In the ensuing decades, New Zealand poetry has become at once more popular and widespread than it ever was before (a vibrant culture of poetry *performance—owing much to the tireless troubadouring of Sam Hunt [b. 1946]—helps see to that) and far less bold in its claims to public significance. The dominant figure in New Zealand poetry from the late 1970s to the present day is Bill Manhire (b. 1946), a poet of cool ironies and oblique wit. His wry take on Curnow's nationalist isolationism neatly punctures the idea of "New Zealandness" as special burden or heroic challenge: "I live at the edge of the universe, / like everybody else" ("Milky Way Bar").

The work of the best poets of this period—Manhire, Elizabeth Smither (b. 1941), Andrew Johnston (b. 1963), Jenny Bornholdt (b. 1960), Brian Turner (b. 1944), Michele Leggott (b. 1956), Lauris Edmond (1924–2000), and Fiona Farrell (b. 1947), to name a few—tends to be small-scaled, often domestic or autobiographical and, if formally sophisticated, not overtly experimental. Whether that is "a real expression of what the New Zealander is" is a question for a later, more marvelous, year.

NIBELUNGENSTROPHE (Kürenbergstrophe). The most important stanza of MHG epic poetry. The Nibelungenstrophe is named from its use in the Nibelungenlied (ca. 1200–10), although its earliest recorded use is by Der von Kürenberg (fl. 1150–70). It is composed of four long lines (Langzeilen) in which each pair is bound by end rhyme. The long lines are divided by a clear *caesura into pairs of *hemistichs. Occasionally, there is also rhyme at the caesura.

Mod. prosodists confine themselves to a descriptive formula, according to which hemistichs 1 to 7 contain three stresses each, and the eighth 4; further, 1, 3, 5, and 7 as a rule show feminine and 2, 4, 6, and 8 masculine endings (see masculine and feminine). A recent study (Wakefield) rejects the "performance based" metrics of Andreas Heusler and most of his successors with its concomitant notion that the verse of Ger. poetry is essentially four-stressed. Basing his description on a statistical study of the distribution of syllables in the strophes in the St. Gall ms. (usually called Ms. B), Wakefield describes verses 1, 3, 5, and 7 of the Nibelungenstrophe as belonging to a long realization of the verse and verses 2, 4, and 6 as belonging to a short realization. Both realizations tend to show an alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables, particularly toward the cadence. Verse 8, however, follows a quite different pattern, called "dipodic" by Wakefield, which exhibits two cadential structures rather than one.

The Nibelungenstrophe is one of a family of strophes built on the simpler model of the Hildebrandston, which is identical to the Nibelungenstrophe except that it lacks the extra stress in the final hemistich—i.e., hemistich 8 is identical to hemistichs 2, 4, and 6. Some later heroic epics in MHG (e.g., Ortnit, Wolfdietrich, Alpharts Tod) are composed in this strophe. The Hildebrandston was replaced in later poetry by the Heunenweise, which requires rhymes at the caesura throughout. Poems in the Heunenweise are often printed in alternating rhyme-pairs that obscures their derivation from the Hildebrandston.

The use of the Nibelungenstrophe has continued over the centuries in many variants, e.g., among the *Meistersinger as the "Hönweise," in the church hymn (P. Gerard, O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden); in the mod. secular lied, esp. among the romantics (L. Uhland, Des Sängers Fluch); and even in the drama (Z. Werner, Die Söhne des Thals [1803]).

I. Rubén Darío and Modernismo. Although Nicaragua is a poor country of only five million inhabitants with scarce resources for education, poetry is important to its cultural identity. This condition is due in large part to the internationally renowned Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darío (1867–1916). Much as Simón Bolívar is associated with Hispanic America's political independence from Spain, Darío initiated—via poetry—the cultural freedom of Sp. America. He championed modernismo*, a late 19th-c. Hispanic Am. literary movement involving poets of several nationalities, incl. the Cuban nationalist José Martí. Darío transformed the Sp. lang. by creating new rhythmic patterns based on the poetry of Victor Hugo and Walt Whitman, esp. in the extravagant musicality of his poem "Marcha triunfal." He enriched his mother tongue by incorporating a vocabulary and a thematic panorama from indigenous America. Darío's poem to the volcano Momotombo in Nicaragua is a geographical rebellion against Spain, an assertion of identity that contains the ancient force of toponymy. Darío encountered supremacist, racist thinking in Spain during his first visit there in 1892 but insisted on asserting with pride his heritage as a mestizo. In Prosas profanas, he famously declares, "If there is poetry in our America, it can be found in the old things: in Palenque and Utatlán, in the legendary Indian and the sensual, refined Inca, and in the great Moctezuma on his throne of gold." The indigenous figures in Darío's poems "Caupolicán" and "Tutecotzimí" are a source of liberating and audacious originality that deeply influenced future generations of his literary compatriots.

The magnitude of Darío's major works of poetry, which include Azul . . . (1888), Prosas profanas y otros poemas (1896 and 1901), Cantos de vida y esperanza, los cisnes y otros poemas (1905), El canto errante (1907), El viaje a Nicaragua e intermezzo tropical (1908), El poema del otoño y otros poemas (1910), and Canto a la Argentina y otros poemas (1914), gave the country a respected place on the world's literary map. The cosmopolitan Darío spent most of his life outside his homeland, preferring Europe and Europeanized cities such as Buenos Aires, though he traveled constantly, sometimes to far-flung places such as North Africa, to produce the articles for the Argentine newspaper La Nación that allowed him to eke out a living.

As a modernista, Darío is a poet of conflicting ideals. E.g., in his famous poem "A Roosevelt" ("To Roosevelt"), he portrays the United States as a future invader of Nicaragua, while in "Salutación al águila" ("Saluting the Eagle"), he praises the work ethic and entrepreneurial spirit of his country's northern neighbor. Darío wrote escapist poems, such as the often-recited "A Margarita Debayle," celebrating journeys to exotic places inhabited by mythological creatures. But he is also the author of "Lo fatal" ("Destined to Die"), one of the most famous poems in the lang., revered for its existential anguish and fatalistic pessimism. Each generation of readers has found something new and provocative in the modernismo of Darío.

II. Post-modernistas. Nicaragua's three exemplary postmodernista writers, Azarías H. Pallais (1885–1954), Alfonso Cortés (1893–1969), and Salomón de la Selva (1893–1959), maintain a literary dialogue with their great predecessor but also forge a new poetics. While they shared Darío's passion for cl. lit. and mythology, they grew tired of the legions of his superficial imitators. A rebellious, impoverished priest guided by the teachings of the Gospel, Pallais sided with the poor in his poetry; his volumes include A la sombra del agua (1917), Espumas y estrellas (1918), Caminos (1921), Bello tono menor (1928), Epístola católica a Rafael Arévalo Martínez (1947), and Piraterías (1951). Cortés, a metaphysical poet concerned with the relativity of time and the preeminence of space, used his severe mental illness to create a therapeutic art to assuage his isolation and lack of intimate human contact. Some of Cortés's best poetry (such as the deeply enigmatic "Yo," "La gran plegaria," "Pasos," and "La canción del espacio") was anthologized by the poet Ernesto Cardenal and translated into Eng. by the Catholic writer Thomas Merton at the Trappist monastery in Gethsemani, Kentucky, in the late 1950s. Cortés's most accomplished collections of poetry are Poesías (1931), Tardes de oro (1934), and Poemas eleusinos (1935). De la Selva's Tropical Town and Other Poems (1918) appeared in Eng. in the U.S., where the poet lived and worked, publishing his poems in important jours., corresponding with noted poets such as Edna St.Vincent Millay, and teaching at Williams College. His second book, El soldado desconocido (1922), is a testimonial work about his experiences as a soldier in World War I. By this time, for ideological reasons that had to do with the interventionist policies of the U.S. in Latin America, the bilingual poet had made the decision to publish his work almost exclusively in Sp. His books, which draw on a deep knowledge of Greco-Roman myth and hist. (occasionally mixed with themes from the Aztec world), include Evocación de Horacio (1949), La ilustre familia (1954), Canto a la independencia nacional de México (1956), Evocación de Píndaro (1957), and Acolmixtli Netzahualcóyotl (1958).

III. The Vanguard Movement. The writers associated with Nicaragua's Vanguard Movement, notably José Coronel Urtecho (1906–94), Pablo Antonio Cuadra (1912–2002), and Joaquín Pasos (1914–47), were young provocateurs who burst onto the literary scene in the city of Granada in the late 1920s by challenging upper-class values and attacking the derivative followers of Darío. The nationalistic, conservative stance of the vanguardistas and their fervent belief in Hispanidad (Hispanicity) as a bulwark against Communism led them to give moral support to dictators such as Anastasio Somoza García in Nicaragua and Francisco Franco in Spain. Much of the material they used to renovate Nicaraguan lit. was based on new poetry of the U.S. and France that the vanguardistas translated and incorporated in their own work, as well as Nicaraguan folklore and traditional culture.

Coronel Urtecho's poetry (as well as his Sp. versions of poems by Marianne Moore and T. S. Eliot) is collected in a volume with a title taken from the Greek of the Odyssey: Pol-la d'ananta katanta paranta (1970, rev. 1993). This book contains Coronel Urtecho's classic narrative poem "Pequeña biografía de mi mujer," a homage to his wife María Kautz. His Paneles del infierno (Panels of Hell, 1981) is an extensive historical poem that takes its rhetorical point of departure in support of the 1979 Sandinista revolution from the opening poem of Edgar Lee Masters's Spoon River Anthology.

Taken as a whole, the poetry of Cuadra provides deep insights into Nicaraguan culture, esp. when it is collated with his essential book-length essays El nicaragüense and Muestrario del folklore nicaragüense. In addition, no writer has more vividly portrayed Nicaragua's geographical and biological diversity. Cuadra's major works include Poemas nicaragüenses (Nicaraguan Poems), first published in 1934, but revised extensively throughout the poet's life; El jaguar y la luna (The Jaguar and the Moon, 1959), poems based on ancient designs of Nahuatl ceramics; Cantos de Cifar (Songs of Cifar, 1971), narrative verse in clipped lyrical lines about the people who navigate the dangerous Homeric waters of Lake Nicaragua; Siete árboles contra el atardecer (Seven Trees against the Dying Light, 1980), in which seven different species of Nicaraguan trees store a country's myths, hist. and collective memory; and La ronda del año (written primarily between 1984 and 1986), twelve poems that reflect a year's natural cycle in Nicaragua.

Pasos, who died prematurely in 1947, is nearly unknown outside Nicaragua. His collected poetry, Poemas de un joven (1962), edited by Cardenal, contains the apocalyptic long poem "Canto de guerra de las cosas" (War Song of the Things), perhaps the most important overlooked masterpiece in 20th-c. Latin Am. poetry.

IV. Generation of the 1940s. Ernesto Mejía Sánchez (1923–85), Carlos Martínez Rivas (1924–98), and Ernesto Cardenal (b. 1925), the three most noted writers who followed the Vanguard Movement, looked toward Nicaraguan vanguardistas as mentors, not figures whose work needed to be openly questioned as Coronel Urtecho had done in his iconoclastic "Oda a Rubén Darío" in the late 1920s—a continuation rather than a rupture in the dialogue between literary generations.

Mejía Sánchez was educated in Mexico and is widely recognized as the most gifted scholar of Darío's poetry. His own verse is collected in the anthol. Recolección al mediodía (1972). One of his lasting contributions is prosemas, short *prose poems.

Martínez Rivas produced the single most influential book of poetry in Nicaraguan lit. for several generations, La insurrección solitaria, first published in Mexico in a limited ed. in 1953 after his formative years in Madrid and Paris in the late 1940s that enabled him to work with Octavio Paz and Julio Cortázar. Conceived in the French tradition of the poète maudit*, his poetry creates new, almost impossible, standards for verbal perfection.

Cardenal is Nicaragua's most internationally recognized poet of recent decades. He served as minister of culture during the 1980s; as both a poet and a government official, he has traveled the globe, giving readings to enthusiastic audiences. With Coronel Urtecho, Cardenal translated an influential anthol. of U.S. poetry (which included a selection of Native Am. texts) and formulated what has come to be known as Exteriorismo, emphasizing a *collage of factual data in prosaic *free verse stripped of metaphor and the incorporation of original historical sources. Exteriorista poetry was a defining, albeit controversial, characteristic of Nicaraguan poetry from the 1970s through the mid-1990s.

Cardenal's poetry has a pronounced political trajectory that corresponds in part to his own life. E.g., his peripheral involvement in the 1954 April Rebellion against the government of Somoza García resulted in his poem Hora cero (Zero-Hour and Other Documentary Poems, 1960). His religious vocation led him to a spiritual friendship with Merton as well as an exploration of the tenets of liberation theology. Merton encouraged Cardenal to become ordained as a priest and, later, to establish a contemplative community called Solentiname on an island in Lake Nicaragua in the mid-1970s. When the repression of Anastasio Somoza Debayle's National Guard destroyed the community, Cardenal went into exile in Costa Rica, where he became a voice of the revolution that finally toppled the dictatorship in July of 1979.

Other works by Cardenal include Epigramas (1961), which imitates the cl. style of Martial and Catullus; Salmos (Psalms, 1964), modeled on the *Psalms of the OT in their poetic indictment of wars, capitalism, and repressive governments; the long historical narrative poem El estrecho dudoso (The Doubtful Strait, 1967); Canto nacional (1972); Oráculo sobre Managua (1973), pub. the year after the earthquake that destroyed Nicaragua's capital; and Vuelos de victoria (Flights of Victory, 1985), a collection of poems that praise the Sandinista Revolution. In Homenaje a los indios americanos (Homage to the American Indians, 1969) and Los ovnis de oro (Golden UFOs, 1985), Cardenal proposes models for contemp. ethical behavior based on ancient civilizations. In his more recent poetry, he has been looking into the far reaches of the universe, exploring the big-bang theory and quantum physics in Cántico cósmico (Cosmic Canticle, 1989) and, in a more streamlined style in keeping with his monastic poems, Telescopio en la noche oscura (Telescope in the Dark Night, 1993).

V. The Frente Ventana and the Betrayed Generation, New Voices. Although there are important Nicaraguan writers of the 1950s such as Guillermo Rothschuh Tablada (b. 1926), Raúl Elvir (1927–98), Ernesto Gutiérrez (1929–88), Mario Cajina-Vega (1929–95), Eduardo Zepeda-Henríquez (b. 1930), Octavio Robleto (b. 1935), Horacio Peña (b. 1936), and esp. Fernando Silva (b. 1927), it was during the 1960s that two divergent literary groups engaged in a debate on poetics that changed the course of Nicaraguan lit. hist. The Frente Ventana (Window Front), based at the university in León and headed by Fernando Gordillo (1940–67) and Sergio Ramírez (b. 1942—now Nicaragua's most prominent novelist), sought ways to link art with a revolutionary struggle in keeping with the idealism, commitment, and sacrifice that attended the birth of the Frente Sandinista de Liberación Nacional (FSLN) in 1963, in conjunction with the influential political writings of Carlos Fonseca Amador (1936–76). One highly promising writer martyred in the armed political struggle of that era was Leonel Rugama (1949–70), whose poetry was published posthumously in the volume La tierra es un satélite de la luna (The Earth Is a Satellite of the Moon, 1983). The other main literary group from the 1960s, La Generación Traicionada (The Betrayed Generation), was based in Managua and founded by Roberto Cuadra (b. 1940), Edwin Yllescas (b. 1941), Iván Uriarte (b. 1942), and Beltrán Morales (1944–86). They tended to identify themselves more with the free-wheeling *Beat poets of the U.S. than with Marxist struggles for social equality in their own country.

New voices that constitute the Nicaraguan literary scene in recent decades include those of Luis Rocha (b. 1942), former ed. of the literary supplement El Nuevo Amanecer Cultural; the surrealist poet Francisco Valle (b. 1942), author of the collection of prose poems Laberinto de espadas (1974 and 1996); and Francisco de Asís Fernández (b. 1945), co-organizer with the poet Gloria Gabuardi of the International Poetry Festival in Granada. Three contemp. poet-critics are worthy of mention: Álvaro Urtecho (1951–2007), whose works of poetry include Cantata estupefacta (1986), Esplendor de Caín (1994), Tumba y residencia (2000), and Tierra sin tiempo (2007); Julio Valle-Castillo (b. 1952), one of Nicaragua's premier literary scholars and art historians and the author of Materia jubilosa (1986) as well as Lienzo del pajaritero (2003), a series of poems that document the myths and folk dances of Masaya; and Nicasio Urbina (b. 1958), most recently the author of Viajemas (2009).

VI. Women Poets of the 1970s to the Present. Perhaps the most important literary phenomenon of the 1970s was the emergence of a new generation of women authors, transforming a literary world that had been dominated by men. Two poets who began publishing in the 1970s are esp. accomplished: Ana Ilce Gómez (b. 1945), author of Las ceremonias del silencio (1975) and Poemas de lo humano cotidiano (2004), and Gioconda Belli (b. 1948), who published Sobre la grama (1973); Línea de fuego (1978), which explores themes of sexual and political liberation and won Cuba's Casa de las Américas prize; Truenos y arco iris (1982); Amor insurrecto (1985); De la costilla de Eva (1987); El ojo de la mujer (1991); Apogeo (1997); and Fuego soy apartado y espada puesta lejos (2007).

There were some important precursors to these writers, such as María Teresa Sánchez (1918–94), Mariana Sansón Argüello (1918–2002), and the internationally recognized Claribel Alegría, who was born in Nicaragua in 1924, lived for most of her life in El Salvador and Europe, then returned to Nicaragua, where she currently resides. Alegría's work was translated into Eng. by the U.S. poet Carolyn Forché as Flowers from the Volcano (1982).

Other notable women poets who remain active in Nicaragua's literary life include Vidaluz Meneses (b. 1944), Gloria Gabuardi (b. 1945), Michéle Najlis (b. 1946), Daisy Zamora (b. 1950), and Rosario Murillo (b. 1951), author of Las esperanzas misteriosas (1990), founder of the group Gradas, director in the 1980s of the Sandinista Association of Cultural Workers, and the wife of president Daniel Ortega.

Additional recent women's voices in Nicaraguan poetry include Yolando Blanco (b. 1954); Isolda Hurtado (b. 1957); Blanca Castellón (b. 1958); Carola Brantome (b. 1961); Esthela Calderón (b. 1970), who published Soledad (2002), Amor y conciencia (2004) and Soplo de corriente vital (2008), a remarkable collection of ethnobotanical poems that recovers traditional knowledge about plants indigenous to Nicaragua's Occidental region; and Marta Leonor González (b. 1972), editor of La Prensa Literaria, cofounder of Nicaragua's most important new literary group 400 Elefantes, and author of Huérfana embravecida (1999) and Casa de fuego (2008).

VII. Caribbean Coast Writers. Given the Pacific Coast literary establishment's refusal to recognize multilingual Atlantic Coast writers, one esp. welcome recent develop. is the attention that the Nicaraguan Association of Women Writers (ANIDE) has paid to the country's Caribbean women authors. In the jour. Anide, editor Vilma de la Rocha has published the work of such poets as June Beer (1935–86), the Atlantic Coast's first woman poet, who wrote her work in both Eng.-Creole and Sp.; Gloriantonia Henríquez (b. 1948), author of Primera vigilia (2004); Andira Watson (b. 1977), who published the collection Más excelsa que Eva (2002) and won the Mariana Sansón National Poetry Prize in 2009; Brígida Zacarías Watson, whose poetry written in the Miskitu lang. appears in Miskitu tasbaia (Tierra miskita, 1997); Erna Narcisso Walters, who writes in both Eng. and Sp, and whose work was anthologized in Antología poética de la Costa Caribe de Nicaragua; Isabel Estrada Colindres, a Garífuna woman who lives in Bluefields and writes in Eng., Sp., and Creole; and Ana Rosa Fagot Müller (b. 1944), who writes in Miskitu and coedits the jour. Tininiska. Some of the work included in this selection published in Anide was translated into Sp. by Carlos Rigby, who was born in Laguna de Perlas in 1945 and has been a peripheral part of Nicaraguan poetry for decades. Rigby is the most prominent Nicaraguan Caribbean Coast poet, together with David MacField, who was born in Ciudad Rama in 1936 and who published Dios es negro (1967), En la calle de enmedio (1969), Poemas para el año de elefante (1970), Poemas populares (1972), and Los veinticuatro: poemas y canciones (1975). Given the lang. barriers, the extreme poverty, and the general isolation of the Atlantic Coast in relation to the western side of Nicaragua, more work is needed to establish greater understanding and cultural respect between the two regions.

NIL VOLENTIBUS ARDUUM (Nothing Is Difficult to the Willing). A society of Dutch poets founded in Amsterdam in 1669. The main concerns of the society were the improvement of the artistic quality and moral standard of the plays presented at the Amsterdam City Theater, which was dominated at the time by the spectacular horror drama of Jan Vos. Nil Volentibus Arduum strove to apply Fr. neoclassical artistic principles, such as rationality, simplicity, and clarity, to Dutch *dramatic poetry and strongly condemned the use of religious and political subject matter. The founding and most influential members of the society were the physician Lodewijk Meyer and the jurist Andries Pels, both of whom also wrote dramatic poetry. In 1681, after the death of Meyer and Pels, the society began to decline in influence. Important writings by Nil Volentibus Arduum include Pels's Gebruik én misbruik des tooneels (Use and Abuse of the Theater, 1681) and the Nauwkeurig onderwys in de tooneel-poëzy (Precise Instruction in Dramatic Poetry), a collection of lectures by the members of the society pub. in 1765. ■ T. NŌ. A form of traditional Japanese drama. Its precise origins are unknown, but it was refined in the 14th and 15th cs. during Japan's med. era and has been performed continuously ever since. Nō (also written noh) means "ability" and was originally known as sarugaku (monkey music). The plays include extensive passages in verse. They are sung and recited by masked and unmasked actors wearing elaborate costumes, accompanied by a chorus and three or four musicians playing drums and a bamboo flute. Almost every play includes a dance or other choreographed movement and is performed on a roofed stage built of polished Japanese cypress.

Although thousands of plays are extant and new ones continue to be written, the repertory of plays currently performed by professional troupes includes only about 240 works. Nō plays are conventionally classified by theme into five categories: god plays, warrior plays, "wig" plays (i.e., those in which the principal character is a woman; traditionally, all roles were played by male actors); miscellaneous plays; and demon plays. In a classic one-day program, one play would be performed from each category in the above order.

The plays may alternatively be classified by method of depiction into two categories: dream (mugen) plays and contemp. (genzai) plays. In dream plays, the principal characters are ghosts, spirits, demons, or deities. In Shigehira, e.g., a traveling Buddhist monk reaches a hill in the town of Nara and meets an old man who points out some of the temples nearby, then vanishes. In the second act, the old man shows his true form, the suffering ghost of the commander whose troops burned down two of the largest temples, killing thousands, during a 12th-c. war. Some ghosts attain enlightenment thanks to the monk's prayers; others return to the afterworld. Contemp. plays enact dramatic encounters between living human beings. In Yuya, e.g., a general forbids his mistress to visit her ailing mother because he wants her by his side to view the cherry blossoms; distraught, she expresses her sadness in a dance and a poem, and he finally assents.

The great med. playwrights—Zeami Motokiyo (?1363–1443), his son Kanze Motomasa (d. 1432), and son-in-law Komparu Zenchiku (b. 1405)—adapted plots from a variety of sources. These included works of literary fiction (such as The Tale of Genji); war epics; cl. poems (see WAKA) and the lore surrounding them; folk tales; Chinese hist. and lit.; Buddhist scriptures, sermons, and anecdotes; and Shinto mythical narratives. The lines of nō plays frequently contain allusions to other literary works. The playwrights' methods of imagistic association draw on techniques used in the Japanese art of linked verse (see RENGA).

Nō prosody and poetics have much in common with other genres of cl. Japanese poetry. Verse passages are composed of sequences of fixed numbers of syllables, unrhymed and unaccented. The most common meter is the traditional one of seven- and five-syllable units used in alternation, but pairs of eight- and four-syllable "lines" are also used. Rhetorical devices include the "pivot word," a type of *syllepsis.

Originally, handwritten vocal scores were circulated exclusively among professional actors. Amateurs began learning how to perform nō plays and individual songs in the 16th c., creating a need for printed texts. The commentary Utaishō was commissioned in 1595 to explicate allusions and other difficult aspects of the plays. Nō libretti were included in the national literary canon established during the 19th c. and, validated in part by its prestige in the West, nō became the object of serious scholarly inquiry in Japan and abroad. The study of nō also extends to its hist., aspects of performance, and the theoretical treatises on acting, stagecraft, and dramaturgy that were written by Zeami, Zenchiku, and their successors.

Little was known or understood outside Japan about nō until the mid-19th c., when the country opened to trade and broad cultural contact with the West. As the official state entertainment of the Tokugawa shogunate, nō fell into disfavor when the shogunate collapsed in 1868 but was revived under the new Meiji state, partly because it was a suitable equivalent to Eur. opera that could be performed before visiting foreign dignitaries. Nō was performed for the former U.S. president Ulysses S. Grant during his tour of Japan in 1879.

In the early 20th c., a number of books by prominent authors and trans. introduced nō to the Eng.-speaking world. These works included "Noh" or Accomplishment: A Study of the Classical Stage of Japan by Ernest Fenollosa and Ezra Pound (1916) and The Nō Plays of Japan by Arthur Waley (1921). W. B. Yeats contributed an intro. to Fenollosa and Pound's volume and wrote plays, such as At the Hawk's Well, that were shaped by his understanding of nō. Other writers influenced by nō include Pound himself, who saw similarities between *imagism and the insistence on key visual images characteristic of nō; Bertolt Brecht, who adapted the nō play Tanikō (The Valley Rite) into two plays, Der Jasager (The Yes-Sayer) and Der Neinsager (The Nay-Sayer); and Benjamin Britten, whose opera Curlew River is based on the nō play Sumidagawa (The Sumida River).

NOIGANDRES. Title of a Brazilian avant-garde poetry jour. founded and ed. by Augusto de Campos, Haroldo de Campos, and Décio Pignatari, leaders of Brazil's concrete poetry movement. These poets emerged from the atmosphere of postwar poetic renewal spearheaded by João Cabral de Melo Neto, adding to that the influences of the international literary avant-garde, especially Ezra Pound, James Joyce, Guillaume Apollinaire, Vladimir Mayakovsky, and Stéphane Mallarmé; and of Brazilian modernists, esp. Oswald de Andrade and his antropofagia. The title of the jour. refers to a mysterious word in a song by the Occitan *troubadour Arnaut Daniel mentioned in one of Ezra Pound's Cantos. The Noigandres poets were also influenced by constructivist art and design and concrete or serial music. Having previously brought out discrete chapbooks, they decided to publish together in a jour., thus creating a sense of intellectual kinship. Five issues in total came out in November 1952, February 1955, December 1956, March 1958, and November 1962. At first, only work by both de Camposes and Pignatari appeared in the jour., but Noigandres 3 also features work by the nonlinear experimentalist Ronaldo Azeredo (the brother-in-law of both the poets A. de Campos and José Lino Grünewald) and includes, for the first time, the label concrete poetry. The 210-page Antologia Noigandres 5—Do Verso à Poesia Concreta includes poetry by the de Campos brothers, Pignatari, Azeredo, and Grünewald.

NONSENSE VERSE. Some consider nonsense a wide category that includes almost any verse that creates a fantastical world with its own rules, while others consider it a narrow category that includes only verse that disrupts the operations of lang., typically by employing an abnormal syntax or invented words. Both these formulations describe many aspects of nonsense, and the two often overlap. E.g., Lewis Carroll's "Jabberwocky," an instance of nonsense verse that uses a largely invented vocabulary, is introduced in the context of Carroll's fantastical Looking-Glass world:

'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
  Did gyre and gimble in the wabe:
All mimsy were the borogoves,
  And the mome raths outgrabe.

Neither of these formulations, however, suffices to describe the broad scope of what authors, anthologizers, and critics have called nonsense verse. Nonsense verse is the versified instance of nonsense lit., a category of writing that transforms into virtues the vices associated with the pejorative term nonsense: silliness, incomprehensibility, childishness, pointlessness, and triviality, among others.

Critics have disagreed over whether nonsense is a genre, as Tigges believes, or something more nebulous, "less a genre than a possibility, a dimension, a boundary which poetry touches more frequently than we usually imagine," as Haughton does. In either approach, critics treat the works of Edward Lear and Carroll as the foremost exemplars of the category in Eng. Nevertheless, Malcolm has found the origins of Eng. nonsense not in the mid-19th c. but earlier, in the 17th. A Fr. nonsense trad. dates to the Middle Ages. While some critics warn against tendencies to universalize nonsense, it exists in a wide spectrum of trads., whether Eur., Chinese, Indian, or Ar.

Despite its name, nonsense does not wholly escape sense, and critics draw a sharp distinction between nonsense and mere gibberish. Nonsense remains rule-based, even if the rules are different from those of our world, and Lecercle has urged readers to dispel the notion that nonsense "presents us with the charming disorder of freedom." Rather, nonsense deals in a complex interplay of order and disorder, of meaning and nonmeaning. Even the most gibberish-like instances of verse engage a reader's impulse toward meaning, "the mind's force toward order" (Sewell). Tigges argues that such interplay is the central characteristic of nonsense, which he considers "a genre of narrative literature which balances a multiplicity of meanings with a simultaneous absence of meaning."

Nonsense is not just light but willfully unserious: its very point often seems to be pointlessness. Nevertheless, some critics have rejected a connection between nonsense and the comic, arguing that much of what happens in nonsense is serious indeed. Even when deeply serious or troubling events happen in nonsense, however, they tend to be deployed for comic effect. Lear's *limericks, e.g., feature heinous acts of violence and tragedy, but the reader is meant to delight in those acts:

There was an Old Man of Peru,
Who watched his wife making a stew;
But once, by mistake, in a stove she did bake
That unfortunate Man of Peru.

Understood realistically, this event would be tragic. In the context of nonsense, it is funny and even silly, as the prominent grin on the face of the woman in Lear's accompanying illustration confirms.

Writers of nonsense often adopt a poetics of formal excess that values improbability more than precision. Nonsense rhymes, often polysyllabic, jarring, and repeated over and over again, are regularly played for laughs. Like Lear's limericks, most instances of nonsense verse feature four- and three-beat rhythms.

Critics have identified a number of characteristic devices through which nonsense disrupts common sense. Sewell, Stewart, and Tigges catalog many of these devices, incl. mirroring, reversals, and inversions, as in Carroll's Looking-Glass world; the simultaneous juxtaposition of improbable elements; and the adoption of and strict adherence to seemingly arbitrary rules. These devices create an alternative to the ordinary world, but they also reflect it. By creating a nonsensical alternative world order, they reveal the rules of the ordinary world to be arbitrary as well. As Wittgenstein once wrote, "[T]he negation of nonsense is nonsense" rather than normative sense.

Even when nonsense does not disrupt syntax or vocabulary, it tends to have a special relationship to lang. in which the metaphorical mechanisms of lang. are taken literally or in which lang. is treated as a tangible material object. Stewart cites the expression "he thought that the sun rose and set on her," noting that in nonsense "the person is likely to get very hot or, at least, very tired from such a burden."

The relationship of nonsense to satire and parody has been a source of significant critical disagreement. Some, like Chesterton, Cammaerts, and Sewell, argue that nonsense should be disconnected from real-world concerns, that satire and parody would taint "that state of security, freedom, and purely mental delight that is proper to the [nonsense] game" (Sewell). Others, incl. Amis and Lecercle, associate parody and satire closely with nonsense, arguing that "a great deal of what passes for nonsense is or was generic parody" (Amis), that "parodies . . . are very frequent in nonsense texts, . . . and they are the privileged locus for the dialogue between the author and his child readers" (Lecercle).

The assumption that the audience of nonsense is children, however, proves equally vexed. While much nonsense is aimed directly at children, much is intended for the delight of adults, incl. the 17th-c. examples explored by Malcolm. These poems do not aim for a juvenile readership at all but instead take the adult lang. of reason to hyperbolic extremes, so forcefully embracing the sophistication of academic lang. as to render it utterly silly.

Though nonsense verse includes a great deal of verse that does not disrupt the operations of lang., Carroll's archetypal example of nonsense verse remains the best of what does. Many of the words in "Jabberwocky" are Carroll's inventions, and ling. textbooks regularly cite the stanza as an example of the power of ling. structure to produce meaning despite the absence of stable meanings for much of its vocabulary. As important to what makes "Jabberwocky" nonsense as the lang. itself, however, is the context in which the poem appears, in Through the Looking-Glass. Alice encounters the poem and is baffled by it, and Humpty Dumpty later confidently but dubiously explains the meanings of various of Carroll's invented words: "'Well, 'TOVES' are something like badgers—they're something like lizards—and they're something like corkscrews.'" Humpty Dumpty, it becomes clear, provides few actual solutions to the problems of meaning in the poem. In part, readers are meant to laugh at his confident analysis. The silliness of these reactions to the poem, and not just its disruption of lang., makes it fit into the same category of nonsense verse as Lear's limericks. Carroll's original version of the first stanza of the poem falsely posited it as a newly discovered "Stanza of Anglo-Saxon Verse" and glossed every single unfamiliar term in a straight-faced mockery of academic discourse, suggesting that the joke was in place all along. It is not just that "Jabberwocky" is written in invented lang. but that we understand it as invented and are in on Carroll's joke that allows us to categorize it as nonsense.

NORSE POETRY. The vernacular poetry of the Viking Age and med. West Scandanavia. Norse poetry is related to the poetic trads. of OE, Old Saxon, and OHG and is, therefore, based on a structural principle of *alliteration, although features such as internal rhyme and the counting of syllables were also important (see SYLLABIC VERSE). Norse poetry differs from alliterative poetry in other Germanic langs. in that it is stanzaic rather than stichic. A handful of Viking Age (ca. 800–1100) runic inscriptions contain verse, and scholars believe that poets whose work has survived lived as long ago as the end of the 9th c. and that some anonymous verse may have had an oral prehist. However, virtually all the evidence for Norse poetry is found in mss. from the 13th c. and later. There is ample med. evidence of the analysis of poetics from the Middle Ages: the poem Háttalykill (apparently a loan trans. of clavis rhytmica) of the Icelander Hallr Þórarinsson and the Orkney Jarl Rǫgnvaldr in the 1140s; four grammatical treatises; and, most important, the Edda (composed ca. 1178–1241; see EDDA) of the poet and chieftain Snorri Sturluson. Edda probably means "poetics," and the work contains, besides a prologue, sections devoted to the mythology (Gylfaginning, "Deluding of Gylfi"), poetic vocabulary (Skáldskaparmál, "Poetic Diction"), and Háttatal ("Enumeration of Meters"), a poem exhibiting 100 metrical or lexical variations, equipped with a metrical commentary.

Snorri named the most commonly used form dróttkvæðr háttr (meter recited before the retinue) or dróttkvætt (recited before the retinue). In the beginning of Háttatal, he presented this verse to exemplify the use of alliteration, rhyme, and syllable-counting:

> Lætr, sás Hákun heitir > (hann rekkir lið) bannat, > jǫrð kan frelsa fyrðum
> friðrofs konungr ofsa; > sjálfr ræðr alt ok Elfar, > ungr stillir sá, milli
> (gramr á gipt at fremri)
> Gandvíkr jǫfurr landi.

Snorri explains that there are 12 "staves" (alliterating sounds) in the verse, two in odd lines and one in even lines, and that they link "quarter-stanzas," i.e., pairs of lines. The staves that appear initially in the even lines he calls "head-staves," and, he says, they control the alliteration. The other staves, in the odd lines, are "props." Thus, in the above verse, the head staves are the initial sounds of the syllables hann, frið-, ungr, and Gand-, and the alliterations require either identical consonants (e.g., Hák- and heit- in the first pair of lines) or, when a vowel begins the "head-stave," any other vowel (ungr, alt, Elf-). Besides this principle of alliteration, each line is to contain six syllables (a sequence like Lætr or ungr is one syllable). In addition, there is a requirement for half rhymes in odd lines (Lætr/heit-, jǫrð/fyrð, sjálfr/Elf-, gramr/frem-) and full rhyme in even lines (e.g., hann/bann-). Finally, although Snorri does not articulate it here, every line ends in a trochee, and the basic poetic unit is actually the half-stanza (Norse helmingr, "half").

Word order is very free. A literal trans. following the word order of the above verse would look something like this: "Causes, the one who is named Hákun (he emboldens an army) to be banned, earth can free for men breaking of the peace the king arrogance; himself rules all Elfr [the Göta River] young prince that between (the prince has fortune the greater) Gandvík [the White Sea] the land." There are three clauses in the first helmingr: Hákun causes the arrogance of war to be banned for men; he emboldens an army; the king can free the earth. The second has only two, but, in characteristic skaldic complexity, the object of the verb in the fifth line is found only in the eighth, and a prepositional phrase has parts in three of the four lines: "That young prince himself rules the land between Elfr and Gandvík; the prince has fortune the greater." Because Norse was a far more inflected lang. than Eng., unraveling the strands is easier than it appears in trans., but it is still tricky enough that many eds. routinely recast verses into normal prose word order, if only to make clear their interpretations.

Later in Háttatal, Snorri discusses variations within this 24-syllable scheme with its alternating alliterative staves and alternating half and full rhymes for the helmingr; these concern primarily the syntax and arrangement of the clauses. He also discusses variations from the scheme: changing the syllable count, changing or moving the alliterations, changing or moving the rhymes. To most of these variations, he assigns a name; these terms are still used in the discussion and analysis of Norse poetry.

Snorri used the verse cited above to exemplify the poetic structure. His next order of business, begun in the very next stanza he presented and discussed, was to explain poetic vocabulary. Although he distinguished between a number of concepts, later scholarship names them all *kennings: substitution for a single noun of some other term that is "made known" (kennd) by another noun. Thus, e.g., battle may be expressed with "spear-din." Kennings may, however, be extended: the "fire of battle" is a sword, as is, therefore, "fire of spear-din."

Here is a helmingr from the second stanza of Háttatal, with the alliterating staves in bold and rhymes italicized:

> Holt* felr hildigelti*
> heila bœs ok deilir* > gulls í gelmis stalli* > gunnseið skǫrungr reiðir.

The helmingr contains two clauses, whose verbs are felr (covers) in line 1 and reiðir (brandishes) in line 4. The subjects are deilir gulls (distributor of gold), a kenning for a king based upon his supposed generosity (such references are common; poets may have wished to remind kings of their obligation to reward them) and skǫrungr (prominent man) in line 4, also referring to the king. What he covers and brandishes are his head and his sword. "Head" is rendered here with holt bœs heila (forest of the inhabited place of the brain): the brain lives in the skull, and its forest is hair, which here functions as a metonym for the head (see METONYMY). "Sword" is gunnseið[r] (battle fish), a kenning that sounds unlikely to our ears but is based on the similarity in shape. Technically, a seiðr is a pollack, but any fish will do for the kenning, and seið[r] enables the required full rhyme. The king covers his head with a hildigoltr—the form in line 1 is a dative instrumental—(battle-boar). Although this kenning might conceivably have originated in pagan-cult practice suggested by the archaeological record, it is most easily explained by reference to a helmet with this name in heroic trad. This explanation demonstrates that some kennings required knowledge of traditional narratives from heroic legend and myth.

For nearly all the hist. of Norse poetry, kennings were as important a poetic feature as the strict requirements for alliteration, rhyme, and number of syllables. However, in the high Middle Ages, some Christian poets objected to kennings as obscuring their message and turned away from using them; the most famous manifestation of this objection is the Icelandic monk Eysteinn's mid-14th-c. Lílja (Lily), a hist. of Christian salvation. He composed it in a meter called hrynhent ("falling" or "floating meter"), which varies from dróttkvætt in that it adds another trochee to each line; the result is quite stately.

A poet was called a skáld. If, as some scholars argue, the word is etymologically related to verbs like the Ger. schelten (reproach) or was the source of the Eng. verb scold, we have some indication of the power of poetry in Old Scandinavian society. Further indication of such power is found in narratives about the impact of insult poetry and laws prohibiting insult poetry and certain kinds of erotic verse. We know that skalds were active in the retinues of powerful men and the courts of kings; one text, Skáldatal (enumeration of skalds), links known skalds to known kings of the Viking Age. Throughout the Viking Age, at least, skalds functioned as eyewitnesses to kings' deeds, mostly perhaps in battle, but we also have an old trad. of ekphrastic poetry (see EKPHRASIS), as well as a large collection of individual occasional verses. Later commentators distinguished a poem equipped with a refrain and other structural features, which they called a drápa (etymology unknown), from a more simple grouping, a flokkr (flock). Occasional stanzas are called lausavísur (unbound verses).

Trad. names the first skald Bragi Boddason, who was probably active in Norway in the late 9th c. Some scholars have imagined that Bragi himself created dróttkvætt, and although no evidence can be brought to bear, it is undeniable that the first skalds use the form with great facility. The mythology also has a Bragi, god of poetry, and it is not difficult to link the two. But the form adapted easily to Christian subjects as well, and there are poems on all manner of Christian themes. The first great Christian drápa was Geisli (Sunbeam) by the Icelander Einarr Skulason, an encomium to St. Olaf recited more than a century after his death, when the see of Niðaróss in western Norway was elevated to an archdiocese in 1153–54. By then, skaldic poetry already was an Icelandic monopoly, and in Iceland, the form lived on throughout the Middle Ages. Its metrical complexities were taken up in a new form of long narrative poem, the rímur (from OF rime).

One ms. contains a collection of poems on mythological and heroic topics in the far simpler alliterative form of other Germanic trads. (but still stanzaic), and the type of poems in it were named "eddic" following an Enlightenment surmise. Other such poems are known as well, many in Icelandic sagas set in the heroic age. Unlike dróttkvætt poetry, these poems are transmitted without the name of a composer, perhaps because they are set in a prehist. about which Icelanders had no information. Because of its Germanic context, eddic poetry has received a great deal of scholarly attention, but it represents only a tiny portion of Norse poetry.

NORSKE SELSKAB. Det norske Selskab (The Norwegian Society) was a literary and patriotic club of Norwegian writers and students who gathered at a coffeehouse in Copenhagen in the late 18th c. Founded in 1772, the group fostered a form of cultural conservatism based on Fr. neoclassicism and Eng. empiricism and opposed to F. G. Klopstock and the influential Danish sentimentalist Johannes Ewald (1743–81). The club had more than 100 members in its prime; some of the important poets among them were Johan Nordahl Brun (1745–1816), Claus Frimann (1746–1829), Johan Herman Wessel (1742–85), and Jens Zetlitz (1761–1821). The literary endeavors of the members ranged over most of the neoclassical genres, from heroic drama and *fables in verse to *elegy and *epigram. Wessel, the most admired member, was a master of witty and elaborate *satire. The society published three Poetiske Samlinger (poetic collections) during the final decades of the century. Worthy of note as Norway's first national historical play is Brun's Einar Tambeskielver (1772). By cultivating a national identity and lit., the society laid the foundations for the Norwegian romantic cultural revival that came in the 1830s.

NORWAY, POETRY OF. For a small nation on the fringes of Europe, Norway has an exceptional collection of mod. and contemp. poets. Over large stretches of its hist., however, poetry in Norway has not enjoyed such an auspicious climate, and it was not until the late 18th c. that the national trad. began to distinguish itself from that of Denmark.

The story of Norwegian poetry begins in the late Middle Ages, after the eddic and skaldic verse of ON lit. The first major works were folk *ballads, which derived their new style from *troubadour verse. Of particular interest is Draumkvæde (The Dream Ballad), a remarkable visionary poem that blends elements of pagan and Christian myth. The first significant Norwegian poet was Petter Dass (1647–1707), whose Nordlands Trompet (The Trumpet of Nordland, composed ca. 1700, pub. 1739) combines a *baroque style with descriptions of the life and landscape of northern Norway. Dass's contemporary and Norway's first recognized female author, Dorothe Engelbretsdatter (1643–1716), expressed powerful religious emotions in her *hymns and poems, which were published in Siælens Sang-offer (The Soul's Offering of Songs, 1678).

The Norwegian-born dramatist and Enlightenment polymath Ludvig Holberg (1684–1750) was the major figure of the joint lit. of Denmark-Norway, a political entity that lasted over 400 years until it was dissolved in 1814. Before writing his well-known comedies and epistles, Holberg published the verse epic Peder Paars in 1720. Another high point in 18th-c. Dano-Norwegian verse is the *pastoral description of spring in "Majdagen" (1758) by Christian Braunman Tullin (1728–65), which offers a somewhat Rousseauian critique of the corrupting influence of urban culture. In the late 1700s, a group of writers belonging to *Det norske Selskab (The Norwegian Society) in Copenhagen sought to create poetic tragedy in the Fr. neoclassical style while cultivating a national identity. Though they produced work in many genres, they are remembered chiefly for the ironic satire Kierlighed uden Strømper (Love without Stockings, 1772), written in graceful *alexandrines by the most talented among them, Johan Herman Wessel (1742–85).

*Romanticism reached Norway in the 1830s, when a cultural debate took place between those who followed Danish models and those who wanted to reject Danish cultural hegemony and build a national lit. Henrik Arnold Wergeland (1808–45), leader of the nationalist Patriots, possessed enormous talents and inexhaustible energy, which he directed to politics and popular education in addition to literary creation. Wergeland's production includes the vast lyric drama Skabelsen, Mennesket og Messias (Creation, Man, and Messiah, 1830), and narrative poems such as Jøden (The Jew, 1842) and Den engelske Lods (The English Pilot, 1844). His inventive lyric poetry reached its apex as he neared death, in poems like "Til min Gyldenlak" (To My Wallflower) and "Til Foraaret" (To Spring), the latter in *free verse. Whereas lit. meant rapture and organic form to Wergeland, it meant the opposite to the leader of the Intelligentsia Party, Johan Sebastian Welhaven (1807–73), a poet of quiet reflection and chiseled form who adopted the conservative aesthetic ideology of the influential Danish figure J. L. Heiberg. Welhaven represented a more understated and sober strand of romanticism; he attacked Wergeland's artistic excesses in Norges Dæmring (The Dawn of Norway, 1834), a series of epigrammatic *sonnets that also mocked the Patriots' nationalism and advocated a broadly Eur. cultural orientation. Wergeland and Welhaven can be seen as establishing two models of influence within Norwegian lit.: one protean, passionate, progressive, and nationalistic; the other modest, melancholy, moderate, and Eur.

The 1840s saw the rise of National Romanticism, when the scholars Peter Christen Asbjørnsen (1812–85), Jørgen Moe (1813–82), and M. B. Landstad (1802–80) collected folk culture and lit. While Asbjørnsen and Moe transformed Norwegian lit. with their folktales, Landstad's Norske Folkeviser (Norwegian Folk Ballads, 1853) exerted a broad influence on poetry. Another manifestation of National Romanticism was the work of the philologist Ivar Aasen (1813–96), who created landsmaal, the lang. now called nynorsk. Aasmund Vinje (1818–70) was the first important poet to use this lang. as a medium of literary expression, in works such as the well-known poem "Ved Rundarne" (1861). Since that time, the poetic trad. in Norway has been enriched by the presence of two literary langs.

Before writing his world-famous prose dramas, Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906) demonstrated the strengths of Norwegian as a medium for dramatic poetry in his many verse dramas, such as the National-Romantic Gildet paa Solhaug (The Feast at Solhaug, 1856), a historical *idyll based on a folk ballad. Kjærlighedens Komedie (Love's Comedy, 1862) marks the beginning of Ibsen's realism; its variously rhymed, skipping iambic *pentameters abound in caricature and paradox. In the masterpieces Brand (1866) and Peer Gynt (1867), Ibsen both exposes the faults of the Norwegian national character and offers a romantic depiction of the mountains and fjords of the country's landscape. The metrical variety of Peer Gynt, in contrast to the Knittelvers* used in Brand, produced a vast range of effects, from idle daydreaming to physical abandon, from the lightest banter to funereal solemnity. Ibsen also published a single collection of lyric poetry, Digte (Poems, 1862), which included the popular narrative poem "Terje Vigen."

While Ibsen's poetry was written in the manner of Welhaven, the 1903 Nobel Prize laureate Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson (1832–1910) saw himself as literary heir to Wergeland, and he was similarly vocal about left-wing political causes. His National-Romantic saga dramas Kong Sverre (1861) and Sigurd Slembe (1862) were meant to give Norway a gallery of heroes matching those of the other Eur. nations. Bjørnson published the narrative romance cycle Arnljot Gelline (1870) and a collection of lyric poems, Digte og Sange (Poems and Songs, 1880), and he later became a central figure of socially and politically engaged critical realism during the Modern Breakthrough era of Scandinavian lit.

Poetry in the 1890s acquired a more personal tone, one attuned to nature, mysticism, and fantasy. Friedrich Nietzsche, Edvard Munch, and Fr. *symbolism were important sources of inspiration for the fin de siècle poets Vilhelm Krag (1871–1933) and Sigbjørn Obstfelder (1866–1900). Krag expressed a world-weary melancholy, while Obstfelder evoked bizarre moods of angst and wonder in a highly original form marked by pauses, repetitions, abrupt transitions, and incompleteness. Though symbolist in conception, Obstfelder's poetry, with its free verse and urban imagery, anticipates Scandinavian *modernism. Arne Garborg (1851–1924) continued the nynorsk trad. with Haugtussa (The Elf Maiden, 1895) and I Helheim (In Hel's Home, 1901), which give voice to the dark, uncanny forces in humankind and nature while expressing a profound religious nostalgia. Another important writer, the 1920 Nobel laureate Knut Hamsun (1859–1952), published the exquisite mystical poem "Skjærgaardsø" in his influential collection Det vilde Kor (The Wild Chorus, 1904).

Hamsun's verse was a source of inspiration for a lyric revival that occurred around 1910, with the work of Herman Wildenvey (1886–1959) and Olaf Bull (1883–1933). Wildenvey's Nyinger (Bonfires, 1907) alternates between seductive love lyrics and pantheistic nature poetry, mixing biblical and ballad idioms with jargon and slang. For Bull, as for fellow symbolists such as R. M. Rilke and Paul Valéry, the purpose of poetry was to transmute fugitive moments of experience into what W. B. Yeats called the "artifice of eternity." Bull's masterpiece "Metope" (1927) is a formally perfect and moving meditation on love and the destructiveness of time. Around this time, the nynorsk trad. was also enriched with the work of Olav Aukrust (1883–1929) and Tore Ørjasæter (1886–1968), who treated religious and philosophical themes in a national spirit using forms derived from the *edda and the *ballad. Aukrust's main work, Himmelvarden (The Cairn against the Sky, 1916), is a visionary poem based on a quasi-mystical experience.

The interwar period brought new themes and original voices, incl. some early signs of modernism, which would become dominant after World War II. The work of Emil Boyson (1897–1979) was influenced by the poetics and preoccupations of Fr. symbolism, while Claes Gill (1910–73) followed the Anglo-Am. modernists to create ecstatic imagist verse that disregards ordinary syntax and logic. Apart from the captivating expressionist poets Kristofer Uppdal (1878–1961) and Åsmund Sveen (1910–63), nynorsk poetry in the early 20th c. was formally traditional. One of the major Scandinavian poets of the century, Rolf Jacobsen (1907–94), debuted in the 1930s with Jord og jern (Earth and Iron, 1933) and Vrimmel (Swarm, 1935). In these collections, he used *free verse and technological imagery in an ambivalent encounter with industrial modernity. In the postwar period, Jacobsen began to see technology as an unstable and sinister force, and he adopted an ecological stance that was highly critical of consumerist culture, for instance, in Hemmelig liv (Secret Life, 1954) and Headlines (1969). Jacobsen's poetry presents a kaleidoscope of contrasting moods, effects, and angles of vision—pathos and humor, the commonplace and the cosmic, sensory vividness and symbolic resonance. The love poems to his deceased wife in Jacobsen's final collection, Nattåpent (Night Open, 1985), are some of the best in Norwegian lit.

Politically and socially oriented poetry in traditional form was also quite significant in the decades before World War II. The two leading leftist poets were Arnulf Øverland (1889–1968) and Nordahl Grieg (1902–43), both of whom became active in the resistance movement during the Nazi occupation. Øverland survived imprisonment in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp, but Grieg died as a war correspondent in Germany. Much of Øverland's work springs from a religiously conceived socialist ideal, often presented in biblical symbols. Den røde front (The Red Front, 1937) is devoted to proletarian songs and other texts with a political message. Notable monuments to the 1930s are the poems "Guernica," inspired by Picasso's famous painting, and the antifascist "Du må ikke sove" (You Must Not Sleep). Øverland's laconic form and austere diction place him decidedly in the formal trad. of Welhaven; he was later a vocal traditionalist opponent of modernist formal experimentation in the poetic debates of the 1950s. Grieg, who was also a novelist and playwright, wrote socially oriented patriotic lyrics in a style of impassioned eloquence. His greatest success was the collection of war poems titled Friheten (Freedom, 1943). Another mid-century socialist poet, Inger Hagerup (1905–85), wrote condensed love lyrics as well as eloquent war poems (e.g., Aust-Vågøy, 1941). Also worthy of mention is Gunnar Reiss-Andersen (1896–1964), who combined a brooding introspection with sensitivity to a world in crisis. During the war he was an important spokesman for his country while in Swedish exile, after which he published Dikt fra krigstiden (Wartime Poems, 1945).

The leading postwar modernist was Paal Brekke (1923–93), whose Swedish exile during the war had exposed him to the modernist authors called Fyrtiotalisterna*. Brekke published his trans. of The Waste Land and other poems of T. S. Eliot, as well as his own first collection, Skyggefektning (Shadow Boxing), in 1949. Brekke's poetry employs a richly allusive, fractured lang., with abrupt shifts in register, mood, and rhythm—pathos alternates with black humor, personal recollection with glimpses of a world falling apart, quotidian banality with the mythic sublime. His best work, Roerne fra Itaka (The Oarsmen from Ithaca, 1960), is a poetic cycle in which Brekke, like Eliot, juxtaposes contemp. actuality with ancient myth. Another distinctive postwar modernist is Gunvor Hofmo (1921–95), whose work deals with the extreme experience of trauma and loss at a personal and historical level; her best friend was murdered at Auschwitz. Hofmo's first collection, Jeg vil hjem til menneskene (I Want to Go Home to the People, 1946), contains the starkly powerful poem "Det er ingen hverdag mer" (There Is No Everyday Anymore). Tarjei Vesaas (1897–1970), a key nynorsk novelist, also adopted a moderate modernism in his poetry, which has been collected in Eng. trans. His wife, Halldis Moren Vesaas (1907–95), was also an accomplished poet whose nonmodernist work explores women's lives and perennial themes of nature, love, life, and death.

By 1960, modernism in poetry was taken for granted, and many new voices were heard. Chief among them were Stein Mehren (b. 1935) and Georg Johannesen (1931–2005). Mehren is a novelist, playwright, and cultural critic as well as poet. His entire oeuvre forms an existential quest for authenticity and an engagement with philosophy of lang. By way of contrast, the work of Johannesen is social and political; he was deeply influenced by Bertolt Brecht, and his style is condensed and elliptical, characterized by bizarre contrasts and mordant irony. Ars Moriendi eller de syv dødsmåter (Ars Moriendi or the Seven Ways of Death, 1965), his main collection, treats the seven deadly sins within a strict, semischolastic format, a style at odds with the often surrealist imagery.

In the late 1960s, new political and poetic tendencies became evident in the work of Jan Erik Vold (b. 1939), who was associated with the influential left-wing modernist literary magazine Profil. Vold began as an experimentalist preoccupied by solipsism, and his early work includes forays into emblematic verse (see EMBLEM) and *concrete poetry. Hekt (Verge, 1966), framed by a document from the Vietnam War, creates a world poised on nightmare through grotesque imagery that evokes the uncanny. Subsequently, under the influence of W. C. Williams and contemp. Swedish poets, Vold moved toward a "new simplicity," anecdotal and confessional in Mor Godhjertas glade versjon. Ja (Mother Goodheart's Glad Version. Yes, 1968), almost purely visual and objective in spor, snø (tracks, snow, 1970), where he adapts *haiku form. The antisymbolist style of "new simplicity" was also perfected by an important older nynorsk poet, Olav H. Hauge (1908–94), who progressively simplified his style until, with Dropar i austavind (Drops in the East Wind, 1966), he was writing about everyday things in an unadorned idiom akin to his Chinese and Japanese models. Hauge, who lived his whole life in an orchard in western Norway, was also active as a translator of many foreign poets, such as W. B. Yeats, Arthur Rimbaud, Georg Trakl, and Paul Celan. Hauge's sober and minimal style has had an enormous influence on contemp. Norwegian lit., and, with Jacobsen, he is the most revered and most translated 20th-c. Norwegian poet.

In the final decades of the 20th c., after the politicized lit. of the 1970s, Norwegian poetry showed a variety of tendencies, from lyrics influenced by ballads and folk songs to continued late modernist minimalism to new forms of multimedia and genre-crossing experimentalism. Two significant contemp. poets are also celebrated dramatists: Jon Fosse (b. 1959) and Cecilie Løveid (b. 1951). Other figures who may be seen as vital to the landscape of contemp. poetry are Eldrid Lunden (b. 1940) and Paal-Helge Haugen (b. 1945), both of whom emerged from the Profil group of 1960s radicals. Like Hauge, Haugen's terse and concrete form of expression was influenced by Chinese and Japanese poetic forms. Perhaps the most fascinating late-20th-c. Norwegian poet is Tor Ulven (1953–95), who crafted a distinctively pessimistic voice with an astonishing use of archaeological motifs, from Etter Oss, Tegn (After Us, Signs, 1981) to the *prose poems of Stein og speil (Stone and Mirror, 1995). In 2004, Øyvind Rimbereid (b. 1966) won the prestigious Kritikerprisen (The Norwegian Critics' Prize for Literature) for Solaris korrigert (Solaris Corrected), which contains an epic science-fiction poem written in a futuristic hybrid composed of dialectal Norwegian, Eng., ON, and other langs. Poetic creativity continues to thrive in contemp. Norway, in part because of generous support from the government's Arts Council.

NOVAS (RIMADAS). A term used in the plural, even for a single composition. Occitan nonlyric poems (verse narratives) ordinarily written in rhymed octosyllabic *couplets. Although the term was sometimes applied to poems with a strong didactic element, it normally designated some kind of narrative, the most famous examples being the verse fictions Jaufré and Flamenca; the latter in particular is one of the gems of Occitan lit.

NOVEL, POETRY IN THE. Some novelists aspire to the poetic; others conspire against it. If a novel is itself poetic, like Boris Pasternak's Doctor Zhivago, poems extend the work's themes and enhance its sensibility. Thus, Pasternak's book ends with its hero's verse "The Poems of Yuri Zhivago," which are arguably the book's greatest achievement.

From antiquity on, a quite different possibility has also tempted prose writers: *satire. Rather than coexisting harmoniously, poetry and prose may form what Mikhail Bakhtin (1968) called "an oxymoronic combination" in which the sublime is brought low by an "inappropriate word." In such combinations, poetry can be used to signal a "poetic" view of life, which the surrounding prose then subjects to scrutiny and *parody. The "poetic" signifies the limit to which poetry supposedly tends, the way in which terms like "the dramatic" and the "operatic" point to extremes or an alleged essence. Satiric combinations represent the "poetic," so understood, as ridiculous. The "prosaic" usually has the last word.

Ancient Menippean satire was sometimes defined as a combination of prose and poetry, but not in a way that would have applied to Doctor Zhivago. Rather, the prose of Menippean satire does not just lie alongside the poetry but subjects it, and everything "poetic," to parodic debasement. The Menippean mixture of prosaic and poetic broadened over the centuries. The "poetic" came to include any number of "uplifting" attitudes: the view of life as exalted and humanity as noble, as well as all idealism, utopianism, and transcendence of the mundane. In Lucian's Philosophies for Sale and Erasmus's Praise of Folly, philosophers, with their sense of rising above ordinary concerns, are treated as another sort of absurd poet. When, in Le rire, Henri Bergson identifies laughter with the subversion of soul by body and of the spiritual by the mechanical, he expresses how Menippean satire treats anything "poetic." Whatever pretends to soar falls to earth, usually into mud or excrement, the way Gulliver, in a state of poetic dreaminess, falls into a giant Brobdingnagian turd.

The mod. novel is often traced to the Ren., whose greatest novelistic masterpieces juxtapose the prosaic and poetic in this way. The 13th ch. of François Rabelais's Gargantua contains a *rondeau about orifices ("Yesterday shitting, I did know / The profit to my arse I owe.") Of course, Don Quixote represents various "poetic" ideals as mad. In bk. 1, ch. 5, the hero repeats verses from a tale "no more authentic than the miracles of Mohammed" beginning: "Where art thou, lady of my heart, / That for my woe thou dost not grieve?" When the barber and curate examine Don Quixote's library, the niece tells them to burn the pastorals as well, lest he "suddenly take it into his head to turn shepherd and roam through the woods and fields, singing and piping, and what is worse, turning poet, for it is said that disease is incurable and catching."

Some 19th-c. realist novels advocated a "prosaic" view of life, which set the highest value on how ordinary moments are lived and everyday decisions made. In these works, the opposite view was often represented by poetry, esp. romantic poetry. The scheming heroine of Anthony Trollope's The Eustace Diamonds sings, plays the harp, and quotes poetry: "She had learned much poetry by heart, and could apply it." "Applied poetry" deceives others, but self-deception is still more likely in these novels advocating the prosaic. In Jane Austen's Persuasion, Anne detects the overwrought quality of Captain Benwick's love of Walter Scott and Lord Byron. Discoursing on "whether Marmion or The Lady of the Lake were to be preferred, and how ranked the Giaour and The Bride of Abydos; and, moreover, how the Giaour was to be pronounced, he shewed himself acquainted with all the tenderest songs of the one poet, and all the impassioned descriptions of hopeless agony of the other." Anne hopes that "he did not always read only poetry" and says "that she thought it was the misfortune of poetry, to be seldom safely enjoyed by those who enjoyed it completely." In such metaliterary passages, Austen and Trollope point to the prosaic values of their own prose.

Fyodor Dostoevsky repeatedly quotes or paraphrases "poetic" poetry, not only to mock naïve idealism but to counter naïve psychology. Notes from Underground and The Brothers Karamazov contain endless references to Dostoevsky's symbol of both kinds of naiveté, Friedrich Schiller. In The Idiot, Aglaia quotes Alexander Pushkin's poem about a "poor knight" both to mock and praise Myshkin for his quixotic spirit. In Demons (The Possessed), the narrator paraphrases Stepan Trofimovich's absurdly romantic poem. It is "some sort of allegory, recalling the second part of Faust," which opens with "a chorus of incorporeal figures of some sort" and "a chorus of spirits not yet living but very eager to live" who sing "about something indefinite, for the most part about somebody's curse." Everything displays "a tinge of higher meaning" until a young man tells a fairy "that his greatest desire is to lose his reason at once (a desire possibly superfluous)." We get the poem only through its satiric rendition in prose.

The narrator of Demons does much the same to the poetic prose of Karmazinov (a *parody of Ivan Turgenev). Karmazinov, we are told, may describe a drowned woman and a dead child, but "one seemed to read between the lines . . . Look rather at me, see how I was unable to bear that sight and turned away from it. . . . I blinked my eyes—isn't that interesting?" Unexpectedly enough, this novel also uses poetry to mock even the prosaic lang. of ordinary society life with lang. that is the very opposite of "poetic." Extremely unpoetic verse does to prose what prose does to "the poetic" when the drunken Lebyadkin recites his poem "The Cockroach," at the end of which a servant empties a jar full of insects, "the whole stew, flies, beetles and all, into the pig pail . . . but observe, madame, observe, the cockroach doesn't complain."

The two greatest novels in verse—Byron's Don Juan and Pushkin's Evgenij Onegin—follow the Menippean procedure with a twist. Both "the poetic" and "the prosaic" appear in verse, yielding to each other in a complex sequence. Byron's "pedestrian muse" manages to inspire digressions from digressions that somehow still fit the verse pattern. So do vulgarities, phrases from foreign langs., and rhymes so bad they are good: "But—Oh! Ye lords of ladies intellectual, / Inform us truly, have they not hen-pecked you all?" Beginning with his verse dedication, Byron repeatedly targets William Wordsworth, S. T. Coleridge, and Robert Southey. Canto 1 ends by working four appalling—but not appalling enough—lines of Southey into the Juan stanza:

> "Go, little Book from this my solitude!
> I cast thee on the waters—go thy ways!
> And if—as I believe, thy vein be good,
> The World will find thee after many days."
> When Southey's read, and Wordsworth > understood,
> I can't help putting in my claim to praise—
> The four first rhymes are Southey's every line:
> For God's sake, reader! take them not for mine!

Pushkin's 14-line *Onegin stanza—well imitated in Vikram Seth's novel in verse The Golden Gate (1986)—allows for still more digression, variety in tone, and *macaronic rhymes across alphabets as well as langs. Once the parodic and always ironic tone is established, Pushkin introduces the romantic poet Lensky by quoting his verse, which just happens to fit the Onegin stanza. Like an elegy put into *limerick form, mockery is inevitable even when not otherwise expressed.

The all-consuming "prosaic" irony of Onegin turns on itself, so that it too becomes the subject of its own parody. In the end, it is hard to say whether Onegin ultimately mocks the poetic with the prosaic, or vice versa, or both. However shrewd the prosaic may be, the poetic can sometimes rise above it.

NUMBER(S). From the cl. era through the romantic, number was a *synecdoche for metrical verse, since meter was conceptualized as the number of syllables in each line. Sometimes, number referred to rhyme and more rarely to stress or *accent. More important, in each of these periods, number indicated poetry's participation in the divine order. After ca. 1820, number became a quaint archaism.

In *classical prosody, Cicero and Quintilian discussed number, as did Augustine and Bede in med. prosody. The biblical book of Wisdom famously claimed that God "ordered all things by measure, number, and weight," and Plato's Timaeus also found universal order in music and number. Of a piece with music, harmony, and the universe, meter was only one of several kinds of *numerology that determined the line, the stanza, and other formal features. In Paradise Regain'd, John Milton describes cl. Athens: "There thou shalt hear and learn the secret power / Of harmony in tones and numbers hit / By voice or hand, and various measured verse." Vocal and instrumental music as well as "measured verse" use "tones and numbers" to create "harmony," unlocking a "secret power."

Because number meant harmony, regularity was prized over *variation or *substitution. In An Essay on Criticism, however, Alexander Pope articulated an emerging aesthetic: "But most by numbers judge a poet's song, / And smooth or rough with them is right or wrong." "Smooth" numbers meant little variation, while "rough" numbers took liberties with the meter. Nudging harmony aside, Pope valued expression more: "The sound must seem an echo to the sense."

Over the 19th c., number fell from being a synecdoche for poetry and, beyond it, for the divine order to become a synecdoche merely for metrical verse. In Of Human Bondage, when W. S. Maugham described the "exquisite numbers" of "old Herrick," the term no longer implied the "order of all things."

NUMEROLOGY. A theory of composition whereby authors order their works according to numerical patterns—when number itself becomes, in Roman Jakobson's phrase, a "constitutive device of the sequence." The items arranged may be almost anything countable, whether substantive (events of a narrative, days of its action) or formal (chapters, stanzas, lines). Equally various are the possible patterns: they range from complex arrays of Platonic numbers or numbers bearing special religious significance—such as the number three in Christianity—to simple round-number counts or mere allusions—like the 200s that refer to Carolus Calvus (CC in Roman numerals). The art of intricate numerology (as of its concealment) can achieve effects of great subtlety.

Much med. and Ren. numerology derived from the Bible, which itself offered models for such organization, notably in Lamentations and the *acrostic Psalms.

These examples exerted immense authority through the trads. of biblical poetics and of Heb. poetics (see HEBREW POETRY, HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS): the letter total of the Heb. alphabet, e.g., used in Psalm 119, became a favorite compositional number. Indeed, handbooks of number symbolism (arithmology), such as Pietro Bongo's Numerorum mysteria (1591), most often based a number's symbolisms on the contexts of its biblical occurrences. But it is important to recognize that numerology could nevertheless be mimetic, since creation itself was thought to reveal patterns of number symbolism. A much-quoted authority was Wisdom of Solomon 11:20: "Thou hast ordered all things by measure, number, and weight."

Philo Judaeus gave a decisive turn to number symbolism when he interpreted Genesis in terms of Pythagorean number theory (e.g., the six days of creation made a perfect number). Subsequently, biblical numbers mingled with Pythagorean-Platonic symbolisms like the tetraktus (1 + 2 + 3 + 4 = 10) and the lambda series (1, 2, 4, 8; 1, 3, 9, 27). Such principal symbolic numbers informed patterns throughout Western culture: they appear in early med. Celtic romances and 17th-c. ecclesiastical music, in biblical commentaries and lyric poems, in *masque dances and cathedral architecture.

Ren. poets emulated the symmetries and Pythagorean proportions of architecture fairly directly, so that a doctrine of ut architectura poesis developed, comparable with the more familiar ut pictura poesis*. Poets esp. liked to form symmetries emphasizing an array's central position, which carried associations of sovereignty or dignity. Thus, Dante treats divine love in the central canto of the Divine Comedy at the center of a symmetrical array of line totals: 151/145/145/139/145/145/151. Texts like Gen. 3:3 and Exod. 8:22 ("I am the Lord in the midst of the earth") authorized such procedures. Consequently, in approaching a late med. or Ren. poem, it is worth counting to find what lies at its center: in John Milton's Paradise Lost, e.g, Messiah ascends his throne in the central lines of the first edition's 10,550 lines (exact numerology was often confined to the editio princeps).

Another common sort of numerology is calendrical. Here, again, there was biblical authority in texts like Ps. 90:12 ("teach me to number my days"). Petrarch took these to heart, structuring his Canzoniere as a calendar and noting the astrological circumstances of composition of individual poems. In the Ren., Edmund Spenser perhaps followed this trad. most extensively: his Epithalamion represents a celebrated instance of numerology, rediscovered by Hieatt. Many Elizabethan *sonnet sequences have calendrical numerology, e.g., Spenser's Amoretti. Alternatively, they may use allusive numbers such as the 108 of the Penelope Game in Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella and Alexander Craig's Amorous Songs, Sonnets and Elegies.

Many Ren. poems of any formal pretensions are organized numerologically. And certain mannerist poets (such as George Chapman) reach a ne plus ultra if not a reductio ad absurdum of self-conscious intricacy in this regard by continual references to their own numerology. But this is far from obvious, since they assiduously finesse by "concealing" their secrets—e.g., by using totals one more or one less than the significant number.

In the Middle Ages and the Ren., numerical composition was taken for granted; it formed part of the poetic craft or "mystery"—like that whereby the rules of prosody are still handed down. Few Ren. writings about numerology have survived, and these are not on a high plane of critical interest. In the 18th c., with the spread of a new worldview, numbers came to be assigned a less symbolic function, and interest in numerology declined. The romantic movement brought a rupture with the older compositional trad., so that numerology had to be rediscovered by the Pre-Raphaelite D. G. Rossetti, by devout students of med. Catholicism, by early 20th-c. Dante scholars, and by hermetic modernists such as James Joyce. Numerology is, after all, a form of *constraint and has affinities with the procedures of *Oulipo and other experimentalists. In the 1960s and early 1970s, numerology enjoyed something of a vogue among a set of critics, principally medievalists and early modernists, who found in it an alternative to both an exhausted *formalism and *historicism (in the pause before a resurgent, i.e., *New, Historicism); in that era, the claims made for numerological structures were sometimes extravagant, and (except for Hieatt on Spenser and a few others) seldom made a lasting mark on the critical conversation around major works. Still, numerology can be indispensable to a full appreciation of earlier poetry, and sometimes (particularly where allusive numbers are involved) it can aid inferential crit. decisively. There is still no comprehensive study of the subject.

NURSERY RHYMES. Verses, either spoken or sung, often originating in oral trad. and adult sensibilities but preserved in the world of young children. The definitive study of these perennially popular verses ("London Bridge is broken down, / Broken down, broken down . . ." e.g., or "Mary, Mary, quite contrary, / How does your garden grow? . . .") remains The Oxford Dictionary of Nursery Rhymes, ed. and introduced by Iona and Peter Opie. The term nursery rhyme was not coined until the early 19th c.; before then, these verses were known in England as "songs" or "ditties" and in America as Mother Goose rhymes. Although the Opies, Robert Jamieson (1806), James Orchard Halliwell (1842), Morag Styles (1998), and others acknowledge that similar rhymes for young children have existed across cultures for centuries, often with striking resemblances to each other, nursery rhyme has come to refer to these traditional Anglo-Am. verses and their variants, which "enter the nursery through the predisposition of the adults in charge of it" (Opie) and which are distinct from playground and school verses for older children (J. Ritson's Gammer Gurton's Garland is dedicated to "all good little children who can neither read nor run"). Nursery rhymes tend to be in accentual verse, often in *ballad meter; in trans., the Opies assert, "the English nursery rhyme has probably been carried into every country in the world."

Nursery rhymes have retained remarkable integrity and appeal over time, a phenomenon the Opies attribute to the tenacity of children and to the vitality of oral culture in the world of the young and their caretakers. Nursery rhymes have also been admired for their literary value. "The best of the older ones," according to Robert Graves, "are nearer to poetry than the greater part of The Oxford Book of English Verse." Walter de la Mare wrote that "they have their own complete little beauty if looked at closely," and a number of well-known poets—Christina Rossetti, Robert Louis Stevenson, Randall Jarrell, John Ciardi, Robert Frost, Theodore Roethke, and others—have composed poems for children. However, Styles distinguishes as "two quite separate traditions" the nursery rhyme, which comes out of "the disorderly, casual, robust world of the oral tradition; and poetry consciously composed with children in mind by writers who wish to communicate with young readers."

With sources as variant as riddles, alphabet primers, ciphers, prayers, proverbs, tavern songs, barrack-room refrains, seasonal chants, street ballads, tongue twisters, monger cries, mummers' plays, and theatrical productions, the Opies assert that "the overwhelming majority of nursery rhymes were not in the first place composed for children." Ten percent of the rhymes in The Oxford Dictionary of Nursery Rhymes date back to 1650 or earlier, with nearly half at least 200 years old and a few hearkening back to the Middle Ages and earlier (the cradle song "Lullay, lullay, litel child, / Softë slep and faste" dates from a ms. of 1372, and "White Bird Featherless" appears in Lat. in the 10th c.). The Opies suggest that "of these pieces which date from before 1800, the only true nursery rhymes (i.e., rhymes composed esp. for the nursery) are the rhyming alphabets, the infant amusements (verses which accompany a game), and the lullabies. Even the riddles were in the first place designed for adult perplexity." Attitudes toward children in 17th- and 18th-c. England, when the majority of traditional nursery rhymes originated, were permissive, with children treated as miniature adults, perhaps accounting for the often bawdy, profane, and even violent content of some of the verses ("Here comes a candle to light you to bed, / Here comes a chopper to chop off your head," for instance, from "Oranges and Lemons").

The Opies and subsequent scholars have taken care to explore and, when necessary, debunk as apocryphal attempts over the centuries to vest with social, psychological, and political import many nursery rhymes, such as "Sing a Song of Sixpence," which has been wrongly interpreted as alluding to the choirs of Tudor monasteries, or to attribute the identity of "Mother Goose" to an actual person, when in fact her persona was introduced in Europe by a Frenchman, Charles Perrault, in contes de ma mère l'Oye in 1697.

Interest in nursery rhymes remains vital in the late 20th and early 21st cs. Any visitor to the Internet will find that fresh print and musical, MP3 downloadable versions of nursery rhymes appear often. Traditional nursery rhymes continue to find their way into contemp. adult work as well, in forms ranging from Anne Carson's long poem The Glass Essay (1995) ("Violante in the pantry / Gnawing at a mutton bone") to Michael Franti and Spearhead's spin on "Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary" in their anthem "Ganja Babe" (2002). It seems likely that traditional nursery rhymes will survive largely intact, though with fresh contexts and applications, in oral and print cultures for generations to come.

NUYORICAN POETRY. Nuyorican is a portmanteau word that brings together New York and Puerto Rican, as well as neo- and Rican; it represents an identity of Puerto Ricans and people of Puerto Rican descent who live in New York City. Historically, the Nuyorican experience over the 20th and 21st cs. has been shaped by poverty, racial discrimination, crime, migration, bilingualism, and labor exploitation. Nuyorican poetry typically gives voice to these issues, although the roots of its aesthetics and concerns reach back much further.

Nuyorican poetry is largely characterized by qualities of orality, *performance, and ling. self-awareness, aspects grounded in Puerto Rican antecedents. Early Puerto Rican poetics syncretized the prehistoric, indigenous Taíno areyto, a ceremony in which songs of secular wisdom were performed communally; the West African role of the griot, a *bard responsible for preserving cultural hist. and interpreting new challenges in an aesthetic, spoken form; and the Sp. lang., the lingua franca of the colonized island. Many Nuyorican poets invoke this multicultural amalgam in justifying the contemp. aesthetic of Nuyorican poetry.

Several historical events contributed to the vast migration of Puerto Ricans to New York City in the 20th c. As an outcome of the Sp.-Am. War, Spain ceded Puerto Rico to the U.S. with the passage of the Treaty of Paris in 1898. The Foraker Act of 1900 established a popularly elected House of Representatives for Puerto Rico, an achievement that added to a communal sense of Puerto Rican sovereignty and political self-determinism. In 1917, the Jones-Shafroth Act established for Puerto Rico a popularly elected Senate and granted U.S. citizenship to Puerto Ricans, a right freely exercised by tens of thousands in the 1940s and 1950s, partially in response to the Puerto Rican politician Teodoro Moscoso's Operation Bootstrap, a program that encouraged U.S. industrial investment in post–Depression-era Puerto Rico at the expense of thousands of agricultural jobs. Many Puerto Ricans were motivated to seek employment in the U.S., which had tightened immigration laws during World War I but experienced a growing economy during and after World War II. New York City, esp. under Mayor Robert Wagner, was the most popular and inviting destination for Puerto Rican migrants in the mid-20th c. Given that Puerto Ricans were U.S. citizens, a phenomenon arose after the Great Migration of the 1940s–60s: the so-called Revolving Door, a tendency for Puerto Ricans in New York City to return periodically to the island and then return again to New York for economic, familial, and educational reasons.

By the 1960s, Puerto Rican communities in New York City had become firmly established. Many Nuyoricans, as well as Puerto Ricans who had migrated to New York City as children or young adults (esp. after service in the U.S. military), had native fluency in Eng. and, motivated by the atmosphere of multiculturalism and liberalism in the 1960s and 1970s, some began to explore a new artistic consciousness, one that expressed the images and emotions of their poor immigrant communities. Jesús Colón, Esmeralda Santiago, Piri Thomas, and Nicholasa Mohr were among the first Nuyorican writers, composing in various genres, esp. fiction, the essay, and the memoir. One neighborhood in New York City of particular importance to the Nuyorican poetry movement was the Lower East Side, an area so largely Nuyorican that it is commonly known also as Loisaida; it could be said that the movement was born there. Among the first Nuyorican poets were Sandra María Esteves, Pedro Pietri, Bimbo Rivas, Shorty Bón Bón, and Américo Casiano, who established a community of Nuyorican poets in the Lower East Side by collaborating on poetry readings at the home of Miguel Algarín, a poet and scholar who taught at Rutgers University. By 1973, these events became regular occurrences that attracted a diverse following, and in 1975, Algarín established the *Nuyorican Poets Café, which has remained a fixture in the Lower East Side and a world-renowned beacon for urban poets.

One of the early and most popular volumes of Nuyorican poetry was Pietri's Puerto Rican Obituary (1973), whose title poem became an anthem of sorts among Nuyorican audiences. In 1975, William Morrow published Nuyorican Poetry: An Anthology of Puerto Rican Words and Feelings, ed. by Algarín and Miguel Piñero. The poems collected in these pages oscillate between Eng. and Sp., happy and angry, urban landscapes and nostalgia, encapsulating a range of frustrations and epiphanies endemic to Nuyorican experiences of the time. A hallmark of this early poetry is its bilingualism; central to the Nuyorican poetic consciousness is the anxiety caused by inhabiting two ling. identities, Eng. and Sp., and the hybrid speech it breeds. In his introduction to Nuyorican Poetry, "Nuyorican Language," Algarín claims that "the experience of Puerto Ricans on the streets of New York has caused a new language to grow: Nuyorican. . . . The mixture of both languages [Eng. and Sp.] grows. The interchange between both yields new verbal possibilities, new images to deal with the stresses of living on tar and cement." Thus, code switching becomes a salient feature of the poetic form, often echoing ironies of the racial or political complexities of Nuyorican identity. Among many examples in Nuyorican Poetry, Martita Morales's "The Sounds of Sixth Street" and "Teatro" demonstrate this verbal play across languages, often high lighting the position of slang in registers of speech.

This play between Eng. and Sp. (and "Spanglish"), as well as between standard expressions and slang derivations, was vital to early Nuyorican poetry in its assertion of a new poetic lang.—as was a potent sympathy for the working class and the urban poor, as captured in Pietri's "Puerto Rican Obituary."

The concerns of reconciling ling. duality and social injustices run seamlessly through the production of Nuyorican poetry from its earliest appearance in the 1970s through the 1980s and 1990s, expressed in works such as Pietri's La Bodega Sold Dreams (1980) and Tato Laviera's La Carreta Made a U-Turn (1992), whose poem "my graduation speech" seems to sum up the pathos of Nuyorican poetry.

In 1982, the Nuyorican Poets Café closed for renovations and remained closed until 1989, when it reopened—but with a noticeably changed purpose. Bob Holman, a Columbia University graduate from Kentucky who had performed at the café on numerous occasions, assumed its leadership and brought with him a new agenda: the *poetry slam. It was Holman's intention to popularize poetry and to make the Nuyorican Poets Café a primary site for open-mike performances and scored poetry competitions. Since 1990, and because of the reputation of the new café, Nuyorican poetry has increasingly been associated with the slam movement and, in reciprocal fashion, Nuyorican poetry's connection to Puerto Rican cultural issues and ideas has diminished, rendering the category—once a response to a turbulent era of political relations between the U.S. and Puerto Rico—more a historical designation than a living phenomenon. Nevertheless, some poets today, such as Willie Perdomo and Caridad "La Bruja" de la Luz, still compose and publish poems in the original Nuyorican trad.

NUYORICAN POETS CAFÉ (NPC) is a nonprofit organization that sponsors cultural events and *poetic contests, located at 236 East Third Street on the Lower East Side of Manhattan.

The NPC began in 1973 as a series of informal gatherings hosted by the poet Miguel Algarín, then teaching at Rutgers University. In Algarín's home, local poets of Puerto Rican heritage would give readings in an effort to establish a new art community of Puerto Rican New Yorkers and to express their cultural experience in the mainland U.S. through their emergent, urban, and often bilingual lang. Participants in these early poetry events included Tato Laviera, Miguel Piñero, Pedro Pietri, Sandra María Esteves, Lucky Cienfuegos, Richard August, Belle Starr, Diane Burns, and Eddie Figueroa.

In 1974, Piñero's play Short Eyes was performed on Broadway, was nominated for six Tony Awards, and won the New York Drama Critics' Circle Award and the Obie Award for best play, drawing general attention to the Nuyorican literary community. In 1975, William Morrow's publication of the anthology Nuyorican Poetry, ed. by Piñero and Algarín, added to this burgeoning interest, and the popularity of Algarín's poetry events grew further. To accommodate more people, Algarín in 1975 rented the Sunshine Bar, 505 East Sixth Street, and renamed it the Nuyorican Poets Café. *Beat poets Allen Ginsberg, William Burroughs, and Gregory Corso were among the Sixth Street NPC's guests. In 1980, the NPC moved to the larger Third Street location, where it continues to operate.

After 1989, Bob Holman reconceived the NPC as a site for *poetry slam competitions, marketing the NPC as a multicultural (rather than exclusively Puerto Rican) community of urban lyricists. Since 1990, the NPC has hosted regular poetry slams, where teams compete in a form of stylized urban *performance poetry and are judged by a panel. The NPC has garnered an international reputation for its slams; notable participants have included Paul Beatty, Reg E. Gaines, Saul Williams, Mahogany Browne, and Karen Jaime. The NPC now hosts a range of artistic events, incl. jazz performances, theatrical productions, *hip-hop shows, and open-mike sessions.

OBJECTIVE CORRELATIVE. The term is defined in T. S. Eliot's essay "Hamlet and His Problems" (1919): "the only way of expressing emotion in the form of art is by finding an 'objective correlative'; in other words, a set of objects, a situation, a chain of events which shall be the formula of that particular emotion; such that when the external facts, which must terminate in sensory experience, are given, the emotion is immediately evoked." Eliot used the formula to pronounce Hamlet "an artistic failure," on the grounds that Hamlet suffers from an emotion "he cannot objectify." (The judgment derived from one of the books Eliot was reviewing, J. M. Robertson's The Problem of "Hamlet," [1919], where the play is called "an aesthetic miscarriage.") Eliot went on to speculate that this difficulty is a "prolongation" of Shakespeare's inability to express his own feelings satisfactorily. Hamlet's "disgust" exceeds its object (his mother's incestuous remarriage), just as the Hamlet story is an inadequate vehicle for the emotion ("by hypothesis unknowable") that prompted Shakespeare to write the play.

Eliot's essay did not convince many to judge Hamlet a failure, but the phrase objective correlative passed into general usage. Between 1980 and 2011, long after the heyday of Eliot's critical influence, the term appeared in more than 350 scholarly articles. When we feel that an image (or any other element) in a work fails to embody the "particular emotion" required or that an emotion is being described rather than "presented," we say that the artist has not found an objective correlative. And when we suspect that some emotion of the artist's has not been fully expressed, we say that the work itself is an inadequate objective correlative.

Eliot's technical-sounding formula has a modernist flavor, but the idea that poems evoke emotions by the representation of sensory experience was conventional in the 19th c. Antecedent instances have been identified in Walter Pater (DeLaura); Washington Allston, in whose Lectures on Art (1850) the phrase appears (Stallman); S. T. Coleridge (DiPasquale); and Friedrich Schiller (Wellek), among many others. The concept has also been connected with the philosopher F. H. Bradley, on whom Eliot wrote his Harvard diss. (Habib). In fact, Eliot's formula is standard in 20th-c. *imagism. Ford Madox Ford, reviewing Pound's Cathay (1915), cited "the theory that poetry consists in so rendering concrete objects that the emotions produced by the objects shall arise in the reader"—a phrase Eliot quoted in Ezra Pound: His Metric and Poetry (1917). And there are other instances contemporaneous with Eliot's essay (Menand). In "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919) and elsewhere, Eliot suggests that the artistically successful construction of the poem relieves the poet of a psychic distress—a "personal" emotion that need have no connection with the emotions expressed in the poem. This psychobiographical aspect of the objective correlative has no necessary relation to its imagist aspect; Eliot's yoking of the two in the Hamlet essay—Hamlet's "problem" reproduces Shakespeare's—represents his own psychologizing of imagist doctrine.

Although the objective correlative has proved useful for sympathetic readings of Eliot's own poetry (e.g., Matthiessen), Eliot's formulation verges on tautology—"the emotions evoked by a work of art must be the product of elements in that work" is a possible paraphrase. But because it names something intuitively felt about art, objective correlative seems one of those terms that are destined to survive their theoretical supersession.

OBJECTIVISM. A term used to designate what some have regarded as a movement in 20th-c. Am. poetry, initiated by the February 1931 issue of Poetry, guest-edited by Louis Zukofsky, and further represented in An "Objectivists" Anthology, ed. by Zukofsky and pub. by George Oppen's TO Publishers, in 1932, and in books issued by the cooperative Objectivist Press from 1933 to 1936. In wider application, the part of mod. and postmod. Am. poetry that has developed out of *imagism as opposed to *symbolism. Poems in this trad. tend to use lang. more literally than figuratively, presenting concrete objects for themselves rather than as embodiments of abstract ideas. They may also reflect a greater interest in composing apprehensible structures of relationships than in offering interpretations of experience, and show awareness of lang. itself as a structure interposed between the I/eye and the world.

The poets most frequently associated with objectivism are the Ams. Charles Reznikoff (1894–1976), Zukofsky (1904–78), Oppen (1908–84), Carl Rakosi (1903–2004), and Lorine Niedecker (1903–70), as well as the Eng. poet Basil Bunting (1900–85). Their work was championed by the older Am. modernists Ezra Pound, who put most of them in contact with one another and recommended Zukofsky as a guest editor for Poetry, and W. C. Williams, who published with the younger objectivists and reviewed their work, as well as corresponding with Zukofsky, who critiqued and influenced his own work.

Critics have been divided as to whether objectivism was a movement with a particular poetics. Some have taken Zukofsky's "Sincerity and Objectification" as an articulation of its principles. In that essay, Zukofsky argues that sincerity is manifested in details of seeing and wording and that perfected poetic structure can achieve objectification of the poem. To Reznikoff and Rakosi, however, the goal of poetic craft was, more simply, a clear, precise naming of things, serving to evoke emotion. The objectivists produced a considerable diversity of styles, ranging from the nearly transparent sentences of Reznikoff to the intricate sound play of Zukofsky, Niedecker, and Bunting, from the sharp satire of Rakosi to the fluid meditation of late Oppen. Zukofsky himself denied the existence of objectivism as a movement; the term he coined was objectivist, which he meant to designate only individual poets. If any generalization can be made about the aesthetic values of all the poets dubbed objectivists, it might be that they sought to "think with things as they exist" (Zukofsky's phrase), to extend the range of imagism while retaining its respect for things and for craft, and to open the poem to contemp. realities and historical context.

Though these poets differ widely from each other and never worked together as a group, they were bound by a loose network of affiliations that has been usefully characterized as a nexus. Reznikoff, Zukofsky, Oppen, and Rakosi were all Jewish; Reznikoff and Zukofsky grew up in immigrant households in New York and spent their lives in that city. Oppen lived there in the 1930s, and the three poets met and talked regularly. Niedecker, who spent her life in rural Wisconsin, wrote Zukofsky after reading the "Objectivists" issue of Poetry, and the two maintained an intense correspondence and exchange of mss. and critiques until Niedecker's death. Bunting corresponded regularly with both of them. Oppen, Rakosi, and Bunting stopped writing for several decades, returning to poetry in the 1960s. All these poets were highly educated but made modest livings, were leftist in their political views, and identified with the poor. The Depression, the Holocaust, and World War II made a deep impact on them.

Though the objectivists worked largely in obscurity, their poetry influenced a number of their younger contemporaries associated with Black Mountain College (see BLACK MOUNTAIN SCHOOL) and *projective verse, notably Robert Creeley and Robert Duncan, and some of the principal practitioners of *Language poetry, including Charles Bernstein and Ron Silliman.

OBSCURITY. Obscurity has a long hist. in poetry, but its causes have varied at different historical moments. One of the earliest and most significant forms of obscurity appears in med. *allegory. The impulse behind allegorical obscurity in the Middle Ages lies in the recoding of the OT in a modified figural system that could be used by readers of the NT, based on the premise that the subject matter of OT texts held a second, concealed meaning to be fulfilled in the future (see EXEGESIS). Characteristically, med. theorists did not always foreground the intrinsic elements of the text in a discernible formal arrangement but rather interpreted the fragmentary signs and traces embedded in the OT as veiled disclosures of a mysterious God's half-illuminated message. Because the subject matter was obscure, the deeper meaning of OT texts was assumed to be still hidden and subject to interpretation. Dante's Divina commedia is perhaps the best example of allegorical obscurity in med. lit. To the same category belongs the esoteric and obscure poetry of the Dolce stil nuovo* of Guido Guinizzelli and Guido Cavalcanti. To be sure, obscure poetry was attacked in the 14th c. because it was thought to be unnecessarily incomprehensible and opaque. Nevertheless, Giovanni Boccaccio defended poetry in his Genealogia deorum gentilium (1360), where he argued that the value of a poem is heightened by the obstacles that stand in the way of its decipherment.

In Ren. Europe, disguised political commentary and theories were often concealed in a double-voiced allegorical obscurity whose meaning was hard to formulate—e.g., in Eng., Edmund Spenser's Shepheardes Calender (1579) and Philip Sidney's Arcadia

The obscurity of much 20th-c. poetry is characterized by a number of distinctive features: disjointed *syntax, broken lines, rupture, and *dissonance—a renunciation of the referential and communicative functions of lang. The intricate wordplay of poetry that developed under the influence of *symbolism, *futurism, *Dada, and other avant-garde movements is strange, unfamiliar, and esoteric in order to subvert conventional reading strategies. Instead of evoking the obscurity of spirit, the unconscious, or the distant past, Rus. modernist poets explore the effects of loosening the connections of lang. and meaning. In the years following the 1917 revolution, the futurist poets Vladimir Mayakovsky and Velimir Khlebnikov sought to open up lang. by separating out its basic building blocks (morphemes, syllables). *'Zaum' or "transsense" poetry does not so much abandon meaning as push the emphasis toward *sound and *rhythm (see SOUND POETRY). Khlebnikov's poem "Incantation by Laughter" repeats a series of neologisms generated from the Rus. word shmekhat (laughter). The series—laughicate, laugherino, laughify—imitates the repetitive sounds of laughter, in addition to foregrounding how nouns and verbs are constructed.

The formal devel. of obscurity has been accompanied by a proliferation of programmatic and justificatory statements: "There is a certain glory in not being understood" (Charles Baudelaire); "I utter the word in order to plunge in back into its inanity" (Stéphane Mallarmé); "I have no language, only images, analogies, symbols" (W. B. Yeats). Schwartz locates the obscurity of mod. poetry in the *"dissociation of sensibility" that T. S. Eliot argued took place in the 17th c. when emotions and sensibilities became subordinate to the instrumental categories of science. There thus emerges a mechanistic rationality that reaches its full devel. in the sterile classificatory schemas of 19th-c. science. A poetic sensibility rooted in a common lang. can no longer exist in such a society, and unable to express himself or herself in shared ling. usage, a poet must slip into an idiosyncratic and specialized discourse.

In the late 20th c., discussion focused less on social diagnoses than on the interpretive codes through which the critic tries to decipher the poem. Riffaterre suggests that a "hermeneutic model" is at work within the poem, helping readers to unravel the peculiarities of the text. Such a model offers readers "a frame of thought or a signifying system that tells the reader how or where to look for a solution, or from what angle the text can be seen as decipherable" (see HYPOGRAM, SEMIOTICS AND POETRY). Significantly, Riffaterre emphasizes words or phrases that "resist deciphering or whose reason for being is hard to judge." Hence, *interpretation is encoded within the site of obscurity in the poem.

In the last decades of the 20th c., poets associated with the Language group and the jour. of the same name sought to free poetry from the burden of meaning and the hierarchy of the sentence (see LANGUAGE POETRY). Drawing on the structuralist observation of the arbitrary relationship between ling. signifier (word or sound) and the signified (the concept designated) and on the poststructuralist insights into the instability within any ling. sign (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER), Language poetry attempted to detach words from meaning by foregrounding their materiality: the shape and density of letters, relations to other words and to the page. Charles Bernstein's poem "Veil," lines of overtyped text forming a "technical palimpsest" (Dworkin), an intricate veil of effaced words; Susan Howe's "Melville's Marginality," constructed from vertical and slanted overwritten blocks of text; Christian Bök's Eunoia, built out of prose sections each focused on only one of the five vowels; David Melnick's "Pcoet," formed with intrusive consonants rendering words unreadable—all these practices demonstrate a self-reflective use of lang. to interrupt deliberately the conventional action of horizontal reading and highlight the poem as printed artifact. In Bernstein's poetics (1992), the unreadable text is situated at the cusp of "the field of human language and the inhumanness of sheer materiality." Similarly, for Silliman, Language poetry does not turn away from meaning but instead situates it as "a construct built from the determinate code of language," compelling readers to attend to the conflicted social processes that shape a poem, incl. the ink, markings, and paper, the disposition of material units. These new practices echo Ludwig Wittgenstein's entreaty: "don't think, but look" (quoted in Dworkin).

In the 21st c., the technological capacities of computers have been used by cyberpoets to produce dynamic, mobile forms of poetry (see CYBERTEXT, ELECTRONIC POETRY). Letters circulate across the screen, sometimes forming words, sometimes not; words appear and move into different configurations; the entire poem may disappear, leaving a blank screen, perhaps the ultimate form of obscurity in poetry (see, e.g., Brian Kim Stefans's "The Dreamlife of Letters"). Because the electronic text brings movement to what was a static page, Stefans compares the poet to a choreographer and the poem to a ballet. Perloff, however, cautions not to "fetishize digital presentation" and urges readers and viewers to consider Stefans's reconstruction of a commentary by Rachel Blau DuPlessis, a very traditional intertextual engagement embedded within the cybertext but made obscure by the constant movement of the letters and words. As in modernist poetry, obscurity in Language poetry and cyberpoetry initiates a process of *defamiliarization, provoking readers to approach the poem with new and different strategies of comprehension.

Discussions about the obscurity of mod. and contemp. poetry are not limited to Western crit. Tay has shown that controversy about obscurity (menglong) in poetry extends to post-Maoist China. In the 1970s and 1980s, poets such as Gu Cheng, Wang Xiaoni, and others created a corpus of work whose expression resembles imagist poetry. More recently, Wang comments that the experimental writings of the Feifei school of poetry (Daozi, Zhou Lunyou, and others) challenge canonical modernist writings with a style influenced by Western avant-garde poets.

OCCASIONAL VERSE. All literary works are occasioned in some sense; occasional verse differs in having not a private but a public or social occasion. From Pindar's *odes to Walt Whitman's "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," poets have found public occasions for writing: e.g., the memorial pieces in honor of Edward King, among which John Milton's "Lycidas" was one; the odes expected of a *poet laureate; tributes to a poet placed at the beginning of his volume, esp. in the 16th and 17th cs.; *epithalamia, such as those by Edmund Spenser and John Donne; funeral *elegies, respectful or ironic; *sonnets or odes memorializing some state occasion or historic event; or the prologues and epilogues to 17th- and 18th-c. plays. Counterparts abound in modernist and contemp. poetry; W. B. Yeats, Ezra Pound, and W. C. Williams wrote a good deal of occasional verse. Some mod. occasional poems are Thomas Hardy's "On an Invitation to the United States," Yeats's "Easter, 1916," and W. H. Auden's "September 1, 1939." Although occasional verse is often associated with poets from the Ren. through the Enlightenment, that is too narrow a view, as is also the restriction to Eur. writers. Islamic poetry is rich in *panegyrics founded on occasion, as is Korean. With their strong assumption of the historical purchase of poetry, Chinese poets typically write occasional verse. Japanese poems of the court period specify occasions, if only fictional, in their headnotes. In short, although occasional verse is often taken to be ephemeral or trivial or public, it is difficult to devise theoretical terms to distinguish rigorously among "Lycidas," Emily Dickinson's imaginary occasions of her own death, Robert Lowell's "For the Union Dead," and various Asian examples. On the other hand, to be dismissive is to violate the most serious conceptions of much of the world's lyric poetry, and even narrative and drama may arise from occasion.

OCCITAN POETRY. The root of the term Occitan is the word oc (yes) in the lang. of med. southern France, in contrast to OF oïl (stressed like mod. Fr. oui) and It. si; Dante made this triple distinction in his De vulgari eloquentia (On Vernacular Eloquence, ca. 1304). The Occitan lang. has been called langue d'oc, Provençal, and other names since the 12th c. The term Provençal was long preferred but has the disadvantage that it seems to refer specifically to Provence (Lat. Provincia Romana, the region of Gaul nearest to Rome), which is the area east of the Rhône and home of the 19th-c. poet Frédéric Mistral (1830–1914; see below), but only one part of the larger area from the Atlantic to the Alps where the lang. is or was spoken. As a geographical term, Languedoc refers to the territory west of the Rhône. Occitan is free from misleading specificity and enjoys increasing acceptance, although it was introduced only recently in both Fr. (1886) and Eng. (1940).

From the time before the *troubadours, who appeared ca. 1100, we have a handful of very short poetic texts, most of them fragmentary, that date from the 10th and 11th cs. The oldest one appears to be a birthing charm; another is a fragment of a passion narrative, yet another a religious alba in Lat. with a refrain in Occitan. A fragmentary proto-canso* (see below) evokes the lover as a hawk, while a fragmentary and obscure proto-sirventes* seems to criticize amorous nuns. Narrative verse begins with the Boeci, a longer but incomplete paraphrase of Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy that was written about 1000 and continues with the Chanson de Sainte Foy, a life of the child saint from about 1050.

In their halcyon days, the troubadours sang of *courtly love (which they called fin'amor or "true love") and a range of other subjects. Scholars debate whether William IX, Duke of Aquitaine and Count of Poitiers (1071–1126), was the first troubadour who composed or merely the first whose compositions have been transmitted to us. Among William's 11 (or 10) extant poems, some describe the humility and devotion of the courtly lover, but others express explicit eroticism: in one, sometimes called a fabliau,* the narrator is a sexual athlete and far from humble. In another, William takes leave of earthly power, perhaps because of an imminent departure on crusade or because he believed he soon would die. In the next generation, the moralist Marcabru (fl. 1130–49) scourged the sexual license of married men and women but also retold encounters of a first-person narrator with a young girl. In one of these, the prototypical pastorela (see PASTOURELLE), the narrator attempts to seduce the girl, but she steadfastly refuses; in another, a girl curses the king who called her lover away on crusade. In the middle years of the 12th c., Peire d'Alvernhe (fl. 1149–68) developed a theory of difficult style, or trobar clus* (closed composition), which involved elaborate sound patterns, unexpected rhymes, obscure vocabulary, and difficult syntax. Raimbaut d'Aurenga (ca. 1144–73) advocated such an abstruse manner in a debate with Giraut de Bornelh (fl. 1162–99), who defended trobar leu or the easy style. Bernart de Ventadorn (fl. 1147–70 or perhaps somewhat later), considered one of the greatest love poets among the troubadours, sang with an air of deceptive simplicity about his adoration for his lady, the joy of love and the grief of yearning, and less frequently about his ecstasy in sexual fulfillment.

By about 1170, the troubadours had developed a set of generic concepts. In terms of this system, their 2,500-odd extant poems comprise about 1,000 cansos or love songs, about 500 sirventes or satires, and about 500 coblas* or individual stanzas, while those remaining include the pastorela or pastourelle, the alba or dawn poem, debate poems such as the tenso* and the partimen*, the planh* or funeral lament, and minor genres. Bertran de Born (ca. 1150–1215), whose castle of Altafort was besieged and taken by Richard Lionheart, sang sirventes of political passion with the commitment of a lord who regarded warfare as a source of moral stature. The male aristocratic mentality also informs the chanson de geste* of Giraut de Roussillon (ca. 1150), written in an artificial blend of Occitan and Fr., and the parodic romance Jaufre (late 12th c.; see MEDIEVAL ROMANCE).

In the early 13th c., the Occitan region was the scene of the Albigensian Crusade, waged at the invitation of the pope by a Fr. leader, Simon de Montfort, against the heretical Cathars who were centered at Albi. According to a long-standing interpretation, the crusade destroyed the courtly society that had nourished the troubadours and so destined Occitan poetry to inevitable decline. However, it is doubtful that this conflict, which was one among many, played so decisive a role. Peire Cardenal (fl. 1205–72) criticized the Church for the failings of unworthy priests, incl. members of the Inquisition, while expressing his own orthodox piety. Perhaps the mid-13th c. saw the composition of the delightful romance of Flamenca, whose heroine succeeds, despite the cruelty of her jealous husband, in enjoying the love of a perfect knight. Late in the century, Guiraut Riquier (fl. 1254–92) complained of the insecurity of the courtier's life and lamented that he had come among the last of the troubadours. In the early 14th c., poets of the school of Toulouse turned to increasingly religious themes, esp. the praise of the Virgin. Only one poet of this period, Raimon de Cornet (fl. 1324–40), has left an extensive body of work incl. lyrics, verse letters, didactic texts, and two poems in Lat. Both priest and friar, Raimon de Cornet indulged in a ribald tale of his mistress's revenge for his infidelity, but in another mood, he seriously defended the value of poetry.

Though we have the melodies of only one-tenth of the troubadour poems, it has often been assumed that virtually all of them were set to music. The troubadour wrote both text and melody, which were performed by the joglar (see JONGLEUR). Joglars and troubadours traveled widely: William IX on crusade to Syria, Marcabru and Guiraut Riquier to Spain, Bertran de Born to northern France. Peire Vidal (fl. 1183–1204) ventured as far as Hungary. These travels contributed to the diffusion of the art form into other langs. starting at the end of the 12th c. in Fr. (see TROUVÈRE) and Ger. (see MINNESANG), and continuing in the 13th c. in It. at the court of the Emperor Frederick II (see SICILIAN SCHOOL), and in Galician-Port. (see GALICIA, POETRY OF). The heritage of the troubadours was acknowledged by Dante and Petrarch, who extended their indirect influence throughout the Europe of the Ren. (see PETRARCHISM) and beyond. Poets of the 20th c. who returned to the troubadours include Ezra Pound, Paul Blackburn, and W. D. Snodgrass in Eng., Jacques Roubaud in Fr., and Augusto de Campos in Port.

A trad. of commentary on the troubadours and their songs began in the early 13th c. with Raimon Vidal's prose Razos de trobar (Principles of Composition) and continued with the Donatz proensals (Provençal Grammar) of Uc Faidit. Uc and other writers compiled the razos*, brief prose commentaries on individual songs, and the vidas*, or lives of the troubadours. Around 1290, Matfre Ermengau (fl. 1288–1322) attempted to reconcile the love sung by the troubadours with love of God in his encyclopedic verse Breviari d'amor (Breviary of Love).

During the 14th and 15th cs., Occitan poetry fell into decline. The trad. was maintained at Toulouse by the Consistori de la Sobregaia Companhia del Gay Saber (Consistory of the Merry Band of the Gay Knowledge—see GAI SABER), which awarded prizes for the best compositions in various troubadour genres (see POETIC CONTESTS). The regulations of these contests were codified in a taxonomy of troubadour practice called Las Leys d'amors (ca. 1341), understood as equivalent to a code of poetry. We are still indebted to Las Leys d'amors for definitions of the genres and for prosodic distinctions such as those among coblas unissonans, in which all the stanzas of a song have the same rhyme sounds; coblas singulars, in which the rhyme sounds change with every stanza; coblas doblas, in which given rhyme sounds are maintained for two stanzas; coblas ternas, in which they are maintained for three stanzas; and coblas quaternas, in which they are maintained for four. In coblas capcaudadas, the first line of one stanza uses the rhyme sound of the last line of the preceding stanza, whereas in coblas capfinidas, the first line of one stanza repeats a key word from the last line of the preceding one. In coblas retrogradadas, the rhymes of a stanza repeat those of the preceding one but do so in reverse order. In all these permutations of concrete rhyme sounds, the abstract rhyme scheme remains constant. On the other hand, the authority of the Leys has obscured evolutionary devels. in troubadour practice. We are only beginning to realize the implications of the fact that the earliest troubadours used no generic distinctions among types of song, hence that the devel. of the generic system requires explanation. Another fundamental evolution occurred in the practice of metrical imitation, or contrafacture, which gradually became characteristic of the sirventes but was adopted in the Leys as its timeless defining trait. The elaborate rhyme patterns of the troubadours analyzed by the Leys are only a few of the endless variations of their technique.

The fate of Occitan may be illustrated in the career of Gaston Fébus, the powerful Count of Foix (1331–91). Although he requested that the Lat. encyclopedia by Bartholomaeus Anglicus, De Proprietatibus Rerum (On the Properties of Things), be translated into Occitan, in which it became the Elucidari de las proprietatz de totas res naturals (Elucidarium of the Properties of All Natural Things), Gaston Fébus chose to use Fr. for his own treatise on hunting and Fr. and Lat. for his collection of prayers. In Occitan, he composed only a single love song. The 14th-c. Jeu de Sainte Agnès shows verve in its elaboration of the traditional story and in its use of music, but two cycles of mystery plays from the 15th and 16th cs. are less successful. When, in the edict of Villers-Cotterêts (1539), Francis I decreed that Fr. (and not Lat.) must be the lang. of administration throughout his kingdom, he laid royal claim on the practice of law, against the claim of the Church. Occitan was gradually excluded from usage in law and in other areas.

Historians of Occitan poetry speak of a first Ren. in the 16th c., illustrated by the Gascon Protestant Pey de Garros (ca. 1525–81), the Provençal Bellaud de la Bellaudière (ca. 1543–88), and Pierre Godolin of Toulouse (1580–1649). A second Ren. in the 19th c. was marked by the group of seven poets called the Félibrige*, led by Mistral. Despite continuing factional disputes, Occitan poetry grew broader in appeal during the 20th c. with the work of poets such as Max Rouquette (1908–2005) and Bernat Manciet (1923–2005). A number of figures such as René Nelli (1906–82), Charles Camproux (1908–94), Pierre Bec (b. 1921), and Robert Lafont (1923–2009) are both troubadour scholars and practicing poets. The composer and singer Claudi Martí (b. 1940), who recorded troubadour songs, allied Occitan poetry with the regionalist movement during the 1970s.

OCTAVE (rarely, octet). A stanza of eight lines. Octaves appear as isolable stanzas, such as the It. ottava rima (rhyming abababcc) and the Fr. ballade* (ababbcbc), as well as the single octave in Fr. called the huitain* and the single ballade stanza in Eng. called the *monk's tale stanza after Chaucer's usage. The octave is the stanza of the first rank in *Occitan poetry, a favorite of the troubadours; and although the trouvères of northern France are less exclusive, they still show a preference for the octave: roughly a third of all extant OF lyrics are set in one form or another of octave. In Sp., the octave of octosyllables rhyming abbaacca, less often ababbccb or abbaacac, is called the copla de arte menor; that of 12-syllable lines, the copla de arte mayor. In It., the Sicilian octave in hendecasyllables rhyming abababab first appears in the 13th c. In ON skaldic poetry, the most important stanzas are drottkvætt and hrynhent, octaves of six- and eight-syllable lines, respectively. In Rus. poetry, which favors *quatrains, poets frequently connect two quatrains to form octaves, as in Alexander Pushkin, or vary rhyme schemes; e.g., Fyodor Tiutchev and Marina Tsvetaeva formed their own octaves with uneven rhyme schemes (aabccbba and ababacac, respectively).

Octaves are also important components of larger stanzas: the first eight lines of the *sonnet are called the octave. P. B. Shelley uses octaves for "The Witch of Atlas," as does John Keats for "Isabella." "I have finished the First Canto, a long one, of about 180 octaves," says Lord Byron in a letter apropos of Don Juan. G. M. Hopkins uses the scheme ababcbca for "The Wreck of the Deutschland." Osip Mandelstam composed a famous set of varying octaves in the early 1930s, the "Vos'mistishiia." John Berryman uses heterometrical octaves in abcbddba for "Homage to Mistress Bradstreet" (1953). Louis Zukofsky's 80 Flowers is a sequence of 81 octaves.

OCTONARIUS. The Lat. equivalent of the Gr. acatalectic *tetrameter, iambic, trochaic, or anapestic, used in Roman comedy, and of which the units are feet, not metra (see METRON). The iambic octonarius of Plautus has two forms: the first with a medial *diaeresis, with the seventh position short, and with the eighth allowing brevis in longo (see ANCEPS), having the effect of creating two iambic quaternarii; the second with a *caesura after the ninth position. This meter is rarely used as stichic verse but often in cantica (see CANTICUM AND DIVERBIUM). The trochaic octonarius is only a meter of cantica. Having medial diaeresis, it too might be regarded as a system of trochaic quaternarii, as might the anapestic. ■ Beare, 137–40; Crusius; C. OCTOSYLLABLE. A line of eight syllables, one of the two most popular line forms in the Eur. vernaculars: the chief line form in Sp. poetry, the oldest in Fr., and the second most important in Eng. It derives presumably from the iambic *dimeter line of med. Lat. hymnody, established by Ambrose in the 4th c. and pervasive in the later Middle Ages. In Fr., the octosyllable first appears in the 10th c. in the Vie de Saint Léger (40 sixains in couplets) and is the most popular meter of OF and Anglo-Norman narrative poetry (excluding the chansons de geste, which adopted first the *decasyllable, then the alexandrine) of the 12th through 15th c.—i.e., chronicles, romances (e.g., Wace), saints' lives, lais, *fabliaux, and *dits—and was esp. favored (along with the decasyllable) for the *courtly love lyric (esp. *ballades and rondeaux) and popular lyric genres (chansons de toile, pastourelles*) from the 14th to the mid-16th c. It is also common in med. drama. Finally, it is the staple meter of folk verse, of poetry of the oral trad., as in the late med. ballads. In succeeding centuries, the octosyllable never lost the close connections thus established to hymnody, song, and orality, and (esp. in couplets) to narrative.

After 1500, Pierre de Ronsard and François de Malherbe made it the meter of the *ode, but in post-Ren. Fr. poetry, the octosyllable became associated with *light verse: even as late as the 18th c., Alain René Le Sage, Alexis Piron, and Voltaire used it for popular appeal. Its lability and the swift return of its rhymes have given it a reputation for alertness, impertinence, and zest. In rhythmical structure, the octosyllabe is mercurial and often ambiguous: it has only one fixed accent, on the eighth syllable, either one or two secondary accents, and no *caesura. This ambiguity derives from the fact that it is caught uneasily between the three-accent norm of the decasyllable and the two-accent norm of the hexasyllable, thus frequently inviting both a two-accent and a three-accent reading, e.g., Théodore de Banville: "Quand je baise, pâle de fièvre" (3 + 5 syllables or 3 + 2 + 3). Whereas the alexandrine is the line of sustained discourse, usually enjoying a certain syntactic completeness, the octosyllable parcels syntax into a series of fragmentary tableaux or near-autonomous images that can stand in a variety of potential relationships with each other. These are the qualities that attracted Théophile Gautier (Émaux et camées, 1852) and the symbolist poets to octosyllabic verse.

Spain received octosyllables (normally in varied *rhyme schemes rather than couplets) in the 14th c. (Juan Ruiz, Libro de buen amor) from the Occitan *troubadours by way of Galician-Port. sources; these reinforced a native tendency toward the octosyllable in earlier Sp. poetry. By the 15th c., the Sp. octosílabo was firmly established through collections of courtly lyrics (e.g., the Cancionero de Baena) and since that time has come to be the national meter par excellence in Spain (see SPANISH PROSODY). There is no set rhythmical pattern: the only requirement is that the line contain from seven to nine syllables (endings vary) with stress on the seventh.

In Eng., the octosyllable is, in the Latinate terminology of foot metrics, commonly called iambic *tetrameter; in Ger., it is called the Kurzzeile or Kurzvers. Occasionally, it is trochaic, and when so, often catalectic (see CATALEXIS), the "8s and 7s" giving a special (and powerful) effect, as in the stanzas of W. H. Auden's elegy to W. B. Yeats beginning "Earth receive an honored guest." It forms the staple line of several stanzas, such as the long meter of the ballads (see BALLAD METER) and the *In Memoriam stanza but is more commonly associated with couplets. Lord Byron's reference to "the fatal facility of the octo-syllabic meter" alludes to the danger of singsong monotony, a danger offset, however, by the rapid movement of the line, which makes it an excellent medium for narrative verse. But in the hands of a skilled craftsman, monotony is not difficult to avoid, as evidenced by John Milton's "Il Penseroso" and J. W. Goethe's "Selige Sehnsucht."

In England, the influence of the Fr. octosyllable in the 12th and 13th cs. through Anglo-Norman poets such as Geoffrey Gaimar, Wace, and Benoît de Sainte-Maure led to a refinement in the syllabic regularity of the indigenous ME four-stress line used for narrative verse (Layamon; The Owl and the Nightingale; Sir Orfeo; John Barbour's Bruce). Chaucer translated part of the Roman de la Rose, which is in octosyllabic couplets, from which, according to the received theory, he learned to adapt, mutatis mutandis, the metrical structures of the OF line to the exigencies of the Eng. lang. The octosyllables of The Book of the Duchess and The House of Fame yield to the decasyllables of the Canterbury Tales. Chaucer's successors, esp. John Gower (Confessio amantis), could not equal his flexibility. The octosyllable finds heavy use in the miracle and morality plays but a lessening use in the 16th c. (chiefly songs). After 1600, the tetrameter becomes the vehicle of shorter poems, descriptive or philosophical, by Ben Jonson, Milton ("L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso"), Andrew Marvell ("To His Coy Mistress"), John Gay, Matthew Prior, Jonathan Swift (his favorite meter, e.g., "Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift"), William Collins, and others; the jogging, satiric octosyllables and polysyllabic rhymes of Samuel Butler's Hudibras (1663–78) canonized the name—*hudibrastic verse. In the 19th c., narrative verse both serious and whimsical was again written in the "8s" as Robert Burns, William Wordsworth, and S. T. Coleridge ("Christabel," in couplets), but esp. Lord Byron, Walter Scott, John Keats, and William Morris ("The Earthly Paradise") brought the tetrameter couplet to a height it had not seen since ME.

However, it is dangerous to treat all eight-syllable lines as a class, without due adjustment for the differences in metrical systems of each national poetry. One cannot treat the Sp. octosílabo, the Fr. octosyllabe, the Lat. octonarius, and the Eng. iambic tetrameter, e.g., as necessary equivalents—i.e., as having the same structure or effects. Each resides within a distinctive verse system dependent in part on the lang. in which it operates. As Michel Grimaud has put it, "eight is a different number" in langs. such as Fr. and Eng.

ODE (Gr. aeidein, "to sing," "to chant"). In mod. usage, the term for the most formal, ceremonious, and complexly organized form of *lyric poetry, usually of considerable length. It is frequently the vehicle for public utterance on state occasions, e.g., a ruler's birthday, accession, or funeral, or the dedication of some imposing public monument. The ode as it has evolved in contemp. lits. generally shows a dual inheritance from cl. sources, variously combining the measured, recurrent stanza of the Horatian ode, with its attendant balance of *tone and sentiment (sometimes amounting to a controlled ambiguity, as in Andrew Marvell's "Horatian Ode" on Oliver Cromwell), and the regular or irregular stanzaic triad of Pindar, with its elevated, vertiginously changeable tone (as in William Collins's "Ode on the Poetical Character"), in interesting manifestations as late as Robert Bridges and Paul Claudel. Both forms have frequently been used for poems celebrating public events, but both have just as frequently eschewed such events, sometimes pointedly, in favor of private occasions of crisis or joy. Nonetheless, of all poetic forms, the ode has continued since Pindar to be the mostly likely choice of poets reimbursed as laureates or other spokespersons. The serious tone of the ode calls for the use of a heightened diction and enrichment by poetic device, but this lays it open, more readily than any other lyric form, to burlesque.

In Gr. lit., the odes of Pindar (ca. 522–443 BCE) were designed for choric song and dance (see MELIC POETRY). The words, the sole surviving element of the integral experience, reflect the demands of the other two arts. A *strophe, a complex metrical structure whose length and pattern of heterometrical lines vary from one ode to another, reflects a dance pattern, which is then repeated exactly in an *antistrophe (the dancers repeating the steps but in the opposite direction), the pattern being closed by an *epode, or third section, of differing length and structure. The ode as a whole (surviving examples range from fragments to nearly 300 lines) is built up by exact metrical repetition of the original triadic pattern. These odes, written for performance in a Dionysiac theater or perhaps in the Agora to celebrate athletic victories, frequently appear incoherent in their brilliance of imagery, abrupt shifts in subject matter, and apparent disorder of form within the individual sections. But mod. crit. has answered such objections, which date from the time of Pindar himself, by discerning dominating images, emotional relationships between subjects, and complex metrical organization. The tone of the odes is emotional, exalted, and intense; the subject matter, whatever divine myths can be adduced to the occasion.

Apart from Pindar, another pervasive source of the mod. ode in Gr. lit. is the cult *hymn, which derived from the Homeric Hymns and flourished during the Alexandrian period in the work of Callimachus and others. This sort of poem is notable not for its form but for its structure of argument: an invocation of a deity (later of a personified natural or psychological entity), followed by a narrative genealogy establishing the antiquity and authenticity of the deity, followed by a petition for some special favor, and concluding with a vow of future service. A complete mod. instance of this structure is John Keats's "Ode to Psyche." Yet another source of the mod. ode's structure of prayerful petition is the Psalms and other poems of the Heb. Bible (see HEBREW POETRY, PSALM), which increasingly influenced Eng. poetry by way of John Milton, the crit. of John Dennis, the original and translated hymns of Isaac Watts, and Robert Lowth's De sacra poesi Hebraeorum (Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, 1753; see HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS).

In Lat. lit., the characteristic ode is associated with Horace (65–8 BCE), who derived his forms not from Pindar but from less elaborate Gr. lyrics, through Alcaeus and Sappho. The Horatian ode is tranquil rather than intense, contemplative rather than brilliant, and intended for the reader in private rather than for the spectator in the theater. Horace also wrote commissioned odes, most notably the "Carmen saeculare" for Augustus, all of which more closely approximated the Pindaric form and voice; but his influence on mod. poetry is felt more directly in the trad. of what might be called the sustained *epigram, esp. in the period between Ben Jonson and Matthew Prior. Among the Eng. poets of note, only Mark Akenside habitually wrote odes in the Horatian vein, but in the 17th c. poets as diverse as Robert Herrick, Thomas Randolph, and—most important among them—Marvell with his Cromwell ode wrote urbane Horatians.

The third form of the mod. ode, the *anacreontic, is descended from the 16th-c. discovery of a group of some 60 poems, all credited to Anacreon, although the Gr. originals now appear to span a full thousand years. In general, the lines are short and, in comparison with the Pindaric ode, the forms simple, the subjects being love or drinking, as in the 18th-c. song "To Anacreon in Heaven," whose tune was appropriated for "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Throughout Europe, the hist. of the ode commences with the rediscovery of the classic forms. The humanistic ode of the 15th and earlier 16th c. shows the adaptation of old meters to new subjects by Francesco Filelfo, in both Gr. and Lat., and by Giannantonio Campano, Giovanni Pontano, and Marcantonio Flaminio in Neo-Lat. The example of the humanistic ode and the publication in 1513 of the Aldine edition of Pindar were the strongest influences on the vernacular ode in Italy; tentative Pindaric experiments were made by Giangiorgio Trissino, Luigi Alamanni, and Antonio Minturno but without establishing the ode as a new genre. More successful were the attempts in France by members of the Pléiade*: after minor trials of the new form by others, Pierre de Ronsard in 1550 published The First Four Books of the Odes, stylistic imitations of Horace, Anacreon, and (in the first book) Pindar. Influenced by Ronsard, Bernardo Tasso and Gabriello Chiabrera later in the century succeeded in popularizing the form in Italy, where it has been used successfully by, among others, Alessandro Manzoni, Giacomo Leopardi (in his Di canzone, 1824), Giosuè Carducci (Odi barbare, 1877), and Gabriele D'Annunzio (Odi navale, 1892). In France, the example of Ronsard was widely followed, notably by Nicolas Boileau in the 17th c. and by Voltaire and others in formal *occasional verse in the 18th. The romantic period lent a more personal note to both form and subject matter, notably in the work of Alphonse de Lamartine, Alfred de Musset, and Victor Hugo. Later, highly personal treatments of the genre may be found in Paul Verlaine's Odes en son honneur (1893) and Paul Valéry's Odes (1920). Claudel's Cinq grandes odes (1907), finally, shows a tendency in many odes of the 20th c. to explore traditional forms of experience, in this case Catholic devotion. In Sp., odes have figured in the work of Pablo Neruda (1904–73), who wrote three volumes of them: Odas elementales (1954), Nuevas odas elementales (1956), and Tercer libro de las odas (1957).

The ode became characteristically Ger. only with the work of G. R. Weckherlin (Oden und Gesänge, 1618–19), who, as court poet at Stuttgart, attempted to purify and refashion Ger. letters according to foreign models. In the mid-18th c., F. G. Klopstock modified the cl. models by use of free rhythms, grand abstract subjects, and a heavy influence from the Lutheran psalms. Later, J. W. Goethe and Friedrich Schiller returned to cl. models and feeling, as in Schiller's "Ode to Joy," used in the final movement of Ludwig van Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. At the turn of the 19th c., Friedrich Hölderlin in his complex, mystical, unrhymed odes united cl. themes with the characteristic resources of the Ger. lang. Since Hölderlin, few noteworthy odes have been written in Ger., with the possible exception of those of Rudolph Alexander Schröder (Deutsche Oden, 1912).

The few attempts at domesticating the ode in 16th-c. England were largely unsuccessful, although there is probably some influence of the cl. ode on Edmund Spenser's Fowre Hymnes, Prothalamion, and Epithalamion. In 1629 appeared the first great imitation of Pindar in Eng., Jonson's "Ode on the Death of Sir Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison," with the strophe, antistrophe, and epode of the cl. model indicated by the Eng. terms "turn," "counter-turn," and "stand." In the same year, Milton began the composition of his great ode, "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity," in regular stanzaic form. The genre, however, attained great popularity in Eng. only with the publication of Abraham Cowley's Pindarique Odes in 1656, in which he attempted, like Ronsard and Weckherlin before him, to make available to his own lang. the spirit and tone of Pindar rather than to furnish an exact transcription of his manner. Cowley was uncertain whether Pindar's odes were regular, and the matter was not settled until 1706, when the playwright William Congreve published with an ode of his own a "Discourse" showing that they were indeed regular. With the appearance in 1749 of a scholarly trans. of Pindar by Gilbert West, the fashion for Cowleyan Pindarics died away. With John Dryden begin the great formal odes of the 18th c.: first the "Ode to the Memory of Mrs. Anne Killigrew" and then, marking the reunion of formal verse and music, the "Song for St. Cecilia's Day" and "Alexander's Feast." St. Cecilia's Day odes by many authors had long been written, but the trad. ended with "Alexander's Feast." For the 18th c., the ode was the perfect means of expressing the *sublime. Using *personification and other devices of *allegory, Thomas Gray and William Collins in the mid-18th c. marshal emotions ranging from anxiety to terror in the service of their central theme, the "progress of poetry," making the ode a crisis poem that reflects the rivalry of mod. lyric with the great poets and genres of the past. The romantic ode in Eng. lit. is a poem written on the occasion of a vocational or existential crisis in order to reassert the power and range of the poet's voice. It is the romantic ode that best suits the remark of Susan Stewart that "[o]des give birth to poets." The Eng. romantic ode begins with S. T. Coleridge's "Dejection: An Ode" (1802) and William Wordsworth's pseudo-Pindaric "Ode: Intimations of Immortality" (1804, pub. 1807). Wordsworth's "Intimations" ode, with its varied line lengths, complex rhyme scheme, and stanzas of varying length and pattern, has been called the greatest Eng. Pindaric ode. Of the other major romantic poets, P. B. Shelley wrote the "Ode to the West Wind" and Keats the "Ode on a Grecian Urn,"

"Ode to a Nightingale," and "To Autumn," arguably the finest odes in the lang. These odes were written in regular stanzas derived not from Horace but from Keats's own experiments with the *sonnet form. Since the romantic period, with the exception of a few brilliant but isolated examples such as Alfred, Lord Tennyson's "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington" and G. M. Hopkins's "The Wreck of the Deutschland," the ode has been neither a popular nor a really successful genre in Eng. Among mod. poets, the personal ode in the Horatian manner has been revived with some success, notably by Allen Tate ("Ode to the Confederate Dead") and W. H. Auden ("In Memory of W. B. Yeats," "In Praise of Limestone").

ODL (Welsh, "rhyme"). Both end rhyme and *internal rhyme are features of Welsh poetry from its origins in the 6th c. to the present day, with internal rhyme reaching its highest levels of complexity in the cynghanedd that has been a required component of Welsh "strict-meter" poetry since the 14th c. Rhyme in Welsh is purely syllabic, and Welsh poetry recognizes rhymes between two unstressed syllables (as in Eng. sínging : dáncing) and between stressed and unstressed syllables (as in Eng. kíng : dáncing), the latter pattern being an obligatory feature of some verse forms (englyn* and cywydd*). This type of syllabic rhyme arose because, unlike Eng., Welsh does not have a strong stress accent, and vowel quality remains distinct even in unstressed syllables. Furthermore, the rhyming of final syllables was likely established before the shift of accent from final to penultimate syllables, which had the effect (once the shift was completed) of making rhyme independent of stress accent.

In addition to true rhymes, Welsh poetry also recognizes two kinds of partial rhyme. In *generic rhyme, known to Welsh poets as odl Wyddelig (Ir. rhyme) because of its widespread use in Ir. poetry, the vowels are identical, while the consonants following them need only belong to the same phonetic group (as in Eng. cat : nap, where both words end with voiceless stops). In proest, the consonants following the vowel correspond exactly, but the vowels or diphthongs preceding them need only be of the same class: short vowels (cat : pot); long vowels (eel : fool); diphthongs ending in w (south : growth); or diphthongs ending in i, e, or y (day : boy or main : coin). Wilfred Owen made much use of proest in Eng., which he called "pararhyme."

OMAR KHAYYÁM QUATRAIN or Rubaiyat stanza (from Persian, originally Ar. rubāʿiyyāt [pl.], "quatrains"). In Eng. poetry, a quatrain of decasyllabic lines rhyming aaba (rarely aaaa). The term is taken from Edward FitzGerald's famous collection Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám (1859), which is a free adaptation of a selection of poems by the Persian poet ʿUmar Khayyām (d. 1122), whose major reputation within the cl. Ar. trad. is as an algebraist. There is considerable doubt as to the attribution of a large part of Khayyām's poetry, but about 50 poems are clearly authentic, while a large number of others are also thought to be so. The wide popularity of FitzGerald's versions must be seen in the context of an extraordinary vogue in the 19th c. for Oriental *exoticism. While many of the subtleties of imagery and lang. in the original Persian escaped FitzGerald, his renderings clearly presented a new and different poetic voice. Whereas Ar. and Persian poetry in qaṣīda form uses *monorhyme, the rubāʿiyyāt break the rhyme in the third line of each stanza, and FitzGerald follows this rhyme scheme in his versions: "I sometimes think that never blows so red / The rose as where some buried Caesar bled; / That every hyacinth the Garden wears / Dropt in its Lap from some once lovely Head." *Enjambment is common in the initial *couplet. A. C. Swinburne's imitation in "Laus Veneris" links third lines in pairs.

ONEGIN STANZA. The vehicle the Rus. poet Alexander Pushkin created for his masterpiece Evgenij Onegin (1825–32). A variation on the *sonnet, the Onegin stanza has the rhyme scheme AbAb CCdd EffE gg (uppercase letters represent feminine rhymes, lowercase masculine), where all three quatrain structures are different—alternating, adjacent, and embracing. According to B. V. Tomaševskij, the first quatrain presents the main idea, the next two develop it, and the witty *couplet rounds it out. The Onegin stanza is admirably suited for the varying tone of the ironic and playful author-narrator, who frequently indulges in urbane chatter, lyrical digressions, and professional comments. Later imitations of the Onegin stanza by poets such as Mikhail Lermontov ("Tambovskaia kaznacheisha," 1837–38), Dmitrii Minaev ("Evgenii Onegin nashego vremeni," 1865–77), Viacheslav Ivanov ("Mladenchestvo," 1913–18), and Valerii Pereleshin, ("Poema bez predmeta," c. 1972–76) are interesting but lack the brilliance of the master.

ONOMATOPOEIA (Ger. Klangmalerei, Lautsymbolik). The traditional term for words that seem to imitate their referents. In the strict sense, onomatopoeia refers to words that imitate sounds (e.g., dingdong, roar, swish, murmur, susurrus), but other qualities such as size, motion, and even color may be suggested; the term is often used to denote any word whose sound is felt to have a "natural" or direct relation with its sense. Since their phonetic shapes seem motivated rather than arbitrary, onomatopoeic words exert significant limitations on Ferdinand de Saussure's doctrine of the arbitrariness of the sign. Both Otto Jespersen and Edward Sapir showed evidence that Saussure greatly overstated his case.

Onomatopoeia is one of four verbal effects often called "expressive" or "mimetic" but known in ling. as "phonetic symbolism" or "sound symbolism." None of these descriptors is wholly satisfactory, and, in fact, onomatopoeic words are, per the terminology of Charles S. Peirce, icons rather than symbols; they are not symbolic in the way ordinary words are, for their semiotic approach to representation is a highly motivated attempt at direct identity, rather than an arbitrary or relatively motivated form of indirect analogy. Beyond (1) onomatopoeia itself (words that imitate sounds in nature), three other interrelated iconic verbal effects include (2) articulatory gestures or kinesthesia (predicated on movements of the vocal or facial muscles; see SOUND); (3) *synaesthesia, *phonesthemes, and other associative phenomena (wherein heard sounds trigger other sensory impressions); and (4) morphosymbolism and iconic syntax (see below).

It has long been fashionable among literary critics to disparage onomatopoeia as a crude and over-obvious poetic device, but there is considerable ling. evidence for *iconicity as an important process in lang.; indeed, certain iconic effects operate across a wide spectrum of langs. and so may be linguistic universals. Jespersen's astonishingly long list of words having the unrounded high front vowel /i/, with all connoting "small, slight, insignificant, or weak," is famous; in Eng., this *phoneme is used almost universally as a suffix for small, familiar, or comforting things (e.g., mommy, daddy, baby, doggie, kitty). Woodworth's analysis of *deixis in 26 langs. revealed a "systematic relationship between vowel quality and distance," namely, that a word having proximal meaning has a vowel of higher pitch than one having distal meaning.

Furthermore, iconic effects in lang. are not merely phonological but morphological and syntactic. Onomatopoeia is, therefore, simply the most conspicuous instance of a broad range of natural linguistic effects, not a merely "poetic" device. In ordinary speech, sound is motivated by sense: once sense is selected, sound follows. But in iconic speech, sense is motivated by sound: words are chosen for their sound, which itself determines meaning. In the case of onomatopoeia, the sound of the word may imitate a natural phenomenon in the world, but the sound of the word is not often precisely the sound of the thing. As Seymour Chatman shows, the connection is not exact, and most onomatopoeic words are only approximations of the natural sounds. Even words for animal sounds are highly conventionalized in every lang.: the Eng. speaker styles the dog's bark as bow wow or arf arf or woof, whereas the Mandarin Chinese speaker has it as wang wang. Meanwhile, in Eng., the pig's grunt is styled oink, oink, whereas the Brazilian Portuguese speaker has it as croinh croinh.

All of this suggests that sound-symbolic effects do not operate without words to trigger them: words that are primary in establishing the semantic field. Sounds can never precede meaning: they can only operate on meanings already lexically created. Nevertheless, ono-matopoeia generally aims to approximate the physical properties of its sounds to the physical properties of its real objects. From the wider perspective of sound symbolism or iconicity, onomatopoeia is part of a much larger set of associative relations between word-sounds and meanings. Associative processes operate extensively among words themselves, particularly in morphology, though also in syntax. The sound shape of a word is almost never created from nothing: it is usually formed in relation to some existing word. After it comes into existence, it is continuously subject to diachronic and synchronic influence from other words in the lang. system. Any entity, no matter how arbitrary upon its entry into the system, is thereafter subject to continuous accommodation to and influence by other entities in the system.

It should be noted that many writers use the term onomatopoeia for something that amounts to what Dwight Bolinger has termed "reverse onomatopoeia": here "not only is the word assimilated to the sound, but the sound is also assimilated to the 'wordness' of the word." Bolinger identifies a series of morphosemantic processes based mainly on association whereby the form influences the meaning or the meaning influences the form of words. In this way, constellations of words form over time, all having similar meanings and similar sounds: one example is the series of Eng. words beginning with gl- which have to do with light; another is the set of words ending in -ash. Consequently, as Bolinger explains, "when we speak of sound-suggestiveness, we speak of the entire lang., not just of a few imitative or self-sufficient forms."

The subject of iconicity in lang. has always been a significant issue for linguists and stood as a topic of lively interest to the ancients. It is central to Plato's Cratylus, and also appears in Aristotle (Rhet. 3.9), Demetrius (On Style), Dionysius of Halicarnassus (On Literary Composition), and Quintilian (Institutio oratoria 9.3, 9.4). Saussure impressed indelibly upon the mind of the 20th c. the idea that the relation between word and thing is arbitrary. But of course, desire cuts so much deeper than fact. Poets continually desire to make lang. appropriate, so that words partake of the nature of things. And the agency is the fact that words are things, have physical bodies with extension in space and duration in time. For fuller discussion of the several types of expressive sound in poetry, see CACOPHONY, DISSONANCE, EUPHONY, MIMESIS, REPRESENTATION, TIMBRE.

OPEN FORM. An "open" term encompassing a variety of overlapping poetic programs. While *free verse tends to be the technical norm, open form is justified as part of a general imperative to respond to the particulars and emergencies of the historical moment, politics, psychology, physiology, and so on. If 19th-c. ideas of organic form are in the background of the concept of open form, the figure of Ezra Pound looms in the foreground. The term gained currency as part of a politically charged reaction against New Critical formalism (see NEW CRITICISM). In the essay "Projective Verse" (1950), Charles Olson made his bold statement, courtesy of "one Robert Creeley," that "FORM IS NEVER MORE THAN AN EXTENSION OF CONTENT." Olson's open or *projective verse, which he also calls *composition by field, rejects the "inherited line, stanza, over-all form"—the "old" bases of "closed verse" or "verse that print bred"—and turns, instead, to the "laws and possibilities of breath," the "speech-force of language," and the "kinetics" of the poem as a "high-energy construct."

The organicist basis of Olson's open verse—which actually relies on *typography—points to a "stance toward reality" that is "larger than" or goes "beyond" technical matters. Allen's influential 1960 anthol. The New American Poetry 1945–1960—expanded and retitled The Postmoderns in 1982—promoted an aesthetic of *presence, *spontaneity, and openness to experience and considered open-form poets to be "the most truly authentic, indigenous American writers." The Poetics of the New American Poetry, a collection of essays by open-form poets, traced these values back to Walt Whitman. Berg and Mezey, opting for "open form" over "free verse" and "organic" form, in their 1969 anthol. Naked Poetry confirmed the thematic bias of the term as distinct from the strictly technical designation of free verse. In the editors' words about their selection of poets, "formal qualities" came "to seem more and more irrelevant, and we find we are much more interested in what they say, in their dreams, visions, and prophecies. Their poems take shape from the shapes of their emotions, the shapes their minds make in thought, and certainly don't need interpreters."

In general, open form appeals to a higher authority than that of poetic trads., incl. trads. of free verse, in order to render "openness" somehow necessary and thus meet one criterion of verse. Open both describes improvisational forms and appropriates the formal revolution of free verse for nonformal purposes, authorizing such forms by invoking larger "freedoms." Ramifying by analogy, open form promotes other kinds of openness considered morally desirable: openness to natural rhythms and processes, "dreams, visions, and prophecies," nonconformist social values, and reformist or revolutionary politics. The sociopolitical valence of the term enables open forms that would "naturalize" poetic lang. to turn around and also naturalize certain social and political arrangements and values.

Moreover, open form also takes "a new stance toward the reality of a poem itself" (Olson), and the practice of writing now becomes part of the content of a verse that registers the processes of the composition of its sonic form, its evolving thought, and the shaping of its page by the typewriter. *Language poetry develops some of these principles. The term calls for a readjustment of the form/content hierarchy and is best understood in the politicized contexts of literary, critical, and philosophical develops.: *historicism as opposed to *formalism, self-referential practices that address their own procedures, and a politicization of poetic form.

ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY. Also known as the Parry-Lord theory of oral composition, oral-formulaic theory is an approach to oral and oral-derived texts that seeks to explain the performance and transmission of folkloristic and literary material through a series of structural units: formula*, theme, and story pattern. The formula is a substitutable phrase that provides the performer with a malleable, ready-made idiom that simplifies the task of oral composition in performance; the theme and story pattern amount to formulas at the higher levels of the typical scene and tale type, respectively. All three of these units are characterized as single "words"—integral bytes of structure and meaning—by South Slavic oral epic singers (guslari; see GUSLAR) and their counterparts in other oral trads. (Foley 2002). The theory evolved from its original derivation in ancient Gr. and South Slavic epic to more than 150 lang. trads. It flourished during the period 1950–90 and, after that point, began to dovetail with other approaches such as performance theory, *ethnopoetics, and traditional referentiality.

Anticipators of oral-formulaic theory were many, starting from the Jewish priest Josephus in the 1st c. CE through the amateur classicists François Hédelin and Robert Wood in the 18th c., but the true antecedents were the Ger. philologists and Rus. and other Slavic ethnographers, chiefly of the 19th c. Of the former, the most significant are Friedrich Wolf (1795), who offered archaeological proof that writing was not available to Homer, and the linguists Johann-Ernst Ellendt (1861), Heinrich Düntzer (1872), and others, all of whom studied the relationship of Homeric phraseology to its meter. As for the ethnographers, Wilhelm Radlov's report (1885) of fieldwork among the central Asian Kara-Kirghiz, which treated the questions of improvisation versus memorization, the units of composition, the role of the audience, and the multiformity of tales, had special interest for Milman Parry. Also extremely influential were Matija Murko's accounts (1929 and the posthumous masterwork of 1951) of his experiences among the South Slavic epic singers. It was to this "living laboratory" in the former Yugoslavia that Parry and Albert Lord were eventually to travel in order to confirm the discoveries made through analysis of the Homeric texts.

As early as his 1923 master's thesis, one can glimpse Parry's vision of a long-standing trad. of ancient Gr. singers that led eventually to Homer. His explanation, which superseded the contemp. debate in cl. philology between Unitarians and Analysts over the authorship of the Gr. epics (one or many Homers), was a radical proposal: in his 1928 thesis, Parry showed that the lang. and style of Homer were neither an original creation nor the composite work of redactors, but rather the bequest of traditional poets who, over generations, had assembled an adaptable *diction and a flexible narrative repertoire. Thus, Parry conceived of the formula as "a group of words which is regularly employed under the same metrical conditions to express a given essential idea"; the "formulaic system" consisted of a set of formulas that shared a common pattern of phraseology. A singer's formulas and systems together comprised something akin to a set of phraseological equations, some of them constant and others with variables, that could be called upon to solve whatever compositional problem arose. According to this theory, there simply was no narrative situation that could not be handled by recourse to this plastic, generative diction. Parry also showed that the noun-epithet phrases (e.g., "swift-footed Achilles" or "wily Odysseus"), a species of formula, exhibit a kind of thrift, in that each hero or god is customarily assigned only one such phrase for a given part of the *hexameter verse and that Homer tended to avoid *enjambment, his thought being either complete in a single hexameter line or optionally (rather than necessarily) continued to the next line. These and other findings led Parry to posit a formulaic diction in which individual aesthetic choice is subservient to metrical expediency and in which the kind of creative artistic effect so cherished by mod. crit. was considered much less likely than traditional values epitomized through traditional structures.

From the hypothesis of trad., Parry moved, at the suggestion of Murko and Parry's mentor Antoine Meillet, to the further and complementary hypothesis of orality. In his studies of 1930 and 1932, Parry argued that Homer's formulaic diction must also have been oral, since nothing less than the ongoing pressure of composition in performance could have stimulated the production and maintenance of this special verse idiom. Parry's field trips to the former Yugoslavia in 1933–35, with Lord, were intended to provide a comparison between the ms. texts of Homer and the living oral trad. of the South Slavs. With the discovery of formulaic diction in the Yugoslav songs, as recorded in Parry's partially published field notes, "Ćor Huso," the oral-formulaic theory as a comparative approach was born.

With Parry's premature death in 1935, the completion and extension of his work were undertaken by Lord, who made trips to the former Yugoslavia and Albania in 1950–51 and, with David E. Bynum, in the 1960s. First in importance among Lord's works, and in the field at large, stands The Singer of Tales, in which he brings the Yugoslav analogy to bear on ancient Gr., OE, OF, and Byzantine Gr. narrative. This volume also saw the elaboration of the concepts of theme (e.g., arming the hero, feasting, boasting) and story pattern (e.g., the Return Song, the Wedding Song), which together with formula offered an explanation of oral-traditional multiformity at all levels of epic verse. Crucial to the extension of oral-formulaic theory to other trads. was Lord's concept of "formulaic density," through which, following Parry's famous analyses of passages from the Iliad and the Odyssey, he claimed that one could determine whether a text was orally composed by calculating its percentage of formulas and systems. Also important has been the publication of the South Slavic songs (Parry et al., 1953–) gathered during fieldwork, particularly the 13,000-line The Wedding of Smailagić Meho by Avdo Medjedović (see also Foley 2004). His later comparative research treated Rus., Latvian, Finnish, Ukrainian, Bulgarian, and other oral trads. As the two "Perspectives" articles (1974, 1986) illustrate, Lord brought the oral-formulaic theory from a revolutionary but narrowly applied method to a discipline of broad comparative importance.

This hist. and rapid expansion during the period 1950–90 are chronicled in Foley (1988) and bibliographically surveyed in Foley (1985, with updates). Among the most significant issues and points of disagreement were (1) the question of how far the comparative method can be extended and how binding are proofs by analogy (e.g., Kirk, Watts); (2) the problem of the seemingly mechanistic nature of oral-formulaic theory and its impact on aesthetic crit. of the works involved (e.g., Vivante); (3) the legitimacy of the "formulaic density" criterion (e.g., Benson); (4) the phenomenon of "transitional texts" that reveal signs of both oral and written provenance (Lord 1974); and (5) the respective roles of fieldwork and textual analysis in the study of oral trads. (e.g., Finnegan). A number of related and parallel areas took on considerably greater prominence, among them philosophical and historical treatments of oral trad. (e.g., Havelock; Ong 1967, 1982). In order to provide a central forum for the interdisciplinary debate surrounding the area, the jour. Oral Tradition (1986–) and the Lord monograph series (1987–) were established.

Over the last 20 years, oral-formulaic theory has combined with other approaches as scholars seek to understand better the aesthetics of oral and oral-derived poetry (Foley 1995). Attention has been focused not only on the structural rules for generation of traditional units (Foley 1990) but on the connotative meaning of these units and patterns. The principle of traditional referentiality (Foley 1991, 2002), whereby formulaic phrases, scenes, and story patterns idiomatically engage the larger implied trad., has directed attention beyond mechanics and structure toward the fundamental issue of poetic artistry. Digital and Internet media have also been harnessed to represent more faithfully the dynamic, patterned, performative nature of oral poetry (Foley 2004, 2010–).

ORAL POETRY. Oral poetry encompasses two general types of verse: oral traditional poetry and oral textual poetry. Oral traditional poetry includes songs that are, for the most part, both orally composed and orally performed. They are primarily ritual, lyric, and narrative poems. By contrast, oral textual poetry is often written down but presented orally in *performance. It includes popular songs as well as more contemp. genres such as spoken-word poetry. Oral performance is a fundamental, defining characteristic of both oral traditional and oral textual poetry.

Oral poetry functions in many different ritual and social contexts and assumes a wide variety of forms. The meaning of oral poetry is complicated by the fact that oral poetry is rarely, if ever, entirely oral because of the inevitable intersections between oral and written culture. Questions regarding the parameters and nature of oral poetry have engendered much scholarly debate. The dynamics of oral composition and performance are addressed by the major theoretical approaches in the field (*oral-formulaic theory, performance studies, and *ethnopoetics).

In preliterate societies, all poetry is unambiguously oral traditional—composed and transmitted in performance by people who do not read or write. In literate or partially literate societies, however, the situation is far more complicated since orality and literacy naturally interact, resulting in overlapping forms of oral and written poetry. It follows that rigid categories of oral and literary verse and the insistence on an explicit divide between them are untenable.

Ritual, lyric, and narrative song are the principal categories of oral traditional poetry. Ritual verse is rooted in an ancient past; indeed, all poetry begins with oral poetry, the origins of which are found in the rhythms, sound patterns, and repetitive structures that reinforce and empower the words and actions of ritual. Ritual poems are short, nonnarrative songs that include *lullabies, ritual wedding songs, *laments, praise poems (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY), songs for special festivals and ceremonies, and *incantations. Most ritual poetry is performed at either life- or calendrical-cycle celebrations.

Life-cycle ritual poetry marks primarily birth, marriage, and death. Associated with birth, lullabies are short songs with repetitive verses and sounds (often nonsense syllables) and are sung to lull babies to sleep. Wedding songs are among the richest ritual genres and commemorate the most celebrated life-cycle passage in traditional society, marriage. Many wedding songs articulate the bride's emotional and often painful separation from her childhood and incorporation into adult status as a wife, esp. in patrilocal societies; some are termed wedding laments. Death lament—poetry that is often chanted or declaimed—is the genre of death rites, frequently performed by women. It typically includes direct discourse to the deceased by the mourner(s) as well as imagined dialogues between them.

While death laments performed by mourners eulogize the deceased, praise poems or *panegyric odes composed by praise singers declaim and glorify the living, typically elite members of society. At one time attested throughout the world, this genre now figures most conspicuously in Africa and Oceania.

Songs for calendrical festivals and ceremonies are performed at key times in the year, both secular and religious. In agricultural societies, these oral poetic forms are frequently associated with the solstices. Songs at these junctures are often stanzaic and sung in groups, e.g., *carols, performed at Christmas and New Year's. Seasonal songs sometimes express religious messages. More often they convey wishes for fertility, good health, and fortune and express the eternal hope of new beginnings (the new year, springtime); they also accompany rituals of divination.

Incantations are verbal charms that are sung as part of magic rituals. Most common are healing charms, curses, spells, and exorcisms. Sound patterns (*alliteration, *assonance, and repetition of certain syllables, words, and word combinations) are conspicuous in incantations since it is often believed that the "exact" repetition of specific sounds and words is necessary to effect the desired magic.

Oral lyric poems are short, informal, nonnarrative songs and are universal. They are melodic and often stanzaic. *Lyric poetry covers a great variety of topics, the most common being love and longing; many are also about suffering. Dancing and drinking songs, as well as work, war, or political songs, among many others, also figure in lyric poetry. These forms are usually ephemeral. Words and ideas are perpetually repeated and paraphrased in oral lyric since songs typically dwell on single ideas and the emotional responses that they engender.

The two principal genres of oral traditional narrative poetry* are *epic and *ballad. Oral epic poems are songs of considerable length and complexity that recount deeds of significance—both heroic and mythic—to the community or nation. The epic tells a story from beginning to end, often with a fullness of detail. As a result, epic performances sometimes last for many hours, even days. Epic poetry is usually stichic (see STICHOS); the same metric line—with some variation—is repeated in a linear fashion. The melodies of epic poetry are typically repetitive; verses, however, are sometimes chanted instead of sung. Sometimes epic is a combination of poetry and prose, e.g., the Congolese Mwindo epic, West African Sunjata, and Turkic Book of Dede Korkut. While some epics such as the Iliad or the Chanson de Roland have tragic overtones, oral epic is by and large optimistic. The hero generally triumphs gloriously over the enemy (as in Rus., Armenian, South Slavic, or Af. trads.). Oral epic has circulated since antiquity. The genre in the pre-20th-c. world is known to posterity because the poetry was written down, presumably when it was still being performed. Orally composed and performed but surviving only in textual form are epics such as the Epic of Gilgamesh, the Mahābhārata, the Rāmāyaṇa, the Odyssey, the Iliad, the Persian Shâhnâma, Beowulf, OF chansons de geste*, the Kalevala, and numerous others. Termed "oral-derived" poetry, many of these epics were perpetuated both orally and in textual transcriptions, exemplifying how oral and literary forms mingle and overlap over time. Some epics have continued to be performed up to the present day or at least until the late 20th c. (the Kyrgyz Manas; South Asian, Ar., and Romanian epics).

Ballads are relatively short, narrative, nonheroic poems that focus on single episodes—usually sensational domestic dramas. Although there are comic ballads, the genre as a whole has an elegiac tone. The tempo of narration is more leisurely than in epic; some ballads consist entirely of dialogue. Ballads are generally stanzaic and their musical forms lyric. Eng. and west Eur. ballads as a genre date from at least the 13th c. and flourished until relatively recently. Anglo-Am. ballads are among the best known (e.g., "Lord Lovel," "Barbara Allen," "Fair Margaret and Sweet William"). Many ballads are also oral-derived.

Oral textual poetry refers to oral poems that are composed in writing but performed orally. Many are popular songs that first circulate as written texts and subsequently enter oral trad. Typical of this category are Eng. *broadside or street ballads, which were sold in printed form to the public and then spread orally. *Blues, contemp. popular, and "folk" songs fit here as well. Some songs travel back and forth between printed and oral forms, illustrating again the complex interplay between oral and written poetry.

Oral textual poetry also refers to a widespread contemp. urban genre termed spoken-word poetry. Spoken-word poems are original compositions written by poets who perform them orally at *poetry slams. The poems are typically nonmetrical and are accompanied by gestures and dramatic vocal and facial expressions. They convey personal and social concerns such as poverty, injustice, racism, and sexism; the genre is heavy with pain and biting social commentary. Although *poetic contests have been staged since antiquity, poetry slams date from the mid-1980s in the United States. They have since spread throughout the world.

Performers of oral poetry learn their repertoires from other performers or printed texts. "Learning" poetry can be a process of explicit (intentional) or implicit (internalized or passive) imitation. The former is typical of longer and more complex genres (such as epic), while the latter usually occurs in genres that are shorter and more frequently performed (ritual, lyric, and popular songs).

The most distinctive characteristic of oral poetry is its variability and fluidity of form, in words and, when singing is involved, music. Multiple performances of the "same song" are invariably different, even in oral textual poetry. There is more variation in different performances of lengthier poems and conversely sometimes verbatim reiteration in shorter poetic forms. Perhaps the most significant mechanism of orality is repetition—from sounds and words to verses, passages, and, in epic and ballad, narrative patterns. The use of *parallelism in sound, syntax, and rhythm aids oral poets in moving from one verse to another. Thus, lines and clusters of lines are formed and held together by sound, structure, and association of meaning. Oral poetry is characteristically paratactic: verses are "added" to what precedes them. Other rhetorical devices of repetition include *anaphora, epistrophe, *anadiplosis, and *ring composition. Figures of speech such as *similes and *metaphors are also part of the compositional stylistics of oral poetry. On the level of content, multiform refers to the existence of narrative ideas in multiple forms and is key to understanding the structure of oral poetry.

Several major approaches guided the research on oral poetry in the 20th c. In the 1930s, both Parry and Lord explored compositional style in oral epic in the former Yugoslavia in order to shed light on the art of oral epic verse-making in Homer. Formally presented in the 1960 publication of Lord's Singer of Tales, their findings became known as the oral-formulaic theory. Lord argued that, in preliterate cultures, oral-epic poets learn a special technique of composition by "formula" and "theme." The formula is "a group of words which is regularly employed under the same metrical conditions to express a given essential idea." The most commonly sung phrases, lines, or *couplets—those that a singer hears most frequently when learning—establish the patterns for the poetry, its syntactic, rhythmic, metric, and acoustic molds and configurations. In time, the poet can form new phrases or create formulas by analogy and become proficient in thinking in these traditional patterns, the special lang. of oral epic. A theme is a repeated passage that functions in much the same way; it has a more or less stable core of lines or parts of lines, surrounded by various elements adapting it to its context. The oral-formulaic theory has been employed in countless investigations of composition in oral poetry and has dominated the field and profoundly influenced the study and understanding of oral epic for over 50 years.

The most significant devel. in the field of oral poetry since the oral-formulaic theory is performance studies, an appreciation and detailed investigation of oral verbal art in the context of performance. In response, in part, to what was viewed by some as an overly narrow understanding of oral poetry by Lord, Finnegan and others in the 1970s and 1980s began to advocate a broader understanding of the "oral" in oral poetry, an increased appreciation of the significant intersection between oral and literary poetry, and a greater recognition of the critical role of performance. Key in developing the theoretical framework for performance studies, Bauman (1977, 1986) argued that performance is critical to an understanding of oral poetry (and folklore in general). He and others suggested that oral trads. be viewed as communicative events that involve both verbal artist(s) and audience as participants. Moreover, they proposed that performance stylistics be recognized as verbal and nonverbal alike.

Related to performance studies, ethnopoetics was first formulated in the 1980s and 1990s by Hymes and by Tedlock, who recommended that transcriptions of oral verbal art reflect the dynamics of performance through detailed prompts in the text. In this way, readers can "reperform" oral texts as they experience them. Foley (1991) also brought depth to comparative textual readings of oral poetry (esp. epic) by seeking to appreciate the idiomatic lang. of oral verse and its traditional register.

Other recent devels. in the study of oral poetry include an increasing globalization of the field as primary source materials expand and research encompasses broader areas of inquiry. The Internet, information-filled Web sites, and other media technologies are also progressively employed to provide ever more detailed "performances" and thus fuller and more nuanced understandings of the mechanics and meanings of oral poetry.

ORGANICISM. Organicism is neither strictly a theory of poetry nor a comprehensive methodology but a set of concerns derived from the analogy between a work of art and a living thing. The term often serves as a placeholder for thinking about the conditions of poetic *unity and the nature of *form, as well as about the inextricability of form from meaning. Although the hist. of organic *metaphors in general can be traced back to Plato (who first articulated the problem of unity in terms of the relation of the parts to the whole) and Aristotle (who consolidated the idea of the interdependence of form and matter in the concept of substantial form), the conceptual thrust in the organicist story was provided by 18th-c. Ger. philosophers and poets (J. W. Goethe, Immanuel Kant, A. W. Schlegel, and Friedrich Schiller). Kant's characterization of works of art, as seemingly endowed with the kind of purposiveness we assign to natural things, revolutionized thinking about aesthetic objects. In the metaphysics of the Ger. romantics, poems not only behave like natural things (i.e., develop into their complete form according to an inner principle of growth, display a strict interdependence of parts and whole, with the whole having an a priori existence to the parts) but are nature's ultimate product, the apotheosis of its vital and organizing powers realized through the artist's creativity. S. T. Coleridge imported many of these ideas to England, the most prominent being A. W. Schlegel's opposition between organic form (innate and self-evolved) and mechanical form (imposed from the outside). However, it remains a question how useful biological analogies derived from a metaphysical system are for modern poetics. The early organicists did not, in fact, offer any but figurative clues to the kind of structure an "organic" poem might actually have.

It remained for 20th-c. critical movements (mainly *Russian formalism, *New Criticism, and the *Chicago school) to give new life to these notions. As the most prominent proponents of organicism, the New Critics derived their concepts of tension and internal coherence from Coleridge's "unity in multeity." The poem thus became for them a special kind of thing: an intricate, highly organized autonomous structure that requires intense, close analysis of the dynamic relations between its parts. As a result of a close study of lang., most formalists asserted the absolute and organic interdependence of form and content.

With its roots in a monistic philosophy, organicism always had a moral inflection and was thus suspect to some critics. Values such as coherence, completeness, and *autonomy were not only appraisals of poetic merit (the more highly integrated a poem, the better and the closer to the ideal of beauty) but judgments against forms of *realism that were "merely" mimetic and thus inadequately universal. Consequently, organicism was not well received by postmodern critics. Deconstruction undid organicist notions of coherence by pointing to the endless possibilities for discontinuity and difference (see poststructuralism); *New Historicism did the same by reestablishing the irreducibility of external context as the poem's environment.

While critiques of the privileged status of the aesthetic object reestablished the dialectical nature of aesthetic experience, they never quite deflated the power of the organic *trope. On the one hand, aesthetic experience continues to call for animate lang. to illuminate its workings, and on the other, ever-elusive questions about poetic structure regularly return to the indissoluble bond between form and content. Organicism, as it is known today, emerged as a result of the paradigm shift in the late 18th c. but was never (for its early advocates) solely a totalizing process. The variety of questions organicism has generated over the years points to its relevance for the study of poetry. In many ways, it remains a reference point for basic questions about poetic structure, questions that remain constant at the intersection of life and art, even as answers change over time.

ORIGINALITY. Usually denotes the quality of novelty or creativity inherent in an artistic work relative to other works. Behind this seemingly self-evident notion lie substantial interpretive problems that have occupied artists at least since the Romans wrote in the shadow of the Greeks. The most interesting of these is what McFarland has termed "the originality paradox," in which those writers most concerned with their own originality will insist elsewhere, in equally strong terms, that all writing is *imitation. Thus, R. W. Emerson, who warned that "imitation is suicide" ("Self-Reliance," 1841), also wrote, "Every book is a quotation; and every house is a quotation out of all forests, and mines, and stone quarries; and every man is a quotation from all his ancestors" (Representative Men, 1850). Often the strongest declarations of originality are themselves imitations or trans.: Ezra Pound's exhortation to "make it new," which has come to encapsulate the 20th c.'s emphasis on innovation, is itself a deliberate mistrans. of an ancient Chinese inscription, as Heinzelman has argued. The counterintuitive relation of originality to imitation is where any serious discussion of the term must begin.

From the Roman period, writers have often insisted on ownership of their own words or attacked others for stealing them. Martial first employed the term plagiarius (Epigrams 1.52), meaning "kidnapper," to describe literary theft (plagiarism), and poets up through the Ren. frequently defended the uniqueness of their work. John Donne wrote in his second satire that of all poets, "he is worst, who (beggarly) doth chaw / Others' wits' fruits." Certainly, a writer's sense of ownership over his or her own works, and a concomitant belief that those who copy them are stealing the writer's words or ideas, seems a necessary if not a sufficient criterion for the mod. concept of originality.

Yet for much of the hist. of Western poetry, as well as that of most Eastern trads., writerly creativity was judged more by the artful imitation of other writers than by the quality of novelty. Put more strongly, imitation was viewed as the most effective path to originality. Writers went forward by looking backward. Horace, whose Odes were themselves modeled on earlier Gr. lyrics, enjoined poets in his Ars poetica to "review the Greek models night and day" and, by doing so, to produce creatively challenging work. In fact, a better term than originality for pre-18th-c. attitudes might be what Greene and others have called "creative imitation," the imitation and strategic revision of prior authors in order to create a mingling of (in Greene's words) "filial rejection with respect." Such a work responds to and struggles against the great works of the past to engage more fully with the present. Most folk trads., as well as Eastern literary and artistic trads. (which, in general, are less concerned than Western art about the question of originality), have also underlined the primacy of imitation; Confucius's statement "I transmit rather than create" remains influential, though not universal, in Chinese artistic practice.

Through the end of the 17th c., in England as well as throughout Europe, most literary writers exercised some form of creative imitation. Indeed, writing that announced itself as sui generis was viewed with suspicion. Three major aspects of med. and early mod. culture—one theological, one literary, and one technological—help account for this view of originality. The first derives from the pervasive Christian notion of imitatio Christi, which held that human beings should imitate God, the only original. Originality might thus be considered as a sin of pride, a view that John Milton underscores in Paradise Lost by associating the concept exclusively with Satan, Chaos, and, of course, "original" sin. The second involves the importance of cl. authorities, esp. Homer and Virgil, whom the Middle Ages saw as crucial models for literary achievement. The Ren. humanists, who in many ways broke from med. paradigms, in this regard heightened the importance of cl. models, viewing Gr. and Roman antiquity as a kind of summit that could be imitated but probably not attained. Third, ms. writing practices (the printing press was invented in the mid-15th c.), with their reliance on anonymity, collaborative authorship, trans., and commentary, resisted the centralizing "author function," in Michel Foucault's phrase ("What Is an Author?," 1979), which contributed to mod. originality by associating a given creative production with a singular individual.

The term originality and its emphasis on ex nihilo newness, rather than the imitation of past writers, appeared only in the mid-18th c. An ideal of intrinsic, organic creativity began to displace the earlier ideal of imitation—now defined as a mechanical, extrinsic process derived from the assiduous copying of earlier and better writers. In one of the first essays to address the topic at length (Conjectures on Original Composition, 1759), Edward Young set the mod. terms of the debate: "An Original may be said to be of a vegetable nature; it rises spontaneously from the vital root of Genius; it grows, it is not made: Imitations are often a sort of Manufacture wrought up by those Mechanics, Art, and Labour, out of pre-existent materials not their own." The romantic poets, with whom the notion of originality is most closely identified, roughly equated originality with the *imagination. For S. T. Coleridge, the poet is like a lute lying open to the natural breezes of *inspiration. (Yet Coleridge, in his letter to Thomas Curnick of April 9, 1814, also described even the best poetry as "a cento of lines that had pre-existed in other works" [see CENTO].) William Wordsworth and Coleridge's famous definition of poetry (in the Preface to the second ed. of Lyrical Ballads, 1800) as "emotion recollected in tranquility" likewise encourages an identification of originality with the poet's authentic, expressive self. For Woodmansee and others, the rise of originality coincides roughly with the devel. of copyright and a strong conception of authorship: originality makes the most sense only when an identifiable author can lay claim to legal ownership of his or her writing. It is probably no accident that Wordsworth advocated vociferously to extend the term of copyright under Brit. law.

After the romantics, ideas of originality found their strongest focus in three contrasting dicta of modernist poetics. The most famous, Pound's "make it new," has been used as a rallying cry for avant-garde innovation in the form of radical breaks with the past (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS, MODERNISM). But this belies Pound's actual poetic practice, which relied heavily on the imitation, trans., and renovation of earlier poets and poetic forms. The second dictum is T. S. Eliot's subtle plea for the value of imitation in "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919): "we shall often find that not only the best, but the most individual parts of [a poet's] work may be those in which the dead poets, his ancestors, assert their immortality most vigorously." As Frye argues in Anatomy of Criticism, "any serious study of literature soon shows that the real difference between the original and the imitative poet is simply that the former is more profoundly imitative." Pound and Eliot are closer than they might appear; scholars have suggested that both poets think of originality as the calculated infusion of the moribund present with the immediacy of the past. "Innovation," writes Hollander, "is itself an innovation of periods in our hist. that were aware of their forerunners."

