The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics

PRINCETON REFERENCE

The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics

Fourth Edition

EDITOR IN CHIEF

Roland Greene
Stanford University

GENERAL EDITOR

Stephen Cushman
University of Virginia

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

Clare Cavanagh
Northwestern University

Jahan Ramazani
University of Virginia

Paul Rouzer
University of Minnesota

ASSISTANT EDITORS

Harris Feinsod
Northwestern University

David Marno
University of California, Berkeley

Alexandra Slessarev
Stanford University

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS

PRINCETON AND OXFORD

Copyright © 2012 by Princeton University Press
Published by Princeton University Press, 41 William Street, Princeton, New Jersey 08540
In the United Kingdom: Princeton University Press, 6 Oxford Street, Woodstock, Oxfordshire OX20 1TW

All Rights Reserved

Based on the original edition. Alex Preminger, editor, Frank J. Warnke and O. B. Hardison, Jr., associate editors.

Cover art: Jiri Kolar, Love Poem, 1964, collage. Photo: Jiri Lammel. Courtesy of the Museum Kampa / The Jan and Meda Mládek Foundation Collection

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The Princeton encyclopedia of poetry and poetics / Roland Greene, editor in chief ; Stephen Cushman, general editor ; Clare Cavanagh, Jahan Ramazani, Paul Rouzer, associate editors ; Harris Feinsod, David Marno, Alexandra Slessarev, assistant editors.—4th ed.
p. cm.
Rev. ed. of : The Princeton encyclopedia of poetry and poetics / Alex Preminger and T.V.F. Brogan, co-editors ; Frank J. Warnke, O.B. Hardison, Jr., and Earl Miner, associate editors. 1993.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-0-691-13334-8 (cloth : alk. paper)—ISBN 978-0-691-15491-6 (pbk. : alk. paper) 1. Poetry—Dictionaries. 2. Poetics—Dictionaries. 3. Poetry—History and criticism. I. Greene, Roland Arthur. II. Cushman, Stephen, 1956- III. Cavanagh, Clare. IV. Ramazani, Jahan, 1960– V. Rouzer, Paul F. VI. Feinsod, Harris. VII. Marno, David. VIII. Slessarev, Alexandra. IX. Princeton encyclopedia of poetry and poetics.
PN1021.N39 2012
808.1'03—dc23 2012005602

British Library Cataloging-in-Publication Data is available

This book has been composed in Adobe Garamond Pro with Myriad Display Printed on acid-free paper. ∞ press.princeton.edu Printed in the United States of America

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

Preface vii

Acknowledgments xi

Topical List of Entries xv

Bibliographical Abbreviations xxiii

General Abbreviations xxvii

Contributors xxviii

Entries A to Z 1

Index 1555

This page intentionally left blank

Preface

Poetics, the theoretical and practical study of poetry, is among the oldest disciplines in the West, one of those founded by Aristotle along with ethics, logic, and political science. The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics is the comprehensive guide to this rich field. This edition of the Encyclopedia significantly develops the past three editions of 1965, 1974, and 1993. Of the more than 1,100 articles, some incorporate and expand their antecedents in those editions, bringing their topics into the present with fresh scholarship and new perspectives. Some 250 entries are entirely new, in response to the changes that poetry and poetics have undergone in the last twenty years. Most articles on major topics have been not only made current but reconceived, in most cases to accommodate a closer attention to poetics. The scope of the Encyclopedia has always been worldwide, concerning (as the original editors put it) the history, theory, technique, and criticism of poetry from earliest times to the present.

The Plan of the Encyclopedia

The solid foundation of the previous editions has offered us the opportunity to enhance coverage without compromising the traditional attention to European and especially English-language poetry and poetics. This edition expands coverage of international poetries, avant-gardes and movements, and the many phenomena, from cognitive poetics to poetry slams to digital poetry that have gained momentum since 1993. Latin America, East and South Asia, Africa, and Eastern Europe are represented here by an infusion of new entries and specialist contributors who present not only the broad canvas of national and regional literary history but the granular detail of informed scholarship.

For instance, to complement the general article on the poetry of the United States, new entries address such topics as the Black Mountain school, the Fireside poets, confessional poetry, and the San Francisco Renaissance. Spanish America is represented by a general essay on the hemispheric tradition in poetry as well as by discrete entries on the poetries of Mexico, Peru, Argentina, Chile, and many other countries. And both sets of articles converse with an authoritative new entry on the poetry of the indigenous Americas, which is in turn augmented by pieces on Guaraní, Inuit, and Navajo poetries, among others. Asian poetry and poetics receive substantial new investments in critical discussion, notably in entries concerning the popular poetry of China, Chinese poetic drama, the influential tenth-century Japanese collection known as the Kokinshū, and the poetry of Cambodia, among others. The coverage of India now involves not only a general entry on the poetry of the subcontinent but many more articles on the history and tradition of poetic forms and styles in various languages from Hindi to Gujarati to Sanskrit. Africa and Eastern Europe see a new measure of attention to countries, languages, movements, and styles.

This wave of locality and specificity changes the character of the Encyclopedia, and brings into the book a wide-ranging cast of contributors, new approaches, and topics of different dimensions. It permitted us to reduce the size and scope of many of the larger entries on national poetries. Free of the obligation to define every episode and movement, the authors of articles on topics such as the poetry of England or the poetry of Spain have been encouraged to delineate a literary history in bold strokes; their narratives are complemented by new items on the particular histories of such topics as Georgianism and neo-Gongorism, respectively. The perspectives of omnibus entries on the poetry of Spanish America or of India still have an important place in this edition, offering the reader both a wide view and a close focus.

Moreover, we have challenged the tacit assumption of many handbooks that general poetic terms may be treated through English-language examples only. A large number of general entries here are written by scholars of poetries other than English—a Hispanist on pastoral, a scholar of the French Renaissance on epideixis, a Persianist on panegyric.

The Encyclopedia includes five kinds of entries: terms and concepts; genres and forms; periods, schools, and movements; the poetries of nations, regions, and languages; and poetry in relation to other cultural forms, disciplines, and social practices such as linguistics, religion, and science. It does not contain entries on poets or works, but discusses these in the context of the larger topics to which they are related. While the A-to-Z format tends to obscure the integrity of these five categories, each one entails certain obligations and challenges.

Terminology makes for one of the most technically exacting aspects of the project. The Encyclopedia remains the authoritative source for brief definitions of particular terms or expansive treatments of broad topics, such as the exhaustive treatment of rhyme. Entries on concepts such as structuralism or speech act theory are designed to engage with poetry over other kinds of literature or writing. This category is home to transhistorical terms such as cento, eclogue, and gai saber; fundamental topics in the history of criticism such as emotion and imagination; and critical concepts of wide application such as ethnopoetics and organicism. From its entries one could assemble a history of ideas in and about poetry.

The rubrics of genre and form often shade into one another, but at the same time they tend to follow complementary logics of openness and limitation, respectively. Most entries on genres, such as those on the alba and the paraclausithyron, follow the evolution of their objects to the present day, while many entries on forms locate them in their original settings of language, epoch, and culture. Nonetheless, the reader will encounter a number of entries that do both, as well as bracing new essays on the concepts of genre and form.

Coverage of periods, schools, and movements has been deepened for this edition, both as a category in itself and within the other categories. For example, postmodern poetry of the United States entails new entries on (among other topics) projective verse, composition by field, Language poetry, and absorption, some contributed by poet-critics in the tradition of William Carlos Williams's entry on the "variable foot" for the 1965 edition. Again, the focus is on poetics. Our entry on naturalism, skewed toward the poetic application of that concept, is very different from an article of the same title in a handbook of general literary criticism or theory.

The fourth category, the poetries of nations, regions, and languages, is a customary strength of the Encyclopedia; many readers have found the past editions a reliable source for introductions to unfamiliar literatures. In this edition we have tried to devise topics that accommodate the histories of national poetries while taking account of local or transnational differences, and that follow languages out of national borders. The results for our nomenclature are described below. Multiple language traditions found within a nation or region are treated as much as is practical, though never fully enough to trace the poetic complexity of modern, multicultural societies.

Finally, the articles concerned with poetry in relation to disciplines, culture, and society—for titles, such entries often take the form of "religion and poetry" or "science and poetry"—have been focused on the implications for the history of poetry as opposed to history in a more general sense. (Depending on the topic and the contributor's approach, some conceptual entries draw a relation to poetics rather than to poetry: thus "anthropology and poetry" but "linguistics and poetics.") From these articles, one could build a history of poetry's relations to the intellectual and cultural world at large.

Of course, these five rubrics are provisional, and many items could move among them. All of the main categories now include entries that reflect on category making, such as "colonial poetics" and "national poetry." A longstanding rubric, "Western poetics," has been answered not by a corresponding omnibus entry for the non-Western world but by new articles on Chinese, Japanese, Sanskrit, and other poetics. Many items are tacitly engaged with one another and might be read in counterpoint (e.g., "criticism," "interpretation," and "hermeneutics," or "imitation," "mimesis," and "representation"); some of these, such as the new set called "poetry as artifact," "poetry as fiction," "poetry as information," and "poetry as knowledge," make a sweeping overview of complementary approaches. (Several other entries continue that overview under various titles: poetry as commodity in "Frankfurt school" and as object of faith in "belief and poetry," and the several entries on terms such as "poem," "text," and "work.") And many important items, such as "politics and poetry," "postcolonial poetics," and of course "poetry," straddle the divisions of the book.

As every reader will notice, this book has been conceived to enable cross-coverages and contradictions insofar as these facts register the current condition of poetry studies. The significance of Whitman or Ḥāfiẓ, the idea of poetic genius, and the continuing implications of the New Criticism are too multifarious to fit into one or two entries. The reader will find these and many other topics in several articles, often from the perspectives of distinctive fields or interests. An index, the first in the history of the Encyclopedia, makes such collations part of the experience of this book.

As the fourth edition of a book that has been in print since 1965, this project carries its history within itself; many entries include the names of past contributors whose entries have been augmented and brought up to date. Every item in the 1993 edition was evaluated by the team of editors.

Some were dropped, while many more were assigned to readers and prospective contributors who were invited to assess the received material. In some cases an old entry stands on its substance while requiring only a new bibliography, which the editors have provided. In others, we publish a collaboration between past and present contributors that could take place only between the covers of this Encyclopedia. The majority of articles, and nearly all of the most prominent ones, have been entirely reconceived by new contributors.

Some six years in the making, this project is also the portrait of a discipline—the worldwide field of poetry studies—in the process of development. It attempts to address the permanent questions in the field, such as the nature of the poetic, while giving some attention to topics that seem to belong to the present and the near future, such as conceptual writing and documentary poetics; it also involves a decided effort on the editors' part to devote resources to topics, such as exegetical interpretation and archetypal criticism, that are currently unfashionable but seem likely to be revived in new manners. No doubt in twenty years the values of this fourth edition will appear in a historical light, but in any case we have chosen both to acknowledge and to transcend the present moment as far as possible. Finally, however, such a project can be only what its population of authors—a cross-section of scholars of poetry around the world—want it to be.

The Conventions of the Fourth Edition

One of the longstanding strengths of the Encyclopedia is its coverage of the poetries of the world. The present edition attempts to make a distinction between poetries that are based in nations or territories and those that are based in language, international cultures, or diasporas—no doubt sometimes an ambiguous difference, but nonetheless one that seems worth making. The entry on the poetry of France is discrete from those on the various francophone poetries of Africa, Canada, or the Caribbean, while Persian poetry is best approached as a single topic with international ramifications. The "poetry of England" and the "poetry of the United States" as topics are preferable to "English" or "American" poetry, with their uncertain but expansive outlines. In its coverage of the British Isles, the former entry is complemented by articles on Welsh, Scottish, and Irish poetries, while the latter is cross-referenced to companion pieces on U.S. poetries wholly or partly in other languages that can claim their own fields of study, such as French-language, Chicana/o, and Asian American poetry. An entry such as "German poetry" takes a linguistic rather than a national approach, but is complemented by entries on Austria, Switzerland, and the Low Countries that follow geopolitical contours and discuss discrete languages within those outlines. In many cases the contributors made the final determination of what to call their entries, which no doubt produces some asymmetries that reflect the differences in the fields represented here.

For example, Walther von der Vogelweide, a poet who wrote in Middle High German, is treated in "German poetry" as the first important political poet in the language, in "poetry of Austria" for his residence in Vienna and service to Duke Frederick I, in "Minnesang" and "Spruchdichtung" for his generic affiliations, in "Meistersinger" for his influence—and in "biography and poetry" as the subject of one of the first biographies of a medieval poet. The result is a comprehensive, multivocal account of many of the signal events in world poetry, from the Occitan troubadours to the modernismo of Rubén Darío to the visual and material poetries of the past fifty years.

Translations are generally given within parentheses, without quotation marks if no other words appear in the parenthetical matter, but set off within quotation marks when some qualification is needed, as in the form of many etymologies: e.g., arsis and thesis (Gr., "raising and lowering"). Translated titles generally appear in the most comprehensive articles, such as those on national poetries or important developments such as "modernism"; entries of smaller scope often give original titles without translation, although contributors have the discretion to translate titles where it clarifies the argument to do so. (We tolerate inconsistency that reflects to some degree the field at hand: thus some major entries, such as "baroque" or "Renaissance poetics," do not translate titles at all; others such as "love poetry" give only translated titles.) Translated titles of books are given in italics when the title refers to an actual English translation: e.g. the Georgian poet Shota Rustaveli's Vepkhis tqaosani (The Man in the Panther's Skin). For poems, translated titles are given with quotation marks when the translation has been published under that title, but without quotation marks when the translated title is ad hoc.

This convention sometimes entails reproducing a non-literal rendering that appears in a published translation, such as Boccaccio's Trattatello in laude di Dante as Life of Dante, or the Guatemalan poet Otto René Castillo's Vámonos patria a caminar as Let's Go! We believe that the value of indicating an extant translation outweighs the occasional infelicity. At the same time, it is likely we have overlooked some published translations, and many new ones will appear over the life of this book.

Dates of the lives and works of poets and critics often appear in the most comprehensive entries on a given topic (e.g. a regional entry such as "poetry of the Low Countries" or a major movement such as "poststructuralism"), showing up less often as topics become narrower. Dates of works in the age of print refer to publication unless otherwise indicated.

Articles contain two types of cross-references: those that appear within the body of an entry (indicated with asterisks or in parentheses with small capitals), and those that follow an entry, just before the bibliographies. If the former are often topics that extend the fabric of the definition at hand, the latter often indicate adjacent topics of broader interest. Of course, both kinds of cross-reference hold out the danger of infinite connection: nearly every entry could be linked to many others, and the countless usages of terms such as line, metaphor, and poetics cannot all be linked to the entries concerned with those terms. Accordingly we have tried to apply cross-references judiciously, indicating where further reading in a related entry really complements the argument at hand.

The bibliographies are intended as guides to relevant scholarship of the distant and recent past, not only as lists of works cited in the entries. The bibliographies have been lightly standardized, but some entries—say, those that narrate the development of a field—gain from citing works of scholarship in their original iterations (John Crowe Ransom's essay "Criticism, Inc." in its first appearance in the Virginia Quarterly Review of 1937) or in their original languages—while many others choose to cite later editions or translations into English as a convenience for the reader.

The deliberately limited standardization of the volume allows the reader to observe the conditions and assumptions that are native to each national literature, topic, or approach represented: something as fundamental as what "classical" or "hermeticism" means, or as technical as where one finds an important essay by Roman Jakobson, may appear differently at several places in the book. One might learn a great deal by noticing these facts—in effect, by interpreting the Encyclopedia itself as a living document of the discipline that unites us across languages, periods, and methods, namely the study of poetry and poetics.

The State of the Field

As a discipline, poetics is undergoing a renewal. In the past it was sometimes conceived as an antiquarian field, a vehicle for broadly theoretical issues in literature, or a name for poets' reflections on their practice. Recently, however, the discipline has turned more explicitly toward historical and cross-cultural questions. In the United States, research groups on poetics at several universities have contributed to this momentum, as have digital projects that render the materials of historical and international poetries readily available and make new kinds of conversation possible. Ventures such as this Encyclopedia, new and old at once, contribute to this conversation by introducing scholars to one another, by opening local topics to comparative attention, and most of all by providing information and perspective.

For two generations The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics has been the common property of the worldwide community of poetry scholars. We are proud to bring it, renewed, to another generation.

Acknowledgments

The fourth edition of The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics has been a collective work of the worldwide community of poetry scholars over several years. It began at the instigation of Anne Savarese, executive editor for reference at Princeton University Press, whose judgment and taste have conditioned the project at every stage. At the Press, Claire Tillman-McTigue and Diana Goovaerts kept the assembly of authors in contact with the editors, and the editors in touch with one another. Ellen Foos, production editor for the volume, was unfailingly patient with wayward editors and stretched deadlines. Mary Lou Bertucci copyedited the text and is responsible for matters of consistency.

The editors gratefully acknowledge the help of the research assistants who have been involved with the Encyclopedia over the years: Sarah Bishop, Lauren Boehm, Maia Draper, Jaime Lynn Farrar, Suzanne Ashley King, Elizabeth Molmen, Frank Rodriguez, Whitney Trump, and Daniel Veraldi. At Stanford University, R. Lucas Coe maintained communications with the Press.

The heart of the book, its 1,100 articles, were conceived, evaluated, and improved by the gathering of contributors, whose names appear elsewhere in the front matter. Many of them read and commented anonymously on the work of others. Some did much more, especially Walter G. Andrews, Yigal Bronner, Marisa Galvez, Joseph Lease, Marjorie Perloff, and Haun Saussy.

The scholars, poets, and others who did not write articles for this edition but nonetheless advised the project are a distinguished roster, and this book belongs to them as well: Txetxu Aguado, Jaime Alazraki, David Atwell, Shahzad Bashir, Stephen C. Berkwitz, Paula Blank, Elisabeth Boyi, Dominic Parviz Brookshaw, Marina Brownlee, Ardis Butterfield, Melanie Conroy, Neil Corcoran, Mary Thomas Crane, John Dagenais, Wai Chee Dimock, Craig Dworkin, Lazar Fleishman, Barbara Fuchs, Christina Galvez, Forrest Gander, J. Neil Garcia, Simon Gaunt, Michael Gluzman, Fabian Goppelsröder, Margaret Greer, Timothy Hampton, Benjamin Harshav, Waïl Hassan, Héctor Hoyos, Jasmine Hu, Alex Hunt, Witi Ihimaera, Kate Jenckes, F. Sionil Jose, Smaro Kamboureli, Sarah Kay, Maurice Kilwein Guevara, Seth Kimmel, Paul Kiparsky, Rachel Lee, Seth Lerer, Chris Mann, Annabel Martín, John Maynard, Natalie Melas, Farzaneh Milani, Ignacio Navarrete, Patricia Parker, Michael Predmore, Phoebe Putnam, Margaret Reid, Joan Ramon Resina, Alicia Rios, Hollis Robbins, Janice Ross, David Rubin, Susan Schultz, David Shulman, Richard Sieburth, Barbara Herrnstein Smith, Sidonie Smith, Ann Smock, Willard Spiegelman, Susan Stephens, Marlene van Niekerk, Susanne Woods, Kevin Young, Shu Yi Zhou, and Jan Ziolkowski.

Finally, we gratefully acknowledge the following authors, publishers, and agents for granting us permission to use brief selections from the copyrighted material listed below. Great care has been taken to trace all the owners of copyrighted material used in this book. Any inadvertent omissions pointed out to us will be gladly acknowledged in future printings.

Alurista for five lines of his poem "Mis ojos hinchados."

Arte Público Press for ten lines of "Guitarreros" by Américo Paredes, from Between Two Worlds, copyright © 1991 by Arte Público Press; and four lines of "Emily Dickinson" by Lucha Corpi, from Palabras de Mediodia/Noon Words, copyright © 1980 by Arte Público Press. Both reprinted by permission of Arte Público Press.

Gordon Brotherston for six lines of his translation of Preuss's musings on the Witoto; six lines of his translation of a traditional Quechua hymn; and twelve lines of his translation from the Nahuatl of an excerpt from Cuauhtitlan Annals.

The University of California Press for five lines of "The Box" by Robert Creeley, from The Collected Poems of Robert Creeley, 1945–1960, copyright © 2006 by the Regents of the University of California; and two lines of "Two Voices" by Khalil Gibran from An Anthology of Modern Arabic Poetry, edited by Hamid Algar and Mounah Khouri, copyright © 1974 by the Regents of the University of California. Both reprinted by permission of the University of California Press.

Cambridge University Press for three lines of "Eulogy" by al-Mutanabbi, from Poems of al-Mutanabbi, translated by A. J. Arberry, copyright © 1967 by Cambridge University Press; and three lines by al-Khansa, from Arabic Poetry: A Primer for Students, translated by A. J. Arberry, copyright © 1965 by Cambridge University Press. Both reprinted by the permission of Cambridge University Press.

Coach House Books for four lines from Eunoia, by Christian Bök (Coach House Books, 2001, updated 2009).

Columbia University Press for six lines of "Tansim ka, or, Song of a Loyal Heart" from Early Korean Literature: Selections and Introductions, by David R. McCann, copyright © 2000 Columbia University Press; twelve lines of "Azaleas," six lines of "Winter Sky," and eighteen lines of "Grasses," each from The Columbia Anthology of Modern Korean Poetry, edited by David R. McCann, copyright © 2004 Columbia University Press. All reprinted by permission of the publisher.

Jayne Cortez for eight lines of "If the Drum Is a Woman," copyright © 2011 by Jayne Cortez.

Faber and Faber Ltd. for two lines of "The Hollow Men" by T. S. Eliot from Collected Poems 1909–1962 by T. S. Eliot, copyright © 1974 by Faber and Faber, Ltd.; three lines of "The Fragment" by Seamus Heaney, from Electric Light, copyright © 2001 by Seamus Heaney and reprinted by permission of Faber and Faber, Ltd.; "In a Station of the Metro" by Ezra Pound, from Personae, copyright © 1926 by Ezra Pound; and "Red Wheel Barrow" by William Carlos Williams, from The Collected Poems: Volume I, 1909–1939, copyright © 1938 by William Carlos Williams. All reprinted by permission of Faber and Faber, Ltd.

Rafael Jesús González for eleven lines of his poem "The Coin (Ars Poetica)" from El hacedor de juegos/The Maker of Games (San Francisco: Casa Editorial, 1977; 2nd edition, 1987), copyright © 2012 by Rafael Jesús González. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Graywolf Press for thirteen lines of "John Col" by Elizabeth Alexander from The Venus Hottentot, copyright © 1990 by the Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia.

Harvard University Press for five lines of "Artifice of Absorption" from A Poetics by Charles Bernstein, Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, copyright © 1992 by Charles Bernstein; four lines of The Kalevala: Or, Poems of the Kalevala District, compiled by Elias Lönnrot, translated by Francis Peabody Magoun, Jr., Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, copyright © 1963 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College. Both reprinted by permission of the publisher.

University of Hertfordshire Press for twelve lines from an untitled poem translated by Iren Kertesz-Wilkinson, published in Romani Culture and Gypsy Identity, edited by T. A. Acton and G. Mundy, University of Hertfordshire Press, 1997; nine lines of "O Land, I Am Your Daughter" by Bronislawa Wajs and four lines of "Roads of the Roma" by Leksa Manus, both published in The Roads of the Roma: A PEN Anthology of Gypsy Writers, copyright © 1998 by PEN American Center, University of Hertfordshire Press.

Henry Holt and Company for two lines of "The Gift Outright" from The Poetry of Robert Frost, edited by Edward Connery Lathem, copyright © 1969 by Henry Holt and Company, copyright © 1942 by Robert Frost, copyright © 1970 by Lesley Frost Ballantine. Reprinted by permission of Henry Holt and Company, LLC.

Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company for excerpts from "The Hollow Men" from Collected Poems 1909–1962 by T. S. Eliot, copyright © 1936 by Harcourt, Inc. and renewed by T. S. Eliot; and eight lines of "It Is Dangerous to Read Newspapers" from Selected Poems I, 1965–1975 by Margaret Atwood, copyright © 1976 by Margaret Atwood. Both reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.

Robert Huey for permission to reprint five lines of his translation of "Shinkokinshū" by Fujiwara Teika.

Phoebe Larrimore Literary Agency for eight lines of "It Is Dangerous to Read Newspapers" by Margaret Atwood, used by permission of the author. Available in the following collections: In the United States, Selected Poems I, 1965–1975, published by Houghton Mifflin, copyright © Margaret Atwood 1976; in Canada, Selected Poems, 1966–1984, published by McClelland and Stewart, copyright © Margaret Atwood 1990; in the UK, Eating Fire, published by Virago Books, copyright © Margaret Atwood 1998.

Ian Monk for excerpts from his poems "A Threnodialist's Dozen" and "Elementary Morality."

James T. Monroe for his translation of "Envoie to a Love Poem" from Hispano-Arabic Poetry: A Student Anthology, published by the University of California Press, 1974.

José Montoya for six lines of his poem "El Louie."

New Directions Publishing Corporation for five lines of "The Five Day Rain" by Denise Levertov, from Collected Earlier Poems 1940–1960, copyright © 1960 by Denise Levertov; four lines of "Poems" by Dylan Thomas, from Collected Poems, copyright © 1952 by Dylan Thomas; five lines of "Epigram (After the Greek)" by H. D. (Hilda Doolittle), from Collected Poems, 1912–1944, copyright © 1982 by The Estate of Hilda Doolittle; "In a Station of the Metro" by Ezra Pound, from Personae, copyright © 1926 by Ezra Pound; and "Red Wheel Barrow" by William Carlos Williams, from The Collected Poems: Volume I, 1909–1939, copyright © 1938 by New Directions Publishing Corp. All reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.

Nightwood Editions for six lines of "language (in)habits" from Forage by Rita Wong, published by Nightwood Editions, 2007; http://www.nightwoodeditions.com.

Oxford University Press for eight lines of "It Is Dangerous to Read Newspapers" from Margaret Atwood, The Animals in that Country, copyright © 1969 Oxford University Press Canada. Reprinted by permission of the publisher.

Burton Raffel for his translation of a pantun, the traditional Malay four-line verse.

Random House for four lines of "River Snow" from The Anchor Book of Chinese Poetry, edited by Tony Barnstone and Chou Ping, copyright © 2005 by Tony Barnstone and Chou Ping. Used by permission of Anchor Books, a division of Random House, Inc.

Lynne Rienner Publications for five lines of "Lazarus 1962" by Khalil Hawi from Naked in Exile: The Threshing Floors of Hunger, translated by Adnan Haydar and Michael Beard, © 1984. Reprinted by permission of Lynne Rienner Publications.

Sonia Sanchez for four lines of her poem "a / coltrane / poem."

Maekawa Sajuro for five lines of an untitled poem from Shokubutsusai by Maekawa Samio, translated by Leith Morton.

Simon & Schuster, Inc., for three lines of "Leda and the Swan," reprinted by the permission of Scribner, a Division of Simon & Schuster, Inc., from The Collected Works of W. B. Yeats, Volume 1: The Poems, Revised by W. B. Yeats, edited by Richard J. Finneran, copyright © 1928 by the Macmillan Company, renewed 1956 by Georgie Yeats. All rights reserved.

Society of Biblical Literature for six lines of "Kirta," from Ugaritic Narrative Poetry, edited by Simon B. Parker, copyright © 1997. Reprinted by permission of the Society of Biblical Literature.

Talon Books for twenty-one lines of "Naked Poems" from Selected Poems: The Vision Tree copyright © 1982 Phyllis Webb, Talon Books, Vancouver, B.C. Reprinted by permission of the publisher.

University of Virginia Press for four lines of "A Warm Day in Winter" by Paul Laurence Dunbar from The Collected Poetry of Paul Laurence Dunbar, edited by Joanne M. Braxton, copyright © 1993 Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia. Reprinted by permission of the University of Virginia Press.

Wesleyan University Press for eight lines of "Spring Images" by James Wright from Collected Poems, copyright © 1971 by James Wright; eleven lines of "Altazor" by Vincente Huidobro, translated by Eliot Weinberger, copyright © 2004 by Eliot Weinberger. Both reprinted by permission of Wesleyan University Press.

This page intentionally left blank

Topical List of Entries

Terms and Concepts
Genres and Forms
Periods, Schools, and Movements
National, Regional, and Diasporic Poetries
Poetry in Culture and Society

Terms and Concepts

absorption accent accentual-syllabic verse accentual verse acephalous address adonic adynaton aeolic aestheticism affect affective fallacy afflatus agudeza alaṃkāra alcaic alcmanic verse aleatory poetics alexandrine allaeostropha alliteration allusion ambiguity amphibrach amplification anaclasis anacoluthon anacreontic anacrusis anadiplosis anagram analogy. See METAPHOR; SIMILE; SYMBOL anapest anaphora anceps anthimeria anthology anticlimax antimetabole antispast antistrophe antithesis antonomasia antropofagia aphaeresis apocope aporia aposiopesis apostrophe appreciation archaism archetype archilochian argument arsis and thesis arte mayor arte menor artifice, poetic Arzamas asclepiad assonance asynarteton asyndeton attention audience. See PERFORMANCE; READER; READER RESPONSE; RHETORIC AND POETRY aureate diction autonomy auto sacramental autotelic auxesis bacchius ballad meter, hymn meter bard
barzelletta. See FROTTOLA AND BARZELLETTA bathos beat binary and ternary bob and wheel book, poetic boustrophedon bouts-rimés bridge broken rhyme burden Burns stanza bylina caccia cacophony cadence caesura
cancionero/cancioneiro
canon cante jondo canticum and diverbium canto canzone canzoniere capitolo carmen carmina figurata carpe diem catachresis catalexis catalog catharsis cauda caudate sonnet cento chain rhyme character, Theophrastan chastushka chiasmus choliambus choriamb chorus
Christabel meter
Chuci classical meters in modern languages classical poetics
classicism clavis cliché climax close reading close rhyme closure cobla codework cognitive poetics colon colonial poetics commonplace
composition. See ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY; POET; RHETORIC AND POETRY; VERSIFICATION composition by field concatenation conceit conceptismo concision concrete universal connotation and denotation consonance constraint conte dévot contests, poetic. See POETIC CONTESTS; POETRY SLAM contrafactum convention copla coq-à-l'âne corona coronach correlative verse cossante

counterpoint counterpoint rhythm coupe couplet courtly love cretic criticism cross rhyme cuaderna vía cueca chilena cultural criticism curtal sonnet cybertext cynghanedd cywydd dactyl dactylo-epitrite dansa dead metaphor decadence decasyllable décima decir decorum defamiliarization deixis demotion descort dhvani diaeresis dialogue diction difficulty dimeter dindshenchas dipodism, dipodic verse discordia concors dissociation of sensibility dissonance distich dithyramb ditty divan dizer dochmiac dol'nik double dactyl dozens duration dyfalu eclogue écriture eisteddfod elegiac distich elegiac stanza elision ellipsis emotion empathy and sympathy enargeia end-stopped en(h)oplian enjambment envelope envoi epanalepsis epenthesis epiploke epitrite epode equivalence estilística estribillo ethnopoetics ethos euphony evaluation exegesis exemplum exoticism explication explication de texte expression eye rhyme fancy fatras feigning figura figuration fili flyting folia foot formalism formula fourteener fractal verse fragment Frankfurt school frottola and barzelletta furor poeticus gai saber gaita gallega galliamb(us) generative metrics generic rhyme Geneva school genius Gesellschaftslied glosa glossolalia glyconic grammatical rhyme Greek Anthology
greguería Guslar
haibun
Hebraism
Hellenism. See GREEK POETRY; HEBRAISM hemiepes hemistich hendecasyllable hendiadys heptameter heptasyllable hermeneutics hermeticism heroic couplet heterogram heterometric heteronym hexameter hiatus hieroglyph historicism homodyne and heterodyne homoeoteleuton hovering accent hudibrastic verse huitain humors hypallage hyperbaton hyperbole hypermetric hypogram hypometric hyporchema hypotaxis and parataxis hysteron proteron iambe iambic iambic shortening iconicity iconology ictus identical rhyme ideogram idyll image imagery imagination imitation incantation incremental repetition indeterminacy influence in medias res
In Memoriam stanza inscape and instress inspiration intensity intention intentional fallacy internal rhyme interpretation intertextuality intuition invective invention ionic irony isochronism or isochrony

isocolon and parison isometric ithyphallic je ne sais quoi jitanjáfora jongleur kenning kharja Kokinshū laisse lauda
laureate. See POET LAUREATE leich leonine rhyme, verse letrilla line lipogram lira litotes logaoedic mal mariée Man'yōshū masculine and feminine matrix measure meiosis melopoeia, phanopoeia, logopoeia metalepsis or transumption metaphor meter metonymy metrici and rhythmici metron mime mimesis minstrel molossus monk's tale stanza monody monometer monorhyme monostich mora mosaic rhyme mote motif muse myth naïve-sentimental narrator. See PERSONA; VOICE national poetry nature Natureingang near rhyme negative capability neoterics
New Criticism
New Historicism Nibelungenstrophe
novas (rimadas) number(s) numerology objective correlative obscurity octave octonarius octosyllable odl
Omar Khayyám quatrain Onegin stanza onomatopoeia open form oral-formulaic theory oral poetry organicism originality ornament ottava rima oxymoron paeon palindrome parabasis paraclausithyron paradox paralipsis parallelism paraphrase, heresy of parenthesis paroemiac paronomasia partimen pathetic fallacy pathos patronage pause pentameter penthemimer performance period periphrasis persona personification phalaecean phonestheme pie quebrado pitch plain style ploce plot poet poète maudit poetess poetic contests poetic function poetic license poetic madness poetics, Western poet laureate poetry reading poiēsis point of view. See PERSONA; PLOT; VOICE polyptoton polysemy polysyndeton postcolonial poetics poststructuralism poulter's measure préciosité pregunta presence priamel priapea proceleusmatic promotion pronunciation prose rhythm prosimetrum prosodic feature analysis of verse prosody prosopopoeia pseudo-statement
pun. See PARONOMASIA punctuation pure poetry pyrrhic pythiambic qiṭʿa quantity quatrain querelle des anciens et des modernes quintain reader reader response reception theory. See READER RESPONSE recitation refrain refrán refrein rejet relative stress principle remate renga repetition representation resolution responsion reversed consonance reverse rhyme rhapsode rhopalic verse rhyme rhyme counterpoint rhyme-prose rhyme royal rhyme scheme rhythm rhythmic figures rich rhyme
rime riche. See IDENTICAL RHYME; RHYME; RICH RHYME

rising and falling rhythm ritornello rota virgiliana rune running rhythm Saturnian saudosismo scansion scheme Schüttelreim scop seguidilla senarius senhal sensibility sentimentality septenarius septet serial form serranilla sestet sexain Shijing Shinkokinshū Sicilian octave sign, signified, signifier signifying simile sincerity
slang. See DICTION śleṣa songbook sound space, poetic spatial form
speaker. See PERSONA; VOICE speech act theory Spenserian stanza split lines spoken word. See PERFORMANCE spondee spontaneity Spruchdichtung sprung rhythm stances stanza stave stichomythia stichos stock stornello strambotto strophe structure style stylistics sublime substitution syllabic verse syllable syllepsis symbol synaeresis synaesthesia synaloepha synapheia syncopation syncope synecdoche system syzygy tail rhyme taste technopaegnion telesilleum tenor and vehicle tercet tetrameter tétramètre text textual criticism textuality texture thematics timbre tlacuilolli tmesis tone topos tornada Tottel's Miscellany touchstones tradition translation tribrach trilogy trimeter trimètre triple rhyme triplet trobairitz trobar clus, trobar leu trochaic trope troubadour trouvère typography unity upamā ut pictura poesis utprekṣā variable foot variation vates Venus and Adonis stanza verisimilitude. See MIMESIS vers verse and prose verse paragraph verse systems. See METER verset versification versi sciolti vers libéré vers mesurés à l'antique verso piano verso sdrucciolo verso tronco vida villancico visual rhyme. See EYE RHYME voice volta Wartburgkrieg wheel. See BOB AND WHEEL wit word-count work wrenched accent xenoglossia yuefu zaum' zeugma

Genres and Forms

abecedarius acrostic air alba allegory anecdote anthem, national aphorism. See EPIGRAM
balada balagtasan ballad ballade beast epic bestiary
Biblical poetry. See HEBREW POETRY; HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS; HYMN; PSALM blank verse blason blues broadside ballad bucolic
burlesque. See CONTRAFACTUM; PARODY; PASTICHE calendrical poetry calligramme canción canso cantar cantiga carol chanso, chanson. See FRANCE, POETRY OF; OCCITAN POETRY; SONGBOOK; TROUBADOUR; TROUVÈRE
chanson de geste
chanson de toile chant chante-fable chant royal charm ci clerihew closet drama collage comedy comma poem companion poems complaint computational poetry conceptual poetry concrete poetry conversation poem

corrido. See CHICANA/O POETRY; ROMANCE country house poem cowboy poetry descriptive poetry devotional poetry dialect poetry didactic poetry Dinggedicht dirge dit dizain doggerel dramatic monologue. See MONOLOGUE dramatic poetry dream vision
dub poetry. See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE echo verse ecstatic poetry edda ekphrasis electronic poetry elegy emblem encomium endecha englyn ensalada ensenhamen epic epicedium epideictic poetry epigram epinikion epitaph epithalamium epithet epyllion erotic poetry espinela estampida fable fabliau fescennine verses finida folk poetry. See ORAL POETRY form found poetry free verse freie rhythmen freie verse fu gaucho poetry genre georgic ghazal gnomic poetry Goliardic verse haikai haiku, Western heroic verse hybrid poetry hymn jingle kind Knittelvers lai lament landscape poem letter, verse. See VERSE EPISTLE lied light verse limerick liturgical poetry long poem love poetry lullaby lyric lyric sequence macaronic verse madrigal manifesto masnavī masque medieval romance melic poetry micropoetries Minnesang
mock epic, mock heroic monologue morale élémentaire
muwashshaḥ. See AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF; ARABIC POETRY; HEBREW POETRY narrative poetry nativity poem Nō nonsense verse nursery rhymes occasional verse ode paean palinode panegyric pantun parody pastiche pastoral pastourelle pattern poetry. See CALLIGRAMME; CONCRETE POETRY; TECHNOPAEGNION; VISUAL POETRY payada penitential psalms planctus planh poem poetry poetry slam political verse proem prophetic poetry prose poem proverb psalm psalms, metrical qaṣīda quatorzain quintilla
rap. See HIP-HOP POETICS razo
recusatio redondilla reverdie riddle rímur ring composition rispetto romance rondeau rondel rotrouenge roundel rubāʿī saga sapphic satire sestina sextilla shi silloi silva sirventes Skeltonic skolion
slam, poetry. See POETRY SLAM song sonnet sonnet sequence sotadean sound poetry spiritual stasimon tagelied tenso terza rima terza rima sonnet toast tragedy tragicomedy triolet tumbling verse

verse drama. See DRAMATIC POETRY verse epistle verse novel. See NARRATIVE POETRY vers libre villanelle virelai visual poetry waka war poetry ymryson
zéjel

Periods, Schools, and Movements

acmeism
Agrarians Alexandrianism
Areopagus avant-garde poetics baroque Beat poetry
Biedermeier
Black Arts movement
Black Mountain school
Cavalier poets
Chicago school Ciceronianism classical poetics
classical prosody
Cockney school of poetry confessional poetry Connecticut wits constructivism courtly makers creationism cubism
Dada
Dark Room Collective Deep Image
Dolce stil nuovo
ecopoetry. See ENVIRONMENT AND POETRY Évora critics
expressionism Félibrige
Finland-Swedish modernists
Fireside poets
Flarf
fleshly school of poetry Fugitives
futurism Fyrtiotalisterna gay poetry Georgianism graveyard poetry
Harlem Renaissance
Hellenistic poetics. See ALEXANDRIANISM; CLASSICAL POETICS Hellenistic poetry. See GREEK POETRY hip-hop poetics imagism impressionism jazz poetry Jindyworobak
Kootenay school Lake school Language poetry lesbian poetry lettrisme mannerism Marinism medieval poetics medieval poetry Meistersinger metaphysical poetry minimalism modernism modernismo
Moscow-Tartu school. See STRUCTURALISM Movement, the naturalism Negritude neobaroque neoclassical poetics neo-Gongorism
New Formalism
New York school
Nil Volentibus Arduum
Noigandres
Norske Selskab
Nuyorican Poets Café
objectivism
Oulipo
Parnassianism
Petrarchism Pléiade postmodernism
Prague school. See STRUCTURALISM
Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood
Pre-Raphaelitism
preromanticism primitivism
procedural poetry. See ALEATORY POETICS; CONCEPTUAL POETRY; OULIPO projective verse protest poetry queer poetry realism rederijkers
Renaissance poetics Renaissance poetry rhétoriqueurs, grands Rhymers' Club
rococo
romantic and postromantic poetry and poetics romanticism
Russian formalism
San Francisco Renaissance Satanic school school of Spenser Scottish Chaucerians or Makars seconde rhétorique Sicilian school smithy poets spasmodic school structuralism Sturm und Drang surrealism symbolism Tachtigers
Tel Quel
TISH Transcendentalists
ultraism vorticism
XUL

National, Regional, and Diasporic Poetries

Africa, poetry of African American poetry
Afrikaans poetry. See SOUTH AFRICA, POETRY OF Akkadian poetry. See ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, POETRY OF Al-Andalus, poetry of Albania, poetry of American Indian poetry. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; INUIT POETRY; NAVAJO POETRY
American poetry. See UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE American Sign Language poetry
Amerind poetry. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE Amharic poetry. See ETHIOPIA, POETRY OF Arabic poetics
Arabic poetry
Arabic prosody
Araucanian poetry. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE Argentina, poetry of Armenian poetry and poetics
Asian American poetry
Assamese poetry
Assyria and Babylonia, poetry of Australia, poetry of Austria, poetry of Aztec poetry. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE Basque Country, poetry of the Belarus, poetry of. See RUSSIA, POETRY OF Belgium, poetry of Bengali poetry
Bhakti poetry. See INDIA, POETRY OF
Bolivia, poetry of Bosnian poetry Brazil, poetry of Breton poetry Bulgaria, poetry of Byzantine poetry
Cambodia, poetry of Canada, poetry of

Caribbean, poetry of the Catalan poetry
Celtic prosody
Chicana/o poetry Chile, poetry of China, modern poetry of China, poetry of China, popular poetry of Chinese poetic drama
Chinese poetics
Chinese poetry in English translation
Chinese poetry in Japan
Colombia, poetry of Cornish poetry
Croatian poetry Cuba, poetry of. See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE Czech poetry
Danish poetry. See DENMARK, POETRY OF Denmark, poetry of Dutch poetry. See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE Ecuador, poetry of Egypt, poetry of El Salvador, poetry of England, poetry of English prosody
Esperanto poetry
Estonia, poetry of Ethiopia, poetry of Finland, poetry of Flemish poetry. See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE France, poetry of francophone poets of the U.S.
French poetry. See FRANCE, POETRY OF French prosody
Frisian poetry
Gaelic poetry. See IRELAND, POETRY OF; SCOTLAND, POETRY OF Galicia, poetry of Georgia, poetry of Germanic prosody
German poetry
Greek poetics. See ALEXANDRIANISM; BYZANTINE POETRY; CLASSICAL POETICS Greek poetry
Guaraní poetry Guatemala, poetry of Gujarati poetry
Gypsy poetry. See ROMANI POETRY Haiti, poetry of. See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE Hausa poetry Hebrew poetry
Hebrew prosody and poetics
Hindi poetry
Hispano-Arabic poetry. See AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF Hittite poetry Hungary, poetry of Iceland, poetry of Inca poetry. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE India, English poetry of India, poetry of Indian prosody indigenous Americas, poetry of the Indonesian poetry
Inuit poetry
Iranian poetry. See PERSIAN POETRY Ireland, poetry of Italian prosody
Italy, poetry of Japan, modern poetry of Japan, poetry of Japanese linked verse. See RENGA
Japanese poetic diaries
Japanese poetics
Java, poetry of. See INDONESIAN POETRY
Judeo-Spanish poetry
Kannada poetry
Kashmiri poetry Korea, poetry of Ladino poetry. See JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY Latin America, poetry of. See ARGENTINA, POETRY OF; BOLIVIA, POETRY OF; BRAZIL, POETRY OF; CHILE, POETRY OF; COLOMBIA, POETRY OF; ECUADOR, POETRY OF; EL SALVADOR, POETRY OF; GAUCHO POETRY; GUARANÍ POETRY; GUATEMALA, POETRY OF; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; MAPUCHE POETRY; MEXICO, POETRY OF; NICARAGUA, POETRY OF; PERU, POETRY OF; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF; URUGUAY, POETRY OF; VENEZUELA, POETRY OF Latin poetics. See CLASSICAL POETICS; CLASSICISM; MEDIEVAL POETICS Latin poetry
Latin prosody. See CLASSICAL PROSODY Latvia, poetry of Lithuania, poetry of Low Countries, poetry of the Macedonian poetry
Magyar poetry. See HUNGARY, POETRY OF Malayalam poetry
Malay poetry
Maori poetry. See NEW ZEALAND, POETRY OF Mapuche poetry
Marathi poetry
Mayan poetry. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE Mesoamerica, poetry of. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE Mexican American poetry. See CHICANA/O POETRY Mexico, poetry of Mongolia, poetry of Mozarabic poetry. See SPAIN, POETRY OF Nahuatl, poetry of. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE Native American poetry. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; INUIT POETRY; NAVAJO POETRY
Navajo poetry
Nepāl Bhāṣa. See NEWAR POETRY
Nepali and Pahari poetry Netherlands, poetry of the. See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE Newar poetry
New Norse (Nynorsk)
New Zealand, poetry of Nicaragua, poetry of Norse poetry
Norway, poetry of Nuyorican poetry
Occitan poetry
Oriya poetry
Persian poetry
Peru, poetry of Philippines, poetry of the Poland, poetry of Polynesian poetry Portugal, poetry of Prakrit poetry
Provençal poetry. See OCCITAN POETRY Puerto Rico, poetry of. See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE Punjabi poetry
Rāmāyaṇa poetry
Romania, poetry of Romani poetry
Romansh poetry. See SWITZERLAND, POETRY OF Russia, poetry of Sanskrit poetics
Sanskrit poetry Scotland, poetry of Scottish Gaelic poetry. See SCOTLAND, POETRY OF Sephardic poetry. See JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY
Serbian poetry
Siamese poetry. See THAILAND, POETRY OF Sindhi poetry. See INDIA, POETRY OF Sinhalese poetry. See SRI LANKA, POETRY OF Slavic poetics. See BOSNIAN POETRY; CROATIAN POETRY; CZECH POETRY; POLAND, POETRY OF; RUSSIA, POETRY OF; SERBIAN POETRY; SLOVENIAN POETRY Slovakia, poetry of Slovenian poetry
Somali poetry
South Africa, poetry of South America, poetry of. See ARGENTINA, POETRY OF; BOLIVIA, POETRY OF; BRAZIL, POETRY OF; CHILE, POETRY OF; COLOMBIA, POETRY OF; ECUADOR, POETRY OF; GAUCHO POETRY; GUARANÍ

POETRY; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; MAPUCHE POETRY; PERU, POETRY OF; URUGUAY, POETRY OF; VENEZUELA, POETRY OF Spain, poetry of Spanish America, poetry of Spanish prosody
Sri Lanka, poetry of Sumerian poetry
Swahili poetry Sweden, poetry of Switzerland, poetry of Tamil poetry and poetics
Telugu poetry
Thailand, poetry of Tibet, contemporary poetry of Tibet, traditional poetry and poetics of Turkic poetry Turkish poetry Ukraine, poetry of United States, poetry of the Urdu poetry
Uruguay, poetry of Vedic poetry. See INDIA, POETRY OF Venezuela, poetry of Vietnam, poetry of Welsh poetry
Welsh prosody. See CELTIC PROSODY
West Indian poetry. See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE Xhosa poetry
Yiddish poetry
Yoruba poetry. See AFRICA, POETRY OF Zulu poetry

Poetry in Culture and Society anthropology and poetry artifact, poetry as belief and poetry
biography and poetry cultural studies and poetry dance and poetry documentary poetics environment and poetry feminist approaches to poetry fiction, poetry as gender and poetry history and poetry information, poetry as knowledge, poetry as linguistics and poetics music and poetry novel, poetry in the painting and poetry philosophy and poetry poetry therapy. See THERAPY AND POETRY politics and poetry psychology and poetry religion and poetry rhetoric and poetry science and poetry semantics and poetry semiotics and poetry syntax, poetic technology and poetry therapy and poetry visual arts and poetry. See CARMINA FIGURATA; CONCRETE POETRY; EKPHRASIS; PAINTING AND POETRY; UT PICTURA POESIS; VISUAL POETRY

Bibliographical Abbreviations

Abrams M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition, 1953
AION-SL Annali dell'Istituto Universitario Orientale di Napoli: sezione filologico-letteraria
AJP American Journal of Philology
AJS American Journal of Semiotics
AL American Literature
Allen W. S. Allen, Accent and Rhythm, 1973
Analecta hymnica Analecta hymnica medii aevi, ed. G. M. Dreves, C. Blume, and H. M. Bannister, 55 v., 1886–1922
Attridge, Poetic Rhythm D. Attridge, Poetic Rhythm: An Introduction, 1995
Attridge, Rhythms D. Attridge, The Rhythms of English Poetry, 1982
Auerbach E. Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature, trans. W. R. Trask, 1953

Beare W. Beare, Latin Verse and European Song, 1957
Bec P. Bec, La Lyrique Française au moyen âge (XIIe–XIIIe siècles): Contribution à une typologie des genres poétiques médiévaux, 2 v., 1977–78
Benjamin W. Benjamin, "The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction," Illuminations, trans. H. Zohn, 1968
BGDSL (H) Beiträge zur Geschichte de deutschen Sprache und Literatur (Halle)
BGDSL (T) Beiträge zur Geschichte de deutschen Sprache und Literatur (Tübingen)
BHS Bulletin of Hispanic Studies
BJA British Journal of Aesthetics
Bowra C. M. Bowra, Greek Lyric Poetry from Alcman to Simonides, 2d ed., 1961
Bridges R. Bridges, Milton's Prosody, rev. ed., 1921
Brogan T.V.F. Brogan, English Versification, 1570–1980: A Reference Guide with a Global Appendix, 1981
Brooks C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn, 1947
Brooks and Warren C. Brooks and W. P. Warren, Understanding Poetry, 3d ed., 1960

Carper and Attridge T. Carper and D. Attridge, Meter and Meaning: An Introduction to Rhythm, 2003
CBEL Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. F. W. Bateson, 4 v., 1940; v. 5, Supplement, ed. G. Watson, 1957
CBFL A Critical Bibliography of French Literature, gen. ed. D. C. Cabeen and R. A. Brooks, 6 v., 1947–1994
CE College English
Chambers F. M. Chambers, An Introduction to Old Provençal Versification, 1985
Chatman S. Chatman, A Theory of Meter, 1965
CHCL Cambridge History of Classical Literature, v. 1, Greek Literature, ed. P. E. Easterling and B.M.W. Knox, 1985; v. 2, Latin Literature, ed. E. J. Kenney and W. V. Clausen, 1982
CHEL Cambridge History of English Literature, ed. A. W. Ward and A. R. Waller, 14 v., 1907–16
CHLC Cambridge History of Literary Criticism, 9 v., 1989–2005
Chomsky and Halle N. Chomsky and M. Halle, The Sound Pattern of English, 1968
CJ Classical Journal
CL Comparative Literature
CML Classical and Modern Literature
Corbett E.P.J. Corbett, Classical Rhetoric for the Modern Student, 3d ed., 1990 CP Classical Philology
CQ Classical Quarterly
Crane Critics and Criticism, Ancient and Modern, ed. R. S. Crane, 1952
CritI Critical Inquiry
Crusius F. Crusius, Römische Metrik: ein Einführung, 8th ed., rev. H. Rubenbauer, 1967
Culler J. Culler, Structuralist Poetics: Structuralism, Linguistics, and the Study of Literature, 1975
Cureton R. D. Cureton, Rhythmic Phrasing in English Verse, 1992
Curtius E. Curtius, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, trans. W. R. Trask, 1953
CW Classical World

DAI Dissertation Abstracts International
Dale A. M. Dale, The Lyric Meters of Greek Drama, 2d ed., 1968 DDJ Deutsches Dante-Jahrbuch
de Man P. de Man, Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism, 2d ed., 1983 Derrida J. Derrida, Of Grammatology, trans. G. C. Spivak, 2d ed., 1998
DHI Dictionary of the History of Ideas, ed. P. P. Weiner, 6 v., 1968–74
Dronke P. Dronke, Medieval Latin and the Rise of European Love Lyric, 2d ed., 2 v., 1968
Duffell M. J. Duffell, A New History of English Metre, 2008

E&S Essays and Studies of the English Association
ELH ELH (formerly English Literary History)
Eliot, Essays T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays, rev. ed., 1950
Elwert W. T. Elwert, Französische Metrik, 4th ed., 1978
Elwert, Italienische W. T. Elwert, Italienische Metrik, 2d ed., 1984
Empson W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity, 3d ed., 1953
ENLL English Language and Linguistics

Fabb et al. N. Fabb, D. Atridge, A. Durant, and C. MacCabe, The Linguistics of Writing, 1987
Faral E. Faral, Les arts poétique du XIIe et du XIIIe siècles, 1924

Finch and Varnes An Exaltation of Forms: Contemporary Poets Celebrate the Diversity of Their Art, ed. A. Finch and K. Varnes, 2002
Fish S. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities, 1980
Fisher The Medieval Literature of Western Europe: A Review of Research, Mainly 1930–1960, ed. J. H. Fisher, 1965
FMLS Forum for Modern Language Studies
Fontanier P. Fontanier, Les figures du discourse, 1977
Fowler A. Fowler, Kinds of Literature: An Introduction to the Theory of Genres and Modes, 1982
Frye N. Frye, Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays, 1957
FS French Studies

Gasparov M. L. Gasparov, Sovremennyj russkij stix: Metrika i ritmika, 1974
Gasparov, History M. L. Gasparov, A History of European Versification, trans. G. S. Smith and M. Tarlinskaja, 1996
GRLMA Grundriss der romanischen Literaturen des Mittelalters, ed. H. R. Jauss and E. Köhler, 11 v., 1968–
Group μ Group μ (J. Dubois, F. Edeline, J.-M. Klinkenberg, P. Minguet, F. Pire, H. Trinon), A General Rhetoric, trans. P. B. Burrell and E. M. Slotkin, 1981

Halporn et al. J. W. Halporn, M. Ostwald, and T. G. Rosenmeyer, The Meters of Greek and Latin Poetry, 2d ed., 1980
Hardie W. R. Hardie, Res Metrica, 1920
HJAS Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies
Hollander J. Hollander, Vision and Resonance: Two Senses of Poetic Form, 2d ed., 1985
Hollier A New History of French Literature, ed. D. Hollier, 1989 HQ Hopkins Quarterly
HR Hispanic Review
HudR Hudson Review

ICPhS International Congress of Phonetic Sciences (journal)
IJCT International Journal of Classical Tradition

JAAC Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism
JAC JAC: A Journal of Rhetoric, Culture, and Politics
JAF Journal of American Folklore
Jakobson R. Jakobson, Selected Writings, 8 v., 1962–88
Jakobson and Halle R. Jakobson and M. Halle, Fundamentals of Language, 1956
JAOS Journal of American Oriental Society
Jarman and Hughes A Guide to Welsh Literature, ed. A. O. H. Jarman and G. R. Hughes, 2 v., 1976–79
Jeanroy A. Jeanroy, La Poésie lyrique des Troubadours, 2 v., 1934
Jeanroy, Origines A. Jeanroy, Les origines de la poésie lyrique en France au moyen âge, 4th ed., 1965
JEGP Journal of English and Germanic Philology
JFLS Journal of French Language Studies
JHS Journal of Hellenic Studies
JL Journal of Linguistics
Jour. P. Society Journal of Polynesian Society
JPhon Journal of Phonetics

Kastner L. E. Kastner, A History of French Versification, 1903
Keil Grammatici Latini, ed. H. Keil, 7 v., 1855–80; v. 8, Anecdota helvitica: Supplementum, ed. H. Hagen, 1870
Koster W.J.W. Koster, Traité de métrique greque suivi d'un précis de métrique latine, 5th ed., 1966
KSMB Keats-Shelley Journal
KR Kenyon Review

L&S Language and Speech
Lang Language
Lang&S Language and Style
Lanham R. A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms, 2d ed., 1991
Lausberg H. Lausberg, Handbook of Literary Rhetoric: A Foundation for Literary Study, trans. M. T. Bliss, A. Jansen, and D. E. Orton, 1998
Le Gentil P. Le Gentil, La Poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge, 2 v., 1949–53
Lewis C. S. Lewis, The Allegory of Love, 1936
LingI Linguistic Inquiry
Lord A. B. Lord, The Singer of Tales, 2d ed., 2000
Lote G. Lote, Histoire du vers française, 9 v., 1940

M&H Medievalia et Humanistica: Studies in Medieval and Renaissance Culture
Maas P. Maas, Greek Metre, trans. H. Lloyd-Jones, 3d ed., 1962
Manitius M. Manitius, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v., 1905–36
Mazaleyrat J. Mazaleyrat, Éléments de métrique française, 3d ed., 1981
Meyer W. Meyer, Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur mittelateinischen Rhythmik, 3 v., 1905–36
MGG Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart: Allegemeine Enzyklopaedia der Musik, ed. F. Blume, 16 v., 1949–79
MGH Monumenta germaniae historica
MHRA Modern Humanities Research Association
Michaelides S. Michaelides, The Music of Ancient Greece: An Encyclopaedia, 1978 MidwestQ Midwest Quarterly
Migne, PG Patrologiae cursus completus, series graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v., 1857–66
Migne, PL Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 221 v., 1844–64
Miner et al. E. Miner, H. Odagiri, and R. E. Morrell, The Princeton Companion to Classical Japanese Literature, 1986
MLN Modern Language Notes
MLQ Modern Language Quarterly
MLQ (London) Modern Language Quarterly (London)
MLR Modern Language Review
Morier H. Morier, Dictionnaire de poétique et de rhétorique, 5th ed., rev. and exp., 1998
Morris-Jones J. Morris-Jones, Cerdd Dafod, 1925, rpt. with index, 1980 MP Modern Philology
Murphy J. J. Murphy, Rhetoric in the Middle Ages: A History of Rhetorical Theory from St. Augustine to the Renaissance, 1974

N&Q Notes & Queries
Navarro T. Navarro, Métrica española: Reseña histórica y descriptiva, 6th ed., 1983
NER/BLQ New England Review / Bread Loaf Quarterly
New CBEL New Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. G. Watson and I. R. Willison, 5 v., 1969–77

New Grove New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. Sadie, 20 v., 1980
Nienhauser et al. W. H. Nienhauser, Jr., C. Hartman, Y. W. Ma, and S. H. West, The Indiana Companion to Traditional Chinese Literature, 1986
NLH New Literary History
NM Neuphilologische Mitteilungen (Bulletin of the Modern Language Society)
Norberg D. Norberg, Introduction a l'étude de la versification latine médiévale, 1958
Norden E. Norden, Die antike Kunstprosa, 9th ed., 2 v., 1983

OED Oxford English Dictionary
OL Orbis Litterarum: International Review of Literary Studies
Olson C. Olson, "Projective Verse," Collected Prose, ed. D. Allen and B. Friedlander, 1997
Omond T. S. Omond, English Metrists, 1921

P&R Philosophy and Rhetoric
Parry M. Parry, The Making of Homeric Verse, ed. A. Parry, 1971
Parry, History T. Parry, A History of Welsh Literature, trans. H. I. Bell, 1955
Patterson W. F. Patterson, Three Centuries of French Poetic Theory: A Critical History of the Chief Arts of Poetry in France (1328–1630), 2 v., 1935
Pauly-Wissowa Paulys Realencyclopädie der classischen Alterumswissenschaft, ed. A. Pauly, G. Wissowa, W. Kroll, and K. Mittelhaus, 24 v. (A–Q), 10 v. (R–Z, Series 2), and 15 v. (Supplements), 1894–1978
PBA Proceedings of the British Academy
Pearsall D. Pearsall, Old English and Middle English Poetry, 1977
PMLA Publications of the Modern Language Association of America
PoT Poetics Today
PQ Philological Quarterly
PsychologR Psychological Review
Puttenham G. Puttenham, The Arte of English Poesie, ed. F. Whigham and W. A. Rebhorn, 2007

QJS Quarterly Journal of Speech

Raby, Christian F.J.E. Raby, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry From the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages, 2d ed., 1953
Raby, Secular F.J.E. Raby, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages, 2d ed., 2 v., 1957
Ransom Selected Essays of John Crowe Ransom, ed. T. D. Young and J. Hindle, 1984
Reallexikon I Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturgeschichte, 1st ed., ed. P. Merker and W. Stammler, 4 v., 1925–31
Reallexikon II Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturgeschichte, 2d ed., ed. W. Kohlschmidt and W. Mohr (v. 1–3), K. Kanzog and A. Masser (v. 4), 1958–84 Reallexikon III Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturwissenschaft, 3d ed, ed. H. Fricke, K. Frubmüller, J.-D. Müller, and K. Weimar, 3 v., 1997–2003
REL Review of English Literature
RES Review of English Studies
Richards I. A. Richards, Principles of Literary Criticism, 1925
RLC Revue de littérature compareé
RPh Romance Philology
RQ Renaissance Quarterly
RR Romanic Review

SAC Studies in the Age of Chaucer
Saintsbury, Prose G. Saintsbury, A History of English Prose Rhythm, 1912
Saintsbury, Prosody G. Saintsbury, A History of English Prosody, from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day, 2d ed., 3 v., 1961
Saisselin R. G. Saisselin, The Rule of Reason and the Ruses of the Heart: A Philosophical Dictionary of Classical French Criticism, Critics, and Aesthetic Issues, 1970
Sayce O. Sayce, The Medieval German Lyric, 1150–1300: The Development of Its Themes and Forms in Their European Context, 1982
Scherr B. P. Scherr, Russian Poetry: Meter, Rhythm, and Rhyme, 1986
Schipper J. M. Schipper, Englische Metrik, 3 v., 1881–88
Schipper, History J. M. Schipper, A History of English Versification, 1910
Schmid and Stählin W. Schmid and O. Stählin, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur, 7 v., 1920–48
Scott C. Scott, French Verse-Art: A Study, 1980
Sebeok Style in Language, ed. T. Sebeok, 1960
SEL Studies in English Literature 1500–1900
ShQ Shakespeare Quarterly
Sievers E. Sievers, Altergermanische Metrik, 1893
SIR Studies in Romanticism
Smith Elizabethan Critical Essays, ed. G. G. Smith, 2 v., 1904
Snell B. Snell, Griechesche Metrik, 4th ed., 1982
SP Studies in Philology
Spongano R. Spongano, Nozioni ed esempi di metric italiana, 2d ed., 1974
SR Sewanee Review
Stephens The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales, ed. M. Stephens, 1986

TAPA Transactions of the American Philological Association
Tarlinskaja M. Tarlinskaja, English Verse: Theory and History, 1976
Terras Handbook of Russian Literature, ed. V. Terras, 1985
Thieme H. P. Thieme, Essai sur l'histoire du vers française, 1916
Thompson J. Thompson, The Founding of English Metre, 2d ed., 1989
Trypanis C. A. Trypanis, Greek Poetry from Homer to Seferis, 1981 TPS Transactions of the Philological Society
TSL Tennessee Studies in Literature
TSLL Texas Studies in Literature and Language

Vickers B. Vickers, Classical Rhetoric in English Poetry, 2d ed., 1989
Vickers, Defence B. Vickers, In Defence of Rhetoric, 1988 VP Victorian Poetry
VQR Virginia Quarterly Review

Weinberg B. Weinberg, A History of Literary Criticism in the Italian Renaissance, 2 v., 1961

Wellek R. Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism, 1750–1950, 8 v., 1955–92
Wellek and Warren R. Wellek and A. Warren, Theory of Literature, 3d ed., 1956
Welsh A. Welsh, Roots of Lyric, 1978
West M. L. West, Greek Metre, 1982
WHB Wiener Humanistische Blätter
Wilamowitz U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechesche Verkunst, 1921
Wilkins E. H. Wilkins, A History of Italian Literature, rev. T. G. Bergin, 1974
Williams and Ford J.E.C. Williams and P. K. Ford, The Irish Literary Tradition, 1992
Wimsatt Versification: Major Language Types, ed. W. K. Wimsatt, 1972
Wimsatt and Beardsley W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Concept of Meter: An Exercise in Abstraction," PMLA 74 (1959); rpt. in Hateful Contraries, W. K. Wimsatt, 1965
Wimsatt and Brooks W. K. Wimsatt and C. Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History, 1957

YFS Yale French Studies
YLS Yearbook of Langland Studies

ZCP Zeitschrift für celtische Philologie
ZDA Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum
ZFSL Zeitschrift für französische Sprache und Literatur
ZRP Zeitschrift für Romanische Philologie
ZVS Zeitschrift für Vergleichende Sprachforschung

General Abbreviations

The abbreviations below are used throughout the volume to conserve space. General abbreviations may also show plural forms, e.g., "cs." for "centuries."

Af. African
Af. Am. African American Am. American anthol. anthology
Ar. Arabic
Assoc. Association

b. born bibl. bibliography Brit. British

c./cs. century
ca. circa, about
cf. confer, compare
ch. chapter
cl. classical contemp. contemporary crit. criticism

d. died devel./devels. development dict. dictionary
diss. dissertation

ed./eds. edition, editor, edited by e.g. exempla gratia, for example Eng. English
esp. especially et al. et alii, and others Eur. European

ff. following
fl. floruit, flourished
Fr. French

Ger. German
Gr. Greek

Heb. Hebrew hist./hists. history

IE Indo-Euopean
i.e. id est, that is incl. including intro./intros. introduction
Ir. Irish
It. Italian

jour./jours. journal

lang./langs. language Lat. Latin ling. linguistics, linguistic lit./lits. literature
lit. crit. literary criticism
lit. hist. literary history

ME Middle English
med. medieval MHG Middle High German
mod. modern ms./mss. manuscript

NT New Testament

OE Old English
OF Old French
OHG Old High German
ON Old Norse
OT Old Testament

p./pp. page
pl. plural
Port. Portuguese postmod. postmodern premod. premodern pseud. pseudonym
pub. published

r. reigned
Ren. Renaissance
rev. revised
Rev. Review
rhet./rhets. rhetoric
rpt. reprinted
Rus. Russian

sing. singular Sp. Spanish
supp. supplement(ed)

temp. temporary trad./trads. tradition trans. translation, translated

v. volume(s)

Contributors

This list includes all contributors credited in this edition of the encyclopedia, including some whose articles from the previous edition have been updated by the editors or other contributors. Those with names preceded by a dagger (†) are deceased.

Gémino H. Abad, English (emeritus), University of the Philippines Hazard Adams, English and Comparative Literature (emeritus), University of Washington †Percy G. Adams, English, University of Tennessee Cécile Alduy, French, Stanford University †Fernando Alegría, Spanish and Portuguese, Stanford University
Joseph Allen, Asian Languages and Literatures, University of Minnesota
Roger M. A. Allen, Arabic Languages and Literatures (emeritus), University of Pennsylvania
Robert Alter, Hebrew and Comparative Literature, University of California, Berkeley
Charles Altieri, English, University of California, Berkeley
Hélio J. S. Alves, Portuguese and Comparative Literature, University of Evora
Walter Andrews, Ottoman and Turkish Literature, University of Washington †Robert P. apRoberts, English, California State University, Northridge Francesco Marco Aresu, Italian, Stanford University
Samuel G. Armistead, Spanish (emeritus), University of California, Davis †John Arthos, English, University of Michigan
Robert Ashmore, East Asian Languages and Cultures, University of California, Berkeley
Paul S. Atkins, Asian Languages and Literature, University of Washington †Stuart Atkins, German and Comparative Literature, University of California, Santa Barbara Derek Attridge, English and Related Literature, University of York
Harry Aveling, Asian Studies, La Trobe University
Jan Baetens, Cultural Studies, University of Leuven
Timothy Bahti, German and Comparative Literature (emeritus), University of Michigan
James O. Bailey, Slavic Languages and Literature (emeritus), University of Wisconsin– Madison
Peter S. Baker, English, University of Virginia
Henryk Baran, Slavic Studies, University at Albany, State University of New York Alessandro Barchiesi, Classics, Stanford University
Vincent Barletta, Iberian and Latin American Cultures, Stanford University Jeffrey Barnouw, English (emeritus), University of Texas
Henry J. Baron, English, Calvin College
Mark Barr, English, St. Mary's University
Shadi Bartsch, Classics, University of Chicago
Catherine Bates, English and Comparative Literature, University of Warwick
Guinn Batten, English, Washington University in Saint Louis
Gary Beckman, Hittite and Mesopotamian Studies, University of Michigan †Ernst H. Behler, Germanics and Comparative Literature, University of Washington
Margaret H. Beissinger, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Princeton University
Esther G. Belin, Writing, Fort Lewis College
Alexandra G. Bennett, English, Northern Illinois University
Sandra L. Bermann, Comparative Literature, Princeton University
Charles Bernstein, English, University of Pennsylvania
Eleanor Berry, independent scholar
†Jess B. Bessinger, English, New York University Krzysztof Biedrzycki, Polish Literature, Jagiellonian University
Stanley S. Bill, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Northwestern University
Lloyd Bishop, French (emeritus), Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University
Jenny Björklund, Center for Gender Research, Uppsala University
Josiah Blackmore, Spanish and Portuguese, University of Toronto
Kirstie Blair, English Literature, University of Glasgow
C. D. Blanton, English, University of California, Berkeley
Mutlu Konuk Blasing, English, Brown University
†Morton W. Bloomfield, English, Harvard University
Frederick L. Blumberg, Comparative Literature, Stanford University
Lev Blumenfeld, Linguistics, Carleton University
Fredric Bogel, English, Cornell University
Willard Bohn, Foreign Languages (emeritus), Illinois State University
Roy C. Boland, Spanish and Latin American Studies, University of Sydney
Annika Bostelmann, German, Institute of Rostock
Enric Bou, Linguistics and Comparative Cultures, Ca'Foscari University of Venice
Betsy Bowden, English, Rutgers University, Camden
Claire Bowen, English, Dickinson College
Katherine Bowers, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Northwestern University
Matthieu Boyd, Literature, Fairleigh Dickinson University
Jeremy Braddock, English, Cornell University
Gordon Braden, English, University of Virginia
Anthony Bradley, English (emeritus), University of Vermont
Ross Brann, Near Eastern Studies, Cornell University
Laurence A. Breiner, English, Boston University
Karen Britland, English, University of Wisconsin–Madison

Claudia Brodsky, Comparative Literature, Princeton University
Jacqueline Vaught Brogan, English, University of Notre Dame
†T.V.F. Brogan, independent scholar
Yigal Bronner, South Asian Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago
Gordon Brotherston, Languages, Linguistics, and Cultures, University of Manchester
Kristina Vise Browder, English, Troy University
Catherine Brown, Spanish, University of Michigan †Huntington Brown, English, University of Minnesota
Katherine A. Brown, French, Skidmore College
†Merle E. Brown, English, University of Iowa †Juan Bruce-Novoa, Spanish and Portuguese, University of California, Irvine Benjamin Bruch, Celtic Languages and Literature, Celtic Institute of North America
Matilda Tomaryn Bruckner, French, Boston College
Horst Brunner, German Philology, University of Wuerzburg Gerald L. Bruns, English (emeritus), University of Notre Dame
Patrick Buckridge, Humanities, Griffith University
Sidney Burris, English, University of Arkansas
John Burt, English, Brandeis University
Stephen Burt, English, Harvard University
Christopher Bush, French and Comparative Literary Studies, Northwestern University
Michel Byrne, Celtic and Gaelic, University of Glasgow
Lorraine Byrne Bodley, Music, National University of Ireland, Maynooth
Thomas Cable, English (emeritus), University of Texas
Kolter M. Campbell, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Northwestern University
Marta Ortiz Canseco, Philology, University of Alcalá
David Caplan, English, Ohio Wesleyan University
Thomas Carper, English (emeritus), University of Southern Maine
Antonio Carreño, Hispanic Studies, Brown University
Meredith Walker Castile, English, Stanford University
Clare Cavanagh, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Northwestern University
Max Cavitch, English, University of Pennsylvania
Mary Ann Caws, Comparative Literature, English, and French, Graduate Center, City University of New York
Natalia Cecire, Fox Center for Humanistic Inquiry, Emory University
Seeta Chaganti, English, University of California, Davis
†Frank M. Chambers, French, University of Arizona
Jennifer Chang, English, University of Virginia
Kang-i-Sun Chang, East Asian Languages and Literatures, Yale University
Jack Chen, Asian Languages and Cultures, University of California, Los Angeles
Patrick Cheney, English and Comparative Literature, Pennsylvania State University
David H. Chisholm, German Studies (emeritus), University of Arizona Elżbieta Chrzanowska-Kluczewska, English Philology, Jagiellonian University
Odile Cisneros, Spanish, Portuguese, and Latin American Studies, University of Alberta
Michael P. Clark, English, University of California, Irvine †Dorothy Clotelle Clarke, Spanish and Portuguese, University of California, Berkeley Albrecht Classen, German Studies, University of Arizona
Michelle Clayton, Comparative Literature, Spanish and Portuguese, University of California, Los Angeles
Katharine Cleland, English, Pennsylvania State University
James M. Cocola, English, Worcester Polytechnic Institute
Michael C. Cohen, English, University of California, Los Angeles
Ann Baynes Coiro, English, Rutgers University
A. Thomas Cole, English (emeritus), Yale University
Claire Colebrook, English, Pennsylvania State University
Stephen Collis, English, Simon Fraser University
Gregory G. Colomb, English, University of Virginia
David A. Colón, English, Texas Christian University
Anne E. Commons, East Asian Studies, University of Alberta
J. E. Congleton, Humanities and Sciences (emeritus), University of Findlay
Eleanor Cook, English (emerita), University of Toronto
†Robert Cook, English, University of Iceland
G. Burns Cooper, English, University of Alaska, Fairbanks
Rita Copeland, Classical Studies, English and Comparative Literature, University of Pennsylvania
Ian D. Copestake, British Culture, University of Bamberg
François Cornilliat, French, Rutgers University †Procope S. Costas, Classical Studies, Brooklyn College, City University of New York
Bonnie Costello, English, Boston University
†Ronald S. Crane, English Language and Literature, University of Chicago Johaina Crisostomo, independent scholar
Holly Crocker, English Language and Literature, University of South Carolina Jennifer Croft, Comparative Literary Studies, Northwestern University Joanna Crow, School of Modern Languages, Bristol University
Cheryl A. Crowley, Russian and East Asian Languages and Cultures, Emory University Isagani R. Cruz, Literature and Philippine Languages (emeritus), De La Salle University
Jonathan Culler, English, Cornell University
Stephen Cushman, English, University of Virginia
Maria Damon, English, University of Minnesota
†Phillip Damon, English and Comparative Literature, University of California, Berkeley
Michael Dash, French, Social and Cultural Analysis, New York University Ian Davidson, English and Comparative Literature, Northumbria University
Michael Davidson, English, University of California, San Diego
Kathleen Davis, English, University of Rhode Island
Dirk de Geest, Literary Theory, University of Leiden
Jonathan Decter, Sephardic Studies, Brandeis University
Andrew M. Devine, Classics, Stanford University
Jeroen Dewulf, German, University of California, Berkeley
Vinay Dharwadker, Languages and Cultures of Asia, University of Wisconsin–Madison

Thibaut d'Hubert, South Asian Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago College Joanne Diaz, English, Illinois Wesleyan University
Terence Diggory, English, Skidmore College
Connor Doak, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Northwestern University
Jeffrey Dolven, English, Princeton University
Daniel G. Donaghue, Old English Studies, Harvard University
Neil H. Donahue, German and Comparative Literature, Hofstra University Christopher Donaldson, Comparative Literature, Stanford University
David F. Dorsey, independent scholar Edward Doughtie, English (emeritus), Rice University
Johanna Drucker, Information Studies, University of California, Los Angeles
Andrew Dubois, English, University of Toronto
Heather Dubrow, English, Fordham University
Martin J. Duffell, Iberian and Latin American Studies, Queen Mary, University of London
Dianne Dugaw, English, University of Oregon
Francois Dumont, Literature, University of Laval
†Charles W. Dunn, Celtic Languages and Literatures (emeritus), Harvard University Rachel Blau DuPlessis, English, Temple University
Sascha Ebeling, South Asian Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago
Jonathan P. Eburne, Comparative Literature and English, Pennsylvania State University
Robert R. Edwards, English, Pennsylvania State University
Sveinn Yngvi Egilsson, Icelandic and Comparative Cultural Studies, University of Iceland
Robert G. Eisenhauer, independent scholar
Helen Regueiro Elam, English, University at Albany, State University of New York
Jonathan Elmer, English, Indiana University
†Gerald F. Else, Classical Studies, University of Michigan
Robert Elsie, independent scholar
Lori Emerson, English, University of Colorado
James Engell, English and Comparative Literature, Harvard University †Alfred Garvin Engstrom, French, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
†Alan W. Entwistle, Hindi, University of Washington
†Alvin A. Eustis, French, University of California, Berkeley
David Evans, Modern Languages, University of St. Andrews
†Robert O. Evans, English and Comparative Literature (emeritus), University of New Mexico Raphael Falco, English, University of Maryland, Baltimore County
Walter Farber, Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago
Ibrahim Fathy, independent scholar
Harris Feinsod, English, Northwestern University
Frances Ferguson, English, Johns Hopkins University
Margaret W. Ferguson, English, University of California, Davis
Patrick ffrench, French, King's College London
Annie Finch, Creative Writing, University of Southern Maine
Jordan Finkin, Oriental Studies (Hebrew), University of Oxford †Harold Fisch, English, Bar-Ilan University
†Solomon Fishman, English, University of California, Davis
†Wolfgang Bernhard Fleischman, Comparative Literature, Montclair State College
†Robert Harter Fogle, English, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
†Stephen F. Fogle, English, Adelphi Suffolk College
†John Miles Foley, Classical Studies, University of Missouri Stephen Foley, English and Comparative Literature, Brown University
Patrick K. Ford, Celtic Languages and Literatures, Harvard University
Benjamin Foster, Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations, Yale University
Alastair Fowler, Rhetoric and English Literature (emeritus), University of Edinburgh
Elizabeth Fowler, English, University of Virginia
Nicholas Frankel, English, Virginia Commonwealth University
Lisa Freinkel, Comparative Literature, University of Oregon
Amanda L. French, Center for History and New Media, George Mason University †Bernard J. Fridsma, Germanic Languages (emeritus), Calvin College
Debra Fried, English, Cornell University
Nila Friedberg, Russian, Portland State University
†Albert B. Friedman, English, Claremont Graduate University
Norman Friedman, English (emeritus), Queens College, City University of New York
Dmitry Frolov, Arabic Philology, Moscow State University
Paul H. Fry, English, Yale University
†Joseph G. Fucilla, Romance Languages, Northwestern University
Robert Dennis Fulk, English, Indiana University
Graham Furniss, Languages and Cultures of Africa, University of London
Thomas Furniss, English, University of Strathclyde René Galand, French (emeritus), Wellesley College
Miguel Ángel Garrido Gallardo, Literary Theory, Spanish National Research Council, Madrid
Marisa Galvez, French, Stanford University
Linda Garber, Women's and Gender Studies, Santa Clara University
Ariadna García-Bryce, Spanish, Reed College
Leonardo García-Pabón, Romance Languages, University of Oregon
Thomas Gardner, English, Virginia Polytechnic Institute
Boris Gasparov, Slavic Languages and Literature, Columbia University
Mary Malcolm Gaylord, Romance Languages and Literatures, Harvard University
Sophie Gee, English, Princeton University
Stephen A. Geller, Bible, Jewish Theological Seminary
Natalie Gerber, English, State University of New York, Fredonia
E. Michael Gerli, Spanish, University of Virginia
Edwin Gerow, Religion and Humanities (emeritus), Reed College

†Robert J. Getty, Classics, University of North Carolina
Denise Gigante, English, Stanford University
Brian Glavey, English Language and Literature, University of South Carolina Leon Golden, Classics (emeritus), Florida State University
Lorrie Goldensohn, independent scholar
Alan Golding, English, University of Louisville
Robert P. Goldman, South and Southeast Asian Studies, University of California, Berkeley †Ulrich K. Goldsmith, German, University of Colorado
David Goldstein, English, York University
Kevis Goodman, English, University of California, Berkeley
Sverker Göransson, Literature, University of Gothenburg
†Lewis H. Gordon, Italian and French, Brown University Rüdiger Görner, Germanic Studies, Queen Mary, University of London
Stathis Gourgouris, Classics, Columbia University
George G. Grabowicz, Ukranian Literature, Harvard University
Kenneth J. E. Graham, English Language and Literature, University of Waterloo
Phyllis Granoff, Religious Studies, Yale University
Erik Gray, English, Columbia University
Stephen Gray, independent scholar
Roland Greene, Comparative Literature, Stanford University
Edward L. Greenstein, Bible, Bar-Ilan University
Tobias B. Gregory, English, Catholic University of America
†Michelle Grimaud, French, Wellesley College
Anne Marie Guglielmo, Comparative Literature, Stanford University
Hans Ulrich Gumbrecht, Comparative Literature, Stanford University
Kathryn Gutzwiller, Classics, University of Cincinnati
Janet Hadda, English (emerita), University of California, Los Angeles †Vernon Hall, Comparative Literature, University of Wisconsin–Madison
Charles Hallisey, Buddhist Literatures, Harvard Divinity School
Stephen Halliwell, Greek, University of St. Andrews
James W. Halporn, Classical Studies, Indiana University
†Albert W. Halsall, French, Carleton University
Russell G. Hamilton, Portuguese, Brazilian, and Lusophone African Literatures, Vanderbilt University
Hannibal Hamlin, English, Ohio State University
William L. Hanaway, Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations (emeritus), University of Pennsylvania
Kristin Hanson, English, Universitiy of California, Berkeley
†O. B. Hardison, English, Georgetown University
David Hargreaves, Linguistics, Western Oregon University
William E. Harkins, Slavic Languages, Columbia University
William Harmon, English and Comparative Literature (emeritus), University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Joseph Harris, English, Harvard University
Robert L. Harrison, independent scholar
Henry Hart, English, College of William and Mary Kevin Hart, Religious Studies, University of Virginia
Lauran Hartley, Tibetan Studies Librarian, Columbia University
Charles O. Hartman, English, Connecticut College
Ruth Harvey, Modern Languages, Literatures, and Cultures, Royal Holloway, University of London
Ernst Haüblein, independent scholar
Edward R. Haymes, German, Cleveland State University
Kenneth Haynes, Comparative Literature and Classics, Brown University
Gregory Hays, Classics, University of Virginia
Wade Heaton, English, Southeastern Louisiana University
Ulf Hedetoft, Nationality and Migration Studies, University of Copenhagen
Wolfhart Heinrichs, Arabic, Harvard University
Ursula K. Heise, English, Stanford University
Gustav Heldt, East Asian Languages, Literatures, and Cultures, University of Virginia
James S. Helgeson, French and Francophone Studies, University of Nottingham Benjamin A. Heller, Spanish, University of Notre Dame
Sarah-Grace Heller, French, Ohio State University
Elizabeth K. Helsinger, Art History, University of Chicago
Omaar Hena, English, Wake Forest University
†Stephen E. Henderson, Afro-American Studies and English, Howard University
†C. John Herington, Classics, Yale University
Brenda Hillman, English, Saint Mary's College of California
Kenneth Hiltner, English, University of California, Santa Barbara Daniel Hoffman, English (emeritus), University of Pennsylvania
Tyler Hoffman, English, Rutgers University, Camden
Norman N. Holland, English (emeritus), University of Florida
John Holmes, English Language and Literature, University of Reading †Urban T. Holmes, Romance Languages, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Bruce Holsinger, English, University of Virginia
Marianne Hopman, Classics, Northwestern University
†Roger A. Hornsby, Classics, University of Iowa
H. Mack Horton, East Asian Languages and Cultures, University of California, Berkeley
Vittorio Hösle, German and Russian Languages and Literatures, University of Notre Dame Peter Howarth, School of English and Drama, Queen Mary, University of London
Laura L. Howes, English, University of Tennessee, Knoxville
Thomas John Hudak, Linguistics, Arizona State University
Robert Huey, Japanese Literature, University of Hawai'i, Manoa
Shaun F. D. Hughes, Comparative Literature, Purdue University
Kathryn Hume, Comparative Literature, Stanford University
Jerry Hunter, Welsh, Bangor University
Walter Hunter, English, University of Virginia
Linda Hutcheon, English and Comparative Literature, University of Toronto
Wilt L. Idema, Chinese Literature, Harvard University
Luis Miguel Isava, Literature, Universidad Simón Bolívar
Fernando Iturburu, Spanish, State University of New York, Plattsburgh
Linda Ivanits, Russian and Comparative Literature, Pennsylvania State University †Ivar Ivask, Modern Languages, University of Oklahoma
Oren Izenberg, English, University of Illinois, Chicago
Virginia Jackson, English, University of California, Irvine

Alessandro Michelangelo Jaker, Linguistics, Stanford University
Alison James, Romance Languages and Literatures, University of Chicago Gerald J. Janecek, Russian and Eastern Studies (emeritus), University of Kentucky Hanna Janiszewska, English, Stanford University
Nicholas Jenkins, English, Stanford University
D. B. S. Jeyaraj, independent scholar
Ramya Chamalie Jirasinghe, independent scholar
Christopher Johnson, Comparative Literature, Harvard University
Eleanor Johnson, English and Comparative Literature, Columbia University
Jeffrey Johnson, English Language and Literature, Daito Bunka University
Eileen Tess Johnston, English, United States Naval Academy
Aled Llion Jones, Department of Celtic Languages and Literatures, Harvard University †Charles W. Jones, English, University of California, Berkeley
Meta DuEwa Jones, English, University of Texas
William R. Jones, English and Philosophy, Murray State University
Elise Bickford Jorgens, English (emerita), College of Charleston
Walter Jost, English, University of Virginia
Cathy L. Jrade, Spanish and Portuguese, Vanderbilt University
Gregory Jusdanis, Greek and Latin, Ohio State University
Steven Justice, English, University of California, Berkeley
Ananya Jahanara Kabir, Humanities, University of Leeds
Andrew Kahn, Russian Literature, University of Oxford †Sholom J. Kahn, English, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Rayna Kalas, English, Cornell University
Julie Kane, English, Northwestern State University of Louisiana
Paul Kane, English, Vassar College
Ruth Kaplan, English, Quinnipiac University
Matthew T. Kapstein, Philosophy of Religions and History of Religions, University of Chicago Divinity School
Robert Kaufman, Comparative Literature, University of California, Berkeley
Nanor Kebranian, Armenian Literature, Columbia University
Edmund Keeley, English (emeritus), Princeton University
Eric Keenaghan, English, University at Albany, State University of New York
Jennifer Keith, English, University of North Carolina, Greensboro
Lynn Keller, English, University of Wisconsin–Madison
William J. Kennedy, Comparative Literature, Cornell University
Dov-Ber Kerler, Jewish Studies, Indiana University
Martin Kern, East Asian Studies, Princeton University
Sachin C. Ketkar, English, Maharaja Sayajrao University of Baroda
Arthur F. Kinney, English, University of Massachusetts, Amherst
Clare R. Kinney, English, University of Virginia
Gwen Kirkpatrick, Spanish and Portuguese, Georgetown University
Peter Kirkpatrick, English, University of Sydney
Matthew G. Kirschenbaum, English, University of Maryland
Dodona Kiziria, Slavic Languages and Literatures (emeritus), Indiana University
Conor Klamann, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Northwestern University Christopher Kleinhenz, French and Italian, University of Wisconsin–Madison
Peter Kline, English, James Madison University
David Knechtges, Asian Languages and Literature, University of Washington Nisha Kommattam, South Asian Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago
Alireza Korangy Isfahani, Department of Middle Eastern and South Asian Languages and Cultures, University of Virginia
David Kovacs, Classics, University of Virginia
Christina Kramer, Slavic Languages and Literatures, University of Toronto Christopher Krentz, English, University of Virginia †Murray Krieger, English, University of California, Irvine
Theresa Krier, English, Macalester College
Efraín Kristal, Comparative Literature, University of California, Los Angeles
Jelle Krol, Tresoar Friesland Historical and Literary Center
Dean Krouk, Languages and Literatures, St. Olaf College
Paul K. Kugler, Inter-regional Society of Jungian Analysis Jill Kuhnheim, Spanish and Portuguese, University of Kansas
Aaron Kunin, English, Pomona College
Christoph Küper, English Linguistics, University of Vechta
Leslie Kurke, Classics and Comparative Literature, University of California, Berkeley
William Kuskin, English, University of Colorado
David Kutzko, Classics, Western Michigan University
Catherine Labio, English, University of Colorado
Dov Landau, Hebrew and Comparative Literature, Bar-Ilan University
George Lang, French, University of Ottawa
Susan S. Lanser, English, Brandeis University
Ilse Laude-Cirtautas, Russian, East European and Central Asian Studies, University of Washington
Marc D. Lauxtermann, Byzantine and Modern Greek Language and Literature, University of Oxford
Sarah Lawall, Comparative Literature (emerita), University of Massachusetts
Joseph Lease, Writing and Literature, California College of the Arts
John Leavitt, Anthropology, University of Montreal
Meredith Lee, German (emerita), University of California, Irvine
Young-Jun Lee, Korean Literature, Kyung Hee University
Catherine Léglu, Medieval Studies, University of Reading †Ilse Lehiste, Linguistics, Ohio State University
Vincent B. Leitch, English, University of Oklahoma
Keith D. Leonard, Literature, American University
Laurence D. Lerner, English, Vanderbilt University
Rolf Lessenich, English, American, and Celtic Studies (emeritus), University of Bonn Gayle Levy, French, University of Missouri, Kansas City
Jennifer Lewin, Writing, Boston University

Franklin D. Lewis, Persian Language and Literature, University of Chicago
Rhiannon Lewis, English, Stanford University
Tracy K. Lewis, Portuguese, State University of New York, Oswego
Joel Lidov, Classics, Graduate Center, City University of New York
Eva Lilja, Comparative Literature, University of Gothenburg
Ian K. Lilly, European Languages and Literatures, University of Auckland John Lindow, Scandinavian, University of California, Berkeley
Ursula Lindqvist, Scandinavian, Harvard University
Lawrence Lipking, English, Northwestern University
Rene Felix Lissens, Dutch and German Literature (emeritus), St. Ignatius University Daiva Litvinskaitė, Slavic and Baltic Languages and Literatures, University of Illinois, Chicago
Ernesto Livon-Grosman, Hispanic Studies, Boston College
Ernesto Livorni, Comparative Literature, University of Wisconsin–Madison
†D. Myrddin Lloyd, National Library of Scotland
Jonathan Loesberg, Literature, American University
Yelena Lorman, Comparative Literary Studies, Northwestern University
Paul Losensky, Comparative Literature, Indiana University
Tina Lu, East Asian Languages and Literatures, Yale University †Katharine Luomala, Anthropology, University of Hawai'i
David B. Lurie, Japanese History and Literature, Columbia University Sverre Lyngstad, English (emeritus), New Jersey Institute of Technology
John MacInnes, School of Scottish Studies (emeritus), University of Edinburgh Armando Maggi, Italian Literature, University of Chicago
John L. Mahoney, English (emeritus), Boston College
Lawrence Manley, English, Yale University
Jenny C. Mann, English, Cornell University
Joshua K. Mann, English, Stanford University
Michael L. Manson, Literature, American University
Abednego M. Maphumulo, Modern and Oral Literature, University of Kwa-Zulu
Kathleen N. March, Spanish, University of Maine
Samuel Mareel, Dutch Literature, Ghent University
David Marno, English, University of California, Berkeley
John Henry Marshall, Romance Philology (emeritus), University of London
Keavy Martin, English, University of Alberta
Meredith Martin, English, Princeton University
†Wallace Martin, English, University of Toledo
Timothy J. Materer, English, University of Missouri
Timothy Mathews, French and Comparative Criticism, University College London Jonathan Mayhew, Spanish and Portuguese, University of Kansas
Krystyna Mazur, American Studies, University of Warsaw
Nicholas F. Mazza, Social Work, Florida State University
Pamela McCallum, English, University of Calgary
David R. McCann, Korean Literature, Harvard University
Russ McDonald, English and Comparative Literature, Goldsmiths, University of London
Kevin McFadden, Virginia Foundation for the Humanities
Jerome McGann, English, University of Virginia
Meredith McGill, English, Rutgers University
Robin McGrath, independent scholar
Arvind Krishna Mehrotra, independent scholar
Julie S. Meisami, Persian, University of Oxford
Louis Menand, English, Harvard University
Edward Mendelson, English and Comparative Literature, Columbia University †Lore Metzger, English, Emory University
Talya Meyers, English, Stanford University
Leah Middlebrook, Comparative Literature and Spanish, University of Oregon
Peter Middleton, English, University of Southampton †Rigo Mignani, Romance Languages, Binghamton University, State University of New York
Laurent Mignon, Turkish, University of Oxford Cristianne Miller, English, University at Buffalo, State University of New York
John F. Miller, Classics, University of Virginia
Tyrus Miller, Literature, University of California, Santa Cruz †Earl Miner, English and Comparative Literature, Princeton University
W. J. T. Mitchell, English and Art History, University of Chicago
Ivan Mladenov, Literature, Bulgarian Academy of Sciences
K. Silem Mohammad, English and Writing, Southern Oregon University
Reidulf K. Molvaer, independent scholar Steven Monte, English, College of Staten Island, City University of New York
Robert L. Montgomery, English (emeritus), University of California, Irvine Colin H. Moore, Comparative Literature, Stanford University
Anna H. More, Spanish and Portuguese, University of California, Los Angeles Adelaide Morris, English, University of Iowa
Saundra Morris, English, Bucknell University
Gary Saul Morson, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Northwestern University
Leith Morton, English, Tokyo Institute of Technology
Ian Frederick Moulton, Interdisciplinary Humanities and Communication, Arizona State University
Paula M. L. Moya, English, Stanford University
Jan-Dirk Müller, German Philology, Ludwig Maximilians University of Munich
H. Adlai Murdoch, French, University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign
Walton Muyumba, English, University of North Texas
C. M. Naim, South Asian Languages and Civilizations (emeritus), University of Chicago
James Naughton, Czech and Slovak, University of Oxford
Sharon Diane Nell, Modern Languages and Literatures, Loyola University Maryland
Barbara Barney Nelson, Languages and Literature, Sul Ross State University
Virgil P. Nemoianu, English and Philosophy, Catholic University of America
Carole E. Newlands, Classics, University of Colorado
J. K. Newman, Classics (emeritus), University of Illinois
Peter Nicholls, English, New York University
B. Ashton Nichols, English, Dickinson College

Jan Krogh Nielsen, Danish, University of Washington
James Nohrnberg, English, University of Virginia
Carrie Noland, French and Italian, University of California, Irvine Barnaby Norman, French, King's College London
Michael North, English, University of California, Los Angeles
Ranjini Obeyesekere, Anthropology (emerita), Princeton University †Michael Patrick O'Connor, Semitics, Catholic University of America
Mari Jose Olaziregi, Basque Studies, University of the Basque Country
Jeff Opland, Languages and Cultures of Africa, University of London †Ants Oras, English, University of Florida
Martin Orwin, Somali and Amharic School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
†Richard H. Osberg, English, Santa Clara University
Andrew L. Osborn, English, University of Dallas
Iztok Osojnik, independent scholar
Stephen Owen, Comparative Literature, Harvard University
William D. Paden, French (emeritus), Northwestern University
Kirsten Blythe Painter, independent scholar
Lucy B. Palache, independent scholar
Anne Paolucci, Council on National Literature
†Henry Paolucci, Government and Politics (emeritus), St. John's University †Douglass S. Parker, Classics, University of Texas, Austin
Walter Ward Parks, independent scholar
James Parsons, Music, Missouri State University
Deven M. Patel, South Asia Studies, University of Pennsylvania
Dipti R. Pattanaik, English, Ravenshaw University
Mark Payne, Classics, University of Chicago
Victoria Pedrick, Classics, Georgetown University
Stephen Penn, English, University of Stirling
Jeffrey M. Perl, Humanities, Bar-Ilan University
Marjorie Perloff, English (emerita), Stanford University
†Laurence Perrine, English, Southern Methodist University
Charles A. Perrone, Portuguese and Luso-Brazilian Culture and Literatures, University of Florida
Curtis Perry, English, University of Illinois, Chicago
†Erskine A. Peters, English, University of Notre Dame
Guillaume Peureux, French, University of California, Davis
Ineke Phaf-Rheinberger, African Literature and Culture, Humboldt University, Berlin
Chantal Phan, French, University of British Columbia
Allen W. Phillips, Spanish (emeritus), University of California, Santa Barbara Natalie Phillips, English, Stanford University
Noam Pines, Comparative Literature, Stanford University †Arshi Pipa, Italian and Albanian, University of Minnesota
William Bowman Piper, English (emeritus), Rice University
Elizabeth W. Poe, French, Tulane University
Jean-Jacques Poucel, French, Southern Connecticut State University †Alex Preminger, independent scholar
Jenifer Presto, Comparative Literature and Russian, University of Oregon
Yopie Prins, English, University of Michigan
Joseph Pucci, Classics and Comparative Literature, Brown University
Marc Quaghebeur, Archives and Museum of Literature, Brussels
William H. Race, Classics, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Burton Raffel, English (emeritus), University of Louisiana, Lafayette Jahan Ramazani, English, University of Virginia
Esperanza Ramirez-Christensen, Japanese Literature, University of Michigan
Virginia Ramos, Comparative Literature, Stanford University
Arnold Rampersad, English (emeritus), Stanford University
Velcheru Narayana Rao, Languages and Cultures of Asia (emeritus), University of Wisconsin–Madison
Suresh Raval, English, University of Arizona
Mohit K. Ray, English (emeritus), Bardwan University
Brian M. Reed, English, University of Washington †Erica Reiner, Eastern Languages, University of Chicago
Timothy J. Reiss, Comparative Literature (emeritus), New York University Elizabeth Renker, English, Ohio State University
Eric J. Rettberg, English Language and Literature, University of Virginia
Alena Rettová, Swahili Literature and Culture, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
Maria G. Rewakowicz, Slavic Languages and Literatures, University of Washington Eliza Richards, English and Comparative Literature, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Alan Richardson, English, Boston College
Hallie Smith Richmond, English, University of Virginia
Francois Rigolot, French and Italian, Princeton University
Tulku Thondup Rinpoche, Buddhayana Foundation
Elias L. Rivers, Spanish, Stony Brook University
Hugh Roberts, English, University of California, Irvine Françoise Robin, independent scholar
Jenefer Robinson, Philosophy, University of Cincinnati
Peter Robinson, English Language and Literature, University of Reading
Emily Rohrbach, English, Northwestern University
Philip Rollinson, English, University of South Carolina
Armando Romero, Romance Languages and Literatures, University of Cincinnati
Susan Rosenbaum, English, University of Georgia
Jason Rosenblatt, English, Georgetown University
Patricia A. Rosenmeyer, Classics, University of Wisconsin–Madison
Sven H. Rossel, Comparative Literature, University of Washington
David J. Rothman, Creative Writing, Western State College of Colorado
Phillip Rothwell, Spanish and Portuguese, Rutgers University
Paul Rouzer, Asian Languages and Literatures, University of Minnesota Christopher Rovee, English, Stanford University †Beryl Rowland, English, University of Victoria
David Lee Rubin, French (emeritus), University of Virginia

Charles Russell, American Studies, Rutgers University, Newark
Elizabeth Sagaser, English, Colby College
Ramon Saldivar, English, Stanford University
David Salter, English Literature, University of Edinburgh
Graham Sanders, Classical Chinese Literature, University of Toronto
Stephanie Sandler, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Harvard University Rosa Sarabia, Spanish and Portuguese, University of Toronto
Edith Sarra, East Asian Languages and Cultures, Indiana University
Haun Saussy, Comparative Literature, University of Chicago
Olive L. Sayce, Modern Languages, University of Oxford
Jennifer Scappettone, English Language and Literature, University of Chicago
Raymond P. Scheindlin, Medieval Hebrew Literature, Jewish Theological Seminary
†Bernard N. Schilling, English and Comparative Literature, University of Rochester Stephanie Schmidt, Iberian and Latin American Cultures, Stanford University
Michael Schoenfeldt, English, University of Michigan
Richard Scholar, Modern Languages, University of Oxford
Stephen Schryer, English, University of New Brunswick
Russell G. Schuh, Linguistics, University of California, Los Angeles
Joshua Scodel, English and Comparative Literature, University of Chicago
Clive Scott, European Literature (emeritus), University of East Anglia Matthew Scott, English Language and Literature, University of Reading
Andrew Seal, American Studies, Yale University
Jacobo Sefami, Spanish and Portuguese, University of California, Irvine
†A. Lytton Sells, French and Italian, Indiana University
Alexander Sens, Classics, Georgetown University
Shafiq Shamel, English, Stanford University †Marianne Shapiro, Comparative Literature, Brown University
Robert B. Shaw, English, Mount Holyoke College
Vered Karti Shemtov, Hebrew Language and Literature, Stanford University
Charles P. Shepherdson, English, University at Albany, State University of New York
Anna Shields, Chinese Literature, University of Maryland, Baltimore County
Rimvydas Silbajoris, Slavic (emeritus), Ohio State University Juris Silenieks, French (emeritus), Carnegie Mellon University †Isidore Silver, Humanities, Washington University in Saint Louis
†Joseph H. Silverman, Spanish, University of California, Santa Cruz
Kirsti K. Simonsuuri, Comparative Literature, University of Helsinki
James Simpson, French, University of Glasgow
Amardeep Singh, English, Lehigh University
Alexandra Slessarev, English, Stanford University
Thomas O. Sloane, Rhetoric (emeritus), University of California, Berkeley
Edgar Slotkin, English and Comparative Literature, University of Cincinnati
James Smethurst, Afro-American Studies, University of Massachusetts, Amherst Guntis Šmidchens, Scandinavian Studies, University of Washington
†A. J. M. Smith, English, Michigan State University
Barbara Herrnstein Smith, Comparative and English Literature, Duke University and Brown University
Ivo Smits, Area Studies (Japan), Leiden University
Rupert Snell, Asian Studies, University of Texas, Austin
Angela Sorby, English, Marquette University
Tamar Sovran, Hebrew Language, Tel Aviv University
Lisa Russ Spaar, English, University of Virginia
Ezra Spicehandler, Hebrew Literature (emeritus), Hebrew Union College
Willard Spiegelman, English, Southern Methodist University
G. Gabrielle Starr, English, New York University
Timothy Steele, English, California State University, Los Angeles
Peter Steiner, Slavic Languages and Literatures, University of Pennsylvania
†Martin Steinmann, English, University of Illinois, Chicago
Laurence D. Stephens, Classics, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Malynne Sternstein, Slavic Languages and Literatures, University of Chicago
Robert S. Stilling, English, University of Virginia
Richard P. Sugg, English, Florida International University
Robert Sullivan, English, University of Hawai'i Luke Sunderland, French, University of Cambridge Tae-kyung T. E. Sung, English, University of California, Irvine †Roy Arthur Swanson, Classics, University of Wisconsin
Jeffrey S. Sychterz, English, Fayetteville State University
Meredith Ramirez Talusan, Comparative Literature, Cornell University
G. Thomas Tanselle, English and Comparative Literature (emeritus), Columbia University
Bronwen Tate, Comparative Literature, Stanford University Miles Taylor, English, Le Moyne College
Frances Teague, English, University of Georgia
Gordon Teskey, English and American Literature, Harvard University
†Robert Donald Thornton, English, State University of New York, New Paltz
Galin Tihanov, Comparative Literature, Queen Mary, University of London Francisco Tomsich, independent scholar
Humphrey Tonkin, Humanities (emeritus), University of Hartford Chandrakant Topiwala, independent scholar Steven C. Tracy, Afro-American Studies, University of Massachusetts, Amherst
Wesley Trimpi, English (emeritus), Stanford University
Reuven Tsur, Hebrew Literature, Tel Aviv University
Gary Tubb, South Asian Languages and Civilizations, University of Chicago

Herbert F. Tucker, English, University of Virginia
Leslie Ullman, Creative Writing (emerita), University of Texas, El Paso
Michael Ursell, Literature, University of California, Santa Cruz Quang Phu Van, Vietnamese, Yale University
W. J. van Bekkum, Semitic Languages and Cultures, University of Groningen
John Van Sickle, Classics, Brooklyn College, City University of New York
Anton Vander Zee, English, Stanford University
Valeria Varga, Central Eurasian Studies, Indiana University
Daniel Veraldi, independent scholar
Aida Vidan, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Harvard University
Robert Vilain, German, University of Bristol
Louise Viljoen, Afrikaans and Dutch, University of Stellensbosch
Robert von Hallberg, English and Comparative Literature, University of Chicago
Michael Wachtel, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Princeton University
David A. Wacks, Spanish, University of Oregon
Mara R. Wade, Germanic Languages and Literatures, University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign
Amanda Walling, English, University of Hartford
Christopher Warley, English, University of Toronto †Frank J. Warnke, Comparative Literature, University of Georgia
James Perrin Warren, English, Washington and Lee University
William Waters, Modern Languages and Comparative Literature, Boston University
Amanda Watson, Research and Instruction Librarian, Connecticut College
Roderick Watson, English (emeritus), University of Stirling
Jessica Weare, English, Stanford University
Ruth Helen Webb, History, Classics, and Archaeology, Birkbeck College, University of London
Anthony K. Webster, Anthropology, Southern Illinois University †Uriel Weinrich, Yiddish, Columbia University
Madeline Weinstein, English, Harvard University
†Edward R. Weismiller, English, George Washington University
Philip Weller, Music, University of Nottingham Colin Wells, English, St. Olaf College
Andrew Welsh, English, Rutgers University
William Wenthe, English, Texas Tech University
Winthrop Wetherbee, Humanities (emeritus), Cornell University †Rachel Wetzsteon, English, William Paterson University
Bridget Whearty, English, Stanford University
Philip White, English, Centre College
Steven F. White, Spanish and Portuguese, St. Lawrence University
Simon Wickham-Smith, Russian, East European, and Central Asian Studies, University of Washington
†John Ellis Caerwyn Williams, Welsh and Celtic University, College of Wales
Rhian Williams, English and Scottish Language and Literature, University of Glasgow
James I. Wimsatt, English (emeritus), University of Texas, Austin
Michael Winkler, German Studies (emeritus), Rice University
James A. Winn, English, Boston University
Rosemary (Gates) Winslow, English, Catholic University of America
Steven Winspur, French and Italian, University of Wisconsin–Madison †Tibor Wlassics, Italian, University of Virginia
Susan J. Wolfson, English, Princeton University
Allen G. Wood, French and Comparative Literature, Purdue University Dafydd Wood, Comparative Literature, University of Texas
James Robert Wood, English, Stanford University
Malcolm Woodland, English, University of Toronto
W. B. Worthen, Theatre, Barnard College
George T. Wright, English (emeritus), University of Minnesota
Teri Shaffer Yamada, Asian Studies, California State University, Long Beach Michelle Yeh, Chinese, University of California, Davis
Timothy Yu, English, University of Toronto
†Lawrence J. Zillman, English, University of Washington
Marc Zimmerman, Modern and Classical Languages, University of Houston Eliza Zingesser, French, Princeton University
Robert Zydenbos, Institute of Indiology, Ludwig Maximilian University of Munich

The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics

This page intentionally left blank

A

ABECEDARIUS, abecedarian (med. Lat. term for an ABC primer). An alphabetic *acrostic, a poem in which each line or stanza begins with a successive letter of the alphabet. The abecedarius was often a spiritual or meditative device in the ancient world, used for prayers, hymns, and prophecies, but it also has an inveterate role as a tool for teaching children language. In divine poetry, not only the word but even letters and sounds, given pattern, bear mystical significance and incantatory power—as do numbers (see NUMEROLOGY). The abecedarius, only one of several such forms, has had a special appeal as a literalization of the alpha-omega trope.

The earliest attested examples are Semitic, and abecedarii held an esp. important place in Heb. religious poetry, to judge from the dozen-odd examples in the OT. The best known of these is Psalm 119, which is made of 22 octave stanzas, one for each letter of the Heb. alphabet, all lines of each octave beginning with the same letter. The more common stanzaic type, however, is that used by Chaucer for his "ABC," where only the first line of the stanza bears the letter (cf. the ornate initials of illuminated mss.). Psalms 111–12 represent the astrophic type, wherein the initials of each successive line form the alphabet. In the comparable Japanese form, Iroha mojigusari, the first line must begin with the first and end with the second character of the alphabet, the second with the second and third, and so on. A number of abecedarii are extant in cl. and Alexandrian Gr., but they were also popular in Byzantine Gr. and are copious in med. Lat.: St. Augustine's well-known abecedarian psalm against the Donatists (Migne, PL 43.23 ff.) is the earliest known example of med. rhythmical verse.

As a mod. instructive device for children, the abecedarius has seen many familiar forms. In Eng., the best-known abecedarius is the song "'A'—You're Adorable," by Buddy Kaye, Fred Wise, and Sidney Lippman (1948).

■ K. Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen litteratur, 2d ed. (1897); C. Daux, Le Chant abécédaire de St. Augustin (1905); H. Leclercq, "Abécédaire," Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne, ed. F. Cabrol (1907); Meyer, v. 2, ch. 6; F. Dornseiff, Das Alphabet in Mystik und Magie, 2d ed. (1925), sect. 14; R. Marcus, "Alphabetic Acrostics in the Hellenistic and Roman Periods," Journal of Near Eastern Studies 6 (1947); Raby, Secular.

T.V.F. BROGAN; D. A. COLÓN

ABSORPTION. A term for the process of a reader's deep engagement with a poem, marked by a lack of self-consciousness about the materiality of the reading process. Poetic rhythm is often used to enhance the experience of deep absorption in a poem; this is most marked in such hypnotically rhythmic poems as S. T. Coleridge's "Kubla Khan," but the condition is also achieved by a range of representational and material devices that pull the reader into a poem. Absorption typically works by unifying the sound, form, and theme of a poem into a construct that the reader perceives as seamless. Absorption may extend to such effects as a heightened sense of the poem as fiction and an identification with the *persona.

Various modernist modes, incl. *collage, parataxis, and *cacophony, are often understood as disrupting the readability of poems. Such modes may seem to make the reader self-conscious about negotiating the compositional structures of the poem and, by so doing, theatricalize (in Fried's term) the experience of reading. Bertolt Brecht's "alienation effect" (verfremdungseffekt), a term he first used in the 1930s, provides a useful model for breaking the identification of the spectator with the spectacle under *modernism, esp. as this term relates to the Rus. Formalist Viktor Shklovsky's 1917 discussion of ostranenie or *defamiliarization. Both verfremdungseffekt and ostranenie are antiabsorptive devices.

Neither absorption nor its converses—impermeability, unreadability, disruption—are inherent poetic values; rather, they suggest approaches to reading and listening. The difference is not as much an essence as a direction: a centrifugal (projective) poetic field versus a centripetal (introjective) one. Poems that attempt to be conventionally absorbing in form and content run the risk of becoming tedious and boring—that is, highly unabsorbing—esp. when they rely on traditional forms and themes that may seem outmoded to historically conscious readers. In contrast, many seemingly antiabsorptive gestures, incl. discontinuity, cut-ups, and opacity, may create rhythmically charged, hyperengaging poems. Moreover, the active use of linguistic materiality—the reader's or listener's acute awareness of the verbal materials and structures of the poem—may contribute to multilevel, supercharged poetic absorption. It seems evident that absorption is historically conditioned: for some readers and listeners, depending on the period and particular poems, *dissonance will be more absorbing than *consonance or *euphony. Indeed, lit. hist. might be seen as incl. cycles of change in readers' affective responses to emerging acoustic, structural, and thematic dimensions of poetry. The shock of the new for some is the invigorating tonic of the contemporary for others. Modernist and avant-garde poetics that emphasize fragmentation, discontinuity, visual materiality, incompleteness, boredom, or noise often do so in order to open new possibilities for "verbivocovisual" (James Joyce's word from Finnegans Wake) engagement of all the senses. Such poetics often explore the chordal possibilities that result from incommensurability, rather than unity, among the levels of form, rhythm, and content; under the sign of overlay and palimpsest, discrepant and impermeable elements of a poem can be recognized as pleats and folds. Temporal, thematic, and stylistic disjunction may form, dissolve, and reform into shifting constellations (to use Benjamin's term) that are open possibilities for a reader's or a listener's absorption into the newly emerging force field of the poem.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS, DIFFICULTY, LANGUAGE POETRY, PRESENCE.

■ B. Brecht, "Brecht on Theater," trans. J. Willett (1977); C. Bernstein, "Artifice of Absorption," in A Poetics (1991); V. Shklovsky, "Art as Device" (1917) in Theory of Prose, trans. B. Sher (1991); Michael Fried, "Art and Objecthood" in Art and Objecthood (1997); W. Benjamin, "The Doctrine of the Similar" (1933), trans. R. Livingstone, Selected Writings, ed. M. W. Jennings et al., v. 2, (1999); R. Tsur, "Kubla Khan"—Poetic Structure, Hypnotic Quality, and Cognitive Style (2006).

C. BERNSTEIN

ACCENT. In Eng., accent is the auditory prominence perceived in one syllable as compared with others in its vicinity. Accent and stress are often treated as synonymous, though some literary scholars and linguists distinguish the two terms according to a variety of criteria. Disagreements persist about the source and acoustical nature of syllabic prominence—loudness, volume, *pitch, *duration, or some combination of factors—but they are arguably of peripheral relevance to the understanding of accent within Eng. poetics.

The phenomena of accent vary among langs. and the poetics associated with them. The Eng. lexical contrast between convict as noun and as verb has no parallel in Fr. (Sp. resembles Eng. in this regard, while Finnish resembles Fr.) For Fr. speakers, stress contours are perceived on the level of the phrase or clause, and learning Eng. entails acquiring the ability to hear contrastive accent in words, just as a Japanese speaker learning Eng. must acquire the distinction between the liquids l and r. A consequence is that, while Fr. *meters count only *syllables, Eng. meters conventionally also govern the number and distribution of accents.

In Eng. speech, accent operates in various ways on scales from the word (convict) through the sentence. As the units grow larger, accent becomes increasingly available to choice and conscious use for rhetorical emphasis. One step beyond the accents recorded in dicts. is the difference between "Spanish teacher" as a compound (a person who teaches Sp.) and as a phrase (a teacher from Spain). Eng. phonology enjoins stronger accent on "Spanish" in the compound and "teacher" in the phrase.

These lexical accents and differences in accent between compounds and phrases are "hardwired" into the Eng. lang. Beyond those, speakers exercise more deliberate choice when they employ contrasting accent to create rhetorical or logical emphases that are intimately entwined with semantic context. In the opposition Chicago White Sox vs. Chicago Cubs, it is the variable rather than the fixed element that receives the accent. Consequently, the question "Are you a fan of the Chicago Cubs?" accords with what we know about the world of baseball, while "Are you a fan of the Chicago Cubs?" implies a Cubs team from some other city. This kind of contrastive stress, so dynamic in Eng. speech, also plays a variety of important roles in the poetic manipulation of lang., perhaps esp. in how written poetry contrives to convey the rhetorical and intonational contours of speech. When a line break, for instance, encourages the reader to place an accent on some word where it would not normally be expected, the emphasis may suggest an unanticipated logical contrast. This foregrounding of accent may have rhetorical implications: "The art of losing isn't hard to master; / so many things seem filled with the intent / to be lost that their loss is no disaster" (emphasis inferred; Elizabeth Bishop, "One Art"); "The sound of horns and motors, which shall bring / Sweeney to Mrs. Porter [not Actaeon to Diana] in the spring" (T. S. Eliot, The Waste Land).

Within the specific realm of traditional Eng. metrical verse, words are treated as bearing an accent if they are short polysyllables (whose stress can be looked up in a dict.) or monosyllables that belong to an open class (noun, verb, adjective, adverb, interjection). Other syllables tend to be unstressed. Yet several factors can alter this perception. One is the kind of rhetorical force created by contrastive stress, esp. in the volatile case of pronouns. Another, more pervasive influence arises from the complex interaction between the abstract, narrowly constrained pattern of meter and the concrete, highly contingent *rhythm of the spoken words. This fundamental distinction—meter and rhythm are related similarly to "the human face" and "a human's face"—crucially conditions how we perceive accent; it accounts for some difficulties that an unpracticed reader of metrical verse, though a native of Eng. speech, may have in locating the accents in a line.

Some of the confusion surrounding the term may be reduced if we recognize that accent names phenomena on two different levels of abstraction, the acoustical and the metrical. There is an analogy with phonemes. Speakers of Eng. unconsciously insert a puff of air after the p in pan, but not in span. The difference can be detected by using acoustic instruments or by holding a palm in front of the mouth, yet is not detected by speakers in the absence of exceptional attention. The p in both cases represents the same phoneme, the same distinctive feature in the Eng. phonetic system—a system that does not merely divide the continuous acoustic stream of speech but abstracts from it a small set of three or four dozen discrete items. Similarly, various acoustical phenomena (pitch, loudness, etc.) give rise to an indefinitely large number of degrees and perhaps even kinds of accent; yet within a metrical context, the accustomed reader—analogous to a native speaker—reduces this continuum to an abstraction of (usually) two opposed values, stressed vs. unstressed. (The analogy fails to capture how the reader is simultaneously aware of a continuum of stress weights in the speech rhythm and a binary feature in the metrical pattern, both embodied in a single set of words.)

Differences of accent between compounds and phrases, or introduced for the sake of rhetorical contrast, which operate prominently within the larger manifold of rhythm, make no difference on the level of meter. "Spanish teacher" in either sense would be scanned as two *trochees, and the stronger stress on one word or the other has no specifically metrical effect. The four degrees of stress adopted by Chatman and others from Trager and Smith, while useful in the phonological analysis of Eng. and in the poetic understanding of rhythm, are unnecessary in the specifically metrical treatment of accent. The "four levels" represent an intermediate abstraction, as does the more traditional compromise of secondary stress or the hovering accent of Brooks and Warren. "Trager and Smith . . . demonstrated that stress and pitch are much more complex and variable phenomena than could be accounted for by the binary unstress-stress relation of traditional prosody" (Bradford 1994)—but this important truth should not mislead us into trying to weld speech rhythm and metrical pattern into an unwieldy whole, rather than hearing their interplay.

Readers are sensitive to a far wider range of rhythmic phenomena in poetry than those that are encoded within a metrical system. The nuanced stress patterns of speech, though they are foregrounded in nonmetrical or *free verse, do not disappear from the reader's awareness in metrical verse with its two-valued feature of accent. Rather, the give and take between the claims of meter and rhythm become a major source of auditory richness. Syllables may be heard as stressed either because of their prominence in speech or because of their position within the metrical line.

Any of the kinds of speech accent—lexical, phrasal, rhetorical—may coincide with a stressed position within the metrical line (as in the even-numbered positions within an *iambic *pentameter); or the speech and metrical accents may be momentarily out of phase. Within the accentual-syllabic system of Eng. metrics, these possibilities give rise to a repertoire of more or less common or striking variations. When speech accents occur in metrically unstressed positions, they give rise to metrical *substitutions of one foot for another, such as the trochee or the *spondee for the iamb:

/ x / /
Singest of summer in full-throated ease

When metrical accents occur where no speech accent is available to embody them, the syllable receives "promoted" stress. The conjunction in the middle of W. B. Yeats's line, "We loved each other and were ignorant," which might pass unstressed in speech, exhibits this kind of promoted accent. It may render the verse line different from and semantically richer than its speech equivalent. The metrical expectation of accent in this position in the line is presumably the initial cause of the promotion; whether the rhetorical point—that love and ignorance are not at odds as one might think, but inextricable—is an effect or another kind of cause would be difficult to decide.

The phonological and metrical understandings of accent can sometimes even be directly at odds. In a compound word like townsman, the second syllable is not unstressed (its vowel is not reduced to schwa). Phonologically, then, the syllable sequence "townsman of" presents three descending levels of stress. In A. E. Housman's line, however, "Townsman of a stiller town," the reader hears "of" with an accent created or promoted by the underlying metrical pattern of iambic *tetrameter; and in comparison, the syllable "-man" is heard as unstressed. The case is complicated by the copresence of other details: because the line is headless, e.g., we know not to scan the initial compound word as a spondee only once we get the following syllables ("a still-"); the unambiguous accent on the last of those syllables (confirmed by the final alternation, "-er town") anchors the whole iambic matrix and retrospectively clarifies the metrical role of "Townsman of." Complications of this kind are typical in the interaction between metrical pattern and speech rhythms and constitute a primary reason for apparent ambiguities of accent in lines of Eng. verse.

See DEMOTION, PROMOTION.

■ G. L. Trager and H. L. Smith Jr., An Outline of English Structure (1951); W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Concept of Meter: An Exercise in Abstraction," PMLA 74 (1959), Brooks and Warren; Chatman, chaps. 3, 4, appendix; N. Chomsky and M. Halle, The Sound Pattern of English (1968); M. Halle and S. J. Keyser, English Stress (1971); R. Vanderslice and P. Ladefoged, "Binary Suprasegmental Features and Transformational Word-Accentuation Rules," Lang 48 (1972); P. Kiparsky, "Stress, Syntax, and Meter," Lang 51 (1975); M. Liberman and A. S. Prince, "On Stress and Linguistic Rhythm," LingI 8 (1977); E. O. Selkirk, Phonology and Syntax (1984); B. Hayes, "The Prosodic Hierarchy in Meter," Phonetics and Phonology, ed. P. Kiparsky and G. Youmans (1989); R. Bradford, Roman Jakobson (1994).

C. O. HARTMAN

ACCENTUAL-SYLLABIC VERSE. In Eng. poetry that is not written in *free verse, the most common and traditional metrical system is called "accentual-syllabic" because it combines a count of *syllables per line with rules for the number and position of *accents in the line.

Metrical systems in different langs. measure lines by various linguistic elements and combinations of elements. Some systems are based on counting a single kind of element (syllables in Fr., monosyllabic words in Chinese). Others—such as the Lat. quantitative meters and the accentual-syllabic system used in mod. Eng., mod. Gr., Ger., and many other langs.—coordinate two different measures, such as syllables and their length or syllables and their stress. Cl. theorists provided a method of analyzing these meters by dividing them into feet, small units defined by various permutations of the two kinds of elements. Thus, the iamb orders a slack syllable and a stressed one (in Eng.) or a short syllable and a long one (in Lat.), while the *trochee reverses the iamb's order and the *anapest extends the iamb by doubling the initial weak syllable position.

Two-element *meters tend to maintain the stability of the lines' measure without as much rigidity in adherence to the meter's defining rules as single-element meters require. Consequently, much of the richness of variation in a two-element meter such as the accentual-syllabic can be captured at least crudely by analysis of substituted feet, metrical inversions, promoted stresses, and similar concepts that build on the notion of the *foot. This variety can be sketched or roughly diagrammed by *scansion of the lines.

Particular meters in such a two-element system are conventionally named by combining an adjectival form of the name of the base foot (iambic, dactylic, trochaic, etc.) with a noun made of a Lat. number word plus "-meter": trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, hexameter, and so on.

See DEMOTION, PROMOTION, PROSODY, SUBSTITUTION.

C. O. HARTMAN

ACCENTUAL VERSE. Verse organized by count of stresses, not by count of *syllables. Many prosodists of the 18th, 19th, and early 20th cs. looked upon most med. verse, a large amount of Ren. verse, and all popular verse down to the present as loose, rough, or irregular in number of syllables and in placement of stresses; from this assumption (not demonstration), they concluded that regulated count of stresses was the only criterion of the *meter. Schipper, e.g., effectually views most ME and mod. Eng. four-stress verse as descended from OE alliterative verse. But in this, he misconceived the nature of OE prosody (see ENGLISH PROSODY, GERMANIC PROSODY). Other prosodists, too, have lumped together verse of very different rhythmic textures drawn from widely different social registers and textual contexts, treating all of them under the general rubric of accentual verse. This generalization masks differences that should probably be characterized in metrical (and not merely more broadly rhythmic) terms. Ideally, we would isolate the similarities among species of accentual verse and then identify either features or gradations in strictness of form that differentiate them. No clear theoretical foundation has been established to accomplish this.

Several varieties of accentual verse have been proposed in the Western langs.: (1) folk verse as opposed to art verse, i.e., the large class of popular (e.g., greeting card) verse, *nursery rhymes, college cheers and chants, slogans, logos, and *jingles—both Malof and Attridge rightly insist on the centrality of the four-stress line here; (2) *ballad and *hymn meter, specifically the meter of the Eng. and Scottish popular ballads and of the metrical psalters in the Sternhold-Hopkins line; (3) popular *song—an extremely large class; (4) literary imitations of genuine ballad meter such as the *Christabel meter; (5) genuine *oral poetry, which indeed seems to show a fixed number of stresses per line but, in fact, is constructed by lexico-metrical formulaic phrases (see FORMULA); (6) simple *doggerel, i.e., lines that hardly scan at all except for stress count, whether because of authorial ineptitude, scribal misprision, textual corruption, or reader misperception—there are many scraps of late med. verse that seem to be so; (7) literary verse (often stichic) that is less regular than accentual-syllabic principles would demand but clearly not entirely free, e.g., the four-stress lines that Helen Gardner has pointed out in T. S. Eliot's Four Quartets; (8) Ger. knittelvers*, both in a freer, late med. variety subsequently revived for literary and dramatic purposes by J. W. Goethe and Bertholt Brecht, and in a stricter, 16th-c. variety (Hans-Sachs verse) in octosyllabic couplets; and (9) Rus. dol'nik* verse, a 20th-c. meter popularized by Alexander Blok, mainly in three-stress lines (interestingly, this form devolved from literary verse, not folk verse as in Eng. and Ger.). In all the preceding, there has been an assumption that accentual verse is isoaccentual; if one defines it more broadly (organized only on stresses but not always the same number per line), one would then admit Ger. freie Rhythmen* and freie Verse* and possibly Fr. 19th-c. vers libéré*. But these verge on *free verse.

When Robert Bridges, the Eng. poet and prosodist, studied accentual verse at the turn of the 20th c., he believed he discovered a paradox in claims that accentual verse works by counting the natural stresses in the line. For example, despite S. T. Coleridge's claims that "Christabel" is in a "new" meter and that every line in it will be found to have exactly four stresses, the poem actually contains a number of problematic lines, like "How drowsily it crew," which cannot by any reasonable standard carry four natural accents. Of this line Bridges remarks: "In stress-verse this line can have only two accents . . . but judging from other lines in the poem, it was almost certainly meant to have three, and if so, the second of these is a conventional accent; it does not occur in the speech but in the metre, and has to be imagined because the metre suggests or requires it; and it is plain that if the stress is to be the rule of the metre, the metre cannot be called on to provide the stress" (italics added). For Bridges, the definition of true "accentual verse" is that it operates on only two principles: "the stress governs the rhythm" and "the stresses must all be true speech-stresses" (Bridges set these sentences in all capitals). This two-part definition, he asserts, strictly distinguishes accentual verse from *accentual-syllabic verse, in which it is the function of the meter to establish and preserve in the mind's ear a paradigm, an abstract pattern, such that, if the line itself does not supply the requisite number of accents, the pattern shall supply them mentally. But Bridges's view is complicated by the dominance of accentual-syllabism in so much mod. Eng. verse that poets and readers may hear promoted stresses even in a mostly accentual context. In many poems by Elizabeth

Bishop, such as "The Fish" (three-stress), e.g., the near regularity of accent counts encourages us to fill out some shorter lines with stresses that, while strong relative to surrounding syllables, would not be heard in the speech rhythm of the line (see RELATIVE STRESS PRINCIPLE); analyzing the verse as either strictly accentual or as consistently but roughly accentual-syllabic requires acknowledging exceptions, but calling the result "free verse" ignores important gestures toward regularity.

In Eng. as in other Teutonic langs., accentual verse has some claim to being fundamental; it is "the simplest, oldest, and most natural poetic measure in English" (Gioia). It lies near the root of poetry, as it were, and near the point where poetry and music diverge (and reconverge in song). It comes closer than accentual-syllabic meters to manifesting the *beat that defines the term meter in the musical sense of that word. Perhaps partly for this reason, versions of accentual verse (measuring lines in four, three, or even two stresses) have been popular alongside mod. free verse, sometimes only notionally distinct from it.

See ALLITERATION, BALLAD METER, EQUIVALENCE, VERSIFICATION. See also NUMBER(S).

■ Schipper; Bridges, "Appendix on Accentual Verse"; G. Saintsbury, History of English Prosody (1906–10); W. Kayser, Kleine deutsche Versschule (1946); H. Gardner, The Art of T. S. Eliot (1949); J. Bailey, "The Stress-Meter of Goethe's Der Erlkönig," Lange&S 2 (1969); J. Malof, A Manual of English Meters (1970), chaps. 3–4; M. G. Tarlinskaja, "Meter and Rhythm of Pre-Chaucerian Rhymed Verse," Linguistics 121 (1974) and English Verse: Theory and History (1976); Scott; Brogan, 319–37; Attridge; Scherr; D. Gioia, "Accentual Verse," http://www.danagioia.net/essays/eaccentual.htm.

T.V.F. BROGAN; C. O. HARTMAN

ACEPHALOUS (Gr., "headless"). A term used for lines of verse that are missing an initial syllable (Ger. fehlende Auftakt, suppression of the anacrusis*). Though it is undeniable that, in some runs of regular *accentual-syllabic verse, occasional lines will be found that are simply missing their first syllables, whether from design or defect of textual transmission, the claims that have most often been made about the concept of acephaly have been made on more sweeping grounds, involving metrical phenomena that are, in fact, capable of varying interpretation. It used to be held, e.g., that there are some eight or nine acephalous lines in Chaucer, incl.—depending on how one treats final e, hence, how one scans—the first line of the "General Prologue" in the Canterbury Tales. It was also claimed that a missing first syllable changes rising rhythm to falling—see Schipper (see also RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM). Many temporal and musical theories of *meter are congenial to the notion of acephalous lines as important variants rather than simply defects, but such theories are not now widely accepted. If, however, acephaly, as foreclipping, is disputed, the converse phenomenon, *catalexis, the cutting off of final syllables, is very well attested; but this may, in fact, be unrelated.

■ Schipper; Brogan, K106, K125, K150, K344; Dale, 22 ff.; G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988).

T.V.F. BROGAN

ACMEISM. A Rus. poetic circle formed in 1912 in reaction against mystical *symbolism, the reigning movement of the prior decade. Founded by Nikolai Gumilev and Sergei Gorodetsky, the acmeist coterie included Anna Akhmatova, Osip Mandelstam, Vladimir Narbut, and Mikhail Zenkevich, all of whom produced poems of a widely divergent nature. The Gr. term akmē denotes not only "apex" but "point" and "edge," evoking the group's interest in precision and sharpness. Eschewing the symbolist notion of the poet as an inward-looking dreamer, the acmeists saw poetry as a craft and the poet as an artisan who carves out exact meanings of words with his "hammer." For this reason, they advocated architectural "equilibrium" rather than the musical "vagueness" of symbolism. The notion of equilibrium informed their entire program: the acmeists aimed for a balance between past and present, between the poet's inner world and the external, tangible world. They proposed evolutionary rather than revolutionary change, positioning themselves against their radical contemporaries, the Rus. futurists. In contrast to the futurist rejection of the past, Mandelstam later defined acmeism as a "yearning for world culture." While *futurism discarded mimetic representation in favor of fragmentation and wordplay, and symbolism depicted objects as vehicles to a higher sphere, acmeism espoused a poetics of palpability and precision: the acmeist poet depicts the earthly object with heightened clarity, attempting to view it as if for the first time, like Adam. (This idea was underscored by acmeism's alternate name, "Adamism.") Acmeism thus embodied a broader international phenomenon of the 1910s: a tempered *modernism that forged a middle ground between poetic trad. and avant-garde radicalism. The strongest exemplars of this, Rus. acmeism and Anglo-Am. *imagism, both sought inspiration in Chinese poetry, Gr. and Roman imagery, the *Parnassians, and the Fr. poet Théophile Gautier. Both groups adopted the metaphor of "hardness" to imply their twin goals of restrained self-expression and rigorous technique. The movements' leaders, the acmeist Gumilev and the imagist Ezra Pound, both modeled at least some of their principles on the spare, chiseled verse of their female companions: Anna Akhmatova and H.D. (Hilda Doolittle). The outbreak of World War I effectively put an end to acmeism, although attempts were later made to resurrect it. Its most significant members, Akhmatova and Mandelstam, never repudiated the movement, yet their late work differs greatly from their acmeist poems of the 1910s.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; RUSSIA, POETRY OF.

■ B. Eikhenbaum, Anna Akhmatova (1922); R. Timenchik, "Zametki ob akmeizme" (Notes on Acmeism), Russian Literature 7–8 (1974); D. Mickiewicz, "The Acmeist Conception of the Poetic Word," Russian Lan- guage Journal, suppl. issue (1975); E. Rusinko, "Russian Acmeism and Anglo-American Imagism," Ulbandus Review 1 (1978); V. Zhirmunsky, "Symbolism's Successors" (1916), The Noise of Change, ed. S. Rabinowitz (1986); R. Eshelman, Nikolaj Gumilev and Neoclassical Modernism (1993); C. Cavanagh, Osip Mandelstam and the Modernist Creation of Tradition (1995); J. Doherty, The Acmeist Movement in Russian Poetry (1995); O. Lekmanov, Kniga ob akmeizme (Book about Acmeism, 1998); K. Painter, Flint on a Bright Stone: Precision and Restraint in American, Russian, and German Modernism (2006).

K. Painter

ACROSTIC (Gr., "at the tip of the verse"). A poem in which the first letter of each line or stanza spells out either the alphabet (an *abecedarius); a name, usually of the author or the addressee (a patron, a beloved, a saint); or the title of the work (e.g., Plautus; Ben Jonson's The Alchemist). On occasion, the initials spell out a whole sentence—the oldest extant examples of this sort are seven Babylonian texts dating from ca. 1000 BCE, which use the first syllable of each ideogram. By far the most common form reveals, while it purports to conceal, the author's name, as in the acrostic Cicero claims Ennius wrote or François Villon's acrostic to his mother that spells "Villone." The spelling is usually straightforward but may be in anagram for the sake of concealment. If the medial letter of each line spells out a name, the poem is a mesostich; if the final letter, a telestich; if both initials and finals are used, a double acrostic (two of the Babylonian acrostics are such); if all three, a triple acrostic. Finals may also be in reverse order. In any case, the aesthetic of the acrostic is clandestine, as its signs are virtually invisible to rhythm and sense, and is meant to be received by seeing the text on the page.

The visual aesthetic of acrostics relates to other clever forms, including carmina quadrata; the deft word-square intexti of Hrabanus Maurus (ca. 784–856), such as the grid that bears "Magnentius Rhabanus Maurus hoc opus fecit" (Magnentius Rhabanus Maurus made this work)—with a mod. analogue in Edward Taylor's poem to Elizabeth Fitch—and carmina figurata or pattern poetry, alongside which acrostics are commonly found in ancient texts (e.g., the Greek Anthology). In Asia, acrostics are found in both Chinese poetry (ring poems, wherein one can begin reading at any character) and Japanese poetry (kakushidai and mono no na).

Acrostics are the kind of mannered *artifice that will be popular in any silver-age poetry; they flourished in Alexandria and in the Middle Ages, being written by Boniface, Bede, Fortunatus, Giovanni Boccaccio, Eustache Deschamps, and Clément Marot among many. Commodian has a book of 80 acrostics, the Instructiones; not only is Aldhelm's De laudibus virginitatis a double acrostic made out of its first line, but the last line is the first line read backward, forming a box. The longest acrostic is apparently Boccaccio's Amorosa visione, which spells out three entire sonnets. In the Ren., Joachim du Bellay excepted the ingenious acrostic and anagram from his sweeping dismissal of med. Fr. verse forms. Sir John Davies wrote a posy of 26 acrostics to Queen Elizabeth (Hymnes of Astraea, 1599). The mod. disparagement begins as early as Joseph Addison (Spectator no. 60), but the acrostic was very popular among the Victorians, appearing in the last chapter of Lewis Carroll's Through the Looking Glass. In E. A. Poe's valentine poem to Frances Sargent Osgood, her name is spelled by the first letter of the first line, the second letter of the second line, and so on in a diagonal pattern across the page.

In vernacular conversation, this process of elevating initials into a higher script to produce acronyms (snafu, gulag)—now especially common with the proliferation of instant messaging and online chat—has evolved a growing shorthand vocabulary. But even in the early Christian Church, the symbol of the fish is such an acronym: the initials of the five Gr. words in the phrase "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Savior" spell out the Gr. word for fish, ichthys.

See ANAGRAM.

■ A. Kopp, "Das Akrostichon als kritische Hilfsmittel," Zeitschrift für deutsche Philologie 32 (1900); Kastner; K. Krumbacher, "Die Acrostichis in der griechischen Kirchenpoesie," Sitzungsberichte der königlichbayerische Akad. der Wiss., philos.-philol.-hist. Klasse (1904); H. Leclercq, "Acrostiche," Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne, ed. F. Cabrol (1907); E. Graf, "Akrostichis," Pauly-Wissowa; R. A. Knox, Book of Acrostics (1924); F. Dornseiff, Das Alphabet in Mystik un Magie, 2d ed. (1925); Lote, 2.305; Reallexikon II; W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature, ch. 3 (1960); R.F.G. Sweet, "A Pair of Double Acrostics in Akkadian," Orientalia 38 (1969); T. Augarde, Oxford Guide to Word Games (1984); Miner et al., pt. 4; W. Stephenson, "The Acrostic 'fictio' in Robert Henryson's 'The Testament of Cresseid' (58–63)," Chaucer Review 29.2 (1994); M.A.S. Carter, "Vergilium Vestigare: Aeneid 12.587–8," CQ 52.2 (2002); D. L. Norberg, An Introduction to the Study of Medieval Latin Versification (2004); J. Danielewicz, "Further Hellenistic Acrostics: Aratus and Others," Mnemosyne 58.3 (2005); E. Assis, "The Alphabetic Acrostic in the Book of Lamentations," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 69.4 (2007); J. Partner, "Satanic Visions and Acrostics in Paradise Lost," Essays in Criticism 57.2 (2007).

T.V.F. Brogan; D. A. Colón

ADDRESS. Under the heading of address in poetry come not only the listeners a poem invokes or implies and the inanimate things or dead people to whom it may speak, but the entire communicative context that such a work projects. The contextual embeddedness of address includes its reference to a situation of utterance (called deixis*) but also the ways in which that situation participates in artistic *convention; the poem's own hist. and fate as a text; and social practices governing literary production and circulation.

Most written poems do not acknowledge that they are written rather than sung or spoken, but only a minority adhere throughout to a representation of one-to-one, face-to-face address. A poem may say "you" (or use the vocative) to more than one addressee; allude to auditors overhearing; call on objects or abstractions in an *apostrophe; convey that its ostensible target is not paying *attention; or leave doubt as to who is meant by "you." Poems may also show no ling. markers of address whatever and yet point to their reception in ways that show resemblance to the explicit hailing of a reader (e.g., in Shakespeare's sonnet 65, "in black ink my love may still shine bright").

Most sentences in conversation or in a letter do not include the word you but are pragmatically indistinguishable from those that do: context, not a pronoun, makes it clear to all who is speaking to whom in what situation. Short written poems usually lack this kind of disambiguating context, leaving them often strikingly underspecified for address. In ling. terminology, the person meant to hear or read is the target, whereas addressee means only the person designated by the pronoun you. These need not coincide: thus, a parent may say "you" to an infant while expecting uptake chiefly from an overhearing, targeted spouse; or a criticism of John can be made more provoking by taking the sham form of address to Mary while John, the target, is standing by; but in lit. crit., the term address often serves for both. To avoid an overtechnical idiom, the present entry continues to use address in this double sense; the term target is not established in poetry crit., and the sense intended should be clear in the examples that follow. (For this and other helpful distinctions, see Goffman 1981; Levinson 1983, 1988; Clark 1992.)

Consideration of address in poetry takes place against the background of a critical trad. that could seem to deny that poetic addresses are in any sense effectual. P. B. Shelley's Defence of Poetry (1821) styles the poet as "a nightingale, who sits in darkness and sings to cheer its own solitude with sweet sounds; his auditors are as men entranced by the melody of an unseen musician, who feel that they are moved and softened, yet know not whence or why." John Stuart Mill's celebrated 1833 remark in "What Is Poetry?" that "poetry is *over*heard. . . . [T]he peculiarity of poetry appears to us to lie in the poet's utter unconsciousness of a listener" likewise seems to rule out the possibility of poetic address to any real audience beyond the self, since "poetry is feeling confessing itself to itself, in moments of solitude." (A few sentences later in the same essay, Mill shifts his image slightly, writing now not of the "utter unconsciousness" that an audience is present but of the poet's success in "excluding . . . every vestige" of such consciousness from the poem: "The actor knows that there is an audience present; but if he acts as though he knew it, he acts ill." The ease with which Mill moves between these apparently contradictory models can be taken to point not to a muddle but to an insight: the kind of distinction we make in theater between, say, Hamlet, who does not and cannot share the theater audience's ontological space, and the actor playing Hamlet, who does but works to make it seem as though he does not, is often elusive in poetry, notwithstanding critical postulates of the poetic speaker or "lyric I." This slipperiness, in turn, has consequences for understanding poetic address, since, without such distinct levels, it can be difficult even to be sure what counts as being addressed in a poem or who if anyone may be covertly or explicitly included as a bystander or in any of various oblique ways "meant.") Influential though Shelley's and Mill's romantic view of the singing or soliloquizing poet has been (also through later inflections of it by T. S. Eliot and Northrop Frye), this model does not account well for poems addressing a patron, friend, beloved, or the reader. Poems addressed to a contemporary of the poet predominate in Gr. and Lat. poetry and are plentiful in other trads.; they might also be thought closest to quotidian speech or writing. But, in fact, writing a poem to someone (like singing a song to him or her), even when—as in W. C. Williams's "This Is Just to Say"—the poem seems to approximate daily communication, actually brings that communication to a temporary halt; poetry suspends relationship in order to present it. Poems addressing contemporaries are marked by this fact. Moreover, insofar as a poem is not only a message but also a thing (see ARTIFACT), it by its nature looks beyond any single hearer. Eliot's poem "A Dedication to My Wife" formulates the double fact: "These are private words addressed to you in public." It is not that the one-to-one address is mere pretense; the words of an intimate poem are private, even as their articulation as poetry binds and ritualizes them in more-than-private ways.

The vast corpus of Eur. poetry in the *courtly love and Petrarchan trads. (see PETRARCHISM) makes vivid illustration of another, related dimension of address: the intertextual one. Here the stylized appeal to (e.g.) a hard-hearted mistress is first of all an element of the trad. and only secondarily—if at all—an address to a genuine hearer. The effect of the sometimes self-conscious conventionality is to produce a you whose function is at least as much display as it is communication. Where we posit or know of a historical person who may have been meant, that person will have found herself in one or another relation to the textual and intertextual you that is a version of her. Each such poem will "mean" a real person or generate a fictive one to a different degree and in its own ways.

The character of each poem's individual address has an effect, in turn, on the extent to which it is appropriate to emphasize the notion of the reader as an overhearer. A poem whose explicit addressee cannot hear might be assumed to be targeting theatrically some other audience of eavesdroppers instead. Address to absent or dead persons is, presumably for this reason, traditionally grouped with apostrophes to objects and abstractions. But, in fact, poetic address to the absent and dead varies greatly in tone and effect, from the customary pomp of public-sounding addresses to great men of past ages, to Constantine Cavafy's surprisingly intimate addresses to them (as in "Ides of March"), to Sylvia Plath's riddling whimsy in addressing her unborn child ("You're"), to the deep longing of some poems of address to a deserting lover or the beloved dead. Poems of this last sort that are convincing in the intensity of their focus on the lost addressee may not stand to gain from introducing the idea of an overhearer.

Address to a reader, by contrast, might seem to bring a poem into clear alignment with the norms of one-to-one communication, but, in fact, it too is attended by many complexities. One example will show a number of these. When Stefan George's volume Das Jahr der Seele (The Year of the Soul, 1897) opens autumnally with a poem whose first line is "Komm in den totgesagten park und schau" (Come to the park they say is dead and look), nothing rules out address to an unnamed companion of the poet who is here invited into a really existing park—in which case we readers seem mere overhearers, ratified or not. But as the book's invitatio, the poem must be in equal measure a direct appeal to its reader as it asks the addressee to "take the deep yellow, the soft grey / from birch and from boxwood" and "twine" them gently with fading flowers "in an autumnal vision." In George's programmatic *decadence, the park must also represent the book itself, as it also represents Eur. high culture, refined and enervated, at the fin de siècle. The poem's eight imperatives, all instructions for the visitor in a certain garden, form at the same time a collective proposal to the reader for particular cultural stances and acts of mind. There are still more complications to identifying the poem's addressee if we know that George's Das Jahr der Seele was artisanally printed in only 206 copies for an exclusive male circle, a historical audience to which no present reader can be admitted. On the other hand, George's disdain for the broader reading public of his time went hand in hand with his keen sense of art's bid to endure through time, i.e., to find later readers. But are you the later reader so addressed? The complications of reader address vary widely among eras, poets, and individual poems, but they are seldom absent.

When a poem offers insufficient cues for readers to be certain of the communicative situation it posits, or addresses a "you" whose identity is ambiguous, contextual factors and practices of reading guide readers' sense of poetry's addressedness as much as or more than textual cues do. Poems in a sequence may, e.g., show quite different relations to addressees when read individually from when taken together. Knowledge of literary-historical context may also be decisive in shaping a reader's sense of a poem's energies of address. Even architectural hist. may come to bear: it has, e.g., been suggested with respect to the poetry of early mod. England, an era whose domestic architecture is said to have made privacy a rare and fleeting experience, that alertness to the possible presence of side participants (bystanders or eavesdroppers) may significantly change our readings of poems that looked rather different when read through romantic presuppositions of the speaker's solitude (Dubrow). Much work remains to be done in shedding historical light on poetic address in individual poets, eras, and trads. But even the fullest contextualizing labors will leave some residue of ambiguous address, not least because poets have recognized the artistic fruitfulness of poetry's communicative uncertainties and sometimes made them integral. Moreover, address in general is not only a feature or property of texts; since it is the axis of communication, its workings are peculiarly dependent on the reader's uptake.

Address plays a distinctive enough role in the work of a few poets that it has attracted special critical attention there. Crit. of Walt Whitman, e.g., has provided several investigations of address to a reader, few poets having dwelt so insistently as Whitman on their poems' contact with readers in a later time. Paul Celan's poems return often to a "you" who sometimes seems to be the deity in whom the poems may or may not show belief, but at other times may be the reader or a Buberian principle of addressable personhood in humans generally. And the work of John Ashbery, where pronouns come and go bewilderingly, plays persistently with the tendency of an unidentified "you" to arrest or unsettle the reader. Such highly ambiguous address is in some ways a special case; but in another way, the lability of reference in Ashbery's work exhibits in concentrated form the freedom that poetry gains through its characteristic detachment from the contexts of use that ordinarily govern lang., a detachment and freedom nowhere more palpable than in poetry's unleashed powers of address.

See EPITAPH, MONOLOGUE, VOICE.

■ T. S. Eliot, "The Three Voices of Poetry," On Poetry and Poets (1957); Frye; E. Goffman, "Footing," Forms of Talk (1981); B. Costello, "John Ashbery and the Idea of the Reader," Contemporary Literature 23 (1982); J. Culler, "Apostrophe," The Pursuit of Signs (1982); W. R. Johnson, The Idea of Lyric (1982); S. C. Levinson, Pragmatics (1983); N. Frye, "Approaching the Lyric," and H. F. Tucker, "Dramatic Monologue and the Overhearing of Lyric," Lyric Poetry: Beyond New Criticism, ed. C. Hošek and P. Parker (1985); K. Larson, Whitman's Drama of Consensus (1988); S. C. Levinson, "Putting Linguistics on a Proper Footing," Erving Goffman: Exploring the Interaction Order, ed. P. Drew and A. Wootton (1988); C. Altieri, "Life after Difference: The Positions of the Interpreter and the Positionings of the Interpreted," Canons and Consequences (1990); H. Clark, Arenas of Language Use (1992); O. Mandelstam, "On the Addressee," The Complete Critical Prose, trans. J. G. Harris and C. Link (1997); W. Waters, Poetry's Touch: On Lyric Address (2003); V. Jackson, Dickinson's Misery: A Theory of Lyric Reading (2005); H. Vendler, Invisible Listeners (2005); H. Dubrow, The Challenges of Orpheus (2008).

W. WATERS

ADONIC (Adoneus, versus Adonius). In Gr. and Lat. poetry, an *aeolic or dactylic clausula that took the form of the last two feet of the dactylic hexameter, i.e., – ∪ ∪ – – , and took its name from the refrain of the song to the god Adonis: o tŏn Ādōnīn (Sappho, fr. 168 [Lobel-Page]). According to the Alexandrian grammarians, the adonic formed the fourth line of the *sapphic strophe, although often there is no word end between the third and fourth lines (which suggests the two lines were metrically one), as is true in Lat. also—e.g., Horace, Odes 1.2.19 ff.: u/xorius amnis (– / – ∪ ∪ – –). But Horace seems to have followed the Alexandrians, for usually there is word end between the sapphic *hendecasyllable and the adonic, and twice there is hiatus. Adonics appear together with other aeolic cola (see COLON) in Plautus and Seneca. Columbanus (sixth c.) wrote adonics; Boethius combined the *hemiepes with the adonic (Consolation of Philosophy 1.2). The adonic verse was also used in stichic poems (see STICHOS) and in strophes of various lengths in med. Lat. verse, in both quantitative and rhythmic meters.

■ Norberg; Crusius; C. Questa, Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto (1967); Halporn et al.

J. W. HALPORN

ADYNATON. The impossibility device: the rhetorical figure for magnifying an event by comparison with something impossible, e.g., "I'd walk a million miles for one of your smiles" (Al Jolson, "My Mammy"); cf. "Hell will freeze over before . . ." and the closely related figure of the impossibility of finding the right words (aporia), i.e., the "inexpressibility topos," e.g., "Words fail me"; "I can't begin to tell you how much . . ." In Gr. and Lat. lit., the two most common varieties of adynaton are the "sooner than" type, which claims that the impossible will come true sooner than the event in question will take place, and the "impossible-count" type, referring to unimaginable numbers—for instance, of sands on the shore or stars in the sky. These varieties are uncommon in the lit. of the Middle Ages. By contrast, OF writers cultivated a different brand known as the fatras, dealing with impossible or ridiculous accomplishments. Occitan poets used an allied form made popular by Petrarch's sonnet "Pace non trovo e non ho da far guerra." The Gr. and Lat. types were, however, abundantly revived by Petrarchan poets all over Europe, who made use of them either to emphasize the cruelty of the lady or to affirm their love. In Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, Antony employs adynaton to dramatize his intent to remain in Egypt despite his Roman responsibilities: "Let Rome in Tiber melt and the wide arch / Of the rang'd empire fall. Here is my space" (1.1.33). Adynaton may also be used negatively to assert a contrary impossibility, as in Shakespeare's Richard II: "Not all the water in the rough rude sea, / Can wash the balme off from an anointed King" (3.2.54–55). Other famous examples include those found in Andrew Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress," Robert Browning's "Up at a Villa—Down in the City," W. H. Auden's "As I Walked Out One Evening," and, strikingly, in Louis MacKay's "Ill-Tempered Lover." In East Asian poetry, varieties of adynata are used as a rhetorical device in the poetry of praise. The poems and hymns of blessing and sacrifice in the Book of Songs, the oldest extant anthol. of Chinese poetry, use magnificent similes and numbers, and a Middle Korean poem, "Song of the Gong," uses the myth of the impossible ("when the roasted chestnut sprouts, then . . ."). Richard Lanham's position, that adynaton is "sometimes a confession that words fail us," would tend to place the figure in the category of metalogisms characterized by Group μ as the suppression of units of expression, i.e., among figures like *litotes, *aposiopesis, reticentia, and silence. Adynaton, thus, might also serve the function of promising rather than maintaining silence.

■ R. H. Coon, "The Reversal of Nature as a Rhetorical Figure," Indiana Univ. Studies 15 (1928); H. V. Canter, "The Figure Adynaton in Greek and Latin Poetry," AJP 51 (1930); E. Dutoit, Le Thème de l'adynaton dans la poésie antique (1936); Curtius 94–98, 159 ff.; L. C. Porter, La Fatrasie et le fatras (1960); Group μ; C. Petzsch, "Tannhäusers Lied IX in C und in cgm 4997. Adynatonkatalog und Vortragsformen," Euphorion 75 (1981)—on impossibility catalogs; M. Shapiro, "The Adynaton in Petrarch's Sestinas," Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, ed. A. S. Bernardo and A. L. Pellegrini (1983); Lanham.

A. W. HALSALL; T.V.F. BROGAN

AEOLIC, aristophaneus. The name usually given to a class of ancient Gr. lyric meters, so called because first attested in the poems of Sappho and Alcaeus, which were composed in the Aeolic dialect. Common to all forms labeled aeolic is the sequence – ∪ ∪ – ∪ – , which appears occasionally as a *colon by itself but much more frequently is preceded and/or followed by a single *anceps (syllable either long or short), or preceded by the so-called aeolic base (a double anceps in Sappho and Alcaeus, elsewhere either – x , x – , or ∪ ∪). Iambic or trochaic may precede or follow within the same colon, and the – ∪ ∪ – sequence may be expanded into either a dactylic – ∪ ∪ – ∪ ∪ – (∪ ∪ –) or a choriambic – ∪ ∪ – – ∪ ∪ – (– ∪ ∪ –). Typical examples are

– ∪ ∪ – ∪ – x	aristophaneus
x – ∪ ∪ – ∪ –	*telesilleum
x x – ∪ ∪ – ∪ –	*glyconic
x x – ∪ ∪ – – ∪ ∪ – ∪ –	lesser *asclepiad
x x – ∪ ∪ – ∪ ∪ – ∪ ∪ – ∪ –	sapphic *fourteener

The aeolic sequence – ∪ ∪ – ∪ – may be terminally shortened into – ∪ ∪ – x, most notably in the pherecratean (x x – ∪ ∪ – x) and reizianum (x – ∪ ∪ – x), as well as replaced by – x – ∪ ∪ – , usually in the glyconic equivalent known as the choriambic dimeter (see CHORIAMB): x x – x – ∪ ∪ – . The latter name is somewhat misleading, however, suggesting as it does a compound out of two independent parts. Genuine dimeters in which the second element is a choriamb do exist, but the first section is either an iamb or another choriamb, and they are more closely related to pure iambic *dimeters (x – ∪ – x – ∪ –) or the mixed form – ∪ ∪ – – ∪ – than they are to aeolic. There also exists a catalectic form (see CATALEXIS) of the latter, externally identical with the aeolic – ∪ ∪ – ∪ – x and called, like it, an aristophaneus; but all such dimeters are foreign to the versification of Alcaeus and Sappho. They appear first in Anacreon and have close affinities with the *ionic sequences characteristic of him, one of which, ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – –, is actually known as the *anacreontic.

See GREEK POETRY, MELIC POETRY.

■ D. L. Page, Sappho and Alcaeus (1955); Maas, sect. 54; D. S. Raven, Greek Metre (1962); Dale, ch. 9–10; D. Korzeniewski, Griechische Metrik (1968); Halporn et al.; Snell; West, 29 ff.; K. Itsumi, "The 'Choriambic Dimeter' in Euripides," CQ 76 (1982), and "The Glyconic in Tragedy," CQ 78 (1984)—fundamental for the two forms discussed; A. M. Laguna Ortiz, "Nueva descripción funcional de los eolocoriambos de Alceo y Safo," Cuadernos de filología clásica: estudios griegos e indoeuropeos 7 (1997).

A. T. COLE

AESTHETICISM. A term originally used in the early 19th c. to label an attention to the sensuous elements of art in opposition to its social responsibilities, thus applied in contemp. reviews to Alfred, Lord Tennyson's early poems; more famously, the term for a literary, philosophical, and cultural movement of the later 19th c. that came to be identified with the phrase "art for art's sake." From that movement, in the 20th c., the term came to be identified with a belief that art is autonomous and has intrinsic value. Although in a broad sense, those beliefs characterize much formative aesthetic theory in 18th-c. England and 19th-c. Germany, from Anthony Ashley Cooper, the third Earl of Shaftesbury (1671–1713) through Immanuel Kant, Friedrich Schiller, and even G.W.F. Hegel, the early Victorian connotation of irresponsible attention to the sensuous element in art, at the expense of social awareness, remained tied to the term, even for mid-20th-c. formalists (see FORMALISM) who shared most of the fundamental aesthetic beliefs of aestheticism.

Tracing either the roots or the boundaries of aestheticism as a movement in 19th-c. England is difficult since that term, as well as "the aesthetic movement," often referred to a set of loose alliances around a common resistance to mid-Victorian aesthetic and social beliefs. The central intellectual statement of the movement is Walter Pater's Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873), particularly its "Conclusion," which in its original version contained the most famous utterance of the phrase "art for art's sake," though that phrase in Eng. goes back at least to A. C. Swinburne's book on William Blake. Through Swinburne and also directly, Pater might have found the phrase and certainly did find many ideas about art in the Fr. symbolist movement (the phrase "l'art pour l'art" occurs in Victor Cousin as early as 1818). But Pater was also well read in the Ger. aesthetic theorizing of the late 18th and early 19th cs., and his essay on Johann Winckelmann shows not only a knowledge of that critic but an extended consideration of Hegel's Lectures on Aesthetics. More important for the movement's intellectual and cultural influence, however, Pater absorbed the aesthetic and literary theories of John Ruskin and Matthew Arnold, while resisting Ruskin's moral evaluations and Arnold's insistence on an objective view of culture and art, thus giving intellectual definition to aestheticism as a theory of a specific type of apprehension—one he claimed made life valuable. At the most basic level, following Kant's idea that one perceives beauty when one perceives an object as having purposiveness without purpose and Hegel's objectification of Kant in defining art as the embodiment of the idea of beauty, Pater defined aesthetic apprehension as a particular mode of perception that allows one to live with more intense awareness and sees art as the mode best prepared to give that apprehension. He took from both Ruskin and Arnold an insistence that art and culture could act as a perspective from which to evaluate society but intentionally stripped from each the moral earnestness, making his own aesthetic critique more resistant to Victorian moral and social norms and thus provoking charges of hedonism and irresponsibility.

Although Pater gave aestheticism its intellectual definition as a movement, by the time his book appeared, it was already a broad set of practices and beliefs. Although *Pre-Raphaelitism as a theory of painting originally denoted an antagonism to academic and cl. compositions and forms in favor of a return both to nature and to the intensity and color that these painters saw in art before Raphael, by the 1860s—when it had become associated with aestheticism—the movement also referred to the particular style of female beauty in the paintings, most famously of D. G. Rossetti. When one adds to these principles a greater attention to ornament; an ethic of craft; an attention to the status of aesthetic objects as popularized by William Morris's extrapolation of Ruskin's theories; and an association of later Victorian poets such as Swinburne, Rossetti, and Morris either antagonistically as the *"fleshly school" or as "Aesthetic Poetry" (Pater's title for a review of Morris, for which the "Conclusion" to The Renaissance was originally written), it becomes possible to see a constellation of intellectual positions and styles in painting, poetry, and art objects that in different ways challenged mid-Victorian moral and aesthetic standards. As an example of the associations the movement could evoke, the murderous heroine of Mary Braddon's phenomenally popular novel Lady Audley's Secret has a portrait done that depicts her as a Pre-Raphaelite beauty, with that association meant to inform us of a dangerous aspect to her beauty. By 1883, Gilbert and Sullivan could satirize the movement in expansive strokes in their operetta Patience and expect the audience to get the joke.

A more subversive and hidden strand of aestheticism was its connection with homosexuality both as a practice and as an association with Hellenism at Oxford in the 1870s and 1880s (see Dowling). Pater was turned down for a promotion at Oxford in the wake of a long-suppressed scandal regarding his relations with an undergraduate. He had been satirized as the sexually ambiguous Mr. Rose in W. H. Mallock's The New Republic and, when he revised the "Conclusion" to The Renaissance in 1888, largely toning down some of the phrases most associated with his aestheticism, he gave as a reason that "it might possibly mislead some of those young men into whose hands it might fall." This strand of the movement becomes particularly important to Pater's famous student Oscar Wilde, who brings together the intellectual, cultural, and scandalous aspects of aestheticism in ways that account for its vexed afterlife in 20th-c. lit. hist. Wilde, in such essays as "The Critic as Artist" and "The Decay of Lying," gave Pater's aesthetic theories, through ironies and paradoxes, a more challenging edge. His book The Soul of Man under Socialism gave to aestheticism a more explicit set of political implications (though not ones that would have been shared by Pater or other aesthetes before Wilde). Perhaps most significantly for the larger culture, his plays in the early to mid-1890s, ending with The Importance of Being Earnest, coupled with a notorious public persona, entertained and challenged a middle-class audience with sharp ironies at its beliefs and practices (see Gagnier). His trial and conviction for gross indecency (the 1885 Criminal Law Amendment Acts term for recriminalizing male homosexual acts) effectively captured all these strands of aestheticism under a penumbra of homophobia that affected its understanding for almost the next 100 years.

One might think, for instance, that given its relations with *symbolism and its roots in Kantian aesthetics, Pater's program would have filiations in T. S. Eliot's poetic thought, influenced as he was by Fr. symbolism, and in mid-century formalism, affected as it was by Kantian ideas of purposiveness without purpose. But Eliot's writing on Pater is famously dismissive, and the *New Criticism barely has a word to say about him. M. C. Beardsley, in Aesthetics, divides aestheticism into one aspect that he treats as truism—that art should not be judged according to moral, political, or other extraneous criteria—and another that he considers "a form of fanaticism," the view that "maintains the supreme value of art over everything else." Meanwhile, though Wilde's reputation as an author—largely for Earnest and The Picture of Dorian Gray—remained high, it was generally scrubbed of any mention of his sexuality. In the last decades of the 20th c., theoretical movements such as deconstruction, feminism, and queer theory have brought closer attention to Pater, Wilde, and the other strands of aestheticism, though with the antagonism of these movements to formalism, often at the expense of the aesthetic theory within aestheticism. More recent studies, including work reviving fiction and poetry directly influenced by aestheticism, have also started to rectify this problem.

■ M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1966); D. De Laura, Hebrew and Hellene in Victorian England (1969); M. Levey, The Case of Walter Pater (1978); R. Gagnier, Idylls of the Marketplace (1986); R. Ellmann, Oscar Wilde (1988); C. Williams, Transfigured World (1989); R. Dellamora, Masculine Desire (1990); J. Loesberg, Aestheticism and Deconstruction (1991); L. Dowling, Hellenism and Homosexuality in Victorian Oxford (1996); E. Hanson, Decadence and Catholicism (1997); K. A. Psomiades, Beauty's Body (1997); Y. Prins, Victorian Sappho (1999); T. Shaffer, The Forgotten Female Aesthetes (2000); J. Siegel, Desire and Excess (2000).

J. Loesberg

AFFECT. When Wimsatt and Beardsley published "The Affective Fallacy" in 1949, the term affective was not widespread in lit. crit., though the phenomena they were examining—the range of emotive, psychological, even physiological responses to literary lang.—had been the subject of much discussion. The adjective affective (from the noun affect, "a feeling or subjective experience accompanying a thought or action," "an emotion, a mood" [OED]) provides Wimsatt and Beardsley a label beneath which a great deal of poetic theory—from Aristotle and Longinus through Edmund Burke and S. T. Coleridge to I. A. Richards and Max Eastman—can be both gathered in one place and held skeptically at arm's length. The "affective fallacy," they argue, is the "confusion between the poem and its results," a confusion leading directly to "impressionism and relativism," an unacceptable confusion for a self-styled "objective criticism." As the invocation of objectivity can suggest, affect as a term in poetic theory registers crit.'s uneasy engagement with science. In its mod. usage, affect enters the Eng. lexicon through the scientific psychology of the late 19th c. As an explicitly scientific term, affect insists both on its distinction from numerous apparent synonyms—e.g., emotion or mood—and on its higher level of generality than the particular affects—e.g., anxiety, disgust, joy—that it collectively designates. In psychoanalysis, affects (anxiety or melancholy, for instance) are central to Sigmund Freud's project of the description of unconscious motivations yet finally remain subordinated to the analysis of representations, the latter being understood to be more amenable to scientific control (Green). The term affect thus seems to treat the phenomena to which it refers with a scientifically skeptical distance, even as it incites the further drawing of distinctions—precisely its function in Wimsatt and Beardsley's essay, as they rename Aristotelian or Coleridgean theory as kinds of affective crit.

Modernist poetics, of which the "The Affective Fallacy" is perhaps the acme, emerges within a horizon defined by scientific psychology (see MODERNISM). Richards openly advocates a "co-operation of psychology and literary criticism" in the service of the regulation of "dangers both of a false understanding of the sense" of poems "and of a distorted development of feeling" about them. T. S. Eliot famously distinguishes between emotions and feelings: "The business of the poet is not to find new emotions, but to use the ordinary ones and, in working them up into poetry, to express feelings which are not in actual emotions at all." Emotion here is the property of psychological individuals, while "floating feelings" are what are catalyzed in poems and belong no longer to either author or reader: "Poetry is not a turning loose of emotion, but an escape from emotion." Eliot's attack on the idea of the poet as an expressive personality is made, like Richards's "practical criticism," in the name of science: it is only when a poet achieves "depersonalization that art may be said to approach the condition of science." While neither Richards nor Eliot uses the term affect—like some contemp. writers, they prefer "feelings"—their stated desire to "approach the condition of science" by way of describing an "escape from emotion" (with all the subjectivism that implies) into a more free-floating, and more subtly differentiated, realm of response is part of the hist. of the term affect in poetic theory. Massumi, to name one contemp. legatee, works out from findings in experimental psychology to argue, like Eliot, for an "autonomy of affect" vis-à-vis "emotions."

Wimsatt and Beardsley turned their scientific skepticism esp. against the overreaching of scientific approaches to literary understanding: "The gap between various levels of physiological experience and the recognition of value remains wide, in the laboratory or out." For the past several decades, however, researchers have been narrowing this "gap," with its implied opposition between affective "experience" and poetic or semantic "value." The "affective stylistics" of Fish's "reader-response" crit. refuses to separate experience and value. The meaning of a poem cannot be separated from the experience of reading it, pace Wimsatt and Beardsley: John Milton's Paradise Lost produces as its meaning an affective experience of being "surprised by sin." Approaching the issue from psychology, Tomkins both granted affects an autonomy they were not allowed in the classic Freudian drive system and tied them more essentially to human cognition and intention: "for human subjects value is any object of affect," he states sweepingly. More recently, Damasio, a neurologist, has described the detailed interdependence of cognition and affect. Damasio, too, leverages a distinction between emotions and feelings, though for him the former is a bodily response to the environment, while the latter is a perception of this body state.

For some literary critics, the scientific lexicon has held out the promise of an improved crit. Sedgwick and Frank applaud the descriptive richness of Tomkins's eight (or more) primary affects, and the invitation to descriptive taxonomy has been taken up by such critics as Altieri, who sees feelings, emotions, passions, and moods as analytically separable subdivisions of affect, each capable of shedding light on specific poetic and literary effects. Ngai's subtle study of "ugly feelings" in mod. and avant-garde lit., while not esp. interested in scientific research on affect, also takes up the joys of taxonomic innovation: the prose experiments of Samuel Beckett and Gertrude Stein, she tells us, induce an affect of "stuplimity" in their readers. Affective responses to rhythm and rhyme have been analyzed through the prism of a *cognitive poetics (Tsur), and in general there has been a great deal of work in recent years at the intersection of philosophy, scientific psychology, neuroscience, and lit. crit. Some have attempted to synthesize this work into a full-blown account of emotion and its interrelations with the arts (Robinson), while others have emphasized particular issues such as emotional expression in the arts (Wollheim). Some history-minded critics have shown skepticism about the emotions. Reddy tries to navigate between rhetorically and biologically based perspectives on affect in his discussion of 18th-c. sentimentality. Gross and Pinch, by contrast, both insist that discourses of emotion and affect are just that—discourses, the products of rhetorical innovation and trad.: affects serve as a kind of social currency, a thesis bolstered by social-constructionist anthropological research such as Abu-Lughod's study of the role of poetry among Bedouin women. Pinch's analysis of 18th-c. discussions of affect and emotion returns us to Eliot's distinction between (personal) emotions and feelings or affects that seem "impersonal" (7): "Not always lodged within the private, inner lives of individual persons, [feelings] rather circulate among persons as somewhat autonomous substances" (1). The distinction between (subjective, personal) emotions and expression and a more inchoate, but no less powerful, region of affects is esp. relevant to the theory and crit. of the *lyric, whether challenged by avant-garde practitioners (Silliman et al.) or by literary historians insisting that Sappho's passion (Prins) or Dickinson's "misery" (Jackson) are not affective properties of these two poets, but the result of their uptake in critical trads. Stewart, on the other hand, insists that "lyric" has precisely as its crucial task the mediation of individual affective expressivity and the context-independence of trad., lang., and historical address. Lyric is not the mere expression of private emotions, Stewart agrees, but it gives form to what Eliot might call "feelings" and what contemp. crit. often calls "affects," that have "escaped" the measure of the individual body, person, or subject.

■ T. S. Eliot, "Tradition and the Individual Talent," The Sacred Wood (1920); I. A. Richards, Practical Criticism (1929); W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Affective Fallacy," The Verbal Icon (1954); S. Fish, Surprised by Sin (1967), and "Literature in the Reader: Affective Stylistics," Is There a Text in This Class? (1980); L. Abu-Lughod, Veiled Sentiments: Honor and Poetry in a Bedouin Society (1986); A. Green, "Conceptions of Affect," On Private Madness (1986); R. Wollheim, Painting as an Art (1987); R. Silliman, C. Harryman, L. Hejinian, S. Benson, B. Perelman, and B. Watten, "Aesthetic Tendency and the Politics of Poetry: A Manifesto," Social Text 19–20 (1988); R. Tsur, Toward a Theory of Cognitive Poetics, 2d ed. (2008); Shame and Her Sisters, ed. A. Frank and E. Sedgwick (1995), esp. S. Tomkins, "What Are Affects?" and E. Sedgwick and A. Frank, "Shame in the Cybernetic Fold"; A. Pinch, Strange Fits of Passion (1996); A. Damasio, The Feeling of What Happens (1999); Y. Prins, Victorian Sappho (1999); W. M. Reddy, The Navigation of Feeling (2001); P. Fisher, The Vehement Passions (2003); B. Massumi, "The Autonomy of Affect," Parables for the Virtual (2002); S. Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002); C. Altieri, The Particulars of Rapture (2003); S. Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2005); V. Jackson, Dickinson's Misery (2005); J. Robinson, Deeper Than Reason (2005); D. Gross, The Secret History of Emotion (2006).

J. Elmer

AFFECTIVE FALLACY. "The Affective Fallacy" is the title of a 1949 essay by William K. Wimsatt, Jr. and Monroe C. Beardsley. It follows their 1946 essay, "The Intentional Fallacy." The two critics use the term to designate any approach to lit. that comments upon the emotional, imaginative, or physiological effects of a poem upon one or more readers. The outcome is that the poem itself tends to disappear as an object of study. In particular, since readers' aesthetic reactions to poetry are influenced by different factors, affective crit. often slips into *impressionism and relativism. Wimsatt and Beardsley instead call for an objective crit. focused on the poem as an autonomous verbal icon.

Like the preceding essay, "The Affective Fallacy" was a crucial statement of New Critical orthodoxy. In particular, the essay's argument was crucial to the Am. New Critics' efforts to professionalize literary studies. Wimsatt and Beardsley, thus, orient their essay against two modes of crit. that represented weak models of literary professionalism. The first is the scientific study of the emotive effects of lit. pioneered by I. A. Richards. This approach erodes literature's disciplinary distinctiveness, culminating in a positivistic study of reader psychology. The second mode is the literary appreciation typical of middlebrow publications like the Book-of-the-Month Club. This crit., the authors argue, is a mass-cultural version of the more sophisticated *affect criticism of the romantic era.

In the 1970s, the affective fallacy was revisited by *reader-response critics, who argued on epistemological, linguistic, and artistic grounds for an affective or subjective crit. that focuses on the relation between poem and reader. Nevertheless, Wimsatt and Beardsley's disavowal of affective crit. as a subprofessional endeavor continues to influence the ways in which critics envisage the distinction between professional and lay readings of literary texts, esp. as reflected in pedagogy.

See INTENTIONAL FALLACY, NEW CRITICISM, READER.

■ W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Intentional Fallacy" and "The Affective Fallacy," The Verbal Icon (1954); S. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? (1980).

S. SCHRYER

AFFLATUS. (cl. Lat., "a blowing or breathing on," a "breeze," or "blast" from wind, animals, humans; also adflatus). Cicero, De divinatione 2.57.117, writes of a blowing out of the earth, "adflatus e terra," in a passage skeptical of the Delphic Oracle; also, sometimes with a negative connotation, as in Ovid, Metamorphoses 7.551, "adflatu . . . nocent," where the breath of those dying of plague pollutes the air. But this negative sense did not carry into later lit. Instead, the figurative sense is found, meaning *"inspiration" or "breathing in" of the divine spirit; this sense, too, is classical and can be found in Cicero (De natura deorum 2.66), as well as in Horace and Virgil. At Aeneid 6.50–51, Virgil describes the Sibyl as frenzied, disheveled with prophetic fever, and physically inflated: "adflata est numine quando / iam propriore dei" (since she felt the god's power breathing nearer). This sense of the proximity of power, along with the transformation of the inspired figure, accompanies the term in later usage in the Neo-Lat. era. But afflatus never became a common term. In its rare appearances, afflatus was virtually interchangeable with furor divinus (divine frenzy) and, in the realm of poetry, furor poeticus*. E.g., Numine afflatur is the inscription under the medallion for Poetry in the vault to Raphael's Stanza Della Segnatura in the Vatican (Curtius).

■ Curtius; C. J. Steppich, Numine Afflatur: Die Inspiration des Dichters im Denken der Renaissance (2002).

R. FALCO

AFRICA, POETRY OF

I. English
II. French
III. Portuguese
IV. Indigenous. See EGYPT, POETRY OF; ETHIOPIA, POETRY OF; HAUSA POETRY; SOMALI POETRY; SWAHILI POETRY; XHOSA POETRY; ZULU POETRY.

I. English. With the end of the colonial period and the advance of literacy and higher education in Africa came a rapid efflorescence of Af. poetry written in Eng. This poetry displays the variety to be expected in so diverse a continent. Like other examples of *postcolonial poetics, Af. poetry in Eng. develops out of the fusion of indigenous trads. with the literary inheritances transmitted through the colonial lang. It is responsive to local idioms, values, and hist. and at the same time remakes for Af. experience the forms and styles imported through Eng. from the Brit. Isles, America, and elsewhere. The adoption of the Eng. lang. for Af. purposes, while advantageous to writers who wish to be heard by an international audience, is fraught with political significance. Some Af. critics contend that poetry written in a historically imperialist lang. cannot be fully disassociated from colonialism's oppressive legacy.

Af. poetry written in Eng. is often seen as divided between poetry that is locally rooted and influenced by Af. oral trads. and cosmopolitan poetry, which is indebted primarily to Western literary trads. The work of Af. poets, however, complicates this distinction, since even the most cosmopolitan poets, such as the Nigerian poet Wole Soyinka, also draw on local oral trads., and even the most local, such as the Ugandan poet Okot p'Bitek (1931–82), also make use of Western literary models. In the wake of colonialism and under the influence of globalization, Af. poetry in Eng. is inextricable from Brit., Ir., Am., and other influences, even when in revolt against the West's values and cultural forms. Conversely, in the West, the descendants of enslaved Africans and economic migrants have fundamentally shaped poetry.

The first poem in the sequence "Heavensgate" (1962, rev. 1964) by Nigerian poet Christopher Okigbo (1932–67) serves as an example of the enmeshment of Af. and Western poetics in sub-Saharan Africa. The poet invokes the Igbo river goddess, near the village where he grew up: "Before you, mother Idoto / naked I stand." Reaffirming his affinity with native culture, Okigbo grounds his poem in local religion and flora (naked, he leans on the oilbean tree, sacred to Idoto, a totem for her worship). At the same time, his *diction (referring to himself as "a prodigal" further in the poem) and rhet. ("Before you, mother Idoto") also recall the Christianity that missionaries imported into Igboland.

The lyric is shaped by the Roman Catholicism in which Okigbo was brought up, incl. prayers to the Virgin Mary and the story of the prodigal son. The poem's final lines, which cry out to a native divinity, paradoxically echo Psalm 130 ("Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord") and Psalm 5 ("Give ear to my words, O Lord. . . . Hearken unto the voice of my cry").

Although Af. poets are indebted to religious, lyric, and other cultural forms from the West, they seldom lose their awareness of Africa's rich oral trads. A poem such as Okot p'Bitek's Lawino (1966) relies on Acholi *songs, *proverbs, *repetitions, idioms, and oral address, even as it also draws on the model of the Western long poem (Okot has cited H. W. Longfellow's Hiawatha as a key influence). An aggrieved village woman inveighs against her husband for forsaking his local culture and being too enamored of Western ways: "Listen, Ocol, you are the son of a Chief, / Leave foolish behavior to little children." In her book-length complaint, Lawino repeatedly brandishes an Acholi proverb that warns against uprooting the pumpkin; in so doing, she emphasizes the importance of preserving the household, as well as the oral trads. that sustain it.

Between the poles marked out by Okigbo's highly literary, allusive, syntactically complex early poetry and Okot's orally based poetics of song, praise (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY), and *invective, Af. poetry has discovered a multitude of ways to mediate the oral and scribal, the local and global, the socially urgent protest and the private meditation. Indeed, as an Oxford-trained anthropologist influenced by Longfellow and the Bible, Okot cannot be reduced to simple nativism. And as a poet who absorbs drum rhythms and praise song into his later work, Okigbo—who died fighting for an independent Biafra—should not be seen as a Westernized sellout. Under the influence of intensified global communication, trade, education, and travel, younger poets work in ever-more deeply hybrid and transnational forms. The South Af. Lesego Rampolokeng (b. 1965), e.g., draws on a global array of influences, incl. rap musicians (see HIP-HOP POETICS), the Af. Am. Last Poets, Jamaican dub poet Mutabaruka, and Jamaican-born Brit. reggae poet Linton Kwesi Johnson, to mount a vehement social critique of his country both before and after apartheid.

From the period of Af. decolonization, first formally achieved in anglophone Africa with Ghana's independence in 1957, to today's struggle against both external economic imperialism and the internalized colonialism of dictators and tyrants, oral and other traditional poetry has strongly influenced Af. Eng. poems. The imprint of Af. oral culture is visible in such fundamental elements as the poet's stance as defender of communal values; allusions to the hist., customs, and artifacts of the culture; and the architectonic features adapted from praise song, proverbial tale, *epic, invective, and indigenous prayer. Experiments in the transmutation of traditional Af. poetic forms into Eng. vary with the culture represented.

Arising in the aftermath of *modernism, much Af. Eng. poetry eschews *meter and *rhyme in favor of *free verse, often ornamented by *alliteration and *assonance, although rap's influence has spawned intensely rhymed and rhythmic verse. Poems that are meant to speak to, or for, Af. communities avoid extended *conceits unless they are buttressed by hard or sardonic reason or concrete *imagery.

A. West Africa. West Africa, particularly Nigeria and Ghana, has the oldest and most influential trad. of sophisticated poetry in Eng. This *lyric poetry combines audacious leaps of thought and individualized expression with social responsibility; it privileges the metaphysical, religious, and social concepts of its own society, although it also draws on concepts indigenous to Eur. cultural hist. When social protest is overt, it is usually presented with intellectual and artistic complexity rather than simplistic fervor. Exemplary Nigerian poets and their principal works include the country's oldest active poet Gabriel Okara (b. 1921; The Fisherman's Invocation [1978], written against the background of civil war); Christopher Okigbo (Labyrinths [1971], incl. the prophetic sequence "Path of Thunder"); J. P. Clark (b. 1935; Reed in the Tide [1965], incl. autobiographical poems; Casualties [1970], concerning the war between Nigeria and Biafra; A Decade of Tongues [1981]; State of the Union [1981], about Nigeria's socioeconomic and political problems in an international context); the philosopher and polemicist Chinweizu (b. ca. 1935; Invocations and Admonitions [1986]); the Nobel laureate Wole Soyinka (b. 1934; Idanre [1967], based on Yoruba mythology; Shuttle in the Crypt [1971]; Mandela's Earth and Other Poems [1988]; and a number of plays that contain poetry); Odia Ofeimun (b. 1947; The Poet Lied [1989], Dreams at Work [2000]); Niyi Osundare (b. 1947; Village Voices [1984], The Eye of the Earth [1986], Waiting Laughters [1990], The Word Is an Egg [2004]); and Tanure Ojaide (b. 1948; Labyrinths of the Delta [1986], The Endless Song [1988], In the House of Words [2006]).

Among Ghanaians, experiments in the trans. and adaptation of indigenous poetic forms have been common, as in the works of Kofi Awoonor (b. 1935; Rediscovery [1964], in which Ewe funeral *dirges are brought into Eng.; Night of My Blood [1971], both autobiographical and political; Ride Me, Memory [1973], in which a Ghanaian abroad reflects on his country; The House by the Sea [1978]; Guardians of the Sacred Word [1978], a collection of Ewe poetry); Kofi Anyidoho (b. 1947; Elegy for the Revolution [1978], A Harvest of Our Dreams [1985], Ancestral Logic and Caribbean Blues [1992]); and Atukwei (John) Okai (b. 1941; The Oath of the Fontomfrom [1971], whose title poem refers to a royal drum that beats out the hist. of a society; Lorgorligi Logarithms [1974]; Freedom Symphony [2008], love poems). Closer to Western trads. of sensibility and structure are others such as Kwesi Brew (1924–2007; The Shadows of Laughter [1968], African Panorama [1981], Return of No Return [1995], The Clan of the Leopard [1996]), A. W. Kayper-Mensah (1923–80; The Dark Wanderer [1970]; The Drummer in Our Time [1975], concerning Africa's view of Europe; Sankofa: Adinkra Poems [1976]; Proverb Poems [1976]), and Frank Kobina Parkes (1932–2004; Songs from the Wilderness [1965]).

A notable poet of Gambia was Lenrie Peters (1932–2009; Satellites [1967], poems about human rights in the broadest sense; Katchikali [1971], which takes its name from a sacred place in Bakau, where the coast of Gambia juts into the North Atlantic; Selected Poetry [1981]).

Prominent poets of Sierra Leone include Syl Cheney-Coker (b. 1945; Concerto for an Exile [1973]; The Graveyard Also Has Teeth [1980]; The Blood in the Desert's Eyes [1990]) and Lemuel Johnson (1940–2002; Highlife for Caliban [1973]; Hand on the Navel [1978]).

B. East Africa. East Af. poetry is dominated by two styles. One originated in Okot p'Bitek's trans. and adaptation of his own Acholi poetry. Okot (Song of Lawino, the lament of a rural wife over encroaching Westernization; Song of Ocol [1970], her husband's reply; "Song of Prisoner" [1971], a commentary on Kenyan politics; "Song of Malaya" [1971], a critique of sexual morality) was probably the most widely read poet of Africa in the later 20th c. Through long rhetorical *monologues usually narrated by a victim of modernization, these poems express social commentary with lucid, graphic imagery, humorous irony, and paradoxical common sense. Another Ugandan poet who makes extensive use of Af. proverbs and folk culture is Okello Oculi (b. 1942; Orphan [1968], an allegorical account of Af. culture's removal from traditional values; Malak [1976], a narrative poem about the dictator Idi Amin's Uganda; Kookolem [1978], about the intersection of social and domestic oppression; Song for the Sun in Us [2000]).

An alternative style, more obviously indebted to West Af. poetry, uses *asyndeton, subtle *imagery, and erudite *allusions to convey a mordant and individualized vision of mod. life. It includes a wider range of subjects, tones, and frames of reference. Preeminent poets include the Kenyan Jared Angira (b. 1947; Juices [1970]; Silent Voices [1972]; Soft Corals [1973]; Cascades [1979]; The Years Go By [1980]), the Ugandan, Richard Ntiru (b. 1946; Tensions [1971]), and the South Sudanese Taban lo Liyong (b. 1939; Meditations in Limbo [1970]; Frantz Fanon's Uneven Ribs [1971]; Another Nigger Dead [1972]; Ballads of Underdevelopment [1976]; Another Last Word [1990]).

C. Southern Africa. Before the abolition of apartheid, Eng.-lang. South Af. poetry was most concerned with subjugation, courage, poverty, prisons, revolt, and the private griefs of public injustice. South Af. poets writing in Eng. before the 1970s were often exiles, whose works, therefore, also reflected Brit. or Am. experience—e.g., Arthur Nortje (1942–70; Dead Roots [1973]), Cosmo Pieterse (b. 1930; Echo and Choruses: "Ballad of the Cells" [1974]), and esp. Dennis Brutus (1924–2009; Sirens, Knuckles and Boots [1963]; Letters to Martha and Other Poems from a South African Prison [1968]; Poems from Algiers [1970]; A Simple Lust [1973], the collection that marked Brutus's turn from artifice toward a *plain style; China Poems [1975]; Stubborn Hope [1978]; Salutes and Censures [1982]; Leafdrift [2005]). In Brutus's poetry, the speaker is often an observer combining passionate concern with reflective distance, and the imagery portrays monstrous abuse in natural and social settings of oblivious serenity. Even after the ending of apartheid, Brutus continued to write poetry that championed a more just social order than South Africa achieved as a new democracy.

The experimental adaptation of regional Af. forms to original poetry in the Eng. lang. is well represented by the work of Mazisi Kunene (1930–2006; Zulu Poems [1970]; Emperor Shaka the Great: A Zulu Epic [1979], an adaptation of a traditional epic; Anthem of the Decades [1981]; and The Ancestors and the Sacred Mountain [1982]).

Keroapetse Kgositsile (b. 1938; Spirits Unchained [1969]; For Melba [1970]; My Name Is Afrika [1971]; The Present Is a Dangerous Place to Live [1975]; To the Bitter End [1995]; This Way I Salute You [2004]) and the broadly popular Oswald Mtshali (b. 1940; Sounds of a Cowhide Drum [1971]; Fireflames [1980]) are forerunners of the dramatic change in and copious output of Af. poetry after 1970. The influence of Af. Am. musical and poetic forms, esp. *jazz, rap, *blues, and the renaissance of the 1960s, looking back to the *Harlem Renaissance, is often evident (see AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY). Immediacy may be reinforced by incl. phrases from South Af. langs. or Afrikaans or by directly addressing the reader as a compatriot. Major writers include poets who wrote in solidarity with the Black Consciousness movement's emphasis on the affirmation of black cultural values in the face of state-based terror and oppression, such as Mongane Serote (b. 1944; Yakhal'Inkomo [1972]; Tsetlo [1974]; No Baby Must Weep [1975]; Behold Mama, Flowers [1978]; The Night Keeps Winking [1982]; Freedom Lament and Song [1997]; History Is the Home Address [2004]); Sipho Sepamla (1932–2007; Hurry Up to It! [1975]; The Soweto I Love [1977]; From Gorée to Soweto [1988]); Mafika Pascal Gwala (b. 1946; Jol'iinkomo [1977]; No More Lullabies [1982]); James Matthews (b. 1929; Cry Rage [1972]; No Time for Dreams [1977]; Flames and Flowers [2000]; Age Is a Beautiful Phase [2008]); Daniel P. Kunene (b. 1923; Pirates Have Become Our Kings [1978]; A Seed Must Seem to Die [1981]); and the jazz-influenced Wopko Pieter Jensma (b. 1939; Sing for Our Execution [1973]; Where White Is the Colour Where Black Is the Number [1974]; I Must Show You My Clippings [1977]).

Postapartheid poets in South Africa include Ingrid de Kok (b. 1951; Familiar Ground [1988], Transfer [1997], Terrestrial Things [2002]), Kelwyn Sole (b. 1951; The Blood of Our Silence [1988], Projections in the Past Tense [1992], Love That Is Night [1998], Mirror and Water Gazing [2001]), Gail Dendy (b. 1957; Assault and the Moth [1993]), Gabeba Baderoon (b. 1969; The Dream in the Next Body [2005], The Museum of Ordinary Life [2005], A Hundred Silences [2006]), and the performance poet Rampolokeng (Horns for Hondo [1990], Rap Master Supreme—Word Bomber in the Extreme [1997], The Bavino Sermons [1999]). See SOUTH AFRICA, POETRY OF.

Politics and economics have denied a wide international audience to the poetry of South Africa's anglophone neighbors. Malawian figures include David Rubadiri (b. 1930; An African Thunderstorm [2004]), Frank M. Chipasula (b. 1949; Visions and Reflections [1972]; O Earth Wait for Me [1984]; Nightwatcher, Nightsong [1986]; Whispers in the Wings [2001]), Jack Mapanje (b. 1944; Of Chameleons and Gods [1981], Beasts of Nalunga [2007]), and Steve Chimombo (b. 1945; A Referendum of the Forest Creatures [1993], Napolo and Other Poems [2009]).

Notable Zambian poets are Richard A. Chima (b. 1945; The Loneliness of a Drunkard [1973]) and Patu Simoko (b. 1951; Africa Is Made of Clay [1978]).

Zimbabwe has produced copious poetry reflecting both the price of liberating warfare and the consequences of victory. Preeminent poets include Samuel Chimsoro (b. 1949; Smoke and Flames [1978]), Musaemura Zimunya (b. 1949; Thought Tracks [1982], Kingfisher, Jikinya and Other Poems [1982], Country Dawns and City Lights [1985]), Mudereri Kadhani (b. 1952; Quarantine Rhythms [1976]), Chenjerai Hove (b. 1956; Up in Arms [1982], Red Hills of Home [1984], Blind Moon [2004]), and Freedom Nyamubaya (b. 1960; On the Road Again [1986]).

With important national and individual differences, the poetry of southern Africa still has an identifiable character. It is often premised on an intense affinity for the land and, through that, a close union between the spiritual and physical worlds. Nature is presented as a manifestation of religious forces but is also treated with a more direct, nonsymbolic sensibility than in other Af. poetry. Poet and *personae are more closely identified with their community through a diction that relies on direct *address to the reader as putative interlocutor, conversational *apostrophe, quiet humor, *anaphora, and avoidance of strident effects. Esoteric lyricism and declamation are both rare. The stresses that urban cultures impose on rural life and on personal values and identity are common themes, as well as the systemic effects of colonial and postcolonial hegemony. In form and themes, the poetry of this region adapts Eng. to provide sophisticated but unaffected articulation of traditional Af. worldviews in a context of rapid social change.

Af. poetry in Eng. displays an immense cultural and personal variety. Sometimes written in an engaged and earnest tone, frequently leavened by humor, it maintains close identification with communal values and experience while conveying personal perceptions and global influences. Inventively hybridizing Eng. poetic forms with indigenous cultural resources, Af. poetry in Eng. is true to a mod. Af. experience that straddles Western and Af. metaphysical, ethical, and aesthetic visions.

II. French. The rise of Af. poetry in Fr. cannot be understood without reference to the slave trade and the subsequent colonization of Africa, the cultural politics France and Belgium imposed during their years of occupation, and multiple forms of resistance to these conditions.

It is no accident that New World writers are usually included in studies and anthols. of Af. poetry in Fr. Both Africans and Af. Americans had to confront the same racist oppression. They accordingly made common cause and sought out each other for inspiration and readership, despite real differences. Hence, the importance of Harlem Renaissance figures such as Langston Hughes and Claude McKay to the founders of *Negritude, the first coherent Af. literary and intellectual movement, which can be dated to the 1930s. Of the founders of the first important literary review, L'Étudiant Noir (The Black Student), Aimé Césaire (1913–2008) of Martinique, Léon G. Damas (1912–78) of French Guiana, and Léopold Sédar Senghor (1906–2001) of Senegal, only the last was from Africa itself, and all three were students in Paris. This tendency toward cross-fertilization with other black lits. made Af. poetry in Fr. intercontinental in scope. Though Césaire and Senghor and later poets repeatedly demonstrated their mastery of Fr. trad., they were drawn both to other lits. from what was then called the third world and to indigenous Af. lits. The desire to embrace and renew traditional Af. poetic practice, expressed rhetorically by the proponents of Negritude, has become increasingly important among subsequent generations, who are, however, aware of the difficulties such hybrid literary forms present.

There is no exhaustive definition for the term Negritude. Coined by Césaire in his 1939 Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Notebook of a Return to the Native Land), it was, in his words, "the simple recognition of the fact that one is black, the acceptance of this fact and of our destiny as blacks, of our history and our culture." Yet there is nothing simple about this statement; its implications are manifold, and the poetry that sought to express it took many different forms, from Damas's explosive Pigments (1937) to Césaire's virulent defense of black culture in his Cahier to Senghor's lofty exaltation of Af. values beginning with his 1945 Chants d'ombre (Shadow Songs). The landmark anthol. of Negritude poetry came three years later, Senghor's Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue française (Anthology of New Black and Malagasy Poetry in the French Language, 1948), with its influential preface by Jean-Paul Sartre, "Orphée noir" ("Black Orpheus").

In Sartre's view, Negritude was but an antithesis, a second phase of reaction to white racism that, while defending the specificity of black culture, did so in view of a final synthesis, the transition to a universal (in Sartre's version, proletarian) culture with no oppressors and, ultimately, no specificity. Sartre's perspective was at odds with that of Senghor himself, who had in mind a less politicized universality, but the former set the grounds for Frantz Fanon's typology of postcolonial cultures in Les Damnés de la terre (The Wretched of the Earth, 1961), one on which most interpretations of postcolonial lit. hist. implicitly repose: a dialectical movement from a colonial period of slavish imitation of Western models to a period of revolt, exemplified by Negritude, and then a postindependence period in which Africans have taken control of their own culture, though not without outside interference.

Damas died relatively young, but Senghor and Césaire lived until the 21st c., and the canonical status of their version of Negritude has been confirmed by Senghor's weighty Oeuvres complètes (Complete Works, 2006) and the volumes that marked Césaire's 90th birthday in 2003. Yet, already in 1966, the anthol. by the publisher Présence Africaine, Nouvelle somme de poésie du monde noir (A New Survey of the Poetry of the Black World), can be seen as a more ambiguous and ambitious poetic project than those rooted in early Negritude. Foremost among the poets from that generation was Tchicaya U'Tamsi (1931–88), whose dense and difficult oeuvre combined contemp. techniques with an anguished concern for the Congo and the ravages of neocolonialism, esp. in his 1962 Epitomé. The number of retrospective eds. that followed his death is a mark of his influence, and it is often against the dominating figure of Tchicaya that later Af. Fr.-lang. poets are measured, not only his fellow Congolese (Brazzaville) J. B. Tati-Loutard (b. 1939, Oeuvres poétiques [2007]) and Sony Labou Tansi (1947–95), but, e.g. the Ivorian Jean-Marie Adiaffi (b. 1941), and the Senegalese Amadou Lamine Sall (b. 1951) and Hamidou Dia (b. 1953).

Over the past three decades, Af. poetry in Fr., while still continental in scope, has become more self-consciously local, more often related to the national trads. of the individual poets. Starting with Tati-Loutard's 1976 Anthologie de la littérature congolaise d'expression française (Anthology of Congolese Literature in French), there began to appear critical works and collections of poetry representing the increasingly self-defining national lits. of Benin (1984), Cameroon (1982), Gabon (1978), the Ivory Coast (1983), and Togo (1980), among others. This parceling up of a subcontinent into national lits. reflects the rise of distinct national identities across Africa and inevitably points to conflicts among them. In time, African literature will seem as broad and as vague a concept as European literature, the internal differences within Africa nuancing the abstract and often racially defined concept of a single continental-wide identity.

One prominent thematic thread of contemp. Af. poetry in Fr. is the experience of exile or emigration, which has affected not only the intellectual elite that write and read poetry in Fr. but Africans of all origins from across the continent. This contemp. state of exile can readily be related back to the original diasporic displacement brought about by the slave trade, hence, the continuing relevance of Césaire's Cahier and the preoccupation with Af. cultural identity both at home and in the growing Af. communities around the world, in Europe but also in the Americas. It is, thus, not at all uncommon for a Congolese poet like Alain Mabanckou (b. 1966) to find inspiration not only in his homeland but in the large Af. community in Paris, and thereafter among Af.-Americans in Los Angeles. Similarly, Véronique Tadjo (b. 1955) was born in Paris but was raised in the Ivory Coast, which continues to inspire her poetry. Rare in fact is the Af. poet writing in Fr. who does not have a foothold on two continents: the Senegalese Babacar Sall (Dakar/Paris), Léopold Congo Mbemba (Brazzaville/Paris), and Amadu Elimane Kane (Senegal/Paris). This is as much the case for female as for male poets, Tanella Boni (Abidjan/Toulouse) and Clémentine Faïk-Nzuji (Kinshasa/Brussels) being additional salient cases among the former.

Many observers think that, despite the continuing hegemony of Paris as a cultural center, writing in Fr. outside France is destined to assume as important a role as writing in Eng. beyond the U.S. and Britain. Af. poetry in Fr. is arguably one of the richest sources of this littérature-monde (lit. of the world in Fr.). This is a less categorical claim perhaps than that made by Sartre in 1948—that Af. and Antillean poetries were the only true "revolutionary" poetries of those times. But the variety of poetic experience conveyed by Af. poets in Fr. confirms that Af. cultures can speak universally with force and authenticity (see CARIBBEAN POETRY [French]; FRANCE, POETRY OF).

III. Portuguese. Af. poetry in Port. is often known as Lusophone Af. poetry, although some resist the term Lusophone, claiming it contains colonial overtones. This was arguably the first Af. poetry in a Eur. lang. to be published. Some facetious critics claim the 16th-c. Port. national bard Luís de Camões as the first Port. Af. poet, pointing to his descriptions of the continent in his literary epic The Lusiads (1572). The question of who qualifies as an Af. poet of Port. expression became contentious in the period immediately following the independence of the former colonies (1973–75), when the newly formed nations sought to define their own literary *canons and claim historical roots that contested Port. cultural hegemony.

It is generally accepted that José da Silva Maia Ferreira (1827–81?), born in Angola and of Port. heritage, was the first poet pub. in Port.-speaking Africa when he released his Espontaneidades da minha alma (Outpourings from My Soul) in 1849. The work is probably the first collection of poems printed in the sub-Saharan region. With the independence of Angola, Mozambique, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, and São Tomé e Príncipe, five increasingly diverse national poetries were born, written mainly in Port. but also, in the case of Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, and São Tomé, in local Port.-based creoles.

Precursors of these national poetics, such as Silva Maia Ferreira; Joaquim Cordeiro da Matta (1857–94), a black Angolan poet; and Caetano da Costa Alegre (1864–90) from the island of São Tomé, wrote verse modeled on Eur. styles and themes, though often informed by an Af. consciousness. Some wrote verse reflecting their sense of social reformism and dedication to Port. liberalism. They did not propose independence for the colonies so much as a more progressive Port. empire. Beginning in the 1930s in the Cape Verde Islands and in the 1950s in Angola and Mozambique, however, poems of cultural legitimization and growing social protest, fanned by the winds of nationalism, characterized the literary movements initiated by members of an emerging black and mestiço (mixed-race) intelligentsia and their Af.-born or -raised white allies.

On the largely mestiço Cape Verde Islands, a trio of poets—Jorge Barbosa (1902–71), Oswaldo Alcântara (pseud. of Baltasar Lopes da Silva, 1907–89), and Manuel Lopes (1907–2005)—founded in 1936 what became known as the Claridade movement, named after the group's arts and culture journal. Under the influence of Brazilian modernism and northeast regionalism, they codified the islands' Creole ethos, giving artistic expression to the prevailing Cape Verdean themes of solitude, the sea, drought, and emigration. This generation reacted to the universalism of poets such as José Lopes (1871–1962), who as well as publishing poetry in Port., wrote poems in Fr. and Eng. and defended the concept of a global Port. nation.

In the Angolan cities of Benguela and esp. Luanda, a thinly veiled nationalist poetics emerged (censorship and police repression precluded outspoken militancy) among black, mestiço, and a few white poets, some of whom would form the nucleus of the Movement of the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), founded in 1956. Poets like Agostinho Neto (1922–79), who was Angola's first president; Viriato da Cruz (1928–73); António Jacinto (1924–91); Fernando Costa Andrade (1936–2009); and Mário António Fernandes de Oliveira (1934–89) produced poems that called for an independent Angola. Many militant poets, in Mozambique as well as Angola, were also guerrilla fighters. Others fled into exile or paid for their militancy with imprisonment.

Throughout the 1960s until the 1974 military coup that toppled the colonial government in Lisbon, much Af. poetry in Port. was produced underground. Militants distributed their poems clandestinely or published them abroad. Neto wrote surreptitiously in his prison cell in Portugal and managed to smuggle his poems out of the Aljube prison to Kinshasa, Dar es Salaam, Milan, and Belgrade, where they were published in bilingual eds. Only after independence did these poets emerge from secrecy and "return" legitimately to Angola.

In Mozambique, during the two decades before national independence, a few Europeans produced poetry that was a conscious part more of Port. lit. than of Mozambique's incipient cultural expression. Starting in the 1960s, these Euro-Mozambicans, most notably Rui Knopfli (1933–97), born and raised in the colonial city of Lourenço Marques (now Maputo), sought to represent the essence of an Afro-Eur. experience. After Mozambican independence, a debate raged within the new nation's cultural elite as to whether the work of poets like Knopfli belonged in an emerging national canon, with most considering him Port. rather than Mozambican, a position he contested. As might be expected, a poetry of Af. cultural and racial essentialism, whether by black or mixed-race Mozambicans, coincided with the rise of nationalism in the 1950s and 1960s. The mestiço poets José Craveirinha (1922–2003) and Noémia de Sousa (1926–2003) both wrote a number of memorable poems of cultural revindication. Many of the arguments used to exclude Knopfli from the Mozambican canon, most notably his absence from postindependence Mozambique, could equally well apply to de Sousa, who spent much of her life in Europe. However, few readers contest her place in the poetic canon of Mozambique.

Craveirinha, Mozambique's most celebrated writer, is considered one of the greatest Port.-lang. poets of the 20th c. In 2001, he won the Prémio Camões, the highest award granted for lifetime literary contributions to the Port. lang. Unlike many Mozambican poets of his generation, who allowed their political dogmas to dictate their aesthetic programs, Craveirinha repeatedly demonstrated how a profound lyricism could serve the political causes he supported. He was capable of exceptionally moving love poetry as well as political demands to address inequalities and social injustice.

Many of the Port. Af. poets who wrote in the years leading to independence spent some of their formative years in Lisbon. Not surprisingly, Lusophone Negritude poetry appeared there, where these poets shared ideas and influences. Most notably, Francisco José Tenreiro (1921–63), a mestiço from the island of São Tomé who lived most of his life in the Port. capital, emerged as the greatest writer of Negritude poetry in Port. Under the influence of the Harlem Renaissance, Afro-Cuban Negrism, and francophone poets such as Senghor and Césaire, Tenreiro wrote the poems published posthumously as Coração em África (My Heart in Africa, 1964).

Some Angolan writers have proclaimed that their poetry was born in the struggle for liberation, while Negritude was conceived in defeat as a Eur.-based phenomenon that had little to do with Africa. During the decade of anticolonialist wars in Angola, Mozambique, and Guinea-Bissau, poetry became increasingly combative and tendentious. Marcelino dos Santos (b. 1929), a high-ranking member of the Mozambique Liberation Movement (Frelimo), who became its vice president, was at the forefront of militant poets who wrote pamphletary verse that, during the protracted war, served as a didactic instrument as well as a goad to political mobilization. Not noted for its aestheticism, the poetry of this generation is a valuable historical document tracing the ideological concerns of the liberation movement.

In the early years after independence, a multiracial array of poets began seeking new ways to capture poetically the changed realities of their nations. In Angola, Manuel Rui (b. 1941) emerged as one of the most important poetic voices of his generation, writing the verses of the Angolan national *anthem. He later concentrated on prose but always in a highly poeticized way. Similarly, Mia Couto (b. 1955) of Mozambique is a poet who became more famous for his extremely lyrical prose. His ling. innovation is so profound and celebrated that it is difficult to categorize him as anything other than a poet. Alda do Espírito Santo (1926–2010), like Rui in Angola, provided the lyrics of the national anthem of São Tomé e Príncipe and became a major literary and political presence in her nation, rising to become the speaker of São Tomé's parliament. In most of the newly independent nations, poetry and politics went hand in hand. This politicized poetry had been born of the independence struggles and continued in the early years of independence in the service of the state. However, it soon became obvious to the practitioners of poetry that the new realities of independence demanded a different kind of poetics, and the next generation of poets became less aligned with, or compromised by, the failings of the liberation movements now in power.

The imperative of new poetic discourses reflecting a changed political reality led Rui, along with fellow Angolans such as Arlindo Barbeitos (b. 1940), Rui Duarte de Carvalho (1941–2010), Jofre Rocha (b. 1941), and David Mestre (1948–97), to experiment with new styles of poetry, which followed political prescriptions less and challenged aesthetic boundaries more. Two of these poets, Duarte de Carvalho and Mestre, were born in Portugal, where Mestre died. In Mozambique, Rui Nogar (1933–93) and Luis Carlos Patraquim (b. 1953); in Cape Verde, Corsino Fortes (b. 1933), Oswaldo Osório (b. 1937), and Arménio Vieira (b. 1941); in Guinea-Bissau, Helder Proença (b. 1956); and in São Tomé, Frederico Gustavo dos Anjos (b. 1954) have all attempted, with varying degrees of success, to shift poetic boundaries away from a collective voice of protest to a more introspective interrogation of the poetic self. In Angola, Duarte de Carvalho has experimented with an integrated form of Af. oral expression and Brazilian *concrete poetry, as well as repeatedly playing with the boundaries between literary genres.

Since independence, a number of poets have emerged in each of the five Port.-speaking Af. countries, inflecting the Port. lang. in ways that are often indebted to oral trads. local to their nations. At the same time, from the 1980s onward, and perhaps in response to a nascent questioning of the failure to realize the promises of independence, poetry from Port.-speaking Africa has taken a decidedly self-interrogating turn. Salient practitioners of this different type of poetics, which owes much to Af. and Eur. heritages but also to the political failures and civil strife, include the following: from Angola, Rui Augusto (b. 1958), Ana Paula Tavares (b. 1952), José Luís Mendonça (b. 1955), and Ana de Santana (b. 1960); from Mozambique, Luís Carlos Patraquim, Hélder Muteia (b. 1960), Armando Artur (b. 1962), and Eduardo White (b. 1964); and from Cape Verde, José L. Hopffer Almada (b. 1960), who organized Mirabilis, an anthol. of work by some 60 island poets (pub. 1991). Tavares's work has become increasingly popular and more sophisticated. Alongside Conceição Lima (b. 1961) from São Tomé, Vera Duarte (b. 1952) and Dina Salústia (b. 1941) from Cape Verde, and Odete Costa Semedo (b. 1959) from Guinea-Bissau, Tavares has demonstrated that successful and popular poetry in Port.-speaking Africa is no longer the preserve of men. Indeed, women have produced some of the most innovative poetry in the Port. lang. in recent years.

See BRAZIL, POETRY OF; COLONIAL POETICS; ORAL POETRY; PORTUGAL, POETRY OF.

■ English. Anthologies: West African Verse, ed. D. Nwoga (1966); Poems from East Africa, ed. D. Cook et al. (1971); The Word Is Here: Poetry from Modern Africa, ed. K. Kgositsile (1973); Poems of Black Africa, ed. W. Soyinka (1975); A World of Their Own: South African Poets of the Seventies, ed. S. Gray (1976); Introduction to East African Poetry, ed. J. Kariara et al. (1977); Zimbabwean Poetry in English, ed. K. Z. Muchemwa (1978); African Poetry in English, ed. S. H. Burton et al. (1979); Summons: Poems from Tanzania, ed. R. S. Mabala (1980); Somehow We Survive, ed. S. Plumpp (1982); The Return of the Amasi Bird, ed. T. Couzens et al. (1982); A New Book of African Verse, ed. J. Reed et al. (1984); The Heritage of African Poetry, ed. I. Okpewho (1984); When My Brothers Come Home: Poems from Central and Southern Africa, ed. F. M. Chipasula (1985); The Fate of Vultures, ed. M. Zimunya et al. (1989); The Heinemann Book of African Poetry in English, ed. A. Maja-Pearce (1990); The New African Poetry, ed. T. Ojaide and T. M. Sallah (1999); The Penguin Book of Modern African Poetry, ed. G. Moore and U. Beier, 5th ed. (2007); Bending the Bow: An Anthology of African Love Poetry, ed. F. Chipasula (2009). Bibliographies: Bibliography of Creative African Writing, ed. J. Janheinz et al. (1971); Black African Literature in English, ed. B. Lindfors (1979); New Reader's Guide to African Literature, ed. H. M. Zell et al., 2d ed. (1983); Supplement to Black African Literature in English, 1977–1982, ed. B. Lindfors (1985); Companion to South African English Literature, ed. D. Adey et al. (1986). Criticism and History: A. Roscoe, Mother Is Gold: A Study of West African Literature (1971); O. R. Dathorne, The Black Mind: A History of African Literature (1974); K. Awoonor, The Breast of the Earth (1975); R. N. Egudu, Four Modern West African Poets (1977); A. Roscoe, Uhuru's Fire: African Literature East to South (1977); G. Moore, Twelve African Writers (1980); K. L. Goodwin, Understanding African Poetry: A Study of Ten Poets (1982); J. Alvarez-Pereyre, The Poetry of Commitment in South Africa, trans. Clive Wake (1984); A. Z. Davies and F. Stratton, How to Teach Poetry: An African Perspective (1984); T. O. McLoughlin and F. R. Mhonyera, Insights: An Introduction to the Criticism of Zimbabwean and Other Poetry (1984); T. Olafioye, Politics in African Poetry (1984); U. Barnett, A Vision of Order: A Study of Black South African Literature in English (1914–1980) (1985); European-Language Writing in Sub-Saharan Africa, ed. A. S. Gérard, 2 v. (1986); R. Fraser, West African Poetry: A Critical History (1986); A. McClintock, "'Azikwelwa' (We Will Not Ride): Politics and Value in Black South African Poetry," CritI 13 (1987); E. Ngara, Ideology and Form in African Poetry (1990); K. A. Appiah, In My Father's House (1992); T. Ojaide, "New Trends in Modern African Poetry," Research in African Literatures 26 (1995); Companion to African Literatures, ed. D. Killam and R. Rowe (2000); A. Irele, The African Imagination (2001); J. Ramazani, The Hybrid Muse: Postcolonial Poetry in English (2001); R. S. Patke, Postcolonial Poetry in English (2006); A. A. Roscoe, The Columbia Guide to Central African Literature in English since 1945 (2007); S. Gikandi and E. Mwangi, The Columbia Guide to East African Literature in English

since 1945 (2007); J. Ramazani, A Transnational Poetics (2009); S. Egya, "Art and Outrage: A Critical Survey of Recent Nigerian Poetry in English," Research in African Literatures 42 (2011).

■ French. Anthologies: Anthologie négro-africaine, ed. L. Kesteloot (1967); Poètes d'Afrique et des Antilles, ed. H. Dia (2002); Nouvelle anthologie africaine: La poesie, ed. J. Chevrier (2002); Nouvelle anthologie africaine II: La poesie, ed. J. Chevrier (2006). Criticism and History: R. Cornevin, Littératures d'Afrique noire de langue française (1976); A. S. Gérard, European-Writing in Sub-Saharan Africa, 2 v. (1986); Dictionnaire des oeuvres littérature négro-africaines de langue française, ed. A. Kom (1983); A. Rouch and G. Clavreuil, Littératures nationales d'écriture française (1986); J. Chevrier, Littérature nègre (1999); "Que peut la poésie aujourd'hui?" spec. iss. Africultures 24 (2000); P. Nganang, Manifeste d'une nouvelle littérature africaine (2007); L. Kesteloot, Les écrivains noirs de langue française, 2d ed. (2010).

■ Portuguese. Anthologies: No reino de Caliban: Antologia panorâmica da poesia africana de expressão portuguesa, ed. M. Ferreira, 3 v. (1975–86); Antologia temática de poesia africana, ed. M. de Andrade, 2 v. (1976–79); Poems from Angola, ed. and trans. M. Wolfers (1979); A Horse of White Clouds, ed. and trans. D. Burness (1989); For Vasco: Poems from Guinea-Bissau, trans. A.R.L. Fernandes et al. (2006). Bibliography: Bibliografia das literaturas africanas de expressão portuguesa, ed. G. Moser and M. Ferreira (1983). Criticism and History: G. Moser, Essays in Portuguese-African Literature (1969); R. Hamilton, Voices from an Empire: A History of Afro-Portuguese Literature (1975); M. Ferreira, Literatura africana de expressão portuguesa, 2 v. (1977); R. Hamilton, Literatura africana, literatura necessária, 2 v. (1981–83); The Postcolonial Literature of Lusophone Africa, ed. P. Chabal et al. (1996).

D. F. Dorsey, J. Ramazani (Eng.); G. Lang (Fr.); R. G. Hamilton, P. Rothwell (Port.)

AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY. Af. Am. poetry began, to all intents and purposes, with the improbable appearance in 1773 in London of Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral by Phillis Wheatley, Negro Servant to Mr. John Wheatley of Boston, in New England. From one point of view, the appearance of this book was a minor event. From another perspective, it was historic. The event was minor in that Poems on Various Subjects followed somewhat mechanically the values and practices of Brit. literary masters of the age; in addition, the presence of several occasional pieces set in New England added to its provincial air. But Poems on Various Subjects also broke new ground. Only the second book of verse pub. by an Am. woman, following the Eng.-born Anne Bradstreet's achievement a century before, it posed a serious challenge to key assumptions most white people held at that time about the mental capacity of blacks. Accordingly, Poems on Various Subjects included an affidavit from 18 eminent white men of Boston, incl. John Hancock and the governor of the colony, Thomas Hutchinson, attesting to the fact that—mirabile dictu—the volume was the work of "PHILLIS, a young Negro girl." They had grilled her, and she had passed their test.

These men enacted the skepticism, crippling at its worst, bracing at its best, with which white America regarded—and to some extent still regards—the black poet. In turn, Wheatley anticipated, if mainly in token ways, some of the basic, abiding concerns of black poets to come. In her verse, she recorded both her discomfort with her identity as a black Am. (one born in Africa) and her determination to succeed as an artist. In poems such as "To the University of Cambridge, in New England" and "On Being Brought from Africa to America," she contested the prevailing belief that blacks were essentially worthless except as chattel slaves. Pagan Africa, she conceded, was indeed "the land of errors, and Egyptian gloom," but Christianity granted blacks a chance at divine redemption, even if slavery itself had made deliverance possible. So, too, in the secular sphere, she knew that writing and publishing poetry empowered blacks at a time when they possessed little power. Their accomplished poems showed the world that blacks, incl. slaves or servants, deserved far more than white society allowed them. In fact, Wheatley's standing as a poet enabled her in 1776 to visit and be cordially received by General George Washington (whom she eulogized in a poem) at his encampment near Cambridge, Massachusetts. Finally, in addressing certain poems to other blacks, incl. "To S.M., A Young African Painter, on Seeing His Works," Wheatley also revealed a hunger for community based on race pride that spoke to the social insecurity and even loneliness that marked, and would continue to mark, the lives of many black poets in America.

By the time she died in 1784, Wheatley was all but forgotten. (As part of a sweeping indictment of the quality of black life, Thomas Jefferson dismissed her poetry as "below criticism.") Nevertheless, a thin line of writers kept the idea of the black Am. poet alive. In North Carolina, George Moses Horton, a slave allowed unusual freedom, became the first black explicitly to attack slavery in verse—although most of his poems are trite. In publishing three volumes of verse, incl. his first, The Hope of Liberty (1829) and the misleadingly titled Naked Genius (1865), Horton saw his career overlap with the age of radical abolitionism but without catching its transforming fire. Not so with two other notable black poets of this time. In 1853, when James M. Whitfield published America and Other Poems, his piece "America" denounced his nation as a land "of blood, crime, and wrong." Frances Ellen Watkins Harper's Poems on Miscellaneous Subjects, appearing the following year and endorsed by the abolitionist zealot William Lloyd Garrison, protested the treatment of black women in particular. Harper's "The Slave Mother," didactic and sentimental but invaluable as propaganda, led to a long career in service to civil rights through poetry (albeit poetry mainly of a preachy kind), fiction, and journalism that was esp. bold in its attacks on lynching.

Black poets, incl. Whitfield and Harper, starting out in the antebellum years, fell far short of the historic achievement of the authors of prose slave narratives. This relatively novel form fueled abolitionist fervor, as in the impact of Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave, Written by Himself (1845), while also achieving a measure of literary distinction. The slave narrative would shape the Af. Am. novel just as it directly shaped Harriet Beecher Stowe's epochal Uncle Tom's Cabin. However, it seemed to have little effect on black poetry. Nor were black poets of the age moved by Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass (1855); most, like their white counterparts, held to old-fashioned notions about the ideal form and content of verse. Black poetry produced a Whitman, but Albery A. Whitman of Springfield, Ohio, although prolific, vigorous, and visionary at his best, was captive to archaic notions about diction and stanza forms. Following the Civil War, far from growing with their new freedom, black poets seemed to enter the doldrums.

That period of stagnation ended with the arrival of Paul Laurence Dunbar of Ohio. Dunbar became the first black poet to gain a national audience. He also became a treasured poet among black Ams. because of his loving portraits of black life. Dunbar seized on two major literary trends. One was the so-called plantation trad., in which romantic notions about slavery, incl. myths about kind masters and mistresses and their happy "darkies," helped white America to close the book on the Civil War. The other was the vogue of Am. regionalism, accompanied by a keen interest in dialect. Both were epitomized in fiction by Mark Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1883) and in poetry by the verse of James Whitcomb Riley of Indiana, who exerted a strong influence on Dunbar. With his collections Oak and Ivy (1893), Major and Minors (1895), and the best-selling Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896), for which William Dean Howells wrote an intro., Dunbar became renowned both for dialect poems about black life and also for poems written in standard Eng. on more elevated, putatively universal themes. Eventually, the tension between these two areas began to demoralize him. When Howells expressed in his preface a preference for Dunbar's dialect verse, which captured for him what he saw as the true range of the black sensibility—between the poles of "appetite" and "emotion"—Dunbar mourned his fate as a black poet. "The Poet" bares his anguish over the fact that, despite his labors to write poems on "universal" themes in cultivated lang., the world insensitively "turned to praise / A jingle in a broken tongue."

*Dialect poetry came to dominate black poetry, just as the plantation trad. widely caricatured black life and culture. The irony was that the plantation trad. and the vogue of dialect verse coincided with the legalization, through crucial U.S. Supreme Court decisions of 1895 and 1896 in particular, of racial segregation in America. Black poets were aware of this irony. Dunbar's friend James D. Carrothers, who also excelled at the form, made clear in his poem "At the Closed Gate of Justice" his anguished belief that "To be a Negro in a day like this / Demands forgiveness." As with Dunbar, however, writing dialect verse made Carrothers's reputation as a poet. Century magazine and other leading white jours. published his work. Nevertheless, the tension between dialect and standard Eng. persisted, as may be seen in any comparison of Carrothers's amusing dialect piece "Me 'n' Dunbar" to his elegy of 1912, "Paul Laurence Dunbar."

Dialect verse sponsored by the plantation trad. was doomed. It did not survive far into the new century, esp. as antiblack repression, epitomized by the brazen lynching of blacks, intensified—and black resistance grew. The militancy of intellectuals such as W.E.B. Du Bois played a strong role in its demise. In The Souls of Black Folk (1903), a landmark prose work that helped to define mod. Af. Am. character and psychology, Du Bois electrified black intellectuals and artists with his identification of a dramatic "double-consciousness" as innate to Af. Am. life. He identified the key quality of the Af. Am. as his or her "two-ness—an American, a Negro; two souls, two thoughts, two unreconciled strivings; two warring ideals in one dark body, whose dogged strength alone keeps it from being torn asunder." He published only a few of his poems, but work such as his fierce, almost dithyrambic "A Litany of Atlanta" (following the Atlanta Riot of 1906) and "The Song of the Smoke" were *free-verse protests that helped to destabilize the hold exerted by dialect and plantation caricatures.