The third poet whose rethinking of originality in the beginning of the 20th c. most influenced later poets is Gertrude Stein, whose deceptively casual assertions such as "I am inclined to believe there is no such thing as repetition" ("Portraits and Repetition," 1935) paved the way for postmodernist challenges by asking whether there is such a thing as originality at all and, if it exists, whether it is desirable. If there is no *repetition—i.e., if every repetition is actually in some sense a new creation—then there can also be no originality because every new instance of lang. is as original as every other. The use of repetition, a central feature of Stein's poetic practice, has since been explored most pointedly in visual art, from Marcel Duchamp's Fountain to Andy Warhol's Campbell's Soup experiments to Sherrie Levine's "Appropriation Art." Coming at the problem from the opposite direction, Baudrillard argues that "a truly unique, absolute object . . . is unthinkable," because objects draw their meaning from their relation to other objects, to the series of which they are always a part.

In the late 20th c., innovation and experiment largely replaced originality as the terms of art in Eng., with subtle differences in emphasis. Although poetry that refers to itself as innovative often explicitly rejects romantic poetic practice, this rejection takes form more often against the romantic conception of the authentically expressive speaker than against the originality of individual *genius per se. In the 21st c., however, poets and theorists have addressed the paradox of originality more directly. Schwartz posits that, under the pressures of digital replicating technologies, the Internet, and postmod. approaches to copyright and intellectual property, "creation and imitation, invention and repetition may become as indistinct as knowing is from copying." *Oulipo has rethought originality by emphasizing techniques of randomness and collaboration and by emphasizing process and "potential" over the finished products of identifiable genius. (Perhaps the most radical challenge to originality, Oulipo suggests, is nonchalance.) Recent experiments in textual appropriation, such as the *Flarf movement's use of lang. culled from Google searches, have sought to redraw the boundaries between plagiarism and originality. *Conceptual poetry often uses techniques of plagiarism, copying, and appropriation, leading Kenneth Goldsmith to declare in "Conceptual Poetry/Conceptual Interview," an interview with Anne Guthrie (2008), that "[c]onceptual writing obstinately makes no claims on originality." One of the most sustained interrogations of originality has emerged from feminist poets who, harkening back to Jackson Mac Low's Buddhist-influenced experiments with *aleatory poetics, see originality as "an ego project," and seek to reconceive the act of creation through other patterns of *influence and generation. Hillman, for instance, considers creation via the mysteries of alchemy: "an inventor is subsumed in her process but a style makes an original thing. How? Can't help you there."

ORIYA POETRY. The Oriya-speaking area of India, now called Odisha—a state on the country's eastern coast, between Bengal and Andhra Pradesh—was known as Udra, Kalinga, Kangod, Koshala, and Utkala during different historical periods since the composition of the Mahābhārata, ca. 2500 BCE. The ancient form of the lang., now the mother tongue of more than 30 million people, incl. 62 different tribes (which speak various dialects) and the diasporic population, is mentioned in the Sanskrit grammarian Panini's Astādhyāyi (5th c. BCE), where he refers to it as "Udra Bibhasha." However, written lit. in Oriya began only in the 10th c. CE. The major poets of that era—such as Sabaripa, Kanhupa, and Luipa—were Buddhist Sahajayana mystics. Their poems, called Charyapada, are artistic records of the lives of disciplined spiritual practitioners. They can be read at different levels: they simultaneously evoke the terrestrial and transcendent realms; they also cloak the sublime under a seemingly erotic surface. Poetry seems for them to be the locus in which the natural world and intimations from beyond come together.

This foundational notion that a poet's consciousness is intimately in touch with a subtle, unseen, and all-controlling force, even as the poet remains firmly planted in the visible world of objects, seems to permeate the entire oeuvre of Oriya poetry. Although between the 12th and 19th cs. Sahajayana Buddhism gave way to spiritual practices such as Shakti worship, Shaivism, the Jagannath cult, and Vaishnavism as the dominant belief systems informing poetic art, poetry in Oriya was always seen as an intermediate space between the immanent and the transcendent, an inevitable part of the spiritual practice leading to Moksha or liberation. Depending on the methods adopted for such liberation, poet-seekers can be divided mainly into two categories: Yogis, who perceive the sensory world as Maya or illusion and seek to withdraw from it, and Bhaktas, or poets of devotion, who represent the world of objects as a legitimate means by which to transcend it. The poets Achyutananda Das (early 17th c.), Yasobanta Das, and Ananta Das (both later 17th c.) belong to the first category, while Banamali (1729–90), Baladeva Ratha (1789–1845), Gopalakrishna Patnaik (1785–1862), and Gourahari (1814–90) represent the latter. Bhimabhoi (1845–95) dares to embrace hell eternally so that the rest of the world can obtain deliverance. From the margins of society, this poet-activist challenged all forms of the status quo and created a political and poetic idiom that pleaded for an egalitarian social order. He represents the acme of Oriya poetic genius.

The 1,000-year span between the beginnings of Oriya written lit. and the 19th-c. poets includes a number of humanistic poems in various subgenres, such as bhajans (devotional songs), jananas (songs of supplication), chaupadis (rhyming quartrains), chitaus (epistolary poems), chautishas (poems in 34 *couplets, each beginning with a consonant), koilis (odes addressed to a cuckoo), samhitas and patalas (two forms of discursive poetry), and champus (chaupadis in chautisha form). In these, poets translate their particular experiences into a universal idiom.

A parallel trad. of puranas, *epics, and kavyas existed as well during this period, originating with Sarala Das's 15th-c. trans. of the Mahābhārata, Saptasati Chandi, Devi Māhātmya, and Bichitra Rāmāyana and bolstered by 16th-c. trans. of the Rāmāyana and the Bhāgabata by Balaram Das (1465–1546) and Jagannath Das (1470–1542), respectively. These trans. were radical attempts at vernacularization and coincided with the founding of a powerful Oriya empire by Kapilendra Dev and its subsequent consolidation by his inheritors. The aesthetic evident in these works can be said to mirror the sociopolitical by subverting the dominant pan-Indian Sanskritic-Brahminical hegemony. The trans. violated the hitherto inviolable purity of the so-called holy texts, producing syncretic works that brought 1,000 years of local hist. and quotidian concerns into confrontation and reconciliation with what was perceived to be universal. These pioneers mediated elite ideas in plebeian lang., humanized the epic characters, and set a model for the subsequent 200 noniconic trans. that constitute the bulk of med. Oriya poetry.

After securely establishing its identity, Oriya poetry began in the 18th c. to compete directly with the Sanskrit master texts. In the isolation and elegance of the royal courts, an ornate poetic trad. was developed by the court poets, who dared to surpass the stylization, verbal artistry, technical elegance, and erudition hitherto available only in Sanskrit poetics. This attempt to valorize Oriya over Sanskrit, at least in the limited and arid realm of stylized expression, by poets like Arjuna Das (16th c.), Dhananjaya Bhanja (1611–1701), Dinakrishna Das (ca. 1670–1740), Upendra Bhanja (ca. 1685–1750), and Abhimanyu Samantasinghar (1757–1806), can be considered an aesthetic recompense in the face of a larger sociopolitical malady. The Gajapati empire, which had held the Oriya people and their pride together, had collapsed. First under the Muslims and then under the Marathas, the Oriyas suffered greatly. The artistic poise that Oriya ornate poetry achieved was absolutely disconnected from the turmoil and uncertainty experienced by the population.

A semblance of order seems to have been restored with the advent of the British in the early 19th c. Oriya poetry now rarely considered Sanskrit to be a competing discourse but rather looked westward for inspiration. The impact of Europe created a Janus-faced poetic consciousness that demonstrated alternately subservience and hostility toward colonial cultural structures. On the one hand, the poets searched for their roots so as to reinvent themselves authentically; on the other, they eagerly appropriated the innovations available in the hegemonic culture. The contributions of Radhanath Ray (1848–1908), Madhusudan Rao (1853–1912), Fakirmohan Senapati (1843–1918), and their 20th-c. inheritors reflect this divided allegiance.

Western contact transformed Oriya poetry in many other ways. Eur. *romanticism, democratic ideals, and liberal thought galvanized nationalist consciousness. Quotidian social, economic, political, cultural, and epistemic issues found expression and legitimacy. Major intellectual currents as well as thematic and stylistic innovations tried out in the West found an echo in Oriya poetry. It can be argued that Oriya poetry in the 20th c. once again became dependent, as ornate poetry in the 18th and 19th cs. had been, through its replication of *Sanskrit poetics. But there is an important difference. While the earlier mode had been more inward and exclusive, cutting itself off from the life of ordinary people, contemp. poetry has been more outward and inclusive, truly global in its aspirations, even as it tries to represent the local faithfully.

The journey of Oriya poetry seems to have come full circle. The genre used by Sarala Das, Balaram Das, and others to shake off intellectual dependence on the elite Sanskrit epistemē and assert Oriya regional identity and by the saint-poets of the Bhakti movement to articulate indigenous philosophical ideas could not maintain its distinct identity. Sociopolitical conditions created new dependencies in the 18th c. and after. Since literary trends are not immune to economic and political pressure, such dependencies were in a way inevitable. What is significant, however, is that Oriya poetry has profitably negotiated changing conditions. It remains to be seen how Oriya poetry responds to the facts of today's global world, with its threats of monolingualism and monoculturalism.

ORNAMENT. The poetic notion of ornament was shaped by the rhetorical trad. in which it originated. In cl. rhet., ornament (Gr. kosmos, Lat. ornatus) is the third major component of *style, after grammatical correctness and clarity of expression (see, e.g., Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 8.3). Figures and *tropes but also the twin arts of choosing the best words and combining them for effect (with respect to *syntax, *sound, and *rhythm) all pertain to ornament. While correctness and clarity define an orator's basic stylistic competence, ornament makes the speech elegant or brilliant, causing pleasure and admiration in the listener or reader and preventing boredom in the process. There are cases in which ornament does not seem to exceed the requirements of correctness and clarity: in *plain style, the apparent absence of ornament functions in fact as one. More generally, from a rhetorical perspective, it is through ornament that style or "elocution" (alongside the *"invention" and "disposition" of arguments) contributes to the orator's persuasive task, notably by amplifying or diminishing what is being discussed. One key condition is that ornament be also apt, proper, and appropriate: all aspects of the speech having to "fit" one another, ornament must be well suited to subject and context, even though its core function is to transform what we perceive of them. It follows that ornament varies with the genre of the speech.

In epideictic rhet. (praise and blame—see EPIDEICTIC POETRY), which is not supposed to have an immediate persuasive purpose, ornament is freer to draw attention to itself as something to be enjoyed, whereas such aesthetic relish can hinder persuasion in forensic or deliberative (political) eloquence: there the beautiful must never be separated from the useful, and ornament must not be perceived as superfluous or excessive in any way. Successful ornament, in this view, is absorbed in the energy it generates. Thus, a forensic speech may not be less prone to figurative lang., nor give less attention to rhythm, than a demonstrative one; but in the former, the very effectiveness of ornament is supposed to preclude its perception as a distinct source of enjoyment. This contrast is often set between two qualities of style—force versus grace, dignity versus loveliness—and enhanced by heavily gendered metaphors: true orators must not indulge in effeminate, overly sweet ornaments but favor brisk, virile ones; the glint of speech must be that of steel, not gold; its color, that of flesh and blood, not makeup.

From this perspective, poetry tended to be seen as an art designed primarily for pleasure, in which ornament could be deployed for its own sake (although Lat. rhetoricians, while warning orators against the toxic wiles of poets, relied on Virgil as often as Cicero to provide examples of "effective" ornament). Thus, rhythm is more perceptible in verse than in prose; poetic comparisons and metaphors can afford to be obscure or distracting instead of having to sharpen an argument; ornaments of all kinds, flaunting their own charm, may even reflect themselves in the poem's subject matter, presented as worthy of aesthetic contemplation (such as a beautiful woman, a flowery landscape, a work of art)—hence, e.g., the central role of description in late Lat. and med. poetry, in which the poetic tended to merge with the epideictic, while treatises of poetics, for their part, mined the catalog of rhetorical ornaments, split between ornatus difficilis (tropes, involving a mutation of meaning) and ornatus facilis (other figures).

Yet practitioners of ostentatious ornament did not necessarily see it as lessening a speech's persuasive vigor: the norm that defined excess was never stable. What a particular era deemed too flamboyant and "poetic" to be effective in political speech could strike other tastes—during Rome's late imperial period, e.g., or among 15th-c. rhétoriqueurs*—as the height of rhetorical power. Conversely, while excessive ornament was often attacked, within the rhetorical trad., in the name of appropriate eloquence, it was destined to become the hated symbol of this very trad. in the eyes of later times (such as the 18th and 19th cs.), which endeavored to free "natural" eloquence (incl. poetry) from all the conventions of rhet. itself.

In truth, while pondering its debt to rhetorical models, poetry had never ceased to reflect (and feel ambivalent) about ornament; it had issued its own warnings against excess and enacted its own version of the rhetorical contrast between force and grace. Ren. poetry, in particular, was caught between a renewed cult of beauty and a renewed obsession with oratory's persuasive impact. Sixteenth-c. poets and poeticians often tried to fuse the two in one specific idea of poetic eloquence, notably in the grander genres (such as the epic), which cast elevated public matters in a sublime light without obeying the strictures of utilitarian persuasion. A key figure in this respect was enargeia (or evidentia, i.e., "showing" vividly with words), which helped attach rhet.'s culture of heightened emotion to the idea of representation (*mimesis), increasingly understood as poetry's defining task, following Aristotle. Yet the art of verbal "painting" could also be used, in lighter poems, to aestheticize objects for enjoyment, and to cultivate poetic admiration as a self-referential experience (see UT PICTURA POESIS).

Thus, the notion of poetic ornament, of poetry as ornament, remained ambiguous throughout the successive rhetorical ages: while ornament could always be understood as decoration (and be dismissed, or savored, as such), it also suggested a splendid fusion of the convincing and the beautiful, transcending their respective limits. The nature, means, and goals of such an effect were as varied and problematic as the definition of poetry itself. However, when romantic poetics sought to break away from the rhetorical paradigm and refused altogether to view beauty as something "added" to thought by way of words, ornament became a foil to mod. concepts of lit.—and, in particular, of *pure poetry as subjective expression and ling. creation. Yet mod. poets often circled back to it, metaphorizing ornament as a paradoxical, mysterious emblem of their art: thus, in 19th-c. France, e.g., from Charles Baudelaire's "flowers of evil" and "sonorous jewels" to Stéphane Mallarmé's "abolished bauble of sonorous inanity," the problem of ornament's power and substance (or lack thereof) proved central to the very sense of what the poetic form hoped to accomplish.

OTTAVA RIMA. Though now widely dispersed in various Western langs., largely because of the fame of Lord Byron's masterpiece Don Juan, ottava rima (or ottava toscana; Ger. stanze; Rus. oktava) originated as an *Italian prosody, an *octave stanza in *hendecasyllables rhyming abababcc. Though its origin is obscure, it is clearly a form that evolved in an oral poetic culture. Scholars relate the form to the stanza of the canzone* or the sirventes*, perhaps in imitation of the Sicilian strambotto* that emerged in the 14th c. for long poems (cantari) of less than epic length. It was in use in religious verse of late 13th-c. Italy, but only received definitive artistic form in Giovanni Boccaccio's Filostrato (1335?) and Teseida (1340–42?). It soon became the dominant form of It. narrative verse, being developed in the 15th c. by Politian, Luigi Pulci, and Matteo Maria Boiardo and reaching its apotheosis in the Orlando furioso (1516) of Ludovico Ariosto, where its potentialities for richness, complexity, and variety of effect are brilliantly exploited. Torquato Tasso (Gerusalemme liberata) showed his mastery of the form later in the century, and it was subsequently employed in Italy by Giambattista Marino (Adone), Alessandro Tassoni (La secchia rapita), Vittorio Alfieri (Etruria vendicata), Niccoló Tommaseo (Una serva, La Contessa Matilde), and Giovanni Marradi (Sinfonia del bosco).

In the broader Eur. context, the poets of Ren. Spain and Portugal followed the It. example in adopting the form for narrative purposes. Notable *epics in ottava rima are Alonso de Ercilla's La Araucana in Sp. and Luís de Camões' The Lusíads in Portuguese. The form was explored by Eng. Ren. poets like Thomas Wyatt (some 15 poems, most monostrophic), Philip Sidney (Old Arcadia), Edmund Spenser, Samuel Daniel (Civil Wars), Michael Drayton, and Fulke Greville; and it was followed as well in the great trans. by John Harington (Ariosto) and Edward Fairfax (Tasso). John Milton uses it for the coda of "Lycidas."

The form did not find its true non-It. master until Byron, whose trans. of a portion of Pulci's Morgante Maggiore (inspired by J. H. Frere's The Monks and the Giants) launched him into a deep exploration of the stanza's poetic resources. After a brief use of the form in an epistle to his sister in 1816, he began using the stanza extensively in 1817, first in Beppo and then, with astonishing panache, in Don Juan and The Vision of Judgment. P. B. Shelley used it after 1820, chiefly for "The Witch of Atlas," and John Keats uses it earlier for "Isabella." It was popularized in Rus. poetry by Alexander Pushkin on the model of Byron.

The work of the great masters of the stanza—Boccaccio, Pulci, Ariosto, Byron—suggests that ottava rima is most suited to work of a varied nature, blending serious, comic, and satiric attitudes and mingling narrative and discursive modes. Referring to Pulci, Byron calls it "the half-serious rhyme" (Don Juan 4.6). Its accumulation of rhyme, reaching a precarious crescendo with the third repetition, prepares the reader for the neatsummation, the acute observation, or the epigrammatic twist that comes with the final couplet:

> And Julia's voice was lost, except in sighs,
> Until too late for useful conversation;
> The tears were gushing from her gentle eyes,
> I wish, indeed, they had not had occasion;
> But who, alas! can love, and then be wise?
> Not that remorse did not oppose temptation:
> A little still she strove, and much repented,
> And whispering "I will ne'er consent"— > consented.
> (Don Juan 1.117)

At eight lines (cf. the Spenserian of nine), the ottava rima stanza is long enough to carry the thread of narrative but not so long that it becomes unmanageable, and it allows much greater room for exposition and elaboration than do *quatrains.

Although A. C. Swinburne remarked that Byron's achievement had spoiled the chances for later poets, he himself employed the form to wonderful effect in his seriocomic narrative "Arthur's Flogging." W. B. Yeats, a mod. master of the form, uses it for some 15 of his poems, incl. "Sailing to Byzantium," "Among School Children," and "The Circus Animals' Desertion." Significantly, Yeats develops the form precisely at the same time (1910–19) that the dreamy style of his early period is evolving into the more realistic, colloquial style of the great poems of his middle period. After Yeats, the form is brilliantly used by A. D. Hope, James Merrill, Kenneth Koch (The Duplications, 1975), Anthony Burgess (Byrne, pub. posthumously in 1995), Alan Wearne (The Lovemakers, 2001), and by various other late 20th-c. Eng.-lang. poets.

OULIPO, an acronym for OUvroir de LIttérature POtentielle (Workshop of Potential Literature), is a Paris-based group of writers and mathematicians who explore and extend the field of lit. through the practice of "writing under constraint" (see CONSTRAINT). Founded in 1960 by François Le Lionnais (1901–84) and Raymond Queneau (1903–76), the Oulipo has come to occupy a singular position among international avant-gardes and contemp. literary research groups, partly because, for more than 50 years, its three generations of members have managed to sustain a distinctive and coherent agenda. At its inception, the Oulipo was a scientific seminar adhered to by a small group of writers, linguists, and mathematicians united by friendship and their common predilection for literary humor, wordplay, and the peculiar rigorous virtuosity of authors such as Alphonse Allais, Lewis Carroll, and Raymond Roussel. Renowned members of the Oulipo include Marcel Duchamp, Georges Perec, Jacques Roubaud, Marcel Bénabou, Jacques Jouet, Anne Garréta (all Fr.), Italo Calvino (It.), Harry Mathews (Am.), and Oskar Pastior (Ger.).

In its early years, the Oulipo adopted programmatic principles in direct contrast to those espoused by *surrealism: instead of celebrating automatism, where inspiration purportedly springs from the artist's unconscious, the Oulipo wagered that innovation and change in literary form may be best accessed through the intentional elaboration of literary forms by way of volitional writing practices. The practice of writing under constraint consists of obeying self-imposed and explicit rules of composition. These constraints are rules or axioms with varying degrees of difficulty that determine the making of the text. While they are not always immediately visible; in principle, they remain verifiable by the *reader, who is often invited, by clues in the text, to observe the procedures involved in its making; as such, Oulipian works are available to conventional readings as well as to those that engage in puzzle-solving.

Broadly speaking, Oulipian constraints fall into two categories: those gleaned and elaborated from constraints already present in lit. and those devised independently, often based on models borrowed from mathematics, for the explicit purpose of testing their productivity. The Oulipian poetics of constraint accounts alike for forms available to verse, the *prose poem, prose fiction, and theater.

The earliest seminal Oulipian work is Raymond Queneau's Cent mille milliards de poèmes (Hundred Thousand Billion Poems, 1961). In this collection of ten *sonnets, each line of each sonnet may be transposed to replace the corresponding line in the other nine primary sonnets. This interchangeability of lines, highlighted in the volume's presentation, produces a vertiginous number of poems, 100 trillion, or 10^{14}. In addition to rendering accessible in one slim volume more sonnets than all the sonnets ever written, or, for that matter more text than had ever been written by all humans at that time, Queneau's *sonnet sequence demonstrates how the intentional use of constraints can add dimension to long-established fixed forms, esp. those (like the sonnet) that elaborate a poetics of constraints in their own right.

Another historic constraint practiced by the Oulipo is the *lipogram, illustrated in Georges Perec's (1936–82) La disparition (A Void, 1969), a 300-page mystery novel written without the letter e. La disparition illustrates key points about writing under constraint. First, constraints establish obstacles, eliminate possibilities, and elaborate an aesthetic of restraint. Deprived of the letter e, Fr. becomes significantly smaller; this radically affects how the story can be told. Second—and this aesthetic principle remains central to constrained writing—the difficulty of a constraint is proportional to its value. La disparition was extraordinarily difficult to write, both because of its length and because it omits the most common letter in Fr. (a lipogram in z would pose comparatively little difficulty). Third, Oulipian constraints are metapoetic. Because it stages the mystery of a missing person (Anton Voyl, whose name sounds like vowel), constraint in La disparition is given a thematic status. In this and other Oulipian works, form is thematized. The degree to which authors in the Oulipo employ constraints as a metapoetic code varies considerably, though referring to the craft of constraint is elementary in paradigmatic Oulipian works; for some, the elegance with which a work encodes and alludes to its axiomatic principles contributes to its literariness.

The invention of new constraints by the Oulipo has evolved from simple compositional techniques, such as S + 7 (where a writer rewrites a text by replacing all the nouns in a chosen text with the seventh noun following it in a chosen dictionary), toward the use of multiple constraints in a single work, and more recently, toward performative or conceptual forms of constraint. The use of the "knight's tour" in Georges Perec's La vie mode d'emploi (Life: A User's Manual, 1978) is a representative example of a new form deployed, along with others, in the composition of a novel. Based on a 10 × 10 grid corresponding to the cross-section of a Parisian apartment building, each chapter of this novel traces the action from room to room, moving from one to the other in the same way a knight moves on the chess board, without twice landing in the same box. Jacques Jouet's Poèmes de métro (2000) illustrates a turn toward an experiential *formalism: these poems were composed in the metro, strictly limiting the act of writing itself to the moments the train has stopped, beginning new stanzas with connecting trains, and composing the concluding line on arrival. In this work, the longest poem attempts, in a drive that is similar to that of the knight's tour, to pass through every station of the Paris Métro in as direct and least repetitive a fashion as possible. The aesthetic values present in these examples, principles of exhaustion and efficiency, are found elsewhere in Oulipian works.

Exactly what is meant by "potential literature" remains strategically undefined. For the Oulipo, constrained writing does not necessarily aspire to the creation of a literary work; rather, it participates in a general research program invested in interdisciplinary *invention, collaborative innovation, ludic approaches to writing and reading, and the elaboration of new economies of expression, complex literary forms that become the springboard for a speculative lit. Constraints are not, for the Oulipo, an end in themselves, but rather, as Le Lionnais would insist, a means for exploring new possibilities in human expression. In this context, the figure of the clinamen, or swerve, takes on special dimensions: in specific instances when the rule can be obeyed, it is intentionally broken for the purpose of drawing attention to the form as a mere code and to encourage readers to consider the sense of the work beyond its palpable formalisms.

The Oulipo remains active to this day, meeting monthly in private to discuss current research horizons. The group publishes new findings in the form of short texts in the Bibliothèque Oulipienne, gives regular public readings in Paris, and leads creative-writing workshops worldwide.

OXYMORON or synoeciosis (Gr., "pointedly foolish"; Lat. contrapositum). A figure of speech that yokes together two seemingly contradictory elements. Oxymoron is, thus, a form of condensed *paradox. Shakespeare has "O heavy lightness! serious vanity! / Mis-shapen chaos of well-seeming forms! / Feather of lead, bright smoke, cold fire, sick health!" (Romeo and Juliet 1.1.178–80). Although oxymoron has been a recurrent device in poetry at least since the time of Horace ("concordia discors rerum"—the jarring harmony of things [Epistulae 1.12.19]), it was an important device in the poetry of *Petrarchism and was the *trope of the *baroque era par excellence. Such poets as Giambattista Marino in Italy, Luis de Góngora in Spain, and Richard Crashaw in England made it a primary vehicle of the 17th-c. sensibility:

> Welcome, all wonders in one sight!
> Eternity shut in a span,
> Summer in winter, day in night,
> Heaven in earth, and God in man!

As this quotation shows, oxymoron is particularly effective in evoking religious mysteries or other meanings that the poet feels to be beyond the reach of logical distinction or ordinary sense. Its popularity in the late Ren. owes something to the heightened religious concerns of that period and something, too, to the revival of the habit of analogical thinking. John Milton uses the figure often in the early books of Paradise Lost, in part to evoke the unimaginable glories of God. Note, however, that oxymoron, which reveals a compulsion to fuse all experience into a unity, is to be distinguished from *antithesis, which tends to divide and categorize elements of experience. Significantly, the latter figure, with its basis in rationality, dominates the poetry of the 18th c., a period that regarded the figures of the baroque poets as examples of "bad taste" and "false wit." But oxymoron returns in many passages in John Keats, who also uses it to express the paradoxes of man's sensuous experience.

Oxymoron is a complex figure best understood by placing it in the group formed by the other related figures of contrast such as antithesis, antiphrasis, and paradox; Ren. rhetoricians distinguished 11 of these. Ducrot and Todorov define oxymoron as the "establishment of a syntactic relationship between two antonyms." Group μ attempts (with only partial success) to distinguish oxymoron from the other complex figures of contrast by analyzing the semantic elements in the oxymoric conjunction: "the contradiction is absolute because the negation takes place in an abstract vocabulary: 'harmonious discord,' 'black sun.' We have, therefore, a figure in which one term is a nuclear seme (semantic trait, element of meaning) negating a classeme (the generic element indicating the class to which individual semes belong, e.g. the same color for the word red) of the other term." E.g., in the well known Miltonic oxymoron "darkness visible," "'darkness' imposes the classeme obscure, which is cancelled by visible." Thus, oxymoron is a "coincidentia oppositorum in which the antithesis is denied and the contradiction fully assented to." Oxymoron differs from antiphrasis, a "metalogism [figure of thought] by repetition (A is not A)," because oxymoron "violates the code and belongs de facto to the class of metasememes [tropes]." Group μ does not discuss the difference between oxymoron and paradox. Dupriez distinguishes between oxymoron (words), oxymoric sentences, and oxymoric sentiments and ideas.

Oxymoron is by no means reserved, however, for religious experience or even love's contradictions; the mod. world abounds in it even for quotidian existence—e.g., "sight unseen"—and G.W.F. Hegel has, we recall, *"concrete universal." Finally, one may note that in the novel 1984, oxymoron is the very basis of "doublethink," that process of holding two opinions simultaneously, "knowing them to be contradictory and believing in both of them." This way not higher unification of opposites but madness lies.

PAEAN. A type of Gr. *hymn whose name derives from ié paián, a cry addressed to Apollo as the god of healing that often forms the *refrain (cf. Homer, Hymn to Apollo 517). Paeans were sung on numerous occasions: to Apollo in his role as healer or protector (e.g., Iliad 1.473); as a song of hope before going into battle (Pindar, Paeans 2) or of joy after victory (Iliad 22.391); and at the beginning of a symposium (Alcman, frag. 98; Ariphron, "Paean to Health"). Paeans were addressed to gods other than Apollo (e.g., Zeus, Poseidon, Dionysus, and Hygeia) and even, in the late 5th c. and Hellenistic period, to victorious generals (e.g., Lysander and Titus Flamininus). Composed for both choral and monodic performance, paeans were accompanied by lyres or woodwinds or both. The ancient debate whether Aristotle's poem to Hermias was a paean or a skolion* shows that the distinctions between paean and other lyric genres were not precise (Harvey).

Although many early Gr. lyric poets wrote paeans, the only substantial remains are papyrus fragments of 22 paeans by Pindar, of which Paeans 2, 4, and 6, written for Abderitans, Ceans, and Delphians, respectively, are the best preserved. A number of Hellenistic paeans surviving as inscriptions are collected in Powell. Although some poems of Horace (e.g., Odes 4.5) resemble paeans, the genre was moribund by his time, and in mod. usage, paean refers loosely to any song of joy or triumph.

PAEON. In *cl. prosody, a metrical unit that is formed of one of the four permutations of one long and three short syllables: these are called first paeon (– ∪ ∪ ∪), second paeon (∪ – ∪ ∪), third paeon (∪ ∪ – ∪), and fourth paeon ∪ ∪ ∪ –). The first and the fourth paeons are, in effect, *cretics (– ∪ –) by resolution of their last and first syllables, respectively. The second and the third, however, are to be found only in ancient metrical theory, and the fourth is quite rare. But the first paeon, esp., is found in Gr. poetry and drama (more frequently in comedy than in tragedy). Cretics and paeons may occur in combination (cf. Aristophanes, Acharnians 210 ff.). Forms of paeons are also common as clausular cadences in Gr. rhythmical prose. But only the most resolutely classicizing of metrists would find these Gr. rarities in Eng. meter, which is founded on a different basis.

PAINTING AND POETRY. The hist. of the relation of poetry to painting might be construed as an account of the innumerable contacts between these arts since cl. antiquity; it might be taken to concern poets such as R. M. Rilke (1875–1926) who adapt values and conventions from painting to poetry; it might treat figures who were both artists and poets, notably Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475–1564). This entry, with a focus on Europe, approaches the topic through several questions that shadow the hist. of this relation.

In antiquity, the two arts were often defined against one another or invoked together to discuss the nature of *representation. In the Phaedrus, Plato shows Socrates commenting with wonder and frustration that poetry and painting both offer the same pleasure in delusion. Like poetry, Socrates argues, when a painting is interrogated, it tells us only the same thing that we first saw, the living quality of things and people. Like painting, the words of poetry talk to us as though they were alive in the voice of the person before us. But the more we listen, the more they repeat the knowledge we already have, for only the appearance of *voice is presented to us, not the bodily dialogue that is the mark of living, illuminating thought. Aristotle looked further into mimesis in the context of literary representation and, in giving poetry a more or less systematic rationale of its own, largely dismissed the comparison with painting. But the productive friction between the two arts was to reappear often, for instance, in the work of the Gr. rhetorician Dionysius of Halicarnassus (ca. 60–7 BCE), the first to use the term ekphrasis for the representation, trans., or transposition of one work into another art form. Contemporaneously, Horace's celebrated dictum in his Ars poetica (ca. 18 BCE) ut pictura poesis* (as is painting, so is poetry) is a statement of the ambition of both art and poetry. It suggests a competition between the arts that is also a coming together: imaginative texts deserve the same merit and attention as paintings and frescos. Still, the competitiveness in ekphrasis might imply the supremacy of either the source art form or the target one. Is there room for a more liberated, if more uncomfortable, understanding of the way the verbal and the visual arts illuminate one another?

A celebrated example of this tense partnership is Nicolas Poussin's Et in Arcadia Ego (1637–39). The title is taken from Virgil, and its meaning is that, even in pastoral world of blissful unity with nature, death (the I or ego) is ever present. Poussin's two versions of the painting are not only ekphrastic but intertextual within the domain of painting (see INTERTEXTUALITY). Poussin omits the skull that often provides mortality with a conventional symbolization. Instead, the concept of death has been made something that is literally being read; the Arcadian shepherds are reading and discussing the inscription on the side of the tomb that occupies the center of the composition. The message from antiquity, et in arcadia ego, is made a matter of visual interpretation and of trans. into present knowledge. Not only has Socrates' doctrine in the Phaedrus of the migration of souls been translated into a humanist one, by which humankind forges knowledge on the basis of its own mortality and a Christian afterlife, but the conventions of present reading and present dialogue are given the foreground. The Arcadian setting, composed in the mode of Eur. neoclassicism, provides the light in which the Socratic pursuit of truth beyond the forms of its revelation is lost, found, and lost again. Thus, ekphrasis, rather than compounding *imitation with imitation, might also allow for an open-ended process of adaptation in which the arts enter into a dialogue about their own hist. and purpose.

Is each art bound to represent the ambitions of another art? In what ways is the relation of art to art speculative? Does it involve convergence or divergence? In her seminal book The Colors of Rhetoric (1982), Wendy Steiner writes that G. E. Lessing's Laocoön: An Essay on the Limits of Painting and Poetry (1766)—a key Enlightenment statement on the nature of art, which is discussed once again through the relation between the arts—sends a loud message of divergence. Although the arts are similar in being imitations, this is a "relational rather than a substantive similarity." Both are symbolic in relation to reality, but each expresses in different ways its own detachment from the objects of its mimesis. In a romantic light and beyond, this detachment among the arts—the sense that they are different in ways that make fresh perspectives available when one art comes into sustained contact with another—is a source of symbolic enrichment.

In *romanticism and after, as M. H. Abrams shows in The Mirror and the Lamp (1953), the purpose of art turns from imitation to the expression of emotion. Norman Bryson in Tradition and Desire (1984) shows Eugène Delacroix's (1798–1863) art developing the romantic desire to account for opposing tendencies in the psyche into a vision "which exceeds the fixities of representation" altogether, and which presents the "existence of the body beyond representation." In turn, Charles Baudelaire (1821–67) develops his poetics as a response to the developing modernity of his time, and its painting in particular. Delacroix, as well as Francisco Goya (1746–1828) from the previous generation, is a key beacon in his aesthetic thought, with Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres (1780–1867) acting as an aesthetic foil.

By means of his celebrated challenges to the morality of his day, encapsulated in the title of his book of verse Les Fleurs du mal (The Flowers of Evil, 1857, 1861), Baudelaire systematically cajoles his reader into questioning his or her modes of recognition and response. In his Salon de 1845, Baudelaire suggests that Delacroix's aesthetic of excess is dramatized in his use of color which extends the lines of drawing and creates an art showing "the ungraspable and trembling character of nature." Color is thus removed from its mimetic connection with the material world and with received *taste and morality. In this, Baudelaire and Delacroix together anticipate the postimpressionism of Paul Gauguin (1848–1903), the fauvism of the early 1900s, and the orphism of Guillaume Apollinaire (1880–1918) and Robert Delaunay (1885–1941).

Baudelaire's classic essay "Le Peintre de la vie moderne" ("The Painter of Modern Life," 1863) is an exercise in ekphrasis on the grandest scale. The position of the poet Baudelaire in relation to his art is rhetorically translated into that of the painter and draftsman Constantin Guys (1802–92) in relation to his own. But equally, the art of Guys is swamped by Baudelaire's elusive evocation of it, which evokes a style of painterly brushwork in conjunction with a mode of thought, rather than comparing particular works of painting and writing. Rapid execution and the unfinished product emerge as core indicators of a dynamic art able to respond to the hist. of its own time, and to the complexity of the relations between attachment to circumstance and the demand for synthesis.

What is at stake is the capacity of the poetic sign in general to give a total account of human experience: life as we understand it systematically, as well as life lived in the moment. Penny Florence's Mallarmé, Manet and Redon (1986) is devoted to reading the relations between *impressionism (1870s and 1880s) and *symbolism (1880s to the turn of the century) dramatized in the works of the artists in her title. Her readings of these works explore the power of form to change the way visual and verbal signs make sense. Florence describes the perfect sign as "a kind of poise," offering an understanding of how it works but also an ability to alter rather than repeat the patterns of recognition it prompts. Florence takes the example of the decadent poet Jules Laforgue, who was born in Montevideo in 1860 and died in Paris in 1887. As Florence describes it, Laforgue's ambition for *versification, developed in large part through his engagement with impressionist painters from 1881 onward, is the desire to convey "reality in the living atmosphere of forms."

But once again, this is not purely a matter of poetry imitating art, and Laforgue's verse in Les Complaintes (The Laments, 1885) exceeds a literal ling. trans. of the retinal impressionism of the works of Claude Monet (1840–1926) and others from the 1870s and 1880s. In Laforgue's verse as Florence characterizes it, an impressionist optics of the moment is transformed into a poetic space in which the various elements involved fail to cohere. An exploration by critics and practitioners alike of the interaction between the arts certainly frees each art individually from the incapacity to account for its own hist. But on the other hand, relations of visual and verbal aesthetics resist synthesis since they do not share the same perceptual space or the same time of reading or viewing.

In Mallarmé's Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice, 1897), the words of the poem and its syntax are scattered across a series of open-book pages in patterns that are indeterminately verbal and visual. The text exemplifies self-critical thought: it creates a partnership of meaning in a composition that resolutely preserves the disparate nature of the elements involved (see BOOK, POETIC; VISUAL POETRY). Such an anticoalescent approach to knowledge may not be appropriate to finding solutions to practical problems. But a disciplinary partnership that refuses appropriation might provide the basis for developing meaningful cultural dialogue rather than conflict.

A desire to respond to the events and calamities of their time drove the practice of artists in the Eur. avant-garde from 1907, the year of Pablo Picasso's Les Demoiselles d'Avignon, to the start of World War II in 1939. This new aesthetic renaissance is once again characterized by the interart dialogues of *cubism, *vorticism, It. *futurism, Rus. futurism, *expressionism, and *surrealism. The resolution of apparently opposing ideas and practices is the battle cry of André Breton (1896–1966) and his ambition for surrealism. Resolution is the only response possible for artists concerned to make a stand against the shocking reality of World War I. Unlike Sigmund Freud, Breton envisages a society harnessing the psychic energy displayed by dream, rather than regarding all unconscious activity as available only as symptom, a sign of what the socializing process will grudgingly allow into the public space. A creative resolution of subjective and objective experience is the aim of all authentic thought, for Breton, and of creative art in particular.

But while the arts come together, the avant-gardist radicalizing mission itself, examined by Peter Bürger in Theory of the Avant-Garde (1976, trans. 1984), is again articulated in the asymmetry of their interaction. In his 1928 text Le Surréalisme et la peinture (Surrealism and Painting, 1928), Breton promotes two related objectives: seeing in its precivilized state and a purely interior model for art. Both are inherently paradoxical. The uncivilized can only be conceived from the point of view of civilization—Picasso's Les Demoiselles d'Avignon explores that drama; and an interior model is as much a public or external concept as a uniquely subjective one. Such tensions are manifest in Breton's readings of individual painters. He presents Salvador Dalí's painting as enabling a realignment of the reality and pleasure principles, releasing creativity from inhibition and conformity. Yet Dalí, in works such as Soft Construction with Boiled Beans (Premonition of War) (1936), which is a now-iconic response to the Spanish Civil War (1936–39), suggests a more horrified investigation of subjective desire and its devastating involvement with authority.

In S/Z (1970, trans. 1974), Roland Barthes examines the lure of the holistic in the postromantic realism of Honoré de Balzac (1799–1850): his aspiration to a holistic account of the human psyche and social causality, as well as the failure to achieve it. An avatar of poststructuralist methodology, S/Z is far more a work of original critical writing, in the form of a reading of a literary text responding to visual art, predominantly sculpture on this occasion but also portraiture (see POSTSTRUCTURALISM). In Barthes's reading of Balzac's Sarrasine (1830), the Enlightenment aspiration to complete classification, as well as the Romantic aspiration to organic understanding, both come to a traumatic halt. But such aspirations, however fantastic, cannot simply be modified or dispensed with. Barthes communicates with increasing alarm his sense that a mad and aggressive pursuit of wholeness and oneness, in the arts as in all forms of knowledge, is produced in the narrative structures designed to expose it, as well as in the social and cultural laws designed to prohibit it.

In opening out to the aesthetic forms with which it engages, critical writing creates various ways of understanding not only seeing but understanding through seeing—in human time and in gendered time. Here are three further examples of ways in which critical writing is creatively advanced by its engagement with painting.

In Reading "Rembrandt" (1991), Mieke Bal explores how her engagements with pictures variously attributed to Rembrandt are driven by the existential wounds of gender. These are wounds coexistent with birth and death, and as such, we understand them through narrative. Not only thematically but formally, Bal suggests, in readings that create an interplay among narratology, *speech act theory, and psychoanalytic theory, word-image oppositions are held in creative suspension, just like the seeming opposition of movement and immobility. Gender difference, however violent, finds new voice. On the other hand, Jean-Luc Nancy's writing on touch with regard to Rembrandt in Noli me tangere (2003, trans. 2008) predicates mimetic understanding on touch as we know it but cannot feel it in the image. At a simple and fundamental level of encounter with painting, viewers are looking at what lies beyond their own seeing; and Nancy finds a lang. of poetic and philosophical simplicity with which to express the enigma of aesthetic form. Finally, in The Sight of Death: An Experiment in Art Writing (2006), T. J. Clark illuminates Poussin's painting by addressing his own material and personal situation as critic. Questions of dimension in Poussin's works are explored in terms of the specific places in which Clark is viewing them and writing about them. The existential dimension of reading painting is given new form in this experiment in writing art intransitively. In such works, an open-ended argument emerges on the relation of painting to writing, renewing the possibilities of art writing and its ability to understand the frames of seeing and knowing.

PALINDROME (Gr., "running back again"). A word (Eve or madam), sentence, or verse (whence versus cancrinus, "crab verse") that reads alike backward or forward. Ben Jonson invented the Eng. word palindrome (Under-woods). George Puttenham's example (Arte of English Poesie, bk. 1, ch. 7), which he calls Verse Lyon (from the Fr.), reverses merely the order of the words. Several varieties exist: (1) in the canonical form, the sentence or verse reads alike in either direction letter by letter; (2) in another variety, the reversal is word by word; (3) a third variety reverses line by line. Outside of the Eng. and Nordic langs., diacritical marks need not be preserved in both directions to have the palindrome be considered correct. In addition to their appearances in literary texts, palindromes exist in fields such as music, medicine, and mathematics. Palindromes have influenced composers such as Ned Rorem.

The reputed inventor of the palindrome was Sotades, a minor Alexandrian poet of the early 3d c. BCE who wrote virulent *invective and obscene verses (see SOTADEAN); no examples are extant from the cl. Gr. period. The best-known palindrome in post-cl. Gr. is "nipson anomemata me monan opsin" (wash my transgressions, not only my face), attributed to Gregory of Nazianzus (4th c.) and often inscribed on fonts in monasteries or churches. Other familiar ones in Lat. are "Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor" (Sidonius Apollinaris Epistulae 9.14) and the so-called devil's verse, "Signa te, signa, temere me tangis et angis." Camden illustrates type (2) with this "perfect Verse": "Odo tenet mulum, madidam mappam tenet Anna / Anna tenet mappam madidam, mulum tenet Odo." One masterly shaped palindrome contains one word per line and can be read in four directions: "Sator arepo tenet opera rotas." Palindromes were esp. popular in Byzantine times, and we possess several written by Emperor Leo the Wise (10th c.). The Sp.-Heb. poet Judah Alharizi (late 12th–early 13th c.) inserted "Palindrome for a Patron" into his māqāmat The Book of Tahkemoni. Purportedly, an Elizabethan aristocrat defended her honor with a palindromic motto: "ablata at alba" (retired I am pure). Preceding Jonson's definition, John Taylor the Water Poet wrote the first palindrome in Eng.: "lewd did I live & evil I did dwel." Ger. palindromes were written by J. H. Riese in the 17th c.; and in 1802, Ambrose Pamperis published in Vienna a pamphlet containing 416 palindromes recounting the campaigns of Catherine the Great. Among the best-known examples of palindromes are Madam, I'm Adam and Able was I ere I saw Elba, the latter attributed to Napoleon. More recent poets including W. H. Auden; Jeff Grant, author of the longest palindrome in Eng. with over 10,230 words (New Zealand); Petar Preradović (Croatia); and Velimir Khlebnikov (Russia) have written them; *Oulipo members wrote and inspired palindromes (go to http://graner.net/nicolas/salocin/ten.renarg//:ptth. to see a palindrome in French by Oulipo member Georges Perec [note that the URL is also a palindrome]); Susan Stewart's "Two Brief Views of Hell" (Columbarium) and James Linton's "Doppelganger" employ type (3).

The metrical analogue of the palindrome is reciprocus versus, a line that scans identically forward and backward, either letter by letter or word by word. Sidonius Apollinaris (5th c. CE) mentions versus recurrentes (Epistulae 9.14) which, when read backward, retain the same order of letters and meter ("Roma tibi . . .," above): this is a palindrome both in sense and meter. And Virgil's Aeneid 1.8 is still a dactylic hexameter when the order of the words is reversed. For examples, see Keil 1.516.24–517.14, 6.113.11–114.10.

PALINODE. A poem or song of retraction; originally a term applied to a lyric by Stesichorus (early 6th c. BCE) in which he recanted his earlier attack upon Helen as the cause of the Trojan War. The palinode became common after Ovid's Remedia amoris, supposedly written to retract his Ars amatoria. It is a frequent device in med. and Ren. love poetry, incl. the Roman de la Rose. Chaucer's Legend of Good Women is a palinode retracting Troilus and Criseyde, and a character called Palinode appears in Edmund Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender. Any ritualistic recantation may loosely be called a palinode, even one in prose, but the term palinodic form denotes a particular pattern in which two metrically corresponding elements are interrupted by another pair of similarly corresponding elements. The palinodic form may be represented as a b b' a' where the letters refer to lines, stanzas, or strophes, and where a b makes a statement that b' a' recants.

PANEGYRIC (Gr. panegyricos, "for a festival assembly") originally denoted an oration delivered at one of the Gr. festivals; later it came to designate a speech or poem in praise of some person, object, or event. As such, panegyric is rhetorically classed as a type of *epideictic poetry or oratory, the major branches of which are praise and *invective. Panegyrics praising heroes, athletes, armies, and dynasties are present in most cultures, incl. in oral poetry, though Western scholarship generally borrows the terminology for panegyric and its particular subgenres and specific occasions from the Gr., such as epinikion, a victory *ode; *epithalamium, a marriage song; *encomium, presumably praise of the host at the komos revel; and eulogy, a speech or poem in praise of the dead. In med. China, however, panegyric, for which a technical term is lacking, was not conceived as a separate genre but rather as poetry (shi*) "written at imperial command" (yingzhao or yingzhi), an effect of the commission by or dedication to a reigning monarch. With its morphological elasticity, the Ar. root for "praise," m-d-ḥ, produces an extensive terminology for the relations involved in panegyric: praise or a mode of poetry (madḥ), the praised one or patron (mamdūḥ), the panegyrist (mādiḥ), a panegyrical poem or section of a poem (madīḥ, midḥa), and self-glorification (tamadduḥ).

The cl. rules of panegyric are given in the rhetorical works of Menander and Hermogenes; famous examples include the Panegyricus of Isocrates, the panegyric of Pliny the Younger on Trajan, and the 11 other XII Panegyrici latini (4th c. CE). Pindar's odes have sometimes been described as panegyrics. After the 3d c. BCE, when much of rhetorical theory was appropriated for poetics, panegyric was accepted as a formal poetic type, and its rules were given in handbooks of poetry. Significant Western examples of panegyrics include Sidonius Apollinaris's poems on the Emperors Avitus, Majorian, and Anthemius; Claudian's on the consulships of Honorius, Stilicho, Probinus, and Olybrius; the panegyric on the death of Celsus by Paulinus of Nola; Aldhelm's De laudibus virginitatis; and innumerable Christian Lat. poems in praise of Mary, the Cross, and the martyrs, though hagiographical or devotional praise might well constitute a distinctly different type of praise from panegyric, since the author is not engaged with the social exchange inherent in a patron-poet relationship. J. C. Scaliger (Poetices libri septem, 1561) distinguishes, e.g., between panegyric, which tends to deal with present men and deeds, and encomium, which deals with those of the past; but, in general, the two are indistinguishable. Menander I, however, categorizes epideictic according to the object of praise, incl. praise of the gods (hymnos), praise of countries or cities, and praise of people or animals.

In Ar. and early Persian trads., the qaṣīda* was the primary verse form for panegyric, though it contained other sections, as well. In later centuries, esp. in Persian, the ghazal* and rubāʿī* forms were sometimes used as vehicles of panegyric. In addition to praising the justice, wisdom, power, and victories of the ruler, a Persian panegyric often closes with two lines of prayer for him. Most Persian works of *epic and romance open with a section of praise, sometimes several hundred lines long and organized hierarchically, first to God, then the Prophet, possibly the caliphs or saints, followed by the ruling patron, and often the crown prince. The basic system of *patronage that developed for Ar. at the caliphal court in Damascus, Baghdad, and Cordoba was replicated throughout the Middle East, South and Central Asia, North Africa and Andalusia, and for other lits., Persian, Turkish, and Urdu, etc. Kings, sultans, and military potentates, whether of local dynasties or major empires (Timurid, Safavid, Ottoman, Mughal) felt the need to retain poets, one of whom often served as *poet laureate, and to encourage recitation of panegyric poems on state, religious, and other ceremonial occasions. Al-Mutanabbī (d. 965), e.g., made Sayf al-Dawla and his court in Aleppo famous through his successful panegyrics. Persian poetry reemerged as a literate trad. in the 10th and 11th cs. largely because the Samanid and Ghaznavid courts decided actively to patronize and encourage Persian poets. Maḥmūd of Ghazna (d. 1030), the Maeceneas of Persian poetry, gathered major panegyric poets around his court (e.g., Farrukhī and ʿUnṣurī) and established the expectation that other sultans and shahs would do likewise. Panegyric poets at the Arabo-Persian courts frequently served as courtiers and boon companions, occasionally coming under political suspicion and suffering imprisonment or execution. The inherent threat of revenge in verse, however, balanced the power relation to some extent; some patrons' reputations were forever tarnished by satires from disgruntled former panegyric poets, e.g., al-Mutanabbī's wicked invective on Kāfūr in the 10th c.; and Firdawsī's satire on Maḥmūd of Ghazna in the 11th c. The complex dynamics of these patronage relationships led rhetoricians to analyze the poetics of *sincerity under rubrics like "praise that sounds like blame" and "blame that sounds like praise."

Panegyric remained popular through the Eur. Middle Ages both as an independent poetic form and as an important topos* in longer narrative poems, esp. epic and, like other such forms, it persisted into the Ren., with perhaps more emphasis on the praise of secular figures and institutions. The panegyric underwent a brief revival in 17th-c. encomiastic *occasional verse, e.g., Edmund Waller's "Panegyrick to My Lord Protector" (1655). The Eng. subgenre known as the *country house poem is a variety of panegyric.

PANTUN (Eng. and Fr. pantoum or pantoun). In contemp. poetry, the pantun is a poem of indeterminate length composed of *quatrains in which the second and fourth lines of each stanza serve as the first and third lines of the next. This pattern breaks in the final stanza, whose second and fourth lines are recurrences of the first and third lines of the first stanza; thus, the pantun begins and ends with the same line. Nineteenth-c. pantuns were often written in *cross rhyme, but contemp. examples by such poets as John Ashbery, Carolyn Kizer, Donald Justice, and the Ger. *Oulipo poet Oskar Pastior are often unrhymed; similarly, there is no established meter.

The schematic pantun, like the schematic *villanelle, was invented by 19th-c. romantics and *Parnassians as part of a programmatic promotion of fixed forms. The first original schematic pantuns in the Occident are probably those published in 1822 by the Ger. botanist Adelbert von Chamisso, but 19th-c. Fr. poets practiced the pantun most. In the notes to his 1829 Les Orientales, Victor Hugo included orientalist Ernest Fouinet's Fr. trans. of a pantun from William Marsden's 1812 Grammar of the Malayan Language; the form of this poem influenced the pantuns of Théodore de Banville and Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle as well as Charles Baudelaire's pantun "Harmonie du Soir" (rhymed abba).

The pattern that Westerners associate with the pantun is highly atypical of the Malay-lang. verse form (see MALAY POETRY). The Malay-lang. pantun can have six to twelve lines, but it is usually in four lines consisting of two end-stopped cross-rhyme couplets. The first couplet, the sampiran, tends to be highly charged and evocative, while the second couplet soars, sometimes obscurely, on the basis of the first: a Malay-lang. proverb declares, "A pantun is like a hawk with a chicken; it takes its time about striking."

PARABASIS. A formal part of Athenian Old Comedy, parabasis signifies a transgression or digression that interrupts the dramatic action of the play. Stemming from the Gr. verb parabaino (to overstep or pass over), it suspends the make-believe of theater. In the parabasis, usually made up of seven parts, each following prescribed rules of Gr. meter, members of the chorus stepped off the stage, removed their masks and costumes, and addressed the audience on matters of social, cultural, and political import. They often pointed directly to Athenian politicians and personalities sitting in front, mocking them while chastising the audience for having elected such idiots. These episodes often constituted unbridled ad hominem attacks on public figures. The parabasis accomplished its critique by violating the boundary between stage and viewer, thereby affirming to the spectators that the work before them was both illusion and reality. It went beyond Bertolt Brecht's notion of alienation in refusing to allow members of the audience to identify with the illusion.

Today, the parabasis is largely associated with the work of Aristophanes because, of all the ancient comedians, his work has largely survived. Even though his plays have socially relevant topics, such as peace and war in The Acharnians, peace and women in Lysistrata, and education in The Clouds, the parabasis punctures the curtain of fantasy to speak about the here and now. By breaking down the illusion of art, it paradoxically makes the spectators part of the spectacle.

PARACLAUSITHYRON (Gr., "sung by a locked door"). While the term itself occurs only in a late source, Plutarch's Moralia 753B, it is now generally applied to the lover's futile *lament outside his beloved's house. The paraclausithyron may have originated from the komos, the rowdy procession through the street after a night's drinking at the symposium, culminating in songs spurring youthful assaults on a brothel; but in the developed form, the lover must break his beloved's will, not the door (James). Key elements of the paraclausithyron are the urban setting, night, the lover's drunkenness, the refusal of the door to open, tears, and a festive garland left on the threshold. The paraclausithyron epitomizes the frustrations and sufferings of love. It is not a separate genre (Cairns) but has a long literary hist., appearing within ancient *lyric, *comedy (e.g., Alcaeus, frag. 374, the first attestation of the paraclausithyron; Aristophanes, Ecclesiazusae 952–75), *epigram, and *elegy. In Roman lit., the door plays a particularly prominent role as *metonymy for the unyielding beloved, perhaps because the door for the Romans was sacred (Copley, Yardley); in the first appearance of the paraclausithyron in Roman lit., at Plautus's Curculio 147–55, the lover addresses the door bolts. Roman love elegy developed the paraclausithyron as a prime example of male amatory persuasion (Yardley). The lover's immediate goal, to spend the night with the beloved, fails; yet, overall, his lament has the strategic advantage of revealing his devotion. Themes associated with the paraclausithyron occur throughout Catullus and the Augustan elegiac poets, all of whom also wrote a formal paraclausithyron (Catullus 67; Tibullus 1.2; Propertius 1.16; Ovid, Amores 1.6). Ovid claimed that the paraclausithyron was the beginning of all poetry (Fasti 4.109–12). Though Ovid has been accused of exhausting the *topos (Canter, Copley), later poets exploit its dramatic potential in various contexts; e.g., Bottom's address to the "sweet, o lovely Wall . . . wicked Wall" (Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream 5.1.174–81); John Donne's "Batter my Heart" (Holy Sonnets 14) adapts the motifs of the paraclausithyron to a religious context; Alfred, Lord Tennyson's In Memoriam 7 and 119 use the convention to express the pain of bereavement.

The paraclausithyron has a vivid presence in popular music of all genres: rhythm and blues (Jack McVea's "Open the Door, Richard"), doo wop (The Genies' "Who's That Knocking"), soul (Otis Redding's "Open the Door"), rock and roll (The Beatles's "No Reply"), psychedelia (Jefferson Airplane's "Let Me In"), fado (Amalia Rodrigues's "A Chave da Minha Porta"), country (George Jones's "The Door"), and samba (Jamelão's "Fechei a Porta"), among others.

PARADOX. A daring statement that unites seemingly contradictory words but that on closer examination proves to have unexpected meaning and truth ("The longest way round is the shortest way home"; "Life is death and death is life"). The structure of paradox is similar to the *oxymoron, which unites two contradictory concepts into a third ("heavy lightness"), a favorite strategy of *Petrarchism. Paradoxes are esp. suited to an expression of the unspeakable in religion, mysticism, and poetry. First discussed in its formal elements in Stoic philosophy and cl. rhet., the paradox became more widely used after Sebastian Frank (280 Paradoxa from the Holy Scriptures, 1534) and has always retained an appeal to the Christian mode of expression, as in Martin Luther and Blaise Pascal. In the Concluding Scientific Postscript (1846), Søren Kierkegaard considered God's becoming man the greatest paradox for human existence.

The most famous literary example of sustained paradox is The Praise of Folly by Erasmus (1511). In the *baroque period, paradox became a central figure; it is particularly important in *metaphysical poetry, esp. the poetry and prose of John Donne, who makes frequent use of paradox and paradoxical lang. in the Paradoxes and Problems and Songs and Sonnets (both 1633). The paradox is manifest in the lit. of the 17th and 18th cs. in its antithetical verbal structure rather than as argument. Denis Diderot in his late dialogue Le Paradoxe sur le comédien (1778)—on the art of acting but with far-reaching implications for poetry—holds that an actor should not feel the passion he expresses but should transcend direct imitation and rise to the conception of an intellectual model. Everything in him should become a controlled work of art, and the emotional state should be left to the spectator. In the romantic period, Friedrich Schlegel (Fragments, 1797) called the paradox a basic form of human experience and linked it closely with poetry and *irony. Thomas De Quincey in his Autobio- graphical Sketches (1834–53) argued that the paradox is a vital element in poetry, reflecting the paradoxical nature of the world that poetry imitates. Friedrich Nietzsche made paradox a key term of human experience and of his own literary expression. In the lit. of the 20th c., paradox often fuses with the absurd, which can be interpreted as an intensified, often existential expression of the paradox.

The term paradox is widely employed in 20th-c. crit., esp. in the work of the *New Criticism. Cleanth Brooks discusses it in The Well Wrought Urn (esp. chap. 1) as a form of indirection that is distinctively characteristic of poetic lang. and structure. As his example from William Wordsworth ("Composed Upon Westminster Bridge") illustrates, Brooks does not use paradox in the strict antithetical sense but gives it an unusually broad range by showing that good poems are written from insights that enlarge or startlingly modify our commonplace conceptions and understandings, esp. those residing in overly simplistic distinctions; this disruptive function of poetic lang. is precisely what Brooks calls paradoxical. Since the degree of paradoxical disruption is an index of poetic meaning, paradox and poetry assume a very close affinity with one another. Subsequently, this New Critical emphasis on paradox was taken up in deconstruction. Paul de Man argued that the insistence by the New Critics on the unity, harmony, and identity of a poetic work was irreconcilable with their insistence on irony, paradox, and ambiguity—or, rather, that the insistence on unity was the "blindness" of the New Criticism, whereas the insistence on irony and paradox was its "insight."

PARALIPSIS (Gr. paraleipsis, "a leaving aside"). The device by which a speaker draws attention to a topic by claiming not to speak of that very same topic (e.g., "I'm not going to tell you what I heard, but . . ."). A narrower term than apophasis (OED: Gr. "denial," from "to speak off"), which includes other methods of argument or representation by denial (such as the apophatic or negative theology of denying or negating positive statements about what God is), paralipsis should not be confused with occupatio, the anticipating and answering of an opponent's arguments (Kelly). Paralipsis is also known as preterition (Lat. praeteritio). Paralipsis has been used as synonymous with paralepsis (Gr., "a taking aside"), though the precision of this use is questionable. Aposiopesis* (Gr., "a becoming silent") is different from paralipsis since it refers to the speaker's coming to an abrupt halt in speech, as if overwhelmed with emotion by the unexpressed thought. The Lat. occultatio is also related to paralipsis because occultatio is used to present evidence that is exaggerated, cannot be proved, or does not stand up against scrutiny by passing over such information as if it were unimportant to the argument. In narrative theory, paralipsis refers to a homodiegetic narrator's omitting or suppressing information that he or she is fully cognizant of from the temporal point of narration; paralepsis is the opposite of paralipsis. Paralipsis is related to—but should not be confused with—analepsis (a flashback) and prolepsis (a flash-forward). James Phelan identifies some examples of paralipsis as paradoxical (e.g., when a narrator unselfconsciously appears to be as naïve as his or her narrated self). Alison Case suggests that Phelan's vision of paralipsis is a convention of 20th-c. fiction rather than a perennial aesthetic.

PARALLELISM (Gr., "side by side"). Parallelism is widely understood as a repetition of structure or pattern in adjacent phrases, clauses, or sentences within discourse in general and poetry in particular, e.g., "When the eye is cleared of obstacles, it sees sharply. When the ear is cleared of obstacles, it hears well" (Wisdom of Lao-Tse). The repeating structure is often syntactic in nature, as in the present example and in general in Chinese poetry (Plaks). However, the repetition may entail other ling. components such as lexicon, phonology, morphology, and rhythm (Jakobson, Hrushovski). A repetition in structural form serves, like rhyme, to associate the semantic content of the phrases or lines that share the common feature. Sometimes formally parallel propositions are roughly synonymous, e.g., "I will knock a boy into their wombs, / a baby into their embrace" (Kalevala; Finnish); but sometimes the coupled lines express different, though related, notions, e.g., "He wept evenings, he wept mornings, / most of all he wept nights" (Kalevala). Here the contrast between daytime and nocturnal behavior is crucial. Psycholinguistic investigations suggest it is natural, or at least conventional, to correlate similarity of structure and similarity of meaning. Thus, a subject in an experiment, when presented with the stimulus sentence "The lazy student failed the exam," responded with "The smart girl passed the test," a sentence parallel in structure and related in meaning.

Parallelism is characteristic of popular and formal poetry in many cultures, from ancient to mod. times, but it may function as an only occasional *trope within a work. The Babylonian creation myth Enuma Elish

(ca. 1200 BCE) begins with a couplet in parallelism: "When on high the heaven was not yet named, / [and] below the earth was not called by name [i.e., created]" (trans. Greenstein; cf. Foster 439). Although parallelism frequently recurs in this lengthy text, it is not continuous. In such works as biblical Heb. poetry and the Kalevala, most couplets exhibit parallelism. Consider, e.g., this typical sequence from the prebiblical epic poetry of North Syria (Ugarit):

> Pour wine into a silver basin, / Into a gold basin, honey.
> Ascend to the top of the lookout; / Mount the city-wall's shoulder.
> Raise your hands toward the sky. / Sacrifice to Bull El, your Father.
> Adore Baal with your sacrifice, / Dagon's Son with your offering.
> (Kirta; trans. Greenstein in Parker 14)

In each couplet, the second line essentially elaborates the content of the first. Kugel and Alter in their studies of biblical parallelism indicate that the second line in parallelism often intensifies or extends the sense of the first; compare:

> The new-wed groom will go forth;
> To another man he'll drive his wife; / To a stranger his own true love.
> (Kirta; trans. Greenstein in Parker 15)

In this example, as in many others, the syntax of the parallel line is identical in the underlying pattern, in the deep structure, while there are variations, such as deleting (gapping) the verb ("he'll drive") in the surface structure. Parallelism in syntactic structure must accordingly be sought in the deep structure as well as in the surface form (Kiparsky, Greenstein). In the Heb. Psalm 105:17, the line "He [God] sent ahead of them a man" is followed by "Joseph was sold as a slave." Though on the surface the syntax of each line seems different, in generative theory the second line, formulated in the passive voice, is underlyingly active—"[Someone] sold Joseph as a slave." The sentence in the deep structure is transformed in the surface structure into a concrete passive sentence. On the deep or abstract level, the syntactic structures are identical (subject noun-phrase, verb-phrase, adverbial phrase). The fact that parallelism obtains fundamentally on the abstract level is clear from instances in which a word or phrase in the surface structure of the first line is gapped in the second line, even when it lacks grammatical agreement. E.g., in the following Ugaritic (N. Syrian, 13th c. BCE) couplet—"Her father sets the stand of the balance, / Her mother the trays of the balance" (Nikkal and Yarikh)—the verb "sets" is masculine; if it were to appear in the surface structure of the second line, it would have to be feminine in form (trans. Greenstein; cf. D. Marcus in Parker 217).

When a word or phrase is deleted in the parallel line, it is routine to compensate for the syllables lost by expanding one of the parallel elements, e.g., "I will certainly stop the women's laughter, / the daughters' peals of laughter" (Kalevala). In the Heb. couplet, "Why is light given to one-who-suffers, / and life to those-bitter-of spirit?" (Job 3:20), the verb "is given" is gapped in the second line and the single word "one-who-suffers" is paralleled by the two-word phrase "those-bitter-of spirit," which is an extension in sense as well as form, as Job extrapolates from his own instance of suffering to that of others, perhaps even all others, as well.

In biblical Heb. verse, the first line of a couplet nearly always comprises a complete clause, if not a complete sentence, and the second line ordinarily reiterates it in parallelism, at least in part. The second line, however, may extend the first line without repeating any of its syntactic structure. The result is a sort of *enjambment, e.g., "He called up against me a holiday / for breaking down my young men!" (Lam. 1:15; see Dobbs-Allsopp). In such cases, we may either understand the entire first line to be repeated in the deep structure of the second line—and deleted; or we may understand that, in this parallelism, balance of line length, rather than repetition of syntactic structure, is determinative (see below).

Biblical Heb. is the best-known system of parallelism, first described in depth by Bishop Robert Lowth in 1753 (see HEBREW POETRY, HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS). Jewish exegetes of the Middle Ages had expressed a less elaborate understanding of parallelism according to which "it is a doubling of the meaning using different words" (David Kimḥi, Provence, ca. 1200). Lowth, too, laid emphasis on semantic reiteration alongside syntactic repetition: "When a Proposition is delivered, and a second is subjoined to it, or drawn under it, equivalent, or contrasted with it in Sense; or similar to it in the form of Grammatical Construction; these I call Parallel lines; and the words, or phrases, answering one to another in the corresponding Lines, Parallel Terms" (Isaiah: A New Translation, 1778).

In the 1980s, both O'Connor and Greenstein suggested that parallelism be regarded as the rhetorical structuration of propositions, whose meanings are brought into conjunction by their formal similarities. Consider Psalm 23:1: "The Lord is my shepherd, / I shall not want." The two propositions have no inherent link semantically. Bringing the two clauses together through parallelism, however, establishes a meaningful connection: the speaker will lack nothing because the Lord is, metaphorically, a shepherd who protects, guides, and cares for him or her. Note as well that the two lines of the couplet have different syntactic structures. They display above all a quasi-metrical balance. A minority view holds that there is a strictly recoverable metrical component to the poetry of the Heb. Bible (e.g., Sievers), but in the absence of any convincing theory, it is more generally maintained that there is an unrecoverable or vague metrical element in the verse.

Biblical parallelism, as J. G. Herder first observed in 1783, is primarily characterized by a balance of line length. Secondarily, it may feature a repetition of syntactic structure and the distribution of conventionally paired words (silver-gold, heaven-earth, father-mother, slave-son of a maidservant, wine-blood of grapes, listen-give ear, etc.) between the parallel lines. Accordingly, the couplet immediately following Psalm 23:1 is "In grassy meadows he lays me down (yarbitséni), / By still waters he leads me (yenahaléni)." Here we find a quasi-metrical balance, full repetition of syntactic structure, the distribution of the word pair "meadow-waters" (cf. Joel 1:20) between the two members of the parallelism, and on top of that a phonetic echo of the verb from line to line.

In Chinese verse and rhet., as was said, it is typical to formulate full lines in complete syntactic parallelism, e.g., "In the vast desert a solitary column of smoke rises straight, / Over the long river the setting sun looms round" (Wang Wei; quoted in Plaks 536). In Eng. Ren. poetry, by contrast, it is common to pattern phrases in sequence in parallelism, e.g., "Light of my life, and life of my desire"; "Oft with true sighes, oft with uncalled teares, / Now with slow words, now with dumbe eloquence" (Philip Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 68, 61). Such sequences can be extended, e.g., "My mouth doth water, and my breast doth swell, / My tongue doth itch, my thoughts in labour be" (37). In more complex structures, the individual entities are themselves likely to be more complex, forming full sentences in parallelism:

> Let Fortune lay on me her worst disgrace,
> Let folke orecharg'd with braine against me crie,
> Let clouds bedimme my face, breake in mine eye,
> Let me no steps but of lost labour trace,
> Let all the earth with scorne recount my case.
> (Astrophil and Stella, 64)

In Eur. poetry since the Ren., biblical influence has reinforced the use of parallelism to the point that few major verse texts are without some parallelism. William Blake and Christopher Smart both use quasi-biblical parallelism extensively. This tendency reaches a turning point when Walt Whitman makes use of biblical structures to supplant the metrical basis of Eng. prosody itself:

> The prairie-grass accepting its own special odor breathing,
> I demand of it the spiritual corresponding,
> Demand the most copious and close companionship of men,
> Demand the blades to rise of words, acts, beings.
> ("Calamus," Leaves of Grass)

Full, indeed extraordinarily long, lines can be formulated in parallelism, as in Dylan Thomas's opening affirmation, "The force that through the green fuse drives the flower / Drives my green age" and its (nonadjacent) parallel, "The force that drives the water through the rocks / Drives my red blood." Similarly in the well-known opening of Allen Ginsberg's Howl (1955), the second line refers back to the syntax of the latter part of the first line (beginning "I saw the best minds of my generation . . ."), reduplicating and elaborating it. The underlying structure of the second line is, accordingly, "[I saw the best minds of my generation . . .], dragging themselves through the negro streets at dawn looking for an angry fix." Essentially, the form we find here is the same as that of ancient Ugaritic and Heb. verse, in which the deletion of an element in the second line is accompanied by an extension of an ungapped element.

Ginsberg's poem captures the cadences of oral discourse, bringing the historical trajectory of parallelism full circle, for while parallelism becomes a convention of formal, literate composition, its beginnings are unquestionably in an oral context. Many poetries featuring parallelism tend to be either oral or early literate. The later typological category is important: the poetry of the Heb. Bible began to be written down over two and a half millennia ago, while Finnish folk poetry has been recorded for only a century and a half, but cl. Heb. and Finnish poetry are comparably close to the oral poetic situation and comparably far from the literate setting (see ORAL POETRY).

Parallelism is well represented in traditional poetry in Chinese (and its literary offspring, Vietnamese), in Toda (but not in the other Dravidian tongues), in the Semitic langs. (see above and cf. several types of "parallel prose" in Ar.), in the Uralic langs. (incl. Finnish), in the Austronesian langs. (Rotinese is the best known), and in the Mayan langs. Both med. and mod. Rus. folk poetry is parallelistic, as is some Altaic (Mongol and Turkic) verse.

PARAPHRASE, HERESY OF. The Am. New Critic Cleanth Brooks describes "the heresy of paraphrase" in the concluding chapter of his widely read and important book The Well Wrought Urn (1947). Following the Brit. critic I. A. Richards's Science and Poetry (1926), he insists on the essential difference between scientific statements (which are paraphrasable) and poetic statements (not paraphrasable; see PSEUDO-STATEMENT). In the former, the same content can be expressed in other words; in the latter, form and content work together to produce meaning so that a poem cannot be reduced to a prose précis.

In analyzing a poem, a critic must sometimes resort to a discursive summary statement about its meaning. However, such plain statements are always put into question by the formal structure of the poem itself. As Brooks puts it, "[W]hatever statement we may seize upon as incorporating the 'meaning' of the poem, immediately the imagery and rhythm seem to set up tensions with it, warping and twisting it, qualifying and revising it." This process is the indispensable structural principle from which the meaning of a poem derives. For Brooks, a poem is never a clear-cut scientific proposition. It is a structure of "gestures and attitudes" that constitutes an autonomous poetic universe. These ideas draw on the poetry and poetics of *modernism. T. S. Eliot describes a poem as "heterogeneity compelled into unity," suggesting a process similar to Brooks's "warping and twisting." The final lines of Archibald MacLeish's "Ars Poetica" (1926) are "A poem should not mean / But be."

Brooks writes in The Well Wrought Urn that a poem resembles drama: "the poem does not merely eventuate in a logical conclusion. . . . It is 'proved' as a dramatic conclusion is proved: by its ability to resolve the conflicts which have been accepted as the données of the drama." Thus, a poem has a meaning because a dramatization of experience is enacted structurally within the poem: tensions are set in motion; elements are played against one another; conflicts are embodied in metrical patterns and figurative lang. Through this process of internal dynamism, putting in motion *irony, *ambiguity, and *paradox, Brooks argues, a poem creates meaning.

The heresy of paraphrase, with its implications about the implicit inner coherence of a poem, was an influential contribution to the formalist analysis of poetry. Situating *New Criticism within intellectual hist., Herbert argues that 19th-c. scientific thought (Charles Darwin, Karl Pearson, Herbert Spencer) and 20th-c. aesthetics and ling. (Benedetto Croce and Ferdinand de Saussure) generated key ideas about coherence that received their fullest explication for lit. crit. in Brooks and Robert Penn Warren's Understanding Poetry (1938). In a different historicizing analysis, Jancovich points out that Brooks's *formalism, his stress on the internal workings of a poem, moves away from the more socially rooted values of the first-generation New Critics John Crowe Ransom and Allen Tate, who celebrated what they saw as the organic communities of preindustrial agricultural societies.

PARENTHESIS (Gr., "to put in beside"). In Eng., parenthesis has two meanings: a rhetorical figure that inserts a word, phrase, or sentence into a sentence already complete in itself; and the rounded brackets (sometimes called "half moons") used to mark that insertion. The figure dates from antiquity, while the graphic signs that enclose the figure were first used by humanist writers in the late 14th c. (Lennard). Reflecting its etymology, parenthesis is usually defined by its status within a larger, more important unit of discourse. The content of the figure varies, but a parenthesis commonly inserts speech attributions, sententiae, relative and conditional clauses, or figurative comparisons. The contents of a parenthesis may or may not relate to the subject of the larger sentence, which retains its sense with or without the parenthetical insertion. Definitions of parenthesis from the cl. period forward emphasize its structural independence from the host sentence, insisting that its removal would leave a "whole," "full," or "entire" sentence behind. Thus, in parenthesis we see the operations of not only a spatial logic (it is "in between") but a temporal logic (it is a belated addition to an already complete text, an addition that may be subsequently removed). As this formulation suggests, definitions of parenthesis tend to be self-instantiating, using the figure to exemplify its own status as unnecessary interruption.

Cl., early mod., and neoclassical rhetorical handbooks often conclude their definitions of parenthesis with a warning; as Pierre Fontanier explains, "[B]y the very fact that [parentheses] interrupt the discourse and draw attention away from its principal object, they tend to produce encumbrance, obscurity, and confusion" (Les Figures autres que les tropes, 1827). A parenthesis distracts the reader from the text's primary idea or narrative, and if it goes on too long without a return to that primary subject, it may confound meaning. Because the figure disrupts syntactical flow and may even fragment the narrative line, uses of parenthesis often belie definitions that insist on its accessory function within the sentence. A passage from Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1590, 1593) indicates the tension between definition and use: "He, swelling in their humbleness (like a bubble swollen up with a small breath, broken with a great), forgetting (or not knowing) humanity, caused their heads to be struck off." The removal of these parentheses would leave the sentence grammatically intact, yet its meaning would be substantively altered. As in this instance, literary uses of parenthesis often disturb distinctions between necessary and expendable textual matter. The figure instantiates what Derrida describes in Of Grammatology as the conundrum of the supplement: it adds an inessential piece of text to something already complete, yet the very presence of the figure exposes a lack in what was supposed to be complete in itself.

PARNASSIANISM. The Parnassiens (in Eng., Parnassians) were a loose cohort of Fr. poets born from 1840 to 1850 who were influenced by Théophile Gautier (1811–72) and gravitated around Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle (1818–94). They treated a number of themes taken from hist., science, philosophy, nature, or contemp. life according to an aesthetic of unsentimental craftsmanship. They were generally classicist in outlook, used traditional verse forms, and regarded the cult of poetry as a religion. Le prémier Parnasse contemporain (1866) was followed by other recueils in 1871 and 1876, but the works of Parnassians covered the period from 1865 to the end of the century, representing an important trend in Fr. poetry between the romantics and the symbolists. Parnassianism had an international reach, influencing the Sp. Am. modernismo* of Rubén Darío and his contemporaries as well as several Eur. poetry movements predicated on *symbolism, *aestheticism, and *decadence, and serving as an often negative point of reference for many 20th-c. modernists in the U.S., Brazil, and elsewhere.

The movement was initiated by Catulle Mendès (1841–1909) and L.-X. de Ricard (1843–1911) in the early 1860s, when the Parnassians first met in Lemerre's bookshop and in the salon of the Marquise de Ricard; later they gathered in the salon of Mme. Leconte de Lisle, whose formidable husband was regarded as a kind of oracle. Of the 50 or more poets called Parnassians only a few can be mentioned here. Among the more independent, Albert Glatigny (1839–73) was a wit and virtuoso who took his cue from Théodore de Banville (1823–1891). F.R.A. Sully-Prudhomme (1839–1907) explored the secrets of the inner life in verses as poignant as Heinrich Heine's but without Heine's bitterness. He wrote philosophic poems using a delicate imagery drawn from the natural sciences. François Coppée (1842–1908) described the life and problems of humble folk and, like Sully-Prudhomme, was sensitive to the writer's moral responsibilities. The followers of Leconte de Lisle respected traditional morals but worshipped Art. Gautier as well as Banville remained a potent influence. Léon Dierx (1838–1912) wrote tragic poems on historical themes and struck a note of despair. Jean Lahor (1840–1909) exhaled his melancholy in Buddhistic verses. J.-M. de Heredia (1842–1905) drew inspiration from the Gr. myths, from the epigrams of the Greek Anthology, and from the Lat. poets. He was something of a scholar and paleographer but above all a finished artist. Most of his Trophées (1895) are *sonnets, and he is one of the outstanding sonneteers of late 19th-c. France. Anatole France (1844–1924) was more independent: although a versatile neo-Hellenist, he was also, in his Poèmes dorés, an able nature poet. Jules Lemaître (1853–1914), the critic and literary historian, was a conteur and poet who achieved formal eloquence.

Though some of them underwent the influence of Louis-Nicolas Ménard (1822–1901), the Parnassians were not primarily Hellenists, nor were they as a whole impassive or impersonal. If they had anything in common, it was a love of precision, a devotion to formal beauty and the cult of *rhyme, and, beyond that, "un romantisme assagi et mitigé" (Henri Peyre), which left a mark on such great poets as Stéphane Mallarmé and Paul Verlaine and, to a lesser extent, on a few figures of the following generation such as Paul Valéry in his Album de vers anciens. In England, the work of Banville and others inspired a vogue for Fr. fixed forms such as the *villanelle, *sestina, and *triolet.

PARODY. Derived from the Gr. roots para (alongside, counter) and odos (song), parody as a form of ironic *imitation has been with us since ancient times. It changes with the culture, however, so no transhistorical definition is possible: its forms, its relations to the parodied text, and its intentions are not the same in North America today as they were in 18th-c. England or Aristotle's Greece. Theories of parody have changed along with the form's aesthetic manifestations, but two major views have emerged, both derived, though in different ways, from the word's etymology. In the age of Alexander Pope and John Dryden, e.g., parody was seen as a "countersong"—a biting, often satiric, imitation intended to wittily "counter" (i.e., to mock or ridicule) what really was an intended "target." In our mod. and postmod. times, parody has come to mean more of an intimate "song beside"—an ironic but not necessarily disrespectful revisiting and recontextualizing of an earlier work.

In formal terms, parody is a doubled structure, incorporating backgrounded aspects of the parodied text of the past into the foreground of its present self. The two texts neither merge nor cancel each other out; they work together, while remaining distinct. From either of its historically defined perspectives, parody involves opposition or contrast: it is a form of repetition with ironic critical difference, marking difference rather than similarity (Gilman 1974, 1976; Hutcheon). Therein lies the difference between parody and *pastiche. Though both are forms of acknowledged borrowing (and in that acknowledging, they differ from the hoax, the plagiarism, or the forgery), pastiche does not aim at ironic inversion leading to difference. Neither does *allusion or quotation in itself, though both can be used ironically. To continue with distinctions, both burlesque and travesty by definition involve ridiculing humor, but parody does not necessarily—neither now nor in its cl. uses (Householder). It can range in its tones and moods from the seriously respectful to the playful to the scathingly critical because that is the range of *irony, its major rhetorical strategy.

But it is parody's defining critical distance that has always permitted *satire to be so effectively deployed through parodic textual forms. From Catullus to Wendy Cope, satirists have used and continue to use the pointed and effective doubling of parody's textual voices as a vehicle to unmask the duplicities of human society. Pope's *mock epics The Rape of the Lock and The Dunciad, the latter with its ironic use of Virgil's Eclogues, stand as fine examples of the complexity of the interrelationship of parody and satire: the mock epic did not mock the epic but satirized the pretensions of the contemporary as set against the ideal norms implied by the parodied text or set of conventions. This is not to say that the literary forms themselves could not be critiqued: John Milton's Paradise Lost uses epic conventions but also critically parodies those conventions and the whole cl. heroic ethos, by consistently associating them with Satan and his legions; and Chaucer's "The Tale of Sir Thopas" ridicules the clichés of med. verse romance.

A form of what has been called *intertextuality (Kristeva, Genette) or interart discourse, parody can also involve a self-reflexive (Rose 1979) and critical act of reassessment and acclimatization. But there is often a tension between the potentially conservative effect of repetition and the potentially revolutionary impact of difference. These contradictory ideological implications of parody took center stage in the postmod. 1980s and the years after, in both the lit. itself and the critical theorizing. And yet despite the complicity that postmod. parody implied, it was the more critical dimension that would come to dominate because of changes in political contexts. Parody's echoing repetition has always implicitly contested romantic concepts of creative *originality and singularity, as well as capitalist notions of individual ownership and copyright, but it clearly was seen to challenge (or, more accurately, to be used to challenge) many other dominant political positions. Parody came to be reinterpreted through what Rich called women's "re-visioning," a looking back with new eyes on a literary trad. dominated by male perspectives and a subsequent rewriting of it in a differently gendered key. This echoing contestation was mirrored in what Gates and others historicized as Af. Am. *"signifying"—another kind of double-voiced repetition and inversion, but this time one that responds to both dominant and vernacular discourses. Postcolonial crit.'s focus on how formerly colonized writers could "write back" to empire through critically rewriting or even (in Bhabha's refigured sense of the word) mimicking its canonical texts coincided with the work of indigenous writers in the Americas to adapt dominant discourses to create new and highly critical hybrid forms (Powell). Queer writing and theory politicized Sontag's notion of "camp" to make ironic repetition the device of choice for challenging homophobia.

In short, whatever the political contestation, parody proved a useful rhetorical strategy, a counter-discourse (Terdiman), to confront the past and potentially to move beyond it. For example, Thylias Moss's various parodies that recode poems racially ("Interpretation of a Poem by Frost" or "A Reconsideration of the Blackbird") are typical of all these manifestations, in both theory and practice, in that the parodies' situation in the world, so to speak, becomes the focus of attention: the time and the place, the ideological frame of reference, the personal and social context—not only of parodist but also of readers of the work. What has also become clear through this new politicized context, however, is that parody is fundamentally ambivalent or paradoxical; it is doubled and divided because of that defining mix of repetition and difference. If it is transgressive, it is only as a form of authorized transgression, like Bakhtin's carnivalesque (1973). It cannot help inscribing and granting authority to what it parodies, even if it aims to challenge it. Parody enacts both continuity and change.

That unavoidable ambivalence may help explain why, depending on the time and place, parody has been either prized or derided, called both noble and vile. On the negative end of the evaluation scale, it has been called parasitic and derivative, esp. within a romantic aesthetic. With the inauguration of copyright laws came defamation suits against parodists. Yet, early in the 20th c., the *Russian formalists prized works like Lord Byron's Don Juan because their parodic form coincided with their own theory of the essential conventionality of literary form and the role of parody in its denuding or laying bare (Erlich). Read in contexts ranging from T. S. Eliot's valorizing of what he called the historical sense to Bakhtin's privileging of dialogism or double voicing, parody has been welcomed as a form of textual appropriation that self-reflexively foregrounds both the formal and the ideological dimensions of lit. It has become one mode of coming to terms with the texts of that rich and, for some, intimidating legacy of the past (Bate), offering a model, however ironized, for the process of transfer and reorganization of that past—whether such recycling be of literary conventions or individual works.

Parodies must be recognized as double-voiced discourses in order for their ironic inversion to function; if they are not, they will simply be naturalized and their doubling ignored. That is why some parodists resort to overtly revealing titles: Anthony Hecht's famous ironic take on Matthew Arnold is dubbed "The Dover Bitch"; P. B. Shelley's parody of William Wordsworth is titled "Peter Bell the Third," while William Maginn's of S. T. Coleridge is called "The Rime of the Auncient Waggonere." For parody to be recognized and interpreted, there must be (cultural, ling., literary) codes shared between the encoder and the decoder, the parodist and the reader, or the structural superimposition of texts will be missed. The potential for elitism inherent in the need for shared codes has been frequently pointed out, but less attention has been paid to the didactic value of parody in teaching or in positively co-opting the art of the past by textual incorporation and ironic commentary. Forrest-Thomson has argued that the mod. poet manages to mediate between the ling. codes we normally recognize and use and those that emerge from an assimilation and transformation of those codes. Parodic poetry in particular can function overtly as this kind of link. Parody is a way to preserve continuity in discontinuity—without the Bloomian anxiety of *influence.

PAROEMIAC (Gr., "proverbial"). In cl. prosody, the term for an anapaestic dimeter catalectic, common in *proverbs and popular expressions: it has the metrical form ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – – and was used in series as a march rhythm and as a close to anapestic systems. It finds related use in the cantica of Plautus (see canticum and diverbium) and was used later as a stichic line by med. Lat. poets such as Boethius.

PARONOMASIA (Gr., occasionally in Lat. [pure Lat. agnominatio], Eng. from 1577, OED). Wordplay based on like-sounding words, e.g., a pun. In rhet., often one type of pun only, as against, e.g., antanaclasis (Lanham). Pun, a later word (from 1644, OED), has come to include earlier rhetorical figures for wordplay (Spitzer).

Rhetoricians from Aristotle onward are mostly cautious about paronomasia, chiefly about its overuse, while noting its effectiveness when used appropriately (Rhetorica ad Herennium, early 1st c. bce; Geoffrey of Vinsauf, Poetria nova, ca. 1210). Some stress its low status (Henry Peacham, The Garden of Eloquence, 1593; Ben Jonson, Timber, 1641; César Chesneau Dumarsais, Traité des tropes, 1730). Overuse is a question of competence, but status is simply a question of *taste and fashion, which may vary from one era to another. From cl. through med. to Ren. writing, the functions of paronomasia were not confined to comic, let alone trivial, purposes. But 18th-c. neoclassical writers disliked it (Joseph Addison, Spectator no. 61, 1711, where it is called "false wit"; Alexander Pope, Peri Bathous [Bathos], 1727). Poets in the 19th c. made little use of paronomasia compared with their 17th-c. predecessors, though some enjoyed it in prose writing (S. T. Coleridge, Charles Lamb). Among major poets, Emily Dickinson and G. M. Hopkins are exceptions. In general, the 19th c. assigned it to comic verse (Thomas Hood, Lewis Carroll, Edward Lear, W. S. Gilbert). Modernist poets (e.g., T. S. Eliot, Wallace Stevens) used paronomasia for serious effects, reviving the concept of serio ludere. But it is still a question whether paronomasia has regained its earlier status as a figure, lost when 18th-c. rhet. downgraded the pun.

Paronomasia may occur in all types of poetry, from comic to sublime. The Heb. Bible uses it (Moses means both one "drawn out" of the water [Heb. mosheh] and one who "draws out" Israel from bondage [Heb. mashah]; Marks); so does the Christian Bible (Jesus puns on the name Peter and petra, rock, Matt. 16:18). Cl. Gr. writers enjoyed it (Stanford), as did some Lat. writers, such as Virgil (Ahl, Spence). Augustine records the delight of contemp. North African congregations in hilaritas, incl. wordplay (Brown). Shakespeare is fertile in the deployment of paronomasia for both comic and serious effects. Mercutio's dying pun is well known: tomorrow he will be "a grave man" (Romeo and Juliet 3.1.98); Hamlet puns on "sun" and "son" (Hamlet 1.2.64 and 67), a pun sometimes extended to Christ, as in George Herbert's "The Son." John Milton puns in the first line of Paradise Lost on "fruit" of a tree and "fruit" as result. *Limericks delight in outrageous witty puns.

Paronomasia runs from piano to forte effects. Edmund Spenser's is quiet and often builds slowly, as does the paronomasia in poetry by Herbert through Elizabeth Bishop and beyond. John Donne's likes to display itself ("A Hymn to God the Father," 1633: "done" and "Donne").

In the analysis of puns, the most familiar division is between homophonic puns (like-sounding, as in "done" and "Donne") and homonymic or semantic puns (different meanings in one word, as in railroad "ties" and "ties" of the heart in Bishop's "Chemin de Fer"). In poetry, it is useful to distinguish paronomasia as a *scheme and paronomasia as a *trope. A simple homophonic pun without further reverberation beyond sheer pleasure would be classified as a scheme (Hood's "Faithless Sally Brown": "They went and told the sexton / And the sexton tolled the bell.") But puns can move toward trope, when they begin to generate fables about themselves (Fried), as seen with Virgil or Stevens above.

Multilingual puns also flourished over the centuries, esp. when Lat. was commonly known. Ludovico Ariosto used an ancient one, newly rediscovered, in his hippogryph or horse-griffin (gryphus puns on the griffin and a type of playful riddle, griphos, a pun that Carroll also used for his Gryphon in Alice in Wonderland [Cook 2006]). James Joyce's Finnegans Wake is rich in such puns, and the art is not lost in poetry: witness Stevens's brilliant paronomasia on "selvages / salvages" in "Esthétique du Mal," sect. 5, echoing Dante's selva oscura and Eliot's "The Dry Salvages."

Most paronomasia in poetry is verbal, but visual puns are possible, as in James Merrill's "The owlet umlaut peeps and hoots / Above the open vowel" ("Lost in Translation") or Tony Harrison's "blank printer's ems" that duly appear in the next line, resulting in a justified right margin ("Self-Justification"). So are oral puns, as in "Crows in Winter" by Anthony Hecht: "the wind, a voiceless thorn" (punning on the OE letter thorn, the unvoiced th).

A few words have a hist. of paronomasia in poetry and invite special attention, e.g., turn, leaves, room. Turn is the root meaning of Gr. trope and may also refer to the turning of the end of a poetic line (cf. Fr. verser). Seamus Heaney, following an old trad., extends this to the lines made by a ploughman (Preoccupations). Leaves is a longstanding trope for the souls of the dead, from Homer through Virgil, Milton, P. B. Shelley, Stevens, and others; a pun on the Eng. verb leave is a given. Stanza means "room."

As with *riddle and *charm, the pun is associated with very early writing. Possibly it gave birth to Western writing itself in the Sumerian alphabet of pre-3000 BCE Mesopotamia, to follow Jared Diamond in Guns, Germs and Steel (1997): ti as "life" and as "arrow." As Frye says, "Paronomasia is one of the essential elements of verbal creation."

PARTIMEN (also joc partit, Fr. jeu parti). In Occitan, a specialized variety of *tenso in which one poet proposes two hypothetical situations (e.g., whether it is better to love a lady who does not love you or to be loved by a lady whom you do not love). The second poet chooses and defends one of these alternatives, while the first poet upholds the other. After each has had his say in the same number of stanzas (usually three), all identical in structure, the poets commonly refer the debate to one or more arbiters for settlement. There are also partimens involving three poets and three choices, but these are far less frequent. It seems certain that these partimens really represent the cooperative work of two or more poets; but in view of the difficulties involved, it is unlikely that they were actually improvised, as they purport to be. Sometimes it is even clear from the poem itself that the poets were writing back and forth over a considerable distance.

PASTICHE. Describes a work of art that imitates the style, gestures, or forms of an older work or antique model. As a formal descriptor of literary works, the word pastiche dates back centuries; as an evaluative term, its usage gradually acquired a hint of negative or dismissive connotation. The word implies a lack of *originality or coherence, an imitative jumble. It was only in the latter half of the 20th c.—and most esp. in the context of theories of postmod. narrative—that pastiche acquired its current critical purchase.

While the term is almost unthinkable today outside the umbrella of *postmodernism, its etymological root is instructive. Pastiche comes from pasticcio, the It. word for a hodge-podge of a pie containing both meat and pasta. The food analogy offers a useful image for conceiving of pastiche as both an artistic form and compositional technique. Like its close cousins *collage and *parody, pastiche involves mixing available elements into a new pie. A pastiche uses recognizable ingredients but offers no new substance.

It was precisely this resolute—even mechanical—referentiality and copy that marked pastiche as a signature mode of postmodernism. Jameson identifies pastiche as a "well-nigh universal" discursive practice of late capitalism. In this account, the ascendance of pastiche seems inevitable and is best understood through its new distinction from the term parody. All lang. having been flattened out into a kind of Orwellian media-speak, Jameson writes, "pastiche is, like parody, the imitation of a peculiar or unique, idiosyncratic style, the wearing of a linguistic mask, speech in a dead language. But it is a neutral practice of such mimicry, without any of parody's ulterior motives, amputated of the satiric impulse, devoid of laughter and of any conviction that alongside the abnormal tongue you have momentarily borrowed, some healthy linguistic normality still exists. Pastiche is thus blank parody."

In postwar poetry, a key early example of deliberate, systematic pastiche is W. H. Auden's long poem The Age of Anxiety: A Baroque Eclogue (1947). The subtitle already names the style (*baroque) and genre (*eclogue) that the poem will combine and replicate. But in Auden's adoption of an OE alliterative line, one hears most clearly how pastiche—at times a pastiche of Auden's own distinctive 1930s voice—drives this poem. One radio news report, e.g., applies the sonic imperative of alliterative verse to callow, euphemistic wartime media-speak: "Now the news. Night raids on / Five cities. Fires started."

Edward Dorn's Gunslinger (1968–75) offers a powerful later example of poetic pastiche. This pop epic centers on the western United States—or rather, on the Technicolor version of it. Thus, the very landscape, as much as the discursive modes of the poem, is a replication of a mediated replication. In Perloff's introductory description of Gunslinger, Dorn's work provides a "poetic Sourcebook on postmodern discourses—the discourses of atomic science and cybernetics, pop song and media-speak, Heideggerianism and high finance"; further, Gunslinger is a definitive late 20th-c. "parapoem . . . with its amalgam of 'theory' and lyric, of prose narrative and sound-text, and especially of citation embedded in or superimposed on the speech of a particular self." Pastiche here, preeminent among those "postmodern discourses," has become an accomplishment rather than a symptom—an achievement rather than a deflated imitation. To this point, the buoyancy of Kenneth Koch's imitations of other poets offers perhaps the preeminent example of pastiche positively constructed—as deliberate, witty homage or playful imitation.

PASTORAL

I. Ancient
II. Modern

I. Ancient. Ancient pastorals are poems in *hexameters, either dramatic in form or with minimal narrative framing, in which fictional herdsmen sing songs to one another or to an absent beloved, in a stylized natural setting. The poems are short, typically less than 150 lines long, and plot and character devel. are minimal: pastoral's major innovation is to make the performance of an internal poetic event—the pastoral song—and the fictional world in which this performance takes place—a locus amoenus, or peaceful rural location with flowing water and shady trees—the chief attractions of a literary genre.

Models for the centrality of performance and the herdsman as a poetic subject can be found in earlier lit.: the songs of the fictional bard Demodocus and the pastoral life of the Cyclops in Homer's Odyssey are esp. important. However, pastoral owes its existence as a genre to Theocritus, a Sicilian Greek of the early 3d c. BCE who synthesized these elements of Panhellenic literary *myth with mythical and performance trads. of his native country, making the legendary herdsman Daphnis the prototypical pastoral singer and adapting the mime trad. known to us through the fragments of the Syracusan Sophron (late 5th to early 4th c. BCE) to his own poetic purposes.

The fictional world Theocritus fashioned from these diverse materials is highly resistant to epistemological reduction: mythical trads. are blatantly contradicted, mimetic and mythical registers are superimposed, and characters with the same name do not resemble one another from one poem to the next. The herdsmen speak hexameters, but in a Doric dialect—a strange conflation of rusticity and heroic *epic—and there is no attempt to distinguish metrically between the spoken and sung portions of the poems (unlike in, e.g., Edmund Spenser's Shepheardes Calender). The unifying *trope is the pastoral singer's self-identification with an imagined predecessor: a would-be herdsman-singer proves his mastery by merging with his own archetype in performance (Idyll 1, 5, 7) or fails conspicuously in his attempt to do so (Idyll 3).

*Imitation of Theocritus began early, and the collections of Gr. pastoral poetry that have survived contain spurious poems that expand the genre's formal and characterological range: the songs of Idyll 8 are set off as elegiacs, Idyll 21 is about fishermen, and the consummated teen romance of Idyll 27 contrasts with the unrequited desire that defines the Theocritean lover. More ambitious devels. can be seen in two poems that marry the setting of Theocritean pastoral with Near Eastern *lament trads.: the "Lament for Adonis" of Bion (probably late 2d c. BCE) and the "Lament for Bion," erroneously ascribed to Moschus (mid-2d c. BCE). The former is distinguished by an affective intensity, particularly in its use of *pathetic fallacy, alien to Theocritus; the latter portrays a historical poet lamented by his own characters, boldly foregrounding the possibility that the poet might include himself within his pastoral fiction that is merely hinted at in Theocritus's Idyll 7.

The supreme achievement of ancient pastoral and the one that ensured the genre's survival in later Eur. lit. is Virgil's Eclogues (between 42 and 35 BCE). Virgil had no literary dialects to play with, and what distinguishes his herdsmen as speakers and singers is an exquisitely wrought *diction that exploits all the resources of Lat. phonology, word order, and verbal *rhythm to create a richly textured art lang., inviting recognition as the first great achievement of an ambitious young poet. Virgil himself moves in and out of his collection as he merges with and withdraws from his fictional singers: in Eclogue 5 and 9, Menalcas is closely identified with the authorial voice, while the narrator of Eclogue 6 cites words of Apollo that refer to him as Tityrus, an identification of poet and character that gains additional credence from the argument of Virgil's 4th-c. commentator Servius, that Tityrus represents the poet in Eclogue 1 because he too had his land saved from appropriation by military veterans through the intervention of a powerful figure at Rome.

No single identification of poet and character can be easily maintained over the entirety of the Eclogues. However, the possibility of such an identification, which is adopted intermittently as an interpretive possibility by ancient commentators on Theocritus's Idylls, in Virgil's book becomes pastoral's founding fiction: authorial self-disguising is what allows the pastoral world to be recognized as contemp. hist. in herdsman's clothing. Conversely, as the Idylls stage the emergence of consolatory forms of fictional self-projection, the Eclogues show how such self-projection is constrained by historical circumstance. The songs of the Eclogues are sung in a cultural landscape, and the transactions of pastoral identity that occur in them are subject to cancellation from without.

The Eclogues of Calpurnius Siculus (mid-1st c. CE) make the conditions of pastoral dependence an occasion of praise for the Emperor Nero. Reading Virgil's Tityrus as a figure of poetic gratitude, Calpurnius presents himself as Corydon, a cowherd who has seen the wonders of Rome and returned to proclaim a new Golden Age to his fellow herdsmen. Calpurnius dispenses with the ambiguities of Virgil's identifications, using a single herdsman to develop a sustained vision of poetry's dependence on imperial *patronage, and of the pastoral fiction in which this dependency is figured. Calpurnius is a master of court pastoral; the same cannot be said of the author of the two Einsiedeln Eclogues, named after the Swiss monastery in which their ms. was discovered: even in their incomplete state, the turgidity of their poetic lang. and the poverty of invention with which they attempt to emulate Calpurnius's courtly dramas are painfully apparent.

The final flowers of the ancient pastoral trad. are the four Eclogues of the 3d-c. Carthaginian Nemesianus, the last of which provided the epigraph to Ezra Pound's Hugh Selwyn Mauberley. Nemesianus evinces no interest in the metapoetic potential of the herdsman-singer, fashioning instead a sequence of brief *bucolic dramas that, while classicizing in their lang., are innovative in landscape and character. Eclogue 2 is particularly noteworthy: two adolescent shepherd boys recall the intensity of the desire that led them to rape a young girl as she was gathering flowers in the countryside. In its mixture of erotic violence, mythic depth, and social realism, the poem points to the continuing vitality of the genre of which Nemesianus's Eclogues are our last ancient example.

II. Modern. From the Ren. to *romanticism, Europe and its overseas territories hosted a great flowering of pastoral lit., accompanied by ubiquitous representations of idyllic *nature in the visual arts and music. Propelled by humanism and increasing secularization, mod. pastorals rehearse the *kind's signature themes of natural harmony, love, friendship, virtue, and poetry itself, using a coded set of names, locales, and poetic commonplaces associated with ancient literary shepherds. Its predictable artifice notwithstanding, the resilient *convention proved an apt mirror for dramatic changes in early mod. experience—rising nations, growing cities and courts, rural depopulation, religious tensions, territorial expansion, new human encounters—as trans-Atlantic Edens and New Arcadias attest. Naturally capacious in form and subject, mod. pastorals experiment energetically with hybridity and polyphony, recombining inherited materials while reaching into new discursive territories.

In the early 14th c., eclogues modeled on Virgil appear first in Italy, where Dante, Petrarch, and Giovanni Boccaccio prepare the way for more Lat. eclogues by Mateo Boiardo, Baptista Spagnuoli (known as Mantuan), Jacopo Sannazaro, and numerous other Eur. poets. Widespread trans. of Virgil, among them those of Bernardino Pulci in 1482 and Luis de León, ca. 1580, parallel cultivation of vernacular eclogues by leading 16th-c. poets, incl. Garcilaso de la Vega, Fernando de Herrera, Francisco de Figueroa, Luís de Camões, Clément Marot, Pierre de Ronsard, and Edmund Spenser. Some prove enormously influential for the course of *national poetry: Garcilaso's three eclogues (1543) reinvent *lyric lang. in Sp.; Spenser's Shepheardes Calender (1579), composed of 12 eclogues, is often considered the first great Eng. Ren. poem (Kermode). As an umbrella for diverse prosodic and rhetorical types, vernacular eclogues welcome *panegyrics, *poetic contests and disputes, *elegies, laments and quarrels, *songs, *epithalamia, narrative *anecdotes, *satires, and philosophical meditations. Verse on pastoral themes is ubiquitous: virtually every significant early mod. poet (among them John Milton, Luis de Góngora, and Giambattista Marino) uses the mode to treat themes of love and loss, often borrowing *tropes and sentimental postures from *troubadour lyric, Petrarch's Canzoniere, oral lyric and *ballad trads., and rustic vernacular dialects. But the kind makes room for Christian themes, as in Sannazaro's short Lat. epic De partu virginis (On the Virgin Birth, 1526), Luis de León's contemplative vernacular odes, and the mystical Cántico espiritual (Spiritual Canticle, 1584; 1586–91) of St. John of the Cross.

Pastoral dramas offer imaginary rustic diversions to audiences in cities and aristocratic courts, using the kind's stylized settings as backdrop for staging such concerns as the workings of *affect, temperament, passions, virtues, and good government. With precedent in Boccaccio's allegorical Ameto (1341–42), Giambattista Giraldi Cinthio's satyr play Egle (1545), Torquato Tasso's Aminta (1581), and Giovanni Battista Guarini's Il pastor fido (written 1583, pub. 1590) dramatize for court audiences at Ferrara period debates about the nature of virtuous love. A vogue of pastoral-mythological plays (30 in 1580s Italy alone) established pastoral *tragicomedy as a legitimate third dramatic genre along with *comedy and *tragedy and made It. plays models for international imitation. In France, Honorat de Bueil, seigneur de Racan's Les Bergeries (1625) spawned a school of courtly shepherds' plays; John Lyly's Gallathea (1592), George Peele's Arraignment of Paris (1584), John Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess (1610), Ben Jonson's Sad Shepherd (1641), and Allan Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd (1725, in lowland Scots dialect), parallel pastoral scenes in Shakespeare and other Eng. dramatists. In Spain, building on med. trads. (oral lyric, pastorela; see PASTOURELLE, SERRANILLA), early 16th-c. performable eclogues by Gil Vicente, Juan del Encina, and Lucas Fernández treat secular and sacred subjects, perfecting the comic type of the rustic shepherd. Pastoral episodes, courtly and rustic, are common in 17th-c. historical comedies, mythological palace dramas, and autos sacramentales* on eucharistic themes, notably in Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz's Auto del divino Narciso (1590).

Anticipated in Boccaccio's Ameto, the hybrid pastoral romance takes hold in Eur. imagination following publication of Sannazaro's Arcadia (1502, 1504), which frames 12 eclogues in prose narrative, and Jorge de Montemayor's Diana (1559), whose looser alternation of *verse and prose subsequently prevails. Both inspire many imitations, incl. Gaspar Gil Polo's Diana enamorada (1564), Miguel de Cervantes's La Galatea (1585), Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1590, 1593), Félix Lope de Vega's La Arcadia (1598) and the sacred Pastores de Belén (Shepherds of Bethlehem, 1612), and Honoré d'Urfé's L'Astrée (1607–28). In contrast with much ancient and early mod. pastoral verse, these romances accord central roles and the privilege of lyric expression to their female characters. By displacing refined courtiers into edenic settings where they meet savages (as in Montemayor, Cervantes, and Spenser's Faerie Queene, [1590, 1596]), their fictions resonate with experiences of exile (Sephardic diaspora, forced conversions), utopian dreaming, and New World wanderings. Ties to epic, court *masque, early mod. opera, the long mythological poem, and dialogues such as Luis de León's De los nombres de Cristo (The Names of Christ, 1583) bespeak pastoral romance's seminal importance in early mod. generic experiments. Pastoral material (idyllic interludes, poems, dialogues) turns up regularly in Ren. romance (chivalric, Moorish, sentimental, Gr., historical), fostering mergers among those kinds and creating a laboratory for the representation of subjectivity in prose. Though gradually stripped of conventional trappings, pastoral's motifs and sentimental discourses are steadily integrated into the central business of prose fiction, making it a fundamental building block of the mod. novel.

Emphasis on lang. and place makes pastoral a natural home for discussions on the role of vernaculars and lit. in mod. civilizations. The simple, rustic diction that purist decorum assigns to shepherds is redefined as an aesthetic of melodic eloquence, an ethics of truthful speech, and the badge of cultural distinction. Numerous pastoral poets (Dante, Pietro Bembo, Joachim du Bellay, Fernando de Herrera, Cervantes, Sidney) publish defenses of mod. langs. and poetry. Foundational in discourses of nationhood as verbal incarnation of place, cultivated lang. elevates pastoral's historical geographies and precious verbal artifacts to the status of national treasure.

Although courtly pastoral, exhausted by overuse and the extreme stylizations of préciosité* and *rococo, went the way of Europe's absolutist courts and aristocratic estates, the kind's humanistic engagement with philosophical and political questions gave it a long hold on the literary imagination. Antonio de Guevara's double-edged satire and international best seller Menosprecio de corte y alabanza de aldea (Dispraise of the Court and Praise of the Village, 1539) earned centuries of trans., imitations, and adaptations. The mode's strategy, suggestive of its links to neo-Stoic thought, of apparently retreating from the world, then reflecting on it, has made it useful in very diverse contexts. In the face of absolutist and ecclesiastical censorship, as in late 16th-c. Spain, pastoral's affinity for masking, displacement, and *allegory provides a vehicle for political and cultural critiques certain to be suppressed in more direct discourses. Pastoral's interest in the relation of humans to the natural world and to each other accounts for its tendency to surface in contexts like anticonquest discourse (Bartolomé de Las Casas's vision of wolves, sheep, and good shepherds in the Americas), Enlightenment philosophy (Jean-Jacques Rousseau's natural man), and romantic poetry (the "precious boon" of nature that William Wordsworth accused humans of giving away). Giamatti finds ubiquitous earthly paradises in early mod. Eur. epics; New World sagas such as Alonso de Ercilla's Araucana (3 parts: 1569, 1578, 1589) make frequent political use of the same trope and particularly of the feminine voices of pastoral romance.

PASTOURELLE. A genre of med. *lyric poetry most frequently found in OF. In the "classical" type, the narrator, sometimes identified as a knight, recounts his meeting with a shepherdess and his attempt to seduce her. Sometimes he says he was humiliated, even beaten, or the shepherdess made a clever escape; in other poems, he says they made love, either by consent or by force. In the "augmented" pastourelle, a shepherd lover joins the cast (e.g., the girl quarrels with Robin, and the poet takes her away); in the bergerie, the poet recounts his meeting with a group of peasants who dance or quarrel; in the pastoureau, the poet meets a shepherd and talks with him.

The genre originated in Occitan; the Fr. term shows influence of the Occitan word pastorela in the retention of the s and in the treatment of the vowel spelled ou. Following antecedents in med. Lat., among the Romance kharjas*, and in Chinese around the 2d c. CE, the cl. pastourelle appeared in the early 12th c. with the *troubadour Marcabru and was imitated in Occitan, Lat., and Fr. In the 13th c., it flowered in Fr. and continued in Occitan, with a hiatus around mid-century after which it was reintroduced, perhaps under Fr. influence; it was practiced in Lat. until the Carmina Burana (ms. ca. 1230) and was introduced into Ger., It., and Galician-Port. Fourteenth-c. Fr. poets lost interest in the pastourelle, but it inspired the invention of the serranilla* in Sp.; more were written in Ger. and It., and a few in Gascon, Eng., and Welsh. We have 15th-c. pastourelles in Fr., Ger., and Franco-Provençal, and more serranillas in Sp. After the Middle Ages, the pastourelle has been cultivated by poets and folksingers in Fr., Gascon, Catalan, Sp., and Eng.

As a genre, the pastourelle influenced other forms such as the theatrical Jeu de Robin et Marion (ca. 1283) by Adam de la Halle, Mahieu le Poirier's narrative Court d'amours (ca. 1300), and the Dit de la pastoure (1403) by Christine de Pizan. A shepherdess named Pastorella figures in an episode of Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene (6.9–12) that is reminiscent of an augmented pastourelle. In Shakespeare's Tempest, the wooing of Ferdinand and Miranda recalls the cl. pastourelle, and the masque of reapers recalls the bergerie. Molière's Dom Juan seduces two country girls in the med. manner. The shepherdess in the pastourelle is a female character in contrast to the lady sung by the troubadours and the trouvères*; as a representation of a woman who speaks, she relates to women poets such as the trobairitz* in Occitan and the female trouvères in Fr.

PATHETIC FALLACY. A phrase coined by John Ruskin in volume 3, chapter 12 of Modern Painters (1856) to denote an enduring practice in Western lit.: the tendency of poets and painters to imbue the natural world with human feeling. For Ruskin, it becomes an important criterion of artistic excellence. The fallacy, due to "an excited state of the feelings, making us, for the time, more or less irrational," creates "a falseness in all our impressions of external things." The offending example is taken from a poem in Charles Kingsley's novel Alton Locke: "They rowed her in across the rolling foam— / The cruel, crawling foam." Ruskin declares that "the foam is not cruel, neither does it crawl," the author's state of mind being "one in which the reason is unhinged by grief."

For Ruskin, there are two classes of poets, "the Creative (Shakspere [sic], Homer, Dante), and Reflective or Perceptive (Wordsworth, Keats, Tennyson)"; it is one of the faults of the latter group that it admits the pathetic fallacy. But Ruskin was unconcerned with the psychological origins of the pathetic fallacy, and his ideas should not be applied indiscriminately to other lits. B. F. Dick contends that the "origins of the pathetic fallacy probably lie in a primitive homeopathy . . . wherein man regarded himself as part of his natural surroundings." In older lits., the pathetic fallacy does not always have the pejorative implications that Ruskin's definition established. Dick considers the Babylonian Epic of Gilgamesh an early and important source of the pathetic fallacy: in a climactic passage, all of nature weeps for the death of the warrior Enkidu; since Enkidu embodies the ideals of the natural man, nature as the universal parent must reflect the joys and sorrows of her children. Homer, for Ruskin one of the first order of poets, occasionally employs the pathetic fallacy, but he characteristically attributes human feelings to weapons instead of the natural world—a standard convention of the war epic. It is generally agreed that in the Iliad Homer falls prey to Ruskin's censures only once, when the sea rejoices as Poseidon passes overhead in his chariot (13.27–29). Yet even in this case, Homer strictly curtails the passage, avoiding the indulgences Ruskin would later criticize.

Based on various cl. models, the *pastoral elegies of the 16th and 17th cs. provided Eng. poetry with a natural arena for the pathetic fallacy. The early Eng. translators—e.g., Sir William Drummond, who trans. the sonnets of the It. poet Jacopo Sannazaro in 1616—were among the first poets to provide the Eng. trad. with flowers, lilies, and columbine that would bow their heads in sympathetic response to the poet's grief; the pathetic fallacy's earliest appearance is, thus, not the result of native invention but of the preservation of a pastoral convention.

Although he was unconcerned to invent a name for it, Samuel Johnson recognized the phenomenon in the 18th c. and complained 100 years earlier than Ruskin that the phrase "pastoral verse" referred simply to poetry in which, among other things, "the clouds weep." Johnson was reacting to the excesses of *sentimentality in 18th-c. verse, but the device continued to be employed: it appears with varying frequency throughout the work of William Collins, William Cowper, Robert Burns, William Blake, William Wordsworth, P. B. Shelley, John Keats, Alfred, Lord Tennyson, and G. M. Hopkins. Wordsworth, justifying its usage, argued that "objects . . . derive their influence not from properties inherent in them . . . , but from such as are bestowed upon them by the minds of those who are conversant with or affected by these objects." Tennyson, on the other hand, was well schooled in the scientific issues of his day, and his descriptions of natural objects are often clinically precise: after 1842, his verse reveals a markedly less frequent usage of pathetic fallacy (Miles), and In Memoriam offers a striking revision of the device by evoking its essential effect without indulging its excesses ("Calm is the morn without a sound. / Calm as to suit a calmer grief" [11.1–2]).

During the 20th c., the most vigorous applications of the pathetic fallacy have been self-consciously designed to explore the epistemological issues implied by the technique. Mod. usage of the pathetic fallacy ironically emphasizes the loss of communion between the individual and the natural world; and in its implied envy of an older world where such communion once existed, it resurrects yet another remnant of its ancient origin, pastoral nostalgia. Recent attempts to deploy the concept have not advanced the discussion in significant ways; at best, the pathetic fallacy has migrated into more subjective renderings of individual perception that privilege a kind of "middle ground" between the object we perceive and the act of perception itself. Mervyn Sprung argues in his discussion of the pathetic fallacy in After Truth that "to treat outer objects either as possessing nothing but their spatial properties . . . or as naturally possessing all qualities we give them in the everyday . . . is to fail to grasp the symbiosis of the inner and outer." Clearly, Ruskin was not concerned about achieving the "symbiosis of inner and outer"; the central confusion here speaks, among other things, to the overall weariness of the concept in contemp. usage.

PATHOS (Gr., "suffering," "passion"). Evoking an audience's emotions in order to use them as a means of persuasion. In the Rhetoric (1:1356a), Aristotle distinguishes three types of persuasive appeal: ethical (ethos*); emotional (pathos), which depends on putting the audience into a fit state of mind; and logical (logos), which depends on the forms of proof or apparent proof. The orator has to study the emotions to know how to arouse them. Toward that end, Aristotle provides one of the first systematic treatments in the West of emotions and of the types of audience members with which they are associated and, consequently, in which they are most readily aroused. As should be evident, there is a close relation between ethos and pathos, which continued to be exploited in the long trad. of writing "characters"—brief moral-psychological essays usually meant to assist orators with audience analysis (see CHARACTER, THEOPHRASTAN). Too, the study of pathos, as seen in Aristotle and in later writers on religion and "physics," is relevant to discussions not only of the "soul" (psyche) but of medicine; in the latter, the subject became assimilated to the "humors"—mainly physical elements that gave a character or personality type a propensity toward certain behaviors. With the rise of 18th-c. science, the newly established discipline of psychology began drawing to itself these formerly dispersed treatments of the emotions and contributed to the narrowing of the sense of the term pathos to merely the pitiable or sad. This abuse of the original sense of pathos is more properly linked to *sentimentality. The importance of pathos as a means of persuasion—or as it is commonly referred to today, audience appeal—has never diminished in the study of rhet. or in rhetorical approaches to poetry. In the latter study, the traditional link between pathos and the figures of speech—Aristotle, e.g., claims that anger demands *hyperbole (3:1413a)—undergirds such mod. stylistic approaches as reader-response crit. (see READER). The locus classicus of the general link between poetry and pathos remains the Aristotelian theory of *catharsis, but here it is theorized that the arousing of emotions (pity and fear) in the audience of a *tragedy is aimed not so much at persuasion toward an argumentative point as at purgation of the emotions themselves.

PATRONAGE

I. Noble Patronage
II. Subscriptions
III. Printing and the Market
IV. Twentieth- and Twenty-First-Century Patronage

The word patronage entered the Eng. lang. around the end of the 13th c. and was used mainly in the context of the Church, denoting assistance offered to a member of the clergy who sought a living or benefice.

By the 16th c., patron was applied to a person who supported poets and the arts, yet poetic patronage as a cultural concept comes in many guises and is difficult to quantify. Holzknecht, writing about med. forms of patronage, usefully suggests that the phenomena may be understood as "the employment of favor, protection, and influential support to advance the interests of art, limited generally to the habit of subsidizing authors." Nevertheless, while patronage may narrowly be defined as the support of a writer or artist by a benevolent protector, this is not always the case. Holtzknecht notes, therefore, that when monetary wealth is concentrated in small social groups, particular patrons become a necessity but when wealth is widely distributed through society, poetry is generally patronized by the public (as was the case for Pindar and Herodotus, who received gifts from the Athenian people). Poetic patronage more broadly, then, is a social and economic exchange that directly or indirectly works to support or encourage poets and presents different aspects in various historical moments and circumstances. At times, it might manifest itself as personal financial support or subsidy; at others, it can be perceived in more social or institutional encouragements of poetic endeavor. It is intrinsically bound up with questions about the nature and function of poetry in society per se and with the perceived status and social role of the poet.

I. Noble Patronage. The Roman Gaius Cilnius Maecenas (ca. 70–8 BCE), an adviser of the emperor Augustus Caesar before and during his reign, is the archetype of a noble patron. His support of Virgil, Horace, and Propertius was the envy of later poets such as Petrarch, who, at his coronation as poet laureate in 1341, explicitly linked poetic endeavor to national glory and placed himself in a trad. of Roman poets who had "attained to the highest and most illustrious mastery of their art." Patronage, manifested here in prize giving, created the poet as a loyal servant to the state and defined poetry as nationally advantageous: Petrarch, as if to bolster this view, explicitly asserted that he wrote poetry above all for "the honor of the Republic."

It is often difficult to ascertain, however, whether a med. or early mod. poet received assistance or subventions from a patron because of his poetry or for other services. The 14th-c. poet Chaucer is known now as a literary figure, but during his lifetime, he was an esquire of the royal household, controller of customs in London, and clerk of the king's works. He received regular stipends from his court offices, being valued, as Pearsall (1999) notes, for his accounting and secretarial skills, not his poetry. Chaucer's compatriot Thomas Hoccleve, a scribe in the office of the Privy Seal, used his poetic talents to write begging poems to his paymasters but was repeatedly unsuccessful in his quest for patronage, even though he wrote a series of poems that were, in Pearsall's words, "almost 'policy statements' " for the new reign of Henry V. He never received the kind of noble patronage offered to the more successful John Lydgate, who captured Henry's attention before the latter's accession and embarked on a remunerative career as "a Lancastrian poet-propagandist" (Pearsall 1999).

The Maecenian model of a noble patron also brought with it fears about the loss of artistic freedom. Although a noble patron's support of a poet might involve an apparently mutual exchange of benefits or goods, the proffer of such support could engender an expectation in the patron of certain laudatory or politically inflected forms of writing. Nowhere is the ambivalent position of a poet in relation to his patron more apparent than in the work of the It. Ludovico Ariosto, whose famous romance epic Orlando furioso (1516) was dedicated to the Este family of Ferrara. At the same time that the poet wrote entertainments and traveled on diplomatic missions for Cardinal d'Este, his ms. satires expressed dissatisfaction with the patronage system. Imitating the Roman Horace's laments about poetic patronage, he advised prospective poets to "Toss your verses into a privy and your lyre after them, and learn a more acceptable skill if you desire to earn benefices," continuing ominously: "But as soon as you have received them, remember you have lost your precious liberty no less than if you had gambled it away with dice."

Fears about the loss of liberty continued to haunt more traditional forms of noble patronage, sometimes leading, in the early mod. period, to the representation of patronage as a form of mutual gift giving, rather than a system of reward or payment. This emphasis on the gift is exemplified in Ben Jonson's epigram 84, "To Lucy, Countess of Bedford," which celebrates the countess's promise to send Jonson a haunch of venison. The poem commemorates the promise of a gift, rather than the gift itself, thereby allowing Jonson to praise the countess from a position of semi-equality, unencumbered by gratitude or indebtedness. Moreover, his ten-line *epigram (which is an incomplete *sonnet, comprising two, rather than three, quatrains, and a rhyming *couplet) joins poet and patron together in mutual awareness of a literary joke that celebrates the intelligence of each party and looks forward to the time when Jonson will receive his gift and complete his imperfect poem.

Jonson provides a forceful example of a poet who presented writing as a vocation and who exploited the possibilities not only of ms. circulation but of the medium of print. The 1616 folio edition of his Workes collected his literary production into one volume in a manner that marks a distinctive moment in the hist. of professional writing. Indeed, as Bergeron has noted, the quest for patronage is inseparable from Jonson's emerging vocation of authorship. The printed dedications to his work, such as the epistle to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge that prefaces his play Volpone, reveal a wide-ranging attitude toward patronage and patrons. The Volpone epistle also demonstrates Jonson's advocacy of poetry as a socially beneficial activity: in many ways, he presents himself as poetry's own patron, noting that "the principal end of poesy" is "to inform men in the best reason of living" and forcefully asserting "the impossibility of any man's being the good poet, without first being a good man." Emphasizing the hard-won skill and mature judgment of the learned and socially responsible poet, he excoriates those who in their "manifest ignorance" have adulterated poetry's form, positioning the good poet as of intrinsic value to a well-functioning society.

Jonson was arguably the most successful poet at attracting patronage in early Stuart England. He received commissions to write entertainments from two kings, from a host of noblemen, and from the city of London guilds and trading companies; and he did much to open for later generations the possibility that writing might be a professional choice rather than a rich man's leisure activity. He also exploited a diverse range of patronage opportunities at the same time as he explored the possibilities of the burgeoning market for printed works. Nevertheless, his works, both dramatic and poetic, constantly negotiate between crit. and compliment. Montrose has noted that noble gift-giving in the early mod. period was really "a tacitly coercive" process, and nowhere is this more apparent than in Jonson's career: he fell from royal favor in 1631 after a dispute about artistic precedence with the king's surveyor, Inigo Jones, and ended his life under the partial patronage of the Earl of Newcastle.

Despite the pitfalls attendant on this Maecenan model, the patronage of poets by the nobility continued well into the 18th c. As Kord observes, however, the class distribution of patronage shifted progressively "down the ranks" to the middle and lower classes. The Suffolk-born 18th-c. poet Ann Candler, e.g., spent time in a workhouse and was supported by a local minister who helped increase her readership by promoting her work, while Elizabeth Hands, the wife of a blacksmith, was encouraged to publish her poems by some of the Rugby School's masters and attracted 1,200 subscribers for her 1789 book The Death of Amnon. Increasingly, then, the availability of printed books opened up new avenues for the distribution of poetry at the same time that it helped refashion the poet's social status, audience, and professional identity.

II. Subscriptions. Publication by subscription gained in popularity during the 18th c., bringing to the forefront a new form of literary patronage that, while it involved the nobility, did not rely exclusively on them. The 16th-c. poet George Wither was probably the first to gather subscriptions for a poetry collection and presented this method of funding his publication as a means of freeing himself from the patronage system. Although he eventually did not collect his money, the preface to his Fidelia (1615) noted, "by this means also I shall be beholding to none, but those that love Virtue or Me, and preserve the unequalled happiness of a free spirit." For Wither at least, subscription offered political and artistic freedom.

Publication by subscription in the 18th c. provides clear evidence that patronage models were changing. Christopher Smart's Poems on Several Occasions (1752), e.g., had over 800 subscribers and was dedicated to the Earl of Middlesex but failed to secure the latter's patronage. A year later, the Ir. writer Arthur Murphy observed wryly it was "an indelible Reproach to the Age" that Smart had not "found a Maecenas," adding, "a bookseller is his only friend, and for that bookseller, however liberal, he must toil and drudge." More fortuitously, Robert Burns published 600 copies of his Poems, Chiefly in the Scottish Dialect by subscription in 1786, aided by the Scottish lawyer Robert Aiken, who signed up 145 subscribers and to whom Burns subsequently dedicated his poem "The Cotter's Saturday Night." The work was well received, and within a month, Burns was dining with the noble Lord Daer but was also being courted by professors, editors, and the Edinburgh literati.

Literary patronage, then, was not dying out at the end of the 18th c. but was spreading to the literate middle classes. Middle-class subscribers appreciated the social cachet they gained when their names were printed in subscription lists alongside those of the nobility, but there was also a genuine interest in poetry for its own sake, esp. as advances in printing technology meant that books became more widely available. Indeed, by the 19th c., poetry had begun to participate in the phenomenon of mass-market publication.

III. Printing and the Market. The arrival of printing changed poetry patronage because it facilitated a move from small-scale ms. circulation among friends to the commercial book trade. A growing leisure class and rising literacy rates increased the audience for printed materials, and, by the start of the 19th c., a mass demand developed for works of poetry. Sir Walter Scott's Marmion (1808) sold 2,000 copies in the month after its publication, and Lord Byron became an overnight sensation in 1812 when the first two cantos of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage sold out within two days. His Bride of Abydos (1813) sold 6,000 copies in a month, while his Corsair (1814) set a record when it sold 10,000 copies on the day it was published.

The rise in printing accorded greater influence to publishers, editors, and critics, with The Publishers' Weekly of April 19, 1890, asserting that the publisher was "or ought to be, the Maecenas of the nineteenth century." Some publishers helped poets with royalty agreements and profit-sharing and made use of newspapers to advertise and raise interest in poetry books. Meanwhile, magazines such as Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, the London Magazine, and the North American Review acted as arbiters of public taste, promoting the poetry of P. B. Shelley and John Keats and crit. concerning their work. Similar magazines appeared throughout Europe: in France, e.g., the weekly literary magazine La république des lettres published reviews of poetic works such as Stéphane Mallarmé's "L'Après-midi d'un faune" (April 20, 1876), while La nouvelle revue française, founded in 1908 by André Gide, became, for a time, the country's premier literary jour.

The benefits of literary patronage continued to be discussed as the century progressed, with the Eng. periodical The Academy reporting on October 5, 1901 that "honest and aspiring literature" was made possible by support of the public. Forcefully stating that the patronage of wealthy gentlemen was no longer necessary nor desirable, the paper made it clear that poetry was to be appreciated and patronized by the many, rather than a few.

IV. Twentieth- and Twenty-First-Century Patronage. Twentieth-c. magazines and poetry publishers retained their important influence on the dissemination and promotion of poetry. In 1912, e.g., the Chicago editor and critic Harriet Monroe founded Poetry, a magazine that revolutionized the poetry scene of the U.S. by publishing the modernist experiments of Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot. The magazine garnered a loyal following that included Ruth Lilly, great-grandchild of Eli Lilly, founder of the pharmaceutical firm. In 2002, she bequeathed $100 million to the magazine, turning it into one of the world's richest publications.

In Europe, too, poetry magazines such as France's Action poétique (established in 1950 and one of France's longest-standing poetry jours.) or the United Kingdom's PN Review (a literary jour. edited by the influential scholar Michael Schmidt) provide forums for the publication of new poetry, both national and international, as well as the lively evaluation of more established poets and their works. At the same time, Eur. states have tended, superficially at least, to support poetic endeavor. The UK's Poetry Library on the South Bank in London is funded by the state-backed Arts Council, while, in France, the Académie française, established by Cardinal Richelieu in the 17th c. for the greater glory of the Fr. state and operating under the umbrella of the Institut de France, promotes itself as "un prestigieux mécénat" and distributes thousands of euros in prizes and grants to support literary activities.

Poetry prizes and fellowships have a useful role to play in contemp. poetic patronage, as they provide recognition and validation of a poet's work. Since 1901, the Sweden-based Nobel Prize in Literature has been awarded to numerous poets, incl. W. B. Yeats and Eliot, while the Am. Pulitzer organization has recognized poets since 1918, when a poetry prize was established with the help of the Poetry Society of America. The U. S. Library of Congress instituted the Bollingen Prize in Poetry in 1948; controversially, it was awarded to Pound for his Pisan Cantos in 1949. Later administered by Yale University's Beinecke Library, the prize is now supported by an endowment from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation.

As in the 18th and 19th cs., journalists, professors, and critics still play a role in patronage; but since the mid-20th c. academic programs in creative writing and writers' colonies (such as Yaddo and MacDowell in the U.S.), retreats (such as Cave Canem for Af. Am. poets—see AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY), and workshops have been increasingly important.

Nomination for prizes, fellowships, or even acceptance into a colony often requires a certain amount of patronage, making these institutions both a source of patronage and a function of it. Nevertheless, in the mod. Western world, the old model of a single Maecenas figure has largely disappeared, perhaps supporting Holzknecht's contention that where wealth is distributed widely through society, poetry is patronized by the public. When extraordinary personal acts of patronage do occur, they are directed less at poets and more toward poetry itself as an art form. Nowadays, then, the most overwhelming support for poets and poetry comes not from state grants and charitable funds but from the people who write, read, criticize, and enjoy it.

PATTERN POETRY. See CALLIGRAMME; CONCRETE POETRY; TECHNOPAEGNION; VISUAL POETRY.

PAUSE. The question of pause in poetry is one of unexpected complexity because any answer implies far-reaching assumptions. In general, temporal theories of *meter are amenable to including pause as a structural feature, while stress theories are more likely to relegate pause to *performance. Some 20th-c. descriptions of Old Germanic meter posited a regular pause in alliterative verse (see ALLITERATION), but few current approaches to the older poetry have found a justification for it.

There are essentially three kinds of pause, the first being perhaps a universal feature of poetry across langs., the other two being confined to *accentual-syllabic verse. The first type, the pause that often accompanies a *caesura, is an epiphenomenal element and is not our concern here. It is dependent on word boundaries and syntactic breaks, which may themselves be specified as part of the metrical structure. The question of whether the pause is an element of design or of performance is a matter of debate.

Much clearer are the *beats and offbeats that occur where syllables are missing in template meters. Template meters include accentual-syllabic meters that specify a preexisting, platonic configuration of beats and offbeats. The beats and offbeats are usually realized as accented and unaccented syllables; thus, they figure in langs. like Eng. and Ger., which incorporate accent or stress as an element of the meter. Once a pattern of expectation has been established, a beat or an offbeat can occur even without a syllable. The most salient examples might be those that Attridge calls "virtual beats," as in *limericks, some *nursery rhymes ("Hickory, dickory, dock"), and the ends of even lines in both popular and literary four-beat meters: e.g., the various *ballad meters and the following stanza from Robert Herrick:

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
B B B B

Old time is still a-flying;
B B B [B]

And this same flower that smiles today
B B B B

Tomorrow will be dying.
B B B [B]

The second kind of pause that occurs without a syllable is the offbeat that spaces two consecutive beats, as in this line from P. B. Shelley ("Alastor" 362):

x x / /
Suspended on the sweep of the smooth wave
o o B ô B

There is no syntactic break between "smooth" and "wave," and there may be no silent moment or cessation of vocalization. However, we feel a pulse between the two consecutive stressed syllables, and this we can call with Attridge "an implied offbeat." It is a part of the phonology of Eng. and of other "stress-timed languages" (see ISOCHRONISM OR ISOCHRONY). It is what Selkirk calls "silent demibeat addition."

If the two consecutive stressed syllables happen to occur on either side of a syntactic break, the pulse is even more obvious, although the important point is that this kind of pause does not depend on any particular level of phrase structure (King Lear 4.6.172):

Pull off my boots; harder, harder—so.
o B o B [o] B o B o B

The brackets indicate that the "virtual offbeat" coincides with a syntactic pause.

Clearly, the problems of pause raise questions about the ontology of the line and the locus of existence of the poetic text. If one's view (common among "stressers") is that the "line" of poetry consists entirely of syllables, then the virtual and implied pauses noted here are not part of the line. If one's view is that the "line" of poetry includes temporal elements as well as syllables (common among "timers," some of whom load up the line with musical notation in excess of the limited contexts described here), then the beats and offbeats without syllables, indicated by [B] and ô, respectively, are as much a part of the line as the words "smooth" and "wave."

PAYADA. An Argentinian *song or *ballad, generally anonymous, in simple *meter, sung by popular poets who wandered the pampas. These mod. *troubadours were called payadores, and their improvisations were generally accompanied by the guitar. Its types included vidalitas, cielitos, tristes, and milongas. They began to appear in print in the 18th c. As in the Middle Ages, the payada was most often a poetic debate in the form of questions and answers, known as contrapunto, played before an audience that was both witness and judge. The famous mythical payador Santos Vega, so legend tells us, conquered the Devil in such a contest. The most celebrated payada takes place in the second part of Martín Fierro (The Return, Canto 30, 1879), a long narrative *gaucho poem by José Hernández and one of the masterpieces of Argentinian lit. This competition has highly dramatic overtones, as Martín Fierro is challenged by El Moreno, a man wishing to avenge the murder of his brother. This payada in contrapunto is not an improvisation but an integral episode of the poem (itself highly realistic) wherein the two contestants forget their rustic antecedents and sing of abstract ideas and supernatural themes.

As a sung, improvised poetic text, the payada is also found in other regions. The performances have guitar accompaniment and are often an exchange between payadores. Similar musical debates are the peleja and desafío of Brazil. Hernández compares his payada to a game of cards called truco; both require wit and speed. As a poetic combat, the payada is an expression of manliness, but the "conquest" is of words. The criollismo of the nonstandard, marginalized speech used in the payada is relevant to the sense of national identity as well.

PENITENTIAL PSALMS. Since at least Cassiodorus in the 6th c., Psalms 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, and 143 according to the Masoretic numbering adopted by Protestants (6, 31, 37, 50, 101, 129, and 142 in the Septuagint) have been regarded as a group and recommended to penitents seeking forgiveness. Augustine had these seven psalms placed around his deathbed; in the later Middle Ages, after Innocent III, they became part of the Roman Catholic liturgy during Lent and at funerals. Although Protestants officially rejected their use in the sacrament of Penance, they continued to be popular in devotional practice, and Psalm 51 remains central to the Church of England's Ash Wednesday liturgy. Verse paraphrases of the penitential psalms (Richard Maidstone, ca. 1390–96; Thomas Brampton, ca. 1414) are among the earliest surviving metrical psalms in Eng., perhaps because of the prominence of these psalms in devotional primers (see PSALMS, METRICAL). Even after the Reformation, the general popularity of metrical psalms in worship and devotions ensured the continuing production of versions of the penitential seven. The most famous of these was written by Thomas Wyatt, perhaps during one of his periods of imprisonment in the Tower (1536, 1541). Wyatt's long paraphrase intersperses nonbiblical verse narratives among the seven penitential psalms to create one long poem describing the penitence of King David after his adultery with Bathsheba and his effective murder of her husband Uriah (2 Sam. 11–12). The association of the penitential psalms with David has a long hist., encouraged by the biblical headnote to the central Psalm 51. Wyatt's psalms (pub. 1549) were a relatively free trans. from the It. prose version of the penitential psalms by Pietro Aretino (1534), but Wyatt's choice of terza rima* (not used in Eng. since Chaucer) derived from an It. metrical version by Luigi Alamanni (1532). Metrical versions of the penitential psalms were also produced during the Middle Ages and the Ren. in Fr. (by Christine de Pizan and Jean de La Ceppède), Sp. (by Luis de Léon and Diego Alfonso Velázquez de Velasco), and other Eur. langs.

Among Martin Luther's early works were a trans. and commentary on the penitential psalms, as well as his metrical version of Psalm 130, "Aus tiefer Not." Other Eng. versions were written by Edmund Spenser (not extant), William Hunnis (Seven Sobbes of a Sorrowfull Soule, 1583), and John Davies of Hereford (The Dolefull Dove, 1612). The Eng. verse paraphrase of the Catholic activist Richard Verstegan or Rowlands (1601) was included in Elizabeth Grymeston's Miscelanea (1604), a collection of advice to her children. Apart from Wyatt's, these metrical paraphrases are unaccomplished, written in variations on the popular *ballad meters of the psalms adapted by Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins. However, some sophisticated verse paraphrases were fashioned from particular psalms from the penitential set. George Gascoigne's "Gascoigne's Deprofundis" (Psalm 130) was included in his Posies (1575), and Anne Lock's extended paraphrase of Psalm 51 (A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner, 1560) may be the first *sonnet sequence in Eng. The form and mode of the penitential psalms had an influence beyond strict trans. and paraphrases. Francis Bacon's "Penitential Psalms," dedicated to George Herbert, included seven biblical psalms that were not the traditional seven. George Chapman's "Penitential Psalms" (1612) were a loose verse trans. from the Lat. prose of Petrarch's seven psalm-like but nonbiblical "Penitential Psalms" (ca. 1355). Thomas Campion's Songs of Mourning (1613) for Prince Henry consisted of seven original poems modeled on the seven-part penitential structure, while the seven mournful instrumental pieces of John Dowland's Lachrimae, or Seven Tears (1604) abandoned text altogether. Since the 17th c., poets have shown little interest in the penitential psalms.

PENTAMETER. In cl. prosody, this term should denote a meter of five measures or feet, as its name says, but, in fact, the Gr. pentameter, which is dactylic, does not contain five of any metra (see METRON): it consists of two *hemiepes with an invariable *caesura: – ◡ ◡ – ◡ ◡ – | – ◡ ◡ – ◡ ◡ – . Contraction of the shorts in the first half of the line is common; the second half runs as shown. It is the conventional name for the second verse in the couplet form called the *elegiac distich, though this is probably a hexameter shortened internally. The cl. Gr. and Lat. pentameter should not be confused with the Eng. "iambic pentameter," despite the fact that the Ren. prosodists derived that name from cl. precedent, for the Eng. line had been written in great numbers for two centuries (since Chaucer) before it was given any cl. name, and the internal metrical structures of the two meters are quite distinct—this follows from the deeper and more systematic differences between quantitative and accentual verse-systems (see ACCENTUAL VERSE, METER, QUANTITY). Other terms lacking cl. connotations that were formerly and are sometimes still used for the staple line of Eng. dramatic and narrative verse include *heroic verse and *decasyllable (see BLANK VERSE, HEROIC COUPLET); which term of these three one chooses depends on what genealogy one assumes for the Eng. line (cl., native, romance, mixed) and what features of the line one takes as constitutive—feet, stress count, syllable count, or the latter two, or the latter two as creating the first one (feet). Despite the fact that trochaic tetrameters (see TETRAMETER, RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM) are fairly frequent in Eng., trochaic pentameters are extremely rare—Shakespeare's line "Never, never, never, never, never" (King Lear 5.3.365) notwithstanding; virtually the only sustained example is Robert Browning's "One Word More."

PENTHEMIMER (Gr., "of five halves," i.e., 2½ *feet). In cl. poetry, a *colon of the form x – ⏑ – x, which is the first half of the line in the iambic *trimeter when the main *caesura occurs after the fifth position. The corresponding first half of the dactylic *hexameter with caesura also after the fifth position (– ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ –) is called *hemiepes. In both meters, this caesura after the first half of the third foot is known as penthemimeral, while caesura amid the fourth foot (much rarer) is known as hephthemimeral.

PERFORMANCE (Lat. recitatio; Ger. Vortrag, Rezitation).

I. Theory
II. History
III. Practice

I. Theory. Performance refers to the recitation of poetry by its author, a professional performer, or any other reader either alone or before an audience; the term normally implies the latter. The performance of poetry also entails a setting and a performance style. Though poets naturally seem the most likely performers, from ancient times to at least the Ren., a class of professional performers or singers has usually been available for performance (see JONGLEUR, MINSTREL, SCOP, GUSLAR). The setting for performance may be a literary salon, a ceremonial civic or state occasion, or a quasi-theatrical performance at which a poet, poets, or performers address a public. By extension to electronic audio and visual media, performances also have been disseminated via radio or television broadcasts; phonograph records, audio tapes, or compact disks; and videotapes, DVDs, and films. A distinction should be made here between performances that are live and static recordings thereof: the latter are fixed copies of but a single performance reduced in form and recoded into some machine lang.

It is also essential to distinguish between the performance of a poem and its composition. These two processes may or may not coincide. In the first case, the poetry presented in performance has already been transcribed as a written text, whether ms., scribal copy, or pub. book. This is the condition of nearly all mod., literary poetry: composition has been completed, and the work has passed into *textuality. Here performance and composition are separated in temporal sequence.

In the second case, namely, *oral poetry, no distinction is made between composition and performance: the "text" is spontaneously composed during performance by illiterate *bards. Such a "text" is unique in every performance. Successive recitations by even the same bard may draw upon the same story pattern, but the construction of scenes and selection of verbal details are different in every case; the choice of wording and phrasing is both controlled by, and assists, a stock of relatively fixed *"formulas." These are at once both narrative and metrical building blocks, serving to construct metrical lines and a coherent story. It should be noted that, in historical terms, the second class preceded the first—i.e., orality preceded the invention of writing, print technology, and the spread of literacy (reading). But even in mod. literate cultures where written texts are widely pub., spontaneous composition has reemerged as a species of what Walter Ong terms "secondary orality."

The audience is one of the least understood components of all performative arts: Western poetics has taken virtually no interest in this subject. It is obvious, however, that audiences often bring with them significant sets of expectations about subject, diction, tone, and versification. As William Wordsworth remarked, the poet who would write in a new style must create the audience by which it will be appreciated—or perish. Some audiences are trained, but most are not. Audience comprehension of oral texts is unknown: some verse trads., such as OE, apparently helped auditors recognize meter with musical chords, e.g. In general, it would seem reasonable to assume that audiences cannot quickly process archaisms or unusual words, complex meters or heterometric stanza forms, or distanced rhymes or elaborate sonal interlace. On the other hand, sound patterns are very much obscured by orthography, particularly in a lang. such as Eng. Sound patterning can certainly be recognized as elaborate in performance even when it is not evident how, exactly, the sounds are structured. It is a question just how much of poetic form is perceived in oral transmission.

In one respect, however, audiences have an easier time with the recognition of meaning in oral texts. Seymour Chatman isolates a central difference between the reading and *scansion of poems on the one hand and their performance on the other: in the former two activities, ambiguities of interpretation can be preserved and do not have to be settled one way or the other ("disambiguated"). But in performance, all ambiguities have to be resolved before or during delivery. Since the nature of performance is linear and temporal, sentences can be read aloud only once and must be given a specific intonational pattern. Hence, in performance, the performer is forced to choose between alternative intonational patterns and their associated meanings.

Performance styles are one of the most interesting subjects in *prosody and have direct connections to acting and articulation in the theater. Jakobson has distinguished between "delivery design" and "delivery instance," the former set by verse form, the latter representing the features that are specific to each performance. But between these lies the realm of expressive style. The two general classes of styles are realistic (naturalistic) and oratorical (declamatory, dramatic, rhapsodic, incantatory). C. S. Lewis once identified two types of performers of metrical verse: "minstrels" (who recite in a singsong voice, letting scansion override sense) and "actors" (who give a flamboyantly expressive recitation, ignoring meter altogether). And early in the 20th c., Robert Bridges argued that verses should be scanned in one way but read aloud in another, tilting toward minstrelsy.

The triumph of naturalistic technique in mod. drama has obscured the fact that artificial modes of delivery are well attested in antiquity, as reported by the grammarian Sacerdos (Keil 6.448). The evidence adduced by W. S. Allen for "scanning pronunciation" and the demonstration of Ren. pedagogy by Attridge suggest that the practice of reciting verses aloud in an artificial manner has been more the rule than the exception in the West. E.g., the romantic poets usually chanted their poetic texts when reading aloud, differentiating their lang. from natural speech by moving it closer to music (Perkins). For dramatic verse that is metrical, particularly Shakespeare's, actors learn that attention to scansion will elucidate nuances of meaning in lines that a literal or natural delivery style will not manifest (Hardison). Consequently, great actors learn how to convey both sense and meter together, so that each supports the other.

II. History. In Asian poetry, the trad. of poetry presentation is esp. important in Chinese and Japanese poetry (see CHINA, POETRY OF; JAPAN, POETRY OF) and continues in 20th-c. Japan. Western poetry readings from the Greeks to the 19th c. have mainly favored invitational performances in courtly settings. It is likely that performances of poetry took place at the Alexandrian court of the Ptolemies (ca. 325–30 BCE) and, at Rome, in the aristocratic residences of Gaius Cilnius Maecenas (d. 8 BCE), who encouraged the work of Virgil, Horace, and Propertius. In Petronius's Satyricon, Trimalchio first writes, then recites, his own "poetry" to the guests at his banquet.

The fifth of the five great divisions of cl. rhet.—after inventio (discovery), dispositio (arrangement), elocutio (style), and memoria (memorization)—was pronuntiatio or delivery. This was less developed in antiquity than the first four subjects, though Aristotle discusses it, as do Cicero (De Inventione 1.9) and the Rhetorica ad Herennium (3.9), treating, like most subsequent rhetoricians, voice control and gesture. Quintilian devotes a lengthy chapter to the subject (Institutio oratoria 11.3). The practice of reciting Lat. verses was encouraged by all the med. Lat. grammarians and central to Ren. education (see PRONUNCIATION).

The Occitan *troubadours retained professional performers, joglars, to recite their verses, though the poets of the *Minnesang did not; other itinerant minstrels maintained themselves by recitation throughout the Middle Ages. Written poetry was recited at the 13th-c. court of Frederick II (see SICILIAN SCHOOL), in the Florentine circle of Lorenzo de' Medici (late 15th c.), and in the late 17th-c. salons of the Princes de Condé. In the 18th c., however, the patronage system gave way to one of public consumption of published books, and performance accordingly changed from a courtly to a public function. As a young poet of the late 1770s, J. W. Goethe read his work at the Weimar court; on the occasion of a production of Faust to commemorate his 80th birthday in 1829, he personally coached the actors in the delivery of their lines. The 18th c. also witnessed the emergence of elocution as an important part of the theory of rhet. In the U.S., before the flourishing of printing presses, the typical mode of disseminating poetry was through handwritten ms. and oral performance, increasingly in forums such as clubs and literary circles.

In the 19th c., public recitations by both poets and their admirers became commonplace (see RECITATION). The work of Robert Browning was recited in meetings of the Browning Society (founded 1881), an organization that produced hundreds of offshoots in the U.S. in the 1880s and 1890s. A Goethe Gesellschaft (founded 1885) held readings in places as distant as St. Petersburg and New York. Elocution was even further popularized in the 19th c.; the practice of reading aloud from lit. after dinner in Victorian households was widespread. The work of treasured poets was memorized and declaimed regularly in schools and churches, and some famous late 19th-c. poets, incl. Alfred, Lord Tennyson and a reader believed to be Walt Whitman, were recorded on wax cylinder. Elocution led to the emergence in the 20th c. of "oral interpretation" as a formal activity in Am. university departments of speech.

The performance of poetry is central to symbolist poetics (see SYMBOLISM). Stéphane Mallarmé read his poetry to a select audience on designated Tuesdays at which the poet himself played both host and reader in oracular style. While Mallarmé's poetry was anything but spontaneously written, his performances both personalized and socialized the work. Stefan George's mode of delivery was consciously influenced by Mallarmé: the audience was restricted to the poet's disciples (Kreis), and the occasion was perceived as cultic and sacral. George read from ms. in a strictly rhapsodic style that disciples were required to follow.

In the 20th c., naturalistic or realistic delivery styles gradually have gained the upper hand over a more artificial, vatic performance style. W. B. Yeats was much concerned with having his work sound spontaneous and natural, though his delivery style, like Ezra Pound's, was dramatic and incantatory. By contrast, T. S. Eliot's performances were aristocratic in style and tonally flat. The Wagnerian prescription of having the performer seem spontaneous in expression but personally remote had its best 20th-c. exemplar in Dylan Thomas, whose dramatic, incantatory style contrasted sharply with the plain, conversational style of Robert Frost and W. H. Auden. Frost's "sentence sounds" are the intonational patterns of colloquial speech, esp. as frozen into idioms—precisely the kind of speech effects that would be likely to come across well to audiences on Frost's frequent reading tours.

Politically motivated poetry readings early in the 20th c. served as models for others to come in the second half of the century. In postrevolutionary Russia, Vladimir Mayakovsky sang the praises of the October Revolution in lyrics written to be read aloud; his dramatic performances attracted mass audiences both in western Europe and the U.S. Avant-garde movements of the 1920s and 1930s such as *Dada and *surrealism generated performances of poetry staged simultaneously with music, dance, and film, and so anticipated the intermedia performances later in the century. *Poetry readings of the 1950s and 1960s often took the form of multimedia presentations and random artistic "happenings." Prominent innovators of the poetry performance in the 1950s were the *Beat poets, notably Allen Ginsberg, Gregory Corso, and Lawrence Ferlinghetti, all instrumental figures in the movement now known as the *San Francisco Renaissance. Orality and performance were foregrounded in the poetics of Charles Olson, who conceived of the poem as a "field of action" and made his unit of measure the "breath group." Olson's *"projective verse" found followers in Robert Duncan, Robert Creeley, and Denise Levertov. Af. Caribbean dub poetry, a form that originated in Jamaica in the 1970s where poetry is spoken over reggae rhythms, has been important to a range of diasporic artists, like Linton Kwesi Johnson, who intervene in an evolving cultural politics through performance.

Since 1960, New York, Chicago, and San Francisco have been the major Am. poetry performance centers, with London, Amsterdam, and West Berlin their Eur. counterparts. In New York, the poetry-reading movement of the 1960s generally associated with the name of Paul Blackburn served as a stimulus for a new vogue of poetry readings in other parts of the country, esp. in Chicago and on the West Coast. Further experimentation with elements of recitation, music, song, digitized or synthesized sound, drama, mime, dance, and video, which are mixed, merged, altered, choreographed, or improvised in seriatim, simultaneous, random, or collage order, characterized the phenomena variously called *sound poetry, multimedia, or sometimes "performance art" of the 1970s and 1980s. David Antin called his improvisations "talk poems." Jerome Rothenberg's interest in tribal poetry led to his reconstruction in print of sound poetry along with notation of the ritual contexts that surround it. The anthropologist Dell Hymes, with Rothenberg a proponent of *ethnopoetics, devised a method of transcribing and analyzing folklore and oral narrative that pays attention to poetic structures within speech.

Since the 1950s, then, the performance of poetry in America has undergone a resurgence, becoming a standard element in the practice of poetry in the Eng.-speaking world. Its tone ranges from conversational idioms to street lang. Jazz or rock music, electronic audio and visual effects, and spontaneous dramatic presentations sometimes accompany recitation, esp. outside of universities, where, it has been argued, an aesthetic narrowness prevails (Lazer). The ethos in intermedia events such as these is one of experimentation, liberation, and spontaneity. Like other contemp. literary genres, postmod. poetry maintains a strong interest in performance as a reaction to academic interpretation and its fixation on the text.

Dana Gioia has noted the decline of print culture in the late 20th and 21st cs. and the rise of a new oral poetry, encompassing rap (see HIP-HOP POETICS), *cowboy poetry, and *poetry slams, that recalls poetry's origins in preliterate cultures and is overwhelmingly formalist and populist. While some of the new performance poetry is performed live and subsequently disseminated in traditional print form, other work is delivered to audiences through electronic media, incl. radio, recordings, and television, as in the PBS series The United States of Poetry, HBO's Def Poetry Jam, and MTV's Spoken Word Unplugged. Sound files on the Internet, through such archival sites as UbuWeb and PennSound, enable anyone with access to a computer to hear the voice of mod. and contemp. poets reading aloud from their work. Former U.S. Poet Laureate Robert Pinsky's Internet-based Favorite Poem Project, launched in 1998, includes videos of ordinary Americans reading their favorite poems.

The heritage of all the various forms of postmodernism in America has been a turning away from the autonomy of the text and the presumption that a text presents one determinate meaning (see INDETERMINACY) or its author's intended meaning (see INTENTION) toward the more fluid, less determinate, free play of readerly responses to texts. Hence, critical interest has shifted from written documents to performances as experiences. Many audiences still consider the performance of poetry a communal, nearly sacral event for heightened speech, investing the poet with the transformative powers of the vates*. And many readers and teachers of poetry continue to believe that poetry achieves its body only when given material form, as sound, in the air, aloud. See also BOUTS-RIMÉS, EISTEDDFOD, POETIC CONTESTS.

III. Practice. Discussions of poetic performance from earliest times to the present focus mainly on bards', actors', and poets' oral presentations, rather than the inner performances that precede and shape our vocalizations. But before a person recites a poem, particularly a metrical poem, he or she has already made decisions about which words in the lines invite special emphasis. Largely the decisions are determined by characteristics of the lang. being spoken and the meter, if any, being used: these will lead the reader familiar with the lang. and its poetic forms to observe mid- and end-line pauses and to emphasize particular syllables. But further refinements and judgments are personal.

The notion that there is, or should be, an entirely "correct" performance of any given line is put in doubt when highly regarded scholars insist on differing rhythmic performances of well-known lines from esteemed poets. Every reader/performer of Shakespeare's sonnet 116, which begins "Let me not to the marriage of true minds / Admit impediments," must come to a conclusion about how to respond to and produce that opening line either in mind or out loud. George T. Wright hears the poem opening with the "quiet, confidential tones" he finds characteristic of the sonnet as a whole, so he begins his commentary by suggesting that "Let" is the line's first emphasized word and that while "not" carries the second beat, it is relatively unemphasized: "Let me not." Helen Vendler hears the sonnet's opening differently. Experiencing the poem as a rebuttal of another's claims (the young man's), she feels that "the iambic prosody" brings "the pressure of rhetorical refutation" into the poem's first line, requiring an emphasis on "me": "Let me not."

However much one may insist on the correctness of either performance, each is right in its own way and worthy of consideration. And it is by adding one's own experience with the line to such efforts of judgment that a deeper involvement with Shakespeare's memorable sonnet can be achieved.

Lines in many poems have a variety of linguistically and metrically permissible emphases, but there are instances when established metrical patterns limit the possibilities of alternative performances. E.g., John Donne, in "The Canonization," creates metaphors for his love in five stanzas whose second lines can be felt as four beats, even though the third stanza's second line could be experienced as having three beats ("Call her one, mee an*oth*er flye") or even five beats ("Call her one, mee an*oth*er flye"). However, the performance that gives emphasis to both "her" and "mee" not only satisfies metrical expectation ("Call her one, mee an*oth*er flye") but heightens the sense of the lovers' unity. Likewise, in the same poet's "The Sun Rising," the fifth lines in the poem's three stanzas ("Sawcy pedantique wretch, goe chide," "If her eyes have not blinded thine," and "Thou sunne art halfe as happy'as wee") are easily experienced as having four beats. Although a prose-like performance of the second-stanza line is possible ("If her eyes have not *blind*ed thine"), it is the four-beat performance ("If her eyes have not *blind*ed thine") that both realizes the metrical norm and dramatizes the loved one's eyes whose brightness challenges the sun's.

Performing the various rhythmical possibilities of even the most familiar poems can extend their ranges of implication and meaning. Two quite different notions about the personalities of the speaker in Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" and the landowner whose "house is in the village" can emerge from slightly different choices among the permissible emphases of the poem's third line, "He will not see me stopping here." One likely performance of the line would follow the steady iambic, or offbeat-beat, pattern clearly established at the poem's opening: "He will not see me *stopp*ing here." But on reimagining, and reperforming, a linguistically permissible emphasis on "He" would more strongly evoke a sense of difference that is central to the poem—the difference between a villager who regards his woods as a possession and the poet-speaker who regards them as a place for experiencing things "lovely, dark and deep." And with the new performance taken into account, other words take on new significance: "He will not see me stopping here" becomes more apprehensive, perhaps even threatening, than something like "He will not mind my stopping here." An alternate performance again enlarges possibilities of feeling and the poem's pleasures.

PERIOD

I. Prosody
II. Rhetoric

I. Prosody. In *classical prosody, a term used to refer to (1) any rhythmic sequence that is whole and complete in itself—i.e., capable of constituting an entire poem but also of being used as one element alongside others in some higher-order rhythmic structure or (2) any sequence separated from what precedes and follows by a break in *synapheia—i.e., some sort of pause. Form (1) is thus what mod. metrists would call a verse paragraph or a poetic sequence ending in *closure and seems a much narrower category than (2). The latter includes not only *stanzas and their major subdivisions, in stanzaic verse, but the individual lines in stichic verse (see stichos), as well as sequences such as the *pentameter in the *elegiac distich and a number of even shorter lyric segments that, unlike stichic units such as *hexameter and *trimeter, are never found as isolated, independent poetic utterances. The nature of the pauses to which such breaks in synapheia correspond and the reasons for their distribution within a composition are imperfectly understood: reinforcing closure is obviously one purpose but probably not the only one. Caution in the use and interpretation of the term period is, therefore, in order. Dale distinguishes (1) and (2) as "major" and "minor" periods, Rossi as period and verse. But not all metrists are so careful.

II. Rhetoric. The term was taken over into rhet. from prosody for discussion of prose style. Cicero (Orator 174 ff.) credits Thrasymachus with the introduction of poetic rhythms into prose, Gorgias with the devel. of the figures or schemes, and Isocrates with combining the two, so that a rhetorical period came to have both metrical and schematic form. Aristotle (Rhetoric 3.9) differentiates between "periodic" or "rounded" style and nonperiodic or "continuous," the latter the more sophisticated form. He defines the period in both structural (logical) and rhythmical terms, as a sentence "which has a beginning and end in itself, and a size which can be seen as a whole." Periodic style is pleasing because "the hearer thinks always he has a grip on something, because there is always a sense of completion," and comprehensible "because it is easily remembered; this is because the periodic style has number. . . . The period must be completed also with the sense. . . . The period may be either composed in cola or simple. A sentence in cola is one which is complete, has subdivisions, and is easily pronounced in a breath" (trans. Fowler). The end of the period, thus, completes at once the sense and the metrical figure, but more the former than the latter, apparently; Aristotle recommends marking the beginning and end with a distinct metron such as the paeon, but he discourages extensive use—even the paeon he thinks obtrusive—and none of his examples uses paeons at both ends. Aristotle permits only two *cola per period—this too came from metrics—perhaps because he emphasizes structures of antithesis, but later writers such as Demetrius quite reasonably allow more; and Aristotle allows periods of only one colon, denied by most later writers. The crucial point, however, is that good style is rhythmic and that these rhythms flow either continuously or in periods, segments that are short enough to be perceived as a whole, complete themselves in sense, and are marked rhythmically as distinct segments. This segmenting and shaping allow auditors to perceive structure. As Theophrastus puts it (Cicero, De oratore 3.184), one can count falling drops of water, but a flowing stream cannot be measured.

PERIPHRASIS. A circumlocution, a roundabout expression that avoids naming something by its most direct term. Since it is constituted through a culturally perceived relationship to a word or phrase that it is not, periphrasis has no distinctive form of its own but articulates itself variously through other figures, esp. *metaphor. Quintilian (Institutio oratoria 8.6.59) subdivides it by function into two types: the euphemistic or "necessary," as in the avoidance of obscenity or other unpleasant matters (Plato's "the fated journey" for "death"—cf. the mod. "passing away"); and the decorative, used for stylistic embellishment (Virgil's "Aurora sprinkled the earth with new light" for "day broke"). The descriptive kind includes most periphrases that approximate a two-word definition by combining a specific with a general term ("the finny tribe" to signify fish). Longinus considered it productive of sublimity but, like Quintilian, warned against its excesses, such as preciosity or pleonasm (28–29). Later writers have characterized it as representing a term by its (whole or partial) definition, as in the expression "pressed milk" for "cheese." Periphrasis also appears in poetry that tries to translate culture-specific concepts from one lang. to another without neologism.

Though it is unlikely that any movement or era in poetry has succeeded in suppressing periphrasis altogether, some styles favor it more than others. Curtius associates it, like other rhetorical ornaments, with *mannerism and marks stages in its use and abuse. Oral traditions frequently build formulas around periphrases, as in the patronymic "son of Tydeus" for "Diomedes"; these have important metrical functions and are not ornament (see FORMULA, ORAL POETRY).

While widely used in biblical and Homeric lit. and by Hesiod, the devel. of periphrasis as an important feature of poetic style begins with Lucretius and Virgil, and through their influence, it became a staple device of *epic and *descriptive poetry throughout the Middle Ages and into the Ren. Classified by med. rhetoricians as a trope of *amplification, periphrasis suited the conception of style that emphasized copia and *invention. The OE poetic device of *variation typically employs multiple periphrastic constructions, as does the *kenning, the characteristic device of Old Germanic and ON poetry, which, in its more elaborate forms, illustrates the connection between periphrasis and *riddle.

Given new impetus through the work of the Pléiade*, periphrasis proliferated in 17th-c. diction, particularly as influenced by the scientific spirit of the age, and even more so in the stock poetic diction of the 18th c., where descriptive poetry often shows periphrastic constructions (Arthos). Since the 18th c., the form has lost much of its prestige in the romantic and mod. reaction against rhetorical artifice; more often than not, it survives only in inflated uses for humorous effect, as in Charles Dickens. Yet its occasional appearance in the work of modernists such as T. S. Eliot ("white hair of the waves blown back" for "foam") suggests that, insofar as directness of locution is not always the preferable route (direct speech being, most often, shorn of semantic density and allusive richness), periphrasis has an enduring poetic usefulness.

PERSIAN POETRY

I. Scope
II. Prosody, Forms, and Rhetoric
III. Historical Overview
IV. Genres
V. Modern Developments
VI. Poetry and Other Arts

I. Scope. Evidence for poetic practice in Old and Middle Persian is scanty and reveals little of its prosody, forms, or themes. The substantive hist. of Persian poetry begins in the 9th c. with the emergence of New Persian written in modified Ar. script. Three dialects of Persian now serve as the national lang. of Iran (Fārsī), Afghanistan (Darī), and Tajikistan (Tājīk). Using Farsi to refer to Persian in Eng. sows confusion and obscures two important features of the trad. First is its continuity: the earliest works of Persian poetry from the 10th c. are probably more readily comprehensible to mod. speakers of the lang. than Shakespeare's works are to mod. speakers of Eng. Second is the geographical extent of the trad. Farsi is spoken only in Iran (and the Iranian diaspora), but for centuries Persian poetry was written and read throughout much of Asia. Literary centers in regions that are now part of the nations of not only Iran, Afghanistan, and Tajikistan but also of Turkey, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Pakistan, India, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan were in constant communication and unified by common poetic practices and values.

II. Prosody, Forms, and Rhetoric. Traditional verse forms employ quantitative metrics. The system of meters was conceptualized according to models laid down for the ʿarūḍ system of *Arabic prosody. But because of phonetic differences and perhaps Middle Persian prosody, Persian metrics diverges significantly in practice from its Ar. counterpart. Some of the most frequently used meters in Persian are rare in Ar. Persian does not permit the substitution of long and short syllables found in most Ar. meters and adds a third category of "overlong" syllables (long vowel-consonant) to the Ar. system. Several common words and particles may be counted either short or long, and word-initial vowels may be elided with the final consonants of preceding words. In Persian, repeated, refrain-like syllables, known as the radīf, often follow the rhyme, a feature rarely found in Ar. Persian also adopted formal genres of Ar. poetry such as the qaṣīda*, ghazal*, and qiṭʿa* but added new forms, such as the rubāʿī*, the masnavī*, and the strophic tarkīb-band. The rhymed *couplets of the masnavī enable the composition of long narrative poems, which have significantly shaped the hist. of Persian poetry.