Other poets of this period contested dialect in different ways. William Stanley Braithwaite, a starched black Bostonian who became nationally respected as the ed. of more than 30 anthols. of verse, incl. an annual anthol. of Am. magazine verse, admired Dunbar as a poet. Nevertheless, his first volume, Lyrics of Life and Love (1904), showed his kindred devotion to the major Eng. romantic poets, whose work indeed inspired most black Am. poets. Seeking to be mod., Braithwaite also absorbed the influence of contemp. Am. writers such as E. A. Robinson. However, the result typically was charming, gently moving, often expertly written poetry that, avoiding the subject of race, lacked blood and sinew. Fenton Johnson of Chicago, who published three collections of verse, incl. Visions of the Dusk (1915) and Songs of the Soil (1916), also admired Dunbar. With the trauma of World War I, however, he became perhaps the first black poet to follow a recognized version of aesthetic *modernism. Familiar with Harriet Monroe's Chicago-based Poetry magazine and thus exposed to the esoteric work of T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound, he hewed instead to the populist line of modernism preferred by Edgar Lee Masters and Carl Sandburg. Johnson's poems in this vein, lamenting the effects of civilization in a sometimes cynical tone, helped to finish off dialect verse among younger black poets.

Another key poet in this transitional period around World War I was Claude McKay. In his native Jamaica, inspired largely by Dunbar and despite his own wide reading, he had published two volumes of dialect verse. Moving to New York, however, he fell in with modernist literary leaders such as Robinson, Waldo Frank, and Floyd Dell. He became an editor at Dell's Liberator magazine. In the process, McKay abandoned dialect. His volumes Spring in New Hampshire (1919) and Harlem Shadows (1922) showed off McKay's lyric power, but in explosive *sonnets (he believed in the form) such as "If We Must Die," "White House," "To the White Fiends," and "America," he also vented his rage against racism and the hypocrisy endemic to America. "If We Must Die," written following the deadly antiblack Chicago Riots of 1919, thrilled aspiring black poets and became his signature piece. McKay set new standards for verse as a vehicle for black protest—although "If We Must Die" makes no specific mention of race, nation, or politics.

Finally, in some respects, the most important transitional figure was the poet, novelist, diplomat, and NAACP leader James Weldon Johnson, a Floridian settled in New York City. In his preface to his key anthology of 1923, The Book of American Negro Poetry (rev. 1931), Johnson declared dialect verse dead. Later, he would credit his own rejection of the form to a belated but shattering reading of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass. Johnson published several stately poems in praise of Af. Am. hist. and culture. His best-known pieces are probably "O Black and Unknown Bards," about the composers of the black spirituals, and the text of "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing," the so-called black Am. national *anthem. Johnson understood the higher aims of dialect poets, even if he no longer wished to be one. In 1927, when his book of free verse, God's Trombones, offered seven sermons as delivered by old-time black preachers, he sought to capture, esp. in "The Creation" (a sermon based on Genesis), the rhetorical and rhythmic virtuosity of the black sermonic trad. without recourse to the traditional markers of black illiteracy.

In the early years of the so-called *Harlem Renaissance, which spanned most of the 1920s and early 1930s, poetry played a decisive role. Replacing the tension between standard Eng. and dialect verse was a not entirely unrelated clash between a devotion to traditional notions concerning poetry and a contrary passion for contemp. black mass culture. This clash played itself out most dramatically in the contrast between the work of Countee Cullen and Langston Hughes. Extravagantly admiring the Eng. poets John Keats (as in "To John Keats, Poet, at Spring Time") and A. E. Housman, Cullen saw the lang. of lower-class urban black culture as inimical to true poetry. He also nursed a mournful sense of his identity as a black poet, as his title "The Shroud of Color" suggests. His sonnet "Yet Do I Marvel" ends with the speaker amazed that an inscrutable God should have done "this curious thing: / To make a poet black, and bid him sing!" The sense of a self-destructive conflict between being black and Am. haunts his major poem, "Heritage" ("What is Africa to me? / Copper sun and scarlet sea . . ."). This poem also hints at its persona's possibly conflicted sexuality; but the themes of gayness, lesbianism, and bisexuality were topics that few white and virtually no black poets dared to treat at that time. Nevertheless, with his first volume, Color (1925), Cullen established his reputation as a harbinger of a new day in black poetry, one rooted in youth and modernity.

Hughes saw poetry differently. He built his early reputation on a succession of poems, such as his signature "The Negro Speaks of Rivers," that calmly asserted the beauty, integrity, and history of the Af. Am. people. Such work dominated his first book, The Weary Blues (1926), but his second, Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), broke new ground with its privileging of the *blues as its major influence. Condemned in the black press for seeming to endorse the semiliterate, sexually unrestrained culture of the urban black poor, the book put in place some key elements of future black verse. Above all, Hughes saw black music, esp. the blues (which he had used only tentatively in The Weary Blues), as the core of his mature aesthetic. Later he recalled how he had tried to write poems shaped by black music. "Like the waves of the sea," he wrote in The Big Sea (1940), "coming one after another, always one after another, like the earth moving around the sun, night, day—night, day—night, day, forever, so is the undertow of black music with its rhythm that never betrays you, its strength like the beat of the human heart, its humor, and its rooted power." The blues emphasized the pain of black life but also typically a mordant wit and an exuberant embrace of life. In this way, ordinary blacks converted pain into art. Dialect returned to black poetry but in a new form. Now it expressed rage and despair where, as Hughes saw it, sophisticated literary forms often filtered and finally betrayed such emotions.

Virtually the full range of the black Am. lang. and life experience was now at the disposal of black poets, even if only a few explored it. One of these poets was the Howard University professor Sterling Brown. His sole volume, Southern Road (1932), built on the blues foundation with poems such as "Ma Rainey," about one of the most famous blues performers. Most other poets of the era, esp. the women writers, stuck to the genteel. Angelina Weld Grimké and Georgia Douglas Johnson offered largely sentimental poems about love and the loss of love; and younger writers such as Anne Spencer and Helene Johnson also found it hard to surrender their "respectability." In poems such as "Before the Feast of Shushan" and "At the Carnival," Spencer showed the keenest interest in "high" modernism among the writers of the Harlem Renaissance. A devout Christian, Arna Bontemps created a poetry of meditation and spiritual concern largely unprecedented in black verse since the 18th c. His "Mourning at Bethesda," which links spiritual loss to the effects of the involuntary African Diaspora, became one of the most admired poems of the Harlem Renaissance.

A victim of the Great Depression, the movement faded into what became virtually a lost decade for Af. Am. poetry. Most of the published poets seemed to shut up shop; Hughes shifted to writing radical socialist propaganda poems such as "Goodbye Christ" and "Good Morning Revolution." Four new talents in particular rose to fill the void. In 1942, Margaret Walker won a Yale Younger Poets award for her slender volume For My People. Its title poem is a rhythmic affirmation of love and respect for the black masses, incl. black women. Although Walker did not build on this success as a poet, about the same time Gwendolyn Brooks launched a career that would keep her near the center of black Am. poetry for decades to come. In her first volume, A Street in Bronzeville (1945), she explored black life in a corner of Chicago, where she lived most of her life. Four years later, in 1949, she published Annie Allen, which won her a Pulitzer Prize. This was easily the most prestigious honor ever given to a black Am. poet. Brooks offered a new fusion in Af. Am. poetry. Influenced both by writers such as Hughes and by the high modernist trad. then epitomized perhaps by Robert Lowell, she moved as a poet between relative simplicity and, as in "The Sundays of Satin-Legs Smith" ("Inamoratas, with an approbation, / Bestowed his title. Blessed his inclination . . ."), a complexity of prosody, learned *allusion, and sustained *irony basically novel to black Am. poetry. Brooks brought intelligence and life experience to her poetry. Early pieces such as "kitchenette building" (about the struggles of the poetic imagination when the poet must suffer the trials of a typical lower-income housewife) and "the mother" (about the psychological trauma of abortions) explored the realities of city life in a fashion new to black poetry. Anchored in Chicago, Brooks was alert to national issues and trends. Her poetry continued to grow as that of other writers withered. Faced by the intimidating Black Power movement of the 1960s, she threw in her lot with the young. The result was well-received volumes such as Primer for Black Folks and Black Love, although her best poetry had come almost certainly before the turbulent 1960s.

If Brooks made sure she modified and domesticated some of the key techniques of high modernism, Melvin B. Tolson came to commit himself to its most arcane, esoteric, and bewildering aspects. In the 1930s, he wrote a relatively conventional collection of poetic portraits of Harlem life published some 30 years later as Harlem Gallery (1965) and A Gallery of Harlem Portraits (1979). In 1944, his book Rendezvous with America drew on the success of its best-known poem, "Dark Symphony," a solemn but fairly conventional paean to black achievement. However, a government commission from Liberia to produce a long poem in honor of the centenary of the republic founded by Am. ex-slaves led to the most daring modernist venture in Af. Am. poetry: Libretto for the Republic of Liberia (1953). This volume, densely studded in almost every line with abstruse allusions and parodic wordplay, appeared with a tribute to its author by Allen Tate, among the elite poets and critics of poetry. Tate hailed Tolson as peerless in his fusion of the black experience with the most complex lang. of modernism.

The fourth member of this transitional quartet was Robert Hayden of Detroit, Michigan. Influenced by his deep reading in historical material as part of the Federal Writers' Project of the late 1930s, Hayden published Heart-Shape in the Dust (1940). His career then took a fortuitous turn when, as a graduate student at the University of Michigan, he studied with W. H. Auden, a visiting professor. Hayden's understanding of poetry and hist. began to mature. Shaped also by the pacifist universalism of his Baha'i faith, he brought a visionary but firmly grounded quality to his meditations on race, hist., and everyday life. His best work includes finely wrought and yet viscerally powerful poems about slavery such as "Middle Passage" and "Runagate Runagate." Later he applied a perhaps even more refined moral and artistic consciousness in writing poems about contemp. life, such as the *elegy "El Hajj Malik El-Shabazz" about Malcolm X's spiritual evolution and tragic end. His mastery as a writer may be seen in the late volumes The Night Blooming Cereus (1972) and Angle of Ascent: New and Selected Poems (1975). In 1976, the Library of Congress appointed him its Consultant in Poetry, the first Af. Am. to hold that position.

By this time, almost all the older writers, incl. Hayden, were under severe fire from militant younger blacks inspired, starting in 1965, by the Black Power and *Black Arts movements. Both movements preached an exclusionary version of black identity and hostility toward white culture. The most powerful figure in the arts was the poet, dramatist, and editor Amiri Baraka, who changed his name from LeRoi Jones to emphasize his African nationalist identity. Once a disciple of the Beat movement (see BEAT POETRY), Baraka (as LeRoi Jones) had lived with his wife, Hettie Cohen, in Greenwich Village, New York, where they edited the Beat arts journal Jugen. His first book of poetry, Preface to a Twenty-Volume Suicide Note (1961), presented a charming, sometimes whimsical sensibility fortified by a keen intelligence and a studied interest in popular culture as well as formal experimentation. Following the assassination of Malcolm X in 1965, however, Jones abandoned these connections and moved to Harlem, where he tried to establish a repertory company based on Black Arts principles. Now he wrote a different, far more aggressive kind of poetry. Indebted in matters of form to W. C. Williams and to the iconoclastic Beat master Allen Ginsberg, as well as to the disruptive music of jazz performers such as John Coltrane, Baraka demanded a new black poetry of ruthless militancy—"poems that kill," he declared. In addition to whites, he targeted blacks who, in his opinion, had failed to purge themselves of their allegiances to white culture. His manifesto poem "Black Art," laced with obscene words and images of violence and degradation, offered an almost apocalyptic view of race relations in America. His poetry of this period is featured in his Black Magic: Poetry 1961–1967, pub. in 1969.

Poetry exploded in popularity within the black community. Seldom, if ever, had the art been integrated so thoroughly in America into a major social movement. The Chicago-based poet Don L. Lee, later Haki Madhubuti, saw his slender volume Don't Cry, Scream! (1969), published by his own Third World Press, sell about 100,000 copies. A plethora of other slender volumes with a similar agenda—to assert black rage and independence from whites—was almost greedily consumed by a mass of readers hungry for the Black Power and Black Arts messages. The major publisher of such volumes, often in cheap paperback form, was the astute ed. Dudley Randall's Broadside Press of Detroit. Established white presses, once indifferent if not hostile to black writers, began to seek out Af. Am. poets.

For a while, the similarities between the poets seemed far more prominent than their differences; a choir seemed to be singing almost exclusively about rage, injustice, black solidarity, and the desire for revenge. But this relative uniformity slowly gave way to the individualism necessary for the growth of art. The conversion of Amiri Baraka from black nationalism to Marxism-Leninism-Maoism epitomized the desire of the younger poets for growth and further change. Pride in black culture and their black selves was not negotiable, but some of these poets increasingly offered work shaped more by their individual integrity than by political ideology. Key aspects of the school of so-called *confessional poetry, with its emphasis on individualism, blended in their approach to poetry with the techniques encouraged by Baraka's earlier example.

The new poets, emerging over a relatively short period, included Alice Walker, Mari Evans, Etheridge Knight, Audre Lorde, June Jordan, Clarence Major, Ishmael Reed, Michael S. Harper, Jayne Cortez, Lucille Clifton, and Carolyn Rodgers. Each produced multiple volumes of verse. (Some, such as Walker, Lorde, Major, and Reed, excelled also in prose.) Almost all wrote free verse only; rhyme and forms such as the sonnet seemed obsolete or perhaps treacherous. Nevertheless, there was variety. If the lang. of the street was important to poets such as Sonia Sanchez and Cortez, others aimed for only a modest infusion of the vernacular in their lines. The iconoclastic Reed helped to take black poetry toward aspects of *postmodernism. Jordan's progressive politics (less dogmatic than Baraka's but no less trenchant) offered an implicit critique of black nationalism—but so did the broadening vistas of the new Af. Am. poet.

Gender became a major line of division as black nationalism transformed and matured with richer sources of inspiration. Building (unconsciously perhaps) on Gwendolyn Brooks's foundation, black women poets began to explore the variegated territory of feminism (see FEMINIST APPROACHES TO POETRY). In contesting the dominance of males, which most women had accepted, sometimes meekly, at the height of Black Power, women poets essentially changed the face of the new black poet. The same unspoken tension would result, in the area of fiction, in the material triumph of novelists such as Alice Walker, Gloria Naylor, Terry McMillan, and Toni Morrison over their male counterparts. The tension also figured in the extraordinary success on the stage in 1975 of the poet Ntozake Shange's verse play for colored girls who have considered suicide, when the rainbow is enuf.

Perhaps nothing underwrote the lives and careers of black poets, and assured the growth of black poetry, as much as did the acquisition by many of these writers of comfortable niches in colleges and universities as teachers of creative writing or black literary studies. This step was part of the post–World War II growth of creative writing as a field in colleges and universities, as well as a result of the changes that brought many black students to predominantly white colleges with the success of the civil rights movement. Plagued by the same economic deprivation that afflicted black Ams. as a whole over the centuries, the most successful black poets finally were assured of a room of their own.

Over the most recent generation, Af. Am. poets, some of them veterans from the 1960s, others born at that time, have shown that the line begun tentatively in the 18th c. with Phillis Wheatley has come to rich fruition. They continue to win honors and awards that reflect the fact that their work, anchored for the most part in their people's culture, nevertheless resounds with universal implications. As a body, these poets possess intellectual depth to match their technical skills. Rita Dove not only won the Pulitzer Prize for poetry for her third published collection, Thomas and Beulah (1986), but served as *poet laureate of the United States from 1993 to 1995. Yusef Komunyakaa won the Pulitzer Prize for poetry in 1994 for his volume Neon Vernacular. From an earlier generation, Lucille Clifton, whose first collection had come out in 1969, won the National Book Award in 2000 for Blessing the Boats: New and Selected Poems, 1988–2000. In 2007, Natasha Trethewey won the Pulitzer Prize for Native Guard, poems about black Union soldiers in Mississippi during the Civil War. Maya Angelou recited a poem at the first inauguration of President Bill Clinton, and Elizabeth Alexander did the same when President Barack Obama was inaugurated in 2009.

Perhaps the single most significant institutional devel. in black poetry at the turn of the millennium has been the growth of the Cave Canem collective. This organization was founded in 1996 by the poets (and professors) Cornelius Eady and Toi Derricotte, with the aim of protecting and nurturing Af. Am. poetry and poets. To Derricotte and Eady, black poets on the whole were underrepresented and isolated in most universities, despite their progress as a group. Within ten years, Cave Canem had become national in scope, with a board of directors, a regular and varied set of programs that includes an annual summer retreat for younger poets, and the direct or indirect support of almost every leading Af. Am. poet. It supports both those writers based in academic institutions and those inspired or excited by more popular, democratic forms, incl. the *poetry slam. Cave Canem, most importantly, appears to have the backing, formally or informally, of almost every eminent black poet. This group includes the jazz-inspired experimenter and sometimes Language poet Nathaniel Mackey (Eroding Witness, 1985; Song of Udhra, 1993; and Whatsaid Serif, 1998); Carl Phillips, whose Speak

Low (2009) was his tenth pub. book of poetry and who teaches Classics as well as creative writing; and Harryette Mullen, whose Muse & Drudge (1995) and Sleeping with the Dictionary (2002) show her extraordinary range of influences, from blues to erudition. On such a foundation, the future health of Af. Am. poetry, a form born in slavery and alienation, seems assured.

■ Anthologies: In Search of Color Everywhere: A Collection of African-American Poetry, ed. E. Miller (1994); C. Major, The Garden Thrives: Twentieth-Century African-American Poetry (1996); A. L. Nielsen, Black Chant: Languages of African-American Postmodernism (1997); Giant Steps: The New Generation of African American Writers, ed. K. Young (2000); The Norton Anthology of African American Literature, ed. H. L. Gates Jr. and N. Y. McKay, 2d ed. (2004); A Different Image: The Legacy of Broadside Press: An Anthology, ed. G. House, R. Weatherstone, A. M. Ward (2004); J. V. Gabbin, Furious Flower: African American Poetry from the Black Arts Movement to the Present (2004); Every Goodbye Ain't Gone: An Anthology of Innovative Poetry by African Americans, ed. A. L. Nielsen and L. Ramey (2006); Gathering Ground: A Reader Celebrating Cave Canem's First Decade, ed. T. Derricotte and C. Eady (2006); The Oxford Book of African American Poetry, ed. A. Rampersad (2006); Rainbow Darkness: An Anthology of African American Poetry, ed. K. Tuma (2006); Shadowed Dreams: Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance, ed. M. Honey, 2d ed. rev. (2006); Brother to Brother: New Writings by Black Gay Men, ed. E. Hemphill (2007).

■ Biographies: R. M. Farnsworth, Melvin B. Tolson, 1898–1966 (1984); A. Rampersad, The Life of Langston Hughes, 2 v. (1986, 1988); W. F. Cooper, Claude McKay (1987); C. E. Kerman and R. Eldridge, The Lives of Jean Toomer (1987); M. J. Boyd, Discarded Legacy (1994)—on the life of Frances E. W. Harper; A. De Veaux, Warrior Poet: A Biography of Audre Lorde (2004).

■ Criticism and History: The New Negro, ed. A. Locke (1925); W. H. Robinson, Early Black American Poets (1969); N. I. Huggins, Harlem Renaissance (1971); S. Henderson, Understanding the New Black Poetry: Introduction and Anthology (1973); M. A. Richmond, Bid the Vassal Soar (1974); E. Redmond, Drumvoices: The Mission of Afro-American Poetry: A Critical History (1976); W. Sollors, Amiri Baraka / LeRoi Jones: The Quest for a Populist Modernism (1978); D. L. Lewis, When Harlem Was in Vogue (1981); Dictionary of Literary Biography: Afro-American Poets since 1955, ed. T. Harris and T. M. Davis (1985); G. T. Hull, Color, Sex & Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance (1987); J. R. Sherman, Invisible Poets: Afro-Americans of the Nineteenth Century, 2d ed. (1989); D. H. Melhem, Heroism in the New Black Poetry: Introductions and Interviews (1990); The Road before Us: 100 Gay Black Poets, ed. A. Saint (1991); African-American Poetry of the Nineteenth Century, ed. J. R. Sherman (1992); F. S. Foster, Written by Herself: Literary Production of Early African American Writers (1993); The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. W. L. Andrews, F. S. Foster, T. Harris (1997); "Database of Twentieth-Century African-American Poetry" (1998), Chadwyck-Healey, http://collections.chadwyck.com/marketing/home_20aap.jsp; F. P. Brown, Performing the Word: African American Poetry as Vernacular Culture (1999); J. E. Smethurst, The New Red Negro: The Literary Left and African American Poetry, 1930–1946 (1999); L. Thomas, Extraordinary Measures: Afrocentric Modernism and Twentieth-Century American Poetry (2000); B. Dorsey, Spirituality, Sensuality, Literality: Blues, Jazz, and Rap as Music and Poetry (2000); D. Bruce, The Origins of African American Literature, 1680–1865 (2001); African American Poets: Lives, Works, and Sources, ed. J. O. Pettis (2002); T. Bolden, Afro-Blue: Improvisations in African American Poetry and Culture (2004); J. S. Gray, Race and Time: American Women's Poetics from Antislavery to Racial Modernity (2004); C. Clarke, "After Mecca": Women Poets and the Black Arts Movement (2005); K. D. Leonard, Fettered Genius: The African American Bardic Poet from Slavery to Civil Rights (2006); A. M. Mance, Inventing Black Women: African American Women Poets and Self-Representation, 1877–2000 (2007); L. Ramey, Slave Songs and the Birth of African American Poetry (2008).

A. Rampersad; M. D. Jones

AFRIKAANS POETRY. See SOUTH AFRICA, POETRY OF.

AGRARIANS. Agrarianism, a literary and political movement in the U.S. South of the late 1920s and early 1930s, argued that the future of the region lay not with industrial devel. and cultural modernization but with independent, small-farm agriculture and with the traditionalism in culture and religion that its proponents associated with agricultural economies. Many key names in the Agrarian movement, such as Robert Penn Warren (1905–89), Allen Tate (1899–1979), John Crowe Ransom (1888–1974), and Donald Davidson (1893–1968), had earlier been associated with the *Fugitives, but the two movements are distinct, since the Fugitives did not have a political cast. The key texts of the Agrarian movement are two collections of essays, I'll Take My Stand (1930) and Who Owns America? (1936). Agrarianism has influenced the poetry and fiction of the South down to the present.

The Agrarians, opposing the advocates of the New South, argued that industrialization would bring in its train not prosperity but new forms of exploitation; that economic modernization would yield only materialism, deracination, and social alienation; and that cultural modernization would lead to a tyranny of thought over feeling and of abstraction over concrete experience. The Agrarians placed the small farmer at the center of southern life and culture, arguing that the life and trads. of the small farmer offered kinds of economic and spiritual fulfillment unavailable to urban modernity. The political claims Agrarians made are essentially arguments about culture, not about economics. The agrarian life, they believed, requires an unsentimental appreciation of the power of nature, a skeptical insight into human limitation and fallenness, and an essentially religious respect for the dark mystery of transcendence, all values they felt to be in short supply in the capitalist world. Their South was the yeoman South that Thomas Jefferson had idealized in Notes on the State of Virginia, not the planter South of the antebellum era, and their hostility to capitalism likewise had a Jeffersonian flavor. As a political program, Agrarianism ranks with other crank economic and political theories of the 1930s such as Social Credit, and, like Social Credit, its relevance today is mostly as a source of insight into the literary works produced by some of its advocates. On the whole, their thinking owed more to W. B. Yeats and, esp., to Leo Tolstoy, than to any disciplined study of politics, economics, or hist.

Agrarian strains of thought continue to play a role in Am. conservatism, mediated by the writings of Richard Weaver and M. E. Bradford. The thought of the historian Eugene Genovese has, since the 1990s, taken a turn sympathetic toward Agrarianism. And important southern writers of succeeding generations such as Flannery O'Connor and Wendell Berry inherited something of Agrarianism in their sensibilities. Early 21st-c. manifestations of "green" lit. and crit. also share some features—such as hostility to capitalist materialism and respect for the otherness of nature—with Agrarianism.

See ENVIRONMENT AND POETRY.

■ P. K. Conkin, The Southern Agrarians (1988); P. V. Murphy, The Rebuke of History: The Southern Agrarians and American Conservative Thought (2001); The Southern Agrarians and the New Deal, ed. E. S. Bingham and T. A. Underwood (2001).

J. BURT

AGUDEZA (Sp., "acuteness"). Arguably the word that best conveys the Sp. *baroque in its literary, philosophical, and ideological valences, agudeza is often translated as "wit" or "witticism." In the 17th c., however, it was far from mere wordplay. The verbal agudeza is the product of a keen mod. mind sharpened on social, economic, and spiritual disillusionments (desengaños) and saturated in a culture of perspectivism and a general rationalist distancing from earlier passions and beliefs.

Agudeza is not restricted to sophisticated aphorisms and *conceits. Strictly speaking, those are conceptos, although the terms are subject to slippage. While agudeza is sometimes used for concepto, it also refers to the capacity to grasp the intricate and subtle correspondences that inform an elaborate *metaphor, as well as to the correspondences themselves. It is thus as closely bound to ingenio (ingenium) as it is to concepto. Indeed, the principal theorist of agudeza, the urbane Jesuit Baltasar Gracián, understood the three to work in concert—a fact indicated by title of his Arte de ingenio, tratado de la Agudeza. En que se explican todos los modos y diferencias de Conceptos (1642), the work that became his better-known Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1648).

Seventeenth-c. Sp. lit. is rife with examples. In the sonnet by Francisco de Quevedo that begins "Si mis párpados, Lisi, labios fueran" (Lisi, were my eyelids lips), the lover's eyes drink down Lisi's beauties as if they had dropsy ("Tus bellezas, hidrópicos, bebieran"). The long trad. by which eyes are the windows (cristales) of the soul, combined with a similar custom that compares water to crystal, provides the ground for the concepto in the second quatrain: "cristales, sedientos de cristales . . . alimentando su morir, vivieran" (crystals thirsting for crystals . . . they would live by feeding on their own death). The agudeza of the poem is enhanced by Quevedo's sense for *rhythm, *assonance, and *paradox, as well as his consciousness of the times. The third stanza describes the lover as sustained by this "invisible comercio" (invisible commerce). Is this a fantasy of Petrarchan true love or a paid transaction? Either way, the poem encodes central preoccupations for Golden Age Sp. wit.

See INVENTION, WIT.

■ A. Maravall, Culture of the Baroque, trans. T. Cochran (1986); E. Hidalgo-Serna, El pensamiento ingenioso en Gracián (1993); Rhetoric and Politics: Baltasar Gracián and the New World Order, ed. N. Spadaccini and J. Talens (1997); D. Castillo, A(wry) Views (2001).

L. MIDDLEBROOK

AIR (1) Described as a "musico-poetic miniature" by Fischlin, air (ayre, Fr. air de cour) most aptly refers to a style of song that flourished in courtly social circles in England and France in the 16th and 17th cs. Airs are typically solo songs (though sometimes printed in such a way that they can be accompanied by additional singers), accompanied by a lute or other plucked instrument and featuring a refined and intimate style appropriate to the courts in which they were sung. A hallmark of the genre is clear presentation of the text, sometimes with illustrative musical devices highlighting specific words. Many airs take their lyrics from the noted poets of the day; many are Petrarchan, and most are love songs; many are strophic (see STROPHE); and they range in quality from exquisite gems to cliché-ridden rhymes. These stylistic features distinguish the air from other types of song that coexisted with it (e.g., Eng. *ballad, Eng. or It. madrigal) or that evolved into more dramatic or elaborate vocal compositions (Ger. lied, It. aria). (2) By extension, air frequently designates a melody or tune, apart from any harmony or accompaniment, and thus a musical composition, usually brief, in which the melody is dominant. In the same courtly circles, an air was sometimes an instrumental dance tune with a prominent melody. (3) Air has also come to be associated with the texts or lyrics, especially of the Eng. variety, which themselves have been the subject of stylistic and historical investigation in the 20th and 21st cs. (4) In the writings of some of the late 16th- and 17th-c. Eng. musical theorists such as Thomas Morley and Charles Butler, air denotes the mode or key of a piece.

See MUSIC AND POETRY, SONG.

■ T. Morley, A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke (1597); C. Butler, Principles of Musick

(1636); P. Warlock, The English Ayre (1926); Roger North on Music, ed. J. Wilson (1959); U. Olshausen, Das lautenbegleitete Sololied in England um 1600 (1963); Lyrics from English Airs, 1596–1622, ed. E. Doughtie (1970); I. Spink, English Song (1974); N. Fortune and D. Greer, "Air," New Grove; E. Jorgens, The Well-Tun'd Word (1982); L. Schleiner, The Living Lyre in English Verse (1984); E. Doughtie, English Renaissance Song (1986); W. Maynard, Elizabethan Lyric Poetry and Its Music (1986); L. Auld, "Text as Pre-text: French Court Airs," Literature and the Other Arts, ed. D. L. Rubin (1993); D. Fischlin, In Small Proportions (1998).

E. B. Jorgens

AKKADIAN POETRY. See assyria and babylonia, poetry of.

ALAṂKĀRA (Sanskrit, "ornamentation"). A category of figure in *Sanskrit poetics entailing many possible aesthetic effects incl. simile (upamā) and *metaphor (rūpaka). In his Nāṭyaśāstra (ca. before 200 BCE), the poetic theorist Bharata mentions only four such figures; in addition to upamā and rūpaka, there are dīpaka (illumination) and yamaka (repetition of phonetically similar words or syllables). The rhetorician Bhāmaha in his Kāvyālaṃkāra (written 6th or 7th c. CE) presents Alaṃkāraśāstra, or the science of poetics, as an independent discipline. Since the two important components of the Kāvyaśarīra (body of poetry) were supposed to be śabda (word) and artha (meaning), the sonic and the semantic, the alaṃkāras were divided into two categories: śabdālaṃkāra (those based on phonetic form) and arthālaṃkāra (those based on meaning). Rudraṭa (fl. 9th c.) divides śabdālaṃkāra into five subcategories. Sometime in the 11th c., Bhoja added a third category: ubhayālaṃkāra, a poetic figure that involves both the sonic and the semantic. Ruyyaka divided alaṃkāras into seven classes on the basis of their semantic content and the construction of meaning. By the time of Mammaṭa (fl. 11th c.), the number rises to 61.

A traditional question has been whether alaṃkāra is integral to the poem or is added simply to make a statement charming. To be functional and not merely decorative, an alaṃkāra must come ab intra and be organically integrated into the poem. Mukherji points out, on the authority of the 9th-c. author Vāmana, that the alaṃkāra "is not to be taken in its literary sense of poetic figures only: it conveys, as well, the idea of poetic beauty in general, and that constitutes the real connotation of the term."

■ Daṇḍin, Kāvyādarśa (1924); Vāmana, Kāvyālaṃkārasūtra (1928). Bharata, Nāṭyaśāstra (1950); P. V. Kane, Sāhityadarpaṇa: Paricchedas I, II, X Arthālaṃkāra with Exhaustive Notes (1965); Rudraṭa, Kāvyālaṃkāra (1965); Ruyyaka, Alaṃkārasarvaśva (1965); R. Mukherji, Literary Criticism in Ancient India (1966); Bhāmaha, Kāvyālaṃkāra (1970); Dhvanyāloka of Ānandavardhana, ed. K. Krishnamoorthy (1974); S. K. De, History of Sanskrit Poetics (1976); K. Kapoor, Literary Theory: Indian Conceptual Framework (1998); B. Pal, Alamkāra-Vicintā (2007).

M. K. Ray

AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF. Opinions are divided as to whether the Ar. poetry of the Iberian peninsula is truly distinctive within the general field of Ar. poetry. Some scholars point to the prominence of specific themes, such as *nature and descriptions of flowers and gardens, as well as to the two types of strophic poem that originated in Al-Andalus (see strophe), as evidence of the distinctiveness of Ar. poetry; some (Pérès, García Gómez [1946], Armistead [1980], Monroe) claim that it reflects a native Iberian trad. preserved continuously from the Roman period and reemerging later in the poetry of Spain and Portugal. Others point to the continuity of the forms, rhetorical patterns, and themes prevailing in Al-Andalus with those of the Abbasid Empire (750–1258): most poems are *monorhymed, are set in quantitative meter according to certain canonical patterns (see classical prosody, quantity), are phrased in cl. Ar., and employ the rhetorical figures associated with neoclassical Abbasid verse.

The literary dependence of Al-Andalus on Abbasid Baghdad is epitomized in the career of Abū al-Ḥassan ʿAlī ibn Nafayni (known as Ziryāb), a 9th-c. CE Iranian polymath who, arriving in Córdoba, used the prestige of his origins to set the court fashions in poetry, music, and manners in accordance with those of Baghdad. By the time of the establishment of the Umayyad caliphate of Córdoba in ca. 930 CE, the strophic muwashshaḥ had emerged as a distinctive local contribution to Ar. poetry, the only strophic form ever to be cultivated to any great extent by poets writing in cl. Ar. The originator of the genre is thought to be either Muḥammad Maḥmud al-Qabrī (ca. 900 CE) or Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi (ca. 860–940 CE).

The muwashshaḥ consists of five to seven strophes, each in two parts (ghuṣn [pl. aghṣān] and simṭ [pl. asmāṭ]). The aghṣān all have the same metrical and rhyming patterns, but the rhyme sound changes from strophe to strophe; the asmāṭ are uniform in meter and in rhyme sound throughout the poem. The poem tends to begin with an opening simṭ. The final simṭ, around which the whole poem was probably composed, is the much-discussed kharja*. The kharja is written either in vernacular Ar., in Ibero-Romance, or in some combination of the two; and it is generally believed to be a quotation from vernacular songs otherwise lost. Of great interest to Romance philologists as the earliest attestations of lyric poetry in any Ibero-Romance lang., the kharjas are thought by some to point to the existence of Iberian popular poetry predating the Muslim conquest (711 CE), supporting the theory of a continuous Iberian element in Andalusi poetry; but aside from the kharjas themselves, no such poetry is extant.

The metrics of the muwashshaḥ may also point to Romance origin. Though the poems can be scanned in conformity with the quantitative principles of Ar. poetry (ʿarūḍ), the metrical patterns only rarely correspond to the canonical ones, and the kharja often resists quantitative analysis altogether. The metrical principle underlying the muwashshaḥ is believed by many to be syllabic (García Gómez 1975, Monroe), though others maintain that it is quantitative, having arisen through the evolution of the qaṣīda. Both Hartmann and Stern pointed out that Eastern poets occasionally varied the qaṣīda's monorhyme by subdividing each of the two *hemistichs with *internal rhyme; the result was the pattern bbba, with a representing the constant rhyme. When a whole poem has the bbba pattern, each line is a miniature stanza. Thus, a subtype of the qaṣīda may have developed into an entirely new verse type. This shift may have occurred under the influence of Romance verse forms reflected in the villancico* and the *rondeau, for unlike cl. Ar. verse, the muwashshaḥ was sung, and Romance musical patterns seem to have played at least some part in shaping it. Another possible source is the stanzaic musammaṭ form, which is first attested to in the poetry of Abū Nuwās (d. 815 CE).

Another class of poems thought to be derived from earlier Romance models has survived in the urjūza poems on historical themes developed by Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi and others; these are long poems composed of rhyming *distichs in a nonclassical quantitative meter known as rajaz. Neither the form nor the theme was an Andalusi invention, however; they were, instead, a direct imitation of an Abbasid model, and these 9th- and 10th-c. poems do not seem to have created a lasting genre.

Though poetry is reported to have been an important feature of Andalusi culture, esp. in the Cordoban court, as it was throughout the Ar.-speaking world, little has survived from the 8th and 9th cs., and what remains is conventional in terms of theme, imagery, and verse patterns. Under the caliphate, however, Córdoba flourished as a literary center, and Andalusi poetry began to outshine even that of the East. The bulk of the poetry was courtly *panegyric and lampoon in qaṣīda form, but *love poetry was extremely popular, as were descriptions of wine and wine drinking, gardens, and ascetic verse. Great poets include Ibn Hānī (ca. 937–73), Ibn Darrāj al-Qasṭallī (fl. ca. 980), and al-Sharīf al-Ṭalīq (d. 1009). The latter two cultivated flower poetry, which was to become a specialty of later Andalusi poets. They employ an increasingly ornate rhetorical style (badīʿ) that originated in the East and is associated with the Abbasid master Abū Tammām (788–845).

The decline of the Cordoban caliphate (1009–31) and the period of the Ṭāʾifa kingdoms (1031–91) saw the greatest achievements of Andalusi poetry. Ibn Shuhayd (fl. ca. 1035) composed a body of passionate and pessimistic verse, as well as an unusual treatise on the nature of poetry in which the narrator visits and converses with the familiar spirits of dead poets. In contrast to the prevailing doctrine of poetry as a learned craft of rhetorically ornamented speech, he propounds an idea of individual poetic inspiration. The theologian and legist Ibn Ḥazm (994–1064) wrote mostly short love verses, more conventional in style, but embodying a spiritual ideal of love closely resembling that of the *troubadours and worked out in detail in his prose treatise. Their younger contemporary Ibn Zaydūn (1003–71) composed a body of very individual poetry, esp. the *odes arising out of his celebrated love affair with the princess Walāda bint al-Mustakfī (1001–80; also an accomplished poet) that reflect the spiritual ideals of love developed by Ibn Ḥazm. It is from this period, the late 11th c., that muwashshaḥ texts are preserved.

Under the Ṭāʾifa kings, the city states of Al-Andalus vied with each other for preeminence in the arts, esp. poetry. Seville became the city of poets par excellence, boasting the presence of the mature Ibn Zaydūn, Ibn ʿAmmār (1031–86), Ibn al-Labbana (d. 1113), and Ibn Hamdīs (ca. 1056–1133); its last Arab ruler, al-Muʿtamid Ibn ʿAbbād (1040–95), the patron of all these, was himself a gifted poet. This efflorescence of poetry was partly made possible by a policy of relative religious tolerance common at the Ṭāʾifa courts, but the Almoravids (1091–1145) introduced a fundamentalist regime that suppressed secular arts. A few great poets, trained in the earlier period, flourished, such as the nostalgic nature poet Ibn Khafāja (1058–1138), Ibn ʿAbdūn (d. 1134) of Évora, the muwashshaḥ poet Abū al-Abbas al-Amā al-Tutīlī (d. 1126), and the opaque Ibn al-Zaqqāq (1100–33); but it was also an age of *anthologists. Nevertheless, the period saw the invention, probably by Ibn Bājja (early 12th c.), of the zajal (see ZÉJEL) and its full flowering in the works of Ibn Quzmān (1078–1160). These are strophic poems, similar to muwashshaḥ in that the strophes have one element whose rhyme changes from strophe to strophe and another with constant rhyme, but the lang. is colloquial Andalusi Ar., the final simṭ is not different from the rest of the poem, and there may be more than seven strophes; the asmāṭ also have only half the number of lines in the opening simṭ. The vulgar lang. of the zajal complements its theme, the bawdy, colorful life of taverns and streets, observed and turned into lit. by sophisticated poets of aristocratic origin who mock the conventions of courtly love and courtly poetry. The form was probably adapted from vulgar poetry. Apparently as a secondary devel., a type of zajal arose resembling the muwashshaḥ in everything but lang. Both types are already present in the works of Ibn Quzmān.

Under the Almohads (1145–1223), there was a revival of poetry: the great poets were al-Ruṣāfī (d. 1177); the converted Jew Abū Ishāq Ibrahīm ibn Sahl of Seville (1212–52); Ḥāzim al-Qarṭājannī (1211–85), whose work on the theory of poetry was also influential; and a famous woman poet, Ḥafsa bint al-Ḥajj al-Rakuniyya (1135–91). The most original devel., however, was the mystical poetry of Ibn ʿal-Arabī (1165–1240), which derived its imagery from secular love poetry and its diction from the highly metaphorical style of the age. The final political phase of Al-Andalus, the Kingdom of Granada (1248–1492), produced a few important poets, incl. Ibn al-Khaṭīb (1313–74) and Ibn Zamrak (1333–93), whose poems embellish the Alhambra.

The similarity of some of the strophic patterns of Arabo-Andalusi poetry and the notions of love sung by Andalusi poets to those of the troubadours has led some to see Ar. poetry as the inspiration of the troubadours (Nykl). The exact relationship of Andalusi poetry to the troubadour lyric continues to be the subject of intense scholarly debate (Boase, Menocal 1987), as also is the problem of the zajal's influence on the Galician-Port. cantigas*.

See ARABIC POETRY; MEDIEVAL POETRY; PORTUGAL, POETRY OF; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

■ M. Hartmann, Das arabische Strophengedicht (1897); A. Cour, Un poète arabe d'Andalousie: Ibn Zaïdoûn (1920); R. Menéndez Pidal, "Poesía árabe y poesía europea," Bulletin hispanique 40 (1938); E. García Gómez, Un eclipse de la poesía en Sevilla (1945) and Poemas arábigoandaluces, 3d ed. (1946); A. R. Nykl, Hispano-Arabic Poetry and Its Relations with the Old Provençal Troubadours (1946); A. J. Arberry, Moorish Poetry (1953); Ibn Ḥazm, The Ring of the Dove, trans. A. J. Arberry (1953); H. Pérès, La poésie andalouse en arabe classique au XIe siècle, 2d ed. (1953); P. Le Gentil, Le Virelai et le villancico (1954); S. Fiore, Über die Beziehungen zwischen der arabischen und der fruhitalienischen Lyrik (1956); P. Le Gentil, "La Strophe zadjalesque, les khardjas et le problème des origines du lyrisme roman," Romania 84 (1963)—judicious review of research to 1963; W. Heinrichs, Arabische Dichtung und Griechische Poetik (1969); Ibn Shuhayd, Treatise of Familiar Spirits and Demons, ed. and trans. J. T. Monroe (1971); E. García Gómez, Todo Ben Quzman (1972); J. M. Solà-Solé, Corpus de poesía mozárabe (1973); J. T. Monroe, Hispano-Arabic Poetry (1974); S. M. Stern, Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry (1974); M. Frenk, La jarchas mozárabes y los comienzos de la lírica románica (1975); E. García Gómez, Las jarchas de la serie árabe en su marco, 2d ed. (1975); R. Scheindlin, Form and Structure in the Poetry of al-Muʿtamid Ibn ʿAbbad (1975); L. F. Compton, Andalusian Lyrical Poetry and Old Spanish Love Songs (1976); R. Boase, The Origin and Meaning of Courtly Love (1977); R. Hitchcock, The Kharja: A Critical Bibliography (1977); M. Frenk, Estudios sobre lírica antigua (1978); E. García Gómez, El libro de las banderas de los campeones de Ibn Saʾid al Magribi, 2d ed. (1978); S. G. Armistead, "Some Recent Developments in Kharja Scholarship," La Corónica 8 (1980); GRLMA 2.1.46–73; M. R. Menocal, "The Etymology of Old Provençal trobar, trobador," RPh 36 (1982–83); Ibn Quzmān, El cancionero hispanoárabe, trans. F. Corriente Córdoba (1984); M. R. Menocal, The Arabic Role in Medieval Literary History (1987); D. C. Clarke, "The Prosody of the Hargas," La Corónica 16 (1987–88); M. J. Rubiera Mata, Poesía femenina hispanoárabe (1989); C. Addas, "L'œuvre poétique d'Ibn ʿArabī et sa réception," Studia Islamica 91 (2000); A. P. Espósito, "The Monkey in the Jarcha: Tradition and Canonicity in the Early Iberian Lyric," Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 30 (2000); T. Rosen, "The Muwashshah," The Literature of Al-Andalus, ed. M. R. Menocal, R. Scheindlin, and M. Sells (2000); S. G. Armistead, "Kharjas and Villancicos," and R. K. Farrin, "The 'Nūniyya' of Ibn Zaydūn: A Structural and Thematic Analysis," Journal of Arabic Literature 34 (2003); F. Corriente, "Again on (Partially) Romance Andalusi ʿKharajāt," Journal of Arabic Literature 35 (2004); H. L. Heijkoop and Otto Zwartjes, Muwaššaḥ, Zajal, Kharja: Bibliography of Strophic Poetry and Music from Al-Andalus and Their Influence in East and West (2004).

R. P. SCHEINDLIN; V. BARLETTA

ALBA (Occitan, Sp., "dawn"; OF aube, aubade; Galician-Port. alva; Ger. Tagelied*). A dawn song about adulterous love, expressing one or both lovers' regret over the coming of dawn after a night of love. A third voice, a watchman, may announce the coming of dawn and the need for the lovers to separate. An Occitan alba may contain a dialogue (or serial monologues) between lover and beloved or a lover and the watchman or a combination of monologue with a brief narrative intro. The voices may fear the jealous husband (gilos) and the lovers' secret being discovered. In its staging of a secret, consummated love under the threat of the coming of dawn, the alba, unlike the canso*, imagines a love of mutual but nonetheless illicit attraction. The alba has no fixed metrical form, but in Occitan each stanza usually ends with a *refrain that contains the word alba. The earliest examples date from the end of the 12th c. By the turn of the 13th c., the alba belongs to the technical vocabulary of *troubadours and later appears in the grammatical manual Doctrina de compondre dictats (late 13th c.).

Various theories of origins remain hypothetical. The earliest attributed alba, Giraut de Bornelh's "Reis glorios, verais lums e clartatz," bears a melodic resemblance to the Lat. hymn to the Virgin, "Ave maris stella" (ca. 9th c.) and the 11th-c. Occitan versus "O Maria, Deu maire"; this song as well as an earlier bilingual Lat.-Occitan alba ("Alba de Fleury-sur-Loire") attests to the likely dialogue between the secular alba and the long trad. of Lat. religious dawn hymns such as those by Prudentius (ca. 348–405) and Ambrose (4th c.) that figure dawn as announcing the light of salvation. In Mozarabic zéjels* and kharjas*, songs about the parting of lovers incorporating the word alba suggest a relation with an independent Romance trad. that exerted an influence on the Occitan alba. Likewise, the courtly Occitan alba perhaps developed in conjunction with a popular pan-Romance lyric trad. that includes OF chanson de femme and the Galician-Port. cantigas d'amigo (see CANTIGA), as well as similar Catalan, Sp., and It. compositions. This trad. consists of dialogue or women's songs about separation, the arrival of dawn signaled by light and bird's song, and the risk of being seen; the adulterous situation of the husband or presence of a watchman seems to have been a significant devel. of the genre (Jeanroy). The watchman plays an important role as mediator between the two symbolic worlds of night (illicit love in an enclosed space) and day (courtly society, lauzengiers or evil gossips or enemies of love; Saville). Eng. examples can be found in Chaucer (Troilus and Criseyde, 3.1415–1533, 1695–1712 and "Reeve's Tale" 4236–47), Shakespeare (Romeo and Juliet 3.5.1–64), John Donne ("The Sun Rising," "The Good Morrow"), and Robert Browning ("Parting at Morning"). In the 20th c., the genre was attempted by Ezra Pound ("Alba"), W. H. Auden ("Aubade"), Philip Larkin, ("Aubade"), and Robert Creeley ("Alba").

■ Anthologies: Eos: An Enquiry into the Theme of Lovers' Meetings and Partings at Dawn in Poetry, ed. A.T. Hatto (1965); Et ades sera l'alba. Angoisse de l'aube: Recueil des chansons d'aube des troubadours, ed. G. Gouiran (2005).

■ Criticism and History: Jeanroy; R. E. Kaske, "An Aube in the Reeve's Tale," ELH 26 (1959), and "The Aube in Chaucer's Troilus," Troilus and Criseyde and the Minor Poems, Chaucer Criticism 2, ed. R. J. Schoeck and J. Taylor (1961); J. Saville, The Medieval Erotic Alba (1972); D. Rieger, GRLMA 2.1B (1979); E. W. Poe, "The Three Modalities of the Old Provençal Dawn Song," RPh 37 (1984), and "New Light on the Alba: A Genre Redefined," Viator 15 (1984); H. U. Seeber, "Intimität und Gesellschaft. Zur Renaissance der Aubade in der englischen Lyrik des 20. Jahrhunderts," Gattungsprobleme in der anglo-amerikanischen Literatur, ed. R. Borgmeir (1986); T. F. Cornejo, La canción de alba en la lírica románica medieval (1999); F. Bauer, "L'aube et la nuit," Revue des langues romanes 110 (2006); C. Chaguinian, "L'alba dans le système des genres troubadouresques: Réflexions sur le rapport des troubadours à la production non troubadouresque," Cahiers de Civilisation Médiévale 50 (2007).

M. Galvez

ALBANIA, POETRY OF. Albanian is an IE lang. spoken in Albania, Kosovo, and surrounding areas in the southwestern part of the Balkan Peninsula. Albania attained its independence in 1912 after five centuries as part of the Ottoman Empire.

The beginnings of written verse in Albania are strongly linked to the Catholic Church. Pjetër Budi (1566–1622), from the Mati area, trained for the priesthood at the Illyrian College of Loretto, south of Ancona in Italy, and was later bishop of Sapa and Sarda in the Zadrima region. His major publication, a catechism titled Dottrina Christiana (Christian Doctrine, 1618), has an appendix of 53 pages of religious poetry in Albanian, some 3,000 lines. This verse, incl. both trans. from Lat. and original Albanian poems in quatrain form, is octosyllabic, which is the standard in Albanian folk verse. Budi prefers biblical themes, eulogies, and universal motifs such as the inevitability of death. Though his rhymes are not always elegant, his verse evinces an authenticity of feeling and genuine human concern for the sufferings of a misguided world.

The Ottoman invasion and occupation of Albania, starting in the late 14th c., brought about the gradual demise of this early Catholic poetry. It was replaced by aljamiado verse, written in Ar. script and strongly influenced by Islamic culture. Muslim poets wrote initially in Ottoman Turkish, but by the mid-18th c., they were experimenting in Albanian as well. Among the leading literary figures of this period was Nezim Frakulla (ca. 1680–1760), from the Fier region. Nezim writes proudly that he was the first person to compose a divan* in Albanian: "Who bade the divan speak Albanian? / Nezim has made it known, / Who bade clarity speak in Albanian? / Nezim has made it human." About 110 of his poems are preserved, all replete with vocabulary of Turkish and Persian origin.

Leaving aside the Italo-Albanian poets of southern Italy, such as Giulio Variboba (1724–88), Nicola Chetta (ca. 1740–1803), Girolamo De Rada (1814–1903), and Giuseppe Serembe (1844–1901), who all made substantial contributions to the evolution of Albanian verse, we first note a revival of verse in Albania itself in the late 19th c., during the Rilindja period of national renaissance. Among the leading figures of this movement for national identity and political autonomy were Pashko Vasa (1825–92) of Shkodra, whose poem O moj Shqypni, e mjera Shqypni (O Albania, Poor Albania), a stirring appeal for national awakening, was written in the dramatic years of the League of Prizren, 1878–80; and Naim Frashëri (1846–1900), now widely regarded as Albania's national poet. Frashëri's verse, pub. for the most part while he was living in Constantinople and very popular among Albanians at the time, included *pastoral lyrics in the trad. of Virgil, heavily laden with the imagery of his mountain homeland; historical epics; and Bektashi religious verse.

A qualitative step forward occurred in the early decades of the 20th c., when the Albanian lang. first became widespread in education and publishing. Though the romantic nationalism of the Rilindja period was still popular, other themes were introduced, incl. love poetry, which initially caused quite a scandal. Among the leading poets of the early decades were Anton Zako Çajupi (1866–1930), who was active in Egypt; Ndre Mjeda (1866–1937) of Shkodra, whose collection Juvenilia (1917), influenced by the 19th-c. It. classics, included *sonnets and other verse in refined meters; and Asdreni (1872–1947), from the southeastern Korça region, whose first three verse collections were well received.

The greatest figure of Albanian verse before World War II was Gjergj Fishta (1871–1940), whose 15,000-line verse epic of Albanian history, Lahuta e Malcís (The Highland Lute, 1937), caused him to be revered as the Albanian Homer. When the Communists took power in 1944, his work was swiftly repressed, and the very mention of his name was taboo for 46 years.

Two poets, entirely different from one another, may be regarded as the vanguards of modernity in Albanian lit. The messianic Migjeni (1911–38) of Shkodra turned away from the beauty of the Albanian mountains and the sacred trads. of the nation to devote his verse to the social realities of despair and ubiquitous squalor, against which he rose in defiance. His slender collection Vargjet e Lira (Free Verse, 1944), pub. posthumously, represented a literary revolution and a breath of fresh air that did away with the trads. of romantic nationalism for good. Lasgush Poradeci (1899–1987), a pantheistic poet from Pogradec on Lake Ohrid, studied the ever-changing moods of the lake to offer crystalline verse in southern Albanian folk style.

Albanian written culture and verse reached a zenith in the 1930s and early 1940s. A mod. lit. had been created, and the nation had come of age. However, it was a brief blossoming in the shadow of an apocalypse. The Stalinist takeover and purges under dictator Enver Hoxha (1908–85) caused terror in intellectual circles and snuffed out imaginative writing in the country for almost 20 years. Only Martin Camaj (1925–92), in Bavarian exile, and the unfettered poets of Kosovo were left to build on established trads.

By the early 1960s, a new generation of poets in Albania, led by Fatos Arapi (b. 1930), Dritëro Agolli (b. 1931), and Ismail Kadare (b. 1936), managed to slip elements of aesthetic finesse into their volumes of obligatory and otherwise stale partisan poetry. There was no thaw in Albanian verse during the Communist period (1944–89); but cautious openings, ever so slight, enabled some verse of quality to be published, and it immediately caught the imagination of the beleaguered public.

Ideological restrictions vanished when the Stalinist regime imploded in 1989–90, and chaos reigned in the little Balkan country for a decade. Yet, despite the harsh conditions of a free-market economy, contemp. poetry lost none of its fundamental importance in Albanian national culture. Well into the 21st c., verse collections still account for more than 50% of literary output. Albania is and remains a land of poets.

■ G. Schirò, Storia della letteratura albanese (1959); A. Pipa, Albanian Literature: Social Perspectives (1978) and Contemporary Albanian Literature (1991); An Elusive Eagle Soars: Anthology of Modern Albanian Poetry, ed. R. Elsie (1993); R. Elsie, History of Albanian Literature (1995) and Studies in Modern Albanian Literature and Culture (1996); A. Zotos, Anthologie de la poésie albanaise (1998); R. Elsie, Albanian Literature: A Short History (2005); Songs of the Frontier Warriors, Këngë Kreshnikësh: Albanian Epic Verse (2004) and Lightning from the Depths: An Anthology of Albanian Poetry (2008) ed. and trans. R. Elsie and J. Mathie-Heck.

R. Elsie

ALCAIC. An *aeolic *strophe named after Alcaeus of Lesbos (fl. early 6th c. BCE) that consists of two 11-syllable lines (alcaic *hendecasyllables) having the form x – ⏑ – x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – followed by a third line that is a rhythmic extension of the first two: x – ⏑ – x – ⏑ x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – – (Snell). The Alexandrian grammarians separated the third line into two parts, after the ninth position, creating a four-line stanza, the third line of nine syllables (x – ⏑ – x – ⏑ – –) and the fourth of ten (– ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – –). The first two lines, the hendecasyllables, are known as greater alcaics, the decasyllable (fourth line) as a lesser alcaic. Horace, who used this strophe more than any other in his Odes (37 times), seems to have regarded it as a four-line stanza, allowing *hiatus between third and fourth lines (e.g., Odes 2.14.3–4). Horace's alcaic strophe was used by med. poets: Hilary of Poitiers (4th c. CE) in his first *hymn created a stanza consisting of a *glyconic alternating with either an alcaic hendecasyllable or an *asclepiad; Prudentius (ca. 348–405) used the alcaic hendecasyllable for stichic verse; and the hendecasyllable in quatrains, devised by Ennodius (late 5th c.), became the most used alcaic form of the Middle Ages. It was adapted in It. by Gabriello Chiabrera (1552–1638), Paolo Rolli (1687–1765), and Giovanni Fantoni (1755–1807). Like Chiabrera, Ren. metrists in England and France attempted imitations of alcaics on both accentual and quantitative principles. In 18th-c. Germany, F. G. Klopstock ("An meine Freunde," "An Fanny") composed 17 alcaic *odes, as did Friedrich Hölderlin ("An die Parzen," "Der Main"), August von Platen, and others in the 19th. Alfred, Lord Tennyson's alcaic ode to John Milton ("O mighty-mouth'd inventor of harmonies") makes the most serious effort of his age to reproduce the cl. rules for quantitative *scansion without replacing *quantity by stress; and Tennyson considered the *In Memoriam stanza related to the alcaic. By contrast, Arthur Clough and A. C. Swinburne wrote accentual alcaics. Trans. of cl. alcaics in the 20th c. include examples by Richmond Lattimore (Greek Lyrics, 1955) and J. B. Leishman's trans. of Horace (1956).

See CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES.

■ F. V. Graeser, De stropha alcaica (1865); E. Brocks, "Die Fortleben der alkäische Strophe," Germanisch-Romanische Monatsschrift 13 (1925); O. Francabandera, Contribuzioni alla storia dell'alcaica (1928); Norberg; Bowra; W. Bennett, German Verse in Classical Metres (1963); Koster; N. A. Bonavia-Hunt, Horace the Minstrel (1969); R.G.M. Nisbet and M. Hubbard, A Commentary on Horace: "Odes" Book I (1970); E. Schäfer, Deutscher Horaz (1976); Halporn et al.; Snell; West; D. Schaller, "Der alkäische Hendekasyllabus im frühen Mittelalter," Mittellateinisches Jahrbuch 19 (1984); R. Warren, "Alcaics in Exile: W. H. Auden's 'In Memory of Sigmund Freud,'" Philosophy and Literature 20 (1996); J. Talbot, "Tennyson's Alcaics: Greek and Latin Prosody and the Invention of English Meters," SP 101 (2004).

R. A. Swanson; J. W. Halporn; T.V.F. Brogan

ALCMANIC VERSE. A final *colon in the *strophe of the Partheneion of the Gr. lyric poet Alcman (7th c. BCE) which can take two forms: – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – – or – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – (West). The latter, a dactylic tetrameter brachycatalectic, is the one to which the term usually refers, although some scholars call the full dactylic tetrameter the alcmanic and the catalectic dactylic tetrameter the *archilochian (Klingner).

■ Horatius: Opera, ed. F. Klingner, 3d ed. (1959); Maas; Halporn et al.; Snell; West.

J. W. Halporn

ALEATORY POETICS. No work of art can exclude chance entirely, in the sense of bringing all aspects of the work under the creator's conscious control. Aleatory poetics, however, deliberately engages with chance as a compositional principle. The category encompasses a wide range of practices, including automatic writing, techniques of cut-up and collage, combinatorial forms, and systems of random or probabilistic selection and ordering. Although it is possible to identify premod. antecedents (e.g., the combinatorial works of some rhétoriqueur poets in the 15th and 16th cs.), the exploration of chance procedures becomes central to much 20th-c. experimental practice, reaching a high point at two key moments: first in the 1910s and 1920s, then in the 1950s and 1960s.

The poetry and poetics of Stéphane Mallarmé anticipate the widespread artistic investigation of chance, yet they are in many respects supremely anti-aleatory. For Mallarmé, chance is both the precondition for poetry's existence and that which poetry strives to transcend without ever abolishing it. This is the core insight of the poem Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice, 1897). Mallarmé's unfinished Livre (Book), the unbound pages of which would have been subject to multiple permutations, points forward to later experiments in mobile form. It also illustrates a set of paradoxes: the withdrawal of the poet, reduced to the role of "operator," effaces the contingency of authorial subjectivity to establish the absolute authority of the "Book," and the opening of the literary work to a plurality of readings fuses with the notion of an absolute and total meaning (see BOOK, POETIC).

Mallarmé's Un coup de dés was not widely disseminated until a 1914 republication, by which time it was both a precursor and contemporary to new avant-garde chance procedures. Tristan Tzara's recipe for making a Dadaist poem by cutting out words from a newspaper article and drawing them out of a bag (1920) eschewed the authorial control of the Mallarméan approach (see DADA). Dadaist manipulations of chance may be interpreted either as forms of anti-art that aggressively reject meaning or as attempts to uncover mystical truths (as the Dada artist Hans [Jean] Arp came to see them); they may be experiments in depersonalization or quests for the unconscious self (Tzara's claim that "the poem will resemble you" is perhaps not entirely ironic). Less equivocal is the surrealist attitude that tends to merge chance and necessity, whether through the practice of automatic writing that suspends the conscious will in order to uncover the deeper workings of the psyche or through the investigation of "objective chance," defined by André Breton in L'Amour fou (Mad Love, 1937) as "the form of manifestation of exterior necessity which traces its path in the human unconscious." The surrealist word collage game known as the cadavre exquis (exquisite corpse) offers a variant on Tzara's method that produces unexpected but grammatically correct sentences (see SURREALISM). In a slightly different vein, Raymond Roussel's writing procedures, which use polysemous phrases or homophonic pairings of sentences to generate narratives, exploit the element of chance inherent in lang. itself (see POLYSEMY).

The hist. of aleatory poetics parallels devels. in the visual arts, beginning with the "canned chance" of Marcel Duchamp's Trois stoppages étalon (Three Standard Stoppages, 1913), produced by dropping three meter-long threads onto strips of canvas, then gluing them into place. In the wake of *cubism and *expressionism, artists explored the external or the psychological workings of chance by means of collage or automatism: examples include Arp's practice of dropping and pasting pieces of torn paper, André Masson's automatic drawings, and Max Ernst's use of decalcomania (transferring paint between two surfaces) and frottage (rubbing with a pencil over a textured surface). In the 1940s and 1950s, artists often emphasized spontaneous brushwork or the dripping of paint (the tachism of Jean Dubuffet and Pierre Soulages; the action painting of Jackson Pollock, Franz Kline, and Willem de Kooning), while Robert Rauschenberg created "combines" of found objects. In lit., techniques of collage or combination often break up narrative continuity: versions of the cut-up technique pioneered by Tzara have been adopted by writers such as the lettrist poet Gil J. Wolman (see LETTERISME); the painter, poet, and performance artist Brion Gysin; and the novelist William S. Burroughs. Marc Saporta's Composition No. 1 (1962) is an unbound novel whose pages may be shuffled, and Julio Cortázar's Rayuela (Hopscotch, 1966) offers the reader several possible paths through the text.

It is not until the 1950s and 1960s that the adjective aleatory, or sometimes aleatoric (from the Latin alea, a die, dice), began to be applied to works of art, specifically to musical compositions. The term is somewhat ambiguous, referring in the broadest sense to works that are partially undetermined by the composer, either in their composition or in their performance (or both). An example of the first type—i.e., of works that involve chance in composition but have a determinate final form—is John Cage's Music of Changes for piano (1951), composed using coin flipping to select musical parameters among charts modeled after the Chinese I Ching (Book of Changes). The second category—of works that are indeterminate with respect to performance—includes Pierre Boulez's Third Piano Sonata (1955–57), which allows the performer freedom in ordering the composed sections, and Karlheinz Stockhausen's Klavierstück XI (1956), which has billions of possible combinations. Forms of indeterminacy range from coin flipping to the use of imprecise notation that reduces the composer's control over sounds (Morton Feldman's Intersection and Projection series, Earle Brown's December 1951), and from the combination and assembling of fragments by the performer (Stockhausen, Boulez) to stochastic methods that involve complex probability calculations (Iannis Xenakis). In a narrower sense, the notion of aleatory music is a polemical concept: Boulez, whose aesthetic aims remain close to Mallarmé's conception of the Book, applies the term to works in which chance is directed and absorbed, in opposition to the supposedly anarchic indeterminacy of Cage's chance operations.

Notwithstanding this local terminological quarrel, Cage is the central figure in the hist. of aleatory poetics. His work bridges music and the other arts—both in his own practice as composer and poet and through collaborations, notably with Rauschenberg and with the choreographer Merce Cunningham.

Influenced by both Dada and Cage, the artists associated with the Fluxus network continued the investigation of chance methods across different media. La Monte Young's proto-Fluxus compilation An Anthology of Chance Operations includes pieces by Cage as well as poetry, compositions, and essays by Claus Bremer, Earle Brown, Joseph Byrd, Walter De Maria, Henry Flynt, Ray Johnson, Yoko Ono, Dick Higgins, Toshi Ichiyanagi, Jackson Mac Low, Richard Maxfield, Nam June Paik, Emmett Williams, and Christian Wolff, among others. *Indeterminacy as a feature of performance predominates in this collection, where the texts are notations to be interpreted. Fluxus composer and artist George Brecht uses the term chance-imagery to refer to "our formation of images resulting from chance, wherever these occur in nature" (Chance-Imagery, 1966), thus calling into question the distinction between nature and art. Daniel Spoerri's Topographie Anecdotée du Hasard (Anecdoted Topography of Chance, 1962) maps, catalogs, and describes the objects lying on the artist's table and the memories associated with them, thus suggesting an approach to the indeterminate core of personhood.

Jackson Mac Low was among the most consistently vital practitioners of aleatory poetry. Influenced by Cage and inspired by Zen Buddhism, Mac Low employed chance operations (random digits, dice, playing cards) to select words, with the aim of minimizing the role of the ego in poetic composition. He developed methods that he characterized as "deterministic yet nonintentional," most notably the techniques of *acrostic and "diastic" "reading-through text selection," which involve searching a source text for words or other verbal units that contain (as their first letter or in other positions) the successive letters of a "seed text" (Stanzas for Iris Lezak [1960], Asymmetries [1960–61], The Pronouns [1964], Words nd Ends from Ez [1981–83]). Mac Low's methods belong to what is often termed "procedural poetics" (Perloff), in which *constraint determines the generative principles of composition. A strict distinction between aleatory and deterministic procedures may be less useful in this context than a reflection on the problem of nonintentionality and unpredictability that is at the heart of such practices and their critical reception.

Devels. in technology since the 1950s, such as the application of probability-based algorithms, have offered new possibilities for the exploitation of specific types of randomness. In the 1960s, a group led by the semiotician Max Bense at the Technische Hochschule in Stuttgart experimented in "stochastic texts" based on probability distributions. Theo Lutz used a computer program to produce simple sentences from a repertory of 100 words from Franz Kafka's The Castle. This project of generative aesthetics unites formal experimentation with scientific inquiry into lang.

The work of the *Oulipo or Ouvroir de littérature potentielle (Workshop for Potential Literature) highlights the contentiousness of the notion of aleatory poetics. The Oulipo explores the use of various constraints and procedures in writing. Reacting fiercely to critics who categorize the group's methods as aleatory, the Oulipo insists that its approach is "anti-chance." It defines itself against surrealist automatism and (to a lesser degree) against the experimental stochastic lit. of Bense's Stuttgart school. Nevertheless, although Oulipo writers seem uninterested in automatism, coin flipping, and stochastics, some Oulipian methods may be deemed aleatory (in accordance with the musical application of the term) in the place that they assign to the reader. This is the case for Raymond Queneau's Cent mille milliards de poèmes (Hundred Thousand Billion Poems, 1961), a work in which the lines of ten original sonnets may be combined to produce 10^{14} sonnets. Furthermore, even a rule-based method such as "S+7," which entails replacing each noun in a given text with the seventh one following it in a given dict., involves a certain suspension or at least displacement of authorial intention (as with Mac Low's deterministic operations).

By eschewing complete control of the writing process or by opening up the text to the reader's intervention, aleatory poetics challenges the very definition of the literary work. Chance methods sometimes emulate natural processes, as in John Cage's introduction of the ambient environment into the space of the performance. In this regard, they may be understood as realist in intent or situated within an avant-garde trad. that challenges the divide between art and life. They have sometimes been interpreted as a response or parallel to devels. in science, from Werner Heisenberg's uncertainty principle to chaos theory, but they can also be theorized in terms of revelation of the unconscious, spontaneous expression, or escape from the confines of bias and personal preference. The ambiguities of aleatory poetics—between art and anti-art, playfulness and mysticism, system and randomness, nature and *artifice, the subjective and the impersonal—encapsulate many of the tensions at the heart of avant-garde and experimental writing.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS.

■ T. Lutz, "Stochastiche Texte," Augenblick 4 (1959); J. Cage, Silence (1961); H. Richter, Dada (1965); A. Breton, Manifestoes of Surrealism, trans. R. Seaver and H. R. Lane (1969); M. Duchamp, Salt Seller, ed. M. Sanouillet and E. Peterson (1973); E. Köhler, Der literarische Zufall (1973); M. Nyman, Experimental Music (1974); H. Watts, Chance: A Perspective on Dada (1979); Oulipo: A Primer of Potential Literature, ed. and trans. W. F. Motte (1986); U. Eco, The Open Work, trans. A. Cancogni (1989); P. Boulez, "Alea," Stocktakings from an Apprenticeship, trans. S. Walsh (1991); M. Perloff, Radical Artifice (1991); T. Tzara, Seven Dada Manifestos and Lampisteries, trans. B. Wright (1992); The Boulez-Cage Correspondence, trans. R. Samuels (1993); J. Cage I–IV (1997); Oulipo Compendium, ed. H. Mathews and A. Brotchie (1998); Y. Uno, "Aleatoric Processes," Encyclopedia of Aesthetics, ed. M. Kelly (1998), Oxford Art Online, http://www.oxfordartonline.com/subscriber/article/opr/t234/e0016; P. Griffiths, "Aleatory," Grove Music Online, Oxford Music Online, http://www.oxfordmusiconline.com/subscriber/article/grove/music/00509; J. Mac Low, Thing of Beauty, ed. A. Tardos (2008).

A. James

ALEXANDRIANISM

I. Alexandria
II. Connotations of Alexandrianism
III. Hellenistic Poetry and Alexandrianism
IV. Alexandrian Imagery
V. Alexandrianism in Rome
VI. Alexandrianism in Modern Literature

I. Alexandria, founded in 331 BCE at the mouth of the Nile by Alexander the Great, was the wealthy and cosmopolitan capital of the Ptolemaic dynasty (Fraser). Seeking to demonstrate their place as the true heirs to the Gr. heritage, the Ptolemies founded a museum (literally, shrine of the Muses) to which they attracted scholars and scientists from all over the Gr.-speaking world. The museum was accompanied by an enormous library in which the Ptolemies aimed at accumulating all Gr. writing of earlier periods. Some of the scholars who were charged with the classification, textual crit., and interpretation of archaic and cl. Gr. lit. in that institution also wrote poetry of their own.

II. Connotations of Alexandrianism. Befitting the inhabitants of a large commercial metropolis, in antiquity Alexandrian could imply impudence or wit (Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 1.2.7). In mod. parlance, the adjective is typically used to denote the highly self-conscious, self-referential, and allusive style that characterizes the compositions of scholar-poets resident at the museum and library. In this sense, the term is slightly misleading, since the literary qualities associated with Alexandrian lit. are shared by the work of some poets of the Hellenistic age (roughly defined as the period from the death of Alexander until the defeat of the last Ptolemy in 31 BCE) who had no known association with the city. As our understanding of Hellenistic poetry has grown, the precise nuance of the term Alexandrianism, which has sometimes been used pejoratively to denote an overly precious or pretentious style, has changed.

III. Hellenistic Poetry and Alexandrianism. The stylistic qualities associated with Alexandrianism are well represented by the work of Callimachus of Cyrene (ca. 305–240 BCE), a highly productive scholar-poet working under the patronage of the early Ptolemies. In the *proem to his Aetia, an elegiac poem in four books in which he describes the origins of a variety of obscure local trads., Callimachus defends himself against literary rivals, whom he terms Telchines, for not having written a long poem on kings and heroes (frag. 1 Pfeiffer). This passage, which had a remarkable influence on Roman poetry (see sect. IV below), led to the view that Callimachus (who himself composed an epic poem titled Hecale) rejected the writing of large-scale *epic poetry and instead favored shorter forms, but the oppositions set up in the proem are about stylistic rather than generic differences. His stated preference for brevity need not entail a rejection of longer poetic forms but rather a preference for poetry in which each word was chosen with the utmost care and precision. Callimachus was acutely aware of the traditional generic associations of discrete words and phrases and of the formal conventions of particular genres, and much of the interest of his often very witty poems lies in his self-conscious awareness and manipulation of these conventions.

Callimachus and contemporaries such as Theocritus and Apollonius of Rhodes were intensely self-conscious about their place in a long trad. tracing back to Homer and sought to demonstrate their knowledge of earlier lit. while simultaneously emphasizing their independence from it. To this end, they regularly engage with specific passages of a wide range of earlier poetry, incl. the Homeric poems, whose prominence in the trad. lends them particular importance. Hellenistic poets regularly reuse Homeric lang. while subtly varying it, evoke verses whose interpretation was debated by contemp. scholars, or allude in meaningful ways to Homeric scenes. Such evocation of the literary past calls attention to the author's own departure from it. Even the four-book epic Argonautica of Apollonius of Rhodes, the most superficially Homeric of surviving Alexandrian poetry (scholars once believed, wrongly, that Apollonius and Callimachus feuded about the propriety of writing epic), incorporates elements from other *genres, incl. *tragedy, and represents its principal hero, Jason, as a figure quite different from the traditional heroes of the Iliad and the Odyssey, despite sharing certain qualities with them. The "reduction" of heroic figures and scenes is, indeed, a common feature of Alexandrian poetry: thus, Theocritus's Cyclops is shown not as a horrible monster but as a haplessly lovestricken youth, while Heracles' killing of the Nemean lion in Callimachus's Aetia is juxtaposed and set in parallel to the war Molorchus wages on field mice.

This approach to lit. was evident in all genres: Theocritus's *idylls play on the intersection of high and low forms, incl. mime and other drama, as well as epic; Callimachus's iambi locate the poet in a trad. deriving from Hipponax but also explicitly defend the intermingling of elements drawn from different genres; literary *epigrams play on the boundaries between funerary and dedicatory verse inscriptions and archaic *elegy and *lyric.

IV. Alexandrian Imagery. In addition to the Aetia prologue, Callimachus's surviving work, much of it recovered on papyrus during the course of the last century, contains several other passages that self-referentially comment on his literary program; similarly programmatic passages may be found in the work of other poets, incl. the idylls of Theocritus. Cumulatively, several themes found in these passages reappear in later poetry as markers of Alexandrianism: an emphasis on Hesiod as a stylistic precursor; the treatment of water (rather than wine), esp. that from Mt. Helicon, as a source of poetic inspiration and a concomitant focus on fresh water; the claim that the poet is treading a narrow, difficult, or original path; the opposition of the poet to a broader crowd, representing those who reject the stylistic qualities he advocates; qualitative and quantitative oppositions involving length, sound, and weight, in which the poet's own work is represented as brief, fine, clear, or light rather than lengthy, muddy, loud, or weighty; the refusal (recusatio; see Wimmel) to meet conventional expectations (the "warning Apollo" motif, later modified to the promise to write epic "one day" or to the referral of a patron's request for such epic to another, and by implication, better poet); the representation of poetry as the object of intense labor, ponos (cf. Theocritus 7.51).

V. Alexandrianism in Rome. The rise of Roman political power throughout the Mediterranean coincided with the flowering of Alexandria and its literary culture, and Alexandrianism was an important strand of the pervasive influence that Gr. lit. exerted on Roman poetry from its inception. Alexandrianism is evident in the work of the trilingual Ennius and marked in Lucilius (Puelma Piwonka) and *Neoteric writers such as Catullus and Calvus, whose work included short epics written in the refined manner of the Alexandrian poets.

The discovery of the Aetia prologue in the early 20th c. made it clear that a number of passages of Roman poetry—incl. Virgil's influential sixth *eclogue, numerous programmatic passages of Roman elegy (esp. Propertius), Horatian lyric and *satire, and the proem to Ovid's Metamorphoses—drew on and adapted to a new context Callimachus's apology for not singing about kings and heroes. Although mod. critics have often conceived of Alexandrianism largely in relation to the question of the status of epic as an acceptable literary form, the influence of Alexandrian poetics was far broader.

Beyond formal issues, Roman poets adapted the highly allusive strategies of Alexandrianism as well as its self-conscious concern with the tension between rupture and continuity with the past. In this sense, Virgil's Aeneid, an epic that draws on the work of a range of Gr. models incl. Apollonius and Callimachus, is a quintessentially Alexandrian poem. Moreover, recent work has revealed the role that Alexandrian representations of the Egyptian capital and its rulers played for Roman poets as they faced Rome's growing power and the consolidation of political authority under a single ruler. In this sense, Alexandrianism is not merely an aesthetic phenomenon but a means by which Roman poets explored the values of their own cosmopolitan city, its empire, and rulers.

VI. Alexandrianism in Modern Literature. Alexandrianism is an enduring phenomenon. Fr. practitioners and theorists such as Paul Valéry and Stéphane Mallarmé show many parallels with ancient ideas (Howald). Am. poets such as Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot reveal an interest in *allusion and a complicated relationship to traditional forms such as epic (in their case, John Milton). More broadly, the self-conscious tension between continuity and discontinuity with the past (as understood in both historical and literary terms) that pervades Alexandrian poetry finds many parallels in contemp. lit.

See CLASSICAL POETICS, GREEK POETRY.

■ Criticism and History: U. von Wilamowitz, Hellenistische Dichtung in der Zeit des Kallimachos, 2 v. (1924); J. U. Powell, Collectanea Alexandrina (1925); E. Howald, Der Dichter Kallimachos von Kyrene (1948); M. Puelma Piwonka, Lucilius und Kallimachos (1949); W. Wimmel, Kallimachos in Rom (1960); G. N. Knauer, Die Aeneis und Homer (1964); J. K. Newman, Augustus and the New Poetry (1967)—appendix, "Alexandrianism in Modern English Poetry"; R. Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholarship (1968); P. M. Fraser, Ptolemaic Alexandria, 3 v. (1972); R. Häussler, Das historische Epos der Griechen und Römer bis Virgil (1976); and Das historische Epos von Lucan bis Silius und seine Theorie (1978); R. D. Brown, "Lucretius and Callimachus," Illinois Classical Studies 7 (1982); Supplementum Hellenisticum, ed. H. Lloyd-Jones and P. Parsons (1983); J. K. Newman, The Classical Epic Tradition (1986); A Hellenistic Anthology, ed. N. Hopkinson (1988); G. O. Hutchinson, Hellenistic Poetry (1988); A. Cameron, Callimachus and His Critics (1995); D. Nelis, Vergil's Aeneid and the Argonautica of Apollonius of Rhodes (2001); S. Stephens, Seeing Double: Intercultural Poetics in Ptolemaic Alexandria (2003); M. Fantuzzi and R. Hunter, Tradition and Innovation in Hellenistic Poetry (2004).

■ Primary Texts: Select Papyri III: Lit. Papyri, ed. D. L. Page (1950); Theocritus, ed. A.S.F. Gow (1952); Callimachus: Aetia, Iambi, Hecale and Other Fragments, ed. and trans. C. A. Trypanis (1958); Callimachus, ed. R. Pfeiffer, 2 v. (1965–69).

J. K. NEWMAN; A. SENS

ALEXANDRINE. The grand line of Fr. poetry since the 16th c., the alexandrine is made of 12 countable vowels (or 13 vowels in a feminine verse line: see MASCULINE AND FEMININE) and divided in two *hemistichs (6-6), as in the following lines from Sonnet 31 of Les Regrets (1558) by Joachim du Bellay:

Heureux qui, comme Ulysse, + a fait un beau voyage
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12(13)
(Happy the man who, like Ulysses, completed a great voyage)

Ou comme cestuy-là+ qui conquit la toison
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12
(Or like he who won the Golden Fleece)

Although its name comes from the Roman d'Alexandre (The Romance of Alexander, 1170), the alexandrine had been used previously in the Pèlerinage de Charlemagne (The Pilgrimage of Charlemagne, 1150). Hypotheses about its origins are numerous (from the most credible to the least, as follows: imitation of Lat. verse; length matched to the number of syllables that can be read in one breath; combination of two six-syllable lines). As the longest Fr. cl. verse line, it was at first seen as resembling discourse in prose; du Bellay, for instance, wrote the Regrets in alexandrines because his book was meant to express an intimate and informal type of inspiration. Considered to be less noble than the more common ten-syllable line, the alexandrine was associated primarily with popular poetry. In 1572, Pierre de Ronsard wrote in the preface to the Franciade, "It would have been much easier to write my book in alexandrines, since this is the longest verse line, were it not for the scruple that they sound too much like prose." Nevertheless, between the 16th and 17th cs., the alexandrine became not only the most widely used verse line in Fr. poetry but the preferred form of elevated and even "noble" genres such as *epic and *tragedy. Thus, a name that referred to the med. heroic poem was elevated to the status of national symbol and eventually came to typify Fr. poetry overall (Halévy). In reality, Ronsard's reluctance to espouse the alexandrine bears witness to its success after 1555, when it began to displace the ten-syllable line as the new vers héroïque. This agreement on what had become the most common verse line in Fr. poetry of the Ren. illustrates the dedication of poets in their efforts to forge a national lang.

Since the exact number of syllables that speakers of Fr. can routinely identify with certainty in a given verse line is limited to eight or fewer, the alexandrine is heard not as a whole but as two hexasyllabic units. But the cl. 6-6 alexandrine is just one of the possible 12-syllable meters in Fr., along with 8-4, 4-4-4, 3-5-4, 5-7, and 7-5, all of which appeared during the second half of the 19th c. Strictly speaking, the designation "alexandrine" should be reserved for 6-6 lines and not all dodecasyllabic lines.

Given its status as the favorite Fr. meter, the alexandrine has always been criticized. Poets and theorists of the 18th c. (e.g., François Neuf-Château, Toussaint Rémond de Saint Mard, Jean-François Marmontel, Louis-Séastien Mercier, André Chénier, Jean-Antoine Roucher) judged its structure to be too rigid, an obstacle to the expression of poets' voices and passions. Traditional theatrical declamation of the line, which was based on a rising tone for the first six syllables and a falling tone for the final six, was felt to be monotonous and little conducive to rhythm (Lote 1940). Later, Hugo heroically claimed he had "disloqué ce grand niais d'alexandrin" (dislocated the alexandrine, that great simpleton [Les Contemplations, 1856]). Though in his poetry Hugo never changed the alexandrine's fundamental 6-6 structure, even as he straddled line-limits (through rejets* and *enjambments), he launched a radical change that some romantics demanded. Subsequent generations from Charles Baudelaire to Arthur Rimbaud, including such figures as Paul Verlaine and Théodore de Banville but excluding Gérard de Nerval and Théophile Gautier, investigated ways to renew the "grand vers" by inventing new scansions that first could accommodate the 6-6 structure ("mesures d'accompagnement"; Cornulier 1995): alternative scansions appeared, such as the 8-4 as in "Comme César pour un sourire, Ô Cléopâtre" (Like Caesar for a smile, O Cleopatra; Verlaine, "Lettre," Fêtes galantes, 1869); the 4-8 as in "Entendez-vous? C'est la marmite qu'accompagne / L'horloge du tic-tac allègre de son pouls" (Do you hear? It is the pot / That accompanies the blithe pulse of the clock; Verlaine, "L'Auberge," Jadis et naguère, 1881); the 4-4-4 as in "Mais de ceci, pour mon malheur, ne sachant rien" (But knowing nothing about this, unfortunately; Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle, "Le corbeau," Poèmes barbares, 1862); and the rare 3-5-4 as in "Ô malheur ! je me sens frémir, la vieille terre . . ." (Oh misfortune! I tremble, the old earth . . .; "Qu'est-ce pour nous, mon coeur . . ." Rimbaud, Derniers vers, 1872). Then, increasingly bold in their line construction, poets weakened the usual syntactic pause of the *caesura by placing in the sixth position words that could not receive vocal emphasis, such as the proclitic article un: "Chacun plantant, comme un outil, son bec impur" (Each [bird] planting his unclean beak as if it were a tool; "Un voyage à Cythère," Baudelaire, Les Fleurs du mal, 1857).

Experiments with the alexandrine (but also with the decasyllable) led to the emergence of vers libre* (free verse) at the turn of the 20th c. But in spite of free verse's liberties, poets have maintained a system of echoes and resemblances with the alexandrine, which remains the most prominent poetic line in Fr.

See FRENCH PROSODY, SYLLABIC VERSE.

■ G. Lote, L'Alexandrin d'après la phonétique expérimentale (1919); J. Roubaud, La Vieillesse d'Alexandre (1978); B. de Cornulier, Théorie du vers (1982); S. P. Verluyten, "Analyse de l'alexandrin: Mètre ou rythme?" in Le Souci des apparences, ed. M. Dominicy (1989); H. Morier, "L'Alexandrin classique était bel et bien un tétramètre," in Langue, littérature du XVII^e et du XVIII^e siècle (1990); G. Lote, Histoire du vers français (VIII) (1994[1953]); B. de Cornulier, Art poëtique (1995); J.-M. Gouvard, Critique du vers (2000); O. Halévy, "La vie d'une forme: l'alexandrin renaissant (1452–1573)," L'Information littéraire (2004); J. Gros de Gasquet, En disant l'alexandrin renaissant (2006); G. Peureux, La Fabrique du vers (2009).

G. PEUREUX

ALLAEOSTROPHA. The Gr. term alloiostropha is used by Hephaestion to describe one type of apolelymena (literally, released or free verse—verse that does not exhibit a repeated pattern of any sort). Apolelymena too short to constitute what Hephaestion regards as a single *strophe are called astropha (astrophic); those that do not exhibit any single recognizable pattern of division into strophes are atmeta (indivisibles); and those composed of two or more contrasting strophes are heterostropha (composed of strophes of which the one is different from the other) if there are only two such strophes and alloiostropha (different strophied) if there are more than two. John Milton uses the term, spelled allaeostropha (for reasons unknown), in the preface to Samson Agonistes to describe verse in irregular *stanzas. Hephaestion was published in Adrien Turnèbe's ed. in 1553, a work that Milton almost surely would have known, it being the only ed. available in the 17th c. and Hephaestion the standard authority for all ancient metrical doctrine.

See HETEROMETRIC, ODE, STICHOS.

■ Maas, sects. 30, 71, 72; West, 135–37.

A. T. COLE

ALLEGORY

I. Uses of the Term
II. Allegory in the Modern World
III. Allegorizing
IV. Historical Development
V. Dialectic of the Visible and the Invisible

I. Uses of the Term. There are three senses in which crit. uses the term allegory (Gr. allegoria; ἄλλος "other" + ἀγορεύειν "public speaking"): (1) as an entire work of art, "an allegory"; (2) as a pattern of images, "an allegory of "; and (3) as arbitrary interpretation, where something is read "as an allegory" of something else. In the first, allegory is a literary or artistic genre in which the entire work of art is presented as secondary with respect to its meaning, eliciting interpretation throughout. In the second, traditional, symbolic figures, often *personifications, are used to give visible form to abstract concepts and processes. Such figures appear most often within allegorical works of the kind just described, but they also appear in other media and genres. In the third, often called allegorizing, nonallegorical works are interpreted as if intended to be allegories, as when The Odyssey is asserted to be an allegory of the journey of the soul through the world or when the Israelites' passing through the Red Sea is asserted to be an allegory of baptism.

In an allegory of the first kind, the immediate narrative—the story of a knight named Redcrosse, e.g.—is presented as a covering or veil behind which the real meaning is concealed, or so we are to suppose. The immediate narrative is relatively incoherent on its own and densely symbolic. We think of the narrative in comparison with writing: just as written letters are secondary to the sounds for which they stand, so the elements of the immediate narrative of an allegory seem to stand for something else. For this reason, the immediate narrative is spoken of (by an inaccurate analogy) as the "literal" meaning and what it hides as the "figural" or represented meaning. Although the figural meaning is supposed to be concealed, there are many clues to what it is: personified abstractions (Disdain, Mr. Worldly-Wise), traditional symbols (the Anchor of Hope, the Torch of Ire), significant topography (the Wandering Wood, the Hill of Difficulty), and elaborately semiotic architectural structures (the Castle of Perseverance, the House of Pride).

Such hints provide the general contexts of meaning within which interpretation is to occur (moral, historical, political, religious), leaving the reader to fill in and organize details. An allegory arouses hermeneutic anxiety and supplies instructions for interpretative play. By engaging in such play, the reader builds a coherent structure of meaning that is then imagined to have been hidden in advance and to have been merely discovered by the reader. Hermeneutic anxiety and interpretative play are allegory's primary aesthetic effects. They are complemented by a sense of penetrating through the text toward a singularity—Dante would call it a punto—that is at the heart of the mystery of the world. Only there may one rest from interpretation. We may refer to this last as the narcosis of repose in the truth. Thus, the three phases of response to an allegory are hermeneutic anxiety, interpretative play, and narcosis of repose in the truth.

How does an allegory differ from a *fable, a beast fable by Aesop, e.g.? The fable makes sense on its own as narrative and is moralized only at the end. But an allegory is a relatively incoherent narrative that demands interpretation throughout in order to make it cohere.

The best-known allegories were composed in the Middle Ages and the Ren.: Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun's Roman de la Rose, Christine de Pizan's City of Women (parodically refashioned by the filmmaker Federico Fellini in Città di donne), Dante's Divine Comedy, William Langland's Piers Plowman, Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene, and John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

Some scholars with a narrower view of allegory, notably Auerbach, have argued that Dante's Comedy is not an allegory, or is only partly so, because his narrative is mimetically real, not secondary with respect to its meaning, as de Meun's narrative is (e.g, de Meun portrays the sexual act as a pilgrim's putting his staff in the hole of a shrine). Still, Dante's Comedy elicits interpretation throughout and brings us to a singularity where we experience the narcosis of repose in the truth. In fact, all the masters of allegory, incl. great painters such as Peter Paul Rubens, strain against the conventions of the genre by making their imaginative worlds as real as the transcendent meaning to which they refer. For almost 1,000 years, from late antiquity to the late Ren., allegory was reputed the truest form of artistic expression, giving visible form to invisibilia, which are more real than what we can see.

II. Allegory in the Modern World. We should not suppose allegory is confined to the past or is only of antiquarian interest. It is impossible to understand mod. culture without allegory, first, because allegorical imagery (allegory in our second sense of the word) has spilled over into the mod. world, appearing on the coats of arms of states, on public monuments, in political cartoons, on commercial products, and on the Internet. Andy Warhol, painter of the Brillo box and of the Campbell's Soup can and of famous images of Jacqueline Kennedy and Mao Zedong, recognized that, with the explosion of reproducible images in mod. culture, flat images become portentous icons.

Something very like allegory (in our first sense of the word) thrives in high culture, too. There are some affinities with allegory in the terrifying fables of Franz Kafka, notably "In the Penal Colony," with its violent scene of writing on the body. A great deal of mod. poetry, with its incoherent syntax and its allusive sense of a mystery withheld, has affinities with allegory, arousing hermeneutic anxiety, engaging us in interpretative play, and delivering the narcosis of repose in the truth.

Ezra Pound's Cantos arouses hermeneutic anxiety and demands the same kind of reading, interpretative play, as does allegory. Although there is less use of allegory in film than one might expect, given how well suited to allegory the visual character of the medium is, Fellini's films are a striking exception. He develops an elaborate system of allegorical imagery that grows in complexity from one film to the next. For the great prophet of modernity, Charles Baudelaire, allegory is the only means of expressing the alienation of the spirit from the material conditions of urban life, conditions to which the spirit remains nevertheless bound, as the allegorical sign is arbitrarily bound to its meaning.

Similar affinities are found in mod. painting and sculpture, from the abstracted but emotionally powerful figures in Pablo Picasso's Guernica to the riddling iconography of Jasper Johns. The contemp. Ger. artist Anselm Kiefer works self-consciously in the allegorical trad., drawing on an astonishing range of contingent discourses (alchemy, astrology, Kabbalah, the Bible, Germanic myth, and mod. poetry) to build monumental works that arouse hermeneutic anxiety and elicit interpretative play—and aesthetic narcosis. Examples are the vast installation Sternenfall (" 'Disaster' " or " 'Falling Stars' ") in the Grand Palais in Paris in 2007 and, in the collection of the Pompidou Center, a series of massive paintings of the night sky on which the tattooed numbers of concentration-camp victims are inscribed among the stars, imitating NASA catalog numbers.

III. Allegorizing. In our third sense of the term, allegory has been applied to works of lit. and art that are imagined to mean something other than they say, even when there is no indication in the work of this alternative meaning. Pedestrian allegorical schemes have thus been imposed on novels by Nathaniel Hawthorne (who denied writing allegory), Herman Melville, Stendhal, George Eliot, and many others. Often referred to in this context as a "mode," allegory becomes a naïve pleonasm for the literary: all lit., all art, is important because it is allegorical and says what we think it ought to say. This is an excuse to make anything an allegory of anything else.

A more coherent, deconstructionist proposal for the meaning of allegory—although it is just as arbitrary a use of the term—follows the work of P. de Man (inspired by Benjamin): allegory reveals the temporality in figurative lang. by acknowledging the noncoincidence of the sign with its meaning, thus demystifying the principle of the symbol, which affirms the fusion of the sign with its meaning. Allegory, in this sense, becomes a sort of floating, critical awareness in lit., closely allied with irony. Like irony, it is condemned never to have any rest, repeatedly undoing the ineradicable supposition that figurative lang. is true.

When Benjamin spoke about allegory (which he was polemically opposing to the fetish of the symbol in Ger. romantic crit.), he was referring specifically to 17th-c. *baroque *emblems replete with skulls, dead plants, and the like. Instead of fusing meaning and life, as the symbol purports to do, the baroque emblem sees them off in opposite directions: "Death," as Benjamin put it allegorically, "digs most deeply the jagged line of demarcation between physis [in this context, "growth" or "life"] and significance" ("zwischen φύσις und Bedeutung"). In generalizing this powerful insight, de Man did not fully succeed in liberating it from a false concretion of the term allegory, which he referred to sometimes as a *"trope" and sometimes as a "mode." Neither term—one is too small, the other too large—is equal to de Man's insight into the opacity of figurative lang.

IV. Historical Development. The Gr. word allegoria can mean either "saying something other than is meant" or "meaning something other than is said"—or both, where the "other" in question rapidly oscillates between the two positions. Allegory often carries the suggestion of prudential encoding. Cicero writes in a letter that, because of the dangerous political situation, he will obscure his meaning with allegories: "αλληγορίαις obscurabo." The classic definition is by the Roman rhetorician Quintilian: "continued metaphor"—μεταφορά continuata. His example is a short poem by Horace in which a troubled state is figured by a description of a ship in rough seas. Quintilian's definition is elegant and durable but applies well only to short works such as Horace's poem. Nevertheless, the appearance in late antiquity of the rhetorical term allegory, suggesting that a text says something wholly other than it appears to be saying, contributed to the later emergence of the literary form we call allegory.

A second factor contributing to the rise of literary allegory is the reduction of minor ancient gods to personifications. Med. personification developed from the widespread tendency to rationalize the gods as abstract universals, on the way to their becoming the traditional virtues and vices and the planetary and zodiacal powers governing our lower world. The cause of everything, including erections and beards, was attributed to some minor god. What we call personifications (the term suggests an actor's mask: per "through" + sonare "to sound") are more like robotic machines designed to represent abstract universals. There is no independent consciousness behind the face of the machine, only what is necessary for its task to be performed. In Spenser's The Faerie Queene, the personification Disdain swings his club at Prince Arthur, who slips under the blow and slashes at Disdain's knee. But because the knee of Disdain would never bend, the entire leg shatters, like a ceramic tube: "But all that leg, which did his body beare, / It crackt throughout, yet did no bloud appeare; / So as it was unable to support / So huge a burden on such broken geare" (6.8.16). Note the word geare, telling us Disdain's leg is not part of a body—it does not bleed—but is instead a piece of equipment. When he crashes to the ground, Disdain keeps struggling to rise, with the repetitive action of a broken machine.

A third factor contributing to the emergence of med. allegorical lit. began as far back as the 6th c. BCE, when the poems of Homer began to be interpreted as if they concealed moral, scientific, philosophical, and even spiritual truths. This was called hermêneia tôn poiêtôn ("interpretation of the poets," whence our word hermeneutics). Hermêneia had the advantage of dignifying ideas one favors by associating them, however anachronistically, with the "bible" of the Greeks. It also served to explain away the parts of Homer that were scandalous to a more puritanical age. Such interpretations were called not yet allegories but hyponoiai, "undermeanings." Thus, when the artificer god Hephaestus catches his wife Aphrodite with her lover Ares in an invisible net, we are not to suppose this episode from the Odyssey is merely for comic relief. It is an encoded hyponoia, an "underthought" on the creation of the cosmos from the opposed forces of concord and discord, bound together in the net of the logos, which is "reason," or "natural law." Such ideas were entirely foreign to Homer. Similarly fanciful interpretations were put forward in the Middle Ages to rescue pagan lit. for Christian use. For Fulgentius, the struggles of Virgil's Aeneas to get to Italy, the "Lavinian shores," are the Christian soul's strivings for heaven; and in the anonymous Ovide moralisé, the bull that rapes Europa, being Jove in disguise, is Christ saving humanity.

Some allegorizations have attained cultural significance in their own right, notably the early Christian interpretation of the erotic Song of Songs as an allegory of Christ's love for his Church and Porphyry's Neoplatonic interpretation of the Cave of the Nymphs in the Odysssey as an allegory of souls in the cosmos. In Ren. Florence, Neoplatonic allegorizations of cl. myth had independent aesthetic value, powerfully influencing great artists such as Sandro Botticelli. The elaborate, med. practice of allegorizing the Bible underlay lit., music, painting, and architecture up to the 17th c. Joshua's leading the Israelites across the Jordan River into the Promised Land prefigures Jesus' leading us through death into heaven. For med. churchmen, Joshua's action is a real, historical event, not just an imaginative one, as with cl. tales, meaning that God himself is an allegorist, hiding meaning in history, as he also hides meaning in nature.

The fourth and final condition for literary allegory comes after antiquity and pervades the Christian worldview: the emergence of a logocentric culture of the sign, replacing a polytheistic culture of the numen or "indwelling spirit." With the coming of Christianity as the dominant culture, the world is seen as an order of signs, all of them pointing back to their mysterious, transcendent creator. Like gravitation, the effect of this new sense of the signifying character of the world is comparatively weak on the small scale of the textual phenomena we have considered so far: rhetorical figures, fanciful interpretations, and personifications. But when we step back to take in a wider perspective, the large-scale effects of this cause are impressive, drawing vast amounts of iconographical material into galaxy-like structures turning around invisible centers. Under Christianity, people began to sense that everything visible is not quite real, though it points, with everything else, to the invisible real. This feeling created the ideal intellectual climate for the growth of allegorical writing.

Early examples are Martianus Capella's On the Marriage of Mercury and Philology (intelligence is the god Mercury, and learning is the maiden Philology, whose bridesmaids are the seven liberal arts) and a poem by Prudentius (ca. 348–405), titled Psychomachia, "the battle of virtues and vices in the soul." This work derives from a famous and much-allegorized episode in the Iliad called the theomachia ("battle of the gods"), in which the gods join in the fighting at Troy. Pious ancient readers had interpreted the episode as a battle of the virtues and the vices in the soul and even as the battle of the different elements in nature. Thus, in the Psychomachia, we see gathered together the four ancient factors contributing to the devel. of allegory: continued metaphor (inward moral struggle as an outward battle); personification (Modesty, Pudicitia, kills Lust, Luxuria); hermeneutics (the gods of the Iliad as virtues and vices); and a sense of mystery enveloping the whole and tending to the unity of truth. At the conclusion of the Psychomachia, the virtues occupy the city of the purified soul, which resembles the heavenly Jerusalem of Revelation, where the mysterious figure of wisdom (Sapientia) is enthroned, the dark center around which everything turns.

Allegory in the Visual Arts. Allegory is the only major literary term that is equally applicable to the visual arts, from the complex symbolism of the great cathedrals of the Middle Ages to allegorical imagery on skyscrapers, such as the tower of the Chicago Sun-Times. The trad. of pictorial allegory in Christian art of the High Middle Ages began with Abbot Suger's plans for the stained-glass windows of the Abbey of Saint Denis and developed into the comprehensive symbolic system of the great Gothic cathedrals, from Chartres to Rheims.

A chronological selection of secular allegory in the visual arts would include the following: Pietro Lorenzetti's Allegory of Good and Bad Government, in the Palazzo Pubblico, Siena (14th c.); Botticelli's Calumny of Apelles and his Primavera, both in the Uffizi, Florence (15th c.); Francesco del Cossa's decoration of the "Room of the Months," Ferrara (15th c.); Albrecht Dürer's "Triumphal Chariot of Maximilian I" (16th c.); Giulio Romano's frescoes in the Palazzo Te, Mantua (16th c.); Agnolo Bronzino's Allegory of Felicity in the Uffizi, Florence, and his stunningly erotic Allegory of Love in the National Gallery, London (16th c.); Guido Reni's Aurora in the Palazzo Rospigliosi, Rome (17th c.); Rubens's ceiling of the Banqueting House in London, and his Allegory of War in the Uffizi (17th c.); Pietro da Cortona's Apotheosis of the Barberini in the Barberini Palace, Rome, and his Medici Ceilings in the Palazzo Pitti, Florence (17th c.); Pompeo Batoni's Allegory of Venice, now in Raleigh, NC (18th c.); Giambattista Tiepolo's stupendous Allegory of the Continents in Würzburg (18th c.); Eugène Delacroix's "Greece Expiring on the Ruins of Missolonghi" (1826), his "Liberty Leading the People" (1830), and his allegorical decorations on the ceiling of the "Galerie d'Apollon" in the Louvre (1850–51); Pierre Ducos de la Haille's France Giving Enlightenment to the Continents of the World, in the Palais de la Porte Dorée, in Paris (1929–31); and José Clemente Orozco's Epic of American Civilization at Dartmouth College in Hanover, NH (1932–34).

V. Dialectic of the Visible and the Invisible. The many, powerful examples of allegory in art underline its intensely visual character in lit., where visibilia point beyond themselves to invisibilia and where invisibilia, such as faith, are brought into view. As Machosky (2003) observes, allegory does not merely conceal meaning: it makes visible things that cannot otherwise be perceived. It was noted that, in the transcendentalizing culture of the Middle Ages, to be visible and material was not to be entirely real; but visible, material things can become paths to the real. As Suger put it (in words inscribed on the doors of the Abbey Church of Saint Denis), the weak human mind may rise toward truth only by the assistance of material signs: "mens hebes ad verum per materialia surgit."

But allegory can also bring what is hidden into the light. In this double movement, we may find a solution to Auerbach's rejection of allegory as incompatible with Dante's irdischen Welt, his "earthly world." Bunyan's homely and realistic villagers are no less earthly than Dante's hectic Florentines. Spenser's Fairy Land seems not less but more intensely real than our world; his knights champion their respective moral virtues but are not reduced to them. As we read an allegory, the dialectical interaction between sharp, realistic images of things disappearing into universal mysteries and universal mysteries emerging into view as sharp, realistic things is the highest pleasure afforded by the genre. De Man's insight may now be recalled: allegory brings pleasure, not truth.

See HERMENEUTICS, IRONY, SYMBOL.

■ Lewis; E. Panofsky, Studies in Iconology (1939); J. Seznec, The Survival of the Pagan Gods, trans. B. F. Sessions (1953); F. Buffière, Les Mythes d'Homère et la pensée grecque (1956); E. Mâle, The Gothic Image, trans. D. Nussey ([1913] 1958); E. Wind, Pagan Mysteries in the Renaissance (1958); E. Auerbach, "Figura," Scenes from the Drama of European Literature (1959); H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale, 4 v. (1959–64); A. Fletcher, Allegory (1964); R. Tuve, Allegorical Imagery (1966); A. Henkel and A. Schöne, Emblemata (1967; suppl. 1976); H. R. Jauss and U. Ebel, "Entstehung und Strukturwandel der allegorischen Dichtung," GRLMA 6.1 (1968); M. Murrin, The Veil of Allegory (1969); D. C. Allen, Mysteriously Meant (1970); J. MacQueen, Allegory (1970); M. R. Jung, Etudes sur le poème allégorique en France au moyen âge (1971); P. Dronke, Fabula (1974)—med. Platonism; J. Nohrnberg, The Analogy of "The Faerie Queene" (1976); J. Pépin, Mythe et allégorie, 2d ed. (1976); W. Benjamin, The Origin of German Tragic Drama, trans. J. Osborne ([1928] 1977); S. A. Barney, Allegories of History, Allegories of Love (1979); M. Quilligan, The Language of Allegory (1979); M. Murrin, The Allegorical Epic (1980); D. Cast, The Calumny of Apelles (1981); Allegory and Representation, ed. S. Greenblatt (1981); P. Rollinson and P. Matsen, Classical Theories of Allegory and Christian Culture (1981); J. D. Black, "Allegory Unveiled," PoT 4 (1983); de Man, "The Rhetoric of Temporality"; C. Van Dyke, The Fiction of Truth (1985); L. Barkan, The Gods Made Flesh (1986); R. Lamberton, Homer the Theologian (1986); J. Pépin, La tradition de l'allégorie (1987); J. Whitman, Allegory (1987); D. Evett, "Some Elizabethan Allegorical Paintings," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institute 52 (1989); A. Katzenellenbogen, Allegories of the Virtues and Vices in Medieval Art (1989); G. Teskey, "Allegory," The Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. A. C. Hamilton (1990), and Allegory and Violence (1996); S. Greenfield, The Ends of Allegory (1998); B. Machosky, "The Phenomenology of the Soul in the Allegory of the Psychomachia," Exemplaria 15 (2003); N. Conti, Mythologiae, trans. J. Mulryan and S. Brown (2006); D. Sanyal, The Violence of Modernity (2006); E. Auerbach, Dante, trans. R. Manheim ([1929] 2007); N. Guynn, Allegory and Sexual Ethics in the High Middle Ages (2007); N. Halmi, The Genealogy of the Romantic Symbol (2007); B. Machosky, "Trope and Truth in The Pilgrim's Progress," Studies in English Literature 47 (2007), and ed., Thinking Allegory Otherwise (2009); E. Naginski, Sculpture and Enlightenment (2009).

G. TESKEY

ALLITERATION. The repetition of the *sound of an initial consonant or consonant cluster in stressed syllables close enough to each other for the ear to be affected. The term is sometimes also used for the repetition of an initial consonant in unstressed syllables, as in E. A. Poe's "lost Lenore," where the weak second l affects the ear less than the long o followed by r, but this less direct patterning is arguably not of the same class as stress-enhanced alliteration. From cl. times up to the 20th c., alliteration as a figure in rhet. means the repetition of the initial letter of words. Alliteration formerly included the echo of initial vowels, even of initial letters in weak syllables—a fact that explains Charles Churchill's 18th-c. attack on those who unsuccessfully "pray'd / For apt alliteration's Artful aid." In mod. scholarship, vowel alliteration usually refers only to the older Germanic langs. It must constantly be borne in mind that, since alliteration is a device of the sound stratum of poetry, the vagaries of spelling systems must be discounted: it is sounds, not letters, that count, as in Emily Dickinson's "The cricket sang / And set the sun" ("The Cricket Sang") or John Dryden's "Thy force, infus'd, the fainting Tyrians prop'd; / And haughty Pharoah found his fortune stop'd" (Absalom and Achitophel, 842–43), where the f phone begins six stressed syllables, one in a medial syllable, one spelled Ph.

In the alliterative meters of the older Germanic langs., including Beowulf (see ENGLISH PROSODY, Old English; GERMANIC PROSODY), alliteration binds the two *hemistichs, as in "Oft Scyld Scefing sceathena threatum." The alliteration is usually on initial consonants or on certain consonant clusters, but any vowel may alliterate with any other. In Old Saxon, a weakening of phonological stress apparently caused alliterating syllables to be reinforced by a higher proportion of identical vowels, whether the syllable began with the vowel or with a consonant (Suzuki). In poetry after ME, alliteration is neither linear nor structural; in fact, it is often carried through several lines. Today, then, alliteration is one of the four most significant devices of phonic echo in poetry (see ASSONANCE, CONSONANCE, RHYME).

One must remember that unintentional alliteration will occur less often than unintentional assonance, since in IE langs. consonants outnumber vowels. Certain consonant clusters (e.g., st and sp) alliterate only with themselves in the older Germanic langs. A. E. Housman, aware of this trad., lets his poet in "The Grecian Galley" alliterate seven st clusters in three lines.

Almost every major poetry in the world except Hebrew, Persian, and Arabic seems to have made considerable use of alliteration, which has been more popular and persistent than rhyme. Although there is disagreement about the nature or importance of stress in Gr. and Lat. poetry, it is certain that cl. poets understood the uses of alliteration. Aeschylus echoed initials to emphasize key words and phrases, to point up a pun, to aid *onomatopoeia, or simply to please the ear (Stanford). Lucretius reveled in phonic echoes, incl. alliteration, while Virgil, a quieter poet, wrote many lines like these two, heavy with assonance, in which eight important syllables also bear initial k or l: "cuncta mihi Alpheum linquens locusque Molorchi / cursibus et crudo decernet Graecia caestu."

More than most others, the Romance langs. have neglected alliteration in favor of assonance, the reason perhaps being that It., Sp., and Port. poetry have traditionally preferred short lines with vowel (often followed by consonant) echoes in the final two syllables. Even though it is said that Fr. poetry by the 17th c. considered alliteration "mauvaise" (Thieme), the Fr. cl. *alexandrine did make some use of it, as in Nicolas Boileau's "Des traits d'esprit semés de temps en temps pétillent." But most Fr. poets from Victor Hugo to Saint-John Perse have found other devices more appealing to the ear.

Even the Asian tonal langs. have been as fond of alliteration as of other phonic echoes. Chinese, a monosyllabic lang. with short-line poems based on parallel structure and patterning of rising vs. falling tones, insists on rhyme and plays much with repeated vowels and consonants, as with ch in the opening lines of "Fu on Climbing a Tower" by Wang Can (ca. 200 CE; Frankel). Also tonal, but polysyllabic, Japanese poetry has from ancient times employed much alliteration (Brower).

All the Celtic langs., but esp. Ir. and Welsh, have been renowned for their elaborate schemes of phonic ornamentation. Early Welsh and Ir. "cadenced" verse was seldom rhymed but used much alliteration for linking words and lines. By the 6th c., this verse gave way to "rhyming" verse in which each line has stressed word pairs that alliterate or assonate, all to go with the "generic rhyming" that links lines of a stanza (see CELTIC PROSODY). By the 14th c., Welsh bards had evolved the elaborately decorated cynghanedd* based on exact rhymes in couplets and complex echoes of vowels and consonants, incl. alliteration (Dunn).

Of the poetry in Germanic langs., mod. Ger. has employed alliteration consistently, while Eng. has liked it perhaps even more. J. W. Goethe used alliteration much as Shakespeare did, in conjunction with other phonic devices and normally with restraint. He might, however, open a lyric (e.g., "Hochzeitlied") with heavy alliteration or help elevate Faust's most important speech to Mephistopheles with "Dann will ich gern zu Grunde gehn!" Heinrich Heine preferred rhymed short-line verse and needed alliteration less, but he often tended to heavy ornament (e.g., "Ein Wintermarchen"). Gottfried Benn and R. M. Rilke were perhaps more sound-conscious than most other 20th-c. Ger. poets; and while they too preferred assonance, Benn could write dozens of lines like this one in "Untergrundbahn": "Druch all den Frühling kommt die fremde Frau," a line no more ornate than some by Rilke.

Although alliteration was disparaged by Chaucer's Parson, a southern man, as "rum, ram, ruf," Eng. poets continued to use it widely after the 14th-c. revival of alliterative verse in England and Scotland (see ENGLAND, POETRY OF). The later usage shows no knowledge of the precise rules of meter that have been discovered for alliterative verse of the 14th and early 15th cs. (see ENGLISH PROSODY, Middle English). Edmund Spenser makes use of it in the Shepheardes Calender; and in The Faerie Queene, the first 36 lines have seven instances of triple alliteration—by some standards very heavy. In A Midsummer Night's Dream (5.1.147–48), Shakespeare makes fun of alliteration, but he employs it heavily in the early long poems (e.g., Lucrece)—less so in the lyrics, sonnets, and plays—though alliteration is often conspicuous in the plays. John Milton, who loved the sound of words even before his blindness, preferred assonance, but he also liked alliteration, e.g., in "L'Allegro" ("And to the stack, or the barn door, / Stoutly struts his Dames before") and in Paradise Lost ("Moping melancholy, / And moonstruck madness" [2.424–25]). Eng. poets from 1660 to 1780 worked hard with phonic echoes in order to vary not only their couplets but their *blank verse and octosyllables. Dryden, Alexander Pope, John Gay, and James Thomson used alliteration best to tie adjectives to nouns, to balance nouns or verbs or adjectives, to stress the *caesura and end rhyme, to join sound to sense, and to decorate their lines. After 1780, poets used alliteration less; still, almost every poet from William Blake to G. M. Hopkins to Housman used it well, sometimes excessively, as with this typical burst in Robert Browning's "The Bishop Orders His Tomb": "And stretch my feet forth straight as stone can point." Alfred, Lord Tennyson is reported to have said, "When I spout my lines first, they come out so alliteratively that I have sometimes no end of trouble to get rid of the alliteration."

In the 20th c., Robert Frost, Ezra Pound, and W. C. Williams are relatively unornamental, though Frost could sometimes alliterate heavily—"Nature's first green is gold, / Her hardest hue to hold" ("Nothing Gold Can Stay"). Others—Wallace Stevens, T. S.

Eliot, W. B. Yeats—are less sparing with alliteration, as Eliot is in the Sweeney poems and "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," though sometimes they indulge sudden excesses, as with Stevens's "Winding across wide waters." But there is a larger group of more recent poets who, learning from Hopkins and Thomas Hardy, have depended very much on phonic echoes, esp. in unrhymed verse. Among these are Wilfred Owen and Dylan Thomas in Britain and Robinson Jeffers, Marianne Moore, Hart Crane, Theodore Roethke, Robert Lowell, Richard Wilbur, and Mary Oliver in the U.S. Crane, typical of this group, echoes not only initial consonants but important vowels in almost every line—"Sun-silt rippled them / Asunder" ("Repose of Rivers") and "Rail-squatters ranged in nomad raillery" (The Bridge). Oliver, whose poems show an awareness of rhetorical figures and prosodical turns, alliterates s four times and f twice in two lines: "It is the light at the center of every cell. / It is what sent the snake coiling and flowing forward" ("The Black Snake").

All these literary patterns depend for their effectiveness on the salience of alliteration in everyday speech. In the Germanic langs. esp., alliterative formulas have been in common use historically, incl. alliterating names for siblings, e.g., Heorogar, Hrothgar, and Halga (Minkova). It appears that nonliterary usage both preceded the literary forms and survived them after fashions in verse changed. Recent research using the databases of corpus ling. has revealed the pervasiveness of alliterative formulas in early ME, influenced partly by the alliterative collocations of western Scandinavia (Markus). ME prose with an affinity to the registers of spoken lang. suggests that these collocations were a part of common speech, as they continue to be in present-day Eng.—e.g., fit as a fiddle, ship-shape, tit for tat, topsy turvy, down in the dumps, worse for wear, and so on.

■ H. Tennyson, Alfred, Lord Tennyson: A Memoir By His Son (1897); R. E. Deutsch, The Patterns of Sound in Lucretius (1939); W. B. Stanford, Aeschylus in His Style (1942); N. I. Hérescu, La poésie latine (1960); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); W. B. Stanford, The Sound of Greek (1967); J. D. Allen, Quantitative Studies in Prosody (1968); Wimsatt, esp. essays by Frankel, Brower, Lehmann, and Dunn; P. G. Adams, Graces of Harmony: Alliteration, Assonance, and Consonance in Eighteenth-Century British Poetry (1977); J.T.S. Wheelock, "Alliterative Functions in the Divina Comedia," Lingua e Stile 13 (1978); Brogan, esp. items C111–C170, L65, L406 (Jakobson), L150, L474, L564, L686, and pp. 479–585; D. Minkova, Alliteration and Sound Change in Early English (2003); S. Suzuki, The Metre of Old Saxon Poetry (2004); M. Markus, "Bed & Board: The Role of Alliteration in Twin Formulas of Middle English Prose," Folia Linguistica Historica 26 (2005).

P. G. Adams; T. Cable

ALLUSION. (Lat., alludere, "to joke, jest" [from ad- "to" + ludere "to play"]), originally meaning "to mock" and later "to make a fanciful reference to." A brief, indirect, and deliberate reference—in a poem or other medium—to a person, place, event (fictitious or actual), or other work of art, allusion may be used by its author to enhance a work's semantic and cultural density, topicality, or timelessness. Despite its etymology, allusion need not be playful but does require that the audience recognize the borrowed reference.

Before describing different kinds of allusion, it may be useful to enumerate what it is not. Allusion differs from *intertextuality because it is purposive; from plagiarism because the poet does not pass off the reference as his or her own; from quotation because it is not cited; and from *topos (e.g., John Milton's "autumnal leaves" simile in Paradise Lost 1.303–4 with its antecedents in Isaiah, Homer, Virgil, and Dante) because it has a single source.

Allusion can vary widely in tone, type, degree of obscurity, completion and accuracy, and relation to its precursor. It can be lighthearted, as when, in Tom Stoppard's play Jumpers, the protagonist George Moore, brooding on violent acts while holding his tortoise Pat, declares, "Now might I do it, Pat" (alluding to a line of Hamlet's as he considers killing the praying Claudius), or somber, as when, in T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land, the narrator (borrowing a line from Dante) declares, "I had not thought death had undone so many." Its context can be historical, as in Gloucester's mention of "These late eclipses of the sun and moon" in Shakespeare's King Lear (a possible reference to recent cosmological events) or Sylvia Plath's description of "Daddy" as "Panzer-man" (referring to a German tank used in World War II); artistic, as in W. H. Auden's "Musée des Beaux Arts"(with its debt to the paintings of Peter Brueghel); or autobiographical, as in Milton's references to his blindness throughout Paradise Lost. It can be fairly easily noticed, like Eliot's allusions to Hamlet in "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," or more arcane, like his references to Hesiod and Andrew Marvell in the same poem. Allusion, while usually featuring an exact iteration of a prior text, can sometimes paradoxically derive its power from a misquotation or inexact recollection, as when, in Samuel Beckett's Happy Days, Winnie tries in vain to remember "that wonderful line" from Paradise Lost but can only come up with "oh something lasting woe." Though usually local, it can also inflect an entire work, as when in his sestina "Paysage Moralisé," Auden borrows several end words from Philip Sidney's double sestina. Allusion often derives its power from alteration of a passage or placement in a different context, e.g., the opening clause of The Waste Land— "April is the cruelest month"—with its grim new take on Chaucer's "Aprill with his shoures soote."

Broadly speaking, we can classify allusion into the following categories (with much potential for overlap): (1) topical, referring to specific historical events (e.g., John Donne's "the new Philosophy calls all in doubt," a seeming allusion to Nicolaus Copernicus's heliocentric cosmology); (2) personal, referring to circumstances in the author's life (e.g., Shakespeare's punning on his own name in his sonnets); (3) formal, using another poet's techniques such as rhymes or tropes (e.g., Eliot's "But at my back in a cold blast I hear / The rattle of bones, and chuckle spread from ear to ear" (The Waste Land 185–86), with its ironic reformulation of "But at my back I always hear / Time's winged chariot hurrying near" from Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress"; (4) metaphorical, referring to earlier works in such a way that they lend the new work added significance and depth (e.g., Milton and the Bible, Auden and Brueghel); (5) imitative, alluding to another work's genre, rhet., mood, or style, whether on a local or larger level (e.g., Alexander Pope's Rape of the Lock, with its many send-ups of epic conventions such as invocation, epithet, and simile); (6) structural, recalling the organization of an earlier work (e.g., Auden's sestina).

Allusion tends to assume an intelligent reader, a shared body of knowledge, and the value of previous works or contexts, but its manifestations in hist. and culture are extremely varied. Only a hundred years ago, a poet could assume that a reader would recognize the phrase "through a glass darkly" as a biblical allusion, but few would deny the lesser likelihood of this familiarity today. In the Japanese haiku trad. (see HAIKAI), certain keywords will resonate instantly with readers, lending each instance of the word an immediate depth. Religious allusion is the most common form in many cultures, e.g., Islamic lit.'s overwhelming debt to the Qur'an. As Ricks has written in Allusion to the Poets, "allusion is one form that inheritance can take, even while inheritance takes diverse forms in different ages and for individual genius."

Lit. crit. has had much to say about allusion. W. J. Bate described the "burden" that literary trad. places on poets while also allowing them the chance to achieve maturity and originality by wrestling with it; Harold Bloom's theory of the "anxiety of influence" put forth an Oedipal account of poetic borrowing; and Henry Louis Gates used the term signifying* to examine textual interplay within the Af. Am. literary trad. Ricks has also poignantly remarked that allusion can mitigate a writer's loneliness.

Debates about allusion can involve questions of *intention (do authors know they are alluding? Does the alluder display ambition or humility?) and comprehension (is enjoyment of a work predicated on a reader's recognizing the allusion?), but there is no doubt that it is an important technique in lit. and other media, instantly evoking attitudes and beliefs, people and places, communities and trads., and providing a dizzying variety of rich and resonant effects.

See IMITATION, INFLUENCE.

■ R. W. Emerson, "Quotation and Originality" (1868); R. D. Havens, The Influence of Milton on English Poetry (1922); E. T. Clark, Hidden Allusions in Shakespeare's Plays (1931); G. Smith, T. S. Eliot's Poems and Plays (1956); S. P. Bovie, "Classical Allusions," CW 52 (1958); R. Brower, Alexander Pope (1959); R. L. Brower, Japanese Court Poetry (1961); D. P. Harding, The Club of Hercules (1962); W. J. Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1972); H. Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence (1973); A. Hamori, On the Art of Medieval Arabic Literature (1974); H. Bloom, A Map of Misreading (1975); Z. Ben-Porat, "The Poetics of Literary Allusion" and A. L. Johnson, "Allusion in Poetry," both in Poetics and Theory of Literature 1 (1976); N. Goodman, Ways of Worldmaking (1978); C. Perri et al., "Allusion Studies: An International Annotated Bibliography, 1921–1977," Style 13 (1979); J. Hollander, The Figure of Echo (1981); G. B. Conte, The Rhetoric of Imitation, trans. and ed. C. Segal (1986); L. Newlyn, Coleridge, Wordsworth and the Language of Allusion (1986); P. Yu, The Reading of Imagery in the Chinese Poetic Tradition (1987); E. Cook, Poetry, Word-Play, and Word-War in Wallace Stevens (1988); H. L. Gates, The Signifying Monkey (1988); E. Stein, Wordsworth's Art of Allusion (1988); R. Garner, From Homer to Tragedy (1989); Intertextuality, Allusion, and Quotation, ed. U. J. Hebel—a bibl. (1989); A. Pasco, Allusion (1994); Literary Influence and African American Writers, ed. T. Mishkin (1995); E. Gregory, Quotation and Modern American Poetry (1996); E. Cook, Against Coercion (1998); C. Ricks, Essays in Appreciation (1996); E. Kamens, Utamakura, Allusion, and Intertextuality in Traditional Japanese Poetry (1997); J. Derrida, Archive Fever, trans. E. Prenowitz (1998); S. Hinds, Allusion and Intertextuality (1998)—on Roman poetry; D. Kelly, The Conspiracy of Allusion (1999); C. Ricks, Allusion to the Poets (2002); C. A. Reynolds, Motives for Allusion (2003)—19th-c. music; G. Machacek, "Allusion," and P. Yeager, "The Polyphony Issue," PMLA 122.2 (2007); S. Harwood, "Poetry in Movies: A Partial List," Poets.org, http://www.poets.org/viewmedia.php/prmMID/19359; R. M. Howard, "Citation, Allusion, Quotation: A Bibliography," http://wrt-howard.syr.edu/Bibs/Citation.htm.

R. WETZSTEON

AMBIGUITY (Lat. ambiguitas, from ambigere, "to dispute about," literally "to wander"). In lit. crit., ambiguity is primarily defined as the simultaneous availability of more than one meaning or interpretation. It has been variously identified as a property of verbal structure (lexical, semantic, and syntactic), of literary forms and genres themselves, and of readerly practices. Aristotle regarded ambiguity as a type of fallacious argument that he called sophistic syllogism, an argument that defends something false in order to confuse an adversary. For Aristotle, there were only two types of arguments: true and untrue. An ambiguous argument was an argument that appeared to be true and untrue at the same time and was, thus, logically untrue. Aristotle's principle of noncontradiction is at the root of scientific and logical thought. But in a literary context, Virgil's suggestive use of the noun ambages in Aeneid 6.99 to denote the ambiguous prophecy of the Cumaean Sibyl was noticed by Dante, Boccaccio, Chaucer, and others, who introduce the Lat. term directly into their vernaculars to suggest perniciously doubled meanings ("with double words slye, / Swiche as men clepen a worde with two visages," Troilus and Criseyde 5.898–99). By the 16th c., ambiguity is established in Eng. (and its counterparts in the other vernaculars) to refer to multiple meanings that may be dangerous, productive, or aporetic (see APORIA), in keeping with the Ren. rupturing of monologic paradigms. For instance, the Rus. theorist Mikhail Bakhtin in the first half of the 20th c. identifies in the works of François Rabelais a socially and historically conditioned use of ambiguity involving multiple meanings in not only words but discourses of all kinds; and in the second half of the century, a train of critics from Leo Spitzer to Claudio Guillén argue that literary works embody contrasting perspectives, the basis of *genres such as the Cervantine novel and the picaresque. The fact that many mod. critics develop theories of ambiguity with reference to Ren. works implies that the concept has a special purchase in the period.

In Anglo-Am. *New Criticism, the broad use of the term ambiguity as making available more than one meaning or interpretation became common practice with William Empson's Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930), where he defines the term as "any verbal nuance, however slight, which gives room to alternative reactions to the same piece of language." Empson drew attention to ambiguity as constitutive of the lang. of poetry and valued it positively as a source of richness rather than imprecision. Empson offers a taxonomy of ambiguity: *metaphor is the first type of ambiguity; followed by ambiguity as two or more meanings that become another meaning; two concepts inextricably connected via context; two meanings that combine to illuminate the author's state of mind; two opposite meanings that illuminate a division within the author; the lack of apparent meaning and the need for the reader's creation of meaning; and, finally, ambiguity as the act of writing, a channel halfway between the text and the writer.

In the 1960s, literary theorists such as Genette, Barthes, and Wheelwright proposed ambiguity as an intrinsic capacity of poetic lang. Genette theorizes the notion of a nonempty "gap" as the essence of poetry, while Wheelwright and Barthes observe not only the capacity to hold more than one meaning or interpretation but the open state of oscillation between them, which is variously called plurisignation (Wheelwright) or infinite plurality (Barthes).

In contrast to Barthes' description of an open work that lacks or deliberately eschews centers of orientation, Rimmon considers an ambiguous work to possess marked centers that polarize data and create mutually exclusive systems of meaning. Rimmon distinguishes ambiguity from double meaning, multiple meaning, plurisignation, or infinite plurality, which she refers to as types of conjunctive ambiguity. For Rimmon, however, ambiguity is disjunctive, that which both "calls for choice and makes it impossible." According to her, the essential difference between the multiplicity of subjective interpretations given to a work of fiction and ambiguity proper is that, while the subjectivity of reading is conditioned mainly by the psyche of the reader, ambiguity is "a fact in the text—a double system of mutually exclusive clues." While Rimmon emphasizes the function of the reader by offering ambiguity as a plurality of readings from which we are to determine our own, at the same time she sees such a subjectivity as invited by the text itself and considers each meaning clearly based in a function of the text and context. Rimmon considers Empson's approach too broad, as he analyzes ambiguity by the conjunction or synthesis or fusion or multiplication of meaning, but she ultimately sides with him in locating ambiguity in the verbal structure itself.

For the poststructuralist Kristeva, "communication and that which breaks communication apart" are located not only in the verbal structure but, following Jacques Lacan, in the unconscious. For Kristeva, ambiguity "provides the creative and innovative impulse of modern poetic structure" and is closely related to signifiance or "the eruption of the semiotic within the symbolic." The ambiguity that characterizes *modernism is the unleashing of the semiotic, i.e., the preverbal impulses and bodily drives discharged into signification. Other critics such as Trujillo move even further away from the verbal structure, considering ambiguity not as inherent in lang. but as a performative mechanism used at will by the writing subject.

With its cl. origins and early mod. provenance, ambiguity differs from concepts such as *polysemy or *indeterminacy. Unlike indeterminacy, it refers not to the instability of meaning itself but to the existence of multiple meanings at the same time. And unlike polysemy, it emphasizes not discrete meanings but their simultaneity, thus placing signification in a state of oscillation between meanings but also interpretations, where context and subjectivity play a main role. Ambiguity is an openness to the potentiality of a multiplicity of interpretations, not because all are equally important or relevant at the same time and for the same reader but because they all exist equally within the field and will emerge eventually as actualized—as De Beauvoir puts it, "reinvested with [a particular] human signification."

■ M. Black, "Vagueness: An Exercise in Logical Analysis," Philosophy of Science 4 (1937); I. M. Copilowish, "Borderline Cases: Vagueness and Ambiguity," and C. G. Hempel, "Vagueness and Logic," Philosophy of Science 6 (1939); W. B. Stanford, Ambiguity in Greek Literature (1939); S. de Beauvoir, The Ethics of Ambiguity, trans. B. Frechtman (1948); G. W. Cunningham, "On the Meaningfulness of Vague Language," Philosophy Review 58 (1949); M. C. Beardsley, Thinking Straight (1954); S. Dawson, "Infinite Types of Ambiguity," BJA 5 (1965); P. Wheelwright, "On the Semantics of Poetry," Essays on the Language of Literature, ed. S. Chatman and S. R. Levin (1967); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1970); C. Guillén, Literature as System (1971); R. Trujillo, Elementos de semántica lingüística (1976); R. Barthes, "From Work to Text," Image, Music, Text, trans. S. Heath (1977); S. Rimmon, The Concept of Ambiguity (1977); G. Pérez Firmat, "Genre as Text," Comparative Literature Studies 17 (1980); J. Kristeva, Desire in Language, trans. T. Gora et al. (1980); M. M. Bakhtin, The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist (1981); J. Derrida, Dissemination, trans. B. Johnson (1981); M. Perloff, The Poetics of Indeterminacy (1981); G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan (1982); D. Wallace, "Chaucer's Ambages," American Notes and Queries 23 (1984); J. Ferrater Mora, Diccionario de la Filosofía (1988); U. Eco, The Open Work, trans. A. Cancogni (1989).

V. Ramos

AMERICAN INDIAN POETRY. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; INUIT POETRY; NAVAJO POETRY.

AMERICAN POETRY. See UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE.

AMERICAN SIGN LANGUAGE POETRY. American Sign Language (ASL) poetry refers to poetry translated from another lang. into ASL or, more often, originally composed in ASL. Since ASL is one of more than 100 distinct, naturally occurring signed langs. in the world, ASL poetry is not the only signed poetic trad., but it is the most developed. In such works, the poet's body has a strong presence. By skillfully using space, hand shape, movement, facial expressions, and other elements, ASL poets produce three-dimensional poems that express meaning without depending on sound.

The beginnings of ASL poetry are elusive. ASL dates from the early 19th c., when deaf students began to come together at schools in the U.S. However, after the Civil War, some hearing educators started a campaign against sign lang., trying to abolish it from schools. Moreover, because ASL is not a written lang., we have no direct record of it before the advent of motion-picture technology in the 20th c. The first ASL performances are largely lost to us, existing only in what has been passed down through sign of hand.

ASL poets draw on the cultural trads. of the deaf community and on poetry in written langs. Early influences probably included ASL songs, folklore, and deaf literary organizations. Films from the 1930s show deaf Americans signing "The Star Spangled Banner" and "Yankee Doodle." Deaf people also developed original forms like 1-2-3 songs, where crowds rhythmically sign together, and ABC stories, which performers relate using only 26 signs conforming to the hand shapes of the manual alphabet. At the same time, deaf literary groups promoted the trans. of Eng. poems into ASL. In 1939, e.g., Eric Malzkuhn gave a signed version of Lewis Carroll's "Jabberwocky" in which he ingeniously recombined parts of everyday signs to convey Carroll's nonsensical words, making something new.

The greatest effect on ASL poetry came in the 1960s, when linguists recognized ASL as a full human lang. Poets responded with renewed pride, composing more original poems in ASL. Sometimes they took on deaf themes. Thus Clayton Valli, in "Dandelion," implicitly compares ASL to those plants that a gardener can never quite eradicate, and Ella Mae Lentz, in "To a Hearing Mother," invites parents of deaf children to work with the deaf community in raising them. Other poems have less to do with deaf experience. Bernard Bragg's "Flowers and Moonlight on the Spring Water" gracefully evokes the image in the title, while "Need," by Peter Cook and Kenny Lerner, the deaf-hearing team of the Flying Words Project, protests America's dependence on oil.

Like other poets, ASL performers may follow rigid structure or more open-ended forms. Among other techniques, they often use space in symmetrical fashion; choose signs with certain hand shapes to give visual rhyme; use eye gaze, mouth movement, head and body shifts, and other nonmanual indicators to add rhythm and meaning; and employ *simile, *metaphor, and *allusion. By exploiting ASL grammar in multiple ways, they create layers of meaning and poetry that is vividly expressive.

ASL poets tend to be deaf, but not all are. Finally, not all deaf poets sign. Some, like David Wright, publish poetry in the dominant lang. of their nations.

■ C. Padden and T. Humphries, Deaf in America (1988); S. Burch, "Deaf Poets' Society: Subverting the Hearing Paradigm," Literature and Medicine 16 (1997); B. Brueggemann, Lend Me Your Ear: Rhetorical Constructions of Deafness (1999); Signing the Body Poetic: Essays on American Sign Language Literature, ed. H. Bauman, J. Nelson, and H. Rose (2006); Signs and Voices: Deaf Culture, Identity, Language, and Arts, ed. K. Lindgren, D. DeLuca, and D. Napoli (2008).

C. Krentz

AMERIND POETRY. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

AMHARIC POETRY. See ETHIOPIA, POETRY OF.

AMPHIBRACH (Gr., "short at both ends"). In *classical prosody, a metrical sequence consisting of a long syllable preceded and followed by a short one. The amphibrach is rare in cl. poetry either as an independent unit or as a continuous meter and equally a rarity in the accentually based prosodies of mod. langs., suggesting it may not exist except as an experiment. Amphibrachic word shapes (a stress flanked by slacks) are easy to finger, esp. polysyllables formed of a monosyllabic prefix + base + suffix (e.g., inspection, romantic); but the amphibrach as a meter risks monotony and is very rare. Lord Byron tried it ("The black bands came over"); J. W. Goethe, Friedrich von Matthisson, and Ernst Moritz Arndt wrote a number of poems in amphibrachs in Ger. In running series with ambiguous ends, amphibrachic lines would be nearly impossible to differentiate from other ternary ones such as dactylic or anapestic.

See BINARY AND TERNARY.

T.V.F. Brogan

AMPLIFICATION. An ambiguous term, perhaps best avoided in lit. crit., which seeks to distinguish rather than to confuse rhetorical taxonomy. In cl. rhet., amplification is one of the "special" topics used in *epideictic poetry or ceremonial discourse, usually for praise, but it has been used to refer to both the expansion and the diminution of an idea or argument. Its hist. in rhetorical theory and practice helps explain how amplification came to be regarded, at different periods, as a subset of both inventio and dispositio. Aristotle in the Poetics mentions "maximizing and minimizing" as important elements of thought (i.e., rhet.), but in the Rhetoric (2.26.1), he contrasts amplification and depreciation, while admitting that both derive from "enthymemes which serve to show how a thing is great or small." It was Cicero (De oratore 3.26) who introduced the confusion between amplification and attenuation by saying that the "highest distinction of eloquence consists in amplification by means of ornament, which can be used to make one's speech not only increase the importance of a subject and raise it to a higher level, but also to diminish and disparage it." Quintilian (Institutio oratoria 8.4.3) increased the confusion, presenting amplification as a species of inventio, when he spoke of four principal means of amplification: augmentation (incrementum), comparison, reasoning, and accumulation (congeries). Quoting from Cicero, Quintilian (8.4.4) gives as an example of amplification the following climax: "It is a sin to bind a Roman citizen, a crime to scourge him, little short of the most unnatural murder to put him to death; what then shall I call his crucifixion?" Murphy has shown how the confusion spread in med. rhet., which fused inventio and dispositio, when amplification, referred to variously as a set of eight or ten figures valuable to those writing sermons, speeches, or letters, becomes at the same time a figure and not a figure, a set of figures, and an arrangement of figures. Eng. Ren. rhetoricians perpetuated the confusion, supplying different totals for the rhetorical phenomena grouped under the general heading "amplification" from 17 (Richard Sherry, 1555), to 64 (Henry Peacham, 1577), to 11 (John Hoskins, 1599). Perelman remarks that ancient writers (e.g., Quintilian 3.8.6.73) tended to see both amplification and attenuation as varieties of *hyperbole. Corbett calls amplification "a way of reminding audiences of the importance or cogency or superiority of our points."

Amplification may be obtained by enumeration and *parallelism, as in Othello's speech, when he has just realized that Desdemona is innocent: "Whip me, ye devils, / From the possession of this heavenly sight! / Blow me about in winds! Roast me in sulphur! / Wash me in steep-down gulfs of liquid fire! / O Desdemona! Desdemona! dead!" (5.2.276–80). Or if amplification means the devel. of a single principle, idea, or word, an entire poem may be structured by amplification, e.g., Dylan Thomas's "The Hand That Signed the Paper."

The confusion remains to be sorted out. If kept, the term amplification should be defined precisely and used with care; its limits become clear only when a text signals by some other means (semantic: change of subject; syntactic: end of stanza or poem; pragmatic: change of *voice, person, or form of *address) a change of direction.

■ W. G. Crane, Wit and Rhetoric in the Renaissance (1937); W. Taylor, A Dictionary of the Tudor Figures of Rhetoric (1937); C. Perelman and L. Olbrechts-Tytecha, The New Rhetoric, trans. J. Wilkinson and P. Weaver (1969); Murphy; Corbett; Lausberg.

A. W. Halsall; T.V.F. Brogan

ANACLASIS (Gr., "bending back"). Transposition of short and long positions within a *metron or *colon. The best known anaclast is the *anacreontic, which is an *ionic dimeter with a transposition of the fourth and fifth positions (⏑ ⏑ – – ⏑ ⏑ – – becomes ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – –). West regards this as something like mod. musical *syncopation, in which maintaining the time values is sufficient for keeping the same rhythm.

■ Maas; Koster; Halporn et al.; West.

J. W. Halporn

ANACOLUTHON (Gr., "wanting sequence"). A term of grammar designating a change of construction in the middle of a sentence that leaves its beginning uncompleted. In rhet., however, anacoluthon has been treated as a figure, a natural and often effective mode of expression in spoken discourse. Hervey cites Matt. 7:9, which runs, in the Authorized Version, "Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?" Shakespeare sometimes shows depth of feeling in his characters by this means, as at Henry V 4.3.34–36, where the king says: "Rather proclaim it, Westmoreland, through my host, / That he which hath no stomach to this fight, / Let him depart." Lausberg finds the commonest form of anacoluthon to be the so-called absolute nominative (as in the Shakespeare above).

Related to anacoluthon is the absence of the second of a pair of correlative expressions, which is known as particula pendens when it has to do with correlative particles (e.g., "either . . . or," "both . . . and"), otherwise by the related term anapodoton (Gr., "wanting the apodosis," i.e., the main clause in a conditional sentence). Ernesti cites the authority of a Scholiast on Thucydides 3.3; the passage goes, "If the attempt succeeds," the understood but unexpressed apodosis being, "it will be well"; so also Lausberg. Anapodoton includes a subset called anantapodoton, in which even the subordinate clause is incomplete.

Group μ classifies anacoluthon among "metataxes" that act on the form of sentences by focusing on syntax. Like *syllepsis, which includes "any rhetorical omission relating to the rules of agreement between morphemes and syntagms, whether it is agreement of gender, number, person, or tense," anacoluthon produces through bifurcation a break in sentence structure. Mod. poetry's frequent suppression of *punctuation removed anacoluthon from the list of taboo figures drawn up by prescriptive rhetoricians. The deletion of punctuation produces rhetorical effects by combining in a single utterance large numbers of agrammatical or potentially incoherent units of discourse. Much poetry after about 1950 draws on anacoluthon for diverse effects, incl. the late poetry of Paul Celan reflecting on human suffering (e.g., Fadensonnen [Threadsuns], 1968); John Ashbery's plain-lang. meditations on being and becoming; and the verbal artist Kenneth Goldsmith's transcriptive work (e.g., Fidget, 2000).

■ C. T. Ernesti, Lexicon technologiae graecorum rhetoricae (1795); H. Bahrs, Die Anacoluthe bei Shake- speare (1893); G. W. Hervey, Christian Rhetoric (1973); Group μ; L. Edelman, Transmemberment of Song (1987); N. E. Enkvist, "A Note on the Definition and Description of True Anacolutha," On Language: Rhetorica, Phonologica, Syntactica, ed. C. Duncan-Rose, C. Vennemann, T. Vennemann (1988); E. Bloch, "Spoken and Written Syntax: Anacoluthon," Literary Essays, trans. A. Joron et al. (1998); Lausberg; Morier.

H. Brown; A.W. Halsall

ANACREONTIC. The term anacreontic denotes both a *meter and a literary mode. The anacreontic meter (anaclasts: ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – – or hemiambs: x – ⏑ – ⏑ – x) is named after the ancient Gr. poet Anacreon of Teos (6th c. BCE), who used it frequently in his verses. The meter was not originally associated with a particular mood: thus, Aeschylus used anacreontics in an emotional graveside speech (Choephoroi 327–30), while Euripides included them in his satyr play Cyclops (495–500). But by 250 BCE, Anacreon was best known for his sympotic verses, and the meter accordingly was associated with youthful hedonism and a carpe diem theme. At about this time, anonymous poets started to write in imitation of Anacreon; these Anacreontea were later preserved in one 10th-c. ms. The collection consists of 60 short poems in anacreontic meter on topics of love, wine, and song, composed over a span of 600 years, from the Hellenistic well into the Byzantine era. Lat. poets also experimented with anacreontic meter on different themes (e.g., Hadrian, Boethius); Christian bishops even wrote anacreontic religious *hymns (e.g., Gregory of Nazianzus, Synesius of Cyrene). But it was the Gr. imitative Anacreontea that most strongly influenced early mod. and later Eur. poets.

In 1554, Henricus Stephanus (Henri Estienne), convinced that the recently rediscovered collection was genuinely archaic, published the Anacreontea to great public acclaim. In Paris, Pierre de Ronsard enthused about the recovery of "du vieil Anacréon perdu / La douce lyre Teienne." In Italy, Torquato Tasso was an early admirer, as were the Eng. poets Robert Herrick and Abraham Cowley. For the next three centuries, the Anacreontea were read as archaic artifacts, inspiring trans. and imitators across Europe. J. W. Goethe wrote an elegiac "Anakreons Grab," while Lord Byron teased the Ir. poet Thomas Moore for his devotion to the anacreontic mode. Eur. poets reveal a remarkable consistency in tone and theme, inspired by what Voltaire approvingly called "ces riens naifs et pleins de grace." By the mid-19th c., however, mod. philology had condemned the Anacreontea as products of the postclassical age and removed them from the canon of great lit. With this reclassification came a rejection of their poetic quality: the Ger. philologist Ulrich von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff found them tasteless compared to the "pure Hellenic wine" of the archaic period. Only in the late 20th c. was the collection recognized by scholars as a worthy mode of poetry in its own right.

■ H. Zeman, Die deutsche Anakreontische Dichtung (1972); M. Baumann, Die Anakreonteen in englischen Übersetzungen (1974); G. Braden, The Classics and English Renaissance Poetry (1978); M. Brioso-Sánchez, Anacreónticas (1981); J. Labarbe, "Un curieux phénomène littéraire, l'anacréontisme," Bulletin de la Classe des Lettres de l'Académie Royale de Belgique 68 (1982); M. L. West, Carmina Anacreontea (1984) and "The Anacreontea," Sympotica, ed. O. Murray (1990); P. A. Rosenmeyer, The Poetics of Imitation (1992) and "Greek Lyric Poetry in the French Renaissance," The Classical Heritage in France, ed. G. Sandy (2002); F. Budelmann, "Anacreon and the Anacreontea," Cambridge Companion to Greek Lyric, ed. F. Budelmann (2009).

P. A. Rosenmeyer

ANACRUSIS (Gr., "the striking up of a tune"; Ger. Auftakt, "upbeat"). One or more extrametrical syllables at the beginning of a line, normally unstressed. Procephalous would be a more accurate and better attested descriptor. Anacrusis was adopted by the 18th-c. cl. scholar Richard Bentley in principle and then by Gottfried Hermann in fact, as well as by most of his Ger. successors in the 19th c., who extended the principles they discovered in the quantitative prosodies of cl. verse to the analysis of the accentual prosodies of the mod. vernaculars without due consideration of the systemic differences between the two systems. In mod. times, anacrusis has been posited on the analogy with music, where extra notes can precede the first bar of the melody without objection. Some temporal and musical theories of meter (e.g., Joshua Steele, Andreas Heusler) treat verse lines as if they were set to music, i.e., as if stresses began bars, so that all unstressed syllables that precede the first stress—e.g., the first syllable in the iambic pentameter line—are instances of anacrusis. Outside of such theories, now generally outmoded, and outside of song meters themselves, anacrusis is rare, though indisputable cases do exist, as in Shakespeare. The old belief that anacrusis could alter rising rhythms to falling, or vice versa, is discredited; and seeming instances of anacrusis often disappear under careful attention to measures. In these two lines from William Blake's "The Tyger," for example—"When the stars threw down their spears / And watered heaven with their tears"—one might take "And" to be an anacrusis, noticing that the seven syllables that follow would then be identical in pattern to the seven in the preceding line. But in fact, it is the second line that is regular (an iambic tetrameter); the preceding line is headless (see ACEPHALOUS), and this type of rhythm—called "8s and 7s"—is fairly common in mod. Eng. verse.

OE verse seems to include anacrusis as part of the metrical system—it is a component of the analyses of Sievers, Pope, and Cable—but then poetry in Anglo-Saxon England was perhaps recited to the accompaniment of a harp.

See HYPERMETRIC.

■ Schipper 3.950 (index); Sievers; N. A. Bonavia-Hunt, Horace the Minstrel (1954); J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of "Beowulf," 2d ed. (1966); Dale; T. Cable, The Meter and Melody of "Beowulf" (1974), ch. 3; Morier; P. Bethel, "Notes on the Incidence and Type of Anacrusis in Genesis B: Similarities to and Differences from Anacrusis Elsewhere in OE and OS," Parergon 2 (1984), and "Anacrusis in the Psalms of the Paris Psalter," NM 89 (1988); S. Suzuki, "Anacrusis in the Meter of Beowulf," SP 92 (1995), and "Anacrusis in the Meter of Heliand," Interdigitations, ed. G. F. Carr, W. Harbert, and L. Zhang (1999).

R. J. Getty; T.V.F. Brogan

ANADIPLOSIS, also epanadiplosis (Gr., "doubled back"). In cl. rhet., a figure of word *repetition that links two phrases, clauses, lines, or stanzas by repeating the word at the end of the first one at the beginning of the second: "The crime was common, common be the pain" (Alexander Pope, "Eloisa to Abelard"); "More safe I Sing with mortal voice, unchang'd / To hoarse or mute, though fall'n on evil dayes, / On evil dayes though fall'n, and evil tongues" (John Milton, Paradise Lost 7.24–26). Sometimes more than one word repeats: "When I give I give myself" (Walt Whitman, "Song of Myself"). As such, anadiplosis is the mechanism of *concatenation and is the usual vehicle for the rhetorical strategy of *climax. It can also be used to link speeches in drama, the second character picking up the train of thought of the first from his or her last word:

> Othello: What dost thou think?
> Iago: Think, my lord?
> Othello: Think, my lord? By heaven he echoes me.
> (3.3.104–07)

Among the Ren. sonneteers, the use of anadiplosis both within the sonnet and to link sonnets together was common practice—visible in Petrarch, Torquato Tasso, Pierre de Ronsard, Joachim du Bellay, Philip Sidney, Samuel Daniel, and many others—Shakespeare showing rather less interest in such effects than most. But Shakespeare's sonnet 129 has "On purpose laid to make the taker mad. / Mad in pursuit and in possession so" (8–9). Anadiplosis fixed at the level of the line and adapted into prosody as a figure of rhyme was practiced by the rhétoriqueurs*, who called it rime annexée and rime fratrisée.

See chain rhyme.

■ Patterson; M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982); Vickers; Corbett.

T.V.F. Brogan

ANAGRAM. The rearrangement of the letters of a word or phrase to produce another word or phrase. Many critics have denigrated the anagram, often forcefully, along with other forms of graphic play such as the *acrostic, the *palindrome, *paronomasia, *concrete poetry, and the *calligramme. In Spectator no. 60 (May 9, 1711), Joseph Addison remarks, "The Acrostick was probably invented about the same Time with the Anagram, tho' it is impossible to decide whether the Inventor of the one or the other were the greater Blockhead." John Dryden banishes Thomas Shadwell to "acrostic land" in "MacFlecknoe." The Greek Anthology*, which is the locus classicus of such types of verse, has often been ridiculed in the same way, esp. by Eng. critics.

The anagram is part of a larger trad. in which writers—esp. poets—play with the graphic elements of alphabetic writing in ways that undermine assumptions about the relationship between writing and speech. It foregrounds semantic functions of writing that cannot be easily explained if writing is viewed merely as a visual substitute for speech. Like other forms of graphic play, the anagram creates an order of signification in a text that frequently cannot be perceived aurally but must be construed on the page. It thus suggests that the relationship between phonetic writing and speech is not mere transcription; anagram and other forms of graphic play create realms of meaning that have a far more complex relationship with speech.

Not all writers have been hostile to the anagrammatic trad. As Vendler, Ricks, Winnick, and others have shown, the golden age of the anagram in Eng. was probably the late 16th and 17th cs., with a particular emphasis on onomastic anagrams. Winnick argues that "English interest in onomastic anagrams, especially in court circles, reached a level of intensity . . . that rivaled and would later surpass sonnet mania." Thus, each text in Mary Fage's Fame's Roll (of Brit. royalty and nobility; 1637) is prefaced by the name of its subject and by an anagram of it ("THOMAS HOWARD / ; / ; OH, DRAW MOST, HA!"). Winnick argues that Shakespeare hides the name of the Fair Friend of the sonnets—Henry Wriothesley, third Earl of Southampton and Baron of Titchfield (1573–1624), who was at one time the poet's patron—throughout that work in more than a dozen direct and broken, or dispersed, anagrams.

In the 20th c., ling. and literary theories of the anagram and other elements of graphic play began to take such forms more seriously. Anagrams have been conceived as substantive components of poetic discourse occurring in a number of poetic trads. This view originates with the partial publication in the 1960s of Ferdinand de Saussure's notebooks (for 1906–9) containing his research on anagrams. Saussure studied sound structures in texts of various provenance, incl. IE poetry, Lat. poetry (*Saturnian verse), such authors as Virgil and Lucretius, and Vedic hymns. In the Saussurean model, the functioning of the anagram presupposes both a poet capable of sophisticated operations on verbal material and a reader able to recognize the presence of the anagram and to reconstitute the hidden whole. For a time, Saussure regarded the anagram as a fundamental principle of IE poetry; subsequently, however, he came to question both his methodology and his conclusions, in part because there is no explicit testimony by ancient authors about such widespread use of the anagram.

Saussure's ideas have been further developed by both linguists and literary theorists. From one strand of ling. has come added evidence concerning the principle of word analysis in the IE poetic trad. (e.g., in archaic Ir. verse). In the work of linguists and anthropologists who focus on the devel. of phonetic writing systems, questions of graphic organization have stimulated a deeper look at the nature of the sound-writing-meaning nexus in poetry. This has led some researchers to emphasize the anagram as a phenomenon that semanticizes elements of the lowest levels of the text, i.e., individual syllables and even letters, independent of their placement in particular words or syntactical structures. New evidence concerning the presence of anagrams in the work of mod. poets has been produced by members of the Moscow-Tartu school (see STRUCTURALISM).

Linguists and literary scholars interested in the devel. of writing systems and their use in art have compiled new anthols. of pattern poetry (Higgins) and theories of the physical aspects of texts (Levenston). Of particular note are the collections ed. by Senner and Daniels and Bright, along with books by Houston and esp. the work of the Eng. linguist Harris, who has argued that all writing systems have a wide range of signifying modes in addition to the transcription of speech. In this model, an anagram is a graphic rearrangement that takes advantage of ways that written signs can be manipulated without regard for aurality, let alone syntax. The undeniable existence of such phenomena suggests that the nonsyntactical dimension of graphic systems is powerfully present in all written poetry, even that composed in phonetic systems.

Future research will involve exploring such questions as (1) the conditions under which semantic information overflows onto the lower levels of the text, increasing the interconnections between formally discrete elements; (2) the genres in which anagrams are most likely to arise; and (3) the relation of anagrams and other forms of graphic playfulness to natural speech.

■ H. B. Wheatley, Of Anagrams (1862); P. Habermann, "Anagram," Reallexikon II; A. Liede, Dichtung als Spiel, 2 v. (1963); P. Wunderli, Ferdinand de Saussure und die Anagramme (1972); M. Meylakh, "À propos de anagrammes," L'Homme 16 (1976); V. V. Ivanov, "Ob anagrammax F. de Sossjura," F. de Saussure, Trudy po jazykoznaniju (1977); A. L. Johnson, "Anagrammatism in Poetry," PTL 2 (1977); S. Baevskij and A. D. Koševlev, "Poetika Bloka: anagrammy," Blokovskijsbornik 3 (1979); J. Starobinski, Words upon Words: The Anagrams of Ferdinand de Saussure, trans. O. Emmet (1979); S. C. Hunter, Dictionary of Anagrams (1982); D. Shepheard, "Saussure's Vedic Anagrams," MLR 77 (1982); R. Harris, The Origin of Writing (1986); D. Higgins, Pattern Poetry (1987); V. N. Toporov, "Kissledovaniju anagrammaticheskix struktur (analizy)," Issledovanija po structure teksta, ed. T. V. Civ'jan (1987); The Origins of Writing, ed. W. M. Senner (1989); Ocherki istorii jazyka russkoj poezii XX: Veka. Poeticheskij jazyk I idiostil. Obshchie voprosy, Zvukovaja organizacija teksta, ed. V. P. Grigorev (1990); E. A. Levenston, The Stuff of Literature (1992); R. Harris, Signs of Writing (1995); The World's Writing Systems, ed. P. T. Daniels and W. Bright (1996); H. Vendler, The Art of Shakespeare's Sonnets (1997); R. Harris, Rethinking Writing (2000); T. Augarde, Oxford Guide to Word Games, 2d ed. (2003); C. Ricks, "Shakespeare and the Anagram," PBA 121 (2003); S. D. Houston, The First Writing (2004); R. H. Winnick, " 'Loe, here in one line is his name twice writ': Anagrams, Shakespeare's Sonnets and the Identity of the Fair Friend," Literary Imagination 11 (2009); F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics, ed. C. Bally and A. Sechehaye, trans. W. Baskin (1959; rpt. 2011).

H. BARAN; D. J. ROTHMAN

ANALOGY. See METAPHOR; SIMILE; SYMBOL.

ANAPEST, anapaest (Gr.; of uncertain meaning, perhaps "beaten back," i.e., a reversed *dactyl). In the quantitative meters of cl. poetry, a metrical foot of two short syllables followed by one long (⏑ ⏑ –, e.g., dĕĭtās), or, in verse-systems based on accent, two unstressed syllables followed by one stressed (x x /, e.g., interrupt). In Gr., the anapest usually appears as a *dipody or *metron with the form ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – . The metron shows total equivalence of single longs and double shorts, unique in Gr.; consequently, in the dimeter (the commonest form), there is usually diaeresis between metra. Anapests were used first as a warlike marching rhythm, then later in Gr. drama as a song meter, both purely, as in the choruses of tragedy and comedy, commonly anapestic *tetrameter catalectic, and in combination with other meters. Runs of anapests are often closed with a catalectic *dimeter or *paroemiac. With the Romans, the single foot replaced the metron as the unit of measure. Plautus made wide use of anapests, esp. in four-foot units (anapestic quaternarii), and acatalectic and catalectic eight-foot units (anapestic septenarii and octonarii). Seneca, however, uses anapests in the Gr. manner (i.e., in metra, not feet) in his tragedies, as anapaestic dimeters, a form used later by Boethius and Prudentius.

In the accentual prosodies of the Ren. and after, the anapest was used in Eng. mainly for popular verse until the beginning of the 18th c.; serious anapestic poems were later written by William Cowper, Walter Scott, Lord Byron, Robert Browning ("How They Brought the Good News"), William Morris, and esp. A. C. Swinburne, who used it in lines of every possible length ("Dolores"). Contemp. poets like Annie Finch have revived interest in anapests and other triple meters as alternatives to canonical iambic meters; they have also challenged common conceptions of anapests as limited to humorous verse (e.g., the *limerick); to depicting mimetic action (typically, hurried motion), e.g., "The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold" (Byron, "The Destruction of Sennacherib"); or to conveying excitement, or less frequently, mourning (Matthew Arnold's "Rugby Chapel"). Nonetheless, pure anapests remain comparatively rare in Eng. and can be difficult to distinguish in running series both from other triple meters such as dactylic and *amphibrachic or from some loose duple meters with extensive trisyllabic substitutions, although prosodists have proposed promising solutions to some of these descriptive problems.

See CLASSICAL PROSODY.

■ A. Raabe, De metrorum anapaesticorum apud poetas Graecos usu (1912); J. W. White, The Verse of Greek Comedy (1912); Hardie, chap. 4; Wilamowitz, pt. 2, chap. 11; Koster, chap. 7; Crusius; C. Questa, Introduzione alle metrica de Plauto (1967); Dale, chap. 4; D. Korzeniewski, Griechische Metrik (1968); D. Hascall, "Triple Meter in English," Poetics 12 (1974); Halporn et al.; Snell, 30 ff.; West, passim; J. G. Fitch, Seneca's Anapaests (1987); K. Hanson, "English Iambic-Anapestic Meter," "Resolution in Modern Meters" (diss., Stanford University, 1991); A. Finch, "Metrical Diversity," Meter in English, ed. D. Baker (1996); T. Steele, All The Fun's In How You Say a Thing (1999); C. Hartman, "Anapestics," Finch and Varnes; N. Fabb and M. Halle, The Meter of a Poem (2008).

D. S. PARKER; J. W. HALPORN; T.V.F. BROGAN; N. GERBER

ANAPHORA (Gr., "a carrying up or back"). Anaphora (or epanaphora) is the *repetition of the same word or words at the beginning of successive phrases, clauses, sentences, or lines. Epistrophe (also epiphora or antistrophe*) reverses the figure, repeating words at the ends of poetic units; anaphora and epistrophe combine in symploce. In epanalepsis*, the same word is repeated at the beginning and end of phrases, clauses, or lines. Duplicating the end of one clause or line at the beginning of the next is anadiplosis*. (In ling., anaphora refers to a grammatical system of reference; in musicology, anaphora can be used to discuss the rhetorical and poetic effects described above but also names a part of the Christian liturgical service, or music composed to accompany those rites.)

Because it consists of simple repetition, anaphora is a versatile, translatable, and ubiquitous poetic tool: present in the Epic of Gilgamesh and the fragments of Sappho; noted by cl. rhetoricians such as Demetrius, Alexander, and Longinus; dominating sections of the Bible and Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella; and figuring prominently in the work of 20th-c. poets such as H.D., André Breton, Attila József, Allen Ginsberg, and T. S. Eliot, whose "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" contains anaphora, epistrophe, symploce, and a loose form of epanalepsis.

Anaphora can serve as the main structuring element of *free verse, as in the poetry of Walt Whitman, but it also fits into closed forms (for anaphora in *sonnets, see E. B. Browning's "The Ways of Love" and Bartholomew Griffin's "Most true that I must fair Fidessa love," the latter demonstrating perfect symploce). However, anaphora neither results from nor signifies any poetic stricture; free verse featuring anaphora is still free verse. Anaphora spans generic boundaries as well as formal ones, as it is often used in political and religious rhet. to build cohesion or emphasis (see M. L. King Jr.'s "I have a dream" speech or Winston Churchill's "We shall fight on the beaches"). The natural sound of anaphora—which could plausibly occur spontaneously and unremarkably in speech—may account for its flexibility.

The seemingly straightforward repetitions of anaphora and its related figures can produce contradictory and complicated poetic effects: the devices can both accentuate and undercut a point, can produce both momentum and stasis. W. H. Auden's use of anaphora goes beyond simple adductive emphasis to unpack the contradictory connotations of a repeated word ("Law Like Love") or track a shifting political ideology ("Spain"). In such nuanced uses of anaphora, repetition compels continual reassessment of the repeated terms.

Whereas some poetic devices (meter, slant rhyme) may become apparent only on close or repeated readings, anaphora thrusts itself into the reader's attention: each line begins with an unmistakable reminder of the unfolding pattern. Thus, anaphora highlights poetic lines as discrete units while simultaneously binding those lines together.

Perhaps because of its ubiquity, natural sound, or ostensible simplicity, the definitive critical hist. of anaphora remains to be written; the device is often noted rather than examined.

See CHANT, HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS.

■ M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); Vickers, Defence; D.A.H. Elworthy, "A Theory of Anaphoric Information," Linguistics and Philosophy 18 (1995).

J. WEARE

ANCEPS (syllaba, brevis in longo) (Lat., "indeterminate"). A Neo-Lat. term widely used to designate three different metrical phenomena. (1) Syllabic or "prosodic" anceps—i.e., fluctuation in quantity created by the existence of a variable syllable boundary. The word agro, e.g., may begin with either a short or a long, depending on whether its initial syllable is open (a-gro) or closed (ag-ro). For anceps in this sense, the preferred term is "common" (Gr. koiné; Lat. communis). (2) "Final" anceps—at the end of a line or stanza, a syllable that may be either long or short, which the ancients referred to as the syllaba indifferens (Gr. adiáphoros). The pause that ensues at this point allows or requires lengthening of the syllable immediately preceding; and since almost all verses and stanzas end at a point where the metrical pattern itself either allows or requires a long, the normal quantity of a syllable becomes metrically "indifferent" when it appears in a final position—i.e., it makes no difference whether the poet decides to use a long or a short there. A normally short syllable that has undergone final lengthening in sense 2 may be called final anceps, but it is more frequently and correctly referred to as (syllaba) brevis in (elemento) longo, a phrase coined by Maas. (3) Anceps positions—any position in the metrical pattern that permits either a long or a short syllable. This is simply to say that some positions in the meter are not important to perception of the pattern, hence are not regulated strictly. Mod. usage of the term anceps tends to be restricted to sense 3 and to insist, correctly, that it is not the syllable that is anceps but the position in the metrical pattern it fills. The ancients sometimes regarded long syllables in these positions as "irrational" (Gr. alogos)—shorter than normal longs by some indeterminate amount. Double anceps at the beginning of the line is referred to as "aeolic base."

See AEOLIC.

■ Maas; L. E. Rossi, "Anceps: Vocale, Sillaba, Elemento," Rivista di filologia e di istruzione classica 91 (1963); A. M. Dale, Collected Papers (1969); Snell; M. L. West, "Three Topics in Greek Metre," CQ 32 (1982).

A. T. COLE

ANECDOTE (Gr. anekdota, "unpublished things"). A short narrative of a single incident, usually drawn from everyday life. The word entered the mod. Eur. langs. in the 17th c. with the discovery and publication of Procopius's Anecdota, a scandalous hist. of the Justinian court. The word anecdote originally referred to an episode in one of the many "secret histories" that were subsequently modeled on the Anecdota. These were historical or pseudo-historical works that collected accounts of the private lives of the powerful and famous. Over the 18th c., however, the word anecdote began to denote a brief narrative of an inconsequential but interesting event.

In its latter instance, the anecdote was associated with conversational speech and historical, journalistic, and biographical prose. Poets began to make conscious use of the anecdote as neoclassical strictures for writing poetry (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS) began to break down under *romanticism. Anecdotal poetry was considered to be closer to ordinary lang. and the texture of ordinary life. William Wordsworth published "Anecdote for Fathers" in the first ed. of the highly anecdotal Lyrical Ballads (1798) and interpolated many anecdotes throughout The Prelude and The Excursion.

The anecdote continued to structure much later poetry. In particular, several avant-garde poets have experimented with anecdotal form (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS). Stéphane Mallarmé titled one section of his Divagations "Anecdotes ou Poèmes." These *prose poems straddle the boundary between *lyric and *narrative poetry, as well as the boundary between poetry and prose. Wallace Stevens was captivated with the anecdote, making innovative use of the form and using the word anecdote itself in the title of several poems, e.g., "Anecdote of the Jar," "Anecdote of Canna," and "Anecdote of the Prince of Peacocks." The anecdote continues to serve as an important template for mod. poetry.

■ K. Burke, A Grammar of Motives (1945); H. Grothe, Anekdote (1971); R. Schäfer, Die Anekdote: Theorie, Analyse, Didaktik (1982); J. Fineman, "History of the Anecdote: Fiction and Fiction," The New Historicism, ed. H. A. Veeser (1989); M.-P. Huglo, Métamorphoses de l'insignifiant: essai sur l'anecdote dans la modernité (1997); A. Liu, Local Transcendence: Essays on Postmodern Historicism and the Database (2008).

J. R. WOOD

ANTHEM, NATIONAL. Anthems are songs or other musical compositions that are performed (in most cases, sung) on ceremonial occasions to evoke collective feelings within a population. While many anthems are officially designated by governments, others are recognized by custom, and some nations, such as the U.S., have both a designated ("The Star-Spangled Banner") and an unofficial ("God Bless America") anthem. The official character of most anthems allows that, where they have words, these reflect the langs. of the relevant society: "O Canada" has lyrics in both Fr. and Eng., while the "Schweizerpsalm" (Swiss Psalm) includes versions in the four langs. of Switzerland (Swiss Ger., It., Fr., and Romansh); and South Africa's anthem (based on the Xhosa hymn "Nkosi sikelel' iAfrika" as well as the Afrikaans "Die Stem van Suid-Afrika") is thoroughly macaronic (see MACARONIC VERSE), employing five of the nation's 11 official langs. (besides the aforementioned two, Zulu, Sesotho, and Eng.).

Many national and other political (as opposed to ecclesiastical) anthems appeared between the early mod. period and the 19th c. While the term anthem—derived from the Grk. antiphōna and the OE antefn—had been used for church music (e.g., by the Eng. composers Thomas Tallis [ca. 1505–85] and Henry Purcell [ca. 1569–95]), the dominant mod., international sense of the term involves the use of song as a vehicle for nationalism or other collective ideologies (incl. religion but usually political in some sense). Historically, national anthems were both a product and a mirror of the process through which nation-states were built. The oldest known national anthem, the 1568 Dutch hymn "Het Wilhelmus," was written during the struggle for independence in the Netherlands, establishing a precedent for the adoption of a national song on the achievement of independence (the Turkish "İstiklâl Marşı"), revolution (the Fr. "Marseillaise"), or triumph after political crisis (the Brit. "God Save the King"). Many national anthems were originally written as patriotic poems that were later set to music; others were written by poets commissioned with the specific task of creating a national song.

However unique the national hists. these anthems obliquely celebrate, the poetic results are surprisingly similar; one anthem bears great likeness to the next. Anthems are almost always marches or hymns, although some take the form of folk songs, fanfares, and opera. They sing the praises of the fatherland in quasi-sacred terms and memorialize the mythical battles of forefathers, celebrating the holy connection between nation, hist., and individual. Historical particularities are routinely glossed over by religious connotations; archaic or stylized lang.; and generalized eulogies to people, landscapes, and political symbols (notably the flag).

In most cases, what remains are textual and melodic documents of similar appearance and intent, where names of countries, heroes, and projected qualities are formally interchangeable. Indeed, if countries had not been named, we would have had a hard time guessing the provenance of individual anthems: "O Russia, forever you're a strong and sacred country"; "Our country's God, our country's God / We worship Thy name in its wonder sublime" (Iceland); "O! say does that star-spangled banner yet wave / O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave" (U.S.); "Norsemen, in house and cabin, / Thank your great God! / It was his Will to protect the country / Although things looked dark" (Norway).

Although the poetic text of national anthems is of minimal literary interest, the performative dimension of anthems is noteworthy. Anthems are performed in a variety of contexts: as marching songs for the military; as a form of collective ritualism at sporting events; as the symbolic opening of the school day; as a provider of ambience at political rallies; and in celebration of newly created nation-states or nation-states in the making. Spectators at these events are called on to participate in a national monument through collective song, and singing, unlike many other symbolic representations of nationalism, is participatory—"active" rather than "passive." Thus, as participants engage with the anthem, the imagined national community becomes present in the shape of the choir, the gathering, and the audience. In the harmonious interaction between these groups, they come to represent and embody the unity of the people, galvanizing the gathering in a sense of national identity.

As the symbolic embodiment of the collective past, present, and future of a nation, anthems have become closely tied to the politics of national identity in the changing global sphere. National anthems are, consequently, politically charged and fluid texts: the Brit. anthem "God Save the King" has been variously adopted and then discarded by Commonwealth countries that wished to distance themselves from their colonial pasts; Russia has changed its anthem more times than any country in the world, a direct symptom of that country's tumultuous hist. of political redefinition; and Taiwanese Olympic athletes march to "The Banner Song" of Chinese Taipei, rather than "San Min Chu-I," because of their country's disputed independence. Supranational anthems, such as the instrumental "Anthem of Europe," the African Union's "Let Us All Unite and Celebrate Together," the "Olympic Hymn," and the "Hymn to the United Nations" represent recent devels. in the form. Thus, if the adoption of an anthem is a politically symbolic act, contemp. anthems indicate a global trend toward internationalization.

■ B. Anderson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism, rev. ed. (1991); The Invention of Tradition, ed. E. Hobsbawm and T. Ranger (1983); D. A. Kertzer, Ritual, Politics and Power (1988); A. Smith, National Identity (1991); M. Billig, Banal Nationalism (1995); U. Hedetoft, Signs of Nations (1995); National Anthems of the World, ed. M. J. Bristow, 11th ed. (2006)—lyrics and scores; The Cambridge Handbook of Sociocultural Psychology, ed. J. Valsiner and A. Rosa (2007); S. L. Redmond, "Citizens of Sound: Negotiations of Race and Diaspora in the Anthems of the UNIA and NAACP," African and Black Diaspora 4 (2011).

U. Hedetoft

ANTHIMERIA (Gr., "one part for another"). The use of one part of speech for another. William Shakespeare, who seems to have coined more than a thousand new words, uses anthimeria as one of his chief strategies; examples include "A mile before his tent fall down and knee / The way into his mercy" (Coriolanus 5.1.5), "And I come coffin'd home" (Cor 2.1.193), and "Lord Angelo dukes it well" (Measure for Measure 3.2.100). He esp. develops the use of nouns, pronouns, and adjectives as verbs, securing thereby the greater energy that verb forms convey. But no Eng. poet used this figure more than John Milton, many of whose examples suggest he found it effective for securing compression of meaning (Havens). In Paradise Lost, examples include "May serve to better us and worse our foes" (6.440; adjective for verb) and "sea-monsters tempest the ocean" (7.412; noun for verb); chaos is described as "the palpable obscure" and "the vast abrupt," while the sky is "Heaven's azure" (adjective for noun). In mod. poetry, even more transferences have been made by e. e. cummings, many of whose anthimerias are famous, e.g., "he sang his didn't he danced his did" and "anyone lived in a pretty how town." In grammar, the gerund, a verb form serving the syntactic function of a noun, is the same kind of word-class transfer.

■ R. D. Havens, The Influence of Milton on English Poetry (1922); M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982); Corbett, 449.

T.V.F. Brogan

ANTHOLOGY

I. Classical
II. Medieval to Contemporary

I. Classical. Anthology (Gr. anthologion, "a gathering of flowers"; Lat. florilegium) refers to a collection of short poems or literary passages drawn from multiple authors. It is first attested in the Byzantine lexicon called the Suda (10th CE) and is now applied to several literary collections that have reached us in ms. The idea underlying the term is selection of what is useful or beautiful.

The word anthologion has a long devel. in Gr. thought. The image of poetry as flowers is as old as Sappho (frag. 55), and Plato (Ion 534A–B) compares the poet to a bee collecting honey from the meadows of the Muses. For Isocrates (Ad Demonicum 51–52), the bee emblematizes someone who searches for knowledge by gathering the best passages from poets and philosophers. Plutarch (Moralia 41E–42A) articulates a distinction common in the imperial age between scholarly collectors, who, like bees, select only what is useful for learning, and literary eds. who, like garland-makers, choose the most beautiful poetic flowers for reading pleasure. Lucian (Piscator 6) hints at the coincidence between aesthetic and utilitarian anthols. by explaining that, while readers of philosophical extracts ostensibly praise the beelike collector, they in truth admire the authors who produced brilliantly colored flowers—if the collector knows how to select, intertwine, and harmonize so that no passage is out of tune with another (cf. Lucretius, De rerum natura 3.10–12).

Collections of the educational type, called gnomologia, began in the cl. period, and examples have been found on papyri of the Ptolemaic era. They typically present extracts on ethical themes, arranged by topic, and were often used in schools. The anthol. of literary passages and short poems made by Johannes Stobaeus to educate his son (5th c. CE) is the best extant example. The title Anthologiae for selections made from the astrological writings of Vettius Valens (2d c. CE) indicates that the idea of flower gathering was adapted to edited compilations of works by single authors (cf. Manetho, Apotelesmatica 5.6).

Ancient anthols. with aesthetic intentions often involve epigrams. Our best source for Gr. literary epigrams is the Greek Anthology—a mod. designation. The earliest discernible layer in this anthol. is formed by single-authored epigram collections of the early Hellenistic era, both scholarly eds. of such poets as Simonides and Anacreon and poetry books by such epigrammatists as Callimachus, Asclepiades, Anyte, Nossis, and Leonidas of Tarentum. The Milan Papyrus, which contains over 100 epigrams attributed to Posidippus, confirms the existence of epigram books by the late 3d c. BCE; its arrangement by epigram types with subheadings is an early example of the book divisions found in later anthols. The Yale papyrus codex containing about 60 fragmentary epigrams attributed to Palladas preserves a later single-authored collection (late 3d to early 4th c. CE). The first known epigram anthol. was the Stephanos (Garland) by Meleager of Gadara (ca. 100 BCE), who added over 100 of his own poems to at least four books of epigrams culled from earlier collections. In the *proem, Meleager presents himself as a garland-maker who has intertwined 48 epigrammatists, each identified with a plant or flower. In his own epigrams, Meleager is fond of mentioning flowers and garlands, which trope his complex arrangement of epigrams by different authors, organized into sequences by theme and often linked sequentially by verbal echoes. His anthol. provided the model for the Garland of Philip (late Julio-Claudian period, 1st c. CE), an alphabetically organized selection of early imperial epigrams, and the Cycle of Agathias, a thematically organized collection of 6th-c. CE epigrammatists. In the early 10th c., Constantine Cephalas assembled a massive compilation of ancient and Byzantine epigrams, derived not only from Meleager, Philip, and Agathias but from Diogenianus's Anthology of Epigrams (Hadrianic; the earliest usage of the title); Strato of Sardis's Mousa Paidike, consisting of pederastic epigrams (perhaps Hadrianic); and epigrams by Palladas. The books of Cephalas's anthol. were organized in part by major epigram types—erotic, dedicatory, sepulchral, and epideictic. Within these, the ed. attempted his own rather careless thematic arrangements, to which he added blocks of epigrams taken from earlier collections.

The Greek Anthology is based on two major mss. and a few minor sylloges, all derived from Cephalas's anthol. Sometime in the 10th c., the Cephalan collection was redacted into the Palatine Anthology of 15 books, which includes *epitaphs by Gregory of Nazianzus (4th c. CE). In 1301, Maximus Planudes produced another, shorter anthol. drawn from Cephalas, rearranged by topics into seven books with subsections. The Planudean Anthology, in Venice, preserves some epigrams lost from the Palatine Anthology, incl. ekphrastic epigrams confusingly printed as book 16 in mod. eds. Scholars were unaware of the Palatine Anthology until it was rediscovered in Heidelberg in 1606; astonishingly, it was known only in mss. descending from a bad copy made by the youthful Claude Saumaise until published by R.F.P. Brunck in 1772 and more accurately by Friedrich Jacobs from 1813 to 1817. The anthol. of Gr. epigrams that influenced the vernacular lits. of the early mod. era was the reduced version by Planudes.

The Latin Anthology (an 18th-c. title) is a mod. compilation of short Lat. poems of the imperial age in various meters. A number of partially overlapping mss. provide the poems for this anthol. The most important is the Codex Salmasianus (ca. 800 CE), which preserves material from Vandal Africa (5th–6th cs. CE), where there was a late flourishing of Lat. literary practice. In numbered sections probably representing different sources, this codex contains a large body of epigrams, incl. a sequence of 100 apparently by an unknown Af. author; Virgilian *centos, incl. a tragic Medea by Hosidius Geta (2d c. CE); other long poems, incl. the famed Pervigilium Veneris about a spring festival to Venus (perhaps 4th c. CE); epigrams ascribed to Seneca; extracts from Propertius, Ovid, and Martial; the Aenigmata of Symphosius (4th–5th c. CE?), consisting of 100 *riddles in three *hexameters supposedly composed at the Saturnalia; and a book of 90 epigrams in various meters by Luxorius of 6th-c. Carthage. The Af. epigrams on such topics as baths and circuses are of interest for the light they shed on Vandal society. Another ms., the Codex Vossianus (ca. 850), contains sequences of epigrams associated with the Neronian circle of Seneca and Petronius.

Early anthols. provide variable contexts for the extracts within them. Epigrams, e.g., may move from fixed inscriptional sites or single-authored collections to anthols., which are subject to repeated reselection and reordering over centuries. Each arrangement produces a different contextual reading and potentially a different understanding. In the right hands, the process of selecting and arranging can be a form of literary composition.

II. Medieval to Contemporary. Med. anthols. were created and preserved mainly by the clerical orders and survive in influential ms. collections such as the OE Proverbs of Alfred and the Eng. lyric collection called the Harley Manuscript (British Museum Ms. Harley 2253; ca. 1330); among other med. florilegia esp. notable are the Carmina Cantabrigiensia (Cambridge Songs; 11th c.) and the Carmina Burana (collected at the Ger. monastery at Benediktbeuren in Bavaria in the 13th c.; see GOLIARDIC VERSE). Ren. collections of *proverbs drew inspiration from Erasmus's Adagia (1500, often reprinted and expanded).

Anthols. took on new importance in the Ren. with a vogue inaugurated in England by the collection assembled by Richard Tottel and now called Tottel's Miscellany* (originally Songes and Sonettes, written by the ryght honorable Lorde Henry Haward late Earle of Surrey, and other, 1557; ed. H. R. Rollins, rev. ed., 2 v., 1965). After Tottel, the vogue for the "miscellanies," as they were called (with the accent on the second syllable), grew to a flood in the last quarter of the century, incl. Clement Robinson's Very Pleasaunt Sonettes and Storyes in Myter (1566; surviving only as A Handefull of Pleasant Delites, 1584; ed. Rollins, 1924); Richard Edwards's The Paradyse of Daynty Devises (1576; ed. Rollins, 1927); Thomas Proctor's A Gorgious Gallery of Gallant Inventions (1578; ed. Rollins, 1926); The Phoenix Nest (1593; ed. Rollins, 1931); and Nicholas Breton's Brittons Bowre of Delights (1591; ed. Rollins, 1933) and The Arbor of Amorous Devices (1597; ed. Rollins, 1936).

Other significant Eur. anthols. are the massive Flores poetarum, compiled early in the 16th c. by Octavianus Mirandula and used throughout Europe until the 18th c.; Jan Gruter's Delitiae (1608–14; It., Fr., Belgian, and Ger. poems in Lat.); J. W. Zincgref's Anhang unterschiedlicher aussgesuchter Gedichten (1624); Thomas Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765), an anthol. of the popular *ballads that proved very influential in the 18th-c. revival of antiquarian interest in primitive poetry; Oliver Goldsmith's The Beauties of English Poetry (1767); Thomas Campbell's Specimens of the British Poets (1891); and Francis Palgrave's Golden Treasury of the Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language (1861–), the most important Victorian anthol. of lyric poetry.

The popularity of anthols. in the 20th c. only increased, with the expansion of the institutions of higher education, esp. in America. In Eng., important anthols. include the Oxford Book of English Verse, successively ed. by Arthur Quiller-Couch (1900, 1939), Helen Gardner (1972), and Christopher Ricks (1999); The New Poetry (1917), ed. by Harriet Monroe and Alice C. Henderson, which influenced the high modernists; Herbert Grierson's Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems (1921), which inaugurated the vogue for *metaphysical poetry; W. B. Yeats's Oxford Book of Modern Verse (1936); Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren's Understanding Poetry (1938; 4th ed. rev. extensively, 1976), which applied to pedagogy the principles of *New Criticism; Donald Allen's The New American Poetry 1945–1960 (1960), which opened the postmodernist *canon; the Norton anthols. of lit. organized by period in several manifestations (World, English, American—often rev.) and anthols. of Literature by Women (3d ed., 2007), of Poetry (5th ed., 2004), of Poetic Forms (2001), of New Poetry (2009), and of Poets Laureate (2010), among others; the Longman anthols. of British Literature (4th ed., 2009) and of World Literature (2d ed., 2008), with attention to less studied figures and langs.; and the anthols. of international poetry produced by the poet and critic Jerome Rothenberg, most notably the three volumes of Poems for the Millennium (1998–2009), which gathers mod. and postmod. poetry from many langs. and trads.

The appeal of Eng.-lang. anthols. covering international poetic trads. has perhaps never been stronger than in the early 21st c. Among many signal examples, consider The Columbia Anthology of Traditional Korean Poetry, ed. P. H. Lee (2002); Reversible Monuments: Contemporary Mexican Poetry, ed. M. de la Torre and M. Wiegers (2002); An Anthology of Modern Urdu Poetry, ed. and trans. M.A.R. Habib (2003); The Columbia Anthology of Modern Korean Poetry, ed. D. McCann (2004); The New Directions Anthology of Classical Chinese Poetry, ed. E. Weinberger (2004); Landscape with Rowers: Poetry from the Netherlands, ed. and trans. J. M. Coetzee (2004); Words of the True Peoples, ed. C. Montemayor, v. 2 (2005)—contemp. indigenous-lang. Mexican poets; Ottoman Lyric Poetry, ed. and trans. W. G. Andrews (2006); The Yale Anthology of Twentieth-Century French Poetry, ed. M. A. Caws (2008); Twentieth-Century German Poetry, ed. M. Hofmann (2008); The Whole Island: Six Decades of Cuban Poetry, ed. M. Weiss (2009); Classical Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. D. Hinton (2010); and The FSG Book of Twentieth-Century Latin American Poetry, ed. I. Stavans (2011), among many others.

The product of both an intellectual exercise and a market, the contemp. anthol. can be read as a sensitive register—and sometimes, as in the case of Grierson and Allen, an instrument—of canon-making.

See BOOK, POETIC; GREEK POETRY; LATIN POETRY; LYRIC SEQUENCE.

■ I. Classical: A. Riese, Anthologia Latina (1894–96); W. R. Paton, The Greek Anthology (1916–18, Gr. and Eng.); J. Hutton, The Greek Anthology in Italy (1935), and The Greek Anthology in France and in the Latin Writers of the Netherlands (1946); J. Barns, "A New Gnomologium," CQ 44 (1950), 45 (1951); Anthologia Graeca, ed. H. Beckby, 4 v. (1965); A.S.F. Gow and D. L. Page, The Greek Anthology: Hellenistic Epigrams (1965), and The Greek Anthology: The Garland of Philip (1968); D. R. Shackleton Bailey, Anthologia Latina (1982)—a reediting of Riese v. 1; R. J. Tarrant, "Anthologia Latina," Texts and Transmission, ed. L. D. Reynolds (1983); A. Cameron, The Greek Anthology (1993); K. J. Gutzwiller, Poetic Garlands (1998); The New Posidippus, ed. K. J. Gutzwiller (2005); N. M. Kay, Epigrams from the Anthologia Latina (2006).

■ II. Medieval to Contemporary: J. O. Halliwell-Phillipps, Early English Miscellanies (1855); An Old English Miscellany, ed. R. Morris (1872); F. Lachère, Bibliographie des receuils collectifs de poésies publiés de 1597 à 1700 (1901); A. Wifstrand, Studien zur griechischen Anthologie (1926); A. E. Case, A Bibliography of English Poetical Miscellanies, 1521–1750 (1935); The Harley Lyrics, ed. G. L. Brook (1948); R. F. Arnold, Allgemeine Bücherkunde, 4th ed. (1966); Die deutschsprachige Anthologie, ed. J. Bark and D. Pforte, 2 v. (1969–70); "Miscellanies, Anthologies and Collections of Poetry," New CBEL, v. 2, ed. G. Watson (1971); E. W. Pomeroy, The Elizabethan Miscellanies, Their Development and Conventions (1973); Pearsall 94 ff.; R. McDowell, "The Poetry Anthology," HudR 42 (1990); Lucia Re, "(De) Constructing the Canon: The Agon of the Anthologies on the Scene of Modern Italian Poetry," MLR 87 (1992); J. Rasula, "The Empire's New Clothes: Anthologizing American Poetry in the 1990s," American Literary History 7 (1995); A. Golding, "The New American Poetry Revisited, Again," Contemporary Literature 39 (1998); P. Yu, "Charting the Landscape of Chinese Poetry," Chinese Literature 20 (1998); Anthologies of British Poetry, ed. B. Korte et al. (2000); P. Middleton, "The Transitive Poetics of Rothenberg's Transnational Anthologies," West Coast Line 34 (2000); A. Ferry, Tradition and the Individual Poem (2001); C. Nelson, "Murder in the Cathedral: Editing a Comprehensive Anthology of Modern American Poetry," American Literary History 14 (2002); On Anthologies: Politics and Pedagogy, ed. J. R. Di Leo (2004); P. Lauter, "Taking Anthologies Seriously," MELUS 29 (2004); D. Wojahn, "Shock and Awe: Anthologies and the Nortonization of Poetry," Shenandoah 54 (2004); T. Naaijkens, "The World of World Poetry: Anthologies of Translated Poetry as a Subject of Study," Neophilologus 90 (2006); J. G. Nichols, "Ezra Pound's Poetic Anthologies and the Architecture of Reading," PMLA 121 (2006); J. Spahr, "Numbers Trouble," Chicago Review 53 (2007), incl. response by J. Ashton; J. Ashton, "Our Bodies, Our Poems," MP 105 (2007), incl. response by J. Scapettone; D. Knechtges, "The Problem with Anthologies: The Case of the 'Bai yi' Poems of Ying Qu (190–252)," Asia Major 3d ser. 23 (2010).

T.V.F. Brogan, K. J. Gutzwiller (cl.);
R. Greene (med. to contemp.)

ANTHROPOLOGY AND POETRY. From the perspective of the 21st c., the social sciences look as though they have become more scientific, and, with the advance toward an increasingly scientific spirit, the uses of the social sciences for art have shrunk somewhat. All poets are their own amateur social scientists of a low-level sort: historians, psychologists, sociologists, anthropologists, and, all along, folklorists. If nothing else, folklore has provided materials for poetry from the earliest times. Agricultural lore, in particular, has furnished stories, characters, themes, and symbols; and it is easy to find and interpret examples, such as the lore about the finding of a red ear during corn husking that turns up in Joel Barlow's "The Hasty Pudding" (1793), H. W. Longfellow's Hiawatha (1855), and elsewhere. As with much rather informal anthropological material of the years before 1860, Longfellow's sources included unsystematic reports by missionaries, traders, explorers, and popularizers.

Geological speculations of the earlier 19th c. and Charles Darwin's The Origin of Species (1859) altered the framework of much thought, incl. that based on the age of the earth, which had long been assumed by many Europeans to be only about 6,000 years. Once it was established that the planet had to be much older, speculations about remote origins and gradual devel. were possible not only in the natural sciences but also in ling. and anthropology, and what is generally understood as mod. anthropology began toward the last third of the 19th c. Those devels. were also immediately important for lit.

The period of greatest practical utility for the various studies grouped under the big top of anthropology came during the period 1860–1925, when lit. was understood as a continuation of an ancient social practice of human culture practically from its beginnings. (The Anthropological Review began in 1863, The Popular Magazine of Anthropology in 1866.) Much of early mod. anthropology addressed itself to the study of ritual, *myth, *symbol, and language in ways that provided material for new lit.—drama and poetry more than prose fiction—and also helped to explain the materials presented in lit. that existed already. Particular attention was paid to the primitive origins of mod. practices, either as recorded in antiquity and the Middle Ages or as found in contemp. societies variously classified as "savage," "primitive," "native," "prelogical," "tribal," or "traditional." In most instances, anthropological studies concerned peoples living in territories recently acquired by colonial and commercial empires that flourished in the century between the Napoleonic Wars and World War I. These studies paralleled literary production designed to appeal to an interest in the exotic, such as are obvious in many works by H. Rider Haggard and Rudyard Kipling.

One of the earliest instances of overt collaboration between poetry and anthropology came in 1880 with the publication of Andrew Lang's XXII Ballades in Blue China, which includes the "Double Ballade of Primitive Man," annotated to indicate that some stanzas were contributed by "an eminent Anthropologist," elsewhere identified as "the learned doyen of Anthropology, Mr. E. B. Tylor, author of Primitive Culture." The stanzas in question are at the end of the poem:

> From a status like that of the Crees,
> Our society's fabric arose,
> Develop'd, evolved, if you please,
> But deluded chronologists chose,
> In a fancied accordance with Mos > es, 4000 B. C. for the span
> When he rushed on the world and its woes,
> 'Twas the manner of Primitive Man!
>
> But the mild anthropologist, HE'S > Not RECENT inclined to suppose > Flints Palaeolithic like these, > Quaternary bones such as those!
> In Rhinoceros, Mammoth and Co.'s,
> First epoch, the Human began, > Theologians all to expose,
> 'Tis the MISSION of Primitive Man.
>
> ENVOY
>
> MAX, proudly your Aryans pose,
> But their rigs they undoubtedly ran,
> For, as every Darwinian knows,
> 'Twas the manner of Primitive Man!

The poem was dedicated to J. A. Farrer (1849–1925), author of Primitive Manners and Customs (1879), and a member of roughly the same generation as Lang (1844–1912) and Tylor (1832–1917). "Max" is the slightly older philologist Friedrich Max Müller (1823–1900), who opposed Darwinian thought and espoused a theory of "Aryan" origins of much IE lang., religion, and philosophy. Lang, Tylor, Farrer, and Müller were all amateur polymaths who ranged freely over many fields.

For many of these thinkers, the business of anthropology consisted of gathering bits of data from all over—some from long ago or far away or from local folklore—and generalizing them into an all-explaining synthesis that reduced everything to a single principle, such as solar worship, animism, or therapeutic magic. In 1890, J. G. Frazer (1854–1941) published the first version of The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion, which remains the single work of anthropology most influential for lit., if for nothing else. Frazer's approach sought to explain many diverse beliefs and practices by references to ancient fertility cults that periodically sacrificed a priest-king. In some respects, Frazer laid the foundation for what T. S. Eliot called "the mythical method," whereby mod. materials are given shape and depth by reference to an ancient model, usually centered on some such recurrent figure as the trickster or savior. It is one hallmark of many mod. literary works that they offer a complex layering of ancient and mod., so that G. B. Shaw's Man and Superman (1903), James Joyce's Ulysses (1922), and Thomas Mann's Doctor Faustus (1947) track the Don Juan legend, the Odyssey, and the Faust legend, respectively. A generation of Eur. and Am. artists born in the 1880s—Pablo Picasso (1881–1973), Igor Stravinsky (1882–1971), Joyce (1882–1941), D. H. Lawrence (1885–1930), Ezra Pound (1885–1972), Eliot (1888–1965)—were in their various ways capable of using anthropological materials to underwrite important innovations that, around 1915, combined the ancient, the primitive, the mod., and the personal in works that could be called both primitivistic and neoclassical. These devels. were contemporaneous with Sigmund Freud's Totem and Taboo: Resemblances between the Mental Lives of Savages and Neurotics (1913), which refers to Darwin, Tylor, Lang, and Frazer. (Totem comes from Native Am. roots; taboo is Polynesian. One of the earliest recorded uses of the latter term is in a book on Hawai'i by the father of G. M. Hopkins.) Freud's adaptation of the mythical method, of which he was one progenitor, leads to the explanation of general cultural practices as well as individual psychic structures by reference to a common obsession with the killing of the same-sex parent and the sexual possession of the opposite-sex parent. There was immense interest and utility for poets in Freud's audacious fusion of the individual materials in dreams and the collective materials in myth, ritual, jokes, and other cultural practices. Eliot was open about his debt to Frazer, as well as to Jessie L. Weston's From Ritual to Romance (1920), and he was closely followed and imitated by Archibald MacLeish, whose Pot of Earth (1925) takes advantage of lore from Frazer and also of poetic manner from Eliot.

Eliot and Pound were interested in other anthropological generalizations, esp. as they applied to primitive mentality and the abiding functions of poetry. For them, and also for Joyce, Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1857–1939) contributed the notion of primitive "prelogical" mentality. For primitive humankind, unity trumped dissociation, and concepts that are separate for the civilized are not so for the primitive: individual and group, dream and reality, death and life, child and adult, and other polarities are not distinct but are rather unified. For a poet, such a concept is of capital value. Eliot wrote in 1916, "M. Lévy-Bruhl goes on to insist quite rightly upon a side of the primitive mind which has been neglected by older anthropologists, such as Frazer, and produces a theory which has much in common with the analyses of mythology recently made by disciples of Freud." (That suggests, by the way, that Eliot was less an adherent of Frazer and less an enemy of Freud than many have imagined.)

For Pound, and later for Charles Olson (1910–70) and Guy Davenport (1927–2005), the "culture morphology" of Leo Frobenius (1873–1938) had more impact than Frobenius's anthropological thinking was to have after his death, although he may not have been the racist charlatan that some critics think he was.

Robert Graves (1895–1985) challenged Frazer's standing by publishing a somewhat similar work, The White Goddess: A Historical Grammar of Poetic Myth (1948), that, like The Golden Bough, uses ancient ritual to explain a good deal of lore and hist. and to provide answers for many riddles. Graves's work, after being rejected by many publishers, was admired by Eliot, who was an influential director of Faber and Faber, the publishers of the book. The White Goddess is a bold work of fancy not firmly based on any solid learning in lang., lit., or anthropology, but it makes an entertaining case for the magical powers of authentic poetry against the claims of rather arid secular mod. society. Graves was never himself a great poet, but his style of thinking had influence on certain elders, such as Eliot, and on some younger writers, incl. Dylan Thomas (1914–53), W. S. Merwin (b. 1927), Robert Creeley (1926–2005), and Ted Hughes (1930–98), for whom, in diverse ways, poetry never gave up its ancient bardic involvement with magic and mystery, *charm and spell and curse (see BARD, POET).

Not many poets are anthropologists—although some attention may be given to Pound's Guide to Kulchur (1938) and Eliot's Notes towards the Definition of Culture (1948), which sound anthropological, and also to some of the prose writings of Nathaniel Tarn (b. 1928) and Gary Snyder (b. 1930), who have long been uncommonly sensitive to the interactions of lang., culture, and ecology.

The experience of anthropology makes people wonder what an anthropologist would make of them, and sometimes poets experiment with what could be called a visiting anthropologist's point of view, which renders the familiar world in unfamiliar terms. At one extreme, the "visitor" is a savage creature, as in Robert Browning's "Caliban upon Setebos" (1864) and Ted Hughes's "Wodwo" (1967). (Caliban, "a salvage and deformed slave" in Shakespeare's The Tempest, has a name that seems to be an anagram of cannibal, itself a version of Carib; Setebos was a demon of the Patagonians, reported by 16th-c. travelers. Wodwo is a made-up singular of woodwose, a "wild man of the woods.") "Caliban upon Setebos," subtitled "Natural Theology in the Island," represents how Caliban projects his own brutish image upward to imagine a brutish deity. (This is not so different from Émile Durkheim's analysis of religion.) "Wodwo" begins, "What am I? Nosing here, turning leaves over / Following a faint stain on the air to the river's edge . . ." At the opposite extreme is Craig Raine's (b. 1944) celebrated "A Martian Sends a Postcard Home" (1979), which takes a common theme from science fiction and other forms of popular culture. Like Browning's Caliban and Hughes's Wodwo, the Martian pays attention to what he or she interprets as fauna: "Caxtons are mechanical birds with many wings / and some are treasured for their markings." Such poets imagine themselves in the *personae of quasi-anthropologists describing a scene or a landscape as if with new eyes.

Now and then, professional social scientists, often exposed to poetry, write their own, and it is worth noting. Edward Sapir (1884–1939), anthropologist and linguist, and Ruth Benedict (1887–1948) both studied with Franz Boas, and both wrote poems. Some suggest their anthropological studies directly. Benedict's "Myth" (ca. 1941) begins, "A god with tall crow feathers in his hair, / Long-limbed and bronzed, from going down of sun . . ." Sapir's "A Pair of Tricksters" (1919) likewise offers a symbolic black bird:

> O one is a raven, glossy black,
> He struts on the low-tide beach
> And he croaks while the mist drifts over his back,
> While the mist lifts out of reach.

A later poem, "Coyote, Reflecting on Just Criticism, Decides to Mend His Ways," by the multitalented Dell Hymes (1927–2009), also involves the figure of a trickster who sounds like Caliban and a Wodwo: "Gee these eels taste good. / It's nice here by the river."

For the future, it is likely that anthropology will grow ever more scientific and ever less fanciful, although it will never completely relinquish fancy as a resource. Information technology has made possible the storage and retrieval of enormous amounts of data, and that, in turn, facilitates a burgeoning of comparative statistical studies. A survey of current interest groups reveals a number of adjectives and adjuncts that have been attached to anthropology: Africanist, archaeological, critical, culinary, cultural, dialectic, ecological, educational, evolutionary, feminist, forensic, humanistic, linguistic, medical, museum, national, pharmacological, physical, psychological, political and legal, queer, sartorial, structural, transnational/global, urban, and visual. There are societies for the "anthropology of" consciousness, food and nutrition, religion, and work. The simple-hearted ethnologists of the 19th c. would be impressed and even appalled at what has become of their science.

Lit., on the other hand, is much harder to sum up. With poetry, esp., when we think things have changed, it is all the likelier that they are essentially staying the same with possibly a superficial change of costume and style. If anything special has happened, it could be that most poets have given up the high modernist ambition of producing art that can operate culturally and communally, comprehending great tracts of historical and social territory, as may have been the case with such poets as Eliot, Pound, W. C. Williams (1883–1963), W. H. Auden (1907–73), Paul Valéry (1871–1945), Saint-John Perse (1887–1975), Pablo Neruda (1904–73), and George Seferis (1900–71). Most of their successors have little interest in writing substantial works of great cultural scope, settling instead for the smaller reach of evanescent psychological and personal expression. Some more recent poets, like Robert Lowell and Snyder, may seem to be exceptions, anomalies, or at least hybrids of some sort, but they are rare.

■ J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough, 3d ed., 12 v. (1905–15); T. S. Eliot, "Review of Group Theories of Religion and the Religion of the Individual, by C. C. J. Webb," International Journal of Ethics 27 (1916); L. Lévy-Bruhl, How Natives Think, trans. L. A. Clare (1926); Frye; J. B. Vickery, "Note on The Waste Land and Totem and Taboo," Literature and Psychology 10 (1960); and The Literary Impact of the Golden Bough (1973); Dialectical Anthropology 11.2–4 (1986)—spec. iss. on poetry and anthropology; Modernist Anthropology: From Field Work to Text, ed. M. Manganaro (1990); P. Rae, "Anthropology," A Companion to Modernist Literature and Culture, ed. D. Bradshaw and K.J.H. Dettmar (2006); J. Schuster, "William Carlos Williams, Spring and All, and the Anthropological Imaginary," Journal of Modern Literature 30 (2007); R. Van Oort, "The Culture of Criticism," Criticism 49 (2007); N. Tarn, The Embattled Lyric: Essays and Conversations in Poetics and Anthropology (2008); B. Thomas, "The Fictive and the Imaginary: Charting Literary Anthropology, Or, What's Literature Have To Do With It?," American Literary History 20 (2008); M. Manganaro, "Mind, Myth, and Culture: Eliot and Anthropology," A Companion to T. S. Eliot, ed. D. Chinitz (2009).

W. Harmon

ANTICLIMAX. A term apparently first used by Samuel Johnson, quoting Joseph Addison; Johnson defines it as "a sentence in which the last part expresses something lower than the first" (Dictionary, 1755). "Lower" in this context concerns the ideas or objects referred to and, as such, restricts the phenomenon to semantic anticlimax, frequently quoted examples of which include Alexander Pope's series of anticlimaxes from The Rape of the Lock: "Or stain her Honor, or her new Brocade," "Or lose her heart, or necklace, at a ball." Syntactic anticlimax would include sentences, lines of verse, or propositions that, after a series of elements of increasing length, suddenly introduce in the final position a considerably shorter syntagm, e.g., "Alfred de Musset, charming, likeable, subtle, graceful, delicate, exquisite, small" (Victor Hugo). When used to designate an ineptly expressed idea meant to be superlatively grandiose or pathetic, anticlimax becomes synonymous with the rhetorical figure *bathos. Similarly bathetic is anticlimax used for a deliberately ironic letdown, as in various absurd similes in Henry Fielding's burlesque of Elizabethan and Restoration tragedy (King Arthur is speaking to his queen Dollalolla): "Whence flow those Tears fast down thy blubber'd Cheeks, / Like a swoln Gutter, gushing through the Streets?" (The Tragedy of Tragedies [1731] 1.2.6–7); or Lord Grizzle's impassioned address to the Princess Huncamunca: "Oh! Huncamunca, Huncamunca, Oh! / Thy pouting Breasts, like Kettledrums of Brass, / Beat everlasting loud Alarms of Joy" (2.5.1–3). The effect of anticlimax in all forms is almost invariably comic.

■ C. Perelman and L. Olbrechts-Tyteca, The New Rhetoric, trans. J. Wilkinson and P. Weaver (1969), under gradation; Group μ.

H. Baran; A. W. Halsall

ANTIMETABOLE (Gr., "transposition"). A species of *chiasmus or word repetition in reverse. The term is probably first recorded in Quintilian (Institutio oratoria 9.3.85, 1st c. CE), who defines it merely as a figure of words "repeated with variation in case or tense" (others would call this polyptoton*) but illustrates with examples in which two words are later repeated in reverse order, e.g., "non ut edam vivo, sed ut vivam edo"; it is specifically this symmetrical abba pattern of word repetition that the term is most often made to designate by later rhetoricians (e.g., John Smith, The Mysterie of Rhetorique Unvailed, 1657). Examples of such manifestly verbal chiasmus in Eng. poetry can be seen in the final line of Shakespeare's sonnet 154, "Love's fire heats water, water cools not love," and in Hamlet's "What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba?" (2.2.559). All in all, it would seem better to use the term chiasmus for the genus of figures of reversal, whether of sound, syntax, or meaning, without necessarily involving specific word repetition, and restrict antimetabole to the narrower meaning of a single reversed word pair.

■ A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982); B. Vickers, In Defence of Rhetoric (1988); Vickers; Corbett; M. García-Page, "Reflexiones lingüísticas sobre la antimetábole," Revista de Literatura 57 (1995); A. Quinn, "Antimetabole," Encyclopedia of Rhetoric and Composition, ed. T. Enos and L. Rathbun (1996).

T.V.F. Brogan; A. W. Halsall

ANTISPAST. The metrical sequence ⏑ – – ⏑ used by ancient Gr. metrists (Hephaestion, Enchiridion 10) for the analysis of *aeolic meters and viewed by some mod. critics (e.g., Koster) as an authentic foot but largely abandoned by most others except to describe a word shape of that pattern.

■ P. Shorey, "Choriambic Dimeter and the Rehabilitation of the Aeolic," TAPA 38 (1907); Koster; West.

T.V.F. Brogan

ANTISTROPHE (Gr., "counterturning"). (1) In *classical prosody, the second part of the regular *ode in Gr. choral dance and poetry. The antistrophe follows the first part, the *strophe, and is followed by the third and concluding section, the *epode. The antistrophe corresponds to the strophe exactly in meter, while the epode does not, giving a double-triple aab structure that is replicated in several other major verse forms (see CANZONE). (2) In cl. rhet., the repetition of words in reversed order, e.g., "the master of the servant and the servant of the master" (cf. CHIASMUS). Antistrophe is also occasionally used as a term for repetition of a word at the end of successive phrases or clauses, but the preferable term is epistrophe.

R. A. Hornsby; T.V.F. Brogan

ANTITHESIS, antitheton (Gr., "opposition"; Lat. contentio). The juxtaposition of contraries: the contrast of ideas, sharpened or pointed up by the use of words of opposite or conspicuously different meaning in contiguous or parallel phrases or clauses. Antithesis is a form of expression recommended as satisfying by Aristotle "because contraries are easily understood and even more so when placed side by side, and also because antithesis resembles a syllogism, for it is by putting opposing conclusions side by side that you refute one of them" (Rhetoric 3.9.8). The anonymous Rhetorica ad Alexandrum (3rd c. BCE, chap. 26) observes that antithesis may oppose words or ideas or both, and later authorities likewise stress the clarity and force that an antithesis may impart to an idea (e.g., Rhetorica ad Herennium [86–82 BCE], 4.15.21; Johannes Susenbrotus, Epitome troporum ac schematum et Grammaticorum and Rhetorme arte rhetorica [1541], under contentio). Antithesis is one of the two or three fundamental strategies of biblical *parallelism first defined by Bishop Robert Lowth (1753) and is fairly frequent in OE poetry. In both these trads., as in nearly all others, antithesis achieves heightened effect when confined to the two halves of a *hemistichic line or two lines of a couplet, securing thereby the reinforcement of meter. Antithesis was cultivated by the cl. poets, and while these poets sometimes contrive a strict balance of form (the figure of parison [see ISOCOLON] in cl. rhet.) or a complex opposition of idea, e.g., "He aims to fetch not smoke from a flash, but light from smoke" (Horace, Ars poetica 142–43), this kind of ingenuity is even more characteristic of the Eng. and Fr. poets of the 17th and 18th cs., e.g., "I would and would not, I am on fire yet dare not" (Pierre Corneille, Cinna [1643] 1.2.122). A. Albalat once declared antithesis to be "the generating principle of half of French literature, from Montaigne to Hugo" (192–93); certainly, it is the predominant figure in the romantic poetry of Victor Hugo.

In Eng. poetry, William Shakespeare uses antithesis 209 times in the Sonnets, i.e., about once per sonnet, both of content and of form (syntax); he also experiments with double antithesis regularly (e.g., 27.12) and at least once with triple (11.5). He particularly exploits antithesis in series, to develop the (Petrarchan) contrariety of emotional conflict (94, 119, 129, 150): love–hate, truth–falsity, beauty–ugliness, fertility–sterility. But it is the *heroic couplet, which emerged in the course of the 17th c. to become the preferred meter of the Restoration and 18th-c. poets, that offered nearly the ideal medium for that balanced, concise, antithetical expression, serious and witty alike, which is the major characteristic of *neoclassical style. In John Dryden and Alexander Pope, antithesis becomes an inestimable device for the display of satirical wit: "Thus wicked but in will, of means bereft, / He left not faction, but of that was left" (Dryden, Absalom and Achitophel 567–68); "It is the slaver kills, and not the bite" (Pope, "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot" 1.106); "Be not the first by whom the new are tried, / Nor yet the last to lay the old aside" (Essay on Criticism 2.335–36). In contemp. writing, antithesis continues to be used to achieve effects, as, e.g., in T. S. Eliot: "We are the hollow men / We are the stuffed men" ("The Hollow Men").

The antitheses quoted above are among the many forms of expression that exhibit two or more figures of speech as these were defined in cl. rhet. and may be labeled with one term or another according to the particular feature to be distinguished. Thus, the second line of the quotation from Dryden exhibits *chiasmus, *epanalepsis, and isocolon. If the contrastive members of the antithesis are set in adjoining clauses that are not parallel but rather contrastive syntactically, the figure is termed syncrisis. Antithesis combined with chiasmus may be seen in the old definition of the scholar: "one who knows something about everything and everything about something." More recently, Group μ describes antithesis as a metalogism of addition, which asserts both "X" and "X is not non-X." Quinn puts this similarly: "rather than saying something and then repeating it in other words, you both deny its contrary and assert it," so that "you have said the thing in two different ways." Antithesis thus offers "the advantage of giving a sense of completeness with only two items."

See EPIGRAM, OXYMORON.

■ A. Albalat, La Formation du style par l'assimilation des auteurs (1921); M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); P. Beyer, "Antithese," Reallexikon II; A. Kibédi-Varga, Les Constantes du poème (1963); G. K. Spring, "An Analysis of Antithesis as a Basis of Epic Rhetorical Patterns," DAI 26 (1966): 6030; M. Kallich, "Balance and Antithesis in Pope's Essay on Criticism," TSL 12 (1967); C. Perelman and L. Olbrechts-Tyteca, The New Rhetoric, trans. J. Wilkinson and P. Weaver (1969); Lausberg; Sr. M. M. Holloway, "Hopkins' Theory of 'Antithetical Parallelism,'" HQ 1 (1974); M. Isnard, "Antithese et oxymoron chez Wordsworth," Rhétorique et communication (1979); R. F. Gleckner, "Antithetical Structure in Blake's Poetical Sketches," SIR 20 (1981); Group μ, 141–42; A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982); Corbett, 429–30.

T.V.F. BROGAN; A. W. HALSALL

ANTONOMASIA (Gr., "naming instead"). A figure in which an epithet or appellative or descriptive phrase is substituted for a proper name (e.g., "The Bard" for Shakespeare; "It was visitors' day at the vinegar works / In Tenderloin Town" [W. H. Auden, For the Time Being]) or, conversely, in which a proper name is substituted for an individual, a class, or type ("the English Diana" for Queen Elizabeth; "Some mute, inglorious Milton here may rest" [Thomas Gray, "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard"]). Similar to the first form above is *periphrasis. Group μ (101–3), however, identifies the two types, respectively, as "particularizing" and "generalizing" varieties of *synecdoche.

Quintilian (Institutio oratoria 8.6.29) holds that antonomasia, which is very common in poetry but less so in oratory, may be accomplished in two ways—by substitution of epithets for names (such as "Pelides" [i.e., son of Peleus] for Achilles) and by substitution of the most striking characteristic of an individual for his or her name ("Divum pater atque hominum rex" [Father of gods and king of men; Virgil, Aeneid 1.65]). To these he adds a third type, wherein acts may indicate the individual; this, however, may be a spurious emendation. He too points to the relation of antonomasia to synecdoche. George Puttenham (The Arte of English Poesie, 1589) distinguishes between epitheton ("fierce Achilles," "wise Nestor"), where name and epithet both appear, and antonomasia, use of one for the other.

■ Group μ; Morier; Lausberg; S. Leroy, "Quels fonctionnements discursifs pour l'antonomase du nom propre?" Cahiers de praxematique 35 (2000), and De l'identification ála catégorisation (2004).

R. O. EVANS; T.V.F. BROGAN

ANTROPOFAGIA (Port. anthropophagy, cannibalism). In the Brazilian arts, antropofagia is a critical concept that originates in the writings of poet-essayist Oswald de Andrade (1890–1954), primarily the aggressively toned "Manifesto antropófago" (in Revista de Antropofagia, 1928). The term refers to the notion of "cultural cannibalism," a critical appropriation of foreign ideas and aesthetic models and reformulation thereof in new national forms. The aim of antropofagia was to constitute an independent literary discourse immune to sectarian interests and excessive patriotism. The main arms of this effort were *parody, *satire, and provocation via conceptual humor. Andrade did not formulate a platform per se, but there are virtual principles from which one may construct the objectives of an artistic movement involving crit., poetry, and the other literary genres as well as intellectual discourse. Unlike Andrade's previous "Manifesto da Poesia Pau-Brasil" (1924), which is specifically cast as a modernist declaration about poetry (see MODERNISM) and is accompanied by a volume of verse, the manifesto of antropofagia does not have a corresponding book of poems nor does it concern only *lyric. As the first line asserts, antropofagia is a unifying force "socially, economically, philosophically." Discussion of antropofagia necessarily expands into a wide plane of debate involving historical interpretation, national identity, philosophy of culture, and *postcolonial poetics. In the lyric, antropofagia is a generative concept for some of Andrade's own poetry, for select works by other Brazilian modernists, for the articulation of *concrete poetry by the *Noigandres group in the 1950s, for the poetry of song represented by the Tropicália movement of the late 1960s, and for youth poetry of the late 20th c. Therein one finds direct allusions to the trope of deglutition as well as reworkings of images related to the symbol of cannibalism as an encounter with primitive forces of the unconscious, as an attempt to comprehend an indigenous, totemic sense of eating one's enemies to absorb their forces via magical disposition, and as a figurative form of resistance or new attitude toward cultural relationships with hegemonic powers.

See ANTHROPOLOGY AND POETRY; BRAZIL, POETRY OF; MANIFESTO.

■ L. Bary, intro. and trans, "Oswald de Andrade's 'Cannibalist Manifesto,'" Latin American Literary Review 19.38 (1991); Antropofagia hoje / Anthropophagy Today? spec. iss. of Nuevo texto crítico 23–24 (1999); L. Madureira, Cannibal Modernities (2005); H. de Campos, "Anthropophagous Reason: Dialogue and Difference in Brazilian Culture" (1981), Novas, ed. A. S. Bessa and O. Cisneros (2007).

C. A. PERRONE

APHAERESIS (Gr., "a taking away"). In *prosody, the technical term for one form of elision, namely, omission of a word-initial syllable, esp. a vowel, e.g., 'gainst for against, mid for amid, 'neath for beneath. Aphaeresis of a syllable containing a vowel-consonant or consonant-vowel pairing is also common, e.g., 'zactly for exactly, 'cause for because. In some occurrences of aphaeresis, the following consonant then clusters with the succeeding word, e.g., 'tis for it is, 'twere for it were. Other times, only the vowel is elided, e.g., supposed becomes 'pposed or s'pposed. In Eng., the elided syllable carries relatively minimal stress, and the following syllable carries either the primary or secondary stress of the word. An *iambic word or phrase thereby becomes a stressed monosyllable. In Gr. poetry, aphaeresis occurs in the suppression of an initial short e following a word ending in a long vowel or diphthong. The Lat. term for this phenomenon is prodelision: when a Lat. word ending in a vowel or a vowel followed only by m comes before es or est, the second vowel is "squeezed out," as in Virgil's "Usque adeone mori miserum est? vos a mihi Manes" (Aeneid 12.646). Aphaeresis is common in spoken Eng. and can be found in dialect, vernacular, and nation-lang. poetries.

See ELISION.

■ L. Kypriotaki, "Apharesis in Rapid Speech," American Speech 45.1 (1970).

T.V.F. BROGAN; R. A. HORNSBY; D. VERALDI

APHORISM. See EPIGRAM.

APOCOPE (Gr., "a cutting off"). In *prosody, the technical term for one form of elision, namely, loss of a word's final syllable or vowel, e.g., eve or even for evening. Often the apocopated word then fuses with the one following, e.g., "th'Empyrean" for "the Empyrean," "th'army," etc., thereby avoiding *hiatus. Apocope is a common linguistic process.

See ELISION.

■ T. Sasaki, "Apocope in Modern English Verse," SEL (Tokyo) 13 (1933); M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947).

T.V.F. BROGAN

APORIA. A logical impasse in which meaning oscillates between two contradictory imperatives. First described in Gr. philosophy as a seemingly insoluble logical conundrum—aporia translates as "without a passage"—it is an important concept in poststructuralist theory, as a term for interpretive undecidability. In deconstructive criticism, an aporia is the site at which a text undermines its own philosophical structure by revealing the rhetorical nature of that structure (de Man). Consider Derrida's deconstruction of the paradox of structure and event in structuralist theories of lang. According to structuralist ling., the structure of a lang. (langue) is a product of past speech acts (parole), yet every speech act is itself made possible by prior structures (Saussure). Thus, Derrida argues, any account of linguistic origins must oscillate between these two perspectives on lang., each of which shows the error of the other. Instead of discovering a foundational linguistic structure, one finds an irresolvable aporia between structure and event (Positions). Because literary texts foreground their own rhetoricity, deconstructive theory often identifies lit. as an exemplary location for identifying and examining such philosophical paradoxes.

In cl. rhet., aporia is a figure of speech that professes doubt or deliberation. Aporia allows a speaker to hesitate on both sides of a question, as when Hamlet asks, "to be or not to be?" The figure, thus, signifies indecision—Plato describes the experience of an aporia as paralysis or numbness (Meno)—although in rhetorical practice this uncertainty is often feigned. The philosophical and rhetorical senses of aporia suggest how the term can refer to both a philosophical paradox and to the state of being perplexed by such a paradox.

See FIGURATION, PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY, POSTSTRUCTURALISM, RHETORIC AND POETRY.

■ F. Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale, ed. C. Bally and A. Sechehaye, 3d ed. (1931); P. de Man, Allegories of Reading (1979); J. Derrida, Positions (1981); J. Culler, On Deconstruction (1982); J. Derrida, "Ousia and Grammē: Note on a Note from Being and Time" and "Signature Event Context," Margins of Philosophy, trans. A. Bass (1986); J. Derrida, Aporias, trans. T. Dutoit (1993).

J. C. MANN

APOSIOPESIS (Gr., "becoming silent"). A speaker's abrupt halt midway in a sentence, due to being too excited or distraught to give further articulation to his or her thought (Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 9.2.54); less commonly, the speaker thinking to impress the addressee with the vague hint of an idea too awesome to be put into words (Demetrius, On Style 2.103). These two motives are not always distinguishable, e.g., in Neptune's threat to the winds (Aeneid 1.133–35): "How dare ye, ye winds, to mingle the heavens and the earth and raise such a tumult without my leave? You I will—but first I must quiet the waves"; or Lear's threat of vengeance against his daughters: "I will have such revenges on you both / That all the world shall—I will do such things—" (2.4.282–83). Compare the conclusion of George Herbert's "The Thanksgiving": "Then for thy passion—I will do for that— / Alas, my God, I know not what" (The Temple, 1633). If at the point of breaking off, the speaker verbalizes the failure of words to convey the emotion adequately, the figure becomes *adynaton. Related are paraposiopesis, interrupting the sentence with an expression of emotion, and *anacoluthon, ending the sentence with a different construction from that with which it began.

According to the Gr. rhetorician Alexander (Peri schematon, 2nd c. CE), aposiopesis is always followed by the speaker's explanation that he or she is passing over in silence matters either already known to the addressee or too sordid to be mentioned; but Quintilian remarks that it is sometimes used as a merely transitional device, where the speaker wishes to introduce a digression or announce an impromptu change in the planned conduct of his or her argument (9.2.55–57).

George Puttenham (The Arte of English Poesie, 1589), who calls aposiopesis "the figure of silence, or of interruption," finds it suited to express a range of emotions, incl. fear, shame, distraction, or momentary forgetfulness. Alexander Pope defined aposiopesis as an "excellent figure for the ignorant, as 'What shall I say?' when one has nothing to say; or 'I can no more' when one really can no more" (Peri Bathous, 1727). Group μ points out that some aposiopeses "have the force of 'etc.,'" while others, "where conjecture is enjoined about the suppressed sequence, may be interpreted as a refusal to proceed"; they "refuse metabole, and precisely for this reason they are metaboles that economize the code . . . as a way of indicating its insufficiencies, of showing that it offers nothing or is, in fact, even a danger" (139). Aposiopesis should not be confused with *paralipsis, the device whereby a speaker pretends not to discuss a subject while actually doing so.

■ Lausberg; Group μ; A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982); B. Vickers, In Defence of Rhetoric (1988); G. Alexander, "Sidney's Interruptions," SP 98 (2001).