Drawing again on Ar. models, Persian writers have cataloged an extensive array of rhetorical devices, from types of puns and verbal figures to varieties of *similes, *allusions, and *metaphors. Traditional lit. crit. in Persian is generally limited to prosody, form, and rhet., but incidental critical comments found in biographies of poets, historical writing, and metapoetic reflections can tell us much about how poetry was read, utilized, and evaluated.

III. Historical Overview. Until the mod. period, poetic novelty was rarely prized for its own sake. Apprentice poets were expected to memorize thousands of verses by their predecessors and contemporaries. Poets drew on a well-established stock of themes, settings, images, and similes; certain poetic metaphors even came to be lexicalized, like the word laʿl (ruby) which acquired the definition "beloved's lips." Innovation took place against the background of authoritative models, and poets would often write responses to the work of earlier masters, using the same meter and rhyme scheme or rewriting the same story. Poetic practice, however, changed gradually over the course of generations. Since the early 20th c., the hist. of Persian poetry has been loosely divided into four broad period styles or sabk. New Persian poetry emerged in the region of Khorasan (now divided among Iran, Afghanistan, and Uzbekistan), whence the name of the sabk-i Khurāsānī to characterize Persian poetry from the 10th to the middle of the 12th c. It is marked by a number of archaic grammatical features; *diction tends to be simple and measured, and metaphors and similes are usually explicit and concrete. During the 12th c., Persian poetry began to expand south toward the subcontinent and west across the Iranian plateau, and an esp. significant school of poetry emerged in Azerbaijan. As populations and poets scattered before the Mongol invasions of the early 13th c., Persian poetry spread past the Hindu Kush into India, to the Persian Gulf in southwestern Iran, and westward into Anatolia. This movement marks the emergence of the sabk-i ʿIrāqī (Iraq here referring to western Persia). Poetic lang. was standardized and greater use made of words borrowed from Ar. Rhetorical figures of speech are deployed with more frequency and sophistication, as poetic conventions and genres (esp. the ghazal) are crystallized. At the end of this period, the trad. is consolidated and codified in the literary school of Herat, and the end of the 15th c. it has sometimes been considered the end of the high cl. period of Persian poetry. But with the foundation of the centralizing dynasties of the Safavids in Persia and the Mughals in India in the early 16th c., Persian became the authoritative lang. of administration and high culture across western, south, and central Asia and served as a cl. reference point for poets writing in Ottoman Turkish. This innovative period first witnessed the emergence of the relatively short-lived maktab-i vuqūʿ (phenomenalist school), which used a plain diction to explore the psychology of amorous encounters. Of much more lasting significance was a style known to its practitioners as the Fresh Style, but later called the sabk-e Hindī or Indian style. Despite its name, this style was transregional in its devel. and practice, and poets traveled freely between major literary centers in Persia, India, and central Asia. Emphasis on the fresh is manifest particularly in the use of colloquial idioms and the cultivation of conceptual metaphors, subtle *conceits, and other figures of thought. While this style held sway in India and central Asia until the early 20th c. and helped shape emerging vernacular lits. in these areas, in Persia proper, a reaction to the perceived obscurities of this *baroque-like style took shape as the Literary Return movement (sabk-i bāzgasht-i adabī), which sought to return to the norms of the Khurāsānī and ʿIrāqī styles. Though poetry in the traditional forms continues to be written today, the economic and cultural impact of the West had far-reaching effects on Persian poetry in the 20th c., weakening the authority of the trad. and leading to wholesale changes in poetic norms.

IV. Genres. There is no strict correlation between theme and form in Persian poetry. *Panegyric, e.g., is most commonly associated with the qaṣīda but can also be found in the masnavī, rubāʿī, and even ghazal forms; conversely, the qaṣīda often contains lyrical elements and can be used for didactic purposes or for the praise of religious figures, either living or dead. The discussion below is thus organized around four broad thematic categories: (1) didactic, homiletic, and gnomic, (2) *epic and romance, (3) panegyric and eulogy, and (4) *lyric.

Poetry is traditionally the privileged form of verbal discourse and the preferred vehicle for the transmission of wisdom and knowledge. Poetry can teach subjects from the mundane to the esoteric. Two early masnavīs indicate the range of possible didactic topics: the Dānishnāma (Book of Knowledge, completed in 980) by Ḥakīm Maysarī presents a compendium of medical science, while the Ḥadīqat al-ḥaqīqa (Garden of Truth) by Sanāʾī (d. ca. 1131) uses short anecdotes to preach on a wide range of ethical and religious issues. Sanāʾī's model acquires a more distinctively mystical or Sufi content in the masnavīs of Farīd al-Dīn ʿAṭṭār (d. ca. 1221), such as Manṭiq al-ṭayr (Conference of the Birds), and the Masnavī-yi Maʿnavī (Spiritual Couplets) by Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī (d. 1273). Even in the 20th c., the Indo-Persian poet Muḥammad Iqbāl (d. 1938) used the masnavī to present his revision of Islamic philosophy. Works like these can consist of several thousand verses and contain dozens of anecdotes and exempla, but homiletic themes also appear in gnomic, aphoristic form, as in the rubāʿī or quatrains of ʿUmar Khayyām (d. 1122), which draw on the ancient Near Eastern trad. of wisdom lit. (See DIDACTIC POETRY, GNOMIC POETRY.) Didactic passages also occur frequently in epic and romance, and panegyrics often include injunctions to the patron to adhere to rules of proper conduct and rule. Even the ghazal, the preeminent lyrical form, may be used as the medium for reflections on theosophy, human nature, and ethics. Throughout Persian poetry, nature and hist. tend to be viewed as ʿibrat, as instructive or admonitory manifestations of general laws of existence and behavior, and the wisdom of poetry is to teach its audience to interpret these phenomena. Objects, persons, and events are typically represented as exemplars of ideal, transcendental forms; the particular is of interest insofar as it represents the type. This principle helps explain why mystical Sufism found such a congenial home in Persian poetry, but it holds true for secular as well as explicitly religious lit.

A preexisting oral and written trad. on the pre-Islamic kings of Persia formed the basis for the first great work of New Persian poetry, the Shāhnāma (Book of Kings) by Abū al-Qāsim Firdawsī (d. 1025). This vast epic tells the story of Persia from the creation of the world and dawn of civilization to the collapse of the Sasanian dynasty and the coming of Islam. The epic is built around the reigns of 50 kings from the legendary Jamshīd to the historical Yazdigird, but some of its most famous stories deal with noble paladins like Rustam, who play major roles in the battles between Īrān and the rival kingdoms of Tūrān and Rūm. Stories of feasting and fighting often give the narrator cause to reflect on the tragic nature of hist. and problems of loyalty, authority, and proper rule. Following on Firdawsī's example, other figures from Persian heroic lore became subjects of a subsidiary epic lit., such as Asadī Ṭūsī Garshāspnāma (Book of Garshāsp, composed 1066). Episodes from the Shāhnāma also served as the basis for the devel. of romance narratives focusing on the adventures and loves of noble heroes, most notably Khusraw va Shīrīn (Khusraw and Shirin) and Haft Paykar (The Seven Beauties) by Niẓāmī of Ganja (d. 1209). But Niẓāmī also drew on the legends of neighboring cultures. His two-part work on Alexander the Great (Iskandarnāma) follows Firdawsī in integrating this Gr. hero into the Persian trad., and for his story of the star-crossed lovers Majnūn and Laylā, Niẓāmī turned to the tribal lore of Arabia. These works, together with his collection of didactic tales Makhzan al-asrār, would serve as models for poets as late as the 19th c. The first poet to attempt to match Niẓāmī's achievement, Amīr Khusraw of Delhi (d. 1325), initiated two trends that would shape the hist. of the genre. First, he turned to Indian legend and fable for some of his stories, providing a precedent for later poets of the Mughal period to look to Sanskrit sources for their stories; Fayżī (d. 1596), e.g., adapted his story of Nal and Daman from a tale in the Mahābhārata. Second, Amīr Khusraw composed epic-like narrative poems based on contemp. events. Masnavīs modeled on the Shāhnāma celebrating the deeds of living monarchs and patrons served to legitimize their rule by integrating it with the epic trad., and an imperial office for the writers of such Persian-lang. *Shāhnāma*s existed for a time even in the Ottoman Empire.

In such poems, the epic masnavī merges with courtly panegyric, but the principal form for eulogistic poetry was the qaṣīda. This genre drew heavily on the long trad. of Ar. court poetry and was the most prestigious literary form in the first period of Persian poetry. From Farrukhī (d. 1038) and Anvarī (d. 1189) in Khorasan to Qaṭrān (d. 1072) and Khāqānī (d. 1199) in Azerbaijan, the most accomplished poets throughout the Persian world earned their living by singing the praises of rulers, soldiers, viziers, and government officials. Qaṣīdas often opened with lyrical descriptions of gardens, the beauties of the season, festival celebrations, or the speaker's experiences in love before turning to ritualistic praise of the patron's victories, prowess in battle, justice in civic administration, or building projects. Generosity was paramount among the noble virtues, and the praise poem served as a social contract among the patron, the poet, and society: the patron was expected to live up to the idealized portrait presented in the poem and to reward the poet for his labors. Failure to do so could unleash the panegyric's dark opposite, the *invective or lampoon (hajv), in which the object of the speaker's wrath was subjected to public vilification and abuse. Though praise poetry was a product of cultural economics and political interests, it was informed by a system of social, ethical, and religious ideals. These come to the fore in the poetry of Nāṣir Khusraw (ca. 1004–72), whose praise for the distant Fatamid rulers of Egypt and North Africa is sometimes overwhelmed by his critique of the society in which he lived in Badakhshan. Panegyric themes are also often found in elegies, as the deceased is praised for virtues and accomplishments that his successor will be expected to preserve. Esp. after the rise of the Shiʾite Safavid dynasty, eulogistic elegies are also composed for the Prophet Muhammad and his descendants, in which the responsibility for preserving their heritage falls to the current temporal rulers and the larger community of believers.

After the Mongol invasions of the 13th c., the qaṣīda lost much of its prestige, and literary patronage spread from the royal court to local lords and landholders, wealthy merchants, and Sufi lodges. The ghazal, which began as amatory lyric for courtly song and entertainment, gradually emerged as the preeminent short poetic form. It occupied an increasingly prominent place in the oeuvre of 12th-c. poets, such as Sanāʾī, ʿAṭṭār, Anvarī, and Khāqānī, and it became the genre of choice of the major 13th-c. poets Rūmī and Saʿdī (ca. 1184–1292), in whose hands it achieved its cl. form. The ghazal is defined by the first-person *voice of the lover who describes, praises, cajoles, or complains of his aloof and idealized beloved. Persian pronouns give no indication of the gender, and the beloved was frequently a young male ephebe. The ghazal was composed for and performed in a wide range of contexts, and the beloved could take on various identities. While often an object of amorous passion, the beloved could also merge with the patron and the poem serve as a veiled courtly negotiation. In religious and mystical circles, the beloved could stand as a witness to divine grace or a symbol of God. Deciding on the most apt interpretation of this richly polysemous object of desire can be difficult, and the acknowledged master of the genre, Ḥāfiẓ (ca. 1325–89) took full advantage of this ambiguity, his poems sometimes allowing readings in all three registers at once. While it never lost its grounding in the experience of love, the ghazal in the works of fresh-style masters such as Sāʾib (ca. 1601–76) and Bīdil (d. 1725) could serve as a vehicle for wide-ranging existential, theosophical, and ethical ruminations, as conventional lyrical images of flowers, wine, gardens, music, and the beloved's physical features took on increasingly subtle, far-ranging metaphorical and symbolic meanings.

Genres in Persian poetry are frequently mixed. Ghazals and first-person lyrical passages, e.g., are often integrated into the romance, as lovers write to one another or lament their disappointments. Elegies on friends or family members praise the deceased but also explore the speaker's feelings of loss and bereavement and meditate on the transitoriness of human life. The 16th c. witnessed the emergence of the genre sāqīnāma (cupbearer's song) in rhymed couplets, in which the lyrical repertoire of wine and intoxication is used to represent a psychological crisis that is often resolved by an affirmation of religious belief or political affiliation. Khāqānī composed the masnavī Ṭuḥfat al-ʿIrāqayn (Gift of the Two Iraqs) in 1157 as an account of his pilgrimage to Mecca, and poets of the 16th and 17th cs. revived this model in versified travelogues and other topographic poetry that cover the vast geographical expanse of the Persian cultural sphere in the early mod. period. The autobiographical narrator describes the natural and manmade environment in terms drawn from epic, romance, and panegyric poetry; praises those who offer sustenance and guidance; censures those who do not; and often pauses to reflect on the lessons of his experience.

V. Modern Developments. Western economic power, political thought, and cultural dominance have had a profound impact on Persian poetry. The transregional cultural continuum of Persian poetry was divided along new national boundaries, and local vernaculars came to replace Persian as a lang. of administration and culture across much of its former range. Economic and political changes destroyed old systems of patronage, and the quest for modernization called into question authoritative trads. and well-established poetic conventions. Proponents of new and *free verse challenged the rules of prosody, but the flexible forms and genres of traditional Persian poetry have nevertheless proven remarkably resilient. Questions of political order and authority had long been a concern of epic and panegyric poetry, and this trad. helped inform a new lit. of nationalism and constitutional rule in the poetry of Adīb al-Mamālik (1860–1917) and Muḥammad Taqī Bahār (1884–1951). After World War II, new and free verse forms served as the vehicle for a politically engaged, oppositional poetry in the work of poets such as Nīmā Yūshīj (1896–1960), Siyāvush Kasrāʾī (1927–96), and Aḥmad Shāmlū (1925–2000). The painter and poet Suhrāb Sipihrī (1928–80) dispensed with formal prosody altogether but drew inspiration from the mystical strain of traditional Persian poetry. Even a form as weighted with trad. as the ghazal has found a mod. relevance in the poetry of Sīmīn Bihbihānī (b. 1927), even if her drive for inner authenticity and sexual frankness do not match those of mod. Iran's foremost woman poet, Furūgh Farrukhzād (1935–67). The dust has largely settled on the debate between proponents of free verse and traditional forms, and it is not unusual to find poets today producing work in both idioms.

VI. Poetry and Other Arts. As the most prestigious form of verbal discourse and artistic expression in Persian culture, poetry has exerted a tremendous influence on other art forms. Histories, philosophical and theosophical treatises, and other prose writings are often studded with verses that summarize, elaborate, or comment on their message. Even today, quoting apropos verses of cl. poetry enlivens daily conversation. The highly regarded art of calligraphy has often employed poetry as its subject matter. Miniature painting evolved as the art of illustrating poetic texts, most notably the Shāhnāma and the works of Niẓāmī and presents the same idealized vision of the world as poetry itself. Verses of poetry also decorate metalwork and ceramics, and public buildings are often embellished with poetry, sometimes composed esp. for its placement on the structure.

PERSONA. Denotes the speaker (or more generally, the source) of any poem that is imagined to be spoken in a distinctive *voice or narrated from a determinate vantage—whether that speaker is presumed to be the poet, a fictional character, or even an inanimate object. But the idea of persona carries in it all the complexity of the hist. of the word. Originally used to denote the mask worn by an actor in Roman drama, persona has been offered as a trans. of the Gr. prosopon (face), though the idea of their synonymy antedates both terms; and also (suggestively but mistakenly) as a derivation from per sonare (to sound through). This pair of false etymologies recapitulates a tension apparent in the term's use: in Cicero's theory of personae, the public roles that an adult is called on to play were understood to be aspects, rather than concealments, of the self. For Seneca, the performance of a public persona represented a falsification of the true self that lies beneath.

Early in its hist., then, we find persona referring to both performance and actor, to the public trapping and suits of feeling, and also to that within that passes show.

Persona becomes an important term for poetry precisely because so much of it speaks in the first person—seemingly disclosing private or hidden aspects of self and subjective experience—but does so in highly shaped and mediated ways, in lang. that bears the stamp of artifice and form. Thus, persona is a conceptual peg on which to hang the distinction between the idea that poems are the sincere expression of the person who makes them and the idea that poems are constructions that use lang. in some other, estranging or objectifying way. Accounts of what that way is—and what function it serves—vary; a poetic persona may be a transparent impersonation, as in dramatic *monologue. Creating a morally compromised or troubling speaker like Robert Browning's Duke of Ferrara or Ai's Joseph McCarthy puts the poet in an ironic relation to his or her own words and places readers in a critical relationship to the idea of sincere expression and literal lang. But the use of a persona need not identify a poem as a "mere" fiction. A poetic persona may stand in a complex rhetorical and performative relation to the poet, as in Juvenal's satires or Jonathan Swift's, making the identification of propositions and attitudes into a puzzle or a hall of mirrors (in John Berryman's Dream Songs, Henry, the poet's alter ego, has his own alter ego and interlocutor, Mr. Bones). Persona may function in a universal or representative capacity, as does Dante's questing protagonist ("Dante") in the Divine Comedy. Persona may also refer to the idea that a poem puts forward beliefs, attitudes, or feelings in hypothetical form—as a way of inquiring into what it is to be a self or as a means of operating on oneself. This sense may be in operation when a speaker is obviously an invention (as in Frank Bidart's "Herbert White," which refracts the poet's desperate desire to animate the world outside the self with sense through the persona of a child-murdering necrophiliac); but even "I" may be a persona in this sense, as Emily Dickinson suggests: "When I state myself, as the Representative of the Verse—it does not mean—me—but a supposed person."

The recent hist. of the concept of persona focuses on the tension between person and supposition and exacerbates it. If persona becomes a theoretical issue in the wake of the explicit articulation of the idea that the poet speaks in propria persona, and speaks so truly and sincerely, then the theoretical problem of persona is a postromantic one—and even more acutely, a modernist one. Paul Valéry's "sieved" and "filtered" inspiration, W. B. Yeats's daemons and masks, T. S. Eliot's doctrine of "impersonality," Ezra Pound's Personae, and Fernando Pessoa's *heteronyms all in their various ways cultivate persona as a reaction against the idea of romantic poetics.

Translating these modernist experiments into interpretive principles, the New Critics theorized the gap between a thought or feeling and its objectification (see NEW CRITICISM). The idea of a poem as a "verbal icon" (Wimsatt) or "a dramatic fiction" (Brower) may have been initially intended to block inquiry into the poet's expressive intention in order to focus attention on the dynamics of lang. and form; its effect was to make persona seem an entailment of the very idea of verbal art. Thus, the obligation to treat poetic speakers as personae carries over into postmodernity in ever-more extreme forms, both as a theory of poetry (Berryman, speaking even of Robert Lowell's ostensibly *confessional "Skunk Hour": "The necessity for the artist of selection opens inevitably an abyss between his person and his persona") and as a general problematic for life in lang. (Paul de Man's claim that autobiography is both a characteristic of every text and "a defacement of the mind" is, in effect, an argument for the inescapability of persona, as is Barthes's notion that "all writing" partakes of a "special voice" of which lit. "is precisely the invention").

PERSONIFICATION. A device that brings to life, in a human figure, something abstract, collective, inanimate, dead, nonreasoning, or epitomizing: Oiseuse, the porter at the gate of the walled garden of the Roman de la Rose, and her porter-colleagues—both named Genius—in two gardens of The Faerie Queene; Mankind in his morality play; Love, Lady Mary Wroth's ever-crying child; Honour, William Collins's gray pilgrim; Autumn at the cider-press in John Keats's *ode; W. B. Yeats's Quiet, who "wanders laughing and eating her wild heart"; Patrick Pearse's lonely mother Ireland; and Clumsy, Mrs. Clumsy, and No-No in Gjertrud Schnackenberg's parlor *allegory. A prominent strategy for poets, personification also appears in ordinary speech, prose, painting, sculpture, architecture, cartoons, film, and other media.

Familiar in antiquity, personification becomes esp. important and complex in the aesthetic programs of the Eur. Middle Ages and Ren., which exploited its capacity for philosophy and enlisted its predilection for hiding the arcane or even dangerous proposition in plain sight. Though often instigated by something as simple as grammatical gender, personification is a way of thought that can generate a wide range of effects and consequences: from folkloric characters such as Jack Frost to the "persons" accorded rights in the medical, civil-rights, and corporate-law decisions of contemp. high courts. Thus, it can act as a figure of speech and as a form of social or political acknowledgment.

In lit., personification is a mode of characterization that, when pervasive, may grow into personification allegory (e.g., Prudentius's Psychomachia, William Langland's Piers Plowman, John Bunyan's The Pilgrim's Progress). Yet it may also make an isolated appearance as a person when a character becomes symbolic in a nonallegorical work. Allegorical personifications are notable for their slippery qualities. In a psychologically revealing yet not naturalistic canto by Edmund Spenser, the beleaguered husband Malbecco transforms into Jealousy itself. Rarely do personifications remain static; even the deadly sins of Piers Plowman repent, belying their nomination. Personification is sometimes unjustly regarded as a badly wrought or primitive kind of characterization because of its abstraction. Such a view fails to notice that the purpose of literary character is not always to render an individual person one might wish to be or to love. In its abstraction, personification is capable of considering personhood over the scope of the entire fiction, past the bounds of character. In this role, personification should be seen as a device for distributing agency, emotion, cognition, gender, and the like.

The notions of quintessence and epitome are conveyed by the ordinary expression "to personify": when we say, "she personifies grace and beauty," for instance, we take an already human figure and regard it as a personification. The canonical personifications Christian (the hero of Pilgrim's Progress) and Everyman (he of the 15th-c. morality play) suggest that fiction does personify humans (the Christian, the ordinary man), though definitions have specified the nonhuman as the material of personification. Similarly, it is profitable to see the conventional persons that dominate the thought of disciplines (legal person, economic man, the reasonable person, the soul, the object of figurative painting, and so forth) as personifications too, in that they embody notions of personhood that entail complex argument. Considered in this way, all characterization involves a degree of personification. But it must be understood that to say so is to apply personification as an analytic tool (in a way analogous to the practice of allegoresis on a work that is not allegorical) without regard to whether we have received cues from the lang. that fit the work to the primary definition of personification. Such a move should not be allowed to erode personification's specificity as a technical term that can identify examples of a poetic device.

Like other devices, personification has many near neighbors and collaborators that help to distinguish it. *Apostrophe is closely associated with personification because *address can be part of the process, conjuring *presence and agency. Personification appears frequently in dialogue and debate: for instance, Boethius's De consolatione philosophiae (Consolation of Philosophy) fashions its complaints and inquiries in the form of a conversation between the author and Lady Philosophy; and, in Piers Plowman, Will's interlocutors are often drawn from faculty psychology—Conscience, Imagynatif, Kynde Wyt, and so forth. Similarly, the late med. morality play involves its protagonist in dialogue with a series of allegorical personifications. When a poet gives speech to an animal or object (such as the speaking Cross in the OE "Dream of the Rood"), the resulting personification may be called *prosopopoeia. In practice, this term is nearly synonymous with personification, though prosopopoeia is more a term of rhet. than of lit. crit. Personification is best reserved for personhood: in cases like Emily Dickinson's "I like to see it lap the miles," where a train acts like a horse, perhaps we need a word like "beastification." Such a term might also cover beast fables, in which animals are given human motivations and capacities without becoming human figures. Are they humans turned into beasts or beasts into part-humans? A glimmer of personification that does not develop into a recognizably human figure (like Katherine Philips's "courteous Tree") is better identified as an example of *pathetic fallacy.

William Wordsworth abjured personification. Ernst Cassirer saw personification as a regime in the hist. of human intellectual devel., a mode of thought that replaced *myth when, with the waning of the premod. era, human consciousness became more skeptical and less primitive. These mod. slights seem to underestimate the sophisticated ontological theses of ancient and med. personification and falsely to impute a mature rationality to mod. thought. When in "The Knight's Tale" Chaucer moves with subtlety among the many possible shapes of Venus, it is exquisitely effective, amounting to a psychology, an astronomy, a theology, an anthropology, a literary feat, and a theory of art, by turns. She is a personification of love and of the influence of the planet Venus; she is a goddess worshiped by Palamon and his culture; she is a literary character, an *allusion, and part of the epic machinery; she is feminine beauty and its abstract force. Personification is influentially discussed by the cognitive linguists Lakoff and Johnson as "entity" *metaphor, a species of ontological metaphor; yet personification's epistemological functions can be comically overstated, as is suggested by the voyeuristic glimpse of Venus disporting with Riches, her porter, in the back corner of the temple in Chaucer's Parliament of Fowls. That the device has important, noncognitive appeals to sensual response is made esp. clear there and in the many erotic portraits of personified love produced by artists in words, paint, and other media over the centuries.

PERU, POETRY OF. Peru can claim one of the richest and most complex poetic trads. of any Sp. Am. nation. With César Vallejo (1892–1938), it can also take pride in a major 20th-c. poet. Even though there are many splendid anthols. of Peruvian poetry, the sheer volume of Peruvian poetry makes its synthesis a daunting task. Most monographs, like Higgins's The Poet in Peru, limit themselves to a handful of poets. In 1964, when the Argentine literary jour. Sur, whose editorial board included Victoria Ocampo and Jorge Luis Borges, asked José Miguel Oviedo to prepare a representative anthol. of contemp. Peruvian poetry, the distinguished literary critic found himself in a challenging situation. He regretted the exclusion of many poets, even as he limited his selection to those whose ages ranged from 25 to 40 and who were active as poets in the 1950s and the 1960s. Since the 1950s, it has been customary in Peru to discuss and organize the poetic production of national poets with the convenient and yet anachronistic criterion of generations; and since the late 19th c., a significant share of critical discussion of Peruvian poetry has focused on the tensions between aesthetic and political imperatives informed by the social and historical dilemmas of the moment.

After the seminal Antología General de la Poesía Peruana (General Anthology of Peruvian Poetry, 1957) by Alejandro Romualdo (1926–2008) and Sebastián Salazar Bondy (1924–65)—major Peruvian poets in their own right—comprehensive accounts of Peruvian poetry cannot neglect the poetic trads. of the indigenous peoples of Peru. Aboriginal Peruvian peoples did not have a written lang., and their rich and variegated oral trads. came to the attention of most literary critics through transcriptions and trans. Some of the most important sources of the old lits. were unearthed in the 20th c., such as the poetry transcribed from the Quechua by Felipe Guáman Poma de Ayala (ca. 1535–1616) in El primer nueva corónica y buen gobierno (The First New Chronicle and Good Government, ca. 1615), a fundamental book of Andean culture. These poems include love poetry of seduction and of parental obstacles to the union of star-crossed lovers, which resonate with the concerns of early mod. Eur. lit.

The recognition of indigenous poetry as lit., as opposed to folklore, was made possible by the pioneering work of 20th-c. anthropologists and writers, in particular by José María Arguedas (1911–69), who argued that the belated acknowledgment of this literary corpus was due to the willful repression of indigenous cultures by the descendants of Eur. colonizers. Arguedas was also the ed. and translator of influential anthols. of ancient Peruvian poetry and one of the first Peruvians whose own Quechua poetry was drafted in writing. One of the high points of Arguedas's literary career, his trans. of the anonymous 18th-c. *elegy "Apu Inca Atawallpaman" (To the Inca Atahuallpa), expresses "the collective vulnerability of a people suddenly stripped of a destiny," as Ortega has underscored.

The interest in indigenous Quechua poetry also sparked curiosity about the poetry of indigenous peoples from the Andes who spoke Aymara and of the peoples of the Peruvian Amazonian region. It emboldened some to celebrate popular and refined trads. by other neglected groups. Nicomedes Santa Cruz (1925–92) wrote poetry evoking the Af. rhythms of his own Peruvian speech and made considerable efforts to disseminate Afro-Peruvian trads., showing how some of them had synthesized popular improvisation and venerable Sp. forms. No literary critic made a more ardent plea in favor of inclusiveness than Cornejo Polar, yet he painfully acknowledged, in his own hist. of Peruvian lit., that he could not "offer an alternative to the traditional typologies of our literary hists. because we lack the critical and historical groundwork to introduce Indigenous and popular contributions into an overview of this kind."

The acknowledgment of Andean pre-Columbian langs. in Peru's literary heritage would have felt extraneous to Peruvian poets in the first few decades following the independence of 1821. Not even the Sp.-lang. poetry written during the times of the conquistadors and the Sp. viceroyalty was considered germane to Peruvian lit. until the second half of the 19th c., in a process Cornejo Polar aptly labeled the "nationalization" of the colonial past. Today, no one would exclude the satirical poetry of Juan del Valle y Caviedes (1652–97), who invented a first-person poetic *persona to expose the shortcomings of Peruvian colonial society; the *epic poetry of Pedro de Peralta Barnuevo (1664–1743); or the *baroque poetry of Juan de Espinosa Medrano (1632–88) from the *canon of Peruvian lit.; and acute scholarship in the first decade of the 21st c., by Lasarte and others, has shown the extent to which these writers are central to understanding the gestation of a distinctly Peruvian ethos that precedes the creation of the mod. state. Refined poetry in the Petrarchan style (see PETRARCHISM) was also cultivated in the viceregal court of Peru, and the "Epistola a Belardo" (Letter to Belardo, 1621) by the mysterious Amarilis (an exquisite local poet or a Spanish invention, perhaps by Félix Lope de Vega) stands out as a captivating poetic evocation in the voice of a female descendant of Sp. conquistadors.

To understand the hist. of Peruvian poetry, it is necessary to keep in mind that the late 19th c. laid a claim to the legacy of poetry written in Sp. by Spaniards in the geographical region that today encompasses the Peruvian state and that the legacy of the indigenous world (and of other non-Western cultures, incl. those of Asian immigrants) was claimed in the 20th c. The earliest poets of the Andean region considered themselves to be people of Sp. descent who had made a political break with Spain, and in the case of Peru, the majority of its representative poets had sympathized with the Sp. crown until after the Peruvian nation was established. An exception is Mariano Melgar (born in Arequipa, 1790–1815), best known for his yaravíes, which draw on indigenous forms and themes in his Sp.-lang. poetry of melancholy longing.

Sp. royal forces executed Melgar during the wars of independence. The case of José Joaquín de Olmedo (1780–1847) is more representative of the nationalistic ethos of poets who, until the independence period, were fully committed to Spain. Born in Guayaquil and educated in Lima, Olmedo had written poems deploring the Napoleonic invasion of Spain. Years later he was a member of the constitutional assembly as the nation of Peru was being established; but when Ecuador came into being, he actively participated in its political life and became one of its first heads of state. Peruvians and Ecuadorians both claim him as a national poet, and his "La victoria de Junín: Canto a Bolívar" (The Victory of Junin, Ode to Bolívar, 1825), is the single most important poem about the Sp. Am. wars of independence.

Most hists. of Peruvian poetry stress the significance of the liberal Manuel Ascencio Segura (1805–71) and the conservative Felipe Pardo y Aliaga (1806–68). Inspired by the Sp. trad. of costumbrismo (the depiction of local manners and customs), they wrote satirical poems about Peruvian life. These foundational poets of the Republican period, like Olmedo before them, had been previously aligned with Spain during the wars of independence. Ricardo Palma (1833–1919), the greatest Peruvian literary figure of the 19th c., created a hybrid literary genre, the tradición peruana, which combined poetry, fiction, local color, and historical anecdotes, presupposing the fluid continuity of a Peruvian culture since pre-Columbian times. The most celebrated Peruvian romantic poet, Carlos Augusto Salaverry (1830–91), expressed intense feelings of sexual longing matched by misogynistic anger and an uneasy relationship with the Christian god.

A positivist and the premier Peruvian political essayist of the 19th c., Manuel González Prada (1848–1918) was also a poet whose clear, sober, and atheist poetry was an affront to the prevailing Christian sensibility of the epoch. González Prada's work was contemporaneous with the rise of modernismo*, but his poetic search was more in line with a sober romantic sensibility, as he worked with discrete meters, some of his own invention. Restraint was not the hallmark of José Santos Chocano (1875–1934), Peru's most famous and colorful literary figure in his own lifetime. Within the modernista idiom of the Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darío, Chocano attempted a sweeping lyrical vision aiming to transcend the Andean world and to encompass all of Sp. America.

A contemporary of Chocano, José María Eguren (1874–1942) emerged out of the modernista trad. but was understated where Chocano was loud. Some dismissed him for his apparent simplicity and for themes evocative of childhood songs and adolescent concerns, but Eguren is one of the Peruvian poets most revered by other Peruvian poets. Ricardo Silva-Santisteban (b. 1941), e.g., considers him to be Peru's first mod. poet. Eguren produced a pristine poetic lang. with a wide but carefully chosen vocabulary, attentive to the emotional resonances of words, with which he creates an alternative reality based on visions and dreams. Abraham Valdelomar (1888–1919) moved away from the mellifluous style of Darío, into dignified meditations about the Peruvian provinces and the family home, with a sense of rueful melancholy. He empowered poets throughout Peru to express regional pride. He also established and edited Colónida (1916). The bohemian and groundbreaking literary jour. paved the way for the reception of Amauta (1926–30), a jour. founded by José Carlos Mariátegui (1894–1930) that promoted the socialist vindication of the indigenous populations and the reception of a decided avant-garde aesthetic (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS).

This is the context in which Vallejo, one of the greatest poets of the Sp. lang., came into his own. González Prada, Valdelomar, Eguren, and Mariátegui recognized Vallejo's talent from the outset and warmly encouraged his literary career. The emotional rawness of Vallejo's poetry stretched the Sp. lang. beyond grammar and lexicon into compelling dissonances and asymmetries, unprecedented and unsurpassed in the hist. of Hispanic poetry. His affecting directness makes him immediately accessible, even while his poems can defy interpretation. Like Paul Celan, Vallejo has presented daunting perplexities to his readers and translators: his lang., fraught with inner tensions, generates fragmentations, silences, and paradoxes. His poetry cannot be analyzed within a single register because he writes in multiple ones and can shift from one to another or operate simultaneously within several in the same poem. In Vallejo, oral expression and the conventions of written lang. are often in conflict, but his distortions can be moving, and his visual configurations are often emotionally arresting, as are his auditory effects. His ambiguities and ambivalences, made up of embers and auras of meaning, constitute an affront to reductive paraphrase. He managed to reorient the local and cosmopolitan literary trads. on which he drew. His poetry is imbued with feelings of guilt, uncertainty, and intimations that the satisfaction of one's own needs can feel shameful when confronted with the suffering of others. In Los heraldos negros (The Black Heralds, 1919), his first book of poems, Vallejo faces his theological demons, expressing a tragic vision in which sexuality and sin are one and the same. With Trilce (1922), he still longs for attachment and is nostalgic for family bonds but no longer relies on the rhet. of religion to address his angst, reaching his most persuasive experimental heights. In his posthumous books España, aparta de mí este cáliz (Spain, Take This Cup from Me, 1937), and Poemas humanos (Human Poems, 1939), his poetry of collective anguish and compassion is expressed with a keener historical awareness and a nettled attentiveness to cosmopolitan concerns. While some have branded Vallejo's most difficult poetry as densely hermetic or as a challenge to the logos of Western culture, others have argued that his difficulties are an aperture into the indigenous soul of the Andean peoples. Vallejo's complete poetry exists in a trans. that the Am. poet Clayton Eshleman took five decades to complete.

As with the poetry of Vallejo, the Peruvian avant-garde made serious attempts to engage with the indigenous. The tensions and contradictions between modernity and trad. informed urgent intellectual discussions of the time. In addition to Amauta, the most influential jour. in Peruvian lit. hist., it is important to cite the Boletín Titikaka (1926–30), ed. by the brothers Arturo (1897–1969) and Alejandro Peralta (1899–1973). Both jours. made efforts to engage the integration of popular culture and avant-garde cosmopolitanism, giving way to the poetic impulses that were to follow in authors such as César A. Rodríguez (1889–1972), Alberto Hidalgo (1897–1967), Guillermo Mercado (1906–83), Xavier Abril (1905–90), Alejandro Peralta, and most notably Arguedas. There was also an avant-garde current oriented to the populist Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana or APRA, the most enduring of all political parties in 20th-c. Peru, which produced important poets such as Magda Portal (1900–89).

In a period concerned with the impact of new information technologies, the star of Carlos Oquendo de Amat (1905–36) has been rising. His 5 metros de poemas (5 Meters of Poetry, 1927) is considered the first Peruvian multimedia poem in which the written word plays with the conventions of x-ray photography, cinema, and advertising. Its 28 pages unfold into a single continuous sheet over four meters long, and some of its pointed effects depend on the visual disposition of the type (see CONCRETE POETRY, TYPOGRAPHY, VISUAL POETRY). Two major poets brought *surrealism to Peru, César Moro (1903–55) and Emilio Adolfo Westphalen (1911–2001). Moro, who signed one of the surrealist manifestos, wrote poetry of unbound desire, unrestrained transgression, and pain. La tortuga ecuestre (The Equestrian Turtle, 1938–39) is his most important book in Sp. He also wrote poetry in Fr. now included in Eur. anthols. of surrealistic poetry. Westphalen has summarized the gist of his poetic appeal: "After reading Moro one feels trampled under foot and crushed by the beasts of love—inconsolable from the infernal breath that spews out of love and beauty. These demented extremes unleash the lightning that unites, destroys and regenerates." Westphalen's best known books are Las ínsulas extrañas (Strange Islands, 1933) and Abolición de la muerte (Abolition of Death, 1935). More measured than Moro's, his poetry is concerned with death as it delves into the painful obscurities of love, silence, and the unconscious. Another major figure, Martín Adán (1908–85), was a master of traditional poetic forms as well as *free verse. A hermetic poet with mystical urges (see HERMETICISM), he was skeptical that lang. could give relief to the quiet anguish of an introverted poetic persona who struggles with mundane desires against the deterioration of the body and the fragility of the mind.

In the second half of the 20th c., one of the great figures of Peruvian poetry is Carlos Germán Belli (b. 1927), best known for his remarkable mastery of the traditional forms of Sp. and It. poetry, as he addresses the anguish and alienation of contemp. urban life. Jorge Eduardo Eielson (1924–2006) began his career as a poet deconstructing Western myths and Christian images, but he purified his poetry, divesting it of its engagements with trad., in a dialogue with his activities as a visual artist. In the 1960s, Eielson became intrigued with the quipu, a pre-Columbian object made of strings and knots whose purpose is the stuff of speculation. Eielson reduced the quipu to a single knot, which became the central object of his most important paintings, installations, and final poems. As Padilla has pointed out, Eielson aimed to deconstruct lang. in order to reconnect with matter, and the knot suggests his lingering attachments to Peru.

Blanca Varela (1926–2009) was a major literary figure. In meticulous poems, her secure lyrical voice explores intense emotions without a hint of sentimentalism but with a tone that can sometimes be playful and even parodic. Her poetry converses with sights and sounds, music and the visual arts, and is often set in a nondescript urban context; but she has also created a lyrical geography that loosely evokes the coast of Lima as it is situated between the sky and the sand, near the sea. Her lyrical world abounds with homes and gardens populated by flowers, animals, insects, and ghosts. Varela transgresses the semantic conventions of the lang., and to some commentators, these transgressions have suggested the disjointedness of surrealism. Her images, however, are neither surrealistic nor impenetrable. Her poetry is not hermetic. She fashioned distinct patterns of signification. Images like "hacer la luz aunque cueste la noche" (to make light even if it costs the night) are paradoxes that reflect one of the central themes of her poetry: the relationship between the light of perception and the dark force of memory. Among Varela's contemporaries one could cite Javier Sologuren (1921–2004), Raúl Destua (1921–2005), José Ruiz Rosas (b. 1928), Pablo Guevara (1930–2006), Juan Gonzalo Rose (1928–83), and Washington Delgado (1927–2003).

Javier Heraud (1942–63) is the legendary poet killed as a guerrilla fighter before he could fulfill the promise of his flowing, seductive lyrical style. With a post-Whitmanesque ease, the poetry of Antonio Cisneros (b. 1942) addresses social concerns and hist. and brings a sense of presence through the sensual evocation of taste and smells. With the publication of his El libro de Dios y de los húngaros (The Book of God and the Hungarians, 1978), Cisneros surprised some readers by his conversion to Catholicism, without renouncing his socialist convictions. Rodolfo Hinostroza (b. 1941) captures the esoteric and occultist bent of Peruvian poetry of the 1960s with a New Age embrace of Eastern cultures and of Sigmund Freud. César Calvo (1940–2000) was admired for his love of beauty, compassion for the bereft, exploration of intense experiences, and idealization of the Amazon region. Other significant poets of this period are Luis Hernández (1941–77), Julio Ortega (b. 1942), Mirko Lauer (b. 1947), and Marco Martos (b. 1941).

Toro Montalvo's anthol. Poesía Peruana del 70 (Peruvian Poetry of the 70s, 1991) underscores the impact for poetry of the 1968 military coup by General Juan Velasco Alvarado and of a new cultural sensibility informed by pop music, chicha (a fusion of the indigenous huaino and the cumbia), and salsa. An influential group in the 1970s was the Hora Zero movement, which brought together Enrique Verástegui (b. 1950), Jorge Pimentel (b. 1944), Jorge Nájar (b. 1946), Carmen Ollé (b. 1947), and Tulio Mora (b. 1948). Other significant poets of that moment are Abelardo Sánchez León (b. 1947), Elqui Burgos (b. 1946), José Watanabe (1946–2007), and Mario Montalbetti (b. 1953).

In the 1980s, the belated feminist movement of Peru made decisive inroads in poetry. Giovanna Pollarolo (b. 1952) and Mariela Dreyfus (b. 1960) confronted Peruvian machismo with a sense of freshness and irony. Patricia Alba (b. 1960), Rosella de Paollo (b. 1960), and Rocío Silva-Santisteban (b. 1963) explored dimensions of female sensuality that Peruvian poetry had previously shunned. It was also a period marked by the impact of the Shining Path terrorist movement and by the dirty war that ensued. Among the most notable poets of this time, one could cite Oswaldo Chanove (b. 1953), Carlos López Degregori (b. 1952), Alonso Ruiz Rosas (b. 1959), Eduardo Chirinos (b. 1960), José Antonio Mazzotti (b. 1961), Roger Santiváñez (b. 1956), and Magdalena Chocano (b. 1957).

The anthol. of Peruvian poetry Los relojes se han roto (The Clocks Are Broken, 2005) includes poets who grew up in a climate of terrorism followed by the corruption of President Alberto Fujimori's regime. These poets include José Carlos Yrigoyen (b. 1976), Montserrat Álvarez (b. 1969), and Chrystian Zegarra (b. 1971), who stands out for his renewal of Vallejo's jagged undertones to express the despair of a society unable to process psychological and physical trauma in the uncertain cosmopolitanism of the mod. world.

PETRARCHISM. The term Petrarchism refers to the *imitation—whether in verse or prose, directly or indirectly—of features in the It. poetry of Francesco Petrarca (in Eng., Francis Petrarch, 1304–74), who derived his style from cl. Lat. verse, Occitan troubadour poetry, the It. Dolce stil nuovo, and his immediate predecessor Dante. Its rhetorical features include metaphorical descriptions of the beloved's (whether male or female) shining eyes, radiant smile, and physical beauty (see BLASON); exuberant wordplay and figurative *conceits; and expressive *paradoxes and *oxymorons, e.g., "fire and ice" to express the beloved's countervailing allure and resistance. Its representational features include avowals of unrequited love and psychological alternations between fleshly desire and forced abstinence. Its structural features include a saturation of forms such as sonnet, canzone (*ode), *madrigal, and *sestina and the placement of poems in a sequence with narrative, emotional, or ritual implications.

Many who embraced Petrarchism were amateur writers who used its features to express amatory travail. Others were professional poets who used it to advertise their writerly ambitions to initiate high-minded literary projects. Still others were major poets who associated Petrarchism with a refined and cultivated style, providing a vehicle to catalyze a *national poetry. Poetic borrowing from Petrarch began even during his lifetime in the 14th c. (e.g., Giovanni Boccaccio, Cino da Pistoia, Chaucer), reached considerable proportions in the last half of the 15th c. (Ausiàs March, Angelo Poliziano, Lorenzo de' Medici, Matteo Maria Boiardo), and became the predominant mode of poetic expression in the 16th c. not only in Italy but throughout most of western Europe, with survivals even into the age of *romanticism.

Lyric poets of the later Ren. approached Petrarch in printed eds. of his Rime sparse (Scattered Rhymes) or Canzoniere* (Songbook) that appeared with biographies of the author and commentaries projecting various—and often competing—views of his achievement. The earliest include antipapal, proimperial glosses composed by the humanist scholar Francesco Filelfo at the despotic Visconti court in Milan during the 1440s (pub. 1476); by the Ghibelline lawyer Antonio da Tempo at Padua (pub. 1477); and by the Veronese entrepreneur Hieronimo Squarzafico (1484). At Venice in 1501, Aldus Manutius published a carefully prepared ed. of Petrarch's poetry, for which he recruited the skills of the humanist scholar Pietro Bembo. The latter then wrote a full-length critical defense of Petrarch in Prose della volgar lingua (Writing in the Vernacular, 1525), authorizing the poet's archaic Tuscan style with its Sicilian turns of phrase and its Lat. neologisms as the supreme norm for lyric composition in the It. vernacular.

Later eds. presented Petrarch from still different perspectives. At Venice in 1525, Alessandro Vellutello rearranged the sequence to recount a coherent narrative about Petrarch's love for Laura. Giovanni Andrea Gesualdo and Sylvano da Venafro, both at Naples in competing eds. of 1533, emphasized Petrarch's rhetorical techniques in his deployment of literary and historical *allusion, cl. *myth, and rhetorical *figuration. In 1536, the Paduan scholar Bernardino Daniello related the Rime sparse to ancient Lat. and Gr. models. Hospitable to Lutheran reform, Fausto da Longiano at Modena (1532), Antonio Brucioli at Ferrara (1548), and Lodovico Castelvetro at Modena (pub. posthumously 1582) identified scriptural and doctrinal allusions in the Rime sparse and iterated Petrarch's crit. of the Avignon papacy.

The result was an accumulation of ideas about Petrarch that influenced his imitators in different ways at different times. In Italy alone, the range is vast, from Bembo's amatory sonnets (1530) to Torquato Tasso's "heroic" sonnets celebrating great men and public deeds (written 1567–93). It includes sonnets written by noblewomen such as Vittoria Colonna and Veronica Gambara about their virtuous widowhood, and others written by professional courtesans such as Tullia d'Aragona and Gaspara Stampa about their worldly amours. Writers famous for accomplishments in other pursuits made notable contributions. Michelangelo Buonarroti, e.g., wrote scores of Petrarchan sonnets and madrigals (unpub. until 1634) about *patronage, art, and religious faith.

In Spain, the prestige of Petrarchism blossomed with the publication of Las obras (1543) by Juan Boscán and his aristocratic friend Garcilaso de la Vega, whose imitations of Petrarch augured a literary standard for Charles V's expansive empire. A century and a half of Petrarchism in Iberia prompted experimentation and refinement by Castilian poets such as Fernando de Herrera, Félix Lope de Vega, and Francisco de Quevedo, with Port. contributions by Francisco Sá de Miranda, António Ferreira, and Luís de Camões. The publication at Madrid in 1692 of philosophical, religious, and amatory poetry by Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, a criolla nun in Mexico City, marked its end.

During the 1530s and 1540s, Petrarchism emerged in France with trans. of Petrarch by Clément Marot and Jacques Peletier and creative imitations by Mellin de Saint-Gelais and Maurice Scève, whose dizains* in Délie (1544) echo the It. poet's amatory obsession. Joachim du Bellay designed his sonnet collection Olive (1549) as an embodiment of literary tenets proposed in his contemporaneous La Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse (Defense and Enrichment of the French Language) to advance a cultural agenda for Henry II's monarchy. His Les Regrets (1558) deployed Petrarchism in a satiric vein to express patriotic nostalgia for France while serving the Crown in corrupt Italy. His friend Pierre de Ronsard, meanwhile, presented himself to the king as a professional poet advertising career-centered ambitions in Les Amours (1552). For the rest of his life, Ronsard revised and amplified this collection about his love for Cassandre, adding sonnets for Marie, Sinope, and other women; and in 1578, he extended his skills in two volumes of Sonnets pour Hélène. Among poets who embraced his program, Louise Labé challenged the women of her native Lyon to follow her example in the Petrarchan sonnets of her Oeuvres (1555).

Petrarchism entered England at the court of Henry VIII during the late 1520s with the amateur sonnets of the knightly adventurer Thomas Wyatt and his friend Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey. The spoils and perils of a gallant life received definitive Petrarchan treatment in Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella (1591), which inaugurated a vogue for Petrarchism among aspiring professionals such as Samuel Daniel (Delia, 1592) and Michael Drayton (Idea's Mirror, 1594). Late in his career, Edmund Spenser published a *sonnet sequence about marriage (Amoretti, 1595), ostensibly to honor his new bride but also to assert his claims as England's *poet laureate. Fifteen years later, Shakespeare published his Sonnets (1609) to complement his career as a successful dramatist. In 1621, Philip Sidney's niece, Mary Wroth, brought Eng. Petrarchism to an end with her sonnet sequence, Pamphilia to Amphilanthus, appended to her prose romance Urania.

Early 17th-c. Europe resuscitated Petrarch's use of *conceits and ingenio (see WIT) in such movements as It. concettismo, Sp. Gongorism (see CONCEPTISMO), Fr. préciosité*, and Eng. *metaphysical poetry. John Donne, e.g., tapped deep springs of Petrarchism that flow from his love poems into his Holy Sonnets (1633). On the whole, even in its decadent phase, Petrarchism motivated poets who valued the inventiveness and the lyric value of Petrarch's style. For these reasons, it represents one of the most dynamic stages in the hist. of early mod. poetry.

PHALAECEAN. In *classical prosody, a hendecasyllabic line that has the pattern x x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – x, so called after the Gr. poet Phalaikos (4th c. BCE?). It is used at times by Sophocles (Philoctetes 136, 151) and Aristophanes (Ecclesiazusae 942 ff.); the Alexandrian poets employed it for whole poems, e.g., Theokritos (Epode 20), Phalaikos (Anthologia Palatina 13.6). In Lat., it is attempted by Laevius and Varro but finds its deepest roots in Catullus, e.g., Ădēste ēndĕcăsyllăbī, quŏt ēstīs. Forty of his 113 extant poems are in *hendecasyllables, ranging from *love poetry to *invective. These have been imitated in mod. accentual form in Ger. by Conrad Gesner (Mithridates, 1555) and in Eng. by Philip Sidney (Arcadia, "Reason, tell me thy mind, if here be reason"), S. T. Coleridge (who makes [intentionally?] the opening trochee a *dactyl) in "Hear, my beloved, an old Milesian story"; W. S. Landor; Alfred, Lord Tennyson in "O you chorus of indolent reviewers" and "All composed in a meter of Catullus" ("Enoch Arden," 1864); A. C. Swinburne in "In the month of the long decline of roses" (Poems and Ballads, 1866), and Thomas Hardy ("The Temporary the All," "Aristodemus the Messenian"). The rhythm is basically that of a trochaic pentameter. Nearly all these examples fall within the Catullan strain of cl. imitations. ■ Hardie, pt. 1, ch. 8; Wilamowitz, pt. 2, ch. 1; Halporn et al.; West.

PHILIPPINES, POETRY OF THE

I. Tagalog
II. English

I. Tagalog. The lang. of the Tagalogs, the largest ethnic group in the Philippines, is spoken in at least eight countries, but most Tagalog poems were and are written by poets living in the central part of Luzon island, where the lang. is the mother tongue.

The earliest poems were handed down orally. These monorhyming poems were *riddles, *proverbs, and short lyrics (mostly in *quatrains). Although other societies have preserved longer poems in the form of oral heroic *epics, no precolonial Tagalog long poem has yet been discovered.

Early poems established the three key features of Tagalog poetry: syllabic meter (see syllabic verse), *rhyme based on identity of vowels and *equivalence of consonants, and talinghaga (a cross between mod. *metaphor and med. anagogy, but without the latter's religious context; see exegesis). The second feature is best known in its formulation by José Rizal (1861–96): for purposes of end rhyme, there are only two consonant "sounds" in Tagalog, that of b, d, g, k, p, s, and t; and that of l, m, n, ng, r, w, and y. Words ending with the same vowel but different consonants, as long as the consonants belong to the same set, are considered rhyming.

Printing was introduced into the islands in 1593 by Sp. colonizers. The first pub. poems in Tagalog were written by missionaries who learned the lang. for evangelization or by translators of Sp. texts in the early 17th c.; these poems followed Eur. rather than Tagalog prosody. The first pub. poem that strictly followed the oral trad. was "May Bagyo Ma't May Rilim" ("Though It Is Stormy and Dark," 1835), a 30-line poem in six monorhyming stanzas.

Their encounter with Sp. lit. led Tagalog poets to adapt Eur. genres such as the metrical *romance to the native trad. Considered masterpieces are Ang Mahal na Pasion (The Passion [of Jesus], 1704) by Gaspar Aquino de Belen (fl. 17th c.) and Florante at Laura (1838) by Francisco Baltazar (1788–1862). Baltazar, writing under the pen name Balagtas, is considered the greatest Tagalog poet, having brought the spoken lang. to a high literary level, much as Chaucer did with Eng. and Dante with It.

Balagtas was such a strong influence on subsequent poets that the modernist movement in the 20th c. was characterized as a battle between his disciples and his detractors (see modernism). Ranged among his disciples were political poets such as Andres Bonifacio (1863–97), Marcelo H. Del Pilar (1850–95), and Amado V. Hernandez (1903–70); and romantic poets such as José Corazon de Jesus (1896–1932). Among those who consciously moved away from his trad. were experimental poets such as Alejandro G. Abadilla (1906–69) and Rolando S. Tinio (1937–97).

Working with traditional forms such as the tanaga (a quatrain of heptasyllabic lines), the dalit (a quatrain of octosyllabics), and the folk epic or ethnoepic, as well as with Eur. forms, Virgilio S. Almario (b. 1944), considered the major poet of the 20th c., integrated the best features of the oral trad., the Balagtas trad., and modernism. Twenty-first-c. poems have extended the trad. to include the *prose poem and *electronic poetry, but traces of syllabic count, consonant equivalence, and talinghaga remain strong.

II. English. On the rocky isle of Corregidor, soon after Commodore George Dewey effectively ended Sp. colonial rule in the Philippines on May 1, 1898, the first makeshift Am. public school was established by U.S. soldiers. In 1901, 600 teachers from the U.S. arrived aboard the transport Thomas to serve as principals, superintendents, and teachers in the highly centralized public-school system. Since there are more than 170 Philippine langs., Eng. was employed as the medium of instruction and communication; pupils who dared speak their native langs. in the school premises were punished. The Am. colonial government also began sending Filipino students and professionals to various colleges and universities in the U.S., and in 1908, the Philippine legislature established the University of the Philippines (UP). The Philippine Commonwealth was established by the U.S. in 1935, to be interrupted during World War II by the Japanese occupation from 1942 to 1944, and the independent Republic of the Philippines was founded in 1946.

Through the influence of Am. educators after 1898, Eng. effectively became the country's first national lang. or lingua franca. It became not solely the chief instrument for the acquisition of new learning, not only a favored medium by which to represent the Filipinos to themselves and to the world, but a principal means to employment, social status, prestige, and power. The country's lit. in Eng., like its scholarship, was bred in the university, and UP may justly claim to be the cradle of Philippine letters in Eng. through its literary organs The College Folio (1910–13) and The Literary Apprentice (since 1928) of the UP Writers' Club and through its national writers' workshop every summer since 1964.

In only half a century after the first Eng.-lang. literary endeavors pub. in The Filipino Students' Magazine in Berkeley, California, in 1905, the country already possessed a significant body of fiction, poetry, drama, and essays in Eng. It may be said that, if at first the writers wrote in Eng., later they wrought from it because its use in lit. had been chiefly toward affirming, within the adopted lang., a Filipino sense of their world. By the mid-1950s, "Philippine Literature in English" was already offered as a formal course at the UP.

Philippine poetry in Eng. may be regarded as having passed through three overlapping transformative phases: a romantic era during the first 40 years or so since 1905, a New Critical phase from the 1950s to the 1970s, and a poststructuralist period from the 1980s to the present.

Because the country already had accomplished writers in Sp., Tagalog, and other native langs., the literary apprenticeship during the romantic phase was ling. and cultural rather than literary or poetic. The tension that inevitably emerged between poets' creative struggle with the adopted lang. and their responses to the new historical situation cleared the poetic terrain for their own sensibility and perception of their circumstances. Such engagement with their own cultural and social milieu is already signaled in Ponciano Reyes's "The Flood" in 1905, a narrative poem that addresses the plight of the working class during a natural disaster. Among the romantic poets of note are Fernando M. Maramág (1893–1936), Luis G. Dato (1906–83), Angela C. Manalang Gloria (1907–95), Jose Garcia Villa (1908–97; known in the U.S. for his experiments such as *reversed consonance and *comma poems—he appears in a famous photo taken in the Gotham Book Mart on November 9, 1948), Carlos Bulosan (1913–56; author of the influential, partly autobiographical novel America Is in the Heart [1943]), Trinidad L. Tarrosa Subido (1912–94), Amador T. Daguio (1912–66), Rafael Zulueta y da Costa (1915–90), and Nick Joaquin (1917–2004), the latter an esp. prolific poet, historian, and journalist.

In the 1950s, the Am. *New Criticism began to hold critical sway: Cleanth Brooks, John T. Purser, and Robert Penn Warren's Approach to Literature (1936) was the standard textbook for the collegiate introductory course in lit. from the 1950s to the early 1980s; noteworthy also is the series of formalist studies of Philippine lit. in Eng. by the Am. critic Leonard Casper following his anthol. Six Filipino Poets (1954), incl. The Wayward Horizon (1961) and The Wounded Diamond (1964). Indeed, the New Criticism is to the present still conspicuous in writers' workshops, book reviews, and judgments in *poetic contests (see BALAGTASAN). Of the six poets in Casper's anthol., three—Dominador I. Ilio (1913–2006), Edith L. Tiempo (1919–2011), and Ricaredo Demetillo (1919–98)—were graduates of the University of Iowa Writers' Workshop. Among other poets during this period are Carlos A. Angeles (1921–2000), Virginia R. Moreno (b. 1925), Alejandrino G. Hufana (1926–2003), Emmanuel Torres (b. 1932), Ophelia Alcantara Dimalanta (1932–2010), and Cirilo F. Bautista (b. 1941).

Yet even among these later poets, the transformation of both lang. and sensibility owes more to the poet's creative toil with lang. in response to his or her historical circumstances than to the influence of New Critical formalism. Political activism in the mid-1960s and the martial-law regime under President Ferdinand Marcos from 1972 to 1986 compelled poets to connect with their social reality, even as they recognized a formalist imperative. There are many more contemp. poets of note, among whom are Alfred A. Yuson (b. 1945), Ricardo M. de Ungria (b. 1951), Marne L. Kilates (b. 1952), Eric T. Gamalinda (b. 1956), Luis Cabalquinto (b. 1935), J. Neil C. Garcia (b. 1969), Merlie M. Alunan (b. 1943), Rowena Tiempo Torrevillas (b. 1951), Marjorie M. Evasco (b. 1953), and Luisa Igloria (b. 1961, formerly Maria Luisa B. Aguilar Cariño). Of these, significantly, four—Gamalinda, Cabalquinto, Torrevillas, and Igloria—now reside in the U.S.

PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY. In his Republic (ca. 380 BCE), Plato (427–347 BCE) deepened a divide that had already emerged in 4th-c. Athens between two powerful civic discourses, poetry and philosophy, setting them literally apart from each other. In this, his best-known dialogue, Plato thus imagined it necessary to expel most *poets from the ideal, philosopher-ruled city he envisaged, retaining only those poets who would be virtuous tools of the state. At this moment in the evolution of Gr. culture, poetry offered a view of the world that was still widely esteemed as a source of wisdom, albeit in an idiom distinct from that of philosophical reflection and disputation. However, Plato radically questioned the grounds of this popular estimation of poetry, finding in it instead a dangerously seductive avatar of deception, dissimulation, and irrational persuasion. Put to the test of Socrates' interrogative skepticism, the claims of poets to possess a deep relation to truth were exposed in Plato's dialogues as little more than an amalgam of bluster, error, and confusion. Like the dark, gnomic pronouncements of pre-Socratic philosophy, the statements of poetry were too closely bound to the prephilosophical pragmatics of *myth, popular wisdom, and divination to earn the respect of this leading practitioner and advocate of philosophical thought.

As Detienne suggests, Plato's arguments against poetry express particular historical and political objections to a preceding archaic organization of Gr. society in which the functions of poet, priest, and ruler were not yet clearly distinguished. Three social types, Detienne explains, converged in the earliest Gr. culture: the poet, the diviner, and the king, each of whom has a special relation to truth mediated by practices and institutions of effective speech. Each, he suggests, was a "master of truth," whose authority came from performances of lang. that also produced effects in the real world, bonding the social community in ritual observance and commemoration, communicating between the human world and the divine, and instituting the cosmic rule set out by the gods. Detienne goes on to trace a process of secularization, parallel to the rise to the cl. Gr. civic order, in which a new, more differentiated mentality and understanding of truth emerged. Only in the latter social order, he suggests, do "poetry" and "philosophy," along with "politics" and "religion," achieve their relatively autonomous existence. Only in the city-state order does the poet's speech begin to be sharply—often polemically—distinguished from the "prose" rhet. of other, competing social types: philosophers, physicians, historians, and political orators.

The Gr. historical trajectory from "masters of truth" to specialized discourses such as philosophy and poetry, which possess their own partial and problematic relations to truth, was decisive for later Eur. and perhaps even global intellectual hist. Nevertheless, it was also a culturally particular devel., and it can be compared with analogous, though different devels. in other cl. civilizations with powerful bodies of poetic and philosophical work, such as in India and China. In these civilizations, too, we can observe how poetry, philosophy, and statecraft form an intertwined matrix of concepts, practices, and mentalities, which, in the course of their historical devel., grow more autonomous and elaborately differentiated. Although India, as Sreekantaiya points out, possessed a vast and ancient body of poetry and thought, *poetics was not originally distinguished among the "limbs" of Vedic study (as was, e.g., grammar), nor was it named as one of the 14 branches of learning. It is only relatively late that poetics as such emerges as a distinct topic in Sanskrit rhet. From the outset of the Common Era, however, rhetoricians began elaborating three categories through which written texts could be distinguished: veda (scripture), śāstra (philosophy, hist., and myth), and kāvya (poetry). Each category of text related lang. to truth in a distinct fashion. In scripture, the very sequence of letters must remain inviolate. In being written just so, the scriptural text discloses the transcendent, divine truth that was its origin and essence. The "prosaic" realm of śāstra, by contrast, relates to truth through the overall meaning of the text and, by this means, sets out rules and guidelines for right action. Poetry, finally, is primarily a means to bring about a special experience of mind called rasa, which relates to a particular ordering of musical notes or words, although rasa is not the order itself but the state of delight that perceiving this order brings about. In analogy to the Gr. devel. traced by Detienne, Indian society showed a similar though differently mapped differentiation of mental orientations to truth, each of which reflected specialized skills and disciplines, social roles, and practitioners (see SANSKRIT POETICS).

In Confucianism, with its strong ethical orientation, poetry was esp. situated as a means of inculcating virtue, and the Shijing* (Classic of Poetry, also known as the Book of Songs; usually dated ca. 1000–600 BCE) was included among the four books and the five classics comprising the *canon of Confucian study, along with the growing body of commentary on them. Confucianism consistently associated the arts with moral cultivation. The refinement of one's sense of beauty is one among other forms of ethical discipline that may communicate and reinforce each other analogously from domain to domain. Even political statecraft ultimately may be aided by this cultivation of aesthetic justness manifested in the beauty of poetry and music. A primary focus of Confucian political thought was the idea of the "rectification of names," the appropriate relating of lang. to the truth of things. Other complementary forms of rectification could help foster in the governing elite the ethical virtues that would avoid social disorder and preserve justice. Poetry in cl. Chinese civilization was, thus, highly refined as a specific activity the intellectual elite should practice and, at the same time, thoroughly integrated into the larger, comprehensive system of ethical cultivation mobilized by Confucian philosophy and political thought (see CHINA, POETRY OF).

If Aristotle's (384–322 BCE) work in its entirety can justifiably be seen as the culmination of philosophy as an intellectual practice in Gr. society, so too his Poetics (ca. 335 BCE) represents a high point in Gr. philosophy's reflection on poetry, in turn influencing a wide range of thinkers through the Hellenic world and later in Europe, Byzantium, and the Ar. world as well. Surpassing and partially refuting Plato's ontological crit. of poetry, Aristotle's Poetics offers the first fully philosophical theory of poetry in Gr. antiquity, as can be seen by three major features of its argument. First, Aristotle grounds his theory of poetry ontogenetically in basic capacities of human nature, esp. in the natural pleasure human beings take in finding things out, their natural inclination to imitate, their ability to think in terms of analogy, and their ability to create patterns of rhythm and emphasis related to the basic motility of living bodies. He extends this "philosophical anthropology" underlying the possibility of poetry into further reflections on more complex structures of human experience such as the organization of events into meaningful narrative sequences ("plots"), character types correlated with social codes of action, and the types of emotion appropriate to different types of characters and plots. Second, he formulates a philosophical semantics of poetry that distinguishes poetry from other sorts of textual production such as the writing of hist., a competing "prose" form for narrating human events. Whereas hist., Aristotle argues, focuses on how things actually were, poetry addresses the question of how things could or should be. This modal character of poetry, which orients it toward the possible and the general, makes poetic statements akin to the conceptual. Oriented toward generality, toward what could happen, Aristotle concludes, poetry is more philosophical than is hist., which remains bound to the concrete happening. Finally, Aristotle valorizes the genre of *tragedy not solely as a prestigious literary form with an important place in the civic life of Athens. In its structured turns and surprises, he suggests, in its interplay of error and disclosure of truth, tragedy also puts on display fundamental aspects of human motivation, knowledge, and experience. Even in the fragmentary form in which it has been preserved, Aristotle's treatise is not simply a technical manual for tragic poets but rather a full-scale philosophical exposition of tragedy as a framework for understanding human existence.

In his philosophical emphasis on tragedy, Aristotle anticipates the analogous and even richer philosophical treatment of the tragic, centuries later, in Ger. idealism; for G.W.F. Hegel, F.W.J. Schelling, Arthur Schopenhauer, and Friedrich Nietzsche, beyond its status as a literary genre, tragedy related basic truths of dialectical epistemology, psychology, ethics, and the philosophy of hist.

Aside from Aristotle's imputation to poetry of a special ability to isolate and dramatize situations of fundamental human import, poetry's historical roots in the "truth-saying" functions of archaic society and its special semantic status may equip it with the expressive means to formulate "philosophical" wisdom of many sorts, from moral epigrams to full-scale metaphysical speculation. Thus, e.g., a long trad. viewed Horace (65–8 BCE) as a poet dedicated to philosophy and capable of subordinating poetry's flights to the ethical task of educating men in basic wisdom, such as that of the fleeting of mortal time:

> Sapias, vina liques, et spatio brevi
> spem longam reseces. Dum loquimur, fugerit invida > aetas: carpe diem, quam minimum credula postero.
> (Be wise, decant the wine, and trim back your hopes for the long run. Even as I speak envious time is fleeing: seize this day, and trust not in the next.)

Yet as Mayer has suggested, to align Horace's concern with "philosophy," at least in the sense in which that was understood in the Roman society of his day, is a misunderstanding. Philosophy, as a civic practice of truth-seeking, was defined by clear professional specialization and by subscription to one of the highly competitive sects, with jealous claims to special ways of thinking and signature vocabularies. Precisely these features of Roman philosophy, Mayer argues, are signally missing from Horace's writing, despite his engagement with wisdom and ethical conduct. One might see an analogous relation of poetry and philosophy in another poet who, because of his ethical and reflective depth, is loosely characterized as "philosophical": J. W. Goethe (1749–1832). Like Horace, Goethe poetically engages in reflections that are of a high conceptual content resembling the contemp. discourse of idealist philosophy, as in his poem "Dauer im Wechsel" ("Permanence in Change," 1803):

> Laß den Anfang mit dem Ende
> Sich in Eins zusammenziehn!
> Schneller als die Gegenstände
> Selber dich vorüberfliehn!
> Danke, daß die Gunst der Musen
> Unvergängliches verheißt,
> Den Gehalt in deinem Busen
> Und die Form in deinem Geist.
> (Let beginning and end contract into one, more swiftly still than these objects fly by! Give thanks that the favor of the Muses promises an imperishable thing: the meaning in your heart and the form in your mind.)

Yet here, too, there is a subtle competition, even a polemical relation of poetry to philosophy implicit in Goethe's stance. The poet does not merely borrow from the philosopher or challenge him in the formulation of truth. Through poetry's stylization of lang., *rhythm, and *sound, the poet surpasses the philosopher in a way that implicitly criticizes philosophy's specialization, its scholastic limitations, its separation of the mind from sensual life, and the gray abstraction of its discursive idiom.

In contrast, Lucretius (ca. 99–55 BCE), in De rerum natura, established a more genuine hybrid of philosophy and poetry, imbuing his verse with both the content and the logical sequencing of Epicurean philosophical argumentation. Moreover, he intends manifestly to reveal "the nature of things" in a philosophical exposition of the natural world, which, in turn, as a therapeutic medicine against fear and superstition, may also have ethical benefits for his reader. "Now," he exhorts, "apply your mind to true reasoning. For a mightily new thing is labouring to fall upon your ears, a new aspect of creation to show itself." Lucretius in this way defined the type of "philosophical poetry" for centuries to come. The late Goethe, in the second part of Faust, e.g., may be thought to reside within this trad. of versified conceptual thought, along with other mod. writers from Erasmus Darwin's natural historical poetry in the 18th c. to P. B. Shelley's and Robert Browning's in the 19th to Wallace Stevens's and Louis Zukofsky's in the 20th.

Christian late antiquity and the high and late Middle Ages saw a vast and diverse devel. of both poetry and philosophy, but, in general in these social formations, they were both subordinated to the aims and authority of theology. In his Confessions (397–98 CE), e.g., Augustine of Hippo (354–430) famously unpacked the mysterious nature of time and memory according to the *metaphor of the recitation of a *psalm. Expectation and memory pervade the entire act of unfolding the poem as the mind passes from sign to sign, just as these two faculties also act at other scales of duration: the extent of a human life or of the whole hist. of humanity. However, the human temporality that derives from moving from sign to sign of the created world and is comprehensible by analogy to acts of synthesizing ling. signs through reading or reciting stops short before the mystery of God, who is outside time and cannot be comprehended by any sign (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). Nevertheless, in the Augustinian trad., as well as in the later Scholastic and Neoplatonic tendencies, poetry and philosophy are both seen as complementary, partial means toward the mind's ascent to God, who can only be approached more nearly through a mystical leap or the experience of conversion. Dante's (1265–1321) Divina commedia (1307–21) offers a topology of ascent up the rungs of spiritual experience through the various domains of mythology, hist., politics, poetry, philosophy, and theology. His Paradiso, however, is above all populated by saints and theologians, while poets are mostly found in the lower and middle canticles, incl. the esteemed Virgil, who as "guide" cannot accompany the pilgrim to the highest levels of divine vision.

The most consequential relation of poetry and philosophy in late antiquity and the Middle Ages, however, resided in the practices of *interpretation that could allegorically derive moral, philosophical, and mystical senses from written texts, incl. the poetic works of pagan antiquity. In Byzantine culture, the *epics of Homer were considered to be cryptic Christian allegories or to contain general moral and philosophical truths consonant with Byzantine political theology. In the Latin West, the fourfold model of interpretation developed by Origen (ca. 185–254) in Peri archōn (On First Principles, before 231) and Augustine in De doctrina christiana (On Christian Doctrine, 397; bk. 4, 426) was originally applied only to biblical interpretation; the texts of the Bible were seen to possess simultaneously a literal sense, a typological sense, a moral sense, and an "anagogical" or mystical sense related to the things of the afterlife (see EXEGESIS). Eventually, however, the fourfold method was extended to vernacular literary texts as well, most notably by Dante to his own Commedia, as he expounded in his letter to Can Grande, dedicating the Paradiso to this lord of Verona and explaining his overall allegorical design. Moreover, because med. sign theory distinguished between two levels of signification—the human, in which words referred to created things, and the divine, in which created things referred to moral and spiritual meanings deriving from their sacred origins—even the most humble description or *catalog of things in verse could take on a variety of conceptual and spiritual resonances.

Much *medieval poetry, admittedly, treats relatively secular historical and political issues or rehearses popular beliefs and stories or is intended primarily to amuse and entertain; highly spiritual or philosophical poetry is a restricted, elite phenomenon, as might be expected. On the other hand, however, allegorizing interpretation was available as a means for elite readers to distinguish themselves intellectually and spiritually from more popular modes of understanding texts, and the method could elicit more profound philosophical and spiritual dimensions of a wide range of texts, incl. those not immediately sacred in character. Within this interpretive outlook, any purely "philosophical" or "poetic" realm thus necessarily blurs over into the broader spiritual, theological domain, with ultimate mystical reference to an ineffable God and the kingdom of heaven to come. In Canto 4 of Paradiso, e.g., Dante converses with Beatrice about various philosophical and theological conundrums that trouble his ascent in understanding, one of which is Plato's doctrine of the return of the souls to the stars from which they originated. Beatrice offers Dante this consolation of spiritual allegory to still his doubt:

> Quel che Timeo de l'anime argomenta
> non è simile a ciò che qui si vede, > però che, come dice, par che senta.
>
> Dice che l'alma a la sua stella riede, > credendo quella quindi esser decisa > quando natura per forma la diede:
>
> e forse sua sentenza è d'altra guisa > che la voce non suona, ed esser puote > con intenzion da non esser derisa.
> (That which Timaeus argues of souls is unlike that which you see here, for seemingly he speaks as he truly thinks. He says the soul returns to the same star from which—he believes—it had been severed when nature gave it form; but perhaps his opinion is to be taken in another way than his words profess, with a meaning not to be derided.)

Precisely thus, in this allegorical subsumption of poetic, philosophical, historical, and moral concerns into theology, poetry and philosophy could stand in productive, coeval communication in the Eur. Middle Ages.

The It. humanists, starting with Petrarch (1304–74) and Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–75) in the 14th c. and continuing as late as the 18th-c. "new science" of Giambattista Vico (1668–1744), challenged the subordinate place occupied by poetry in med. worldviews, which, in many cases, had been complemented by the denigration of the pagan gods and heroes of pre-Christian cl. poetry. Arguing that the cl. poets hid their deeper intentions from ready popular access, humanists utilized allegorical interpretation to decode philosophical and religious meanings underlying poetic characters and actions, which they also took as distorted figures of real places, persons, and events in universal hist. Petrarch and Boccaccio, e.g., both defended poetic polytheism as the allegorical mask of an ancient monotheism. The gods of cl. mythological poetry had to be seen, they argued, as attributes of a single sublime divinity, with a status reconcilable with the "One" of Platonist and Neoplatonic philosophy and with the God of Heb. and Christian theology. In the process of transmission across time through poetically figured texts, the wisdom of the ancients had been, at once, preserved for posterity and subjected to misunderstanding. This theory thus boldly set poetry at the center of a process of communication across historical epochs and established its equal rights with historical discourse, philosophical truth, and theological revelation.

Though innovative in his powerful identification of hist. with the transformation of poetic figures across civilizational time, Vico's Scienza nuova (New Science, 1725), written in the early decades of the Eur. Enlightenment, exhibits strong continuities with the thinking of much earlier humanism. Vico conceived of an originary "poetic metaphysics" proper to the primitive gentiles out of which grew all the more sophisticated branches of knowledge. From the crude poetic wisdom of the ancients, Vico wrote, "as from a trunk, there branch out from one limb logic, morals, economics, and politics, all poetic; and from another, physics, the mother of cosmography and astronomy, the latter of which gives their certainty to its two daughters, chronology and geography—all likewise poetic." He thus situates poetry in a complex dialectical relation with the other disciplines of knowledge, political organization, and rational human practice. Poetry stands at the ontogenetic and phylogenetic origins of all forms of knowledge, and more advanced forms of knowledge develop precisely through the gradual clarification of the figurative, imaginatively and emotionally charged topoi of poetic wisdom, the poetic universals that constitute the anthropological constants of gentile world hist. Vico thus sets poetry on a footing equal or even superior to that of the "prose" disciplines in the sciences and humanities, with one possible exception: philosophy as the New Science, which can encompass both poetry and its rational offshoots in a single conceptual framework. Vico's philosophy stands above the whole of human knowledge, unfolding its developmental logic in hist. He offers his readers a poetic philosophy of world hist., understood as the cyclically enacted, rationalizing transmission of imaginative universals from epoch to epoch.

*Romanticism lent further impetus to this elevated view of poetry as a comprehensive form of thought closely related to philosophy, which in the hands of systematic philosophers such as Immanuel Kant, J. G. Fichte, Hegel, and Schelling was seeking to encompass society, nature, science, hist., theology, and art in a single, total conceptual framework. In one of his Athenäum fragments, Friedrich Schlegel (1772–1829) compared poetry to transcendental philosophy, which not only expressed philosophical truths but reflected critically on the conditions of philosophy itself. By analogy, he suggested, one could speak of a "transcendental poetry," a "poetry of poetry," that was at once poetry and the outlines of a theory of the poetic faculty, an exploration of the conditions, nature, and limits of the poetic *imagination. Poetry (and more broadly for Schlegel, art) should occupy that medium of the absolute, which is no longer the self-reflection of a subject, as in the philosophy of Fichte, but the self-reflection of poetic form on poetry's own capacities for evolution and transcendence. In light of Schlegel's fragment, one might accordingly observe in the verse of romantic poets such as William Wordsworth, S. T. Coleridge, and P. B. Shelley, a typical shuttling between "primary" presentations of poetic episodes or other subject matter and reflective passages that offer philosophical views of the imaginative or other subjective faculties. Thus, e.g., Coleridge's 1795 poem "The Eolian Harp" dramatizes the ontological dynamics of its own becoming: "O! the one Life within us and abroad, / Which meets all motion and becomes its soul, / A light in sound, a sound-like power in light, / Rhythm in all thought, and joyance every where—." It reflects on the mental and emotional process by which an external impetus is transformed into the poem one is reading. In many cases, one can find in the poem complementary hints about how the act of reading apprehends and reiterates the original imaginative production that first took place in the poet's mind.

*Modernism and the avant-garde poetries of the 20th c. called into question the formal and communicative conventions of earlier poetry and substituted for them various reflexive features of *style, *form, and lang. use; these postconventional poetic means were often reinforced by an implicit armature of philosophical or theoretical ideas. Philosophers, thus, often play an important role for the work of major modernist and postmodernist writers: e.g., Hegel for Stéphane Mallarmé, Henri Bergson and F. H. Bradley for T. S. Eliot, Nietzsche and Oswald Spengler for Hart Crane, R.W. Emerson and George Santayana for Wallace Stevens, William James for Gertrude Stein and Lyn Hejinian, John Dewey for W. C. Williams, Martin Heidegger for George Oppen and Paul Celan, and Ludwig Wittgenstein for a number of avant-garde writers ranging from Ingeborg Bachmann, Thomas Bernhard, and Friedrich Achleitner to Rosmarie Waldrop, David Shapiro, Michael Palmer, and Ron Silliman. The poets' use of philosophy, however, tends to be quite variable and intermittent, pragmatic and eclectic in its treatment rather than systematic. Philosophical ideas form only one set of materials among others that the poet may draw on in constructing the poem. One finds in Wallace Stevens (1879–1955), e.g., conceptual *imagery that, at least metaphorically, figures the philosophical activity of the mind reflecting on its own processes and powers:

> We feel the obscurity of an order, a whole . . .
> We say God and the imagination are one . . .
> ("Final Soliloquy of the Interior Paramour," 1950)

Yet to reduce Stevens's poetry to a philosophical—i.e., a conceptual or discursive impulse—not only ignores the extent to which concepts serve the poet as mere "occasions" for flights of poetic invention but forgets Stevens's poetic agon with philosophy in the name of sensual life, a polemic that we have also seen, e.g., in the poetic stance of Goethe. Thus, as Stevens writes of this invigorating, nonconceptual richness of sensual life in his elegy for Santayana, "To an Old Philosopher in Rome" (1952):

> The sounds drift in. The buildings are > remembered.
> The life of the city never lets go. . . .

The poet, in Stevens's view, is not only an acolyte of thought's transcendence but the guardian of the phenomenal world in its sheer, gaudy, vital being-there. More generally, we may conclude, merely on account of their use of heightened conceptual material, such "philosophical" lyrics cannot truly fulfill Schlegel's ideal of "transcendental poetry" or justify the often extravagant claims about the so-called conceptual nature of modernist and avant-garde poetry.

From the side of philosophy, two very consequential mod. defenses of poetry should be mentioned in conclusion: the studies of poetry and "lived experience" by the neo-Kantian philosopher and hermeneutic theorist Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911) and the lectures on Friedrich Hölderlin and other poets by the existential phenomenologist Martin Heidegger (1889–1976). In his 1905 collection Das Erlebnis und die Dichtung (Poetry and Experience) along with other studies of poetry, Dilthey developed a nuanced view of how intense personal experiences of the poet are crystallized through acts of poetic objectification and how, in turn, expressive features of the poem foster analogous acts of poetic understanding in the *reader, who reproduces and reactivates the lived experience that gave rise to the poem. Heidegger, in numerous lectures and seminars on poetry from the 1930s until his death in 1976, wholly recasts his earlier existential phenomenology, originally articulated in Sein und Zeit (Being and Time) in 1927, in terms of the world-making and ontologically primordial character of poetry. The Ger. romantic poet Hölderlin played an esp. important role in this turn in Heidegger's later thought. From Hölderlin, Heidegger borrowed the motif of the fourfold division of the world as a historically specific relating of earth, sky, gods, and the mortals; and he sees poetry as the means by which this fourfold apportioning of being is brought to lang., disclosed, and lent historical endurance. In one sense, Heidegger's claims for poetry represent one of the strongest philosophical visions of poetry in the Western trad., rivaling that of Aristotle. In the seminars on Hölderlin, the poet no longer appears as a mere mod. specialist in a particular practice of thinking and writing. Rather, he is a visionary thinker standing above social division and pointing a people toward a historical future he alone discerns and articulates. As Heidegger's etymological pun would have it, the authentic poet must ultimately be nothing less than the authoritative Sager (sayer) of a "world," an order of being underlying the historical Sage (saga) of a people or civilization. Yet despite profound insights into the nature of poetic lang. and esp. into Hölderlin's difficult texts, Heidegger also closes the circle of the long trajectory of Western philosophy and poetry with a regression to the myth of their reunification in a reemergent, postscientific "master of truth," a "leader-poet-priest" figure with disquieting resonances with the Führer myth of National Socialism.

PHONESTHEME. Apparently coined by J. R. Firth (1930) for a phenomenon related to or included in *onomatopoeia and sound symbolism, phonestheme signifies a specific *sound that seems to be "shared by a group of words which also have in common some element of meaning or function" (Firth). Although many students of lang. consider such a theory tentative, others agree on the existence of phonesthemes but warn against excesses in discovering them. That is, since a given phone or combination of phones does not always force a given cognitive reaction, a phonestheme to be effective as a stimulant to the mind or the emotions must be aided by lexical associations in context.

Nearly every phonestheme so far discovered by count or by psychological tests is an initial or final consonant or consonant cluster and—it is claimed—aids cognition when employed in *alliteration or *consonance. A convincing argument has been made by Dwight Bolinger for the morpheme -ash, which in stressed syllables of 21 of 48 possible forms signifies "headlong," "hit," or the result of hitting, as in splash, lash. The cluster st often begins words suggesting firmness or arrest in Germanic langs., e.g., stand, stable, or Stark, stecken, and has been a favorite of poets wishing to stress those notions, as in G. M. Hopkins's "underneath him steady air and striding / High there." Other consonantal phonesthemes argued for are gl- for visual phenomena (glare, gleam, glow, glitter); sk- for swiftness; l- for softness; and tw- for twisting motions—e.g., John Dryden's "twine / The sallow twigs." Perhaps more convincing are theories about s and z for whistling or buzzing; the Grs. and Romans, L. P. Wilkinson says, "thought an excess of sibilants cacophonous" (see CACOPHONY).

Although less has been claimed for vowels, Grammont, Chastaing, and other Fr. prosodists offer theories about vowel symbolism, while Jespersen and others in Eng. conclude that the vowel in Ger. licht and Eng. bit universally reflects lightness and smallness. In Eng., the vowel in no has been popular for death and melancholy, not just with E. A. Poe in the theory about "nevermore" and throughout "Lenore" but with Alexander Pope in "Eloisa" and "Elegy to . . . an Unfortunate Lady" and with Alfred, Lord Tennyson in "Ballad of Oriana" and the song of "The Dying Swan," whose voice "With a music strange and manifold / Flow'd forth on a carol free and bold." The Am.-Eng. low mid-vowel of dull and blood is, David I. Masson claims, Wilfred Owen's "great discovery in assonance" and presents "the sensuous and spiritual desert of war," but Masson also states that phonesthemes were employed by Shakespeare, Dryden, P. B. Shelley, and others to suggest ugliness, disgust, clumsiness, and sulky states of mind, as in Pope's attack on Lady Mary in Epistle II and, again and again, in The Dunciad. But in identifying phonesthemes, one must remember the cautions of Roman Jakobson and others (incl. Pope) that the thought or emotion must fit the sound.

PIE QUEBRADO (Sp., "broken foot"). Although this Sp. metrical term may occasionally mean any half line used with its corresponding whole line (as the *heptasyllable or the pentasyllable with the *hendecasyllable, the hexasyllable with the dodecasyllable), pie quebrado usually denotes the tetrasyllable (or equivalent) used in combination with the octosyllable, particularly in the copla de pie quebrado (see COPLA). The use of the pie quebrado has been common in Sp. poetry since at least the early 14th c., when it appears in the Libro de buen amor.

PITCH. The frequency of a sound, represented on an oscilloscope by the number of sound waves in a given duration and perceived by auditors as higher vs. lower. Pitch is one of the three elements of sound relevant to signaling meaning and prominence in speech, the others being loudness and length. (A fourth component, *timbre, is not relevant to meaning focus in speech.) Sound frequency is measured in number of sound waves or cycles per second (quantified in acoustics as Hertz [Hz; 1000 Hz = 1 Millihertz (Mhz)]; though medians for the human voice vary from study to study, the median frequency for the male voice is ca. 125 to 150 Hz and for the female voice is ca. 200 to 220 Hz; the range of the human ear is ca. 20–20,000 Hz). Research in articulatory phonetics and acoustics has shown that the sound produced by human vocal cords is actually not single but a complex band or bands of vowel frequencies called "formants"; pitch is, therefore, often represented in ling. as "fundamental frequency," the lowest frequency in a sound wave.

Prior to 20th-c. technologies for recording, graphing, and analyzing sound (e.g., the sound spectrograph, developed in the 1940s), pitch was not clearly differentiated from stress because the three components of stress co-occur. Stress on syllables correlates highly with changed pitch level (and increased length as well); indeed, stress itself seems to be mainly a function of pitch change, where pitch level is raised or lowered from a mid-range pitch where the most weakly stressed syllables are voiced. The precise nature and relations of pitch and stress are still being investigated, a slow process given the number of langs. in the world and the various relations of the two aspects even within the same lang. Ren. grammarians and prosodists, who drew their concepts from antiquity, speak of "tone" as a raising or lowering of the voice. It is not until the 18th c., in the work of prosodists such as Sir Joshua Steele, that real advances began to be made in developing a terminology that accurately described what critics and readers of poetry had heard for centuries but could not adequately explain. Steele's work is based on music, following the understanding of prosody imported from cl. langs. during the Ren. and is, therefore, of historical interest more than linguistic pertinence. In the West, an important pitch-based lang. was cl. Gr., which, according to the ancient grammarians and their mod. successors (though see Allen), used pitch for accentuation but syllabic length or quantity for metrical patterning, making Gr. prosody inherently more complex than the mod. prosodies, which use the same sound features for meter as are used in the lang.

In Germanic langs. like Eng., stress indicates prominence of syllable in the word and of word in the phrase; pitch change is present in more than 99 percent of occurrences of prominence and is, therefore, the component of sound that most accurately indicates prominence. In 1900, Otto Jespersen first devised a method of marking four degrees of stress, from one (lowest). Degree of pitch change from the lowest level (unstressed) largely determines the degree of stress (still today given usually in four, but for some researchers three, levels of perceptual capacity). In single words, stress assignment is regulated by the lang. system and is specified as ling. rule because of the high degree of regularity. In passages of lang. longer than words, stress is distributed over the phrase in a suprasegmental pattern called an intonational contour or an accentual contour, depending on one's orientation to tone or to information focus. In addition, certain intonational contours that rely on tonal shifts indicate questions, statements, *irony, *emotion, and so on. E.g., in Eng., pitch patterns are used to differentiate questions (rising contour at the end) from statements (falling), as in "You need help," which can either confirm or query depending on how inflected. Pitch can even change within a word: every child knows the difference between a "no" that is a "no!" and one that is a "maybe." This example shows that pitch can counter lexical meaning—or, more precisely, that a word can have more than one pitch pattern, hence more than one meaning since intonation is one indicator of meaning. But for the most part in stress-based langs., pitch applies more to the entire utterance than the word. In tonal langs., like Chinese, the pitch itself (i.e., not the level with respect to surrounding syllables) often indicates a different word, hence a different meaning.

At present, pitch, whether tone or pitch change, is regarded as a principal feature of sound structure and therefore of rhythm and meter in the world's major langs. Recent and current research on pitch is concerned with detailed study of where pitch occurs and how it functions in the various langs. and poetries.

PLAIN STYLE. For several millennia, writers have used the plain style to communicate meaning or intention without stylistic distractions. In absolute terms, this may be impossible, but a *style is plain in relation to other styles of its time and place, not absolutely. A plain style usually aims to eschew the characteristics of other styles, so it may be defined negatively, as a paradoxically styleless style: it does not employ specialized or unusual *diction, it does not highlight obvious *sound patterns or vary greatly from everyday *syntax, it is not highly metaphorical, and it contains few other rhetorical figures. At different times, it has been regarded as antirhetorical, anticourtly, and anti-Ciceronian. Positively, it is clear, simple, bare, functional, direct, and brief. Such stylistic qualities have often been seen as ethical and political virtues.

As a category, however, the plain style is surprisingly lacking in clarity and simplicity. Although its presence generally attests to a writer's desire for truth, the plain style has proven to be as various as truth itself. It has been linked most often to dialectical, religious, and scientific truth; and frequently identified plain styles include the cl., the Christian, the passionate, (and in Eng.) the native, the Puritan, the Anglican, and the Augustan. This proliferation of plain styles implicitly calls into question both the epistemological and the ethical claims made for the style, which have been challenged by those who find the end of transparency naïve and by those who suspect, like King Lear's Cornwall, that the claim to honesty may hide craft and corruption. Both these objections and the long-standing association of the plain style with true counsel, friendship, and free speech (parrhesia) are inescapable parts of the plain-style trad.

Two main species of plain style in antiquity have influenced later poetry. The first originated in cl. rhet., which distinguishes three levels of style: the high, the middle, and the low or plain. The cl. plain style, or genus tenue, was originally associated with teaching and forensic oratory; it came to be seen as well as a style of conversation and self-revelation and acquired the name Attic. Perhaps the best-known description of this prose style is in Cicero's Orator 75–90; among its most important defenses is letter 40 of Seneca's Epistulae Morales, which declares that "speech that deals with the truth should be unadorned and plain." The cl. poets who embraced the principles of the plain style include Horace, Persius, and Martial. They used a plain style to achieve the brevity and sententiousness of the *epigram, the familiarity and flexibility of the letter, the sharpness and candor of *satire, and the freedom and *wit of *comedy. The ideals of the cl. plain style were again articulated in the anti-Ciceronian movement of the Ren. by such writers as Justus Lipsius, Juan Luis Vives, Michel de Montaigne, and Francis Bacon and are among the foundations of mod. prose style in the West.

The second type of plain style is the Christian plain style. Also known as sermo humilis, it developed from the Christian response to the form and substance of the Bible, particularly the Gospels and Paul's letters. To classically trained church fathers such as Origen, Jerome, and Augustine, the biblical style seemed low and artless, but this quality could be explained by the lowliness of Christ's origins and by the needs of the uneducated audience to whom much of the Bible was addressed. Christ's subversion of cl. hierarchies, incl. the levels of style, showed that sublimity and plainness may coexist: for Augustine, as Auerbach writes, "the highest mysteries of the faith may be set forth in the simple words of the lowly style which everyone can understand." A plain style defined by its humility, modesty, and brevity consequently came to be seen as a way to express the sincerity and passion of religious conviction and a spiritual truth inaccessible to the senses and to sensuously richer styles. Like its cl. counterpart, the Christian plain style typically addresses its audience in a familiar, even intimate manner, includes an introspective and confessional dimension, and encompasses a wide range of subject matter. But the differences are substantial. In Matthew Arnold's terms (Culture and Anarchy, 1869), the Christian plain style is a somewhat loosened *Hebraism to the Hellenism of the cl. plain style: one seeks above all to proclaim the truth it knows with zeal and ardor in order to make it prevail, while the other wishes to increase its store of knowledge through the free play of the urbane intellect. One is a style more of conviction, the other of discovery.

Later poetry has drawn periodically on one or both of these stylistic trads. In some med. Eng. poetry, the influence of the Christian plain style predominates; this poetry is public, didactic, moralistic, and aphoristic. Poets such as Thomas Wyatt, George Gascoigne, Isabella Whitney, and Walter Ralegh continued this style into the 16th c., where it is sometimes referred to as the native plain style; it became an aspect of Protestant poetics in poets as different as Robert Crowley, Fulke Greville, and George Herbert. Am. poets from Anne Bradstreet to Emily Dickinson were influenced by a Protestant version of the Christian plain style, the so-called Puritan plain style. The Ren. revitalized the cl. plain style, which Ben Jonson described in Discoveries and practiced particularly in his epigrams and verse letters and which continued to inspire Restoration and 18th-c. verse. Exemplified by the poetry of Alexander Pope, the Enlightenment plain style exhibits a conversational ease and flexibility that is both familiar and performative and that has been seen as an element of the emerging public sphere.

In the last two centuries, invocations of the plain-style trad. have tended to be less overt. When late 18th-c. poetry saw a vogue for poetic diction, William Wordsworth called for "a plainer and more emphatic language," a "language really used by men," in the Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800). Similarly, in its response to Edwardian poetics, some modernist poetry can be seen as seeking a plain style of true perception. But *modernism generally associated the plain style with individualism and Enlightenment rationalism, as exemplified by the Royal Society's support of a scientific plain style, and rejected it. Nevertheless, the plain style has continued to find exponents and practitioners, from Donald Davie, Philip Larkin, and the *Movement poets in England to Yvor Winters and J. V. Cunningham in the U.S., and remains part of the conversation about poetry, lang., and truth.

PLANCTUS. The mod. generic term encompasses laments of many kinds, often in the form of a *dirge (esp. for a royal or otherwise distinguished figure, whether fictional or historical) but also expressions of grief in exile or as a result of the destruction of a city, amorous complaintes, or laments of the Virgin Mary for the deceased Christ (the planctus Mariae). The genre, which was not conceived so broadly in the Middle Ages, flourished from the 9th to the 15th cs. and was practiced in Lat., Fr. (plaint, complainte), Eng., Ger. (Klage), It. (pianto, lamento), Occitan (planh*), Catalan, and Galician-Port. It was most frequently freestanding, but mod. scholars sometimes describe as planctus expressions of grief in narratives such as Beowulf or the Chanson de Roland. Formal characteristics of the planctus were not fixed, but some are related to the sequence and the lai*. The earliest extant planctus with music notation are compiled in mss. associated with Saint Martial at Limoges. Some of the most famous examples include Peter Abelard's 12th-c. planctus on biblical themes and Gaucelm Faidit's planh for Richard the Lionhearted. Religious planctus were nonliturgical, but there is evidence they were performed in churches, particularly as part of Passion plays.

PLANH. Occitan funeral lament. In form, it may be considered a specialized variety of sirventes. Of the 40-odd planhs preserved, three-fourths bewail the death of some distinguished person, normally a patron or patroness; only ten are laments for close friends and loved ones. The poem ordinarily consists of conventional and hyperbolic eulogies of the departed (he was generous, hospitable, gracious, chivalrous, well-mannered, wise, brave, all to a supreme degree), a prayer for his soul, and a statement of the poet's sense of loss, the sincerity of which is sometimes open to question.

PLÉIADE. Although lit. hist. has used this term to designate a group of 16th-c. Fr. poets, it is a misnomer. Pierre de Ronsard (1524–85), the leader of the group, used it once, in 1556, to welcome a new member by referring to the name chosen by well-known Alexandrine poets who had themselves borrowed it from the constellation in the northern sky. Ronsard's friends, however, preferred the term Brigade, with its more militant connotation, whenever they referred to their intellectual circle. Ten years after its first and last mention by Ronsard, Henri Estienne used it in his Apologie pour Hérodote in confident expectation that it would be understood to refer to the contemp. group of Fr. poets. Yet only in the early 19th c. did the term Pléiade become associated with a mythical school whose agenda was then viewed as exemplary and prefiguring the profound literary aspirations of *romanticism.

Although membership in the Pléiade varied with the years, it did not at any time exceed seven. Four major poets had lifetime status: Joachim du Bellay (ca. 1522–60), Jean-Antoine de Baïf (1532–89), Étienne Jodelle (1532–73), and Pontus de Tyard (1521–1605). In 1555, two early members, Guillaume Des Autels (1529–81) and Jean de La Péruse (1529–54), were replaced by Jacques Peletier (1517–82) and Remy Belleau (1528–77). According to Ronsard's first biographer, Claude Binet, the name of Peletier was eventually replaced by that of the poet's teacher, Jean Dorat (1508–88), one of the great Hellenists of the Fr. Ren. Three members of the Pléiade were influential contributors to Fr. poetic theory of the Ren.: Peletier, du Bellay, and Ronsard himself. As early as 1541, Peletier had published a trans. of Horace's Ars poetica prefaced by remarks of his own that enunciated the fundamental principle later adopted by Ronsard and his associates: that Fr. writers should defend and illustrate (i.e., render illustrious) their own lang. by writing in Fr., not Lat. or Gr. In 1555, Peletier published his Art poétique in which he reaffirmed the position he had adopted in the 1541 preface to Ars poetica, insisted on the divine nature of poetry, and discussed the relationship between technique and native endowment, the function of imitation, the varieties of poetic subjects, and genres (Patterson; see renaissance poetics).

In matters of theory, both du Bellay and Ronsard may be called disciples of Peletier. The former published in 1549 the renowned Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse, which, though it followed by eight or more years Peletier's preface, became, because it arrived precisely at the right moment and because of the intensity of its lang., the *manifesto of the new "school." Du Bellay blames the alleged poverty of the Fr. lang. of his time on the unwillingness of earlier generations of Frenchmen to devote their energies to its cultivation. Intrinsically, he says, it is capable of the highest reaches of poetic and philosophic expression and need not bow in these respects before any of the langs. of antiquity or mod. times. This is the essence of his deffence. As for the illustration, du Bellay rejects the position that trans. of the great classics into Fr. can of itself suffice to raise Fr. literature to a status of equality with Gr., Lat., or It. The Fr. poet needs so intimate a knowledge of the classics and of the more important mod. lits. that their substance will become part of his own and that ideally his imitation of them will result in a natural assimilation and transformation.

The Abrégé de l'art poétique françois of Ronsard (1565) is a brief practical handbook intended for the young beginner in poetry. Like Peletier and du Bellay, Ronsard's fundamental premise is that the poet must write in Fr., although he too demands that the would-be writer possess as profound a cl. instruction as possible. He demands that the poet, who for him is the inspired prophet of the Muses, should hold them "in singular veneration and never reduce them to a position of dishonorable servitude" (Œuvres complètes, 1993).

To form a clear idea of the contribution of the Pléiade in the area of poetic practice, it is useful to consider each member's accomplishments and, in the works of these poets, which features proved to be the most creative and enduring. Baïf, although innovative in many ways (he founded the Fr. Academy of Poetry and Music in 1570), unsuccessfully tried to adopt a Greco-Lat. quantitative meter (see classical prosody, meter, quantity), which proved unfit to Fr. ears. Belleau, a gifted trans. of Anacreon, obtains striking effects in praising natural objects like the cherry, the oyster, or the snail (what he calls "petites inventions") and the mystical virtues of precious stones (1576). Tyard, Leone Ebreo's able trans. and a theorist of Neoplatonism, makes a powerful case for poetry as "divine fury" (see FUROR POETICUS). Jodelle's stand against *Petrarchism makes him the most unruly member of the group. He is also the author of Cléopâtre captive, the first *tragedy of the Fr. repertory. With the exception of Ronsard, du Bellay outstripped the other members of the Pléiade in his mastery of the *sonnet, in the music of his syllables (see SYLLABIC VERSE), and in expressiveness of inner feeling, esp. the nostalgia of his Roman poetry in his Antiquités, imitated by Edmund Spenser, and the satire of It. mores in his Regrets. The range and the quality of the poetic activity of Ronsard, however, place him unquestionably above his colleagues.

Ronsard's sense of the dignity of his poetic calling is reflected in the cl. and It. forms that he chose: the *ode, the sonnet, the *elegy, the *eclogue. The technical mastery that he amply demonstrates in these is matched by sound placement, concrete *diction, grace of expression, and rhythm in a wide variety of metrical forms. His sure taste seized on the *alexandrine and demonstrated for all time its peculiar suitability to the Fr. tongue. To embellish his verse, Ronsard made bold and broad use of the abundant resources of cl. mythology. He imparted renewed validity to the legends of antiquity by adopting them as his principal mode of figurative expression, at a time that these myths were still perceived by some with mistrust. In his hands, myth became the means of exploring the many facets of human experience.

If Ronsard's leadership of the Pléiade springs from the wider range of form and theme that he deploys, it is, nevertheless, as a poet of love that he excels. In this key area, he seeks and finds originality by adroit exploitation of both Petrarchan and Neoplatonic topoi (see TOPOS), through which devices he expresses his sufferings on the one hand and idealizes the object of his love on the other. Yet over and above the traditional erotic imagery, Ronsard weaves into his *love poetry a perception of *nature that is at once fresh and intimate. Few poets have been able to capture the exquisite mingling of beauty and ephemerality that haunts the celebrated Ode à Cassandre. At this level, Ronsard achieves his goal of rivaling the ancient poets, while leaving for posterity a practical aesthetic.

Soon after Ronsard's death (1585), François de Malherbe (1555–1628) campaigned against the Pléiade's aesthetic inadequacies (lack of regularity, excessive imagery, uncontrolled ling. creation) as the idea of "progress" developed in the arts and sciences. For the next two centuries, Ronsard and his friends were lumped together as representatives of pedantic erudition and bad taste. They finally rose from the grave where the Enlightenment had buried them with C. A. Sainte-Beuve's polemical efforts in his Tableau de la poésie française (1828). As the romantic period begins, qualities of subjective lyricism, equally present in the poets of the Pléiade but neglected during the period of Fr. *classicism, came once more to the fore. The influence of the Pléiade was thus durable and pervasive, and it is fair to say that the principles laid down by Peletier, du Bellay, and Ronsard have not lost their vigor, except among poets for whom harmony and sonority take precedence over communication.

PLOCE, ploche (Gr., "plaiting"; Lat. iteratio). The genus of figures for word repetition, with or without intervening words, generally in proximity in the clause or line; commonly conflated with epizeuxis. Quintilian and Herodian define epizeuxis as repetition with no words intervening, while George Puttenham in the Arte of English Poesie (1589) defines ploce as "speedy iteration of one word but with some little intermission by inserting one or two words between." Examples of ploce include Euripides' "O mortal man, think mortal thoughts" (Alcestis I), Philip Sidney's "Even those sad words in sad me did breed" (Astrophil and Stella 58.14) and Alexander Pope's "Where Wigs with Wigs, with Sword-knots Sword-knots strive, / Beaus banish Beaus, and Coaches Coaches drive" (The Rape of the Lock 101–2). Examples of epizeuxis are Shakespeare's "Never, never, never, never, never" and "Then kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill" from King Lear, and "Tomorrow, and tomorrow, and tomorrow" and "O horror, horror, horror" from Macbeth. Representative examples from the 19th c. include Alfred, Lord Tennyson's poem "Break! Break! Break!" and many of G. M. Hopkins's poems, e.g., "The Leaden Echo and the Golden Echo," which includes both "to despair, to despair, / Despair, despair, despair, despair" and "We follow, now we follow.—Yonder, yes yonder, yonder, yonder, / Yonder." Twentieth-c. Am. poet Stephen Crane employs both ploce and epizeuxis in his poem "In the Desert." Both poetic figures are widespread in 20th- and 21st-c. poetry. Epizeuxis is common in hip-hop lyrics (e.g., Flo Rida's "Low").

Johannes Susenbrotus writes in Epitome troporum ac schematum (1563) that epizeuxis is valuable "for the sake of greater vehemence" in speech, imitating the iterations natural to moments of great emotion. Sometimes the meaning of the word may be altered by its repetition. Some scholars argue that vehement repetition indicates avoidance or repression, while others believe that ploce concerns simple iterations of a word without a shift in its grammatical form or meaning.

More complex rhetorical figures that deploy word repetition in syntax are *anaphora (word-repetition at beginnings), epistrophe (at ends), symploce (a combination of the two preceding, i.e., one word repeated at beginnings), *epanalepsis (same word repeated at beginning and at end), and *anadiplosis (word at end of one line repeated at beginning of the next). In written poetic forms, these figures take advantage of the heightened visibility offered by the special status of boundaries in the flow of discourse; in performance poetry, these repetitions often provide formal structure in the absence of a visible poem. Hip-hop lyrics often employ repetitive wordplay to emphasize *syncopation with the musical beat.

PLOT may be defined as the pattern or structure of textual events. Conceptions of plot vary, but common to most of them is the notion of a sequence of actions related by chronology and perhaps also by causality. While some theorists use the term to designate any textual design, plot is more commonly considered a feature of temporal structures. Although plot has traditionally been associated with drama, epic, and prose fiction, it may figure in any genre, from sonnet (e.g., John Milton's "Methought I saw my late espouséd Saint") to painting (e.g., William Hogarth's "Rake's Progress"). Though technically plot may refer to any sequence of actions in a text, it is also usually associated with event structures that can be related to textual themes. As Frye conceives it, e.g., plot is theme in movement; theme is plot at rest. Most narrative theorists consider plot an element of a text's deep structure, independent of the precise lang. or surface form of a work, and thus able to be translated, summarized, or transposed to another medium: thus, a single plot—say, Figaro's marriage—can be represented as a drama, opera, verse narrative, film, or summary. Some theorists (e.g., Smith) maintain, however, that these different retellings are necessarily distinct versions and thus arguably different plots.

Until the 20th c., analyses of plot were framed almost entirely within the terms given by Aristotle, for whom plot is the most essential element of dramatic art. Aristotle's Poetics defines plot (mythos) as "the imitation of the action" and "the arrangement of the incidents," stressing at once the content and its representational form. Aristotle favors "whole and complete" plots that include a "beginning, a middle, and an end"; involve a change of fortune that seems probable or inevitable rather than accidental or mechanical; and retain a strict unity of action, "so that, if any part is displaced or deleted, the whole plot is disturbed and dislocated." The best plots develop through recognition (anagnorisis, a change from ignorance to knowledge) and reversal (peripeteia, a corresponding change of situation to its opposite). Particularly when events are "unexpectedly interconnected," the well-wrought tragic plot creates the experience of pity and terror that Aristotle considers the project of tragedy (see CATHARSIS). Aristotle also believes that different genres necessitate different forms of plot: a "double" plot is appropriate to *comedy, in which "the good are rewarded and the bad punished," while in *tragedy, a "single" plot represents a hero's suffering.

Although plot does indeed dominate the literary works that Aristotle analyzes, his privileging of plot over character and his strictures for good plotting have been challenged as historically and culturally contingent. Esp. in explorations of mod. lit., with its focus on individual psychology and inner life, character has been considered more important than plot, and a focus on plot has sometimes been seen as a deterrent to the representation of character. Henry James's "The Art of Fiction" (1884) mediates the argument by asking, "What is character but the illustration of incident? What is incident but the revelation of character?" Other theorists have argued that the tightly wrought, logical plot, with its corresponding aesthetic of closure and unity, assumes a deterministic universe. Some theorists have likewise challenged Forster's cl. distinction between plot—a causal sequence of events—and story—a mere temporal succession—rejecting the association of plot with causality and even arguing (e.g., Richardson) that textual sequence suffices to constitute a plot. Some feminist and queer theorists (e.g., de Lauretis, Miller, Lanser, and Farwell) suggest that plots may be structured through (hierarchical) distinctions of gender and sexuality attendant upon social practices, while postcolonial and race critics (e.g., Gates) have described hybrid plot forms born of cross-cultural contact and conflict. Under such reconceptions, narratives that Aristotelian poetics might have deemed "plotless" or "poorly plotted" become signs of social difference, cultural resistance, or literary diversity.

During the early decades of the 20th c., critical attention both to character and to the *"close reading" of texts led some scholars to deem plot scarcely worth critical analysis. At the same time, however, formally oriented theorists, less interested in prescribing and evaluating plots than in identifying their distinguishing features and potential dynamics, began to give plot a renewed prominence. Propp broke new ground in identifying 31 "functions," or actions defined "from the point of view of [their] significance for the course of action of the tale as a whole," that occur in invariant order (though not invariant number) in every Rus. tale. Viktor Shklovsky proposed in 1919 what became a widely accepted understanding of plot by distinguishing between events as ordered in the content of the story (fabula) and events as the text arranges and presents them (sjuzet), a distinction that Fr. *structuralism more or less replicates in the terms histoire and récit. The work of these early analysts was continued in the Fr. *structuralism of the 1960s as scholars of narrative (often called "narratologists") sought to identify the specific mechanisms or "grammar" of plot. Genette influentially analyzed the relationship through his exploration of narrative order, attending in particular to temporal features that reshape story into plot. Within this framework, plot comes to be a function of the relationship between the story's chronological events (histoire) and the order and manner in which they are revealed in the temporality and spatiality of the text (récit).

Abstracting from Propp's notion of functions, other narrative theorists have explored the "verbal" position of action within a narrative "grammar" (e.g., Todorov) and the interrelated temporal and thematic reversals that plot effects (Greimas). Bremond's "logic of narrative" proposes that every event sequence opens a binary of actualization vs. nonactualization, which can open a further binary of success or failure, so that all plot relies on a continual tension between contrary forces. Pavel likewise formulates plot in terms of "moves," each of which is defined as "the choice of an action among a number of alternatives" in a rule-governed situation. Ryan's influential concept of "possible worlds" extends Bremond's notion to see plot as the "network of possibilities" that readers of narrative anticipate; by incorporating virtual domains that reside only in the minds of characters, Ryan sees plot as emerging from the interaction between actual and virtual realities. Bakhtin has usefully added the concept of chronotope, through which narratives plot along time-space trajectories, which are deployed differently in different genres and historical contexts. Within these various models, plot becomes a complex structure in which multiple textual elements (order, pacing, point of view) participate.

Although such investigations of plot seem to assume a set of structures inherent in the text, many mod. critics see plot as a construction undertaken by readers according to a set of conventions learned through the practice of reading. As Culler puts it, "the reader must organize the plot as a passage from one state to another and this passage or movement must be such that it serves as a representation of theme. The end must be made a transformation of the beginning so that meaning can be drawn from the perception of resemblance and difference." Plot thus becomes a reading effect that may be imposed upon the most unconventional narratives to render them intelligible and orderly. When understood as constituted by and constituting the interrelationship among all textual elements, plot becomes, phenomenologically, "the intelligible whole that governs a succession of events in any story" (Ricoeur). Taking impetus from dynamic, reader-oriented narrative inquiries, cognitively oriented narratologists (e.g., Herman, Fludernik, Dannenberg) have begun to explore the mental operations by which readers process plots and the ways in which narrative capacities and plot forms have intersected with human social devel. (Zunshine, Flesch).

Distinguishing among types of plot is a continuing critical project that dates from Aristotle's distinctions between tragedy and comedy. Frye's Anatomy of Criticism, attempting to classify the whole of lit. through intersecting typologies, names four mythoi or generic plots: comedy, which typically involves movement from one society to another, usually through marriage; romance, which carries forth the adventure or quest plot; tragedy, which emphasizes the individual whose fall brings about the disintegration of family or society; and irony or satire, which represent struggles between societies or social norms. Categorizations of plot are famously myriad: Crane categorizes plots by subject matter and Ryan by narrative world types, while Todorov looks within a seemingly unified genre—the detective novel—to distinguish the formal dynamics of the "whodunit" from those of the "thriller."

Psychoanalytic theorists, often synthesizing cl. and postmod. notions of plot, have added a further dimension to our understanding of the term in arguing that plot forms articulate unconscious as well as conscious desires. Sophocles' Oedipus Rex, e.g., exposes human psychodynamics as Oedipus is taken over by the discourse of the oracle and not only lives out but fails to recognize the horror of his deeds until his need to know becomes imperative. Oedipus thus exposes a plot beneath the plot: a chaotic story that threatens to disturb the coherence of the traditional plot, which becomes, in turn, an effort both to repress and to articulate desire. The reader's construction of plot may then be seen as a response not simply to learned conventions but to deeper needs for certain kinds of revelation, repetition, and control. Thus, in ways that evoke Aristotle's notion of catharsis, psychoanalytic critics (e.g., Brooks) see plot not only as inscribing structures of desire but as drawing readers into displaced engagements with their own desires, incl. the wish, already apparent in Oedipus, for a mastery that cannot be attained. And as it is in the nature of desire that it will be endlessly repeated, never completely fulfilled or understood, people will always be "reading for the plot."

POEM. A composition, often in *lines, that draws on some or all of the following common features: *rhythm, *meter, *figuration (incl. rhetorical *schemes and *tropes), and *artifice (incl. *diction and syntax). Poems of different times and places do not necessarily resemble one another so much as they share a recognition from their respective cultures that they embody poeticity or what the Rus. linguist Roman Jakobson called the poetic function: "Poeticity is present when the word is felt as a word and not a mere representation of the object being named or an outburst of emotion, when words and their composition, their meaning, their external and inner form acquire a weight and value of their own instead of referring indifferently to reality." The poem comes into existence when an actual set of elements such as those named above is attached to the relevant cultural category (e.g., Fr. poème, Ger. Gedicht, Hungarian vers, Polish wiersz, or Chinese shi*). Not only is a poem both made and recognized as such by its maker or others, but the network of related concepts, most manifestly poetry* and poet*, is potentially modified by the admission of the new poem. Poem is not a universal concept: sometimes, as in the Occitan vers*, the relevant term means "verse" (in the sense of a single line or several lines, a strictly technical meaning) and only implies poem (in the culturally recognized sense).

As the integer or complete constitutive unit of poetry, the poem displays some of the generative principles theorized in poetics such as *equivalence, *unity, *intertextuality, or *defamiliarization. In principle, it is often a statement in little of a poetics (derived from, e.g., *classical poetics, *futurism, *objectivism, or other established or ad hoc principles). However, in practice—i.e, under reading or *interpretation—the character of the poem, like that of any work of lit., is often autonomous, equivocal, or ambiguous. If poems are made by their creators, they are often remade in interpretation by each generation of readers.

Theorists, poets, and observers have more often defined poetry than the term poem. Unlike the *genre or medium we call poetry, which maintains a theoretical and practical discourse going back to Plato, the object into which poetry is usually resolved, the poem, is notoriously hard to isolate and discuss. Theories of poetry may be classified in a number of ways, notably according to the scheme advanced by M. H. Abrams in the 1950s and developed since, which considers four kinds of theories: mimetic, expressive, pragmatic, and objective.

The first two categories, which are concerned with *mimesis and *expression, respectively, and thus are associated with cl. and romantic doctrines, while they often address the nature of the poem, tend to give more attention to other factors, such as the nature of poetry or the power of the poet; in contrast, theories of the latter two categories often have a great deal to say about the poem in the context of their propositions about poetry. Pragmatic theories in the West, as Abrams shows, derive from ancient rhetorical theory and esp. from Horace's Ars poetica (1st c. BCE), which emphasizes the effects produced in the reader who is taught and moved. Much poetic theory of the Ren. and the Enlightenment is largely pragmatic, but this approach belongs to no age; it may appear in any time or place in which the ends or effects of poetry are in focus (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS, RENAISSANCE POETICS). Abrams argues that, in Europe, objective theories develop in the 18th c. out of two models for the poem: the "heterocosmic model," which grants each poem the status of a "unique, coherent, and autonomous world," and the "contemplation model," which emphasizes the disinterested study of the poem. Notions of the poem as world are esp. prevalent in the work of Ren. thinkers such as Torquato Tasso, J. C. Scaliger, and Philip Sidney; but one might argue that they proceed from a certain understanding of poetry as world-making and the poet as a godlike creator rather than from a speculative attention to the nature of the poem per se. Alexander Baumgarten's dictum in Meditationes Philosophicae de Nonnullis ad Poema Pertinentibus (Reflections on Poetry, 1735)—"the poet is like a maker or creator, so the poem ought to be like a world"—indicates his prior assumptions about the poem. Likewise, the contemplative approach often has more to do with valorizing the role of the perceiver or reader—augmenting his or her office with a moral and even theological dimension—than with a new idea of the poem itself as somehow suitable for contemplation.

Romantic and decadent thinkers such as John Keats and E. A. Poe bring a new measure of concern to the nature of the poem as such: any hist. of ideas about the poem must take account of Poe's famous statement that "a poem is such, only inasmuch as it intensely excites, by elevating, the soul, and all intense excitements are through a psychal necessity, brief" ("The Philosophy of Composition," 1849). Charles Baudelaire repeats this observation: "anything that exceeds the period of attention which a human being can give to the poetic form is no longer a poem" (see ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS). But it is really under the auspices of *modernism—when poems were very long as often as very short—that a concentration of speculative power attaches to the poem itself, perhaps through an exhaustion with general and idealist theories of poetry, perhaps through a new awareness of the social and cultural lives of poems as objects in the world, like paintings and sculptures.

Observations about the nature of the poem by poets and critics of the 1900s and after tend to be not only object- rather than genre-oriented but openly prescriptive and empirical rather than theoretical, and may be nakedly ideological as well: after all, this is a question that lends itself to pronouncements and dicta more readily than does the nature of the genre. For instance, Ezra Pound's famous "A Retrospect" about *imagism (1918) is a set of prescriptions at the level of the poem rather than of poetry (e.g., "to use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation"); in Pound's assessment of the preceding six years of imagism, "perhaps a few good poems have come from the new method, and if so it is justified." Emphasizing craft, procedure, and values, many such modernist observations seem intended to shed the idealisms and mystifications that had accumulated around the idea of poetry since at least the Ren. Even the gnomic "Ars Poetica" (1926) by Archibald MacLeish, composed during his sojourn in the community of Am. expatriates in Paris, restates these premises while perhaps inadvertently reintroducing mystification: "A poem should not mean / But be."

To be precise, notions about the poem are articulated on a different plane than theories about poetry itself. The assumptions and practices of a reader confronted with an actual poem are often ideological and experiential rather than theoretical; practical and object-oriented instead of abstract. The question "How do I go about understanding this poem?" is not fully answered by Abrams's four doctrines, which provide broad principles for the nature of poetry; operating within those doctrines, readers in empirical practice tend to follow procedures that reflect their education, interests, or inclinations. These reading and writing practices belong to at least four categories: the assimilationist, the integrationist, the artifactualist, and the irreducibilist. While any of these may coincide with the kinds of theories of poetry that Abrams and others describe, they are more ad hoc than those theories, often more assumed or felt than reasoned. Moreover, they are not radically separate from one another; rather, these positions are often in conversation with one another, so that traces of one become visible even in what appears to be an uncompromising statement of the other.

Assimilationist accounts of the poem emphasize its continuity with other literary and cultural genres and forms. From this standpoint, poetry may be close to narrative and drama (for instance, it may be fundamentally dramatic, as in Kenneth Burke's theory of dramatism), or the poem may deeply resemble other sorts of art objects or events such as painting, sculpture, or dance. Perhaps Horace, with his dictum ut pictura poesis, is the original assimilationist, but many other critics and readers of the postclassical era, from Sidney to Ezra Pound to the textual artist Kenneth Goldsmith, subscribe to this notion.

Integrationists take seriously the notion that poems rarely exist in isolation from other poems and, thus, seek to absorb them into larger wholes such as *anthologies, *books, *songbooks, *lyric sequences, genres, schools, and movements. Implicitly or directly, they may challenge the premise that the poem is the relevant integer of analysis. Much scholarship on *medieval poetry, of Asia as well as Europe, is of this sort, reflecting the conditions in which many premod. poems were performed or written, with little or no investment in the idea of the individual poem; likewise, a great deal of crit. concerning Ren. sonneteers from Petrarch through the early 17th c. The genre crit. of Eur. poetry that was current from the late 1950s (prompted by Northrop Frye's "Theory of Genres" in Anatomy of Criticism, 1957) to about 1980 followed an integrationist paradigm.

The artifactualist position does not always entail an understanding of the poem's nature different from that of the two categories already mentioned; in fact, it may serve as the adjunct to any of the other positions, relating to any and all of them in some measure. An artifactualist statement describes a poem as the expression of some abstract principle—*form, *structure, *texture, artifice, hist.—and describes or narrates how such a principle becomes manifest in the poem we have. It is tempting to think of artifactualism as the default position of mod. poetics because its reliance on formal description in the service of various possible ends strikes many contemp. readers as natural and inevitable. To put it another way, from the mid-20th c. on, nearly any other position from *historicism to *formalism to personalism (the construal of poems according to one's own poetic practice) may compromise with artifactualism without incurring the charge of inconsistency; on the contrary, the neglect of artifactualism may be reproached as insufficiently attentive to the poem itself. Many poets who do not articulate an explicit poetics but discuss the making of their and others' poems are loosely artifactualist (e.g.,W. B. Yeats, Pablo Neruda, Cid Corman), as are many critics who give their attention to the sources, genesis, and reception of particular poems (e.g., Hugh Kenner on Pound's career) and many critics who are also poets, such as Veronica Forrest-Thomson. Readers of Anglo-Am. poetry who are accustomed to thinking of historicism and formalism as opposed positions may think it odd to find both standpoints in the same category. Nonetheless, it is the nature of a default position to stand invisibly behind views that ostentatiously stage a competition even as they agree in fundamental matters.

Finally, the irreducibilist view is that every poem is a unique event unassimilable to genres and the other arts and only minimally responsive to general values such as form, craft, or period. Octavio Paz asks, "How can we lay hold on poetry if each poem reveals itself as something different and irreducible? . . . Poetry is not the sum of all poems. Each poetic creation is a self-sufficient unit. The part is the whole." Irreducibilists may be at once the ultimate historicists (not only every period but every poem—its own period—must be read on its terms) and the ultimate formalists (each poem generates a unique formal protocol that must be recovered and explained); and while irreducibilism may accept something like an artifactualist position in practice, its logical outcome is properly spoken by Paz when he asserts that "each poem is a unique object, created by a 'technique' that dies at the very moment of creation." A strict irreducibilism would hold that, when poems are susceptible to analysis under rubrics such as genre or form, they have failed as poems ("when a poet acquires a style, a manner, he stops being a poet and becomes a constructor of literary artifacts"). A further step in this doctrine notes that most critics and readers, fixated on constants in poetry such as form or style, are unable to recognize what is properly poetic in the objects they address or the creators who made them. While the irreducibilist strain runs through a great deal of historical and contemp. discourse on poetry, uncompromising (as opposed to merely nominal or superstitious) irreducibilists are rare. The It. philosopher Benedetto Croce was one. The kind of experimental poet who produces poems and perhaps manifestos but not crit. or who is uninterested in formulating an explicit poetics is often an irreducibilist; the Brazilian modernist Oswald de Andrade sometimes expresses such views, and several well-known poems of the later modernist era in Brazil (Manuel Bandeira's "O Último Poema" ["The Last Poem," 1968] and Carlos Drummond de Andrade's "Procura da Poesia" [Search for Poetry, 1945]) take this stance. Some of the less discursive, more atomistic work associated with the era of *Language poetry in the U.S. belongs to an irreducibilist impulse (e.g., Bruce Andrews, P. Inman). Paz is among the most prominent poet-critics to embrace the position without equivocation; it does not impede but curiously enlivens his most important work of crit., concerning the Mexican *baroque poet Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

As object and event, an inalienable element of lives and societies, the poem responds as much to cultural and personal notions as to theories and doctrines of poetry. It may seem so ubiquitous as to be invisible, so firmly possessed as to be ours alone, so natural as to resist abstraction. To take these conditions into account while explaining the poem in principle is one of the continual challenges of poetics.

POET. The Greeks called the poet a "maker"—poiētēs or poētēs—and that word took hold in Lat. and other Eur. langs., incl. It., Fr., and Eng. But what precisely does the poet make? The obvious answer is *poems, the arrangements of words that he or she composes. Yet poets have often been given credit for bolder kinds of making. According to ancient Gr. fables, Amphion built Thebes from stones his songs called into place, and Orpheus's songs drew trees and beasts and stones to follow him. Ren. critics allegorized these stories as the harmonious beginning of civilization: poets had tamed the wilderness and softened the hearts of men. In the Defence of Poesy, Philip Sidney thought that the poet delivered a golden world, "in making things either better than Nature bringeth forth, or, quite anew, forms such as never were in Nature." Potentially that power of creation resembles, at one remove, the power of the Creator who first made the world. Other cultures have also regarded poets as godlike. Vyasa, who is both the putative author of the Indian Mahābhārata and a character in the epic, sometimes seems to be an avatar of the god Krishna. And even those who find such exalted views of the poet presumptuous or absurd concede that poets are capable of making fabulous fictions or myths (see FICTION, POETRY AS). Historically, most nations and societies have preserved poems, usually attributed to a specific maker, that embody their trads. and values. The works of Homer were so revered in ancient Greece that they supplied the basis of education. In this way, the poet can represent a whole community bound by a common lang. and stories that everyone knows.

The ideal of the poet as maker of golden worlds and founding myths tends to lose sight of the maker of poems, however, who dwindles to a mere name or legend. No one knows with any certainty who Homer was or where or when he lived or whether he was blind or even whether any one person composed the works attributed to him. Thus, "Homer" signifies a stamp of authenticity, a name that certifies the greatness of the poems. The effort to trace a particular person seems incidental to the aura of the maker. The first poet recorded by hist., Enheduanna of Ur (ca. 2400 BCE), was the daughter of King Sargon and priestess of Inanna (Ishtar), whom she magnifies in hymns that also refer to herself. Yet the goddess, the historical figure, the poet, and the legend are hard to separate, esp. since mss. of these poems date from centuries later. Similar problems veil the identities of virtually all early poets. In works preserved through oral trads. or scattered tablets, it is generally impossible to single out the original maker or to determine whether such an individual ever existed. Often the title of author falls to the scholar who first put a standard text together or wrote it down. Thus, the Mesopotamian Epic of Gilgamesh is supposed to have been revised and codified by Sîn-liqe-unninni (ca. 1200 BCE), a priest and scribe who lived more than a millennium after the work began and who inherited the honor of being its poet. Mod. ideas of authorship are challenged by these attributions. Nevertheless, the name of the poet casts a spell, as "Sappho" lends luster to every scrap or fragment of verse ascribed to her. It is as if the power of wonderful poems compelled their audiences to imagine the wonder-workers or divine spirits who made them. In the Heb. Bible, great hymns and songs are traditionally associated with inspired leaders and kings such as Moses (Deut. 32, 33), David (Ps.), and Solomon (Song of Sol.). Here the maker of nations absorbs the maker of verses; only someone anointed by God seems worthy of this sublime lang.

From this point of view, the poet is someone chosen, not someone who willfully tries to make poems. Hesiod, the poet of the Theogony (ca. 700 BCE), introduces himself as a shepherd tending his flock on Helicon when the *Muses descended on him, gave him a staff of bay, breathed a voice into him, and instructed him to spend his life singing their praises. Variations on this theme recur in many other times and places. In a prologue attached to some versions of the Rāmāyana, when the illiterate Vālmīki sees a hunter shoot a crane, the cries of its grieving mate inspire him to invent the meter (sloka) in which, at the bidding of Brahma, he will compose the epic that follows. Another illiterate, Cædmon, was sleeping in a cowshed, according to the Venerable Bede (ca. 731 CE), when a mysterious voice taught him to sing in praise of God. Sophisticated poets of later eras have also felt themselves to be chosen—sometimes, as with Friedrich Hölderlin, almost against their will. John Keats's Fall of Hyperion (1856) begins with a vision in which the narrator, in mortal peril, confronts the possibility that he might be an idle dreamer rather than a chosen poet; the issue was unresolved, and the poem remained unfinished. But many lovers of poetry still contend that no one can resolve to be a poet or learn the trade because poets are born—or chosen—not made.

To call someone a true poet, therefore, is frequently less a description than a glorification. The word itself implies a superior talent, if not a touch of *genius. In many fields, as Horace famously advised, mediocrity is quite acceptable—a second-rate lawyer can still do useful work—but neither men nor gods nor booksellers can abide a would-be poet. A number of terms distinguish poets from pretenders, who are called versemongers and versifiers, poetasters and rhymers. Even in mod. times, when canonizing a chosen few might be regarded as judgmental or elitist, it seems important to decide who qualifies as a poet and who does not. Verdicts like these apply to every kind of verse maker, to lyricists and *troubadours as well as *poets laureate; not every candidate can be the real thing. Perhaps a lingering sense of the role of those poets who once functioned as priests and prophets or as the living memory of their people accounts for the claims still made for poets, even in societies that do not award them much status or financial support. Yet secular eras have also reserved a special place for those who seem to be born to the calling. Cædmon's story set a pattern that has been often repeated. A fascination with "natural," uneducated makers of verse grew esp. strong in 18th- and 19th-c. Britain, when working-class or peasant geniuses appealed to the reading public; and at least two, Robert Burns and John Clare, eventually came to be recognized as major poets. Nature, not art, was supposed to have formed them and blessed them with inspiration. More recently, in 1955, Minou Drouet, just eight years old, became a best-selling Fr. poet (despite suspicions that her mother had written the poems). Apparently, children too can be struck by the muse.

A rival view of the poet, however, would stress the importance of learning a craft. From that perspective, poets are made, not born. As a demanding vocation, poetry requires unceasing study, a knowledge of what other poets have done, a mastery of *prosody and all the tools of verse, and lifelong practice. Such study is needed still more as the poet ages. Almost everyone is capable of writing one heartfelt poem, it is sometimes said, but only someone devoted to the craft of poetry can continue to write and to grow (Drouet stopped writing poems when she was 14). Moreover, the poet must understand the world in order to write well about it. Through much of hist., poetry was considered a type of learning, and "the learned poet" furnished an example to be followed. Scholars and critics often looked down on writers who were unacquainted with cl. texts. In The Wisdom of the Ancients (1609), Francis Bacon interpreted Orpheus as "a representation of universal Philosophy"; the archetypal poet was also the archetypal sage. The association of poetry with wisdom spans many cultures. It has been esp. powerful in early societies around the world, from the Americas to Africa to Iceland to Java, where native poets have supplied some basic models of how to live. But cl. trads. in the West have asked the poet for supreme craftsmanship as well as universal knowledge. In this respect, the exemplary figure is Virgil, who in late Roman times and in the Middle Ages came to be known simply as "the Poet." Virgil excelled in each of the genres most admired in his time: *eclogues, *georgics, epic; he absorbed and improved on the best poems of the past; in search of perfection, he wrote only a few lines a day and constantly revised them; he created not only individual poems but the pattern of a full poetic career, in which the poet progresses through stages until each work seems part of one great whole, the lifework of the poet. Yet, in addition, Virgil was renowned as a vates or seer who had foreseen the coming of Christ and learned the secrets of the dead and whose works could be consulted to divine the future (the sortes Virgilianæ). Hence, "the Poet," both craftsman and magus, guides Dante through hell and purgatory in the Divine Comedy until, at the earthly paradise, they reach the limits of pagan and earthly knowledge. The poet Dante acknowledges his master and at the same time asserts the superiority of a Christian worldview. But together the two great poets affirm the value of their vocation, a craft that, pursued through a lifetime, culminates in understanding and bringing word of first and last things through art.

In such works, the master craftsman mounts above any mere human being. "The Poet" may take the name of Virgil, but he has gone far beyond the particular person who once lived and behaved as other people do. As characters in the Divine Comedy, both "Virgil" and "Dante" are useful fictions, filling the roles they play in the grand scheme of the poem. To be sure, the fictional Dante does draw on the memories and opinions of the poet who has created him and whose name he shares. But the relation between the character and his creator can never be taken for granted. In the past few centuries, many poets have tried to close that gap; they insist that the voice that speaks in a poem should be the same as that of the man or woman who made it. The romantics often regarded a capacity for deep feeling as the mark of a poet and direct expression of feeling as the mark of a good or authentic poem. In The Prelude, William Wordsworth gave epic scope to the story of how he had realized himself as a poet; and later poets, such as Walt Whitman and Vladimir Mayakovsky, liked to imply that their work had exposed the naked truth of who they were. Rhetorically, that open self-presentation can help to establish a sense of intimacy between writer and reader. Older poets had also recognized its power. Sappho seems to hold nothing back; Catullus and Ovid seem adept at revealing themselves; Petrarch and Dante confess their personal faults and obsessions. Moreover, even those who are ordinarily more reserved can flash forth at crucial moments. Many readers cherish the passages in Paradise Lost when John Milton, in the first person, thrusts his own struggles and feelings into the story.

It is tempting to view such disclosures as a transparent kind of autobiography, encompassing not only the situation of the poet but his or her inner life. Yet the image of the poet within the poem, like a painter's self-portrait, reveals only as much as will serve an artistic effect. Quite often a glimpse of the person behind the lines may function to tease or intrigue the reader, provoking a curiosity forever invited and yet evaded. T. S. Eliot, for instance, mastered that art, despite his advocacy of "impersonality." Good craftsmen know what to withhold as well as what to divulge. These strategies can be very complex. Hence, self-portraits of poets cover a wide range of forms and purposes, from Li Ch'ing-chao's tz'u to Allen Ginsberg's Howl. In the Japanese genre of the poetic diary (uta nikki) (see JAPANESE POETIC DIARIES), prose and verse combine in a personal journal enriched by an anthol. of poems. Thus, Matsuo Bashō's Narrow Road to the Interior (1689) offers a travelogue sprinkled with haiku in which exquisite descriptions of nature convey the inner landscape of the poet. The diary documents spontaneous impressions of a historical journey into perilous regions. Yet it was carefully revised to accommodate both the facts and the person to a series of moods woven together, as if the writer himself were a work of art. Other poetic genres also insinuate that they are revealing the private life of the poet. The *sonnet sequences of Petrarch, Pierre de Ronsard, and Shakespeare, e.g., have often been combed like diaries for evidence of whom and how the poet loved. But such evidence is untrustworthy at best. The sonnets of Louise Labé offer a famous, searing case hist. of a passionate woman in love; but lately some scholars have argued that Labé never existed and that a group of men concocted those sonnets. Whatever the truth may be, it cannot be determined solely by the testimony of the poems, whose personal voice often echoes the voices of many earlier works. In this way, the poet seems constructed or pieced together from expectations about what a poet should be.

Those expectations also keep changing over time. Perhaps, in the distant past, poets knew just what societies wanted from them. The shaman, the *bard, the court poet all were rewarded for doing their duty, whether as oracles, entertainers, or eulogists of their patrons. Even in those days, they tended to complain about the difficulty of making verses to make a living. Yet their way of life was accepted. In some societies, everyone recognized the value of poetry, which seemed as indispensable as breathing. During most of Chinese hist., from the earliest emperors until the era of Mao Zedong, all educated people could and did write verse, catching fleeting emotions or memorializing special occasions. The practice was so familiar that Chinese has no word that designates "the poet," although great writers like Li Po and Tu Fu were honored as masters or "teachers." In lesser hands, a skillful piece of verse might function to impress superiors or advance a career; a courtier who could not ask a favor from the emperor directly could appeal to him with a poem. But in most mod. societies, poets can seldom rely on being valued or noticed. Since the rise of print culture and the decline of *patronage, they have largely depended on selling their wares to the public, and very few have found that profitable. Nor does poetry seem quite respectable as a profession or job description. The vast majority of poets earn their keep by doing other kinds of work, most often (in the U.S.) by teaching. There is little agreement, moreover, about what they contribute to society or about what society owes them. Poets and lovers of poetry continue to feel that poems provide something essential, whether by revitalizing lang., by noticing things that daily routines pass over, or by reminding readers of what it means to be alive. But much of the public seems content with a world in which the poet has no place at all.

The lack of any well-defined social role might be regarded, even so, as a peculiar advantage. If poets are outsiders, they are free to examine and challenge all the assumptions that other people usually take for granted. One model of the poet was put forward in the 15th c. by François Villon, whose popular ballads traded on his exploits as a ruffian and thief. Four centuries later Charles Baudelaire explored the creative possibilities of evil, Paul Verlaine and Arthur Rimbaud devoted themselves to breaking rules and laws in poems, and Oscar Wilde linked criminals and poets—an association that rappers and other performing rebels still make the most of. But the freedom of poets from social constraints and conventions can also inspire a more positive mission, a resistance to the empty formulas of those in power. When others are afraid to speak, the poet sometimes bears a special burden. In the former Soviet Union, when the government brooked no opposition and suppressed any unauthorized publication—"Poets, we are—and that rhymes with pariahs," Marina Tsvetaeva wrote in "Poets"—a small core of outcast writers, whose poems circulated in secret or by word of mouth, seemed to represent the conscience of the nation. Osip Mandelstam paid with his life for "anti-Soviet" verse, and Anna Akhmatova bore witness to the suffering of her people. Such poetry broke a terrible silence; many readers knew those poems by heart. And poets have seldom been more revered. (In the relative freedom of Russia today, some writers complain, poetry matters less.) Yet the mandate to serve as watchman and witness has not lost its force. Amid the troubles of times and places where free speech is throttled, dissident poets around the world have managed to defy authority and scorn injustice. That social or antisocial role has honored the name of the poet.

Yet most countries tolerate poets. Insofar as the mod. poet does have a voice, it tends to be the still, small voice that lingers in the mind when someone has turned off the busy hum of mass-market diversions. A memorable phrase or two—"the still small voice," "the busy hum"—can alter perceptions. Hence, poets take on the special task of ministering to lang., refining its rhythms, preserving or transforming its stock of words and expressions. Ever since Stéphane Mallarmé, some theorists have claimed that the poet is foremost a maker of lang., giving "a purer sense to the words of the tribe" ("The Tomb of Edgar Poe"). The power of poetic lang. to mold ideas, or even to inspire fresh ways of thinking, had earlier moved P. B. Shelley to declare that "poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the World"; they create the words and ideals that will govern the future. Lately, more skeptical theorists have sometimes reduced the poet to a captive or special effect of lang., a medium in which all human beings are submerged and that dissolves any illusion of a unique personality. Yet somehow that special effect of lang. has survived long after the tongues that first gave rise to it have passed away. The maker of golden worlds and the maker of poems still represent the possibility of making something new. The poet, as R. W. Emerson said, is "the Namer, or Language-maker" who converts the world into words, and that process links the distant past to those who make poems today.

POÈTE MAUDIT. A phrase that reflects the widening gulf in 19th-c. France between the gifted poet and the public on whom his survival might depend. It was given currency by Paul Verlaine's Les Poètes maudits (1884), a collection of essays on poets hardly known at the time, such as Tristan Corbière, Arthur Rimbaud, and Stéphane Mallarmé. A half century earlier, Alfred de Vigny's Stello (1832) had developed, in successive tales about Nicolas-Joseph Gilbert, Thomas Chatterton, and André Chénier, the idea that poets ("the race forever accursed [maudite] by those who have power on earth") are envied and hated for their superior qualities by society and its rulers who fear the truths they tell. Thereafter, a sick, impoverished, or dissolute poet of significant but generally unrecognized talent came to be seen in these terms as doubly victimized by a hostile and insentient society.

POETESS. The Poetess is a generic figure with a long and various hist., often connected to popular poetry with broad national and international circulation and reaching its height in the 19th-c. verse culture of Europe and the U.S. Tracing the use of poetess back to the 16th c., the OED defines the term simply as "a female poet; a woman who composes poetry," but it has also been used in more complex ways since the 18th c. to celebrate or denigrate popular women poets writing within a Poetess trad. (hence, the capital letter, to indicate that trad. at work). After rising to fame, the figure fell into obscurity in 20th-c. crit. until the emergence of second-wave feminism (ca. 1960–90), producing several generations of feminist critics who have contributed to the recovery of "lost" women poets and the reconstruction of "Poetess poetics" from different historical and theoretical perspectives. The Poetess is now understood to be an important figure within lit. hist., as a shifting aesthetic category that is closely linked to historical transformations in mod. reading practices.

In the Middle Ages, the trobairitz* of Occitania and the female trouvères* of France were women poets associated with *song, but they were not Poetesses in the mod. sense of the term, nor were Christine de Pizan, Louise Labé, or most other med. or early mod. female poets. We should not assume that all women poets wrote in a Poetess trad. Rather, such a trad. is highly selective and often involves poets and readers of one era celebrating both antecedents and contemporaries in an act of identification. One recurring prototype for the Poetess is Sappho (fl. ca. 600 BCE), the ancient Gr. poet invoked as "the tenth muse" in antiquity and idealized over the centuries as a woman singing her poems at the origins of a *lyric trad. Educated women poets were often named "a Sappho" or "the Sappho" of their era: Katherine Philips (1632–64) was celebrated as the English Sappho in the 17th c., and by the 18th c., the compliment could also be reversed, as it was by Alexander Pope in a poem addressed to Anne Finch (1661–1720): "In vain you boast Poetick Dames of Yore, / And cite those Sapphoes wee admire no more." Looking toward the future rather than the past, Mary Robinson (1757–1800) sought to legitimize women's poetry in the name of Sappho: in 1797, she published "Sappho and Phaon: A Series of Legitimate Sonnets" with a preface urging her "illustrious country-women" to write for posterity like Sappho, who "knew that she was writing for future ages."

As a detachable figure that exceeded the work of any actual woman poet, the Poetess became a repeatable *trope, a *personification, performed by female poets (and indeed by some male poets, as in the early poetry of Alfred, Lord Tennyson, or E. A. Poe's mimicry of poetesses in his circle). Available for occupancy but also advertising its vacancy, this personification was used for multiple and often contradictory purposes, determined by particular historical contexts but also overdetermined by larger cultural patterns of production and reception in an expanding literary market. The Poetess became common currency in early 19th-c. England and the U.S., when women's verse was increasingly commodified through publication in newspapers, periodicals, musical broadsides, anthols., annuals, decorative eds., and other forms of print.

Among the first to capitalize on this market were Felicia Hemans (1793–1835) and L.E.L. (Letitia Elizabeth Landon, 1802–38). Through the frequent reprinting of poems in Records of Woman (1828) and Songs of the Affections (1830), Hemans became the very type of the popular Brit. Poetess whose character seemed "strongly impressed upon her writing," as noted by L.E.L. in "On The Character of Mrs. Hemans's Writings" (1835). What made Hemans a vivid figure was less an individual self than an idea of national character defined through the domestic ideology of her poetry. The poetry of L.E.L. was an even more elaborate print production, so broadly marketed that it caused speculations about the promiscuous circulation of her literary character. Laman Blanchard's poem "On First Seeing the Portrait of L.E.L." (1841) recalls how she was revealed to the curious public, an anonymous figure first identified only by three magical letters and then transformed into "this dainty little picture" that encouraged readers to read L.E.L. as a personification of the Poetess.

Projecting the Poetess simultaneously into and out of her writing is a convention at the heart of 19th-c. sentimental reading (see SENTIMENTALITY). According to a review of nine "Modern English Poetesses" in the Quarterly Review (1840), the difference between the "I" who writes and the "I" who reads is blurred as "the eye swims too deep in tears and mist over the poetess herself in the frontispiece." Yet what seems most personal in this moment of sympathetic identification proves most abstract, as the poetess in the frontispiece (so often glimpsed in 19th-c. volumes of women's verse) is not "the poetess herself" but a reflection on her personification: not a person but the figure of a figure. The recognition of the figurality of this figure, simultaneously empty and infinitely productive, is a characteristic feature of Poetess poetics, played out in many different versions that proliferated in the course of the century. The anthologizing of women poets was a logical extension of Poetess poetics, in numerous 19th-c. anthols., ranging from Alexander Dyce's Specimens of British Poetesses (1825) and Rufus Griswold's The Female Poets of America (1848) to Eric Robertson's English Poetesses (1883) and Alfred H. Miles's The Women Poets of the Nineteenth Century (1907).

The paradigmatic career of the Poetess embodied in her verse was sufficiently familiar for Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806–61) to narrate in Aurora Leigh (1856). Beginning with the tautology of "I, writing thus," the character of Aurora develops as a reflection both of and on the poetic conventions that make her into a Poetess. This generic autobiography could be read back into the poetic career of Browning, whose "novel poem" consolidated her reputation as exemplary Poetess for other women poets to imitate, on both sides of the Atlantic. The Poetess had already become a vehicle for transnational circulation, esp. through Hemans who served as model for the French poétesse Amable Tastu (1798–1885), the German Dichterin Annette von Droste-Hülshoff (1797–1848), Lydia Sigourney (1791–1865) who was widely known as the American Mrs. Hemans, and the Af. Am. Frances Harper (1825–1911), who performed a complex relation to the racial politics of this cultural category. Later, Mrs. Browning took the place of Mrs. Hemans for aspiring Poetesses, as Emily Dickinson (1930–86) famously wrote: "I think I was enchanted / When first a somber girl / I read that Foreign Lady."

By the end of the century, the Poetess went into global circulation as a domesticated version of "that Foreign Lady," carrying a wide range of ideological implications within different national discourses. Even before the 19th-c. consolidation of the Poetess for the identification of (and with) white bourgeois femininity, Phillis Wheatley (1753–84) had already been read as America's "African Poetess," demonstrating the malleability of a category that could signify what was both familiar and foreign, performing "whiteness" as well as racial "otherness." The "Indian Poetess" Toru Dutt (1856–77) came to be read in England as an exotic figure, celebrated by the critic Edmund Gosse to represent an alien homeland. Later, Gosse also introduced Sarojini Naidu (1879–1949) to Eng. readers who identified (with) the poetess in the frontispiece of her early volumes of verse, pub. in London before she returned to India to become their new "national" poetess (see INDIA, ENGLISH POETRY OF). The international circulation of the Poetess is evident as well in the work of Pauline Johnson (1861–1913), who moved between England and Canada to perform the role of a "Mohawk Indian Princess" identified with a lost nation. The words of the Jewish Am. writer Emma Lazarus (1849–87), famously inscribed on the Statue of Liberty as a personification of a homeland calling out to all immigrants, is another performance of the Poetess as a generic figure.

While the Poetess may seem an obsolete designation (and according to some, a denigration) of the mod. woman writer, we encounter permutations of Poetess poetics well into the 20th c. In 1922, Amy Lowell (1874–1925) published "The Sisters" to reflect on a poetic lineage that includes Sappho, Dickinson, and Browning ("we're a queer lot, / We women who write poetry"), thus acknowledging the Poetess as a vehicle for women's poetry. The Poetess continued to be a mobile figure for mod. women poets (e.g., Angelina Grimké [1880–1958], Edna St. Vincent Millay [1892–1950], Gertrud Kolmar [1894–1943], Marina Tsvetaeva [1892–1941], Bing Xin [1900–99], Sylvia Plath [1932–63]), and this generic category also mobilized critical reading, perhaps most obviously in a renewed impulse to anthologize women's poetry toward the end of the 20th c. Along with selected trans. of women's poems from many langs. for the Defiant Muse series (pub. by The Feminist Press), and popular collections such as Cora Kaplan's Salt and Bitter and Good: Three Centuries of English and American Women Poets (1977), anthols. organized by historical period or nationality are part of an ongoing project to recover women poets, not only in books but in digital archives and other technologies for making their poetry available on line.

Yet, as Lootens argues in her ongoing account of the Poetess trad., the more we try to make the Poetess visible the more she seems to dissolve before our eyes. The primary challenge for the emerging field of Poetess studies is not to treat the figure as a stable object of recovery but to trace the loss of the Poetess as the very means of its literary transmission. One reason for the disappearance and reappearance of the Poetess is that she is not the content of her own generic representation: not an "I," not a consciousness, not a subjectivity, not a *voice, not a *persona, not a self. This has proved a controversial claim among critics whose rhetorical reading of poems as the personal testimony of women poets comes into conflict with the historical recognition that they cannot be recovered from the idealized abstraction of the Poetess that is performed again and again in their poetry. Rather than reading the Poetess expressively, as the expression of a female subject, a more productive approach would be to read the figure even more rhetorically as historical reflection on the very conventions that made it possible for the Poetess to circulate so widely.

POETIC CONTESTS are formal, agonistic exchanges in verse that display some or all of the following characteristics: (1) two or more poet contestants, (2) physically present to each other, (3) in a public setting before witnesses, (4) engaging in a verbal duel or debate that (5) treats a conventionalized or stipulated subject matter (often of an ad hominem variety), (6) undertaken for the sake of a prize, material or spiritual, and (7) resolved through appeal to external judgment. Since all seven elements seldom obtain in a single work, the class of poetic contests is heterogeneous, encompassing several subgenres and defying precise circumscription. Indeed, the poetic contest itself is not a *genre at all but rather the verbal expression of a general mode of human interaction—the aggressive and agonistic—whose roots extend deep into biology and psychology. The distinction between "real" and "imaginary" (or, more precisely, extratextual and intratextual) poetic contests is fundamental though not inviolable. Historically, actual contests (such as the Athenian dionysia) may occasion the composition of poems that contain no contestual elements; fictional contests (such as the Canterbury Tales), on the other hand, may be dramatized in poems that were not themselves products of a contest. Yet the line may be blurred, as when a real poetic contest results in poetic works with contestual elements recognizable only by audiences who knew the original *performance setting. Poetic contests are usually rooted in the world of orality that assumes greater interdependence between poem and presentational context than is customary in the poetries of highly literate societies. When speaking of a poetics of poetic contests, scholars note the various thematizations of competition, such as reference to *metaphors, *riddles, and puzzles, and religious vs. lay discourses. In these versions of the contest, the poet defines himself or herself through a conflict-based literary structure, which can include metaphors of war and violence as a mode of self-expression. In this sense, one might view poetic contests as producing an agonistic aesthetics bound up with a bodily performance against a competitor and before a judge and audience (Kellner and Strohschneider).

Verbal contest forms akin to poetic contests flourished in ancient civilizations. Ancient Gr., Ar., and Celtic legends feature poet-magicians whose satirical verses could produce a range of woes from the raising of blisters to death; occasionally, such versifiers match off in supernatural contests. In heroic poems such as the Iliad, Mahābhārata, Beowulf, and the Chanson de Roland, warrior pairs hurl boasts and insults before battle. In such exchanges, the spoken word poetically cast is perceived as an extension of the vital energy, martial prowess, or moral worth of the speaker. The poetic contest emerges spectacularly into the foreground of Western lit. hist. in the great dramatic festivals of cl. Athens (5th c. BCE). While this contest setting is not directly reflected in the content of Gr. *tragedy, Aristophanes made it the subject of The Frogs, where Aeschylus and Euripides compete posthumously before Dionysus for the laurel crown. From Hellenistic times, singing matches begin to make their appearance in *pastoral poetry, first in Theocritus's Idylls, later in the *eclogues of Virgil and Ren. Eur. poets. Some of the verse *satires of Horace and later writers in the satiric trad. are cast in argumentative, dialogic frames.

It is in the Middle Ages, however, that contests both fictive and actual are most abundantly represented. Med. Lat. poems of conflictus feature altercations between character types or allegorical *personifications such as summer and winter; wine and water; body and soul; rustics and clerics; or among a Muslim, a Jew, and a Christian, subjects that recur in several vernacular lits. In the 12th c., love emerges as a major topic, as in the Altercatio Phyllis et Florae. In the same period in Fr. and Occitan lit. emerges the tenso*, in which *troubadours debate in alternating strophes on matters of politics, morality, poetics, or, above all, love and women. Perhaps derived from the sirventes, a political or satirical diatribe, and incorporating such subgenres as the partimen*, the tenso is the dominant med. verse debate form, although debate elements appear in other genres as well, such as the pastourelle*, the It. lauda* and contrasto, and the 13th- to 15th-c. Galician-Port. cantigas d'escarnho e de mal dizer* and the Sp. pregunta*. The purest and most dramatic med. poetic contest is the 13th-c. MHG Wartburgkrieg*, in which five poets are pitted against a magician in a riddle competition with death as the penalty for losing. Several Eddic poems feature verbal contest between such adversaries as Thor and Odin. ME produced a classic débat in the late 12th- or early 13th-c., The Owl and the Nightingale; Chaucer's Canterbury Tales represents a full-blown peregrine contest with some 30 contestants, a judge, and a prize. The flamboyant flytings* of 15th- to 16th-c. Scotland feature volleys of fantastic *invective and abuse between noted contemp. poets, possibly as court entertainment.

The scope and longevity of these forms should be taken as an index of the wide popularity of verbal contesting in the Middle Ages in circles both courtly and popular. Rival troubadours and Minnesingers such as Gottfried von Strassburg and Wolfram von Eschenbach traded barbs by alluding to each other, by name or epithet, in their works. Cultivating independence from courtly *patronage, Fr. poets and *minstrels in the 13th c. began to form associations (puys) that trained apprentices in the craft and sponsored competitions for prizes. *Meistersinger guilds in 14th- to 16th-c. Germany served similar functions. Several such associations and annual festivals still survive, such as the Jocs florals in Toulouse (see GAI SABER) and the National *eisteddfod in Wales (see WELSH POETRY). In these cases, poetic contests reflect the transformation of lyric reception in late med. urban environments, as the transmission and practice of poetry moved from aristocratic courts to municipal institutions. For instance, in the 14th c., laymen founded the Consistori de la Sobregaia Companhia del Gay Saber (Consistory of the Merry Band of the Gay Knowledge) to maintain the practice of *courtly love and the knowledge of how to write poetry. The founders modeled their activities on the ceremonies of the city's university, awarding degrees and treating the competition as a public examination. The ritualization and codification of lyric poetry through contests were a means of civic identity and self-representation. The creation of poetic institutions—incl. the compilation of *songbooks and poetic manuals that contained the rules and procedure for such competitions—maintained the prestige of an earlier vernacular trad. while transforming this trad. into an accessible craft.

After the Ren., poetic contests witnessed a decline both as poetic topic and social custom. Despite its allusion to the laurel crown of cl. contests, the status of *poet laureate became a reward more for political loyalties than for poetic skill—although debate features persisted in the pastoral, Ren. and neoclassical drama, and other genres. Jean Racine, Pierre Corneille, and Voltaire asserted their superiority over their rivals in the prologues of their plays, and John Dryden's "MacFlecknoe" and later Augustan satires register through thinly veiled fictions real social and poetic rivalries. Still, students of poetry looked to the prestige of the contest to revivify native literary trads. In the 18th c., the Swiss poet and critic Jakob Bodmer used the poetic contest as a figure for cultivating a philological and romantic connection to the med. past. In his allegorical tale Das Erdmännchen, e.g., a Wettgesang or singing match ensues between a med. and a contemp. poet, as anacreontic verses are antiphonally juxtaposed with those from the main Minnesang songbook, which Bodmer had transcribed. This contest represents how Bodmer believed that the study of MHG lyric could revitalize Ger. literary lang.

In Asia, Japanese poetic contests are perhaps the most elaborate in the world. They began in the late 9th c. as one of a variety of matches on objects ranging from iris roots to paintings and were largely social; the low-ranking nobility commonly writing the poems did so for presentation by their betters. But in time, social distinctions became less important and competition keener, often bitter. To facilitate judgment, topics were increasingly given out in advance and became more detailed as well as fictionalized, e.g., "Cherry Blossoms at a Mountain Temple," "Love Consummation Unconsummated." Because poetic contests were a major form of publication and because of increasing rigor, standards of judgment were conservative, being based on precedent. But standards altered, and the judgments at contests provide important insights into poetic theory as well as praxis. At the Japanese court, two of the most important contests were The Poetry Contest in 600 Rounds (i.e., 1,200 poems, 1193 CE) and The Poetry Contest in 1500 Rounds (3,000 poems, 1202). There were also poetic contests by one person, pitting poems on the same topic against each other for judgment by an esteemed critic, e.g., Monk Saigyō's Mimosusogawa Poetry Match (1187). There were numerous other variants. Closest to the kind, and indeed often part of it, 100-poem sequences were often the unit of competition. Subsequently, other kinds of matches occurred, chiefly those of linked poetry (renga*) and nō*. Contests of various kinds are a major feature of Japanese lit. until about 1600, after which only modified and attenuated versions exist. But during these six or seven centuries, poetic contests are a more important feature of Japanese lit. than of any other.

In the contemp. era, while real poetic contests are a regular feature of the literary landscape, the resultant poetry is seldom agonistic in style or subject. Yet poetic contests remain vital in the developing world and everywhere in popular culture. Such poetic or semipoetic modes as playing the *dozens, *toast, *signifying, and rapping, widely in evidence among contemp. Af. Americans and often realized as verbal duel, feature rhetorical pyrotechnics and a marked facility for extemporization. Other instances of contests attest to their cross-cultural popularity and diversity: Greenland Inuit resolved quarrels through poetic duels (called Iviutiit) adjudicated by the tribe (see INUIT POETRY); obscene dueling genres flourish among Turkish and Guatemalan adolescents; and Eur. television broadcasts an annual Saengerkrieg, taking its title from the "war of singers" at the Wartburg.

POETIC FUNCTION. As defined by Rus. formalist linguist and literary theorist Roman Jakobson, the poetic function is "[t]he set (Einstellung) toward the message as such, focus on the message for its own sake." The context for this definition is his analysis of the act of verbal communication, formulated at an international conference on style held at Indiana University in 1958. According to this formulation, every such act involves six elements: an addresser; an addressee; a context referred to; a code common to addresser and addressee as encoder and decoder of the message; a contact, i.e., "a physical channel and psychological connection between the addresser and the addressee"; and the message, i.e., the actual spoken or written discourse in all its linguistic particulars. Each element corresponds to one of six functions of lang.: the emotive or expressive (oriented toward the addresser, aiming at a direct expression of his or her attitude); the conative (oriented toward the addressee and often expressed grammatically through the vocative case of a noun designating the addressee and the imperative mood of verbs); the referential (toward the context); the metalingual (toward the code); the phatic (toward the contact, aimed at establishing, maintaining, or prolonging communication); and the poetic (toward the message). What Jakobson here calls the poetic function, he sometimes elsewhere refers to as the aesthetic function.

This notion of the poetic function was adumbrated by Jakobson as early as 1928, in a study of the Rus. futurist poet Velimir Khlebnikov, and elaborated over the intervening 30 years in a series of analytical articles and theoretical papers through which he sought to establish an appropriate focus for literary studies. The poetic function of lang., Jakobson stressed, is not restricted to poetry, nor are the other functions absent from poetry. In any act of verbal communication, several functions, having different degrees of importance, may be realized, one being predominant. A poetic work, then, is a verbal message whose aesthetic function is dominant.

The predominant function is, for Jakobson, the primary determinant of the verbal structure of the message. Where the poetic function is predominant, the principle of *equivalence is projected "from the axis of selection into the axis of combination." That is, words in the text are related to each other not only syntagmatically, by contiguity, but also paradigmatically, i.e., as they are related to other words that could be substituted for them. Where the poetic function is predominant, the words present in the text will have the same kinds of linguistic relations to each other as they do to the words from among which they were chosen. These relations include phonological identity (whence meter and rhyme), grammatical parallelism, and semantic synonomy or antithesis.

This definition of the poetic function of lang. has important implications for *stylistics; the task of the stylistician becomes that of analyzing exhaustively the linguistic structure of a text and thereby discovering patterns of equivalences. Jakobson himself practiced such stylistic analysis on poems in many langs. and of periods from med. to mod. Among these analyses, one, with Claude Lévi-Strauss, of Baudelaire's "Les Chats" and one, with Lawrence Jones, of Shakespeare's sonnet 129 are esp. notable for the controversy they have stirred. In each, different parts of the poem are contrasted in terms of the presence or absence of features in binary opposition, revealing multiple symmetries.

Jakobson's methodology and results have been challenged by Michael Riffaterre, who has argued that a given linguistic equivalence is not necessarily stylistically relevant unless or until it becomes perceptible to readers (other than trained linguists). Similarly, Paul Werth has argued that recurrence will be found in any text, that its perceptibility and effects depend in part on the nature of the repetition and of the units involved (whether phonological, lexical, or syntactic), that binary oppositions can be generated at the whim of the analyst, that it is pointless if not impossible to attempt an analysis that is exhaustive at all levels, and that semantic analysis is properly a prerequisite to analysis of other aspects of text structure. Countering such objections, Paul Kiparsky has pointed to Jakobson's stipulation that only linguistically relevant categories can enter into the patterning of poetry and noted that his idea of poetic function "opens the way to an understanding of the grammatical texture of poetry."

Jakobson was not the only 20th-c. scholar to discriminate functions of lang. use in a way that bears on the analysis of poetry. As early as 1925, I. A. Richards distinguished between the scientific use of lang., for the sake of reference, and the emotive use, for the sake of the emotion produced. Richards's emotive function, being concerned with production of attitudes in the audience, is different from Jakobson's, which involves expression of emotion by the addresser. Whereas Jakobson derived his functions from an analysis of the act of communication, Richards simply attempted to categorize the kinds of work a sentence can do. By 1949, he was distinguishing six such jobs: indicating, characterizing, realizing, appraising, influencing, and structuring. In Jakobson's terms, the first three jobs seem to be referential; the fourth and fifth, emotive. Only the sixth resembles Jakobson's poetic function.

POETIC LICENSE. This phrase originally referred to the freedom allowed the poet to depart in diction, grammar, or subject matter from the norms of prose discourse or, later, from poetic "rules." Poetic license is still a popular phrase in common usage, but in crit., it is now chiefly a term used to describe the creative management of historical fact—Virgil's decision to make Dido the contemp. of Aeneas, e.g. But many other rhetorical ploys once fell under its aegis, among them the use of archaic words or pronunciations (see archaism) and inversions of syntax (see hyperbaton). Both Aristotle and Horace thought it feasible for poets to coin, lengthen, shorten, alter, or import words that might distinguish their lang., and Aristotle even encouraged poetic license to enhance verisimilitude: "for poetic effect a convincing impossibility is preferable to that which is unconvincing but possible" (trans. Butcher). The notion of a license itself implies, however, a fairly strict set of rules or norms of generic or structural specification that the poet is given permission to ignore, and mod. critical theory has refined and altered considerably the ideas that pertain to the nature of literary genres and the authority of *convention. Genre studies have questioned the integrity of the various rules that once governed the assignment of a text to the ranks of poetry or prose; and the confidence that once allowed a critic to identify an instance of poetic license is of very limited use in describing the *prose poem, as Arthur Rimbaud implicitly demonstrated in A Season in Hell. In conceptualizing poetic making as either deviation from strictly defined "rules" (that do not exist) or as lawless freedom to create, the phrase distracts attention from the specific and important functions that innovation and *invention can serve. Paul Celan was one of the most innovative poetic neologists of the 20th c., but his coinages are very poorly served by being described as poetic license because they were not designed to create effects simply by violating standard Ger. vocabulary. Rather, by taking advantage of the natural affinity of Ger. for making compounds, Celan was able to combine neology and etymology for constructing a critique of lang. and its influence on perceptions of reality.

In mod. *stylistics, similar characterizations of unusual lexical and syntactic constructions are occasionally found; these, too, are unfortunately cast in negative rather than positive terms. In *prosody, it was sometimes said that poetic license allowed the poet freedom to alter *diction or *syntax so as to meet the stricter requirements of *meter, but this amounts to an indictment of the competence of the poet, who on this account is not master of the meter for his or her own purposes but is mastered by it. This too is inept: prose norms of diction or order have no precedence or authority such that poetry should be judged against that standard. The concept has proved only minimally useful in discussions of contemp. poetics. Most notably, Marjorie Perloff's Poetic License uses the phrase to set up a traditional discussion of the two senses of license—and of the two poles between which poetry operates aesthetically—as "permission from an outside authority" or as "defiance of authority."

POETIC MADNESS (Gr. mania or enthousiasmos; Lat. furor poeticus*). Up to the Ren., the central component of the Western conception of poetic composition was that of divine *inspiration—literally, a "breathing in." The notion that the *poet may become "possessed" by a frenzy or ecstasy bequeathed by a god in order to create poetry descends from the Greeks. In the earliest Gr. poetry, the *voice of the poet is simply the stringed instrument of the *Muses, who impart information that he either could not know himself or is not able to remember. Homer several times appeals to the Muses for factual information, though the notion of divine inspiration for poetic form, by contrast, is nonexistent in his works. The first extant reference to poetic madness is by Democritus (frag. 17, 18), who says that no one can be a poet without "divine breath."