H. BARAN; A. W. HALSALL; A. WATSON

APOSTROPHE (Gr. "turning away"). Poetic address, esp. to unhearing entities, whether these be abstractions, inanimate objects, animals, infants, or absent or dead people. Examples include Petrarch's "Occhi miei lassi, mentre ch'io vi giro . . ." (Canzoniere 14); Shakespeare's "thou age unbred" (sonnet 104); Alphonse de Lamartine's "O lac! rochers muets! grottes! Forêt obscure!" ("Le Lac"); William Blake's "Little lamb, who made thee?" ("The Lamb"); or William Wordsworth's "Milton! Thou shouldst be living at this hour" ("London, 1802"). Some poetry critics have treated the term apostrophe as interchangeable with the term address*, so including poetic speech not only to unhearing entities but to the listening beloved, friend, or patron or to contemp. or later readers. The narrower term is more useful, but, as with all varieties of poetic address, it is best to think in terms of prototypes rather than of sharp-edged categories. The term apostrophe originates in cl. oratory. An orator was felt to be addressing his audience at all times, such that there is no rhetorical term for address to the audience; apostrophe meant instead "turning aside" from the principal audience to address briefly someone or something else (Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 4.1.63–70). (The rhetorical trad. does not distinguish between hearing and unhearing addressees; that distinction emerges only in recent poetry crit.) Such side addresses in oratory were said to convey pathos (as in the cry of Julius Caesar's Mark Antony, "O judgment! thou art fled to brutish beasts"), as poetic apostrophe often does too (John Donne's "Full nakedness! All joys are due to thee," Elegy 19). Overlap with the figure of exclamation or ecphonesis is frequent. Dupriez suggests that apostrophe "is rhetorical when one of its elements is unexpected" and characterizes the pretense of address to the unhearing as one form this unexpectedness may take.

In mod. poetry crit., Culler's seminal essay "Apostrophe" highlighted the potential embarrassment in apostrophe's excess of pretense or pathos, seeing in this figure of speech the wager that one can pull off this extravagant verbal gesture and so be proven as the poet one claims to be. To cry "O" to something insentient is self-consciously to stage a drama of the self calling. Culler can thus identify apostrophic invocation as a trope of poetic vocation, the self's performance of itself. Positing, moreover, an opposition between narrative temporality and lyric timelessness, he styles *lyric in general as "the triumph of the apostrophic" because poetic hailing seeks to become an event itself rather than to narrate events.

Numerous critics have responded to Culler. Several have built on the suggestion (also found in de Man's essays) that apostrophe is closely linked to *prosopopoeia, making the inanimate speak; others introduce historical considerations, such as different eras' practices of public utterance or familiarity with rhetorical models. It is also important to recognize differences among apostrophes. For the pathos of address to the unhearing may be of a different kind, not embarrassing but moving, when the unhearing addressee is (as in Elizabeth Bishop's "Insomnia" or "One Art") a forsaking lover who will, to the poet's grief, never read her poem, or (as in Catullus's elegy for his brother, poem 101) not a great figure in hist. but the poet's own loved dead.

See MONOLOGUE, RHETORIC AND POETRY.

■ P. de Man, "Autobiography as De-Facement," The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984) and "Lyrical Voice in Contemporary Theory: Riffaterre and Jauss," Lyric Poetry: Beyond New Criticism, ed. C. Hošek and P. Parker (1985); B. Johnson, "Apostrophe, Animation, and Abortion," A World of Difference (1987); J. Hollander, "Poetic Imperatives," Melodious Guile: Fictive Pattern in Poetic Language (1988); B. Dupriez, A Dictionary of Literary Devices, trans. A. W. Halsall (1991); J. D. Kneale, "Romantic Aversions: Apostrophe Reconsidered," ELH 58 (1991); J. Culler, "Apostrophe," The Pursuit of Signs, rev. ed. (2002); Lausberg; W. Waters, Poetry's Touch: On Lyric Address (2003); H. Dubrow, The Challenges of Orpheus (2008).

W. Waters

APPRECIATION. A term widely used in anglophone countries, esp. in the first half of the 20th c. to denote both a cognitive awareness of the aesthetic qualities of a work of fine art or lit. and also the act of interpretation that expresses such awareness. It is a fairly recent addition to the critical lexicon: the word does not appear in Samuel Johnson's Dictionary, and its pre-1800 usage, as recorded in the OED, is mainly nonartistic (e.g., economic and strategic), referring, as the etymology suggests, to the estimation of true worth. In its new applications to art and lit. in the first half of the 19th c., however, it moves away from evaluation and judgment toward "the perception of delicate impressions or distinctions" and "the sympathetic recognition of excellence." F. D. Maurice, e.g., described the best kind of crit. as that "cordial, genial appreciation" that "delights to draw forth the sense and beauty of a book, and is . . . in sympathy with the heart of the writer." The term thence evolves in tandem with the older concept of *taste, which undergoes a similar shift of meaning from a capacity for correctly judging a work of lit. to a capacity for understanding and enjoying it. Taste and appreciation were explicitly connected by R. G. Moulton, who defined appreciation as the exercise of taste without judgment. In his distinction between "inductive" and "judicial" crit., appreciation is identified with the former and signifies both the cultivation of enjoyment and a practice of holistic interpretation of individual works, esp. appropriate for teaching vernacular lit. in schools and universities. William Henry Hudson embraced and advocated Moulton's positive concept of appreciation but argued that evaluation could not be rigidly excluded.

Appreciation was sometimes used to denote an "aestheticist" crit.—impressionistic, emotional, and digressive, in the style of Walter Pater—hence, a foil for the analytically rigorous or socially engaged critical modes of the early 20th c., though figures like T. S. Eliot, W. K. Wimsatt, and F. R. Leavis still used the term in a neutral or positive sense, and William Empson explicitly distinguished "appreciative" and "analytical" crit. as complementary components of interpretation.

In the 1930s, appreciation was frequently the subject of psychological experiments seeking to establish its characteristics as a mental state or cognitive act (Griffiths). Its main significance for most of the 20th c., however, was as the widely accepted goal of literary pedagogy. Many "guides" and "introductions" to literary appreciation were published in Eng. speaking countries, ca. 1910–70, typically offering a methodical training in understanding, responding to, and interpreting canonical literary works; imputing aesthetic autonomy and unity to the work for the purpose of such analysis; and placing relatively little emphasis on critical evaluation as such. In many cases (e.g., Mueller, Osborne) accounts of literary appreciation were enriched by highlighting its similarities and continuities with the (less contested) practices of appreciation in music and the visual arts.

Since the 1960s, appreciation has fallen foul of the "suspicious hermeneutics" of ideological crit. and poststructuralist theory. There have been indications, however, of a revival of both critical and philosophical interest in literary aesthetics and appreciation (Feagin, Ricks).

See aestheticism, criticism, interpretation, taste.

■ F. D. Maurice, "On Critics," The Friendship of Books and Other Essays (1874); R. G. Moulton, "Principles of Inductive Criticism," Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist (1885); W. Pater, Appreciations (1889); W. H. Hudson, An Introduction to the Study of Literature (1910); F. H. Hayward, The Lesson in Appreciation (1915); Empson; D. C. Griffiths, The Psychology of Literary Appreciation (1932); J. H. Mueller, E. G. Moll, N. B. Zane, and K. Hevner, Studies in Appreciation of Art (1934); P. Gurrey, The Appreciation of Poetry (1935); H.L.B. Moody, Literary Appreciation (1968); H. Osborne, The Art of Appreciation (1970); S. L. Feagin, Reading with Feeling (1996); C. Ricks, Essays in Appreciation (1996).

P. J. Buckridge

ARABIC POETICS

I. Classical
II. Modern

I. Classical. The first Ar. works on poetics were composed at the end of the 9th and beginning of the 10th c. Four groups of scholars were in varying degrees instrumental in shaping this new literary genre: the experts on ancient poetry, the poets and critics of mod. poetry (for ancient versus mod., see below), the Qurʾanic scholars, and the (Aristotelian) logicians. Earlier, the pre-Islamic poets very likely had had a professional lang. for technical features of their poetry, and there are reports about comparative evaluation of poets, but none of this amounts to an explicit ars poetica.

In the field of poetry, two devels. are noteworthy. First, ancient, (i.e., pre- and early Islamic) poetry became canonized as a corpus of cl. texts. This meant that ancient poetry was considered a repository of correct and authoritative speech. As such, it became the domain of the philologists, who, around the middle of the 8th c., began to collect the extant poetry into dīwāns and anthols.; to these they later added interlinear glosses on lexical and grammatical matters. Once the task of editing and writing commentaries had been mostly achieved, we do find one book that may be called a grammarian's poetics: the Qawāʿidal-shiʿr (Foundations of Poetry) ascribed to the Kufan grammarian Thaʿlab (d. 291/904—dates refer to the Muslim and the Common eras, respectively). This is a logically arranged collection of technical terms often provided with definitions and always exemplified with a number of shawāhid (evidentiary verses). Significantly, it starts with an enumeration of four basic types of sentences (command, prohibition, report, question) that are introduced as the "foundations of poetry," and it ends with a verse typology based on the syntactic independence or interdependence of the two *hemistichs of the line in which the highest aesthetic value is accorded those lines that have two independently meaningful hemistichs. This atomistic approach to the study and evaluation of poetry prevails in most of the theoretical lit.

The second notable event that had a decisive (indeed, greater) effect on the devel. of poetics and literary theory was the rise, around the middle of the 8th c., of a new school of poetry: the muḥdathūn (moderns). By contrasting them with their forebears, the qudamāʾ (ancients), critics and theorists became aware of some of the basic dichotomies in poetry. It should be noted, however, that the model of ancient poetry was never seriously challenged, which meant that the innovations of the moderns leaned toward *mannerism and relied heavily on earlier poetry. Critical discussions focused on a phenomenon called badīʿ—literally, "new, original, newly invented." The earliest attestations of the word suggest that it was originally used to refer to a special type of *metaphor (imaginary ascriptions such as "the claws of death") that played an important role in the poetic technique of the moderns, who created some outrageous—and severely criticized—specimens (e.g., "the eyes of religion were cooled," meaning that the Islamic armies were victorious). However, the term soon spread to other figures of speech. The poet Ibn al-Muʿtazz (d. 296/908), who devoted the first monograph to this topic, Kitāb al-Badīʿ (The Book of the Novel [Style]), proposed five figures to be covered by the term—metaphors of the kind just mentioned, *paronomasia, *antithesis, *epanalepsis (or epanadiplosis, and playful dialectics imitating theological jargon. The main goal of his book is to demonstrate that the badīʿ phenomena are not new but can be found already in ancient poetry as well as in the Qurʾan and in wisdom aphorisms; it is only their exaggerated use that is truly new.

Coming from one of the foremost poets of his time, this line of argument obviously served to legitimize the use of badīʿ. Ibn al-Muʿtazz's book became influential in several ways: (1) the discipline dealing with rhetorical figures was named "the science of badīʿ" after the title of his book; (2) the discovery of legitimizing precedent in ancient texts, esp. the Qurʾan, became commonplace, and as a result, the system of the rhetorical figures came to be considered an integral and static part of the lang.: their proliferation in later rhetorical works was thus thought to be due to closer analysis rather than new invention; (3) the emphasis on figures of speech as the central concern of literary theory originated here; and (4) the difference between poetry and prose in most respects, save the purely formal one, was considered unimportant.

The result of factor (4) in particular meant that, although works on literary theory—mostly rhetorical in outlook—continued to be produced, works on poetics proper tended to become the exception. Two of them were composed by younger contemporaries of Ibn al-Muʿtazz, one by the poet Ibn Ṭabāṭabā (d. 322/934), titled ʿIyār al-shiʿr (The Standard of Poetry), the other by the state scribe and logician Qudāma ibn Jaʿfar (d. after 320/932). Although Ibn Ṭabāṭabā did not use the word badīʿ in its technical sense, he is well aware of the predicament of the moderns, who can no longer simply utter truths, as did the ancients, but have to display their wits in a subtle treatment of well-known motifs. He is also remarkable for giving a step-by-step description of the production of a poem; this is quite rare because works on poetics usually offer theories of poetic crit. rather than artes poeticae in the strict sense.

This characterization is esp. true of Qudāma's poetics, which the author describes as the first book on the "science of the good and the bad in poetry" and aptly titles Naqd al-shiʿr (The Assaying of Poetry). His work is at the same time the first representative of the third approach to literary theory (besides the grammatical and the poetic already mentioned), namely, that of the logician in the Aristotelian trad. This characterization refers, however, less to the content than to the structure and presentation of his work: he starts with a definition ("Poetry is metrical, rhymed utterance pointing to a meaning") that yields the four constitutive elements: meter, rhyme, wording, and meaning. He then discusses first the good qualities of these elements and their combinations, followed by the bad. Although Qudāma was much quoted by later authors, his "foreign" method did not find followers.

The controversies about the mod. poets' use of badīʿ, though reflected in theory, can more accurately be gauged from works of applied crit. such as the books devoted to the controversial "rhetorical" poets Abū Tammām (d. 231/845) and al-Mutanabbī (d. 354/965). The major topics that emerge are the following: (1) The relationship between ṭabʿ (natural talent) and ṣanʿa (artful or artificial crafting). The latter term came to mean the application of badīʿ to the motif at hand. According to taste and predilection, some considered this takalluf (*constraint, artificiality), while others pointed to the element of taʿjīb (causing amazement) that it imparted to well-known motifs. Given the general drift toward mannerism, this was a much sought-after effect. (2) The role of lafẓ (wording) versus maʿnā (meaning) in poetry. Already at the end of the 8th c., a consensus had been reached that poetry was to be judged by its wording, since the meaning was nothing but the material to be shaped. Some authorities are said to have given precedence to the meaning, but on closer inspection, it appears that they intended the maʿnā al-ṣanʿa (the special meaning created by the application of a figure of speech; this comes close to the *conceit in Western *mannerist poetry and thus did not undermine the priority of the wording. (3) The relationship between poetry and reality, whether ṣidq (truth) or kadhib (falsehood). In general, poetry is presumed to depict reality mimetically. Obvious "falsehoods" such as imaginary metaphors and *hyperboles, therefore, tended to provoke objections on the part of the critics. Such figures became so predominant in later Abbasid poetry, however, that some theorists (Ibn Fāris, Ibn Ḥazm) posited falsehood as one of the constituent elements of poetry. (4) Regarding the question of sariqa (plagiarism), although this word means "theft" and originally denoted flagrant literary larceny, with the increasing tendency toward mannerism in mod. poetry, sariqa became a way of life, and the disreputable connotation of the term gave way to the more neutral one of "taking over" (an earlier motif); critics even began to talk of "good sariqas." Taking over an earlier poet's motif and improving on it, mostly by the application of badīʿ, constituted an istiḥqāq (better claim [to that motif]), for which the poet earned high praise.

Ar. poetics, fostered by the rise of mod. poetry, soon experienced something like arrested growth. The work of the Qurʾanic scholar and grammarian al-Rummānī (d. 384/994), al-Nukat fī iʿjāz al-Qurʾān (Thoughtful Remarks on the Inimitability of the Qurʾan), in which he undertook to prove this dogma on the basis of the Qurʾan's balāgha (eloquence), soon began to influence works on poetics and rhetorical figures. The first major compilation that resulted, the Kitāb al-ṣināʿatayn (Book of the Two Crafts [i.e., poetry and prose]) by Abū Hilāl al-ʿAskarī (d. 395/1004), expressly mentions proving the inimitability of the Qurʾan as its main goal and makes extensive use of al-Rummānī's work. The confluence of the two different technical terminologies, Qurʾanic and poetic, at first created a notable confusion that was only gradually eliminated, esp. by the greatest of all Ar. literary theorists, ʿAbd al-Qāhir al-Jurjānī (d. 471/1078). In his Asrār al-balāgha (The Mysteries of Eloquence), he tried to establish a clear and unambiguous taxonomy for the theory of *imagery (*simile, analogy, metaphor based on simile, metaphor based on analogy); and for the first time, he finds, designates, and describes the phenomenon of takhyīl (fantastic interpretation, i.e., inventing imaginary causes, effects, and proofs, often on the basis of metaphors taken literally)—which is so characteristic of later Abbasid poetry. Although not a comprehensive work on poetics, the "Mysteries" certainly is the most sustained effort to reach to the core of Ar. poetry.

Al-Jurjānī's books, the one just mentioned and his Dalāʾil al-iʿjāz (Signs for the Inimitability), were later reworked into parts of the scholastic ʿilm al-balāgha (science of eloquence) which, from the 13th c. on, dominated the teaching of rhet.—consisting of stylistics, theory of imagery, and figures of speech—in the institutions of higher learning. Poetics was thus incorporated into a discipline that served the religious purpose of demonstrating the inimitability of the Qurʾan, whence it ceased to exist in its own right.

Some theoretical and critical works were produced outside the Qurʾanic trad. One of them, al-ʿUmda (The Pillar), by the poet Ibn Rashīq (d. 456/1063 or later), deserves to be cited as a comprehensive handbook for poets that contains well-informed accounts of all the major topics in poetics mentioned above.

A fascinating, though not very influential, sideline of the lit. on poetics was created by Maghribi authors of the late 13th c., who, to various degrees, showed interest in "logical" poetics, i.e., the Aristotelean Rhetoric and Poetics as part of the Organon, a late Alexandrian trad. that was adopted into Ar. logical writings. The most sophisticated among these authors is Ḥāzim al-Qarṭājannī (d. 1285), who adopted the two central terms of logical poetics, "creation of images in the mind of the listener" (takhyīl) and "imitating the object of the poem by means of artful description" (muḥākāt), in order to identify the cornerstones of the poetic enterprise.

II. Modern. From the 13th to the 18th c., Ar. poetics tended to reflect the priorities of the audience for the lit. of the period: the intellectual elite at the various centers of political authority. Elaborating on earlier devels. in poetics, commentators and anthologizers placed primary emphasis on the formalities of rhet. and the compilation of ever-expanding lists of poetic devices and themes. It was the task of pioneers in the 19th c., such as Ḥusayn al-Marṣafī (1815–90), to revive interest in the great cl. works of poetics. However, such exercises in neoclassical revival gradually receded into the background, superseded by the increasing domination of Western literary genres and critical approaches.

From the first intimations of what has been termed preromanticism with poets such as Khalīl Muṭrān (1872–1949), Ar. poetry and poetics have undergone what Jabrā has termed a series of "rapid chain explosions of Eur. culture." The poetics of *romanticism are reflected in works such as Al-Ghurbāl by Mīkhāʾīl Nuʿayma (1889–1988) and Al-Dīwān by two Egyptian critics, Al-ʿAqqād (1889–1964) and al-Māzinī (ca. 1889–1949). The application of Western critical approaches, predominantly Fr. and Eng., to the lit. is also evident in the writings of critics such as Tāhā Ḥusayn (1889–1973), Mārūn ʿAbbūd (1886–1962), and Muḥammad Mandūr (1907–65).

Following World War II and the achievement of independence by many Arab nations, lit. of "commitment" (iltizām) became de rigueur and was much reflected in critical writings. The Lebanese literary periodical Al-ādāb, founded by Suhayl Idrīs in Beirut in 1953, had "commitment" as its major guiding force and continues to serve as a major conduit and catalyst for trends in mod. Ar. poetics. In that role, it has since been joined by a number of other jours., most prominent among which is Fuṣūl, pub. in Cairo. More recently, growing interest in literary theory, ling., and folklore has led to significant changes in approach to the Ar. literary trad. as a whole. Numerous Western studies in semiotics (see SEMIOTICS AND POETRY), *structuralism, *poststructuralism, *postcolonial poetics, *feminist crit., and reception theory (see READER RESPONSE) have been read by Arab critics either in the original or in the rapidly increasing library of such works in trans. The emergence of these new disciplines and approaches can be seen in the publication of critical and theoretical studies that not only reconsider the nature and precepts of the Ar. literary *canon (e.g., in the realms of popular narrative and prosody) but address genres from all periods of the trad. in entirely new ways. In a number of works, the major poet-critic Adūnis (pseud. of Ali Ahmad Said Asbar, b. 1930?) has devoted himself to a detailed investigation of the issue of modernity itself and the reinterpretation of the past. In his writings and those of many others, this process, at once highly controversial and stimulating, continues to have a profound effect on both the poetic trad. and on attitudes toward the adoption of various modes of interpretation.

In 1972, Adūnis was reflecting a cultural trad. of long standing in titling one of his studies Zaman al-shiʿr (Poetry's Time). In such a context, it may be seen as a deliberate indication of a shift in that trad. that, in 1999, the Egyptian critic Jābir ʿUsfūr (Gaber Asfour) published a work on the novel titled Zaman al-riwāya (The Novel's Time). The predominance of visual media in the societies of the Ar.-speaking world has indeed led to a change of balance in the markets for poetic and narrative modes of expression. There has been a concomitant rise of critical interest in the study of narratology, at the hands of scholars such as Saʿīd Yaqṭīn (Morocco), ʿUsfūr (Egypt), Yumnā al-ʿĪd (Lebanon), and Faysal Darrāj (Palestine and Syria), among many others. In the realm of poetry and poetics, a relatively new phenomenon has been a critical concentration on more popular forms of poetic expression and their modes of performance and reception.

■ I. Classical: I. Goldziher, "Alte und neue Poesie im Urtheile der arabischen Kritiker," Abhandlungen zur arabischen Philologie 1 (1896, rpt. 1982), ch. 2; G. E. von Grunebaum, "Arabic Literary Criticism in the 10th Century A.D.," JAOS 61 (1941); and "The Concept of Plagiarism in Arabic Theory," Journal of Near Eastern Studies 3 (1944); A Tenth-Century Document of Arabic Literary Theory and Criticism: The Sections on Poetry of al-Bâqillânî's Iʿjâz al-Qurʾân, ed. G. E. von Grunebaum (1950); A. Trabulsi, La Critique poétique des Arabes jusqu'au Ve siècle de l'Hégire (XIe siècle de J.-C.) (1955); I. Y. Krachkovsky, "Deux Chapitres inédits de l'oeuvre de Kratchkovsky sur Ibn al-Muʿtazz," Annales de l'Institut des Études Orientales (Algiers) 20 (1962); W. Heinrichs, Arabische Dichtung und griechische Poetik (1969), and "Literary Theory—the Problem of Its Efficiency," Arabic Poetics: Theory and Development, ed. G. E. Von Grunebaum (1973); S. A. Bonebakker, Materials for the History of Arabic Rhetoric from the Ḥilyat al-muḥāḍara of Ḥātimī (1975); J. E. Bencheikh, Poétique arabe (1975)—additional preface, 1989; V. Cantarino, Arabic Poetics in the Golden Age (1975)—anthol. in trans., with introductory essays often ignorant of earlier lit.; W. Heinrichs, The Hand of the Northwind: Opinions on Metaphor and the Early Meaning of Istiʿāra in Arabic Poetics (1977); K. Abu Deeb, Al-Jurjānī's Theory of Poetic Imagery (1979); G. J. van Gelder, Beyond the Line: Classical Arabic Literary Critics on the Coherence and Unity of the Poem (1982); A. Arazi, "Une Épître d'Ibrāhīm ben Hilāl alṢābī; sur les genres littéraires," Studies in Islamic History and Civilization in Honour of David Ayalon, ed. M. Sharon (1986); I. ʿAbbās, Taʾrīkh al-naqd al-adabī ʿind al-ʿarab, rev. ed. (1993); W. Heinrichs: "Takhyīl: Make-Believe and Image Creation in Arabic Literary Theory," Takhyīl: The Imaginary in Classical Arabic Poetics, Part 1: Texts, ed. and trans. G. J. van Gelder and M. Hammond; Part 2: Studies, ed. G. J. van Gelder and M. Hammond (2008); W. Heinrichs, "Early Ornate Prose and the Rhetorization of Poetry in Arabic Literature," Literary and Philosophical Rhetoric in the Greek, Roman, Syriac, and Arabic Worlds, ed. F. Woerther (2009).

■ II. Modern: D. Semah, Four Modern Egyptian Critics (1974); Adūnis, Al-Thābit wa-al-mutaṇawwil, 3 v. (1974–79); S. al-Jayyusi, Trends and Movements in Modern Arabic Poetics (1977); I. J. Boullata, "Adūnis: Revolt in Modern Arabic Poetics," Edebiyât 2 (1977); J. Jabrā, "Modern Arabic Literature and the West," Critical Perspectives on Modern Arabic Literature, ed. I. J. Boullata (1980); Adūnis, Introduction to Arabic Poetics, trans. C. Cobham (1990); I. J. Boullata, Trends and Issues in Contemporary Arab Thought (1990); S. Somekh, Genre and Language in Modern Arabic Literature (1991); R. Snir, Modern Arabic Literature: A Functional Dynamic Model (2001); Arabischen Literatur postmodern, ed. A. Neuwirth, A. Pflitsch, B. Winckler (2004).

W. P. Heinrichs (CL.); R.M.A. Allen (MOD.)

ARABIC POETRY

I. Introduction
II. 6th to 13th Centuries
III. 13th to 18th Centuries
IV. 19th and 20th Centuries

I. Introduction. Until relatively recently, poetry has served as the predominant mode of literary expression among those who speak and write in Ar. Poetry was, in the traditional phrase, "dīwān al-ʿarab," the register of the Arabs, and poets had and continue to have a particular status in their own community. The Ar. word for poetry, shiʿr, is derived from the verb denoting a special kind of knowledge that was believed in the earliest times to have magical or mantic properties. While poetry has afforded poets the opportunity for personal expression, it has been more often than not a public phenomenon, whether addressed to the tribe of ancient times, the patron during the predominance of the caliphate and the many dynasties of the med. Islamic world, or the many political causes of the present-day Middle East.

Most hists. of Ar. poetry have adopted a dynastic approach based primarily on political and social devels., concentrating mainly on the poets, their role in society, and their themes. This approach serves to illustrate the close links between poetry and poetics on the one hand and divisions of the Islamic sciences on the other. However, while biblio. sources provide evidence of the richness of the trad. available to us, they also make clear not only that large amounts of poetry are lost to us but that much more poetry remains unpublished and unassessed within the critical canon. Further, the hist. of Ar. poetry has recently been undergoing a reevaluation, based on two interlinked phenomena. First, Ar. poetry itself has been going through a period of transformation and radical experimentation since the beginning of the 1950s: this process has led some critics to attempt a redefinition of what poetry is (or should be) and therefrom to initiate projects aimed at a reassessment of the corpus of cl. Ar. poetry. Second, critics have applied new ideas in analysis and theory—e.g., *structuralism, oral-formulaic and *genre theories, and metrics—to the corpus of Ar. poetry.

II. 6th to 13th Centuries

A. The Beginnings: Oral Tradition. What have been recorded as the beginnings of Ar. poetry are versions of a poetic corpus that is already highly developed in the late 5th c. CE. The trad. is an oral one, similar to that of the Homeric poems and Serbo-Croatian songs analyzed by Milman Parry and Albert Lord (see ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY). Thus, each poem or rather the differing versions of each poem represent a single, isolated yet privileged point in a long process of devel. and transmission from poet to reciter (rāwī). Each poem would have been performed before an audience (perhaps accompanied by music or rhythmic beat) and transmitted through generations from one "singer of tales" to another.

B. The Poet. The ability to improvise was (and often still is) part of the craft of Arab poets. Many occasions would arise at which they would extemporize a poem or recite a work from memory. They were important members of the tribe, in effect propagandists, whose role was to extol the tribal virtues—bravery, loyalty, endurance, swiftness of vengeance—and to lampoon the lack of such virtues in the tribe's enemies. The various thematic "genres" used—eulogy, *elegy, and *satire—all concerned praise or its antithesis (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY). The elegy (rithāʾ) provides some of the most moving examples of the poetic voice, as in the poems of al-Khansāʾ (d. ca. 644) for her brother, Ṣakhr, killed in tribal combat:

I was sleepless and I passed the night keeping vigil, as if my eyes had been anointed with pus,
For I had heard—and it was not news to rejoice me—one making a report, who had come repeating intelligence, Saying, "Sakhr is dwelling there in a tomb, struck to the ground beside the grave, between certain stones."
(trans. A. J. Arberry)

The poet used the different genres to depict companionship, the benefits of tribal solidarity, the beauties of women, the qualities of animals, and the joys of wine. Part of this same environment, but from a different social perspective, were several vagabond ṣuʿlūk poets such as al-Shanfarā (d. ca. 525), his companion Thābit ibn Jābir (known by his nickname, Taʾabbaṭa Sharran [he who has put evil under his armpit]), and ʿUrwa ibn al-Ward (d. ca. 594). Ostracized from tribal society, they and their peers wrote stirring odes about their ability to withstand prolonged isolation, hunger, and thirst and their feelings of affinity with the wilder animals of the desert, as in this extract from the poem rhyming on the consonant "l" by al-Shanfarā:

To me now, in your default, are comrades a wolf untired,
A sleek leopard, and a fell hyena with shaggy mane.
True comrades: they ne'er let out the secret in trust with them, Nor basely forsake their friend because he brought them bane.
(trans. R. A. Nicholson)

In contrast to this stark vision of life stands that of the courts of the Ghassanids, the tribe that served as a buffer between the Arabs and Byzantium, and the Lakhmids, who fulfilled the same function vis-à-vis Sasanid Iran from their center at al-Ḥīra (in present-day Iraq). To these courts would come not only tribal poets but professional bards like Ṭarafa ibn al-ʿAbd (d. ca. 565) and Maymūn al-Aʿshā (d. 629) in search of patronage and reward for their eulogies.

C. The Structure of the Poem. The process of oral transmission and the later recording of poetry in written form have not preserved the stages in the early devel. of the Ar. poem. Thus, we find examples of both the short, monothematic poem (qiṭʿa*) and the multisectional, polythematic qaṣīda*. Several examples of the latter came to be highly valued, esp. by the early Muslim caliphs and the ruling Arab aristocracy, which regarded these poems as a source and standard for the study and teaching of the cl. Ar. lang. Seven (and later ten) of the longer odes were gathered into what became the most famous collection of early Ar. poetry, the Muʿallaqāt. The Muʿallaqa of Imruʾ al-Qays (d. ca. 540) is the most famous poem in the collection and indeed probably in all of Ar. lit. Yet each Muʿallaqa manages to reflect its poet's vision of life in pre-Islamic Arabia: that of Zuhayr ibn Abī Sulmā is placed within the context of settling a tribal dispute, while the ode of Labīd (d. ca. 662), with its elaborate animal imagery and concluding aphorisms, is virtually a hymn to tribal values.

Recent analyses of some examples of the pre-Islamic qaṣīda have challenged the received view that its structure is fragmented, a view canonized in part by the conservative critical trad. of ʿamūd al-shiʿr (the essentials of poetry). It is now suggested that the choice and ordering of the various segments of these poems reflect the poet's desire to illustrate by conjunction and opposition the glaring contrasts in community life, making these elaborate poems a public event of almost liturgical significance. Thus, the nasīb (erotic prelude) of many poems will often be placed within the context of the aṭlāl, the section describing the poet's arrival at a deserted encampment. The opening lines of the Muʿallaqa of Imruʾ al-Qays are esp. famous: "Halt (you two) and let us weep for memory of a beloved and an abode / In the edge of the sand dune between ad-Dakhul and Hawmal." A transitional section describing a departure or desert journey allows the poet to give a description of his riding animal, which is often elaborate and lengthy, and provides some of the most memorable lines from this corpus of poetry. From this interweaving of segments, the poet will then turn—often by means of aphoristic sentiments—to the purpose of the poem: the bolstering of the community through praise of its virtues, criticism of contraventions of them, and sheer self-aggrandizement as a means of fostering tribal pride and solidarity.

D. The Advent of Islam. While the advent of Islam brought about radical changes in beliefs and customs in the society of the Arabian Peninsula, the poetic environment changed relatively little. Muhammad himself was not averse to poetry, as sections of Kitāb al-aghānī make abundantly clear. Indeed, Ḥassān ibn Thābit (d. 673) is known as "the poet of the Prophet." His contemporary, Kaʿb ibn Zuhayr, the son of the famous pre-Islamic bard Zuhayr ibn Abī Sulmā, composed a famous poem addressed to Muhammad that illustrates the continuation of the poetic trad. into the new social context; the poem is called al-Burda (The Cloak), since, upon hearing it, Muhammad is alleged to have placed his cloak around the poet:

> I was told that the Messenger of Allah > threatened me (with death), but > with the Messenger of Allah I have > hope of finding pardon.
> Gently! mayst thou be guided by Him > who gave thee the gift of the Koran, > wherein are warnings and a plain > setting-out (of the matter).
>
> (trans. R. A. Nicholson)

The spirit of defiance in the face of imminent danger and even death that characterizes much pre-Islamic poetry is also to be found in the odes of poets belonging to groups that broke away from the incipient Muslim community on religious grounds and fought vigorously for their conception of Islam. The poetry of the supporters of the Kharijite cause, such as al-Ṭirimmāḥ (d. ca. 723), and of the Shīʿa, such as Al-Kumayt ibn Zayd (d. 743), is esp. noteworthy in this regard. The pre-Islamic penchant for satire of rivals and enemies finds fertile ground in the tribal squabbles that continue well into the period of the Umayyads (660–750). In a series of increasingly ribald satires (gathered into a collection known as Al-Naqāʾiḍ), the poets Jarīr (d. 732) and Al-Farazdaq (d. ca. 730), joined among others by the Christian poet Al-Akhṭal (d. 710), followed the pattern of earlier satirical poetry in both form and imagery and adopted rhetorical strategies characteristic of verbal dueling in the Arab world.

E. The Emergence of New Genres. The oral transmission of poetry continued into the Islamic period, ensuring that the Arab poet's attachment to many of the themes and images of the desert lingered long after such environments were superseded by the emerging urban centers of the Muslim community. Thus, Dhū al-Rumma (d. 735) was often referred to as "the last of the poets" because he continued to use desert motifs in his poems a century after the advent of Islam. Inevitably, however, the gradual process of change led to the emergence of new priorities expressed in different ways. On the political level, the changes were far-reaching. During the first century or so of Islam, Muslim armies took the religion to the borders of India in the east and across North Africa to Spain in the west. The center of caliphal authority moved out of the Arabian Peninsula first to Damascus under the Umayyads and then to the newly founded city of Baghdad in 756 under the Abbasids. Under the impetus of this vast exercise in cultural assimilation, authors from different areas of the Islamic world began to adapt the traditional Ar. literary forms and to introduce new themes and genres.

Various segments of the qaṣīda gradually evolved into distinct genres. The collected works of poets composed during the first century of Islam begin to contain separate sections devoted to specific categories: hunt poems (ṭardiyyāt) and wine poems (khamriyyāt)—both of these most notably in the verse of Al-Ḥasan ibn Hāniʾ (d. ca. 810), usually known by his nickname, Abū Nuwās. His wine poetry is noted not only for its disarming lasciviousness but for how he occasionally parodies the desert imagery of the earlier poetry:

> The lovelorn wretch stopped at a > (deserted) camping-ground to > question it, and I stopped to enquire > after the local tavern.
> May Allah not dry the eyes of him that > wept over stones, and may He not > ease the pain of him that yearns to > a tent-peg.
>
> (trans. R. A. Nicholson)

The blind poet Bashshār ibn Burd (d. 784) displayed a similar impatience with Arabian conventions, though in his case it is linked to a desire to express pride in his own Persian ancestry. Another poet of the period, Abū al-Atāhiya (d. 828), is primarily remembered for his moral and ascetic poems (zuhdiyyāt).

One of the most remarkable devels. along these lines is that of the love poem (ghazal*). Soon after the advent of Islam, two distinct trends appear in the Arabian Peninsula. The first, emerging from within the tribal poetic trad., placed the aloof and imperious beloved on a pedestal while the poet suffered the pangs of love from a distance, often leading to a love-death. This trad. is termed ʿUdhrī after the Banu ʿUdhra tribe, noted for having many such lovers, among whom was Jamīl (d. 701), one of the most illustrious exponents of ʿUdhrī poetry. Each of these love poets also carried the name of his beloved: Jamīl, e.g., is Jamīl Buthayna, the beloved of Buthayna; other poets of this type are Kuthayyir ʿAzza (d. 723) and, most famous of all, Majnūn Laylā. The other trad., sensual and self-centered, developed in the cities of the Ḥijāz; it is usually associated with its most famous exponent ʿUmar ibn Abī Rabīʿa (d. 719). With the gradual devel. of the genre, the two separate strands fused, as can be seen in the works of poets such as ʿAbbās ibn al-Aḥnaf (d. ca. 807) in the east and Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi (d. 940) in al-Andalus (as Islamic Spain was known).

F. The Badīʿ Style: Imagery and Rhetoric. During the caliphate of ʿUthmān (d. 644), a generally accepted version of the Qurʾān (Koran) was established in writing, a process that set in motion many intellectual currents later to have a profound effect on poetry. Scholars in Kūfa and Baṣra (both in present-day Iraq) began to prepare the materials needed for authenticating the transmission of the Qurʾān, interpreting its text, and codifying the Ar. lang. in which the sacred text proclaims itself to have been revealed. Anthols. of poetry of different genres and from particular tribes were made, a process that involved the devel. of basic critical terms for the evaluation of literary works. A philologist of Baṣra, Al-Khalīl ibn Aḥmad (d. 791), analyzed the sounds and rhythms of the earliest poetry and set down his results as a set of meters that formed part of a definition of poetry (as "rhymed and metered discourse") that was widely regarded as canonical up to the end of World War II (see ARABIC PROSODY). This philological activity was accompanied by a gradual shift away from the predominantly oral culture of pre-Islamic Arabia toward a society in which verbal art was committed to writing.

Within this environment of compilation, authentification, and analysis, there now emerges in Ar. poetry badīʿ, a term that literally means "innovative" but that involves a greater awareness of the potential uses of poetic imagery. The poet-caliph Ibn al-Muʿtazz (d. 908) wrote a famous analysis of the five most significant tropes (incl. simile and metaphor) entitled Kitāb al-Badīʿ, a work that took many of its examples from early poetry and the text of the Qurʾān. This was to be the first in an increasingly complex series of rhetorical analyses. The discussions that evolved around the subject of badīʿ were part of a dynamic period in the devel. of Islamic thought on religious, ethnic, ideological, and cultural issues. They also raised questions of literary taste and provoked fierce debate between proponents of the "new" (muḥdathūn) poets and the old. Much critical opprobrium was reserved for the poet Abū Tammām (d. 846), who was widely condemned for carrying the use of badīʿ to excessive lengths. At a later date, the great critic ʿAbd al-Qāhir al-Jurjānī (d. 1078) pioneered the analysis of the psychological impact of imagery on the reader and thereby accentuated the originality of many of Abū Tammām's ideas, a verdict gaining increasing credence in modern crit.

With the growth of the bureaucracy at the caliph's court and the expansion of the Islamic dominions—accompanied almost automatically by the emergence of local potentates-—plentiful sources of patronage became available to reward poets who would compose occasional poems. During the heyday of cl. Ar. poetry, many such centers existed: the Umayyads and their successors in al-Andalus; the Hamdanids in Aleppo, Syria; the Ikhshidids in Egypt; and the court in Baghdad. To all these centers poets would come in search of favor and reward. The poet who best exemplifies this patronage system is al-Mutanabbī (d. 965). He composed poems for all kinds of occasions and for a number of rulers and patrons, some of whom are eulogized and later mercilessly lampooned. Developing the use of the badīʿ style and combining a superb control of the lang. with an innate sense of the gnomic phrase, he was soon widely regarded as the greatest of the cl. Ar. poets. His Dīwān (collected poetry) provides us with many splendid examples of the qaṣīda as occasional poem; his examples of eulogy (madīḥ) are among the most famous contributions to a genre that was a major form of verbal art in Arab civilization:

> Whither do you intend, great prince?
> We are the herbs of the hills and > you are the clouds;
> We are the ones time has been miserly > towards respecting you, and the > days cheated of your presence.
> Whether at war or peace, you aim at > the heights, whether you tarry or > hasten.
>
> (trans. A. J. Arberry, 1965)

A great admirer of al-Mutanabbī's poetry was Abū al-ʿAlāʾ al-Maʿarrī (d. 1057). This blind poet and philosopher began by imitating his great predecessor, but his collection of poems entitled Luzūm mā lā yalzam (Requirement of the Nonrequired), the title of which reflects the fact that he imposes strict formal rules on himself, combines consummate skill in the use of poetic lang. with some of the most pessimistic sentiments to be found in the entire Ar. canon:

> Would that a lad had died in the very > hour of birth
> And never sucked, as she lay in child-> bed, his mother's breast!
> Her babe, it says to her or ever its > tongue can speak,
> "Nothing thou gett'st of me but sorrow > and bitter pain."
>
> (trans. R. A. Nicholson)

Three poets of al-Andalus from this period deserve particular mention: Ibn Shuhayd (d. 1035) and Ibn Ḥazm (d. 1063), both of whom contributed to crit. as well as to poetry; and Ibn Zaydūn (d. 1070), who celebrated his great love, the Umayyad Princess Wallāda, and then rued her loss to a rival at court. The Iberian Peninsula was also to contribute to Ar. poetry two strophic genres, the muwashshaḥ (see HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS) and zajal (see ZÉJEL). The origins and prosodic features of both genres are the subject of continuing and intense debate. The final strophe or refrain known as the kharja* (envoi) was originally a popular song in Romance or a mixture of Romance and Hispano-Ar. sung by a girl about her beloved:

> My beloved is sick for love of me.
> How can he not be so?

Do you not see that he is not allowed near me?

(trans. J. T. Monroe)

This refrain provides the rhyme scheme for the other strophes in the poem that are in literary Ar. Interspersed between them are other verses with separate rhymes. In the zajal genre, the colloquial lang. sometimes encountered in the kharja of the muwashshaḥ is used in the body of the poem itself. With its illustrious exponent Ibn Quzmān (d. 1159), the fame of the genre spread to the East.

As the corpus of poetics and rhet. increased in scope and complexity, poetry itself tended to become more stereotyped and convention-bound, e.g., the poetry of Ibn ʿArabī (d. 1240), one of the major figures in Islamic theology; the mystical poet Ibn al-Fāriḍ (d. 1235); and Bahāʾ al-Din Zuhayr, whose death in 1258 coincides with the capture of Baghdad by the Mongols, an event generally acknowledged as signaling the end of the cl. period in Islamic culture.

III. 13th to 18th Centuries. The era between the 13th and early 19th cs. has often been characterized as "the period of decadence," a designation that not only reflects the distaste of subsequent critics for poetry in which a penchant for verbal virtuosity and poetic tropes prevailed but serves to conceal a general lack of research that has until recently characterized scholarly interest in this lengthy period. These six centuries have often been subdivided into two subperiods: an earlier Mamluk period (13th–16th cs.) and an Ottoman (16th–early 19th cs.). While the poetic output of the latter period still remains largely unexplored, the example of the poetry of ʿAbd al-Ghanī al-Nābulusī (d. 1731) gives an indication of the riches that further research may reveal. Meanwhile, the poetic production of the Mamluk period clearly runs counter to the "decadent" label. The so-called Burda poem (after that of Kaʿb ibn Zuhayr) composed by al-Būṣīrī (ca. 1212–96) has for centuries found a wide audience within the mystical circles of popular Islam much in evidence throughout the period; concurrently in Spain, Ḥāzim al-Qartājannī (d. 1285) was not only a major contributor to the trad. of Ar. poetics but a poet in his own right. The Iraqi poet Ṣafī al-Din al-Ḥillī (d. 1349) not only wrote his own poetry but composed a study of the muwashshaḥ and zajal. Many of these poets were adept at composing verse full of embellishments, e.g., poems in which each word begins with the same letter or each word starts with the final grapheme of the previous word. This was indeed a period of verbal artifice but also one of compilation (incl. the major Ar. dictionaries) and explication. Ibn Mālik (d. 1274) composed a poem in 1,000 verses on Ar. grammar, a text that was still in use in Egyptian religious schools at the turn of the 20th c.

The limited size of the audience for the elite lit. just outlined may account for the considerable vigor of the popular literary trad. during these centuries. This is most evident in the greatest of all narrative collections, 1001 Nights, as well as in other popular tales that contain large amounts of poetry in a variety of styles. And, while the trad. of popular poetry is sparsely documented, some intimations of its liveliness and variety can be gauged from the (albeit bawdy) poetry to be found in the shadow plays of the Egyptian oculist Ibn Dāniyāl (d. 1311).

IV. 19th and 20th Centuries

A. The Beginnings of the Modern Revival. The process whereby Ar. poetry enters a new phase is termed al-nahḍa (revival). Two principal factors are involved: what one scholar has termed "the Arab Rediscovery of Europe" on the one hand and a reexamination of the cl. trad. of Ar. poetry and poetics on the other. Esp. noteworthy figures in this revival are Rifāʿa al-Ṭahṭāwī (d. 1873) in Egypt, and Buṭrus al-Bustānī (d. 1883), Nāṣīf al-Yāzijī (d. 1871—who was particularly inspired by the poetry of al-Mutanabbī), and Aḥmad Fāris al-Shidyāq (d. 1887) in Lebanon.

B. Neoclassicism. Al-Mutanabbī was also the inspiration of one of the first major figures in the neoclassical movement, the Egyptian Maḥmūd Sāmī al-Bārūdī (d. 1904), who advocated a return to the directness and purity of cl. Ar. poetry and composed poems to illustrate his ideas. Within the chronology of its own mod. hist., every Arab country fostered neoclassical poets, e.g., the Egyptian Hāfez Ibrahim (d. 1932), the Iraqis Jamīl Ṣidqī al-Zahāwī (d. 1936) and Maʿrūf al-Ruṣāfī (d. 1945), and somewhat later, the Palestinian Ibrāhīm Ṭūqān (d. 1941). However, critical opinion is virtually unanimous in judging Aḥmad Shawqī (d. 1932) as the greatest poet of the neoclassical school. Whether in his stirring calls to the Egyptian people, his more personal descriptive verse, or his still-popular operettas, his superbly cadenced poetry seems destined to secure him a place in the pantheon of great Ar. poets. While recent devels. in Ar. poetry produced many changes, several poets continued to compose poetry in the traditional manner, esp. Muḥammad al-Jawāhirī, (d. 1997) Badawī al-Jabal (pseud. of Muḥammad Sulaymān al-Aḥmad, d. 1981), and Al-Akhṭal al-Ṣaghīr (pseud. of Bishāra al-Khūrī, d. 1968).

C. Romanticism. Signs of a reaction against the occasional nature of much neoclassical verse can be found in the works of the Lebanese poet Khalīl Muṭrān (d. 1949), although not so much in his own poetry as in his writings about poetry and particularly the intro. to his collected poems (1908). Full-blooded romanticism in Ar. poetry comes from the poets of al-mahjar (the émigré school), as the Arab poets of the Americas are called. While Amīn al-Rīḥānī (d. 1940) was certainly much admired in the Middle East, the undisputed leader of the northern group was Khalīl Jubrān (Kahlil Gibran; d. 1931), as famous for his works in Eng. as for those in Ar.:

Give me the flute and sing! Forget all that you and I have said

Talk is but dust in the air, so tell me of your deeds.
(trans. M. Khouri and H. Algar)

Far removed from their native land, Jubrān and his colleagues, among whom were Mīkhāʾīl Nuʿayma (b. 1889), Īliyyā Abū Māḍī (d. 1957), and Nasīb ʿArīḍa (d. 1946), proceeded to experiment with lang., form, and mood and, in so doing, introduced a new voice into Ar. poetry. Jubrān was also in constant touch with his fellow-countrymen in South America, among whom Fawzī Maʿlūf (d. 1930) is the most significant figure.

In the Middle East, the ideals of Eng. *romanticism were vigorously advocated by three Egyptian poets: al-ʿAqqād, Ibrāhīm al-Māzinī (d. 1949), and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Shukrī (d. 1958). While all three wrote poetry, the primary function of the group was to criticize the neoclassical school in favor of a new, more individual role for the poet. The 1930s and 1940s were the heyday of romanticism in Ar. poetry. In 1932, Aḥmad Zakī abū-Shādī (d. 1955) founded the Apollo Society in Cairo, which published a magazine to which several poets, incl. Ibrāhīm Nājī (d. 1953), ʿAlī Maḥmūd Ṭāhā (d. 1949), and the Tunisian Abū al-Qāsim al-Shābbī (d. 1934) made contributions. Among other important figures in the devel. of romantic Ar. poetry are ʿUmar Abū Rīsha in Syria, Yūsuf Tījānī al-Bashīr (d. 1937) in the Sudan, and Ṣalāḥ Labakī (d. 1955) and Ilyās Abū Shabaka (d. 1947) in Lebanon. As a critic Labakī also devoted his attention to the devel. of a symbolist school of poetry, much indebted to Fr. poetic theory (see SYMBOLISM) and associated with the Lebanese poets Yūsuf Ghuṣūb and (esp.) Saʿīd ʿAql.

D. The Emergence of "New Poetry": The Role of the Poet. The period following World War II was one of political uncertainty, frequent changes of government, and revolution. The creation of the state of Israel in 1948 served as a major psychological catalyst in the Arab world. In the revolutionary atmosphere during the 1950s, the poetry of the late romantics, in particular symbolists such as Saʿīd ʿAql, came to be regarded as elitist, ivory-tower lit. Along with the prevalence of such causes as Palestinian rights, nationalism (whether the Pan-Arab or local variety), revolution, and communism came the rallying cry for "commitment" (iltizām). Not surprisingly, among the most prominent contributors to poetry of commitment have been a large group of Palestinian poets; particularly noteworthy are Maḥmūd Darwīsh (d. 2008), Fadwā Ṭūqān (b. 1917), and Samīḥ al-Qāsim (b. 1939). The other overriding topic of political poetry has been life among the poorer classes in both the cities and provinces of the Arab-world nations: the earlier poetry of Badr Shākir al-Sayyāb (d. 1964), ʿAbd al-Wahhāb al-Bayyātī (b. 1926), and Ṣalāḥ ʿAbd al-Sabūr (d. 1982) shows this concern, as do the works of Aḥmad ʿAbd al-Muʿṭī Ḥijāzī (b. 1935) and Muḥammad Miftāḥ al-Faytūrī (b. 1930). The dark visions of Khalīl Ḥāwī (d. 1982) show a more subtle kind of commitment, tinged with bitterness, as in the prescient commentary on the Arab world in the 1960s, "Lazarus 1962":

Deepen the pit, gravedigger, Deepen it to bottomless depths beyond the sun's orbit;
night of ashes, remnants of a star buried in the wheeling abyss.
(trans. A. Haydar and M. Beard)

The most widely read poet in the contemp. Middle East in the second half of the 20th c. was undoubtedly Nizār Qabbānī (d. 1998), who earned enormous popularity for his several volumes of sensuous love poetry. During the 1950s, he also wrote poems of social protest, such as his famous "Bread, Hashish and Moonlight"; particularly following the June war of 1967, political and social issues were constant topics in his poetry. Also immensely popular was Darwīsh, who managed for over half a century to encapsulate in his exquisitely crafted poetry the experience of his own Palestinian people.

With Adūnis (pseud. of ʿAlī Aḥmad Saʿīd, b. 1930), a different kind of commitment is encountered. After editing with his colleague, the Lebanese Christian poet Yūsuf al-Khāl (d. 1987), the jour. Shiʿr, which has had immense influence in the devel. of a mod. poetics in the Arab world, Adūnis broke away and in 1968 founded his own jour., Mawāqif. He has published numerous poetry collections of startling originality:

To a father who died, green as a cloud with a sail on his face, I bow.
("Waṭan" [Homeland], Journal of Arabic Literature 2 [1971])

Using his jour. and its coterie as a conduit for his ideas, he advocates the need for "innovation," viewing the primary purpose of poetry as the use of words in new ways.

E. Changes in Form. Strophic Ar. poetry has existed from at least the 10th c. The mod. period has also witnessed other experiments, such as *blank and *free verse. Also noteworthy are metrical experiments within folk poetry, particularly in Lebanon where Rashīd Nakhla (d. ca. 1940) and Michel Ṭrād composed poems in strophic form and with mixed meters. In 1947, two Iraqi poets, Nāzik al-Malāʾika (b. 1923) and al-Sayyāb, initiated a break from the concept of the line as poetic unit and thus paved the way for the emergence of shiʿr ḥurr ("free verse"). In fact, al-Malāʾika's attempt to establish a new set of rules based on the single foot (tafʿīla) rather than the line (bayt) was soon discarded as poets began to experiment with both traditional and new quantitative patterns in their poetry. Other poets have pursued this trend even further by composing prose poetry (qaṣīdat al-nathr) in which the sheer conjunction and musicality of words contribute to the poetic moment: *alliteration, *assonance, and *imagery are combined in the works of poets such as Jabrā Ibrāhim Jabrā (b. 1919), Muḥammad al-Māghūṭ (b. 1934), and Tawfīq Ṣāyigh (d. 1971).

The Arab poet today continues to be influenced and inspired by the great cl. trad., but the stimuli provided by his own time and world are now international and of considerable variety. While poetry continues to hold its traditionally prestigious position and to fulfill an esp. important role in times of crisis, recent cultural trends—particularly the growing prominence of visual media and their markets—have tended to afford a greater cultural priority to narrative genres. One consequence of the increasing role that such media have come to play is the enhancement of the status of more popular forms of poetry (in both standard lang. and colloquial dialects), not least through recordings of their performance modes. The public function of the Arab poet, a permanent feature of the Ar. poetic heritage, is thus being brought to a yet wider audience.

■ General Reference Works: C. Brockelmann, Geschichte der Arabischen Literatur, 2 v. (1898–1902), Supplementbanden, 3 v. (1937–42); A. Fischer, Schawahid Indices (1945); Encyclopedia of Islam, 2d ed. (1954–), 3d ed. (2007–); J. D. Pearson, Index Islamicus 1906–1955 (1958), Supplements (1956–80); The Fihrist of al-Nadim, trans. B. Dodge, 2 v. (1970); M. Alwan, "A Bibliography of Modern Arabic Poetry in English Translation," Middle East Journal 27, (Summer 1973); F. Sezgin, Geschichte des Arabischen Schriftums, v. 2 (1975); Modern Literature in the Near and Middle East 1850–1970, ed. R. C. Ostle (1991); S. J. Altoma, Modern Arabic Poetry in English Translation (1993); R. Allen, The Arabic Literary Heritage (1998); Encyclopedia of Arabic Literature, 2 v., ed. J. S. Meisami and P. Starkey (1998); H. Toelle and K. Zakharia, A la découverte de la littérature arabe (2003); P. G. Starkey, Modern Arabic Literature (2006); Histoire de la littérature arabe moderne, ed. B. Hallaq and H. Toelle (2007).

■ Anthologies: Arabic Poetry for English Readers, ed. W. A. Clouston (1881); Ancient Arabic Poetry, ed. C. J. Lyall (1885); W. S. Blunt, Seven Golden Odes of Pagan Arabia (1903); R. A. Nicholson, Translations of Eastern Poetry and Prose (1922); Modern Arabic Poetry, ed. and trans. A. J. Arberry (1950); The Seven Odes, trans. A. J. Arberry (1957); Al-Majānī al-Ḥadītha ʿan Majānī al-Ab Shaykhū, ed. F. Afram al-Bustānī, 3 v. (1960–61); Dīwān al-Shiʿr al-ʿArabī, ed. Adūnis (1964–68); Arabic Poetry (1965) and Poems of al-Mutanabbi (1967), both ed. A. J. Arberry; Anthologie de la littérature arabe contemporaine, trans. L. Norin and E. Tarabay (1967); An Anthology of Modern Arabic Verse, ed. M. Badawi (1970); Hispano-Arabic Poetry, ed. and trans. J. T. Monroe (1974); Mawsūʿat al-Shiʿr al-ʿArabī, ed. K. K. Ḥāwī and M. Ṣafadī (1974–); An Anthology of Modern Arabic Poetry, trans. M. Khouri and H. Algar (1974); Modern Arab Poets 1950–1975, I. Boullata (1976); K. Ḥāwī, Naked in Exile, trans. A. Haydar and M. Beard (1984); Majnun et Layla, trans. A. Miquel and P. Kemp (1984); Classical Arabic Poetry, trans. C. Tuetey (1985); Modern Arabic Poetry, ed. S. K. Jayyusi (1987); ʿAbd. al-Wahhāb al-Bayātī, Love, Death and Exile, trans. B. K. Frangieh (1990); N. Kabbani, Arabian Love Poems, trans. B. K. Frangieh and C. Brown (1993); Night and Horses and The Desert, ed. R. Irwin (1999); Adonis, A Time between Ashes and Roses, trans. S. M. Toorawa (2004); S. al-Qasim, Sadder Than Water, trans. N. Kassis (2006); M. Darwīsh, The Butterfly's Burden, trans. Fady Joudah (2007); Mourid Barghouti, Midnight, trans. R. Ashour (2008).

■ Criticism and History: W. Ahlwardt, Über Poesie und Poetik der Araber (1856); I. Goldziher, Short History of Classical Arabic Literature (1908), trans. J. Desomogyi (1966); R. A. Nicholson, Literary History of the Arabs (1914), Studies in Islamic Poetry (1921), Studies in Islamic Mysticism (1921); Ṭ. Ḥusayn, Al-Shiʿr al-Jāhilī (1926); H.A.R. Gibb, Arabic Literature (1926); U. Farrukh, Das Bild der Frühislam in der arabischen Dichtung (1937); N. al-Bahbītī, Tārīkh al-Shiʿr al-ʿArabī (1950); M. al-Nuwayhī, Al-Shiʿr al-Jāhilī (n.d.); R. Serjeant, South Arabic Poetry (1951); R. Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe, 3 v. (1952–66); G. Gomez, Poesia arabigoandaluza (1952); G. von Grunebaum, Kritik und Dichtkunst (1955); N. al-Asad, Maṣādir al-Shiʿr al-Jāhilī (1956); I. ʿAbbas, Tārīkh al-Adab al-Andalusī (1959); J. al-Rikābī, Fi al-Adab al-Andalusī (1960); N. al-Malāʾika, Qaḍāyā al-shiʿr al-muʿāṣir (1962); S. Ḍayf, Tārīkh al-Adab al-ʿArabī, 4 v. (1963–73); J. Kamāl al-dīn, Al-Shiʿr al-ʿArabī al-Ḥadīth wa-rūḥ al-ʿaṣr (1964); E. Wagner, Abu Nuwas (1965); M. Ullmann, Untersuchungen zur Ragazpoesie (1966); I. Ismāʿīl, Al-Shiʿr al-ʿArabī al-muʿāṣir (1967); G. Shukrī, Shiʿrunā al-Ḥadīth (1968); J. Vadet, L'Esprit courtois en Orient dans les premiers siècles de l'Hégire (1968); W. Heinrichs, Arabische Dichtung und griechische Poetik (1969); M. Bateson, Structural Continuity in Poetry (1970); M. al-Nuwayhī, Qaḍiyyat al-shiʿr al-jadīd (1971); R. Jacobi, Studien zur Poetik der altarabischen Qaside (1971); J. T. Monroe, "Oral Composition in Pre-Islamic Poetry," Journal of Arabic Literature 3 (1972); M. Ṣubḥi, Dirāsāt taḥlīliyya fī al-shiʿr al-ʿArabī al-muʿāṣir (1972); Arabic Poetry, ed. G. von Grunebaum (1973); J. ʿAsfūr, Al-ṣūra al-fanniyya fi al-turāth al-naqdī wa-al-balāghī (1974); S. Ḍayf, Al-Taṭawwur wa-al-tajdīd fī al-shiʿr al-Umawī (1974); A. Hamori, On the Art of Medieval Arabic Literature (1974); R. Scheindlin, Form and Structure in the Poetry of Al-Muʿtamid ibn ʿAbbād (1974); S. M. Stern, Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry (1974); M. Badawi, A Critical Introduction to Modern Arabic Poetry (1975); J. Bencheikh, Poétique arabe (1975); S. A. Bonebakker, Materials for the History of Arabic Rhetoric from the "Hilyat al-muhādara of Hātimīi" (1975); J. Stetkevych, "The Arabic Lyrical Phenomenon in Context," Journal of Arabic Literature 6 (1975); L. F. Compton, Andalusian Lyrical Poetry and Old Spanish Love Songs (1976); S. Moreh, Modern Arabic Poetry 1800–1970 (1976); R. Hitchcock, The Kharjas (1977); S. K. Jayyusi, Trends and Movements in Modern Arabic Poetry (1977); K. Kheir Beik, Le Mouvement moderniste de la poésie arabe contemporaine (1978); M. Zwettler, The Oral Tradition of Classical Arabic Poetry (1978); Y. al-Yūsuf, Al-Shiʿr al-ʿArabī al-muʿāṣir (1980); M. Abdul-Hai, Tradition and English and American Influence in Arabic Romantic Poetry (1982); G. van Gelder, Beyond the Line (1982); Arabic Literature to the End of the Umayyad Period, ed. A. Beeston et al. (1983); M. Ajami, The Neckveins of Winter (1984); S. Stetkevych, "The Ṣuʿlūk and His Poem: A Paradigm of Passage Manqué," Journal of the American Oriental Society 104 (1984); Adonis, Introduction à la poétique arabe (1985); S. A. Sowayan, Nabati Po- etry (1985); M. R. Menocal, The Arabic Role in Medieval Literary History (1988); S. Sperl, Mannerism in Arabic Poetry (1989); Abbasid Belles-Letters, ed. Julia Ashtiany et al. (1990); Religion, Learning and Science in the Abbasid Period, ed. M.J.L. Young et al. (1990); C. Bailey, Bedouin Poetry from Sinai and the Negev (1991); S. P. Stetkevych, Abū Tammām and the Poetics of the ʿAbbāsid Age (1991); A. Hamori, The Composition of Mutanabbi's Panegyrics to Sayf al-Dawla (1992); Modern Arabic Literature, ed. M. M. Badawi (1992); M. al-Nowaihi, The Poetry of Ibn Khafajah (1993); J. Stetkevych, The Zephyrs of Najd (1993); K. Abdel-Malek, Muhammad in the Modern Egyptian Popular Ballad (1994); T. E. Homerin, From Arab Poet to Muslim Saint (1994)—on Ibn al-Fāriḍ; Reorientations: Arabic and Persian Poetry, ed. S. Stetkevych (1994); P. M. Kurpershoek, Oral Poetry and Narratives from Central Arabia, 3 v. (1994–96); D. F. Reynolds, Heroic Poets, Poetic Heroes (1995); Qasida Poetry in Islamic Asia and Africa, ed. S. Sperl and C. Shackle, 2 v. (1996); P. F. Kennedy, The Wine Song in Classical Arabic Poetry (1997); T. DeYoung, Placing the Poet (1998)—on Badr Shākir al-Sayyāb; The Literature of Al-Andalus, ed. Maria Rosa Menocal et al. (2000); A. A. Bamia, The Graying of the Raven (2001); The Literature of Al-Andalus, ed. Maria Rosa Menocal et al. (2000); T. E. Homerin, ʿUmar Ibn al-Fāriḍ, Sufi Verse, Saintly Life (2001); S. Stetkevych, The Poetics of Islamic Legitimacy (2002); B. Gruendler, Medieval Arabic Praise Poetry (2003); H. Kilpatrick, Making the Great Book of Songs (2003); A. Månsson, Passage to a New World (2003); A. M. Sumi, Description in Classical Arabic Poetry (2004); Ghazal as World Literature, ed. T. Bauer and A. Neuwirth, 2 v. (2005–6); M. J. al-Musawi, Arabic Poetry (2006); G. Schoeler, The Oral and the Written in Early Islam, trans. U. Vagelphol (2006); Arabic Literature in the Post-Classical Period, ed. R. Allen and D. S. Richards (2006); Nadia G. Yaqub, Pens, Swords, and the Springs of Art (2007); C. Holes, Poetry and Politics in Contemporary Bedouin Society (2009).

R.M.A. Allen

ARABIC PROSODY. Ar. *versification (al-ʿArūḍ) is quantitative (see QUANTITY), a unique phenomenon among the Semitic langs., where accent verse systems dominate (see ACCENTUAL VERSE), although in the beginning the ancient Ar. verse was no different from other examples of the archaic Semitic poetry, Akkadian, Ugaritic, or biblical. Ar. poetry starts as the parallelistic verse (see PARALLELISM, at first even unrhymed. From the earliest examples, dating back to the 1st c. CE, it underwent a long evolution until it emerged in the middle of the 6th c. CE as a highly organized metrical system. The intermediate archaic verse forms, found by a researcher as coexisting in time, though they mark stages of devel., are the following:

(1) Sajʿ, often translated as "rhymed prose," but for the early oral phase, it is a verse form, based on the parallelistic technique with no concrete meter discernible, attested in the sayings of pre-Islamic kāhins and Bedouins, as well as in the early Meccan sūras of the Qurʾān.

(2) Rajaz, later incorporated in the ʿArūḍ system as one of its meters, initially it was a short verse form labeled by the Ar. scholars as "one-hemistich verse" with a rather loose structure where one can already observe the emergence of the alternative rhythm of the quantitative nature, though some of its features, such as the possibility of inner pauses within the verse line, suggest that *accent still played a moderate part in creating the verse rhythm. The adaptation of its loose pattern to the strict (or can we say overstrict) ʿArūḍ rules created difficulties for Ar. scholars starting from the creator of the metrical theory, al-Khalīl ibn Aḥmad (d. ca. 786).

Al-Khalīl noticed that the rhythmic core of Ar. prosody is the alternation of longer and shorter prosodic segments. In other words, it is based solely on quantity or temporal duration. The very notion of stress is absent from his theory. The notion of syllable in its cl. form is also absent, but this is not a symptom of the deficiency of the theory. Al-Khalīl invented another system of concepts for the analysis of the structure of Ar. verse, by far surpassing in that capacity the traditional Eur. notion of syllable, as it takes account of the fact—often neglected by Eur. scholars—that the sequence that we call short syllable (CV) cannot be pronounced autonomously or is not a syllable at all.

The basis notion is ḥarf, which can be either sākin (quiescent), i.e., a consonant or a long vowel, or mutaḥ arrik (moving), i.e., a consonant followed by a short vowel. Both variants (one being structurally identical with the CV) are less than the minimum of pronunciation, as it should always begin with the "moving" ḥarf and end with the "quiescent" one. So, the minimum of Ar. speech is a two-ḥarf segment (structurally identical with a "long syllable"—CVC or CVlong).

The notion has a twofold function in the metrical structure. First, it is used as the means of the segmentation of speech into elementary prosodic units (EPU). The goal is achieved by stops at each unvocalized ḥarf; as a result, each EPU has an identical structural pattern: a number (one or more) of vocalized ḥarfs and a final unvocalized ḥarf. Second, the ḥarf is a unit of measurement of prosodic length, which can be considered a functional equivalent of the universal notion of mora*. So, the length of EPU can be two ḥarfs (this is the minimum), three ḥarfs, four ḥarfs, and so on.

These EPU play the role of metrical syllables in the ʿArūḍ structure, the two-ḥarf unit being the short one and the three-ḥarf unit the long one. The shorter one is called sabab (rope or cord) and the longer one watid (peg); both terms go back to the image of a Bedouin tent. There is a beautiful legend about an aged shaykh teaching a youth to compose poetry. The master says that all verses are composed of two elements—naʿam (yes)—this is watid—and lā (no)—this is sabab. So, if we recite, "Naʿam lā naʿam lā lā . . . ," we get one meter, while if we recite, "Lā lā naʿam lā lā naʿam . . . ," we get another meter and so on.

The sababs and watids are the core of the alternative verse rhythm, in which the first EPU functions as thesis and the second as arsis (see ARSIS AND THESIS), but the actual set of EPU postulated by ʿArūḍ is wider as it comprises four-ḥarf and five-ḥarf segments called smaller fāṣila and larger fāṣila, which can be treated as prosodic clusters made of a combination of the sababs and watids with the prosodic boundary between them eliminated.

Certain combinations of metrical syllables make ʿArūḍ *feet. The theory postulates eight different types of feet, but only seven of them are real, while the eighth is a purely fictitious foot postulated by al-Khalīl to solve some theoretical difficulties he encountered. They have a uniform structure: one watid that is the arsis of the foot plus one or two sababs (or smaller fāṣila). It follows that the prosodic length of the ʿArūḍ feet is either five or seven ḥarfs (or morae). The seven foot types (presented by mnemonic word patterns taken from Ar. morphology with some modifications that go back to al-Khalīl and by numerical schemes where two stands for sabab, three for watid, and four for smaller fāṣila) are the following:

faʿūlun: 32 (trochaic foot), e.g., kitābun, dhahabtum fāʿilun: 23 (iambic foot), e.g., kātibun, lam yakun mafāʿīlun: 322 (dactylic foot-1), e.g., hunā shamsun mufāʿalatun: 34 (dactylic foot-2), e.g., faqad dhahabū fāʿilātun: 232 (amphibrachic foot), e.g., min kitābin mustafʿilun: 223 (anapaestic foot-1), e.g., mustaqbalun, lam yadhhabū mutafāʿilun: 43 (anapaestic foot-2), e.g., mutadhāhirun, wahabū lahā

It can be seen that the Ar. presentation, with the help of ḥarf/mora and EPU/metrical syllables, reveals the structural affinity of Ar. metrics with other systems of versification and gives the firm basis for typological studies.

The system of Ar. meters started to develop from three archaic rhythms, identified with three functional forms (*genres) of ancient poetry that already had names in pre-Islamic vocabulary:

(1) descending, either trochaic (32) or dactylic (322/34), which was initially associated with the trad. of old Ar. singing, now extinct; this form of poetry with short (four-foot) verse lines was called hazaj;
(2) ascending, either iambic (23) or anapestic (223/43), which was initially associated with declamation, not singing; this—probably the oldest—form of poetry with extra-short (three-foot) lines was called rajaz; see above;
(3) ambivalent, ascending-descending, or amphibrachic (232), which was initially associated with the trad. of Persian singing, imported into Arabia via al-Ḥīra; this form of poetry, the most recent it seems, with short (four-foot) lines was called ramal.

The set of meters that constitute the classic system of ʿArūḍ was born out of the three basic rhythms with the help of the processes of elongating verse lines and of introducing strict order in the alternation of inter-watid intervals.

Al-Khalīl himself identified 15 meters, and the 16th meter was added later on. On the basis of their origin and structural affinity, they can be grouped in three metrical families.

A. Hazaj. The hazaj family comprises five meters. The rhyme schemes follow each definition:

(1) ṭawīl (long): An eight-foot meter of two *hemistichs and the only one that does not have shorter forms. It is the main meter of qaṣīd poetry (see QAṢĪDA), almost half of which is written in this meter):

faʿūlun / mafāʿīlun / fāʿilun / mafāʿīlun // 32 322 32 33
faʿīlun / mafāʿīlun / fāʿilun / mafāʿīlun
32 322 32 322

(2) wāfir (abundant, full): A six-foot meter that also has a rare four-foot variation, one of the four main qaṣīd meters:

mufāʿalatun / mufāʿalatun / mufāʿalatun // 34 34 34
mufāʿalatun / mufāʿalatun / mufāʿalatun
34 34 34

(3) hazaj (quick vibration of sound): Theoretically, a six-foot meter but used exclusively as a shorter, four-foot variation. This rare meter, rhythmically close to wāfir, is the direct heir of the archaic hazaj; see above:

mafāʿīlun / mafāʿīlun // mafāʿīlun / mafāʿīlun
322 322 322 322

(4) mutaqārib (contracted or drawn near each other): An eight-foot meter made only of five-ḥarf feet, which is unusual for Ar. verse—hence, its name. Its frequency is 5 to 15 percent, and it is one of the six most popular meters of cl. Ar. poetry. Its short six-foot variation is much less frequent than the long one:

faʿūlun / faʿūlun / faʿūlun / faʿūlun //
32 32 32 32
faʿūlun / faʿūlun / faʿūlun / faʿūlun
32 32 32 32

(5) muḍāriʿ (similar): Theoretically, a four-foot meter but never used by poets. Its scheme is as follows:

mafāʿīlun / fāʿilātun // mafāʿīlun / fāʿilātun
322 232 322 232

B. Rajaz. The rajaz family comprises seven meters:

(1) basīṭ (outspread, unfolded): An eight-foot meter but with a shorter six-foot variation, one of the four main qaṣīd meters:

mustafʿilun / fāʿilun / mustafʿilun / fāʿilun // 223 23 223 23
mustafʿilun / fāʿilun / mustafʿilun / fāʿilun
223 23 223 23

(2) kāmil (complete): A six-foot meter that also has a four-foot variation, one of the four main qaṣīd meters:

mutafāʿilun / mutafāʿilun / mutafāʿilun // 43 43 43
mutafāʿilun / mutafāʿilun / mutafāʿilun
43 43 43

(3) rajaz (trembling sound, murmur): One of the oldest meters, rhythmically close to kāmil, used from time immemorial exclusively as a short three-foot (or even a two-foot) variation; in the theory of ʿArūḍ it is presented as a "normal" six-foot meter:

mustafʿilun / mustafʿilun / mustafʿilun // 223 223 223
mustafʿilun / mustafʿilun / mustafʿilun
223 223 223

(4) sarīʿ (quick): A six-foot meter that also has a short, three-foot variation. It definitely shows affinity to rajaz, and if treated according to actual prosodic practice, it becomes a specific variation of rajaz with deformation at the end of each hemistich, nothing more. In the metrical theory, though, it is presented as having at the end the anomalous prosodically incomplete foot, which, in fact, never has the ideal form (its real form can be 222 or 23 but never 223; otherwise, it would turn into rajaz):

mustafʿilun / mustafʿilun / mafʿūlātu-// 223 223 2221–
mustafʿilun / mustafʿilun / mafʿūlātu-
223 223 2221–

(5) munsariḥ (free, easygoing, unbound): A rare six-foot meter that also has a short, two-foot variation. In the metrical theory, it is presented as having the same anomalous foot in the middle of the hemistich, but the prosodically relevant scanning shows that it is another specific variation of rajaz with a watid shifted one step further. Both ways of scanning are shown by numerical indexes in this case:

mustafʿilun / mafʿūlātu- / mustafʿilun //
223 2221– 223 (theory)
223 2223 23 (reality)
mustafʿilun / mafʿūlātu- / mustafʿilun
223 2221– 223 (theory)
223 2223 23 (reality)

(6) mujtatt (cut or carved off): A very rare four-foot meter:

mustafʿilun / fāʿilātun // mustafʿilun / fāʿilātun
223 232 223 232

(7) muqtaḍab (cut or torn off): A four-foot meter that never existed in poetic practice. It is the third meter for which al-Khalīl postulated the occurrence of the same anomalous foot, which is placed in the beginning of each hemistich:

mafʿūlātu-mustafʿilun // mafʿūlātu-mustafʿilun
2221–223 2221–223
(theoretical scanning)
2223 23 2223 23
(actual prosodic scanning)

(8) One more meter can be added to this family. It is the 16th meter included in the system after al-Khalīl: mutadārik. However, the schema of this meter was never attested in poetic practice:

fāʿilun / fāʿilun / fāʿilun / fāʿilun // fāʿilun / 23 23 23 23 23
fāʿilun / fāʿilun / fāʿilun
23 23 23

The anomalous foot mafʿūlātu-(2221–), which is impossible as it is prosodically incomplete, is the eighth foot of the ʿArūḍ set mentioned above. It was invented by al-Khalīl to overcome a specific theoretical problem that arose in connection with meters that were heirs of the ancient rajaz with its loose structure. The maximum length of the ʿArūḍ foot was postulated as seven ḥarfs, and most of the meters comply with the rule; but in some schemes, we see three sababs in succession between watids, which cannot be divided between adjacent feet. So, a theoretician has an alternative: either to break the rule and postulate the existence of the super-long nine-ḥarf foot or to find another solution, as did al-Khalīl. He postulated the existence of such a foot in three meters: muqtaḍab, munsariḥ, sarīʿ, where it occupies the first, the second, and the third position in the hemistich; see above. In order to substantiate the existence of this foot, al-Khalīl had to introduce another conventional notion, that of the abnormal watid—lātu-, which has only one location—at the end of this very foot. It carries a significant name—mafrūq (disjointed) because, prosodically, it is nothing but a combination of incomplete parts of adjacent EPU. The combination was so successful that many scholars consider these conventionalities to be real and base on them their interpretation of ʿArūḍ.

C. Ramal. The ramal family consists of three meters:

(1) khafīf (light): A six-foot meter that also has a four-foot variation:

fāʿilātun / mustafʿilun / fāʿilātun // fāʿilātun / 232 223 232 232
mustafʿilun / fāʿilātun
223 232

(2) ramal (woven cloth; sound of raindrops): A six-foot meter that also has a four-foot variation:

fāʿilātun / fāʿilātun / fāʿilātun // fāʿilātun / fāʿilātun
232 232 232 232 232
/ fāʿilātun
232

(3) madīd (stretched, extended): Theoretically, an eight-foot meter but used exclusively as a shorter six-foot variation:

fāʿilātun / fāʿilun / fāʿilātun // fāʿilātun / fāʿilun / 232 23 232 232 23
fāʿilātun
232

This classification of meters into three families is based on their rhythmical affinity, but the author of ʿArūḍ classified them differently—his famous and mysterious circles, five in number. The system of circles is, in fact, a generative device. It groups meters that can be produced from each other by the shift of the starting point one EPU forward. The generative principle can be shown in the following diagram:

. . . 322 322 322 322 322 322 322 . . . (hazaj rhythm)
. . . 223 223 223 223 223 223 223 . . . (rajaz rhythm)
. . . 232 232 232 232 232 232 232 . . . (ramal rhythm)

So, the first circle is ṭawīl—madīd—basīṭ. The second circle is wāfir—kāmil. The third circle is hazaj—rajaz—ramal. The fourth circle is sarīʿ—munsariḥ—khafīf—muḍāriʿ—muqtaḍab—mujtatṯ. The fifth circle is mutaqārib alone. Later on, mutadārik was added.

But the derivational device produces more schemes than are accepted by the theory. The first circle generates five schemes, and only three are recognized as meters. The fourth circle generates nine schemes, and only six are accepted. The rest are labeled as muhmal (neglected, unused). The mystery is that, as we have seen, some schemes that were recognized as meters of ʿArūḍ are also unused (muḍāriʿ–muqtaḍab), and mutadārik was included despite the fact that it was never used by Ar. poets.

The ʿArūḍ system was adopted by Heb., Persian, and Turkish poetry and has undergone serious changes in the process of adaptation to a different prosodic matter.

In the 20th c., Ar. poetry witnessed a shift away from the ʿArūḍ metrics to free verse.*

■ G. W. Freytag, Darstellung der Arabischen Verskunst (1830); S. Guyard, "Théorie nouvelle de la métrique Arabe," Journal Asiatique, ser. 7, 7, 8, 10 (1877); M. Hartmann, Metrum und Rhythmus (1896); J. Vadet, "Contribution a l'histoire de la métrique Arabe," Arabica 2 (1955); G. Weil, Grundriss und System der altarabischen Metren (1958), and " ʿArūd," Encyclopedia of Islam, ed. H.A.R. Gibb et al., 2d ed., v. 1 (1960); S. ʿAyyād, Mūsīqā al-Shiʿr al-ʿArabī (1968); Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, al-ʿIqd al-Farid, v. 3 (1968); A. A. Sánchez, "K voprosu o sushchnosti sistemi arabskoy metriki," Arabskaya Filologiya (1968); Ibn al-Sarrāj, al-Miʿyār fī Awzān al-Ashʿār (1968); I. Anīs, Mūsīqā al-Shiʿr, 4th ed. (1972); J. Kuryłowicz, Studies in Semitic Grammar and Metrics (1973); K. Abū Deeb, Fī al-Binya al-Iqāʿiyya li al-Shiʿr al-ʿArabī (1974); E. G. Gómez, Métrica de la moaxaja y métrica española (1975); I. Goldziher, Abhandlungen zur arabischen Philologie, v. 1 (1976); J. M. Maling, "The Theory of Classical Arabic Metrics," al-Abhāth 26 (1977); D. Semah, "The Rhythmical Function of the Watid and the Fāsila," Journal of Semitic Studies 28 (1983); and "Quantity and Syllabic Parity in the Hispano-Arabic Muwashshahāt," Arabica 31 (1983); W.F.G.J. Stoetzer, Theory and Practice in Arabic Metrics (1989); J. Bellamy, "Arabic Verses from the First/Second Century: The Inscription of ʿEn ʿAvdat," Journal of Semitic Studies 35 (1990); G. Bohas and B. Paoli, Aspects formels de la poésie arabe (1997); D. Frolov, "The Place of Rajaz in the History of Arabic Verse," Journal of Arabic Literature 28 (1997); D. Frolov, Classical Arabic Verse: History and Theory of ʿArūḍ (2000); D. Frolov, "Meter," Encyclopedia of Arabic Language and Linguistics, ed. K. Versteegh et al., v. 3 (2007).

D. Frolov

ARAUCANIAN POETRY. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

ARCHAISM. Deliberate use of old, old-fashioned, or obsolete words, esp. in poetry, to evoke the mood of an earlier time or to recapture a connotation or denotation not borne by any mod. word. Archaisms appear in both Virgil and Lucretius; in Fr. poetry of the Ren., archaisms were promoted in the doctrines of the Pléiade. In Eng. poetry, archaism was once said to have its deepest source in Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene (1590, 1596). But mod. scholarship reveals that archaisms are less common in Spenser than was often thought: there are only about 100 archaic words in The Faerie Queene, and half of these are used just once.

The effect of archaism may be achieved by a number of lexical strategies besides resuscitating words found in an older author, as Spenser did with Chaucer. These include the addition of archaic prefixes or suffixes to contemporaneous words, inclusion of words rapidly passing out of fashion, use of rare and unusual (but not obsolete) words, use of dialectal words, and the coining of words that look or sound archaic but are actually neologisms. Syntactic strategies such as *hyperbaton may also give the effect of archaism. Sometimes archaism also serves metrical ends when the older form of a word, having a different number of syllables, more readily fits into the meter than its modern equivalent (e.g., when such words as loved, wished, etc., are used in poetry as disyllables—lovéd, wishéd).

Archaism was a stylistic landmark of the *School of Spenser in the 17th c., of Spenser's imitators in the 18th, and of the *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood in the 19th. It continues to feature in poetry of the mod. and postmod. eras. "Last year's words belong to last year's language," T. S. Eliot remarks in Four Quartets, but he also provides a model for poets seeking not only to find new words for new experience but to revive old words for a sense of the past.

See AUREATE DICTION, DICTION, EPITHET.

■ G. Wagner, On Spenser's Use of Archaisms (1879); R. S. Crane, "Imitation of Spenser and Milton in the Early 18th Century," SP 15 (1918); W. L. Renwick,

"The Critical Origins of Spenser's Diction," MLR 17 (1922); T. Quayle, Poetic Diction (1924); E. F. Pope, "Renaissance Criticism and the Diction of the Faerie Queene," PMLA 41 (1926); B. R. McElderry Jr., "Archaism and Innovation in Spenser's Poetic Diction," PMLA 47 (1932); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction, 2d ed. (1952); N. Osselton, "Archaism," and B.M.H. Strang, "Language, General," The Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. A. C. Hamilton (1990).

T.V.F. Brogan; M. Weinstein

ARCHETYPE

I. History
II. Powers and Limitations

Generally speaking, an archetype is an original structure or plan that informs and underlies all copies made from it, so far as they are recognizable as generated from the prototype despite superficial variations in their size, shape, or material. Thus, the archetype of a table would be "a flat horizontal surface upheld by vertical supports for placing things on," and this is the recognizable idea of all tables everywhere.

In poetry, an archetype may be an *image, *symbol, plot, character, or setting that evokes in the reader a sense of its heightened significance because it represents a culturally or psychologically privileged—whether revered or condemned—object, value, or belief. The archetype often expresses essential characteristics of the human condition that are primitive and universal, rather than intellectualized and singular. Some common archetypal subjects are transformative human events, such as birth, childhood, initiation into adulthood, partnering, procreation, senescence, and death; the cycle of the seasons and nature's powers and mysteries; love and all its objects; greed, guilt, and redemption; religion, mutability, and art. Some archetypal themes are crime and punishment, the conflict between reason and imagination, free will and fate, appearance and reality, and the individual and society. Examples of archetypal situations are tensions between family members, a child's search for a father, and the young adult's leaving parents for a new home. Familiar archetypal characters are the hero or heroine of a quest, a person representing the hero's shadow side, the wise old man, femme fatale, scapegoat, trickster, rebel, wanderer, and witch. Some symbolic and archetypal natural images are oceans, rivers, the sun and moon, the bear, birds, serpents, the tree, garden, and mountain. Also used archetypically are colors, such as green, red, blue, and black; and geometric figures, such as the circle, mandala, and labyrinth. When archetypal elements are represented repeatedly in a poem so as to bring forth their underlying, essential, and manifold attributes, then they may be recognized and read as an archetypal pattern or design.

I. History. The hist. of the archetypal approach may be traced through several movements beginning around 1900, with some overlap in both time and focus.

A. The Anthropological Influence. Since these studies tend to center on the terms myth and ritual, a few basic definitions are in order. A myth, strictly speaking, is a sacred story about supernatural beings; it may also include humans with special or supernatural powers who interact with these divine beings. A ritual, on the other hand, is a ceremonial reenactment of a sacred myth, but it has not been definitively established whether the myth was created to explain the ritual or the ritual was invented to dramatize the myth. Either way, the usual anthropological account of ritual is that it provides a way for a culture to express its hopes and fears in those dealings with nature that it believes are basic to its survival.

The earliest anthropological influence on the archetypal approach to lit. was the so-called Cambridge school of comparative anthropology, led by J. G. Frazer, author of The Golden Bough (1890), and including fellow scholars Murray, Harrison, and Weston. Their method, often based on armchair research rather than participant-observation in the field, was to collect accounts of myths and rituals from various cultures with a view to tracing their fundamental similarities. The general effect of their approach was to create the impression that myth and ritual the world over and throughout hist. formed certain regular and standard patterns. T. S. Eliot publicly endorsed Weston's and Frazer's sense of the archetype in The Waste Land, and his 1923 review of Ulysses enthusiastically recommended to modernist writers this new "mythical method," which he said was made possible by the recent discoveries in anthropology and psychology. Several characteristics of an archetypal poetics were cited: the immediacy of symbolic representation, when compared to the traditional narrative method; the intensity of an archetypal symbol, as it simultaneously embodies multiple and even paradoxical meanings; and the implicit authenticity accompanying such a seemingly unplanned creation from the poet's archetypal imagination. Thus, archetypal lit. crit. was launched.

The Am. school of anthropologists, however, represented by such field researchers as Mead and Benedict, took a much more pluralistic stance from 1930 to 1955, pointing out that cultures were fundamentally different from one another, and that if there were "similar" patterns among them, these had differing meanings in their differing contexts. Mead even published her views in the Modern Language Association jour. Nevertheless, from 1960 to 1980, a newer, "structuralist" anthropology, propounded by Lévi-Strauss, along with Eliade's books linking myth, symbols, and the sacred, continued the debate about the universality and importance of the archetype. Certainly, the period 1945 to 1980 saw the flowering of archetypal and mythic crit. in universities.

B. The Psychological Influence. One principal reason C. G. Jung broke with Sigmund Freud in 1913 was their disagreement over the archetype. Rather than accept Freud's tenet that only the Oedipus complex/archetype explained every patient's problems, Jung followed what he had observed in his practice. His patients brought in dream symbols that were much more understandable when read in the light of stories and characters found in ancient world myths. To explain how 20th-c. humans could dream in ancient symbols, Jung posited a deeper level of psyche, called the collective unconscious. "Collective" meant shared by every member of the human race, and "unconscious" meant linked to the instinctual level of the brain and, therefore, in some ways beyond the control of the consciousness and reason. The many archetypes that reside there are unconscious patterns of potential emotional and behavioral responses to the many possible stimuli life has presented to the human species during its evolution.

Jacobi explains that Jung made a distinction between the archetype as such and the archetypal image: the former has no material existence but is an informing structure that must be clothed by the conscious mind in material from the external world. It is not clear, however, whether the archetype as such results from the deposit of innumerable experiences on the evolving human psyche or is an a priori condition for human experience itself, or both. Advances in neuroscience's study of connectomics, incl. observing with ever more powerful tools and measuring ever more closely the intensity of the brain's responses to stimuli, coupled with mapping the complex neural pathways linking our inherited genetic brain with our learned, experiential knowledge, continue to bring the answer closer. Post-Jungian analysts—many medical doctors and thus scientists, rather than literary critics—view the psychological archetype as more conditioned by the dreamer's historical context and specific personality than Jung did; they believe that what is important in analytic practice is gauging the intensity of feeling the archetype engenders in the dreamer. Nevertheless, Jung honored both poetry and the poets with his oft-stated belief that the poet who invokes archetypes in her poetry speaks in a voice stronger than her own; using archetypes can lift personal poetry "above the occasional and the transitory into the sphere of the ever-existing . . . and transmute personal destiny into the destiny of humankind. . . . That is the secret of effective art" (1928).

Archetypal lit. crit. takes a number of forms. One practice looks in poetry for resonant echoes and reenactments of ancient and ubiquitous patterns, discovering general types emerging from the specific elements of a given poem and then responding to those types as symbols of human desires, conflicts, and problems; this emerges as a kind of symbolic approach. E.g., one might trace the archetypal image of "The Descent into Hell" from early myth and ritual to Homer, Virgil, *medieval romance, and Dante up to Hart Crane's subway section of The Bridge and Eliot's "The Hollow Men," comparing and contrasting the symbols in the various works while also gauging the intensity of the archetypal affect that these pieces carry for readers today. A second critical practice uses the archetypal feminist approach; e.g., Pratt has discovered gender-specific archetypal images and patterns previously unrecognized in women's poetry and fiction. Pratt's work not only challenged the universality of the most frequently represented myth—the archetypal journey quest plot of the male hero—but refashioned it as a gender-specific pattern, not typical of the patterns followed by heroines in women's lit. Her work has thus helped to revive a buried feminine trad. A third form of archetypal lit. crit. is an interdisciplinary one that brings together different professions—analytical psychologists and teachers of lit.—and illuminates their different practices and goals with regard to the archetype. The analyst Hillman advocated archetypal psychology from the 1970s; his Healing Fiction urged psychologists and therapists to envision psychic reality as data not to be interpreted literally but to be understood and dealt with as material "poetic, dramatic, literary in nature." In the 1980s and 1990s, Hillman joined the poet Robert Bly in spreading this interdisciplinary archetypal approach, and it found an enthusiastic audience among the popular Men's Movement. Bly's best-selling book about male psychology, Iron John: A Book about Men (1990), is an archetypal meditation on a fairy tale. Bly and Hillman also edited a poetry anthol. whose subtitle is "Poetry for Men." Finally, archetypal crit. has proved better suited than some other crit. approaches for certain kinds of poetry, sometimes termed wisdom lit. or visionary lit.; such art generally aspires to express heightened experiences and relies on an archetypal poetics to achieve its effects. Studying the significance of such heightened experiences is likewise central to archetypal psychologists, and Samuels et al.'s Dictionary definition for numinous, as possessing a quality of unusually strong *affect, notes that such a heightened state was considered by Jung to be generally "present in all religious experiences." Twentieth-c. poems in Eng. that have consciously reached for the numinous, that exemplify some characteristics of archetypal poetics, include Eliot's The Waste Land, esp. "What the Thunder Said"; Crane's The Bridge; Allen Ginsberg's Howl; Bly's Sleepers Joining Hands, esp. "The Teeth Mother Naked at Last"; Galway Kinnell's "When The Towers Fell"; and work from such poets as Denise Levertov, Willam Stafford, Adrienne Rich, W. S. Merwin, Sylvia Plath, and Ted Hughes.

C. Natural and Universal Symbols. One may, however, develop an approach to mythological and universal symbols without specifically drawing on the work of either comparative anthropology or psychology. Here one's concern is primarily epistemological—i.e., with the relation between Mind and World and among the various langs. and symbol-systems humanity has devised for bringing them together. Noteworthy in this line is the work of Cassirer, Wheelwright, and Campbell. Notable in this trend of thought are the many correspondences among physical forms and the forms of thought, such as stars for guidance, sun for life, spring for renewal, animals for humanity's physical or emotional side, and mountains for struggle and achievement.

D. Northrop Frye. Frye constructed an archetypal symbology based on the parallels between the cycles of human life and those of the natural world and the patterns these parallels have caused to appear in myth, ritual, dream, and poetry. Sidestepping the nature vs. nurture debate over the origin of archetypes, he claimed that it is not very important whether there is any relationship between lit. and reality, nor whether lit. embodies the truths of depth psychology. What is more important is that lit., when taken as a whole, reveals inductively the persistence of certain patterns, with the result that lit. is seen to form a highly organized universe of its own. The job of critics, therefore, is to formulate and interpret those patterns—which Frye proceeded to do in Anatomy of Criticism (1957) at some length. In the process, he transcended archetypal crit. itself and developed a fourfold set of approaches, of which the archetypal is only one: (1) Historical Criticism: Theory of Modes (fictional, tragic, comic, thematic); (2) Ethical Criticism: Theory of Symbols (literal and descriptive, formal, mythical, anagogic); (3) Archetypal Criticism: Theory of Myths (spring: comedy; summer: romance; autumn: tragedy; winter: irony and satire); and (4) Rhetorical Criticism: Theory of Genres (epos, prose, drama, lyric).

II. Powers and Limitations. The archetypal approach to poetry has demonstrated several powers. First, since the early 20th c., general awareness and interest in archetypes and myth have been important in the cultural zeitgeist; many poets and visual artists have turned to them for creative purposes, consciously incorporating them into their work. Since an alert critic will follow where artists lead, a critical approach attuned to the archetypal world may discover significance in works that other approaches might overlook. A second power of archetypal crit. is its usefulness in evaluating and perhaps redirecting mass media culture, whose infinitely reproducible image-products have led to a severe reduction of ancient archetypes into mass culture's comic-book stereotypes. The archetypal critic is well positioned to interrogate these stereotypes and represent to a contemp. audience the more complex (and more powerful for their visual and psychological complexity) originals found in authentic myth and serious lit. A third strength of the archetypal approach is that it looks beyond the formal limits of the work itself to consider the imaginative impulse of its creator as well as to assess the work's effect and affect for the reader.

There are also limitations to the archetypal approach. First, in practice, archetypal critics themselves can frequently seem reductive, not just in excessive "symbol-hunting," which can lead to ignoring other important aspects of the work, but in overestimating the significance of a symbol whose reach for the archetypal may exceed its grasp. Second, unlike other critical approaches to lit. such as *formalism, *historicism, or *cultural studies, the archetypal approach cannot be applied to every work. But it has proved its worth in evaluating some of the world's most revered lit., e.g., all acknowledged epics, Gr. and Shakespearean tragedies, every culture's holy book (incl. the Bible), and world myths generally.

See ANTHROPOLOGY AND POETRY, CRITICISM, MYTH, PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY.

■ Anthropological Influence: J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough, 3d ed., 12 v. (1905–15); J. Harrison, Themis (1912); G. Murray, The Classical Tradition in Poetry (1927); J. L. Weston, From Ritual to Romance (1920); R. Benedict, Patterns of Culture (1934); H. M. Block, "Cultural Anthropology and Contemporary Literary Criticism," JAAC 11 (1952); M. Mead, "Cultural Bases for Understanding Literature," PMLA 68 (1953); C. Lévi-Strauss, Structural Anthropology, trans. C. Jacobson and B. Grundfest Schoepf (1963); M. Eliade, Images and Symbols, trans. P. Mairet (1969); J. B. Vickery, The Literary Impact of "The Golden Bough" (1973); T. S. Eliot, "Ulysses, Order, and Myth," Selected Prose, ed. F. Kermode (1975); H. Blumenberg, Work on Myth, trans. R. M. Wallace (1985); I. Strenski, Four Theories of Myth in Twentieth-Century History: Cassirer, Eliade, Lévi-Strauss and Malinowski (1988); R. Ackerman, The Myth and Ritual School (1991); J. R. Smith, Writing Tricksters: Mythic Gambols in American Ethnic Literature (1997).

■ Natural Symbols: E. Cassirer, Language and Myth, trans. S. K. Langer (1946); R. Chase, Quest for Myth (1949); J. Campbell, The Hero with a Thousand Faces (1949); W. H. Auden, The Enchafed Flood (1950); E. Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, trans. R. Manheim, 3 v. (1953–57); R.W.B. Lewis, The American Adam (1955); B. Seward, The Symbolic Rose (1960); E. Sewell, The Orphic Voice (1961); P. Wheelwright, Metaphor and Reality (1962); E. Sewell, The Human Metaphor (1964); J. B. Vickery, Myth and Literature (1966); P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain, 2d ed. (1968); M. Douglas, Natural Symbols (1970); H. Slochower, Mythopoesis (1970).

■ Northrop Frye: N. Frye, "Archetypes of Literature," KR 12 (1954); "Forming Fours," HudR 6 (1954); Northrop Frye in Modern Criticism, ed. M. Krieger (1966); P. Kogan, Northrop Frye (1969); N. Frye, "Expanding Eyes," CritI 2 (1975–76); R. D. Denham, Northrop Frye and Critical Method (1978); F. Lentricchia, After the New Critics (1980); H. Adams, Philosophy of the Literary Symbolic (1983); Centre and Labyrinth, ed. E. Cook et al. (1983); D. Cook, Northrop Frye (1985); I. Balfour, Northrop Frye (1988); A. C. Hamilton, Northrop Frye: Anatomy of His Criticism (1990).

■ Psychological Influence: C. G. Jung, Psychology of the Unconscious, trans. B. M. Hinkle (1916); Psychological Types, trans. H. G. Baynes (1923); and Contributions to Analytical Psychology, trans. C. F. Baynes and H. G. Baynes (1928); M. Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934); E. Drew, T. S. Eliot: The Design of His Poetry (1949); J. S. Jacobi, Complex/Archetype/Symbol in the Psychology of C. G. Jung (1959); M. H. Philipson, Outline of a Jungian Aesthetics (1963); Man and his Symbols, ed. C. G. Jung et al. (1968); J. Hillman, Re-Visioning Psychology (1975); J. Olney, The Perennial Philosophy—Yeats and Jung (1980); A. V. Pratt, Archetypal Patterns in Women's Fiction (1981); J. Hillman, Healing Fiction (1983); Feminist Archetypal Theory, ed. E. Lauter and C. S. Rupprecht (1985); Critical Dictionary of Jungian Analysis, ed. A. Samuels, B. Shorter, and F. Plaut (1986); J. van Meurs and J. Kidd, Jungian Literary Criticism, 1920–1980 (1988)—annotated bibl.; J. Campbell, Transformations of Myths through Time (1990); D. A. Leeming, The World of Myth (1990); R. Bly, J. Hillman, and M. Meade, The Rag and Bone Shop of the Heart: Poems for Men (1992); Jungian Literary Criticism, ed. Richard P. Sugg (1992); A. V. Pratt, Dancing with Goddesses: Archetypes, Poetry, and Empowerment (1994); Cambridge Companion to Jung, ed., P. Young-Eisendrath (1997); Encyclopedia of Archetypal Symbolism, ed. B. Moon (1997); J. Hillman, Archetypal Psychology, 3rd ed. (2004); Post-Jungian Criticism, Theory and Practice, ed. J. S. Baumlin and T. F. Baumlin (2004).

N. Friedman; R. P. Sugg

ARCHILOCHIAN. The Gr. lyric poet Archilochus of Paros (fl. mid-7th c. BCE) drew on earlier verse forms, esp. dactylic and iambic cola (see COLON), to create a number of complex systems (*asynarteton and *epode), i.e., lines in which different metrical cola are combined. Scholars define the archilochian line variously: (a) xDx + ithyphallic (x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – x | – ⏑ – ⏑ – –), where D = *hemiepes; (b) dactylic tetrameter + ithyphallic (– ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ | – ⏑ – ⏑ – –) (Halporn et al.; = Klingner's versus Archilochius); (c) dactylic tetrameter catalectic (– ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – –; Klingner). Type (a) is found in Archilochus frag. 170 (West; = 109 Diehl); type (b) in frag. 191.1 (West; = 112.1 Diehl); type (c) as the even lines in the first archilochian strophe of Horace (Odes 1.7, 28; Epode 12). Horace has three epodic (strophic) forms named by metrists after Archilochus: first archilochian: dactylic hexameter + type (c); second archilochian: dactylic hexameter + hemiepes (Odes 4.7; Epode 12); and third archilochian: type (b) + iambic trimeter catalectic, i.e., – – ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – – (Odes 1.4).

■ Horatius: Opera, ed. F. Klingner, 3d ed. (1959); Halporn et al.; Snell; West.

J. W. Halporn

AREOPAGUS (Gr., "Rock of Ares"). Originally referring to a site in which an ancient judicial body met northwest of the Acropolis in Athens, the name has been understood by literary historians to refer to a literary circle of the 1580s established to reform Eng. versification according to cl. models. The name comes from a reference in a letter from Edmund Spenser to Gabriel Harvey pub. in Three proper, and wittie, familiar letters (1580), in which he writes that Philip Sidney and Edward Dyer had recently "proclaimed in their areopagos a generall surceasing and silence of balde Rymers." On the basis of Spenser's comment and Harvey's reply, a trad. arose in the 19th c. that the term referred to a formal literary club similar to the Fr. Pléiade*, incl. Sidney, Dyer, Spenser, Harvey, and Fulke Greville. Although probably not organized in that fashion, those poets were all enthusiastically experimenting with quantitative verse at the time (see QUANTITY), an enterprise that held, for them, serious implications for the value of Eng. as a national and literary lang.

See CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES.

R. Kaplan

ARGENTINA, POETRY OF. The Argentine poetic trad. begins with a poem by a soldier on a Sp. expedition, Martín del Barco Centenera's (1535–1602), La Argentina, pub. in 1602 in Lisbon. In its style, verse form (hendecasyllabic lines with alternating consonant rhyme), and historical description of Indians, the poem echoes the Basque poet Alonso de Ercilla in La Araucana (1569–89), though without the same vitality, which makes del Barco's poem a less auspicious start to this national trad.

Local voices arose in the 19th c., and their styles, like many in Sp. America, featured neoclassicism and patriotic verse (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS). "Al Paraná" by Manuel José de Lavardén (1754–1809) is a neoclassical *ode published in 1801, a song of praise to the region that predates the Venezuelan Andrés Bello's more famous Silvas americanas (1823). The struggle toward national independence continued and extended patriotic verse, e.g., in the "Marcha patriótica" (1813) by Vicente López y Planes (1785–1856), a nationalistic hymn that would later be revised into the Argentine *anthem. Another locally focused poetic style crucial to this century was *gaucho poetry, and Bartolomé Hidalgo's (1788–1822) work is an early example. His Cielitos y diálogos patrióticos recounted events of the wars for independence and highlighted the perspective of the gauchos, or nomadic cowboys from the plains. Gaucho poetry is based on oral practice, and Hidalgo's cielitos are rhymed quatrains that may come from the Sp. romance* trad. Later gaucho-style poetry was elaborated by Estanislao del Campo (1834–80) and Hilario Ascasubi (1807–75), but it is José Hernández's (1834–86) Martín Fierro that is widely considered to be the culmination of gauchesque lit. The first part of this long narrative poem was published in 1872 and recounts Fierro's marginalization from civilization, while the second chronicles his return (1879). Hernández employs the voice of a gaucho singer or payador to create the effect of improvisation for, as Ludmer has noted, in the gaucho style the lettered elite make use of the popular. Gaucho poetry offers an intriguing link between lit. and politics and highlights certain crucial tensions of the moment: between written and oral cultures and between the rural interior and urbanized center—divisions that are central to 19th-c. cultural production in Argentina.

An important figure in the national political scene, whose presence is felt in the poetry of the decade, is Juan Manuel Rosas. Elected governor of Buenos Aires in 1829, Rosas (a Federalist) later headed a dictatorial regime that lasted from 1835 to 1852. Juan Cruz Varela (1794–1839) was a poet of the opposing Unitarian Party, who composed odes to freedom of the press, commemorated key independence battles, and wrote "El veinticinco de mayo de 1838" (The 25th of May, 1838), attacking Rosas. Varela composed a long love poem, "Elvira" (1831), and odes to national heroes Juan Ramón Balcarce and Manual Belgrano; the critic Menéndez y Pelayo called him the first truly Argentine poet.

During the same period, Esteban Echeverría (1805–51) nationalized romantic poetry and prose. His Rimas (Rhymes, 1837) includes what would become his best-known poem, "La cautiva" (The Captive Woman), a ten-part narrative that recounts the capture of two Argentines by a group of Indians. This poem, in some ways romantic more in sentiment than in form, is an example of a Eur.-influenced aesthetic in an Am. context. It has been read in relation to the struggles for independence and other captivity narratives and creole representations of the Indian and includes references to issues such as miscegenation, gender, the role of nature, and the extension and limits of the nation in Latin America. Later *romanticism (1852–80) is associated with the work of Carlos Guido y Spano (1827–1916), who was not known for Indian or gaucho themes but treated topics that ranged from the intimate to the heroic. He is recognized for adopting romanticism as a way of life, and some of the Parnassian elements in his poetry link him to early 20th-c. modernismo.

Leopoldo Lugones (1874–1938) is the Argentine most associated with modernismo and, as Kirkpatrick has observed, his work demonstrates a transformative relationship to this movement. Like other modernists, Lugones attempted to alter or refine lang. and prosody through daring rhymes, verbal skill, and a recherché vocabulary. In Las montañas del oro (The Golden Mountains, 1893), he combined a series of opposing images and linked nature and science; Los crepúsculos del jardín (The Garden's Twilight, 1905) featured excess and exaggeration, and all the irony and tensions of his earlier styles culminate in the parody of Lunario sentimental (Sentimental Moon Journey, 1909). While some qualify Lugones's work as late modernismo, others see it as part of a postmodernist reformulation and critique of that movement. In Sp. America, posmodernismo designates an early 20th-c. transitional period, between approximately 1905 and 1930, in which modernist characteristics expanded and shifted in poetry that largely did not participate in the avant-garde. There is some controversy about whether it exists as a separate movement or as an extension of modernismo; but in any case, it features poetry that is markedly intimate, is often situated in rural rather than urban settings, and involves perspectives regularly marginalized by the dominance of modernismo.

Associated with this early posmodernismo is Evaristo Carriego (1883–1912), whose Misas herejes (Heretical Masses, 1908) describes humble lives with sincerity and emotion, earning him fame as the poet of the arrabal or suburb (a perspective to be elaborated by Jorge Luis Borges). Baldomero Fernández Moreno (1886–1950) is known for capturing urban and rural reality in his poetry, and Las iniciales del misal (The Missal's Initials, 1915) relies on simple musical lyrics. Alfonsina Storni (1892–1938), the best known of this group and one of the now-canonical women poets, demonstrates in much of her poetry a feminist consciousness and anger with prescribed social roles. Her early work, El dulce daño (Sweet Suffering, 1918) has stylistic links to modernismo, while she moves toward the avant-garde in her later, more experimental collection Mascarilla y trébol (Mask and Clover, 1938).

Another Argentine response to modernismo arose in the ultraist movement of the 1920s, which advocated *free verse and sought to condense poetry to its primary element—a revitalized metaphor (see ULTRAISM). The movement, which emphasized aesthetics and cosmopolitanism, is associated with Borges (1899–1986) and the Martín Fierro magazine (1924–27), which featured the work of Borges, Guillermo de Torre, Oliverio Girondo, Norah Lange, Ricardo Molinari, and Leopoldo Marechal. These writers were also associated with the Grupo Florida, an intellectual and aristocratic assemblage concerned with aesthetic renovation, which they defined and put into action; often considered elitist, this group also exhibited some contrasting democratic, urban, and nationalistic traits. Between 1923 and 1930, Borges published three books of poetry, each of which emphasized ultraism through the use of metaphor; formally, the poems combine free verse, hendecasyllables, and the *alexandrine, and many of them are concerned with a mythical space—Buenos Aires and its urban neighborhoods. Later, Borges abandoned ultraism, but he continued to write poetry throughout his life, incl. a variety of themes also present in his fiction: the search for identity, nostalgia, philosophical idealism, and Argentine folklore (e.g., he composed lyrics for tangos and milongas).

Leopoldo Marechal (1900–70) also participated in Martín Fierro in the 1920s, and his first published poetry, Los aguiluchos (The Eaglets, 1922) and Días como flechas (Days like Arrows, 1926), tends toward the avant-garde. His work deals with philosophical preoccupations, order, harmony, and lyrical interpretation of Argentine places and trads. Joining Borges and Marechal was Molinari (1898–1996), whose themes are more existential: lack, the impossibility of communication, the purity of lang. From a metaphysical perspective, he contemplates solitude, death, and time in forms such as the romance, *sonnet, and ode.

Girondo (1891–1967), after Borges and Lugones, is the best known of Argentina's early 20th-c. poets, and his early work is also part of this group. Veinte poemas para ser leídos en el tranvía (Twenty Poems to be Read on the Streetcar, 1922), Calcomanías (Transfers, 1925), and Espantapájaros (Scarecrow, 1932) are all ultraist in style and, although they include some surrealist discontinuities, are more referential than most of his later works (see SURREALISM). En la masmédula (In the Deep Marrow, 1954) features his most radical use of lang., incl. neologisms and phonic relations between terms. Lange (1906–72) was the sole woman in the group, and her personal, dreamlike poetry had surrealist touches within fragmented yet intimate urban landscapes.

The Grupo Boedo, a leftist, socially conscious set opposed to the Florida group's aestheticism, shared a desire for something new and occasionally participated in ultraism and the avant-garde. Raúl González Tuñón (1905–74) was a poet who witnessed the city and its social life instead of producing art for art's sake. Out of El violin del diablo (The Devil's Violin, 1926), his first book, grew marginal figures such as the militant character Juancito Caminador (Johnny Walker). Nicolás Olivari (1900–66), also part of the Boedo group, displayed irony and sarcasm in his portraits of society in La musa de la mala pata (The Bad-Footed Muse, 1926); like some of his compatriots, he composed tango lyrics, notably those of La violeta (The Violet). Both these poets influenced Francisco Urondo (1930–76), who used his idealism and militant poetry to confront the dictatorship of the 1970s. Entering the 1930s and 1940s, previously ultraist poets turned to surrealism or neoromanticism, and the Argentine avant-garde fractured into different elements.

Essays and narrative dominated the 1920s and 1930s, but one transitional poet in this period was both part of the Martín Fierro group and different from it: Carlos Mastronardi (1901–76). Called an "anti-vanguard vanguardist," Mastronardi, known for translating Fr. symbolists, was a symbolist himself, whose verse engaged sensibility and landscape, drew on comparison rather than metaphor, and employed traditional musical forms rather than free verse. His poetics make him a precursor to the 1940s generation, whose poets combined avant-garde elements with *symbolism and romanticism to create personal styles that bring them together eclectically as a group.

There is a tendency in mid-century Argentine letters to discuss ten-year generations, loosely affiliating poets who began to publish in the same decade and who share a literary inheritance but not a platform. Some of the 1940s poets, writing during the time that Juan Perón first came to power (1946–55), demonstrate an interest in the irrational, magical, and ritual possibilities of poetry. They tend to see the poem as a way of knowing, while at the same time questioning what it is possible to know or say. Alberto Girri (1919–91) is one of these poets, who counts Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot among his influences. His early work, such as Playa sola (Lone Beach, 1946), is visionary, necromantic, imagistic, and affective. In his later work, the perspective becomes ironic and cerebral in dense, free-verse poems that explore time and space. Enrique Molina's (1910–96) work is more associated with surrealism (he translated André Breton), and in his first book, Las cosas y el delirio (Things and Delirium, 1941), he combines reality with hallucination, creating a sense of disintegration and of solitude as a natural experience. His long poetic novel Una sombra donde sueña Camila O'Gorman (A Shadow Where Camila O'Gorman Sleeps, 1973) offers its readers a dreamlike approach to a figure from Argentine hist., as well as a genre-crossing postvanguardist experiment. There is a constant tension in the poetry of Olga Orozco (1920–99): a ceaseless motif of desire and lack, a search for a fragmented god or wholeness, amid themes of distance and loss. Poetry is a ritual or an interior journey in her work, which demonstrates a notable coherence of tone, lang., and themes, from Desde lejos (From Afar, 1946) to the occult, metaphysical concerns of Con esta boca en este mundo (With This Mouth in This World, 1994). Each of these poets turned away from overt engagement with the social world in her or his work to explore other kinds of knowledge through poetry.

In the 1950s and 1960s, a number of younger poets began to publish, some continuing in the postvanguardist mode, such as Alejandra Pizarnik (1936–72), who wrote often-terse, interior-focused poetry on the fringes of surrealism, while others turned to poetry as a means of social transformation. Pizarnik's work is often seen as a self-exile in lang. and away from the poetic values of her generation. She uses a dense, hypercontrolled lang. in which solitude and silence play a central role to challenge lit.'s limitations in works such as El infierno musical (Musical Hell, 1971). Pizarnik was an inspiration to a series of later poets, and recent readers have begun to explore the full range of her writing.

Liliana Lukin (b. 1951) acknowledges Pizarnik's writing as an inspiration to her own. Her book Descomposición (Decomposition, 1986) quotes from Franz Kafka (a source of intertexts favored by Pizarnik as well), whose work reminds us that reading, like writing, is a disturbing and corporeal process. Lukin uses lang. to embody absence, and in both theme and technique, this poetics becomes part of the historical recovery process after the Dirty War (the dictatorship that lasted from 1976 to 1983). Tamara Kamenszain (b. 1947) is another writer who extends Pizarnik's techniques through her concept of lang. as a trope in Los no (1977), in which ritualized Japanese *Nō theater exemplifies the renunciation of representation, and in La casa grande (The Big House, 1986), a semisurreal evocation of daily life. More recently Anahí Mallol (b. 1968) has explored the impact of Pizanik in her own work and that of others (contemps. Susana Thénon [1937–90] and Orozco, and more recent writers) whose works converse with those of Pizarnik in their intensity and struggle with the liminal zones of lang.

A contemporary of Pizarnik, Juan Gelman (b. 1930), moves through the world and makes his poetry of it, shoring up lang. against dehumanization. His early poetry (Violín y otras cuestiones [Violin and Other Questions], 1956) is based on local speech that links experience with imagination in primarily urban settings. Gelman was exiled from Argentina in 1975, and his later books deal with issues such as mourning, politics, and responsibility for the other, employing techniques such as syntactic and linguistic alteration, idiosyncratic punctuation, intertextual references, *heteronyms, and self-translations. During this time of much social and political change, Juana Bignozzi's (b. 1937) poetry joins a personal, confessional tone to social realism. Lucid and conversational, her lang. shares irony and an ethical perspective with that of Gelman; her collected works, La ley, tu ley (The Law, Your Law, 2000), demonstrate the scope of her expression. The work of Leónidas Lamborghini (1927–2009) grows out of a social commitment that he expresses in unadorned lang. and short lines. He highlights the construction of a poetic *voice, and this, along with an attention to rhythm, unites his oeuvre. He creates a dialogue or counterpoint by rewriting earlier authors, sometimes with a parodic, ludic tone to remind his readers consistently that art is an artifice—one technique that associates him with the *neobaroque.

After the dictatorship, the floodgates opened, and there was a proliferation of poetry that branched out into new areas, both stylistic and thematic. Néstor Perlongher (1949–92) was a prominent figure of the 1980s whose style is complex, focusing readers' attention on the text's surface and on lit.'s metalinguistic aspects, all elements that situate his work within the neobaroque. Perlongher describes the movement as deterritorialized (departing from the Spaniard Luis de Góngora), a postcolonial response to inherited paradigms. Although some neobaroque poets may exclude external references, Perlongher insinuates politics and hist. into his early collections (Austria-Hungría, 1980), in which orderly syntax and grammatical connections still predominate. In his later work, neobaroque complication reigns: Parque Lezama (1990) is a linguistic performance in which any normative identity is destabilized, propelling its readers to ontological questions about what speech and poetry are. Another defiant perspective of the 1980s is that of Diana Bellessi (b. 1946), who established a feminist voice (with a notably lesbian perspective in Eroíca, 1988) with which she recreated inherited symbols, images, and words in an often intimate tone. Her later work elaborates her ethical interests, often joining popular and high cultural registers. Bellessi's work has been taken in new directions by more recent poets such as Bárbara Belloc (b. 1968), whose Ambición de las flores (1997) elaborates the flower as a feminine erotic image, paradoxically loving and carnivorous.

A proliferation of journals in mid- and late 20th-c. Argentina featured poetry: Poesía Buenos Aires, A partir de cero, and later Literal, Diario de poesía, Ultimo reino, and XUL*, providing venues for local and international poetry and theoretical debate. The economic turmoil of the 1990s, which continued into the next century, heralded more social transformation and a new urban poetry featuring direct communication of experience that some critics have called hyperrealistic. Many younger poets work against alienation and give voice to disillusion through irony and references to the new social margins. Some of this poetry incorporates film, mass media, and popular culture in form and content. Through performance, poetry on the Web, and hypertextual forms, poets find new ways to seek out readers. One example of the many recent writers who challenge the status quo is Washington Cucurto (pseud. of Santiago Vega, b. 1973), whose Cosa de negros (Black Folks' Stuff, 2003) has developed a kind of cult following. Cucurto writes from the invisible part of his country and uses cumbia and other dance rhythms to express the raw experience of a peripheral world that is denigrated by the dominant culture. Like many of the poets of his generation, he uses lyric conventions to challenge these prejudices—an approach that might characterize much of the poetry of the late 1990s and the early 21st c. in Argentina.

See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: Poesía argentina del siglo XX, ed. J. C. Ghiano (1957)—also contains hist. and crit.; Antología lineal de la poesía argentina, ed. C. Fernández Moreno (1968); Antología de poesía argentina, ed. A. del Saz (1969); La nueva poesía argentina, ed. N. Salvador (1969); Antología de la poesía argentina, ed. R. G. Aguirre (1979); Antología de la nueva poesía argentina, ed. H. Alvarez Castillo (1990); Geografía lírica argentina, ed. J. Isaacson (2003).

■ Criticism and History: M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Historia de la poesía argentina (1943); J. Ludmer, El género gauchesco (1988); B. Sarlo, Una modernidad periférica (1988); G. Kirkpatrick, The Dissonant Legacy of Modernismo (1989); M. González and D. Treece, The Gathering of Voices (1992); Conversaciones con la poesía argentina, ed. J. Fondebrider (1995); A. Mallol, El poema y su doble (2003); M. Prieto, Breve historia de la literatura argentina (2006); Tres décadas de la poesía argentina 1976–2006, ed. J. Fondebrider (2006); T. Kamenszain, Boca de testimonio (2007).

J. KUHNHEIM

ARGUMENT has several senses in crit. Loosely used, it can mean *plot, i.e., a sequence of events; this meaning is authorized by cl. usage (e.g., Terence, argumentum fabulae, the plot of the story) and is common during the Ren. It may also refer to a prologue with a prose paraphrase of the verse to follow. But the most common and most important meaning concerns the *structure of a poem: the framework or design that propels and shapes the sequencing of events. Must every poem have an argument in this sense? Has its argument much—or anything—to do with its value? Ren. poetry was certainly written in a trad. that linked poetry with logic, spoke about the "cause" of a poem, and considered details in relation to their logical function (see RENAISSANCE POETICS). The symbolist view, by contrast, finds the value of poetry in those elements it does not share with prose: the logical or narrative structure of a poem is dispensable (see SYMBOLISM). This seems to be the case in such poems as Stéphane Mallarmé's "L'Après-midi d'un faune" or Paul Valéry's "La jeune parque" (though not in all Valéry): no logical thread links the *imagery of these poems. The Ezra Pound of *imagism, Wallace Stevens, and T. S. Eliot stand at least partly in this trad. A rather different antilogical trad. runs from Arthur Rimbaud through *vorticism to *surrealism and includes Dylan Thomas: here the brute juxtaposition of imagery is not the result of careful construction but a direct expression of the unconscious.

There seem to be three possible conclusions: that argument is unnecessary; that it is mainly a ploy to attract the reader, relying on the rest of the poem to enable true poetic response; that it is sometimes (always?) part of a poem's true value. It would not be possible to claim that it was the whole of the poem's value without maintaining that the paraphrase was worth as much as the poem. The first view is the symbolist theory. The second is implicit in some romantic crit. and is likely to be held by mod. admirers of romantic poetry. The perfect illustration would be a poem like S. T. Coleridge's "Kubla Khan." The third is the traditional view and, in modified form, is still found among critics for whom structure is a primary consideration. Even in those critics who eschew the term argument as old-fashioned, however, it is worth noting what terms they use instead to denote a poem's principle of logic and continuity.

■ J. Kertzer, Poetic Argument (1989).

L. D. LERNER

ARMENIAN POETRY AND POETICS

I. Pre-Christian Origins and Early Epics
II. Ecclesiastic Poetry

III. The Rise of Folk Songs and Armenian Classicism
IV. The National Awakening
V. The Rise of the Aesthetes
VI. Poetry in Diaspora

I. Pre-Christian Origins and Early Epics. The Armenian lang., a branch of the IE ling. family, has an extensive poetic trad. originating in ancient Asia Minor and eventually spanning the globe over more than two millennia. Most historians date the emergence of the Armenians to the 6th c. BCE as a distinct ling. and cultural collective autochthonous to Anatolia in the Republic of Turkey.

Few samples of the earliest Armenian poetry remain. Two reasons account for this scarcity. First, the earliest poetry constituted a segment of the oral trad., thereby leaving no written trace. Second, the Armenians' state conversion to Christianity (ca. 314–15) precipitated the prompt effacement of the Armenian Zoroastrian and pagan pasts, incl. the narratives they inspired.

The remaining fragments, which were partially inscribed following the invention of the Armenian alphabet (ca. 406 CE), suggest rich bardic origins. Armenian historical texts indicate that the first poets were *minstrels, known as gusans, who composed a variety of songs, ranging from eulogies for historical personages to festive wedding tunes. Pre-Christian poetry also included two categories of *epics based either on legendary tales or mythologized historical themes. The legendary epic "Vahagn Vishapagagh" (Vahagn the Dragonslayer) found in the History of the Armenians by Movses Khorenatsi (Moses of Khoren, "Father of Armenian Historiography") constitutes the oldest surviving Armenian poem and recounts the birth of the divinity Vahagn, god of thunder. Mythologized historical epics appear during the Yervantuni dynasty (ca. 600–200 BCE) and include the popular tale Tigran and Azhdahak, relating the struggle between King Tigran I and the king of the Medes, Azhdahak (Astiages). It depicts the first female character to appear in an epic, Tigranuhi, Tigran's sister and Azhdahak's wife. The earliest known post-Christian epic is Parsits Paterazm (The Persian War), drawn from folklore and composed between the 3rd and 5th cs. CE and relating the protracted struggle of the Arshakuni (Arsacid) dynasty rulers of Armenia against the Sassanid Empire.

II. Ecclesiastic Poetry. The first phase of ecclesiastic poetry commenced following the alphabet's invention by the monk Mesrop Mashtots (ca. 360–440). Though lay poetry continued to appear, verses were primarily restricted to spiritual works, which rendered biblical stories, reproduced ancient Jewish prayers and psalms, and introduced the first specimen of written Armenian *lyric poetry, namely, the spiritual hymn, later known (from the 12th c. CE on) as sharakan. Mashtots and one of his patrons, the catholicos Sahak Partev (ca. 345–439), authored the first sharakans, which were performed on Christian feast days and holidays. In addition to Mashtots and Sahak Partev, other noteworthy sharakan writers include Moses of Khoren, renowned for his "Khorhurd metz yev skanjeli" (Great and Wondrous Mystery) sung on Christmas; Sahak Dzoraporetsi (677–708), who wrote the first sharakans dedicated to the Cross and the Church; Stepanos Siunetsi (d. 735), who turned the canon into the liturgy by organizing hymns and arranging voices and tunes; and Sahakdukht (fl. 8th c.), Siunetsi's sister, who is the first known female Armenian poet.

In addition to sharakans, the Middle Ages also produced one of the most renowned Armenian poets, the monk Grigor Narekatsi (Gregory of Nareg, ca. 950–1003). Narekatsi is acclaimed for his monumental lyric poem Matyan Voghbergutyan (Book of Lamentations), known simply as Narek, a book of prayers consisting of 95 chapters. Its tone resembles Augustine's Confessions with themes of repentance and love of God, heavily imbued with simile and metaphor. After the Psalter and NT, it was the most widely circulated text of med. Armenian lit. and has remained influential.

Another influential early poet is Nerses Shnorhali (Nerses, Full of Grace, ca. 1101–1173). Shnorhali lived and wrote during a trying historical period when the displaced Armenian people were forced to relocate to Syria and Cilicia and had to struggle for autonomy from Byzantine and regional rulers. A pervasive preference for poetry had emerged that led writers and translators to render a wide variety of narratives—historical, didactic, scientific, and literary—into verse in the manner of Homer, David, Solomon, and Jeremiah, and also often converted prose texts into poetry. Shnorhali wrote in this milieu, composing in a vast array of genres. Trained as a priest and later anointed catholicos (1166), Shnorhali was committed to national and ecclesiastic concerns, exemplified in his historical epic Voghb Yedesio (Lament for Edessa, ca. 1145), the first of its kind in Armenian lit. The epic recounts the destruction of Edessa (1144) and the massacre of its Christian population by Emir Zangi's troops. It introduced several innovations, incl. *personification and the five-syllable iambic meter, which became the standard for subsequent poets. The work helped reinforce the *lament as a dominant poetic form, inspiring Grigor IV Tgha's (ca. 1133–93) Voghb Yerusaghemi (Lament for Jerusalem, 1189); Stepanos Orbelian's (ca. 1250–1305) Voghb i dimats katoghikein (Lament on Behalf of the Cathedral); and Arakel Baghishetsi's (ca. 1380–1454) Voghb Mayrakaghakin Stampolu (Lament for the Capital Constantinople, 1453), among others.

After Narekatsi and Shnorhali, few noteworthy names or literary devels. appear from the 13th through the 17th cs., a period of protracted political strife for the Armenians embattled by invaders and culminating in the devastating fall of the kingdom of Cilicia (1375) to Mamluk forces. The poets whose names survive from this period lived and wrote chiefly in the 13th c. Hovhannes Yerznkatsi (Pluz, ca. 1230–93) was the era's best-known scholar and philosopher. He was the first to write a secular love poem based on a folk tale about a pair of ill-fated lovers—an Armenian boy and a Muslim girl—divided by their faiths. The spirited Frik (b. ca. 1230) was popular for his bombastic poems condemning corruption and oppression in all spheres.

Kostandin Yerznkatsi (ca. 1304–36) is significant for introducing extensive nature imagery and earned acclaim for his elaborate allegories.

III. The Rise of Folk Songs and Armenian Classicism. By the end of the 16th c., a new group of poets emerged consisting of Nerses Mokatsi (ca. 1575–1625), Martiros Ghrimetsi (1620–83), and Simeon Aparanetsi (ca. 1540–1614). At the time, folk songs had a great influence on poetry. Nahapet Kuchak (d. ca. 1592) was a master of the hairen variety, an indigenous poetic form written in four lines of *couplets with a single coherent theme.

The 18th c. compensated somewhat for the immediate past's poetic stagnation. Bardic lyricism had developed in the previous century as a branch of folk songs and flourished in the 18th through the works of the two renowned *bards Naghash Hovnatan (1661–1722) and Sayat-Nova (ca. 1712–95). The latter is a dominant figure in the Armenian national imagination, and his songs are still regularly performed. Bardic lyric poems were related to Perso-Arabic lit. and were sung by wandering bards who also performed non-Armenian pieces. They initially expressed historical themes but eventually evolved primarily into love songs. This period also paved the way for formal cl. pieces composed in grabar (cl. Armenian) such as those by Paghtasar Dpir (Grigorian, 1683–1768) and Petros Ghapantsi (d. 1784).

The 18th c. also witnessed the rise of the Mkhitarist Congregation (1717) founded by Mkhitar Sebastatsi (Mkhitar of Sivas, 1676–1749) on the island of San Lazzaro in Venice. The Mkhitarist monks were instrumental in reviving the Armenian lang. and lit. Mkhitar was their first author and wrote mainly religious poems with patriotic themes. Arsen Bakratuni (1790–1866) and Ghevont Alishan (1820–1901) succeeded him as the two most prominent Mkhitarist poets. Bakratuni's poem Hayk Diutzazn (The Epic Hero Hayk) is one of the longest poems (22,332 lines) in world lit. and represents the height of Armenian classicism. It recounts the heroic exploits of the mythical Armenian forefather Hayk, deriving its influence from ancient Gr. and Lat. sources. Alishan's poems were the first to appear in mod. Armenian and initiated the romantic trad. in Armenian lit., inspiring the patriotic works of such major 19th-c. poets as Raphael Patkanian (1830–92) and Mikayel Nalpantian (1829–66). Alishan's most celebrated poems include "Voghbam Zkez Hayots Ashkharh" (I Weep for You, Armenia) and Hushigk Hayrenyats Hayots (Memories of the Armenian Homeland).

The 19th c. inaugurated a culturally fertile epoch, which continued into the early portion of the 20th c. Armenian poetry in particular underwent radical transformation, achieving unprecedented popularity and a central role in facilitating the Armenian national-cultural revival. Interest in the poetic trad. led folklorist Father Karekin Srvandztiantz to the major discovery and inscription in the 1870s of Sansuntsi Davit (David of Sassoun), part of the cycle Sasna Tzrer (Madmen of Sasun) and Jojants Tun (House of Giants). It was an epic recounted for the first time in the Middle Ages and had survived in the oral trad. of Mush, one of whose inhabitants, Krpo of Mush, had retained and retold it.

IV. The National Awakening. The second half of the 19th c. is known as the era of Zartonk (Awakening), which proceeded from various historical, political, and cultural antecedents: the rise of the merchant classes in Armenian global diasporic communities; the creation of Armenian printing presses; the cultural efforts of the Mkhitarist congregation; and the preoccupation of Eur.-educated intellectuals with national concerns. Four poets exemplified the spirit and poetic trends of the Zartonk generation: Mgrdich Beshigtashlian (1828–68) and Bedros Turian (1851–72), both natives of Istanbul, represented the Western Armenian dialect writing in the Ottoman Empire; and Mikayel Nalpantian (1829–66) and Raphael Patkanian (also known as Kamar Katipa, 1830–92), both from Nor Nakhichevan (Rostov-on-Don), wrote in Eastern Armenian in the South Caucasus. Beshigtashlian is renowned for his romantic lyricism, which combined naturalist imagery with nationalist motifs. His poems "Karun" ("Spring") and "Yeghpair Emk Mek . . ." (We Are Brothers . . .) highlight his delicate temperament and profound patriotism. Turian, who died prematurely from tuberculosis at the age of 21, was much beloved by his contemporaries. His poems primarily speak of unrequited love, untimely death, and patriotic struggle. His poems "Ljag" ("Little Lake"), about his imminent death, and "Trkuhin" (The Turkish Woman), about an unattainable beloved, are among his most popular works. Nalpantian was a staunch anti-imperialist activist whose poems reflect his political inclinations, esp. in "Mankutyan Orer" (Childhood Days), "Azatutyun" (Freedom), and "Mer Hayrenik" (Our Fatherland), which became the national anthem of the Republic of Armenia. Similarly, Patkanian considered his work a medium for promoting enlightenment and national consciousness through such poems as "Araxi Artasuke" ("The Tears of the Araxes") and his 1878 collection Azat Yerger (Free Songs).

V. The Rise of the Aesthetes. In the last decades of the 19th c., as *realism gradually replaced romanticism, preference for poetry waned in favor of prose. The next wave of influential poets emerged afterward, in the first two decades of the 20th c. Taking their cues from the canon of Western lit., some of them demanded and exercised new modes of ling. refinement and aesthetic consciousness, becoming known as the Aesthetes. The outstanding names of this time include, among Western Armenians, Misak Medzarents (1886–1908), Vahan Tekeyan (1878–1945), Tanyel Varujan (1884–1915), Siamanto (Adom Yerjanian, 1878–1915); and among Eastern Armenians, Hovhannes Tumanian (1869–1923), Yeghishé Charents (Soghomonian, 1897–1937), Avetik Issahakian (1875–1957), and Vahan Terian (1885–1920).

Varujan and Charents constitute the apex of these new poetic heights and share similarly tragic fates. Varujan described his perspective as "poetic paganism," which he voiced initially with his rendition of "Vahagn." The poem appeared in his first large collection, Tzeghin Sirde (The Heart of the Race, 1909), which was followed by Hetanos Yerker (Pagan Songs, 1912), considered two of the most important books of Armenian poetry from the 20th c. On April 24, 1915, the eve of the outbreak of the Catastrophe (the genocide of Ottoman-Armenians, 1915–18), Varujan was captured by Ottoman authorities along with hundreds of his contemporaries and deported to the prison camp of Chankiri, where he was promptly executed. Charents lived across the Ottoman border, in Soviet territory. He was a staunch Communist but soon became disillusioned with the Stalinist regime, which took his life during the 1937 purges. Charents's work expresses a revolutionary spirit that responded with insight and fervor to the harrowing historicopolitical vicissitudes he observed and experienced. His best-known works in his extensive repertoire include Tandeakan Araspel (Dantesque Legend), a response to the World War I Ottoman atrocities he witnessed as a volunteer soldier; Ambokhnerë Khelagarvatz (The Frenzied Masses), which established him as the first major non-Russian Soviet poet; and Girk Chanaparhi (Book of the Road), a set of verses dedicated to major Armenian cultural figures alongside religious and love poems.

VI. Poetry in Diaspora. Following the Catastrophe and the expansion of the Armenian diaspora, poetry experienced a mixture of decline and experimentation. Surviving and emerging Ottoman-Armenian writers wrote haphazardly and consisted both of traditionalist and avant-garde wings. Among the traditionalists who conformed to the poetic ideals and methods of their predecessors were Mushegh Ishkhan (Mushegh Jerderian, 1913–90), Antranig Dzarugian (1912–90), and Vahé Vahian (Sarkis Abdalian, 1907–98). Among the avant-garde, one finds Nigoghos Sarafian (1902–72), Zahrad (pseud. of Zareh Yaldzjian, 1924–2007), Zareh Khrakhuni (pseud. of Artin Jiumbiushian, b. 1926), and Vahé Oshagan (1922–2000). Dzarugian and Sarafian have left the most indelible marks by vividly expressing their generation's orientation. Dzarugian's controversial poem, "Tught ar Yerevan" (Letter to Yerevan) targeted Soviet Armenian writers' antinationalist propagandist rhet. Sarafian paved a unique and unprecedented path with his long poem Venseni Andare (The Forest of Vincennes), which traces the poet's inner journey as the son of a displaced people. During the same years, Soviet Armenian poets were beset by the regime's stringent restrictions. They include Gevork Emin (1919–98), Paruyr Sevak (1924–71), and Silva Kaputikian (1919–2006).

In the wake of the 20th c., Armenian poetry is at a virtual standstill, though several promising voices in the diaspora and the Republic of Armenia remain active. Krikor Beledian (b. 1948), based in France, is author of the groundbreaking works Yelk: Mantraner B. Shark (Exit: Mantras B. Series) and Deghakrutyun Kantvogh Kaghaki Me Hamar (Diagram for a Collapsing City), which impels Armenian poetry into new uncharted realms of abstraction. Violet Grigorian (b. 1962) is a singular experimental poet whose feminist themes and provocative lang. continue to interrogate and undermine entrenched patriarchal taboos. She has published four collections of poems, incl. Haremi Vard (Harem Rose).

■ Anthologies: A. Issahakian, Scent, Smile, and Sorrow: Selected Verse (1891–1957) and Jottings from Notebooks, ed. and trans. E. B. Chrakian (1975); Anthology of Armenian Poetry, ed. and trans. D. Der Hovanessian and M. Margossian (1978); Armenian Poetry, Old and New: A Bilingual Anthology, ed. and trans. A. Tolegian (1979); K. Nahapet, Come Sit Beside Me and Listen to Koutchag: Medieval Armenian Poems of Nahabed Kouchag, trans. D. Der-Hovanessian (1984); Bloody News from My Friend: Poems by Siamanto, trans. P. Balakian and N. Yaghlian (1996); K. Nahapet, A Hundred and One Hayrens, trans. E. Osers (1998); The Heritage of Armenian Literature, ed. G. Basmajian, E. S. Franchuk, A. J. Hacikyan, and N. Ouzounian, 3 v. (2000–05); Bosphorus Nights: The Complete Lyric Poems of Bedros Tourian, trans. J. R. Russell (2005); Deviation: Anthology of Contemporary Armenian Literature, ed. V. Grigoryan and V. Ishkhanyan (2008).

■ Collections: Armenian Popular Songs, trans. G. M. Alishan (1852); V. Komitas, Armenian Sacred and Folk Music, trans. E. Gulbekian (1998); G. M. Alishan, Old Armenian Songs: A Nineteenth-Century Collection, ed. A. Nercessian (2002); The Song of the Stork and Other Early and Ancient Armenian Songs, trans. D. Kherdian (2004).

■ Histories: B. S. Hairapetian, A History of Armenian Literature: From Ancient Times to the 19th Century (1995); K. B. Bardakjian, A Reference Guide to Modern Armenian Literature, 1500–1920 (2000); V. Nersessian, "Armenian," The Oxford Guide to Literature in English Translation, ed. P. France (2000); S. P. Cowe, "Medieval Armenian Literary and Cultural Trends," The Armenian People from Ancient to Modern Times, Vol. 1: The Dynastic Periods, ed. R. G. Hovanissian (2004); V. Oshagan, "Modern Armenian Literature and Intellectual History from 1700 to 1915" and R. W. Thomson, "Armenian Literary Culture through the Eleventh Century," The Armenian People from Ancient to Modern Times, Vol. 2: Foreign Dominion to Statehood, ed. R. G. Hovanissian (2004); R. Panossian, The Armenians: From Kings and Priests to Merchants and Commissars (2006).

■ Journals: Ararat: A Quarterly (1960–); Journal of the Society for Armenian Studies (1984–); Raft: Journal of Armenian Poetry and Criticism (1984–).

■ Translations and Criticism: David of Sassoun: The Armenian Folk Epic in Four Cycles, trans. A. K. Shalian (1964); Moses of Khoren, History of the Armenians, trans. R. W. Thomson (1978); C. Dowsett, Sayat'-Nova: An Eighteenth-Century Troubadour (1997); The Heroes of Kasht: An Armenian Epic, ed. and trans. J. R. Russell (2000); N. Grigor, Speaking with God from the Depths of the Heart: The Armenian Prayer Book of St. Gregory of Narek, trans. T. J. Samuelian (2001); M. Nichanian, Writers of Disaster, Vol. 1: The National Revolution (2002); Yeghishe Charents: Poet of the Revolution, ed. M. Nichanian (2003); Divine Liturgy of the Armenian Apostolic Orthodox Church, trans. A. Aivazian (2005); S. A. Arak'el, Adamgirk': The Adam Book of Arak'el of Siwnik', trans. M. E. Stone (2007); A. Eghiazaryan, Daredevils of Sasun: Poetics of an Epic, trans. S. P. Cowe (2008).

N. Kebranian

ARSIS AND THESIS (Gr., "raising and lowering"). These terms, and their equivalents, arsis and basis (step), and to ano (the up [time]) and to kato (the down), designate the two rhythmical divisions of the *foot in cl. Gr. and Lat. prosody. The thesis always contains a basic longum or its resolved equivalent and is the rhythmically prominent portion of the foot; the arsis always contains at least one breve or an anceps* and is the nonprominent portion. However, arsis and thesis should not be equated with the up- and downbeats of Western music. In simple feet such as the iamb (⏑ –), trochee (– ⏑), *dactyl (– ⏑ ⏑), and *anapest (⏑ ⏑ –), the arsis is the single or double breve; the thesis is the longum.

Linguistic Basis. The two primary attributes of *rhythm are temporal regularity and prominence differentiation. Arsis and thesis pertain to the latter. When subjects in a psychological experiment were presented with a sequence of evenly spaced, identical sounds, they judged alternate sounds to be stronger, i.e., they assigned an alternating arsis and thesis structure to an objectively undifferentiated sequence. In the rhythm of speech, the prominence is commonly stress: strong or thesis syllables have primary or secondary stress, while weak or arsis syllables are unstressed. At least one syllable must be mapped onto thesis, but sometimes no syllable is assigned to arsis. In some langs., a sequence of two syllables within the same word can be mapped onto one thesis (see RESOLUTION).

The terms originally designated the raising and lowering of the foot in walking (Pseudo-Aristotle, Problemata 5.41; cf. Bacchius 98) and probably entered the technical terminology of music theory from description of the dance. In the later Roman period, arsis sometimes refers to the first part of the foot, thesis to the second, but their meanings became reversed in the Lat. trad. (e.g., Terentianus Maurus [see Keil 6.366, 1345–46]), probably when the grammarians came to identify arsis and thesis with the lowering and raising of the voice rather than of the foot. The confusion aroused by this reversal of meanings was carried into mod. cl. scholarship by Richard Bentley in the 18th c. and Gottfried Hermann in the 19th. It would be better if both terms were now avoided altogether outside of Gr. metrics. In Old Germanic and OE metrics, the equivalent terms are lift and dip; mod. metrists speak indifferently of positions or else of ictus* and nonictus.

See METER.

■ J. Caesar, Disputatio de verborum "artsis" et "thesis" apud scriptores artis metricae latinos . . . significatione (1885); E. H. Sturtevant, "The Ictus of Classical Verse," AJP 44 (1923); H. Woodrow, "Time Perception," Handbook of Experimental Psychology, ed. S. S. Stevens (1951); R. P. Winnington-Ingram, "Fragments of Unknown Greek Tragic Texts with Musical Notation, II," Symbolae Osloenses 31 (1955); Beare, ch. 5; Maas, sect. 8; Dale, 210 ff.; Allen; A. J. Neubecker, Altgriechische Musik (1977); Michaelides; West.

L. D. Stephens

ARTE MAYOR. As a general Sp. metric term, arte mayor may mean any line of nine or more syllables. However, arte mayor almost always refers to a line of a certain pattern (verso de arte mayor) or to the *strophe composed of such lines (copla de arte mayor). The line developed from the late med. Lat. double *adonic modified by an increasingly liberal use of *anacrusis and *catalexis. Late med. poets borrowed the arte mayor directly from the Galician-Port. of the 13th and 14th cs. The form reached the peak of its devel. in 15th-c. Sp. poetry, then gave way to the Italianate *hendecasyllable in the 16th, since which time it has occupied only a minor position in Sp. poetry. Juan de Mena (1411–56) is considered its greatest master. A recitative measure, it was the vehicle for most poetry of weighty or serious subject matter of the 15th c. Unlike most learned Sp. verse, the arte mayor was not restricted by syllable count but depended largely on rhythmic beat. The basic pattern was a 12-beat verse divided into two *hemistichs of six beats each and having triple rhythm (⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ | ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑) with the second syllable in each hemistich receiving secondary stress and the fifth syllable in each primary stress. The primary and secondary stress beats (the latter occasionally lacking) of each hemistich are supplied by accented syllables; the unstressed beats between these two are supplied by two obligatory unaccented syllables; the remaining unstressed beats may each be supplied by one or two unaccented syllables or a rest beat. The pattern was not always strictly followed. The arte mayor was normally arranged in groups of eight lines to form a stanza, the copla de arte mayor, rhyming abbaacca, less often ababbccb or abbaacac. Although the original arte mayor enjoyed great rhythmic and syllabic freedom, the line in later centuries became primarily a 12-syllable or a 6 + 6 syllable verse with marked amphibrachic rhythm.

■ R. Foulché-Delbosc, "Etude sur le Laberinto de Juan de Mena," Revue hispanique 9 (1902); J. Saavedra Molina, El verso de arte mayor (1946); Le Gentil; M. Burger, Recherches sur la structure et l'origine des vers romans (1957); D. C. Clarke, Morphology of Fifteenth-Century Castilian Verse (1964), and "Line Formation in the Galician-Portuguese Poetry of the Cancioneiro Colocci-Brancuti," RPh 35 (1981); J. Lemartinel, "Remarques sur le vers d'arte mayor," XIV Congresso internazionale di linguistica e filologia romanza, ed. A. Várvaro (1981); Navarro; G. S. Hutcheson, "Cracks in the Labyrinth: Juan de Mena, Converso Experience, and the Rise of the Spanish Nation," La Corónica 25 (1996); J. C. Conde, "Praxis ecdótica y teoría métrica: El case del arte mayor castellana," La Corónica 30 (2002).

D. C. Clarke

ARTE MENOR. Sp. octosyllabic verse (sometimes shorter). The term is used in contrast to arte mayor*, which has longer lines and is generally applied to the verse characteristic of the copla de arte mayor, a late med. stanza having the rhyme scheme of any copla de arte mayor or variation thereof. Both line and *strophe were probably borrowed from 13th- and 14th-c. Galician-Port.

■ D. C. Clarke, "Redondilla and copla de arte menor," HR 9 (1941); Navarro.

D. C. Clarke

ARTIFACT, POETRY AS

I. Classical Background
II. Temporalities
III. Contrasts

An artifact is a made thing. The word artifact draws on one of the oldest meanings of poetry, from Gr. poiésis*: fiction, making.

I. Classical Background. The three modes of making are creation, transformation, and preservation. In cl. poetics, creation is essentially mimetic. For Plato and his followers, poems imitate nature, and natural objects imitate ideas; even artifacts that are not obviously derived from nature, such as tools and furniture, have ideas behind them at a deeper level of reality. For every artifact, a divine source, such as a *muse, communicates a diminished version of an idea to a human maker. In the Hebraic trad., creation is similarly eidetic insofar as things reproduce the image of their creator.

To transform is to give new qualities to things. In the most influential cl. account of transformation, Ovid's Metamorphoses, the mechanism is always a kind of divine action. In the words of Arthur Golding's trans. (1567), the same gods who "wrought" the transformation of "shapes . . . to bodies straunge" will authorize the speaker's voice, directly connecting the origin of the world to the composition and reading of the poem. By imitating nature, artists participate in the transformation of received materials, originally a divine prerogative. On this account, if I am a sculptor working with a piece of stone, I can give the stone qualities that it does not naturally have. I can make it warm, fluid, or transparent; I can make it float. If I am a poet and my material is lang., I should be able to give the words of my lang. the qualities of tears or a fish's scales or an extreme situation such as torture or an emotion such as obsessive love.

To preserve is to maintain something in the given world. The cl. expression of this power is the conventional boast of poetic immortality. Horace seals the third book of his Odes with a poem claiming that he has completed "a monument more lasting than bronze and loftier than the pyramid's royal pile." The book extends the life of the speaker's most valuable "part" by sheltering it from the effects of time; because it can be embodied in speech or writing, memorized, recited, copied, quoted, and translated, it achieves a permanence that would be impossible for seemingly durable bronze and stone memorials. The hostility to the other memorials, the confident projection of a future world that would include the Odes but not the pyramids, is typical. Given the chance, Roman funeral urns and Egyptian pyramids would proclaim their unique permanence and the unreliability of oral or textual transmission. A surviving fragment of a statue makes this very proclamation in P. B. Shelley's "Ozymandias." It may be that all artifacts privately entertain fantasies of the universal destruction of other artifacts.

II. Temporalities. Although secondary, the act of preservation is by no means a weak or diminished species of making. On the contrary, as Heidegger argues, it is deeply involved in the createdness of artifacts. Heidegger is a mod. exponent of a humanist trad. that sees preservation as the artifact's main function. In its most specific meaning, humanism is the intellectual movement driving the Eur. Ren.; humanist scholars and artists of the 15th and 16th cs. processed knowledge through cl. poetic models and translated cl. poetry into mod. langs. Wood's study of Ger. Ren. historiography shows that humanists do not periodize artifacts by the time of their manufacture but instead treat them as counters in a "chain of substitutions" across time. As Wood succinctly puts it, humanists use artifacts to "bend time" into a knot tying things in the present to their origins in things from a chronologically distant past. E.g., when John Keats looks into Chapman's Homer, he sees not only the mediator, George Chapman, but Homer and his world; the book might bring Keats closer to Homer than to Chapman. In a broad sense, humanism is a trad., starting with Aristotle if not earlier, of using artifacts to forge links between ancient and mod. epochs, thereby establishing a common world. The maker of an artifact gathers pieces of the past and sends them into the future.

Arendt, an eloquent defender of humanism, explains how artifacts maintain a world. Things promise commonness and objectivity in that several people can encounter the same thing, as well as plurality in that different encounters can be compared and in that the things physically hold persons apart. All things help to separate persons, but Arendt privileges works of art for their claims to permanence. The resistance of works of art to the effects of time and the care that people put into protecting them from decay ensure the continuity of the world. Thus, although J. W. Goethe is not our contemporary, we can look at the same sculptures that he saw and read the poems that he wrote, as well as poems that he read by earlier poets.

Poetry is somewhat exceptional in Arendt's cosmology. Artworks are "the most intensely worldly of tangible things," but poems are less worldly, less "thingly," than other artworks because their medium is lang. and they are not usually object-specific. The indifference of poetry to its particular objectification both guarantees its easy transmissibility and leaves it vulnerable to disappearance from hist. Attempts to locate poetry in unique objects, ranging from Brooks's argument against paraphrase to Howe's argument for the semantic value of Dickinson's pen strokes, inevitably sacrifice the transmissibility without lending poems any additional durability.

Not all made things count as artifacts for Arendt.

Artifacts, which persist in time, belong to the sphere of human activity that she calls work, as opposed to labor, whose ephemeral products only sustain life. A similar division within the category of made things occurs in the aesthetics of the Victorian poet and designer William Morris. According to Morris's lectures on ornament, art enters the artifact as a feeling of joy in working and encountering "resistance in the material." This joy is embodied in the decorative flourishes that covered every surface of the furniture and walls in Morris's home and the pages of the books he printed. The alternative would be a fragmentary or ruined thing, hastily, carelessly, and unhappily thrown together. Morris describes this condition of denuded utility, in which a household object such as a ceramic cup receives only a first impression of form and is good for nothing more than holding a liquid and keeping it at a constant temperature, as one of "useless toil," "slavery," and "death," terms that he uses interchangeably. The aesthetic ideal would be a world of exclusively handmade objects whose every surface displayed legible marks of joy in work. An example of such a mark is the motto that Morris borrows from the early mod. painter Jan Van Eyck and inscribes on many of his artisanal and poetic productions: "Si je puis," meaning "If I can," with the implication "As well as I can." The signature directs attention to the artist's virtuosity while ambiguously calling it into question, suggesting that it has limits or that it is derived from an external, perhaps divine source.

For other theorists, the concept of artifactuality dissolves distinctions between art objects and the tools and products of manual labor. Kubler uses the concept to include ancient Mayan tools in art hist.; Gell uses it to include high art in cultural anthropology, as when he outrageously characterizes Michelangelo's David as "a big doll for grownups." Both rely on the artifact's extension in time, its durability as opposed to its unassailable permanence. Kubler defines an artifact as a "fibrous bundle" of durations of varying lengths that facilitate contact between cultures and epochs. E.g., a book is published in the 20th c.; its contents are composed in the 16th c., and they translate an ancient poem that incorporates sources from an untraceable past. Many passages in the book are ignored at the time of their publication, and some will come into view centuries later. The format of the book is worth considering: the font is based on an 18th-c. design; the technology of writing is older than the ancient poem, whereas the printed book, of which the glossy paperback is a recent variation, is a near contemporary of the early mod. trans. To what period does the book belong? What happens when this book is placed on a shelf alongside another book that gives time another shape?

Benjamin, however, would deny an important feature of artifactuality to the printed book. A unique handmade object receives from its maker a spiritual deposit that Benjamin calls its "aura." Objects mass-produced by machine lack this aura; further, the auras of unique objects are compromised merely by the existence of the technology to reproduce them mechanically. The aura is the artifact's historical trace, the footprint that it leaves in time; this mark is erased when it can be replaced by a new copy at any moment. Without aura, there can be no artifact. Through the devel. of technologies of reproduction, all artifacts come to share in the diminished worldliness that Arendt ascribes to poetry.

III. Contrasts. In cl. poetics, creativity is not considered a human possibility. Creation in the strong sense of producing something without a precedent in the hist. of forms becomes a value in *romanticism. In Biographia Literaria (1817), S. T. Coleridge, e.g., assigns primary creative powers to the faculty of *imagination, which he associates with "the eternal I AM," as opposed to the *fancy, a secondary image-making faculty that can only arrange received materials. The word creativity, coined in the early 20th c., reflects the modernist values of novelty and originality. Ezra Pound gives voice to these values in the motto "Make it new." The singularity of modernity is axiomatic in *historicism, a method of historical scholarship that assigns each object in the universe to a single place and time, the context of its moment of origin. Historicist scholars as different as Rosemond Tuve and Stephen Greenblatt agree in positing an absolute division between mod. and premod. epochs and in treating poems and other art objects as symptoms rather than remedies of the division. These devels. present challenges to humanist accounts of artifactuality.

An artifact need not be a product of human civilization, as Paul Valéry demonstrates in an essay on seashells. A seashell is undeniably a made thing; in what he describes as a "naive moment," Valéry writes that the first question in the seashell's catechism is "Who made me?" We live in a world of made things, but we experience the world as given because we do not know how to read the signatures on things or because they naturalize themselves, hiding the signs of their making, or simply because we did not make them. An artifact does not have to be brought into the world through an act of human making or perceiving, but it has to do the more difficult work of maintaining a world for a period of time greater than an instant. It is precisely for this reason that Brooks emphasizes the artifactuality of poetry by appropriating John Donne's image of a "well-wrought urn" as an emblem: he wants a poem to exist in a "history without footnotes" rather than in a single historical context as "the expression of the values of its time." Brooks makes Benjamin's point more strongly: without artifacts, there can be no hist.

The true opposite of artifactuality may be theatricality. A theater is a public space, and the scenes enacted there may be shared among the members of the audience in attendance, but the scenes are impermanent. Theater tends to exhaust the resources of artifice in a single moment of *performance. Historicism privileges theatrical performances because they are specific to cultures and to occasions. An artifact, by contrast, is not specific to a culture; instead, it acts as a portal through which materials pass between cultures. Perhaps no theater of purely improvised performances exists. Theater starts to become artifactual when it shapes actions into things that endure beyond the moment of performance, either through the institutions and conventions of the stage or the repetition of actions, characters, and entire plays or through the memorization and objectification of a script.

Many genres of poetry, including *epic, *ballad, *tragedy, *sound poetry, and spoken word, are theatrical in the sense that they were composed in or for a moment of performance. Some mod. poetry is theatrical in a different but related sense that Fried explores in his hist. of art. The literal assertion of the specific properties of objects that occurs in minimalist art is an unhealthy sort of theatricality, according to Fried, in that the art object solicits the participation of a beholder. *Concrete poetry and conceptual writing are theatrical in Fried's sense by virtue of their redundant thematization of their own appearance, their careful undoing of the tension between figure and ground (see CONCEPTUAL POETRY). *Language poetry is intensely theatrical because, in addition to its orientation toward the materials of lang., it professes to give power to readers. Barbara Guest, a poet of the *New York school, is like Fried in rejecting the typical modernist insistence on the elemental materials of lang. A good poem is no longer made of words, although "it is true that many poems are constructed solely of words. . . . We have all read these poems and know that after we have read them we feel curiously bereft." Guest disagrees with Stéphane Mallarmé's dictum that poems are made of words rather than ideas and with W. C. Williams's definition of a poem as "a small (or large) machine made of words." Instead, a poet gives words the properties of other bodies "even as a painting has flesh."

Most poems have artifactual and theatrical aspects. Robert Herrick deliberately composes the "Argument" of his collection Hesperides (1648) out of small unities of each: "I sing of times trans-shifting, and I write / How roses first came red, and lilies white." The acts of the speaker demarcate two ways of thinking about lyric. "I sing" conceives lyric as performance, holding a moment in time to itself. "I write" conceives it as monument, persisting in time, connecting things to their origins in other things. The former approach allows Jackson to consider Emily Dickinson's poems as performances specific to the occasion of their composition; the latter allows Keats to look into Chapman's Homer. Both are valid, demonstrating opposed ways of poetry's participating in hist.

See BOOK, POETIC; CLASSICISM; FICTION, POETRY AS; FRANKFURT SCHOOL; INFORMATION, POETRY AS; KNOWLEDGE, POETRY AS; MIMESIS; MODERNISM.

■ Brooks; H. Arendt, The Human Condition (1958); G. Kubler, The Shape of Time (1962); P. Valéry, Aesthetics, trans. R. Manheim (1964); Benjamin; W. Morris, Unpublished Lectures, ed. E. Lemire (1969)—esp. "Of the Origins of Ornamental Art"; M. Heidegger, Poetry, Language, Thought, trans. D. Hofstadter (1971); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991); A. Grossman, The Sighted Singer (1992); S. Howe, The Birth-mark (1993); M. Fried, Art and Objecthood (1998); A. Gell, Art and Agency (1998); D. Mao, Solid Objects (1998); B. Guest, Forces of Imagination (2003); V. Jackson, Dickinson's Misery (2005); C. Wood, Forgery, Replica, Fiction (2008); A. Kunin, "Shakespeare's Preservation Fantasy," PMLA 124 (2009).

A. KUNIN

ARTIFICE, POETIC. While general definitions of artifice link it to contrivance, artistry, and technical skill, poetic artifice specifically denotes the densely concentrated sonic, visual, and imagistic properties that mark poetry as distinct from prose. The binaries of poetry/prose and artifice/nature, evident in 20th-c. crit., have characterized theories of poetic artifice since the early mod. period, when artifice was closely tied to artistic invention. In the 1970s, poetic artifice in Eng. came to signify more narrowly those nonsemantic features—such as lineation or overall sonic texture—lost in the attempt to render a poem in prose. Later 20th-c. crit. revised this position to argue that lang. unique to poetry (at the level of device but also above and below it) falls within a continuum of semantic meaning. Despite these marked continuities, the arc of critical conversation on poetic artifice may be seen to modulate from moral debates to formalistic and aesthetic ones, esp. after the 17th c., and from a humanist-derived view of the concept as problematic but necessary to the recent sense that artifice is among the terms that best links experimental trads. of the past to those of the present.

Debates over poetic artifice polarized Eng. poetics in the 16th and 17th cs. Denouncers deemed it unnatural, seductive, and morally dangerous; defenders celebrated its demonstrations of human ingenuity and craft. In his Discourse of English Poetrie, the 16th-c. critic William Webbe wished some poetic works "bettered, and made more artificiall." Other writers vilified poetry's dissimulations, and their opinions likely colored the strong contemp. association between artifice and rhetorical argumentation: Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa condemned poetry as "the female Architect of falsehood." Indeed, Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1595) distances poetry from artifice, as he rejects fixed, "artificial rules" of rhet. in favor of poetry that invents "another nature" more "golden" than that of the world.

Moralistic invectives against artifice peaked at the turn of the 17th c., the age of the *baroque. In his Worlde of Wordes (1598), John Florio declared true poetry inimical to "that Art, or rather that Artifice, [which] debauch[es] and corrupt[s] the People." To antibaroque observers, poetry was the Virgin; artifice, the Whore. By the century's end, however, critics alloyed moral judgments with aesthetic ones (e.g., Gilbert Burnet's Discourse of the Pastoral Care deemed "artificial poetry" "forced and unnatural . . . in a great measure ridiculous"). By the mid-1700s, discussions of poetic artifice had shifted almost entirely to formal concerns. As the tide turned, many theorists came to view artifice less as corruption of natural lang. and more as elevating play. Robert Lowth, for instance, claimed in De sacra poesi Hebraeorum (Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews) that artifice lent poems, "a certain peculiar colouring, which elevates it above the lang. of the vulgar. Poetry . . . always makes use of . . . artifice." Theorists from the mid-1700s on invoked poetic artifice in ambitious claims about formal structures. Samuel Johnson's preface to Works of the English Poets deems the "artifice of rhyme" central to *neoclassical poetic organization; nearly a century later, G. M. Hopkins's "Poetic Diction" theorizes *parallelism as the principle of "all [poetic] artifice." Late 19th- and early 20th-c. poetics, while sensitive to the inherited problem of nature/artifice, continued to approach artifice from a largely technical angle, with new attention to markers of textual self-irony and the artifice of written *"voice."

In the wake of high *modernism and into the postmod. era, formalist critics examined poetic artifice via close textual analysis, in New Criticism, and in ling. theory, such as that of Jakobson (who wrote that "on every level of language the essence of poetic artifice consists in recurrent returns"). In a reconfiguration of Sidney's 16th-c. poetry/rhet. distinction, the New Critic Wimsatt contrasts poetic and rhetorical artifice (see NEW CRITICISM). While rhet. depends on its artifice not being "seen through," poetry is strengthened "by an increase in our understanding of the artifice." He concludes, "In poetry the artifice is art."

An article on the New Critic William Empson's poetry, "Rational Artifice" by Forrest-Thomson, led to her groundbreaking book Poetic Artifice. Drawing from Ludwig Wittgenstein, specifically his understanding of poetry as different from the "language-game" of transmitting information, Forrest-Thomson imagines a reading practice that gives more attention to the textures and effects of a poem's lang. than to the "communicable" statements it transmits. While she notes that poetry-specific reading practices are conventionally inscribed in the shape and lineation of a poem, she concentrates on the poem's internal patterns of *sounds, *forms, *tropes, and *images. Concerned with critical praxis, Poetic Artifice demonstrates how to study a poem's "nonsemantic" artifice without vulgar "naturalizations" of the poem into prose paraphrase or dilation. It aims to read poetry, in other words, not for its statements or ideas but for the artifice that makes it poetry.

The study of artifice extends well beyond Eng.-lang. crit., to every Eur.-derived lit. that confronts the humanist dichotomy of nature/artifice. Within poetics specifically, Vega Ramos in El secreto artificio studies Ren. theories of Sp. vernacular poetry, noting their attention to fonosimbolismo, or semantically expressive sounds (*onomatopoeia, alliterated hard consonants, and such). The artifice of emphatic or repeated sounds, Vega Ramos suggests, powerfully shapes meaning. While Forrest-Thomson looks to poems' sounds for nonsemantic art, Vega Ramos regards artful sound as a semantic act of its own.

In "Artifice of Absorption," a verse-essay on Forrest-Thomson's work, Bernstein offers a corrective to her stark distinction between artifice and semantic communication. He writes that, while the test of artifice is its resistance to summary, artifice nonetheless signifies; there is no hard line between meaningful and unmeaningful sound. Despite this corrective, Bernstein largely endorses and amplifies Forrest-Thomson's primary claims. Importantly, both critics define artifice against realism*. In their view, realism attempts to mimic unmediated transmission, while artifice stresses untransparent materiality. Consequently, though all poems are built of structures defined by poetic artifice, the term in Eng. is most often associated with *Language poetry and other forms of *avant-garde poetry and poetics. In this trad., Perloff's Radical Artifice examines how the poetry of media-saturated postmod. culture asserts its artificial constructedness by rejecting principles of "natural language" and syntax, while the 1998 anthology Artifice and Indeterminacy generalizes "artifice" to characterize cutting-edge contemp. poetics as a whole.

See ABSORPTION, INVENTION, RENAISSANCE POETICS.

■ W. K. Wimsatt, Hateful Contraries (1966); V. Forrest-Thomson, Poetic Artifice (1978); R. Jakobson, Language in Literature (1987); C. Bernstein, Artifice of Absorption (1988); M. Perloff, Radical Artifice (1991); M. J. Vega Ramos, El secreto artificio (1992); Artifice and Indeterminacy, ed. C. Beach (1998); F. Masiello, "Oliverio Girondo: Naturaleza y artifício," Revista de Critica Literaria Latinoamericana 24 (1998); B. K. Stefans, "Veronica Forrest-Thomson and High Artifice," Jacket 14 (2001), http://jacketmagazine.com/14/stefans-vft.html/.

M. CASTILE

ARZAMAS. A Rus. literary circle, active 1815–18 in St. Petersburg. Members (incl. Vasily Zhukovsky, Konstantin Batiushkov, Petr Viazemskii, and Alexander Pushkin) created parodies of the conservative group Beseda ("Lovers of the Russian Word") and advanced a more conversational literary lang., following the arguments of the historian and writer Nikolai Karamzin. Arzamas fostered a cult of friendship and lasting bonds among its members. Arzamas dissolved when Beseda weakened, but its views triumphed, particularly in the success of Pushkin and others in the 1820s.

See RUSSIA, POETRY OF.

■ M. I. Gillel'son, Molodoi Pushkin i arzamasskoe bratstvo (1974); W. M. Todd III, The Familiar Letter as a Literary Genre in the Age of Pushkin (1976), 38–75; Terras.

S. SANDLER

ASCLEPIAD, asclepiadean. An *aeolic line consisting of a *glyconic (x x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ –) internally compounded with a *choriamb, thus: x x – ⏑ ⏑ – – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ –. Though named by later grammarians after the Gr. epigrammatist Asclepiades of Samos (ca. 300 BCE), it is already found in Alcaeus (7th c. BCE) and, in fact, was used long before for both *lyric (monodic and choral) and *tragedy. The asclepiad was used extensively both as a stichic verse and in combination with other aeolic forms to form *strophes. Horace in his Odes used the asclepiad frequently, in five different arrangements that have come to be called first through fifth asclepiads, though mod. scholars do not agree on which types go with which names. The asclepiad line form shown at the end of the first sentence above is known as the lesser asclepiad; the greater asclepiad (there seems to be no ancient evidence for this term) adds a third choriamb: x x – ⏑ ⏑ – – ⏑ ⏑ – – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ –. The greater was used by both the aeolic poets and by Horace.

In the Middle Ages, asclepiads (or alcaic hendecasyllables) alternating with glyconics are found in Hilary of Poitiers (4th c. CE), Prudentius (ca. 348–405), and the Carolingian poets; as in Horace, there is usually a break after the sixth position: – – – ⏑ ⏑ – | – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ –. The med. asclepiad strophe kept itself quietly afloat on the steady stream of popularity of the cl. *ode forms—particularly the *sapphic—a stream given its impetus by the authority of Horatian poetics. There are some 40 examples of the asclepiad in the Analecta hymnica. In the Ren., accentual imitations and trans. of asclepiadeans were tried by Pierre de Ronsard and the Pléiade*. Philip Sidney attempts some in the Old Arcadia (e.g., "O sweet woods" in the Second Eclogues), and William Collins's "Ode to Evening" is a fourth asclepiadean. The young John Milton essayed an imitation "as near as the Language will permit" of Horace's ode 1.5 (a third asclepiadian), rendering "Quis multa gracilis te puer in rosa" as "What slender youth bedew'd with liquid odours." Ger. examples include F. G. Klopstock's "Der Zürcher See" and Friedrich Hölderlin's "Heidelberg."

■ Wilamowitz; H. Sadej, "De versu Asclepiadeo minore apud Romanos obvio," Eos 45 (1951); L. Rotsch, "Zur Form der drei Horaz-Oden im Asclepiadeus maior," Gymnasium 64 (1957); A. R. Bellinger, "The Lesser Asclepiadean Line of Horace," Yale Classical Studies 15 (1957); Norberg; Maas; W. Bennett, German Verse in Classical Metres (1963), ch. 27; L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); Koster; N. A. Bonavia-Hunt, Horace the Minstrel (1969); Halporn et al.; Snell; West.

J. W. HALPORN; T.V.F. BROGAN

ASIAN AMERICAN POETRY. Asians who migrated to the U.S. beginning in the mid-19th c. quickly established a rich, if ephemeral, literary culture. Chinese migrants detained at Angel Island in San Francisco Bay, the point of entry between 1910 and 1940 for immigrants from China, inscribed poems on the walls of their barracks. Written in the cl. Chinese style, these poems, recovered decades later by Him Mark Lai and others and published in the anthol. Island (1980), mix literary and historical allusions with the laments of immigrants detained for weeks or months awaiting admission to the U.S. The community that formed in San Francisco's Chinatown produced a rich body of Cantonese vernacular rhymes of aspiration, struggle, and disillusionment, published in newspapers and anthologies and collected by Marlon K. Hom in Songs of Gold Mountain (1987). The overwhelmingly male immigrants, cut off from their families by U.S. policies of Chinese exclusion, often wrote their laments in the voices of wives left behind in China. In Hawai'i, the hole-hole bushi, sung by Japanese plantation workers, set erotic themes and claims to Am. soil to the rhythms of labor.

Writing in Eng. by poets of Asian descent began to appear as early as the 1890s, as cataloged in Juliana Chang's historical anthol. Quiet Fire (1996). Sadakichi Hartmann, a writer of Japanese and Ger. ancestry, served for a time as Walt Whitman's secretary and became a pioneering critic of mod. art and photography. Hartmann composed symbolist verse and drama and was among the first to introduce the Japanese forms of tanka and haiku (see HAIKAI) to Am. audiences. The poems of Yone Noguchi, another early advocate of the Eng. lang. *haiku, resonate with techniques of *free verse and *imagism. By the 1920s, poems such as Wen I-to's "The Laundry Song" and H. T. Tsiang's "Chinaman, Laundryman" were offering sharp political commentary on the economic struggles of Chinese immigrants, many of whom had been forced into what had traditionally been "women's work" through restrictive labor laws.

Japanese Am. poetry flourished through the first half of the 20th c. Regional poetry societies devoted themselves to writing in traditional Japanese forms, and poems in Japanese and Eng. appeared widely in community and national publications, launching the careers of poets such as Toyo Suyemoto and Hisaye Yamamoto. During World War II, even as Japanese Americans were forced into internment camps, poetry continued to appear in jours. published in the camps, and the trauma of internment would become a major theme of Asian Am. writing in decades to come. The 1940s also saw the first books of poetry by Filipino authors in the U.S. Jose Garcia Villa, already well known as a pioneering mod. writer in the Philippines, won praise from e. e. cummings and Marianne Moore for his mystical, allusive, modernist lyrics and later gained notoriety for his *"comma poems," visual experiments in which all spaces between words were replaced by commas. Carlos Bulosan, who would later gain fame for his autobiographical novel America Is in the Heart, published powerful poems of working-class experience and protest.

In the post–World War II years, Lawson Fusao Inada, who was interned with his family during the war, would become the major Asian Am. poet of his generation. Inada's Before the War (1971) was one of the first books of Asian Am. poetry to be published by a major New York publisher, and Legends from Camp (1993) established Inada as one of the primary poetic chroniclers of the internment experience. Inada's short, syncopated lines are rooted in jazz rhythms, and his poems are a cool mixture of historical memory, sharp commentary, and imagistic lyricism.

Inada's work featured prominently in the literary flowering of the 1970s, a decade marked by political upheaval and activism, during which the term Asian American emerged as a label for a panethnic political and cultural identity. Poetry played a central role in this political awakening, pub. regularly in Asian Am. jours. such as Gidra and Bridge as a representation of the voice of "the people." The work of poets such as

Fay Chiang, Al Robles, and Ronald Tanaka used direct, colloquial lang., reflecting influences from popular music, oral performance, and the *Beat poets, to offer polemics and reflections on politics, race, and culture. Perhaps the paradigmatic poet of this era was Janice Mirikitani, founder of Aion, the first Asian Am. literary magazine. Mirikitani's activist commitments were matched by a populist style, using natural and archetypal imagery to treat topics like internment, sexism, and racial stereotyping, while celebrating Asian Am. community and culture.

In the 1980s, Asian Am. poetry gained increasing recognition from mainstream literary institutions. Cathy Song's Picture Bride, which won the Yale Younger Poets prize in 1982, signaled a shift from the politically charged, populist work of the 1970s to what George Uba has called "post-activist" poetry, featuring polished, understated, first-person lyrics and dramatic monologues. Poets such as Song, David Mura, Marilyn Chin, and Li-Young Lee gained wide readerships outside the Asian Am. community with lyrics that explored personal experience, family hist. and sexuality while adopting a skeptical distance from politics. Mura's poems interweave Japanese Am. hist. with reflections on domesticity and addiction; Chin's playful formalism offers ironic takes on identity politics; and Lee's widely taught and anthologized "Persimmons" uses the scene of an Asian Am. boy corrected for his "misuse" of lang. to open up depths of memory and emotion. The definitive statement of this mode is Garrett Hongo's 1993 anthol. The Open Boat, which rejects the poetry of "ethnic authenticity" in favor of introspective lyrics on a wide range of subject from a diverse group of writers.

Hongo's anthol. also reflects the increasing ethnic diversity of Asian Am. writers during the 1980s and 1990s. While "Asian American literature" in the 1970s consisted largely of the work of Chinese and Japanese Am. writers, changes in Am. immigration policy after 1965 led to new waves of immigration, esp. from South and Southeast Asia. Indian Am. poets Meena Alexander and Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni have gained wide readerships for their autobiographical and historical poems, while Kashmiri Am. writer Agha Shahid Ali became known for his devel. of the ghazal* form in Eng.

While Hongo's anthol. celebrated the consonance of Asian Am. poetry with mainstream lyric styles, another anthol. of the 1990s, Walter K. Lew's Premonitions, emphasized the role of experimental poetry in Asian Am. writing. Lew's 1995 anthol. coincided with increasing critical interest in poets such as John Yau, Myung Mi Kim, and Mei-mei Berssenbrugge. Some, like Yau and Berssenbrugge, had been publishing since the 1970s, but their work had not been widely discussed among Asian Am. readers, in part because of their more ambiguous approach to autobiography. Berssenbrugge's long, discursive lines structure the page in a manner consonant with her engagement with the visual arts, opening up space for philosophically inflected engagements with consciousness and the body. Kim, a Korean immigrant, employs techniques of *collage and fragmentation associated with *Language poetry in poems that grapple with migration, colonialism, and linguistic alienation. The work of Yau, who is also a prolific art critic, has received perhaps the most critical attention in recent years. Yau's poems reflect influences from film, *surrealism, and the *New York school, and in poetic sequences such as "Genghis Chan: Private Eye," he playfully deploys Asian signifiers and stereotypes to create new, hybrid subjectivities.

The catalyst for this new attention to experimental writing was Theresa Hak Kyung Cha's multigenre book Dictée, published in 1982 and rediscovered by Asian Am. critics in the early 1990s. Cha's critiques of conventional historical narratives, her investigations of lang., and her focus on imperialism and exile made her work a centerpiece of Lisa Lowe's paradigm-shifting critical book Immigrant Acts (1996). But experimentalism was not a new devel. in Asian Am. writing. Lew's anthol. which juxtaposes work of the 1970s by Robles, Tanaka, and Luis Syquia with the work of younger writers such as Kim, Tan Lin, and R. Zamora Linmark, suggests that Asian Am. poets have long pursued questions of ethnic identity through explorations of poetic form. Premonitions also signals the expansion of the category of Asian Am. writing to include Asian Canadian poets such as Roy Kiyooka, Fred Wah, and Roy Miki.

There has been relatively little critical work on Asian Am. poetry. Despite poetry's central role in Asian Am. political consciousness, Asian Americanist critics have tended to focus on the historical narratives of immigration and identity formation found in memoirs and novels. The pioneering 1974 Asian Am. anthol. Aiiieeeee! contained no poetry at all, and essays devoted specifically to Asian Am. poetry did not begin to appear until the late 1980s. Like much early Asian Am. lit. crit., these first forays into Asian Am. poetics sought to establish the cultural and aesthetic distinctiveness of this poetry, as in Shirley Geok-lin Lim's 1987 call for an approach to the subject grounded in *ethnopoetics. George Uba describes a shift from the raw, activist poetry of the 1970s to the more polished "post-activist" writing of the 1980s and 1990s but argues that both subvert "Euro-American" poetics. Uba and Sunn Shelley Wong offer useful historical overviews of Asian Am. poetry and crit. in the 2001 Resource Guide to Asian American Literature, focusing on engagements with activism and on contextual reading.

Crit. on Asian Am. poetry has sought to combat the traditional neglect of the topic by emphasizing poetry's ability to challenge and complicate conventional narratives of Asian Am. identity. Juliana Chang's 1995 essay "Reading Asian American Poetry" argues that Asian Am. poetry should be seen as neither personal nor purely social but as a discourse that revises conventional ideas of culture. Essays by poets such as David Mura and Garrett Hongo also highlight the growing diversity of Asian Am. writing. The poetry of Li-Young Lee, which mixes biographical, religious, and erotic themes, has been the subject of numerous articles. More recently, critical attention has focused on experimental writers such as Cha, Yau, and Kim, whose concerns and aesthetics are consonant with current theoretical interests in postcoloniality, hybridity, and diaspora. Brian Kim Stefans's essay "Remote Parsee" proposes such writers as the foundation of an "alternative grammar" for Asian Am. poetry. Dorothy J. Wang suggests that Yau's experimental writing does not reject subjectivity but explores its division and alienation, while Timothy Yu places Yau and other Asian Am. poets in the context of white avant-gardists, such as the Language poets, who have developed their own forms of "ethnicization."

Other critics locate Asian Am. poetry in the context of modernist and Americanist literary studies. Yunte Huang places Asian Am. poetry in a lineage of "transpacific" Am. writing that includes Herman Melville and Henry Adams. Josephine Nock-Hee Park and Steven G. Yao both argue that white Am. poets' engagements with Asia in the 20th c. provide a backdrop for Asian Am. poetry. Yao finds in Ezra Pound's Cathay a template for Chinese subjectivity in Eng., while Park sees in Asian Am. poetry a critical response to the orientalism of poets such as Pound and Gary Snyder.

Asian Am. poets continue to work in a variety of trads., from formalist to postconfessional to experimental to spoken word, while further expanding the ethnic diversity of Asian Am. writing. The visceral diction of Vietnamese Am. poet Linh Dinh juxtaposes horror and humor, and Filipino Am. poet Nick Carbó's fluidly structured poems display a hip facility with Filipino and Am. popular culture. Innovative work has also appeared by Hmong and Laotian Am. poets such as Pos Moua and Bryan Thao Worra; Tibetan Am. poet Tsering Wangmo Dhompa; and mixed-race writers such as Sesshu Foster and Christian Langworthy.

■ Anthologies: Roots, ed. A. Tachiki, E. Wong, and F. Odo (1971); Counterpoint, ed. E. Gee (1976); Breaking Silence, ed. J. Bruchac (1983); The Forbidden Stitch, ed. S. G. Lim and M. Tsutakawa (1989); Chinese American Poetry, ed. L. L. Wang and H. Y. Zhao (1991); The Very Inside, ed. S. Lim-Hing (1994); Returning a Borrowed Tongue, ed. N. Carbó (1995); Living in America, ed. R. Rustomji-Kerns (1995); Contours of the Heart, ed. S. Maira and R. Srikanth (1996); Making More Waves, ed. E. H. Kim, L. V. Villanueva, and Asian Women United of California (1997); Black Lightning, ed. E. Tabios (1998); Watermark, ed. B. Tran, M. T. D. Truong, and L. T. Khoi (1998); The NuyorAsian Anthology, ed. B. A. Realuyo (1999); Take Out, ed. Q. Bao and H. Yanagihara (2000); Tilting the Continent, ed. S. G. Lim and C. L. Chua (2000); Bold Words, ed. R. Srikanth and E. Y. Iwanaga (2001); Bamboo among the Oaks, ed. M. N. Moua (2002); Screaming Monkeys, ed. M. E. Galang (2003); Asian American Poetry: The Next Generation, ed. V. Chang (2004).

■ Criticism and History: S. G. Lim, "Reconstructing Asian-American Poetry," MELUS 14 (1987); G. Uba, "Versions of Identity in Post-Activist Asian American Poetry," Reading the Literatures of Asian America, ed. S. G. Lim and A. Ling (1992); Reviewing Asian America, ed. W. L. Ng, S. Chin, J. S. Moy, and G. Y. Okihiro (1995); C. Altieri, "Images of Form vs. Images of Content in Contemporary Asian-American Poetry," Qui Parle 9 (1995); J. Chang, "Reading Asian American Poetry," MELUS 21 (1996); B. K. Stefans, "Remote Parsee," Telling It Slant, ed. M. Wallace and S. Marks (2002); D. J. Wang, "Undercover Asian," Asian American Literature in the International Context, ed. R. G. Davis and S. Ludwig (2002); S. G. Yao, "Toward a Prehistory of Asian American Verse," Representations 99 (2007); Y. Huang, Transpacific Imaginations (2008); J. N. Park, Apparitions of Asia (2008); T. Yu, Race and the Avant-Garde (2009).

T. Yu

ASSAMESE POETRY. Assamese is the lang. of the state of Assam in northeast India. The earliest examples of Assamese poetry are from the 13th c. and are recreations, sometimes trans., of the great Sanskrit epics the Mahābhārata and the Rāmāyaṇa and the Sanskrit myths in the Purāṇas. Assam may have had its own distinctive versions of the Purāṇas. This would explain why Hema Saraswatī's 13th-c. Prahlāda Caritra (The Deeds of Prahlāda) does not conform to any existing Sanskrit text. Other early landmark texts are the 14th-c. Rāmāyaṇa of Mādhava Kandalī and the renderings of the Mahābhārata (by Kavi Ratna Sarasvatī and Rudra Kandalī). These works attest to a lively trad. of poetry inspired by the Sanskrit classics. Assam has a rich trad. of folk poetry, sung at festivals and weddings, which probably existed alongside these early literary compositions.

With the appearance of the great Vaiṣṇava leader Śaṅkaradeva (1449–1569), Assamese poetry came into its own. Śaṅkaradeva endeavored to spread the teachings of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, which recounts the deeds of the god Kṛṣṇa. His literary output was considerable, incl. trans. into Assamese from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, dramas (Aṅkīya Naṭa) on the life of Kṛṣṇa, and short hymns for private and public worship (Kīrtana Ghoṣā and Bargītas). Some of the Bargītas were composed by Śaṅkaradeva's disciple Mādhavadeva (1489–1596). Mādhavadeva also composed devotional and philosophical poems, Nāma ghoṣā, and dramas. His Bhaktiratnāvali is an Assamese trans. of an anthol. of verses from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa compiled by Viṣṇu Pūri (1485).

Roughly contemporary with Śaṅkaradeva, Pītambara Dāsa, Durgāvara, and Manakara composed poetry in a different vein. Drawing on traditional sources, their poetry described the love of the god Śiva for his wife Pārvatī, well known from the Purāṇas, and the marriage of the merchant Lakhindār and Behulā. Durgāvara composed the Gīti Rāmāyaṇa, based on the Assamese Rāmāyaṇa of Mādhava Kandalī. These poets wrote in the style of the oral bardic poetry of Assam, avoiding the ornate figures of speech favored by Sanskrit poets.

The disciples of Śaṅkaradeva continued to compose poems on subjects in the epics and the Purāṇas and to translate these Sanskrit texts into Assamese. Rāma Sarasvatī's 16th-c. Mahābhārata includes independent poems on the slaying of various demons. These Vadha kāvyas are considered a distinctive contribution of Assam to the telling of the Mahābhārata.

The Vaiṣṇava movement of Śaṅkaradeva gave rise to a rich biographical lit., often in verse. Daityāri Ṭhākura wrote a biography of Śaṅkaradeva and Mādhavadeva. Nīlakaṇṭha Dāsa composed a biography of Dāmodaradeva (1488–1598), a direct disciple of Śaṅkaradeva and the first schismatic. Bhadra Cāru's poem deals with the life of Ananta and his struggle with the king Gadādhara Siṃha in the 17th c. As the group split, these texts established the lineages of succession. The biographies of Śaṅkaradeva and his followers were not the only historical texts written in verse. A court astrologer, Sūrya Khaḍi Daivajña, born in the late 18th c., wrote a verse hist. of the kings of Daraṅga.

Well into the 19th c., poets continued to draw on Sanskrit sources. Ramākānta Chaudhuri (1846–89) wrote his Abhimanyuvadha (The Slaying of Abhimanyu, 1875) based on the story in the Mahābhārata. He broke with traditional verse forms and followed the Bengali poet Michael Madhusudan Dutt, whose *blank verse poem on the death of the Rāmāyaṇa villain Rāvaṇa had caused a stir in literary circles in Calcutta. The influence of Bengal on Assamese intellectuals remained strong; and new influences, e.g., from Brit. romantic poetry, were apparent in both Bengal and Assam. The periodical Jonākī, which published the poems of Chandrakumar Agarwala (1867–1938) and Lakshminath Bezbarua (1868–1938), among others, was begun from Calcutta. Jonākī was published for only ten years. It was followed by a period of experimentation with *surrealism, *symbolism, and the thought of Sigmund Freud and Karl Marx. Today, this eclecticism continues; poets from diverse backgrounds continue to seek their inspiration in a variety of sources, in the diverse tribal cultures of Assam, in India's ancient Sanskritic culture, and in poetic movements elsewhere and abroad.

See INDIA, POETRY OF; RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY.

■ Asamiya Sahityar Chaneki or Typical Selections from Assamese Literature, ed. H. Goswami, 3 v. (1924–27); Birinchi Kumar Barua, The History of Assamese Literature (1964); M. Neog, Śaṅkaradeva and His Times (1965); M. Neog, Asamīya Sāhityar Rūparekhā (1981); Medieval Indian Literature: An Anthology, ed. K. Ayyappapaniker, 2d ed. (1997).

P. GRANOFF

ASSONANCE (Lat. assonare, "to sound to" or "to respond to"; Ir. amus). The repetition of a vowel or diphthong in nonrhyming stressed syllables near enough to each other for the echo to be discernible. Examples in Eng. would be back-cast, rose-float, and feat-seek, or the echoes of diphthongs such as fine-bride and proud-cowl. In some verse forms of *Celtic prosody, the patterning of assonance is strictly governed by elaborate rules; in other prosodies, it may be an occasional *ornament (see, e.g., Gluck or Mariaselvam on assonance in Heb. verse). Between these two extremes fall cases in which assonance substitutes for strict rhyme in a form requiring the latter, as in the case of a poet who ends an Eng. or Shakespearean *sonnet with a *couplet pairing end words that assonate. In a trad. stemming from OF and Old Sp., and until the 20th c. with its more varied versification, assonance served the same function as rhyme, i.e., formalized closures to lines in the poems of most Romance langs. The OF Chanson de Roland (early 12th c.) attempts in each laisse* to have not only the same vowel in the final stressed syllable of each line but the same vowel in the following weak syllable, if there is one. A similar system prevailed in Sp. and Port., as can be seen not only in the great epic Os Lusíadas (The Lusiads, 1572) by Luís de Camões but also in his lyrics, sonnets, and pastorals. Waley has argued that, because most Chinese syllables end in a vowel or nasal sound, "rhyme" in Chinese poetry is actually assonance, but Liu differentiates assonance from Chinese rhyming compounds, which do require identical final consonants, if there are any. Distinctions between assonance and rhyme are complicated because, as a full taxonomy of rhyme suggests (see RHYME), assonance, like *alliteration and *consonance, falls into the category of sound pairings to which many would assign the larger heading rhyme; that vowel rhyme or vocalic rhyme often appears as a synonym for assonance suggests that the latter is a subset of rhyme. But the hist. of the word assonance in Eng. suggests that it has served some as the more comprehensive term. According to the OED, the word assonance first appeared in Eng. in 1727 and meant "resemblance or correspondence of sound between two words or syllables." This definition, which does not limit assonance to "the recurrence of syllable-forming vowels" (Gasparov's formulation; see definition 2 in the OED), would make assonance the basis not only of all rhyme but of all *prosody.

Along with the complex end echoes in OF, Old Sp., and Port., Romance poets have employed much internal assonance, partly perhaps because their langs., like Lat., are so rich in vowels. Almost any Lat. or Gr. poet can be shown to have loved vowel play (Wilkinson, Stanford). John Dryden quotes this line from the Aeneid to demonstrate Virgil's "musical ear"—"Quo fata trahunt retrahuntque, sequamur"—which stresses a four times against a background of three unstressed u sounds. In mod. times, internal assonance is as marked an acoustic device of the *alexandrine as of later Fr. poetry, as in Phèdre, which has a number of lines with assonance of three syllables, this one (1.3.9) with four—"Tout m'afflige et me nuit et conspire a me nuire." Paul Verlaine with his belief in "musique avant toute chose" is often credited with inspiring poets of his day to employ sonorous sounds; assonance was most important in his own versification.

Far less a subject of traditional interest than alliteration but more noticed than consonance, assonance has often been thought a lesser substitute for rhyme. It is true that the Germanic langs. had an early hist. of alliterative poetries—e.g., Beowulf—and continue to employ alliteration, often heavily. True, too, the Celtic langs., notably Welsh, developed schemes of sound correspondence, esp. cynghanedd*, that have complex alliterative patterns. But it is equally true that in nearly all langs., incl. Ir. and Welsh, poets have continually employed assonance internally if not as a substitute for end rhyme. The term assonance was borrowed by Eng. from Sp. and Fr. to describe the various vocalic substitutes for rhyme in the Romance poetries. But end assonance is only a small part of the total phenomenon called assonance.

Since vowels and diphthongs change their pronunciation, sometimes radically, over time and from region to region, while consonants change relatively little, a reader needs to know how the vowels were pronounced by the poet being read. Mod. readers can still hear the alliterations of Germanic poetries, e.g., but they may no longer hear what were originally instances of assonance. In Eng., because the "great vowel shift" was largely completed by Shakespeare's time, the verse of Chaucer and other ME poets sounds different from that of later times. Furthermore, a number of vowels continued to change pronunciation after Shakespeare's day; by the 18th c., Eng. poets were still naturally rhyming Devil-civil, stem-stream, pull-dull-fool, feast-rest, tea-obey, and join-fine (Hanson).

Ger. poets seem to have found assonance even more appealing than alliteration, from Clemens Brentano, who has whole poems with a polysyllabic assonance in nearly every line, to J. W. Goethe, Heinrich Heine, and mod. poets. Goethe, in his lyrics and plays, has more assonance than other phonic echoes, as in Faust's contract with Mephistopheles, which in its last three lines has a six-syllable assonance of aI as well as other echoes: "Dann bist du d*ei*nes Dienstes fr*ei*, / Die Ühr mag stehn, der Z*ei*ger fallen, / Es s*ei* die Z*ei*t fur mich vorb*ei*!" And R. M. Rilke, one of the most sonorous of poets, opens "Wendung" with "L*a*nge err*a*ng ers im *A*nschauen."

Rus. poets, too, have employed assonance consistently, esp. Fyodor Tiutchev, Boris Pasternak, Alexander Blok, and Valery Bryusov, the latter two frequently substituting it for end rhyme (Plank, Donchin, Ginzburg).

Finally, the notion that assonance is no longer used for end rhyme must be dispelled. Blok replaced rhyme with assonance in whole series of poems, as did Rilke; Verlaine used assonance instead of rhyme perhaps half the time, and poets such as Dylan Thomas in Britain and Randall Jarrell and Hart Crane in the U.S. have often made such a substitution. It should also be pointed out that poets other than Sp. and It. have dabbled with polysyllabic assonance, the echoes coming only in the weak final syllables. But in Eng. such echoes are rare, difficult, and relatively ineffective. In fact, just as computers would be of little help in finding assonance, any reader should hesitate before including obviously weak syllables in a study of vowel repetitions.

■ A Hundred and Seventy Chinese Poems, trans. A. Waley (1919); R. E. Deutsch, The Pattern of Sound in Lucretius (1939); W. B. Stanford, Aeschylus in His Style (1942); G. Donchin, The Influence of French Symbolism on Russian Poetry (1958); N. I. Hérescu, La poésie latine (1960); W. Kayser, Geschichte des deutschen Verses (1960); P. Delbouille, Poésie et sonorités, 2 v. (1961, 1984); J.J.Y. Liu, The Art of Chinese Poetry (1962); W. B. Stanford, The Sound of Greek (1967); D. L. Plank, Pasternak's Lyric (1966); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); J. Gluck, "Assonance in Ancient Hebrew Poetry," De Fructu oris sui, ed. I. H. Eybers et al. (1971); Wimsatt; P. G. Adams, Graces of Harmony: Alliteration, Assonance, and Consonance in Eighteenth-Century Britsh Poetry (1977); R. P. Newton, Vowel Undersong (1981); Brogan, esp. items C129–30, C150, C152–53, K2, K116, L233, L322, L406, L518; A. Mariaselvam, The Song of Songs and Ancient Tamil Love Poems (1988); Gasparov; K. Hanson, "Vowel Variation in English Rhyme," Studies in the History of the English Language, ed. D. Minkova and R. Stockwell (2002); E. Ginzburg, "The Structural Role of Assonance in Poetic Form," Poetics, Self, Place, ed. C. O'Neil, N. Boudreau, and S. Krive (2007).

P. G. Adams; S. Cushman

ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, POETRY OF

I. Introduction
II. Narrative Poetry
III. Religious Poetry
IV. Didactic Poetry

I. Introduction. Assyrian and Babylonian were the two main dialects of Akkadian, a Semitic lang. Of these, Babylonian and not Assyrian was used for most of the poetry. The earliest surviving poetic texts, preserved on clay tablets written in cuneiform script, date from the end of the third millennium BCE. A very creative period followed in the Old Babylonian period, from ca. 1800 BCE onward. Around and after 1200, again much new poetry was composed. This material is mostly known from copies collected in royal or temple libraries in Assur, Ninive, Sultantepe, Babylon, Uruk, and Sippar in the first millennium.

Most of the texts are anonymous: as exceptions, the author of the *epic poem Erra and Ishum, Kabti-ilani-Marduk (who claims to have written it from the gods' dictation); the author of the latest version of the Epic of Gilgamesh, Sîn-liqe-unninni; and the poet of the Theodicy, Saggil-kinam-ubbib, are known by name. Other names appearing in tablet colophons are generally those of the copying scribes, not of the poets.

With respect to genre, the corpus may summarily be divided into narrative, religious, and didactic poetry, i.e., into epics, *hymns and prayers, and wisdom literature. Purely secular poetry (e.g., the humorous poems discussed below) seems to have been recorded in writing only rarely; traces of it can be found in *charms to avoid scorpions, to remedy toothache, to quiet a crying baby, and so on. As part of an oral trad., the *motifs and stylistic features of such poems can often be traced over long periods in ever-changing new versions. The texts themselves—often embedded in medical or magical prescriptions—resemble *nursery rhymes and suggest a pattern of folk poetry made up of mostly short lines containing similes and wordplay and often concatenated *repetitions, such as > Anger advances like a wild bull,

> Jumps at me like a dog.
> Like a lion, it is formidable in progress,
> Like a wolf, it is full of fury.

Some verses whose lyricism would suggest secular *love poetry mostly seem on closer reading to concern divine lovers, as in the Old Babylonian poem

> The women's quarter moans, the bedchamber weeps
> Wherein we were wont to celebrate the wedding;
> The courtyard sighs, the loft laments
> Wherein we were wont to do sweet dalliance.

In an Assyrian elegy, a woman who died in childbirth complains:

> I lived with him who was my lover.
> Death came creeping into my bedroom,
> It drove me from my house,
> It tore me from my husband,
> It set my feet into a land of no return.

The most common formal characteristic of Assyro-Babylonian poetry, shared with *Sumerian and most other Semitic poetry, is syntactic *parallelism, as evidenced in the examples above. It is frequently combined with *chiasmus, while *zeugma is rarely tolerated. A special form of *enjambment, combined with chiasmus, is sometimes used to connect lines in a "Janus construction." *Rhyme (more often internal than final), *alliteration, *onomatopoeia, *anaphora, and epistrophe may be used for special effect. *Rhythm is based on stress, with no strict meter (see ACCENTUAL VERSE); a typical line contains four measures, rarely three or five, with a *caesura in the middle. The verse ending is usually *trochaic, and final syllables that would make the last word a *dactyl are often truncated. *Acrostics and telestics in which the respective syllables spell out a name or a pious wish, as well as poems in which each line of a *strophe begins with the same written sign, are also known.

II. Narrative Poetry. Babylonian epics deal with the exploits of gods or mythological beings and are, therefore, often dubbed myths. Many of these are already known from the Old Babylonian period, although their first-millennium recensions are usually more elaborate: the story of the bird Anzû, who stole the Tablet of Destinies from the supreme god Enlil and was defeated by the god Ninurta; the story of the mythical king Etana, who ascended to heaven on the back of an eagle to obtain the herb for childbearing; the story of the sage Atrahasis (Exceedingly Wise), who survived the flood brought about by the gods after they had created humankind; and the Epic of Gilgamesh (see below).

Of a slightly later date are the stories of wise Adapa and of Nergal and Ereshkigal, the latter telling how Nergal came to rule the netherworld together with its queen Ereshkigal. Only first-millennium sources are known for Enuma Elish, the epic of creation in which Marduk defeats the forces of chaos and creates the cosmos out of the body of the primeval monster, thereby being acknowledged as supreme god; Erra and Ishum, which describes the calamities that befell Babylon when the plague god Erra replaced its tutelary god Marduk; and the Descent of Ishtar to the Netherworld.

The 19th-c. discovery of a tablet of the Epic of Gilgamesh with an account of the Flood closely paralleling that in the OT triggered Western interest in this work. It deals with basic human concerns of all times—friendship and the quest for immortality and enduring fame. When Enkidu, a semisavage created by the gods to become Gilgamesh's friend and companion, dies, Gilgamesh realizes the same fate awaits him and so begins the quest that eventually leads to an encounter with the sole survivor of the Flood. There, Gilgamesh almost reaches his goal of achieving eternal life but then loses it again in a moment of inattentiveness. The epic does not end with the death of its hero, however, but as it began, with the description of the ramparts of the city of Uruk, his lasting achievement.

Some narrative poems have historical kings as heroes, e.g., a cycle about Sargon and Naram-Sin, who built the Akkadian empire in the late third millennium. An epic about the Assyrian king Tukulti-Ninurta (1243–1207 BCE) and his victory over the Babylonian king Kashtiliash reflects Assyrian political ideology, though it is actually written in the Babylonian literary dialect. Other poems are couched as autobiographies, with the king narrating his own hist. Here, the lesson to be drawn from events of the past is held up to the future ruler in a sort of envoi* at the end, bringing the genre close to that of *didactic poetry.

III. Religious Poetry. Most Babylonian hymns address gods and goddesses, but some are also in praise of cities. These poems are characterized by an elevated style and a vocabulary of rare terms, indicators of their learned origin and sophisticated audience. They are often divided into strophes that are, however, only inconsistently marked on the tablet. The Hymn to Shamash (the sun god and god of justice) has exactly 200 lines, divided by rulings into 100 *distichs; other hymns of even greater length were addressed to Ishtar, to Marduk, and to Nabu. Some hymns, such as the 200-line "Hymn to Gula," are styled in the first person, the goddess speaking her own praise. A hymnic-epic poem from the Old Babylonian period addressed to Ishtar, the Song of Agushaya, blurs the boundaries of narrative and hymnic poetry.

Like hymns, prayers also address the deity with praise but stress the supplicant's misery and petition. Their poetic virtue lies in their description of mood and feeling. Their plaintive lyricism, in such phrases as "How wet with my tears is my bread!" "Man's sins are more numerous than the hairs on his head," or "What sin have I committed against my god?" reminds us of the *penitential psalms. Prayers are often couched as *incantations and recited during ritual ceremonies to alleviate medical conditions and other misfortunes, while prayers to the gods of divination ask for a favorable answer to the oracle query.

IV. Didactic Poetry. This group mostly comprises philosophical dialogues or monologues questioning the fairness of the fate bestowed by the gods, such as the Theodicy, an acrostic, and the poem of the Righteous Sufferer, with similarities to the biblical book of Job. Animal *fables and *poetic contests in which two rivals—e.g., trees or cereals—extol their own merits and belittle those of their opponent hark back to a well-attested Sumerian genre.

Only relatively few humorous poems are known, and their relationship to didactic poetry remains under discussion. The satirical Dialogue between Master and Servant may belong there, while the Tale of the Poor Man of Nippur, having close affinities with the Tale of the First Larrikin of the 1001 Nights, seems to be purely secular and has perennial appeal. The Tale of the Illiterate Doctor, similarly situated in the Sumerian city of Nippur, draws its humor from the ling. effects of Sumerian interspersed in the Babylonian text.

■ Anthologies: M.-J. Seux, Hymnes et Prières aux Dieux de Babylonie et d'Assyrie (1976); Texte aus der Umwelt des Alten Testament, ed. O. Kaiser, 3 v. and suppl. in 19 fascicles (1982–); S. Dalley, Myths from Mesopotamia (1989); B. Foster, Before the Muses, 3d ed. (2005)—contains all poems listed below, though sometimes with different titles.

■ Editions of Individual Works: Babylonian Wisdom Literature, ed. W. G. Lambert (1960)—Dialogue between Master and Servant, Hymn to Shamash, Righteous Sufferer, and Theodicy; J. Bottéro, "'Le Dialogue Pessimiste' et la Transcendence," Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie 99 (1966), and "Rapports sur les Conférences: Histoire et Philologie," Annuaire: École Pratique des Hautes Études (1966–67)—Theodicy; W. G. Lambert, "The Gula Hymn of Bulluṭsa-rabi," Orientalia n.s. 36 (1967); L. Cagni, L'Epopea di Erra (1969)—Erra and Ishum; W. G. Lambert and A. R. Millard, Atra-ḫasīs: The Babylonian Story of the Flood (1969)—incl. trans.; O. R. Gurney, "The Tale of the Poor Man of Nippur and Its Folktale Parallels," Anatolian Studies 22 (1972); P. Machinist, "The Epic of Tukulti-Ninurta I," diss. Yale Univ. (1978); E. Reiner, Your Thwarts in Pieces, Your Mooring Rope Cut (1985)—Descent of Ishtar to the Netherworld; M. E. Vogelzang, Bin šar dadmē: Edition and Analysis of the Akkadian Anzu Poem (1988); A. George, "Ninurta-Paqidat's Dog Bite, and Notes on Other Comic Tales," Iraq 55 (1993)—Tale of the Illiterate Doctor; B. Groneberg, Lob der Ištar (1997)—Song of Agushaya; J. G. Westenholz, Legends of the Kings of Akkade (1997)—Sargon and Naram-Sin cycle; M. Haul, Das Etana-Epos (2000); G. Pettinato, Nergal ed Ereškigal (2000); S. Izre'el, Adapa and the South Wind (2001); A. George, The Babylonian Gilgamesh Epic, 2 v. (2003); S. Maul, Das Gilgamesch-Epos (2005); P. Talon, The Standard Babylonian Creation Myth (2005)—Enuma Elish.

■ Criticism and History: J. Nougayrol, "L'Épopée Babylonienne," Atti del convegno internazionale sul tema: La poesia epica e la sua formazione (1970); O. R. Gurney (1972)—see above; E. Reiner (1985)—see above; W. Farber, "Magic at the Cradle: Babylonian and Assyrian Lullabies," Anthropos 85 (1990); N. Veldhuis, A Cow of Sin (1991); Mesopotamian Poetic Language: Sumerian and Akkadian, ed. M. Vogelzang (1996); M. L. West, "Akkadian Poetry: Metre and Performance," Iraq 59 (1997); F. d'Agostino, Testi Umoristici Babilonesi e Assiri (2000); N. Wasserman, Style and Form in Old-Babylonian Literary Texts (2003).

E. Reiner; W. Farber

ASYNARTETON (Gr., "disconnected," "disjunct"). A verse composed out of two or more distinct and often dissimilar rhythmical cola, usually in *synapheia but separated from each other by word end and not analyzable as continuous portions of the same rhythm. The genre was invented or first given vogue by Archilochus; and several of the more common examples are linked to his name. Archilochus' asynarteta are always dicola, usually combined with a rhythmically homogeneous line of different length to form a *distich; and their components are, with one exception, identical to the segments normally marked off by recurring word end within the most common stichic meters—*hexameter, *trimeter (full and catalectic), and catalectic *tetrameter (*iambic and *trochaic). The imitations produced by later authors are longer and draw on a more varied repertory of components, and later theoreticians allow for the combination of segments of dissimilar rhythms without intervening word end.

See ARCHILOCHIAN, COLON, DACTYLO-EPITRITE, ELEGIAC DISTICH, EPODE.

■ D. Korzeniewski, "Epodische Dichtung," Griechische Metrik (1968); L. E. Rossi, "Asynarteta from the Archaic to the Alexandrian Poets," Arethusa 9 (1976); B. M. Palumbo Stracca, La teoria antica degli asinarteti (1979); Snell; West, "Strophic metres," sec. IIB; B. Gentili and L. Lomiento, Metrics and Rhythmics: History of Poetic Form in Ancient Greece, trans. E. C. Kopff (2008).

A. T. Cole

ASYNDETON (Gr., "unconnected"). The omission of conjunctions between phrases or clauses; the opposite of *polysyndeton, which is the addition of conjunctions. Omission of conjunctions between words is technically brachylogia—fundamental to all forms of series and *catalogs—but many writers now use asyndeton as the cover term for all types of conjunction deletion. And it is itself, in turn, one species of all the figures of *ellipsis. Asyndeton is used both in rhet. and lit. for the purpose of speed, breathlessness, headlong momentum, and emotional force. Quintilian calls asyndeton dissolutio and the Ger. equivalent is Worthäufung, "word-piling." Heinrich Lausberg divides forms of asyndeton by two principles of division: according to parts of speech (nominal and verbal asyndeton) and according to length of elements (asyndeton between single words, phrases, and clauses). Also, both Malcolm Hebron and Lausberg organize asyndeton (a.) according to relations of the parts: a. additivum (accumulated in list), a. summativum (collective sense of list summarized either at beginning or end), a. disiunctivum (elements are contradictory or paradoxical), a. adversativum (elements are logically antithetical), a. causale (reasons following a proposition), a. explicativum (elements clarify a preceding proposition), a. conclusivum (a series of premises expressed by asyndeton and followed by the logical conclusion). These classifications are neither canonical nor comprehensive. Homer uses it, as does Virgil (e.g., Aeneid 4.594), but the classic examples are Aristotle's "I have done; you have heard me. The facts are before you; I ask for your judgment" (Rhetoric) and Caesar's veni, vidi, vici. Horace and Statius are fond of the device, and their example was followed by many med. Lat. poets. Med. Ger. poets (e.g., Walther von der Vogelweide, Wolfram von Eschenbach) also made much use of asyndeton, but the figure was esp. favored by *baroque poets in Germany (Andreas Gryphius), Spain, and France. In the Latinist John Milton one can find numerous examples as well: "Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Vertues, Powers" (Paradise Lost 5.601); "The first sort by their own suggestion fell, / Self-tempted, self-depraved; man falls, deceived / By the other first: man therefore shall find grace, / The other none" (3.129–32). In Eng., asyndeton has occurred particularly in mod. poetry—in the work of the imagists, e.g., with their cult of brevity (see IMAGISM)—and in W. H. Auden (e.g., "In Memory of W. B. Yeats"), with his fondness for the pithy and loaded phrase.

■ H. Pliester, Die Worthäufung im Barock (1930); Curtius, 285; Group μ; A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982); E. Blettner, "The Role of Asyndeton in Aristotle's Rhetoric," P&R 16 (1983); J. P. Houston, Shakespearean Sentences (1988); Corbett; W. G. Müller, "Emotional Asyndeton in the Literature of Feeling," Anglistentag (1992); Lausberg; M. Hebron, "Seven Types of Asyndeton in Paradise Lost," English 52 (2003).

A. PREMINGER; T.V.F. BROGAN; A. W. HALSALL; D. VERALDI

ATTENTION (Lat. ad-tendere, "to stretch toward"). In 1928, in an introduction to Harry Crosby's book of poetry Chariot of the Sun, D. H. Lawrence suggested that "the essential quality of poetry is that it makes a new effort of attention, and 'discovers' a new world within the known world." The idea of a poetic attention has never become a fully theorized concept in literary theory. Yet Lawrence's association of poetry with attention is by no means without precedent; various notions of attention have been operative in rhet. and poetics since antiquity. Indeed, soliciting and manipulating attention are two of rhet.'s main goals. Figures in rhet. and lit. serve to engage the reader's focus, and we might think of literary form as corresponding to the movement of attention.

In cl. Gr. and Roman rhet., discussions of attention appear mainly in the context of the parts of an oration. Engaging the audience is an element of rhetorical persuasion; therefore, many rhetoricians argue that the attention of the audience should be drawn at the introduction (Gr. prooimion). Yet already Aristotle warns in the Rhetoric against such restrictions: "it is . . . ridiculous to put this kind of thing at the beginning, when every one is listening with most attention. Choose therefore any point in the speech where such an appeal is needed" (bk. 3, ch. 14). In terms of maintaining the attention of the audience, Aristotle perceives a contrast between rhet. and poetic form: "the metrical form destroys the hearer's trust and diverts his attention, making him watch for metrical recurrences" (bk. 3, ch. 8; see FORM). Aristotle also notes, however, that orators may intend to distract their audience: "the appeal to the hearer aims at . . . gaining his serious attention to the case, or even at distracting it—for gaining it [poiein prosektikon] is not always an advantage" (bk. 3, ch. 14; trans. W. R. Roberts). While in cl. rhet. attention is a function of public oratory, in Christianity the sense of oration as prayer (or oratio mentis) contributes to the emergence of a spiritual notion of attention. In this context, there is a rising interest in poetic form as potentially conducive to focusing attention. In Augustine's Confessions, reciting the Psalms appears both as an illustration of the imperfections of human attention and as a way of creating a devotional attention. The Middle Ages and the early mod. period move toward a more methodical focusing of attention, esp. through the practice of meditation. This tendency peaks during the Counter-Reformation with Ignatius Loyola's Spiritual Exercises (1548). Loyola's follower, Francis de Sales, defines meditation as "attentive and reiterated thought" in Traité de l'amour de Dieu (1630). In the 16th and 17th cs., Catholic and Protestant traditions of meditation influence a number of poets who, like Teresa of Ávila and John Donne, use poetic *artifice to produce a devotional modality of attention.

During the Enlightenment, we see two competing models of attention—moral and cognitive. Sermons continue to invoke 1 Cor. 7:35: "attend upon the Lord without distraction," casting attention as virtue, distraction as vice. In the 17th and 18th cs., however, philosophers such as John Locke, David Hume, and Benjamin Franklin begin to disentangle attention from these religious connotations. They move toward secular models of the mind that naturalize distraction, portraying wandering attention as an aspect of everyday life. 18th-c. poets increasingly describe attention as a limited commodity. While, in his essay "An Account of the Greatest English Poets" (1694), Joseph Addison writes of John Milton that "ev'ry verse . . . my whole attention draws," by 1782, William Cowper resignedly declares in "Retirement," such "habits of close attention" have become "more rare." In his poem, "Conversation," Cowper claims this shift has actually inspired original work: "at least we moderns, our attention less, / Beyond the example of our sires digress." Such comments reflect the period's growing fascination with distraction. Denis Diderot's Encyclopédie associates distraction with intellectual vivacity: "distraction originates in an excellent quality of understanding, a facility for allowing ideas to re-awaken one another." By the end of the century, romantics such as Jean-Jacques Rousseau, E.T.A. Hoffmann, and Lord Byron (in Don Juan) celebrate distraction as a catalyst of poetic invention.

At the turn of the 20th c., interest in attention rises again. Psychologists develop new scientific models of attention; however, the historical friction between attention and distraction persists. In 1890, James defines attention as "the taking possession . . . of one of several possible trains of thought." Attention, for him, is a process of selection and, thus, a "focalization" and "concentration of consciousness." Its opposite is the "confused, dazed, scatterbrained state . . . known as distraction." In 1895, Janet instead emphasizes the "negative effects of attention." He suggests excessive focus narrows "the contents of consciousness" and advocates a more fluid notion of attention.

Poets, artists, and literary critics engage in similar conversations about attention. In "Au sujet d'Adonis" (1921), Paul Valéry describes poetry as "writing down one's dreams" with "the utmost effort of attention." *New Criticism's practice of *close reading models an entire interpretative practice around the value of attention. It is no accident the New Critics are drawn to 16th- and 17th-c. poetry; Brooks, for instance, turns to Donne, emphasizing the discipline one gains by the "perpetual activity of attention" evoked by the "rapid flow . . . and playful nature of thoughts and images" in *metaphysical poetry. In contrast, critics such as Benjamin define mod. perception as "reception in a state of distraction." While Benjamin is nostalgic for an age of attention and "aura," he believes distraction may offer an escape from bourgeois absorption. His contemporary, the Hungarian painter and photographer László Moholy-Nagy, adds that being "forced to simultaneously comprehend and participate in" multiple aesthetic stimuli inspires "moments of vital insight." In this spirit, high modernists such as Gertrude Stein (e.g., Tender Buttons) craft a poetics that presents "unfocused" objects from multiple angles simultaneously, modeling an associative yet discontinuous style of thought.

Recent cognitive studies of attention have inspired new interest in the neural dynamics of aesthetic engagement. In Cognitive Poetics, Stockwell defines reading as "a dynamic experience . . . of renewing attention" and analyzes poetry's "stylistic patterns [for] focusing attention within textual space." Understanding the neural processes of attention's role in reading poetry may provide a framework for building new cognitive theories of poetic attention. At the same time, the hist. of the relationship between attention and poetry in non-Western and Western trads. alike remains a field calling for further investigation.

See COGNITIVE POETICS.

■ W. James, The Principles of Psychology (1890); P. Janet, "L'attention," Dictionnaire de physiologie (1895); L. Moholy-Nagy, Painting, Photography, Film (1925); Benjamin; Brooks; L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation (1954); "Attention," Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, doctrine et histoire, ed. M. Viller, F. Cavallera, J. de Guibert (1937–95); "Attentum parere," Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik, ed. G. Ueding (1992–); J. Crary, Suspensions of Perception (1999); F. McCormick, "Attention Deficit Disorder," The English Journal 88 (1999); M. Riley, Attentive Listening (2000); P. Stockwell, Cognitive Poetics (2002); M. Hagner, "Toward a History of Attention in Culture and Science," MLN 188 (2003); N. Dames, The Physiology of the Novel (2007); D. Revell, The Art of Attention (2007); G. Starr, "Poetic Subjects and Grecian Urns: Close Reading and the Tools of Cognitive Science," MP 105 (2007).

N. PHILLIPS; D. MARNO

AUDIENCE. See PERFORMANCE; READER; READER RESPONSE; RHETORIC AND POETRY.

AUREATE DICTION. Marked density of Latinate-derived words. Aureation in the more general sense has been characteristic of high style or epic *diction since the Middle Ages, as is conspicuous in the works of John Milton. Assimilation of Latinate terms as a process is evident in most of the late med. vernaculars, e.g., MGH (where it is called gebluemte Rede) as the natural extension of *macaronic poetry, where Lat. words appear alongside vernacular ones. But in the more restricted and usual sense, aureate diction refers to the characteristically overwrought style of ME and Scottish poetry of the 15th c.—that of William Dunbar, John Lydgate, and Stephen Hawes in England and King James I and Robert Henryson in Scotland—as well as of that of the contemporaneous *Grands Rhétoriqueurs in France. This style is based on coinages from Lat. copious to the point of excess, as in Dunbar's "Haile, sterne superne Haile, in eterne" (Hail, star on high; hail in eternity), which is followed by the native line "In Godis sicht to shine (In God's sight to shine)." The excess has long been derided by literary historians. If today aureate diction seems less offensive, that is partly because many terms have since been absorbed into the lang. and so do not today strike us as aureate. But they were exotic coinages in their day.

See PLAIN STYLE; SCOTLAND, POETRY OF; SCOTTISH CHAUCERIANS OR MAKARS.

■ J. C. Mendenhall, Aureate Terms (1919); P. H. Nichols, "Lydgate's Influence on the Aureate Forms of the Scottish Chaucerians," PMLA 47 (1932); E. Tilgner, Die Aureate Terms bei Lydgate (1936); C. S. Lewis, English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Excluding Drama (1954); J. A. Conley, "Four Studies in Aureate Terms," diss., Stanford (1956); S. Lerer, "The Rhetoric of Fame," Spenser Studies 5 (1985)—on Hawes.

T.V.F. BROGAN

AUSTRALIA, POETRY OF. Oral poetry among indigenous Aboriginal people in Australia is an ancient trad., reaching back as far as 40,000 years or more. It continues to this day, though much diminished as a result of colonization by the Brit., beginning in 1788. There is no one single Aboriginal trad., as there were hundreds of distinct langs., but they shared common features: the poetry was highly ritualistic and embraced a rich variety of song and narrative, incl. myths, legends, mourning poems, war poems, *satires, *anecdotes, and so on. Performances were usually accompanied by music, and some involved dance and even ground drawings and carvings. Early accounts of this material, starting in the 1830s and 1840s, were recorded by ethnologists, but it took another hundred years before the works of R. M. Berndt and T.G.H. Strehlow brought recognition of Aboriginal poetry as a cultural achievement to the wider world. One of the best-known Aboriginal poems is the 13-part "Song Cycle of the Moon-Bone," of the Wonguri-Mandjigai people of Arnhem Land, which opens with ceremonial preparations (in Berndt's trans.):

> The people are making a camp of branches in that country at Arnhem Bay:
> With the forked stick, the rail for the whole camp, the Mandjigai people are making it. . . .

Although there was Aboriginal writing in Eng. from the early colonial period, it was not until the 1960s and 70s that Aboriginal lit. in Eng. began to be widely disseminated. We Are Going (1964) by Oodgeroo Noonuccal (initially known as Kath Walker, 1920–93) was the first poetry collection pub. by an Australian Aborigine, and she was soon followed by Kevin Gilbert (1933–93) and Jack Davis (1917–2000), initiating a new phase of Aboriginal poetry. This recent trad., which has attracted considerable attention, necessarily exhibits a complex relationship to anglophone poetry in Australia generally, simultaneously being a part of it and apart from it. As is the case with other indigenous cultures within postcolonial settler nations (Canada, South Africa, New Zealand, and the U.S., among them), Aboriginal writing is a multilayered and intricate phenomenon, entailing considerations of hist., politics, lang., and identity.

Early colonial poetry also had a strong oral component. Founded as a penal colony, Australia (or New South Wales, as it was called) was populated by convicts who were predominantly poor and urban, with low rates of literacy; subsequently, folk songs, work songs, and ballads flourished alongside the nascent written lit. There are a number of vigorous anonymous ballads from this period (incl. "Van Dieman's Land" and "The Female Transport") and one significant convict poet, Francis MacNamara (or "Frank the Poet," ca. 1810–1861), whose long poem, "A Convict's Tour to Hell" (1839) is a powerful satiric *dream vision in rhyming couplets ("Cook who discovered New South Wales / And he that first invented gaols / Are both tied to a fiery stake / Which stands in yonder boiling lake"). Convict verse marks the beginning of an antiauthoritarian strain in Australian culture. Australia has a strong trad. of balladry, particularly in what became known as "bush ballads," celebrating outback life and heroic deeds, incl. those of renegade bushrangers, or deploring the trials and failures that attend such hard living. Among the most accomplished and best known of these poets are Adam Lindsay Gordon (1833–70), the only Australian poet to be honored in The Poets' Corner at Westminster Abbey; A. B. ("Banjo") Patterson (1864–1941), the ever-popular author of "Waltzing Matilda" (the unofficial national *anthem) and "The Man from Snowy River"; and Henry Lawson (1867–1922), who, in the pages of the popular and nationalistic jour. the Bulletin carried on a famous dispute with Banjo Patterson about the true nature of bush life (Lawson takes a more dour outlook, as in "Up the Country," where the speaker prefers the ease of town life by the coast, "Drinking beer and lemon-squashes, taking baths and cooling down"). It is noteworthy that much of the poetry published in the 19th c. appeared in newspapers and other periodicals, which made poetry—esp. ballads and songs—very much part of a common culture. The high-water mark for these genres was in the 1880s and 1890s, a period of intense nationalism in Australia, prior to federation (1901). But before then, there was already another trad. of "serious" verse that drew on the concerns and forms of Brit., Eur., and even Am. poetry.

The first book of poems published (privately) in Australia was by Barron Field (1786–1846), a magistrate who served in New South Wales for seven years and whose First Fruits of Australian Poetry appeared in 1819. His work is informed by an 18th-c. neoclassical taste, as in his wry poem, "The Kangaroo," whereby the first rhyme with "Australia" is "failure." The next significant book, Thoughts: A Series of Sonnets (1845), is by Charles Harpur (1813–68), an ambitious and major poet whose work inaugurates a late romantic trad., in the lyrical mode of William Wordsworth and P. B. Shelley. (The intervening quarter of a century between Field's and Harpur's books accounts for the sense of a belated romanticism that marked the devel. of Australian poetry.) In addition to loco-descriptive poems, Harpur wrote narratives, political and satirical verse, a tragedy, and several long visionary works. His most anthologized poems are "A Mid-Summer Noon in the Australian Forest" and "The Creek of the Four Graves," both of which render the Australian landscape in a new and vivid manner. Harpur was an important influence on Henry Kendall (1839–82), who extended Harpur's celebration of the landscape in a more lyrical and lush verse. Like Harpur, Kendall was eager to establish himself as a poet in Australia, but conditions were exceedingly hard financially in the new colony. Kendall did gain a reputation at the time, however, and for a long time was considered Australia's finest poet, with accolades given to "Bell-Birds," "Orara," "Beyond Kerguelen," and "To A Mountain."