Plato in the Phaedrus (244a–245a, 265a–b) identifies four types of madness—prophetic, ritual (Dionysiac), poetic, and erotic—a formulation surviving from archaic times, when the boundaries among religious ecstasy, drunkenness, mystical prophecy, and poetic creation were blurred, if existing at all. But in the Laws, where Plato defines poetic madness best, the distinction between ecstasy (see ecstatic poetry) and the capacities of the poet is more clearly drawn. Here too, as is the case with enthousiasmos, there is no definitive evidence in early Gr. documents that the Greeks believed the poet acted without some form of agency in the act of "making" (i.e., poeien, to make).

Subsequently, Plato's four types were reduced to three, which appear two millennia later in Shakespeare (Midsummer Night's Dream 5.1), when the Duke confirms that "the lunatic, the lover, and the poet / Are of imagination all compact." Socrates asserts that poets cannot succeed without poetic madness. In the Ion, both poet and critic are described as so possessed that they no longer consciously control their words—clear evidence of the Platonic denigration of craft, for, in fact, Plato's purpose is to show that poetry, being wholly given, is no art at all. The Roman poets and critics also accepted poetic madness: Horace says that drink improves poetic creation; Cicero says that no one can be a poet "who is not on fire with passion and without a certain touch [*_afflatus_] of frenzy" (_De oratore_ 2.46); Ovid remarks that "a god is within us; when he urges, we are inspired." Thereafter, the idea was appropriated by Neoplatonism.

All these references amount to claims that (1) a heightened state of consciousness or intensity of experience is the necessary condition or effect not only of genuine madness (insanity) but of artistic creativity and erotic transport and that (2) category divisions between these states are largely immaterial. "Great wits are sure to madness near allied," says John Dryden in _Absalom and Achitophel_, "And thin partitions do their bounds divide." The belief that the *genius ("spirit") and lunatic ("driven by the Moon") are fed from the same springs has never departed Western culture.

In the subsequent hist. of Western *poetics, major alterations in this conception are but two: with the advent of Christianity, transfer of the locus of generation from pagan gods to a Christian God and, with the advent of secular psychology, from external inspiration to internal creation. And while Plato clearly distinguishes between madness that is divinely inspired and that caused by physical disease ("our greatest blessings come to us by way of madness," says Socrates, "provided the madness is given us by divine gift" [trans. Dodds]), the subsequent devel. of the concept of madness has served mainly to call the very notion into question. Many Ren. poets and critics (e.g., Pierre de Ronsard and Michel de Montaigne) embrace it, while others are ambivalent: Philip Sidney in the _Defence of Poesy_ mouths the traditional (Neoplatonist) line but also insists on the power of the poet as maker; and in _Astrophil and Stella_ (e.g., 74), he rejects poetic madness outright. The notion of divine origination and control of poetic creation ran counter to the emergent Ren. spirit of scientific rationalism, as well as to the profound humanist distrust of the irrational and immoral. To a humanist, it would be sacrilege to assign to mere mortals qualities of the divine.

But in romantic poetics, the role of the poet is given new primacy as both visionary and tormented outcast (see POÈTE MAUDIT, ROMANTICISM). And though inspiration is now dissociated from divinity for some of the romantics, or else transferred to a pantheistic source, the aesthetics of *spontaneity, *originality, and *imagination all affirm intensified consciousness. To poems that are the result of intoxication or hallucination are now added poems given in a dream or reverie—S. T. Coleridge's "Kubla Khan," E. A. Poe's "The Raven"—though Coleridge himself calls "Kubla Khan" a "psychological curiosity."

Mod. reformulations of the idea of poetic madness derive almost entirely from the emergence of psychology in the late 19th c. The connection to the concept in antiquity is simply the new belief that creativity is the work of the id, not the ego. To Sigmund Freud (in his essay "The Relation of the Poet to Day-Dreaming" and elsewhere), the artist is neurotic, and the artist's work is a by-product and a symbolic statement of his or her disturbance, particularly so in that, for Freud, the unconscious itself works by processes that are tropological. But for Carl Jung, creative activity puts the poet in touch with the primal source of human vitality, the energy welling up from the collective unconscious; it synthesizes id as eros and ego as will to power in a productive act. This is only to say that poets who really were mad—such as Lucretius, François Villon, Christopher Marlowe, William Collins, Christopher Smart, William Blake, Gérard de Nerval, Friedrich Hölderlin, Friedrich Nietzsche, and Ezra Pound—or, at the very least, exhibit marked personality disorders, nevertheless seemed able, thereby, to access regions of creativity not available to others. The question of who is mad, thus, begins to seem really the question of who gets to define the criteria: on aesthetic criteria, it is bourgeois materialism and philistinism that seem mad.

The issue of whether art is neurotic or an emblematic of deeper health has been explored by Thomas Mann, Kenneth Burke, Lionel Trilling ("Art and Neurosis"), and esp. Edmund Wilson: in _The Wound and the Bow_ (1941), "wound" refers to the artist's neurosis and "bow" to the art that is its compensation. Now, poetry like all art is a *catharsis for the poet, whereas, for the Greeks, it was one for the audience. Even I. A. Richards's theory of poetry was originally neurologically based, emphasizing interinanimations, synergism, and wholeness.

POETICS, WESTERN

I. Classical
II. Medieval and Early Modern
III. Romanticism to Modernism
IV. Postmodernism and Beyond

Poetics is the branch of lit. crit. devoted to poetry, esp. to the study of its characteristic techniques, conventions, and strategies. The word can also refer to theoretical texts on the topic, above all to Aristotle's famous philosophical treatise. Sometimes _poetics_ is used in both a narrower and a more expansive sense. On the one hand, it can designate the compositional principles to which a particular *poet subscribes. These principles may remain implicit, or they may be made overt in a variety of ways, ranging from the occasional and casual, such as John Keats's famous discussion of *"negative capability" in a letter to his brother on December 21, 1817, to the serious and scholarly, such as Czesław Miłosz's Charles Eliot Norton Lectures, published as The Witness of Poetry (1984). On the other hand, poetics may be used as a label for any formal or informal survey of the structures, devices, and norms that enable a discourse, genre, or cultural system to produce particular effects. Prominent examples would include Gaston Bachelard's La Poétique de l'espace (1958; trans. as The Poetics of Space, 1964), Linda Hutcheon's A Poetics of Postmodernism (1988), and Tzvetan Todorov's Poétique de la prose (1971; trans. as The Poetics of Prose, 1977), none of which places poetry at the center of its argument. When employed in this expanded sense, poetics is often implicitly opposed to hermeneutics*, i.e., the practice of *interpretation. In other words, one explains how something works, not what it means.

I. Classical. In the West, the discipline of poetics has its origins in Gr. antiquity. Although he never wrote a single extended work on the subject, Plato's scattered comments on poetry have served as a standard starting point for understanding the art form. His dialogue Ion, for instance, argues that poetry is written in a state of divinely inspired madness (see FUROR POETICUS). The thesis that poetry comes to a poet from outside, from some higher or alien authority, has had a long and surprising hist. in the millennia since, down to 20th- and 21st-c. experiments with automatic writing (see ALEATORY POETICS), *computational poetry, *cybertext, and *found poetry.

Plato is best known for a set of related arguments made in the Republic. He maintains that poetry addresses itself to the emotions. Instead of encouraging rational thought, it stirs the passions of its audience. Such manipulation may be acceptable in a few limited cases, such as *hymns to the gods or *encomia celebrating illustrious heroes, which encourage people to live better lives. Otherwise, poetry is an inferior art. It is no more than a crude attempt to reproduce in words ideas that transcend lang. (see IMITATION, MIMESIS).

Again, these propositions have cast a long shadow. Statements on poetics have conventionally taken a stand on whether poetry's propensity to provoke strong feelings is to be celebrated, as Longinus (see SUBLIME for the author and dating controversy) does in Peri hypsous (On the Sublime, 1st c. CE), or to be handled carefully, as in William Wordsworth's Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800), which advocates tempering *emotion through the use of regular *rhyme and *meter. Similarly, the question of poetry's relation to truth has been a leitmotif in writings on poetics, with fascinating consequences, such as Pierre de Ronsard's insistence in Abrégé de l'art poétique français (A Summary of the French Art of Poetry, 1565) that poets must study as many occupations as possible, incl. blacksmithing, falconry, and sailing, if they are to gain the experiential knowledge necessary for fine writing—or W. H. Auden's public confession in "Dichtung and Wahrheit" (1959) that he was sexually attracted to someone other than his long-term companion Chester Kallman.

Aristotle's Poetics made the problems of *affect and representation fundamental to Western discussions of poetry. In response to Plato, he maintains that imitation is not the same thing as producing a flawed, degraded copy. Children, he notes, spontaneously enjoy imitating others; it is a natural human faculty, as well as a technique fundamental to all learning. Moreover, poets do not slavishly repeat what they witness, know, or have heard. When they compose poetry they invent scenes, characters, and actions. Historians might find themselves constrained by the arbitrariness of actual events; poets, in contrast, present their audiences with pretend but "probable" scenarios that are better suited to moving them in appropriate ways. *Tragedy, for instance, relies on the spectacle of heroic men and women undergoing apt suffering to cause people to feel intense fear and pity. After being "purged" of these troublesome emotions (*catharsis), they will then, presumably, be prepared to act more rationally and hence make better decisions in the future.

It can be surprising to encounter mention of tragedy in the middle of a broader discussion of poetics. In the course of his rebuttal of Plato, Aristotle pursues his usual strategy of argument by classification. He identifies and differentiates two poetic *genres, *epic and tragedy (with a third genre, *comedy, apparently covered in the lost second half of the Poetics). This taxonomic project stands at the head of a long series of similar endeavors with great influence on later writers. E.g., Pierre Corneille's Trois Discours sur le poème dramatique (Three Discourses on Dramatic Poetry, 1660) formalizes the Aristotelian doctrine of the three unities of place, time, and action that later governed not only neoclassical drama but modernist works such as James Joyce's Ulysses (1922). Torquato Tasso reverses Aristotle by elevating epic above tragedy in Discorsi del poema eroico (Discourses on the Heroic Poem, 1594), an argument that had a profound effect on John Milton as he mulled his literary future. Northrop Frye's Anatomy of Criticism (1957) takes Aristotle's arguments about genre and uses them as a starting point for proposing a sweeping model for understanding all of literary hist.

For many, a second surprising aspect of Aristotle's Poetics is its relative lack of attention to prosody. Although he does twice discuss meter (books 4.14 and 24.5–6), he does not directly and intimately connect the act of making (poiēsis) that defines poetry with the patterning of *sound. Like Plato, he can often appear more concerned with what a poem relates—its content—than the specific words, and the specific word ordering, that a poet selects. There are instances of such analysis in antiquity—above all Dionysius of Halicarnassus's Peri syntheseos onomaton (On the Arrangement of Words, 1st c. BCE), but already one can begin to see the possibility of what later critics will consider to be a distinction between verse and poetry.

Francis Bacon's The Advancement of Learning (1605), for instance, acknowledges that some critics might consider poetry distinguishable by its *style but rejects such a definition as superficial and prefers the argument that poetry is "feigned history." By the time of P. B. Shelley's Defence of Poetry (1840), it was possible to argue that, as long as they display Aristotelian virtues such as harmony, order, and *unity, artworks of any kind (music, sculpture, dance) deserve the label poetry.

II. Medieval and Early Modern. In general, cl., med., and early mod. authors worry less about *form and more about poetry's ability to educate readers, esp. young people. Plato's Protagoras and Aristotle's Politics both argue that the purpose of poetry is to edify its audience, and Plutarch's "Quomodo adolescens poetas audire debeat" ("How the Young Man Should Study Poetry," 1st c. CE) goes so far as to recommend that one should emend poets' writings to guarantee their probity. Often treatments of poetry's instructional potential also contemplate its seductive qualities. Horace's Ars poetica (1st c. BCE) famously asserts that poets are "those who mix the useful with the sweet," and he prescribes such a mixture as the best means of "mold[ing] a child's young lips." While in later centuries there are dissenters such as Lodovico Castelvetro—whose Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e sposta (Aristotle's Poetics Translated and Expounded; 1570, 1576) endorses pleasure as the primary motivation for reading or writing poetry—until the 19th c. it remained conventional to defend poetry's capacity for moral instruction, as well as to justify any by-the-by enjoyment as a means of enticing the weak and impressionable to start on the path toward virtue and goodness. Indeed, given that the primary text on poetics available during the Middle Ages, a commentary on Aristotle's Poetics by the Ar. philosopher Ibn Rushd (Averroës), emphasizes poetry's moral purpose and civic-mindedness, one could track an unbroken lineage in the West of moralizing statements on poetics from Plutarch to late 20th-c. works such as Adrienne Rich's "When We Dead Awaken: Writing as Re-Vision" (1971) and Cary Nelson's Repression and Recovery (1989).

Significantly, this trad. rarely embraces straightforward didacticism. Dante's Convivio (ca. 1304–7), e.g., argues that, in a good poem, the literal, denotative meaning is supplemented by other, "allegorical" strata that touch on matters such as ethics and theology. In his Difesa della Commedia di Dante (On the Defense of the Comedy of Dante, 1587), Giacopo Mazzoni further explains that *allegory is necessary because poets must use concrete and credible images to communicate with a wide audience, many of whom are ill-suited to abstract thought. Poetry might, therefore, resemble a game in certain respects; but as long as poets play such word games in the service of public virtue, then, contra Plato, they perform a useful function in society. Such gaming could, in fact, Giambattista Giraldi Cinthio contends in his Discorso intorno al comporre dei romanzi (Discourse on the Composition of Romances, 1554), lead poets to innovate boldly, even creating entirely new and unprecedented kinds of poetry, such as Ludovico Ariosto's long, self-interrupting narrative poem Orlando furioso (1516), which departs from Aristotelian prescriptions on almost every count. Even if the purpose of poetry remains constant across the ages—to praise the good and condemn the bad—to remain effective, poets must vary the means by which they pursue those ends.

The republication of Aristotle's Poetics in 1508 and its trans. into Lat. in 1536, plus the ready availability of Horace's Ars poetica in significant eds. such as the one pub. in Paris in 1500, ensured that the questions of seeming, pleasure, truth, and utility remained central to Western discussions of poetics during the Ren. and into the Enlightenment. Landmark works such as Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1595), John Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668), and Alexander Pope's Essay on Criticism (1711) devote themselves to reprising and revising cl. stands on these subjects. When Samuel Johnson states that "the greatest excellency of art" is to "imitate nature; but it is necessary to distinguish those parts of nature, which are most proper for imitation" (Rambler, no. 4), or when Matthew Arnold claims that "truth and seriousness" are the sine qua non of good verse ("The Study of Poetry," 1880), one can hear echoes of Aristotle on *mimesis as well as two millennia of debates concerning the most compelling, improving, and expedient means of representing humans and the world. Even treatises such as Baltasar Gracián's Agudeza y arte de ingenio (Cleverness and the Art of Wit, 1642, rev. ed. 1648) that defend what might appear to be disruptively antimimetic devices—in particular, wild punning and exaggerated uses of figurative lang.—nevertheless continue to justify such obstructive *artifice by crediting pyrotechnic displays of *wit with the power to render poetry's lessons more sensuously and intellectually appealing.

Variations within this overall pattern do exist. E.g., George Puttenham's Arte of English Poesie (1589) distinguishes itself by blurring the boundaries between *rhetoric and poetics. He borrows terms pell-mell from rhetorical manuals in the trad. of Cicero's De inventione (ca. 86 BCE), the Rhetorica ad Herennium (early 1st c. BCE), and Quintilian's Institutio oratoria (ca. 93–95 CE) to anatomize Eng. verse. Surprisingly, he also attends closely to sound, distinguishing Elizabethan stress-based meters from cl. quantitative prosody. Puttenham's emphasis on poetry as, first, a discursive system susceptible of formal analysis and, second, a means of stirring an audience can make him sound unusually contemporary. In fact, New Historicists in the 1980s and 1990s such as Jonathan Goldberg, Stephen Greenblatt, and Patricia Parker looked to Puttenham as a touchstone and precursor, someone who pioneered the exploration of the dynamic relationship between literary texts and cultural contexts (see NEW HISTORICISM). One could also, however, construe Puttenham as engaged in a variant on the querelle des anciens et des modernes* (quarrel of ancients and moderns), seeking to prove that a vernacular lang. and lit. can achieve excellences similar to but distinct from Lat. and Gr.

precursors. In this regard, the Arte of English Poesie deserves comparison to works such as Vasily Trediakovsky's Novyi i kratkii sposob k slozheniiu rossiiskikh stikhov (New and Brief Method for Composing Russian Verse, 1735) and Mikhail Lomonosov's Pis'mo o pravilakh rossiiskogo stikhotvorstva (Letter on the Rules of Russian Prosody, 1739), which similarly turn to the study of rhet. to help codify the *conventions, devices, and forms characteristic of an emergent *canon of vernacular poetry.

Another prominent strand within early mod. and Enlightenment poetics concerns comparisons between poetry and the other arts. Sometimes this discussion takes the form of a paragone, a mock-combat reminiscent of the duels between singing shepherds in the cl. *pastoral, as in the first act of Shakespeare's Timon of Athens (1623). At other times, the exercise leads to an extended philosophical reflection, as in Leonardo da Vinci's jours., or most famously in G. E. Lessing's Laokoön (Laocoön, 1766). Lessing maintains that Horace's injunction ut pictura poesis*—that a poem should resemble a painting—was mistaken. Poetry, he believes, unfolds over time, whereas painting extends across space but can be taken in by the eye in an instant. Devices suitable to one art simply cannot be transposed effectively into the other. These arguments concerning what might now be called medium specificity have haunted poetics ever since. Is poetry distinguished from other art forms simply because it uses lang. to communicate, as Clement Greenberg contends in "Towards a Newer Laocoön" (1940)? Or is it at its core something more precise, as Nathaniel Mackey argues in Paracritical Hinge (2005), an art that showcases the "occult clamor" audible in speech and song?

III. Romanticism to Modernism. Around the year 1800, poets, literary critics, and philosophers began not simply to question or revise but to break with the Aristotelian legacy. As M. H. Abrams recounts in The Mirror and the Lamp (1953), mimetic theories of poetry started to give way to an emphasis on *expression. In the West, people took to describing and evaluating poetry based on its success or failure in eloquently and accurately communicating a writer's innermost thoughts, feelings, experiences, fantasies, and dreams, esp. as they touch on abstractions, spiritual matters, and historical causes that transcend the merely personal and arbitrary. From this vantage point, fidelity in *representation and seriousness of moral purpose matter less than a given writer's *intensity, *sincerity, passion, and ingenuity. Indecorous or lowly content and mannered or otherwise distorted depictions of the external world are excusable as long as poets obey the dictates of their *imagination and conscience. In doing so, moreover, they are free to dispense with received guidelines and models concerning proper poetic form. A poem's *structure, *diction, *rhythm, and other organizing traits should arise organically, i.e., in tight, close conjunction with the unfolding of its denotative meaning and its connotative associations (see CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION).

These precepts are all well known, of course, as aspects of romantic poetics. Key texts include A.W. and Friedrich Schlegel's jour. the Athenaeum (1798–1800), S. T. Coleridge's Biographia Literaria (1817), Wordsworth's Preface, and Shelley's Defence. Philosophically, the most important contributions were by Immanuel Kant and G.W.F. Hegel. In different but complementary ways, they assert that the mind plays an active role in the constitution of the external world. Later writers and thinkers became enamored of the power and the possibilities that this idea makes available. In the extreme formulation of this argument, poets do not reflect existing realities. Through the agency of the imagination, they, in fact, can create new ones ex nihilo—and might even be responsible for generating and sustaining the current actuality that they inhabit. Wallace Stevens's The Necessary Angel (1951) represents perhaps the most rigorous, sober, yet also far-reaching formulation of this romantic doctrine.

Kant deserves mention here for a second, additional reason. His Kritik der Urteilskraft (Critique of Judgment, 1790) holds that aesthetic judgments belong to a category independent of moral judgments and judgments that convey information or knowledge. To read a poem and expect to come away with moral instruction or other kinds of useful data is to make a logical mistake, i.e., to treat it as something other than a work of art. (As Ludwig Wittgenstein's Zettel [1967] puts it, "Do not forget that a poem, although it is composed in the language of information, is not used in the language-game of giving information.") Kant, in effect, makes the first sustained case for art's *autonomy, its separation from other spheres of human activity; the next two centuries would see many restatements and revisions of this thesis. Friedrich Schiller's Ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (On the Aesthetic Education of Man, 1795), e.g., stakes out a position that would later be summed up as "art for art's sake" (see AESTHETICISM). Theodor Adorno's "Rede über Lyrik und Gesellschaft" ("Lyric Poetry and Society," 1957) claims that, insofar as Western aesthetics from Kant onward has provided poets an illusion of refuge from hist. and politics, they are thereby granted an opportunity to imaginatively negate the world they inhabit and dream of living free of capitalist necessity.

The expressive school of poetics found its last great expositor in Benedetto Croce. In Ariosto, Corneille e Shakespeare (1919), he states that "style is nothing other than the expression of the poet and his very soul." He believes that one should approach a poem as an aesthetic whole and trace its tone and other formal features in order to elucidate the mind and spirit that prompted its composition. Of course, such an approach presupposes that a given author's internal life is worth reconstructing and appreciating, an assumption that would come under attack from many quarters over the course of the 20th c. One set of writers expressed strong reservations regarding whose subjectivities and experiences are presumed to be normative within Western expressive poetics. They also questioned whether poetry could or should address a generic reader. These opponents of unreflective universalism include Gloria Anzaldúa, Amiri Baraka, Audre Lorde, M. NourbeSe Philip, and Denise Riley.

Other critics wondered whether poetry ought to place any priority at all on individual expression. In Towards the Decolonization of African Literature (1980), Chinweizu, Onwuchekwa Jemie, and Ihechukwu Madubuike argue that the anglophone poetic canon is excessively inward-directed and protective of privacy. They contrast it to the "public language" exemplified by oral Af. poetries, which emphasize direct, performative connections between poet and audience. Léopold Sédar Senghor, in his Dialogue sur la poésie francophone (Dialogue on Francophone Poetry, 1979), goes further, suggesting that the mod. Eur. has entirely lost touch with *myth, the shared collective system of stories and symbols that elevate poetry above self-indulgent coos and complaints. On the other side of the Atlantic, Édouard Glissant, in L'intention poétique (Poetic Intention, 1969), makes a parallel argument, disparaging Crocean creative *genius in the name of a poetry that could embody and perpetuate a healthy group consciousness.

Early in the 20th c., the Rus. formalists proposed a fundamental reorientation of poetics away from expression altogether (see RUSSIAN FORMALISM). Beginning with Viktor Shklovsky's "Voskreshenie slova" ("Resurrection of the Word," 1914), they polemically minimized the status of the author in favor of attending to the priemy (devices) in a work of lit. A poem does not convey a message; it draws attention to itself, more specifically, to its construction and function. Poetry in the aggregate, too, is not a gallery of brilliant achievements. It is a self-generating system of texts. New poems are not the product of *inspiration and brilliant execution. Rather, as Yuri Tynianov says in "Literaturnyi fakt" (Literary Fact, 1924), they are "mutations" that receive attention (instead of vanishing into historical oblivion unnoticed) because they depart in unusually striking ways from once-popular but now overly familiar, commonplace ways of assembling poetic devices.

Anglo-Am. *New Criticism also sharply differentiated between poet and poem. E.g., even when written in the first person and offering seemingly autobiographical details, a *lyric, New Critics such as John Crowe Ransom, Allen Tate, and Robert Penn Warren would assert, remains a thing apart, voiced by an implied "speaker" who, whatever overlap might exist with the poet, never coincides entirely. Studies such as Cleanth Brooks's The Well Wrought Urn (1947) and William Empson's Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930) demonstrate the virtues of *close reading, the intensive scrutiny of a poem's lang. and prosody that proceeds with limited or no reference to the original historical context in which it was written or to its poet's biography or psychology. If a poem is worthwhile, close reading can proceed almost indefinitely, since its paradoxes, convoluted figures of speech, and many levels of meaning reward intense prolonged interpretation. As promoted via arguments such as W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley's essays *"The Intentional Fallacy" (1946) and *"The Affective Fallacy" (1946), close reading amounts to a somewhat peculiar variant on cl. rhet. that limits itself to the formal analysis of texts while neglecting their intended or observed effects on *readers.

IV. Postmodernism and Beyond. Although strong pedagogically, New Criticism did not happen to offer a consistent theory of poetry as a literary system. It preferred to examine poems, not to generalize about poetry as a whole. *Structuralism, as developed and practiced in France in the decades after World War II, reverses this privileging of *texts over *textuality—i.e., instead of focusing on the appreciation of singular artworks, it seeks to elucidate cultural sign systems in toto. As Gérard Genette explains in "Structuralisme et critique littéraire" ("Structuralism and Literary Criticism," 1966), discrete literary objects should be conceived not as unitary and stand-alone but as relational entities, explicable only with reference to the larger system of themes, motifs, and keywords that constitute the literary system out of which the work has been assembled. Michael Riffaterre's Semiotics of Poetry (1978) asserts that, as a consequence, it is a mistake to read literary works such as poems as if they were primarily referential or mimetic. A poem's sentences, images, themes, and rhetorical devices signify—convey meaning—only insofar as they participate in semiotic structures, the sign configurations that make up poetry as a system that readers have learned to recognize. Jonathan Culler's Structuralist Poetics (1975) summarizes this approach to reading by stating that it privileges poetics over interpretation. In other words, instead of seeking to restate a poem's meaning in new words, it engages in description intended to locate a poem within an array of relevant categories. E.g., if a critic recognizes that Jan Kochanowski's Treny (Threnodies, 1580) is a collection of elegies for his daughter Urszula, she cannot straight away begin by pondering whether the poet is being overly sentimental, nor can she start expounding on the blend of Ren. humanism and staunch Catholicism that the lyrics exhibit. She must first ask what is an *elegy, how Treny relates to other elegies, and where elegy fits within literary production as a whole in the early mod. Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.

Structuralism quickly gave way to a variety of *poststructuralisms that then had widespread impact in Western academies during the 1970s and 1980s. Structuralism, critics quickly discovered, has a fatal flaw. It requires people to agree that it is possible to create ling. descriptions that can analytically stand in for actual cultural systems. Roland Barthes's book Système de la mode (The Fashion System, 1967), for instance, has to be understood as offering in words a sufficient mapping and explanation of how fashion itself operates in Fr. society. Poststructuralists attack this assumption from many different angles. Can any use of lang. ever accurately depict what happens in the ever- and swiftly changing external world? Are systems ever intelligible in their entirety? Do they even exist as wholes, or are they, in fact, made up of myriad competing interlinked ephemeral partial systems?

One philosopher who helped poststructuralists address these issues is Martin Heidegger, whose later essays such as "Der Ursprung des Kunstwerkes" ("The Origin of the Work of Art," 1935) and ". . . dichterisch wohnet der Mensch . . ." ("Poetically Man Dwells," 1951) propose that Truth and Being never entirely reveal themselves. They can be approached only sidelong, and each revelation, by spotlighting one aspect of what people seek to know, often distracts them from or even blinds them to other facets. What is one to do? Poetry, Heidegger contends, is the art in which lang. most overtly stages its own emergence from nothingness, thus making it the best vehicle for pondering how and why the world exists.

The intellectual ferment in poststructuralist circles gave rise to numerous provocative arguments about poetics. The Yale School—which includes Harold Bloom, Paul de Man, Barbara Johnson, Geoffrey Hartman, and J. Hillis Miller—concentrated on showing that poetry always resorts to misnaming and misrecognition in its perpetual quest to affirm truths and essences that, in reality, are never self-evident or fully apprehensible. In essays such as "Shibboleth. Pour Paul Celan" (1986), Jacques Derrida suggests that a poem can best be read by launching off from particular details (such as an appended date of composition) and exploring its many ramifications as far as one may go. On this view, a poem is neither a self-enclosed *artifact nor a gateway to systemic verities but a starting and ending point for a voyage into ling. possibility. Marjorie Perloff's The Poetics of Indeterminacy (1978) agrees that poems open outward into vertiginous anarchic free play and speculation, but she also underscores that such moments of *indeterminacy remain constricted or counterbalanced by convention, context, and what else appears in a text. A poem cannot mean "just anything." Julia Kristeva's La révolution du langage poétique (1974, trans. as Revolution in Poetic Language, 1984) associates the infinite suggestiveness in good poetry with its nonsemantic components, esp. its rhythm and sound play, which she believes are traces of the profound, embodied communicative ties between child and mother that precede the forced imposition of patriarchal grammar and logic.

Poststructuralism's near-exclusive focus on lang., texts, and *intertextuality quickly produced its own countermovement, a push toward relocating poetry's meaning in social, cultural, economic, and political institutions and discursive practices. Indispensable have been philosophers such as Michel Foucault, whose Surveiller et punir (1975, trans. as Discipline and Punish, 1979) presents all texts as implicated in networks of power and knowledge, and Antonio Gramsci, whose Quaderni del carcere (1964, trans. as Prison Notebooks, 1971) maintains that texts acquire meaning and social significance not so much through what they say but through the links made between different spheres of activity. (An antiwar poem, for instance, can have no impact on a nation's war effort unless poetry is "articulated with," considered vitally connected to, other forms of effective political speech. Otherwise, it might as well celebrate May flowers or the Mayflower.)

*New Historicists present poetry as a mode of cultural production that has unacknowledged connections to other varieties. It can, Stephen Greenblatt argues in Renaissance Self-Fashioning (1980), serve as a means of drawing attention from patrons and heightening one's social status. Louis Montrose's The Purpose of Playing (1996) isolates "theatricality" as a shared attribute and value in Ren. Eng. religion, courtly society, and verse drama. More recent *cultural studies approaches to poetics—as Maria Damon and Ira Livingston recount in their introduction to Poetry and Cultural Studies (2009)—define themselves by setting aside any conventional distinctions between high/elite and low/mass/popular culture, by suspending evaluative distinctions between good/bad, and by denying the autonomy of aesthetics. The composition and the interpretation of poetry are often related to, and grounded in, contemp. activist projects, and a critic should not prejudge which humanities, social sciences, or other disciplines will prove best suited to illuminating a poem's "cultural work," its particular contribution to society, economics, and politics on behalf of what particular constituency.

Dissatisfaction with disciplinary limits characterizes other continuing conversations within the field of poetics. Many scholars have grown uneasy with the national, geographic, and ling. divisions that all too often artificially seal off different corpora of poetry from one other. In response, they have started surveying ways in which poetry takes shape and operates transnationally, i.e., across and despite nation-state boundaries. Indeed, studies such as Yunte Huang's Transpacific Displacements (2002) trouble the East/West divide. Another set of boundary-crossing scholars have attempted to supplement the humanistic analysis of poetry with methods and insights drawn from ling., psychology, neuroscience, and philosophy of mind. In Toward a Theory of Cognitive Poetics (1992), Reuven Tsur describes the enterprise of *cognitive poetics as an inquiry into how mental processes shape and constrain literary response and poetic structure. Crit. in this vein meticulously examines patterns in texts while simultaneously paying close attention to the cognitive states and dynamics involved in acts of interpretation.

A final important point: one should not assume from this overview that, by the year 2000, poetics had become solely an academic or university-based pursuit. As the new millennium approached, poets, too, continued to show themselves as capable as ever of making pioneering provocative arguments about the nature and function of their chosen art form. One recurrent ambition was to define poetry as a special kind of rhet. whose antimimetic and nonsemantic aspects enable it to serve liberatory political ends. The Moscow Conceptualists, e.g., among them Andrei Monastyrsky, Vsevolod Nekrasov, and Lev Rubinshtein, hold that poetry can provide an escape from oppressive ideologies and state surveillance. They believe that attending to the empty unmeaning clichés, errors, repetitions, and other verbal "junk" pervasive in everyday lang. use grants access to a blissful nothingness external to officially sanctioned truths and values. Halfway around the globe, another literary movement, *Language poetry, challenged the liberal democratic faith in the autonomy of the individual in the name of alternative, revolutionary modes of being in the world and being with others. Am. and Canadian writers affiliated with the movement such as Charles Bernstein, Lyn Hejinian, and Steve McCaffery frequently characterize their readers as "co-creators" of a poem, completing or continuing the process of meaning production initiated by its author. In Latin America, the publication of Haroldo de Campos's Galáxias (1984) helped to catalyze the emergence of a self-consciously *neobaroque poetics that is assertively, foundationally "postcolonial" and "antimodern." Coral Bracho, Eduardo Milán, Néstor Perlongher, and Raúl Zurita celebrate *archaism, *ornament, excess, inconsistency, asymmetry, and other disruptive, striking, and fanciful devices as means of seducing readers away from what they perceive as the misleading clarity and unearned rectitude of Western rationalist thought. They seek, as John Beverley puts it in "Nuevas vacilaciones sobre el barroco" (New Vacillations on the Baroque, 1988), a "possible culture and society starting from the mutilation that imperialism has inflicted on its people."

While all these figures might polemically oppose the centrality that mimesis has played in Western poetics since the days of Plato and Aristotle, they nonetheless recognizably operate within that same trad.: i.e., they focus their attention on whether and how lang. touches on the world, and they inquire into poetry's capacity to improve human behavior. And these concerns, too, more broadly typify the best contemp. writing on poetry by poets, whether represented by, say, the exilic musings of Agha Shahid Ali, the affirming feminism of Nicole Brossard, or the probing postapartheid meditations on justice and ethics by Ingrid de Kok. In the 21st c., the word poetics will surely continue its curious ambiguity, signifying, on the one hand, something institutional and perduring—a branch of lit. crit.—and, on the other hand, something altogether more changeable, porous, and unpredictable, namely, the compositional principles that poets themselves discover and apply during the writing process.

POET LAUREATE. The term derives from the med. university practice of crowning with laurels a student admitted to an academic degree in grammar, rhet., and poetry. In time, it grew in application to denote any significant poetic attainment, in accordance with Apollo's declaration that a branch or bay from his emblematic plant should become the prize of honor for poets and victors (Ovid, Metamorphoses 1). Paralleling the traditional role of poetic entertainer to the ruling court in other cultures (the Scandinavian skald, the Welsh bard*, the Anglo-Saxon scop*, and the Scots makar), the Eng. poets laureate were required to sing the glories of kings and chieftains. Poet laureate was used as a term of respect to compliment poets such as Chaucer and Petrarch and became a title informally bestowed on John Gower, John Lydgate, John Skelton, and Bernard Andreas (the Augustinian friar at Henry VII's court) for their work undertaken at royal courts. Official recognition of poetic court duties increased for Edmund Spenser, Michel Drayton, and Samuel Daniel; and Ben Jonson considered himself poet laureate in light of his two pensions and popular acclaim. Apollo's founding convergence of poetic expression with ruling power was then secured when John Dryden became the first authorized appointment to the office of poet laureate in 1668 and royal historiographer in 1670. The roles were separated in 1692, but the office continued to be associated with the writing of officially sanctioned poetry, as illustrated by Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (1681), which allegorizes its support of the royal cause during the turbulence that accompanied Charles II's restoration to the throne.

Subsequently, the office was held in Britain by Thomas Shadwell, 1689–92; Nahum Tate, 1692–1715; Nicholas Rowe, 1715–18; Laurence Eusden, 1718–30;

Colley Cibber, 1730–57; William Whitehead, 1757–85; Thomas Warton, 1785–90; Henry James Pye, 1790–1813; Robert Southey, 1813–43; William Wordsworth, 1843–50; Alfred, Lord Tennyson, 1850–92; Alfred Austin, 1896–1913; Robert Bridges, 1913–30; John Masefield, 1930–67; C. Day-Lewis, 1968–72; Sir John Betjeman, 1972–84; and Ted Hughes, 1984–98. At his appointment in 1999, Andrew Motion negotiated the terms of the office such that it was held for ten years, rather than for life. The honorarium was also increased to around £5,000, replacing the previous arrangement of £200 plus a "butt of canary" (container of a Spanish wine). Trad. was further overhauled with the appointment in 2009 of Carol Ann Duffy, the first female poet laureate.

For a time during the 18th c., holders were required to become a member of the royal household and to compose a New Year's and birthday *ode to the king; this custom was dropped in order to preserve the dignity of the office, and the poet laureate became more regularly required to write eulogies, *elegies, and other *occasional verse. The longest serving poet laureate, Tennyson composed his "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington" (1852) for this purpose, and the office's stately requirements may be appreciated by comparing this with the poet's other more personal elegiac compositions. In the 21st c., the poet laureate's role has been officially demarcated from the business of the royal court, and it is now an honorary title awarded to a poet whose work is of national significance. Accordingly, the poet laureate continues to provide poetic compositions on occasions of royal significance, such as for jubilee celebrations, but the honor and responsibility of speaking for and to a nation has seen the poet address issues of collective memory (such as for war losses) and collective hopes and disappointments (in the sporting arena, e.g.).

In accordance with changes to the Brit. political landscape, comparable roles of Scots Makar (established 2004) and National Poet for Wales (established 2005) are now recognized alongside the Brit. poet laureate. In America, the unofficial role of poet laureate (in existence since 1937) was established as the honorific title Poet Laureate Consultant in Poetry. Holders of this year-long position include (among others) Elizabeth Bishop, Joseph Brodsky, Billy Collins, Rita Dove, Robert Frost, Louise Glück, Donald Hall, Robert Hass, Ted Kooser, Maxine Kumin, Stanley Kunitz, Philip Levine, W. S. Merwin, Robert Pinsky, Kay Ryan, Karl Shapiro, Charles Simic, Mark Strand, Allen Tate, Robert Penn Warren, and Richard Wilbur. Its duties include one poetry reading and a public lecture. Such parallel institutions illustrate how the poet laureate's role continues to develop and change in its accommodation of a conservative heritage and a unique engagement with the life of national politics.

POETRY. Accounts of poetry as a category tend to outline essential features in an argument that might claim general assent. The range of past and present usage of the word, however, eludes such unifying accounts and invites us to think of poetry as a word of ancient Gr. origin, with a long and rich hist. One part of that hist. is the assumption that the word refers to something that transcends its hist. or has a conceptual core that runs through all the variations in its use. That hist. has been driven by acts of calling certain representations or classes of *representation poetry.

The hist. begins with a set of Gr. terms: poiēsis*, making; poiēma, a thing made, a work; poiētēs, a maker, *poet; poiētike (technē), the making (art/technique), *poetics. None of these words quite corresponds to the later categorical term poetry. The first attempt to give a comprehensive account, Aristotle's Poetics, set this hist. of change in motion by incl. the Socratic dialogues in prose but excluding Empedocles's versified natural philosophy. Prior to Aristotle, the Greeks had roughly assumed that poetry, when applied to discourse, referred to making verse. By excluding metrical composition as the defining criterion, Aristotle turned the object of "making" into a problem. Combined with Plato's critique of the conceptual value of poetry (for which Aristotle had an answer), Aristotle's question of what poetry "is" and, no less important, what poetry "is not" initiated a process of redefining and extending the categorical term. That process had a weight that was lacking in more specific questions: what is a sonnet or a play or even a debated term like epic?

Aristotle, thinking primarily of *drama and epic, answered the question he posed with the claim that the object of "making" was a *plot (muthos), an old term redefined and transformed into a set of internally necessary relations by the logic of Aristotle's argument. Although we now identify poetry primarily with *lyric, it is not at all clear how well Gr. lyric would have satisfied Aristotle's definition. Thereafter, poetry, in its mutations through various Eur. langs., was destabilized, in natural lang. referring to a set of metrical genres and in theory referring to some idea realized in only a subset of texts.

In the wholesale borrowing of Gr. literary vocabulary by the Romans, the conceptual morphology of poiēsis was Latinized and used for general terms covering a range of metrical discursive forms more commonly referred to by specific genre names, some borrowed from Gr. but others such as carmina (oddly trans. as odes*) from native Lat. We will call these Latinized and later vernacularized variations of the Gr. poiēsis "poetry words," the borrowed terms that helped create the impression of a universal concept that transcended its instantiation in any particular lang. Until the late Middle Ages, poema, poetica (ars), and poeta remained Lat. terms. The bards, scops, and skalds, troubadours*, trouvères*, rimatori, and Minnesänger came to be called poets in the vernacular only later. If such rhymers were referred to in Lat., the poetry words were sometimes used. In Dante, the poetry words were firmly established for vernacular composition. Indeed, in the Vita nuova and the Convivio, we have poetria, a categorical term roughly corresponding to poetry. The term was borrowed from med. Lat. but used in an apparently new way. Petrarch, who so profoundly aspired to be a "poet" in the Lat. sense, still termed his vernacular verse Rime sparse (or Rerum vulgarium fragmenta)—even though he calls what he does in the vernacular lyrics poetando, "making poems." The term poetry, in its variations, gradually came into use in the Eur. vernaculars; there it appears as a general term, covering a wide range of metrical discourses in the vernacular and implicitly linking recent vernacular metrical writing to Gr. and Lat. trads.

On a certain level of theoretical discourse, the vernacular derivatives of the Lat. continued to carry the full range of the Aristotelian usage, referring to epic (and verse *narrative), drama (in verse), and even lyric (although Ren. It. critics rarely considered lyric in their treatises on poetics). This range continued well into the 19th c., esp. in Germany, which came to favor the native term Dichtung for metrical composition, as opposed to the general term (derived from Fr.), Poesie, for lit. in a larger sense, incl. the novel. In popular usage, however, epic and drama increasingly appeared as marked terms (such as John Dryden's An Essay of Dramatic Poesy), while the unmarked term poetry came to refer primarily to lyric. In the 19th c., variations on the term literature eventually supplanted this larger sense of "poetry."

As the meaning of poetry was becoming increasingly centered on lyric and shorter *narrative verse, the range of discursive forms called poetry was broadening in the late 18th and 19th cs. In part, this broadening followed from renewed interest in and the recovery of earlier lit. from the Middle Ages, whose vernacular lyrics were now conventionally called poetry. Anonymous oral verse such as *ballads and folk songs became poetry. Poetry was also used to describe a variety of metrical genres from the old, literate cultures of Asia, genres that were sometimes very far from the sense of the term that we find in Aristotle. Shi'ir, the categorical term for strict metrical lyric genres in the Islamic world, was called poetry. Kāvya, with a range that included prose and was centered, like Aristotle, on epic and drama, was called poetry. The lyric form shi*, in its East Asian variations, was, like poetry, a concept going beyond formal definition (by this period in Chinese one could say that there was no "shi" in something that was formally a "shi"); this too was called poetry. In the latter part of the 19th c., protoanthropologists found poetry in the verse of preliterate societies. Eventually in the 20th c., Homer, once the prime example of the poet as maker, became the name attached to the record of a collective practice of oral composition, which was called oral poetry*. Such a radically extended corpus of what might be considered poetry, combined with the evolving practice of Eur. writers who called themselves poets, required a new and far broader understanding of the term.

Some basic transformations in the idea of poetry occurred in the early 19th c. These transformations have come to be so taken for granted that they are now seen as essential to poetry rather than as historical phenomena.

Aristotle's claim that a poet made "plots" was no longer appropriate for the new ways in which the word poetry was used. G.W.F. Hegel proposed in the Aesthetics that the material of poetry was "inner representations" (innere Vorstellen) to which the poet gave form and that lang. was merely an accidental means of manifestation. From this, Hegel concluded that poetry could be translated from one lang. to another without essential loss. Only a few decades separated Hegel's lectures on aesthetics from P. B. Shelley's memorable comparison of translating poetry to casting a violet into a crucible (A Defence of Poetry). The differences among discursive forms called poetry were the companion of the nationalization of poetry. Even Hegel insists that there are different poetries of different nations or areas, each distinct in "spirit, feeling, outlook, expression." The idea that poetry appears through particular words in a unique national lang. and is thus untranslatable was very much a product of the 19th c. It went with the idea of a distinctly national culture, the unprecedented dissemination of a normalized national lang. and the suppression of regional variation through a new school system based on the authorized vernacular. It was an idea that served the mythology of the ethnic unity of the nation-state (see NATIONAL POETRY).

We see yet another important transformation in poetry in Hegel's Aesthetics: the rejection of *occasional poetry, which is made to answer social needs and demands. Through much of its hist., lyric poetry in particular was socially grounded—it served to praise, blame, petition, insult, and seduce. Such contingency in poetry violated the freedom that Hegel saw at the heart of poetry. The idea that poetry should be an end in itself was to have profound consequences later in the century.

In the 19th c., a few poets could still make a living by writing poetry (Victor Hugo may have been the last), but by and large, poetry came to be seen as an exercise of pure art detached from any pragmatic social ground. Mod. theorists from Theodor Adorno to Pierre Bourdieu have argued that valorizing poetry's disengagement from social utility was itself socially grounded. The putative social *autonomy of the poet has remained, however, the general assumption, with the only serious exception being the subordination of poetry to the needs of socialist revolution. Nonsocialist critics consider such poetry potentially propaganda, thus, not true poetry.

Like other cultural products of Europe, this new version of poetry traveled with colonialism and the display of Eur. technological power. The Eur. diasporic cultures of the New World, Africa, and the Pacific kept up by reading and sometimes sending aspiring young poets back to Europe—most often to Paris. From the mid-19th through the early 20th c., Fr. and Eng. poetry was exported to the literate cultures of Asia. In Asia, these imported Eur. trads. competed with and sometimes entirely replaced established literary trads. There was usually a stage during which writers tried to accommodate new Eur. ways of writing in traditional forms, beginning with Tanzimat (Transformation) in Ottoman Turkey in the 1840s. Similar phases came later in Japan, China, South Asia, and the Persian and Ar. world. In some cases, as with the destruction of the culture of Mughal Dehli following the Sepoy Rebellion, political upheaval destroyed the community on which continuity depended. In other cases, the dissatisfaction of young writers with traditional poetic forms led to what was often termed new poetry, essentially on a Eur. model (ranging from *romanticism to the avant-gardes of the early 20th c.; see AVANT-GARDE POETICS).

In Japan, China, South Asia, and the Islamic world, these versions of new poetry entered a tense relationship with the existing older poetry. The later represented cultural trad., a conservatism that, through the course of the 20th c., increasingly represented nationalism. The former began with its eyes fixed firmly on Western Europe but gradually saw itself as representing an international community of poetry. Both the new poetry and the various forms of older poetry were, however, understood as different versions of some universal thing now called poetry. Although the terms used for poetry were regional and thus asserted continuity with older trads., the semantic range of such terms expanded to accommodate the vague universalism of poetry, as used in the various Eur. vernaculars.

Through the 19th c. and early 20th c., Western Eur. poetry was being diffused through the Eur. diaspora, through Eastern Europe and Russia and through the colonies and independent states feeling the weight of Eur. technological power. During this same period, poetry was changing rapidly, primarily in France. One could easily argue that the technology of distribution had become so rapid that, in order to retain their cultural advantage, Fr. poets had continuously to supersede their recent predecessors; they had, in effect, entered a mod. self-conscious fashion system.

It is important to understand the differences in cultural power at this long moment in hist. The Rus. elite visited and stayed in Paris; the Fr. elite by and large did not stay in Moscow or St. Petersburg. If Rus. books were imported to France, they were purchased by Russians; if Fr. books were imported to St. Petersburg, they were purchased by Russians. Rubén Darío went to Paris and brought back a new poetry that began a transformation of Latin Am. poetry; although the Fr. would eventually become interested in the new Latin Am. poetry, they did not go to Mexico City at the turn of the 20th c.—much less to León, Nicaragua, where Darío became a poet—to get literary inspiration. Orientalists in England, France, and Germany studied cl. Ar., Persian, and Ottoman poetry; their trans. were widely read and appreciated, giving us J. W. Goethe's West-östlicher Divan (West-Eastern Divan; see DIVAN) and Edward FitzGerald's trans. of ʿUmar Khayyām (see OMAR KHAYYÁM QUATRAIN). But (somewhat later), young Ar. and Turkish intellectuals frequented the Fr. bookstores in Alexandria and Istanbul for the latest shipments from Paris. In Alexandria (and often in Paris), C. P. Cavafy was arguably not a "Greek poet," but a very innovative "Western European poet" who wrote in Gr.

An essay by the Am. poet E. A. Poe, "The Poetic Principle," had an immense impact in France. Poetry was to aspire to the condition of music, a pure aesthetic experience of concentrated intensity. Although still tied to the ideology of national lang. in its untranslatability, the lang. of *pure poetry was distinct from lang. elsewhere, which was seen as based on utility and social engagement.

From the middle of the 19th c., there was an ever-increasing diversity in the kinds of discourse that were called poetry. Paris attempted to assert hegemony in successive versions of an avant-garde and, for much of the world, succeeded until World War II. Such hegemony, however, could be contested from the very beginning of poetic modernity in figures such as Walt Whitman and Emily Dickinson.

Changes in technology and the structures of cultural authority in the second half of the 20th c. and into the 21st c. have profoundly changed the world of poetry. Improvements in the technology of printing and dissemination made the production of poetry less dependent on large publishers with established structures of distribution. The shrinking readership for contemp. poetry simultaneously made publishing poetry less desirable for large publishers. By the end of the 20th c., the Web became an important venue for poetry, with communities of readers no longer in any common physical location but able to communicate with each other—and sometimes with the poets—with great ease.

The literary reviews of an earlier era, in which the judgment of established cultural figures exerted a profound influence on the careers of younger poets, became less important. The rapid expansion of the university system in the second half of the 20th c. made the academy a central force in the evolution of poetry, with a proliferation of critics recovering and publicizing older poetry, passing judgment on contemp. poetry, offering venues for poets giving readings and lectures, and often providing regular employment for poets. The sheer number of such colleges and universities in the New World, Europe, and much of Asia has led to a radically decentered world of poetry. The poetry communities on the Web have increasingly offered challenges to such academic authority.

What is the understanding of poetry that unites diverse practices from concrete poetry to computer-generated poems to waka that follow the sentiments and rules of propriety from a millennium earlier to a traditional Chinese poem in which a father admonishes his son who has asked for money to buy a tape recorder? In each case, a cultural authority of one sort or another can step in and say, "That is not poetry." Yet each of the diverse practices of poetry in the early 21st c. derives from some moment in the hist. of the word, and each stakes a claim that excludes some practice of poetry elsewhere.

POETRY READING. Although oral poetry *performance is coextensive with the hist. of poetry, the poetry reading is a relatively recent type of such performance, a cultural category of a discrete live event at which an author reads aloud from a written text of his or her own poetry to a public audience. Text-based performance by the author has become central to mod. poetry trads. since the middle of the 20th c. and performs a number of functions: it provides publicity and financial support for the careers of poets; it promotes the dissemination of poetry in societies whose mass media pay little attention; it makes possible the borrowing of cultural capital from other events such as conferences, rallies, and social campaigns; and it generates new modes of poetry. Almost all poetry since the 1950s anticipates both silent reading and aural reception, and this duality of reception gives impetus to poetic forms well suited to public authorial projection, such as first-person confessional lyrics, oratorical and highly rhetorical styles, and even disjunctive, paratactic verse (purely *oral poetry is heavily paratactic; see HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS). The growing dominance of the poetry reading has also enabled many other performance trads.—incl. performance art, live comedy, praise poetry, the griot, the phalène, the *eisteddfod, the mushaira, and pop-music lyrics—to influence the poetry reading and has led to speciation into spoken word, *poetry slam, hip-hop, experimental performance, *sound poetry, and crossovers with music, visual art, and theater. This intense activity around the poetry reading continues to drive devels. in poetic form.

The public reading aloud of written poems has diverse origins. Although poets have always recited their work aloud privately to family, friends, and patrons, most oral reading of poetry was done not by the author but by professionals, priests, courtiers, officials, and others at religious or ceremonial occasions or by actors in public entertainments. A few 19th-c. authors, notably Walt Whitman, gave public readings in the wider context of popular lectures. In the early 20th c., avant-garde venues and universities in particular provided intermittent opportunities for poets to give poetry readings; but with a few exceptions, poetic composition was not directed at authorial public performance, and there was no defined cultural category of poetry reading. Until the mid-20th c., the majority of occasions when poetry was read aloud were everyday private gatherings, where ordinary readers entertained a circle of listeners by reading aloud, a commonplace oralcy that deeply shaped both the composition and reception of poetry until the early 20th c.

Rapid decline of such homemade entertainment from the 1920s onward in the face of new leisure opportunities provided by the automobile, the cinema, and radio ended this hist. of self-reliant communal entertainment and, in the process, removed the experience of hearing poetry from most readers. After World War II, demand for radio broadcasts of poems by their authors, a continuing minor trad. of poetry readings in universities, the success of Dylan Thomas's tour of America, new affordable recording technology, and perhaps a felt lack of live poetry in everyday life all contributed to the emergence of the poetry reading as a major force in the 1950s, a devel. symbolized by notable events such as the Six Gallery reading at which Allen Ginsberg premiered Howl and by Evgenii Evtushenko's performances of "Babi Yar." Most poetry pub. since the 1960s is intended to be both read silently on the page with the sharpened attention to semantic, visual, and sonic cues made possible by rereading and heard and remembered as a performed work.

Poetry readings are easily thought of as no more than live public entertainments at which audiences can see and listen to poets in action. Critics of the poetry reading have deplored their popularity as pandering to a taste for vaudeville or at best no more than a mutual celebration of cultural capital; scholars have sometimes assumed that, despite apparent parallels between the texts of poems and musical scores or drama scripts, performance of a written text adds nothing to the value and meaning of a poem that could not be had by silent reading. Now that performance is an essential component of the public culture of poetry, researchers have begun to ask whether the poetry reading affects any of the core conceptual issues of literary interpretation, and several areas of investigation have been proposed.

Many poets argue that *sound is the primary carrier of meaning in the poem through the *iconicity of phonemes, the affective coloration of phonetic articulation produced by the body's vocal organs, and associations between the sound of the poem's lang. and the sensory complexity of the world's soundscapes. Researchers have investigated whether the poetry reading offers opportunities similar to those of musical performance to explore these possibilities of the poetic acoustic in ways to which the inner mental theater can do only limited justice and to study the intersections of physical and metaphorical voice in texts and performance. Others note that poetic movements tend to adopt speaking styles that could be studied like hegemonic singing styles; that performance can elicit intersubjective dynamics of *address; that poetry performance is interdependent with recording and mediating technologies; that many poetry readings are site-specific; and finally that poetry readings frequently stage existential and institutional issues of authorship, as an audience witnesses what it means to embody and affirm these particular words in a poem in public.

Charles Bernstein writes that he "would add the poet's own performance of the work in a poetry reading, or readings, to the list of variants that together, plurally, constitute and reconstitute the work." Until the end of the 20th c., lit. crit. wrote little about this possibility (even poets had little to say) and left the field to ethnographers of oral lit., but researchers increasingly agree with Bernstein's claim. In addition to a rapidly growing critical lit., many Web sites now present audio and video recordings of poetry readings, and major archiving projects of a hist. at risk of disappearance are also underway both online and in national libraries.

POETRY SLAM. A contest in which poets compete against each other with judges (chosen at random from the audience) assigning a score to each performance on a scale of one to ten to determine the winner. The entertainment is characterized by a high level of participation between poet and audience and is often held at a bar or café, with the intent of drawing a paying crowd. Typically, no props or costumes are allowed, and performances are limited to three minutes. Many slams are open to the public, though some are by invitation only. The poetry slam has been credited as a factor in returning poetry to the people.

The poetry slam is part of a broad late 20th-c. resurgence of the spoken word, incl. in music (rap and *hip-hop), and has been likened to ancient trads. of competitive and/or linked rhymes between orators—from the Gr. mythological tale of Apollo and Marsyas to the Af. griots, from the Sanjurokunin sen, or imaginary poetry team competitions, of 10th-c. Japanese court poet Fujiwara no Kinto to the Af. Am. *dozens. Its rise in the U.S. in the early 1980s is traceable to a poetry "bout" between poets Ted Berrigan and Anne Waldman—both decked out as boxers—in 1979. (Future bouts moved to New Mexico and became the Taos Heavyweight Poetry Championship.) The next year, in an unrelated occurrence, the Chicago poet Jerome Salla and the musician Jimmy Desmond, who previously had gotten drunk and created a disturbance at one of Salla's readings, engaged in what was billed as "a ten-round poetry fight to the death." The fight was inspired by professional wrestling, which was enjoying immense popularity in the U.S. at the time, as well as punk rock, which came to the U.S. in the late 1970s, with the erosion of the boundary between artist and spectator informing the dialogic relationship between audience and poet that is central to the poetry slam. The poetry slam also has links to earlier trads. of U.S. performance poetry, perhaps most notably the *Beat poets and the carnival culture that prevailed at their readings.

Marc Smith started the poetry slam in Chicago in 1986 at a club called the Green Mill. In New York, Bob Holman introduced the poetry slam at the *Nuyorican Poets Café in 1989, one of the original venues to host such competitions. In San Francisco in 1990, Gary Mex Glazner organized the first National Poetry Slam, where competitors from across the U.S. came to compete. The poetry slam has become a widespread cultural phenomenon, regularly convening ordinary people either weekly or monthly in many North Am. cities. The National Poetry Slam is an international event, with championships taking place in England, Germany, Israel, and Sweden.

Styles of slam poetry range from the searingly funny to the wrenchingly confessional. Through strategies of counteridentification and even disidentification, slam poets often seek to transcend the boundaries of socialized roles, and the poetry slam itself becomes a site for the ritual enactment of communitas. Much of the poetry performed at the poetry slam is fueled by identity politics, and the poetry slam itself has been hailed as both democratic and multicultural, featuring a pluralist cast of poets who are tied up in powerful social movements that have reframed—and validated—cultural identities of minority citizens, particularly as those identities are informed by race, ethnicity, class, gender, and sexuality. The poetry slam thus has given a voice to subaltern groups and their resistant, sometimes subversive, politics. On the other hand, the poetry slam also has sought to harness the energies and strategies of late market capitalism in an effort to compete for consumers' attention, complicating for some its claims to alterity.

Concern has been expressed about the commodification of the poetry slam—its trendiness and gimmickry—as by the poet Amiri Baraka, who likens it to a "strong-man act," a sideshow spectacle that relies too much on the personality of the poet and not enough on the intrinsic quality of the poem. Some have condemned the slam as "anti-art," with the literary critic Harold Bloom proclaiming it "the death of art." Others have questioned in more subdued tones whether slam poetry can operate successfully on the page.

A number of slam poets have published work in traditional print form; others have released cassettes and compact discs in addition to, or in the place of, books. Many of the most popular performance poets in the U.S. in the early 21st c. got their start in the arena of the poetry slam, among them Staceyann Chin, Reg E. Gaines, Bob Holman, Tracie Morris, Patricia Smith, and Saul Williams.

POETRY THERAPY. See THERAPY AND POETRY.

POIĒSIS (from the Gr. verb poieō, infinitive poiein, "to make form"). The verb, not the noun, was prominent in usage first. In the context of poetry, the substantive poiētēs (*poet) was long more common than the abstract noun poiēsis. Indeed, the art of poetry as such was often denoted as poiētikē, from which the discipline of *poetics obtains its name.

In general usage, the verb form poiein retained as primary meaning an act of formation and transformation of matter in the cosmic sphere in relation to time. Though ultimately, as a social practice, it involves technē (art) and thus belongs to the world of art, poiēsis in the sense of making form is still present in the lang. of biology and cybernetics (as in autopoiesis, the self-generation of living organisms) or medicine (as in hematopoiesis, the process by which bone marrow produces red blood cells).

It is important to observe this primary sense of making form when discussing the term poiēsis in the context of poetry and poetics. The poet as homo faber (man, the maker) and the poem as the made thing are commonplaces that persist throughout the hist. of Western poetics, often in tension with other formulations that identify the poet as prophet or seer (Lat. vates*), as a vessel of divine *inspiration, or as the transcendent voice of the age.

Esp. when the complement or alternative has been an idealist program for poetry—for instance, the Aristotelian notion of poetry as mimesis* as adapted in the Eur. Ren.—the notion of poetry as poiēsis has held an undiminished power, perhaps because it explains what other programs often cannot: how we encounter a poem as object, how a poem radically alters reality, how a poem is actually made. The hist. of Western poetics includes many episodes in which idealist or even metaphysical claims for poetry are answered (and not necessarily contradicted) by corresponding claims that proceed from poiēsis: e.g., Philip Sidney's fusion of Platonism and Aristotelianism in his Defence of Poesy (written ca. 1580, pub. 1595) meets its counterpart in George Puttenham's contemporaneous Arte of English Poesie (1589), which begins with this statement: "a poet is as much to say as a maker." A reductive but not inaccurate thesis would have it that this tension between idealist creating and materialist making permeates the entire hist. of signification of the term poiēsis.

In the 20th c., renewed attention to poiēsis was the outcome of a modernist aspiration to shake off the burden of the romantic *genius. Modernist poetry and crit. often named the poem not as fiction, ideation, or reflection but as new reality in itself; described the poetic act as the making of a new thing; and—in the spirit of Dante's praise of Arnaut Daniel as "miglior fabbro del parlar materno" (a better craftsman of the mother tongue; Purgatorio 26.117), echoed in T. S. Eliot's dedication to The Waste Land (1922)—celebrated the poet as agent of creation rather than instrument of *representation (see MODERNISM). Crucial here would be the early theoretical texts of Paul Valéry: "The Introduction to the Method of Leonardo da Vinci" (1894) and "Poetry and Abstract Thought" (1939).

In this specific sense, one might discern in modernist thinking something of the emergent notional frame of poiēsis. Its most ancient appearance in Homeric Gr. (as poiein) pertains primarily to working on matter, shape, or form and only secondarily to abstraction, whereby it might suggest availing or producing forms. As philosophy takes over in the cl. Gr. imaginary, this primary materialist notion of poiēsis becomes degraded relative to praxis (action) or dēmiourgia (creation). Yet it is interesting to note that, in strict etymology, the root reference of dēmiourgia bears a sort of communal instrumentalism. As opposed to poiētēs, who encounters form as object, dēmiourgos is one whose work derives its primary meaning from the public sphere, as the word itself shows: dēmos + ergon. This ergon (work) covers a range of action: a dēmiourgos can be a seer as much as a doctor.

Arguably because of the Christian investment in the notion of creation out of the absolute, but no doubt also because of the epistemological permutations of Platonism from the Hellenistic era onward, the referential framework that comes to measure the genius of a poet is drawn not from poiēsis but from dēmiourgia. In Plato, one might say (though in Timaeus both notions are intertwined) that dēmiourgos is still in effect a worker who commits an ergon, even if this ergon is the universe itself, while the poet is a shaper who shapes forms. But for Plato, shaping forms is, in the last instance, inevitably misshaping, de-forming—hence, his alarm for the poet as a shaper who transforms morals, essentially a political, not ethical, act that leaves no place for the poet but exile from the city. Plato's concern is warranted from the standpoint of what will become the philosophical (and later, theological) desire to harness an unalterable, inalienable truth. This is because shaping is always altering; thus, to form is always to transform, conceived, in a materialist way, as the process of bringing otherness to bear on the world, as opposed to receiving otherness as external authority. In this respect, inherent in the infinitive poiein is also an element of destruction, and there is no external guarantee that would absolve any poiēsis of the destructive elements of the alteration it performs.

The mod. viewpoint sustains this creative and destructive action in poiein. The struggle between what we can abusively call "private" and "public" poetics has not resolved, historically, the social demands posed by the idea of the poet as a shaper of forms. Astonishingly long lasting, the force of Plato's political prejudice has been crucial in the formation of modernity. Discussions of the Platonic dimensions of the term poiēsis often restrict themselves to its central invocation in the Symposium, where the notion is infused with various permutations of eros. There too, however, the ultimate power of poiēsis consists not in the shaping of form or even the erotic creation and production of life but in the transformation of the soul by virtue of philosophical practice. In the usurpation of poiēsis, philosophy defeats poetry yet again.

It is no surprise that, in the long precession of Western thought, whereby the quarrel between poetry and philosophy is relentlessly conducted, the advocates of poiēsis as material (trans)formation are those who resist the seductions of Platonism and its derivatives. Few, however, explicitly name poiēsis as such to be the matrix of their philosophical pursuit. One such thinker would surely be Giambattista Vico, whose Scienza nuova (New Science, 1725) extends the Ren. rendition of poiēsis beyond the task of imitatio natura and indeed inaugurates thinking of hist. as a poetic project. While it is difficult to speak of Vico's direct philosophical descendants, in retrospect a vast trajectory of strains of thought either in *avant-garde poetics (from the 19th c. on) or political aesthetics (esp. heterodox tendencies unfolding out of Hegelian Marxism) engages with similar views of hist. as poiēsis.

However, of all mod. philosophical encounters with poiēsis specifically, Martin Heidegger's engagement remains most influential. Although Heidegger's claim to discover the originary meaning of poiēsis should be taken lightly, nonetheless his explicit decision to outmaneuver the vast Platonic legacy by turning to the pre-Socratics lends a new aspect to the notion. In Heidegger's texts, poiēsis is invoked as the overcoming of the ancient quarrel between poetry and philosophy by standing for the disclosure (a-lētheia) of Being. Already in the Einführung in die Metaphysik (Introduction to Metaphysics, 1936), Heidegger forwards what will eventually become the central focus of his work: poetry is thought itself (dichten ist denken), and thereby all philosophical thinking is truly poetic and vice versa. Even if one can trace theological elements in Heidegger's invocation of poiēsis as radical creation, his gesture does, in part, return to the Gr. poiein its radical formative force.

This force resonates in discourses of modernity, both aesthetic and political. An entire society can be said to engage in poiēsis in its radical moments of self-determination. In this sense, and bearing reference to Vico, poiēsis can be linked to hist. in the making. This making cannot be said to have a precise temporality; hence, traditional methods of historiography cannot grasp it. Its working is a perpetual reworking that would not spare even itself as an object of that work. (The commonplace notion of a poem always being at work on itself, on making itself into a poem, should be understood here as an elemental force of poiēsis.) The duration of shaping matter into form, as Henri Bergson would have it, occurs in (or as) a radical present. This is a paradoxical condition, which is why its boundaries exceed the capacity of both narration and symbolization and can only be grasped in a performative vein. The energy of poiēsis is dramatic: literally, to form is to make form happen, to change form—incl. one's own. The social and political substance of poiēsis is thus signified not only by its constitutively transformative power, which would be a mere abstraction, but by the fact that, since its ancient Gr. meaning, it pertains to humanity's immanent (even if perpetually self-altering) encounter with the world.

I. The Middle Ages to the Fourteenth Century
II. The Fifteenth Century
III. The Sixteenth Century
IV. The Seventeenth Century
V. The Eighteenth Century
VI. The Nineteenth Century
VII. The Twentieth Century
VIII. The Twenty-First Century

I. The Middle Ages to the Fourteenth Century. Pre-Christian oral poetry in Polish dialects has not been uncovered, but its traces may be found in folk lit. Christianity in Western form was adopted in Poland in 966. The result was sustained literary activity in Lat. until the 17th c. Among the numerous liturgical songs of the med. period, the hymn Gaude Mater Polonia devoted to St. Stanislaus was esp. important. The anonymous song "Bogurodzica" (Mother of God) is the oldest poem preserved in the Polish lang. The only two copies date from the beginning of the 15th c., but it was most likely composed in the 13th c. It was sung throughout the country in various versions and was even considered an *anthem of the Polish kingdom. Consisting of two stanzas and the refrain "Kyrie eleison," the equivalent of the iconographic theme of deesis (Christ Pantocrator, Mary, and St. John the Baptist) is visible in its sophisticated construction. Only fragments of other Polish poems of the Middle Ages have been preserved, but Christian literary production (both oral and written) was probably much more extensive. The first trans. of the Psalms at the end of the 14th c. (the so-called Psałterz floriański) had a lasting impact on the devel. of Polish poetry.

II. The Fifteenth Century. Religious literary activity of this period was very rich; some Christmas *carols and Lenten and Easter songs are still sung in Polish churches. The song "Żale Matki Boskiej pod krzyżem" (Lament of the Mother of God at the Foot of the Cross) is the most innovative work of the time. The monologue, expressing Mary's powerful emotions, is likely a part of a missing Passion mystery play. *Epic poetry is poorly represented. Legenda o świętym Aleksym (The Legend of Saint Alexis) is an example of verse hagiography, drawing on foreign sources. Only a few fragments of secular poems have been preserved. The most impressive is "Rozmowa Mistrza Polikarpa ze Śmiercią" (A Dialogue between Master Polycarpus and Death), a form of med. dialogism or perhaps part of a morality play. Opulent in lang., imagery, black humor, and even grotesque elements, it constitutes a reflection on the topos of the danse macabre. The verse structure of Polish poetry at that time was based on a system of relative syllabism with approximate rhymes (see SYLLABIC VERSE).

III. The Sixteenth Century. Humanist influences are pronounced in Lat. poetry in the first part of the century. In describing Polish landscapes and recounting Polish hist., Janicíus (pseud. of Klemens Janicki, 1516–43) imitated the forms of ancient poetry. Some poets—among them, Jan Kochanowski (1530–84) and Szymon Szymonowic (1558–1629)—cultivated bilingual (Lat. and Polish) poetry.

Poetry in vernacular came into prominence. Mikołaj Rej (1505–69, called the father of Polish poetry) used Polish exclusively in his didactic or satiric poetry expressing the ideology of the Reformation; his verse structure is close to syllabism.

Jan Kochanowski was the most eminent poet of the Polish Ren. He imported the forms of ancient poetry and established a strictly syllabic system of Polish verse, incl. exact rhyme, stabilized *caesura, paroxytonic *cadence and *enjambment, thus making possible an interplay between syntax and verse structure. His poetry consists of the collections Psałterz Dawidów (an adaptation of the Psalms, 1578), Treny (Laments, 1580), Fraszki (Trifles, written throughout his life, ed. 1584), Pieśni (Songs, ed. 1586), some epic poems, and the cl. verse tragedy Odprawa posłów greckich (The Dismissal of the Greek Envoys, 1578). The anacreontic trifles and Horatian songs he composed from his early years until his death express an enjoyment of everyday life and acceptance of nature: they are inspired by Stoic and Epicurean philosophy. In his *laments, written after the death of his four-year-old daughter, the poet expresses a wide range of shifting emotions, from despair to final reconciliation with God's will.

Mikołaj Sęp Szarzyński (1550?–81?) was a profoundly metaphysical poet whose work expressed impassioned spiritual experience. He converted from Calvinism to Catholicism (as was typical for Polish nobles during the Counter-Reformation). His work foreshadowed the emerging poetics of the early *baroque (or *mannerism): oxymoronic imagery, abundant inversions, ellipses, and enjambments. Sęp Szarzyński was the author of only one volume of poems, ed. posthumously: Rytmy abo wiersze polskie (Rhythms or Polish Verses, 1601). Another metaphysical poet of the period was Sebastian Grabowiecki (ca. 1543–1607), who expressed quietism through his refined, sophisticated lyricism.

IV. The Seventeenth Century. Szymon Szymonowic was a poet of the late Ren. who followed Kochanowski in his poetics but also imitated the Alexandrian poet Theocritus in his Sielanki (Idylls, 1614). His semirealistic *pastorals became the model for the genre in the 17th and 18th cs. Maciej Kazimierz Sarbiewski (1595–1640), known as the Christian Horace, vaulted to Eur. fame as an intellectual poet writing in Lat. and the author of a theory of baroque poetry. The Protestant Daniel Naborowski (1573–1640) continued "the metaphysical line" in Polish poetry. His oxymoronic poetry, full of contradictions, expressed the uncertainty of human existence in the world.

Another kind of Polish baroque poetry, court poetry, was inspired by Giambattista Marino (see MARINISM) and Luis de Góngora (see CONCEPTISMO). It was more cosmopolitan, close at times to Fr. libertinism. The premier author in this mode was Jan Andrzej Morsztyn (1621–93); his poetry, full of *wit and *conceits, constituted a kind of verbal game. Its main theme was love and its *paradoxes.

The dominant strain in 17th-c. Polish culture was the Sarmatian baroque. Ancient Sarmatia was a founding myth of the Polish nobility, and many poets subscribed to the ideology this myth embodied. Their poetry employed various forms, both epic and lyric. Wacław Potocki (1621–96) composed the epic poem Wojna chocimska (War of Chocim, 1670) and the series of "Moralia" (1688). Wespazjan Kochowski (1633–1700) was the author of the collection of lyrics and epigrams Niepróżnujące próżnowanie (Unleisurely Leisure, 1674) and of a long poem in biblical prose Psalmodia polska (Polish Psalmody, 1695), a messianic interpretation of Polish hist.

V. The Eighteenth Century. Polish poetry in the 18th c. remained under the strong influence of the Sarmatian baroque. In 1766, an epigone of the style, Józef Baka (1707–80), published his devotional and moralistic poems, full of paradoxes and a very particular black humor. A vast wave of anonymous patriotic and religious poetry appeared after the gentry rebellion called Konfederacja Barska (the Confederacy of Bar, 1768). The 1760s marked a significant turn in Polish poetry, in response to the political changes following the election of the last king of independent Poland, Stanisław August Poniatowski (r. 1764–95). The ideology of the Enlightenment gained currency in intellectual circles surrounding the royal court and other aristocratic courts. Didactic poetry propagating the new philosophy and worldview emerged; and the baroque style was replaced by Fr. *classicism, *rococo, and preromantic sentimentalism. The new tendencies intermingled with older Sarmatian models in the work of Adam Naruszewicz (1733–96). In his poetry, didactic and rhetorical, he employed cl. genres such as the *ode or *satire. At the same time his lang. was crude and abounded in *antitheses.

Ignacy Krasicki (1735–1801) was the most magnificent poet of the Polish Enlightenment. His poetic production encompassed *fables, satires, and a *mock epic (Monachomachia, 1778). His works were full of irony and sophisticated humor, marked by precise lang., brilliant dialogues, innovative rhymes and cl. forms. Krasicki ridiculed contemp. morals, incl. the life of the clergy; his skepticism about human nature shows his affinities with the philosophy of Voltaire. His poetry was didactic without intrusive rhet. Stanisław Trembecki (1739?–1812) and Tomasz Kajetan Węgierski (1756–87) represented the libertine poetry of the rococo. Trembecki composed both political odes and obscene *erotic poems; his highest achievements, however, were his anacreontics and the *descriptive poem Sofiówka (Sophie's Garden, 1806). Węgierski was far more radical in his libertinism, writing not only erotic poems but antireligious poetic pamphlets and harsh moral satires as well. Another stream of rococo verged on sentimentalism. Franciszek Dionizy Kniaźnin (1750–1807) produced anacreontics, fables, and *bucolic verse. Franciszek Karpiński (1741–1825) wrote erotic poems, sentimental rather than libertine, *idylls, and religious songs (among them one of the most refined Polish Christmas carols, "Bóg się rodzi" (God Is Born).

After several years of political upheaval (a profound crisis in the government, efforts to rectify it, internal tensions, foreign political interference), Poland was partitioned among its neighbors—Russia, Prussia, and Austria—and disappeared as an independent nation in 1795. In Polish lit. and esp. in poetry, an entirely new situation emerged. From this time on, poetry became a substitute for other means of shaping national ideology and culture (see NATIONAL POETRY).

VI. The Nineteenth Century

A. The Classical and Preromantic Period. The beginning of the century was marked by the continued domination of cl. poetry, but new tendencies also developed. Apart from Trembecki's work, another significant descriptive poem—influenced by Virgil—was Ziemiaństwo polskie (Polish Landed Gentry, 1839), which occupied the poet Kajetan Koźmian (1771–1856) for almost three decades. Kazimierz Brodziński (1791–1835) composed a series of sentimental bucolics. Alojzy Feliński (1771–1820) authored a cl. tragedy in syllabic verse inspired by Polish hist., Barbara Radziwiłłówna (1811, staged in 1817). Jan Paweł Woronicz (1757?–1829) was the author of Hymn do Boga (Hymn to God, 1805), a messianic explication of Polish hist. (the romantics were later inspired by this vision). The Śpiewy historyczne (Historic Songs, 1816) of Julian Ursyn Niemcewicz (1758–1841) were written in the style of James Macpherson's Ossianic songs and told of Poland's heroic past. Aleksander Fredro (1793?–1876) was the author of comedies inspired by cl. forms (Molière, Marivaux) but dealing with the Sarmatian trad. (Zemsta, Vengeance, staged 1834) or the new romantic sensibility (Śluby panieńskie, Maidens' Vows, staged 1839). Fredro's raillery was rooted in both a libertine outlook and rational common sense. He was inventive in his poetics and lang.; wit and play with various styles were the main sources of his humor.

B. The Romantic Period. The period between 1818 and 1822 was marked by "the battle between the Classicists and the Romantics." The dispute was settled by the debut of Adam Mickiewicz (1798–1855), with his volume Ballady i romanse (Ballads and Romances, 1822). Mickiewicz, the greatest Polish poet since Kochanowski, was the first Polish romantic. He had read J. W. Goethe, Friedrich Schiller, Lord Byron, and other Eur. romantic authors; but, educated in the spirit of the Enlightenment, he knew cl. lit. as well. In his work, both tendencies are visible. Oda do młodości (Ode to Youth, 1820) is an example of combining cl. rhet. with the new romantic ideology of youth as a divine power creating a new world. Mickiewicz was a master of Polish verse. He experimented with forms of rhythm, sought out revealing rhymes, and played with multiple genres. Above all, he took full advantage of the possibilities of the Polish lang., esp. its syntax and vocabulary. Mickiewicz's ballads refer to native folklore, though they are more frequently Belarusian or Lithuanian than ethnically Polish. This helped him maintain distance from the described world, full of fantasy and supernatural phenomena but, at the same time, made it possible to oppose rationalist philosophy and express the heart's "living truth." His poetic drama Dziady (Forefather's Eve, two parts, 1823; third part, 1832) has the structure of a mystery play; while it refers to folk commemorative ceremonies, its construction and versification are innovative. The sequence of Sonety krymskie (Crimean Sonnets, 1826) linked precise cl. form with a romantic way of describing exotic landscapes. His Byronic tale in verse Konrad Wallenrod (1828) introduced the political and ethical topic of a secret struggle against the nation's powerful enemies. After the collapse of the November Insurrection of 1830–31, when many Polish intellectuals went into exile in Western Europe (esp. France), Mickiewicz became far more than an eminent poet; he was considered a wieszcz (prophet, bard) and gained moral and political prestige through his metaphysical (messianic) interpretation of Polish hist.

In 1834, Mickiewicz published Pan Tadeusz a long poem recognized as the Polish national epic. From one point of view, it constitutes a Homeric epic on the poet's homeland (a province at the border between Poland, Lithuania, and Belarus) during the time of the Napoleonic wars (1811–12). But one can also find attributes of other genres, e.g., the descriptive poem, bucolic, mock epic, sentimental novel, and gawęda (a kind of tale, often oral, peculiar to Sarmatian culture). The work mixes nostalgia with humor and irony. In subsequent years, Mickiewicz grew absorbed in mystical soul-searching and political activity and virtually stopped writing poetry. His last sequence of poems (the so-called Lausanne lyrics, written in 1839) could have opened a completely new path in Mickiewicz's work. Ascetic, concise, focused on the word rather than syntax or syllabic rhythm, they violated the romantic paradigm.

A number of young poets followed Mickiewicz in the 1820s and 1830s, but they were much more typically romantic: Antoni Malczewski (1793–1826), Józef Bohdan Zaleski (1802–86), Seweryn Goszczyński (1801–76). The truly distinctive talent among them was Juliusz Słowacki (1809–49). Inventive in his poetics, esp. in his breathtakingly innovative rhymes, he experimented with many genres: lyric poems, tales in verse, visionary epics, and poetic dramas. He opposed Mickiewicz (his play Kordian, 1834, was a polemic against Mickiewicz's play Dziady) in his interpretation of Polish hist. and his philosophy of existence. Tragedy intermingled with bitter humor and deep romantic irony in his work. He was masterful in his range of emotional expression. In his dramas, inspired by Shakespeare, he experimented with versification, dramatic construction, and the creation of an inner world—realistic, fantastic, dreamlike, symbolic, and ambivalent (e.g., Balladyna, written 1834, pub. 1839). In his poems, Słowacki employed complex stanzaic forms, ottava rima*, and biblical prose, inter alia. His "poem of digression" Beniowski (1841), resembling the narrative poems of Byron or Pushkin, is a recapitulation of the author's poetic path and a reckoning with himself, his enemies, poetry, and the world. It was a turning point in Słowacki's work, initiating a mystical period in his life and work. Król-Duch (King-Spirit, 1847), a mythopoetic vision of the incarnation of the nation's spirit in the great personalities of hist., was an expression of the poet's new convictions.

Zygmunt Krasiński (1812–59) was considered the third wieszcz, or bard (after Mickiewicz and Słowacki). However, his poetics lack the force of the others' work. In contemp. times, he is appreciated not so much for his poems as for his political dramas, which express a conservative vision of the crisis of Christian civilization, and his fascinating letters.

In his lifetime, Cyprian Norwid (1821–83) was isolated from the mainstream of Polish poetry. Forgotten for several decades, he was rediscovered in the 20th c. and is considered a precursor of mod. Polish poetry. In his poetics, he developed and even violated romantic rules. He was a master of the brief lyric (Vade-mecum, a collection of poems written before 1866, pub. posthumously), but he also wrote long poems, dramas, and stories. He was a magnificent epistolary writer as well. His works are verbally precise; many phrases—pointed and laconic—sound like aphorisms. A poetics of *ellipsis and even of silence plays a crucial role in his work. Subtle irony and ambivalence are his key methods of presenting the world; his use of parable, *allegory, and *symbolism convey an ambiguous vision of reality. Rhythm and rhyme are subordinate to sense in this intellectual poetry. Norwid called into question central tenets of romanticism; he was a humanist or personalist in a mod. sense.

All four great poets lived in exile in Western Europe. The domestic poetry of the time was less interesting. Kornel Ujejski (1823–97) wrote ardent patriotic poems; Teofil Lenartowicz (1822–93) based his lyric style on the folklore of Mazovia (the region where Warsaw is located), while Władysław Syrokomla (1823–62) gave voice to the worldview of the nobility.

C. The Postromantic Period. The epoch following the exhaustion of high romanticism—the collapse of the insurrection of 1863 marked a decisive shift—was programmatically antipoetic; the ideology of positivism dominated intellectuals. Though poetry generally continued under the influence of romanticism, a few poets transcended mere epigonism. Adam Asnyk (1838–97) wrote erotic and intellectual lyrics. Apart from her abundant work in prose, Maria Konopnicka (1842–1910) composed numerous poems inspired by folklore; they described landscapes and often expressed social or metaphysical rebellion.

The last decade of the 19th c. saw new trends in poetry: this period was called Young Poland. Poets were inspired by Fr. symbolism and the philosophy of Arthur Schopenhauer and Friedrich Nietzsche: they rediscovered and reinterpreted high Polish romanticism ("neoromanticism"). This signaled the early beginnings of *modernism. The most influential poet of the time was Kazimierz Przerwa Tetmajer (1865–1940). He expressed the decadent mood of the generation through his erotic lyrics and descriptive poems employing impressionist methods.

VII. The Twentieth Century

A. The Modern Period. The lyric production of Jan Kasprowicz (1860–1926) opened new horizons for poetry. He began with naturalistic poems depicting peasant poverty, while in the 1890s he focused on symbolist, descriptive works. The publication of a sequence of hymns (1898–1901) marked a turning point in his creation: they convey an expressionistic, deeply pessimistic, almost blasphemous representation of the world in Satan's power. He finds reconciliation with God in the sequence's final hymns. In his late works, he invented "tonism," a system of accentual versification based on an equal number of stresses, not of syllables (see ACCENTUAL VERSE). The way to *vers libre was open. Stanisław Wyspiański (1869–1907) was a painter, poet, and author of verse dramas. Wesele (Wedding, 1901) is a symbolic play inspired by romantic drama and Richard Wagner's idea of the theater as a synthesis of the arts. Poetic lang. is subordinated to the hypnotic rhythm of folk music. The play, full of symbols and ambiguity, is a kind of psychoanalysis of Polish national and social traumas. Leopold Staff (1878–1957) began his career as a "decadent," but after reinterpreting Nietzsche and finding inspiration in Stoicism and Franciscan Christianity, he became a poet of mental equilibrium, joie de vivre, and spiritual power. He was inspired by neoclassicism, *Parnassianism, and symbolism, and served as a mentor to young poets in the 1920s. He incorporated *avant-garde poetics into his late work, in the 1950s.

Bolesław Leśmian (1878–1937) was the greatest poet of the first half of the century. A symbolist, he explored the impossibility of adequately describing a world in constant motion. Following the philosophy of Henri Bergson, he conveyed the instability of a reality always in statu nascendi. In his opinion, only poetry could truly articulate élan vital; hence, rhythm (*accentual-syllabic verse) was key to his poetics. He wrote *ballads in stylized folk forms, which he turned to intellectual, existential, and metaphysical purposes. He was distinguished by the extraordinarily inventive verbal coinages he developed to convey the nuances of his philosophy. Leśmian's first poetic volume was published only in 1912; three subsequent volumes were edited in the 1920s and 1930s.

After World War I and the rebirth of an independent Poland in 1918, new tendencies in Polish poetry appeared. Reinterpretations of trad. were confronted by avant-garde movements on the one hand and a quest for inspiration in folk culture on the other. Many programs were proclaimed, and a wide range of groups and periodicals (most of them ephemeral) came into being. The group Skamander, established in 1918, played a central role in the literary life of the period. Jan Lechoń (1899–1956) reinterpreted the romantic trad. Antoni Słonimski (1895–1976) linked *Parnassianism with *expressionism and radical political ideas. Jarosław Iwaszkiewicz (1894–1980) created personal, introspective poetry; he chose *aestheticism as his principal attitude and was inspired by expressionism, neoclassical and other, sometimes exotic, trads., such as Persian; sensitive to the musical aspects of verse, he discovered the possibilities of *dissonance in poetry. Kazimierz Wierzyński (1894–1969) began as a neoclassicist; in his later works, he was inspired by expressionism, romanticism (esp. during World War II), and even the avant-garde (beginning in the 1950s). Julian Tuwim (1894–1953) was the most inventive poet of the group. He played with lang., discovering a new colloquial idiom. He experimented with the sounds and senses of words and sought inspiration in *classicism as well. He also composed popular songs, cabaret songs, and children's poetry. In the 1920s, the poets of Skamander focused on ordinary existence; they expressed joy in daily life and discovered popular culture for poetry (Wierzyński, e.g., dedicated a sequence of poems to sports). In the 1930s, their poetic tone grew increasingly dark. Iwaszkiewicz's poems expressed existential fears; Wierzyński became a harsh judge of mod. civilization; Tuwim grew more and more radical politically.

Skamander marked the more traditional wing in Polish poetry of the time. Other poets were close to their orientation. In her refined poems, Maria Jasnorzewska-Pawlikowska (1891–1945) employed paradoxes, *oxymorons, and ellipses to express the experience of the mod. woman, esp. her eroticism. Władysław Broniewski (1897–1962) wrote impressive political poems (he was a fellow traveler of the Communist Party) making the most of the new system of versification (tonism) and appealing to the romantic trad. Jerzy Liebert (1904–31) was a poet of dramatic religious experience (in Blaise Pascal's spirit); influenced by classicism, he pursued lucidity in his poetics. Konstanty Ildefons Gałczyński (1905–53) linked grotesquery and mockery with emotional lyricism in his work.

The experimental wing in Polish poetry was represented by *futurism and the avant-garde. The futurists were radical in their views on poetics and politics (Communism); in their practice, they came close to *Dada. The most important poets of this movement were Bruno Jasieński (1901–39) and Aleksander Wat (1900–67); in his late poetry, Wat changed his aesthetics, reflecting on the experience of pain. The avant-garde program was announced in the 1920s: its most prominent representatives were Tadeusz Peiper (1891–69) and Julian Przyboś (1901–70). The avant-garde reformed poetics: *syntax or even the *line constituted a poem's rhythm, not equal numbers of syllables or stresses. They proclaimed and practiced economy in lang., leading to their preference for *metaphor and ellipsis as basic figures. The avant-garde affirmed mod. civilization: its poetry exuded dynamism and belief in creative potency. The avant-garde of the 1930s was a different matter. Józef Czechowicz (1903–39) linked his experience of these new tendencies with the trads. of folk poetry; in his poems, the bucolic collides with visions of historical catastrophe.

The most eminent poet of this movement was Czesław Miłosz (1911–2004, winner of the Nobel Prize in Literature, 1980). In his early poems, the poetics of neosymbolism and *surrealism conjoined with romantic or biblical ways of constructing visions and a cl. rigor of form: it expressed a sense of the eminent metaphysical catastrophe of civilization. During World War II, Miłosz altered his poetics. In his search for the "proper form," he appealed to various trads., from the Bible to Far Eastern poetry, from the Middle Ages to the avant-garde. His poetry is polyphonic, often ironic. In spite of its intellectual and metaphysical character, the poetry is focused on the concrete particulars of reality. Among themes of the Miłosz's works are ethics, hist., God, nature, and the purpose of existence. It is difficult to overestimate Miłosz's influence on Polish poetry of the 20th c.

B. Era of War and Totalitarianism. A turning point in Polish hist. and culture came in 1939: World War II, which divided Poland between totalitarian regimes (Nazi and Soviet), led in turn to the Holocaust, mass exterminations, displaced peoples, the destruction of cities (esp. Warsaw), and the installation of a Communist regime following the war. Numerous poets lost their lives during the war, and the wartime and postwar years saw waves of emigration among poets, continuing until the 1980s. Under Nazi occupation, official literary life was virtually nonexistent; important works were produced and published only underground. Under Soviet occupation and later in Communist Poland until Stalin's death, all lit. was subordinated to ideology, in the form of socialist realism. Even after the liberalization of 1956, the harsh state censorship controlled and deformed all poetic production. At the same time, numerous authors played games with their readers, conveying indirect meanings through *allusions and special codes. From the mid-1970s until the collapse of Communism in 1989, alternative underground publishing houses published many major volumes of poetry.

Poets of the generation born in the 1920s, who came to maturity during the war, chose a variety of aesthetics. For many of them, the experience of war, evil, fear, pain, and death played a crucial role. Krzysztof Kamil Baczyński (1921–44) followed Miłosz in his neosymbolic poetry of visions. Tadeusz Gajcy (1922–44) drew upon the poetics of the baroque and the avant-garde (esp. surrealism). Tadeusz Różewicz (b. 1921), as a descendant of the avant-garde, invented new forms of ascetic verse. Julia Hartwig (b. 1921) was inspired by early

Western avant-garde artists such as Walt Whitman and Guillaume Apollinaire. Miron Białoszewski (1922–83) was extremely inventive in his ling. play and imitation of spoken lang.; he crossed the borders between verse and prose in his "ling. poetry." In her intellectual and conceptual poetry, Wisława Szymborska (1923–2012; winner of the Nobel Prize in Literature, 1996) uses irony and exploits ling. ambiguity (in the meanings of words and even in grammar). Zbigniew Herbert (1924–98) linked the inspiration of the avant-garde (esp. in his use of metaphor and ellipsis) with appealing topoi and a stoic philosophy derived from neoclassicism: *irony plays a special role in his poetry. Their poetry articulates a sense of deep cultural crisis as it searches for ways to preserve human values—in ethics, in ordinary life, or in poetry itself.

Some older figures found their original poetic ways during this period. For instance, in her late, ascetic poems, Anna Świrszczyńska (known as Anna Swir, 1909–84) candidly described the specifics of women's lives, esp. during wartime. The current of metaphysical or religious poetry continued in the work of Jan Twardowski (1915–2006), a Catholic priest who wrote Franciscan poems full of humor and paradoxes about the "unfinished" Creation. Karol Wojtyła (Pope John Paul II, 1920–2005) composed mystical and intellectual meditations: the best known of these is his late, long poem Tryptyk rzymski (Roman Triptych, 2003).

Younger poets looked for inspiration in various aesthetics. In his poetry inspired by folk culture, Tadeusz Nowak (1930–91) expressed the moral and metaphysical unrest of the individual endangered by mod. civilization. Krystyna Miłobędzka (b. 1932) in her minimalistic poetry searches for the exact words in the world's description. Stanisław Grochowiak (1934–76) used a surreal aesthetic of ugliness to demonstrate the crisis of traditional codes of beauty. Jarosław Marek Rymkiewicz (b. 1935) propounds a program of mod. neoclassicism: he appeals to trad., esp. to the late, Sarmatian Polish baroque.

For poets of the Generation of '68 (also called the New Wave) the crucial problem is finding an adequate lang. for describing the contemp. world. In their early poetry, these poets appealed to the experience of the avant-garde (esp. "linguistic poetry"): later, they began to seek out inspiration in various trads. In his ascetic poetry, Ryszard Krynicki (b. 1943) follows the Asian trad. of playing with a minimal number of words and with silence to express his ethical and metaphysical meditations. Using enumerations and inventive metaphors, Adam Zagajewski (b. 1945) tries to represent the world in its opulence and abundance. Ewa Lipska (b. 1945) links sophisticated metaphors with irony to reveal the paradoxes of existence. Rafał Wojaczek (1945–71) used an expressionistic aesthetic of shock to overcome mental and moral taboos. Bohdan Zadura (b. 1945) in his recent works invents a poetics of paradox in the daily lang. Stanisław Barańczak (b. 1946) exposes the ambiguities of lang., esp. of propaganda; in his later work, he draws inspiration from Eng. *metaphysical poetry to ask basic questions about life's meaning. Piotr Sommer (b. 1948) follows mod. Eng.-lang. poetry; he describes reality by using words intended to stick as closely as possible to the things themselves. Bronisław Maj (b. 1953) develops Miłosz's poetics of epiphany, representing the world in its moments of beauty and sense.

C. Post-Communist (Late Modern) Period. In 1989, Communism in Poland collapsed, and the situation of lit. consequently changed completely. Censorship disappeared; borders were opened; and a new context was shaped by pop culture, mass media, a free market, and democracy. The 1990s were marked by a poetry in evident flux. Apart from the continued activity of older poets (incl. Miłosz), young poets were expansive in their quest for a new and varied poetics. Andrzej Sosnowski (b. 1959) writes intellectual poems, using complicated metaphors to reveal the glimmerings of equivocal words. Marcin Świetlicki (b. 1961), the icon of his generation, is close to the ideology of counterculture and focuses on the experience of ordinary life: as the leader of a rock band, he revolts against traditional forms of poetry. Eugeniusz Tkaczyszyn-Dycki (b. 1962) uses forms of baroque poetry to express the fears and doubts arising from the mod. world. Krzysztof Koehler (b. 1963) is a representative of the cl. tendency in poetry: inspired by various trads. (esp. the baroque), he focuses on metaphysical problems. Jacek Podsiadło (b. 1964) plays with different poetics, between an aesthetic of paradox and shock and an aesthetic of "classical," refined verse. Miłosz Biedrzycki (b. 1967) is inspired by the poetics of surrealism and the "liberated imagination."

VIII. The Twenty-first Century. The beginning of the century was a time of change. The turning point for traditional poetry was Miłosz's death in 2004. Young poets have chosen a variety of aesthetics. Tomasz Różycki (b. 1970) tries to revive cl. forms that clash with the poetics and consciousness of the contemp. individual and experience of avant-garde. Tadeusz Dąbrowski (b. 1979), describing metaphysics in post-mod. life, plays with paradox. A radical appeal to the avant-garde is visible among the "neolinguistic" poets (incl. Maria Cyranowicz, b. 1974; Jarosław Lipszyc, b. 1975; and Joanna Mueller, b. 1979).

POLITICAL VERSE (Gr. politikos stichos, "the verse of the polis and its citizens"). A Byzantine meter of 15 syllables, accentually based and *iambic. Political verse first appears in the 10th c. CE and is the standard meter for mod. Gr. poetry from at least the 12th c. to the present day. It consists of two cola of eight and seven syllables with a *caesura after the eighth syllable, each *colon having one main accent, on the eighth or sixth syllable in the first and on the fourteenth in the second. Maas gives the *scansion xx/xxx/x/ x/x/x/x as common. The origin of the verse is uncertain; some imperial *dirges of ca. 912 CE are in political verse, and the *hymns of Symeon the New Theologian (fl. 1000 CE) include some 5,000 lines of it. The Byzantine grammarian Eustathios thought it originated in the cl. trochaic tetrameter, Krumbacher in a mixture of the cl. iambic and trochaic tetrameter; but all such hypothesized connections to antiquity seem remote. From the beginning, it is a medium of *oral poetry and popular verse.

POLITICS AND POETRY. In 1968, the poet James Merrill was asked about the relationship between poetry and "political realities." "Oh dear," he answered, "these immensely real concerns do not produce poetry." L'art pour l'art (art for art's sake) was at that moment more a posture than a tenable position, though 20 years earlier many Western poets and critics had operated on the assumption that poetry suffers from contact with political subjects. Skepticism about political subjects derived then largely from a strong postwar anti-Stalinist impulse among Western literary intellectuals, who had been sympathetic to Soviet Marxism until the Nazi-Soviet pact of 1939. Am. and Western Eur. critics perceived the major controversy among Rus. poets as the role of private rather than public subject matter: Vladimir Mayakovsky, in their view, was the state's eager propagandist, while the quintessentially lyrical Anna Akhmatova, attacked by Soviet critics for her suspiciously individualist love lyrics, directed her greatest political poem, Requiem (written 1935–40, pub. 1963), against Stalin's terror (it remained unpublished in the Soviet Union during her lifetime). In fact, Soviet politicians and critics had castigated Mayakovsky and Akhmatova alike early on for excess "lyricism," pointing to the schism that divides Eastern and Western Eur. perceptions of poetic politics. Still, the devel. of an exalted *lyric, antipolitical poetic in the West after World War II was one literary aspect of the cold war. The political record of the high modernist poets was also discouraging to Western intellectuals: from 1945 to 1958, Ezra Pound was incarcerated in a Washington mental hospital because of charges of treason (see MODERNISM).

The hist. of poetry, as Paulin demonstrates, abounds in successful political poems: med. peasant's songs, the Divine Comedy, Andrew Marvell's Horatian *ode, Milton's political *sonnets, Egan O'Rahilly's Gaelic *laments, John Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, William Blake's "London," André Chénier's "Iambes VIII," William Wordsworth's Prelude, W. B. Yeats's "Easter, 1916," Marina Tsvetaeva's "André Chénier," Akhmatova's "Voronezh," Pablo Neruda's "The United Fruit Co.," Zbigniew Herbert's "Elegy of Fortinbras," Seamus Heaney's "Punishment." The lineaments of heroism, the limits of national or tribal solidarity, the power of persuasion, the forceful imposition of authority, and war—these homeric themes have long been central to poetry. Toward the periphery the lesser genres—seduction songs, *epithalamia, nature poems—now seem, though less obviously, still fascinatingly political.

What counts as a political subject—or a political form—is a question of audience. Poems like Bertolt Brecht's "The God of War" seem only vaguely political in peacetime, but in time of war, such a poem would be understood to be insistently partisan. Therefore, we may say, all that can be changed by social consensus or external authority is properly called political. The possibility of change itself, certainly not the state, is, after all, the source of political passion. Political poems concern situations that might be otherwise—and this links them with the "dream of a world in which things would be different" that Theodor Adorno sees at the heart of the lyric particularly.

The boundaries dividing overtly political from "apolitical," and even "antipolitical," poetry are fluid. "So long as the poet, East or West, appears before the public only as a lyrist, banking on the irresponsibilities traditionally associated with that role, he will be tolerated by the governing class and allowed to communicate with his readers," Davie asserts. But the programmatically collectivist states of the former Eastern Bloc considered the "lyric I" ideologically suspect. Even the most seemingly introspective poems may reveal their subversive potential in such contexts.

Wordsworth's "Tintern Abbey" is a case in point. Many recent critics have seen the poem as marking Wordsworth's rejection of a revolutionary politics that engages the world in favor of a subjective, internal transformation that elides it. It thus becomes emblematic of a romantic and postromantic poetry that "typically erases or sets aside its political and historical currencies" in its embrace of the quasi-autonomous individual subject (McGann). The Polish poet Czesław Miłosz experienced Wordsworth's lyric differently. His trans. of the poem, completed shortly after the postwar Soviet takeover, could not be published in the Polish People's Republic. Under the Communist regime, Miłosz warns, the poet who feels "that boundless exaltation in the face of nature that seized Wordsworth on his visit to Tintern Abbey is at once suspect." Such raptures were reserved for state occasions and officially approved topics alone. Conversely, young Eastern Eur. writers of the post-Stalinist cultural "thaw" embraced Mayakovsky's officially sanctioned poetry—imposed under Stalin "like potatoes under Catherine the Great," as Boris Pasternak said—not for its revolutionary sentiments but for its subversively lyrical tendencies.

"In Western Europe," A. Alvarez comments in his introduction to Zbigniew Herbert's Selected Poems (1968), "we take for granted that there is a fundamental split between poetry and politics. The problem is not that the twain can never meet but that they can do so only at a great cost. The complexity, tension and precision of modern poetry simply does not go with the language of politics, with its vague rhetoric and dependence on clichés." From the mid-1960s on, anglophone poets turned increasingly, like Alvarez, to writing in trans. to counteract what they saw as the political and social marginality of mod. poetry in the West. The writers of Latin America and Eastern Europe particularly invited emulation through their socially engaged verse. "Poets such as Zbigniew Herbert, Różewicz, Holub remind us," Paulin comments, "that in Eastern Europe, the poet has a responsibility both to art and to society, and that this responsibility is single and indivisible": 'In this authoritarian or totalitarian reality there is no private life, no domestic sanctuary, to retire into. Here, any and every action has a political significance which cannot be evaded' " (1986). The "impact of translation" (Heaney) has been profound in recent decades. But it has often led anglophone poets to underestimate, as Paulin does, the shifting relationship between public and private in trads. whose political and cultural complexities are veiled, if not lost, in trans.

Critics of the 1970s and 1980s demonstrated repeatedly how subjects formerly thought not to be political are, in fact, importantly so, partly because the range of imaginable social change has expanded. The literary representation of women is an obvious example. The description of landscape is a less obvious one: Williams showed that the landscapes of Eng. poetry are political figurations of the prerogatives of wealth and class (see LANDSCAPE POEM). Other critics focused on all that is taken for granted in poetry, for that is where political issues are treated as already somehow settled. Empson argues that figurative lang. can shut off inquiry by suggesting that some political or historical event is natural, no more in question than an ocean or mountain. Neo-Marxist interpreters set themselves the task of counteracting the alleged effort of poets to render politics invisible: "Even apolitical poetry is political," as Wisława Szymborska notes mockingly in "Children of Our Age." One weakness of this approach is the presupposition that, once political intent has been unveiled, a critic's job is done, as though the revelation that poetry is politically motivated were itself a critical achievement. Another is the dismissal of poetic *form as inherently apolitical. Poetry's "very formality is social," Pinsky comments. The ostensibly ahistorical bent of Anglo-Am. *New Criticism and *Russian formalism has been much overstated: both movements imbedded their readings in a shifting range of political and cultural contexts. As Wolfson has argued, close attention to form, by writers and critics alike, may, in fact, reveal the complexity of the lyric's social and political concerns.

Mythological figures are more obviously political than natural ones, since they bear both a weight of hermeneutical trad. and explicit cultural authority. When Dryden characterized Charles II as King David, the Duke of Monmouth as Absalom, and the first Earl of Shaftesbury as Achitophel, the political significance of the poem was set forth explicitly. Invocations of myth, hist., or scripture to structure contemp. political events are different from other sorts of figures, however, in that the criterion of aptness is counterbalanced by one of audacity. The choice of a framing myth, esp. in satire, is usually outrageous: Charles II as David? Lenin as Christ, in Hugh MacDiarmid's "First Hymn to Lenin"? Dwight Eisenhower as Satan, in Robert Duncan's "The Fire"? But that is where the controversial aspect of these poems is sharpest; what David, Absalom, and Achitophel are made to say is much less tendentious. The pleasure and success of such poems depend on the framing myth seeming audaciously afield yet, finally, acute. The mythological bent of poets such as C. P. Cavafy and Herbert has exerted particular influence on contemp. writers: Herbert's Procrustes, with his murderous bed, clearly evokes the mod. world's most infamous experiments in the engineering of bodies and souls alike.

The supposed strain between politics and poetry is actually more a strain between politics and the evaluative criteria of crit. Mod. crit. has only limited access to a didactic view of poetry (see DIDACTIC POETRY). Didactic poems are esteemed according to a universality or generality criterion, whereby a poem succeeds insofar as it speaks to the conditions of life in different historical contexts. By this measure, either *satire derives from an overall moral norm, or it counts as a minor genre because it names names and deeply loves its historic moment. Samuel Johnson's "Preface to Shakespeare" blocks the access of mod. critics to a contemporaneity criterion that can treasure the minute particulars of a local social milieu. Dryden, Alexander Pope, the Pound of Cantos 14 and 15, and among contemporaries, Turner Cassity, express a kind of curiosity and, beyond the satire, a fondness for very specific details of their time. Crit. needs a way of appreciating this poetry, not because the details are heterogeneous but because they are thorny and abundant evidence of a citizen's passionate engagement less in a party than in a particular moment.

McKeon argues that ideological comprehensiveness is the apt criterion for political poetry: political poets succeed by comprehending a wide range of the demands and conflicts of their time, not by rising above their historical moment. This view addresses the apprehensions of New Critics, such as Cleanth Brooks, in the face of partisan leftist poetry of the 1930s: leftist poems employed, in Burke's terms, a rhet. of exclusion. Those circumstances or considerations that did not fit a leftist ideological perspective were ignored, not incorporated into the poem as a sign of faith with the historical moment. The result, Brooks argues, was a sentimental appeal to a reader's political beliefs.

Pindar's songs in praise of Gr. tyrants provide the most obvious archaic example of Western political poetry (the political significance of the Iliad is more abstract). Although Robert Lowell wrote praise poems for Senators Eugene McCarthy and Robert Kennedy during the 1968 Am. presidential campaign and Gary Snyder wrote sympathetically about California Governor Jerry Brown in the late 1970s, mod. poets have been generally disinclined to employ their art to praise the state in any form. What we now appreciate in Pindar is less his capacity to praise, which Pound dismissed as a big bass drum, than the back of his hand: his clever management of myths to warn the tyrants against the abuses of power. The most admired praise poem in Eng., Marvell's Horatian ode, is esteemed for its mix of praise and blame (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY, PANEGYRIC). Mod. poems of sheer blame, such as Robert Bly's "Asian Peace Offers Rejected without Publication" and Adrienne Rich's "Rape" have been far more widely appreciated. But poems of true praise are much harder for critics to admire. More important, the middle ground between praise and blame has been badly eroded by an oversupply of extremist crit. Edwards argues that the best political poems express mixed feelings: if outrage then also complicity, if contempt then also sympathy. This view draws support from two considerations: (1) an ambitious poem should do more than gild the monolith of an ideology, and (2) political issues are generally more complicated than one or another party suggests. Osip Mandelstam's longest poem, "The Horseshoe Finder: A Pindaric Fragment," exemplifies the complexities of the mod. praise poem. The speaker seeks to follow Pindar in praising the unnamed captain of a mod. ship of state but falters both through his own ambivalence and because his lyric gifts apparently no longer answer the needs of a new revolutionary regime.

However, mod. poets and critics tend to admire, even more than mixed feelings, frankly oppositional poems: hence, the burgeoning in recent decades of anthols. celebrating an international "poetry of witness," through which Anglo-Am. poets are invited to identify with writers whose work emerges under the very real threat of political persecution. Indeed, political poetry, if not poetry in general, is commonly (and too narrowly) understood now to be oppositional by definition. Even a centrist critic like Kermode has argued that "literature which achieves permanence is likely to be 'transgressive'. . . [the art] of the stranger in conflict with the settled order." Most contemp. political poems, however offensive they would be to those who do not read them, are consoling to those who do. Am. poets write about the possibility of civic change, but their poems are—quite rightly—no longer of interest to politicians, statesmen, and political administrators, because few Am. poets begin from a belief in political processes or agents as worthy of sustained scrutiny. They rarely take politics seriously enough in political terms, nor do they present political problems as difficult to solve or as ethically problematic. Am. poets such as Bly, Duncan, and Allen Ginsberg attribute mean motives and low intelligence to their political adversaries, as though virtue or cleverness could make a great difference. When Am. poets now attempt to extend sympathy to politicians, they invoke a psychoanalytic frame, in which no one is really guilty, but the sympathy is clinical and well outside of politics. Critics might credit as oppositional only that political poetry that challenges the political opinions of its audience and condemn those poems that extend the blunt discourse that is routine in political controversy.

Probably well before Milton's prefatory note to Paradise Lost readers sensed an analogy between social and prosodic order. Departure from prosodic norms has been loosely likened to political liberty, and discussions of poetic form have thereby been burdened by political polemics. One of the paradoxes of such thinking is that the modernist poets responsible for breaking the force of metrical convention were not champions of political liberty. F. T. Marinetti, Ezra Pound, and T. S. Eliot were staunchly on the political right, though their efforts in *free verse made it difficult for younger poets to continue writing in *meter. Pound, Eliot, and other modernists felt unconstrained by the pressure of immediate poetic precedent, by the desire of readers to find continuity from one generation to the next, or by the daily secular experiences of their readers. These poets made a radical break with the conventions of late 19th-c. Brit. and Am. verse. They dealt with historical subject matter very selectively and from a bird's-eye view, skipping over that which did not engage them. And together with Yeats, they asserted claims to suprarational revelations. The willfulness that Pound displayed in lit. crit. and admired in the poetry of Dante he also admired in totalitarian politics of the right.

Under the influence of continental theory, academic critics in England and America have begun to locate the oppositional effort of poetry not in ideas or statements so much as in technical expressions of noncompliance with the referential and discursive features of descriptive, narrative, and expository prose—all of which supposedly underwrite the prevailing capitalist economic and social order. For many critics, a poet's breaking of genre conventions is itself an admirable act of political defiance. The Am. Language poets of the 1970s (see LANGUAGE POETRY) argued that the undermining of narrative structure and the disruption of syntactic expectations are the most responsible ways in which poets can contribute to large-scale social change: "language control = thought control = reality control," Charles Bernstein has said. "Poetry, like war," his collaborator Ron Silliman writes, "is the pursuit of politics by other means." These poets see their writing as a poetic and expressly Marxist part of a broad intellectual movement in literary theory and philosophy that includes Jacques Derrida, Roland Barthes, Fredric Jameson, and Richard Rorty. One major objection to this approach to the nexus of politics and poetry is that it appeals only to academics who see it as a demonstration of the practical implications of literary theoretical texts that have achieved currency, as well as one way of reconciling these theories with neo-Marxism.

New Historicist critics have pushed well beyond broad analogical arguments by identifying ways in which political motives determine the writing of poets and other writers within a culture; they discover intentional connections between particular discursive practices and specifiable political positions (see NEW HISTORICISM). Helgerson has shown how the controversy of the 16th and 17th cs. about quantitative verse in Eng. was understood then to be part of a debate about the kind of nation England would become, the kind of civil laws it would establish (see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES). Barrell has argued that conditions of *patronage fostered a particular kind of periodic structure in Ren. Eng. praise poems. In reconstructing the political significance of poetic forms, this devel. in lit. crit. is restoring continuity to a view of poetry that was distinguished until very recently by the work of poet-critics such as Empson, who insisted always that a poet's formal choices expressed political considerations alive at the time of writing.

The Marxist or neo-Marxist thought that shapes much New Historical crit. has led to some surprising historical blind spots, though. Like contemp. postcolonialist critics, the New Historicists largely omit discussion of the former "second world," with its troublesome hist. of Marxist imperialism. They thus overlook a crucial link between current historically inflected crit. of the lyric particularly and early Soviet discussions on the proper place of poetry in the new state. "Our epic is not lyric," Leon Trotsky proclaimed in 1924. Nikolai Bukharin echoed Trotsky's comments a decade later in a collectively authored, programmatic speech on "Poetry, Poetics, and the Problems of Poetry in the U.S.S.R." given at the First All-Soviet Writers' Congress of 1934: he extolled the "synthetic poetry" of the future to which he opposes outmoded the " 'antirealist' " . . . lyric seeking for a 'world beyond.' " Mikhail Bakhtin was very much Bukharin's comrade-at-arms in this, if little else. The poet, he charges in "The Word and Culture" (1934–35), destroys "all traces of social heteroglossia and diversity of language" in its efforts to achieve "a purely poetic, extrahistorical language": hence, the tendency of all poetic speech to become "authoritarian, dogmatic and conservative."

New Historicist critics of romantic poetry particularly have embraced Bakhtin's ideas without recognizing their historical genesis in the political and theoretical battles between formalists and Marxists that led finally to the literary policies articulated by Bukharin and others. In official Soviet culture, with its cult of the collective, the " 'lyric I' became almost 'taboo' " (Eikhenbaum), along with the retrograde ideology it represented. And this, in turn, constituted its distinctive, disruptive power. Under such circumstances, "the attempt to save or defend one's own personality and the right to individuality is the most subversive public act" a poet can commit, the erstwhile Polish poet-dissident Stanisław Barańczak insists. Wordsworth and his descendants, Bromwich argues, likewise oppose "the abstracting tendency of modernization" with the capacity, cultivated through poetry, "to feel as an individual being rather than as a member of an aggregate being."

Critics must maintain a broad range of interpretive and, esp., evaluative principles for analyzing the relations of politics to poetry, so that the political significance of poetry will not be confined to prophecy, invective, or satire. More than this, they must remain alert to the shifting functions and possibilities of poetry, lyric, and otherwise, in multiple trads. as well as modes. Mod. poetry tests the profoundly social issue of "human belonging or not belonging" by continuously tracing and retracing "the boundaries that define inclusion and exclusion" as it crosses "back and forth between an inner self and a world out there," Fletcher has argued. As such, it speaks, at least potentially, "of subjects of interest to all the citizens" (Miłosz 1953).

POLYNESIAN POETRY

I. Poetry In Polynesian Languages
II. Poetry In English

I. Poetry In Polynesian Languages. Polynesia is a vast triangle of thousands of islands, with apexes at Hawai'i to the north, Easter Island to the southeast, and New Zealand to the southwest; Tuvalu and enclaves are farther west in Melanesia and Micronesia. Each of the archipelagoes has majority populations of Polynesian descent, except for New Zealand and Hawai'i, where Maori and Kanaka Maoli remain substantial groups. Before Eur. contact, knowledge was mainly transmitted by oral presentation and by demonstration, which are both of continuing importance. Polynesia elevated oral art to a high level of beauty and subtlety. Poets use numerous homonyms, puns, and repetitions, along with reduplication and *alliteration, as they enjoy frequent reiterations of sound.

Western culture introduced by 19th-c. missionaries, settlers, colonial officials, and voyagers stimulated poetic creativity by adding new concepts and symbols without, however, the traditional art's losing its indigenous identity. Poetry's social function, however, has altered with Westernization. Traditional poetry, integral to personal life from birth to death and to both religion and entertainment, was frequently entwined with ritual, vocalization, and dance to express values, give aesthetic pleasure, transmit knowledge, and affirm the connection of human beings to nature and the supernatural. Poetic strategies across introduced and indigenous langs. include personifying nature with gods and spirits (many regarded as ancestors) and reacting emotionally to changing aspects of landscape with minute observation, vivid description, and extensive naming of places and natural forces.

Since traditional poetry and music are inseparable, each adding power to the other, a poet composed text and melody at the same time. Each category of poetry had its characteristic modes of rhythmic oral delivery, the principal modes being song or recitative, with variations and combinations of each. Hawaiians, e.g., distinguished between an oli and a mele but adapted a poem to either. An oli was a dignified recitative, most often a solo, with limited gestures and occasional percussion accompaniment, for *dirges, prayers, eulogies, and genealogies, each class with its special oli style. The basic style was a rapid, guttural, vibrating monotone on a single pitch that required a strong, deep voice trained to hold the breath through long phrases often ending with a trill. Continuity of sound was essential because breath carried the words filled with mana (supernatural power), and a break or hesitation, except at appropriate places, was believed unlucky in a secular poem and fatal in a sacred. A mele was sung or chanted to the accompaniment of dance (hula), pantomime, and instruments (not always the three together); a subtype was performed either with or without dance for love songs, name songs honoring individuals, or genital chants celebrating generative powers. A mele, customarily performed with a chorus whose leader sang solo parts, had marked, repeated rhythmic patterns if danced and a wider range of *pitch and freedom than the oli. Missionary hymns brought melody, which Polynesians called hīmeni and combined with old styles of delivery for new poems, not necessarily sacred, but not danced. While music changed as Westerners introduced their folk and work songs, texts retained many traditional themes and devices. The same was the case in other archipelagos beside the Hawaiian.

A new poem that met an audience's approval was performed repeatedly and might become a classic passed on for generations. In New Zealand, compositions by Kingi Tahiwi, Te Rauparaha, Paraire Tomoana, Sir Apirana Ngata, Te Ari Pitama, Te Arikinui Te Atairangikaahu, Kingi Tawhiao, Ngoi Pewhairangi, Tuini Ngawai and many others are still sung and performed. Their genius lay in fresh and innovative rearrangement or reinterpretation of recurrent themes, images, phrases, and lines.

Samoan chiefs (but not commoners) could sing a solo (the Samoan term for a recitative epitomizing a myth or legend) of the subcategory fa'ali'i, meaning "royal" and concerning a royal lineage. A politically important trad., e.g., centered on Sanalālā: when his canoe was swept to sea from Tonga to Samoa, his father's land, his Tongan mother, Chieftess Fitimaupaloga, composed a 21-line solo fa'ali'i considered "exceedingly beautiful." A chief was much admired when he sang it with a plaintive *cadence while accompanying himself on a type of drum only certain chiefly families could use (Freeman).

The solo uses common Polynesian poetic devices of inspiration from nature and place; irregular but rhythmic lines; repetition of sounds, words, and syllables; and (peculiarly western Polynesian) deliberate rhyming and termination of sets of lines with a certain sound. Many traditional Maori song poems (waiata) follow a quantitative meter where eight or 12 vowels are contained in each half line of text corresponding to a musical phrase. A whole line corresponds to a musical *strophe.

Sacred creation and genealogical *chants were intoned by senior males and high priests in consecrating a chief's primary wife's firstborn son and on other occasions. Numerous resemblances with other chants elsewhere prove the chants share the same Polynesian heritage. Their fundamental function concerned procreation and the continuity of life through the chief, on whom, as the closest link to the gods, the fertility of nature and people depended. Starting with creation, a chanter connected the infant to his divine and earthly kin and thereby confirmed his rank, privileges, taboos, territory, and power. Because words had power to produce action, an error or hesitation negated a sacred chant.

An example is the Hawaiian Kumulipo (Origin in Deepest Darkness), a 2,102-line masterpiece of the type called ku'auhau, pathway lineage, property of the family of Kalākaua and his sister Lili'uokalani, the last rulers in the 19th c. of the monarchy established by Kamehameha I in 1795. When priests ca. 1700 CE chanted the Kumulipo, each name activated the latent mana of High Chief Keawe's son and heir, named Lono-i-ka-makahiki because he was born during the annual Makahiki festival for Lono, god of peace and prosperity. It may have been recited in 1779 over Captain James Cook as the returned god Lono. It also establishes linkages to pan-Polynesian deities such as Maui.

Eastern Polynesian chiefs and priests, who were educated in sacred houses of learning, excelled in technical skill at composition and erudition. Marquesan and Mangarevan masters served rulers as organizers and directors of ceremonies, determined official versions of sacred chants and hist., and recited the most sacred parts of chants. A Marquesan tribal master of chants, outranked only by the ruler and the inspirational priest, might be deified at death. Nonetheless, if another tribe's master challenged him, he had to compete successfully before an audience, exhibiting his learning, quickness in composition, and ability in other oral arts at the risk of losing his title or even his life. Many Polynesian islands had such contests of wit and learning.

A Samoan chief's talking chief, also a master of ceremony and subject to challenges from a rival, upheld his chief's and village's prestige, esp. on official visits to other villages, by his command of the complex art of oratory, learning, composition, and knowledge of procedure and etiquette due each titled man present. Tonga, by contrast, had a class of professional poets, generally untitled but with status roughly equivalent to a ruler's ceremonial attendants. A poet, though honored, was entirely dependent on his patron chief and usually insecure even as to his life. At one time, contests between poets became so bitter they had to be discontinued. Like other members of ruling families of Polynesia, Queen Salote of Tonga was famed for her compositions.

In New Zealand, Maori women, who as a group predominated as composers, were more likely than men to compose songs about frustrated love or waiata aroha ("Would I were a broken canoe that might be mended") and short, informally arranged, intensely personal *laments (waiata tangi) often for those slain in tribal or anticolonial wars, coupling frank emotion and natural imagery ("Like the tides within Tirau forever rising and falling/Is my wild lamentation within Houhangapa"). Maori men were more likely to compose longer, more formally structured laments, filled with elaborate metaphors to emphasize that the whole tribe had lost a great man ("like a star shining apart in the Milky Way" or "a sheltering rata tree from the north wind"). There are many thematic categories of Maori song poem, or waiata, and oratorical chant, or tauparapara. The haka is a form of assertive or war dance poetry in New Zealand, widely popularized by the national rugby team who perform and chant a haka before international matches. Experts of the form have criticized the team's bowdlerized versions, while there has been a general resurgence in the variety and quality of haka performed by many Maori groups (Karetu, Ngata, Mead).

II. Poetry in English. Many of the contemp. Eng.-lang. poets are resident in New Zealand and Hawai'i, while Eng.-lang. poets of Melanesia (e.g., John Kasaipwalova, Steven Winduo, Jully Makini, Grace Molisa) and Micronesia (Teresia Teaiwa, Emelihter Kihleng, Craig Santos Perez) highlight the porosity of cultural boundaries as they are influential in the region. The following selected poets have books published.

A. Cook Islands. Mine Eyes Dazzle (1950), by the New Zealand-based Cook Islands (Tongareva) poet Alistair Te Ariki Campbell (1925–2009), was the first book of poetry by a Polynesian to be published in Eng.

Campbell's early work referenced New Zealand and Eng. romantic modes, while his work from the 1960s on is infused by his Tongarevan and broader Polynesian heritage, incl. Sanctuary of Spirits, The Dark Lord of Savaiki, Soul Traps, and Maori Battalion. His *lyric poetry, incl. the littoral and the oceanic, fuses a personal desire to belong to a familial collective in dialogue with personae from the historical and mythological past, and always has an elegiac edge. It includes direct trans. of Tongarevan chant and genealogy (see NEW ZEALAND, POETRY OF). Campbell's prolific Cook Islands compatriot Kauraka Kauraka (1951–1997) wrote tateni style poetry in praise of persons in Eng. and Cook Islands Maori.

B. New Zealand (Maori). Former New Zealand poet laureate Hone Tuwhare (1922–2008) was an arts icon and the first Maori poet in Eng. to be published. His No Ordinary Sun (1964) has been reprinted ten times (he published 13 poetry books in all); the title poem was a protest at nuclear testing in the Pacific, reflecting his socialist ideology and environmentalism. His work code shifted between multiple vernacular and chiefly oratorical registers and featured a strong relationship between myth and nature, romance, a panegyric sensibility, and a cultural relationship to the land. Many Maori poets have followed in Tuwhare's wake, incl. multigenre author Apirana Taylor, who combines the qualities of orature with text—namely, repetition, Maori names and words, short lines composed for the breath, and music in live performance. Roma Potiki employs traditional forms such as the oriori or instructional *lullaby, while Trixie Te Arama Menzies directly borrows from famous waiata tangi (laments), such as E pā tō hau. Arapera Blank composed in Maori and Eng., relying on such chiefly symbolism as the kokako (a cousin of the highly prized and extinct huia wattlebird). J. C. Sturm, a poet of Tuwhare's generation like Blank and Menzies, imbues her poetry with karanga (initial call of welcome in greeting ceremonies) and tangi (lament). Keri Hulme's poetry is infused with humor, mythological shapes, natural and spiritual omens, gods, and songs. Robert Sullivan's six books of short poems and extended sequences range from personal to cultural subjects, incl. oceanic exploration in Star Waka. Rangi Faith also incorporates Maori symbolism in his collections. Hinemoana Baker's first collection draws on traditional models such as the waiata tangi, Michael O'Leary is influenced by Pakeha (Eur.) poet James K. Baxter, who borrowed from Maori trads., and Brian Potiki's collection Aotearoa studs his texts with praise for artist-heroes such as Tuwhare.

C. Samoa. Albert Wendt, the influential and prolific Samoan author and poet, anthologized wider Oceanic (Melanesia, Micronesia, Polynesia) lit. in Lali, and Nuanua and Polynesian poetry in Whetu Moana with Reina Whaitiri and Robert Sullivan. His early elegiac sequence "Inside Us the Dead" incorporates high rhetorical flourishes grounded in immediate referents, as well as elements of genealogical recitations (gafa) and formal oratorical codes (fa'alupega), while providing a family and social hist. as he recounts the death of his brother. A verse novel, The Adventures of Vela, is a contemp. myth-saga featuring a contest between poets. The Book of the Black Star merges images with text ranging from relaxed to heightened modes. Tusiata Avia's Wild Dogs under My Skirt underscores her work by referring to the Mau Samoan resistance movement and myths, and uses Samoan words. Her contemporary, Sia Figiel, also richly weaves Western with Samoan concepts of the self. Momoe Malietoa Von Reiche uses her relationship with the land as a refuge and source of nourishment (Marsh). Selina Tusitala Marsh's first book, Fast-talking PI, pays homage to many poets of the region. Tutuila (Am. Samoan) poet Caroline Sinavaiana negotiates Am. colonialism and indigeneity through the lens of the warrior goddess Nafanu and the power of tagi (lament).

D. Tonga. Tongan poet Konai Helu Thaman draws on traditional symbolism in her popular work, such as the association of the sun with monarchs, the contrast of langakali flowers (symbolizing fertility and regeneration) against corrupting Westernization, as well as other botanical references significant within Tongan lang. compositions. She composes in Tongan and translates her compositions into Eng. (Marsh). Karlo Mila's Dream Fish Floating summons her family genealogy to rationalize first-generation Tongan-Samoan-Palagi (Eur.) life in New Zealand and adeptly pays homage to poets of the older generation (tuakana).

E. Hawai'i. Political leader and scholar Haunani-Kay Trask's minimalist *free-verse *strophes are focused on sovereign justice, dignity in the face of cultural denigration, and recovery. She draws on places, figures, and protocols important to the volcanic goddess Pele, who represents overwhelming indigenous power and who features in traditional poetry cycles. Wayne Kamuali'i Westlake (1947–1984), whose poetry included *Dadaist and Confucian ideas, wrote *concrete poems using Hawaiian words to inflect his anger at Am. colonialism, such as pupule (Hawaiian for "crazy"). The scattered letters in pupule also form words for prayer (pule), guns (pu), appetizers (pupu), and a letter-jumble similar to the litter on the sidewalks of Waikiki (the subject of a sequence), forming random words in multiple langs. Mahealani Perez-Wendt references the last monarch, Queen Lili'uokalani, in the title of her collection Uluhaimalama, which was the queen's garden. The hidden meaning of that name refers to growth into the light, both for the plants in the garden and the Hawaiian nation. Imaikalani Kalahele juxtaposes illustrations and poems, using the rhythms of jazz and Hawaiian lang. Joseph Balaz is one of the most accomplished Hawaiian poets, who writes in standard and pidgin Eng. He produced the first spoken-word album, Electric Laulau, in 1998. Sage U'ilani Takehiro's Honua was published with the assistance of indigenous publisher Kuleana 'Ōiwi Press, also the publisher of skilled lyric poet Brandy Nālani McDougall. Takehiro passionately braids natural elements into a literary shelter (or honua).

F. Rotuma and Niue. David Eggleton, of Rotuman descent, is one of the most successful New Zealand performance poets of his generation, preceding the spoken-word poets who most obviously link to techniques of orature. When in contemplative mode, he occasionally explores Maori and colonial history. John Puhiatau Pule, who was born in Niue but spent most of his life in New Zealand, incorporates hist., mythology, nature, and love poetry in his novel The Shark That Ate the Sun in a 30-poem reconstructed sequence by a fictional 19th-c. poet.

G. French Polynesia / Te Ao Mā'ohi. The anthol. Varua Tupu has made an extensive selection of Fr. Polynesian writing available in Eng. Notable poets include cultural leader Henri Hiro, Flora Devatine, Patrick Arai Amaru, and Rai a Mai (Michou Chaze). These poets compose in Tahitian and Fr.

POLYPTOTON (Gr., "word in many cases"; Lat. traductio). Related to the varieties of simple word repetition or iteration, which in cl. rhet. are treated under the genus of *ploce, is another class of figures that repeat a word or words by varying their word class (part of speech) or by giving different forms of the same root or stem. Shakespeare takes great interest in this device; it increases patterning without wearying the ear, and it takes advantage of the differing functions, energies, and positionings that different word classes are permitted in speech. Schaar says that Shakespeare uses polyptoton "almost to excess," "using derivatives of more than a hundred stems" in the sonnets. Some of these are but natural in the amplification of any theme, e.g., love—lov'st—beloved—loving—love's—lovers, though it is obvious in other cases that the figuration is intentional, as in sonnet 43:

> And darkly bright, are bright in dark directed.
> Then thou, whose shadow shadows doth make > bright—
> How would thy shadow's form form happy show
> To the clear day with thy much clearer light.

To Shakespeare's hundred forms in 154 sonnets, compare Philip Sidney's 45 in the 108 of Astrophil and Stella, Edmund Spenser's 27 in the 89 Amoretti, and Pierre de Ronsard's 63 in the 218 of Amours I.

Transferred to prosody, polyptoton at line end becomes, mutatis mutandis, a type of rhyme that also avails itself of grammatical categories, which was known to the rhétoriqueurs as rime grammaticale (see grammatical rhyme; rhétoriqueurs, grands). To us now, this does not seem true rhyme, but standards for acceptability in rhyming have varied from age to age (see identical rhyme).

Very similar to polyptoton is antanaclasis, repetition of a word with a shift in meaning. By using two forms of a word, antanaclasis can play on two senses of it and thereby generate homonymic puns. Shifting the meaning of the word without repeating it, the shift being entailed by a second predicate or modifier, is the function of the elusive *syllepsis. Recognition of all these forms suggests that we should construct a taxonomy of the varieties of word repetition as given (albeit often confusedly) in cl. and Ren. rhet. Four types seem distinguishable: repetition of the same word, in the same grammatical form, with the same meaning (ploce and epizeuxis); same word, same form, different meaning (antanaclasis); same word, different form, same meaning (polyptoton); same word, different form, different meaning (sometimes called antanaclasis, sometimes polyptoton). Here, however, one must define word and form carefully. Also related is *anthimeria—another favorite of Shakespeare's—the turning of one part of speech into another, particularly the making of verbs out of nouns.

Some rhetoricians have used traductio in the sense not of polyptoton but of ploce, or direct word repetition (see Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 9.3.68–73); one should, therefore, be explicit about definitions when using any of these terms.

POLYSEMY. Denotes a plurality of meanings in a given sign, statement, or text, referring at once to multiple contexts for *interpretation. Perhaps the most inclusive category of its kind, polysemy indicates the coincidence of multiple and sometimes contradictory meanings under the same sign, as opposed to *irony, a discrepancy between two meanings or interpretations; *aporia, a logical impasse; or *indeterminacy, an indecision with regard to meaning.

There are two fundamental paradigms by which one can think about the occurrence of polysemy in literary lang.: referential and differential. The referential paradigm assumes that lang. has the basic function of referentiality, i.e., it points to things that exist outside it; accordingly, polysemy would be understood as a trait of certain texts in which signs do not function ordinarily (having one or two referents at most) but bear multiple relational associations, so that such a text becomes, as Perloff calls it, "a reverberating echo chamber of meanings." Nevertheless, these intricate webs of meanings and associations do not occur spontaneously but are aligned along the same axis of figurative associations (see metaphor, metonymy). A sign in a given polysemous text will bear multiple relational meanings, while certain unassociated meanings will remain excluded from consideration. Even though each signifier will have more than two signifieds, polysemy under the referential paradigm will always remain a polysemy of controlled meanings—confined, as it were, to the rule of association (see sign, signified, signifier).

The second, differential paradigm assumes that polysemy is not a property of *texts but a function of lang. itself. According to this paradigm, lang. is not a naming operation but is instead a closed system of interdependent terms in which the value of each term results solely and arbitrarily from the simultaneous presence of all others. The meaning of each given term emerges by virtue of its differentiation from all other meaningful terms in lang. and remains fixed only with respect to the simultaneous concurrence of every meaning that exists outside it. Likewise, the literary text does not have a single fixed meaning or even several meanings, but its meaning is always constituted by virtue of its differentiation from all other texts that exist in lang. Thus, a text is infinitely polysemous, connoting endless other contexts for interpretation. In fact, one can really speak only of a single text, since its limits are the limits of lang. itself. Therefore, the polysemy of a given text does not consist of an enumeration of different meanings or interpretations because those meanings can never be closed off or constructed hierarchically; as Barthes claims, "everything signifies ceaselessly and several times, but without being delegated to a great final ensemble, to an ultimate structure."

For critics working under the differential paradigm, polysemy represents a case of *intertextuality in which an expression, while signifying one thing, always signifies another thing without ceasing to signify the first, whereas, for critics working under the referential paradigm, polysemy is a property of particular texts that explore and bring to light the multiple associative relations that a sign carries, relations that usually remain submerged or repressed in ordinary use of lang. One noteworthy case in which these two paradigms converge is T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land. In terms of the differential paradigm, the poem contains numerous intertextual references to such sources as Dante's Inferno, the Bible, Charles Baudelaire's Fleurs du mal, Richard Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, Shakespeare's The Tempest, Ovid's Metamorphoses, and so on. These textual references are so thoroughly embedded into the fabric of the text that one cannot detach from the poet's own voice, effectively bringing about the "death of the author" as a singular voice to which a specific origin can be assigned. In terms of the referential paradigm, The Waste Land maintains referential unity between signifier and signified. Thus, as Perloff argues, Eliot's "Unreal City" is a real fog-bound London, and one can find numerous references to locales such as the London Bridge, the Cannon Street Hotel, the Metropole, the Strand, and Queen Victoria Street. Yet, at the same time, Eliot's London also bears multiple relational meanings as it echoes Dante's hell and Baudelaire's Paris. Along the same lines, various figures and locales are related along an axis of metaphoric and metonymic associations. Thus, e.g., the Church of St. Magnus Martyr brings to mind the martyrdom of Christ, and its "Ionian white and gold" is an *allusion both to liturgy and cl. Greece, symbolically opposed to the decayed London of brown fog and winter.

POLYSYNDETON (Gr., "much compounded"). The repetition of conjunctions, normally and; the opposite of *asyndeton, which is the omission of conjunctions; common in all kinds of poetry. Quintilian (Institutio oratoria 9.3.51–54) remarks, however, that "the source of [both figures] is the same, as they render what we say more vivacious and energetic, exhibiting an appearance of vehemence, and of passion bursting forth as it were time after time," citing, as an illustration, "Both house, and household gods, and arms, and Amyclaean dog, and quiver formed of Cretan make" (Virgil, Georgics 3.344–45). Longinus discusses both figures, differentiating them. Mod. rhetorical theorists point out that, in addition to a sense of breathlessness, polysyndeton may add emphasis to the items in an enumeration or may represent the "flow and continuity of experience" (Corbett). Conversely, Quinn observes that by slowing down a sentence, polysyndeton may add "dignity" to it or produce an incantatory effect. The latter usage may explain the numerous examples of polysyndeton often cited in the Bible (e.g.,Gen. 1:24–25; Rev. 13:1). Examples may be found in Horace, Odes 15; in Petrarch, Canzoniere 61 (polysyndeton is a major structuring device in Petrarch's poetry); in Shakespeare, sonnet 66; in Walt Whitman; and in T. S. Eliot's "Journey of the Magi" (11–15). Group μ, which classifies polysyndeton among metataxes, i.e., as a figure of repetitive addition affecting syntax, explains the effect in the Eliot passage as "responsible for the harmony of the sentence and the metrical scheme of the verse. This is not by chance, since . . . harmony and metrics are systematic groups of practices and rules, two vast syntactic figures that proceed by addition and repetition." In some cases, then, the polysyndeton may contribute to rhythm. Although polysyndeton in Eng. poetry mainly involves the repetition of and, examples occur in which other conjunctions repeat, as in Eliot's "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (101–2), though these are disputed, since they do not give the same effect; cf. Milton, whose Satan "pursues his way/And swims or sinks, or wades, or creeps, or flies" (Paradise Lost 2.949–50) or Othello 3.3.77–80, where a series of *or*s offer logical alternatives.

PORTUGAL, POETRY OF. Port. poetry originates in the med. (12th–14th cs.) Galician-Port. cantiga*. The cantigas are generally divided into three major genres: cantigas de amigo (songs in the voice of women), cantigas de amor (courtly love songs in the voice of men), and cantigas de escarnho e mal dizer (joke and insult poetry). Galician-Port. poetry circulated orally and through *performance. The cantigas de amigo are unique to Portugal and Iberia and constitute the largest corpus of woman-voiced poetry in Europe, although all extant compositions are attributed to male poets. The cantigas de amor tend to follow the model of *Occitan poetry and in that regard are more conventional. The joke poetry is accomplished in *polysemy, revels in transgressive *imagery and bawdy humor, and presents ludic constructions of sexuality, gender, and cultural and religious orthodoxies. Many of the cantigas, esp. the cantigas de amigo, invoke the sea and ships as motifs in amatory complaint and yearning and thus establish a trad. of maritime poetry in Portugal. Some salient poets are Pero da Ponte (fl. 1235–60), who composed in all three major genres; Johan Zorro (fl. late 13th c.); Martim Codax (fl. mid-13th c.); Pai Gomez Charinho (ca. 1225–95); and Pero Meogo, whose sea-inspired love songs stand as examples of med. poetic virtuosity. The work of over 150 poets represents the Galician-Port. lyric school.

Following the cantigas, the poetic record is silent for a century until 1516 when Garcia de Resende (ca. 1470–1536) published the bilingual (Port.-Castilian) Cancioneiro Geral (General Songbook), a collection of erudite, courtly verse that testifies to the shift from oral to written poetic culture. These poems were intended as palace entertainments. Resende, himself one of the Cancioneiro poets, assembled compositions on aristocratic themes (such as the formalities of love and courtship) that are usually structured as the popular redondilha maior or line of seven syllables. A common format is an initial refrain (mote) that is then glossed (glosa). Petrarchan ideas on love first appear here (e.g., love that delights in suffering and contradiction; see petrarchism), but some poems take on humorous and satirical topics or reveal the social realities of 15th- and 16th-c. Portugal with personages such as the sorceress, the Jew, and the Moor. Resende's stanzas on the tragic death of Inês de Castro, João Rodrigues de Castelo Branco's "Cantiga sua partindo-se" (Song of Parting), and Jorge da Silveira's contemplation on love are notable examples. The verses of the first known woman poet, Filipa de Almada, appear in this Cancioneiro. Other poets include Jorge de Aguiar, Duarte de Brito, Francisco Sá de Miranda, Anrique da Mota (d. after 1544), Francisco de Sousa, and Gil Vicente (ca. 1465–1536), the first major figure of Port. theater who composed his plays in verse and included lyrical passages and interludes in them. Much of his poetry is inspired by traditional forms and subject matter that were reworked to theatrical ends. In this, Vicente's plays are a repository of Port. poetry but one that rewrites and reformulates the trad. through the playwright's acute literary sensibilities. Vicente's command of poetry is apparent across the genres he cultivated, namely, religious plays, comedy, and farce. Later in the 16th c., Joana da Gama (d. 1586) employed the popular verse forms characteristic of Resende's collection to express an anguished vision of life in Ditos da freyra (Sayings of the Nun).

After a sojourn in Italy, Sá de Miranda (1481–1558) brought It. Ren. genres to Portugal, incl. the Petrarchan *sonnet that would dominate Port. poetry from then on. He would, however, continue to cultivate the old style of poetry even after the introduction of Italianate forms. His Trovas à maneira antiga (Stanzas in the Old Style), e.g., are largely composed in the traditional redondilha and explore their topics in learned and erudite lang. and *conceits. Alongside his friend Bernardim Ribeiro (1490?–1536?), Sá de Miranda is credited as the first to compose *eclogues in Port. following Virgil's example. Sá de Miranda's moralistic poetry is technically proficient and often conceptually difficult, and its Port.-Castilian bilingualism bears evidence, as does other poetry of the time, of the interconnected literary cultures of Portugal and Spain. Ribeiro is the author of five eclogues, and some of his poetry first appears in Resende's Cancioneiro. Ribeiro develops a sentimental vein in his work turning on love and its psychological contours that is also reflected in Cristóvão Falcão's Écloga Crisfal (Crisfal Eclogue, first pub. anonymously then reprinted together with Ribeiro's works in 1554). Ribeiro's sentimental pastoral fiction História de Menina e Moça (Story of a Young Girl, 1554, 1557), which is interspersed with verse, elaborates a psychology of love, nostalgic yearning (saudade), and a fatalistic sense of life. Saudade is a cornerstone of Port. literary and cultural identity, beginning with the med. cantigas, and is the basis of the 19th- and early 20th-c. poetic movement known as saudosismo*. Menina e Moça includes literary motifs on the dimensions and characteristics of amorous sentiment and consciousness that will be further elaborated and explored in the widely influential verses of Luís de Camões.

The poetry of António Ferreira (1528–69) and Luís de Camões (1524?–80) stands out as representative of lyric verse in Ren. Portugal, with Camões as the culminating figure now at the heart of the Port. literary canon. Ferreira, an admirer of Sá de Miranda, wrote poems based on It., Lat., and Gr. models and eschewed the Port.-Castilian bilingual practice in favor of Port. alone. His poems were published under the title Poemas Lusitanos (Lusitanian Poems, 1598) and rehearse topics important to humanism. (Neo-Lat. humanist poets, such as André de Resende [1500?–73], revived Lat. as a poetic lang.; see LATIN POETRY.) Camões's poetry earned him international renown. He wrote in the Ren. genres of the sonnet, eclogue, *song, *ode, *elegy, and *epic. The lyrics were published posthumously under the generic title of Rimas (Rhymes, 1595, 1598); they often express their topics through the prevailing lens of Petrarchism. But they also characteristically inflect intense, personal experience with a melancholic tone and perspective and address such universal themes as love, hope, happiness, and death. Maritime expansion and travel, the historical backdrop of 16th-c. Portugal, exercise an influence on the metaphors and the real and imagined experiences of the Camonian poetic subject. As a virtuoso sonneteer, Camões shapes a philosophy of existence informed by the contradictory nature of love, melancholy, sadness, and the "desconcerto do mundo" (disorder of the world) or the dissonance between the world as it should be and as it actually is. He charts the workings of *affect in all its contradictions. His epic Os Lusíadas (The Lusiads, 1572), modeled in large part on Virgil and Ludovico Ariosto, takes as its story the 1497–99 voyage of Vasco da Gama to India. While The Lusiads is, on one level, an expression of Christian imperialist ideology, it is also fraught with contradiction and failure and expressed in a rhet. that frequently enters the realm of the lyrical. The poem is an exploration of the Port. Ren. imagination and joins hist., myth, and literary culture into a vibrant cohesiveness. Camões is one of the Ren.'s most influential mythographers and psychologists of love. The Lusiads quickly achieved international currency and, along with the Rimas, establishes connections to other poets of early modernity writing in the contexts of (maritime) exploration, literary creation, and subjectivity.

Camões's epic initiative was continued and imitated in the 16th and 17th cs. by poems based on other imperial figures or events in Africa, Asia, and Brazil. Jerónimo Corte-Real (1533–88) wrote the Naufrágio e lastimoso sucesso da perdiçam de Sepúlveda (Shipwreck and Sorrowful Loss of Sepúlveda, 1594), based on the famous shipwreck off the coast of East Africa in 1552. Bento Teixeira's Prosopopéia (1601) tells of Jorge de Albuquerque Coelho's shipwreck off Recife, Brazil, in 1565. Other epic poems in this trad. are Francisco de Andrada, O primeiro cerco de Diu (The First Siege of Diu, 1589), Vasco Mouzinho de Quevedo Castel-Branco, Affonso africano (Afonso the African, 1611), Francisco de Sá de Meneses, Malaca conquistada (Malacca Conquered, 1634), and João Franco Barreto, Eneida portuguesa (Portuguese Aeneid, 1664), a Port. trans. of the Aeneid that often incorporates verses taken directly from The Lusiads.

Francisco Rodrigues Lobo (1574?–1621), probably best known for his dialogues on court life (Corte na Aldeia, 1619), is an important voice in late Ren. *bucolic poetry on the eve of the baroque. In 1596, Rodrigues Lobo imported the genre of the romance into Portugal from Spain with his Romanceiro. The Éclogas (1605) are polished examples of bucolic verse in which the motifs of desengano (disillusion) and melancholy are present; the poems also display Sá de Miranda's moralizing influence. Camões and Spain's Luis de Góngora will remain the two major poetic influences throughout the century. Góngora's conceptismo* and cultismo are evident in Sóror Violante do Céu (1601–93), a Dominican nun whose religious and accomplished Rimas Várias (Diverse Rhymes, 1646) establishes *devotional poetry as a terrain for women poets. Another nun, Sóror Maria do Céu (1658–1753), also composed religious poetry. The multilingual Bernarda Ferreira de Lacerda (d. 1645?) wrote verse on epic (España libertada) and bucolic (Soledades de Buçaco) themes.

Francisco Manuel de Melo (1608–66), while known more for his prose works, typifies in his poetry the aristocratic and learned peninsular culture in the final years of the Sp. annexation of the Port. crown (1580–1640).

His Obras Métricas (Metrical Works, 1665) encompass all poetic genres cultivated at the time. They are arranged according to the nine Muses. Satirical poetry flourishes at the end of the century and is to some extent a reaction against Gongorism. This satirical poetry is collected in anthols. of the early 18th c., such as Fénix Renascida (Phoenix Reborn, 1715–28), and includes Tomás de Noronha (d. 1651), the Coimbra-educated Brazilian Gregório de Matos (1636–96), and Tomás Pinto Brandão (1664–1743).

The 18th c. witnessed a continuation of baroque practices in its first decades and a neoclassical period (see CLASSICISM, NEOCLASSICAL POETICS) beginning roughly in mid-century with the renovation of Port. culture and society under the enlightened despotism or rationalism of the Marquis of Pombal. The distinction between these two periods is approximate, since, despite rationalist arguments against the excesses of the baroque and Gongorism, some aspects of the baroque (such as the reliance on cl. mythology) continued throughout the century. Academic neoclassicism was initiated with the creation of the Arcádia Lusitana or Olissiponense (Lusitanian or Lisbon Arcadia) in 1756 and reaffirmed in 1790 with the Nova Arcádia (New Arcadia). Neoclassical Port. intellectuals (e.g., Luís António Verney [1713–92] and Cândido Lusitano [1719–73]) debated the didactic and learned status of poetry and its social functions and developed dogmatic precepts of lang., grammar, and phonetics guided by the motto "inutilia truncat" (eliminate that which is useless). Unrhymed (*blank) verse was widely adopted as appropriate for the imitation of Greco-Roman poets and their numerous genres and subgenres. Arcadian poets, inspired by Fr. authors, adopted literary pseuds. under which they wrote and published, a gesture meant to erase social distinctions and promote a literary form of aristocracy. The realities of daily bourgeois life were a favorite theme. The best-known lyrics on love and the domestic life were the collection titled Marília de Dirceu (1792, 1799) by Tomás António Gonzaga (1744–1810). Born in Portugal but sent to Minas Gerais in Brazil and eventually exiled to Mozambique, Gonzaga composed this poetry to his lover Marília under the Arcadian pseud. Dirceu. Like some of the poetry of António Diniz da Cruz e Silva (1731–99), he brought Brazilian nature and landscapes into Port. poetry, and Marília de Dirceu was one of the most popular books in Portugal and Brazil at the time. Other lyric poets include Pedro António Correia Garção (1724–72), Domingos dos Reis Quita (1728–70), and Cruz e Silva, who also wrote a comic epic O Hissope [The Hyssop]). Nicolau Tolentino de Almeida (1740–1811) was a major figure of the century whose satires target the sordid and vice-laden aspects of Port. society and class structure, while also treating general themes such as war. Social types and manners also frequently appear in his poetry. Tolentino characteristically employs a prosaic idiom in his poems. Manuel Maria Barbosa du Bocage (1765–1805, Elmano Sadino of the Nova Arcádia), like Tolentino, wrote of bohemian life and composed sonnets of considerable accomplishment, many of them engaging motifs that became mainstays of *romanticism such as the obsession with death and the tenebrous. António Lobo de Carvalho (ca. 1730–87) was a satirist noted for his scabrous and obscene poems in the spirit of med. joke poetry. Bocage's contemporary, José Agostinho de Macedo (1761–1831), was a lyric poet but is better known for his pamphleteering and virulent crit. of Camões who, in Macedo's opinion, grossly contravened verisimilitude in The Lusiads. Macedo countered The Lusiads with his poem O Oriente (The Orient) and wrote a heroic-comic poem titled Os Burros (The Asses). Leonor de Almeida (1750–1839), later the Marquesa de Alorna, also heralds romanticism; her lyrics oscillate between religious devotion and an acute sense of melancholy and, like the work of Reis Quita, present a poetic voice that often turns on saudade. Two friends of the marquesa participate in moving Port. poetry toward the early romantic sensibility: Catarina de Lencastre (1749–1824) expresses a conflict between reason and sentiment, and Francisca de Paula Possolo (1783–1838), the Arcadian "Francília," rejects reason and acknowledges the irrational powers of the imagination.

Romanticism is rooted in the poetry of the later Arcadians but became solidified as a movement with the sociopolitical changes of the liberal revolution of 1832–34 and the new, secular society formed after the abolition of the religious orders in Portugal. Almeida Garrett (born João Baptista da Silva Leitão, 1799–1854) is credited with introducing romanticism in Portugal after a stay in England and exposure to the works of Walter Scott and Lord Byron with the narrative poem Camões (1825). A novelist and playwright, Garrett fueled the Port. romantic desire for a national theater. Garrett's contemporary Alexandre Herculano (1810–77), mostly a prose writer, inaugurates religious-themed romantic poetry. Herculano, who believed that social and political revolution should find literary expression, expounds a theory of romantic lit. as anti-Arcadian, popular, and of the masses but in alignment with current philosophical currents and in which a return to med. roots would displace classicism and absolutism. Garrett, an admirer of the Arcadian Filinto Elísio, first composed neoclassically inspired poetry but moved definitively into the romantic mode with Adosinda (1828) and the publication of his Romanceiro (1851), a collection of romances or popular poetry with med. themes inspired by Madame de Staël and the Ger. interest in folkloric lit. Garrett's best-known book of poetry is Folhas Caídas (Fallen Leaves, 1853), which directly expresses states of passion; his belief that lit. should manifest a national character, based on folklore and trad. as the most authentic expressions of lusitanidade (Lusitanianness), is adopted by late 19th-c. writers and is known as neogarrettismo (neo-Garrettism). António Feliciano de Castilho (1800–75) adheres to a conservative, neoclassical mindset in terms of ling. discipline, though his poetry is regarded as romantic. Poets whose work appeared around 1838 are called the ultraromantics (notionally the representatives of the final phase of romanticism, though ultraromantic themes and lang. are present earlier, such as in the poetry of Castilho) and include Maria Browne (1797–1861), António Augusto Soares de Passos (1826–60), and Tomás Ribeiro (1831–1910).

In 1865, a group of students at the University of Coimbra rebelled against romanticism and called for social, political, and scientific reforms that, in the domain of lit., led to *realism. This ideological polemic came to be known as the Questão Coimbrã and its adherents as the Generation of 1870, headed by the poet Antero de Quental (1842–91). Antero's poetry culminated in a collection of masterful Sonetos (1886), which are, at turns, pessimistic, religious, and philosophical, and borrow concepts from thinkers such as G.W.F. Hegel. Guerra Junqueiro (1850–1923) wrote political poetry and at the time was considered a major exponent of contemporary reality. Toward the end of the century, Port. *Parnassianism was briefly practiced by poets such as Gonçalves Crespo (1846–83) and António Feijó (1859–1917). Realist poetry is most accomplished in the work of Cesário Verde (1855–86), whose posthumously published O Livro de Cesário Verde (The Book of Cesário Verde, 1901) depicts the concrete realities of Lisbon and the oppressive life of the working class. As one of the most remarkable poets of city life and its sensorial aspects, Verde rejected romantic rhet. with a vividness of description that includes market stalls, the sounds and rhythms of daily living, the squalor of the streets, and yellow fever.

Apart from Verde, Port. *symbolism, with its emphasis on the impalpable, autumnal, nostalgic, and distance from the real, characterizes fin de siècle poetry. Eugénio de Castro's (1869–1944) Oaristos (1890) formally initiated Port. symbolism, which lasted until 1915. Though not published until 1920, Camilo Pessanha's (1867–1926) Clepsidra (Water Clock) constitutes an important moment in symbolist poetry. Other poets of the time are António Nobre (1867–1900) and Teixeira de Pascoaes (1877–1952). Pascoaes is the main proponent of saudade or nostalgia as the basis of the pantheistic, messianic philosophy and literary movement known as saudosismo. Saudosismo promoted a certain neoromantic lexicon and sensibility that appear in the early work of some modernist poets.

At the end of the first decade of the 20th c., a group of artists and writers who came together in Lisbon, would usher in *modernism, a movement that broke with the past with iconoclastic force, often incorporating ideas on lit. and art brought to Portugal from Paris and expressed through a variety of print and other artistic media. It included movements such as paulismo, interseccionismo, sensacionismo, and futurismo. The first group of modernists include Fernando Pessoa (1888–1935), Mário de Sá-Carneiro (1890–1915), and José Sobral de Almada-Negreiros (1893–1970), the latter known more for his paintings and designs but whose Manifesto Anti-Dantas stands out as a main text of the new movement. This group published several literary magazines; its first publication, Orpheu (1915), provided the name to this first wave of the new, revolutionary aesthetic. A divided, fragmented self, frequently the result of the irreconcilability of thought and emotion, achieves lasting expression in the poetry of Pessoa, by far Port. modernism's preeminent representative and perhaps the greatest mod. poet in any language. The nature of the (lyric) self in its many textual and philosophical aspects is also evident in Sá-Carneiro (Dispersão [Dispersion, 1914], and Indícios de ouro [Traces of Gold, 1937]). Pessoa created literary personae or *heteronyms—discrete personalities with distinctive styles and poetic attitudes often antithetical to one another. The heteronyms testify to the fluctuation between plurality and unity consistently found as a sort of existential statement in Pessoa's work. Pessoa's three main heteronyms are the pantheistic Alberto Caeiro, the neoclassical Ricardo Reis, and the modernist/futurist Álvaro de Campos. Pessoa also signed poetry under his own name, work that uses the meters and phrasings of traditional verse. Other poets of the first wave of modernism include Ronald de Carvalho (1893–1935), Ângelo de Lima (1872–1921), Luís de Montalvor (1891–1947), Alfredo Pedro Guisado (1891–1975), and Mário Saa (1893–1971). Port. modernism's second moment centers on the magazine Presença (1927–40) whose collaborators include Branquinho da Fonseca (1905–74), Adolfo Casais Monteiro (1908–72), José Régio (1901–69), João Gaspar Simões (1903–87), and Miguel Torga (1907–95). While not as subversive as the Orpheu group, presença capped the modernist movement as a whole. It validated the Orpheu poets while also seeking to promote pure aesthetic values and extract artistic creation from political concerns as much as possible. It includes a significant amount of prose writing and lit. crit., and the members of the presença group (or presencistas) experienced moments of ideological dissidence among themselves.

The experimentation with subjectivity, poetic *sincerity, and plurality of being typical of the first moment of modernism and the heteronyms extend to the realm of gender and sexual orientation. One of the Orpheu poets, Armando Côrtes-Rodrigues (1891–1971), composed a series of poems under the female identity of Violante de Cysneiros. Poems or parts of poems in Pessoa's work express homoerotic desire, feminized passivity, or masochistic tendencies. António Botto (1897–1959) and Judith Teixeira (1873–1959) were gay and lesbian poets whose work appeared during the first moment of modernism. Pessoa was a friend and literary collaborator of Botto and translated his Canções (1920 and subsequent eds.) into Eng. as Songs. Unlike Botto's candid homoeroticism, Teixeira's poetry tends toward the ambiguous and the symbolic and often employs a decadent idiom (see DECADENCE). Other important women poets emerged in the 20th c., such as Irene Lisboa (1892–1958), who published under the male pseud. João Falco, and Florbela Espanca (1895–1930). Espanca's sonnets, with their emphasis on female eroticism and an awareness of a patriarchal literary trad., are precursors to the fully developed feminist consciousness later in the century.

Following the publication of Presença, a series of Cadernos de Poesia (Poetry Notebooks) were published beginning in the 1940s, a period in which the socially and politically committed agendas of neorealism had already appeared in the 1930s and lasted to the 1950s. Mostly a prose fiction movement, neorealism included the poets Manuel da Fonseca (1911–93) and Fernando Namora (1919–89). After World War II, Port. surrealist poetry emerged, characterized by the automatic workings of the subconscious, black humor, and verbal associations (see SURREALISM). António Pedro (1909–66) ranks as a major surrealist artist and poet and was a founding member of the first surrealist group in Portugal. Pedro was also a prose writer and cultivated a multimedia oeuvre, incl. ceramics, and exalted the plastic arts. Mário Cesariny de Vasconcelos (1923–2006) became Port. surrealism's best-known figure with poetry that is sarcastic, explosive, and often erotic. It employs the technique of the surrealist inventory, as does the poetry of another of the surrealist writers, Alexandre O'Neill (1924–86).

Jorge de Sena (1919–78), who pursued a career as a professor in the U.S., claims a place among mid-20th c. poets. Eugénio de Andrade (1923–2005) wrote verses of a lyrical musicality that exist outside of movements and schools. Andrade is associated with the Generation of 1927 in Spain, since he admired and translated Federico García Lorca as a young man. Sophia de Mello Breyner (Andresen, 1919–2004) is an important voice of the 20th c.; her prolific work roots itself in limpid lang. and metaphors that extol the Port. maritime landscape and human habitation in it, expressed in a refined poetic diction. Later 20th-c. experimental and concretist poets, who bring visual aspects to poetry and reimagine the poetic or textual sign (see CONCRETE POETRY, VISUAL POETRY), include Ana Hatherly (b. 1929), Herberto Hélder (b. 1930), E. M. de Melo e Castro (b. 1932), and Gastão Cruz (b. 1941).

Port. lit. in general was brought definitively in line with feminist concerns with Novas Cartas Portuguesas (New Portuguese Letters, 1972) by Maria Isabel Barreno (b. 1939), Maria Teresa Horta (b. 1937), and Maria Velho da Costa (b. 1938). This book intersperses prose with poetry and further solidifies a female literary subjectivity announced earlier with poets like the Marquesa de Alorna and Espanca. The work of Natália Correia (1923–93) participates in the movement represented by the Cartas. (Correia also edited an important anthol. of satiric and erotic poetry in Port.) Other contemp. women poets of note are Luísa Neto Jorge (1939–89), Ana Luísa Amaral (b. 1956), and Adília Lopes (b. 1960).

POSTCOLONIAL POETICS. Postcolonial literary studies is often seen as having been launched by the publication of Edward Said's critique of Western constructions of the East in Orientalism (1978) and as having been academically institutionalized by the publication of The Empire Writes Back (1989) by Ashcroft, Griffiths, and Tiffin. As a field, it has emphasized many of the so-called third-world writers explored by Commonwealth studies before it, but postcolonial studies supplanted that earlier field with a style of critical work more theoretically inflected and politically urgent.

Widely debated, the term postcolonial (often hyphenated) has several different meanings. "Occurring or existing after the end of colonial rule; of or relating to a former colony" is the OED's definition. In this sense, postcolonial poetry is postindependence poetry—written, i.e., by peoples liberated after the ending of Eur. colonial rule and the establishment of sovereignty over their lands. Accordingly, the term has been applied primarily to parts of Asia, Africa, Oceania, the Caribbean, and elsewhere in the third world after decolonization, particularly from the time of Indian and Pakistani independence in 1947 through the 1970s, when the Brit., Fr., Dutch, Port., Ger., Sp., and other mod. Eur. colonial powers relinquished control over most of the earth's surface. The assumption of a sharp dividing line often does not coincide, however, with lit. hist., since works written by many poets publishing before independence do not diverge essentially from those published afterward—e.g., Derek Walcott's poetry published before and after his natal island of Saint Lucia's formal independence from the United Kingdom in 1979.

A broader use of the term postcolonial has involved its application to postcolonization lit. In this sense, all poetry produced after Sp., Brit., Fr., and Dutch colonization of the Caribbean, e.g., is "postcolonial." But this usage raises still other problems, such as whether highly imitative or derivative "colonial" poetry is postcolonial in the same way that later poems often more resistant to aesthetic and political domination are postcolonial.

Hence, postcolonial is sometimes used in a third sense, closer to anticolonial: poems that exemplify or enact the struggle against Eur. colonial rule. This usage raises further questions, since many poems produced both before and after independence exhibit varying degrees of anticolonialism and anti-anticolonialism and cannot be flattened into a teleological political program. In sum, no one of these three senses of postcolonial seems entirely satisfactory, so perhaps they can be combined to mean something like the following: poetry written by non-Eur. peoples in the shadow of colonialism, both after independence and in the period leading up to it, particularly works that engage, however obliquely, issues of living in the interstices between Western colonial and non-Eur. cultures.

Another issue in postcolonial studies is whether the term should be extended from the third world to white settler colonies, or dominions, such as Australia and Canada. The commonalities are often acknowledged. But some critics would not wish the distinctions lost between white settler colonies, where majority populations of Eur. descent extended and adapted Western cultural resources to local circumstances and colonized indigenous populations, and other colonies, where the majority populations were not of Eur. descent and the discrepancies between local cultural resources and those of the colonizer were vast.

In conceptualizing postcolonial poetics, two primary paradigms stand out. The first is decolonization. The poets affiliated with Fr.-lang. *Negritude in the 1930s and after, such as Aimé Césaire of Martinique and Léopold Sédar Senghor of Senegal, exemplify the quest to reclaim a precolonial blackness: an Af. and Af. diaspora sensibility and culture that Eur. colonialism suppressed and degraded. Physical and cultural attributes once seen as negative—blackness, rhythm, instinct—are transvalued. Senghor urges, in his poem "Nuit de Sine" (Night of Sine), "listen to the beating of our dark blood, listen / To the beating of the dark pulse of Africa in the mist of lost villages." Césaire, who coined the Fr. term négritude, titled his magnum opus Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Notebook of a Return to the Native Land, 1939), a title suggestive of poetry's role in returning to and reclaiming native land from colonization. Similarly, lusophone poet José Craveirinha of Mozambique celebrates attributes once disparaged: "My beautiful short kinky hair / and my black eyes / great moons of wonderment on the most beautiful night" ("Manifesto").

Such nativist and nationalist reclamation is a strong impetus as well in much anglophone poetry. To the extent that Ireland, though Eur., resembles non-Eur. nations undergoing decolonization (Ireland having once been conceived as England's racial and religious "other"), a poet such as W. B. Yeats may be considered postcolonial in seeking to construct a national imagination based in pre-Christian and precolonial myths and to reclaim Ireland for the Ir. by renaming and remythologizing it. Later examples of postcolonial poets for whom poetry has been a tool of decolonization include the Ugandan Okot p'Bitek, one of East Africa's most celebrated poets, who brought into literary verse indigenous Acoli *songs, *proverbs, and *metaphors; and the Jamaican Louise Bennett, popular disseminator of her Creole poems on the stage, radio, television, and Jamaica's national newspaper, who helped free West Indians from a Eur.-imposed sense of inferiority about oral customs, lang., and folklore. Following Bennett and Césaire, an influential poet from Barbados, Kamau Brathwaite, emphasized the importance of returning Af. diasporic cultures to their oral roots and throwing off the "tyranny of the pentameter," the *sonnet, and other Eur. literary forms ("History of the Voice"). Just as culture played a significant role in colonization, so too, for many postcolonial poets, the retrieval of native cultural resources and the indigenization of poetic forms were seen as essential to decolonization.

The nativist and nationalist models of postcolonialism have proved to be limited, however, in various ways. An obvious danger is the reduction of poetry to platform politics, despite the differences between much poetry and more expository forms. Another risk is underestimating the extent to which even nativist poetry is implicated in what it resists: as Frantz Fanon observed in Les damnés de la terre (The Wretched of the Earth), Negritude and other nativisms replicate in reverse the Eur. values against which they are pitted. Finally, even the most nativist poets, such as the Paris-based leaders of Negritude, draw on transnational influences, tropes, forms, and resources, paradoxically, in reclaiming indigeneity.

A second paradigm for postcolonial poetics is hybridity. Drawing on both indigenous cultural resources and those of Eur. colonizing powers, postcolonial poetry is richly syncretic, layered, and transnational. Revalorizing Cuba's Af. roots, Nicolás Guillén combined modernist and surrealist elements, as well as Sp. ballads, with Af. Cuban musical forms such as the son (sound) and street vernacular to create a poetic mestizaje (mixture). Through hybridization, poets create forms that embody their experience of living between the discrepant cultural worlds of global North and South. The Indian poet A. K. Ramanujan synthesized influences from Eur. modernist poets such as Yeats, T. S. Eliot, and Ezra Pound with literary techniques and tropes in the Dravidian poetry of South India, bringing into poetic expression a South Asian experience of modernity. A poet from Kashmir, Agha Shahid Ali, similarly fused Eliot's fragmentary and apocalyptic poetics and James Merrill's formalism with Urdu-Persian genres such as the ghazal. Walcott, who ironically dubbed himself a "fortunate traveller" in a poem by that name, combines in Omeros Western epic and terza rima with Af. Caribbean myths, rhetorical forms, and landscapes. Creating cross-cultural poetic rituals that answered to his interstitial experience, the Igbo poet Christopher Okigbo delicately interlaced Af. praise song, drumming, local botanical names, and Nigerian place-names with biblical echoes from his Catholic education, syncretic strategies from Eliot and Pound, and formal lyric devices from Lat. verse.

While such overtly cosmopolitan poets obviously hybridize discrepant trads., even strongly nativist poets, such as those already mentioned, often practice a transnational poetics: they yoke together tropes, idioms, and ideologies across hemispheres, while working toward decolonization. Césaire is both a Caribbean poet and a Fr. surrealist; Yeats fuses Ir. place names and myths with anglophone orthographies and lyric trads.; Bennett writes Creole poetry in the Brit. *ballad stanza; Okot p'Bitek draws on H. W. Longfellow and Western dramatic monologue as well as Acoli oral trads.; Brathwaite combines West Indian landscapes and tropes with a creolized Caribbean idiom made available to him by Eliot's conversational style.

The hybridity model, however, also has drawbacks. It has been criticized for naturalizing aesthetic processes, reinforcing formulaic dualities of Western and non-Western influences, glossing over uneven power relations between colonizer and colonized by its false symmetries, depoliticizing postcolonial studies, recycling a term (hybridity) contaminated by earlier racist usages, and oversimplifying as homogeneous the always already heterogeneous trads. fused in hybridization. Given the limitations and capabilities of both the hybridity and decolonization models, one solution (albeit imperfect) is to use them in tandem as mutual correctives, without forsaking either the aesthetic traction of "hybridity" or the political thrust of "decolonization."

Another way of exploring postcolonial poetics is to delineate a few of the poetry's recurrent preoccupations. First, because of the distortion and effacement of local trads. by Eur. colonialism, many postcolonial poets, such as the aforementioned Negritude poets, seek through poetry to nurture collective historical memory. Af. Caribbean poets write with an acute consciousness of the devastations of slavery and colonialism, recuperating Af. rituals, gods, and names lost in the Middle Passage. Redeploying oral trads., Lorna Goodison, e.g., thinks back through the lives of her Jamaican female ancestors to oral tales of her slave progenitors in poems such as "Guinea Woman." Af. poets sometimes summon the powers of precolonial gods: in Wole Soyinka's long poem Ogun Abibiman (Ogun of the Land of the Black Peoples), the Yoruba god of roads, iron, creativity, and war is extolled in the service of the antiapartheid struggle. Occasionally recalling the violence of Brit. colonial rule, South Asian writers reach back to earlier literary and cultural trads. Ali, whose poem "The Dacca Gauzes" recalls how the Brit. severed Indian weavers' thumbs to prevent competition with Brit. muslins, poetically reinstantiates aspects of Moghul-era Muslim Indian culture. Ramanujan builds the poetic sequence "Prayers to Lord Murugan" on the example of a 6th-c. Tamil devotional poem.

Second, poets writing in Eur. langs. must grapple with the alienating effects of working in a lang. imposed under colonialism. The Indian poet R. Parthasarathy laments his imprisonment in an oppressive lang.: "My tongue in English chains." Recalling that slaves were sometimes prohibited from speaking in Af. langs. and even had their tongues removed in punishment, M. NourbeSe Philip from Trinidad and Tobago plays revealingly on the Eng. "language" as a "foreign lan" and "foreign anguish" in her poem "Discourse on the Logic of Language." But many poets attempt to remake Eur. langs. for their local circumstances. Anglophone poets sometimes stud Eng. with indigenous words, place names, and names of flora and fauna; and sometimes they write in dialect, despite the stigma of inferiority that has attached to it, esp. in the former Brit. colonies. Guyanese poet John Agard half-humorously writes in "Listen Mr Oxford don" of "mugging de Queen's English" and "slashing suffix in self-defence."

Third, poetry often serves efforts of self-definition in relation to nation and world, colonizer and colonized, place and displacement. In "Balada de los dos abuelos" ("Ballad of the Two Grandfathers"), Guillén dramatizes his mixed lineage: he imagines his white and black grandfathers embracing and interfusing in his poem across differences of power. Walcott famously agonizes over his mixed inheritances: "I have Dutch, nigger, and English in me, / and either I'm nobody, or I'm a nation." With its layers and ambiguities, poetry seems esp. well suited, for poets such as Walcott and Guillén, to holding discrepant inheritances in tension with one another—Eur. *modernism and Af. Caribbean orality, Gr. *archetypes and black fishermen. Sometimes in postcolonial poetry this in-betweenness or interstitiality is a tragic condition, as when Walcott declares himself "divided to the vein" and "poisoned with the blood of both" his Eur. and his Af. ancestors ("A Far Cry from Africa"). Bleakly self-descriptive, the Indian poet Eunice de Souza states, "my name is Greek / my surname Portuguese / my language alien," and concludes of these disparate "ways / of belonging": "I belong with the lame ducks" ("Ways of Belonging"). But sometimes these disparate inheritances are celebrated for the powerful new possibilities they unleash, despite the lingering wounds: Brathwaite ends his epic trilogy The Arrivants announcing his aspiration to make "some- / thing torn // and new"—presumably, in part, the creolized epic that these very lines complete.

POSTMODERNISM

I. Definition and History
II. Self-Reflexivity
III. Subjectivity
IV. Language and Form

I. Definition and History. The definition and hist. of postmodernism have both been highly contested; postmodernism was declared dead shortly after it came into being, yet it appears to be still with us. Its very name embodies its fundamentally paradoxical or ambivalent nature. The post in relation to modernism is at once temporal (after), causal (because of), and directional (beyond). The postmod. marks both continuity with and rupture from the mod.; it is both critical of and complicit with the aesthetic of modernism (Hutcheon 1988, 1989). Over the years, however, postmodernism has become a convenient label for a broad artistic movement related to the general philosophical, social, and cultural condition called postmodernity. Arising after the grand ideological failures of World War II and provoked and nourished by the civil rights and women's movements and by *poststructuralism, it developed in mid- to late 20th-c. Europe and the Americas before spreading around the world. Despite this dispersion, certain impulses persisted in the specifically postmod. poetries that emerged: a marked self-reflexivity, often combined with a certain, sometimes parodic, intertextual exuberance and a critical engagement with hist. and historiography; an in-depth exploration of subjectivity's construction in lang.; and a contesting of the transparency of lang. itself as well as of the "naturalness" of the relationship between form and content through a simultaneous use and abuse of poetic convention.

Though the term itself has existed for some time, this particular sense of postmodernism first arose in architecture to signal a building's "double-coding": both new/modernist and old/historical (though often ironically or parodically so) and, thus, accessible and popular at once to art-world insiders and the general public. The other arts—from visual appropriation art to film, from music to dance and theater—developed related, yet differing, ways to double-code and challenge restrictive either/or thinking. Over time, postmodernism's persistent both/and inclusive logic came to undercut Hassan's early attempt to define it through rigid binaries, in which modernism meant form, purpose, and hierarchy and postmodernism was associated only with antiform, play, and anarchy.

McHale (2007) has convincingly argued that postmodernism developed differently and unevenly across the art forms. Such differences and unevenness also emerged within each specific art form, thus rendering historical delimitation as difficult as definition. For example, Am. poetry in the 1950s and 1960s reacted against modernism in widely divergent ways. The countercultural *Beat poets insisted on immediacy of expression, rejecting traditional form in favor of "spontaneous" prosody. The poets of the *New York school responded to the "seriousness" of high modernism by blurring "high" and "low" culture. *Confessional poetry replaced modernist impersonality with a focus on the dramas of private life. *Black Mountain school poet Charles Olson maintained Ezra Pound's experimental, intertextual, and historiographic poetics, while adopting a more openly exploratory stance, a more democratic politics, and a greater devotion to the merely local rather than universal. Out of all these diverse responses emerged that series of persisting poetic impulses that characterized postmod. (plural) poetries.

II. Self-Reflexivity. Postmodernist self-reflexivity can be found in many different forms and tones: e.g., in the self-undermining narrative play of Mark Strand and James Merrill, in John Ashbery's "Paradoxes and Oxymorons," and in Susan Howe's My Emily Dickinson, a self-conscious poetic meditation on Dickinson's philosophical, literary, and historical contexts and their influence on Howe's writing. Another entire dimension of the self-reflexive further complicated the postmod. challenge to modernist historiography. While theorist Jameson saw a loss of what he called genuine historicity in the postmod. logic of late capitalism, poets were busy struggling with the concepts of both the "genuine" and the "historical." Cultural assumptions about totalities and coherent unities, logic and reason, consciousness and subjectivity, representation and truth(s) all came under scrutiny. Manifesting what Lyotard famously dubbed the postmod. incredulity toward master narratives, both narrative and lyric poetry placed hist.—modernism's Joycean nightmare—and its writing under the microscope, posing new questions that echoed those of contemporaneous historians. Together they asked: Whose story got told in the official histories? Whose did not? Who was allowed to tell it? What did the archive omit? The lingering positivist and empiricist assumptions of the discipline of hist., inherited from the 19th c., came under fire: historical events, it was argued, were made into historical facts (i.e., were constructed as facts) by the historian's act of putting them into a narrative (White).

Suddenly the individual (and even lyric) voice was no longer banned from historical discourse, as even historians sometimes refused to hide behind the third-person mask of putative objectivity and instead called attention to the ideological positioning inevitable in any historical account. In poetry, Margaret Atwood retold a personalized and feminist version of the story of a 19th-c. Canadian pioneer woman of letters in The Journals of Susanna Moodie; Geoffrey Hill's lyrics (e.g., The Mystery of the Charity of Charles Péguy) reflected on historical events and on his own reflections on and writing about them. The historical record might be unreliable, but Hill questioned too his own motives in writing about hist. and how these shape the results. Writers of the postmod. long poem as well as the lyric often chose to recount not the master narratives of hist. but smaller, more local (and conflicted) hists. Here the postmod. dovetailed with the feminist and postcolonial in the work of writers like Kamau Brathwaite, Lorna Goodison, Simon Ortiz, Paul Muldoon, and Derek Walcott.

III. Subjectivity. The radical postmod. challenges to the humanist notion of the self as coherent, unified, and centered that were undertaken by contemp. psychoanalysis and philosophy found their echo also in postmod. poetry, though not without a particularly poetic twist or two. The reasons for the poststructuralist refusal of any deep, single, stable, autonomous identity were bound to have repercussions for poetry—and for poets, whether narrative or lyric: if human consciousness is not the source of lang. but is constructed in and by lang., poets would have to think differently about both their work and their identity. The postmod. adoption of the idea of the "subject" to replace that of either "self" or "identity" was intended to suggest both the "subject" of a sentence (the agent of a verb) and the condition of being "subjected to" the lang. that constructs one's identity. Thus, poets and theorists saw in postmod. poetry evidence that lyric consciousness does not exist prior to or aside from lang. (Bernstein). The subject is entirely constituted by and knowable through a heterogeneous field of ling. and real-world engagements (Altieri 1973).

This understanding of subjectivity was embodied in a wide range of poetic styles and modes. Confessional postmod. poets Robert Lowell and Sylvia Plath used the lessons of psychoanalysis to expose their own hists. of mental illness, sexuality, infidelity, and parenthood. Frank O'Hara's "I do this, I do that" poems presented the quotidian details of his movements through New York City. The postmod. tendency to blur the boundaries between high and low culture and to incorporate a wide range of popular reference showed how subjectivity is culturally constituted. Ashbery's "Farm Implements and Rutabagas in a Landscape," e.g., is a sestina involving characters from Popeye; Amiri Baraka and other members of the *Black Arts movement drew on the rhythms of jazz and popular music; and *Asian Am. poets such as John Yau showed how Hollywood stereotypes of Asians influence Asian Am. subjectivity. *Flarf poets such as K. Silem Mohammad have used Google searches to generate material for lyric poems. Diverse as these poetries are, each in its own way articulated the speaking/writing subject more as product or process than as producer.

IV. Language and Form. Many postmodernist poets, from Olson to bpNichol to Charles Bernstein, have challenged the concept of individual, coherent *"voice" that has been central to the hist. of lyric poetry, and this challenge has had implications for the forms that poetry takes. *Language poetry, which epitomized the postmodernist concern with how lang. shapes subjectivity, took an explicit position against the idea that speech is the basis of poetry and often foregrounded the materiality of the page and text. Rejecting the idea of lang. as a transparent medium of communication, Language poetry called attention to and problematized the role of ling. structures and conventions in generating meaning. Formal fragmentation at the level of the word, phrase, or line marked the ling. version of this contestation. Some poems prohibited us from deploying the usual interpretive codes (always as ideological as they are formal) we need to make meaning, sometimes through the physical *textuality of the page, as noted above (see BOOK, POETIC; TYPOGRAPHY).

There was at the same time a paradoxical impulse in postmodernism in all the arts to both exploit and explode the conventions upon which it depended; poetries were no different. One means of contesting, while provoking, our readerly impulses toward coherence and meaning could be found in the deliberately arbitrary use of formal *constraint. A tour de force of the *Oulipo-esque genre, Christian Bök's Eunoia, e.g., uses only one vowel per short section; every line in Ashbery's "Into the Dusk-Charged Air" mentions the name of a river; John Cage famously deployed intricate but *aleatory methods to generate poems; Lyn Hejinian's My Life, composed when the poet was 37, contains 37 sections of 37 sentences each, while Ron Silliman's Tjanting expands according to a Fibonacci mathematical sequence. Conte has perceived a distinctly postmod. manner of using strict, traditional forms, particularly ones involving *refrain. Rather than carefully shaping form and content to communicate the poet's intentions, the poet let the form generate the poem. Such works used strict patterning on a "micro" level to undermine coherence on the more "macro" semantic and thematic levels, but with the postmod. extremes of such patterning, there was an implied critique of the very form/content separation.

A slightly different set of problems emerged on the larger scale of the *long poem. The modernist *collage form of Pound, T. S. Eliot, W. C. Williams, or the early Louis Zukofsky could be made to cohere, often through the poet's subjectivity. But in keeping with its challenges to any sense of coherent identity, postmodernism made this sense of formal wholeness problematic. For Conte, the postmod. long poem used an open-ended *"serial form" that contested the narrative and thematic coherence of classic long poems, while still gesturing toward the scale and importance of *epic and its modernist reincarnations. Jack Spicer's "book" compositions, A. R. Ammons's Tape for the Turn of the Year, or Ashbery's Flow Chart exemplified this kind of work. Kroetsch saw the long poem as allowing a kind of Foucauldian "archaeology" to replace the continuous, totalizing, teleological narrative form of hist.

Even given the persistent suspicion of the rhet. of periodization, esp. by poets themselves (McCaffery), the complex relationship of the post to the modern has clearly been one of critical rethinking, leading either to a continuation and often intensification or a rejection. If modernist poets broke with traditional forms and pioneered techniques of fragmentation and collage, it was often in the service of finding a new order. Post-modernist poets adapted, rather than adopted, many modernist techniques but were far more skeptical about the prospect of ultimate coherence. What Perloff (1991) has called the poetics of *indeterminacy emerged from some of modernism's most radical gestures, which existed in tension with a drive toward order; for much postmod. poetry, representing such indeterminacy was precisely the goal.

L. HUTCHEON, M. WOODLAND, T. YU, A. DUBOIS

POSTSTRUCTURALISM. *Structuralism—associated with early 20th-c. thinkers such as the linguist Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913) and the anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss (1908–2009)—was a methodology as well as a theory of existence. It claimed that we can study cultural phenomena only as full systems, not as single terms, and that human beings experience their worlds according to structures (such as myths, symbols, and lang.). Structuralism placed more value on relations and differences than identities. In ling. terms, it insisted that langs. do not consist of signs that label a distinct reality but that differences among sounds enable minds and cultures to distinguish and differentiate within an otherwise meaningless reality. (If we want to understand a word, e.g., we need to know the position it takes in a lang.; there is no such thing as a direct trans. from one lang. to another.) In anthropology, structuralism regarded *myths as functions rather than meaningful stories; myths allow for the distinction between good and evil, pure and impure, inside and outside, male and female, even self and other. To understand a myth is to analyze it as an organizing system. In poetics, structuralism could look at the way literary works created distinctions, oppositions, and categories through the production of contrasting terms. Structuralism focused on relations among terms (how langs. produce distinctions) and situated those relations within a relatively closed system (a lang., a culture, a practice or a network—such as fashion systems or tribal markings).

Poststructuralism follows from, and overturns, structuralism. One of the key historical markers for poststructuralism—which is often associated with philosophies of postwar France—was the May 1968 student protests. Traditional leftist political movements were grounded on so-called material conditions: the real role of workers in hist. and production. But when students protested across Europe and the Communist parties failed to support the revolution because it was deemed not to be properly political or economic, there emerged a need to rethink the problems of intellectual or cultural resistance. If systems are the means through which we think and act, how can those systems be destabilized, opened, or ruptured? How do they come into being and pass away? These were political and material questions, but they also concerned the politics and matter of sign systems. If we accept the premises of structuralism—that identity is created through differentiation—then we open up a new problem concerning the closure of structures. Can we think outside the structures that produce identity? What position of knowledge do we occupy when we examine differences among structures and the emergence of structures? Jacques Derrida (1930–2004), beginning in the late 1950s, in a series of essays that radicalized the premises of structuralism, argued that any thought or concept of a structure (such as lang. or culture) would itself be dependent on structures; we would always be caught up in relations of difference, never capable of stepping outside the tracing of relations of difference that we are trying to explain. Structuralism, like all Western thought, relied on positing a founding presence, such as the explanatory concept of culture or lang. (even though these terms are themselves effects of lang. and culture). Any thought of some origin, any account of the genesis of structures, would itself be an effect of structuring differences. Further, even if we accept that we are always within networks of difference and, therefore, never capable of grasping a pure unmediated truth outside of difference, we cannot avoid the effect of presence. If we claim that langs., cultures, myths, or texts create the differences through which we conceptualize the world, then we are bringing in another foundation, and we avoid the ways in which foundational terms are also made possible only by difference and relation. Derrida, therefore, argued for a deconstruction of textual relations and forces; texts are "scenes of writing" in which oppositions are produced. Literary texts tend to foreground writing and inscriptive processes and, in so doing, allow for a continuing disturbance of the seemingly self-present nature of identity.

Poststructuralism also had implications for the ways in which human consciousness and the unconscious could be approached. Jacques Lacan (1901–81) argued for what he referred to as the "agency of the letter" in the unconscious. There are not self-present minds or egos that have experiences, some of which are repressed to produce an unconscious. Rather, from differential processes—such as the symbolic order of lang. that allows us to speak and think of ourselves as subjects—we imagine that there is both a world of fixed identities, an ultimate reality beyond the vagaries of perception, and an original subject who is the origin of all speech and meaning. What we cannot think—what constitutes a necessarily and radically absent unconscious—is the differential system through which we are able to think of ourselves as unified subjects. For Lacan, there is a special value to lit. in its presentation of the sign as such—the letter that we always imagine to be the sign of some ultimate presence.

Despite psychoanalysis and its Oedipal theories being ostensibly disastrous for women's identity, Lacanian psychoanalysis was crucial for poststructuralist feminist literary theory (see FEMINIST APPROACHES TO POETRY). Poststructuralist feminism, in general, rejected the notion of a natural femininity that would be masked or belied by culture: the very notion of a pure nature overlaid by culture is itself an effect of structure (and one that had helped sustain the figure or image of a mother nature outside signs and hist.). Poststructuralism in its psychoanalytic form enabled some explanation of why there had always been some presupposed maternal origin or plenitude that we now regard as lost. Because we are speaking beings, produced through structure, we also imagine some prestructural origin. We presuppose an ultimate "beyond" or plentitude that exists in excess of the social order of the symbolic. Lacan suggested that Woman (or the figure of that which lies beyond the differentiating laws of the symbolic order) does not exist and that ethics would only begin if we could—in a mode of poststructuralist affirmation—relinquish the imagination of the feminine "beyond." Feminists who followed Lacan took a different path and suggested a new way of reading texts. For Julia Kristeva (b. 1941), poetic lang. would be directly revolutionary because it does not accept the terms of a structure (such as lang.) and work within its terms but draws on sonorous, rhythmic, and tonal matters from which logical systems emerge. In poetry, it is as though the subject of logic, judgment, and identity is drawn back to some pre-Oedipal moment of emerging differentiation (what Kristeva referred to as the "chora"). For Luce Irigaray (b. 1932), the Lacanian theory of the subject is only half the story. The notion that we are subjected to a symbolic order of law from which we must presuppose a lost and desired prohibited feminine that is nothing more than an effect must be coupled with another sexed subject. For Irigaray, this other subject would be feminine, and her mode of existing and speaking would not be negative and mournful—imagining a lost fantasized feminine—but creatively different. In the male-female relation, one recognizes an other or otherness beyond the system of signs that would structure reality in advance. There is at least one other sexed subject—woman—whose modes of speech, touch, and experience are not those of a differentiating subject faced with an undifferentiated object or matter. Irigaray argues that, in relations of sexual difference, we encounter others as desiring relations, not as differentiated objects. Her theory of sexual difference is also a theory of textual difference, in which we experience the world not as blank matter to be represented by an active subject but as a living world that has its own dynamism. In certain mythic or spiritual modes of writing, contact is made with an "elemental" aspect of existence that is neither brute unstructured reality nor constructed objectivity but a process of relation that produces differences.

Poststructuralism, though diverse in the disciplines from which it drew (incl. philosophy, ling., anthropology, psychoanalysis, and poetics) was nevertheless united in being a complex mode of antifoundationalism. Like structuralism, it argued that one could not grasp a foundation or origin outside the system of differences through which identities and relations are made possible. Unlike structuralism, though, poststructuralism maintained that the terms used to describe structures are themselves effects of difference and that the effects or illusions of an ultimate presence could not simply be avoided. In other words, we at once acknowledge that all terms or identities can only be known through some mediating structure, yet any term used to describe that structure will nevertheless appear as one more privileged foundation. The idea that all concepts are effects of lang. posits lang. as some ultimate and single ground, but lang.'s differential system is never a full presence and is only known and experienced differentially. Derrida referred to this as a "necessary impossibility": the idea of truth or some presence beyond relative differences is necessary for all thinking (for we always take signs to be signs of something signified, something that will be present). But that presence can never arrive. In his later work, Derrida referred to a "future to come" or messianism without messiah. P. de Man (1919–83), lit. crit.'s most audacious poststructuralist and one of the Yale school of theorists who transposed poststructuralist Fr. philosophy into lit. crit., diagnosed what he referred to as the continual "relapse" of meaning effects. Lit. offers us nothing more than traces and marked-out oppositions, yet we always posit some nature or ground (or meaning) from which some effects have supposedly emerged. De Man argued that *allegory—seeing signs as doubles of some prior nature, or foundational meaning—is what reading ought to aim to destroy, yet any destroyed allegory could never arrive at a degree zero and would always lapse back into seeing texts and relations as having derived from some prior and fruitful ground. In this respect, de Man—despite his manifest association with Derrida and deconstruction—was closer to the insistently immanent poststructuralism of Gilles Deleuze (1925–95) and Michel Foucault (1926–84): i.e., he rejected a future or messianism that might be intimated but never known; instead, he insisted on the labor of reading that would always focus on the textual differences themselves (and not some imagined presence of which they were effects). De Man, therefore, rejected transcendence or a presence beyond the differences and relations of textual traces, and, in this sense, he—like Deleuze and Foucault—was more insistently a theorist of immanence, taking up Friedrich Nietzsche's (1844–1900) nihilist project of positively destroying or annihilating any supposed "higher" world or value.

Deleuze, who coauthored a series of works with the Fr. psychoanalyst Félix Guattari (1930–92), aimed to liberate thought from transcendence or the idea that perceptions, images, signs, desires, and identities are grounded on some ultimate or transcending "plane." Unlike Derrida, whose work increasingly insisted on a "to-come" that might be thought but never known, Deleuze embraced the deep interior of thinking—phenomena such as stupidity, malevolence, and nonsense—in which life would appear as such and not indicate any logic or rationale beyond itself. He insisted that relations were external to terms: there are not identities that then explain how the world unfolds; nor is there a general law that explains and orders all identities. Relations—or the terms and systems we know—are effects of contingent encounters that could always have been otherwise. Deleuze's work was close to Foucault's, although Foucault was less explicitly philosophical. Like all poststructuralists, Foucault was indebted to Nietzsche and the genealogical approach: one does not assume identities that come to realization through time. Genealogy traces wayward and awkward connections and mappings of vastly different and disjoined phenomena. The very idea of "man," for Foucault, was only possible after certain spatial redistributions, knowledge practices, sociopolitical procedures, and different styles of perceiving and knowing. The human being is an effect of knowledge, and knowledge is enabled by distributions of knowledge: "man" is produced as an object of study by (e.g.) mod. penal practices of analysis and interpretation, which, in turn, enable criminology and the project of the human sciences.

In this respect, Foucault, like all poststructuralists, produced a corpus that was an antidote to what has come to be known as postmodernism*. The idea that the world is an effect of signs and that everything is relative (esp. relative to human knowledge) is one more foundational idea that puts the human being at the center. Poststructuralists insisted that there would always be hierarchies, disjunctions, systems that do not cohere, and ongoing mutations and distortions that would preclude a general relativism. The one poststructuralist who did use the term postmodernism in his work, Jean-François Lyotard (1924–98), defined the postmod. condition as one of an "incredulity towards metanarratives": there could be no general account capable of subsuming all phenomena. The idea that "everything is simulation" or that "the world is the effect of representation" would be just as totalizing as a fundamental religion or metaphysical schema. Lyotard, therefore, drew attention to what he referred to as the "postmodern sublime"—purely sensible events that could not be reduced to already given or commanding concepts.

Overall, then, the poststructuralist legacy is still to be played out and still presents a challenge to many current modes of thought—such as the attempt to account for differences through a single overarching system, such as culture, hist., lang., or "life."

POULTER'S MEASURE. A rhymed *couplet, the first line having 12 syllables and the second 14: "What length of verse can serve brave Mopsa's good to show, / Whose virtues strange, and beauties such, as no man them may know?" (Philip Sidney, "What Length of Verse?"). After confessing ignorance of its name, George Gascoigne called it a "poulter's measure" since the poultry man gives 12 eggs for the first dozen and 14 for the second. Although the definition refers to the number of syllables, poets understood that the meter was *iambic and that the first line had six beats and the second seven.

One of the few native poetic forms created in Eng. during the Ren., poulter's measure peaked early, in the 1560s and 1570s, as Gascoigne, Fulke Greville, Nicholas Grimald, Sidney, the Earl of Surrey (Henry Howard), Thomas Wyatt, and others sought the right meter for *heroic verse. By the 1590s, poets turned away, mocking it as Sidney does above for its singsong and supposedly uncouth qualities. Soon, iambic *pentameter dominated, and poulter's measure disappeared.

The appeal and demise of poulter's measure stem from its rhythmic similarity to *short meter. The beat pattern of poulter's measure is 6 and 7, and the Ren. practice of placing a *caesura in the middle of each line meant that the rhythm often sounds like 3-3-4-3, echoing the beat pattern of short meter. As Malof, Thompson, and Attridge explain, short meter (and its relative the *limerick, which breaks the 4-beat line in half, creating a 3-3-2-2-3 beat pattern) creates an insistent rhythm, the singsong that appealed to the Ren. love of *ornament but also doomed poulter's measure for long poems. By contrast, iambic pentameter has structural advantages that prevent the devel. of a rollicking rhythm.

PRAKRIT POETRY. The term Prakrit refers in its broadest sense to a wide range of Middle Indo-Aryan langs., related to but different from Sanskrit. Although the name is drawn from a Sanskrit word referring to these langs. as "original" or "natural" in contrast to the "refined" status of codified Sanskrit, a description pointing to a recognition of their status as vernaculars, several of the Prakrit langs. had standardized forms of their own and enjoyed a long hist. of use both as court langs. in South Asia and by groups such as the Buddhists and Jains, who opposed the claims of authority made by Brahmanical users of Sanskrit. The oldest surviving written examples of Middle Indo-Aryan langs. are from the 3d c. BCE, in the inscriptions of the Buddhist emperor Aśoka, and a very large corpus of Buddhist texts survives both in the Pali lang. and in various Prakrit langs. An unknown portion of Prakrit lit. has been lost; in only the last 15 years, e.g., excavations in Central Asia have increased the numbers of known mss. in Gāndhārī Prakrit from one example to hundreds. In addition to the Buddhist texts, Jain canonical works are preserved in Prakrit langs. such as Ārdhamāgadhī and Jain Māhārāṣṭrī. Alongside these uses, several Prakrit langs. were used for literary purposes by Brahmanical authors as well. In mod. usage (continuing the practice of Sanskrit authors) the term Prakrit generally excludes the Pali lang. as well as the later stages of Middle Indo-Aryan known as Apabhraṃśa, despite the literary uses of these langs.

Sanskrit writers on poetics treat Prakrit as a ling. option for poetic purposes alongside Sanskrit and Apabhraṃśa, sometimes incl. as well the "goblin language" or Paiśācī, in which was composed a famous collection of stories called Bṛhatkathā (The Great Story), now lost in the original but surviving in several versions in Sanskrit dating from the 6th c. onward. In addition to the use of Prakrit as the lang. in which entire works are composed, in Sanskrit dramaturgy the use of several Prakrit langs. is assigned by rule to characters of certain classes: in the plays, it is generally only educated upperclass men who speak Sanskrit, while women speak in Śaurasenī Prakrit and sing in Māhārāṣṭrī Prakrit, and less refined men speak other forms of Prakrit such as Māgadhī. Prakrit grammars written in Sanskrit described these langs. largely by giving rules for converting Sanskrit into Prakrit, and from early med. times onward, it became increasingly clear that most Sanskrit playwrights were thinking in Sanskrit and employing such conversions to produce their Prakrit sentences. It is perhaps for this reason that the great poet Bhavabhūti, author of three plays in the 8th c., wrote prose in both Sanskrit and Prakrit but composed verses only in Sanskrit. It is also clear that readers as well were less able over time to understand Prakrit directly, as shown in the fact that commentaries on the plays regularly provide Sanskrit trans. of the Prakrit passages and in the widespread corruption of Prakrit passages in mss.

Māhārāṣṭrī Prakrit, associated with the region in which mod. Marathi is spoken (see MARATHI POETRY), played an esp. important role in poetry and is treated as the fundamental Prakrit in written grammars. The oldest collection of verses is the anthol. named Sattasaī (Seven Hundred), attributed to the 1st-c. king Hāla but containing *couplets mostly from the 3d to 5th c. and from as late as the 7th c. The verses, called *gāthā*s, are couplets, syntactically independent like Sanskrit couplets but composed in freer meters of the āryā pattern, a type apparently related to regional folk songs, not allowed in the most prestigious form of Sanskrit poetry but adopted with enthusiasm in other forms of Sanskrit composition. The verses deal esp. with the psychological aspects of love and were influential in providing the model for similar collections in Sanskrit such as the Amaruśataka (The Hundred Verses of Amaru, ca. 7th c.), an anthol. of verses offering psychological vignettes of life in an aristocratic polygamous society, using techniques of poetic suggestion similar to those found in many of the Prakrit gāthās. Such poetry was the impetus for the devel. of the theory of poetic suggestion that looms large in Sanskrit poetics beginning with the 9th-c. Dhvanyāloka (Light on Suggestion) treatise of Ānandavardhana, which uses as examples not only Sanskrit verses from Amaru's collection but many Prakrit verses from the Sattasaī. Later Sanskrit poetic works such as the 12th-c. Āryāsaptaśatī (Seven Hundred Āryā Verses) imitate the Sattasaī not only in flavor but in meter as well. Commentaries in Sanskrit were written on many of the Prakrit poems.

In addition to the gāthā lit., Prakrit poets also composed in most of the standard genres of Sanskrit poetry or in related Prakrit genres. Examples are the 7th-c. sargabandha (composition in *cantos, the ornate *epic also called mahākāvya or great poem in Sanskrit) of Pravarasena titled Setubandha (The Forming of the Bridge), the 8th-c. campu (poem in mixed prose and verse) of Uddyotana Sūri titled Kuvalayamālā (The Garland of Water Lilies), and the long 8th-c. poem Gaüḍavaha (The Slaying of the Gauda) of Vākpatirāja, who was also among the latest of the authors included in Hāla's collection. Several distinctive Prakrit genres are defined in early Sanskrit treatises on poetics, but examples have survived only sporadically. Other authors used Sanskrit and Prakrit together, as in works with Sanskrit verses and Prakrit prose, in *macaronic verses with one half in Sanskrit and the other in Prakrit, and even in verses designed to sound the same in both langs.

A considerable portion of these poetic works in Māhārāṣṭrī Prakrit was composed by Jain authors, many of whom continued to use distinctively Jain forms of Prakrit for literary as well as expository and philosophical uses.

Extensive treatment of the differences in effect between Sanskrit and Prakrit, of the distribution of Prakrit langs. geographically and socially, and of the social milieu of the Prakrit court poets is provided in the 9th-c. Kāvyamīmāṃsā (Exegesis of Poetry), an encyclopedic work on lit. by Rājaśekhara, who was the most prolific of Sanskrit court poets and prided himself on his abilities in Prakrit, as evidenced in his play titled Karpūramañjarī (Camphor Cluster), which is composed entirely in Prakrit langs.

PRÉCIOSITÉ. Deliberate pursuit and "prizing" of refinement in manners, dress, lang., and lit. Bray (among others) has traced the hist. of préciosité from med. *courtly love to the present (via Stéphane Mallarmé and Jean Giraudoux), but as a significant cultural phenomenon, it is most pertinently applied to 17th-c. Fr. salons and polite society (1630–60). In 1608, the Marquise de Rambouillet, disgusted by the licentious court of Henri IV, retired to her Parisian manor, noted for its chambre bleue; as a salon, it reached its height from 1630 to 1645. Elegance in clothing and manners, decorum and modesty in behavior, and witty conversation were cultivated. Love and lit. were the topics of discussion. Honoré d'Urfé's pastoral novel L'Astrée (1607–28) was analyzed and imitated; authors (incl. Pierre Corneille) read aloud their works. The poet and epistolist Vincent Voiture (1597–1648) animated the group and epitomized the delicate, ludic tone of the précieux style. In the 1650s, préciosité appeared in several salons, most notably that of Mlle. de Scudéry, renowned for her lengthy novels. Préciosité became widespread and fashionable in polite (mondaine) society. Some critics (Lathuillère) consider this decade the only period of true préciosité. By the time of Molière's satiric attack in Les Précieuses ridicules (1659), the episode was already beginning to wane.

As an attitude and endeavor, préciosité is characterized by reductionism, purity, artifice, and abstraction. In terms of lang., it continued François de Malherbe's task of rejecting the cacophonous Latinate neologisms of the Ren. The précieux lang. of the ruelle (an alcove in the salon) stressed exaggerated metaphors, clever pointes (puns, witticisms), and paraphrase. Objects could not be crudely designated by their vulgar, common names: in Antoine Baudeau de Somaize's Dictionnaire des précieuses (1660), a mirror is a "counselor of the graces," cheeks are the "thrones of modesty." Platonic love interests were encouraged, which gave rise to the literary forms valued by préciosité: the epistle, *ode, *sonnet, *rondeau, *epigram, and *madrigal. But the more popular préciosité became, the clearer and more frequent were the abuses of extravagance and pretension (esp. among the bourgeois). Burlesque poetry and realistic novels were linked, inversely, to précieux thought.

An element of the Fr. *baroque, préciosité had several earlier Eur. analogues of idealized refinement: Euphuism, Gongorism, *Marinism. Yet it did not seek the periodic style of Euphuism, the Latinate vocabulary of Gongorism, or the rambling syntax of Marinism. The influence of préciosité, restricted to Fr. lit., was considerable, since the psychological analysis of love, expressed by galant terms (but without florid images or an excessive style) is evident in Mme. de Lafayette, the Lettres portugaises, and François de La Rochefoucauld.

PREGUNTA. The pregunta or requesta (question) with its corresponding respuesta (answer) was a form of poetic debate practiced principally by Sp. court poets of the late 14th and 15th cs. One poet presented his question—often on such themes as morals, love, philosophy, or religion—in a poem, and another poet gave the answer in a poem of identical form, incl. the rhymes. Sometimes answers in identical form were given by more than one poet. Occasionally, an answering poet was unable to follow the rhymes of the pregunta and might excuse himself for his substitutions.

PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. Arguably the first mod. avant-garde movement, the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood (PRB) exercised an influence disproportionate to its short life. Three young Brit. art students banded together in London in 1848 to protest academic conventionalism in Eng. art. W. H. Hunt, J. E. Millais, and D. G. Rossetti were the most important figures in a group that eventually numbered seven (plus associated artists and writers F. M. Brown, W. B. Scott, and Christina Rossetti) before dispersing in the early 1850s. The PRB sought to lead Eng. art and lit. back to a studied simplicity, what Ruskin, writing in their defense, called "archaic honesty," taking inspiration from the work of northern Eur. and It. "primitive" art and lit. of the late Middle Ages and early Ren.: i.e., before Raphael. In 1850, the group launched an ambitious small magazine of poetry, crit., and original designs, The Germ: Thoughts toward Nature in Poetry, Literature and Art, which sold few copies but survived four issues.

Paintings signed "PRB," first appearing publicly in 1849, accumulated sharply observed details in bright, local color to render scenes of socially or sexually charged encounters from lit., the Bible, and mod. life (e.g., Millais's Christ in the House of His Parents, Isabella, Mariana, Ophelia; Hunt's The Light of the World, Claudio and Isabella, The Hireling Shepherd, The Awakening Conscience; D. G. Rossetti's Mary's Girlhood, Ecce Ancilla Domina!, and Found). PRB artists used minimal chiaroscuro, avoiding lights and shadows conventionally used for dramatic or narrative simplification and illusions of depth; employed colors that struck contemporaries as jarringly vivid, and rendered their subjects with scrupulous fidelity, painting outdoor backgrounds in situ under often-trying conditions and refusing to idealize their working-class subjects. Eliminating depth of field, they labored minutely on visual detail across their canvases. Preternaturally focused visual attention, overriding ordinary conventions for organizing pictorial and narrative scenes, created formal patterns and suggested heightened states of mind.

Rossetti preferred imagined scenes, using one figure as what he termed an "inner standing point" for states of mind rendered through concrete sensory details—a process that shaped both his two exhibited oils and poems first pub. in The Germ: "The Blessed Damozel," "My Sister's Sleep," and "Sonnets for Pictures" by Andrea Mantegna, Giorgione, Leonardo da Vinci, and Hans Memling. Rossetti's prose tale "Hand and Soul" in the Germ's inaugural issue captures the group's interest in intensely "seen" psychohistories taking inspiration from earlier (and then-unpopular) moments in the hist. of art revisited through mod. sensibilities. Subsequent issues published C. Rossetti's strange, beautifully crafted short lyrics ("Dream Land," "An End," "A Pause of Thought," "Song: Oh! Roses for the flush of youth," "A Testimony," "Repining," and "Sweet Death") under the pseud. Ellen Alleyn. As in painting, so in poetry PRB contributors experimented with a spare, antirhetorical style and cultivated sensory and emotional intensity.

PRE-RAPHAELITISM. The term is loose but useful to describe shared ideals and practices in circles around D. G. Rossetti and William Morris in the later 1850s and 1860s, after the dissolution of the original *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. Pre-Raphaelitism was a site of poetic innovation and experiment, beginning with Morris's 1858 The Defense of Guenevere; D. G. Rossetti's trans. from Dante and his circle, The Early Italian Poets (1861); Christina Rossetti's Goblin Market (1862); A. C. Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon (1865) and Poems and Ballads, First Series (1866); and D. G. Rossetti's Poems (1870). The influence of poetic Pre-Raphaelitism affected contemporaries (e.g., George Meredith's Modern Love, 1862; G. M. Hopkins; Thomas Hardy) and extended to later devels. it nurtured or partly inspired (*aestheticism, *symbolism, *decadence, and significant aspects of *modernism and *postmodernism, particularly *Language poetry).

Poetic Pre-Raphaelitism is characterized by sharpened attentiveness to sensory perception valued as a mode of knowledge, giving access to heightened states of psychological and visionary intensity, particularly as provoked by passion or desire. Sensuous figuration and formal design evoke affective moods and psychological conditions to explore social, sexual, political, and metaphysical ideas. Pater was probably the first and best critic of this aspect of Pre-Raphaelitism, but the poets themselves were significant critics in prose as well as verse (e.g., Swinburne, Notes on Poems and Reviews [1866], William Blake [1868], Notes on Some Pictures of 1868; and D. G. Rossetti, The Stealthy School of Criticism [1871]). Pre-Raphaelite crit. vigorously resisted Victorian strictures on style and subject matter, insisting on "poetry for poetry's sake" (Swinburne, William Blake).

The poets' fundamental commitment to the seriousness of their subjects was pursued through formal innovation. While looking back to Blake; P. B. Shelley; John Keats; the early Alfred, Lord Tennyson; and Robert Browning, Pre-Raphaelitism drew on a much wider range of foreign and intermedial material. As a poetic practice, Pre-Raphaelitism was distinctively arts-inflected, emphasizing verbal rhythm, texture, and design in a variety of lyric forms and skillfully working the interplay of graphic and aural patterns to produce meaning. The four major poets of Pre-Raphaelitism paid unusual attention to poetry's material forms in page and book design (see BOOK, POETIC). They made frequent use of trans. (from Fr., It., Icelandic, Gr.), turning for fresh ideas to earlier historical periods, particularly the Eng. and Eur. Middle Ages and the Ren. (as noted appreciatively by Ezra Pound), but also to painting, drawing, the decorative arts, and music, challenging contemp. attitudes (toward love, desire, religion, politics) while expanding the ling. and formal possibilities for Eng. poetry. C. Rossetti drew on market cries, *nursery rhymes, and *ballads as well as Tractarian poetics and other religious poetry and commentary. Morris, D. G. Rossetti, and Swinburne brought med. continental lyric forms back to Eng. poetry with brilliant experiments in the *carol, *sestina, *ballade, and *rondeau. D. G. Rossetti and Swinburne wrote exemplary terse *ballads (Rossetti, "Sister Helen" [1870]; Swinburne, "The Tyneside Widow," "The Lyke-Wake Song" [1889]), while both Rossettis composed innovative *sonnet sequences (D. G. Rossetti, "The House of Life" [1870, 1881]; C. Rossetti, "Monna Innominata" and "Later Life: A Double Sonnet of Sonnets" [1880]).

Individually distinctive, Pre-Raphaelitism's poets shared aspirations, practices, and spaces; their impact was enhanced by relationships at once social and professional. Poets worked with artists (e.g., Edward and Georgiana Burne-Jones, Philip Webb, J. M. Whistler, Elizabeth Siddall, Jane Burden Morris, Simeon Solomon, Frederick Sandys) in Red Lion Square in the late 1850s; Morris's Red House in Bexleyheath, Kent (1860–65); and from 1862, Rossetti's Tudor House, Chelsea (Swinburne, Meredith, and W. M. Rossetti were occasional tenants). Collaborative projects included the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine (1856), ed. by Morris and Burne-Jones; decoration of the Oxford Debating Society's rooms in the Oxford Union under the charismatic Rossetti (1857); design and decoration of Red House; a decorative-arts business (Morris, Marshall, Faulkner and Co.; after 1875, Morris and Co.); painting exhibitions; and extensive shared editorial labor (e.g., D. G. Rossetti's contributions to C. Rossetti's books of 1862 and 1865 and the collaborative work on his Poems, 1870; Morris and Burne-Jones's "big book" project, 1865–68, for an illustrated ed. of Morris's The Earthly Paradise; and in the 1890s, Morris's Kelmscott Press).

PREROMANTICISM (Fr. Préromantisme, Ger. Vorromantik). An umbrella term, introduced by the comparative lit. scholar van Tieghem in 1924 to denote all the various forms of "dissent" from the prevalent neoclassical system of rules and from the hegemony of the cl. trad. in 17th- and 18th c. Europe. They ultimately combined to form high romanticism. Changes of paradigm included the substitution of imaginative *originality for cl. *imitation (Edward Young); the preference for solitude and night over society and daylight (Anne Finch, Countess of Winchilsea) or the withdrawal from metropolitan salons into small sympathizing family circles (Anna Letitia Barbauld); the replacement of "artisan poetry" composed according to rule and reason by *inspiration, enthusiasm, and *poetic madness (William Blake); opposition to academic crit. according to rules (Nicholas Rowe); the growth of original genius in *nature rather than schools (James Beattie); introspective individualism in the lyrical revival (Joseph and Thomas Warton, the Bluestocking Circle, the Eng. Della Cruscans); the med. revival (Richard Hurd); the preference for simple vernacular diction and the native countryside (William Cowper); the literary revindication of regional dialects (Robert Anderson, Robert Fergusson, Robert Burns, Susanna Blamire); a preference for the child of nature and noble savage over against the cultivated Augustan (Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Lord Monboddo), as well as for wild poetic ecstasy (William Collins); a passion for the rights of man and abolition of feudal society and institutions (William Godwin, Thomas Paine); the inclusion of animals in natural egalitarian human sympathy (Joseph Ritson); the revival of "primitive and oriental" poetry such as Heb., Ar., Germanic, Celtic, Indian, and Chinese, as opposed to cl. Gr. and Lat. lits. and myths (Robert Lowth, J. G. Herder, Hugh Blair); the sentimental movement with its egalitarian tendency, as well as its repudiation of *satire and punitive ridicule; and the substitution of music for painting (see UT PICTURA POESIS) in the ordering of the arts: ut musica poesis. Changes of genre included the *sonnet revival (Charlotte Smith, William Lisle Bowles); the *ballad and romance revival (Allan Ramsay, Thomas Percy); *graveyard poetry (Young, Thomas Gray, James Hervey, Robert Blair); topographical and regional poetry (James Thomson, John Dyer); the sensational melodrama (Guilbert de Pixerécour, Thomas Holcroft); the sentimental comedy with its preference for touching positive examples of virtue as opposed to derided examples of vice and folly (Colley Cibber, Richard Steele, Hugh Kelly); the sentimental or domestic tragedy with its desertion of the classical rules of Fallhöhe and Ständeklausel, as well as its ranking of pity above objectifiable fear in the tragic *catharsis (George Lillo, Edward Moore); the sentimental novel with its "romantic triangle" engaging the reader's emotions in favor of rebellious marriages of love against feudal marriages of rank and riches (Samuel Richardson, Rousseau, Henry Mackenzie, J. W. Goethe, Laurence Sterne); the Gothic novel with its return of the suppressed unconscious as a "sublime" offshoot of the sentimental novel (Horace Walpole, Clara Reeve, Matthew Gregory Lewis, Mary Robinson, Charlotte Dacre, Ann Radcliffe) and the Radical or Jacobin novel as the Gothic novel's transposition into the real present-day horror of political persecution by the ancien régime (Robert Bage, Holcroft, William Godwin); the Gothic drama (Walpole, Joanna Baillie); and the Gothic or oriental tale as forerunner of the short story (Walter Scott, Washington Irving, William Beckford). In philosophy, these devels. were paralleled by inquiries into an innate prerational moral and aesthetic sense (Anthony Ashley Cooper, the third Earl of Shaftesbury interpreted by Francis Hutcheson); doubt about the cognitive faculty of reason (David Hume, Immanuel Kant); exploration of the origins of the incomprehensible and dark Longinian *sublime as a core of the Gothic (Edmund Burke); and concern with interiority, the human psyche, *sensibility, and innate *taste (Adam Smith, Alexander Gerard). The direction of all these devels. was retrospective, primitivist, and nostalgic, because of a growing fatigue with the "tyranny of reason" in Enlightenment philosophy, neoclassical art, and the Church, as well as the state embodied in the ancien régime. Thus, philosophy and poetry began to clash long before John Keats praised the poet's *"negative capability."

In Britain, the call for "liberation" in favor of *imagination, *fancy, passion, and *wit was the earliest of all, beginning even before the year of the Restoration (1660). This developing awareness was due to the Eng. self-reinvention as a nation of liberty against the French as a "nation born to serve" (Alexander Pope), the tenacity of Scottish primitivism (Ramsay), the Protestant Nonconformist call for variety in contradistinction to the Anglican ideal of uniformity, and the disastrous consequences of the Agricultural and Industrial Revolutions, such as deserted villages, destroyed landscapes, and overpopulated slum cities. The Dissenters were a driving force both of preromantic poetry (as in the Bluestocking Circle), women's liberation (Mary Wollstonecraft, Mary Hays), and the Radical or Jacobin demand for liberté, égalité, fraternité (Anna Seward, Helen Maria Williams, Amelia Opie, Joseph Priestley). In their Radical youth, even high romantic poets of Anglican origins were deeply influenced by the culture of Dissent (William Wordsworth, S. T. Coleridge). In its growing recognition of its own limitations, Enlightenment rationalism and neoclassicism (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS) unwittingly advanced the cause of romanticism. Thus, Shaftesbury opposed his teacher John Locke by pleading for an innate moral and aesthetic sense in unison with reason, a sudden sense of virtue and beauty in an elegant, sensitive "virtuoso," later interpreted as "man and woman of feeling" in the Scottish Enlightenment "moral sense school" (Hutcheson, Smith, Hume, Adam Ferguson). Dominique Bouhours and Pope admitted the existence of *"je ne sais quoi de beau," graces "beyond the reach of art." Thus, Nicolas Boileau translated and wrote a commentary on Longinus's Peri hypsous (On the Sublime). Lowth's and Burke's subsequent insistence on the indispensability of a sensitive poet's "sublime sentiments," inspired by infinity and incomprehensibility, shifted the distinction of poetry and prose from a formally manufactured sublime style (genus sublime) to what Wordsworth was to call "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings." Entgrenzung, breaking the narrow limits of reason and artifice in favor of imagination and spontaneity, promoted religious enthusiasm and Pietism (John and Charles Wesley, George Whitefield, Nikolaus Ludwig Graf von Zinzendorf). Against the grain of the Enlightenment, it initiated the exploration of the unconscious in dreams and visions brought about by reveries in nocturnal churchyards, charnel houses, or decaying Gothic or dark neo-Gothic mansions (Walpole's Strawberry Hill and Beckford's Fonthill Abbey) and by natural or drug-induced sleep (Walpole, Beckford). The Enlightenment concept of *nature, the rational design of a unified and finished natura naturata as promulgated by Isaac Newton and Pope, was gradually replaced by the concept of an ever dynamically growing, decaying, and self-regenerating natura naturans. This new concept of nature found expression in a cult of growth and decay opposed to Pope's "unchanged and universal light." It included literary *fragments, a revival of Gothic against Palladian architecture (Walpole), the invention of the Eng. landscape garden (William Kent) ranking variety above unity, and the creation of other anticlassical styles suggesting natural variety and growth (*rococo, Chippendale, chinoiserie). Gothic buildings breaking all cl. proportions were seen much as Sterne's Tristram Shandy (pub. in 9 v., 1760–67) was read: unfinished heterogeneous works of art in statu nascendi. With this revaluation of a freely growing nature hardly controlled by gardeners and a freely floating imagination hardly controlled by reason, cultural, chronological, and aesthetic *primitivism was pitted against progressivism.

Neoclassical advocates of the cl. trad. satirized preromanticism's popular cult of "morbid" literary sensibility—demonstrated by the case of Thomas Chatterton. Such sensibility was widely promoted by the abolition of the perpetual copyright of booksellers in 1774 and by the introduction of a postal system in Britain. Neoclassicists also derided preromanticism's shift of emphasis from the cultural center of London to the rural margins of the British Isles, esp. Scotland and Wales, and later to the Lake District. James Macpherson's construction of a Scottish national past in his Ossianic forgeries (pub. 1760–62) with their lang. of sensibility imitated from OT Heb. poetry naturally provoked the enmity of Samuel Johnson, who went to Scotland and the Hebrides to prove the fraud and to deride such primitivism, in opposition to his Scottish companion James Boswell, whose account of the tour of 1773 differs sharply from Johnson's. Many Britons, who suspected the fraud, would yet believe in the poems' authenticity (John Home), and Ossianism became a Eur. literary fashion undercutting the Enlightenment and cl. trad. With its integrative egalitarian character, sensibility—as opposed to distinguishing reason—fostered a wave of women's liberation as well as abolition of slavery, promoted esp. by women (Hannah More, Ann Yearsley). The revaluation of OT poetry as lit. challenged the neoclassical concept of a universally valid Augustan norm of refinement by postulating the existence of other, equal or superior aesthetic values, even as it demolished the neoclassical concept of a chiefly formal distinction between prose and poetry, thus creating the rhythmic *prose poem (Christopher Smart).

PRESENCE. Presence as expected and enjoyed by readers of poetry has a spatial more than a temporal dimension: it is related to the kind of presence we mean when we say that someone who enters a room "has presence"—a bodily reaction, a sudden feeling of immediacy with things that had been remote, even a desire to touch the world. Poetry can make things "present" not exclusively in the sense of bringing them back from a past into which they were receding but also "present from the future," in the sense of an anticipation, and "present," above all, suggesting that whatever has this quality can be touched and touches the reader.

Most likely, the indestructible, unavoidable, and today much overlooked presence of poetry comes from the same energy that premod. cultures drew on when they crafted prosodic lang. for prayers and *charms. While the feeling of such presence has long been familiar to readers, critics began only recently to explain how presence originates in what we call poetic *form or *artifice, e.g., in *lines, *rhyme, *stanzas, and *rhythm. For instance, none of the analyses that characterize the past century of crit. concerning the work of Charles Baudelaire—neither Walter Benjamin, Roman Jakobson, Erich Auerbach, nor P. de Man—have paid attention to the presence dimension in poetry. To describe this dimension is still a precarious conceptual operation but nonetheless is worthwhile for the promise of answers to unresolved questions about the functions of poetic form.

As manifested on the syntactic level, poetic form often involves structures of highly symmetrical distribution and arrangement that we call meter* or verse. As a matter of *performance, poetic form is realized as rhythm and rhyme, phenomena that we can hear and feel as bodily experience organized into a pattern (and for present purposes, the difference between the effects of rhythm and those of rhyme are immaterial). From a certain level of complexity, *sound *repetition entails a conjuring and presence-producing function. Two properties of rhythm are decisive for this capacity to produce presence effects. In the first place, what we call rhythm can be a response to the challenge of how, phenomenologically speaking, temporal objects in the proper sense can have a form. Second, "rhythms" make up for one basic type of relation through which systems can be coupled to each other; rhythms are, in this sense and according to Luhmann, the consensual domain of "first-order couplings," couplings that are nonproductive because they leave unchanged the systems that they bring together. To illustrate the effects of presence as a dimension of poetry, this article follows the double—phenomenological and systems-theoretical—inspiration, in full awareness that it is one of several conceptual programs that can help in this project of poetic reflection.

Regarding the first of the above-mentioned properties of rhythm, why is it a problem at all for a time-object in the proper sense to have a form? We can define form as the simultaneity of self-reference and outside reference: a quadrangle, e.g., simultaneously points to itself and to the space outside itself. Once the shape that defines the quadrangle starts moving, however, it becomes a time-object and, thus (unless this movement is sheer expansion or contraction), it no longer has the stability of a form. But a moving form can acquire such stability on a higher level if the sequence of changes that it runs through is recurrent, returning to the quadrangular form, e.g., then departing from it again in the same way it departed before, and so on. Because of repetition, a rhythm suspends the open progression of change that belongs to time-objects without rhythm, incl. any kind of lang. without prosodic form.

It may well be this suspension of temporal progression and the constant change of prose lang., as a background, that accounts for the impression that rhythmic lang., e.g., the lang. of a charm, establishes a relationship of immediacy with—can "make present again"—discrete moments of the past: a relationship of epiphany, of divine intervention, of personal bliss. It is as if the temporal progression suspended and frozen through rhythm becomes a vacuum that tends to attract and to absorb parts of the past. This conjuring power of prosodic lang., as lang. with form quality, may also explain its mnemonic function, i.e., the fact that we recall more easily any meaning that is cast into verse. The conjuring function of poetry, however, is not exclusively related to recovering things from the past. Any modification of what we consider the normal flow of time can be relevant here. In Gottfried Benn's probably most famous poem, "Asters" (1937), e.g., "incantation" and "spell" as functions of the poem are associated with an effect that Benn describes as "hesitation": "Asters, and days that smolder, / Old incantation, spell, / The gods hold the scales in balance / A hesitant moment still."

Second, rhythm is the medium, the "consensual domain" of two (or more) systems linked in a first-order coupling. First-order couplings are nonproductive, i.e., system (1) triggers a state in system (2) that triggers a different state in system (1) that triggers a different state in system (2) and so forth, until system (1) returns to its original state and both systems go through the same sequence again. What we call languages, by contrast, belongs to the level of second-order couplings. They demonstrate a different type of consensual domain, in which the interaction between systems is productive, i.e., it brings to the fore new, unprecedented states in both systems that, at a certain level of complexity, can become self-reflexive and, hence, self-descriptive. This is the reason that we always expect "language" to have a content, a meaning, semantics, a descriptive relationship to the world of which it is a part. Now, this view not only implies that meaning and rhythm are heteronomous and casts a skeptical light on all theories of poetry (like the theory of overdetermination) that have claimed prosody to "supplement" or "structure" content. Our insight indeed suggests that a tension exists between first-order and second-order couplings, between meaning and rhythm, between meaning effects and presence effects. Instead of bringing together meaning effects and presence effects into some kind of harmony, poetry always produces situations of oscillation between them. The listener or reader of poetry cannot be on both sides of this oscillation at the same time, on the presence side and on the meaning side, with equal *attention. Surprisingly, lit. crit. has never had much to say about this oscillation. Sympathetic descriptions tend to come from outside this narrow academic field, among them Paul Valéry's description of poetry as "hesitation between sound and sense" or H. G. Gadamer's insistence, toward the end of an intellectual life completely dedicated to the philosophical bases of meaning identification, that poetry was about not only "propositional content" but sound and *voice (Gadamer uses the Ger. word Volumen here).

In those moments when our predominant attention is on the presence side, words, verses, and stanzas function as sound material that touches our bodies. This is why poems are sometimes appealing as sound structures even to those who do not understand the lang. of which they are made. Empirically speaking, such foregrounding of the material side of lang. seems to have an affinity with the conjuring function of poetry. Charms can function independently of being understood by those who use them—as long as their words and verses are pronounced in what is considered to be the correct way. Names are often functionally equivalent to prosodic form, inasmuch as they establish a relation of immediacy with the—always individual—objects to which they refer. This functional equivalence probably explains why sound quality is particularly relevant for names. Rhythmic sound and names as conjuring devices come together in those OHG charms that give away (or hide) a secret name through which whoever recites the charm might sometimes gain power over supernatural beings.

Without any doubt, the presence effects and the presence functions of poetry have receded each time that its predominant modes of circulation and reception turned to script, print, and silent reading. Yet the conjuring power and the oscillations between meaning and presence never completely vanished from Western poetry. In this sense, it is remarkable that, as we know today, the historical transition to *prose poems and to *free verse during the 19th and 20th cs. did not become a threshold without return; the fact that poetic form long survived the historical transition from ms. to print, from *recitation to silent reading, suggests indeed that the conjuring power of poetry within the Western trad. never completely faded. This rigor of poetic form, far from having disappeared, seems to attract a renewed fascination today, in combination and coordination with music and through innovative forms of recitation. Because of the often exclusive concentration on the *hermeneutic level, i.e., the dominance of *interpretation as the attribution of meaning in the humanities, lit. crit. seems to have fallen behind such contemp. devels. in the production and reception of poetry. A return to recitation as an in-class practice might be a step back in the right direction.

PRIAMEL (Ger.; Lat. praeambulum, "prelude," "introduction"). The term was conceived to designate a subgenre of epigrammatic poems composed primarily in Germany from the 12th through the 16th cs. and characterized by a series of seemingly unrelated, often paradoxical statements cleverly brought together at the end, usually in the final verse. Numerous collections survive, but the author most noted in the genre is the 15th-c. Nuremberg poet Hans Rosenplüt. The first scholars to study the priamel not as a form of the Spruch but as a separate genre were G. E. Lessing and J. G. Herder in the 18th c. The first to study the form of the priamel in world lit. was Bergmann, who, however, restricted his survey to didactic verse (e.g., Proverbs 30.21–23).

In cl. studies since the pioneering work of Dornseiff and the dissertation of his student Kröhling, the term priamel refers to a poetic (and rhetorical) form that occurs throughout Greco-Roman poetry but has received the most attention in connection with Pindar (Bundy) and Horace (Nisbet and Hubbard). As it is currently defined, the priamel consists of two basic parts: the foil and the climax. The function of the foil is to introduce and highlight the climactic term by enumerating or summarizing a number of other instances that then yield (with varying degrees of contrast or analogy) to the particular point of interest or importance. A brief example is Sappho, frag. 16.1–4: "Some say an array of cavalry, others of infantry, and others of ships is the most beautiful thing on the black earth, but I say it is whatever a person loves." Here various military arrays are foils to the real subject of the poem, "whatever a person loves." There are hundreds of examples in Gr. and Lat. poetry.

Recent studies refine our understanding of how the priamel functions differently according to genre: Davies shows how Euripides' Cyclops transforms the tragic topos into a comic tool; Compton-Engle notes that Aristophanes uses the priamel as a mock-tragic device in the Acharnians. Increasingly, scholars acknowledge and discuss the use of the priamel in mod. lit. Holzinger and Ramajo Caño trace the devel. of the priamel in Sp. Golden Age poetry. Race (2000) explores the use of the priamel in the work of two 20th-c. Am. poets, Richard Wilbur and Raymond Carver; a further study of Carver's use of the priamel is Kleppe. Other examples can be found in Shakespeare (sonnet 91), Charles Baudelaire ("Au Lecteur"), W. B. Yeats ("An Irish Airman Foresees his Death"), and W. H. Auden ("Law Like Love").

PRIAPEA. In Alexandrian Gr. and in Lat. poetry, short erotic poems honoring the god of fertility, Priapus. Euphronius of Chersonesus is traditionally said to be the inventor of the priapeum, but it was Leonidas of Tarentum who set the fashion in the 3d c. BCE. Such poems use a distinctive meter called the Priapean, consisting of a *glyconic and a pherecratean separated by a *diaeresis. This was used by Anacreon and other Gr. erotic poets and is also found in dramatic poetry, esp. the chorus of satyr plays. In Lat., it is found in Catullus (e.g., 17.1) and in the anonymous Priapea, of which some 80 examples survive.

PRIMITIVISM. The idealization of another culture, whether described as ancient, savage, premod., or wholly "other," that reflects writers' attitudes toward their own historical moment and their culture's relation to itself. Primitivism can be understood as a form of nostalgia: a desire for lost origins perceived as foundational for, or preferable to, the idealizing culture.

Primitivism is not particular to one period, region, or style but encompasses a number of contradictory tendencies: the primitive mind as nonrational (violently savage or innocently childlike); the space of nature (unruly threat or harmonious Eden); the primitive as feminine (seductively exotic or willingly passive); primitive society (debased origin of or redemptive cure for capitalist modernity). Many lits. celebrate or lament a distant past, e.g., the *topos of a golden age in cl. and Ren. poetry. However, the discourse of primitivism in its mod. usage originates in the 18th-c. Enlightenment and the attendant rise of Eur. colonialism, which enabled increasing contact with non-Western cultures in Africa, the Americas, and Oceania. Michel de Montaigne's "Des Cannibales" and Denis Diderot's Supplément au voyage de Bougainville are inspired by early accounts of Brazil and Tahiti. Jean-Jacques Rousseau speculated on "savage" state and the "noble savage" in his two Discours, which influenced 18th- and early 19th-c. lit. Friedrich Schiller celebrated the "naïve" perfection of both childhood and Gr. poetry in "Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung" (1795–96; see NAÏVE-SENTIMENTAL); J. W. Goethe's Leiden des jungen Werthers (1774) typifies Sturm und Drang* lit. (and Eng. *"sensibility") in its ascription of intuitive wisdom and a fuller emotional life to women, children, and peasants. William Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge celebrated the "elementary" qualities of rustic life and lang. and "primal" emotional experience of rustics, children, and the mentally deranged (Lyrical Ballads, 1798, 1800, 1802). Primitivism accounts in large part for the romantic and Victorian poets' interest in the Middle Ages, in Gr. antiquity, in "Oriental" cultures and societies, and in the Am. Indian. In the 20th c., the rise of comparative anthropology (Franz Boas, J. G. Frazer) and mod. psychology (Sigmund Freud, C. G. Jung) gave primitivism renewed force as an instinctive, primal impulse in the individual and collective unconscious. Modernist poets (W. B. Yeats, Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, R. M. Rilke, W. C. Williams, D. H. Lawrence, H.D.) deployed primitivism to shatter earlier conventions of poetic beauty and refinement and to critique the pretenses of mod., bourgeois civilization. Poets affiliated with *surrealism and *Dada experimented with "automatic writing" and self-consciously primitive poetry. More recently, Brit., Ir., and Am. poets appeal to the notion of the artist as shaman (as in Ted Hughes, W. S. Merwin, Gary Snyder, and Seamus Heaney) and tap into deep ecology.

Primitivism's imperialist hist. has produced a range of responses among postcolonial and multiethnic poetries. In the early to mid-20th c., poets of the *Harlem Renaissance (Langston Hughes, Jean Toomer, Claude McKay) and *Negritude (Aimé Césaire, Léopold Sédar Senghor, Birago Diop) claimed the constitutive modernity of pan-Af. cultures and relocated imperial assumptions about race within the West. Primitivism has been further complicated by contemp. poetries informed by *postmodernism and *poststructuralism. Poets from the Caribbean (Louise Bennett, Derek Walcott, Kamau Brathwaite), the South Asian diaspora (A. K. Ramanujan, Daljit Nagra), Africa (Christopher Okigbo, Okot p'Bitek), Ireland (Eavan Boland, Paul Muldoon), and Native America (Leslie Marmon Silko, Joy Harjo, Sherman Alexie) wryly appropriate primitivist discourse by adopting *irony, *satire, *pastiche, and *parody both to mock primitivism and to question the artificial bases for separating the mod. from the primitive, West from non-West, masculine from feminine, self from other.

The endurance of primitivism registers the continuation of the notion of "modernity" (and with it the ideals of reason, technological progress, political freedom, diachronic time, and civilization itself) as it also undergoes transformation in its supposed origins, meaning, and historical and geographic reach. Like modernity, primitivism is a fundamentally discursive construction, produced primarily through a crisis in the time and location of its enunciation, and hence capable of taking on new meanings in shifting contexts.

PROEM, Sp. proemio, Fr. proème. A poem or lines of poetry that introduce a longer poetic work, or sections of a long poem, often characterized by such gestures as invocation and dedication. Proems may be differentiated metrically or visually from what follows. The proem originates in cl. *epic and is typically associated with that genre but, from the 14th c., is often synonymous with prologue in Eng. and also denotes a prose preface to nonpoetic works. Petrarch's first *sonnet in the Canzoniere is perhaps the most famous and widely imitated proem in any Western vernacular; Philip Sidney's first sonnet in Astrophil and Stella (1591) is probably its counterpart in Eng.

PROJECTIVE VERSE. The term derives from the title of Charles Olson's 1950 *manifesto, one of the most influential statements in Am. *poetics since World War II and widely reprinted as a starting point for innovative poetry in the period. Olson and his associates advanced an alternative to what they saw as the dominance of an unambitious and formally conventional poetry that ignored the creative possibilities opened up by the modernist experimentation of, among others, Ezra Pound, W. C. Williams, and Louis Zukofsky. Projectivism's organicist view of poetic form can be traced back to S. T. Coleridge's distinction between "Form as proceeding" and "Shape as superinduced," and in Am. poetry to R. W. Emerson's call for "not meters but a meter-making argument" and the claims of Walt Whitman's Preface to the first ed. of Leaves of Grass. (The masculine nature of the projective verse trad. has become one object of scholarly analysis.)

In Olson's essay, projective verse rests on a set of distinctions between a "closed" poetry, shaped by the dictates of page-based traditional forms, and an "open" or "projective" poetry, shaped by the individual poet's breath and physiology. Olson goes on to develop the "kinetics," "principle" and "process" of projective verse, or "composition by field." He uses "kinetics" as a metaphor for the poem as a "high energy-construct," a means for transferring the poem's originating energy from writer to reader. The central "principle" of projective verse as a poetics is the subsequently influential—though not, in itself, original—aphorism that "form is never more than an extension of content." The "process" by which this kinetic transfer occurs is that "one perception must immediately and directly lead to a further perception," in a mobile line and syntax through which the poem establishes its own form in the exploratory, unpredictable act of writing. The poet must be wary of *similes, adjectives, and description generally as slowing this process and be willing to break *syntax open, since it imposes restrictive logical conventions on thought. The implications of projective verse for *prosody include intensive attention to details of *sound (at the syllabic level) and to the *rhythm of the breath-based line. Olson extends his formal concerns into the epistemological realm in arguing that projective verse involves a "stance toward reality" that he labels "objectism": "getting rid of the lyrical interference of the individual as ego," an ethically antihumanist move to take poetry beyond mere self-expression into more culturally capacious realms of statement. A final, crucially influential component of Olson's essay emphasizes the opportunities afforded by the typewriter for experimenting with the space of the page, as an active formal element in the poem and as a score for *performance and an indicator of the poet's breath patterns.

Following Olson's essay, projective verse became a catchall term for a wide range of poetic practices extending into the 1970s (and in some cases, well beyond) that emphasized organic form, orality, breath and the body, and the poetics of process. Variations on these principles mark the poetics of many poets associated with the New American Poetry (the nexus of poets gathered in the Allen anthol. of the same name), and esp. those of the *Black Mountain school. Thus, the term played a central role in the so-called anthol. wars of the early 1960s, the poetic debates between the early postmodernists of the New American Poetry and their more stylistically and intellectually traditional contemporaries. At the same time, there is no definable group of poets that can be accurately referred to as the projectivist "school," despite some critics' use of that term.

The practice of projective verse among this postwar generation of experimental poets proved important for the Language poets, who were influenced by the formal adventurousness and cultural ambition of their predecessors but felt compelled to counter the oral emphasis within their work and its implications of unmediated *presence. *Language poetry moves away from the projective emphasis on voice and embodied presence toward a poetry that foregrounds the materiality of lang., of the written word rather than the oral; that sees poetic form as constructed rather than organic and expressive; that takes the poet's voice as more multiple and socially embedded than projectivism sometimes allows for; and that takes as a central subject questions of reference that projectivism often leaves unexamined. Thus, projective verse has left a powerful legacy not simply through its own practice but also in the questions it has provoked for later poets.

PROMOTION. Because of our tendency to perceive alternation in lines of metrical verse, a reader/performer will often sense that an unstressed word or syllable carries a *beat, or *ictus, thus fulfilling a metrical expectation ("this is pentameter" or "these are four-beat lines"). Such "promotion" of an unemphasized element to one carrying a beat is experienced when two conditions exist. Derek Attridge describes the first condition in this way: "An unstressed syllable may realize a beat when it occurs between two unstressed syllables."

E.g., in William Wordsworth's tetrameter line "I wandered lonely as a cloud" the "as," between the unstressed syllables "-ly" and "a," remains unemphasized but is promoted to realize the expected meter. A prose expectation would likely produce only three emphases, on "wan-," "lone-," and "cloud," with "ly-as-a" run together. When Hamlet refers to "The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," metrical expectation of a pentameter will promote "of" to a beat—though without a trace of added emphasis.

A second condition of the Attridge rule for promotion is this: "An unstressed syllable may realize a beat when it occurs with a line-boundary on one side and an unstressed syllable on the other." This kind of promotion is often noted at the endings of metrical lines, as when, in John Milton's Paradise Lost, Beelzebub finds himself "Here swallowed up in endless misery," with an unemphatic "-ry" completing the pentameter; or when Matthew Arnold concludes the first stanza of "Dover Beach" with a promoted "in," as the waves bring "The eternal note of sadness in."

Promotion thereby allows unemphasized syllables to help convey, within a familiar metrical pattern, Wordsworth's casual wandering, Hamlet's equal balancing of weapons and fate, and both a fallen angel's and Arnold's spiritless resignation.

PRONUNCIATION (Lat. pronuntiatio, "delivery"), one of the five *canons of cl. rhet. originating in Aristotle's Rhetoric and formalized in Roman treatises on rhet. Originally, pronunciation was distinct from elocutio (*style). Pronunciation treats the manner of vocal and physical execution: *pitch, *accent, volume, phrasing, posture, gesture, and countenance. Cl. categories in Ren. rhetorical and pedagogical theories were inherited largely from Cicero and Quintilian. Around the turn of the 13th c., Matthew of Vendôme in Ars versificatoria (ca. 1175) and Geoffrey of Vinsauf in Poetria nova (ca. 1210) applied Ciceronian rhetorical theories to poetry. Countenance, gesture, and voice conditioned med. audiences' reception of recited poetry, creating an experience of the literary text different from that of mod. readers (Rowland). In the early 16th c., pronunciation more frequently describes poetry's oral delivery; see Stephen Hawes's The Pastime of Pleasure (pub. 1509).

Despite theories of "proper" Eng. and other pronunciations since before the 15th c., pronunciation was unsystematically theorized as a rhetorical category through the Ren. In The Book Named the Governor (1531), Thomas Elyot remarks on Eng. neglect of the canons of elocution and pronunciation. By the middle of the 16th c., the study of physical delivery concentrates on the ling. physiology of pronunciation; Thomas Wilson in The Art of Rhetoric (1553) foregrounds the role of the "tongue, or voice" in audible and persuasive speaking.

Wilson recommends that youth, or those otherwise lacking a "strong" natural voice, imitate exemplary pronunciation to attain fluency in standard Eng. The Art of Rhetoric emphasizes pedagogical training and methods of remediating pathologies of pronunciation resulting from an accent, nonstandard articulation, or improper use of countenance or gesture. Another treatise on poetry in the Eng. vernacular, George Puttenham's Arte of English Poesie (1589), prescribes that Eng. be pronounced in the fashion of the court or within London and a 60-mile radius. The Arte instructs the courtier in counterfeiting, or dissembling in both speech and countenance, to obtain royal favor.

Pronunciation retains its cl. meaning in the Defence of Poesy (1595), where Philip Sidney uses it to denote the delivery of public oration. By the 17th c., however, to pronounce often means simply to speak, though it frequently refers to poetic utterance. The 17th c. sees the rise of orthoepy, the study of correct pronunciation; John Wilkins is a leading figure in this domain, as in other areas of early mod. ling. science. Elocution increasingly subsumes pronunciation, as Obadiah Walker's Some Instructions Concerning the Art of Oratory (1659) includes pronunciation, *recitation, and action under discussion of "elocution." Also in the 17th c., the study of gesture branches from that of oral delivery, though it still couches its analysis in the lang. of verbal pronunciation: see John Bulwer's Chirologia: or, the Natural Language of the Hand and Chironomia: or, the Art of Manual Rhetoric (1644). In the 18th c., pronunciation no longer designates a category of rhetorical delivery encompassing gesture but is limited to its mod. sense of "sounding of the words" (see Thomas Sheridan, Lectures on Elocution, 1762). Sheridan was a prominent figure of the 18th-c. elocutionary movement, so named because pronunciation had by then acquired specialized meaning in studies of orthoepy and phonation. The division between pronunciation and gesture holds in rhet. (see John Mason's An Essay on Elocution: or, Pronunciation, 1757), as well as dramatic performance: Charles Gildon's The Life of Mr. Thomas Betterton (1710) characterizes the complementarity of "pronunciation" or "utterance" and "gesture" or "action" as the actor's "eyes and hands" are the "Principal Helps of Pronunciation." John Walker's Elements of Elocution (1799) defines pronunciation "in its most limited sense" as the utterance of discrete words but, "in its largest sense," as words in "connection" with one another; thus, the domain of pronunciation overlaps with that of elocution or the sounding of sentences and longer discourse. (See also Walker's Critical Pronouncing Dictionary [1791], a genre that continues through the 20th c.) Early 20th-c. phonetic and phonological analyses of Eng. pronunciation intended for pedagogical training include Daniel Jones's The Pronunciation of English (1909), which uses phonetic transcription of literary examples to model the sounds of standard Eng. *Rhyme in poetry has also provided evidence of original vocal pronunciation in earlier periods (Wyld). For a historical phonology of Eng. in the 16th and 17th cs., see Dobson's two-volume study (1968).

PROPHETIC POETRY. The prophet-poet claims to be the conduit of supernatural *inspiration to a human audience. The source of this inspiration may be immediate (e.g., a direct message from some divine being) or the last link in a causal chain of inspiration that has passed through a series of prophets. Prophetic poetry need not be prescient but must appear as a kind of public quotation: it claims to be the utterance not of the poet but ultimately of some supernatural author.

Much of the mod. tendency to see poetry as an expression of "inspiration"—as "prophetic" in a broad sense—arises from the influence of Robert Lowth's examination of biblical metrical arrangement in De sacra poesi Hebraeorum (1753). Before Lowth, the Western poetic trad. had seen the essence of poetry as alternately mantic and nonvatic. Early Heb. commentators were often at pains to separate true prophecy from mere poetry: the two were distinct genera, with different social functions and often separate modes of graphic and metrical arrangement. However, Plato's Ion evidenced a strong view in ancient Greece that poetry arose only from inspiration and possession, a view embodied in the verse of the Pythian oracle and still evident at the time of Pindar (see FUROR POETICUS).

When the Gr. and Hebraic trads. filtered separately into Christianity and, ultimately, Eng.-lang. poetics, tension between the concepts of poetry and prophecy continued. If Philip Sidney could, in the Defence of Poesy, look to the Roman vates* and Gr. oracles as ideal poetic models, less than a century later Thomas Hobbes could see prophetic poetry as at best pagan pretension, a position countered by John Milton's expression of prophetic vocation in Paradise Lost. However, Lowth argued that biblical prophecy was, in effect, a species of poetry with principles of arrangement lost in antiquity; consequently, poetry and prophecy had "one common name, one common origin, one common author, the Holy Spirit." Lowth's identification of poetry and prophecy became firmly established in the Eng. poetic trad., contributing to the romantic conception (epitomized in William Blake) that all "true" poetry must be of inspired origin. This attitude has found sporadic expression in the 20th and 21st cs. in (e.g.) *surrealism, *Black Mountain poetry, and *Beat poetry, but these various influences have entailed Western *poetics with at least the vestigial notion that all poetry, even poetry not self-consciously invoking the prophetic trad., contains traces of the divine.

The Eng. poetic trad. is one of many that associate the social function of *poet and prophet. The Sanskrit kavi was a poet in contact with an unseen world, a conception also found in parts of ancient China. The Ar. kuhhan and shu'ara were poet-oracles of supernatural knowledge wielding an authority later expressed in the Qur'an's sura of "the Poets." India's Bhakti and Persia's Sufi poetry both self-consciously insert themselves into a prophetic trad., while Native Am., Polynesian, Af., Central Am., and Siberian cultures have also productively conflated the roles of poet and prophet at various times.

PROSE POEM. The extreme conventions of 18th-c. Fr. neoclassicism, with its strict rules for the differentiation of poetry from prose, are to be blamed—or, depending on one's point of view, thanked—for the controversially hybrid and (aesthetically and politically) revolutionary genre of the prose poem. With its oxymoronic title and its form based on contradiction, the prose poem is suitable to an extraordinary range of perception and expression, from the ambivalent (in content as in form) to the mimetic and the narrative or anecdotal. Let's come down clearly on the side of gratefulness, since the prose poem occasions a rapidly increasing interest. Its principal characteristics are those that would ensure unity even in brevity and poetic quality even without the line breaks of *free verse: high patterning, rhythmic and figural repetition, sustained intensity, and compactness. The short form is a sure model here; otherwise, the prose poem merges with the essay.

Generally speaking, the prose poem represents a field of vision, only to be, on occasion, cut off abruptly. Emotion is contracted under the force of ellipsis, so deepened and made dense. The rhapsodic mode and what Charles Baudelaire called the "prickings of the unconscious" are, in the most interesting examples, combined with the metaphoric and the ontological. So the prose poem aims at knowing or finding out something not accessible under the more restrictive conventions of verse (Beaujour). It is frequently the manifestation of a willfully self-sufficient form characterized above all by its brevity. It is often spatially interesting (D. Scott). For some critics, it is necessarily intertextual (Riffaterre); for others, politically oriented (Monroe). It is, in any case, not necessarily "poetic" in the traditional sense of the *lyric and can even indulge in an engaging wit.

The prose poem is usually considered to date from Aloysius Bertrand's Gaspard de la Nuit (1842), though he was writing prose poems earlier, and to be marked by heavy traces of Fr. *symbolism and conditioned by the stringency of the Fr. separation of genres. Among its antecedents are the poeticized prose verses of the Bible (see VERSET), of cl. and folk lyrics, and of other foreign verse; the poeticized prose of such romantics as Chateaubriand and the prose passages of William Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads; as well as the intermixtures of verse and prose in Maurice de Guérin's "Le Centaure," Ludwig Tieck's Reisegedichte eines Kranken, and Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve's Alexandrin familier. Characteristically, it was the romantics who came to the defense of this hybrid form: Victor Hugo's plea for the mélange des genres (mixture of genres) in his preface to Cromwell is the natural counterpart to Jules-Amédée Barbey d'Aurevilly's apology for the prose poem. A case could be made for certain manifestos (see MANIFESTO) as the natural extension of the prose poem into a form fitted for display.

Perhaps the most celebrated example of the prose poem is Baudelaire's Petits Poèmes en prose, or Le Spleen de Paris (begun 1855, pub. 1869), in which he pays tribute to Bertrand for originating the genre. Baudelaire's texts can complicate *figuration to the point of "figuring us" as reader (Johnson, in Caws and Riffaterre). His "Thyrse" offers female poetic windings and arabesques around an upright male prose pole as the highly eroticized primary metaphor of mixing, while the Petits poèmes themselves are at once anecdotal and intimate, to the point of mixing the self with the subject. Arthur Rimbaud's Illuminations (written 1872–76) celebrate with extraordinary intensity the emergence of poems from less intimate matter, a newness dynamic in its instantaneity, yet the precursor of the aesthetic of suddenness practiced by Hugo von Hofmannsthal in his Philosophie des Metaphorischen—the speed of the metaphor is an "illumination in which, for just a moment, we catch a glimpse of the universal analogy"—and by imagists such as Ezra Pound. Rimbaldian confusion of first- and third-person perspective ("the lyric process of undergoing oneself and the more properly novelistic business of mapping out a behavior," according to C. Scott) sets up, together with his notational rapidity, a kind of vibratory instant. Stéphane Mallarmé's Divagations (begun 1864, pub. 1897) with their intricate inwindings of metaphor, Comte de Lautréamont's Chants de Maldoror (the first canto in 1868, the rest published posthumously in 1879), lush with a sort of fruity violence, André Gide's Nourritures terrestres (Earthy eats, 1897), and Paul Claudel's Connaissance de l'est (Knowing the East, 1900), nostalgic and suggestively pictorial, lead to Paul Valéry's Alphabet (1912), whose form has been compared to what Valéry later calls, speaking of the dual function of discourse, "the coming and going between two worlds" (Lawler).

Elsewhere, the prose poem flourishes with a different cast: early on, in Switzerland, with Salomon Gessner (Idylls, 1756); in Germany, with Novalis and Friedrich Hölderlin, then Stefan George, R. M. Rilke, Franz Kafka, Ernst Bloch, and recently, in former East Germany, Helga Novak; in Austria, Hofmannsthal, Peter Altenberg, and Alfred Polgar; in Belgium, Emile Verhaeren; in England, Thomas De Quincey, Thomas Lovell Beddoes, Oscar Wilde, and the imagists; in Russia, Ivan Turgeynev and the Rus. futurists, esp. Velimir Khlebnikov; in Italy, the cubo-futurists such as F. T. Marinetti (see FUTURISM); in Spain, Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer, Juan Ramón Jiménez, and Luis Cernuda; in Latin America, recently, Jorge Luis Borges, Pablo Neruda, and Octavio Paz; and in Denmark, J. B. Jacobsen.

Modernist writing as practiced in France after symbolism and postsymbolism increasingly problematized the genre; the so-called cubist poets Max Jacob, Pierre Reverdy, and Blaise Cendrars (see CUBISM) each gave a particular slant to the prose poem, emphasizing respectively its "situation," its strangely reticent irresolution, and its simultaneous perceptions. The Fr. surrealists Paul Éluard, André Breton, and Robert Desnos provide a rich nostalgia and revelatory illumination by means of a startling juxtaposition of images; Gertrude Stein's Tender Buttons reaches a height of the lyric and the everyday held in tension, taking its energy from the androgynous. Among recent 20th- and 21st-c. Fr. poets, René Char, Saint-John Perse, and Francis Ponge, and then Yves Bonnefoy, Jacques Dupin, and Michel Deguy prove the sustained vigor of the genre, proved equally in the U.S. (after Walt Whitman, of course), by such prose poets as James Wright, Robert Bly, W. S. Merwin, Russell Edson, John Ashbery, and John Hollander, and such Language poets (after Stein and W. C. Williams) as Charles Bernstein.

PROSE RHYTHM

I. Overview
II. Classical and Medieval
III. Modern

I. Overview. In the Western trad., and in the simplest and most general sense, all prose has *rhythm, at least insofar as lang. itself has shorter or longer rhythms of phonological, morphological, and syntactic structuring. Since rhythm etymologically means "flow," almost any prose that seems to flow may be said to be rhythmic. But if rhythm is taken to refer to grammatical elements—members of equal size or length—disposed at equal distances or delivered with equal or approximately equal timing, then prose rhythm refers to prose wherein rhythmic effect is deliberately sought. Such *ornament or *figuration has been cultivated in nearly all cultures with written records, some of these trads. being very extensive and of great antiquity.

Prose that cultivates rhythmical effects comes in two species: either the patterns are smaller and exact or else larger and inexact. Small and exact prose rhythm strictly controls the number of syllables and patterns of quantity or stress. This includes Gr. and Lat. prose, which is quantitative (see QUANTITY) and regulates the last few syllables of syntactic periods (known as the "terminal cadence" or "clausula"); med. Lat. *accentual verse apparently derived from these Gr. and Lat. accentual forms. Large and inexact "prose rhythm" includes most mod. forms of rhythmical prose, which employ syntactic *parallelism, *anaphora, and *amplification. Such prose has been referred to as periodic, balanced, or Attic style.

Cl. rhet.'s chief purpose was to give figuration to prose utterances in order to enhance recognition, persuasion, and memory. The resultant inventory of sound and syntactic shapes are the familiar rhetorical figures, variously classed as *scheme and *trope. Once a syntactic form was established, such as "reversal" in *chiasmus or "reiteration" in parallelism, it only remained to require an equal number of syllables in each member to make the sequence rhythmical, exactly as in verse. In the terminology of cl. rhet., syntactic phrases or clauses equal in shape or structure are treated under the figure parison; those equal in number of syllables and quantitative pattern are treated under *isocolon.

The most common method for identifying varieties of prose rhythm is by breaking down sentences or phrases into syllables, then analyzing quantitative or accentual patterns by poetic *scansion. Since the structure of any lang. generates rhythmic patterns, statistical analysis can take prosodic patterns as the ground against which to measure variation. Scholars have taken texts, portions of texts, and speech forms as possible grounds for analysis, with mixed results.

II. Classical and Medieval. Prose rhythm was an accepted part of ancient rhetorical theory. Major texts include Aristotle's Rhetoric, Demetrius's On Style, Dionysius's On Literary Composition, Quintilian's Institutio oratoria, and Cicero's De oratore. Aristotle conflates rhythm with periodic structure and treats the rhythm of the whole sentence with that of merely the sentence end or clausula. Neither of these issues is distinguished by subsequent theorists, though they emphasize variety and closely analyze sentence rhythm to produce few regularities other than the marked patterning of the closing syllables (the *cadence) of the syntactic period. Marking the end of the sentence with one of only a small class of fixed patterns is one of the most distinctive laws of rhythmical structure in prose.

The ancients believed the Sophist rhetorician Thrasymachus of Chalcedon (459–400 BCE) was the first to cultivate quantitative patterns in Gr. prose, as did Gorgias and Demosthenes later. Plato uses them in Phaedrus but also objects to and parodies them in the Symposium. After the shift from quantity to accent, Gr. and Byzantine writers cultivated accentual clausulae or cursus. Cicero took the Gr. quantitative system into Lat. and developed a clear system of preferences for clausulae. His example provoked wide imitation by Seneca, Suetonius, Nepos, Quintilian, Pliny, and Tertullian. Cicero's clausulae also showed significant coincidences of accent and quantity. Purely accentual clausulae first appear in the work of the Afs. Minucius and Cyprian in the early 3d c. CE, and by the late 4th c. accentual clausulae supplanted quantitative clausulae altogether. In the 11th c., professional scribes of the Roman Curia took up cursus as an obligatory stylistic feature for papal correspondence. Cursus have three main types:

(1) planus or plain: ´— — ´—
(2) tardus or slow: ´— — ´— —
(3) velox or fast: ´ — — — —´—

which, despite their accentual form, continued to be described by their older quantitative terms: (a) *dactyl plus *spondee, (b) dactyl plus dactyl; (c) dactyl plus dispondee. The two features of cursus are Blass's Law (three or more short syllables in a row are not allowed) and Meyer's Law (the number of syllables between accents must be a multiple of two). Petrarch and Dante were familiar with the cursus, and it is used as evidence to deny Dante's authorship of a famous letter to Can Grande (prefixed to the Paradiso espousing the fourfold method of interpretation).

III. Modern. Strict or clausular prose rhythm did not survive the Middle Ages. Ren. interest in prose developed a full range of rhetorical figuration, as in euphemism and *mannerism, though strict or clausular prose rhythm was not practiced. The most influential rhythmical prose to emerge from the Ren. was that of the Authorized Version of the Bible (1611), which sought to import parallelism, the chief prosodic feature of Heb. verse, into Eng. prose. Deriving from this fountainhead is the trad. of 17th-c. devotional prose, as in John Donne's sermons and Thomas Browne's essays. Many writers after the Ren. employ prose rhythm to great effect, though there is no common critical model for its analysis. During the middle and late 19th c., when scholars were obsessed with defining and codifying cl. and med. prose rhythm, anglophone poets such as Alfred, Lord Tennyson, H. W. Longfellow, and Matthew Arnold experimented with cl. meters in Eng., and their results were often accused of sounding too much like prose. Examples of rhythmic phrases appear in much 19th-c. nonfictional and fictional prose (e.g., "the crystallizing feather-touch; it shook flirtation into love" from George Eliot's Middlemarch). Most scholarly accounts of 20th-c. prose rhythm focus on James Joyce's Ulysses and his engagement with the literary historian George Saintsbury, whose History of Prose Rhythm (1912) scanned prose according to cl. scansion, a practice imitated by contemp. scholars.

PROSIMETRUM. A text composed in alternating segments of prose and verse. The prosimetrum is widely attested in both Western and Eastern lits. and apparently appears worldwide. Typically, the verse portions serve as lyric, emotive, or personal insets within a philosophical or narrative frame, often with connectives between prose and verse sections; but, in fact, there are several varieties still not thoroughly understood: the definitive cross-cultural study remains to be written. Formal variables include whether the sections alternate regularly or irregularly; whether the number and form of the sections are controlled by a larger architectonic structure (i.e., the principle of mixture); whether the one form is a paraphrase of the other and whether by the same author and whether at the same time; whether there is more than one narrator or, if two, whether both speak in both modes or are kept separate; whether the content of the two modes is similarly kept separate (e.g., philosophical versus lyric); whether differing subgenres (philosophy, fictional narratives, drama) differ categorically in structure; and whether variety of meters is required in the verse sections.

In Chinese, prosimetric form is manifested in the fu* (*rhyme-prose; see CHINA, POETRY OF) and in some 10th-c. bianwen (narratives; see CHINA, POPULAR POETRY OF); in Japanese, it is used for the collection of mythical hist. known as the Kojiki (ca. 712 CE); and in Sanskrit, it is a major component of Vedic narrative poetry, as evidenced in the Mahābhārata, the long dynastic *epic containing the Bhagavad-Gitā, among many others. Indeed, some have seen the *lyric itself as emergent from these emotive or sung inserts in epic narratives.

In the West, the earliest exemplars are the satires of the Gr. writer Menippus (3d c. BCE.), from which developed the Lat. satura (later "satire," but originally "medley") and the Satyricon of Petronius; extant too are four Gr. texts in a ms. of the 2d c., two of which seem to be romances. Both *satire and the prose *romance retained long association with prosimetric form. But the central text that established the popularity of the prosimetrum for the Middle Ages was Boethius's De consolatione philosophiae (early 6th c.), five books of alternating, numbered segments called "Metrum" and "Prosa" and set within a larger numerological structure (see NUMEROLOGY). The Consolation moves from emotive complaint to metaphysical contemplation: the male prisoner-narrator and female personified Philosophy speak both the first two metra and the last prosa. Polymetry in the verse segments is emphasized (some two dozen meters). The influence of Boethius's prosimetrum on the later Middle Ages was extensive and prolonged, even though subsequent translators and imitators did not all retain the prosimetric format: the OE Meters of Boethius attributed to King Alfred, the OF trans. by Jean de Meun, and Chaucer's Boece are entirely in prose; the Occitan Boëce (11th c.), the Anglo-Norman Roman de fortune, and the one other surviving ME version are entirely in verse.

Also influential, though less so, was Martianus Capella's De nuptiis philologiae et mercurii (The Marriage of Philology and Mercury), an odd work in nine books wherein the Seven Liberal Arts become the bridesmaids at the wedding of Learning and Eloquence: here the verse insets are arranged irregularly. The prosimetrum was revived in the 12th c. in Lat.—as instanced in Bernardus Silvestris's De universitate mundi (ca. 1150) and Cosmographia, which return to regular alternation of segments and free use of both modes by all characters, and Alan of Lille's De planctu naturae, a complaint on sodomy—and then the vernaculars. Very similar in form are the Occitan vidas* and razos*, biographical story collections incl. poems meant to be sung; these, along with Boethius, influenced Dante. Dante's Vita nuova (1292–93), 31 poems introduced and connected with prose, and Convivio (1304–7), esp. interesting in that one narrator recounts all, the verse segments being, he says, from his own earlier writings. Giovanni Boccaccio's Ameto (1342) provides a frame story in which seven stories are told and seven songs sung, a structure leading directly to the Decameron and Chaucer, where the regular alternation of segments is lost. But it is retained in the pastoral romance, esp. Jacopo Sannazaro's Arcadia (1485; 12 prose segments and 12 verse) and Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1590, 1593), with its inset eclogues and experiments in Eng. quantitative verse (see QUANTITY).

Fr. also explored the prosimetrum: from the 13th c., there are 13 extant OF versions of Boethius, some of them prosimetric. The anonymous author of the 13th-c. Aucassin et Nicolette calls his text a chante-fable* or song-story, showing that the verse segments had moved from lyric into song. This devel. made natural the extension of prosimetric form into med. drama, where inset songs, if occasional, provided relief from dialogue and narrative in prose. Other Fr. prosimetra include Jean Froissart's Prison amoureuse (ca. 1372) and Guillaume de Machaut's Voir dit (1361–65), where prose letters and love poems are set in a verse frame.

Other med. lits. knew the prosimetrum: the Ar. maqāmāt, which originated around 1000 CE; the Celtic epic Taín; some of the Icelandic sagas; and the Turkish epic known as The Book of Dede Korkut. Snorri Sturluson's Edda (ms. early 14th c.) is in prose but includes a 100-meter catalog of Icelandic verse forms. The relations of prose and verse in the Middle Ages were more fluid than today (Curtius); within the range of mixed forms, the prosimetrum is but one hybrid form among several, e.g., rhythmical prose (see PROSE RHYTHM) and rhyme prose. A related genre is the opus geminatum (twinned work), written once in prose and then versified or vice versa, the prose for recitation in church, the verse for private meditation. This takes its origin in the rhetorical doctrine of conversio or paraphrase and emerges in Caelius Sedulius's Carmen paschale and Opus paschale of the mid-5th c., followed by Aldhelm (De virginitate, 60 chs. of prose transformed into a Carmen de virginitate of 3,000 hexameters), Bede, and Alcuin among others.

PROSODIC FEATURE ANALYSIS OF VERSE. A system of metrical analysis developed by Karl Magnuson and Frank G. Ryder in the late 1960s and early 1970s that applies the principles of Prague School distinctive-feature analysis in phonology to metered verse to identify those features that are prosodically (metrically) distinctive. In phonology, distinctive features represent minimal differences between sounds expressed as polar extremes of the same category or the presence or absence of a particular quality. Similarly, the identification of prosodic features is based on the occurrence or nonoccurrence of different types of two-syllable sequences relative to the underlying meter. If two prosodic word-types (e.g., holding/behold) occur in mutually exclusive environments, they are in complimentary distribution and differ in at least one prosodically distinctive feature. Magnuson and Ryder found that certain features occur most often in metrically prominent positions, others in nonprominent positions (labelled x and o, respectively, below). The former support or "affirm" the meter in prominent positions and disrupt or "disaffirm" it in nonprominent positions, the latter the reverse.

Magnuson and Ryder originally identified four prosodically distinctive features in Ger. verse and applied them to Eng. verse: stress (ST) and word onset (WO) affirm prominent positions of the meter, while prestress (PS), assigned to all syllables preceding a stressed syllable within the same orthographic word, and weak (WK) affirm nonprominent positions. The presence or absence of a feature is indicated by a + or − sign:

	o	x	o	x	o	x	o	x	o	x
	Making	a	famine	where	abundance	lies	(Shakesp.)
ST	+	−	−	+	−	−	−	+	−	+
WO	+	−	+	+	−	+	+	−	−	+
PS	−	−	−	−	−	−	+	−	−	−
WK	−	+	+	−	+	+	+	−	+	−

Whereas the "weak" feature (later redefined by Chisholm in lexical terms) is redundant for Eng. (i.e., all +ST syllables are −WK and vice versa), it is distinctive for Ger. On the basis of these features, Magnuson and Ryder formulated prosodic rules that account for the presence or absence of all two-syllable sequences in Ger. and Eng. verse.

At the core of the theory is the concept of a binary relation between contiguous positions of the meter such that the poet's selection in the second position may be constrained as a result of his selection in the first. This principle of loss and recovery of metrical equilibrium places constraints on filling a metrical position when the feature filling the preceding position disrupts the meter. If, e.g., the ST feature occurs in a position that disrupts the meter, it must be followed by at least one feature (ST in the following examples) that "affirms" the meter in the immediately following position:

o x o x o x o x o x
Thy youth's *proud li*very, so gazed on now (Shakespeare)

o x o x o x o x
Die Nacht *schuf tau*send Ungeheuer (J. W. Goethe)

On the basis of prosodically distinctive features, Magnuson and Ryder demonstrate that the metrical relation x-o is more strictly constrained than the relation o-x in both Eng. and Ger.: words such as Eng. holding and (much less frequently) Ger. dränge can occur in the relation o-x, whereas words such as behold and gedrängt are prohibited from occurring in the relation x-o.

Prosodic distinctiveness varies in different langs.: because of the much higher frequency of monosyllables in Eng., WO is distinctive for Ger., but not for Eng. verse. ■ R. Jakobson, G. Fant, and M. PROSODY (Gr. prosodia, originally the musical part of a song, "tune"; later, the marking of accents; Lat. accentus, "song added to speech").

I. Introduction
II. Elements, Structure, System
III. Analysis
IV. Prose and Free Verse
V. Linguistic Prosody and Literary Studies

I. Introduction. Traditionally, prosody is the study of measurable structures of *sound in language and in poetry. Linguistic prosody is concerned with describing and explaining the structure and function of the suprasegmentals in lang., those aspects—pitch, duration, loudness, and juncture—that produce the contoured streams of sound by which the segments are voiced. Literary prosody was traditionally the study of *prose rhythm and *versification. From the 19th c., prosody began a slow expansion toward inclusion of other levels of organization, as verse experimentation, reactions to metricality, and the rise of *free verse shifted importance to qualitative sound (see below), which increasingly performed many of the binding functions of verse design formerly associated solely with *meter. In addition, the visual patterning of verse joined prosody, as the visible aspects of printed poems also performed prosodic functions (see TYPOGRAPHY, VISUAL POETRY). With generative and functional ling., prosody has now come to include the hierarchy of structures, up to the *stanza, built from nonphonological elements affected by the phonological system (see Ross 2008). Since poetry is a verbal design using linguistic material, literary prosody has benefited enormously from the concepts, categories, and analytic approaches of ling. An objective attention to the lang. object, detailed and overarching, enriches the literary critic's apprehension and understanding of aesthetic elements, forms, and processes that work with and on lang. and form.

II. Elements, Structure, System. Prosody belongs to the phonological system, the lowest order system interacting with and affecting the morphological, syntactical, and semantic systems. An influential theory, articulated by Paul Kiparsky (in Fabb et al.), regards prosody in all langs. as characterized by four interactive systems: (1) periodicity, or repetitive patterning in alternating stresses by a set of processes that maintains the periodic return; (2) constituency, or grouping of stresses into feet—strong/weak or weak/strong—depending on the lang.; (3) maximal articulation, or hierarchical grouping into several levels of larger groups, each comprised of smaller bundles, e.g., syllables into words, words into phrases, and (in poetry) feet into half lines, half lines into lines, lines into couplets, and so on; and (4) even distribution, or balancing the phrase or line, by regulating where heavy and light units may be positioned to maintain a sense of equal order (see Lerdahl and Jakendoff for an opposing theory based on a musical metaphor instead of on the constituency metaphor). These systems include the lang. of poetry. Ross (2008) has recently combined these four systems to yield two prosodic structuring systems: sectioning and arraying. The first includes the first three of Kiparsky's systems, and the second speaks to the fourth, wherein the entire system of a poem contains an array of prosodies (elements functioning in and as patterns) distributed in an organized fashion for aesthetic texture and effects. Recalling earlier critics' metaphor for poetic texture as woven tapestry, Ross includes the qualitative structures (segmentals) and sees them as a set of overlays the analyst can look at one by one, group by group, as he or she lays them down over others. Boundaries are then the intersections, the "cusps" of rhythmic shape where the features relevant to poetic meaning and effect are made prominent. These are the areas of density that rise into prominence in the reader's perception to become salient features for interpretation (see Ross).

In addition, Gil and Shoshany and others regard pragmatic and rhetorical features as part of the prosodic system at the higher hierarchical levels.

Sound is produced by the breathing and vocal apparatus of the physical body and is felt as vibration and resonance for semantic, emotive, and aesthetic effects. Temporal and measurable, sound is energy in the form of waves. It becomes meaningful in lang. when perceived by users as consisting of elements and structures of the phonological system. As temporal, the structural units (e.g., feet, phrases) have perceptual *isochrony (though not actual isochrony) and *rhythm. The more rhythmic a passage of lang., the greater the tendency toward isochrony, with metered verse bearing the closest perceptual equivalence among units and groupings of units. The tendency toward isochrony is a feature of lang., but in poetry, the more highly regular the recurrence of units from which a pattern is built, the closer the tendency toward approximation. While some theorists disagree that isochrony operates in lang. testing of perception by actual hearers gives evidence that perception counts as much as actual phonic measurement. What is important is the perception of isochrony, the felt equivalence of time, as in music. Similarly, with sound in written texts, what counts is the perceptual experience of sound "heard" by readers of poetry and rhythmic prose as an approximate equivalence of timing with which a performance's phrasing works as the baseline for expansive expression (Lehiste; Bolinger).

Segmentals are the smallest units of lang., the phones or actual sounds represented somewhat inaccurately in Eng. by the letters or graphemes (though the graph is important in some visual prosody). Phones are the important elements of the segmental patterns in poetry; they make up the figures of speech that are repetitions of sound for the sake of sound (e.g., *alliteration, *assonance, *rhyme), permitting a range of rhythmic expressivity. Suprasegmentals are the components that comprise the measurable production of sound, because they exist in time: loudness (intensity, volume), *duration (length), *pitch (tone or fundamental frequency), and juncture (markers of boundary and linkage among segments and groupings). They are the phonological components of lang., working together in various ways in the different langs. to give shape—contour, grouping, and boundary. They are said to be over (supra) the segments because they are the sound occurring when the various groupings of linguistic segments are spoken. They produce coherence, make meaningful distinctions, foreground information, and indicate where emotional interest lies. The three components of temporal sound—pitch, loudness, and duration—are most often found in combination, but in varying degrees in the different langs. and situations. One of these three components is characteristically dominant in a lang.: e.g., Japanese keeps syllabic length even and the pitch range narrow so as not to be an influence over the syllable, but tonic pitch, as in Chinese, may distinguish the words that otherwise sound and are written the same. By contrast in Eng. a different aspect of pitch—relative change in frequency—is meaningful. Sound prominence in langs. like Eng. is also called *accent or stress. Syllables in the nonprominent range are called unaccented or unstressed. Stress, still the term most frequently used in common parlance, is perhaps the least accurate because of its more general meaning as emphasis or prominence and because of its long association with loudness, which was mistakenly thought until 50 years ago to be the most important factor in realizing prominence. Instead, pitch change (not a pitch) is the most frequent and reliable indicator of prosodic prominence, occurring in 99 percent of cases of prominent syllables, with loudness and/or length also a factor though not always both (see Fry 1955; Ladefoged). Like musical notes, pitch change in lang. can be heard as rises and falls from the pitch level on which nonprominent syllables occur within the range of the specific speaking voice. Loudness and length also change relative to the nonprominent level of voicing, but these can be artificially produced in such a way as to throw the perception off, without a true change in prominence.

When distributed among nonprominent syllables, prominence shapes the sound of lang. The more regular the distribution of peaks, the more rhythmic the lang., with meter defining the extreme of greatest regularity. The suprasegmental system places some syllables into a nonprominent range and thrusts other syllables onto peaks, but a highly rhythmic system will tend to draw the linguistic prominence system into the overlaid poetic system, causing prominence peaks to be promoted or demoted in level (see PROMOTION and DEMOTION). This is the reason meter, which counts only two levels of prominence (strong and weak), and rhythm, which counts more, are distinguished by literary analysts. Most agree that there are four perceptual levels of stress in Eng.: primary, secondary, tertiary, and nonprominent (see RELATIVE STRESS PRINCIPLE; Chomsky and Halle; Halliday; see Bolinger on three- level perceptual system; Gates 1987 on why a three-level system is not always adequate). The prosodic shape that is spread over groupings is called either an accentual, a stress, a prominence, or an intonation contour, depending on what aspects of the prosodic system are under consideration. Chomsky and Halle termed the contour unit the phonological phrase, aligning it with the syntactic phrase, which they believed motivated prominence. The "phrase" is now often thought of as akin to the musical phrase, which distributes the tonal shape of an information unit (Halliday), or as a unit of emotional interest as recognized by the speaker (Bolinger). More recently, there is agreement that information is sectioned into "chunks" because the brain appears to process it that way, in both the making and receiving modes (Ross 2008). The chunks present the way the speaker is thinking about the information's importance as foreground and background. A chunk may have up to five or six prominence peaks, a number which appears to correspond to the brain's processing limit. This limit matches that noticed by Chomsky and Halle, and it matches the upper number of peaks in poetic lines in the world's langs.—besides the pentameter, the line has a strong tendency to group into three and three (*hexameter), three and four (*fourteener), etc. But in poetry, these chunked linguistic groupings coexist with the rhythmic groupings, working sometimes within, sometimes across the established rhythmical set of a poem. The cross-structuring creates potentials for vocal realizations that open up a multivalent, polysemantic verbal design. The dual systems' additional key functions are to indicate poetic *genre; give pleasure; provide cohesion; compose structure; and support, undercut, inflect, and reflect meaning (see ICONICITY, TONE).

The fourth suprasegmental—juncture—gives boundary to syllables, words, phrases, "chunks" and at the same time indicates how they are to be joined. Silence is the aspect of juncture most relevant to poetic analysis, emerging, for instance, in and around *caesura, line ending (pause, *enjambment), and word boundaries that cut across the perception of foot boundaries (e.g., The form was steady, in iambic pentameter, where steady crosses the fourth into the fifth iambic foot). In visual prosody, juncture is often the most prominent of the suprasegmentals, with spacing indicating silence, lack, drama; appearing instead of *punctuation; and functioning in all manner of expressive, rhetorical, and semantic ways.

Qualitative prosody refers to phonic (vs. phonemic) cohesion: e.g., repetition of consonantal sounds, vowel sounds, and groupings of sounds from two phones to syntactic units (e.g., br, str, I saw the, out of the, down from the, Turning and turning). Qualitative sound patterning is rhyming in its broadest sense (Kiparsky in Fabb, et al., for a componential view of rhyme). Whereas quantitative sound patterns are paralinguistic, operating to organize meaning for coherence over a segment of lang., qualitative sound patterns function to provide cohesion among units and groups within a text. Ross (1999) views these two types as "interpenetrating" prosodies. And while linguistic sound systems function largely to gather and focus meaning and tone for communication, when density of features is high enough to foreground lang. itself (Jakobson's *poetic function), rhythm works to restrain linear forward progression, thrusting the mind back on repetition, drawing the reader/auditor away from sense into the flow that is rhythm itself. It is the nature of poetic lang. to move against and counteract the semantic system, and it is the principal characteristic, function, and effect of poetry (Jakobson; Kristeva—both in Cook).

III. Analysis. What literary prosody keeps to the fore is the dialectic between rhythm and code (i.e., between semiotic and symbolic, felt and rational modes). When prosody is left out of poetic analysis and interpretation, what is left is impoverished as aesthetic crit.

The tension created by the pull of a lang. system's features and functions against the way a verbal artist uses, exploits, and pressures the system has been regarded for the past 100 years as the main subject of the study of literature as literature. Variety in prominence levels that pressures the ideal metrical pattern, along with other pressuring features, has been valued since *New Criticism and other varieties of *formalism described and privileged tensive forces in its valuations. While the theory wars and debates over the *canon in the postmod. period gave pause to aesthetic study in the U.S., cognitive stylistics, which studies the way poetic elements, structures, and functions are processed in the mind, has generated a body of research from data on actual readers' understanding that demonstrates how the tensions are created by the semantic associations that all words carry. Words with similar sound features and similar sets of semantic features will create convergence, while words with similar sound features and very different semantic features will create divergence, with a range of lower to higher between these extremes (Tsur). Tension results from aggregates of features that possess varying degrees of sound, semantic, and/or syntactic clash: e.g., in W. B. Yeats's "The Wild Swans at Coole" the rhyming words "rings" and "wings" converge in terms of their grammatical status as nouns, but the shapes of the two objects are divergent: rings are circular and stable, wings are blade-shaped and associated with motion. So there is a satisfaction of similarity in sound and grammar, but also an emotional intensity in the small dissimilarity of the initial phones and the greater clash of the two objects drawn into semantic relation. The lines are thereby texturally entwined, so that they produce an emotional intensity higher than the normative emotional interest a prominence word acquires in the normative intonation/information system of the Eng. lang. (Hollander on "mounting" prominence; Gates 1987 on "surmounting" prominence; Bolinger on the heightening of emotion when the normal pitch range is exceeded).

It could be said that Yeats is making "rings" (in two senses, phonic and semantic) of qualitative sound in end and internal rhymes:

> And scatter wheeling in great broken rings
> Upon their clamorous wings.

The -ing of rings circles back and also chimes with wheeling, and again with wings. And, scat-, and clam- make another cohesive pattern, and Up- and -ous yet another, holding the lines in close relation through assonance, creating the beauty and pleasure of ordering, as in music, while also, some might argue, imitating the repetitive circling of which the lines speak. There is, however, tension as well, in that only some of the syllables rhyme; and in the differing parts of speech drawn together in rhyme. The open vowels, a in great and o in open and clamorous, work contrastively, in tension, with the e and short i sounds to round and open out the sonorous quality of the lines, giving an expansiveness to accompany the repeated closing in of circularity. Morphological, syntactic, and semantic features brought into sound cohesion both unify and clash, initiating perceptual experiences that serve to signal the poetic function of play, of genre, of pleasure, of tension, of meaning (see Tsur; Ross 1999).

IV. Prose and Free Verse. Since lang. has prosody, prosody may be artistically shaped in prose as well as in verse (see VERSE AND PROSE). Ancient Gr. and Rom. orators elaborated at length on how to use rhythm for persuasion in grammar, music, and rhet. (Cicero, Quintilian, Augustine; Aristotle cautioned against too much rhythm; see RHETORIC AND POETRY). The marks of punctuation, capitalization, and paragraphing originated as a graphic system to mark writing for oral performance. Med. writers continued to develop prose rhythm as part of rhet. (e.g., cursus in ars dictaminis and ars praedicandi); rhetorical handbooks included prosody through the 19th c.; and prosodic patterning continues to be taught in some schools as part of prose composition, though without the elaborations of the earlier centuries. Mod. free verse makes use of prose rhythm, beginning with Walt Whitman's 1855 ed. of Leaves of Grass, which, according to one theory, marked breath pauses with dots in the manner recommended by 19th-c. rhetorical manuals (Hollis). In the eds. following the first, Whitman dropped the dot-marking system and used the standard system of punctuation to mark off rhythmic units (Gates 1985). Emily Dickinson used the dash for many junctures in lieu of standard punctuation early on. Stéphane Mallarmé, follower of Whitman's practice and an inventor of the *prose poem, declared that prose did not exist—"There is alphabet, and then there are verses which are more or less closely knit, more or less diffuse. So long as there is a straining toward style, there is versification." Some 20th-c. poets created systems of punctuation for distinctive prosodic styles, in some cases omitting it entirely (e.g., e. e. cummings, W. S. Merwin in some of his work). W. C. Williams wrote in a system of the prose unit he called at first the *variable foot, later revised to the relative measure, which produced cultural, social, and poetic meanings and effects (Cushman 1985; Steele; Gates). The prosodies of dramatists and fiction writers have also been examined as part of their prose styles (e.g., G. B. Shaw, Henry James, Ernest Hemingway, Thomas Wolfe, Annie Dillard). Varieties of free verse range from highly cadenced prose to mixed meters (the majority of free verse today) to prosodies made of the appearance or sounds of graphs and phonemes. The prose poem is without the highly regular prosody of meter, but its qualitative and rhythmic qualities provide the cohesion that meter and narrative give in other genres. The resources of mod. ling. make intensive analysis of these forms possible. As in poetry but in lesser degree, the regularity of prosodic styling in prose and free verse promotes *attention to the qualitative and quantitative sound systems, enhancing perceptual attention, heightening *emotion, and working the felt experience to some effect.

V. Linguistic Prosody and Literary Studies. Ling. continues to develop highly sophisticated understandings of prosody. The structuralists' failed attempt to discover a universal system has been recuperated by a somewhat different inquiry into the possibility of constructing a universal prosody in the form of a set of obligatory and optional rules for poetries in all langs. As with the structuralist project, the effort is yielding detailed knowledge about lang. and poetic systems, whether or not the end goal can be reached. While the literary historian and critic need not know ling. prosody theory, drawing from the systematic knowledge of linguists changes what can be analyzed, and so greatly assists interpretation. To ignore the functions and effects of the sound system is to risk less complete, less insightful understanding.

PROSOPOPOEIA (Gr. prosopon, "face," "person," and poiein "to make"). The speech of an imaginary person.

A term still used for *personification—the attribution of human qualities to animals or inanimate objects—to which it is closely allied. Pierre Fontanier, however, argues, prosopopoeia "must not be confused with personification, apostrophe or dialogism . . . [since it] consists in staging, as it were, absent, dead, supernatural or even inanimate beings. These are made to act, speak, answer as is our wont" (Riffaterre 1985). As a means of making a speech "vivid" or lively, Fontanier's definition agrees with that of the Tudor rhetoricians, who placed prosopopoeia in the list of figures that included prosopographia, characterismus, ethopoeia (which together give us our notions of fictional portraiture); mimesis of gesture, pronunciation, and utterance; and dialogismus or sermocinatio, by which an imaginary person is given the ability to speak. In antiquity, prosopopoeiae were school exercises in which writers took on the persona of a famous historical or mythological figure in a composition with the end of exhibiting his character (cf. Quintilian 3.8.49). At times, however, both rhetorical and poetic theoreticians use prosopopoeia far more expansively to indicate the vivid presentation of something absent or imaginary before the eye and ear. The example given by Quintilian (9.3.89), "Avarice is the mother of cruelty," shows that prosopopoeia exists as a *trope at the basic levels of *metaphor or axiom. Likewise, P. de Man calls prosopopoeia "the master trope of poetic discourse" (1986), because it posits "voice or face by means of language" (1984). Thus, prosopopoeia operates like a mask and is analogous to any adoption of *persona. To address an imaginary person as if present engages the figure of *apostrophe; however, J. Douglas Kneale insists that prosopopoeia is the more appropriate term. Historically, apostrophe is defined as a "turning away" from the primary audience; thus, Kneale argues, unified addresses, such as William Blake's "The Sick Rose," P. B. Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind," and John Keats's "Ode on a Grecian Urn," are all prosopopoeiae because they infer the possibility of reply.

PROTEST POETRY. Like the protest song, protest poetry goes by many names: social, revolutionary, or topical poetry, or occasionally poetry of commitment, or a subgenre of political poetry. However, two things distinguish protest poetry from other poems with political content: a connection to a social movement and a direct and obvious pertinence to events in the immediate present. The 1960s folk singer Phil Ochs's comment that "a protest song is a song that's so specific that you cannot mistake it for bullshit" might easily be extended as a valid if minimal definition for protest poetry as well. Given its formal and geographic diversity, the genre requires this theoretical simplicity; protest poetry can take the form of avant-garde manifestos, testimony, *elegies, or *ballads and is as widespread as the resistance to power that it seeks to articulate. It is primarily a 20th- and even late 20th-c. form; the term poetry of social protest was used to describe Af. Am. poetry of the 1920s, but protest poetry did not reach wide usage and was not often applied to poetry outside the U.S. until the 1960s.

Protest poetry's insistence on topicality has often meant a reduction in its staying power or longevity; once the topics have changed, it may be difficult for later readers to reconstruct the poem's full power. One great exception to this seems to be poems protesting war, which may indeed be the preeminent examples of the genre. Poetry opposing the glamour or glorification of war has a long hist.; one critic roots the trad. in a speech in book 2 of the Iliad by the commoner Thersites, who defies Agamemnon and the Gr. army by ridiculing their insatiable lust for spoils. Most accounts of antiwar poetry, however, identify World War I as the first conflict that elicited strong and general poetic opposition, although most of the widely read poetry opposing the war was written by returning soldiers. Later wars—particularly, for Americans, the Vietnam War—would be protested mainly by civilian poets. In either case, poems opposing a war are among the most famous and long-lasting protest poems and serve, to some degree, as models for other causes.

Protest poets share a common political orientation: they are unambiguously critical of the status quo and the dominant forces in society, and they call for change. This directness has caused some critics to analyze protest poetry in strictly functional terms—isolating its didactic, persuasive, or hortatory elements from any aesthetic considerations. Many have even dismissed the genre as propaganda or agitation, its lack of ambiguity obviating any need for the elaborate formal analysis normally brought to bear on lyric poetry. Other critics, particularly those studying Af. Am. poetry of the 20th c. or the Am. counterculture of the 1960s, have emphasized how the overtly rhetorical elements of the poems frequently depend on complex aesthetic effects and strategies.

Furthermore, the directness required of protest poetry does not preclude *figuration or even *allegory; what is necessary is merely clarity of reference. Little directness is lost, for instance, in the Soviet dissident Osip Mandelstam's "Stalin Epigram" (1933), despite the mannered and somewhat surreal imagery employed: "the huge laughing cockroaches on his top lip, / the glitter of his boot-rims" (trans. W. S. Merwin).

In part, this clarity comes from protest poetry's necessary connection to a social movement, but as one can see from the example of Mandelstam, who died as a prisoner in 1938, this connection is obviously contingent on the degree to which a social movement is capable of forming and voicing its concerns publicly; this may be more difficult under repressive governments than in comparatively open societies. Yet what drives protest poems is the palpable sense of speaking collectively and of addressing a broad social concern, even if it is articulated through the lang. of individual experience or idiosyncratic vision. One might think here of the poem "Incident" (1925), by the *Harlem Renaissance poet Countee Cullen. Depicting a moment when, as a young boy, Cullen smiled at a white boy of similar age and was rebuffed with a racial slur, the connection to the national context of deep and unthinking prejudice needed no explicit invocation. Or one might think of Allen Ginsberg's comic *apostrophe to "America" (1956), a shambolic indictment of America's excesses, foibles, and sins. Through a disjointed slew of pop-culture references, semiparanoid questions that are not quite rhetorical ("Are you being sinister or is this some form of practical joke?"), and allusions to current events and to historical injustices, Ginsberg constantly defers any explicit or specific (realistic) recommendation or demand, emphasizing instead a diffuse personal disappointment, confusion, and frustration with Am. society. "There must be some other way to settle this argument," Ginsberg writes, but the poem withholds that kind of solution. As Ginsberg's poem shows, protest poetry can be only vaguely politically programmatic, diagnosing general social ills without proposing identifiable policies or actions. Many other protest poems however, can be quite direct, specifying discretely contextualized wrongs that can be redressed in an ostensibly straightforward manner—bring the troops home, end apartheid, and so on.

Many protest poems seek to achieve a balance between general or universal social problems and concrete injustices that give the poem immediacy and definition. Frequently, protest poems serve as elegies for the poet's actual or spiritual compatriots who have died in the service of the cause that the poem seeks to call attention to or defend. The Peruvian poet César Vallejo's "España, aparta de mí este cálíz" ("Spain, Take This Cup from Me," 1937), for instance, laments the death of Pedro Rojas, a Republican soldier in the Sp. Civil War; Vallejo honors Rojas individually but also takes him as a symbol of the type of man who would give his life to fighting Fascism or any oppressive regime: "in his body a greater body, for / the soul of the world . . ." (trans. C. Eshleman and J. Rubia Barcia).

In recent years, the international success of *poetry slams has arguably renewed the vitality of protest poetry. While not all slam poetry is written or performed in protest, much of it is politicized, and the slams' competitive performance format has tended to encourage poets to express strong opinions and to draw in their audiences with topical references. Similarly, online communities have served to increase the circulation of poetry protesting the war in Iraq, environmental degradation, and other issues. Poetry also played a prominent role in the revolts of the Arab Spring of 2011, with many crowds using couplets from poets living and dead as rallying cries and street chants. Protest poetry's ability to fuse personal indignation with collective commitment and universal themes with highly specific events promises to keep the genre relevant and useful long into the future.

PROVENÇAL POETRY. See OCCITAN POETRY.

PROVERB. A traditional saying, pithily or wittily expressed. Proverbial expression is traditionally given to customs and legal and ethical maxims, blasons populaires, superstitions, weather and medical lore, prophecies, and other categories of conventional wisdom. Proverbs are among the oldest poetic expressions in Sanskrit, Heb., Germanic, and Scandinavian lits. "Learned" proverbs are those long current in lit., as distinct from "popular" trad. The former come into Western Eur. lit. both from the Bible and the Church fathers and from such cl. sources as Aristophanes, Theophrastus, Lucian, and Plautus. Erasmus's Adagia (1500) was instrumental in spreading cl. proverb lore among the Eur. vernaculars. The first Eng. collection was John Heywood's Dialogue conteining . . . All the Proverbs in the English Language (1546). But proverbs had been commonly used by OE and ME writers, particularly Chaucer. The Elizabethan delight in proverbs is evident in John Lyly's Euphues (1580) and in countless plays—as it is in Shakespeare. The genres of lit. in which proverbs frequently occur are the didactic (e.g., Chaucer's "Tale of Melibeus," Ben Franklin's Way to Wealth, and J. W. Goethe's "Sprichwörtliches"); the satirical (Alexander Pope); works depicting folk characters (Miguel de Cervantes's Don Quixote, J. R. Lowell's The Biglow Papers); works reproducing local or national characteristics (E. A. Robinson's "New England"); and literary tours de force (François Villon's "Ballade des proverbes").

What distinguishes proverbs from other figures such as idioms or *metaphors, Milner proposes, is their structure of "four quarters" in a "balanced relationship . . . both in their form and content." This configuration, evident in Waste / not, / Want / not or Qui seme / le vent / Recolte / la tempete (He who sows the wind shall reap the whirlwind), appears in ancient and non-Eur. as well as in mod. langs. Milner associates this balanced four-part form with Carl Jung's paradigm of the structure of the mind. Milner's analysis, however, is found inadequate by Dundes, who proposes the proverb as "a traditional propositional statement consisting of at least one descriptive element" that consists of "a topic and a comment." Proverbs that contain "a single descriptive element are non-oppositional," while those with two or more "may be either oppositional or non-oppositional." Dundes relates proverbial structures to that of *riddles; however, "proverbs only state problems in contrast to riddles which solve them." Dundes calls for empirical testing of his hypothesis with proverbs from various cultures.

PSALM (Gr. psalmos, "sacred song," "hymn"). A psalm is a sacred song or poem, conventionally describing the chapters of verse comprising the book of Psalms in the Heb. Bible. There are 150 psalms in the Heb. canon, with several more appearing in postbiblical sources such as the Dead Sea Scrolls. Several poems of the psalm type appear throughout the Bible, placed in the mouths of individual or collective prayers.

The poetic form of the psalm, at least as it has come down in the Western literary trad., is an invention of the ancient Near East. Often associated with ritual, the psalm was an important literary medium in Mesopotamia, Egypt, Hatti (Asia Minor), Ugarit (northern Syria), and, one may assume, despite the lack of surviving texts, in Canaan. The psalmists of ancient Israel took over forms from the surrounding cultures, adapting images, phrases, and even whole sequences of lines, but often with an evident polemical purpose: to attribute to the God of Israel those powers and beneficences that others claimed for their gods.

The book of Psalms as we have it is a product of the Second Temple (Hellenistic) period, when various, occasionally overlapping, collections of poems were assembled into a single anthol. The included psalms were composed over a period of several hundred years, the earliest going back to the beginning of the first millennium BCE. While certain diachronic shifts in lang. and poetics are discernible, far more striking are the continuities of *style and *convention. A parade example is the adaptation in Psalms 96 and 98 of an invocation of the "sons of the gods" to render homage to the Lord in the archaic Psalm 29: first, the mythological cohort is replaced by the peoples of the earth; then, the sacrifices they are bidden to offer are replaced by a musical fanfare.

The most common Heb. term for psalm—mizmor—denotes a song sung to musical accompaniment. The earliest Heb. name of the book is "The Book of Praisings," although the word for praise—tehillah—is used only intermittently and serves as the title of only one psalm. Other psalm headings ascribe the poem to King David, the legendary singer of Israelite trad., or to another figure; or they describe the occasion giving rise to the psalm; or they describe the musical mode in which the psalm is to be chanted. In spite of shared terminology, the psalter includes a wide variety of song types. The two predominant genres are praise and supplication, the latter of which features a complaint in need of remediation. Together these make up more than two-thirds of the book of Psalms. Many psalms, however, are of mixed genre and treat diverse situations. Even within one subgenre, there are striking differences in emphasis: a supplication may stress sin and contrition, the speaker's terror in a moment of acute distress, a reflective meditation on human transience, and much else. Among the other genres, such as wisdom meditations and historical reviews, most unusual are royal psalms, which are addressed not to the deity but to the king.

Some of the Heb. psalms are marked for liturgical performance on specified occasions or at specified moments in the temple rite. A view promulgated by Mowinckel and others holds that many psalms were used at an annual New Year festival, when the God YHWH was enthroned as king. There is both internal and external support for this hypothesis. Other psalms seem designed for individual recitation in moments of anguish or exaltation. The double nature of the psalms, alternately collective and personal, thankful and remonstrative, has been a source of their relevance both to the institutional and the individual lives of Jews and Christians ever since.

Poetically, the psalms exhibit a higher degree of convention, *cliché, and patterning than other genres of biblical poetry. A few psalms are cast as alphabetic *acrostics (see ABECEDARIUS). The reader encounters *refrains or refrain-like *repetitions, antiphonal voices, and inclusio or *envelope structures, in which the ending echoes *images, *motifs, or even whole phrases from the beginning (see RING COMPOSITION). The rich *imagery and other sophisticated tropes of Psalm 23 ("The Lord is my shepherd; / I shall not want" . . .) are not characteristic of the psalter as a whole.

Yet the beautifully arranged movements and the archetypal simplicity of style of the biblical psalms have made them a recurrent source of inspiration to later poets. With the resurgence of interest in the Bible after the Reformation, adaptations of psalms became widespread. In France, the versions of Clément Marot are particularly noteworthy. The apogee of psalmodic verse in Western langs. was reached in Ren. England, where the Bible in its new vernacular version became central to the culture. A variety of Eng. poets, from Thomas Wyatt and Philip Sidney to George Herbert and John Milton, tried their hand at metrical versions of psalms. In the signal instance of Herbert, the poet's original production owes something abiding in its diction, imagery, and sense of form to the model of the biblical psalms. Mod. Eng. poetry continues to evince a deep interest in psalms, as in the work of Dylan Thomas and in Donald Davie's To Scorch or Freeze (1988).

PSALMS, METRICAL. The Heb. psalms were rendered into vernacular meters for two reasons, one participatory and the other prosodic, resulting in two trads. of metrical psalms.

Regarding participation, the regular rhythms and line lengths of metrical versions of the psalms promoted singing, whether in public worship or domestic devotions. Recognizing this, Martin Luther, John Calvin, and other Protestant reformers believed metrical psalms effective for spreading doctrine. Among Luther's first publications, metrical psalms quickly spread to France, the Netherlands, England, Hungary, Poland, and much of the rest of Europe. In Great Britain, psalms were translated into Welsh, Ir., Cornish, and Manx. Eng. Separatists emigrating to Am. colonies took metrical psalms along; The Bay Psalm Book (1640) was the first book printed in New England. Following Protestant practice, metrical psalms caught on later in Catholic countries, incl. Italy and Spain, though for private devotion rather than congregational singing. Ger. (Luther, Johann Walter), Dutch (Jan Utenhove), and esp. Fr. (Clément Marot, Théodore de Beza) metrical psalms used in churches were often written in sophisticated verse. In England, a simple *ballad meter (and close variants) became standard for singing-psalms, esp. following publication of the immensely popular psalter versified by Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins (from 1562). George Sandys attempted a poetically more sophisticated metrical psalter (1648), but common meters dominated 17th-c. collections of metrical psalms, incl. the Scottish Psalter (1635) and that of Nahum Tate and Nicholas Brady (1696), which finally supplanted Sternhold and Hopkins in public worship. In the 18th c., Isaac Watts, Charles Wesley, William Cowper, and Christopher Smart transformed common- (now hymn-) meter psalms into fine poetry. Many functional but poetically bland metrical psalters were produced from the 18th to the 20th cs., and metrical psalms are still sung in Protestant churches, sometimes as *hymns.

Concerning *prosody, psalms were also translated into meter because of a misunderstanding about the nature of Heb. poetry. The defining technique of biblical parallelism was not accurately described by Christian scholars until the 18th c.; but from the time of Jerome, psalms had been understood to be poems and (erroneously) the formal models for ancient Gr. and Roman poetry. Accordingly, poets felt the translated psalms should reflect such (notional) formal excellence, so turned them into "poems" according to the norms of their own langs. Early trans. of the psalms into OE verse may reflect this feeling, though the impact of humanist studies on biblical trans., along with poets' recognition that the biblical precedent justified vernacular poetry, made metrical psalms popular. Eng. poets were also inspired to compete with continental psalmodists such as Marot. Thomas Wyatt, the Earl of Surrey (Henry Howard), and George Gascoigne translated psalms into terza rima, *blank verse, and other innovative meters; Richard Stanyhurst and Abraham Fraunce attempted psalms in quantitative verse (see QUANTITY). The psalter begun by Philip Sidney and completed by Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke, was the masterpiece of Eng. poetic psalm trans., containing psalms in most of the lyric forms then available (incl. sonnets, terza rima and ottava rima, *rhyme royal, *acrostics, heroic hexameters, and quantitative *sapphics). The Neo-Lat. metrical psalms of the Scot George Buchanan (from 1556) were internationally acclaimed. Metrical psalms continued to be popular across Europe: powerful poetic psalms were written by John Donne, Thomas Carew, Richard Crashaw, Henry Vaughan, and John Milton; Philippe Desportes, Guillaume du Vair, Jean de Sponde, and Jean-Antoine de Baïf; Luís de León, St. John of the Cross, and Jorge de Montemayor; Luís de Camões; Martin Opitz and Paul Fleming. The vogue waned after the 17th c., but some metrical psalms continued to be written by major poets, incl. in Eng. James Thomson, Robert Burns, Lord Byron, and John Clare. The biblical psalms have continued to attract mod. poets, incl. G. M. Hopkins, Bertholt Brecht, Paul Celan, Geoffrey Hill, and Yehuda Amichai, but they have preferred paraphrase, adaptation, or imitation to trans. proper.

PSEUDO-STATEMENT. Pseudo-statement is used by the 20th-c. Brit. critic I. A. Richards in Science and Poetry (1926), where he describes the term: "A pseudo-statement is a form of words which is justified entirely by its effect in releasing or organizing our impulses and attitudes . . . ; a statement, on the other hand, is justified by its truth, i.e. its correspondence, in a highly technical sense, with the fact to which it points." Richards uses this distinction between propositional statements (which aim to express truth about the external world) and the "pseudo" statements of poetry (which do not) to posit a deeper opposition between poetic lang. (emotive) and scientific lang. (denotative). For him, an identical sequence of words or phrasing would be propositional in scientific lang. but emotive in poetic lang. The function of the poem is not to supply a repertoire of verifiable facts but to impart "a perfect emotive description of a state of mind." What separates the "truth" of poetic pseudo-statement from that of scientific statement is its special ability to organize experience in richly complicated and imaginatively stimulating ways. The whole of pseudo-statement is epitomized by this complex organization of feelings and impulses in the emotive utterance.

Pseudo-statement was debated in Britain and the United States in the 1930s and 1940s. Since the term is equivocal (Murry) and since it privileges the emotive over the cognitive, Richards's formulations did not find favor with a number of critics. Tate, e.g., made the point that poetic value is much more related to "the knowing mind" than to a "projection of feeling." Although Richards continued to be preoccupied with the question of belief and poetry, it appears that, in practice, he ceased to make use of the controversial term. Snow's influential lecture "The Two Cultures" (1959) about the unproductive effects of the separation of sciences and humanities, Northrop Frye's comments about the common structure of discourses in the final chapter of Anatomy of Criticism (1957), together with structuralist and poststructuralist thought in the 1960s and 1970s, all imply that a larger framework of discourse is more productive than the distinction between scientific and emotive lang. Generally speaking, pseudo-statement is best viewed as one of Richards's attempts to furnish crit. with adequate technical vocabulary and with systematic critical principles.

PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY

I. Psychoanalytic Psychology
II. Archetypal Psychology
III. Other Psychologies

Among the disciplines most often applied to problems in lit., incl. poetry, psychology has been esp. resilient. Long before the formal establishment of the discipline of psychology in the 19th c., theorists and readers used insights about the emotions, the cognitive process, and other manifestations of what we now call psychology to analyze lit. Some would say that, when Plato speaks of poetry enfeebling the mind or composition as poetic madness, when Aristotle writes of *catharsis or S. T. Coleridge of *imagination, he is making psychological statements. By the 20th c., terms and assumptions from psychology were deeply embedded in literary reading, even for those readers whose critical method was (and is) not explicitly psychological.

Lit. both embodies the psychological conditions of its makers and is realized through the psychological premises of its interpreters. Even critics who posit an "objective" *text are making a psychological assumption, namely, that the perception of that text can be independent of the activities of the perceiver's mind. A single work may be read different ways according to psychology: a historical critic may explore early mod. notions of the mind to explicate a play of Shakespeare, while a psychoanalytic critic may apply mod. ideas about the unconscious or the Oedipus complex to the same play. Some mod. critics tend to leave their psychological assumptions tacit, deriving them from common sense or philosophy, not the discipline of psychology as such. Since the devel. of psychoanalysis, however, most critics make their psychological assumptions formal and explicit as a way of contributing to a common discourse.

Near the end of the 19th c., Sigmund Freud began to develop psychoanalytic psychology. At the same time, academic psychology was evolving from a branch of philosophy into a science. Psychological crit., properly so called, dates from the first efforts to use these now-separated experimental, clinical, or "scientific" psychologies instead of aesthetic or philosophical statements about the nature of the human. From that time to the present, psychological crit. has drawn esp. on three psychologies: psychoanalytic (Freudian), archetypal (analytic or Jungian), and cognitive. Psychologies, however, deal in the first instance not with poems but with persons. The application of any form of psychology to poetry will usually discuss the author, some member(s) of the author's audience, a character, or the lang. (usually meaning a character or some psychological process represented in the lang.).

I. Psychoanalytic Psychology. By far, the largest body of psychological crit. draws on psychoanalysis, perhaps because from the very beginning Freud was a kind of literary reader, concerned with the exact wording of a patient's free associations, a slip of the tongue, or the telling of a dream or joke. Hence, one can use psychoanalytic psychology to study details of poetic lang. Also, since the 1960s, psychoanalysis has become more and more a general psychology, as theorists have drawn on anthropology, experiments, neuroscience, and such mod. theories as *semiotics and information theory. Controversies that loomed large in the 1920s, such as Freud vs. Carl Jung, now seem small as psychoanalysis has become a psychology of the self.

One can think of psychoanalysis in three phases: a psychology of the unconscious (1897–1923), ego psychology (1923–), and a psychology of the self in its contexts (ca. 1950–), though the latter era has produced its own phases. The later phases build on and include the earlier, enlarging the field of human behavior that psychoanalysis attempts to explain. The most recent thinking in psychoanalysis incorporates and generalizes much of Freud's earliest work. One can define these phases by the polarity used to explain events: conscious and unconscious, ego and non-ego, or self and not-self.

The first stage grew directly from Freud's most fundamental discovery. If a patient free associates in connection with a symptom, i.e., says whatever comes to mind, sooner or later the patient will enunciate (over strongly felt resistance) a repressed thought or feeling that the symptom expresses. Similarly, if a patient free associates to a dream, the patient will become aware (also against resistance) of a previously unconscious wish—so too, Freud found, with slips of the tongue or pen, lapses of memory, forgettings, or jokes. In all these odd, marginal behaviors, free association reveals a resisted latent or unconscious content underneath the tolerated manifest or conscious behavior. Once Freud realized that this manifest-latent pattern occurred in many spheres of mental activity, he concluded that he had arrived at something fundamental to human nature itself, a general principle of psychological explanation, the struggle between the conscious and the unconscious.

In this "classical" phase, Freud thought of the conscious and the unconscious as opposed forces, as systems or even places. He and his first followers explained human behaviors as either repressions or expressions of unconscious material in which psychic energy shifted from one state to the other. The other major event of the first phase was their understanding of child devel. as having clear stages leading to adult life. In particular, adult character developed from the child's resolution of his or her Oedipus complex. That is, a style of adult relations to other persons grew out of how the child coped with its love and hate toward mother and father as the child grew into a world divided into male and female and parent and child. Even earlier, the child developed character from how it learned to adapt internally to adult concerns about the management of the child's body in feeding, defecating, urinating, walking, masturbating, and so on. Within this first framework, Freud developed highly general ideas about the working and structure of the mind, although psychoanalysis often focused primarily on special behaviors such as neurosis and dreams.

Lit. played a key role in Freud's discoveries. In the letter of October 15, 1897, in which he announced that he had found love of the mother and jealousy of the father in his self-analysis, he went on to identify this complex with the "gripping power" of Sophocles' Oedipus Rex and the unconscious forces behind Shakespeare's writing of Hamlet, as well as the latter protagonist's inability to act. Freud, thus, addressed all three of the persons of psychological crit., although in this first phase he confined his writings largely to author and character.

In "Creative Writers and Day-Dreaming" (1908), Freud developed a powerful model of the literary process. Stimulated by a present wish, the writer enriches it unconsciously with wishes from childhood and embodies it in a literary form that entices an audience (who, in its turn, takes the text as stimulus and elaborates it with its own unconscious wishes). Using this model, he wrote studies of Leonardo da Vinci and Fyodor Dostoyevsky and his longest literary analysis, an interpretation of the dreams in Wilhelm Jensen's novel Gradiva. He also analyzed a variety of literary characters: Hamlet, Macbeth and Lady Macbeth, Henrik Ibsen's Rebecca West, and Falstaff (see Strachey).

Freud's writings attracted other early psychoanalytic figures to lit. crit. Typical were Ernest Jones's study of Hamlet, Marie Bonaparte's of E. A. Poe, and Phyllis Greenacre's of Jonathan Swift and Lewis Carroll. Characteristically, these first-phase critics used only such early psychoanalytic concepts as unconscious content or the Oedipus complex or the phallic and anal stages of child devel. They relied heavily on Freud's lists of symbols in the 1914 additions to The Interpretation of Dreams or the first set of Introductory Lectures in 1915–17, a tactic that resulted in some bizarre crit. and a dubious reputation for psychoanalytic studies among conventional literary critics.

Perhaps because it was so novel, this earliest style, the search for latent content, set the image of psychoanalytic crit. in literary circles. Also, a number of prominent literary critics of the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s began to use this first-phase theory, esp. William Empson, Edmund Wilson, Lionel Trilling, Kenneth Burke, and Leslie Fiedler (see Phillips). Work continued in this vein into the 1960s and 1970s (Crews; Kaplan and Kloss). Some of this work remains highly effective precisely because of the simplicity of its theory. Harold Bloom's influential theory of poetic *influence, e.g., rests on Freud's early version of the Oedipus complex.

Freud himself, however, found that a quarter century of clinical experience required him to revise his first theories. In the second phase of his thought, Freud complicated the simple division of the mind into conscious and unconscious by mapping it onto the "structural" hypothesis of a mind whose workings consisted of the interaction of id, superego, reality, and repetition compulsion under the governance of a presiding ego. Id, one would define today as the psychic representation of biological drives; superego, the internalized commands of one's parents, both to do and not to do, violation of which leads to guilt or depression; repetition compulsion, the tendency to try old solutions even on new problems; the ego, the synthesizer and executive that chooses strategies and tactics that best balance these competing needs. Freud and his colleagues of the 1930s expanded their inventory of defense mechanisms from repression to other strategies such as reversing anger into kindness and projecting one's own impulses onto others. Although Freud had largely ceased writing on lit. by 1923, some of his earlier works illustrate what his second-phase writing might have been like: studies of jokes and humor, the legend of the Medusa's head, the theme of beauty's transience (an essay prompted by R. M. Rilke), or the "uncanny" in ghost stories. These writings all have less to do with author or character and more with the audience and an assumed collective response to a literary stimulus.

Second-phase psychoanalytic theory made possible a more powerful poetics. Kris and Mauron were able to integrate the new ego psychology of multiple defenses into studies of the writing process. Sharpe and Rogers showed how the new theories could explicate the psychological function of metaphors and poetic lang. Kris, Lesser, and Holland used ego psychology to study the response to literary texts. Reflecting the new complexity in the theory of defense, Kris approached lit. as "regression in the service of the ego." Lesser showed how lit. variously appeals to id, ego, and superego. Holland developed a model of lit. as a fantasy modified by poetic forms (analogous to psychological defenses) toward a meaning. Where first-phase critics felt that they could talk only about persons, second-phase critics could use the new theories to consider genres such as *lyric poetry. Thus, Matthew Arnold's "Dover Beach" denies a primal scene fantasy; W. B. Yeats's "The Second Coming" splits a fantasy of omnipotent rage. Psychoanalytic studies of writers could become more realistic with biographers such as Edel, Kaplan, Meyer, Fruman, or Wolff. The anthols. by Ruitenbeek, the Manheims, and Tennenhouse sample this phase.

The third phase took place largely after Freud's death in 1939. Psychoanalytic psychology went beyond the ego to address the self in the largest sense and, finally, all of human behavior. As early as 1930, in the first chapter of Civilization and Its Discontents, Freud ushered in this phase: "Originally the ego includes everything; later it separates off an external world from itself." Nazi persecutions forced the emigration of Freud and his circle from Vienna and spread second- and third-phase psychoanalysis all over the world.

Brit. theorists, during the 1940s and 1950s, replaced Freud's biological determinism from innate drives with learning based on interpersonal encounters between the child and its significant others ("object relations"). Concentration on these pre-Oedipal experiences led to a more comprehensive account of the themes in a child's devel. that persisted in the adult's style. The Oedipus complex was only one among several critical events; indeed, the child's first-year relation to the mother overshadowed what Freud had thought dominant, the relation to the father in the third year and after. In particular, both theory and observation indicated a crucial period early in life when the child felt he or she was not yet separate from the mother, and Holland (1968) showed how this early experience could explain "absorption" in lit. later in life. From this "object-relations school," theories of "potential space" and "transitional object" (Winnicott) had an important influence on literary theory (Schwartz, Hartman, Grolnick and Barkin), evidenced, e.g., in work on Shakespeare (Schwartz and Kahn). A number of literary critics built on the work of Melanie Klein, an important figure in object-relations theory who posited a dynamic picture of the psyche, and Karen Horney, who focused early on defensive patterns and object relations.

In France, under the influence of Jacques Lacan (after ca. 1965), psychoanalysis turned toward understanding conscious and unconscious experiences as an entry into a ling. culture. Lacan wrote in an arcane, metaphorical way, describing concerns of the third phase of psychoanalysis (object relations or personal style) in the lang. of the first phase (phallus, castration). Although much Lacanian critical writing simply explicates Lacan, he posited important psychoanalytic ideas on analyses of Poe's "The Purloined Letter" and Hamlet; and many critics turned to analyzing discrete works (see Bersani, Felman, and the Davis and Felman anthols.) In some versions, Lacanian psychoanalysis meshes with the work of such Fr. thinkers as Roland Barthes, Michel Foucault, and Jacques Derrida, who treated lang. as an active, autonomous system and the speaker as passive. Psychoanalytic psychology in this form is more widely read in literary circles (in the U.S., U.K., France, and South America) than earlier versions were, though, paradoxically, it reduces the importance of the actual methods such as free association on which psychoanalysis rests.

A particularly vigorous current in the 1980s was feminist psychoanalytic crit., this despite Freud's unsophisticated theories about women. Feminists sometimes reread Freud as if he were a literary text; sometimes they use Freud to understand a patriarchal society (Mitchell); sometimes they rewrite him into a more sophisticated psychology (Chodorow). Some feminist critics drew on Fr. theory (Irigaray; Marks and de Courtivron), others on Anglo-Am. ego psychology and object-relations theory (Gilbert and Gubar; Garner). All found in psychoanalytic psychology both a challenge and a resource.

Influential recent discussions of psychoanalysis in relation to poetry have often been wide-ranging instances of cultural and literary crit. rather than narrow applications of Freud, Lacan, and their successors. The Bulgarian theorist Julia Kristeva, in La Révolution du langage poétique (Revolution in Poetic Language, 1974) and other works, borrows from Freud and other psychoanalytic models to build "a theory of signification based on the subject, his formation, and his corporeal, ling., and social dialectic." The Brit. literary historian Jacqueline Rose in several books, notably Sexuality in the Field of Vision (1986) and On Not Being Able to Sleep (2003), reshapes Freudian insights into a set of adaptable tools for the analysis of a broad range of poems but also other kinds of phenomena such as the spectacle of Princess Diana. The French psychotherapist Félix Guattari published several powerful books expanding psychoanalytic concepts to address the making of subjectivity in society, modes of political resistance to fascism and capitalism, and the cultivation of an ecologically oriented philosophy; his most famous book, the collaboration with Gilles Deleuze called Anti-Oedipus (1972), proposes a "materialist psychiatry" that proceeds from a critique of Freud's Oedipus complex. The Israeli-born theorist Shoshana Felman has probed madness in psychiatric and literary contexts, trauma, and sexual difference. The Am. critic Barbara Johnson continued many of Felman's approaches, freely applying Freud and Lacan in important essays on Stéphane Mallarmé and Poe, among others. And in The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989), still his best book, the Slovenian philosopher Slavoj Žižek returned to Lacanian concepts, now braided with Hegelian dialectics, in a searching contribution to the theory of ideology.

II. Archetypal Psychology. Archetypal psychology was a significant force in critical theory from the 1920s to the 1960s. Its theoretical foundation derives from the work of the Swiss psychoanalyst Carl Jung, esp. his idea that archetypal structures are the primary factors organizing human personality. For Jung, the personal unconscious consists of memories and images (imagos) collected in the course of an individual life. The collective unconscious, on the other hand, is limited to the imposition of structural laws—*archetypes. The personal unconscious is like a lexicon where each of us accumulates a distinctive vocabulary; these lexical units, however, acquire value and significance only insofar as they are archetypally structured. If the unconscious activity of the psyche consists in imposing structures (archetypes) upon content (imagos) and if these structures are fundamentally the same for all personalities, then to understand and interpret a literary text it is necessary to analyze the unconscious structures underlying the text itself. This is the model used in traditional Jungian crit.

Jung published the first archetypal analysis of a literary text in 1912 in "Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido," an extensive treatment of the structures underlying H. W. Longfellow's "Hiawatha." Here Jung introduced his interpretive method know as amplification. Earlier, Freud had demonstrated the importance of free association for understanding the unconscious motivation and meaning of a person's dreams. Jung extended this idea not only to the personal associations of the dreamer but to intertextual associations within the dreamer's cultural canon and, in some cases, cross-cultural associations as well. By establishing a larger intertextual context for the dream image through philological, iconological, mythological, and historical research, Jung showed that the process of amplification deliteralizes the image, cultivating an attitude that psychologically questions the naïve, literal level of lang. and image in order to expose its more shadowy, metaphorical significance (see INTERTEXTUALITY).

Analysis of archetypal structures and the phenomenological amplification of images characterized archetypal crit. from the 1920s to the mid-1960s, esp. in the early work of Maud Bodkin, John Thorburn, Herbert Read, and Elizabeth Drew, through the later Kathleen Raine and Graham Hough, and culminating in the prodigious writings of Northrop Frye (see also MYTH).

In the 1970s, revolutionary changes in archetypal crit. came from two areas: (1) expansion of clinical analysis to a phenomenological study of *imagination and lang. and (2) study of the depth-psychological dimension of religion and lit. The most influential figure was the Jungian psychoanalyst James Hillman. To extend Jungian psychology beyond clinical practice to a study of Western imagination, Hillman called for a "postanalytic consciousness" committed to an articulation of the "poetic basis of mind." Hillman's phenomenological view of mind holds fantasy images to be the means by which consciousness and self-consciousness are possible and through which the world is imagined. Work with images, whether in therapeutic, cultural, or literary analysis, thus became a work as much on the process of seeing as on the object seen.

The shift from Jung to Hillman may be illustrated in their differing approaches to alchemy. Where Jung writes an "objective" and "empirical" psychology of alchemy, Hillman tries instead to provide an experiential closeness to the alchemical images and tropes themselves. In writing about "silver and the white earth," Hillman intends his writing, like a poem, to bear traces of "silver," to become a "silver mine," unearthing and performing the images' tropological structure. The metaphor of silver "author-izes" the actual style of writing and internal logic of the text. As a mode of psychological crit., Hillman's new archetypal psychology assumes that a literary work brings with it the very *hermeneutics (imagos and tropes) by which it can be interpreted. In the late 1970s, Paul Kugler further developed the interrelation between alchemy and the poetic dimension of lang. by focusing on the interrelation among consciousness, lang. (texts), and imagos. Consciousness is continually being imagined (imaged, in-formed) by the metaphors in the very text it is writing or reading.

In its last burst of activity in the 1980s, archetypal crit. drew on the philosophy of the later Martin Heidegger, Derrida, and the notions of nothingness and emptiness from Zen Buddhism, to further deepen the imaginal hermeneutic toward semiotic and postmod. literary theory.

III. Other Psychologies. Except for I. A. Richards's and Morse Peckham's somewhat eclectic use of psychology, an occasional nod to a Gestalt psychologist like Kurt Koffka, or a mention of Jean Piaget's work on the devel. of play and symbolic thought in children, academic psychology did not attract the attention of theorists on poetics until the 1970s. After that, a number of literary theorists explored artificial intelligence, developmental and cognitive psychology, and other subfields of the cognitive sciences that deal with poems, stories, humor, metaphor, and general symbolic activities.

Evolutionary psychology—the study of psychological adaptations to environments by human populations, such as emotion, imitation, and lang.—has been an intriguing (though an eclectic and dispersed) method in recent work on poetics. Considering that many features of poetry (e.g., figurative lang., meter) are useless or even counterproductive to some human activities but deeply useful in others, the factors of environment and adaptation hold promise as an analytical context not available to other methodologies. The interpretive (as opposed to the speculative) value of an evolutionary approach remains to be seen.

Metaphors We Live By, a 1980 book by the cognitive linguist George Lakoff and the philosopher Mark Johnson, was a crossroads for research into psychology and poetics in that it demonstrated an approach that came to be called cognitive poetics*—the study of poetic phenomena according to their relation to the processes of the human mind. Cognitive poetics fundamentally changes how poetics draws on psychology, based as it is on a constantly changing body of empirical research rather than endless reinterpretations of the psychoanalytic models of Freud, Lacan, and others. Following this empirical turn, and the absorption of insights from related fields such as discourse analysis, cognitive ling., and artificial intelligence, the study of psychology and poetry has acquired new dimensions that were hardly imaginable in the 1950s and 1960s.

PUN. See paronomasia.

PUNCTUATION (Lat. punctus, "point"). A system of nonalphabetical signs that express meaning through implied pauses, pitch shifts, and other intonational features. For prose, in western Europe, punctuation began as a pedagogical and scribal guide to reading aloud. It evolved to mark syntax for silent readers, as urged by Aldus Manutius in Orthographiae ratio (1566) and Ben Jonson in The English Grammar (ca. 1617, pub. 1640). For poetry, however, the diachronic shift from oral delivery to silent reading had less impact on comprehension because in poetry—whether its *sound is actual (heard) or virtual (read)—sound helps create sense.

Both pedagogy and *performance loom large in the hist. of punctuation. Speech seems continuous; thus, the earliest Gr. inscriptions do not separate words. Points occasionally separate longer phrases, and Aristotle mentions a horizontal line, the paragraphos, used to introduce a new topic. At the Museum in Alexandria, ca. 200 BCE, the librarian Aristophanes proposed terms and marks (not corresponding to their mod. counterparts) to distinguish a short section (comma) from the longer and longest textual sections (colon, periodos). His terms survived via the Roman grammarians, notably Donatus in the 4th c. CE, and via early Christian teachers such as Jerome, who devised punctuation per cola et commata (by phrases) specifically to facilitate reading aloud of his new Vulgate trans. of the Bible. Over the next millennium, various writers developed systems of punctuation, adapting musical notation (neumes) to indicate *pitch shifts as well as pauses. Thus authorities long dead could continue to prescribe correct oral recitations of sacred texts.

For secular poetry, early printers (e.g., William Caxton) and theorists (e.g., George Puttenham) emphasized the practical functions of punctuation—esp. breath breaks—rather than syntax or prescriptive interpretation. During the 17th c., syntactic punctuation became the norm for imaginative as well as expository prose, whereas drama and poetry tended to retain sound-based flexibility. Before John Urry (1721), for instance, eds. preparing Chaucer for print punctuated ordinary line ends only sporadically. Similarly, readers of Shakespeare's plays as scripts for performance realized that no amount of enforced syntactic punctuation can hold to one set meaning Hamlet's "To die, to sleep / No more and by a sleep to say we end." During the 19th c., however, the study of the mod. langs. succumbed to the strictures of academic respectability. Teachers and eds. began using syntactic punctuation to prescribe their own imagined performances of secular poetry, just as clerics a millennium earlier had prescribed oral performances of sacred Lat. prose.

The illuminated works of William Blake provide striking examples of authorial punctuation as a guide to imagined performance, for Blake laboriously engraved each plate with letters, visual art, and other marks, incl. punctuation. In the first stanza of "London," nonsyntactic periods that close two lines help express the narrator's initial, but illusory, sense of control. Each stanza has progressively lighter punctuation, the second spilling with no end mark into the third, until—as ever more appalling images engulf the narrator—punctuation disappears altogether from the final stanza. The abyss yawns. Despite Blake's efforts, his 20th-c. ed. Geoffrey Keynes repunctuated "London" in accord with mod. canons of punctuation and sense, i.e., in accord with prose syntax, so that the poem in his ed. (though not in others) presents a detached narrator calmly cataloguing social problems.

Many eds. long considered standard have imposed syntactic prose punctuation on poetry. In the Twickenham Edition of Alexander Pope, e.g., each ed. records words that differ from the copy-text chosen, but each modernizes punctuation at will, despite Pope's letter telling a printer to "contrive the Capitals & evry [sic] thing exactly to correspond" with an earlier printing.

How do eds. justify changing authorial punctuation? In part, they are applying methodologies developed for cl. and med. mss., in which any punctuation that appears is based on a local scribal dialect that may bear little or no relationship to our present standardized system. In one ms. trad., a virgule (slash, solidus) might mark poetic *caesura, e.g.; in another trad., a virgule may mark the shortest of three pauses and in yet another, the longest of six divisions into sense units. The slanted line went nameless until 1837, when Henry Hallam adopted a zoological term to declare that virgules in Chaucer mss. always mark caesura—an assertion that, though dead wrong, was not definitively disproven until 1982.

In mss., other punctuation marks also vary from one region to another, even within the same decade. Med. dialects of neumes varied likewise, yet standardized musical notation is not now expected to explicate a set meaning for either readers or performers of a score. But eds. of cl. and med. poetry began to supply less experienced readers with syntactic punctuation suitable to explicative prose. Nearly all Chaucer eds. since 1835, e.g., have imposed the full range of mod. punctuation. Quotation marks, in particular, create demonstrable interpretive problems absent from mss. of Chaucer, wherein a given speech need not be assigned definitely to the narrator or to one or another character. By specifying punctuation absent from or altering punctuation present in mss., mod. eds. continue to prescribe their own silent performances of key poetic passages.

In cultures that have not undergone such a pronounced shift from religious to secular textual education, such as Ar. or Chinese, most punctuation still signals breath breaks and major new topics. Only occasionally does it indicate change in speaker or the many other vocal intonations commonly prescribed in the West by means of syntactic punctuation applied—or misapplied—to poetry.

B. BOWDEN

PUNJABI POETRY. Poetry has been written in the Punjabi lang. since around the 12th c. CE. The literary devel. can be divided into roughly three overlapping periods: med. to early mod. Sufi and Sikh devotional writing (12th–18th cs.), epic romantic verse (17th–19th cs.), and the mod. period (1890–present). As Punjabi was historically a demotic rather than a literary lang., Punjabi poetry has been influenced by verse forms from Hindi, Urdu, and Persian, with heavy use of the sloka, a couplet-based form common in cl. Sanskrit, in med. and early mod. Punjabi, and forms such as the ghazal* since the 18th c.

Poets historically have used two scripts when writing in Punjabi, Gurmukhi and Shahmukhi. Though the grammar and diction in the two scripts are identical, Shahmukhi script derives from Persian, while Gurmukhi bears some resemblance to the standard script used in Hindi, Devanagri, though Sekhon and Duggal suggest resemblances to Takri and Sharda scripts as well. Gurmukhi is also associated with the Sikh trad. since it is the script of the Sikh holy book, the Gurū Granth Sāhib, while Shahmukhi traditionally has been used by Muslim Punjabi speakers, a division intensified since the partition of the Indian subcontinent in 1947.

Scholars agree that the first major poetry written in Punjabi was composed by Fariduddin Ganj-i-shakar, commonly known as Sheikh Farid (ca. 1173–1265). Sheikh Farid was a Sufi mystic of the Chishti order, whose writings have had a deep and lasting impact on Punjabi speakers from the Muslim, Hindu, and Sikh communities (Chopra). Farid's slokas reflect Sufi philosophical precepts, esp. focused on the critique of institutional religious authority as well as material attachments: "Farīdā pankh parāhunī ḍunī suhāvā bāg / Naubat vajī subah sio chalaṇ kā kar sāj" (Farid says, the bird is a guest in the beautiful garden. / Morning bells are ringing, get ready to go).

The Sikh gurus wrote a considerable body of *devotional poetry in Punjabi from the 16th to the 18th cs. In his verses, Gurū Nānak (1469–1539) asserted an iconoclastic ethos under the influence of Sufis such as Farid as well as the Hindu Bhakti trad. Nanak worked with a variety of elements in his verses, many of them originating in Hindi poetry, incl. padas (stanzas) and ashtapadis (eight-stanza compositions), as well as chhants, paharas, savayyas, and slokas. The Sikh gurus also set their compositions in 31 different ragas, indicating how the verses were to be recited melodically. Beginning with Guru Arjan (1563–1606) and his contemporary Bhai Gurdas (1551–1636), Sikh devotional poets came to prefer Braj Bhasha (a historical literary lang. closer to Hindi) over demotic Punjabi, opening a window for further devel. of Sufi Punjabi poetry beginning in the 17th c. (Singh 1988).

The themes of Punjabi Sufi poetry from the early mod. period echo that of Sheikh Farid and Gurū Nānak, though the form preferred by these writers is called the Kāfi, a monorhyme stanzaic verse form usually set to music. One poet of particular note is Bulleh Shah (ca. 1680–1757), whose iconoclastic verses have been revived in Indian popular music, as in "Bulla ki jāna": "Nā mei momin vich masīt ān / Nā mei vich kufar diyan rīt ān / Nā mei pākān vich palīt ān / Nā mei mūsa nā pharaun." (Not I, a believer inside a mosque / Not I, an infidel doing rituals / Not I, pure amongst the wicked / Neither Moses nor Pharoah, am I) Other important Sufi Punjabi poets include Madhulal Hussain (also referred to as Shah Hussain, 1538–99), Sultan Bahu (1628–91), and Shah Sharaf (1640–1724).

Waris Shah (ca. 1722–98) is the most influential writer in the extended romantic lyric form known in Punjabi as the qissa (also spelled kissa), derived from the Ar. qaṣīda*. Shah's most influential contribution is his version of the verse narrative Heer-Ranjha (1766), an archetypal tale of doomed lovers. The intense imagery and natural-sounding voices in Heer have made it a key text in the Punjabi trad. Related to the qissa is the epic heroic poem, known in Punjabi as the vār, which recounted wars and other historical events. The vār form was also used by Sikh gurus in the Gurū Granth Sāhib (see HINDI POETRY).

Punjabi poetry was marginalized under Brit. colonialism in India, as educational policies in the 19th c. favored national langs. such as Urdu over regional langs. However, a new phase of Punjabi poetry arose with the reformist Singh Sabha movement in the latter half of the 19th c. Bhai Vir Singh (1872–1957), a leading literary figure in the movement, was an active novelist and publisher, as well as a major poet. He is widely cited by critics (incl. the authors of the major reference works cited below) as the father of modern Punjabi poetry, perhaps because he instantiated the independent short poem in Punjabi; he was also likely one of the first Punjabi poets to distribute his poetry commercially in the form of printed books. Singh's influence on contemporaries is readily evident in the writing of Puran Singh (1881–1931), the latter being a poet also deeply influenced by both Japanese aesthetics and the Am. Walt Whitman. Puran Singh is likely the first Punjabi poet to use *free verse, though thematically his writing retains a lyric and devotional focus.

Self-consciously secular poetry in Punjabi emerges as part of the Progressive Writers' movement in South Asian lit. in the 1930s. While the movement is known for works in Hindi, Urdu, and Eng., it had a substantial influence on Punjabi writers such as Mohan Singh (1906–78), Sharif Kunjahi (1915–2007), Amrita Pritam (1919–2005), Prabhjot Kaur (b. 1924), and, slightly later, Shiv Kumar Batalvi (1936–73). As with the Progressive movement more broadly, a significant number of Punjabi Progressive writers were women, incl. Kaur and Pritam. Evidence of the continuing influence of writing from the qissa period is seen in Pritam's "Aj Ākhan Waris Shah Nū," a reflection on the partition of the subcontinent addressed apostrophically to Shah: "Aj ākhan Waris Shah nū kito qabra vicho bol / te aj kitāb-e-ishq da koi aglā varka phol" ("I say to Waris Shah today, speak from your grave / And add a new page to your book of love," trans. D. S. Maini).

*Modernism in Punjabi Indian poetry emerged roughly in tandem with modernism in Hindi, where it is referred to as the Nayī Kavitā (New Poetry). An experimental, modernist sensibility can be seen in the work of Jasbir Singh Ahluwalia (b. 1935), who published an anthol. of "experimental" (Prayogashīl) Punjabi poetry in 1962, which included his own verses as well as those of established poets, such as Pritam and Mohan Singh, associated with the previous generation. Despite the presence of self-conscious experimentalism since the 1960s and free verse since the 1920s, the dominant voices in Punjabi poetry after 1947 have continued to emphasize traditional rhyme (generally *monorhyme) associated with the ghazal and Kāfi forms, as well as traditional meters.