Other poets of note writing in the latter half of the 19th c. include Ada Cambridge (1844–1926), whose outspokenness about gender issues was daring for the time; Victor J. Daley (1858–1905), often associated with the Celtic revival; and Bernard O'Dowd (1866–1953), a radical progressive who called for a "Poetry Militant" and initiated a correspondence with Walt Whitman. With O'Dowd, we move into the early 20th c., which featured a number of important poets who straddled both centuries. Mary Gilmore (1865–1962), a colorful and legendary figure, probes Aboriginal subjects, the convict heritage (most notably in "Old Botany Bay"), and many social issues, often from quite radical positions. Christopher Brennan (1870–1932), a scholar of classics and philosophy who studied at the University of Berlin and later taught at Sydney University, turned to poetry after encountering the work of Stéphane Mallarmé, with whom he exchanged letters. Brennan wrote in the mode of the Fr. symbolists (see SYMBOLISM), composing dense, hermetic poems, frequently on magian and visionary themes. An impressive figure, he has more in common with a fin de siècle *romanticism than with literary *modernism. XXI Poems: Towards the Source (1897) and Poems (1913), which was conceived of as a livre composé (or an "architectural and premeditated book," in Mallarmé's phrase) are Brennan's major publications. A contemporary of Brennan, and in many ways his opposite, John Shaw Neilson (1872–1942) is an attractive and engaging poet whose poems are frequently set in rural Australia, where he lived and worked for many years in difficult jobs under difficult circumstances. Despite those conditions, Neilson wrote some of the finest and most delicate lyrics of any Australian poet, as evidenced in his Collected Poems of 1934.

Most critics consider Kenneth Slessor (1901–71) the first true modernist in Australian poetry. An early acolyte of the vitalist Norman Lindsay (1879–1969), a bohemian artist whose jour. Vision attracted a number of poets in the 1920s, Slessor gradually made his way toward a more experimental and mod. sensibility. A thoroughly urbanized poet, Slessor developed a hard-edged and imagistic verse that assimilated many of the modernist techniques coming out of Britain and the U.S., though never the most radical modes. Slessor's poetic output was not large, but a handful of his poems ranks among the most highly regarded in Australia, esp. the luminous elegy "Five Bells" and the war poem "Beach Burial" (Slessor was a war correspondent in the 1940s). Two other poets associated with the "Vision School" of Norman Lindsay went on to have significant careers: Robert Fitzgerald (1902–87), a discursive and meditative poet; and Douglas Stewart (1913–85), a prolific writer known for his pastoral poems and for his years as lit. ed. of the Bulletin. John Blight (1913–95) came to prominence as a poet of the Queensland coast, esp. with his "sea sonnets," but later, in the 1970s, changed his style to a more experimental and idiosyncratic one.

During the 1940s, in the midst of the literary ferment brought on by modernism, there was nonetheless considerable resistance to its more extravagant forms. The infamous Ern Malley hoax is the prime example. Two young (and later prominent) poets, James McAuley (1917–76) and Harold Stewart (1916–95), decided to discredit modernist pretensions by creating a fake poet, Ern Malley, whose "absurd" work they sent to the avant-garde jour. Angry Penguins, which then published it to acclaim in 1944. Exposure of the imposture created a sensation in the press, though "Ern Malley" continues to be regarded by many as genuine poetry of a high order of inventiveness. McAuley went on to become a major figure and write expertly crafted verse marked by fierce intelligence and emotional depth. Stewart, also productive, though more disaffected with postwar Australia, finally moved to Japan, where he devoted himself to Shin Buddhism. Like McAuley and Stewart, A. D. Hope (1907–2000) was critical of modernist excesses and quickly became known for his lashing reviews. But Hope's poetry is regarded as one of the high-water marks of Australian lit., esp. overseas. Cultivated and often epicurean, Hope was a traditionalist in verse and an ardent believer in the orphic power of poetry. Not unlike W. H. Auden, he displays a penchant for the middle style of sophisticated discursive verse but can also write with lyrical grace and distinction.

Prior to the founding of Angry Penguins in 1940, another movement began with a more nationalistic purpose: the *Jindyworobaks. Instituted by the poet Rex Ingamells (1913–55), it looked to indigenous Aborigines for inspiration in promoting an original Australian culture, one based on appreciation for the Australian landscape and a belief in its spiritual dimension. The movement was controversial and lasted into the 1950s, attracting a number of artists and writers, most prominently the poet Roland Robinson (1912–92), who frequently incorporates Aboriginal material in his verse. Judith Wright (1915–2000) was also concerned with indigenous issues, though from a different perspective. Known as a fierce environmentalist and a stalwart activist for Aboriginal rights, she writes passionately about Australian landscape and hist. from a deeply personal point of view. A note of despair and bitterness can sound in her work, but it is all the stronger for it. With her inaugural volume of poems, The Moving Image (1946), Wright moved immediately to the forefront of Australian poetry and remains one of its most revered figures. Another prolific poet of *pastoral is David Campbell (1915–79), a war hero, a grazier, and a keen observer of the natural world. While many Australian poets at this time engaged thematically with the landscape, others turned to more metropolitan subjects. In Tasmania, Gwen Harwood (1920–95) created not only a series of fascinating personae in her poetry (Professors Eisenbart and Kröte) but *heteronyms under whose names she published (Walter Lehmann, Francis Geyer, and Miriam Stone, among them). Renown for her tart wit and probing intelligence, Harwood, like Elizabeth Bishop in the U.S., has increasingly become prominent in accounts of 20th-c. poetry in Australia. Vincent Buckley (1925–88), one of Harwood's early supporters, was a leading poet and an influential critic in Melbourne. His spare intellectual style could move rapidly between irony and profound emotion. Chris Wallace-Crabbe (b. 1934), also from Melbourne, quickly established himself as a leading poet of his generation and has gone on to solidify that high regard with a prolific output of verse and crit. His poems are often witty and cognitively adventurous, deploying a demotic Australian that counterpoints the sophistication of his work. More overtly sophisticated is the poetry of Peter Porter (1929–2010), an expatriate who lived in London but who maintained close ties with his homeland. Porter is regarded as a major poet in both the U.K. and Australia and is one of the most cultured and skillful of contemporary poets. Bruce Beaver (1928–2004) was influential in the devel. of more experimental poetry. Francis Webb (1925–73) extended the range of mod. Australian poetry with his intensely charged lang., reminiscent at times of Robert Lowell. Like Lowell, Webb spent time in mental asylums, dying in one at an early age, but not before creating a remarkable oeuvre that continues to influence Australian poets for its ling. facility and dynamic emotional power. Whereas Webb can appear to be a poet's poet for his level of difficulty, Bruce Dawe (b. 1930) is unusual for being a genuinely popular poet, much read in schools and widely admired for his ironic humor and colloquial manner. Another popular writer, though primarily for his fiction, is David Malouf (b. 1934), who has compiled a body of verse distinguished by its inwardness and sensitivity. Other notable poets born before World War II include the highly regarded Rosemary Dobson (b. 1920), important in the devel. of Australian women's poetry, as are Fay Zwicky (b. 1933) and Judith Rodriguez (b. 1936); Thomas Shapcott (b. 1935), who helped usher in new devels. in poetry from overseas; Peter Steele (b. 1939), a polished poet with far-ranging and deep interests; and J. S. Harry (b. 1939), an early experimental poet. By far the best-known Australian poet, nationally and internationally, is Les Murray (b. 1938). Frequently mentioned as a candidate for the Nobel Prize, Murray writes a brilliant vernacular that can be astonishing in its thematic range and ling. inventiveness. Looking back to the Jindyworobaks, Murray has woven rural and Aboriginal material together with more urban and urbane matter, creating a poetry that is at once distinctly Australian and cosmopolitan.

By the later 1960s, Australian poetry was undergoing an upheaval similar to the one in the U.S. occasioned by the "war of the anthologies" that attended Donald Allen's The New American Poetry 1945–1960. In Australia, the self-styled Generation of '68 or the New Australian Poetry championed an aesthetic associated with the *Black Mountain, *New York school, and *San Francisco Renaissance movements. These Australian poets comprise a lively, talented, and disparate group, a number of whom continue to be important for contemp. poetry, incl. Robert Adamson (b. 1943), a key figure in the movement and often labeled a neoromantic; John Tranter (b. 1943), an early postmodernist; Kris Hemensley (b. 1946), owner of Collected Works, an influential poetry bookshop in Melbourne; John A. Scott (b. 1948), who experimented with poetic sequences; Alan Wearne (b. 1948), author of book-length verse narratives that broke new ground; Laurie Duggan (b. 1949), who used *collage techniques to good effect; Jennifer Maiden (b. 1949), one of the few women poets in the movement; and John Forbes (1950–1998), a highly gifted seriocomic poet. Out of all of them, Tranter is most active and best known, esp. for his editorship of the online jour. Jacket. Two poets who demurred polemically from the aesthetics of the New Australian Poetry were Robert Gray (b. 1945) and Geoffrey Lehmann (b. 1940). Gray writes a finely tuned imagistic poetry, redolent of his interest in Zen Buddhism, while Lehmann is more eclectic. Poets of note that Gray and Lehmann championed include Geoff Page (b. 1940), unusual for his formalist verse; Mark O'Connor (b. 1945); Rhyll McMaster (b. 1947); and Alan Gould (b. 1949), also a fine novelist. As the poetry wars of the 1970s and 1980s faded, other "unaligned" poets came to the fore, incl. those born in the 1940s: Jan Owen (b. 1940); Barry Hill (b. 1943), a novelist and nonfiction writer as well; Diane Fahey (b. 1945); Gary Catalano (1947–2002), an art critic; Alex Skovron (b. 1948); Martin Harrison (b. 1949); and Kate Jennings (b. 1949), an early feminist and novelist. These were followed by other prominent poets, incl. Peter Goldsworthy (b. 1951), also an essayist, novelist, and librettist; Stephen Edgar (b. 1951), a writer of unsurpassed technical facility; Dorothy Porter (1954–2008), whose lesbian detective novel in verse, The Monkey's Mask, was a popular sensation; Kevin Hart (b. 1954), a philosopher and theologian, whose rich meditative verse proves haunting and arresting; Peter Rose (b. 1955), a highly cultured and satiric poet; Gig Ryan (b. 1956), a minimalist and feminist; Judith Beveridge (b. 1956), a serene nature poet deeply engaged with Buddhism; Anthony Lawrence (b. 1957), an exuberant storyteller; Sarah Day (b. 1958), a writer of finely wrought lyrics; and Philip Hodgins (1959–1995), whose unflinching exploration of rural life and his own terminal leukemia produced powerful poetry.

As poetry in Australia moves into the 21st c., a sense of capacious pluralism reflects the increasingly multicultural nature of the society. There has been a resurgence of Aboriginal poetry, as seen in Sam Watson (b. 1952), Tony Birch (b. 1957), Lionel Fogarty (b. 1958), Lisa Bellear (1961–2006), and Yvette Holt (b. 1971). Attention to ethnicity has always been a presence in Australia but has become more pronounced since the 1970s. Few, however, would consider themselves "ethnic" writers; indeed, the following poets are seen as mainstream: Dimitris Tsaloumas (b. 1921), Antigone Kefala (b. 1935), Ania Walwicz (1951), Tom Petsinis (b. 1953), Ouyang Yu (b. 1955), Marcella Polain (b. 1958), Dipti Saravanamuttu (b. 1960), and Ali Alizadeh (b. 1976), among others. To a marked degree, poets in Australia remain open to a multitude and plurality of influences. John Kinsella (b. 1963) is an unusually prolific author whose work ranges from the highly experimental (in the *Language poetry manner) to more conventional pastoral and lyrical forms. Kinsella also exemplifies an internationalist impulse that looks beyond national and nationalist borders to embrace a wide variety of poetic modes. The same could be said of John Mateer (b. 1971), of South African heritage, and Alison Croggon (b. 1962), initially from the Transvaal. There has clearly been an efflorescence of poetry in Australia in the last decades, and it is likely to be furthered by such poets as Jordie Albiston (b. 1961), Craig Sherborne (b. 1962), Brendan Ryan (b. 1963), Tracy Ryan (b. 1964), Michael Farrell (b. 1965), Peter Minter (b. 1967), Bronwyn Lea (b. 1969), Lisa Gorton (b. 1972), Judith Bishop (b. 1972), Michael Brennan (b. 1973), and Petra White (b. 1975), all of whom have published to considerable acclaim. In Australia, poetry continues to be one of the continent's most vibrant arts.

■ Anthologies: Songs of Central Australia, ed. T. Strehlow (1971); Three Faces of Love: Traditional Aboriginal Song-Poetry, ed. R. Berndt (1976); Penguin Book of Modern Verse, ed. H. Heseltine (1981); New Oxford Book of Australian Verse, ed. L. Murray (1986); Inside Black Australia, ed. K. Gilbert (1988); Penguin Book of Modern Australian Poetry, ed. J. Tranter and P. Mead (1991); Australian Poetry in the Twentieth Century, ed. R. Gray and G. Lehmann (1991); Penguin Book of Australian Ballads, ed. P. Butterss and E. Webby (1993); Oxford Book of Australian Women's Verse, ed. S. Lever (1995); Australian Verse, ed. J. Leonard (1998); Landbridge, ed. J. Kinsella (1999); Calyx 30, ed. M. Brennan and P. Minter (2000); Penguin Anthology of Australian Poetry, ed. J. Kinsella (2008); Macquarie PEN Anthology of Australian Literature, ed. N. Jose (2009); Puncher & Wattmann Anthology of Australian Poetry, ed. J. Leonard (2009).

■ Criticism and History: J. Wright, Preoccupations in Australian Poetry (1965); Oxford History of Australian Literature, ed. L. Kramer (1981); A. Taylor, Reading Australian Poetry (1987); Penguin New Literary History of Australian Literature, ed. L. Hergenhan (1988); P. Kane, Australian Poetry (1996); Oxford Literary History of Australia, ed. B. Bennet and J. Strauss (1998); Cambridge Companion to Australian Literature, ed. E. Webby (2000); M. Harrison, Who Wants to Create Australia? (2004); P. Mead, Networked Language (2008); A Companion to Australian Literature since 1900, ed. N. Birns and R. McNeer (2007).

P. Kane

AUSTRIA, POETRY OF. Although the langs. of Austrian poetry—Ger. and Germanic dialects—emphasize its closeness to Ger. poetry, the geographical, historical, and political distinctiveness of Austria justify regarding Austrian poetry as a separate entity. This is largely the case throughout the hist. of Austria, whether as duchies, provinces, kingdoms, and empires under the Babenbergs (976–1246) and the Hapsburgs (1278–1918), or as a mod. republic. Nevertheless, it is difficult to speak straightforwardly of an Austrian "national" lit., since from the Middle Ages to the present regional identity has been strong.

Texts of important religious poetry from the early Middle Ages in the Danube valley survive in three ms. collections, the Wiener, Millstätter (or Klagenfurter), and the Vorauer Handschriften (mid-to-late 12th c.). The last of these holds the first surviving poems in Ger. by a woman, Frau Ava or Ava von Melk (ca. 1060–1127), incl. Das Leben Jesu (ca. 1125), which shows considerable sophistication. Mariological works include the Melker Marienlied (ca. 1130) and the Mariensequenz aus St. Lambrecht (Seckau) from the later 12th c. The St. Trudperter Hohenlied (ca. 1160–70), based on the Song of Songs, stems from the Abbey of Admont in Steiermark.

The most celebrated secular work is the MGH Nibelungenlied (ca. 1200), probably by someone at the court of Wolfger von Erlau, bishop of Passau. Another secular strand was represented by the poets of Minnesang*. The Danubian trad. flourished with Der von Kürenberg (fl. mid-12th c.), active in Upper Austria, and Dietmar von Aist (fl. ca. 1160–80), who wrote some of the first love lyrics in Ger. Kürenberg's "Swenne ich stân aleine" is the earliest example of the Frauenlied genre. At the same time, the satirical poet Heinrich von Melk (d. after 1150) wrote protests against love songs and a memento mori, Von des tôdes gehugede. The Minnesänger gradually developed more complex strophic forms and rhyme schemes, and the conventions of the love lyric became modified into the noble form of courtly poetry by poets such as Reinmar the Elder (d. ca. 1205), in whose verses the pain of unrequited love is sublimated into exquisite formal sophistication.

Not until the 13th c. do mss. preserve melodies for Minnesang, but by the time of Oswald von Wolkenstein (ca. 1377–1445), text and setting go hand in hand. He and the Mönch von Salzburg (late 14th c.) wrote for several voices. Many writers of the period had positions at court, incl. Walther von der Vogelweide (ca. 1170–ca. 1230), a Ger. working for Frederick I of Austria in Vienna. The patrons of Frauenlob (Heinrich von Meißen, 1280–1318), a highly original author of the eroticized Marienleich, the Kreuzleich, and the Minneleich, included Wenceslas II of Bohemia. Frauenlob, Walther, Neidhart (ca. 1185–1240), Oswald, and the Styrian Ulrich von Lichtenstein (1198–1275) subvert and redirect the conventions of Minnesang: in his Vrowen dienst (1255), e.g., Ulrich wrote perhaps the first extended autobiographical lyric.

The court of Maximilian I was an important literary center, attracting the humanist poet Conrad Celtis (1459–1508), but literary devels. in the Ren. were curtailed by the wars of the Reformation; the success of the Counter-Reformation in Austria restored the hegemony of the Catholic Church and with it Lat. as the lang. of art and learning. The outstanding Ger.-lang. poet of the late 16th c. was the Ren. humanist Christoph von Schallenberg (1561–97). His Lat. verse is formally sophisticated and religious, while the Ger. lieder are simpler and more worldly. He features in anthols. from the early 17th c., such as the Jaufener Liederbuch; others, such as the Raaber Liederbuch display the influence of Petrarch.

The influence of the It. Ren. continued into the 17th c. Verse *epics such as Die unvergnügte Proserpina (1661) and Der Habspurgische Ottobert (1664) by Wolf Helmhard von Hohberg (1612–88) were inspired by Ludovico Ariosto. Like other Protestant poets, incl. his friend Catharina Regina von Greiffenberg (1633–94), Hohberg was driven into exile in Germany by the Counter-Reformation. Greiffenberg's first work, the virtuosic Geistliche Sonnette (1662), reflects both these political pressures and the psychological tensions of difficult family circumstances and expresses the hope that God will grant in poetry the space for her to unfold personally and spiritually. Catholic writers active in the Austrian lands included the general and statesman Raimundo Graf Montecúccoli (1609–80), author of moving sonnets, as well as members of religious orders, such as the Capuchins Laurentius von Schniflis (1633–1702) and Procopius von Templin (1608–80), whose collection Hertzen-Freud und Seelen-Trost (1659) was published in Passau.

The commonplace that, between Abraham a Sancta Clara (1644–1709) and Ferdinand Raimund (1790–1836) or Franz Grillparzer (1791–1872), there is no major Austrian writer of lasting repute masks interesting devels. in poetry. Under Maria Theresa, it moved from the playfully secular Liederbuch (songbook) style to works with loftier ambitions. Michael Denis (1729–1800) attempted to familiarize Austria with north Ger. writing in his anthol. Sammlung kürzerer Gedichte aus den neuern Dichtern Deutschlands (1762–66), although his own work is more indebted to Jesuit religiosity than to the Ger. Enlightenment. F. G. Klopstock inspired the patriotic odes of Denis's pupil, Lorenz Leopold Haschka (1749–1827), author of the Austrian national *anthem "Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser!" (1797). Haschka befriended the most prominent woman author of the early 19th c., Caroline Pichler (1769–1843), who, with Joseph Franz Ratschky (1757–1810), represented a contrasting epigrammatic, satirical tone in contemp. verse. In a similar vein, Aloys Blumauer (1755–98) wrote a comic *mock epic parodying Virgil, Die Abenteuer des frommen Helden Aeneas (1784–88). Vienna was also the center of a thriving *ballad trad., similarly satirical and often anonymous, although the work of Johann David Hanner (1754–95) stands out for its acute social critique.

While Ger. romantic poetry had its imitators and defenders in Austria, Austria did not imitate Ger. *romanticism. Symptomatic of much early 19th-c. lit. are tones of resignation, Weltschmerz (world-weariness), and self-sacrifice that reflect the lives of many authors. Some, such as Michael Enk von der Burg (1788–1843), committed suicide. The most renowned poet, Hungarian-born Nikolaus Lenau (1802–50), died in an asylum, and his work reflects a Byronic searching for meaning and justice. Nature in his poetry (Gedichte, 1832) carries the burden of the poet's emotions and experiences, and the lyrical voice seems attenuated and isolated. Lenau's political poetry is also significant, although that of his friend Anastasius Grün (1806–76) is more radical, with Spaziergänge eines Wiener Poeten (1831) and Schutt (1835) targeting Metternich's reactionary system and the influence of the church on the state. Similar social awareness characterizes the poetry of the otherwise conservative Ferdinand von Saar (1833–1906). The poetry, prose, and drama of Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach (1830–1916) consistently reflect her concern with the poor and the oppressed, as does her correspondence with Josephine von Knorr (1827–1908). Knorr's poetry of melancholy and transience was widely admired by contemporaries but is little known today.

As Austria turned away from Ger. romanticism, a rich trad. of writing celebrating the unique character of the Austrian regions flourished. Anthols. from all periods reflect this: in 1854, e.g., Salomon Mosenthal (1821–77) collected a representative range in his Museum aus den deutschen Dichtungen österreichischer Lyriker und Epiker. But Mosenthal excluded *dialect poetry, another important vehicle for the expression of regional identity in the 19th c. Collections of Lower Austrian verse were published by Ignaz Franz Castelli (1781–1862) and Johann Gabriel Seidl (1804–75) in 1828 and 1844, respectively. Others include Karl Stelzhamer (1802–74, Upper Austria), author of Lieder in obderenns'scher Volksmundart (1837); Anton von Klesheim (1812–84, Vienna); Peter Rosegger (1843–1918, Styria); and Otto Pflanzl (1865–1943, Salzburg). In the 20th c., the Heimatkunst ("regional art") movement lent further impetus to dialect writing, inspiring Joseph Oberkofler (1889–1962, Tirol), Resl Mayr (1891–1980, Lower Austria), and Josef Weinheber (1892–1945, Vienna).

The melancholy and uncertainty of much 19th-c. Austrian poetry are perpetuated at the turn of the century, influenced by Fr. and Ger. *symbolism, *impressionism, *decadence, and Jugendstil (the Ger. equivalent of the term art nouveau) in lit., and by devels. in psychology. In the 1890s, poetry turned from social crit. to become subjectivized, often to the point of overrefinement, nervousness, and introspection. The group known as Young Vienna cultivated nuances of feeling and subconscious drives in an effort to create a new aesthetic. The precocious Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1874–1929) was the most celebrated: his apparently effortless, expressive verse explores the semimystical power of lang. to convey truth via feeling and atmosphere, the transience of experience, and the fluidity of the boundaries of identity. Before the age of 30, Hofmannsthal ceased writing poetry almost entirely, externalizing the crisis brought about by the intrusion of consciousness between lang. and reality in the so-called Chandos Letter of 1902.

Lesser writers include Felix Dörmann (1870–1928), author of the sensuously solipsistic lyrics of Neurotica (1891) and Sensationen (1892), and Leopold von Andrian (1875–1951), who published delicate, narcissistic verse in Stefan George's Blätter für die Kunst. Tensions between the mannered, impressionistic Gedichte (1893) and the euphoric Eherne Sonette (1915) greeting World War I characterize the contradictory oeuvre of Richard von Schaukal (1874–1942). The Catholic writer Richard von Kralik (1852–1934) rejected subjectivist writing and turned to Germanic myth, med. mystery plays, and puppet theater to regenerate Ger. culture.

Wholly distinct from these Viennese poets, Rainer Maria Rilke (1875–1926) was among the greatest writers of Eur. *modernism. From the contemplative religious lang. of Das Stunden-Buch (1905), via the existential and poetological reflectiveness of the Duineser Elegien (written 1912–22) to the celebratory enthusiasm of Die Sonette an Orpheus (written 1922), his poetry explores themes of death, love, and loss, mastering and imaginatively developing a huge variety of poetic forms. He interrogated the relation between his art and the world around him, moving from the neoromantic and the mystical toward the precise craft of expressing the everyday in poetry and the poet's duty to praise the world. During a period in Paris as Auguste Rodin's secretary, he learned to see and look ("Schauen," "Anschauen"), producing two books of Neue Gedichte (written 1902–8) that combine observation and precision with inwardness to give new definition to the concept of Dinggedicht*.

Austrian *expressionism was less politically engaged than its Ger. counterpart; it was apocalyptic and emotionally charged and formally experimental. Representatives include Oskar Kokoschka (1886–1980), whose Die träumenden Knaben (1908) thematizes art and dream, love and death, the inadequacy of lang. and the attraction of the exotic. His fascination with China was shared by Albert Ehrenstein (1886–1950), who, unlike many Ger. contemporaries, was never caught up by enthusiasm for the war, as Der Mensch schreit (1916) demonstrates. The poetry of Hans Kaltneker (1895–1919) expresses visionary intensity and an unquenchable faith in the redemptive power of love with immense ling. sensitivity. The (nondenominational) gospel of love was also propounded by Prague-born Franz Werfel (1890–1945) in his first collection, Der Weltfreund (1911).

The most influential Austrian expressionist was Georg Trakl (1887–1914), who, like Werfel, served on the front line. Trakl depicts a world of decay, destruction, and death. He uses lang. radically to express the ruptured universe in free rhythms, fractured syntax, and enigmatic metaphors known as Chiffren (ciphers), which establish a relation between the incomparable realms of the referential and the ontological. Guilt and despair are expressed in a sonorous lang. of *alliteration and *assonance that shows the influence of Arthur Rimbaud.

The dual monarchy of Austria-Hungary collapsed in 1918, and the succeeding republic was characterized by economic instability and political polarization. The federal government moved toward "Austro-Fascism" and Austria's annexation by Germany in 1938, while the city of Vienna remained under Social Democrat control until 1934. Contemp. sociopolitical protest was reflected in the writings of the worker-poet Alfons Petzold (1882–1923) and the muted lyricism of Theodor Kramer (1897–1958); Kramer's Wir lagen in Wolhynien im Morast (1931) also reflects with restrained intensity on the war. Jura Soyfer (1912–39), a powerful anti-Nazi poet, was murdered in a concentration camp. By contrast, Josef Weinheber (1892–1945) was highly conservative, claiming for the poet in Adel und Untergang (1934) the salvation of meaning in a meaningless world. His reputation has not recovered from associations with Nazism. He was a master of complex cl. strophic forms and the *sonnet, and some of his more experimental ling. effects are recognized as precursors of postwar writing. Similarly indebted to cl. trad. was the grandiose work of the self-styled poeta doctus Alexander von Lernet-Holenia (1897–1976). He and Erika Mitterer (1906–2000) were also heavily influenced by Rilke. Both Rilke and the cl. trad. were important to Franz Baermann Steiner (1909–52). Forced into exile during World War II, he, like H. G. Adler (1910–88), has only recently been recognized as a major lyric talent.

The political context of Austria after 1945, in which National Socialism was interpreted as a period of occupation, meant that poetry of this period was frequently conservative, focusing on the values of Heimat (homeland or regional identity). Alongside Lernet-Holenia's Germanien (1946) and a posthumous collection by Weinheber (Hier ist das Wort, 1947), this trend was represented variously by the hugely popular Heiteres Herbarium (1950) of Karl Waggerl (1897–1973) and an Österreichische Trilogie (1950) by the patriotic Catholic Rudolf Henz (1897–1987). Catholic spirituality was central also to the work of the reclusive poet Christine Lavant (1915–73), whose passionate lyrics hover between poetry and prayer. Like Lavant, Christina Busta (1915–87) progressed toward a more lapidary style, gradually abandoning strict forms. By 1963, the anthol. Frage und Formel: Gedichte einer jungen österreichischen Generation makes overt the mod. era's ironic treatment of formal rigor and traditional themes and foregrounds a consciousness of the plasticity of poetic lang.

Excessive density, *hermeticism, even a desire for "absolute metaphors" are accusations unjustly leveled at the work of the towering figure in the postwar poetic landscape, Paul Celan (1920–70), whose relationship to Austria was fatally problematized by Ger. as the lang. spoken by the perpetrators of the Holocaust. Linguistically subtle and innovative, morally uncompromising and poetologically reflexive, his works from Mohn und Gedächtnis (1952) to Die Niemandsrose (1963) and Lichtzwang (1970) are grounded in the belief that meaning finds itself only when it finds lang. Celan lived in Paris; his distinguished contemp. Ingeborg Bachmann (1926–73) settled in Italy. Her poetry engages critically with contemp. Austrian society's blindness to the legacy of the Nazi period using a variety of personas. Rooted in the Austrian trad. (like Celan, she drew inspiration from Hofmannsthal), her lang. is rhythmically restless and her imagery a unique blend of vivid tangibility and intense abstraction. Ilse Aichinger (b. 1921) shared Bachmann's critique of contemp. Austria (cf. Verschenkter Rat, 1978).

More politically direct than Celan and Bachmann, Erich Fried (1921–88) was also more formally exploratory; his use of montage and documentary materials paved the way for the explosion of experimental poetry in the 1950s that led to the formation of the Vienna Group around Friedrich Achleitner (b. 1930), Gerhard Rühm (b. 1930), Konrad Bayer (1932–64), and Oswald Wiener (b. 1935), with H. C. Artmann (1921–2000). The group acknowledged the influence of *Dada, Fr. *surrealism, and Ludwig Wittgenstein; and its diverse works, often in dialect or embracing *concrete poetry and multimedia montage, are unified by an interest in games (Spiel) and the attempt to free lang. from the primacy of communication. Other avant-garde poets included Andreas Okopenko (1930–2010), exploiting the power of the grotesque and the experimental; and Ernst Jandl (1925–2000). Jandl's humorous but challenging engagement with the reader earned him popular appeal. From 1960, the liberating effects of the Vienna Group served as a springboard for a broader group of avant-garde writers, the Graz Group, which includes a broad spectrum of contemp. authors with ling. and sociopolitical interests, united by a critical stance toward the status quo in art and society. Its jour., manuskripte, is edited by the poet Alfred Kolleritsch (b. 1931), whose opaque metaphors examine the content and conditions of consciousness. The Viennese poet Jutta Schutting (b. 1937) also operates in the Wittgensteinian trad., using lang. to question itself.

Avant-garde concerns continue in the work of contemp. poets Ferdinand Schmatz (b. 1953) and Raoul Schrott (b. 1964), whose verse exploits a variety of formal and typographical idiosyncrasies. Schrott is a mod.-day poeta doctus, whose erudition is displayed prominently within and alongside the poetry. The Austrian trad. of reflecting on the nature of lang. continues to be articulated by Peter Waterhouse (b. 1956), who brutally forces lang. to cede to a kaleidoscope of perspectives from the empirical world. After an experimental phase, the later works of Friederike Mayröcker (b. 1924) also mark a return to the real world and recognizable human emotion. This repersonalization of the lyric is reflected, too, in the elegiac poetry of Evelyn Schlag (b. 1952). Like Mayröcker and so many of her contemporaries and predecessors, in volumes such as Brauchst du den Schlaf dieser Nacht (2002), Schlag engages in a moving dialogue with the trad. of Austrian poetry.

■ Anthologies: Lyrik aus Deutschösterreich vom Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart, ed. S. Hock (1919); Die Botschaft: Neue Gedichte aus Österreich, ed. E. A. Rheinhardt (1920); Dichtungen in niederösterreichischer Mundart, ed. K. Bacher et al. (1931); Österreichische Lyrik aus neuen Jahrhunderten, ed. W. Stratowa (1948); Dichtung aus Österreich, v. 2, Lyrik, ed. E. Thurnher (1976); Zwischenbilanz: Eine Anthologie österreichischer Gegenwartsliteratur, ed. W. Weiss and S. Schmid (1976); Zeit und Ewigkeit. Tausend Jahre österr. Lyrik, ed. J. Schondorff (1978); Verlassener Horizont: Österreichische Lyrik aus vier Jahrzehnten, ed. H. Huppert and R. Links (1980); Die Wiener Moderne: Literatur, Kunst und Musik zwischen 1890 und 1910, ed. G. Wunberg (1981); Austria in Poetry and History, ed. F. Ungar (1984); Austrian Poetry Today, ed. M. Holton and H. Kuhner (1985); Contemporary Austrian Poetry, ed. B. Bjorklund (1986).

■ Criticism and History: A. Schmidt, Dichtung und Dichter Österreichs im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert, 2 v. (1964); C. Magris, Der habsburgische Mythos in der österreichischen Literatur (1966); Handbook of Austrian Literature, ed. F. Ungar (1973); Kindlers Literaturgeschichte der Gegenwart: Die zeitgenössische Literatur Österreichs, ed. H. Spiel (1976); Die österreichische Literatur: Eine Dokumentation ihrer literarhistorischen Entwicklung, ed. H. Zeman, 4 v. (1979–89); A. Best and H. Wolfschütz, Modern Austrian Writing (1980); Formen der Lyrik in der österreichischen Gegenwartsliteratur, ed. W. Schmidt-Dengler (1981); S. P. Scheichl and G. Stieg, Österreichische Literatur des 20. Jahrhunderts (1986); Geschichte der Literatur in Österreich von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart, ed. H. Zeman, 7 v. (1994–); Literaturgeschichte Österreichs: von den Anfängen im Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart, ed. H. Zeman (1996); A History of Austrian Literature, ed. R. Robertson and K. Kohl (2006); A. Bushell, Poetry in a Provisional State: The Austrian Lyric 1945–1955 (2007).

R. L. Vilain

AUTONOMY. The concept of autonomy is fundamental for poetics because it has been frequently invoked to sustain two claims about works of art—that their foregrounding of internal formal relations affords a distinctive mode of self-consciousness and that the semantic force of these relations cannot be accounted for by the interpretive models we employ in our practical lives.

When we try to apply the term, we find it involving us in tensions basic to any discussion of freedom. Autonomy toggles between accounts stressing the negative—what freedom is from—and the positive—what freedom involves for our quality of being.

Concepts of aesthetic disinterest and logical claims that art is irreducible to any other model of value emerged as early as the mid-18th c. Fully celebratory doctrines of autonomy ultimately came to depend on Immanuel Kant's transcendental ontology because that provided systematic parallels between the aesthetic and the moral domains. In Kant's moral philosophy, practical and prudential judgments are "heteronomous" because they submit the subject to empirical and causal factors providing the terms for decisions. The person chooses for various pragmatic reasons rather than a concern for the identity the choice would establish. Autonomous action, in contrast, treats the will as the synthesis of spontaneity and rationality that makes possible self-legislating activity. Moral behavior need not follow rules or pursue prudential policies but can align the self with rational principles to which one lucidly submits one's subjective interests. One wills to be rational and allows rationality to determine how one might be worthy to be happy. Analogously, aesthetic judgment (or the exercise of taste) also "does not find itself subjected to a heteronomy from empirical laws," because it also legislates in accord with "something that is both in the subject and outside him, something that is neither nature nor freedom" (Critique of Judgment). This sense of combining intuition and judgment joins "the theoretical and practical power . . . into a unity." *Taste, like moral judgment, depends on refusing mere liking and so cannot be treated in terms borrowed from heteronomous thinking. Rather, agents making judgments of taste that honor the autonomy of art do not act out of "mere liking" but offer approval or disapproval. An aesthetic judgment takes place when agents align their empirical subjectivity with reflective desires to claim "the universal agreement of all men." Aesthetic judgment, however, cannot claim to be a deductive science like morality, because then it could not account for pleasure or honor constant innovation. Its universality, therefore, is a matter not of deduction taking the form of duty but of pleasure being directed toward possible identification with a collective response that the judgment projects.

Aesthetic judgment also provides a model of how artists legislate through their concrete processes of presentation. In the Critique of Judgment, Kant envisions the *genius as the maker "who gives the rule to nature." The work of genius is not subject to heteronomy, because there is no pressing desire to achieve something practical by means of the art. Rather, the genius elaborates an intuition into a complex "presentation" (Darstellung) that develops an overall purposiveness aimed primarily at establishing internal resonance for how pieces of the work fit together. Neither artists nor critics can fully appreciate how the work forges a distinctive "aesthetic idea" unless they manage to take a disinterested stance, making it possible to overcome the sheer immediacy of purely subjective states. Disinterest toward the practical world (which is not the same thing as ignorance of it) makes it possible to treat the work not only as a thing but as a presentation characterized by a formal density of active internal relationships. The presentation is not a simple object, because those dense internal relationships make their own demands on how we stand toward the work. Realizing this, Kant thought, enabled us to treat the work as "inexponible" intuition that "occasions much thought" without being the stable object of any one thought." Such stability is the goal of the understanding. But the *imagination of the genius resists predicates that would produce unity for the work by assigning it a purpose subjecting it to the understanding. Instead, the work establishes "a purposiveness without purpose" that offers a self-legislating structure that has to be treated as "an aesthetic idea" capable of assuming transcendental powers similar to moral ideas. As we develop the "free play of imagination" provoked by the work, we can experience our own pleasure as producing a possible law for itself that takes the form of a demand for the agreement of other members of the audience.

Both judge and artist, then, make choices that maintain independence from what society offers as rewards for conforming to its preferred roles. Rather than choose prudentially, the work enables a sense that one simultaneously legislates and develops a manifest justification for that legislation. This model of choice echoes an aristocratic ideal of preferring character to calculation, an ideal that will become central to 19th c. writers. For Kant, however, any identification with a particular class would betray the very autonomy asserted because it would submit to social codes rather than transcendental principles. So Kant transforms the core of aristocratic distinction—the capacity for self-legislation—into the fundamental state of binding oneself to the rationality of moral law or binding oneself to intuitions that become symbols of the moral good—not because they provide moral allegories but because they call on legislative powers combining immediacy with self-transcendence. Other thinkers are not so reluctant to identify autonomy with class distinctions.

Kant's conjunction of the aesthetic and the rational did not survive the prevailing cultural dichotomies between the domains of reason and understanding that it intended to resolve. It did open speculative spaces where others could try strategies recasting art as a domain of self-legislation. Friedrich Schiller, e.g., argued that aesthetic experience not merely symbolized moral judgment but provided the conditions of autonomy by producing the psyche's only reliable experience of its own distinctive powers for a nobility not reducible to the practical understanding. Schiller thought that Kant was reductive in his sense of the mind's highest powers involving subordination to fixed universals, so he allied those highest powers with the capacity of the aesthetic spirit to establish its own expressive forms not subject to the understanding but in harmony with the fluid life of the senses. Such forms free sense impressions from the heteronomous causality we attribute to mere perception by providing glimpses of "pure ideal man within himself" (Letters upon the Aesthetic Education of Man).

By rejecting Kantian logic, Schiller prepared the way for aestheticist versions of autonomy throughout the 19th c. that would increasingly separate art from any claims to be symbolic of moral action or to be of any use to society (see AESTHETICISM). Thus, Théophile Gautier states in the preface to Mademoiselle de Maupin (1825): "There is nothing truly beautiful except what is of no use: everything useful is ugly, for it is the expression of some need, and man's needs are ignoble and disgusting, like his pure infirm nature. The most useful spot in a house is the bathroom." Thus, too, the playwright Auguste Villiers de L'Isle-Adam (Axël's Castle, 1890): "As for living, our servants can do that for us." Autonomy now resides in the power of beauty to separate itself from the useful, thereby also generating a distinction between purely aristocratic self-legislation and servitude to bourgeois customs and habits. In "The Painter of Modern Life," Charles Baudelaire celebrated this distinction through the figure of the dandy who pursues "a personal form of originality within the external limits of social conventions." Also noteworthy are Arthur Schopenhauer's and Stéphane Mallarmé's ascetic versions of aristocratic autonomy. All want is cast as submission to heteronomy, so value must reside in humans turning against desire toward contemplative stances that protect ideals from our appropriative instincts.

The 20th c. was more likely to root autonomy in the object rather than in the genius producing the object. Then, readers could pursue contemplative states that set aside practical desires in order to engage the complexity and the elegance of how works established their own purposiveness. There were many theoretical accounts of various aspects of these autonomous objects—incl. Bell on distinctively aesthetic emotion, Adorno on the tension between "beauty" and "truth," and Jakobson on the internal self-sufficiency of the *poetic function. Probably the most radical claims to autonomy were Piet Mondrian's insistence that only an impersonal abstract art could free Western art from the fear of mortality that haunts any representation of subjective interests. In The Future of the Image, Rancière offers a summary of these views as prelude to his analysis of how most modernist art came to identify with the synthetic image as a complex synthesis of feeling and thinking. Art becomes the cultivation of "the way in which things themselves speak and are silent." The task of poetics, then, is to articulate the concrete achievement of what images could say, supplemented by accounts of what might matter in their evocative silences that tease the imagination into speculating on its own powers.

Postmodern art and theory have focused on the limitations of claims that art has to be granted a mode of existence distinctive from the states in ordinary life where practical interests prevail and heteronymous causes determine behavior. That version of negative freedom seemed little more than a defensive mechanism for idealizing what had already become art's impotence. After all, as Heumakers observes, to claim that art is free from social influence is tantamount to agreeing with G.W.F. Hegel's thesis about the end of art, since it no longer can compete with the work reason can do. More devastating yet were younger thinkers like Peter Berger and Jay Bernstein formed by immersion in *Frankfurt school writing. Bernstein is esp. eloquent in Against Voluptuous Bodies: "Art's autonomy, however, is not the achievement of art's securing for itself a space free from the interference of social or political utility, but a consequence and so an expression of the fragmentation and the reification of modern life. Autonomy is . . . art's expulsion and exclusion from everyday life and the (rationalized and reified) normative ideals, moral and cognitive, governing it."

Such critiques, however, may sell the idea of poetic autonomy short by dwelling only on formulations stressing aestheticist claims to negative freedom and ignoring the conditions of positive agency elaborated in Kant's views of genius and critical response. Can aesthetics do without the distinctions between liking and approving or, for that matter, between art and other modes of engaging experience? At least three modest ways of preserving the positive attributes stressed by autonomy claims could be advanced. The first is essentially historical. One might point out that very few artists and writers with strong claims on us in fact relied on the lang. of autonomy. Rather, they took for granted that art could be different from life in significant ways, and they tried to make those differences into means of giving new articulations to possible states of attention and responsiveness to the world. In the process, modernist artists esp. used that sense of resistance to the categories of the understanding to alter roles traditionally seen as foundational for the arts (see MODERNISM). Rather than pursue distinctive and fixed concepts of author, work, audience, and world, they treated those conceptual elements as mutually dependent and variable. Each work could in principle define how author, work, audience, and world meshed and, in the process, exemplified potential structures of interrelationship. The simplest example is how noniconic abstract art had to identify artist with audience in order to stage an elemental transpersonality and to merge work and world in order to make good on the desire for an art of pure presentation. T. S. Eliot's poetics, too, makes impersonality a linking of author and audience and treats feeling as the fusion of work and world.

Second, works of art could invite a discourse of autonomy without denying social bonds or responsibilities. The desired freedom can simply be from the modes of blindness or repression driven by specific ideological practices central to that society. Denying the authority of certain instruments typically used in worldly struggles for power certainly need not entail denying other concerns for what seem legitimate social interests. Positively, artists and writers can invoke autonomy without depending on Kant's universal categorical imperatives. As Anscombe has shown, one can claim autonomy as an attribute of expressive agency when one can take overt responsibility for one's actions. Establishing this can be difficult in the case of literary texts. But in principle, autonomy is possible whenever there seem overt intentions capable of accounting for how the purposiveness in the text structures the primary internal relations giving the work its distinctive power. Artists like Gustave Flaubert and James Joyce play on this purposiveness to establish tensions between interest in the world and the disinterest that enables one to reflect on that range of interests.

Third, autonomy extends to the act of critical judgment because there is something symbolic of our sense of moral powers in how readers struggle to give reasons for their investments in seeing the text in a particular way. Probably we have to repudiate Kant's insistence that such acts of approval embody a transcendental demand for universal assent. The effort to establish reasons for one's pleasures suffices, in itself, to distinguish reading from a purely heteronomous cultivation of the empirical ego. Such reading offers a person's considered responses as a potential exemplar for achieving a shared mode of interpretation.

See AUTOTELIC.

■ O. Wilde, The Soul of Man under Socialism (1891); C. Bell, Art (1914); J. P. Sartre, What Is Literature?, trans. B. Frechtman (1949); F. W. Schiller, On the Aesthetic Education of Man, trans. R. Snell (1954); I. Kant, Critique of Practical Reason, trans. L. W. Beck (1956); S. Mallarmé, Crisis of Poetry, trans. B. Cook (1956); G.E.M. Anscombe, Intention (1957); R. Jakobson, "Closing Statement: Linguistics and Poetics," Sebeok (1960); C. Baudelaire, "The Painter of Modern Life," trans. P. E. Charvet (1964); A. Schopenhauer, The World as Will and Idea, trans. R. S. Haldane and J. Kemp (1964); B. Croce, Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic, trans. D. Ainslie (1978);

J. Derrida, "The Law of Genre," trans. A. Ronell, Glyph 7 (1980); M. M. Bahktin, The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist (1981)—essays from the 1930s; G. Hermerèn, "The Autonomy of Art," Essays on Aesthetics, ed. J. Fisher (1983); T. Adorno, Aesthetic Theory, trans. C. Lenhardt (1984); P. Bürger, Theory of the Avant-Garde, trans. M. Shaw (1984)—important foreword by J. Schulte-Sasse; Ransom, "Poetry: A Note in Ontology"; L. Haworth, Autonomy (1986); J. Habermas, Autonomy and Solidarity, ed. P. Dews (1986); I. Kant, Critique of Judgment, trans. W. Pluhar (1987); B. Croce, Essays on Literature and Literary Criticism, ed. and trans. M. E. Moss (1990); Aesthetic Autonomy: Problems and Perspectives, ed. B. van Heusden and L. Korthals Altes (2004)—esp. A. Heumakers, "Aesthetic Autonomy and Literary Commitment: A Pattern in Nineteenth-Century Literature"; J. Bernstein, Against Voluptuous Bodies (2006); J. Rancière, The Future of the Image, trans. G. Elliot (2007); C. Altieri, "Why Modernist Claims for Autonomy Matter," Journal of Modern Literature 32 (2009).

C. Altieri

AUTO SACRAMENTAL. Along with the comedia, the auto sacramental was shaped during the second half of the 16th c. as one of the two major art forms of Sp. drama. (The word auto—i.e., acto—had originally been used to refer to any dramatic act or piece but came to refer primarily to a religious play.) The first influential collection of religious autos was that of Diego Sánchez de Badajoz, published posthumously in 1554; in them, he drew on med. antecedents and was able to present theological problems in a dramatic way, using prefiguration and *allegory. The most important playwrights to develop further the genre in the 16th c. were Juan de Timoneda, Félix Lope de Vega, and José de Valdevieso. But the auto sacramental received its definitive form in the 17th c. at the hands of Pedro Calderón de la Barca.

The Calderonian auto sacramental was a paraliturgical, allegorical, one-act play written to celebrate the Eucharist; usually financed by a municipality, it was performed on carts and a special stage constructed in a public square during the feast of Corpus Christi. (In Madrid, from 1649 on, Calderón was the only poet officially commissioned to write autos.) Allegory was used to give concrete literary form to the abstract theological mysteries of Christianity, consisting essentially of the Fall and redemption of humanity; original sin leads to the incarnation of Christ and his crucifixion, commemorated in the Mass, which sums up the entire sequence. The theme, then, was always the same, but many plots were used to retell it allegorically. These plots were taken from a wide range of sources—pagan mythology, the Bible, saints' lives, hist., secular plays. *Emblem lit. and conceptista metaphors (see CONCEPTISMO) influenced the structure of these ingenious dramatic texts and their theatrical performances, replete with music and elaborate sets. One of the most typical autos is El gran teatro del mundo, based on the *conceit of the theatrum mundi, in which God is the Director of the play of human life, distributing costumes and dividing the performance into three acts (under natural law, until the Flood; under the Heb. OT; and under the NT of Grace, ending with Judgment Day); Grace is the prompter. After the show, the Director invites most of the cast to a Eucharistic banquet, excluding only the Rich Man, who is sent to Hell.

One of the few playwrights to compare with Calderón in theological ingenuity and literary brilliance was the Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, who used both cl. and Aztec mythology for her plots (see MEXICO, POETRY OF). The Calderonian auto sacramental continued to be popular in the Sp. world until, after radical crit. by Fr. neoclassical theorists, it was finally prohibited by the Bourbon government in 1765.

■ M. Bataillon, "Essai d'explication de l'auto sacramental," Bulletin hispanique 42 (1940); A. A. Parker, The Allegorical Drama of Calderón (1943); E. Frutos Cortés, La filosofía de Calderón en sus autos sacramentales (1952); B. W. Wardropper, Introducción al teatro religioso del Siglo de Oro (1953); E. M. Wilson and D. Moir, The Golden Age: Drama 1492–1700 (1971); R. Arias, The Spanish Sacramental Plays (1980); B. E. Kurtz, The Play of Allegory in the Autos Sacramentales of Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1991); M. Greer, "'La vida es sueño—¿o risa'? Calderón Parodies the auto," Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 72 (1995); C. Davis, "Calderón in the Country: Corpus Christi Performances in Towns around Madrid, 1636–60," BHS 77 (2000); J. Slater, "Eucharistic Conjunction: Emblems, Illustrations, and Calderón's Autos," Ekphrasis in the Age of Cervantes, ed. F. de Armas (2005); B. J. Nelson, "From Hieroglyphic to Representational Sign: An Other Point of View in the Auto Sacramental," Hispanic Baroques, ed. N. Spadaccini and L. Martín-Estudillo (2005).

E. L. Rivers

AUTOTELIC (Gr., auto [self] and telos [end, goal]). Something that is perfect, self-creating, having no meaning or purpose outside of itself. In the realm of aesthetics and crit., it conveys an idea, a structure, or a work of art that derives meaning and justifies its existence through its own resources rather than through external factors such as morality, religion, politics, or the economy (see AUTONOMY). Although the concept derives from cl. philosophy, it became important in modernity, particularly with the work of Immanuel Kant who argued that when we contemplate beauty, we seek nothing other than the pleasure of its formal features. Various Eur. and Am. thinkers, among them Friedrich Schiller, Germaine de Staël, S. T. Coleridge, E. A. Poe, and Oscar Wilde, appropriated this idea and characterized art as autonomous, unique, and self-enclosed (see AESTHETICISM). The term autotelic became central to the late 19th-c. movement of art-for-art's sake and to the formalist schools of literary crit. in the 20th c. In the 1980s and 1990s, however, the idea of autotelic art has been put into question by critical schools such as feminism, deconstruction, *new historicism, gay studies, and *postcolonialism, all of which have sought to situate the work of art in its social, cultural, political, and economic contexts.

■ I. Kant, Critique of Judgment (1790); F. Schiller, On the Aesthetic Education of Man (1795); W. Pater, "Conclusion," The Renaissance (1873); T. S. Eliot, "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1917); Brooks; J. Derrida, "Structure, Sign and Play," The Structuralist Controversy, ed. R. Macksey and E. Donato (1972); E. K. Sedgwick, Epistemology of the Closet (1990).

C. P. Shepherdson; G. Jusdanis

AUXESIS. The rhetorical strategy by which members are arranged in ascending order or increasing importance, as in Philip Sidney, "I may, I must, I can, I will, I do" (Astrophil and Stella 47), and William Shakespeare, "Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea, / But sad mortality o'ersways their power . . ." (sonnet 65). Auxesis is the opposite of *meiosis. *Climax concatenates the members, as the last element of each member becomes the first of the next; sorites is the logical sequence of members culminating in a conclusion.

■ Vickers.

T.V.F. Brogan; D. Veraldi

AVANT-GARDE POETICS

I. Introduction
II. Avant-garde versus Modernism
III. Italian and Russian Futurism
IV. Dada
V. Theory

I. Introduction. Avant-garde was originally a military term; it designated the front flank of the army—the "advance guard" that leads the way for the rest of the soldiers. In the arts, the first use of the term avant-garde is usually attributed to the Fr. historian Étienne Pasquier, who wrote in 1596, "A glorious war was then being waged against ignorance, a war whose avant-garde was constituted by [Maurice] Scève, [Théodore] Bèze, and [Jacques] Peletier; or, to put it another way, these men were the avantcoureurs [forerunners] of the other poets." From the first, then, avant-garde referred to the members of a cohort who were ahead of their time, who led the way for the less daring soldiers of the ranks. It was only after the Fr. Revolution that avant-garde began to be formulated as a concept, originally with reference to politics. The first periodical to bear the word in its title was the 1794 antiroyalist jour. L'Avant-garde de l'armée des Pyrenées orientales, whose watchword was "liberty or death." The subsequent use of avant-garde in the literary-artistic context was thus directly derived from the lang. of revolutionary politics. And indeed, in its early utopian phase, the avant-garde was felt to be the arm of political revolution. Although Karl Marx himself did not use the term, the Communist Party was considered the revolutionary avant-garde of the proletariat.

As a movement agitating for political change, the avant-garde was frowned upon by the great Fr. poet of the middle 19th c. Charles Baudelaire, who had contempt for the cult of the new as well as for the avant-garde's subordination of aesthetics to action. By the 1870s, however, the avant-garde had come to designate the small group of advanced writers and artists who transferred the spirit of radical social critique to the domain of artistic forms. Arthur Rimbaud, a great sympathizer of the Paris Commune of 1871, wrote in his famous "Lettre du Voyant" (to Paul Demeny, May 15, 1871) that poetry must be "in advance," providing new ideas and forms. For Rimbaud and other avant-gardists of his time, the artistic and the political went hand in hand: both were simply part of life, which should be lived in an avant-garde manner. Avant-garde thus came to refer to praxis, the life lived contra everything bourgeois and conventional.

But the political/aesthetic equation could hardly be sustained. If the Communist Party was to be the inclusive party of the working class, it could not support the restless experimentalism and the drive to "make it new" that characterized the work of avant-garde writers and artists. The central contradiction between the avant-garde's drive to transform the social order and its aesthetic elitism has haunted the avant-garde well into the 21st c. On the one hand, we have those who dismiss all talk of avant-gardes as elitist, aestheticist, and snobbish; on the other, the avant-garde is justified and defended as the manifestation of whatever countercultural drive still exists to oppose the status quo, whether political or artistic. When, e.g., Merce Cunningham died in 2009, having revolutionized the art of mod. dance for decades, he was referred to, in most obituaries, as the "great avant-garde choreographer of the century," the first to have made a clear separation between the dance movements themselves and the music that accompanies them—in Cunningham's case, the music, most frequently, of his fellow avant-gardist John Cage. It is unlikely that the term avant-garde will disappear any time soon; on the contrary, it remains the key descriptor of the new, the unfamiliar, the daring, and the provocative. Indeed, in public parlance, accordingly, avant-garde means little more than "chic" or "in."

But avant-garde also has a much more specific set of meanings. For literary and art historians as well as critics, the term refers to the so-called historical avant-gardes, a series of radical movements that took place in the first decades of the 20th c., emanating from continental Europe on the eve of World War I. Indeed, the three preeminent avant-gardes—*futurism, in both its It. and Rus. manifestations (in Russia, various terms like cubo-futurism and suprematism were used for what was most commonly referred to simply as "the Rus. avant-garde"), *Dada, and *surrealism—could not have existed without the war. The futurisms favored "war" as a cleansing of a moribund, hierarchical, stratified society; Dada, by contrast, born during the war in neutral Switzerland, reacted strongly against the killing fields by adopting an absurdist or nihilist stance; and surrealism was deeply opposed to war in all its manifestations. The avant-gardes also positioned themselves vis-à-vis technology. Although only the It. futurists exalted the "new" world of factories and motor cars, all the avant-gardes made use of new technologies in their performance art, their innovative *typography, their modes of instant communication, and esp. their obsession with speed—whether of transport, production, or reception.

The avant-garde was an international if not quite global movement though, paradoxically, it originated in two then marginalized countries: Italy (which became a national state only in 1870) and a still-czarist Russia, whose "new" artists and poets flocked to Moscow and Petersburg from the distant provinces of a backward empire. Paris was the capital of the avant-garde, but few avant-gardists were actually natives: consider Guillaume Apollinaire (Polish-It.), Blaise Cendrars (Swiss), and Tristan Tzara (Romanian). In Germany, again a recently unified nation, an aggressive avant-garde was beginning to flourish, the desire to transform the "moribund" arts finding its outlet in such radical works as Kurt Schwitters's verbal/visual/musical *collages and later the Merzbau assemblages (the word Merz coined from merde [shit], plus Kommerz). In Britain, the avant-garde never really took hold: brief eruptions like Wyndham Lewis's *vorticism on the eve of World War I were soon squelched, Eng. poetry, not to mention art, being characterized by its continuity rather than by any appreciable rupture. No doubt, Eng. suspicion of the avant-garde was the natural outcome of its stable political system, its trust in trad. and established conventions as part of its imperialist ethos. But even in postcolonial Britain today, the avant-garde is under suspicion. In the U.S., the same situation obtained at least until World War II, although Marcel Duchamp's presence in the U.S. from 1915 on created a brief spurt of what has been called New York Dada. After the war, esp. thanks to the impact of the Eur. refugees in New York, Los Angeles, and elsewhere, there have been significant "avant-garde" movements like *Black Mountain and *Language poetry.

II. Avant-garde versus Modernism. The relation of the avant-garde to *modernism remains a vexed problem. For early theorists of the avant-garde, the two were opposites: a bourgeois status-quo "high" modernism (associated with particular poets like R. M. Rilke, Paul Valéry, and T. S. Eliot) was regularly distinguished from the countercultural avant-garde movements that challenged its status. But increasingly, as the century wore on, the two were seen to be on the same spectrum. For one thing, some of the most prominent writers of the period—Gertrude Stein, James Joyce, Franz Kafka, later Samuel Beckett—emerged as at least as radical and revolutionary in their art as were the futurist F. T. Marinetti or the Dadaist Tzara. Indeed, as Tom Stoppard demonstrates nicely in his play Travesties (1974), Lenin, Joyce, and Tzara, all living in Zurich in 1916, had wholly conflicting aesthetic agendas. To label Stein "modernist" and Hugo Ball "avant-gardist" thus makes little sense. We can now see that modernism, far from being monolithic, was itself astonishingly varied. Vladimir Mayakovsky, a central figure in the Rus. avant-garde, was certainly a "modernist" in his adherence to lyric forms, his indirection and irony, his predilection for organic unity. At the same time, the modernist/avant-garde spectrum has its extremes: no one would call Robert Frost an avant-gardist or label Mina Loy a mainstream modernist. Indeed, the debate about these isms, as well as about the relation of modernism and avant-garde to *postmodernism remains a heated one.

III. Italian and Russian Futurism. But at least in its origins, the avant-garde was regarded as a definitive rupture. The first notable avant-garde movement was *futurism, inaugurated on February 20, 1909, by the appearance, on the front page of the Paris newspaper Le Figaro, of "The Foundation and Manifesto of Futurism" by the It. poet-polemicist F. T. Marinetti. The "First Futurist Manifesto," as this document came to be called, is remarkable for its insistence that the "new" art (hence, the new life) be entirely different from all that preceded it, for its vituperative, aggressive rhetoric, incl. such notorious clauses as "a roaring car that seems to ride on grapeshot is more beautiful than the Victory of Samothrace," for its troubling declaration that "War is the hygiene of the people," and for its emphasis on the value of movement rather than individual ethos. Marinetti's *manifesto begins with the word "We" and establishes the first-person plural as the pronoun of choice; from then on, the signatories of futurist manifestos were almost always listed in the plural.

The avant-garde impact of It. futurism came predominantly in the nontraditional genres; its poetry and painting were never as innovative as its manifestos, performance pieces, verbal-visual works on paper (parole in libertà), architectural drawings, and musical scores—and its willingness, as a minor lit., to take on the uncontested leadership role of France. Marinetti campaigned for the "destruction of syntax" and for the use of "free words" rather than *"free verse," thus transforming the look (a block of print, usually broken into stanzas) and sound of poetry, eschewing all metrical forms or even an anaphoric free verse à la Walt Whitman (see ANAPHORA). Parole in libertà had a profound influence on such Anglo-Am. poets as Ezra Pound and D. H. Lawrence, even as visual poetics looked ahead to such later avant-garde movements as *concrete poetry, esp. that of the Brazilians Augusto and Haroldo de Campos, and the radical poetics of the Vienna Group of the early 1960s.

Although the word futurism usually designates the It. movement, its Rus. counterpart can now be seen as even more important and influential. From its first manifesto "A Slap in the Face of Public Taste" (1912), signed by David Burliuk, Aleksei Kruchenykh, Vladimir Mayakovsky, and Velimir Khlebnikov, the Rus. avant-garde produced not only superb manifestos, artist's books, and performance works but also—unlike the Italians—a new *lyric poetry and theater. Unlike It. futurism, the Rus. avant-garde included notable women artists—Natalia Goncharova, Liubov Popova, and Olga Rozanova—and poets like Elena Guro and, more peripherally, Anna Akhmatova. And although the Rus. futurists rejected, as did their It. counterpart, the immediate past of *symbolism and *impressionism, they drew heavily on their indigenous artistic trads. such as the icon and woodblocks called lubki. Khlebnikov, who invented, with Kruchenykh, zaum'* (beyond sense) poetry, stands behind all later *sound poetry, from Schwitters's Ursonate to the experiments of Steve McCaffery and Christian Bök. The Rus. Formalist theorist and critic Roman Jakobson considered Khlebnikov to be the greatest 20th-c. poet: the latter's inventions of an etymological poetry, with its puns, coinages, elaborate sound structures, and verbal play, "made new" a world in crisis from the 1905 Rus. Revolution to the Civil War famine of 1921–22, in which Khlebnikov himself met his death. Jakobson also wrote movingly of Mayakovsky's poetry and its avant-garde treatment of byt, that untranslatable noun designating the monotony and boredom of everyday routine.

The Rus. avant-garde belonged to the Left even as It. futurism was to shade into Fascism in the 1920s. The Rus. avant-garde poets were strong advocates of the October Revolution and participated in the agit-prop demonstrations of 1916–17. At the same time, their endorsement of war and violence was not unlike Marinetti's: from 1913 on, they wanted war with Germany and praised battle maneuvers and cannon fire in their poetry and prose. Like the It. architectural visionary Antonio Sant'Elia, who was killed on the It. front at age 28, Khlebnikov advocated a new utopian architecture, where pulleys on top of skyscrapers would take passengers from rooftop to rooftop on monorails providing access and travel for all.

IV. Dada. In poetry, if not wholly in art where *constructivism was a major movement, the Rus. avant-garde was finished by the early 1920s. But in its symbiosis of politics and poetry, its utopian visionary drive, and its inclusiveness of women and poets of all classes, it was perhaps the greatest of the avant-gardes, even though that pride of place is usually accorded to Dada. This movement was born in 1916 in the Cabaret Voltaire in Zurich in rebellion against the horrors of World War I; its founders were two Romanian poets, Tzara and Marcel Janco, an Alsatian poet-sculptor (Hans [Jean] Arp), and two Ger. sound poet-performers, Hugo Ball and Richard Huelsenbeck. The word Dada was baby talk for "yes yes" in Romanian; it means "hobby horse" in Fr. but was mainly coined to sound as nonsensical as possible. Unlike the utopian futurism, Dada was a nihilistic movement that sought to undermine all the conventions, clichés, and ideals of bourgeois lit. and art. Tzara's brilliant manifestos, more individualistic than the futurist proclamations, used complex wordplay, pun, and dislocated syntax, as well as scatological humor and chance operations (like drawing names out of a hat), to create an aura of anarchy and surprise that stands behind a whole trad. of later 20th-c. poetry, musical composition, and art making. But the original Dadas had less than a lifelong commitment to their art: indeed, Hugo Ball soon left the group and entered a monastery, while Huelsenbeck became a psychiatrist. In the 1920s, Dada split off into Ger. and Fr. wings, the Ger. being more political and biting in its largely visual satire, Fr. Dada soon shading into—and being replaced—by surrealism, one of the longest lasting and most complex of the historical avant-garde movements. In its emphasis on the subconscious and dream states, on the demand for a new "reality," and its strong individualism, surrealism is considered by many, incl. this author, to be, despite its extravagant claims and worldwide influence, less rupture than a return to the concern with identity of the romantics and hence a far cry from the early futurist desire to found a mass movement—a nationalistic movement as was the case in Italy and Russia.

V. Theory. To make the proper discriminations among these movements, a theory of the avant-garde is required and such theorizing has now become a growth industry. When Peter Bürger published his influential Theory of the Avant-garde in 1980, there had been only one prior attempt at such full-scale theorizing: Renato Poggioli's 1962 book (Eng. trans. 1968) by the same title as Bürger's. Poggioli's aim is to identify the basic principles that characterize the early avant-gardes in Europe: his examples are drawn primarily from It. futurism. He assumes from the outset that the original avant-garde impulse to fuse aesthetics and politics failed after 1880 or so; therefore, he focuses on aesthetic and structural devels. The Theory of the Avant-garde begins by distinguishing between the "school" and the "movement": schools presuppose a master, a trad., and a principle of authority, whereas movements are "constituted to obtain a positive result." To this end, avant-garde movements are both activist and agonistic: they are, by definition, against the status quo, the prior movement, or the previous generation—hence, the tendency of the avant-garde toward advertisement and propaganda, toward proclamations announcing "the revolution of the word," and the emphasis on youth and the utopian faith in the future.

For Bürger, Poggioli's was much too empiricist a view. His Theory of the Avant-garde is a late product of the *Frankfurt school, countering Theodor Adorno and Walter Benjamin's doctrine of aesthetic autonomy—the view that art occupies a special status, detached from the cultural and political system in which it is made. The agonistic aim of the avant-garde, according to Bürger, was not to negate earlier forms of art but to oppose the very institution of art itself "as an institution that is unassociated with the life praxis of men." "Can one make works which are not works of 'art'?" Duchamp had famously written in his notebooks. To which Bürger responds:

> When Duchamp signs mass-produced objects [a urinal, a bottle drier] . . . and sends them to art exhibits, he negates the category of individual production. The signature is inscribed on an arbitrarily chosen mass product because all claims to individual creativity are to be mocked. Duchamp's provocation not only unmasks the art > market . . . it radically questions the very principle of art in bourgeois society, according to which the individual is considered the creator of the work of art. Duchamp's Readymades are not works of art but manifestations. (51–52)

As such, the provocation cannot be repeated: "If an artist today signs a stove pipe and exhibits it, that artist certainly does not denounce the art market but adapts to it." The avant-garde was thus doomed to fail: the capitalist art market remained intact. The so-called neo-avant-gardes of the later 20th c., Bürger posits, could do no more than to imitate the Duchampian gesture, a gesture now empty and meaningless.

Bürger's theory of avant-garde intervention and its inevitable failure to transform the world was fashionable throughout the cold-war years, and it is still, somewhat surprisingly, the starting point for all theorizing on the avant-garde. But its argument is surely flawed. For one thing, it posits a hard and fast line between something called "modernism" and something called the "avant-garde." More important, it bases its entire theory on the work of an artist who insisted throughout his career that he did not belong to Dada or surrealism, that indeed he found "these movements" very "boring." Today Duchamp is seen to be the very "original genius" Bürger was rejecting; he is, by all accounts, sui generis.

Then, too, Bürger and his many successors tend to ignore the Rus. avant-garde, which, for political and historical reasons remained largely inaccessible before 1989. From Andreas Huyssen and T. J. Clark to Paul Mann and Fredric Jameson, the "avant-garde" has been under suspicion as, at best, a one-time manifestation (from Dada to early surrealism) that failed. Given this conclusion, the so called neo-avant-gardes—from Fluxus, Black Mountain, and the Vienna Group to concrete poetry and lettrisme* and culminating in *Flarf today, are negligible. New movements and groups can publish all the manifestos they like, but their shock value and ability to bring about change is gone.

While no manifesto today is going to "matter" as did Marinetti's of 1909, if we go back to the original definition of avant-garde as "ahead of its time," its staying power is evident. The poet Ron Silliman regularly distinguishes between the two poles of contemp. poetry he calls "post-avant" and "school of quietude." One need not accept these terms to feel that understanding the avant-garde matters. Indeed, given the controversial nature of the avant-garde, it has become, in the 21st c., the very focus of symposia, collections of essays, and monographs. Avant-gardism, it seems, appeals to our continuing belief that, in reconstituting the world of poetry and art, "It must change."

■ H. Richter, Dada Art and Anti-Art, trans. D. Britt (1997); R. Poggioli, The Theory of the Avant-garde, trans. G. Fitzgerald (1968); M. Duchamp, The Essential Writings, ed. M. Sanouillet (1973); Russian Art of the Avant-garde: Theory and Critics 1902–1934, ed. J. Bowlt (1976); M. Calinescu, Five Faces of Modernity, 2d ed. (1987); C. Russell, The Avant-Garde Today (1981); P. Bürger, Theory of the Avant-garde, trans. J. Schulte-Sasse (1984); J. Weissberger, "Le Mot et le Concept d'Avant-Garde," in Les Avant-Gardes Littéraires au XX^e^ Siècle, ed. J. Weisberger, 2 v. (1984), 18–20; A. Huyssen, After the Great Divide (1986); M. Perloff, The Futurist Moment (1986); V. Khlebnikov, Collected Works, ed. C. Douglas, trans. P. Schmidt, 3 v. (1987); Russian Futurism through Its Manifestos, 1912–1928, ed. A. Lawton (1988); M. Ecksteins, Rites of Spring (1989); F. Jameson, Postmodernism (1991); P. Mann, The Theory-Death of the Avant-garde (1991); M. Perloff, Radical Artifice (1992); R. Jakobson, My Futurist Years, trans. S. Rudy (1997); European Avant-garde, ed. D. Scheunemann (2000); R. Sheppard, Modernism-Dada-Postmodernism (2000); T. J. Clark, Farewell to an Idea (2001); M. Perloff, 21st-Century Modernism (2002); M. Perloff, "The Avant-garde Phase of American Modernism," Cambridge Companion to American Modernism, ed. Walter Kalaidjian (2005); M. Perloff, "Avant-garde Tradition and the Individual Talent: The Case of Language Poetry," Revue francaise d'études américaines 103 (2005); D. Scheunemann, Avant-garde/Neo-avant-garde (2005); M. Puchner, Poetry of the Revolution (2006); S. Bru, J. Baetens, B. Hjartarson, et al., Europa! Europa?: The Avant-garde, Modernism, and the Fate of a Continent (2009); Futurism, ed. L. Rainey, C. Poggi, and L. Wittman (2009).

M. Perloff

AZTEC POETRY. See indigenous americas, poetry of the.

B

BACCHIUS, also bacchiac. In *classical prosody, the metrical sequence ⏑ – – , most frequently encountered in Gr. lyric (*monody) and drama as a *clausula to a run of iambs. It may be an instance of *syncopation, i.e., the iambic *metron x – ⏑ – with suppression of the third syllable. Bacchii (with *cretics) are among the most common meters in Plautine cantica (see CANTICUM AND DIVERBIUM), appearing mostly as four-foot units (quaternarii) or in systems. The Romans felt the bacchius to be esp. suitable for a serious or solemn style. The reverse of a bacchius, i.e., a foot composed of two long syllables and one short one, is known as a palimbacchius (Gr. palin, "back") or antibacchius.

■ W. M. Lindsay, Early Latin Verse (1922); G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman Comedy (1952); Koster; Crusius; Dale; Halporn et al.

J. W. HALPORN

BALADA. Occitan dance song with refrain, akin to the dansa but differing from it in having, besides repetition of the full refrain after each stanza, the first line of the refrain repeated after the first and (usually) second line of each stanza. It is a relatively infrequent form.

■ Chambers.

J. H. MARSHALL

BALAGTASAN. Named after the 18th-c. poet Francisco Baltazar (Balagtas), the Balagtasan is the Philippines's primary debate form, distinctive in its exclusive use of verse. It has served as popular entertainment since its origination in 1924 and lives on today in school contests and town festivals. While intentionally devised by a number of poets, its form is inspired by the duplo, an indigenous court drama in verse most often performed at funeral wakes. Traditionally, two poet-debaters compose rhyming and metered passages on opposing sides of a topic, and perform the debate extemporaneously with a moderator. A panel of judges declares the winner. Topics vary widely, from questions of value such as gold versus steel, to domestic issues such as the superiority of a jealous versus a docile husband, to pressing political concerns such as violent versus peaceful revolution during the Am. occupation. On the whole, there is greater emphasis on enduring rather than topical questions. It is more common currently for multiple teams to present scripted debates and for judges to decide a winning team rather than a winner between two competing debaters. Topics continue to reflect Philippine concerns, such as debates between pure and creolized lang. or between traditional and foreign values.

See PHILIPPINES, POETRY OF THE; POETIC CONTESTS.

■ English: C. G. Quan, "Language Play and Rhetorical Structure in the Tagalog Duplo and Balagtasan," diss., Univ. of Texas, Austin (1990); L. Mercado, The Filipino Mind (1994); V. S. Almario, "Art and Politics in the Balagtasan" (2003), http://escholarship.org/uc/item/23b7f9h6.

■ Filipino: V. S. Almario, Balagtasismo versus Modernismo (1984); P. Libiran, Balagtasan: Noon at Ngayon (1985); G. S. Zafra, Balagtasan: Kasaysayan at Antolohiya (1999).

M. RAMIREZ TALUSAN

BALLAD

I. Regional and Linguistic Variation
II. Oral and Written Ballads
III. Scholarship and Influence in Literary History

In scholarly discourse since the 18th c., across the disciplines of lang. and lit., musicology, and folklore, a ballad is a narrative song set to a rounded—i.e., stanzaic—tune or a literary poem modeled on such songs. This stanzaic structure distinguishes the ballad from the sung traditional *epic (a longer narrative set to a chantlike, nonstanzaic tune). Ballads present a series of actions involving protagonists and are thus distinguished from *lyric and other nonnarrative songs or verse. Typically, ballads focus on a single episode where the plot involves a small cast of characters and is directed toward a catastrophe. In all Eur. langs. since the Middle Ages, popular narrative song and *oral poetry have displayed recognizable links and parallels across regions. Moreover, many of the lang. trads. possess cognate forms of particular ballads. With origins in popular idioms, the ballad form represents a collective cultural sensibility, and anonymous popular ballads persist to the present day as folk songs found in diverse variants.

In common parlance, the term ballad has been variously employed from the 16th-c. beginnings of its usage in Eng., when the word appeared in connection with danced songs, and considerable ambiguity can still cloud the term. In the 17th and 18th cs., a ballad meant any popular song, and Samuel Johnson's Dictionary (1755) applies the term vaguely to any "trifling verse." In the context of jazz or popular music today, the term designates any song in a slow tempo with a sentimental text.

Ballads exist in both polite and popular culture as oral-performance works as well as literary ones, across a range of social registers. Literary ballads are items of individually authored verse that imitate the structure and style of popular ballads. The latter are typically created, performed, learned, and disseminated as songs. These anonymous ballads are best understood as a species of oral poetry that has for centuries intersected with, influenced, and been influenced by writing, while still maintaining widespread oral circulation in the traditional channels documented by folklorists.

The interaction of oral forms with written culture has been pervasive, despite scholarly theories that defined the two expressive realms as entirely in contradistinction to each other. The ballad has commanded literary and scholarly interest across Europe and its colonies, especially beginning in the 18th c. when the form drew attention first as a mode for satire and later as part of a fascination with subaltern expression and sensibility during *romanticism. In Eng., the ballad took on renewed importance in 20th-c. modernist poetry (see MODERNISM) and the poetics of *New Criticism.

I. Regional and Linguistic Variation. Ballads are found throughout Europe and in Africa, the Americas, and Australia. Analogous popular narrative songs are found as well in Asia and Oceania. Despite nearly global pervasiveness, regional ballad forms and trads. show as many differences as commonalities. Even among Eur. trads., metrical distinctions are obvious. For example, Eng. and other northern Eur. ballads are stanzaic and set to strophic tunes, the words rendered in *accentual-syllabic verse as quatrains of alternating tetrameter and trimeter lines or, less commonly, as four tetrameter lines (if in accentual verse, as alternating four- and three-stress lines or as four-stress lines, respectively). Many southern and eastern Eur. ballads are, by contrast, stichic with varying verse structures. Sp. ballads, termed romances, are for the most part conceived of as octosyllabic with assonant rhyme in the even-numbered lines. However, to underscore their presumed devel. from the earlier epic, these are sometimes typographically rendered in 12 to 16 syllables in hemistichs linked by rhyme or assonance, as are ballads of Portugal, France, Catalonia, and northern Italy. An octosyllabic line is considered typical of Bulgarian and much Ger. balladry. Romanian ballads, normally in trochaic trimeter or tetrameter, have considerable variation in length as do the Rus. ballads, termed bylina.

In all trads., the shaping function of the music is crucial to understanding the rhythmic textual patterns. Seeming prosodic irregularities seen in print almost inevitably disappear in oral performance. Indeed, ballad prosody should be understood as a recognizable yet elastic mode governed by the predilections for shaping songs within the collective song-making trad. of a region. Scholars of ballad style typically study the structures, formulas, and conventional patterns of regional and lang. forms as distinct entities, e.g., Eng. and Scottish ballads, Sp. romances, and Rus. bylina.

II. Oral and Written Ballads. Popular ballads in Eur. trads. fall into two categories determined by origins, hist., and narrative techniques: (1) the older "traditional" or cl. ballad, usually on a tragic theme, that represents a med. oral poetry reflective of a premod. world; (2) the journalistic or *broadside ballad developed with the advent of popular, commercial printing in urban centers in the late 16th c., often chronicling a newsworthy event such as a sensational crime, natural disaster, military conflict, or love scandal. All Eur. lang. groups with print markets display this division between older, oral ballads and more journalistic ballads shaped by writing and print. However, individual ballads of both types have circulated orally as anonymous songs among singers, and many continue to be learned, sung, and reshaped over time through processes of oral trad. While both types of narratives conform to the ballad genre and relate similar kinds of events, each displays distinct stylistic conventions.

A. Oral-Ballad Traditions and Style. The older "traditional" or cl. ballads from premod. oral trads. have generated greater literary appreciation and imitation than the later broadside ballads, on the one hand because of their mysterious and almost indefinable artistry and on the other because of their med. archaism. These songs concentrate on two or three characters and develop dramatically and economically through dialogue and action. The plot usually begins in medias res with little attention to settings or circumstantial detail. Cl. ballads present stark and formulaic characters, actions, objects, and scenes. Events are shown with brevity, and *dialogue prevails as protagonists speak to each other, usually without ascription. Individual ballads unfold as a series of gapped paratactic images that Hodgart has likened to the cinematic technique of montage, whereby the narrative develops almost as a series of tableaux. Gummere described this plotting of the traditional ballad style as an abrupt "leaping and lingering" from scene to scene, and Vargyas as a poetry of conventionalized gestures.

In the cl. ballads, repetitive verbal patterns and tight, balancing scenes create a tone of striking objectivity. Repetition and formulaic expression, both marks of oral artistry, are key to traditional ballad style. Commonplace descriptors serve as formulas for what characterization occurs and for construction of the narrative. In Eng. ballads, protagonists typically mount "milk-white steeds" and write "braid letters signed with their hands"; maidens are "taken by their lily-white hands"; characters enter a scene asking "what news, what news"; and so on. Redundancy shapes individual ballads and marks as well the shared nature of the patterned idiom from song to song across a lang. trad. *Incremental repetition is a common strategy in ballad narrative technique, whereby a song unfolds in sequences of repeating lines or stanzas that, with each occurrence, introduce a change of word or phrase that furthers the plot. Thus, "Lord Randall," known across various Eur. langs., unfolds as a question-and-answer dialogue between a mother and son in which details added to each stanza disclose the dying son's report of being poisoned by his lover. The repetition and formulaic structure of the disclosure create the understatement, dramatic irony, and suspense characteristic of oral style.

In all lang. trads., the oral origin and style of cl. ballads is thought to predate the writing-based mode of the broadside ballad, though few individual examples of the oral style are reported before the late 16th and 17th cs. Cl. ballads represent a late-med. world and sensibility. They place their characters in a rural world of feudal objects and settings, med. social roles and practices, and premod. beliefs and mores (castles, knights and ladies, hawks and hounds, herbal potions, supernatural visitants, etc.). Thus, in a typical variant, the eponymous protagonist of the Scottish ballad "Tam Lin" escapes thralldom to the underworld by shape-shifting in the arms of his beloved, who embraces him through a magical rescue as he transforms from one archaic state of being to another: "an esk and adder," "a lion bold," "a burning gleed," and finally, "a naked knight." This counterspell frees him from fairy captivity.

The study of such ballads as representative of oral poetry and of a retrospectively imagined med. past began in the 18th c. with commentary by scholars such as Thomas Percy (1729–1811), the Eng. ed. of Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765), and the Ger. writer and philosopher J. G. Herder (1744–1803), both influential in Eur. romanticism. For them, ballads posed a collective mythopoetic inheritance for forging a prized national unity. By the 19th c., scholars of the "traditional" ballad—typified by collectors such as the Scottish Walter Scott (1771–1832) and William Motherwell (1795–1835) or the Danish Svend Grundtvig (1824–83)—garnered versions found in mss. and oral variants that they considered purer and more "ancient" for being free from print and commercial associations. The defining collection and cataloging of some 300 narrative songs of this type in Eng. by the Am. medievalist F. J. Child (1825–96) codified the anglophone trad. of these narratives to the extent that scholars refer to them as "Child ballads."

B. Broadside-Ballad Traditions and Style. Originating with print production for a popular readership, the broadside or journalistic ballad is a song reproduced on a single sheet of paper (a broadside) and sold on urban streets, in bookshops, and at such gathering places as docks and fairs. From the late 16th c., such marketing of ballads remained a fixture of popular culture in Europe and its colonies for several hundred years. Typically, a woodcut print included the text of one or more ballads, several images and decorative borders, and sometimes the title of a recommended tune. Musical notation almost never appeared. By the 18th c., broadside-ballad presses operated in provincial centers in Europe and its colonies. Frequent literary attacks on the vulgarity of the form and the large numbers of ballad prints from the 16th through the 19th cs. that remain in archives to this day attest to the popularity of broadside ballads.

As a product of urban journalism, the narrative style of the broadside ballad discloses a contrasting worldview to that of the orally based cl. ballad. The broadside ballad narrates in a straightforwardly linear and expository manner, with little repetition, and offers a journalistic rendering of each story with specifically named and particularized places, people, and events. A realistic and moralizing narrative voice portrays a world of more mod. institutions and commerce. As an example, the paratextual heading of the London broadside ballad of "The Children in the Wood" (1595) gives details of place and persons as well as the causal outlines of its moralizing plot: "The Norfolk Gentleman, his Will and Testament, and howe he committed the keeping of his children to his own brother whoe delte most wickedly with them, and how god plagued him for it." Not uncommonly, broadside ballads relate first-person stories, identifying precise urban locations, detailed actions, and historical identities. In The Beggar's Daughter of Bednall Green, from another Eng. print, the "blind beggar" narrator sings at his daughter's wedding and at the end reveals his true identity as the heir of the rebel earl of Leicester: "And here, noble lordes, is ended the songe / Of one, that once to your owne ranke did belong." These characteristics contrast to the impersonal, third-person narration of orally rooted traditional ballads. Across Eur. and Eur.-colonized regions, song makers and publishers rendered ballad accounts of historical events. Ballads in Eng. from North America exemplify the journalistic specificities of the style: "The Constitution and the Guerrière," an account of an 1812 U.S. sea victory over an Eng. frigate; "Lost Jimmie Whalen," the lamenting story of the death of a 19th-c. lumberman; and murder ballads such as "Charles Guiteau," which tells of the assassination of Pres. James Garfield in 1881, and "Poor Omie," which recounts the 1808 drowning of a North Carolina girl by her former lover.

Many ballads originating in broadsides continued to circulate in oral trads. Typically recomposed through the strategies of repetition and gapped narrative characteristic of oral recall and preservation, some ballads that originated as printed compositions have continued to be passed on for generations—as is the case with the Am. ballads mentioned. Shortened in the process, such orally reformed ballads focus on the central, most patterned, and most emotionally charged points of the story, taking on characteristics of performative orality (repetition, parallel structure, and formulaic expression) not found in the initial broadside version. Conversely, some ballads of the older oral type—"Barbara Allen" and "Lord Beichan" are examples from the Eng. trad.—were sold in printed broadside versions and were refashioned with more details and plot linearity in keeping with the journalistic mode.

Scholars of the printed street ballad amassed collections of ballad broadsides (single-sheet prints) produced by printers from the 16th c. on, a preservation effort that takes on renewed life today with collections made available online. In the 19th c., antiquarian enthusiasm for both traditional and broadside ballads spurred collections of orally disseminated folk songs from live singers, an effort that peaked in the mid-20th c. and amassed an enormous body of ballads and other songs from Europe and Eur.-influenced cultures.

Significant devels. in ballad style have emerged as a result of regional adaptations. Scholars identify in the U.S. the "blues ballad," a narrative song type influenced by Af. Am. oral performance and composition style. With a focus on murder, death, and tragedy typical of all ballads, the blues ballad renders historical events from a contemp. view as did the printed broadside ballads (see BLUES). However, characteristics of the blues ballad also include the call-and-response techniques of Af. Am. arts, a predilection for antiheroes and -heroines, a prominent influence of orality in the ballad's creation and dissemination, and a voice more poetic and celebratory than reportorial. In contrast to the linear, broadside style, such ballads as "John Henry," "Casey Jones," "The Titanic," "Frankie and Albert" ("Frankie and Johnny"), and "Stagolee" tell their stories with an oblique, gapped, and sometimes radial rendering of the narrative and an improvisatory style characterized by repetition, parallelism, and a stock of commonplace images ("rubber-tire hearses," guns that are "38s" and "44s," girls "dressed in blue" followed by those "dressed in red"). Ballads in this mode typically celebrate their transgressing protagonists, who emerge from a world of crime. The narrative song trads. brought with the Sp. conquest display a similar devel. in the Americas, with narrative corridos emerging, like the blues ballads, from oral trads., even as journalistic corridos in reportorial style were sold on broadsides. In Mexico and the southwestern U.S., corridos from the 20th and early 21st cs. often feature antihero bandidos and stories of narcotics trafficking.

In Germany from the 17th to the 20th c., sellers of the broadside ballad—termed Bänkelsang or Moritat—used elaborate pictorial representations of the typically sensational and sentimental narratives. Conventionally, the Bänkelsanger sang from a platform and displayed scenes from the story on a large poster as passersby purchased the song sheets. Nineteenth-c. authors adapted the form to literary ballads and satire, especially after 1848. In the 20th c., such ballads featured in Ger. cabaret culture; the best-known adaptation is Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill's "Die Moritat von Mackie Messer" from Driegroschenoper (1928), a reworking of the Eng. Beggar's Opera (1728) by John Gay.

III. Scholarship and Influence in Literary History. Early 20th-c. scholarship divided between theories of the origin of popular ballads in individual or in communal creation, eventually reaching consensus that a particular ballad originates with an individual song maker; subsequently, continuing performance across communities recreates the ballad in numerous variants. Scholars applied this model of dynamic creation and re-creation in their study of individual traditional artistry in both the making and the performance of ballads (Porter and Gower). Theoretical concern about the reliability of ethnographic records has spurred attention to documenting occasions, modes, and contexts for song performance; the social function and reception of songs; and the interpretive framings of oral hist. (Ives 1978). Studies of contexts reveal in ballads an index for diachronic analysis of sociopolitical hist. and paradigms of gender, class, socioeconomics, power dynamics, etc. (Dugaw 1989, Symonds). Individual ballads afford sites for synchronically examining particular historical moments and events (Ives 1997, C. Brown, Long-Wilgus). The broadside ballad has received renewed scholarly attention both with analytic studies of prints from different eras and regions (Würzbach, Cheesman) and with the availability of online databases (English Broadside Ballad Archive, Roud). Analyses of textual form attend to the aesthetic effects of ballads and to their formulaic and performative mechanisms as examples of oral artistry (McCarthy, Andersen, Renwick).

The importance of the ballad to Eng.-lang. lit. hist. has received renewed investigation with regard to the 18th-c. literary interest in and emulation of the form and its engendering of a new ethnographic sensibility that gave rise to *ethnopoetics and verse-making beyond the traditional borders of belles lettres (Groom, Newman). Scholars have examined the ballad in connection with the art of particular writers such as John Gay and John Clare (Dugaw 2001, Deacon) as well as the tenets of literary movements such as romanticism (McLane), and in examinations of the historiographical significance of individual ballad scholars (M. E. Brown).

Ballads of every type have influenced lit. in all the lang. trads. E.g., literary poets of early mod. Sp. such as Félix Lope de Vega and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz wrote romances modeled on popular narratives in earlier cancionero* collections (see SONGBOOK). The prevalence of poets who wrote ballad-inflected poems in Eng. mirrors the importance of the form in lits. elsewhere. Political satire of the late 17th and early 18th cs. enlisted the ballad form in miscellanies such as The Covent Garden Drollery and Poems on Affairs of State. Gay's Beggar's Opera introduced ballad opera as a burlesque in which pointed songs set to popular ballad tunes forwarded the mood and action of spoken drama. The decades-long popularity of this and imitative ballad operas reflected and enhanced interest in ballads. Such antiquarian collections as Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry influenced lit. at all levels, shaping the poetics of Eng. and continental romanticism. Wordsworth ("Lucy Gray," "Seven Sisters") and S. T. Coleridge (The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, "The Three Graves") wrote verse imitative of ballads. The Preface to the 2d ed. of the Lyrical Ballads (1800) articulates a theoretical justification for echoing plebeian forms in order to make poetic expression "real lang." without the obfuscations of literary artifice. Ballad-like poems modeled on both oral-traditional and broadside ballads in Britain are among the works of Gay ("Sweet William's Farewell"), Thomas Tickell ("Lucy and Colin"), Robert Burns ("The Five Carlins," "Kellyburn Braes"), William Blake ("Mary," "Long John Brown and Little Mary Bell"), John Keats ("La Belle Dame sans Merci"), Christina Rossetti ("Maude Clare," "Lord Thomas and Fair Margaret"), A. C. Swinburne ("The Bloody Son," "May Janet"), Thomas Hardy ("The Second Night," "No Bell-Ringing"), Oscar Wilde ("The Ballad of Reading Gaol"), and others.

The interplay, through collection and study, between the street, workplace, or fireside realm of ballads and that of belles lettres is evident in British trads. and throughout Europe. Literary writers—John Clare, e.g., himself a fiddler—participated as well in collecting ballads. In Scotland, 18th-c. ballad collecting by Allan Ramsay and Burns was followed in the 19th c. by James Hogg, in addition to Scott and Motherwell. Ger. poetry through the 19th c. was shaped by Achim von Arnim and Clemens Brentano's Des Knaben Wunderhorn (1805–8), a collection prompted by Herder's philosophic championing of popular song.

In the 20th c., the ballad continued as a literary model. In Ireland, modernist writers such as James Joyce, J. M. Synge, and W. B. Yeats identified their work with an Ir. cultural sensibility both ancient and contemp. Yeats collaborated on song and tale collections in Ir. and Eng. with Lady Augusta Gregory and others and also penned ballad-influenced works ("Down by the Salley Gardens," "Moll Magee"). In the U.S., Cleanth Brooks and R. P. Warren formulated a modernist poetics of New Criticism that identified the ballad as a model for an aesthetics of accessibility and collective *voice, echoed in the work of Elizabeth Bishop and others. For Af. Am. modernism and subsequent movements, the blues ballad supplied a model for such poets as Langston Hughes ("Sylvester's Dying Bed," "Ballad of the Landlord") and Gwendolyn Brooks ("of De Witt Williams on his way to Lincoln Cemetery," "The Ballad of Late Annie"). To the present, literary writers from numerous national and ethnic trads. collect and engage ballads in a continuing testimony to the mutually influencing dynamic between literary artistry and the oral and collective realm of popular trads.

■ Descriptive Catalogs and Research Aids: G. M. Laws, American Balladry from British Broadsides (1957), and Native American Balladry (1964); T. P. Coffin, The British Traditional Ballad in North America, 2d ed. (1977); B. R. Jonsson et al., The Types of the Scandinavian Medieval Ballad (1978); D. Catalán et al., Catálogo general del romancero, 3 v. (1984); E. Richmond, Ballad Scholarship (1989); L. Syndergaard, English Translations of the Scandinavian Medieval Ballads (1995).

■ Historical Contexts: A. Paredes, "With His Pistol in His Hand" (1958); D. Dugaw, Warrior Women and Popular Balladry (1989); M. Herrera-Sobek, The Mexican Corrido (1990)—feminist crit.; N. Würzbach, The Rise of the English Street Ballad 1550–1650, trans. G. Walls (1990); E. Ives, The Bonny Earl of Murray (1997); D. Symonds, Weep Not for Me (1997)—ballads in early mod. Scotland; J. McDowell, Poetry and Violence (2000)—Mexico's Costa Chica; C. Brown, Stagolee Shot Billy (2003); E. Long-Wilgus, Naomi Wise (2003).

■ History of Scholarship: D. K. Wilgus, Anglo-American Folksong Scholarship since 1898 (1959); The Anglo-American Ballad, ed. D. Dugaw (1995); N. Groom, The Making of Percy's "Reliques" (1999); M. E. Brown, William Motherwell's Cultural Politics (2001); Singing the Nations: Herder's Legacy, ed. D. Bula and S. Rieuwerts (2008).

■ Literary Contexts: M. R. Katz, The Literary Ballad in Early 19th-Century Russian Literature (1976); D. Dugaw, "Deep Play"—John Gay and the Invention of Modernity (2001); G. Deacon, John Clare and the Folk Tradition (2004); S. Newman, Ballad Collection, Lyric, and the Canon (2007); M. McLane, Balladeering, Minstrelsy, and the Making of British Romantic Poetry (2008).

■ Origins and Style: F. B. Gummere, The Popular Ballad (1907); H. Rollins, "Black-Letter Broadside Ballad," PMLA 35 (1919); W. Entwistle, European Ballad (1939); G. Gerould, The Ballad of Tradition (1939); M.J.C. Hodgart, The Ballads (1962); D. Foster, The Early Spanish Ballad (1971); E. Ives, Joe Scott (1978); O. Holzapfel, Det balladeske: fortællemåden i den ældre episke folkevise (1980); C. Slater, Stories on a String: The Brazilian Literatura de Cordel (1982); F. Andersen, Commonplace and Creativity (1985); D. K. Wilgus and E. Long, "The Blues Ballad and the Genesis of Style," Narrative Folksong, ed. C. Edwards and K. Manley (1985); W. McCarthy, The Ballad Matrix (1990); C. Harvey, Contemporary Irish Traditional Narrative (1992); T. Cheesman, The Shocking Ballad Picture Show (1994); J. Porter and H. Gower, Jeannie Robertson (1995); R. deV. Renwick, Recentering Anglo/American Folksong (2001); D. Atkinson, The English Traditional Ballad (2002); V. Gammon, Desire, Drink and Death in English Folk and Vernacular Song (2008).

■ Ballad and Tune Collections: S. Grundtvig et al., Danmarks gamle folkeviser, 12 v. (1853–76); F. J. Child, The English and Scottish Popular Ballads, 10 v. (1882–98); G. Doncieux and J. Tiersot, Le Romancéro populaire de la France (1904); R. Menéndez Pidal, Poesía popular y poesía tradicional (1922); Deutsche Volkslieder mit ihren Melodien: Balladen, ed. J. Meier et al., 8 v. (1935–88); Traditional Tunes of the Child Ballads, ed. B. Bronson, 4 v. (1959–72); E. Janda and F. Nützhold, Die Moritat vom Bänkelsang oder Lied von der Strasse (1959); H. Fromm, ed., Deutsche Balladen, 4th ed. (1965); C. Simpson, The British Broadside Ballad and Its Music (1966); L. Vargyas, Hungarian Ballads and the European Ballad Tradition, trans. I. Gombos 2 v., (1983); J. Jiménez, Cancionero completo (2002); Ballads on Affairs of State, ed. A. McShane (2009)—17th c. England.

■ Web Sites: English Broadside Ballad Archive, University of California, Santa Barbara: http://emc.english.ucsb.edu/ballad_project/index.asp; Roud Folk Song Index: http://library.efdss.org/cgi-bin/home.cgi; Roud Broadside Index: http://library.efdss.org/cgi-bin/textpage.cgi?file-aboutRoudbroadside&access=off.

D. Dugaw

BALLADE. The most important of the OF formes fixes (fixed forms) and the dominant verse form of OF poetry in the 14th and 15th cs. (Formes fixes are usually three in number: the ballade, the *rondeau, and the *virelai.) The most common type of ballade comprises 28 lines of octosyllables, i.e., three eight-line stanzas rhyming ababbcbC and a four-line *envoi rhyming bcbC. As the capital letter indicates, the last line of the first stanza serves as the *refrain, repeated as the last line of each stanza and the envoi. In the complexity of its *rhyme scheme, restriction of its rhyme sounds, and use of the refrain, the ballade is perhaps the most exacting of the fixed forms. Some variants of the standard ballade employ ten- or (less often) twelve-line stanzas with, respectively, five- and six-line envois. The envoi, which frequently begins with the address "Prince," derived from the med. *poetic contest (puy) at which the presiding judge was so addressed, forms the climatic summation of the poem.

Although the ballade may have developed from an Occitan form, it was standardized in northern Fr. poetry in the 14th c. by Guillaume de Machaut, Eustache Deschamps, and Jean Froissart. It was carried to perfection in the 15th c. by Christine de Pisan, Charles d'Orléans, and, most of all, François Villon, who made the ballade the vehicle for the greatest of early Fr. poetry. Such works as his "Ballade des pendus" and his "Ballade des dames du temps jadis" achieved an unequaled intensity in their use of refrain and envoi. The ballade continued in favor up to the time of Clément Marot (early 16th c.), but the poets of the Pléiade*, followed by their neoclassical successors in the 17th c.—with the exception of Jean de La Fontaine—had little use for the form and regarded it as barbaric. Both Molière and Nicolas Boileau made contemptuous allusions to the ballade.

The ballade of the vintage Fr. period was imitated in England by Chaucer and John Gower, though now in *decasyllables. Chaucer uses it for several of his early complaints and takes the single *octave from it for the *monk's tale stanza. Beyond their practice, it never established itself firmly. In the later 19th c., the so-called Eng. Parnassians (Edmund Gosse, Austin Dobson, Andrew Lang; see PARNASSIANISM) and poets of the 1890s (W. E. Henley, Richard Le Gallienne, Arthur Symons) revived the form with enthusiasm, inspired by the example of Théodore de Banville (Trente-six Ballades joyeuses à la manière de Villon, 1873), who gave a new impetus to the ballade equally among fellow Parnassian and decadent poets in France (François Coppée, Paul Verlaine, Jean Richepin, Maurice Rollinat; see DECADENCE). But the mod. ballade, with the possible exception of a few pieces by A. C. Swinburne and Ezra Pound's Villonesque adaptations ("Villonaud for this Yule" and the freely constructed "A Villonaud: Ballad of the Gibbet"), has not aimed at the grandeur and scope of Villon: it has been essentially a vehicle for *light verse, e.g., G. K. Chesterton, Hillaire Belloc, and, more recently, Wendy Cope.

The double ballade is composed of six eight- or ten-line stanzas; the refrain is maintained, but the envoi is optional (e.g., Villon's "Pour ce, amez tant que vouldrez"; Banville's "Pour les bonnes gens" and "Des sottises de Paris"; Swinburne's "A Double Ballad of August" and "A Double Ballad of Good Counsel"). The "ballade à double refrain," which has Marot's "Frère Lubin" as its model, introduces a second refrain at the fourth line of each stanza and again at the second line of the envoi, producing, most characteristically, a rhyme scheme of abaBbcbC for the stanzas and bBcC for the envoi; Dobson, Lang, and Henley number among the later 19th-c. practitioners of this variant.

See FRANCE, POETRY OF.

■ G. White, Ballades and Rondeaus (1887); G. M. Hecq, La Ballade et ses derivées (1891); Kastner; H. L. Cohen, The Ballade (1915), and Lyric Forms from France (1922); P. Champion, Histoire poétique du XVe siècle, 2 v. (1923); G. Reaney, "Concerning the Origins of the Rondeau, Virelai, and Ballade," Musica Disciplina 6 (1952); A. B. Friedman, "The Late Medieval Ballade and the Origin of Broadside Balladry," Medium Aevum 27 (1958); J. Fox, The Poetry of Villon (1962); G. Reaney, "The Development of the Rondeau, Virelai, and Ballade," Festschrift Karl Fellerer (1962); Christine de Pizan and Medieval French Lyric, ed. E. J. Richards (1998)—esp. B. K. Altmann, "Last Words: Reflections on a 'Lay mortel' and the Poetics of Lyric Sequences," C. McWebb, "Lyric Conventions and the Creation of Female Subjectivity in Christine de Pizan's Cent ballades d'Amant et de dame," and W. D. Paden, "Christine de Pizan and the Transformation of Late Medieval Lyrical Genres"; Morier; C. Page, "Tradition and Innovation in BN fr. 146: The Background to the Ballades," Fauvel Studies: Allegory, Chronicle, Music and Image in Paris, ed. M. Bent and A. Wathey (1998).

A. PREMINGER; T.V.F. BROGAN; C. SCOTT

BALLAD METER, HYMN METER. In Eng. poetry, ballad meter—or, as it is sometimes termed, ballad stanza—refers to the meter of the traditional ballad, a popular narrative song form since the late Middle Ages, and the written literary adaptation of this oral form. Ambiguities abound with regard to the application of the term, which gained importance in literary parlance only with the 18th-c. rise of interest in plebeian poetic forms. Commonly, ballad meter designates quatrains that alternate iambic tetrameter with iambic trimeter and rhyme at the second and fourth lines. For reasons discussed below, the form corresponds to "hymn meter" or "common meter," whose quatrains, however, can rhyme abab, as in the well-known instance of Isaac Watts's setting of Psalm 90: "O God, our help in ages past, / Our hope for years to come, / Our shelter from the stormy blast, / And our eternal home." The use of this iambic tetrameter-trimeter form in the two familiar arenas of popular secular ballads and widely sung hymnody is significant, as this structure and its effects over time draw from and represent collectively widespread and recognizable sung utterance. Moreover, in practice, the distinction between the two, ballad meter and hymn meter, is not made consistently, so that a poem in quatrains with either rhyme scheme, whose iambic lines alternate four stresses and three stresses, may be identified as a ballad. Nor is the requirement of the iambic stress pattern rigidly or universally followed in the application of the term. Thus, literary poets may title a work a "ballad" that varies from the quatrain form, the meter, or other aspects of the usual definition. Oscar Wilde's "Ballad of Reading Gaol," e.g., alternates between unrhymed tetrameters and rhymed trimeters but features stanzas of six rather than four lines.

Collective ongoing oral practice, for hundreds of years, constructs a context for understanding the vitality of the ballad meter form, from its origins in sung verse from popular trads. to the uses both hymnodists and literary poets made of it. Both the meter and the quatrain organization derive from the association of the verse with conventional melodic structures and rhythms: Eng. tunes typically follow patterns of four musical phrases. The popular and orally circulating ballads of the anglophone trad.—e.g., such ballads as are found in F. J. Child's English and Scottish Popular Ballads—customarily, though not inevitably, follow the accentual 4-3-4-3 pattern of ballad meter, but the words hew less rigorously to metrical form than do the ballads of consciously literary poets such as William Wordsworth, who adhere to metric strategies of poetic formulation. The shaping function of the music allows for greater flexibility in the verbal patterns of orally circulating folk ballads; sung performance inevitably enlivens and smoothes seeming prosodic irregularities in a text.

The origin, devel., and exact nature of ballad meter have prompted considerable scholarly discussion. One point of dispute concerns whether ballad meter is *accentual verse, i.e., isochronous and counting only stresses (see ISOCHRONISM), or *accentual-syllabic, regulating syllable count and not timed. The irregularities of the anonymous popular sung ballads and the importance of *caesura and dipodism in their isochronic lines have suggested to metrists the application of the concept of accentual meter used for OE verse to ballad meter. However, ballads do not show evidence of such consciously wrought complexities of OE prosody as formulaic hemistichs, structural alliteration, and clear stichic structure. Nineteenth-c. metrists considered ballad meter to be derived from the med. Lat. septenarius, a line of seven stresses and 14 syllables, and proposed that such long couplets, often with internal rhyme, were formulated into quatrains, perhaps because of exigencies of space on a given codex page. However, no plausible or demonstrable link between Church Lat. hymn verse and the oral vernacular ballads has been found. In the Ren., rhyming iambic heptameter couplets—*fourteeners—function with a syntactic and conceptual coherence that corresponds to the quatrain stanzas of alternating tetrameters and trimeters of ballad meter. The more regular meters and not infrequent heptameter form found in early *broadside ballads suggest a link to this fashion for heptameter couplets; however, no direct lineage between the 16th-c. literary mode and the popular verse quatrains of ballad meter is discernible, and the term ballad meter appears only in the romantic period, long after the literary vogue of fourteeners had passed. Rather, the ballad and ballad meter's influencing presence assist the occasional use of iambic-heptameter couplets in mod. poetry in connection with topics from the popular realm, as, e.g., in E. L. Thayer's "Casey at the Bat," whose composed heptameter couplets can be "heard" in recitation as ballad meter.

Another set of pertinent analytic terms attests to the significance of orality and singing traditions with regard to the develop. and study of ballad meter. With the 16th-c. emergence of Eng. Protestantism, such writers of *hymns in the vernacular as Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins brought Martin Luther's Ger. practice into their hymnody and also made use of the conventional ballad meter and sometimes the actual tunes of Eng. popular ballads for settings of psalm and hymn texts. The widespread collective singing of religious song, thus, formed another context in which the metric predilections of ballad meter influenced the writing of poetry in such authors shaped by hymnody as George Herbert and Emily Dickinson. To this day, metrical designations remain a common feature in the indexes of Protestant hymnals with the following categories typically given (numbers denote the stresses per line): long meter (or measure; abbreviated LM): 4-4-4-4; common meter (or measure; CM): 4-3-4-3; short meter (SM): 3-3-4-3 (see POULTER'S MEASURE); and rarely, half meter (HM): 3-3-3-3. The most common pattern is CM, which conforms metrically to iambic ballad meter and reflects the overlap of the two collective trads. of popular sacred and secular song.

See METER, PSALM.

■ F. B. Gummere, Old English Ballads (1894); J. W. Hendren, A Study of Ballad Rhythm (1936); E. Routley, The Music of Christian Hymnody (1957); Saintsbury, Prosody; G. W. Boswell, "Reciprocal Controls Exerted by Ballad Texts and Tunes," JAF 80 (1967) and "Stanza Form and Music-Imposed Scansion," Southern Folklore Quarterly 31 (1967); B. H. Bronson, The Ballad as Song (1969); Brogan; J. Hollander, Rhyme's Reason (1981); R. Leaver, "Goostly psalms and spirituall songes" (1991)—Eng. and Dutch psalms, 16th c.; Attridge, Poetic Rhythm; Meter in English, ed. D. Baker (1996); J. R. Watson, The English Hymn (1997); T. Steele, All the Fun's in How You Say a Thing (1999); Carper and Attridge; L. Turco, The Book of Forms, 3d ed. (2000).

D. DUGAW

BARD. A term borrowed into Eng. from the native Celtic word for "poet," its hist. goes back to Celtic Gaul, where the Gr. ethnographers Strabo and Diodorus Siculus, following Poseidonius, refer to Celtic βάρδοι (pl.). Diodorus says that βάρδοι were poets who sang eulogies and satires accompanied by stringed instruments. The word continued into historical times in the Celtic countries, in Ireland as bard, in Gaelic Scotland as bard/baird, in Wales as bardd, in Middle Cornish as barth, and in Middle Breton as barz. In the same passage, Diodorus mentions δρυίδαι, druids who were philosophers and theologians; and μάντεις, diviners or seers; Strabo calls these latter οὐάτεις. These three constituted a privileged, professional class of men who enjoyed high status in early Celtic society. The function of the bard was to support the social order by preserving versified genealogies that affirmed the rights of certain figures to govern, hists. of battles, and other lore; and to create fame for the leaders of that society through eulogy and elegy.

In Ir., in addition to bard (pl. baird), the word fili* (pl. filidh) was used to signify a poet who also had the power of divination; the word comes from a root that means "see." The word druid survived in Ir. as well, but the status of the fili was higher, and he seems to have taken over those magical properties that were associated with the druid in Celtic Gaul. The bard too lost some of his status at the expense of the fili. Like his counterpart on the continent, he continued to be a singer of praise, but his honor-price (a measure of status) was considerably less than that of the fili. The training of the fili was long and included instruction in the various meters, some of which, apparently, were common to the bard as well, but the fili was also trained in divination and the magical arts. In the wake of the Norman invasion, the fili no longer enjoyed his earlier status; rather, he became, like the bard, a singer of praise, and the meters he used were those of the bard. In Wales, bardd (pl. beirdd) retained the meaning of singer of praise, among other functions such as genealogist, historian, or custodian of lore. Both in Ireland and Wales, the poets were graded according to their training and achievement: the highest grade in Ireland was called ollamh (master; professor); in Wales, it was the pencerdd (chief of the craft of poetry).

Hence, the trad. of learned craft and proven skill behind the term is far removed from the emotionalism connected with it by the 18th-c. Eng. poets who revived it, such as Thomas Gray and James Beattie. The Eng. romantics were fascinated by the antiquity of the Celtic poets or bards and endowed them with their own ideas concerning "true" poetry, ironically attributing to them the qualities that they least prized, spontaneity and unbridled emotion. That emotionalism is essentially preserved in the mod. Eng. sense of the term, which denotes any poet but often connotes rhapsodic transcendence and is sometimes used as a pejorative; "bardolatry" is the critical term for the idolization of Shakespeare.

See CELTIC PROSODY, WELSH POETRY.

■ J. Vendryes, Lexique Étymologique de L'Irlandais Ancien, fasc. B, ed. E. Bachellery and P.-Y. Lambert (1981); Uraicecht na Ríar: The Poetic Grades in Early Irish Law, ed. Liam Breatnach (1987); Williams and Ford; Dafydd Jenkins, "Bardd Teulu and Pencerdd," The Welsh King and His Court, ed. T. M. Charles-Edwards et al. (2000).

J.E.C. WILLIAMS; T.V.F. BROGAN; P. K. FORD

BAROQUE

I. History of the Term and Concept
II. Comparative Perspectives
III. National Perspectives

Baroque describes a literary style and poetics that flourished in Europe and the Americas between roughly 1575 and 1690, or from Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata to Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz's Primero sueño. Prizing wit and difficulty, while variously promoting spectacle and meditation, skepticism and belief, baroque lit. gives expression as well to the causes and effects of sundry epistemological, political, and religious crises riddling early modernity. The baroque thus also designates a period concept and worldview associated with the waning of high Ren. humanist practices and values, the rise of the empirical sciences, Counter-Reformation theology, and political absolutism. Baroque aesthetic practices circulate from Western Europe to Eastern Europe and follow imperial routes to the Americas, where they combine with indigenous forms. Moreover, the mid-20th c. emergence of *neobaroque aesthetics and discourse in which hybridity, recursivity, perspectivism, and often *parody are paramount, suggests at once the vitality of the baroque style and period concept and that the baroque should continue to play a crucial role in the critique of modernity.

I. History of the Term and Concept. The Eng. word baroque comes, by way of 19th-c. Fr., from a 13th-c. Port. term for a misshapen, inexpensive pearl, barroco, which is ultimately derived from the Lat. verruca ("a wart"; "an excrescence on precious stones"; "a slight failing"). A rival, if less plausible etymology, championed esp. by Croce, points to the med. Lat. mnemonic barroco, for a logically dubious syllogism. And while the extent to which these two etymologies have contaminated each other over time in various vernaculars is still contested, such confluence neatly emblemizes not only the penchant for semantic ambiguity and wordplay often ascribed to baroque writing, but how the concept is an a posteriori one.

In mid-18th c. France, the term baroque was used to decry the perceived excesses and "bizarre" tastes of 17th-c. architecture. Analogously, Jean-Jacques Rousseau in his Dictionnaire de Musique (1767) writes: "Une Musique Baroque est celle dont l'Harmonie est confuse, chargée de Modulations & Dissonances. . . ." In the 1860s, Charles Baudelaire was the first to give baroque a positive connotation, when, in Pauvre Belgique, describing Belgian church architecture, he lauds its "style varié, fin, subtil, baroque." In Menschliches, Allzumenschliches (1878), Friedrich Nietzsche views the baroque as an inevitable, overly "rhetorical and dramatical" style that recurs throughout hist. and in all the arts whenever dialectical subtlety is lost.

Wölfflin's Renaissance und Barock and Kunstgeschichtliche Grundbegriffe first gives the baroque its current meaning designating both a style and a period concept. Wölfflin ascribes three principal "effects" to baroque architecture and visual arts: painterliness, massivity, and mobility. As for mobility, "the baroque never offers us perfection and fulfilment, or the static calm of 'being,' only the unrest of change and the tension of transience" (1888). Michelangelo's funeral sculptures, Caravaggio's swirling angel in Saint Matthew with the Angel, Diego Velázquez's The Weavers, and Gian Lorenzo Bernini's unrealized plans for the Louvre exemplify this dynamism. Wölfflin is also the first to transfer criteria from the visual arts to lit. when he briefly compares the splendor and "solemnity" of Michelangelo's art and the world-weariness of Tasso to Ariosto's "cheerful playfulness."

In subsequent decades, literary scholars generally concentrate on delineating rhetorical and literary-historical criteria to evaluate the baroque. Still, by the mid-20th c., the term baroque acquires so many, often contradictory meanings that it risks losing all methodological and conceptual value. Furthermore, the question of whether and how to delineate a mannerist style or period concept that would precede or be encompassed by the baroque becomes an enormous, often fruitless distraction. While many scholars understandably prefer to dissect late Ren. lit. into mannerist, précieux, metaphysical, euphuist, culturanista, conceptista, and Marinist styles, even so they generally recognize an overarching baroque style and Weltanschauung. Wellek (in a 1946 essay that was reprinted with a "Postscript" in 1963), however, helps to clarify the term and save its viability by arguing that the baroque should be interpreted as a period concept containing both stylistic and ideological elements. Wellek contends that the baroque broaches larger issues concerning periodization, the value of historical versus formalist approaches, and the usefulness of stylistic criteria to evaluate lit. "Whatever the defects of the term baroque," he concludes, "it is a term which prepares for synthesis, draws our minds away from the mere accumulation of observations and facts, and paves the way for a future history of literature as a fine art." Accomplishing exactly such a synthesis and spurning the dictates of bienséance, Rousset's influential La littérature de l'âge baroque en France adduces formal qualities from Bernini's works to establish a multifaceted literary baroque in France and elsewhere. Alternately, in "La curiosidad barroca," Lezama Lima proposes a Lat. Am. baroque exemplified by the neo-Gongorist poetry of Sor Juana in Mexico, but also by Lat. Am. church architecture and the 18th-c. sculptures of the Brazilian O Aleijadinho, with their fusion of indigenous and Eur. elements. Dubbing the Lat. Am. baroque the art of the "contraconquista," Lezama subverts the commonplace of the baroque as the art of the Counter-Reformation.

More recent scholarship on the baroque has sought to deepen and expand analytic, historical, and comparatist perspectives. Genette (1966, 1969), Beverley, and Hampton variously read the baroque as helping to reveal the dynamics of literary imitation. Mining the baroque for its philosophical lessons, Deleuze, (a rediscovered) Benjamin, Buci-Glucksmann, and Lacan (who defines the baroque as "la régulation de l'âme par la scopie corporelle"), find immanence, *aporia, and transcendence in baroque rhetorical and conceptual excesses. Meanwhile, the emergence of a New World baroque or Lat. Am. baroque as a field of crit. (e.g., Carpentier and Lezama), as well as that of neobaroque crit. (e.g., Sarduy, Calabrese, Buci-Glucksmann, and Moser), have ensured that the baroque remains a vital subject for research and reflection. And if the neobaroque is frequently associated with postcolonialism, Bal and Ndalianis demonstrate that it may also herald, respectively, a broader aesthetics of quotation and spectacle. Recent studies by Zamora (2006) and Davidson confirm just how fruitful the decision can be to view the literary baroque (and New World baroque) through categories borrowed from the visual arts—although in less skilled hands, this panoptic approach sometimes confuses expressive means.

II. Comparative Perspectives. Baroque literary style is generally marked by rhetorical sophistication, excess, and play. Self-consciously remaking and thus critiquing the rhet. and poetics of the Petrarchan, pastoral, Senecan, and epic trads., baroque writers challenge conventional notions of *decorum by using and abusing such tropes and figures as *metaphor, *hyperbole, paradox, *anaphora, *hyperbaton, *hypotaxis and parataxis, *paronomasia, and *oxymoron. Producing copia and variety (varietas) is valued, as is the cultivation of concordia discors and *antithesis—strategies often culminating in *allegory or the *conceit. The tendency to amplify greatly a single image or idea is another hallmark. Baroque style typically courts admiration (admiratio) as much as assent or pleasure. Writers like Giambattista Marino, Luis de Góngora, Andreas Gryphius, John Donne, and Robert Burton thus trouble the traditional distinction between *invention (inventio) and *style (elocutio).

Baroque poetics largely continues Ren. debates on how to balance nature and art and how to please, move, and teach audiences and readers. Read directly, or filtered through numerous Neo-Lat. and vernacular poetics, Cicero, Horace, Quintilian, and Aristotle (Poetics and Rhetoric) still dominate most prescriptive treatises. Eloquence remains the poet's cardinal virtue. Some paratexts and *panegyrics, e.g., Thomas Carew's "An Elegie upon the death . . . of John Donne" (1633) do, however, acclaim baroque innovations in verse. Carew writes, "The Muses garden with Pedantique weedes / O'rspred, was purg'd by thee; The lazie seeds / Of servile imitation throwne away; / And fresh invention planted . . ." A more significant devel. is the handful of encyclopedic treatises on the art and faculty of *wit (ingenium). Reacting, respectively, to the stylistic revolutions of Góngora and Marino, Baltasar Gracián's Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1648) and Emanuele Tesauro's Il cannocchiale aristotelico (1654) offer comprehensive accounts of why wit (agudeza*, argutezza) should be the writer's highest aim and the conceit (concepto, concetto), with its heavy hermeneutic demands and surprising aesthetic, cognitive, and spiritual rewards, poetry and prose's loftiest achievement. By stressing ingenuity in their accounts of invention, Gracián and Tesauro effectively make the imagination a rival to reason, a move that in retrospect nicely epitomizes the baroque.

In baroque lyric, the concision of the *sonnet, *epigram, and *emblem is everywhere cultivated. But Sp. poets also prize the expanded freedom of the silva, while John Milton, picking up where Christopher Marlowe and George Chapman leave off, perfects an unrhymed iambic pentameter enabling "things unattempted yet in prose and rhyme." Meanwhile, Gracián and George Herbert refine more direct if still elliptical styles. The myriad genres of baroque prose range from Madame de Sévigné's piquant, sentimental letters to Athanasius Kircher's encyclopedic syncreticism. Baroque novelistic forms—as exemplified by Don Quixote, L'Astrée, and Simplicissimus—may be read, as Lukács suggests, as representing a "degraded" world where God no longer guarantees order. Baroque tragedy and comedy can be distinguished by their willingness to violate Aristotelian "unities," production of spectacle and *affect, and role in promoting absolutism and allegorizing hist. In his influential interpretation of Ger. baroque Trauerspiele, Benjamin finds their allegorical representations of tyranny and ruin artistically inferior to the tragedies of Shakespeare and Pedro Calderón de la Barca but more amenable to a "philosophy of art." In Arte nuevo de hacer comedias (New Art of Writing Comedies, 1609) Félix Lope de Vega underscores the need to satisfy the audience's gusto (*taste) and thus of skirting Aristotelian rules forbidding the mixture of genres. His plays may be "monstrous" to the erudite, but their "variety delights." Similarly, concluding that his principal task is "to please" (plaisanter), Jean Racine in the preface to Bérénice (1670) promotes "simplicité" of plot over any adherence to "régles."

Still, baroque poetics generally cultivates an aesthetics of *difficulty valuing erudition, ingenuity, and rhetorical excess. Rousset (1954) observes that baroque poetics is fueled by "the refusal to simplify by eliminating [and] the accumulation of imagery born from the need to multiply points of view because no one point of view is capable by itself of seizing a fluctuating and fleeting reality." Such perspectivism takes many forms: Jean de Sponde's surprising pointes, Milton's epic similes, and Calderón's signature technique of recolección (recapitulation). Expressing the horrors of the Thirty Years' War, Gryphius's "Menschliches Elende" (1637) exemplifies baroque paratactic style and preoccupation with transience: "Was sind wir Menschen doch? ein Wohnhaus grimmer Schmerzen, / Ein Ball des falschen Glücks, ein Irrlicht dieser Zeit, / Ein Schauplatz herber Angst, besetzt mit scharfem Leid, / Ein bald verschmelzter Schnee und abgebrannte Kerzen." (But what are we humans? a home of fierce pain, / A ball of false joy, a will-o'-wisp of these times, / A scene of bitter fear, filled with sharp woe, / a quickly melted snowfall and a burned down candle.) By contrast, in his Polifemo (1612) and Soledades (1612), Góngora creates allusive *pastoral worlds whose greatest violence is that done to conventional poetics.

The motives for the baroque invention and style are quite diverse. From Donne's Anniversaries to Calderón's autos sacramentales*, poets and their patrons proved eager to outdo predecessors and rivals. In Counter-Reformation Spain, Mexico, Italy, and France, in Protestant England and Holland, to say nothing of war-torn, confessionally divided Germany and Bohemia, the consequences of religious strife were as severe as they were heterogeneous. Many writers were tasked with epideictic or apologetic duties, while others responded with extreme forms of skepticism or mysticism. Baroque documents and monuments typically make more subjective claims than their Ren. predecessors, partly because they are less tied to strictures, respectively, of cl. decorum and linear perspective but also, arguably, because the individual is perceived as increasingly autonomous or monadic, as G. W. Leibniz would have it. Thus, besides their ornamental and ideological functions, the resources of baroque style may serve as the heuristic means for representing a world or self that no longer can be credibly represented based on the Ren. system of microcosmic-macrocosmic analogies or other humanist models. Topoi such as life as dream (Calderón), world as labyrinth (Jan Amos Comenius), world upside-down (Andrew Marvell), vanitas mundi (Quirinus Kuhlmann), and theatrum mundi (Gracián) devalorize the world of appearances and point to skeptical or transcendental solutions. Baroque tragedy typically shows how characters' extreme passions are incommensurable with unyielding contingency. This creates astonishment, confusion, and enormous affectus and often results in spectacular depictions of death. As with painterly chiaroscuro, thematic and formal ambiguities are produced by devices such as the play within the play or, in lyric, by sonnets about writing sonnets. These mises-en-abîmes speak to the more general baroque concern with incommensurable qualities and quantities, whether these refer to the cosmological infinite as championed by Giordano Bruno and decried by Blaise Pascal or express the more palpable mutability and insufficiency of worldly things and pretensions.

While the philosophies of René Descartes and Francis Bacon try to limit the imagination's role, many baroque writers—because of the dynamics of literary imitation, the needs of court, empire, the Church, or, in Protestant countries, in response to iconoclasm—avidly cultivate the marvelous and pathetic in their imagery. "The efficacy . . . in awakening and moving the affections," Maravall affirms, "was the great motive of the baroque." Typical baroque imagery involves alabaster, jewels, bubbles, ruins, corpses, skeletons, flames, tears, dewdrops, mirrors, clouds, rainbows, and fountains. Besides focusing on what pleases or disgusts the senses, baroque writing frequently makes metamorphosis, mutability, disillusionment, melancholy, inexpressibility, and infinity central themes. Mining less "cl." aspects of lit. hist., baroque imitatio often turns to early imperial Lat. lit. for models. Francisco de Quevedo borrows directly from Seneca, Juvenal, and Propertius in his devout sequence of poems Heraclito Cristiano and his satiric Sueños. Marino composes his digressive, 41,000-line epic L'Adone on an Ovidian theme, while a sonnet such as "La bella schiava" fashions compact meraviglie (wonders) recalling Martial. Echoing Seneca and Plutarch, Donne hyperbolically anatomizes the world's decline in the Anniversaries, even as he glimpses its Christian redemption. Imitating Lucan, Théodore-Agrippa d'Aubigné laments the slaughter of his fellow Protestants in Les Tragiques but revels in his discovery of the rhetorical means to amplify such violence.

In sum, Spitzer's description of Sp. baroque lit. as riddled by the conflict between Weltsucht and Weltflucht retains broad explanatory appeal. Baroque play with opposites commonly yields paradoxical imagery, generic instability, tenuous allegories, and irreconcilable spiritual tensions. Bruno's Candelaio (1582) and Calderón's El mágico prodigioso (1637) try to stage physical and abstract coincidentia oppositorum. The ironic sensuality of Marino's amorous verse complements Angelus Silesius's audacious mystical straining. Donne's Holy Sonnets fuse the sensual and spiritual in adapting the meditative trad. of Ignatius Loyola for Eng. readers.

III. National Perspectives. Baroque lit. is best viewed from a comparatist perspective. Imitation of the same models occurs throughout Europe and the New World, while a vibrant respublica litteraria diffuses new stylistic and thematic trends across national boundaries and oceans. Nevertheless, much of the best crit. on the baroque has concentrated first on local occurrences and contexts. Further, just as the literary baroque occurs at different historical moments in different countries, scholarly judgments about the literary baroque have often been shaped by shifting national perspectives. The following adumbrates historical and critical devels. in various vernacular trads.:

A. Germany. The Ger. baroque ranges from Martin Optiz's prescriptive Buch von der Deutschen Poeterey (1624) to the death of Philipp von Zesen (1689). It includes Gryphius's poetry and drama, Hans Jakob Christoph von Grimmelshausen's picaresques, and Daniel Caspar von Lohenstein's Trauerspiele, as well as the lyric poetry of Friedrich Spee, Paul Fleming, Christian Hofmanswaldau, Catharina Regina von Greiffenberg, Silesius, and Kuhlmann. The most sophisticated instance of Ger. baroque poetics is Georg Philipp Harsdörffer's Poetischer Trichter (1648–53). As a period concept and name for a literary style, the baroque is first and most fervently embraced by Ger. critics such as Cysarz and Benjamin. This is partly due to the similarities they find between the baroque and Ger. *expressionism, as well as to Wölfflin's vast influence, but also because there was no viable competing term for the baroque to usurp. More recently, while Adorno warns against the misuse of the term baroque, Barner, Jaumann, Garber, Althaus, and Kemper (1988, 2006) have greatly deepened the understanding of Ger. baroque rhet., lyric, drama, epigram, and the baroque's reception hist.

B. Spain and Latin America. Baroque writing may be said to commence with Fernando de Herrera's Anotaciones (1578) and Juan Huarte de San Juan's treatise on wit, Examen de ingenios (1575); reach full bloom with Miguel de Cervantes's Don Quixote (1605, 1615) and Persiles, Lope de Vega's dramas, the lyrics of Góngora, Quevedo, and Pedro Espinosa; and then have its magnificent autumn with Calderón's dramas, Gracián's prose, and the poetry of Sor Juana (1648–95). Besides Sor Juana, whose life and work has been the subject of much recent scholarship, other leading Mexican baroque poets include Miguel de Guevara and Luis Sandoval y Zapata. In Brazil, emerging from Luís de Camões's shadow, Gregório de Matos is the most celebrated baroque poet, while António Vieira's ingenious, audacious sermons exemplify baroque prose. As for crit., the untenable duality of the terms conceptismo and culteranismo has been largely replaced by the rubric baroque, which now is also generally favored over the more traditional siglo de oro, esp. when describing 17th-c. lit. Maravall's interpretation of the baroque as a period of "general crisis" and its art as serving "conservative" ends continues to spur new thinking. Following the crit. of Dámaso Alonso and Américo Castro, Orozco Díaz methodically maps the contours of the literary baroque, culminating in his Introducción al Barroco (1988). González Echevarría's Celestina's Brood (1993) embodies recent efforts to expand the baroque beyond its peninsular, Golden Age confines.

C. Italy. Some critics have found the baroque already in Michelangelo's poetry and in Tasso's Aminta, Gerusalemme liberata, and his treatise on poetics, the Discorsi; but most prefer a later start, approximately from Marino's Rime (1602) and the varied works of Giambattista Basile (d. 1632) to the last edition of Il cannocchiale aristotelico (1670) pub. in Tesauro's lifetime. While Croce equated barroco with bad taste and aesthetic failure, other scholars gradually adopted the term and gave it more positive connotations. It now competes with the narrower notion of Marinismo and the more widely used seicento. Raimondi and Getto make perhaps the strongest case for the It. baroque. By focusing mainly on thematic questions, Battistini's Il barroco offers a welcome corrective to the tendency to conflate the baroque with Counter-Reformation art, culture, and ideology.

D. France. The leading Fr. baroque poets are considered to be Agrippa d'Aubigné, Sponde, Marc-Antoine Girard de Saint-Amant, Théophile de Viau, and Jean de La Ceppède. Drama by Molière, Jean Rotrou, Racine, and Pierre Corneille have been convincingly read as baroque; for even when their style heeds François Malherbe's classicizing dicta, often their motifs, metaphors, extreme theatricality, and cultivation of spectacle do not. Nicolas Boileau rings the death-knell for the Fr. baroque with his 1672 L'Art poétique: "Evitons ces excès: laissons à l'Italie / De tous ces faux brillans l'eclatante folie . . . Fuyez de ces auteurs l'abondance stérile, / Et ne vous charger point d'un detail inutile" (Let us avoid this excess and leave to Italy, / With all its fake jewels, glittering folly . . . / Flee those authors of sterile abundance, / And do not burden yourself with useless detail). In the 20th c., the pioneering studies of Raymond, Tapié, Buffum, Mourgues, and esp. Rousset, together with more recent scholarship by Lestringant and Mathieu-Castellani, have largely vanquished Fr. reluctance to recognize a period style between the Pléiade and classicisme. Buci-Glucksmann's studies of baroque and neobaroque aesthetics in light of Benjamin, Baudelaire, Lacan, and feminist theory have given new life and theoretical weight to typological readings of the baroque. But introducing a 1980 edition of Tapié's Baroque et classicisme (1957), Fumaroli decries the concept of the baroque as a Ger. import and a "délicieux accouplement entre discipline universitaire et imagination romanesque, entre philolettres et rêveries, école des Annales et tourisme sentimental."

E. England and North America. Baroque stylistic features and themes characterize verse by Donne, Michael Drayton, Marvell, and Milton; the prose of Donne, Burton, Thomas Browne, and Margaret Cavendish, as well as Shakespeare's poetry and drama (from the grotesquerie of Troilus, the perspectivism and wordplay of the Sonnets, to the theatrum mundi of The Tempest). The baroque effectively ends in England with John Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668) and his bowdlerization of purple passages in Shakespeare's plays to prepare them for a neoclassical stage. In New England, Jonathan Edwards's sermons and the verse of Edward Taylor, Michael Wigglesworth, and Anne Bradstreet have been read as representing what Warren (1941) calls a "colonial baroque." More generally, though, Anglo-Am. crit.'s attachment to the stylistic terms metaphysical and cavalier*, and the period terms Elizabethan, Jacobean, and Restoration, as well as the more recent predilection to lump all 16th- and 17th-c. lit. under the rubric "early modern," has forestalled the acceptance of an Eng. baroque. Notable exceptions include Warren (1939) on Crashaw; studies by Daniells, Roston, and Parry on Milton; Croll's reading of Browne's prose; and Kermode pondering the metaphysical poets. T. S. Eliot avoids the word but apprehends the concept: "Seventeenth-century poetry is much like a crucifix ornamented with pearls, except that we are able with some difficulty to perceive the pearls." And while critics writing outside Anglo-Am. circles, esp. Praz (1925, 1958) and Hatzfeld, are less hesitant to apply the term to Eng. lit., within them Bush's 1962 verdict still epitomizes the prevalent attitude: "German exponents of Geistesgeschichte have pursued the ramifications of 'Barock' as Browne pursued the quincunx, with a heavier foot and with equally specious and elliptical logic, but for us the simplest definition is 'poetry like Crashaw's.'" Even so, Nelson's (1954, 1961) and Warnke's (1961, 1972) contention that, from a comparatist perspective, the baroque is an ineluctable term to describe the period's style and Weltanschauung in England has yet to be been gainsaid.

F. Holland. P. C. Hooft's meditative lyrics and Constanijn Huygens's more worldly verse display numerous baroque qualities. Analogies between Dutch lit. and the painterly techniques of Rembrandt and Peter Paul Rubens are also compelling. Yet beginning with Haerten's study (1934) of Joost van den Vondel's dramas, the notion of a Dutch baroque has only been ambivalently embraced. Grootes and Schenkeveld label Daniel Heinsius's Neo-Lat. poetry baroque but are reluctant to apply the term to vernacular lit.

G. Eastern Europe. As Segel observes, baroque poetry flourishes later here than in Western Europe. A strong Marinist influence is felt in Croatia, where Ivan Gundulić's psalms and unfinished epic Osman (1638) are representative. In Hungary, the lyrics of Miklós Zrínyi stand out, as does his epic The Siege of Szigetvár (1651), with its numerous echoes of Tasso. In Poland, where the baroque style waxes around 1700, Jan Andrzej Morsztyn and Daniel Naborowski ingeniously rearrange the ruins of the Petrarchan legacy. Born in Bohemia, Comenius becomes one of the most celebrated baroque polymaths. In Russia, the baroque may be said to commence with Simeon Polotsky and Avvakum Petrov, and extend into the 18th c. with Vasily Trediakovsky's poetry and theory, Gavrila Derzhavin's odes, and Mikhail Lomonosov's lyrics. Tschižewskij (1971, 1973) views the "slavic Baroque" as a "synthesis of the Renaissance and the middle ages." Embraced enthusiastically in the 1920s, most recent crit. of Rus. lit. has tended to avoid the period term baroque, preferring instead to limit it to descriptions of style. However, Joseph Brodsky's "Great Elegy to John Donne" (1963) makes an extremely compelling, if implicit, case for the centrality of the baroque in the Rus. literary trad.

More generally, imitations like Brodsky's and the emergence of neobaroque critical discourse indicate how the continuing viability of the baroque as a period concept ultimately lies in its heuristic value or how it serves contemp. creative, critical, and theoretical tasks. As Deleuze (1992) observes, "Irregular pearls exist, but the Baroque has no reason to exist without a concept that forms this reason itself. It's easy to render the Baroque non-existent; one only has to stop proposing its concept." Less paradoxically, Zamora (2009) asserts, "The real strength of the neobaroque resides in its engagement of specific historical and cultural contexts." In this respect, Lezama Lima's 1966 novel Paradiso is exemplary for its syncretism or plutonismo by which the rich textures of contemp. Cuban culture are fused with historical, literary, and metaphysical traits that Lezama elsewhere ascribes to a mythical "señor barroco." Or as Greene more soberly affirms, "The Neobaroque embodies the obligation of early modernists to attend to their period not as a closed episode, like antiquity, but as an uncompleted script for the present."

See CONCEPTISMO; MANNERISM; MARINISM; METAPHYSICAL POETRY; RENAISSANCE POETICS; RENAISSANCE POETRY.

■ Comparative: H. Wölfflin, Renaissance und Barock (1888), and Kunstgeschichtliche Grundbegriffe (1915); M. Praz, Secentismo e marinismo in Inghilterra (1925); H. Haerten, Vondel und der deutsche Barock (1934); E. D'Ors, Du baroque (1935); O. de Mourgues, Metaphysical, Baroque and Précieux Poetry (1953); L. Nelson Jr., "Góngora and Milton: Toward a Definition of the Baroque," CL 6 (1954); M. Praz, The Flaming Heart (1958); L. Nelson Jr., Baroque Lyric Poetry (1961); European Metaphysical Poetry, ed. F. Warnke (1961); J. M. Cohen, The Baroque Lyric (1963); R. Wellek, "The Concept of Baroque in Literary Scholarship," Concepts in Criticism (1963); M. W. Croll, "The Baroque Style in Prose," Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm, ed. J. M. Patrick and R. O. Evans (1966); G. Lukács, The Theory of the Novel, trans. A. Bostock (1971); H. B. Segel, The Baroque Poem (1974); J. Lacan, "Du baroque," Encore, le séminaire XX (1975); F. Warnke, Versions of Baroque (1975); La Métamorphose dans la poésie baroque française et anglaise, ed. G. Mathieu-Castellani (1980); V.-L. Tapié, Baroque et classicisme, ed. M. Fumaroli (1980); G. Mathieu-Castellani, Mythes de l'eros baroque (1981); J. Beverley, "Going Baroque?" boundary 2 15 (1988); Baroque Topographies, ed. T. Hampton (1991); M. Blanco, Les rhé- toriques de la pointe (1992); O. Calabrese, Neo-Baroque, trans. C. Lambert (1992); G. Deleuze, The Fold: Leibniz and the Baroque, trans. T. Conley (1992); G. Mathieu-Castellani, "Baroque et maniérisme," Dictionnaire universel des littératures (1994); É. Glissant, "Concerning a Baroque Abroad in the World," Poetics of Relation (1997); W. Moser, "Barock," Ästhetische Grundbegriffe, v. 1 (2000); M. Bal, Quoting Caravaggio (2001); Résurgences baroques, ed. W. Moser and N. Goyer (2001); C. Buci-Glucksmann, La Folie du voir (2002); A. Ndalianis, Neo-Baroque Aesthetics and Contemporary Entertainment (2004); P. Davidson, The Universal Baroque (2008); G. Lambert, On the (New) Baroque (2008); R. Greene, "Baroque and Neobaroque: Making This-tory," PMLA 124.1 (2009); C. Johnson, Hyperboles (2010).

■ German: H. Cysarz, Deutsche Barockdichtung (1924); W. Benjamin, Ursprung des deutschen Trauerspiels (1928); T. W. Adorno, "Der mißbrauchte Barock," Ohne Leitbild (1967); W. Barner, Barockrhetorik (1970); R. Browning, German Baroque Poetry, 1618–1723 (1971); H. Jaumann, Die deutsche Barockliteratur (1975); H.-G. Kemper, Barock–Mystik (1988); Europäische Barock–Rezeption, ed. K. Garber, 2 v. (1991)—includes important articles on the Slavic, Dutch, and Scandinavian baroque; T. Althaus, Epigrammatische Barock (1996); H.-G. Kemper, Barock Humanismus: Krisen–Dichtung and Barock Humanismus: Liebeslyrik (both 2006).

■ Spanish and Latin American: J. Lezama Lima, La expresión americana (1957); H. Hatzfeld, Estudios sobre el barroco (1964); S. Sarduy, Barroco (1974), and "The Baroque and the Neobaroque," Latin America and Its Literature, ed. C. Fernández Moreno (1980); J. A. Maravall, Culture of the Baroque, trans. T. Cochran (1986); E. Orozco Díaz, Introducción al barroco (1988); L. Spitzer, "The Spanish Baroque," Representative Essays, ed. A. K. Forcione, H. Lindenberger, and M. Sutherland (1988); R. González Echevarría, Celestina's Brood (1993); A. Carpentier, "The Baroque and the Marvelous Real," Magic Realism, ed. L. P. Zamora and W. Faris (1995); L. P. Zamora, The Inordinate Eye: New World Baroque and Latin American Fiction (2006), and "New World Baroque, Neobaroque, Brut Barroco: Latin American Postcolonialisms," PMLA 124.1 (2009).

■ Italian: B. Croce, Storia dell' età barocca in Italia (1929); J. V. Mirollo, The Poet of the Marvelous: Giambattista Marino (1963); E. Raimondi, Letteratura barocca (1982); L. Anceschi, L'idea del barocco (1984); The Sense of Marino, ed. F. Guardiani (1994); A. Battistini, Il barroco (2000); G. Getto, Il barocco letterario in Italia (2000); A. M. Pedullà, Il romanzo barocco e altri scritti (2001).

■ French: I. Buffum, Agrippa d'Aubigné's "Les tragiques" (1951); J. Rousset, La littérature de l'âge baroque en France (1954); M. Raymond, Baroque et Renaissance poétique (1955); I. Buffum, Studies in the Baroque from Montaigne to Rotrou (1957); L. Spitzer, "The 'Récit de Théramène,'" Linguistics and Literary History (1962); G. Genette, "Hyperboles," Figures I (1966); J. Rousset, "Adieu au baroque?" L'intérieur et l'extérieur (1968); G. Genette, "D'un récit baroque," Figures II (1969); F. Hallyn, Formes metaphoriques dans la poésie lyrique de l'age baroque en France (1975); F. Lestringant, La cause des martyrs dans "Les tragiques" d'Agrippa d'Aubigné (1991); M. Blanchot, "The Baroque Poets of the Seventeenth Century," Faux pas, trans. C. Mandell (2001).

■ English and North American: A. Warren, Richard Crashaw (1939), and "Edward Taylor's Poetry: Colonial Baroque," KR 3 (1941); D. Bush, English Literature in the Early Seventeenth Century (1962); R. Daniells, Milton, Mannerism and Baroque (1963); F. Kermode, The Metaphysical Poets (1969); M. Roston, Milton and the Baroque (1980); T. S. Eliot, The Varieties of Metaphysical Poetry, ed. R. Schuchard (1993); G. Parry, "Literary Baroque and Literary Classicism," A Companion to Milton, ed. T. Corns (2003).

■ Other National or Area Studies: D. Tschižewskij, History of Russian Literature from the Eleventh Century to End of the Baroque (1960); A. Angyal, Die slawische Barockwelt (1961); D. Tschižewskij, Comparative History of Slavic Literatures, trans. R. Porter (1971); J. Bucsela, "The Problems of Baroque in Russian Literature," Russian Review 31 (1972); D. Tschižewskij, Slavische Barockliteratur I (1973); Slavische Barockliteratur II, ed. R. Lachmann (1983); E. K. Grootes and M. A. Schenkeveld, "The Dutch Revolt and the Golden Age, 1560–1700," A Literary History of the Low Countries, ed. T. Hermans (2009).

C. Johnson

BARZELLETTA. See frottola and barzelletta.

BASQUE COUNTRY, POETRY OF THE. Basque lit. bloomed late because of various sociohistorical circumstances that hindered its devel. and are tightly bound to the ups and downs suffered by Basque, or Euskara, a lang. of pre-IE origin spoken today by some 700,000 people who live on both sides of the Pyrenees, in France and in Spain. The political border that today divides the Basque Country (Euskal Herria) separates two different legislative regions. After the Sp. constitution of 1978 was approved, the Basque lang. was accepted as an official lang., together with Castilian (Sp.), in the provinces in the Sp. Basque region; however, the same is not the case in the Fr. Basque Country, where Basque does not hold the status of an official lang. The consequences of this imbalance are easy to predict: factors such as the establishment of bilingual models of teaching and the existence of grants for publications in the Basque lang. have made the literary system in the Sp. Basque Country much stronger and more dynamic than that on the French side. Within Basque lit., poetry has always been a crucial genre. The first book of any sort published in Basque was a volume of poems by Bernard Etxepare (1493?–1545); moreover, poetry has also held a position of considerable importance in Basque oral lit. Long-established genres such as improvised Basque verse singing, or bertsolaritza, are still very popular today.

Linguae Vasconum Primitiae (Origins of the Basque Language, 1545) by Etxepare was the first step from an oral to a written lit. It consists of 15 poems dealing with themes such as love and religion; Etxepare expresses his joy at the possibilities created by the invention of the printing press and his hope that it will help disseminate Basque lit. Etxepare had read Erasmus, and his book reveals this influence. Another foundational vol., Arnaut Oihenart's Atsotitzak eta neurtitzak (Proverbs and Verses, 1657), is a book not only of proverbs and refrains but of love poems that follow the trad. of *Petrarchism. The dominance of religious texts in this era was almost absolute; Oihenart (1592–1667) was one of the few laic Basque writers of his time.

The last decade of the 19th c. saw the emergence of a new spirit that would transform Basque lit. The dominance of devotional and didactic works began to wane, and the spectrum of literary genres widened. Indalezio Bizkarrondo or "Blintx" (1831–76) and the satiric Pierre Topet or "Etxahun" (1786–1862), e.g., were considered romantic poets.

After the Second Carlist War in 1876, the revocation of foral rights—which had ensured regional autonomy by empowering assemblies of local inhabitants—unleashed a cultural revival, Pizkundea (the Basque Renaissance, 1876–1936), the Basque equivalent of the Galician Rexurdimento or the Catalan Renaixença, in which patriotic renewal would stem from recognition of the Basque lang. The foralist movement gave way to the nationalism of Sabino Arana and from this point on, the fundamental purpose of writing in Basque would be to contribute to the creation of the Basque nation. Nationalism was to influence all Basque lit. of the first third of the 20th c. Poetry was promoted by *poetic contests known as lorejokoak (floral games), by Basque festivals, and by the publication of *songbooks containing popular folk songs. During the time of the floral games, the work of Felipe Arrese-Beitia, among others, showed anguish in the face of the potential death of the lang. In the 1930s, two poets, Xabier Lizardi and Esteban Urkiaga (Lauaxeta), explored the expressive possibilities of Basque through postsymbolist poetics. Both nationalists, they participated actively in the Pizkundea that took place during the years of the Sp. Second Republic, a time at which nationalist political and cultural activism went hand in hand. Another influential poet and translator of that time was Nicolas Ormaetxea (Orixe), whose love of cl. lit. and knowledge of Scholasticism greatly influenced his writing. Bide Barrijak (1931) by Lauaxeta, Biotz begietan (1932) by Lizardi, and Barne muinetan (1934) by Orixe are considered the premier poetic vols. of the pre–Sp. Civil War period.

The repression and censorship that followed the Sp. Civil War (1936–39) made it impossible to publish in Basque until 1949, when the first mod. book of poetry appeared, but it was not until the 1950s that the dialogue with modernity became more developed through the voices of two poets, Jon Mirande (1925–72) and Gabriel Aresti (1933–75). Mirande, heterodox and nihilist, was the first to transgress the religious spirit latent in Basque poetry. Echoes of his many and varied philosophical and literary readings (such as the Stoics, Friedrich Nietzsche, Oswald Spengler, E. A. Poe, and Charles Baudelaire) abound in his prose and poetry. Aresti wrote short stories and drama as well as poetry and translated such authors as Giovanni Boccaccio, T. S. Eliot, and Nazim Hikmet. His first collection of poetry was Maldan behera (Downhill, 1960), influenced by symbolist poetry and an Eliotian modernism. However, with Harri eta herri (Stone and Country, 1964), a landmark in the history of Basque lit., he moved toward a more sociopolitical poetry. Critics praised the book's modernity and innovative spirit, together with its left-wing humanism. It was followed by Euskal harria (Basque Stone, 1967) and Harrizko herri hau (This Country of Stone, 1971).

In the 1960s, political and cultural activism against the regime of Francisco Franco were closely linked, with the consequence that sociopolitical poetry found its best ally in modern Basque song, esp. in the group Ez dok amairu, which was formed by singers like Mikel Laboa (1934–2008) and poets like Xabier Lete (b. 1944), Joxean Arze (b. 1939), and Joxe Anjel Irigarai (b. 1942). Linked to this movement of social commitment, female poets emerged, such as Amaia Lasa (b. 1949) and Arantxa Urretabizkaia (b. 1947). Other authors took a postsymbolist stand, intending for Basque poetry to evolve toward a more concise and synthetic style (e.g., Juan Mari Lekuona, 1927–2005) or to move toward a deeper degree of introspection (e.g., Bittoriano Gandiaga, 1928–2001).

However, things changed radically after Franco's death in 1975; from then on and for the first time in hist., the Basque literary system was supported by a legal framework that allowed the establishment of bilingual education and funding for the publication of books in Basque. In 2005, a total of 1,648 books were published, 247 of which were literary works, including 37 books of poetry. In the 1970s and early 1980s, because of a proliferation of literary magazines, Basque poetry experienced its most avant-garde period. While Joseba Sarrionandia (b. 1958) reminded us that all lit. is metalit., Koldo Izagirre (b. 1953) dabbled in surrealist aesthetics. But the book that truly shook the poetry scene of the time was Etiopia (Ethiopia, 1978), by Bernardo Atxaga (b. 1951), the most internationally renowned Basque author. In Etiopia, Atxaga addresses the tedium brought about by the end of modernity and declares the impossibility of addressing poetic lang. itself. Freed from the baroque and far removed from the dramatics of his previous work, in Poemas & Híbridos (Poems & Hybrids, 1990) Atxaga tries to recover poetry's essence. For this purpose, he tears up the nonneutral, topical lang. that is traditionally used in the modernist poetry and mixes it with Dadaist strategies (see DADA), with the primitive and the infantile, and with humor.

Contemp. Basque poetry can best be described as eclectic. Its primary characteristics include a wide diversity of poetics, the use of various narrative styles, a preference for nonaesthetic poetics rooted in the quotidian, and the emergence of women poets who reclaim other codes based on the female body. Poets such as Felipe Juaristi (b. 1957), Rikardo Arregi (b. 1958), Miren Agur

Meabe (b. 1962), and Kirmen Uribe (b. 1970) seem to be influenced by the *Beat poets and gritty realism. Audiences often enjoy poetic performances that combine poetry with music or other arts. What happened to the other literary genres has also happened to poetry: it has absorbed the characteristics literary critics describe as *postmodern—a denial of transcendental meaning, an assertion that all lit. is metalit. in the end; a nonelitist attitude toward literary creation; the use of *pastiche; a mistrust of lang.; and a hybridization of genres. That is, Basque poetry displays a tendency toward aesthetic populism and a democratizing attitude to the figure of the poet.

■ Anthologies: Antología de la poesía vasca, ed. I. Aldekoa (1993); Etzikoak, ed. and trans. M. Drobnic and M. Prelesnik Drozg (2006); Montañas en la niebla, ed. J. Kortazar (2006); Six Basque Poets, ed. M. J. Olaziregi (2007); Cien años de poesía, coord. J. Sabadell-Nieto (2007).

■ History and Criticism: L. Michelena, Historia de la literatura vasca (1960); I. Aldekoa, Historia de la literatura vasca (2004); History of Basque Literature, ed. M. J. Olaziregi (2010).

M. J. Olaziregi

BATHOS (Gr., "depth"). Now generally used as an equivalent to the descriptive term *anticlimax, bathos entered literary use with Longinus's treatise Peri hypsous (On the Sublime), where it was a synonym for hypsos, the sublime, and meant either high or deep. To ridicule his poetic contemporaries, however, Alexander Pope wrote the satirical Peri Bathous: or, Martinus Scriblerus His Treatise of the Art of Sinking in Poetry (1727), parodying Longinus by converting praise of the sublime into mock-praise of the profound. Pope presents bathos as an attempt at elevated expression that misfires, creating a sudden transition from the sublime to the ridiculous. Pope was responding to Nicolas Boileau's Treatise of the Sublime (1674), itself a trans. of Longinus. Peri Bathous drew attention to the many deficiencies of the poetry of Pope's rivals: affectation, pertness, needless complexity, confusion, and obfuscation. Since Pope, bathos has been used to suggest an unfortunate or unintended "sinking" or deflation to create a humorously awkward juxtaposition. William Hogarth alluded to Pope with his 1764 engraving The Bathos: or, the Manner of Sinking in Sublime Paintings. The similarity to the Gr. *pathos inflects bathos with the sense of sad or pitiable. Bathos is a common technique in *parody, burlesque, and absurdist writing. Pope gives the example, "Ye Gods! Annihilate both Space and Time, / And make two Lovers happy." Elizabeth Barrett Browning produces bathos with "Our Euripides, the human — / With his droppings of warm tears" ("Wine of Cyprus," 89–90) and Alfred, Lord Tennyson with "He suddenly dropt dead of heart-disease" ("Sea Dreams," 64).

■ A. Pope, The Art of Sinking in Poetry: Martinus Scriblerus' Peri Bathous, ed. E. Leake Steeves (1952); 'Longinus' On the Sublime, ed. D. A. Russell (1964); C. Gerrard, "Pope, Peri Bathous, and the Whig Sublime," Cultures of Whiggism, ed. D. Womersley (2005).

H. Brown; S. Gee

BEAST EPIC. Comprising a vast range of global trads., incl. origin myths, wisdom lit., *comedy, and *satire, the term beast epic generally designates more or less structurally unified narratives featuring animals as characters rather than as types. A fellow traveler of cosmological and totemic trads. such as the "dreamtime" narratives of aboriginal tribes of Australia or the tales collected by the Roman poet Ovid into the Metamorphoses, the beast epic is clearly also related to single-episode forms such as the *fable. Thus, the carefully interwoven structure of the influential Sanskrit Panchatantra (The Five Principles), possibly composed in the 3d c. BCE and later translated into Persian and Ar., shows it to be more than a collection of short moral tales. Although the diversity of beast-epic trads. is remarkable, important common points remain, not least how such material maps and describes the contours of human experience, not only charting the world beyond the village but, through the mimicry of human activity and traits imputed to speaking animals, exploring our relations with those strangest of creatures, our human neighbors. In this respect, such sophisticated and subversive materials chart the edges and limits of humankind in their interrogations of social or gender conventions, as well as of the ambition of lang. to describe and tame nature.

This war between weasel words and horse sense is notably reflected in the Eur. trads. of Reynard the Fox, the first surviving tales composed in the mid- to late 12th c. in France, the centerpiece being the fox's rape of the she-wolf and the subsequent trial. These adventures illuminate social, religious, political, and legal institutions and changes, with further episodes as well as trans. and adaptations into Ger., Dutch, and Eng. following over the next three centuries. That the fox did not entirely rule med. Europe's cock-and-bull roost is clear from works featuring God's natural comedian, the ass. Following in the wake of cl. antecedents such as Apuleius's salaciously satirical Golden Ass (2d c. CE), med. examples include the Speculum stultorum (The Mirror for Fools, ca. 1180) by the Canterbury monk Nigel of Longchamps, and the quasi-apocalyptic Fr. satire Le Roman de Fauvel (ca. 1312) by Gervais de Bus, mss. of the latter often lavishly illuminated and featuring musical settings, striking testimony to the prestige accorded this material. There is also a rich trad. of "bird-debate" poems, examples being The Owl and the Nightingale (ca. 1190) and Chaucer's Parliament of Fowls (ca. 1382). While some trads. feature more or less ontologically stable creatures, such as foxes, wolves, monkeys, and spiders, in others the creature is either less defined in form or capable of transformation (examples here are the Chinese novel Journey to the West [ca. 1590] recounting the adventures of Monkey and his companions, the African Ananse stories, or the Japanese tales of magical foxes known as kitsune). Accordingly, North Am. Winnebago trickster stories center on a figure proteanly inchoate in form and character, occupying a temporality simultaneously prior to and coextensive with human hist. Thus, although a creator figure who gives rise to the first vegetables, the trickster struggles to integrate into an existing human lifeworld, sending his genitals to marry the daughter of a chief of a neighboring tribe. Lastly, although separate trads. can be identified, beast epics often reflect complex confluences and interactions, stories from Uncle Remus and Br'er Rabbit reflecting the influences of African Ananse stories as well as of native Am. trads. Taken together, this vast diversity of trads. reflects how humans have harnessed imagined animals as tools for narratives as varied and problematic as the exploitation and commoditization of actual creatures.

See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

■ Criticism and History: C. Lévi-Strauss, Totemism, trans. R. Needham (1963); K. Varty, Reynard the Fox: A Study of the Fox in Medieval English Art (1967); P. Radin, K. Kerényi, C. G. Jung, The Trickster: A Study in American Indian Mythology (1972); D. J. Haraway, Simians, Cyborgs and Women: The Reinvention of Nature (1991); M. Green, Animals in Celtic Life and Myth (1992); J. Ziolkowski, Talking Animals: Medieval Latin Beast Poetry, 750–1150 (1993); A. Plaks, "Journey to the West," Masterworks of Asian Literature in Comparative Perspective, ed. B. S. Miller (1994); J. E. Salisbury, The Beast Within: Animals in the Middle Ages (1994); J. R. Simpson, Animal Body, Literary Corpus: The Old French "Roman de Renart" (1996); K. Varty, Reynard, Renart, Reinœrt and Other Foxes in Medieval England: The Iconographic Evidence (1999); L. E. Robbins, Elephant Slaves and Pampered Parrots: Exotic Animals in Eighteenth-Century Paris (2002); B. Sax, Crow (2003); M. Bathgate, The Fox's Craft in Japanese Religion and Folklore: Shapeshifters, Transformations and Duplicities (2004); M. Wallen, Fox (2006); J. Mann, From Aesop to Reynard: Beast Literature in Medieval Britain (2009); S. Carnell, Hare (2010); K. Michalska and S. Michalski, Spider (2010).

J. SIMPSON

BEAT. The recurring pulse in a regular *rhythm. Derived from the motion of the conductor's hand or baton indicating the rhythmic pulse in music, in the analysis of verse it refers to the salient elements of a poetic *meter as experienced by the reader or listener. It is generally agreed that spoken lang. is normally too varied to allow for the emergence of beats (but see Couper-Kuhlen for a different view); metered verse, however, arranges words and sentences in controlled ways that produce a regular movement characterized by the alternation of stronger and weaker beats (or "offbeats"). When beats and offbeats are organized into the patterns enshrined in verse trad., the rhythm created is particularly strong; and once sequences of beats are perceived, the expectation is that they will continue. *Free verse and, more rarely, prose can fall into a sequence of alternating beats and offbeats, but without creating metrical patterns. The equivalent term for the beat in cl. prosody is *ictus.

Analysis of poetry in terms of beats and offbeats—"beat prosody"—emphasizes the relation of verse to music, without attempting to apply musical notation to the rhythms of lang. Both regular verse and cl. Western music are regarded as building on simple, familiar rhythmic forms, the most ubiquitous of which is the four-beat unit (which is produced by doubling a beat, then doubling it again). In the Eng. trad., the four-beat rhythm is the staple of popular verse and song, children's rhymes, advertising *jingles, and *hymns. It is also common in art verse, where, in its most straightforward realization, it becomes *iambic or *trochaic tetrameter. Most commonly, it is found in larger units also created by doubling: four-beat *couplets or, more usually, four groups of four beats. In *dipodic verse, beats alternate between stronger and weaker (an alternation that arises from the hierarchic nature of all regular rhythm).

Once a four-beat rhythm is established, the mind can perceive a beat in certain limited positions even when there is no syllable to manifest it; thus, the common *ballad meter omits the last beat of the second and fourth groups. This perceived but not actual beat is termed an "implied beat," a "virtual beat," or an "empty beat." Most line lengths in the Eng. verse trad. are based on the four-beat group or its variants, the two-beat group or the group of three beats plus an implied beat. A significant exception is the five-beat line, which does not fit easily into the four-beat rhythm, a fact that explains many of its special characteristics: it is rare in popular verse and song, it is often unrhymed, and it almost always takes the form of a strict accentual-syllabic or syllable-stress meter, the *iambic pentameter. It is thus clearly distinct from the trad. of song and closer to the rhythms of the spoken lang. (Some prosodists have argued that five-beat lines have a sixth implied beat, but this is not generally accepted.)

The strong pulse of the four-beat rhythm makes it possible to vary the number of offbeats that occur between the beats. Eng. accentual or stress verse has the greatest freedom in this respect, allowing one or two offbeats and, less frequently, three or none at all. Accentual-syllabic verse, by contrast, controls the number of syllables in the line, and hence the character of the offbeats: before or after a double offbeat, there will usually be a missing offbeat, and vice versa. Offbeats at the beginning and end of the line are less strictly controlled; four-beat verse may begin consistently with a beat or with an offbeat, or it may vary between these, as in these lines from John Milton's "L'Allegro" (where b indicates the syllables that take a beat):

And young and old come forth to play
b b b b

On a sunshine holiday,
b b b b

Till the livelong daylight fail,
b b b b

Then to the spicy nut-brown ale.
b b b b

Verse in a triple or ternary rhythm (almost always in four-beat groups) has more double offbeats than single, but it can begin and end with two, one, or no offbeats. When a duple or binary meter begins regularly with an offbeat, it may be labeled "iambic"; when it begins regularly with a beat and ends with an offbeat, it may be labeled "trochaic." When it begins and ends with a beat, it may be termed both "catalectic trochaic" (see CATALEXIS) and *"acephalous" or "headless iambic"; more simply, it is four-beat verse without initial or final offbeats.

Beats are realized by the most prominent rhythmic feature of the lang.—in Eng., by stress. However, not every stressed syllable is perceived as a beat and not every unstressed syllable as an offbeat. Under certain conditions, such as its occurrence between two stresses carrying beats, a stressed syllable can be felt as the rhythmic equivalent of an offbeat. Conversely, an unstressed syllable can, under certain conditions, such as its occurrence between two unstressed syllables functioning as offbeats, be experienced as rhythmically doing duty for a beat. These processes, *demotion and *promotion, are common in Eng. verse and derive from similar rhythmic processes in spoken Eng. They enable the poet to vary the speed and weight of the verse, the former producing a slower rhythm (since the demoted stress is still given emphasis) and the latter a quicker rhythm (since the promoted nonstress is still uttered lightly).

*Scansion of accentual-syllabic verse in terms of beats and offbeats differs from scansion in terms of cl. feet in that it does not assume the verse line to be divided into units determined by the meter. This difference is particularly evident in their accounts of the patterns / / x x and x x / /, which are frequent in Eng. iambic verse. In foot prosody, the former involves the substitution of a trochaic foot for an iambic foot (| x / | / x | x / | x / |), and the latter the substitution of a *pyrrhic and a *spondee for two iambs (| x / | x x | / / | x / |). In beat prosody, by contrast, the two successive stressed syllables are understood as two beats, and the two unstressed syllables as realizing a double offbeat. By showing the position of the beats, and the composition of the offbeats in the intervals between beats and at the beginning and end of the line, beat scansion indicates the rhythm as perceived by the reader or listener—who may have no training in cl. prosody.

See RHYTHMIC FIGURES.

■ W. B. Ker, Form and Style in Poetry (1928); G. R. Stewart, The Technique of English Verse (1930); J. Malof, "The Native Rhythm of English Meters," TSLL 5 (1964); R. Burling, Man's Many Voices (1970); G. D. Allen, "The Location of Rhythmic Stress Beats in English," L&S 15 (1972); G. Knowles, "The Rhythm of English Syllables," Lingua 34 (1974); Attridge, Rhythms; E. Couper-Kuhlen, English Speech Rhythm (1993); Attridge, Poetic Rhythm; Brendan O'Donnell, The Passion of Meter (1995)—Wordsworth's use of rhythm; Carper and Attridge; John Creaser, " 'Service Is Perfect Freedom': Paradox and Prosodic Style in Paradise Lost," RES 58 (2007).

D. ATTRIDGE

BEAT POETRY refers to the work of a group of Am. writers from the late 1940s through the mid-1960s. It rejected as claustrophobic and ethically untenable the formalism of the then-dominant *New Criticism, Southern Agrarians, and other movements that stressed the *autonomy of the work of art; its compressed, intricate, and depersonalized nature; and the "dramatic irony" that arose from its internal and strictly textual contradictions. Beat writing strove to achieve a more romantic, though mod., "marriage of Heaven and Hell" through yoking abject subject matter, often of an autobiographical and socially transgressive nature (homosexuality or other nonnormative relationships, illicit drug use, extreme states of mind, the grittiness of everyday street life, rootlessness, urban squalor, and disillusionment), with exalted spiritual aspiration and insight; the term beat invokes both beatitude and despair or destitution, being "beat down to [one's] socks," in the words of Herbert Huncke, the petty criminal, drug addict, and gifted raconteur who befriended some of the writers. (Huncke and some of the other Beat writers, members of the Times Square demimonde, participated as subjects in the Kinsey Report on Sexual Behavior in the Human Male [1948].) The term beat also refers to Af. Am. expressive culture, esp. bebop jazz, whose argot and "way-out" sound were central to the Beat lexicon and aesthetic, though the movement comprised primarily working-class "white ethnics"—first-generation Italian-, Jewish- and other Americans—whose embrace of what they perceived to be an alternative aesthetic and way of life set them apart from the upwardly mobile, conformist culture of the postwar U.S. After U.S. leftism imploded in the 1950s, the Beats embodied a cultural rather than political revolution, though their work drew on politically informed antecedents such as Am. (esp. Walt Whitman) and Br. (esp. William Blake and P. B. Shelley) *romanticism, *surrealism, and Dadaism—with an added emphasis on Eastern and Western mysticism, the Eur. poète maudit tradition, and French existentialism. Contemporaneous and geographically proximate movements that shared a poetics of open, "organic" form, spontaneity, and personal directness include the *New York and *Black Mountain schools on the East Coast, and the *San Francisco Renaissance poets on the West. Although the poetics of the Beats is best known for phrases like "first thought, best thought," "spontaneous bebop prosody," the invention of the cut-up *collage technique, and obscenity trials (most notably that of Allen Ginsberg's Howl and Other Poems [1956]), in later years Ginsberg, who had earlier characterized the Beat generation as a "boy-gang," was careful to counter the widespread impression that the Beats were literary barbarians, naming T. S. Eliot, Marcel Proust, and Herman Melville as additional influences. Recent years have also seen a recuperation of women Beats, notably Joanne Kyger, Bonnie Bremser/Brenda Frazer, Helen Adam, and Hettie Jones.

Key writers and texts include Ginsberg, Howl (1956); Jack Kerouac, On the Road (1957) and Mexico

City Blues (1959); Gregory Corso, Gasoline (1958); John Wieners, The Hotel Wentley Poems (1958); William Burroughs, Naked Lunch (1959); Ted Joans, The Hipsters (1961); LeRoi Jones/Amiri Baraka, Preface to a Twenty-Volume Suicide Note (1961), Dutchman (1964), and The System of Dante's Hell (1965); Bob Kaufman, Solitudes Crowded with Loneliness (1965); Lawrence Ferlinghetti, A Coney Island of the Mind (1968); Bremser, Troia (1969); Gary Snyder, Riprap (1969); Diane di Prima, Dinners and Nightmares (1974); Kyger, Joanne (1974); Lew Welsh, Ring of Bone (1973); also Ray Bremser, Lucien Carr, John Clellon Holmes, Philip Lamantia, Michael McClure, David Meltzer, Alexander Trocchi, ruth weiss, and Philip Whalen. Important jours. included Beatitude, The Floating Bear, Measure, City Lights Journal, Big Table/Chicago Review, Evergreen Review, and Yugen; presses included Olympia, Totem, Grove Press, City Lights, Black Sparrow, and New Directions. Institutions with Beat foundations include Naropa University's writing program (The Jack Kerouac School of Disembodied Poetics) in Boulder, CO; and the St. Mark's Poetry Project, at St. Mark's Church in the Bowery, New York City.

■ L. Lipton, Holy Barbarians (1959); F. Rigney and D. L. Smith, The Real Bohemia (1961); M. McClure, Scratching the Beat Surface (1982); M. Davidson, The San Francisco Renaissance (1989); J. A. Maynard, Venice West (1991); Beat Culture and the New America: 1950–1965, ed. L. Philips (1995); D. Cándida-Smith, Utopia and Dissent (1996); H. Jones, How I Became Hettie Jones (1996); S. Clay and R. Phillips, A Secret Location on the Lower East Side (1998); D. Belgrad, The Culture of Spontaneity (1999); Breaking the Rule of Cool, ed. R. Johnson and N. G. Campbell (2004); P. Whaley, Blows Like a Horn (2004); Norman Mailer, "Hipsters," Advertisements for Myself (2005).

M. Damon

BELARUS, POETRY OF. See RUSSIA, POETRY OF.

BELGIUM, POETRY OF

I. Dutch. See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE.

II. French. Med. Belgian lyric poetry underwent important devels.—as much in religious as in *epic, mystical, or courtly genres—in the feudal principalities that were the foundation of the country. Likewise, during the 16th and 17th cs. under the Burgundian dynasty, Chambers of Rhetoric prospered whose trads. of formal *invention and *irony are undoubtedly similar to certain aspects of mod. poetry in Belgium. The production of original poetry, in Fr. as well as in Dutch, declined when the Netherlands, while retaining its constitution, found itself subservient to Madrid or Vienna (1585–1795).

This section concerns the production of poetry in Fr. that began after the Battle of Waterloo (1815) in the territories of the Catholic Netherlands and the Principality of Liège. The contours of a new Europe were being drawn, a Europe in which nationalist revolutions would break out, incl. the Belgian Revolution of 1830. In this setting, the concept of national lit. was affirmed, and the problem of francophone lits. was worked out; in this, the Belgian literary field was not merely a laboratory but the first great incubator, even if those interested in such questions take into account what was happening at the same time in Haiti and Switzerland. In the romantic period, freed from their imposed union with Holland, Belgian poets such as Théodore Weustenraad (1805–49), André van Hasselt (1806–74), and A.C.G. Mathieu (1804–76) used diverse forms of Fr. verse to celebrate the various industrial realizations of its modernity. As early as the 1820s, poets began to take liberties with dominant Fr. literary models, but it was not until the 1880s and 1890s that a distinctive Belgian Fr. poetry emerged, although one related to larger trends in Europe at the end of the century.

Some of these, in the Fr.-speaking world, arose in a country that hist., through its various means, had better prepared than others to break from the cl. Fr. *canon. This condition brought the generation called the Jeunes Belgique (Young Belgium) to take over the mysteries of *symbolism, the stylistic audacity of Arthur Rimbaud and the Comte de Lautréamont (both of them published in Belgium), as well as Stéphane Mallarmé's encouragement. They thus asserted a specific literary identity recognized very quickly—and first of all in other countries—without claiming it as a national possession.

Émile Verhaeren (1855–1916) with Les Campagnes hallucinées (The Hallucinated Countryside, 1893) and Les Villes tentaculaires (The Tentacular Cities, 1895); Georges Rodenbach (1855–98) with Le Règne du silence (The Reign of Silence, 1891); Charles van Lerberghe (1861–1907) with La Chanson d'Ève (The Song of Eve, 1904); Max Elskamp (1862–1931) with Dominical (Sunday Prayer, 1892); and the Nobel laureate Maurice Maeterlinck (1862–1949) with Serres chaudes (Hot Houses, 1899) gave to francophone as well as to world lit. works of note and influence. E.g., Antonin Artaud claimed the six Hot Houses in verse as an inspiration (see SURREALISM); the It. Crepuscolari (Twilight Poets; see ITALY, POETRY OF) would be incomprehensible without Rodenbach's stimulus, as Ger. *expressionism would be without Verhaeren's poetic upheaval.

These innovators distanced themselves from their peers such as Albert Giraud (1860–1929), Iwan Gilkin (1858–1924), and Valère Gille (1867–1950) who wanted to remain faithful to *Parnassianism and to the Fr. trad. These divisions, which persisted a long time, reached to the very heart of the francophone world. The ruptures of World War I and the Rus. Revolution only served to deepen them.

The flourishing of the avant-garde and a new set of exchanges with Paris followed on these beginnings. *Dadaism found a special radicalism in Clément Pansaers (1885–1922), author of Le Pan-Pan au cul du nu nègre (Pan-Pan at the Negro Nude's Ass, 1920), who called very early for the end of the movement by its own logic. In Brussels, a surrealist movement appeared around Paul Nougé (1895–1967) as early as 1924—one that has been both compared to and differentiated from the one led by André Breton in Paris at the same time. The group's mistrust of the literary world, the clear distinction between the rules of political activity and those of writing or painting, and the very Belgian refusal to believe the evidence of lang. engendered production fundamental to the hist. of surrealism.

Of a rare quality and impertinence, as well as an exceptional rigor, this aesthetic and ethical endeavor is inscribed in the titles of the two Nougian summas collected by Marcel Mariën (1920–93)—Histoire de ne pas rire (A Story of Not Laughing, 1956) and L'Expérience continue (The Continuous Experience or The Experience Continues, 1966)—and in this precept: "exégètes, pour y voir clair, rayez le mot surréalisme" (exegetes, to see clearly, scratch out the word surrealism). Invented and shared by Marcel Lecomte (1900–66), Louis Scutenaire (1905–87), Camille Goemans (1900–60), André Souris (1899–1970), Paul Colinet (1898–1957), Irène Hamoir (1906–94), Édouard Léon Théodore Mesens (1903–71), and René Magritte (1898–1967), this movement unfolded outside any literary milieu, in a sort of inscribed parenthesis and in a filiation or reinvention between Ger. romanticism and revolution. Entirely coherent, this strand is fundamental to those artistic approaches that exhausted all the methods of the time, incl. advertising.

This inclusivity distinguishes Belgian surrealism from the lyricism that characterizes the work of Achille Chavée (1906–69), of Hainaut, who was faithful to the precepts of Fr. surrealism, and of his follower, Fernand Dumont (1906–45), the post-Nervalian surrealist who wrote La Région du cœur (The Region of the Heart, 1939) and La Dialectique du hasard au service du désir (Dialectic of Chance in the Service of Desire, 1979). There was lyricism, too, in the work of Charles Plisnier (1896–1952), who was also actively engaged on the Left and who found the means of expressing this engagement—which the followers of Nougé rejected—in the form of the spoken *choruses, such as Odes pour retrouver les hommes (Odes to Rediscover Men, 1935) and Sel de la terre (Salt of the Earth, 1936).

Close to the modernists whose postulates the surrealists violently contested (among these, Pierre Bourgeois [1898–1976], editor of the Journal des poètes), Géo Norge (1898–1990), for his part, aims to plunge to the carnal heart of a Langue verte (green language) that he celebrates and puts to work with relish in Les Oignons (The Onions, 1953) and Le Vin profond (The Deep Wine, 1968).

This trust in the Fr. lang. and trad. likewise declined, though with entirely different connotations, in the works of Marcel Thiry (1897–1977), such as Toi qui pâlis au nom de Vancouver (You Who Pale at the Name Vancouver, 1924). Thiry expressed this lack of faith in Le Poème et la langue (The Poem and the Language, 1967) by opposing his vision to that of Henri Michaux (1899–1984), whose plunges into words and traits sought the instinctual, the irrational, and the irregular—in works such as La Nuit remue (Darkness Moves, 1935), L'Infini turbulent (Infinite Turbulence, 1957), and Face à ce qui se dérobe (Facing the Evasive, 1976). Michaux, whose first works were close to those of Goemans, nevertheless held himself at a distance from the surrealists, even if he did dedicate to Magritte one text strongly expressive of the surrealists' mode of being and of doing: En Rêvant à partir de peintures énigmatiques (Dreaming from Enigmatic Paintings, 1972). Furthermore, as early as 1924 in the Transatlantic Review, he explained how his poetics aimed to differ from that of his Belgian forefathers.

If Thiry led his reader out of the rural world, notably into the various colonies and trading posts of the planet and into industry, it was to this old harmonized world that Maurice Carême (1899–1978), whose texts such as Mère (Mother, 1935) and Petites Légendes (Little Legends, 1949) are everywhere in primary schools, preferred to return. The tormented universes of Jean de Boschère (1878–1953) are completely different in Job le pauvre (Job the Poor, 1923) and Derniers poèmes de l'obscur (Last Poems from the Darkness, 1948), whose wild lyricism is that of the aesthete and the poète maudit*, as such is equally the case of René Verboom (1891–1955) in La Courbe ardente (The Burning Curve, 1922) and of Paul Desmeth (1883–1970), whose dandyism is distilled into a book much rewritten, Simplifications (1932).

The period after 1945 yielded a poetic scene even more divided than what had preceded it, but it broadened the already excellent diversity of the interwar years. Under the rubric of La Belgique sauvage, one could find the various modulations of the avant-garde, groups such as Les Lèvres nues (The Naked Lips), Phantòmas, Daily-Bul, Temps Mêlés (Mixed Times), and Le Vocatif (The Vocative). Internationally, the most prominent such venture was CoBrA (named for Copenhagen–Brussels–Amsterdam), led by Christian Dotremont (1922–79), who transformed an old house in Brussels into a center for collective innovation in both poetry and sculpture. Dedicated to finding the origin of the corporeal, this team (incl. Asger Jorn [1914–73], Karel Appel [1921–2006], and the painters known as Constant [1920–2005] and Corneille [1922–2010]), which stayed together for three years, took a break from relations with the Communist Party and displaced some key objectives of surrealism.

Next Dotremont became involved in the adventure that would lead him, via his travels to Laponia, to the invention in 1962 of logograms. On a blank sheet of paper of variable dimensions, a dancing line of China ink was traced, in the manner of the most personal of writings, which the writer-sculptor next transcribed to the underside of the page, in small penciled letters. This is how the sensory and cognitive simultaneity that haunts a major segment of Belgian poetry was attained and how the author of De loin aussi d'ici (From Afar as from Here, 1973) completed his research.

The years after the war also witnessed the devel. of the work of another writer-artist active from the 1920s, Michel Seuphor (1901–99), whom the publisher Rougerie strove to keep in print even as the artist's word paintings proliferated.

Other works, exceptions to the norm, appeared at the edges of the avant-garde. So it was with François Jacqmin (1929–92), an adolescent whom the hazards of the war took from Fr. to Eng., then from Eng. to Fr. In Les Saisons (The Seasons, 1979) and Le Livre de la neige (The Book of the Snow, 1990), his lucid lang. creates a relationship (to the natural world as to the self) of dissolution and absorption; he emphasizes the conjunction of mistrust and ineluctability inherent in the literary work. Jacqmin's mix of distance and sensibility is not that of Max Loreau (1928–90), the acute commentator of Dotremont and of Michaux and the high-flying philosopher of La Genèse du phénomène (The Origin of Phenomena, 1989), whose radical modernity tries to break lang. in order to reintroduce a lyrical celebration of the world: Cri (Scream, 1973), Chants de perpétuelle venue (Songs of Perpetual Arrival, 1977), Florence portée aux nues (Florence on a Pedestal, 1986).

In the next generation, the Belgian members of the Fr. group TXT, Éric Clemens (b. 1945) and Jean Pierre Verheggen (b. 1942), continued this experimentation with lang. Verheggen—author of Le Degré zorro de l'écriture (The Zorro Degree of Writing, 1978), Divan le terrible (Divan the Terrible, 1979), and Sodome et Grammaire (Sodom and Grammar, 2008)—infused his work with a great Rabelaisian character not unfamiliar to the emblem of Belgian letters in the 19th c., Tyl Eulenspiegel. Finally, in the surrealist circle of influence, Tom Gutt (1941–2002) produced some of the most beautiful love poems in Belgian lit.

Still, the desire to conform to Fr. models had not disappeared. It dominated Belgian poetry institutionally in the years after the war. But if this tendency—exemplified by Serge Vandercam (1924–2005), Robert Vivier (1894–1989), Jean Mogin (1921–86), Charles Bertin (1919–2003), Jean Tordeur (1920–2010), and Arthur Haulot (1913–2005)—wanted to combine the internalization of Fr. ideology (and its universality) with the celebration of humanist values destined to conjure up the ghosts of Nazi abjectness, it also led to works that opened a worldwide dialogue. Thus are the cases of Roger Bodart (1910–73) in Le Nègre de Chicago (The Negro from Chicago, 1958) and Fernand Verhesen (1913–2009), the smuggler of Latin Am. lits. There was also some beautiful reshuffling of trad.: Philippe Jones's (b. 1924) filtered restitution of sensory evidence; Liliane Wouters's (b. 1930) fusion with the Flemish trad.; and Henry Bauchau's (b. 1913) return to the very old rhythms of lang. in poetic works that constitute the matrix and the tension point of fiction. A unique and admirable work of this generation was Roger Goossens's (1903–54) Magie familière (Familiar Magic, 1956).

Likewise, but in a very different way, for the next generation: Sophie Podolski's (1953–74) Le pays où tout est permis (The Country Where Everything Is Allowed, 1974) was charred by the universe of repression. During this period, Claire Lejeune (1926–2008), who plunged next into the essay, destined to facilitate the social birth of the poetic, wrote Mémoire de rien (Memory of Nothing, 1972), a masterpiece—along with Françoise Delcarte's (1936–95) Sables (Sands, 1969)—of postwar women's poetry, haunted by modernity. This moment also saw William Cliff (b. 1940) charge onto the literary scene with a return to cl. verse in a narrative sequence of the blessings and misfortunes of a homosexual lifestyle (Homo sum, 1973); and Eugène Savitzkaya (b. 1955) in L'Empire (1976) and Mongolie plaine sale (Mongolia, Dirty Plain, 1976), who pulverizes Fr. phrases to let loose verbal hordes.

Off the beaten paths of the avant-garde and strict classicism but trusting in the strengths of poetry, various strands that evolved in the 1970s nevertheless refer to Heideggerian dogma. In Promenoir magique (Magical Promenade, 2009), Jean-Claude Pirotte (b. 1939) made concise Fr. the site of his renewal; in Werner Lambersy's (b. 1941) Maîtres et maisons de thé (Masters and Tea Houses, 1979) is a response to Asian culture. In Jacques Izoard (1936–2008), we find baroque sensuality surrounded by harsh metrics. In Christian Hubin's (b. 1941) La Parole sans lieu (The Word without Place, 1975), there is the dread of the rift and the threshold, while in Frans De Haes's (b. 1948) Terrasses et Tableaux (Terraces and Paintings, 2007), we find the pregnancy of the Bible and post-Tel Quel* ling. work. Finally, there is the constant interrogation of the absence of the Other in Yves Namur's (b. 1952) Le Livre des Sept Portes (The Book of Seven Doors, 1994).

Rooted in the Walloon soil, certain poets produced works that further escaped the effects of the Francocentric literary world. In Les Prodiges ordinaires (The Ordinary Prodigies, 1991), André Schmitz (b. 1929) worked though contraction and attained the density of a carnal tragedy tamed, while Claude Bauwens (b. 1939) follows his white dream of return to the forgetting of oneself in L'Avant-Mère (The Pre-Mother, 1975) and Paul André (1941–2008) returns to the magic of a natural being-in-the-world in C'est (It is, 1995). Those who, like Guy Goffette (b. 1947) in Éloge pour une cuisine de province (Praise for a Provincial Kitchen, 1988) or Lucien Noullez (b. 1957) in Comme un pommier (Like an Apple Tree, 1997), left these rural shores far away from centers of cultural recognition, played, all the same, from a different score, a score that their childhoods continued to nourish deeply. This offers them a foundation that distances them from exaggerated *modernism and *postmodernism.

François Muir (1955–97), in La Tentation du visage (The Temptation of the Face, 1998), did not find these types of relative balance. Essentially published posthumously and completely iridescent, his life's work is—with Schmitz's—the most enigmatic, most consistent, and most intriguing of the last decades.

■ Anthologies: Poètes français de Belgique de Verhaeren au surréalisme, ed. R. Guiette (1948); Lyra Belgica, trans. C. and F. Stillman, 2 v. (1950–51); Anthologie du surréalisme en Belgique, ed. C. Bussy (1972); Panorama de la poésie française de Belgique, ed. L. Wouters and J. Antoine (1976); La poésie francophone de Belgique, ed. L. Wouters and A. Bosquet, 4 v. (1985–).

■ Criticism and History: G. Charlier and J. Hanse, Histoire illustrée des lettres françaises de Belgique (1958); R. Frickx and R. Burniaux, La littérature belge d'expression française (1980); M. Quaghebeur, Alphabet des lettres belges de langue française (1982); R. Frickx and R. Trousson, Lettres françaises de Belgique, Dictionnaire des œuvres, v. 2: La Poésie (1988); A.-M. Beckers, Lire les écrivains belges, 3 v. (1985–); C. Berg and P. Halen, Littératures belges de langue française (2000); J. P. Bertrand et al., Histoire de la littérature belge (2003).

M. Quaghebeur

BELIEF AND POETRY

I. Classical to Early Modern
II. Early Modern to the Present

I. Classical to Early Modern. The question of belief and poetry was posed as such only in the mod. period, but since virtually every narrative or discursive utterance claims some kind of assent, these claims naturally have received critical attention since cl. antiquity. *Classical poetics, beginning from rhetorical principles, characteristically took conventional beliefs and common sense as normative and sought to avoid conflict with them. Since audiences cannot be instructed or delighted by a poem whose premises or claims they actively reject, the poet must secure their acquiescence as efficiently as possible; to this end, Horace gives the advice to "follow convention, or at least be consistent" (Ars poetica). Even Aristotle, who trenchantly distinguished poetry from rhet., took the world of common apprehension to be the object of poetic imitation. Conventional beliefs thus stood as the measure not only of incident but of style, design, and character through Gr. and Roman antiquity.

But as Aristotle recognized, implied in even the most straightforwardly rhetorical address were two claims with a longer reach. First, the very aim of rhetorical persuasion supposes that artful speech can shape and alter those conventional beliefs. Cicero's and Quintilian's insistence that eloquence can turn destructive if wisdom does not steer it affirms its power over the mind; in Longinus, this power becomes an aesthetic value apart from any persuasive end it might serve. Second, rhet.'s status as a form of systematic knowledge supposes that there is something systematic, something enduring and natural, about what sways audiences; conventions may thus disclose the intelligible structures of the real. Aristotle treats the "probable" (eikos) as the proper object of imitative composition not merely because audiences accept it but because their acceptance reveals it as the locus of poetry's distinctive truth-claims. By its skillful presentation, poetry could precipitate the universal from its dispersal into particulars and present it to view.

In defending poetry as a kind of knowledge, Aristotle answered the powerful crit. of eloquence and *imitation voiced by Plato, who agreed with the rhetoricians that their enterprise was mortgaged to popular judgment and deplored the fact. Plato's Republic says that the artist, bound to flatter his audience's judgment, is like a trainer who has become slave to his animals' whims. He famously argued that imitative art is illusory art, really distancing and coarsening what it seems to present closely and in detail. Poems conspire with popular error to obscure truth; philosophy must work against both, to clarify truth and reform belief. He thus cast both conventional perception and its artistic representation as forms of what later would be called ideology and cast philosophy as its critique. Plato did not explicitly entertain the possibility that imitative art might itself conduct such critique.

Christianity did. Requiring belief in a truth exigent but nonevident and seeking coherent exposition of that truth in the apparent incoherence of the Bible, it devised an account of literary form and *figuration that found in them resources for conducting the critique Plato sought from philosophy and so for reforming belief. The crucial figure is St. Augustine. From Plato, via Plotinus, he borrowed the thought that the empirical world is a "region of dissimilitude" holding the real at bay; from the exegetical principles exemplified by St. Paul (Gal 4:22–31) and developed by Origen and St. Ambrose, he developed an account of figurative expression as *allegory meant to overcome dissimilitude. His De doctrina christiana (On Christian Doctrine) describes how the abrupt and enigmatic expressive surface of the biblical text, refusing to supply what the mind finds comfortable, forces it to adapt to meanings more vexing and consequential. In the Middle Ages, these techniques of *interpretation became codified as academic procedure (with its most succinct and profound account in Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica 1q.1a.10) and as a didactic and homiletic device, offering *medieval poetry a means to make both serious and subversive claims to belief. The letter to Can Grande della Scala, controversially attributed to Dante, illustrates how med. thinkers could treat formal biblical exegesis as a model for composition.

II. Early Modern to the Present. The med. emphasis on *hermeneutics and the apprehension of difficult truths in poetry were typically rejected by Ren. humanists, who emphasized instead the persuasive power of poetic fictions. That power was modeled on the force of divine inspiration, but it was attributed to the ability of poetry to move the reader through imaginative constructs rather than appealing to the transcendent ground of belief. Defending poetry against the charge of telling lies, Philip Sidney noted that the poet was not constrained to the "bare was" of the historian but nonetheless was incapable of lying because he never claimed to be telling the truth: "what child is there, coming to a play, and seeing Thebes written in great letters upon an old door, doth believe that it is Thebes?" (Defence of Poesy, 1595); instead, as J. C. Scaliger put it succinctly, the poet "imitates the truth by fiction" (Poetices libri septem [Seven Books of Poetics], 1561).

The Augustinian emphasis on the revelatory power of metaphorical lang. was countered in the Reformation by an interest in the literal or historical meaning of biblical narrative that characterized much Protestant hermeneutics. This historicism at times challenged

Scholastic claims about the ultimate clarity and significance of mystical signs, esp. as those claims depended on belief or revelation rather than historical corroboration and a close reading of the scriptural text. Literary consequences of the Reformers' interest in hist. and referential lang. were mixed. It clearly reinforced the nascent realism underlying develop. of the early novel, but it also led to the Puritans' iconoclastic rejection of metaphorical signs and imaginative expression of all forms.

Ambivalence about the role of belief in reading and interpretation persisted into the neoclassical era, where it often led to increasingly tenuous and contradictory claims about the centrality of belief to the impact of poetry and drama on their readers and audience. Fr. neoclassicists, e.g., often insisted on strict verisimilitude in drama because they feared audiences would not respond to representations of actions on stage if they could not believe those actions were real, at least temporarily and provisionally. Samuel Johnson, on the other hand, defended Shakespeare against Fr. charges that his work was not credible because it lacked such close correspondence to the world. Shakespeare's work is, in fact, a "mirror of life," Johnson claimed, but qualified that assertion by adding ironically that "it is credited with all the credit due to a drama" ("Preface to Shakespeare," 1765).

Johnson's deliberately paradoxical claim underscores the obvious logical problems of trying to defend lit. on the basis of credibility or belief. At the end of the 18th c., Immanuel Kant avoided those problems by significantly shifting the grounds of the argument. He insisted on the purely subjective basis of aesthetic experience, turning attention from mimetic connections between the work and the world to the effect of the work on the audience. Kant claimed that aesthetic judgments of beauty derived from a purely disinterested sense of pleasure and harmony within the mind of the viewer or reader. Effects of belief associated with those experiences were merely projections of subjective feelings "as if" they were properties of objects in the world or direct manifestations of a transcendent or "supersensible" substratum or spirit or reason, which could only be vaguely intuited in our present condition (Kritik der Urteilskraft [Critique of Judgment], 1790).

The epistemological skepticism that characterized Kant's aesthetics was quickly abandoned by the Ger. idealists, who replaced Kant's "as if" with a metaphysics of presence that treated poetry as a direct manifestation of spirit in matter. The influence of Ger. idealism on Eng. poetics was felt most directly through the work of S. T. Coleridge and his attribution of "organic form" to poetry, but Coleridge still insisted on the importance of an active, vital *imagination that "struggles to idealize and unify" elements of the poetic symbol in the act of perception. Thus, despite his insistence on the metaphysical union of idea and image, or subject and object, in poetry, Coleridge's emphasis on the role of the imagination in reading recalled the paradoxical claims of Sidney and Johnson. Coleridge argued that, to accomplish its ends, poetry must induce in the reader a "willing suspension of disbelief," a state that inspired the emotive power of belief without a corollary degree of conviction about the truth or credibility of the work of art as a manifestation or imitation of some transcendent truth (Biographia Literaria, 1817).

Karl Marx rejected the claims of Ger. idealism and *romanticism, along with the whole realm of the spirit, as ideological illusions masking the material grounds of lived experience, but the idea of a uniquely poetic form of belief persisted in Anglo-Am. poetics. Matthew Arnold defended poetry as offering the emotional satisfaction of belief without the insistence on a specific doctrine or faith as required by religion and without competing with science for rational commitment and empirical verification ("The Study of Poetry," 1880; "Literature and Science," 1882). Such satisfaction was possible, Richards later claimed, because of differences between poetic and ordinary lang. Although statements made by the poem resemble the truth-claims of science and religion, they are, in fact, *"pseudo-statements" that function as part of the "emotive" discourse of poetry, as opposed to the "referential" discourse of science. Richards distinguished between "intellectual belief" and "emotional belief" (1929), and he said that, rather than asking us to suspend disbelief, a successful poem will evoke emotional beliefs that will be held in balance with other emotional beliefs in terms of the poem rather than tested and resolved in the external world.

Similarly, although T. S. Eliot embraced a much more orthodox notion of belief in his later poetry and religious faith, he claimed that poetry is less about the content of the beliefs than about how it feels for one to hold them. Beliefs are merely the raw material of poetry, Eliot said; the poet is more properly concerned with their "emotional equivalents" as expressed in the poem through their *objective correlatives. Together, Eliot and Richards turned poetics away from the question of belief as doctrine or a state of mind and toward the formalist concerns that occupied Am. crit. in the decades following World War II. New Critics such as Brooks, viewing the poem as an autonomous object, argued that poetic statements of belief existed only as dramatic utterances that functioned solely in the context of the poem. As Brooks argued in "Irony as a Principle of Structure" (1949), a poem should so accurately dramatize a situation that "it is no longer a question of our beliefs, but of our participation in the poetic experience" (see NEW CRITICISM).

In the 1970s, *poststructuralism extended this paradoxical, self-referential, highly qualified status of belief in poetry into a sweeping critique of metaphysical foundations in all forms of discourse. Derrida attributed the claims of belief in philosophy and religion, e.g., to the same self-cancelling properties of lang. traditionally associated with poetic tropes. Foucault and new varieties of Marxian analysis (e.g., Jameson and Louis Althusser) similarly portrayed belief along with more general categories of truth and meaning as mere effects of power produced by the discursive regulation of society. In de Certeau's terms, belief was thus "exhausted" of its content and could best be characterized by the subject's investment in the propositional "act" of making a statement and considering it as true. The result, de Certeau says, is an extension of the constitutive power of narrative beyond the traditional self-referential boundaries of literary fiction to create a société récitée, a society of stories in which belief is constituted through an endless citation and recitation of fictional propositions that create a simulacrum of the real. For Bourdieu, one of the most important stories told by society is that of art itself; he argued that the author, the work, and their critics and supporters were inextricably implicated in a field of cultural production that creates and sustains a "circle of belief" in the value and significance of art in society.

Critics of poststructuralism often condemned this rejection of any transcendent content for belief as antihumanist nihilism, but even among the poststructuralists, many theorists remained profoundly interested in the subjective experience of belief as a product of the individual's engagement with lang. and lit. in particular. Derrida argued that, prior to any specific philosophical content, "poetry and literature provide or facilitate 'phenomenological' access to what makes of a thesis a thesis as such a nonthetic experience of the thesis, of belief." In his later work, Derrida often focused on a nonfoundational form of "spectral" belief derived from theology and metaphysics but closely resembling the self-conscious illusions of traditional poetics. Similarly, Vattimo (1985) described the experience of belief as what Martin Heidegger called the Zeigen or "showing" of poetic lang., an entirely provisional event in time contrary to the constraints and finality of metaphysical certainty. This interest in belief as a dimension of the reader's interaction with lang. could also be found in the reader-oriented analysis of Rezeptionstheorie in the work of Iser and Jauss, with its debt to the hermeneutic theory of Friedrich Schleiermacher and other Ger. theologians. It also reflects the more general renewal of religious themes in contemp. phenomenology, esp. in conjunction with lang. as in the work of Ricoeur.

In the latter half of the 20th c., there was a renewed interest (by Abrams, Fraser, and Scott) in poets for whom belief was a central theme. A wide range of theorists revived the traditional poetical question of whether the relation between the poetic work and the world beyond it can best be described as "epiphanic" (Taylor) or "iconic" (Marion). Alternately, Bloom redefined belief in psychoanalytical terms as an agonistic struggle for creative autonomy in which the poet is willing to "ruin the sacred truths to fable and old song," to disbelieve in those truths and so make possible a belief in himself as "a sect of one" (see INFLUENCE). The result would be a form of subjectivity that transcends poststructuralist nihilism and confounds distinctions between literary meaning and religious belief. Arguing that there can be no reasoning or belief without words, the neopragmatist Rorty generalized Bloom's definition of the strong poet as a creator of new langs. to argue that reading poetry makes us more fully human by enriching vocabularies and lang. as a tool for coping with reality. Rorty's claim, in turn, led Poirier to argue that neopragmatism is "essentially a poetic theory" about how belief is contingent upon poetics.

This attention to the experience of belief among Rorty, Poirier, and other neopragmatists such as West and Mailloux is only one part of the so-called religious or theological turn in critical theory at the beginning of the 21st c. Renewed interest in the efficacy and significance of belief and religion extended well beyond the concerns of traditional poetics and encompassed many different theoretical and philosophical movements. In response to what Vattimo called pensiero debole (weak thought) or the general "thinning out" of belief in contemp. society, MacIntyre, Hauerwas, Milbank, and other so-called New Traditionalists attempted to defend traditional beliefs—particularly those of the Aristotelian-Thomistic trad.—against secular liberalism (cf. Stout). According to the New Traditionalists, mod. liberal democracies undermine traditional beliefs and narratives and, as a result, make it impossible to sustain the virtues necessary to confront any major ethical-moral challenge. Conversely, in a book-length debate on belief between the neo-Marxist, Lacanian atheist Slavoj Žižek and the Anglo-Catholic theologian Milbank, Žižek insisted that Milbank's beliefs are illusions; but, following Badiou, Žižek argued that illusions can be useful for militant revolutionary politics if the revolutionaries believe in them. This emphasis on the pragmatic efficacy of belief apart from any transcendent or doctrinal content thus returned the political and philosophical dispute to its literary origins and the "willing suspension of disbelief" that grants tremendous power to poetry but protects literary illusions from the specious certainty of metaphysical delusion.

See EXEGESIS, FORMALISM, MIMESIS, NEOCLASSICAL POETICS, PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY, READER, RELIGION AND POETRY, RENAISSANCE POETICS, RHETORIC AND POETRY, ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS.

■ I. A. Richards, "Poetry and Beliefs," Science and Poetry (1926); and Practical Criticism (1929); T. S. Eliot, The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (1933); H.-I. Marrou, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (1939); Brooks, "The Heresy of Paraphrase," "The Problem of Belief and the Problem of Cognition," "The Well Wrought Urn" (1947); W. J. Rooney, The Problem of Poetry and Belief in Contemporary Criticism (1949); Eliot, Essays, "Dante"; M. Heidegger, "Der Ursprung des Kunstwerkes" (1935), Gesamtausgabe, v. 5 (1950); M. C. Brooks, "Irony as a Principle of Structure," Literary Opinion in America, ed. M. D. Zabel (1951); Wellek, v. 1: The Later Eighteenth Century; Literature and Belief, ed. M. H. Abrams (1958); Heidegger, "Die Sprache" (1950), Unterwegs zur Sprache (1959); Weinberg; D. W. Robertson Jr., A Preface to Chaucer (1962); P. Courcelle, Les Confessions de Saint Augustin dans la tradition littéraire: antécédents et postérité (1963); E. Auerbach, Literary Language and Its Public in Late Antiquity and in the Middle Ages, trans. R. Manheim (1965); J. Derrida, La voix et le phénoméne

(1967); M. Foucault, L'archéologie du savoir (1969); W. Iser, The Implied Reader (1974); P. Bourdieu, "La production de la croyance," Actes de la recherche en sciences sociales 13 (1977); M. De Certeau, L'invention du quotidien (1980); F. Jameson, The Political Unconscious (1981); H. R. Jauss, Toward an Aesthetic of Reception, trans. T. Bahti (1982); R. Rorty, Consequences of Pragmatism (1982); A. MacIntyre, After Virtue (1984); H. Fraser, Beauty and Belief (1985); N. Scott, The Poetics of Belief (1985); G. Vattimo, La fine della modernità (1985); C. West, The American Evasion of Philosophy (1989); H. Bloom, Ruin the Sacred Truths (1989); S. Hauerwas and W. Willimon, Resident Aliens (1989); C. Taylor, Sources of the Self (1989); J. Milbank, Theology and Social Theory (1990); P. Ricoeur, "Expérience et langage dans le discours religieux," Phénoménolgie et théologie, ed. J.-F. Courtine (1991); R. Poirier, Poetry and Pragmatism (1992); J. Derrida, "Foi et savoir: les deux sources de la 'religion' aux limites de la simple raison," La religion, ed. J. Derrida and G. Vattimo (1996); G. Vattimo, Credere di credere (1996); A. Badiou, Saint Paul (1997); J.-L. Marion, Etant donné (1997); Henri de Lubac, Medieval Exegesis: The Four Senses of Scripture, trans. M. Sebanc, 4 v. (1998); S. Hauerwas, With the Grain of the Universe (2001); S. Žižek, On Belief (2001); J. Stout, Democracy and Tradition (2004); S. Mailloux, Disciplinary Identities (2006); S. Žižek and J. Milbank, The Monstrosity of Christ (2009).

M. Krieger; S. Justice (Cl. to Early Mod.);
M. P. Clark, T. K. Sung (Early Mod. to Present)

BENGALI POETRY. The Bengali lang., or Bangla, is a New Indo-Aryan speech of the northeastern part of the Indian subcontinent. The hist. of Bengali lang. and lit. closely links it to the neighboring Assamese, Oriya, and, to a lesser extent in the mod. period, to Maithili. Except for a few commentaries composed in Assam in the 16th c. CE, prose was not used in Bengali lit. before the 18th c.

The first poems in proto-Bengali were preserved in the collection of the Caryā songs composed by Buddhist saints in the 11th c. CE. Discovered in 1907 in Nepal, the Caryā songs were not known by later premod. Bengali authors.

Premod. Bengali poetry may be divided into short and long forms. Both forms contained lyrical aspects; performance was a central feature of their composition. The Bengali narrative verse par excellence from the 14th c. is the payāra. The payāra is a syllabic meter of 14 feet with a *caesura after the eighth that follows a plain rhyme scheme (aa, bb, cc . . .). Lyrical and descriptive passages are usually composed in tripadī, a slightly more complex verse with two caesurae and an internal rhyme. Tripadīs are also arranged in *distichs with the same rhyming pattern as the payāra. Short forms usually use tripadī and other meters borrowed from Sanskrit.

The short forms, or *pada*s, heavily drew on the subject of the love between Kṛṣṇa, the incarnation of the Hindu god Viṣṇu, and the cowherd Rādhā. Each poem is a vignette treating one episode of their relationship. Thus, the poem belongs to a wider narrative frame from which it derives its meaning and character. The main themes are love in union (sambhoga) and love in separation (viraha). The models of this lit. lie in the Sanskrit Gītagovinda of Jayadeva (12th c.) and the Maithili poems of Vidyāpati Ṭhākura (14th c.). Caṇḍīdāsa, who composed the Śrīkṛṣṇakīrtana (ca. 14th c.), is the first Bengali poet known to have used this theme. The love between Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa illustrated both the mundane ideal of courtly love and the spiritual stages of the devotee. From the 16th c. onward, with the devel. of the sect founded by Caitanya (1486–1533), a rich lit. was composed on this theme. The love between Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa became the archetype of the amatory relationship in Bengali poetry; moreover, Muslim authors also composed poetry in this vein.

Long forms are mainly represented by the pā̃cāli tradition. The term pā̃cāli refers to a mode of performance combining the declamation of a narrative poem interspersed with more lyrical parts accompanied by music and dance. The first pā̃cālis were adaptations from Sanskrit lit. The Rāmāyaṇa of Kṛttivāsa (ca. 15th c.) or Mālādhara Vasu's Śrīkṛṣṇavijaya (The Victory of Lord Kṛṣṇa) were pā̃cālis of this kind. Some typical texts of Bengal called *mangalakāvya*s (propitiatory poems) narrate how a goddess imposed her worship among humans in the region. The hagiographic work entitled Caitanyacaritāmṛta of Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja (ca. 1517–1615)—about the life and doctrine of Caitanya—pertained to some extent to the poetics of the pā̃cāli. Muslim poets such as Saiyad Sultān (fl. 1584) adapted stories of the prophets of Islam from the Persian and Ar. using the same form. Similarly, other poets like Ālāol (fl. 1651–71) who lived in Arakan, in mod. Myanmar, translated and adapted Hindi and Persian Sufi romances into Bengali. Other important themes of pā̃cāli poetry are the stories of mythic figures like Satyapīra who belong to both Hindu and Islamic cultures in Bengal.

While premod. poetical forms continue today, Bengali poetry underwent major changes during the 18th and early 19th cs. Bhāratacandra (1712–60) was a clerk and a court poet who integrated historical themes in the pā̃cāli trad. In the early 19th c., Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1824–73), a polyglot poet and dramatist familiar with both Indian and Western cl. langs. and lits., introduced *blank verse into Bengali as well as the *sonnet. He composed the Meghanādavadha kāvya (The Slaying of Meghanada, 1861), an *epic poem resorting to the poetics of Gr. tragedy but based on an episode of the Sanskrit Rāmāyaṇa.

The versatile author of thousands of poems and songs Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941), known as the "universal poet" (viśvakavi), is a landmark of mod. Bengali poetry. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1913 for an Eng. version of his Bengali Gitanjali (Song Offerings, 1910). Tagore reshaped traditional topoi through his distinctive genius, thus illustrating the larger dynamics at work in the Bengali literary trad. between the end of the 19th and the first decades of the 20th cs. The Indian and Bangladeshi national *anthems are songs composed by Tagore.

Kazi Nazrul Islam (1899–1976), the "rebel poet" (vidrohī kavi), was also a prolific songwriter. The themes of his poetry are variegated. He translated Persian poems of Ḥāfiẓ (1315–89) and composed devotional works dedicated to several Hindu gods and goddesses, as well as powerful nationalist poems. As opposed to that of Tagore, Nazrul's poetry maintains a poetics of chaos and confusion from which a certain creative energy ensues.

Jibananda Das (1899–1954) is the third landmark in the hist. of mod. Bengali poetry. His poems reveal a "complexity" (jaṭilatā) in the poet's relation to the world. His conception of poetry as utterly shaped by individual subjectivity—a kind of hermeticism—opposed him to Tagore's universalism and prompted crit. by the followers of an ideologically committed poetry.

In the 1930s, various progressive writers shifted from Tagore's model and engaged in poetic dialogues with his oeuvre. Chief among them is Buddhadeva Bose (1908–74), who devoted several works to the interrogation of Tagore's poetry and composed poems inverting his images. Other poets such as Amiya Chakrabarti (1901–86), Sudhindranath Dutta (1901–60), and Bishnu Dey (1909–82), who did not form a homogenous group, represent different modernist attitudes of the period surrounding World War II.

The independence of India and Pakistan in 1947 marked an important turn in the hist. of Bengali poetry. Dhaka, the capital of East Pakistan, became an alternative to Calcutta as an intellectual center.

Poets of East Bengal expressed a need for a proper identity. During "the language movement" in 1952 up to the independence of Bangladesh in 1971, Bengali poetry became the privileged medium of the nationalist claims of the people of East Pakistan. A variety of voices reflecting the multiple options for the building of a Bangladeshi national identity appear in the poetry of that period. Among them, Shamsur Rahman (1929–2006) was the most influential figure. In his hymn-like poems, his voice melds with the song of freedom and independence of the people of Bangladesh. Jibananda Das's approach to poetry also had a strong influence on the prominent Bangladeshi poet Al-Mahmud (b. 1936). In West Bengal, poetry took a strong ideological turn with the growth of Marxism and the Naxalite movement. Among the noticeable poets of West Bengal of the 1970s and contemp. period are Sunil Gangopadhyay (b. 1934) and Jay Goswami (b. 1954).

■ A Tagore Reader, ed. A. Chakrabarti (1961); The Thief of Love, trans. E. C. Dimock (1963)—Bengali tales; S. Sen, History of Bengali Literature (1979); A. K. Banerjee, History of Modern Bengali Literature (1986); C. B. Seely, A Poet Apart (1990)—on Jibananda Das; R. Tagore, Selected Poems, trans. W. Radice, rev. ed. (1994); "Bengali," Medieval Indian Literature, ed. K. A. Paniker, v. 1 (1997); Voices from Bengal, trans. and ed. M. Bandyopadhyay et al. (1997); Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja, The Caitanya Caritāmṛta, ed. T. K. Stewart, trans. E. C. Dimock, (1999); Fabulous Women and Peerless Pīrs, trans. T. K. Stewart (2004); M. M. Dutt, The Slaying of Meghanada, trans. C. B. Seely (2004); P. K. Mitra, The Dissent of Nazrul Islam (2007).

T. D'HUBERT

BESTIARY. The bestiary or book of beasts (liber bestiarum) is a med. collection of animal stories, written in both Lat. and in the principal vernacular langs. of Western Europe and normally but not always decorated with illustrations. The oldest surviving examples date from the early 10th c., but most of the extant versions were produced in the late 12th and 13th cs. The bestiary is derived from Lat. trans. of the Gr. Physiologus, named after its supposed compiler (the Naturalist), and written sometime between the 2d and 4th cs. CE, possibly in Alexandria. Like the bestiary, the Physiologus exists in a number of different versions. Purportedly drawn from observation but actually derived from works of natural hist., as well as myth, legend, and fable, the Physiologus describes the characteristics of animals, birds, serpents, and insects that are then moralized and used as a vehicle for revealing Christian truths. The bestiary is similar in form to the Physiologus but greatly expands the number of both real and imaginary animals that are included and interpolates material from other sources, most notably the Etymologiae of Isidore of Seville and the Hexameron of St. Ambrose. Like the Physiologus, the bestiary assumes that the natural world can be read as a divinely inscribed book and that the characteristics of animals provide a set of lessons for the edification of humanity. Thus, the lion symbolizes the resurrection because it revives its cubs (which are born dead) by blowing into their faces three days after their birth, while the beaver acts as an exhortation to clean living by biting off its own testicles (which are prized for their medicinal qualities) when pursued by a hunter.

Bestiaries provide some of the finest examples of med. ms. illustration, with the most luxurious and expensively produced copies created in England in the early 13th c. While the bestiary reached its apogee at that time, Ren. writers continued to use it as a rich source of images and metaphors (e.g., King Lear condemns his "pelican daughters," a metaphor drawn from the bestiary pelican that brings its young back to life by feeding them with its blood). The bestiary survives in such traditional and proverbial lore as "to lick into shape" (derived from the bear that was said to give form to her cubs by licking them after they are born as shapeless lumps of flesh) and the phoenix that rises from the ashes.

■ The Bestiary, ed. M. R. James (1928); F. McCulloch, Medieval Latin and French Bestiaries, rev. ed. (1962); B. Rowland, Animals with Human Faces (1974); Physiologus, trans. M. J. Curley (1979); X. Muratova, I manoscritti miniati del bestiario medievale (1985); Birds and Beasts of the Middle Ages, ed. W. B. Clark and M. T. McMunn (1989); D. Hassig, Medieval Bestiaries: Text, Image, Ideology (1995).

D. SALTER

BHAKTI POETRY. See INDIA, POETRY OF.

BIBLICAL POETRY. See HEBREW POETRY; HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS; HYMN; PSALM.

BIEDERMEIER. A term first used around 1855 to refer ironically to the smug, philistine, and petty-bourgeois mentality and writing style frequently encountered in South Germany and Austria in the period 1815–48. Soon after 1900, Biedermeier began to be used descriptively as a period term referring to the style of furniture and fashions of dress prevalent in Central Europe and Scandinavia during the first half of the 19th c.; the painting of Carl Spitzweg and Ferdinand Waldmüller was considered typical of this stylistic mode, as well as the poetic realism and idyllic nostalgia of Ger.-lang. writers such as Eduard Mörike, Adalbert Stifter, Ferdinand Raimund, Johann Nestroy, Franz Grillparzer, and Annette von Droste-Hülshoff (see GERMAN POETRY).

Historical observation shows that features such as resignation and contentedness, idyllic intimacy and domestic peace, conservatism, morality and lack of passion, innocent drollery, and a mixture of dreamy idealism and realistic devotion to detail characterize many writers of the Biedermeier period. However, this poetry is also placed in multiple and complex dialectical relationships with that of writers who emphasized the dynamics of political and social progress, irony, and revolution. Together and in contrast, Mörike and Heinrich Heine express and define a common sociocultural situation. Additionally, the Biedermeier surface of coziness and satisfaction often overlays doubt, oneiric demonism, uncertainty, and ambiguity, which also have to be considered integral parts of Biedermeier writing. Ultimately *romanticism, the Fr. Revolution, and the social upheavals of the Napoleonic age, along with the period of compromise and constriction that succeeded them, created a state of affairs in which a sense of loss, a search for security, individualism, an ironic or tragicomic worldview, and national, political, and social reform could emerge and interact. These features referred back to a common absent center—the idealized heroic age of romanticism and revolution—with the result that Biedermeier writers feel marked by the problematic and the epigonal, a situation to which they respond in a variety of ways, from realistic action to amused or melancholy contemplation.

Ultimately, the background of the cultural events in these decades is not political or economic but informational. The overwhelming increase of available scientific data on the universe, on nature and the human world (in astronomy, in the life sciences, in geography and history, in physics and chemistry, in sociology and psychology), and the multitude of new philosophical and ideological theories obliged writers to devise images, theories, and patterns that would provide synthetic, restful, tranquilizing, and aesthetic solutions for the normality of existence.

The Biedermeier itself as a cultural phenomenon is perhaps limited to Central Europe, but its complex intermeshing with a given intellectual, cultural, and historical situation finds close analogues in the France of Victor Hugo, Alfred de Musset, Alphonse de Lamartine, and Alfred Vigny; and in the Eastern Europe of Adam Mickiewicz, Juliusz Słowacki, and Alexander Pushkin. More than echoes of Biedermeier mentality can be found in the writings of Walter Scott and Jane Austen, of Leigh Hunt and Charles Lamb, and in the ideology of William Cobbett, as well as across the Atlantic in the amiable prose of Washington Irving.

Biedermeier provides a useful if somewhat vague explanatory framework for discussions of poetry in the early 19th c. At the same time, it relates in an interesting way to romanticism, as *rococo does to *baroque or *postmodernism does to *modernism.

■ M. Greiner, Zwischen Biedermeier und Bourgeoisie (1953); G. Böhmer, Die Welt des Biedermeier (1968); Zur Literatur der Restaurationsepoche, ed. J. Hermand and M. Windfuhl (1970); F. Sengle, Biedermeierzeit, 3 v. (1971–80); Begriffsbestimmung des literarischen Biedermeier, ed. E. Neubuhr (1974); V. Nemoianu, The Taming of Romanticism (1984); G. Schildt, Aufbruch aus der Behaglichkeit: Deutschland im Biedermeier 1815–1847 (1989); C. Herin, "Biedermeier," Geschichte der deutschen Lyrik, ed. W. Hinderer, 2d ed. (2001); Zwischen Goethezeit und Realismus: Wandel und Spezifik in der Phase des Biedermeier, ed. M. Titzmann (2002); Biedermeier: Die Erfindung der Einfachheit, ed. H. Ottomeyer et al. (2006); V. Nemoianu, The Triumph of Imperfection (2006).

V. P. NEMOIANU

BINARY AND TERNARY. The mod. terms for what used to be called, with considerable inconsistency of usage, "duple" (or "double") and "triple" meter(s). Binary meters have two members per *foot, as in *iambic and *trochaic (also *pyrrhic and spondaic if one recognizes these as admissible meters), while ternary meters have three, as in anapestic and dactylic (or amphibrachic or *cretic). The distinction between two-membered feet and three- is ancient, despite the facts that the basis of cl. Gr. metrics (*quantity) is different from that of the mod. langs. (stress; see ACCENT) and that, despite the retention of cl. names for mod. feet, the generic registers of binary and ternary meters from ancient times to mod. have almost exactly reversed: in Gr., anapestic meter was used for serious and lofty subjects (the *epic), and the iambic for lighter subjects; but in the mod. meters, the opposite is true: iambic is the meter of *heroic verse.

In the quantitative theory of *classical prosody, the members of the intralinear metrical units (feet) have definite durational relations to each other (see DURATION): a long is by convention equivalent to two shorts. Similarly, in mod. "musical" theories of *meter (Sidney Lanier, Morris Croll, J. W. Hendren; see Brogan), stresses are claimed to be double the temporal value of their opposites, and intervals are made isochronous; hence, the iambic foot has three "times" (equal to three shorts) and so is said to be in "triple time," and triple meters are in "duple time" (their three members adding up to four "times," a compound of two). Omond, however, for whom time is the basis of meter but speech syllables are too variable to have definite durations as in music, holds that iambic and trochaic are "duple meters" and in "duple time," i.e., the time required for two average syllables (he lets pauses fill gaps) and that ternary feet are "triple meters" in "triple time." But this contrariety of terms between musical and nonmusical temporal theories of meter seems pointless to those mod. metrists who are not timers: for them, it is only the number of members (syllables) in the foot that matters.

The usefulness if not the necessity of the distinction between binary and ternary arises from the widely acknowledged fact that the distribution of the one class of meters differs from that of the other, even beyond the fact that the former is far more prevalent than the latter: ternary meters are often said to have a different felt cadence, or *rhythm, from binary, hence to be suitable for a different range of subjects—often lighthearted, humorous, rollicking, satirical. What this means is that, in mod. verse, generic constraints are differentially assigned in part by metrical class, hence that this distinction is one valid plane of cleavage in metrical theory.

Further, it is disputed whether the meters within each class are, in fact, distinct meters: iambic and trochaic are said by some to be interchangeable or at least interrelated via rhythms established by word shapes: particularly interesting is the case of iambo-trochaic tetrameters known as 8s and 7s (see RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM). In Eng., though binary meters appear in early ME, definite ternary meters appear only in the Ren., and even then only sporadically—Ker relates them to *tumbling verse, as in works by Thomas Tusser, and remarks that they are "almost always" the product of a musical tune—effectively, they are not common at all until the later 18th c. (Thomas Gray's "Amatory Lines," John Gay, Oliver Goldsmith) and by far the majority of examples are from the 19th c. (Lord Byron's "Destruction of Sennacherib"; Walter Scott; Alfred, Lord Tennyson's Maud and "Charge of the Light Brigade"; Robert Browning's "Saul"; A. C. Swinburne). And ternary meters are notoriously difficult to differentiate in running series, esp. when line ends are irregular and unpredictable: the sequence x / xx / xx / xx / may be felt as anapestic tetrameter with a missing first syllable, but it can also be amphibrachic with a missing final syllable. Schipper indicates the syllabic ambiguities in ternary meters by treating them as "iambic-trochaic" and "trochaic-dactylic," remarking that "the rising and falling rhythms are not strictly separated but frequently intermingle and even supplement one another." Finally, it appears that there may be intermediate stages between these classes, via the admission of extra (unelidable) syllables into binary meters. But this question, which entails the concept of *accentual verse, is too complex to be undertaken here (see Weismiller). ■ Schipper, v. 2, sects. 224–41; T. S. Omond, A Study of Metre (1903), esp. 49, 52; Schipper, History, ch. 14; W. P. Ker, Form and Style in Poetry (1928); K. Taranovski, Ruski dvodelni ritmovi (1953); G. Saintsbury, Prosody, v. 3, App. 3; A. T. Breen, "A Survey of the Development of Poetry Written in Trisyllabic Metres to 1830," diss., Nat. Univ. of Ireland (1965); E. R. Weismiller, "Studies of Verse Form in the Minor English Poems," A Variorum Commentary on the Poems of John Milton, ed. M. Y. Hughes, v. 2 (1972); D. L. Hascall, "Triple Meters in English Verse," Poetics 12 (1974); M. L. Gasparov, Sovremennyj russkij stix (1974); Brogan; M. L. Gasparov, Ocerk istorii russskogo stixa (1984); Scherr; M. G. Tarlinskaja, "Meter and Language: Binary and Ternary Meters in English and Russian," Style 21 (1987); and "Triple Threats to Duple Meter," Rhythm and Meter, ed. P. Kiparsky and G. Youmans (1989); Morier, "Binaire."

T.V.F. BROGAN

BIOGRAPHY AND POETRY

I. History
II. Value to Readers and Interpreters

I. History. Biographies of poets have been written in all major cultures, and literary trads. of detailed lives of poets, located in a specific place, society, and historical moment, emerged independently in Europe, China, and, some centuries later, the Islamic world. In Europe, probably the earliest known biographies of any poet are the imaginative reconstructions of the life of Homer, written in ancient Greece. These were followed by further biographies of poets who wrote in Gr. and Lat., and, in the med. period, in the Romance langs. After around the 17th c., biographies of poets were written in most major Eur. langs.

A. Non-European Traditions. Ancient Jewish trad. made no effort to write biographies of the authors of the poetry in the Heb. Bible, instead attributing those poems to figures famous for their political and military acts; thus, Solomon was identified as the author of the Song of Songs and David as author of the Psalms. Biographies exist of ancient Chinese and Japanese poets, but the earliest of these biographies tend to focus on the poets' careers as soldiers or courtiers, treating their writings almost incidentally (see CHINA, POETRY OF; JAPAN, POETRY OF). On the Indian subcontinent, ancient trads. often describe as the work of one poet (who may or may not have had a historical existence) a large body of poems that may have been written over many centuries by many anonymous poets but that shared a recognizable set of stylistic and philosophical tendencies (see SANSKRIT POETRY).