Crit. related to 20th-c. Punjabi poetry has been heavily constrained by the partition of 1947, which fractured literary communities in Punjabi along religious lines. Studies by Indian scholars tend to focus exclusively on mod. writers from Hindu and Sikh backgrounds (works by Sekhon and Duggal and by Malhotra and Arora are cases in point), while, in Pakistan, Javeid's study is framed as an explicitly nationalist project and exclusively invokes writers of a Muslim background. Rammah has explored the status of West Punjabi poetry, focusing on Kunjahi, Najm Hosain Syed (b. 1936), Munir Niazi (1928–2006), and Ahmed Rahi (ca. 1923–2002) as the leading voices in postpartition Punjabi poetry from Pakistan.

Finally, the growing body of Punjabi-lang. poetry by writers outside the Indian subcontinent should be noted. The best-known figure is Sadhu Binning (b. 1947, Canada), whose bilingual edition of No More Watno Dur (No More Distant Homeland, 1994) has been widely influential. Other frequently cited Punjabi poets in the diaspora include Ajmer Rode (b. 1940, Canada) and Amarjit Chandan (b. 1946, U.K.). Diasporic writing uses elements from traditional Punjabi poetry but adds themes associated with the diasporic experience, often with an infusion of transliterated Eng. vocabulary.

PURE POETRY, Fr. poésie pure; Ger. absolute Dichtung; Sp. poesía pura. This term refers to a doctrine derived from E. A. Poe by the Fr. symbolist poets—Charles Baudelaire, Stéphane Mallarmé, and Paul Valéry—and widely discussed in the late 19th and early 20th cs. The debate also extended to Spain, Mexico, and Cuba. In this context, pure is equivalent to absolute as in absolute music, i.e., the structuring of sound without ostensible semantic content, a significant analogy in that both the theory and practice of *symbolism was influenced by the relations of *music and poetry. The meanings of this term, however, vary considerably from poet to poet.

Poe articulated the basis of this doctrine in "The Poetic Principle" (1850). In that essay, he argued that poems should be short, because poetry is directly related to the *intensity of excitement the poem produces, a necessarily transient phenomenon. Thus, for Poe, the long poem was a "flat contradiction in terms." Moreover, poetry worthy of its name, Poe argued, is entirely independent of the intellect and moral sense, its only goal being "to attain a portion of that Loveliness whose very elements perhaps appertain to eternity alone." It is in music that humans best achieve the aim of creating "supernal beauty"; thus, Poe considered *meter, *rhythm, and *rhyme as "absolutely essential" and "the union of Poetry with Music" as "the widest field for the Poetic development."

In developing his ideas on pure poetry, Baudelaire drew heavily on Poe. Like Poe, he staunchly opposed moral or *didactic poetry, arguing that poetry had no other goal but beauty, and he adopted Poe's view of the *imagination as a quasi-divine faculty that allowed the poet to see the intimate and secret relations among things, the correspondences and analogies. Baudelaire also praised *concision, brevity, and "intensity of effect" as the true qualities of poetry, noting Poe's penchant for the short story, a genre in which he often achieved "purely poetic" results. Like Poe, Baudelaire acknowledged rhythm as the most useful tool in the devel. of the idea of beauty, the aim of pure poetry.

In varying degrees, the symbolists sought to confer *autonomy on poetry by subjecting the semantic properties of lang. to the phonetic properties of words, their sounds, kinship, and connotations. For Baudelaire, the autonomy of poetic lang. was incomplete in that meaning involved "correspondences" with an ultimate reality. Poe, in his reference to the "supernal beauty" that pure poetry was capable of achieving, had hinted at the possibility of a metaphysical or mystical significance in verbal music. Mallarmé's conception of pure poetry was of a point at which poetry would attain complete ling. autonomy, the words themselves taking over the initiative and creating the meanings, liberating themselves from the semiotic tyranny of the lang. and the deliberate *intentions of the poet. With Mallarmé, subject matter is a function of an intense preoccupation with the medium.

Following Mallarmé, Valéry found the processes of poetic composition more interesting than the poetry itself. Valéry's contribution to the doctrine of pure poetry focused on the most fundamental yet ineluctable aspects of poetic lang., the relation of sound and sense. In his preface to a volume of verse by Lucien Fabré (Connaissance de la déesse, 1920), Valéry defines pure poetry as poetry that, like the chemical purification of an element, is isolated from everything but its essence. Poe's strictures on long poems and on the didactic motive are repeated. Pure poetry seeks to attain from lang. an effect comparable to that produced on the nervous system by music. An important debate began in 1925, when Henri Bremond, a Jesuit writer on mystical subjects eager to support Valéry's candidacy for the Fr. Academy, delivered an address entitled "Poésie Pure" at a meeting of the Institut de France. Although he agreed with Valéry's analogy between pure poetry and music, Bremond was more explicit in claiming a mystical value for pure poetry. This prompted Valéry to define his own views differently, rejecting any mystical connection. Without abandoning the doctrine, Valéry later denied the existence of pure poetry, deeming it instead a theoretical goal rarely attainable in view of the intimate ling. connections between sound and meaning.

The influence of Poe's ideas of pure poetry on Eng.-speaking critics and poets was negligible; the idea was mainly imported from France. *Imagism demanded the utmost precision in the rendering of the *image, which ran counter to the vagueness and suggestiveness espoused by Poe and the symbolists. In 1924, George Moore published an anthol. titled Pure Poetry. While he had absorbed the views of the symbolists, Moore's own conception returns to the earlier, plastic trad. of *Parnassianism. T. S. Eliot regarded pure poetry as the most original devel. in the aesthetic of verse made in the last century, characteristically mod. in its emphasis on the medium of verse and its indifference to content, yet also an event that decisively terminated with Valéry. Other critics, however, have continued to find the absolutist, sound-intensive, and antireferential mode in mod. poems such as Wallace Stevens's "Sea Surface Full of Clouds," as well as more radical experiments that followed *modernism in the *Beat poets, *Language poetry, "text-sound," and *sound poetry.

In Spain, from about 1916 on, Juan Ramón Jiménez had pursued a purification of poetic lang. similar to Mallarmé's. Jorge Guillén and Pedro Salinas, who were familiar with Valéry and Mallarmé, theorized and practiced pure poetry through abstraction and the relations between subjective and objective elements in poetry. In Spanish America in the 1920s, pure poetry was often pitted against social or national poetry. Cuban pure poetry followed the path of abstraction, in the work of Eugenio Florit, and of sound play known as jitanjáforas*, in the work of Emilio Ballagas and, esp., of Mariano Brull, who lived and published in Europe in the 1920s. Around the same time, in Mexico, the poets of the review Contemporáneos intensely debated pure poetry in their essays. The poetry of Xavier Villaurrutia and José Gorostiza, in particular, exemplifies such a trend. If all poetry does indeed aspire to the condition of music, that aspiration will make itself manifest somewhere in the poetry of every age and culture.

PYRRHIC (Gr., "used in the pyrriche or war dance"). In *classical prosody, a metrical foot of two short syllables. This may be said to have been the shortest metrical foot in Gr. and Lat. verse, although its admissibility was denied by the ancient rhythmici such as Aristoxenus (see METRICI AND RHYTHMICI), who felt that feet must be of at least three chronoi (temporal elements). In the mod. prosodies based on *accent, such as Eng., the existence of pyrrhic feet is disputed: several important metrists (e.g., J. B. Mayor, Robert Bridges, Joseph Malof, G. T. Wright) have recognized them as legitimate variations or substitutions in iambic verse; others deny them (J. M. Schipper, George Saintsbury). The dispute between the two camps turns on the issue of whether gradations of stress in the line are to be treated relatively or absolutely. In a line such as Andrew Marvell's "To a green thought in a green shade," the stress pattern (using notation of four levels of stress numbered 1 through 4, 1 being strongest, 4 weakest) might be said to be 3-4-2-1-3-4-2-1. Since Otto Jespersen's seminal 1903 article "Notes on Metre," many prosodists have accepted his claim that stress is perceived only in relation to its surroundings; and if one asks about each pair of syllables in the line from Marvell's "The Garden," 3s outweigh 4s, as 1s do 2s, so that the *scansion is properly trochee + iamb + trochee + iamb (see RELATIVE STRESS PRINCIPLE). There are, additionally, some theoretical grounds for thinking that feet composed of homogeneous members should not be recognized; for further discussion of this issue, with bibl., see FOOT and SPONDEE.

Other metrists, however, would say that, in Marvell's line, 2s and 1s are both stronger than 3s and 4s and that readerly distinctions of stressing are made in absolute terms, not relative—giving the scansion pyrrhic + spondee + pyrrhic + spondee. Absolutists thus view the pyrrhic as a foot of two weakly stressed syllables; precisely how weak the one syllable is in relation to the other is unimportant. Historically, this approach has appealed to classicizing metrists, and it has a certain direct appeal; Saintsbury is eccentric (here as in much else) in accepting spondees but not pyrrhics. The sequence weaker-weaker-stronger-stronger is reasonably common in Eng. iambic pentameter verse; Wright gives many examples from Shakespeare. What one calls it—some classicizing metrists once liked to call it an *ionic foot, while Attridge calls it "stress-final pairing"—is, however, less important than whether one hears relatively or absolutely.

PYTHIAMBIC. A mod. term (versus pythius or Pythian verse = dactylic hexameter) for the strophic form of Horace's Epodes 14–15 (called First Pythiambic: hexameter + iambic dimeter; also found in Archilochus) and Epode 16 (Second Pythiambic: hexameter + iambic trimeter). There is no ancient authority for the term.

QAṢĪDA. A *monorhyme verse form that emerged in the oral Ar. poetry of the 6th c. as a composite *ode. It was adapted in the 10th and 11th cs. to Persian and Heb. poetry (along with other Ar. poetic conventions) and then spread to Turkish and other Middle Eastern, Af., and South and Southeast Asian lits. Basic formal features shared by *qaṣīda*s across these trads. include the following: all lines of the poem observe the same *meter and *rhyme (aa ba ca, etc.); each line divides in symmetrical *hemistichs, graphically arranged in two columns, often marking a syntactic *caesura, esp. in Persian; length varies, usually 20 to 100 lines, though longer qaṣīdas are not uncommon; it is consciously literary and epideictic, often a praise poem (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY), frequently intended for *performance in a ritual, ceremonial, or festive context. Anthols. of pre-Islamic qaṣīdas (e.g., the Muʿallaqāt) reveal a fluidity in theme and structure, but Ar. critics of the 9th and 10th cs. abstracted an idealized polythematic, tripartite qaṣīda as the generic model: the tribal Bedouin poet weeps over the beloved's abandoned campsite, falling into nostalgic, often erotic reverie (nasīb); he evokes scenes of his solitary trek through the desert on his she-camel (raḥīl); closing with praise of himself or his tribe (fakhr) or his patron (madīḥ). Earlier views of qaṣīda poetics as atomistic or "mere" ekphrasis* have given way to understanding the cl. tripartite qaṣīda as a complex sonata structure, rite of passage, Maussian gift exchange, and so on. In the highly literate courtly milieus of the Abbasid age, esp. after al-Mutanabbī, the qaṣīda dropped its raḥīl and generally adhered to a bipartite structure of nasīb (on amatory, bacchic, garden, or hunt themes), followed by madīḥ. Persian, Heb., Turkish, and Urdu generally followed this "secondary" bipartite model of the qaṣīda for *panegyric; but the qaṣīda was also dedicated to homiletic, ascetic, philosophical, and mystical themes (e.g., al-Būṣīrī's widely performed qaṣīda in praise of the Prophet Muhammad). The qaṣīda continued to thrive across the trads. in neoclassical form in the 19th c. and remained the prestige verse form in Ar. until the advent of *free verse ca. 1950.

QIṬʿA. A *monorhyme poetic form common to Ar., Persian, Turkish, Urdu, and other related lits. The name qiṭʿa means "fragment" or "piece" and originally served to distinguish this form from the qaṣīda*. Formally, the qiṭʿa typically lacks the *internal rhyme found between the hemistichs in the first verse of the qaṣīda (and ghazal) and is much shorter than the qaṣīda, containing at least two and normally no more than 20 verses. In contrast to the polythematic qaṣīda, the qiṭʿa is characterized by a unity of topic and mood. Despite its name, however, most qiṭʿa are not, in fact, *"fragments" of an original whole but constitute complete, self-standing poems. In pre-Islamic Ar. poetry, the qiṭʿa was most often employed for mourning the death of a warrior and calling for tribal vengeance. But with the rise of Islam and the establishment of a cosmopolitan empire in the 8th and 9th cs. CE, the thematic range of the qiṭʿa expanded tremendously. Since the prestige of the qasida genre made it the standard medium for political *panegyric and court ceremony, the qiṭʿa became a favorite vehicle for the devel. of *anacreontic, amatory, homiletic, and *nature poetry, addressed to an increasingly diversified urban audience; the simple expedient of removing the opening internal rhyme took the qiṭʿa out from under the weighty authority of the qaṣīda and opened the door to significant literary innovation. In Persian and later Islamicate trads., the themes of wine and love became the domain of the lyric ghazal, and the qiṭʿa took on a new role as the poetic form for ostensibly extemporaneous, *occasional poetry. Topics might include panegyric, requests for *patronage or payment, *invective, *elegy, social *satire, friendly correspondence, or philosophical or ethical meditation. After the 15th c., the qiṭʿa also became the typical form for the chronogram, a poem that disposes the numerical values of the letters in a memorable phrase to commemorate the year an event occurred. The *diction of the qiṭʿa normally requires neither the formality of the qaṣīda nor the *euphony of the ghazal and often tends toward the idiomatic or colloquial.

QUANTITY

I. Concepts Ancient and Modern
II. Linguistic Basis

I. Concepts Ancient and Modern. Quantity is a property of syllables and forms the basis of the metrical *prosody of some langs. Quantitative verse is contrasted with verse based on syllable count or on word accent. Terminology and concepts of quantity in Western poetics descend from practice and description in cl. Gr. and Lat. In ancient and in many mod. theories, quantity is closely connected with vowel length—also called vowel quantity—and the same terms, long and short, are used to describe both vowels and syllables. So, "durationalists" have assumed that the elapsed time of the entire syllable is the criterion of difference, and some have made a point of variation within the two categories (ancient rhythmici, unlike metrici, focused on the varied realizations of quantity in performance [see METRICI AND RHYTHMICI]). Most scholars now treat the distinction as an opposition of structures; W. S. Allen (1973) recommends following the ancient Indian trad. in calling syllables either "heavy" or "light" in weight.

A separate distinction, between "open" and "closed" syllables, is often part of the definition of quantity; open syllables end in a vowel, closed in a consonant. Gr. and Lat. syllabification rules allow closed syllables only when a vowel is followed by at least two consonants (VC-CV). Open syllables with a short vowel are short; closed syllables and syllables with a long vowel are long. So: a͟r-mă̰ vi̯-rṵ̆m-que . . . (vowel quantity above the line, syllable quantity below; in ar- the actual vowel quantity is "hidden" since the internal closed syllable is necessarily long). A syllable is long "by nature" if it has a long vowel; if it has a short vowel but is closed, it is long "by position" (Gr. thesei; Lat. positione, meaning either "by convention" or "by placement"; the distinction reflects the confusion of vowel and syllable quantities). Since the combination of a plosive + liquid was sometimes treated as a single consonant (Gr. pat-ros vs. pa-tros), the preceding syllable was said to be "common"—long or short. Syllables were reckoned across a line of verse without regard to word end, although word-final syllables might be subject to special treatment (in particular, *elision). The details of practice, incl. interaction with word stress and the permissibility of ad hoc adjustments to quantity, varied between langs., over time, and with degree of stylization (*epic is freest, while comedy, in particular, respects spoken norms), but they do not affect the fundamental categorization of long and short syllables. In Eng., efforts to apply the cl. quantitative system to analysis or composition have foundered on the difficulty of defining long and short (Attridge; cf. Stone and various experiments by Robert Bridges).

The metrical patterns of quantitative poetry comprise long or short "elements" (Maas) or "positions" (West) in which a particular syllable quantity is required, but patterns often incorporate alternatives (the distinction between pattern and instance, never entirely absent, was formalized by Maas). An element where either a short or long may be used is *anceps (a postclassical term); the final element of a verse is always "indifferent" to short or long (anceps, "common," and "indifferent" have had multiple and overlapping usages; "neutralization" is the mod. technical term). By "contraction," one long may replace the positions for two short syllables, and by "resolution," two shorts replace a long syllable. Both are restricted in application. Contraction is very familiar from the epic dactylic; resolution is common in comic *iambic; much *lyric excludes both. But the 2:1 replacements (not unique to Gr. and Lat.) are understood in durational terms to mean that a long quantity temporally equals twice a short; the short is the minimal time unit, Gr., chronos or sema; Lat. and mod. technical term, mora. A "triseme" and "tetraseme" are each a further prolongation of a long syllable. Surviving Hellenistic and later musical settings incorporate these ratios. For most 19th- to mid-20th-c. scholars, anceps was identified with what ancient rhythmicians recognized as an alogos (irrational) duration, between long and short, and so was taken to require a third quantity whose intermediate length was satisfied by altered performance of either syllable structure (the possibility of a third quantity was refuted in Devine and Stephens [1975]).

Quantitative rhythm may inhere in a pattern, since most patterns require a long element after every anceps or one or two short ones; a sequence of more than two shorts is taken to imply underlying resolution and of two or more longs to involve anceps, contraction, or *syncopation (the omission of a short; never in this context for rhythmic reversal). Scholars differ on whether syncopation implies prolongation. Nonetheless, patterns have traditionally been analyzed into quantitative feet formed by combinations of long and short syllables, with *rhythm determined by the internal ratios and usually with allowed *substitutions among feet providing the variations in pattern. Some scholars have held that quantitative feet are only the verbal representation of nonverbal rhythms incorporating a metrical *ictus (i.e., stress) or a musical beat and ratios other than 2:1 between long and short; some durationalists even adjusted unequal feet to equal "bars." Quantitative feet have allowed more opportunity than syllable quantity to confound separate systems of prosody (so Lanier, Kitto).

II. Linguistic Basis. In phonology, quantity, also known as syllable weight, is measured in moras, also known as weight units (Hyman). A light (or short) syllable has one *mora, a heavy (or long) syllable has two moras, and a superheavy (or overlong) syllable has three moras. Quantity is a property of the *rhyme of a syllable (in phonology "rhyme" means the part of the syllable that excludes the onset); that is, initial consonants never count for weight (though see Gordon 2005 for possible exceptions). The quantity of a syllable is determined by how many moras constitute the rhyme of that syllable.

In a quantity-insensitive lang., coda consonants do not contribute to weight; rather they share a mora with the vowel. Such langs. also lack long vowels, by definition. Quantity-insensitive langs. include Fr. and Polish. In a typical quantity-sensitive lang., a syllable is heavy either by having a long vowel or being closed by a coda consonant—this is also called weight by position—or both. Eng., Lat., Sanskrit, and Ar. are examples of quantity-sensitive langs. Some quantity-sensitive langs. (e.g., Khalkha Mongolian) have nonmoraic codas, meaning that syllable weight is determined only by vowel length, not by the number of consonants. Still other langs. (e.g., Kwakw'ala [Gordon 2004]) show a pattern where sonorant consonants, such as m, n, r, and l, are moraic, while obstruent consonants such as t, d, p, and k are not. While it may seem arbitrary that a consonant may add weight in one lang. but not in another, recent work has shown that these patterns reflect subtle differences in the way these sounds are pronounced across langs. (Broselow, Chen, and Huffman).

The relationship between quantity sensitivity and quantitative verse is not a simple one. Quantity-sensitive langs. do not necessarily have quantitative verse. Lat. and It., e.g., are both quantity-sensitive, stress-accent langs.; yet Lat. verse is largely quantitative, while It. verse is based on stress and syllable count. Furthermore, the distinction between quantitative verse and *accentual verse is not black and white. There is a statistical tendency in both Lat. and Gr. verse to align word stress with metrical ictus (Allen 1965, 1968), while in several Eng. meters, the phenomenon of *resolution is sensitive to syllable weight (Kiparsky and Hanson; Kiparsky). Thus the sequence of vowels and consonants in a syllable does not automatically determine whether that syllable will count as light or heavy in verse; rather, this is a product of the interplay among the quantity sensitivity of the lang., metrical conventions, and ultimately the stylistic preferences of particular poets.

QUATORZAIN. Any stanza or poem of 14 lines, incl. the *sonnet, though the term is now normally reserved for any 14-line poem other than the cl. Petrarchan (It.) or Shakespearean (Eng.) sonnet. The dispersion and success of the sonnet have tended to conceal from view other members of this class of stanzas. The assonantal laisses of OF epic poetry are usually quatorzains (see LAISSE), as are, in Rus. poetry, the nearly 400 stanzas of Alexander Pushkin's Evgenij Onegin (1825–32; see ONEGIN STANZA). In Eng. poetry, one can point to Capel Lofft's Laura; or an Anthology of Sonnets . . . and Elegiac Quatorzains (5 vols., 1813–14), and in mod. Am. poetry they have served as the vehicle of the verse-novel The Golden Gate by Vikram Seth (1986), with the rhyme scheme ababccddeffegg.

QUATRAIN. A stanza of four lines, usually rhymed. The quatrain, with its many variations, is the most common stanza form in Eur. poetry. Established as the meter of the *hymn in the 3d c. CE (after the Lat. iambic dimeter or two-foot line), it became a conventional meter in the Middle Ages as iambic tetrameter (alone or mixed with trimeter). These four- and three-foot lines correspond to the four-beat line, which is the basis for several forms of the *ballad meter, also a vernacular staple in the Middle Ages. Since then, the "four by four" (a quatrain with lines of four "feet" or "stresses") has been a common stanza for hymns, *ballads, and *nursery rhymes. The quatrain is the form of the Sp. cópula, the Rus. chastushka*, the Georgian shairi, the Malay pantun*, the Ger. Schnaderhüpfel, the Chinese and Japanese shichigon-zekku, the Iranian rubāʿī*, and the Welsh englyn*. In 1834, August Meineke argued that Horace's Odes exhibit quatrain structure.

Irrespective of length, most rhyming quatrains adhere to one of the following rhyme patterns: abab or xbyb, called *"cross rhyme" (in which x and y represent unrhymed lines), which includes ballad meter, the elegiac stanza, the heroic quatrain (as in Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard") and is the rhyme scheme of most Fr. quatrains; abba called "envelope rhyme" or the *envelope stanza of which Alfred, Lord Tennyson's *In Memoriam stanza is a type. Theses two rhyme schemes have been the most popular forms in Western poetry since the 12th c., used primarily as a unit of composition in longer poems and forming the two components of the octave of the *sonnet. Other rhyme schemes include aabb, in which internal balance or *antithesis is achieved through opposed *couplets, as in P. B. Shelley's "The Sensitive Plant"; aaaa or aaxa, a monorhymed or nearly monorhymed stanza, such as Gottfried Keller's "Abendlied" or the Rubaiyat stanza. There are also interlinking rhyming quatrains that alternate *masculine and feminine rhymes, as in the most common Rus. stanza form (AbAb or aBaB, in which the capitals denote feminine rhymes). As a complete poem, the quatrain is often epigrammatic (see EPIGRAM). In hymn meter, common quatrain variations are common meter or common measure (alternating iambic tetrameter and trimeter rhyming abab), long meter (four iambic tetrameter lines, rhyming the second and fourth lines and sometimes the first and third), and short meter (two iambic trimeter lines, followed by a third line of iambic tetramter and ending with another trimeter line, rhyming the second and fourth lines and sometimes the first and third).

QUEER POETRY. A multivalent term whose meanings have all been articulated in the very recent past, most often it denotes the effect of poetry's representation of desire and eroticism on a reader. In such theoretical accounts, queer poetry is seen as distinct from the identity-based rubrics of gay or lesbian poetry. As many critics of queer theory (and several queer theorists themselves) note, the effort to disentangle the term queerness from gayness or lesbianism is never complete. Nonetheless, critics insist on queer poetry's distinction insofar as queer texts challenge and deconstruct the identity-based logic of fixed social categorization whereby understandings of gender, sexuality, nationhood, race, ethnicity, religious culture, and other social categories are constructed.

In the early 1990s, U.S. scholars began to form the field of queer studies and queer theory as a disciplinary movement distinct from gay and lesbian studies. The first volume to articulate the field as such was Warner's edited volume Fear of a Queer Planet (1993). The contributors to this anthol. were inspired by two contemp. activist organizations: ACT UP (AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power) and Queer Nation. Founded in New York City in 1987 as a response to the Reagan administration's silence and inaction regarding the HIV/AIDS crisis, ACT UP challenged policies injurious to all people living with AIDS/HIV (PLWAs), incl. seropositive persons, loved ones, and caregivers. The communities served by ACT UP and contributing to its activist base are, by definition, not limited to sexual minorities. Queer theorists and critics adopted this coalitional spirit and often investigated how cultural production by the entire spectrum of sexual and gender minorities might address the social needs or political issues of larger national, regional, or global populations. Although short-lived, Queer Nation (1990–ca. 1994) modeled forms of social disruption through demonstrations in urban centers in the U.S. and Canada. Queer Nation's confrontation of politicians and corporate retailers often involved public displays of affection intended to affirm that sexuality and eroticism need not always conform to heteronormative models. Queer theorists and activists often view the study of cultural productions—and sometimes their own performative critical projects—as the keys to general social transformation.

Performativity is a theoretical concept originating in *speech act theory and developed in poststructuralist philosophies. It describes how the *performance of a discourse affects and transforms a particular identity. Speaking, writing, and all lang. practices are limited by a subject's context; those limits, in turn, inform the subject's identity. However, every ling. performance also has the potential to challenge those contexts and their underlying ideologies. Hence, performative critique can also disrupt normative and seemingly "natural" categories of identity. Although queer theory draws on different philosophers (Jacques Lacan, Michel Foucault, Gilles Deleuze, Jacques Derrida, Luce Irigaray, Hélène Cixous, Julia Kristeva, Roland Barthes), the core idea of performativity depends on linguistically and socially inflected theorizations of desire. Prominent queer theorists such as Leo Bersani, Judith Butler, Tim Dean, and Lee Edelman generally maintain that desire is not simply object orientation. Rather, they understand desire as a force akin to Lacan's Real or Derrida's supplement. As such, desire is conceived as a part of the structure of lang., but it acts as the "unconscious" of lang. (Lacan) or is that part of lang. that interferes with clear communication (Derrida). Thus, desire lies outside acknowledged social systems of meaning that construct social categories, such as identity. When one finds traces of this destabilizing force in texts, as in performative lang. practices, one also finds disruptions of meaning and identity. Understanding the work of desire through performance, across both literary works and social acts, becomes a major preoccupation of queer theorists and critics.

Is queer poetry limited to the production of sexual or gender minorities? Scholars deploying the term are in a double bind owing to their fields' political origins. On the one hand, they claim that queer poetry, much like the activism of ACT UP, strives to build new collectives and social orders in a coalitional spirit. On the other hand, the performativity they associate with queer poetry, as in Queer Nation's actions, proceeds from nonheteronormative, often same-sex, eroticism. Given this contradictory situation, critics and even some contemp. poets still rely on definitions of queer poetry that refer to poetic production by anyone from a gender or sexual minority, even if the text is not explicitly politicized. Thus, as a category, queer poetry has become esp. useful for collating poetry representing same-sex desire, experiences, or cultures by sexual and gender minorities from eras or cultures in which the terms gay or lesbian are inappropriate. E.g., the term regularly denotes poets from other global cultures—particularly Africa, Southeast Asia, the Caribbean, and Latin America—to whom it is inappropriate to impose such categories as gay or lesbian, which connote conformity to U.S. and other Western industrialized nations' prevalent understandings of sexual minorities. The term has also sufficed to describe poetry written before the late 19th c. by poets who may have engaged or did engage in same-sex sexual activity before the social identities gay or lesbian had come into existence.

In addition to this usage, the rubric of queer poetry describes the potential of certain poetic texts—whether or not authored by a self-identified "queer" (or lesbian, gay, transgender) writer—somehow to transform existing social attitudes, discourses, or gender categories. For instance, while the Chicana feminist poet Gloria Anzaldúa described herself as a lesbian, her Borderlands/La Frontera (1987) is a paradigmatic example of queer poetry. A bilingual project that hybridizes memoir, social commentary, and lyric poetry, Anzaldúa's book uses ling. experiments to render the text a corporeal extension of the author's own body, and thus as a desiring entity in its own right. The queerness of Borderlands/La Frontera resides in its characterization of lang. as a kind of body that acts on and interacts with readers' consciousnesses, in an intimate and even erotic manner. The result, as Anzaldúa explicitly imagines it, is a coalitional community, suturing the North-South divide as well as redressing sexual, gender, racial, and other exclusions.

Queer theory postulates that the coalitional capacity of a text like Borderlands/La Frontera specifically derives from its "performative" nature and its consequential ability "to queer" (to deconstruct through the deployment of desire) all manner of social constructs and identity categories. Anzaldúa responds to the aforementioned tenet of queer theorists and other observers of performativity—that desire precedes lang. but is closely bound to ling. structures—by demonstrating that a rearrangement of *structure or *syntax, whether willfully through *style or unconsciously through *repetition, reintroduces an erotic difference into the ling. or representational order, and from there into culture and society. When emerging into a lang. system or practice, desire disrupts social codes and conventions. Thus, the ling. introduction of desire brings about discursive and social transformation. Such disruptions are often thought to affect discursive and even generic boundaries as well, thus causing the blurring of lines between poetry and fiction or other prose. Writers working during the era of *poststructuralism in the late 1960s through the 1980s, incl. the Cuban expatriate Severo Sarduy, the Brazilian Clarice Lispector, and the Quebecois Nicole Brossard, deliberately established their poetry and poetic fiction as literary enactments of such theoretical principles. For this reason, their queer poetry doubles as a kind of queer theory.

Much of the effort to disengage the "queerness" of queer poetry from a poet's own sexual identification has concentrated on desire as a formal issue of lang.'s structure, syntax, or ethics (i.e., lang. as a vehicle enabling relations between authors and audiences or among groups of readers). The Jewish-Am. lesbian expatriate Gertrude Stein established an early 20th-c. precedent wherein erotic disruptions of poetic lang. intend to provoke the transformation of a subject's attitudes toward hist. and the social world, esp. since she envisioned subjects' relationships to reality as mediated materially by lang. itself. Stein's early work Tender Buttons (1914) links lesbian eroticism to experimental lang. practice in the interest of introducing readers to different general conceptual, ling., even social orders, inclusive of but not limited to prevailing heternormative understandings of gender and sexuality: "All this and not ordinary, not unordered in not resembling. The difference is spreading." In Lectures in America (1935), Stein directly links eroticism to poetic writing: "So as I say poetry is essentially the discovery, the love, the passion for the name of anything," and "it is a state of knowing and feeling a name." Her body of work experiments with lang., as a desiring form, in order to reconfigure perception and experience.

Stein's heirs in contemp. Am. poetry draw similar connections between experimental poetic practices and desire, furthering a politically progressive agenda to articulate poetry's socially and culturally transformative potential. Such heirs include the Am. homosexual anarchist poet Robert Duncan. Chapters of his H.D. Book, a prose project written and revised from 1961–ca. 1975 (pub. 2011), advance his own understanding of lang. as a socially queering mechanism, a vehicle introducing impersonal desire into the mainstream world order. Although a major portion of Duncan's project entailed a reimagining of gender and sexual norms (he was specifically interested in embracing, rather than disavowing, perceptions of poetry's "effeminacy" and "passivity"), he distanced his work from the categories of gay and homosexual in favor of having it read as humanism, intent on redressing imperialism, capitalism, and solipsism. The influence of Stein's linking of what now is called poetry's "queering" potential to a formalist understanding of the eroticism of nonnormative lang. practices has also been acknowledged by heterosexual Am. writers, such as the Language poets Lyn Hejinian and Leslie Scalapino, the Af. Am. Harryette Mullen, and the Korean Am. Theresa Hak Kyung Cha. In her poetic memoir The Transformation (2007), Juliana Spahr, another poet influenced by Stein, explicitly struggles with the term queer as an apt social category for describing her protagonists' unconventional relationship (one woman and two men committed to one another); yet Spahr's memoir and her other poetry are "queer" insofar as they evince her conviction of desire's ability to transform social situations through readers' interactions with self-described "avant-garde" poetic performance.

QUERELLE DES ANCIENS ET DES MODERNES (Battle of the Ancients and the Moderns). The most serious challenge to the Ren. doctrines of poetic *imitation and regularity, the Querelle, a dispute over the relative superiority of cl. or mod. lit., reflected an antiauthoritarian, rationalistic, progressivist trend that dated from René Descartes's Discours de la méthode (1637) and Blaise Pascal's Traité du vide (1647) and that reached its height from 1687 to ca. 1719.

In 1687, Charles Perrault asserted in Le Siècle de Louis le Grand that contemp. art outshone the achievements of the Augustan Age of Rome. Jean de La Fontaine replied for the ancients in his Epître à Huet, followed by Jean de La Bruyère in his Caractères. Bernard le Bovier de Fontenelle took up the mod. cause in Digression sur les Anciens et les Modernes (1688), and over the next four years, Perrault sharpened his arguments in the Parallèles des Anciens et des Modernes (1688, 1690, 1692). Nicolas Boileau then defended the ancients while attacking the moderns in his Discours sur l'ode (1693) and Réflexions sur Longin (1694). The opponents reconciled in the same year.

Perrault criticized the ancients for works he often found tiresome or confused and for physics that had been reduced to absurdity by the telescope and the microscope. Unquestioning admiration of ancient errors could only result, he argued, from a lack of critical spirit; with the advent of mod. thought, however, scientists began to study nature itself rather than the writings of Aristotle, Hippocrates, and Ptolemy. Mod. artists, too, must reclaim their freedom. Fontenelle, assuming the permanence of human nature, argued that, whereas the ancients invented everything, equally talented moderns would have done equally well had they come first. Adding the idea of progress, Perrault in his Parellèles likened the arts to the sciences, both of which had advanced in the 17th c.

Mainly practitioners rather than theoreticians, the ancients advanced arguments strongly influenced by their creative experiences. They first reaffirmed the cult of Greco-Roman lit. La Fontaine did not deny the merits of the moderns but reaffirmed Homer and Virgil, among others, as "the gods of Parnassus." Imitation was not to be slavish, however: La Fontaine subsumed it under reason and nature. Boileau emphasized that the rules, inferrable from masterpieces, must be used as a guide to rather than a blueprint for original composition, as well as a basis for sensible judgment. Boileau also appealed to the test of time: if antiquity is not a title of merit, long-standing and constant admiration must be, for the majority of readers do not err over the long term.

The moderns won the first battle. Although, in his Lettre à Charles Perrault (1694), Boileau denied that the mod. writers surpassed all the ancients, he freely admitted that the 17th c. was superior to any similar period of antiquity. Charles de Saint-Évremond, taking a more nuanced position, in Sur les poèmes des anciens (1685) anticipated both evolution and relativism: creative production must accommodate time and place—i.e., as religion, government, and manners change, so too must art.

In England, the Querelle focused somewhat less on poetry than on the relative merits of Scholasticism and its 17th-c. competition—free inquiry and induction as expounded by Francis Bacon, Robert Boyle, and Isaac Newton. Debate began with the "Essay on the Ancient and Modern Learning" in Sir William Temple's Miscellanea (1690). Temple was as reluctant to defend the ancients as he was to idolize the moderns. In 1694, William Wotton countered with Reflections on Ancient and Modern Learning, arguing for the artistic superiority of the ancients and the scientific preeminence of the moderns. The narrowly literary manifestations of the Querelle turned on the rules, known through trans. of René Rapin and Boileau, among others, and promoted by Thomas Rymer in a critique of Elizabethan drama, The Tragedies of the Last Age Considered (1678). John Dryden, a tentative defender of the rules in his Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668), proved inconsistent in his critical views, admiring the ancients but keenly aware that they and the moderns inhabited very different worlds. This implies a skeptical posture toward the unthinking and systematic application of inherited frameworks.

Independent and antidogmatic, Jonathan Swift's "Battle of the Books" (written 1697, pub. 1704) burlesques the Querelle without arriving at a definitive conclusion.

The Fr. Querelle was reignited in 1714 when Antoine Houdard de la Motte published an embellished Iliad based on the accurate prose trans. by Anne Dacier (1711). Much that Mme. Dacier had found powerful, harmonious, and majestic in Homer was condemned by La Motte in his Discours sur Homère as contemptible and graceless by mod. standards. In his celebrated Lettre à l'Académie (1718), François Fénelon straddled the issue: whereas mod. writers need not idolize their forerunners, neither should they scorn them. The Abbé Dubos had the last word in his Réflexions critiques sur la poésie et sur la peinture (1719). First, he contended, the superiority of mod. to ancient science has more to do with the quantity and quality of available fact than with reason, a universal. Second, progress in poetry and painting depends less on a knowledge of past achievements than on *invention or natural *genius. Accordingly, Dubos rejected any evaluation of art tied to the hist. of science. Echoing Boileau, Dubos argued that the final test is that of time, though he identified sentiment rather than trad. or authority as the decisive factor in aesthetic judgment.

Subsequent attitudes toward the Querelle have varied. Like Thomas Macaulay in his 1878 essay on William Temple, who dismissed this "most idle and contemptible controversy," Van Tieghem pronounces the issues unimportant and its problems ill-defined. Saisselin finds in the plethora of treatises and broadsides the very germ of major 18th-c. literary theories. While the Querelle had little impact on applied poetics, it, nevertheless, remains a remarkable case study of critical ideas and methods in conflict and change.

QUINTAIN. Sometimes called a quintet and most commonly known as a cinquain, this poem or stanza consists of five lines, sometimes with the same meter in each line but often with alternating meters and line lengths (e.g., the *limerick). The earliest Fr. poem, the 11th-c. Vie de Saint Alexis, is written in decasyllabic cinquains; in 1174, Guernes de Pont-Sainte-Maxence wrote cinquains in *alexandrines. The 19th-c. poet Victor Hugo wrote cinquains with alternating alexandrine and eight-syllable lines. In Eng., George Puttenham uses the term quintain. Examples include Philip Sidney (Psalms 4, 9, 20, 28; Astrophil and Stella, Song 9; Old Arcadia), John Donne ("Hymne to God my God"), Edmund Waller ("Go, lovely Rose"), William Wordsworth ("Peter Bell," "The Idiot Boy" in tetrameters), and E. A. Poe ("To Helen"). The Am. poet Adelaide Crapsey popularized unrhymed cinquains, inventing a syllabic form (built on the analogy to Japanese tanka [see JAPAN, MODERN POETRY OF] and influenced by *haiku) in her 1915 book Verse. Her five lines consisted of 2-4-6-8-2 syllables; and her poems were mostly iambic. Unlike Japanese tanka, Crapsey gave her cinquains titles, which often served as a sixth line. Twentieth-c. variations on Crapsey's form include the following (all syllabic): reverse (two, eight, six, four, and two syllables); mirror (a cinquain followed by a reverse cinquain); butterfly (a concrete, nine-line stanza with two, four, six, eight, two, eight, six, four, two syllables); crown (a sequence of five connected cinquains forming one poetic sequence); and garland (a series of six cinquains in which the sixth cinquain is formed from lines taken from the preceding five poems, line one from stanza one, two from two, etc.). Since the early 20th c., cinquain tends to refer specifically to Crapsey's original (two, four, six, eight, two) syllabic verse form, which has achieved specific popularity in Am. elementary classrooms as the "didactic" cinquain. The term cinquain, then, has supplanted the more general quintain, which describes only a poem or stanza of five lines rather than Crapsey's syllabic form. More specific rhyme schemes for the quintain are named the English cinquain (a poem in no specified measure with rhyme abcba), the Sicilian quintain (ababa), and the pentastich (no specified meter). Tetrameter quintains include the Spanish cinquain or quintilla* (ababa, abbab, abaab, aabab, and aabba).

QUINTILLA. A Sp. stanza form formerly considered a type of redondilla* and so called (Diego García Rengifo, Arte poética española, 1592), probably formed by the separation, in the 16th c., of the two parts of the nine- or ten-line copla de arte menor when it was embryonic (see ARTE MENOR). The quintilla is a five-line octosyllabic *strophe having the following restrictions: there may not be more than two rhymes or two consecutive rhymes, and the strophe may not end with a *couplet. The five possible rhyme combinations are, therefore, ababa, abbab, abaab, aabab, aabba. The last two combinations, which begin with a couplet, are generally avoided in the independent quintilla but frequently appear as the second half of the copla real. The quintilla probably ranks among the three or four most commonly used octosyllabic strophes in Castilian. N. Fernández de Moratín's famous Fiesta de toros en Madrid is written in quintillas employing four of the five possible rhyme schemes.

RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY. Few if any works of world lit. have had as great an impact on the theorization and production of poetry as the monumental ancient Indian epic poem the Rāmāyaṇa, composed in Sanskrit, according to trad., by the legendary poet-seer Vālmīki sometime in the middle of the first millennium BCE.

First and foremost, the ancient and copious Indian lit. on poetry and poetics generally agrees that the *epic is the original example of the poetic genre in hist. The poem itself, as it has been transmitted, contains a prologue in the form of a celebrated metapoetical narrative that tells how the sage Vālmīki, moving through a sequence of transformative personal experiences, the first edifying, the second emotive, and the third inspirational, is able to fuse them into the production of a new medium of expression, the poetic. The incident is referred to many times in later poetic works and theoretical treatises on the nature of poetry. Thus, the work is often referred to as the ādikāvya (first poem), while its author is celebrated as the ādikavi (first poet).

Equally noteworthy is how the epic has served as the inspiration for countless poetic retellings of its central narrative in virtually all of the langs. of South and Southeast Asia and several langs. of West, Central, and East Asia as well. According to some traditional works, there are no fewer than one crore (10 million) extant in the world. Many langs. have more (sometimes many more) than one Rāmāyaṇa to their credit, and in many instances, like Vālmīki's influential work, these regional versions are regarded as standing at the head of their lit. trads. Several of these are among the most important and influential literary works in their respective langs.

In Sanskrit alone, the Rāmāyaṇa has inspired dozens, perhaps hundreds, of major poems and poetic dramas that highlight different aspects of the epic tale. Important literary examples, to name but a few, are Kālidāsa's major narrative poem, the Raghuvaṃśa, and Bhavabhūti's powerful poetic dramas, the Mahāvīracarita and the Uttararāmacarita. Many Jain versions in Prakrit, such as Vimalasūri's Paumacariya, were central to that religion's lit. hist. Important and highly influential med. and early mod. poetic Rāmāyaṇas in major regional langs. continue to be read and performed and exert tremendous cultural influence. Important examples are the Tamil poet Kamban's Irāmāvatāram (early 13th c.), Kṛttibās's Bengali version (early 15th c.), and the incomparably influential devotional poem the Rāmcaritmānas of the Avadhi (Old Hindi) poet-saint Tulsīdās (late 16th c.).

RAZO (Lat. ratio, "reason," "explanation"). A brief Occitan prose narrative that tells the story leading up to the composition of a particular *troubadour song. Razos are often referred to jointly with the vidas* as the "biographies of the troubadours." Like the vidas, the razos probably originated with *jongleurs, who used them in their performances. Though typically somewhat longer than vidas, razos rarely exceed several paragraphs. Certain of the stories they recount are based on a literal interpretation of the imagery found in the poem that they purport to explain; others appear to draw from a fund of fabliau-like episodes. The material for the razos, none of which postdates 1219, must have been collected by the primary biographer Uc de Saint Circ before he left southern France for Italy. The frequent Italianisms that they contain suggest that Uc did not write the razos immediately on his arrival in the Veneto. The razos for the sirventes of Bertran de Born were produced before the other razos and always remained separate from them. The boundary between vida and razo was fluid in the Middle Ages: the extant corpus of troubadour biographies includes a number of hybrid texts bearing traits of both types.

READER. Poetry without readers is a contradiction in terms, but poets have long expected conflict between situations of production and reception, whether problems with addressed rulers, patrons, and other powerful figures who could be offended (e.g., the exiles of Ovid in 8 CE and Osip Mandelstam in 1934) or an inability to produce work appealing to a wide readership in a mass democracy. From the exclusion of poets in Plato's Republic to their dropping from publishers' lists through failing to generate sufficient sales, poets have hoped that they might a "fit audience find, though few," as John Milton put it in Paradise Lost. Such long-standing ambivalence about poetry's aim has resulted in theories and assumptions about the position and role of readers and of poets' responsibilities toward them. The range of these approaches, however theoretically elaborated, covers such duties as are outlined in Horace's Ars poetica, summarized in the phrase ut doceat, ut moveat, ut delectet (to teach, to move, to delight). Contemp. pressures include requirements to entertain or distract, to move for educative ends, or to disturb reader relations so as to effect cultural and political transformations.

During the romantic period, matching the poet's social isolation, readers were located in the margins—exemplified by John Stuart Mill's observation in "What Is Poetry?" (1833) that "eloquence is heard, poetry is *over*heard. Eloquence supposes an audience; the peculiarity of poetry appears to us to lie in the poet's utter unconsciousness of a listener. Poetry is feeling confessing itself to itself in moments of solitude." This notion best suited the poetry experiencing its heyday when Mill wrote: seemingly solitary meditation like William Wordsworth's and dramatic *monologues such as Alfred, Lord Tennyson's and Robert Browning's. In Wordsworth, even when (as in The Prelude) there is an interlocutor, the "Friend," a figure identified with S. T. Coleridge, it can still be argued that the reader, not being this friend, overhears the poem as an *apostrophe directed elsewhere. Browning's "Andrea del Sarto" appears to be an *address by its eponymous speaker to his silently departing wife. Mill's assertion protected poetry's special value as something other than propagandistic manipulation. Its influence shows in W. B. Yeats's oft-quoted 1918 aphorism that "[w]e make out of the quarrel with others rhetoric, but of the quarrel with ourselves, poetry."

Yet it may be one more defense, as in Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy, that protects by haplessly diminishing poetry's social consequence. Would Mill's theory allow for the eloquent addresses and apostrophes of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass or Allen Ginsberg's Howl? Would Yeats's aphorism explain the many poems including the prepositions to and for in their titles or dedications? Counterarguments have it that the staging of the poem as a solitary meditation is its fictional dimension (see FICTION, POETRY AS). Dorothy Wordsworth's diary shows that the inspiring occasion of "Daffodils" did not find the poet "lonely" with his thoughts but traveling with his sister. Equally, an address to a named or unnamed interlocutor—let alone an implied character receiving the poem's address, as in Browning's "My Last Duchess"—is an enabling fiction for poetic speech, the true addressee being the reader, who, far from "overhearing" what is said to a friend or projected interlocutor, receives what is obliquely directed, for instance, toward the "British Public" evoked in Browning's epic The Ring and the Book.

Such fictional dimensions of a poem's internal speaking relations were taken up by poststructuralist critics to assert a difference in kind between the empirical addressee of a letter and the fictive addressee of a poem, showing how poems containing apostrophes evoke absences, underlying the narcissistic or solipsistic spheres of the lyric, in which the poet's apostrophizing inanimate objects, *prosopopoeia, and persons (since poetry "makes nothing happen" in the words of W. H. Auden's *elegy for Yeats) constructs substitute hermetic events that survive as a "way of happening, a mouth." Yet such poetic happenings are activated in readers' lives, where things will happen, by those readers; and, despite its partiality, *reader-response theory did underline that the poem's meaning is not quite in its shaped words but in the enabling of those words through the learned and intersubjective activity of reading. Emphasizing the fictive dimension of lyric address underplayed functioning similarities between writing a love letter and a love poem and disabled enacted relationships between the reader and interlocutor or addressee of a poem—when, e.g., directed to a dedicatee of the poet's acquaintance, such as Elizabeth Bishop's "Invitation to Miss Marianne Moore." Could readers not activate an affiliation between the intimate address to a once-living person and the living person who is, at that moment, reading the poem? Such an account argues for imaginative links among interlocutors, dedicatees, addressees, and the poem's anonymous reader. This reader is not left to overhear the articulation of those relationships but invited into them by means of the poem's formal features, as an equally occasioning figure of the poem's written speech. Such reader relations have invited reflections on the pronouns I and you, as on other deictic words such as here and now, arguing against the assumption that, in poems, they have no referents (see DEIXIS). Such discussions of occasioned communication have contributed to current debates about poetry's addressing its culture with transitivity and commitment beyond the fictive through the necessary somatic response to poetry in the reader's body and nervous system.

A range of variously explicit attitudes to readers has, thus, developed from a highly conscious appeal to an assumed reader, the poet second-guessing what will please, which attitudes can be played up and which down, while at the other extreme are writers whose strategy is to address their materials and medium and to treat the reader as a figure that will be imagined into existence in the work of a genius who "creates the taste by which he shall be appreciated," in words from Thomas Noon Talfourd's 1837 campaign for the establishment of copyright. One widespread theory of modernist and experimental writing has it that, though not addressing the reader, nevertheless, its disturbances of *syntax, or unexpected *diction, are political engagements with consciousness and result in a "making of the reader."

Thus, there has been a struggle in poetry and poetics among the claims of poet, poem, reader, and interpreter. When on October 26, 1751, in the Rambler no. 168, Samuel Johnson writes of "the Force of Poetry," he places efficacy in a power of the text, put there by the poet, able to shape and change readers. Ezra Pound, writing in a postcard to Mary Barnard on February 23, 1934, of how the rhythm of a poem is "forced onto the voice" of the reader, founds his belief on poetry's efficacy as a constructed form with power over the reader's speech. Similar assumptions of poetry's power shape W. S. Graham's belief in his 1946 "Notes on a Poetry of Release" that the poem assists with "the reader's change." Yet, as Auden put it in his Yeats elegy, the poet's words are "modified in the guts of the living." The reader brings the poem to life in consciousness, in the voice and body (in silence or out loud) or in those listening to it, producing that Johnsonian force. The reader is coactive in the exchange that makes things happen.

In the light of such conflicted relations among the role of the poem, of the making poet, and of the freely responding reader, attempts have been made to articulate them as contractual, or quasi-contractual, prompting skepticism about such necessarily informal arrangements. The deconstructive crit. of Austin's performative utterances and Searle's *speech act theory underlined the banishing of the poetic to the realm of the parasitical, by arguing that lang. use is necessarily fictive (there are only parasites and no host). By contrast, its supporters have criticized that appeal to the imagined as a failure to identify how poetry may promise and affirm, if properly understood in its transactions with readers. They note that when, for instance, John Donne apparently urges us to "Go and catch a falling star," it would be mistaken to assume that he is really inciting such an action in his reader but equally wrong to suppose he does not have designs that must be realized by readers' collaborative enactment of the poem's shape and significance, a realizing that need not prevent a coming to conclusions or preferring to believe views about a woman's fidelity other than those of Donne's poem. The cultural action of poetry is as dependent on a readiness to be invited into, to engage with, and be changed by the poems we read, as it is by a capacity to evaluate, criticize, and resist them; and, to that end, let it not be forgotten, poets are first readers, too.

READER RESPONSE. An epithet applied to crit. that focuses on a *reader's or an audience's experience of a poem. In general, much more of crit. involves ideas of reader response than would appear at first glance. Any poetic theory that makes statements about how we feel as we read a poem, what poetry aims to do, how poetry affects us morally, or how we perceive the world described by the poet is making claims about reader response. Plato, in banning poets from his Republic, and those critics who assert against Plato the moral efficacy of poetry are both making assumptions about reader response. Aristotle's *catharsis, Longinus's *sublime, and mod. concepts such as Bertolt Brecht's alienation effect or the Rus. formalists' *defamiliarization all rest on reader-response claims. One could argue that poetic theory always involves a model of understanding lang., even if the model remains tacit.

More specifically, reader-response crit. refers to a group of critics who explicitly studied not a poem but readers reading a poem. This critical school emerged in the 1960s and 1970s in North America and Germany, in work by Stanley Fish, Wolfgang Iser, H. R. Jauss, and N. N. Holland. Important predecessors would include I. A. Richards, who in 1929 analyzed a group of Cambridge undergraduates' misreadings of poems, and Louise Rosenblatt, whose 1937 book insisted on the unique relationship of each reader to aesthetic texts. In opposition, W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley in 1954 attacked the *"affective fallacy." To evaluate a poem in terms of its emotional effect, they argued, was to confuse the poem with its result. They thus assumed an "objective" text, separate from its reader but entailing certain appropriate responses. The affective fallacy became a theoretical cornerstone of the *New Criticism.

The reader-response critic holds exactly the opposite view. A poem involves a psychological or phenomenological process in which author and reader interact through a physical text. Therefore, one cannot isolate some objective poem that exists prior to readers' experience of it. Critics often claim "objectivity," but that is an illusion. In fact, one can only see a poem through our human processes of perception (and they are driven by our sense of the poem's relation to our feelings and values, incl. our ideas of how one ought to read a poem).

Within this general position, critics (primarily in Germany and the U.S.) developed differing versions of reader-response theory. Some sample the responses of actual readers, while others posit on theoretical grounds a response or (more usually) a reader (the narratee [Prince], the superreader [Riffaterre], the informed reader [Fish 1967], the reader implied or required by this poem [Iser], or simply "the" reader). Among those who consider actual readers, some seek "free" responses (Bleich, Holland), while others use questionnaires that structure response. Thus, some reader-response critics regard individual differences in response as important, while others prefer to consider response as common to a class or era.

There is a fundamental distinction between those reader-response critics who envisage a largely uniform response to a poem (with unimportant personal variations) and those who see the reader in control at every point. The former say that which is common to different readers' readings results from the poem, while those who see the reader in control explain that which is common as resulting from common codes and *canons for reading that are individually applied by different readers. The most fundamental difference among reader-response critics is probably, then, between those who regard individual differences among readers' responses as important and those who do not. By and large, Ger. and other continental critics tend to use generic and theoretical concepts of the reader, Am. critics actual and individual.

E.g., Jauss's landmark paper (1967; trans. as "Literary History as a Challenge to Literary Theory") defined lit. as a dialectic process of production and reception. In reception, readers have a mental set that Jauss called a horizon of expectations (Erwartungshorizont), from which vantage point a reader, at a given moment in hist., reads. Lit. hist., then, becomes the charting of these horizons of expectations. Jauss, however, derives this horizon by reading literary works of the period, thus introducing a circularity in his theory. In subsequent writings, he dealt extensively with the kinds of pleasure we take in lit.

Iser also exemplified the Ger. tendency to theorize the reader. Drawing on the Polish aesthetician Roman Ingarden's idea of Konkretisation, Iser argues that a poem is not an object in itself but an effect to be explained. Nevertheless, he brackets the real reader and relies instead on an implied reader, the reader a given poem requires.

Among the Americans, David Bleich pioneered the study of the actual feelings and free associations of actual readers as early as 1967, and he applied his findings both theoretically, to model the reading process, and practically, to reform the classroom teaching of lit. Bleich has written extensively on particular teaching strategies using readers' responses.

In Surprised by Sin (1967), Fish provided the first reader-oriented study of a major literary work, John Milton's Paradise Lost. An appendix, "Literature in the Reader," used "the" reader to examine responses to complex sentences sequentially, word by word (such as "Nor did they not perceive the evil plight"). After the mid-1970s, however, Fish emphasized the real differences among real readers, focusing attention on the reading tactics endorsed by different critical schools and by the literary professoriate. Milton's "Lycidas" is *pastoral for one "interpretive community," a set of themes for another, and a fantasy defense for a third.

In recent years, the approach has been less a discrete method and more a widely adopted concern fused with other methods by critics who would not always accept the reader-response label. Much of the best work since 2000 has been in pedagogy; in aesthetic experiences (Felski) and affects (Ngai); and in the emotions produced in fiction (Keen).

Ethically, the reader-response critic's emphasis on the activity of the reader makes it possible to be precise about the effects of reading, e.g., self-effacement, refining one's moral criteria, learning to heed details, adding to one's knowledge, or discovering new strategies of *interpretation. In this vein, reader-response critics have often shared the concerns of critics writing from a feminist, queer, or postcolonial vantage. Such readers are likely to arrive at readings of a poem not available to a white, middle-class, Western male reader.

Socially, because reader-response critics pay attention to the strategies readers are taught to use, they have often become concerned with the teaching of reading and lit., with the profession of letters, and with the literary professoriate. What ways of reading are we teaching, and what do those ways show about our society and our values?

REALISM. The term realism denotes both a diversely practiced stylistic method and, esp. in the Ger. context, a heterogeneous period in lit. hist., during which poetry is at best of secondary importance. In either case, a succinct definition, even the speculative construction of an ideal type, of realism is made difficult by the semantic indeterminacy or multivalence of its underlying concept, reality. In principle, an understanding of what is "realistic" in an artistically created ("fictitious" or "fictional") world is based on the implicit agreement between reader and writer, differences in their subjective perceptions, purposes, and talents notwithstanding, that reality is constituted by the objective factuality of natural laws. These laws are accessible to empirical ("scientific") cognition. External events in human affairs, natural phenomena, and interpersonal experiences are determined by the logic and dynamics of cause and effect, of coherence and continuity, in their social, psychological, and material implications. This is a tenet of absolute veracity and validity. Hence, reality is identical with truth, and beauty exists objectively in real nature (and not merely in the eye of the beholder). Nature's poetic transformation into das Kunstschöne (beauty in art) can only serve the purpose of intensifying, i.e., of distilling into an aggregate of greater purity, what is already beautiful (das Realschöne, beauty in reality). Likewise, the empirical world is a meaningful entity that needs to be described in its multifarious ordinary details but not imaginatively invented or rearranged. Aesthetic theory must, therefore, uphold the fundamental conviction that reality by necessity is orderly and that it affords pleasurable experiences. Art itself is a distinctive mode of representing particular aspects of this essential structure of reality and of contributing to facilitate its sensory cognition. These widely accepted assertions, incl. their recourse to trads. of speculative idealism, established the dominance of narrative genres over all other forms of lit. in the second half of the 19th c., perhaps even preventing the emergence of a distinctly "realistic" poetry.

Critical discussions in continental Europe during the 1830s postulated realism as a school of writers and their style as arising from an aesthetic opposition to the continued authority of *classicism's idéalisme. As réalisme romantique, this realism is seen as constituting itself as a "natural" consequence of *romanticism rather than as an oppositional reaction against it, even where it follows a pointedly antipoetic orientation. The realists, in other words, appear as objective romanticists. These controversies started in the early 1820s in critical response to a style of painting that refused to transfigure the common aspects of life and hence was denounced as a distortion of reality. But they had lost much of their vehemence by 1855, when an exhibition of 40 paintings by Gustave Courbet in the pavilion "Le Réalisme" at the Paris World's Fair initiated a revaluation of critical standards.

In historical terms, by 1840, realism was concomitant with the full emergence of bourgeois culture—in France during the reign of Louis-Philippe, le roi bourgeois—even though the political and economic foundations of this culture were significantly different among the Eur. monarchies and in the U. S. In Germany esp., a mood of resignation became prevalent after the failure of the 1848 revolutions, which erased an upswell of public poetry that, with an agitating, satiric, and often antidynastic patriotic temper, had advocated republican ideals and decried the ubiquitous injustices and miseries (pauperism) inflicted on the populace. But even the rhetorical pathos of these poems seems driven by the realization that this era (the post-Napoleonic generation) is a time of shattered illusions that has, in fact, become a prosaic age. It defies any attempt to "idealize" it. Consequently, the difference between "reality" as the material of poiēsis* and its ling. articulation has to be so inconspicuous as never to challenge readers' expectations of probability, i.e., their ability to recognize their own Lebenswelt (life-world) in its artistic representations.

As a result, realistic poetry projects normal rather than extraordinary perceptions of reality. It provides plausible rather than imaginative explanations. Its style reinforces rather than questions what is generally accepted as relevant and truthful. It prefers quotidian situations and average characters with modest experiences and simple emotions, renouncing rhetorical intensity or flourishes in the interest of descriptive verisimilitude. Consistently applied, these principles would, of course, bring about the desiccation of poetry, as they did in the immensely popular and genteel versification of Emanuel Geibel (1815–84), e.g., and in the sentimental imitations of the romantics in the late 19th-c. U.S. or late Victorianism.

The Unlyrische, for the poet-novelist Theodor Fontane (1819–98) the defining characteristic of his time, was only bypassed and not disproved in attempts to absorb it in such hybrid forms as the *ballad and the verse *epic and even in the revival of the vernacular. This is perhaps also true of the Rus. poemy, long narrative poems, usually depicting the lives of the poor in colloquial language (A. N. Maikov, 1821–97, and N. A. Nekrasov, 1821–77), in A. P. Barykova's (1839–93) and I. S. Nikitin's (1824–60) poetry of social protest, or in the populist idealization of the peasantry in the narodnik movement of the 1870s. A solution to this critical dilemma would be to avoid the designation realistic altogether, speak of "poetry in the age of realism" instead, and point out its "realistic" aspects. The alternative is to accept for poetry a paradigm shift that sees all reality as perspectivism and a construction. In this sense, it would be legitimate to include both "socialist" and "magic" realism in its basic definition.

RECEPTION THEORY. See READER RESPONSE.

RECITATION. The act of repeating a written text from memory, often following conventions of elocution and dramatic representation, recitation has been central to the educational and social practices of many cultures. In Islam, for instance, Muslims are expected to memorize portions of the Qur'an, and recitation is a sophisticated art (one sense of the word Qur'an is "recitation"). In most Eur. cultures and esp. the Eng.-speaking world, the art of vernacular (as opposed to Lat.) recitation of poetry played an important role in the 18th, 19th, and early 20th cs.

The aesthetic and literary significance of recitation must be distinguished from the oral trad. In preliterate oral cultures (e.g., Homer's milieu) and in settings that draw on oral cultures (such as the Appalachian folk-ballad trad.), the *performance is the text. The performer is expected to improvise and elaborate; his or her fundamental role is to participate in the creation of the poem and its meaning. Thus, the received poem is subordinate to, and dependent on, the performer (see ORAL POETRY). By contrast, recitation, while it has an interpretive element, is not additive or improvisational; the point is to remember the written text accurately and to interpret it correctly. In other words, the performer is mostly subordinate to, and dependent on, the received text.

Before the 18th c., well-educated boys were compelled to recite Lat. poetry and prose. After the Enlightenment, however, schools shifted their focus to vernacular langs. as they opened their doors to a broader population. By the early 19th c., schools in the Eng.-speaking world were teaching children to recite from poets such as Shakespeare, William Cowper, and William Cullen Bryant. Wide literacy also meant that moderately prosperous people could enjoy poetry at home; on both sides of the Atlantic, Robert Burns rivaled Shakespeare as a favorite because his lyrics in dialect lent themselves to dramatic recitation in parlors (see DIALECT POETRY). During the 19th c., then, and in Europe and Latin America as well as Britain and the U.S., the recitation of poetry flourished in both the private and public spheres, reflecting and influencing the rise of the middle class. The Mexican critic Alfonso Reyes tells of such a family occasion, normally devoted to the declamation of romantic poetry, in which the Cuban poet Mariano Brull introduced the variety of sound poetry he called the jitanjáfora.

In the romantic period and after, the art of recitation depended, in part, on the cult of the singular *poet. Poets became role models, and reciters not only mouthed their words but sometimes internalized their values (see ABSORPTION). This sense of identity through performance tended to favor poets whose work seemed to accord with conventional middle-class values: while it led to a backlash against figures like Lord Byron, others such as Alfred, Lord Tennyson and H. W. Longfellow ascended to secular sainthood. Recitations of poetry in schools, parlors, churches, union halls, and settlement houses were believed to have an elevating effect; to recite a poem was to express both ambition and subordination to established cultural authorities. Of course, cultural authority is never evenly distributed, and some poems passed quickly into the oral trad., becoming—like folk rhymes—subject to appropriation and improvisation; examples include Jane Taylor's "The Star" ("Twinkle, twinkle," 1806), or Elizabeth Akers Allen's "Rock Me to Sleep" (1860). But poems by "great men" remained the standard in a culture of recitation that supported established literary authorities and conventions.

The culture of recitation influenced the contract between poets and their readers, pressuring poets to write accessible lyric poems that sounded melodious when read aloud (see EUPHONY). During the 18th and 19th cs., the most widely read poets produced works that engaged the voice and the ear. Some poems even took recitation as a topic, such as David Everett's "The Boy Reciter" (1791): "You'd scarce expect one of my age / To speak in public on the stage / And if I chance to fall below / Demosthenes or Cicero / Don't view me with a critic's eye / But pass my imperfections by."

Elocution manuals stressed the value of both control and emotiveness as readers learned to speak in public while curbing their "imperfections." Speakers were taught to practice articulation, inflection, emphasis, modulation, and pauses; to control their breathing; and to position their feet and hands properly. The poem was a demonstration not only of literary merit but of the speaker's training. The link between recitation and bodily control has led Robson to link poetic meter with the experience of corporal punishment. From this perspective, recitation worked as a disciplinary measure that regulated young readers' bodies and hearts. Many popular recitation pieces thematized self-making or "character building." Rudyard Kipling's "If" (1910), e.g., promises: "If you can keep your head while all about you / Are losing theirs and blaming it on you," then, in the end, ". . . you'll be a Man, my son." To remember and recite such lines could be a way not merely to learn Kipling but to make Kipling's values part of the speaker's lived and voiced experience.

Recitation, however, was not only a social performance; it was a feat of memory. William Wordsworth's The Prelude implies that the self is literally made of memories; from a romantic perspective, then, memorized poems—like other memories—become integral to the speaker's selfhood. Although many recitation pieces stress character building, many more express and elicit a longing for the past, as in J. G. Whittier's "Barefoot Boy" (1855): "From my heart I give thee joy / I was once a barefoot boy!" In this poem, the act of repeating a *refrain is also an exercise in nostalgia—and in self-assertion. To repeat a poem learned in the past is to, in some sense, recover a past self. Moreover, the practice of recitation raised, and continues to raise, questions about the nature and functions of poetry generally. When a poem is recited, what precisely is being remembered? How much depends on the text, and how much depends on the speaker?

By the mid-20th c., the practice of Eng.-lang. recitation of poetry was in decline. Progressive 20th-c. educators sometimes called it "drill and kill," implying that rote memorization deadened both the poem and the reader's enthusiasm for poetry. However, there have been sporadic calls for a revival. In his intro. to the anthol. Committed to Memory, Hollander suggests that learning a poem by heart is still one of the best ways to understand it fully. He argues that, far from "killing" poetry, the act of recitation brings poems alive by engaging the voice, the ear, and the mind. In much of the world, this lesson remains fully understood.

RECUSATIO (Lat., "refusal"). A term applied by cl. scholars to a poem in which the speaker implicitly or explicitly "refuses" to write on a certain subject or in a particular style. A type of programmatic poetry, recusationes often dramatize the poet's rejection of one kind of poem and choice of another; he may claim to have been asked to compose a different kind of poem; he may even pretend to have tried to do so; he may claim to be reacting to crit.; a god may rebuke the poet or give his approval.

Although elements of the form can be found in Sappho, fragment 16 (which implicitly rejects martial *epic poetry for amatory lyric poetry; cf. Anacreontea 26, a later imitation that makes the recusatio explicit), recusatio flourishes in the Hellenistic period, beginning with the prologue of Callimachus's Aetia and the epilogue of his "Hymn to Apollo," in both of which Apollo approves of Callimachus's rejection of grand themes (compared to the sea and the Euphrates) in favor of highly refined treatment of small subjects (compared to pure drops of water from a spring), thus beginning a long trad. in Lat. poetry that includes Virgil (Eclogues 6), Horace (Odes 1.6, 2.12, 4.2, 4.15), Propertius (2.1, 3.1, 3.3, 3.9), and Ovid (Amores 1.1, 2.1, 3.1). In line with Callimachean aesthetics, these poets refuse grand-style treatments of epic themes in favor of shorter lyric and elegiac *love poetry. Roman satirists such as Horace (Satires 2.1), Persius (Satires 5), and Juvenal (Satires 1) also expressed their poetic programs in the recusatio.

The recusatio became popular again in the Ren., esp. in anti-Petrarchan *sonnets that purport to eschew learned allusions and dense styles for straightforward treatments employing direct lang. Prominent examples in sonnets include Joachim du Bellay, Regrets 4; Philip Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 1, 3, 6, 15, 28, 74; Samuel Daniel, Delia 46; and George Herbert's two "Jordan" poems. With the exception of Robert Burns's "Epistle to J. Lapraik," the recusatio was not popular among romantic poets, but beginning with A. E. Housman's "Terence, This Is Stupid Stuff," numerous examples appeared in the 20th c., incl. W. B. Yeats's "A Coat" and "On Being Asked for a War Poem," Wallace Stevens's "The Man on the Dump," W. H. Auden's "We Too Had Known Golden Hours," J. V. Cunningham's "For My Contemporaries," Czesław Miłosz's "No More," Zbigniew Herbert's "A Knocker," and John Hollander's Powers of Thirteen, sonnet 1.

REDERIJKERS. Members of vernacular amateur literary confraternities called kamers van retorica (chambers of rhetoric), who had their heyday in the southern Netherlands, esp. in Flanders and Brabant, during the 15th and 16th cs. They also existed in the north, esp. in Zeeland and Holland. Many chambers evolved from urban confraternities such as neighborhood groups and religious brotherhoods, although analogous Fr. associations such as the puys also seem to have functioned as a model. Chambers were organized as guilds, with a name, patron saint, motto, and blason and generally designated a number of specific functions, such as the prince (patron), and the factor (principal author).

The activities of the chambers, whose membership consisted of male, mainly middle-class artisan urbanites, were characterized by a strong competitive element. The rederijkers held contests within the chamber, generally for poetry, as well as among chambers, mostly for drama (such as the Brabant landjuweel). They owed a considerable part of their prestige, as well as their official status, to their activities during urban public festivals, such as religious processions and joyous entries, where they performed literary texts and tableaux vivants. Individual rhetoricians, such as Jan Smeken from Brussels, were sometimes hired by city authorities to organize public festivals.

Typical genres practiced by the rederijkers are, in drama, the serious spel van zinne (morality play) and the comical esbattement; and in poetry, the refrein*. Their compositions are often outspokenly didactic and moralizing, with an elaborate use of *allegory, as well as formalist and complex, with frequent gallicisms and neologisms.

Well-known chambers are De Fonteine from Ghent, De Heilige Geest from Bruges, De Violieren from Antwerp (which was part of the local painters' guild of Saint Luke), and De Eglantier from Amsterdam. Many rederijker texts, such as the morality play Elckerlijc (probably the source for the Eng. Everyman) and the hybrid work, part prose novel and part verse drama, Mariken van Nieumeghen, came down to us anonymously. Nevertheless, a number of rhetoricians, like Anthonis de Roovere from Bruges, Matthijs de Castelein from Oudenaarde, Anna Bijns from Antwerp, and Louris Jansz from Haarlem seem to have enjoyed considerable renown in their own day.

REDONDILLA. A Sp. stanza form in octosyllabic quatrains, rhyming abba and sometimes called redondilla mayor, cuarteta, cuartilla. Quatrains having the rhyme abab are occasionally called redondillas but generally use the name serventesio. The redondilla written in lines of fewer than eight syllables is called redondilla menor. The term formerly included the quintilla* and was also applied to any octosyllabic *strophe in which all verses rhymed. The redondilla apparently is the result of the breaking in two at the strophic *caesura of the copla de arte menor (see ARTE MENOR). The separation was completed in the 16th c., and the redondilla has been one of the most commonly used octosyllabic strophes in Castilian ever since. Ezra Pound experimented with the form.

REFRAIN (Ger. Kehrreim). A line, lines, or the final part of a line repeated verbatim within a poem, esp. at ends of stanzas; in song, a *burden or chorus (through the 16th c., also called refreit); a structurally significant repetend separated by at least one line of nonrepeating material (hence distinguished, in Eur. poetics, from rime riche, *anaphora, and epistrophe). Refrains may be as short as one word or longer than the longest nonrepeated stanza. They may dispense with paraphrasable meaning entirely or become units of independent sense whose changing implications comment on the rest of a poem; most refrains fall somewhere in between.

A frequent (though by no means universal) feature of *oral poetry, refrain may give a solo performer time to remember the next verse or encourage communal recitation. Refrains appear in sacred writings of antiquity, incl. the Egyptian Book of the Dead, the Heb. Psalms (e.g., 24, 67), and the Rig Veda (e.g., 10:121), as well as in early Gr. *pastoral poetry, Lat. *epithalamia of Catullus (61, 64), and the OE Deor.

Refrain and forms based on refrain take on unparalleled frequency and importance in med. Europe: refrains appear in med. Lat. hymnody and antiphonal responsion, in almost all ME *carols, and in OF from ca. 1147. Refrains then become required components of such med. and Ren. forms as *ballade and roundeau, ME *tail rhyme, Dutch refrein, It. ballata, Sp. villancico*, and Port. cantiga*. Later poets (esp. in the 19th c.) can hence use refrain and forms requiring refrain to signal med. inheritance.

In ms. cultures and in oral transmission, otherwise differing poems may share a refrain, or the "same" poem may exist with various refrains. A refrain may separate itself on linguistic grounds from the rest of a poem, preserving other (almost always older) vocabulary and grammar or using another lang. altogether (e.g., Lat. refrain in ME and Ren. Eng.; Ar. refrain in Sp.; Mozarabic in 9th-c. Andalusian Heb. and Ar.). The text of a poem set down to be sung or recited often records a refrain only once: where performance trad. is lost or unclear, mod. scholars may remain unsure (as in Andalusian muwashshaḥ) whether or when a certain segment (in muwashshaḥ, the kharja*) constitutes a refrain or stands apart in some other (nonrepeated) way.

Analogous to refrain in Eur. and Eur.-derived poetics is the Persian and Persian-derived radif, a word or short phrase repeated at each line end after a given rhyme in Persian poetry from the 10th c. on, and in later poetry with Persian models, esp. Urdu and Turkish (but never Ar.). Persian and Persian-derived monorhymed forms ghazal*, qaṣīda*, and rubāʿī* (quatrain) use the same radif (if any) throughout a given poem. The radif becomes most important (and most like refrain in Eur. poetry) in the ghazal from the 12th c. (e.g., in the Persian poet Sanāʾī) on, when the ghazal in Persian becomes a fixed form. Wholly apart from Persian-influenced forms, longer refrains (of full sentences or complete ideas) occur in postclassical poetry of the Indian subcontinent, incl. Kannada vacanas (from 10th to 12th c.) and the Hindi Bhakti poetry of, e.g., Kabīr (15th c.).

Refrains in Ren. and later written poems link them to oral trads., to "folk" poetry and to song, esp. to such popular or participatory sung genres as work songs, dance songs, *ballads, *lullabies, and children's games. A mod. poet's frequent recourse to refrain (as in W. B. Yeats or Okot p'Bitek) often pays homage to oral or "folk" culture generally. Some refrains with musical settings include *nonsense, as in Shakespeare's songs, or consist entirely of it, as in Korean Koryo sogyo songs (11th c.), whose otherwise senseless refrain not only fits but imitates accompanying music.

Refrain promises regularity (even when the promise is violated or fulfilled in some nonliteral way) and implies a distinction (of speaker, *tone, subject, or audience) between repeated and nonrepeated parts. Refrain risks monotony within a long work but can bind together a short one; most poems organized around refrains are relatively short, either narrative (as ballads) or lyric. Within long works, refrain may distinguish inset lyric or odic passages from the narrative or dramatic verse that surrounds them. In mod. poems not otherwise songlike, refrain can suggest self-division, haunting, or obsession, hence mortality (E. A. Poe, "The Raven"; M.-L. Halpern, "Memento Mori") or else a congregation's call-and-response (Sterling Brown, "Old Lem"). Refrain in freestanding poems may also comment on the passage of time (Edmund Spenser, Prothalamion; Federico García Lorca, "Llanto por Ignacio Sánchez Mejía") or interrupt narrative and argument with the stronger emotion of song.

REFRÁN (Sp., "proverb"). A short, pithy, popular saying in Sp. expressing advice based on wisdom gained through common experience or observation. It may deal with any subject, such as medicine, hygiene, agriculture, morals, or philosophy, to name but a few. It is often composed of two short phrases that rhyme or contain *alliteration or employ *parallelism or have some other sound device that makes them appeal to the ear and cling to the memory. The Sp. lang. is rich in this sort of expression, and collectors have been busy for at least half a millennium gathering them into refraneros. The first known collection is the mid-15th-c. Refranes que dicen las viejas tras el fuego, generally attributed to the Marqués de Santillana. Many thousands have been gathered by dozens of collectors since then. Some of the important collections are those of Hernán Núñez, Juan de Mal Lara, Gonzalo Correas, F. Rodríguez Marín, and J. Cejador y Frauca.

REFREIN. A poetic form typical of the rederijkers* in the 15th and 16th c. Netherlands, derived from the French ballade*. A refrein (or referein) generally consists of four *stanzas. The first three have the same rhyme scheme and number of lines (13 to 17 on average); the last one, which is addressed to a prince, generally the patron of the chamber or a saint, is often shorter and has a different rhyme scheme. Each stanza ends with an identical line, called the stock.

On the basis of content, the rederijkers distinguished between refreinen in t'zot (comical), in t'vroed (religious, didactic, moralistic), and in t'amoureus (amatory). Refreinen were often written in the context of a competition, between the members of a chamber or between chambers (called refreinfeest). They had to integrate a given stock or provide an answer to a specific question. The poems were generally recited, in a lively, theatrical, yet always spoken manner but could also be posted in a public place.

Most of the well-known rhetoricians, such as Anthonis de Roovere, Matthijs de Castelein, Anna Bijns, and Eduard de Dene, left a significant number of refreinen. The majority of the extant specimens of the genre came down to us anonymously, however, e.g., in the refrein-collections by the rederijker Jan van Styevoort and by the printer Jan van Doesborch, although the name of the author is sometimes integrated into the poem in the form of an *acrostic.

REJET. Part of the Fr. prosodic terminology for enjambement (see ENJAMBMENT) but equally applicable to other verse systems. Rejet refers to the word, or small word-group, rejeté by enjambment into a following line, so that the larger part of the syntactic unit interrupted by the line ending occurs in the preceding line, e.g., Victor Hugo: "C'est le sceau de l'état. Oui le grand sceau de cire/Rouge" (It is the seal of state. Yes, the great seal of red wax). A rejet can also occur line-internally (rejet à l'hémistiche), where there is syntactic overflow across the caesura, from the first hemistich to the second, e.g., Charles Baudelaire: "Pour qui? C'était hier//l'été; voici l'automne!" (For whom? It was summer yesterday; now autumn is here!). Correspondingly, contre-rejet refers to the word, or small word-group, initiating an enjambment, where the larger part of the syntactic unit interrupted by the line ending occupies the following line. Contre-rejet likewise has a line-internal equivalent (contre-rejet à l'hémistiche), where the caesura isolates the smaller part of the syntactic unit in the first hemistich, e.g., Hugo: "Le Sauveur a veillé pour tous les yeux, pleuré/Pour tous les pleurs, saigné//pour toutes les blessures" (The Saviour has watched for all eyes, wept/For all tears, bled//for all wounds).

RELATIVE STRESS PRINCIPLE. One of the most important theories in mod. metrics, the principle of relative stress asserts that the degree of stress of a syllable is determined in relation to the stress of the syllables adjacent to it. It was first articulated in a 1900 lecture by Otto Jespersen, who stated that relative stress results from "a natural tendency towards making a weak syllable follow after a strong one and inversely." E.g., the stress pattern of the word uphill differs in the phrases: "to walk uphill" and "an uphill walk." The stress shifts from "up*hill*" in the first instance, to "*up*hill" in the second: it is the position of the syllables relative to the strongly stressed syllable "walk" that causes this shift. "Thus," states Jespersen, "syllables which ought seemingly to be strong are weakened if occurring between strong syllables, and naturally weak syllables gain in strength if placed between weak syllables." This "effect of surroundings" is heard in the way that the phrase "when one" is pronounced in the following line: "I know when one is dead and when one lives." In the first instance, "one" receives the stronger stress; in the second, "when" is stronger. Jespersen used four degrees of accent, rather than two, to scan relative stress. In this system, he accounted for metrical regularity in places where a traditional foot-based prosody might not. In foot-based scansion, the line "In the sweet pangs of it remember me" contains pyrrhic and spondaic substitution in the first two feet. However, Jespersen scans the first four syllables as four increasing degrees of stress. Thus, the syllables "in the" are iambic in relation to each other; likewise "sweet pangs." While foot-based prosody sees two variations of feet in this line, relative stress sees only one departure from an overall iambic pattern: the stress increase between the third and fourth syllable. Because relative stress places equal attention to such relationships occurring between metrical feet, the principle leads Jespersen to reject the notion of the foot.

RELIGION AND POETRY

I. Introduction
II. Ancient Works
III. Medieval Works
IV. Modern Works
V. Modern Responses

I. Introduction. It has been said that all poetry is religious and just as firmly that poetry excludes religion. Those who affirm the former position sometimes argue that the earliest poetry arises from the celebration of fertility rites and that, although later poetry may distance itself from its religious origin, it never quite escapes it: religious motifs—inspiration, rebirth, the divided border between life and death—get reworked in secular poetry, taking on new significations rather than being eliminated altogether. Northrop Frye articulates a version of this view in his Anatomy of Criticism (1957), and in doing so, he draws on the work of the Cambridge School of Anthropology: J. G. Frazer, Jane Harrison, Francis Cornford, and Gilbert Murray, among others. Those who argue that poetry excludes religion tend to agree with the 18th-c. Eng. critic Samuel Johnson in his "Life of Waller" that poetry turns on *invention and that a revealed religion such as Christianity does not lend itself to invention, or they maintain with T. S. Eliot that poetry requires firsthand experience and that religion offers itself to us as secondhand experience at best. Religious poetry, Eliot argues, is mostly minor poetry; it invites the writer to pretend to feel things that he or she does not and restricts experience to a small range, too small to generate poems of wide appeal and lasting power.

Such large-gestured claims about religion and poetry are perhaps only to be expected when allowing two overdetermined concepts to engage one another without mediation. Although religious poetry does not specify either a genre or a mode, more clarity and precision may be found by examining the conjunction of religion and poetry from the perspectives of lit. hist., mode, and *genre. The line that divides ritual from secular space in poetry is seldom straight and continuous.

II. Ancient Works. The majestic Hindu narrative the Rāmāyaṇa may well be the oldest religious *epic; it is dated to 300 BCE, if not earlier. The poem consists of 24,000 verses arranged in seven books. It tells the story of Rāmā, the seventh incarnation of Viṣṇu, whose wife Sītā is taken by Ravana, emperor of the demons. The poem is less a literary work about a religious trad. (John Milton's Paradise Lost, e.g.) than an integral part of that trad. (see RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY). Rāmā is worshiped as a god, as well as revered as an epigone of male honor. Venerated in India as a work of great wisdom, the Rāmāyaṇa broods on ideal types (brother, king, servant, and wife) and on dharma, the righteous path that each person must take in life, one that requires different things of people at different times. A short version of the Rāmāyaṇa, known as the Rāmopākhyāna, in which Rāmā has no divine traits, may be found in the third parva of the Mahābhārata, the other vast religious epic of Hinduism and the longest epic poem in the world. Its beginnings in oral trad. may go back to the Vedic age, 8th c. BCE, although it reached its immense size only in the Gupta age in the 4th c. CE. The sixth parva, the Bishna Parva, contains the Bhagavad-Gītā, in which Kṛṣṇa (Krishna) speaks to Arjuna on the eve of battle and reveals himself as the god who destroys as well as creates. Older than even the Rāmāyaṇa are the Vedas, the most archaic texts of Hinduism, which range from *incantations and *charms to sacred *hymns. Orthodox believers hold them to be revealed texts; nonorthodox believers regard them as inspired poems.

The Finnish folk epic the Kalevala has its oldest stratum in ancient oral verse, which was sung to the accompaniment of the kantele, a sort of zither, also used to accompany the songs collected in the Kanteletar, incl. both pagan and Christian lyrics. "Prayer for Peace" is addressed to Ukko, the chief god of the Finnish pantheon (ukko in Finnish means "old man"). "The Ballad of the Virgin Mary" is strikingly at variance with the standard Christian teaching: Jesus is born after Mary swallows a berry. (A version of the same story is told at the very end of the Kalevala.) Both the Kalevala and the Kanteletar were late in being transcribed and edited; the process for the Kalevala began in the late 17th c., and the epic was given its final editorial shape of 22,795 lines by Elias Lönnrot only in 1849. The hero of the poem is Väinämöinen who, like all shamans, communicates with the spirit world. This is an epic rich in spells and magic, in demons and other spirits. (Shamanic poetry is not restricted to the West; it may be found in China—Qu Yuan's "Nine Songs" in the 4th-c. BCE Chuci*, e.g.—and somewhat later in Korea.) The first Väinämöinen cycle of the Kalevala explains the origin of the earth: a traditional function of religion. The Judeo-Christian explanation of creation may be found in the writings of the priestly author in the sublime opening of Genesis, the first book of the Heb. Bible. For the Gr. Hesiod in his Theogony (ca. 700 BCE), there is no creation story but rather a genealogy of the gods. Quite different are the early song cycles of the Australian aborigines, for here the emphasis is not on a pantheon of gods but on the acts of the ancestors, the construction of sacred nara shade, the naming of holy trees and drinking holes, and singing the country into being. The Djanggawul cycle, for instance, consists of 188 songs that chart the Djanggawul people on their passage from Bralgu Island, home of the Bralgu Spirits, to Port Bradshaw, and their progressive establishment of sacred sites on the mainland.

Explanations of creation and sacred sites, along with stories of communicating with the spirit world, appear in some early narrative poems, though certainly not all. Homer's world is full of gods, and Odysseus speaks with the spirits of the mighty dead, but no explanation of the origin of life is given. Of course, the genre of the epic does not have a monopoly on religion in the ancient world. The plays of Sophocles and Aeschylus, poetry of the first order, are thoroughly religious in impulse, being concerned with the vexed relations between mortals and immortals, with hubris and guilt, and with the apparently feckless actions of the gods. Religious feelings, sometimes intertwined with myths and legends, are also to be found in *lyric poems in the ancient world. The Psalms, conventionally associated with King David, are among the most commanding religious poems ever composed. Not all religious lyrics are preserved in scriptural canons, however. Pindar's *odes, composed in the 5th c. BCE, praise the victors in athletic competitions; yet the very theme of success requires Pindar to sound darker notes of warning, for triumph comes only with the consent of the gods who, if they observe too much hubris, will punish it unflinchingly. The Olympic pantheon appears in the odes, along with other divine or semidivine beings, and, from time to time, an ode is consumed with religious thought: the second Olympian, for instance, dilates for many lines on the afterlife.

Long before Pindar and even Homer, poets were intoning charms, spells, and poems that name the sacred, examples of which have survived in Africa, the Americas, Asia, and Oceania. There were also hymns to the gods. Enheduanna, earliest of all known poets, who flourished about the year 2300 BCE, served as a high priestess in ancient Sumer. Her "Hymn to Inanna" praises the moon goddess for her might as well as for her beauty. Hymns served liturgical functions in the ancient cults, and Christianity absorbed this practice: the Eastern liturgy features several solemn hymns, incl. the "Cherubikon," which was inserted into the standard liturgy in the 6th c. The first important Christian poet, Prudentius (ca. 348–405) is remembered for the Peristephanon, 14 hymns celebrating the lives and acts of the martyrs, and for the Cathemerinon, 12 hymns that give a Christian inflection to everyday events such as waking, eating, and sleeping. Passages from Prudentius's hymns may be found in the Sp. Mozarabic Breviary.

III. Medieval Works. If we order world lit. according to the Western conception of the med. age, a long and varied period between the ancient world and modernity, we find a rich corpus of religious poetry. One finds Bhakti lyrics, poems of acute religious devotion, such as those Rābiʿah, an 8th-c. Sufi, a follower of the mystical strain of Islam. Of equal beauty are the lyrics of Ḥāfiẓ, a Sufi poet of the 14th c., and Kabīr whose work is claimed with equal zeal by Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs. Widely regarded as the pinnacle of Islamic poetry is the Masnavī* of Rūmī, a poem in about 26,000 couplets written in the 13th c. in Farsi and Arabic. How we pass from the material world to the divine world is Rūmī's high theme, which is explored also in many of his other lyrics. Verses of the Qur'an are folded into the Masnavī: the line between poetry and canonical scripture is hard to trace here.

In 10th-c. Hinduism, one finds an eruption of vacanas, intense religious lyrics in unmetered verse. Mahādēviyakka, a 12th-c. devotee of Śiva, speaks movingly to her "lord white as jasmine" about the sheer difficulty of living in this world while longing for the spiritual world. Yet it is Mīrābāī, a 16th-c. rather than a med. Bhakti poet, who has written the poems that most intimately resonate with mod. readers in the West. "All I was doing was being, and the Dancing Energy came by my house," she says: her candor and freshness are attractive. The Christian West features many beautiful lyrics, mostly anonymous, devoted to Mary and Jesus: e.g., "I sing of a maiden" and "Quia amore langueo," both from the early 15th c.

If we turn to China, we find poems informed by Taoism, Buddhism, and Confucianism, sometimes with traces of all three in the one piece. By the time of the T'ang dynasty, there are poems in which one discerns a Buddhist emphasis on rinsing the mind of attachment so as to see clearly. Liu Zongyuan's lyric "River Snow," dated to the late 8th or early 9th c., is a prime example of a religious attitude being delicately suggested rather than stated:

> A thousand mountains. Flying birds vanish.
> Ten thousand paths. Human traces erased.
> One boat, bamboo hut, bark cape—an old man
> Alone, angling in the cold river. Snow.
> (trans. Barnstone and Ping)

Korean poetry of the same period is similarly inflected by Buddhist themes. The hyangga or native songs of Yi Kyu-bo in the 13th c. express Buddhist concern for the well-being of ordinary folk as well as for transcendence of this world. In Japan, the 8th-c. Kojiki, the earliest surviving book of the culture, gathers poems about many things, not only the imperial family and other important families but the creation and the gods, along with ritual songs used in the Shinto religion. Also compiled in the 8th c. is the massive Man'yōshū*, which includes long and short poems, some of which go back to the 4th c. The earliest poems included show Confucian or Taoist influence, while later ones are almost all Buddhist in orientation, even though the number of poems dealing explicitly with Buddhist themes is small. In the 13th c., there is compiled the Ogura Hyakunin Isshu, a survey of Japanese poetry from the 7th c. to the middle of the 12th: 100 poems by 100 poets. Many are love poems, but there are several in which Buddhism appears covertly or even overtly.

Looking forward, past the Western med. period but in the same poetic trad., we can glimpse the 17th-c. poet Bashō who, with winning subtlety, relates a spiritual as well as a physical journal in his Narrow Road to the Interior. Bashō's journey to Oku is, as the name itself suggests in Japanese, a passage away from civilization as well as to the place most deeply within oneself. The haibun* that compose the work, prose interspersed with haiku (see RENGA), are marvels of a hard-won simplicity. Years of study of Zen, incl. the poems attributed to the 9th-c. Chinese Zen poet Hánshān (the Cold Mountain poems) resulted for Bashō in a poetry that is at once profound Zen and high art.

Religious dream poetry begins early in Britain: the Anglo-Saxon alliterative poem "The Dream of the Rood," about the Cross of Jesus, is preserved in a 10th-c. Vercelli Book. Piers Plowman, a long alliterative poem composed in the late 14th c. by William Langland, embodies the quest for the true Christian life; its mixture of *dream vision and *allegory, along with its caustic social satire, take us deeply into the Eng. Catholic mind in the Middle Ages. The same is true of Eng. play cycles, the most moving of which are the York Corpus Christi plays, which relate the entire story of salvation hist., from Creation to Eschaton, in lively verse. They were performed from the middle of the 14th c. until the middle of the 16th c. Dante's Divine Comedy, written in the 14th c., relates the solemn passage of the author through hell, purgatory, and paradise; it remains the summa of med. Christian self-understanding, the strongest poem ever written in *terza rima, and an inescapable work of the Western literary imagination.

The Middle Ages have bequeathed us Lat. as well as vernacular poetries. Some are anonymous hymns, such as the 7th or 8th c. "Ave maris stella" (Hail star of the sea) whose art is contained in its stark purity, and the "Veni, creator Spiritus" (Come creator spirit), trans. by, among others, John Dryden. Others are anonymous *carols, such as the 13th-c. "Cantet omnis creatura," or sequences in the Mass, such as the "Rosy Sequence," dated to the late 12th c. The "Dies irae," a sublime 13th-c. Lat. hymn, evokes the Day of Judgment and is incorporated in the requiem Mass. Sts. Ambrose, Bonaventure, Thomas Aquinas, and Hildegard of Bingen all wrote religious lyrics in Lat. Special mention should be made of Aquinas's "Pange, linguae, gloriosi corporis mysterium," still sung in trans. throughout Europe at the feast of Corpus Christi.

IV. Modern Works. Until modernity, poetry did not have to be devotional in order to be religious. Religion supplied an overarching imaginative structure within which writers worked. Secular poems were written and sung, but they were not informed by a comprehensive imaginative structure known as "modernity" in which science, rather than religion, is held to offer the better explanation of cosmic events. One does not think of Chaucer as a religious poet, but the 14th-c. Canterbury Tales is deeply informed by Christian practices. Shakespeare is a more difficult writer to assess in this regard: whatever his personal beliefs may have been, his vision does not harmonize with Christian understandings of life and death. And yet it would be impossible to understand his plays without a working knowledge of Christianity. There is no one version of modernity, however: in the West, it comes in various waves (the age of the Alexandrian Library, the Carolingian age, the Ren., the Enlightenment); and outside the West, it comes more hesitantly. Orthodoxy resists modernity to some extent, while many Muslims deflect the encounter, at least with respect to the understanding of scripture.

Supreme among Eur. religious poets in the 16th c. is the Sp. Carmelite mystic St. John of the Cross, whose Cántico espiritual (Spiritual Canticle) resets motifs from the biblical Song of Songs: the soul searches for the heavenly Bridegroom, Christ. the Dark Night of the Soul, a lyric poem of exquisite beauty and imagistic richness, also tells of the soul's quest for a loving union with God. That the soul must suffer in its quest has become known in the Christian West as the experience of "the dark night." John's line-by-line commentary on his poem is itself a work of piercing spiritual insight.

In the 17th c., it was still possible to write a religious epic. In Paradise Lost (1667, 1674), Milton seeks "[t]o justify the ways of God to man," which he does by tracing the fall of the angels and then showing how Lucifer brings about the fall of humankind. The theology of Paradise Lost is far from orthodox, for Milton's God is not a trinity. William Blake was doubtless correct when he declared in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1790) that Milton wrote better of evil than good because he "was a true Poet and of the Devils party without knowing it." Milton's Lucifer is a romantic figure; his God is a tyrant. A wayward religious genius himself, Blake imitated biblical lang. while also developing a quasi-Christian mythological system in long poems such as Vala, or The Four Zoas (1797) and Jerusalem (1820). Many of his short lyrics, such as the preface to Milton (1808; "And did those feet in ancient times"), are among the most piercing religious poems of all time. The lyric is based on the legend that the young Jesus visited England. Unorthodox though the theology of the poem surely is, the lyric's setting by Hubert Parray in 1916 made it a much-loved hymn in Brit. churches.

Of Eng. religious lyricists in the 17th c. the major figures are George Herbert whose The Temple (1633) is a spiritual autobiography in exquisite lyrics, some of which are shaped ("The Altar" and "Easter Wings"), and John Donne whose Holy Sonnets and hymns are indexes of a passionate religious sensibility. If later poets such as Richard Crashaw, Henry Vaughan, and Thomas Traherne are less often discussed, it is only because of the poetic authority of the generation that preceded them. To find a Christian poet of comparable sway to Herbert, one must wait until the 19th c. when G. M. Hopkins's poems, incl. his great *ode "The Wreck of the Deutschland" (1876), were written. His *sonnets, whether of ecstatic praise or spiritual desolation, mark an intensity of religious feeling seldom reached in any lang. In America, many of Emily Dickinson's lyrics offer witness to a similar spiritual potency, although it is a religion affirmed on her own terms. Another Victorian, Matthew Arnold, serves as a counterweight to Hopkins's Ultramontane ode about a physical and a spiritual shipwreck. "Dover Beach" (1867) speaks of supernatural faith leaving the earth, so that the poet can almost hear "[i]ts melancholy, long, withdrawing roar."

The withdrawal of the Christian God is a theme sounded throughout Friedrich Hölderlin's odes and elegies, mostly written in the late 18th c. and the first years of the 19th c. When human beings turn away from God, God turns away from them. Yet this "default of God," as Hölderlin calls it, does not erase a sense of the sacred for the Ger. poet; on the contrary, for Hölderlin, it is the poet who keeps that sense alive: a theme that weaves its way through romantic poetry and that Heidegger intensifies in his elucidations of Hölderlin's poems. Whether the romantics preserve religion by way of the *sublime or hold it there to be unpicked by philosophers in the 20th c. is still debated (see ROMANTICISM). Certainly with the romantics and those who follow them, religious awareness is dissociated from doctrine. René Char, who writes in the wake of Hölderlin and alongside Heidegger, inflects this association of poetry and the sacred in his own way and combines a pre-Christian sense of the sacred with deep feeling for the landscape of his native Provence. His sequence "Lascaux" is a prime example. Even more compelling in its spiritual intensity is the poetry of R. M. Rilke, whose Sonnets to Orpheus (1923) and Duino Elegies (1923) both exude a strong religious disposition in which the poet crosses the border between this world and the next and in which Christianity and Judaism are pushed to the margins.

Charles Baudelaire, by contrast, adopts a distinctly anti-Christian attitude in his Flowers of Evil (1857). For all his celebration of evil, however, his prizing of the symbol in the sonnet "Correspondances" generates a displaced religiosity in poetry, one taken up ecstatically by Arthur Rimbaud, who saw himself as a mod. savant, and then was further folded in an intricate manner by the surrealists, and then unfolded in ultraorthodox Catholic terms by Paul Claudel. In Claudel's versets, esp. in his Five Great Odes (1907), one experiences a violent upsurge of baroque Catholic feeling. The influence of the Vulgate trans. of the Psalms is apparent. Lyrics influenced by his theological insight into Sophia or Wisdom were composed in Rus. by Vladímir Soloviev in the late 19th c.; of course, Rus. religious poetry has deep roots in the old oral trad. of dukhovnye stikhi or spiritual verses, some of which are still recited today. A longing for the infinite also pervades the emotionally charged lyricism of Anna Akhmatova and Osip Mandelstam. Alphonsus de Guimaraens and Augusto Frederico Schmidt, both 20th-c. Brazilians, also testify to a strong sense of mystery and the eternal in their lyrics. Getting to be better known in the West today is the astonishing 19th-c. Urdu poet Ghālib, whose ghazals* express a strong personal religion of love, combined with a disdain for those he regarded as overly traditional in their Islamic faith.

T. S. Eliot's admirable poem of conversion Ash Wednesday (1930) and the more contemplative Four Quartets (1936–42) interlace lines from The Book of Common Prayer and med. Eng. mystical writings. Both poems seek to recover authentic religious feeling as the basis for traditional Christian teachings, and the Quartets in particular register a strong sense of "the darkness of God." With the early poems of Robert Lowell ("The Quaker Graveyard in Nantucket," 1946, e.g.) and the work of the Australian Francis Webb, we find more fervent Catholic verse. More nuanced in their Catholic imagery are the lyrics of the 20th-c. Korean poet Chŏng Chi-yong, whose poems have been touched by Blake's Songs of Innocence as well as by the landscape of his own childhood. W. H. Auden explores the world of Protestant thought and feeling, often with a strong ethical flavor: his sequence Horae Canonicae remains memorable. For works later in the century, we often need to talk of religiosity or spirituality rather than religion (as in poems that show awareness of a spirit or natural force: Robert Bly and Philippe Jaccottet are examples); or of poetry that diagnoses failed religious experience, such as Geoffrey Hill's Tenebrae (1978); or of poetry that regards itself as a stairway to a God who can no longer be believed in (Charles Wright, for instance), or of poetry marked by a Western understanding of Buddhism (Gary Snyder and Robert Gray, e.g.).

The horror of the Holocaust has generated more religious poetry among Jews than Christians. The Holocaust remains a religious issue for Christians, yet it has scarcely entered poetry in the mode of religious feeling or thought. Paul Celan's "Psalm" in his The No-Man's-Rose (1963) "praises" God as "No one" and walks the delicate border between Rhineland mysticism and mod. atheism. Edmond Jabès's The Book of Questions (1963–73) reflects in fragments, some lyrical, on the Shoah and generates pseudo-Talmudic commentaries on life in a world in which God is painfully absent. Yehuda Amichai's poems bear witness to a personal struggle with faith, and for him the word God means something different before and after the Shoah. An immense heritage of Jewish religious poetry precedes him, beginning with the Bible and incl., among many others, the oeuvre of Jehudah Halevi (ca. 1074–1141), many of whose poems associate the suffering of Israel with the hidden name of God and make use of the Song of Songs.

V. Modern Responses. Religious poetry has not attracted the detailed attention of the best-known mod. literary critics although specialists attend closely to many of the poets already named. Fairchild's six-volume Religious Trends in English Poetry remains a valuable reference; and individual studies by Buckley on the sacred in the poetry of Donne, Blake, and Eliot; Lynch on the theological imagination; and Scott on mod. poetry and "sacramental vision" are touchstones still for students, as is Gardner's Religion and Literature. Perhaps the most irruptive works on poetry and religion are those of Heidegger (his essays on Rilke and Georg Trakl, as well as those on Hölderlin) and Bloom's Charles Eliot Norton Lectures gathered together as Ruin the Sacred Truths, a Gnostic interpretation of poetry from the Bible to the present day. Anthols. of religious poetry, generally understood, appeared in significant numbers in the late 20th c. Some emphasize the number of centuries poets have been writing religious poetry, what can plausibly count as religious poetry, and the different cultures in which such poetry has been written. Anthols. by Bly and Hirshfield are prominent examples of this trend and remind us that, in the East, the distinction between the secular and the sacred often works in quite different ways from how it does in the West.

REMATE. A Sp. metrical term denoting a short stanza placed at the end of a poem and serving as a conclusion to the poem. The remate generally repeats the last rhymes of the preceding full-length strophe. It is most commonly used at the end of the canción. In it, the poet addresses himself to the canción, giving it a special message to bear to a particular person, "recognizing some flaw in the canción, or making an excuse for it, or telling it what it must answer if it should be found wanting in some respect" (Diego García Rengifo, Arte poética española, 1592). It has also been called vuelta, commiato, despido, envio, ripressa, ritornelo (retornelo), and contera.

RENAISSANCE POETICS

I. Introduction
II. The Defense of Poetry
III. The Language of Poetry
IV. The Genres of Poetry
V. The Principle of Imitation
VI. Rhetoric and Poetics
VII. Conclusion

I. Introduction. Lit. crit. was first recognized as an independent form of lit. and the critic first accepted as a new kind of writer in the Ren.; indeed, nearly all mod. *poetics derives directly from ideas advanced in this period. Ren. crit. began in the struggle to defend imaginative lit. against attacks of immorality and frivolity and to put forward the tenets and practices of humanist education. In establishing a place for the writing and study of poetry, the use of the vernacular was debated (and also vindicated); genres were distinguished, each with its own conventions; the humanist movement instituted as the basis of poetics the practice of imitating cl. texts; and rhetoricians supplied a basic technē or set of rules on which poetic art could rely.

II. The Defense of Poetry. Giovanni Boccaccio in his Genealogia deorum gentilium (Genealogy of the Gentile Gods, 1360) and in his Life of Dante laid down the main lines for defending poetry against clerical and secular charges. He argues that *religion and poetry are not opposed; on the contrary, the Bible is poetry and teaches, as all poetry does, by means of *allegory, i.e., *metaphors with fixed and continuing referents. In addition, the poets were cast as the first theologians. Seemingly immoral pagan stories may thus be interpreted in wholly moral ways. For Boccaccio, even the story of Leda and the swan could be viewed allegorically as anticipating (or shadowing) the Virgin and the dove. Boccaccio also defended poetry against charges of frivolity, arguing that it had always been admired by the people, protected by their leaders and rulers, and supported by wealthy patrons. Moreover, the poet is a creator like God himself; there is, Boccaccio says, no higher vocation possible for the human.

Once these arguments were in place, they were copied, expanded, and developed in nearly all It., Fr., Sp., and Eng. defenses of poetry from the 14th through the 16th c. Meanwhile, much technical lore about cl. poetry was spread abroad through elaborately annotated eds. of Horace's Ars poetica, most esp. the popular ed. by Badius Ascensius first pub. in Paris in 1500. The result was summed up in It. crit. by Marco Girolamo Vida's De arte poetica (1527), a long verse treatise imitating Horace but also incorporating much humanist theory about the moral purpose and genres of poetry and the function of the critic. As for theory relating specifically to vernacular poetic theory, the most important work of the early 16th c. is Giangiorgio Trissino's La poetica (books 1–4, 1529; books 5–6, 1563), an elaborate analysis of It. *versification and verse conventions.

A new factor was introduced into Eur. lit. crit. in 1508 with the publication by Aldus Manutius of a reliable Gr. text of Aristotle's Poetics and a Lat. trans. by Alessandro Pazzi in 1536. The Poetics was known in the Middle Ages only through a Lat. trans. of a paraphrase by the Arab philosopher Averröes and a badly flawed Lat. trans. by Lorenzo Valla that was published in the late 15th c. Pazzi's Lat. trans. was an immediate and powerful stimulus to critical thought. Detailed commentaries on the Poetics began to appear in the 1540s and continued to be produced in Italy throughout the rest of the century. In the earlier commentaries—e.g., those by Francesco Robortello (1548) and by Vincenzo Maggi and Bartolomeo Lombardi (1549)—Aristotle mixes theories derived from rhet. with didactic theories drawn from the humanist trad. and from Horace. In general, these treatises interpret *catharsis as purgation of wicked impulses, and *tragedy as a form providing examples of vices to avoid.

The most famous It. Ren. commentary on Aristotle is Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e sposta (1570, 1576) by Lodovico Castelvetro, which insists that tragedy is popular entertainment and that catharsis is insensitivity to suffering created by seeing it in plays. After 1540, most full-blown It. critical essays—e.g., Antonio Minturno's De poeta (1559), usually considered a source of Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy (written ca. 1580, pub. 1595)—draw heavily on Aristotle. These texts usually treat lit. as a source of moral instruction through examples of virtue and vice. They regularly combine Aristotelian ideas with the Horatian trad. that poetry should "profit" morally, even as it "delights." More narrowly focused treatises—e.g., Giambattista Giraldi Cinthio's Discorso intorno al comporre dei romanzi (1554)—mix Aristotelian ideas with ideas drawn from theories of vernacular versification and trads. about popular vernacular genres such as romance.

Whatever the point of view, after 1540 few critical treatises were written in Italy that did not draw on the Poetics. That the Sp. followed the It. lead is illustrated by Alonso Pinciano's Filosofía antigua poética (1596), a commentary on the Poetics treating *imitation, verisimilitude, and wonder, among other topics. In northern Europe, conversely, the influence of Aristotle is not felt until the last quarter of the 16th c. Indeed, in northern Europe the most influential critical work was, for many years, the massive but derivative Poetices libri septem (1561) of J. C. Scaliger. Although Aristotle is often cited by northern Eur. critics in the last quarter of the 16th c., not until 1611 with the De tragoediae constitutione of Daniel Heinsius was a study of the Poetics produced comparable in scope and sophistication to its It. predecessors; but with Heinsius, we begin to move from Ren. to *neoclassical poetics.

Another critical position, deriving from Aristotle's

Rhetoric, appears in, e.g., Baltasar Gracián's Agudeza y arte de ingenio (Cleverness and the Art of Wit, 1648) in Spain and Emanuele Tesauro's Il cannocchiale aristotelico (The Aristotelian Telescope, 1654) in Italy. Concettismo (see CONCEIT, CONCEPTISMO), as it is called, is concerned neither with plot and character nor with moral uplift. Instead, it is concerned with the effect of brilliant *imagery, understood for the most part as pleasure and awe.

III. The Language of Poetry. It. theories about poetic lang. were much influenced by the revival of interest in cl. poetry that occurred in the 14th c. The humanist movement thus generated spent much of its early years interpreting—and in some cases recovering and perfecting through imitation—Gr. and Lat. mss., even though some of the best poets, such as Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, were writing in the vernacular. Humanists assumed that the great texts of the past, in all genres, were best in the cl. langs., esp. Lat. The support of vernacular writing was further complicated in Italy because of the many dialects in the separate city-states: the country as yet had no national unification and no national lang. Hence, those interested in a vernacular body of work had first to defend a particular dialect for it (see ITALY, POETRY OF).

Dante's De vulgari eloquentia (ca. 1304) is the first and still the best argument for vernacular lit.; it has no worthy successor until Leon Battista Alberti's Trattato del governo della famiglia (1438), which contends that the vulgar (or common) tongue would become as polished as Lat. if patriotic writers gave it their attention. In Prose della volgar lingua (1525), Pietro Bembo claims that the Florentine dialect is as good as Lat., and even superior to it as a lang. for mod. subjects. Since Florentine was the one dialect with a strong literary trad., most Italians who wrote in the vernacular used it, yet some opposed it in favor of a truly national literary lang. they termed "Italian" or even "Courtier's Tongue." Il Calmeta and Baldassare Castiglione (esp. in his Il Cortegiano, 1528) were foremost among these proponents, although they took most of their arguments from Dante's earlier essay.

Nationalism also aided the cause of vernacular lit. in France. Joachim du Bellay's La Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse (1549) is firmly nationalistic. Du Bellay took many of his arguments from the Dialogo delle lingue of Sperone Speroni (1542); he claims that the Fr. are as good as the Romans, so that it follows that their lang. is equally good. It is, therefore, the patriotic duty of all Fr. scholars and poets to write in Fr. and enrich the lang.; translators can also participate by enlarging the Fr. vocabulary with words "captured" from other langs. (see FRANCE, POETRY OF).

The Eng. were, if possible, even more nationalistic than the Fr., yet the widespread taste for Lat. produced by grammar-school education made the battle more difficult than it might otherwise have been. Roger Ascham writes in Toxophilus (1545), his defense of the use of the ancient longbow in battle, that "to have written this book either in Latin or Greek . . . had been more easier." Indeed, in the 17th c., Francis Bacon had some of his more important scientific works pub. in Lat. because he feared that "these modern languages will at one time or other play bankrupt with books." On the other hand, Richard Mulcaster, a prominent educator, thought of Eng. as "the joyful title of our liberty and freedom, the Latin tongue remembering us of our thraldom and bondage." In this, he undoubtedly spoke for the majority of the Eng. people. Both in England and in northern Europe, the cause of national langs. and lits. was enhanced by the growing Reformist and Protestant movements, which insisted that the scriptures be translated and available for all believers to read for themselves.

But once the cause of vernacular poetry was established, the practice raised problems of its own. The initial problem was *meter: how could a vernacular lang. (lacking *quantity) imitate the (quantitative) meter natural to Gr. and Lat.? Claudio Tolomei in his Versi et regole de la nuova poesia toscana (1539) tried to show how It. poetry could be written so as to imitate the prosody of Lat. verse. He was followed in France by Jacques de la Taille, who writes in the preface to his La Manière de faire des vers en françois, comme en grec et en latin (1573) that the real issue is the yearnings of "ultraclassicists" to rival Virgil or Homer and argues for a new Fr. spelling and pronunciation that will permit the lang. to fit cl. meter. The Eng. were more tolerant still, and many Eng. poets in the later 16th c. came to write an Eng. quantitative verse in imitation of the Gr. and Lat. because the Eng. lang. seemed closer to the cl. langs., esp. Lat., than it did to It., with its greater percentage of rhyming words, or to Fr., with its more musical accent. For the Eng., meter superseded *rhyme, and in The Scholemaster (1570), Ascham, associating rhyme with med. scholastic verse, even calls rhyme "barbarian" (see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES).

Later treatises by William Webbe (Discourse of English Poetrie, 1586) and George Puttenham (The Arte of English Poesie, 1589) provide an additional, Protestant argument by declaring that the past age, when rhyme was employed, was not only "gothic" but papist. Webbe recalls "this tinkerly verse which we call rime" and condemns monks for having invented "brutish Poetry." Puttenham speaks of rhyme as "the idle invention of Monastical men," supporting the superiority of Protestant classicists. Even Edmund Spenser briefly became part of the quantitative movement, and as late as 1602, Thomas Campion in his Observations questions "the childish titillation of riming." The positive outcomes of such complaints in Eng. were a notable increase in poetic experimentation and the devel. of a flexible and powerful medium for *dramatic poetry—*blank verse.

IV. The Genres of Poetry. Ren. concern with cl. verse forms was matched by interest in cl. distinctions of *genre, distinctions first worked out by the commentators on Horace and Aristotle and later codified by such critics as Minturno, Scaliger, and Sidney. In general, the commentators associated each of the major genres with a particular social stratum, with the nobility at the top and peasants and artisans at the bottom.

*Epic or *heroic verse was usually considered the most important and noble of all genres, since its heroes were rulers and military leaders and were meant to represent a nation's best values. In Italy, Ludovico Ariosto, Giangiorgio Trissino, and Torquato Tasso attempted major national epics. Their efforts were paralleled by those of Luís de Camões in Portugal, Pierre de Ronsard in France, and Edmund Spenser and John Milton in England. But whether such mod. poetic narratives as Orlando furioso and The Faerie Queene could actually be considered epics was the cause of argument. Ariosto's Orlando furioso and Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata are popular romances, unlike the more classically oriented L'Italia liberata dai Goti of Trissino. Minturno attacks romances for lacking cl. *unity and for appealing to lower tastes, while Cinthio argues for the right of a new age to develop its own forms and to depart from the universal Ren. poetic principle of imitation.

Tragedy ranks highest among dramatic genres both because its heroes are rulers and because Aristotle himself ranked tragedy highest in the Poetics. Scaliger notes that tragic plots are based on the activities of kings—the affairs of state, fortress, and camp. Cinthio adds that we call the actions of tragedy illustrious not because they are virtuous but because the characters who enact them are of the highest rank. Tragedy calls for elevated style and, in Italy, for magnificent scenery in presentation as well.

*Comedy is complementary to tragedy. It treats middle- and lower-class characters, and it concentrates on situations that are amusing or ridiculous rather than pitiable and fearful. In L'arte poetica (1563), Minturno suggests that, while noble ladies appear in public, middle-class women do not do so until after marriage and that the poet will violate comic decorum if he counters this practice. Castelvetro writes that, while members of the strong-willed aristocracy constitute a law unto themselves, the middle class will run to magistrates with its difficulties and live under the law. Consequently, the comic plot must not involve vendettas or other inappropriate behavior but instead treat the commonplaces of bourgeois life in which characters speak an everyday lang. Farce concentrates on lower-class characters and situations; here the chief responsibility of the poet is keeping *decorum, since the action is broad and the speech colloquial.

Most Fr. and Eng. critics followed this threefold generic division, giving almost exactly the same definitions as the It. critics. Pierre de Laudun, for instance, in L'art poétique françois (1597), contends that "[t]he characters of tragedy are grave people of great rank and those of comedy are low and of small position. . . . The words of Tragedy are grave and those of Comedy are light. . . . The characters in Tragedy are sumptuously dressed and those of Comedy garbed in an ordinary way." Most Ren. dramatists, incl. Shakespeare, followed these principles or, as in the Prologue to Henry V, announce it conspicuously when they do not. In Spain, Félix Lope de Vega explained in Arte nuevo de hacer comedias (1609) that, while he admires Aristotle's theories, along with those of his Ren. interpreters, he has to make a living, and pleasing the crowd requires violating most of the cl. rules, incl. those relating to the three unities.

Shakespeare's prologue speaks to the problem of unity—specifically, unity of place—as much as to social decorum, while Ben Jonson in Sejanus apologizes for not keeping to a unity of time (one 24-hour period). The unities of place and time were added by Ren. critics to the single unity of action (or *plot), which Aristotle argues in the Poetics is the basis for drama. The three unities were introduced for the first time in England through Sidney's Defence. They were never observed rigorously, however, by the Eng. popular dramatists. In France, they became critical dogma, and it was principally from France that they were reintroduced into Eng. crit. in the later 17th c.

The theory of genres was complicated by two developing dramatic and narrative forms in the Ren.—*tragicomedy and romance. For conservative critics, tragicomedy was by name and definition a "mongrel" form because it mingled kings and clowns, as Sidney puts it. However, Giovanni Battista Guarini, the author of Il pastor fido (1590), argued that, since the great and the lowly exist side by side in actual life, it is perfectly natural and correct to have both in a single drama. The response came from Jason DeNores (Apologia, 1590) when he remarked that comedy instructs citizens how to act, but a mixed genre, since it cannot instruct this way, is without any useful end; moreover, it gives no certain direction to the playwright as to appropriate behavior or lang. Guarini later published an extended reply, Compendio della poesia tragicomica (1601), in which he hinted that he writes to please rather than to follow "rules" or to instruct; and he adds that some of his shepherds are noble and some are not: hence his use of both tragedy and comedy. The best playwrights agreed, as we see in Shakespeare's late plays, Cymbeline, Pericles, The Winter's Tale, and The Tempest, all of which introduce wonder as a means of combining genres. In John Fletcher's prologue to The Faithful Shepherdess, "a God is as lawful in this as in a tragedy, and mean people as in a comedy."

V. The Principle of Imitation. The various strands of Ren. imitatio began with Plato, who notes in The Sophist (219a–c) two kinds of art he calls icastic and fantastic. Icastic or "likeness-making art" occurs "whenever anyone produces the imitation by following the proportions of the original in length, breadth, and depth, and giving, besides, the appropriate colors to each part" (235d)—when the artist records what he sees without any imaginative changes. Icastic art, thus, copies the original precisely. Fantastic art, on the other hand, either creates that which does not exist—Sidney suggests the Cyclops as an example—or else gives a disproportioned, inexact representation of the object being imitated: fantastic art, thus, "produces appearance," according to Plato, "but not likeness" (236c). While both kinds of art share the identical end, *representation, their means are opposed: one teaches by exact copying, the other persuades by asking the audience to accept what seems to be for what is. Since Plato uses sculpture and painting as his examples, his distinction is a distinction in poetics.

Beginning in the 14th c. with Petrarch, another kind of imitation—stylistic imitation of the ancients, esp. of Cicero and Virgil—became popular. This theory of imitation persisted throughout the Ren. and overlaps other, more philosophical theories. It was closely associated with Ren. education, since much of the grammar-school curriculum involved translating, paraphrasing, and imitating Lat. authors. Questions associated with it include whether one should imitate a single author or the best features of many; whether one should use cl. forms directly or seek vernacular equivalents of them; and how *originality and imitation can coexist. Two treatises that nicely illustrate Ren. understanding of imitation in this sense are the Ciceronianus of Erasmus (1528) and the second book of Ascham's Scholemaster.

The rediscovery of Aristotle's Poetics introduced yet still another kind of imitation. Whatever Aristotle may have understood by mimesis*, most Ren. writers understood it to mean either (a) the direct representation in lang. and dramatic action of the real world, or (b) the representation of typical (or "probable") aspects of the real world. The argument that mimesis should focus on the typical or probable rather than on the specific or topical justified departures in plots from strict historical fact. A very prominent thrust of the theory was the justification for reshaping hist. so that it conformed to the requirements of moral instruction. When interpreted in this way, the Poetics seemed entirely consistent with the traditional theory inherited from Horace that poetry mixes the morally useful with the aesthetically delightful. Thus, in La poetica (1536), Bernardino Daniello argues that the poet, unlike the historian, can mingle fiction with fact because he is held not to what is or was but rather to what ought to be. Robortello in his commentary on the Poetics likewise argues that the poet can add invented material in imitating reality, citing as exemplars Xenophon's ideal portrait of Cyrus and Cicero's ideal portrait of the orator; moreover, he adds, poets can invent matters that transcend nature so long as they can be logically inferred from what we know in nature: there is even room in the epic, he admits, for the marvelous. Girolamo Fracastoro similarly argues in the Naugerius (1555) that the poet, in depicting the simple and essential truth of things, should not simply reproduce it but clothe it in beauty that is formal, ethical, and aesthetic, keeping only to decorum, which is for him suggested by the idea the poet wishes to portray.

Tasso further complicates the question of imitation in his Discorsi dell'arte poetica (composed 1567–70, pub. 1587) when he seeks some balance between the claims of Christian and allegorical truth and poetic license and adornment: the naked truth, he claims, should be enhanced by novelty and surprise that will increase the sense of wonder. To some critics, the requirement that certain kinds of poetry present wonderful and marvelous events and arouse admiration (admiratio), as well as teach moral lessons, seemed to be compatible with the Poetics; but to others, it contravened the dictum that the poet should represent the real world (or "nature"). The latter position is taken in the Della poetica la deca disputata (1586) of Francesco Patrizi, popularly known as the Deca ammirabile. For Patrizi, there are two forms of the marvelous: one is a quality of the poem itself, which springs from the divine inspiration or enthusiasm of the poet and suitably combines the credible and incredible, making the work admirable (mirabile); the other is the effect produced in the audience, the extrinsic end of poetry (la maraviglia).

While the theory of imitation was considerably more advanced in Italy than elsewhere in the 16th c., there was great interest in France, Spain, and England as well. Du Bellay's Deffence argues that Fr. poetry can only hope to attain perfection by imitating the classics and that, while the true poet is born, only education in the classics will protect his talent from being useless or ill-formed. But du Bellay does not distinguish one kind of imitation from another; he left that to Jacques Peletier, who says (not unlike Tasso) in his Art poétique (1555) that the poet's responsibility is to imitate old things by adding to them something new, something beautiful. Ronsard invokes the fundamental principle of imitatio both in his Abrégé de l'art poétique françois (1565) and in the 1572 preface to his incomplete epic La Franciade. While he urges the use of images that are inspiring (since he sees the end of poetry as moral edification), he rules out images that are fantastic, unnatural, or marvelous. But the sense of morality is strongest in the work of Jean Vauquelin de la Fresnaye, who prefers scriptural themes for poetry. Indeed, he notes in his Art poëtique (1605) that if the Greeks had been Christian they too would have sung of the life and death of Christ.

VI. Rhetoric and Poetics. References to *ornament and to memory suggest that, for many of the major Ren. critics, Ren. poetics also grew directly out of Ren. rhet. Vida's De arte poetica, e.g., combines a Horatian discussion of the training of the poet and a defense of poetry (in book 1) with rhetorical treatises on invention and disposition (in book 2) and elocution (in book 3). Daniello's La poetica expands Horace around the same three rhetorical concerns; and even Minturno's L'arte poetica combines Horace and Aristotle's Poetics with the rhetorical writings of Cicero and Quintilian. In the 14th c., Coluccio Salutati had urged in De nobilitate legum et medicinae the practice of disputations, or controversiae, as a practical means to sharpen the mind, inspire further learning, and engender practical results in the life of early humanist students; in the 15th c., Fracastoro argues that the poet can persuade his reader by imitating natural things. Such an art of persuasion was at first the chief purpose not so much of poetry as of rhet., yet poets too needed to persuade readers to the basic truths of their poetry, whether it was deliberately verisimilitudinous or not. By the 15th c. in Italy and by the 16th c. in northern Europe, poetics frequently rested on the principles and practices of rhet. because that was the substance of education and, further, because both shared the common end of persuasion.

Extant syllabi and lectures from humanist schools of the 15th and 16th cs. illustrate the close alliance between rhet. and poetics. Humanist students were taught Lat. grammar and syntax followed by orations, imitating historical and imagined speeches; they also practiced fables, biographies, epistles, and descriptions. Regardless of form, such exercises promoted deliberative, judicial, and demonstrative speeches that would discuss an issue, argue a point, or award praise or blame; after this, students would move on to disputations and debates.

Indeed, the rhetorical technē taught in the humanist schools provided esp. imaginative ways to think, write, and speak, such as *prosopopoeia, the creation (or *feigning) of a fictive *persona; and topographia, the description (or creation) of places such as Utopia or Arcadia. The rhet. studied in humanist schools also taught the value and practice of ethos, or the feigned persona of the speaker, and pathos, the ways in which a speaker (or poet) puts his audience into a particular frame of mind. Such classroom lessons were easily transferred into poetic technique, esp. since Aristotle's chief rhetorical end, probability, was transformed into verisimilitude by Cicero (De inventione 1.21.29).

Rhet. also emphasized the centrality of the audience, pointing the need for interest, emotional connection, and learning. Shakespeare, e.g., addresses this in the Prologue to Henry V in which he instructs his audience concerning the limitations of stage performances, but it was the ongoing concern of paragena, dedicatory letters, and dramatic prologues such as the Introduction to Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair or the epilogues of Shakespeare's Puck or Rosalind. Constant interruptive addresses to the *reader are also a feature of François Rabelais's Gargantua and Pantagruel, Miguel de Cervantes's Don Quixote, Sidney's Arcadia, and Spenser's Faerie Queene (see RHETORIC AND POETRY).

VII. Conclusion. One of the important cl. texts for Ren. poetics is Epistle 45 of the Roman philosopher Seneca. According to Seneca, art is best understood as an imitation determined by the four causes of Aristotle's Prior Analytics. As Seneca applies them, the first cause is actual matter (such as the bronze of a bronze statue); the second cause is the agent (the artist or worker); the third is the form (the sense of the form and function of a statue); and the fourth is the purpose (money, reputation, religious devotion). What became crucial for Ren. poetics, however, is Seneca's own "fifth cause"—the model or original against which the new creation is made and to which it always, implicitly or explicitly, refers. The theory of models was consonant with the Ren. interest in turning away from the Middle Ages to Gr. and Roman texts for an understanding of form, genres, and techne, reinforcing both the understanding and practice of poetry. Cl. models lie behind not only the epics of Ariosto, Tasso, Spenser, and Milton, but The Praise of Folly of Erasmus, such plays as Shakespeare's Othello and Ben Jonson's Volpone, and such prose fictions as Sidney's Arcadia and Cervantes's Don Quixote.

The It. Ren. critics and their Sp., Fr., and Eng. successors were the founders of mod. Eur. crit. and mod. Eur. lit. as well. The Dutch and Ger. critics of the Ren. added little that was new. The theories that were produced by Ren. critics were learned, sophisticated, and detailed, but they were often divorced from the realities of the literary marketplace. This was esp. true of theories of drama. Lope de Vega confessed that, of his 483 comedies, "all except six of them sin grievously against art." In other words, the only way he or anyone else prior to the collapse of the neoclassical spirit could talk about art was in the terms formulated and promulgated by Ren. poetics, and these terms were for the most part irrelevant to the kind of drama that Lope de Vega was writing.

RENAISSANCE POETRY. The Ren. was the first period in postclassical Eur. lit. hist. to conceive itself as a period, in the spirit of Petrarch's designation of his age as a "rinascimento" (rebirth) of knowledge after what he supposed to be the intellectual obscurity of the Middle Ages. Beginning in Italy in the 15th c., the period opens unevenly across Europe from Portugal to Poland and Eur. outposts from Mexico City to Macau. In outline, the Ren. begins with the assimilation of Petrarch's thought and concludes with the rise of neoclassicism in the late 17th c.; but there are several divisions and reactions within the period proper—the *baroque is perhaps the most problematic of these—and many countries have their own period concepts within the larger age. The Ren. was made by humanism, which radiated outward from Petrarch and his It. successors—incl. thinkers such as Lorenzo de' Medici (1449–92), Giovanni Pico della Mirandola (1463–94), Pietro Bembo (1470–1547), and countless poets—who speculated on such topics as the nature of humanity, the intellectual and moral character of love, and the proper interactions between human beings and their world. Humanism had educational, philological, aesthetic, political, and other dimensions. It provided the intellectual atmosphere in which such technological and cultural inventions as movable type and linear perspective could be conceived and flourish; it was closely connected to the exaltation of the individual, the rise of the mod. state, and the devel. of imperialism.

The poetry of the Ren. began with the vernacular poetry of Petrarch (1304–74), whose Rime sparse or Canzoniere and Trionfi were in poetic terms as technologically revolutionary as printing and pictorial perspective. The facts that these poems were composed in the vernacular, that they represented the thoughts and emotional states of a single person over time, that they shunned obvious *allegory in favor of a rich attention to the textures of both lang. itself and immediate experience, and that they treated amatory love as the summa of human existence, as complete in its way as the devotional or philosophical life and in a sense containing those kinds of life within it—all these made Petrarch's work seem astonishingly mod. for the 15th and 16th cs. The absorption of Petrarch into other lits. meant that his work attained the status of a mod. classic, comparable to the poetry of Virgil or Horace: when the Venetian printer Aldus Manutius produced the first mod. eds. of the Gr. and Roman classics around 1500, he included Petrarch's Canzionere in that *canon. As *Petrarchism arrived in each Eur. culture, it was not so much a set of strict conventions as a model for mod. writing that could be adjusted to local conditions, and the acceptance of Petrarchism invariably meant that a new generation had appeared, ready to remake vernacular poetry in its own way.

The foundational monuments of Petrarchan poetry across Europe include Maurice Scève's (ca. 1511–64) Délie (1544) and the experiments in love poetry and other genres by the poets of the Pléiade*, Pierre de Ronsard (1524–85), Joachim du Bellay (ca. 1522–60), and Jean-Antoine de Baïf (1532–89) in France, whose emergence was heralded by du Bellay's La Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse (1549); the adaptations of Italianate and cl. forms such as the *sonnet, the *elegy, and the *eclogue into Sp. by Juan Boscán (ca. 1490–1542), Garcilaso de la Vega (1503–36), and their follower Fernando de Herrera (1534–97), and into Port. by Francisco Sá de Miranda (1481–1558); and the introduction of Petrarchism into Eng. by Thomas Wyatt (1503–42) and Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey (1517–47). Nearly every Eur. culture has one or several of these poets, the transformational figures of their national poetries.

Of course, the picture is more complicated in each setting, and there are precursors, dissenters, and hybrids to take into account. Clément Marot (1496–1544), against whom the Pléiade defined itself, had absorbed many elements of Italianate poetics into his practice and had differentiated his work from that of his father, the rhétoriqueur* Jean Marot (ca. 1450–1526); the reform represented by Ronsard and his brigade was perhaps as much about explicit declaration as about radical change. For that matter, Garcilaso's introduction of Petrarchism into Castilian had been anticipated by his grandfather's uncle, the 14th-c. poet the Marqués de Santillana (1398–1458); as in France, the difference was made by a highly visible publication, in this case Las obras de Boscán con algunas de Garcilaso de la Vega (1543). Each culture had its figures who defied the modernizing influence of Petrarchism, such as the Sp. poet Cristóbal de Castillejo (ca. 1490–1550), who favored national over imported resources. And no poet of significance was entirely converted to Petrarch's models: e.g., we remember Wyatt and Surrey as his agents in Eng. letters, but a substantial part of their poetry, esp. Wyatt's, remained closely involved with a nativist trad. known as the *plain style. Wyatt's and Surrey's posthumous publication occurred in a volume called Songes and Sonettes, written by the ryght honorable Lorde Henry Haward late Earle of Surrey, and others, now known as Tottel's Miscellany* (1557). The import of this notional generation whose members were mostly born between 1500 and 1525 was not that they were literally the first in any category—Petrarchans, reformers, classicists—but that their work (in some cases pub. posthumously) emerged contemporaneously in the 1540s and 1550s with a burst of attention and self-awareness. They not only rehabilitated cl. genres but developed vernacular ones such as the sonnet and found in the *sonnet sequence an adaptable medium for fusing experiments in *diction and *figuration, mythological *allusion, and a vivid first-person *voice. This group's collective efforts made an apex for *love poetry; and, for several generations, the topic of love in poetry became a *metonymy for many other kinds of human endeavors. Hundreds of sonnet sequences were composed in Europe between 1550 and 1640, more than 60 in England during the period known as the "sonnet boom" (1580–1630), incl. such distinguished works as Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella (1591) and William Shakespeare's Sonnets (1609).

The influence of It. thought and letters on the rest of Europe extended well beyond lyric, however, esp. where Italy was seen to have a privileged relation to humanism and the classics. Like Petrarch, who had written an *epic titled Africa along with his voluminous work in other genres, many poets of the 16th c. strove to fashion epics that would revisit cl. and med. heroes in light of present-day dynastic and political concerns: these include the several epics conceived around an updated Roland (now called Orlando) such as Luigi Pulci's (1432–84) Morgante maggiore (1483), Matteo Maria Boiardo's (1441–94) Orlando innamorato (1495), and Ludovico Ariosto's (1474–1533) Orlando furioso (1516); Torquato Tasso's (1544–95) reimagining of Godfrey of Bouillon's exploits during the first crusade in Gerusalemme liberata (1581); and Edmund Spenser's (1552–99) configuration of the story of Arthur with that of his own monarch, Elizabeth I, in The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596). One should mention Ronsard's unfinished Franciade, which concerns the adventures of Francus, son of Hector.

While most of the period's epics accept this reinvestment in cl. and med. lit., the most notable example that falls outside the tendency is The Lusiads (1572) of Luís de Camões (1524–80), the Port. national epic of empire in which Vasco da Gama's exploration of India and Africa is portrayed as fulfilling the providential destiny of his nation. Mythological characters abound in The Lusiads, but they play a supporting role to the Port. themselves; instead of adapting a received story such as Orlando or Arthur to present-day realities, Camões boldly begins from those mod. circumstances and renders them as densely as any cl. or med. tale, with the stock motifs appearing ad hoc in service to his nationalist vision. Another striking revision of epic convention appears in the Basque Alonso de Ercilla's (1533–94) La Araucana (1569–89), an epic concerning the conquest of Chile, in which the narrator is a principal character who negotiates his way among Sp., indigenous, and cl. figures.

Like nearly all 16th-c. Eur. epics, The Lusiads and the Araucana honor the cl. trad. of Homer and Virgil while instilling an atmosphere of romance that those poets would not have entirely recognized. Romance was the mode of much med. and early mod. vernacular narrative: it offers heroes greater in degree than we are and more emotionally variegated than those of epic, a landscape and world that often reflect the geopolitical concerns of the audiences, and a supernatural ambience that does not violate but fulfills the terms of the fiction. The conflation of romance and epic values in early mod. epic—as in the Faerie Queene, for instance, where epic significance is attached to a plot and characters largely driven by romance—acknowledged how much narrative fiction and its readerships had changed over the long rise of the vernaculars. A romance ethos was one of the things that made 16th-c. epic seem mod. On the other hand, the modernity of one era becomes obsolescent in the next, and many of these epics were rendered quaint if not unseasonable with the coming of the novel in Miguel de Cervantes's (1547–1616) Don Quixote (1605, 1615), which explicitly satirized romance conventions. As a result, many Eur. and trans-Atlantic societies found their early mod. epics to be barren of descendants until much later, often when romantic poets discovered the distinctive early mod. fusion of fancy, heroism, and passion that populates the great narrative poems of the Ren. (see ROMANTICISM).

Petrarchan lyric was widely adapted but not universally absorbed; epics are few in number. While these genres set the agenda for much of what we retrospectively consider Ren. poetry, they were two threads in a fabric. What is often anthologized as representative of the period is not the entire cloth. One factor, diminished in strength since Petrarch's career but still important, was the continued vitality of Lat. A great deal of 16th- and 17th-c. poetry was written in Lat. within a comprehensive range of genres and modes. Some poets whom we know for their vernacular poetry, such as du Bellay in France and John Milton (1608–74) in England, wrote significant short poems in Lat.; other figures of considerable influence, such as the Sp.-It. poet Baptista Spagnuoli Mantuanus, known as Mantuan (1448–1516), and the Scottish George Buchanan (1506–82), wrote entirely in Lat. If Lat. and the vernaculars remained in close proximity throughout the period, so did amatory and *devotional poetry. Even as poets explored the possibilities of what we could consider secular poetry (on amatory, social, or *epideictic topics), many of them developed substantial corpora of devotional poetry. Trans. of the *Psalms were a common milestone because they put ambitious poets into direct contact with the work of David, who was conventionally seen as the supreme poet of the Judeo-Christian world; the challenge of rendering the Psalms into the vernaculars was a parallel to the humanist problem of how to relate contemp. writing to the classics, and the established doctrines of humanist poetics—Aristotelian *mimesis, Horatian *imitation, Ciceronian *invention—had a deeper meaning when the original work was scripture. Clément Marot, Wyatt, Surrey, Baïf, Philippe Desportes (1546–1606), Luis de León (1527–91), Camões, Buchanan, Philip Sidney (1554–86), Mary Sidney (1561–1621), Martin Opitz (1597–1639), John Donne (1572–1631), Richard Crashaw (1613–49), Milton—all confronted an opportunity braided with a problem, requiring not only convincing trans. of the poems but a legible position on the poetics. And this is to say nothing of the popular versions of the Psalms that, in Reformed countries, were often the most widely read, such as the Eng. psalter (1549) by Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins and Ambrosius Lobwasser's adaptation of the Genevan Psalter into German (1573), both of which remained in use for centuries. The first book published in Brit. North America, The Bay Psalm Book (1640), was just such a popular psalter. Beyond the Psalms, of course, devotional and other kinds of religious poetry were among the most thoroughly developed modes of the period. Responses to scripture, meditations, *contrafacta that refashioned amatory verse, *narrative poems—notwithstanding the inattention of mod. readers, all these were prominent and were sometimes the work of the same poets (e.g., Scève and Tasso) whom we now read avidly for their poetry of love, adventure, or courtly life.

The penchant of many 16th- and 17th-c. poets for Lat. and divine poetry may appear remote from a mod. world that is predominantly demotic and secular. Likewise, to present-day urban culture, it can be hard to fathom the esteem for *pastoral poetry in the Ren.—like devotional writing, a mode it may seem everyone attempted. Recent scholars generally agree that pastoral typically wears a shell of idealization around a hard kernel of social and political commentary and that the play between the literal and figurative levels—a relation not usually of allegory but of a less closed, more indeterminate kind of figuration—constitutes much of the mode's appeal to readers who were steeped in cl. and recent models as well as the contemporaneous persons and events under representation. While pastoral claimed a biblical antecedent in Psalm 23, the most powerful models for early mod. pastoral were found in the Hellenistic poets Theocritus, Moschus, and Bion and esp. the eclogues of Virgil; and closer to hand, in imitations of Virgil's eclogues by Dante, Petrarch, and Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–75), in Mantuan's Neo-Lat. eclogues, in the It. humanist Jacopo Sannazaro's (1458–1530) romance Arcadia (1502) and five Eclogae piscatoriae (written 1501–44), and in the Port. Jorge de Montemayor's (1520?–61) Diana (1559).

Once pastoral was revived in the 16th c., it became a widely understood perspective that could be assumed for the sake not of idealism or nostalgia—the ostensible values of its surface—but of saying difficult or harsh things cloudily, behind an unimpeachable convention. Moreover, while every pastoral has its own social, political, or religious polemic to make, at the same time all pastorals tell the same stories of singing contests, spurned lovers, and the daily lives of shepherds. Ren. readers must have found pleasure in this mix of consistency and difference, surface and depth, obvious fiction and truth-telling. Major instances of early mod. pastoral are too many to list, but every reader should know Boiardo's eclogues in Lat. and It., which prepare for his unfinished epic Orlando innamorato; Garcilaso's three eclogues that reflect the complexity of his career in the service of the absolutist regime of Charles V; Marot's two eclogues of the 1530s that articulate humanist values in the face of the court, the first ("Eglogue sur le Trespas de ma Dame Loyse de Savoye") an elegy for the mother of King Francis I, the second ("Eglogue au roy, soubz les noms de Pan & Robin") an address to the king that broaches the reciprocal obligations of poet and monarch; Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender (1579), a densely layered, polyvocal set of 12 eclogues that announced a new generation in Eng. letters and an avant-garde sensibility disguised within a scholarly attention to past works (for these qualities, it should be considered the Waste Land of its era); Sidney's prose romance Arcadia (1590, 1593), which includes a great deal of exquisite verse that honors but also galvanizes the conventions of pastoral lyric; Luis de Góngora's (1561–1627) two Soledades (composed 1613, the second unfinished), a recasting of pastoral motifs for a baroque world concerned with the legibility of verbal signs and the difficulty of reaching nature through any means but direct experience; and Milton's "Lycidas" (1637), an astonishing self-evocation that is perhaps the most famous pastoral elegy in the lang.

The shorter *genres such as the *epigram, the elegy, the *epyllion, the *satire, and the *hymn undergo a revival throughout the period, often coincident with the renewal of interest in the cl. figures who were their most visible exponents—such as Martial for the epigram, Juvenal for satire, and Ovid for the epyllion. Observers of poetry such as Sidney (Defence of Poesy, 1595) and George Puttenham (The Arte of English Poesie, 1589) often revel in the lists of available genres (Sidney: "heroic, lyric, tragic, comic, satiric, iambic, elegiac, pastoral") as though taking stock of how mod. poets have augmented the resources received from the classics. In many ways, the Ren. is a period of multiple genres, forms, and modes in productive collision with one another. It might be claimed that this was the first period in Eur. lit. in which the idea of genre became fully developed as both a theoretical and a practical matter.

After about 1600, this first, properly humanist phase of the Ren. drew to a close and another phase began, still humanist but in a different spirit. Intellectual life changed with the emergence of recognizably mod. disciplines such as astronomy, physics, and philosophy, and empirical discovery assumed a new value as a condition of knowledge; the absolutist political order across Europe was roiled by social and economic instability; and the Counter-Reformation produced new expressions of spirituality, as well as new forms of ecclesiastical intervention in cultural life. In poetry, the age is characterized by a poetics that revisits the established genres and forms of the past century with an augmented measure of *artifice, self-consciousness, and intellectual engagement, esp. in view of the highly charged advances in disciplinary knowledge. There are several names in circulation for this poetic turn, from the general—*mannerism and the baroque, which appear in the national poetries in various moments and guises—to the local, such as Marinism in Italy, conceptismo and culteranismo in Spain, and *metaphysical poetry in England and colonial New England. Conventional lit. hists. often treat these names as representing highly distinctive movements, autochthonous to the lang. or nation, and even (as in the case of conceptismo and culteranismo) ineluctably opposed to one another; but from the vantage of a common Eur. lit. hist., it must be noticed that these movements had in common the building of a poetic technology that was adapted to the state of knowledge in its time, as Petrarchism and other varieties of humanist poetry had been in the long era of their dominance.

The principal figures of 17th-c. poetry are innovators in this sense: they establish voices and values of their own in ways that even the most accomplished Petrarchans seldom do. Examples of the best of the period must include the Englishmen Donne and George Herbert (1593–1633), the latter probably the greatest devotional lyric poet in the lang.; and Góngora and Francisco de Quevedo (1580–1645) in Spain, ostensibly opposed to one another. Another category of intriguing figures—often disparaged, poorly understood (or too well understood), associated with other genres—might include the Germans Opitz, often didactic and descriptivist, and Andreas Gryphius (1616–64), who, like many poets of the century, evolved into a dramatist; in France, the fabulist Jean de La Fontaine (1621–95) and the early classicist François de Malherbe (1555–1628); the astonishingly prolific Sp. poet and dramatist Félix Lope de Vega (1562–1635), who wrote about 3,000 sonnets (nearly ten times Petrarch's Canzoniere) and 1,800 plays; and in England, the Catholic Crashaw and the *Cavaliers Thomas Carew (1595–1640) and John Suckling (1609–42). Still, there are stark differences between the generations of 17th-c. poetry—T. S. Eliot advanced a famous argument about the *dissociation of sensibility that he found between Donne's and Milton's eras—and over the middle and later decades, the influence of neoclassicism grew palpable and insistent, as though revisiting the discovery of the classics that inaugurated the Ren. more than 150 years earlier. The period sees many remarkable holdovers, foreshadowings, and coexistences. Looking back to the baroque as the source of their self-definition, some poets, theorists, and observers emphasize the powers of the poet in forming *conceits and analogies, as Baltasar Gracián (1601–58) does in his Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1648), one of the most influential Sp. treatises on poetics of the century; others look forward to the return of classicism by dwelling on the poet's restraints, as Nicolas Boileau (1636–1711) does in L'Art poétique (1674), the principal Fr. document in poetics of the later century. While Ben Jonson (1572–1637) was an early neoclassicist in England, his restrained poetry is impoverished by the label, embracing a rich array of cl. and vernacular models as well as a productive tension with Donne's poetics. On the other hand, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (ca. 1648–95) is a late baroque poet, writing into the 1690s, and a principal fount of Sp. Am. poetry. A generation apart, Jonson and Gracián inhabit different 17th-c. worlds, as do Boileau and Sor Juana—or the latter two and Milton, the natural heir of the 16th-c. epic poets such as Spenser and Camões.

RENGA is a once popular but now seldom practiced genre of Japanese poetry in which verses (ku) alternately of 17 and 14 morae (see MORA) are joined into long sequences according to rules (shikimoku) that govern how constituent images are to be employed. By the latter half of the med. era (1185–1600), orthodox linked verse (ushin renga) had become the most widely practiced form of Japanese poetry in the vernacular; vast numbers of hundred-verse sequences (hyakuin) survive, and some linked-verse practitioners rank among Japan's greatest poets. In the beginning of the early mod. (Tokugawa or Edo) period (1600–1868), ushin renga was eclipsed by unorthodox or comic haikai [no] renga (or renku, haikai* linked verse), which has far fewer restrictions on topics and vocabulary than the orthodox variety. The term renga usually refers to the orthodox form of the art, and that form will be the focus of the following discussion.

The practice of linking verses dates from the earliest recorded times; examples of protorenga are found in Kojiki (Record of Ancient Matters, 712 CE) and Man'yōshū* (late 8th c.). Renga composition was a leisure pursuit in the early med. period, but thereafter it developed into a serious art form; and while it never reached the canonical stature of the 31-morae waka* poem, the orthodox form of linked verse came to rank just beneath it, thanks in large part to the contributions of the court noble Nijō Yoshimoto (1320–88) and his commoner poetic advisor Kyūsei (or Gusai; ca. 1281–1376), who together compiled the first imperially authorized collection of linked verse, Tsukubashū (Anthology of the Way of Tsukuba, 1356–57); the first mature critical works (rengaron); and the first widely disseminated rules. The art reached its apogee in the linked verse of Shinkei (1406–75), Inō Sōgi (1421–1502), and many others of their era. Sōgi compiled the second imperially sanctioned renga collection, Shinsen Tsukubashū (Newly Selected Anthology of the Way of Tsukuba, 1495). Sequences linking Japanese verses and Chinese couplets (wakan renku) were popular as well, and there were also experiments that included employing one Sino-Japanese word in each stanza of otherwise pure native diction. The art remained vibrant during the time of Sōgi's disciples and up through the first years of the early mod. period, then become fossilized. Though ushin renga continued to be composed throughout the Tokugawa period and even thereafter, most linked-verse poets of those centuries turned to haikai [no] renga, which had also been enjoyed by previous generations of orthodox linked-verse poets in their lighter moments but which had not yet come to be seen as a poetic way of legitimacy and value in its own right.

Orthodox renga was usually composed orally by a group of poets, though solo sequences (dokugin) were often made as well. The first verse, the hokku, was the only one that could be prepared in advance, and it initially stood alone; it consists of 17 morae (divided into segments of 5, 7, and 5) and is the ancestor of the haiku (literally, "haikai verse"). A second poet would add a rejoinder of 14 morae (divided into two segments of 7), which related to the first while at the same time constituting an independent poetic statement. A third poet would then add another 17-morae verse, which by the rules could relate only to the verse immediately preceding it. Verses of 17 and 14 morae thus alternated until a hundred-link sequence was completed, a process that might take a full day or more. Every link after the introductory hokku, therefore, elicits three possible readings: as a verse in isolation, as a rejoinder to the previous verse, and as the inspiration for the following; and part of the artistry and pleasure of linked verse inheres in the way one poet's interpretation may be recast (torinashi) by the poet who follows. If any proffered verse in the sequence leapt over its immediate predecessor and referred to the specific subject of the penultimate link, it was rejected by the ranking renga poet (sōshō), who supervised the sequence, or by the scribe (shuhitsu). The renga lexicon was divided into various thematic categories, such as "spring" or "travel," which were adopted from waka usage, and lexical categories, such as "falling things" (e.g., rain or snow) or "flora" (e.g., grasses or trees). As each new verse was recited, the scribe would mentally check for infractions against the rules of repetition (how often a given poetic image could appear in a sequence), seriation (the minimum and maximum number of contiguous verses in which a thematic or lexical category could be employed), and intermission (how many verses had to separate the occurrences of an image or category). If a verse was satisfactory in terms both of rules and artistry, the scribe wrote it down. The final written record consisted of four sheets of paper (kaishi) folded lengthwise and inscribed both front and back, with eight verses on the front of the first page and the back of the last page, and 14 verses on the remaining sides. Ideally, the completed sequence would demonstrate a balance of linkage between each pair of verses (tsukeai) and overall thematic transition (yukiyō) through numerous verse worlds. A sequence was also expected to divide into an introduction (jo), devel. (ha), and swift conclusion (kyū), a formula renga shares with other cl. arts such as gagaku music and nō* drama. In that each 17- or 14-morae verse by necessity constituted a complete statement, renga links could be even more condensed and elliptical than those of 31-morae waka, and every image deployed therein was energized by centuries of prior waka practice.

Linked verse responded to the contestatory spirit of the age, combining the high ideals and lexicon of the waka way with intense competition as each poet vied to be the first with the next link. While waka for most of its hist. had been dominated by courtier poets, many of the great renga masters (rengashi) were of modest or even humble origins, a fact that reflects the increasing social mobility of the violent late med. period. But linked-verse masters also composed waka and taught it, and the allied cl. literary trad., to students and wealthy patrons, contributing thereby to the establishment and dissemination of the Japanese literary canon. In that renga masters made their livings through their art (as opposed to earlier court poets, who were supported by emoluments), they have been called Japan's first professional literary figures. And because of the universal respect for the poetic way, rengashi could travel safely even through contiguous warrior domains that were in a state of conflict, and the records of their journeys, written in a blend of poetry and prose *prosimetrum, constitute some of the most vivid examples of Japanese travel and diary writing (see JAPANESE POETIC DIARIES). Though renga verses did not generally become sources for later allusion as many waka poems did, some hundred-verse sequences, like Minase sangin hyakuin (One Hundred Verses by Three Poets at Minase, 1488) and Yuyama sangin hyakuin (One Hundred Verses by Three Poets at Yuyama, 1491), remain monuments of the Japanese poetic trad. Some critical writings on renga, like Shinkei's Sasamegoto (Murmured Conversations, 1463–64), likewise are models of Japanese poetic exegesis. In mod. times, the renga art has also inspired experiments in linked poetry in foreign langs.—notably the quadrilingual "chain of poems" by Octavio Paz, Jacques Roubaud, Edoardo Sanguineti, and Charles Tomlinson (pub. in Eng. as Renga, 1971).

REPETITION. The structure of repetition underlies the majority of poetic devices, and it is possible to argue that repetition defines the poetic use of lang.

The effects of repetition are, however, multivalent and range from lending unity and coherence to exposing the fundamental difference between the repeated elements. Even as repetition may effect poetic closure and provide the poem with a regular pattern, exact repetition is impossible: the simple fact of temporal discontinuity between repeated elements leads to a difference in their functions, via the accumulation of significance and recontextualization (as demonstrated, e.g., by Edgar Allan Poe's "The Raven" in the radically unstable meaning of the repeated word "nevermore"). That is why Gertrude Stein, famous for her highly repetitive texts, claims "there is no repetition." At the same time, the poem's repetitions set up expectations and guide interpretation.

Repetition structures poetic forms at all levels, as in the repetition of sounds (*alliteration, *assonance, *consonance, *rhyme, homonym, or *paronomasia); repetition of syllables (*syllabic verse, *rich rhyme); repetition of words (*anaphora, *anadiplosis, parechesis, traductio, *ploce); *identical rhyme, repetend, *catalog, list, and the pattern of word repetitions in traditional *lyric forms, such as, e.g., the end words in a *sestina; repetition of lines (*refrain, *incremental repetition, envelope stanza pattern, used also in verse forms such as pantun and *villanelle); repetition of measure (*rhythm; *meter); repetition of syntactical patterns (*parallelism, *hypotaxis and parataxis); repetition of the line break (*free verse); semantic repetition (pleonasm, synonymy, and repetitions of figures, images, concepts, themes); and intertextual repetition (*allusion or *pastiche).

Repetition not only patterns (as the examples above demonstrate) but parallels and reinforces those poetic devices that distinguish verse from prose. Similarly to the line break, it disrupts the linearity of lang., creating a counterpoint rather than continuity of narrative logic. Repetition of the same element in different contexts may also perform a metaphorical function. As readers often observe, repetition draws attention to itself and tends to denaturalize lang.: the more repetitions there are in a poem, the more we are conscious of the poem's *artifice and the less able to come up with the poem's paraphrasable meaning. In fact, intense repetition may lead to the loss of meaning (the signifier entirely replaces the signified). It has been observed also that repetition marks the collective in lang., revealing a polyphony and taking poetic expression beyond a single voice.

A poem's various repetitions interact, creating a complex effect. E.g., in the final couplet of Shakespeare's sonnet 18, a pattern of alliteration, assonance, paronomasia, and syntactic parallelism creates a series of echoes: "So long as men can breathe, or eyes can see / So long lives this, and this gives life to thee." W. C. Williams's "To a Poor Old Woman" is an example of *free verse exploiting the counterpoint between syntax and line break. The sentence/line that begins the second stanza, "They taste good to her," is repeated twice but broken into three lines. Apart from revealing an ambiguity or plurality of meanings inherent in a simple sentence, because of the mismatch between syntax and lineation, the repetitions create a pronounced, syncopated rhythm.

In ritual poetries, repetition has a performative function and lends them illocutionary power. Prayers, mantras, Santería or voodoo rituals, and various liturgies all rely on verbal repetition that supplants logic with emotive effect. Repetition is the basis of prosody in the Heb. Bible; its syntactical parallelism has exerted an influence on Anglo-Am. poetry of such dissimilar poets as Christopher Smart (Jubilate Agno), William Blake ("The Garden of Love"), Walt Whitman ("Song of Myself"), and Allen Ginsberg (Howl).

Oral poems are repeated by being passed from generation to generation as well as structured by repetition that serves as a mnemonic device (see ORAL POETRY). Scholars of orality point to various degrees of balance between the repetition of formulas, themes and story patterns, and improvisation (see ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY). Needless to say, the function of repetition in oral texts is different from that in written poetry, and oral trad. demonstrate a wide range of practices, thus varying among themselves in their use of repetition.

In Native Am. poetics, because of the traditional connection between the sacred and the verbal, often much importance has been placed on exact repetition of an oral text. Embedded in a specific occasion (where many other elements, such as music, dance, and gesture actively produce meaning, comparably to contemp. intermedia art) a *song, *chant, spell, prayer, or oration has a performative function and may be repeated several times, depending on the specificity of the event (e.g., a healing prayer repeated line by line after the shaman by the patient). Native Am. songs and chants employ repetition as a structural device (often said to echo natural cycles, as well as tribal inheritance), where grammatical and semantic repetition is said to increase the incantatory (as opposed to narrative) qualities of a given performance. Considering the Native Am. concept of authorship (and audience), a "poem" is always a type of repetition entailing a source larger than the speaker (communal, natural, or sacred), rather than an expression of a unique voice. Western poetics has less patience for repetition: ethnocentric critics reveal that Native Am. repetitions are often expurgated in trans. into Eng. because considered untranslatable, redundant, or meaningless.

Rhythm and repetition (sometimes engaged in chiastic reversals) are said to be the defining elements of black culture. James A. Snead juxtaposes this feature of black "non-progressive" culture with Western tendency (present in Eur. and Eurocentric cultures from the late 16th c. up until the modernist revolution in the 20th) to "cover up" its repetitions for the sake of the ideology of progress, realism, and faithful representation of reality in art. Repetition lies at the core of Af. verbal trad. (e.g., call-and-response patterns) that informs much of black art: it shapes Af. and Af. Am. music and its lyrics (slave songs, *spirituals, gospel, *blues, and rap); it grounds improvisation in jazz (which needs an established pattern to diverge from); it is a pronounced feature in black folk sermons. All of these models find their way into *African American poetry. Snead refers to the repeated beat as "social," i.e., available to be played with by new voices. *Signifying, defined by Henry Louis Gates Jr. as the "black trope of tropes," depends on repetition with a difference. As a play of signifiers, this "figure for black rhetorical figures" (Gates) consistently draws attention to its repetitions, a feature often explored by Af. Am. poets. Harryette Mullen's Muse & Drudge signifies, among others, on W.E.B. Du Bois's concept of "double consciousness" (Huehls); Michael Harper's "Dear John, Dear Coltrane" signifies on Coltrane's "Love Supreme"; Langston Hughes's Ask Your Mama is, according to Gates, the most representative Af. Am. poem based on signifying as a mode of discourse.

Repetition in poetry has been studied from a number of perspectives and with tools from various fields. Mod. philosophers (from Søren Kierkegaard and Friedrich Nietzsche to Gilles Deleuze and Jacques Derrida) make a distinction between two forms or competing effects of repetition that can be provisionally defined as repetition-as-unity and repetition-as-difference. The former, sometimes referred to as "Platonic repetition" or "recollection," is based on the principle of identity or original similitude that is recovered by repetition (e.g., by *mimesis); the latter is a disclosure or production of difference. This binary definition of repetition often extends to other binary oppositions, such as hierarchy vs. nonhierarchical difference; theological grounding vs. lack of ground; order vs. disorder; stasis vs. movement; habit vs. creativity; trad. vs. individual talent; codification vs. dissent; authority of the text vs. surrender of authorial control; and linearity vs. rupture. An example of the former model is found by Mircea Eliade in archaic societies' belief in the possibility of recovering an ideal past, of repeating the original act performed by the gods, heroes, or ancestors. Transformational grammar (Noam Chomsky) aims at recovering the "deep structure" of lang. from which all "surface structures" may be generated. The later model, of repetition without an original, is present, e.g., in Baudrillard's concept of the simulacrum. *Structuralism in anthropology (Claude Lévi-Strauss)—but also in ling. (Ferdinand de Saussure) and literary studies (Roman Jakobson); see the *poetic function as a type of repetition—posits the existence of a system that underlies all concrete manifestations of social (also linguistic) phenomena. (Were one to apply the Saussurean structuralist linguistic model directly to poetic repetition, repetition of the sign would be realized by repeated words and phrases; repetition of the signifier by rhyme and alliteration; repetition of the signified by, e.g., synonymy.) In a Freudian psychoanalytic definition of the repetition compulsion, repetition is seen as both symptom (mechanical reenactment of the repressed) and cure (repetition in the transferential context of therapy). The cure consists in the move from unconscious, mechanical reenactment to conscious remembering: paradoxically, one needs to remember in order to forget, i.e., to free oneself of the past. Some readers argue that, through its various repetitions, poetry speaks to the irrational side of our brains (Finch). Conceptions of the historical (also in literary and poetic hist.) similarly rely on alternative uses of repetition. Edward Said's critique of Giambattista Vico's model of hist., e.g., works along the common binary: in place of the "filiative" or genealogical model of repetition embraced by Vico, Said proposes a model that is "affiliative." Said emphasizes those forces in hist. that counter generative continuity and are based on affiliation. Obviously, the very tendency to account for repetition via binary oppositions is itself structuralist in its provenance, and, arguably, the two types of repetition always coexist, one always calling up the other, even as the tendency of a text and/or interpretation leans toward one more than the other.

The multivalence of poetic repetition is reflected in the variety of theoretical approaches to it. Those, again, tend to fall into two recognizable types: a grounded repetition that recovers an original and an ungrounded repetition that reveals difference. Thus, e.g., the notion of *"organic form" in poetry is usually grounded in the first type of repetition (and tends to be less explicitly repetitive or "covers up" its repetitions), while highly crafted poetic forms seem more of a "mechanical" exercise in which form produces content. In literary theory, Harold Bloom's Anxiety of Influence uses the genealogical model of repetition (critiqued by Said) to set the stage for his theory of poetic influence. Barbara Johnson discusses two types of repetition used, respectively, by William Wordsworth and E. A. Poe, arguing that the distinction between the two gives the study of poetry the key to "articulating authenticity with conventionality, originality and continuity, freshness with what is recognizably 'fit' to be called poetic." Wordsworth's and Poe's models of poetic creativity may seem incompatible, as Wordsworth's is based on "emotion recollected in tranquility" and aims at the recovery of an original moment, while Poe's rests on mechanical repetition of words and sounds; one is based on the signified, the other on the signifier. Johnson, however, deconstructs the opposition demonstrating that the two types of repetition and, consequently, the two definitions of poetic lang. are inextricable, even if one is the text's explicit argument and the other its "subversive ghost" (see also J. Hillis Miller). The confusion between the two types of repetition, argues Johnson, is not an error but the condition of poetic lang. itself.

I. Definition. Representation is the process by which lang. constructs and conveys meaning. One major component—perhaps the major component—of the process of representaton is reference: words (texts) refer, or create pointers to, the external world, to other words (other texts), to themselves, or to the process of referring; Linda Hutcheon (in Whiteside and Issacharoff) identifies these four types or directions of reference as, respectively, extratextual, intertextual, intratextual, and metatextual (see INTERTEXTUALITY). Reference concerns the ability of lang. to describe, capture, express, or convey—the verbs have often been interchangeable—the external world in symbols that the mind can manipulate.

Representation lies at the very heart of the nature of lang., i.e., speech as a system of communication for encoding information symbolically and transmitting it from speakers to auditors (for diagram, see Jakobson; see also Abrams). It is one of the most difficult problems in philosophy; the issues are central not merely to aesthetics, but to epistemology and metaphysics. The structures and limitations inherent in words presumably already constrain our ability to talk about lang. at all: there is no vantage point from which we can stand outside lang. so as to critique it. But, conversely, we do not know how severe these constraints are, and we do know that lang. is capable of both creativity and growth so as to convey new concepts. A priori, it would seem reasonable to explore the nature of hammers as a construction tool by hammering and the nature of paint as an aesthetic medium by painting: hence, the nature of lang. by engaging in verbal discourse.

One would think that it might be possible to escape representation altogether; and indeed experimental poetries such as poésie pure in the 19th c. (see PURE POETRY) and *sound poetry in the 20th sought escape from denotation and reference. All art aspires, Walter Pater remarked, to the condition of music. But, in fact, representation is almost impossible to escape even in nonrealistic or nonreferential art: thus, Rudolf Arnheim, commenting on abstractionist painting, suggested that "even the simplest patterns point to the meaning of the objects to which they apply," so that ultimately "there is no form without representation." Whether abstract or realistic, art largely engages in representation.

Though Samuel Johnson disparaged "representative meter" in poetry and though the range of imitative prosodic effects in Alexander Pope's Essay on Criticism is limited, *mimesis extends much deeper, and the desire for it is embedded in the very fabric of poetic lang. John Crowe Ransom said that poetic lang. aspires to the condition of nature: it "induces the provision of icons among the symbols." In perfected poetic speech, every word would be motivated and wholly natural, appropriate in form to its meaning. When devices such as sound patterning and repetition are used for artistic purposes, the inert categories of ordinary grammar are energized and raised to a higher level of valency where order is naturalized: here words become natural experience. Representation is, thus, the desire for the motivated sign.

II. Classic and Romantic. The Greeks bequeathed to posterity not one conception of poetry but two. The first strain derives from Plato's theory of Forms; in it, the issue of mimesis as *imitation is central. In this theory, which survived until the late 18th c., verbal experience is characterized as secondary and derivative, a re-presentation of actual experience. For Plato, lit. offers only an *image of an image, a copy of a copy of the real, so it is suspect. By the 18th c., copying "Nature" meant something else (see CONVENTION), but "imitation" was still embraced as sound poetic praxis. In the 19th, Thomas Carlyle and Friedrich Nietzsche's announcements that God is dead sealed the fate of this theory forever by removing any possibility of a being apart from our experience of the world who would validate the accuracy of mimetic representation. In the absence of all such verification, only making remains. All 20th- and 21st-c. art, therefore, exists in a postmimetic mode; notice that the chief drive in late industrial technology is to devise machines of ferocious efficiency at copying, at creating facsimiles. Endless repetition becomes the postmod. condition.

The second strain derives from the Gr. conception of poiēsis* as making, the creation of objects from formless matter. This strain eventuated in romantic poetics, where form is made over as internal and individual; in *organicism, every entity has a form that proceeds from a principle that is self-contained, even as the oak tree springs from the acorn. The advent of *romanticism effected a fundamental epistemological shift by reformulating lit. not as an imitative but as a constitutive art, presenting not external reality but a fuller, partly interior version of reality that includes the feeling subject.

Mimesis as imitation was thus supplanted in romantic poetics by the concept of creative *imagination, the faculty by which the poet envisions and creates realities never before seen and not a part of the external world.

The romantic (expressive) strain has roots in antiquity in Aristotle's argument that the *poet surpasses the historian because he or she is not tied to mere fact but provides a more accurate (if less "factual") account of reality. This is the line followed in the Ren. by J. C. Scaliger (Poetices libri septem 1.1) and Philip Sidney: since the poet as seer (see VATES) can envision a higher order of nature than the one known to ordinary mortals, he or she becomes not a slave to or a copier of reality but a creator. The poet, says Sidney, "doth grow in effect another nature." Since the poet does not make propositional statements about the external world directly ("nothing affirmeth"), the poet is not a fabricator of falsehoods ("never lieth"). The poet models "truth" at a deeper level, where recreating the sense of life as felt experience is largely not a matter of descriptive detail; nor is verisimilitude required in order to persuade a reader of the "reality" of the fiction.

III. Saussure and Peirce. The most extensive mod. theories of verbal representation are those of Ferdinand de Saussure, the publication of whose lecture notes subsequently created an entire school in poetics (see STRUCTURALISM), and Charles Sanders Peirce, whose semiotics has been, if more extensive and philosophically coherent, much less influential in Am. lit. crit. (see SEMIOTICS AND POETRY). Both theories place the activity of signification—i.e., symbolization, sign making and sign interpreting—at the center of human cognition and interaction with the external world. Saussure followed all Western thought about lang. since Plato in conceiving the nature of ling. signs to be arbitrary: since the words for the same referent in two different langs. normally differ, there cannot be any innate, natural, or "motivated" relation between the particular sound shape of a word (the signifier) and its referent in the external world (the signified; see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). He departed from such trad., however, in assigning the locus of meaning to the difference between such signs and their referents, both between langs. and within a lang. (see SOUND). Since, for Saussure, the vast majority of words have no motivated form, meaning arises only in the interplay of signs: hence, it is polyvalent, unstable, and indeterminate (see INDETERMINACY, TEXTUALITY).

Peirce conceives the world as triadic: his ontology identifies Firstness (a thing that is without relation to any other thing), Secondness (a thing that has its being in relation to any one other thing), and Thirdness (a thing that brings into relation a First and a Second). Thirdness is the realm of signs. For Peirce, all thought is carried on in signs; hence, all representation, as thought, is mediate cognition. Things in this triadic world may be either objects, meanings, or signs: a sign mediates between an object and its meaning. Meaning exists a priori, apart from human cognition; what remains for us is only to discover and know it in greater or lesser degree. Hence, meaning is entirely objective, existing on an ideal plane that Peirce makes clear is essentially Hegelian.

The relations of sign to object—i.e., the fundamental modes of representation—possible in Peirce are three: resemblance, producing an icon (see ICONICITY); physical contiguity or action, producing an index; and thought (cognition), producing a symbol or sign. Since all signifying activity for Peirce is mental and even idealist, the first two indicate resemblance or emotive meanings and may express possibilities that might obtain or actualities that do obtain in the world—but not necessary relations that must obtain logically. Such signs are, therefore, not genuine, though their very ambivalences and ambiguities guarantee that they will be used widely. Genuine signs, incl. lang., exist in the autonomous realm of interpretive thought, which is fundamentally symbolic in character.

The noncongruence of ontological and epistemological assumptions between Peirce and Saussure is stark. For Peirce, subjectivity is a minor issue; for Saussure, it is fundamental. For Peirce, meaning is always already existent; for Saussure, it is local, unstable, and evanescent. Saussure's account is binary and linear; meaning is endlessly deferred. All the other major philosophical systems are ternary and triangular: all of them—including ling., semantics, semiotics, psychology, and cognitive studies—take meaning as a given.

IV. The Verbal Medium. Lang., the 20th c. realized with a shock, is a modeling system based on a code: everything cast into verbal form is encoded. Like other systems of expression both natural (gestures) and artificial (ciphers, mathematics), the elements of the system and the rules for combining them are largely arbitrary. Fundamental to all representation, therefore—whether mimetic or not—is the nature of the medium. Every representation is a mediation; all representations are formalizations and symbolizations. The nature of a symbol demands that it be radically unlike that for which it stands.

It is of the very essence of art that the medium be different from that of its objects. But it is the peculiarity of verbal art that the medium is both physical and symbolic—hence, double, inextricably so. Words, besides having such physical characteristics as shape and length, bear meaning as part of their primary substance. In expository prose, the physicality of words is suppressed, whereas, in poetry, it is foregrounded. The medium is the mediation; lacking it, there is no translation of the expression into another form, for all art partakes of the condition of trans. Lang., like art, is a "secondary modeling system"; and though it is true that lang. is art-full, more deeply, one must say that lang. is art in its enabling conditions, processes, and achieved effects.

From the point of view of cognitive science and information theory, a representation is a type of modeling; our recognition that an artwork is an imitation of the external world is one species of pattern recognition.

But the re-presentation in every representation is also, more directly, a presentation itself. So every representation is re-present and re-presents as it represents. The relation of the verbal representation to the original sensory one is one of analogy or resemblance, which is very different. An analogy is a perceived congruity in structural relationships between two sets of phenomena. Now the difference in modality is foregrounded, and difference is accepted as an essential part of the process.

V. Translation. The nature of verbal representation may become clearer if we consider the case of trans. The translated poem is not a copy good or bad; it is a version enacted in another medium. The nature and quality of the trans. are controlled by the translator's skill but also by the resources offered by both the source and the target langs. All trans., i.e., is mediation, so that the aim of faithful representation is not to copy the original but to try to do the thing that the original did in its medium as well as that can be done in the new medium, insofar as the doing in the original is understood by the translator.

This account, which relates one verbal representation to another, can be extended to all representation in art and indeed to lang. itself as representation. All verbal representation is trans. by its very nature. A verbal representation is, in effect, a trans. target lang., except that the source lang. is not verbal; it is sensory. The point is not that direct comparison between the two modes of representation is impossible but simply that it is confounded by the radical differences between the representational media, which are very different codes.

VI. Design. Many recent commentators have seemed to think that the verbal representation of experience in lit. does not effect and instantiate any real presence. But it is odd to complain that lit. is an order of experience secondary to sense experience. We should ask, rather, whether a literary (poetic) artwork represents the same objects, in the same way as, and with the same resulting degree of credibility as, sense experience: if so, how and how much, and if not, why and what instead. Is verbal representation inferior to sensory representation? Plato answers in the affirmative; the romantics answer in the negative. Sense experience itself is, of course, a representation; the verbal artifact, however, during the process of reception—reading, hearing, or observing—presents itself directly to cognition, supplanting the external world. It blocks out normal sense data, replacing them with other data about sensation in a precoded form. "It is hard to write any piece of literature that corresponds to anything as such, whatever it be," says Viktor Shklovsky in O teorii prozy (Theory of Prose, 1925), because "art is not the shadow of a thing but the thing itself." The eye sees the words on the page, in prose, only to ignore them: they are transparent. Poetry, by contrast, is translucent if not opaque: meaning is still conveyed but now in words whose design arrests our *attention.

Fundamental to the nature of all art is that it achieves its effects by increase of order or design. Regardless of authorial intention, most artworks show themselves to be supercharged with design. It is traditional in Western poetics to think of the faculty or capacity of imagination, i.e., image making, as central to literary representation, This is indeed important, esp. for realistic representation and verisimilitude, but it cannot supplant the making, the craft, the shaping of the medium that evokes those images and, as it does so, binds their elements more tightly together by *form. In poetry, the shaping is of the sensory medium (sound) and carried out largely at the preverbal (phonological) level (*meter, *rhyme, sound patterning). In its heightened design, texture, and materiality, poetry does not compete with the external world as a species of representation: it offers additional resources and forms of order that are constitutive, not imitative: they enact a heightened form of representation that creates that heightened mode of consciousness that, since antiquity, has been called poetic.

Poetry aims to show that relationships exist among the things of the world that are not otherwise obvious; it accomplishes this by binding words together with the subtler cords of sound. These bindings, like the relations they enact, are formal. Ernest Fenollosa observed that "the relations between things are more important than the things which they relate." If mimesis is to occur at all, therefore—given the differences between the representational media—it must address formal rather than substantial features. As Ludwig Wittgenstein remarks, "What any picture of whatever form must have in common with reality, in order to be able to depict it . . . is logical form, i.e. the form of reality" (Tractatus 2.18). Hence, the problem of representation is not so much that of the elements of lang. as, again and ever, the problem of form (see PROSODY).

Even Aristotle supports this view: mimesis as "imitation" is only part of the account of art given in the Poetics. Aristotle certainly views imitation as a central human activity; nevertheless, he makes it clear that the chief criterion for drama is not spectacle, diction, credible character, or even verisimilitude but the making of a strong *plot, i.e. structure. As for poetry, the account of the means of imitation given in ch. 1 of the Poetics is truncated and somewhat garbled; but several modes are identified, and the manner of the imitation is by no means assumed to be direct or literal. The role attributed to imitation in the Poetics has distinct limits: only some arts are imitative. Indeed, Aristotle holds that the order of art need not be—and at least once he holds it must not be—the order of reality (else poetry would be inferior to hist.). On the whole, Aristotle goes to considerable lengths to differentiate the art object from the reality it imitates, and this almost entirely on account of aesthetic design. Both imitative and nonimitative arts share this feature, which suggests that, for Aristotle, it is design itself that distinguishes art from life. Even in realistic and referential art, where design is a signifier for the reality outside the artwork, the signifier is a presentational form. In all art, i.e., the artwork itself stands as an icon for signification itself.

VII. The Master Trope. There was much interest in the 20th c. in lang. as it manifests itself in psychology, philosophy, prose fiction, and culture. Sigmund Freud showed that words are often the keys to dream interpretation, because lang. itself writes the structure of the unconscious. And while the relation of signifier to signified is central in Saussure, much of Jacques Lacan's work explores processes based on links between signifier and signifier. René Girard has argued that desire itself derives from mimesis. In philosophy, Martin Heidegger conceived poetic lang. as presentational rather than representational, presenting Being itself, a framework built upon by H.-G. Gadamer. Reference and representation have been major subjects in the study of narrative fiction. It has been argued by cultural theorists that the study of representation must focus not only on the code but on the physical and cultural means of production of that code, since these forces undeniably affect both the nature of the code and the uses speakers put it to. All these inquiries bear directly and deeply on the fundamental issue of how lang. functions, which is to say, on what is possible in verbal representation. All of them take lang. as the master *trope for human mind and action.

I. Linguistic Basis
II. Germanic Metrics

In Gr. and Lat. metrics, resolution refers to the admissibility of two short syllables where the basic pattern of the meter has one longum; it is generally distinguished from contraction or *substitution of two light syllables for a metrical breve or *anceps. Comparable phenomena can be found in the verse of many langs., such as the cl. Somali gabay genre and the Prakrit arya meter, which suggests that there is a basis for resolution in the phonology of ordinary speech. In Gr., resolution, always excluded from the last foot, is rare in the iambic trimeter; and the trochaic tetrameter of the archaic iambographers, more frequent in *tragedy, grows rapidly over the course of Euripides' devel., is more frequent still in the satyr play, and is very frequent in *comedy. In comedy, substitution in iambic trimeters is very common, being excluded from only the last foot; in tragedy, however, it is restricted to the first foot, except for proper names. In general, the two light syllables of a resolution or substitution cannot be separated or followed by a word boundary.

I. Linguistic Basis. When Luganda poems and songs are accompanied on the drums, a single drumbeat is assigned to a light syllable (⏑) and two to a heavy syllable (–). These drumbeats directly reflect the *mora count of ling. rhythm. The moraic equivalence of two light syllables to one heavy is attested in the ling. rules of many langs., even those not having long vowels. In Manam, a word ending in a heavy (closed) syllable reduplicates only that last syllable, but a word ending in two light syllables reduplicates both. Moraic equivalence explains why some verse systems allow a sequence of two light syllables to be mapped onto one rhythmically strong position in the foot (see ARSIS AND THESIS) when that position is preferentially occupied by a heavy syllable.

II. Germanic Metrics. In Germanic metrics, incl. OE, OHG, and ON, where *ictus is usually borne by a long syllable, resolution applies specifically to a short stressed syllable and the following syllable whether short or long. Metrical resolution is not to be confused with phonological *elision or contraction, which depends on certain sonorant patterns (esp. liquids and nasals) such that two syllables are either reduced or have the potential to be reduced to one. In resolution, the syllables must remain distinct, but they count as one ictus-bearing unit at the metrical level of abstraction (just as, in Beowulf, two or more unstressed syllables count as one nonictus-bearing unit, i.e., a dip).

RESPONSION. The relation of *equivalence that exists between two or more corresponding (i.e., metrically identical) sections of the same larger rhythmical whole. The term is ordinarily used in reference to the repeated stanzas or strophes of a piece of Gr. choral lyric (see MELIC POETRY, ODE) or to the shorter segments within such a *lyric. *Strophe and *antistrophe in a given poem are then said to be in responsion to each other; every syllable in the one either has its responding counterpart in the other or else belongs to a pair of syllables that has such a counterpart (usually two shorts that respond, through resolution or contraction, to one long, though other possibilities do exist—"anaclastic" responsion between – ⏑ and ⏑ – [see ANACLASIS], e.g., or responsion between – ⏑ and –, found occasionally in the creto-paeonic verse of Gr. Old Comedy). "Exact" or strict responsion between single syllables of the same quantity is often contrasted with the "free" responsion that exists in pieces that allow *anceps resolution, contraction, and the like; and responsion between the principal subdivisions of a whole composition (the type to which the term usually refers) is occasionally distinguished, as "external" responsion, from the "internal" responsion of one foot or metron to the next that exists within such subdivisions. Since Maas, the concept of responsion has come to seem one of the principal compositional and structural strategies for one kind of strophic verse.

REVERDIE. A dance song or poem, popular throughout Europe in the late Middle Ages, that celebrates the coming of spring—the new green of the woods and fields, the singing of the birds, the time of love. By a natural association, the reverdie began to welcome Easter as well as spring, and Ger., OF, Lat., and Occitan poets described how longing for spring leads to longing for heaven and praise of the Blessed Virgin. The form is usually that of the chanson of five or six stanzas without *refrain. A further variation was developed by the Occitan *troubadours, who extended their praise to other seasons of the year.

REVERSED CONSONANCE. A stylistic device developed by the Filipino poet Jose Garcia Villa in which the first and last consonants of a word or the two consonants of the last syllable are reversed in the corresponding *rhyme. Thus, the corresponding rhyme of a word like maiden would either begin with the letter n and end with the letter m or begin with n and end with d. The two consonants reversed in the rhyming word do not need to retain the original pronunciation they had in the first word. E.g., the word sing may be rhymed with a word like begins, as the last syllable of begins involves a reversal of the two consonants, s and g. In the case of a word that has only one sounded consonant, the corresponding rhyme may be formed by reversing this consonant with the last sounded consonant of the previous word. Garcia Villa developed this technique in the belief that it would provide a subtler, less obtrusive rhyme than what is conventional in Eng.

REVERSE RHYME, inverse rhyme. In full or true rhyme, the medial vowel and final consonant (or cluster) of the syllable are held constant, while the initial consonant is varied. In reverse rhyme, the first consonant and the vowel remain the same, and the final consonant changes, as in bat/back, yum/yuck. This is a rare form in Eng. poetry; indeed, many might deny that it qualifies as rhyme at all, since it thwarts rhyme's traditional structure of "begin differently, end same." Sometimes the term is also used for a kind of *chiasmus in which the first and last consonants of a word are switched, e.g., rap/pair.

RHAPSODE (Gr., "one who stitches songs" or, by false etymology, "one who sings while holding a staff [rhabdos]"). In early Greece, a singer who selected and "stitched together" his own poetry or that of others, originally a selection or a portion of *epic poetry, usually the Iliad or the Odyssey, partly extemporaneously or from memory. By the 6th c. BCE, with the establishment of what were regarded as authentic Homeric texts, the term labeled a professional class of performers who recited the Homeric poems in correct sequence, not merely selected extracts. Rhapsodes are to be distinguished from citharodes or aulodes, singers of lyric texts to the accompaniment of the cithara or flute. Subsequently, the term rhapsody came to denote any highly emotional utterance, a literary work informed by ecstasy and not by rational organization; it is also applied to a literary miscellany or a disconnected sequence of literary works.

RHETORIC AND POETRY

I. Interpretation
II. Composition

Traditionally, rhet. has been identified with the kind of public oratory in which speakers seek aims and effects ranging from (at one end) a persuasiveness that shapes and resolves an audience's belief or action regarding some relatively circumscribed problem, chiefly through argument, to (at the other end) an eloquence that transforms the listener by elevating the imagination or passions, or amplifying the emotions, and/or displaying impressive form and style. Yet any distinction between persuasion and eloquence must be held as tenuous at best, for theorists and critics have seen them sometimes as distinct, sometimes as interpenetrating and mutually constitutive. Aristotle understood style as contributing to argumentative proofs, and Cicero (and later even David Hume) understood that the eloquence of high style and raised passions can help to constitute the very arguments of law or politics. The art of oratory has typically identified three genres—the deliberative or political speech given before policy-determining bodies, the judicial or forensic before courts of law, and the epideictic or demonstrative before occasional assemblies. In addition, however, rhet. has periodically expanded to become not only a prominent but the overarching art of discourse, e.g., in the Roman Republic and throughout the Ren. in Europe. When this occurred, poetry itself was usually written and read by people for whom rhet. was not only the major craft of composition but the general intellectual context for interpreting all matters of thinking, feeling, and acting. At times, the similarity of poetry and rhet. has been stressed, e.g., as a *mimesis of persuasion (Philip Sidney's or Shakespeare's *sonnet sequences) and/or an intensification of social passion or *imagination (poetry is the "most prevailing eloquence," remarked Ben Jonson); and both have been thought of as modes of practical thought and action aimed at good judgment (Aristotle) and even practical wisdom (Gr. phronesis, Lat. prudentia), esp. when rhet. is conceived as architectonic. Pindar's odes, e.g., were performed as direct public interventions into the social matrix of his time and place, as was much Gr. lyric (Walker).

By contrast, at other times differences between poetry and rhet. were stressed, esp. in the last several centuries, as in John Stuart Mill's self-conscious pronouncement that "[p]oetry and eloquence are both alike the expression or utterance of feeling: but, if we may be excused the antithesis, we should say that eloquence is heard, poetry is *over*heard." In our own time, even if it is not rhet. as traditionally conceived (as one of the ars disserandi or arts of discourse), nevertheless, the traditional preoccupations of rhet. have become pervasive and for some architectonic, e.g., in much cultural crit. and the many varieties of ideology-critique, often under different names and guises and in complex interactions with more disciplinary pursuits, like economics or psychoanalysis (Bender and Wellbery). Poetry can always be interpreted rhetorically, but contemp. poetry in England and America and indeed throughout the world may be thought to consider itself rhetorical to the extent that it is seen to have absorbed and superseded "modernist" concerns with formal epiphanies (Langbaum) and is intent on evincing "postmodernist" orientations to communication and its difficulties (Altieri, Bernstein, Perloff), to social, public and/or political interventions (von Hallberg, Pinsky, Nelson, Spiegelman), to representing variants of practical reason and ethics (Sloane, Booth 1983, Phelan, Vendler), or to enlarging the sensus communis as an "epideictic rationality" (Garver 2004, Walker, Jost).

The bearing of rhet. on poetry has always involved composition and interpretation, sometimes at elementary levels, as in many med. manuals, sometimes in quite sophisticated theories. Quintilian's influential Institutio oratoria (1st c. CE) offers one traditional attitude: skill in oratory is founded on "speaking correctly" and "interpreting poets" (1.4.2), and conflates the inventive processes of rhet. and poetry, otherwise often differentiated (see INVENTION). These differentiations have usually been impelled, like devels. and even revolutions in interpretation, by reactions against a perceived restrictiveness of rhetorical method. Because, over the last 100 years or so, interpretation in general and rhetorical interpretation of poetry in particular have undergone a more conscious revolution than has the art of composition, interpretation will be discussed first.

I. Interpretation. Rhetorical interpretation and crit. can take many forms, but generally speaking, they emphasize relationships among speaker, audience, text, purpose, situation, and occasion (Jost and Olmsted); more narrowly, they consider how any discourse can be understood as if it were a public address of some kind, whether persuasive or eloquent or both. Just as a speech act encompasses such extratextual elements as its speaker's delivery and the audience's response, so rhetorical theorists and critics have insisted that poetry too might be understood as intentionally addressed at a certain time, by someone, to someone else, for some purpose, and toward some effect (Phelan; see INTENTION, SPEECH ACT THEORY). Borrowing from Aristotle, one might inquire, e.g., how intention is secured through different "modes of proof" (Aristotle, Rhetoric 1.2) to help establish one's case, that is, through forms of argumentative and other persuasive appeals regarding the substantive issue(s), or logos, as well as through manipulation of the audience's perception of the speaker's moral character, or ethos, and through manipulation of the audience's emotion, or pathos. In the Middle Ages, the distinctiveness of rhet. was its search for identifiable causes of audience effects, closely related to but different from the enterprise of grammar, which was often both a search for the forms of "correctness" in speech and an intro. to the ancient auctores, and the enterprise of logic or dialectic, which included the study of validity in deduction and universals (Copeland). (Together, grammar, rhet., and dialectic constituted the trivium of the high med. liberal arts curriculum, distinguished both from the quadrivium of arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy, and from professional disciplines like medicine, law and theology.) On the one hand, rhetorically minded interpreters concerned with the three modes of proof are necessarily historicist and contextual, conceiving all poetry as a kind of social act or performance and even locating the rhetorical impulse in, e.g., romantic, symbolist, imagist, objectivist, or other modernist poetry, on its face often non- and even antirhetorical (Blasing, Altieri). On the other hand, rhetorical theorists and critics in our own time are often faulted for their privileging of authorial intention, that is, for their failure to view poetry sui generis.

Distinguishing poetry from rhet. and other arts or "powers" (Gr. dynameis) was the analytic project of Aristotle's Poetics. Aristotle made mimesis (the representation or *imitation of human action) the genus of poetry, with mythos (*plot) its species. By contrast, persuasion was the genus of rhet., audience differentiation in terms of judging (deliberative and forensic) or observing (epideictic) its species, and good judgment—not persuading at all costs—its internal end or telos (Garver 1995). Aristotle's analytic efforts to distinguish and arrange the arts and sciences "horizontally," so to speak, form a sharp contrast to Plato's efforts to synthesize the arts and arrange them hierarchically, all governed by the mode of disputation he called "dialectic," which subsumed the rhetorical.

Aristotle's analytic division was, however, lost sight of for more than a millennium, and Plato's was radically reformulated in the cl. world by Cicero's elevation of rhet. as an architectonic art of eloquent persuasion in all matters, and in the Middle Ages by Horace's Ars poetica, which similarly gives poetry the ends of rhet. The Horatian view, moreover, reaffirmed the Ciceronian position that "knowledge-qua-practical" should be the basis of all persuasion and extended that view to the notion that a poet's unique powers were (additionally) to delight. To teach, to delight, to move (docere, delectare, movere) were for a long time the ends of traditional rhet., understood as both persuasion and eloquence, and could be achieved by poetry. Thus, most med. manuals of poetry were often equally manuals of rhet., with only the sections on versification constituting any significant distinction between them.

After Aristotle's Poetics was rediscovered in the 15th c., its former analytic distinctiveness from rhet. slowly but gradually overcame the by then long-standing symbiosis of rhet. and poetry. At first, however, the temper of the Ren. continued to mute any such antagonism, for rhet. had again become architectonic in the culture and the curriculum, restored to something of its former centrality after having been displaced by logic and dialectic in the 12th c. *Renaissance poetics at first reaffirmed, then surpassed, the lesser didactic, Horatian qualities of the earlier Middle Ages: that is, a poem's utility—its proficiency at teaching or moving, so argued Antonio Minturno (1559), J. C. Scaliger (1561), and Sidney (1595)—was achieved through its unique capacity for delighting and esp. through (quasi-Aristotelian) "imitative" means. In these and similar apologetics, poetry became in effect a superior rhet., and Virgil and Horace were cited as the Ciceronian perfectus orator, eloquent by virtue of both persuasive and stylistic abilities to make wisdom practical, effective, and situated (Altman, Lanham 1976). Rhetorical imitatio, meaning here the composer's exercise of copying the work of others, became in interpretive theory the readerly role of imitating model behavior as represented in another text, historically a theoretical position ancient as Plato's Republic, and negatively sanctioned by the Puritan closing of the theaters in 1642. In this way, Ren. imitatio blunted later, more accurate and analytic rereadings of Aristotle's notion of mimesis, even while ostensibly encompassing it. In time, however, a new emphasis on form—on a poem's organization and on a playwright's use of the so-called "unities" of time, place, and action—began to sweep crit., increasingly relegating rhet. to matters of emotion and style only. Further stimulating this new emphasis was the revival, with Francesco Robortello's ed. of Longinus in 1554, of the thesis that the "sublimity" of poetry does not so much persuade as more nearly "transports" its audience (see SUBLIME). This concept also revived interest in a post-Hegelian "organic" theory of poetry compatible with Aristotelianism and echoed in the mod. insistence, extending through S. T. Coleridge into the 20th c., that poetry must be read as if its *form and content were fused (see ORGANICISM), further relegating argument and reason to nonpoetic discourse. This later insistence controverts the sometime rhetorical view, esp. prominent in the allegorical orientation of the earlier Middle Ages, that form is isolable, interchangeable, and strategic, while content is a manageable body of knowledge, truths, or arguments.

Although a certain, mainly Aristotelian formalism was inaugurated in the poetics of the late Eng. Ren., the movement did not reach its apotheosis until the 20th c., first with Joel Spingarn in 1910 and Benedetto Croce in 1933, both of whom called for a scrapping of all of the older, rhetorically infested terminologies; and then with the *New Criticism of the 1930s and the Chicago neo-Aristotelians (see CHICAGO SCHOOL), with their insistence that a poem constructs its own uses for otherwise referential discourse, adjacent to or beyond the parameters of ordinary communication. Poetry speaks a different lang., Richards theorized in 1929. Poetry does not communicate, Brooks insisted in 1947. Or if it does, Frye argued in 1957, it does so as a kind of "applied literature." Prophetically, Kenneth Burke offered a "counter-statement" to this increasingly dominant *formalism as early as 1931, calling for the restoration of a rhetorical perspective in which discursive form could again be seen as strategic and in which content could be seen as a complex fusion of the "motives" (causes and reasons) of speaker, intention, utterance, and audience.

The mod. restoration of rhet. to interpretation found three main emphases: the author's relation to the text and audience, the role of the reader in the communication, and style. The first distinguished two levels of speaking in the poem, the one in which the narrator of the poem is talking to himself or to another person (see VOICE), and the one in which the poet is speaking to us (Olson, Eliot, Booth 1983, Wright, Ong; see PERSONA). Increasingly, however, 20th-c. poetics pursued the second emphasis, focusing on the role of the reader—whether real-life, authorial or ideal, narrative, and either of or in the poem—whose interaction with the poem's structures gives it meaning or whose presence at least raises questions about the conditions of *textuality and communicability (Barthes, Holland, Culler, Iser, Fish, Suleiman and Crosman, Scholes, Phelan).

Whereas formalists, in their "organic" view of poetry, insist that poetry means what it says, postformalist critics argue that poetry means what it does. Nonetheless, these first two emphases involve at best a partial or fragmentary use of rhet. and often an antagonism toward its ends. But when the reader is a listener, as when poetry is performed in an oral culture (Errington, Connelly, Sweeney), or in a culture of "secondary orality" (Ong), or in a multicultural environment, the role of rhet. becomes much more extensive, at once more traditional and more Burkean, a general heuristic of communicative strategies, the study of whose scope is now beginning to reach beyond Western cultural confines (see ORAL POETRY).

For the specifically stylistic analysis of poetry, rhet. (here, amplification and ultimately eloquence) has traditionally supplied detailed taxonomies of figures, schemes, and tropes, ranging from such textual effects as *irony to such local effects as *alliteration. Style catalogs burgeoned particularly among med. and Ren. rhetoricians, for whom an embellished *style was the sum total of eloquence (in Peacham [1593] over 350 figures are described). Four tropes—*metaphor, *metonymy, *synecdoche, irony—were early conceived as master tropes (Fraunce [1588]) because they generate all figurative uses of lang., an idea reiterated by inter alia Kenneth Burke in the 1940s, the philosopher Stephen Pepper in the 1960s, the historian Hayden White in the 1970s, and others later. In 1956, Roman Jakobson found metaphor and metonymy to be attitudes the mind assumes in coping with degrees of similarity or contiguity between matters and thus began a movement to view tropes as inherent in intellection. Subsequently, the act of interpretation itself came to be seen as tropological, even in psychoanalysis (Genette, Nietzsche, Freud): figures, esp. the master tropes, map mental strategies or processes in the reader's work of unraveling the meaning of a text. The figures and tropes have supplied a taxonomy for anthropology, psychology, ling., and hist.; in mod. rhet., they serve as indicators of the inherent plasticity of lang. (Vickers, Quinn) or as cognitive templates (Turner). The plasticity and figurality of lang. have also become concerns of mod. deconstructionists (Derrida, de Man) in their rhetorical examination of the often indeterminate gap between what poetry says and what it ostensibly does (see INTERTEXTUALITY).

This brief review may suggest that the ultimate choice for contemp. interpretation is less to rhetoricize or not to rhetoricize than how or to what extent to do so: to consider poetry as persuasively audience-directed and stylistically eloquence-directed or both at once, even if viewing it as something other than a conventionally communicative act; to subsume all of rhet. or only those fragments thought to be applicable, in such mod. sciences as ling. or psychology; or even to rejuvenate rhet. as an architectonic productive art (McKeon). Some of the alternatives may be further clarified, and some of the gaps in our survey bridged, by shifting our attention to theories of composition that, by offering attitudes toward the use of lang., also speak to possibilities of interpretation.

II. Composition. Among extant Western handbooks of composition, Aristotle's Rhetoric is the oldest. His master stroke in the Rhetoric, one too easily overlooked or absorbed within other theories, is his doctrine that rhetorical practice embodies its own unique mode of thought. The orator discovers the available means of persuading his audience chiefly by consulting (having previously mentally absorbed and made second nature) the "common" and particularly the "special" "topics" (Gr. topoi*; Lat. loci, *"commonplaces"). Topics are discursive "re-sources," esp. pairs of terms, useful for provisionally locating and organizing the relevant circumstances and facts and interpretive premises of an indeterminate case, a contingent matter susceptible to competing understandings. This part of practical reasoning, called "invention" in later theories, deals with probable rather than demonstrable matters: the orator weighs alternatives, substantiates his case with facts and value-premises, and chooses strategies that she or he believes will move (when properly employed) to good judgment. To establish the uniqueness of rhetorical invention to some collective audience, Aristotle advanced the example and the enthymeme as the counterparts, respectively, of logical induction (to a singular not to a generalization) and syllogism. The latter has two premises and a conclusion with clear canons of formal completeness and validity operating on expert subject matters (in dialectic) and on commonly held matters (in rhet.). The enthymeme, in other words, draws its major premise from the audience's beliefs (e.g., Had we but world enough and time,/This coyness, Lady, were no crime); its facts also draw from the audience's perceived situation (but we have not world enough and time); and its conclusion accordingly (therefore, this coyness, Lady, is a crime). Rhet. allows the audience silently to supply a condition, premise, and even a conclusion itself. Induction, or argument by example (paradeigma), works by analogy and has many forms. In either enthymeme or example, the audience, its knowledge and emotions, has a priority in rhet. that is otherwise held (generally speaking) by formal validity in logic, forms of correctness in grammar, and the "formal cause" or "plot" in poetry.

In one respect, rhetorical invention became poetic invention by default. Aristotle does not describe the latter and distinguishes the two largely by implication; his Poetics is not a handbook of composition but a theory of the nature and elements of poetry, developed in part by comparison with drama. One of those elements—"thought" (dianoia), or what is appropriate for a fictional character to say—Aristotle declines to discuss at length in the Poetics (6.16) because he had already treated it in the Rhetoric. That is, poetic invention (heuresis), where it does not depend upon plot, seems to arise from a certain natural plasticity (17), the poet's ability to visualize action and assume attitudes and arguments, which is Aristotle's way of avoiding ascribing poetic invention to either *inspiration or poetic madness as Plato did. Nevertheless, the Platonic alternatives have had their advocates through the centuries: the divine furor usually associated with Neoplatonism was expressed by Shakespeare in A Midsummer Night's Dream ("The lunatic, the lover, and the poet/Are of imagination all compact"), though Shakespeare himself was steeped in a rhetorical culture. The turn to inspiration reached its culmination in the romantic movement of the 19th c. (see ROMANTICISM). Still, in the larger historical view, it was rhet., esp. in its devels. after Aristotle, that remained the chief discipline by which writers and speakers learned their craft.

By the time of Cicero, whose Latinity was influential for centuries and whose theories of rhet. were to achieve enormous popularity among Ren. humanists, rhet. had become much more systematized and more intellectually architectonic. A unified process of composition implicit in Aristotle became divided into five discrete functions: thought (inventio), arrangement (dispositio), style (elocutio), memory (memoria), and delivery (actio or pronuntiato). Aristotelian rhetorical invention, the search for available means of persuasion, later became a pro-and-contra analysis of inventive topics regarding the substance of the speech, the credibility of the speaker, and the emotion of the audience; forensic oratory, as in Cicero, was the paradigm (Sloane 1997). Oratorical arrangement also became more prominent: where Aristotle had advised only two parts (statement and proof) but allowed for four (plus introd. and conclusion), Cicero advised six (exordium, background of the question, statement, proof, refutation, conclusion) but allowed seven (plus a digression). Although Cicero (himself a poet) may have found poetry limiting, the two were firmly joined in his extension of rhet. well beyond the genres of public oratory, not least through Horace's aims of teaching, pleasing, and moving in the Ars poetica. Rhet. became the art of persuasive eloquence governing all disciplines, a lang. whose stylistic force numbered among the formal means by which its content achieves persuasiveness. As such, rhet. was to cap the statesman's education and be, above all, the avenue through which the wisdom of philosophy would be made practical. To accomplish this last, Cicero in effect rhetoricized philosophy, extending Aristotle's teachings on rhetorical thought far beyond its carefully delimited boundaries. Ciceronian rhet. now became a kind of surrogate philosophy that still had great attraction for Ren. humanists 14 centuries later, a particularly self-reflexive example of which is the first sonnet in Sidney's sonnet series Astrophil and Stella. In fact, throughout the 16th c., Cicero's formalized rhet. and ideal of persuasive eloquence were ready tools to fill the practical and apologetic needs of critics and poets, ethical philosophers and lawyers, theologians, and even, in part, protoscientists like Francis Bacon (see CICERONIANISM).

In the Middle Ages, Cicero's youthful De inventione and the pseudo-Ciceronian Rhetorica ad Herennium never waned in popularity, though both were merely schematic catalogs offering little more than systematizing. Med. rhets. and poetics stressed dispositio and elocutio, as seen in Geoffrey of Vinsauf's Poetria nova (ca. 1210), which, like so many others, used rhetorical invention for interpretive ends. The most formalized functions of Ciceronian rhet., functions that directly pertain to the creation of plot (argument) and/or style, became the critical determinants of eloquence in either art. A concern with rhetorical thought, or any intrusion of inventio into systematic philosophy, let alone poetics, was increasingly neglected, although much earlier Augustine's De doctrina christiana (426 CE) used rhetorical invention for hermeneutic purposes (Copeland).

It was precisely that concern with "thought" or invention that was revived in the Ren. The first pub. book in Italy was Cicero's masterpiece De oratore, a dialogue in which famous Roman statesmen and lawyers, engaged in a dialogue, give critical precedence not to dispositio and elocutio but to the strategies of inventio in moving others to action. The recovery of Quintilian and the rise to prominence of law as a secular profession gave added impetus to this "new" mode of thought and disputation, preeminent examples of which were Baldassare Castiglione's The Book of the Courtier (1528) and Niccolò Machiavelli's The Prince (1532). Ciceronian tactics drawn from judicial rhet. seemed to fire the poets' imaginations as well: arguing in utramque partem, on both sides of a question, though rigidified as a feature of med. scholastic disputation, became a kind of lawyerly embracing of contraries (controversia), reappearing in the argumentative and ostensibly irresolute fabric of Tudor poetry and drama; qualis sit, or individuating a phenomenon by setting it within a thesis-to-hypothesis (or definite-to-indefinite-question), suffuses Boccaccian fiction and Sidneyan crit.; ethos and ethopoiesis, the illusion of mind and of behavioral probability, pervade dialogues, mock encomia, and most discussions of courtliness. Schoolroom imitatio, incl. the formal requirements of the forensic oration (esp. the second part, the narratio or relevant background of the main issue), brought fictiveness itself well within rhetorical exercises.

Ultimately, however, it was just this Ciceronian inventio, incl. those vestiges within it of Aristotle's distinction between rhetorical and logical modes of thought, that suffered most in the reformations that accompanied the Ren. Rhet. eventually became utterly formalized far beyond anything Cicero imagined (in fact he warned against such formalization) or its allegorization in the Middle Ages. To mention but one of the influential books of the early Ren., De Inventione dialectica by Rudolphus Agricola (d. 1485): logic or dialectic, according to Agricola, is "to speak in a probable way on any matter"; grammar teaches correctness and clarity; rhet., style. Subsequently, the reformers known as Ramists (after Peter Ramus) bled rhet. of inventio and dispositio (these became solely functions of logic), reducing it to style and delivery (memoria was seen as a function of arrangement or dispositio). Though the Ramist reform did not last, rhet. was drastically dispersed among other arts and sciences, eventually submitting to further reformative efforts, scientific and philosophic, to restrict its scope. Thereafter, Cicero's public mind in search of probabilities has been more or less displaced by an isolated, psychologized, and meditative mind at odds with traditional inventio.

As inventio declined in prominence, style (elocution) rose, not only in the new rhets. of the 16th c. but in the new poetics. With the rise of the vernacular over Lat. as the lang. of lit., scholarship, and commerce, rhetorical theories burgeoned with discussions of style, further cutting across what few boundaries yet remained between rhet. and poetry, the former again reduced to merely the stylistic dimension of the latter. Although Thomas Wilson, who wrote the first Ciceronian rhet. in Eng. (1553), stayed within rhetorical genres for his examples, other traditional stylists, such as Richard Sherry, Henry Peacham, and Abraham Fraunce, treated elocutio by drawing virtually all of their examples from vernacular poetry. George Puttenham's Arte of English Poesie (1589) devotes much attention to style and is equally a work on rhetorical elocutio, involved as both arts are in what Puttenham regards as the courtly requirements of "dissembling."

Like many of the continental poetics of the time (Joachim du Bellay, Pierre de Ronsard, Jacques Peletier), Puttenham's book divides theory along the lines of the first three offices of traditional rhet.: inventio, dispositio, elocutio. But this rhetoricizing of poetics did little to salvage the rapidly disappearing uniqueness of rhetorical invention, incl. those poetics that had clear bearing on compositional matters. Geoffrey of Vinsauf's advice to med. poets, to invent merely by thinking of structure first, was seldom superseded. Similarly, Puttenham taught that invention was to be performed by the "phantasticall part of man," his imagination, and controlled by choice of *genre and by *decorum, not by discursive topics or places. Audience-anchored doctrines of rhetorical invention—whether the Aristotelian search for the means of persuasion via the probable or the Ciceronian pro-and-contra reasoning through a grid of topics toward eloquence—were, for all intents and purposes, dead. Nor did either of these doctrines play a significant role in the new literary theories fostered by the recovery of Aristotle's Poetics, such as those by the 16th-c. humanists Francesco Robortello and Lodovico Castelvetro, though the two terminologies coexisted. Throughout 17th- and 18th-c. poetics, Aristotelian plot ("fable"), character ("manners"), thought ("sentiments"), and diction continued to exist side by side with Ciceronian terminology ("passions," "propriety"). Inventio remained the creator's first responsibility, but its thought-content was relegated thereafter to logic and its considerations of audience relegated mainly to stylistic decorum. In the 18th c., the creative processes began to be scrutinized by the rising science of psychology and taught through whatever relicts of ancient rhet. were considered salvageable. Among those relicts, elocutio, or style, retained greatest prominence and for centuries constituted virtually the whole of rhet., only to become the scapegoat of conscious artifice in romantic and postromantic poetics before being revived as an important feature of mod. interpretation. In the 20th c., along with Kenneth Burke, William Empson was one of the few lamenting this situation: "It is a misfortune that the whole literary tradition of Symbolism has grown up so completely divorced from the tradition of fair public debate."

Two remaining offices of rhet. have received comparatively little attention over the centuries. Actio, claimed by Demosthenes as the sine qua non of persuasion, did achieve some vogue in the 18th and 19th cs. under the name of "elocution." An effort to scientize delivery, which began with John Bulwer in 1644, occupied the attention of 18th-c. lexicographers and actors (Thomas Sheridan, John Mason) in teaching graceful gesture and correct phonation (now called *"pronunciation"). With the teachings of Del Sartre in the 19th c., the movement had an impact, through mannered *recitations, on Eng. and Am. education, on styles of acting, and esp. on poetry written to be recited, the latter inviting a sentimental theatricalism against which the modernist poets rebelled. Memoria—the storehouse of wisdom as it was known in rhet. and the mother of the Muses (cf. W. H. Auden's "Homage to Clio")—was resistant to much theorizing outside medicine, where it was studied as a faculty of the soul (Yates). Rhyme was early considered not only a figure but a mnemonic device; so was the pithy form of eloquence known as sententia. When the two were combined (as in Edgar's speech closing King Lear: "The oldest hath borne most; we that are young / Shall never see so much, nor live so long"), a terminus ad quem was made memorable. The art of memory also became involved with the creation of fantastic images (the more fantastic, Quintilian advised, the easier to remember) and elaborate "memory theaters" for the rapid recall of complex, even encyclopedic knowledge.

In sum, whether one considers the interpretation or composition of poetry or rhet., shared interests in persuasion and eloquence, and in form and style, have always linked the two. The fragmentation of rhet. and its dispersal through various disciplines and critical approaches were steady devels. in Western culture after the Ren., particularly after the rise of science in the 16th c., of formalist crit. in the 17th c., and of romanticism in the 18th. At the present time, on the one hand, the uniqueness of poetry is arguably more fully understood than that of rhet. On the other hand, mod. efforts to reestablish rhetorical inventio (e.g., Perelman, Lanham, Booth 1983, Ulmer) may ultimately serve to reauthenticate rhet. as sui generis and to reinvigorate rhetorical thinking for crit. of all lit. in a digital age.

RHÉTORIQUEURS, GRANDS. A group of late med. or early Ren. courtly writers who wrote in the Fr. vernacular in very ornate style, both in verse and in prose, to celebrate the feats and virtues of the princes who employed them. The major figures include Jean Bouchet, George Chastelain, Guillaume Cretin, André de La Vigne, Jean Lemaire de Belges, Jean Marot, Jean Meschinot, Jean Molinet, Jean Robertet, and Octavien de Saint-Gelais. The phrase grands rhétoriqueurs was found in a satirical text by Guillaume Coquillart and mistakenly applied by 19th-c. scholars to a cluster of authors spanning almost a century (from the mid-15th to the mid-16th) and two main political entities (in addition to a number of lesser courts): the duchy of Burgundy, whose northern territories, from which many of these writers hailed, were incorporated in the Holy Roman Empire after the defeat and death of Duke Charles the Bold (1477); and the kingdom of France. The misnomer caught on and remains in use, perhaps because it summarizes three major characteristics of the Grands Rhétoriqueurs: while they never formed a "school," they praised one another as masters of their craft while working for powers that often fought one another; they understood their art to be a form of "rhetoric"—indeed, eloquence itself—organized around the task of praising and chronicling their patrons; and they had a "grand" notion of this task, signaled by the elaborate grandiloquence of their style and by the elevated position that, in spite of their bourgeois origins, they came to occupy, at least in the Burgundian court. On the other hand, the satirical connotations of the term rhétoriqueur reflected the contempt felt by late 19th-c. historians for writers who spouted propaganda and accumulated encomiastic hyperboles in bizarrely mixed forms (such as the *prosimetrum), seemingly unable to distinguish between prose and verse, hist. and poetry, chronicle and fiction, extravagant praise and reasonable advice. The spectacular style of the Grands Rhétoriqueurs—notably their reliance on ultrarich rhymes and puns—became the focus of their rehabilitation during the course of the 20th c., at the hands first of surrealist poets, then of poeticians such as Zumthor, who suggested that such dazzling elocutio techniques subverted the monolithic political message that the rhétoriqueurs were paid to promote. In recent decades, a more balanced view has emerged, justifying the cohort's flamboyant figuration by connecting it with the requirements of epideictic inventio (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY). Building on a trad. initiated in the early 15th c. by Alain Chartier, the successive Indiciaires de Bourgogne (Chastelain, Molinet, Lemaire) and their Fr. imitators (La Vigne, Saint-Gelais, Cretin, Marot, Bouchet) indeed strove to combine (not confuse) the resources of "first" and "second" rhetoric (i.e., prose and verse: see SECONDE RHÉTORIQUE), as well as those of hist. and "poetry" (allegorical fiction), in order to illustrate, interpret, and justify the glory of the prince as exemplary ruler and image of God. Should the prince fail to live up to this standard, however, the rhétoriqueur could advise him to mend his ways, typically by giving voice to symbolic representatives of his people or to entities such as Counsel and Truth. This syncretic notion of political rhetoric as the noblest form of verbal art also allowed for some celebration of creative power, at least by peers, as the author himself invariably struck a humble pose in his own work. All this developed at first within the bounds of mss. composed for the prince's and the court's enjoyment and then entered into the larger stage of print (some rhétoriqueurs did not care to see their works printed; others, such as Lemaire, exploited the new technology with gusto). The holistic art of the Grands Rhétoriqueurs soon fragmented, however, as hist. and poetry began to separate again; it was the son of Jean Marot, Clément, who quietly gave up the historiographer's duties as well as the grand style's signature effects and thus reinvented Fr. poetry as an autonomous art, aesthetically exalted but, in a way, rhetorically diminished. Nevertheless, the grands rhétoriqueurs played a key role in the devel. of poetic forms and ideas in the early Fr. Ren.; conversely, many 16th-c. poets who touted their own sophistication while proclaiming that their art had nothing to do with hist. or immediate persuasion also retained a keen sense of what poetry had lost, in terms of rhetorical authority and social status, by renouncing the political calling of their "ignorant" predecessors.

RHYME

I. Origin and History of Rhyme in World Poetries
II. Rhyme in Western Poetries, Particularly in English

I. Origin and History of Rhyme in World Poetries

A. Introduction. There have been two chief views on the origin and devel. of rhyme. The derivationist position is that rhyme originated in one locus and was disseminated to all others. Turner argued as early as 1808 that rhyme originated in Chinese or Sanskrit (but not Ar.; for Ren. arguments about the Ar. origin of rhyme, see Dainotto), whence it spread via the trade routes to Europe. Draper claimed China as the single point of origin (according to him, the earliest attested rhymes in Chinese date from ca. 1000 BCE; according to Kenner, 1200 BCE), from which it spread to ancient Iran by means of Mongol hordes and westward to Rome with Persian mystery cults; but, as McKie has argued, Draper's ambiguous evidence suggests dual sources in Iran and China. The alternate view, set forth as early as 1803 by Swift, is that rhyme does not take its origin exclusively in any one lang. but is a natural ling. structure that can arise in any lang. having the right set of features. The fact that rhyme originated once shows that it can originate at any time. It is a simple ling. fact that the number of sounds available in any lang. is limited, and its many words must, therefore, be combinations of only a few sounds. There is considerable evidence that children manufacture rhymes spontaneously as one basic form of sound permutation; also conspicuous is rhyme in the *chants and *charms of many primitive cultures. Systematic rhyming has appeared in such widely separated langs. that its spontaneous devel. in more than one of them seems a reasonable assumption. We should not seek to find the ultimate "origin" of rhyme in Western poetry by tracing rhyme forms back through langs. to some common source. Still, it is a thundering fact that most of the world's 4,000 langs. lack or avoid rhyme in their poetries altogether (Whitehall).

In the hist. of the world's poetries, those cultures that have most extensively developed rhyme have been Chinese in the East and in the West, Ar., Ir., Occitan, Fr., Ger., Eng., and Rus. Note that rhyme is not originally native to any Eur. lang. or even IE. Regardless of whether rhyme had one source or several, it is indisputable that, both in ancient and med. lits., there are several discernible routes of transmission, the tracing of which is neither impossible nor unimportant, merely difficult. It is obvious that specific rhyme forms, like meters and stanzas, have been imported into langs. via trans. or imitation of famous poets and canonical works in another lang. (Homer, Virgil, Dante, Petrarch, Shakespeare), even where rhyme was already indigenous.

What can be said reliably at present about the earliest rhyme trads., Chinese and Ar., is as follows.

B. Chinese. Rhyme is an essential element of Chinese versification; it has been largely ignored by Western translators and readers because it cannot be fully reproduced in trans. Because Chinese is a tonal lang., not a stress-based lang., and because every Chinese character is pronounced as one syllable, Chinese rhymes more readily than most other langs. (though the distribution of tones may complicate the rhyme patterns). End rhyme occurs in all traditional verse, with rhyme schemes varying according to different forms of poetry. In the open-ended ancient-style verse (gushi), rhyme generally occurs at the end of each *couplet; and the rhyme, in either the level or the oblique tone, may change in the course of the poem. But in a more rigid form such as the eight-line regulated verse (lushi), the same rhyme should be used throughout the poem and is almost always in the level tone. This level-tone rhyme falls at the end of each couplet, but it is also permissible at the end of the first line of the poem. Compared to regulated verse, the ci* (lyric) is relatively more complex and varied. In composing a song in ci style, the poet chooses a tune, out of some 825 tunes, and writes words for it. Each tune pattern determines the tonal category of the end rhyme and *internal rhymes, as well as the number of lines and the number of syllables per line. For the historical evolution of rhyme, see CHINA, POETRY OF.

C. Arabic and Persian. Until the 20th c., rhyme (qāfiya) was one of two primary features in the Ar. definition of poetry itself; in the famous dictum recorded by Qudāma ibn Jaʿfar (d. 934), the author of Kitāb naqd al-shʿr, a manual on poetics, poetry is "discourse with rhyme and meter." The central position accorded rhyme in Ar. and Persian poetics leads to the devel. of a theoretical science of rhyme parallel to though separate from that of prosody, with the Basran scholar Al-Khalīl ibn Aḥmad (d. 791), as its alleged founder. In these trads., as indeed in most others, rhyme is based on *sound; there is no visual rhyme. Thus, it may be said that critical writing on rhyme in Ar. dates from the 8th or 9th c.; rhyme itself is already present in the first extant exemplars of Ar. poetry (6th c.), its origins lost in the unrecorded beginnings of oral trad. The question of whether rhyme exists in the Old Iranian Avesta (ca. 1500 BCE) is disputed.

In Ar., the essential part of rhyme is the word-final consonant called al-rāwī, which remains constant throughout the poem (this consonant will sometimes be preceded by a further consonant that is also part of the rhyme). Rhyme in Ar. can be of two sorts: fettered (muqayyada), i.e., ending with a consonant; or loose (muṭlaqa), i.e., ending with a vowel. While occasional examples of *assonance or *near rhyme are known in Middle Persian poetry, the intricate rules and conventions for rhyme in Islamic Persian were adapted from Ar. practice. Rhyme in Persian may comprise from one to four syllables, the last ending with the same consonant preceded by the same vowel, e.g., bām / kām; sardam / mardam; revāyati / shekāyati; pāyandagān / āyandagān. Some variation is allowed in the longer rhymes but no license.

The majority of cl. qaṣīda* and ghazal* poetry is composed of verses in *monorhyme, with the rhyme at the end of the second of two *hemistichs (miṣrāʿ). More often than not, the rhyme is called to the attention of the poem's audience by being used at the end of both hemistichs of the first line of the poem, a process called taṣrīʿ. A rhyme word should not be repeated except at distant intervals. A special feature of Persian rhyme is the radīf, a syllable, word, or phrase repeated verbatim following the rhyme, e.g., yār dāram/khomār dāram, where the rhyme is -ār and the radīf is dāram. Some typical rhyme schemes are the following: qaṣīda and ghazal, aabaca; quatrain, aaaa or aaba; masnavī or rhyming couplet, aabbcc, etc.; qeṭʿa, bacada. Strophic forms have more complicated schemes. This can be seen most notably in the Andalusian, muwashshaḥ, where, within a series of *strophes, one section (usually termed ghuṣn) will normally have an independent rhyme for each instance, while the other (termed simṭ or qufl) will retain the rhyme of the final segment of the poem, the kharja* (see AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF).

Since World War II, rhyme has lost its formerly privileged position and become but one of a number of features of poetic discourse as poets and critics have abandoned the dictates of cl. Ar. poetics in favor of new (and often imported) genres such as *free verse and the *prose poem. For more information, see ARABIC POETICS (CLASSICAL), ARABIC POETRY, ARABIC PROSODY.

D. Western European. In the West, while rhyme is rare in all cl. poetry, it is rarer in Gr. than in Lat.: still, it is not unknown in Homer (Iliad 2.87–88, 9.236–38) and the Gr. dramatists (Aristophanes' Clouds 709–15, Wasps 133–35, and Acharians 29–36); Euripides in the Alcestis has a drunk Hercules speak in rhyme (782–86), a passage clearly meant to be comic. Rhyme can be found in the Alexandrian poets and, among Lat. poets, in Ennius and Ovid (a fifth of the lines in the Tristia show *leonine rhyme), Virgil (Aeneid 1.625–26, 2.124–25, 2.456–57, 3.549, 3.656–57, 4.256–57, 8.620–21, 8.646–47, 9.182–83, 10.804–5), and Horace (Ars poetica 99–100).

The emergence of rhyme in the West had to await the devel. of accent (Clark remarks that "the history of the adoption of rhyme is almost exactly parallel to, and contemporaneous with, the history of the substitution of accent for quantity"); the shifting of word accent from the root syllable rightward; and, progressively, the transition from inflectional to positional syntax. But since rhyme obviously appears in inflected langs., we must say that, insofar as it is to be distinguished from *homoeoteleuton, it should be seen as arising in response to the decay of the inflectional system and, therefore, growing stronger only as like endings disappear (Whitehall). Langs. that retain inflections but use rhyme (e.g., Fr.) will, therefore, impose extensive constraints on rhyme forms so as to differentiate the two systems.

The earliest indigenous rhyme trad. in Europe was apparently Ir., and elaborate canons of rhyme have remained a central feature of *Celtic prosody up to the 20th c., though it is necessary to distinguish between Celtic vernacular and Ir.-Lat. verse (McKie). The Ir. missionaries apparently brought rhyme with them to the continent (the older view was that this influence worked in the opposite direction). Assonantal precursors of rhyme first appear in the Christian Lat. hymns of Hilary of Poitiers, Ambrose, and Augustine (late 3d through 4th cs.); and McKie calls arguments in favor of a Christian Lat. (incl. Ir.-Lat.) source of rhyme in OE "decisive." Meyer thought the source for this practice to be Semitic, a view not now followed. In Byzantium, Romanus and Synesius were exploiting its possibilities in hymnology by the 6th c.

Except for the intervention of med. Lat., the Eur. langs. would have developed their prosodies in opposing directions. The Germanic langs., with forestressing of words, developed structural *alliteration for their prosody, as in OHG and OE, less ornate than the elaborately interlaced sound patterns of the Celtic poetries, i.e., Ir. and Welsh, but more closely linked to meter (see Árnason for the argument that "in-rhyme" in ON could have developed inherently in ON lit., not as the result of Ir. influence). The Romance langs., in which word stress was weaker and phrase stress stronger, developed first assonance then rhyme; the great flowering of short-lined, rhymed stanzas in *Occitan poetry by the *troubadours directly influenced every other vernacular on the continent, and even med. Lat. *Goliardic verse. Occitan was itself influenced, perhaps strongly, by Ar. sources, though the nature and extent of this influence is still disputed.

Ger. early fell under the influence of med. Lat. versification, as Eng. did of Fr. after the Norman Conquest. Rhyme first appears in the Germanic vernaculars in the 9th c. in the work of Otfrid (Evangelienbuch, ca. 863–71), directly influenced by med. Lat. versification. There are also some vestiges of rhyme in OE as a result of Celtic influence, chiefly the "Rhyming Poem." *French prosody itself was an outgrowth of med. Lat. principles. Northern Fr. exerted enormous influence on ME from the 12th c. (The Owl and the Nightingale, the Harley lyrics) through Chaucer (who also knew Boccaccio) into the 15th c. The collapse of the OE inflectional system had left numbers of monosyllabic words in early ME, but the large number of Romance loan words imported, most of them polysyllabic and oxytonic or paroxytonic, readily encouraged rhyme: many of them kept their Romance end-stressing in ME and even influenced the stressing of other Eng. words. Chaucer takes advantage of a variable final e, which was in the process of disappearing during his own lifetime, for both meter and rhyme. After Chaucer, the loss of final e and the Great Vowel Shift in the 15th c. sounded the end of ME versification; mod. Eng. prosody was reinvented by Thomas Wyatt and by Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey, though even here on Romance principles of rhyme and stanza (e.g., the *sonnet).

Since the Ren., the emergence of standardized varieties of the mod. langs. has worked to restrict the canons for permissible rhyming in literary verse, but three other forces have exerted pressure against this trend: (1) oral and popular trads., along with literary imitations of them, esp. folk poetry such as the *ballad in the 18th c., have strongly influenced or, more recently, arisen to challenge literary verse, particularly in *romanticism (e.g., Lyrical Ballads); in the 19th-c. Ger. cult of the lit. of the Volk (see ORAL POETRY); in *dialect poetry, once extensive and important, as in Scottish, southern Ger., and It., but subsequently marginalized from literary verse even while it flourishes in oral trad.; and, beginning in the late 20th c. in the U.S., in many public performances of poetry (see, e.g., PERFORMANCE, POETRY SLAM, NUYORICAN POETS CAFÉ); (2) song lyrics, such as those of W. S. Gilbert in the 19th c. or Cole Porter, Ira Gershwin, and Stephen Sondheim in the 20th, and the lyrics of many hip-hop artists in the 20th and 21st cs. present vigorous, inventive, often comic challenges to the more limited rhyming of much literary verse (see SONG, HIP-HOP POETICS); and (3) in literary verse itself, the devel. of variant forms of rhyme in the 19th and 20th cs., such as near and *eye rhyme, continues to offer poets many possibilities.

II. Rhyme in Western Poetries, Particularly in English

Philip Sidney in the Defence of Poesy calls rhyme "the chiefe life" of mod. versifying; indeed, so it must still seem, despite the advent of the great trad. of Eng. *blank verse from Shakespeare to Alfred, Lord Tennyson, and even the advent of the several free-verse prosodies after 1850: the first edition of the Oxford Book of English Verse (1900) contains 883 poems of which only 16 lack rhyme. And what is true of Eng. is even more true of Rus., where the trad. of rhyme is more extensively developed, and esp. Fr., where rhyme is truly fundamental to the whole system of versification. Rhyme is, as Oscar Wilde said, "the one chord we have added to the Greek lyre."

A. Definition. In the specific sense of the term as used in Eng., rhyme is the linkage in poetry of two syllables at line end (for internal rhyming, see below) that have identical stressed vowels and subsequent phonemes but differ in initial consonant(s) if any are present—syllables that, in short, begin differently and end alike. This is the paradigmatic case for Eng.; but in the half-dozen other langs. where rhyme has been developed as a major poetic device, many other varieties have been developed, resulting in more expansive definitions admitting any one of several kinds of sound echo in verse. More broadly, however, we must say that rhyme is the phonological correlation (see EQUIVALENCE) of differing semantic units at distinctive points in verse. It is essential that the definition not be framed solely in terms of sound, for that would exclude the cognitive function.

Rhyme calls into prominence simultaneously a complex set of responses based on identity and difference. On the phonic level, the likeness of the rhyming syllables (at their ends) points up their difference (at their beginnings). The phonic semblance (and difference) then points up semantic semblance or difference: the equivalence of the rhyme syllables or words on the phonic level implies a relation or likeness or difference on the semantic level. Rhyme in this sense, i.e., end rhyme, is, with *meter, a primary form of sound patterning in mod. verse and deploys sound similarity as the means to semantic and structural ends.

Crucial to these ends, as with all others in *prosody, is segmentation. As with the clausulae of late antique *prose rhythm, rhyme marks the ends of runs of syllables in speech and thereby segments the sound stream into equal or perceived-equal units or sections: this segmentation, in turn, establishes equivalence, which is essential to *repetition and the effects it is capable of. Lotman says that, if all equivalences in the poetic line are classed as either positional (rhythmic) or euphonic (sonal), then rhyme is created at the intersection of the two sets.

From the usual sense of the term rhyme—i.e., the sound common to two or more words or a word that echoes another word—other senses derive by *synecdoche, i.e., (1) a poem in rhymed verse or (2) rhymed verse in general; or by *metonymy, i.e., (3) any kind of sound echo between words (e.g., alliteration, assonance, *consonance) or (4) more generally, any kind of correspondence, congruence, or accord (cf. J. R. Lowell's "of which he was as unaware as the blue river is of its rhyme with the blue sky" from The English Poets, 1888).

The spelling r-h-y-m-e became common in Eng. in the 17th c.; the earlier Ren. and ME spelling, r-i-m-e, derives from OF rime, ritme (< Med Lat. rithmi < Lat. rithmus, rhythmus < Gr. rhythmos). The OF form gave the Occitan, Sp., Catalan, Port., and It. cognates rima and MHG, ON, and Old Icelandic rim, later rima (rhymed poem, ballad; see RÍMUR). This form of rim is not to be confused with (though it is related to) OHG, OE rim (number) or with OE, ON hrim (hoar-frost, rime-frost). The term rim in the mod. sense of rhyme first appears in an Anglo-Norman rhymed sermon of the early 12th c.; in this century, rhyme became a central feature of short-lined lyric poetry in Occitan and came to replace assonance in the laisses* of the OF chansons de geste*. In Eng., the spelling r-i-m-e / r-y-m-e for vernacular, accentual, rhymed verse was preserved to ca. 1560, when spelling reform based on the classics brought in r-i-t-h-m-e / r-y-t-h-m-e (pronounced to rhyme with crime and spelled r-i-'-m-e by Ben Jonson), current to 1700, after which time r-h-y-t-h-m became the spelling for that concept in the mod. sense. About 1600, however, rhime/rhyme appears, presumably to distinguish rhyming from rhythmical/metrical effects; r-h-y-m-e subsequently won out, though the (historically correct) spelling r-i-m-e has never entirely disappeared.

In med. Lat., rithmus/rythmus denotes versus rithmici (rhythmical verse), meaning verse whose meter is based on *accent, not *quantity (versus metrici) and that employs end-rhyme. Lat. rhythmical verse, appears as early as the 3d to 4th cs. CE and reaches its culmination in the 12th c., though verse written on quantitative principles continued to be written throughout the Middle Ages. This fact—two metrical systems side by side in med. Lat.—is responsible for the mod. phrase "without rhyme or reason," meaning neither rhythmus nor ratio, i.e., not any kind of verse at all. In short, the word for accentually based and rhymed verse in med. Lat. vacillated between an i and y spelling for its vowel; the Ren. distinguished these two criteria and, hence, terms for them. Ren. spelling reform affected the visual shapes of the words; pronunciation diverged later. Rhythm and rhyme are, thus, intimately related not only etymologically but conceptually.

There are two final points about definition. First, the definition of what counts as rhyme is conventional and cultural: it expands and contracts from one national poetry, age, verse trad., and genre to another. Hence, definition must shortly give way to a taxonomy of types (below). Second, there is the issue of positing rhyme at line end itself (see LINE). Žirmunskij, looking at rhyme as not only sound echo but the marker of line end, sees that function as having an effect on the rhythmic organization of the line. Indeed, it is commonly assumed that rhyme exerts a metrical function in marking the ends of the lines. But, of course, rhyme is not restricted to line end, suggesting that "any sound repetition that has an organizing function in the metrical composition of the poem should be included in the concept of rhyme" (1923). Further, as de Cornulier argues, rhyme does not exactly reside at line end: its positioning shapes the entire structure of the line, so that we should more accurately say that the rhyme resides in the entire line. Removing rhymes from lines does not merely render them rhymeless; it alters their lexical-semantic structure altogether.

B. Taxonomy. Rhyme correlates syllables by sound. We may describe the structure of the *syllable as initial consonant or consonant cluster (the so-called support or prop consonant [Fr. consonne d'appui]; this may be in the zero state, i.e., absent) + medial vowel (or diphthong) + final consonant (or cluster, if present), which we may schematize as CVC. If we ask which elements of a syllable can be repeated in a second syllable in correspondence with the first, letting underlining denote a sound repeated identically, then seven configurations are possible (the eighth possibility is null; these are simply the permutations of a set of three elements), having these forms and Eng. names:

1. C̲ V C alliteration (bad / boy)
2. C V̲ C assonance (back / rat)
3. C V C̲ consonance (back / neck)
4. C̲ V̲ C reverse rhyme (back / bat)
5. C̲ V C̲ [no standard term] frame rhyme, pararhyme (back / buck)
6. C V̲ C̲ rhyme strictly speaking (back / rack)
7. C̲ V̲ C̲ Rich rhyme, rime riche, or identical rhyme (bat [wooden cylinder] / bat [flying creature])

This schema presumes that both syllables are identical in all other respects, i.e., their phonological and morphological characteristics—e.g., that both syllables are stressed monosyllables. But, of course, this is not usually the case, certainly not for Fr. or It. or Rus., not even for Eng. A more elaborate taxonomy would subsume all such variants. To date, no such inventory of rhyme structures has yet been given. When it is, it will explain a number of effects as yet unaccounted for, clarify relations between forms in the same or different langs. hitherto thought unrelated or remote, and provide a comprehensive and synthetic overview of the structure of the system, showing how rhyme processes function as an integral system. It will also, presumably, correlate with the schema of rhetorical figures and processes given by Group μ.

As a preliminary to such a taxonomy, we may distinguish 12 criteria for the analysis and categorization of rhyme types:

(1) By the number of syllables involved in the rhyme:

(a) single, monosyllabic, or masculine. This is the norm or zero state of rhyme, at least in Eng.—two stressed monosyllables, e.g., Keats / beets (John Crowe Ransom's examples from "Surveying Literature," here and below). Whether this is the norm in any given lang. depends on the morphological and syntactic structure of that lang., i.e., whether it is inflectional or positional or mixed. All other more complex forms of rhyme are generated by extension, either rightward into syllables following the rhyming syllable or leftward to the consonant or syllables preceding the vowel, esp. proclitics and separate words (Ger. erweiterter Reim).

(b) Double, disyllabic, or feminine (see MASCULINE AND FEMININE), e.g., Shelley / jelly. Two contiguous syllables that rhyme. In the paradigmatic case in Eng., both words are disyllables and have a trochaic word shape, and both rhyming syllables (the first in each word) are stressed and stand in the last metrical position (*ictus) of the line. The post-rhyming syllables are pronounced but not stressed and are identical; metrically, they do not count: they are extrametrical. (It is also possible for the second syllables themselves also to rhyme, e.g., soreness / doorless.) But these conditions do not apply in other langs., and even in Eng., many other complex and variant forms are possible. Indeed, Eng. is probably not a good norm: in It., nearly all rhymes are double or triple. Scherr usefully treats syllabic variance of the rhyming syllable in Rus. poetry under the rubric of "heterosyllabic" forms.

(c) Triple (Ger. gleitender Reim, "gliding"), also called compound and multiple, e.g., Tennyson / venison; two extra (identical and extrametrical) syllables after the rhyming syllable. Triple rhymes are, of course, rarer; usually they are *mosaic rhyme, since rhyming of more than two successive syllables is difficult in any lang. The effect in Eng. since Lord Byron has almost always been comic. See TRIPLE RHYME.

(2) By the morphology of the words that the rhyming syllables inhabit. The zero state is that the rhyming syllables are each monosyllabic words—i.e., that the rhymes do not breach a word boundary. In double and triple rhymes, the words being rhymed are normally di- or polysyllabic or a series of short words (stayed with us / played with us) or ends of words followed by one or more whole words (beseech him / impeach him), but it is also possible to rhyme several short monosyllables with one polysyllable, known as mosaic rhyme in Eng. (poet / know it). In Welsh cywydd* couplets, one of the rhymes must be a monosyllable but the other a polysyllable. But if rhyme depends for its distinctive effects on the morphology of the particular words involved in the rhyme, it also, therefore, depends on the morphological structure of the lang. itself as the ground against which the pattern becomes visible.

Inflectional endings are, as it were, the antithesis or reflex of rhyme, though it is not accurate to say, as did Whitehall, that langs. in which like endings result automatically from inflection will never use rhyme as a structural device in verse. Rhyme is occasionally to be found, consciously used, in the lit. of the cl. langs. The notion of like endings (Gr. homoeoteleuton, Lat. similiter desinens) is discussed by the ancients—Aristotle (Rhetoric 3.9.9–11), Dionysius of Halicarnassus (23), and Quintilian (9.3.77)—under the rubric of "verbal resemblance" or sound correspondence between clauses (paromoeosis). Late antique *rhyme-prose continues this trad.; the *grammatical rhyme of the Grands Rhétoriqueurs (see RHÉTORIQUEURS, GRANDS) takes a different slant. But the two systems—case endings and rhyme—overwrite the same space and so in the main are mutually exclusive. And when, in any lang., rhyming is relatively easy, poets will tend to complicate it by employing forms of *rich or *identical rhyme (as in Fr.) or complex stanza forms (as in Occitan and Fr.) or both, or else by eschewing rhyme completely (as in *blank verse). Poets who choose to rhyme, in fact, walk a tightrope between ease and difficulty: too easy rhyming or too difficult rhyming eventually produce the same result—the poetic disuse of rhyme. In some verse systems, the rules in a prosody survive sometimes for centuries after the ling. facts on which they were originally based have disappeared. One of the chief instances of this process is the mute e suffix in Fr., which disappeared from pronunciation in the 15th c. but was preserved in a set of elaborate rhyme rules into the 19th.

Since Eng. dropped nearly all its inflectional suffixes about a thousand years ago, the sets of rhyming words in Eng. are smaller and different in character as well. How much smaller, however, is an interesting question, for it is often claimed that rhyme is much more difficult in Eng. than in other langs. But accurate statistical information about the relative poverty of rhyme in one lang. vs. another has yet to be assembled. Owing to the large number of ways in which Eng. words can terminate, the number of words that rhyme on a sound, on average, is certainly under three, but the distribution is extremely uneven. The number of words that rhyme strictly (in the manner of no. 6 in the taxonomy table above) with only one other word is large (mountain / fountain, babe / astrolabe), and those that cannot rhyme strictly is as large or larger—e.g., orange or circle, which one could "rhyme," by consonance (no. 3 in taxonomy table above) with flange (paired with the unstressed syllable of orange) or snorkel, respectively, (though not strictly with any one-word mate). But the rhymes on words like day are legion.

One other way of approaching this issue, however, is to point out that rhyme depends less on the structure of the lang. than on the semantic field presently relevant in the poem: only some of the available rhymes for a given word are possible candidates for use in a poem on a given subject. What this means, most generally, is that it is dangerous to discuss rhyme as an abstract entity divorced from the constraints imposed on it in each individual poem. The subject of morphology and rhyme is a large and complex one that still remains to be mapped out.

(3) By the position of the stress on the rhyming (and adjacent) syllables. Normally, single rhymes are ictic and stressed; double rhymes add an extra unstressed syllable. Rhyming masculine with feminine words, i.e., a stressed monosyllable with a disyllable the rhyming syllable of which is unstressed (e.g., sing / loving, free / crazy, afraid / decade) Tatlock called "hermaphrodite" rhyme (an odd term, since male mating with female in love would not be thought so). Others have called it "apocopated" or "stressed-unstressed" rhyme; it was popular in the 16th and 17th cs. and is used by John Donne and by Ezra Pound (Hugh Selwyn Mauberley). There is also "unstressed rhyme," where the rhyming syllables are both unstressed or weak: e.g., honey / motley, mysteries / litanies, wretchedness / featureless. But there is some question whether this constitutes rhyme at all. Scherr calls all such cases in Rus. poetry "heteroaccentual" forms and cites the taxonomy given by Markov.

A related type rhymes a stressed syllable with one bearing only secondary speech stress, which is promoted under metrical ictus, e.g., sees / mysteries. Many rhyme pairs of this sort formerly differed in pronunciation and were good rhymes in their time, though they are not now; others were not so, then as now. Rhymes like eye / harmony, eye / symmetry (William Blake), or flies / mysteries force the critic to call on the researches of historical phonology.

Perhaps the most interesting case of all is the pair die / poetry, common in the Ren. There is some evidence (e.g., Alexander Gill in Logonomia Anglica, 1620) that, for words like poetry, alternative pronunciations existed as late as the first quarter of the 17th c., one form pronounced as the word is today, to rhyme with me, the other to rhyme with die. If so, rhyme pairs like poetry / die—and others like majesty / eye, crie / graciously, and most others ending in ty or ly—may well have been good rhymes for Shakespeare and the Ren. sonneteers, as they were for John Milton. But the diphthongal ending apparently lost out, so that sometime after 1650 poetry and die ceased being a good rhyme and became merely conventional. They may well have continued to be used by poets but only on account of their having precedent. Whether poets after 1650 actually altered their pronunciation of poetry, in reading aloud their verses, so as to rhyme with die, is unknown; one may speculate that their acceptance of convention did not extend so far. If so, the reader would be expected to recognize such rhymes as poetic *convention, a kind of *poetic license admissible on the grounds that they were so in a former state of the lang. A mod. instance appears in W. H. Auden's elegy on Yeats: "Let the Irish vessel lie / Emptied of its poetry." But the evidence is very complex and uncertain, and the number of cases where later poets knowingly reproduce such archaic rhymes must be few: far more important is the fact that, in earlier stages of the lang., they were apparently good rhymes.

(4) By the lexical category of the rhyming words. In much verse, the rhymes are commonly words of the same grammatical category, noun rhyming with noun, verb with verb. The phonic echo highlights semantic differences certainly, but not functional ones. More striking effects are to be had by extending the differentiation, so that the words not only mean different things but function differently as well. The predominance of substantives for rhymes creates a verse of a distinctive texture, whereas the use of function words gives a radically different texture and virtually demands *enjambment: thus, John Donne's "Love's not so pure and abstract as they used / To say who have no mistress but their Muse" ("Love's Growth"). Even within substantives, the use of nouns for rhymes gives a markedly different texture from the use of verbs, which, as the conveyors of action, energy, state, and change, take on even greater power when positioned at line end. Wimsatt in his classic 1944 essay discusses the importance of this strategy, but detailed data have only very recently begun to be collected. Cohen, e.g., reports that the 17th-c. Fr. classicists used different category rhymes only 19% of the time, the romantics 29%, and the symbolists 31% (1966); one would like to see Eng. data for comparison.

(5) By the degree of closeness of the sound match in the rhyme. The standard definition for "true" or "perfect" rhyme (the usual Eng. terms; cf. Ger. reiner Reim, Rus. tochnaia rifma) is relatively narrow, with the result that the other collateral forms—near rhyme and eye rhyme—are problematized. But in other verse trads., this is not the case: Rus., e.g., admits "inexact rhyme" as part of the standard definition of canonical rhyme (see Scherr). *Welsh poetry recognizes a very large category of "generic rhyme" in which sounds echo closely but not exactly. But it is misleading to frame the analysis in terms of "near" vs. "perfect" to begin with: exactness is not the only or even the most important criterion in some verse systems. As a number of critics (e.g., Burke, Small) have observed, sounds themselves are related to each other in phonology in categories; within these categories, individual sounds—such as voiced and voiceless fricatives—are interchangeable in some verse trads. To recognize this fact is to recognize that sounds come in "equivalence sets," e.g., nasals (m, n, and ng) or sibilants (s, f, z, sh, zh), that a poet may use to expand the range of rhyming. This approach should neutralize mechanistic attempts to assess the "purity" of rhyme (Ger. Reinheit des reims). In general, it may be said that the strictness of the definition of "true" rhyme in langs. varies in inverse ratio to the ease of rhyming in that lang., which is itself a function of morphology and syntactic rules: langs. in which rhyming is relatively easy will impose additional constraints, such as the rules constraining the grammatical gender of rhymes in Fr.; langs. in which it is more difficult will admit wider variation.

(6) By the relationship between the sonal figuration created in the rhyme and the semantic fields of the words. Rhyme is a figure of sound; but, of cour\se, words in poetry, as in lang., bear sense, and both levels of information are delivered to the auditor or reader not separately but simultaneously: rhyme, therefore, figures meaning. This is how rhyme is able to increase the amount of *information carried in verse, despite the fact that the establishment of a *rhyme scheme leads to expectedness, normally reductive of information load.

Of such semantic figuration, there are two possibilities: either sound similarity can imply semantic similarity in words otherwise so unrelated that, in prose, no relation would have ever been noticed; or sound similarity can emphasize contrast in two words that echo. As Lotman puts it, "[P]honic coincidence only accentuates semantic difference." G. M. Hopkins held that the beauty of rhyme, for the Eng. reader at least, "is lessened by any likeness the words may have beyond that of sound" (Note-books and Papers). The "richness" or "sonority" of a rhyme is, therefore, not merely a function of the degree of phonic echo but of the semantic aspect as well (Lotman).

Wimsatt cites a classic example from Alexander Pope's Rape of the Lock: "Whether the nymph shall break Diana's law, / Or some frail China jar receive a flaw." Wimsatt remarks the rhyme prompts us to ask in what way breaking Diana's law is like marring a valuable vase. The answer we will be led to is that, in Belinda's refined society, losing one's virginity is simply an indiscretion, a clumsiness, equivalent to scarring a Ming porcelain—both signs of poor taste. In this way, study of the semantic effects of the phonic coupling in the rhyme augments the hermeneutic process, directing us toward a deeper and more powerful interpretation. Wimsatt calls rhyme, somewhat awkwardly, "alogical" and "counterlogical," by which he means not asemantic but simply bearing semantic import that runs in addition to, and sometimes counter to, the lexicosyntactic, denotative "logic" or sense of the words in the lines. However one chooses to describe it, this sense borne by the rhymes is supplemental to the import the words would have borne were they merely set as prose (see VERSE AND PROSE), showing thereby the additional expressive resources of verse form.

At the same time, several poets and critics have remarked that rhymes, particularly in a long work, come to form a system of their own that is the correlate of an idiolect or, if it be influential, a dialect in natural lang. Clark remarks that, "when a poet rhymes well," it is "as if he had invented a new lang., which has rhyme as one of its natural characteristics."

Rhyme semantics is a vast subject only beginning to be explored. It was first charted by the Rus. formalists, esp. Žirmunskij, but his book was not known in the West until the 1960s: in the Anglo-Am. world, it was Wimsatt's 1944 essay that paved the way, followed by Lotman's 1970 book (trans. 1977) on the stratification of the artistic text (see also Nemoianu). Shapiro applies the Saussurean paradigm influenced by Peircean semiotics, i.e., markedness theory, under which distinctive features appear in pairs of binary opposites, one present, one absent, with the present one, therefore, marked: he shows by phonological analysis marked features that seemingly remote rhymes have in common.

Study of rhyme semantics must examine both the semantic fields available in the lang. and those chosen for the poem. As every rhyming poet knows, choice of one word for a rhyme immediately constrains the range of words available for its mate(s), hence for extension or completion of the sense. In the lang., the sound shape, orthographic form, and semantic fields of each word are determined by the historical interaction of complex sets of ling. processes and accidents of hist. (wars, migrations, customs). These constraints affect the field of meaning in a given poem and are, in turn, affected by choices made by the poet. Some semantic contrasts are already coded into the lang. as rhymes, e.g., light / night, Gehalt / Gestalt: these are pairs that must be actively avoided by serious poets. These are rhymes so outworn that the (semantic) life has gone out of them altogether. Pope satirizes breeze / trees in the Essay on Criticism, but others—anguish / languish, length / strength, death / breath, tomb / womb—are easy to name. The fault in all these is that they seem to let the rhyme too obviously dictate the sense. A whole semantic field is coded into some rhyme pairs, e.g., mad / bad, stranger / danger.

One other consequence of the preceding is the expectedness or surprise of the rhyme: a common or unprepossessing first rhyme word followed by a startling or shocking mate from a radically different lexical category is almost certain to be used for either comic or satiric effect. Rhymes can also be constructed from nonsense syllables and nonce words, as in Lewis Carroll.

(7) By the effects of further complication of sound patterning in the rhyme words themselves. More than one pattern may be figured in the rhyming words: typically assonance or consonance is mounted on top of the rhyme scheme, not as a reduction but as a complication. In Milton's sonnet "On the Late Massacre in Piedmont," e.g., the octave rhymes are bones / cold / old / stones / groans / fold / rolled / moans. The rhyme scheme is thus abbaabba, but the vowel is held constant, assonating aaaaaaaa. Milton's "On His Deceased Wife" rhymes abbaabba cdcdcd but assonates aaaaaaaa bbbbbb. "To the Lord General Cromwell" has for its octave rhymes cloud / rude / fortitude / ploughed / proud / pursued /imbued / loud, also abbaabba, but all eight lines are in consonance on final –d. Yeats achieves the same effect in "Among School Children," reiterating the final consonant of images / those / reveries / repose / presences / knows / symbolize / enterprise. This is rhyme yet more interwoven and complete.

(8) By participation of the rhymes in sound patterning nearby. Part of the perceived effect of the rhyme also depends on the density of sound patterning in the lines surrounding the rhyme words. Here we enter the realm of those larger constellations of sound that schematize the entire poem, over and above, though not apart from, the rhyme scheme. Like rhyme, these too impose a surplus of design on the verbal material, binding words together, promoting salient words, underlining significant semantic parallels between otherwise disparate words, punctuating the seriatim flow of text processing by repetition of significant sounds recently heard and remembered, and marking the text as aesthetic through the increase of attention required—and rewarded—in reading.

(9) By the position in the line of the rhymes. Normally rhyme is presumed to be end rhyme, i.e., sound linkage of lines by marking their ends (it is known that ends of members in series have special cognitive "visibility"), but more complex forms rhyme the word at line end with other words line-internally or rhyme two line-internal words in the same or successive lines, or both, thus opening up a spectrum of new possibilities for more complex sound figuration. Further, even the end-rhyme word itself may be hyphenated or broken over the line end to effect the rhyme (see BROKEN RHYME).

(10) By the interval between the rhymes. Without the space or gap between the rhyme words, no rhyme is possible: hence, the distance is no less significant than the repetition. In fact, repetition requires distance, the absence enabling the presence. The variance of distancing and of repetitions, of course, yields the patterning of rhyme in the stanza, i.e., the rhyme scheme; more interestingly, it also enables the distinction between "nonrhymes" and "antirhymes." Abernathy points out that it is not sufficient to characterize some types of verse as "unrhymed," for this fails to distinguish between "rhymeless" verse, wherein rhyme is neither required nor prohibited but merely unspecified, and "antirhymed" verse, such as blank verse, where rhyme is specifically proscribed. Rhyme schemes reveal intervals not only between rhymes but between unrhymed lines; and in some unrhymed verse, passages of deliberate rhyme may even appear (T. S. Eliot). It is also worth noting that rhymes that are very widely separated are not rhymes because they are not perceived so. There are, in fact, some hundred-odd rhymes in Paradise Lost, despite Milton's strictures in his prefatory "Note" against "modern bondage" (his term for rhyme). But a rhyme not felt is not a rhyme.

(11) By the order or sequencing of the rhymes. The rhyme architectonics that is schematized in rhyme schemes binds lines into more complex stanza forms both *isometric and *heterometric. This is one of the chief pleasures of formal verse (see STANZA). Rhyme schemes also reveal links with identical kinds of order in other domains such as rhet. or meter. The scheme for the Petrarchan sonnet, e.g., is abbaabba cdecde, i.e., an octave of two sets of envelope rhyme followed by a sestet of two tercets whose rhyme is repeated seriatim. The orders here are *envelope—a scheme of repetition in reverse—and sequence—repetition in order.

Normally, rhymed stanzas contain rhymes that have at least one mate inside the same stanza; other less common but still important elements of order in rhyming are monorhyme, i.e., iteration of the same rhyme sound (as in OF assonance or triplets in couplet verse); lines whose rhyme is indeterminate or optional in the midst of other lines with obligatory participation in the rhyme scheme (marked with an x in the rhyme scheme); "isolated rhyme" or "thorn rhymes" (Occitan rim estramp, Ger. Korn—see CLAVIS); lines that have a mate only in following stanzas; and rhymeless lines without mates anywhere in the poem (Ger. Waise, "orphan" lines; more exploited in Rus.). All these devices structure the aesthetic space either by adding higher levels of order or by opening up spaces within the order for some amount of free play.

(12) By sight versus sound. In most poetry of all ages and langs., sound is the primary stratum, and rhymes are based on sound correspondence; strictly speaking, the spelling of words is irrelevant. Furthermore, spelling can mislead inattentive readers if they respond to the visual shape of the words instead of the aural. Still, this is a narrow view, and it is undeniable that literate poets of all ages have been aware to some degree of the visual dimension of poetry (Hollander's "poem in the eye"). The relations of sound to orthography in a given lang. are more manifold than is usually supposed, and these must be attended to. The first point is that fundamental processes of sound change in a lang., such as the Great Vowel Shift in Eng., have altered the pronunciation that some words formerly had, but since orthography tends to ossify—to change much more slowly than sound and via differing laws—some words that formerly rhymed and were spelled similarly now retain only the orthographic similarity. Some writers have called these "historical rhymes," but this is only to say that, in the original poem, they were authentic rhymes and should be so understood now. Conversely, orthography has itself exerted an influence on pronunciation at times, so that words spelled alike come to be pronounced alike despite former difference: this phenomenon is called "spelling pronunciation."

An important related issue is that of rhyming in dialect poetry and dialect rhymes in standard-dialect poetry. Orthography and time conceal some of these rhymes, such as Keats's Cockney rhymes, e.g., thoughts / sorts (with the r suppressed in Cockney slang; see COCKNEY SCHOOL), or the South Ger. dialect rhymes of J. W. Goethe, Friedrich Schiller, and others.

Some poets have exploited the visual forms of words to create visual analogues of aural rhyme: these maneuvers require rapid shifts in category recognition on the part of the reader to realize the nature of the sleight-of-hand. Finally, the invention of script and then printing has exerted so powerful an influence on mod. consciousness that poetry itself is now in effect a bivalent form wherein visuality comes to have, in the mod. world, equal legitimacy with sound as the mode of poetic form, leading to the several forms of pattern poetry, concrete poetry, lettrisme, *calligrammes, and *visual poetry.

C. Terminology. The terminologies for rhyme, its varieties, and its analogues in the several Western langs. derive from the 12th c.; they are unsystematic and inconsistent. In med. Lat., rhyme emerges from the Christian hymn trad. into the elaborate forms of rhyming in the silver-age poetry of the Carolingian Ren. (see Raby). In the vernaculars, rhyming achieves its first flowering in Occitan poetry, where the troubadours exhibited in their verse perhaps the most sustained interest in rhyme ever seen in the West, before or since. From Occitan, it passed to all the other Eur. vernaculars, with later efflorescence in northern France in the poetry of the rhétoriqueurs in the late 15th–early 16th cs., influencing even, through Ger., the poetries of the Scandinavian countries. From this thumbnail hist., one would think that Fr. rhyme terminology would have dominated all others, incl. Eng. But since Eng. prosody developed out of 19th-c. Ger. philology, itself based on cl. philology, the 20th c. inherited a confused and confusing apparatus.

Further, given the conservatism of traditional prosodists, one would think that rhyme terminology would be relatively consistent from one lang. to another. But all langs. do not admit the various morphological forms of rhyme with equal facility and so tend to develop one or another rhyme form more extensively. The practice of a major poet also has great effect. Thus, simple trans. of a term from one lang. to another gives a misleading impression, for the effects of a given structure are not precisely the same in two different langs. This is a significant constraint on building cross-ling. taxonomies and terminologies. It is not a constraint, however, on the more immediate problems of making the reference of terms clear and precise or of eliminating confusion. To date, no full and systematic analysis of the terminologies in the major Western langs.—med. Lat, Occitan, OF, OE, ON, ME, MHG, and mod. Ger., Fr., Eng., Sp., and Rus.—much less in the major Asian langs.—Chinese and Japanese—has yet been given. Since the most influential mod. prosodies have been Fr. and Eng., a brief discussion of terminological issues therein will be instructive.

(1) French. In 19th- and early 20th-c. Fr. prosody, rhyme classification distinguished between phonemic material following the tonic (rhyming) vowel and phonemic material preceding it:

(a) rhyme of tonic vowel alone:
rime pauvre or faible
(b) rhyme of vowel + following consonant(s):
rime suffisante
(c) rhyme of vowel + preceding consonant(s):
rime riche
(d) rhyme of vowel + preceding syllable(s):
rime léonine

Under (c), the homophony of the rhyme words' consonne d'appui (the consonant immediately preceding the tonic vowel) was a condition of rime riche (see RICH RHYME). The incidence of rime riche increased with the romantic poets and became an important plank in the aesthetic platform of *Parnassianism: "Without the consonne d'appui, there is no rhyme and, consequently, no poetry" (Banville); but it should not be assumed that this increase in rime riche was designed to compensate for the concomitant increase in other metrical freedoms by shoring up the line end (Cornulier). Among these poets, rime riche enriches the rhyming words, investing them with more resonance, color, and dramatic presence. To later 20th-c. analysts, however, this 19th-c. system of classification has seemed too crude, particularly in that it allows rhymes like bonté / cité to be rich, while denser accumulations of phonemes (e.g., tordre / mordre, arche / marche) are classed as merely suffisantes. Accordingly, a purely numerical approach to rhyme classification has been preferred, whereby the more identical phonemes there are, in whatever position, the richer the rhyme:

(1) rime pauvre or faible:
identity of one element, the tonic vowel
(bossu / vu)
(2) rime suffisante:
identity of two elements, tonic vowel + consonant (roc / bloc) or consonant + tonic vowel
(main / carmin)
(3) rime riche:
identity of three or more elements in the tonic syllable (s'abrite / s'effrite, tordu / perdu, charmes / larmes)
(4) rime léonine:
identity of two or more syllables, the tonic syllable + one or more syllables preceding it (tamariniers / mariniers, désir, Idées / des iridées).

But in the assessment of the degree or relative richness of rhyme, other factors also need to be taken into account, e.g. the "amplification" of the rhyme (identical phonemes in the rhyme words but not involved in the rhyme itself, e.g. rivage / image; galopin / maroquin) and correspondence of the number of syllables in the rhyme words or rhyme measures.

(2) English. Eng. has never succeeded in codifying its terminology for rhyme forms. Surveys of usage even show very little consistency of treatment. The most common terms for rhyme in Eng. have been end rhyme, full rhyme, perfect rhyme, and true rhyme. The first of these simply denotes line position and, while unsatisfactory, seems least problematic; the second corresponds to Fr. rime suffisante and would be useful were that all it were taken to mean, i.e., meeting the minimum criteria for rhyme. The last two, however, imply that the one form of sound echo denominated "rhyme" is somehow the ideal or epitome toward which all other forms strive (and fail), whereas, in fact, end rhyme is but one of several related configurations of sound correspondence. The terms perfect and true should be avoided as prejudicing a priori the status of other forms of rhyme, whose own terms (off rhyme, near rhyme) are also objectionable.

But again, it is essential to bear in mind that, even for rhyme types directly appropriated from the Romance langs. and for which the Eng. terms are simply direct trans., the effect is not the same: rhyme is a markedly different phenomenon in inflectional langs., where identity of word ending is pervasive and often must be actually avoided, than in positional langs., where inflectional endings are almost entirely absent and where sound similarity is more dependent on the historical evolution of the lexicon. Notwithstanding, this difference does not automatically make the Romance langs. rhyme "rich" and the Germanic langs. rhyme "poor," as has often been thought: it is not merely the quantity of like endings that is at issue.

D. Analogues. Inside poetry, there are a number of structures that have rhyme-like effects or functions or exceed the domain of rhyme, verging into repetition. The *sestina, e.g., repeats a sequence of whole words rather than rhyme sounds. Several rhetorical devices generate comparable effects to those of rhyme even in unrhymed verse: in the 10,000 lines of Paradise Lost, there are over 100 cases of epistrophe, nearly 100 of *anaphora, 60 of *anadiplosis, 50 of *epanalepsis, and 40 of epizeuxis, all of them, as Broadbent says, "iterative schemes tending to the effect of rhyme." Milton also weights words at line end (Broadbent calls this "anti-rhyme"), counterposing semantically heavy and contrastive terms at Paradise Lost 4.561–62, e.g.: "Tempt not the Lord thy God, he said and stood. / But Satan smitten with amazement fell"—an effect reinforced all the more by reiteration of these two terms via *ploce ten more times in the following 21 lines, and echoed thereafter at 4.590–91 (cf. 9.832–33). In *American Sign Language poetry, poets achieve rhyme-like effects using hand shapes.

Outside poetry, rhyme is commonly thought of as a "poetical" device, but, in fact, it is a broadly attested ling. structure used for marking the ends of important words and phrases to make them memorable. Rhyme is widely used not only for ludic and didactic purposes, as in rhymed and rhythmical calendrical mnemonics, children's counting-out and jump-rope rhymes, and jingles for ads (see Chasar) but for other types of memorable speech such as *proverbs, *epigrams, inscriptions, mottoes, *riddles, puns, and jokes (Brogan). Children seem to be able to manufacture rhymes not only spontaneously and happily but more readily than the other six forms cited at the top of section II.B above, suggesting that the closural or "final-fixed" structure that is rhyme is somehow more salient for cognitive processing (see Rayman and Zaidel), as the vast lit. on the role of rhyme in promoting children's phonemic awareness, lang. acquisition, and literacy suggests. Perhaps the most common form of rhyming in lang. is seen in mnemonic formulas, catch phrases that rhyme, e.g., true blue, ill will, fender bender, double trouble, high and dry. The list of such popular and proverbial phrases is astonishingly long, and the device is also used in poetry (Donne, "Song (Go and Catch a Falling Star"); Eliot, Four Quartets; see CLOSE RHYME).

In an important study, Bolinger has shown that in every lang., words that begin or end alike in sound come to be perceived as related even when they have no etymological connection. This sort of paradigmatic or synchronic associativity is even stronger than the historical kinship of words, which is often concealed by spelling and pronunciation changes, and is extended naturally into poetry as rhyme without any alteration of form or function. The inevitability of rhyme suggested by this study becomes harder to deny in light of evidence that rhyme-like structures apparently exist even in nonhuman langs., such as that of whales (Guinee and Payne), challenging those who think of rhyme as more artificial than natural to reconsider.

RHYME COUNTERPOINT. A phenomenon noted by Hayes in the verse of John Donne, Henry Vaughan, and esp. George Herbert (e.g., "Denial"): the pattern of line lengths in a *heterometric poem is independent of the pattern of the rhymes. For example, a quatrain of lines of eight, seven, eight, and seven syllables has the metrical pattern abab, but the rhyme scheme is abba. Normally, rhymed verse is isometric (see ISOCHRONISM OR ISOCHRONY), and even in heterometric verse, lines bound together by rhyme are generally assumed to be isosyllabic. In the case of rhyme counterpoint, however, meter and rhyme are set in contrast, rather than in harmony, making the reader's expectations for both prosodic features act in concert. The distinctive and formally ambiguous effect of rhyme counterpoint is consonant with other features of *metaphysical poetry.

RHYME-PROSE

I. Latin
II. Arabic
III. Chinese

I. Latin. Ancient literary theory in the West posits a gradation from prose to poetry rather than a sharp distinction. In antiquity, a general class of prose was made artful by the application of artifice and *figuration (see ARTIFICE, POETIC); this includes rhythmical prose (see PROSE RHYTHM) and rhymed prose or what will be called here rhyme-prose. Such prose is divided into rhythmical units separated by pauses and end-marked by *rhyme. The largest units are *periods, full-sense units equivalent to mod. independent clauses or sentences; the next largest units are cola, i.e., phrases or subordinate clauses (see COLON); the smallest are commas. Prose has *rhythm; poetry has rhythm and adds *meter (Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.8.1408b30; cf. Augustine, De musica).

The so-called Gorgian figures introduced by Gorgias of Leontini (ca. 485–ca. 380 BCE) define sound effects created by control of rhythm through such strategies as *parallelism (parisosis), balance (isocolon*), and *antithesis. According to Aristotle (Rhetoric 3.1.1404a25), the Gorgian figures were taken from the poets. They are reinforced in antiquity by two devices—terminal rhythms defining natural pauses (see CADENCE) and like sounds created by like endings (homoeoteleuton* or "case rhyme"). Art prose that makes use of the Gorgian figures and related devices was called rhetoricus sermo or eloquentiae prosa. Formulas for the period and colon and for types of prose rhythm and homoeoteleuton are given in the Rhetorica ad Herennium, the earliest extant Lat. rhet., and in Cicero's De oratore and Quintilian's Institutio oratoria. During the Middle Ages, the quantitative terminal rhythms (cadences) of art prose were expressed in accentual forms (the cursus); the Vatican adopted certain of these for papal correspondence. As the use of prose rhythms became widespread, the use of homoeoteleuton was broadened and became full rhyme. The convergence of the two resulted in rhyme-prose. Here rhyme is typically used to mark the ends of periods and cola. Much of the rhyme is simple homoeoteleuton, but rhyme of two and three syllables is also found. Rhyme pairs, marking the ends of balanced parallel or antithetical elements, are usual; but practice varies, and *cross rhyme (abab) and bracket rhyme (abba) are common. Rhyme is also found within the period or colon, esp. to mark moments of thematic importance or emotional intensity.

Rhyme-prose was cultivated by Christian writers—e.g., Tertullian, Augustine, Lactantius, Fortunatus, and Hrabanus Maurus—and flourished most vigorously between the 10th and 14th cs. The significance of rhyme-prose is disputed. Norden argued that ancient rhyme-prose coupled with the accentual rhythms of the cursus is the source of rhyme in all Eur. vernacular poetry, but his theory is generally rejected. The more modest position (Polheim) is simply that rhyme-prose is an important med. Lat. form (see LATIN POETRY).

II. Arabic. In Ar., rhyming prose (known as *saj*ᶜ, literally, the cooing of a dove) is found from the very beginnings of literary trad. The aphorisms of pre-Islamic soothsayers are couched in this style, in which a sequence of short utterances all end in the same rhyme and also show evidence of stress patterning (with possible implications for the origins of Ar. poetry itself). The text of the Qur'an itself is predominantly in this style, with a number of the earliest suras (chs.) showing its exclusive use. The most famous literary manifestation of this style occurs in the genre of maqāmāat, a combination of verbal virtuosity and picaresque social commentary apparently originated by Badīᶜ al-zamān al-Hamadhānī (d. 1008) and exploited with great virtuosity by Al-Ḥarīrī (d. 1120).

RHYME ROYAL. A seven-line *pentameter *stanza rhyming ababbcc, one of many complex stanzas developed in the late Middle Ages; sometimes called the Troilus stanza, after Chaucer's use of it in Troilus and Criseyde. The name has speculatively been associated with the stanzaic form of the Scottish King James I's "The Kingis Quair" (c. 1425) but is more likely to have emerged from late med. Fr. forms of ceremonial and festive addresses to royalty; these trads. underlie the vigor of rhyme royal in John Skelton's Eng. Magnyfycence, Thomas Sackville's induction to A Mirror for Magistrates, and other works of drama, pageantry, and rhetorical address in Eng.

Chaucer's devel. of rhyme royal emerges from his familiarity with Fr. courtly poetry, esp. the ballade stanzas of Guillaume de Machaut and Eustache Deschamps, and with the ottava rima of Giovanni Boccaccio. Chaucer adapted and shortened by one line each of these forms while amplifying the stanza's syntactic spaciousness. He uses rhyme royal in a ballade-like way for reflection, philosophizing, and emotional expressiveness, as does his contemporary John Gower, who favors rhyme royal for philosophical love poetry. Chaucer also uses rhyme royal for narrative, a brilliant innovation, in the Troilus and The Parliament of Fowls, Anelida and Arcite, and certain Canterbury Tales. In the Troilus, it is agile and flexible: enjambed or end-stopped at any point, enjambing even across stanza breaks, it accommodates dialogue, action, or reflection; it moves swiftly or slowly, in tones exalted, rough, or colloquial. When Shakespeare used rhyme royal in The Rape of Lucrece, he tested its capacities for violent action and violent reflection at once.

The rhyme scheme of rhyme royal, with its medial bb *couplet, means that the first *quatrain, in alternating rhymes, ends with a line (line 4) which is also the first line of that medial couplet (lines 4–5). Readers might experience this overlap as a unifying ligature or as a gradual disruption or surprise in the move from quatrain to couplet; the third b-rhyme (line 5) as a dilation or amplification that slows narrative momentum. These potentialities create a sense of amplitude and openness within the stanza, lending it to delineation of elusive temporal experiences: reverie, dream, vision, thresholds between waking and sleeping, dawns and dusks. Chaucer explores rhyme royal's temporal capacities in the directions of dream vision and comedy in The Parliament of Fowls, in the direction of philosophical love narrative and tragedy in the Troilus. Thomas Wyatt develops temporal bemusement in other directions through rhyme royal in "They Flee from Me"; Edmund Spenser in "An Hymne of Heavenly Beauty"; John Milton in "On the Death of a Fair Infant Dying of a Cough" and in the proem of "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity." In this latter poem, the rhyme royal stanza has been expanded and its historical argument deepened by augmenting its seventh line to a Spenserian *alexandrine, a move that would influence the rhyme royal practices of Thomas Chatterton, S. T. Coleridge, and William Wordsworth when they revived med. forms and genres (e.g., Wordsworth's "Resolution and Independence"). In mod. times, the most powerful poem in this line is W. B. Yeats's "A Bronze Head."

The rhyme royal stanza has been decreed solemn at least since the 16th c., when George Gascoigne considered it "serving best for grave discourses"; this could fairly be said of some rhyme royal works by 15th- and early 16th-c. Chaucerians like John Lydgate, Thomas Hoccleve, William Dunbar, Robert Henryson, Stephen Hawes, and Alexander Barclay. But it could not be said of the range of Chaucerian work in the form, much less of W.H. Auden's use of it for tonal juxtapositions in the 1955 poem "The Shield of Achilles," or his 1937 tour de force Letter to Lord Byron, which impersonates a light poem by achieving a long rhyme royal poem with abundant feminine rhymes and a wittering air. It is a bravura, unique performance—as is Francis Kinaston's 1635 achievement of translating a full two books of Chaucer's Troilus into perfect Lat. rhyme royal stanzas, published as Amorum Troili et Creseidae libri duo priores Anglico-Latini.

RHYMERS' CLUB. The Rhymers' Club was a loose association of late Victorian male poets, conventionally called aesthetes and decadents. They were characterized (much later) by their most famous member, W. B. Yeats, as "overwrought, unstable men," doomed to personal and poetic failure because of their dissipated, self-destructive personal lives. They met regularly from 1890 to 1895 at London's Cheshire Cheese pub and elsewhere, where they recited and discussed each other's poetry. These meetings, precursors of the mod. *poetry reading, were usually decorous and often dull. Yet as Yeats later observed, that the Rhymers read their poems out loud and thought that they could be so tested was a definition of their aims. A number of Rhymers besides Yeats—Ernest Dowson, Lionel Johnson, Arthur Symons—later became famous in their own right. And because many Rhymers were Celtic by birth, the club is sometimes seen as foreshadowing the Celtic Literary Revival. But in their own time, the Rhymers were distinguished by their collective voice, by their rejection of the high mission claimed for poetry by John Stuart Mill and Matthew Arnold, and by their rigorous refusal to sound notes of individual mastery or *genius.

When others were beginning to experiment with *free verse, the Rhymers delighted in speech, rhyme, and lyricism—in what Yeats called "song for the speaking voice"—and a number of their poems reflect self-consciously on their own spoken or *song-like condition. Their poetry is also significant for the seamlessness and care with which it was mediated into book form. In both The Book of the Rhymers' Club (1892) and The Second Book of the Rhymers' Club (1894), the poetic voice of the individual is woven artfully into the collective whole, making it difficult to read individual poems in isolation. The Rhymers themselves arranged the contents of the two collections. But the books' cohesiveness was due also to the artfulness with which they were published and printed. As their prosaic titles imply, the books of the Rhymers' Club really are books (see BOOK, POETIC)—and they played a small role in what has been termed the renaissance of printing that took place in the 1890s.

RHYME SCHEME (Ger. Reimfolge). An ideal pattern of rhyme in strophic or stichic verse or the written representation of the same. Usually, the term rhyme scheme refers to end rhymes, but variants of the conventional representation can refer also to *internal rhyme. Poets may undertake significant departures from the model rhyme scheme suggested by a poem, and the variability of *rhyme itself leads to further variability of actual rhyme patterns. A standardized notation for rhyme scheme uses lowercase letters of the alphabet to represent patterns: the first rhyme sound is represented as a at its first and every subsequent occurrence, the second b, and so on, with x (and sometimes y, z, etc., in sequence) for lines that do not rhyme. Thus, *couplets rhyme aa bb cc dd, etc., *rhyme royal ababbcc, and the Shakespearean *sonnet ababcdcdefefgg. This system of notation was employed as early as the Ren., when Antonio Minturno used it in his L'arte Poetica (1563). No standardized notation exists for the *refrains of forms in which entire words or lines are repeated, e.g., the *sestina, the *villanelle, and the *ghazal, but critics generally use the capital R or a superscript diacritical mark or number. Rhyme schemes bind constellations of sound and meaning as they link poems to formal trads. Just as the rhyme scheme of a Shakespearean sonnet divides the poem sonically into three quatrains and a couplet, e.g., the thought in the poem typically progresses in three parts toward the proposition of the closing couplet. Even as it binds internally, the rhyme scheme of a sonnet can connect it to the larger hist. of all sonnets and, by means of that connection, generate a range of figurative meanings. Not all rhyme schemes bind sound, meaning, and poetic trad. as tightly as the typical Shakespearean sonnet, however, and various rhyme schemes have greater and lesser degrees of complexity and bond force (Ger. Reimzwang).

RHYTHM (Gr. rhythmos; Lat. rhythmus).

I. Features of Rhythm
II. Rhythm versus Meter
III. Analysis of Rhythm

Although when it was first used in Eng., in the 16th and 17th cs., the word rhythm was not clearly distinguished from the word rhyme* (both words being spelled in a variety of ways), by the 18th c. it was being consistently employed to refer to the durational qualities of poetry and music, and soon extended to analogous properties of the visual arts. In the 19th c., it was generalized to movement of a regular kind—most often the alternation of strong and weak elements—in any sphere, and appropriated by the physical sciences for periodicities and patterns in a range of natural phenomena. The word has retained throughout its hist. an aesthetic aspect, suggesting a movement or spatial arrangement that exhibits some degree of regularity without being mechanical. In poetry and music, it is often opposed to *meter, understood as a more precisely structured, quantifiable movement.

One cannot understand rhythm without considering its realization in human psychology and physiology; as readers of poetry, it is the experience of rhythm that is important to us, and this experience is both mental and bodily. At its most basic, rhythm is a patterning of energy, of tension and release, movement and countermovement that we both perceive and produce—or reproduce—in our own brains and muscles. The most powerful stimuli in producing a sense of rhythm are those that can be interpreted as bursts of energy, the drum being an obvious example. There is a distinction to be made between the noun rhythm and the adjective rhythmic: the latter usually implies a fairly strong regularity, so that we can say, "This is not a particularly rhythmic line," whereas the former can embrace both movements that are metronomic in character and those that are far from metronomic. In their use of rhythm, poetry and music are most closely allied—which does not mean that poetry can be adequately analyzed by means of musical notation (though the many attempts to do so are not without interest), but that both arts draw on the same human rhythmic faculty and thus can gain insights from one another.

Every spoken lang. has its own rhythm, which is to say a distinctive movement of sound, and the pulses of energy that produce it, in a temporal dimension. Linguistic rhythm is a product of the particular language's deployment of volume, duration, *timbre, and *pitch in reflecting lexical and syntactic structures as well as particular emphases. As the use of the term rhythm suggests, there is a degree of periodicity in this use of sound, although different langs. achieve it in different ways. The most common classification of langs. is threefold: stress-timed langs., such as Eng., Ger., and Dutch; syllable-timed langs., such as Fr., It., and Sp.; and mora-timed langs., such as Japanese and Tamil (where the speech rhythm is based on subsyllabic elements). This does not mean that in spoken Eng., e.g., the durations between stresses are objectively equal, nor that in spoken Fr., all syllables are of the same length. Phonetic evidence shows that *isochronism is not a matter of equal duration but of a tendency in this direction, evident, for instance, in the relative durations of vowels to consonants, which are proportionally higher in stress-timed languages (see Ramus et al.). Speakers of Eng. perceive stresses as the dominant element in the language's tendency toward regular rhythm, whereas the syllables—although they too play a part in creating the rhythmic quality of Eng. speech—are felt to be subsidiary. In Fr., by contrast, the syllables are felt to be the carriers of rhythm, with stress a secondary feature.

The characteristic verse forms of a lang. reflect its rhythm; thus, traditional Fr. verse is based on a syllable count, while traditional Eng. verse is based on the disposition of stresses. However, in Fr. and in Eng., the rhythmic subtlety of which metrical poetry is capable arises from the interplay between syllabic and stress rhythms, both of which are produced by the operation of the body's musculature in sequences of tension and release. In the most strongly regular verse, the different sources of rhythmic movement in a lang. are aligned, and the resulting movement conforms to the general properties of rhythmic organization.

*Free verse does not organize the features of the lang. in such a way as to produce a regular rhythm, but due to the inherently rhythmic character of every lang. and the structuring devices used by the poet (which can include lineation, syntactic arrangement, and rhyme), rhythm remains an important element in the reader's experience.

I. Features of Rhythm. Rhythm as a psycho-physiological phenomenon possesses certain properties, irrespective of the medium in which it is realized. Stable rhythms characteristically display five features: regularity, repetition, variety, hierarchy, and grouping.

A. Regularity. Rhythmic series consist of perceived signals occurring at intervals that are either regular or are close enough to being regular to create and constantly reinforce the expectation of regularity. In reading a text, the mind is continually making rapid predictions about what is likely to be perceived on the basis of what it has just perceived (and still holds in short-term memory); if the expected signal is delayed or missing, the mind will often supply it. An experience of rhythm will not arise if the time lapse between signals is too great; this, however, is not likely to happen in the case of poetry, except in a very unusual style of performance. When regularity is marked, and the expectation of regularity strong, the signals are perceived as *beats. (It has been argued, e.g. by Couper-Kuhlen, that this happens in spoken Eng. as well as in verse.)

B. Repetition. In order for a rhythm to be perceived, the successive stimuli must be experienced as the same stimulus occurring over and over again. In poetry, the rhythm is based on identifiable linguistic units: stressed syllables, syllables, or mora (irrespective of the phonetic differences that occur as these units are repeated). Again, expectation plays a large role in the perception of rhythmic stimuli: having heard a number of repeated signals, we are likely to interpret further stimuli as more of the same.

C. Variation. Exact repetition is usually felt to be monotonous, however, though the precise point at which pleasurable repetition becomes tedious is not easily specifiable. Variation is thus crucial to the enjoyment of rhythm, but if the signal varies too greatly from what is expected, the pattern will be perceived as unrhythmical—or as the beginning of a new rhythmic series.

D. Hierarchy. The repeated stimuli that create a regular rhythm are usually perceived as possessing some further organization, rather than being understood as a simple series. The fact that we hear a clock's "tick-tick-tick-tick" as "tick-tock-tick-tock" is one of the most familiar examples of this tendency: in this case, an exactly repeated stimulus is interpreted as an alternation between a stronger and weaker signal. This interpretation produces a hierarchy: over and above the rhythm of the repeated sounds, we hear a more widely spaced rhythm made up of the "stronger" sounds. If we were asked to tap on one out of every two sounds, we would find ourselves tapping on those we hear as "ticks" rather than those we hear as "tocks."

The hierarchical nature of regular rhythm is very clear in music, where the fundamental rhythmic units, the beats, are perceived in patterns of strong and weak, or strong, less strong, and weak, and so on. Thus a *measure of four beats will begin (according to convention) with the strongest beat, followed by a weak beat, then a somewhat strong beat, then another weak beat. Once this pattern is established (something that can be achieved in a number of ways, incl. variations in pitch, timbre, or loudness), it will continue to be heard unless an alternative organization imposes itself on the hearer. In verse, a four-beat line will tend to follow the same pattern, although other factors such as emphasis and syntax can obscure it. The common stanza in *accentual-syllabic verse consisting of 4 four-beat, or *tetrameter, lines can be thought of as having an underlying rhythm in which the initial beats of the first and third lines are the strongest (the "highest" level of the hierarchy, where each unit is two lines), the next strongest beats are at the start of the second and last lines, then the third beats of each line, then the second and final beats of each line. The first stanza of William Blake's "London" will illustrate, using B, B, b, b to indicate beats of descending strength:

I wander thro' each charter'd street.
B b b b

Near where the charter'd Thames does flow
B b b b

And mark in every face I meet
B b b b

Marks of weakness, marks of woe
B b b b

This tendency is particularly marked in *dipodic verse, in which the lang. of the lines induces a strong alternation between the beats; alternatively, it can be obscured by the establishment of a contrary rhythm by the lang.

Rhythmic hierarchies are based on twos and threes; series of four or more are perceived as having stronger and weaker beats, and therefore a hierarchical structure. At the lowest level of the hierarchy, this gives rise to duple and triple rhythms; above this level, arrangements of threes are less common. By far the commonest rhythm is the duple rhythm, that is, one based on simple alternation between stronger and weaker stimuli, beat and offbeat; and in popular verse in many langs., this alternation is repeated at higher levels to produce the familiar four-beat rhythm—also a staple of med. verse, Lat. and vernacular, sacred and profane, and many trads. of art verse.

At a certain point in the hierarchy that cannot be defined precisely (and no doubt varies from reader to reader), rhythm fades, to be replaced by what might be called balance. Thus, the relation between 2 four-line tetrameter stanzas is unlikely to be perceived as a matter of rhythm—which is to say, it is unlikely to be registered somatically—though it may be intellectually understood as a strong-weak, or weak-strong, relation. Some analysts, however, incl. Cureton, use the word rhythm for relations over these much longer spans.

E. Grouping. As a result of rhythm's hierarchical nature, mora, syllables, or stresses (depending on the lang.) are perceived in groups of two or three or combinations thereof. Grouping is achieved not by the insertion of dividers between the groups, although the use of bar lines and foot divisions may seem to suggest this, but rather by a number of factors working together to encourage the perception of a closer link between some elements than between others. The use of a strict meter is one such factor: accentual-syllabic verse in a duple meter that begins regularly with an unstressed syllable or offbeat will encourage the perception of groups of two syllables, unstressed then stressed; this is *iambic meter, each unit of which is an iambic *foot. The reverse arrangement produces *trochaic feet. If, as in the former, weaker elements are grouped before stronger elements, the result is a rising rhythm; if, as in the latter, stronger elements are grouped before weaker elements, the result is a falling rhythm (see RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM). Tetrameter lines exhibit a tendency to divide into two groups of four syllables; in *pentameter lines, there is less pressure to fall into a regular grouping (though 4:6 and 6:4 are the most common groups). *Alexandrines most often fall into two groups of six syllables. However, word, phrase, clause, and sentence divisions may cut across these metrically induced groupings to produce a more complex, less clear-cut pattern of groups. And if the meter does not generate particular expectations of grouping—for instance, if the openings of lines vary freely between beats and offbeats—these linguistic divisions, together with line divisions, play the dominant role in determining the perception of groups.

II. Rhythm versus Meter. The distinction between rhythm and meter is old, dating to at least the 4th c. BCE. The disagreement between the metrici* and the rhythmici in ancient Greece reflected two approaches to verse, one strictly quantitative, the other musical, and the two terms have retained these connotations. Meter is that aspect of regular rhythm that can be labeled and counted. It is sometimes conceptualized as an abstract pattern coexisting with the actual, varied rhythm of the poem's lang., and most systems of *scansion are designed to provide a graphic representation of this pattern, though there is no psychological evidence for the simultaneous perception of two different levels in our apprehension of metrical verse. The evidence of Ren. attempts to write vernacular verse in cl. meters, however, suggests that the intellectual apprehension of complex metrical patterns can coexist with the aural appreciation of rhythm (see also CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES).

When the rhythm-bearing features of a lang. are arranged in such a way as to produce marked regularity, and thus the perception of beats, the basis for metrical organization exists. And when the series of beats and intervening offbeats are themselves organized into patterns, a meter is perceived, usually in conformity with a set of numerical constraints that has developed in the linguistic trad. in question. Meter can thus be understood as a particular form of rhythm, but it must be remembered that even the strictest metrical verse will retain some of the variety and unpredictability of the language's native rhythm. The establishment of a metrical pattern will also have an effect on the perception of rhythm, for instance, in the *promotion or *demotion of certain syllables. Any verse allows for a variety of individual *performances, within the parameters set by the norms of the lang., and, in the case of regular verse, the demands of the meter.

III. Analysis of Rhythm. The task of rhythmic analysis is to reflect the movement of lang.—words, phrases, clauses, and sentences—in verse, as perceived by the reader. In free verse, this movement does not induce the experience of a regular pattern and its accompanying expectations, although with some free verse, it is appropriate to include an indication of its movement toward and away from such a pattern. In metrical verse, a full rhythmic analysis will include scrutiny of the movement that both creates and varies a metrical pattern.

One approach to rhythmic analysis is to examine phonetic records of performances of verse, using techniques developed for the phonetic analysis of speech (see, e.g., Chatman and Tsur, Poetic Rhythm). This approach is esp. useful for illuminating the different performance styles of different readers and periods, less useful in understanding the rhythmic properties common to a number of readings. The use of musical symbols to represent the rhythmic features of spoken lang. in verse, as proposed, for instance, by Joshua Steele in Prosodia Rationalis (1775) and Sidney Lanier in The Science of English Verse (1880), has proved less successful, since musical rhythm is determined by specified pitches and durations, whereas linguistic rhythm depends on relations among units.

Phonological investigations of lang. rhythms may utilize terminology that overlaps with that of poetic analysis, thanks to the close connection between natural speech rhythm and verse trad., thus providing tools for rhythmic analysis in poetry (see Hanson and Kiparsky; Hayes 1984 and 1989). Whereas earlier phonological accounts of stress in Eng. relied on the apportioning of numbered levels to syllables, often influencing studies of poetic rhythm, generative phonology and subsequent devels. in linguistic science have demonstrated the importance of lexical and syntactic structures, as well as the operation of general rules of rhythm, in establishing rhythmic hierarchies.

Another approach draws on studies of rhythm in music to scrutinize the complex hierarchies created by the phonological, morphological, and syntactic properties of the lang. used in verse. Cureton, for instance, exploits the influential theory of musical rhythm propounded by Lerdahl and Jackendoff (itself owing much to generative studies of lang.) to develop an account of rhythmic phrasing in verse (see also Attridge, Poetic Rhythm, chap. 8). Discussions of folk songs by Hayes and MacEachern and by Kiparsky using optimality theory have provided insights into the relation among the rhythm of the spoken lang., the rhythm established by the meter, and the rhythm of the musical setting. Approaches within the field of *cognitive poetics make use of studies of brain functions, such as the operation of short-term or working memory, and build on older studies of perception such as Gestalt theory (see Tsur 1977). There is still much that is not fully understood about the operation of rhythm in verse, and its relation to the rhythms of lang. and of music, and to rhythm itself as a perceptual phenomenon.

RHYTHMIC FIGURES. Metrical verse in Eng. is experienced as the regular alternation of *beats and offbeats, but very often these do not coincide with stressed and unstressed syllables. Such variations from the simplest realization of the meter frequently fall into one of a very small number of rhythmic figures (the phrase is borrowed from musical analysis). The five most common of these regularly encountered patterns can add expressive power, as well as variety, to the lines in which they occur.

The first figure involves three successive syllables in a metrical line that are all very lightly emphasized in pronunciation, although the middle syllable is felt as a beat, or *ictus, defining the metrical pattern (see promotion). In Shakespeare's opening line of sonnet 150, "How heavy do I jour*ney* on the way," unemphatic beats on "do" and "on" fulfill the reader/performer's sense of a pentameter. The same figure is used in these lines by Alexander Pope and Emily Dickinson to satisfy five-, four-, and three-beat expectations: "The sound must seem an echo to the sense"; "I died for beauty— but was scarce / Adjusted in *the tomb."

The second figure is the mirror image of the first, where three sequential syllables are all emphasized, though only the first and last syllables carry beats (see demotion). In Thomas Hardy's trimeter "For then, I, undistressed," Robert Herrick's tetrameter "And this same flower that smiles today," and Emma Lazarus's pentameter "The air-bridged harbor that twin cities frame," the emphasized "I" and "same" and "bridged," although as prominent as the adjacent syllables, are not sensed as beats that define their poems' metrical schemes. A two-syllable version of this second figure is experienced at the beginnings of lines in countless instances, where only the second of equally emphasized syllables carries a beat, as with John Milton's "Hence* vain deluding joys," or Lazarus's "Send* these, the homeless, tempest tost to me."

Instances of both the first and the second rhythmic figures constitute almost the entirety of this single line by Pope: "The line too labors,* and *the words move slow" (figure one), and (figure two) "The line too la-bors, and the words move slow."

The third familiar rhythmic figure occurs frequently at the beginning of lines and is often labeled "initial inversion," which *foot-scansion prosodists explain as the substitution of a *trochee (/ u) for an expected *iamb (u /). But the four-syllable pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables (/ u u /) is so common and easily perceived that identifying it as a single metrical pattern both simplifies and clarifies the nature of the reader/performer's experience. Thus, the rhythmic figure can add energy to such lines as Dickinson's trimeter "Men do not sham Convulsion," Herrick's tetrameter "Gath*er ye* rosebuds while ye may," and Lord Byron's pentameter "Nels*on was* once Britannia's god of War."

This third rhythmic figure can also occur after a mid-line break in the rhythm, as in William Wordsworth's tetrameter "My horse moved on, hoof after hoof" or in Milton's pentameter "Others whose fruit, burn*ished with* golden rind"—a line where one experiences the rhythmic pattern at the line's beginning as well: "Oth-ers whose fruit, burnished with golden rind."

The fourth rhythmic figure, less frequently experienced because more complex than the previous ones, is, like the third, formed by four syllables. Here two unstressed syllables, or offbeats, are followed by two stressed ones, or beats. This "u u//" pattern is found in such trimeter lines as Wordsworth's "All over the* wide lea," and Shakespeare's pentameter "When in disgrace with Fortune and* men's eyes."

The fifth rhythmic figure occasionally employed is the reverse of the previous one. Here the pattern of stresses, or beats, is// u u, and can be experienced in this line from George Herbert's "Easter Wings": "Then shall the fall fur*ther the flight in me." (Contrast this rhythm with the relative slackness of a rewritten "Then shall the fall extend the flight in me.") John Keats's "Ode on Melancholy" has consecutive lines that exemplify both the fourth and fifth rhythmic figures as the poet writes about a weeping cloud "That fosters the droop-headed flowers all, / And hides the green hill in an April shroud."

By taking these rhythmic figures into account when they occur and sensing their varying effects, the reader/performer may forgo an intellectual effort to discern conventional feet with their line segmentations, labels, and substitutions, and experience more immediately the pleasures that the figures add to the enjoyment of metrical poetry.

RICH RHYME (Fr. rime riche, Ger. reicher Reim, It. rima cara). Definitions of "exact" or "true" rhyme tend to require a difference in sound along with the similarity: the final vowel and all following phonemes sound the same, but the preceding consonant or consonants differ, if any are present (e.g., may/day). In accentual langs. such as Eng., exact rhyme will entail the sameness of the final stressed vowel and all following phonemes (see RHYME). Rich rhyme extends sonic similarity back to the preceding consonant, e.g., may/dismay or even may/May.

The consonant-vowel-consonant likenesses of rich rhyme suggest three general possibilities. First, the rhymed terms may be homophones, with like sound but different spelling and meaning, e.g., night/knight, foul/fowl, stare/stair, or Fr. violence/balance. Homographs, with differing sound but like spelling, as in read / read (present tense, past tense) or conflict/conflict (verb, noun), have affinities with rich rhyme but can be more accurately labeled *eye rhyme since they feature differing vowel sounds. The most extreme case of rich rhyme is the homonym, in which both spelling and sound are alike but meaning significantly differs, e.g., Eng. want/want (lack, desire), port/port (harbor, wine) or Fr. été/été (summer, been).

The term rich rhyme derives from a Fr. spectrum of rhyming, from the poor rhyme of *assonance through sufficient and rich rhyme to the even richer leonine rhyme, which extends rhyming backward over two full syllables (and must be distinguished from the homonymous med. verse form). The Fr. origin of the term suggests its frequency in the lang. The technique appears in quantity in the 15th c. as one of the devices of the rhétoriqueurs, and Thomas Sébillet gave it the name rime riche in 1490. Pierre de Ronsard, Joachim du Bellay, and other poets of the Pléiade* allowed it in moderation. After 1600, rich rhyme fell out of favor in Fr. but was later revived by the romantics, particularly Victor Hugo. Championed subsequently by Théodore de Banville, it was used even more by the *Parnassians.

Chaucer and John Gower, whose Eng. owes much to Fr., employ rich rhyme regularly: heere/heere (here / hear), e.g., and herte/herte (hurt / heart). However, since the Ren., in which Thomas Wyatt and Edmund Spenser used rich rhyme regularly, the practice has been quite rare. Many *prosody manuals insist that rich rhyme is impermissible in Eng., to the extent that some give rich rhyme the name "false rhyme." Hollander argues that rich rhyme in Eng. "always must fall ridiculously flat, underlined as the like syllables are by their stressed position. In English rime très riche is always in a sense, rime pauvre." Small has argued that Eng. resistance to rich rhyme arises more from convention than from actual qualities of the lang., and she finds a surprising prevalence of rich rhyme in Emily Dickinson's verse. Because of its rarity, rich rhyme in Eng. offers an element of surprise that can be used to accentuate semantic meaning. The two rhymed words may be alike in sound, but they can differ with respect to local meaning or usage while also contrasting with the more typical rhymes around them.

Rich rhyme occurs in many other lits., incl. It., Sp., and cl. Ar. *Identical rhyme extends the similitude of rich rhyme to the level of meaning, e.g., may/may, where both are the verb. The echo device (see ECHO VERSE) is one species of rich rhyme. Ger. rührende Reim is a type of mosaic rich or identical rhyme popular in MHG in which one of the rhyming words is a compound of the other, e.g., Ger. zeigen/erzeigen, Fr. aroi/a roi, Eng. mortal/immortal (see MOSAIC RHYME).

RIDDLE. Ancient and worldwide phenomena in both oral trad. (the "folk riddle") and written lit. (the "literary riddle"), riddles take the form of question and answer. Typically, an intentionally misleading question presents an enigma that can be resolved only by a clever "right" answer. The impulse to dismiss riddle as "a sort of trick question which, once answered, has no further interest—a silly puzzle which, once clarified, self-destructs" (Wilbur) has been refuted by a long trad. of scholarship that treats riddle as a site for central aspects of poetry and poetics, incl. *metaphor, wordplay, *paradox, and *imagery.

In a "true riddle," the question presents a description, which usually describes something in terms of something else, and a "block element," a contradiction or confusion that disrupts the initial description. E.g., the riddle "What plows and plows, but no furrow remains" first appears to describe a plow, then blocks that answer by eliminating the effect of a plow. The implicit answer to this riddle—a ship—arises only after the listener or reader suppresses the initial response and thinks of another object to which the verb plow might apply. Such riddles are essentially metaphors with one term concealed, pointing out both similarities and differences between the terms. Some metaphorical riddles leave the block element implicit: "Back of the village sit those who have donned white kerchiefs" (fence posts, each with a cap of snow). Other kinds of riddles rely on puns—"What turns without moving" (milk)—or on anomalies in the laws of nature—"I tremble at each breath of air, / And yet can heaviest burdens bear" (water).

The folk riddle tends to appear in structured social occasions, from children's games to adult rituals like courtship in tribal South Africa and funeral wakes in the West Indies. A number of other kinds of enigmatic questions associated with riddle also occur in social ritual: e.g., biblical riddles, which describe a character in the Bible; the joking questions known as "conundrums," e.g., "How is a duck like an icicle? Both grow down"; wisdom questions, as in a catechism; charades, which describe a word syllable by syllable; and parody forms such as the catch-riddle, which tricks the answerer into an embarrassing answer.

Literary riddle brings literary ambitions to the basic form of folk riddle, tending toward longer and more elaborate expression. In contrast to folk riddles, literary riddles may use abstractions as topics (e.g., creation, humility, death, wisdom), exploit the device of *prosopopoeia, delight in obscene suggestions, and even give away the answer in the text or title.

The literary riddle has a long hist., appearing in Sanskrit, in which the cosmological riddles of the Rig Veda go back to the early first millennium BCE; in Heb., where a trad. of literary riddles runs from the OT and Talmud through the Heb. poetry of med. Spain, incl. the poetry of Dunash Ibn Labrat (10th c.) and Jehudah Halevi (ca. 1074–1141); in Gr., esp. in the Greek Anthology* and in Byzantine lit.; in Ar., from the 10th c. to the present, the most famous Ar. riddlemaster being Al-Ḥarīrī (ca. 1050–1120); in Persian lit. extending from the 10th and 11th cs. through the 16th, incl. the epic Shāhnāma of Firdawsī (b. 940); and perhaps in Chinese, where evidence, though no discovered text, suggests literary riddling in the 12th and 13th cs. A rich med. trad. began in Europe with 100 Lat. riddles by Symphosius (5th c.). In England, Aldhelm (640–709) wrote 100 riddles in Anglo-Lat. hexameters (Enigmata), contributing to the genre of the etymological riddle, which uses the text of the riddle to explore the Lat. name of the answer. The riddles of the OE Exeter Book (ca. 10th c.), which feature involved riddling descriptions of everyday things, are exemplary and have been the focus of much critical consideration. The Ren. was another productive period for the literary riddle, particularly in Italy. Later writers attracted to riddles include Miguel de Cervantes, Jonathan Swift, Friedrich Schiller, Heinrich Heine, and Emily Dickinson.

These instances of the riddle genre can be distinguished from a pervasive literary mode of riddling at work in a bevy of other genres incl. "sacred writing, . . . tragedy, comedy, romance, lyric kinds, even the novel," as Cook has noted. Indeed, the conjunction and disjunction of implicitly compared terms in riddle suggest poetic *metaphor, as Aristotle argued in the Rhetoric: "metaphors imply riddles, and therefore a good riddle can furnish a good metaphor." Frye, in Anatomy of Criticism, associates riddle with visual imagery, arguing that "the radical of opsis in the lyric is riddle," and Welsh treats the visual imagery of riddles as the basis for a theory of the roots of *lyric poetry. Wilbur observes that the visual suggestions in the question of a riddle imprint themselves on readers' minds, a mental quirk that gives the metaphoric pairings of riddles more impact: "If someone says to me, think of a white bird, a white bird appears in my mind's eye; if I am then told to forget about the bird, I find that its image will not go away."

The dialogic structure of even literary riddle suggests social interaction, "a competition between the riddler and the riddlees" (Pagis). As such, a riddle holds in social and literary tension the meaning it conceals and the meaning it reveals. "The deliberate obscurity of riddles," Tiffany argues, "does not imply the absence of disclosure or sociability." The process of mental concentration and play that riddles demand, in fact, can instruct: children, e.g., explore the ling. and cognitive systems of their cultures through riddle contests (McDowell).

Riddles, in fact, model *defamiliarization, the poetic process of making the world strange that Viktor Shklovsky treated as central to the literary imagination. The first term of the question is made strange by the block element, and once an answer arrives, both terms are made strange in relation to each other. As Tiffany has argued, a riddle "withholds the name of a thing, so that the thing may appear as what it is not, in order to be revealed for what it is." The figurative operations of riddle, then, have suggested compressed instances of the operations of poetic imagery and wordplay. The task of discerning the connections and disjunctions of lang. and meaning that the interpreter of riddles undertakes, far from a passing triviality or a forgettable joke, mirrors the process of literary *interpretation itself.

RIME RICHE. See IDENTICAL RHYME; RHYME; RICH RHYME.

RÍMUR (pl.; sing. ríma). A form of stanzaic narrative poetry, cognate with the ME rime, surviving from the mid-14th c. Rímur are Icelandic poems in multiple fits, a ríma having only one. More than a thousand such poems survive, most still unpub. The four-line Lat. *hymn stanza was adapted to include alliteration and the complicated poetic vocabulary of kenning and heiti borrowed from skaldic poetry. While the most popular meter was ferskeytt ("squared meter," four lines; the first and third lines have seven syllables, and the second and fourth have six, rhyming abab), 22 different varieties developed, and it became traditional that no two consecutive fits should be in the same meter. Two- and three-line stanzas appeared, and internal rhymes became increasingly intricate, as did the complex technical vocabulary associated with rímur metrics. Subject matter was wide-ranging, but adaptations of stories set in ancient Scandinavia (fornaldarsögur) or adaptations of chivalric romances (riddarasögur) were esp. favored. Emphasis was on action and adventure, and the rímur were never popular with the ecclesiastical and intellectual elite. Among the most prolific rímur poets were Guðmundur Bergþórsson (1657–1705; 14 rímnaflokkar, "sets of rímur," incl. Olgeirs rímur danska, 60 fits, pub. 1948 in two v.) and Sigurður Breiðfjörð (1798–1846; 27 rímnaflokkar). Steinunn Finnsdóttir (ca. 1641–1710) is the earliest known woman rímur poet. Rímur were the most popular literary form in Iceland until well into the 19th c., being performed esp. during the rural evening work period (kvöldvaka) and in the winter fishing camps (verbúðir). They were chanted, not read, and a good kvæðamaður (chanter of rímur) was always in demand. The *chant melodies (stemmur) reentered popular music thanks to the efforts of Sveinbjörn Beinteinsson (1924–1993), followed by Steindór Andersen (b. 1954) and the band Sigur Rós.

RING COMPOSITION. A structural principle or rhetorical device in which an element or series of elements is repeated at the beginning and at the end of a poem or narrative unit, thus comprising a "ring" framing a nonannular core. Van Otterlo, the pioneer in this branch of literary study, distinguished between simple framing structures, in which a single repeating element encloses the core material in the pattern a-x-a, and annular systems, in which the core material is set off by two or more concentric rings, e.g., a-b-c-x-c-b-a. The repeating elements in an annular system are chiastically ordered. Thus, ring composition provides a mechanism for configuring circles into the production and reception of linear narratives. The terms ring structure, envelope pattern (see ENVELOPE), framing, and chiasmus* often refer to the same figure.

Ring composition operates on several scales. Sometimes lexical repetition encapsulates a passage comprising a few lines, a stanza, a fit, or a short poem; longer episodes or digressions are usually marked off by annular patterns of greater complexity. In their most expanded and intricate forms, ring systems can organize entire *epic poems, as Whitman has argued for the Iliad and Niles for Beowulf. Rings can be made up of repeating material of various sorts—individual words or word roots, themes, images, *motifs, or even elaborate narrative sequences. To function successfully as a ring marker, however, the convention of repetition must be sufficiently recognizable within the trad. or the repeating element sufficiently developed within the poem to enable listeners or readers to recognize the recurrence.

Ring composition possibly arose in response to mnemonic necessity: it provided oral poets with a powerful compositional technique and aural audiences with a means of keeping track of the movement of the story. Structurally, it can function in two ways: (1) to connect the ring-encapsulated passage or episode with the larger story or (2) to create coherence within such a passage. Yet its usefulness can be exaggerated, since the particular pattern that ring composition imposes cannot easily accommodate nonpaired repetitions, linear plot progressions, and other nonsymmetrical movements. A perspicuous lit. hist. of ring composition cannot yet be written, as its incidence has been thoroughly examined in relatively few genres and historical periods, although this list has been rapidly expanding. The governing scholarly assumption has been that ring composition serves the intellectual and stylistic economies of oral-based composition. This assumption has been validated by the high incidence of the device in the oral or oral-derived poetries (particularly epic and narrative) of the ancient Greeks and Anglo-Saxons. In these two fields, research into ring composition under varying rubrics originated independently during the 1930s and 1940s. On the other hand, it had long been known among Celtic scholars that ancient Ir. and Welsh poets made extensive use of a ring device called dúnad(h), which requires that a poem begin and end with the same word. From the latter part of the 20th c. on, the device has been documented in other works and trads. arising out of close association with an oral background, such as the OF chanson de geste*, the MHG Nibelungenlied, 20th-c. Yugoslav oral epic, Scottish balladry, the Zoroastrian Avesta, cl. Ar. poetry, the Gospels, Paul's epistles, and the Heb. Tanakh. Increasingly, ring composition has been found in various texts from a wide range of lit. trads.

The discovery of ring composition in Laurence Sterne's Tristram Shandy, Ezra Pound's Cantos, and other mod. and highly literate works has suggested that it might fill more uses over a broader literary spectrum than had been hitherto suspected. Some scholars have hypothesized that the use of such an intricate structure as ring composition might in fact suggest the later reorganization of earlier oral material, rather than simply being a remnant of oral-based composition. Douglas has argued that mod. readers are so accustomed to the assumption of linear composition that ring composition poses a serious obstacle to comprehension. According to this argument, ring composition is associated with a fundamentally different method of constructing and extracting meaning.

RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM. Rising rhythm typically refers to groups of syllables or words in which the relative stress or the general stress contour moves from lighter to heavier, and falling rhythm designates the opposite movement, or directionality, from heavier to lighter syllables. In traditional Eng. prosody, *iambs and *anapests indicate a rising pattern, while *trochees and *dactyls indicate a falling one. Rising rhythm and falling rhythm are sometimes used as if they were synonymous with iambic and trochaic meters and trads., respectively, but directionality of meter does not necessarily define directionality of rhythm in a given passage or poem.

Historically, the interest in rhythmical directionality emerged, in fact, partly out of dissatisfaction with *foot analysis itself (see Hopkins). In poetic practice, rising and falling rhythms often move against the patterns of the feet, as occurs in "inversions" and other metrically allowed substitutions; but, more important, word or phrase rhythms may cut across foot boundaries and thus create rhythmic ambiguity or neutrality even within a metrical context. A polysyllabic word with a final falling rhythm, e.g., may straddle two iambs in a line, or a phrase with a rising rhythm may spread across the boundaries of several trochaic feet. The abundance of such rhythmic ambiguities within regular metrical lines from all periods—one writer claims as much as 45 percent of the *accentual-syllabic trad. cannot be clearly classified as rising or falling rhythm (Stewart)—may thus argue against the foot being the most important unit of perceived rhythm (Creek). Headless or *catalectic lines are also prone to ambiguous directionality in their meter, since schematically the only difference between a headless iambic line and a catalectic trochaic line is where foot boundaries are drawn.

In spite of these ambiguities, it has been almost universally acknowledged since at least the 16th c. that verse in rising meters differs in important and perceptible ways from that in falling meters. Most characterize the rhythm of poetry in iambic meter, at any rate, as more subtle, complex, and variable than that of poetry in trochaic meter, which has been described as more heavily stressed, insistent, inflexible, and even strained, unnatural, or against the grain of the lang. Some have noted that these qualities of verse in falling meters closely resemble those of the accentual trad. in popular verse. Mod. empirical studies have pointed to measurable differences between rising and falling rhythms, suggesting that the ratio of duration between stressed and unstressed syllables in groupings with a falling rhythm is close to 1:1, while that for syllables in a rising rhythm is approximately twice that, 2:1. In metrical terms, this means that trochees are perceived as shorter than iambs and have less variety of syllable length, but while stress in rising rhythms is thus tied to greater stress length, in falling rhythm stress is tied to perceived greater intensity (see Chatman and Newton). Accordingly, the mere perception of a longer stressed syllable seems to encourage perceptual grouping of that syllable with preceding ones, while a perception of greater intensity in a stressed syllable encourages perceptual grouping of that syllable with ones that follow it (Woodrow), making the stresses in falling rhythms intrinsically tied to perceived intensity of stress. Also, beat intervals in falling rhythm, like those in accentual verse, seem to tend toward perceptual, if not actual, *isochronism, whereas beat intervals in rising rhythms are less regular and more modulated (see Woodrow and Newton). While not entirely uncontested, such studies seem at the very least to corroborate the sense that there is a significant difference between the two rhythms.

But is rising meter somehow more "natural" to the lang., as common opinion and the great predominance in Eng. of the iambic meter over all other alternatives seem to suggest? The linguistic evidence is mixed. Rising rhythm seems to be the fundamental tendency in Eng. phrase construction, with the greatest phonological prominence ordinarily falling on the final stressed syllable of a phrase or syntactical unit. Falling rhythms, however, are far more common than rising ones in polysyllabic Eng. words, esp. disyllables. The play of lexical rhythms (generally falling) within and across phrasal rhythms (generally rising) does, in short, seem to be a part of the rhythmic texture of Eng., and, owing to the language's analytic character, in which phrase is more fundamental than inflected word, the rising, phrasal tendency might reasonably be thought to offer a natural base for meter. On the other hand, if falling rhythms are somehow akin to accentual verse, with its roots in the early hist. of the lang. and the continuing trad. of popular poetry, it might be argued that the iambic trad., adapted from continental syllabism and cl. meters, is less native to the origins of Eng., though perhaps equally as natural to its post-Norman, hybrid character (see Tarlinskaja).

In any case, skillful interweaving of the rising and falling rhythmic strands intrinsic to the language's mod. texture is surely in part responsible for the complexity and nuance that most attribute to sophisticated art verse. Much of the directional ambiguity of many lines in the trad. should thus be appreciated as carefully modulated, balanced, or *counterpointed rhythm. Tabulations of verse in the trad. suggest that verse written in rising rhythms really has tended to exhibit more variations and contrasting internal rhythms such as initial and mid-line inversions as well as countermetrical rhythmic groupings falling across foot boundaries than trochaic and dactylic verse (Hascall, Halpern, Newton). Some reasons for this might be found in the intrinsic linguistic and perceptual differences discussed above. Even so, poets such as Robert Browning and P. B. Shelley have written varied and complex verse in falling meters (Kiparsky), and the relatively less modulated quality of verse in falling meters in the metrical trad. may owe as much to conventional preconceptions about the character of the two kinds of rhythm as to properties inherent in them.

RISPETTO. An It. stanza of variable length, usually ranging from 6 to 12 lines in *hendecasyllables, but most commonly an octave rhyming abababcc, and for this reason often confused with the *Sicilian octave (abababab) and the Tuscan variety of the strambotto*. Some variation in the form occurs in the last four verses or ripresa, which came to have two rhyming *couplets of different rhymes, giving ababccdd. Originally a form of Tuscan popular poetry, the rispetto came to be used throughout Italy. The content is generally amatory hence the name, "respect," i.e., honor paid the beloved woman. In the 15th c., Leonardo Giustiniani, Angelo Poliziano (Politian), and Lorenzo de' Medici wrote series of rispetti; in mod. times, Giosuè Carducci composed many, and Giovanni Pascoli included a number of them in his Myricae. The possible connection of the rispetto to the Fr. respit is not likely, given the difference in subject matter, generally amatory in the former and didactic in the latter.

RITORNELLO (also ripresa). A group of lines (from one to four or more) in a variety of meters (quinario through endecasillabo) that introduce an It. ballata and that are repeated as a *refrain at the end of each stanza. The last line (sometimes the last two lines) of each stanza is linked through rhyme to the ritornello, thereby providing a sort of metrical "return" to the refrain. The ritornello may have begun as a ritornello intercalare, an exclamation from the congregation in response to the priest who was reading a psalm or sequence. In most instances, the ritornello expresses in concise terms either an emotional response to or the essence of the idea or action treated in the stanza or the poem as a whole. Since the ritornello serves as the refrain of a ballata, the number of lines in the ritornello determines the name applied to each variety of this lyric form: one-line ritornello, ballata piccola; two-line, ballata minore; three-line, ballata mezzana; four-line, ballata grande (the most common form); five-line (or more), ballata stravagante.

ROCOCO. Taken from art hist., rococo was invented by the engraver Charles-Nicolas Cochin fils in the mid-18th c. to designate pejoratively the style rocaille in Louis XV furniture and interior decoration. Although poets composed rococo works as early as 1660, the heyday of the style extends from 1685 to 1770. Thematically, rococo poetry celebrates seduction and inconstancy (Guillaume Amfrye de Chaulieu, Alexis Piron, John Gay, Paolo Rolli, J.W.L. Gleim), anacreontic conviviality (Friedrich von Hagedorn, Voltaire, Giuseppe Parini, William Congreve, Carlo Frugoni), and frivolity (C. M. Wieland, Jean Dorat, Matthew Prior). Rather than honoring grand passion, e.g., rococo poets immortalize luxury items such as snuff boxes and tiny objets d' art, pet birds and lap dogs, tobacco and coffee. In *tone, rococo writing is often humorous but opts for a smile rather than laughter. Rococo writers explicitly avoid seriousness and mortality while concentrating on entertainment in the here and now. Formally, monotony is avoided by keeping the poems short or employing seemingly negligent *variation (use of the genre mêlé [e.g., mixing poetry and prose in the same piece] and verse with irregular *rhyme schemes and line lengths; mixing formal *diction with colloquialism). Although rococo poetry has been termed "feminine" because of its charm, grace, delicacy, and refinement, on a deeper level it is often misogynistic and even misanthropic. Not only are rococo poets overwhelmingly male, but women are depicted in ways consonant with the querelle des femmes (quarrel of women, the med. and early mod. dispute between critics and defenders of women): as frivolous, chatty, inconstant, erotic, passive, and even inanimate sex objects (see, e.g., Stanislas, Chevalier de Boufflers's poem "La Bergère"). Typically, women are undressed coquettes, while men are silk-clad beaux. The style also includes *mock-heroic poems such as Jean-Baptiste Gresset's Ver-Vert and Alexander Pope's Rape of the Lock.

ROMANCE (Sp., *ballad). The romance is the simplest and most common fixed form in Sp. poetry. It is usually written in octosyllabic verse in which the even lines assonate alike and the odd-numbered are left free. In the romance doble, the odd-numbered lines have one *assonance and the even-numbered another. Other variations of the basic form (even some having a periodic *refrain) have at times been popular. The learned and the semilearned—and probably even the illiterate—produce these ballads wherever Sp. is spoken, and scholars collect them by the hundreds. They reflect almost every phase of Sp. life. Since many of them are anonymous and have been transmitted largely in oral form, their origin and complete hist. cannot be traced. The earliest known written romances date from the early 15th c. In the early 16th c., romanceros (collections devoted exclusively to ballads) began to appear, the first (1545–50?) being the famous Cancionero de romances—often called the Cancionero sin año because it bears no date of publication—by Martin Nucio in Antwerp. The most convenient classification of romances—that summarized by S. G. Morley and adapted from those of Agustin Durán, Ferdinand Wolf and Conrad Hofmann, and Manuel Milà i Fontanals—covers the period from the 15th through the 17th c. It corresponds, with the exception of the romances vulgares, to three periods of creation—traditional, erudite, and artistic: (1) the anonymous romances viejos, primitive or traditional ballads, usually on historical themes and thought to be among the earliest; (2) the 15th- and early 16th-c. romances juglarescos, minstrel ballads, "longer and more personal, but still supported by tradition"; (3) romances eruditos, erudite ballads, written by known authors after 1550 and based on old chronicles; (4) romances artisticos, artistic ballads, usually lyric, on varied themes, and written by known poets from the late 15th c. through the 17th c.; and (5) the crude romances vulgares, blind beggar ballads, from about 1600 on. Large numbers of orally transmitted romances were collected in the Americas and abroad by such scholars as Samuel G. Armistead and Joseph Silverman (Sephardic), Manuel da Costa Fontes (Port.), and others. A strong impulse to romance composition emerged in the early 20th c. with Federico García Lorca, who used the form for expressing complex emotions.

The romance heroico, also called romance endecasílabo or romance real, is a romance in Italianate *hendecasyllables. A romance in lines of fewer than eight syllables is called romancillo. One variation of the romance is the corrido (ballad with guitar accompaniment), esp. popular in Mexico. The jácara is a romance in which the activities of ruffians are recounted, usually in a boisterous manner.

ROMANIA, POETRY OF. Poetry is one of the few areas of Romanian culture in which one notices a kind of organic continuity over the centuries. The earliest surviving texts of Romanian poetry date from the 17th c. In the 17th and 18th cs., Romanian poetry is chiefly of three kinds. The first is religious poetry, esp. verse trans. of biblical books. Thus, Dosoftei, a learned Moldavian clergyman, translated the Psalms (1673) in rhymed *couplets of variable length that indicate equally the influence of Romanian oral folk verse and of classicist Polish poetry (see POLAND, POETRY OF). The second is *occasional verse following Western models—*elegies, *odes, pattern poetry, and *epigrams. The most prominent example is by the historian and statesman Miron Costin (1633–91), whose Viaţa lumii (The World's Life, ca. 1672) is a meditation on the vanity of life and the mutability of fortune, written in rhymed couplets of 12 or 13 syllables in irregular meter. The third kind is represented by a wide variety of historical chronicles in verse that flourished in the 18th c. in the southern principality of Wallachia. These are often polemical, always picturesque, and undoubtedly circulated orally.

The 18th c. also witnessed the culmination of oral folk verse, references to and quotations from which are found already in the 15th and 16th cs. They express in a variety of genres the existential horizon and emotional universe of a stable agrarian society. While steeped in a religiosity that combines a simplified Christianity and a broad pantheistic sacrality, this poetry also preserves some traces of a pre-Roman pagan mythology. Heroic trads. are rendered not in epics but rather in short *ballads. The bulk of folk poetry consists of doinas, lyrical expressions of love, loneliness, grief, and yearning, or, less often, glee, carousal, or revolt. Broader visions are provided by the myth of the master-builder Manole, who sacrificed his and his wife's lives to the achievement of a unique building, and particularly by Mioriţa, which is often said to embody a Romanian folk philosophy. It tells the story of a migrant shepherd who, on hearing his companions' plot to murder him, does not defend himself but rather turns the occasion into a grand reconciliation with nature, the stars, and the animals. The popularity of folk poetry declined toward the end of the 19th c., and it had virtually disappeared by the middle of the 20th.

The end of early Romanian lit. was marked by Anton Pann (1796?–1854), who synthesized the oral, didactic, and mythical-historical modes in a mock-naïve style. The decisive turn of Romanian poetry toward Western values and forms occurred in the last two decades of the 18th c. The Wallachian nobleman Ienache Văcărescu (1740?–93) and his two sons wrote gracious and erotic *anacreontic verse on Gr., It., and Fr. models. At almost the same time, in Transylvania, Ion Budai-Deleanu (1760?–1820) wrote a satirical *mock epic of the medieval struggle against the Ottoman Empire.

The first half of the 19th c. in Romanian poetry is characterized by the simultaneous assimilation of Enlightenment, neoclassical, romantic, and *Biedermeier forms and ideas, which led to a number of interesting combinations (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS, ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS). Dimitrie Bolintineanu (1819–72) and Grigore Alexandrescu (1814–85) wrote historical ballads, *satires, *fables, and elegies much influenced by Alphonse de Lamartine and Lord Byron. Vasile Alecsandri (1821–90) combined the fervent struggle for democratic reform and national unity common to the generation inspired by the ideals of 1848 radicalism with poetic serenity, a smiling Epicureanism, and a search for cl. balance. He excelled in patriotic verse, natural description, poetic drama, and adaptations of the newly recovered oral trad.

The greatest 19th-c. Romanian poet was Mihai Eminescu (1850–89), who was influenced by the Ger. romantics and by the philosophies of Immanuel Kant and Arthur Schopenhauer. Unfortunate love, social marginality, intense nationalism, mental illness, and early death no less than his towering poetic achievement soon turned Eminescu into a mythic figure. He gave to Romanian poetry the mod. form of its poetic lang. Eminescu's poetry (melancholy meditations on hist., society, sentimental love, and allegory) is founded on a deeper level of mythical cosmology, irrational vision, and subjective pantheism. Eminescu's unpublished work contains huge fragmentary epics that describe the universe as emerging out of the lamentations of universal or divine self-consciousness; he also evoked the pre-Roman society of the Dacians as a pristine, luxuriant, and crystalline world of which later hist. is but a series of deformed copies. Eminescu's radical conservatism was the wellspring for all later forms of nationalism in Romania.

For three decades after Eminescu's death, two poetic schools vied for primacy. One was *symbolism, which appeared largely under Fr. influence; its most important representative was Alexandru Macedonski (1854–1920), a flamboyant artist who believed fervently in aesthetic perfection; his poetry abounds in images of precious stones, fabulous mirages, and morbid obsessions. Ion Minulescu (1881–1944), an able manipulator of grandiloquent images and sentimental intimations, continued the movement. The other school was the populist and idyllic movement mainly advocated by the jour. Semănătorul. Its proponents emphasized the use of simple lang. and drew their inspiration from national trads. and local themes. The best poets in this trad. were George Coşbuc (1866–1918), who also produced a superb trans. of Dante's Divine Comedy; Octavian Goga (1881–1938), whose best verse expresses a kind of primeval suffering; and Stefan O. Iosif (1875–1913).

The unification of all Romanian provinces following World War I and the beginnings of capitalist democracy favored an unparalleled growth of poetic diversity and power. The Romanian high modernists strove to combine trad. and innovation; the influence of Ger. *expressionism and of Fr. modernists such as Stéphane Mallarmé and Paul Valéry can often be recognized in them. George Bacovia (1881–1957) expressed a universal hopelessness through his austere and obsessive verse, full of images of rain, mud, illness, and provincial dreariness. His poems, inspired by Moldavian towns, evoked a symbolic universe of humidity and putrefaction. Ion Barbu (1895–1961), a mathematician, wrote obscure, semantically packed, tightly structured verse exploring philosophical propositions; for him, the formal order of poetry outlined "a purer, secondary game." In other poems, Barbu indulged his voluptuous pleasure in the verbal thickness of a lush and lurid Balkan world, with its jesters, whores, and sages. Lucian Blaga (1895–1961), philosopher, diplomat, and professor, inquired poetically into the connections between natural reality and transcendent mystery; he evolved from Dionysian rhapsodic tones to praise of the agrarian order as a suggestion of cosmic harmony. Tudor Arghezi (1880–1967) renewed the discourse of Romanian poetry by mixing metaphysics and realism. He is particularly impressive for his astounding thematic range, from pamphleteering virulence, coarse violence, and sexuality to the worlds of children and of wrestling with religious faith and doubt.

In the same generation, there were able traditionalists such as the cultivated neoclassicist Ion Pillat (1891–1945); the natural mystic Vasile Voiculescu (1884–1963); Adrian Maniu (1891–1968), who clothed a decadent weariness in the mock simplicity of folk iconography; and the late neoromantic Alexandru Philippide (1900–79), whose poems abound in cosmic visions and historical nightmares. Among the many nationalist poets of the age, the most prominent was Aron Cotruş (1891–1957), whose messianic thunderings were couched in rolling *free verse and a racy, sonorous vocabulary.

At least as vital and effective was the group of experimentalists, surrealists, and avant-garde radicals who eventually came to influence even Western Eur. poetry. Best known among them was the founder of *Dada, Tristan Tzara (1896–1963), but of comparable distinction were Benjamin Fondane (1898–1944), Ilarie Voronca (1903–46), and Gherasim Luca (1913–1994), all of whom emigrated to France. Gellu Naum (1915–2001) and Saşa Pană (1902–81) were among the chief animators of poetic anarchism, which they aligned with leftist political attitudes. Camil Baltazar (1902–77), with his fluid and melodious verse and his morbid yearning for paradisal innocence, as well as Ion Vinea (1895–1964), with his jazzy rhythms and strident prose inserts, strove to bring experimental poetry closer to the mainstream and to endow it with more finished forms.

The poets who emerged in the later 1930s and 1940s had to suffer the trauma of war and of repeated political upheavals. Some chose exile. Others had to accept long periods of silence. They can be roughly grouped into the Bucharest and the Sibiu schools. The former is exemplified by Ion Caraion (1923–86), Geo Dumitrescu (1920–2004), Dimitrie Stelaru (1917–71), and Constant Tonegaru (1919–52), all ironic pessimists who clamored for adventurous vitality and the demolition of philistine prejudices. Among them Caraion is remarkable for the unrelenting and ferocious darkness of his images. The Sibiu group, exemplified by Radu Stanca (1920–62), the abstractionist Ion Negoiţescu (1921–1993), and above all Stefan Aug Doinaş (1922–2002), eloquently pleaded for the autonomy of culture and the humanizing role of aesthetic production. Doinaş is a consummate craftsman in a wide range of genres and forms, an admirable translator of poetry (e.g., Faust), a poet of intense metaphoric creativity, and the author of ethical satire and Neoplatonic visionary evocations.

The establishment of a communist regime in 1947 that suppressed artistic freedoms led to more than a decade of poetic barrenness. Only the more liberal 1960s brought a revival of poetry. Nichita Stănescu (1933–83) became the standard-bearer of a generation devoted to experiment and to a metaphorical version of reality free from ideological interference. Ioan Alexandru's (1941–2000) best verse moved from the cruelty of tragic naturalism toward a kind of religious harmony. Ion Gheorghe (b. 1935) manages to alternate crass primitivism and oracular obscurities with sophisticated lang. games. Mircea Ivănescu (1931–2011) wrote self-analytic elegies in which stream-of-consciousness techniques are applied with lucid irony. Marin Sorescu (1936–1997) dealt in *parody and in the jocular debunking of habit. Leonid Dimov (1926–1987) inaugurated an "oneiric" movement based on dream imagery and associations of verbal music. Despite adverse political pressures, the feeling that the maintenance of high aesthetic standards is crucial for national survival encouraged the continuation of these efforts, either in the direction of lyrical purity, as in the poems of Sorin Mărculescu (b. 1936) and Ana Blandiana (b. 1942), or in the more open discontent and ethical rage of Ileana Mălăncioiu (b. 1940), Mircea Dinescu (b. 1950), and the dissident Dorin Tudoran (b. 1945). Many of these poets were in the forefront of the 1989 anti-Communist revolution. A new generation emerged soon thereafter, led by the postmodernist Mircea Cărtărescu (b. 1955); the cynical, street-wise Florin Iaru (b. 1955); the elegant religious poet Eugen Dorcescu (b. 1942); and Ion Stratan (1955–2005).

Two things should be added. One is that poetic and aesthetic values occupied a much more prominent place in Romanian culture than in the West: lit. was a respected mode of conveying wisdom and social values. The greater poets and movements were flanked for two centuries by hundreds of minor authors, and only an awareness of these can suggest the thick texture of Romanian poetry. The other is that the Romanian territory was hospitable to lit. written by numerous ethnic groups—Hungarian, Serbian, Saxon Ger., Bukowina Jewish, and others. Important literary figures such as Nikolaus Lenau (1802–50) and Paul Celan (1920–70), besides others mentioned above, originated here and can thus round off our understanding of the landscape of Romanian poetry.

ROMANI POETRY. The ancestors of today's Roma (Gypsies) left northern India ca. 1000 CE and migrated to Europe and later to other parts of the world. Although traditionally regarded as nomadic, many Roma have been sedentary for generations. Persecution, exclusion, injustice, and poverty have characterized much of Romani hist. and find expression in Romani poetry. Romani, a lang. of Indo-Aryan origin, is spoken by numerous Roma, although many also or only speak the dominant tongue of their surroundings. There is no standard literary form of Romani, but there are many spoken dialects. Romani is the vehicle of both oral and written lit., but Roma also compose poetry in non-Romani langs.

Oral traditional poetry, both ritual and lyric, was the only Romani poetry until the mid-20th c. Ritual wedding songs express joy and bittersweet sorrow, while funeral laments articulate the grief of separation. In this Hungarian-Romani lament, the voice of the deceased cries out in the first two stanzas, while the mourner speaks in the third; a tragic sense of the Romani plight is pervasive:

To die, to die, one has to die.
I have to leave my family behind.
Unfortunate as I am,
I must perish this way.

I am wandering and cannot find a place
Where I can put my head down.
I put my head on the soil
Look how much I am suffering!

I live, I live, but for what?
When I do not have a single happy day?
Oh, my God, it is so bad for me.
My life is full of mourning.

(Kertész-Wilkinson)

Oral lyric songs at times celebrate the pleasures of family life, but many more tell of hardship, sorrow, and heartache. Roma proverbially claim that a "Gypsy song is a song that expresses pain and suffering."

In the late 1920s and 1930s, with the founding of Romani jours. in the USSR, Romania, and Yugoslavia, Roma began to voice their concerns in written lit. Literary poetry emerged after World War II. It is primarily *lyric, inspired by oral poetry in both form and content; like Romani song, it overwhelmingly expresses pain. The collective anguish of being Romani in a cruel world permeates the poetry, as do metaphors of traveling and forced migration. The Romani soul is often portrayed as finding solace and shelter in nature.

Bronisława Wajs (1910–87) from Poland, known as Papusza (doll), is considered the mother of Romani poetry. She was discovered in the late 1940s by the poet

Jerzy Ficowski, who translated her verse for publication from Romani to Polish. Papusza's "Tears of Blood" is a moving account of how she and fellow Roma suffered in hiding under Ger. occupation in the 1940s. Her most famous poem, "O Land, I am Your Daughter," also autobiographical, evokes nostalgia and her own sense of being Romani and connecting with nature:

Oh land, mine and afforested,
I am she, your daughter.
The woodlands and plains are singing.
The river and I combine our notes into one Gypsy hymn.
I will go into the mountains in a beautiful swinging skirt made of flower petals.
I shall cry out with all my strength . . .
(Hancock et al.)

Because of her association with Ficowski, who became linked to the Polish government's program to settle Roma after the war, Papusza was ostracized in the mid-1950s by the local Romani community and pressured to lay down her pen. A contemporary of Papusza (known primarily for his prose), Mateo Maximoff (1917–99), was a well-known Rus.-Romani author living in France who wrote poetry in both Fr. and Romani.

A new generation of Romani poets emerged in the 1960s and 1970s. In Western Europe, Sandra Jayat (b. 1938) published Fr. verse starting in 1961. José Heredia Maya (1947–2010) was a prominent Romani poet, essayist, and playwright, whose poems in Sp. have appeared since the 1970s. Romani has developed as a written lang.—although with numerous dialects—and is employed esp. by poets from Eastern Europe. One of the best-known cultural figures of this generation was Leksa Manuš (1942–97) of Latvia. He viewed the migrations and constant struggles of his people with wearied, longing eyes, as in his "Roads of the Roma":

Each night, my God, as I close my eyes,
I see before me the roads of the Roma.
But where, my God, is the long-lost road, the one true road, the one first-traveled?
(Hancock et al.)

Dezider Banga (b. 1939), from Slovakia, published his first volume of lyric poetry in 1964 in Slovak; he has also written in Romani. Rajko Djurić (b. 1947), from Serbia, is a poet and journalist. Writing in Serbian and Romani, he focuses on the hist. and culture of the Roma and depicts the Holocaust and injustices meted out to Roma, often conveying anger and futility in his poems. Originally from Slovakia but presently residing in Belgium, Margita Reiznerová (b. 1945) evokes the burden of persecution in her Romani verse. From Belarus, Valdemar Kalinin (b. 1946) now dwells in England where he writes poetry in Romani and advocates its standardization to unify Roma globally. In Macedonia, where radio and periodicals foster Romani lang. and culture, a circle of poets developed. Šaban Iljaz (b. 1955), from Skopje, is one of the best known of this group; his verse includes bitter meditations on Romani suffering and forced migration.

Romani authors of the 1980s and 1990s were increasingly involved in social causes, e.g., Béla Osztojkán, from Hungary (b. 1948), a prolific poet (and prose writer) who began publishing verse in 1981. Djura Makhotin (b. 1951), a poet, journalist, and musician from Russia, is also a Romani activist. From Romania, Luminița Cioabă (b. 1957) writes in both Romani and Romanian as she embraces the ethnic communities of her world. Among a more recent generation of bards, Alexian Santino Spinelli (b. 1964), a poet, essayist, and musician from Italy, is involved in advancing Romani lang., lit., and music worldwide. Nicolás Jiménes González (b. 1968), from Spain, writes poetry (in Sp.) to promote Romani culture.

While hampered by the lack of a standardized written lang., Romani poets are at the same time part of the wider Eur. trad. and vital instruments in the devel. of genuine Romani culture.

ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS

I. Romantic Poetry and Poetics in the 18th Century
II. 19th-Century Romanticism and Postromanticism

Romantic poetry is a chronologically shifting category whose conception differs not only from nation to nation but often within national trads. The tendency of romantic poetry to elude fixed determination is already apparent in the first explicit definition of its object: "Romantic poetry is a progressive universal poetry" (K.W.F. Schlegel, 1798). Rather than characterizing its aims, content, or style, Schlegel predicates romantic poetry in specifically nonprescriptive terms. Unlike the thrust of his inaugural dictum, Schlegel was, of course, a historically situated critical thinker, whose recognition of *romanticism arose in the wake of pivotal reconceptions of the poetic in the second half of the 18th c.

While the writing of "poetics" in a formulaic or neo-Aristotelian sense had waned by the mid-1700s, theoretical reflection on the fundamental nature and role of poetry became a touchstone for the major philosophical and political, as well as aesthetic, writings of the time. Following the experimental methods advanced in philosophy, natural science, and mathematics by René Descartes, Francis Bacon, Blaise Pascal, G. W. Leibniz, and Isaac Newton, speculation on the "natural" rather than divine origin of humankind's ling. abilities led to a consideration of the essential part played by poetic lang. in human experience and thinking.