In Islamic lit., lives of poets, often in the form of collections, began to be written (usually in verse) around the 10th c. Samarqandi (12th c.) seems to be one of the earliest biographers; having failed to win distinction as a poet, he wrote lives, apparently based on oral trad., of poets he admired. Other Islamic authors wrote collections of saints' lives that included poets who were revered as much for their religious as for their literary merits, e.g., the poet Rūmī. Lives of Islamic poets were sometimes prepared by a later ed. of their poems, e.g., the life of the Persian national poet Firdawsī (10th c.), written perhaps four centuries after his death (see PERSIAN POETRY).

B. European Traditions through the Eighteenth Century. Ancient biographies of Homer, notably the Life of Homer, falsely attributed to Herodotus, seem to be entirely fanciful. The incidents they describe were evidently invented to explain Homer's knowledge of places and events in the Homeric epics or to explain the origin of some verse fragments formerly attributed to Homer. Other biographies of poets in the cl. era tend to be historical or thematic accounts of their work. A life of Virgil, attributed to Suetonius and written perhaps a century after the poet's death, lists and describes Virgil's work, incl. epigrams not otherwise attributed to him, but says little or nothing about his motives for writing them.

In Christian Europe until around the 13th c., an author was understood to be (at least in part) a vessel for divine inspiration. A poet's life, when written about at all, tended to be seen in the same conventionalized terms as med. saints' lives. A more individualizing approach emerged in the vidas* and razos* that appeared in some late 13th- and early 14th-c. chansonniers, or collections of poems by *troubadours; and by the mid-14th c., the character of a poet was often understood to shape his work, whether that work was devoted to sacred or amatory themes (see POET). Giovanni Boccaccio's Trattatello in laude di Dante (Life of Dante, 1351) includes, among a general account of poetry in its relation to cl. mythology and the Bible, an account of Dante's character that emphasizes his unique combination of qualities, incl. his haughtiness, political passions, and lustfulness. When Boccaccio considers alternate interpretations of Dante's Divina commedia, he justifies his preferred readings by citing personal characteristics of Dante that tend to confirm those readings. Extending and deepening the interpretative techniques of the razos, this is among the earliest cases in which a critic uses biographical information to interpret the meaning of a vernacular poem, not merely as an explanation of the events that prompted it to be written.

During the next centuries, some national lits. produced far more biographies of poets than others. At two extremes were Spain, which produced almost no poets' biographies until the 19th c., and England, which developed a lively biographical trad. as early as the 17th c. Izaak Walton's The Lives of Dr. John Donne, Sir Henry Wotton, Mr. Richard Hooker [and] Mr. George Herbert (1670) contains lengthy accounts of these writers' hists. and characters; their poems are described as incidents in their public lives rather than, as in later trads., the product of their inner thoughts and impulses.

The first systematic set of biographies of a nation's poets was Samuel Johnson's four volumes of Prefaces, Biographical and Critical, to the Works of the English Poets (1779–81), which included 52 biographies varying widely in length and depth. These essays were written not as biographies but as prefaces to selections of the poets' works; however, they were marketed as biographies in an early reprint ed., The Lives of the Most Eminent English Poets (1781). In telling the life of a poet, Johnson typically described the initial impulses and influences that led the poet to begin writing poems, then described the hist. of the poet's works and his relations with patrons and publishers, and followed this with a critical account of the poet's work. He generally did not attempt to integrate biography and crit. and, except in a few paragraphs in his long life of Milton, seldom explored the inner impulses that prompted a poet to write discrete works.

C. Romantic and Modern Traditions. Writers in the romantic era and after focused their attention on the inner life of poets in a new way. William Wordsworth, in his posthumously pub. autobiographical work The Prelude: The Growth of a Poet's Mind (1805, pub. 1850), recounted, among much else, the devel. of his moral and literary attitudes and their relation to his emotional experiences in childhood and youth. During the romantic period, biographies were written about poets from all earlier periods, ranging far beyond the century and a half covered by Johnson; e.g., in 1822, the Ger. poet and scholar Ludwig Uhland published Walther von der Vogelweide, perhaps the first biographical account of a med. poet.

Until the romantic period, eds. and collections of shorter poems by individual poets were generally arranged according to form or genre or in a sequence arranged for aesthetic effect, with the best-known poems placed first or last; rarely, if ever, were such eds. arranged in chronological order of composition. During the 19th c., poets began to encourage biographical readings of their poems by arranging them in chronological sequence. Wordsworth evidently considered but rejected a chronological sequence for his two collected eds., Poems, in Two Volumes (1807) and Poems (1815); but the 1815 ed. included a chronological listing of his poems that encouraged a biographical understanding of his career. When Mary Shelley edited the first posthumous collection of P. B. Shelley's poems (1839), she arranged many of the poems by year of composition. Alfred, Lord Tennyson's retrospective collection, Poems (1842), is divided into two volumes of mostly early and mostly later work, but the contents of each are not arranged in a careful chronological sequence. A more or less strictly chronological arrangement of collected volumes became more common later in the century, although it was by no means a universal practice. Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass, although explicitly autobiographical in content, was not arranged in chronological sequence.

In the 20th c., poets typically published their work in ways that emphasized the larger patterns of their career rather than a closely detailed chronological sequence. Poets tended to arrange their individual volumes of recent poems (written in perhaps the previous half-dozen years) in sequences chosen for aesthetic effect or according to forms or themes; in contrast, the collected eds. chosen by the same poets typically encouraged biographical readings by dividing the ed. into sections each of which corresponded to one of the earlier, smaller volumes, presented in order of publication; a typical example is The Collected Poems of Robert Frost (1930).

The many collected eds. prepared by W. B. Yeats are arranged in sequences that represent his earlier volumes, but with the chronology and contents altered for aesthetic effect; e.g., Yeats replaced the contents of his earlier books with newly organized sequences with different titles and contents. In a comparable but less revisionary way, Wallace Stevens organized the final section of his Collected Poems of Wallace Stevens (1955) as if it were a book titled "The Rock," which, in fact, had never appeared as a separate volume. When W. H. Auden first collected his poems, for The Collected Poetry of W. H. Auden (1945), he arranged the contents by alphabetical order of first lines in the hope of discouraging biographical readings; but in his next collection, Collected Shorter Poems 1927–1957 (1966), he chose a chronological arrangement, noting in a foreword that he had no objection to his work's being read from a historical perspective.

Many biographies of poets from the romantic period to the present treat poets' inner lives as heroic battles against such enemies as bodily illness, critical philistinism, and public indifference. Examples of such biographies include Richard Monckton Milnes's Life, Letters and Literary Remains of John Keats (1848) and G. H. Lewes's The Life of Goethe (1855). A countertrad. of reductive, skeptical biographies began in the 20th c., prompted by Lytton Strachey's Eminent Victorians (1918). In this trad., the poet's life is typically presented as the product of either neurosis or careerism rather than genius; such books can illuminate aspects of a poet's life and work that are invisible in more idealizing biographies and can add to the understanding of readers who admire the poet more than the biographer does. Examples of such books include Lawrance Thompson's Robert Frost (1966–76); Lyndall Gordon's Eliot's Early Years (1977) and Eliot's New Life (1988); and Humphrey Carpenter's A Serious Character: The Life of Ezra Pound (1988). Some esp. illuminating biographies combine idealizing and skeptical approaches, presenting the poet as heroically pursuing a vocation through sometimes unscrupulous means; a notable example is R. F. Foster's W. B. Yeats: A Life (1997–2003).

A few 20th-c. poets, notably T. S. Eliot and Auden, actively discouraged biographies, either in last wills and testaments or in comments to friends. They wished that their poems might be read for their literary merits, not explained away as the product of personal or public motives. Such concerns continue to challenge literary biography to expand rather than diminish the pleasure and understanding of critics, historians, and readers.

II. Value to Readers and Interpreters. The value of biographical information about poets has been the subject of intense dispute since the mid-20th c. Proponents of critical schools that emphasize the aesthetic or structural aspects of a work of art (e.g., *New Criticism, *structuralism, deconstruction) or that emphasize the public role or public reception of a poem (e.g., *cultural studies, reception hist.) tend to deny that biographical information is relevant in interpreting a poem. In the views held by these critical schools, a poem is the product of inner imaginative acts that are inaccessible to biographers and perhaps unknown even to the poet, generic and aesthetic forces that act independently of a poet's conscious or unconscious intentions, or impersonal cultural forces for which the poet is primarily a medium. Another view holds that the meaning of the poem is created by its readers' interpretations of it, not by any of the personal or impersonal forces that caused it to be written. Among the most influential arguments against biographical reading is "The Intentional Fallacy" (1946) by W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley (see INTENTIONAL FALLACY). Earlier arguments against such readings include The Personal Heresy (1939) by C. S. Lewis and E.M.W. Tillyard; later ones are implicit or explicit throughout structuralist and poststructuralist crit.

No biography can explain why a poet wrote one poem instead of another in response to the same circumstances and experiences. Biography can, however, offer valid cues to interpretation that would not otherwise be available and can illuminate patterns of implication in a poem that might not otherwise be accessible to readers and critics. These cues, like any other cues to interpretation, may in turn help a reader to find a poem more aesthetically satisfying, intellectually stimulating, and emotionally moving than it would be otherwise.

A. Biography and Particularity. Among those readers for whom biographical information is distracting or irrelevant are those who regard individual poems as autonomous objects or as statements of universal themes; a *lyric poem, in such a view, might be one poet's exploration of such universal concerns as love or death. In contrast, readers for whom biographical information can be helpful in interpretation tend to regard poems as responses to unique events in a poet's personal hist., which the reader understands as being analogous to unique events in the reader's own experience; a lyric poem, in such a view, was provoked by one particular love or one particular death, but the reader understands the poem through the analogy of the poet's unique experience with the reader's unique experiences of one particular love or one particular death. To such a reader, the kind of knowledge that is worth having is sympathetic, not objective; the poem is not an object to be understood with the kind of knowledge that gives power over that object but as a subject that is best understood through the kind of knowledge that enables sympathy rather than power.

Readers who benefit from biographical information, thus, tend to regard poems as analogous to individual persons. To such readers, a poem, like a person, is the product of unique circumstances, and its existence was affected and provoked by historical events; it speaks with its own irreplaceable voice, with its own special variations on the grammar and syntax that it shares with other poems written in the same lang. and the same culture. It can enter into a dialogue with the reader and, if the poem is worth reading at all, says different things to the same reader at different stages in the reader's life. In this view, a poem, like a person, can say things that a reader does not wish to hear. Although it is a member of one or more classes or categories of poems (e.g., sonnets, visionary poems, mod. poems), the fact of its membership in a class is less interesting than the ways in which it differs from other members of that class.

This view of poems and other works of art as analogues to expressive, individual persons developed in Western culture in the later 18th c. and became pervasive during the 19th. Its philosophical basis was established by the aesthetic theories of J. G. Herder and Friedrich Schleiermacher, both of whom systematized, but did not originate, similar views already emerging among artists and writers (see ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS; ROMANTICISM).

B. Readings Made Possible by Biographical Information. A biography may suggest the extent to which a poem is deliberately artificial or conventional—and, therefore, a response to other poems—and the extent to which it is, in contrast, an expression of a personal passion or belief. Biographies of Yeats, notably Foster's, indicate that his love poems to Maud Gonne were less the expression of passionate feeling than products of his conviction that a romantic poet must suffer from an unhappy and unfulfilled love that provides him with the themes of his poetry and that Yeats consciously elaborated and intensified his feelings for Gonne in something of the same way that he elaborated and intensified his poems from their flat-sounding first drafts to their rhythmic and rhetorical final versions. An alert reader could guess some of these things by reading Yeats's poems without reading a biography, but biography, more than any other mode of crit., makes it possible to detect the depth and pervasiveness of Yeats's artificiality that half-pretends to be passion.

In a similar way, Foster's biography indicates that many of the extreme-sounding attitudes about racial and national matters that Yeats expressed in his later work were deliberately chosen to create controversy and thus generate sales for the pamphlets of his work that were published by his sisters' Cuala Press. Some theoretical arguments against biographical interpretation claim that biography simplifies a poem into a mere statement of personal feeling; but in this and similar instances, biography deepens a poem by pointing toward its complex interplay of performance and authenticity and its complex relation between personal statement and theatrical role-playing.

Biography performs a similar function by identifying experiences that are not explicitly named in a poem but that affect its mood, form, and vocabulary and that may be detected in the poem only by readers who are familiar with the biographical background. Gordon's biography of Eliot points to the erotic renunciations that were part of the experience that prompted the writing of "Burnt Norton"; the religious attitudes expressed in the poem, thus, involve not only an aspiration toward something higher than earthly life but a deliberate refusal of actual earthly and erotic satisfactions that are present in the poem only in the form of apparently nonspecific metaphors. In a similar way, biography can clarify the private experiences through which a poet writes about public events. Poems in which a poet writes about, e.g., the Irish Civil Wars or the outbreak of World War II, can be more deeply understood if a reader learns from a biography the specific personal and emotional concerns that affected the poet at the same time and that influenced the imagery, vocabulary, and poetic forms that the poet used when describing public events.

Biography can also clarify the ways in which the meaning of one poem is affected by the meaning of an earlier or later one by the same poet. Edward Mendelson's Early Auden (1981) describes a sequence of inner psychological events when Auden explored and then rejected a fantasy of himself as a leader figure in the 1930s. This account makes clear that some poems that appear to express simple nationalistic feelings are also statements of personal ambition and that later poems that appear to make general statements about human limitation are also specific renunciations of earlier personal hopes.

The value to readers of any biography varies according to the degree to which the biographer perceives large-scale continuities and trajectories in the poet's life. Carpenter's detailed lives of W. H. Auden and Ezra Pound, e.g., treat these poets' lives as a series of disconnected episodes, so that individual poems are portrayed as more or less immediate responses to recent events, not as events in a life shaped by past events and directed to future ones. Foster's equally detailed life of Yeats, in contrast, treats Yeats's life as a narrative in which memories and intentions are inseparable from daily events, with the effect that Yeats's works are understood both as having value in themselves and as part of a constantly changing but coherent larger whole. As in all other matters in which biographers and critics differ in their approaches, the method that seems most valid to a reader will be the one that more closely corresponds to the reader's own understanding of the nature of a poet's career; but sympathetic and well-informed biographical approaches can expand and intensify the experience of reading in ways that are unavailable through other approaches.

■ L. Lipking, The Life of the Poet: Beginning and Ending Poetic Careers (1981); W. Empson, Using Biography (1984); S. Fix, "Distant Genius: Johnson and the Art of Milton's Life," MP 81 (1984); D. Bromwich, "Some Uses of Biography," A Choice of Inheritance (1989); S. Boym, Death in Quotation Marks: Cultural Myths of the Modern Poet (1991); D. Levertov, "Biography and the Poet," Ohio Review 48 (1992); C. Ricks, "Victorian Lives," Essays in Appreciation (1996); Romantic Biography, ed. A. Bradley and A. Rawes (2002).

E. MENDELSON

BLACK ARTS MOVEMENT. BAM is a shorthand term coined by the poet, playwright, critic, and political activist Larry Neal for the outpouring of politically engaged Af. Am. art from the mid-1960s to the late 1970s that was closely joined with the Black Power movement. BAM encompassed a wide range of ideological and aesthetic stances. Nonetheless, like the Black Power movement, all strains of BAM were generally united by a belief in the need for Af. Ams. to determine their own political and cultural destiny within the international struggle against colonialism, neocolonialism, and racism.

BAM largely emerged out of overlapping circuits of old-left radicalism, artistic bohemianism, and black nationalism. Its early participants were inspired by the revolutions and independence movements of Africa, Asia, and Latin America as well as the civil-rights movement, esp. the student movement that grew out of the Southern sit-ins in 1960 and after. While proto-Black Arts institutions, such as Liberator, Freedomways, and Negro Digest magazines and the Free Southern Theater, were established throughout the early 1960s, it was the murder of Malcolm X and the Watts uprising in 1965 that catalyzed these disparate initiatives into the beginning of a movement. Malcolm X's death pushed Amiri Baraka and other artists living in the downtown bohemia of New York City to join with Harlem activists to form the Black Arts Repertory Theatre and School (BARTS)—an event that many took to signal the arrival of a new movement rooted in black neighborhoods. The spread and increasing frequency of black, urban uprisings and the mass circulation of radical nationalist ideas in the Af. Am. community paradoxically authorized both the repression of black revolutionary organizations and the availability of federal, state, and local public funds to support often radical cultural work and institutions, aiding in the growth of a BAM infrastructure.

BAM poetry had a bifurcated character. Many BAM poets oriented their work toward *performance in public venues from community centers to bars to political rallies. Often these performances were multimedia, multigeneric affairs that mixed spoken word, dance, theater, and music. Even when performing alone, poets like Baraka, Sonia Sanchez, and Haki Madhubuti sang, drummed on microphones or podiums, and employed a range of nonverbal vocalizations to approximate collaborations with musicians. BAM poets also often attempted to represent on the page the rhythms, musical lines, and chordal experimentations of the new jazz, particularly the work of John Coltrane. In this, of course, they were engaging not only the work of Langston Hughes and Sterling A. Brown but the New American Poetry literary counterculture such as Allen Ginsberg's Howl and Jack Kerouac's Mexico City Blues, where notions of lineation and breath were in part based on the model of bebop soloing.

While there was a tendency to privilege the process of sound performance over textual product, BAM poetry still reached its audience primarily through printed texts. Such journals as Black World (originally Negro Digest), Liberator, and The Journal of Black Poetry and black-run publishers, such as Third World Press and Broadside Press, were the vehicles that made this poetry available to an audience beyond the poets' immediate communities. One might argue that BAM was the most successful U.S. small-press and little-magazine literary movement. From 1965 to 1975, Detroit's Broadside Press issued dozens of titles and sold many times the number of books by black poets issued by general publishers in the previous decade; Chicago's still-extant Third World Press published numerous titles and thousands of copies. BAM poets, then, had to think deeply about the textual, the verbal, and the visual on the page as well as the performative.

The end of the movement is hard to date precisely. Certainly by the middle of the 1970s, internal ideological struggles between Marxists and anti-Marxist nationalists took a toll on many Black Power and BAM organizations and institutions. As programs supporting the arts were cut or became increasingly hostile to radical community-arts projects with the presidential election of Ronald Reagan in 1980, BAM largely came to an end.

Black Arts fundamentally changed Am. attitudes toward the arts, demonstrating that "high" art can be popular in form and content while popular culture can be socially and artistically serious. This legacy can be seen perhaps most clearly in hip-hop, where politically conscious artists have long invoked and even worked in collaboration with leading Black Arts activists. At the same time, the Black Arts practice of a socially engaged, formally radical mixture of poetry, theater, music, dance, and visual arts performed for a genuinely popular audience also transformed the cultural field for poetry.

See AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY, HIP-HOP POETICS, JAZZ POETRY, PROTEST POETRY.

■ E. Redmond, Drumvoices (1976); K. W. Benston, Performing Blackness (2000); L. Thomas, Extraordinary Measures (2000)—Afrocentric modernism; C. Clarke, "After Mecca" (2005)—women poets and BAM; J. Smethurst, The Black Arts Movement (2005); New Thoughts on the Black Arts Movement, ed. L. G. Collins and M. Crawford (2006).

J. SMETHURST

BLACK MOUNTAIN SCHOOL. The term Black Mountain school refers to the nexus of poets associated, directly or indirectly, with Black Mountain College (1933–57), a tiny experimental college in North Carolina that centered its curriculum on the arts. Like many terms for poetic movements, Black Mountain is simultaneously social and aesthetic in its reference. Socially, it encompasses poets who attended or taught at Black Mountain between about 1948 and 1956 and extends to associated poets who shared the same networks of correspondence and publication. These personal and poetic connections had so diversified by the late 1960s that the term has little relevance beyond that date.

The movement acquired its name from its poets being grouped together in Donald Allen's germinal anthol. The New American Poetry 1945–1960. As Allen introduces them, the Black Mountain poets include Charles Olson, Robert Creeley, Robert Duncan, Ed Dorn, Denise Levertov (the poets most consistently associated with the label), Paul Carroll, Joel Oppenheimer, Larry Eigner, Paul Blackburn, and Jonathan Williams. Some would add John Wieners and the long-neglected Hilda Morley to that group. As with many poetic avant-gardes, a shared geographical location helped spark a self-conscious sense of oppositional community associated with resistance to established conventions in the arts—in this case, to the formally traditional mainstream poetics of the period, which were often derided as "academic." Shared publishing outlets in the form of little magazines (Cid Corman's Origin, Creeley's Black Mountain Review) and small and independent presses (Creeley's Divers Press, Williams's Jargon Society) were also crucial to the coherence of the Black Mountain school (a "coherence" that some of the participants themselves denied). Through their appearance in these venues, poets like Levertov, Blackburn, and Eigner came to be associated with the Black Mountain school without ever attending the college. The writers were further connected by a common sense of their important poetic predecessors: Ezra Pound, W. C. Williams, the objectivists (see OBJECTIVISM), Gertrude Stein, and H.D.

While appearing differently in the work of the various poets, the central features of Black Mountain poetics reflect the principles of Olson's essay *"Projective Verse" (1950), the movement's unofficial ars poetica: *composition by field (the poem as a process of exploration or discovery, historical, spiritual, or emotional); a breath- and speech-based line shaped by the poem's developing content and the poet's physiology, rather than by traditional prosody; the value-laden distinction between experimental "open" forms and "closed" forms inherited from the poetic trad. The Black Mountain poets share a commitment to an organic form that emerges in the writing process—a position articulated in such statements as Levertov's "Notes on Organic Form" (1965), Duncan's "Ideas of the Meaning of Form" (1961) and "Towards an Open Universe" (1964), and Creeley's many short essays and reviews. *Line, *syntax, and page space are taken as key sites of poetic experiment.

Their openness to theorizing their poetics differentiated the Black Mountain poets from contemporaneous movements with which they otherwise had much in common—the *Beats, the *San Francisco Renaissance, the *New York school—and attracted some crit. from proponents of these movements. However, the Black Mountain poets' construction of a literary community via mutual support, correspondence, statements of poetics, publication, and the exchange of sometimes conflicting ideas about the arts became one model for the later practices of the *Language poets, where that construction takes a more politically engaged form.

■ The New American Poetry 1945–1960, ed. D. Allen (1960); C. Olson, Selected Writings (1966)—"Projective Verse"; M. Duberman, Black Mountain (1972); The Poetics of the New American Poetry, ed. D. Allen and W. Tallman (1973); S. Paul, Olson's Push (1978); P. Christensen, "Olson and the Black Mountain Poets," Charles Olson (1979); S. Paul, The Lost America of Love (1981); M. E. Harris, The Arts at Black Mountain College (1987); E. H. Foster, Understanding the Black Mountain Poets (1995); A. Golding, "Little Magazines and Alternative Canons," From Outlaw to Classic (1995); A. D. Dewey, Beyond Maximus (2007).

A. GOLDING

BLANK VERSE

I. Italian
II. English
III. Spanish and Portuguese
IV. German
V. Scandinavian
VI. Slavic

I. Italian. Blank verse is a term for unrhymed lines of poetry, always in lines of a length considered appropriate to serious topics and often in the most elevated, canonical meter in a given national *prosody. The phenomenon first appeared in It. poetry of the 13th c. with "Il Mare Amoroso" (The Sea of Love), an anonymous poem composed of 334 unrhymed endecasillabo verses (see ITALIAN PROSODY). In the Ren., this form was transplanted to England as the unrhymed decasyllable or iambic *pentameter. Though these lines are thought to have derived metrically from the cl. iambic *trimeter, they were designed to produce, in the vernaculars, equivalents in tone and weight of the cl. "heroic" line, the *hexameter. The unrhymed endecasillabo, while popular and important for certain writers (e.g., Ugo Foscolo, Giacomo Leopardi, and many 20th-c. poets), did not become a major meter in It. as the unrhymed iambic pentameter did in Eng. Fr. poet-critics noted the work of the It. poets and made experiments of their own, but these never took hold in a lang. where word *accent was weak; hence, Fr. poetry never developed a significant blank-verse trad. The Iberian, Ger., Scandinavian, and Slavic trads. are discussed below.

Luigi Alamanni's Rime toscane (1532) and other famous It. works in versi sciolti* (i.e., versi sciolti da rima, verse freed from rhyme), such as Giangiorgio Trissino's tragedy Sophonisba (1524) and *epic L'Italia liberata dai Goti (1547), were important models for other national poetries such as the Eng.; the first poet to write blank verse in Eng., Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey (1517–47), surely knew of Alamanni, as well as Niccolò Liburnio's 1534 trans. of Virgil or the 1539 trans. by the de' Medici circle.

II. English. Blank verse in England was invented by the Earl of Surrey, who sometime between 1539 and 1546 translated two books of the Aeneid (2 and 4) into this "straunge meter." It remains to be shown precisely how the rhythms in Surrey's lines derived from the It. endecasillabo. Rather than the 11 syllables of his It. model, Surrey's lines have 10, in an alternating (*iambic) rhythm, and his more easily identifiable precursors are Eng. writers of rhymed decasyllabic verse such as Thomas Wyatt and (more remotely) Chaucer. Gavin Douglas's Scottish trans. of Virgil's epic (written ca. 1513, pub. 1553), from which Surrey took 40% of his diction, is in rhymed *heroic couplets. Like other pre-Shakespearean blank verse, Surrey's is relatively stiff in rhythm, impeded by end-stops. Dignified in style, it exhibits an extensive network of sound patterning, perhaps to offset absent *rhyme.

As blank verse developed in Eng., generic considerations became important. In Eng., blank as used of verse suggests a mere absence of rhyme, not that liberation from a restrictive requirement implied in the It. term. Nevertheless, Eng. defenders of blank verse repeatedly asserted that rhyme acts on poets as a "constraint to express many things otherwise, and for the most part worse than else they would have exprest them" (John Milton). That rhyme has its virtues and beauties needs no argument here. Rhyme does, however, tend to delimit—even to define—metrical structures; it has its clearest effect when the syllables it connects occur at the ends also of syntactic structures, so that *meter and syntax reinforce one another. One associates rhyme with symmetries and closures. Omission of rhyme, by contrast, encourages the use of syntactic structures greater and more various than could be contained strictly within the line and so makes possible an amplitude of discourse, a natural-seeming multiformity, not easily available to rhymed verse. In light of these characteristics, Eng. writers found blank verse a fitting vehicle for long works (for its lack of imposed repetition), drama (for its natural word order), and epic (for its inversion, suspension, and related stylistic devices).

Though blank verse appeared in Eng. first in (trans.) epic, attempts at Eng. *heroic verse after Surrey use, as Hardison remarks, "almost every form but blank verse." The form achieved its first great flowering in drama. After Surrey, the dramatic and nondramatic varieties have significantly different hists., suggesting that they differ in nature more than critics once thought (see WRIGHT, HARDISON). In nondramatic verse, the influence of *Petrarchism, manifested in the vogue for the *sonnet sequence, ensured that rhyme held sway in Eng. nondramatic verse up to Milton. The heavy editorial regularization by the editor of Tottel's Miscellany (1557) set the trend up to Philip Sidney, who showed that metrical correctness and natural expressiveness were not mutually exclusive (see Thompson), a demonstration extended even further by John Donne—but again, in rhyme.

The first Eng. dramatic blank verse, Thomas Norton's in the first three acts of Gorboduc (1571), is smooth but more heavily *end-stopped than Surrey's, giving the impression of contrivance, of a diction shaped—and often padded out—to fit the meter. Thomas Sackville's verse in the last two acts of the play is more alive. But the artificial regularity of Norton's verse came to characterize Eng. *dramatic poetry until Christopher Marlowe came fully into his powers. Marlowe showed what rhetorical and tonal effects blank verse was capable of; his early play Dido echoes lines from Surrey's Aeneid, and Shakespeare's early works show what he learned from Marlowe.

A. Shakespeare. Shakespeare's blank verse, the major verse form of his plays throughout his career, is marked by several features, some of them shared with or derived from earlier Eng. poets (e.g. John Lydgate, Sidney, and Marlowe) but developed with unprecedented coherence. (1) Blank verse is always mixed with other metrical modes (e.g., rhymed verse, songs) and (except for Richard II and King John) with prose; two plays offer more rhymed verse than blank (Love's Labour's Lost and A Midsummer Night's Dream), and seven plays (two hists. and five middle-period comedies) are largely or predominantly written in prose. Shifts within a scene from one mode to another are often subtle, gradual, and hard to hear; different metrical registers for different social classes, however, can be heard, and identify sets of characters—as in MND. (2) Resourceful use of common Elizabethan conventions of metrical patterning and esp. of metrical variation gives many individual lines great flexibility, variety, melody, and speech-like force. (3) Frequent use of lines deviant in length or pattern (short, long, headless, broken-backed, and epic-caesural) extends the potentialities of expressive variation beyond what was commonly available to Ren. writers of stanzaic verse. (4) Shrewdly deployed syllabic ambiguity, esp. by devices of compression (see ELISION), makes many lines seem packed. (5) Lines become increasingly enjambed: sentences run from midline to midline, and even a speech or a scene may end in midline (see ENJAMBMENT). Conversely, metrically regular lines may comprise several short phrases or sentences and may be shared by characters (*split lines). In the theater, consistently enjambed blank verse, unlike Marlowe's end-stopped "mighty" line, sounds more like speech but also tests the audience's awareness of the meter. Esp. in Shakespeare's later plays, the audience, like the characters it is scrutinizing, follows an uncertain path between comprehension and bafflement. Besides carrying the characters' emotional utterances and conveying (with appropriate intensity) their complex states of mind, Shakespeare's blank verse may figure, through its rich dialectic of pattern and departure-from-pattern, a continuing tension between authority and event, model and story, the measured structures of cosmic order and the wayward motions of erratic individual characters.

B. After Shakespeare, and esp. after Donne's (rhymed) Satyres, the dramatic blank-verse line grew looser in form. Feminine endings (see MASCULINE AND FEMININE), infrequent in all early blank verse, became common; in John Fletcher, they often carry verbal stress. Later, true feminine endings become common even in nondramatic rhymed verse. Milton uses feminine endings in Paradise Lost and Paradise Regain'd only with great restraint. They occur rather seldom in the early books of Paradise Lost, but much more frequently after Eve and Adam's fall and are thereby appropriated to the speech of fallen mortals.

In dramatic blank verse, extrametrical syllables begin to appear within the line—first, nearly always following a strong stress and at the end of a phrase or clause at the *caesura; later, elsewhere within the line. In some late Jacobean and Caroline dramas (e.g., those of John Webster) the line has become so flexible that at times the five points of stress seem to become phrase centers, each capable of carrying with it unstressed syllables required by the sense rather than by the metrical count of syllables. But such "Websterian" lines were to call down the wrath of later critics; and the closing of the theaters in 1642 saw the end of a brilliant—if almost too daring—period of experimentation with the structure of the dramatic blank-verse line. When verse drama was written again, after the Restoration and under the impetus of the newly popular Fr. model, the line was once again a strict pentameter but now, and for the next century, rhymed. In any event, after the closing of the theaters, blank verse was never to be of major importance in the drama again. The attempt to renew verse drama (incl. blank verse) in the 20th c. never won either popular or critical acclaim.

C. Milton. Milton returned blank verse to its earliest use as a vehicle of epic and to strict, though complex, metrical order; his influence was so powerful that the form bore his impress up to the 20th c. He did, of course, write blank-verse drama—Comus (A Mask) and Samson Agonistes, the first much influenced by Shakespeare. In both, blank verse, though it is unquestionably the central form, is intermingled with other forms—lyric in Comus, choric in Samson Agonistes—to such effect that we think of both works as being in mixed meters. In Samson Agonistes, Milton is trying to produce the effect of Gr. tragedy (though with a biblical subject); but the blank verse is similar enough to Milton's nondramatic blank verse that discussion of the two may be merged.

Milton was profoundly familiar with the Aeneid in Lat., perhaps in It. trans., and in some Eng. versions; he was equally familiar with It. epic and romance. As a theorist of form, he wanted to make blank verse in Eng. the instrument that the humanist poets had been attempting to forge since Trissino. For his subject in Paradise Lost, he needed a dense, packed line, as various as possible in movement within the limits set by broadly understood but absolute metricality; at the same time, he needed a syntax complex and elaborate enough to overflow line form, to subordinate it to larger forms of thought, appropriately varied in the scope of their articulation—"the sense variously drawn out from one verse into another." The idea was not new, yet no one had managed enjambment in Eng. as skillfully as Milton learned to manage it. Before him—except in Shakespeare's later plays—the congruence of syntax with line form had been too nearly predictable.

Even more than Shakespeare's, Milton's blank-verse line differs from his rhymed pentameter in management of rhythm and through constant variation of the placement of pause within the line. In the course of enjambing lines, Milton writes long periodic sentences, making liberal use of inversion, parenthesis, and other delaying and complicating devices. At times, he uses Italianate stress sequences that disturb the double rhythm and in some instances all but break the meter. Also important, given his refusal of rhyme, is a more extensive (if irregular) deployment of the varied resources of sound patterning. Numerous forms of *internal rhyme occur, as well as final *assonance and half rhyme; and whole passages are woven together by patterns of *alliteration, assonance, and half rhyme.

D. After Milton. Milton's influence on subsequent nondramatic blank verse in Eng. was, as Havens showed, enormous. Yet, all blank verse after Milton became essentially a romantic form—no longer epic and (the dramatic *monologue excepted) no longer dramatic, but the vehicle of rumination and recollection. The line of descent leads through William Wordsworth ("Michael"; The Prelude; The Excursion) to Alfred, Lord Tennyson ("Ulysses"; "Tithonus"; Idylls of the King) and Robert Browning (The Ring and the Book). By the mid-18th c., the forces of metrical regularity had begun to weaken; for the first time, extra syllables that cannot be removed by elision begin to appear in the nondramatic line, producing triple rhythm. The Eng. pentameter, both dramatic and nondramatic, between 1540 and 1780 all but disallowed triple rhythms; strict count of syllables was deemed central to line structure. Real, irreducible triple rhythms before 1780 were associated with music; they occur fairly commonly in song lyrics and *ballads but not in *accentual-syllabic verse. After 1780, however, triple rhythms gradually invade poems in double rhythm, in part because the romantics were devoted to the work of their 16th- and 17th-c. predecessors and often used the diction of Edmund Spenser, Shakespeare, and Milton, though without entirely understanding earlier metrical conventions. There was also a revival of interest in the ballads, which varied the basic double rhythms with irreducible triple rhythms, a practice soon evident in William Blake's Songs and even occasionally in Wordsworth. As the 19th c. wore on, rhythmic handling might be restrained (Tennyson) or flamboyant (Browning), but the prevailing stylistic tendency was toward effects of speech (a devel. forecast by S. T. Coleridge's term conversation poem*).

In the early 20th c., such speech qualities were exploited by E. A. Robinson and esp. Robert Frost in his North of Boston (1914). The rise of experimental *modernism severely challenged the form; T. S. Eliot deprecated "the inevitable iambic pentameter." Although with scant critical attention and with diminished prestige, much blank verse continued to be written. The impressive works of the post–World War II generation (e.g., Howard Nemerov, Richard Wilbur, Anthony Hecht, James Merrill) followed in the wake of earlier achievements such as W. B. Yeats's "The Second Coming" and Wallace Stevens's "Sunday Morning." In the later 20th c., some poets, evidently with an eye to *free verse, wrote looser versions of the line with added syllables and with stresses erratically clumped or spaced, so that the standard meter seems a distant paradigm rather than an active presence. More traditionally inclined poets—first the Stanford formalists and later the New Formalists (see NEW FORMALISM)—practiced a stricter adherence to the meter. In the 21st c., blank verse continues in wide use among poets attracted to its generic versatility and its expressive pliancy and power.

III. Spanish and Portuguese. In his foundational Gramática de la lengua castellana (Grammar of the Castilian Language, 1492), Antonio de Nebrija deplores the use of rhyme for three reasons: the lack of freedom to express the feelings of the poet, the wearisome similarity of sound, and the way the sound distracts from understanding the sense. But the rise of blank verse occurs after Juan Boscán (ca. 1490–1542) wrote a preface to his poems (1543) where he waxed ironic about the readers who felt "nostalgic for the multitude of rhymes" current in traditional courtly poetry. His generation opened the way toward a new Iberian idiom, based on a kind of studied spontaneity, in which rhyme became secondary or nonexistent. Lyric Port. and Sp. rhymed hendecasyllabic poems by Francisco Sá de Miranda (1481–1558) suggest a rhythmical flexibility like that of prose. Boscán himself wrote Leandro, a narrative poem of over 2,700 unrhymed lines, and his friend Garcilaso de la Vega (1503–36) composed an epistle in the form. In spite of detractors such as Fernando de Herrera ("Notes on the Poetry of Garcilaso," 1580), blank verse appeared in important *lyric, narrative, and dramatic poetry of the later 16th c. António Ferreira (1528–69) composed the supreme masterwork of 16th-c. Iberian tragedy, Castro (first written ca. 1554, pub. 1587, definitive ed. 1598), mostly in blank verse, and expressed elsewhere the same reluctance about rhyme as Nebrija. The first epic poem finished in Port., Segundo Cerco de Diu (Second Siege of Diu, ms. ca. 1568, pub. 1574) by Jerónimo Corte-Real (d. 1588), is entirely in unrhymed verse. The Spaniard Francisco de Aldana (1537–75) wrote the mythological Fábula de Faetonte and three long epistles in blank *hendecasyllables (pub. 1589–91). There were influential blank verse Sp. trans. of Homer's Odyssey in 1550, Virgil's Aeneid in 1555, Ovid's Metamorphoses in 1580, and of a mod. poem like Corte-Real's in 1597. Corte-Real himself published two other epics mostly in blank verse that received considerable renown, Victoria de Lepanto in Sp. (1578) and Sepúlveda in Port. (1594, post.), with intertextual links back to Boscán's Leandro and not without influence in authors as canonical as Miguel de Cervantes and Milton. In the 17th c., perhaps the only remarkable poem in blank verse was Félix Lope de Vega's El arte nuevo de hacer comedias (New Art of Writing Comedies, 1609), and this only for its value as theory of drama (though ironically 17th-c. Sp. drama rejected blank verse). But unrhymed hendecasyllabic verse returned to full effect in some of the best lit. of the 18th c., such as the Brazilian nativist epic O Uraguai by Basílio da Gama, the *mock-heroic masterpiece O Hissope (The Aspergill) by Antonio Dinis da Cruz e Silva, Leandro Fernández de Moratín's great and moving Elegía a las Musas (Elegy to the Muses), and the truculent defense of poetry Carta a Brito (Epistle to Brito) by Filinto Elísio. Blank verse was also chosen for the first great work of Port. *romanticism, Almeida Garrett's Camões (1825), as well as for mod. long poems by major Iberian figures of the time such as Eugénio de Castro (Constança, 1900), Teixeira de Pascoaes (Regresso ao Paraíso, 1912) and Miguel de Unamuno (El Cristo de Velásquez, 1920).

IV. German. The earliest attempt at writing iambic pentameter blank verse in Ger. dates to the beginning of the 17th c., when Johannes Rhenanus wrote a version of Thomas Tomkis's university comedy Lingua. In 1682, Rhenanus was followed by E. G. von Berge with a trans. of Milton's Paradise Lost. While these attempts were of no further consequence, interest in blank verse was rekindled around the middle of the 18th c., when various writers, incl. J. E. Schlegel and his brother J. H. Schlegel, published trans. of Eng. blank-verse lit. (e.g., James Thomson's Seasons and some of his tragedies, William Congreve's The Mourning Bride) or wrote their own dramas (J. W. von Brawe, Brutus; C. F. Weisse, Atreus und Thyest; F. G. Klopstock, Salomo). G. A. Bürger applied blank verse to the epic genre in his trans. of passages from Homer's Iliad, as did C. M. Wieland in his Erzählungen (Tales). The first Ger. blank-verse drama to be performed was Wieland's Lady Johanna Gray, staged in Switzerland in 1758. As a translator of Shakespeare's dramatic works into prose, Wieland chose MND for a blank-verse trans. (1762). However, it was not until G. E. Lessing's Nathan der Weise (1779) that blank verse replaced the *alexandrine as the dominant meter in Ger. cl. and postclassical drama. This change was promoted by K. P. Moritz's handbook on prosody, Versuch einer deutschen Prosodie (1786), which J. W. Goethe consulted in rewriting earlier prose versions of his Iphigenie auf Tauris (1787) and Torquato Tasso (1790). Likewise, Friedrich Schiller rewrote Don Karlos (1787) and the second and third parts of his Wallenstein trilogy, Die Piccolomini and Wallensteins Tod (the first part, Wallensteins Lager, being in free knittelvers*). Between 1800 and 1804, Schiller wrote Maria Stuart, Die Jungfrau von Orleans, Die Braut von Messina, and Wilhelm Tell, all (apart from the choruses in Die Braut von Messina) in blank verse.

A. W. Schlegel's trans. of Shakespeare's plays (14 plays between 1797 and 1810) helped further establish blank verse as the standard meter of Ger. verse drama. His work was later complemented by Ludwig Tieck, his daughter Dorothea Tieck, and Wolf Graf Baudissin, who even took the liberty of translating Molière's alexandrines into blank verse (1865) because he argued that it had the same dominant position in Ger. drama as the alexandrine had in Fr. Thus, most major and minor dramatists of the 19th c. used blank verse exclusively (as is the case with Heinrich von Kleist, although there are some prose passages in Das Käthchen von Heilbronn), extensively (as did Franz Grillparzer, C. D. Grabbe, and C. F. Hebbel), or at least occasionally (Karl Immermann, Karl Gutzkow, and Paul Heyse).

While the earliest attempts at blank verse in Ger. clearly reflected the Eng. models on which they were based (e.g., by the avoidance of feminine endings like Thomson or by construing long periodic sentences over many verse lines like Milton), Lessing, Goethe, and Schiller developed their own metrical styles. Lessing almost disregarded the verse line as a metrical unit by using strong enjambments, by frequently splitting the line into short phrases, often uttered by different speakers, and by splitting lines between speakers 70% of the time (see SPLIT LINES). Thus, Lessing made his verse sound "natural" in the sense of sounding like speech or prose. Goethe went to the other extreme and made his blank verse clearly distinct from speech or prose. His lines are mostly end-stopped, and a change of speakers coincides generally (more than 90%) with the end of a line, at a dramatic climax even in the form of *stichomythia. His syntax is complex but well built, rhythmically balanced, and, stylistic devices such as sententia or genitivus explicativus, at times highly artificial. Schiller's style lies somewhere between Lessing and Goethe, although he moved toward Goethe in his later plays. However, Goethe's verse always has a smooth, lyrical "ring," whereas Schiller adapts his verse to the dramatic function by, e.g., making Mortimer (Maria Stuart, 3.6) utter wildly unmetrical lines in order to convey to the listener or reader that he is out of his mind.

Ger. blank-verse dramas like those of Shakespeare often contain lines that are shorter or longer than the standard ten syllables. Kleist, esp. in his comedies, was less strict than Goethe, but both occasionally loaded an ultrashort or an extra-long line with extra meaning. Insertions of a different meter in Goethe's Iphigenie or in Schiller's Braut von Messina always have a dramatic function.

Even in late 19th- and 20th-c. drama, blank verse was not entirely abandoned (Ernst von Wildenbruch, Gerhart Hauptmann, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, J. R. Becher, and Walter Hasenclever). After 1945, blank verse experienced a kind of renaissance in the works of some East Ger. dramatists (Heiner Müller, Hartmut Lange, Erwin Strittmatter, and Peter Hacks), who introduced more metrical complexity in their verse dramas by frequently—and even verse-internally—placing trochaic words in weak-strong sequences as in Eng. blank verse.

In Ger. poetry, iambic pentameter verse occurred mostly in its rhymed version. However, after Schiller's early specimen Das verschleierte Bild zu Sais (1795), early mod. poets like C. F. Meyer, Stefan George, von Hofmannsthal, and R. M. Rilke (in two of his Duineser Elegien) used blank verse for some of their best poetry. Despite the predilection among contemp. poets for free verse, blank verse can still be found, be it in the form of entire poems in blank verse (by Arnfrid Astel and Thomas Rosenlöcher in Jahrbuch der Lyrik 2001) or intermingled with shorter lines (Günter Grass) or "hidden" in scattered passages (sometimes incongruent with the printed lines) of free-verse poems (Volker Braun, Norbert Hummelt).

Blank verse in Ger. has at times been criticized as being rhythmically monotonous. Compared to Eng., Ger. blank verse is more "regular" because Ger. lexical words tend to have an unstressed syllable that naturally falls on a weak position, while the lexically stressed syllable falls just as naturally on the strong position (*ictus). However, this view overlooks the rhythmic potential of blank verse in the hands of a poet with a fine ear (such as Goethe or Lessing) and ignores the subtleties of meaning created by an interplay between meter and rhythm.

V. Scandinavian. In Scandinavia, blank verse was introduced as an effect of romanticism at the end of the 18th c. It soon replaced the alexandrine in the narrative, philosophical, and dramatic genres. Originally, the Eng. and Ger. varieties were adopted, and trans. of Shakespeare's plays enhanced the reputation of the new meter. The assimilation of blank verse in Scandinavia can be attributed to two factors: the lack of end rhyme in blank verse suited the Scandinavian langs., with their scarcity of rhyme words; and the habit of realizing just four out of five prominence positions brought blank verse close to the med. four-beat line. As it grew in use, the Scandinavian variant of blank verse became distinguished by its alternation between lines of 10 and 11 syllables.

In Denmark, Johannes Ewald initially attempted blank verse in 1768. His music drama Balders Død (1773) introduced hendecasyllabic blank verse in Denmark, probably of It. extraction. A. G. Oehlenschläger's first play in blank verse was the comedy Aladdin (1805). He used the decasyllable with masculine endings, following the Eng. and the Ger. styles.

The earliest instances of Norwegian blank verse are some farces by Henrik Wergeland, whose versification was probably inspired by Shakespeare. Blank verse in the style of the Danish forerunners dominated Norwegian drama from the middle of the 19th c. Henrik Ibsen tested blank verse in his first play Catilina (1850), and Bjønstjerne Bjørnson composed excellent blank verse in his saga dramas Halte-Hulda (1858) and Kong Sverre (1861).

In Sweden, blank verse was introduced with J. H. Kellgren's narrative fragment Sigvarth och Hilma (1788), which was inspired by Ewald's works. The poet F. M. Franzén, influenced by Shakespeare, elaborated blank verse in the 1790s. Since then, blank verse has been a popular Swedish measure in the narrative and philosophical genres, with contributions by poets such as E. J. Stagnelius, Birger Sjöberg, and Gunnar Ekelöf. Most of the space opera Aniara (1956) by Harry Martinson is written in blank verse. The versification of Göran Palm's Sverige—en vintersaga (1984–2005) is a mod. blank verse that comes close to the rhythm of spoken lang.

VI. Slavic. Rus. blank verse emerged in 18th-c. imitations of antiquity, e.g., Vasily Trediakovsky's syllabic blank-verse version of François Fénelon's Aventures de Télémaque (1699) and A. D. Kantemir's renderings of Horace. In the 19th c., under the influence of Vasily Zhukovsky's trans. (1817–21) of Schiller's Die Jungfrau von Orleans and Alexander Pushkin's Boris Godunov (1825), iambic pentameter blank verse became widely associated with drama. Simultaneously, Rus. blank verse appeared in folk stylizations, e.g., Pushkin's "Tale of the Fisherman and the Fish" (1833) and "Songs of the Western Slavs" (1835), inspired by the Serbo-

Croatian epic decasyllable, and Mikhail Lermontov's "Song of the Merchant Kalashnikov" (1837), as well as in lyric monologues such as Pushkin's "Again I visited" (1835), where it acquired a semantic aura later echoed by such 20th-c. poets as Alexander Blok, Vladislav Khodasevich, and Joseph Brodsky.

In Poland, dactylic-hexameter blank verse was employed by Ren. poets writing in Lat. Hendecasyllabic blank verse in Polish-lang. poetry had It. roots; Jan Kochanowski used it in his tragedy The Dismissal of Greek Envoys (1578). Polish trans. from antiquity and from Eng., Ger., and It. featured blank verse; however, rhymed verse was the standard for Polish drama. Blank verse plays include Jozef Korzeniowski's The Monk (1830) and Gypsies (1857), J. C. Słowacki's Lilla Weneda (1840, partially rhymed), and Cyprian Norwid's 1880 comedy Pure Love at a Seaside Spa.

■ English: S. Johnson, Rambler, nos. 86–96 (1751); Schipper; J. A. Symonds, Blank Verse (1895); J. B. Mayor, Chapters on English Metre, 2d ed. (1901); E. Gosse, "Blank Verse," Encyclopedia Britannica, 11th ed. (1910–11); Bridges; R. D. Havens, The Influence of Milton on English Poetry (1922); A. Oras, Blank Verse and Chronology in Milton (1966); R. Beum, "So Much Gravity and Ease," Language and Style in Milton, ed. R. D. Emma and J. T. Shawcross (1967); R. Fowler, "Three Blank Verse Textures," The Languages of Literature (1971); E. R. Weismiller, "Blank Verse," "Versification," and J. T. Shawcross, "Controversy over Blank Verse," A Milton Encyclopedia, ed. W. B. Hunter Jr., 8 v. (1978–80); Brogan, 356 ff.; H. Suhamy, Le Vers de Shakespeare (1984); M. Tarlinskaja, Shakespeare's Verse (1987); G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); J. Thompson, The Founding of English Metre, 2d ed. (1989); O. B. Hardison Jr., Prosody and Purpose in the English Renaissance (1989); A. Hecht, "Blank Verse," Finch and Varnes; R. B. Shaw, Blank Verse (2007).

■ Spanish and Portuguese: I. Navarrete, Orphans of Petrarch (1994); Historia y Crítica de la Literatura Española, ed. F. Rico, 7 v. (1991–95); Juán Boscán, Obra Completa, ed. C. Clavería (1999); António Ferreira, Poemas Lusitanos, ed. T. F. Earle (2000); Fernando de Herrera, Anotaciones a la poesía de Garcilaso, ed. I. Pepe and J. M. Reyes (2001); H.J.S. Alves, "Milton after Corte-Real," MP 106 (2009).

■ German: J. G. Herder, Ueber die neuere deutsche Literatur. Fragmente, 2d ed. (1768); F. Zarncke, Über den fünffüssigen Jambus mit besonderer Rücksicht auf seine Behandlung durch Lessing, Schiller und Goethe (1865); A. Sauer, Ueber den fünffüssigen Iambus vor Lessing's "Nathan" (1878); E. Zitelmann, Der Rhythmus des fünffüßigen Jambus (1907); W. Rube, Der fünffüssige Jambus bei Hebbel (1910); L. Hettich, Der fünffüssige Jambus in den Dramen Goethes (1913); R. Haller, "Studie über den deutschen Blankvers," Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 31 (1957); R. Bräuer, Tonbewegung und Erscheinungsformen des sprachlichen Rhythmus (1964); L. Schädle, Der frühe deutsche Blankvers unter besonderer Berücksichtigung seiner Verwendung durch Chr. M. Wieland (1972); B. Bjorklund, A Study in Comparative Prosody (1978); D. Chisholm, "Prosodische Aspekte des Blankversdramas," Literaturwissenschaft und empirische Methoden, ed. H. Kreuzer and R. Viehoff (1981); C. Küper, Sprache und Metrum (1988), and "Blankvers," Reallexikon III, v. 1 (1997).

■ Scandinavian: O. Sylwan, Den svenska versen från 1600-talets början, v. 1–3 (1925–34); O. Sylwan, Svensk verskonst. Från Wivallius till Karlfeldt (1934); H. Lie, Norsk verslære (1967); J. Fafner, Dansk vershistorie, v. 1–3 (1994–2000); E. Lilja, Svensk metrik (2006).

■ Slavic: K. Estreicher, Bibliografia Polska, v. 1 (1870); R. Jakobson, "Slavic Epic Verse," v. 4 (1966); M. Gasparov, Ocherk istori russkogo stikha (1984); Terras; M. Wachtel, Development of Russian Verse (1999); L. Pszolowska, "Dve literatury i dve modeli stikha," Slavianskii stikh, ed. M. Gasparov et al. (2001); S. Zurawski, "Wiersz biały," Literatura polska. Encyklopedia PWN (2007).

E. R. Weismiller (It.); T.V.F. Brogan, R. B. Shaw, E. R. Weismiller, G. T. Wright (Eng.); H.J.S. Alves (Sp. and Port.); C. Küper (Ger.); E. Lilja (Scand.); N. Friedberg (Slavic)

BLASON. A descriptive poem in praise or blame of a single object (Thomas Sébillet, L'art poétique, 1548). It gained popularity in mid-16th c. France after Clément Marot's "Blason du beau tétin" (1536) gave rise to the vogue of the blason anatomique. However, the term is first used in the late 15th c. with the loose definition of propos ("speech") or even "dialogue" in works such as Guillaume Alexis' Blason des Faulces Amours (1486) or Guillaume Coquillart's Blason des armes et des dames (1484).

The blason received its stricter early mod. definition after Marot's poem, written while in exile in Ferrara and probably influenced by Olimpo da Sassoferrato's love poetry. In response to the poetic competition launched by Marot, dozens of poems celebrating some part of the female body were composed in France and collected in an illustrated anthol., first pub. as a short annex to Leon Battista Alberti's Hecatomphilia (1536, 1537, 1539), then as an independent volume, the Blasons anatomiques du corps femenin: Ensemble les Contreblasons (1543, 1550, 1554, 1568). In spite of Marot's injunction to avoid offending words or body parts, many blasons from that collection fall under the category of the obscene, in the satirical trad. of the paradoxical eulogy. The genre of the contreblason, also initiated by Marot, turns the genre upside down, either by deriding ugly objects or by criticizing the very enterprise of praising the human body (Charles de La Hueterie, Le Contreblason de la beaulté des membres du corps humain, 1537).

The poetics of the blason has been connected to its heraldic origin (a description of a coat of arms); to the *emblem, where woodcut, poetic description, and interpretation are similarly linked; to mannerism (Saunders, Vickers 1997, Giordano); and to ekphrasis and epideixis (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY). Frequently used devices include *anaphora, enumeratio, and *hyperbole.

According to Sébillet, a good blason should be brief, set in octo- or decasyllabic verses, in couplets, and have an epigrammatic conclusion. However, blasons have from the start been of various lengths: they are less defined by a specific format than by their descriptive and epideictic mode. The *Pléiade expanded the genre with sonnets-blasons and hymnes-blasons; Paul Éluard, René Étiemble, and Régine Detambel revived it in prose and *free verse in the 20th c.

In studies of early mod. Eur. poetry, the blason has been discussed in the 1980s and 1990s as an instance of appropriation and control. From the perspective of feminist poetics, the blazon is a male inventory of the female body; from that of postcolonial studies, a way of mapping and taking control of the Other.

See CATALOG, DESCRIPTIVE POETRY, FEMINIST APPROACHES TO POETRY, PETRARCHISM, SATIRE.

■ J. Vianey, Le Pétrarquisme en France au XVI^e siècle (1909); R. E. Pike, "The Blasons in French Literature of the 16th Century," RR 27 (1936); K. Kazimierz, "Des Recherches sur l'évolution du blason au XVI^e siècle," Zagadnienia Rodzajow Literarick (1967); D. B. Wilson, Descriptive Poetry in France from Blason to Baroque (1967); A. Tomarken and E. Tomarken, "The Rise and Fall of the Sixteenth-century French Blason," Symposium 29 (1975); N. J. Vickers, "Diana Described: Scattered Woman and Scattered Rhyme," CritI 8 (1981); A. Saunders, The Sixteenth-century Blason Poétique (1982); N. J. Vickers, "'The Blazon of Sweet Beauty's Best': Shakespeare's Lucrece," Shakespeare and the Question of Theory, ed. P. Parker and G. Hartman (1985); P. Parker, "Rhetorics of Property: Exploration, Inventory, Blazon," Literary Fat Ladies (1987); N. J. Vickers, "Members Only: Marot's Anatomical Blazons," The Body in Parts, ed. D. Hillman and C. Mazzio (1997); M. J. Giordano, "The Blason anatomique and Related Fields: Emblematics, Nominalism, Mannerism, and Descriptive Anatomy as Illustrated by M. Scève's Blason de la Gorge," An Interregnum of the Sign, ed. D. Graham (2001).

I. SILVER; T.V.F. BROGAN; C. ALDUY

BLUES. Originating in Af. Am. folk culture, the blues has developed into a central inspiration for a great deal of Am. poetry. The music is distinguished thematically and philosophically by its posture of direct confrontation with the melancholy psychological state also called blues that is produced by unfortunate circumstances of lost love or unjust circumstances of racism and poverty. Ralph Ellison describes this motivation behind the music: "The blues is an impulse to keep the painful details and episodes of a brutal experience alive in one's aching consciousness, to finger its jagged grain, and to transcend it, not by the consolation of philosophy but by squeezing from it a near-tragic, near-comic lyricism." In other words, the blues transcends the pain by keeping it alive in the music itself.

This lyricism took many forms, though it has come to be associated most directly with the 12-bar blues. This form consists of three lines with an aab rhyme scheme, with the first line repeated in the second, often with slight variation in syntax or intonation, and with the third providing either ironic commentary or some resolution or both, as in the following lines from "The Backwater Blues": "Backwater blues done call me to pack my things and go / Backwater blues done call me to pack my things and go. / 'Cause my house fell down and I can't live there no more." These lines also convey the typical sense of loss and isolation that permeates the blues and that is reinforced by the repetition, as well as the understatement and ironic humor with which the singer confronts that loss, since her house "fell down" in the third line not of its own volition but because of the dramatic and destructive Mississippi flood of 1927. Indeed, clichés about the blues are sometimes true, as many songs mourn lost loves, castigate two-timing lovers, lament loneliness, and confess melancholy, though occasionally with a similarly understated tongue in cheek, leading Langston Hughes famously to characterize the blues as sometimes laughing to keep from crying. This tone of sadness is also expressed by what is sometimes called the "blue note," notes in the music scale distinctively flattened to melancholic effect. Simultaneously, a call-and-response interaction between voice and instrument, and between singer and audience, expresses at least the hope for unity and sympathy in the isolation. Through this complex leavening of melancholy with ironic humor, the blues exemplifies a defining tragic-comic humor and subtle emotional affirmation of Af. Am. folk culture.

Its own kind of verse, the blues inspired a great number of Af. Am. poets with this formal enactment of its psychological state, its stoic sensibility, and its existential philosophy, allowing the poet to extend into verse the central ideas and practices of black oral trads. First, the blues derives from spirituals, slave work songs and field hollers, cultural forms of communal unity, spiritual renewal, and, at times, political resistance developed by enslaved Afs. and by Af. Ams. enduring segregation. Second, blues singers often adapt folk ballads, using such folk heroes as John Henry, High John the Conqueror, and Stagolee as subjects and even as personae. Also, like those *ballads, blues songs use *rhyme and *repetition to create possibilities for humor, irony, and *lament that would be familiar to the almost exclusively black original audiences for the music. In addition, blues musicians often sing personalized versions of the same songs—called standards—and improvise on several standard *tropes, incl. the train and its whistle as symbols of mobility, moments of decision on the crossroads, and the flood of 1927, as well as the well-known themes of lost or cheating loves. Improvisation itself—the ability to "riff" on common themes and to change songs in every performance—was part of this stoic assertion of self by offering personal versions of common problems. In these ways, the blues fosters the creation of a distinctive Af. Am. communal culture as a bulwark against social oppression and existential angst.

From these common themes and cultural roots emerged varied modes of song that, in their various ways, would come to characterize blues poetry. There is the so-called classic blues like "Backwater Blues" sung in recordings by such well-known artists as Ma Rainey and Bessie Smith, women who complicated the music's traditionally masculine themes with their female perspectives and who helped to establish the 12-bar blues as the music's most identifiable form. There are also several regional subgenres, including the originating, acoustic Mississippi delta blues, which produced Robert Johnson and Muddy Waters, among others; the urban, electric guitar-based Chicago blues; and the later, jazz-influenced Kansas City blues. New Orleans boasts Dr. John, while Eric Clapton is celebrated for his mod. versions of the music.

Langston Hughes initiated the now-prevalent practice of adapting this empowering existential self-assertion of the blues and its variegated musical forms and trads. to literary poetry. In one of his best-known poems, "The Weary Blues," Hughes describes a blues musician whose singing was inspiring and who eased his own pain so that he could sleep. Hughes also included lyrics from an actual song called "The Weary Blues." Moreover, in many other poems, Hughes translated the 12-bar blues into six-line stanzas, both by adapting actual lyrics of the urban blues he heard in Harlem and by creating his own. His contemporary in the 1920s, Sterling A. Brown, likewise adapted rural blues songs from his folklore research into poetry. This turn to folk culture for poetic sources was characteristic of the *Harlem Renaissance, the cultural flourishing of Af. Ams. in and around Harlem in the 1920s in which Hughes and Brown participated. Since then, Gwendolyn Brooks, Melvin B. Tolson, Robert Hayden, Honoree Fannonne Jeffers, and Kevin Young are among the many poets who found in the wit, sarcasm, and existentialism of the music an approach amenable to portraying black people realistically and complexly, eliciting call-and-response relations between poet and poem analogous to that of blues musician and audience. The posture of self-affirmation in the face of a rigid society also appealed to Beat poets (see BEAT POETRY).

Indeed, the blues has come to be understood not only as one of the defining practices and sensibilities of Af. Am. popular and literary culture but as a distinctive Af. Am. contribution to Am. culture, literary and otherwise. E.g., Houston A. Baker suggested that the critic of Af. Am. lit. was much like a blues musician sitting at the crossroads whose imagination constitutes what Baker called a "blues matrix." Tony Bolden went further, implying that even such cultural forms as the *spiritual were actually blues-inflected. Moreover, most scholars of music in poetry acknowledge that jazz not only emerged from the blues but constitutes a musical and thematic continuum from the saddest, most stoic blues to a joyful, improvisational jazz celebration (see JAZZ POETRY). As scholars such as Sascha Feinstein, Meta DuEwa Jones, T. J. Anderson, and Kimberly Benston have pointed out, there is a jazz-blues aesthetic in Am. poetry, ranging from Jack Kerouac to Yusef Komunyakaa. There are also now folk festivals dedicated to the blues and many of its figures—Robert Johnson, B.B. King, Bessie Smith, Ma Rainey—have become cultural icons, clarifying the powerful influence of the blues.

See MUSIC AND POETRY.

■ P. Oliver, The Meaning of the Blues (1963); R. Ellison, Shadow and Act (1965); A. Murray, Stomping the Blues (1976); H. A. Baker Jr., Blues, Ideology and Afro-American Literature (1984); S. Tracy, Langston Hughes and the Blues (1988); The Jazz Poetry Anthology, ed. S. Feinstein and Y. Komunyakaa (1996); T. Gioia, The History of Jazz (1997); A. Davis, Blues Legacies and Black Feminism: Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, Bessie Smith and Billie Holiday (1998); K. Benston, Performing Blackness: Enactments of African American Modernism (2000); M. Jones, "Jazz Prosodies: Orality and Texuality," Callaloo 25 (2002); T. J. Anderson, Notes to Make the Sound Come Right: Four Innovations of Jazz Poetry (2004); T. Bolden, Afro-Blue: Improvisations in African American Poetry and Culture (2004).

K. D. LEONARD

BOB AND WHEEL. A set of *heterometric poetic lines coming at the end of an *isometric stanza. The connecting line, the "bob," is shorter than the others; the following lines, the "wheel," rhyme with themselves and the bob. Both bobs and wheels occur independently of one another in med. poetry as well as together. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, the most celebrated example of the two used together, culminates a series of instances from the 12th c. onward in ME, according to Guest. Following Borroff, both Cable and Duncan emphasize the number of syllables per line over metrical stress, Borroff calling ME rhymed verse "a compromise between native and continental metrical principles" (145). Other examples include the ME poems "Somer Sunday" and "Sir Tristrem," several of the Towneley mystery plays, incl. The Second Shepherd's Play, and Chaucer's "Tale of Sir Thopas."

■ E. Guest, History of English Rhythms (1838); M. Borroff, "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight": A Stylistic and Metrical Study (1962); E. G. Stanley, "The Use of Bob-Lines in Sir Thopas," NM 73 (1972); T. Turville-Petre, " 'Summer Sunday,' 'De Tribus Regibus Mortuis,' and 'The Awntyrs off Arthure': Three Poems in the Thirteen-Line Stanza," RES 25 (1974), and The Alliterative Revival (1977); T. Cable, The English Alliterative Tradition (1991); A Companion to the Middle English Lyric, ed. T. G. Duncan (2005).

L. L. HOWES

BOLIVIA, POETRY OF. Hists. of Bolivian poetry have regularly struggled to incorporate the poetry created in all the langs. spoken in the nation. Besides Sp., the official lang. and lingua franca, at least three langs. are widely spoken in Bolivia: Aymara, Quechua, and Guaraní. Lit. hists. have been able to describe poetry written in Sp. since the colonial period and have sought to include the poetry written in the indigenous langs., but with limited success. The major impediment is that poetry in native langs. usually is part of an oral trad.

(i.e., none of these cultures had developed advanced writing systems; see ORAL POETRY). Thus, hists. of Bolivian poetry usually start with those texts written in Sp. after the arrival of Francisco Pizarro and Diego de Almagro and the conquest of the Incas (1531–33). Because the major part of the territory of what today is Bolivia (then called Kollasuyo) was part of the Inca Empire, this moment in hist. is considered an origin for the production of Bolivian lit. The present article will follow this conventional route (see also INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE).

Bolivian scholars agree that, for the colonial period (1531–1825), the criteria for defining authorship should rely on location more than place of birth for attributing a text to Bolivian lit. hist. Thus Bolivian poetry of the colonial period includes both the poems written by men and women born in the region and those written by colonists of the territory of the Royal Audience of Charcas (1599), an appellate court with jurisdiction over the region that would become Bolivia. Coplas a la muerte de Don Diego de Almagro (Songs on the Death of Diego de Almagro, ca. 1540) is recognized as the first poem written in Bolivian territory by an anonymous Sp. poet. Not very skillfully written, this is an epic romance of the execution of Almagro perpetrated by the Pizarro family in 1538. The most important writer of the 16th c. is Diego Dávalos y Figueroa (1552–1608), an Andalusian who lived and died in the city of La Paz. Dávalos wrote a text in prose, the Miscelánea Austral (Austral Miscellany), and a book of poems, the Defensa de damas (Defense of Ladies), that were published together in Lima in 1602 and received with great admiration by the intellectuals of the Viceroyalty of Peru. Dávalos's writings are considered the best example of *Petrarchism in the Sp. colonies. The life and work of Dávalos are tightly related to the intellectual life of his wife, Francisca de Briviesca y Arellano (ca. 1547–1616). She was a learned woman whose participation in her husband's production seems to have been very significant. In the Defensa de damas, she may be the poetess to which the poems refer, as well as the Cilena who signs one of the laudatory poems at the beginning of the book. This exquisite sonnet is the first poem pub. by a woman in the Viceroyalty of Peru. Moreover, the Defensa de damas is the first feminist poem in Bolivian—and Latin Am.—lit.

During the 16th and 17th cs., the wealth of the imperial city of Potosí, based in the exploitation of the silver in its famous mountain, attracted adventurers from the New and Old Worlds looking for quick prosperity. Potosí became an exuberant and opulent city typical of the Am. *baroque, drawing numerous writers in the 17th c.

The Port. poet Henrique Garcés (ca. 1522–95), who had an important role in adapting Petrarch's poetry throughout the Viceroyalty of Peru, may have lived in Potosí while he tried to implement a process to separate silver by the use of mercury. His trans. of Petrarch's Canzoniere (1591) and his own poetry were so well known that Miguel de Cervantes mentioned him in a poem. The most important poet of the 17th c. to have dwelled in Potosí is Luis de Ribera (ca. 1555–1623). Born in Seville, he lived in Potosí as well as in La Plata from at least 1621 to 1623. His only book is a collection of religious poetry, Sagradas poesías (Sacred Poems), published in Seville in 1612. Ribera worked in a sophisticated baroque style, and despite the devotional orientation, an intense eroticism pervades many of his poems. He had a preference for biblical themes that allowed him to display erotic topics, such as the drunkenness of Lot raped by his daughters or the nakedness of Bathsheba. His poetry is considered not only one of the peaks of Bolivian and Latin Am. colonial production, but among the best of the Sp. Golden Age. Diego Mexía de Fernengil (ca. 1555–after 1617), another important figure born in Seville, resided in Potosí from 1609 to 1617. He was a friend of Ribera, with whom he shared strong religious beliefs. Mexía was a reputed translator of Ovid. In 1608, he published the first part of his Parnaso Antártico (Antarctic Parnassus), a trans. of Ovid's Heroides. While in Potosí, he probably wrote the second part of the Parnaso Antártico, a collection of sonnets, some of them inspired by illustrations of the life of Christ made by the Jesuit Jerónimo Nadal.

José de Antequera (1689–1731) was perhaps the finest poet of the 18th c. He was a judge of the Audience of Charcas, but he rebelled against the Sp. Crown. Sentenced to death in 1731, he wrote several sonnets while in prison, lamenting his fate and the passing of time. The "Testamento de Potosí" (Potosí's Testament, 1800), by an anonymous poet, may well be the closing text of the colonial period. This is a book of satirical poetry that anticipates the character of much 19th-c. poetry.

Bolivia began its independence movement in 1810 and became a nation in 1825. These were long years of war, and few literary texts were produced or survived the armed struggle. In the first decades of the republic, the social and political situation was not much better. Political turmoil engulfed many of the promising writers of this period. *Romanticism, the dominant literary style in Sp. America, did not have large numbers of Bolivian cultivators. However, there were a few poets whose works are recognized as valuable. The outstanding poet of this period is Ricardo José Bustamante (1821–84). He studied in Paris, where he became familiar with Eur. lit.; his best-known poem is "Preludio al Mamoré" (Prelude to the Mamoré). Another important romantic poet is the blind María Josefa Mujía (1812–88), who is considered the first woman writer of the newly independent nation. Her poetry draws on her blindness to convey a dark and tragic perception of life. It is worth mentioning Manuel José Tovar (1831–69), whose poem "La creación" (The Creation), based in the biblical Genesis, is one of the jewels of Bolivian romantic poetry.

The transition to mod. poetry of the 20th c. followed two roads: one opened by the poetry of Adela Zamudio (1854–1928), inclined toward social issues; the other by Ricardo Jaimes Freyre (1866–1933), focused on the renovation of poetic lang., a phenomenon fueled by Sp. Am. modernismo*. Zamudio's poetry is in some measure romantic, but a profound consciousness of her social situation as a woman generates a radical crit. of the hypocrisy of Bolivian patriarchal society. She is considered the most important feminist writer in Bolivian lit. In her life and works, she was a defender of childhood and women as well as a critic of Bolivian education, in the hands of the Catholic Church at the time. Her best known poem is "Nacer hombre" (To Be Born a Man), a strong crit. of men's privileges. Jaimes Freyre is considered, with Rubén Darío and Leopoldo Lugones, one of the founders of modernismo. He and Darío wrote a *manifesto in 1894 that is considered the beginning of this literary movement. In 1905, Freyre wrote Leyes de la versificación castellana (Laws of Castilian Versification), an innovative treatise about the laws of versification in the Sp. lang. His most famous book of poetry is Castalia bárbara (Barbarous Castalia), a poetic recreation of some themes of Scandinavian mythology.

It has been argued that the dominant intellect of the first half of the 20th c. in Bolivia was Franz Tamayo (1879–1956). His poetry was fed by the modernist style; however, he took that style to phonetic extremes even as he used cl. Greco-Roman lit. as the foundation of his poetry. He developed a voice so distinctive that it made him the preeminent poet of Bolivia. His erudition allowed him to write poetry heavy with references to antiquity, esp. the cl. trad., as these titles may indicate: Epigramas griegos (Greek Epigrams), Scopas, and his best-known book, La Prometheida (The Promethiad, 1917), a meditation on the Prometheus myth.

The avant-garde movements of the first decades of the 20th c. had some late followers in Bolivia. It is worth mentioning Guillermo Viscarra Fabre (1900–80) and Julio de la Vega (b. 1924). But perhaps the most original poet with avant-garde affinities is Edmundo Camargo (1936–64). These three poets made profuse use of visual images and surrealist topics common in the period's avant-garde movements. Yolanda Bedregal (1916–99), named "Yolanda of Bolivia," was considered an official symbol of Bolivian poetry in the second half of the 20th c. The main topics of her poetry are women as the foundation of the family and God. Although love is central to her writings, it is not always viewed as an easy or pure emotion. Love in her poetry is constantly faced with emotional challenges such as hatred or abuse.

If the first half of the 20th c. was dominated by Tamayo, the second part saw two poets, both his admirers, as the major figures of Bolivian poetry: Oscar Cerruto (1912–81) and Jaime Saenz (1921–86). Cerruto's poetry continues to employ a cl. lang., but without Tamayo's considerable erudition. Impelled by a search for the "precise word" and by his admiration for Sp. Golden Age poetry, Cerruto developed an extremely unadorned poetry to express a disenchanted view of Bolivian society. Among his books, Patria de sal cautiva (Fatherland, Captive of Salt, 1958) and Estrella segregada (Outcast Star, 1975) are considered masterpieces. Saenz's alcoholism and troubling obsession with death became the source of his philosophical and poetic view of life. He experienced his life as a path to transcendental meaning, always bordering on self-destruction. His poetry is born out of this search as a mystical and demonic quest. By the use of nonsense, paradox, and oxymoron, his poetry forces lang. to the limits of signification. Books such as Aniversario de una visión (Anniversary of a Vision, 1960), Recorrer esta distancia (To Cross this Distance, 1973), and La noche (The Night, 1984) are extraordinary examples of a deeply eccentric Bolivian (and Latin Am.) poetics.

The end of the 20th c. and the beginning of the 21st saw at least three important poets: Eduardo Mitre (b. 1943), Humberto Quino (b. 1950), and Blanca Wiethüchter (1947–2004). Mitre writes a celebratory poetry in a highly crafted lang. where words and objects can trade places in the seamless space of the erotic. Quino has produced a no less precise poetry but of an opposite character, by looking at himself with irony, sarcasm, and self-contempt. Wiethüchter wrote a poetry of permanent self-searching that speaks of her womanhood in terms of desire and intellectual aptitude. Her feminism can be seen in the poems of Itaca (Ithaca, 2000), where she uses Penelope's voice to recognize how little she needs and wants the return of Odysseus.

See COLONIAL POETICS; GUARANÍ POETRY; SPAIN, POETRY OF; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ A. Cáceres Romero, Nueva historia de la literatura boliviana, 3 v. (1987–95); Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, ed. R. González Echevarría and E. Pupo-Walker, 3 v. (1996); Diccionario histórico de Bolivia, ed. J. M. Barnadas, G. Calvo, and J. Ticlla, 2 v. (2002); Hacia una historia crítica de la literatura en Bolivia, ed. B. Wiethüchter and A. M. Paz-Soldán (2002).

L. García-Pabón

BOOK, POETIC

I. Medieval and Early Modern
II. Modern, Postmodern, and Postbook

I. Medieval and Early Modern. Book is an inclusive term. Applied to cuneiform tablets, papyrus rolls, bound objects, and electronic devices, it refers both to historically specific literary technologies and to writing in general. This combination drives the book's paradoxical relationship to poetic form and lit. hist. On one hand, books are simply material objects, vehicles for the ostensibly more primary artistic and intellectual works they contain. On the other, their format implies a poetic dimension, a *trope for writing, a shaping force, and a silent collaborator in reading. Similarly, books are at once marked by the time of their construction and transcendent of that time, able to project the human imagination across centuries. The poetics of the book derives from its ability to span these contradictions, to figure paradox as unity and thus to sustain the fragmentary, fissured nature of representation as a coherent whole. In this, the technology of the book asserts a poetic and temporal form at a literary level beneath authorial intention. Book is an inclusive term, then, not only because it encompasses multiple technologies of inscription but because it is a jointly material and discursive object of figural representation.

For the med. and early mod. periods, the dominant form of the book is the codex. Derived from the Lat. for "the trunk of a tree," the codex originated as a writing tablet, a wooden board with a carved depression in its center filled with red or black wax and written on with a hard stylus. Homer describes Proteus as using a "folded tablet" in the Iliad (6.168), suggesting that, by the 8th or 9th c. BCE, the codex had developed from a slate to two pieces of wood fastened together, a hinged object that protected its internal message. Early examples of the codex feature additional internal leaves of wood, papyrus (a writing surface made from Egyptian reeds), or parchment (animal skin). Throughout the Gr. and Roman world, such codices were used for notational writing—drafts, lessons, calculations, and lists—and were, thus, secondary to the roll. Books are known as a permanent record, yet they originate as a technology for ephemera; and so the hist. of the book, an object that symbolizes depth of learning but is effectively defined by its covers, is cross-cut by contradiction.

This contradictory quality is first articulated by the epigrammist Martial (pseud. of Marcus Valerius Martialis, ca. 40–103), who reflects on the codex in the second poem of his revised Epigrams (ca. 103):

> Qui tecum cupis esse meos ubicumque libellos > et comites longae quaeris habere viae, > hos eme, quos artat brevibus membrana tabellis:
> scrinia da magnis, me manus una capit.
> ne tamen ignores ubi sim venalis et erres > urbe vagus tota, me duce certus eris; > libertum docti Lucensis quaere Secundum
> limina post Pacis Palladiaeque forum. (1.2)
>
> [You who want to have my books with you wherever you go, and who are looking to have them as companions on a long journey, buy these, which the parchment confines within small covers: give cylinders to the great, one hand can hold me. That you should not be ignorant of where I am on sale and wander aimlessly over the whole city, with me as your guide you will be certain: look for Secundus, the freedman of learned Lucensis, beyond the threshold of the Temple of Peace and the Forum of Minerva.] (Fitzgerald)

In its emphasis on buying and selling, on carrying, covers, and great cylinders, the poem is chiefly about the form of the book. It is also about self-fashioning, about Martial's formulation of his *persona as an urban poet-about-town. Martial highlights a tension between these two forms, book and author, through a metonymic change of name ("I am on sale," "with me as your guide"). This tension is contained in the very word he uses for the codex, libellus, which (as Fitzgerald remarks) means both a single petition and a complete book of poems. Martial's is a book of petitions twice over: once in that it is a series of fragmentary short poems integrated as a collection by the genre of *epigram and once again in that it is a series of individual sheets constructed into a unity by the codex's binding. Implicitly, Martial asks which is the operative genre that structures his poetry and his poetic self, epigram or codex? From the very start of literary commentary on the book, Martial recognizes that the book-as-codex involves both surface and depth, physical and discursive genres for poetic representation.

Shortly after Martial's observation, the early Christian communities at Antioch and Jerusalem developed the codex from a secondary writing aid to a major textual form. By the 4th c., the codex rivaled the roll, so much so that the term biblios became common in Antioch for school texts or Christian books; by the 5th c., 89% of all remaining Gr. books are in the form of the codex. In a quantifiable way, the representative potential inherent in the codex found an audience in Christian readers and writers, and this energized its technological devel. The early Christians' predilection for the codex has no clear explanation beyond the jointly physical and discursive capacities suggested by Martial: codices imply a unified canon even if the actual texts they contain are only fragmentary. In each case—material surface and intellectual depth (substitution), change of name (object for author), and part for whole (a selection of texts representing a total collection)—the codex operates through a singular tropological principle, *metonymy: i.e., technology always includes a figural as well as a material sense. For the book, these two elements coalesce in metonymy. Thus, as much as the book is a material form, it is also a poetic one.

Throughout the Middle Ages, book producers experimented with ways of making the mise-en-page (scene of the page) more expressive of this unity. For example, decorative elements such as historiated initials (an introductory capital letter containing a picture, portrait, or scene within it), miniatures (pictures related to the contents), and illuminations (gold or silver decorations that create a sense of light from within the book) transformed the page from a textual to a visual space. Across the 12th and 13th cs., fraternal religious organizations and the Parisian academic book trade developed a visual system to represent the text's internal rhetorical organization, its ordinatio, which included numerals, paragraph marks, underlinings, rubrics (the practice of writing titles or marginal glosses in a contrasting color such as red), and tables of contents, all designed to guide the reader's experience. These readers added their own marks to the page. Indeed, the making of books blurs the roles of reader and writer, and this was recognized, in the 13th c. esp., in the compiler, whose task was to reassemble—combine, rearrange, and order by chapter and section—authoritative texts according to a new organizational scheme. Each of these cases—decoration, ordination, and compilation—describes a process by which book makers augmented the texts they copied with design elements unique to the format of the book and in so doing created an increasingly sophisticated and unified object.

Thus, the codex emerges as a powerful trope across the med. and early mod. periods. From Augustine's reading of Paul in his personal Bible in the Confessions, to Petrarch's reading of Augustine in his portable copy of the Confessions on Mont Ventoux, the intellectual markers of both the med. and the mod. recur on the object of the book. For Eng. poetics, the act of poetic making and book making become almost inseparable. E.g., in the conclusion to book 5 of Troilus and Criseyde, Chaucer (ca. 1345–1400) writes:

> Go, litel bok, go, litel myn tragedye,
> Ther God thi makere yet, er that he dye,
> So sende myght to make in som comedye!
> But litel book, no making thow n'envie,
> But subgit be to alle poesye;
> And kis the steppes where as thow seest pace
> Virgile, Ovide, Omer, Lucan, and Stace.
> (5.1786–92)

Here, as in Martial, is the notion of book as proxy for the author. Yet Chaucer's book is not simply a metonymic stand-in; possessing its own emotions and engaging in its own activities, it constitutes a metaleptic function in which the book-as-metonym appears within a larger figure of lit. hist. as a pantheon of named authors. This is true for the ms. hist. of Troilus and Criseyde as well, for there exists no authorial version of this important text. The remaining mss. of the poem were copied in the 15th c., after Chaucer's death, and not one presents the poem in an authorial form. Rather, most of these versions were created from small booklets or quires, circulated by London lending shops and each possessing variations. The scribes who borrowed these texts were freelance craftsmen, loosely organized by stationers who subcontracted the work, apparently at times out of a tenement that operated as physical hive for the division of labor. Just as Chaucer's "litel bok" appears in a lit. hist. of named authors as a semiautonomous representation, Troilus and Criseyde emerges from Eng. literary book culture as an independent construction. The book is a metonymic machine: assembled from parts, it unifies rhetorical and material fragments in the face of contradiction, creating a physical embodiment of a literary imagination that perhaps never existed.

Print technology significantly expands the volume of book production, but it does not revolutionize the fundamental assembly process. Again, the hist. of Troilus and Criseyde is instructive. First printed by William Caxton in 1483, it appeared in a series of seemingly separate publications, culminating in William Thynne's famous 1532 ed. of Chaucer's collected works. Thynne's ed. was reprinted and expanded throughout the 16th and 17th cs., finding definitive expression in Francis Thynne's 1602 version. In this progression, the literary *canon appears to develop as a break with the med. past into a mod. sense of authorship and print culture. Troilus and Criseyde was complied into exactly such canonical collections from the start, and a number of early books bind together single-ed. handwritten and printed versions of Chaucer's poetry into composite collections. Ms. producers were, in fact, experimenting with mass-production techniques and woodblock printing from the beginning of the 15th c. Johannes Gutenberg combined these techniques—the division of labor, line assembly, the wooden screw-type press, binding—with moveable metal type and so created a system of textual reproduction that remained essentially unchanged through the 19th c. Yet the format of the codex as a bound object was established by Homer's time, and the inventive plan Gutenberg deployed—the combination of preexisting parts into a new whole—belongs not to mod. print culture but to the governing logic of the book, one that continually figures invention through metonymy.

A book not only creates, as Martial observed, a figure of the self but, as Chaucer suggests, projects this figure across time through a process of assembly both derivative and atemporal: derivative, because it relies on the technologies of the past and hence is always invested in a return, always troping on a preexisting format; atemporal, because it stands outside chronology, able to communicate an imaginative truth in whatever present it is read. Thus, the book not only operates as a poetic form but presents a formal relationship to hist. The process of lit. hist. often appears a species of naturalism, the settling of literary accounts according to a yearly plan; the book suggests time according to the poetics of the page, one that is fragmentary but nevertheless recoverable, imaginative but still tangible.

II. Modern, Postmodern, and Postbook. As the foregoing section argues, the formal and historical character of the book is indivisible. No exception to this statement, the 17th c. in Europe marks a period in which printing and book technology became entwined with the intellectual culture of the day. In Britain, this period opened with the appearance of three books that went on to long lives in different relations to printing: first, in 1611, one of the most often-printed books in Eng., the King James Bible; in 1616, Ben Jonson's Workes, the first self-edited collection of a living poet's production and a model for every later collected works; and then, in 1623, a book whose contents have been among the most often reprinted in different ways, the First Folio of Shakespeare's plays. The period then closed with the struggle for freedom of the press and against the legal requirement that all books be approved by an official censor before publication (a struggle evidenced by John Milton's address to Parliament in 1643, pub. in 1644 as Areopagitica). For poetry, these two devels. clearly—and for the first time—opened the possibility of the book as a technology of writing not only widely available but adaptable to modification, appropriation, and even "hacking" in many ways to bring format into different alignments with content. Writers in all disciplines became more involved in book technology, sometimes even writing directly to the new adaptability of the medium. By 1669, the Dutch scientist and mathematician Christian Huygens had invented a process to print handwriting and geometrical figures; in the same year, the physician William Petty had developed a method for printing as many copies of a book as the public demanded. Chappell and Bringhurst's A Short History of the Printed Word and Finkelstein and McCleery's An Introduction to Book History offer a fuller and more nuanced account of the early hist. of the book; but for the purposes of this entry, this authorial involvement with form (the form of the book as much as the material, mechanical limits, and possibilities of the printing press itself), content, medium, and message acted as a catalyst for ever more experiments on the book as a poetic object—very often a poetic object that was as much "content" as the words appearing between the covers. This approach would ultimately give rise to the idea of the artist's book that came to fruition in the latter part of the 20th c.

Insofar as the 17th c. prepared for a new integration of book form and intellectual and artistic content, William Blake's Songs of Innocence and The Book of Thel are the most obvious 18th-c. outcomes. In 1788, Blake printed There Is No Natural Religion, the first instance of illuminated printing. Echoing his concern for how—in opposition to Jean-Jacques Rousseau's notion of natural ideas held by all human beings—each poet and reader had his or her own worldview and system of values, Blake's new method of printing meant that "the metal plates with which he was familiar as an engraver could be etched sufficiently to be printed in relief. . . . [W]hen finished, the etched plate could be used to pull prints as they were needed or ordered, thus allowing him to work with an unlimited edition produced on demand" (Drucker, Visible Word). The following year, Blake published his monumental Songs of Innocence, a work of painting and poetry; thereafter, he published numerous other works in which the page—a basic unit of composition of the book—is transformed from a neutral, even transparent, surface to a canvas on which margin, border, illustration, and text form a unified whole. With illuminated printing, Blake not only combined the visual arts with the literary but moved away from the expensive process of using a letterpress and thus took back control of the means of production.

If Blake's commitment to expressing independence through the book is one turning point in Brit. letters, then William Morris and his work with the Kelmscott Press—as a counter to rapid industrialization and a demonstration of his growing commitment to socialism—is another. Morris expounded an ethos of craft, function, and respect for materials that made him a pioneer of modern design. While it appears that Morris's notions about book design were rooted in 15th-c. printing practices, his unique innovation was that he extended, not simply imitated, these earlier practices, creating works that were not merely decorative at the level of the page or even at the level of the units of construction on the page but carefully designed wholes. Not surprisingly, then, his highest achievement is generally acknowledged to be his Works of Geoffrey Chaucer, which represents his most concerted effort to create "the ideal book," by which he means "a book not limited by commercial exigencies of price: we can do what we like with it, according to what its nature, as a book, demands of Art" (Morris).

However, it was precisely Morris's dedication to a clean, legible, and harmonious aesthetic of the book, the page, as well as *typography—a dedication he hoped would express a medievalism that took the reader or viewer outside the ugly reality of Victorian England and reflected certain ideas about art, beauty, and the inherent goodness in craftsmanship and simplicity—that led to the early 20th-c. avant-garde embrace of a disruptive, nonlinear, even explosive approach to page design, typography, and the construction of the book. While undoubtedly Stéphane Mallarmé's Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice)—published in the magazine Cosmopolis in 1897 but not in book form until after his death in 1914—had a tremendous influence on 20th-c. explorations into words themselves as visual carriers of meaning. Experiments in typography and bookmaking by futurists, Dadaists, and surrealists (see FUTURISM, DADA, SURREALISM) were so far-reaching that their influence is still felt today in online experiments with kinetic typography, animated digital poems, and other digital deconstructions of the page. For instance, in 1913, the It. futurist F. T. Marinetti first proposed the idea of parole in libertà (words in freedom) as a call for a typographical revolution that would consist of "Condensed metaphors. Telegraphic images. Maximum vibrations. Nodes of thought. Closed or open fans of movement. Compressed analogies. Color Balances. Dimensions, weights, measures, and the speed of sensations." In an attempt to realize his vision of words-in-freedom, Marinetti published Zang Tumb Tuuum (1914)—a typographic tour de force with fold-out pages that further unsettled the harmony of the page and the book.

While there are many other instances of influential early 20th-c. experiments on the book and its various units of construction (incl. binding, margin, page, typography, and cover), there seems to be a connection between Marinetti's attempts to turn the space of the page into a nonlinear, painterly canvas on which to explore the shape, dimension, and volume of letters and words and later, even more radical experiments such as Steve McCaffery's monumental typescape Carnival (1969–75). A concrete poem (see CONCRETE POETRY) that was originally packaged as a book containing 16 sheets of paper, Carnival offered its readers the following instructions: "In order to destroy this book please tear each page carefully along the perforation. The panel is assembled by laying out pages in a square of four." Clearly, the paradox of this work is that to read the book the reader first has to destroy it.

Less obviously related to Marinetti, though no less invested in systematically breaking down conventions of meaning-making and literariness that were tied to the idea of the book, poets and/or artists such as Robert Grenier (in his 1978 Sentences) and Carolee Schneemann (in her 1977 ABC) took the binding off the book and instead published decks of cards, which utterly undercut any notion of unity as well as clear authorial intent. The Brit. artist Tom Phillips deconstructed the book by constructing five different eds., beginning in 1970, of A Humument by "treating" or painting and writing over a copy found by both rule and chance (i.e., the first book Phillips found for threepence) of the novel A Human Document by the Victorian novelist W. H. Mallock. There are countless other examples of 20th-c. artists' books and ostensible books of poetry that have broken down or defamiliarized every conceivable aspect of the book. E.g., the painter Larry Rivers and the poet Frank O'Hara collaborated to create Stones (1958)—twelve lithographs made by Douglass Morse Howell by pulling from stones written and drawn on by Rivers and O'Hara; Elisabetta Gut's 1983 Libro-seme (Seed-book) uses the shell of a seed as the cover of a book inside of which are sheets of music on rice paper that have been cut in the shape of the shells; and Frances L. Swetlund's 1989 The Messenger appropriates a Victorian photo album inside of which is a dead bird, a map, bones, shells, and other found objects on which letters and numbers have been stamped (see ALEATORY POETICS, CONSTRAINT).

Thus, having encountered books as everything from decks of cards, fans, accordions, postcards, sculptural objects, and objects made out of cloth to edible works made out of chewing gum, in a sense 21st-c. poets have no choice but to extend this systematic deconstruction (a "hacking" that was anticipated in the early mod. hist. of the medium) to an utter dematerialization of the book through its trans. into the digital. While it is true that certain animated digital poems such as Brian Kim Stefans's "Dreamlife of Letters," as well as his "Suicide in an Airplane," seem to continue, in the digital realm, Marinetti's attempts to bring a sense of dynamism to the page, by and large digital poets are prepared to carry on postbook experiments (post in both the sense of looking back on and in the historical sense of coming after). Stephanie Strickland's V (2002) and Zone: Zero (2008) are postbook works in which poems in book-bound form comment on the same poems in digital form and vice versa, the result of which is a distributed poem such as "slippingglimpse" whose stable text in a two-column form on the page undergoes a radical trans. online where it turns into a ten-part Flash poem that combines the original text with videos of ocean patterns; as Strickland puts it, "In a round robin of reading, the water 'reads' the poem text . . . the poem text 'reads' image/capture technologies . . . and the image-capture video 'reads' the water," thereby utterly destabilizing both the original book-bound text and the conventional notion of what it means to read. Further, a substantial number of digital poems are less about semantic meaning than about a self-reflexive consideration of the materiality of letters and words, as well as about investigating the material limits and possibilities of the computer as a medium for writing. John Cayley's "Translation" exemplifies such poems in that it is often unreadable either because it is constantly algorithmically shifting between Eng., Fr., and Ger. or because the words are, as Cayley puts it, always either "surfacing, floating, or sinking." It is also likely a matter of time before poets attempt to hack e-readers at least in part to draw attention to how these devices both imitate and undermine the idea and the material reality of the book.

See ELECTRONIC POETRY, LANGUAGE POETRY, SONGBOOK, TECHNOLOGY AND POETRY, VISUAL POETRY.

■ Medieval and Early Modern: Curtius; M. B. Parkes, "The Influence of the Concepts of Ordinatio and Compilatio on the Development of the Book," Medieval Learning and Literature, ed. J.J.G. Alexander and M. T. Gibson (1976); E. L. Eisenstein, The Printing Press as an Agent of Change (1979); P. Needham, The Printer and the Pardoner (1986); C. H. Roberts and T. C. Skeat, The Birth of the Codex (1987); Book Production and Publishing in Britain, 1375–1475, ed. J. Griffiths and D. Pearsall (1989); D. C. Greetham, Textual Scholarship (1994); P. Gaskell, A New Introduction to Bibliography (1995); R. Hanna III, Pursuing History (1996); C. De Hamel, A History of Illuminated Manuscripts (1997); A. Manguel, A History of Reading (1997); F. G. Kilgour, The Evolution of the Book (1998); The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain, Vol. III, 1400–1557, ed. L. Hellinga and J. B. Trapp (1999); The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain, Vol. IV, 1557–1695, ed. J. Barnard, D. F. McKenzie, and M. Bell (2002); A. Murphy, Shakespeare in Print (2003); S. Füssel, Gutenberg and the Impact of Printing, trans. D. Martin (2005); W. Fitzgerald, Martial (2007).

■ Modern, Postmodern, and Postbook: F. T. Marinetti, Zang Tumb Tuuum (1914), http://www.colophon.com/gallery/futurism/2.html/; D. McMurtrie, The Book (1973); S. McCaffery, Carnival (1969–75), http://archives.chbooks.com/online_books/carnival/; R. Grenier, Sentences (1978), http://www.whalecloth.org/grenier/sentences_.htm/; S. McCaffery and bpNichol, Rational Geomancy: The Kids of the Book-Machine: The Collected Research Reports of the Toronto Research Group, 1973–82 (1992); J. J. McGann, Black Riders: The Visible Language of Modernism (1993); W. Morris, The Ideal Book, ed. W. S. Peterson (1982); J. Drucker, The Century of Artists' Books and The Visible Word: Experimental Typography and Modern Art, 1909–1923 (both 1994); D. Higgins and C. Alexander, Talking the Boundless Book (1996); J. Rothenberg and S. Clay, A Secret Location on the Lower East Side: Adventures in Writing, 1960–1980 (1998); W. Chappell and R. Bringhurst, A Short History of the Printed Word (1999); J. Rothenberg, A Book of the Book (2000); B. Bright, No Longer Innocent: Book Art in America (2005); D. Finkelstein and A. McCleery, An Introduction to Book History (2005); T. Phillips, A Humument (1970–2005), http://www.humument.com/; P. Shillingsburg, From Gutenberg to Google (2006); S. Strickland, "Slippingglimpse," intro. (2008), http://www.cynthialawson.com/sg/pages/introduction.html; K. Wasserman, The Book as Art (2006); A Companion to the History of the Book, ed. S. Eliot and J. Rose (2009).

WM. KUSKIN (MED. AND EARLY MOD.); L. EMERSON (MOD.)

BOSNIAN POETRY. The influence of folk genres, in particular *ballad and lyric *songs, is characteristic of both recent and older Bosnian poetry. Traditional Bosnian poetry should be considered part of the broader South Slavic corpus, owing to a shared body of stylistic and thematic features. The first systematic study of folk poetry from this region was undertaken by Milman Parry and Albert Lord in the period 1933–35 (see ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY) and resulted in Lord's seminal study The Singer of Tales (1960). Parry and Lord devoted most of their efforts to long epics, but they also collected over 11,000 women's ballads and lyric songs. It is the shorter folk songs that have left the deepest trace on the lit. of Bosnia-Herzegovina, regardless of the author's ethnic or religious background.

Alongside a lyrical component stemming from traditional lore, in the poetry of Bosnian Muslim authors there is an esoteric-mystical dimension reflecting Islamic spirituality and drawing on poetry that reached Bosnia through the extended presence of the Ottomans in the Balkans. The older generation of authors, such as Safet-beg Bašagić (1870–1934), Musa Ćazim Ćatić (1878–1915), and Ahmed Muradbegović (1898–1972), relied heavily on patterns of folk love poetry but also introduced the refinement and sensibility of a complex multicultural environment.

The next generation of poets introduced elements of the avant-garde, which meant a departure from more traditional forms and the inclusion of the irrational, as well as a more openly erotic dimension saturated with Eastern mysticism and opulent imagery. These characteristics are particularly visible in the poetry of Hamza Humo (1895–1970). Following in this vein is the somewhat younger Skender Kulenović (1910–78), for whom poetry is both an esoteric experience and a voice of social conscience.

Several Serbian poets were active in Herzegovina for all or part of their careers, incl. the symbolist Jovan Dučić (1871–1943) and Aleksa Šantić (1868–1924), who modeled many of his works on traditional love poems. One of the greatest Croatian expressionist poets, Antun Branko Šimić (1898–1925), also spent his youth in Herzegovina before relocating to Zagreb.

Although it draws on a specifically Bosnian heritage, the poetry of Mak (Mehmedalija) Dizdar (1917–71) is stylistically highly accomplished and transcultural. His groundbreaking poem Plivačica (The Swimmer, 1954) is a strong statement of individuality, vitality, and formal innovation that reflects elements of surrealism but is also an overt departure from the rigid norms of social realism then prevalent. In his collection Kameni spavač (Stone Sleeper, 1966), he takes as his inspiration inscriptions from the stećak monuments (med. Bogomil tombstones) and through an ancestral poetic perspective speaks of Bosnia as a country of sorrow and resilience.

The poetry of Abdulah Sidran (b. 1944) is imbued with a sadness resulting from his perception of disharmony in the world. His poems are dialogic and often give the impression of settling accounts with life. Representatives of the younger generation, most notably Semezdin Mehmedinović (b. 1960) and Saša Skenderija (b. 1968), were deeply influenced by the wars of 1990s and often address questions of politics, identity, and everyday life in their poetry, while at the same time experimenting with hybrid genres. Among Bosnian-Herzegovinian women poets, Bisera Alikadić (b. 1939), Mubera Pašić (b. 1945), Josefina Dautbegović (1948–2008), and Ferida Duraković (b. 1957) all have written predominantly introspective, intimate poetry, while the latter two have provided memorable verses on the theme of war.

■ Anthologies: B. Bartók and A. Lord, Serbo-Croatian Folk Songs (1951); Serbocroatian Heroic Songs, ed. and trans. A. Lord et al. (1953–80); Antologija bošnjačke poezije XX vijeka, ed. E. Duraković (1995); Scar on the Stone: Contemporary Poetry from Bosnia, ed. C. Agee (1998); Antologija bošnjačkih usmenih lirskonarativnih pjesama, ed. Đ. Buturović and L. Buturović (2002).

■ Criticism and History: M. P. Coote, "Serbocroatian Heroic Songs," Heroic Epic and Saga, ed. F. J. Oinas (1978); Lord; C. Hawkesworth, Voices in the Shadows: Women and Verbal Art in Serbia and Bosnia (2000); A. Buturović, Stone Speaker: Medieval Tombs, Landscape, and Bosnian Identity in the Poetry of Mak Dizdar (2002); E. Duraković, Bošnjačke i bosanske književne neminovnosti (2003); A. Vidan, Embroidered with Gold, Strung with Pearls: The Traditional Ballads of Bosnian Women (2003).

A. VIDAN

BOUSTROPHEDON (Gr., "in the manner of an ox's turning"). A text in which alternate lines or columns are designed to be read in opposite directions is said to be written boustrophedon. The term alludes to the alternating direction of the furrows in a ploughed field. Though properly an adverb, it is often used as an adjective or noun. Boustrophedon is a graphic format, not a literary form. Any text that can be written in two or more lines using discrete letter-forms or symbols can be written boustrophedon; a text thus written should not be confused with a *palindrome. The boustrophedon format is found sporadically in the ancient Near East and in Etruscan, early Lat., and runic inscriptions. The best-known examples, however, are in Gr. inscriptions of the 7th and 6th cs. BCE. These include short verse texts as well as law codes, religious dedications, and calendars, inscribed on stone, pottery, or metal. In the Gr. examples, the shapes of the letters, as well as their order, are typically reversed in alternate lines (as if reflected in a mirror); in other cases, alternate lines are not reversed but inverted. Boustrophedon coexisted at this early period with the now-familiar left-to-right format as well as texts with all lines written right to left (probably reflecting the Gr. alphabet's Phoenician roots). It seems to have fallen out of use by the 5th c. BCE. Boustrophedon has been revived on an ad hoc basis by various contemp. writers under the influence of *concrete poetry and *Oulipo. In mod. poems, the retrograde element may involve mirror writing (as in Rosanne Wasserman's "Boustrophedon"), reversal of letters, or reverse ordering of words in alternate lines; the poem's content usually reflects or alludes to the format in some way. Other poets (e.g., John Kinsella) have invoked the term's metaphorical associations (retrograde movement, nonlinear progression, writing-as-ploughing) without using the actual format.

■ L. Jeffery, The Local Scripts of Archaic Greece (1961); A. G. Woodhead, The Study of Greek Inscriptions (1981).

G. Hays

BOUTS-RIMÉS. A sequence of words rhyming in accordance with a predetermined *rhyme scheme (often that of the *sonnet) and used as the basis of a verse-making game; also (by *metonymy) the game itself. The object of the game, which is said to have been invented by Gilles Ménage (1613–92) and was popular in précieux circles of 17th-c. Paris, is to write a poem incorporating the given rhyme words so as to achieve effects as witty as they are seemingly uncontrived. Accordingly, the sequence of rhymes is made as bizarre and incongruous as possible. From the first, bouts-rimés tried the ingenuity of even the most considerable poets (Pierre Corneille, Nicolas Boileau), and the diversion spread to England and Scotland and survived as a source of 19th-c. vers de société. But any school of poets that regards rhyme as the generative principle of verse composition will favor a method of working essentially by bouts-rimés, as did *Parnassianism, e.g., guided by Théodore de Banville's axiom that "an imaginative gift for rhyme is, of all qualities, the one which makes the poet." Stéphane Mallarmé's enigmatic "ptyx" nonce-sonnet may count as bout-rimés. The rhyming dictionary itself will, when the combinations it offers are severely limited, act as a purveyor of bouts-rimés (see the octave of Charles Baudelaire's "Sed non satiata"). In terms of the materiality of writing, bouts-rimés are the residue in presentia of a program that can be imagined by the reader only in absentia, while in view of a metaphysics of writing, bouts-rimés are like the cryptic fragments of an oracular utterance that only the priest-poet has the power to reconstitute or construe; the poet is the paleographer of the invisible.

See POETIC CONTESTS, PRÉCIOSITÉ.

■ Kastner; T. Augarde, Oxford Guide to Word Games, 2d ed. (2003); E. Greber, "Metonymy in Improvisation: Pasternak, Mayakovsky, Jakobson, and Their 1919 Bouts-Rimés," Eternity's Hostage, ed. L. Fleishman (2006).

C. Scott

BRAZIL, POETRY OF. Colonial production of verse in Port. America included lyric, drama, and epic. Early composition comprised continuations of med. trads., popular lyrics, and courtly versions of *troubadour ballads. Jesuits used dramatic verse (in Sp., Port., Lat., and Tupi) in their efforts to convert the native population to Christianity. Father José de Anchieta (1534–97) even wrote a modest New World epic in Lat. (printed in Coimbra in 1563). All attempts to write *epic in Port. were penned in the shadow of Luís de Camões and Os Lusíadas (The Lusiads, 1572), his prodigious narrative of Portugal's historical achievements. The first local imitation was Prosopopéia (1601) by Sp.-born Bento Teixeira (1561–1600), who fled to Brazil as a young man to avoid the Inquisition. His encomiastic heroic octaves exalted the leader of the settlement of the captaincy of Pernambuco. A baroque phase begins in the mid-17th c. In the 18th c., the principal venues for poetry in large cities were academies where associates met to share work. The outstanding poet of the period was Gregório de Matos (1636–96), nicknamed Boca do Inferno (Mouth from Hell) for his biting satires that prompted authorities in Salvador, Bahia, to exile him to Angola. In a serious vein, he made devotional and amatory poetry. In his sonnets and other poems (all known through codices), Matos practiced the dominant Iberian modes of the day, characterized by conceits, formal dexterity, and imitation, both of Greco-Roman models and of the contemporaneous Sp. masters Luís de Góngora, Francisco de Quevedo, and Baltasar Gracián. While agile in the application of conceptismo and cultismo, Matos also touched on the mixed nature of Brazilian society, occasionally incorporating indigenous and even Af. elements.

A Brazilian version of arcadianism emerged in the late 18th c. in the gold-rich state of Minas Gerais. Colonial lit. had appeared with little coherence or continuity; now came forth an organized group with shared attitudes and nascent national awareness. Poets adopted pastoral pseuds. To write of bucolic ideals yet managed to constitute the beginnings of "Brazilian personal lyricism" (Coutinho). Their provincial adaptations of neoclassical poetics entailed turning away from perceived baroque excesses, a search for natural simplicity, and preference for graceful rhythmic schemes. While having studied in the Old World, they began to give voice to new feelings of belonging in the New World. As engaged citizens, they read Enlightenment authors, advocated political autonomy, and took part in the first conspiracy against the rule of Portugal (1789). The principal poets were Cláudio Manuel da Costa (1729–89), whose petrous imagery has been seen to reflect emotional attachment to the land; the Port.-born Tomás Antônio Gonzaga (1744–1810), author of the most popular collection of love poems in Port., Marília de Dirceu (1792); and Silva Alvarenga (1749–1814), noted for local landscapes. In Lisbon, Brazilian mulatto Domingos Caldas Barbosa (1738–1800) was elected president of the cultivated Nova Arcadia assembly but gained fame in the royal court performing his sometimes sensual songs, lyrics of which were published alongside pastoral poems. His occasional use of an Afro-Brazilian lexicon was a historical milestone.

National spirit was most evident in epic poems. Caramuru by José de Santa Rita Durão (1722–84) was composed of ten Camonian cantos about the Port. arrival in Bahia, and O Uraguai (1769) by Basílio da Gama (1741–95) narrated the Luso-Hispanic war against the Jesuit missions of southern Brazil. Efforts to relive epopeia—epic poetry—continued in Brazil well into the next century. Domingos José Gonçalves de Magalhães (1811–82) with his A confederação dos tamoios (1856) celebrated liberty in a crushing military defeat of an Indian tribe, revealing limited sensitivity toward native peoples. The poet's close ally, Manuel Araújo Porto Alegre (1806–79) tried his hand at epic in Colombo (1866), extolling Eur. expansionism in the figure of Columbus.

In the mid-1830s, these last two authors had formed a literary association in Paris that in essence launched Brazilian *romanticism, through lyric poetry and the expository essay. The entire period was naturally marked by independence from Portugal (1822), the evolution of the only monarchy (here called an empire) in the Western hemisphere, and the pursuit of Am. forms of identity. In general, the first generation of romantics believed in a historical mission to create lit. of a national character. Led by Antônio Gonçalves Dias (1823–64), they emphasized differences from Europe and autochthonous phenomena. The multigenre movement of Indianism celebrated native peoples, places, sources, and heroism. Among Dias's "American Poems," the most recognized composition was "I-Juca Pirama" (in Tupi, "he who must die"), a classic of Indianist poetry. In this work, Dias employed varied Port. verse forms but, while he assigned narrative voice to Indian personages in some passages, never recovered an indigenous poetics per se. Dias also left an unfinished epic based on a tribal story. Perhaps the most widely known Brazilian poem of all time is his "Canção do exílio" (Song of Exile, 1843), which he wrote while studying in Portugal, where he absorbed myriad romantic influences. The *strophes express the quintessential Lusitanian emotion of saudade (longing, homesickness) in relation to the New World homeland. With the former colony now irretrievably the focus of consciousness, the brief piece relates location—Brazil as place of desire—to the romantic emphasis on sentimentality, expressivity, and shared heritage. The poem's importance as a symbol of the country has been compared to those of the flag and the national *anthem. In the second wave of romantic poetry, Manuel Antônio Álvares de Azevedo (1831–52)—a Brazilian parallel to Lord Byron, Alfred de Musset, and some Port. figures—explored intense subjectivity, bohemianism, and pessimistic introspection. In contrast, a third current during romanticism was social poetry, eminently the abolitionist works of Antônio de Castro Alves (1847–71). Influential titles were "Navio negreiro" (The Slave Ship) and "Vozes d'África" (Voice of Africa), impassioned rhetorical verse of ethical purpose known through periodical publication and public declamations. He crafted amatory, bucolic, and patriotic lyric as well. A sui generis figure of the romantic period was Joaquim de Sousa Andrade or Sousândrade (1833–1902), maker of adventurous lines that prefigure *modernism, markedly in the trans-Am. neoepic O Guesa (London, 1888), featuring an anthological interlude titled "The Inferno of Wall Street" in its editorial revival of the 1960s.

Following the lead of France, reaction against ultraromanticism and a vogue of "realist" poetry would lead to the devel. of *Parnassian poetry, a school and style based on restraint of feeling, reverence for form (particularly the *sonnet), and erudition. While in Portugal this practice was relatively modest, the Brazilian applications of Parnassianism were quite extensive in size, thematic variety (from cl. mythology to historical figures of Brazil), and longevity, enduring from 1880 until the 1920s. The depth and reach of the movement are seen in a canonical trinity. Alberto de Oliveira (1857–1937) was the most orthodox Parnassian, as seen in such titles as "Vaso grego" (Grecian urn) and his regular use of *alexandrines. The scrupulous versifier Raimundo Correia (1859–1911) displayed remarkable wealth of vocabulary and expressive variety, incl. pessimism and melancholy. Crowned the Prince of Brazilian Poets (in a 1907 contest sponsored by a leading magazine), Olavo Bilac (1865–1918) cultivated, in addition to amatory themes and art for art's sake, patriotism, progress, and a work ethic. *Symbolism arrived around 1890 and brought forth a major trio of poets. João da Cruz e Sousa (1861–98), son of a slave, witnessed abolition (1888), a cause he supported in print and deed. He produced poetry of pain and suffering alongside typically symbolist verse marked by musicality and spiritual concerns. A mystical poet par excellence was Alphonsus de Guimaraens (1870–1921), preoccupied with death and Catholic faith. Augusto dos Anjos (1884–1914) produced an idiosyncratic verse employing laboratorial lexicon and material philosophical concepts. His single volume, Eu (I, 1912), continues to be reprinted regularly. The Parnassian-symbolist phase in Brazil corresponded to modernismo* in Spanish America, where antiromantic refinement and exaltation of form were similar but New World subject matter was more prominent.

In Port. modernismo refers to the complex of antitraditional and avant-garde tendencies beginning around 1920. The Brazilian movement, officially launched with the Modern Art Week of 1922 (the centenary of independence), endeavored to shake the foundations of academic writing, still stilted and Lusitanian, and to liberate poetry from the lingering constraints of obsolete Parnassianism and symbolism. The two fundamental aspects of the new creed were technical renovation of lyric, *free verse above all, and attention to the national, in lang. itself (using the Brazilian vernacular) and themes (folklore, contemp. life). Rio-born Ronald de Carvalho (1893–1935) lived *futurism in Paris; coedited the cutting-edge jour. Orfeu (1915) in Lisbon with the multifarious master of mod. Port. poetry Fernando Pessoa (1888–1935); and transported their vanguard cause to Brazil. While having Eur. links, modernismo in Brazil was driven by nationalism. In Carvalho's case such native fervor was tied, in Whitmanian fashion, to a pan-Am. spirit, evident in the neoepic sequence Toda a América (All the Americas, 1926). Guilherme de Almeida (1890–1969) celebrated ethnic mixture (Euro-, Afro-, Indo-) in Raça (Race, 1926) and essays on "nationalist sentiment." Having written in a panoply of styles, he was elected Prince of Brazilian Poets in 1958 in a poll conducted by a leading São Paulo daily. Mário de Andrade (1893–1945) exemplified an innovative approach attuned to national realities. His Paulicéia desvairada (Hallucinated City, 1922) advanced a playful musical concept of verse and probed the multicultural cosmopolis of São Paulo, while later collections contemplated the breadth of the country, incl. remote jungles. Oswald de Andrade (1890–1954) incorporated primitivism, *cubism, and various conceptual currents (notably Sigmund Freud) into a clever poetic minimalism and manifestos that clamored, with abstract humor, for aggressive novelty and self-assertiveness. His title Poesia Pau-Brasil (1924) takes its name from brazilwood, the first natural resource for export. In a broad civilizational metaphor, the new product of poetry should aspire to reverse the unidirectional influence of the metropolis (Paris, Lisbon) over the (former) colonies. The "Manifesto antropófago" ("Cannibalist Manifesto," 1928)—the declaration of *antropofagia—concerned poetry and intellectual discourse at large. Both *manifestos undermined sermo nobilis and sought to expand the restricted literary sense of poetry. A conservative nationalist group under the banner of verde-amarelismo (green-yellowism) opposed "alien" influence and favored the symbol of the anta (tapir), an animal imagined to embody the primeval power of the land. An enduring poet of this persuasion was Cassiano Ricardo (1895–1974). In Rio de Janeiro, poets attached to the jour. Festa were less concerned with brasilidade (Brazilianness) than with mod. consciousness and spirituality. Cecília Meirelles (1901–64) wrote neosymbolist collections and a lyrical epic about the capital city itself. Poets from all provinces of Brazil came to embrace their own physical and cultural geographies, natural lang., self-veneration, and differentiation from Europe.

Modernist purposes were wholly fulfilled in the work of Manuel Bandeira (1886–1968) and Carlos Drummond de Andrade (1902–87). The former lived the transition from 19th-c. conventions to mod. flexibility, a change evident in such titles as O ritmo dissoluto (Dissolute rhythm, 1924) and Libertinagem (Libertineness, 1930). His manipulations of pointedly colloquial lang. and pursuit of popular wisdom endeared him to generations of readers. Drummond exhibited astounding range, over the decades producing modernista joke poems, existential reflections, social verse, philosophical meditations, gamesome ling. trials, and even erotic episodes. Among the many other modernist poets, Murilo Mendes (1901–75) composed distinguished surrealistic and metaphysical pieces, and Jorge de Lima (1895–1953) showed striking versatility, from the folk-inspired Poemas negros (1946) to the hermetic quasi-epic Invenção de Orfeu (Invention of Orpheus, 1952). The iconoclastic "heroic phase" of the modernist movement in Brazil is usually placed in the years 1922–30, while the "constructive" phase extends to at least 1945. The term modernismo also encompasses the later works of poets born before 1920.

Chronologically, João Cabral de Melo Neto (1920–99) coincided with the so-called Generation of '45, a mid-century cluster of neo-Parnassian poets who objected to free verse and overtly native topics, instead proposing a return to circumspect versifying and removal from quotidian affairs. A representative name in this cohort was Ledo Ivo (b. 1924). Cabral shared with them an alert regard for formal rigor and discipline, but he opposed their focus on psychic states and insistence on elevated poetic lexicon—in sum, their elitism. Cabral was concerned with tangible reality and the materiality of words rather than romantic or philosophical inspiration. He was a leading exponent of a new objectivity in postwar Latin Am. poetry but commonly connected his lang. of objects to social facts and real-world settings, chiefly his native northeastern region. Cabral never made a concession to sentimental rhet. or confessionalism; his textual geometry and architecture always prevailed.

Brazil was a principal scene in the movement called *concrete poetry, an organized international avant-garde or neovanguard of the 1950s and 1960s. The Brazilian founders were the São Paulo poets Augusto de Campos (b. 1931), Haroldo de Campos (1929–2003), and Décio Pignatari (b. 1927), who formed the *Noigandres group. In the early 1950s, they produced audacious lyrical texts with vehement imagery, fragmentations, and other experimental effects. The spatial minimalism of poesia concreta evolved in three phases. In early years (1952–56), the prime procedures were visual—the presentation of words on the page, *typography (esp. the disposition of fonts and colors), the use of empty space—along with a corresponding attention to interrupting or undermining the sentimental dimension of the poem. "Classical" or "orthodox" material arose in a second phase (1956–61) that involved ultrarational principles of composition and extensive theorization, incl. the bilingual manifesto "pilot plan for concrete poetry," built on universal and national planks, such as Stéphane Mallarmé, Ezra Pound, James Joyce, e.e. cummings, Oswald de Andrade, and Cabral. In a third stage of concretism (1962–67), open notions of *invention led to several different behaviors and products, from semantic variations to word *collages and abstract designs with lexical keys. Other groups theorized and practiced vanguardism, concerned with both textual innovation and sociopolitical relevance: neoconcretismo (ephemeral splinter of poesia concreta, 1959); Tendência (centered in Minas Gerais, 1957 and after), led by Affonso Ávila (b. 1928); Poesia Práxis (in São Paulo, 1962 and after), conceived by Mário Chamie (b. 1933); and poema processo (1967 and after), semaphoric *visual poetry.

After concrete poetry per se, the paths of its principal exponents diverged. From the 1970s to the 2000s, Augusto de Campos continually created forms of lyric that crossed the generic and media borders between literary, visual, and musical arts. In the mid-1980s, his poster-poem "pós-tudo" ("Post All") ignited a landmark debate about *postmodernism. No poet born in the first half of the 20th c. anywhere has better adapted to the digital age than he. Haroldo de Campos proved to be one of the most significant names of Brazilian letters since 1950, inalterably broadening the horizons of textual crit. and theory. His prose-poetry project Galáxias (1984) was a paragon of the Latin Am. *neoba-roque, and his rethinking of mod. poetry culminated in the notion of the "postutopian poem," informed by the implications of historical transformations. A classically tinged long poem—Finismundo, a última viagem (The last voyage, 1990)—brought the cl. Western trad. into the age of computers. A máquina do mundo repensada (Rethinking the machine of the world, 2000) exquisitely interrelated Dante, Camões, Drummond, and cosmological theories. The Noigandres group also influenced Brazilian poetry with its many trans. of canonical and experimental world poetry, everything from troubadours and haiku to *metaphysical poetry, Fr. symbolism, and Gertrude Stein.

In the final four decades of the 20th c. and the first decade of the 21st, Brazilian poetry was pluralistic, continually growing in diversity, thematic scope, and sociocultural reach. The poet-critic Mário Faustino (1930–62) was a skilled advocate of Poundian poetics. The widely recognized work of (José Ribamar) Ferreira Gullar (b. 1930) spanned experimentalism, committed poetry (he was the most prominent voice of the socialistic collective Violão de rua [Street guitar, 1962–63]), and late-modernist personal lyricism. Of recently active poets, engaging voices from different states and regions include Manoel de Barros (b. 1916), a late discovery who ponders nature and ecology; Thiago de Mello (b. 1926), a noted militant; Roberto Piva (1937–2010), transgressive, exuberant, interested in bodily mysticism; Francisco Alvim (b. 1938), known for brevity, irony, and informality; Carlos Nejar (b. 1939), with his legalistic and mythical tones; Armando Freitas Filho (b. 1940), ever sensitive to evolving modernity; Ruy Espinheira Filho (b. 1942), poet of love and memory; and Marcus Accioly (b. 1943), author of studied lyrical and epic works, incl. the vast Latinomérica (2001). Other long, (semi-)narrative titles of neoepic character are Gullar's Poema sujo (Dirty poem, 1975), A grande fala do índio guarani (The great speech of the Guaraní Indian, 1978) by Affonso Romano de Sant'Anna (b. 1936), As marinhas (Seascapes/marines, 1984) by Neide Arcanjo (b. 1940), and Táxi ou poema de amor passageiro (Taxi or Poem of Love in Transit, 1986) by Adriano Espínola (b. 1952).

In the late 1960s, 1970s, and, to a much more limited extent, beyond, a unique aspect of culture in Brazil has been the recognition of songwriters and lyricists as voices of poetry. The contemp. association of music and lit. was given impetus by Vinícius de Moraes (1913–80), salient modernist poet turned performer and foremost Bossa Nova lyricist. In the eclectic post-Bossa Nova urban popular music of the 1960s generation known as MPB (Música Popular Brasileira), two names are regularly indicated as having "literary quality": Caetano Veloso (b. 1942) and Chico Buarque (b. 1944), poet-musicians (both with complete lyrics in pub. volumes) who proved the artful complexity of song. Other poetically adept songwriters and numerous poets doubling as composers of song texts participated in this generational phenomenon. In the following decades, Arnaldo Antunes (b. 1960) rose to prominence as a rock singer and lyricist and achieved recognition as a singular visual and postconcrete poet.

In the 1970s, there was a small-press flourish of informal youth verse (dubbed poesia marginal), centered in Rio and São Paulo. This trend shared some traits but mostly contrasted with the rubric of "intersemiotic creation," which comprehended measured verse and nondenominational mixtures of words and sonographic elements. So-called marginal poetry cared little for nationalism or intellectual decorum, preferring casual discursivity and sociability. The concurrent constructivist tendency sought to keep technological advances and literary interrelations in sight. Beginning in the 1980s, poets turned increasingly from spontaneity, on the one hand, and visual exhibitionism, on the other, seeking instead an expressive discourse keen to the rationales of rigor and broadly based creative awareness. Contemp. practice was synthesized in the work of Paulo Leminski (1944–89) for the intensity and variety of his ideas regarding lyric. Another prematurely departed voice of distinct originality was Waly Salomão (1943–2003), whose work spanned antinormative prose poetry, song, and cosmopolitan free verse. In the 1990s and into the new millennium, a reliable taxonomy of Brazilian poetry is hindered by the multiplicity of poets and the sheer diversity of their work. With individualism dominating, ever-expanding scenes have embraced diverse and resourceful stylings by poets born in different decades. Active accomplished poets such as Salgado Maranhão (b. 1953) have already published volumes of their collected work. After Mário de Andrade, Bandeira, Meirelles, Drummond and Cabral, notable mod. and contemp. poets who have been ably rendered into Eng. (in single-author volumes) include Renata Pallotini (b. 1931), Adélia Prado (b. 1935), Astrid Cabral (b. 1936), Paulo Henriques Brito (b. 1951), and Régis Bonvicino (b. 1954). Since 1990, there have been expanded efforts to connect realms of poetry in Brazil (both its hist. and its present-day activity) with international circuits, above all within the Americas and Iberia, notably by poet-professor Horácio Costa (b. 1954). Cooperation at colloquia, writers' meetings, book fairs, and publishing houses has been complemented by articulations achieved through the boundless Internet, which has reinvigorated the past and provided previously unthinkable access to poets and readers of the present.

See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; PORTUGAL, POETRY OF; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: Antologia dos poetas brasileiros da fase romântica, 2d ed. (1940); Antologia dos poetas brasileiros da fase parnasiana, 2d ed. (1940); Panorama do movimento simbolista brasileiro, ed. A. Muricy, 3 v. (1951); Panorama da poesia brasileira, 6 v. (1959), Poesia do modernismo brasileiro (1968), both ed. M. da Silva Brito; Poesia barroca (1967), Poesia moderna (1967), both ed. P. E. da Silva Ramos; An Anthology of Brazilian Modernist Poetry, ed. G. Pontiero (1969)—texts in Port. with annotations; An Anthology of Twentieth-Century Brazilian Poetry, ed. E. Bishop and E. Brasil (1972)—superb team of trans.; 26 poetas hoje, ed. H. Buarque

(1976); Brazilian Poetry 1950–1980, ed. E. Brasil and W. J. Smith (1983)—includes visual poetry; Nothing the Sun Could Not Explain, ed. N. Ascher et al. (1997)—late-century voices; Na virada do século, poesia de invenção no Brasil, ed. C. Daniel and F. Barbosa (2002); Poets of Brazil, trans. F. Williams (2004)—bilingual selection from 1500 on; Apresentação da poesia brasileira, 4th ed. (2009), all ed. M. Bandeira.

■ Criticism and History: J. Nist, The Modernist Movement in Brazil (1967); M. Sarmiento Barata, Canto melhor (1969)—intro. and anthol. of social poetry; W. Martins, The Modernist Idea (1970); Poetas do modernismo, ed. Leodegário A. Azevedo Filho, 6 v. (1972)—selections with crit. by specialists; G. Brotherston, Latin American Poetry (1975); A literatura no Brasil, ed. A. Coutinho, 5 v. (1986)—sections by scholars on poetry; G. Mendonça Telles, Retórica do silêncio I, 2d ed. (1989); D. Treece and M. González, The Gathering of Voices (1992)—sociocultural analysis; A. Bosi, História concisa da literatura brasileira, 2d ed. (1994)—sections on poetry and epochal styles; The Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, ed. R. González Echevarría and E. Pupo-Walker, v. 3 (1996)—chronological blocks since 1830s; C. Perrone, Seven Faces (1996); A. C. Secchin, Poesia e desordem (1996); A. Bueno, Uma história da poesia brasileira (2007)—primarily on premodernists; H. de Campos, Novas, ed. A. S. Bessa and O. Cisneros (2007); C. Perrone, Brazil, Lyric and the Americas (2010).

C. A. Perrone

BRETON POETRY. The independent state of Brittany was formally annexed to France in 1532. Breton writers have produced much Fr. poetry (see FRANCE, POETRY OF), and all educated Bretons since the med. period may be presumed to know Fr. The Breton lang., still spoken in the western half of the region (Breizh Izel), belongs to the Brythonic or "P-Celtic" group of Celtic langs., like Welsh and Cornish. It is derived from the speech of settlers from southwest Britain who left their homeland from the 5th to the 7th c. as the Saxons were encroaching from the east. Early Breton poetry would have had much in common with early *Welsh poetry, about which more is known. Marie de France and others indicate that med. Breton poets or bards sang of love, knightly adventures, and faery and that their compositions were the source of Marie's own form, the lai; but the earliest surviving Breton poetry dates from only the 14th c. It consists of fewer than 20 lines of popular verse in an indigenous metrical system whose main feature is obligatory line-internal rhyme similar to cynghanedd lusg*: "An hegu*en* am lou*en*as / An hegar*at* an lac*at* glas" (Her smile gladdened me, / The blue-eyed love). This native prosody was predominant until the 17th c., when it was superseded by the Fr. system of syllable counting and end rhyme. Traces of it can be found in later works, and some 20th-c. poets (Arzhig, Alan Botrel) have used it deliberately.

Most of the Breton verse from the 15th to the beginning of the 19th c. consists of works of religious edification, *hymns, *carols, a book of hours, and the long and dreary Mirouer de la mort (1519). One poem stands out: Buhez Mabden, a powerful meditation on death printed in 1530 but probably written a century earlier. The prophetic Dialog etre Arzur Roe d'an Bretounet ha Guynglaff dates back to 1450. There are also numerous plays in verse. A few popular plays, such as the Pevar Mab Emon, are based on chivalric romances, but most derive from the Bible and saints' lives. The influence of Fr. models is evident, with a few notable exceptions, mainly mystery plays that recount the lives of Celtic saints.

New stirrings begin with the two mock-epic poems of Al Lae (close of the 18th c.), but the real impetus comes with the rise of 19th-c. *romanticism. The great event is the appearance in 1839 of Théodore Hersart de la Villemarqué's Barzaz Breiz (Poetry of Brittany), an anthol. of supposedly ancient oral poetry, which recent scholarship has shown to be more authentic than many 19th-c. critics believed. The effect was profound. A romantic vision of the Breton past was created that stirred the imagination of many and sparked new literary enthusiasm. At the same time, François-Marie Luzel and others undertook more "scientific" collecting of Breton folk poetry, of which there were two main kinds: gwerzioù, which are essentially *ballads, and sonioù, a broader designation that extends to more lyrical verse, incl. love songs and satires. *Broadside ballads in Breton also circulated. A few of the gwerzioù are demonstrably connected to med. Welsh poetry or to med. events in Brittany; some scholars claim that the gwerzioù are related to the putative Breton-lang. sources of the lais in OF. Songs are still an important form of Breton poetry. Mod. singer-songwriters include Glenmor, Youenn Gwernig, Gilles Servat, Jef Philippe, Louis Bodénès, Nolwenn Korbell, Denez Prigent (who composes gwerzioù of his own), and the internationally famous Alan Stivell.

After the Middle Breton literary standard lapsed in the 17th c., four main dialects emerged, associated with the regions of Léon, Trégor, Cornouaille, and Vannes. But following the lead of the grammarian Jean-François Le Gonidec (1775–1838), Breton writers again worked to establish a cultivated literary norm, largely based on the Léon dialect. The dialect of Vannes was used mostly by priests who found inspiration in their faith and in their love for their native land. Esp. popular were Msgr. Yann Vari Joubiouz's Doue ha mem bro (1844) and Joakim Gwilhom's imitation of Virgil's Georgics, Livr el labourer (1849). From the 1850s to the 1880s, only minor talents emerged. Living uprooted from the Breton countryside, these poets expressed in artificial diction their love of the simple life, of the homeland, and of their inheritance, which was no longer secure. This nostalgic trad. was maintained and reinvigorated in the 1890s by the rich lyricism of François Taldir-Jaffrennou and the more artistic Erwan Berthou, but the outstanding poet of their generation was Yann-Ber Kalloc'h, killed in action in 1917. His poems, written in Vannetais and published posthumously, express strong religious and patriotic convictions enhanced by rich and powerful imagery.

The 20th c. saw the vigorous growth of Breton literary periodicals, each with its coterie. Vannetais writers found expression in Dihunamb, ed. by the poet-peasant Loeiz Herrieu. The Gwalarn group, founded in 1925 under the leadership of Roparz Hémon, proved by far the most talented and creative. Maodez Glanndour and Hémon stand out from the group, although nearly all were gifted poets. Gwalarn did not survive World War II, but patriotic young writers launched new publications. Most did not last. The single exception was Al Liamm: under the guidance of Ronan Huon, it became the leading Breton literary jour. In their poetry, Huon and his contemporaries Youenn Olier, Per Denez, and Per Diolier, later joined by Youenn Gwernig (who also wrote in Fr. and Eng.) and Reun ar C'halan, respected the literary standards set by Gwalarn. Women have also played a significant role in the survival of Breton poetry, esp. Anjela Duval, Vefa de Bellaing, Benead, Naïg Rozmor, Tereza, and, more recently, Maï Jamin and Annaïg Renault. The jour. Brud (now Brud Nevez), founded in 1957, counted one of the best contemp. poets, Per Jakez Hélias, among its first contributors. The 1960s witnessed a strong resurgence of Breton nationalism. The Union Démocratique Bretonne, created in 1964, attracted several young militant poets: Paol Keineg (better known for Fr. poetry), Yann-Ber Piriou, Erwan Evenou, and Sten Kidna. Other poets have since come to the fore: Abanna, Alan Botrel, Yann-Baol an Noalleg, Koulizh Kedez, Padrig an Habask, Gwendal and Herle Denez, Tudual Huon, Bernez Tangi, to name but a few. Many were pub. in Skrid (1974–89). New jours. that regularly publish Breton poetry include Aber, An Amzer, Al Lanv, HOPALA!, and Spered Gouez.

Among the special interests of the 20th and 21st-cs. poets are Breton identity; issues of human rights, cultural autonomy, and lang. survival in Brittany and worldwide; other minority cultures, particularly those of other Celtic lands, an interest sometimes verging on "pan-Celticism" (beginning with the Gwalarn group, many poems have been trans. into Breton); and creative manipulation of the Breton lang. itself. The biggest challenge now facing Breton poetry is to find and maintain a knowledgeable audience outside the ranks of its practitioners.

■ Anthologies: Barzaz Breiz, ed. T. H. de la Villemarqué (1839); Gwerziou Breiz Izel, ed. F. M. Luzel, 2 vols. (1868–74); Soniou Breiz Izel, ed. F. M. Luzel and A. Le Braz, 2 vols. (1890); Les Bardes et poètes nationaux de la Bretagne armoricaine, ed. C. Le Mercier d'Erm (1918); Barzhaz: kant barzhoneg berr, 1350–1953, ed. P. Denez (1953); Défense de cracher par terre et de parler breton, ed. Y.-B. Piriou (1971); Le Livre d'Or de la Bretagne, ed. P. Durand (1975); Anthologie de la poésie bretonne, 1880–1980, ed. C. Le Quintrec (1980); Du a Gwyn, ed. D. M. Jones and M. Madeg (1982); Barzhonegoù, ed. Skrid (1986); Writing the Wind: A Celtic Resurgence, ed. T. R. Crowe (1997); Anthologie de la littérature bretonne au XXème siècle/ Lennegezh ar Brezhoneg en XXvet Kantved, ed. F. Favereau, 3 vols. (2002–08); The Turn of the Ermine, ed. J. Gibson and G. Griffiths (2006).

■ Surveys: F. Gourvil, Langue et Littérature bretonnes (1952); Istor Lennegezh Vrezhonek an Amzer-Vremañ, ed. Abeozen [Y.F.M. Eliès] (1957); Y. Olier, Istor hol lennegezh "Skol Walarn," 2 vols. (1974–75); Y. Bouëssel du Bourg and Y. Brekilien, "La littérature bretonne," La Bretagne, ed. Y. Brekilien (1982); J. Gohier and R. Huon, Dictionnaire des écrivains aujourd'hui en Bretagne (1984); Histoire littéraire et culturelle de la Bretagne, ed. J. Balcou and Y. Le Gallo, 3 vols. (1987); D. Laurent, Aux sources du Barzaz-Breiz (1989); F. Favereau, Littérature et écrivains bretonnants depuis 1945 (1991); M.-A. Constantine, Breton Ballads (1996); A. Botrel, "Les chemins de la poésie en langue bretonne," HOPALA! 29 (2008).

■ Prosody: E. Ernault, L'Ancien Vers Breton (1912); R. Hémon, Trois poèmes en moyen breton (1962); F. Kervella, Diazezoù ar sevel gwerzioù (1965).

D. M. Lloyd; R. Galand; M. Boyd

BRIDGE (Gr. zeugma). In metrics, bridges are constraints on word end at certain locations within the line. In *classical prosody, the most important bridges in (1) the iambic *trimeter are the following: (a) Knox's trochee bridge: in the iambographers (Archilochus, Semonides, Solon, Hipponax), a trochaic word shape may not end in third *anceps and is still somewhat constrained in *tragedy; (b) Porson's bridge: after long third anceps outside *comedy, no full word boundary may occur; (c) There is also evidence for a general, if weak, *constraint on word end after short third anceps; (d) Knox's iamb bridge: an iambic word shape may not end in fifth longum in the iambographers; (e) Wilamowitz's bridge: a spondaic word shape may not end in fifth longum in the iambographers; (f) Word boundary should not split a *resolution or *substitution or divide them from the following syllable. Each of the foregoing bridges has its counterpart in the trochaic *tetrameter.

The most important bridges in (2) the dactylic *hexameter are the following: (a) Iterated trochaic division of the first and second feet before a feminine *caesura is avoided in all styles. A line beginning

– ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑

autis epeita pedonde

(Odyssey 11.598)

is rare and probably more constrained when all three words are lexical; (b) Meyer's bridge: trochaic division of the second *foot is not permitted before a masculine caesura in Callimachus unless either the word before the division or the word after it is nonlexical; (c) Hermann's bridge: trochaic division of the fourth foot is strongly avoided; (d) Bulloch's bridge: in Callimachus, if a word ends with the third foot, the verse must have a regular caesura and a bucolic *diaeresis, and the syntactic boundary at either or both of the latter positions must be of higher rank than the boundary at the end of the third foot. Callimachus would not permit a line such as

– – – – – ⏑ ⏑ – – – ⏑ ⏑ – x

ede gar deron chronon allelon apechonta

(Iliad 14.206)

(e) *Spondee *zeugma: word end after contraction (– for ⏑ ⏑) is avoided in the fourth foot, rare in the second, and practically excluded in the fifth. In Callimachus, the zeugma is stricter.

There are also constraints on nonfinal heavy syllables in arsis that are clearly related to some bridges (see ARSIS AND THESIS). E.g., type (1e) above cannot be subsumed along with (1d) under a generalized constraint on disyllables, so that the initial heavy syllable of spondee-shaped words is independently constrained. Furthermore, in the iambographers, words of the shape – – ⏑ x are strongly avoided beginning in third anceps. In the hexameter, words of the shape – – x are strongly avoided beginning in the arsis of the fifth foot. These constraints unite with the bridges to form a finely structured hierarchy of strictness according to *genre and style.

The definition of a bridge as a point in the verse line where word end is forbidden is adequate for certain descriptive and philological purposes, like identifying corrupt lines; but in offering no explanation, it obscures more than it reveals. Some bridges, such as Knox's (1a, 1d), are apparently simple constraints on patterned iteration of word end. Others, like Bulloch's bridge (2d), are constraints against potential phrase boundary. A third group of bridges (incl. Porson's [1b], which is often regarded as prototypical, and the constraints against "split" resolution [1f]) are not, properly speaking, sensitive to word end at all. What is constrained by these latter is how the syllables of the word are mapped onto arsis and thesis. Word end is simply the right edge of the domain within which syllables are rhythmically organized for speech. Apparent exceptions to bridge rules generally involve function words (e.g., articles, pronouns, prepositions), which coalesce with their head word into a single domain, or fixed phrases. Some styles of verse allow function words at bridges with great freedom, others much less so: this variation reflects the degree to which a verse style allows itself access to fluent speech.

■ R. Porson, Euripidis Hecuba, 2d ed. (1802); G. Hermann, Orphica (1805); J. Hilberg, Das Prinzip der Silbenwaegung und die daraus entspringenden Gesetze der Endsilben in der griechischen Poesie (1879); W. Meyer, "Zur Geschichte des griechischen und lateinischen Hexameters," Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (1884); L. Havet, Cours élémentaire de métrique grecque et latine (1896); Wilamowitz; A. D. Knox, "The Early Iambus," Philologus 87 (1932); Maas; A. W. Bulloch, "A Callimachean Refinement of the Greek Hexameter," CQ 20 (1970); Allen; A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, "Bridges in the Iambographers," Greek, Roman, Byzantine Studies 22 (1981); and Language and Metre (1984); Snell; West.

A. M. DEVINE; L. D. STEPHENS

BROADSIDE BALLAD. A journalistic song printed on a single piece of paper (a broadside) often chronicling a newsworthy event. From the late 16th c., the marketing of broadside ballads was a fixture of popular culture in Europe and its colonies for several hundred years. All Eur. lang. groups with print markets display a division between an older, premod. layer of oral ballads and a more recent body of broadside ballads shaped by writing and print.

■ History: H. Rollins, "Black-Letter Broadside Ballad," PMLA 35 (1919); G. M. Laws, American Balladry from British Broadsides (1957); E. Janda and F. Nützhold, Die Moritat vom Bänkelsang oder Lied von der Strasse (1959); C. Simpson, The British Broadside Ballad and Its Music (1966); C. Slater, Stories on a String: The Brazilian Literatura de Cordel (1982); N. Würzbach, The Rise of the English Street Ballad 1550–1650, trans. G. Walls (1990).

See BALLAD.

■ Web Sites: English Broadside Ballad Archive, University of California, Santa Barbara: http://emc.english.ucsb.edu/ballad_project/index.asp; Roud Broadside Index: http://library.efdss.org/cgi-bin/textpage.cgi?file-aboutRoudbroadside&access=off.

D. DUGAW

BROKEN RHYME. Broken rhyme usually designates the division by hyphenation of a word at the end of a line in order to isolate the portion of that word that produces a rhyme with a word at the end of a subsequent line: e.g., "As prone to all ill, and of good as for*get-* / ful, as proud, lustfull, and as much in debt" (Alexander Pope), or "Winter and summer, night and morn, / I languish at this table dark; / My office window has a corn- / er looks into St. James's Park" (William Thackeray). In Eng. poetry, poets from Shakespeare to Ogden Nash have used broken rhyme to comic and satiric effect. G. M. Hopkins uses it as a resource for serious poetry, e.g., in "The Windhover" and "To What Serves Mortal Beauty?," going so far as to link the final portion of one line with an isolated phoneme in the next ("at the door / Drowned" rhymes with "reward"); this he called the rove over rhyme. Broken rhymes have also been used by John Donne (Satyres 3 and 4) and e. e. cummings. Yet broken rhyme is more frequent still in non-Eng. trads.; it was developed extensively in Rus. poetry, particularly in the work of 20th-c. poets Vladimir Mayakovsky, Velimir Khlebnikov, and Joseph Brodsky.

Broken rhyme's counterpart in unrhymed verse is *enjambment. Both rely on visual form: for all the "breaking," the binding of the syllables within the broken word is, in fact, stronger than the line end, generating the tension that characterizes each technique.

In Lord Byron, some instances of broken rhyme also meet the criteria for *mosaic rhyme or split rhyme, in that the rhyme is achieved not by pairing two words but rather by pairing one word with multiple words: "Start not! Still chaster reader—she'll be nice hence- / Forward, and there is no great cause to quake; / This liberty is a poetic licence"; elsewhere in Don Juan, we see pure examples of mosaic rhyme, though this is also now referred to as broken rhyme by numerous sources: "But—Oh! ye lords and ladies intel*lectual*, / Inform us truly, have they not hen-pecked you all"?

See CHAIN RHYME.

T.V.F. BROGAN; J. CROFT

BUCOLIC (Gr. bu+kol-, "care of cattle"). The semantic range of bucolic stretches from such concrete activities as feeding, grazing, and controlling animals, to tending children or attending to anything the mind can make an object for cognition. As "herdsmanlike," though, bucolic commonly connotes "lazy," "thievish," or "distracted," like the mythic herdsman Argos, panoptes (all-seeing) with a hundred eyes, said to have been lulled by music and killed by the god Hermes (archetypal trader and cattle rustler). Early and widely too, music and story (*myth) are said to "console" or "sway" with Orphic power, whether in pasture, nursery, school, or political assembly, but contrarily again to "feed" false hopes, so "mislead," "beguile." Thus documented as constitutive for a culture where cattle are the basic capital (McInerney), the encoded contradictions inform and animate the Gr. Bucolics by Theocritus (of Syracuse and Alexandria, 3d c. BCE). On the premise that "the herdsman was good to think with," Theocritus first turned the bucolic "figure of analogy" into "the character of focus" (Gutzwiller) creating *idylls, "little scenes," blending *mime with epos, which dramatized and thematized bucolic powers and limits to process the unruly force of love (eros). Two centuries later, Virgil redeployed bucolic epos to process the unruly force of revolution at Rome. His Bucolics (ten in number, also called Eclogues*) proclaimed a returning Golden Age (Eclogue 4); transformed the tragic cowherd Daphnis dying of love (idyll 1) into a dead hero and new god (Julius Caesar; eclogue 5); and capped this sequel with a prequel, replacing Daphnis in Sicily (idyll 1) with Roman Gallus dying in Arcadia (eclogue 10). In the aftermath, bucolics, *pastorals, and eclogues get further redeployed from Roman, through Ren. and later moments, viable still for W. H. Auden ("Bucolics—Winds, Woods, Mountains, Lakes, Islands, Plains, Streams," 1955), Sylvia Plath ("Bucolics," 1956; bitter irony and tragic dream), and Maurice Manning (Bucolics, 2008; 70 eclogues, mocking "Boss," which recalls bossy [cow], echoing bous [Gr.], bos [Lat.], and gwou [IE]), also divers musical compositions or ensembles, not to mention commonplaces touting real estate as rural and serene.

See ALEXANDRIANISM, GREEK POETRY, LATIN POETRY, PASTORAL.

■ D. Halperin, Before Pastoral: Theocritus and the Tradition of Ancient Bucolic Poetry (1983); R. Hunter, Theocritus: A Selection (1999)—important intro. and commentary; K. Gutzwiller, "The Bucolic Problem," CP 101 (2006); and "The Herdsman in Greek Thought," Brill's Companion to Greek and Latin Pastoral, ed. M. Fantuzzi and T. Papanghelis (2006); New Versions of Pastoral: Post-Romantic, Modern, and Contemporary Responses to the Tradition, ed. D. James and P. Tew (2009); J. McInerney, The Cattle of the Sun: Cows and Culture in the World of the Ancient Greeks (2010); J. Van Sickle, Virgil's "Book of Bucolics": The Ten Eclogues Translated into English Verse (2011).

J. VAN SICKLE

BULGARIA, POETRY OF. Bulgarian poetry began with the adoption of an alphabet newly devised by two learned brothers of Thessaloniki, Cyril and Methodius, and with their trans. of several ecclesiastical books. The brothers devised not the Cyrillic alphabet, as is generally believed, but the Glagolitic alphabet in 855. Its complexity meant that it was quickly replaced by what we now call the Cyrillic alphabet. The Bulgarians converted to Eastern Orthodoxy in 865, under Boris I, who proclaimed it the state religion; this conversion was facilitated by the introduction of literacy in the vernacular.

The lit. in the early med. age was ecclesiastic: it focused on prayers, worship, and church rituals. Its main features fluctuate, but there is an invariant characteristic of poeticism in all eras. Cyril, Methodius, and their disciples translated a large corpus of canonical Christian texts and hymnological texts centered on the lives of the saints. These books contained mostly troparia (or stikhera) and kontakia, short poetical verses of two or three sentences to be sung between biblical psalmody and accepted as parts of vespers and matins. In 9th-c. Byzantium, the 12 volumes of the Menaion (Book of Months) were completed, containing proper offices for each day of the calendar year. From Bulgaria this ecclesiastical lit. spread to Serbia, Romania, and Russia, which helped to consolidate Slavdom in the 10th c. In accepting Christianity from Byzantium, along with its ecclesiastical and hymnological texts, Bulgaria accepted its ars poetica as well.

The earliest known poetic text of 9th-c. Bulgaria is the Proglas kâm Evangelieto (Foreword to the Tetraevangelion); it was most likely authored by Konstantine (Cyril) the Philosopher. It holds 110 verses of high artistic value, ecstatically glorifying the newly received gift the Slavs had received "from God," i.e., literacy in the vernacular. Some scholars, however, believe that this is a slightly later work, meant as a foreword to another artistic piece, Azbouchna molitva (Alphabet Prayer) by Konstantin Preslavski, written in 893. This work contains 40 verses with a woven alphabetical *acrostic. Preslavski wrote another poetic pearl, Ouchitelno evangelie (Didactic Gospel), thus establishing the role of the capital city of Preslav as the birthplace of Bulgarian poetry.

Two of Cyril and Methodius's followers, Kliment and Naum, established the town of Okhrid as a second cultural center. Mss. from Preslav were written in the Cyrillic alphabet, whereas those from Okhrid were mostly written in Glagolitic. Thanks to the work in both centers, early Slavic became the written lang. of the new culture then developing alongside Byzantium. In the 9th and 10th cs., Bulgaria reached its height as a political and cultural power.

Another cultural surge occurred in 1185, when the state regained its independence from Byzantium after more than a century of subjugation. The new capital, Turnovo, became the next important cultural center. The key figure here was Patriarch Evtimii (?1325–1401), who became famous for his orthographic reform of the Bulgarian literary lang., as well as his hagiographies and eulogies (zhitija and pohvalni slova) on Bulgarian saints. His name marked the emergence of the author from med. anonymity. He also contributed to the endorsement of the hesychastic norms introduced by another outstanding leader, Teodosiy Turnovski (1300–63). Other renowned figures from the literary school of Turnovo include Kiprian (1336–1406), Grigorii Tsamblak (1330–1406), and Konstantin Kostenechki (1380–1443).

Early in the 14th c., the monasteries of Mount Athos became incubators for saving and developing Slavic letters. Parchment was gradually replaced by paper, which facilitated the spread of lit. The holy mountain with its 20 main monasteries and numerous monastic cells became a natural fortress of Slav–Byzantine culture, which was preserved and transmitted through the following centuries under Ottoman rule (1396–1878).

During this period, Bulgarian lit. withdrew into churches and monasteries. The Ottomans destroyed many churches, and only a few of the remote monasteries survived to become hidden "barrels" where national awareness fermented. The civilization of the Bulgarian Middle Ages had to be conserved and saved within the framework of an alien Islamic doctrine, as the title of Runciman's book suggests.

In the 17th c., the fashion of so-called damaskin lit. began to flourish. It represents adaptations of slova (eulogies) and apocrypha (branded as "heretical") originally composed by the 16th-c. Gr. preacher Damaskin Studit. Folklore comprising all the oral genres—tales, songs, proverbs, didactic stories, rural beliefs, calendars, and so forth—continued to develop alongside the written trad. under foreign rule.

Secular lit. of modest artistic merit, based on Rus. and later on Fr. models, appeared in the middle of the 19th c. Educated Bulgarians turned first to Russia for secular literary forms. Poetry predominated through the work of writers like Neofit Rilski (1793–1881), Dobri Chintulov (1822–86), Naiden Gerov (1823–1900), and Georgi Rakovski (1821–67), who wrote the famous poem Gorski Putnik (A Forest Traveler) in 1857. With the introduction of the printing press in the Ottoman Empire after 1840, new genres emerged: ballads, diaries, travel notes, pamphlets, and short stories. Around 1850, poetic works were produced mainly by teachers, resulting in daskalska poezija (school poetry), characterized by patriotic and didactic tendencies.

Several prominent figures who were both poets and revolutionaries spearheaded the cultural resurgence of the 19th c. Vasil Levski (1837–73) was revered by all Bulgarians as the "saint of the revolution." He was hanged by the Turks near Sofia. His life and death inspired other writers such as Hristo Botev (1848–76), who was killed in combat as he led his people against the Turks in the Balkan range. Botev composed his poems using folk motifs and colloquial idioms.

The invariant characteristic of the period's poetry was monosemanticism, in which a limited number of synonyms stand for the poetic word as such. Poets sought a word that fully exhausts its semantic value, signifying a definite meaning. This corresponded to society's sole ideal, national liberation from the Turks. For an example of monosemanticism, we might take the case of Levski; the most celebrated poem extolling his death was written by Ivan Vazov (1850–1921), who exclaimed, "Oh, heroic gallows!" Since then, this expression became a cliché for a heroic death, used to signify the death of a national hero, usually Levski.

The style of these works is most often called realistic, but the events described, witnessed by most of the authors, were so grim and shocking that it might be better termed naturalistic, even dramatic. Another stream of "quiet" poetry emerged at this time; it focused on refining the lang., finding new rhymes and inventing figures. These tales, love songs, and poems did not tell of suffering or pain.

Bulgaria was liberated in the Russo–Turkish War (1877–78). The newly emerging literary star of the time was Vazov, celebrated as the patriarch of modern Bulgarian literature. Vazov worked across the cultural spectrum, writing poems, short stories, lyrics, dramas, and criticism.

The realistic model of lit. slowly began to crumble at this time. Authors sought to reopen a multisemantic fan behind the poetic word (*polysemy as opposed to monosemanticism). Words were given an unusual set of references or paralleled by sudden rhymes that displaced their meaning: unexpected harmony was sought in distant dissonances. E.g., the word swan had a whole "fan of meanings," such as the poet's soul, his striving for beauty, his lover, and so forth. The leading figure in this process was Vazov's lifelong rival Pencho Slaveikov (1866–1912), a humanitarian, poet, and philosopher educated in Germany. The playwright Petko Todorov (1879–1916), the poet Peyo Yavorov (1878–1914), the critic Krustyu Krustev (1866–1919), and Slaveikov formed an aesthetic circle around the literary jour. Misul (Thought, 1892–1907).

Slaveikov became the first modernist in Bulgarian lit. and the first poet directly connected with international movements. He went his own way, focusing more on great aesthetic questions than on contemp. literary life. A document in the Nobel Prize Committee archive states that Slaveikov was a Nobel Prize nominee in 1912. He died before the committee meeting, however. Slaveikov inherited a rich collection of folkloric work from his father, Petko Slaveikov, and masterfully saturated his own songs with folk motifs. In the epic poems Ralitsa, Boiko, and Kurvava pesen (Song of Blood), he tried to place specific folk sounds within a larger Eur. frame. Slaveikov's attempt to infuse national motifs into foreign models was successfully continued by Todorov, whose refined Idiliy (Idylls, 1908) spoke of the deeply symbolic lang. of nature, eluding any fixed literary classifications.

The most cherished figure of the early 20th c. was Yavorov, commonly held as the greatest Bulgarian poet. Although he formally belonged to the so-called Misul Circle, his unique talent enabled him to create his own poetic trad. Yavorov reflected the dramatic split of his tormented soul. His personal life seemed to be performed onstage, constantly trailed by a spotlight. His suicide in 1914 seemed a logical finale to his dramatic life.

The high aesthetic criteria of the jour. Misul became a lyrical guidepost for many young authors from different movements. From Misul to the next important literary circles, Zlatorog (Golden Horn, 1920–43) and Hyperion (1922–31), the Bulgarian literary trad. remained rooted in an aesthetic *romanticism, which has not ceased. Even later, when poets like Teodor Trayanov (1882–1945), Nikolai Liliev (1885–1960), Dimcho Debelyanov (1887–1916), Emanuil Popdimitrov (1855–1943), and Dimitur Boyadzhiev (1880–1911) brought *symbolism into Bulgarian lit., it still occupied romantic grounds.

This is esp. true of Trayanov, who was considered Yavorov's poetic rival. Trayanov spent 20 years (1901–21) in Vienna where he studied and took a diplomatic position. In this cultural atmosphere, he absorbed the ongoing romantic trad., which remained unbroken in Ger.-speaking countries. Mod. Bulgarian crit. is divided as to who opened the door to symbolism, Yavorov or Trayanov. As the most consistent of the symbolists, Trayanov is the most likely candidate, with his poem "Novijat den" (The New Day, 1905), also pub. in his first collection of 1909, Regina Mortua. Although entirely lyrical, his work is also classically symmetrical, divided into cycles, themes, and books. The striving for wholeness that runs throughout Trayanov's verse is typically romantic. His poems resonated deeply with the mood of national resignation during the interwar period, when he wrote his Bulgarski baladi (Bulgarian Ballads, 1922). Though Bulgaria had won its chief battles, it lost substantial territories through poor diplomacy and the betrayal of its allies. "The Secret of the Struma" and "Death in the Plains" are his great ballads of that period.

The poetry of Popdimitrov shows the closest relationship to Trayanov. Popdimitrov revived images from the Gothic Middle Ages. Many of his poems are titled with melodious women's names ("Ema," "Iren," "Laura"). The verse of Debelyanov is romantic and elegiac but also warm and lively. It introduced new modes: drinking songs, bacchanalian songs, the confessional genre of short narrative pieces about fashionable bohemian life. Debelyanov was killed in World War I. Similar motifs were to be found in the poetry of Kiril Hristov (1875–1944), whose work is flavored with the unbridled eroticism that was his inspiration. Liliev is considered one of the finest Bulgarian lyricists. His short collections include Ptitsi v noshta (Birds at Night, 1918), Lunni petna (Moonspots, 1922), and Stihotvoreniya (Verse, 1931).

The Fr.-influenced symbolism of Yavorov and the Austrian symbolism of Trayanov clashed with the dominant sociorealistic tendency of Bulgarian lit. During the Communist regime, this tendency continued. But just as Trayanov is more a neoromantic than a symbolist, the "hard" realism of Bulgarian lit. is more a myth than a reality. The term realist became the pass, awarded by official critics, that enabled many Bulgarian literary celebrities to enter the rebuilt, low–roofed pantheon of socialist realist writing. Geo Milev (1895–1925) was an expressionist poet among the symbolists. Milev's greatest poem, "Septemvri" (September, 1924), led eventually to his incarceration and death at the hands of the regime. His poetry resumes monosemanticism on a new scale; it demonstratively rejects polysemy for the sake of synonymity, piling up many similar words for one and the same meaning.

A new generation of poets made their debuts through opposing the now old-fashioned symbolism. In his collection Fragmenti (Fragments, 1967), Atanas Dalchev (1904–1978) achieved a paradoxical realism based on idiosyncratic imagery. Asen Raztsvetnikov (1897–1951) composed melodious ballads with resigned overtones. Nikola Fournadzhiev's (1903–68) dark and depressive poetry in heavy rhythmic style marked a different pole. The verse of Nikola Rakitin (1886–1934) breathed a quiet and idyllic atmosphere. The poetry of Alexander Voutimski (1919–43) represented an early romantic protest against advancing totalitarianism.

The interwar period also marked the debuts of women poets who began their careers free of any dogmatism. Elisaveta Bagryana (1893–1991) is celebrated for her unrestrained personality and a worship of life, freedom, youth, and travel. Her collections include Vechnata i svyatata (The Eternal and the Sacred, 1927), the postwar Ot bryag do bryag (From Coast to Coast, 1963), Kontrapunkti (Counterpoints, 1972), and Na brega na vremeto (At the Shore of Time, 1983). Dora Gabe (1886–1983) imaginatively explored common household objects in bright, optimistic poetry. Her collections include Zemen put (Terrestrial Way, 1928), Pochakai slunce (Wait Sun, 1967), and Sgustena tishina (Condensed Quietude, 1973). Early in the Communist era, an attempt was made to revive a "hard" realistic method. Poets like Nikola Vaptsarov (1909–42), who was shot as a terrorist before the Communist coup, and Penyo Penev (1930–59) were used for this purpose. But resistance won in the long-term conflict. Penev lost his illusions and committed suicide. Many writers were sent to labor camps. The discord between Soviet-style socialist realism and the inventions of contemp. lit. grew rapidly. New trends, masked as experiments, permeated Bulgarian lit. Gifted writers such as Ivan Peichev (1916–76), Andrei Germanov (1932–81), Alexander Gerov (1919–97), Ivan Teofilov (b. 1931), Stefan Tsanev (b. 1936), Nikolai Kunchev (1936–2007), Boris Hristov (b. 1945), and Ivan Tsanev (b. 1941) took advantage of this relative freedom and sent a countermessage to the era's stale ideals. In the late 20th c., the poets Radoi Ralin (1923–2004), Blaga Dimitrova (1922–2003), Konstantin Pavlov (1933–2008), and Vladimir Levchev (b. 1957) became open dissidents.

Even before Communism's collapse in 1989, fresh trends of delicacy and concision could be seen in the poetry of Miriana Basheva (b. 1947), Fedya Filkova (b. 1950), and Georgi Rupchev (1957–2001). Petya Dubarova, born in 1962, was widely recognized as the most gifted younger voice; her suicide in 1979 was believed to be a tragic reaction to the brutality of society. The poetry of Ani Ilkov (b. 1957), Miglena Nikolchina (b. 1955), and Edvin Sougarev (b. 1953) can be described by terms such as *expressionism, *imagism, and *constructivism, as long as post- appears before them.

Among a new wave of extremely promising authors, poets such as Georgi Gospodinov (b. 1968), Verginiya Zaharieva (b. 1959), Kristin Dimitrova (b. 1963), Elin Rahnev (b. 1968), and Mirela Ivanova (b. 1962) seek to present the complications and contradictions of the postmod. consciousness in a time of chaos, marked by destructive political events and a radical upheaval of the world picture. Their brilliantly rendered insights and linguistic games have helped to build a warmer and more generous cultural philosophy. Their books of poems have largely appeared either in Eng. or as bilingual editions. Recent names, such as Nadejda Radulova (b. 1975), Dimiter Kenarov (b. 1981), and Kamelia Spasova (b. 1982), mark new experiments, such as living in virtual reality, writing Internet poetry, reflecting on a new femininity, and more.

■ S. Runciman, The Great Church in Captivity (1968); Anthology of Bulgarian Poetry, trans. P. Tempest (1975); J. Meyendorff, Byzantine Theology (1987); Clay and Star: Contemporary Bulgarian Poets, trans. and ed. L. Sapinkopf and G. Belev (1992); An Anthology of Bulgarian Literature, ed. I. Mladenov and H. R. Cooper Jr. (2007); Istoria na bulgarskata srednovekovna literature, comp. and ed. A. Miltenova (2008).

I. Mladenov

BURDEN, burthen (OE byrthen; OHG burdin—sometimes confused with bourdon, burdoun, from Fr. bourdon, Sp. bordin—there is little or no separation of the two words from the earliest citations in the OED). (a) In the Eng. Bible (cf. onus in the Vulgate), trans. from Heb. massa, a raising of the voice, utterance, oracle; (b) the bass or undersong, accompaniment (the same as bourdon): "For burden-wise I'll hum on Tarquin still"—William Shakespeare, Lucrece, 1133—cf. Chaucer's obscene pun about the summoner, "General Prologue," 673; (c) the chief theme, the leading sentiment or matter of a song or poem: "The burden or leading idea of every couplet was the same"—Leigh Hunt, Men, Women, & Books 1.11.199; (d) the refrain or chorus of a song: "Foot it featly here and there; And, sweet sprites, the burden bear. Hark, hark! Burden dispersedly. Bow-wow."—Shakespeare, Tempest 1.2.381; in particular, the refrain line in the *carol.

See ritornello.

■ R. H. Robbins, "The Burden in Carols," MLN 57 (1942); R. L. Greene, The Early English Carols, 2d ed. (1977).

T.V.F. Brogan; R. O. Evans

BURLESQUE. See contrafactum; parody; pastiche.

BURNS STANZA (also called "Scottish stanza," "standard Habbie"). One variety of *tail rhyme, the Burns stanza is a six-line stanza rhyming aaabab, the a-lines being tetrameter and the b-lines dimeter. Although named for the 18th-c. Scottish poet Robert Burns, the Burns stanza and its close variants are first found in med. *troubadour poetry; the earliest example is found in a poem by William of Poitiers. Examples in Scots poetry date from the 16th c.; a well-known 17th-c. ballad by Robert Sempill the Younger, "The Life and Death of Habbie Simpson," gave rise to the name "standard Habbie." By the 18th c., Allan Ramsay and Robert Fergusson frequently used it, which influenced Burns; around this point, Scottish writers began to see the form as a distinctively national one. Each stanza typically contains a single sentence; occasionally, two sentences are used. Despite its complexity, the form is an effective one. Following the crescendo of the initial tercet, the short lines lend themselves well to effects of pointing, irony, and closure:

> Ye ugly, creepin, blastit wonner,
> Detested, shunn'd by saunt an' sinner,
> How daur ye set your fit upon her,
> Sae fine a lady!
> Gae somewhere else, and seek your dinner
> On some poor body.
>
> ("To a Louse")

The meter was also used by William Wordsworth, appropriately, for his "At the Grave of Burns."

■ A. H. MacLaine, "New Light on the Genesis of the Burns Stanza," N&Q 198 (1953); H. Damico, "Sources of Stanza Forms Used by Burns," Studies in Scottish Literature 12 (1975); R. Crawford, Robert Burns and Cultural Authority (1997); The Canongate Burns, ed. A. Noble and P. S. Hogg (2003).

A. Preminger; T.V.F. Brogan; C. Doak

BYLINA (pl. byliny). Scholars use the word bylina for the Rus. oral *epic (see oral poetry), but singers employ starina (or starinka), terms indicating songs about past events. Byliny originated among the princes' retinues in Kyivan Rus' and were produced between the 10th and 15th cs. Ordinarily byliny contain 300–500 lines, are without stanzas or rhyme, are built around typical epic subjects, and employ special ling. and poetic devices. They are performed by a single singer without the accompaniment of a musical instrument. The earliest pub. collection appeared in 1804 and is attributed to Kirsha Danilov, who took down songs in the Ural region in the mid-18th c. Thought extinct by the mid-19th c., byliny were discovered to be a living trad. in the region around Lake Onega by P. N. Rybnikov in 1860. A collecting effort concentrated largely around Lake Onega and the White Sea ensued and continued until about 1950 when the trad. died out.

Scholars divide byliny into three cycles: magical (sometimes "mythological"), Kyivan, and Novgorod. The magical heroes (bogatyri) are the earliest. They include the shape-shifter Volkh Vseslavyevich, the villager's son Mikula, and the giant Svyatogor. Kyivan byliny constitute the largest group, and their heroes serve Prince Vladimir, who has been compared to King Arthur. These byliny reflect the struggle of Kyiv with nomadic steppe groups, though after the Mongol conquest, the adversaries appear as Tatars. The low-born Ilya Muromets, who even when snubbed by Vladimir stands up for Rus, the Christian faith, and the downtrodden, is its central hero. Other important heroes include the courteous diplomat Dobrynya Nikitich and the cunning priest's son Alyosha Popovich. The third cycle is connected to the northern city of Novgorod. Its heroes are the rich merchant and gusli player Sadko and the rabble-rouser Vasily Buslayev.

■ A. P. Skaftymov, Poetika i genezis bylin (1924); N. Chadwick, Russian Heroic Poetry (1932); A. M. Astakhova, Russkii bylinnyi epos na Severe (1948), and Il'ia Muromets (1958); V. Ia. Propp, Russkii georicheskii epos (1958); Byliny, ed. A. M. Astkhova (1966); F. J. Oinas, "Russian Byliny," Heroic Epic and Saga (1978); B. N. Putilov, Epicheskoe stazitel'stvo (1997); An Anthology of Russian Folk Epics, ed. J. Bailey and T. Ivanova (1998).

J. O. Bailey; L. Ivanits

BYZANTINE POETRY

I. Hymnography
II. Songs
III. Declamatory Poetry
IV. Epigrams
V. Religious Poetry
VI. Satirical Poetry
VII. Verse Romances and Chronicles
VIII. Didactic Poetry

The Byzantine millennium is usually divided into three periods: early Byzantine or late antique (330–ca. 600), middle Byzantine (ca. 600–1204), and late Byzantine (1204–1453). Constantinople officially became the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire (now called the Byzantine Empire) in the year 330; around 600, urban civilization and traditional power structures began to collapse, leading to the "dark age" crisis of the 7th and 8th cs. In 1204, Constantinople was conquered by the knights of the Fourth Crusade, and although it was reconquered in 1261, the Byzantine Empire had been reduced to a few territories that were gradually taken by the Ottoman Turks until the city itself fell in 1453. Although the Byzantine Empire was multilingual and produced lit. in Gr., Lat., Coptic, Syriac, Heb., Armenian, and Slavonic, the term Byzantine literature stands for med. Gr. lit. Byzantine Gr. is a literary lang. harking back to the ancients (Homeric and Atticistic Gr.) and/or the Bible and the earliest Christian texts (koiné); the first experiments in the vernacular date from the 12th c. Because Byzantine lit. is imitative, it has had a bad press; but *originality is a romantic concept, unknown to the Middle Ages. There are two kinds of Byzantine poetry: poetry set to music, such as *hymns, acclamations, satirical songs, and folk songs; and all other forms of poetry, intended either to be declaimed in public or to be read in private. As most poetry belonging to the first category has come down to us without scores or in later musical adaptations, we are uncertain how Byzantine music, esp. in its early stages, may have sounded. As for meter, all poetry set to music and many of the unsung poems are based on rhythmical patterns regulated by the position of stress accents. Poems in prosodic meters, such as the *iamb, the *hexameter, or the *anacreontic also survive, but these, too, obey certain rhythmical rules.

I. Hymnography. Byzantine liturgical poetry falls into three periods: the first (4th–5th c.) characterized by short hymns, the troparia and stichera; the second (5th–7th c.) by long and elaborate metrical sermons, the kontakia (clearly influenced by certain forms of Syriac hymnography); and the third (7th–9th c. and afterward) by a form of hymn-cycle called kanon, consisting of eight or nine odes, each set to its own music (heirmos). The second is the great period of Byzantine hymnography. The celebrated Akathistos hymn, sometimes referred to as the Byzantine Te Deum, dates from the 5th c. In the 6th c. lived Romanos, Byzantium's greatest religious poet. Some 85 of his kontakia have been preserved, all metrical sermons for various feasts of the Orthodox Church. Romanos, a conscientious Christian, treated his subject matter exactly as a preacher would. Occasionally, however, he gives rein to his fancy and at such times becomes grandiloquent in the style of epideictic oratorical poetry. His lang. on the whole is pure; he is rich in *metaphor and *imagery and often interweaves in his narrative whole passages from Holy Scripture. Andrew of Crete (around 700), initiates the third period of Byzantine liturgical poetry with his Great Kanon, a huge composition, in which elaboration of form results in a magnificent celebration of the Divine. Other representatives are John of Damascus, Kosmas of Maiouma, and Joseph the Hymnographer (8th–9th cs.). Though new hymns continued to be written, by the end of the 9th c., the liturgical calendar had filled up, and only few additions were made, such as a set of hymns written for the feast of the Three Hierarchs by John Mauropous (11th c.).

II. Songs. Byzantine chronicles preserve snippets of popular songs, such as the song making fun of Emperor Maurice's sexual prowess. The Book of Ceremonies (shortly after 963) contains the lyrics of many acclamations sung by the circus factions, unfortunately, without musical annotation. Some of the Gr. folk songs recorded in the 19th and 20th cs. by anthropologists go back to a centuries-old trad.; but in an oral trad., changes and corruptions are inevitable. There are a few texts in vernacular med. Gr. that clearly rely on an oral substratum. The most famous of these is the Digenis Akritis (early 12th c.?), a text of epic proportions that strings together a compilation of earlier ballads into an incoherent and disjointed narrative; the text has come down to us in various mss., the most important of which are the Escorial and the Grottaferrata versions.

III. Declamatory Poetry. *Panegyrics, *monodies, and *ekphraseis are just a few of the genres that were intended to be declaimed either at official celebrations, at certain ceremonies, or in so-called theatra, literary salons where literati would present their works to each other. The two best representatives of the panegyric (epic encomium) are George Pisides (7th c.) and Theodore Prodromos (12th c.), the former writing iambic verse (called dodecasyllable because it consists of 12 syllables) in praise of his patron, Emperor Herakleios, and his victories over the Avars and the Persians; and the latter writing for various patrons, incl. Emperor John Komnenos and other members of the imperial family, whose military feats he celebrated in political verse (a 15-syllable verse with a *caesura in the middle and an iambic rhythm). Monodies are funerary *dirges declaimed at burial ceremonies: the most famous are anonymous monodies on the deaths of Leo VI (912) and Constantine VII (959), the earliest instance of political verse; other monodies mourn the loss of cities, such as the late 12th-c. dirge by Michael Choniates, in which he lamented that ancient Athens was lost forever. Among the many ekphraseis, the detailed descriptions of St. Sophia by Paul the Silentiary (6th c.) and of the Church of the Holy Apostles by Constantine the Rhodian (10th c.) deserve to be mentioned—but ekphrasis can take many forms, incl. an anonymous early 11th-c. description of a boat trip on the Bosporus or a detailed account of a day at the races by Christopher Mitylenaios (11th c.).

IV. Epigrams. Byzantine *epigrams are either genuine or fictitious verse inscriptions attached to monuments or works of art or inscribed on tombs (*epitaphs). There is not a single Byzantine poet without at least a few epigrams to his name. While Agathias, Paul the Silentiary, and other 6th-c. poets clung to the rules and dictates of Hellenistic epigrammatic poetry, a more Christian and less elaborate form was developed by George Pisides (7th c.), Theodore of Stoudios, and Ignatios the Deacon (both early 9th c.). However, the heyday of the Byzantine epigram spans the 10th to 12th cs.: it was then that John Geometres, Christopher Mitylenaios, John Mauropous, Nicholas Kallikles, and Theodore Prodromos flourished. The anonymous 12th-c. epigrams in the collection of Marcianus Graecus 524 are also quite exceptional. The genre of the Byzantine epigram also comprises the many book epigrams found in Byzantine mss.: epigrams written in honor of the author, the patron who commissioned the ms., or the scribe. Gnomic epigrams (see GNOMIC POETRY), of which there are many, also fall in this category: most of these pithy sayings are anonymous, but some are attributed to Kassia (9th c.), the only known female Byzantine poet.

V. Religious Poetry. Apart from hymnography, the singing of which is a communal act of devotion, there are also lyrical effusions of the soul and intimate soliloquies with God; these poems are not sung but either declaimed or read in silence. The poetry of the Church father Gregory of Nazianzus (4th c.) is a brilliant example followed by all Byzantine poets. The greatest of these are John Geometres (10th c.), Symeon the New Theologian (10th–11th c.), and John Mauropous (11th c.). Geometres' masterpiece is a long confession and prayer to the Holy Virgin, in which he tries to come to terms with his human limitations. Symeon the New Theologian was a mystic who wrote inspired poetry relating all his mystical experiences and divine revelations, such as one in which he recognizes the presence of Christ in his body. Mauropous was an intellectual reluctant to leave his books and step out into the world: when he was forced to become metropolitan of a provincial town, he wrote two poems first praying that this evil might not happen and then, when the imperial decision proved to be irreversible, asking God to teach him how to accept his fate.

VI. Satirical Poetry. *Satire is ubiquitous in Byzantine poetry, in both the learned and vernacular trads. A good example of the latter are the Ptochoprodromic Poems (12th c.), five satires dealing with different characters who narrate their petty problems and little adventures, posing as a henpecked husband, a hungry paterfamilias, a poor grammarian, and a lowly and abused monk. The poems of "Poor Prodromos" are brilliant satires that describe the lives of ordinary citizens in a big city in a vernacular that serves as a vehicle of social crit. and colorful realism. Another good example of satire is the Entertaining Tale of Quadrupeds (14th c.), a hilarious poem about an assembly of animals who express their grudges.

VII. Verse Romances and Chronicles. In the 12th c., the ancient "novelists" Heliodorus and Achilles Tatius were imitated in a number of verse romances by Niketas Eugenianos, Theodore Prodromos, and Constantine Manasses, all of whom wrote in learned Gr. After 1204, this literary experiment was followed by verse romances in vernacular Gr., most of which also show some familiarity with Western romances of chivalry (see MEDIEVAL ROMANCE), such as the Livistros and Rodamne, War of Troy, Achilleid, and Velthandros and Chrysantza, all the works of unknown poets. Verse chronicles, too, were composed in learned and vernacular Gr.: the Synopsis Chronike by Manasses (12th c.), the Chronicle of Morea (14th c.), and the Chronicle of the Tocco (early 15th c.). With its emphasis on love, exploring the depths of the human soul, Manasses' chronicle might even be seen as a verse romance.

VIII. Didactic Poetry. A few names should suffice for these prose-in-verse creations on all kinds of scientific topics: Pisides' Hexaemeron, Leo Choirosphaktes' Thousand-Line Theology (early 10th c.), Niketas of Herakleia's grammatical treatises in the form of troparia and kanons (11th c.), and Manuel Philes' On the Characteristics of Animals (early 14th c.).

■ Anthologies: Anthologia Graeca Carminum Christianorum, ed. W. Christ and M. Paranikas (1872); Poeti byzantini, ed. R. Cantarella, 2 v. (1948); Medieval and Modern Greek Poetry, ed. C. A. Trypanis (1951); An Anthology of Byzantine Poetry, ed. B. Baldwin (1985).

■ Criticism and History: K. Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Litteratur, 2d ed. (1897); H.-G. Beck, Geschichte der byzantinischen Volksliteratur (1971); H. Hunger, Die hochsprachliche Profane Literatur, 2 v. (1978); Trypanis; Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, ed. A. P. Kazhdan (1991); M. D. Lauxtermann, Byzantine Poetry from Pisides to Geometres (2003).

M. D. LAUXTERMANN

C

CACCIA. An It. verse form first used in the early 14th c. by Magister Piero, Giovanni da Cascia, and Jacopo da Bologna. Three early caccia were cast in the form of the *madrigal. The highly developed caccia consisted of a random number of eleven-, seven-, or five-syllable lines of verse. As in the madrigal, a *refrain might occur as the final section. Other features include *onomatopoeia, elliptical syntax, and exclamatory remarks. As the name indicates, the caccia originated as a hunting song (It. cacciare, to hunt); Boccaccio's Caccia di Diana (1336), in terza rima*, is the first. Niccolò Soldanieri created the best examples; later poets such as Giannozzo Manetti, Franco Sacchetti, Ghirardello da Firenze, and Francesco Landini extended the motive and also included battle scenes, fishing scenes, and dancing. Musically, the caccia consists of a canon in two parts for upper voices, which "hunt" each other, normally accompanied by an instrumental tenor. In 1332, Antonio da Tempo wrote the first extensive theoretical treatise of the cacci, the Summa artis rithmici. The caccia was particularly popular between 1360 and 1380; after 1400, only a few examples are extant. Forms of the caccia existed in most Eur. countries, such as the Fr. chace (chasse), the Eng. chase, the Sp. caça, and the Ger. Jagdlied (Oswald von Wolkenstein). Since the 16th c., the term has generally been applied to hunting songs of various types, e.g., the songs by Nicolas Gombert or Clément Janequin, or the catch in England. Joseph Haydn (Symphony no. 73) and Étienne Méhul (overture of his opera Le jeune Henri) applied the term Chasse to their works.

■ Fourteenth-century Italian Cacce, ed. W. T. Marrocco (1942); N. Pirrotta, "Per l'origine e la storia della caccia e del madrigale trecentesca," Rivista musicale italiana 48–49 (1946–47); F. Ghisl, "Caccia," MGG; A. da Tempo, Summa artis rithmici, ed. R. Andrews (1977); F. A. Gallo, "Caccia," Handwörterbuch der musical: Terminologie, ed. H. H. Eggebrecht (1979); K. von Fischer, "Caccia," New Grove; A. Classen, "Onomatopoesie in der Lyrik von Jehan Vaillant, Oswald von Wolkenstein und Niccolò Soldaniere," Zeitschrift für Deutsche Philologie (1989); Diana's Hunt, ed. and trans. A. K. Cassell and V. Kirkham (1991); D. Del Puppo, "Caccia," Medieval Italy: An Encyclopedia, ed. C. Kleinhenz (2004).

A. Classen

CACOPHONY (Gr., "bad sound"). The opposite of *euphony. Harsh and discordant or dissonant sound, used particularly in dramatic works and poetry to create tension, to express a speaker's rage or indignation, or to evoke other stressful emotions for readers, performers, and their audiences.

In his Essay on Criticism, Alexander Pope employs cacophony to show how "The Sound must seem an Eccho to the Sense" when he writes, "But when loud Surges lash the sounding Shore, / The hoarse, rough Verse shou'd like the Torrent roar" (365, 368–69).

It bears noting that what the words are saying may alter one's perceptions of cacophony. Reader/performers are likely to consider the concluding line of G. M. Hopkins's "Felix Randal," with its own insistent b's and d's (and g's), more steadily forceful and admiring (and perhaps suggestive of hammer blows) than cacophonous, as the poet describes how the blacksmith "Didst fettle for the great gray dray horse his bright and battering sandal."

More certain cacophony is evident in Robert Browning's "Soliloquy of the Spanish Cloister." Harsh g's of the opening "Gr-r-r—there go" are followed by the breathy hea and hor of "my heart's abhorrence"—the physical exhalations accompanying and intensifying the sense of the speaker's hatred of another cloistered monk. After nine stanzas of vituperation, the poem ends with an outburst of harsh sounds such as those that might summon devils, as well as a corruption of the euphonic "Ave Maria, gratia plena": Hy, Zy, Hine . . . / 'St, there's Vespers! "Plena grati / Ave, Virgo! Gr-r-r—you swine!"

See DISSONANCE, SOUND.

T. Carper

CADENCE. (1) Technically, the fixed patterning of quantities in the clausula, i.e., the last few syllables of a phrase or clause, in med. Lat. art prose (see PROSE RHYTHM); also, by extension, such prefinal patterning in metrical verse. (2) More generally, the rhythmic pattern or intonational contour of a sentence or line, referring to its accentual pattern, the timing of its delivery, its *pitch contour, or any combination of these. (3) A term often used to describe the rhythmical flow of such nonmetrical prosodies as found in the Bible, in Walt Whitman, in *free verse, and in the *prose poem. Drawn from music, the term used in this third sense implies a looser, more irregular concept of poetic rhythm than that applied to metrical poetry and mainly refers to phrasing, which extends beyond foot-based *scansion. Cadence is here determined by ample and flexible sonic features incl. *assonance and *consonance and is shaped both by stichic concerns and strophic considerations. Most of the poets experimenting in the avant-garde prosodies of the later 19th and early 20th cs. followed injunctions toward cadence-based composition advanced by Ezra Pound and W. C. Williams, esp. per the latter's notion of the *variable foot. Amy Lowell linked cadence not only to music but to breathing, which Charles Olson subsequently theorized in his remarks on *projective verse. Robert Duncan later extended the connection between cadence and breathing to encompass the entire body. In recent years, the continued emphasis on cadence as an alternative to meter is indicative of a more inclusive canon, the revival of *oral poetry, and the ongoing transition from print to digital culture.

See COLON, PERIOD, PUNCTUATION.

■ Hardie; A. Lowell, "Some Musical Analogies in Modern Poetry," The Musical Quarterly 6, no. 1 (1920); Olson; M. M. Morgan, "A Treatise in Cadence," MLR 47 (1952); W. Mohr, "Kadenz," Reallexikon II, 1.803–6; Lausberg, 479 ff.; D. Levertov, "Some Notes on Organic Form," Poetry 105 (1964); Scott 187 ff.; Morier, see "Clausule"; Norden 2.909 ff.; R. Duncan, "Some Notes on Notation," Ground Work: Before the War (1984).

T.V.F. BROGAN; J. M. COCOLA

CAESURA

I. Caesura vs. Pause
II. Position
III. Extra Syllables

A term that derives from the Lat. verb caedere, "to cut off," and refers to the place in a line of verse where the metrical flow is temporarily "cut off." When this "cut" occurs at the beginning of a line, it is called an "initial caesura"; when it occurs in the middle of a line, it is called a "medial caesura"; and when it occurs at the end of a line, it is called a "terminal caesura." In OE poems such as Beowulf, caesuras occur predictably between the two half-lines (*hemistich) that are linked by *alliteration. Chaucer used caesuras with greater variety in his *iambic pentameter, and William Shakespeare used them with even more variety in his *blank verse. Poets during and after the Eng. Ren. often placed several caesuras in a line—or no caesuras in a line—to alter the rhythm of the meter, which would otherwise be as monotonous as the ticking of a metronome. 18th-c. poets such as Alexander Pope used caesuras to create a sense of balance or symmetry. In Pope's famous couplet "True wit is nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed" (An Essay on Criticism, 297–98), the caesura in the second line allows the reader to pause before balancing the traditional contraries of wit and nature, thought and speech. 19th- and 20th-c. poets who broke away from metrical verse to write *free verse used caesuras in unexpected places in an attempt to represent more accurately the spontaneous way people thought and spoke. When Ezra Pound and e. e. cummings composed poems by arranging words—or even syllables—in unconventional patterns on the page and when poets such as Charles Olson and Allen Ginsberg declared that poetic lines should be units of breath, caesuras were often indicated by spaces between phrases. In contemp. writing, the poetic term caesura is frequently used metaphorically to mean any space, break, or pause in a sequence. Thus, Stephen Melville titles a chapter "Caesura" in AIDS and the National Body to refer to a pause in the long "sentence" of dying caused by AIDS. Other contemp. scholars write of "the caesura of the Holocaust" or "the caesura of religion."

I. Caesura vs. Pause. In every sentence, a syntactic juncture or pause between phrases or clauses is usually signaled by punctuation. Traditionally, a caesura is the metrical phenomenon in verse that corresponds to this break in syntax. Often these "breaks" are not carefully distinguished in prosody and lit. crit. Some critics use pause, rest, and caesura interchangeably. Strict constructionists argue that performative pauses and individual speech tempos have nothing to do with caesuras in a traditional metrical design. Nor do so-called "metrical pauses" (missing syllables in accentual verse and other verse systems whose time is filled by a rest) have anything to do with a caesura. According to the traditional view, a poet deliberately places a caesura in a line to break up the metrical flow of verse and to prevent monotony. By contrast, a reader can break up the flow any way he or she deems appropriate. Although some prosodists have claimed that, strictly speaking, a caesura is not a component of a metrical pattern or is only realized in performance, these are minority views.

II. Position. The position and number of caesuras in a line vary from one verse system to another. In cl. prosody, a caesura referred specifically to a pause within a foot of metrical verse. A *diaeresis referred to a pause at the end of a foot. The semantic shift from caesura to diaeresis may have occurred in Pierre de Ronsard's Abrégé de l'art poétique françois (1565). During the Ren., the mod. concept of caesura as a pause at the end of a metrical foot first surfaced in the prosody manuals of the Séconde Rhétorique of early 16th-c. France. A rule forbidding an extra syllable before the caesura was set forth in the Pleine rhétorique (1521) of Pierre Fabri and in the Art poétique (1555) of Jacques Peletier du Mans, who seems to have been the first to use the term césure in Fr.

In Gr. and Lat. poetry, caesuras were regulated more as to position than as to number, and technical terms have been developed to designate the most common placements in the *hexameter line. The term penthemimeral refers to a caesura appearing after the first long syllable of the third foot (i.e., after the fifth half-foot), and hephthemimeral refers to a caesura after the seventh half-foot. Cl. poets avoided dividing the hexameter line into two equal halves with a caesura. Fixed caesura placement was a major criterion in romance prosodies, esp. Fr. prosody. Indeed, when Victor Hugo moved the caesura in his Fr. alexandrine lines to create the trimètre, it was considered one of the most revolutionary moments in Fr. romanticism. In Eng. verse, caesura placement varies considerably according to metrical subgenre (dramatic verse vs. narrative and lyric; rhymed couplets vs. blank verse). At the end of the 19th c., Jakob Schipper promoted the doctrine that the caesura was essential to the structure of iambic pentameter (fully half of the 50 pps. devoted to Chaucerian meter in his Englische Metrik treated the caesura) and that variation in caesura placement was a deliberate strategy to combat the tedium of perfectly metered lines of verse.

III. Extra Syllables. The conventional terminology for line endings, masculine* and feminine, is sometimes still applied to caesuras. Thus, a caesura that follows a stressed syllable is called masculine, and one that follows an unstressed syllable is called feminine. Romance philologists and prosodists of the later 19th c. developed the terms epic and lyric to refer to two types of feminine caesuras that followed, respectively, an unstressed syllable that is not counted as part of the metrical pattern and an unstressed syllable that is counted. This system of classification arose from speculations about OF epics and lyric poems of *troubadours and *trouvères. In 1903, L. E. Kastner showed that the notion of epic caesuras was "not justified by facts." Unfortunately, these terms were taken up by scholars to describe caesural variation in Chaucer, with the implication that Eng. patterns of syllabic variation around the caesura "strictly correspond to their French models" (Schipper History, 133). Further studies have shown that caesura placement in Eng. verse—esp. Chaucer's and Shakespeare's—is not strictly regulated.

■ L. E. Kastner, "The Epic Caesura in the Poetry of the Trouvères and Troubadours," MLQ 6 (1903); Schipper, History (1910); A. L. F. Snell, Pause (1918); A. Oras, Pause Patterns in Elizabethan and Jacobean Drama (1960); J. Malof, A Manual of English Meters (1970); Allen; J. P. Poe, Caesurae in the Hexameter Line of Latin Elegiac Verse (1974); R. Tsur, A Perception-Oriented Theory of Metre (1977); G. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); A Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, ed. J. A. Cuddon (1998); S. Fry, The Ode Less Travelled (2006); A New Handbook of Literary Terms, ed. D. Mikics (2007).

T.V.F. Brogan; H. Hart

CALENDRICAL POETRY. Of poems in the Western trad. that play with calendrical schemes, the first is Hesiod's Works and Days (ca. 700 BCE), whose final 64 verses offer an almanac of propitious or unlucky days of any month (but not all days) for various human activities. The miscellaneous topics include agriculture, other practical operations (e.g., shipbuilding), and major life events (birth and marriage). Cl. Lat. didactic poems adapt the Hesiodic movement: Virgil thus briefly advises farmers at Georgics 1.276–86, while Ovid in Art of Love 1.399–418 parodically itemizes for the wooing lover days of the year when gifts are customary and so when visits to the stereotypically acquisitive girl are to be avoided. The Hellenistic Greek Simias of Rhodes (3rd c. BCE) wrote Months (now lost), a poem presumably devoted wholly to the calendar. Ovid continued this devel. at Rome with the Fasti, which traces the religious year of the Roman state day by day, with one book devoted to each month; only the first six books survive. The Fasti responds to—some would say contests—the emperor Augustus' remaking of the Roman calendar in his own image through the addition of various imperial feast days alongside the traditional festivals. Ovid, moreover, plays civic time off against "natural" temporal schemes by interweaving zodiacal notices and dated weather signs.

In the Middle Ages, the Christian calendar of major liturgical feasts and saints' days occasionally found expression in verse, in both Lat. and the vernacular. The form became popular among humanist poets in Ren. Italy (L. Lazzarelli [c. 1485], L. Bonincontri [1491], B. Mantuan [1516], A. Fracco [1547]), whence it spread to the Protestant north (N. Chytraeus, 1568) and later to France (H. Vaillant, 1674). For all these, Ovid's Fasti served as both chief model and polemical pagan foil. In The Shepheardes Calender (1579), Edmund Spenser contributes a new form to the pastoral genre by presenting a book of 12 *eclogues as meditations on the individual months. The most conspicuous menological motifs mirror the rustic characters' moods—January's wintry barrenness, a rejected lover's plight; April's showers, the tears for a sad friend. The suggestive Spenserian structure is applied more rigorously by later poets who actually encapsulate the months in ordered sequence: John Clare appropriates Spenser's title for a descriptive survey of village life from January through December (The Shepherd's Calendar, 1827), while H. W. Longfellow narrows the focus to a quick progression of summary utterances by the personified months in The Poet's Calendar (1882).

In the 20th c., there emerges the genre of verse jours., apparently originated by W. C. Williams in "The Descent of Winter" (1928; actually a mixture of prose and verse). Poetic reflections are arranged according to date, with varying degrees of continuity and calendrical completeness. In personalizing the calendar, the poet either pointedly eschews a day's meaning in public spheres (civic, religious, historical), like William Corbett in Columbus Square Journal (1976), or anchors private meditations in larger communal contexts, like Anne Sexton in Eighteen Days without You (1969) and Charles Wright in A Journal of English Days (1986). Angus MacLise's Year (1962), at once minimalist and the fullest poetic calendar, uniquely presents an entire year with a cascade of 366 dated phrases that idiosyncratically characterize the individual days.

■ C. E. Newlands, Playing with Time (1995); J. F. Miller, "Ovid's Fasti and the Neo-Latin Christian Calendar Poem," IJCT 10 (2003); S. Cushman, " 'The Descent of Winter' and the Poetry of the Calendar," Rigor of Beauty, ed. I. D. Copestake (2004).

J. F. Miller

CALLIGRAMME. The calligramme derives its name from Guillaume Apollinaire's Calligrammes (1918) and represents one type of visual poetry. Its antecedents include Gr. technopaegnia, Lat. carmina figurata*, med. pattern poetry, Ren. *emblems, and Stéphane Mallarmé's Un coup de dés (1897). It thus occupies an intermediary position between older types of visual poetry and more recent forms such as *concrete poetry, hypergraphic poetry, *electronic poetry, and holopoetry. In the context of the early 20th c., the calligramme reflects the influence of cubist painting (see CUBISM), It. *futurism, and the Chinese *ideogram (the first examples were called idéogrammes lyriques). Introduced by Apollinaire in 1914, the genre inaugurated a period of radical experimentation by fusing art and poetry to create a complex interdisciplinary genre or intermedium.

Like other forms that dissolve the traditional barriers between visual and verbal, the calligramme mediates between the two fundamental modes of human perception, sight and sound. Whereas the futurists preferred abstract visual poetry, Apollinaire's compositions are largely figurative, portraying objects such as hearts, fountains, mandolins, and the Eiffel Tower, as well as animals, plants, and people. Still, a significant number are abstract, making generalization difficult, though on the whole the abstract calligrammes are later works. Of the 133 works arranged in realistic shapes, the visual image duplicates a verbal image in about half the cases. Some of the poems are autonomous, but most are grouped together to form still lives, landscapes, and portraits, an important innovation in the visual poetry trad. that complicates the interplay of visual and verbal signs. As Apollinaire remarks, "[T]he relations between the juxtaposed figures in one of my poems are just as expressive as the words that compose it." Although some of the calligrammes are solid compositions, most feature an outlined form that emphasizes the genre's connection with drawing. Unlike most of his predecessors, however, Apollinaire adapts visual poetry to lyric themes. Some of the calligrammes are in verse, but many others are in prose. One group, composed in 1917, continues Apollinaire's earlier experiments with poésie critique and functions as art crit. Although its critical reception has been mixed, the calligramme was widely imitated in France, Italy, Spain, Mexico, the U.S., and elsewhere.

See LETTRISME, TYPOGRAPHY.

■ G. Apollinaire, Calligrammes, ed. and trans. A. H. Greet and S. I. Lockerbie (1980); D. Seaman, Concrete Poetry in France (1981); W. Bohn, The Aesthetics of Visual Poetry, 1914–1928 (1986), and Apollinaire, Visual Poetry, and Art Criticism (1993); J. Drucker, The Visible Word (1994); M. Webster, Reading Visual Poetry after Futurism (1995); W. Bohn, Modern Visual Poetry (2001) and Reading Visual Poetry (2010).

W. BOHN

CAMBODIA, POETRY OF. At the beginning of the Common Era, Sanskrit, the sacred lang. of India, spread along the trade routes across most of southern Asia from Afghanistan to Java. This political literary culture, referred to by Pollock as the "Sanskrit cosmopolis," shaped the aesthetics of "Cambodian" or Khmer poetry from the time of Funan, an ancient Indianized kingdom located around the Mekong Delta during the 1st c. CE.

The Khmer lang., an eastern branch of the Mon-Khmer family, which is part of the larger Austro-Asiatic lang. group, is basically monosyllabic, although words may be lengthened to an iambic disyllable by the addition of prefixes or consonants. Old Khmer (7th–12th cs.) was heavily influenced by Sanskrit throughout the Angkor period (9th–13th cs.) and by Pali, the lang. of Theravada Buddhism, from the 13th c. onward. Examples of early lit. are largely found in Sanskrit inscriptions written in verse praising the great deeds of gods and kings. The poetry of six anonymous authors can be identified as written in Sanskrit during the Angkor period.

Jacob (1996) has identified 12 different forms of meter in Cambodian poetry, with certain meters used for specific purposes. "High" vocabulary—i.e., Sanskrit or Pali borrowings—often are combined with a Khmer word as a type of reduplication in Khmer poetics. The linking of one stanza to the next through rhyme is also a feature of this poetry. Since Khmer is replete with alliterative, chiming, and rhyming words, the best poems are melodious, indicating pleasure in *assonance and *alliteration. Such poetry sometimes is recited to the accompaniment of a stringed instrument, reflecting the importance of its musicality. Because of this aesthetic, Jacob (1996) argues that the best representation of Khmer poetry is to be found in *songs. Themes of songs and poems often touch on emotion, such as lost love or separation. Besides songs, *riddles, proverbs, and didactic lit., early Khmer fictions also were written in verse. After attacks by the Siamese, the Angkor period in Cambodia came to a close around 1430. By then, many Khmer writers and books had been relocated to Siam (now Thailand). For the next five centuries, Cambodia suffered predatory attacks on its borders, along with ebbing fortunes. As in Western Europe, where Lat. lit. was largely displaced by vernacular langs. after the fall of the Roman Empire, so too would Sanskrit be displaced by the Khmer lang. during the subsequent Middle Period.

As Cambodia's fortunes declined, its lang. changed. Middle Khmer shows borrowings from Thai, Lao, and, to a lesser extent, Vietnamese. Verse, which was used for all literary texts, was written in Khmer. Because of Cambodia's troubles following the fall of Angkor, no lit. survives that can be precisely dated to the 15th or 16th cs. The earliest written extant lit. consists of the Rāmakerti I (Cambodian Rāmayāna), and Cpāp' (Codes of Conduct; 15th–16th cs.). The earliest stratum of these texts is written in Pad kākagati (crow's gait meter). There is a religious element to most of the verse lit. of the Middle Period. The Rāmaketi (Reamker), Cambodia's version of the Rāmayāṇa, was originally a Hindu text. The Cambodian version, filled with allusions to Hindu gods and geography, was influenced by Buddhism, with its hero Ram represented as Buddha. The Cpāp', Buddhist moral poems that teach standards of conduct, also humorously portray details of ordinary lives. Some verses from Cpāp' are popularized as proverbs.

Other genres of Middle Period lit. include the Sātrā lpaeṇ, verse novels that tell stories of the bodhisattvas, or previous lives of the Buddha, usually portrayed as a prince, and the jātak, birth stories of the Buddha in verse, esp. the "ten jātak" (depicting the last ten lives of the Buddha before he entered Nirvana) and the extracanonical "50 jātak." Although originally written in Pali, versions of the 50 jatak are known only in Burma, Laos, Thailand, and Cambodia. Another Buddhist religious text of great importance is the Trai Bhūm (The Three Worlds), whose source is a Siamese ms. written during the reign of the king of Sukhoday.

Historically, the next genre to develop during the Middle Period is the *lyric (kaṃṇāby). These are mss. of 18th–19th c. court poets, whose poems express feelings of love and separation. After the fall of Angkor, the Siamese used Cambodian lit. for their own cultural purposes. After many centuries during which changes were made to the texts, the Cambodians gradually recovered much of their lit. in the 19th c. They would also adapt Thai verse forms to Cambodian-lang. poetry, such as the Thai klong (seven-syllable meter).

In 1863, Cambodia, along with Vietnam and Laos, became a protectorate of France. The Fr. established public schools in the new capital city of Phnom Penh, where young men were taught solely in Fr. and introduced to Fr. lit. This influence fostered Cambodian novels in prose but did not lead to the devel. of a new mod. poetry. By 1954, when King Sihanouk gained Cambodia's independence from France, Khmer writers were publishing new prose and poetry in literary magazines popular in the larger cities. In 1958, the government stipulated that the verse novel Tum Teav, whose authorship is contested, be included as a central text in the Khmer lit. curriculum for secondary schools. Oral versions of this tragic love story are traced to the 19th c., but it might be as old as the Middle Period. Sihanouk, who had abdicated his position as king to become head of state, was overthrown in a 1970 coup as the country gradually devolved into civil war. Poets of the early 1970s, such as Koy Sarun, dealt with the harsh realities of power. On April 17, 1975, the Khmer Rouge took control of Cambodia, emptying its capital city of inhabitants and forcing "new people" from the cities to work in gulag labor camps in remote areas of the countryside. During this period, the majority of Cambodian poets were killed or died from disease, starvation, or exhaustion. Writing was forbidden among the masses under the Khmer Rouge, but poetry reemerged after 1979, when the Vietnamese established a government in Cambodia and drove the Khmer Rouge toward the Thai border. This poetry, in traditional meter, replete with sorrow and loss, would be written by Cambodians in exile, either in refugee camps along the Thai border or in distant lands of the Cambodian diaspora. Poet U Sam Oeur, who moved to the United States, typically uses traditional meter in his poems but sometimes writes in *free verse. Many of his poems describe his experience under the Khmer Rouge:

> There are no more intellectuals, no more > professors—
> all have departed Phnom Penh, leading children, > bereft, deceived to the last person,
> from coolie to king.
>
> ("The Fall of Culture")

Since May 1993, when elections were held in Cambodia under the supervision of the United Nations, Cambodian lit. entered an age of somewhat freer expression. Although poetry was still written in traditional verse, the use of Pali and Sanskrit to embellish it faded among the younger writers. New poetry often contains mod. themes about the environment or social conditions. Contemp. poets reflect on power and the powerless, along with the transitory quality of the natural world. Yin Luoth's poem "Crippled Soldiers" describes a common scene in Phnom Penh:

> Crippled soldiers > walking through the market > missing arm or leg > hands in supplication > everyday beg > even without fingers > to take the money.

The continuing influence of Buddhism in Cambodian culture, esp. its social concern for the unfortunate and injunction against greed, is also reflected in the poems of Ven. Chin Meas, whose understated symbolism gives his poetry particular poignancy. His poem "Inherited House" traces the happiness of a rural family until the death of the parents unleashes the thoughtless greed of their selfish children:

> They divided up the inherited house > that had once given them peace > they can never > live together again.

Currently in Cambodia, there are very few venues for poets to present their work to the public. Poets typically subsidize the publication of 100 to 200 copies of their chapbooks, which they often give away or try to sell through the book stalls in the various markets in the cities. Phnom Penh, with the largest community of poets in the country, has the Java Café and Monument Books, which support poetry evenings. The government sponsors national literary prizes that are awarded through the National Library in Phnom Penh. The Khmer Writers Association has also sponsored poetry prizes and the publication of chapbooks. Since 1993, the Nou Hach Literary Association has held a yearly conference where prizes for poetry are awarded and then published in its annual jour, The Nou Hach Literary Journal, which is distributed for sale in markets. Although poetry books are not a common purchase in Cambodia, the art of poetic expression is still greatly admired by the older generation. There is a resistance to experiment with *free verse, since the melodiousness of poetry—its rhyme, assonance, and alliteration—is what defines it as a genre for Cambodians. Nevertheless, younger poets are branching out to include socially critical themes in their poems and slowly experimenting with freer forms of versification.

■ J. Jacob, "Versification in Cambodian Poetry," Cambodia's Lament: A Selection of Cambodian Poetry, ed. and trans. G. Chigas (1991); A. Thompson, "Oh Cambodia! Poems from the Border," New Literary History 24 (1993); J. Jacob, The Traditional Literature of Cambodia: A Preliminary Guide (1996); Tum Teav: A Translation and Analysis of a Cambodian Literary Clas- sic, ed. and trans. G. Chigas (2005); C. Meas, "The Inherited House," Nou Hach Literary Journal 4 (2007); S. Pollock, The Language of the Gods in the World of Men: Sanskrit, Culture, and Power in Premodern India (2006).

T. S. Yamada

CANADA, POETRY OF

I. English
II. French

I. English. Prior to the 20th c., Canadian poetry was strung between poles of a colonialism that sought to maintain the aesthetic and social values of the mother country and a nativism that sought to face the particular challenges of a New World exuding both promise and threat. Thus, W. D. Lighthall can, in one of the early anthols. of Canadian poetry—his 1889 Songs of the Great Dominion—celebrate Canada as the "Eldest daughter of the Empire" and "the Empire's completest type," while at the same moment the first generation of truly nativist poets—the so-called Confederation poets—were exploring the Canadian landscape and psyche in a lyrical nature poetry that could only have been written in the new country.

Long before this, however, the promise of the new colony sounds in what is probably the first book of poetry written in North America—Robert Hayman's (1575–1629) Quodlibets Lately Come Over from New Britaniola, Old Newfound-Land (1628)—in which, as governor of the colony, he advertises Newfoundland as a near-paradise, "Exempt from taxings, ill newes, Lawings, feare." The threat of the New World is given expression in Oliver Goldsmith's (1794–1861) otherwise optimistic "The Rising Village" (1825), a response to his famous great-uncle and namesake's "The Deserted Village":

> When, looking round, the lonely settler sees
> His home amid a wilderness of trees:
> How sinks his heart in those deep solitudes,
> Where not a voice upon his ear intrudes.

Nevertheless, one should not be given the impression that Canadian poetry before the 20th c. lacked diversity. Amid narratives of colonization and lyric bursts on nature's fickle blasts, there are poems championing the cause of the laboring classes, as in the ballads of Scottish immigrants James Anderson (1842–1923) and Alexander McLachlan (1818–96), who sounds a republican note in "Young Canada or Jack's as Good as His Master" (1874). With Pauline Johnson (1861–1913), First Nations Canadians, typically subject to their portrayal by settler poets, had their voice heard for the first time—though Johnson (her mother was English, her father Mohawk) tended to perform the archetypal noble savage for the audiences of her popular performances. Her "performance of the hybrid inheritance of Canada and the British Empire," in Gerson's words (1994), can be seen in quintessential Johnson poems such as "The Song My Paddle Sings," with its simultaneous invocations of P. B. Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind" and a solitary native paddling across prairie waters.

As mentioned above, the first generation of poets seen to embody an emergent "Canadian" poetry were the Confederation poets, who, in the decades following the 1867 Confederation, came to be seen as answering D. H. Dewart's call, in Selections from Canadian Poets (1864), for a *national poetry as "an essential element in the formation of national character." Born in the 1860s and beginning to publish in the 1880s and early 1890s, William Wilfred Campbell (1860–1918), Charles G. D. Roberts (1860–1943), Bliss Carman (1861–1929), Archibald Lampman (1861–99), and Duncan Campbell Scott (1862–1947) were the dominant voices and driving forces in Canadian poetry for the next three or four decades. Later theories about the "Canadianness" of Canadian poetry, such as Margaret Atwood's notion of "survival" as the national theme, clearly required the bedrock of the Confederation poets' descriptive verse upon which to set their foundations. In this regard, Campbell's "The Winter Lakes" (1889) can stand as a characteristic example:

> Lands that loom like specters, whited regions of winter,
> Wastes of desolate woods, deserts of water and shore;
> A world of winter and death, within these regions who enter,
> Lost to summer and life, go to return no more.

With their focus on the particularities of the Canadian landscape and climate, the heavily visual lyrics of these poets could easily give the impression that the lyric mode best characterizes Canadian poetry before World War I. However, the reality is more likely that the long narrative poem and the verse drama, as written by poets such as Charles Sangster (1822–93), Charles Heavysege (1816–76), and Isabella Valancy Crawford (1850–87), were the dominant modes, if measured in terms of their ubiquity and popular success. This trad. continues into the 20th c. in the work of E. J. Pratt (1883–1964), a poet seen either as a throwback to 19th-c. narrative verse or as the "first" modernist (so credited for his realism and use of contemp. themes).

It has sometimes been remarked that Canadian poetry skipped *modernism altogether, moving directly from *romanticism to *postmodernism. Certainly, the "modernization" of Canadian poetry proceeded at a slow pace (if one is to take a poet like Pratt as a transitional figure); however, as early as 1914, Arthur Stringer (1874–1950) was writing in favor of the "formal emancipation" of *free verse, and John Murray Gibbon (1875–1952) commented that "[r]hyme is the natural refuge of the minor poet." W.W.E. Ross (1894–1966) was writing and publishing imagist, free-verse lyrics in the Dial and Poetry in the 1920s, as was Dorothy Livesay (1909–96), before turning to her politically charged poems during the socialist 1930s and 1940s and then to later "documentary" work.

Canadian modernism had its center in Montreal, where poets A.J.M. Smith (1902–80) and F. R. Scott (1899–1985) cofounded The McGill Fortnightly Review in 1925. "The modern revival began in the twenties," Smith later wrote, as "Canadian poets turned against rhetoric, sought a sharper, more objective imagery, and limited themselves as far as possible to the lang. of everyday and the rhythms of speech." Scott's poetry, though modernizing in terms of "a freer diction and more elastic forms," was, nevertheless, still drawn to what were already well-established "Canadian" tropes and themes. His "Laurentian Shield" is remarkable both for its retrieval of the imagery of the proverbial Canadian "wastes" (the poem can be profitably compared to, and contrasted with, Campbell's "Winter Lakes") and for his updating of such imagery, combining it with a compressed social hist. of an industrializing Canada:

> Hidden in wonder and snow, or sudden with summer,
> This land stares at the sun in a huge silence
> Endlessly repeating something we cannot hear.
> Inarticulate, arctic,
> Not written on by history, empty as paper,
> It leans away from the world with songs in its lakes
> Older than love, and lost in the miles.

The poem goes on to address the "deeper note sounding" from "the mines, / The scattered camps and the mills" as Canada's working classes enter the national dialogue (Scott was for many years associated with the country's first socialist party, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation). However, the long-established image of the "silent" and "inarticulate" land awaiting (Eur.) inscription unquestioningly recalls the colonial roots of Canadian poetry.

The Montreal circle around Smith and Scott grew in the 1940s to include poets such as A. M. Klein (1909–72) and P. K. Page (1916–2010), as the jours. Preview and then The Northern Review became the group's main vehicles. Klein, a Ukrainian Jewish immigrant, wrote modernist-inspired lyrics on Jewish culture and hist. Page, similarly influenced by modernists such as T. S. Eliot, pursued a philosophical and introspective imagism over many decades. As Louis Dudek (1918–2001) writes in The Making of Modern Poetry in Canada, "By the early 1940s the development of modernism in Canada had reached the point of 'cell divisions,' showing a conflict of generations within the modern movement." Dudek himself, as both poet and ed., played an important role in this "division," as another Montreal circle formed around him to include Irving Layton (1912–2006) and Raymond Souster (b. 1921), and, for a time in the 1950s, Leonard Cohen (b. 1934) and Phyllis Webb (b. 1927). Dudek and Layton joined John Sutherland (1919–56) in editing First Statement (later folded, along with Preview, into The Northern Review), and then, with Souster, Contact magazine and press, in the 1950s. If Layton was the flamboyant, outrageous, and sensual poète maudit* of the new grouping, Dudek was its theorist and propagandist. Dudek was influenced by the Am. modernism of Ezra Pound, as well as the editorial proselytizing of Cid Corman (and his jour. Origin). "Like American lit. in general," he writes in The Making of Modern Poetry in Canada, "Canadian poetry divides into two branches: one related through British writing to Eur. literary culture, formal and rooted in traditional sources of the imagination; the other, spontaneous and original in its sources, and relying on the direct report of local experience." Sutherland, in a similar vein, argues in Other Canadians that "the American example will become more and more attractive to Canadian writers; that we are approaching a period when we will have 'schools' and 'movements' whose origin will be American. And perhaps it is safe to say that such a period is the inevitable half-way house from which Canadian poetry will pass towards an identity of its own."

Two other poets who provide important bridges between modern and postmodern Canadian poetry need to be mentioned here. Earl Birney (1904–95), who was the first significant modernist poet to be born, live, and write in western Canada (Birney was born in Calgary and lived for many years in Vancouver, where he founded the first creative writing program in the country, at the University of British Columbia), and Al Purdy (1918–2000), who was instrumental in spreading the use of vernacular, conversational (as opposed to overtly "poetic") lang. and everyday themes, influenced a generation of Canadian poets. The work of poets from British Columbia's Patrick Lane (b. 1939) to the East Coast's Milton Acorn (1923–86) and Alden Nowlan (1933–83), from "prairie poets" such as Dennis Cooley (b. 1944) and Andrew Suknaski (b. 1942) to the perennial wanderer John Newlove (1938–2003), is difficult to imagine without the vernacular trad. in part opened by Purdy's work.

In a 1955 study titled "The Poet and the Publisher," Phyllis Webb found only "two or three" presses in the country that regularly published poetry, all located in Toronto. With the 1960s and 1970s, there was an extraordinary expansion of regional presses and little magazines—in part spurred by the founding of the Canada Council for the Arts in 1957—that decidedly decentralized Canadian poetry. "Regional," Atwood noted in 1982, "has changed in recent years from a bad to a good word, in Canada at any rate." Indeed, Canadian poetry since the 1960s has seemed less a national lit. than a cluster of communities divided along regional, aesthetic, class, ethnic, and gender lines. "Canada," as Davey (1994) writes, "is a network of competing canons rather than a single canon."

Postmodernism in many ways enters Canadian poetry through Vancouver: the *TISH poets—George Bowering (b. 1935), Fred Wah (b. 1939), and Daphne Marlatt (b. 1942) among them—and the 1963 Vancouver Poetry Conference, which brought leading lights from the New American poetry (Charles Olson, Robert Duncan, Robert Creeley) together to teach, read, and talk for three weeks of events. Canadian *avant-gardes—in Vancouver, at least—have ever since been deeply influenced by their dialogue with similarly focused Am. poetic movements (TISH and the New American poetry, and then from the 1980s, the *Kootenay School of Writing and *Language poetry)—seeming to fulfill Sutherland's prophetic words cited above. Bowering, Canada's first parliamentary *poet laureate, has, despite that honor, often stood more for a western Canadian sensibility and a transnational poetics that moves more north-south than east-west. Jeff Derksen (b. 1958), one of the founding members of the Kootenay School, has similarly often critiqued the centralizing formation of the nation, writing instead from a position of urban class consciousness that sees the local and global intersect in spaces formed more by late capitalism than by the nation as such.

Since the 1960s, there has been heavy traffic between Vancouver and Toronto avant-gardes, with poets such as bpNichol (1944–88) and bill bissett (b. 1939) moving between the cities. With Steve McCaffery (b. 1947) in Toronto, Nichol's experiments with the Toronto Research Group (TRG) and Four Horsemen led to many innovations in *concrete and *sound poetry. Such work—along with the site-specific projects of Christopher Dewdney (b. 1951)—have cast a long shadow on Toronto poetry, directly leading to the concrete and performance work of Christian Bök (b. 1966), the procedural and digital poetics of Darren Wershler (b. 1966), and—moving out from Toronto—the concrete poetry of derek beaulieu (b. 1973) and Donato Mancini (b. 1974) and sound poetry of a. rawlings (b. 1978) and Jordan Scott (b. 1978). Bök's 2001 Oulipian work Eunoia set the standard for, and reanimated work in, *constraint-based poetics, with its five "chapters" each limited to the use of only one vowel. Chapter "A" begins:

> Awkward grammar appals a craftsman. A dada
> bard
> as daft as Tzara damns stagnant art and scrawls an > alpha (a slapdash arc and a backward zag) that > mars
> all stanzas and jams all ballads (what a scandal).

One could argue that "narrative" reappears in such work, in the form of the quasi-epic conventions and set pieces that structure the prose-poetry of Eunoia.

Feminist poetry and poetics in Canada began to find its footing in the 1980s, with notable events such as the Women and Words conference (1983) and the founding of the jour. Tessera (in 1984). Lesbian issues and the question of trans. often appeared (as in the case of Marlatt and Fr.-Canadian poet Nicole Brossard [b. 1943] and in the work of Erin Mouré [b. 1955]); established poets such as Webb, Marlatt, and Margaret Atwood (b. 1939) began to interact with newly emerged poets such as Sharon Thesen (b. 1946), Bronwen Wallace (1945–89), and Mouré. This trad. continues in the work of contemp. poets such as Vancouver's Meredith Quartermain (b. 1950), Torontonians Margaret Christakos (b. 1962) and Rachel Zolf (b. 1968), and Manitoba-born Sina Queyras (b. 1963).

Poets writing through an awareness of race, immigrant experience, and the diasporas of globalization often intersect with regional and avant-garde poetries in Canada. George Elliott Clarke (b. 1960) from Canada's East Coast and Wayde Compton (b. 1972) from Canada's West have both explored the hist. of black people in Canada, and Caribbean-born Dionne Brand (b. 1953) writes a similar hist. through feminist and lesbian lenses. Asian Canadian poets have tended to forge links with avant-gardes, as is the case with Roy Kiyooka (1926–94), Wah, and Roy Miki (b. 1942), all born in the prairies and moving to Vancouver to participate in the TISH movement and its aftermath. Both Wah and Miki have, as critics and university professors, influenced the work and thought of the many younger writers drawn to their politicized example. One contemp. poet mining similar territory is Rita Wong (b. 1968), whose 2007 book Forage explores the ground upon which race, class, and environmental degradation intersect in a recklessly globalized world:

> the gap between the crying line & electric speech > is the urbanization of the mouth > round peasant dialect vowels relocate > off the fields into city streets > where sound gets clipped > like our ability to smell the wet earth.

First Nations poets, such as Marie Annharte Baker (b. 1942) and Gregory Scofield (b. 1966), update traditional themes to new urban environments. Both poets employ an urban-native vernacular and reappropriated stereotypes to question the hist. and policies of government "Indian Acts" and residential schools. The work of Jeannette Armstrong (b. 1948) and Marilyn Dumont (b. 1955) further questions notions of stable identity and literary form.

While the lyric poem, often confessional and anecdotal, has dominated Canadian poetry, Canada has also maintained a vibrant trad. around the long poem. The lyric in contemp. Canadian poetry, whether confessional or imagistic, has tended toward compressed narrative via the epiphanic *anecdote. The dominance of "story" can in part be seen by how frequently Canada's best-known poets have been just as highly regarded as novelists, as in the case of Atwood and Michael Ondaatje (b. 1943). Canadian poets have also often combined fragments into long *lyric sequences, with narrative present in the form of the documentary details of the life and times of the historical subject under investigation, as in Atwood's The Journals of Susanna Moodie (1970), Ondaatje's The Collected Works of Billy the Kid (1970), and Gwendolyn MacEwen's (1941–87) The T. E. Lawrence Poems (1982). Canadian lyric poems often combine astute observation of the external world and condensed expression of internal states with a broadly framed awareness of the social contexts the poet lives and writes through. Hist., it could be said, is the primary "story" haunting Canadian poetry, as in Atwood's "It Is Dangerous to Read Newspapers" (1968):

> While I was building neat > castles in the sandbox, > the hasty pits were > filling with bulldozed corpses and as I walked to the school washed and combed, my feet stepping on the cracks in the cement detonated red bombs.

It is difficult to underestimate the influence Atwood and Ondaatje have had on the course of Canadian poetry, despite (or because of) their evolution into novelists. Poets such as Don McKay (b. 1942), one of the country's premier ecological poets, and Jan Zwicky (b. 1955), who investigates the philosophical underpinnings of the lyric, continue to be major practitioners of the lyric poem, as Ken Babstock (b. 1970), Karen Solie (b. 1966), and Stephanie Bolster (b. 1969) do among the younger poets.

As narrative has come to dominate the Canadian lyrical anecdote, so the contemp. Canadian *long poem has moved away from narrative as such, toward serial and archival/documentary forms. Phyllis Webb's Naked Poems (1965), with its extended minimalism, leads the way to the contemp. long poem in Canada. Moving through a counterpointed sequence of "Suites," Naked Poems combines personal, social, and philosophical information into arrestingly compressed ling. spaces:

YOUR BLOUSE
I people this room with things, a chair, a lamp, a fly, two books by Marianne Moore.

I have thrown my blouse on the floor,

Was it only last night?

"Story" hovers here, but what the story is, the reader is never sure. Just as quickly as narrative appears, it disappears, sinking under a surface of sonic and visual detail:

a curve / broken of green moss weed kelp shells pebbles lost orange rind orange crab pale delicates at peace on this sand tracery of last night's tide

Another early influence on the contemp. long poem in Canada was Robin Blaser's (1925–2009) The Holy Forest, the serial components of which were beginning to appear in the 1960s. Blaser, Am.-born but living in Vancouver since 1966, theorized the serial poem in his 1975 afterward to The Collected Books of Jack Spicer. With Blaser's work, however, we move beyond the serial or long poem to the lifelong poem, a form so elastic it comes to contain all a poet's work, coming to a conclusion only with the poet's death. Blaser's Holy Forest, along with Robert Kroetsch's (b. 1927) Complete Field Notes and Nichol's The Martyrology (1967–88) are three highly influential examples of such extended long forms.

More recent practitioners of the long poem tend to trouble the boundary between poem (long or otherwise) and *"book," taking up the writing of a book of poetry as a research project. Anne Carson (b. 1950), Mouré, and Lisa Robertson (b. 1962) have produced some of the most innovative poetry in the country. Recalling the book-length historical projects of Atwood and Ondaatje—but minus the biographical subject and drawing on the broadly philosophical investigations and intertextuality of Blaser and Nichol's long works—these poets have rewritten classical myths (as in Carson's 1998 Autobiography of Red), engaged in "transelations" with Fernando Pessoa's *heteronyms (as in Mouré's 2002 Sheep's Vigil by a Fervent Person), and appropriated the discourse of 18th- and 19th-c. Eng. meteorologists (as in Robertson's 2001 The Weather). Both lyrical and formally expansive, philosophically and socially engaged, innovative and yet highly sensitive to cultural heritage on a transnational scale, the work of these poets has reached a wide international audience and is already influencing the next generation of Canadian poets.

II. French. In Fr. Canada, a genuine poetic trad. was not established until the 1830s. François-Xavier Garneau (1809–66), the first major Fr.-Canadian author, published a few poems in his youth but devoted most of his efforts to the monumental Histoire du Canada depuis sa découverte jusqu'à nos jours (A History of Canada from Its Discovery to the Present Time). Following Garneau, two poets, Octave Crémazie (1827–79) and Louis Fréchette (1839–1908), were known for their patriotic writing. Crémazie, whose poetry published in newspapers venerated nostalgia for France, was celebrated as a national bard, although his romantic "Promenade de trois morts" (The Promenade of the Three Dead) was met with incomprehension. Fréchette, an admirer of Crémazie and a liberal pamphleteer, honored Fr.-Canadian hist. with emphatic poems inspired by Victor Hugo. Less well known than Crémazie and Fréchette, the intimist poets Alfred Garneau (1836–1904) and Eudore Évanturel (1852–1919) are among the few 19th-c. Fr.-Canadian poets who preferred a personal register to a patriotic one.

Émile Nelligan (1879–1941) embodies the ideal of a poet dedicated to his art. Before he was permanently interned in a psychiatric hospital at the age of nineteen, he was involved in the École littéraire de Montréal (Montreal Literary School), where he was celebrated for the quality of his poetry but also criticized for his indifference toward a regionalism promoted by the religious authorities. In 1904, his poems were anthologized by Louis Dantin (1865–1945), one of the period's most accomplished critics and a poet in his own right. Some of Nelligan's poems are purely musical; others seem to foreshadow his fate. His works demonstrate a precocious assimilation of *Parnassianism, *symbolism, and the decadent style (see DECADENCE).

The opposition between the regionalists and those who were known as the "exotics" had a profound impact on the literary scene of the early 20th c. Celebrated by clerical critics, regionalists such as Blanche Lamontagne-Beauregard (1889–1958) sought to render the "Canadian essence." Reacting against this ideal, many poets united in 1918 under the banner of the magazine Le Nigog (a Native Am. word meaning "harpoon") to promote the idea of art for art's sake. Typical of the exotic poets, Marcel Dugas (1883–1947) and Paul Morin (1889–1963) lived for many years in Paris. While Dugas practiced prosaic forms of poetry, Morin was dedicated to fixed forms such as the *sonnet. Their inspiration was, first and foremost, contemp. Fr. poetry.

Certain early 20th-c. poets such as Albert Lozeau (1878–1924) found themselves behind entrenched literary positions. Notably, Lozeau's first volume of rhyming poems, L'âme solitaire (The Solitary Soul, 1907), can be seen as a continuation of the intimist poetics of the end of the 19th c. Jean-Aubert Loranger (1896–1942), who preferred sober free-verse poetry that expressed the subject's isolation, was influenced by his readings of Fr. poets as well as by his discovery of Asian forms such as the *haiku and the outa. As a journalist, he also published numerous tales such as "Le passeur" (The Ferryman), a parable of old age that was included in his initial collection of poems Les atmosphères (Atmospheres, 1920), but his poetry was not widely read until the reissue of his work in 1970. The most celebrated poet of the times, and the one who seems to surpass the age's contradictions by invoking Nelligan while addressing regionalist concerns, is Alfred DesRochers (1901–78). His collection À l'ombre de l'Orford (In the Shadow of Orford, 1929) includes "Hymne au vent du Nord" (A Hymn to the North Wind), a celebratory epic of the ancestors, as well as his realistic sonnets describing contemporaries: the peasants and the shantymen. Faithful to rhymed and metered verse, DesRochers remained estranged from the new lang. of free verse that became dominant during the 1930s, so much so that his work would be seen as the end of an epoch.

Hector de Saint-Denys Garneau (1912–43) experimented with an unreservedly free verse in Regards et jeux dans l'espace (Gazes and Games in Space, 1937), the only volume that he ever published. In a society he found to be a cultural "desert," Garneau found intellectual stimulation in the magazine La Relève in 1934 that pushed him to dedicate himself to writing and painting. His enthusiasm, however, would be short-lived. His jour., pub. in 1954, showed that, even though he continued to write poetry and to paint, his profound angst caused him to renounce publishing. After breaking off his formerly abundant correspondence with friends, Garneau was found dead near his family's manor, where he had decided to withdraw. Garneau's poems, jour., and correspondence constitute the most prominent work of a Fr.-Canadian poet since Nelligan; for both, the myth of the poet-martyr would be indissociable from their work. In retrospect, Garneau's despair seems more assumed than endured, as he describes in a famous text from his jour. titled "Le mauvais pauvre va parmi vous avec son regard en dessous" (The bad pauper going among you with his downcast gaze). A few years Garneau's senior, Alain Grandbois (1900–75) established himself in 1944 with Les îles de la nuit (The Islands of the Night). While these two poets are often compared, the reclusiveness of Garneau contrasts with the cosmopolitanism of Grandbois, whose travels took him as far as China. Grandbois' poetry is more eloquent than Garneau's and his style, as much as that of Fr. poets of his generation like René Char and Paul Éluard, influenced younger poets. Anne Hébert (1916–2000), Garneau's cousin, published in 1953 Le tombeau des rois (The Kings' Tomb), where she explored interior impediments. This book was later published to form a diptych with her next collection of poetry, Mystère de la parole (Word's Mystery, 1960), which celebrated a woman's flowering consciousness witnessing the world's regeneration. The same solemn register was also present in the work of Rina Lasnier (1910–97), whose work often evoked the Christian faith, as seen in the biblically inspired Le chant de la montée (The Rising's Song, 1947).

During the 1930s and 1940s, a social life shattered by the economic crash dominated the work of several poets, such as Clément Marchand (b. 1912) in Les soirs rouges (Red Evenings, 1947). *Surrealism also influenced several poetic works of the postwar era, as exemplified by Claude Gauvreau (1925–71), a signer of the Refus global (1948) manifesto. A poet and dramaturge, Gauvreau, along with the painter Paul-Émile Borduas, was a member and principal defender of the "automatist" group, which aimed to replace what it saw as the passivity of Fr. surrealist writing with a state of revolt. For Gauvreau, automatic writing involved accepting an unknown lang. "explorén," something he also integrated into his plays. Several years after his suicide, the publication of his Œuvres créatices complètes (Complete Creative Works, 1977) revealed an abundant, sustained level of production, in spite of a marginality accentuated by his mental illness. Also invoking surrealism, Roland Giguère (1929–2003) followed Gauvreau's example, albeit in a more serene fashion. His retrospective collection L'âge de la parole (The Word's Age, 1965) reconstituted the author's artistic journey while proclaiming the emancipation of the exploited, as typified in "La main du bourreau finit toujours par pourrir" (The Oppressor's Hand Will Eventually Rot). Giguère's poetry is full of imagery yet always straightforward, embracing both tenderness and violence, and also stresses the idea that, while it is important to map the dreamed world, it is also necessary to reveal "le pouvoir du noir" (the power of darkness).

In the 1960s, Fr.-Canadian nationalism transformed into Quebec nationalism. One of the objectives of this new nationalism was to create a distinctive Quebec lit. This project was nurtured by the publisher Éditions de l'Hexagone, founded in 1953 by a group of young Montreal poets. Resolved to make poetry more socially current, this group organized gatherings and counted on a system of subscriptions to involve potential readers in a genuine communal movement. Although many poets of this generation were devoted to Quebec's political independence, most of them insisted on the *autonomy of poetry. Their writing was often labeled la poésie du pays (the poetry of the land), which was, above all, a quest for identity, as in Michel van Schendel's (1929–2005) Poèmes de l'Amérique étrangère (Poems from a Foreign America, 1958). More often than not, la poésie du pays celebrated the physical attributes of the land as the pathway to a mythical regeneration, as in Gatien Lapointe's (1931–83) Ode au Saint-Laurent (An Ode to the Saint-Laurent, 1963). Moreover, the theme of the land became associated with the devel. of a common lang., one capable of redefining social issues.

At the center of the Hexagone movement was Gaston Miron (1928–96), who defined himself more as its organizer than its poet. Initially, Miron published a collaborative anthol., Deux sangs (Two Bloods, 1953), Éditions de l'Hexagone's very first publication. Following this, he published poems in both newspapers and magazines, continually insisting on their provisional character. Miron would redraft his collection L'homme rapaillé (Mustered Man, 1970) many times, claiming that each version was fragmentary and incomplete. In each, early poems and political essays frame the poem's cycles in which love, the nation, and commitment are fundamental themes. A call to transform the world is coupled with the testimony of a man who ceaselessly collapses and rises in his "Marche à l'amour" (Walk to Love).

After republishing such poets as Grandbois and Giguère, Éditions de l'Hexagone allowed many young poets to write within an editorial continuity unknown by their elders. This allowed Paul-Marie Lapointe (b. 1929) to republish an anthol. of his youth Le vierge incendié (The Burned Virgin), gone unnoticed when it first appeared in 1948 that became, when taken up again in Le réel absolu (The Absolute Real, 1971), the first steps of a literary production that never stopped exploring new directions. After the surrealist revelry of his first anthol., Lapointe coupled love with politics in long improvisations, inspired by jazz. The rest of his work was notably comprised of descriptive poems and formalist experimentations, all constituting an illustration of freedom as a "fundamental demand."

Of the same generation as Lapointe, Fernand Ouellette (b. 1930) also elaborated a varied and important body of work. Poet, essayist, and novelist, Ouellette invoked Eur. affinities (Novalis, Pierre-Jean Jouve), linking experience and transcendence by exploring sexuality (Dans le sombre [In the Darkness], 1967) and, in what is often cited as his best work, his father's death throes (Les heures [The Hours], 1987). Younger than Lapointe and Ouellette, Jacques Brault (b. 1933) also falls clearly within the framework of the poésie du pays movement in his first book, Mémoire (Memory, 1965), although he moved away from collective perspectives and expansive writing in his later work. In L'en dessous l'admirable (The Underside the Admirable, 1975) and Moments fragiles (Fragile Moments, 1984), the present moment constitutes the only accessible temporality; identity appears increasingly illusory but paradoxically reveals an essential, intimate life.

Paul Chamberland (b. 1939), who is associated with the socialist, separatist magazine Parti Pris, published in 1964 Terre Québec (Quebec Land), a seminal anthol. of nationalist poetry. Less embarrassed than his elders by a politicized lit., Chamberland put poetry on trial in the name of the "revolution" to be incited. A few years later, after being seduced by Am. counterculture, he invoked a new concept for the revolution. Denis Vanier (1949–2000) proved to be one of the most radical and unswerving poets of the counterculture movement at the end of the 1960s. For certain poets, countercultural references go together with nationalist demands in a quest for fraternity. Such is the case of the prolific Gilbert Langevin (1938–95), who combined the ludic and the tragic in a poetics bordering the spoken word.

Along with counterculture references, two trends influenced the poetics of the young generation of the 1970s: *formalism and feminism. These two orientations came together in the work of Brossard, a leader of an avant-garde that was coming to light, most notably in the magazine La Barre du jour. With Suite logique (Logical Follow Through, 1970), Brossard opposed textual "mechanics" to literary idealism. Following this, she integrated an explicitly lesbian subject and related fiction and theory in her writing. Another avant-garde magazine founded in 1968, Les Herbes rouges (Red Grass), published poets such as Normand de Bellefeuille (b. 1949), Roger Des Roches (b. 1950), and François Charron (b. 1952), all of whom were initially associated with a militant formalism but who gradually diverged from the avant-garde's rhetoric. In the mid-1970s, feminism defined itself in avant-garde terms, and along with the works of Brossard, those of Madeleine Gagnon (b. 1938) and France Théoret (b. 1942) particularly influenced poetry that incorporated a critical and activist perspective.

During the 1980s, esp. with the publication of Kaléidoscope ou Les aléas du corps grave (Kaleidoscope or the Unforeseen Solemn Body, 1984), Michel Beaulieu (1941–85) epitomized the expansion of an intimist vein on the margins of a waning avant-garde. Beaulieu, who had experimented with several forms since his debut in the 1960s, achieved an intimist style that subtly plays with ambiguities created by *enjambments. Marie Uguay (1955–81) was also attached to the inner life. Several younger poets inflected feminism with intimism, as in the work of Denise Desautels (b. 1945), or associated intimism with a spiritual quest, as in Hélène Dorion's (b. 1958) work.

With the 1980s, the pluralism of Quebec poetry continued to grow. Publishing houses such as Le Noroît and Les Écrits des Forges published a variety of work, in the trad. of L'Hexagone. The idea of a collective identity was fading, with the exception of emerging "migrant writings." Initially brought forward by Haitian Montrealers such as Anthony Phelps (b. 1928) and Serge Legagneur (b. 1937) and followed by Montrealers of It. extraction, such as Fulvio Caccia (b. 1952) and Antonio D'Alfonso (b. 1953), this movement not only extended the notion of identity in nationalist poetry but questioned the 1960s definition of the Quebec nation by exposing the cultural diversity of contemp. Quebec society. Often, this was done in a polemical fashion. Marco Micone's (b. 1945) *pastiche "Speak What" (1989), e.g., displaced the perspectives of Michèle Lalonde's (b. 1937) 1960s poem "Speak White," a portrayal of Quebec based on the domination of Francophones by Anglophones. Since the 1970s, poetry has also been linked to the collective question of identity of Canadian Francophones living outside Quebec, notably the Acadians and the Franco-Ontarians (see FRANCOPHONE POETS OF THE U.S.). The poetry of the Acadian Serge-Patrice Thibodeau (b. 1959) is centered on wanderings, while that of the Franco-Ontarian Patrice Desbiens (b. 1948) focuses on the daily alienation of the minority condition. Furthermore, at the beginning of the 21st c., a specifically aboriginal lit. emerged, written in Fr. by such poets as Jean Sioui (b. 1948).

Although the presence of the countryside has played a role in Fr.-Canadian poetry since the 19th c., meditation on physical place has always been marginal when compared to considerations of historical destiny. By the end of the 1970s, in part inspired by Europeans such as Yves Bonnefoy and Philippe Jaccottet, many poets concentrated on place as the focus of their work. Gilles Cyr (b. 1945) with Sol inapparent (Inapparent Soil, 1978), Robert Melançon (b. 1947) with Peinture aveugle (Blind Painting, 1979), and Pierre Morency (b. 1942) with his series Histoires naturelles du Nouveau Monde (Natural Histories of the New World, 1989–96) emerge as the precursors of this movement. An increasing interest in the trans. of poetry, esp. from Eng., also has encouraged diversity.

See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; INUIT POETRY.

■ Anthologies: The Book of Canadian Poetry, ed. A.J.M. Smith (1943); J. Sutherland, Other Canadians (1947); The New Oxford Book of Canadian Verse in English, ed. M. Atwood (1982); The New Canadian Poets, ed. D. Lee (1985); The New Long Poem Anthology, ed. S. Thesen (1991); Canadian Poetry: From the Beginnings through the First World War, ed. C. Gerson and G. Davies (1994); La poésie québécoise contemporaine, ed. J. Royer (1995); La poésie québécoise avant Nelligan, ed. Y. Grisé (1998); 15 Canadian Poets X 3, ed. G. Geddes (2001); Anthologie de la littérature québécoise, ed. G. Marcotte (2004); Open Field: 30 Contemporary Canadian Poets, ed. S. Queyras (2005); La poésie québécoise des origines à nos jours, ed. L. Mailhot and P. Nepveu (2007).

■ Criticism and History: G. Marcotte, Une littérature qui se fait (1962); L. Dudek and M. Gnarowski, The Making of Modern Poetry in Canada (1967); G. Marcotte, Le temps des poètes (1969); M. Atwood, Survival (1972); F. Davey, From Here to There (1974); P. Nepveu, L'écologie du réel (1988)—poetry of Quebec; C. Bayard, The New Poetics in Canada and Quebec (1989); R. Kroetsch, The Lovely Treachery of Words (1989); S. Kamboureli, On the Edge of Genre: The Contemporary Canadian Long Poem (1991); G. Woodcock, George Woodcock's Introduction to Canadian Poetry (1993); A. Brochu, Tableau du poème (1994)—poetry of Quebec; F. Davey, Canadian Literary Power (1994); C. Filteau, Poétiques de la modernité: 1895–1948 (1994); L. Mailhot, La littérature québécoise (1997); P. Nepveu, Intérieurs du Nouveau Monde (1998); F. Dumont, La poésie québécoise (1999); J. Blais, Parmi les hasards (2001)—poetry of Quebec; P. Butling and S. Rudy, Writing in Our Time: Canada's Radical Poetries in English, 1957–2003 (2005); M. Biron, F. Dumont, E. Nardout-Lafarge, Histoire de la littérature québécoise (2007).

S. COLLIS (ENG.); F. DUMONT (FR.)

CANCIÓN. The term is now loosely applied to any Sp. isostrophic poem in Italianate lines (eleven and seven syllables) and in which the poet invents a first *strophe and then models all subsequent strophes on it exactly, in *responsion. Canciones of a few lines are often called liras*, canciones aliradas, canciones clásicas, and odas. Many variations have been developed since the Italianate canción (see CANZONE) was introduced by Juan Boscán and Garcilaso de la Vega in the 16th c. The canción petrarquista (also called canción a la italiana, canción extensa, and estancias) is generally considered the purest form of the Italianate type.

In the 15th and early 16th c., before the use of the Italianate form, an entirely different type of canción—an octosyllabic form of cantiga* (see DECIR)—was widely employed. Although some variety in pattern was allowed in the early period, by the end of the 15th c. the form was usually restricted to either a quatrain (abab or abba) followed by a copla de arte menor (eight lines only) whose last four rhymes are identical with those of the initial quatrain, though the order of the rhymes may be changed; or a quintilla* (two rhymes only, no set order) followed by a copla real or a copla de arte menor of nine or ten lines, whose last five rhymes are identical with and follow the same sequence as those of the initial quintilla. Variation in the first type, then, may occur only in the order of rhymes and in the second type only in the length of the second strophe. Vendrell de Millás lists other variations. This canción may be distinguished from the closely related villancico*, according to Le Gentil, by its longer refrain (four or five lines having redondilla, serventesio, or quintilla rhyme); its vuelta, which parallels exactly the initial theme; its shorter length, which rarely exceeds one stanza; and its courtly nature and love theme.

■ El Cancionero de Palacio, ed. F. Vendrell de Millás (1945); Le Gentil.

D. C. CLARKE

CANCIONERO/CANCIONEIRO

I. Introduction
II. Poetry and Poets
III. Manuscripts

I. Introduction. The first manifestation of Iberian court poetry of the late Middle Ages is preserved in

ms. anthols. that began to be compiled in Galicia and present-day Portugal as early as 1189. Amorous and satirical lyrics composed by Port. and Galician poets from roughly the end of the 12th to the middle of the 14th c., known as cantigas—cantigas d'amor*, cantigas de escarnho e maldizer, and cantigas d'amigo—were collected in these anthols., referred to in Galician-Port. as cancioneiros (*songbooks). Although the cantigas de escarnho e maldizer and the cantigas d'amor have clear Occitan antecedents in the sirventes* and the tenso,* the cantigas d'amigo of the cancioneiros point to an older trad. of autochthonous oral poetry with roots in rural society, nature, and animism.

Later collections of lyric poetry, known as cancioneros, appeared in Castilian with different types of compositions, marking the change from the Galician-Port. lang. to Castilian as the favored idiom of courtly verse in the western Iberian peninsula. The first Castilian compilation, the Cancionero de Baena (ca. 1430), was the work of Juan Alfonso de Baena, secretary to King Juan II of Castile and Leon. With the introduction of the printing press, beginning in the 1480s, the first printed cancioneros began to circulate, culminating in the mammoth, epoch-making Cancionero general of 1511. Hernando del Castillo, a book dealer from Segovia who compiled and published the Cancionero general in Valencia, spent the years 1489–1509 gathering and selecting the poetry he would include in it, representing all the styles and motifs of the Castilian verse of the second half of the 15th c. The work records some 1,056 poems by 239 known poets, as well as numerous anonymous compositions. Nearly all the verse in the Cancionero general belongs to the period encompassing the reign of the Catholic Monarchs (1474 until two years before the Cancionero's publication), with the exception of a few earlier compositions that date back to the court of Juan II (1406–54) and Enrique IV of Castile and Leon (1454–74). The Cancionero general was republished eight times and became the best and most widely read compilation of poetry in Spain during the 16th c. Clear echoes from its verses may be found among the Sp. poets of the Golden Age—who, according to conventional lit. hist., rejected the older forms of poetry in favor of the new, Italianate styles of composition introduced to the Iberian Peninsula in the 1530s by Juan Boscán and Garcilaso de la Vega.

Three major Galician-Port. cancioneiros came to light in the 19th c. They are the Cancioneiro da Biblioteca Nacional (often referred to as Colocci-Brancuti, a name that recalls two of its past owners), the Cancioneiro da Vaticana, and the Cancioneiro da Ajuda. The latter records the earliest known cancioneiro verse, a cantiga d'amigo by Pai Soares de Taverió datable to 1189.

Some 60 cancioneros—literally "collections of canciones"—in Castilian survive. They give preference to the canción*, a short lyrical verse with an initial refrain (estribillo*) that is subsequently glossed in the body of the composition. Although the term cancioneiro/cancionero derives from OF cançoner (precursor of mod. Fr. chansonnier), none of the early Iberian mss. of cancioneiros/cancioneros contains musical notation. Contrary to the Fr. and It. trads., where chansonniers and canzonieri* often appeared with musical notations and exist in multiple copies, in the Iberian peninsula, one generally finds only unmusically annotated, single witnesses of a given anthol. that usually belonged to a royal, monastic, or noble library.

The proliferation of Iberian cancioneros in the 15th c. is generally taken to mark the sudden ascendancy of Castilian court lyric after two centuries of Galician-Port. dominance. However, rather than view the blossoming of Castilian poetry in hegemonic terms, we should probably think of the survival of so much verse as an index of change in courtly values, accompanied by an increase in literacy and the material conditions that favored textual production and preservation. Lyric poetry enjoyed a fashionable revival in 15th-c. Castile and played a significant role in the social and intellectual life of the courts and in the cultural practices of the aristocracy.

II. Poetry and Poets. The terms poesía de cancionero and poesía cancioneril are generally used to refer to the courtly verse preserved in the cancioneros produced in Iberia during the 150-year period from the end of the 14th to the beginning of the 16th c. Several thousand poems survive, composed by over 500 poets whose names have come down to us. Nearly all this verse was written in Castilian, even by poets like the Catalan Pere Torrellas and the Port. Juan Manuel and in transnational settings like the Aragonese court of Naples. Catalan poetry was collected separately; no late med. ms. anthols. of Port. verse survive.

Cancionero poetry embraces numerous types of lyrical verse (love allegories, dream visions, serranillas), as well as the short lyric canción and the longer dezir or copla.* Although 15th-c. cancionero poetry is considered primarily a form of love lyric, its heterogeneity cannot be overstated. Its repertory includes a large variety of themes and subjects, such as poetic debates (preguntas y respuestas—see PREGUNTA), disquisitions on moral or doctrinal issues, personal *invective, political *satire, and misogynist diatribe. The categories of religious verse alone range from solemn Marian hymns to long meditations on the life and passion of Christ, accompanied by daring erotic and risqué contrafacta (see CONTRAFACTUM) of the Mass and other liturgical texts. Although burlesque and openly bawdy poetry is notably absent from the early Castilian mss., they play a prominent role in the closing section of the printed Cancionero general (under the title obras de burlas) and the latter's expanded, independently pub. sequel, the Cancionero de obras de burlas provocantes a risa (Valencia, 1519).

Much of cancionero verse was tied to specific events or personalities, recalling incidents or anecdotes at court or commemorating occasions of social or political importance. A great deal of it may as well have been performed in improvised games, competitions, or semitheatrical entertainments (see POETIC CONTESTS). It is difficult to be certain that even the more intimate poems were intended for private reading rather than public *recitation or *performance. Some of the shorter love lyrics must have been sung, but only with the appearance of the musically annotated *songbooks in the closing decades of the century does sure evidence of poems that were intended to be sung or performed appear.

The poets of this verse come from a broad variety of backgrounds, ranging from monarchs, high-ranking nobles, statesmen, diplomats, and knights to bureaucrats, clerics, and entertainers, or latter day *jongleurs. These differences are often reflected in the poetic production of the private person for whom verse served as a social accomplishment implicated in the display of wit and power; the professional dependent on it for a living or social advancement; and the dedicated poet who treated the art as a serious intellectual enterprise. All the major Castilian poets of the 15th c. may be included in this last group: Francisco Imperial, Iñigo López de Mendoza, Fernán Pérez de Guzmán, Juan de Mena, Gómez Manrique, Jorge Manrique, Fray Íñigo de Mendoza, and Garci Sánchez de Badajoz; as well as a number of authors better known for their prose: Juan Rodríguez del Padrón, Diego de Valera, the Bachiller Alfonso de la Torre, and Diego de San Pedro. Archival research has still to uncover biographical data for the majority of the named poets in the cancioneros/cancioneiros, all of whom but a handful were men. The only woman credited with more than one complete poem, Florencia Pinar, is the exception.

III. Manuscripts. Brian Dutton's authoritative registry of cancionero poetry (1990–92) records over 200 known mss. However, not all these mss. are strictly cancioneros; some are only fragments of lost collections or prose miscellanies with inscribed verses. Codicological and typological studies of the mss. in light of current methods of ms. study are just beginning. A great deal remains to be examined in terms of the provenance, ownership, production, circulation, readership, and, above all, the criteria and methods of compilation for the verse in cancionero mss., many of which include overlapping compositions.

■ Anthologies and Translations: Medieval Galician-Portuguese Poetry, ed. and trans. F. Jensen (1992); Cantigas d'escarnho e de mal dizer, ed. M. Rodrigues Lapa (1995); 113 Galician-Portuguese Troubadour Poems, trans. R. Zenith (1995).

■ Electronic Bibliography: V. Beltrán, Bibliografía sobre poesía medieval y Cancioneros, http://www.cervantesvirtual.com/servlet/SirveObras/p227/12032748817833728098213/index.htm.

■ Criticism and History: R. Menéndez Pidal, Poesía juglaresca y orígenes de las literaturas románicas, 6th ed. (1957); A. Várvaro, Premesse ad un' edizione critica delle poesie minori di Juan de Mena (1964); F. Jensen, The Earliest Portuguese Lyrics (1978); M. Rodrigues Lapa, Lições de literatura portuguesa, rev. ed. (1981); G. Tavani, A poesia lírica galego-portuguesa (1990); Dicionário da literatura medieval galega e portuguesa, ed. G. Lanciani and G. Tavani (1993); J. Whetnal, "El Cancionero general de 1511: Textos únicos y textos omitidos," Actas del V Congreso de la Asociación Hispánica de Literatura Medieval (1995); La Corónica 26.2 (1998); Poetry at Court in Trastamaran Spain, ed. E. M. Gerli and J. Weiss (1998); J. Weiss, "On the Conventionality of the Cantigas d'amor," Medieval Lyric, ed. W. D. Paden (2000); B. Liu, Medieval Joke Poetry (2004).

■ Primary Texts and Editions: Il canzoniere portoghese della Biblioteca Vaticana, ed. E. Monaci (1875); Cancioneiro da Ajuda, ed. C. Michaëlis de Vasconcellos, 2 v. (1904, 1966), diplomatic ed. by H. H. Carter (1941); Cancioneiro da Biblioteca Nacional (Colocci-Brancuti), ed. E. Paxeco Machado and J. P. Machado, 8 v. (1949–64); El cancionero del siglo XV, c. 1360–1520, ed. B. Dutton, 7 v. (1990–92)—includes ms. registry.

E. M. Gerli

CANON. Canon developed in Eng. as a religious term with two primary designations: ecclesiastical rule, law, or decree; and the collection of books of the Bible validated by the Christian Church, a criterion that excluded other scriptural writings. In literary studies, the term canon typically indicates a real or notional list of great works, those discussed in the major studies of lit. hist. and crit. and taught in schools and colleges as elements of proper education. In the last two decades of the 20th c., the idea of the canon moved to the center of Anglo-Am. and other areas of Western literary study and attracted energetic mainstream political debate. At the core of this ferment was the concept of literary value, in particular the question of how and by whom such value has been defined in the past. Scholars began to explore through what historical processes the canon of great books and authors had come into being and through what processes of exclusion other authors and works had been defined as other than "great." Was it the case that the best works, with "best" defined in aesthetic terms, had simply withstood the test of time and been passed from one generation to the next? Or had forces of political and social exclusion, forces whose criteria might now be usefully questioned, elevated some works and diminished others of theoretically equal value? These kinds of questions had a special currency in the Anglo-Am. and postcolonial fields, while they were generally less relevant in many Eur. lits. Scholars debated the content of the current canon, "recovered" unknown writers (often women and people of color), and rewrote literary anthols. They also began to write the hist. of "canon formation," i.e., the hist. of how the canon came into being.

The long hist. of canon-making is inseparable from the hist. of poetics. In Chinese culture of the 6th c. (which saw the appearance of significant comprehensive anthols.) and after, the condition of poetry's being (or becoming) canonical—often called "canonicity"—became an important social and cultural criterion, esp. from the Song dynasty (ca. 960–1279) on. The growth of a class of literati united by their shared education in preparing for the civil-service exams and the spread of inexpensive printed books gave the criterion social force (see CHINA, POETRY OF). Canonicity existed in Japan as well, though until the Edo period (1600), the concept of the canon was largely limited to a fairly small aristocratic population. Perhaps the more important issue surrounding canonicity in Japan occurs with the Meiji era (1868–1912), when attempts at rapid Westernization and modernization led to the establishment of a "national canon" for largely patriotic and pedagogic purposes (see JAPAN, POETRY OF).

In Eng., as in many langs., poetry was the first canonical genre. The mod. canon was born in the 18th c., at a time when men of letters understood their literary heritage as consisting almost exclusively of poets. While the value of poetry was unquestioned, the relative value of ancient and mod. writings was a subject of heated debate. Used in this context, the word modern simply means nonclassical, i.e., written in vernacular or native langs. such as Eng. rather than in the "educated" ancient langs. of Gr. and Lat. While the value of the ancient classics in Gr. and Lat. was assumed, the value of writing in the Eng. lang. had been contested for centuries. Through the middle of the 18th c., common conceptions held that mod. poets like Edmund Waller and John Dryden had improved on writers from the past through their eloquence and smooth, regular verses. They brought the lang. to a stage of devel. superior to where it stood in the poetry of such past figures as Chaucer. In the 1740s and 1750s, the idea that the present improved on the past gave way. Now the idea that ancient texts were valuable was redefined to include not only Gr. and Roman ancients, but the Eng. past and the Eng. lang. as well. The high canonical figures who emerged from this revaluation of the poetic past were the poets Edmund Spenser, Shakespeare, and John Milton. Thus, the Eng. "classics" came into being.

This shift in focus entailed a revision of criteria for judgment. Poetry was now prized not for its smoothness, its regularity, and its ling. improvements over the rough lang. of the past but for its formidable difficulties, historical remoteness, and craggy sublimity. Engaging the Eng. classics was now comparable to interpreting great texts in cl. tongues; only those with special skill would be able to apprehend these texts properly. This new vision of the Eng. past marked it as fundamentally distinct from the realm of the merely popular. Such a distinction was pressing in an era when revolutionary social changes included rising literacy rates; increased access for women to education, reading, and writing; destabilization of class distinctions; and the rise of the novel, all of which created new social and class pressures.

The definitions of both poetry and literature were thrown into uncertainty by these changes. Poetry had once been a more general term for all imaginative lit., incl. verse but not limited to it; now the term literature increasingly assumed this more general function, and poetry moved to a position more elevated than the prose works that were popular with readers. Shakespeare emerged in the 1750s as the national poet, a figure who represented both "literary" qualities antithetical to the market and, simultaneously, enthusiastic popularity. He represented a resolution to the era's tensions over literary valuation.

A century later, the concept of Eng. "classics" endured, although the terms for defining a classic continued to evolve. In 1879–80, the poet, critic, professor, and literary arbiter Matthew Arnold still identified Shakespeare and Milton as "our poetical classics," ranking the recent poet William Wordsworth in third position. No longer hindered by the need to justify the value of writing in the Eng. lang., Arnold in "The Study of Poetry" saw "the true and right meaning of the word classic, classical" as "the class of the very best." Our object in studying poetry, according to Arnold, is that of "clearly feeling and of deeply enjoying the really excellent." Arnold's concept of "classics"—works that withstand a test of timeless excellence—would survive well into the 20th c. esp. in popular usage, but in professional settings, it was overtaken by what came to be called "the canon." As Guillory (1993) observes, "The word 'canon' displaces the expressly honorific term 'classic' precisely in order to isolate the 'classics' as the object of critique."

Canon crit. made its first mark in curricula in the wake of the social upheavals of the 1960s. Socially engaged academics carried their politics into the classroom, teaching what came to be called "noncanonical" materials, often by or about people socially disfranchised based on race, class, or gender. Af. Am. poets such as Frances Harper and Paul Laurence Dunbar and women poets such as Alice Cary, Phoebe Cary, Lucy Larcom, and Celia Thaxter, who had been minimized or entirely neglected in 20th-c. textbooks, were now reclaimed by canon-conscious teachers and literary historians. One recurrent question at the core of debate was whether previously noncanonical texts were "as good" as traditionally canonical ones, putting new pressure on the criteria for assessing textual value. Gradually, challenges to the canon began to affect the margins of publishing and scholarship and eventually to alter mainstream publishing and teaching, generating the wide public debate of the 1980s and 1990s in particular. From these interrogations of the idea of the canon (no longer the "classics"), canon scholarship emerged as a new field in its own right, concerned not only with the politics of the current canon but with developing a precise hist. of canon formation at different times and places.

Such scholarship has focused in particular on how canons are formed and disseminated through institutions such as literary anthols. and the school system, esp. the university. The case of one of the most canonical Am. poets, Walt Whitman, provides a useful example of how the poetry canon changes over time. Literary textbooks published since 1919, the centennial of Whitman's birth, vary in how they define his stature. Early textbooks preferred his more conventional verse, such as "O Captain! My Captain!" and did not categorize him as a major poet. By the 1930s, the climate of appreciation for literary *modernism and its radical formal experiments, and the growth of American literature as a professional field and a subject for higher study, had cultivated a new appreciation for Whitman's technical innovations. This change in poetic culture led to a revaluation of Whitman's poetic contributions and to a dramatic change in his stature. By 1950, he had become one of the major Am. writers.

The canon debates of the last two decades of the 20th c. often centered on putatively conservative and liberal positions about whether and how the canon replicated historical exclusions based on race, class, and gender. Guillory redefined the fundamental terms of the debate in 1993, arguing that the actual nature of the problem underlying the canon debates was a crisis in the cultural capital of literary study itself, a form of study "increasingly marginal to the social function of the present educational system." Canon scholarship has dismantled the idea of "the canon" as a single monolithic entity; the term is now more likely to be used in plural or more historically restricted senses.

■ M. Arnold, "The Study of Poetry" and "Wordsworth," Matthew Arnold's Essays in Criticism, ed. G.K. Chesterton (1964); E. Miner, "On the Genesis and Development of Literary Systems," CritI 5.2–3 (1978–79); B. M. Metzger, The Canon of the New Testament (1988); P. Yu, "Poems in Their Place: Collections and Canons in Early Chinese Literature," HJAS 50 (1990); P. Lauter, Canons and Contexts (1991); J. Guillory, Cultural Capital (1993) and "Canon," Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. F. Lentricchia and T. McLaughlin, 2d ed. (1995); A. Golding, From Outlaw to Classic (1995); J. Kramnick, Making the English Canon (1998); T. Ross, The Making of the English Literary Canon (1998); Inventing the Classics: Modernity, National Identity, and Japanese Literature, ed. H. Shirane and T. Suzuki (2000); R. Terry, Poetry and the Making of the English Literary Past (2001); J. Csicsila, Canons by Consensus (2004); W. J. T. Mitchell, "Canon," New Keywords, ed. T. Bennett et al. (2005); E. Renker, The Origins of American Literature Studies: An Institutional History (2007).

E. Renker

CANSO, chanso, chanson. A love song, the literary genre par excellence among the *troubadours. Its distinguishing characteristics are precisely the two great contributions of the troubadours to all subsequent Eur. lit.—a new conception of love involving the exaltation of the lady (see COURTLY LOVE, LOVE POETRY) and a constant striving for perfection and originality of form. It is impossible to draw a sharp line between the canso and the older vers*; but by the time the name canso came into common use (toward the end of the 12th c.), the ideals of courtly love had become conventional and the technique of composition more polished, so that the canso is apt to be more artistic, but also more conventional and artificial, than the vers.

The typical canso has five or six stanzas of identical structure, plus a tornada* (Occitan) or envoi* (Fr.). Far from following any set metrical pattern, every canso was expected to have a stanzaic structure and a tune that were completely original. This proved too high a hurdle for many poets, but the metrical diversity of the extant cansos is still very impressive. Unfortunately, the same cannot always be said for their contents, which often ring the changes on a few well-worn themes and situations. The poet's love is almost never named; the proper names used in a canso (commonly secret names, or senhals, in the tornada) are for the most part those of friends or patrons to whom the poem is dedicated.

See CANZONE, SONG.

■ R. Dragonetti, La Technique poétique des trouvères dans la chanson courtoise (1960); M. Lazar, Amour courtois et fin'amors (1964); H. van der Werf, The Chansons of the Troubadours and Trouvères (1972); L. T. Topsfield, Troubadours and Love (1975); Elwert, sect. 194; Chanter m'estuet, ed. S. N. Rosenberg and H. Tischler (1981); A Medieval Songbook, ed. F. Collins Jr. (1982); Sayce; Chambers; M. L. Switten, The "Cansos" of Raimon de Miraval (1985); S. Gaunt and P. France, "Canso," The New Oxford Companion to Literature in French, ed. P. France (1995); L. Paterson, "Fin'amor and the Development of the Courtly Canso," The Troubadours, ed. S. Gaunt and S. Kay (1999).

F. M. Chambers

CANTAR. Throughout Sp. lit., the term cantar has been used loosely to mean words for a song. In the 15th c., it was probably the equivalent of cantiga*. In mod. times, it has come to mean specifically an octosyllabic quatrain having *assonance (occasionally, true rhyme) in the even-numbered lines and, preferably, unrhymed oxytones in the odd-numbered: "Algún día me verás / cuando no tenga remedio; / me verás y te veré, / pero no nos hablaremos." The composition, also called copla, is usually confined to one *strophe. The seguidilla gitana (see SEGUIDILLA) is sometimes called cantar. The cantar is sometimes defined as an octosyllabic five-line monostrophic poem assonating ababa. The cantar de soledad, also known as soledad, soleá, terceto, and triada gallega, is an octosyllabic cantar reduced to three lines. The first and third lines rhyme in either assonance or true rhyme, and the second is left unrhymed. The form is of popular origin. Dance songs, such as the jota and the malagueña, are also termed cantar. The cantar de gesta, also called simply cantar, is usually a med. *epic poem (see CHANSON DE GESTE). The lines vary in length but are long and divided into hemistichs. The poem is divided into laisses of unequal length, each laisse being monorhymed in assonance. The anonymous Poema del Cid (ca. 1140) is the most famous example.

■ N. Alonso Cortés, Elementos de preceptiva literaria, 7th ed. (1932); S. G. Morley, "Recent Theories about the Meter of the 'Cid,'" PMLA 48 (1933); Navarro; C. Smith, The Making of the "Poema de mio Cid" (1983).

D. C. Clarke

CANTE JONDO. A type of primitive Andalusian popular *song or *lament in poetry, music, and dance (baile flamenco). The origins of the cante jondo have never been completely explained, but it undoubtedly has roots in Christian and Muslim religious chants, which, in turn, were fused with traditional gypsy music and folkloric elements in southern Spain. A Jewish heritage has been claimed on the basis of the chanting nature of cante jondo, which is then taken to mean "deep song"; those favoring a Hebrew source say that it derives from Jom Tov, feast day.

The most familiar forms of the cante jondo are the sequiriya or seguidilla* (according to Federico García Lorca, the most genuine), the soleá, the saeta, the petenera, the polo, and the martinete. Among its celebrated interpreters are Pastora Pavón (La Niña de los Peines), Juan Breva, Manuel Torres, and Silverio Franconetti. In addition to Sp. musicians such as Manuel de Falla (El Amor Brujo) and Isaac Albéniz (Iberia), composers of other nationalities, incl. Claude Debussy and Mikhail Glinka, have been influenced by these songs of incantatory rhythm and plaintive tremulos. The classification of the various types of cante jondo is highly complex, but all have in common the expression of deep, dramatic passion and suffering and anguish. The singer uses enharmonism and often slides his or her voice from note to note with minute changes—features thought to be of Byzantine-Oriental origin. Full of pathos and lament, cante jondo's principal themes are love and death, often linked to telluric forces, expressed in solemn ritual. Lorca and Rafael Alberti were esp. successful at integrating these popular motifs into their sophisticated verse, an achievement that gave rise to the trend of neopopularism. The former published his Poema del cante jondo in 1931. Twenty years earlier, Manuel Machado had edited Cante hondo: Cantares, canciones y coplas, compuestas al estilo popular de Andalucía. In June 1922, the Fiesta del Cante Jondo, organized by de Falla and Lorca, was held in Granada.

■ I. Brown, Deep Song: Adventures with Gypsy Songs and Singers in Andalusia and Other Lands (1929); K. Schindler, Folk Music of Spain and Portugal (1941); M. de Falla, Escritos sobre música y músicos (1950); G. Chase, The Music of Spain, 2d ed. (1959); L. F. Compton, Andalusian Lyrical Poetry and Old Spanish Love Songs (1976); V. Almáida Mons, "Rito y ritmo: El cante jondo," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 475 (1990); J. Martínez Hernández, "La cultura de la sangre: Apuntes para una poética del cante jondo," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 512 (1993).

A. W. Phillips; K. N. March

CANTICUM AND DIVERBIUM. In Roman drama, the canticum is the part of the play that was declaimed or sung to musical accompaniment, as opposed to the diverbium or spoken dialogue. The cantica of Plautus are very numerous, constituting approximately two-thirds of each play, while those of Terence are few. Cantica are chiefly *monodies or duets sung or declaimed by an actor or actors and appear in a great variety of meters. The cantica of Seneca are choral songs written in meters that derive primarily from the metrical system of Horace. The diverbia were written, as a rule, in iambic senarii (see SENARIUS). In some mss. of Plautus, the diverbium is indicated by the marginal notation DV and the canticum by C.

■ Crusius; H. Drexler, Einführung in die römische Metrik (1967); C. Questa, Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto (1967); L. Braun, Die Cantica des Plautus (1970); A. S. Gratwick, "Drama," CHCL, v. 2.

P. S. Costas; J. W. Halporn

CANTIGA. The term used to designate poetic compositions that flourished in Iberia from the 13th to the mid-14th cs. in Galician-Port., a lang. of the northwest Iberian Peninsula and the lingua franca of poetry during this time. The general stylistic and thematic cohesion of these compositions make the cantiga a "school" of lyric. In their principal mode of dissemination, cantigas were sung or perhaps recited. The anonymous and fragmentary Arte de trovar (AT) describes genres and the formal attributes of rhyme, syllable count, and rhet. The major genres are cantiga de amigo, cantiga de amor, and cantigas de escarnho e mal dizer. The cantiga de amigo, though attributed to male poets, is in the voice of a woman (usually a peasant) lamenting the absence of a lover or "friend." In the cantiga de amor, a man sings of love and his lady or senhor. The cantiga de escarnho and cantiga de mal dizer are joke and insult poetry and include a wide range of topics. According to the AT, the cantiga de escarnho lampoons its target covertly with double entendre (equivocatio), while the cantiga de mal dizer does so openly, often naming the object of the joke. The generic distinction between the types of joke poetry is often approximate, since many compositions exhibit characteristics of each. A number of minor genres exist such as the tenção (a dialogue in poetic form), the funereal pranto, or the satirical sirventes*. Nearly 1700 cantigas are extant, collected in three major cancioneiros* or *songbooks. The numerous cantiga poets include King Denis of Portugal and King Alfonso X el Sábio (the Wise) of Castile.

Though the influence of *Occitan poetry is discernible in some compositions, the cantigas are distinct in character and portray the social and natural landscapes of Iberia. The cantigas de amor are expressions of the culture of courtly love found in contemporaneous Occitan verse, but unlike the joi that typifies the *troubadour poems, these cantigas typically express a coita d'amor or amorous suffering. The cantigas de amigo, probably inspired by popular and indigenous women's songs, also express a pained affect in the cadences of their highly structured stanzas. These songs are an important testimony to the representation of women's voice and sexuality in med. Eur. lit. Both genres of the love poetry manifest the melancholic yearning or saudade that is often held to be characteristic of the Port. literary temperament. The ribald and frequently obscene cantigas de escarnho e mal dizer often display cantiga poets at their ling. and semantic best in the joking games of lang. and nuance underlying this genre. These cantigas depict many of the realities of daily life in med. Iberia and are revealing documents of the social and cultural hist. of the peninsula.

See CANTAR; PORTUGAL, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies and Translations: Cantigas d'amor dos trovadores galego-portugueses, ed. J. J. Nunes (1972); Medieval Galician-Portuguese Poetry, ed. and trans. F. Jensen (1992); Cantigas d'escarnho e de mal dizer, ed. M. Rodrigues Lapa (1995); 113 Galician-Portuguese Troubadour Poems, trans. R. Zenith (1995); 500 Cantigas d'Amigo, ed. R. Cohen (2003).

■ Criticism and History: R. Menéndez Pidal, Poesía juglaresca y orígenes de las literaturas románicas, 6th ed. (1957); F. Jensen, The Earliest Portuguese Lyrics (1978); M. Rodrigues Lapa, Lições de literatura portuguesa, rev. ed. (1981); G. Tavani, A poesia lírica galego-portuguesa (1990); Dicionário da literatura medieval galega e portuguesa, ed. G. Lanciani and G. Tavani (1993); La Corónica 26.2 (1998); J. Weiss, "On the Conventionality of the Cantigas d'amor," Medieval Lyric, ed. W. D. Paden (2000); B. Liu, Medieval Joke Poetry (2004).

■ Primary Texts: Il canzoniere portoghese della Biblioteca Vaticana, ed. E. Monaci (1875); Cancioneiro da Ajuda, ed. C. Michëlis de Vasconcellos, 2 v. (1904, 1966), diplomatic ed. by H. H. Carter (1941); Cancioneiro da Biblioteca Nacional (Colocci-Brancuti), ed. E. Paxeco Machado and J. P. Machado, 8 v. (1949–64).

J. Blackmore

CANTO. A longer subsection of an *epic or *narrative poem, as distinguished from shorter subsections such as *stanzas, and corresponding roughly to chapters in a novel (a series of cantos may form a book in a poem such as The Faerie Queene). The term is of It. origin and is synonymous with such designations as movement or fit in other lits.; it has been used in works by Dante, Ludovico Ariosto, Torquato Tasso, Alonso de Ercilla, Voltaire, Alexander Pope, Lord Byron, and Ezra Pound, among others. In the case of Pound, Cantos was from the beginning only a working title for the long poem he envisioned; witness the fact that the titles of the first three installments all began "A Draft of. . . ." But his own life took unexpected turns, and the extent to which the pub. Cantos reveal any integrative architecture is uncertain. Pound clearly meant his 800-page "tale of the tribe" to be read as a mod. verse epic, based to some degree on Homeric, Ovidian, and Dantean models, while at the same time, such a title, in foregrounding the poem's units of construction rather than subject matter, emphasized that the poet was still working toward an as yet unseen vision of order that would unify the poem's component parts.

■ R. Sale, "Canto," The Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. A. C. Hamilton et al. (1990).

T.V.F. Brogan; T. Gardner

CANZONE. In De vulgari eloquentia (On Vernacular Eloquence), Dante defines the canzone as the most excellent It. verse form, the one that is the worthy vehicle for those "tragic" compositions that treat the three noblest subjects: martial valor, love, and moral virtue. Noting the intimate link between poetry and music (the term canzone comes from cantio, a song), Dante remarks that "although all that we put in verse is a 'song' [cantio], only canzoni have been given this name" (2.3.4). As a result, the term canzone has come to be applied to a number of verse forms with differing metrical patterns. Among the better known types is the canzone epico-lirica, whose center of diffusion was originally the Gallo-It. dialect area: it belongs to the Celtic substratum and is akin to compositions of the same genre in France and Catalonia. More indigenous to the It. soil is the canzone a ballo or ballata and other popular compositions such as the frottola* and barzelletta, the canto carnascialesco, and the lauda sacra. At various times, these types have been used by the poeti d'arte, but the type exclusively employed for refined artistic expression is the so-called canzone petrarchesca, which bears strong traces of Occitan influence. The It. strambotto* and ballata and Ger. Minnesang* are also said to have conditioned its architectonic structure.

In Italy, the first forms of the canzone are found among the poets of the Sicilian school. It is employed extensively by Guittone d'Arezzo and his followers and by Dante and the poets of the Dolce stil nuovo but acquires a certain elegance and perfection in Petrarch's Canzoniere, hence the qualifying adjective petrarchesca. Its greatest vogue in Italy occurred during the age of *Petrarchism, which lasted until the death of Torquato Tasso (1595). While the Petrarchan canzone was employed in England by William Drummond of Hawthornden and in Germany by A. W. Schlegel and other Ger. romantic poets, Spain and Portugal were the only countries outside Italy where it was used to a considerable extent.

One structural feature of the canzone proved to be of lasting importance for the subsequent devel. of a number of lyric genres in the Eur. vernaculars, especially Occitan, OF, and Middle High Ger. This is the organization of the poem into a structure that is simultaneously tripartite and bipartite. In the terminology Dante gives in De vulgari eloquentia (2.10), the poem is divided into a fronte (Lat. frons) and a sirma (Lat. cauda*)—head and tail—but the frons itself is further subdivided into two piedi (pedes, feet) that are metrically and musically identical, making the essential structure aa/b. Subsequent Ger. terms for these partitions are the Aufgesang divided into Stollen and the Abgesang. This tripartite structure appears in analogues as late Chaucerian *rhyme royal and the *Venus and Adonis stanza. In some cases, the sirma may be divided into two identical parts called volte (Lat. versus), thus leading to a quadripartite structure aa/bb. In the It. canzone there is, further, usually a single commiato (envoi*) at the close of the poem, serving as a valediction. Stanzaic length is indeterminate, varying from 7 to 20 verses. The lines are normally *hendecasyllables with some admixture of heptasyllables, and this mix of 11- and 7-syllable lines became distinctive of the form. After Tasso, under the strong influence of the Fr. Pléiade, this type was supplanted by new forms labeled canzoni—the Pindaric and anacreontic odes, whence the inexact use of ode as a trans. for canzone. Gabriello Chiabrera (sometimes called the It. Pindar) played a leading role in their diffusion. He also revived the canzonetta first employed by the poets of the Sicilian school—a form composed entirely of shorter meters, usually heptasyllables. This became the favorite type used by Metastasio and the Arcadian school.

Toward the close of the 17th c., Alessandro Guidi acclimated the canzone libera, which reached its highest devel. at the hands of Giacomo Leopardi.

See ITALIAN PROSODY, LAUDA.

■ P. E. Guarnerio, Manuale di versificazione italiana (1893); O. Floeck, Die Kanzone in der deutschen Dichtung (1910); F. Flamini, Notizia storica dei versi e metri italiani (1919); R. Murari, Ritmica e metrica razionale italiana (1927); V. Pernicone, "Storia e svolgimento della metrica," Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di letteratura italiana, ed. A. Momigliano, v. 2 (1948); E. Segura Covarsí, La canción petrarquista en la lírica española del Siglo de Oro (1949); E. H. Wilkins, "The Canzone and the Minnesong," The Invention of the Sonnet (1959); I. L. Mumford, "The Canzone in 16th-Century English Verse," English Miscellany 11 (1960); L. Galdi, "Les origines provençales de la métrique des canzoni de Petrarque," Actes romanes 74 (1966); M. Pazzaglia, Il verso e l'arte della canzone nel "De vulgari eloquentia" (1967), and Teoria e analisi metrica (1974); E. Köhler, "'Vers' und Kanzone," GRLMA, v. 2.1.3; Spongano; Wilkins; M. Fubini, Metrica e poesia, 3d ed. (1975); D. Rieger, Gattungen und Gattungsbezeichnungen der Trobadorlyrik (1976); J. A. Barber, Rhyme Scheme Patterns in Petrarch's "Canzoniere," MLN 92 (1977); C. Hunt, "Lycidas" and the Italian Critics (1979); G. Gonfroy, "Le reflet de la canso dans De vulgari eloquentia et dans les Leys d'amors," Cahiers de Civilisation Médiévale 25 (1982); F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983), s.v. "Canzone" et seq.; Elwert, Italienische, sect. 79; S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994).

J. G. FUCILLA; C. KLEINHENZ

CANZONIERE (Fr. chansonnier; Sp. cancionero, "songbook"). The term is generally used to refer to the early ms. collections of *lyric poetry in the various Romance lit. trads. In Italy, the three major collections of verse dating from the late 13th and early 14th cs.—Vatican, Lat. 3793; Florence, Laurentian Library, Rediano 9; and Florence, National Library, Banco Rari 217—contain the poetry of the Sicilian school, Guittone d'Arezzo and his followers, the Dolce stil nuovo, and others. Many other canzonieri date from the 14th, 15th and 16th cs. and preserve the rich lyric trad. of med. It. poetry. The term canzoniere has also been used to designate any collection of poems that appear to have been organized by their author so as to constitute an ordered sequence. This usage has its origin in the title often given to Petrarch's collection of 366 poems, the Rerum vulgarium fragmenta or Rime sparse, which he wrote, organized, and arranged in various orders from around 1342 until his death in 1374. Divided in two parts—the poems "in vita di Madonna Laura" (1–263) and those "in morte" (264–366)—the Canzoniere is primarily concerned with Petrarch's love for Laura and the varied moods it engenders, from ecstatic joy to deep sorrow, as well as with his inner thoughts, desires, and aspirations. Some 30 poems treat literary and political topics. Dante's Vita nuova (New Life), a combination of poetry and prose that relate the story of the protagonist's love for Beatrice, may have provided the model for Petrarch's Canzoniere (which, however, lacks the prose narrative). Retrospectively, critics have applied, perhaps unwisely, the term canzoniere to earlier corpora of poetry that they believe were written and organized by the author to tell a story or that could be arbitrarily arranged by mod. eds. so as to accomplish a similar end. It is more prudent, however, to consider canzoniere as referring to the numerous ms. songbooks of early It. lyrics and Canzoniere as designating Petrarch's verse collection.

See CANZONE; ITALY, POETRY OF; PETRARCHISM; SONGBOOK.

■ Canzonieri della lirica italiana delle origini: I. Il canzoniere vaticano, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Vat. Lat. 3793; II. Il canzoniere laurenziano, Firenze, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana, Redi 9; III. Il canzoniere palatino, Biblioteca Nazionale Centrale di Firenze, Banco Rari 217, ex Palatino 418; IV. Studi critici, ed. L. Leonardi (2000–01); O. Holmes, Assembling the Lyric Self: Authorship from Troubadour Song to Italian Poetry Book (2000).

C. KLEINHENZ

CAPITOLO (It., "chapter"). Petrarch's term for the subdivisions of his Trionfi (Triumphs, ca. 1340–74). The capitolo is an It. verse form based on and identical in structure to Dante's terza rima*, i.e., tercets linked by concatenation (capitolo ternario—aba bcb cdc, etc.). Through the 15th c., it was used for didactic subjects—an alternative form, the capitolo quadernario, derives from the Occitan sirventes*. The petrarchisti of the 16th c. employed the capitolo for ethical meditations, often solemnly allegorized. Ludovico Ariosto in his Satire adopted the form to versified memoirs; Francesco Berni transformed it into a vehicle for parody (capitolo bernesco). After Ariosto, the form survived into the 18th and 19th cs., to Vittorio Alfieri, Giacomo Leopardi, and Giosuè Carducci, as the chief form for It. verse satire and for quotidian topics treated in a light vein.

See PETRARCHISM.

■ M. Pazzaglia, Teoria e analisi metrica (1974); Spongano; La metrica, ed. R. Cremante and M. Pazzaglia, 2d ed. (1976); F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); Elwert, Italienische, sect. 93.2; S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994).

T. WLASSICS; C. KLEINHENZ

CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE

I. Dutch
II. English
III. French
IV. Spanish

I. Dutch

A. Language. The most outstanding character of "Dutch" Caribbean poetry is its ling. diversity. Besides poetry in Dutch, the lang. for administration since the 17th c., poetry is written in Papiamento and Papiamentu in the Leeward Islands (Aruba, Bonaire, Curaçao), whereas Eng. and creole Eng. dominate in Saba, St. Eustatius, and St. Martin, the so-called Windward Islands. Furthermore, in Suriname, the former "Dutch Guiana" on the South Am. continent, the creole lang. Sranan is the most popular, followed by indigenous langs. (Trio, Carib, Arawak), Maroon langs. (Aucan, Saramaccan), Sarnami, Javanese, Chinese, and Hindi. Poets also have a strong affinity for writing in Sp. and Eng.

Critical academic attention to poetry of the Caribbean is fairly recent and began, with a few exceptions, in the 1990s. In the essays included in a special issue of Callaloo (1998) and in the second volume of A History of Literature in the Caribbean (2001), scholars discuss the different lang. trads. separately. For references to the past, the creole langs. Sranan (Suriname), and Papiamentu (Bonaire, Curaçao) are crucial because they evolved in close relationship with the most intense times of slavery. Both langs. have an impressive record of oral and musical trads. Some written examples have emerged from the second half of the 18th c., but the real outburst came in the 20th c. and runs parallel with the process of decolonization since World War II. Suriname became an independent republic in 1975; Aruba has been an autonomous entity within the Kingdom of the Netherlands since 1986; and Curaçao and St. Martin have had the same status since the end of 2010. In contrast, Saba, St. Eustatius, and Bonaire are now completely incorporated in the Dutch administrative system.

B. Suriname. When Jahn published his famous anthol. Schwarzer Orpheus (Black Orpheus, 1954) with black poets from Africa, the Antilles, and South and North America, he included two poems from Suriname under the heading "Guyana." Jahn indicated that he had translated these poems from the Surinamese lang. (Sranan) in collaboration with A. O. Ehrhardt, a Ger. pastor who worked in Suriname. Sranan was the working lang. for Creole Drum (1975), a bilingual (with Eng. trans.) anthol. on creole lit. in Suriname. This ed. includes the same poem "Mama Afrika e krei fu en pikin" (Mama Africa Cries for Her Children) by Julius Koenders (1886–1957) as Jahn did, and the author is praised as the ed. of the first magazine that appeared in Sranan, Foetoe-Boi (Foot-Boy, 1946–56). When van Kempen reproduced Koenders's poem again in his 709-page anthol., Spiegel van de Surinaamse poëzie (Mirror of Surinamese Poetry, 1995), Sranan is only one of several langs. included. By then, it was no longer an exception to write in Sranan, the lang. that in colonial times was forbidden in schools. The painful process of writing poetry in this lang. is expressed by Trefossa (pseud. of Henri Franz de Ziel, 1916–75), the most outstanding Sranan poet, in a poem dedicated to Koenders from the 1950s: "one true poem is like frightening you. / one true poem is like a struggle against death."

Locally produced literary magazines such as Tongoni (1958–59), Soela (1962–64), and Moetete (1968–69) were catalysts for the overwhelming poetical production in Sranan as well as Dutch. Eddy Bruma (1925–2000), who founded a nationalist movement Wie Eegie Sanie (Our Own Things), recalled images from the past and inspired one of the best-known poets in the popular local realm, Dobru (pseud. of Robin Ravales, 1935–83), famous for his performances of the poem "Wan Bon" (One Tree) in the 1970s. February characterizes Dobru's poetry as a "linguistic tour de force" whose effect on the audience obviously was immediate. He further discusses Edgar Cairo (1948–2000), an author who moved to the Netherlands in that same period, together with a considerable part of the Surinamese population in the wake of independence. Cairo also was a performer, and February characterizes him as a "word-workman" or "word-worker," "as a cultural, historical, and literary obja [Obeah] man, magically transforming the life of Suriname's Creoles into a completely modern style, and reshaping their reality."

Experimental practices were much more characteristic than nationalism for Cairo as well as for other Surinamese poets living in the Netherlands. Hans Faverey, for instance, born in Paramaribo (1933–90), left an important oeuvre and was even proposed as a Dutch candidate for the Nobel Prize in Literature. For poetic experimentation, the vijftigers, a Dutch group of poets closely related to visual art, had prepared the reading audience for provocative metaphoric combinations. Faverey's imagination, however, also extended to memories of his native country. Jones discusses his poem "De vijver in het meer" (The Pond in the Lake), in which the Spider is visited by his son; Jones explains this metaphor of Spider as the "resourceful Anansi of Caribbean legend," judging that Faverey's Dutch has Caribbean modulations. Faverey and other poets, who receive attention in the Netherlands, do not emphasize their "Caribbeanness," as does a poet such as Astrid Roemer (b. 1947), who was at the forefront of women's liberation, ecological awareness, and the struggle against discrimination. She describes the difficulties of being published in her commemorations of Jos Knipscheer (1945–97), the owner of a courageous house for "Dutch" Caribbean authors.

Another important segment of Surinamese poetry comes from the "coolitude"—heritage. Cl. Hindi verse was introduced, and contemp. authors use this lang. together with Sarnami (a Surinamese lang. for people from Indian descent) and Dutch. This poetry also reflects on modernization, such as changing gender role patterns, intimacy and emotions, and lyrical images.

C. Aruba, Curaçao, St. Martin. Poets in the Netherlands Antilles mostly gather around institutions, libraries, and publishing houses in the three biggest islands of the area. In Curaçao, locally produced literary magazines promoted young talents. Agustin Bethancourt (1826–85), born in the Canary Islands, was the editor of Notas y Letras, (1886–88) in Sp. He was surrounded by native Papiamentu speakers, who wrote poetry in Sp. and maintained contacts with other writers in Latin America and Spain. Joseph Sickman Corsen (1853–1911) was an exception, because he also produced poetry in his native creole lang. His poem "Atardi" (Getting Dark, 1905) is still known by most Curaçaoans today, and its melancholic, introverted tone fits perfectly within the contemp. modernismo* sensibility on the Sp.-Am. continent.

When Chris Engels (pseud. of Luc Tournier, 1907–80)—an immigrant from the Netherlands—founded De Stoep (1940–51) 50 years later, writing in Sp. had become marginal, but Papiamentu-writing was quite common already. It was a published lang. since Civilizadó, ed. by Bethencourt from 1871 to 1875, as well as thereafter the weekly La Cruz—since 1900—in which "Atardi" debuted. Many other publications followed, and Broek defines a prewar period of Papiamentu-lit., supported by the Catholic Mission. Therefore, when De Stoep came out with its first issue in Dutch, a group of poets published another magazine, Simadan (1940), with contributions in Papiamentu. Simadan succeeded in bringing out only two volumes, but it became legendary for writing lit. in Papiamentu. Its initiator was Pierre Lauffer (1920–81), who even founded a musical trio, Cancionero Papiamento, in order to make clear in which lang. the feelings of belonging were to be found.

Existential questions were predominantly addressed in poetry written in Dutch. Some works show a strong reminiscence of the contacts with Spain and Sp. America, such as Bekentenis in Toledo (Confession in Toledo, 1945), in which Cola Debrot (1902–81) recalls the Sp. 17th c. Other authors who published in De Stoep evidence the desperate search for love and the desire to shape the colors and images of the island's landscape. Most of the local contributors were native Papiamentu-speakers. Oversteegen analyzes the poem "Bezoek" (Visit, 1945), with which Tip Marugg (1923–2006) debuted, and interprets its reception as having two different levels of meaning: one for the Dutch reader and one for the Antillean, the native of Papiamentu.

Papiamentu imagination is very strong in Aletta Beaujon's (1933–2001) first work, Gedichten aan de Baai en elders (Poems at the Bay and Beyond, 1957), in which the sea is repeatedly placed at the center of the poetical universe. In that same year, Frank Martinus Arion (b. 1936) came out with Stemmen uit Afrika (Voices from Africa, 1957), an epos in which he describes the encounter of white tourists with black inhabitants of the rain forest in Africa. Arion also edited the magazine Ruku in the 1970s, in which black consciousness was promoted and in which he published poetry in Dutch and Papiamentu.

Poetry written in the creole lang. of Aruba, Papiamento, does not reproduce the same tension between Dutch and Papiamentu in Curaçao. Cosecha Arubiano (Aruban Harvest, 1983), the anthol. pub. by Booi and coeditors, reveals that Papiamento, Eng., Sp., and Dutch seem to coexist peacefully together without feeling specifically challenged one by the other. Generally, Papiamento is the most important medium for poetical expression. For others, living abroad, this medium becomes a relative dimension. Henry Habibe (b. 1940), the ed. of the literary magazine Watapana (1968–72), which published the poetry of Antillean students in the Netherlands, was highly praised for his exquisite volumes in Papiamento. However, his last poetry volume came out in Dutch. In contrast, Denis Henriquez (b. 1945), who became a well-known author of novels written in Dutch, produces poetry in Papiamento that to date has not been published.

In St. Martin, creole Eng. is even less involved in a poetical dialogue with Dutch. Wycliffe Smith (b. 1948) published a first survey of poetry in the Dutch Windward Islands, Windward Island Verse (1981), in Eng. Thereafter, the activities of Lasana Sekou (b. 1959), who studied in New York, have had far-reaching consequences. His publishing company, House of Nehesi, has attracted local talent and also has attracted other Caribbean writers to St. Martin. In addition, because of in part the Nigerian critic and teacher Fabian Badejo (b. 1950), who lived in St. Martin, the relationship with Africa becomes a concrete point of reference, asserted in performances, theater, and workshops, widely seen but rarely published.

D. Traumas, Visions, Rhythms, and Sounds. Critical work by Broek, Echteld, van Kempen, van Putte-de Windt, and Wim Rutgers repeatedly addresses the important role of literary magazines in the local settings. Poetry represents historical trauma such as slavery, the search for connections with Africa, the May 1969 rebellion in Curaçao, the December murders in Suriname in 1980, gender roles, or discrimination. The myriad of anthols., (short-lived) magazines, or self-published volumes makes it complicated to distinguish among the different "strategies and stratagems" of "Dutch" Caribbean poetry. Therefore, it might be useful to conclude with some general observations.

First, it is clear that different poetical langs. are not disappearing but are growing stronger, even though Dutch remains the condition for circulating on the literary market. Second, efforts to counter the marginalization of the creole langs. by pushing them forward as written literary langs. have succeeded since the 1940s: their rhythms and rhymes have a strong musical background, and, in this context, Caribbean poetry begins to be increasingly influential. The House of Nehesi has published volumes by Kamau Brathwaite, and his work has also been translated into Sranan in Suriname. Sekou even speaks of the Caribbean as the "universe of sound." Van Mulier, ed. of the anthol. Nieuwe Oogst (New Harvest, 2002), belongs to the Surinamese Writers Association in the Netherlands and has recognized this point. He has argued for more attention to musical rhythm in poetry. One of the poets in the volume, the music professor Rudy Bedacht (b. 1932), presents his composition for another melody for the national *anthem, currently based on the 1876 musical composition of a Dutch teacher. The anthem, which has one Dutch and one Sranan *strophe—the latter produced by Trefossa in 1959—was translated into a slightly modified Javanese version in 1998. This detail clearly reveals that the poetical sensibility in this part of America is dealing with different langs. and styles that all refer to the same native intimacy.

II. English. Speakers of Eng. begin to inhabit the Caribbean during in the early 17th c., through the colonization of Barbados and then Jamaica. By the end of the 20th c., the region's anglophone poets wrote not only from former Brit. colonies large (Guyana, Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbados, St. Lucia) and small (Belize, the Bahamas, St. Vincent, Grenada, Antigua, St. Kitts, Virgin Islands, Dominica, Montserrat), but from islands that were never Brit., such as Puerto Rico and even St. Martin. In addition, many writers who regard themselves as anglophone Caribbean poets now reside for the most part in North America or the U.K. Such a list is not very helpful for identifying some common ground for all this writing beyond the accident of lang. Another frequent option, "West Indian poetry," is more explicitly grounded in the Eng.-speaking islands themselves but is commonly used more broadly. The most ingenious, and possibly most accurate, attempt at characterization associates this poetry with "the cricket-playing Caribbean."

Venturing to speak of "anglophone Caribbean poetry" turns any traditional notion of national lit. on its head. This is a body of poetry from noncontiguous territories, many of them now sovereign states, some of which once comprised a single political unit, though only fleetingly, as the short-lived Federation of the West Indies (1958–62). This is not the poetry of a nation, nor of a people, nor of a single culture, nor even, strictly speaking, of a single lang. What do we gain by having a catchall phrase for any verse written in some variant of Eng. by someone associated with the Caribbean? Even naming the region itself requires choosing among incommensurate terms: "the Caribbean," "Latin America," "the Antilles," "the West Indies." But if the difficulties of naming this body of work might suggest that it is not really viable as a single object of attention, the repeated efforts to name it seem to belie that suggestion. Indeed, throughout the Caribbean, the issues raised by the very act of naming have been central to cultural self-consciousness (and particularly to poetry) since Europe insisted these islands were "the Indies," gave the slaves ancient Roman names, and described the landscape in the vocabulary of Ren. pastoral. To propose "Caribbean poetry in English" as an object of study is to propose that regarding the poetry through such a frame or optic, rather than as sheaves of separate poems, significantly enhances our experience of the texts. For critics and poets alike, it is inherently intriguing that this body of work is problematic to name.

Thus, e.g., we might start from the common historical narrative/trajectory that these islands share. Then the qualifications must begin at once: at least two of these "islands" (Belize and Guyana) are not islands at all. But the need to make that qualification is not distracting; it sensitizes readers to different roles that topography and geography may play in shaping the local intonation of themes and images common to the experience of the region. Metaphorically speaking, many aspects of Caribbean life are instances of a broad principle, "one language, many accents." This is consistent with Antonio Benítez Rojo's (1931–2005) insight that, in the Caribbean, things are always done "in a certain kind of way." The Tobagonian poet Eric Roach (1915–74) in "Caribbean Calypso" (1965) strikingly envisions the Caribbean as a laboratory, each island a Petri dish in which initially similar cultures, once isolated, evolve quite differently under the influence of what were at first only slightly different conditions, mutations, contaminations. Caribbean writers characteristically bear in mind at once the distinctively local and its regional or international contexts.

Qualifications and variants aside, the common ground for the entire region is archipelagic geography, tropical climate, and a shared hist. Europe intrudes into Amerindian societies, and the rest follows. Emancipation brought an end to plantation slavery on different islands at different times, but in the Brit. colonies, the reach of the empire made it possible to avert the ensuing labor shortage by recruiting indentured workers from India, China, and even West Africa. After extreme economic and political changes and two world wars, Britain moved to dismantle both the plantation and the empire, creating a climate in the Caribbean for the emergence of cultural and political nationalism. Independence came for most of the Brit. Caribbean in the course of the 1960s, unexpectedly inflected by the rise of Black Power movements in the region as well as in North America and the U.K. In the sometimes disappointing aftermath of independence, the salient international pressures on the region were redefined: increasing Am. influence, globalization, and neocolonialism. Such is the grand narrative, though it played out in different terms and on different timetables from island to island.

In the anglophone case, the production of poetry from its beginnings entails decisions about three intertwined questions that have remained perennial for this body of work: Who is the audience? What is the lang. of expression (Standard English [SE] or creole)? What is the envisioned mode of expression (oral or scribal)? Throughout the colonial Caribbean, the various metropolitan langs. isolated territories from one another, while each lang. imported conventions and styles that shaped distinctive literary hists. Almost at once, a variety of creole langs. arise (new spoken langs. developing out of persistent contact between two or more other langs.), and creole becomes an influential part of the ling. experience of writers long before it emerges openly as a lang. of expression in the literary realm. Some societies respond to the emergence of a spoken creole by establishing a barrier between what are perceived as separate and unequal langs. Though the ling. hists. of the Brit. colonies vary considerably, there has been a general tendency to think in terms of a ling. continuum linking rural creole with metropolitan lang. This gives individual speakers considerable control over their self-expression, even within single sentences, and has been an important resource for the distinctive flexibility of anglophone poetry.

In the late 1790s, there appear the first transcriptions of folk songs and stories composed in an Eng.-based creole. These would have been accessible to and used by West Indians of both Af. and Eur. heritage, though it is difficult to date the actual creation of such oral materials. They are recorded in travelogues, hists., and personal jours. published mostly in London and reflect what we would now call an anthropological interest in the region, stimulated at a crucial historical moment: this is the era of the Am., Fr., and Haitian revolutions; of the abolitionist movement; and of the Brit. acquisition of Trinidad.

The first self-consciously literary poems appear somewhat earlier, from about 1750. These are fairly long narrative poems, in *blank verse or *couplets, written according to the conventions of contemporaneous Brit. poetry. Most of the poems of this period are published in London; while a few were printed in Jamaica or Barbados, these authors certainly aspired to reach a Brit. audience. They would also have envisioned a small but interested audience in the Caribbean, made up of planters, government officials, doctors, attorneys, and clergy. It is apparent that West Indian poets have always been aware of the challenges and opportunities entailed by addressing more than one audience at a time.

Individual poets were sporadically active during the 19th c., and it is likely that more of this work will be recovered as research into periodical publications of the era continues. Though there are intriguing exceptions, the dominant themes are predictable: nature, spirituality, moral uplift, and imperial patriotism. Issues of audience and lang. became more prominent at the end of the century with the success of *"dialect poetry"—verse composed in the creole vernacular as a vehicle for comedy or social satire. Intended for newspaper publication, this poetry was written by members of the social elite for a literate readership, but the most popular practitioners reached wide audiences and published reprint collections through local printeries. Soon afterward, in 1912, the young Claude McKay (1890–1948), from a well-to-do black family in rural Jamaica, published two volumes (one in Kingston and the other in London) that are generally regarded as the collections in which poems in an anglophone creole are explicitly presented as lit. The influence of McKay's work was seminal but delayed (perhaps because McKay almost immediately emigrated to the U.S. and never wrote in creole again).

Literary anthols. begin to appear in print in the 1920s and 1930s, but historical perspective is rare in these collections; most include only works of living authors, with few poems from before about 1900. There is one impressive exception, the first anthol. from Guyana (Guyanese Poetry, 1931), whose ed., Norman Cameron, unearthed work from as early as 1831. The appearance of anthols. coincides with the devel. in several territories of productive poetry groups, clubs, or salons (such as the Poetry League of Jamaica or the group associated with the Beacon magazine in Trinidad), and some tentative printing ventures. In the more developed colonies during this period, we can discern the crucial metamorphosis by which a scattering of writers coalesces into a lit. There is generally a new interest in local Caribbean geography and hist., and during the late 1930s and the war years, these themes mature into more overt concern with cultural and political nationalism.

From the very beginning of the century, women had taken important initiatives, and during this period, one who learned from McKay's example was Una Marson (1905–65), another Jamaican who published several collections of poetry in the 1930s and so established herself as arguably the first important modernist and the leading female voice of the time. A number of her poems experiment with the poetic resources of vernaculars, drawing on lessons learned not only from Jamaican creole but from her knowledge of *Harlem Renaissance poetry and its exploration of black Am. vernaculars. The greatest exponent of McKay's early mission, however, is Louise Bennett (1919–2006), a collector and performer of folk tales and songs, professionally trained in London at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, and the author of several collections of original poems in Jamaican creole, beginning in the 1940s. Her work, however, was not regarded as "literature" until the independence era, despite her jibe in 1944 that, though the Brit. had been trying to stabilize their lang. since the 14th c., "Five hundred years gawn an dem got / More dialect dan we!" ("Bans o' Killing," 1944).

A massive Caribbean migration to Britain occurred between the early 1950s and the restrictive immigration legislation of 1962. As in any migration, there was concern about abandoning home and losing identity, but this turned out to be something different—as Bennett phrased it, a case of "colonization in reverse." Nationalist impulses at home were complemented by the discovery, in London, of both a broader West Indian identity and a black identity. Anglophone migrants from all over the Caribbean were thrown together (Britons tended to call them all Jamaicans) and began to sort out not only their common traits but the distinctive differences between local island cultures—in particular (from the perspective of poets) ling. variations in the syntax, lexicon, and accent of their diverse forms of Eng. The formulation of a West Indian identity was facilitated by a number of new institutions. Most powerful in its impact was perhaps the BBC's Caribbean Voices program, which featured the voices of West Indian authors resident in London reading current West Indian prose and poetry for listeners in the Caribbean (a number of the early emigrants, incl. novelists Sam Selvon, George Lamming, and V. S. Naipaul, worked for the BBC and wrote their first books on its typewriters). Also significant were the Caribbean Artists Movement (which eventually migrated back to the Caribbean from England), the founding of literary jours. with regional perspective (Bim in Barbados [1942], Kyk-Over-Al in Guyana [1945], Caribbean Quarterly in Jamaica [1949]), and the establishment in 1948 of the University College of the West Indies (soon to become the University of the West Indies). A succeeding generation of writers, building on this thinking about West Indianness, would go on in their own work to formulate what we now call Black British identity. This pattern is repeated when the somewhat later migration to Canada leads to the emergence of yet another "colony" of anglophone Caribbean lit.

Back in the Caribbean, some of the leading poets of this period were Martin Carter (1927–97) and A. J. Seymour (1914–89) in Guyana, and Roach and Harold Telemaque (1910–82) in Trinidad. Between 1962 and 1966, Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, Guyana, and Barbados all became independent countries. The timing meant that the process of coming to terms with independence took place in the context of the global emergence of black consciousness. For predominantly black nations like Jamaica and Barbados, this was in the long run a positive influence. For Guyana and Trinidad, with much more diverse populations, the downside was institutionalization of political confrontation along ethnic lines. Among the positive outcomes was (on the one hand) robust growth of both recognizably Afro-Caribbean and recognizably Indo-Caribbean writing and (on the other) a growing confidence among writers about drawing on their multiple cultural trads. Everywhere writers joined in the fundamental debates about "roots"—about whether identity was to be grounded in pristine Af. or Asian heritage or in current creole realities (as in Derek Walcott's view of the archetypal Caribbean man as a "second Adam"). Discussion of the hybrid results of creolization could be framed as biological (what are your parents?), cultural (what do you do, and how do you do it?), even intellectual (what do you talk about and how?). Poets, through the content of their poems, played a vital role in those discussions, but, for the practice of poetry, the leading issues were again lang. and mode of expression.

Among the many rewarding poets of the postindependence era are Edward Baugh (b. 1936), Mervyn Morris (b. 1937), Velma Pollard (b. 1937), and Dennis Scott (1939–91) in Jamaica; Kendel Hippolyte (b. 1952), Jane King (b. 1952), and Robert Lee (b. 1949) in Saint Lucia; Ian McDonald (b. 1933) and David Dabydeen (b. 1955) in Guyana. The single most important poets of the 20th c. were Derek Walcott (b. 1930) and Kamau Brathwaite (b. 1930), both ambitious, prolific poets and highly visible figures on the Caribbean scene. Walcott began publishing in the late 1940s; his poetry has often addressed in complex ways the relation of the Caribbean to its Eur. heritage, while his verse plays have given voice to several West Indian vernaculars. Brathwaite came to prominence in the 1960s with the first volume of what became a trilogy, The Arrivants (1967–69), an epic poem of vast scope and resonance, which, among other innovations, set the standard for literary use of anglophone creoles.

Following the magisterial example of Brathwaite's trilogy, many poets joined the project of demonstrating that their anglophone creoles could be literary langs.; some even took the extreme view that SE could not be the lang. of their work. In some cases, the argument for creole was an argument that spoken lang. should be fundamental for poetry (an argument that echoes the likes of William Wordsworth, Chaucer, and Dante). Advocacy of spoken lang. often brought with it an advocacy of spoken style, of what Brathwaite called "orature": written poetry that aspired to the condition of oral poetry. This argument invoked several important values of the era: the association of oral verbal arts with the Caribbean "folk" (conceived in various ways) and with ancestral trads. in Africa, and traditional respect for the figure of the Caribbean "man of words." This, in turn, led to a new respect for performers of poetry (such as Bennett), and to the rise, esp. in Jamaica, of composers of "dub poetry" (sometimes called "reggae poetry"): poetry intended for performance that draws heavily on features of Jamaican deejay practice and is often (but not necessarily) accompanied by reggae music. Among the most compelling of these, accessible through commercial recordings, are Linton Kwesi Johnson (b. 1952), Michael Smith (1954–83), Jean "Binta" Breeze (b. 1956), and Mutabaruka (b. 1952).

From a narrowly literary perspective, the *performance poets no longer dominate the Caribbean scene as they once did. A generation of younger poets has come forward, many of them not esp. interested in performance and often writing rather surprisingly in SE. In particular, women in much greater numbers (and from several generations) began publishing volumes of poetry in the 1980s; they had almost dropped out of the poetry scene during the male-dominated nationalist period. This is a body of work remarkable for diversity and audacity; it is not the exploration of "female subjects" or a narrowly defined "women's style." It addresses a variety of audiences, sometimes in creole, sometimes in SE, sometimes in both. Lorna Goodison (b. 1947) has an international reputation and a clear influence on younger writers. But there are many established figures, such as Pollard and Grace Nichols (b. 1950), while the numerous younger poets often publish locally and are best sought out in anthols.

The current poetry scene has become increasingly diverse in every respect, yet high-profile performance poets like Johnson effectively symbolize the paradox on which anglophone Caribbean poetry stands after the 20th c. Through recordings, concerts, and videos, they reach an enormous global audience, comparable to that of the reggae stars. But what they deliver is a specifically Caribbean (or in some cases Black Brit.) perspective couched in unmediated creole lang. With minimal compromise or homogenization, they do not make their lang. accessible; they successfully invite audiences to make the effort to access it. Increasingly, transnational experience and even transnational identity are marks of most Caribbean poets, yet their work seems ever more interested in the peculiarities of local speech, custom, and behavior. They preserve and celebrate what is distinctively Caribbean but project it globally.

III. French. One of the most widely accepted truths of francophone Caribbean lit., and for some readers perhaps Caribbean lit. in its entirety, is that no poetry existed before 1939. Revolutionary ideologies in the francophone Caribbean in the 1930s were constructed around myths of rupture and innovation that condemned the 19th c. as a time of unexamined imitation. This is one of the defining characteristics of the identity politics promoted in such radical jours. as Légitime Défense, Tropiques, and La Revue Indigène. This yearning for a violent rupture with the past led Frantz Fanon to declare, "Until 1939 the West Indian lived, thought, dreamed . . . composed poems, wrote novels exactly as a white man would have done" (Toward the African Revolution, 1964). Indeed, in the case of Haiti, the influential theorist of Haitian indigenisme Jean Price-Mars (1876–1969) dismissed his predecessors in 1928 as practicing collective "bovarysme" or "the pathological deviation [of] conceiving of ourselves as other than we are" (So Spoke the Uncle, 1928). More recently the promoters of Créolité in the Fr. Antilles blindly repeated Price-Mars's term "bovarysme collectif" to describe all the writing done in Haiti between 1804 and 1915.

Before the publication of Aimé Césaire's epic poem Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Notebook of a Return to the Native Land, 1939) on the eve of World War II, there was good reason to believe that Fr. Caribbean poetry, at least what was produced in the Fr. colonies, was dominated by sentimental, pastoral, and, most important, apolitical evocations of nature. A local intellectual culture was never encouraged in colonies whose raison d'être was primarily commercial. Education was a fiercely guarded privilege restricted almost exclusively to the white planter elite. This drawback, combined with an inevitable sense of cultural inferiority, meant that, when it did appear, poetry was likely to offer imitative apologies for the economic status quo. For instance, Poirié de Saint-Aurèle (1795–1855), a member of the white planter class from Guadeloupe, fully deserves Fanon's dismissive description, having published a defense of plantation slavery and collections of regionalist verse (Les Veillées francaises [French Evenings], 1826; and Cyprès et palmistes [Cypresses and Palms], 1833) that defend the plantation hierarchy and display contempt for the black-slave population.

Saint-Aurèle's love for his native land and antipathy to the métropole are a product of reactionary self-interest, as he felt the way of life of the planter class increasingly threatened. This was not always the case, as regionalist verse was also inspired by the ideals of Fr. *romanticism that could allow for the condemnation of racial prejudice and for a healthy interest in representing local flora and fauna. Toward the end of the century in Martinique, René Bonneville (1871–1902) published a regionalist anthol., Fleurs des Antilles (1900), to coincide with the Universal Exposition. In Guadeloupe, Oruno Lara (1879–1924) published much regionalist verse in his newspaper La Guadeloupe Littéraire. They propagated the exotic image of les Antilles heureuses until the outbreak of World War I. Uniform themes and unoriginal styles are the hallmark of this period of Fr. West Indian poetry, typified by such writers as Daniel Thaly (1878–1950), the titles of whose works—Le Jardin des Tropiques (The Garden of the Tropics, 1911), Nostalgies françaises (French Nostalgia, 1913)—speak for themselves. Along with this picturesque presentation of local color, there was a more ethnographic trend that insisted on a local identity. Gilbert de Chambertrand (1890–1984) and Gilbert Gratiant (1895–1985) spoke more directly to local concerns, even if in an unoriginal way. The latter experimented with poems in Creole and was even included in Léopold Sédar Senghor's 1948 Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue française (Anthology of the New Negro Poetry in French and Malagasy).

Out of this period of largely white nostalgia and mulatto mystification, there nevertheless emerged the powerful evocation of an Antillean childhood in the early verse of Saint-John Perse (1887–1975), a white Creole native of Guadeloupe. His first book of poems, Eloges (Praises, 1911), is as much a love song to Guadeloupe as one of loss motivated by the outlook of a displaced planter class that one finds in Saint Aurèle. Even if the ghost of the planter patriarch haunts the pages of Eloges, Perse has become, as much as Césaire, a central figure in Fr. West Indian lit. The Caribbean landscape in Perse's poems is not evoked through the clichés of tropical local color as is the case with the regionalist poets. It is not so much the references to local flora and fauna as the deeply felt personal sense of a lost paradise that make these poems authentically Caribbean. The poet's plantation past becomes an Antillean lieu de mémoire, the poetic origin for a trad. of writing Caribbean landscape.

The dismissal of all poetry before the 1930s as Eurocentric seems particularly unjust in the case of Haiti. The themes of early Haitian poetry are drawn from the 1804 Declaration of Independence: pride in Haiti's historic defeat of Napoleon's army, the need to inspire patriotic ideals in the new nation, and the proclamation of Haiti's redemptive mission in a world where plantation slavery still thrived. From very early on, there were calls for a national lit. that would resist cl. forms and references in favor of Haitian hist. and culture. Victor Hugo's robust rhet. and militant politics were a source of inspiration at the time. One of the major exponents of this nationalist verse was Oswald Durand (1840–1906), whose Rires et Pleurs (Laughter and Tears, 1896) were an unflagging attempt to celebrate Haitian culture. He is remembered for his poem of unrequited love, "Choucoune" (1884), which was one of the first experiments in Creole-lang. verse. His contemp. Masillon Coicou (1867–1908) was both a military man and a poet and is best known for the tellingly named Poésies nationales (1892), which retold Haitian hist. and the independence struggle. At the turn of the 20th c., there was a reaction against what was seen as the excessive nationalism of the patriotic school of Haitian poets. The movement called La Ronde felt that, to gain international acclaim, it was necessary to avoid the trap of a narrow parochialism in poetry. Its adherents argued for a literary eclecticism and engaged cosmopolitanism in Haitian verse and felt that regionalist concerns were best left to Haiti's novelists. The works of the poets of La Ronde—Etzer Vilaire (1872–1951), Edmond Laforest (1876–1915), and Georges Sylvain (1866–1925)—were allusive, impersonal, and reminiscent of the ideals of Fr. *symbolism. This poetic movement was abruptly cut short by the Am. occupation of Haiti in 1915.

Given the radical turn in Haitian poetry after 1915, Césaire's revolutionary poetics was already evident in the wake of the U.S. occupation. Well before the *Negritude movement of the 1930s, the poets of the indigenist movement began to espouse the ideals of a heroic *modernism that valued the poet for his or her visionary power and poetic lang. for its apocalyptic thrust. An antiestablishment iconoclasm was practiced by poets such as Emile Roumer (1903–88), Philippe Thoby-Marcelin (1904–75), and Carl Brouard (1902–65), whose work was published in La Revue Indigène. Brouard, in particular, could be seen as an early exponent of the values of Negritude, as he became increasingly preoccupied by Haiti's Af. past and the Vaudou religion. The most outstanding figure of this time is Jacques Roumain (1907–44), who founded the Haitian Communist Party and linked the Haitian Renaissance to similar movements elsewhere in the Caribbean, and North and South America. He was close to the Cuban poet Nicolás Guillén, the Chilean Pablo Neruda, and the Af. Am. Langston Hughes, who were all bound by their ties to Marxism. His fiery book of poems Bois d'ébène (Ebony Forest, 1945) favors the grand prophetic manner of the militant utopian rhet. of the 1940s. This epic, militant style would be continued after Roumain's death in 1944 by poets such as Jean Brierre (1909–92), René Bélance (1915–2004), and Roussan Camille (1912–61). Perhaps the most successful of the generation that followed was René Depestre (b. 1926), whose early verse Etincelles (Sparks, 1945) and Gerbe de Sang (Spray of Blood, 1946) were deeply influenced by the poetry of the Fr. Resistance, esp. that of Paul Éluard and Louis Aragon. Most of Depestre's life would be spent in exile, which would make him an early poet of what would become during the Duvalier dictatorship in the 1960s the Haitian diaspora.

Although he has been eclipsed by Césaire, the Fr. Guyanese poet Léon Gontran Damas (1912–78) was the herald of what came to be known as the Negritude movement. His book of poems Pigments (1937) was the first to treat the subject of an international black consciousness and to openly denounce Fr. colonialism. His poetic production was less than that of Césaire and his style less dependent on surrealist techniques, but his direct, spontaneous verse connected him immediately to both the Harlem Renaissance and Haitian indigenisme. He pioneered the use of everyday speech in his verse, drawing on the poetic experiments with spoken Fr. by Raymond Queneau and Jacques Prévert. He found a way of creating *protest poetry that could endure, manipulating pace, humor, and shock to create a number of memorable dramatic *monologues. Damas is as terse and incisive as Césaire is epic and erudite.

Césaire's Cahier d'un retour au pays natal inaugurated the heroic modernist verse that would become the hallmark of francophone poetry in the next two decades. In the poetic masterpiece of this period of radical politics, Césaire conceives of the francophone Caribbean in terms of violent images of revolutionary decolonization. The Caribbean past was represented as a sea of running sores, a bloody, open wound with its archipelago of precarious scabs. The Caribbean people eked out a zombified, repressed existence in this putrifying world. The poet proposed a volcanic reordering of space where the tongue of volcanic flame would sweep away the old and found a new utopian order.

The championing of Césaire's apocalyptic poetics had much to do with his meeting with André Breton in 1941 as the latter was heading into exile in the United States. Breton's account of their meeting, which now forms the introduction to Cahier, promoted Césaire as a mystical visionary who shared with the leader of the surrealist movement the primitivist dream of an uncontaminated elsewhere beyond the reach of the nightmare imposed by Europe in the colonial past for Césaire and the Nazi present for Breton. Césaire and Breton's visits to Haiti in the coming years would help spread this apocalyptic modernism. However, there is much evidence that Césaire was at least as deeply concerned with the problems of an overly referential verse as he was with a political prise de conscience. His high regard for Stéphane Mallarmé, with whom he shared the view that the concrete could short-circuit the poetic, and his siding with Breton in the quarrel with Aragon as to the need for a political poetry are evidence of Césaire's passionate belief in the freedom of the poetic imagination. This is an area of ambiguity that pushes us to rethink the view that Césaire's poetry is exclusively associated with violent militancy.

When the Haitian Marxist Depestre, echoing Aragon, insisted that Caribbean poetry be accessible and nonexperimental, Césaire's response to Depestre, and by extension Aragon and the Communist Party, was indeed entitled "Réponse à Depestre poète haitien, Eléments d'un art poétique" (Response to the Haitian Poet Depestre: Elements of the Art of Poetry, 1955). By giving his reply this subtitle, Césaire invites us to see the poem as prescriptive. With unaccustomed directness, he urged Depestre not to pay heed to Aragon's call for accessible verse but to become a poetic maroon, after the early mod. term for escaped slaves who lived independent of colonial society. Depestre was encouraged to learn to conjugate this particular neologism—marronner—in the way that the 18th-c. Haitian maroon and Vaudou priest Dutty Boukman understood it. Césaire reminded Depestre that Boukman's rebellious cry incited the rebellions that became the Haitian Revolution and argued that the poetic word should strive for a similar "insane chant" as the ultimate form of marronnage. It is hard to tell whether Depestre heeded Césaire's advice. He was certainly capable of a moving and unpretentious lyricism as in Journal d'un animal marin (Journal of a Marine Animal, 1964), arguably the most important poetic work about exile during the Duvalier years, and more relaxed personal pieces in Minerai noir (Black Ore, 1957). Nevertheless, he was equally capable of inspiring, accessible verse in response to requests from the Communist Party. His Vaudou ritual poem Un arc-en-ciel pour l'Occident chrétien (A Rainbow for the Christian West, 1967) is structured around chants for mobilizing the Vaudou gods to wage war against U.S. imperialism. His Poète à Cuba (1976) shows him to be an inveterate producer of poetry for political occasions. His celebration of pagan love as the ultimate catalyst for liberating the self, however, suggests that he has not quite abandoned his early surrealist influences for the rhet. of political activism.

It could be said that Césaire straddles two aspects of literary modernism. On the one hand, he practices a heroic modernism with its notion of the poet's prophetic vision and the poem as a moment of epiphany. On the other, he also espouses a nonutopian poetics based on the values of imaginative freedom and formal experimentation. By the 1950s, however, dreams of revolutionary decolonization had begun and a monolithic racial identity had begun to yield to a poetics that no longer valued marronage and radical difference. The emergence of this new, identifiably postcolonial interest in cultural contact, hybridity, and creolization in the francophone Caribbean is as much linked to the failure of the dream of revolutionary decolonization as to the complex nature of the surrealist movement itself. We should not forget that the poetics of modernism first entered Caribbean lit. not through Césaire but through the group Légitime Défense, among whose members were the now largely forgotten writers René Menil (1907–2004) and Jules Monnerot (1909–95). Their presence has been eclipsed by that of Césaire and the Breton-sponsored idea of revolutionary poetics. However, their ideas often overlapped with members of the surrealist movement who either defected or were expelled by Breton. Here we find the origins of the post-Césairean idea of poetry in the Caribbean. While we tend to associate surrealism with the world of dreams and the unconscious, it also maintained a strong materialist interest in things, in the impossibility of creating abstract formulations from concrete reality. The inscrutable otherness of objects and the inability to systematize the concrete are crucial to the early writings of Monnerot as to such early members of the movement as Roger Caillois (1913–78) and Michel Leiris (1901–90). Subjectivity, in particular artistic subjectivity, depended on le hasard objectif, the inscrutable otherness of objects.

This interest in the liberating possibilities of otherness is rich in significance for Caribbean writers wrestling with colonial as well as anticolonial constructs of reality. It certainly created a suspicion of the grand ideological formulations of heroic modernism and provoked an interest in the ethnographic mapping of otherness. Some of the surrealist fellow travelers who knew each other and favored this methodology also came to the Caribbean during the 1940s. Pierre Mabille (1904–52) and later the ethnographer Alfred Métraux (1902–63) spent long periods in Haiti in the 1940s. On the invitation of Césaire, Leiris visited Martinique and Haiti in 1948. The importance of travel, the encounter with the other, and self-ethnography were all seen at this time as the supreme artistic endeavor. Global modernity had turned all places into crossroads where the unpredictable occurred. There could, therefore, be no more ancestral heartlands nor utopian elsewheres.

A prewar apocalyptic poetics now yielded to a poetry based on self-scrutiny catalyzed through interaction with the other. Poets such as Clément Magloire St. Aude (1912–71) of Haiti and Édouard Glissant (1928–2011) of Martinique became major exponents of this mode of poetic expression. The latter's 1955 Soleil de la conscience (Sun of Consciousness) is a perfect example of a poetic self-ethnography as the writer travels not to the native land but to Paris where he is both a stranger to and a product of that reality. The poetics of postwar modernism in the Caribbean is about not new beginnings but a postcolonial errancy that negates, as Glissant has said, "every pole and metropole." It is also not so much about self-expression as about opening poetry to the Caribbean's hemispheric horizons and ultimately to global horizons. This is the central difference between the poetics of Césaire and Glissant. The former projects island space as home, as an unambiguous foundation for the assertion of difference in the face of a deterritorializing incorporation into the transcendent values of the West. The latter replaces the Césairean romance of lost origins with an alternative poetics of location that projects island space as an open yet opaque insularity, a zone of encounter that both acquiesces in yet resists the pressures of global interaction. Consequently, Glissant's poetics was not about idealizing difference in the face of the transcendent will of the West, the reductive force of the Same. He set out, rather, to theorize a "totalizing rootedness," a coming to consciousness of the world in a particular locale. A crucial aspect of Glissant's early assertion of a totalizing vision is the density and tension of locale that underpins this relational model.

In his early book of poems Les Indes (1956), Glissant examines the question of place, naming, and the force of the imagination in the Indies—as much dream space as the space of historical nightmare. From the outset, Glissant saw his legacy not so much as that of a Fr. West Indian poet but as that of an Am. modernist. He felt a greater affinity with Perse and William Faulkner than with Roumain and Césaire. Breaking with the demiurgic impulse of heroic modernism, Glissant focuses on the shaping force of landscape. This time it is not the Césairean volcano but Perse's inscrutable marine world that allows Glissant to break with the poésie de circonstance that characterized earlier decades. The Manichean combativeness of Negritude is absent from early collections such as Un champ d'iles (A Field of Islands, 1953) and La terre inquiète (The Anxious Land, 1954). The dense poetic meditations of these early works contain the essence of Glissant's literary project, which is not about providing ideological answers but posing questions "dans la lumière trop diffuse, quand la connaissance est possible et toujours future" (in the too diffuse light when knowing is possible and always to come). Increasingly, Glissant turned from poetry to poetics, from books of poems to poetically derived theory reflecting the larger postcolonial trend in the francophone Caribbean away from poetry that no longer occupies the place it did in the mid-20th c.

Poetry may be overshadowed by prose, but it still retains its prestige because of the need for narrative to reach beyond realistic description. For instance, the novelist Daniel Maximin's L'invention des desirades (The Invention of Desirada, 2000) addresses both Caribbean space, as the title suggests, and the need for a verbal inventiveness made possible by poetic lang. Other Antillean writers who attempt to voice the Glissantian ideal of dream space anchored in the real are the prolific Henri Corbin (b. 1934) in works such as Lieux d'ombre (Shadow Places, 1991) and Plongée au gré des deuils (Descent into the Currents of Loss, 1999) and the densely experimental poet Monchoachi (b. 1946) in L'Espére-geste (The Awaited Gesture, 2003). Similar demands on poetic lang. were made by Haitian writers since the 1960s with the short-lived movement Haiti-Littéraire. René Philoctète (1932–90), Anthony Phelps (b. 1928), and Davertige (pseud. of Villard Denis, b. 1940), among others, reacted against the militant Marxist verse of Depestre and saw the early surrealist St. Aude as their literary forebear. The dense elliptical style of George Castera (b. 1936), who returned to Haiti after the fall of Duvalier in 1986, keeps this experimental trad. alive in his prize-winning collection Le trou du souffleur (The Prompter's Box, 2006).

IV. Spanish. The Hispanic Caribbean is comprised primarily of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and Puerto Rico. A strong case can be made for incl. in this cultural area the coastal zones of the Circum-Caribbean, i.e., the Gulf Coast of Mexico, the eastern coasts of the Central Am. nations, and the northern coasts of Colombia and Venezuela. However, given the paucity of major poets from these Circum-Caribbean regions, this section focuses on the three Hispanic states of the Greater Antilles. Cuba and the Dominican Republic are independent nations, while Puerto Rico is a "free associated state" of the U.S. Despite the political and economic differences among the three, a common hist. of Sp. colonialism and extractive economies (esp. the plantation), slavery, and racial and ethnic mixing has produced a certain cultural unity (Benítez Rojo).

The most notable features of the poetry of the Hispanic Caribbean are (1) a rich trad. of popular poetry in forms such as romances*, décimas*, and coplas* derived from the Sp. trad., as well as forms such as the son, derived from the syncretic Afro-Caribbean trad.; (2) the early introduction of romanticism and modernismo (in Cuba at least) relative to the rest of Latin America; (3) a rich trad. of Afro-Caribbean literary poetry; and (4) the introduction of the *neobaroque strain in Latin Am. letters.

A. From the Conquest to the Beginning of the Independence Movements. In contrast to Mexico and its archive of Nahuatl poetry from before and during the conquest, there are no examples of Taino poetry. The indigenous peoples of the Hispanic Caribbean were the first to encounter Sp. explorers and did not long survive that encounter. Chroniclers such as Gonzalo Fernández de Oviedo (Historia general y natural de las Indias, 1535) refer to Taino gatherings called areitos, dancing and singing rituals in which the recitation of poetry preserved a communal past. However, these poems are lost. The conquistadors were steeped in the poetic trad. of the romances. Many anthols. of these *ballads were published in 16th-c. Spain, although the typical method of transmission was oral. Mod. Dominican versions of traditional romances—presumably extant since the early colonial period—were collected in the 20th c. by Pedro Henríquez Ureña and by Edna Garrido.

Hispaniola was the center of Eur. cultural life in the early colonial period, and some of the earliest poems in the New World were written there, often in Lat. The first example of poesía culta (learned poetry) in the Hispanic Caribbean is an *ode written in Lat. by Bishop Alessandro Geraldini to celebrate the construction of the cathedral of Santo Domingo in 1523.

Meanwhile, 16th-c. Spain experienced a revolution in poetic form, as the It. hendecasyllable line, the terza rima and ottava rima* stanza forms, the *sonnet, and other models out of *Petrarchism were imported to Spain by Juan Boscán and Garcilaso de la Vega. These forms—and the courtly ideals and modes of behavior they expressed—quickly became absorbed into the trad. of poesía culta and appeared in the New World. Early examples are the sonnets of the earliest known female poet of the Americas, the nun Sor Leonor de Ovando (fl. 1575).

Most critics would agree that the first major poem of the Hispanic Caribbean trad. is the Espejo de paciencia (Mirror of Patience, 1608), a historical *epic written by the Canarian Silvestre de Balboa y Troya de Quesada (1563–1647?), a resident of Puerto Príncipe (mod.-day Camagüey), Cuba. Written in ottava rima, the epic is notable on at least two accounts. First, it is preceded by six laudatory sonnets by local dignitaries, which reflect the existence of an intellectual circle or literary academy in the area of Puerto Príncipe in the early colonial period, surprising given the political marginality of the locale. Second, the poet mixes cl. Gr. mythology with local places and flora (González Echevarría). For Cuban intellectuals, the Espejo de paciencia is one of the foundational texts of a transcultural national idiom, of lo cubano (Vitier 1958). Inasmuch as hybridity is often seen as a key aspect of the Latin Am. *baroque (el Barroco de Indias or "baroque of the Indies"), the Espejo de paciencia is viewed as one of the earliest instances.

Of the poets writing in the 17th and 18th cs. in the Hispanic Caribbean, none enjoys the stature of the Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz or even of the Sp. poet in colonial Peru Juan del Valle y Caviedes. Although of little significance outside their country of origin and the search for beginnings, for the 17th c. one can mention the Puerto Rican criollo (creole) poet Francisco de Ayerra y Santa María (1630–1708) and the Seville-born Dominican Fernando Díez de Leiva (fl. 1582), and in the 18th c., the Puerto Rican satirist Miguel Cabrera, and the Cuban poets Juan Miguel Castro Palomino (1722–88), José Rodríguez Ucres (known as Capacho, d. before 1788), and Félix Veranés, among others. It is not until the late 18th and early 19th cs. that poets of relevance for the mod. period appear, foremost among them the neoclassical Cuban poet Manuel Zequeira (1764–1846), whose "Oda a la piña" (Ode to the Pineapple, 1808) is a testimony to the growing importance of local landscape and culture.

B. The Nineteenth Century: Romanticism, Modernismo, and the Struggle for Independence. While romanticism in Germany and England took root at the end of the 18th c. and the beginning of the 19th, it is a somewhat later phenomenon in France, Italy, and Spain. As a general rule, it appears even later in Latin America, coinciding generally with the end of the wars of independence and the early postwar years but stretching across the 19th c. Yet the major Hispanic Caribbean poet of the romantic period and one of the most important romantic poets in the Sp. lang., the Cuban José María Heredia (1803–39), was a poetic innovator who had already composed many of his major poems by the mid-1820s. Like many other Latin Am. romantics, Heredia was inspired by revolutionary politics; he spent many years in exile for his political activities and commitment to Cuban independence. Heredia's poetry breaks with the balanced tone and measured pace of his neoclassical antecedents. Like many romantics, he represents nature as an overwhelming force that awes him and puts him in contact with the divine. Nature is bound as well to the native country and embodies the desire for independence and autochthony. Other major poets of the first wave of romanticism in Cuba include Gertrudis de Avellaneda (1814–73), better known as a dramatist and novelist (esp. for the antislavery novel Sab [1841], 11 years earlier than Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin); the mulatto poet Gabriel de la Concepción Valdés (known as Plácido, 1809–44), author of the romance "Jicotencatl" (1838) and a number of exceptional letrillas* (incl. "La flor de la caña" [The Flower of the Sugar Cane], 1838), and José Jacinto Milanés (1814–63), a reclusive autodidact who was also a playwright. A second wave of romantic poets in Cuba around midcentury includes Rafael María de Mendive (1821–86), leader of an important tertulia (salon) and teacher of José Martí; Joaquín Lorenzo Luaces (1826–67); Juan Clemente Zenea (1832–71); and Luisa Pérez de Zambrana (1837–1922). Of these, Zenea is the most noteworthy, known both for his *love poetry (esp. the elegiac "Fidelia," 1860) and his patriotic verse. His involvement in the movement for Cuban independence resulted in repeated exile and, finally, execution.

The romantic movement in Puerto Rico coincides largely with this second wave of Cuban romantics. The standout is José Gautier Benítez (1851–80), who died young of tuberculosis but managed to produce many of the best-known patriotic verses of 19th-c. Puerto Rico. Having studied in Toledo, he knew Sp. poetry well, esp. that of Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer. The object of his love, however, tends to be the island; nostalgia and longing are the dominant themes of his work. Many Puerto Rican poets of the second half of the century continued in the romantic mode and, like the Cuban romantics, were similarly involved in the island's movement for independence. Lola Rodríguez de Tío (1843–1924) is notable as the first Puerto Rican woman poet with an extensive body of work and a strong believer in independence. Author of the original lyrics to "La Boriqueña" (1868), the national *anthem, she cultivated the stanza form called the copla. Francisco Gonzalo Marín (known as Pachín, 1863–97) ended up as a fierce militant for independence, a friend and collaborator of José Martí, after beginning his political life working for a limited autonomy from Spain. His best-known poems (from Romances [1892], and En la arena [1898]) are clearly in the patriotic mode.

One of the most interesting features of 19th-c. Hispanic Caribbean lit. is the movement toward a local, nativist poetry, emphasizing nature, country folk, the indigenous peoples who lived in the region at the time of the conquest, and popular poetic forms such as the copla and the décima. This autochthonous, criollista poetry played a significant role in the construction of national cultures at a time when the islands of the Hispanic Caribbean remained, with the Philippines, Spain's last colonies. In Puerto Rico, Manuel Alonso's (1822–89) book El gíbaro (1849) is an early representative of cuadros de costumbres (literary sketches of customs) mixed with creolist poetry that adopts the perspective and dialect of the poor campesinos, while Daniel de Rivera's (1824–58?) "Agueynaba el bravo" (Agueynaba the Brave, 1854) expressed a fervor for latter-day political independence through the representation of a historical indigenous theme. Indeed, for José Fornaris (1827–90), creator of the siboneyista movement in Cuba, the theme of the indigenous inhabitants was appropriate at that moment because the early inhabitants of the island felt the same love of nature and suffered under Sp. oppression as did mod. Cubans. Fornaris's 1855 Cantos del Siboney was one of the most popular books of poetry of the time. However, the décimas of Juan Cristóbal Nápoles Fajardo (known as El Cucalambé, 1829–62?), published in his only book of poetry, Rumores del Hórmigo (Sounds of Hórmigo, 1856), are the culmination of the movement, inasmuch as they seemed to give voice to country folk (the guajiros) and quickly became part of popular culture. In the Dominican Republic, the country's major romantic poet, José Joaquín Pérez (1845–1900), wrote in this indigenous vein in his "Fantasías indígenas" (Indigenous Fantasies, 1877), while Juan Antonio Alix (1833–1918) was a more popular poet who cultivated the décima in the country dialect of the Cibao region.

In the Caribbean, as is often the case in Latin America, schools of poetry that in Europe tended to follow each other in rough succession and in reaction overlapped and coexisted. Thus, in the Dominican Republic, Salomé Ureña (1850–97) followed neoclassical precepts late into the 19th c. and is known for her well-constructed civic verse, incl. the hymn to tropical nature "La llegada del invierno" (The Arrival of Winter) and the elegiac "Ruinas." Influenced by the educator and philosopher Eugenio María de Hostos, she founded the first center of higher education for women on the island.

Associated most often internationally with the name of its most vocal exponent, the Nicaraguan Rubén Darío, the literary movement modernismo took the Hispanic world of letters by storm at the end of the 19th c.. Cuba boasts two of the earliest modernista writers in Martí (1853–95) and Julián del Casal (1863–93), and the first clearly modernista work, Martí's small volume of verse titled Ismaelillo (1882), which preceded Darío's Azul . . . by six years. Active on political and literary fronts, Martí was the major catalyst of the last Cuban War of Independence from Spain (1895–98) and would likely have become the first president of the Cuban Republic if he had not been killed early in the conflict. A writer in many genres, he published two volumes of poetry in his lifetime (Ismaelillo and Versos sencillos [Simple Verses], 1892) and left several mss. of poetry at his death (Versos libres, Flores del destierro, and uncollected verse), which were published posthumously. Martí also edited magazines such as the literary La edad de oro, a magazine for children, and Patria, a magazine dedicated to Cuban independence from Spain. Like most of the major modernista poets, Martí observed the important currents of Fr. poetry (*Parnassianism and symbolism, in particular) as well as the classic Sp. trad., but as he argues in the important essay "Nuestra América" (1891), he emphatically rejected servile imitation of foreign models. Thus, while he embraced the Parnassian attention to form and love of color, he yoked it to the symbolist enthusiasm for the image and suggestion, while also underscoring the social involvement of the poet and the social relevance of verse. This unique combination of elements distances his poetry from the elitist *aestheticism of Darío's Azul . . . and Prosas profanas, as well as from the verse of Casal, José Asunción Silva, Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera, and the other early modernistas.

While Ismaelillo consecrated Martí as one of the leading voices of the new poetry, it was the Versos sencillos that garnered the respect and adulation of a more general public, with the apparent simplicity of its themes—nature, friendship, sincerity—and a traditional *octosyllable. However, the volume only seems simple. The attention to form results at times in a complex mirroring of signifier and signified, and the book is filled with startling, multivalent images. Between the two, highly polished books that Martí published, he wrote the poems he called his Versos libres (Free Verse, 1882), first published posthumously in 1913. These are generally written in what he called "hirsute hendecasyllables," and like most hendecasyllabic poetry in Sp., they seem more sonorous and philosophically weighty than the shorter verse forms. One of Martí's most personal, expressionistic works, the book emphasizes above all a certain disorderly authenticity of emotion and form, heralding the works of 20th-c. poets like Neruda. Martí is clearly the most important poet and writer of the Hispanic Caribbean in the 19th c. and an influence on poets and political thinkers to the present day.

The other major modernista poet of the region is Casal, also Cuban but very different from Martí. Whereas Martí led a political life from a young age and entered into conflicts with the Sp. colonial authorities that led to prison, exile, and a peripatetic existence, Casal led a literary and sedentary city life, leaving Havana only for one brief trip to Spain. Collaborator in a number of literary and popular magazines (above all, La Habana Elegante and the popular La Caricatura), Casal published three books of poetry: Hojas al viento (Leaves to the Wind, 1890), Nieve (Snow, 1891), and Bustos y rimas (Busts and Rhymes, 1893). This last work was published after his early death from tuberculosis, just short of his 30th birthday. Influenced greatly by Charles Baudelaire and the Fr. Parnassians, enthralled by the paintings of Gustave Moreau that he recreated in a series of ten sonnets ("Mi museo ideal," My Ideal Museum), Casal echoes these models but transforms them into something new. Firmly within the aestheticist vein of modernismo and apparently distanced from the sociopolitical realities of his time, he has too often been contrasted with a "virile," socially engaged Martí and discounted as artificial, effete, and somehow less Cuban (by Vitier, among many others). Recently critics and younger Cuban poets have analyzed Casal through the lens of queer theory and deconstructed the Martí/Casal dichotomy (Montero, Morán), creating a much richer picture of this fine poet. Bonifacio Byrne (1861–1936) is Cuba's third modernista and author of the immensely popular patriotic poem "Mi bandera" (My Flag, 1901).

Modernismo arrived late in Puerto Rico, in part because of the Sp.-Am. War of 1898 but had strong adherents in José de Diego (1866–1918), Virgilio Dávila (1869–1943), and above all Luis Lloréns Torres (1876–1944). In tune with the patriotic, mundonovista strain of the later Darío, these poets adopted the stylistic innovations of the modernistas to exalt their native land (see esp. Lloréns Torres's 1913 poem "Canción de las Antillas"). In reaction to the U.S. invasion of 1898, they show a strong desire to defend what they perceive to be the essences of Puerto Ricanness. Reflecting their generally patrician roots, they cultivate a strong Hispanophilia in their work, and the theme of the jíbaro (country dweller supposedly of white, Hispanic ancestry) recurs. In the Dominican Republic, modernismo is also belated and dictates the style of poets such as Fabio Fiallo (1866–1942) and Enrique Henríquez (1859–1940), but the major figure at the turn of the 20th century is Gastón Fernando Deligne (1861–1913), a psychological realist in the mode of the Sp. poet Ramón de Campoamor. His poem "Ololoi" (1907) is a stirring meditation on the conflict between liberty and the oppression of dictatorship.

C. The Twentieth Century and Beyond. While two important poets, Regino E. Boti (1878–1958) and José Manuel Poveda (1888–1926), were active in the first decades of the First Cuban Republic, these were quiet times for poetry. Boti in particular matures in his style from the modernismo of his first book, Arabescos mentales (Mental Arabesques, 1913), through his most coherent collection, El mar y la montaña (The Sea and the Mountains, 1921), to the avant-garde verses of Kodak-Ensueño (Kodak Daydream, 1928) and Kindergarten (1930). The poetic scene gained complexity during the difficult 1920s, with the introduction of the avant-garde at a time of increased political instability, economic troubles, and the ferment of student and workers' movements. The Grupo Minorista, incl. the painter Eduardo Abela, the future novelist Alejo Carpentier, the essayists Jorge Mañach and Juan Marinello, and the poets José Zacarías Tallet (1893–1989) and Rubén Martínez Villena (1899–1934), was primarily responsible for the introduction of the avant-garde in Cuba; a number of these figures edited the major avant-garde jour. Revista de Avance (1927–30). The experimental avant-garde was short lived, however, and was quickly replaced by two major trends: social poetry with early contributions from Felipe Pichardo Moya (1892–1957), Agustín Acosta (1886–1979), and Regino Pedroso (1896–1983; "Salutación fraterna al taller mecánico" [Fraternal Salutation to the Garage], 1927); and *pure poetry, inspired by the theories of Henri Bremond and exemplified most clearly by the poetry of Mariano Brull (1891–1956; Poemas en menguante [Waning Poems], 1928, and Solo de rosa [Only Rose], 1941), Eugenio Florit (1903–99; Trópico, 1930; and Doble acento [Double Accent], 1937), and Emilio Ballagas (1908–54; Júbilo y fuga [Joy and Flight], 1931; and Sabor eterno [Eternal Taste], 1939). Brull is known for his focus on sound, esp. the jitanjáfora*, a playful use of nonsemantic sounds to achieve rhythmic effects in poetry, while Ballagas was one of the earliest practitioners of literary afrocubanismo.

The avant-garde is poorly represented in the Dominican Republic, although some critics (Gutiérrez) have alleged that Vigil Díaz's (1880–1961) "movement" vedrinismo, announced in 1912, preceded Vicente Huidobro's *creationism by a few years. Lacking a true *manifesto and with ultimately only two adherents, vedrinismo is responsible for the introduction of *free verse into Dominican poetry, with Díaz's 1917 poem "Arabesco." The most important Dominican movement of the 1920s—Domingo Moreno Jimenes (1894–1986), Rafael Augusto Zorrilla (1892–1937), and Andrés Aveliño's (1900–74) Postumismo—had an ambiguous relationship with the avant-garde. Intent on creating a more mod. and more Dominican poetry (a reaction in part to the U.S. occupation of the island from 1916 to 1924), they consciously broke with what they considered an outmoded, Eurocentric national trad., cultivating free verse and opening poetic lang. to a wider register. In this rupture with trad., they were clearly avant-garde, although they programmatically rejected the acrobacia azul (blue acrobatics) of the more experimental "isms" (Manifiesto postumista), as well as the masterworks of the Western trad. Moreno Jimenes (1894–1986) was the undisputed leader of the group. His poetry is avowedly colloquial and populist, although his most moving works are profoundly personal poems that address the theme of death ("Poema de la hija reintegrada" [Poem for the Reintegrated Daughter], 1934).

In Puerto Rico, the avant-garde found early adherents in two movements. The first, Diepalismo, launched in 1921, was an ephemeral movement led by its only two practitioners, José I. de Diego Padró (1899–1974) and Luis Palés Matos (1898–1959), who privileged *onomatopoeia as the basis for radically new verse. (The name of the group is a combination of the patronymics of the two poets.) The other avant-garde movement, of more lasting consequence, took the bombastic title of El atalaya de los dioses (Watchtower of the Gods) and was led from 1928 on by the gifted poet and radical nationalist Clemente Soto Vélez (1905–93). Intent on breaking with a "mummified" trad., these poets rebelled against the remnants of modernismo as well as *realism and academic poetry. Like many of the other atalayistas, Soto Vélez was involved early on in the militant nationalist movement led by Pedro Albizu Campos and finally settled in New York. His later works, Abrazo interno (Internal Embrace, 1954), Árboles (Trees, 1955), Caballo de palo (Wooden Horse, 1959), and La tierra prometida (Promised Land, 1979), continued to engage in ling. experimentalism and to exploit the surreal images of the avant-garde (see SURREALISM).

Two other poets who came of age poetically among the avant-garde in the 1910s and 1920s deserve mention. Evaristo Ribera Chevremont (1896–1976) was not affiliated with any movement but early on was much influenced by the reigning modernista movement and the Hispanophilia of writers such as Lloréns Torres. After five years in Spain, where he was in direct contact with *ultraism and Huidobro's creationism, he returned to the island as an ardent supporter of the avant-garde. He is widely credited with introducing free verse to the national poetry and, with a career spanning six decades, is one of the most prolific of Puerto Rican poets. Juan Antonio Corretjer (1908–85), a fellow member of the Atalaya group, spent five years in a U.S. prison for his work with Albizu Campos's Nationalist Party. Committed at first to the nationalist project and later to the creation of a socialist state, his poetry is a "telluric neocriollismo" that combines the Latin Americanism of the late Darío with the epic ambition of Lloréns Torres (Márquez). The avant-garde is not just a historically delimited movement but a rupturalist, modernizing attitude that can recur at any moment. José María Lima (1934–2009) of the Generation of the 1960s and Joserramón Melendes (b. 1952) of the Generation of the 1970s both exemplify an experimentalist, avant-garde mode.

The Afro-Caribbean poetic movement called negrismo, poesía negra, poesía afroantillana, or in Cuba, afrocubanismo constitutes one of the most significant devels. in 20th-c. Latin Am. poetry. Incl. poetry both about and by Afro-Caribbeans, it comes into being in the mid-1920s and culminates in the 1930s and 1940s. It is an essential part of a regionalist vein of avant-garde poetry, with analogues in Federico García Lorca's Andalusian gypsy ballads and Jorge Luis Borges's early ultraísta verse, and it took energy from parallel movements in the U.S. (the Harlem Renaissance) and Eur. interest in the "primitive" and all things Af. Palés

Matos began publishing his "black" poems in literary magazines in 1925, although they were not collected until the much later publication of his Tuntún de pasa y grifería: Poesía afroantillana (Tomtom of Kinky Hair and Black Things: Afro-Antillean Poetry, 1937). Like Ballagas, Ramón Guirao (1908–49), and some of the early cultivators of afrocubanista poetry in Cuba, Palés Matos was white and has been criticized by some as creating stereotypical images of Afro-Caribbean peoples. Nevertheless, his poetry has been immensely popular in Puerto Rico and elsewhere; rhythmic and onomatopoeic, it is esp. apt for recitation or declamation. This poetry responds to a vision of the nation as syncretic and transcultural and was daring at the time in light of the racist attitudes of many of the creole elite who saw the essence of Puerto Ricanness in the island's Hispanic—i.e., not Af.—heritage (Pedreira), when that cultural complex was experiencing the disintegrating influence of an overwhelming U.S. economic and political imperialism. Recent critics have done much to clarify Palés's historical specificity and his ludic irony and to give a balanced appreciation of his work beyond the poesía afroantillana (López Baralt, Ríos Avila).

In Cuba, Afro-Cuban poets (Plácido and Manzano [1797–1854], in particular) had been publishing since the romantic period, but afrocubanismo begins with the publication of Ramón Guirao's poem "Bailadora de rumba" (Rumba Dancer) in early 1928, followed soon after by Tallet's "La rumba." The next decade saw a flood of poems on Afro-Cuban themes, by both black and white poets. The most important and enduring of these was Nicolás Guillén (1902–89), whose early collections adapted the Afro-Cuban syncretic musical form of the "son" to literary language. His Motivos de son (Motifs from the "Son," 1930), Sóngoro cosongo (1931), and West Indies, Ltd. (1934) are clearly within the afrocubanista vein. By Guillén's second book, he is already proclaiming mulatez or the mixing of black and white as the essential process forming Cuban national culture, challenging the widely accepted view of national culture as rooted in the Hispanic and symbolized by the country folk or guajiros. This poetry signals the beginning of a sea change in race relations and notions of national belonging. Although afrocubanismo as a literary movement was largely over by the late 1930s, Guillén continued to publish and evolve as a poet. His poetry shows a sophisticated understanding of the trad. and possibilities of Sp. verse forms, from the Afro-Cuban son to the *alexandrine sonnet to *elegies, ballads, and all the way to the postmod. *pastiche. He links this lyrical skill to an authentic concern for social justice, racial equality, and historical analysis, which first alienated him from the dictatorial Batista regime and later made him a favorite of the Cuban Revolution. His poetry, however, has enduring importance, above and beyond any political affiliation.

At this time, the Dominican Republic was suffering under the dictatorship of one of the most brutal and long-lived regimes in Latin America, that of Rafael Leónidas Trujillo (1930–61). Many of the major poets in the post-avant-garde period wrote some of their most important works in exile, incl. two that align with the poesía negra, Manuel del Cabral (1907–99) and Tomás Hernández Franco (1904–52). Del Cabral is one of the towering figures of 20th-c. Dominican poetry and has often been compared to the major figures of the Latin Am. avant-garde such as César Vallejo, Neruda, Huidobro, and Guillén. His Ocho poemas negros (Eight Black Poems, 1935) and Trópico negro (1941) were signal contributions to the devel. of Dominican negrismo, although it is his book centered on the figure of the campesino from the Cibao region, Compadre Mon (1942), that has garnered the most critical attention. Del Cabral is a protean poet with a plethora of styles and subject matter, incl. the later devel. of a deep metaphysical strain (esp. in Los huéspedes secretos [Secret Guests], 1950) and a strong anti-imperialist stance (La isla ofendida [The Offended Island], 1965). Franco is known primarily for the mythical epic Yelidá (1942), where he insists on the superiority of racial mixing embodied in a sensual mulata born of a Norwegian expatriate and a Haitian woman.

In the Cuba of the latter half of the 1930s, as the afrocubanismo movement was losing momentum, a singular poet, José Lezama Lima (1910–76), transformed the poetic scene with the publication of his first poem, Muerte de Narciso (Death of Narcissus, 1937). Stimulated by his readings in the Sp. Golden Age poets but forging its own style, Lezama Lima's poetry baffled critics with its *difficulty, its *artifice, and its seeming distance from the sociopolitical realities of the time. He followed this first publication with four more books of poetry over the next four decades: Enemigo rumor (Enemy Rumor, 1941), Aventuras sigilosas (Stealthy Adventures, 1945), La fijeza (Fixity, 1949), and Dador (Giver, 1960). His final collection, Fragmentos a su imán (Fragments to Their Magnet), was published posthumously in 1977. Lezama Lima often takes other works of art as his starting point; his work in general is densely allusive and assimilative. Some of his best poems ("Rapsodia para el mulo" [Rhapsody for the Mule], "Pensamientos en La Habana" [Thoughts in Havana]) have much to say about Cuban national identity and the neocolonial dynamics of the time. While showing a penchant for expansive free verse, he also exploited a variety of poetic forms (the *prose poem, the sonnet, the décima) over the course of his career, and although he is largely faithful to the neobaroque difficulty he first embraced in Muerte de Narciso, the later, posthumous poems are more luminous and personal. Lezama Lima became more known outside Cuba in the 1960s, after the publication of his monumental novel Paradiso (1966). In fact, there is no clear line between his poetic production and his prose, and Paradiso is considered by many to be the clearest exposition of the poetic system developed in his poetry and his rich body of essays. Lezama Lima's importance to Cuban and Latin Am. lit. is based in part on his own production and in part on his role as ed. of a series of influential literary jours.; the most important of these was Orígenes (1944–56). This jour. was the focal point for a group of writers, artists, musicians, and critics, incl. the poets Virgilio Piñera (1912–79), Cintio Vitier (1921–2009), Eliseo Diego (1920–94), Fina García Marruz (b. 1923), and Gastón Baquero (1914–97). Each of these Origenistas is an important figure in his or her own right. Of these, Piñera, a reluctant and confrontational member of the group, is best known as a novelist, short-story writer, and dramatist, although his important long poem La isla en peso (The Whole Island, 1943) bears comparison to high points of Caribbean poetry such as Césaire's Cahier d'un retour au pays natal and Del Cabral's Compadre Mon in its negative vision of an asphyxiating island life (Anderson). After Lezama Lima, Diego is perhaps the most gifted poet, deservedly well-known outside Cuba for collections such as En la Calzada de Jesús del Monte (On Jesús del Monte Avenue, 1949), Por los extraños pueblos (Through Strange Towns, 1958), Muestrario del mundo o Libro de las maravillas de Boloña (Showcase of the World or Book of the Wonders of Boloña, 1968), and Los días de tu vida (The Days of Your Life, 1977).

In the late 1950s and after the triumph of the Cuban Revolution in 1959, the Origenista poets—esp. Lezama Lima—were roundly criticized for their supposed escapism and lack of social concern. Younger poets gathered around the polemical figure of Piñera and a series of jours. that took the place of Orígenes as major venues for Cuban poetry and lit. crit. (Ciclón, Lunes de Revolución). The Cuban Revolution in general had a profound impact on the state of poetry. On the one hand, there was initially a widespread enthusiasm for democratization and social justice (incl. educational reform and a literacy campaign), and poetry and art in general were seen by many as tools in this collective project. On the other hand, the cultural politics of the Castro regime favored direct communication with the masses and support of the revolutionary agenda, and this support became more and more compulsory over the course of the first two decades after 1959. As a result, the group of poets known as the Generation of the 1950s, as well as younger poets that came of age in the 1960s and 1970s, shared a colloquial diction and conversational tone. Of this earlier generation, Roberto Fernández Retamar (b. 1930) stands out for his poetry (Con las mismas manos, 1949–1962 [With These Same Hands] and Hemos construido una alegría olvidada, 1949–1988 [We Have Built a Forgotten Joy], among many other volumes), influential essays (esp. "Calibán," 1971), and the direction of the important cultural magazine Casa de las Américas.

Among poets who began publishing in the 1960s, Heberto Padilla (1932–2000) and Nancy Morejón (b. 1944) have received the most critical attention. Padilla, at first an ardent supporter of the revolution whose early volume El justo tiempo humano (A Just Human Time, 1962) has much in common with Retamar's poetry and intellectual stance, arrived at a much more critical attitude in his 1968 Fuera del juego (Out of the Game), a complex, ironic collection that won an important prize that year in Cuba but catapulted Padilla into conflict with the regime. Three years later, he was detained for supposedly counterrevolutionary activities, prompting a firestorm of criticism of the Cuban government by prominent Latin Am. and Eur. intellectuals, many of whom had previously been positive toward the revolution. Ultimately released from prison after a public self-criticism, Padilla was incessantly watched in the years that followed and allowed to leave the island for the U.S. only in 1980. In the U.S., he published two bilingual collections, Legacies (1982) and A Fountain, a House of Stone (1991), which confirmed his status as a strong poet in the conversational mode. Morejón follows in a line of important Cuban women poets such as García Marruz and Dulce María Loynaz (1902–97), but her closest model is Guillén. Of Afro-Cuban descent, Morejón began publishing after the revolution, and she has remained faithful to its ideals over the years. Author of the much anthologized poems "Mujer negra" (Black Woman) and "Amo a mi amo" (I Love My Owner), she has given women of Afro-Cuban ancestry a critical visibility they lacked in the past. Three other poets of the era 1959–80 deserve mention, although they have published the majority of their work outside the island: Severo Sarduy (1937–93), José Kozer (b. 1940), and Reinaldo Arenas (1943–90). The first two are consummate practitioners of the neobaroque mode initiated by Lezama Lima. Although known primarily as a novelist, Sarduy in his finely crafted poetry adopts the stanzaic forms and the diction of the baroque while referring to novel themes such as homosexual love or the gods of the Cuban syncretic religion, Santería. Kozer's poetry, neobaroque in its complexity, is a moving testimony to his Cuban-Jewish roots. Arenas is also primarily a novelist, but his epic poem "El central" is both daringly experimental in form and radical in its bitter denunciation of oppression.

During the 1940s in the Dominican Republic, a group emerged which shared some characteristics with the Cuban Origenistas, although lacking poets of the stature of Lezama Lima, Piñera, or Diego. This is the Poesía sorprendida (Surprised Poetry) group, which coalesced around the jour. of the same name, pub. 1943–47, and which programmatically left behind the traditional Dominican emphasis on autochthony. Openly assimilative, avowedly universalist, these poets embraced a wide range of world lit. The most important members of the group were Franklin Mieses Burgos (1907–76), Aída Cartagena Portalatín (1918–94), Freddy Gatón Arce (1920–94), Manuel Rueda (1921–99), and Antonio Fernández Spencer (1922–95), many of whom were quite prolific (esp. Gatón Arce, the most surrealist of these). Given the repressive nature of the Trujillo government, most of these poets adopted an oblique style and avoided direct criticism of Dominican society or the regime. Several other important Dominican poets active at this time did not affiliate with the sorprendida group, incl. the aforementioned del Cabral and Hernández Franco as well as Héctor Incháustegui Cabral (1912–79) and Pedro Mir (1913–2000). All these are social poets in the best sense of the term. Incháustegui Cabral's best-known collection is Poemas de una sola angustia (Poems of a Single Anguish, 1940), in which he took on the cause of the poor and powerless and leveled a rather direct critique at the Trujillo regime. When he was not punished for this by the dictator, he lost faith in the power of poetry to effect political change; he later became one of the few intellectuals who collaborated actively in the government. Mir, on the other hand, was consistent in his critique of Dominican elites and the Trujillo dictatorship, at the price of exile. An identification with poor workers and a spirited denunciation of U.S. imperialism is evident in most of his poetry. Recognized abroad as one of the most important voices of the Hispanic Caribbean, he gains his reputation primarily from Hay un país en el mundo (There Is a Country in the World, 1949) and the Contracanto a Walt Whitman (1952). The next few generations, the poets of the 1960s and the postwar group, were caught up in the political turmoil of that eventful decade. Their poetry is more often more political than literary. The exceptions are Alexis Gómez Rosa (b. 1950) and Cayo Claudio Espinal (b. 1955), both of whom have matured into exceptional poets unafraid of experimentation.

While Puerto Rico had no group comparable to Cuba's Orígenes or the Dominican Republic's Poesía sorprendida from the late 1930s to the 1950s, it produced two singular poets, Francisco Matos Paoli (1915–2000) and Julia de Burgos (1914–53). Matos Paoli's prolific work extends from the 1930s to the mid-1990s and shows a keen appreciation for Sp. Golden Age poets and the Generation of 1927 (esp. Jorge Guillén), along with Mallarmé and the Fr. symbolists. An ardent nationalist, he was arrested for his support of the 1950 uprising and sentenced to 30 years of prison in San Juan, although he was released in 1955 after a mental breakdown in long periods of solitary confinement. His work is characterized by its adherence to the precepts of pure poetry and its *hermeticism. De Burgos launched her career in 1937 with Poemas exactos a mí misma (Exact Poems to Myself), followed by Poema en veinte surcos (Poem in Twenty Furrows, 1938) and Canción de la vida sencilla (Song of the Simple Life, 1939). In the early 1940s, she completed El mar y tú (The Sea and You), although it was not published until 1954, a year after her early death in poverty in New York from alcoholism, depression, and illness. Thoroughly nationalist, De Burgos's most famous poems (such as "Río Grande de Loíza") express a yearning for a fusion with the island landscape, esp. the waters of rivers and sea, a theme that has made her quite popular. Her later verse anticipates the alienation of the Latino immigrant in the impersonal cities of the U.S. and, in its nonconformism, prepares for the feminist poets of the 1960s and 1970s such as Rosario Ferré (b. 1938) and Olga Nolla (1938–2001), as well as the younger Vanessa Droz (b. 1952), all of whom continued to publish important collections into the late 1990s and beyond. Of the same generation as Droz, Manuel Ramos Otero (1948–90) was a complex, iconoclastic writer who deserves to be better known outside the island. Writing from an openly gay perspective, he engages the Sp. baroque trad. in expressionist meditations on death and disease (notably the AIDS epidemic) in his posthumous Invitación al polvo (Invitation to Dust, 1991). José Luis Vega (b. 1948), and Aurea María Sotomayor (b. 1951), also of this generation, are important critics as well as poets. Sotomayor's Diseño del ala (Wing Design, 2005) confirms her as a major voice in Caribbean poetry more generally.

Of the younger poets, the Cuban Generation of the 1980s has several standouts, incl. Juan Carlos Flores (b. 1962), Damaris Calderón (b. 1967), Víctor Fowler Calzada (b. 1960), and Antonio José Ponte (b. 1964), among others; several of these are also noted essayists. Reina María Rodríguez (b. 1952) and Francisco Morán (b. 1952), although older than this group, have been close fellow travelers and unifying figures. These writers have not shied away from hermetic lang., eroticism, and philosophical questions and have actively engaged an antihegemonic, less obviously political strand of the Cuban poetic trad. (Julián del Casal, Lezama Lima, and Virgilio Piñera, as opposed to Martí and Guillén). In Puerto Rico, the same generation has resistantly engaged the postmod., recognizing the failure of the dreams of independence and of socialism, while also seeing the pitfalls of neoliberalism (Martińez-Márquez and Cancel). The most important figures here are Rafael Acevedo (b. 1960), Eduardo Lalo (b. 1960), and Mayra Santos Febres (b. 1966). Lalo's postmod. cultural critiques (Dónde [Where], 2005), combining photography and essay, add to the interest in this multifaceted artist. The dominant voice of the Generation of the 1980s in the Dominican Republic is José Mármol (b. 1960), poet and essayist, whose training as a philosopher is apparent in prose poems that embrace both ling. and conceptual difficulty.

No review of Hispanic Caribbean poetry would be complete without mention of poetry in Eng. or mixing Eng. and Sp., much of it written by immigrants to the U.S. or their descendants. For more here, see NUYORICAN POETRY.

See AFRICA, POETRY OF; AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY; AVANT-GARDE POETICS; COLONIAL POETICS; FRANCE, POETRY OF; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; JAZZ POETRY; POSTCOLONIAL POETICS; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS; SPAIN, POETRY OF; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ Dutch. Anthologies: Schwarzer Orpheus, ed. J. Jahn (1954); Creole Drum, ed. J. Voorhoeve and U. M. Lichtveld (1975); Cosecha Arubiano, ed. F. Booi et al. (1983); Spiegel van de Surinaamse poezie, ed. M. van Kempen (1995); "Special Issue: Caribbean Literature from Suriname, the Netherlands Antilles, Aruba, and the Netherlands," Callaloo 21.3 (1998); Literatura en español en Curazao al cambio del siglo: En busca de textos desconocidos de la segunda mitad del siglo XIX y de las primeras décadas del siglo XX, ed. L. Echteld (1999); Nieuwe oogst, ed. L. van Mulier (2002). Criticism and History: A. G. Broek, The Rise of a Caribbean Island's Literature (1990); F. R. Jones, "A Leak in the Silence: The Poetry of Hans Faverey"; M. van Kempen, "Vernacular Literature in Suriname"; and I. van Putte-de Windt, "Caribbean Poetry in Papiamentu," Callaloo 21 (1998); A. J. Arnold, A History of Literature in the Caribbean, v. 2 (2001)—esp. T. Damsteegt, "East Indian Surinamese Poetry and Its Languages"; V. February, "The Surinamese Muse: Reflections on Poetry"; and J. J. Oversteegen, "Strategies and Stratagems of Some Dutch-Antillean Writers"; I. Phaf-Rheinberger, "The Crystalline Essence of 'Dutch' Caribbean Literatures," Review 74 (2007).

■ English. Criticism and History: R. Abrahams The Man-of-Words in the West Indies (1983); L. Brown, West Indian Poetry (1984); P. A. Roberts, West Indians and Their Language (1988); A. Benitez, The Repeating Island: The Caribbean and the Postmodern Perspective, trans. J. E. Maranis (1992); E. Chamberlin, Come Back to Me My Language (1993); Dictionary of Caribbean English Usage, ed. S.R.R. Allsopp (1997); L. Breiner, An Introduction to West Indian Poetry (1998); E. A. Williams, Anglophone Caribbean Poetry, 1970–2001 (2002)—annotated bibl. Anthologies in English: E. K. Brathwaite, The Arrivants (1973); Penguin Book of Caribbean Verse in English, ed. P. Burnett (1986).

■ French. M. Condé, La Poesie Antillaise (1977); J. M. Dash, Literature and Ideology in Haiti (1981); G. Gouraige, Littérature et société en Haiti (1987); J. M. Dash, "Engagement, Exile and Errance: Some Trends in Haitian Poetry, 1946–1986," Callaloo 15 (1992); A History of Literature in the Caribbean, Vol. 1: Francophone and Hispanophone Regions, ed. A. James Arnold (1994); M. Gallagher, "Contemporary French Caribbean Poetry: The Poetics of Reference," Forum of Modern Language Studies 45 (2004).

■ Spanish. Anthologies: Versiones dominicanas de romances españoles, ed. E. Garrido (1946); Antología de la poesía cubana, ed. J. Lezama Lima, (1965); Lecturas puertorriqueñas: Poesía, ed. M. Arce de Vazquez, L. Gallego, L. de Arrigoitia (1968); Poesía criollista y siboneísta, ed. J. Orta Ruíz (1976); La Generación de los años 50, ed. L. Suardíaz and D. Cherición (1984); Antología de la literatura dominicana, ed. J. Alcántara Almánzar (1988); Publicaciones y opiniones de La Poesía Sorprendida (1988); Antología de poesía puertorriqueña, ed. R. A. Moreira (1992); Para entendernos: inventario poético puertorriqueño: Siglos XIX y XX, ed. E. Barradas (1992); Antología histórica de la poesía dominicana del siglo XX, 1912–1995, ed. F. Gutiérrez (1998); El límite volcado: Antología de la Generación de Poetas de los Ochenta, ed. A. Martínez-Márquez and M. R. Cancel (2000); La casa se mueve: Antología de la nueva poesía cubana, ed. A. Luque and J. Aguado (2000); Poesía cubana de la colonia, ed. S. Arias (2002); Poesía cubana del siglo XX, ed. J. J. Barquet and N. Codina (2002); Puerto Rican Poetry, ed. and trans. R. Márquez (2007). Criticism and History: M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Antología de poetas hispano-americanos, v. 1–4 (1894); A. S. Pedreira, Insularismo: Ensayos de interpretación puertorriqueña (1934); C. F. Pérez, Evolución poética dominicana (1956); C. Vitier, Lo cubano en la poesia (1958); P. Henríquez Ureña, "La cultura y las letras coloniales en Santo Domingo," Obra Crítica, ed. E. S. Speratti Piñero (1960); I. A. Schulman and M. P. González, Martí, Darío y el modernismo (1969); R. Friol, Suite para Juan Francisco Manzano (1977); J. Alcántara Almánzar, Estudios de poesía dominicana (1979); E. Saínz, Silvestre De Balboa y la literatura cubana (1982); Instituto de Literatura y Lingüística de la Academia de Ciencias de Cuba, Diccionario de la literatura cubana (1984); C. Vitier, Crítica cubana (1988); W. Luis, Literary Bondage: Slavery in Cuban Narrative (1990); V. Kutzinski, Against the American Grain: Myth and History in William Carlos Williams, Jay Wright, and Nicolás Guillén (1987); and Sugar's Secrets: Race and the Erotics of Cuban Nationalism (1993); R. González Echevarría, Celestina's Brood: Continuities of the Baroque in Spanish and Latin American Literatures (1993); O. Montero, Erotismo y representación en Julián del Casal (1993); The Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, ed. R. González Echevarría and E. Pupo-Walker, 2 v. (1996)—esp. A. Bush, "Lyric Poetry of the Eighteen and Nineteenth Centuries," v. 1; and J. Quiroga, "Spanish American Poetry from 1922 to 1975," v. 2; B. A. Heller, Assimilation/Generation/Resurrection: Contrapuntal Readings in the Poetry of José Lezama Lima (1997); M. López Baralt, El barco en la botella: La poesía de Luis Palés Matos (1997); R. Ríos Avila, "Hacia Palés," La raza cómica del sujeto en Puerto Rico (2002); E. Bejel, "Poetry," A History of Literature in the Caribbean: Hispanic and Francophone Regions, ed. A. J. Arnold, v. 1 (2004); T. F. Anderson, Everything in Its Place: The Life and Works of Virgilio Piñera (2006); M. Arnedo-Gómez, Writing Rumba: The Afrocubanista Movement in Poetry (2006); F. Morán, Julián Del Casal o los pliegues del deseo (2008).

I. Phaf-Rheinberger (Dutch); L. A. Breiner (Eng.); M. Dash (Fr.); B. A. Heller (Sp.)

CARMEN (Lat., "song" or "lyric"). Commonly used as in the title of Catullus's Carmina; occasionally, it had the broader meaning of "poetry," incl. *epic, drama, and lampoon (see INVECTIVE). Its broadest usage covered *prophetic poetry, *incantation, *hymn, *epitaph, *charm, and even legal formulas. The word seems to connote divine *inspiration, the song of the *poet as the agent of a god or muse, as in Horace's usage in the Odes. Ovid wrote cryptically that his banishment to Tomis by the Emperor Augustus was because of "carmen et error" (a poem and a mistake).

■ D. Norberg, "Carmen oder Rhythmus?" Au seuil du Moyen Âge II, ed. R. Jacobsson and F. Sandgren (1998).

R. A. Hornsby

CARMINA FIGURATA. The Lat. term means "shaped songs" and refers to poems in a figured format. In certain cases, this visual format is used to encode a secondary text within the composition that can be discerned by close reading of the graphical features. The vogue for shaped poetry waxes and wanes, with conspicuous periods of activity in cl. antiquity, the Middle Ages, the late Ren., and the 20th c., separated by long stretches of dormancy. The earliest known examples date back to cl. times where they are referred to as technopaegnia among the Greeks and carmina figurata among Lat. poets. The Gr. poet Simias of Rhodes (fl. ca. 300 BCE) created handwritten poems in the shape of Eros's wings and other figures that conformed to strict rules of syntax and metrics. The complexity of working with two sets of constraints, visual and verbal, lent an air of virtuosity to these poems. In the early 4th-c. court of Constantine the Great, Publilius Optatianus Porphyrius brought shaped poetry into the Lat. world. Seeking favor from the emperor, Porphyrius wrote (otherwise dreadful) *panegyrics using lines of varying length composed into visual images. In the early 9th c., the Abbot of Fulda, Hrabanus Maurus, composed one of the most renowned collections in carmina figurata format. Hrabanus was a student of Alcuin of York, the advisor to Charlemagne who was responsible for standardization of handwriting and script across the Carolingian empire. Maurus's much copied collection, In honorem Sanctae Crucis (In Honor of the Holy Cross), also known as De laudibus Sanctae Crucis (In Praise of the Holy Cross), includes 28 poems in which a square grid of text—thirty to forty letters wide and long—contains a poem in metrical Lat. that can be read left to right but like prose, since the lineation is not visible in this format. Certain words and phrases that run against the directionality of the underlying poem (e.g., "divino" spelled vertically, or "arcangeli" in a diagonal, wing-shaped pattern) are foregrounded by means of a graphic line that enclosed them in a shape or, in some presentations such as the influential edition by Jakob Wimpheling published at Pforzheim in 1503, red ink. Hrabanus's works, theologically complex and verbally rich, were ideally suited to this visual format, and lent credibility to the carmen figuratum. Elaborate labyrinths and shaped verse appeared after the invention of moveable type in the 15th c. The most prominent practitioner of later pattern poetry was George Herbert, a 17th-c. Anglican, whose posthumously published poems in the forms of angels' wings and an altar were among the last serious and substantive contributions to this genre. The linear constraints of letterpress meant that these works had to be created within the prevailing grid structure of a typographic form. Though the technology existed for more free-form work, the decision of the 20th-c. avant-garde poet Guillaume Apollinaire to break free of the underlying grid of letterpress technology in his *calligrammes came almost 500 years after the invention of printing.

■ C. Haeberlin, Carmina Figurata Graeca (1887); J. Adler and U. Ernst, Text als Figur (1987); D. Higgins, Pattern Poetry (1987); E. Ulrich, Carmen figuratum (1991); R. Maurus, In honorem Sanctae Crucis, ed. M. Perrin (1997); C. Chazell, The Crucified God in the Carolingian Era (2001).

J. Drucker

CAROL. Originally referring to a specific formal pattern for sung verse accompanying a dance, carol now means a festive or contemplative strophic song. Song and dance intersected in the med. carol: OF carole designated singing and dancing in a circle. In England, the carol maintained this identity as a dance song in the 13th and 14th cs.; Chaucer uses it to describe a combination of singing and dancing. The carol was a stanzaic song with a *burden, sometimes called a fote: short verses (often a couplet) that began the song and were repeated as a refrain but that were musically and narratively separate from the stanzas. Stanzas were regular within each carol but varied in form across carols. Performance practice dictated the stanza/burden form. A leader sang stanzas, and a chorus performed the burden as part of a round-dance. Harmonizing Christian feasts with older pagan rituals, the carol always figured in the solstice-associated Christmas and Easter holidays. Its content, however, ranged across religious, political, humorous, and other themes. Parallel devels. existed in the Sp. villancico and the It. lauda*, and Scotland had its own carol trad. The med. Eng. carol blended courtly and popular styles. The earlier carol's lyrics also sometimes drew attention to the singers and the act of performing.

While Scottish carols continued to imply both dancing and singing through the 16th c., the 15th-c. Eng. carol's associations with dance became increasingly attenuated. Even though its form continued to reflect this origin (as in John Audelay's carols), other elements began to contribute to the carol's identity. E.g., liturgy, *hymns, and processional music have been suggested as influences on the late ME carol. Disagreement surrounds the possible use of carols in processions; however, the late med. carol may have had other liturgical functions and certainly displayed other connections with religious culture (see LITURGICAL POETRY). Carols were frequently *macaronic, incorporating accentual Lat. verse. While some of these lines were commonly used phrases or composed for particular carols, others were taken from church services. Because of their similar structures, hymn material was most frequently excerpted in carols; however, the carol generally maintained musical independence from the hymn. In addition, the Franciscan order was instrumental in disseminating carols; both early and late Franciscan carols were probably used in preaching.

Between the 15th and 17th cs., the carol lost its earlier formal definition. The polyphonic carol gained popularity in the mid-15th through the early 16th cs. It may have substituted on feast days for the traditional Benedicamus verses sung at the end of the canonical hours. Other carols from this period were courtly rather than liturgical and more uniform in theme, as shown in the ms. of Robert Fayrfax (ca. 1500), which contains musically complex Passion carols. Ultimately, the Elizabethan *madrigal as a polyphonic form replaced the carol. During the 17th c., however, Catholic recusants upheld old trads. of music and dance in celebrating Christmas; a 1650s collection by Thomas Fairfax comprises the largest set of texts labeled as carols from this period. These Christmas songs, marking the period from Christmas to Candlemas, are carols only loosely, most lacking burdens. Over time and in the transmission from England to America, the carol has come to be associated particularly with Christmas. England, however, accommodates a broader range of songs within this definition, incl. Easter carols.

The carol's mod. preservation emphasizes both the evanescence and endurance of its defining features.

Seventeenth–c. carol texts in dramas establish continuity between the carol's earliest performance contexts and its more mod. manifestations. Arrangements by folk musicologists such as Cecil Sharp and Ralph Vaughan Williams have helped preserve the Eng. carol trad., and new carols continued to be written through the 20th c. The Am. folklorist John Jacob Niles collected a North Carolina variant of the Corpus Christi Carol (an unusual nonsecular import). The Eng. carol appears in an early 16th-c. ms. compiled by Richard Hill, in the Dyboski edition:

Lully, lulley, lully, lulley;
The fawcon hath born my mak away.

He bare hym up, he bare hym down;
He bare hym into an orchard brown.

In that orchard ther was an hall,
That was hangid with purpill and pall.

Despite some glimmering threads of continuity, the following Am. stanza published by Gilchrist reveals the change over time and points to the disappearance of intermediate variants:

Down in yon forest be a hall,
Sing May, Queen May, sing Mary.

Its cover-lidded over with purple and pall,
Sing all good men for the new-born baby.

Thus, while the carol's integration of poetry and performance remains constant, the particularities of its transmission create a hist. of formal vanishings.

■ Songs, Carols, and Other Miscellaneous Poems, from the Balliol Ms. 354, Richard Hill's Common-place Book, ed. R. Dyboski (1907); E. K. Chambers, "Fifteenth-Century Carols by John Audelay," MLR 5 (1910); R. H. Robbins, "The Earliest English Carols and the Franciscans," MLR 53 (1938); A. Gilchrist, "Down in Yon Forest," Journal of the Folk Song Society 4 (1942); F. Harrison, Music in Medieval Britain (1958); E. Routley, The English Carol (1958); R. H. Robbins, "Middle English Carols as Processional Hymns," SP 56 (1959); R. L. Greene, "Carols in Tudor Drama," Chaucer and Middle English Studies, ed. B. Rowland (1974); Early Tudor Songs and Carols, ed. J. Stevens (1975); The Early English Carols, ed. R. L. Greene, 2d ed. (1977); F. McKay, "The Survival of the Carol in the Seventeenth Century," Anglia 100 (1982); M. Bukofzer, "Polyphonic Carols," The New Oxford History of Music, v. 3, ed. D. Hughes (1986); D. Parker, "John Jacob Niles and Revisionist Folklore," Southern Folklore 49 (1992); The New Oxford Book of Carols, ed. H. Keyte and A. Parrott (1992); K. Reichl, "The Middle English Carol," A Companion to the Middle English Lyric, ed. T. Duncan (2005).

S. Chaganti

CARPE DIEM (Lat., "pluck [enjoy] the day"). A phrase from Horace, Odes 1.11, that enjoins full enjoyment of the present time. The hedonistic form of the *motif ("eat, drink, and be merry . . .") is already fully developed in the Egyptian "Song of the Harper" and in the advice of Siduri to Gilgamesh (Pritchard). Typically, the carpe diem injunction is pronounced amid warnings about the transience of life, the uncertainty of the future, and the inevitability and finality of death (". . . for tomorrow we die"). The motif occurs in many genres of Gr. poetry: *lyric (Alcaeus, frag. 38a; Anacreontea 32), *elegy (Theognis 973–78), drama (Aeschylus, Persians 840–42; Euripides, Alcestis 780–802), and *epigrams (Anthologia Palatina 5.79, 5.118, 11.38). The advice to enjoy the present can range from eating (Iliad 24.618–19) and drinking (Alcaeus, frag. 38a) to love (Catullus 5: "Let us live, my Lesbia, and let us love"). The Roman master of the motif was Horace, many of whose poems urge a refined, Epicurean enjoyment of the day (e.g., Odes 1.4, 1.9, 1.11, 2.14, 3.29, 4.7). To stress the urgency of enjoying the present in the face of fleeting time, the speaker often draws analogies from nature; consequently, the subgenre is full of references to rising and setting suns, seasonal changes, and flowers.

The late Lat. poem "De rosis nascentibus" attributed to Ausonius (ca. 400 CE), which describes roses blooming at Paestum and concludes with the advice "Gather, maiden, roses, while the bloom is fresh and youth is fresh," established the rose as one of the emblems of the carpe diem poem (e.g., Pierre de Ronsard, "Mignonne, allons voir si la rose"; Edmund Spenser, The Faerie Queene 2.12.74–75; Robert Herrick, "Gather ye rosebuds while ye may"; and Edmund Waller, "Go, lovely Rose"). In Ren. poetry, the carpe diem theme often serves as the basis of "persuasions" to seduce coy young women, as in Samuel Daniel (Delia 31), Thomas Carew ("To A. L. Perswasions to love"), and John Milton (Comus 736–54); but the best-known example in Eng. is Andrew Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress," which prominently exhibits the syllogistic form implicit in many carpe diem poems. In the 19th c., Edward FitzGerald's versions of The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám popularized the hedonistic carpe diem theme. Twentieth-c. examples include A. E. Housman's "Loveliest of Trees, the Cherry Now" and John Crowe Ransom's "Blue Girls."

■ F. Bruser, "Comus and the Rose Song," SP 44 (1947); H. Weber, La Création poétique au XVIe siècle en France (1956); J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near-Eastern Texts (1969); R.G.M. Nisbet and M. Hubbard, A Commentary on Horace, Odes Book I (1970); C. Yandell, "Carpe Diem, Poetic Immortality, and the Gendered Ideology of Time," Renaissance Women Writers, ed. A. R. Larsen and C. Winn (1994); and "Carpe Diem Revisited: Ronsard's Temporal Ploys," Sixteenth-Century Journal 28 (1997); E. H. Sagaser, "Sporting the While: Carpe Diem and the Cruel Fair in Samuel Daniel's Delia and the Complaint of Rosamond," Exemplaria 10 (1998).

W. H. Race

CATACHRESIS (Gr., "abuse"). The tidiest definition of this *trope dates back, it has been argued, to the Stoic grammarians: catachresis is the use of a borrowed word for something that does not have a name of its own. We speak thus of the "legs" of a table or the "foot" of a bed. Augustine gives the example of piscina: the word denotes a swimming pool or tank, despite the complete absence of fish (piscis; De doctrina christiana 3.29). According to this most straightforward analysis, catachresis functions like a *metaphor, implying the comparison of two objects. However, unlike a metaphor—which enacts a lexical transfer by establishing the equivalence of two terms—catachresis performs its transfers in the face of a missing term, thus without anchoring its meaning in the logic of equivalence. For instance, "thunderbolts of eloquence" (eloquentiae fulmina)—one of Quintilian's examples of metaphor—describes particularly effective discourse by equating eloquence with a lightning flash (cf. 8.6.7). In contrast, piscina uses the name of fish to describe something that otherwise has no name. A metaphor has, as it were, taken up residence as a proper name. As one mod. theorist explains, "[T]here is no other possible word to denote the 'wings' of a house, or the 'arms' of a chair, and yet 'wings' and 'arms' are instantly, already metaphorical" (Barthes). Following this line of thought, writers have often defined catachresis as a so-called *dead metaphor: a metaphor so fundamental to expression that no distinction from literal use is possible.

According to this logic, catachresis operates under the pressure of necessity: a catachrestic transfer takes place when a "proper" proper name is lacking. "[I]f for lacke of naturall and proper terme or worde we take another, neither naturall nor proper," writes George Puttenham in his 1589 Arte of English Poesie, "and do vntruly applie it to the thing which we would seeme to expresse . . . it is not then spoken by this figure Metaphore . . . but by plaine abuse" (3.17). Catachresis borders on malapropism (mistaking one word for another) or paradiastole (euphemistic redescription); its "abuse" entails a misapplication of terms. But with catachresis, such misapplications are seemingly unavoidable. Impropriety is built into the trope irreducibly, from the ground up.

The figure's irreducible impropriety has led postmod. and poststructuralist observers to privilege catachresis as "the common denominator of rhetoricity as such" (Laclau). For such theorists, catachresis becomes the name for the inescapable metaphorical or rhetorical function of lang. The trope then bespeaks our general inability to trace human meaning back to the bedrock, "literal" reality on which it presumably rests. Giving the lie to our handy philological narratives, catachresis instead reveals the ways in which lang. is "always already" figurative. Moreover, thanks to the way it generates new meanings and uses from a semantic void (i.e., the "lack" that Puttenham notes in his definition), catachresis can then be taken to characterize the originary gap at the heart of all systems of meaning. Catachresis names the origin of lang.—or indeed of any symbolic system—as "rupture" or "doubling" rather than as singular presence. This general rhetorical analysis of the trope has been deployed in disciplines as diverse as political science, media and cultural studies, anthropology, and psychoanalysis. Some notable examples include Spivak's use of the trope to characterize postcolonial discourse; Laclau's view of social hegemony as catachrestic; Barthes's investigation of the figure of beauty in 19th-c. *realism; and Derrida's critique of metaphoricity in Western philosophy.

The postmod. treatment of the trope is exceptionally powerful and holds great explanatory force. Such readings have tended to focus on only one aspect of the trope's hist., however: namely, the preoccupation with the problem of a primitive semantic lack. It could be argued that another, related thread is equally important: the question of what we might call semantic "place." Here Quintilian's characterization of the trope is paradigmatic. Like many writers before and since, Quintilian defines catachresis as a species or version of metaphor. Indeed, his account in many ways anticipates postmod. thought, celebrating catachresis not as the abuse of metaphor but rather as metaphor so elemental as to be necessary—as when we speak of crops being "thirsty" although they have no throats (8.6.5–6). At the same time, however, the 1st-c. rhetor explains that the trope functions by adapting whatever term is closest at hand: "By [catachresis] . . . is meant the practice of adapting the nearest [proximo] available term to describe something for which no actual term exists" (8.6.34).

To privilege catachresis as Quintilian does is to foreground the problem of semantic place. A criterion of proximity—of neighboring place—undergirds his understanding of the trope. Indeed, at stake here is the cl. definition of trope itself, with its strongly spatialized conception of ling. property: i.e., the "place" where a word "properly" belongs. Once again, we turn to Quintilian for his influential definition: "[trope is] the transference of words and phrases from the place which is strictly theirs to another to which they do not properly belong" (9.1.4). Thus understood, trope maps out an entire lexical geography, where each word or phrase finds its accepted coordinates in relation not only to a world of things but to the world of other words and phrases. Moreover, as far back as Aristotle, metaphor has been understood to organize these places through the ability "to see the same" (to homoion therein estin): i.e., the ability to recognize analogies, resemblances, and hierarchies (Poetics 1459a18). Catachresis, however, unsettles our ability to determine such resemblance.

Simply put, a judgment of similarity requires at least two terms for comparison; with catachresis, however, one of these terms is missing. A word is transferred from one place to another—to a place that lacks any name of its own. Where metaphor anchors its transfers on the basis of resemblance, catachresis functions on the basis of sheer proximity. In place of no name, we adapt the nearest available term. We grab what is closest to hand. But what is nearness in lang., proximity of terminology, if it is not a judgment of resemblance? What is semantic place tout court? What is a place without a name? Indeed, catachresis raises the uncomfortable notion of an empty ling. place: of a place held open in lang. but not inhabited by lang. Catachresis thus invokes a world whose contours and contents are already shaped, but not yet named, by lang. This is a world that comes to us already articulated and processed by trope, a world chewed up by lang. before we meaning-makers even arrive on the scene.

According to this thread of its hist., the abuse of catachresis is not that it misapplies a name but rather that it violates our sense of place. This violation has lead to a common alternate definition of the trope as a "mixed," "extravagant," or (most tellingly) "far-fetched" metaphor (Lanham). According to this understanding, catachresis disrupts the reassurances and taxonomic ordering of resemblance, offering instead a world where semantics has lost its bearings, where the foreign and far away has collapsed in on the near and the neighborly. It is perhaps the catachrestic oddity of the trope that its hist. reveals two such seemingly opposed interpretations: on the one hand, catachresis as metaphor that is "far-fetched" or "extravagant" (literally: wandering out of bounds); on the other hand, catachresis as metaphor so familiar and domesticated as to be considered quite "dead."

■ Augustine, On Christian Doctrine, trans. D. W. Robertson (1958); Quintilian, Institutio oratoria, trans. H. E. Butler (1958); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1974); P. de Man, "The Epistemology of Metaphor," CritI 5.1 (1978)—spec. iss. on metaphor; D. A. Russell, "Theories of Style," Criticism in Antiquity (1981); J. Derrida, "White Mythology: Metaphor in the Text of Philosophy," Margins of Philosophy, trans. A. Bass (1982); P. Parker, "Metaphorical Plot," Literary Fat Ladies (1987), and "Metaphor and Catachresis," The Ends of Rhetoric, ed. J. Bender and D. E. Wellbery (1990); Lanham; E. Laclau, On Populist Reason (2005).

L. Freinkel

CATALAN POETRY. Catalan is the common name for the lang. spoken in Catalonia, Valencia, and the Balearic Islands. The unique hist. of the region meant that Catalan was not in continuous literary use: Occitan and Catalan were the langs. of poetry in the Middle Ages, Castilian during the phase of Sp. ascendancy, and Catalan again since *romanticism, when Catalan poetry experienced a revival. The Renaixença (Rebirth) movement amplified the topics of romanticism and brought about an extraordinary literary period interrupted only by the dictatorship of Francisco Franco in Spain. During the years of political and cultural repression (1939–75), poetry played a prominent role in the preservation of Catalan lang. This role created a unique conflict between ideological and aesthetic objectives, resulting in an unbalanced literary trad. that promoted national survival to the detriment of artistic devel.

The Middle Ages left a rich legacy of poets and texts. Ensenhamen, written before 1160 in Occitan by Guerau de Cabrera (d. ca. 1160), contains a full catalog of cl. and Fr. literary topics; such long poetic narratives and brief popular songs were predominant at the time. In the 13th c., amatory and devotional songs were common among preserved texts, such as "Epístola farcida de Sant Esteve," "Plany de Maria Aujats senyors . . . ," and Escolania de Montserrat's "Virolai." When King Alfons I inherited Provença in 1166, he became a strong defender of the poetic use of Occitan, as in Raimon Vidal de Besalú's (1190–1213) Razos de trobar, the first poetic grammar and rhetorical treatise in any Romance lang. Thus, the first Catalan poems were written in Occitan, which influenced the subject matter, style, and versification of the genre until the 15th c. Catalan authors contributed to the *troubadour trad., with spectacular poems written according to the trobar leu (Guillem de Berguedà, 1138–96) or trobar ric (Cerverí de Girona, fl. 1259–85) conventions (see TROBAR CLUS, TROBAR LEU).

In the early 13th c., Ramon Llull (1232–1315), considered the founder of Catalan literary prose, dealt with the diffusion of the Christian faith. His most notable contribution to poetry is Libre d'Amic e Amat (The Book of the Friend and His Beloved), a series of 365 mystical prose poems. As in France, this period generated remarkable examples of romances written in verse: works by Raimon Vidal de Besalú; Blandín de Cornualla and Salut d'amor (both anonymous); and in the 14th c., works by Guillem de Torroella (d. ca. 1348), such as the Arthurian Faula. This century also saw narrative poems by Pere (ca. 1336–1413) and Jaume Marc (ca. 1335–1410), and Fraire de Joi e sor de Plaser, the anonymous Catalan version of Sleeping Beauty. Francesc de la Via (ca. 1380–1445) wrote several court accounts in the style of *fabliaux, such as Llibre de Fra Bernat, and Bernat Serradell (ca. 1375–1445) went beyond this model in Testament d'En Bernat Serradell.

In the 14th and 15th cs., Catalan poetry was in full bloom: liberated from their Occitan origins, new writers gained popularity by employing It. Petrarchan models. Nevertheless, the influence of Occitan poetry can still be found in authors from Majorca and northern Catalonia, whose works were collected in a Ripoll cançoneret after 1346 (see SONGBOOK). Following the example of the Tolosa poetical school, in 1393 King Joan I created the Consistori de la Gaia Ciència in Barcelona (see GAI SABER). Under the influence of this somewhat remote model, two important books were written in the late 14th c.: Llibre de concordances by Jaume March (1336–1410) and Torsimany (incl. a rhyme dictionary) by Lluís d'Averçó (1350–1412). The It. Ren. illuminated the verse of minor poets such as Gilabert de Pròxida (d. 1405), Pere de Queralt (d. 1408), and Melcior de Gualbes (d. ca. 1400). Andreu Febrer's (1375–1444) poetry still followed troubadour models, but he was also the author of an excellent verse trans. of Dante's Divina commedia into Catalan. Overcoming the durable influence of troubadour poetry, in the 15th c. two major poets started writing. Jordi de Sant Jordi (ca. 1390–1424) expressed personal sorrow while in captivity. After 1425, Ausiàs Marc (or March; 1400?–59), based in Valencia but familiar with It. models, wrote his collection of more than 100 poems. Transcending Dolce stil nuovo* and Petrarchism, he explored the doubts surrounding love and death. Joan Roíç de Corella (ca. 1430–90) wrote poems of visual and imaginative power about sensual and divine love. He was the first to introduce into Catalan poetics the It. *hendecasyllable. In the midst of civil war (1462–72), poetry became a tool for expressing ideological and political commitments. Joan Berenguer de Masdovelles (d. 1476) wrote long poems in favor of Joan II. Minor poets of the period include Bernat Hug de Rocabertí (ca. 1420–85), Pere de Torroella (d. 1475), and the politician Romeu Llull (1439–96). In prosperous Valencia, among figures such as Bernat Fenollar (1438–1516), an easygoing literary culture of satirical and humorous poems thrived. Also in Valencia, Jaume Roig (ca. 1400–78) wrote Espill (Mirror), a prebourgeois fiction in verse with a pessimistic and rude approach to reality and traces of med. misogyny.

Although Catalan poetry was enjoying a healthy life in the early 16th c., a series of historical events related to the political misfortunes of the crown of Catalonia and Aragon subdued literary growth under a newly unified Spain. Catalonia lost two wars with Castile (1640 and 1714), and most of the nobility moved to central Spain to serve Charles V and Philip II. Also, after 1492 the main economic activity shifted from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic Basin. Because of these changes, Catalonia experienced a profound crisis, which may explain why the Ren. and its aftermath (neoclassicism, Enlightenment) were lived with less intensity. Andreu Martí Pineda (d. ca. 1566) and Valeri Fuster (d. ca. 1500) imitated bourgeois Valencian poetry from the late 15th c. *Baroque writing is well represented by authors such as Joan Pujol (1532–ca. 1603), Francesc Vicenç Garcia (1578?–1623), Francesc Fontanella (1622–ca. 1682), and Josep Romaguera (1642–1723), while neoclassicism inspired the Minorcan poets Joan Ramis (1746–1819) and Antoni Febrer i Cardona (1761–1821). From the early 17th c. on, we can easily detect the influence of Golden Age and baroque Sp. writers from Garcilaso de la Vega (whose Italianate poems were first published in a famous volume of 1543 with those of his friend, the Catalan innovator Joan Boscà Almogàver, (Juan Boscán, ca. 1488–1542) to Baltasar Gracián. The lit. of the Counter-Reformation reflected rigidity and asceticism. Vicenç Garcia, also known as Rector de Vallfogona, created a "school" with imitators all the way into the 19th c. The lack of a strong elite lit. is offset by a surge in popular poetry. Some of the most outstanding poems of the time were anonymous. This trend survived until the 19th c., when popular styles were adopted by romantic authors: Pau Piferrer (1818–48), Manuel Milà i Fontanals (1818–84), and Marià Aguiló (1825–97). The myth of Count Arnau was particularly important in popular poetry and became a topic for poets in the 20th c., esp. Josep Maria de Sagarra and Joan Maragall.

During the 19th c., under the auspices of the Industrial Revolution and romanticism, poetry was employed to differentiate Catalonia from Spain. Long considered, together with the *Basque Country, Spain's industrial engine, Catalonia nevertheless carried little political weight in Sp. politics after 1714. Modernization became a means of demanding a distinct political and economic status, as evident in Catalan romantic and modernist lit. Early poetical essays such as Bonaventura Carles Aribau's (1799–1862) "A la pàtria" (To the Motherland, 1833) have long been considered the starting point of this movement, as is the first book written in Catalan, Miquel Anton Martí's (ca. 1790–1864) Llàgrimes de viudesa (Weeping Widowerhood, 1839). That year Rubió i Ors (1818–99), known with his pseud. Lo Gaiter de Llobregat (The Bagpiper from Llobregat), started publishing poems in Diario de Barcelona; they were compiled in 1841 under the same Lo Gaiter de Llobregat. Tomàs Aguiló (1775–1856) and Tomàs Villarroya (1812–56) followed suit in Majorca and Valencia, respectively, while Milà i Fontanals helped develop an interest in troubadour poetry from a scholarly perspective.

At first, recovery of Catalan lit. began with the Renaixença, a literary movement organized after 1859 around the Jocs Florals (*poetic contests), competitions celebrated every first Sunday in May, which aroused new and widespread interest in Catalan lit. This movement included Josep Lluís Pons i Gallarza (1823–94), Víctor Balaguer (1824–1901), Marià Aguiló (1825–97), Teodor Llorente (1836–1911), Francesc Pelagi Briz (1839–89), Jaume Collell (1846–1932), Ramon Picó i Campamar (1848–1916), Francesc Matheu (1851–1938), Josep Anselm Clavé (1824–74), and Joaquim M. Bartrina (1850–80). Jacint Verdaguer (1845–1902), the founder of mod. Catalan literary lang., is the major literary figure of the Renaixença. His two epic poems, Atlàntida (1877) and Canigó (1885), interpreted Sp. and Catalan hist. in light of mythological and religious references in the style of the Fr. romantic poet Alphonse de Lamartine.

This cultural revival initiated a period of intense literary activity until the Sp. Civil War. Concurrent with major Eur. trends, cultural movements such as Modernisme (a version of flamboyant art nouveau style) and Noucentisme (a neoclassical revival modeled on Fr. lit.) flowered. In the 1920s and 1930s, there were strong signs of a very active avant-garde, postsymbolist modernity—a moment of splendor that was violently truncated by the onset of the Civil War (1936–39). This period was dominated by the idea of modernization, which was divided along bourgeois and proletarian lines.

At the turn of the century, we detect a second moment of this revival. Under Modernisme, Joan Maragall (1860–1911) masterfully epitomized feelings and obsessions of the time in his poems ("Oda nova a Barcelona," "Oda a Espanya," "Cant espiritual"), painting an accurate portrait of Catalan society incl. anarchism, difficult relations with Spain, and religious doubts. Santiago Rusiñol (1861–1931) wrote the first decadent prose poems in Oracions (1893). In Majorca, Miquel Costa i Llobera (1854–1922) and Joan Alcover (1854–1926) wrote poetry with a more classicist penchant. The latter became inspirational for a group of young poets who wrote under Noucentisme. Josep Carner (1884–1970), Guerau de Liost (pseud. of Jaume Bofill i Mates, 1878–1933), and Josep Maria López-Picó (1886–1959) composed formalist poetry. Jours. such as La Revista (1915–36) were influential in the introduction of *symbolism and promoted avant-gardism (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS). Joan Salvat-Papasseit (1894–1924), Josep M. Junoy (1887–1955), and Salvador Dalí (1904–89) adapted *futurism, *cubism, and *surrealism, respectively, with staggering results. This marks a third moment. Josep Vicenç Foix (1893–1987) combined avant-garde (Gertrudis, 1927) and cl. models (Sol i de dol, 1947). Following a postsymbolist program, Carles Riba (1893–1959), who twice translated The Odyssey, wrote in a severe tone (Estances, I [1919] and II [1930]). His Elegies de Bierville (1943) presents a somber account of exile. Josep Maria de Sagarra (1894–1961) and Ventura Gassol (1893–1980) were the most popular poets before World War II. Other poets drawn toward intimacy and dream include Maria Antònia Salvà (1869–1958), Josep Sebastià Pons (1886–1962), Marià Manent (1898–1988), Tomàs Garcés (1901–93), and Clementina Arderiu (1889–1976). Pere Quart (pseud. of Joan Oliver, 1899–1986) wrote satirical poetry (Les decapitacions, 1934), whereas personal experiences of illness and civil war appeared in the poetry of Bartomeu Rosselló-Pòrcel (1913–38) and Màrius Torres (1910–42).

Franco's regime repressed Catalonian culture. For many years, the lang. vanished from public life, with publication in it forbidden. Writers employed poetry as a means of subversion; the genre was easy to distribute illegally, and its inherent abstraction helped keep a rich cultural heritage alive. Riba and Foix presided over literary and political meetings where they inspired writers of the younger generation: Jordi Sarsanedas (1924–2006) and Joan Perucho (1920–2003). Josep Palau i Fabre (1917–2008) and Joan Brossa (1917–2008) maintained an active focus on avant-garde aesthetics. Agustí Bartra (1908–82), a minor poet who lived in exile, represented a revival of modernista models. When Riba died in 1959, a radical change occurred under Realisme Històric (Socialist Realism), as proposed in Castellet and Molas's influential anthol., Poesia catalana segle XX. Quart (Vacances pagades, 1960) and Salvador Espriu (1913–85, La pell de brau, 1960), created an interest in more realist approaches, particularly evident in Gabriel Ferrater (1922–72, Les dones i els dies, 1968). Some authors distantly related to realism are Vicent Andrés Estellés (1924–93), Marià Villangómez (1913–2002), Blai Bonet (1926–97), Josep M. Llompart (1925–93), Màrius Sampere (b. 1928), Montserrat Abelló (b. 1918), and Miquel Martí i Pol (1929–2003).

From the mid-1960s, a remarkable recovery of Catalan poetry began. The arrival of an iconoclastic generation, in dialogue with their Eur. counterparts, provoked a significant shift toward a poetry of universal interest. Characteristically, these poets worried little about the past and were overtly irreverent toward traditional topics, such as the sanctity of lang. Rather than following local literary models, they favored freedom of expression, some adopting a formalistic attitude, others vindicating obscure figures from the past. Pere Gimferrer (b. 1945, Mirall, espai, aparicions, 1981) is outstanding among this group, together with Feliu Formosa (b. 1934), Joan Margarit (b. 1938), Narcís Comadira (b. 1942), Francesc Parcerisas (b. 1944), Miquel Bauçà (1940–2005), and Jordi Pàmias (b. 1938). While Catalan poetry today has lost part of the aura it had during difficult times, nevertheless, poetry is very much alive, and many exceptional poets are worth mentioning: M. Mercè Marçal (1952–98), Salvador Jàfer (b. 1954), Jaume Pont (b. 1947), Josep Piera (b. 1947), Carles Torner (b. 1963), David Castillo (b. 1961), Margalida Pons (b. 1966), Jaume Subirana (b. 1963), Enric Casassas (b. 1951), Arnau Pons (b. 1965), and Lluís Solà (b. 1940).

See OCCITAN POETRY; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: Anthololgy of Catalan Lyric Poetry, ed. J. Triadú and J. Gili (1953); Ocho siglos de poesía catalana: antología bilingüe, ed. J. M. Castellet and J. Molas (1976); Modern Catalan Poetry: An Anthology (1979), and Postwar Catalan Poetry (1991), both ed. and trans. D. H. Rosenthal; Poesia catalana del barroc, ed. A. Rossich and P. Valsalobre (2006); Lights off Water: XXV Catalan Poems 1978–2002, ed. Anna Crowe (2007); "Made in Catalunya," L. Anderson, L. Reed, and P. Smith reading Catalan, http://www.llull.cat/_cat/_publi/pub.cfm?seccio=publi&subseccio=25030&CATEGORIA=25030).

■ Bibliographies: E. Bou, Nou diccionari 62 de la literatura catalana (2000); A. Broch, Diccionari de la literatura catalana (2008).

■ Criticism and History: M. de Riquer, A. Comas, J. Molas, Història de la Literatura Catalana, 11 v. (1964–88); J. Fuster, Literatura catalana contemporània (1972); J. Bofill i Ferro and A. Comas, Un segle de poesia catalana (1981); J. Marco and J. Pont, La nova poesia catalana (1981); A. Terry, Sobre poesia catalana contemporània (1985); J. Rubió i Balaguer, Obres completes: Història de la literatura catalana (1986); A. Terry, Quatre poetes catalans (1991); F Carbó, La poesia catalana del segle XX (2007); LletrA: Catalan Literature Online: http://www.lletra.net/; A Rossich, Panorama crític de la literatura catalana, 6 v. (2009–11).

E. Bou

CATALEXIS (Gr., "coming to an abrupt end"). The process by which a metrical *colon or line is shortened on the end. The adjectival form, catalectic, describes omission of one syllable, the final one; the older, technical term for double catalectic forms is brachycatalectic. The normal form, where no syllable is lacking, is sometimes called acatalectic; and when extra syllables appear at the end, the colon or line is said to be hypermetric*. Catalexis applies only to ends; shortening at the beginning is normally treated separately since the metrical environment differs (see ACEPHALOUS).

Catalexis is evident in both cl. Gr. and Sanskrit prosody and seems to have derived in part from IE prosody, though it would have appeared indigenously as a normal linguistic process. In cl. Gr., all the most common metrical cola (*dactylic, *anapestic, *iambic, *trochaic, *aeolic) have catalectic forms, in which the last two syllables are shortened to one heavy syllable (longum). But the precise mechanism of catalexis in *classical prosody is complex and varies from meter to meter. More important, the catalexis often appears at the end of a metrical period or stanza—esp. in dactylic, trochaic, and anapestic verse—so that the principle of shortening or blunting has double effect.

In the mod. poetries, catalexis is not common at all in iambic verse but is frequent in trochaic and ternary meters (see BINARY AND TERNARY), where the unexpectedly sudden and forceful close (on a stress) gives bite. In Eng., the trochaic *tetrameter of eight syllables is often found together with a catalectic line of seven, both forms meshing smoothly. Why catalexis should operate well in some meters but not others still awaits definitive explanation; temporal metrists would say that in *accentual verse and other meters that retain a close association with music and song, the missing weak syllable at the end is filled by a *pause. In any event, it is manifest that catalexis is one of the fundamental principles of *rhythm, and provision must be made for it in any theory of meter.

■ L.P.E. Parker, "Catalexis," CQ 26 (1976); Morier; M. L. West, "Three Topics in Greek Metre," CQ 32 (1982).

T.V.F. BROGAN

CATALOG. An enumeration of persons, places, things, or ideas in poetry that often displays some common referent or context such as power, heroism, or beauty. The catalog differs from the simple list or inventory by incl. more descriptive information and by affording the writer more opportunity for digression or thematic devel. The catalog is of ancient origin and is found in almost all lits. of the world. In antiquity, the catalog plays a didactic or mnemonic role, e.g., in the Bible (Gen. 10 and Matt. 1). More frequently, however, the catalog has a clearly aesthetic function. In epic lit., e.g., it conveys the size and power of armies, as in Homer's list of ships and heroes in Iliad 2, and the technique creates the effect of vastness and panoramic sweep, both in geographical space and in narrative time. Similar effects of epic expansions occur in Virgil's catalog of heroes in Aeneid 7 and Milton's catalog of fallen angels in Paradise Lost 2.

Med. and Ren. poetry developed catalog techniques based on cl. models to produce an encyclopedic variety of topics and forms. Ovid's catalog of trees drawn to Orpheus in Metamorphoses 10 serves that purpose for similar lists in Virgil, Chaucer, and Edmund Spenser. In Spenser's Faerie Queene book 1, the catalog of trees places the action of the poem within the epic trad. and marks the poet's position within what Ferry calls a "subliminal catalog of immortal names." A second major form, the ubi sunt poem, features a catalog of absences in order to meditate on mortality and the transience of life, asking where the dead are now. Med. Lat. poems feature the phrase itself, as in the hymn "De Brevitate Vitae," and OE poems of the Exeter Book, such as "The Wanderer," call out the individual dead in order to meditate on the common fate of all. A third rich trad. features the catalog of beautiful attributes in order to praise a beloved (see BLASON). The catalog of women is a related type, deriving in the Western trad. from Hesiod and Homer and developing into the catalog of the "good woman" type in Boccaccio and Chaucer. Although the catalog of feminine beauty may preserve gender stereotypes, it can function in other ways in a poem like Shakespeare's sonnet 130, "My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun."

In 19th- and 20th-c. Eur. and Am. poetry, other functions of catalog and catalog rhet. have emerged. Writers in antebellum America featured catalog rhet. in both poetry and prose, notably in R. W. Emerson's and H. D. Thoreau's essays, in Herman Melville's encyclopedic fictions, and, most important, in Walt Whitman's long poems. While Whitman's catalog rhet. creates an effect of potentially endless and random multiplicity, it can also combine with effects of thematic or dramatic unity. Whitman's catalog rhet. takes parataxis as a basic organizing principle in order to develop coordinating techniques of syntactic parallelism such as *polysyndeton and asyndeton. Catalog rhet. also features pronounced forms of repetition, such as *anaphora and epistrophe, in order to create effects of nonmetrical rhythm and rhetorical power. Despite formal restrictions of line length, metrical pattern, and generic limitation, catalog enacts a principle of nearly infinite expandability.

■ J. W. Bright, "The 'ubi sunt' Formula," MLN 8 (1893); T. W. Allen, "The Homeric Catalogue," JHS 30 (1910); D. W. Schumann, "Observations on Enumerative Style in Modern German Poetry," PMLA 59 (1944); S. K. Coffman, " 'Crossing Brooklyn Ferry': A Note on the Catalogue Technique in Whitman's Poetry," MP 51 (1954); L. Spitzer, "La enumeración caótica en la poesía moderna," Linguística e historia literaria (1955); H. E. Wedeck, "The Catalogue in Latin and Medieval Latin Poetry," M&H 13 (1960); L. Buell, "Transcendentalist Catalogue Rhetoric: Vision versus Form," AL 40 (1968); S. A. Barney, "Chaucer's Lists," The Wisdom of Poetry, ed. L. D. Benson and S. Wenzel (1982); N. Howe, The Old English Catalogue Poems (1985); M. L. West, The Hesiodic Catalogue of Women (1985); A. Ferry, The Art of Naming (1988); J. P. Warren, Walt Whitman's Language Experiment (1990); G. McLeod, Virtue and Venom: Catalogues of Women from Antiquity to the Renaissance (1991); R. E. Belknap, The List: The Uses and Pleasures of Cataloguing (2004).

R. A. HORNSBY; T.V.F. BROGAN; J. P. WARREN

CATHARSIS (Gr., "purgation," "purification," or "clarification") The use of catharsis in connection with the theory of lit. originates in Aristotle's celebrated definition of *tragedy in the Poetics. Unfortunately, Aristotle merely uses the term without defining it (though he may have defined it in a putative second book of the Poetics), and the question of what he actually meant is a cause célèbre in the hist. of lit. crit. Insofar as there is no universal agreement, all definitions, incl. this one, must be regarded as interpretations only.

The essential function of tragedy, according to Aristotle's definition, is a *representation (*mimesis) of an action that is serious or noble, complete, and of appropriate magnitude; and when such representation is effectively carried out, it will succeed "in arousing pity and fear in such a way as to accomplish a catharsis [in one of its fundamental senses] of such emotions." The definition was doubtless framed as an answer to Plato's charge that poetic drama encourages anarchy in the soul by feeding and watering the passions instead of starving them. Aristotle held, to the contrary, that anarchy in the soul is most effectively prevented not by starving and repressing the *emotions but by giving them expression in a wisely regulated manner. Tragedy he regarded as a chief instrument of such regulation, for it works in a twofold way, first exciting the emotions of pity and fear and then allaying them through the cathartic process.

Aristotle's somewhat technical conception of catharsis acquires its particular character from a ling. heritage that is part medical, part religious, and part intellectual. Out of this matrix come several possible meanings of catharsis as the key aesthetic term in the Poetics. As a medical term, catharsis finds early expression in the Hippocratic school of medicine to describe the process of purging the body of humors and impurities that are the cause of disease (Laín Entralgo). The medical view of catharsis, influentially advocated by Bernays, suggests that pity and fear can build up into pathological states that require a therapeutic purgation that is provided by the emotional stimuli of tragedy and that results in pleasurable relief and cure (Lucas). Catharsis as a religious term is closely associated with the concept of purification as it applies to rites required for the entry into a holy place, the purification required of believers by certain sects, or the cleansing of guilt by someone who has committed a crime (Laín Entralgo). In the Phaedo, Plato uses the term in this religious sense (as well as in an intellectual one) to describe the separation of body from soul, an act that is prerequisite for casting off the illusory world of imitations and shadows and approaching the world of true reality. The interpretation of catharsis as purification has been extended to mean purification of any excess or deficiency of pity and fear so that the proper mean of these emotions is achieved (Janko) and to indicate the purification of the tragic deed of the hero from moral pollution so that the audience is able to experience the emotions of pity and fear (Else). The interpretation of catharsis as intellectual clarification is based on the use of the term by Plato and others in this sense (Golden and Hardison, Nussbaum), the internal argument of the Poetics (Golden and Hardison), and the actual practice of Gr. medicine (Laín Entralgo). Two significant variations on intellectual clarification have also been suggested: emotional (as well as intellectual) clarification (Nussbaum) and ethical clarification (Wagner).

When Aristotle's definition is reconsidered in light of all three of these strands, an important corollary stands forth. Since the new blending that is attained in the cathartic process is psychic and not merely physical, it must involve a new emotional perspective and even, arising from that, a new intellectual vision. A wisdom is distilled from tragic suffering: the person is pathei mathos (taught by suffering), as the chorus in the Agamemnon sings. The tragic catharsis and the ensuing emotional calm have produced in the spectator a new insight into what the plot of the drama, its action—which is to say, its meaning in motion—most essentially represents. Such insight is what justifies Aristotle's assertions that the essential goal and pleasure of artistic mimesis is manthanein kai syllogizesthai (learning and inference) and that "poetry is something more philosophical and more significant than history, for poetry tends to express universals, history particulars" (see HISTORY AND POETRY).

On the whole, later critics have been more inclined to accept than to reject the doctrine of catharsis, although their acceptance has usually involved some degree of reinterpretation. In the It. Ren., Aristotle's definition was revived by such writers as Antonio Minturno (De poeta, 1559) and Lodovico Castelvetro (Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e sposta; 1570, 1576), although, in the former, the emphasis is shifted to the "delight and profit" that result to the spectator from his or her cathartic experience. In France a century later, both Pierre Corneille and Jean Racine accept the principle of catharsis in the fairly plain moral sense of regarding the spectator as purified by the tragedy and, thus, as deterred from performing evil acts such as he or she has witnessed. Moreover, Corneille assumes that either pity or fear may operate separately.

In Germany, G. E. Lessing in his influential Laokoön (1766) opposed the latter view of Corneille, insisting that the special effect of tragedy must come from the union of the two emotions, from which there emerges the cosmically oriented emotion of awe, as the spectator recognizes through the tragedy the sword of destiny that is suspended above us all. Lessing also emphasizes (Hamburger Dramaturgie, 1768) the applicability of Aristotle's ethical standard of "due measure" to the principle of catharsis: tragedy, if it is to transform our pity and fear into virtue, "must be capable of purifying us from both extremes"—from "too little" by its emotional contagion and from "too much" by the restraint that its formal pattern imposes. Friedrich Schiller in his essay "Über das tragische" ("On Tragic Art," 1792) reaffirms the importance of measure, and in "Über das Erhabene" ("On the Sublime," 1801), he draws two corollaries: that the most perfect tragedy is one that produces its cathartic effect not by its subject matter but by its tragic form; and that it has aesthetic worth only insofar as it is *sublime—i.e., as it represents the indifference of the universe to moral ends and so produces in the soul of the spectator an "inoculation against unavoidable fate." J. W. Goethe, in his Nachlass zu Aristoteles Poetik (Supplement to Aristotle's Poetics, 1827), sees the main importance of the purgatorial or cathartic situation not in reference to the spectator, whose condition is incidental and variable, but in the reconciliation and expiation of the characters in the play. Among later Ger. writers on aesthetics, Arthur Schopenhauer in Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung (The World as Will and Idea, 1819) equates the cathartic principle of tragedy with an idealized and universal experience of fellow suffering wholly disproportionate to moral deserts, and Friedrich Nietzsche in Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geist der Musik (The Birth of Tragedy, 1872) interprets the matter through the complementary symbols of Dionysus and Apollo, the unresisting plunge into whatever sufferings and joys life may offer and the calm vision that results from this self-surrender.

Of Eng.-speaking writers, John Milton in the preface to Samson Agonistes (1671) interprets Aristotle to mean that tragic catharsis operates on the homeopathic principle; he draws an analogy from medicine, wherein "things of melancholic hue and quality are used against melancholy, sour against sour, salt to remove salt humours." William Wordsworth, shifting the reference from dramatic to *lyric poetry, offers a humanitarian interpretation: that readers are to be "humbled and humanized" and to be purged of the prejudices and blindnesses arising from false sophistication and snobbery "in order that they may be purified and exalted" ("Essay, Supplementary to the Preface," 1815). I. A. Richards (Principles of Literary Criticism, 1925) interprets the cathartic process as a reconciliation and reequilibration of "Pity, the impulse to approach, and Terror, the impulse to retreat," along with various other groups of discordant impulses, affirming the importance of tragedy on the ground that "there is no other way in which such impulses, once awakened, can be set at rest without suppression." Subsequently, Northrop Frye (Anatomy of Criticism, 1957) described catharsis as "not the raising of an actual emotion, but the raising and casting out of an actual emotion on a wave of something else." He identifies that "something else" as "exhilaration or exuberance," an experience "as much intellectual as it is emotional." While catharsis has long been interpreted as some form of purgation or purification, there has been increasing momentum in recent years toward integrating the concept with ideas from philosophy, psychology, and cognitive science.

See CLASSICAL POETICS.

■ J. Bernays, On Catharsis (1857); M. T. Herrick, The Poetics of Aristotle in England (1903); H. House, Aristotle's Poetics (1956); B. Hathaway, The Age of Criticism (1962); Aristotle, Poetics, trans. D. W. Lucas (1968); Aristotle's Poetics, ed. and trans. L. Golden and O. B. Hardison (1968); T. Brunius, "Catharsis," DHI; P. Laín Entralgo, The Therapy of the Word in Classical Antiquity (1970), ch. 5; D. Keesey, "On Some Recent Interpretations of Catharsis," Classical World 72 (1978–79); T. J. Scheff, Catharsis in Healing, Ritual, and Drama (1979); F. Sparshott, "The Riddle of Katharsis," Centre and Labyrinth, ed. E. Cook et al. (1983); R. Janko, Aristotle on Comedy (1984); C. Wagner, "'Katharsis' in der aristotelischen Tragödiendefinition," Grazer Beiträge 11 (1984); A. K. Abdulla, Catharsis in Literature (1985); G. F. Else, Plato and Aristotle on Poetry (1986); M. C. Nussbaum, The Fragility of Goodness (1986); N. Lukacher, "Anamorphic Stuff: Shakespeare, Catharsis, Lacan," South Atlantic Quarterly 88 (1989); C. Willett, "Hegel, Antigone, and the Possibility of Ecstatic Dialogue," Philosophy and Literature 14 (1990); B. Rubidge, "Catharsis through Admiration: Corneille, Le Moyne, and the Social Uses of Emotion," MP 95 (1998); V. C. Sobchack, "The Violent Dance: A Personal Memoir of Death in the Movies," Screening Violence, ed. S. Prince (2000); R. W. Rader, "From Richardson to Austen: 'Johnson's Rule' and the Development of the Eighteenth-Century Novel of Moral Action," The Novel, ed. D. J. Hale (2006); L. Potter, "Shakespeare, Marlowe, and the Fortunes of Catharsis," 'Rapt in Secret Studies': Emerging Shakespeares, ed. D. Chalk and L. Johnson (2010).

P. WELLER; L. GOLDEN

CAUDA, coda (Lat., "tail"). A short line, or tail, that, in a stanza of longer lines usually rhymes with another, similar line, making the stanza *heterometric. Dante in De vulgari eloquentia divides the *canzone into two parts, frons and cauda, subdividing the frons further into two pedes. The form aabccb and its derivatives, with b-line caudae rhyming, which developed in med. Lat. and was popular in Fr. and ME metrical romances, is known as *tail rhyme. The *sapphic is another caudate form. The *caudate sonnet has a longer, plurilinear tail; cf. the *bob and wheel.

T.V.F. BROGAN

CAUDATE SONNET. A sonnet augmented by coda or tail (Lat. cauda). Usually the coda following the 14 lines is introduced by a half line and followed by a couplet in pentameters; it may also be followed by additional tails. Established in It. by Francesco Berni (1497–1536), the caudate sonnet was employed by Michelangelo in a poem written while he was painting the Sistine Chapel and was imported by John Milton into Eng. in the satiric "On the New Forcers of Conscience under the Long Parliament." G. M. Hopkins wrote three caudate sonnets, incl. "That Nature is a Heraclitean Fire and of the Comfort of the Resurrection," an especially experimental, expansive sonnet aberration, with its 13-word title, *alexandrine lines, three codas, and extra half line; Feeney writes that "the very form of a caudal sonnet is itself a play on the It. and Miltonic sonnet's traditional form," calling these three sonnets "the climax of Hopkins's poetry and of his play." Other caudate sonnets include those by A. Samain in Fr. and by R. M. Rilke in Ger. The *bob and wheel, though in shorter lines, is analogous, and tailing is another common form of stanzaic variation. The caudate sonnet may be contrasted with shortened sonnet experiments, especially Hopkins's so-called *curtal sonnet.

See TAIL RHYME.

■ J. S. Smart, The Sonnets of Milton (1921); J. Dubu, "Le Sonetto caudato de Michel-Ange à Milton," Le Sonnet à la Renaissance, ed. Y. Bellenger (1988); J. Feeney, The Playfulness of Gerard Manley Hopkins (2008); The Making of a Sonnet, ed. E. Hirsch and E. Boland (2008).

T.V.F. BROGAN; L. R. SPAAR

CAVALIER POETS. A mod. term for poets associated with Charles I's court and cause during the Eng. civil war, also known as Caroline poets (from "Carolus," i.e., Charles). Cavaliers wrote polished *lyrics and *epigrams on love and sex, friendship and convivial drinking, court and country pleasures, and poetry itself. Avoiding the Elizabethan *sonnet, many adopted the aggressive masculinity and bold conceits of John Donne's love lyrics and elegies, as well as Ben Jonson's imitation of cl. models (whence the designation Sons of Ben), particularly anacreontic celebrations of wine and sex, Roman carpe diem poems, Horace's convivial and rural *odes, and Martial's epigrams.

Four Cavaliers suggest their range. Thomas Carew (1595–1640) writes an exquisite erotic compliment, "Ask Me No More," and the "Rapture," urging a woman to an "Elysium" of intensely imagined sexual bliss. Amid wars, he celebrates the court and country estates as havens of peace and pleasure; his poems on Jonson and Donne delineate and imitate their achievements. Robert Herrick (1591–1674), whose "Ode to Ben Jonson" commemorates the "lyric feasts" in London taverns with his poetic master before Herrick became a country parson, writes metrically intricate lyrics and epigrams enlivened by surprising diction, both Latinate (e.g., "liquefaction") and colloquial (e.g., "slug-a-bed"). Against Puritan strictures, he celebrates Eng. fairies and spells, country festivities with a blend of cl. and scriptural allusion (most famously in "Corinna's Going A-Maying"), and women's bewitching dress ("Delight in Disorder," "Upon Julia's Clothes"). He urges virgins to marry in a distinctively avuncular carpe diem ("To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time") and writes tender epitaphs on infants (part of his overall celebration of "little things"), earthy comic epigrams, and poems asserting, in Roman accents, poetry's immortalizing power. With psychological acuity regarding male desire and a nonchalant, debunking, intentionally shocking air, the lyrics of John Suckling (1609–41?) expose romance's "couzenage," declare sexual "appetite" the creator of beauty, and prefer sexual titillation to "fruition," i.e., consummation (a theme in several Cavaliers). The Royalist soldier and prisoner Richard Lovelace (1618–57) famously values military "Honor" over love ("To Lucasta, on Going to the Wars") but also indulges in a later poem in explicitly masturbatory fantasy of sexual liberty ("Love Made in the First Age"). Several knotty lyrics draw ethicopolitical lessons from emblematic animals; the best, "The Grasshopper," adapts anacreontic and Horatian motifs to celebrate convivial drinking and endurance after Charles I's defeat.

Other Cavaliers include Edmund Waller (1606–87), whose smooth couplets were a Restoration model but who is now best known for his politely cruel carpe diem, "Go, Lovely Rose"; William Davenant (1606–68), who was unusual in attempting epic, his unfinished Gondibert; Richard Corbett (1582–1635); Thomas Randolph (1605–35); Sidney Godolphin (1610–43); William Cartwright (1611–43); and Thomas Stanley (1625–78). Contemporaries who were not primarily Cavaliers sometimes wrote in their vein, incl. Henry Vaughan (1621–95) in his early secular poetry and Andrew Marvell (1621–78), most notably in "To His Coy Mistress." In his Poems (1645) and 1650s convivial sonnets, the ambitious visionary Puritan poet John Milton (1608–74) betrays generic and thematic affinities with Cavalier contemporaries, from whom he self-consciously distinguishes himself.

See ENGLAND, POETRY OF.

■ E. Miner, The Cavalier Mode from Jonson to Cotton (1971); Ben Jonson and the Cavalier Poets, ed. H. Maclean (1974); G. Braden, The Classics and English Renaissance Poetry (1979); R. Helgerson, Self-Crowned Laureates: Spenser, Jonson, Milton, and the Literary System (1983); L. Marcus, The Politics of Mirth (1986); G. Hammond, Fleeting Things: English Poets and Poems, 1616–1660 (1990); J. Scodel, Excess and the Mean in Early Modern English Literature (2001).

J. SCODEL

CELTIC PROSODY. Celtic tribes were prominent on the Eur. continent in the middle of the first millennium BCE and by the mid-3rd c. had spread into Asia Minor in the east, the Iberian peninsula in the west, and the Brit. Isles in the north. Celtic warriors sacked Rome in 380 BCE and raided the oracle at Delphi in 260 BCE; they were known as one of the four great barbarian peoples (along with Scythians, Libyans, and Persians). Our information about the nature and customs of these continental Celts comes from Gr. (and later Roman) ethnographers. Their commentaries date from around the 6th c. BCE; but from the Gr. historian Posidonius, by way of Diodorus Siculus (1st c. BCE) and the somewhat later Strabo, we discover important information about the practice of poetry. Diodorus says that the Celts had three classes of learned and privileged men: (1) βάρδοι, *bards who were poets and who sang eulogies and satires accompanied by stringed instruments; (2) δρυίδαι, druids who were philosophers and theologians; and (3) μάντεις, seers (Strabo calls them ουάτεις, Lat. vates). Caesar too was probably drawing on the Posidonian trad. when he wrote, concerning the extensive training of the druids, that they commit to memory immense amounts of poetry and that their study may last as long as twenty years. From these and similar accounts, it is clear that poetry was a prestigious occupation among the continental Celts. But it must be emphasized that none of this poetry has survived and that, therefore, nothing is known of its *prosody.

By the time Celtic tribes had migrated into the Brit. Isles, their once-common Celtic lang. had split into two principal branches: Goidelic (whence the Gaelic langs. of Ireland, Scotland, and Isle of Man) and Brittonic (whence Welsh, Breton, and Cornish [see IRELAND, POETRY OF; SCOTLAND, POETRY OF; WELSH POETRY; BRETON POETRY; CORNISH POETRY]). In these langs., and more specifically in Ir. and Welsh, we find the earliest recorded Celtic poetry, though it must be stressed that it is more properly to be regarded as Ir. poetry and Welsh poetry. We must, therefore, speak of Ir. prosody and of Welsh prosody. It is remarkable that the earliest extant vernacular manuals of prosody in Europe are Ir., dating back to the end of the 8th c. (R. Thurneysen [1912], 78–89; G. Calder).

The early Ir. and Welsh poets, like those of their forebears among the continental Celts, exercised an authoritative function in society as members of a professional class (P. Sims-Williams). The earliest Ir. poetry included both rhyming and nonrhyming verse. One type of nonrhyming verse consisted of units with two or three stressed words linked by *alliteration. This type occurs in genealogical poems, poems in secular sagas, and in legal tracts. Another type of nonrhyming verse is syllabic rather than stress, e.g., a seven-syllable line with a trisyllabic cadence at the end (L. Breatnach). Calvert Watkins argued that the most archaic form of versification employed in Old Ir. seems to be a reflex of the IE cadenced verse form that appears in Gr., Sanskrit, and Slavic, if due allowance is made for the fact that IE prosodic patterns were determined by alternation of long and short syllables, whereas Goidelic had adopted alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables as a patterning feature. The earlier term for this nonrhyming verse is retoiric (P. Mac Cana), but the favored term now is rosc(ad). While some of the earliest Ir. poetry may well continue an older system derived from IE prosody (in which case we might well call it Celtic prosody), current scholarship argues that the roscada, which continued to be composed well into the Old and early Middle Ir. period, are but an elevated form of literary practice and that the influence of late and med. Lat. rhetorical and poetical style on these verse forms cannot be denied (Corthals).

Lat. influence is to be seen also in the syllabic, rhymed verse, which constitutes the bulk of Old and Middle Ir. poetry. Gerard Murphy argued that rhyme and regular syllable count in this poetry derived ultimately from early med. Lat. hymnic poetry. Dán díreach, syllabic verse with strict rules about rhyme, alliteration, and so on, characterized the poetry of the middle and early mod. periods in Ireland and in the Gaelic-speaking parts of Scotland as well. *Generic rhyme, whereby consonants were grouped in six phonetic classes, developed early, as did the marking off in the normal four-line stanzas (rann). The various metres of dán díreach demanded strict employment of *consonance, *assonance, *dissonance, alliteration, and rhyme; rhyme might be end-line, internal between lines, or end-line with internal of the following line (aicill rhyme). The lang. of the poetry was learned in the bardic schools and remained unchanged throughout the period of Ir. cl. poetry, ca. 1200–1650, whether in Ireland or Gaelic Scotland. The intricacy of this poetry is almost unparalleled in Eur. poetry. The complexity of Ir. prosody is paralleled by Welsh prosody, esp. in the period of the Poets of the Princes (Beirdd y Tywysogion), 12th to end of the 13th c., and beyond. The following Ir. poem is in a meter called deibhidhe, the commonest of the syllabic meters in Ir. bardic poetry and the easiest:

Dá mbáidhthí an dán, a dhaoine,
Gan seanchas, gan seanlaoidhe,
Go bráth, acht athair gach fhir,
Rachaidh cách gan a chluinsin.

(E. Knott 1966, 78)

(If poetry were suppressed, men, so there was neither history nor old poetry, nothing would be known of any man save only the name of his father.) The unit is the *quatrain. The prosody of dán díreach in general involves syllabic count, generic rhyme, internal rhyme, and alliteration. A consonant alliterates either with itself or with the corresponding initial form produced by grammatical mutation; a vowel alliterates with itself or any other. In deibhidhe, the meter of the poem quoted, there are seven syllables in each line. Line a rhymes with b, c with d. In Ir. rhyme, the stressed vowels must be identical and the consonants of the same generic class and the same quality (i.e., broad or slender). The generic end rhyme is between words of unequal syllabic length (dhaoine, seanlaoidhe; fhir, chluinsin). There is alliteration between two words in each line, and the final word of d alliterates with the preceding stressed word (chluinsin, cách). There must be at least two internal rhymes between c and d (bráth, cách; athair, rachaidh). In every meter, the complete poem should end with the same word or syllable with which it began (dúnad, "closure"; see RING COMPOSITION).

Gaelic Scotland shared this trad. of cl. Ir. poetry. Although it was composed and sung in the courts of Scottish chieftains, it remained Ir., both linguistically and culturally (T. Clancy). It is virtually impossible to determine, on purely linguistic or metrical grounds, whether a poem from this period (1200–1650) was composed in Ireland or Scotland or whether it belonged to the beginning or end of that period.

The earliest Welsh poetry, that of Aneirin and Taliesin in the 6th c., seems to have been accentual, although, unlike some of the early Ir. poetry, rhyme as opposed to an unrhymed cadence marked the end of the line. In that early poetry, the syllabic length of lines varies considerably (M. Haycock); however, the number of stresses in each line tended to produce a more or less regular number of syllables. Eventually, syllabic regularity and main rhyme (prifodl) characterized all meters in the awdl, englyn*, and cywydd* categories. An awdl is a poem of unregulated length, comprised of various syllabic meters; earlier awdlau are monorhymed. The englyn forms are stanzaic, the most common being the englyn unodl union, comprised of four lines with a single main rhyme. Among the later awdl meters are assymetric rhyming couplets (cywydd couplets) and, from the 14th c., a cywydd is a poem of unregulated length comprised solely of these couplets. The several varieties of these three classes made up the canonical 24 meters. As in Ireland, poets in Wales were trained in bardic schools both orally and with the use of written texts, the bardic grammars (G. J. Williams and E. J. Jones). From the beginning, intricate alliteration and internal rhyme ornamented the lines of the awdl and englyn; by the end of the 13th c., these features had evolved into the system known as cynghanedd*. Early in the following century, cynghanedd was introduced into the cywydd, and it subsequently became an obligatory feature in every line of strict-meter verse. Dafydd ap Gwilym's cywydd address to a seagull (14th c.) is typical:

Yr wylan deg ar lanw dioer,
Unlliw ag eiry neu wenlloer,
Dilwch yw dy degwch di,
Darn fel haul, dyrnfol heli.

(Fair sea gull on the certain tide, of color like snow or the bright moon, spotless is your beauty, a patch like sunlight, gauntlet of the sea.) Each line has seven syllables; the accent in Welsh is usually on the penultimate, so each couplet rhymes a stressed monosyllable with an unstressed polysyllable. Additionally, each line must feature one of the different forms of cynghanedd. Lines 1, 2, and 4 of this citation illustrate consonantal cynghanedd, i.e., the sequence of consonants around the main stressed vowel before the *caesura is exactly repeated around a different stressed vowel in the second half of the line. Lines 1 and 4 have cynghanedd groes; thus, in line 1, the sequence r l n d is echoed: yR wyLaN Dég | aR LaNw Díoer. Line 2 has cynghanedd draws, with unanswered consonants before the echoed sequence: úNLLiw | [ag eiry neu] wéNLLoer. Line 3 illustrates tripartite cynghanedd sain, where the first and second parts of the line rhyme, and the second and third demonstrate consonantal cynghanedd: dil*wch* | yw dy Dég*wch* | Dí. A further category of cynghanedd is cynghanedd lusg, where the unstressed penultimate syllable of the line rhymes with the syllable immediately preceding the caesura. A full discussion of cynghanedd would require many more pages.

Generally speaking, the Celtic bards, rather like the Ir. illuminators of the Book of Kells, chose to fill minute spaces decoratively. At their best, as in the Ir. and Welsh examples just quoted, they were capable of providing not only an intricate phonetic texture but a brilliant network of imagery that illuminated their poems in a manner that is perceptible even in trans.

Traces of one type of Welsh cynghanedd may be seen in the few bits of Breton poetry that survive from the late Middle Ages, suggesting that Brittany may have shared in a Brittonic prosodic system. The surviving late med. Cornish verse shows no signs of participating in a Brittonic or Celtic prosodic system.

With the decline of the bardic orders in the Celtic countries, new and simpler meters became increasingly popular. In part, these are the products of amateur versification; in part, they may represent the legitimization of popular and perhaps ancient song meters hitherto unrecorded; and in part, they certainly represent the adaptation of foreign meters. When the secret of generic rhyme was lost, the most appealing device for Ir. and Scottish Gaelic poets seems to have been assonance. Typical is an Ir. song composed by Geoffrey Keating (17th c.), which is in the new Ir. stressed verse known as amhrán and begins:

Óm sge*o*l ar *a*rd-mhagh Fá*i*l ní ch*o*dlaim oí*d*hche.

The last stressed vowel of the five stressed syllables in the first line assonates with each of the last stressed syllables in all of the following lines of the stanza, as in the OF laisse*. But, additionally, each of the other four stressed vowels in the first line assonates with its counterparts in all of the following lines, so that the melody of the stanza consists of a sequence of five stressed vowels (here o-a-a-o-i).

Scottish Gaelic song poetry begins to appear in mss. and print in the later 18th c., though its roots go back well into the Middle Ages (W. Gillies).

In Wales, canu rhydd, free-meter poetry, a poetry depending not upon syllabic regularity but rather upon rhythm and accent, had been around since the time of Aneirin but was not preserved in abundance until the 16th c. (Davies). Some of this is poetry composed in imitation of strict meters but without cynghanedd and with less attention to syllable count. The rest consists of stanzas set to existing musical airs, some of which were imported from England. However, strict-meter poetry with cynghanedd was not threatened by these popular devels., and its popularity remains strong today.

See MASCULINE AND FEMININE.

■ General: Parry, History; Williams and Ford, Literacy in Medieval Celtic Societies, ed. H. Pryce (1998); The New Companion to the Literature of Wales, ed. M. Stephens (1998).

■ Irish: R. Thurneysen, "Zur irischen Accent-und Verslehre," Révue Celtique 6 (1883–85); "Mittelirische Verslehren," Irische Texte, ed. W. Stokes and E. Windisch, vol. 3 (1891); "Zu den mittelirischen Verslehren," Abh. der königl. Akad. der Wiss. zu Gött., philol.-hist. Klasse 14, no. 2 (1912); "Über die älteste irische Dichtung," Abh. der königl. Preussische Akad. der Wiss., philos.-hist. Klasse, nos. 6, 10 (1914); G. Calder, Auraicept na n-Éces, the Scholars' Primer (1917); O. Bergin, "The Principles of Alliteration," Eriu 9 (1921–23); W. Meyer, "Die Verskunst der Iren in rhythmischen lateinischen Gedichten," Meyer, vol. 3; E. Knott, Irish Classical Poetry (1957); G. Murphy, Early Irish Metrics (1961); C. Watkins, "Indo-European Metrics and Archaic Irish Verse," Celtica 6 (1963); E. Knott, An Introduction to Irish Syllabic Poetry of the Period 1200–1600, 2d ed. (1966); P. Mac Cana, "On the Use of the Term Retoric," Celtica 7 (1966); Irish Bardic Poetry, texts and trans. O. Bergin, ed. D. Greene (1970); E. Campanille, "Indogermanische Metrik und altirische Metrik," ZCP 37 (1979); L. Breatnach, "Poets and Poetry," Progress in Medieval Irish Studies (1996); J. Corthals, "Early Irish Retoirics and Their Late Antique Background," Cambrian Medieval Celtic Studies 31 (1996); P. K. Ford, The Celtic Poets: Songs and Tales from Early Ireland and Wales (1999); P. Sims-Williams, "Medieval Irish Literary Theory and Criticism," CHLC, v. 2, ed. A. Minnis and I. Johnson (2005).

■ Scottish Gaelic: D. Thomson, An Introduction to Gaelic Poetry, 2d ed. (1989); T. Clancy, "The Poetry of the Court: Praise," and W. Gillies, "Gaelic Literature in the Later Middle Ages," The Edinburgh History of Scottish Literature, vol. 1 (2007).

■ Welsh: G. J. Williams and E. J. Jones, Gramadegau'r Penceirddiaid (1934); Jarman and Hughes, esp. E. Rowlands, "Cynghanedd, Metre, Prosody"; Morris-Jones; A. T. E. Matonis, "The Welsh Bardic Grammars and the Western Grammatical Tradition," MP 79 (1981); R. Bromwich, Aspects of the Poetry of Dafydd ap Gwilym (1986); T. Conran, Welsh Verse, 2d ed. (1986); M. Hay-cock, "Metrical Models for the Poems in The Book of Taliesin," Early Welsh Poetry, ed. B. F. Roberts (1988); C. Davies, "Early Free-Metre Poetry," and N. Lloyd, "Late Free-Metre Poetry," A Guide to Welsh Literature, v. 3, ed. R. G. Gruffydd (1997).

■ Breton: Histoire Littéraire et Culturelle de la Bretagne, 3 vols., ed. J. Balcou and Y. Le Gallo (1987).

■ Cornish: R. Maber, "Celtic Prosody in Late Cornish: The englyn 'an lavar kôth yu lavar guîr'," Bulletin of the Board of Celtic Studies (1988); B. Bruch, "Cornish Verse Forms, the Evolution of Cornish Prosody," diss., Harvard University (2005); O. Padel, "Oral and Literary Culture in Medieval Cornwall," Medieval Celtic Literature and Society, ed. H. Fulton (2005).

P. K. Ford; A. Ll. Jones

CENTO (Lat., "patchwork"). A verse composition made up of lines selected from the work or works of some great poet(s) of the past. Homer largely served this purpose in Gr. lit., ranging from the adaptations by Trygaeus of various lines in the Iliad and Odyssey reported by Aristophanes (Peace 1090–94) to the Homerokentrones of the Byzantine period. Similarly, Virgil was the most popular source for centos in later Roman times. The oldest of those extant is the tragedy Medea by Hosidius Geta (2d c. CE), while the Cento nuptialis of Ausonius and the Cento Vergilianus of Proba (both 4th c. CE) are among others drawn from his work. Ren. and later works of this kind included the Eng. Cicero princeps (1608), a treatise on government compiled from Cicero. Centos are still occasionally published, e.g., the late poem "Antologia" by the Brazilian modernist Manuel Bandeira (1886–1968), a *pastiche of lines from throughout his long career, incl. some of his most widely recognized such as "Vou-me embora pra Pasárgada" (I'm going away to Pasárgada).

See ANTHOLOGY, CONTRAFACTUM.

■ J. O. Delepierre, Tableau de la littérature du centon chez les anciens et chez les modernes, 2 v. (1874–75); R. Lamacchia, "Dall'arte allusiva al centone," Atene e Roma n.s. 3 (1958); "Cento," Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. N.G.L. Hammond and H. H. Scullard, 2d ed. (1970); T. Augarde, Oxford Guide to Word Games, 2d ed. (2003); P. K. Saint-Amour, The Copywrights (2004).

R. J. Getty; T.V.F. Brogan

CHAIN RHYME (Ger. Kettenreim, äusserer Reim, verschr, änkter Reim). Interlocking or interlaced rhyme that refers to any rhyme scheme in which one line or stanza links to the next line or stanza, forming a pattern of alternating rhymes. *Terza rima is one form: here the medial rhyme in each *tercet becomes the enclosing ones of the next, aba bcb cdc, and so on. Robert Frost extends this scheme to the quatrain in "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening." Examples of chain rhyme range widely, from Af. folk forms and Eng. *nursery rhymes to Edmund Spenser's Amoretti. According to Myers and Wukasch, the *villanelle also employs chain rhyme, since the first and third lines of the initial tercet alternately recur as the third line of subsequent tercets, A1bA2 abA1 abA2, and so forth. Chain rhyme, like *cross rhyme, has recently been used by scholars to refer to the abab pattern. Historically, though, chain rhyme, also identified as linked rhyme by Turco, rhymes the last word of one line to the first word of the next line, creating a chiming effect. In Fr. prosody, the *Grands Rhétoriqueurs of the late 15th and early 16th cs. developed the terms rime fratrisée, entrelacée, enchainée, and annexxée for a rhyme sound or syllable at line end repeated at the beginning of the next line. The repeated syllable, however, must carry a different meaning. Recent scholars (Alim, Bradley) have noted the abundant use of chain rhyme in Am. rap and hip-hop (see HIP-HOP POETICS), which not only serves to effect a technique of generative improvisation but creates an incantatory effect; the sound repetition is typically amplified by the addition of *internal rhyme. Rapper Talib Kweli, with Pharaoh and Common, employs chain rhyme in "The Truth." Chain rhyme extended to repetition of entire words becomes the rhetorical figure *anadiplosis, a type of *concatenation.

■ Patterson; L. Turco, The Book of Forms: A Handbook of Poetics, 3d ed. (2000); H. S. Alim, "On Some Serious Next Millennium Rap Ishhh," Journal of English Linguistics 31 (2003); J. Myers and D. Wukasch, A Dictionary of Poetic Terms (2003); A. Bradley, Book of Rhymes: The Poetics of Hip Hop (2009).

T.V.F. Brogan; J. Chang

CHANSO, CHANSON. See FRANCE, POETRY OF; OCCITAN POETRY; SONGBOOK; TROUBADOUR; TROUVÈRE.

CHANSON DE GESTE

I. Gestes, Continuations, Cycles
II. Form and Style
III. Ethics and Politics
IV. Aesthetics
V. The Religious, the Exotic, and the Fantastic

An *epic poem recounting the feats of Charlemagne or other kings of the Carolingian era and their barons. The term geste originally meant "heroic deeds" but came also to signify the "historical record" provided by the texts relating them and, by extension, the "family" or "lineage" responsible for them. Around 120 poems survive. Early crit. focused on the question of the origins of the corpus: the "traditionalists" argued from the presence of elements of historical fact in the songs that they were the textual remnants of a collective oral trad. going back to the era of the events told (this view was revived in the 1950s by Rychner). But the extant versions, found in some 300 mss., date mainly from the 12th and 13th cs., and their preoccupations are arguably those of this period: hence, the opposing, "individualist" view (pioneered by Bédier) that they are authorial creations with little regard for "tradition." The chansons de geste show evidence of interaction with other 12th- and 13th-c. literary genres, principally romance (see MEDIEVAL ROMANCE) but also chronicles, lyric, and hagiography. Some chansons have come down to us in a series of different redactions: e.g., the Chanson de Roland, whose Anglo-Norman version is one of the earliest and undoubtedly the best known of all chansons de geste, also survives in three OF and three Franco-It. versions. Carolingian epics were widely diffused: most codices are in OF, but there is an important set of chansons de geste in Anglo-Norman (incl. Gormont et Isembard and La Chanson de Guillaume, two of the earliest surviving texts), a small group of Occitan epics (Girart de Roussillon, Daurel et Beton), and a large corpus of poems in the hybrid literary lang. of Franco-It., mainly locatable to the Veneto (La Geste Francor, L'Entrée d'Espagne). Independent It. reworkings of the material grew out of the latter corpus, and chansons de geste were elsewhere translated into MHG, Middle Dutch, ON, and Icelandic, as well as influencing the Castilian epic. The genre was well known and highly popular and continued to be rewritten, compiled, and revived—particularly in prose recasting—into the 16th c.

I. Gestes, Continuations, Cycles. Mod. crit. has tended to follow the classification given by the med. author Bertrand de Bar-sur-Aube in the epic Girart de Vienne (ca. 1180), which divides the chansons into three gestes: la geste du roi (narrating the deeds of Charlemagne and his barons, incl. Roland), la geste de Garin de Monglane (concerning the lineage of Garin, ancestor of the great Guillaume d'Orange), and la geste de Doon de Mayence (a group of rebel barons and traitors). However, only one of these groupings—la geste de Garin de Monglane—appears in mss. as a cycle. The largest cyclical Garin codex unites 18 poems about Guillaume, his ancestors, and his kinsmen the Narbonnais (the Narbonnais poems are also found as a cycle in their own right). Although one codex gathers a selection of texts concerning rebel barons (incl. Doon de Mayence, La Chevalerie d'Ogier, and Renaut de Montauban), it is perhaps preferable not to give too much priority to Bertrand's categorization but rather to speak of a general tendency of epics to collect themselves into sequences and to recruit additional songs as *proems (such as Enfances texts narrating the youthful exploits of well-known heroes) and sequels (incl. Mort and Moniage texts, telling of a hero's final days). The Chanson de Roland inspired a number of continuations and prologues such as Anseïs de Carthage, Aspremont, and Gaydon. Other groupings are the vast Crusade Cycle (historical poems about the First and Third Crusades, with imaginative continuations); the Franco-It. Geste Francor (featuring texts about Pepin and the young Charlemagne and Roland), and sets of poems associated with the heroes Huon de Bordeaux, Jourdain de Blaye, and Renaut de Montauban; and the Loheren, Nanteuil, and Saint-Gille lineages.

II. Form and Style. Most chansons de geste are in *decasyllables, although some are in *octosyllables or dodecasyllables, also known as alexandrines. Lines are grouped into strophes called laisses, which are united by *assonance in most poems. Rhyme began to feature from the late 12th c., and the use of assonance after this point may be a deliberate archaism signaling the age and trad. of the material. The decasyllabic line normally features a *caesura after four syllables, with the first part of the line often filled by repeated formulas. This can be viewed as evidence of the poems' oral composition (Rychner), but many repetitive, seemingly "oral," elements are, in fact, part of the epics' functioning as written texts. Not only phrases but actions are repeated, such as when a series of laisses retell the same event from different perspectives (laisses similaires) or when separate events are made analogous by being described in roughly the same terms (laisses parallèles). More broadly, similar characters and plots recur. The overall tendency toward repetition inspired and enabled continuations, many of which feature new generations of warriors who avenge their kinsmen or pursue the grievances of their forefathers. The formulas used to describe characters make them fixed types who act out timeless conflicts: valiant heroes versus their evil opponents, either Saracens (a catchall term used interchangeably with the term pagan to describe the religious enemies of Christians) or cowardly, underhanded traitors. The entire genre suggests that the past is never dead and buried; the epics are set in a Carolingian past that is always also present, portrayed as having unmistakable similarities with the periods in which the poems were written, reworked, and compiled.

III. Ethics and Politics. The dramatic tension animating the chansons de geste comes partly from a clash between a warrior ethos advocating uncompromising, to-the-death violence as the solution to all problems and another ethos that sees violence itself as the problem and seeks to restrain bloodthirsty tendencies. The hero is the privileged site of controversies: he inspires and unifies as the incarnation of the hopes and dreams of a particular community, for victory (e.g., Roland) or for peace and stability (e.g., Guillaume in Le Couronnement de Louis); but he also pursues singularity, desiring to stand alone, independent of the rest of humanity (the extreme case is Raoul de Cambrai, which describes the unfettered destruction following Raoul's complete alienation from all social structures). There are a number of communal groupings in the epics: families and lineages; crusade identities gathering diverse Western Christian soldiers under the banner of "Franks"; alliances with the emperor or king; and homosocial cohesion on the battlefield, where fellow combatants are frequently mirror images of each other (a logic carried to its culmination in Ami et Amile, whose two heroes are practically indistinguishable). Each of these structures creates solidarity but also produces and excludes an opposite: family loyalty leads to vengeful and never-ending feuds against other families; crusade ideology demonizes the Saracen enemy; rebellions ensue when the sovereign favors one party; and restrictive gender politics brings violence against women or their marginalization. Though attempts have been made to incorporate the chansons de geste into a national Fr. literary canon, they generally represent the interests of one narrow social group: powerful regional barons. The "rebel baron" epics argue for the barons' right to attack the king to seek redress for injustice (Gaydon, Renaut de Montauban); other poems feature a baron resisting the king in an attempt to preserve the independence of a region not considered to be part of "France," such as Burgundy (Aspremont) and Occitania (Girart de Roussillon). The baronial perspective explains the tyrannical qualities of the king in many texts, where he is intransigent, omnipotent, and unreasonable. The corpus as a whole is engaged with contemp. politics: the narratives are reflections on concepts such as sovereignty, fealty, and lordship, and they feature ethical debates on the rights and wrongs of war. But such discussions are repeatedly overridden by the prevailing drive to violence, and the society portrayed is subject to self-destructive impulses.

IV. Aesthetics. The chansons de geste are thrilling, eventful texts, whose most striking aesthetic feature is the vivid and gory presentation of violence. The sights and sounds of battle are described in horrifying detail: men and horses are chopped in two, limbs are lost, bowels and brains spill out, and blood pours onto grass, producing a contrast of colors that is often remarked on. The recurring phrase "or veïssiez" (now you would have seen) invites readers and listeners to imagine themselves at the scene. There is a repeated movement from an aesthetic of order and beauty, as warriors line up and armor glistens, to one of chaos and destruction. In the thick of battle, critical reflection on the consequences of violence is suspended, and we are encouraged to become emotionally involved in the action. Enemies are often monstrous or devious, whereas heroes are proud, honorable, and muscular. Violence is thereby justified as part of a transcendent struggle between the forces of good and evil.

V. The Religious, the Exotic, and the Fantastic. The chansons de geste are ostensibly religious texts: their heroes are the soldiers of God, who pray frequently, devote themselves to war against confessional enemies, and are always ready to sacrifice their lives (martyrs include Vivien in Aliscans and Roland). But beneath this lie more earthly considerations: crusade is inspired by the desire for land and power (as witness Le Charroi de Nîmes); the East is a place of exotic treasure (Le Pèlerinage de Charlemagne), of magic and the fantastic (Huon de Bordeaux), or of multilingual diversity (L'Entrée d'Espagne); and the Saracen is as much an object of fascination as a religious other. In some texts, an alluring Saracen princess helps the Christian hero conquer territory before converting to Christianity and marrying him (La Prise d'Orange). Other Saracens are integrated into Christian society because of their usefulness as warriors and allies, such as the giant Rainouart in Aliscans. Elsewhere, the religious aspect of the texts is merely an exit from otherwise intractable narrative problems or a way to transcend violence. In Girart de Vienne, God stops a combat between Roland and his future companion Oliver, and the Chanson de Roland ends with God's miracle ensuring justice is done. Some texts have saintly endings where the hero becomes a monk or hermit to atone for a life of violent sin (Girart de Roussillon, Le Moniage Guillaume).

See FRANCE, POETRY OF; HEROIC VERSE; JONGLEUR; NARRATIVE POETRY.

■ J. Bédier, Les Légendes épiques (1926–29); J. Rychner, La Chanson de geste (1955); W. C. Calin, The Old French Epic of Revolt (1962); M. de Combarieu du Grès, L'Idéal humain et l'expérience morale chez les héros des chansons de geste (1979); E. Heinemann, L'art métrique de la chanson de geste (1993); F. Suard, La Chanson de geste (1993); D. Boutet, La Chanson de geste (1995); S. Gaunt, Gender and Genre in Medieval French Literature (1995); S. Kay, The "Chansons de geste" in the Age of Romance (1995); K. Busby, Codex and Context (2002); F. E. Sinclair, Milk and Blood: Gender and Genealogy in the Chanson de geste (2003); P. Bennett, Carnaval-héroïque et écriture cyclique dans la geste de Guillaume d'Orange (2006); S. Kinoshita, Medieval Boundaries: Rethinking Difference in Old French Literature (2006); A. Cowell, The Medieval Warrior Aristocracy (2007); J. Gilbert, "The Chanson de Roland," The Cambridge Companion to Medieval French Literature, ed. S. Gaunt and S. Kay (2008); L. Sunderland, Old French Narrative Cycles (2010).

L. SUNDERLAND

CHANSON DE TOILE. Among the earliest secular Fr. lyric poems are the chansons de toile (12th to 13th cs.), short narrative poems with refrains describing the loves and sorrows of young women. They are mostly anonymous. There is no evidence of female authorship, unlike in the songs attributed to women trouvères or trobairitz*. The chansons de toile are composed in meters and verse schemes similar to early saints' lives or chansons de geste*. They are said to have accompanied women's textile work, but their surviving melodies are ornate. Their content and use of refrains link them to the OF courtly genres such as the mal mariée* and the pastourelle*.

See CANSO.

■ E. J. Burns, "Sewing like a Girl: Working Women in the Chansons de Toile," in Medieval Woman's Song, ed. A. L. Klinck and A. M. Rasmussen (2002); M. O'Neill, Courtly Love Songs of Medieval France: Transmission and Style in the Trouvère Repertoire (2006); C. Léglu, "Space and Movement in the Old French chansons de toile," Parergon 24 (2007).

C. LÉGLU

CHANT. A mode of verbal performance between speech and song, chant is, strictly speaking, oral poetry organized rhythmically by the internal rhythms of lang. and the external rhythms of music. Lat. texts of the Roman Catholic liturgy have been sung since the early Middle Ages in monodic, unaccompanied, and metrically flexible Gregorian chant or "plainsong." Oral poetry composed as chant is distinguished by various strong patterns of *repetition: phonetic repetition (e.g., stress, *alliteration, nonsense syllables), lexical and phrasal repetition (key words or stock formulas, *anaphora, *refrains), grammatical and semantic *parallelism and contrast (*catalogs; stichic or hemistichic structures; recurring names, images, or allusions). Such devices may be reinforced with percussive instruments (tapping sticks, drums, rattles, hand claps, foot stamps) and dance steps.

Chant involves a complex thread of associations. Musically, it is an ambiguous term, referring both to the short melody or phrase to which words are sung (as in a *psalm or canticle) and to the psalm or canticle that is chanted. Where chant signifies melody, the emphasis falls squarely on its steady monotonousness. Communally performed chant carries strong symbolic valences. It brings individuals together into a single body of chanters or dancers, in effect creating a society, at least temporarily, through the chant rhythm. This important social function appears in numerous forms of communal chanting: the dance songs of Eskimo villages; the great mythological chants of aboriginal Australian, Polynesian, and southwest Am. Indian ritual; communal prayer, such as the temple chanting of Buddhist monks and the litanies of Christian congregations; work songs of various kinds; the game songs of children (jump-rope rhymes, counting-out verses, taunts).

In written lit., chant appears as far back as the Vedas of India and the Psalms of the Heb. Bible. The oral form has been imitated in various ways by literary poets such as Christopher Smart, William Blake, Walt Whitman, William Morris, W. B. Yeats, Vachel Lindsay, and Allen Ginsberg. Formal admixtures of chant and lyric (as in Smart, Morris, or Yeats) complicate conventional notions of individualist lyric. Written chants also challenge distinctions between the aesthetic and the instrumental and between oral and print modes.

In the past two centuries, chant has often been associated with political activism—Morris's Chants for Socialists (1884, 1885, 1891), reprinted in political *songbooks throughout the 20th c., is a case in point. As poetry, chant disturbs conventional high-cultural ideals: subliterate (spoken not written) and subliterary (instrumentalist not aesthetic), chant describes congregational rather than individual experience. Its complex politics are indicated by affiliations with terms such as "enchant" or "incantation," which share etymological origins (Fr. chanter, Lat. cantāre, Fr. incantation, Lat. incantātiōnem, Lat. incantāre, Fr. enchanter). Where these words intersect with chant is in the perceived power of musical form: an incantation charms a listener by virtue of being chanted; to enchant is to captivate, hold in thrall, or influence. These associations suggest opposed political effects. As a protest march derives much of its symbolic power from movement (resistance as a living, mobile force), chant can effect collective action; from another vantage, chant can be seen as inhibiting the individual's critical capacities.

See ABSORPTION, POLITICS AND POETRY.

■ M. S. Edmonson, Lore (1971); R. Finnegan, Oral Poetry (1977); Welsh; C. Waters, British Socialists and the Politics of Popular Culture, 1884–1914 (1990); P. Zumthor, Oral Poetry, trans. K. Murphy-Judy (1990); A. F. Janowitz, Lyric and Labour in the Romantic Tradition (1998).

A. WELSH; C. ROVEE

CHANTE-FABLE. A med. Fr. dramatic recitation composed, as the name implies, of sections of verse and prose, the former intended to be sung, the latter spoken, perhaps by two *jongleurs alternately. The verse form is unusual: a seven-syllable line in *assonance, each lyric ending in a four-syllable line without assonance. Alternating verse and prose is not a rare practice in med. Lat. (see PROSIMETRUM), Ar., Celtic, ON, and Occitan writers. But only the anonymous 13th-c. author of Aucassin et Nicolette terms his work a chante-fable. Aucassin et Nicolette is a beautifully constructed, well-unified love story, with distinct dramatic elements, rich in humor and irony; and it skillfully parodies contemporary *epic and romance. But it survives in only a single ms., and the extent to which it represents a vogue is disputed (Holmes). In China, some 10th-c. bianwen (narratives) are in a chante-fable form (see CHINA, POPULAR POETRY OF).

■ J. R. Reinhard, "The Literary Background of the Chante-Fable," Speculum 1 (1926); CBFL 1:2127–35; MGG 2:1082–84; U. T. Holmes, History of Old French Literature (1962); L. Ch'en, "Pien-wen Chantefable and Aucassin et Nicolette," CL 23 (1971); Aucassin et Nicolette, ed. J. Dufournet (1973); J. Trotin, "Vers et Prose dans Aucassin et Nicolette," Rom 97 (1976); P. Menard, "La Composition de Aucassin et Nicolette," Mélanges de philologie et de littératures romanes offerts à Jeanne Wathelet-Willem (1978); K. Brownlee, "Discourse as Proueces in Aucassin et Nicolette," YFS 70 (1986); W. Godzich and J. Kittay, The Emergence of Prose (1987), ch. 5; A. E. Cobby, Ambivalent Conventions (1995).

I. SILVER; B. ROWLAND

CHANT ROYAL. One of the most complex and difficult of the OF verse forms. Related to the ballade*, the chant royal in its most common form (as described in the 14th c. by Eustache Deschamps) consists of five stanzas of 11 lines each rhyming ababccddedE (the capital denotes a refrain), followed by a five-line envoi rhyming ddedE. It is further distinguished by the use of the refrain at the end of each stanza and the envoi and by the fact that, except in the envoi, no rhyme words may be used twice. Thus, 60 lines must be rhymed on five rhyme sounds—a formidable technical task. Its most common theme is love, spiritual or human, embodied in the beautiful courtly lady. The name probably derives from its popularity in literary contests in the bourgeois poet guilds of northern France (puys royaux). The term first appears in Nicole de Margival's "Dit de la panthère d'amours" (late 13th c.), but the form, not yet fixed, was used by *troubadours and *trouvères in the 12th c. Through Guillaume de Machaut, Jean Froissart, and Deschamps in the 14th c., the chant royal found wide recognition; but by the 15th c., its popularity waned. Clément Marot composed four chant royaux, mainly on religious themes. The Pléiade* banned the form, but in the 19th and 20th cs., attempts were made to revive it by Théodore de Banville and others. Some of these, like Deschamps, used it for satirical commentary as well as for elevated themes; others, e.g., Richard Le Gallienne, reduced it to vers de société. Paul Valéry remarked that, by comparison, the *sonnet is child's play.

■ Kastner; Patterson; L. Stewart, "The Chant Royal, a Study of the Evolution of a Genre," Romania 96 (1975); Morier, "Ballade"; Revue des langues romans 108.1 (2004)—spec. issue on chant royal.

A. Preminger; B. Rowland

CHARACTER, THEOPHRASTAN. At the heart of the trad. of the Theophrastan character lies the philosophical question of reference, i.e., the mechanism underlying how words refer either to abstract ideals and generic types or to concrete, particular individuals. At stake is not only the vacillation between abstract and concrete reference but how this vacillation exhibits itself through a parallel tension between definition and description.

The tradition begins in the late 4th c. BCE with the peripatetic philosopher Theophrastus's work Χαρακτῆρες (Characters), which expands on the discussions of human nature in his teacher Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics and Rhetoric. After briefly defining a vice, such as garrulity or arrogance, each of the work's 30 sketches then illustrates the vice by a list of behaviors typical of Athenians who embody it. These behavioral descriptions are so concrete that they seem to be descriptions of actual Athenian individuals, i.e., to refer to particulars. However concrete they may seem, the descriptions always refer to generic types; therefore, the subjects of both the definitions and the descriptions in Theophrastus's sketches remain abstract.

Although subsumed by Roman rhet. as ornament, after Theophrastus the character sketch as genre remains unimportant until Isaac Casaubon's 1592 trans. of Theophrastus into Latin brings the work back into fashion. In 17th-c. England, Joseph Hall, Sir Thomas Overbury, and John Earle lead the trad. Unlike Theophrastus, their works add sketches of virtues alongside vices to underscore moral purpose. Because they closely imitate Theophrastus's form, however, they preserve the typological character of his definitions and descriptions. Introducing the proper name, Ben Jonson's Epigrams (1616) shifts the nature of reference in the trad. While Jonson retains Theophrastus's—and in his case, Martial's—model to exhibit vices through descriptions of anonymous types, he departs from Theophrastus in that certain of his epigrams name actual individuals, such as John Donne or Thomas Overbury, to extol their virtues alongside his own talent for empirical observation. For the first time in the trad.'s hist., concrete descriptions refer to particular individuals.

Further developments take place in 17th-c. Spain and France. In his Oráculo manual y arte de prudencia (The Art of Worldly Wisdom [1647]), Baltasar Gracián lists behaviors the reader can adopt, according to circumstance, for self-benefit. In turn, his descriptions refer not to types and individuals imbued with definable moral qualities but to virtual conventions. Finally, in his 1688 Caractères, Jean de La Bruyère, like Jonson, assigns his characters proper names, seeming to mark again the union between concrete description and particular reference. Unlike Jonson, however, his proper names refer not to actual individuals but to fictional characters, thereby introducing a new referential territory, a virtual space between the particular and the generic. Omitting the traditional opening definition of each sketch's vice, moreover, he forces his reader to induce what vice each fictional individual represents; this reverses the logical procession from abstract definition to concrete description inherited from Theophrastus.

■ J. Bos, "Individuality and Inwardness in the Literary Character Sketches of the Seventeenth Century," Journal of the Warburg and Courtald Institutes 61 (1998); M. Escola, "Le statut des definitions dans les Caractères: de Théophraste à La Bruyère," Lalies 17 (1997); M. Stein, Definition und Schilderung in Theophrasts Charakteren (1992).

K. Hume

CHARM (Lat. carmen, "song" or "lyric poetry"; also "magic formula" or *"incantation"). Now both a physical amulet worn for magical purposes and a verbal formula used for magical effects. In practice, verbal charms accompany ritual actions and are themselves treated as physical actions or "verbal missiles" (Malinowski); they thus can be turned back by a stronger magician. Charms are used worldwide in traditional cultures for healing (medicinal and fertility charms), success (hunting, weather, love charms), and attack and defense (curses and protection charms). They are usually fixed, traditional texts, partly in a "special language" of power marked by thick, irregular patterns of *repetition (sounds, words, phrases) and often involving archaic vocabulary, unusual phonological and grammatical forms, esoteric names and allusions, or other elements of obscure meaning. A dozen metrical charms survive in OE, accompanied by directions in prose for ritual actions, and the power of several (e.g., "For Infertile Land," "Against a Sudden Stitch") can still be felt.

Magical charms have been directly imitated in Eng. lit. from Beowulf (the curse laid on the gold, 3069–75) through Shakespeare (the witches' charm in Macbeth 4.1.1–38) to Ezra Pound ("The Alchemist"). On a deeper level, the principle of charms lies beneath both *love poetry (words used to attract a beloved) and *satire (words used to wound an enemy). Even deeper connections exist in the belief that power resides in *sound: poetry strongly influenced by thick sound-patterns of *alliteration, *assonance, *internal rhyme, and word repetition (e.g., in Edmund Spenser, E. A. Poe, and G. M. Hopkins) resembles and partakes somewhat of the ethos of lang. selected for magical purposes and is primarily concerned with evoking and transmitting power.

■ H. M. Chadwick and N. K. Chadwick, The Growth of Literature, v. 1 (1932), ch. 15; A. Huxley, "Magic," Texts and Pretexts (1933); B. Malinowski, Coral Gardens and Their Magic, 2 v. (1935)—texts and theory of Trobriand charms; The Anglo-Saxon Minor Poems, ed. E.V.K. Dobbie (1942)—texts of OE metrical charms; Frye; R. C. Elliott, The Power of Satire (1960); H. D. Chickering Jr., "The Literary Magic of 'Wið Færstice,'" Viator 2 (1971)—on OE; N. Frye, "Charms and Riddles," Spiritus Mundi (1976); Welsh; H. S. Versnel, "The Poetics of the Magical Charm: An Essay in the Power of Words," Magic and Ritual in the Ancient World, ed. P. Mirecki and M. Meyer (2002); J. Roper, English Verbal Charms (2005); L. K. Arnovick, Written Reliquaries (2006)—on med. Eng.

A. Welsh

CHASTUSHKA. The miniature Rus. lyric folk song genre called chastushka (fast song) emerged in the 1860s and has since, along with the anekdot (joke), become one of the most productive forms in Rus. folklore. The chastushka originates in both city and village; mixes literary and folk elements; ranges from "true" (and often bawdy) folk poetry to political slogans; may be sung, recited, accompanied by a musical instrument, or danced to; is highly improvisational and topical; and concerns mainly young people. The most common type consists of four lines, which usually rhyme. A female lead singer and chorus may perform such "ditties" in long thematically related strings. Jarxo connects the chastushka with similar songs in Ger. and Sp. ■ B. Jarxo, "Organische Struktur des russischen Schnaderhüpfles (Častuška)," Germanoslavica 3 (1935); S. Lazutin, Russkaja častuška (1960); V. Bokov and V. Baxtin, Častuška (1966); B. Stephan, Studien zur russischen Častuška und ihrer Entwicklung (1969); Y. Sokolov, Russian Folklore (1970); Terras; A. Volkov, Zavetnye chastushki (1999).

J. O. Bailey; C. Klamann

CHIASMUS (Gr., "a placing crosswise," from the Gr. letter X, "chi," and the verb chiazein, "to mark with diagonal lines like an X"). The repetition of a pair of sounds, words, phrases, or ideas in the reverse order, producing an abba structure, as in Satan's attempt to rally the rebel angels: "The mind is its own place, and in itself / Can make a Heav'n of Hell, a Hell of Heav'n" (Paradise Lost 1.254–55). Although the term chiasmus appears in Eng. in 1871, its mod. hist. is closely bound up with that of antimetabole*, the Eng. usage of which dates to George Puttenham's Arte of English Poesie in 1589 (OED). The earliest attestations of antimetabole can be found in Cousin, who cites definitions by Quintilian (9.3.85) and Alexander Numenius (3.37.23) and synonymous terms in Phoebammon (3.55.2). Quintilian gives two examples of antimetabole: "Non, ut edam, vivo; sed, ut vivam, edo" (I do not live that I may eat, but eat that I may live) and, from Cicero, "Ut et sine invidia culpa plectatur, et sine culpa invidia ponatur" (That both guilt may be punished without odium, and odium may be laid aside without guilt). While antimetabole (and its Lat. term commutatio) once covered all such reciprocal exchanges, regardless of alterations in case or tense, chiasmus now appears to be the more capacious term and antimetabole a species of chiasmus (Miller and Mermall). In recent literary theory, and esp. work influenced by deconstruction, chiasmus has enjoyed wide currency as a critical term. The trope has been esp. important for Derrida, since chiasmus lays bare the "natural invertability" of a hierarchy of two terms—a description that could apply just as easily to deconstruction (Beidler). Deconstructionists have employed chiasmus in specific instances to describe the tension between "theological thought and its linguistic underthought" in G. M. Hopkins (Miller) and "the reversal of the figural order" in R. M. Rilke (de Man).

Some of the most ancient examples of chiasmus are found in Ugaritic texts (1400–1200 BCE), which may have influenced the composition of the OT. Biblical exegetes have indeed revealed chiasmus in verse (Gen. 9:6: "Whoso sheds the blood of man, / By man his blood shall be shed") and chapter (the Gospels of Matthew and John, the letters of Paul) (Breck, Thomson). Although chiasmus frequently describes the repetition of particular phonemes or the inversion of clauses, it is not uncommon to find that an entire poem or novel has a chiastic structure or that several kinds of chiasmus are at work simultaneously. In Eunoia (2009), Christian Bök's clever "The scented dessert smells even sweeter when served ere the sweetness melts" features chiasmus of sound and syntax ("smells," "sweeter," "sweetness," "melts"). Affecting both semantics and syntax, Hopkins's line "This seeing the sick endears them to us, us too it endears" ("Felix Randal," 9) concludes with an *ellipsis of the grammatical object. If, as Thomson prefers, we construe chiasmus more broadly as the bilateral symmetry "of four or more elements around a central axis," the Epic of Gilgamesh, Chaucer's Parliament of Fowls, John Dryden's "A Song for St. Cecilia's Day," S. T. Coleridge's "Frost at Midnight" (Nänny), Alfred, Lord Tennyson's In Memoriam, and Raymond Roussel's Nouvelles Impressions d'Afrique might all be considered to have chiastic patterns. E. M. Forster famously attributes the "triumph" of Henry James's The Ambassadors to the chiastic, or "hourglass," shape of its plot. Quinn defines chiasmus by comparing it to other repetitive figures like epanodos, the amplification or expansion of a series, and palindrome*, a sentence that shows the same syntax and meaning forward or backward. The elliptical approach of chiasmus can sometimes be seen as an elegant *periphrasis of those emotions for which bald statement is impossible: "Grief has become the pain only pain erases" (Agha Shahid Ali, "Not All, Only a Few Return").

■ C. Walz, Rhetores Graeci, 9 v. (1832–36); Allen and Greenough's New Latin Grammar, ed. J. B. Greenough et al. (1903); E. M. Forster, Aspects of the Novel (1927); J. Cousin, Études sur Quintilien (1936); M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); M. M. Mahood, Shakespeare's Wordplay (1957); A. Di Marco, "Der Chiasmus in der Bibel," Linguistica Biblica 37–39 (1976); P. de Man, Allegories of Reading (1979); Chiasmus in Antiquity, ed. W. Welch (1981); Group μ; A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982); H. Horvei, The Chev'ril Glove (1984); J. Derrida, Glas, trans. J. P. Leavey Jr. and R. Rand (1986); J. H. Miller, "The Linguistic Moment," Gerard Manley Hopkins: Modern Critical Views, ed. H. Bloom (1986); R. Norman, Samuel Butler and the Meaning of Chiasmus (1986); W. Shea, "Chiasmus and the Structure of David's Lament," Journal of Biblical Literature 105 (1986); J. Derrida, The Truth in Painting, trans. G. Bennington and I. McLeod (1987); M. Nänny, "Chiasmus in Literature: Ornament or Function?" Word and Image 4 (1988); T. Mermall, "The Chiasmus: Unamuno's Master Trope," and J. W. Miller and T. Mermall, "Antimetabole and Chiasmus," PMLA 105 (1990); J. Veitch, " 'Moondust in the Prowling Eye': The History Poems of Robert Lowell," Contemporary Literature 33 (1992); J. Breck, The Shape of Biblical Language (1994); I. Thomson, Chiasmus in the Pauline Letters (1995); Lausberg; E.P.J. Corbett, Classical Rhetoric for the Modern Student, 4th ed. (1999); P. G. Beidler, "Chiastic Strands in The Wreck of the Deutschland," VP 38 (2000); S. Adams, Poetic Designs (2003); B. Costello, Shifting Ground (2003); H. Vendler, Poets Thinking (2006); M. Garber, Shakespeare and Modern Culture (2008); W. Engel, Chiastic Designs in English Literature from Sidney to Shakespeare (2009).

T.V.F. Brogan; A.W. Halsall; W. Hunter

CHICAGO SCHOOL. Originally, the "Chicago critics" were the authors of Critics and Criticism: Ancient and Modern (1952) and were so called because of their association with the University of Chicago; the label was later extended to some of their pupils and to others influenced by them. Major figures included R. S. Crane, Richard McKeon, Elder Olson, and Bernard Weinberg in the first generation; and Wayne Booth, Sheldon Sacks, Arthur Heiserman, and Ralph W. Rader in the second. The features of their approach to crit. that distinguished the group most clearly from other 20th-c. schools may be summed up under two heads: (1) what they called their pluralism and (2) what has been called by others their neo-Aristotelianism, the two terms referring, respectively, to the group's concern, as theorists and historians of crit., with investigating the logical grounds of variation among critical positions, and to its interest, as students of lit., in exploring the possibilities of a particular approach to the analysis and *evaluation of literary works that has seemed to them neglected.

The most explicit statements of their pluralism are contained in McKeon's "The Philosophic Bases of Art and Criticism" (1943), Olson's "An Outline of Poetic Theory" (1952), and Crane's The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry (1953). The basis of the view is the recognition that what any critic says on a literary subject, general or particular, is determined only in part by direct experience with literary works; it is conditioned no less importantly by the tacit assumptions concerning the nature of lit. and the most appropriate method of studying it that are brought to the immediate task: the critic will say different things about a given poem, e.g., or at least mean different things, according as he or she conceives of poetry as a species of artistic making or as a mental faculty or as a special kind of knowledge, and the results will likewise differ widely according to whether the critic's reasoning about it rests primarily on literal definitions and distinctions within the subject matter or primarily on analogies between it and other things, and so on through a good many other possible variations in principle and method.

In short, the Chicago critics proceeded on the assumption that, while some modes of crit. are more restricted in scope than others, there are and have been many valid critical approaches to lit., each of which exhibits the literary object in a different light and each of which has its characteristic powers and limitations, so that the only rational ground for adhering to any one of them over any of the others is its superior capacity to give the special kind of understanding and evaluation of lit. the reader wants, at least for the time being.

The so-called neo-Aristotelianism of the Chicago school represents a choice of this pragmatic sort. The special interest in the Poetics that appears in these critics' earlier work had its origin in their concern, as teachers of lit., with developing a kind of practical crit. of literary texts that (1) would emphasize the specifically artistic principles and reasons governing their construction, as distinct from their verbal meanings, their historical and biographical backgrounds, or their general qualitative characteristics, and that (2) would attach more importance to the principles peculiar to different kinds of texts and to individual texts within a given kind than to those common to lit. in general. The appeal of Aristotle to the critics of the Chicago school was that he, more than any other critic they knew, had conceived of literary theory in this a posteriori and differential way and had not only formulated some of its necessary distinctions and principles, in his brief discussions of ancient *tragedy and *epic, but had pointed the way to further inquiries of the same sort in other literary arts still unrealized at the time he wrote, particularly the *lyric, the drama, and the novel.

The Chicago school bequeathed to its students and followers not only its pluralism and neo-Aristotelianism but a general interest in the hist. of crit. By contrast, an intense interest in lang. was more characteristic of the *New Criticism and later *poststructuralism. The second generation of Chicago critics, notably Booth, turned the approach toward narrative and away from poetry, an emphasis that remains visible in the work of Chicago-influenced critics such as James Phelan.

See classical poetics.

■ Criticism and History: H. Trowbridge, "Aristotle and the New Criticism," Sewanee Review 52 (1944); W. K. Wimsatt, "The Chicago Critics," The Verbal Icon (1954); M. Krieger, The New Apologists for Poetry (1956); H. P. Teesing, "The Chicago School," OL, supp. 2 (1958); W. Sutton, Modern American Criticism (1963); Aristotle's Poetics and English Literature, ed. E. Olson (1965); Wellek, v. 6; M. Sprinker, "What Is Living and What Is Dead in Chicago Criticism," Boundary 2 13 (1985); V. B. Leitch, American Literary Criticism from the Thirties to the Eighties (1988), ch. 3; A. D. Schneider, Literaturkritik und Bildungspolitik

(1994); R. Zorach, "Love, Truth, Orthodoxy, Reticence; or, What Edgar Wind Didn't See in Botticelli's Primavera," CritI 34 (2007).

■ Primary Sources: R. McKeon, "The Philosophic Bases of Art and Criticism," Critics and Criticism: Ancient and Modern, ed. R. S. Crane (1952), abridged ed. with new intro. and list of other related writings (1957); N. Friedman and C. A. McLaughlin, Poetry: An Introduction to Its Form and Art (1961); R. S. Crane, The Idea of the Humanities (1967); E. Olson, Tragedy and the Theory of Drama (1961), The Theory of Comedy (1968), and On Value Judgment in the Arts (1976); W. C. Booth, Critical Understanding (1979), and The Rhetoric of Fiction, 2d ed. (1983).

R. S. Crane; H. Adams; R. Greene

CHICANA/O POETRY. Strictly speaking, Chicana/o poetry begins in the 1960s, with the rise of the Chicano Movement for civil rights and—inseparable from it—a politically engaged poetics. Its emergence and spread was facilitated by the over 60 movement and literary jours., such as El Grito, El Malcriado, and De Colores, that circulated as instruments of communication and politicization, as well as through poetry readings that served to mobilize Chicana/o activists. Most Chicano Movement poetry was committed to the communal struggle of its minority culture, a position reflected in its predominant themes: an identification with the pre-Columbian indigenous past and Mexican revolutionary periods; a revision of U.S. hist.; the glorification of heroic male personages and female icons; the exaltation of communal cohesion in the barrio (neighborhood), the centrality of the family, the relations between the sexes, carnalismo (brotherhood), and Mexican female strength and endurance; and the channeling of solidarity into political action. Much poetry of this era moved easily between Eng. and Sp. at the level of *diction and *syntax, while the most common rhythms were found in a *free verse adapted to sound like vernacular speech.

Of course, Chicana/o poetry had antecedents as early as the colonial period in the northern provinces of New Spain, now the U.S. Southwest. Gaspar Pérez de Villagrá's (1555–1620) epic Historia de la Nueva México (1610) was the first poetic rendering within the present U.S. territory of the racial and cultural conflicts that have plagued the country since the Eur. arrival.

From the mid-19th c. on, the corrido—descended from a med. Sp. romance *ballad form—served as the foundation for other literary and artistic genres and constituted a philosophical folklore, a critical vernacular hist. of the region, and a poetic chronicle of the early making of a mod. U.S.-Mexico borderlands culture from out of the Sp. colonial and early republican past. A particular version of the corrido developed along the newly formed U.S.-Mexico border in response to the increasingly violent contact between Anglos and Mexicans along the border after 1848. These "border corridos" expressed a collective adversarial consciousness against oppression and a sense of violated communal social order and told of the actions of a local hero attempting to defend local community values against some outside threat.

"El corrido de Gregorio Cortez" is typical of this genre. An anonymous folk narrative composed in eight-syllable *quatrains with a rhyme pattern of abcb, sung in 3/4 or 6/8 time, the ballad narrative is framed with formulaic openings and closings. It sings of a humble workingman who, goaded into violence and unjustly accused, could fight for his rights "with his pistol in his hand." A genre not based on personal experience, the corrido adopts a transpersonal perspective, representing the political and existential values of the community as a whole. Like cl. *epic, it takes a body of symbolically charged, iconically powerful experiences and plunges the audience into the middle of the story. Corridos like "Gregorio Cortez," thus, performed a three-part symbolic function: they served as narratives of political hist., as repositories of the essential facts of social struggle, and as condensed versions of basic knowledge necessary for resistance.

In the 20th c., Eng. appeared more frequently in written poetry produced by Mexican Americans, though community newspapers still published in Sp. poems by leading Latin Am. writers. During the Mexican Revolution and its aftermath (1910–36), a number of Mexican intellectuals immigrated to the U.S. and worked on newspapers; Latin Am. modernista poetry was belatedly introduced to Mexican Am. readers during this period. Although the Sp. oral trad. was kept alive through immigration, public schooling in the U.S. was almost exclusively conducted in Eng., affecting both ling. capabilities and the knowledge of a formal poetic trad. in Sp.; this fact, coupled with the dominance of Eng. in the print media, explains the increase in Eng.-lang. poetry written by Mexican Americans in the first half of the 20th c. Fray Angélico Chávez's (1910–96) Clothed with the Son (1939) and Eleven Lady-Lyrics and Other Poems (1945) were acclaimed by critics.

By the mid-20th c., the twin pressures of Americanization and modernization severely eroded the formerly cohesive qualities of traditional poetic social forms. Américo Paredes's (1915–99) poetry from this period as collected in Between Two Worlds (1991) and Cantos de Adolescencia/Songs of Youth (1932–37) (2007) points to the multiple and complex reasons for this erosion, incl. attacks by Anglo Am. social institutions on the legitimacy of Mexican cultural forms in a mod. Am. context and the internal stresses, contradictions, and limitations of those traditional forms in themselves. In "Guitarreros" (1935), Paredes directs our attention to the play between langs. and cultures, as sites where modes of consciousness are made and unmade in the space between cultures and trads.:

Bajaron el toro prieto, que nunca lo habían bajado . . .
Black against twisted black
The old mesquite
Rears up against the stars
Branch bridle hanging,
While the bull comes down from the mountain
Driven along by your fingers, Twenty nimble stallions prancing up and down the redil of the guitars.

(Between Two Worlds, 1991)

With the end of the historical moment of armed struggle after the sedition of 1915 and the emergence of new historical situations, Paredes laid the groundwork for new formal strategies, a new poetic lang., and a new bilingual aesthetic, to overcome the impasses and contradictions that the values and social structures of a former era could no longer resolve. The invention of these new langs. and forms was Chicana and Chicano *modernism itself.

By mid-century, the vibrant flowering of writings by Chicana writers seeking to raise those articulations of race, class, and gender to the level of critique shows that gender factors, no less than those of class and race, functioned to create a poetry that completely revises the general notion of an undifferentiated Chicano (male) poetic subject. Heirs to the male-centered corrido trad., many male poets of the early Chicano Movement years continued to seek a new spirit of aggressive resistance to assimilation by championing a Chicano cultural nationalism that denied the existence of gender, sexual, racial, or class conflict and diversity.

Rodolfo Gonzales's (1928–2005) *manifesto, I Am Joaquin/Yo Soy Joaquín: An Epic Poem (1967), demanded Chicana/os withdraw from U.S. social oppression into their communal trads. to rediscover their identity as survivors and warriors. Abelardo Delgado's (1930–2004) "Stupid america" (1969) proclaimed the nation's future greatness if Chicana/os were allowed to fulfill their creative potential and the self-destruction that was the alternative. Viola Correa's "La Nueva Chicana" (1970) called attention to the multigenerational social roles of Chicanas fighting for revolution. Alurista's (pseud. of Alberto Urista Heredia, b. 1947) Floricanto en Aztlán (Flower Song in Aztlán, 1971) proposed a hybrid of pre-Columbian philosophy and third-world anticapitalism as a survival strategy amid U.S. racism and class exploitation. Ricardo Sánchez's (1941–95) Canto y grito mi liberación (I Sing and Shout My Liberation, 1971) railed against U.S. life as an alienating prison. In Perros y antiperros (Dogs and Anti-dogs, 1972), Sergio Elizondo (b. 1930) toured the hist. and geography of the Southwest to denounce Anglo-Am. encroachment and the dehumanizing character of U.S. society, positing a refuge in the Chicana/o community's love and humanity. In "I Speak an Illusion" (1973), the pinta (prison) poet Judy Lucero articulates the contradictions of her Chicana experience while lamenting the apparently unbreakable bonds that incarcerate her. And while Tino Villanueva's (b. 1941) Hay Otra Voz Poems (There is Another Voice Poems, 1972) prefigured the introspective turn and the heightened awareness of lyric craft and *tropes to come in the mid-1970s, it culminated in a declaration of the poet's dedication to communal political struggle in a bilingual idiom that is itself a metaphor of the ideological message.

This poetry's most distinctive stylistic features were the predominance of narrative and mimetic over lyrical and figurative modes of expression and bilingualism, a combination of Sp., Eng., and subdialects. Prime exponents of the latter were José Montoya (b. 1932) and Alurista:

Hoy enterraron al Louie
(Today they buried El Louie)
And San Pedro o sanpinche
(St. Peter or saintdamned) are in for it. And those times of the forties and the early fifties lost un vato de atolle
(a really down dude)

(Montoya, "El Louie")

mis ojos hinchados
(my swollen eyes) flooded with lágrimas (tears) de bronze (of bronze) melting on the cheek bones of my concern

(Alurista, "Mis ojos hinchados")

Many volumes were published with facing trans., e.g. I Am Joaquin/Yo Soy Joaquín or Perros y antiperros, which opened Chicana/o poetry to a wider readership.

As the Chicano Movement matured into the 1970s, existing tensions within activist communities became more apparent, and the control that Chicano nationalists had exercised over the editorial policies of movement and literary jours. began to ease. Chicanas, many of whom were participants in feminist organizations, increasingly moved onto the editorial boards of existing publications or founded jours. such as Encuentro Feminil, Comadre, and Mango that were dedicated to publishing Chicana writing or editorially controlled by Chicanas. The result was a flowering of poetry by Chicanas that responded to the subordination of women in Chicana/o communities, thematized the act of writing as a strategy for female liberation, explored Chicanas's relationships to each other and to themselves, and celebrated female sexual emancipation. Judy Flores Gonzales's "Canto to My Womanness" (1976) and Lydia Camarillo's "Mi Reflejo" (1980) are just two of the many poems that reconceived the passive female subject in Gonzales's I Am Joaquin/Yo Soy Joaquín by linking Chicanas to powerful historical female figures. Lorna Dee Cervantes's (b. 1954) "Declaration on a Day of Little Inspiration" (1976) expressed her struggle to make poetry out of the material available to her as a poor Chicana living in a San Jose barrio. Alma Villanueva's (b. 1944) tender poem "strength" (1978) honors her mother's legacy. Cervantes's "You Cramp My Style, Baby" (1977) uses food imagery and irony to expose the rampant sexism of the more nationalist of the Chicano activists.

The devel. of Chicana/o poetry as a body of lit. brought with it an increased concern with craft. While narrative tendencies, bilingualism, and appeals to an indigenous past remained as significant features, the use of tropes and intertexual references to non-Mexican and Chicana/o source material increased. Bernice Zamora's (b. 1938) Restless Serpents (1976) engages the work of Shakespeare, Robinson Jeffers, and Theodore Roethke. Rafael Jesús González's (b. 1935) "The Coin, Ars Poetica" (1977) ends with a cultural juxtaposition that inserts traditional Chicana/o themes into a broader conversation:

> the sky-eagle > devouring the earth-serpent > as a sign.
> The Aztec ball player > losing the game lost his heart > to keep alive the gods.
> The wells claim it:
> Li Po > would die > needing it > for the moon.
>
> ("Coin, Ars Poetica")

Lucha Corpi (b. 1945) ends her 1980 tribute to Emily Dickinson with

> We are . . . migrant > workers in search of > floating gardens as yet > unsown, as yet, unharvested.

Cervantes's first book of poetry, Emplumada (1981), and Sandra Cisneros's (b. 1954) Bad Boys (1980) and My Wicked Wicked Ways (1987) treat a wide range of themes even as they set pre-Columbian mythical figures alongside those from the Gr. and Roman pantheons. Luis Omar Salinas (1937–2008), known as a 1960s Movement poet for his "Aztec Angel" poem, has few Chicana/o references in Darkness under the Tress / Walking behind the Spanish (1982), yet he remains an influential Chicana/o poet. Gary Soto's (b. 1952) Black Hair (1985) is a Chicana/o work, yet readers can easily place it within the broader context of the U.S. experience.

In recent years, Chicana/o poetry has developed in multiple directions, reflecting the values of poets who are perhaps more intellectually and socially diverse than those of the 1960s and 1970s. Juan Felipe Herrera (b. 1948) is best known for a richly lyrical poetry of urban life, often in Los Angeles and San Francisco; his notable books include Exiles of Desire (1985); Akrilica (1989), a set of 41 poems curated by "color" and topic, like paintings; Night Train to Tuxtla (1994), autobiographical poems about the Chicano poet's "continuous trek into himself"; and Half the World in Light (2008), a career retrospective with new poems. Cervantes has published two additional volumes of poetry, From the Cables of Genocide: Poems of Hunger and Love (1991) and Drive: The First Quartet (2006), that combine a developing poetic voice with a concern for social injustice, identity, and women-centered artistic and intellectual activity. The poems in Cisneros's Loose Woman (1996) celebrate a fiercely independent woman of Mexican heritage whose sexuality is a key source of her power. The anthropologist Renato Rosaldo's (b. 1941) Prayer to Spider Woman/Rezo a la Mujer Araña (2003) is a collection of 48 poems of enormous cultural range, from the barrio to Mexico to the Philippines. The Chicano and Native Am. poet Jimmy Santiago Baca (b. 1952) began to write in prison, first publishing Immigrants in Our Own Land (1979). He maintains a concern with the intersections of work, community, the New Mexican landscape, and myth in such collections as Martin; And Meditations of the South Valley (1987) and Black Mesa Poems (1989). Ana Castillo (b. 1953), born in Chicago, writes about the complex layers of women's lives in the U.S. and Mexico, as in My Father Was a Toltec and Selected Poems, 1973–1988 (1995). Cherríe Moraga's (b. 1952) Loving in the War Years (1983) is a classic collection of poems, stories, and essays about coming to terms with lesbian sexuality within Chicano culture. Michele Serros (b. 1966) is a spoken-word poet and social commentator; like Moraga's collection, her Chicana Falsa and Other Stories of Death, Identity and Oxnard (1993) is multigeneric. Many younger poets deserve notice, among them J. Michael Martinez (b. 1978), whose volume Heredities (2009) unsettles the constructions of identity and aesthetics of previous generations to recover a voice estranged from itself ("History gathers in the name we never are"); and the Afro-Chicano John Murillo (b. 1971), whose collection Up from the Boogie (2010) displays an array of stanzas and free verse, musical influences from *blues to *hip-hop to reggaeton, and even a parody of Ezra Pound's "In a Station of the Metro" located in the Los Angeles Metro.

See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; MEXICO, POETRY OF; SPAIN, POETRY OF; UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE.

■ Anthologies: El ombligo de Aztlán, ed. Alurista (1972); ENTRANCE: Four Chicano Poets, ed. L. Adame (1975); El Quetzal emplumece, ed. C. Montalvo (1976); Siete poetas, ed. M. Bornstein-Somoza (1978); Fiesta in Aztlán, ed. T. Empringham (1981); Contemporary Chicano Poetry, ed. W. Binder (1986); Antología de la Poesía Chicana / Anthology of Chicano Poetry, ed. R. Burk et al. (1997); La Lunate, ed. M. D. Pinate (2010)—spoken-word poetry from San Francisco.

■ Criticism and History: J. Bruce-Novoa, Chicano Authors, Inquiry by Interview (1980), and Chicano Poetry: A Response to Chaos (1982); M. Sanchez, Contemporary Chicano Poetry (1985); W. Binder, Partial Autobiographies: Interviews With Twenty Chicano Poets (1986); C. Candelaria, Chicano Poetry (1986); J. E. Limón, Mexican Ballads, Chicano Poems (1991); R. Pérez-Torres, Movements in Chicano Poetry (1995); A. Arteaga, Chicano Poetics (1997); Formas narrativas de la tradición oral de México, ed. M. Zavala Gómez de Campo (2009).

J. BRUCE-NOVOA; P.M.L. MOYA; R. SALDÍVAR

CHILE, POETRY OF. The Sp.-lang. trad. in Chilean poetry begins with the publication of La Araucana (The Araucaniad) by Alonso de Ercilla (1533–94), born in Spain, who wrote about the conquest of Chile. This *epic, which documents the founding of Chile, was published in three parts in 1569, 1578, and 1589; Andrés Bello called it Chile's Aeneid. Written in octavas reales, it belongs to early mod. trad. in its use of Gr. mythology, cl. references, and themes, incl. the faith and daring of the Spaniards and the heroism and sacrifice of the natives. It inspired later romantics with its vision of the noble savage and also inspired the next well-known colonial Chilean writer Pedro de Oña (1570–1643), who entered into dialogue with Ercilla with his poem Arauco domado (1596).

Oña's is a less idealistic portrayal of the indigenous people, written in memory of the poet's father, who was killed by Mapuches. This epic includes 19 cantos, hendecasyllabic octaves with rhyme schemes that do not follow Ercilla's octavas reales. Oña, born in Chile, received a Sp. education in Lima and has sometimes been regarded as not Chilean; it is clear in his poem that he views the country as a colony. His other notable poems include "El temblor de Lima" (The Earthquake of Lima, 1609), in which he uses a new kind of ottava rima and demonstrates the influence of the culteranismo of Sp. poets such as Luis de Góngora (see CONCEIT, CONCEPTISMO), and his heroic, religious poems "El Vasauro" (1635) and "El Ignacio de Cantabria" (1639).

Not much poetic production of note was recorded in the 17th and 18th cs.: there are poems of salon life, songs of praise, and popular poetry collected as part of Chilean folklore. Alegría mentions Father López, Father Oteíza, and Captain Lorenzo Mujica but categorizes them as "poets of circumstance." Popular poets wrote in décimas*, or ten-line stanzas, and popular *quatrains. Corridos (*ballads), payas (poetic compositions with improvised verses), and chronicles in verse that use dramatic forms to treat human and divine themes comprise the Chilean version of the Sp. romancero (or ballad trad.; see ROMANCE).

Chile gained its independence in 1818, and poets of this period include Camilo Henríquez (1769–1845), a journalist who believed that poetry had a role in the moral and political education of the populace and who was recognized more for his political ideas than his poetry. Bernando Vera y Pintado (1780–1827), though born in Argentina, died in Chile and celebrated Chilean independence in his poems, one of which was transformed into the first national hymn (see ANTHEM, NATIONAL). Mercedes Marín del Solar (1804–66) combined neoclassical and romantic styles. The Venezuelan Bello (1781–1865) and the Argentine Domingo Faustino Sarmiento (1811–88) worked and lived in Chile, and their debates (particularly about *romanticism) were influential in Chilean literary conversations. José Victorino Lastarria (1817–88) wrote noteworthy essays about Chilean lit. and argued that Chile was late in developing its own lit. because of its political autocracy and backward social devel. The literary movement Generation of 1842, an answer to Lastarria, produced a national literary society that emphasized national expression, rejected Sp. romanticism, and championed renovating Chilean lit. by cultivating a progressive attitude.

Romanticism came late to Spain, and still later to Chile, and perhaps for this reason, Alegría argues, it is more distinctive there. Salvador Sanfuentes y Torres (1817–60) follows the indigenist themes of Ercilla and Oña, with Caupolicán (1835), a drama in verse in the romantic trad. Other important names in Chilean romanticism include Guillermo Blest Gana (1829–1904), José Antonio Soffia (1843–86), and Eusebio Lillo y Robles (1827–1910), a disciple of José Espronceda and José Zorrilla, who wrote a new Chilean national anthem.

Early 20th-c. Sp. Am. writers experienced a contradictory *modernism, inheriting forms and trads. from Europe usually elaborated by elite writers, who struggled to found their own literary hist. in their poetry. This effort to develop a local perspective in Chile resulted in Los Diez (The Ten), a literary group dedicated to independent expression founded by Pedro Prado (1886–1952). Prado was a meditative poet who used *symbolism and *free verse, as well as sonnets and poetic prose, to record the local Chilean landscape and territory. Magallanes Moure (1878–1924) is another member of the group whose first book of poetry, Facetas (Facets, 1902), used traditional forms like the sonnet and sought modernist formal perfection in his portraits of country life. Not a member of the group but a notable early avant-garde writer of this time is Rosamel del Valle (pseud. of Moisés Filadelfio Gutiérrez Gutiérrez, 1900–65), who used long lines and a hermetic style in his sometimes visionary poetry; he published seven collections and was admired later by Vicente Huidobro. While some of these writers' styles are grounded in Sp. Am. modernismo*, others move toward the avant-garde, which would prove to be much more fruitful and innovative than earlier poetry in Chile (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS).

Pablo de Rokha (pseud. of Carlos Díaz Loyola, 1894–1968) is an early representative of the Chilean avant-garde. An innovator, he wrote in long lines that often lacked punctuation and chose antipoetic themes. He uses lang. as a weapon and combines many different genres: epic and lyric, popular and surrealist. He attempted to renovate poetry through excess and exaggeration, and his work is an important expression of Chilean identity. Huidobro (1893–1948), who traveled to Buenos Aires, Spain, and France, is perhaps the most recognized proponent of the post-World War II literary avant-garde. He was a modernist in his early work, but his travels led him to found a movement called creacionismo (*creationism), complete with its own manifestos that highlighted its poetry's originality and capacity to make things happen with lang. His masterwork is the long poem Altazor (1931), which charts the existential and ling. crisis of its namesake.

Gabriela Mistral (pseud. of Lucila Godoy Acayaga, 1889–1957), in 1945 the first Latin Am. to win a Nobel Prize in Literature, addressed in her poetry topics such as Chilean and Am. identity, religion, childhood, love, suffering, maternity, and rebellion. She combines a local, formal lang. with a passionate tone, often speaking as an outsider in her books: Desolación (Desolation, 1922), Ternura (Tenderness, 1924), Tala (Felling, 1938), and Poema de Chile (published posthumously in 1967). Writing during the time of multiple avant-gardes, she chose an anachronic *formalism and *tone; for these among other reasons, Concha argues that Mistral's work can be seen as part of an autochthonous vanguard. Mistral is recognized for her prose as well as her poetry, for her stances as an international intellectual and educator, and for her defense of human rights.

Pablo Neruda (pseud. of Ricardo Neftalí Reyes Basoalto, 1904–73) is the major figure in 20th-c. Chilean (and beyond that, Sp. Am.) poetry. In 1924, he published Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada (Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair), his second book of poems with neoromantic roots, which remains popular today. He enters the avant-garde with his Residencia en la tierra (Residence on Earth), three volumes published in 1935–47, in which the poet uses bold metaphors and rhythmic free verse to communicate surprising experiences of the world. In Canto general (1950), Neruda creates a prophetic voice in a long epic poem to sing the social and political hist. of the continent, while his Odas elementales (Elemental Odes) of the 1950s are direct poems in which he draws on sometimes complex metaphors to catalog everyday objects imbued with unanticipated emotion. Like Mistral, Neruda was a renowned public figure; exiled for his political views and later a senator, he was a supporter of Salvador Allende's Popular Unity presidency, and his death coincided with the coup that brought Augusto Pinochet to power in 1973. Neruda's work has been translated into many langs., and he is the first Chilean figure to enter the *canon of world poetry; perhaps for this reason, contemporaneous poets such as Pablo de Rokha and Nicanor Parra, as well as later poets, reacted against his at times overwhelming influence.

The year 1954 is key in Chilean poetry, when Parra (b. 1914) published his Poemas y antipoemas (Poems and Antipoems) as a response to Neruda and to the conventional idea of poetry as ritual, elevated expression for elite readers. Parra forged an alternate path through poetry that used colloquial, prosaic lang., self-irony, and ludic qualities to approach everyday life. Parra's relativization of the world was reflected in new attitudes in his poetic speakers, who question and parody trad. and modernity in poems that interrogate both form and content. His ongoing struggle with convention is apparent in Artefactos (Artifacts, 1972), a box of picture postcard-poems that challenged the idea of the *book.

Much of mid-20th c. Chilean poetry responds to these canonical figures; it splits or crosses lines of influence from the avant-garde and antipoetry (which has a decisive influence on much of the poetry that follows and is both part of the vanguards and a reaction against them). Gonzalo Rojas (1917–2011) follows Parra's lead with his vigorous social poetry, in themes that extend from the erotic to the existential and ontological. Associated with the surrealist group La Mandrágora (The Mandrake), Rojas sought to communicate with a broader audience. Enrique Lihn's (1929–88) work is also more closely linked to Parra's than to Neruda's. Lihn tackles definitive questions such as the meaning of life, suffering, and death and demonstrates a commitment to social reality, moving toward poesía situada (situated poetry), a poetics that speaks from and about the situation of the speaker and that constantly recreates itself. Closer to Neruda, perhaps, is Jorge Teillier (1935–96). He writes of Chile's southern regions in poetry of origins, childhood, nostalgia, and mythic creation; and his speaker is sometimes a visionary witness. He uses simple, direct lines and metaphor to make the region a symbolic zone. Popular poetry in this period may be seen in the work of Violeta Parra (1917–67), who was central to the Chilean New Song movement. Widely recognized as a musician, she also can be considered a popular poet.

The 1960s and 1970s include the pre-Salvador Allende generation and those who first experienced the Pinochet dictatorship following the coup of 1973. Figures of the 1960s include Waldo Rojas (b. 1944), whose work incorporates a reflexive, metapoetic intensity as he writes and rewrites his perceptions of the world. There is a continuity from his early books, such as Príncipe de naipes (Prince of Cards, 1966) to the later Deber de urbanidad (Urban Obligation, 2001), in which memory and exploration of symbolic space predominate (in the last example, the space is Paris, where Rojas moved in 1974). Jaime Quezada (b. 1942) is another member of this generation, recognized for his contemplation of daily life in an accessible style; Quezada's interest in Chilean poetry is also seen through his work as an editor of authors such as Mistral, Neruda, and Nicanor Parra. The early idealism and political dynamism of the 1960s shifted with the political turmoil in the early 1970s. Topics such as exile, direct repression, and the climate of fear and persecution began to predominate; and for this reason, the 1970s in Chilean letters is called the dispersed or decimated generation. Some of its members are Floridor Pérez (b. 1937), who followed in the footsteps of Teillier but integrated humor and irony more characteristic of Nicanor Parra into his work. Oscar Hahn (b. 1938) uses surrealist elements and imagery in sonnets and free verse with sonorous intensity to speak of mortality, love, and alienation. Gonzalo Millán's (1947–2006) work is a constant rereading of himself. He also examines the relationship between image and text (he was a sculptor and visual artist) with complexity in poems conceived as series. His 1987 book Virus reflects on the function of poetry and art confronted with power. Like many members of the 1960s and 1970s generations, both Hahn and Millán spent significant time exiled from Chile.

The 1980s in Chile meant writing within the dictatorship, in a precarious and hostile situation of domination, and writers found different strategies for confronting the role of art in a repressive society. Alejandra Basualto (b. 1944) has discussed the conditions of internal exile for those who remained in the country, the lack of books coming into Chile, and the devel. of workshops to communicate at this time. A community developed among women writers, such as Eugenia Brito (b. 1950), who textualizes physical suffering and combines genres in her more recent Extraña permanecia (Strange Permanence, 2004); and Verónica Zondek (b. 1953), who uses her often abstract poetry to reconstruct and learn through pain and memory. Carmen Berenguer (b. 1946) has continued in the avant-garde vein with her radical, experimental, feminist work. She writes hermetic poetry that frequently deals with the situation of marginalized, oppressed, fragmented subjects both during and after the dictatorship. Elvira Hernández (b. 1951) also deals with marginal identities, expressed in ruptured syntax in books like Santiago Waria (1992), in which she connects the city to its indigenous past, and La bandera de Chile (1991), where she empties and resignifies the national emblem (some of these works circulated clandestinely before they were published in the early 1990s).

Juan Luis Martínez (1942–93) is also in the avant-garde line in his attempt to create a new kind of poetry. La nueva novela (1985) is a poetic object or an inter-artistic experiment with a new kind of literary expression that incorporates humor and textual play (he is a clear descendant of Nicanor Parra). Tomás Harris's (b. 1956) mythological and poetic voyages through the city chronicle uneven devel., while Diego Maqueira (b. 1951) combines high cultural and popular registers and alters the conventional depiction of time. Raúl Zurita (b. 1951) extends an avant-garde desire to put poetry into action and uses surrealist images, self-referentiality, and multiple voices in his poetry. He is recognized for conjoining written words with performances via sky and desert writing and photos in his texts, which form a Dantesque chronicle of Chile's suffering: Purgatorio (1979), Anteparaíso (1982), and La vida nueva (1993).

In the 1990s, the transition to democracy opened the doors to increased expression and new voices, many of whom have become known as the shipwrecked generation. The transition also focused attention on multiculturalism and the work of Elicura Chihuailaf (b. 1952), a Mapuche poet (see MAPUCHE POETRY) who publishes in Mapuzungun and Sp.; she became one of a number of poets who undermined the unitary vision of Chile promoted under Pinochet. In some ways, their work can be read as a response to the founding poetry of Ercilla, for they represent their own ethnic and national identity, record trads., and add their voices to political debates and land disputes (Vicuña includes Chihuailaf, Leonel Lienlaf, Jaime Luis Huenun, and Graciela Huinao in her collection). Poets of the 1990s continue the dialogue with precursors such as Lihn, Parra and anti-poesía, and Rokha to experiment with *typography and the book (Martínez) and to acknowledge Mistral. Their diversity of topics and styles extends from globalization and mass media to love, loss, and the circumstances of late 20th-c. Chile: material excess and commoditization, visual culture, and shifting social values. One of these, Clemente Riedemann (b. 1953), offers another perspective from the south, using accessible, colloquial lang. in his ironic recording of contemp. society, esp. Chile's role at the turn of the 21st c.

The early 21st-c. poets are known as the novísimos (the new ones), and they return to the poets of the 1980s for inspiration. Some names associated with this group are Diego Ramírez (b. 1982), Paula Ilabaca Nuñez (b. 1979), and Héctor Hernández Montecinos (b. 1979), who chose diverse styles to question social and literary convention in work that is not limited to writing but includes music, visual elements, installation, performance, and recordings. Some recent winners of the Neruda Prize in poetry (for writers under 40) include Rafael Rubio (b. 1975), Javier Bello (b. 1972), and Malú Urriola (b. 1967).

■ Anthologies: Antología de la poesía chilena contemporánea, ed. R. E. Scarpa and H. Montes (1968); Antología de la poesía chilena (siglos XVI al XX), ed. L. Cisternas de Minguez and M. Minguez Sender (1969); Veinticinco años de poesía chilena (1970–1995), ed. T. Calderón, L. Calderón, and T. Harris (1996); Antología de poesía chilena nueva (1935), ed. E. Anguita and V. Teitelboim (2001); 20 poetas mapuches contemporaneos, ed. J. Huenún (2003); Poesía chilena desclasificada (1973–1990), ed. G. Contreras and J. Concha, vol. 1 (2005); Diecinueve (poetas chilenos de los noventa), ed. F. Lange Valdés (2006).

■ Criticism and History: F. Alegría, La poesía chilena (1954); H. Montes and J. Orlando, Historia y antología de la literatura chilena (1965); J. Concha, Poesía chilena 1907–17 (1971); "La poesía chilena actual," Literatura chilena en el exilio 4.1 (1977); and Gabriela Mistral (1987); J. A. Piña, Conversaciones con la poesía chilena (1990); UL: 4 Mapuche poets, ed. C. Vicuña (1998); F. Schopf, Del vanguardismo a la antipoesía (2000).

■ Web Site: Escritores y poetas en español, http://www.letras.s5.com.

J. KUHNHEIM

CHINA, MODERN POETRY OF. In China, there is not a single standard term for mod. poetry. Before 1949, poetry written in the contemp. vernacular and nontraditional forms was commonly called New Poetry or Vernacular Poetry. After 1949, China was divided into three political entities: the People's Republic of China on the mainland (PRC), the Republic of China on Taiwan (ROC), and Hong Kong under Brit. rule. Whereas New Poetry continued to be used in the PRC, it was gradually replaced by the term mod. poetry in Taiwan and Hong Kong as the result of a flourishing modernist movement.

In 1917, Hu Shi (1891–1962), then a PhD student in the U.S., published a short essay titled "A Preliminary Proposal for Literary Reform," in which he envisioned a new poetry written in the "living language" (as opposed to cl. Chinese as a "dead language") and freed from traditional forms. Although certain genres of traditional Chinese poetry, such as folk song, ballad, and ci* (see CHINA, POPULAR POETRY OF), employ a fair share of the vernacular, the New Poetry that Hu advocated was iconoclastic in its rejection of all poetic conventions, incl. parallelism, stock imagery, allusions, and imitation of ancient masters, as well its lang. and forms.

Understandably, Hu's call for radical reform was met with crit. from conservative scholars, some of whom were his close friends. On the other hand, the poetry reform, newly dubbed Literary Revolution by Chen Duxiu (1879–1942), a mentor of Hu and then dean of humanities at Peking University, triumphed as it converged with the May Fourth movement. Born in the demonstrations against Western imperialism in 1919, the May Fourth movement was spearheaded by progressive intellectuals, some of whom were teaching at Peking University at the time. The movement critiqued all aspects of traditional Chinese culture and introduced mod. Western concepts of science, democracy, and nationalism. Within a few years, New Poetry became a standard bearer of the new "national literature" written in the "national language."

The period 1920–30 witnessed a blossoming of New Poetry. Various foreign trends—such as *romanticism, *symbolism, realism, Japanese haikai, and prose poetry (see PROSE POEM)—provided inspirations to a new generation of poets, many of whom had studied abroad and were avid readers and translators of foreign poetry. Poetry societies and jours. also mushroomed. Among the most influential were the Creation Society (1921), the New Crescent Society (1923), and the jour. Les Contemporains (1932). The Creation Society was best represented by Guo Moruo (1892–1978), who had studied in Japan and translated J. W. Goethe before he turned to proletarian lit. The New Crescent was led by Xu Zhimo (1897–1931) and Wen Yiduo (1899–1946). Xu, who had studied in the U.S. and Britain, was dubbed the Chinese Shelley in his pursuit of love, beauty, and freedom. Wen, who had studied art and lit. in the U.S., theorized the ideal poetry as a synthesis of the beauty of painting, music, and architecture. Dai Wangshu (1905–50) was the most influential poet of Les Contemporains; he studied in France and translated symbolist poetry into Chinese. During the 1920s and 1930s, intense debates unfolded along ideological lines, which were often simplified as art for art's sake versus art for life's sake, or *pure poetry versus poetry of social conscience.

The outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War on July 7, 1937, radically changed the poetry scene. Educational and cultural institutions were destroyed or relocated, and poets were scattered across the country. As a result, mod. poetry spread to all corners of the land, from Chongqing, the temporary capital of wartime China, to Shanghai under Japanese occupation, to Kunming and Guilin in the southwest, to the northwest under the Chinese Communist Party based in Yan'an, and to Hong Kong under Brit. rule. Poets joined other writers and artists in mobilizing the masses against the Japanese invasion and promoting patriotism. Poetry was recited and performed in public, often in plain speech and lively dialogue. Whereas before the war the short lyric was the dominant mode, now long narrative poetry flourished. But not all poetry addressed the war. Modernist experiments by younger poets continued; philosophical musings on life and art reached a new height.

The year 1949 was another watershed in the hist. of mod. poetry. Under ironclad ideological control in the PRC, most poets stopped writing and focused on scholarship or trans. Even so, they did not escape persecution in the successive political campaigns throughout the 1950s and 1960s, which culminated in the Cultural Revolution (1966–76). A few weak voices from the underground were silenced. The desolate situation did not change until the late 1970s, when China under Deng Xiaoping opened its door to the free world and embarked on an ambitious program of national modernization.

On the other side of the Taiwan Strait, in contrast, a modernist movement thrived despite censorship and a cultural policy of conservatism under the Nationalist regime (KMT). Led by Ji Xian (b. 1913) and Qin Zihao (1912–63), both of whom had started writing poetry in pre-1949 China, the postwar generation of young poets in Taiwan embraced *avant-garde poetry and art in the West, incl. *surrealism and high *modernism. The most influential poetry societies and jours. were Modernist Poetry Quarterly (1952) and the Modernist School (1954), the Blue Star (1954), and the Epoch (1954). They not only created experimental works of the highest caliber but interacted with young poets in Hong Kong, who shared their enthusiasm for avant-garde art and lit. In the conservative social climate in Taiwan in the 1950s and 1960s, the modernist poetry movement was often derided and attacked. However, it was unstoppable as its influence spread. As a result, Modern Poetry became both a standard term and an institution in Taiwan and Hong Kong.

The next challenge to mod. poetry came in the early 1970s when Taiwan suffered a series of setbacks in the international political arena: the loss of its seat to the PRC in the United Nations and the severance of diplomatic relations with Japan and the U.S. These diplomatic setbacks triggered a legitimacy crisis and an identity crisis among intellectuals and writers, who demanded a "return" to Taiwanese society and Chinese cultural roots. Mod. poetry in Taiwan took a sharp turn toward realism and nativism, with the latter paving the way for the large-scale nativist literature movement (1977–79). Many poets, both old and young, embraced an idealized rural Taiwan, expressed concern for social maladies, and even critiqued the ruling regime. Into the 1980s, as the democracy movement steadily gained momentum, mod. poetry played an important role in raising public awareness of the repressed past and the hopeful future of Taiwan.

A new page also turned in the PRC in the late 1970s and early 1980s. In the liberalizing atmosphere of post-Mao China, commonly referred to as the New Era, underground poetry burst on the scene and enjoyed phenomenal success. The immediate predecessors of underground poetry were poets who wrote during the Cultural Revolution and whose works were hand-copied and circulated among the urban youths who had been sent down to the countryside by Chairman Mao. Chinese trans. of foreign poetry also provided them with an important source of inspiration. The most influential poetry in post-Mao China was represented by Today, founded by a group of young poets and artists in Beijing in 1978. The new generation of poets had recently experienced the Cultural Revolution; their works expressed disillusionment with politics on the one hand and a yearning to return to the private world, romantic love, and nature on the other. The new poetry stirred up a nationwide controversy; critics who condemned its obscurity and individualism called it Misty Poetry. As its popularity grew, however, the negative connotations disappeared. In the latter half of the 1980s, the newcomers defined themselves against Misty Poetry, rejecting the latter's lyricism and introspection. Instead, they engaged in a broader range of experiments and developed more radical poetics.

Censorship never ceased to exist in post-Mao China. Throughout the 1980s, Deng Xiaoping authorized several political campaigns against lit. and art that were considered too liberal or "bourgeois." Misty Poetry was constantly targeted. After the violent crackdown on student demonstrations in Tiananmen Square in June 1989, several poets were arrested and imprisoned; more left China in self-imposed exile. In the 21st c., Chinese society has undergone dramatic transformations. Culturally speaking, it has become not only far more diverse but more oriented toward pop commercialism. Poetry has lost the prestige and universal appeal that it once enjoyed. Ironically, while China's economic success has made possible more poetry prizes, jours., readings, and conferences than before, poetry readership has shrunk and the impact of poetry diminished. It is also ironic that despite completely different hists., poetry in 21st-c. mainland China, Taiwan, and Hong Kong faces very similar conditions: commodification of culture, the Information Age, and new technologies. Poets tend to see themselves as poetry makers rather than "poets," and many turn to the Internet as an important venue where free, democratic, and global interactions take place.

The story of mod. Chinese poetry since 1917 is dramatic, to say the least. It arose in reaction against cl. poetry, the most ancient and respected cultural form in traditional China, and successfully established itself as a representative of mod. lit. early on. It has drawn on the rich trads. of world poetry for resources but, in doing so, has repeatedly found itself embroiled in debates that question its cultural identity. What is clear is that mod. poetry represents a new aesthetic paradigm that is simultaneously related to and clearly distinguished from cl. poetry. It has broadened the Chinese lit. trad. in lang. and form and enriched it with a wide range of subject matters and sensibilities that are unique to the mod. era.

■ Anthologies: Twentieth-Century Chinese Poetry, trans. K. Y. Hsu (1970); Out of the Howling Storm, ed. T. Barnstone (1993); Anthology of Modern Chinese Poetry, trans. M. Yeh (1994); Frontier Taiwan, ed. M. Yeh and N.G.D. Malmqvist (2001); Sailing to Formosa, ed. M. Yeh et al. (2006); Another Kind of Nation, ed. E. Zhang and D. Chen (2007); Twentieth-Century Chinese Women's Poetry, ed. J. C. Lin (2009).

■ Criticism and History: J. C. Lin, Modern Chinese Poetry (1972); M. Yeh, Modern Chinese Poetry (1991); M. Hockx, A Snowy Morning: Eight Chinese Poets on the Road to Modernity (1994); M. Van Crevel, Language Shattered: Contemporary Chinese Poetry and Duoduo (1996); J. H. Zhang, The Invention of a Discourse: Women's Poetry from Contemporary China (2004); M. Van Crevel, Chinese Poetry in Times of Mind, Mayhem and Money (2008).

M. Yeh

CHINA, POETRY OF. Contemp. Chinese poets have a conception of poetry much in common with the view held by their compatriots in other countries, so to use the term Chinese poetry may seem at first unproblematic. But before the mod. period, Chinese writers employed no single term that embraced all traditional forms of verse; they referred instead to individual genres. This article reviews major devels.; readers also should examine the detailed articles on genres.

Generally speaking, traditional Chinese poetry consists of forms of writing that employ *rhyme and usually a metric defined by a set number of syllables for each line. Some verse forms also require attention to the tones of the lang., exploiting the effect of rising or falling pitch in certain prescribed patterns. Depending on the lang. register appropriate to various genres, the lang. of traditional poetry may vary from a refined cl. Chinese to a mod. or near-mod. vernacular.

The earliest surviving Chinese poems derive from religious and political rituals; some are preserved in the first significant collection, the Shijing* (Classic of Poetry, also known as the Book of Songs), an anthol. of 305 poems composed during the Zhou dynasty (1046–256 BCE). In most cases, the Shijing employs four-syllable lines arranged in *couplets; individual stanzas of four, six, eight, or ten lines are also typical, with the frequent employment of *refrain and repetition. Though mod. readers often detect a "folk" quality in the Shijing, traditional commentaries stressed the ethical significance of the poems (and the poems have been read thus throughout Chinese hist.).

Originally, the term shi* referred only to Shijing poems (or poems from the same era); but by the 2d c. CE, shi was also applied to contemp. verse composition, both from anonymous popular and folk sources and from educated poets (a significant group of poems with a more explicit connection to song were also termed yuefu* or "music bureau" songs). In both early shi and yuefu, lines of five syllables became increasingly important, though four-syllable line composition continued, usually with archaic associations. Shi poets focused on couplets as the basic poetic unit, and (unlike the poets of the Shijing) did not usually construct shi in clear-cut stanza forms. Shi could go on indefinitely but usually lasted from four to thirty lines; long shi stretching on for a hundred lines or more do exist but are rare. Themes tended to dwell on autobiographical expression, particularly the public and political experiences of the educated male poet; ethical and spiritual self-cultivation; and the tribulations of private life. Mild erotic content was also common (if frowned on by the educated elite as "unserious"). Since the Ming dynasty (1368–1644), critics have held that traditional shi reached the pinnacle of achievement during the Tang dynasty (618–907); important devels. during this period include the increasing popularity of the seven-syllable line alongside the five-syllable line, as well as quatrain and octet forms with prescribed tonal patterns.

Shi in later ages came to be regarded as the most important form of traditional Chinese verse composition. With the advent of commercial printing in the 11th c., the publication of shi collections (often containing thousands of poems) became widespread, leading to the wholesale preservation of large collections from even minor poets. Shi composition also became common among groups outside the male Chinese elite—e.g., women poets became increasingly visible in later centuries (esp. from the 17th c. onward). Shi also commonly appeared in other contexts; it is not unusual for the author of traditional fiction to insert a shi whenever he needs to express deep emotions, portray combat on the battlefield, or evoke natural scenery. Shi also could become a sort of banal "social glue," appearing not just in literary contexts but in everyday social exchanges and daily rituals and as an inscribed ornament in practically every environment. The prestige and utility of shi resulted in its spread to other countries influenced by Chinese culture (see KOREA, POETRY OF; CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN; VIETNAM, POETRY OF).

From the 3d to 1st cs. BCE, another form of verse evolved in south China, which achieved finalized form in the anthol. known as the Chuci* or "Songs of Chu" (Chu being a Chinese kingdom located in the central Yangtze Valley). This form involved a more flexible meter, though couplets continued as the main structural unit. Lament was the strongest thematic strain, with erotic and religious elements also present. Chuci-style composition remained popular in the Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE) court, though it was gradually replaced by the somewhat similar but more ambitious fu* (rhapsody). Fu were largely courtly or public in origin and became immensely popular from the end of the Han through the Tang. In style, they were rhetorical (evolving in large part from earlier trads. of political and ethical oratorical persuasion). In a broader sense, fu contributed substantially to later descriptive prose style (and, in fact, traditional theorists tended to see it as a form of prose, even though it often employed "poetic" techniques such as *parallelism, couplet structures, rhyme, and tonal regulation).

After shi, the best-known genre of traditional Chinese poetry is the ci* (song lyric), which evolved from Tang dynasty popular songs. Ci are composed to set tune patterns (ci pai) with rigidly prescribed line lengths, stanza divisions, and tonal requirements; in content, they originally emphasized mildly erotic themes, though by the Song dynasty, they broached typical shi topics as well. Though many ci continued to be sung, other ci pai lost their original music, resulting in a strictly spoken poetic form. The Song dynasty is held to be the acme of ci composition, but Qing dynasty (1644–1911) ci are also greatly admired.

In the past millennium, two further significant devels. emerged in traditional Chinese poetry. First, Chinese drama (which became important in the 13th c.) incorporated lyrics to set tunes that function much like the songs in Eng. ballad opera. This form of dramatic lyric became a major outlet for poetic expression both in performance and in print (see CHINESE POETIC DRAMA). Second, numerous popular narrative poetic forms appeared, many of them conveyed through oral performance by a professional storyteller class. While our knowledge of earlier centuries is spotty, from the 18th c. and later a large corpus of texts has been preserved (some produced by women); from the 20th c., we also have eds. based on recordings or oral performance.

With the arrival of the imperial powers in China in the late 19th c. and political and social pressure to use the West as the model for "modernization," traditional Chinese verse forms fell into disfavor among many progressive intellectuals and were continued mostly on the amateur level. "Serious" poetry was influenced considerably by mod. artistic movements in the West and was written in the spoken vernacular lang.; this became known generally as xin shi (new poetry; see CHINA, MODERN POETRY OF). Forms of *free verse have been the most popular, though poets have experimented with other Western poetic forms such as the *sonnet. Interestingly enough, while Chinese poets were experimenting with Westernized forms, mod. Western poets began to employ aspects of traditional Chinese poetry in their own verse experiments (see CHINESE POETRY IN ENGLISH TRANSLATION).

See CHINA, POPULAR POETRY OF; CHINESE POETICS.

■ Criticism and History: J.J.Y. Liu, The Art of Chinese Poetry (1962); B. Watson, Early Chinese Literature (1962); H. Frankel, The Flowering Plum and the Palace Lady (1976); The Indiana Companion to Traditional Chinese Literature, ed. W. Nienhauser (1986); M. Yeh, Modern Chinese Poetry (1991); W. Idema and L. Haft, A Guide to Chinese Literature (1997); The Columbia History of Chinese Literature, ed. V. Mair (2001); W. Idema and B. Grant, The Red Brush: Writing Women of Imperial China (2004)—includes many trans.

■ Translations: Sunflower Splendor, ed. W. Liu and I. Y. Lo (1975); Wen Xuan, ed. and trans. D. Knechtges, 3 v. (1982–96); The Columbia Book of Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. B. Watson (1984); The Columbia Book of Later Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. J. Chaves (1986); Anthology of Modern Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. M. Yeh (1990); The Red Azalea: Chinese Poetry since the Cultural Revolution, ed. E. Morin (1990); The Columbia Anthology of Traditional Chinese Literature, ed. V. Mair (1994); An Anthology of Chinese Literature, ed. and trans. S. Owen (1996); Women Writers of Traditional China, ed. K. S. Chang and H. Saussy (1999); Classical Chinese Literature, ed. J. Minford and J.S.M. Lau (2002); How to Read Chinese Poetry, ed. Z. Cai (2007)—includes critical essays on poems.

P. ROUZER

CHINA, POPULAR POETRY OF. China has a long trad. of popular poetry. Alongside a rich and varied trad. of vernacular song, there also exists an equally rich and varied trad. of vernacular narrative verse, often of epic proportions—texts of thousands or even ten thousands of lines are no exception. And alongside this trad. of pure verse narrative, there exists an even richer trad. of prosimetric narrative (see PROSIMETRUM). In these prosimetric narratives, composed in an alternation of prose and verse, the verse sections often are dominant. Because these verse sections were chanted or sung in performance, in contrast to the more colloquial rendition of the prose sections, the mod. Chinese designation of this body of texts is shuochang wenxue or "literature for telling and singing," while some Western scholars have used the Fr. term chante-fable* (the term shuochang wenxue in practice also includes the many genres of vernacular verse narrative).

While to the 14th c. many forms of popular song eventually were taken up by elite writers and developed into genres of cl. poetry such as shi*, ci*, or qu (see CHINESE POETIC DRAMA), this did not happen to any of the genres of verse and prosimetric narrative. As a result, our knowledge of the early hist. of these genres is very incomplete; most of our knowledge is based on archaeological discoveries of mss. or printed texts. Texts of verse narratives or chante-fables have only been preserved in greater number from the 17th c. on, and many of them were printed in the 19th c. or later. Other texts were recorded only in the 20th c.

Verse narratives are most often composed in lines of seven-syllable verse, which are called ci or "ballad-verse" (confusingly, this ci is the same term that is also used to designate the genre of the lyric). From the 9th to the 15th c., texts written exclusively in ci are simply called ciwen (texts in ci). The basic rhythm of the seven-syllable line is 2-2-3, with a major *caesura following the fourth syllable. Every second line rhymes. From the 15th c. on, one also encounters ten-syllable lines, which are called zan. These lines have a basic rhythm of 3-4-3 or of 3-3-4. Initially, the zan was used only for short descriptive passages; but their use became increasingly more common with the progression of time, and in 19th c. and later one find texts only using zan. Many prosimetric genres also rely primarily on the ci (and the zan) for their verse sections, and the element ci is often encountered as part of the name of a genre (such as cihua or "ballad stories," tanci or "string ballads," and guci or "drum ballads"). The earliest examples of verse or prosimetric narratives employing ci are the bianwen or "transformation texts" of the 9th and 10th cs., discovered at Dunhuang.

Some chante-fable genres, however, rely for their verse sections on songs whose melodies demand lines of unequal length. Whereas in some genres the author may limit himself to a single tune that is repeated as often as required in each verse section, other genres, such as the zhugongdiao or "all keys and modes" that flourished from the late 11th to the early 14th c., employ a bewildering variety of tunes, which are organized in suites of varying length. The zhugongdiao acquired its name from the fact that no suite could be followed by another in the same key. The musical sophistication required in the composition, performance, and appreciation of a genre like the zhugongdiao has ensured that this latter type of genre has always been in a minority.

The preserved texts may derive from oral performances, but in both premod. and mod. times such texts will have been heavily edited before they were printed. Many orally performed texts turn out, on closer observation, to be derived from written texts in some way or another. Other texts were written by performers or aficionados with performance in mind, but some texts in these genres were written primarily for reading. The highly educated women authors of tanci in the 18th and 19th cs. concerning women dressed as men outperforming men in the examinations, at court, and on the battlefield stressed that their works were intended for reading only, but even so some of these works were adapted for performance in later times. Texts from many different parts of China tend to be written in a rather uniform stylized vernacular, but some genres also systematically include the local dialect: tanci produced in Suzhou may include extensive passages in the local Wu dialect; the muyushu or "wooden-fish books" from Guangdong make some use of Cantonese; and the gezaice or "song books" from southern Fujian and Taiwan became increasingly liberal in their incorporation of Minnanese over the course of the 20th c. The local coloring of genres originating from northern China such as guci and zidishu or "youth books" (a genre beloved by Manchu amateurs in 18th- and 19th-c. Beijing) is less obvious because Mandarin became the basis of the mod. standard lang.

The subject matter of verse and prosimetric narrative is extremely broad. It is probably safe to say that the stories of all popular China traditional novels and plays also have been treated in shuochang wenxue. Some genres have an outspoken affinity to a certain class of subject matter. Baojuan or "precious scrolls" initially told pious Buddhist tales but as time went by broadened their repertoire. Daoqing or "Daoist sentiments" originally focused on tales of Daoist immortals and their conversions. Guci are said to have a greater affinity to tales of warfare and crime, while tanci are said to be more suitable to tales of romance and intrigue. Plots and characters were freely exchanged between the many genres. Some stories that were very popular in shuochang wenxue were rarely or never treated in fiction before the 20th c. One example is the legend of Meng Jiangnü, whose husband was drafted as a corvée laborer for the construction of the Great Wall, soon died of exhaustion, and was buried in the wall. When she came to the construction site to bring him a set of winter clothes and learned of his death, her weeping brought down the section of the wall in which he had been buried. Another example is the romance of Liang Shanbo and Zhu Yingtai. Zhu Yingtai is a girl who in male disguise leaves home and attends an academy. She falls in love with her male roommate Liang Shanbo. When she leaves, she urges him to visit her, but by the time he does so and learns she is a girl, her parents have already engaged her to the son of another family. The now-love-smitten Liang Shanbo soon dies; and when Zhu Yingtai's bridal procession passes by his grave, the grave opens up and she joins him in death, whereupon their souls turn into butterflies. While stories like these are encountered in practically all genres, other stories are more specific to a certain region or genre.

■ Ballad of the Hidden Dragon, trans. M. Doleželová-Velingerová and J. I. Crump (1971); Master Tung's Western Chamber Romance, trans. L. L. Ch'en (1976); Tun-huang Popular Narratives, trans. V. H. Mair (1983); V. Mair, T'ang Transformation Texts (1989); The Story of Hua Guan Suo, trans. G. O. King (1989); A. E. McLaren, Chinese Popular Culture and Ming Chantefables (1998); D. Overmeyer, Precious Volumes: An Introduction to Chinese Sectarian Scriptures from the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (1999); M. Bender, Plum and Bamboo (2003) on Suzhou; Meng Jiangnü Brings Down the Great Wall (2008), Personal Salvation and Filial Piety (2008), Filial Piety and Its Divine Reward (2009), Heroines of Jiangyong (2009), Judge Bao and the Rule of Law (2010), The White Snake and Her Son (2009), The Butterfly Lovers (2010)—all trans. W. L. Idema; W. L. Idema, "Verse and Prosimetric Narrative," Cambridge History of Chinese Literature, ed. K. S. Chang and S. Owen, v. 2 (2010).

W. L. Idema

CHINESE POETIC DRAMA. Xiqu, or "drama," literally means dramatic song, and until the advent of Western-style "spoken drama," all Chinese drama was sung by characters who belonged to role types (e.g., male lead, female lead, clown). Traditional drama encompasses hundreds of regional forms, spanning close to a millennium, from its beginnings around the year 1100 to the present. The vast majority of those forms have left no written trace. Performers rely not on libretti but on oral transmission and improvisation. A form as popular as Peking opera (jingju) has no scripts to speak of. This entry discusses the few dramatic forms that became important as written lit.: zaju, xiwen (or nanxi), and xiwen's much more important descendant, chuanqi. Even in these forms, the vast majority of scripts have been lost. Within the full panoply of Chinese performance trads., these forms—in which the page has been as important as the stage—are anomalous. A 1324 mural of a theatrical troupe that depicts the lead actress in scrupulous detail but never mentions a playwright or a play suggests that, even when it comes to zaju, our contemp. inclination to identify a playwright rather than an actor as the primary creative force might be misplaced.

No written traces of drama predate the 13th c.; however, it is clear from other sources that drama had antecedents in religious ritual and was also closely associated with other forms of poetry meant for paid performance (most particularly prosimetric lit. [see PROSIMETRUM] and zhugongdiao [all keys and modes]). From the earliest surviving dramatic texts, two main trads. predominate, one based on northern melodies and rhymes (zaju) and the other based on southern (xiwen). In both cases, melodies were not composed specifically for a play; instead, folk songs and popular ditties circulated as an existing repertoire.

Zaju are closely associated with the performance trads. of the great cities of the 13th c., esp. Hangzhou (then called Lin'an) and Beijing (Dadu, under the Yuan dynasty). The first playwrights whose names are known were largely men of Dadu, Guan Hanqing most famous among them. When the component songs are referred to as qu (songs), they relate a narrative as experienced by the individual who sings of it and are considered dramatic verse. Set to the exact same music but unconnected by plot, sanqu (or unconnected songs) are considered *lyric poetry.

Whereas the textual integrity of shi* or ci* was generally respected by those who transmitted them, these early dramatic texts were clearly regarded as open to modification. We speak of the most famous of zaju, Xixiang ji (The Western Wing), as if its author were Wang Shifu, but in fact, the play appears in multiple recensions: the most important, a 17th-c. version rewritten by Jin Shengtan, and others, with layers added in the 14th and 15th cs.

Whether they are part of a play or simply a song, qu feature northern slang; a common pattern is to end with an earthy punch line delivered in colloquial northern Chinese. Like ci, qu are characterized by lines of uneven length, dictated by the melody, or qupai. Rather than determining the prosodic pattern as strictly as in ci, however, the melody is a signpost. This flexibility has partly to do with performance practice. When these prosodic guidelines were translated to the stage, they made for some of the unusual characteristics of zaju. Usually four acts (with a short additional act or "wedge"), each act is comprised of a single song suite—with one rhyme throughout and only a single singer. Had it not been for the use of chengzi (padding syllables) and a flexible understanding of rhyme (with no regard for the tone of the rhyming syllables), zaju would have involved too many prosodic strictures to allow for plot devel.

As it is, plot is secondary in zaju, and many are clearly performance pieces to highlight the skills of a single performer: consider, e.g., the scene in which Dou E is wrongfully executed in Guan Hanqing's Dou E yuan (The Injustice to Dou E). Xixiang ji is a formal exception, a successful romantic comedy only because it is five plays, one after the other, comprising a total of 21 acts; each of the two lovers, as well as a maidservant, takes a turn at singing.

Musically, zaju and xiwen were both governed by rules that are deeply arcane now. Melodies belonged to different modes; an act could contain melodies from a single mode, or it could include melodies from different modes, as long as these followed a prescribed pattern.

The first xiwen to circulate widely as a written text was Gao Ming's Pipa ji (The Lute), which dates from the mid-14th c. Only recently have scholars been able to collect fragments of a number of nanxi, some from the Yongle Encyclopedia and others from various tomb excavations. More than one character could sing within a single act; a solo could turn midstream into a duet or a trio or a chorus. From an early point, xiwen were long, 20 acts or longer and probably intended to be performed over the course of two days.

By the early decades of the Ming dynasty, zaju had become the favorite form of the imperial court. A number of scripts have survived in the imperial collections, where they were sometimes edited or even rewritten to avoid the appearance of sedition. One of the best known of early Ming dramatists was Zhu Youdun, grandson of the dynasty's founder.

Over the course of the dynasty, zaju ceased to be an important popular form of performance. What took its place was southern drama, whose great heyday was in the last decades of the Ming dynasty, a period that coincided with an explosive growth in the availability of print material. Alone of all genres of Chinese popular drama, kunqu (a performance style to sing chuanqi, the written plays) was essentially born in print in the 1570s, its flagship libretto Huansha ji (Washing Silk) by Liang Chenyu, who had worked closely with the musician Wei Liangfu. Many other plays in the same style began to appear immediately thereafter—and perhaps more strikingly, an entire cultural apparatus for the production and consumption of chuanqi: guidebooks to *prosody, hists. of nanxi, dramatic appreciations. These long plays were probably almost always performed in excerpt. Audiences acquainted themselves with the rest of the play by reading scripts, in which prose dialogue became increasingly important.

Zaju too came under the same pressures and by the late 16th c. was increasingly tied to the world of the imprint. Xu Wei's Sisheng yuan (Four Cries of the Gibbon) is four zaju dealing with the same theme, that of theatricality and identity. All the plays toy with the strictures of zaju: e.g., a monk dies midway through and is reincarnated as a woman, each the protagonist and the sole singing role in his or her respective acts. These plays were radical musically as well, mixing northern and southern melodies. After Xu Wei, numerous playwrights wrote plays that were zaju in name only: short, focusing on a single singer, but no longer adhering to the old prosodic regulations.

Much of what in recent centuries has been considered Yuan drama is filtered through a single anthol., Yuanqu xuan (Selection of Yuan Drama, 1611), compiled by Zang Maoxun. Comparing extant Yuan and early Ming sources with those in the anthol. reveals that Zang Maoxun had a heavy editorial hand, embellishing prose dialogue and making endings more climactic and moralistic.

Contemp. discussion of drama concerned the place of prosodic rules and of the stage. The most famous chuanqi of all, Mudan ting (The Peony Pavilion) by Tang Xianzu, originally written in the Yihuang style, was the touchstone for the 17th-c. enthusiasm for romance but almost unsingable. Both Feng Menglong and Zang Maoxun tried their hand at rewriting it according to the stricter prosodic rules advocated by another contemp. playwright, Shen Jing.

Written largely by elite men to be performed by actors, when acting was a despised profession associated with prostitution, chuanqi plays involve men and women from a range of class backgrounds, often masking their true status. Buffoons pretend to be refined scholars; refined scholars disguise themselves as poor men to avoid recognition; girls pretend to be boys—disguise is the norm, and lang. is used to dissimulate as much as reveal. This extreme heteroglossia is important at a thematic and syntactic level: since at least Song ci, one of the most important rhetorical modes of Chinese poetry is an abrupt shift in ling. register. Nowhere are sharp shifts in register more common and central than in chuanqi. The cl. trad. itself becomes the object of commentary. A single aria might include a quotation from the classics, Tang shi, Song ci, and Ming slang. Puns are common.

Chuanqi continued to be popular throughout the 17th c. and into the 18th, although fewer and fewer were written, and under the Manchus increasingly strict rules were imposed both on performance and performers. The 19th c. saw the decline of the form, which essentially was brought to an end by the Taiping Rebellion of the 1860s.

■ Critical Studies: W. L. Idema and S. H. West, Chinese Theater 1100–1450, A Source Book (1982); S. H. West, "A Study in Appropriation: Zang Maoxun's Dou E Yuan," JAOS 101 (1991); T. Lu, Persons, Roles, and Minds (2001); C. C. Swatek, Peony Pavilion Onstage (2002); Cambridge History of Chinese Literature, ed. K. S. Chang and S. Owen, 2 vols. (2010).

■ Translations: The Story of the Western Wing, trans. W. L. Idema and S. H. West (1995); Scenes for Mandarins, ed. and trans. C. Birch (1995); The Peony Pavilion, trans. C. Birch (2002); Select Poets and Resources: Monks, Bandits, Lovers, and Immortals: Eleven Early Chinese Plays, ed. and trans. S. H. West (2010).

T. Lu

CHINESE POETICS. A survey of Chinese poetics must keep in view the intimate association between poetry and music in Chinese trad. The following passage from the Shang shu (Classic of Documents), in a section of that work that took shape during the Eastern Zhou (8th–3d c. BCE), depicting the moment when music was instituted by a command from the mythic sage-king Shun to his assistant Kui, provides one key reference point for traditional discussions of poetry:

> The divine ruler [Shun] said: "Kui! I command you to preside over music: to instruct the princes of the state, that they be upright, yet affable; tolerant, yet reverent; that they be firm, yet not cruel; and direct, yet not arrogant. The shi expresses aims; singing draws out the expression; the musical mode attunes the sounds, so that the eight timbres accord, none usurping another's place. Thus gods and humans are placed in harmony." Kui said, "I strike the stones, stroke the stones; the hundred beasts take up the dance."

The term shi*, in its centrality to traditional Chinese poetic discourse, offers the nearest functional analogue to the Western category "poetry." In the above passage, shi means simply "lyrics," the words to a song. The statement that "the shi expresses aims" itself also doubles as a definition, since the graphs for "express" (yan) and "aim" (zhi) mirror the two halves of the graph shi. Shi can also designate an ancient musical repertoire overseen by musicians of the Zhou court (1046–256 BCE). This repertoire, seen as descended from the institution of music whose founding is depicted above, became central to the curriculum of traditionalist ritual and musical education. It became fixed over time, and as the old musical settings fell from memory in the Zhou's waning centuries, the remaining written text, an anthol. of 305 poems, was known as the Shijing* (Classic of Poetry, also known as the Book of Songs). In med. and later times, the same term referred to "literati shi," i.e., poems in a range of newer verse forms, primarily in pentasyllabic or heptasyllabic lines.

For practical purposes, it is important to distinguish which of these disparate meanings applies in a given use of the term shi. In Chinese discussions of the fundamental nature and function of poetry, however, its explanatory power often stems precisely from the way one meaning carries resonances from one or more others. Thus, though the word in Shun's speech means "words to a song," for traditional readers the implications of this pronouncement would include its import for their own study and recitation of the Shijing; similarly, later critics of literati shi, even when discussing technical aspects of those later verse forms, often felt obliged to assert an underlying continuity of their activity with the Shijing and the sagely institution of music. Just as fully understanding a given instance of the word shi often meant situating the particular use in the broader context of a hist. from high antiquity to the present, skill in reading poetry (or listening to speech or song) meant skill in inferring, from the particular expression, a fullness of what the expressive act revealed, not only the poet's implicit intentions but more generally the world to which the poem responded.

Both these aspects of poetic understanding as contextualization—situating the poem in the context of the legacy of ancient music and understanding its particularity by "hearing" its layers of implication—remain prominent throughout later Chinese critical trad., as in Sima Guang's (1019–86) exegesis of the first half of Du Fu's (712–70) "Chun wang" ("Spring Prospect"):

> The capital shattered, hills and rivers remain;
> city walls in springtime: grass and trees grow thickly.
> Stirred by the season—flowers are spattered with tears;
> regretting separation—birds startle the heart.

Sima Guang comments: "The poets of antiquity are to be esteemed for the way their conceptions lie beyond the words, leaving the reader to obtain them only upon reflection; thus 'those who spoke were free from blame, and those who heard had ample means of correcting themselves.'" Here Sima Guang cites from the Mao school Great Preface to the Shijing the belief that the ancient shi had provided a channel for indirect expression of resentments, thus fostering social harmony. The point of the quotation is less to suggest that Du Fu was expressing a potentially dangerous resentment than to highlight and commend a latent continuity between Du Fu's poem and the ancient trad. Sima Guang next proceeds to an account of the implicit states of the poet and his world, in keeping with this idea of an ancient poetics of indirection: "To say, 'The capital shattered, hills and rivers remain' shows that there is nothing else. To say, 'city walls in springtime: grass and trees grow thickly' shows that there are no human traces. As for 'flowers' and 'birds,' in ordinary times such things are objects of delight. To see them and weep; to hear them and grieve—the sort of time this is may be known."

Though Shun's dictum states "the shi expresses aims," the scene in which this statement occurs makes clear that the motivating purpose of the institution was not to express particular aims but rather to shape the personalities of "princes of the state." Scenes in the Analects where Confucius (551–479 BCE) discusses the Shi (whose meaning, in the Analects, we see shifting from the musical repertoire referred to as shi toward the fully textual classic Shi, or Shijing) with his disciples show this shi jiao (teaching through poetry) in action. Confucius asserts that having truly studied the Shi should entail being competent to act autonomously as the representative of one's ruler in diplomatic exchanges (Analects 13.5); indeed, formal performances from the Shi were often required at state banquets, demanding not only a command of the repertoire but an acute sensitivity for how contextual meanings might shift with circumstances of performance.

As suggested in the Shang shu scene, though, the most immediate purpose of teaching through poetry lay in its shaping effect on the student's personality, instilling a delicate balance between opposed impulses: firmness is desirable but, left unchecked, might turn to cruelty; directness is desirable but, left unchecked, might lead to arrogance. Such harmonizing of opposed tendencies characterizes not only these intended effects of teaching through poetry but the personality of a sage, who is "affable, yet severe; imposing, yet not aggressive; respectful, yet at ease" (Analects 7.38, describing Confucius), or the legacy of sagely music itself, which is "joyful, yet not licentious; mournful, yet not grieved to the point of harm" (Analects 3.20).

This last comment is uttered by Confucius in response to "Guanju" (Fishhawk), the first poem in the Shijing. Evidence within the Analects suggests Confucius would have been responding not to a text but to a musical performance. For readers in ages after the musical settings to the Shi had been lost, those lost settings became an emblem of the distance separating them from the poems' primordial expressive and transformative power. The Song dynasty scholar Zhu Xi (1130–1200) commented that the reader of the text of "Guanju," by reflection on the poem's words, might gain an understanding of the "rightness of personality" of both the poem's central figure and the poet himself but could never capture the full "harmony of sound and breath" conveyed in the performance as Confucius had heard it. Zhu Xi continues, "[T]hough this seems regrettable, if the student will but attend to the phrases, pondering the inhering principle, so as in this way to nurture the mind, then in this way as well one may attain what is fundamental about studying the Shi" (Shijing jizhuan). The final aim of the study of the Shijing is to recover the efficacy of the musical legacy of the sages through alternate means.

This didactic notion of poetry as an adjunct of the transformative project of sagely music, although it exerted decisive influence over critical statements about poetry's fundamental significance throughout premod. Chinese trad., is far from encompassing the variety of poetry and song as practiced. In ritual contexts, music and song served in communicating with deceased ancestors and other unseen powers. As one human variety of the general cosmic category of wen, or patterning, poems were one among many sorts of wen—celestial, terrestrial, and human—that might be fraught with portent based on a dense web of latent interconnections and occult sympathies. We glimpse this element of mystery in the incantatory tone of Kui's response to Shun's charge and in his vision of music as a force to which even animals respond—Kui himself, though euhemerized in the Shang shu scene as a human minister, in other contexts appears as a crocodile-like figure, associated with the magical power of drumming via the use of reptile skins for drumheads.

There were always ample instances of poetry and music of ecstatic rapture, divine trance, and sensual abandon to affront traditionalist ideals of harmony and the delicate balancing of opposed impulses, filling scholars with something like the unease Plato felt about allowing poets into his ideal city. Even certain poems and sections within the Shijing itself, particularly the "Guo feng" (Airs of the States) sections tied to the states of Zheng and Wei, were deemed symptomatic of a loss of emotional and moral equilibrium, and the significance of their inclusion in the canon (an editorial choice attributed within the trad. to Confucius) was a fraught and productive problem for later crit. The Chuci*, reflecting a poetics of religious ecstasy and sensual transport, along with the Western Han (206 BCE–8 CE) rise of the poetic genre of fu*, which drew largely on both the prosody and underlying aesthetic from the Chuci trad., posed further challenges for Han and later scholars striving to accommodate these later poetic modes to the traditionalist paradigm. A typical strategy for accomplishing this involved invoking concepts such as bian (mutation) or liu (offstream), allowing these poetic modes to be seen as deviations while leaving open the possibility of viewing them as continuations of the legacy of the ancient shi by altered means, in response to larger processes of historical change.

The turn of the 3d c. saw the rise of the literati shi, along with fu and the full repertoire of genres of belletristic writing. The "Lun wen" (Discourse on Literature) of Cao Pi (186–226), first emperor of the Wei dynasty (220–65), marks a watershed both for its overt assertion that composition in these genres could be a means to cultural immortality and for its theorization of the system of affinities between particular sorts of talent and particular literary modes. Over subsequent centuries, a view emerged of poetic hist. as a repertoire of styles that could be read in terms both of divergent personalities and of distinct historical eras. Zhong Rong's (ca. 468–516) "Shi pin" (Grades of Poetry) ranked poets in the pentasyllabic shi form from its beginnings down to Zhong's own lifetime in "top," "middle," and "lower" grades, giving a précis of each poet's style and in many instances specifying its antecedents. Not surprisingly, among the most praised styles were those affiliated directly to the Shijing.

The intermittent inclusion during the Tang dynasty (618–907) of composition in shi and fu genres in the requirements for candidates for the prestigious jin shi (Presented Scholar) degree is itself unimaginable apart from the ancient conception of music and poetry as tools to mold "princes of the state" into sound administrators. The prestige of these poetic forms, along with increasingly demanding rules for tonal regulation and syntactical *parallelism, created a need for instructional guides for poetic composition. The resulting body of material, largely composed of lists of prohibitions, typologies of parallel couplets, rosters of stylistic subtypes, and so on, came to be viewed as middlebrow at best, since the orthodox view of poetry as stemming organically from the poet's response to events of the world could not admit the validity of fixed rules for poetic composition.

Something of this tension between, on the one hand, the practical need for technical analysis and prescriptive methods and, on the other, reassertions of the organic connection between poetry and the broader project of cl. studies and personal transformation is reflected throughout the proliferating lit. of poetic crit. from the Song dynasty (960–1279) onward. Many of the enduring arguments reprise themes from the early hist. of shi, incl. discussions of the relation between inner emotional states and outer scene, calls for fu gu (restoration of antiquity), debates about the proper choice of models and about striking the proper balance in studying such models, between careful imitation and the expression of the student's own personality. Analogies to and ideas drawn from Chinese Buddhist trads. became a prominent feature of Song dynasty and later poetic crit., with the critic Yan Yu (late 12th–early 13th c.) often cited as the first to draw an explicit analogy between Zen enlightenment and poetic inspiration and Wang Shizhen (1634–1711) regarded as a highly influential late imperial exemplar.

Just as the fu had been assimilated to the traditionalist view of poetic hist. as a mutated offstream of the ancient shi, critical discourses surrounding later lyric genres incl. ci* (song lyric) or qu, the diverse constellation of song forms that from the Yuan dynasty (1271–1368) onward formed the lyrical building blocks of a rich operatic lit. reflect a similar tension between genre-specific technical discussions and the impulse to link the basic expressive and transformative power of these genres back to the ancient shi and the mythology of the transformative power of music. Even seemingly remote genres such as narrative fiction and the "eight-legged essay" that was the staple of examination cultures of the Ming and Qing dynasties came to be viewed in their own ways as mutated analogues to the sagely legacy of music.

See CHINA, POETRY OF; CHINA, POPULAR POETRY OF; CHINESE POETIC DRAMA; CHINESE POETRY IN ENGLISH TRANSLATION; CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN; YUEFU.

■ Liu Xie, The Literary Mind and the Carving of Dragons, trans. V.Y.C. Shih (1959)—trans of Wenxin diaolong; J.J.Y. Liu, Chinese Theories of Literature (1975); R. J. Lynn, "Orthodoxy and Enlightenment—Wang Shih-chen's Theory of Poetry and Its Antecedents," The Unfolding of Neo-Confucianism, ed. W. T. de Bary (1975); Theories of the Arts in China, ed. S. Bush and C. Murck (1983); S. Owen, Chinese Poetry and Poetics: Omen of the World (1985); The Indiana Companion to Traditional Chinese Literature, ed. W. Nienhauser (1986); P. Yu, The Reading of Imagery in the Chinese Poetic Tradition (1987); S. Van Zoeren, Poetry and Personality: Reading, Exegesis, and Hermeneutics in Traditional China (1991); S. Owen, Readings in Traditional Chinese Literary Thought (1992); H. Saussy, The Problem of a Chinese Aesthetic (1993); R. Ashmore, "The Banquet's Aftermath: Yan Jidao's Ci Poetics and the High Tradition," T'oung Pao 88 (2002); R. Sterckx, The Animal and the Daemon in Early China (2002); M. Kern, "Western Han Aesthetics and the Genesis of the Fu," HJAS 63 (2003); Chinese Aesthetics: The Ordering of Literature, the Arts, and the Universe in the Six Dynasties, ed. Z. Cai (2004).

R. ASHMORE

CHINESE POETRY IN ENGLISH TRANSLATION. Chinese poems began to be paraphrased in Western langs. in the 17th c. when Jesuit missionaries, seeking support for their policy of cultural accommodation, reported on the advanced literary, scientific, and philosophical state of China. Efforts at *translation into Fr., Ger., and Eng. were peripheral to lit. and even to scholarship until Ezra Pound published Cathay (1915). This book of 14 cl. Chinese poems, rewritten from the word-for-word versions of Ernest Fenollosa and his Japanese tutors, first exhibited the characteristics of the hybrid Chinese-Eng. poetic lang.: *end-stopped, stress-heavy lines, mostly monosyllabic, using coordination rather than subordination and often appearing to have left something out. See the opening lines of Pound's "Poem by the Bridge at Ten-Shin" (from Li Bai, "Gu feng 59 shou," no. 18):

> March has come to the bridge head,
> Peach flowers and apricot boughs hang over a thousand gates,
> At morning there are flowers to cut the heart,
> And evening drives them on the eastward-flowing waters.

Pound's trans. practice foregrounds the "qualities of vivid presentation" he found in Fenollosa's notes and emulates the way "Chinese poets have been content to set forth their matter without moralizing and without comment" ("Chinese Poetry, I" in Early Writings). As if to confirm the imagist call for "direct treatment of the thing, whether objective or subjective" and to "use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation" (Pound, "Imagisme" [1913]), the 8th-c. Chinese poet here ventriloquized uses the present tense, speaks in short bursts of observation, and withholds comment on things not outwardly visible save for the (possibly idiomatic) expression of the flowers' effect on feelings. Weak *personification ("March has come," "evening drives them") serves mainly to give the sentences subjects and verbs. An unobtrusive *allegory (flowers driven on unidirectional currents from morning to evening) supports the elegiac tone.

Contrast the effort of Fenollosa some years earlier to render a different 8th-c. poem (Wang Wei, "Gao yuan") in Eng. verse:

> Crimson the snare of the peaches that catch the dews on the wing.
> Verdant the face of the willows that bathe in winds of the spring.
> Petals have fallen all night, but no dutiful maid is yet sweeping.
> Larks have been up with the dawn, but the guest of the mountain is sleeping.

The end-stopped sentences and the speaker's reticence are all there, but the clockwork meter and banally elaborate diction separate it from the genre of the Eng.-lang. "Chinese poem" initiated by Pound.

"The element in poetry which travels best," as Graham observed, "is of course concrete imagery": Chinese poetry came into fashion in the Eng.-speaking world just when *imagery reigned supreme. Unspoken meanings, another feature of much Chinese poetry, are not the translator's problem. Most translators since Pound, those at any rate whose audience is readers of poetry, have adopted the terse plainness of Cathay. The 21 trans. by different hands of a single quatrain by Wang Wei, collected by Weinberger, shows the steady advance of this manner. Wai-lim Yip and Gary Snyder, poets in their own right, contend in theoretical writings and by the example of their trans. that Chinese poetry gives direct access to perception unclouded by lang., a radicalization of the theory of the *ideogram: thus, their versions adapt the Eng. lang. to their purposes, shedding pronouns, tenses, prepositions and other explicative machinery. More recent translators have explored electronic means of staging Chinese poems in some form of Eng. Anthols. of Chinese poetry in trans. permit taking stock of this stream of trad.

The effortless simplicity seen in trans. Chinese poetry is not just a style but an ethos. As ethos, it becomes a mode or manner of mod. Am. poetry, for which knowledge of Chinese is not required. The poets of the Chinese canon become models, ancestors, interlocutors. James Wright addresses an 8th-c. predecessor with an echo of Charles Baudelaire ("As I Step over a Puddle at the End of Winter, I Think of an Ancient Chinese Governor," 1963). Charles Wright paraphrases Du Fu ("China Mail," 1997). Am. poetry of the 20th c. is unimaginable without the Chinese contribution. Chinese poetry since the 1980s has included this Am. poetry in a Chinese manner among its influences, a rhetorical resource separate from the models of cl. Chinese poetry.

See IMAGISM.

■ A. C. Graham, Poems of the Late T'ang (1977); E. Weinberger, Nineteen Ways of Looking at Wang Wei (1987); W. Yip, Diffusion of Distances: Dialogues between Chinese and Western Poetics (1993); R. Kern, Orientalism, Modernism and the American Poem (1996); S. Yao, Translation and the Languages of Modernism (2002); The New Directions Anthology of Classical Chinese Poetry, ed. E. Weinberger (2003); E. Pound, Poems and Translations (2003); E. Hayot, Chinese Dreams: Pound, Brecht, "Tel Quel" (2004); E. Pound, Early Writings, ed. I. Nadel (2005); Classical Chinese Poetry, trans. D. Hinton (2008); E. Fenollosa and E. Pound, The Chinese Character as a Medium for Poetry, ed. H. Saussy et al. (2008).

H. SAUSSY

CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN

I. Terminology, Genres, and Characteristics
II. History

I. Terminology, Genres, and Characteristics

A. Terminology. There is no consensus that "Chinese poetry in Japan" is the best way to describe poetry composed by Japanese in a script-lang. often called "Chinese." The disagreement about what to call this poetry indicates how differently these poems are viewed. One not entirely logical trad. among Western scholars uses the Japanese terms kanshi and kanbun in the sense of, respectively, poems and prose in Chinese composed by Japanese. However, since the late 19th c., these terms, often in the fused form kanshibun (poems and prose in Chinese) in Japan refer to any text in Chinese, usually from China; Japanese scholars commonly refer to "Japanese kanshi" (Nihon kanshi). Alternatively, kanshi from Japan have been often called "Japanese poems in Chinese" and conversely "Sino-Japanese" poetry.

Behind the terminology lurks a lang. question: namely, whether Sino-Japanese poetry is, in fact, "Chinese" or is better understood as a form of Japanese. Choice of terminology has implications for assumptions of "foreignness" of Chinese poetry in Japan. The idea that the lang. of kanshi in Japan is a form Japanese, or at the very least not the same as "Sino-Chinese," is recently gaining some ground and suggests that poems in (some form of) "Chinese" are more and more considered to be an indigenous part of the Japanese literary trad. At the same time, Sino-Japanese poetry is part of a larger East Asian body of poetry in variant forms of Chinese (China, Korea, Vietnam).

B. Genres and Characteristics. The poetic trad. of Sino-Japanese poetry is long and diverse, but it is important to understand that these poems are usually seen in contrast with, or even opposition to, poetry in Japanese (waka*). Whereas some of waka's predominant features are its brevity and rather strict adherence to alternating units of five and seven syllables, its stress on ling. purity, and its inclination to limit itself to certain thematic sets (notably love and the nature imagery of the four seasons), Sino-Japanese poetry is free from most such restraints: it can be quite long (several hundreds of lines) and has total thematic freedom—a feature that most appealed to its practitioners. Grounded in a long and varied generic trad. in China, as well as Japan, Chinese poetry in Japan also knows a large variety of formats. Japanese literati of the cl. period already distinguished various literary genres: bun (Chinese wen, rhyming prose), hitsu (Chinese bi, rhymeless prose), shi* (rhyming poem), fu* (poetic exposition), ku (Chinese ju, couplet), etc. Rhyming or nonrhyming was perhaps an even more important distinction than poetry or prose.

Nevertheless, from the beginning, one particular form has been preferred by Japanese poets: the shi, usually of eight lines and always with equal lines of either five or seven graphs or characters. In fact, the shi in kanshi is both a generic term (a poem in Chinese, as opposed to one in Japanese) and a specific genre within the domain of Sino-Japanese poetry (i.e., rhyming poem). "Old style" shi poetry is relatively free of tonal patterns, unlike the "regulated poem" (Chinese lüshi, Japanese risshi) that became dominant in Tang period (618–907) China and later in Japan as well. Variant forms are the quatrain (Chinese jueju, Japanese zekku) and the "aligned regulated [poem]" (Chinese pailü, Japanese hairitsu; a shi of more than eight lines). The shi has a fairly standard structure in which a theme is elaborated and brought to conclusion. The shi also rhymes, which may not be as obvious as it sounds: the Sino-Japanese reading (on) of a graph does not lend itself easily to meaningful rhyme, and Japanese poets based their rhyme schemes on classic rhyme dictionaries. For centuries, the same held true for most poets in China.

Sino-Japanese poetry was meant to be read aloud. From at least the cl. period onward, reading, or even singing, was typically performed in yomikudashi (var. kundoku), a type of pronunciation in which clusters of words are pronounced by their on reading (the pronunciation that simulates to some extent Chinese pronunciation) but adjusted to Japanese grammar. This long-standing habit, which continues to this day, is one reason that some scholars feel that Sino-Japanese poetry functions as poetry in Japanese rather than in Chinese.

The composition of Sino-Japanese poetry was almost exclusively a male affair. The existence of a handful of female Sino-Japanese poets at the early cl. court or the uniquely talented Ema Saikō (1787–1861) and a few other contemp. women poets does not detract from the fact that, from the 10th c. on, women were not actively trained in writing Sino-Japanese nor encouraged to express themselves in that lang.

II. History

A. Ancient and Classical Periods (to 1185). By the reign of the emperor (tennō) Tenji (r. 661–71), the composition of poetry in Chinese seems to have been a regular activity. Not much is extant from these earliest compositions. The earliest extant anthol. of Sino-Japanese poetry is Kaifūsō (Patterned Sea-Grasses of a Cherished Style, 751). Man'yōshū (Collection for Ten Thousand Generations, mid- to late 8th c.), Japan's oldest anthol. of waka, also contains several Sino-Japanese poems. Although these early court poems in Sino-Japanese were not much alluded to by later generations, the court continued to be the important locus for the composition of Sino-Japanese poems when the capital was moved from Heijō-kyō (Nara) to Heian-kyō (Kyoto), just as Six Dynasties' (316–589) poetry from China remained a notable touchstone. Many of the poems reflect this court setting, in which congratulatory and banquet poetry formed a central genre. Important are three royal kanshi anthols.: Ryōunshū (Cloud Topping Collection, 814), Bunka shūreishū (Collection of Beauties among the Literary Flowers, 818), and Keikokushū (Collection for Governing the State, 827), as well as the collected poetry of Sugawara no Michizane (845–903). This was also when the Japanese discovered the works of Bai Juyi (772–846), who would remain the best-regarded Chinese poet, and became more enamored of (esp. late) Tang (618–907) poetry. An early and influential text to couple Sino-Japanese couplets (ku) to waka is Wakan rōeishū (Chinese and Japanese Poems to Sing, early 11th c.), which coincides with the dominance of "verse-topic poetry" (kudaishi): poems that were composed to set topics consisting of a line of verse. Later court poets' preference for nature and temple-visiting poetry can be gleaned from Honchō mudaishi (Non-Verse Topic Poems from Our Court, 1162–64?).

B. Medieval Period (1185–1600). With the rise of Zen institutions in Kamakura and Kyoto supported by the new shogunate and collectively known as gozan (the five mountains—that is, monasteries), the center of Sino-Japanese composition had by the beginning of the 14th c. shifted to monastic communities. The monasteries were also actively engaged in the printing of Chinese texts and in Chinese scholarship in general, although court scholars continued to be active as well. Unlike court poets before them, several monks visited China. In keeping with the Zen (Chinese Chan) trads. from the mainland, fostered by Chinese priests who came to Japan, such as Yishan Yining (Japanese Issan Ichinei, 1247–1317), lit. and specifically poetry played a central role in the monks' lives. Traditionally, a distinction is made between the Zen Buddhist verse (geju) composed by gozan poets and their thematically much freer poetry in the shi format, which shows their readings from Song (960–1279) poets. While most well-known gozan poets such as Kokan Shiren (1278–1346), Sesson Yūbai (1290–1348), Gidō Shūshin (1325–88), or Zekkai Chūshin (1336–1405) emphatically worked within their monastic institutions, the Zen monk Ikkyū Sōjun (1394–1481) operated outside them. From the 15th c., the scholarly trad. of the gozan monks gained in importance, and here the seeds were sown for the blossoming of neo-Confucian studies in early mod. Japan.

C. Early Modern Period (1600–1868). Although Sino-Japanese poets existed in the 17th c., notably the former warrior and recluse Ishikawa Jōzan (1583–1672) and the prolific scholar and thinker Hayashi Razan (1583–1657), not many were active. This changed dramatically after the first century of Tokugawa rule (1600–1868): during the early mod. period, Chinese studies became an integral part of literary studies in general, and poetry and prose were composed in numbers that were never equaled before or after. It was the golden age of Sino-Japanese lit. Chinese studies was a natural extension of Confucian studies and esp. the study of the thought of Zhu Xi (1130–1200). The neo-Confucian thinker Ogyū Sorai (1666–1728) and his followers, who emphasized the active composition of Sino-Japanese poetry and prose, played a pivotal role.

In 18th- and early 19th-c. Japan, the obvious centers for Sino-Japanese poets were no longer few in number. Academies (juku), both private and operated under the auspices of the lord (daimyō) of a domain (han), were practically everywhere, and thorough training in the classics could be had throughout the country. Scholars made a living teaching aspiring Sino-Japanese poets. Many Japanese, esp. well-educated city dwellers, both of samurai and merchant descent, were able to compose a Sino-Japanese poem, and many did. Attempts at listing major early mod. poets, therefore, fail by definition; but any list would contain Kan Chazan (1748–1827), the Zen monk Ryōkan (1758–1831), and Ema Saikō's mentor Rai San'yō (1780–1832).

D. Modern Period (after 1868). The dramatic political and social changes of the mid- through late 19th c. in Japan did nothing to stem the immense outpouring of emotions and ideas in the form of Sino-Japanese poetry. This phenomenon continued even after Japanese had established itself as the new "national language" (kokugo), ca. 1890. A symbol of how intertwined Sino-Japanese poetry became with the hist. of Japanese lit. as a whole, Natsume Sōseki (1867–1916), perhaps Japan's most revered novelist, composed a Sino-Japanese poem nearly every day toward the end of his life.

■ Anthologies: Japanese Literature in Chinese, trans. B. Watson (1975–76); Poems of the Five Mountains, trans. M. Ury (1977); Zen Poems of the Five Mountains, trans. D. Pollack (1985); Kanshi: The Poetry of Ishikawa Jōzan and Other Edo-period Poets, trans. B. Watson (1990); Great Fool: Zen Master Ryōkan, trans. R. Abé and P. Haskel (1996); An Anthology of Kanshi (Chinese Verse) by Japanese Poets of the Edo Period, trans. J. N. Rabinovitch and T. R. Bradstock (1997); Breeze through Bamboo, trans. H. Sato (1997); Japanese and Chinese Poems to Sing, trans. J. T. Rimer and J. Chaves (1997); Early Modern Literature, ed. H. Shirane (2002); Dance of the Butterflies: Chinese Poetry from the Japanese Court Tradition, trans. J. N. Rabinovitch and T. R. Bradstock (2005); Tradiional Japanese Literature, ed. H. Shirane (2006).

■ Criticism: D. Keene, World within Walls (1976);

J. Konishi, A History of Japanese Literature, trans. A. Catten and N. Teele (1984–91); H. C. McCullough, Brocade by Night (1985); R. Borgen, Sugawara no Michizane and the Early Heian Court (1986); D. Pollack, The Fracture of Meaning (1986); D. Keene, Seeds in the Heart (1993); I. Smits, The Pursuit of Loneliness (1995); A. Yiu, "In Quest of an Ending: An Examination of Sōseki's Kanshi," Studies in Modern Japanese Literature, ed. D. Washburn and A. Tansman (1997); I. Smits, "Song as Cultural History," Monumenta Nipponica 55 (2000); W. Denecke, "Chinese Antiquity and Court Spectacle in Early Kanshi," Journal of Japanese Studies (2004); P. Rouzer, "Early Buddhist Kanshi," Monumenta Nipponica 59 (2004); W. Denecke, "'Topic Poetry Is All Ours,'" HJAS 67 (2007); M. Fraleigh, "Songs of the Righteous Spirit," HJAS 69 (2009).

I. Smits

CHOLIAMBUS or scazon (Gr. "lame iambic," "limping"). Hipponax of Ephesus (ca. 540 BCE) employed this meter for *invective. Its "limping" effect was suggested by the substitution of a long for a short in the penultimate position of the normal iambic trimeter, thus: ⏑ – ⏑ – | ⏑ – ⏑ – | ⏑ – – x. When the first position in the third *metron was also long, the verse was called ischiorrhogic (with broken hips) and was ascribed to Ananius (also 6th c. BCE). The choliambus was used in the Alexandrian period by Herodas for his mimiambi and by Callimachus. In Lat. poetry, Catullus uses this meter for eight of his poems (8, 22, 31, 37, 39, 44, 59, 60), all but one of them invectives; the line has a hardened ending that suits a hardened tone. Catullus and his successors apparently imitated Callimachus in altering only the final two syllables. The form is clearly meant as mimetic, a deformed meter for the subject of depravity. Mod. imitations of limping iambics have mainly tried the analogous structure of reversing the fifth foot in the iambic pentameter from an iamb to a trochee: the effect is very distinctive, since the fifth foot is the most highly constrained (least variable) of all in this meter. Examples of choliambic lines or poems include Alfred, Lord Tennyson's "Lucretius" 186, Wallace Stevens's lines "Elations when the forest blooms; gusty / Emotions on wet roads on autumn nights" ("Sunday Morning"), W. H. Auden's "Down There" (in About the House), and John Frederick Nims's "Love Poem." W. C. Williams cites a discussion of the choliambus as a kind of epilogue to book 1 of Paterson, and, while he does not attempt to recreate the meter, the reference signals an affinity between the poetics of deformity in his own poem and those of the Gr. choliambic poets.

■ Koster; Halporn et al.; West; B. Acosta-Hughes, Polyeideia: The "Iambi" of Callimachus and the Archaic Iambic Tradition (2002); M. Payne, The Animal Part: Human and Other Animals in the Poetic Imagination (2010).

T.V.F. Brogan; R. J. Getty; M. Payne

CHORIAMB (Gr., "consisting of a choree [i.e., a trochee] and an iamb"). A *metron of the structure – ⏑ ⏑ –, frequently found in Gr. lyric verse—it is used often by Sappho and Alcaeus—and dramatic *choruses, and, in Lat. poetry, by Horace. It is very often found in combination with other cola, esp. *glyconics and *asclepiads (see AEOLIC) but sometimes purely, as in Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus 484.

Choriambic dimeter is a term coined by Wilamowitz to cover a variety of related seven- and eight-syllable cola ending in – ⏑ ⏑ – ; mod. usage generally restricts it to the *colon o o – x – ⏑ ⏑ – (where x represents anceps and oo the aeolic base: one of the two must be long). Maas, who treats it as an anaclastic glyconic, uses the honorific but awkward term wilamowitzianus. The term choriambic dimeter is doubly a misnomer, since the sequence is not a dimeter at all but a single indivisible sequence or colon or, at best, the sequence – x – ⏑ ⏑ – preceded by an aeolic base, and the sequence – ⏑ ⏑ – – ⏑ ⏑ – is actually quite distinct. Choriambic dimeters appear in the "eupolidean" meter of the *parabasis in Old Comedy, but they are most conspicuous in *tragedy. Sophocles uses them occasionally, but they are a favorite of Euripides, being varied more widely later in his career. They are closely related to—and presumably derived from—glyconics, with which they mix and respond.

Accentual imitations of the choriamb are very rare in the mod. vernaculars and usually appear in poems expressly meant as cl. imitations, as in F. G. Klopstock's "Siona," in J. W. Goethe's Pandora (choriambic dimeters), and in poems by August von Platen. In Eng., such usage as exists ranges from single lines such as Andrew Marvell's "Lilies without, roses within" ("The Nymph and Her Fawn") to A. C. Swinburne's more extended experiments in his "Choriambics" (Poems and Ballads, Second Series, 1878). A few mod. metrists have interpreted the sequence / xx / in the first four syllables of the iambic pentameter, as in lines beginning "Roses have thorns" or "Look in thy Glass," not as an "initial trochaic substitution" but as a choriamb, but this misunderstands both the nature of cl. prosody and the relation of that to the mod. system.

■ Wilamowitz, pt. 2, chs. 3, 7; E. W. Scripture, "The Choriambus in English Verse," PMLA 43 (1928)—unsound; Maas; Koster, ch. 10; Dale; K. Itsumi, "The Choriambic Dimeter of Euripides," CQ 32 (1982); West.

D. S. Parker; T.V.F. Brogan

CHORUS (Gr. choreuein, "to dance"). In ancient Greece, a song-and-dance ensemble of performers led by a chorus leader (choregos). Choruses played a fundamental role in Gr. life and culture. Participation in choruses contributed to the education and socialization of youths (Plato, Laws 653c–55b, 672e–73d) and provided a means of sharing and coming to terms with the joyful and sorrowful highlights of human life. Choruses performed at civic and pan-Hellenic festivals celebrating gods and heroes (Herodotus 5.67), initiatory rituals, funerals, or celebrations of victorious athletes. Specialized genres of choral songs include hymns to the gods Apollo (*paeans) and Dionysus (*dithyrambs), maiden choruses (partheneia), *dirges (threnoi), and victory odes (epinikia*). Few precious bits of that intense choral activity have been preserved, incl. maiden songs by Alcman and Sappho (7th c. BCE) and victory *odes by Pindar, Simonides, and Bacchylides (5th c. BCE). Songs initially performed by a solo singer could be reperformed by a chorus in another context, and vice versa.

In Athens, choruses played an important role at the festivals for the wine god Dionysus that provided the context for the devel. of drama, the Dionysia and the Lenaia. According to Aristotle, *tragedy originated from the leaders of the dithyramb and *comedy from the leaders of phallic songs (Poetics 4). At the peak of their devel., the Great Dionysia required three choruses of 12 or 15 performers for the tragic contests, five choruses of 24 performers for the comic contests, and 20 choruses of 50 performers for the men's and boys' dithyrambs. Dramatic poets who wished to compete "asked for a chorus" from the magistrate in charge; the expense of dressing and training choruses was assigned by the state to a wealthy citizen (choregos). Many surviving tragedies and comedies are named after their chorus (Aeschylus's Suppliants, Libation Bearers, Eumenides; Sophocles' Trachinian Women; Euripides' Children of Heracles, Suppliants, Trojan Women, Phoenician Women, Bacchae; Aristophanes' Acharnians, Knights, Clouds, Wasps, Birds, Women at the Thesmophoria, Frogs, Assemblywomen). The competition was as much between rival choregoi and their choruses as between poets (Demosthenes, Against Meidias 66, [Andocides] 4.21).

Structurally, Athenian drama can be defined as the interplay between actor speech and choral songs, although crossover does occur. In Aristotle's outline, the parts of tragedy include a prologue (the portion preceding the choral entry), episodes (portions between the odes), exodos (the part following the last ode), and choral odes, themselves divided in parodos (entrance song) and several stasima* (Aristotle, Poetics 12). While actors generally spoke in iambic *trimeters, a meter close to everyday speech, the choral odes were sung in non-Attic dialect and characterized by complex meter, poetic syntax, and rich *imagery. The songs are made of several pairs of metrically identical *strophes and *antistrophes, often followed by an *epode. It is unclear how the dance movements accompanying each strophe and antistrophe corresponded or contrasted with each other.

Chorus members performed in mask and costume and were led by a coryphaios. They entered the dramatic space from the side entrances (parodoi), took their position in the dancing floor (orchestra), and with a few exceptions stayed on stage throughout the drama. Little is known of the movements of choral dancing. It is even unclear whether dramatic choruses performed primarily in rectangular or circular formation. In line with their ritual function elsewhere in Gr. life, choruses often performed rituals integrated in the fiction, incl. libations, hero cult, dancing, wreathing, and curses. Since the plays were performed in the ritual context of the festivals for Dionysus, the interplay between the intra- and extradramatic relevance of ritual utterances could generate powerful effects.

Within the dramatic fiction, choruses often impersonate socially marginal figures such as women, old men, or slaves. Their place in the plot varies over time and from one poet to another. The chorus is central to the plot of Aeschylus's earlier plays (Persians and Suppliants) but more marginal to the action of Sophoclean drama. In contrast to the individual emotions and heroic isolation of the protagonists, choruses bring in a collective experience drawing on traditional wisdom, collective memory, and inherited stories.

Polyphonic by definition, dramatic choruses could, in turn, take the voice of the poet, the audience, or their own fictional character. The special connection between chorus and audience is esp. clear in the *parabasis of Aristophanic comedy, when the chorus addresses the audience directly and partially or completely abandons its dramatic identity. In tragedy, the chorus's use of traditional lang. and its survivor position at the end of the play facilitated audience identification; by contrast, its marginal identity, withdrawal from the action, and frequent misinterpretations of the action distanced it from the spectators.

After its heyday in the democratic Athens of the 5th c. BCE, the chorus gradually disappears from the stage, a disappearance coinciding with the increasingly private rather than public subject matter of the plays. Choral songs separate acts but are not integral to the action in the late comedies of Aristophanes and Menander (4th c. BCE) and the Roman tragedies of Seneca (1st c. CE). In mod. theater, the use of the chorus was a hotly debated topic that verged on the broader issues of *classicism and the social function of theater. To the skepticism of the Abbé d'Aubignac (La Pratique du Théâtre, 1657) and John Dryden (Essay of Dramatic Poesy, 1668) contrasted the enthusiasm of André Dacier (Poétique d'Aristote, 1692) and later Friedrich Schiller (prologue to Die Braut von Messina, 1803), who highlighted the usefulness of the chorus as a means to give coherence to the action and heighten its moral and ethic significance. Notable experiments with the chorus include John Milton's Samson Agonistes (1671), Jean Racine's Esther (1689) and Athalie (1691), P. B. Shelley's Hellas (1822), J. W. Goethe's Faust II (1832), and T. S. Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral (1935).

See CLASSICAL POETICS, DRAMATIC POETRY.

■ C. Calame, Les choeurs de jeunes filles en Grèce archaïque (1977); H. Bacon, "The Chorus in Greek Life and Drama," A. Henrichs, " 'Why Should I Dance?' Choral Self-Referentiality in Greek Tragedy," and G. Nagy, "Transformations of Choral Lyric Traditions in the Context of Athenian State Theater," all Arion 3.1 (1995); J. Gould, "Tragedy and Collective Experience," and S. Goldhill, "Collectivity and Otherness—The Authority of the Tragic Chorus: Response to Gould," Tragedy and the Tragic, ed. M. S. Silk (1996); Der Chor im antiken und modernen Drama, ed. P. Riemer and B. Zimmermann (1998); D. Mastronarde, "Knowledge and Authority in the Choral Voice of Euripidean Tragedy," Syllecta Classica 10 (1999); P. Wilson, The Athenian Institution of the Khoregia (2000); H. Foley, "Choral Identity in Greek Tragedy," CP 98 (2003); S.

Murnaghan, "Women in Groups: Aeschylus' Suppliants and the Female Choruses of Greek Tragedy," The Soul of Tragedy, ed. V. Pedrick and S. M. Oberhelman (2005); G. Ley, The Theatricality of Greek Tragedy (2007); M. A. Gruber, Der Chor in den Tragödien des Aischylos (2008).

M. Hopman

CHRISTABEL METER. Term for the verse form of S. T. Coleridge's "Christabel" (1797–1800, pub. 1816), believed by Coleridge to be a species of *accentual verse. In the preface to the poem, he writes that "the meter of Christabel is not, properly speaking, irregular, though it may seem so from its being founded on . . . counting in each line the accents, not the syllables." The number of syllables in the poem "may vary from seven to twelve," but "in each line the accents will be found to be only four." He calls this a "new principle" in Eng. poetry and claims that variations in syllable count are made intentionally: "occasional variation in number of syllables is not introduced wantonly . . . but in correspondence with some transition in the nature of the imagery or passion." Up to the turn of the 20th c., Coleridge was generally believed in his assertions, and "Christabel" was considered an important example of accentual verse in Eng.

Upon closer inspection, however, numerous scholars have found Coleridge's claims to be false. Robert Bridges showed in 1901 (rev. ed. 1921) that Coleridge is actually writing *accentual-syllabic verse. And Snell showed in 1929 that "four-fifths of the lines of Christabel are perfectly regular; that is, they are the conventional four-stress iambic verse usually in couplet form, with only such variations in general as are found in this sort of meter. If [the remaining one-fifth of the poem's lines] is scanned according to the principle that 'light syllables may occasionally be added or subtracted without altering the normal verse meter' . . . the entire poem is iambic with monosyllabic and anapestic substitutions." In short, the poem is heavily iambic and effectively octosyllabic: of the 655 lines of the poem, 523 (80%) are perfectly regular octosyllables, and 92% vary by only one syllable one way or the other. And Coleridge's implication, in the preface, that he is the first to use syllabic *variation for purposes of metrical expressiveness seems an unreasonable slight to earlier poets, such as Shakespeare, John Donne, and John Milton.

■ Bridges; A.L.F. Snell, "The Meter of 'Christabel,'" Fred Newton Scott Anniversary Papers (1929); Brogan; B. O'Driscoll, "The 'Invention' of a Meter: 'Christabel' Meter as Fact and Fiction," JEGP 100.4 (2001); M. Russett, "Meter, Identity, Voice: Untranslating 'Christabel,'" SEL 43.4 (2003).

T.V.F. Brogan; M. Weinstein

CHUCI. Following the earlier Classic of Poetry (see shijing), the Lyrics of Chu (Chuci), comprising poetry from the 3d c. BCE through the 2d c. CE, is the second principal source of ancient Chinese poetry. It reflects the distinct literary aesthetics of the southern region of Chu along the mid- and lower Yangzi River. While the songs include words of Chu dialect, their lang. belongs to the literary koiné of ancient China. The anthol. emerged in the 2d c. BCE, was completed in the 2d c. CE, and received its final arrangement in the 12th c. Its principal early commentator Wang Yi (d. 158) attributes more than half of the songs to Qu Yuan (ca. 340–278 BCE) and his shadowy "successors" Song Yu and Jing Cuo; however, many pieces attributed to Qu Yuan are evidently Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE) imitations. Wang's readings of the songs as expressions of political frustration, in line with Han interpretations of the Classic of Poetry, were challenged only in later imperial times, most prominently by Zhu Xi (1130–1200).

In their mythological imagination, the early parts of the anthol. seem connected to the contemporaneous aristocratic culture of the south such as seen in the funerary banners from the 2d c. BCE burials at Mawangdui (Hunan). Likewise, the songs' lively meter and rhythm must reflect a (lost) southern musical style performed with string and wind instruments. The typical couplet of the "Nine Songs" (Jiu ge)—perhaps the earliest section of the anthol.—has two equal lines of four, five, or six syllables, with an additional rhythmic particle xi in the middle. "Encountering Sorrow" (Li sao), Qu Yuan's lament in 187 couplets and the most celebrated poem of the anthol., further develops the pattern into a more complex meter capable of a narrative style: dum dum-dum particle dum-dum xi / dum dum-dum particle dum-dum. Since Han times, this meter was popular in elegies describing personal misfortune.

Developed as a celestial journey, "Encountering Sorrow" stages an autobiographic narrative of political ambition and frustration; since its earliest reception in Jia Yi's (200–168 BCE) "Lament for Qu Yuan" (Diao Qu Yuan), it has been interpreted through the tragic story of its purported author and protagonist, an upright minister at the Chu royal court who was slandered and banished further south where he finally drowned himself. While unknown from any preimperial text, this story existed in several sources, some of which are patched together in Qu Yuan's only surviving biography in Sima Qian's (ca. 145–86 BCE) Records of the Historian (Shiji). According to trad., "Encountering Sorrow" is the first autobiographic poem in China, and Qu Yuan the first Chinese poet known by name. In reality, he may be the subject but not the author of the texts attributed to him.

The poetic diction of "Encountering Sorrow"—hyperbolic catalogs of natural phenomena in a southern geography, both real and imagined; a large repertoire of rhyming and alliterative binomes; a rapid metric pace—is unlike anything in the Classic of Poetry. So are the themes of mystic flight and erotic desire, as well as the fantasies of immortality and command over the cosmic spirits that alternate with complaints about a morally corrupt world. The same rich lang. and melancholic tone also characterizes the "Nine Songs," a set of 11 pieces that Qu Yuan, in Wang Yi's interpretation, developed out of southern religious chants to express his political frustration. Mod. scholars, however, have found in some of the songs—e.g., the delirious fantasies depicting the vain pursuit of alluring water goddesses—the traces of ancient shamanism.

The lang. and themes of "Encountering Sorrow" and the "Nine Songs" reverberate through the remaining parts of the anthol. that include Qu Yuan's despairing lament "Embracing Sand" (Huai sha), purportedly composed immediately before his suicide; the incantations "Summoning the Soul" (Zhao hun) and "Great Summons" (Da zhao) that recall the souls of the dead; "Summoning the Recluse" (Zhao yinshi) where the same theme is transposed to a prince who has fled into the hostile mountains; "Roaming Afar" (Yuan you) that turns the celestial journey into an ecstatic experience of magical transcendence; and several cycles of songs, most likely of Han date, that imitate the expression of desolation in "Encountering Sorrow," but in far more constrained terms. While the earliest layers of the Lyrics of Chu oscillate between political ambition, extravagant imagination, and sensual desire, the parts by later epigones, up to Wang Yi's own "Nine Yearnings" (Jiu si), are tamed by Han Confucian moral thought. Beyond the anthol. proper, however, the quest for the goddess inspired numerous later Chinese poems of love and desire.

Finally, the Lyrics of Chu includes "Heavenly Questions" (Tian wen), a unique catalog of questions—possibly riddles—that, in 172 tetrasyllabic verses, moves from the origin of the universe to the mythical and historical world of ancient Chu. As much of the underlying mythology is lost, parts of the poem are now cryptic; but even so, "Heavenly Questions" reminds us of the expansive imagination and exuberant cultural vitality of the south at the dawn of the Chinese empire.

■ A. Waley, The Temple and Other Poems (1923); J. R. Hightower, "Ch'ü Yüan Studies," Silver Jubilee Volume of the Zinbun-Kagaku-Kenkyusyo (1954); A. Waley, The Nine Songs (1955); A. C. Graham, "The Prosody of the Sao Poems in the Ch'u Tz'u," Asia Major n.s. 10 (1963); D. Hawkes, "The Quest of the Goddess," Asia Major n.s. 13 (1967); S.-H. Chen, "On Structural Analysis of the Ch'u Tz'u Nine Songs," Tamkang Review 2 (1971), and "The Genesis of Poetic Time," Tsing Hua Journal of Chinese Studies n.s. 10 (1973); D. Hawkes, The Songs of the South (1985); G. R. Waters, Three Elegies of Ch'u (1985); S. Field, A Chinese Book of Origins (1986); P. Yu, The Reading of Imagery in the Chinese Poetic Tradition (1987); C. H. Wang, From Ritual to Allegory (1988); P. W. Kroll, "On 'Far Roaming,'" Journal of the American Oriental Society 116 (1996); T. W-K. Chan, "The jing/zhuan Structure of the Chuci Anthology," T'oung Pao 84 (1998); G. Sukhu, "Monkeys, Shamans, Emperors, and Poets," in Defining Chu, ed. C. A. Cook and J. S. Major (1999).

M. Kern

CI ("song lyric"). After shi* poetry, the second best-known genre of Chinese poetry was the ci, "song lyric," form, which grew out of the popular music of the Tang dynasty (618–907). Song lyrics were composed to set tune patterns (ci pai) with fixed metrical structures, rhyme patterns, and tonal euphony. Although the height of the genre is often considered to have occurred in the Song dynasty (960–1279), ci have been composed by elite poets since the Tang, enjoyed an important revival in the hands of many poets in the late Ming (1368–1644) and Qing (1644–1911) dynasties, and are composed even today. The origins of ci in the 9th and 10th cs. are understood only in outline: new music and musical instruments from central Asia, imported along the Silk Road during the med. period, strongly influenced musical composition at both the popular and elite levels of Tang society. In the entertainment quarters of the major Tang cities, musicians and singers composed or adapted new tunes and wrote lyrics to new songs, and these spread to other areas of the empire, to musical composition at the imperial court, and to the musical troupes of Tang officials. In the late 8th and early 9th cs., elite poets became interested in composing lyrics to these new tunes, though relatively few lyrics composed by Tang literati have been preserved. The body of ci discovered in the early 20th c. at Dunhuang, most of which date to the 9th and 10th cs., give us strong evidence of song lyric composition at the popular level.

The birth of ci in the realm of popular music, along with the lyrics' early performance by female entertainers, profoundly shaped the evolution of the genre in the late 9th and early 10th cs., when romantic love was the most common topic and the subjects of the lyrics were predominantly women who were either speaking or were described as objects of a male viewer's gaze. Although elite poets in the late 10th and 11th cs. used ci as a vehicle for masculine voices speaking of romantic love or loss and later Song poets extended the genre into topics once reserved for shi poetry, the genre came to be regarded as the most appropriate form in which to express certain kinds of qing, "feeling," in particular, sorrow, longing, and regret. Over the course of the genre's hist., poets who wrote ci frequently experimented with creative tensions that grew out of these early directions. Some examples of these tensions include that between an "elevated" (ya) style and a more "vulgar" (su) style, indicated by the use of formal lang. punctuated with colloquial phrases, the use of shifting male and female voices in lyrics, the presence or absence of erotic detail, the interplay of memory and the present moment; and the opposition of a highly masculine, hearty style and a suppressed, emotionally suggestive style. Another fundamental feature of ci poetics that emerged from early song lyrics was the intense relationship of the internal emotional world of the speaking subject and the depiction of the external scene. Poets explored this relationship in many ways: the scene could mirror or extend the speaker's feelings or could serve as stark contrast. The stanzaic structure of ci also allowed poets abruptly to juxtapose elements of scene and feeling, implying connections for the reader to complete.

As the genre matured, writers of both shi and ci sought to differentiate the boundaries between the two poetic genres as part of a broader interest in defining the limits of socially acceptable elite composition. However, ci as a genre was always secondary to shi, because of its relative youth, its association with popular entertainment and romantic culture, and its failure to deepen its connections to the elite cl. curriculum. In the eyes of Song and later poets, ci was defined as "not-shi," both topically and formally. The formal features of ci, as defined by individual tune patterns, stabilized over the course of the Song dynasty, when new tune patterns continued to be written and sung. Most but not all tune patterns contained two stanzas of roughly equal length. In some patterns, the stanzas were brief (three or four lines), a form known as "short songs" (xiaoling); other patterns contained stanzas of more than a dozen lines each, known as "long" (man) lyrics. Two formal features of ci that distinguished it sharply from shi poetry were the use of lines of different length and the unique rhyme and tonal schemes found in individual tune patterns. These features made composing ci technically challenging; they also encouraged poets to experiment with syntax, line length, and line breaks in ways not allowed in shi poetry. Although some poets composed new music for older ci patterns, the general trend of ci from the early Song onward was toward becoming a poetic form that existed independent of music. Anthols. of ci began to be published in the Song dynasty, which gave the genre more prominence in elite culture, even if that prominence remained somewhat suspect.

After the fall of the Tang, the practice of composing ci seems to have become more widespread among the literati of the courts of the 10th-c. Five Dynasties and southern kingdoms. An anthol. from this period, the Huajian ji (Collection from among the Flowers) was the first extant collection of ci written by elite poets. Its lyrics focus on beautiful women and romantic, mildly erotic scenarios, and it served as a stylistic model for early northern Song writers. Another influential model from the 10th c. was that of the ruler of the southern Tang, Li Yu (937–978), who composed lyrics in a male voice; his works have commonly been read biographically, as expressions of his own despair at the Song conquest.

The growing urban environments of the northern Song and their entertainment quarters increased interaction between literati and female performers and surely inspired more lyrics on that subject. But the social stigma of writing about that world remained powerful in elite society. The poet Liu Yong (987–1053) wrote hundreds of lyrics in a more colloquial style, many of them in the long form, depicting the romantic travails of singing women and literati playboys. Many important Song poets composed both shi and ci, though some, such as the prominent literatus Ouyang Xiu (1007–72), sought to distinguish the two kinds of poetry very clearly, reserving romantic content or melancholy emotional expression for ci. The introduction of cl. literary content into ci by Su Shi (1037–1101), including material such as historical events, reflections on the past, and depictions of the natural world that were neither romantic nor sentimental, not only broadened the range of ci for later writers but "masculinized" the genre for those uninterested in the excessively feminine style of romantic lyrics. However, he was later criticized for having altered ci in this way. The late northern Song woman poet Li Qingzhao (1084–ca. 1151) was one of the first people to theorize about ci poetics as well as to compose ci herself. Her lyrics stand as an influential early example of a woman writer using a literary form for which there were already "feminine" voices. Her critical assertion that ci, as a genre, had a fundamental nature distinct from shi also gave the form greater legitimacy.

By the southern Song dynasty, writers had a wider range of stylistic models for ci, but these could be roughly divided between a "bold and carefree" (haofang) masculine style that avoided romance as a topic and a "delicate and lovely" (wanyue) feminine style used more often for expressions of sorrow and longing. Xin Qiji (1140–1207) is best known for his patriotic, energetic version of the masculine style; his best-known lyrics express his distress at the conquest of the northern Song by non-Chinese invaders. Lu You (1125–1210), one of the most important poets of the southern Song, followed in the path laid by Su Shi and incorporated many concerns of shi into his ci. The poet Wu Wenying (ca. 1200–1260) is perhaps the best example of the refined, delicate style that combined elegant craft with romantic subject matter. Notably, few prominent southern Song men were known for their ci composition, an indication of the genre's still dubious reputation.

During the Yuan and Ming dynasties, literati lost interest in ci; with respect to song forms, some writers explored the qu or sanqu (literally, "detached aria") of the increasingly popular *Chinese poetic drama, which included arias along with spoken text. But the late Ming and early Qing dynasties saw an unexpected revival of ci from two different quarters: from women writers, both courtesans and well-educated elite women, and from Qing scholars who sought to rehabilitate the form. The rising number of women who composed, circulated, and even pub. poetry (in both shi and ci forms) challenged the gender roles of trad. Chinese poetry. Ming and Qing elite women, however, refashioned the genre to downplay its erotic or romantic elements and articulate their experiences in a manner in keeping with their roles as virtuous Confucian daughters, wives, and mothers. Male poets such as Zhu Yizun (1629–1709) also tended to avoid eroticism, and they downplayed colloquial lang., putting a greater emphasis on cl. lang. and allusion. The efforts of both groups helped to revitalize the form, ensuring its continuing popularity into the mod. era.

See CHINA, POETRY OF; CHINA, POPULAR POETRY OF.

■ J.J.Y. Liu, Major Lyricists of the Northern Sung (1974); S. Lin, The Transformation of the Chinese Lyrical Tradition (1978); K. Chang, The Evolution of Chinese Tz'u Poetry (1980); Lyric Poets of the Southern T'ang, ed. and trans. D. Bryant (1982); G. Fong, Wu Wenying and the Art of Southern Song Ci Poetry (1987); D. McCraw, Chinese Lyricists of the Seventeenth Century (1990); P. Rouzer, Writing One Another's Dream (1993); Voices of the Song Lyric in China, ed. P. Yu (1994); S. Sargent, "Tz'u," Columbia History of Chinese Literature, ed. V. H. Mair (2001); S. M. Bell, Gendered Persona and Poetic Voice (2004); A. Shields, Crafting a Collection (2006).

A. Shields

CICERONIANISM. The emulation of Cicero's lang. and application of his rhetorical theory that gained particular currency in 16th-c. Europe. In circulation in the Middle Ages were only Cicero's youthful De inventione and his Topica; his legacy was already part of the cultural matrix but was limited to narrow stylistic prescription. An emergent rhetorical Ciceronianism, intertwined with the hist. of humanism, can be traced to Petrarch's rediscovery in 1345 of Cicero's letters to Atticus and Gerardo Landriani's unearthing in 1421 of his major works De oratore, Orator, and Brutus. Instrumental to the diffusion of Ciceronianism was the Venetian humanist Pietro Bembo, who established Ciceronian Lat. as the official code of the Roman church in the mid-16th c. The underlying premise for early Ren. emulators was that Cicero's lang. embodied an ideal purity—a paragon of Lat. at its height, still free of the ruggedness of the Silver Age and of med. "barbarisms."

From the start, Ciceronianism was surrounded by contention over the implications of singling out one cl. author for imitation above the rest. Tensions played out repeatedly and across national boundaries between the doctrinaire Ciceronians (e.g., Paolo Cortesi, Bembo, Marco Girolamo Vida, Christophe de Longueil, Sebastian Fox Morcillo) who argued that Cicero should be the exclusive model for rhetoricians and those (e.g., Angelo Poliziano, Giovanni Pico de la Mirandola, Erasmus, Juan Luis Vives, Francisco Sánchez de las Brozas, Philip Sidney, Francis Bacon) who viewed a productive appropriation of antiquity as necessarily drawing from multiple models and adapting to contemp. cultural realities. Among the advocates of the latter position, some denounced Ciceronianism as slavish aping. Exemplary in this respect was Erasmus's Ciceronianus (1528), which was at the origin of a robust anti-Ciceronian trad. But beyond the precise divergences among purported friends and enemies of Ciceronianism, its effects on the trajectory of Ren. humanism were wide-ranging. One must be wary of some scholars' view that the Ciceronian model was relevant only to prose composition (i.e., the direct mimicking of sentence structure and vocabulary). Far from being a static mold, as the anti-Ciceronians contended, Ciceronianism evolved along with the complex relationship between Lat. and vernacular letters, generating ideas central to the devel. of poetry in several national trads.

How specifically Ciceronianism permeated the poetic sphere has to do with the encompassing neoclassical agendas of the 16th c. In this context, stylistic guidelines were conceived in tandem with the requirements of a collective vivere civile, a vision already embedded in Petrarch's seminal conversation with Cicero. Seduced by the orator's lang. because of its formal beauty and cadence, Petrarch established a personalized rapport with his precursor through letters that he addressed to Cicero (Epistolae familiares), setting a tone that would become characteristic of humanism, one distinguishing feature of which was the privileging of individual voice as locus of organic cultural exchange. In contrast with dogmatic manifestations of institutional Ciceronian Lat., Petrarch's dialogic appropriation incorporated Cicero's lang. and teaching to his own milieu as a way of life fostering refined civism, a standard that later informed Baldassare Castiglione's courtly ethos and definition of sprezzatura, or naturalized artifice. An important channel of Ciceronian influence, the ideals of courtly self-expression articulated in Castiglione's Libro del cortegiano (Book of the Courtier, 1528) were pervasive in poetry, as was the related motif of the universally educated poet, well-versed in the liberal arts and social sciences, a notion deriving from Cicero's celebrated wise orator. Cicero's early mod. descendants were, thus, true to his belief that verbal excellence was grounded in intellectual competence. In continuity with these ideals, Bembo's Prose della volgar lingua (Writing in the Vernacular, 1525) was another key work in the genealogy of Ciceronianism, providing a lasting paradigm for combining stylistic prescription and social fashioning. Fusing the teachings of De oratore with those of Horace's Ars poetica, the treatise outlines an aesthetic program for vernacular letters that advanced the public role of poetry by situating it in the framework of oratorical art. Throughout the Ren., the two spheres converged until poetry was largely defined in terms of rhetorical categories: inventio, the determination of topic (see INVENTION); elocutio, the way in which speech was delivered; and dispositio, the organization of matter. The status of poetry as a medium of both beauty and persuasion is reflected in Bembo's lessons on prosody which, proposing Petrarchan lyric as the model for contemp. verse, formulate the mellifluous combination of consonants and vowels as a means of eliciting the requisite emotional register in the listener (see PETRARCHISM). Thus, making use of the civic sensibilities and accompanying formal parameters of Ciceronian rhet.—the careful balance between elocutio and inventio, between gravity and artifice—in the establishment of a Tuscan literary preeminence, Bembo created a blueprint for the construction of a standardized cultural authority that would become pivotal in the consolidation of other literary trads. This process was furthered by theorists and poets such as Bernardino Daniello, Donato Tomitano, Girolamo Muzio, Antonio Minturno, J. C. Scaliger, Étienne Dolet, Joachim du Bellay, and Fernando de Herrera. Through their work, Ciceronianism continued to mix with other antique influences—notably Aristotelian theories of *decorum and Quintilianic conceptions of ideal oratory as a measure of moral good—in the devel. of vernacular appropriations of *classicism. The degree to which the Ciceronian mark informed this fluid enterprise is evident in Herrera's commentary on Garcilaso de la Vega's oeuvre (1580). Noting the key role played by Cicero's "divine eloquence" in Lat.'s attainment of "fertility" and "abundance," Herrera upholds these as attributes essential to the cultural legitimacy of Sp. poetry.

The decline of Ciceronianism in the 17th c. can be linked to the crisis of eloquence. In a mounting tide of political skepticism occasioned by protracted territorial and religious wars, humanist belief in consensus was compromised, as was faith in the social powers of the word. The influence of Peter Ramus and his followers brought about a curricular reshuffling, resulting in the separation of rhet. from logic and philosophy, with rhet. relegated to the formal mechanics of style. Another factor contributing to this phenomenon was the increasingly empirical conception of knowledge, manifest in the scientific revolution as well as in the burgeoning notion of politics as a practical science. In relation to these devels., Senecan brevity, with its imperious hyperlucidity, became the preferred standard for communication. If Ciceronianism sought a conciliation between pleasure and usefulness, the dolce and the utile, laconism stressed mental agility at the expense of formal harmony. Identifiable with this shift is the 17th-c. rise of the poetic *conceit, its exhibition of conceptual prowess often transgressing the principles of decorum (see BAROQUE, CONCEPTISMO). Cicero continued to be hailed, however, among those wishing to rescue aesthetics from excessive formal idiosyncrasy. In this spirit, the orator is celebrated in Baltasar Gracián's formulation (1642) of the conceit as guarantor of civilized subtlety.

See RHETORIC AND POETRY.

■ M. W. Croll, Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm, ed. J. M. Patrick et al. (1966)—classic essays on the Ciceronian and anti-Ciceronian trads.; A. Lumsden Kouvel, "La huella ciceroniana en el siglo XVI," Actas. Asociación Internacional de Hispanistas 4 (1971); M. Garci-Gómez, "Paráfrasis de Cicerón en la definición de poesía de Santillana," Hispania 56 (1973); The Rhetoric of Renaissance Poetry: From Wyatt to Milton, ed. T. O. Sloan and R. B. Waddington (1974); T. M. Greene, The Light in Troy: Imitation and Discovery in Renaissance Poetry (1982); J. P. Houston, The Rhetoric of Poetry in the Renaissance and Seventeenth Century (1983); J. J. Murphy, Renaissance Eloquence (1983); K. Meerhoff, Rhétorique et poétique au XVIe siècle en France (1986); N. González and J. María, El ciceronianismo en España (1993); M. Mora, "El De oratore de Cicerón como fuente del De poeta de Minturno," Humanismo y pervivencia del mundo clásico, ed. J. M. Maestre Maestre, J. Pascual Barea, and L. Charlo Brea (1997); I. Navarrete, Orphans of Petrarch: Poetry and Theory in the Spanish Renaissance (1994); R. G. Witt, In the Footsteps of the Ancients (2000); J. Dellaneva, Ciceronian Controversies (2007).

A. GARCÍA-BRYCE

CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES

I. Introduction
II. Quantitative Imitations
III. Accentual Imitations

I. Introduction. Throughout the hist. of Eur. poetry since the Ren., there have been attempts to introduce into the versification of the vernacular languages the metrical principles, the specific meters, and the stanza forms of cl. Gr. and Lat. verse. The most obvious motivation for this endeavor has been the continuing high status of the cl. langs. and esp. of cl. poetry, which for many has represented the epitome of Western literary achievement. In addition, many writers in the mod. Eur. langs., even when not seeking to emulate the achievement of cl. verse, have drawn upon cl. examples to extend the variety of metrical forms in their own literary trads.

These attempts were most frequent in the Ren., esp. in the 15th and 16th cs. Humanism placed a high valuation on cl. lit. at a time when the mod. Eur. langs. were for the most part without a literary trad. of equal stature. The practice of *imitation had long been fundamental to literary art, and the project of enriching the vernacular was encouraged by the growing cultural nationalism of the period. The highly organized nature of *classical prosody also appealed to the Ren. aesthetic sense, which favored the artificial and the complex. By the 17th c., the native verse trads. had established themselves more securely, and there was less incentive to look to ancient Greece and Rome for models. The romantic desire to challenge established verse forms produced a resurgence of interest in cl. meters, esp. in Germany (F. G. Klopstock) and England (S. T. Coleridge, Robert Southey), and the rise of a more historically informed classicism in the late 19th and early 20th cs. resulted in attempts to devise more exact vernacular equivalents to Gr. and Lat. meters (e.g., by Robert Bridges). The experiments of modernism led once more to a free use of cl. verse forms as a quarry for new poetic directions.

Imitations of cl. meters can be broadly divided into two types: those that seek to establish a principle of quantity in the vernacular on which to base *scansion and those that retain the indigenous phonological prominence of the lang. in question (usually stress) as the marker of the meter but seek to imitate or reproduce the metrical patterns of cl. verse.

II. Quantitative Imitations, or "quantitative verse." To appreciate the attempts to write cl. verse in the vernacular langs. based upon a principle of quantity, it is less important to understand what *quantity was in the spoken langs. of ancient Greece and Rome than to understand what the poets of the Ren. and after believed it to have been. The terms traditionally used to describe the two types of syllables in quantitative poetry are "long" and "short," and there is a very old claim, inherited from the Gr. rhythmici, that long syllables take twice the time of short ones in pronunciation. Regardless of whether this claim accurately described linguistic reality in antiquity (the evidence suggests that quantity was more a structural difference than a temporal one), it bore little relation to the phonetic facts of Lat. as pronounced during the Ren.; in any event, the claim had long since become a convention, accepted without inquiry. This meant that the metrical schemes of Lat. verse were realized only very fitfully in actual reading: the conception of meter that arose was a largely abstract and visual one based on an intellectual classification of syllables according to learned rules.

This accounts for the initially puzzling fact that Ren. cl. imitations frequently have no perceptible rhythmic patterning—or if they do, it is a pattern of accents that cuts across the quantitative scheme. The scheme is there, however, deducible by the rules of cl. prosody, and a Ren. reader trained in Lat. prosody as part of the regular grammar-school education could perceive and enjoy it. Strictly speaking, this verse should be called "pseudoquantitative," since to follow the rules of Lat. quantity in a lang. with a different phonological structure does not produce the same syllabic organization.

The earliest quantitative verse in a mod. vernacular appears to have been written in It. by Leon Battista Alberti and Leonardo Dati in 1441. The extent of the It. quantitative movement can be gauged from the Versi, et regole de la nuova poesia toscana of 1539, collected by Claudio Tolomei, which contained verse written on quantitative principles by 24 named poets and several anonymous contributors. Numerous other It. poets attempted quantitative verse in the 15th and 16th cs., many of whom were collected by G. Carducci in 1881.

The Fr. quantitative movement seems to have begun in the late 15th c. with the unpublished work (incl. a treatise) of Michel de Boteauville; in the latter part of the 16th c., many of France's best-known poets attempted vers mesurés à l'antique*. The link between quantitative meter and music arising from the theoretical basis in strict durations was most productive in the compositions of Jean-Antoine de Baïf's "Académie de Poésie et de Musique." In Germany, the earliest quantitative experiments were made by Conrad Gesner in 1555; other Ren. adherents of the new meters were Johann Clajus, Johann Fischart, Johann Kolross, and Andreas Bachmann. The Ren. also saw quantitative imitations in Dutch and Hungarian and in the Scandinavian and Slavic langs. under the international aegis of humanism.

The quantitative movement in England had its beginnings in discussions by Roger Ascham, Thomas Watson (later bishop of Lincoln), and Sir John Cheke at Cambridge, ca. 1540. Two *hexameters by Watson that survive from these discussions, quoted by Ascham in The Scholemaster (1570), will serve as an example of quantitative imitation:

– ⏑ ⏑ | – – | – ⏑ ⏑ | – –
All travellers do gladly report great
| – ⏑ ⏑ | – –
prayse of Ulysses
– ⏑ ⏑ | – ⏑ ⏑ | – –| –
For that he knew many mens maners
– | – ⏑ ⏑ | – –
and saw many Cities

These lines do not attempt to create aural patterns, either of stresses or of longs and shorts. Stresses may fall in short positions (first syllable of "travelers" and "many"); unstressed syllables may be long and may fall in the *ictus position at the beginning of the foot (last syllable of "travelers" and "maners"). The ear does not perceive the sequence "-ers and" as two long syllables, and the stress on the first syllable of "many" gives it greater length in pronunciation than the second. But Ascham's admiration of these lines is not, in his own terms, misplaced. The lines observe the two most important cl. prosodic rules taught in Tudor grammar schools: the penultimate rule (in words of three or more syllables, a stressed penultimate syllable is long, and an unstressed one is short) and the rule of "position" (a syllable is long if its vowel is followed by more than one consonant in the same or the following words). "Great" is long both by position and because its vowel is a diphthong. (In fact, the rule pertained to digraphs since, like the rule of position, it applied not to pronunciation but to spelling; one resource available to many quantitative poets of this period was the variability of orthography.) Where no rules applied, Watson was free to determine quantity himself, provided he was consistent.

Ascham included some quantitative trans. in Toxophilus (1545), and James Sandford published specimens in 1576, but the major impetus for the movement in England was Philip Sidney's example in writing quantitative poems for the Arcadia, probably between 1577 and 1580, and his discussions with Thomas Drant, Edward Dyer, and Edmund Spenser on the question of cl. imitations. As K. Hanson has shown, Sidney (whose quantitative rules have survived) was extremely alert to the phonological characteristics of Eng. Examples by Spenser and by Gabriel Harvey appear in their correspondence. Numerous poets wrote Eng. quantitative verse over the next 20 years. One of the strictest, technically speaking, was Richard Stanyhurst, who trans. four books of the Aeneid (1582); one of the most prolific was Abraham Fraunce, who published several quantitative works between 1587 and 1592; and one of the most skilled was Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke, in her trans. of the Psalms in the 1590s. Several treatises were written in at least partial support of quantitative imitations, notably by William Webbe (1586), George Puttenham (1589), and Thomas Campion (1602). After 1602, the movement virtually came to an end.

The Ren. quantitative movement died when the changing aesthetic climate caused an intellectual notion of meter to give way to a metrical practice based on the experienced rhythms of the lang.—at least partly under the influence of the drama—and when the native verse trads. demonstrated unequivocally that metrical principles arising from the mod. langs. themselves could yield poetry of a grace and power matching that of antiquity. The role of the quantitative experiments in the devel. of the vernacular metrical trads. was, however, significant: they showed the dangers of interpreting the notion of imitation too literally, and they led to other successful innovations such as the introduction of *blank verse. Later attempts to devise a strict quantitative principle for mod. langs. (e.g., by Bridges) succeeded only in showing that quantity is not a phonological feature that can be transferred from the cl. langs.

III. Accentual Imitations. Although mod. scholarship has for the most part held the view that Lat. verse should be read with its normal prose stresses, for a long time there existed an alternative mode of reading in which the ictus of each foot is stressed, thereby converting the cl. metrical pattern into a kind of accentual verse. This trad. has sometimes encouraged prosodists (e.g., G. Saintsbury) to use the terminology of cl. prosody (esp. longs and shorts) in discussing accentual meter. There is evidence of this mode of reading in Ren. schools, and it was firmly entrenched in 19th-c. Eng. and Ger. pedagogy. As a result, the rhythms of these accentual equivalents of cl. meters were familiar to many poets, and it is not surprising that a number attempted to use such meters in their own langs. Two Lat. forms in particular produce distinctive rhythmic patterns when converted into accentual verse: the hexameter and the *sapphic; the latter esp. has had a long hist. in Eur. lit. The influence of accentual versions of cl. meters can be seen in many Ren. imitations, and one of the most significant features of Campion's relatively successful experiments is that they combine a strict pseudoquantitative scansion with an accentual one. In Germany, Martin Opitz argued in 1624 for an equivalence between length and stress, while, in Spain, accentual imitations, esp. sapphics, date from the mid-16th c. However, it was not until the second half of the 18th c. that experiments with accentual imitation became common, and in the 19th c., they are legion. The most influential poet in this movement was F. G. Klopstock, whose accentual hexameters had a profound effect on later Ger. versification and whose example was followed by numerous Ger. and Eng. poets. J. W. Goethe, F. Schiller, A. W. Schlegel, and F. Hölderlin all wrote accentual imitations of cl. schemes, followed by Eduard Mörike, Christian Morgenstern, R. M. Rilke, Thomas Mann, and Bertolt Brecht, while scholars such as A. W. Schlegel, G. Platen, and J. H. Voss attempted a stricter transfer of cl. metrical principles.

Imitations based on Klopstock's principles were introduced into Eng. by William Taylor in the late 18th c., followed by Coleridge and Southey. Alfred, Lord Tennyson made attempts to combine the accentual principle with a quantitative one, while long poems in accentual hexameters by H. W. Longfellow (Evangeline), C. Kingsley, and A. H. Clough achieved some success. Numerous hexameter trans. of cl. and Ger. verse were published, many encouraged by Matthew Arnold's advocacy. A. C. Swinburne and George Meredith also experimented with accentual cl. imitations, as have many 20th-c. poets, incl. Ezra Pound, Louis MacNeice, and W. H. Auden. Rus. accentual imitations also date from the latter part of the 18th c.; Vasily Trediakovsky's hexameters were particularly influential, and a number of poets, incl. Alexander Pushkin, used the form in the 19th c., esp. for trans. The accentual pattern that is produced is close to that of the dol'nik*, a folk meter that became important in the 20th c. It. imitations present a somewhat different picture, since the lang. and verse forms are less strictly based on stress. The most influential naturalizer of cl. versification was Giosuè Carducci, whose Odi barbare (Barbarian Odes, 1877–89; 2d ed., 1878, with useful preface by G. Chiarini) made use of the accentual patterns of cl. meters (when read with their normal prose stresses) and ignored the quantitative patterns. He was thus able to bring cl. imitations close to the native trad. of It. verse, though at the cost of the cl. metrical schemes themselves. He added a historical study to his own experiments in 1881. For a different mod. attempt to imitate the meters of an ancient poetry, this one Germanic (see ALLITERATION).

■ K. Elze, Die englische Hexameter (1867); La poesia barbara nei secoli XV e XVI, ed. G. Carducci (1881); A. H. Baxter, The Introduction of Classical Metres into Italian Poetry (1901); R. B. McKerrow, "The Use of So-called Classical Metres in Elizabethan Verse," MLQ (London) 4–5 (1901); Kastner; Omond; G. D. Willcock, "Passing Pitefull Hexameters," MLR 29 (1934); G. L. Hendrickson, "Elizabethan Quantitative Hexameters," PQ 28 (1949); A. Burgi, History of the Russian Hexameter (1954); Beare; P. Habermann, "Antike Versmasse und Strophenformen im Deutschen," Reallexikon II—extensive bibliographies; A. Kabell, Metrische Studien II: Antiker Form sich nähernd (1960)—wide-ranging; The Poems of Sir Philip Sidney, ed. W. A. Ringler (1962); W. Bennett, German Verse in Classical Metres (1963); Elwert, Italienische; D. Attridge, Well-weighed Syllables (1974)—Elizabethan imitations; Wilkins; Die Lehre von der Nachahmung der antike Versmasse im Deutschen, ed. H.-H. Hellmuth and J. Schröder (1976); S. Schuman, "Sixteenth-Century English Quantitative Verse," MP 74 (1977); Brogan; Navarro; Scherr; Gasparov, History; R. L. Scott, "The English Hexameter," CML 16 (1996); B. E. Bullock, "Quantitative Verse in a Quantitative-Insensitive Language," JFLS 7 (1997)—on Baïf; K. Hanson, "Quantitative Meter in English," ENLL 5 (2001)—on Sidney; E. Bernhardt-Kabisch, "'When Klopstock England Defied,'" CL 55 (2003)—on Ger. and Eng. hexameters; Y. Prins, "Metrical Translation," Nation, Language, and the Ethics of Translation, ed. S. Bermann and M. Wood (2005)—Victorian hexameters; H. M. Brown and R. Freedman, "Vers mesurés," Grove Music Online, http://www.grovemusic.com/shared/views/article.html?from=az&section=music.29243.

D. ATTRIDGE

CLASSICAL POETICS

I. Early Greek Poetics
II. Plato on Poetry

III. Aristotle
IV. Hellenistic Poetics
V. Poetics and the Hellenistic Philosophers
VI. The Roman as Epigones
VII. Horace and the Augustan Age
VIII. Poetics of the Roman Empire
IX. Neoplatonic Poetics

I. Early Greek Poetics. Ancient Gr. poetics at its inception was shaped by two features of archaic culture: the treatment of the Homeric *epics as a source of authoritative knowledge and the nature of early poetry as *song or *recitation performed in social contexts. Accordingly, the concerns of the earliest Western poetics centered on criteria that had little to do with the notion of lyric subjectivity. At issue instead were poetry's ethical and pedagogical value, the poet's relationship to truth, the suitability of a poem to its performative context, and the pleasure and judgment of the audience. These emphases would change with the move away from an oral culture and the rise of formal and aesthetic criteria of judgment.

The term poetics itself requires a caveat. Before the 5th c. BCE, there was no single term to mark out poetry as a genre; an early "poetics" can be derived only from the implicit views embedded in early poetry, philosophy, and rhet. Early epideictic prose and poetry were both seen as incantatory (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY); the former displayed *rhythm, figure, and *parallelism, as in the Sophist Gorgias's (ca. 485–380 BCE) Encomium of Helen, which itself claims that poetry is merely "logos [speech] with meter." Not until the 5th c. is attention directed to the formal study of poetry's properties abstracted from its performance context, perhaps because of the increasing commitment of song to writing (Ford). At this point, the term poietai (poets) comes into general use to denote such crafters; in the 4th c., we find, in Aristotle's Poetics, a poietike tekhne, an art or craft of poetry sustaining formal analysis.

Poetry was held to be the educator of men, esp. early epic, which was seen as a source of ethical and practical knowledge. Homer (ca. 800 BCE) by virtue of his priority, held a cultural authority not unlike that of the Bible later in the Christian West. Yet the epic depiction of the gods as ruled by human passions was a target of crit.: the critic Xenophanes (ca. 570–475 BCE) condemned (in verse) the notion of anthropomorphism and the immoral behavior of the epic Olympians, who engaged in theft, adultery, and deception (fr. B11-16 Diels-Kranz). Similar complaints occur in his near-contemporaries Pythagoras of Samos (570–495 BCE) and Heraclitus of Ephesus (535–475 BCE), while the lyric poets Stesichorus (ca. 640–555 BCE) and Pindar (ca. 522–443 BCE) explicitly correct earlier "tales" (cf. Olympians 27–29, Nemean 7.20ff). To take these crits. as evidence for Plato's claim of "an ancient war" between poetry and philosophy (Republic 607b), however, is risky. Truth-claims in this period occur in the context of bids for poetic authority, and the genres of philosophy and poetry are not clearly distinct until the cl. period.

From Homer forward, the *Muses, daughters of Memory, were invoked as the source of both the poet's knowledge and his inspiration, a pairing not seen as incompatible until Plato. The *poet represents himself as relying on the Muses in his recreation and memorialization (aletheia, bringing out of forgetfulness) of heroic deeds. To listen to this poetic song brings enchantment and forgetfulness of present troubles (Odyssey 8.44–45; 17.385, 521; cf. Phemius at Odyssey 1.326ff.). Similarly, the Hesiodic Muses, who offer knowledge of the past and future, bring a pleasing forgetfulness of the present (Theogony 53–55, 98–105), though Hesiod (writing between 750 and 650 BCE) attributes to them the statement that they can speak true-seeming lies as well as the truth (Theogony 27–28).

Aristophanes (ca. 445–385 BCE) devotes several of his comedies to attacks on the tragedian Euripides (ca. 480–406 BCE) and the 5th-c. Sophists, whose newfangled ideas (relativism, skepticism, agnosticism) influenced Euripidean drama. They were pilloried in the Clouds, as was Euripides himself in Acharnians and Thesmophoriazusae. The Frogs (405 BCE) stages the first scene of lit. crit., a contest as to whether Euripides or Aeschylus was a better teacher of the Athenians. Aeschylus's view is that the poet should conceal wickedness and speak of honorable things; he sees himself as a latter-day Orpheus or Mousaios, and his old-fashioned morals, martial topics, and larger-than-life heroes carry the day (Frogs 1030–36). In contrast, the argumentative and impious characters of Euripides are judged too base to offer ethical models, however realistic his drama may be.

Underlying meanings (hyponoia) in Homer and Hesiod were sought by means of etymologized narrative, allegory, and other forms of exegesis. Already in the late 6th c., Theagenes of Rhegium (fl. 6th c. BCE), in the oldest known Gr. treatise on poetry, defended Homer by interpreting the warring divinities of Iliad 20 as representing a conflict between physical elements or psychological forces. The Stoics employed a similar approach, reading the Olympian gods as personifications of air, ether, fire, or earth, and relying heavily on etymology in their explications (cf. also the Derveni papyrus; Metrodorus of Lampsacus, 5th c. BCE). The Sophists accepted pay for giving ethical lessons based on Homeric exegesis; Protagoras in Plato's Protagoras 316d–317b calls the poets "Sophists in disguise" who conceal their wisdom in verse. This search for underlying meaning was already a familiar procedure in Gr. culture, as evident from interpretations of the Delphic oracle and the fable (ainos): Pindar and Theognis (6th c. BCE) claim to speak an "ainos" that will be understood only by the wise. The term allegoria (speaking otherly) came into use only in Plutarch's (ca. 46–120) time (Moralia 19E; see ALLEGORY).

II. Plato on Poetry. With Plato (427–347 BCE), poetry is treated—if only to be condemned—as a field of endeavor with a single object, by analogy to the crafts of painting and sculpture. Plato acknowledges the enormous influence of Homer and the poets as teachers (Republic 598d–e, 599a) but criticizes them in the Ion and Republic esp.; his response to the debate about the ethical and practical uses of poetry is to banish the poets (with a few exceptions) from his ideal state (Republic books 3, 10). Their task, he argues, is better achieved by Socratic dialogue (Protagoras 347d).

The attack on poetry in Republic book 2 focuses on the familiar issue of the poets' representation of the gods: their lying tales are to be rejected, and the gods should be described as unchanging, good, and incapable of violence (2.379a–382e). The vulnerability of the young leads Socrates to reject even poetry sanitized by hyponoia (Republic 2.378e)—after all, one poem can lead to many interpretations, nor can the absent poet answer questions about his intent (Protagoras 347c–348a). In book 3, we encounter the conceptual tool on which much of Plato's argument rests: mimesis*, i.e., dramatic or expressive representation or a replication of something in material form. Listing three genres—drama, epic, and *dithyramb (a form of choral lyric, though iambic, elegiac, and lyric *monody are omitted)—Plato distinguishes among them based on the difference between "plain narrative" (diegesis) and mimetic narrative, i.e., direct speech. Dithyrambs exemplify the former, since there the poet speaks in his own person; in drama, only mimetic narrative is used; a combination of the two occurs in epic (Republic 3.392d–394c). The Guardians should not engage in mimetic narrative lest, from enjoying the *imitation, they come to enjoy the reality—or if they do imitate, it should be of courageous, self-controlled, pious, and free people. Thus, they will use Homeric-type narratives, mostly plain narrative and a small amount of mimetic narrative (but only of the ethically appropriate type; Republic 3.395d–96d). The lyric modes are excluded except for songs that inspire courage or address the gods (Republic 2.299b–c).

For Plato, it is not only the "imitators" but their audience who are at risk. Because the tragic poets mostly portray people suffering and reacting nonphilosophically to their suffering, they strengthen the nonrational part of the audience's souls, throwing into disarray its psychic constitution (Republic 10.605b); the same happens in the case of "sex, anger, and all the desires, pleasures, and pains" that accompany our actions. (One might contrast Gorgias's view that "the deceiver is more just than the non-deceiver, and the deceived wiser than the undeceived.") Plato (or his spokesperson Socrates) proposes instead that the citizens be told a "noble lie" justifying the hierarchies in the city (Republic 414c). In the Laws, however, the Athenian emphasizes the importance of setting up choruses for the city to persuade the citizens that the most philosophical life is the happiest one, harnessing the power of song about which Plato is so cautious in the Republic (Laws 2.664b–c).

Elsewhere Plato treats poetry under the heading of *inspiration (enthusiasmos) rather than mimesis (the two concepts do not appear together until the Laws). His treatment of inspiration innovates; in relying on the Muse, the poet does not acquire knowledge so much as enter upon a kind of madness (mania) beyond his control (Ion passim, Apology 22a–c, Meno 99c–e, Phaedrus 245, Laws 3.682a, 719c–d; see FUROR POETICUS). Although the poet does not know what he is saying, he can nonetheless produce beautiful poetry; in the Phaedrus, his inspiration is said to be winged by Love (Eros) and capable of attaining truth.

III. Aristotle. With the Poetics of Aristotle (384–322 BCE) comes a shift in emphasis from poetry as a socio-religious activity to poetry as an *artifact with a generic form and telos. Aristotle starts his discussion with the "modes of imitation," which differ from each other in their means, objects, or imitative procedures rather than performance context (1447a). Aristotle thus deploys Plato's view of poetry as a mimetic art; even the verse form is a less important criterion than its mimesis of what is fictional. The objects of imitation are the actions of good or bad men; the manner is (as with Plato) plain narrative, mimetic narrative, or a mixture thereof. The bias toward mimesis is also shown in Aristotle's focus on drama rather than *lyric, *elegy, or iambus. But imitation here is not condemned as a poor copy of reality or a corruptive influence; instead, Aristotle points out that imitation is natural to humans from childhood, that it is fundamental to the learning process, and that we delight in realistic works of imitation even if their subject matter is unpleasant: in these traits, he locates the origin of poetry (Poetics 1448b). Moreover, since the poet's function is to produce an imitation of what could happen rather than what did happen, poetry is more serious and more philosophical than hist. (Poetics 1451a–b).

*Tragedy, says Aristotle, developed from the improvisations of the leader of choral dithyrambs (1449a). Its "soul" is the *plot (mythos). The other elements of tragedy are, in decreasing order of importance, character (ethos), thought (dianoia, probably the arguments of the characters), poetic expression (lexis), the composition of the choral odes (melopoieia*), and spectacle (opsis, Poetics 1450a). Tragedy is "the imitation of an action that is complete in itself," with a certain order and of a certain magnitude—i.e, long enough for the hero to pass via probable or necessary stages from misfortune to happiness or vice versa (Poetics 1452a). It is in the representation of this "action," as constrained by probability and causal necessity (not contiguity), that the famous Aristotelian *unity resides. Aristotle also minimizes the power attributed to rhythmic and melodic discourse by Gorgias and Plato. There is no mention of the dramatist's inspiration; instead, his work is a rational art, a tekhne, with a specific goal, the *catharsis of the audience by the evocation of "pity and fear," preferably by the plot rather than the spectacle (Poetics 1450b, 1453b). Whether the primary sense of catharsis is medical, ethical, or otherwise is unclear; but the sense is that catharsis improves the human capacity to feel the proper emotions toward the correct objects (Halliwell), and it represents one part of Aristotle's response to Platonic crit.

Plots can be simple or complex. In the former, the protagonist's change of state is linear; in the latter, it is caused by a sudden and unexpected reversal of fortune (peripeteia) or a recognition (anagnorisis, a change from ignorance to knowledge) or both (Poetics 1452a). Two other plot types are the pathetic (where the motive is passion) and the ethical (where the motives derive from character). The best tragedy entails a reversal from happiness to unhappiness; the hero should be a good man but not a perfect one, and the change should be caused not by wickedness but by some hamartia (Poetics 1453a). The term may mean "moral flaw," "intellectual error," or some intermediate quality; excluding culpability allows for a tragic disparity between a character's intention and its outcome (Halliwell).

Epic (Poetics 1459a–60a) is similar to tragedy insofar as it is a representation, in verse, of characters of a higher type. It too must be simple or complex, "ethical" or "pathetic." Tragedy, however, is the superior form; while epic has no limit in time, may portray simultaneous actions, and incorporates elements of the supernatural, tragedy tries to contain its action within a single day and to what can be shown on stage and is thus the more efficient and superior genre (Poetics 1462a–b). Aristotle's theory of *comedy may have been contained in a lost second book of the Poetics but is probably not represented in the 10th-c. ms. known as the Tractatus Coislinianus. Lost are his three books of On Poets and six or more of Homeric Problems.

IV. Hellenistic Poetics. The museum and library founded by Ptolemy I at Alexandria in the early 3rd c. housed not only the ancient world's largest collection of volumes but a community of scholars devoted to *textual criticism, philology, and *exegesis. Zenodotus of Ephesus (ca. 325–260 BCE), the first head of the library, produced authoritative eds. of the Homeric and Hesiodic epics. His successor Eratosthenes (ca. 276–195 BCE) criticized the widespread use of Homer for pedagogy, emphasizing that poetry's goal was enchantment, not instruction (Strabo 1.1.10). Aristophanes of Byzantium (ca. 257–180 BCE) introduced punctuation and chastised Menander (ca. 342–291 BCE) for his borrowings from other poets—an early critique of plagiarism. Aristophanes, and Aristarchus of Samothrace after him (ca. 217–145 BCE), formally evaluated the work of their literary forebears, producing official lists (the kanones, or *canons) of those considered best and worthy of preservation; no contemporaries were included. Aristarchus instituted the critical principle that each author is his own best interpreter and that editorial decisions should thus be based on the poet's own usage and thought (as represented by the maxim Homeron ex Homerou, Homer from Homer).

A synchronous phenomenon was the rise of *Alexandrianism in poetic composition, a style that emphasized the display of mythological and scientific erudition presented with painstaking poetic craftsmanship. The trend is best represented by Callimachus (ca. 305–240 BCE), whose programmatic statement that "a big book is a big evil" represented the rejection of large-scale Homeric epic in favor of shorter poems on little-known episodes in myth. The introduction to his Aetia sets forth a new poetics epitomized by Apollo's command: "Poet, let your sacrificial victim be fat, but your muse slim."

V. Poetics and the Hellenistic Philosophers. Of the three major schools of Hellenistic philosophy—the Epicureans, Stoics, and Cynics—two took distinct positions on the nature and function of poetry. The Stoics detected their own cosmology in Homer and Hesiod; Crates of Mallos (2d c. BCE), e.g., treated Agamemnon's shield in Iliad 11 as a representation of the cosmos (Eustathios [ca. 1115–95 or 96 CE] on Iliad 11.32–40), while Cornutus (fl. 40 CE), like the Gr. Stoics, used etymological readings of Homer to recover early beliefs about the world. Balbus in Cicero's De natura deorum (2.60ff) also invokes *metonymy (Ceres stands for grain) and the deification of virtues and emotions as interpretive techniques. The Stoic emphasis on hyponoia suggests that the Stoics did not feel poetry could lead an audience to virtue without the correct critical reception; the crucial issue was the mental ability of the reader or listener to recognize what was morally commendable and what needed adaptation. The Stoics recognized that poetic form helped the *absorption of content: as reported by Seneca the Younger (ca. 3 BCE–65 CE) in Epistles 108.8–11, Cleanthes (331–232 BCE) held that the force of meter and music added greater impact to the thought.

The allegorist Heraclitus (1st c. CE) claims that both Plato and Epicurus (341–270 BCE) were hostile to Homer and that Epicurus himself condemned all poetry "as a destructive lure of fictitious stories" (Homeric Problems 4). Sextus Empiricus (ca. 160–210 CE) reports in Against Mathematicians (1.296–97) that Epicurus felt that poets pursued falsehood because it naturally moves the soul more than truth and because it inflames the baser human passions. However, Epicurus may have been receptive to poetry as entertainment as long as it made no claims to education. The later Epicurean Philodemus of Gadara (110–40 BCE) wrote that poetry should be beautiful and produce pleasure, not serve any moral or utilitarian purpose; nor did it need to be truthful (On Poems 5). Philodemus also argued that style and content are inseparable, with the result that any change in the order of the words (metathesis) changes the meaning as well. Epicurean didactic should thus be an *oxymoron, yet Lucretius (ca. 99–55 BCE) composed precisely that in the mid-1st c. BCE. His epic poem De rerum natura characterizes itself via the well-known metaphor of the medicinal cup rimmed with honey in order to fool children into taking their medicine; his verse—and perhaps such images as the opening tableau of Mars and Venus sharing a bed—is to be the sweet lure into Epicurean philosophy. His Philodemian view of the inseparability of style and content is reflected in his "atomistic poetics," in which the letters are conceived of as atoms, so that lignum (wood) is said to contain igni(s) (fire).

We know only a little of the Aristotelian critic Neoptolemus of Parium (3d c. BCE). His division of poiēma, poiēsis, and poiētēs (poem, poetry, poet) linked the first term to style and the second to the mimesis of fictional stories. This division of poetry into (roughly) expression vs. content may be the precursor of a later division between grammatike (crit.), philology, and glosses on the one hand and hermeneutics on the other (Walker). Poetic crit. throughout this period thus revolved around the oppositions of form vs. content and pleasure vs. instruction; also at issue was the question of whether poetry was the result more of natural genius or of hard work, with Callimachus naturally the representative of art (cf. Longinus, On the Sublime 33.4–5).

VI. The Romans as Epigones. The Romans inherited Gr. lit. before they established a lit. of their own. Their earliest recorded poet, the Gr. ex-slave Livius Andronicus (ca. 280–200 BCE), was a translator; he set Homer's Odyssey in *Saturnian verse and also translated Gr. comedy and tragedy for staging at the Great Games of 240 BCE. Prose was originally held to be the more authoritative form because of its propriety for forensic oratory and hist., the writing of which occupied the leisure time of the elite classes. Indeed, the first original Roman poetry was the historical epic composed by Naevius (ca. 270–201 BCE) and Ennius (ca. 239–169 BCE). Ennius's treatment, in the Annales, of Roman hist. from the fall of Troy to 184 BCE, opened with a description of how Homer's soul was transferred into him by metempsychosis; he also adopted Homer's dactylic hexameter. Despite the temporal priority of Livius Andronicus, later Romans too chose to set Naevius or Ennius at the head of a Roman poetics; Lucretius, e.g., claims that Ennius first brought the poet's crown from Helicon (De rerum natura 1.117–18; cf. Horace Epistles 2.1.156–59).

These circumstances produced a particular set of anxieties in early Roman poetics: their epigonal status vis-à-vis the Greeks; the tension between imitation of these models and originality; the negative associations that touched on writing poetry; the low social status of the actors of the Roman theater; and, finally the uncomfortable similarity between poetry and political prose in performance. Horace's famous quip, "Greece, though captured, captured in turn her savage victor" (Epistles 2.1.156), evokes some of these tensions. This "anxiety of influence" would lead to much discussion of the proper imitation of others both in poetry and in rhet. (cf. Cicero, De oratore 2.8–97; the fragments of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, On Imitation; Horace Epistles 1.19.19 and Ars poetica 133ff.; Seneca the Elder, Suasoriae 3.7; Seneca the Younger, Epistles 84; Quintilian 10.2.27–8; Longinus, On the Sublime 13–14). Too literal an imitation of other poetry is to be avoided; instead, the source should be recognized at the same time as the changes (even polemic ones) rung upon it by the poet, a process now termed *intertextuality.

The first Roman dramatic crit. is to be found not in a treatise but in the prologues to the plays of the ex-slave Terence (195 or 185–159 BCE). Like his predecessor Plautus (254–184 BCE), Terence staged trans. of Gr. New Comedy, but his frequent combination of two originals for use in a single Roman drama brought on the accusation of "spoiling" (contaminatio) the looted Gr. plays for use by other Roman playwrights (cf. the prologues to the Andria, the Adelphoe, and the Self-Tormentor). These dramas gained in literary stature through the efforts of Aelius Stilo (ca. 154–74 BCE) in the late 2d c. BCE, when they were added to the school curriculum. Stilo is said by Suetonius (ca. 70–135 CE) to have played a key role in the devel. of a literary education at Rome (Lives of the Grammarians 3), following the example of Crates of Mallos, who encouraged critical attention to poetry during his visit to Rome in 159 BCE.

The orator and statesman Cicero (106–43 BCE) claims, in his legal defense of the Gr. poet Archias (120–ca. 60 BCE), that the poet's inspiration is divine (In Defense of Archias 18). In a more Roman vein, he adds that the poet benefits the state because he celebrates the deeds of Roman heroes and the Roman people and thus provides an incentive to glory (19ff.) In his Orator, Cicero suggests that the main distinction between oratory and poetry cannot be meter, since Plato and Demosthenes have more in common with poetry than do the writers of comedy (Orator 67). Further linking the two, he argues that both orators and poets move the audience by being moved themselves (De Orator 2.194; De divinatione 1.80; Orator 132). As a statesman and advocate, however, he is often careful to affect ignorance about Gr. lit. and to insist on the distance separating the orator from the poet (Brutus 191). In his letters, Cicero criticizes the "cantores Euphorionis" (bards of the school of Euphorion), his pejorative term for the poets who adopted the Callimachean program at Rome (Tusculan Disputations 3.45). Catullus (ca. 84–54 BCE), Calvus (82–47 BCE) and Cinna (1st c. BCE) are its best-known representatives; they adopted such Alexandrian mannerisms as allowing a *spondee in the fifth foot of their verse (Cicero, Letters to Atticus 7.2.1, cf. Orator 161). These Neoteric poets rejected annalistic epic, privileged ekphrasis and erudition, used difficult *diction, and produced intricately structured and highly polished verse; Catullus describes his book of poems as a trifle, but an elegant one that has been well polished with dry pumice. He influenced the Roman elegists and Virgil (70–19 BCE), in whose sixth Eclogue we find Apollo warning the shepherd Tityrus off martial epic, telling him to keep his sheep fat but his song finely spun.

Roman higher education was based on training in rhet. as well as the reading of poetry, with the result that both were grouped under litterae (loosely, the liberal arts) and shared critical terminology and standards of eloquence. Rhetorical handbooks come to include commentary on "criticism," which includes, in the Art of Grammar of Dionysius Thrax (170–90 BCE), reading aloud, the explanation of figures, glosses of difficult words, the finding of etymologies, the elucidation of analogies, and judgment of the poetry. The On Composition of the Gr. rhetorician Dionysius of Halicarnassus (ca. 60–after 7 BCE) treated the styles of poets, historians, and orators from the cl. period. Focusing on the arrangement of words, Dionysius held that the poetic goal of pleasure and beauty could be created by a particular combination of sounds, variety, and rhythm. These criteria were used to set up three distinct styles: the austere, the elegant, and the mixed (21–24). Demetrius's (b. 350 BCE) On Style (possibly 1st c. BCE) treats both poetry and prose under four styles: elevated, elegant, plain, and forcible.

VII. Horace and the Augustan Age. The centralization of political power in a single figure after the Augustan victory of 31 BCE oriented contemp. poetics around issues of patronage, ideology, and the relationship of poet to state. We see accordingly such poetic features as the recusatio: originally exemplified by Callimachus's refusal to write grand epic, in the early imperial period it evolved into the poet's statement of his inadequacy to celebrate the deeds of a contemp. military or political "great man" (cf. Horace Epistles 2.1, Odes 1.6, 2.12, 4.2, 4.15; Propertius Elegies 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, 3.3, 3.9; Ovid Amores 1.1; Virgil Georgics 3.16ff.). Also characteristic of this refusal is the thematic opposition of amor (love) to political topics as the subject of poetry.

Horace (65–8 BCE) wrote as both poet and critic. His Odes cast him as the Roman heir to Gr. lyric. The Satires criticize the unpolished and prolific verse of his predecessor Lucilius (ca. 180–103 BCE) and refuse to imitate his attacks on his peers (Satires 1.4, 1.10); instead, his own verse will expose social vice and folly in gentler terms. The Epistles make a claim for the moral value of reading poetry; Epistles 1.2 finds Homer more useful in this regard than the Stoics, while Epistles 2.1 points out the poet's usefulness: he teaches the young, offers moral exempla, and helps the state with hymns and prayers—an echo of Plato's Republic. Here Horace also offers a defense of contemp. poets and laments the conservative preference for the past, based on a false analogy, he argues, of the earliest Roman poets to the earliest Gr. poets. A brief hist. of Roman drama gives it a local origin with *fescennine verses at rustic festivals.

The famous Ars poetica (Epistles 2.3 to the Pisos; the name comes from Quintilian) is a Roman variation on Aristotelian poetics combined with Hellenistic concerns. On the evidence of Porphyrio (fl. 2d or 3d c. CE) and Philodemus (ca. 110–ca. 40 or 35 BCE), it seems that Horace took his major precepts here from Neoptolemus, incl. the focus on unity (also Aristotelian), the view of poetry's dual function in delighting and being useful, and his tripartite structure of poiēma, poiēsis, and poiētēs. The focus on unity motivates the famous opening analogy of the bad poem to the painting of a monstrous body with parts from different animals (1–13), a twist on the bodily metaphors used for the coherent poem or speech by Plato (Phaedrus 264c), Aristotle (Poetics 1450b), and Cicero (De oratore 2.325). Horace's demand that the poem be finely crafted recalls the Callimachean program, while his support of the poet's right to coin new words meshes with his critique of conservatism in Epistles 2.1. His metaphor of words flourishing and decaying like leaves and men adapts Homer's original comparison of the generations of men to leaves at Iliad 6.14ff., suggesting that lang., too, has a natural life span (Ars poetica 46–82).

Horace next addresses what can be represented with propriety in tragedy and comedy (Ars poetica 89–98, cf. 180–88) and argues (as in the rhetorical treatises) that the actor must feel what he portrays in order to affect his audience (103–105). From this point onward, it is clear that Horace takes drama, and esp. tragedy, to be his main subject, without particular regard to the contemp. situation at Rome. He includes a number of traditional prescriptions for the dramatist (five acts; three actors; choral odes relevant to the plot, 189–95) but, unlike Aristotle, gives more prominence to character than to plot, a typically Roman concern with ethos also influenced by rhet. (120–24, 156–78). His etiology for Gr. drama differs from that of Aristotle in Poetics 1449a, here beginning with poets competing for the prize of a goat (220ff.); one Thespis later invents the mod. version (275–77). Also non-Aristotelian is Horace's attention to the moral role of drama: the chorus should sooth the angry, give good advice, regulate the passionate, praise what is right, and pray to the gods (196–201). The moral role is supported by his claim that Socratic wisdom is the font of good writing (309–10). Avoiding the pleasure/education dichotomy about the role of poetry, he claims that the best poet wishes to do both (342–34). Both ingenium (talent) and ars (skill) are needed to write good poetry (408–11); Horace does not praise the "divine madness" of the Ion and Phaedrus, which he associates with a reading of Democritus as requiring poets to be mad (295–308; cf. the mad Eumolpus in Petronius's Satyricon).

VIII. Poetics of the Roman Empire. Much of the lit. of the 1st c. CE (both poetry and rhet.) identifies itself as in decline from its republican acme. This "poetics of inferiority" could be used as ethical, social, or political commentary; thus, the (supposed) devel. of luxury and sexual deviance, detrimental changes in literary taste, and the end of the political clout of the elite classes were all offered as the causes of deterioration. Lucan's (39–65 CE) epic Pharsalia signifies its opposition to the triumphant narrative of the Aeneid not only in describing the end of Republican Rome but in describing itself as written under conditions of "slavery"—after praising Nero at the poem's start. Similarly, Tacitus's (56–117 CE) Dialogue on Orators poses the question of why there are no good orators in the present day but eschews answering it directly in favor of an exploration of three topics: the superiority of oratory or poetry as a career, the superiority of the ancients or the moderns, and the cause of the decline of eloquence. The dialogue itself stages another issue, the danger incurred by one of its three main protagonists, Maternus, for writing drama about historical or mythical tyrants and heroic republicans such as Cato the Younger. Poetry is thus shown to be the site of true political commentary despite Aper's crit. that it is detached from the world of oratory. At the end of the dialogue, Maternus executes a surprising about-face in praise of the quiet times brought on by autocracy; but this very praise from a critic of the regime effectively demonstrates the oppressive force of that autocracy and undermines its own laudatory content. The Dialogue thus models the relationship between lit. and politics under the empire and demonstrates the political rather than philosophical uses of allegory.

The Stoic Seneca the Younger devotes several of his letters to poetic issues. Epistle 84 discusses the imitation of our poetic models: we should read as the bees gather and blend the whole into one delicious compound so that it both reveals its source and differs from it (Epistles 84.3–5). In Epistle 88, he criticizes the idea that Homer was a philosopher or that the liberal arts can teach us virtue. Poetry can prepare the mind for virtue, but only philosophy can instill it (Epistles 88.20, 95.8). His own poetic practice may be seen in the tragedies, which offer an indirect critique of the Aristotelian model by portraying the shocking spectacle of good men coming to a bad end and bad men triumphant. Critics are divided as to whether this dovetails with his philosophical teachings or shows up their idealism, but in any case, it is clear that the dramas require an intellectually engaged audience if they are to provoke more than horror.

The rhetorician Quintilian (ca. 35–100 CE), who held an imperial post under Vespasian, eschews any narrative of decline in his The Training of an Orator in favor of describing an educational practice and a theory of rhet. that hearken back to the Ciceronian period. Book 10 contains brief appraisals of Gr. and Roman authors as educators and stylistic models; the reading of these models is necessary for the devel. of true eloquence.

Plutarch's essay on "How the Young Man Should Study Poetry" characterizes epic and tragic verse as an introduction to philosophy. Recapitulating earlier philosophical procedures on negating the force of ethically inappropriate verse, he urges readers to offset apparently immoral passages by recalling other passages from the same author—or another—or even emendation. As such, Plutarch provides an answer to Socrates' demonstration of poetic pliability in the Protagoras: here it can always be made to address Zeus's concern for human beings. Augustine (354–430 CE) borrows such techniques from cl. authors in De doctrina christiana (On Christian Doctrine) when instructing his readers on how to interpret apparent contradictions or immoralities in Holy Scripture.

The mysterious Longinus (1st c. CE?) stands outside the cl. trad. in his Peri hypsous (On the Sublime), concentrating on forms of expression that "transport us with wonder" and "uplift our souls" (ch. 1). Drawing his examples from oratory, poetry, hist., philosophy, and the OT (the author was most likely a Hellenized Jew), the author known as Longinus argues that both natural genius and skill are required for great writing. The *sublime can be achieved only by writers who have the ability to form "grand conceptions" through their nobility of soul; the other sources of this ability are a spirited treatment of the passions, the use of figures of speech and figures of thought, elegant diction, and an elevated style of composition (ch. 8). Phantasia—the power of the imagination—is crucial in both the orator and the poet (ch. 15). The true sublime stands the test of different readerships and different eras and sticks in the memory. Longinus suggests that, when we face a topic that demands grandeur, we should ask ourselves how Homer or Plato or Demosthenes or Thucydides might have given it sublimity. Here, as elsewhere in such cl. lists, we see not so much genre crit. as the establishment of the best writer to emulate in each trad. The final chapter (44) is a brief essay on the decline of eloquence, a common 1st-c. CE topic. Longinus casts this in the form of a dialogue with an unnamed philosopher, who (like Tacitus's Maternus in the Dialogue on Orators) claims that the lack of political freedom has suppressed the possibility of sublimity. Longinus in his response plays it safe by citing, traditionally, the moral degeneration of the age and its addiction to luxury and pleasure.

IX. Neoplatonic Poetics. The Neoplatonists (3d c. CE onward), a school of philosophy founded by Plotinus (204–70 CE), reiterated the philosophical importance of poetry while allegorizing Homer to show his conformity to Plato's thought. Plotinus protested against the Platonic view that poetry was the imitation of a world that was itself an imitation; the arts, he argued, come from the imagination, not from reality (Enneads 5.8.1). In his work "On the Cave of the Nymphs," Plotinus's follower Porphyry (ca. 234–305 CE) offered multiple metaphysical interpretations of the Homeric passage in which Odysseus hides guest-presents in a cave in Ithaca (Odyssey 13.102ff): e.g., the cave can stand for our world of matter, being dark, rocky, and damp; or for the cosmos, where the nymphs represent the souls who descend to be reborn. This openness to multiple meanings was unusual in antiquity.

Proclus (ca. 412–85 CE) addresses Plato's crits. of poetry in essays 5 and 6 of his commentary on the Republic. Essay 6 in particular takes on Plato's attack on Homer in Republic 2 and 3, in which he condemns Homer's depiction of the afterlife in Hades, and of Hera seducing Zeus on Mt. Ida; Plotinus reconciles poet and philosopher by showing that Homer's version is a veiled version of Plato's truth. In his essay on Republic 10, Proclus offers a general defense of poetry on metaphysical grounds: not all poetry is at three removes from reality. Inspired poetry allegorizes the union of the soul with the One, didactic poetry offers information about the physical world or about ethics, and mimetic poetry is "eikatic" or "phantastic" and shows things in the sensible world as they appear to the human being; only the last, he argues, is the object of Plato's crit. (6:177.7–196.13).

See ALEXANDRIANISM, CLASSICISM, CRITICISM, GENRE, GREEK POETRY, LATIN POETRY, RHETORIC AND POETRY.

■ General: G.M.A. Grube, The Greek and Roman Critics (1965); R. Pfeiffer, History of Classical Scholar- ship from the Beginnings to the End of the Hellenistic Age (1968); Ancient Literary Criticism, ed. D. A. Russell and M. Winterbottom (1972)—wide range of ancient sources; D. A. Russell, Criticism in Antiquity (1981); CHCL; CHLC, v. 1, ed. G. A. Kennedy (1989); Y. L. Too, The Idea of Ancient Literary Criticism (1998); J. Walker, Rhetoric and Poetics in Antiquity (2000); J. Farrell, "Classical Genre in Theory and Practice," NLH 34 (2003); Oxford Readings in Ancient Literary Criticism, ed. A. Laird (2006).

■ Aristotle: G. F. Else, Aristotle's "Poetics": The Argument (1957); J. Jones, On Aristotle and Greek Tragedy (1962); T.C.W. Stinton, "Hamartia in Aristotle and Greek Tragedy," CQ 25 (1975); S. Halliwell, Aristotle's Poetics (1986); E. Belfiore, Tragic Pleasures: Aristotle on Plot and Emotion (1992); Essays on Aristotle's Poetics, ed. A. O. Rorty (1992); Making Sense of Aristotle: Essays in Poetics, ed. Ø. Andersen and J. Haarberg (2001).

■ Augustan Age: J. K. Newman, Augustus and the New Poetry (1967); K. Quinn, "The Poet and His Audience in the Augustan Age," Aufsteig und Niedergang der römischen Welt 2 (1982); J.E.G. Zetzel, "Re-creating the Canon: Augustan Poetry and the Alexandrian Poet," CritI 10 (1983); D. C. Innes, "Augustan Critics," CHLC, v. 1, ed. G. A. Kennedy (1989); R. Tarrant, "Ovid and Ancient Literary History," The Cambridge Companion to Ovid, ed. P. Hardie (2002).

■ Cicero and the Rhetorical Critics: A. D. Leeman, Orationis Ratio: The Stylistic Theories and Practice of the Roman Orators, Historians, and Philosophers (1963); D. M. Schenkeveld, Studies in Demetrius, "On Style" (1964); G. A. Kennedy, The Art of Rhetoric in the Roman World (1972); L. P. Wilkinson, "Cicero and the Relationship of Oratory to Literature," CHCL, v. 2; M. Heath, "Dionysius of Halicarnassus on Imitation," Hermes 117 (1989).

■ Greek Poetics, General and Preplatonic: C. Segal, "Gorgias and the Psychology of the Logos," Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 66 (1962); W. J. Verdenius, "The Principles of Greek Literary Criticism," Mnemosyne 36 (1963); R. Harriott, Poetry and Criticism before Plato (1969); C. Macleod, "Homer on Poetry and the Poetry of Homer," Collected Essays (1983); G. B. Walsh, The Varieties of Enchantment (1984); N. Richardson, "Pindar and Later Literary Criticism in Antiquity," Proceedings of the Liverpool Latin Seminar 5 (1985); M. Heath, The Poetics of Greek Tragedy (1987); and Unity in Greek Poetics (1989); S. Goldhill, The Poet's Voice: Essays on Poetics and Greek Literature (1991); Homer's Ancient Readers: The Hermeneutics of Greek Epic's Earliest Exegetes, ed. R. Lamberton and J. J. Keaney (1992); L. Pratt, Lying and Poetry from Homer to Pindar (1993); Greek Literary Theory after Aristotle, ed. J.G.J. Abbenes, S. R. Slings, I. Sluiter (1995); M. Detienne, The Masters of Truth in Archaic Greece, trans. J. Lloyd (1996); A. Ford, The Origins of Criticism: Literary Culture and Poetic Theory in Classical Greece (2002); G. M. Ledbetter, Poetics before Plato (2003).

■ Hellenistic Philosophers and Hellenistic Poetry: P. De Lacy, "Stoic Views of Poetry," AJP 69 (1948); N. A. Greenberg, "The Use of Poiema and Poiesis," Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 65 (1961); G. Hutchinson, Hellenistic Poetry (1988); G. A. Kennedy and D. C. Innes, "Hellenistic Literary and Philosophical Scholarship," CHLC, v. 1, ed. G. A. Kennedy (1989); G. Most, "Cornutus and Stoic Allegoresis: A Preliminary Report," Aufsteig und Niedergang der römischen Welt 2 (1989); M. L. Colish, The Stoic Tradition from Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages, 2d ed. (1991); E. Asmis, "Neoptolemus and the Classification of Poetry," CP 87 (1992); M. C. Nussbaum, "Poetry and the Passions: Two Stoic Views," Passions and Perceptions, ed. J. Barnes and M. Nussbaum (1993); J. I. Porter, "Stoic Morals and Poetics in Philodemus," Cronache Ercolanesi (1994); E. Asmis, "Epicurean Poetics," Philodemus and Poetry: Poetic Theory and Practice in Lucretius, Philodemus and Horace, ed. D. Obbink (1995); Metaphor, Allegory, and the Classical Tradition, ed. G. Boys-Stones (2003).

■ Horace: C. O. Brink, Horace on Poetry, 3 v. (1963–82); K. Reckford, Horace (1969); B. Fischer, Shifting Paradigms: New Approaches to Horace's "Ars Poetica" (1991); M. Fuhrmann, Die Dichtungstheorie der Antike: Aristoteles, Horaz, "Longin": eine Einführung (1992); K. Freudenburg, The Walking Muse: Horace on the Theory of Satire (1993); Philodemus and Poetry: Poetic Theory and Practice in Lucretius, Philodemus and Horace, ed. D. Obbink (1995).

■ Neoplatonists: J. A. Coulter, The Literary Microcosm: Theories of Interpretation of the Later Neoplatonists (1976); A.D.R Sheppard, Studies on the Fifth and Sixth Essays of Proclus' Commentary on the Republic (1980); R. Lamberton, Homer the Theologian: Neoplatonist Allegorical Reading and the Growth of the Epic Tradition (1986).

■ Plato: G. F. Else, " 'Imitation' in the Fifth Century," CP 53 (1958); L. Golden, "Plato's Concept of Mimesis," BJA 15 (1975); A. Cameron, Plato's Affair with Tragedy (1978); C. Griswold, "The Ideas and Criticism of Poetry in Plato's Republic, Book 10," Journal of the History of Philosophy 19 (1981); Plato on Beauty, Wisdom, and the Arts, ed. J. Moravscik and P. Temko (1982); J. A. Elias, Plato's Defence of Poetry (1984); E. Belfiore, "A Theory of Imitation in Plato's Republic," TAPA 114 (1984); G. F. Else, Plato and Aristotle on Poetry, ed. P. Burian (1986); G.R.F. Ferrari, Listening to the Cicadas: A Study of Plato's "Phaedrus" (1987); S. Rosen, The Quarrel between Philosophy and Poetry (1988); G.R.F. Ferrari, "Plato and Poetry," CHLC, v. 1, ed. G. A. Kennedy (1989).

■ Roman Empire: C. P. Segal, "UYOS and the Problem of Cultural Decline," Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 64 (1959); D. A. Russell, "Longinus Revisited," Mnemosyne 34 (1981); F. Ahl, "The Art of Safe Criticism in Greece and Rome," AJP 105 (1984); E. Fantham, "Latin Criticism of the Early Empire," CHLC; S. Bartsch, Actors in the Audience (1994); A. Schiesaro, The Passions in Play: Thyestes and the Dynamics of Senecan Drama (2003); D. Konstan, "The Birth of the Reader: Plutarch as Literary Critic," Scholia 13 (2004); D. S. Levene, "Tacitus' Dialogus as Literary History," TAPA 134 (2004); G. A. Staley, Seneca and the Idea of Tragedy (2010).

■ Roman Poetics: K. Quinn, Texts and Contexts: The Roman Writers and Their Audience (1979); C. Martindale, Redeeming the Text: Latin Poetry and the Hermeneutics of Reception (1993); S. Hinds, Allusion and Intertext: Dynamics of Appropriation in Roman Poetry (1998); L. Edmunds, Intertextuality and the Reading of Roman Poetry (2001); S. M. Goldberg, Constructing Literature in the Roman Republic: Poetry and Its Reception (2005).

S. Bartsch

CLASSICAL PROSODY

I. Quantity in Greek and Latin
II. Greek
III. Latin

I. Quantity in Greek and Latin. Gr. and Lat. prosody is based on a phonemic distinction between the durations of syllables and the articulation of that distinction into a conventional system of long and short syllables, called quantity. Syllables containing a long vowel or a diphthong are long; syllables containing a short vowel not followed by a consonant are short. If a syllable is closed (i.e., ends in a consonant), both Gr. and Lat. also treat it as long. Allen's terms heavy syllable and light syllable (Allen 1973), although not standard in cl. scholarship, are useful in distinguishing the quantity of syllables from the quantity of vowels.

Gr. and Lat. *meters are quantitative, in that they impose requirements on the sequences of long and short syllables. Though most ancient verse forms show, in addition, some trace of the operation of other principles (syllable counting and accent, discussed below), this condition does not alter the fact that the essential rhythmical nature of a piece of Gr. or Lat. poetry is determined by the ordering of its longs and shorts.

While the syllable is the basic unit of cl. verse, lines can be conceived as sequences of three types of more abstract positions, termed long (–) and short (⏑), which must be filled with long and short syllables, respectively, and anceps*, or "indifferent," position (x), which can be filled by either. Thus, the *iambic *metron schematized as x – ⏑ – can be realized as either a long-long-short-long or a short-long-short-long sequence.

Some meters allow *substitutions between two shorts and a single long syllable. While the duration of two shorts was probably not phonetically equal to the duration of a single long, such *equivalence is grounded in the phonologies of the two langs.; the stress/accent systems of both Gr. and Lat. are organized around the same equivalence.

Such substitutions make patterns in two distinct ways. *Resolution allows a long position to be realized with two short syllables, with restrictions (e.g., a word boundary cannot intervene between them; similar restrictions on resolution are found in other langs., incl. Eng.). E.g., the iambic metron x – ⏑ – sequence may, under some circumstances, be filled with a long-short-short-short-long sequence, with the first two shorts in resolution. On the other hand, in the dactylic *hexameter and other meters, some ⏑⏑ sequences, termed biceps, may be realized as a single long syllable, by a process called contraction. That contraction is distinct from resolution is shown by the fact that the prohibition of a word boundary between two shorts in resolution does not apply to the two shorts of a biceps.

The study of Gr. and Lat. prosody has a long trad. in cl. scholarship. Since the last decades of the 20th c., it has enjoyed a revival of interest in mod. ling., where the devel. of new theoretical models of prosodic structure can be fruitfully tested on the rich empirical material provided by the cl. langs.

Gr. and Lat. versification is by no means unique among the world's poetic systems, even if better known in the Eur. scholarly trad. Quantity plays a role in many other langs. with a phonemic length contrast, e.g., in *Arabic poetry, *Sanskrit poetry, *Turkish poetry, Finnish poetry (see FINLAND, POETRY OF), and others.

II. Greek. The complexity of Gr. versification is due to the confluence of several distinct trads. into a heterogeneous whole. The earliest attested Gr. poetry bears witness to at least three distinct systems: *Aeolic, Ionian, and Dorian, each with its own repertoire of meters and genres and each associated with a distinct local dialect of Gr. The three trads. share the close association among poetry and instrumental *performance, *song, and *dance.

The Aeolic trad., represented by the lyrics of Sappho and Alcaeus, is the most conservative. Aeolic meters maintain a constant syllable count, as they recognize no substitutions of a long syllable for two shorts or vice versa. The quantitative requirements are often relaxed at the beginning of the line, in the so-called aeolic base (xx). These features are similar enough to those of Vedic Sanskrit to suggest derivation from a common IE ancestor—essentially a syllable-counting versification based on 8-, 11-, and 12-syllable lines. Quantity in IE was regulated only at line end. While Gr. extended quantitative requirements to the rest of the line, the line-initial aeolic base is an archaism symptomatic of a conservative IE meter.

The eight-syllable pattern most frequently encountered, here and in all subsequent aeolic, is what later came to be called the glyconic* (x x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ –); seven-syllable patterns combine with iambic or *trochaic to yield the two most famous aeolic forms, the *alcaic and *sapphic hendecasyllable (respectively, x – ⏑ – x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – and – ⏑ – x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – x). The four- and three-syllable patterns are the familiar iamb (x – ⏑ –), trochee (– ⏑ – x), *ionic (– – ⏑ ⏑ and ⏑ ⏑ – –), *choriamb (– ⏑ ⏑ –), and *dactyl (– ⏑ ⏑). Dactylic and choriambic are inserted rather than prefixed or suffixed to other forms, yielding, e.g., the lesser *asclepiad (x x – ⏑ ⏑ – – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ –) through combination of choriambic with glyconic. Aeolic poetry may be stichic, or consisting of two or three-line *stanzas repeated in the poem, and recurring from poem to poem. The sapphic stanza, although typically printed in four lines in mod. eds., in fact consists of three lines—two sapphic hendecasyllables followed by an expansion of the same pattern (an aaA structure).

In contrast to the Aeolic, the Ionian trad. is characterized by greater regularity and avoidance of nonperiodic sequences such as – ∪ ∪ – ∪ –. Resolution and contraction are commonly used. The dactylic hexameter, used in the epics of Homer and in Hesiod, consists of a sequence of five dactyls (– ∪ ∪), followed by a shortened disyllabic *foot (– x). All dactyls can be substituted by *spondees (– –) by contraction; spondees in the fifth foot are rare. *Caesura typically occurs in the third foot, either after the long or the first short position. Other restrictions on the location of word boundaries, such as the avoidance of a word-final spondaic foot, are tendencies in Homer but become strict rules in the Hellenistic poets such as Callimachus. The dactylic hexameter was also used in the *elegiac distich, where it alternates with a so-called *pentameter line consisting of two – ∪ ∪ – ∪ ∪ – sequences.

Iambic and trochaic meters originate in early Ionian poetry of Archilochus and become the standard meters of dramatic verse in *tragedy and *comedy. Iambic trimeter (x – ∪ – x | – ∪ – x – ∪ –) and trochaic tetrameter catalectic (– ∪ – x – ∪ – x | – ∪ – x – ∪ –) were by far the most common meters. Both meters typically require a word break after the anceps position of the second metron, counting from the end of the line (caesura in the trimeter and *diaeresis in the tetrameter), although other locations of the break are possible. The classification of the trimeter as iambic and the tetrameter as trochaic is partly artificial; both meters can be conceived as derived from an undifferentiated periodic sequence (. . . x – ∪ – x . . . —see EPIPLOKE). If the meters are "right-aligned," various constraints on word boundaries, incl. the caesura/diaeresis, are located in the same place in the lines, suggesting that the grouping into iambs and trochees does not reflect their true structure.

Stricter iambic and trochaic meters employ Porson's law, a prohibition of a long syllable preceding a long-short-long word at the end of the line. Some scholars have interpreted this and other such restrictions as due to the presence of stress on word-final long syllables in Gr., in addition to *pitch accent.

Resolution of long positions becomes more common in later drama; plays of Euripides can be dated by the frequency of resolution, which rises in the later plays. Comic meters employ a curious hybrid system, where certain short positions are partial acipitia—they can be filled with a short syllable or with two short syllables in resolution, but not a single long.

The use of the meters is typically stichic; where stanzas are used, such as in Archilochus and Hipponax, they consist of no more than three lines.

The Dorian trad., represented by Stesichorus, Alcman, and Ibycus, admits nonperiodic sequences to a far greater extent than Ionian but is also less archaic than Aeolic in allowing resolution and contraction. Dactylic meters such as the tetrameter are the most widely used, usually mixed with iambic cola; *anapests and *cretics are also found. The late archaic poets Pindar, Bacchylides, and Simonides began to integrate the separate trads. of Gr. verse.

The Dorian poets' greatest innovation was in the rich devel. of strophic composition in repeated stanzas. There is a fairly steady tendency for the repeated sequence to become longer and more complicated. The maximum number of identical metra or cola that can be linked together to produce it increases, yielding what ancient metrists called *systems rather than lines; its components may be set off from each other as separate paragraphs or *periods. The latter are sometimes different from each other in their basic rhythmic structure and may be composed of contrasting subcomponents. When the component periods are sufficiently long and exhibit an aab pattern, it is customary to regard the larger repeated sequence as a triad divided into *strophe, *antistrophe, and *epode, with metrical *responsion linking the parts. This is esp. true of texts composed to be sung and danced by a *chorus rather than for simpler, monodic performance by a singer accompanied on the lyre or flute. (Stesichorus, the traditional name of the 6th-c. inventor of triadic composition, actually means "chorus master.") The tendency toward increasing length and complexity ends only with the Hellenistic period, by which time poetry and music have begun to go their separate ways.

The specific needs of Attic drama account for most of the 5th-c. innovations in prosodic technique. March anapests are taken over to accompany the entrances and exits of the chorus or, in comedy, formalized debate between protagonists. Musical holds and rests and, in longer stanzas and periods, a regularized colon structure make possible a heightening of dramatic intensity and emphasis. Most pervasively, repeating stanzaic or triadic composition is abandoned. The last devel., which makes lyric composition a series of single poetic sentences or paragraphs, is usually associated with a late 5th-c. BCE innovation, the virtuoso song for a professional soloist, whether in drama or *dithyramb. But even the earliest drama that survives (Aeschylus's Persae) has already moved in this direction by limiting itself mainly to single repetitions of a given stanzaic pattern followed, in longer compositions, by further single repetitions of completely different patterns—aa' bb' cc', etc., rather than the a a' a'' (or, with triads, aab a'a'b' a''a''b'' of earlier lyric).

The prominence of compositions for professional soloists is symptomatic of how the devel. of music was beginning to outstrip that of poetry, and the resulting separation of the two arts is the main reason for the transformation of Gr. versification that took place in the 4th c. New techniques of vocal and musical embellishment were making the inherited multiplicity of verse forms based on the ordering of long and short syllables irrelevant or even distracting. Poets who wrote for performances by specialists in these techniques tended to confine themselves to a monotonous succession of durationally equivalent metra not unlike the bars of mod. Western music. Other poets, forerunners of the Alexandrians, turned to the task of adapting the hexameters, elegiacs, and trimeters of earlier recited verse to the needs of a reading rather than a listening public. All but the simplest stanzas disappear from such compositions for readers, though occasionally an isolated sequence of syllables will be lifted from an earlier stanzaic context and repeated stichically to form a "new" verse form, often named after its supposed inventor: glyconic, asclepiad, *phalaecean, *sotadean. *visual poetry, written for eye rather than ear, now makes its first appearance.

III. Latin. The earliest known Lat. meter, *Saturnian, was probably accentual rather than quantitative, although the small corpus of surviving lines does not allow for definitive analysis. This native trad. was amalgamated with Gr. imports in the late 3d c. BCE, resulting in a complex hybrid system that shared features of both quantitative and *accentual verse. The comedies of Plautus employ the same dramatic meters as their Gr. predecessors—iambic *senarius (corresponding to Gr. trimeter) and trochaic *septenarius (corresponding to Gr. tetrameter), and a complex system of lyric cantica or sung verse. The Plautine iambs and trochees relax many of the Gr. restrictions but introduce new ones not found in Gr. meters. Except for the last metron of the line, Plautus allows a long syllable to fill what in Gr. would be a short position, i.e., the Plautine iamb is x – x –, rather than x – ⏑ –. On the other hand, complex restrictions on the location of word boundaries suggest that, in addition to quantity, the meters also regulated word accent. Although the question is vexed and subject to debate, it is clear that the Gr. meters were modified to make their use more natural in a lang. whose phonology differed from that of Gr.

Two such differences are relevant to meter. First, short syllables are much less frequent in Lat. than Gr., making it more difficult to require metrical positions to contain a short syllable, as is evident in Plautus. Contraction in dactylic meters, by necessity, is also far more frequent in Lat. The second difference involves the nature of Gr. and Lat. accent. Gr. accent was most likely solely realized by pitch and played no role in any cl. meter; whether Gr. had stress in addition to accent is subject to debate. Lat. accent, on the other hand, was based not on pitch but on intensity; such accent in other langs. typically is relevant to meter. Whether that was the case in Lat. is the central unresolved question in the field. On the one hand, there are clear statistical tendencies showing alignment between metrically strong positions and accented syllables. On the other hand, Lat. accent is preferentially placed on long syllables, and since the meters are quantitative, the attraction of accent to strong positions might be an illusion. The strongest argument in favor of the role of accent in Lat. verse is that, in quantitatively nondescript sequences of syllables, such as sequences of long syllables in Plautus or in the dactylic hexameter, accent seems to play an organizing role. The result is a system in which stress patterns now reinforce, now supplement, or clash with quantitative ones to such an extent that *rhythm cannot avoid having an added dimension, a counterpoint between the quantitative and accentual properties of the text. One of its essential ingredients is the tension between harmony and dissonance, i.e., expectation fulfilled and expectation frustrated, which is largely foreign to Gr.

The verse that went furthest in this direction is Plautus's favorite line, the trochaic septenarius. Though it corresponds to the Gr. tetrameter, the septenarius is occasionally referred to by a purely Lat. name, versus quadratus, and it has the distinction of being the only important cl. form that continues to be important—once suitably modified—in the *accentual-syllabic versification of med. Lat. Some metrists are inclined to see here a "substrate" phenomenon: a partially Hellenized native meter bearing witness to a subliterary type of Lat. versification whose accentual basis made it entirely different from any considered in this article and that was ultimately destined to provide the basis for all med. and mod. Western prosody.

The aliterary, performance-oriented side of the trad. is probably reflected in the cantica of Plautine comedy, though many cantica are considerably more complex than anything in the Gr. texts that survive from the period. After Plautus, the literary side dominates, as the Romans confine themselves to forms already well established in Gr. The metrical constraints become more rigid and more purely quantitative. The variability of the iambic and trochaic meters in Plautus—the large number of various substitutions, liberal use of resolution, and other effects—is unparalleled in later Lat. verse forms. In the lyric forms, only Horace and Seneca go beyond the Hellenistic repertory—either toward a much closer and more extensive reproduction of stanzas found in Alcaeus and Sappho (Horace) or toward entirely new structures produced by excerpting and recombining lines and line sections from those Horatian reproductions (Seneca).

While the meters of the cl. age imitate their Gr. models closely, the native Lat. tendencies still show through. The basic structure of dactylic hexameter is identical to that of Gr.—five dactylic feet with possible contraction, followed by – x. Yet, the meter underwent an evolution in Lat. that suggests an increasing attention to native phonology. The earlier poets (Ennius and Lucretius) imitated the quantitative pattern of Gr., with few other restrictions. Virgil, Propertius, Tibullus, and esp. Ovid impose constraints on the location of word boundaries usually interpreted in terms of word accent: agreement between the accentual and quantitative prominence in the *cadence (last two feet) of the line and clash at the caesura in the third foot—tension between accent and quantity culminates at the caesura and is resolved in the end of the line. This pattern becomes nearly absolute in Ovid and later poets.

The fate of Gr. versification in Lat. is yet another illustration of the truth of Horace's famous dictum on captive Greece as captor, Graecia capta ferum victorem cepit. It is only with the radical transformation of both ancient cultures that the captured Muse of the conqueror reasserts her independence.

See ALEXANDRIANISM, GREEK POETRY, LATIN POETRY.

■ Bibliographies: "Métrique, rythmique, prosodie," L'Année philologique 1– (1927–); A. M. Dale, "Greek Metric 1936–57," Lustrum 2 (1957); L.P.E. Parker, "Greek Metric, 1957–70," Lustrum 15 (1970); D. W. Packard and T. Meyers, A Bibliography of Homeric

Scholarship (1974); F. Cuppaiolo, Bibliografia della Metrica Latina (1995).

■ General: A. T. Cole, "Classical Greek and Latin," Wimsatt; Allen.

■ Greek: J. W. White, The Verse of Greek Comedy (1912); A. Meillet, Les Origines Indo-Européennes des Mètres Grecques (1923); Maas,; W. B. Stanford, The Sound of Greek (1967); Dale; A. M. Dale, Collected Papers (1969); E. Wahlström, Accentual Responsion in Greek Strophic Poetry (1970); A. M. Dale, Metrical Analyses of Tragic Choruses (1971); G. Nagy, Comparative Studies in Greek and Indic Meter (1974); West; A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, Language and Metre: Resolution, Porson's Bridge, and Their Prosodic Basis (1984); A. Prince, "Metrical Forms," Phonetics and Phonology I: Rhythm and Meter, ed. P. Kiparsky and G. Youmans (1989); W. S. Allen, Vox graeca (1987); A. T. Cole, Epiploke (1988); A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, "Stress in Greek?" TAPA 115 (1985), and The Prosody of Greek Speech (1994); C. Golston, "The Phonology of Classical Greek Meter," JL 38 (2000); C. Golston and T. Riad, "The Phonology of Greek Lyric Meter," JL 41 (2005).

■ Latin: W. M. Lindsay, Early Latin Verse (1922); C. G. Cooper, Introduction to the Latin Hexameter (1952); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); D. S. Raven, Latin Metre (1965); H. Drexler, Einführung in die Römische Metrik (1967); C. Questa, Introduzione alla Metrica di Plauto (1967); L. Braun, Die Cantica des Plautus (1970); W. S. Allen, Vox latina (1978); E. Pulgram, Latin-Romance Phonology: Prosodics and Metrics (1975); A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, "Latin Prosody and Meter: Brevis Brevians," CP 75 (1980); J. Soubiran, Essai sur la Versification dramatique des Romains (1988); J. Parsons, "A New Approach to the Saturnian Verse and Its Relation to Latin Prosody," TAPA 129 (1999); B. W. Fortson, Language and Rhythm in Plautus (2008).

T.V.F. Brogan; A. T. Cole; L. Blumenfeld

CLASSICISM. The term classicism carries a cluster of different but interrelated meanings and so presents some challenges of definition. These stem from the varied meanings of the word classic, which can mean first class (the word's original, etymological meaning), standard, exemplary, or (in the lang. of consumer culture) obsolete. The description of Greco-Roman antiquity as the cl. period and of the canon of Greco-Roman lit. as the classics was not fully naturalized until the 19th c. and derives from the enormous cultural authority granted to surviving Greco-Roman artifacts. The Eng. word classicism is a 19th-c. coinage, used initially in the context of commenting upon culture wars in France and Germany that placed classicism—understood primarily as an aesthetic and political program devoted to the re-creation of an ideal of social harmony and artistic purity associated with cl. Greece—against *romanticism. Of course, romanticism, in Germany and France as in England and elsewhere, likewise featured a robust strain of Hellenism, and it is helpful to think of the opposition between classicism and romanticism in late 18th- and early 19th-c. Europe as a debate within the romantic movement over the importance of formal imitation and restraint that is differently inflected, in each case, by the cultural legacy of prior deployments of the cl. trad. Weimar classicism, the social and aesthetic movement now associated primarily with Friedrich Schiller and J. W. Goethe, is part of the larger movement of Ger. romanticism. But in France, which had a stronger and more culturally authoritative trad. of formal neoclassicism (as represented, for instance, by the tragedies of Jean Racine and codified for poetry in Nicolas Boileau's L'Art poétique [1674]), romanticism was received as a challenge to classicism's established sense of *decorum.

By the early 20th c., the binary opposition between classicism and romanticism had hardened, and modernist writers like Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot created their own form of classicism as a reaction to what they perceived as the excesses of the romantic movement. T. E. Hulme's essay "Romanticism and Classicism" (pub. in 1924, though written more than a decade earlier) distinguishes sharply between two opposed ideas of art, politics, and human nature, arguing that where the romantic sees humans as inherently good, believes in progress, and celebrates subjective creativity, the classicist is conservative, sees humans as flawed, and regards trad. as a useful stay against the debilitating weakness of the individual. Though Hulme refers admiringly to Horace (a perennial favorite of critics and writers who believe in the value of decorum), he is not primarily concerned with cl. antiquity as such. But modernist classicism also involves a reevaluation of artifacts from cl. antiquity as offering artistic alternatives to romanticism. Eliot, whose attitude toward the importance of trad. is broadly cognate with Hulme's classicism, argues for the primary importance of cl. langs. and lits. in his late essay "Modern Education and the Classics" (1932), for instance, and an idealizing fondness for fragments of lyric poetry from the Greek Anthology*—a poetry stripped of its subjective author and social context by time—is one of the influences behind the *imagism of modernist writers like Pound and H.D.

Because it entered critical discourse framed by its opposition to romanticism, classicism as a term of art in cultural or poetic crit. can still denote formal precision, adherence to trad., artistic conservatism, simplicity, and restraint. And in lit. hists. of France and England, one often encounters the term designating artistic movements (Fr. classicism of the 17th and early 18th cs., and Eng. neoclassicism of the 18th) that put a premium on adherence to formal regularity as well as imitation of cl. antiquity. But classicism also has a larger, second meaning that we can understand by analogy with parallel critical terms like medievalism or Hellenism. In this broader sense, classicism refers to the appropriation and redeployment of cl. antiquity and to ways in which ideas about cl. Greece and Rome have been shaped by and circulated within subsequent cultural milieus. The hundred years' war between classicism and romanticism can be understood as an episode in the long hist. of classicism in this latter sense, since its skirmishes involved both a romantic reaction to earlier, neoclassical ideas of art and a series of competing ideas about the meaning of ancient artifacts as the recovered traces of a primeval, Hellenic Western culture.

If we take the term to refer to the hist. of reception and appropriation pertaining to artifacts and concepts associated with cl. Greece and Rome, then it is obvious that classicism as a category depends on a prior idea of cl. antiquity as a discrete period. Classicism, therefore, depends on a notion of historical period that is usually understood to be a 14th-c. It. innovation and that is often credited, above all, to Petrarch (1304–74). Petrarch had a lifelong interest in recuperating the lit. of cl. Rome, but his essential innovation, for the purposes of understanding classicism as a concept, resides in the role he played in creating and disseminating a new idea of historical period according to which everything from the decline of the Roman Empire through the 14th-c. project of humanist recovery of the classics could be thought of as the dark ages and the period of the humanist project itself could be understood as a renaissance, or rebirth, of cl. learning. This idea of hist., in effect, creates the concept of the classics—Greco-Roman antiquity—with which we are familiar today. Lat. was the lang. of scholars, though, and knowledge of Gr. was comparatively rare, so the focus of Ren. classicism is primarily on Roman antiquity, with the secondary focus on cl. Greece often filtered through the lens of Roman philhellenism.

Petrarch's historiographical innovation is in many ways a flawed characterization of the hist. of cl. reception. Med. Europe was certainly not without its own robust trads. of reading and imitating many of what we today would think of as cl. philosophical and literary texts, often in highly sophisticated ways designed to make sense of the problematic moral status of pagan lit. within a Christian world. One obvious example here is the way Dante imagined Virgil as his guide during the Inferno and Purgatorio portions of his early 14th-c. Divine Comedy but required a suitably Christian guide for the Paradiso. Another is the 13th-c. Ovid Moralisé, a massive poem and accompanying commentary built on the scaffolding of Ovid's Metamorphoses, whose project is to reconcile Ovidian poetry with Christian theology. Moreover, though Petrarch and his followers did make enormous contributions to the philological project of recovering texts from cl. antiquity, they were by no means the first to do so: lit. hists. of Italy often speak of 13th-c. prehumanists, men like Lovato dei Lovati (1240–1309), a Paduan judge sometimes credited with originating the philological project of recovering cl. lit., or his disciple Albertino Mussato (1261–1329), whose Lat., Senecan play Ecerinis (1315) is the postclassical era's earliest secular tragedy. Nevertheless, the idea of renaissance evokes the periodization upon which subsequent classicism rests, and so the hist. of classicism properly begins with the invention and spread of ideas concerning hist. and the importance of Rome popularized in 14th-c. Italy.

Though humanists, following Petrarch, were able to conceive of their era optimistically, as a moment of cultural rebirth and recovery, their sense of historical period also put new emphasis on the linked problems of historical loss, ruin, and anachronism. Cl. Rome, understood as a cultural high-water mark, existed for them only in variously decontextualized or fragmented forms: in architectural ruins and in surviving texts and artifacts separated from an original cultural context that was, in turn, impossible to assimilate fully to a Christian, Eur. world. Because Ren. writers operated according to ideas about education and creativity that put a premium on the importance of *imitation, the humanist conception of cl. Rome (as both exemplary and in some sense lost) had an enormous impact on all aspects of the period's intellectual life. We can see this in the ideas and practices governing Ren. poetry and poetics. As Greene has shown in The Light in Troy, self-styled Ren. writers from Petrarch onward found themselves attempting to imitate literary models conceptualized, simultaneously, as authoritative classics and as traces of a lost and distant cultural moment; this, in turn, meant that the project of imitating cl. texts shaded into the more complex task of recreating them anew in the context of a strong sense of anachronism. We see in Ren. poetry a good deal of imitation and trans. of authoritative cl. models, periodic vogues for forms like epic and ode associated with writers like Virgil and Horace, and, of course, innumerable allusions to cl. texts. But the project of recreating cl. literary authority for a present understood to be discontinuous with the cl. world also creates space for innovation, resulting in the flourishing of ambitious vernacular lits. and (as Greene suggests) a sophisticated interest in deracinated but endlessly allusive literary self-fashioning that finds its characteristic expression in lyric poetry after Petrarch. Petrarch's own poetic career is illustrative: his Africa, a Lat. hexameter epic on the subject of the Second Punic War, exemplifies the period's imitative literary classicism, but he was (and is) better known for his profoundly innovative and influential sonnet sequence, the Canzoniere, which is written in the It. vernacular and which is self-consciously preoccupied with the creation of a poetic speaker whose laureate authority is constituted self-referentially by the sequence itself.

The influence of It. humanism spread all over Europe, driven by the international commerce in books and ideas; but they were absorbed at different rates in different places, and, of course, they were inflected differently by confessional, political, and other factors in each locale. It is conventional in literary and intellectual hist. to speak of the Ren. as a 15th-to-16th-c. phenomenon in Fr.-, Sp.-, and Ger.-speaking Europe, e.g., but as a 16th-to-17th-c. phenomenon in England. In all cases, though, the humanist impulse to recover and emulate the classics fused with political or cultural ambitions—the desire to imitate Roman might and the desire to elevate one's own vernacular. The paradigmatic statement of what this means for poetry and poetics may be Joachim du Bellay's 1549 treatise La Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse (Defense and Enrichment of the French Language), which argued that Fr. authors should emulate cl. models but should do so not by writing in Lat. or by slavishly replicating cl.

literary forms but rather by fully digesting and so recreating cl. achievements while writing in Fr. in order to cultivate and ennoble their own native lang. Du Bellay's treatise was meant as a kind of party paper or manifesto for an influential and ambitious group of poets, including most famously Pierre de Ronsard, who have since come to be known as the Pléiade* and who helped to establish an exceptionally strong trad. of classicism in France. But similar ideals and ambitions are also expressed regarding other vernaculars and national trads. throughout the Ren. Ren. classicism, all over Europe, is about emulation in each of its primary senses: both the imitation of and the attempt to compete with cl. attainments.

Local variations notwithstanding, this basic paradigm helps to explain a great deal about the progress and devel. of Eur. classicism through the first half of the 18th c. On the one hand, the canon of the classics provided a shared cultural reference point for cultural and political elites all over western Europe. But, on the other, the goal of matching cl. culture, or of appropriating the mantle of cl. civilization or Roman might for one's own people, continued to be a motor for artistic innovation. Pronounced devels. in Eur. classicism in this period are typically expressions of cultural self-assertion associated with historical moments in which various monarchies or nations experience eras of unusual wealth and power. The brands of classicism they produce are, therefore, often best understood as forms of cultural imperialism designed to make competitive assertions about the attainments of their respective creators. Eras of political consolidation and military expansion in Hapsburg Spain (esp. 16th and early 17th cs.) and the France of Louis XIV (esp. late 17th and early 18th cs.) saw corresponding periods of classically oriented artistic magnificence, as monarchs and other patrons encouraged art, lit., and architecture designed to lay claim upon the cultural centrality and imperial power associated with the cl. world. In England, military success and the wealth associated with colonial expansion and the slave trade helped fuel a cultural self-confidence that found characteristic artistic expression in the neoclassicism of the so-called Augustan Age: the era of John Dryden (1631–1700) and Alexander Pope (1688–1744), each of whom was a notable trans. of cl. lit. into elegant Eng. couplets. Dryden translated, among a great many other cl. texts, Virgil's Aeneid; Pope became wealthy from subscription sales of his trans. of Homer.

The characteristic early mod. tension between reverence for the classics and the imperatives of cultural self-assertion is perhaps most perfectly manifested in the late 17th and early 18th c. battle of ancients and moderns that was carried out simultaneously in England and France (see QUERELLE DES ANCIENS ET DES MODERNES). The catalysts for this debate (which readers of Eng. poetry will recognize from Jonathan Swift's satirical treatment in "The Battle of the Books" [1704]) were arguments presented by writers like Bernard le Bovier de Fontenelle (1657–1757) and Sir William Temple (1628–99) about the relative superiority of mod. thought and culture to those of the ancients. These arguments, self-evidently expressions of early-Enlightenment optimism about the progressive potential of science and reason, were countered by writers like Boileau who reasserted the importance for contemp. culture of imitating cl. models. Strikingly, one can see in these debates early, preromantic intimations of the binary opposition between conservative classicism and progressive romanticism that later finds expression in Fr. literary culture of the 19th c. and in the early 20th-c. writings of Hulme and others (see PREROMANTICISM).

The decisive shift in 18th-c. classicism involved a fundamental reevaluation of the relationship between cl. Greece and Rome championed above all by the Ger. art historian J. J. Winckelmann (1717–68). Before Winckelmann, Eur. classicism operated according to a synoptic view of the classics, one within which mod. writers could draw upon the specific cultural associations of cl. Greece or Rome without jeopardizing an overall conception of cl. excellence shared across the entire period of Greco-Roman antiquity. Winckelmann—and esp. his influential book Geschichte der Kunst des Alterthums (The History of the Art of Antiquity), pub. in 1764 and soon trans. into Fr., Eng., and It.—treated Roman art as a pale copy of a more vibrant, original Gr. artistry and thus heralded in a new model of classicism as, primarily, Hellenism. This innovation sparked a Eur. fashion for all things Gr. that lasted well into the 19th c. and undergirded a new model of classicism built upon an idealized picture of the purity and balance of Gr. art and culture with which it became possible to denigrate postclassical art imitative of Roman models as decadent, impure, or *baroque. Indeed, the word baroque, from the Port. barroco—a jeweler's term for an irregularly shaped pearl—entered the Eng. lang. in tandem with Winckelmann's influence and was used to describe postclassical devels. in art and architecture (esp. in Roman Catholic counties, though also in Germany) that, though they often strove to imitate and better Roman artistic models, had come to be seen as misshapen or overly ornamented from the perspective of the new, Hellenistic ideal of cl. simplicity and balance.

More broadly, the shift in thinking precipitated by Wicklemann set up Greece and Rome as competing cultural models, so that, for the first time, the cultural authority of cl. antiquity could be marshaled against classicism itself. This is part of what we see in the 19th-c. opposition between romanticism and classicism, where romantic writers like John Keats or Lord Byron (who died of a fever fighting for Gr. independence against the Ottoman Empire) could draw upon an idea of Greece as original, natural, and thus eternal, while simultaneously rejecting the formal classicism and restrictive decorum characteristic of proceeding generations of Eng. poets. That the idea of Greece as primeval—as the last true meeting point between nature and civilization—is also of foundational importance within the 19th-c. origins of mod. and postmod. thought is indicated by the importance accorded to Greece in the thinking of Sigmund Freud (whose Oedipus complex is grounded in Sophocles) and Friedrich Nietzsche (who found in the Greece of Aeschylus and Sophocles the last successful balance between the Apollonian and the Dionysian elements of the creative imagination).

As the study of cl. langs., lits., and cultures within Eur. schools has gradually been supplemented and replaced by other forms of humanistic study, the role of classicism as a central mode of cultural self-fashioning has likewise been eroded. Nevertheless, the variety of perspectives built into the hist. of classicism and the eclecticism associated with postmod. artistic praxis combine to ensure that the cultural authority of cl. lit. and art is sampled and reappropriated by late 20th- and 21st-c. writers in innumerable ways. For the poet-as-bricoleur, classicism now offers a vast repository of familiar images and personages, freighted with dense layers of meaning accumulated through centuries of recovery, reception, and appropriation. Though the political hist. of the 20th c.—fascism, the Holocaust, postcolonialism, globalization—has made writers leery about idealizing Greece as any kind of original moment of Western purity, associated ideas of Gr. art as exemplifying strong simplicity and the fusion of art and nature or of Greece as the cradle of democracy are still very much part of the lexicon of late 20th- and 21st-c. classicism. However, since the aesthetic idea of classicism remains focused predominantly upon Hellenism of a kind first popularized by Wincklemann, the popular image of Roman antiquity has become more fully and inextricably linked to questions about republic and empire, militarism and governance. These become most acute in the U.S.: from the ostentatious classicism of its federal buildings to the Lat. phrases and emblems incorporated into its money, the national style of the U.S. in the 21st c. is still deeply bound up with an Enlightenment-era ideal of Greco-Roman classicism connoting solid military strength, popular governance, and liberty. But Rome, in 21st-c. art, has also come to connote imperialism, governmental hubris, decadence, and (as exemplified in Cullen Murphy's Are We Rome? [2007]) the specter of imperial collapse.

■ E. M. Butler, The Tyranny of Greece over Germany (1935); T. E. Mommsen, "Petrarch's Conception of the 'Dark Ages,'" Speculum 17 (1942); T. W. Baldwin, William Shakspere's Small Latine & Lesse Greek, 2 v. (1944); W. J. Bate, From Classic to Romantic (1946); G. Highet, The Classical Tradition (1949); Eliot; Curtius; R. M. Ogilvie, Latin and Greek (1964)—England, 1600–1918; T. S. Beardsley Jr., Hispano-Classical Translations Printed between 1482 and 1699 (1970); R. Wellek, "The Term and Concept of Classicism in Literary History," Discriminations (1970); F. J. Warnke, Versions of Baroque (1972); G. Braden, The Classics and English Renaissance Poetry (1978); J. Buxton, The Grecian Taste (1978); T. M. Greene, The Light in Troy: Imitation and Discovery in Renaissance Poetry (1982); Latin Influences on English Literature from the Middle Ages to the Eighteenth Century, ed. C. Kallendorf (1982)—annotated bibl.; A Dictionary of Classical Reference in English Poetry, ed. E. Smith (1984); F. M. Turner, The Greek Heritage in Victorian Britain (1984); G. Braden, Renaissance Tragedy and the Senecan Tradition (1985); L. D. Reynolds and N. G. Wilson, Scribes and Scholars (1991)—med. survival of cl. texts; G. H. Tucker, The Poet's Odyssey (1991)—du Bellay and Ren. Fr. classicism; The Collected Writings of T. E. Hulme, ed. K. Csengeri (1994); J. M. Levine, The Battle of the Books (1994); C. A. Stray, Classics Transformed (1998)—educational and curricular reform in mod. England; D. S. Ferris, Silent Urns (2000)—romanticism and Hellenism; R. G. Witt, In the Footsteps of the Ancients (2000); The Classical Heritage in France, ed. G. Sandy (2002); The Literature of Weimar Classicism, ed. S. Richter (2005); S. Settis, The Future of the "Classical," trans. A. Cameron (2006); A Companion to the Classical Tradition, ed. C. W. Kallendorf (2007).

C. Perry

CLAVIS (Lat., "key" or "nail" line). Dante describes clavis as the end of a line of verse that has no matching rhyme within the stanza, though it may rhyme with lines in later stanzas of the poem. Clavis is, therefore, defined as the absence of rhyme where it is expected. Agamben suggests that this deferral of expectation holds a special place in *Occitan poetry and stilnovismo poetics (see DOLCE STIL NUOVO) in that it provides the "semblance of coincidence" between sound and sense. Rhyme words in the *sestina can be understood as extensions of the clavis technique. Clavis may also be identified as rim estramp (see OCCITAN POETRY), dissolute, orphan rhyme, and unrelated rhyme.

■ Dante, De Vulgari Eloquentia 2.13.-5; Las Leys d'Amors, ed. J. Anglade (1920); G. Agamben, The End of the Poem, trans. D. Heller-Roazen (1999).

H. Feinsod

CLERIHEW. A form of *light verse consisting of two couplets giving facetious biographical information; the lines are of unequal length and the rhymes often eccentric. Edmund Clerihew Bentley invented the form as a schoolboy (1890) by writing:

> Sir Humphrey Davy
> Detested gravy
> He lived in the odium
> Of having discovered sodium.

The clerihew enjoyed instant popularity with Bentley's fellow students, incl. G. K. Chesterton. Later practitioners are W. H. Auden, Clifton Fadiman, and J.R.R. Tolkien. As the example shows, the clerihew presents the great quirkily. The clerihew differs from other light-verse forms by its roughness: other light verse is polished, but the clerihew is deliberately ragged, burlesquing fixed-form eulogies.

■ E. C. Bentley, Biography for Beginners (1905), The Complete Clerihews (1951; rpt. 1981), The First Clerihews (1982); C. Fadiman, "Cleriheulogy," Any Number Can Play (1957); P. Horgan, Clerihews of Paul Horgan (1985).

F. Teague

CLICHÉ (Fr., clicher or cliquer, "to click"). The term cliché emerged in the early 19th c.: it referred to the stereotype block used in printing and originated in the clicking sound produced when molten lead was struck to make stereotypes. By the second half of the century, the definition was extended to photographic negatives, reflecting the close ties between photography and print as means of mechanical reproduction. As applied to lit., cliché was used metaphorically, to connote an overused expression or stock response. In 1887, A.M.V. Barrère defined cliché in the dictionary Argot and Slang as "a commonplace sentence readymade; commonplace metaphor; well-worn platitude." This figurative meaning was tied to the term's mechanical origin, suggesting a general familiarity with the technology and a sense that conventions of expression had become overused and commercially debased.

Lerner and Barry both connect the distaste for cliché to the romantic emphasis on *originality. Woodmansee and others have explored the complex relations between print culture and understandings of the romantic lyric that espoused qualities opposed to mechanization (e.g., originality, *spontaneity, and *sincerity; see ROMANTICISM). Nonetheless, the romantic emphasis on feeling would strike ensuing generations as mechanical, resulting in new means of resisting cliché: in the early 20th c., modernists associated the cliché (as opposed to the stereotype or *commonplace) with a worn-out romanticism, perpetuated by sentimental poetry (see SENTIMENTALITY) and, according to T.S. Eliot, best countered through strategies of abstraction and impersonality. In surveying the magazine verse of the 1880s, Lowell wrote, "Here are all the old clichés: doves grieving for their lost mates, young lambs at play, swallows who herald the sun, winds that bluster," while Tietjens in her study of the poetic clichés of several langs. concluded that "they pertain . . . in all languages to the tender sentiments." Pound (1918) distinguished commonplace, which he defined as "things which we all know and upon which we for the most part agree" from cliché, which he defined as "the stock and stilted phraseology of the usual English verse as it has come down to us," arguing that clichés result in "poetry as balderdash—a sort of embroidery for dilettantes and women." Instead, mod. poetry must resist the cliché: "for it is not until poetry lives again 'close to the thing' that it will be a vital part of contemporary life." Critics in this trad. have charged the cliché with impeding the expression of original feeling or thought, threatening an understanding of the poem as a form through which lang., ideas, and feelings can be made or remade anew. Clichés are the opposite of poetry as that which "strikes the reader with the force of a new perception," as Brooks and Warren put it. From this perspective, the cliché puts the human itself at risk of mechanization; for Molnar, it atrophies both intelligence and "the sense of beauty, discrimination, taste, manners." Ricks (1984) sums up this approach thus: "[W]e are in a grim world where if you don't sourly subjugate clichés they will subjugate you. . . . [C]lichés are to be attacked."

The power of the cliché to define the human subject and shape culture is implicit in the ideas about lang. of *structuralism and *poststructuralism: as Barthes writes, "inner" expression is "only a ready-formed dictionary," and "the text is a tissue of quotations drawn from the innumerable centres of culture." Riffaterre (1971) sees the cliché as a stable stylistic structure, akin to a quotation, whose discordance from a new textual context generates meaning; what becomes worn is not the cliché but the reader's ability to recognize it as such, because of shifts in ideology and ling. codes. Critics taking a ling., sociological, or anthropological perspective have also emphasized the cliché's constitutive function in culture, regarding it as an "active, structuring, probing feature of our awareness" (McLuhan), as a microinstitution (Zijderveld), and as a species of ordinary lang. that overlaps with the commonplace, idiom, *proverb, stereotype, and slogan.

The cliché as a form of ordinary lang. has similarly interested a number of mod. poets, resulting in a more affirmative response than that of Pound, Eliot, and others. For Sabin, the desire to probe rather than satirize the cliché's ties to common life and lang. is specific to an Anglo-Am. literary trad., while Culler's study of Charles Baudelaire suggests otherwise, demonstrating that Baudelaire does not simply parody but also displays and creates clichés. In turn, the Fr. poetic avant-garde's interest in the mechanization of voice (Noland) has resulted in a sustained interest in cliché. Watson presents Philip Larkin's use of cliché as a means of investigating ordinary speech and habit, while Spargo argues that the cliché articulates a "presumed movement toward assent," enabling Robert Frost to explore the failures and gaps in communication that underlie the "myth of democracy." Inspired by William Empson's observation that clichés are metaphors that "are not dead but sleeping," Ricks and Barry demonstrate Samuel Beckett's interest in the cliché's "tenacity" and "hidden appeals," its expression of "fundamental desires and fears and truths," while Shoptaw, Morse, and Monroe explore a similar use of cliché as a form of "hallowed" lang. in John Ashbery's poetry. Davie and Ricks see the animation of *dead metaphors as one of poetry's fundamental tasks: from this perspective, the deliberate use of cliché in a poem does not debase but purifies or renovates the lang.

See CONVENTION, HYPOGRAM.

■ Dictionnaire de L'Academie Francaise, 6th ed. (1832–35); The American Amateur Photographer (1891); E. Pound, Pavannes and Divisions (1918); A. Lowell, Tendencies in Modern American Poetry (1921); E. Tietjens, "The Sub-Conscious Cliché," Poetry 18 (1921); T. S. Eliot, The Sacred Wood (1922); E. Pound, Literary Essays (1935); E. Partridge, A Dictionary of Clichés (1940); Empson; L. Lerner, "Cliché and Commonplace," Essays in Criticism 6 (1956); Brooks and Warren; D. Davie, Purity of Diction in English Verse, 2d ed. (1967); M. McLuhan, From Cliché to Archetype (1970); M. Riffaterre, "Fonction du Cliché dans la Prose Litteraire," Essais de stylistique structurale (1971);

E. Pound, Selected Prose 1909–1965 (1973); R. Barthes, "The Death of the Author," Image, Music, Text, trans. S. Heath (1977); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); A. C. Zijderveld, On Clichés (1979); C. Ricks, "Clichés," The Force of Poetry (1984); T. Molnar, "The Anatomy of Clichés," Chronicles 10 (1986); M. Sabin, The Dialect of the Tribe (1987); W. D. Redfern, Clichés and Coinages (1989); J. R. Watson, "Clichés and Common Speech in Philip Larkin's Poetry," Critical Survey 1 (1989); J. Monroe, "Idiom and Cliché in T. S. Eliot and John Ashbery," Contemporary Literature 31 (1990); C. Ricks, Beckett's Dying Words (1993); J. Shoptaw, On the Outside Looking Out: John Ashbery's Poetry (1994); J. Morse, "Typical Ashbery," Tribe of John: Ashbery and Contemporary Poetry, ed. S. Schultz (1995); M. Woodmansee, The Author, Art, and the Market (1996); J. Culler, "Poesie et Cliché Chez Baudelaire," Le Cliché, ed. G. Mathis (1998); C. Noland, Poetry at Stake: Lyric Aesthetics and the Challenge of Technology (1999); E. Barry, Beckett and Authority (2006); R. C. Spargo, "Robert Frost and the Allure of Consensus," Raritan 28 (2009).

S. Rosenbaum

CLIMAX (Gr., "ladder"). Loosely refers to any ascending rhetorical figure, whether the rungs are repeated words (gradatio), word order (*auxesis), or logic (sorites). Still more commonly, it refers to the highest point of audience interest in a drama or narrative.

In cl. rhet., climax is strictly synonymous with gradatio (Lat., "steps"), in which the last word or phrase of a clause becomes the first of the next, and so on, each repeated word gaining greater importance. Puttenham gives this example: "His virtue made him wise, his wisdom brought him much wealth, / His wealth made him many friends, his friends made him much supply / Of aids in weal and woe." The ladder ascends from virtue, through wisdom, wealth, and friends, to a height of abundant help.

In auxesis (Gr., "increase"), the rungs are not repeated words but words arranged in order from lesser to greater. Puttenham: "He lost, besides his children and his wife, / His realm, renown, liege, liberty, and life." Here each loss is greater than the last until the sequence climaxes in death.

Finally, sorites (Gr., "heap") names a kind of syllogism, not a figure of speech. Hoskyns explains that it concludes gradatio with a clause containing the first and last rungs. Puttenham's example of gradatio would thus end: "therefore, his virtue brought him abundant aid."

In 1863, Freytag borrowed the term climax to describe the apex of the rising action in a drama, the third of a five-part structure called Freytag's pyramid. He made climax, which describes the audience's interest, synonymous with crisis, the structural turning point of the drama, but the term has since been applied more loosely to any peak in audience interest.

The opposite of climax is catacosmesis (Gr., "to set in order"), which describes a descending order. Congeries (Lat., "heap") describes an unordered heaping of words. Puttenham: "how fair, how wise, how good, / How brave, how free, how courteous, and how true / My lady is." Gradatio is sometimes confused with *anadiplosis (Gr., "double back"), which merely repeats a single word and does not always result in an ascent or descent. Puttenham: "Your beauty was the cause of my first love; / Love while I live." Gradatio must repeat more than one word and must ascend.

Cl. rhetoricians described gradatio as esp. prominent. Quintilian recommended sparing use because it is "produced by art less disguised, or more affected," while Demetrius placed the figure not in the plain, grand, or elegant styles but in the forceful.

Most Ren. rhetoricians placed gradatio among other rhetorical figures, but others created subdivisions. Melanchthon, Susenbrotus, and Peacham characterized gradatio as amplifying, which referred to the goal of rhet., while Puttenham categorized it as sententious or wise.

Conceptually, gradatio was slow to enter Eng. Christian Anglo-Saxon England restricted rhetorical knowledge to elocution. When gradatio finally arrived in the Ren., it was applied to music as well. During the romantic era, cl. education declined, making most subsequent uses of climax either serendipitous or imitative of literary precedents.

See rhetoric and poetry, scheme, trope.

■ G. Freytag, Die Technik des Drama (1863); M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); Vickers; D. Bartel, Musica Poetica (1997)—rhetorical figures in music; P. McCreless, "Music and Rhetoric," Cambridge History of Western Music Theory, ed. T. Christensen (2002); J. Steen, Verse and Virtuosity (2008)—med. rhet.

M. L. Manson

CLOSE READING. Close reading is an approach to texts that pays particular attention to their semantic and formal features and often finds in those features a complex coherence and purpose—as one prominent 20th-c. exponent put it, close reading reveals "language so twisted and poised in a form that it not only expresses the matter at hand but adds to the stock of available reality" (R. P. Blackmur, Poetry magazine [March 1935]). Attention to poetry's ling. textures has been an activity of critics and readers for centuries, but the term close reading is most associated with the *New Criticism. In Ransom's 1941 manifesto for the movement, the term first appears in a discussion of I. A. Richards's psychologically oriented criticism: in Practical Criticism (1929), where Richards explores his Cambridge students' skills at reading poetry, "Richards reveals himself as an astute reader. He looks much more closely at the objective poem than his theories require him to do." Developing the procedures of Richards and William Empson (Seven Types of Ambiguity, 1930), the New Critics stressed the central role of tension, *paradox, and *ambiguity in poems. They argued that, when read closely, a good poem displays a ling. density and order, both acknowledging the multiple meanings and tones embodied in rhetorical figures and formal patterns and resolving those potentially discordant elements into a unified or balanced whole.

In The Well Wrought Urn (1947), for instance, Cleanth Brooks draws attention in poems to what he described as "a pattern of resolutions and balances and harmonizations, developed through a temporal scheme," while Reuben Brower in In Defense of Reading (1963) examines poems with an eye for what he calls their "key design." Perhaps the most explicit demonstration of the assumptions and techniques of close reading appears in Brooks and Warren, where poems appear with "exercises" intended to draw the student into a consideration of how various formal and rhetorical features amount to a unity (e.g., on an extract from Alfred, Lord Tennyson's In Memoriam: "Is the poem unified?"—see UNITY). Implicit in such work is the sense that poems are "self-contained worlds with their own laws and their own logic" (Dowling), a notion assumed by Riffaterre, a structuralist critic prominent in the 1960s and 1970s, when he argues that poems are generated from a kernel word or *"matrix" and associated "ungrammaticalities" (elements of semantic complexity or *artifice); and by Vendler, one of the most committed contemp. close readers, when she proposes an "aesthetic criticism" able to make visible the "law" or problem that generates and sets in motion a text's "unique configuration" of elements.

Close reading, however, need not necessarily be bound by the expectation that a poem's complications be resolved into a single gesture or tension. Burke made the important claim that a poem is a "symbolic act," the record of a series of attempts, within lang., to identify, analyze, and respond to an initial conflict. A number of critics after Burke—Fish, Poirier, and others—emphasize the processive rather than the teleological nature of close reading; many of these readers concede something to the imperative of coherence and closure but with a heightened sense of the poem's responses to the instability of lang. and the provisionality of form. This approach to close reading has been applied to much mod. and contemp. poetry in Eng. and other langs.; it is a mainstay of recent discourse about *avant-garde poetics from Europe to Asia to the Americas, as in the work of Perloff and others.

Moretti, a scholar of the novel, has argued for a "distant reading" of that genre to take fuller account of the diversity of international fiction: "the trouble with close reading (in all of its incarnations, from the New Criticism to deconstruction) is that it necessarily depends on an extremely small canon. . . . [Y]ou invest so much in individual texts only if you think that very few of them really matter." Moretti's view has heralded a reassessment of close reading in poetry, not so much to discard it—the procedure remains an article of faith for nearly all readers and critics—as to place it in historical context and consider its antecedents and alternatives.

See EXPLICATION, FORMALISM.

■ J. C. Ransom, The New Criticism (1941); Brooks and Warren; R. Brower and R. Poirier, In Defense of Reading (1963); S. Fish, Surprised by Sin: The Reader in "Paradise Lost" (1967); K. Burke, "Symbolic Action in a Poem by Keats," A Grammar of Motives (1969); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); H. Vendler, The Music of What Happens (1988); R. Poirier, Poetry and Pragmatism (1992); W. Dowling, The Senses of the Text (1999); F. Moretti, "Conjectures on World Literature," New Left Review 1 (2000)—developed in Graphs, Maps, Trees (2005); Close Reading, ed. F. Lentricchia and A. DuBois (2003); M. Perloff, Differentials (2004); J. Gang, "Behaviorism and the Beginnings of Close Reading," ELH 78 (2011).

T. GARDNER

CLOSE RHYME (Ger. Schlagreim, "hammer rhyme"). Two contiguous or close words that rhyme. Common in idioms, proverbs, and formulaic expressions, close rhyme is one of only three modes for forming reduplicatives (binomial word pairs), these modes being identical repetition (e.g., beep beep), ablaut change (zig-zag, clip-clop, tick-tock), and *rhyme (mumbo jumbo). Close-rhymed formulas in doublet form are legion: hobnob, hubbub, humdrum, harum-scarum, hodgepodge, helter-skelter, double trouble, true blue. They also come in trinomials—fair and square, wear and tear, near and dear, high and dry, make or break, only the lonely. Slightly longer formulas—e.g., put the pedal to the metal—almost automatically become metrical (this one a trochaic tetrameter) and thus cross into poetry itself, where such figuration was often treated as one or another form of internal rhyme or else that kind of spaced repetition-with-a-difference treated in cl. rhet. as *polyptoton. Wilhelm Grimm maintained that poetic end rhyme itself arose from such rhymed formulas as these. Close rhyming in poetry thus may be seen to cover a small range from tight forms, e.g., T. S. Eliot's "Words after speech reach / Into silence" (one of a dozen examples in Four Quartets) or E. A. Poe's "Thrilled me, filled me" ("The Raven") to whole lines. Its compacting effect can also be gained by shortening the lengths of the lines, as in the *Skeltonic and in much *heterometric verse: John Donne has "And swear / Nowhere / Lives a woman true, and fair" ("Song"). In G. M. Hopkins, the technique is all but universal; the effect is that much weight is redistributed from the line ends back into the lines, delivering the maximum amount of force through the entire line. Close rhyme can even be obtained, and concealed, by breaking over line end, as in Louis MacNeice's "The sunlight on the gardens / Hardens and grows cold." The device actuates *echo verse. Close rhyme is also common in popular song lyrics. According to Krims, the dense, close "rhyme complex" is a key feature of rap music: "Notable in many speech-effusive performances are large numbers of syllables rhyming together, so that once a rhyme is established, quite a few rhyming syllables will be produced before the next series of rhymes begins." Krims cites such rap artists as Big Pun(isher), Bone Thugs 'N' Harmony, Nas, Ras Kass, and Raekwon in his Only Built 4 Cuban Linx (1995). Close rhyme creates stylistic power in much spoken-word poetry performance, as well (as in Saul Williams's "Scared Money").

See HIP-HOP POETICS, INTERNAL RHYME, NEAR RHYME, POETRY SLAM.

■ A. Krims, Rap Music and the Poetics of Identity (2000); S. Williams, The Inevitable Rise and Liberation of Niggy Tardust (2008).

T.V.F. BROGAN; L. R. SPAAR

CLOSET DRAMA. Drama supposedly intended to be read in the study (closet) or recited to a private audience rather than performed on a public stage. The term is problematic, however, as it originates from the 19th c. and has since been applied retrospectively to earlier times when definitions of "performance" were not as standardized as they now are. In the 1st c. CE, Seneca wrote plays for private declamation at a time when the Neronian stage was dominated by mimes and tumblers; his closet dramas are highly rhetorical and focus far more on lang. than on action—a pattern his successors would imitate. Yet it is difficult to divorce closet drama entirely from the stage: Seneca's works were performed in the Elizabethan period and influenced the stage dramas of Thomas Kyd and Christopher Marlowe. During the same era, literary coteries produced similarly rhetorical plays; the form may be credited for enabling women such as Elizabeth Cary and Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke, the opportunity to write drama in an age that banned Englishwomen from acting. Later, though John Milton explicitly stated that his Samson Agonistes was never intended for performance, dramatists such as Thomas Killigrew turned to closet drama when the public theaters were closed during the Eng. Civil War and Interregnum.

Several 19th-c. poets hearkened back to the cl. era in writing verse dramas explicitly intended for private reading or recitation. In Manfred and Cain, Lord Byron set out a "metaphysical drama" intentionally unsuited for stage representation, while P. B. Shelley experimented with both neo-Elizabethan tragedy in The Cenci and "lyrical drama" in Prometheus Unbound. In 1811, after a number of unsuccessful attempts to write drama, Charles Lamb argued in "On the Tragedies of Shakespeare" that Shakespeare's plays were unsuited for the public stage and best appreciated through reading. In France, Victor Hugo turned from the stage to write for an imagined theater, while Alfred de Musset wrote "armchair" plays. Yet here, too, the difficulty of separating closet drama from the stage becomes apparent: some of de Musset's plays were eventually staged, and J. W. Goethe's Faust, now one of the most frequently performed dramas in Ger., was originally composed as a closet drama. Later examples include Robert Browning's Paracelsus, Matthew Arnold's Empedocles upon Etna, and Thomas Hardy's The Dynasts, while 20th-c. poets such as W. B. Yeats, T. S. Eliot, and Christopher Fry wrote verse dramas for the stage that have been far more often read than performed. In 2010, Sylvia Plath's 1962 play Three Women was staged in London despite the text's lack of named characters and dialogue. The genre, thus, opens up multiple questions about the nature of dramatic paradigms and conventions.

See DRAMATIC POETRY.

■ F. L. Lucas, Seneca and Elizabethan Tragedy (1922); D. Donoghue, The Third Voice (1959); C. Affron, A Stage for Poets (1971); T. Otten, The Deserted Stage (1972); A. Richardson, A Mental Theater (1988); J. R. Heller, Coleridge, Lamb, Hazlitt, and the Reader of Drama (1990); D.B.J. Randall, Winter Fruit (1995); Readings in Renaissance Women's Drama, ed. S. P. Cerasano and M. Wynne-Davies (1998); K. Raber, Dramatic Difference (2001).

A. G. BENNETT

CLOSURE. Refers most broadly to the manner in which texts end or the qualities characterizing their conclusions. More specifically, the term "poetic closure" is used to refer to the achievement of an effect of finality, resolution, and stability at the end of a poem. In the latter sense, closure appears to be a generally valued quality, the achievement of which is not confined to the poetry of any particular period or nation. Its modes and the techniques by which it is secured do, however, vary in accord with stylistic, particularly structural, variables.

Closural effects are primarily a function of the reader's perception of a poem's total structure; i.e., they involve his or her experience of the relation of the concluding portion of a poem to the entire composition. The generating principles that constitute a poem's formal and thematic structure arouse continuously changing sets of expectations, which elicit various hypotheses from a reader concerning the poem's immediate direction and ultimate design. Successful closure occurs when, at the end of a poem, the reader is left without residual expectations: his or her developing hypotheses have been confirmed and validated (or, in the case of "surprise" endings, the unexpected turn has been accommodated and justified retrospectively), and he or she is left with a sense of the poem's completeness, which is to say of the integrity of his or her own experience of it and the appropriateness of its cessation at that point.

Closure may be strengthened by specifically terminal features in a poem, i.e., things that happen at the end of it. These include the repetition and balance of formal elements (as in *alliteration and *parallelism), explicit allusions to finality and repose, and the terminal return, after a deviation, to a previously established structural "norm" (e.g., a metrical norm). Closural failures (e.g., *anticlimax) usually involve factors that leave the reader with residual expectations. They may also arise from weak or incompatible structural principles or from a stylistic discrepancy between the structure of the poem and its mode of closure. Weak closure may, however, be deliberately cultivated: much modernist poetry shares with modernist works in other genres and art forms a tendency toward apparent anticlosure, rejecting strong closural effects in favor of irresolution, incompleteness, and a quality of "openness." *Language poet Lyn Hejinian, e.g., advocates a "rejection of closure" and the creation of "open text" that "emphasizes or foregrounds process" and actively engages the reader. One can profitably compare and contrast the self-consciously disruptive rejection of closure as it operates in mod. Western poetry with a long-standing Chinese poetics of incompleteness and suggestiveness.

See ORGANICISM.

■ B. H. Smith, Poetic Closure: A Study of How Poems End (1968); P. Hamon, "Clausules," Poétique 24 (1975); Concepts of Closure, spec. iss. of YFS 67 (1984); L. Hejinian, "The Rejection of Closure," Poetics Jour. 4 (1985); Y. Ye, Chinese Poetic Closure (1996); J. E. Vincent, Queer Lyrics: Difficulty and Closure in American Poetry (2002).

B. H. SMITH; A. WATSON

COBLA. The usual word for "stanza" in Occitan. It is also used, either alone or in the expression cobla esparsa (isolated stanza), to designate a poem consisting in its entirety of a single stanza. These coblas are fairly common from the end of the 12th c. on. In theme, they are usually like miniature sirventes*, and, in their concision, they represent the troubadours' closest approach to the epigram. It often happened that a cobla would inspire an answering cobla, and this might well follow the metrical structure of the first, in which case the resultant combination resembles a short tenso.

See OCCITAN POETRY.

■ Jeanroy, v. 1; C. Leube, GRLMA 2.1B.67 ff.; E. Poe, "'Cobleiarai, car mi platz': The Role of the Cobla in the Occitan Lyric Tradition," Medieval Lyric, ed. W. D. Paden (2000).

F. M. CHAMBERS

COCKNEY SCHOOL OF POETRY. A derisive epithet applied to a group of writers associated with London, incl. Leigh Hunt, John Keats, and William Hazlitt, in a series of hostile articles signed by "Z" in Blackwood's Magazine beginning in October 1817. The attacks are attributed to John Wilson Croker and John Gibson Lockhard, who charge the "school" with "vulgar" diction, "loose, nerveless versification," and "Cockney rhymes," e.g., Keats's rhyming of "thorns" with "fawns" in "Sleep and Poetry" and of "Thalia" with "higher" in "To * * * *" [Georgiana Augusta Wylie, afterward Mrs. George Keats]. The reviewers' hostility is patently motivated both by the group's association with political and social radicalism and by class bias. The writers are accused of having founded a "Cockney school of versification, morality, and politics," and the humble origins of Keats and Hunt are stressed, while P. B. Shelley, though a "Cockney" in politics, is excused for his "genius" and aristocratic birth. Croker adopted the "Cockney" term in his notorious attack on Keats's Endymion in the Quarterly Review for April 1818.

See DIALECT POETRY, LAKE SCHOOL.

■ W. J. Bate, John Keats (1963); J. O. Hayden, The Romantic Reviewers (1969); W. Keach, "Cockney Couplets," SIR 25 (1986); D. Wu, "Keats and the 'Cockney School,'" The Cambridge Companion to Keats, ed. S. Wolfson (2001); J. Cox, Poetry and Politics in the Cockney School (2004); D. Gigante, The Keats Brothers (2011).

A. RICHARDSON; D. J. ROTHMAN

CODEWORK. A term used by new media practitioners and theorists to describe digital writing in which normally invisible lang. addressed to a computer's operating system appears on the screen with lang. addressed to human interpreters. As practiced by such poets as Mez (Mary-Anne Breeze), John Cayley, Talan Memmott, Alan Sondheim, and Ted Warnell and theorized by Cayley, Memmott, Sondheim, and such critics as N. Katherine Hayles and Rita Raley, codework foregrounds for analysis the human-machine interaction, event, or performance that constitutes digital writing.

In a broad sense, all writing draws on semantic or bibliographic codes that prepare information for display. Electronic writing depends on a tower of programming langs. that includes machine code, assembly code, and such higher-level markup codes as BASIC, Perl, and HTML. These langs. share with natural langs. a complex syntax and grammar, a nuanced semantics, and a specific community or culture of address. As Galloway emphasizes, however, code is the only lang. that is executable: programming lang. sets a computing system into motion. For code writers and some critics alike, discussions of *electronic poetry that fail to account for code miss its most significant feature.

Coined by Sondheim in 2001, the term codework has sparked a series of critical discussions that challenge the illusion that the screen is an isolate or isolable entity, situate machine-addressed code as a part of a digital poem's *"text," position both code and text as artistic compositions, and underscore the temporal unfolding that makes electronic writing an event or *performance rather than an object or *artifact.

Extending Sondheim's taxonomy of codework, which focused on screenic effects, Cayley (2002, 2004, 2006) distinguishes between code that is operational and has depth and code that is marooned at the interface and thereby rendered inoperable. For Cayley, operational or "strong sense" code exhibits an "aesthetics of compilation"; technically nonreferential or nonperformative code, by contrast, risks becoming at best a "decoration or rhetorical flourish" or at worst new media's equivalent of "baroque euphuism."

For Hayles, by contrast, code or code elements that mingle with natural lang. on the screen construct a creole or pidgin whose semantic, epistemological, and poetic resonances voice the synergy between humans and intelligent machines. As exemplified in Hayles's parsing of compounds such as "cell.f" or "I-terminal" from Memmott's "Lexia to Perplexia" and Raley's reading of "m[ez]ang.elle," the "net.wurked" lang. of Mez's "data][h!][bleeding texts," codework's elaborate and self-confident rhet. layers programming vocabulary and punctuation with poetic and theoretical lang. to capture the hybrid subjectivity, cognitive processes, and textual possibilities of networked culture.

Instead of bringing machine-addressed code to the screen or creating a hybrid human-machine lang., Cayley's new media poems use kinetic programming to capture for the interface the pacing and effects of working code. Representative of a form of writing Cayley calls "literal art," such ambient time-based poems as his "riverIsland," "overboard," and "translation" make coding's active and ongoing modulation of signification visible through algorithms that incrementally replace letters of a stable underlying text with similarly shaped letters from different ling. systems. As it moves the source text into and out of legibility, this "transliteral morphing" generates dynamic tapestries of lang. accompanied, in "riverIsland," by QuickTime movies and, in "overboard" and "translation," by Giles Perring's generative music.

Supplementing Cayley's formal and ling. focus, Mez, Memmott, Sondheim, and others use codework to expose and disrupt the proprietary practices and corporate ethos of contemp. information culture. Like the "hactivism" practiced by the Critical Art Ensemble and theorized by Wark, their tactics envision a utopia of layered, multiple, playful, and often subversive signification, the free circulation of information, and an open, improvisatory future.

In its attention to the materiality of lang., contemp. codework remediates for digitality the process-based writing of *avant-gardes from *Oulipo to *Language poetry. Participating with computational and cybertextual poetics in the invention of textual art for networked and programmable media, it explores the human-machine interface, the nature of code, and the role of the intelligent machine in contemp. constructions of subjectivity. And finally, it generates new strategies for making and new frameworks for understanding lang. in a world that is evolving in conjunction with the code-based operations of intelligent machines.

See COMPUTATIONAL POETRY, CYBERTEXT.

■ Electronic Sources: T. Memmott, "Lexia to Perplexia" (2000), http://collection.eliterature.org/1/works/memmott__lexia_to_perplexia.html; J. Cayley, "The Code is not the Text (unless it is the Text)," electronic book review (2002), http://www.electronicbookreview.com/thread/electropoetics/literal; Mez, "data][h!][bleeding texts" (2002), http://netwurkerz.de/mez/datableed/complete/; R. Raley, "Interferences: [Net.Writing] and the Practice of Codework," electronic book review (2002), http://www.electronicbookreview.com/thread/electropoetics/net.writing; J. Cayley, with Giles Perring and Douglas Cape "overboard," (2004), http://homepage.mac.com/shadoof/net/in/overboard.html; J. Cayley, with Giles Perring, "translation" (2004), http://collection.eliterature.org/1/works/cayley__translation.html; and J. Cayley, "riverIsland," version 1.2 (2008), http://homepage.mac.com/shadoof/net/in/riverisland.html.

■ Printed Sources: Critical Art Ensemble, Digital Resistance (2001); A. Sondheim, "Introduction: Codework," American Book Review 22 (2001); A. R. Galloway, Protocol (2004); M. Wark, A Hacker Manifesto (2004); N. K. Hayles, My Mother Was a Computer (2005); J. Cayley, "Time Code Language: New Media Poetics and Programmed Signification," and N. K. Hayles, "The Time of Digital Poetry: From Object to Event," New Media Poetics, ed. A. Morris and T. Swiss (2006); N. K. Hayles, Electronic Literature (2008).

A. MORRIS

COGNITIVE POETICS. One branch of the rapidly growing field of cognitive lit. crit. further divided by Alan Richardson into cognitive rhet., cognitive narratology, cognitive aesthetics of reception, cognitive materialism, and evolutionary literary theory. It grew in the 1970s–80s out of *structuralism, Slavic *formalism (incl. *Russian formalism), generative ling., *New Criticism, and Gestalt theory. Cognitive poetics is an interdisciplinary approach to the study of lit., employing the tools of cognitive psychology, psycholinguistics, artificial intelligence, and certain branches of ling. and philosophy. These investigate information-processing activities during the acquisition, organization, and use of knowledge, incl. perceptual and emotional processes. Cognitive poetics explores how poetic lang. and form are shaped and constrained by cognitive processes.

Cognitive poetics has taken two main directions. Gestalt-oriented cognitive poetics, developed by Barbara Herrnstein Smith and Reuven Tsur, focuses on meaning, *affect, perceived qualities, and *versification. Meaning-oriented cognitive poetics is based on George Lakoff and Mark Johnson's notions of "embodied mind" and conceptual *metaphor, as well as on Mark Turner and Gilles Fauconnier's "blending."

Cognitive poetics can deal with issues traditional poetics is unable to handle. A work of lit. may have emotive content as well as display an emotional quality. Poetic effects may arise from the subtle interaction of versification and elements on the syntactic, figurative, and "world" levels of the poem, combined in a variety of ways. Weak gestalts typically display emotional qualities; strong gestalts generate rational or witty qualities. A special combination of weak gestalts with a more than usually regular *meter may produce a hypnotic quality. Similarly, interacting semantic features in metaphors may yield relatively diffuse or focused gestalts. In synaesthetic metaphors, perceived qualities are governed mainly by direction of transfer and by the presence or absence of stable visual shapes. "Upward" transfer (from less to more differentiated senses) is more frequent (and probably more natural) than "downward" transfer in Western langs. as well as in Chinese, in both colloquial and poetic lang.: "soft color" is more natural than "bright touch." Operating on this principle, John Donne uses "loud perfume" (Elegie 4, "The Perfume") to achieve metaphysical wit. Or we might consider the line:

> And taste the music of that vision pale.
> (John Keats, "Isabella" 49)

Here, many readers sense an impassioned, uncanny atmosphere. The verse contains a double, upward intersense transfer: the line speaks of "vision" in terms of "music" and "music" in terms of "taste." The word vision denotes an abstraction that has no stable visual shape. Unlike sight, it suggests not only the thing seen but also an impassioned state of mind with supernatural connotations. The paleness of the vision may be associated with the paleness of the dead, Isabella, or the moonlit scene, but none of these is explicitly mentioned; nor can they usurp each other's place, yielding a diffuse quality of paleness. The interaction of "music" and "vision" deletes the "auditory" feature in "music," which turns the gestalt-free "vision" into a pleasant fusion of percepts, imbued with delicate energy expanding toward the perceiving self. The interaction of "taste" with "music" deletes the "gustatory" feature, foregrounding such meaning components as direct perception of reality, some fine texture or elusive quality. The upward transfer from the less differentiated senses enhances the indistinctness of the fused sensations. Then we have the case of another line by Keats:

> The same bright face I tasted in my sleep
> (Endymion 1.895)

This excerpt also applies the verb taste to an object derived from a higher sense and should be perceived as smooth and natural. However, it makes a very different impression: Stephen Ullmann considered it "a strange phrase." Generating an emotional quality requires fusion into a soft focus. Stable, characteristic visual shapes (like the shape of face) tend to resist such fusion (or "tasting") and render synaesthetic metaphors less natural and wittier, whereas "thing-free" qualities facilitate fusion.

In considering poetic *rhythm, cognitive poetics assumes three dimensions: versification pattern, linguistic pattern, and *performance. When the first two patterns conflict, they are accommodated in a rhythmical performance such that both are perceptible simultaneously. A deviant linguistic stress intrudes upon meter, generating tension that is relieved at the next point in which the versification and linguistic patterns have a coinciding downbeat; here meter becomes fresh and new. The line is a system that determines the character of its parts. According to *generative metrics, a stress maximum in a weak position violates metricality; according to cognitive poetics, it increases tension, provided that the integrity of the whole is preserved in perception through performance.

Cognitive poetics also pays particular attention to speech sounds. As opposed to impressionistic "chatter," speech research provides systematic arguments concerning phonetic symbolism. Speech sounds are transmitted by rich precategorial auditory information, which is immediately recoded into phonetic categories and excluded from awareness. We perceive only a unitary phonetic category as i or u. In the poetic mode of speech perception, we can tell that u is somehow lower and darker than i because recoding has been delayed and some of the lingering precategorical auditory information subliminally reaches awareness: the second formant of u is lower than i (formants are concentrations of overtones that uniquely determine vowels), and the first two formants of u are nearer one another, less easily discernible, than those of i. *Rhyme and *alliteration direct attention to the lingering auditory information, which normally serves to preserve verbal material in active memory for efficient processing. Here it serves a different—aesthetic—end: when attention is directed to the lingering auditory information, it becomes musicality.

Cognitive poetics as an interdisciplinary endeavor faces the danger of restating in cognitive or neurological lang. what can be stated in traditional critical terms. To avoid reductionism, cognitive or neurological lang. can be justified only when the problems cannot be properly handled without appealing to some cognitive or neurological process or mechanism.

■ General: E. D. Snyder, Hypnotic Poetry (1930)—an early instance; S. Ullmann, "Panchronistic Tendencies in Synaesthesia," The Principles of Semantics, 266–89 (1957); B. Herrnstein Smith, Poetic Closure (1968); M. Turner, Death Is the Mother of Beauty (1987); R. W. Gibbs, The Poetics of Mind (1994): M. Turner, The Literary Mind (1996); Y. Shen, "Cognitive Constraints on Poetic Figures," Cognitive Linguistics 8 (1997); M. T. Crane and A. Richardson, "Literary Studies and Cognitive Science," Mosaic 32 (1999); G. Lakoff and M. Johnson, Philosophy in the Flesh (1999); E. Scarry, Dreaming by the Book (1999); M. T. Crane, Shakespeare's Brain (2001); "Models of Figurative Language, Metaphor and Symbol," Metaphor and Symbol 16, ed. R. Giora (2001); G. Fauconnier and M. Turner, The Way We Think (2002); "Literature and the Cognitive Revolution," PoT 23, ed. A. Richardson and F. F. Steen (2002); Cognitive Stylistics, ed. E. Semino and J. Culpepper (2002); P. Stockwell, Cognitive Poetics: An Introduction (2002); Cognitive Poetics in Practice, ed. J. Gavins and G. Steen (2003); P. C. Hogan, Cognitive Science, Literature, and the Arts (2003); "The Cognitive Turn? A Debate on Interdisciplinarity," PoT 24, ed. M. Sternberg (2003); N. Yu, "Synaesthetic Metaphor," Journal of Literary Semantics 32 (2003); A. Richardson, "Studies in Literature and Cognition," The Work of Fiction, ed. A. Richardson and E. Spolsky (2004); R. Tucker, "Consciousness and Literature," Journal of Consciousness Studies 11 (2004); M. H. Freeman, "Cognitive Linguistics and Literary Studies," The Handbook of Cognitive Linguistics, ed. H. Cuyckens and D. Geeraerts (2005); M. K. Hiraga, Metaphor and Iconicity (2005); European Journal of English Studies 9, ed. M. Toolan and J. J. Weber (2005); A. Elfenbein, "Cognitive Science and the History of Reading," PMLA 121 (2006); D. S. Miall, Literary Reading (2006); C. Emmott, A. J. Sanford, E. J. Dawydiak, "Stylistics Meets Cognitive Science," Style 41 (2007); P. C. Hogan, "The Brain in Love: A Case Study in Cognitive Neuroscience and Literary Theory," Journal of Literary Theory 1 (2007); R. Tsur, Toward a Theory of Cognitive Poetics (1992; 2008); *Cognitive Poetics: Goals, Gains and Gap*s, ed. G. Brône and J. Vandaele (2009).

■ Selected Web Sites: Cognitive Approaches to Literature, http://www.ucs.louisiana.edu/~cxr1086/coglit/; Coglit, http://coglit.13pirates.org/coglit/; Literature, Cognition, and the Brain, http://www2.bc.edu/~richarad/lcb/home.html; Miall, http://www.ualberta.ca/~dmiall/; Tsur, http://www.tau.ac.il/~tsurxx/index.html; Turner, http://markturner.org/

R. Tsur; T. Sovran

COLLAGE (Fr. coller, "to glue"). Refers to an abstract visual artwork in which the artist juxtaposes disparate media and various textures, affixing them to a single pictorial surface. Collage entered the descriptive vocabulary of art crit. in the second decade of the 20th c. As a compositional technique in painting, collage was among the innovations that distinguished later (synthetic) cubism from earlier (analytic) cubism. Synthetic cubist paintings included, e.g., fragments of newsprint headlines, bits of string, and other materials. (Georges Braque first included pieces of wallpaper in charcoal drawings; later, the Ger. artist Kurt Schwitters began making his famed abstract collage works incorporating found objects and alluding, often, to contemp. events; this work is known as Merz; see AVANT-GARDE POETICS.)

Collage migrated almost immediately to the lexicon of poetry and poetics, esp. among Fr.- and Eng.-lang. writers: after World War I, poets and critics alike began using the term to describe poems or series of poems built out of abrupt textual juxtapositions, newsprint transcriptions or headlines, direct prose quotations, and so forth. Thus, where the related combinatorial form of *pastiche relies on the imitation of an established voice or style, collage relies on visible textual collocation. For one example in the U.S. context, W. C. Williams's long poem Paterson (1946–58) includes transcriptions of historical documents, letters, and anecdotes that maintain the margins of prose and appear in a smaller typeface than the lyric sections.

The quick adoption of collage as a poetics term marks a nearly simultaneous instance of how the Horatian analogy ut pictura poesis* (as in painting, so in poetry) analogy continued to inform poetry and poetry crit. in the 20th c. As with all analogies, however, collage ought not to be applied or assumed too easily. While the poetic practices of excerption, juxtaposition, and quotation bear a suggestive formal relationship to the cutting and pasting of a visual collage, the material of a collage poem remains semantic and textual.

■ Fragments—Incompletion and Discontinuity, ed. L. D. Kritzman and J. P. Plottel (1981); M. Perloff, "The Invention of Collage," The Futurist Moment (1986); E. Adamowicz, Surrealist Collage in Text and Image (1998); B. Taylor, Collage (2004); P. McBride, "The Game of Meaning: Collage, Montage, and Parody in Kurt Schwitters' Merz," Modernism/Modernity 14 (2007).

C. BOWEN

COLOMBIA, POETRY OF. While recent studies of Colombian poetry include the voices of pre-Columbian peoples, their legends, *chants, and poems were gathered by scholars in the last 50 years. These chants belong to the U'wa, Cuna, Kogi, Mwiska, Huitoto, Guahibo, and Desana tribes, among others. Despite their ethnographic value, the oral poems of these indigenous peoples have had little effect on the formation of a Colombian poetic trad., which is based on Sp. lang. and culture.

The chronicler Juan de Castellanos (1522–1606) is considered the first Colombian poet. His monumental Ren. *epic Elegías de Varones Ilustres de Indias (Elegies of Illustrious Men, 1589, first part), contains 113,609 *hendecasyllabic verses in octavas reales (see OTTAVA RIMA), celebrating the heroic deeds of the Sp. conquerors in northern South America and the Caribbean. The later colonial period, from the late 16th to the 18th c., reflects the influence of Sp. *baroque culture. Born in Colombia, Hernando Domínguez Camargo (1606–59) is the best representative of this period. His masterpiece is San Ignacio de Loyola, Fundador de la Compañía de Jesús: Poema Heroyco (Saint Ignatius of Loyola, Founder of the Society of Jesus: A Heroic Poem, 1666). Domínguez Camargo brought Gongorist verse (in the vein of the Sp. poet Luis de Góngora), marked by the use of *hyperbaton, elaborate *metaphor, and cl. references. The nun Sor Francisca Josefa del Castillo y Guevara (1671–1742) is one of the most important women writers of the colonial period. She is the author of the Catholic mystical book Afectos espirituales (Spiritual Feelings, 1843), which includes prose and verse, and an autobiographical Vida (Life, 1817). In the 18th c., the most important Colombian poet was Francisco Vélez Ladrón de Guevara (1721–81?). Mainly a poet of the viceregal court, Ladrón de Guevara wrote an elegant and crafted verse with a *rococo influence, such as Octavario a la Inmaculada Concepción (1774).

Across Sp. America, the beginning of the 19th c. was marked by revolutionary movements against the colonial powers. In Colombia, the opposition to Sp. rule united many intellectuals and writers, incl. the poet José Fernández Madrid (1789–1830), who signed the document of Cartagena declaring independence (1811) and was persecuted and exiled by the Spaniards. His Poesías (1822) appeared during his exile in Cuba. He is considered a romantic liberal, the link between the neoclassical current of the 18th c. and the romantic movement of the 19th (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS, ROMANTICISM). Another important poet of this period is Luis Vargas Tejada (1802–29). A precocious intellectual, polyglot, and author of tragedies, comedies, and lyric poetry, he was consumed by the political events of his time. His neoclassical poems were published in the book Poesías de Caro y Vargas Tejada (1857).

Although the romantic period in Colombia lacked the resonance that it had in Europe, it represented a change in poetic attitudes and themes. Proof of this is the presence in prose and poetry of certain motifs: nature, freedom, and the faith in the individual as owner of his destiny. José Eusebio Caro (1817–53) is one of the most important Colombian poets of this period. Because of his agitated political life and early death, his poems were published only posthumously in the aforementioned volume with Vargas Tejada (1857) and Obras escogidas (Selected Works, 1873). Caro is considered a precursor of fin de siècle modernismo*.

Rafael Pombo (1833–1912) is perhaps the best representative of the romantic period in Colombia. His poetry, highly passionate and obscure, includes two of the best known poems in Colombian lit. hist., "Hora de tinieblas" (Hour of Darkness) and "Noche de diciembre" (December Night). Miguel Antonio Caro (1843– 1909), like Rufino José Cuervo (1844–1911), was an important philologist and grammarian. He is praised as a conservative poet who rejected the advances of Sp. Am. modernismo and looked for an ideal, almost mystical form of poetry. Horas de amor (Hours of Love, 1871) and Poesías (1896) are his most important books.

In 1886 in Bogotá, José María Rivas Groot (1863–1923) published an extensive anthol. of Colombian poets, La Lira Nueva (The New Lyre), seeking to indicate new directions. Thirty-three poets are included, among them Ismael Enrique Arciniegas (1865–1938), Candelario Obeso (1849–84), Carlos Arturo Torres (1867–1911), Julio Flórez (1867–1923), José Asunción Silva (1865–96), and Groot himself.

Silva is one of the leading figures of modernismo. Although his poetry is linked to the romantic period, it represents a breakthrough in Colombian poetry, unifying form, theme, and music. Silva employed an ample variety of poetic forms according to Sp. trad. as well as the resources of the Fr. symbolist movement (see SYMBOLISM). His books were published posthumously.

Two of the poets included in La Lira Nueva deserve special attention: Obeso and Flórez. Obeso is among the first Sp. Am. poets to bring Afro-Caribbean diction into Sp. For the Colombian people more than for scholars, Flórez epitomizes the honorific poet*, despite his late romanticism and formalism.

Within modernismo, Guillermo Valencia (1873–1943) epitomizes the highly intellectual poet with a vast knowledge of forms and themes. His books include Ritos (Rites, 1899) and Sus mejores poemas (His Best Poems, 1926). Porfirio Barba Jacob (1883–1938) represents the *poète maudit. A vagabond, drug addict, and homosexual, Barba Jacob defied Colombian society even as he published some of the better known poems of the period. His work mixed a very personal romantic tendency with modernist forms. Notable volumes are Rosas negras (Black Roses, 1933) and Canciones y elegías (Songs and Elegies, 1933). Another popular poet of this period is Luis Carlos López (1879–1950). His poetry, sarcastic and humoristic, centers on Cartagena, his native city. López's poetry departs from the main trad. in favor of colloquial and direct lang. that borders on prosaic. His books include De mi villorio (From My Town, 1908) and Por el atajo (Easy Way Out, 1920).

Best known for his novel La Vorágine (The Vortex), José Eustacio Rivera (1889–1928) is a modernist poet in the line of *Parnassianism, cl. in form but not completely detached from emotion. His only book was Tierra de promisión (Promised Land, 1921). Contemporary with Rivera, Eduardo Castillo (1889–1938) published his books Duelo lírico (Lyric Grief, 1918) and El árbol que canta (The Singing Tree, 1927) in a symbolist aesthetic.

In 1925, the literary magazine Los nuevos (The New Ones) appeared in Bogotá, featuring a large group of young Colombian poets and writers. While it was not aligned with the contemporaneous *avant-garde movements in Europe and Latin America, the jour. sought to bring a change to the literary climate of the country. León de Greiff (1895–1976) was the most important poet of this group. With a very personal voice and a practice derived from Fr. symbolism and the avant-garde, De Greiff published several important volumes, incl. Tergiversaciones de Leo Legris, Matías Aldecoa y Gaspar (Tergiversations on Leo Legris, Matías Aldecoa, and Gaspar, 1923) and Libro de los signos (Book of Signs, 1930). In contrast with de Greiff, Rafael Maya (1898–1980), another poet of Los nuevos, dedicated his life to a conservative poetics combining romanticism and modernismo in search of cl. forms.

With his book of poems Suenan timbres (Bells Sound, 1926), Luis Vidales (1900–90) introduced the avant-garde into the Colombian trad. The book was to resound in the years to come, esp. for the poets of the 1960s. After Suenan timbres Vidales changed his tone and wrote poetry of social commitment. Another poet linked to Los nuevos was Jorge Zalamea (1905–69). Known for his exemplary trans. of Saint-John Perse, his work—esp. El sueño de las escalinatas (Dream of the Staircases, 1964)—follows the same discursive and incantatory line, although with a political militancy.

During the 1930s, Sp. Am. poetry developed experimental works and innovative approaches based on *surrealism, *cubism, *creationism, and other movements, both local and imported. Colombian poetry, however, took a more conservative approach, strengthening its relation with traditional Sp. poetry. The product of these ideas was a group called Piedra y Cielo (Stone and Sky), which took its name from a book of the Sp. poet Juan Ramón Jiménez. Aurelio Arturo (1906–74) was regularly associated with this group, although his poetry does not greatly resemble the others. In spite of his restrained style, his poetry flows with images, metaphors that illuminate the link between the human and nature (while questioning their existence), and exaltations of love. After the surge of the avant-gardes in the 1960s, Arturo had perhaps the greatest influence on other Colombian poets. He wrote few poems, collected in Morada al Sur (Southern Dwelling, 1975).

Eduardo Carranza (1913–85) is the most representative poet of Piedra y Cielo. While conservative and traditional, his verses manifest some traces of the Chilean poet Vicente Huidobro's creationism. The other poets of the school were Arturo Camacho Ramírez (1910–82), Jorge Rojas (1911–95), Tomás Vargas Osorio (1908–41), Darío Samper (1909–84), Gerardo Valencia (1911–94), and Carlos Martín (1914–2008).

With the poets who emerged during the 1940s and 1950s, Colombia's conservative trad. suffered a crushing blow. Although they formed no literary group, these poets have been studied as a generation under the name of the literary jour. Mito (Myth), published by Jorge Gaitán Durán (1934–62) in Bogotá after 1955. Gaitán Durán promoted changes in the Colombian intelligentsia, not only with respect to lit. but in the general way of thinking about the nation's problems, esp. the continuous political violence. The poetry of Álvaro Mutis (b. 1923) absorbs the freedom of the avant-garde movements without stridency or obscurity; his important books are Los elementos del desastre (Elements of Disaster, 1953) and Summa de Maqroll el Gaviero (The Summa of Maqroll el Gaviero, 1973). Fernando Charry Lara (1920–2004), another poet of the Mito generation, condenses several currents of mod. poetry to find a highly particular voice between the obscure and the transparent.

The other poets of this generational cohort are Eduardo Cote Lamus (1928–64), Héctor Rojas Herazo (1921–2002), Fernando Arbeláez (1924–95), and Rogelio Echavarría (b. 1926). Cote Lamus is a conceptual poet, with an introspective and conservative vision of existence. Arbeláez produces a sober poetry with a narrative logic and a universal vision. Rojas Herazo is an exuberant poet, with a strong voice that echoes contemp. colloquialisms. Echavarría's poetry—somber, with a strange beauty—is concentrated in the daily life of the anonymous passersby who populate big cities. His most important book is El transeunte (The Transient, 1964).

Close to this group is Carlos Obregón (1929–1963). His life as well as his poetry distanced itself from the Colombian literary world because of his voluntary exile in the United States and Europe. He wrote short, reflective poems with mystical tendencies. His books are Distancia destruida (Destroyed Distance, 1957) and Estuario (Estuary, 1961).

Before the 1960s, Colombian poetry by women was scarce. Two exceptions are Maruja Vieira (b. 1922) and Dora Castellanos (b. 1924), who wrote often in traditional forms about love.

The convulsive 1960s brought drastic changes in how poets approached poetry, not only from the intellectual but from the existential point of view. The lack of a local avant-garde movement and the continuous political violence made possible the emergence of a group of poets and writers that directly challenged the order and direction of Colombian lit. This group, called Nadaísmo (Nothingism), was composed mainly of poets. It had no explicit aesthetic or literary program; its only agenda was complete freedom. The most important poets were Gonzalo Arango (1931–76), Jaime Jaramillo Escobar (b. 1932), Mario Rivero (1935–2009), Jota Mario Arbeláez (b. 1940), Amilkar Osorio (1940–85), Eduardo Escobar (b. 1943), and Armando Romero (b. 1944).

With the slogan "we are geniuses, crazy and dangerous," Arango led the movement. Mainly a prose writer, his scarce poetry was always incendiary, colloquial, and discursive. Arango never collected his poems. A complete selection of them can be seen in the Antología del Nadaísmo (2009).

Although he rejected his affiliation with the nadaísta group, Rivero figured in the two main anthols. of this group and was recognized for years as a member. His poetry, colloquial and direct, looks for simplicity in the daily life of the urban dweller. Among his books are Poemas urbanos (Urban Poems, 1966) and Baladas (1980). Jaramillo Escobar's poems, obscure and transparent at the same time, deal with love, violence, and death, although with a humorous and ironic attitude. His books include Los poemas de la ofensa (Poems of Offense, 1968) and Poemas de tierra caliente (Poems of the Hot Land, 1985). Arbeláez's poetry is marked by a colloquial rhythm that borders on the *prose poem. It combines witty humor with surreal metaphors and word plays, dealing with love, sex, and violence. His books include El profeta en su casa (Prophet in His House, 1966) and Mi reino por este mundo (My Kingdom in This World, 1980). Osorio cultivated a baroque poetry, learned and conceptual, in only one book, Vana Stanza, diván selecto (Vain Stanza: Selected Divan, 1984). Escobar's poetry, such as his first books La invención de la uva (The Invention of the Grape, 1966) and Monólogos de Noé (Monologues of Noah, 1967), is colloquial and irreverent, concerned with love and political topics. Romero's books include El poeta de vidrio (The Glass Poet, 1979) and A vista del tiempo (A View of Time, 2005).

Contemp. to the nadaístas were three poets who, in spite of a personal voice, followed the moderate character of traditional Colombian poetry. They reinstate its conservative trend. Giovanni Quessep (b. 1939) is a formalist poet who returns to symbolism for musical and verbal elements, which he will transform in incantatory and obscure poems where lyric and narrative become intertwined. José Manuel Arango (1937–2002) was a rigorous poet of brevity and musicality. His first books appeared late in life: Este lugar de la noche (This Place of Night, 1973) and Signos (Signs, 1978). Jaime García Maffla (b. 1944) is a philosophical and religious poet. His poems, cathedrals of lang., are obscure and liturgical.

During the 1970s, another group of poets, called by critics the Generación sin nombre (Generation without a Name), confronted the nadaístas. This challenge was not aesthetic or programmatic, since these poets also espoused freedom of forms and themes, colloquialism, and a questioning of conservative values. Their goal was literary-political, to reshape Colombia's literary world. The critic and poet Juan Gustavo Cobo Borda (b. 1948) was a central figure in remaking the *canon, as in La tradición de la pobreza (The Tradition of Poverty, 1980). His poetry, however, followed the line of nadaísmo (sarcasm, humor, colloquialism) with self-confidence. María Mercedes Carranza (1945–2003) continued the trend of colloquial poetry, rejecting sentimentalism in favor of a direct, common speech. Elkin Restrepo (b. 1942) was linked to the nadaísta group at the beginning of his career, although he distanced himself early in the 1970s. His poetry, ranging from the prose poem to conventional verse, deals with urban life and a nostalgic feeling for the past. His books include Bla, bla, bla (1967) and Retrato de artistas (Portrait of Artists, 1983).

Harold Alvarado Tenorio (b. 1945) is an irreverent poet of love and Colombian society as well as a critic. Among his books are Pensamientos de un hombre llegado el invierno (Thoughts of a Man Come to Winter, 1972) and Recuerda cuerpo (Remember Body, 1983). Close to the nadaísta group in his first years, Juan Manuel Roca (b. 1946) is an independent poet who combines a deep lyricism and direct, almost surreal images. His themes vary from love and everyday life to social issues, without falling into politics or the colloquialisms of his time. His books include Memoria del agua (Memory of Water, 1973) and Luna de ciegos (Moon of the Blind, 1990).

Santiago Mutis (b. 1952), Ramón Cote Baraibar (b. 1963), and Orietta Lozano (b. 1956) represent a group that appeared after the turmoil of the 1960s, opening new avenues for contemp. poetry. Mutis's highly lyrical poetry, notably Tú también eres de lluvia (You Too Are of the Rain, 1982) and Soñadores de pájaros (Dreamers of Birds, 1987), often finds its imagery in paintings. Cote Baraibar is a conservative poet of magisterial craft; his books include Poemas para una fosa común (Poems for a Common Grave, 1983) and El confuso trazado de las fundaciones (Confused Plan of the Foundations, 1991). Lozano is a very important voice in the emergence of women's poetry. Her poetry is highly sensual and erotic, a drastic change from the cautious poetry written by most women in the Colombian trad. Her books include Fuego secreto (Secret Fire, 1980) and El vampiro esperado (Expected Vampire, 1987).

See SPAIN, POETRY OF; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ C. A. Caparroso, Dos ciclos de lirismo colombiano (1961); R. Maya, Los orígenes del modernismo en Colombia (1961); A. Holguín, Antología crítica de la poesía colombiana (1874–1974) (1974); J. Arango Ferrer, Horas de literatura colombiana (1978); J. Mejía Duque, Momentos y opciones de la poesía colombiana (1979); A. Romero, Las palabras están en situación (1985); F. Charry Lara, Poesía y poetas colombianos (1986); H. Orjuela, Estudios sobre la literatura indígena y colonial (1986); Historia de la poesía colombiana, ed. M. M. Carranza (1991); R. Echavarría, Quién es quién en la poesía colombiana (1998); J. G. Cobo Borda, Historia de la poesía colombiana (2006).

A. ROMERO

COLON (Gr., "limb, member"). As a metrical term, colon may refer to at least three different things: (1) a metrical or rhythmical unit sometimes divisible into two or three equivalent metra (see METRON) but also capable of functioning alongside cola of a similar or different character as a means of articulating rhythmical sequences that resist division into such metra; (2) a syntactical or rhetorical phrase, usually marked off by punctuation, that combines with comparable phrases to articulate the meaning of a sentence; and (3) the portions of a rhythmical pattern that intervene between any two positions at which word end is significantly more frequent in instantiations of the pattern than its absence. Type 1 cola are rhythmical: basic components of a verse design; type 2 cola are rhetorical: a way of articulating the text of a given instantiation of the design; type 3 cola are verbal-rhythmical: a means of achieving a compromise between the constancy of a given rhythmical design and the large variety of verbal patterns theoretically capable of appearing in its instantiations.

Rhythmical cola are usually what a writer has in mind in discussing those forms in which the colon rather than the metron is felt to be the basic rhythmical unit. Verbal-rhythmical cola appear frequently in discussions of the structure of metric forms such as the Gr. *trimeter, which, in the earliest stages of its devel., is a variable dicolon: either x – ⏑ – x + – ⏑ – x – ⏑ – or x – ⏑ – x – ⏑ + – x – ⏑ –, depending on whether the penthemimeral or hephthemimeral *caesura, one or the other of which was obligatory, appears in the particular line under consideration. It is perfectly possible, however, for this verbal-rhythmical dicolon to be a rhetorical tricolon as well—as in Menander's "O dystyches! O dystyches! O dystyches!" ("Woe! Woe! Woe!" [Dyskolos 574]). Here the first verbal-rhythmical colon ends after the second "O," the first rhetorical one after the first "dystyches." (Compare the structure of the alexandrin ternaire, which shows a rhetorical 4–4–4 grouping of syllables but usually retains the word end after the sixth syllable that allows it to be, like the cl. *alexandrine, a verbal-rhythmical dicolon).

As the number of attested instances of any given design decreases, it becomes increasingly difficult to distinguish rhetorical from verbal-rhythmical cola, and when regular metric structure is absent, the two tend to merge or become confused with rhythmical cola as well. In such situations, the overall verse design may be so irregular that identification of rhythmical units is possible only if one assumes that rhetorical boundaries or recurring verbal boundaries coincide with the boundaries of basic rhythmical units. Proceeding on this assumption, perfectly justified in many instances, has been standard practice, at least since Aristophanes of Byzantium (ca. 250–185 BCE) established his "measuring into cola" (colometria) for the lyric poets and the lyric portions of drama and began the custom of allotting to each colon its separate line of text. It is not valid in all instances, however, and one must reckon with the possibility, first raised by A. M. Dale, that the whole notion of the colon as a basic structural unit analogous to the foot or metron is inappropriate in dealing with certain types of rhythm.

See EPIPLOKE, PERIOD, PUNCTUATION.

■ J. Irigoin, Recherches sur les mètres de la lyrique chorale grecque (1953), with the review by L.P.E. Parker, Bulletin of the Institute of Classical Studies 5 (1958); G. S. Kirk, "The Structure of the Homeric Hexameter," Yale Classical Studies 20 (1966); Dale, "Classification and Terminology" (1968), and "The Metrical Units of Greek Lyric Verse," Collected Papers (1969); West, "Units of Analysis," sec. IB; L. E. Rossi, "Estensione e valore del colon nell' esametro omerico," Struttura e storia dell esametro Greco, ed. M. Fantuzzi and R. Pretagostini (1996); N. Baechle, Metrical Constraint and the Interpretation of Style in the Tragic Trimeter (2007).

A. T. COLE

COLONIAL POETICS

I. Definition
II. Classical and Pre-Enlightenment
III. Post-Enlightenment and Neocolonialism

I. Definition. The term colonial poetics has not been employed systematically in literary and cultural crit. Given this lack of definition, it may be broadly interpreted as any aspect of *poetics that has been affected by conditions of colonialism. Colonialism may be defined as the domination of one political territory over another, whether in the form of settler colonies, unequal trade relations, or any other restrictive political influence. Although colonialism is closely related to the term imperialism, the two refer to distinct aspects of extraterritorial domination. Imperialism, derived from the Lat. imperium, emphasizes the systematic domination of one state over another or many others and often implies an overarching ideological project. Although also derived from a Roman term, in this case for extraterritorial settlements or coloniae, colonialism has come to refer to the ground-level practices of imperial domination, with an emphasis on the cultural and social effects upon the colonized territory. Thus, the term has been limited to those imperial projects that actively seek to effect cultural, religious, and political changes in the dominated territories.

A second problem in the definition of colonialism has been whether and how to distinguish it from postcolonialism (see POSTCOLONIAL POETICS). Although the latter suggests a period after political liberation from colonialism, many critics have argued that this temporal division does not recognize the continuity of the cultural effects of colonialism in the postindependence period. It also obscures the possibility of internal colonialism within the postindependence territory and neocolonialism, i.e., analogous forms of colonialism in the territory even after political independence. Given these problems, Ashcroft et al. have argued that the term postcolonial should be expanded to describe any resistance to colonialism, regardless of whether this occurs during or after formal colonial rule. Colonialism and postcolonialism have been further confused by the fact that critics who have been labeled "postcolonial" have provided the technical vocabulary for the study of colonialism; thus, studies of colonial history often imply a postcolonial critique. For the purposes of this essay, colonialism will be taken in its broadest sense to include cultural manifestations of imperial ideology, colonial practice, and postcolonial critique.

The concept of colonial poetics must be further distinguished from that of colonial discourse, first inaugurated by Said in Orientalism. Whereas colonial discourse has often been associated with imperial domination, the term colonial poetics suggests a system of figural lang., whether or not this is strictly poetic verse, that can resist as well as further the practice of colonialism. Indeed, poetry and poetics have often served in colonial contexts to draw attention to the limits of imperial reason, whether to unmask its power or to contest it with alternative forms of meaning. Since the concept of colonial poetics ultimately applies a Western notion to situations of domination or competition between Western and non-Western cultural systems, however, the term also calls attention to the cross-cultural tensions around poetry, poetic form, and nonanalytic meaning inherent in colonial contexts. In order to outline the specific historical ways in which colonialism and poetics have interacted, this essay follows a chronological division that has divided Eur. colonialism into pre- and post-Enlightenment models. It emphasizes points of similarity between these periods, however, and considers the possibilities of applying the term colonial poetics to neocolonial, non-Western and premod. forms of political domination.

II. Classical and Pre-Enlightenment. Although it could potentially refer to the cultural effects of any large-scale political domination of one state over another, colonialism has most often been associated with Eur. expansion after the 15th c. Initial critiques and theories of colonialism, tied to the post-1945 decolonization of Asia and Africa, were based on post-Enlightenment Brit. and Fr. colonial models. Critics such as Hulme, Dussel, and Mignolo, however, have argued that mod. forms of colonialism began much earlier, with Iberian expansion into Africa, Asia, and, esp., into the Americas. Incl. even earlier empires, such as the Gr., Roman, and Ottoman, within the scope of colonialism has been more contentious, ostensibly because these imperial projects did not involve forced cultural transformation or capitalist economies. Cl. and non-Western philosophy and imperial models, however, have provided Eur. imperialism with many of its framing concepts and practices. Critics have also used theories drawn from later models of colonialism to investigate questions of cultural negotiation and political domination both in med. Europe and in cl. Greece and Rome, without necessarily arguing that these periods were colonialist.

Early mod. Eur. colonialism had its origins in the reconquest of Iberian regions that had been under Islamic rule since 711 and the subsequent economic expansion into Africa. Although the conquest of the Caribbean began in 1492, it was not until after the conquests of the Mexica (Aztec) Empire in 1521 and the Inca Empire in 1532 that the Sp. state began coordinating what until then had been ad hoc colonial practice. One of the strongest models for early mod. imperialist poetics was the cl. *epic. While Luís de Camões's Os Lusíadas (The Lusiads, 1572), narrating Vasco da Gama's voyage to India, and Alonso de Ercilla's La Araucana (The Araucaniad, 1569–89), narrating the Sp. conquest of Chile, are the best-known examples of epic poetry on Iberian imperialist themes, numerous lesser-known epic poems were written to celebrate conquests such as those of the Canary Islands and of Ácoma in New Mexico. Vernacular indigenous poetics have to be reconstructed from postconquest documents and include few examples of poetry that react to Sp. colonization. One exception, included in Miguel León-Portilla's anthol. of indigenous sources on the Sp. conquest, is a poem that records the effects of the Sp. siege of Tenochtitlán (Mexico City). Because indigenous systems of education were dismantled under Sp. rule, it is harder to find examples of indigenous poetics that incorporated long-term cultural changes. Critics such as Greene and Dagenais have argued that the Petrarchan lyric trad. provided a poetic model for desire and resistance that anticipated Iberian colonialism and influenced later works such as the Royal Commentaries (1609), a history of the Inca empire written by the mestizo author El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega (see PETRARCHISM). In arguments such as these, colonial poetics could be understood to be the shared appropriation of a Western lyric trad. in order to represent the consequences of colonial domination.

Unlike Iberian colonialism, the Brit. colonization of North America was built around closed communities of settlers with little emphasis on widespread indigenous conversion. The rhet. of the 16th-c. Eng. settlement of Ireland, however, holds many similarities to that of Iberian colonization. Edmund Spenser's A View of the Present State of Ireland (written 1596), e.g., advocates forced cultural change in order to civilize what he represents as the degenerate peoples of Ireland. Canny has argued that its thematic continuities with Spenser's epic *allegory of the Tudor dynasty, The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596), suggest both his initial belief in and later disillusionment with poetry as a medium for moral reform. Although the Petrarchan trad. provides a platform for comparing Brit. and Iberian colonial poetics, the nature of Brit. colonization in the Americas resulted in fewer opportunities for the cross-cultural poetics of Iberian America. Egan has noted that Anne Bradstreet's commendatory poems, e.g., avoided Am. themes altogether in order to escape associations with savagery. Examples of popular *satire, one poetic mode shared by Iberian and Brit. Ams. in the late 17th and 18th cs., also betray the difference between Iberian and Brit. colonialism. In Iberian America, the satiric poetry of Gregório de Matos in Bahia and Juan del Valle y Caviedes in Lima introduced indigenous and Af. lexicon and themes to mock the racial heterogeneity of Am. society. De Matos's poems in particular have led to a pointed debate between de Campos, who considered them to be creative engagements with colonial Brazil's social reality, and Hansen, who argued they are moral correctives in line with colonial governance in Bahia. By contrast, Richards has argued that Brit. Am. satire of the same period included local themes and objects only to highlight the transformation of Brit. settlers in the Americas.

Brooks has shown that in 18th-c. Brit. America a discourse of Christian redemption marked the first pub. works by Af. Am. and Native Am. authors, incl. the poetry of Af.-born Phillis Wheatley and the religious prose and hymnody of Samson Occom, a Mohegan tribal leader. Although transcriptions of Mayan cosmogonic texts such as the Popol Vuh and the books of Chilam Balam date from the beginning of the 18th c., and could, therefore, be considered under the rubric of a colonial poetics, it was only in the late 20th c. that they were read for their critical perspectives on Sp. colonization.

III. Post-Enlightenment and Neocolonialism. What is often called "high" Eur. imperialism—the Brit. and Fr. expansion into the Middle East, Asia, and Africa during the 18th and 19th cs.—has been seen to reflect the philosophical and economic changes of the mid-18th c. onward. Young, for instance, distinguishes between the tribute-oriented Iberian imperialism and the market capitalism of 19th-c. imperialism. Enlightenment notions of historical progress also overrode the Iberian emphasis on redemption through conversion to create a Eurocentric evolutionary scale. At the same time, an emphasis on self-expression and representation in both the 18th-c. republican revolutions and in *romanticism created particular paradoxes for 19th-c. imperialism. Romanticism, moreover, established poetry as a field that was morally and cognitively distinct from instrumental reason and thus provided a medium to critique imperial bureaucracy and capitalism. Yet it is important to note that romanticism was also a main source of Orientalism, which, as Said defines it, sought to represent the "other" in collusion with Eur. imperialism.

Despite sharing many Eur. influences, regions that had been subject to pre- and post-Enlightenment colonization developed distinct poetic trads. in the 19th c. In the newly independent Sp. Am. nations, where the creole elite continued a policy of internal colonization even after the end of Sp. rule, indigenous culture also became a source of national identity. The poetic manifestation of this interest in indigenous culture was strongest in imperial Brazil, however, where coastal indigenous people had been ravaged by early settlement. Romantic poetics marked poems such as Antônio Gonçalves Dias's celebration of Tupi warriors in "I-Juca-Pirama" (1851) and prose works such as José de Alencar's Iracema (1865), a narrative of the love between a Port. colonizer and an indigenous woman, whose highly poetic style he claimed was inspired by indigenous lang. While in Sp. America and Brazil a marginalized indigenous culture lent itself to the nostalgic invention of national origins, 19th-c. Eur. colonialism was unable to dismantle fully vernacular literary trads. Even so, the survival of vernacular poetics did not indicate a resistance to colonialism, as Pollock has noted in the case of the Sanskrit revival in early 19th-c. Bengal. Instead, Bengali poets such as Michael Madhusudan Dutt sought to assimilate Eur. influences into new vernacular poetic forms such as the Bengali *sonnet and an adaptation of *blank verse in The Slaying of Meghanada (1861), an epic poem whose theme is drawn from the Sanskrit epic Rāmāyaṇa.

By the end of the 19th c., these regional adaptations of romanticism had led to a more consciously critical anti-imperialist poetics. Both the Cuban José Martí and the Philippine José Rizal, e.g., faced the anomalous transition from Sp. to Am. imperialism by returning to the romantic utopias of Simón Bolívar's pan-Americanism to critique republican nationalism. In Bengal, Rabindranath Tagore's poems blended Bengali metaphysics and Western poetic trads. in a style initially embraced but later critiqued by non-Indian poets such as W. B. Yeats. Chakrabarty has argued that this crit. reflects a lack of understanding of how Tagore's humanist poetics sought a locally rooted idiom for nationalism. The Chinese poet and critic Guo Moruo, whose essay "The National and the Supranational"

(1923) dates from the same period, also selectively appropriated Western influences to find a cosmopolitan idiom beyond nativist nationalism. In the period leading up to and immediately following World War II, anticolonial poetics, such as those of Senagalese Léopold Senghor and Martinican Aimé Césaire, became more strongly drawn to nativist affirmation. Although in the same period, Frantz Fanon critiqued the anticolonial nationalism of the *Negritude movement, of which Sédar Senghor and Césaire were founders, this attack did not indict poetics per se as an instrument of decolonization. Indeed, both Césaire's and Fanon's prose have been called a poetics (Kelley, Bhabha), an application that continues to promote figural lang. as an antidote to colonial reason.

In what has been categorized as the postcolonial period, roughly after 1965, debates on nationalism and decolonization have given way to a divided stance on vernacular lang. and poetic trad. On the one hand, there has been an embrace of the cultural hybridity that has resulted from colonialism. This stance is most evident in Caribbean authors, from the *neobaroque poetics of José Lezama Lima and Alejo Carpentier in the 1940s and 1950s to the later cultural crit. of Édouard Glissant. On the other hand, there has been a movement away from hybridity and toward a recuperation of vernacular poetics and lang. This position is most forcefully argued in Ngũgĩ's Decolonising the Mind but may also be seen in the concerted effort to promote indigenous poetics in both North and South America, of which Tedlock's anthropologically informed trans. of the Mayan Popol Vuh is representative. A third poetic stance has manifested itself in the critical rewriting of Western and colonial classics, both among poets who embrace cultural hybridity and those who reject it. Examples of the former are Césaire's 1968 rewriting of Shakespeare's The Tempest, José Emilio Pacheco's 1969 poetic recreation of Bernal Díaz del Castillo's chronicle of the Sp. conquest of Mexico in "Crónica de Indias," and St. Lucian poet Derek Walcott's 1990 rewriting of Homer's Odyssey in his epic poem Omeros. An example of the latter is the Mapuche poet Elicura Chihuailaf's 2006 trans. of sections of Ercilla's La Araucana into Mapundungun.

Although renewed or continued colonialism during the period of postcolonialism after 1965 has often been referred to as neocolonialism, the distinction between the two is not always easy to make. Arias has called attention to the ways in which Maya intellectuals in Guatemala have become more globally oriented than their political opponents, for instance, even while they continue to suffer from the legacy of internal colonialism. The poetry of Maḥmūd Darwīsh denounces present Israeli politics while taking up the issue of Palestinian memory, a theme closer to those of postcolonial poetics. And Chicano poets such as Gloria Anzaldúa have returned to the memory of indigenous colonization to expose Chicano marginalization in the U.S. These examples challenge the very terms that have limited colonialism to Eur. imperialism from the 15th to the 20th cs. Finally, studies that apply a postcolonial perspective to non-Eur. empires—for instance, to that of the Japanese in Taiwan after 1895—will potentially find relationships between poetics and colonialism that have not been considered by this essay.

See ANTHROPOLOGY AND POETRY, CULTURAL STUDIES AND POETRY, ETHNOPOETICS, POLITICS AND POETRY.

■ R.D.G. Kelley, "A Poetics of Anticolonialism," intro. to A. Césaire, Discourse of Colonialism (1972); E. Said, Orientalism (1979); Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o, Decolonising the Mind (1981); Popol Vuh, intro. and trans. D. Tedlock (1985); P. Hulme, Colonial Encounters (1986); B. Ashcroft, G. Griffiths, and H. Tiffin, The Empire Writes Back (1989); É. Glissant, Caribbean Discourse (1989); J. A. Hansen, A Sátira e o Engenho [Satire and Wit] (1989); E. Hobsbawm, The Age of Empire, 1875–1914 (1989); D. Quint, Epic and Empire (1993)—on cl. and early mod. imperialist epic; H. Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994); E. Said, Culture and Imperialism (1994); E. Dussel, "Eurocentrism and Modernity," in The Postmodernism Debate in Latin America, ed. J. Beverley, M. Aronna, and J. Oviedo (1995); F. Lucas, "Brazilian Poetry from the 1830s to the 1880s," Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, ed. R. González Echevarría and E. Pupo-Walker, v. 3 (1996); G. Anzaldúa, Borderlands/La Frontera (1999); R. Greene, Unrequited Conquests (1999); D. Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe (2000); W. Mignolo, Local Histories/Global Designs (2000); L.T.S. Ching, Becoming Japanese (2001)—postcolonial perspective on Japanese colonialism in Taiwan; S. Gikandi, Ngugi wa Thiong'o (2001); S. Pollock, "The Death of Sanskrit," Comparative Studies in Society and History 43 (2001); J. Ramazani, The Hybrid Muse (2001); S. Shih, The Lure of the Modern (2001)—on modernism in China, 1917–37; R.J.C. Young, Postcolonialism (2001); J. Brooks, American Lazarus (2003); N. Canny, Making Ireland British, 1580–1650 (2003); J. D. Blanco, "Bastards of the Unfinished Revolution," Radical History Review 89 (2004)—on Rizal and Martí; J. Dagenais, "The Postcolonial Laura," and I. Malkin, "Postcolonial Concepts and Ancient Greek Colonization," MLQ 65 (2004); F. Fanon, The Wretched of the Earth, trans. R. Philcox ([1961] 2004); C. B. Seely, "Introduction," The Slaying of Meghanada (2004); A. Loomba, Colonialism/Postcolonialism, 2d ed. (2005); H. de Campos, Novas, trans. A. Sergio Bessa and O. Cisneros (2007); The Broken Spears, ed. M. León-Portilla, trans. L. Kemp, rev. ed. (2007); A. Arias, "The Maya Movement," Coloniality at Large, ed. M. Moraña, E. Dussel, and C. Jáuregui (2008); J. Egan, "Creole Bradstreet," and J. H. Richards, "Barefoot Folks with Tawny Cheeks," in Creole Subjects in the Colonial Americas, ed. R. Bauer and J. A. Mazzotti (2009)—Richards on Brit. Am. satire.

A. H. More

COMEDY

I. Definition
II. Ancient Greek
III. Modern Global Comedy

I. Definition. To ask what comedy is looses a Pandora's box of wild questions, with slim hope of answers. We can reduce their gamut by acknowledging that the Eng. word's primary meaning is of a stage or film performance involving a course of chiefly humorous and pleasant effects and a fortunate outcome, arousing laughter and joy. Sp. comedia can mean any stage play, and the best-known It. commedia is Dante's epic poem: as having a desired, fortunate end. These last two usages are imprecise, letting us include all drama and *epic, besides Dante, such as the Rāmāyaṇa, Amir Hamza, the 1001 Nights, and endlessly more. The Eng. term comedy can also name the sort of theme apt for comic performance, so that a real-life event, a poem, or a novel is a "comedy," instead of, say, a *"limerick," *"clerihew," or a "comic novel": names implying that the word comedy used outside theater or film is derivative. So med. Ar. maqāmāt and their likely sequel, the Sp. picaresque, novels such as Amos Tutuola's Palm-Wine Drinkard, Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o's Wizard of the Crow, or Samuel Selvon's London series are all "comedies": with a fortunate end and/or humorous episodes. These last, too, can include *satire, burlesque, or fantasy (quite usually in colonial and postcolonial studies of comedy). Such broad usages are not at issue here, where we look at performance, though many of our observations evidently have wider relevance. At the same time, choosing a narrow definition and the specific (Gr.) story enabling it—not least because it was there "paired" with *tragedy as to both performance and later crit.—implies a clarity, even a sort of purity absent from the comic in other world trads. We address this issue further at the start of section III.

Like tragedy, the Western trad. of comedy is taken to have begun with the ancient Greeks. Of comic performance, theirs are the oldest written traces and longest critical trad., going back at least to Plato. The age and clarity of the Gr. trad. make it a good place to seek definitions, even as we agree that the global presence of comedy may confirm (already Gr.) speculations on laughter—like reason and speech—as a defining characteristic of humanity. We need to distinguish between speculative generalizations about the "comic spirit," which can result in the sort of generic elisions already mentioned, and more exact historical description serving to analyze the function of comedy in society. We must also discriminate between such description and efforts to analyze the "psychology" of laughter because the event of comedy and the eruption of mirth are not the same.

The name comedy is from Comus, a Gr. fertility god. In ancient Greece, comedy named a rite of spring now thought to celebrate cyclical rebirth, resurrection, and rejuvenation. Mod. scholars and critics have thus seen in comedy a universal celebration of life, a joyous outburst of laughter in the face of either an incomprehensible world or a repressive sociopolitical order. Carnival, festival, folly, and a general freedom of action, then, indicate either acceptance of the first or resistance to the second: the latter letting scholars easily explain comedy in colonial and neocolonial conditions (as if its performers had not had comedy for centuries). Scholars have taken such notions further. If tragedy plays a fall from some "sacred irrationality," comedy triumphantly affirms that riotous unreason and humanity's share in the chaotic forces that produce life. The comic protagonist's defeat mirrors the tragic protagonist's failure, both ritual cleansings by way of a scapegoat—in comedy, one representing life-threatening forces. Such speculations have been advanced in various forms by classicists (Cornford, Harrison, Murray), philosophers (Bakhtin, Langer), literary critics (Barber, Frye), anthropologists, and sociologists. Whether such theories help see what comedies are is a fair question. They fancy that under any given comedy lies a profound universal "carnival" common to the human world everywhere and always. They remove comedies from their historical time and social context. Yet even so seemingly fantasist a theater as that of Aristophanes is misconstrued by theories neglecting his comedies' basis in the social and political intricacies of their age and place—Athens during the Peloponnesian Wars.

This is not to say that some peoples do not have such a sense of their place in the world. Hopis, writes Stott, see "clowning as fundamental to identity, as they hold that they are descended from an original clown youth and clown maiden. For them [says one ethnographer] 'clowning symbolizes the sacredness of humanity in the strict sense—that there is something sacred in being a finite and mortal being separated from god.' By embracing the identity of their first parents, the Hopi acknowledge the distance between their daily lives and their idea of spiritual perfection, finding religious value in the knowledge that they are flawed." This, besides difficulties in equating clowning with laughter and the comic (the trad. of the sad, even grieving, clown is worldwide), is far from comedy in any familiar Western sense—whatever analogies Stott may perceive with Dante.

Setting aside broad metaphysical speculations, we should look at accounts of laughter as a human reaction to certain kinds of events. We can by and large divide these accounts into three theories. One asserts that laughter is aroused by a sense of superiority (Thomas Hobbes's "sudden glory"); another that it evinces "psychic release" in the face of anxiety, fear, or incomprehension; the third that it is elicited by an abrupt sense of the ludicrous, the incongruous, a dissociation of event and expectation. All three go back to the oldest commentators but with different emphases at different times. The idea of psychic release is analogous to that of emotional purgation popular (esp. apropos of tragedy) in the Eur. Ren. but is nowadays most associated with Freudian and post-Freudian theories of displacement. Too, though the superiority theory goes back to Plato and Aristotle, it was most explored by Hobbes, Henri-Louis Bergson, and George Meredith. It posits our joy in seeing ourselves more fortunate than others or in some way freer. Bergson's idea that one of the causes of laughter is a sudden perception of someone as a kind of automaton or puppet, as though some freedom of action had been lost, is one version of this.

The theory of comedy as the ludicrous or as a dissociation of expectation and event also began with Aristotle and has been evoked by Immanuel Kant, Arthur Schopenhauer, Søren Kierkegaard, Sigmund Freud, and many others. In Poetics, ch. 5, Aristotle holds that comedy imitates people "worse than average; worse, however, not as regards any and every sort of fault, but only as regards one particular kind, the Ridiculous, which is a species of the Ugly. The Ridiculous may be defined as a mistake or deformity not productive of pain or harm to others" (trans. Ingram Bywater). Similar remarks exist in his Rhetoric and in a med. Gr. ms. known as the Tractatus Coislinianus, Aristotelian in argument and possibly even an actual epitome of the otherwise lost work on comedy that Aristotle mentions in the Poetics (Janko). Save for suggesting some detail of dissociative word and action, this text adds little to what may be gleaned from extant texts of Aristotle. It does, however, draw a parallel between comedy and tragedy by observing that *catharsis also occurs in comedy: "through pleasure and laughter achieving the purgation of like emotions." The meaning of such a phrase is unclear, though it suggests comedy as an almost Stoic device to clean away extremes of hedonism and root out carnivalesque temptations.

These theories complement each other as explanations of the psychology of laughter, but that of incongruity seems more particularly applicable to comedy than the others in seeking also both to indicate devices specifically provocative of laughter and to explain their effect on a spectator. What unites these devices and effects is the aim to provoke laughter; the use of mockery and satire; the activities of characters who, as to rank, class, or caste, run from low to middle; and plots that begin in uncertainty and uproar and end in the happy reestablishment of calm (symbolized by marriage, banquet, dance, or other ritual of communal bonding). They seem to offer some kind of "lesson," though the political, social, or ethical nature of the lesson may lack clarity. Quite usually, in addition to various degrees of slapstick and other low stage stuff, they incorporate music, song, and dance. The "Aristotelian" analyses are more generally suggestive. First, their sort of laughter requires oddity, distortion, folly, or some such "version of the ugly," without pain. This laughter assumes sympathy. Second, although this theory is kinder than that of superiority, it too has its part of cruelty, lying in that touch of ugliness. Third, all three theories take laughter as means, as commentary on or correction of what we may call the real, even local world: unlike metaphysical theories, which make mirth an end in itself and an escape into some "universality." Fourth, these theories (which supplement rather than oppose one another) require the laugher to be aware of some disfiguring of an accepted norm. Comedy and laughter imply a habit of normality, a familiarity of custom, from which the comic is a deviation. It may be the case that comedy, like tragedy, shows the construction of such order, but above all it demonstrates why such order must be conserved.

II. Ancient Greek. This fourth trait hints why comic competition began at the Athenian Dionysia in 486 BCE, some 50 years after that for tragedy, as a new polity was solidifying. Aristotle tells that the first competition was won by Chionides, who with Magnes represented a first generation of Gr. writers of comedy. Around 455, a comic victory was won by Cratinus, who with Crates formed the second generation. Many titles have survived and some fragments, but these constitute nearly the sum of extant facts about Athenian comedy until Aristophanes' victory with Acharnians in 425. We know that in this competition Cratinus was second with Kheimazomenoi, and Eupolis third with Noumeniai. These names tell us little, but we may assume that Aristophanic comedy was fairly typical of this so-called Gr. Old Comedy: a mixture of dance, poetry, song, and drama, joining fantastic plots to mockery and acid satire of contemp. people, events, and customs. Most of Aristophanes' plays are hardly comprehensible if we know nothing of current social, political, and literary conditions.

Aristophanes did not hesitate to attack education, the law, tragedians, women's situation, and the very nature of Athenian "democracy." Above all, he attacked the demagogue Cleon, the war party he led, and the Peloponnesian War itself. This says much about the nature of Athenian freedoms, for Aristophanes wrote during the struggle with Sparta, when no one doubted that the very future of Athens was at issue. Aristophanes' last surviving play (of 11, 44 being attributed to him) is Plutus (388 BCE), a play criticizing myth but whose actual themes are avarice and ambition. Quite different in tone and intent from the preceding openly political plays, Plutus is considered the earliest (and only extant) example of Gr. Middle Comedy.

But the situation of comedy differed from that of tragedy, for another strong trad. existed. This was centered in Sicilian Syracuse, a Corinthian colony, and claimed one of the earliest Gr. comic writers, Epicharmus, working at the court of Hieron I in the 470s BCE. We know the titles of some 40 of his plays. Other comic poets writing in this Doric trad. were Phormis and the slightly younger Deinolochus, but the Dorians were supplanted by the Attic writers in the 5th c. and survive only in fragments. Another Sicilian, the late 5th c. Sophron, was the best-known composer of literary versions of the otherwise "para-" or "sub-" literary genre of comic mime, remaining popular for centuries through the Hellenistic period and across its world (Hordern). From the 4th c. exists a series of vase paintings from Sicily and southern Italy, suggesting that comedy still thrived in that area. The initiative had largely passed, however, to the Gr. mainland. Plutus is an example of that Middle Comedy, whose volume we know was huge. Plautus's Lat. Amphitruo (ca. 230 BCE) seems a version of another one. These imply that a major trait was mockery of myth. (Aristophanes' earlier Frogs [405 BCE], attacking Euripides and Aeschylus, tried in the Underworld, may be thought a forerunner.)

By the mid-4th c., so-called New Comedy held the stage. Among its poets, the most celebrated and influential was unquestionably Menander. His "teacher" was one Alexis of Thurii in southern Italy, so we see how the "colonial" influence continued, though Alexis was based in Athens. Alexis is said to have written 245 plays and to have outlived his pupil. We know of Philemon from Cilicia or Syracuse, of Diphilos from Sinope on the Black Sea, and Apollodorus from Carystos in Euboea: New Comedy's sources were very widespread. Until the 1930s, however, only fragments seemed extant. Then, what can only be considered one of the great literary discoveries turned up a papyrus containing a number of Menander's comedies, complete or almost so. These plays deal not with political matters or crit. of myth but with broadly social matters (sometimes using mythical themes). The situations are domestic, the comedy is of manners, the characters are stock.

The Gr. Mediterranean and beyond knew many comic forms. By the mid-3rd c. at least, itinerant troupes crossed the Hellenistic world. By 240, Livius Andronicus, from Tarentum in southern Italy, had adapted Gr. plays into Lat. for public performance. Like Naevius and later Ennius, this poet composed both tragedy and comedy. From the 3rd c. as well dates Atellan farce (named from Atella in Campania), using stock characters and a small number of set scenes and featuring clowns (called Bucco or Maccus), foolish old men, and greedy buffoons. These farces were partly improvised, on the basis of skeletal scripts, much like the commedia dell'arte of almost two millennia later. The influence of Etrurian musical performance, southern It. drama, Gr. mime, New Comedy, and Atellan farce joined in the comedies of Plautus, who wrote in the late 3rd c. (Cicero says he died in 184 BCE). By him, 21 complete or almost complete comedies have survived. A little later Rome was entertained by the much more highbrow Terence, of whom six plays remain extant. These two authors provided themes, characters, and style for much comedy as it was to develop in Europe after the Ren.

III. Modern Global Comedy. The definitions and hist. just advanced pose the problem stated at the outset: that other world trads. have not used or relied on such clear generic distinctions as Western trads. imply. They did not do so, at least, until the domination by Western media that began early in the 20th c., perhaps marked in China by aspects of the New Culture (May 4th) Movement (1915–21) and later across colonial Africa and Asia by third-world independence movements (1950s–1970s). But by then Western comic forms were also losing such clarity as they may have had earlier. Let us take two well-known cases. Chinese zaju was a kind of drama that matured in the Yuan dynasty (1271–1368), though it grew from a form popular in the preceding Song and Jin dynasties, featuring lowly characters, song, clowns, and slapstick. After the Mongol invasions, the form grew into a more serious genre, with prelude and four acts often dealing with aspects of Mongol oppression, but still incorporating song, clowns, and much comic gesture and interplay. Some of its plays, Ji Junxiang's Orphan of the Zhao Family, e.g., or Li Xingfu's Chalk Circle, later found their way into the Western theater, the first as Voltaire's Orphelin de la Chine, the second as Bertolt Brecht's Caucasian Chalk Circle. Neither would be thought a comedy, and it may be that a category of comedy is indeed not useful to describe many other cultures' forms of performance. Elements of Yuan zaju subsist in many mod. Chinese dramatic forms, most familiarly, perhaps, in the Beijing Opera.

A similar difficulty of generic distinctions characterizes Japanese kabuki, a dramatic form invented early in the 17th c. as a ribald dance theater of everyday life, first performed entirely by women and closely tied to prostitution. Banned in 1629, it revived in mid-century as an all-male performance, though still with its earlier characteristics. Slowly, from the late 17th c., it acquired its mod. form, notably its association with bunraku, puppet theater. Kabuki plays are historical, domestic, or dance. The first usually uses samurai characters, the second lowly town or country people. The plays may appeal to serious emotional effect (the most famed of the second kind are those of Chikamatsu Monzaemon, often involving romantic tales of impossible and fatal love) or be happily zany, while all are characterized by highly stylized, even kitsch, costume and makeup and often luridly elaborate staging, sets, and machinery. Here, too, the comic has its place but no separate one. Unlike these 13th–14th- and 17th–18th-c. Asian dramatic forms, Eur. ones continued much in the generic wake of Greco-Lat. antiquity.

While humanist scholars of the 16th c. published and then imitated Plautus and Terence, Eur. vernacular comedy had long been developing in the farces, sotties, and comic interludes widely performed in the Middle Ages. So, the early 16th c. saw the publication of much school drama in both Lat. and vernaculars, while, in Italy just a little later, there developed the commedia dell'arte, whose influence was to be enormous. This was improvisational comedy, using sketchy scripts and a small number of stock characters–Harlequin, Columbine, Pantaloon, the Doctor, and others—and situations. Their plots drew on antiquity and med. folk art alike, and the form lived on into the popular Comédie italienne of late 17th-c. France, and remained visible in the plays of Pierre de Marivaux and Carlo Goldoni. It survives in our time in performances that often put the old characters or their avatars to work in the service of powerful political satire (as kabuki, esp. the historical, may make sharp commentary on contemp. conditions).

The commedia dell'arte developed in Italy, but other Eur. lands saw their own devel. of comedy, usually from a similar joining of sources. If Spain's late 15th-c. Celestina of Fernando de Rojas was a "comedy" in acts and in dialogue but never really intended for performance, by the late 16th c. that country's theater was equal to any in Europe. Félix Lope de Vega, Pedro Calderón de la Barca, and a host of others produced a multitude of romantic and realistic comedies dealing mainly with love and honor. They (and It. writers) provided innumerable plots, themes, and characters for comic writers of France and England, who also benefitted from both indigenous folk trads. and publication of Lat. comedy. In France, humanist comedy gave way in the late 1620s to a romantic form of comedy whose threefold source was the prose romance and novella of Spain, Italy, and France; Sp. comedy; and It. dramatic pastoral. A large group of major writers wrote in this style through midcentury, up to the poet whom many consider the greatest writer of comedy of all times.

Molière (pseud. of Jean-Baptiste Poquelin) wrote an enormous variety, in verse and prose, ranging from slapstick farce to plays approaching bourgeois tragic drama. Comédie ballet, comedy of situation, manners, intrigue, and character all flowed from his pen. He readily treated issues that roused the ire of religious dévots and professional bigots; nor did he shirk crit. of patriarchy, and much of his work has political overtones. Starting his theatrical career as leader of a traveling troupe, Molière made full use of folk trad., provincial dialect, commedia, and farce, as well as of cl. example. Many of his characters have become familiar types in Fr. trad. (the "misanthrope," "tartuffe," "dom juan"); many of his lines have become proverbial. While his plays do contain the now-familiar young lovers, old men both helpful and obstructive, wily servants both female and male, sensible wives and mothers (whereas husbands and fathers are almost always foolish, headstrong, cuckolded, or obstructive), they bear chiefly upon such matters as avarice, ambition, pride, hypocrisy, misanthropy, and other such extreme traits. What interests Molière is how such excess conflicts directly with the well-regulated and customary process of ordered society.

Following a similar trajectory to that of its southern neighbors in the 16th c., interacting both with them and its own past(s), England created hugely varied and long-lived comic trads. As in much else, Shakespeare's comedy stands out for its diversity: aristocratic romance, bitter and problematic farce, comedy of character, slapstick farce, and the almost tragic Troilus and Cressida. If any comedy may be analyzed with some "metaphysical" theory, it is no doubt Shakespeare's, with its concern for madness and wisdom, birth and death, the seasons' cycles, love and animosity. But it stayed unique; he had no direct heir. Ben Jonson's urbane comedy of humors, of types and of character, satirizing manners and morals, social humbug and excess of all kinds, and falling more clearly into the forms already seen, was soon followed by the remarkable flowering of Restoration comedy, with a crowd of authors, not a few copying Molière. They produced a brittle comedy of manners and cynical wit whose major impression is one of decay and an almost unbalanced self-interest. Excepting Shakespeare's, all these forms of Eur. comedy have continued into the present and thrive throughout the Western world. There is no need to detail names here. A late addition to the genre is the so-called dark comedy of the 20th c.'s second half. Perhaps a response to the killing grounds of World Wars I and II and, later, mostly African and Asian colonial wars and their murderous aftermaths, these comedies again portray everyday people; are set in bleak, often highly conflicted situations; and use comic wordplay, gesture, manners, slapstick, and other devices serving plots whose open-endedness is often forlorn, if not desolate, and whose humor figures a kind of defiant resignation before an empty world.

At the same time, one does have to take note of the extraordinary outpouring of drama, incl. comedy, in Africa and the Caribbean since independence. As said earlier, this is all too often interpreted as merely a way to displace varied "postcolonial" anxieties, or indeed an "allegory" of the "postcolonial condition." There is far more to these comedies (and tragedies), however, than this. Wole Soyinka's Opera Wonyosi, e.g., a Yoruba-inflected riff on John Gay's Beggar's Opera and Brecht's Threepenny Opera, whose very ties to these earlier satirical comedies invoke a complex play against a colonizing aesthetics, politics, and the capitalist economics that the earlier plays criticize and satirize at two crucial historical moments, is also a hilariously corrosive attack on the neocolonial Nigerian government that forged the Biafran war and established its military dictatorship. The same may be said of a play such as Efua Sutherland's The Marriage of Anansewa, which puts Akan traditional dramatic forms to work not in an attack on the Ghana of its moment (of which she was very optimistic) but in a humorous search to tie somehow together local trad. and a colonial overlay that, however bad, is inescapable. Such diverse concerns are common to comedy across Africa and find their way into the many langs. of Caribbean comedy. In many ways, too, all share interests with contemp. comedy around the world. Its authors sport ironically with the social, moral, political, and metaphysical dimensions of the human condition. Usually such issues are no longer held separate, and all are fair game for an ambiguous, perplexed, and uncertain derision, as if comedy had to dig ever deeper for those social norms referred to at the outset.

See DRAMATIC POETRY.

■ G. Meredith, An Essay on Comedy (1877); F. Nietzsche, Die fröhliche Wissenschaft (The Gay Science, 1882); G. Murray, Greek Comic Verse (1886); H. L. Bergson, Le rire (Laughter, 1912); F. M. Cornford, The Origin of Attic Comedy (1914); S. Freud, Wit and Its Relation to the Unconscious (1916), trans. A. A. Brill (1917); J. Harrison, Themis (1927); J. Feibleman, In Praise of Comedy (1939); M. T. Herrick, Comic Theory in the Sixteenth Century (1950); G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman Comedy (1952); W. Sypher, Comedy (1956); Frye; S. K. Langer, Philosophy in a New Key, 3d ed. (1957); C. L. Barber, Shakespeare's Festive Comedy (1959); J. L. Styan, The Dark Comedy (1962); A. Nicoll, The World of Harlequin (1963); Theories of Comedy, ed. P. Lauter (1964); N. Frye, A Natural Perspective (1965); W. Kerr, Tragedy and Comedy (1967); M. M. Bakhtin, Rabelais and His World, trans. H. Iswolsky (1968); E. Olson, The Theory of Comedy (1968); W. M. Merchant, Comedy (1972); K. J. Dover, Aristophanic Comedy (1972); M. C. Bradbrook, The Growth and Structure of Elizabethan Comedy, 2d ed. (1973); R. B. Martin, The Triumph of Wit: A Study of Victorian Comic Theory (1974); A. Rodway, English Comedy: Its Role and Nature from Chaucer to the Present Day (1975); M. Gurewitch, Comedy: The Irrational Vision (1975); F. H. Sandbach, The Comic Theatre of Greece and Rome (1977); A. Caputi, Buffo: The Genius of Vulgar Comedy (1978); E. Kern, The Absolute Comic (1980); R. W. Corrigan, Comedy: Meaning and Form, 2d ed. (1981); K. H. Bareis, Comoedia (1982); D. Konstan, Roman Comedy (1983); E. L. Galligan, The Comic Vision in Literature (1984); R. Janko, Aristotle on Comedy (1984); K. N. Bame, Come to Laugh: African Traditional Theatre in Ghana (1985); E. W. Handley, "Comedy," CHCL, v. 1; R. L. Hunter, The New Comedy of Greece and Rome (1985); W. E. Gruber, Comic Theaters (1986); S. C. Shershow, Laughing Matters: The Paradox of Comedy (1986); H. Levin, Playboys and Killjoys (1987); L. Siegel, Laughing Matters: Comic Traditions in India (1987); A. Ziv, National Styles of Comedy (1988); P. Gilliatt, To Wit: Skin and Bones of Comedy (1990); R. S. Jenkins, Subversive Laughter: The Liberating Power of Comedy (1994); R.D.V. Glasgow, Madness, Masks, and Laughter: An Essay on Comedy (1995); S. E. Hengen, Performing Gender and Comedy: Theories, Texts, and Contexts (1998); E. Segal, The Death of Comedy (2001); Comedy, Fantasy, and Colonialism, ed. G. Harper (2002); J. H. Hordern, Sophron's Mimes: Text, Translation and Commentary (2004); M. Charney, Comedy: A Geographic and Historical Guide (2005); A. Stott, Comedy (2005); J. Hokenson, The Idea of Comedy: History, Theory, Critique (2006); E. Weitz, The Cambridge Introduction to Comedy (2009); The Birth of Comedy, ed. J. Rusten (2011).

T. J. Reiss

COMMA POEM. A poem in which every word is followed by a comma. The device was invented by the Filipino poet and critic Jose Garcia Villa (1908–97) to highlight the integrity of each word and emphasize its dual function as both carrier of meaning and aesthetic object. In describing his practice, Garcia Villa wrote that "the method may be compared to Seurat's architectonic and measured pointillism—where the points of color are themselves the medium as well as the technique of expression: therefore functional and valid, as a medium of art and as a medium of personality."

Because the space after each comma is omitted, the commas used in comma poetry effect a different measure of *pause from those operating within a prose context. Since the comma represents the only pause separating words on every line, there ensues both an expansion and a contraction of time at the lineal pace—an expansion due to the excess of commas, a contraction due to the shrinking of space. This procedure ultimately emphasizes the word's primacy as the material of poetry.

See typography.

■ J. Garcia Villa, "Comma Poems," The Anchored Angel, ed. E. Tabios (1999).

J. Crisostomo

COMMONPLACE (Gr. Koinos topos; Lat. locus communis, "common place" or "general theme"). Refers in cl. oratory to a mode of argument. Following the success of Ren. humanist pedagogy, commonplace has come to mean a notable passage, poem, or excerpt transmitted via the commonplace book, an important technology of cultural memory. Through association with ideas that are commonly held, it has also come to signify the trivial, hackneyed, or banal. The practice of commonplacing originated with the cl. conception of topoi,* rhetorical strategies designed to increase clarity and enhance authority in philosophical debate. Aristotle's "places" were categories of relationship, such as opposition, adjacency, or the relation of part to whole. Ren. humanists, who placed renewed emphasis on cl. trad., redefined these abstractions as textual fragments suitable for gathering. In two influential treatises of 1512, De ratione studii and De copia, Erasmus promoted the keeping of commonplace books as the best way of understanding and putting to use the cl. past, promulgating a system for organizing exemplary passages under headings and subheadings. Textualizing the commonplaces—transforming them from places in the mind to places in a text—gave them cultural specificity; they were no longer abstract and portable modes of relation but rather a shorthand for the prevailing cultural code.

Commonplacing is a mode of cultural transmission that allows for the deracination and reframing of authority. In the early mod. period, commonplace books were a primary means for making cl. antiquity accord with mod, Christian consensus. They also helped to elevate vernacular poetry through association with the poetry of the ancients. Echoing the med. trad. of gathering sententiae into florilegia (books of flowers), Robert Allen's England's Parnassus (1600) arranged "[t]he Choysest flowers of Our English Poets" under commonplace headings for future reference and use. Commonplace books were important tools for managing the flood of print that began to emerge from the popular press. Early mod. printed play texts, incl. the first quarto of Hamlet (1603), often indicated lines fit for copying by placing commas or inverted commas at the beginning of the line. In the late 17th c., John Locke proposed an alphabetical system for indexing and cross-referencing commonplaces, one that allowed for headings to emerge out of the course of reading (rather than needing to be established beforehand). Locke's scheme was widely reprinted in collected eds. of his work; printed indexes and an explanation of Locke's system were frequently appended to blank books sold to the learned for the purposes of commonplacing.

Commonplace books testify to a long and vibrant trad. of claiming moral authority for verse, pressing whole poems or excerpts into didactic uses. Poetic commonplaces tend to be framed already as quotable, ready to be plucked, favoring brevity, prescriptiveness, and a strong sense of closure. The popularity of commonplace books compiled by major poets, from Ben Jonson's posthumously printed Timber (1640) to Robert Southey's Common-place Book (1850) and R. W.

Emerson's Parnassus (1874), suggests not only readers' curiosity about poetic influence but also the cultural status of poets as moral exemplars.

Ms. and printed commonplace books offer a valuable record of poetic reception. Much women's poetry before the 19th c. survives chiefly in commonplace books and albums, testifying to the lively exchange of women's verse within coteries. The influence of this mode of circulation on canonical poetry is evident from numerous published poems by S. T. Coleridge, E. A. Poe, and others that begin "Lines Written in an Album . . ." Commonplacing thrived as long as printed books were expensive for readers to own; in the late 19th c., they began to give way to scrapbooks and collections that emphasized personal taste, not cultural prescription. Nevertheless, commonplace books remain valuable resources for scholars seeking to understand popular taste in poetry. The decontextualizing and recontextualizing processes at the heart of commonplacing, and its concern with imitation and emulation, can be seen in the Victorian and modernist fascination with *centos or patchwork poems comprised entirely from lines taken from other poems. A commonplace aesthetic can also be seen in the conceptual artist Jenny Holzer's Truisms (1977–), which use a wide array of media (incl. light projection, LED feeds, plaques, benches, T-shirts, and the Internet) to map sententious phrases onto public space, putting received wisdom under scrutiny.

See CLASSICISM, CLICHÉ, EPIGRAM, RENAISSANCE POETICS.

■ L. D. Lerner, "Cliché and Commonplace," Essays in Criticism 6 (1956); A. P. Debicki, "César Vallejo's Speaker and the Poetic Transformation of Commonplace Themes," Kentucky Romance Quarterly 17 (1970); J. A. Hiddleston, "Fusée, Maxim, and Commonplace in Baudelaire," MLR 80 (1985); S. G. Nichols, "Marie de France's Commonplaces," YFS (1991); M. T. Crane, Framing Authority (1993); A. Moss, Printed Commonplace-Books (1996), and "The Politica of Justus Lipsius and the Commonplace-Book," Journal of the History of Ideas 59 (1998); E. Havens, Commonplace Books (2001); T. Cave, "Thinking with Commonplaces: The Example of Rabelais," (Re)Inventing the Past, ed. G. Ferguson and C. Hampton (2003); P. Saint-Amour, The Copywrights (2003); L. Dacome, "Noting the Mind: Commonplace Books and the Pursuit of the Self in Eighteenth-Century Britain," Journal of the History of Ideas 65 (2004); J. Phillips, "'Vox populi, vox dei': Baudelaire's Uncommon Use of Commonplace in the Salon de 1846," French Forum 31 (2006); Z. Lesser and P. Stallybrass, "The First Literary Hamlet and the Commonplacing of Professional Plays," Shakespeare Quarterly 59 (2008); D. Allan, Commonplace Books and Reading in Georgian England (2010); A. M. Blair, Too Much to Know (2010); A. Grafton, "The Humanist and the Commonplace Book: Education in Practice," Music Education in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, ed. R. E. Murray Jr. et al. (2010).

M. McGILL

COMPANION POEMS. Two poems designed to be read as complements, opposites, or replies. Truly paired poems are not common in Western poetry. Some of Shakespeare's sonnets are paired, e.g., 44 and 45 (on the four elements) and 46 and 47 (eye and heart), but the best-known companion poems in Eng. poetry are John Milton's "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso," which are truly paired, in the manner of rhetorical essays preferring the rival claims of day and night or youth and age. After Milton, there are Abraham Cowley's "Against Hope" and "For Hope," the former of which was also paired with Richard Crashaw's "For Hope"; and John Oldham's "Satyr against Virtue" with the "Counterpart." Such opposed poems were sometimes printed together in alternating stanzas: so Cowley and Crashaw on hope; the 17th-c. Dutch poet Maria Tesselschade Visscher's "Wilde en Tamme Zangster" (Wild and Tame Singer); Robert Burton's "Author's Abstract of Melancholy"; and Edmund Waller's "In Answer of Sir John Suckling's Verses," interwoven with Suckling's "Against Fruition." Some of the poems paired by one author against those by another are answer poems with parodic elements: Christopher Marlowe's "Come live with me and be my love" excited a number of such replies (see CONTRAFACTUM). Thus, Anthony Hecht's "Dover Bitch" may be thought a kind of "answer" to Matthew Arnold's "Dover Beach" a century earlier. John Donne's two "Anniversary" poems—"The Anatomy of the World" and "The Progress of the Soul"—are companion poems more by virtue of relation and contrast in theme, tone, and occasion. William Blake's Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience include a number of poems set against each other and understood only by their contrasts. Similarly, Robert Browning's "Meeting at Night" and "Parting at Morning" pair two related experiences (see ECHO VERSE).

In Asian poetry, however, true answer poems, implying social intercourse in verse address, are found in large numbers in collections of Chinese, Korean, and Japanese poetry. The cl. poetic trads. of these countries assumed that the persons addressed were also poets, and, in fact, poetry was often exchanged on occasions that today would call for other forms of contact. Chinese poets often matched a poem received from a friend by writing another in the same form and using the same rhymes. It sometimes happened that Japanese poems not actually paired were brought together editorially with a headnote describing the (imaginary) situation, leading to a genre known as "tales of poems" (uta-monogatari), of which Ise Monogatari (The Tales of Ise) is the best-known example. Another Japanese example that flourished in cl. times was the utaawase (poetry match), in which two or more people competed by writing poems on given topics, with a response given by judges (see POETIC CONTESTS).

■ P. Mahony, "The Structure of Donne's Anniversaries as Companion Poems," Genre 5 (1972); B. K. Lewalski, "Milton, the Nativity Ode, the Companion Poems, and Lycidas," Early Modern English Poetry, ed. P. Cheney, A. Hadfield, G. A. Sullivan Jr. (2007).

F. J. WARNKE; E. MINER

COMPLAINT (Gr. schetliasmos, Lat. plangere). An established rhetorical term by the time of Aristotle's Rhetoric (1395a9), complaint is a varied mode that crosses numerous generic boundaries. Usually, it is a dramatic, highly emotional *lament that reveals the complainant's specific grievances against a public or private injustice. The most influential complaints from antiquity are found in Ovid's Heroides, a collection of epistolary complaints in which abandoned lovers narrate their stories in hope of receiving recognition for their suffering (Farrell). The mode also borrows from the Heb. trad. of lamentation in the books of Job and Jeremiah and the med. planctus* that were central to mourning in the med. church. In the Middle Ages and Ren., three sometimes coinciding strains of complaint are evident: (1) satiric complaints that expose the evil ways of the world (contemptus mundi, e.g., Alan of Lille, De planctu naturae, and Edmund Spenser's collection Complaints, Containing Sundrie Small Poems of the Worlds Vanitie [1591]); (2) didactic complaints that relate the fall of great persons, often called "fall of princes" or "de casibus" narratives (e.g., Giovanni Boccaccio, De casibus virorum illustrium; Chaucer, "The Monk's Tale"; and the Ren. collection A Mirror for Magistrates [1559]); and (3) lover's complaints, including both short poems written in the Petrarchan mode (e.g., by Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey, in Tottel's Miscellany [1557]; see PETRARCHISM) and more ambitious monologues that are frequently voiced by female speakers but have male complaints embedded within the "female" complaint framework (e.g., Samuel Daniel, The Complaint of Rosamond [1592]; and Shakespeare, A Lover's Complaint [1609]). Ren. complaints employ legal rhet. in the *ballads and *broadsides of public executions (Craik) and in revenge tragedies (Thomas Kyd, The Spanish Tragedy [1592]; and Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus [1594]). Other prominent examples of complaint include Chaucer, "A Complaint unto Pity" (Chaucer has many experimental complaints, on the model of Fr. and It., as *ballades or in *ottava rima); Abraham Cowley, "The Complaint" (1663); and Edward Young's long discursive poem Complaint, or Night Thoughts (1742–45). In *Occitan poetry, the complaint takes the form of the enueg, which inspired the 36th of Ezra Pound's Cantos. In the 20th and 21st cs., the complaint frequently appears in *blues lyrics and *hip-hop poetics (Berlant).

■ H. Stein, Studies in Spenser's Complaints (1934); The Mirror for Magistrates, ed. L. B. Campbell (1938); J. Peter, Complaint and Satire in Early English Literature (1956); W. A. Davenport, Chaucer (1988); L. Berlant, "The Female Complaint," Social Text 19–20 (1988); J. Kerrigan, Motives of Woe (1991); J. Farrell, "Reading and Writing the Heroides," Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 98 (1998); K. A. Craik, "Shakespeare's A Lover's Complaint and Early Modern Criminal Confession," ShQ 53 (2002).

W. H. RACE; J. DIAZ

COMPOSITION. See ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY; POET; RHETORIC AND POETRY; VERSIFICATION.

COMPOSITION BY FIELD is a phrase by Charles Olson (1910–70) in his seminal essay "Projective Verse" (1950). The phrase evokes at once a poetics (or a philosophy of writing), a mode of practice (or heuristic activity that discovers its own order), and a kind of poem that is recognizable both visually and aurally. In the latter sense, the page space features loosely configured lines, white space in integral relation to the text, interlineal *caesurae, and *fragments following the pulse of thinking and feeling as it occurs. The mode of practice rests on engagement with one's compositional and ontological energies (physical being, breath) in the absolute present of writing. And in the poetics of *projective verse, *form in any particular work emerges from the multiple pressures of content. These verbal constellations relate to several artistic modes of the time, incl. action painting (Jackson Pollock), gestural dance performances using casual movement (Merce Cunningham), and improvisatory modes of jazz (Charlie Parker). Projective verse posits writing as made of existential choices defined by desire and act and as seeing, feeling, and understanding in the present—a kind of phenomenology out of conformity with that of traditional or even *free-verse prosodies. In this lightning-strike poetics, the page (called here the field) becomes a zone of "energy transfer." However, there is a tension between two senses of the poet: as the channel of organic energies (participation mystique) and as master, constructing the poem.

The polemical feeling of the essay, typical of the rhets. of *manifesto (here featuring a masculinist diction), began in a fervent resistance to the influence of T. S. Eliot. Olson saw the Four Quartets in particular as confining, both for its adherence to a traditional religious ideology and for the repetitive architectonics of its "closed" form. Composition by field produced open form and, therefore, resisted conventional poetic markers (such as *rhyme and metrical *repetition) and featured paratactic organization in syntax (see HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS).

In bringing the prosodic and experiential radicalism of the avant-garde into the contemp. period, Olson influenced several poets whose work appeared in Donald Allen's important anthol. of 1960 (e.g., Robert Creeley, Robert Duncan, Robin Blaser, Denise Levertov; see ANTHOLOGY, BLACK MOUNTAIN SCHOOL). While a new phrase in 1950, composition by field as concept has analogues to modernist poetic practice, such as the phrasal lobes and white space of Stéphane Mallarmé's Un coup de dés (1897; see VISUAL POETRY); the erasure of syntactic connection as a way of freeing words from inherited connotations, described in F. T. Marinetti's 1914 manifesto as parole in libertà (words in freedom); and the productive misunderstanding of the *ideogram in Ezra Pound's manifesto-compilation from the notes of Ernest Fenollosa, The Chinese Written Character as a Medium for Poetry (1919).

See OPEN FORM.

■ M. Perloff, "Charles Olson and the 'Inferior Predecessors': 'Projective Verse' Revisited," ELH 40 (1973); G. Hutchinson, "The Pleistocene in the Projective:

Some of Olson's Sources," AL 54 (1982); B. Hatlen, "Pound's Pisan Cantos and the Origins of Projective Verse," Ezra Pound and Poetic Influence, ed. H. M. Dennis (2000); J. Osborne, "Black Mountain and Projective Verse," A Companion to Twentieth-Century Poetry, ed. N. Roberts (2001).

R. B. DuPlessis

COMPUTATIONAL POETRY. A term used by theorists to describe poems generated by instructions that can be formalized as procedural or algorithmic sequences. Whether executed by hand, in print, or on a computer, the defining features of such poems include a program that precedes and determines the poem, a relation between form and content that distinguishes the poem from concepts of poetry that are either organic or formalist, and a definition of the authorial function that differentiates the poem from conventional romantic notions about poetry.

Generative programs for computational poems include numerical patterning, mathematically driven permutations of ling. elements, schematic transformations of source texts, and an array of alphabetic, syntactic, semantic, or homophonic procedures. As various as the devices that produce them, examples include Ron Silliman's Tjanting (1981), in which the number of sentences per unit equals the sum of the number of sentences in the preceding two units (the Fibonacci sequence); Lee Ann Brown's "Pledge" (1999), in which each noun in the Pledge of Allegiance has been replaced by the seventh subsequent noun in a dictionary (N + 7); and Brian Kim Stefans's "Stops and Rebels" (2003), in which texts contained in files on a hard drive have been recombined by a digital algorithm.

Unlike an organic poem, in which form is said to arise from content (see ORGANICISM), or a formalist poem, in which form is said to contain content (see FORMALISM), a computational poem is produced and enacted by a procedure in which the poem's form acts as its intelligence. Having determined the procedure and put it in motion, the poet-programmer steps back to witness, like any other interpreter, the poem's commentary on itself and the world in which it exists.

Although computational poems may generate *affect, their energy is conceptual rather than lyrical. They do not aim to convey a *persona, construct an authentic *voice, capture nuances of *emotion, or put passionate convictions into *form, but rather to engage and probe broad ling. and cultural structures of meaning. In this sense, a computational poem is, to borrow John Cage's definition of experimental music, "not a question of having something to say" but rather a means of attending to flows of information.

Although programmed permutational poetry can be traced back to esoteric practitioners who established models for generative lit. as early as 330 CE, its most influential advocates have been the loose federation of writers and mathematicians who founded the Workshop for Potential Literature or Ouvroir de littérature potentielle (*Oulipo) in 1960. In homage, a conference of contemp. writers incl., among others, Christian Bök (Eunoia, 2001), Harryette Mullen (Sleeping with the Dictionary, 2002), and Caroline Bergvall (Via, 2005) met in 2005 to carry its project forward under the rubric Noulipo. Procedural texts such as Lyn Hejinian's My Life (1980–87) and projects of "uncreative writing" such as Kenneth Goldsmith's No. 111. 2.7.93-10.20.96 (1997) and Craig Dworkin's Parse (2008) are often regarded as precursors or counterparts of poems composed and performed on computers.

Starting with the earliest mainframes, programmers created algorithms that access, filter, and recombine the contents of databases to generate texts that simulate the ling. structures, promise of interpretability, or cultural capital of poetry. Such combinatory projects as Talan Memmott's Self Portrait(s) [as Other(s)] (2003), Millie Niss's Oulipoems (2004), and geniwate's Concatenation (2004) capture for the screen the experimental energy of the *Beat poet William Burroughs's cut-ups and the Oulipo founder Raymond Queneau's Hundred Thousand Billion Poems (1961), a set of *sonnets, originally executed for the page but now remediated for the screen. In a literary milieu incl. texts that migrate among print, electronic, and performed versions, computational projects, data mining, sampling, mixing, and other forms of procedural, combinatory, and computational practice have become an integral part of information culture.

See CONCEPTUAL POETRY; CONSTRAINT; ELECTRONIC POETRY; FLARF; INFORMATION, POETRY AS.

■ J. Cage, "Experimental Music: Doctrine," Silence (1961); Oulipo: A Primer of Potential Literature, ed. and trans. W. F. Motte (1986); F. Cramer, "Combinatory Poetry and Literature in the Internet" (2000), http://ada.lynxlab.com/staff/steve/public/docu/lidia/docu/combinatory_poetry.pdf—mentions earliest examples of generative lit.; C. T. Funkhauser, Prehistoric Digital Poetry (2007); The Noulipian Analects, ed. M. Viegener and C. Wertheim (2007).

A. Morris

CONCATENATION (Lat., concatenare; "to link together"). Concatenation literally translates as "to connect together like the links of a chain" and describes the act of "chaining" *stanzas together through the use of a word, phrase, or a line at the end of one stanza that is repeated (in its entirety or in a slightly altered version) in the first line of the following stanza.

In verse divided into structural units and particularly in long narrative poems, some means of linking stanzas enhances continuity through the whole since *rhyme schemes tend to emphasize the integrity of the stanza. The simplest means to this end is to carry over a rhyme sound from one stanza to the next, as in *terza rima, or to use *alliteration and other sound echoes. Sometimes the entire line may be repeated or else its sense paraphrased or amplified.

Concatenation makes its earliest appearance in Eng. in popular songs at the end of the 13th c. and is a specific component of northern alliterative verse, where it builds on the unifying principles of alliteration by emphasizing connections between stanzas. In "Song of the Husbandman" (ca. 1300), the end of one stanza and the beginning of the next are connected by an entire line repeated in a modulated form: "that me us honteth ase hound doth the hare. // he us hontethe ase hound hare doth on hulle."

Concatenation also appears in Celtic verse, incl. in six rhyming romances, as well as examples in the late 12th- and 13th-c. northern poems written in Lat. In Eng. poetry, concatenation plays an important part in the most intricately structured poem to be written in ME, Pearl. Divided into 101 stanzas and 20 sections, its individual stanzas are linked by the repetition of a single key word, rather than a phrase or line. In addition, the final link word of the entire poem, "pay," also appears in the poem's opening line, as "paye," and so emphasizes the poem's circular structure.

In the Ren., the devel. of *lyric and *sonnet sequences raised the issue of how poems might be linked together—whether (only) thematically or verbally (as the more direct manifestation of the former). George Gascoigne is the first Eng. poet to link his sonnets via repetition of an entire line. Edmund Spenser's practice in The Faerie Queene follows Ludovico Ariosto closely. Concatenation has also been a significant resource in some Asian poetries, particularly Japanese renga*.

See JAPAN, POETRY OF; POLYPTOTON.

■ M. P. Medary, "Stanza-Linking in Middle English Verse"; and A.C.L. Brown, "On the Origin of Stanza-Linking in English Alliterative Verse," RR 7 (1916); T. Brooke, "Stanza Connection in the Faerie Queene," MLN 37 (1922); J. M. Bullitt, "The Use of Rhyme Links in the Sonnets of Sidney, Drayton, and Spenser," JEGP 49 (1950); J. C. McGalliard, "Links, Language, and Style in Pearl," Studies in Language, Literature, and Culture of the Middle Ages (1969); E. Miner, Japanese Linked Poetry (1979); Morier; The Poems of Laurence Minot 1333–1352, ed. R. H. Osberg (1996).

T.V.F. BROGAN; I. D. COPESTAKE

CONCEIT. Three meanings are commonly found: (1) the "idea" informing a poem or play (cf. Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy, George Puttenham's Arte of English Poesie, and Hamlet [2.2.530]); (2) an esp. elaborate metaphor or simile like those in Petrarch's Canzoniere; (3) a figure of thought, typical of *baroque and *metaphysical poetry and prose, which ingeniously compares dissimilar things and ideas, cultivating thereby surprise, followed, ideally, by admiration and insight. While all three kinds stress poetic *invention, only the third, rooted largely in 17th-c. theory and practice, ascribes both aesthetic and epistemological value to the conceit. Based on but not limited to *metaphor, the baroque conceit aims wittily to engage both imagination and intellect without acknowledging either's sovereignty. As Gardner writes, "A conceit is a comparison whose ingenuity is more striking than its justness, or, at least, is more immediately striking. . . . [A] comparison becomes a conceit when we are made to concede likeness while being strongly conscious of unlikeness." Such is the case with John Donne's 12-line conceit in "A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning" comparing the souls of separated lovers to the legs of a compass. Cast as a proposition needing proof, the conceit yields images at once more abstract and precise than those typical of Petrarchan conceits.

Often structured like a paralogism or abbreviated syllogism, the baroque or metaphysical conceit exploits literary and cultural commonplaces as well as tropes. Unlike a *simile or strong metaphor, its terms are frequently allusive or qualified by argument, thus its perceived artificiality. When Luis de Góngora in the Soledades (1.481–90) compares Ferdinand Magellan's sight of coral islands in the Pacific to Actaeon's gazing on the white limbs of Diana bathing in the Eurotas river, the wit of the concepto lies in realizing the common peril for both men; but it also depends on the commonplace of forbidden beauty, as well as the simile that cupidity is like eros. The conceit also typically tries to marry the concrete and abstract, without, though, becoming allegorical. As Donne implores in "A nocturnall upon S. Lucies day":

> Study me then, you, who shall lovers bee
> At the next world, that is, at the next Spring:
> For I am every dead thing,
> In whom love wrought new Alchimie.
> For his art did expresse
> A quintessence even from nothingnesse,
> From dull privations, and leane emptinesse:
> He ruin'd mee, and I am re-begot
> Of absence, darknesse, death; things which are not.

The paradoxical image of the speaker as "every dead thing" is distilled from two premises: first, the notion that alchemy produces "quintessence" from "nothingnesse"; second, the analogy that the "art" of "love" is like alchemy's. Further, the lover's hyperbolic transformation is striking and worth studying, Donne suggests, because his own poetic "art" is able to unite hitherto irreconcilable extremes.

As the finest product of *"wit" (Lat. ingenium, It. ingegno, Sp. ingenio, Fr. esprit, Ger. Witz), the baroque conceit underscores the subjective aspects of poetic invention. Yet to interpret it, the reader's ingenuity must partly mimic the poet's. As a contemporary, Jasper Mayne, writes of Donne's verse: "[W]e are thought wits, when 'tis understood."

The baroque conceit has various origins. The epigrammatic wit of Martial and the Greek Anthology*, avidly imitated by J. C. Scaliger, Clément Marot, Ben Jonson, Martin Opitz, and others, encourages its devel. Alternately, Petrarch and his lyric successors refine a sophisticated metaphoric discourse commonly labeled "conceited." In Canzoniere 127, Petrarch takes the terms in a simile comparing love's effect on him to the sun melting snow ("come 'l sol neve mi governa Amore") and then elaborates each of them in a complex series of metaphoric images. Pierre de Ronsard's Amours, Francisco de Quevedo's Canta sola a Lisi (Poems to Lisi), and Shakespeare's sonnets exemplify the many ways that the rich array of Petrarchan conceits are later imitated. But Shakespeare's ironic *blason in sonnet 130 ("My mistress' eyes . . .") also indicates how belated Petrarchans seek to find ever more ingenious, extravagant conceits that might still surprise and move. (Such "outdoing" persists into the 19th c.; Charles Baudelaire, e.g., compares his beloved to a rotting carcass in "Une charogne.")

During the mid-17th c., the conceit becomes the focus of a novel, theoretically rich poetics that, borrowing its terms from faculty psychology and scholastic logic, tries to account for the new conceited styles of Giambattista Marino and Góngora, the revival of Senecan and other "pointed" prose styles, and the period's fascination with *emblems, aphorisms, and other forms of wit.

Baltasar Gracián's Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1648) defines the concepto as "an act of the understanding" that "consists of an excellent concordance, a harmonic correlation, between two or three knowable extremes." A figure either of "proportion" or "disproportion," the conceit is the chief means by which the ingenio "finds" and then "expresses" the "correspondence" between objects in a manner "that not only is content with the truth, as is judgment, but aspires to the beautiful." The finished product of such invention aims to be more than what is typically called a poetic conceit in Eng. For though Gracián equivocates whether such correspondences exist outside the witty mind, he unambiguously casts the concepto as the most discerning way to express new ideas.

Emanuele Tesauro's Il cannocchiale aristotelico (1654) describes the concetto as the acme of poetic creation. Comparing its "wonders" (meraviglie) to scripture's symbolic, parabolic effects, Tesauro also regards the new science's epistemological novelties as justifying concetti. Adapting Aristotle's notion of asteia (urbanity), he makes metaphor's "mental flight" and the poet's ingenio the basis for the conceit. Initially compared to an enthymeme, the conceit is later described as a "metaphorical argument" or "caviling fiction." Celebrating how conceits produce new knowledge from old categories of thought, Tesauro dubs them "urbanely fallacious arguments" (argomenti urbanamente fallici).

In Life of Cowley (1781), however, Samuel Johnson regrets how in metaphysical poetry "the most heterogeneous ideas are yoked by violence together." He blames its overly "analytic" style and "slender conceits and laboured particularities." Yet his perceptive critique of Donne and Abraham Cowley's penchant for discordia concors*, or "combination of dissimilar images or discovery of occult resemblances in things apparently unlike" neatly defines the conceit. Responding to Johnson and heralding his own poetics, T. S. Eliot (1921, 1926) celebrates the metaphysical conceit as uniquely suited to uniting thought and feeling. Tuve reads conceited imagery as emerging from the dialectics of Peter Ramus and his followers and as a "stylistically very striking" form of judgment. Leaning on Gracián's treatise, 20th-c. Sp. crit. treats the style of Quevedo and Góngora as conceptista. Gilman sees similarities between the conceit and anamorphosis. Proctor, Brodsky, and Van Hook analyze the conceit's illogic. Blanco and Vuilleumier regard the conceit as the culmination of Ren. poetics. Rousset and Hallyn stress how the dissolution of the Ren. analogical worldview encourages the conceit's devel.

Further afield, the surrealist emphasis on startling *imagery recalls the aesthetic claims of the baroque conceit but ignores its epistemological promise (see SURREALISM). Comte de Lautréamont's image of "a boy as beautiful as a chance meeting on a dissecting table of a sewing machine and an umbrella" (from his prose poem Les Chants de Maldoror, 1869) is analyzed in André Breton's Manifesto of Surrealism (1924): "The value of the image depends upon the beauty of the spark obtained; it is, consequently, a function of the difference of potential between the two conductors. When the difference exists only slightly, as in a comparison, the spark is lacking."

Finally, forms akin to the Petrarchan conceit occur outside the Eur. trad. The kāvya (cl.) style of Sanskrit poetry often favors extended, complex metaphors (cf. Kālidāsa's "Cloud Messenger"; see SANSKRIT POETICS). In med. *Persian and Urdu poetry, the ghazal is fueled by elaborate, symbolic comparisons; Ḥāfiẓ's fusion of earthly and divine love yields many strikingly conceited images.

See AGUDEZA, CONCEPTISMO.

■ M. Praz, Studi sul concettismo (1934); F. Yates, "The Emblematic Conceit in Giordano Bruno's De Gli Eroici Furori and in the Elizabethan Sonnet Sequences," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 6 (1943); R. Tuve, Elizabethan and Metaphysical Imagery (1947); A. Parker, "La 'Agudeza' en algunos sonetos de Quevedo," Estudios dedicados a Menéndez Pidal, v. 3 (1952); G. Watson, "Hobbes and the Metaphysical Conceit," Journal of the History of Ideas 16 (1955); The Metaphysical Poets, ed. H. Gardner (1957); A. Terry, "Quevedo and the Metaphysical Conceit," BHS 35 (1958); E. Donato, "Tesauro's Poetics: Through the Looking Glass," MLN 78 (1963); J. Rousset, L'intérieur et l'extérieur (1968); K.K. Ruthven, The Conceit (1969); G. Conte, La Metafora barocca (1972); R. E. Proctor, "Emanuele Tesauro: A Theory of the Conceit," MLN 88 (1973); E. Gilman, The Curious Perspective: Literary and Pictorial Wit in the Seventeenth Century (1978); C. Brodsky, "The Imaging of the Logical Conceit," ELH 49 (1982); A. Parker, "'Concept' and 'Conceit': An Aspect of Comparative Literary History," MLR 77 (1982); J. W. Van Hook, "'Concupiscence of Witt': The Metaphysical Conceit in Baroque Poetics," MP 84 (1986); T. E. May, Wit of the Golden Age (1986); J. Tilakasiri, Kalidasa's Imagery and Theory of Poetics (1988); M. Blanco, Les rhétoriques de la pointe: Baltasar Gracián et le conceptisme en Europe (1992); A. Schimmel, A Two-Colored Brocade: The Imagery of Persian Poetry (1992); T. S. Eliot, "The Metaphysical Poets" (1921), "The Conceit in Donne" (1926), The Varieties of Metaphysical Poetry, ed. R. Schuchard (1993); T. Althaus, Epigrammatisches Barock (1996); A. Zárate Ruiz, Gracián, Wit, and the Baroque Age (1996); F. Vuilleumier, "Les conceptismes," Histoire de la rhétorique dans l'Europe moderne, 1450–1950 (1999); F. Hallyn, "Cosmography and Poetics," CHLC, v. 3, ed. G. P. Norton (1999); P. Frare, "Per istraforo di perspettiva": Il "Can- nocchiale Aristotelico" el a poesia del seicento (2000); H. Meyer, "Jesuit Concedes Jesuit Conceits: A Hit on Sarbievius' Head," Gedächtnis und Phantasma, ed. S. Frank et al. (2001); Y. Hersant, La métaphore baroque: d'Aristote á Tesauro (2001); R. Rambuss, "Sacred Subjects and the Aversive Metaphysical Conceit: Crashaw, Serrano, Ofili," ELH 71 (2004).

C. Johnson

CONCEPTISMO. The term conceptismo was not coined until the 18th c., when it began to be used to designate the pervasive practice of the concepto in 17th-c. Spain. The concepto, or *conceit, is an ingenious trope or ling. device—*metaphor, *metonymy, *paronomasia, *hyperbole, *antithesis—that couples disparate elements. Baltasar Gracián, Spain's foremost theorist of the concepto, celebrated it as a manifestation of heightened cultural achievement, hailing its combination of masterful poetic technique and intellectual acumen. The emergence of conceptismo can be traced back to the 16th c. when salient poets converged in the attempt to equip Sp. with the grandeur of an imperial lang. Upholding Petrarchan verse as a desirable model of refinement, poets such as Garcilaso de la Vega, Juan Boscán, and Fernando de Herrera cultivated a lang. rich in wordplay and syntactic sophistication. Such artifice was amplified by the 17th-c. conceit, which ranged from the logical to the farfetched. The figures classified by Gracián as conceits by virtue of correspondence and proportion pair relatable elements, as in the case of the connection between "puerta" (door) and "alma" (soul) in the following verses by Félix Lope de Vega: "En vano llama a la puerta, / Quien no ha llamado en el alma" (In vain he calls at the door / Who has not called on the soul; quoted in Agudeza y arte de ingenio). Meanwhile, those qualified as conceits by disparity and dissimilarity unite terms that are discordant in the extreme: "estuve vivo con la muerte" (I was alive with death; Francisco de Quevedo, poem 337). Not confined to high genres, the concepto figured prominently in satirical poetry. Illustrative in this terrain is Quevedo's parallel, in a poem (826) mocking Luis de Góngora, between "coplas . . . divinas" (divine couplets) and "letrinas" (latrines).

Hispanist scholarship traditionally opposed conceptismo to culteranismo, the other preeminent stylistic mode of the baroque. Where conceptismo is considered an exhibition of agudeza or superior cognitive power, culteranismo, also closely linked to aristocratizing Italianate currents, is characterized as an ostentatious mastery of cultural referents. Identified by Collard with the emergence of the bizarro (elegant) and the docto (highly educated) as prized cultural values, culteranismo presents luxurious ornamentation, abundant mythological and historical references, Latinisms, and labyrinthine syntax. Where conceptismo and culteranismo have distinctive qualities, the idea that they constituted two separate schools, the former headed by Quevedo and the latter by Góngora, has been revised by current scholarship, which notes that they are best approached as stylistic traits that often coexist in the same poetic corpus. The dichotomy, upheld well into the 20th c., was the legacy of Enlightenment critics who, while regarding both tendencies as manifestations of poor taste, took all too seriously the mutual oppositions voiced by Góngora and his enemies.

Culteranismo was famously vilified by doctrinaire figures like Quevedo and the scholar Jáuregui as an affront to moral and social rectitude. Deemed a betrayal of national gravitas and a submission to foreign influences, it was tainted by associations with Asiatic effeminacy and converso culture. Significantly, the word culterano, from which culteranismo is derived, was concocted by the anti-Gongorists to echo the word luterano (Lutheran), another indicator of heresy. Conceptismo itself was not free of controversy, as Counter-Reformation ideologues denounced the more excessive manifestations of the conceit, arguing that undue emphasis on conceptual ingenuity resulted in the sacrifice of didactic content. Although himself a master of the conceit, Quevedo avoided positive mention of the concepto in his theoretical writings and targeted conceptista poets in his social satires. The subversive implications of conceptismo continue to be recognized by contemp. scholars who contend that its more extreme forms (both serious and comic) transgress the balance, harmony, and decorum prescribed by Aristotelian mimetic principles. From this perspective, conceptismo is viewed as a self-conscious subversion of Ren. *classicism, its idiosyncratic tropes approaching a mod. aesthetic awareness in their recognition of the subjective nature of poetic correspondences.

The social and political underpinnings of conceptismo and culteranismo are best understood in relation to early mod. court culture. In its construction of a highly codified lang. requiring discernment and inventiveness on the part of both author and reader, the expression of the new poets was in line with the valorization of supreme prudence and discretion as core virtues of the post-Machiavellian courtier. In an era marked by reason-of-state doctrines and Tacitean skepticism, Ren. paradigms of open civic communication were displaced by an awareness of the need for sinuous craftiness and dissemblance. From a rhetorical perspective, then, the new poetry can be said to depart from Quintilian's standards of eloquence as artful morality and to espouse eloquence as spectacular exhibition. Its links to other art forms that conditioned curial life, such as royal ceremony, theater, and painting, as well as to political lit., are accordingly receiving growing scholarly attention.

See renaissance poetics, renaissance poetry.

■ E. Rivers, "El conceptismo del Polifemo," Atenea 143 (1961); A. Collard, Nueva poesía, conceptismo, culteranismo en la crítica española (1967); J. de Jáuregui y Aguilar, Discurso poético, ed. M. Romanos ([1624], 1978); A. García Berrio, "Quevedo y la conciencia léxica del concepto" and J. M. Pozuelo Yvancos, "Sobre la unión de teoría y praxis literaria en el conceptismo: un tópico de Quevedo a la luz de la teoría literaria de Gracián," Cuadernos hispanoamericanos 361–62 (1980);

R. Lachman, "'Problematic Similarity': Sarbiewski's Treatise De Acuto et arguto in the Context of Concettistic Theories of the 17th Century," Russian Literature 26 (1990); M. Blanco, Les rhétoriques de la pointe: Baltasar Gracián et le conceptisme en Europe (1992); I. Arellano, "El conceptismo de Góngora: más divagaciones sobre los 'déligos capotuncios' del romance 'Diez años vivió Belerma,'" Hommage a Robert Jammes, ed. F. Cerdan (1994); F. de Quevedo y Villegas, "Dedicatoria Al Excelentísimo señor Conde-Duque," Quevedo y su poética dedicada a Olivares. Estudio y edición, ed. E. Rivers (1998); E. Marquer, "Conscience baroque et apparences: Le conceptisme de Baltasar Gracián," Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale 2 (1999); J. Lieberman, "Estética conceptista y ética mercantilista de Confusión de confusiones (Amsterdam 1688)," BHS 77 (2000); L. Schwartz, "Linguistic and Pictorial Conceits in the Baroque: Velázquez between Quevedo and Gracián," Writing for the Eyes in the Spanish Golden Age, ed. F. de Armas (2004); L. Dolfi, "Culteranismo" e teatro nella Spagna del seicento (2006).

A. García-Bryce

CONCEPTUAL POETRY. Conceptual poetry (or conceptual writing), usually understood to fall under the rubric of experimental poetry, dates to the late 1990s in Canada and the United States. Works are called conceptual when they embody a concept that is more important to their purpose than the actual lang. and ideas they express—the poetic qualities, or even the oddities, of everyday lang., for instance, or the materiality of the signifier or the banality of interpretation. Notable conceptual works include No. 111 2.7.93-10.20.96 (1997), Fidget (2000), and Soliloquy (2001) by the artist and archivist Kenneth Goldsmith; Eunoia (2001) by Christian Bök; and Apostrophe (2006) by Bill Kennedy and Darren Wershler-Henry, based on an earlier poem by Kennedy (1994). In his introduction to Against Expression, Craig Dworkin remarks that, before there was conceptual writing, there was conceptual art; yet coeval with the conceptual art of the 1960s, a mode of writing that we can now call "conceptual" was evident in Vito Acconci's early works, such as "READ THIS WORD" (1969), which consists of nothing more than a series of instructions for how to read the very words that constitute the instructions. Likewise, *modernism already exhibited conceptual tendencies, such as in Gertrude Stein's "Five Words in a Line" (1930), which simply reads, "Five Words in a Line."

While poets have arguably been producing conceptual writing for quite some time, conceptualism did not solidify as a literary movement until the digital age and its accelerated procedures for treating lang. as data that can be mined, processed, or generated. Many conceptualists recognize the computer's reduction of all writing to binary code, and the abundance of information through the advent of the Internet significantly changes the ways in which lang. is currently written and understood. Such changes structure a new media environment in which the poet must operate.

Conceptual writing is particularly intent on breaking the widely held belief that writing is a solitary activity characterized by the creative *genius and *originality of an expressive artist, a belief that may have reached its zenith in the late 19th c. but that has persisted into the present. In contrast to expressive models of poetry, conceptualism elevates the concept behind a work and the labor required to produce it over its semantic meaning or emotional content. Goldsmith has explicitly called for an "uncreative writing" in which "all of the planning and decisions are made beforehand and the execution is a perfunctory affair. The idea becomes a machine that makes the text" ("Paragraphs on Conceptual Writing," 2005). Otherwise put, the idea driving the work is a machine that has been programmed to process lang. in some determined way such that the product is not necessarily as important as the production process itself. E.g., No. 111 2.7.93-10.20.96 is a 600-page collection of phrases ending in r sounds, arranged alphabetically and by syllable count until it finally reaches 7,228 syllables by appropriating the entirety of D.H. Lawrence's short story "The Rocking-Horse Winner." However, given the importance of the production process, conceptual writing is also aligned with *Flarf (though conceptual writers such as Goldsmith have pointed out distinctions between the two movements), as well as constraint-based writing (see CONSTRAINT), procedural writing, and appropriative writing. E.g., Bök's Eunoia doubles as a constraint-based work insofar as it consists of five chapters, each of which uses only one of the vowels a, e, i, o, or u. Place and Fitterman write in Notes on Conceptualisms that whether a given practice falls under conceptual writing depends on whether the poet is trying to "reach for a larger idea outside of the text"; thus, they implicitly argue that the aforementioned writing practices are all modes of conceptual writing.

Certain conceptual writers' attempts to treat lang. as data (exemplified by Goldsmith's work as much as by Bök's recent attempt to inject the DNA of the bacteria Deinococcus radiodurans with a string of nucleotides to form a comprehensible poem) is partly driven by a desire to write a poetry that is both reflective of the culture of the digital era and enmeshed in or disruptive of the inner workings of technoscience. Yet other works of conceptual writing, such as Vanessa Place's Tragodía, 1: Statement of Facts (2010), elegantly make the argument that conceptual writing in which an idea "becomes a machine" need not necessarily be enabled by the computer; it need only draw attention to (in Goldsmith's words) the "unboring boring" ("Being Boring") or the material practice of writing itself, a practice that—even in the case of the tedious transcription or the rendering into "neutral lang." of court testimonies—cannot help but be inflected by the act of the writer writing. These debates point to the fact that early 21st-c. conceptual writing consists of a rapidly transforming set of speculative practices led by a growing field of innovative poet-theorists.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS, ELECTRONIC POETRY.

■ M. Perloff, 21st-Century Modernism (2002);

K. Goldsmith, "Being Boring" (2004), http://epc.buffalo.edu/authors/goldsmith/goldsmith_boring.html; "Kenneth Goldsmith and Conceptual Poetics," sp. iss., Open Letter 12.7 (2005); M. Perloff, "Conceptualisms, Old and New" (2007), http://marjorieperloff.com/articles/conceptualisms-old-and-new/; V. Place and R. Fitterman, Notes on Conceptualisms (2009); Against Expression: An Anthology of Conceptual Writing, ed. C. Dworkin and K. Goldsmith (2011).

L. Emerson

CONCISION. A general term for lexical compression, concentration, and economy, designed to achieve "maximum efficiency of expression" (Pound 1913). Concision is often associated with compact forms—*sonnet, *haiku (see RENGA), and epigram, among others. Connotations vary considerably in different contexts: concision embodies distinct poetic qualities, e.g., in Chinese shi, the Augustan *heroic couplet, and *symbolism. It has served as a flashpoint in arguments about metrics, *free verse and poetic *form, didacticism, *difficulty, and *realism.

Concision has been described as "native to the lyric" (Vendler 1995), but poetic media influence its exercise. The terseness of *epitaph is in part conditioned by the need to carve it in stone. Brief forms are suited to the spatial constraints of a print culture in which poems must fit in magazines, on subway walls, and in the pages of anthols. (They are also suited, some would argue, to the pedagogical requirements of academic settings.) Some 21st-c. poetry exhibits the compactness of contemp., character-restricted communications (e.g., text messaging, microblogging).

The privileging of concision is as long as the hist. of poetry and ranges across both Western and non-Western trads. Aristotle's Rhetoric gives instructions for achieving concision, such as naming a thing instead of describing it, bracketing two words under one article, and eliminating connectives. Cl. Chinese poetry, in part because of the noninflectional nature of the lang., is distinguished by extreme compression: pronouns are dropped, content words (shizi) take precedence, and grammatical connections are minimal. The concluding couplet of Shakespearean sonnets demonstrates the semantic intensities that emerge from verbal concentration. Many forms of oral poetry, such as the traditional four-line Malay pantun and the mod. one- or two-line Somali balwo, depend on concision to persist in listeners' auditory memories. The related Japanese forms of waka*, renga, and hokku, distinguished by intricate stanzaic patterning and strict sound-unit counts, privilege lexical economy. Comic effects of concision are apparent in the work of the hokku poet Matsuo Bashō, as well as in various Western and non-Western trads. of the epigram, whose "jerk or sting" (John Dryden) is a prominent feature in 18th-c. Eng. verse. In the hands of Augustan poets, heroic couplets show off concision's oratorical and satiric possibilities, and Alexander Pope claimed to write his philosophical essays in verse because he "could express them more shortly this way . . . and . . . the force as well as grace of arguments or instructions, depends on their conciseness" (Essay on Man).

Concision is an arguable feature of romantic poetry. Twentieth-c. New Critics condemned the romantics for an emotionality lacking in concision (see NEW CRITICISM), but this implies a false dichotomy of concision and *affect. The expression of powerful feeling can require concision. In William Blake's Songs of Innocence and Experience and the "spots of time" that punctuate William Wordsworth's autobiographical epic The Prelude, concision contributes to a mystical quality and to an affective intensity. The romantic argument against poetic *diction associates simplicity with concision, praising a poetry stripped to a threadbare, affective baseline: thus, for Wordsworth, the lines "My lonely anguish melts no heart but mine; / And in my breast the imperfect joys expire," from the middle of Thomas Gray's "Sonnet on the Death of Mr. Richard West," are preferable to its opening: "In vain to me the smiling Mornings shine, / And redd'ning Phoebus lifts his golden fire." The romantic effort was to retrieve the primitive power of expression from the built-up sedimentation of poetic hist. Paradoxically, however, concision can be enabled by shared conventions, be they general (the historical accrual of meaning in specific words or phrases) or particular (intimacy among groups of poets). The importance of brevity in Japanese linked poetry, for instance, has been attributed to the closeness among collaborating poets, which eliminated needless discursiveness and decorousness.

In the Wordsworthian moral trad., plain spokenness could lead to prolixity, but even here, concise expression remains highly valued. Walter Bagehot declared in "Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Browning; or Pure, Ornate and Grotesque Art in English Poetry" (1864) that "poetry should be memorable and emphatic, intense and soon over." The question is often, rather, that of what is to be expressed. "What is not interesting," Matthew Arnold argued in the Preface to his Poems (1853), "is that which does not add to our knowledge of any kind; that which is vaguely conceived and loosely drawn; a representation which is general, indeterminate, and faint, instead of being particular, precise, and firm."

Through the 19th c., the quickened pace of life and the secular apprehension of the transience of experience solicited compact modes of expression. The concentrated aesthetic moment became existentially valuable: "We have an interval, and then our place knows us no more," wrote Walter Pater in The Renaissance (1873); "our one chance lies in expanding that interval, in getting as many pulsations as possible into the given time." The movements of *aestheticism and *decadence saw the descriptive compulsions of realism give way to a subjectivist pointillism, and symbolist poetry—more "real" than realism (Stéphane Mallarmé's poetic flower is "l'absente de tous bouquets" (absent from all bouquets)—found its raison d'être not in communicative simplicity or didacticism but in access to a more profound level of existence, expressed in concentrated lyric moments.

*Modernism meant new opportunities for the exercise of concision. What Ezra Pound (1916) called the "one image poem" summoned the sparseness of Japanese and Chinese poetry in recording "the precise instant when a thing outward and objective . . . darts into a thing inward and subjective." The lyric intensity of Pound's "In a Station of the Metro" or of Giuseppe Ungaretti's famously brief "Mattina" captures the profundity of the minute. Such poems anticipate *minimalism, in which diminution and reduction signal authenticity and exemplify the rejection of discursiveness summarized by W. C. Williams's phrase "No ideas but in things." In poems such as "The Red Wheelbarrow" and "As the Cat," Williams uses small structures to force attention to infinitesimal units of meaning within the poem (sounds, stress patterns, line breaks).

The formal openness of these poems points to the centrality of concision in arguments about free verse. Conventional poetic forms are typically seen as demanding compression: Wordsworth's 1806 sonnet "Nuns Fret Not" states the case by linking form with self-denial (" 'twas pastime to be bound / Within the Sonnet's scanty plot of ground"). But for Pound (1918), vers libre* best facilitates the exercise of concision: "words are shovelled in to fill a metric pattern or to complete the noise of a rhyme-sound. . . . If you are using a symmetrical form, don't put in what you want to say and then fill up the remaining vacuums with slush."

Concision bears political meanings. It can represent an avoidance of a hegemonic discourse or the difficulty of negotiating that discourse or even the outright silencing of voices within it; Adrienne Rich's half-sonnet "An Unsaid Word" uses concision to communicate "a negative experience of power" (Keyes). For Audre Lorde, poetry's concision suits it to the representation of marginalized experience: "of all the art forms, poetry is the most economical. It is . . . the one which can be done between shifts, in the hospital pantry, on the subway, and on scraps of surplus paper." Theodor Adorno's oft-quoted dictum "To write poetry after Auschwitz is barbaric" suggests how a concision evoking silence might be the most appropriate way of describing certain experiences; thus, in Paul Celan's "Chymisch" ("Alchemical"), silence is not only sacramental and memorial but emblematic of lang.'s potential violence: "Schweigen, wie Gold gekocht, in / verkohlten / Händen" (Silence, cooked like gold, in / charred / hands).

■ E. Pound, "The Serious Artist," The Egoist (1913); Gaudier-Brzeska (1916); and "A Retrospect," Pavannes and Divisions (1918); Empson; R. H. Brower and E. R. Miner, Japanese Court Poetry (1961); R. Finnegan, Oral Poetry (1977); The Columbia Book of Chinese Poetry: From Early Times to the Thirteenth Century, ed. B. Watson (1984); A. Lorde, "Age, Race, Sex and Class," Sister Outsider (1984); C. Keyes, The Aesthetics of Power: The Poetry of Adrienne Rich (1986); H. Vendler, The Music of What Happens (1988); P. Zumthor, Oral Poetry: An Introduction, trans. K. Murphy-Judy (1990); P. Nicholls, Modernisms (1995); H. Vendler, Soul Says: On Recent Poetry (1995); Sources of Japanese Tradition: 1600–2000, ed. W. T. DeBary et al., 2d ed. (2001); K. Painter, Flint on a Bright Stone: A Revolution of Precision and Restraint in American, Russian, and German Modernism (2006); Z. Cai, How to Read Chinese Poetry (2007).

C. Rovee

CONCRETE POETRY. Although used in a general way to refer to work that has been composed with specific attention to graphic features such as *typography, layout, shape, or distribution on the page, concrete poetry properly understood has a more specific definition created in the mid-1950s by the Swiss-Bolivian poet Eugen Gomringer and the Brazilian poets Décio Pignatari and Haroldo and Augusto de Campos. The original tenets of concrete poetry are clear in the early writings of the group. Their 1958 "Pilot Plan for Concrete Poetry" outlines a distinct approach in which form and meaning (material expression and reference field) would be as close to each other as possible. Thus, concrete suggests a unification of the word with its presentation. The poets derived certain ideas from the work of Ezra Pound, in particular his adoption of Ernest Fenollosa's productive misunderstanding of the Chinese ideogram as a self-identical verbal-visual expression. The concrete poets recast this notion into an idea of isomorphism (identity of shape and meaning) that they believed embodied an ideal of structure as content. This attempt to eliminate extraneous associations or ambiguities comports with the aesthetics of "specific objects" expressed by minimalist artists of the 1960s, who sought to strip art objects of all superfluous elements.

Gomringer's poem "silencio" (1953) exemplifies the concretists' aim of creating a total integration of word as image in a single aesthetic expression. By repeating the word "silence" eight times to frame an empty "quiet" space, Gomringer's poem is self-defining and self-referential. Gomringer had been the secretary to Max Bill, a visual artist and graphic designer affiliated with the New Bauhaus, a post–World War II Swiss movement with a highly formalist orientation. Bill used the term concrete to identify his own functionalist, analytical methodology, which had an influence on the devel. of Swiss-style graphic design. Though committed to principles of self-identical work, concrete poets were profoundly interested in and attracted by mass culture and the graphic langs. of signage and advertising. Pignatari's famous "beba coca cola" (1957) reworks commercial lang. to critique corporate colonialism.

Concrete poets embraced the concept of intermedia works that could operate simultaneously in verbal-to-visual and acoustic modes. The use of sans serif typefaces, particularly Helvetica and Univers, lent the concrete poets an air of cool modernity that separated their work typographically from trads. of humanist poetry and *lyric voice. Many concrete poets distanced themselves from earlier 20th-c. avant-garde movements by their less explicit political content and absence of inflammatory rhet. But they continued the trad. of writing *manifestos to state their aesthetic positions.

Concrete poetry found many adherents, and the poets who identified themselves with the term quickly expanded to include major figures in Europe, the Brit. Isles, the U.S., Japan, and South America. With increased distance and time, the work of these groups and individuals expanded beyond the strict orthodoxy outlined in the pilot plan. Thus, many poets who experimented with visual forms and typographic features are loosely associated with concrete poetry, even though their work is only pictorial, composed as a field or a score, rather than conforming to the strictly self-referential guidelines of concretism. By the time the first three major anthologies of concrete poetry appeared, ed. by E. Williams (1967), S. Bann (1967) and M. E. Solt (1968), their editorial range included poets from around the globe.

Precedents for concrete poetry can be traced to cl. antiquity and followed into the Middle Ages when poems shaped as religious icons carried theological meaning (see CARMINA FIGURATA). Similar shaped works appeared in printed form in the Ren. and after as part of a contemplative trad. and then in a secular era as novelties and poetic amusements. Few visually shaped works follow the intellectual rigor of concrete poetry's self-identical reduction. Important later 20th-c. devels. brought concrete poetry into dialogue with procedural work, visual arts, installation, film, *sound poetry, typewriter poetry, critical theories of deconstruction and *performance, and later digital works using animation and graphic means.

See TECHNOPAEGNION, VISUAL POETRY.

■ Concrete Poetry: An International Anthology, ed. S. Bann (1967); An Anthology of Concrete Poetry, ed. E. Williams (1967); Concrete Poetry: A World View, ed. M. E. Solt (1968); D. Judd, "Specific Objects," Donald Judd: Complete Writings 1959–1975 (1975); D. Seaman, Concrete Poetry in France (1981); W. Bohn, The Aesthetics of Visual Poetry 1914–1928 (1986); J. Drucker, The Visible Word (1994); Experimental-Visual-Concrete, ed. K. D. Jackson, J. Drucker (1996); Poesure et Peintrie, ed. B. Blistène, V. Legrand (1998); W. Bohn, Modern Visual Poetry (2000).

J. DRUCKER

CONCRETE UNIVERSAL. In an essay published in 1947 that was later adapted as a chapter in The Verbal Icon, W. K. Wimsatt proposed the term concrete universal as a primary concept in "an objective criticism." Wimsatt's term works off the long philosophical and literary preoccupation with similarly opposed terms: abstract and concrete, universal and individual, general and particular. Defining a literary work as a "complex of details" composed and complicated by its "human values," Wimsatt argues that a concrete universal, which may be a character, a figure of speech, or some other formal element of a work, embodies the individual but expresses the universal. In other words, the meaning expressed in the particular way an object or concept is represented becomes inseparable from the meaning expressed by the object or concept itself. For the *New Criticism, of which Wimsatt was a major exponent, the notion of the concrete universal is a considered approach to the question of how complex formal and structural features produce not only an object that requires a thoroughgoing *explication, but a kind of truth.

Deriving the term from G.W.F. Hegel (Phenomenology of Spirit), Wimsatt cites Aristotle, Plotinus, Hegel, and John Crowe Ransom, among others, in tracing the critical legacy surrounding the "concrete" and the "universal" through canonical statements: "Poetry imitates action and that poetry tends to express the universal" (Aristotle); Shakespeare's genius is due to a "union and interpenetration of the universal and particular" (S. T. Coleridge); the artist's "soul reaches straight to the forms that lie behind in the divine intelligence" (Plotinus); "The business of the poet is not to number the streaks of the tulip; it is to give us not the individual, but the species" (Samuel Johnson). Wimsatt believed that New Critics such as William Empson, Allen Tate, R. P. Blackmur, and Cleanth Brooks had "implicitly" elaborated similar assumptions.

Wimsatt's term concrete universal is both descriptive and prescriptive, involving both an analysis of rhetorical structure and a judgment of the work's difficulty and sophistication—thus, its use and value; indeed, Wimsatt asserts that "complexity of form is sophistication of content." As a prescriptive concept, the concrete universal is employed as an interpretive tool by the "objective" critic to aid readers to come to a "full realization" on their own and to distinguish the "good" from the "bad." Following the publication of The Verbal Icon, Ransom contested the efficacy and clarity of Wimsatt's notion of the concrete universal, finding the concrete and the universal "radically incommensurable," while defending an earlier formulation of his own that emphasized the concrete detail in poetry (*"texture") as central to the knowledge about the world that it makes available (see SCIENCE AND POETRY).

In a substantial critical encounter with the term, Knapp dedicates a chapter in Literary Interest to revisiting the concrete universal, finding that Wimsatt's account of the distinctiveness of the literary is troubled by his (unknowing) reliance on notions of *affect such as interest and pleasure. While Knapp finds Wimsatt's use of affect unintentional, he argues that the affectivity of literary representations (and, thus, of *imagination) is endowed with its own type of generality, as well as its own kind of rationality. Knapp does not find the *"unity" of literary works that Wimsatt claims but offers that literary works particularize typical meanings and create new connections and associations short of achieving a complete melding of particularity and typicality. Knapp also interprets the concrete universal in terms of what he calls "literary interest": literary works offer an analogical experience to what it feels like to be an "agent," by reproducing the oscillation between typicality and particularity that characterizes the interiority of human agency.

See AFFECTIVE FALLACY, INTENTIONAL FALLACY.

■ J. C. Ransom, "The Concrete Universal: Observations on the Understanding of Poetry," KR 16 (1954); W. K. Wimsatt, "The Concrete Universal," The Verbal Icon (1954); S. Knapp, "The Concrete Universal," Literary Interest: The Limits of Anti-Formalism (1993); F. Jameson, "The Experiments of Time: Providence and Realism," The Novel, ed. Franco Moretti, v. 2 (2006); T. Davis, Formalism, Experience, and the Making of American Literature in the Eighteenth Century (2007).

J. K. Mann

CONFESSIONAL POETRY. Confession in religious, psychoanalytic, criminal, and legal settings refers to the revelation of a shameful secret, as in a sin, crime, moral failing, social transgression, or neurosis. In an Am. literary context, confessional poetry refers to a group of poets writing during the 1950s and 1960s (Robert Lowell, W. D. Snodgrass, John Berryman, Sylvia Plath, Anne Sexton), who often employed the first-person *voice to explore transgressive autobiographical subjects incl. mental illness, familial trauma, gender and sexuality, and moral and political iconoclasm. M. L. Rosenthal originated the term in a review of Robert Lowell's Life Studies in 1959: "Because of the way Lowell brought his private humiliations, sufferings, and psychological problems into the poems of Life Studies, the word 'confessional' seemed appropriate." Confessional poetry is formally diverse, employing narrative, lyric, and dramatic modes and both free and metrical forms, while stylistically it often follows conventions of 19th-c. realist prose in its presentation of autobiographical material (Perloff). For example, Lowell's Life Studies originated in his prose memoir 91 Revere Street, and he stated in an interview with Ian Hamilton that he wanted the poems to be as "single-surfaced as a photograph." The confessional poets' debts to *modernism are also evident in uses of surrealist imagery (Plath) and multivocality (Berryman).

Confession in postwar Am. poetry can be seen as part of a more general resurgence of neoromantic poetics and a turn to autobiographical practices after World War II. Allen Ginsberg's effort in Howl to "stand before you speechless and intelligent and shaking with shame, rejected yet confessing out the soul" spelled an end to poetic impersonality (Eliot) and the New Critical bias against *intention and *affect. A variety of postwar poets sought forms of "naked," honest expression; cultivated spontaneity, immediacy, and a conversational style; privileged process over product; explored the Freudian unconscious and taboo desires; and initiated new methods of conjoining poetry and everyday life. Ginsberg's Howl, Frank O'Hara's personism, Amiri Baraka's "Black Art," Adrienne Rich's feminist poetics, and Robert Bly's *Deep Image all share an interest in the poet's person as the ground for varied explorations of self, politics, nation, and aesthetics. Despite the specific connotations of confessional poetry, then, it emerges from and converses with trads. of romantic lyric, autobiography, and the poetry of witness. Contemp. poets who explore confession, incl. Sharon Olds, Frank Bidart, and Susan Hahn, indicate its enduring interest.

Judgments of confessional poetry have hinged on interpretations of the poem's relationship to the biographical poet. Detractors have read the poems as naïve autobiographical utterances and often as literal forms of therapeutic catharsis unmediated by aesthetic considerations, or conversely, as exhibitionist, sensationalist, self-serving performances (e.g., Lerner, Bawer, Gullans). Defenders have emphasized the problems with biographical readings, pointing out that judgments of the poetry often rest on moral evaluation of the poet's conduct (Travisano) and that pejorative responses are often feminized. Confessional poets and their sympathetic critics have pointed out the artful, fictive nature of confessional representation and performance, incl. the use of dramatic personae and dramatic *monologue (Lowell, Sexton, Berryman), while feminist scholars have emphasized Sexton's and Plath's performance and interrogation of the gendered self as a critical commentary on cold-war culture and an important influence on feminist poetry and performance art.

Given the pejorative connotations of confessional poetry, Travisano has called for its demise as a "critical paradigm," while others argue that the concept of confession can usefully elucidate poetry's truth claims. In that the confessant unveils secrets despite the stigma of shame, this revelation against societal resistance contributes to the expectation of the liberation of truth. As de Man writes, to confess is "to overcome guilt and shame in the name of truth: it is an epistemological use of language in which ethical values . . . are superseded by values of truth and falsehood." Gilmore argues that "as a mode of truth production the confession in both its oral and its written forms grants the autobiographer a kind of authority derived from the confessor's proximity to 'truth.' " Critics influenced by *poststructuralism have found in confessional poetry not liberating, therapeutic expression but complex challenges to ideals of the coherent subject, referential lang., truth, and *sincerity. Foucault's understanding of confession has proven particularly influential. Counter to the belief that confession "unburdens" or "liberates," Foucault argues that confession is "the effect of a power that constrains us." As "a ritual that unfolds within a power relationship," the confession is shaped by the "authority who requires the confession, prescribes and appreciates it, and intervenes in order to judge, punish, forgive, console, and reconcile." Critics have drawn attention to confessional poetry's foregrounding of these power relationships and to the poetry's negotiation of its reader as a potential judge, analyst, jailer, or confessor. From this perspective, confessional poetry reveals the moral problem of judgment and explores the epistemological problems of truth and the relation of life and lit.

If one reads confessional poetry in the context of the longer trad. of confessional lit., Augustine and Jean-Jacques Rousseau provide two important models. For Augustine, self-conscious reflection on and repentance for sin lead to conversion and incorporation within a Christian community, whereas, for Rousseau, confession enacts individual difference rather than moral conformity, permitting the painting of a "portrait in every way true to nature." In Rousseau's text, confession of "sin" allows him to indict an inherently unjust society rather than take responsibility for error; de Man argues that confession-cum-excuse allows Rousseau to take pleasure in the exhibition of shame. Both models are evident in the poetic trad.; as Davie argues, there are poets who confess virtue (William Wordsworth) and those who confess vice (Lord Byron, Charles Baudelaire), poets who seek accommodation within a moral community and others who transgress moral community to critical ends. In mid-20th c. America, although the influence of Augustinian confession persists (New), Rousseau's example dominates; Rosenthal influentially argued that the confessional poet's alienation from society embodies a nation and culture in crisis. Successive critics often treat the confessional poet as "representative victim" (Breslin) and the confessional poem as an instrument that mirrors and critically diagnoses the culture. Hence, Middlebrook argues that "the images of the confessional poem encode the whole culture's shame-making machinery," while others have demonstrated confessional poetry's critical engagements with specific contexts, incl. Freudian psychoanalysis, McCarthyism, surveillance, privacy law, television, commercial culture, and gendered codes.

■ R. Langbaum, The Poetry of Experience: The Dramatic Monologue in Modern Literary Tradition (1957); M. L. Rosenthal, The New Poets: American and British Poetry since World War II (1967); D. Davie, "On Sincerity: From Wordsworth to Ginsberg," Encounter 31 (1968); L. Trilling, Sincerity and Authenticity (1972); M. Perloff, The Poetic Art of Robert Lowell (1973); M. Foucault, The History of Sexuality, Volume 1: An Introduction, trans. R. Hurley (1978); P. de Man, Allegories of Reading (1979); P. Breslin, The Psycho-Political Muse: American Poetry since the 1950s (1987); L. Lerner, "What Is Confessional Poetry?" Critical Quarterly 29 (1987); C. Gullans, "Review of Live or Die," Anne Sexton: Telling the Tale, ed. S. E. Colburn (1988); I. Hamilton, "A Conversation with Robert Lowell," Robert Lowell, Interviews and Memoirs, ed. J. Meyers (1988); B. Bawer, "Sylvia Plath and the Poetry of Confession," The New Criterion 9 (1991); M. Perloff, Radical Artifice (1991); J. Rose, The Haunting of Sylvia Plath (1991); C. Forché, Against Forgetting: Twentieth-Century Poetry of Witness (1993); K. Lant, "The Big Strip Tease: Female Bodies and Male Power in the Poetry of Sylvia Plath," Contemporary Literature 34 (1993); D. Middlebrook, "What Was Confessional Poetry?" and G. Orr, "The Postconfessional Lyric," The Columbia History of American Poetry, ed. J. Parini (1993); L. Gilmore, "Policing Truth: Confession, Gender, and Autobiographical Authority," Autobiography and Postmodernism, ed. K. Ashley, L. Gilmore, G. Peters (1994); R. Felski, "On Confession," Women, Autobiography, Theory: A Reader, ed. S. Smith and J. Watson (1998); C. Britzolakis, Sylvia Plath and the Theatre of Mourning (1999); I. Gammel, Confessional Politics: Women's Sexual Self-Representations in Life Writing and Popular Media (1999); T. Travisano, Midcentury Quartet: Bishop, Lowell, Jarrell, Berryman, and the Making of a Postmodern Aesthetic (1999); D. H. Blake, "Public Dreams: Berryman, Celebrity, and the Culture of Confession," American Literary History 13 (2001); M. Bryant, "Plath, Domesticity, and the Art of Advertising," College Literature 29 (2002); D. Nelson, Pursuing Privacy in Cold War America (2002); J. Rose, On Not Being Able to Sleep: Psychoanalysis and the Modern World (2003); T. Brain, "Dangerous Confessions: The Problem of Reading Sylvia Plath Biographically," J. Gill, "Introduction," and E. Gregory, "Confessing the Body: Plath, Sexton, Berryman, Lowell, Ginsberg, and the Gendered Poetics of the 'Real,'" Modern Confessional Writing, ed. J. Gill (2006); E. New, "Confession, Reformation, and Counter-Reformation in the Career of Robert Lowell," and S. Burt, "My Name Is Henri: Contemporary Poets Discover John Berryman," Reading the Middle Generation Anew, ed. E. L. Haralson (2006); S. Rosenbaum, Professing Sincerity: Modern Lyric Poetry, Commercial Culture, and the Crisis in Reading (2007); J. Badia, Sylvia Plath and the Mythology of Women Readers (2011).

S. Rosenbaum

CONNECTICUT WITS. The Connecticut Wits (or Hartford Wits) were a loose coterie of poets who published numerous poems during the Am. revolutionary and early republic periods. The group originated at Yale College in the early 1770s, when fellow students John Trumbull (1750–1831), Timothy Dwight (1752–1817), David Humphreys (1752–1818), and Joel Barlow (1754–1812) formed a lasting literary friendship around their shared admiration for Alexander Pope, Jonathan Swift, and other Brit. neoclassical writers. This youthful immersion in Augustan poetry would influence the form and content of the Wits' own poetic productions, particularly their emphasis on poetry as a weapon of political or ideological warfare. In general, the Wits supported the patriots in the Am. Revolution and the Federalists during both the constitutional debates of the 1780s and the early partisan political struggles of the 1790s. Their most memorable works include Trumbull's M'Fingal (1775); Dwight's The Triumph of Infidelity (1788) and Greenfield Hill (1794); Barlow's The Vision of Columbus (1787) and "The Hasty Pudding" (1793); and the satiric series The Anarchiad (1786–87), written in collaboration by Trumbull, Humphreys, Barlow, and fellow Hartford poet Lemuel Hopkins (1750–1801).

By the 1790s, as the original Wits focused their energies on careers in education, law, and diplomacy, they would be succeeded by a second generation of Connecticut Wits (sometimes called the "minor" Wits), which included Hopkins, Richard Alsop (1761–1815), Theodore Dwight (1764–1846), and Elihu Hubbard Smith (1771–98). Writing amid the tumult of the Fr. Revolution and the rise of the Jeffersonian party, the latter group would publish numerous verse *satires both individually and collaboratively, incl. The Echo series (1791–98), The Democratiad (1795), and The Political Greenhouse (1798).

See NEOCLASSICAL POETICS.

■ L. Howard, The Connecticut Wits (1942); W. C. Dowling, Poetry and Ideology in Revolutionary Connecticut (1990); C. Wells, "Revolutionary Verse," Oxford Handbook of Early American Literature, ed. K. J. Hayes (2008).

C. WELLS

CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION. The distinction between denotation and connotation was important in lit. crit. and theory from the 1930s to the 1970s. The denotation of a word or phrase is its literal or obvious meaning or reference as specified in a dictionary; the connotations of a word or phrase are the secondary or associated significances that it commonly suggests or implies. This distinction is complicated in practice because many words have more than one denotation and because dictionaries sometimes include definitions of a word based on connotation as well as denotation. E.g., the first set of definitions of the noun rose given by the OED tells us that a rose is both "a well-known beautiful and fragrant flower" and "a rose-plant, rose-bush, or rose-tree"; in addition, the OED gives a number of "allusive, emblematic, or figurative uses" (e.g., "a bed of roses" or "under the rose") that reveal the huge store of cultural connotations associated with the flower.

The connotations of a word or phrase accrue from the way it is used in a particular lang. community. Our knowledge of connotations comes from our access to the cultural assumptions of the society in which the word or phrase was used. When Robert Burns's speaker declares that his "love is like a red, red rose," we do not read it as a denotative statement of fact but respond to the connotations—of sexual love and passion—that the simile transfers to the woman and/or his feelings for her. These connotations derive from the long association between roses and romantic love in Western culture.

Critics have often suggested that lit., esp. poetry, makes sustained and highly organized uses of connotations. All aspects of poems and poetic lang.—genres, figures, sound patterns, and so on—can evoke connotations through their use in the general culture and in other poetry. Under the influence of early 20th-c. forerunners such as Richards and Empson, Anglo-Am. New Critics assumed that poetry employs the connotations of words and phrases in order to suggest levels of meaning and feeling that embody the subtle nuances of human experience and reveal truths that are unavailable to those nonliterary discourses (such as science) that supposedly employ purely denotative lang. Yet the New Critics also sought to exclude the reader's merely personal associations by insisting that valid connotations are part of the public culture in which the poem was produced. They also argued that the connotations of the poem as a whole make up a coherent, organic pattern—what Ransom called "the tissue, or totality of connotation." For New Critics such as Brooks, a poem's tissue of connotations constitutes an organic complexity that cannot be reduced to denotative statements without destroying the poem's essence (the "heresy of paraphrase"; see NEW CRITICISM).

Eur. literary theory has attempted to deal with connotation in more rigorous and systematic ways. A concern with the relationship of connotation and denotation was at the core of Barthes's work from the 1950s to the 1970s. Barthes's semiological analysis of everyday cultural phenomena in Mythologies (1957) sought to expose how the media and popular culture exploit the connotations of words, phrases, images, or objects to present an ideological view of an aspect of the mod. world as natural and inevitable. In Elements of Semiology (1964), influenced by Hjelmslev's "connotative semiotics," Barthes highlights some of the ways that Ferdinand de Saussure's Course in General Linguistics (1916) overlooks connotation and then devotes the whole of the final section to a consideration of denotation and connotation. Following Hjelmslev, Barthes suggests that signs on the plane of denotation become signifiers (or "connotators") on the plane of connotation, and he accepts at this point in his career Hjelmslev's assumption that secondary connotations are always anchored by primary denotations. Barthes concludes by anticipating that "the future probably belongs to a linguistics of connotation" (see SEMIOTICS AND POETRY).

The goal of the structuralist analysis of lit. was not to discover the complex meanings or structure of the text being read but to describe the literary system that made it possible in the first place (see STRUCTURALISM). Lit. uses the first-order system of lang. in ways that are made possible by a second-order literary system made up of conventional techniques and codes—narrative techniques, speech situations, genres, and so on—that work through connotation rather than denotation. Barthes's "Introduction to the Structural Analysis of Narratives" (1966) suggests that this second-order system of connotative meaning should become "the object of a second linguistics" and envisages a mode of analysis that would examine individual narratives in terms of what they reveal about the narrative system that made them possible in the first place.

Barthes's almost exclusive focus on narrative texts meant that the devel. of a semiological or structuralist analysis of poetry was left to other theorists. Jakobson's semiotic analysis of E. A. Poe's "The Raven" in Language in Operation (1964) highlights how the connotation of the repeated refrain "Nevermore" changes according to its immediate context in the poem. But whereas connotation is fundamentally shaped by context, denotation supposedly remains the same in all contexts. The refrain in "The Raven" thus exemplifies the repetition with α difference that characterizes Jakobson's *poetic function, and he concludes by announcing that "[t]he tension between this intrinsic unity [of denotation] and the diversity of contextual or situational meanings [connotations] is the pivotal problem of the linguistic discipline labelled semantics." Riffaterre's Semiotics of Poetry (1978) argues that all aspects of a poem constitute a unified semantic field of denotations and connotations that points to or elaborates its unstated meaning and that a reader of poetry, therefore, needs "to decode connotations as well as denotation." But the challenging aspect of Riffaterre's argument is his proposition that the denotation that we "discover" at the poem's originating kernel is actually an aftereffect produced by the reader's interpretation of its system of connotations. Indeed, he suggests that there is no such thing as a purely denotational lang. that is free of or prior to connotation—lang. is always already "hot with intensified connotations."

One problem with the structuralist analysis of lit. is that the second-order codes and devices that characterize lit. are not like the first-order signs that make up lang. Literary codes and devices exploit and generate connotations, and connotations are provisional and unstable, depend on context, and cannot be organized into a coherent system whose meanings are equally shared by a single interpretive community. And while literary texts exploit the connotative potential of lang. and of literary strategies and forms, they also disrupt and transform those connotations. The realization that literary texts cannot, therefore, be read straightforwardly as products of a system they tend to revise and undermine is one of the motives of the shift from structuralism to *poststructuralism.

In 1970, in S/Z: An Essay, Barthes carried out a full-length segmental analysis of Honoré de Balzac's short story "Sarrasine," but by then he had begun to see the problems with the structuralist project. Instead of attempting to constitute the narrative system that makes possible all the world's narratives, Barthes now shows how each arbitrarily divided segment (or "lexia") of the text disseminates plural connotations that cannot be constrained by considerations of *mimesis or by assuming that the text is a coherent structure. Yet although he deconstructs the distinction between denotation and connotation and no longer sees Saussure's langue as a primary system of stable denotations against which to measure the "secondary" system of literary connotations, Barthes nonetheless sees a strategic role for attending to connotation in some literary texts; his suggestion that the variety of connotators found in the lexias can be organized into five "codes" indicates that connotations are a fundamental aspect of what Barthes and Julia Kristeva called intertextuality*—a term that refers to the way literary texts are made up of anonymous "quotations" that have been repeatedly iterated and encountered in the general culture. As we have seen, this is precisely how connotations work.

Connotation, then, was central to the structuralist project and to Barthes's version of poststructuralism. Yet the terms denotation and connotation hardly figure in subsequent theory and crit. Given that the nuances of meaning and feeling play a key role in the formation and effects of ideology and given that literary texts both exploit and challenge the way connotations make partial views of the world appear natural, it would seem that politically engaged lit. crit. and cultural studies would benefit from the close analysis of connotation. Moreover, the play of connotation remains central to how many nonacademic critics and poets think about lyric poetry and, indeed, to the way we teach lit. in the classroom.

See POLYSEMY, SANSKRIT POETICS, SEMANTICS AND POETRY.

■ Richards; Brooks; W. Empson, The Structure of Complex Words (1951); Empson; L. Hjelmslev, Prolegomena to a Theory of Language, trans. F. J. Whitfield (1961); R. Barthes, Elements of Semiology, trans. A. Lavers and C. Smith (1967); Mythologies, trans. A. Lavers (1973); S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1974); R. Barthes, Image, Music, Text, trans. S. Heath (1977); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); R. Jakobson, Language in Literature, ed. K. Pomorska and S. Rudy (1987); Post-Structuralist Readings of English Poetry, ed. R. Machin and C. Norris (1987); S. Hall, "The Rediscovery of 'Ideology,'" Literary Theory: An Anthology, ed. J. Rivkin and M. Ryan (1998)—reprint of extracts; J. C. Ransom, "Criticism, Inc.," The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, ed. V. B. Leitch et al. (2001); D. Paterson, "The Lyric Principle" (part one), The Poetry Review 97 (2007).

T. FURNISS

CONSONANCE. In *prosody, consonance refers most strictly to the repetition of the sound of a final consonant or consonant cluster in stressed, unrhymed syllables near enough to be heard together, as in Robert Lowell's "iro*n*ic rai*n*bow" and "Go*bb*ets of blu*bb*er" or Robert Browning's "Rebu*ck*led the chee*k*-strap, chained sla*ck*er the bit," where three final k sounds emphasize the stressed syllables bu*ck*-chee*k*-sla*ck*. Consonance parallels the repetitions in *alliteration (initial consonant) and *assonance (vowel) and can be combined either within a syllable to produce other effects, such as *rhyme (assonance + consonance) or pararhyme (alliteration + consonance). Critics have sometimes used the terms consonance, assonance, and alliteration interchangeably with some loss of precision. Consonance also sometimes specifically denotes cases of pararhyme, an effect commonly found in early Celtic, Germanic, and Icelandic poetry, and in W. H. Auden's "*r*ea*d*er to *r*i*d*er" or in early Ren. verse such as Luigi Pulci's "Stille le stelle ch'a tetto era tutta." This effect has been referred to alternately as bracket rhyme, bracket alliteration, bracket consonance, or rich consonance, though it may be useful to distinguish this double echo from the single echo of final consonant repetition. This would allow one to say that "rider" both alliterates and consonates with "reader," while in fur-fair, f alliterates and r consonates. Consonance has often fallen loosely under the terms half rhyme, near rhyme, or slant rhyme, which may blur the distinction between differing vowel and consonant echoes. Combinations that appear to rhyme to the eye, such as lo*v*e-mo*v*e, may only consonate, though some such pairs are accepted by convention as rhyme. Several critics have identified other instances of "partial" or "semi" consonance when, e.g., one or more echoes involve slightly differing clusters, as in Dylan Thomas's pairing pla*t*es-hea*rt*s, which differs by the r in hearts but retains the t-s echo in both. Likewise, one may find "close" consonance between voiced and unvoiced final consonant echoes, as in the f and v of wi*f*e-lo*v*e or s and z of hea*rs*e-wa*r*e*s*. Consonance becomes more subtle, and harder to hear, between complex vowel or glide endings, as in the y of da*y*-li*e*, also sometimes called semiconsonance, while "zero-consonance" has been used to describe repeating vowels without the final consonant echo. There is little agreement, however, on the use of these more narrowly defined terms. There is no consensus either about how to notate consonantal echoes across stressed and unstressed syllables or in ambiguous rhythms, though most critics take a pragmatic approach to capturing such effects.

Though occasionally criticized as "imperfect" rhyme, consonance has been used with great frequency as ornamentation; as a substitute for or contrast with rhyme; as a device to create *parallelism, to amplify rhythmic effects, or to forestall closure; and as a structuring device in its own right. Lucretius has many lines such as "Cernere adorari licet et sentire sonare," with four final r's in stressed syllables. Though final written consonants are not often pronounced in Fr., Nicolas Boileau echos final s and r in "Changer Narcisse en fleur, couvrir Daphné d'écorce." Shakespeare normally preferred other phonic echoes, but his couplet from Romeo and Juliet (2.3.3–4) is far from unique: "And flecked darkness like a drunkard reels / From forth day's path and Titan's fiery wheels," where six of ten stressed peaks consonate with k or th. John Dryden used it for parallelism, often with other echoes ("piercing wi*t* and pregnant thought*t*); for joining adjective to noun ("o*d*ious ai*d*," "exte*nd*ed wa*nd*"); and for *onomatopoeia ("A buzzing noise of bees his ears alarms," where the z of buzz ends every stressed syllable). Emily Dickinson and R. W. Emerson employed consonance often in place of end rhyme, as in Dickinson's "I like to see it lap the miles," with lines ending u*p*-ste*p*, pee*r*-pa*r*e, whi*l*e-hi*ll*, and sta*r*e-doo*r*. G. M. Hopkins is known for a variety of phonic echoes, including pairs such as Gho*st*-brea*st*, ye*ll*ow-sa*ll*ows.

In the 20th c., dozens of poets showed an interest in consonance as an anchor for various formal schema. W. B. Yeats's "Meditations in Time of Civil War" sometimes prefers consonance over end rhyme, as in the d-r-d-d-r pattern of woo*d*, wa*r*, roa*d*, bloo*d*, sta*r*e. Consonance dominates Dylan Thomas's "And Death Shall Have No Opinion," inverting the usual proportion of end consonance to end rhyme. Ted Hughes combines rhyme and consonance, as in fro*z*en-eye*s*-snow*s*-row*s*-snail*s*. Wilfred Owen has more consonance by itself (shri*ll*-wai*l*ing-ca*ll*), as do Theodore Roethke and Hart Crane, who lets the consonance of r dominate a whole stanza of "Voyages II."

■ K. Burke, "On Musicality in Verse," The Philosophy of Literary Form (1941); J. Travis, "Intralinear Rhyme and Consonance in Early Celtic and Early Germanic Poetry," Germanic Review 18 (1943); A. Oras, "Surry's Technique of Phonetic Echoes," JEGP 50 (1951), and "Lyrical Instrumentation in Marlowe," Studies in Shakespeare, ed. A. D. Matthews (1953); D. Masson, "Vowel and Consonant Patterns in Poetry" and "Thematic Analyses of Sounds in Poetry," and A. Oras, "Spenser and Milton: Some Parallels and Contrasts in the Handling of Sound," Essays on the Language of Literature, ed. S. Chatman and S. R. Levin (1967); R. Astley, "Stations of the Breath," PMLA 84 (1969); G. N. Leech, A Linguistic Guide to English Poetry (1969); P. G. Adams, Graces of Harmony: Alliteration, Assonance, and Consonance in Eighteenth-Century British Poetry (1977); M. Williams, Patterns of Poetry (1986); J. J. Small, Positive as Sound (1990); P. G. Adams, "Edward Taylor's Love Affair with Sounding Language," Order in Variety, ed. R. W. Crump (1991); D. Robey, Sound and Structure in the Divine Comedy (2000); M. W. Edwards, Sound, Sense, and Rhythm (2002); S. Heaney, Finders Keepers (2002); M. Tyler, A Singing Contest (2005); B. Devine, Yeats, the Master of Sound (2006); W. Harmon, "A Game of Feet," SR 116 (2008); L. Wheeler, Voicing American Poetry (2008).

P. G. Adams; R. S. Stilling

CONSTRAINT. Constrained writing is a literary method in which the writer produces poetic texts through the use of externally derived "constraints." A constraint is a mod. technical term with anticipations but without precise equivalents in the traditional vocabulary of poetics and rhet. It refers to a freely chosen rule added either to the ling. rules of the natural lang. in which the text is written or the traditional rules of a genre to which the text seeks to conform. Systematically applied throughout the entire text, it thus serves as a trigger for *invention and creativity and as an illustration or token of what it is possible to write with the help of such a device. Constraints are usually singular rather than conventional: they often find their origin in the experiments of a particular writer, whereas other poetic features are often collective and anonymous. Moreover, their use is, at least in theory, completely saturated, for in constrained writing, it is compulsory to follow the rule (the only exception allowed is that of the playful or revealing "mistake," in which case the error becomes a unique "clinamen"). As a result, a constrained poem tends to foreground its own constraint as much as the lang. that displays it, which explains why certain readers will discard the result of constrained writing as inauthentic or artificial. Any formal or semantic aspect of a poem can be the locus of a constraint. *Lipograms (the systematic omission of a letter or letters), monosyllabic vocabulary, the graphic alternation of vowels and consonants, the exclusion of all male nouns, or the use of bilingually functioning words are all constraints, provided these devices do not already pertain to the conventional poetic system of the day and they are applied throughout the whole text or a meaningful section of the text.

It may be possible to divide constraints into two types, whose difference owes more to cultural than to technical distinctions. One might call these two types the "anachronisms" and the "neologisms": the former are conventional rules that have fallen into oblivion but are recuperated as constraints; the latter are newly invented constraints. In traditional poetry in Eur. langs., based on the formal difference between poetry and prose, any text is rule-based, at least at the level of *prosody and *rhyme—which used to be compulsory in poetry, but in poetry only. Yet the changes wrought by the *romanticism and *modernism of the 19th and early 20th cs. emphasized the right of the poet to break the rules of prosody and rhyme in the name of personal expression. In the wake, new neologistic forms of constraint emerged, which aimed at taking the place of the now old-fashioned rules. Nevertheless, the rediscovery or reappraisal of old forms continues to form a starting point of constrained writing as well. To use the *sonnet form as it had been canonized by François de Malherbe in the 16th c., and then attenuated and eventually exploded in later centuries, would be an example of constrained writing today.

The literary stakes of constraint are always double. As a negative device, it prevents the writer from freely—yet stereotypically—expressing himself, for writing under constraint is often very difficult and blocks any spontaneous *expression, which defenders of constrained writing dismiss as an outlet for banality and *cliché. As a positive device, constraint forces the writer to invent something new even as he lacks *inspiration in the traditional sense of the word—hence, the praise of constraint as a tool capable of breaking the domination of a sterile *free verse since the gradual blurring of the boundaries between poetry and prose following the end of the 19th c.

In recent Western poetics, the invention of constrained writing is often associated with the Fr. *Oulipo or Ouvroir de littérature potentielle (Workshop for Potential Literature, founded in 1960), although the work of John Cage, who tried to merge the apparently incompatible worlds of necessity and chance, is often recognized as well. In the case of the Fr. poet Jacques Roubaud (b. 1932), who has experimented with mathematically inspired forms of rhythm, the use of constraint is a necessary condition of memory in and through lang., for it is the constrained rhythmic backbone of a text that enables poetic and verbal transmission. For Denis Roche (b. 1937), who has worked with new forms of cut-up, constrained writing is a way of exploring the similarities between lit. and photography, i.e., of framing and cropping reality itself. In Crystallography, Christian Bök (b. 1966) uses constrained writing as a way of giving shape to the encounter between poetic and scientific lang. Finally, it should be stressed that, for many authors, constraint is a powerful instrument in the democratic and interactive use of literary lang. The reader of a constrained poem is expected to participate in a very active way, not only by discovering the operative constraint (authors do not commonly make the constraints they employ explicit) but most importantly by evaluating how the author proposes a concrete variation of a form that is always open to other and sometimes more interesting occurrences or demonstrations. Constrained writing has, therefore, become an important axis in the new worlds of collective writing and is a common institution of creative writing programs, at least in France and the United States. In anglophone culture, the importance of constrained writing grows along multiple avenues, thanks to the inspiring examples of Cage's mesostichs (a constrained type of cut up) as well as to repeated attempts to restore traditional forms of prosody and verse.

See ALEATORY POETICS, FORMALISM.

■ Oulipo, Atlas de littérature potentielle (1981); C. Bök, Crystallography (1994); D. Roche, La poésie est inadmissible (1995); J. Baetens, "Une déclaration d'indépendance," 9e Art 2 (1998); Oulipo Compendium, ed. H. Mathews and A. Brotchie (2005); J. Baetens, "Hergé, auteur à contraintes? Une relecture de L'Affaire Tournesol," French Forum 31 (2006); A. S. James, Constraining Chance: Georges Perec and the Oulipo (2009); "The State of Constraint: New Work by Oulipo," McSweeney's Quarterly Concern 22 (2006), http://www.mcsweeneys.net/quarterly/; Oulipo, http://www.oulipo.net/.

J. BAETENS

CONSTRUCTIVISM as a mod. art movement first emerged among Rus. painters around 1913 and included such artists as Vladimir Tatlin and Naum Gabo; the new trend spread to Western Europe in the early 1920s. The constructivists called for the union of art with science and technology. Gradually, the movement's ideas spread to lit. and to poetry in particular. The initiator of this trend was A. N. Čičerin, who drafted the first *manifesto, "Znaem" (We Know, 1923) and was its most radical practitioner, progressing from short, phonetically transcribed poems to more compressed, even wordless visual artifacts in accordance with the principle of maximum expression using a minimum of material. In 1924, a group of Rus. writers organized under the banner of constructivism; these included the poets Il'ja Selvinskij, Eduard Bagritskij, and Vera Inber, as well as the movement's other theoretician, K. L. Zelinskij. The group called for the absorption of the lexicon of science and technology by lit.; it also emphasized what members called "localization" of word pattern and other literary devices, which meant their subordination to subject matter; thus, a poem on war might employ a marching rhythm. But the group's theories were at best hazy and, with the exception of Selvinskij, little more than lip service was paid to them. The movement broke up after 1930.

■ K. L. Zelinskij, Poèzija kak smysl': kniga o konstruktivizme (1929); H. Ermolaev, Soviet Literary Theories, 1917–1934 (1963); G. Weber, "Constructivism and Soviet Literature," Soviet Union 3 (1976); E. Mozhejko, "Russian Literary Constructivism: Towards a Theory of Poetic Language," Canadian Contributions to the VIII International Congress of Slavists, ed. Z. Folejewski et al. (1978); R. Grübel, Russischer Konstruktivismus (1981), and "Russkij literaturnyj konstruktivism," Russian Literature 17 (1985); C. Lodder, Russian Constructivism (1985); "Kan-Fun: Konstruktivizm-funkcionalizm," Russian Literature 21 (1987); G. Niebuhr, The Tradition of Constructivism (1990); C. Cooke, Russian Avant-Garde: Theories of Art, Architecture and the City (1995); G. Rickey, Constructivism (1995); B. Watten, The Constructivist Moment (2003); M. Gough, The Artist as Producer: Russian Constructivism in Revolution (2005); C. Kaier, Imagine No Possessions (2005); Rodchenko and Popova: Defining Constructivism, ed. M. Tupitsyn (2009).

W. E. Harkins; G. J. Janecek

CONTE DÉVOT. A type of OF pious tale in prose or verse, popular in the 13th and 14th cs. It is distinct from the saint's legend and the moral tale (see EXEMPLUM). The best-known conte dévot is the Tombeor Nostre Dame, or Jongleur de Notre Dame, in which a *minstrel whose only talent is in dancing performs before the image of Our Lady, to her approval. Such tales were undoubtedly inspired by the great collections known as the Vitae Patrum and the Miracles Nostre Dame. Many of the contes dévots are miracle tales, though not all. In the Chevalier au barisel, a knight is instructed by his confessor to fill a small keg with water but proves unable to do so, despite many attempts, until he sheds one tear of true repentance, which fills the keg miraculously. In the Conte del'hermite et del jongleour, a holy hermit is told by an angel that his companion in heaven will be a minstrel. In disgust, the hermit goes to the town marketplace, where he talks with a poor minstrel and listens to his life story. Realizing that the poor man is better than he, the hermit repents, and eventually the two are admitted to heaven together.

■ O. Schultz-Gora, Zwei altfranzösische Dichtungen, 4th ed. (1919); E. Lommatzsch, Del Tumbeor Nostre Dame (1920); F. Lecoy, Le chevalier au barisel (1955).

U. T. Holmes

CONTESTS, POETIC. See POETIC CONTESTS; POETRY SLAM.

CONTRAFACTUM (pl. contrafacta; also contrafact[s], contrafacture[s]; Lat., "made against"). The term contrafactum refers both to a process of poetic and musical borrowing and to the works that are the result of such a process.

As an imitative form, the contrafactum is typical of the Eur. Middle Ages and Ren., when respect for trad. and authority was often an important factor in poetic composition: whereas later authors increasingly sought *originality, med. and early mod. poets and composers often adapted and recreated existing works. While they are esp. prevalent from the 12th to the 17th c., contrafacta appear in all eras, and the definition of both the process and the genre went through several transformations.

Dating from the 12th c., the earliest identified contrafacta are monophonic. Many troubadour songs were famous enough to be reused as models throughout the 12th and 13th cs., their melodies or rhymes forming the basis of new songs. Structural analysis of the med. secular lyric has revealed musical and poetic links between the various vernacular Western Eur. trads., esp. the Occitan troubadours, the Fr. trouvères, the Ger. Minnesänger*, and the Galician-Port. poets of religious cantigas*.