I. Romantic Poetry and Poetics in the 18th Century

A. France. An early theory of romantic poetry resulted from the joint investigation of the origins of knowledge and lang. by l'Abée (Etienne Bonnot) de Condillac (1715–80) in the Essai sur l'origine des connoissances humaines (1746). Following John Locke's argument against the theory of innate ideas in the Essay concerning Human Understanding (1689–90), Condillac argued that ideas themselves stem from perceptions and are known through what Locke called "the signs of our ideas," "words." Yet unlike Locke, who maintained a distinction between signs and ideas of things and submitted that one may dispense with signs in contemplating "the reality of things," Condillac argued that signs are "absolutely necessary" to the primary act of reason, the formation of relations between ideas. The relating of ideas (la liaison des idées) through *imagination and reflection is the "single principle" named in the subtitle of the Essai as the source of all understanding; thus, Condillac's inquiry into the origin of knowledge necessarily became an inquiry into the origin of the ling. signs by which ideas are related and knowledge is formed. Part Two of the Essai, on the "origin and progress of language," sketches a hist. in which "natural signs," or "cries of passion," are slowly replaced by "instituted signs" or "articulate sounds." Music, gesture, and dance all refer back to the natural signs of the passions; *metaphor refers forward to articulate sounds in its attempt to "paint" the passions in words. Situating figurative lang. at the crossroads of articulate sound and natural sensory expression, Condillac's poetic theory (v. 2, ch. 8) hypothesizes that all ling. "style" was originally poetic and that poetry and music, articulated in tandem, formed the passionate lang. in which ancient societies first instituted religion and law.

The influence of Condillac's speculations on the poetic origin of lang. appears most prominently in the romantic poetics formulated by Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78) and Denis Diderot (1713–84). In his Discours sur l'origine de l'inégalité parmi les hommes (1754), Rousseau supported Condillac's thesis that the first lang. was one of natural cries and gestures, for which articulate sounds and instituted signs were eventually substituted. The first words, however, are not viewed synesthetically by Rousseau as paintings or copies of gesture and pure sound (see SYNAESTHESIA). Words by nature, Rousseau argued, exist only by common consent and thus paradoxically would already be necessary to the social process by which they are created. On this point, Rousseau took issue with Condillac, whose historical account of the formation of lang. presupposes a kind of preverbal society from which lang. springs.

The link among social relations, lang., and poetics is also established in the Essai sur l'origine des langues (written 1750s), in which Rousseau makes the important theoretical distinction between gestures and words. Gestures are viewed in the Essai as the products of physical "needs," while words are considered the offspring of "passions" or "moral needs." Lang. owes its origin not to "reasoning" (based on needs) but to "feeling," and the langs. of "the first men" were "the languages of poets." With this consideration, romantic poetry achieves one of its first full formulations: poetry does not follow a prior lang. of natural cries and gestures but is itself identical with lang. in its origin. Man's "first expressions were tropes," a "figurative language" that preceded dispassionate or "proper meanings."

The romantic poetry formulated by Diderot also conjoins the theory of the origin of lang. to questions of natural sentiment and theatricality. In the Lettre sur les sourds et les müets (1751), Diderot elaborates an understanding of poetry that pervades his diverse writings, incl. treatises on the technical and natural sciences (primarily in the Encyclopédie, 1751–66), lit. crit., aesthetic crit., and philosophy, and works of drama and fiction. Following Condillac, whom he praised and debated in his earlier Lettre sur les aveugles (1749), Diderot distinguishes between natural and institutional aspects of lang. In order to exemplify a "natural order of ideas" hypothetically correlative with lang. at its origin, Diderot appeals to the gestures employed by deaf mutes. Rather than speculating that gesture preceded articulate sounds, as argued by Condillac and, in part, by Rousseau, Diderot regards such gestures as ongoing evidence of the natural workings of the soul. These he then relates specifically to poetry. Poetry is closer to gesture and the origin of lang. because it combines many simultaneous ideas. His conception of gesture as an "animal language" lacking any form of subordination leads Diderot to a theory of poetry opposed to the basic successivity of lang. as such. Poetry, he argues, is less a discursive than a synchronous medium; fusing movement and simultaneity, it appeals "all at once" (toute à la fois) to the senses, to understanding, and to imagination; rather than rendering verbal, it "paints" the "moving tableau" of "the soul." Diderot describes the combination of movement and stasis in poetry as "a tissue of hieroglyphs superimposed upon each other," a form of lang. that is "emblematic" in the visual sense (see EMBLEM).

B. Germany. Like Diderot, G. E. Lessing (1729–81) understood poetry to be naturally dynamic. Yet his landmark theoretical work Laokoön (1766) definitively distinguishes plastic from verbal art by the same criteria that Diderot's conceptions of poetry had combined, namely, simultaneity and successivity. Gesture, *hieroglyph, painting, emblem, tableau—the pictorial or plastic terms of Diderotian poetry—are for Lessing spatial metaphors that cloud rather than clarify our understanding of poetry. Departing from an observation regarding the recently rediscovered Laocoön statue made by the cl. scholar and archaeologist J. J. Winckelmann (1717–68), in his widely influential Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in der Malerei und Bildhauerkunst (1755)—to wit, "Laocoön suffers as Sophocles' Philoctetes suffers"—Lessing's Laokoön argues why, in actual artistic terms, this can never be the case. For Winckelmann, the statue presents additional evidence of the "noble simplicity and silent greatness" of all Gr. artworks, aesthetic reflections of the supposed balance and serenity of the Gr. soul. By equating the suffering of an apparently self-composed Laocoön with that of Sophocles' dramatic figure, Winckelmann, Lessing argues, overlooks the philological fact that Sophocles devotes whole lines of text to his character's exclamations of anger and groans of pain. The Laocoön statue itself, Lessing reasons further, appears noble solely because its plight is rendered in marble. Winckelmann has taken the effect of the statue's expression for its cause, mistaking a general technical requirement of the plastic arts for a specific psychic reality and failing thereby to distinguish not only between matters of technē and psyche but between the distinct material realities of the different art forms.

Lessing's argument is directed against not so much Winckelmann nor, certainly, antiquity, but the misleading notion commonly underlying aesthetic theory that "painting is mute poetry, and poetry, speaking painting." Effectively refuting (neoclassical) equations of aesthetic media under the aegis of ut pictura poesis*, Lessing's technical distinctions between the arts in Laokoön provide a first theoretical foundation for a fundamental proposition of romantic poetry, namely, the unequaled power of poetry, at not one but any moment, to free the mind of synchronic representational constraints by setting its "imagination" into motion.

Theory of the origin of lang. was pursued in the Abhandlung über den Ursprung der Sprache (1770) of J. G. Herder (1744–1803), who argues equally against divine and mechanistic views of the origin of lang. by asserting that, while humans originally shared the lang. of animals, the inarticulate sounds of pain and passions that, by "natural law" could not be contained within the sufferer, specifically human lang. was formed of a person's unique ability for "reflection," already active within his or her soul even while the person was "mute."

Yet even while disputing his naturalistic account of ling. devel., the Abhandlung remains deeply indebted to Condillac's double epistemological emphasis on the function of "reflection" in lang. formation and thus of lang. itself in thought. Herder considers lang. tantamount to reason in its ability to make "distinctions" and recommends that, rather than developing "hypotheses" of its genesis, students of lang. would do better to collect ling. "data" from every age and domain of human life. This comparative and empirical approach to lang. study is later taken up by Wilhelm von Humboldt (1767–1855), one of the early advocates of comparative ling., lit., and anthropology, whose "Einleitung" to Über die Kawisprache auf der Insel Java (1836) first proposed what we now call the "Sapir-Whorf" hypothesis, namely, that thinking is largely linguistically determined and that individual langs. constitute distinct mental frameworks for thought. In the Kawi-Einleitung, Humboldt also links poetry to music and speculates, like Rousseau before him and G.W.F. Hegel to come, that the "free reign of the spirit" in poetry probably preceded and provoked the "intellectual" institution of prose.

Although he identified ling. competence with reason rather than passion, Herder's interest in poetic lang. was unequivocally romantic, a split commonly attributed to his association with both Immanuel Kant (his professor in Königsberg) and J. G. Hamann (his friend and mentor). Under Hamann's influence, he began to formulate a theory of hist. as progressive revelation (in Auch eine Philosophie der Geschichte zur Bildung der Menschheit, 1774, and Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität, 1793–97) that would be developed later by Hegel and to study the romantic literary models he would share with the young J. W. Goethe (in Strassburg, 1771), such as the OT, Homer, the purported ballads of the 3d-c. Celtic bard Ossian (James Macpherson, pub. 1760–63), folk and popular poetry, and Shakespeare. Like Lessing, he opposed Shakespeare to neoclassical dramatists, praising "the new Sophocles" as an author of "universal nature" whose plays were, in the romantic sense, "historic" rather than generic in conception. His views, pub. in Shakespear (1773), exerted a formative influence on the romantic dramas of the Sturm und Drang* and were reflected in Goethe's Rede zum Shakespeares-Tag (1771). Herder's collection of Volkslieder (1774; 1778–79), suggested by Thomas Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765), called for a return to native med. poetry and contributed to a contemp. revival of the *ballad, incl. Goethe's and Friedrich Schiller's later collaborative efforts (1797). His argument for the affinity of Ger. and Eng. lit. (Über die Ähnlichkeit der mittleren englischen und deutschen Dichtkunst, 1776) was borne out by the return to indigenous forms and themes linking the poetic to common lang. in the romantic poetry of both nations.

C. England. The single figure to dominate discussion of poetry in the second half of the century was Samuel Johnson (1709–84), whose critical writings elaborated not so much a poetics as the achievements and deficiencies of poets. Still, some fundamental criteria remained constants of judgment in Johnson's mind: that all great poetry consists in the new expression of universal or general truths; that these truths are gathered in the observation of *"nature" rather than through poetic *imitation; and (the Horatian dictum) that poetry must provide moral instruction through pleasure—principles Johnson articulated most clearly in Imlac's "Dissertation upon Poetry," ch. 10 of Rasselas (1759); in the "Preface to Shakespeare" (1765); and in the Lives of the Poets (1779–81).

On this basis, Johnson famously faults the *metaphysicals (in the Life of Cowley) for shattering mimetic illusion with a discordia concors* of unnatural *wit and Shakespeare, too, for occasionally composing "swelling figures" in which "the equality of words to things is very often neglected" and being "more careful to please than to instruct." John Milton, on the other hand, sacrifices pleasure to instruction in Paradise Lost, which, while second only to Homer as *epic, lacks "human interest" and is "a duty rather than a pleasure" to read. Johnson's concern in the Dictionary to make "signs" "permanent" reflects his esteem for "the common intercourse of life" as that "style which never becomes obsolete" ("Preface to Shakespeare"), a romantic tenet that achieves greatest prominence in the poetics of William Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge.

Edmund Burke (1729–97), in A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful (1757), examines the psychophysiological composition of the feelings of the *sublime and the beautiful, i.e., which "affections of the mind produce certain emotions of the body" and, reciprocally, what bodily "feelings" produce certain "passions in the mind." On the basis of this view of beauty experienced in independence of reason and rational proportion, Burke criticizes the formal garden in particular for falsely imposed architectural principles on nature (and thus turning "trees into pillars, pyramids, and obelisks"), thereby pointing to the aesthetic domain first called "romantic" in England, landscaping. But it is the sublime, in its power to suggest "ideas of eternity and infinity," that is most closely allied to poetics. In the final part of the Enquiry, Burke argues that the effect of words cannot be explained by way of the sensory, physiological model he has hitherto employed: poetic lang. is not "imitative" of nonlinguistic sensations in that there is no "resemblance" between words and "the ideas for which they stand." Burke's Enquiry thus develops Locke's principle of the arbitrary relations between signs and ideas into a central problematic of romantic poetry. Hypothesizing (as will Wordsworth) that "unpolished people" are given to more "passionate" or sublime expression, he views lang. as a special repository of the sublime because it can join ideas unrelatable by any other medium (citing the example of Milton's "universe of death" as a "union of ideas" "amazing beyond conception," i.e., beyond concrete description). In contrast to the secondary, mimetic status ascribed to tragedy at the outset of the Enquiry, the words of poetry are argued to affect us "sometimes much more strongly" than "the things they represent." Thus, the principle of a necessary equivalence between word and thing that underlies Johnson's crit. of extravagant imagery is superseded in Burke's analysis by the romantic consideration of the disproportionate way in which lang. functions and affects us generally.

D. Italy. The functions of lang. are identified with a theory of hist. in Scienza nuova (1725; rev. ed., 1744) of Giambattista Vico (1668–1744). Rather than hypothesizing a historical origin of lang., Vico finds in lang., its "tropes" and "poetic logic," the origin and devel. of human hist.: his "new science" unites poetry and reality in an essentially romantic poetic. The "fantastic speech" of humankind's "first lang." yielded four fundamental *tropes, or "corollaries of poetic logic," corresponding to distinct phases in the recurrent hist. of human consciousness. Metaphor is identified by Vico with the divine pagan or poetic phase; *metonymy, with the aristocratic or (Homeric) heroic; *synecdoche, with the lawfully democratic or human; *irony, with the period of reflection leading to the dissolution of civil bodies and reemergence of barbarism, followed in turn by the divine, heroic, and human phases of Christianity. Poetic lang. is not the "ingenious inventions of writers" but the "common sense of the human race" and key to the structure of "ideal, eternal history." A more conventional view of poetics characterized the transition to romanticism in the field of It. crit. While Saverio Bettinelli (1718–1808) and Giuseppe Baretti (1719–89) exhorted It. authors to break with cl. norms, the period saw a broad assimilation of diverse literary models in trans. of works extending from the ancients to the Eng. and Fr. "moderns," incl. the pseudoancient Ossian, trans. by philologist and philosopher of lang. Melchiorre Cesarotti (1730–1808).

E. Spain. After the Golden Age of Luis de Góngora and Pedro Calderón de la Barca, poetics, like poetry, suffered an eclipse throughout the 18th c., as a new wave of *classicism arose in response to mannered imitations of the *baroque masters. The major poetic treatise of the century was the Aristotelian Poética (1737) of Ignacio de Luzán (1702–54).

II. 19th-Century Romanticism and Postromanticism

A. Germany. The distinctively rapid devel. of romantic poetry and the flowering of postromanticism owed to two enormously influential and not entirely compatible strains of crit.: the critical theory of Friedrich Schlegel (1772–1829) and the critical epistemology of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804). Kant's restriction of the field of knowledge to "representations" of experience countered, on the one hand, the insistence on the random nature of experience theorized by David Hume, and, on the other, the antiexperiential dogmatic idealism of George Berkeley and Christian Wolff. Kant's critical philosophy—consisting of the Kritik der reinen Vernunft (1781), its summation in the Prolegomena zu einer jeden künftigen Metaphysik, die als Wissenschaft wird auftreten können (1783), the Kritik der praktischen Vernunft (1788), and the Kritik der Urteilskraft (1790)—argues, in opposition to idealism, that all knowledge must be related to sensory objects and, in opposition to skepticism, that our experience of objects is not arbitrary but rather structured a priori by mental forms (e.g., time and space) and relational categories (e.g., causality). Our knowledge of experience is thus not of an object as it is "in itself" (as "noumenon") but of its "representation," the "phenomenon" that our minds construct in the very act of experience. This hypothesis of the phenomenal limits of knowledge in the First Critique is countered by the deduction of a single, necessarily nonphenomenal object of knowledge, the concept of (practical or moral) "freedom," in the Second Critique. Moral freedom, the freedom to act without respect to the welfare of one's own phenomenal being, is the one hypothetical noumenal object of knowledge in Kant's critical system, for without "freedom," all actions would be confined to the causal chain of mentally formed phenomena; thus, no real ground for moral action could exist, nor would there be any "real knowledge" to which we could lay claim, not even that of the phenomenal limits of cognitive reason. At once central to Kant's entire philosophical system and foundational for romantic poetics, the "bridge" (Übergang) between the real freedom of "practical reason" and the limited phenomenal cognitions of "pure reason" occurs in acts of aesthetic judgment; without the mediating power of judgment, Kant stipulates, the entire Critique would collapse into two irreconcilable spheres. Never before had aesthetic experience been considered so essential (rather than detrimental or distracting) to the potency of the mind; the unparalleled position Kant accords aesthetics relates acts of judgment to the separate reasons of knowledge and practical action by way of the distinct categories of the beautiful and the sublime. In the first place, the Third Critique criticizes the loose identification of aesthetics with personal *"taste" in order to prove that aesthetic judgments, no less than phenomenal cognitions and moral actions, are based on universal mental operations. Judgments, however, are neither cognitive nor active but contemplative; aesthetic objects please freely because they are "purposive" forms without practical "purpose" (Zweckmüssigkeit ohne Zweck). In the experience of the beautiful, "imagination and understanding" come together in a state of mutual "free play" (freies Spiel der Einbildungskraft und des Verstandes), while the experience of the sublime brings imagination and reason into conflict. Such conflict arises when the mind encounters an object of which it can make no adequate sensory image but which reason can nonetheless "think": objects that are "absolutely large," that suggest an insuperable "power" in nature or, as does poetic lang., a nonrepresentational power of the mind. This freedom of reason evoked by the sublime links aesthetic judgment to the moral freedom and to such nonimageable "ideas" as totality and infinity. Its analysis of the sublime as the unique juncture between moral action and scientific knowledge made the Kritik der Urteilskraft the seminal articulation of a romantic poetry that would locate the bridge to the sublime itself within poetry.

Friedrich Schiller (1759–1805), Kant's first major proponent in the field of poetics, translates Kant's distinction between phenomenon and noumenon into analogous conceptual categories ("matter" and "form," "the physical" and "the moral," etc.) deriving from the opposing "drives" of sensory experience and reason mediated, as in Kant, by aesthetic experience. In Über das Pathetische (1795) and Über das Erhabene (ca. 1795), and Ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (1795), Schiller effectively dispenses with Kant's Second Critique by identifying moral freedom wholly with aesthetic experience. "Aesthetic freedom" becomes the locus of moral action for Schiller, who, while indebted to Kant, departs significantly from the Critique in defining beauty as the sensory means of making freedom "visible" (Über das Pathetische). His Über Naïve und sentimentalische Dichtung (1795), which names Kant as the source of its theoretical oppositions between "being" and "seeking" nature (the ancients versus mod. admiration for antiquity) and between "feeling" nature and "reflecting" on feeling (*naïve versus sentimental), was credited by K.W.F. Schlegel with altering his appraisal of mod. poetics. While openly disdainful of the systematic nature of Kant's philosophy, Schlegel, once an avatar of classicism (see Über das Studium der griechischen Poesie, 1795), owed his conversion to romantic poetics to the Kantian Schiller and to Kant's devoted follower J. G. Fichte (1762–1814). In his early writings, Schlegel had opposed the harmony of cl. beauty to the "interesting," irregular, and aesthetically unsatisfying creations of "romantic poetry," by which he meant all med. and mod. lit., from chivalric romances through the works of Christoph Martin Wieland. For Schlegel, romantic is no longer a generic or historical category but the name for poetry perpetually in a "state of becoming" that, like irony, "no theory can exhaust," while "other kinds of poetry are finished" and can be "fully analyzed" (Athenäum no. 116). What is romantic is what is "poetry itself," whether written in verse or prose, whether ancient or mod., and what is poetry is "infinite" by dint of its own eternal self-crit. (Athenäum no. 51). As Schlegel defines them, the poles of irony informing all romantic poetry are recognizable from Fichte's Wissenschaftslehre (1794). Intending to "complete" Kant's project, Fichte overreached the essential limits of the Critique by identifying the thing-in-itself with a thinking self or ego capable of positing both itself and all that it perceives as not itself, the material world. But whereas Fichte saw the self-positing ego as freely containing contradiction within it (a self that recognizes the not-self must first be itself), Schlegel's conception of poetic irony never rests on a principle of self-certainty. This is made clearest in the essay written for the last issue of the controversial Athenäum, "Über die Unverständlichkeit" (1800), in which Schlegel describes "the irony of irony" as a "tiring" of irony from which one nonetheless cannot "disentangle oneself," since to speak about irony either nonironically or ironically is still to be caught in irony and thus (as in this "essay on incomprehensibility") not to comprehend fully one's own speech.

Schlegel's conception of perpetual self-crit. takes the form of "infinite" textual interpretation in the works of Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834), an early friend of Schlegel and the author of Vertraute Briefe über Schlegels Lucinde (1800). In his Lectures on Hermeneutics (Vorlesungen über die Hermeneutik, 1819), Schleiermacher described textual *interpretation (see HERMENEUTICS) as a properly philosophical endeavor whose endless "task" is to comprehend texts in terms both of the past and of futurity.

Schlegel's views were popularized by his brother

A. W. Schlegel (1767–1845), cofounder of Athenäum and author of the broadly historical Vorlesungen über dramatische Kunst und Literatur (1808), and reproduced by such contemporaries as J.P.F. Richter (1763–1825), who in his Vorschule der Ästhetik (1804) speculates that metaphors preceded denotative expressions in lang. formation. Karl Solger (1780–1819), in Erwin: Vier Gespräche über das Schöne und die Kunst (1815), a work commended by Søren Kierkegaard in his Concept of Irony (1841), describes "the true realm of art" as the passing of the idea into the particular, that moment of creation and destruction that "we call irony." Schlegel's and Solger's theories of romantic irony are reflected in the critical work of Ludwig Tieck (1773–1853), incl. several volumes devoted to Shakespeare (1811, 1826, 1838, 1920), and the "Fragmente" (Athenäum, 1798) and Dialogen (1798) of Friedrich von Hardenberg (Novalis; 1772–1801). The self-reflexivity of romantic irony is dramatized in supernatural mirrorings of the natural in stories by E.T.A. Hoffmann (1776–1822) and by the absolute absence or absolutely paralyzing presence of self-consciousness in stories and dramas by Heinrich von Kleist (1777–1811).

While the romantic poetry derived from Kant and Schlegel is predominantly synchronic in conception, an essentially diachronic understanding of poetry is developed in the poetry and theoretical essays of Friedrich Hölderlin (1770–1843) and in the philosophy and aesthetics of G.W.F. Hegel (1770–1831). The concern with antiquity pervading Hölderlin's works owes not to a neoclassical idealization of the purported harmony of Gr. art but to a conception of the temporal nature of experience exemplified in ancient poetry and mythological hist. In early lyrics (1801–3), the dramatic fragments of Der Tod des Empedokles (1798–1800), the essays on Empedokles, and the essay Werden im Vergehen (ca. 1799), Hölderlin focuses on the moment of passage, of present becoming past, which, fatal for the individual, at once represents the life of the world and is represented in turn by the signs of lang. Poetry both retells this passage in poetic narrative and embodies its occurrence in the creation of poetic lang. until, in Hölderlin's fragments (1803–6), these two ling. means of representing transience are divided, and signs replace story as the elliptical vehicles of narratives whose own poetic possibility is already past.

The anteriority of art is the overarching theme of Hegel's Vorlesungen über die Ästhetik (1820–29, pub. 1835, 1842), in which the famous statement that "in its highest determination, art for us is that which is past," speaks cryptically for Hegel's entire philosophy of the dialectical becoming of spirit over time. In the Ästhetik, Hegel correlates the epochs of human hist. with different kinds of art distinguished by their structural relationship of intellectual content to form; the dialectical transformation of this relationship signifies the progress of spirit toward ultimate freedom from all relation at the end of time. In keeping with this progressive conception of aesthetics, Schlegel's concept of irony is condemned by Hegel. Departing from Fichte's proposition that all existence is posted by an ego that can also destroy it, Schlegel's irony, Hegel argues, views the artist as a divine *genius who can create and annihilate at will and thus for whom all moral and social relations conducted in reality are also viewed ironically as a "nullity." Hegel praises Solger, whom he distinguishes from Schlegel's followers, for recognizing the negativity of irony as a "dialectical moment of the idea," which, itself negated, reinstates the "general and infinite in the particular." The ironic, Hegel emphasizes, is "only a moment" (in the progress of the idea or spirit) and, as such, pertains to the diachronic dialectic between human hist. and the universal spirit rather than the Fichtean principle of absolute subjectivity.

Arthur Schopenhauer (1788–1860) rejected Hegel's philosophy of spirit entirely and based his Welt als Wille und Vorstellung (1819) on Kant's Critique, which he, like Fichte, claimed to complete. For Schopenhauer, the thing-in-itself is not the Fichtean self but the will, represented in all temporally and spatially structured appearances. Reducing Kant's categories to the mechanism of causality, Schopenhauer argues that only disinterested artistic genius is freed from the causal chain of willed representations. The highest forms of art are poetry and music, the latter being a pure reflection, rather than worldly representation, of the will. In Parerga (1819), Schopenhauer discusses general aspects of poetics and literary style, observing that the best authors write "objectively" by employing the "concrete" means of everyday lang., using "common words to say uncommon things." Misjudged for this reason in their own lifetimes, their genius comes to inform the life of the "whole species."

Schopenhauer's philosophy of will influenced Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), whose writings effectively transferred romanticism into the 20th c. In Die Geburt der Tragödie (1872), Nietzsche rewrites the cl. conception of Gr. antiquity by arguing that combative tendencies underlie its poetry: the Dionysian spirit of music and the Apollonian spirit of imaging. The Dionysian, prompting man's "highest symbolic faculties," is a state of intoxication that destroys the individual as it expresses "the essence of Nature," while the Apollonian imagines a world of "beautiful appearances" delimited by the scale of the individual. Nietzsche commends Schiller, among the Ger. "classicists," for recognizing "the musical mood" that precedes the act of poetic imaging and analyzes the figure of the tragic hero as an image meant to turn us, through the experience of compassion, from the Dionysian to the individual. Nietzsche does not suggest that poetry is ever entirely Dionysian, i.e., is the music from which it originates, but rather that, within tragedy, the Dionysian and Apollonian are eventually compelled to speak "each other's language" and that, in this exchange, the "highest aim of tragedy and of art in general is reached." The thesis that music is the essential romantic art form appears repeatedly in the late Der Wille zur Macht (1901), in which romantic art is also equated with "a makeshift substitute for defective 'reality,'" and Gustave Flaubert is called a "postromantic" for having translated the "romantic faith in love and the future" into "the desire for nothing." Thus, Nietzsche already sees romantic art as postromantic or self-retrospective (not unlike Hegel), while distinguishing it from romanticism, whose "most fundamental form" he identifies as "German Philosophy as a whole" (Leibniz through Schopenhauer).

Nietzsche's contemporary Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911) pursued the psychological strain in interpretation Schleiermacher had proposed. In Das Leben Schleiermachers (1870), Die Entstehung der Hermeneutik (1900), and Das Erlebnis und die Dichtung (1905), Dilthey argued that an author's life could be "reconstructed," by methods as demonstrable as those of the natural sciences, into a larger theory of historical knowledge. While his grounding of the "human sciences" in psychology limited his hermeneutics to individual hists., Dilthey's attention to the temporal basis of poetry proved influential on the philosophy of Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), a characteristic (perhaps the only one) he shared with Nietzsche.

B. England. William Wordsworth (1770–1850) and S. T. Coleridge (1772–1834) considered incl. a critical intro. to the 2d ed. of their joint poems; the ensuing Preface to the Lyrical Ballads (1800), written by Wordsworth, may be the single most important document of Eng. romantic poetry. The immediate aim of the Preface was to describe that aspect of the Lyrical Ballads that made them "so materially different" from the poetry of the day: their lang. The Lyrical Ballads, Wordsworth states, relate "common life" in the "real language of men," the properly "philosophical" lang. he opposes to conventional "poetic diction." First arguing that the presence of *meter alone distinguishes poetry from prose, he then states that only "matter of Fact, or Science" is meaningfully distinguished from "Poetry," since meter also enters "naturally" into the composition of prose. Meter maintains "something regular" in the reading of "words" that, "in themselves powerful," "produce" "an unusual and irregular state of the mind": those who use it merely to "accompan[y]" "colours of style" "greatly underrate the power of metre in itself." Similarly, when used as mere "mechanical devices," such rhetorical "colours" are a deadening substitute for the "figures" that arise naturally in our impassioned interaction with the "objects" around us. Recalling Rousseau, Wordsworth regards unmannered, rustic lang. as a more "permanent" and "philosophical" lang. than that of authors intent only on feeding "fickle appetites of their own creation." This view may have led to his mischaracterization as a sentimentalist and the commonplace abbreviation of the definition of poetry that, in its truncated version, has become the best-known phrase in the Preface ("all good poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings"), but that, as Wordsworth in fact composed it, continues past a full colon to oppose "feelings" to the equally powerful, and more valuable, basis of poetry in long-term "thought" (". . . feelings: and though this be true, Poems to which any value can be attached were never produced . . . but by a man who . . . had also thought long and deeply").

Other definitions in the Preface—such as "Poetry is the first and last of all knowledge"; "Poetry is the most philosophic writing" (following Aristotle) in that its "object" is "general and operative" rather than "individual and local" "truth"; and "the Poet binds together by passion and knowledge the vast empire of human society"—clearly indicate a poetics that, instead of substituting feeling for knowledge, finds its only true relation in poetry, a view Wordsworth extends beyond his own or other contemp. poetry to the "judgment" of "the greatest Poets both ancient and modern." In the "Appendix" to the Preface, Wordsworth elaborates his crit. of "poetic diction," underscoring that, with regard to "works of imagination and sentiment," a single lang. is used for both verse and prose. His introduction of the historical argument, familiar from 18th-c. romantic poetry, that the "figurative" lang. of the "earliest poets" was the "language of men" animated by "passion," links Wordsworth to Condillac, Vico, Diderot, and Rousseau, among others.

Coleridge's Biographia Literaria (1817), a mixture of biographical narrative, crit., speculation, and trans. and summary (esp. of Schelling, Fichte, and Kant), draws a distinction (ch. 12) between imagination, the "shaping or modifying power," and *fancy, the "aggregative and associative power," thereby disagreeing with Wordsworth, who held that the imagination shared these latter powers but used them differently to more permanent ends (1815 Preface). Coleridge criticized Wordsworth's view of the lasting value of the lang. of rustic life, arguing that such lang. itself varies "in every county" and that whatever is invariable and universal in lang. should not be identified with any particular class (ch. 17). Echoing the distinction drawn by Schiller between the "naïve" and "sentimental," Coleridge indicated the existence of a "secondary," recreative "echo" of the "primary" imagination (ch. 13), while defining poetry generally as the joining in imagination of good sense, fancy, and motion (ch. 14).

In the letters of John Keats (1795–1821), the identification of truth with beauty (already ambiguously evoked in the context of "Ode on a Grecian Urn" [1819]) is questioned in intensely speculative formulations relating beauty to the "passions" while truth to dispassionate "abstraction" while comparing the truth of imagination to an earthly "dream." Keats's contrast between the "delights" of sensation and the desire for truth opposes pure sensation, described as "falling" through "space" and "being blown up again" "continually," to sensations experienced "with knowledge" and "without fear." *"Negative capability," the capacity for "being in uncertainties" that Keats attributed not to himself but to Shakespeare, contrasts sharply with the either/or constructions that often propel his own poems.

P. B. Shelley (1792–1822), an early admirer of Keats, asserts a poetics that surely would have struck Keats as post-Wordsworthian, in that it admits no rival creative power to poetry at all. His Defence of Poetry (1821) ascribes to imaginative poetic works the ethical character of civilization itself, placing the greatest poets (Dante through Milton) above philosophers (Locke through Rousseau) in their influence on "the moral nature of man." Shelley's sweeping overview of the part played by poetry in the hist. of civilization responds to Thomas Love Peacock's thesis, in The Four Ages of Poetry (1820), that, as civilization develops, poetry must decline. Shelley argues that civilization is, rather, the result of poetry and that poetry produces humanity's "moral improvement" not by teaching moral doctrine but by enlarging the power of imagination by which people put themselves "in the place of another." Poetry alone exerts this power over "the internal world," whereas the "external" progress of the empirical sciences incurs human beings' "enslavement." Like Burke in the *Enquiry (*and, later, Hegel in his Aesthetics), Shelley considers lang. to be more "plastic" than the plastic arts since it is "arbitrarily produced by the imagination" and so relates "to thoughts alone." Recalling lang. theorists on the continent, Shelley also equates "language itself" with "poetry," asserting that, at the beginning of hist., all authors were poets and that lang. at its origin resembled "the chaos of a cyclical poem." At the same time, because poetry stimulates moral speculation, poets also originally authored all "laws" and "civil society" and, the Defence concludes, remain "the unacknowledged legislators of the world."

Following the self-romanticizing identification of poetics with personality in the life and poetry of Lord Byron (1788–1824), Eng. romanticism yields to a series of postromantic attempts to overreach, or retreat from, its poetics. Poetic thought after romanticism divides between doctrinal classicism and pictorially based aestheticism, and works of prose crit. that take on a poetic life of their own. In Sartor Resartus (1833–34), the first major postromantic critic, Thomas Carlyle (1795–1881) presents a Philosophy of Clothes (espoused by one Diogenes Teufelsdröckh, professor of Things in General at the University of Weissnichtwo [I-Don't-Know-Where]), that defines clothing as "whatsoever represents Spirit to Spirit." From all the "garments," the imagination "weaves" to reveal the otherwise invisible creations of reason, Carlyle distinguishes "language," understood instead as "the Body of thought," whose "muscles and tissue" are the old and new "Metaphors" of which lang. is composed.

A postromantic emphasis on the essentially poetic nature of prose is the theme of John Ruskin (1819–1900) in Sesame and Lilies (1865), a series of lectures aimed at answering the question "Why to read?," that contrasts the literal act of reading "syllable by syllable—nay, letter by letter," with all more or less accidental or associative forms of verbal communication. In Modern Painters (2 v., 1846), he distinguishes "Poetical" from "historical Painting," the former being "imaginative," the latter, a relation of "plain facts," and coins the phrase *"pathetic fallacy" to describe self-projecting metaphoric lang. that, while betraying an ungoverned "weakness of character," may be true to the emotion expressed.

Matthew Arnold (1822–88), a neoromantic poet who disavowed romanticism in the Preface to his collected Poems (1853) and the first layman to be made professor of poetry at Oxford (1857), reintroduced a Johnsonian strain into crit. Arnold defines the terms classic, classical as meaning of "the class of the very best" (The Study of Poetry, 1880) and broadly describes the function of crit. of the classics so defined as "a disinterested endeavour to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world" (The Function of Criticism at the Present Time, 1864; intro. to Essays in Criticism, 1865). Arnold's advocacy of "disinterested" crit. and the greatness of the classics proffers the one in support of the other without specifying what constitutes either, or, for that matter, poetics generally; in order to recognize "the best," he suggests in circular fashion, one need only memorize *"touchstone" lines from recognized masters. His praise of stylistic simplicity in the Preface recalls Johnson, while his exclusion of Chaucer, commended for a "sound representation of things," from the ranks of the classics, owes, Arnold asserts, to that poet's lack of "high seriousness."

The *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood of W. H. Hunt (1827–1910), D. G. Rossetti (1828–82), W. M. Rossetti (1829–1919), and J. E. Millais (1829–96) proposed a postromantic return to *naturalism in a renewed cooperation of painting and verse replacing academic rules of composition (conventional since Raphael) by highly detailed representation: in imitation of the med. allegorical trad., etchings accompanied poems in the Pre-Raphaelite journal The Germ (1850). Even while laying claim to med. "sincerity," the return of the ut pictura poesis topos informing the Pre-Raphaelite "return to nature" after romanticism yielded not naturalism but *aestheticism. The movement was rapidly adopted by Walter Pater (1839–94), who, in his review of Poems by William Morris (1868), famously commended "the love of art for art's sake." Pater's singular emphasis on beauty as an immediate sensuous experience based in "a certain kind of temperament" (The Renaissance, 1873) gave way inevitably to the fetishism of feeling associated with *decadence.

Crit. reflection emerged with a new vigor, however, in the writings of Oscar Wilde (1854–1900). The Decay of Lying (1889) brings the nature of the relationship between art and lived experience again into question by provocatively asserting that life imitates art and that the "ages" of the human spirit (by a turn on Hegel) symbolize aesthetic devels. rather than the other way around. Neatly reversing the mimetic principle by arguing that "facts" attempt to "reproduce fiction," Wilde moves beyond the limits of purely sensuous aesthetic criteria by returning, albeit in radically polemical form, to the romantic problem of mental perception. Wilde's ultimate conclusion that, like human life, nature too imitates the lit. that "anticipates" it, is based on the distinction he draws between mechanically "looking at a thing" and "seeing" it. Nature is only seen when its beauty is perceived, and that perception, like cognition itself, is not immediate but always mediated by "the Arts that have influenced us:" "we do not know anything" about nature until aesthetic detours permit us to "see" it. Closely related to perception, in "The Critic as Artist" (1890), is crit. Like the misconceived notion of "unimaginative realism" (exemplified for Wilde by Émile Zola), crit. does not imitate but reveal: it is not aimed at "discovering" the "real intention" of the artist, whose capacity to "judge" is limited by his creative ability. Crit. instead "leads us" to the future creations suggested by the work of art as the critic "sees" it; "new" art works are thus already old with regard to the crit. that foresees them. As if to demonstrate, in the manner Wilde describes, this critical proposition, the poetry of his own age lagged behind his notion of crit. Bombastic neoromantic styles, such as that of A. C. Swinburne (1837–1909), were countered in part by the spare dramatic *monologue developed by Robert Browning (1812–89) and the recasting of Shakespearean love poetry in the Sonnets from the Portuguese (1850) by Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806–61), whose critically successful "novel-poem," Aurora Leigh (1856), influenced by Mme. De Staël's Corinne (1807), was praised again by Virginia Woolf (Times Literary Supplement, 1931; see NARRATIVE POETRY). The dynamic poems of G. M. Hopkins (1844–89), whose posthumous publication in 1918 contributed to their classification as modernist, combined dense, sensuous lang. with the contrapuntal tension of Hopkins's own *"sprung rhythm," described in the Author's Preface as suggesting "two or more strains of tune going on together." Closer to romanticism than the ensuing postromanticisms of their time, Hopkins's poems recall the phrase by Wilde that most aptly describes the age: "Life goes faster than realism, but romanticism is always in front of life" (The Decay of Lying).

C. United States. The convergence of romanticism with liberal Protestantism produced a new movement that began in 1836 with the meetings of four active or one-time Unitarian ministers, most famous among them R. W. Emerson (1803–82). The movement took the name Transcendentalism, borrowing the term transcendental from Kant, whom Emerson and others understood, often imperfectly, through the mediation of Coleridge (see TRANSCENDENTALISTS). The most condensed statement of Transcendentalist poetics is Emerson's essay "The Poet" (1844), in which he describes poets as "liberating gods," who by means of tropes enable readers of poetry to recognize in the natural world correspondences with the supernatural. (Like Blake, Emerson was influenced by Emanuel Swedenborg's notion of correspondence.) Emerson's exalted notion of the poet anticipated the visions of Walt Whitman (1819–92) in Leaves of Grass, esp. in the Preface to the 1st ed. of 1855 and in "Song of Myself," and Emily Dickinson (1830–86), whose poems and letters brim with romantic images, both explicit and cryptic, of the poet, lang., nature, and desire. The romantic poetry of E. A. Poe (1809–49) anticipated, while it differed from, Pater's "art for art's sake" credo by stating that, while the "poem [is] written solely for the poem's sake" and poetry is "the rhythmical creation of Beauty" ("The Poetic Principle," 1850), the melancholic mood of beauty could only be achieved through analytic craft ("The Philosophy of Composition," 1846), ideas that, furthered by Poe's Fr. translator and advocate Charles Baudelaire, exerted singular influence on romantic and modernist poetics in France.

D. France. Romanticism arrived late in France and was disrupted early and long. Just as the Fr. Revolution was linked to the romanticism of Rousseau, ensuing political upheavals and displacements played a major role in the fractious hist. of Fr. romantic poetry. This is most evident in the writings of François René de Chateaubriand (1768–1848), whose crit. of Shakespearean drama for its untempered representation of nature, in Essai sur la littérature anglaise (1801) and concurrently his romantic novel Atala, were followed by Le Génie du Christianisme (1802), whose assimilation of romanticism to religion, favored by Napoleon, was expanded into an identification of Christianity with human liberty in Memoires d'Outre Tombe (1848–50). By contrast, the romanticism of Mme. De Staël (1766–1817) linked the devel. of lit. with political freedom rather than religious belief; her De l'Allemagne, advocating the importance of Ger. romantic philosophy and lit. for France, was suppressed by Napoleon (1811; pub. in London, 1813). In Racine et Shakespeare (1823), Stendhal (Marie Henri Beyle, 1783–1842) transposed the Fr. debate between cl. and romantic poetry from contemp. political (proroyalist, or "ultra," versus liberal) into larger temporal terms, arguing that any new literary form is "romantic" in its time, while Victor Hugo (1802–85) unequivocally identified romantic drama with contemp. liberalism in his "Préface de Cromwell" (1827).

In addition to the political allegiances dividing proponents of classicism from those of romanticism in 19th-c. France, a division also developed, unlike any in Germany or England, between poets and critics. C. A. Sainte-Beuve (1804–69) stressed a psychological and personality-oriented approach to authors in his Portraits littéraires (1862–64) and Portraits contemporains (1869–71), a view expanded into the conception of lit. as a function of documentable social factors by Hippolyte Taine (1828–93) and as grounded in empirical scientific methods by Émile Zola (1840–1902). Yet while different forms of positivism informed the poetry advocated critically, nothing could be less positivistic in outlook than the poetry written during this period. While differing in style and temperament, the first significant poets of the century, Alphonse Marie Louis de Lamartine (1790–1869), (Comte) Alfred Victor de Vigny (1797–1863), Hugo, and Alfred de Musset (1810–57), were all romantic in their turn from conventional cl. themes and strict *alexandrine meter to the more malleable prosody of emotive verse. Still, the lyrics of the poet viewed posthumously as the greatest of the century, Charles Baudelaire (1821–67), indicate the endurance of a dialectic between classicism and romanticism within Fr. poetry. Focusing on the mundane and the abstract, sounding high themes and low, the cl. rigor of his Fleurs du mal (1857, 1861, 1868) gave lived reality the quality of dreamed or perpetually receding meaning and identified allegory and myth with the contemp. landscape of the city. Just as his Peintre de la vie moderne (1863) defines the fleeting "present" aesthetically by its already dated "representation," Baudelaire's romanticism rejects from the outset any possibility of naturalism; in "Correspondances," his most famous lyric, "nature" is immediately equated with a meaningful construct, "a temple," and "forests" are composed of "symbols." Baudelaire's imagistic precision, graceful versification, and unsurpassed control of Fr. poetic diction made him one of the early *Parnassians, a group that rejected undisciplined effusions for a new romantic decorum.

Paul Verlaine (1844–96) was more neoromantic than Parnassian in his emphasis on the suggestive quality of poetry. His views proved influential for the poets of vers libre* but were later retracted by Verlaine on the grounds that the new poetry, lacking all rhythm, bordered too closely on prose. Arthur Rimbaud (1854–91) described his poetics as a form of self-induced vision, arguing that poets must make themselves voyants through a purposeful "disordering of the senses." For Rimbaud, all romantic poets, but above all Baudelaire, have been voyants. Like "critics," he states however, "romantics" themselves have never been able properly to "judge romanticism," from which follows the famous agrammatical dictum "car Je est un autre" (for I is another), by which the self, identified by being "disordered" with what is not the self, acquires the double (creative and reflective) vision of the voyant. Although Rimbaud probably wrote his last poetry at the age of 19, the influence by the end of the century of his already repudiated Illuminations (1886) was matched only by the work of the poet least like him in life, Stéphane Mallarmé (1842–98).

Mallarmé, who was employed as a lycée teacher until his retirement at 51, worked at eliminating the visual from poetic lang. in any sense but that of the graphic display of letters on the page, as in the late Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice, 1897), the prototype of modernist *concrete poetry. His formal manipulation of the rule of syntax and immediate power of sound in the composition of grammatical and semantic labyrinths defying image-based interpretation seems to invest lang. itself with a density outweighing any particular sense made of it. Just as, in "Le Tombeau d'Edgar Poe" (1877), "eternity" alone "changes" "the poet" "into himself," so Mallarmé's compressed poetic lang. seems to acquire inexhaustible substance by severing itself from all worldly service, an extreme version of the negative factor of temporality informing the trad. of romantic poetry within which it remains.

E. Italy. Romanticism was at first a distinctly political movement focused on the "revolutionary" figure of Napoleon; the Ultime lettere di Jacopo Ortis (1802) of Niccolò Foscolo (1778–1827) added the motive of political disillusion to the suicide of its Wertherian hero. The downfall of Napoleon and the treaty of Vienna (1815) contributed to a new affiliation of liberal thinking with romanticism whose major literary forum was the journal Il Conciliatore (1818–19). The poetry of Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837), the most important of the 19th c., involved a romantic tension of aspiration and deception that was not directly political in nature. With the achievement of national unity after decades of struggle incl. the imprisonment or exile of many authors in the romantic movement, It. romanticism began to wane. Giosuè Carducci (1835–1907) wrote lyrics of renewed cl. vigor reflecting an antireligious, realist spirit most reminiscent of the Fr. philosophes. The formulation of a philosophical approach to lit. crit. first appeared in the essays and Storia della letteratura italiana (1870–71) of Francesco de Sanctis (1818–83), which aimed at establishing critical practices uninfluenced by particularities of politics, religion, or taste. Gabriele D'Annunzio (1863–1938), poet, novelist, playwright, and the single most significant It. literary figure of the latter 19th c., was also one of the most internationally informed; his literary "decadence" was greatly influenced by the Fr. postromantic poets and Nietzsche.

Earlier Ger. idealism, by contrast, shaped the Filosofia dello spirito: estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale (1902) of Benedetto Croce (1866–1952). Equating art with instinctive, as opposed to conceptual, knowledge, Croce's Filosofia subordinated hist. to aesthetics. It argued that classicism and romanticism represent not historical categories but rather views of the artistic *symbol as either extrinsic or intrinsic to the content of art. Reviving 18th-c. origin-of-lang. debates, Croce suggested that lang. itself is art in a state of "perpetual creation." Reaction against Croce's own idealism soon inspired the It. futurists (see FUTURISM).

F. Russia. Classicism in the Western Eur. sense had never been a fully integrated literary force, while the 18th-c. lit. of sensibility exerted a considerable influence. Romanticism was identified most strongly with Lord Byron and the circle surrounding Alexander Pushkin (1799–1837), whose unsentimental portrayal of a jaded Byronic hero in Evgenij Onegin (1825–32) used realism to reveal the dramatic insufficiency of high romantic narrative style. A jaded Satan in love with a mortal woman is the doubly alienated Byronic hero of the long poem The Demon (1829–40) by M. Y. Lermontov (1814–41), whose mod. syntax and complex first-person narrative, contrasting sharply with Pushkin's classically harmonious verse, are forerunners of the symbolist movement at the close of the century. Influenced by Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, and Rus. mysticism, the symbolists discounted traditional poetics. Foremost among them were Konstantin Bal'mont (1867–1943), whose crystalline sonnets recall Baudelaire; Valery Bryusov (1873–1924), whose experimental meters and imagery introduced an exotic effect; Andrei Bely (Boris Bugayev; 1880–1934), known for his devel. of the *prose poem; and Alexander Blok (1880–1921), whose symbolism was linked to mysticism. The exhaustion of *symbolism in Russia and a renewed concern with cl. lit. as revelatory of the historical and temporal dimension of poetry inform the lyrics of the imprisoned Osip Mandelstam (1892–1938). Mandelstam's attention to compositional perfection, characteristic of Rus. *acmeism, recalls the Fr. postromantic Parnassians.

G. Spain. The return of exiled liberal writers after the death of Ferdinand VII in 1833 led to a belated experimentation with Byronesque romanticism in the works of José de Espronceda (1808–42) and José Zorrilla (1817–93). The most popular romantic Sp. drama, Don Álvaro (1835) by Ángel de Saavedra (Duke of Rivas, 1791–1865), echoed the succès fou of its Fr. model, Hugo's Hernani (1830). The most important critical documents were the Discurso sobre el influyo que ha tenido la crítica moderna en la decadencia del teatro antiguo español (1830) of Agustín Durán (1793–1862), which praised native med. Sp. lit. as truly romantic, and El clasicismo y romantismo (1838) of Juan Donoso Cortés (1809–53). The first Sp. romantic poetry devoid of Byronism, the Rimas (El libro de los gorriones, 1868) of Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer (1836–70), later praised by such critics as Dámaso Alonso as the starting point of all mod. Sp. poetry, combined relatively simple poetic lang. with great economy of diction. Bécquer was probably influenced by newly collected Andalusian folk poetry, as Galician folk songs were to influence the Cantares gallegos (1863) of Rosalía Castro (1837–85), who wrote in Galician rather than Castilian (see GALICIA, POETRY OF). The most important Sp. critic of the 19th c., Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo (1856–1912), is generally credited with singlehandedly creating a critical and historical framework for the study of Sp. lit. His scholarly renewal of Sp. literary culture, in such works as Historia de las ideas estéticas en España (1833–91), Antología de poetas líricos castellanos (1890–1908), and Ensayos de crítica filosófica (1892), contributed to the liberal and nationally oriented Generation of 1898, which included Miguel de Unamuno (1864–1937), the individualist philosopher, and José Ortega y Gasset (1883–1955), whose studies in Germany (of Kant in particular) influenced his philosophical critique of art (La dehumanización del arte, 1925). Finally, Spain's greatest 20th-c. poet, Federico García Lorca (1898–1936), is also its greatest romantic. His Romancero Gitano (1928), a collection of poems modeled on Andalusian ballads, elevated native poetic forms to the level of the Ren. and baroque masters. In the dramatic trilogy of Bodas de Sangre (1933), Yerma (1934), and La Casa de Bernarda Alba (1936); in elegies such as Llanto por Ignacio Sanchez Mejías (1935); and in his short lyrics, García Lorca's impassioned imagery, rhythmic sonority, and limpid diction may be compared with Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads and Baudelaire's Fleurs du mal in the impact they exerted on an entire national literary trad., already marking this poet as Spain's most significant mod. romantic at the time of his murder by a Falangist firing squad during the Sp. Civil War.

ROMANTICISM

I. European
II. British and American

I. European. Romanticism (Ger. Romantik, Fr. romantisme, Rus. romantizm) was the leading aesthetic and intellectual trend in the first half of the 19th c. Its most important common denominators were the emphasis on individual consciousness in its tense relationship with the material and social environment and cultivation of loosely structured artistic forms rife with fragmentation, discontinuities, and stylistic and emotional contrasts. The hist. of romanticism can be divided into three periods: early (mid-1790s–1800s), when the philosophical foundations of romantic consciousness were formulated; middle or "high" (1810s–40s), when romanticism spread throughout Europe; and late (after 1848), when vestiges of its heritage maintained their presence in a postromantic world.

Romanticism had numerous predecessors in the 18th c., from the critique of rationalism by J. G. Herder, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and J. G. Fichte, to preromantic literary practices (sentimentalism, Sturm und Drang*; see PREROMANTICISM) conceptualized by Friedrich Schiller as "sentimental poetry." The romantic movement proper emerged in the mid-1790s in Jena in writings of the Athenaeum, a jour. whose chief contributors were the Schlegel brothers, Friedrich (1772–1829) and August Wilhelm (1767–1845); Novalis (1772–1801); Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834); and Ludwig Tieck (1773–1853). Outside the Athenaeum circle, similar philosophical views and features of poetics were developed by Friedrich Hölderlin (1770–1843).

Romanticism sprang to life in response to Immanuel Kant's (1724–1804) critique of pure reason, out of the sense of metaphysical anxiety caused by Kant's exposure of the contingency of cognition, which left consciousness confined in a priori categories and thereby cut off the infiniteness of the "world in itself" transcendent to those categories. Early romantics rejected the remedy offered by Idealist philosophy (Fichte), which consisted in proclaiming the absoluteness of subjective consciousness, thus making it the noncontingent anchor of cognition. The romantics strove to approach the transcendent world without losing sight of its objective existence independent of consciousness. The early romantic solution to this dilemma consisted in making Kantian pure reason "impure" by invading it with free-flowing fantasy. An emphasis on the free, creative fantasy as an inexorable component of reflection stood behind the choice of the provocative term romantic, a word traditionally associated with overblown fantasies carried to the point of being ridiculous and bizarre. The notion of "romantic poetry," introduced by K.W.F. Schlegel in the collective series of "Athenaeum Fragments" (1798), signified a dynamic mode of creativity driven by an unceasing pursuit of an unreachable yet anticipated ideal. Fragmentation and discontinuity, brought to reflection by the uncontrollable and unpredictable creative element, "potentialized" all phenomena (Novalis, "Blütenstaub" [Grains of Pollen]), setting their cognition into a "progressive" (i.e., unceasingly evolving) commotion, in which they ever approximate yet never achieve the absolute. A "marriage" of rational thought and untamed fantasy turns metaphysical reflection into an open-ended narrative of the "philosophical years of learning" (from the title of K.W.F. Schlegel's work), while products of free creativity emerge illuminated by romantic *irony—a concept of key importance understood as exposing, by means of metareflection, the relative and transient character of any artistic and intellectual achievement.

Among early literary examples of romantic philosophical doctrine were Novalis's Heinrich von Ofterdinger (posthumously pub., 1802) and Hölderlin's Hyperion (1797–99), works that introduced fragmentary novelistic narrative, and K.W.F. Schlegel's novel Lucinde (1799), whose discourse comprised freely juxtaposed third-person narrative, philosophical dialogues, and embedded stories. Although J. W. Goethe did not belong to the romantic movement and later condemned its penchant for disorder as "sick," some of his works showed a kinship with romantic ideology and aesthetics. In particular, Faust (1st pt., 1808) explored quintessential features of the romantic hero: the sense of being imprisoned in his subjectivity and the yearning for the "real" world, resulting in perpetual restlessness and never-satisfied longings. An important role in the Athenaeum heritage belonged to trans. (Shakespeare's plays by A. W. Schlegel, Cervantes's Don Quixote by Tieck), which contributed to the eventual "globalization" of Eur. lit. under the auspices of romanticism.

Principles of Ger. romanticism found an early resonance in England and France. William Wordsworth (1770–1850), in the Preface to his and S. T. Coleridge's (1772–1834) Lyrical Ballads (1798–1802), advocated a poetic lang. devoid of any conventional rhetorical flourish and argued for the importance of ordinary life experiences as catalysts of reflection. Wordsworth's idea of "spots of time" (The Prelude, 1805, pub. 1850) designated revelational moments that punctuate the incremental process of personal devel. François René de Chateaubriand (1768–1848), in his short novels Atala (1801) and René (1802), carried the never-satisfied quest of the Faustian romantic character to an exotic locus: having fled civilization, René seeks harmony in the world of the Am. Indians, whom he initially perceives as being blissfully united with *nature. Yet the meeting of the world of nature and the world of self-conscious civilization leads to nothing but a series of catastrophes, in which all the protagonists are eventually destroyed.

With the advent of high romanticism, principles of romantic art, alongside features of "romantic" consciousness and behavior, spread across ling. barriers, cultural trads., and artistic media. In this process, romanticism largely abandoned the relativizing critique that was central for the early romantics in favor of utopian or mystical dreams of an all-encompassing organic synthesis, typically under the auspices of the national collectivity. These trends drew strong crit. from authors who otherwise were not alien to romantic psychological insights and aesthetic innovations. Heinrich Heine's (1797–1856) polemical essay Die romantische Schule (The Romantic School, 1833–35) was particularly influential in shaping the image of romanticism as a regressive movement that retreats from modernity into mystical otherworldliness and the idealized national past. Yet the high romantic exalted vision of the messianic role of art resulted in high and manifold aesthetic achievements.

In France, high romanticism opened with the polemic between "classics" and "romantics," which rapidly spread to many other lands. The advent of the "new school" was proclaimed in numerous *manifestos, most notably Stendhal's (1783–1842) Racine and Shakespeare (1823) and Victor Hugo's (1802–85) preface to Hernani (1830). They declared a revolt against the neoclassical "rules" of Nicolas Boileau's (1636–1711) poetics, and ultimately, against any conventional constraints, claiming the sole responsibility of an artist to be the exploration of all the complexities and contradictions of the human soul by any artistic means at his or her disposal. The Parisian cultural scene at large presented itself as a romantic discontinuous narrative of a kind, with a flamboyant variety and incessant commotion of personalities, events, and ideas.

In Germany, the romantic metaphysics received a new ground in Friedrich Schelling's (1775–1854) Systeme des transzendentalen Idealismus (System of Transcendental Idealism, 1800). Schelling cast the central romantic concept of duality of the world of spirit and the world of nature into complementary polarities that are longing to meet, with the spirit perpetually exerting itself in a pursuit of the organic unity of the world of nature, while nature languishes in its inability to reflect on and express itself. The synthesis is to be achieved by a philosopher or an artist of *genius, whose work emerges as an act of free, creative will yet possesses the organic harmony of nature. The romantic cult of the "absolute" genius—Goethe, Pushkin, Shakespeare, Dante, Mozart—ensued from this idea. With its longing for the absolute, high romanticism gave rise to revelatory utopian visions, either mystical (William Blake's Jerusalem, 1804–20) or revolutionary (P. B. Shelley's Prometheus Unbound, 1820).

High romantic *organicism awakened interest in folklore and "primitive" cultures, the prehistoric past, and the collective ling. consciousness as domains in which vestiges of primordial harmony withstood the fragmentation of mod. civilization. Wilhelm von Humboldt (1767–1835) spoke of lang. as the vessel of the collective memory of a nation, whose forms bear an imprint of its "character" and historical destiny. Achim von Arnim (1781–1831) and Clemens Brentano's (1778–1842) collection of folk poems, Des Knaben Wunderhorn (The Youth's Magic Horn, 3 v., 1805–8), alerted Germany and eventually all Europe to the treasures of folk consciousness and artistry. Particularly in smaller Eur. nations, the rising national self-consciousness and national lang. tended to be focused on a single figure of the "national" poet: Karel Mácha (1810–36) in Czech, Mihai Eminescu (1850–89) in Romanian, Sándor Petöfi (1823–49) in Hungarian, Taras Shevchenko (1814–61) in Ukrainian lit. The view of folklore and lang. as the embodiment of national self-consciousness gave rise to messianic efforts to reclaim the "soul" of a nation from the primordial depths of its folk poetry—a trend most spectacularly manifested in Elias Lönnrot's (1802–84) composition of the Finnish national *epic Kalevala (1835–49) out of authentic Karelian and Finnish epic folk songs.

Nevertheless, the early romantic emphasis on fragmentariness persisted in artistic practices, even though their philosophical background was largely forgotten. The polymorphous novel, initiated by K.W.F. Schlegel and Hölderlin, reached its climax in the oeuvre of E.T.A. Hoffmann (1776–1822), whose tales featured instant shifts of narrative voices and a constant vacillation between the real and the fantastic. In a similar way, the polymorphous composition in verse comprising different styles and forms loosely attached to each other in a manifold composition, a genre introduced by Goethe's Faust, was maintained in some major poetic works of the time, notably Adam Mickiewicz's (1798–1855) Dziady (Forefathers' Eve, 1821–32).

The metaphysical anxiety of early romanticism was now reinterpreted as the psychological malaise of the mod. age, whose carriers felt themselves condemned to inaction and perpetual doubt because of the contradictory nature of the soul. Benjamin Constant's (1767–1830) Adolphe (1816), Alfred de Musset's (1810–57) Confession d'un enfant du cièle (Confession of a Child of the Century, 1836), and Mikhail Lermontov's (1814–41) Geroi nashego vremeni (A Hero of Our Time, 1840) explored this predicament of mod. consciousness. In a parallel devel., earlier depictions of the "eternal feminine" as the passively harmonious counterpart to the Faustian male hero gave way to the heroines of Germaine de Staël (1766–1817), Charlotte Brontë (1816–55), and George Sand (1804–76) with a complex character and rich inner life. Lord Byron's (1788–1824) oeuvre and personality epitomized the perpetual vacillation between degrading sarcasm and lofty exaltation grounded in the self-destructive restlessness of romantic consciousness. Heroes of Byron's poems and dramas (Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, 1812–19; The Prisoner of Chillon, 1816; Manfred, 1817; The Deformed Transformed, 1824) feel their spirit imprisoned in the physical and social world, and ultimately, within their own body—a sense that condemns them to wanderings and the self-imposed ejection from the "normal" life. Byron and Byronism signified the advent of a phenomenon that Rus. modernists would later call "life-creation," whereby the artist's oeuvre transparently refers to his life and personality, while his life path acquires dimensions of an artistic "work."

The romantic principle of existential-spiritual duality received compelling representations in music and painting. In canvases by Caspar David Friedrich (1774–1840), crippled fragmentariness of the phenomenal world paraded itself as a hint at a mystical truth behind it. The works by Hector Berlioz (1803–69), particularly his Symphonie fantastique (1830), offered a poignant musical expression of the "romantic character" in all its burning contradictions. In Franz Schubert's (1797–1828) vocal cycles, the overt naïveté of the folklore element, predicated on the highest artistic ingenuity, achieved a poignantly transcendental effect. Romantic music (Schubert, Robert Schumann, 1810–56; Frédéric Chopin, 1810–49) cultivated free-flowing, quasi-improvisational piano miniatures; the piano, its timbre and dynamic register greatly expanded because of technical innovations, became the favored instrument whose potential for contrasting effects and multiplicity of voices ideally fitted the task of expressing "dialectics" of the human soul.

The favorite mode of expression in lyric poetry of the time can be called elegiac. Its free poetic form and the easiness with which poetic thought could establish symbolic "correspondences" between contrasting phenomena—between past and present, nature and human soul, this and the other world, passion and its ironic subversion—made *elegy or quasi-elegy the dominant poetic genre. Its mood perpetually wandered from sweetly beautiful, radiant depictions (Joseph Eichendorff, 1788–1857; Musset) to passionate and bitter effusions (Giacomo Leopardi, 1798–1832) to somber introspection (Evgenii Baratynsky, 1800–44) to mystical meditation (Alphonse de Lamartine, 1790–1869) to, finally, a precarious balance between passion and self-irony (Alexander Pushkin, 1799–1837; Heine). At the same time, some strictly shaped poetic genres thrived as well, for instance, the *sonnet (Mickiewicz, Wordsworth), whose chiseled shape symbolically represented, as it were, the organic harmony of the world.

The romantics' acute awareness of an abyss between the inner dreamlike world of the soul and a hard existential reality sought remedy in retreating into the fairy-tale and mystical element, a mood that struck a powerful chord in the spiritual climate of the age of the Bourbon restoration. The dreamlike ballade thrived in Germany (Ludwig Uhland, 1787–1862) and consequently in Russia (Vasily Zhukovsky, 1783–1852). The romantic penchant for otherworldliness expressed itself in eruptions of the Gothic element (Hoffmann; E. A. Poe, 1809–49).

On the other side of the spectrum of genres catalyzed by the duality of romantic consciousness, exploration of the conflict between the inner and the phenomenal world gave rise to the social novel, in which the focus on heroes' complex psychological motivations came hand in hand with detailed and precise depictions of the material and social conditions under which they acted. Early examples of the genre in works of Jane Austen (1775–1817), Stendhal, Honoré de Balzac (1799–1850), Charles Dickens (1812–70), Alessandro Manzoni (1785–1873), and Lermontov, which portend the rise of the realist novel, owed their emergence not to a small extent to the romantic longing for reaching out to reality. Finally, from general interest in hist. arose the historical novel, pioneered by Walter Scott (1771–1832) and championed by such authors as Hugo, Alfred de Vigny (1797–1863), and Edward Bulwer-Lytton (1803–73).

During its first two decades (from 1810 through the '20s), Rus. romantics, while intensely exploring various romantic genres and modes of expression, remained largely unconcerned with romanticism's roots in metaphysics, the philosophy of hist., and the philosophy of lang. Pushkin's Kavkazskii plennik (The Prisoner of the Caucasus, 1821), Baratynsky's Eda (1824), and Lermontov's A Hero of Our Time carried romantic exoticism à la Chateaubriand to the loci of Rus. imperial conquest, paradoxically coupling the restlessness of the romantic character with the vicissitudes of military duty. The Rus. elegy of the 1820s exploited a volatile state of the Rus. lang. of the time for creating a dynamic discourse, rife with ambiguities and rapid mood shifts. Lermontov's poetic persona in the 1830s presented arguably the most compelling embodiment of Byronism on the Eur. scene. In his Ukrainian stories (1831–32), Nikolai Gogol (1809–52) presented the ethnographic element in an artful mixture of naïve exuberance and irony. Most important, Pushkin's Evgenij Onegin (written 1825–32, first full ed. 1833) became one of the foremost achievements of the prerealist novelistic narrative strategy, with its ellipses and evasions, its reliance on an implied meaning, and its ironic unreliability of the authorial voice.

It was only in the 1830s and particularly in the 1840s, partly because of an overwhelming influence of Schelling and Hegel, that Rus. lit. turned to early philosophical values of romanticism, reinterpreting artistic forms as a means for representing metaphysical reflection. Pushkin's poetic works in the 1830s often pose as a metareflection on themes and genres he had mastered in the previous decade. Gogol's novel Dead Souls (1st pt., 1841) combined an episodic and ironic travelogue-like narrative with an effort (doomed to remain unaccomplished) to carry out a moral message of cosmic and mystical proportions. Another example of philosophically charged prose was Vladimir Odoevsky's (1803–69) Russkie nochi (Russian Nights, 1844), whose polymorphous narrative, comprising philosophical discussions, Hoffmanesque phantasmagoria, and embedded novellas, embodied the key romantic idea of the multiplicity of alternative representations through which the absolute can be indirectly accessed.

In a way, the hist. of Rus. romanticism directly counters the course of romanticism's evolution in western Europe, a paradox that may explain the flowering of "metaphysical poetry" (late Baratynsky, Fyodor Tiutchev, 1803–73; Afanasy Fet, 1820–92) in the 1840s–'70s, which arguably constituted the highest literary achievement of late romanticism at the time when its literary tides were ebbing elsewhere. Particularly striking is the total symbolization that is the central feature of Tiutchev's poetics. Echoing motifs, through which the world of the spiritual absolute let itself be anticipated in material forms of being, reverberate in Tiutchev's poetry, recalling Charles Baudelaire's (1821–67) poetics of "correspondences," yet Tiutchev's total symbolization remains distinctly "romantic" in that it does not have characteristically modernist sharp dissonances of Baudelaire's *imagery.

One domain in which late romanticism continued to thrive was music. Richard Wagner (1813–83), Johannes Brahms (1833–87), and Franz Liszt (1811–86) in Germany and Austria; Pyotr Tchaikovsky (1840–93) and Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakov (1844–1908) in Russia; Georges Bizet (1838–75) in France; and Giuseppe Verdi (1813–1901) in Italy explored such central domains of romantic consciousness and aesthetics as the dialectics of characters, the quest for the primordial, and the penchant for the fantastic and the exotic. Literary and musical late romanticism directly influenced *symbolism, *impressionism, and *expressionism, whose eventual appearance signified the emergence of modernist aesthetics (see MODERNISM). In this sense, the romantic element continued its subliminal presence in mod. Eur. culture.

II. British and American. The romantic movement was both self-critical and self-conscious from its inception and also the product of waves of like-minded thought over a number of decades, rather than a single intellectual and artistic entity. From an aesthetic standpoint, romanticism is clearly a reactive concept, and poetic self-consciousness is central to it. Much of its greatest lit. is about the act of writing as it develops from the work of the *imagination (e.g., John Keats's Fall of Hyperion [written 1819, pub. 1856], Coleridge's "Kubla Khan" [1797, pub. 1816], Wordsworth's The Prelude [1805, pub. 1850]). Many romantic poems are at least in part about stripping bare the creative process in disarmingly personal ways, and this, in turn, often contributed to their authors' initial reluctance to make them public. In contrast to the public nature of much of the writing of the 18th c., that of romanticism is often deeply private and personal, circulating among close groups of friends and fellow writers for some time before publication. Indeed, the matter of romantic writing is often autobiographical—the closely observed personal experience of the writers themselves, even or esp. that which is intangible, half-remembered, or known through altered states, both waking and sleeping (e.g., Byron's Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, pt. 3 [1816]; Shelley's "Triumph of Life" [written 1822; pub. 1824]; Blake's Marriage of Heaven and Hell [1790]; Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale" [1819; pub. 1820]; Coleridge's *conversation poems [1796–98]). A related phenomenon is an extraordinary outpouring of reflection on the essence of lit. (e.g., Keats's letters; Shelley's Defence of Poetry [written 1821; pub. 1840]; Coleridge's Biographia Literaria [1817]) and also a related body of transformational lit. crit. (e.g., the Shakespeare crit. of William Hazlitt, Coleridge, and Charles Lamb).

Broadly understood, romanticism in Britain can be taken to describe the group of artistic ideas emerging between two key political events: the revolution in France of 1789 and the Reform Act of 1832. Together, these are transformational moments in Brit. hist. Many writers assumed the first of these events to be the greatest moment of historical calamity since the fall of the Roman Empire; it shook up the geopolitical order of western Europe and ushered in a period of great uncertainty. Although outside the realm, it caught a mood in political thought at home that recognized the need for reforms providing for increased suffrage and greater individual liberty in a rapidly industrializing nation expanding its imperial boundaries into foreign lands as it built itself into a serious international power. The second episode enacted many of these desires for reform by redesigning the political landscape, ushering in a period when the Crown, church and aristocracy had reduced power. In between the two events, other key devels. had an impact on life in Britain. One was the ongoing war with postrevolutionary France (1799–1815), which generated considerable social change; another was the emancipation of Catholics (1829), which presented challenges to the role of the established church. Both cast doubts on the existing structures of power and forced progressive governments to reconsider the ways in which the country was ruled. Writers in the romantic period reflected these concerns widely. They also took their aesthetic ambitions from a cultural environment concerned with social improvement and individual liberty but aware at the same time of the strictures placed on these by the changing state of Britain. The period saw the abolition of slavery and advancements in gender equality but also terrible privations brought on by the war and periods of political repression (all of which are reflected in the work of the poet Anna Laetitia Barbauld, 1743–1825, for instance). Equally, industrialization brought new wealth to the middle class and generated enlightened discussion of workers' rights while contributing to rural poverty and urban squalor.

A particular paradox surrounds romanticism in America. While it clearly takes its lead, in intellectual and artistic terms, from Britain, a central theme is the challenge of matching an independent cultural response to a new nation with its unique landscape and demography. The movement, moreover, has more fluid dates than its Brit. counterpart. Romantic elements are visible in the writing of the first generation that followed the Revolutionary War (1775–83) and may be traced throughout the lit. of antebellum America (pre-1861). During this period, Am. artists looked to instantiate myths of independent origins, often by appealing to the extraordinary power of the landscape, but also inevitably nodding to Brit. cultural priority. Many writers of the first half of the 19th c. had close links to Britain: Washington Irving (1783–1859) and George Ticknor (1791–1871) knew Byron, while W. C. Bryant (1794–1878) and R. W. Emerson (1803–82) visited Wordsworth. Coleridge, largely because of his philosophical and religious writings, had a greater following in America than he did at home. Nevertheless, by 1842, confidence in the national *canon was sufficient to encourage the publication of an anthol. of Am. poetry. Dedicated to the Harvard-educated painter Washington Allston (a friend of Coleridge), some of those included retain their reputation as important writers in the romantic trad. such as Poe and Bryant; others such as H. W. Longfellow (1807–82), Richard Dana Sr. (1787–79), and C. F. Hoffman (1806–84) may have looked to the Am. wilderness for their subject, but their poetics are conventionally Victorian.

America's most interesting contribution to romanticism grew out of the intellectual movement associated with opposition to the Unitarianism of the Harvard Divinity School. Transcendentalism, as it came to be known, draws together many of the most important figures in Am. culture: Emerson, H. D. Thoreau (1817–62), and Margaret Fuller (1810–50). As a reaction to nonconformism, further analogies may be drawn with Britain, where a number of important writers developed their ideas from unconventional religious convictions, incl. Blake, Coleridge, Hazlitt, and Leigh Hunt (1784–59). Transcendentalism also built on the romantic interest in the subject-centered philosophy of idealism, made popular in Britain by Coleridge after his reading of Kant, and it sought to connect this with a celebration of Am. nature in all its vastness. Much of the great writing of the mid-century (in particular that of Walt Whitman; Herman Melville, 1819–91; and Nathaniel Hawthorne, 1804–64) embraces these two themes and attempts in form as well as subject matter to develop a voice that is distinctly Am. Still, there remains a related body of lit. constituting a trans-Atlantic romanticism by writers with a place in both trads., or those concerned with negotiating America's place in the Atlantic World, such as Melville in his great whaling novels or Hannah More (1745–1843), Harriet Martineau (1802–76), and Olaudah Equiano (1745–97), whose various writings form part of the vast lit. related to slavery and abolitionism.

Complex contradictions beset efforts to define romanticism as a critical term; in his highly influential 1923 lecture to the Modern Language Association, Lovejoy argued that any coherent appraisal of it is impossible. Nevertheless, to such Victorian commentators as Thomas Carlyle (1795–81), Matthew Arnold (1822–88), and George Eliot (1819–80), it was clear that parallels could be drawn between the artistic trends of the previous generation in the Eng.-speaking world and Eur. ideas, which had themselves exerted a steadily increasing influence on a number of key figures during the period itself. Romantic may have been a term imported from abroad; but the word had already begun to take on its mod. meaning in Britain during the 18th c., when the impulses of the movement were first felt. Thomas Warton (1728–90) distinguished between cl. and romantic elements in Dante as early as 1774, and the word had connotations of medievalism from the 17th c. An unsettling "deep romantic chasm" lies at the heart of Coleridge's visionary masterpiece "Kubla Khan," suggesting that the word was charged for him with more meaning than it has in its conventional amatory guise, and both there and in Walter Scott's preface to his first novel, Waverley (1814), it is related to a nostalgia for an archaic world of fantastic romance that is not obedient to the laws of mod. rationalism. Romantic thought more widely betrays an obsession with the past, and one of its key tenets, expressed in Carlyle's important essay of 1830, "On History," is that the knowledge of a people's spiritual nature is only arrived at through an understanding of their historical past. If 18th-c. historians are characterized in the imagination of romantic writers as suspicious of the primitive past, then the later generation falls in line with one of its most important thinkers, Edmund Burke (1729–97), whose account of the Fr. Revolution takes it to be the last and most barbaric act of the Enlightenment, which cares nothing for hist.: "people will not look forward to posterity who never look back to their ancestors," he warned in "Reflections on the Revolution in France" (1790).

The recovery and indeed invention of national mythology are both fundamental to romanticism in Britain and America. Antiquarianism, the earlier fashion for recovering artifacts relevant to Britain's distant past, fed into a more literary preoccupation with the recording of popular poetic trads. and the creation of a national canon independent of the classics. Shakespeare became established in romantic crit. as the quintessentially Eng. genius, all the better for his ignorance of the rules of neoclassicism. Meanwhile, the other pinnacle of Eng. poetry, John Milton (1608–74), exerted an influence in more testing ways. All the major poets of the period display a debt to Milton; for Keats (1795–1821) and Blake (1757–1827), esp., this runs over into an antagonistic struggle to escape from his shadow. The desire to create a literary work that is epic in scope but mod. in form, and hence different from Paradise Lost, haunts romanticism; and it may be said to have been achieved only insofar as writers made themselves the subject of their work either directly, as in Wordsworth's Prelude or Whitman's "Song of Myself," or indirectly, as in Byron's Don Juan or Melville's Moby Dick.

One set of works that obsessed many writers in the period, in both Britain and America, was that of the supposedly ancient Scots bard Ossian. This collection of poems, apparently drawn from local highland sources and then translated by James Macpherson (1736–96) in the 1760s, was widely and rightly contested as a hoax, but it satisfied the longing for a northern Eur. epic and was popular with Thomas Jefferson and Goethe. Fingal (1761), purporting to be an ancient epic poem trans. from Gaelic, invoked distant Celtic hist. and thus contributed to the kind of myth of origins sought by romanticism, with its local, nationalistic leanings. The historical novels of Scott, rooted in the very events out of which Brit. national mythology was made but invoking a romanticized vision of highland life, are one product of this impulse; another is the pompous epic Columbiad (1807) by Joel Barlow (1784–1812), the Connecticut poet, first written in the aftermath of the Am. Revolution, which tells of the founding of the nation.

Part of the attraction of Ossian's poetry was no doubt its setting at the farthest reaches of Scotland, beyond the limits of the civilized world as traditionally conceived. Romantic artists were, in fact, fascinated by the ancient cl. past and in particular the ruins of its empires (e.g., Shelley's "Ozymandias" [1817]; Keats's "Ode on a Grecian Urn" [1819]; Byron's The Curse of Minerva [written 1811, pub. 1813]), but the locus classicus for the romantic imagination remains the sublime natural landscape, untamed by human interference. Wordsworth climbing Snowdon, Shelley before Mont Blanc, Whitman by blue Ontario's shore, or the artist J.M.W. Turner observing the eruption of Vesuvius are all expressions of the romantic preoccupation with a sublime nature that stretches human imagination to its very limits and threatens to destroy civilized human life. Frequently, expressions of the *sublime reveal connections to the nation and its hist. Scott's highlanders, bound by ancient, elemental codes of honor, are inseparable from their wild environment; and Wordsworth's subjects are often unpolished but heroic members of a rural poor, whom he describes as though they had emerged from the landscape itself. One of the most memorable is the leech gatherer described in the poem "Resolution and Independence" (1807), in which Wordsworth reflects on the madness that afflicts many poets. Shelley puts this well in a poem about Lord Byron: "Most wretched men / Are cradled into poetry by wrong, / They learn in suffering what they teach in song." A familiar *topos, this romantic fixation also relies on the sublime, only here it is internalized as a figure for the vast, unknowable quality of the human mind.

Wordsworth had Thomas Chatterton (1752–70) in mind in "Resolution and Independence." While still a teenager, "the marvellous Boy" had forged a number of pseudomedieval poems, trying to pass them off as originals before committing suicide, and his unhappy story contributed to the cult of the untrained genius that fed the reputation of supposedly uneducated, natural poets from the rural laboring class: Robert Burns (1759–96), James Hogg (1770–1835), Robert Bloomfield (1766–1823), and John Clare (1793–1864) in particular. Traditional poems, *ballads and folk songs from rural communities were popular with early romantic readers, the most dedicated collector of these being Thomas Percy (1728–1811), whose Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765) was aimed at an audience like that which appreciated Ossian. These trends combined with political and aesthetic concerns in one of the most important aspects of romantic poetics: the radical transformation of the lang. of poetry itself. Undoubtedly, the most significant publications in this regard are the first two eds. of Lyrical Ballads (1798, 1800). Some of the greatest poems in these collection—Coleridge's "The Nightingale" and The Rime of the Ancient Mariner or Wordsworth's "Tintern Abbey," "Michael," and "The Brothers"—have little to do with the traditional ballad form and certainly do not employ the "language really used by men," as the Preface of 1800 claimed. Nevertheless, the poems clearly inaugurate a trad. of writing that makes a radical break with 18th-c. poetics. There are dark, disturbing elements in many of the poems in Lyrical Ballads and the influence of popular Ger. ballads, such as G. A. Bürger's "Lenore" (1773), with their gothic mixture of the macabre and the mystical, is apparent throughout the period. In fact, the gothic pervades many romantic genres (poems, plays, novels), and it appealed both to a popular taste for ghoulish tales of the supernatural and also to an intellectual milieu that was fascinated by aspects of experience that had not already been explained away by enlightened science. Isaac Newton (1643–1727) and John Locke (1632–1704), the great heroes of the Eng. empirical trad., are frequent whipping boys in the period; Keats attacked the former in a famous phrase from "Lamia": "Philosophy will clip an angel's wings." Romanticism certainly does not dismiss science (indeed, some writers, incl. Coleridge and Shelley, studied devels. in contemp. science very closely), but many of its greatest works suggest strongly that the powerful truths of human life cannot be found in the empirical analysis of the immanent alone. Rather, as in the moments of idealist transport that accompany the tough intellectualism of Wordsworth's "Tintern Abbey," they are uncovered through a subjective intuition of transcendence that comes from within.

RONDEAU. Originally the generic term for all Fr. forms derived from dance-rounds (rondes or rondels) with singing accompaniment (see RONDEL, TRIOLET): the refrain was sung by the chorus—the general body of dancers—and the variable section by the leader. The written forebears of the rondeau are generally thought to be the rondets or rondets de carole from 13th-c. romances (see CAROL).

The form by which we know the rondeau today emerged in the 15th c. and by the beginning of the 16th c. had displaced all competitors. The poem is constructed on two rhymes only with lines of eight or ten syllables, and the first word or phrase of the first line is used as a *refrain; this curtailed, repeating line, called the rentrement, usually does not rhyme. As a type of truncated refrain, the rentrement may have derived from copyists' habits of abbreviation, common in the Middle Ages. In Fr. prosody, rentrements are usually associated with the rondeau, but whenever the refrains of any poem are an abbreviated version of the first line either of the poem or of each stanza (e.g., Thomas Wyatt, "In aeternum," "Forget not yet," "Quondam was I"), then the term rentrement can be justifiably applied.

Traditional lengths for the rondeau are 12 or 15 lines (if the two brief rentrements are not considered lines, 10 or 13) printed in two or three stanzas. In the 15th c., both lengths appear: François Villon's "Mort, j'appelle de ta rigueur" is 12 lines in length, while Clément Marot's "Au bon vieulx temps" is 15, and both poems have been lineated with two and three stanzas. If we let R stand for the rentrement, the 12-line rondeau is abbaabR abbaR in two stanzas or abba abR abbaR in three, while the 15-line rondeau is aabbaaabR aabbaR in two stanzas or aabba aabR aabbaR in three.

During the course of the 16th c., the rondeau gradually disappeared. It was restored to fashion at the beginning of the 17th c. by the précieux poets, esp. Vincent Voiture, on whose 15-line example Théodore de Banville based his 19th-c. revival of the form. Although Alfred de Musset had experimented with the form earlier in the 19th c., taking some liberties with the rhymes, it was Banville's practice that provided the model for the later 19th- and 20th-c. explorations of the form. In England, aside from 16th-c. examples (Wyatt in particular), the rondeau did not really flourish until the end of the 19th c., when under Banville's influence, Fr. forms attracted the enthusiasm of *light verse poets such as Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, W. E. Henley, Ernest Dowson, Thomas Hardy, and Robert Bridges. Their influence was felt in America: the Af. Am. poet Paul Laurence Dunbar's most well-known poem may be the 1896 rondeau "We Wear the Mask," whose title is also its rentrement. In Germany, where it has also been called Ringelgedicht, Ringelreim, and Rundreim, the rondeau was used by Georg Rudolf Weckherlin, Johann Nikolaus Götz, Johann Fischart, and later Otto Eric Hartleben.

In the 20th c., an immensely famous rondeau was Canadian doctor John McCrae's "In Flanders Fields" (1915), a poem frequently recited and reprinted both during and long after World War I. "In Flanders fields the poppies blow," begins the lyric, ending with a stern call to the public to "keep faith" with the battlefield dead. Through the efforts of the Royal Legion of Canada, the YMCA, the National American Legion, the American and French Childrens' League, and the British Legion, McCrae's Flanders poppy became an instantly recognizable symbol worn in Canada and Britain annually on November 11, Remembrance Day, to commemorate the Great War dead. When the poem first appeared, few of these literal legions may have recognized its form: even the best-selling posthumous collection of McCrae's poetry published in 1919 referred to it as a highly original kind of *sonnet. In 2001, the first stanza of "In Flanders Fields" was printed on the Canadian ten-dollar bill.

The management of the rentrement is the key to the rondeau's expressive capabilities. Banville says that the rentrement is "both more and less than a line, for it plays the major role in the rondeau's overall design. It is at once the rondeau's subject, its raison d'être and its means of expression." Fr. poets, wishing to keep the rentrement unrhymed, yet fatally drawn to rhyme, found a solution in the punning rentrement, which rhymes with itself rather than merely repeating itself (e.g., "son or," "sonore," "s'honore"). Consequently, in the Fr. rondeau, the rentrement tends to remain unassimilated, full of wit, buoyancy, and semantic fireworks. The Eng. poets, on the other hand, sought to integrate the rentrement more fully, both by frequently allowing it to rhyme with either the a or b lines, thus pushing the rondeau in the direction of that exclusively Eng. form, the *roundel, and by exploiting its metrical continuity with the rest of the stanza. The Eng. rentrement is also usually longer than the Fr., four syllables rather than one or two. In short, the Eng. rondeau is altogether graver and more meditative than the Fr., its rentrement more clearly a lyric destination, a focus of self-recollection, intimate knowledge, and haunting memory.

The rondeau redoublé, similar in form, was rare even at the time of Jean Marot, who is known to have composed one in 1526. In the 17th c., a few isolated examples occur in the works of Mme. Deshoulières and Jean de La Fontaine; Banville uses the form in the 19th c. Marot's rondeau redoublé, 24 lines in six *quatrains plus the rentrement, may be schematized as follows (R signifying the rentrement and capitals and primes denoting whole-line refrains): ABA'B' babA abaB babA' abaB' babaR. Each line of stanza 1 is employed in turn as the last line of each of the following four stanzas, which thus serve to develop the content of stanza 1; the final stanza then makes a comment or summation. Dorothy Parker's "Rondeau Redoublé (And Scarcely Worth the Trouble, At That)" of 1926 follows the four-century-old scheme of Marot exactly.

RONDEL. Like the terms roundel* and rondeau*, the term rondel did not apply in the Middle Ages to one rigidly fixed poetic form but to a "round" song with a *refrain or to any of several similar two-rhyme patterns for such a song's lyrics. Eustache Deschamps gave five separate schemes for the rondel in his L'Art de dictier (1392), one of which would later be renamed the *triolet. Poems by 15th-c. poets Christine de Pisan, Jean Froissart, Octavien de Saint-Gelais, and Charles d'Orléans designated as rondels are schematically distinct. In the 19th c., Théodore de Banville's popular handbook Petit traité de poésie française (1872) took a rondel by d'Orléans as a model for and example of the rondel form. Banville's first ed. printed the d'Orléans poem with 14 lines, but upon discovering that transcribers who habitually indicated refrains with "etc." had confused him, Banville corrected the example in later eds. to 13 lines. Banville and other *Parnassians adhered to the 13-line scheme, but the Eng. Aesthetes as often chose the more *sonnet-like 14-line scheme. The rondel can therefore be defined as a form with two rhymes, three stanzas, and a two-line refrain that repeats either two and a half or three times: ABba abAB abbaA(B).

ROTA VIRGILIANA (Lat., "Virgilian wheel"). The term illustrates the division of Virgil's major works into a hierarchical triad. Authors of late antiquity recognized the generic progression from the pastoral Eclogues to the didactic Georgics* to the *epic Aeneid as reflecting the developing complexity of Virgil's writing style and life station. In his grammar Parisiana poetria (ca. 1220), John of Garland introduces the rota virgiliana as a mnemonic device that portrays the works' stylistic differences and their corresponding occupations and imagery in a schema of concentric circles divided by three spokes.

The "low" style of the Eclogues, the "middle" style of the Georgics, and the "high" style of the Aeneid correspond to the occupations of "leisurely shepherd," farmer, and soldier or governor, respectively. Each style and occupation has its own representatives (Tityrus and Melibeus; Triptolemus and Ceres; Hector and Ajax), animal (sheep, cow, horse), implement (crook, plow, sword), locale (pasture, field, camp, or city), and tree (beech; apple and pear tree; laurel and cedar).

The rota virgiliana had great influence during the burgeoning nationalism of the Eng. Ren. Poets, notably Edmund Spenser and John Milton, fashioned themselves as national laureate poets in the manner of Virgil by following his career pattern, first composing works in the pastoral genre before tackling the weighty matters of the epic.

ROTROUENGE. OF stanza form of uncertain origin (perhaps originally "song of Rotrou") and of indeterminate form. The rotrouenge perhaps derived from adaptation to lyric use of the epic laisse*, with its characteristic sequence of isometric lines sung to one repeated musical phrase, but this structure may well have undergone early modification. Adapted into Occitan as retroensa or retroncha, the term was applied to strophic songs having a two-line *refrain (whence the verb retronchar, to repeat in the manner of a refrain).

ROUNDEL. In the Middle Ages, this term was simply a synonym for the *rondeau or the *rondel—e.g., Chaucer, "Knight's Tale" (1529). But in its mod. sense, the term usually refers to the variant form introduced by A. C. Swinburne in his A Century of Roundels (1883). The Swinburne roundel is a three-stanza, two-rhyme poem of 11 lines on the pattern abaR bab abaR where R stands for the rentrement. The rentrement, as in the rondeau, is a shortened line—a word or phrase—that repeats in the manner of a *refrain; in the Swinburne roundel, the rentrement normally rhymes with the b lines of the poem. The few other poets who have written Swinburne roundels include John Davidson, Ernest Dowson, and Sara Teasdale; Christina Rossetti drafted but never published a self-referential Swinburne roundel in which the word roundel rhymes with such words as scoundrel and groundswell.

RUBĀʿĪ (pl. rubāʿīyāt, Ar., "four-parter"). A *monorhyme *quatrain originating in the Persian trad. and subsequently adapted into other Islamicate lits. The term rubāʿī refers to the four *hemistichs (miṣrāʿ) that comprise the quatrain. In Ar. and Persian versification, every line (bayt) of verse consists of a symmetrical pair of miṣrāʿ, graphically arranged in two columns and separated by a visual *caesura. The quatrain can thus be parsed both as a four-line poem (rubāʿī) by counting miṣrāʿs and as a two-line form (du-baytī) by counting bayts:

3d miṣrāʿ . . . . . x |	4th miṣrāʿ . . . . a || (= bayt 2)

The terms rubāʿī and du-baytī are not, however, interchangeable. Rubāʿī quatrains conform to a unique meter not used for other verse forms, its 20 *morae usu. resolving as a 13-syllable pattern, either or – – ◡ ◡ – ◡ – ◡ – – ◡ ◡ – . But since one long may replace two consecutive breves, possible permutations allow as few as 10 syllables. The du-baytī quatrain, by contrast, is composed in a canonical Persian meter, usually hazaj, in a shorter 11-syllable (19-morae) pattern: ◡ – – – | ◡ – – – | ◡ – –. The rhyme scheme for all rubāʿī and du-baytī quatrains is aaxa and often, esp. in the early period, aaaa. In Persian, Turkish, and Urdu rubāʿīs, the rhyme may occur before the end of each miṣrāʿ, to be followed by a uniform refrain (radīf).

The Persian quatrain is an epigrammatic genre, tersely developing an image, thought, or problem that is then wittily or forcefully resolved in the final line, ideally with an aphorism, didactic maxim, or philosophical/mystical aperçu. Each quatrain treats a single theme, but the genre's topical scope is broad: love, wine, homily, mysticism, praise, politics, or satire. It emerged from folk poetry, often in regional dialect, more often sung than written (in music, a separate term, tarāna, is applied to sung quatrains). Oral circulation of rubāʿīs in this popular performance milieu led to frequent misattribution, with many so-called wandering quatrains attributed to multiple authors. The cl. rubāʿī is amply attested in both courtly and Sufi milieus in the 10th c., and by the 11th–12th cs., legendary vitas had built up around some quatrain composers or reciters, e.g., Mahsatī, renowned for her amorous and sometimes bawdy rubāʿīs; the "naked" dervish Bābā Ṭāhir with his dialect du-baytīs of love and devotion; and Abū Saʿīd-i Abi al-Khayr, who in his sermons regularly recited rubāʿīs composed by others for mystical inspiration. At court, an impromptu rubāʿī might receive rich reward for particular wit or elegance; a 14th-c. anthol., Nuzhat al-majālis, compiles 4,000 rubāʿīs by some 300 poets, topically organized in 17 chapters for the shah's amusement at court.

While living, ʿUmar Khayyām (d. 1122) was not known as a poet; a trickle of rubāʿīs were attributed to him in scattered 13th-c. sources, about 25 in total by the year 1330. His corpus then began to grow, reaching well over 500 rubāʿīs by the mid-15th c., attesting to a growing vogue for the philosophically skeptical Khayyamesque rubāʿī. The astounding success of Edward FitzGerald's trans. of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám (anonymously pub. in 1859, with subsequent revisions and expansions, 1868, 1872, and 1879) led to the creation of Khayyām societies in most anglophone capitals, to numerous parodies (e.g., the rubaiyat of golf, rubaiyat of a Persian kitten, etc.), and to trans. in most other world langs. FitzGerald's command of Persian was good, though his trans. style was free. Subsequent scholars and poets (e.g., Robert Graves, John Heath-Stubbs) have been unable to displace FitzGerald's rubāʿīs, which follow Eng. prosody (iambic pentameter) but retain the aaba rhyme scheme and a cynical epicurean outlook, while rearranging the Khayyamesque corpus into a quasi-narrative sequence, "something of an Eclogue." In the mid-20th c., forgeries purporting to be early mss. of Khayyām's rubāʿīs were foisted on scholars; in Amin Maalouf's novel Samarcande (1998), an apocryphal early ms. of Khayyām's rubāʿīs plays a central fictional role.

We may question Khayyām's authorship, but most canonical Persian poets did compose rubāʿīs, some in great quantity: about 1,900 by Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī (ca. 1207–73), incl. several in Ar. ʿAṭṭār (ca. 1145–1221) tells us he composed 6,000 rubāʿīs, of which he preserved 2,000 in his Mukhtār-nāma, on amatory, Khayyamesque, and mystical themes, topically arranged to illustrate a subtle theosophy of love. The Persian rubāʿī remained a vibrant form, practiced by most poets from the 11th to 19th cs.; even after cl. forms gave way to *free verse in the mid-20th c., poets such as Nīmā Yūshīj (1896–1960) and Saeed Yousef continue to innovate in this form.

The rubāʿī form and meter were introduced to Ar. under the Persian name du-baytī, probably by 11th-c. bilingual Persian-Ar. poets composing macaronic rubāʿīs for musical performance. It became popular among Ar. poets of the 13th–14th cs. as far west as Iberia, with some one thousand examples surviving, sometimes experimentally embedded in other forms, such as the qaṣīda and muwashshaḥ. Though not in the rubāʿī meter of cl. convention, the quatrain form in other meters remains popular in mod. Ar. lit. (e.g., Jamīl Ṣidqī al-Zahāwī [1863–1936], Maḥmūd Darwīsh [1941–2008]). Despite the presence of a four-line strophic form (dörtlük) attested in eastern Turkic from the 11th c., the cl. rubāʿī was borrowed by Turkic lits. from Persian models, adopted in eastern Anatolia by Kadī Burhaneddin (1344–98), in Azerbayjan by Nesimi (ca. 1369–1417), and in Central Asia by ʿAlī-Shīr Navāʾī (d. 1501), though Azmi-zade Haleti (1570–1631) is considered the master of the Turkish rubāʿī and the Khayyām of Anatolia. Ottoman Turkish poets continued to produce rubāʿī through the 19th c.; even the communist poet Nazim Hikmet (1902–63) produced a small volume of quatrains inspired by the rubāʿī form in 1945–46.

RUNE. A character of the Old Germanic alphabet (called the futhorc from its first characters), probably derived from Gr., Lat., and related scripts. From about the 4th c. CE, runes were widely inscribed on such objects as coins, memorial stones, weapons, and other personal objects. Notable poetic inscriptions include those on the 5th-c. Horn of Gallehus (now lost), and the 8th-c. Ruthwell Cross and Auzon Casket. Two runes (named thorn and wyn) were used in the OE adaptation of the Lat. alphabet, and thorn was also used in ON. Runes are sometimes found in OE poetic mss., where the rune names (e.g., epel, "home" and sigel, "sun") must be substituted for the characters. In the OE riddles, runes sometimes provide clues or spell out solutions. The OE poet Cynewulf wove his runic signature into his works. The OE "Husband's Message" is spoken by a cryptic rune staff; and poetic collections of gnomes organized around the futhorc are found in both OE and ON.

RUNNING RHYTHM (common rhythm). A term coined by G. M. Hopkins to denote the standard rhythms of Eng. *accentual-syllabic verse measured, in traditional prosody, by feet of two or three syllables. The rhythm is said to be rising if the stress falls at the end of the foot (*iamb, *anapaest), falling if the stress occurs on the first syllable of the foot (*trochee, *dactyl; see RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM). If the stress occurs between two unstressed or "slack" syllables (*amphibrach), Hopkins calls it "rocking rhythm." However, running rhythm employed with too much regularity becomes "same and tame." Poets have counteracted this tendency by resorting to reversed feet and reversed or *counterpoint rhythm, which Hopkins dubs "that irregularity which all natural growth and motion shews."

RUSSIA, POETRY OF

I. 17th and 18th Centuries
II. 19th Century
III. 20th Century and Beyond

Four interrelated tendencies characterize the hist. of Rus. poetry from its origins in the 17th c. until the early 21st c. The first concerns the incremental growth of the versification system. While writers and readers have valued strict-form verse, every period has produced innovation in the prosodic resources of Rus. verse in response to movements such as *classicism, *romanticism, and *modernism. The second direction relates to openness to foreign poets, trads., and aesthetic movements through adaptation, imitation, and trans. The third pattern concerns the pervasive intra- and intergenerational affiliations that poetic texts express through subtextual and intertextual allusion. Rus. poets acquire with their education almost complete access to the entire trad., with the result that poets and readers are highly attuned to the connotative and associative connections triggered by the poetic, as opposed to prosaic, word. The fourth characteristic is the continuous regulation of Rus. poetry by political authorities. While the severity of censorship varied under both the imperial and Soviet regimes (as did the self-censorship practiced by writers), periods of complete freedom of expression were curtailed, leading on occasion to poetry of outright dissidence, as well as encouraging subtle techniques of satire and ironic suggestion.

I. 17th and 18th Centuries. From the mid-17th c. until the early 1760s, poetry was restricted to centers of learning, the bureaucracy, and court. The roots of early mod. Rus. literary culture lie in the Lat. and Scholastic orientation of 17th-c. Kyivan literary culture and its transfer to Moscow. The earliest writers to produce a corpus of poems were the literate functionaries collectively known as the Chancery school (Prikaznaya shkola). Their activity in the mid-17th c. demonstrates the relation between lit. and the court, personal ideals and state service as expressed in verse dedications, epistolary petitions, *acrostic dedications, and rebus poems. At court, the major figure was the erudite Simeon Polotsky (1629–80), who displayed his mastery of the *baroque poetics of Polish, Ukrainian, and Neo-Lat. lit. in two massive collections of verse, the Rifmologion (Rhymology) and the Vertograd mnogotsvetnyi (Variegated Vine). Backed by Tsar Aleksei Mikhailovich, whose policies of secular enlightenment anticipated those of his son, Peter the Great, Polotsky and his followers Silvester Medvedev (1641–91) and Karion Istomin (1650–1717) introduced the idea that poetry has an autonomous role in culture. Cast in the baroque form of the allegorical garden, Polotsky's two enormous poetic cycles, which contain a verbal labyrinth and *emblem poem in the shape of a heart, invite the reader into a morally pure world of Christian virtue. Polotsky is the first in a long series of Horatian imitators in Russia, extending all the way to Joseph Brodsky in the 20th c., who maintain that the purpose of poetry, as Polotsky thought, "is to teach, please and move by means of connected speech."

In this respect, his successor, and the great innovator of the next generation, is Prince Antiokh Kantemir (1709–44). A diplomat posted in Paris and London, Kantemir defined his ambitions for poetry and Rus. culture by adopting Fr. neoclassicism as a progressive model. Kantemir saw *satire as an efficient didactic mode in which to take a stand on cultural politics in support of Peter's reforms. Based on contemp. speeches of Peter's chief propagandist Feofan Prokopovich, the Petriada, Kantemir's epic fragment, celebrates the physical splendor of the city (more illusion than reality before the 1740s) and the speed of its creation. Kantemir's juxtaposition of civilization and nature anticipates a recurrent theme in the Petersburg myth. His Satires drew on the techniques of irony and caricature from a wide range of Eur. exemplary satirists, from Horace to Nicolas Boileau to Voltaire to Jonathan Swift. The poems project a Eur. sophistication well beyond the competence of all but the smallest readership in Russia at the time. Kantemir, whose work was published first in London and circulated in ms. in Russia before printed Rus. eds. appeared from the 1740s, received due recognition only after 1762, when Catherine the Great espoused Peter the Great's more secular vision of culture.

Debates about genre, imitation, and innovation, and ling. and prosodic norms engaged with neoclassical theory and progressed by trial and error from the late 1730s into the first decades of the 19th c. There were no official court poets during the reigns of Peter the Great or his successors, and a culture of literary patronage is more notional than material during Catherine's reign. The prominent poets and theoreticians were Vasily Trediakovsky (1703–69), Mikhail Lomonosov (1711–65), and Alexander Sumarokov (1718–77). Despite personal rivalry, their common purpose was to prescribe the ling., syntactic, and prosodic system that would enable Rus. poets to domesticate Western genres and create a native trad. Trediakovsky and Lomonosov argued in their treatises (respectively, "New and Brief Method for Composing Russian Verse," 1735; "Epistle on the Rules of Russian Versification," 1739) that the syllabotonic system was the appropriate basis for mod. Rus. versification. Lomonosov applied his rules with panache in his "Ode on the Capture of Chocim" (1739). This spelled the end for *syllabic verse as the basis of versification. Sensitive to the relation between form and affect, each theorist attributed to the selection of feet a fundamental role in the creation of poetry's emotional capacity. Trediakovsky advocated the trochee as the basic metrical foot, whereas Lomonosov promoted the *iamb. In the event, Lomonosov prevailed. Trediakovsky had devised such complex rules of syntax for verse that his system became unworkable (though it is displayed with great ingenuity in Tilemakhida [1766], his transposition into verse of François Fénelon's Télémaque). The transition to the syllabotonic system has been attributed to numerous factors: statistical analysis of syllabic verse, in fact, suggests that tonicization was under way and that these theoretical pronouncements reflected a transition rather than a dislocation. These discussions yielded a new repertory of varied stanza forms and modes, incl. epic, song, *epitaph, *verse epistle and *elegy, from which two subsequent generations drew heavily.

In the newly secular culture of the mid-18th c., dozens of poets, some dilettantish nobles, some translators, and some figures of lasting achievement created a substantial poetic *canon. The composition of poetry among the educated elite, who absorbed the lessons of native and foreign handbooks and enthusiastically formed literary associations, enjoyed prestige as a demonstration of civility and cultivation. The most important poets were the scientist Lomonosov and statesman Gavrila Derzhavin (1743–1816), who enjoyed early acclaim and earned lasting renown. Their biographies—each was from a remote part of Russia and reached a high rank at court—conferred an aura of genius, lending stature when they addressed the monarch. Both Lomonosov and Derzhavin took the notion of a poetic persona to new heights. The *ode is the definitive high genre of 18th-c. Rus. poetry, a showcase for ling. experimentation as well as a mirror to the image of the monarch. Lomonosov's solemn odes, relentlessly paced by iambic tetrameter and alternating *masculine and feminine rhyme, reveled in Pindaric chains of metaphors contained by the signature ten-line stanza. Rhetorically, these occasional poems restored poetry to its ceremonial place at court in the trad. of Polotsky. The turgidity of the Lomonosovian ode derives from a propensity to create semantic clusters, usually through etymologic play or tropes, such as *zeugma. Lomonosov made Enlightenment progress (from the uses of glass to the advantages of Western dress) the subject of his verse. He evoked cl. *allegory in celebration of Russia's triumphs of the 1750s and 1760s, advised on cultural policy, declared the arrival of a utopian age, encouraged imperial expansion, and promoted the political economy of a mercantile nation. The authority of the poet derives less from vatic inspiration, which turns out to be rational rather than visionary in the display of loyalty and practical wisdom. Lomonosov speculates in verse on the nature of the universe, but in the famous evening and morning meditations written in 1743, he becomes the first Rus. poet to capture a sublime appreciation of nature.

This view of poetry as a mode of inquiry into the universe, society, and man finds its most eloquent spokesman in Derzhavin at his peak in the 1780s. Famed as a rule-breaker both in his poetic style—his idiosyncratic attitude to rhyme would look particularly clumsy to later generations—and subject matter, Derzhavin is a philosophical poet imbued with an Enlightenment belief in self-examination, rational skepticism, and empiricism. A spirit of cosmic enquiry inspires Derzhavin's remarkable meditation "God" (1784), a text that employs the discourse of natural philosophy (with some debt to G. W. Leibniz) as well as contemp. optics. Derzhavin is, above all, an eloquent poet who experiences metaphysical problems with pictorial vividness.

Derzhavin's poems often proceed by counterpointing reason and emotion and abstraction with realistic detail. His aim in mixing high and low, elevated diction and colloquialism, is to show that the genre system, with its rules about form and diction, is subordinate to the style of the poet's mind. Thanks to this force of personality and stylistic liberty, poems fold the sheer matter of everyday life into their argumentative structure. As a statesman, Derzhavin, like Horace, wrote in a civic mode with a view to instructing the ruler on the theory of natural law, good governance, and progress, all mainline Enlightenment topics. Whereas Lomonosov remained the respectful courtier, the senatorial Derzhavin in the late 1770s and 1780s showed greater boldness in mixing flattery with irony and dressing up topical discussion in thinly veiled allegory. In poems of statecraft, read and sometimes appreciated by Catherine the Great, he put the ruler and poet on virtually equal footing. He is the first Rus. poet to use the lang. of natural law in reminding the ruler of limits to autocracy. Derzhavin's choice of philosophical and political subjects conferred gravitas on the figure of the poet.

Yet not all is high seriousness in the period. Numerous poets from the 1730s to the 1770s were adept at song as well as verse tragedy and comedy. Light verse of an ephemeral nature enjoyed a vogue. Alexander Sumarokov (1717–1777), the director of the Imperial Theatre (and dubbed the Rus. Boileau), preferred pastoral themes. Parody and burlesque reached sparkling heights in the mock epic Dushen'ka (a transposition into poetry of Jean de La Fontaine's Les Amours de Psyche et Cupidon [1669]), which brought Ippolit Bogdanovich (1744–1803) admirers well into the 1820s.

II. 19th Century. This rapid experimentation with styles and genres laid the ground for the first generation of classic Rus. poets of the 1810s. In the roughly 25 years before Alexander Pushkin published his first poem in 1815, the poetic norms established during Catherine's reign persisted. Most lyric poetry earlier in the period continued to circulate among a small coterie of amateur men of letters. Before the mid-1820s, public and private readerships were identical, since national literacy rates remained low and there was no system of distribution to bookshops. No one could aspire to be a professional poet much before the early 1820s. Lomonosov's poems had been published at court in tiny print-runs. Derzhavin's poetry circulated mostly in handsome ms. copies, but he lived long enough to see the transition toward printed eds., overseeing the publication of his own collected verse in 1814.

The devel. of smaller lyric forms proved to be a boon when sentimentalism reached Russia in the 1780s. Much more than prose in the period, which tended to emulate archaic models, Rus. poetry remained up to date in its openness to other national trends and movements, esp. from France. The lang. of *sensibility developed in the 1790s by Nikolai Karamzin (1766–1826) and his acolytes Mikhail Muravev (1757–1807) and Ivan Dmitriev (1760–1837), all accomplished writers of poèsie fugitive, attracted the poets of early romanticism. Vasily Zhukovsky (1783–1852), a writer and translator of *ballads, opened new conduits to Eur. currents as a smooth and idiomatic translator. His 1802 version of Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (1750) was considered a masterpiece of the art of trans. in Russia and marked the inception of early romanticism. Older-generation canonical figures include the classicists Alexei Merzliakov, a translator of Virgil and professor of rhet.; Nikolai Gnedich (1784–1833), famed for his 1831 trans. of the Iliad into heroic hexameter; and Konstantin Batiushkov (1787–1855), an imitator of the musicality and sensibility of Tibullus and Torquato Tasso. Batiushkov exercised a formative influence on Pushkin and his contemporaries. The elegiac speakers of the 18th c., drawn from tragedy, proved archaic after sentimentalism, which cultivated the expression of feeling. From the 1800s, the lyric landscape utilized manifold props and techniques of *preromanticism, incl. ruins, *pathetic fallacy, epigraphs, and wanderers. Poets employed a wider repertory of verse forms, turning out epistles in iambic trimeter, narratives in trochaic tetrameter with dactylic rhyme, and verse fables in mixed iambs, with notable success, e.g., in the fables of Ivan Krylov (1769–1844). For the next generation, working in the 1820s and 1830s, versification roughly adhered to the norms developed at this time: the default narrative meter was the iambic tetrameter (in more than 40% of works written in the 1820s), blank verse rather than *alexandrines or iambic hexameter was employed in tragedy with Shakespearean overtones, and exact rhyme gradually became the norm. However, stanza boundaries, which a generation earlier had adhered to strophic forms like the eight- and ten-line ode, were relaxed as the romantics preferred openness and continuity in their lyric forms.

The greatest poet of the 19th c. is Alexander Pushkin, whose body of lyric and narrative verse was unprecedented in its variety and standard of accomplishment. From the 20th c. on, he has also been widely considered Russia's national poet. A discussion of Pushkin's unparalleled standing in the Rus. poetic trad. necessarily has three components: his intrinsic creative qualities, his contribution to the growth of the professional status of the writer in Russia, and finally the symbolic position he occupies in aesthetic debates, literary politics, and national identity from the time of his death through the Soviet period up to the present day. His idiom flows from the lang. that Karamzin and others refined, and he deploys it with unfailing elegance and deeper psychological nuance. His command of the genres is impeccable, yet his mastery of *parody and *pastiche are one source of delight, most esp. in Evgenij Onegin, his novel in verse that appeared in installments from 1825–32. Dubbed by the influential critic Vissarion Belinsky an "encyclopedia of Rus. life," it is also an encyclopedia of Rus. lit., packed with quotation and allusion. It is highly sophisticated in its narrative voice, creation of time frames, deconstruction of realism, and metatextual play. If Pushkin's metrical profile tends to the standard iambic tetrameter and his stanza forms are traditional, numerous examples demonstrate his aptitude for verse forms that match the mobility of his thought. Emotional transparency, conveyed in cultivated and conversational diction, characterizes his lyric corpus of nearly 700 poems in which he sloughs off poetic *cliché—or uses it to devastating effect. The publication of his lyric poetry as a collection in 1826 was a landmark, following on the critical and financial success of early romantic narratives on Byronic themes. Lyric poetry had been the preserve of the amateur elite; few poets previously had courted a readership for their verse. The step was decisive in establishing the preeminence of lyric poetry in the 1820s and Pushkin's superiority among practitioners. He took a conservative approach to organizing the poems chronologically and according to genre, as was the custom among Fr. poets. By contrast, his highly esteemed contemporary Evgenii Baratynsky (1800–44) would later arrange the poems of his landmark collection Sumerki (Twilight, 1842) thematically, creating an impression of psychological coherence and implied linkages. This approach anticipated the thematic structure of the poetic book that many later poets, esp. the symbolists in the 1890s, would develop. Lapidary diction and pace characterize Pushkin's eight narrative poems, which move from Byronic themes to the greatest Rus. poetic meditation on hist., The Bronze Horseman (1834), while his fairy-tales have the vitality of folk idiom and considerable humor. His famed clarity does not negate a capacity to use polyphony, intertextual allusion, and form to suggest depth and dialogue with the trad. In his hands, for instance, *blank verse rather than the alexandrine becomes an ideal medium for dramatic soliloquy in the Shakespearean historical tragedy Boris Godunov.

Poetry for Pushkin was certainly a calling, but he also called it "my trade, a branch of honest industry, which provides me with food and domestic independence." Bedeviled by censorship and goaded by his precarious critical reception, Pushkin was acutely aware that financial independence was a risk for aristocratic writers unable to live on revenues from their estates and reluctant to serve in the bureaucracy. Yet Pushkin braved different types of self-assertion in promulgating the authority of the *poet. In "The Prophet" (1826), which may well be the most famous of all Rus. poems, he asserted the twin principles of the divine basis for the poet's genius and a duty of public enlightenment. The first claim grew out of Pushkin's appropriation of the romantic discourse of genius, rather than from any clear belief in a divine mission, and the second reflected his hopes that a poet of his talent, intelligence, and noble ancestry could advise the tsar. It is doubtful whether Pushkin subscribed to P. B. Shelley's view that poets were the legislators of humankind, but his exalted image of the poet fit in well with the younger generation of Moscow-based Schellingians like Dmitrii Venevitinov (1805–27) and found favor among the intelligentsia in the late 19th c., esp. symbolist writers, who adopted a hieratic notion of the poet.

The slump in Pushkin's critical reputation and his death in a duel created the perception that he was the victim of a repressive government and society hostile to poetic genius—suppositions in which there is some grain of truth, although these were not the immediate causes of the debacle. In "The Death of the Poet" (1837), the younger Mikhail Lermontov (1814–41) railed against an unworthy society, positioning the martyred poet as the upholder of cultural and moral values. Read as an attack on the government, it earned Lermontov a term of exile that bolstered his pose as a "Pushkin" to the younger generation. In his final years, Lermontov, who was also the victim of a duel, extended Pushkin's theme of the poet's aloofness from the debased crowd. His mature verse—and virtually all the poems written in 1841 are anthologized masterpieces—embraces a persona of alienation and despair, partly as a romantic reflex of Rus. Byronism, partly as a response to the constraints of life in Russia under Nicholas I. His narrative poetry explored topics such as the interrelation of consciousness and nature, jealousy and love, while his lyrics project a poet-figure afflicted by a sense of solitude and fate. His view of the poetic calling as a lonely destiny reverberated in the work of later poets facing hostile imperial and Soviet regimes.

Alongside Pushkin and Lermontov, the two outstanding poets of the period were Baratynsky and Fyodor Tiutchev (1803–73). They are often paired because of their philosophical themes and their common debt to Ger. idealist thought on hist. and nature. Baratynsky's gift is for compressing material of different logical kinds—observation, meditation, simile, satire—into a syntactically varied but metrically stable pattern that proves adaptable for the searching tones of his voice, which slips suddenly into bitter regret, then rises in metaphysical exaltation; and in his last poetry, achieves a distance from the world that is sublime. Both are poets of nature, the first imbued with a sense of awe and reason akin to J. W. Goethe, the second informed by F.W.J. Schelling and later Arthur Schopenhauer's pessimism. Both are among the most powerful love poets in Rus., expert at portraying an unrequited longing that corrodes hope and breeds disillusion. Baratynsky treated the relationship of poetry to hist. in one of the greatest lyrics of the century, "Poslednii poet" ("The Last Poet," 1835). Inspired by Viconian theories about the evolutionary cycles of culture, Baratynsky surveyed the progress of poetry from Homer to Pushkin, which for him marked the beginning of an Iron Age pitting prose against poetry, industrialization against creativity, capital against intangible genius. Like Lermontov's theme of the wanderer poet, this vision of an age governed by commercialism, positivist intellectual values, and mechanization would strike a chord with later poets.

The generation following Pushkin and his younger contemporaries, which includes now-forgotten but then-celebrated poets like Alexander Polezhaev (ca. 1805–38), saw itself as the possessor of a ready-made poetic lang. and a substantial trad. Nonetheless, there is a widespread perception that, from the 1840s to the 1890s, the rise of the novel eclipsed Rus. poetry. This judgment, which reflects some critical distaste for the breakdown of thematic boundaries between prose and poetry, is simplistic. Even in the supposedly fallow decades leading up to the rise of the next major movement, *symbolism, poetry was highly productive and widely printed from the 1850s. If anything, the cultural status of poetry became increasingly an issue for debate, polarizing factions according to their position on an ideological spectrum between, at one end, Afanasy Fet (1820–92), Tiutchev, and others, who combined conservative nationalism with a commitment to Pushkinian values of art and craft; and, at the other extreme, the gifted democratic and radical Nikolai Nekrasov (1821–78). Along with lesser writers like Aleksei Khomiakov (1804–60) who used verse as a vehicle for a Slavophile ideology, it was Fet and Tiutchev who perfected the capacity of the Rus. lyric to create speakers of psychological depth and to distill entire areas of thought about nationalism, politics, and, above all, nature as a pantheistic force.

From the 1840s, the literary field was transformed by the rapid growth in literacy, demographic shifts toward cities, the improvement in print technology and the publishing infrastructure, and the crumbling of both class and gender barriers. Few notable women poets were active during Rus. classicism, although the early 19th c. poets Anna Bunina (1774–1829) and Anna Volkova (1781–1834) were treated respectfully by literary societies. Over the next decades, Bunina, an amateur, would be followed by female poets like the formidable Evdokiia Rostpochina (1811–58), Elizaveta Shakhova (1822–99) and, above all, Karolina Pavlova (1807–93), who published substantial collections to positive critical and public response. Pavlova is a pioneer of poetry as a type of emotional diary and devoted lyric cycles to her affairs with Adam Mickiewicz and Boris Utin, while also departing from ostensibly "feminine" themes in more polemical verse about Russia and the mission of the poet.

The growth of an educated nongentry class, from which teachers, university professors, translators, and writers emerged, led to an expansion of the number of jours. in which poetry was featured. While the Rus. reading public consumed prose fiction above all, poetry sold and circulated in quantities that would have struck Pushkin as fabulous. Aesthetic debates current in Western Europe about the social function of lit. and "art for art's sake" reached Russia in the 1860s and 1870s. Yet in the "thick journals" that treated the famous "accursed questions" of Rus. politics and hist., the radical critics contested the worth of Pushkin and "pure" poets to a country experiencing severe social tensions because of agrarian reform and industrialization. Poets declaimed with prosaic explicitness in defense of the downtrodden and urban poor.

Pushkin's status as an object of attack from the Left, veneration from the Right, and adoration from the nonpolitical middle classes in itself gives evidence of the unusual importance accorded to poetry in ideological debates about the purpose of art. Some regarded him as irrelevant because he had failed to produce a positive hero who would be a model of political activism: Onegin for Our Times (1865) by Dmitrii Minaev (1835–89) fought fire with fire by parodying Pushkin's novel-in-verse. For the so-called radical critics, Pushkin's name was largely a byword for effete aestheticism. The vehement critic Dmitrii Pisarev (1840–68) derided Pushkin and Zhukovsky as "parodies of poets" and Lermontov as the author of "absurdities." In fact, Pushkin's reputation was a moving target since the true nature of his legacy was only then becoming known in Russia through radical émigré publications. There is an irony that attacks from radicals on Pushkin coincided with the first publication in the émigré press of some of his most radical poetry, which had been banned in Russia, incl. the pornographic burlesque Gabrieliad (1821), which mocked church dogma, and the lyric "Sower of the seed in the desert" (1823). By the time Fyodor Dostoevsky, in his famous speech on the opening of the Pushkin monument in Moscow (1880), elevated him as the embodiment of the Rus. soul, Pushkin had been claimed by all camps from radicals to pan-Slavists.

Readers continued to respond personally to Pushkin's lyric poetry. A large (and predominantly female) section of the now-substantial readership turned to poets as soul mates who intuited reader's private feelings. These included second-tier masters like A. K. Tolstoy (1817–75) and Konstantin Sluchevsky (1837–1904). Apollon Grigoriev (1822–64), Yakov Polonsky (1819–98), and Aleksei Apukhtin (1840–93) enjoyed particular favor thanks to their autumnal landscapes, moonlit-night settings, and emotional vagueness, often adapted in song.

Nonetheless, these melodists were out of step with an age gripped by questions of political and social change. The best of the "naturalists" is Nekrasov, ed. of the leading liberal jour. The Contemporary, who believed that all the prose of life could be made the subject of poetry. To the service of this credo, Nekrasov, nicknamed the Poet-Citizen, applied a formal mastery and an acute ear for popular idiom and dialect. The characters of his narrative poems are drawn from the world of the peasantry and new urban underclass.

The publication of Poems (1856) was a historic populist call. It unites the virtues of craft and irony that Nekrasov esteemed in Pushkin and Baratynsky with a forthrightness and cynicism seen earlier only in Derzhavin and Krylov. If any poem speaks for Nekrasov's generation, and for his aspirations for poetry, it is that collection's explicitly anti-Pushkinian and programmatic "Muse," which begins by repudiating "a Muse who sings gently and beautifully," but whose inspiration is imbued with a spirit of revenge that will sustain the poet across the "dark abysses of despair and evil." Nekrasov further expressed this ethos with verse portraits of radical critics such as Nikolai Chernyshevsky (1828–89), whose views on lit. would later become precepts of Marxist-Leninist aesthetics in Soviet lit. crit.

The culmination of Nekrasov's career was the cycle of lyric and narrative poems united under the title Komu na Rusi zhit' khorosho' (Who Lives Well in Russia?, 1863–78), which applies a satirical eye to all facets of the Rus. empire. Nekrasov's ability to orchestrate polyphony and different modes makes him the true contemporary of Dostoevsky, while his eye for detail owes much to populist movements in the visual arts. Like Pushkin's lyric hero who spoke in the tones and manner of his social class, Nekrasov fashioned a speaker in the social image of his reader, thereby creating an intense emotional bond between him and a larger, socially engaged readership of urban professionals, incl. writers, students, and doctors, who made up the "mixed estates." Nekrasov's funeral became a mass demonstration at which Dostoevsky (in the company of the young Marxist philosopher Georgii Plekhanov) proclaimed him the legitimate heir of Pushkin and Lermontov.

Poets of Nekrasov's generation had engaged intensely with the so-called accursed questions, adding women's rights, poverty, and political freedoms. The assassination of Alexander III in 1881 and a period of reaction led to a gradual national subsidence into relative torpor until the first Rus. Revolution of 1905. The most popular poets of the 1870s were hackneyed imitators of Nekrasov, their politics expressed in often crudely sloganizing verse. By the late 1880s, Rus. poetry regained some measure of sophistication, deploying longer verse lines and ternary meters and, as in the poetry of the highly popular Semen Nadson (1862–87), even altering the rhythmic balance of iambic tetrameter. In the 1880s, Fet broke his 20-year silence with his final collection, Vechernie ogni (Evening Flames, 1891). His exquisite mastery of short forms combined subtle shifts in rhythm, verbal inventiveness, and sound play to mirror the febrile moods of his subjects. It came as a timely reminder of the lyric trad.'s marvelous fusion of music and psychology, inspiring the next two generations of poets to concentrate on smaller forms and personal subjects.

III. 20th Century and Beyond. These tentative stirrings in the 1880s anticipated the burst of formal daring shown by both generations of symbolist poets who were great enlargers of the tonal and rhythmic palette of Rus. verse. From the start, the Europeanness of Rus. symbolism is reflected in its culture of trans. Trans. and imitations of numerous other authors, incl. Arthur Rimbaud, Stéphane Mallarmé, Maurice Maeterlinck, E. A. Poe, as well as Pre-Raphaelite critics such as Walter Pater and John Ruskin, steered the symbolists away from civic topics toward personal themes expressed for an intimate circle of readers (see PRE-RAPHAELITISM). Cross-currents in the aesthetic affiliations and philosophies of poets made the entire period highly dynamic and rich. First-generation symbolists, incl. Dmitrii Merezhkovsky (1865–1941), the febrile Zinaida Gippius (1869–1945), and the hugely popular Konstantin Bal'mont, shared the decadent preoccupation with death together with a yearning for an unattainable fullness of life, the belief in art for art's sake, self-obsession, and a tendency to conflate art and life. With hypnotic musicality, Fyodor Sologub (1863–1927) created a poetic dream-world of secret gardens and imagined realms in which symbolist hopes for cosmic renewal vied with Schopenhauerian pessimism about a decadent world. We are back in the world of coterie poetry. Valerii Briusov (1873–1924) and Georgy Ivanov (1894–1958), for instance, indicated their exclusivity by assigning Lat. titles to their collections, e.g., Briusov's Me eum esse (1898) and Tertia Vigilia (1901). Lyric, rather than narrative, was the dominant form. Poetic collections presented complex cycles. The degree to which poets become known to readers through the book of poems rather than miscellaneous publications is striking. It would be possible to write a hist. of Rus. poetry starting at this juncture by following a series of such titles. Some poets arranged their collections according to hidden feelings that obscurely moved the reader like a musical impulse. Others viewed the collection as a lyric diary, attaching dates to create a chronological progression. The first poetic collection to represent his spirit of pessimism and despair is Bal'mont's Pod severnym nebom (Under a Northern Sky, 1894). Unlike Bal'mont, who emphasized the musical expressivity of the word over its sense, Innokenty Annenskii (1856–1909), an older symbolist whose first collection was not published until 1908, conveyed a sense of existential unease and ennui through oblique images and periphrastic diction, the music of his verse stored up in the intonation of its questioning phrases rather than in sound orchestration. The poetry of Annenskii casts a hypnotic musicality over his dream world of secret gardens and imagined realms pervaded by corrupted innocence and the devil, emanations of his Schopenhauerian pessimism. Briusov occupied a unique position as critic, scholar, and publisher and was a leading arbiter of taste until after the revolution. While his eclecticism may now look more affected than genuine, younger writers respected his formal virtuosity, fell under the spell of his versatile poetic persona, and were dazzled by his aptitude in adapting mod. Fr. verse, whether Charles Baudelaire's misanthropic brilliance or the coldness and exoticism of the *Parnassians.

Both Alexander Blok (1880–1921) and Andrei Bely (1880–1934) conveyed the symbolist belief that the concrete world is only a damaged reflection of the world of eternal essences and that poetry captures the movement of the spirit from realia ad realiora. Blok's poetry, which shares Fet's plangent sound structure, mesmerized contemporaries with the new rhythmic capacities he revealed by using the dol'nik*, rather than the iamb, to give his lines an accentual (and more speech-like) beat. This flexibility of rhythm, adapted to the intonation and changing mood of each line, and exemplified in the Verses on the Beautiful Woman (Stikhi o prekrasnoi dame, 1903), became widely imitated over the 20th c. Blok's Collected Verse (1911–1912) united his first five collections and reordered the poems according to chronology, thereby creating an autobiographical narrative about the growth of the poet from a Baudelairean poète maudit* under the spell of the Eternal Feminine into a visionary attuned to the elemental music of hist. Blok was a phenomenon because the individual personality and voice of his lyric speaker was patently autobiographical to a greater degree than any other poet since Baratynsky. The interrelation of life and art and the symbolist project of perfecting life through art inform the poet's spiritual presentation throughout his collections. In the heady aestheticism of the prerevolutionary period, writers from the next generation like Anna Akhmatova (1889–1966) and Marina Tsvetaeva (1892–1941) fell under Blok's spell, dedicated youthful cycles to him, and emulated him by giving biographical detail and psychological continuity to their lyric cycles. Arguably, Blok did more than any previous writer to give thematic cohesion and a sense of psychological devel. to the unitary poetic collection, and while he enjoys much less popularity in the post-Soviet period, his status and influence were once towering.

Blok felt that the poet possessed an acute sense of hist. that came with an obligation, in the trad. of Pushkin's Prophet, to teach the nation. Clearly, some members of the intelligentsia, esp. in St. Petersburg, subscribed to these pretensions, but it is hard to substantiate the persistent claim that the mass of readers generally endowed their poets with mystical charisma. Even before the revolution of 1917 elevated proletarian art, a host of factors had already enlarged the popular base for poetry. There is clear evidence that, like the cinema, poetry readings were enjoyed as a type of elevated entertainment and a conduit for popular expression. Both Blok and Bely caught the turbulence of their revolutionary age at an early stage. In his 1905 collection Pepel' (Ashes), Bely shed his learned style and assumed a more popular persona under the inspiration of Nekrasov. Anxiety about Russia's future pervades Blok's prose in which he warned his readers about the "music of history"—and perhaps for the last time in the hist. of Rus. poetry, he invoked the authority of the poet in making such national pronouncements. When the October Revolution occurred, Blok captured the actual violence of the revolution in Dvenadtsat' (The Twelve, 1918), which tells the story of a marauding band of soldiers let loose on Petrograd. This cycle fuses the symbolic lang. of Blok's philosophy of hist. with a polyphonic narrative of upheaval at street level. Blok punctuates whole sections with onomatopoeic, nonverbal explosions of sound effects to convey rifle fire. Class distinctions mark the speech of characters, and Blok makes extensive use of *accentual verse to characterize peasant speech. All the great 20th-c. narrative poems, incl. Tsvetaeva's Krysolov (Ratcatcher, 1925), Mikhail Kuzmin's Forel' razbivaet led' (The Trout Breaks the Ice, 1929) and Akhmatova's Rekviem (Requiem, written 1935, pub. 1963) follow his example in forging a sequence out of highly varied metrical structures.

In the years between the revolutions of 1905 and 1917, symbolism made way for the most remarkable concentration of great poets since the Pushkin period. Poetic groups across a spectrum of artistic philosophies came together and by dint of sometimes marginal differences splintered into numerous subgroups. One common denominator across the Silver Age (as it was retrospectively called) was the cult of Pushkin, who appears in many guises as a ghostly interlocutor for Annenskii, a haunting friend for Akhmatova, a poetic sun for Osip Mandelstam (1892–1938), and a dandy for Mikhail Kuzmin (1872–1936). In her prerevolutionary collections, Akhmatova, whose understatement and irony communicated this poetic kinship, freed erotic psychology from the frenzy and melodrama of the decadents. Voiced in cl. binary meters, these short lyrics present subdued dramas of emotional reckoning. The very different characterizations of Pushkin in the work of Akhmatova and Tsvetaeva show how malleable his reception and image continued to be and help crystallize the differences in their poetics (Akhmatova was clearly cl., while Tsvetaeva was an iconoclast in idiom and sentiment). Tsvetaeva, one of the great formal innovators of Rus. poetry, celebrated Pushkin as the "scourge of tsars," a poet of Af. ancestry whose protean genius and aptitude set the standard in many genres. If Akhmatova's attention to the emotions finds its natural form of expression in short poems, Tsvetaeva required the expansiveness of confessional, autobiographical modes practiced with devastating candor in poems written after her emigration in 1922 such as the "Poema gory" ("Poem of the Mountain," 1924) and at a metaphysical level in her ethereal Novogodnee (New Year Letter, 1927) to R. M. Rilke, works that blur generic boundaries by expanding the introspection and dense imagery associated with the lyric on a narrative scale.

Literary *futurism was officially inaugurated in 1913 when Vladimir Mayakovsky (1893–1930) established its antiestablishment credentials by repudiating Pushkin as an aesthetic standard. Certain slogans ("A slap in the face of public taste," "Throw Pushkin overboard") together with deliberate outrageousness in public displaced the listless symbolist persona with the bad-boy image cultivated by Mayakovsky. The graphic appearance of futurist poetry, with its jagged lines and use of the verse ladder (lesenka), gives a visceral sense of the distance it puts between itself and cl. poetry (see TYPOGRAPHY, VISUAL POETRY). While futurism is best known by representatives such as Mayakovsky, the term is a portmanteau word for a range of subgroups responsible for the doctrine of cubofuturism, and the imaginists (made up of thirteen poets incl. Anatoly Mariengof [1897–1962] and Vladimir Shershenevich [1893–1942]), as well as the later Left Front in Art (LEF). Individual poets and factions were heavily implicated in producing and applying the lessons of post-Saussurean ling. theory elaborated across a wide spectrum of thinkers from A. A. Potebnya to members of the formalist movement whose theories of the literary device, the literary system, and the dynamic literary word galvanized poets to exploit poetic lang. in all its semantic, phonetic, and even visual complexity and to assume that the poetic word has a special density of expressivity that exceeds its denotative function as a signifier. The poetic avant-garde experimented with form and lang. as the means to defamiliarize reality for new readers in a mod. age (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS, DEFAMILIARIZATION). This common impulse, shared by all groups, animates some of the most daring formal innovation in Rus. poetry, whether expressed in the trans-sense lang. that the imagist-futurist poet Velimir Khlebnikov (1885–1922) coined or in Mayakovsky's attention to poetic lang. as a nearly material substance (faktura stikha) that delivers the shock of the new through neologism, unusual rhymes, explosive intonation, rapid syntax, and unusual verse forms.

Mayakovsky remains one of the great iconoclasts of Rus. verse, a magnetic civic poet, and in the cycle Pro eto (About That, 1923) a moving writer of love poetry. By setting out his revolutionary rhet. in lines of unprecedented metrical variety over extensive monologues, he maximized intonational variety and rhythmic flexibility. But Mayakovsky is hardly alone in taking metrical sophistication to new lengths. Readers appreciated the skillful *amphibrach in Boris Pasternak's second collection, just as they esteemed the dexterity with which Tsvetaeva (in the trad. of Bal'mont) mastered Gr.-style logoaedic meters in her verse tragedies. Boris Pasternak (1890–1960) initially participated in futurist groups before going his own way. Like Tsvetaeva, he refracted the observation of contemp. historical events, such as the Kronstadt rebellion and the October Revolution, through a lyric optic. His second book Sestra moia zhizn' (My Sister Life, 1917), a lyric diary of emotional upheaval during a year of revolution, remains one of the great collections of Rus. poetry, remarkable as a phenomenological transcription of consciousness. The subject is the poet's emotional and intellectual hist. when his ardent openness to the sensual experience of life merges with utopian excitement. Like Tiutchev and Fet, Pasternak presents nature as a Schellingian force, imbued with subjectivity and spirit. His landscapes, defamiliarized through metonymy and metaphor, reflect his common heritage with the futurists.

Like the imagists, the acmeist poet—and here Mandelstam excelled in his first collection Kamen' (Stone, 1913)—creates out of the verbal texture of the poem an image of an object that seems real in material terms (thus, opposing the Platonic ideal of symbolist poetry; see ACMEISM). Many of the poems in Stone weave together a tissue of allusions to Eur. poets and themes, creating a concentrated sense of culture in a manner similar to T. S. Eliot's high *modernism. Great buildings like Notre Dame and Hagia Sophia are emblems of the syncretism of religions and civilizations and communicate a modernist conviction that culture can be remade from its own past. The collections Mandelstam published in his lifetime are touchstones of Rus. poetry, not least because they seem to sum up their historical moment. In their focus on memory and beauty, strategies of poetic identity and the interrelation of painting, poetry, and music, Stone managed to be a timeless example of lyric perfection while also being steeped in the mood and idioms of fin de siècle Europe.

Mandelstam's next collections, Tristia (1923) and New Verse (1928), have a formal inventiveness and a range of reference and allusion that consciously distance them from the proletariat poetry sanctioned by the regime. Haunted by Lermontov's image of the poet as an outcast, Mandelstam reacted to the historical turmoil of "War Communism," the emergency economic measures Lenin imposed between 1918 and 1921, by introducing a new type of complexity into Rus. poetry characterized by layered *allusion, metaphorical density, and the trans. of the contemporary into mythic *archetypes. Poetic composition for Mandelstam (as well as for Mayakovsky), was an exercise in multiplying the self and describing its tension points within a tumultuous political and literary context. His later poems, most of which were written from exile in Voronezh in the 1930s, have a Mallarmé-like poise in considering the relation between music and silence and explore consciousness and an intersubjective perception of time and space.

As the Bolsheviks established state-run literary organizations and publishing houses, poets of all schools were mobilized for propagandistic purposes in building the "dictatorship of the proletariat." The poetic landscape changed in direct measure as the new Soviet state progressed in the 1920s through the next stages of civil war and War Communism to the establishment of the New Economic Policy (NEP) and finally its demise in 1929. Much ephemeral poetry (now collected in historical anthols.), often expressed in the form of versified slogans or songs, captured public jubilation during the October Revolution. Poems by the thousand were written in a utilitarian style to mark technological achievements of the new state, to celebrate workers, and to vilify counterrevolutionaries. Professional writers were not immune to such propaganda. Numerous poetic narratives sympathetic to the Bolsheviks, like Glavnaia ulitsa (Main Street, 1922) by the proletarian poet Demian Bednyi (1883–1945), depicted—and approved—the violence inflicted on the peasantry.

A qualitative difference, however, surely marks out masterpieces of Communist poetry from hackwork. Like the constructivists who sought to move art out into the public realm by applying it to mass-produced textiles and household goods, poets of the stature of Mayakovsky, Nikolai Aseev (1889–1963), and the young Nikolai Tikhonov (1896–1979) tried to create a new revolutionary art by joining poetry and agitprop. Nothing was too prosaic to be turned into easily memorizable verse, incl. the endless decrees produced in the new jargon of the regime. The same poets also projected their utopian vision of revolutionary reality by mythologizing the new state and its leaders. Just as he rallied workers to the socialist cause, so did Mayakovsky (whose style was far too modernist for the conservative Vladimir Lenin) in his narrative poems cast the revolution in cosmic terms.

Meanwhile, poets of the so-called neo-peasant school, which included the wildly popular Sergei Esenin (1895–1925) and the Old Believer Nikolai Kliuev (1887–1937), were focused on the countryside: their writings during War Communism caught the hardship of the times in popular folk idiom. Contrary to the image of official propaganda, the neo-peasants frankly depicted the devastated landscapes of Russia during its civil war. Even as the Bolsheviks purged institutions of perceived enemies, the restored free-market economy of the 1920s (known as NEP) led to wild bursts of prosperity. The cityscape that Nikolai Zabolotsky (1903–1958) created in Stolbtsy (Columns, 1929) combines cinematic montage with Gogolian grotesque, presenting an expressionist portrait of city life. The poets grouped as OBERIU, incl. Daniil Kharms (1905–42), Nikolai Oleinikov (1898–1942), and Konstantin Vaginov (1899–1934), in the years before their arrest and suppression in the early 1930s, created a new style of absurdist poetry that expressed their alienation from a menacing Soviet context by contrasting the grammatical logic of propositions with their sometimes violent content.

By the end of the 1920s, the regime's strong preference for conservative form and lang. in poetry had forcefully curtailed proletarian groups, demoralized the futurists (Mayakovsky committed suicide in 1930), hounded Akhmatova into silence, and marginalized Mandelstam (in whose fate Stalin took a personal interest). Literary institutions, under instruction from Stalin, began to orchestrate the cult of Pushkin as a national poet, culminating in a series of mass events and publications that made this elite poet into a household name, a proverbial byword, and a comrade. The Soviet literary establishment systematically inculcated respect for poetry by pedagogical means, by cultivating a rich children's lit. written in verse and, perhaps above all, by publishing in large print-runs the Soviet equivalent of the Fr. Pléiade editions, the Biblioteka Poeta series founded by Maksim Gor'ky (1868–1936). The 250-plus titles published over the entire lifetime of the Soviet Union signified official acceptance and canonical status for individual poets and poetic movements.

The official requirement that writers adhere to socialist realism, together with Josef Stalin's terror, created a sorry record for Rus. poetry as pub. from the 1930s until the 1960s. Socialist realism required lit. to deliver a positive message confirming the achievement of socialism and the party's ideals. Form and lang. were to be simple, and all traces of irony and ambivalence were expunged by the censors or preempted through self-censorship. Poetic anthols. devoted to national anniversaries show how quickly poetry fossilized into fixed tropes and ideological clichés; unsurprisingly, the formal blandness and thematic repetitiveness blighted poetry during the Stalinist period.

While the official picture was superficially one of monolithic conformity, unofficial channels led poetry in more creative directions from the end of the 1950s. In the post-Stalin period, and esp. the thaw of the early 1960s, innumerable talented poets were associated with dozens of separate, and often ephemeral, poetic groups that tested official limits. Three misleading perceptions about Soviet lit. in the post-Stalin thaw and subsequent stagnation under the regime of Leonid Brezhnev have arisen: first, that Joseph Brodsky (1940–1996) was the only significant poet at this time; second, that the gulf between official and unofficial lit. was unbridgeable; and finally, that the description "practitioner of unofficial lit." during these years is coterminous with "political dissident." The truer picture is one of interrelated backgrounds and artistic formations joining many major and minor Leningrad poets of the time with officially sanctioned literary groups.

While censorship persisted, the state's efforts to turn out talented poets unwittingly encouraged new directions. Poets trained in a quasi-official literary group like Gleb Semenov's famous LITO (Literary Society) also broadened their horizons by meeting other young poets and sharing unorthodox views and copies of both foreign and Rus. poetry that had been smuggled from abroad. A whole new generation of poets came of age in the 1960s. Akhmatova, who survived official denunciation in the 1940s, was a beacon to younger poets like Brodsky, Evgenii Rein (b. 1935), Dmitrii Bobyshev (b. 1936), and Viktor Sosnora (b. 1937), known after Akhmatova's death as her "orphans." Similarly, another survivor of a legendary era, Pasternak inspired a younger generation in Moscow, and his Zhivago poems remain one of the high points of his oeuvre. Both older writers treated the moral standing of the poet in works that could only be published abroad, such as Requiem, published in Munich in 1963, the cycle in which Akhmatova reacted to the Stalinist terror by articulating her grief as a victim and mother and as spokesman for the traumatized people of Leningrad.

For every poet like Evgenii Evtushenko (b. 1933), who moderated his political message for advantage, numerous others followed an anti-Soviet direction. This is the case with Alexander Galich (1918–1977), a master of dissident song, and the subtle strict-form lyric poet Vladimir Ufliand (1937–2007). Many other poets in both metropolitan Russia and provincial cities ignored the transparency and prosaic sense demanded by socialist realism. In this diversity and wealth of talent, we might cite the minimalism of Aleksei Khvostenko (1940–2004); the delightful illogic of the Muscovite Evgenii Kharitonov (1941–1981), which harks back to the techniques and absurdist outlook of Kharms; Igor Holin (1920–1999), who in the mid-1960s applied the jingle-type rhymes of the chastushka* to questions about identity and ontology; and Genrikh Sapgir (1928–1999), a member of the Lianosovo group of painters and poets, whose ironical vignettes and epigrammatic brilliance have a moral force. Much poetry circulated unofficially in ms., in samizdat publication in Russia and abroad in "tamizdat" anthols. like The Blue Lagoon (1980–86).

In the 1960s, the "guitar poets" or bards Vladimir Vysotsky (1938–1980) and Bulat Okudzhava (1924–1997) achieved popularity as lyric poets and balladeers; their poetic songs eschewed official lang. and were much closer to people's daily lives and concerns, while also expressing subversive countercultural and sometimes implicitly anti-Soviet views. Brodsky's first collection, Ostanovka v pustyne (A Halt in the Wilderness, 1970), which contained a formally startling tribute to John Donne and poignant elegy for T. S. Eliot, caused a sensation when published abroad and galvanized the literary underground in Leningrad. Mannerisms and innovations that would become unmistakable appear, incl. his extensive relaxation of verse line through *enjambment, intricate stanza forms (a striking contrast with the iambic tetrameter quatrain sanctioned by Soviet practice), aphorism and paradox, religious themes (again, a provocation), and his obsession with time and space. Brodsky voiced a degree of self-irony shared by many if not all his contemporaries, an irony that stripped away the residual mystical status of the poet as spiritual guide and prophet that was a legacy of the trad. from the romantics to Blok. The generation of the 1960s sought wit, novelty, and individuality of voice. A lack of explicit interest in Pushkin is a striking feature among poets from both Leningrad/St. Petersburg and Moscow, reflecting fatigue with his Soviet-sponsored familiarity.

The hist. of 20th-c. Rus. poetry contains many chronological displacements due to censorship. Much poetry written from the 1930s until the 1960s would not officially see the light in Russia before perestroika. Poets who had fallen into disfavor were rarely granted posthumous publication. Tsvetaeva was at the height of her creative powers after leaving Russia, and her unique body of metrically startling narrative and vivid autobiographical lyrics were known clandestinely in Russia to a small readership. During the thaw, while noteworthy eds. were published abroad, the Soviet rehabilitation of figures like Mandelstam and Tsvetaeva was uneven; their work was subject to distortion through censorship and unreliable editing. Their legacy remained more legendary than real until the 1980s.

The same period also saw significant geographical displacement. We should not leave 20th-c. poetry without mentioning the possibly unique phenomenon of Rus. poetry abroad, a stunning and essential chapter in its hist. The degree to which poetry written in Rus. from the diaspora is separate from and even in counterpoint to devels. in Soviet Russia is hard to assess. The poets of the first wave of emigration in the 1920s who achieved lasting distinction had already started writing in imperial Russia or the Soviet Union. The experience of revolution and emigration deeply marked Vladislav Khodasevich (1886–1939), author of two exquisite collections full of bitter self-irony and truculence about the immediate past who sought refuge in nostalgia for the Pushkinian trad. By contrast, Georgy Ivanov (1894–1958), whose Rus. collections had taken up fashionable decadent themes, became increasingly experimentalist and surreal in emigration, while Boris Poplavsky (1903–35) quickly assimilated the program of André Breton and his followers. Despite the large numbers of poets in the diaspora from the 1930s (incl. Vladimir Nabokov [1899–1977], who was a prolific writer of lyric poems), it is not until the third wave of emigration in the 1970s that a generation of truly significant poets, incl. Brodsky, Lev Loseff (1937–2009), and Rein emerges. All came of age in Soviet Russia and took up residence either in the U.S. or Europe. Their poetry was often first appreciated in the West before becoming known to readers in Russia through underground distribution and subsequently in print from the inception of perestroika.

In post-Soviet Russia, poetry quickly regained formal innovativeness, acquired an edge of political unorthodoxy, and reveled in the shock of the new. While many gifted poets born in the 1930s no longer lived in Russia, a generation of young poets born in the late 1940s and 1950s included outstanding lyric talents, among them Oleg Chukhontsev (b. 1938), Elena Shvarts (b. 1948), Ol'ga Sedakova (b. 1949), and Yunna Morits (b. 1937), whose individual voices spoke with uncommon interiority and religious feeling long before the collapse of the Soviet Union. In the post-Soviet period, their poetry continues to develop in familiar directions. Among Moscow poets who bridged the Soviet and post-Soviet division, Aleksei Tsvetkov (b. 1947) and Sergei Gandlevskii (b. 1952) write in the elegiac trad. about core existential questions. While their poems evoke great reaches of the Rus. trad., their grandeur is offset by irony, mordant humor, and highly inventive rhyme. The experience of unfettered freedom in the Boris Yeltsin years lent rampant experimental exuberance to the poet's task in the 1990s. Avant-garde poetic movements reflected the outlook and methods of deconstruction and *postmodernism. The act of writing, which in recent memory had carried extreme personal risk, became an act of ling. and philosophical daring for many poets. This is nowhere better seen than in the work of the "metametaphorist" Alexei Parshchikov (1954–2009), as well as the "conceptualists" Lev Rubinshtein (b. 1947) and Dmitrii Prigov (1940–2007) and the "postconceptualists," incl. Timur Kibirov (b. 1955), all of whom were originally based in Moscow. Like the futurists, these poets flaunted their colorful personalities and exploited ling. resources to the full, reconnecting with the trad. of Khlebnikov and *Dada while also displaying the assimilative powers of Rus. verse by domesticating foreign writers like the *Beat poets. Each in his highly individual fashion combines verbal energy with sarcasm and affected innocence. For many readers, the cleverness with which these writers dismantled the Soviet experience and its made-to-order art remains the most memorable feature of their works. Interestingly, Pushkin's stock rose once again in the 1990s, as post-Soviet avant-garde groups claimed him as a fellow postmodernist.

RUSSIAN FORMALISM

I. Doctrine and Historical Position
II. Competition with Marxism and Later Resonance

A school of literary studies that emerged in the mid-1910s and peaked by the early 1920s; its formal end was marked by an article of enforced self-crit. by Viktor Shklovsky, "Monument to a Scholarly Error" (1930). Formalism originated in the study of lang. dialects and folklore at the Moscow Linguistic Circle, established in 1915, and in the work of the Petrograd Society for the Study of Poetic Language (Opoyaz), founded in 1916, although the earliest important text to be associated with the school, Shklovsky's "The Resurrection of the Word," dates to 1914. The most prominent exponents of Rus. formalism were Shklovsky (1893–1984), Roman Jakobson (1896–1982), Yuri Tynianov (1894–1943), Boris Eikhenbaum (1886–1959), Osip Brik (1888–1945), and Boris Tomashevsky (1890–1957). Vladimir Propp (1895–1970) and Pyotr Bogatyrev (1893–1971) developed the ideas of the formalists in the 1920s in the study of folklore; a group of "young Formalists" (mladoformalisty) was active in Leningrad in the late 1920s (Lidiya Ginzburg, 1902–90, being the most prominent) but gradually moved away from its teachers and their methodology.

I. Doctrine and Historical Position. Rus. formalism laid the foundations of mod. literary theory. The formalists were the first to see lit. as an autonomous domain of theoretical inquiry, steering away from aesthetics, sociology, psychology, and hist. and seeking support in ling. In Germany, there had been earlier attempts to apply a similarly autonomous approach to music and the visual arts. Heinrich Wölfflin's (1864–1945) dream of a hist. of art without names was echoed in Brik's belief that, had Alexander Pushkin never been born, Evgenij Onegin would still have been written. Breaking with a long trad. of thinking about lit. in terms of subjectivity and individual creativity, the Rus. formalists discussed the literary work of art in terms of "literariness" (literaturnost'), a quality they believed had to be explained before the uniqueness of lit. in relation to other discourses could be located. Uncontrolled by, and irreducible to, ethics, religion, or politics, lit. was now shaped not by individual imagination and authorial will but by a repertoire of devices, motifs, and rules, the exploration of which stimulated the formalists' interest in rhyme, rhythm, sound patterns and repetition, plot structure, and narrative frames.

Although the formalists actively studied prose and film (but not drama), poetry occupied pride of place in their work. Rus. formalism considered poetry to be the product of a specific use of lang. that highlights and draws attention to the act of expression itself. Hence the central notion of self-referentiality, capturing the essential distinction between the lang. of lit. (epitomized by poetry) and everyday lang.: "Poetry, which is simply an utterance orientated toward the mode of expression, is governed by immanent laws" (Jakobson, "Noveishaia russkaia poeziia," 1921; partial Eng. trans., "Modern Russian Poetry: Velimir Khlebnikov," 1973). Poetry is thus the best example of the self-referentiality of the literary text, which—unlike the texts generated by everyday lang.—does not focus on transmitting a message or prompting action but seeks instead to arrest the reader's attention and to direct it onto the act of expression itself. The purpose behind this redirection of attention was never unambiguously formulated. For Jakobson, this was a mechanism of "deautomatizing" the reader's perception of the text; or as Eikhenbaum wrote, "[T]he aim of poetry is to make perceptible the texture of the word" (Lermontov, 1924; Eng. trans., 1981). For Shklovsky, it was more than that. In his version, art is called on to deliver "estrangement," which he employs as a synonym for deautomatization, while extending its powers: not only is our perception of form deautomatized, so that we can shed the ballast of conventions acquired through previous experiences of reading lit., but the objects themselves also regain freshness and substance in the process. In Shklovsky's famous dictum, estrangement makes the stone "stonier."

Early on, formalism conceived of the literary work of art as a "sum of devices," but this static notion was later abandoned in favor of a more dynamic view of the literary text as a system of features and functions, in whose interaction one feature or function plays the dominant role at any one time. Jakobson usually referred to that feature by using a substantive: dominanta. This impulse was carried forward by Tynianov in an attempt to understand and describe literary evolution as systemic change that reshuffles and rejuvenates the genre repertoire of lit. In Tynianov's account, lit. grows by the margins: it incorporates previously nonliterary discursive domains populated by hitherto marginal genres. Literary forms are not born and do not disappear, but they change their status and place on the literary map: "In the epoch of the decomposition of a certain genre, it moves from the centre to the periphery, while from the trivialities of literature, from its backyard and lowlands, a new phenomenon emerges in its place" (Tynianov, Arkhaisty i novatory [Archaists and Innovators]).

The exceptional significance of Rus. formalism as the first school to assert lit. as an autonomous object of theoretical analysis has obscured its background and complex position among other intellectual formations at the end of the 19th and the start of the 20th c. Formalism was a phenomenon and offspring of late modernity, epistemologically related to positivism, psychoanalysis, and Marxism. Formalism was as technical, precise, meticulous, and cold as positivism itself, but it differed from positivism in that it abandoned trust in encyclopedic scholarship and the genetic explanations inherited from the Enlightenment trad. of attention to climate, environment, race, and the historical "moment." Formalism sought to reconcile the exactitude of positivism with its own insistence on the independence of lit. from various "extra-literary series." Scientific soundness (nauchnost') remained a paramount value for both positivism and formalism, and the formalists proved this by their rigorous concentration on the quantifiable aspects of verse (Jakobson, Brik, Tomashevsky). Leon Trotsky (1879–1940) characterized formalist analysis, somewhat vulgarly but not far off the mark, as "essentially descriptive and semi-statistical."

There is also an important proximity to cl. psychoanalysis. Sigmund Freud was adamant that we are not altogether masters of our own inner lives. Dreams, jokes, and verbal slippages all come to denote the inevitable manifestation and validation of laws that operate independently of us but are nevertheless knowable; we cannot govern our own psychic lives, although we can hope to know what governs them. Similarly, formalism wanted to demonstrate that writers are unseated from their writing desks by forces that are beyond their control (most important, the structural characteristics of lang.) but that are, nevertheless, entirely amenable to scientific study and rationalization. This new understanding of human agency makes formalism much more than a school in literary studies and highlights its importance as an integral part of 20th-c. intellectual hist.

II. Competition with Marxism and Later Resonance. The formalists were active at a time when, in the Soviet Union, the intellectual scene was increasingly dominated by Marxism. Karl Marx's belief that hist. unfolds according to inexorable objective patterns, much as Evgenij Onegin would have been written, in Brik's account, even without Pushkin, made formalism and Marxism bitter competitors in the field of rational inquiry into the objective laws governing social life and creativity. After the October Revolution (1917), both movements strove to embody the ideals and values of scientism in a society that had succumbed to the lures of rapid modernization. In this sense, Marxism and formalism were competing on the same ground. It was no accident that Eikhenbaum was irritated when Lev Pumpiansky (1891–1940), in their conversations, thought the formalists close to the Marxists (Ustinov). This hidden competition never amounted to true dialogue, however, mainly because of one fundamental asymmetry characterizing the relationship between formalism and Marxism. Unlike Marxism, formalism never became a prescriptive discourse. Discovering the patterns of form, rhyme, and rhythm never amounted to formulating recipes for writing good prose or poetry. Thus, instead of a seminal dialogue, the two competitors were involved in a number of polemics usually initiated as attacks on formalism by Marxist ideologues. The first and most important example is Leon Trotsky's critique of formalism in Literatura i revoliutsiia (1923; Eng. trans., Literature and Revolution, 1925), followed much later by a prominent dispute in Leningrad (1927), in which Eikhenbaum, Tomashevsky, Tynianov, and Shklovsky represented the formalists, against Nikolai Derzhavin (1877–1953), Georgii Gorbachev, Mikhail Yakovlev, and the writer Lidiya Seifullina (1889–1954) as proponents of Marxism. Trotsky was not against the formal method as such. On the contrary, he welcomed it precisely because of its scientific potential to explain form. He objected to extending the sphere of the method's application too far: "The methods of Formalism, if confined within legitimate limits, may help to clarify the artistic and psychological peculiarities of literary form" (Literature and Revolution; italics added). This appeal for restraint and confinement suggests the nature of the emerging turf war between formalism and Marxism, waged not least with a view to securing a larger share of public attention and credit.

Formalism was not indifferent to power, nor was it driven to gestures of political significance solely as a means of survival. In 1924, the formalists published a number of interconnected articles devoted to Vladimir Lenin's style; some of the formalists were seriously engaged with *constructivism, the "literature of fact" (literatura fakta), and other devels. in leftist art. Formalism was thus not estranged from the processes of constructing a new culture and a new political identity after 1917. Of particular importance were Jakobson's and Brik's close association with Vladimir Mayakovsky (1893–1930) and the various phases of Rus. futurism, as well as the gravitation of some of the most distinguished formalists to LEF (Levyi Front Iskusstv [Left Front of the Arts]) and its jours. Lef and Novyi Lef. Eikhenbaum's desire to see "the revolution and philology" as mutually supportive entities indicated the determination with which the formalists were trying to inscribe themselves in the new social order.

By the mid-1920s, the formalists reached the recognition that neither formalism nor Marxist sociology of lit. could work in isolation and without some form of mediation. This new turn in Rus. formalism signaled fresh interest in literary circles and in the sociology of literary production, publishing, and reading. The idea of the "literary everyday" (literaturnyi byt), a porous notion that was summoned to capture the social situatedness of literary production, gained prominence. Eikhenbaum, in particular, engaged in the study of extraliterary "series" (riady). However, the Marxists took this not as a serious sign of natural scholarly evolution but as an admission of weakness or even past guilt. Medvedev's 1928 critique of formalism remains a rare example of a more sophisticated Marxist objection to its methodology.

The fate of formalism in the Soviet Union after 1930 was marked by wholesale rejection; formalism became a label of condemnation widely applied to stigmatize any interest in the formal aspects of lit. and art, as opposed to the "healthy" preoccupation with "content" (ideas). While the representatives of semantic paleontology (Olga Freidenberg, 1890–1955, and Izrail Frank-Kamenetsky, 1880–1937), the most interesting leftist movement in literary studies in the 1930s, were highly critical of formalism, Mikhail Bakhtin (1895–1975) safeguarded and continued its attention to marginal discursive forms. His theory of the novel draws on Tynianov's account of the evolution of "junior genres." As the *ode was for Tynianov, the novel is, in Bakhtin's account, an underdog before coming to prominence as a major genre; its life, according to Bakhtin, can be captured in the words Tynianov uses in Arkhaisty i novatory to describe the ode: "it existed not so much as a finished, self-enclosed genre, but as a certain constructional tendency." In Bakhtin's theory of the novel, one detects the same vision of not-yet-ready literary forms that present a dynamic discursive direction (ustanovka) rather than a finished product. Bakhtin's claim that the novel holds a unique position among other genres, guaranteed by its refusal to ossify into a fixed *canon, is foreshadowed by Shklovsky's judgment: "the canon of the novel as genre is perhaps more often than any other [canon] capable of parodying and modifying itself" (O teorii prozy, 1925–1929; Eng. trans., Theory of Prose, 1990).

When the Moscow-Tartu School (see STRUCTURALISM) came to prominence in the late 1960s, the revival of formalism was rather selective. While interest in the verifiable, quantitative aspects of the literary text was welcome and endorsed by Jurij Lotman, estrangement, a central category of early formalism, was cast aside as less productive. The "young formalists," esp. Ginzburg, who had seemed like mere traitors to their teachers, were now admitted to the wider canon of literary studies that had evolved since (and to some extent also from) formalism. Outside the Soviet Union, scholars of lit. in Poland and Czechoslovakia showed considerable appreciation of formalism, and some followed in its tracks during the 1930s. Of particular significance was the work in the late 1920s and throughout the 1930s of the Prague Linguistic Circle, in which Jakobson played a major role. In the West, the initial reaction, notably among Rus. émigré literary critics (e.g., Georgy Adamovich, 1894–1972, and Vladislav Khodasevich, 1886–1939), was negative; it was felt that formalism contradicted a long Rus. trad. of uncovering and asserting the moral values of lit. Speculations that a conversation between Sergei Tretyakov (1892–1937) and Bertolt Brecht (1898–1956) in 1935 led to the latter's adopting (and adapting) Shklovsky's ostranenie (see DEFAMILIARIZATION) as a cornerstone of his own method of Verfremdung have not been fully substantiated (cf. Tihanov 2005). Thus, it was not until the 1960s that Rus. formalism began to enjoy a notable presence in the West. An early influential selection of articles by the Rus. formalists, ed. by Todorov and prefaced by Jakobson, was published in France in 1965, arousing Herbert Marcuse's interest. The enduring legacy of formalism, enriched with the insights of the Prague Circle, was a significant factor in the growth of structuralism and narratology in the West in the 1960s and 1970s. Comparisons between Rus. formalism and Am. *New Criticism, on the other hand, while grounded in their shared predilection for *"close reading" and sustained focus on the structure of the poetic text, are less productive in establishing direct influence by the formalists. The arrival of *poststructuralism and deconstruction signaled the dominance, throughout the closing decades of the 20th c., of a new agenda, in which Rus. formalism has been present under erasure: recognized for its resistance to traditional notions of subjectivity and creative autonomy and, at the same time, disregarded for its insistence on poetic and everyday lang. being qualitatively different and on the literary work of art presenting a meaningfully structured whole.

SAGA. The word is borrowed into Eng. (and other langs.) from Icelandic. Through its Germanic root, saga is related to the Eng. say, saying; exact cognates are OE sagu and mod. Eng. (old) saw. At core, Old Icelandic saga signified an event that was spoken about, hence (1) the significant event itself, i.e., hist., story; or (2) the prose literary work in which it is realized—thus, roughly histoire and discours. For the extended Eng. senses, see the OED. In Old Icelandic lit., various types of sagas are recognized, among them: Icelandic family sagas (e.g., Njáls saga); kings' sagas (e.g., Heimskringla); mythic-heroic sagas (e.g., Völsunga saga); contemp. sagas (with several subgroups, e.g., Sturlunga saga); and Eur. romances in prose adaptation (riddarasögur). The "saga literature" as a whole comprises a huge corpus of narrative prose from med. Iceland (and Norway), whether native or adapted from continental models. The most renowned as lit., the 40-odd family sagas written mainly in the 13th c., center on conflicts among the settlers of the new land c. 930–1030 and are closely bound up with social, legal, historical, and cultural realities; they have been compared to historical novels, but the comparison does not do justice to the dialectic between oral trad. and written creativity in the genre's evolution. The chaste saga style, with invisible narrator and realistic drama, is justly famous; its prose poetics is largely a poetics of human behavior viewed through an apparently clear glass: the saga itself. Prose surface is broken by quoted poems in many sagas, creating a prosimetrical counterpoint between sobriety and passion.

SAN FRANCISCO RENAISSANCE. On October 13, 1955, a poetry reading by five poets at the Six Gallery in San Francisco—Allen Ginsberg, Philip Lamantia, Michael McClure, Gary Snyder, and Philip Whalen—began what came to be known as the San Francisco Renaissance. The principal event of that reading and the following years was the emergence of *Beat poetry, manifested on this occasion by Ginsberg's Howl; but even at the reading, Beat poetics (*confessional, incantatory, and profane) was only one section of a literary environment that grew to embrace precursors, contemporaries, and dissenters incl. Kenneth Rexroth, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Robert Duncan, Jack Spicer, Joanne Kyger, and William Everson. As one of the early episodes of *postmodernism in Am. poetry, the San Francisco Renaissance joined several vivid tendencies of postwar poetic culture (*nature poetry, *jazz poetry, *performance) with the indigenous character of the city's dispersed literary scene, an alternative to long-dominant centers such as New York and Boston. The San Franciscan "poetics of place" paid particular homage to the city's unique landscape and culture, as well as its political and social radicalism. Moreover, since at least the 1940s, many Bay Area poets had identified with a *canon of influences, such as *surrealism and the extreme lang. play of Gertrude Stein and the later James Joyce, that set them apart from the conversation among Am. poets elsewhere. Its best historian, Michael Davidson, has characterized the San Francisco Renaissance as held together by an expressivist poetics that was fundamentally neoromantic in ideology and performative in ethos.

Like the *New York school of the 1960s, the San Francisco Renaissance expressed a place and a moment together but also launched a number of careers that outlasted it. Most observers agree that the renaissance was over by the late 1960s. It was quickly succeeded and overwritten by several renaissances, some that carried forward its central preoccupations with exploring subjective expression (now by such poets as Robert Hass, Robert Pinsky, and Denise Levertov), but others reacting to the idealisms and omissions of the renaissance poets by foregrounding collective voices (as did several poets of color of the 1970s and after, notably Lorna Dee Cervantes and Victor Hernández Cruz); or in the case of the *Language poets of the Bay Area such as Ron Silliman, Leslie Scalapino, and Lyn Hejinian (the Western cohort of a movement that originated concurrently in New York), disclosing the complicity of lang. in social discourses that create the very subjects who purport to speak directly through poems by Ginsberg or Snyder. In this second phase from 1970 to the turn of the 21st c., no position lacks a model or a forerunner in the multifarious generation of poets who made the San Francisco Renaissance, but, at the same time, no assumption of that earlier group goes unmodified or uncontradicted by its diverse successors.

SANSKRIT POETICS

I. Early History
II. Middle Period: Sanskrit Poetics in Kashmir and Beyond
III. New Poetics in Early Modernity

Sanskrit poetics is an intellectual discipline that accompanied literary production in the highly prestigious medium of Sanskrit for nearly two millennia. The discipline had its roots in the early centuries of the first millennium CE and continued uninterrupted into the early mod. era. It formed an important component of the education of Sanskrit literati and of writers, scholars, and artists in other langs. and media.

Indeed, while Sanskrit poetics tended to ignore local langs. in the vast area stretching from present-day Afghanistan in the west to the Indonesian archipelago in the east, it had a profound impact on lit. and culture in these regions. Works on Sanskrit poetics traveled throughout this world and were translated into many of its langs. A prominent example is Daṇḍin's Kāvyādarśa (Mirror of Poetry, ca. 700 CE), a work that was transmitted to southeast Asia, if not to China, and translated into Tamil and Kannada in the south of the Indian peninsula, Pali and Sinhalese in Sri Lanka, and Tibetan (see TIBET, TRADITIONAL POETRY AND POETICS OF) far to the north. Poets, intellectuals, and artists in the Indian subcontinent proper constantly kept up to date with Sanskrit poetics. A case in point is Bhānudatta (fl. ca. 1500), whose treatises on aesthetics inspired early mod. literati in Telugu and Hindi, as well as miniature painters in various Indian locations in the 17th and 18th cs.

The achievements of this long-standing and sophisticated discipline include an unparalleled analysis of figurative lang., as in the investigation of the formal, logical, semantic, and pragmatic aspects of *simile and its numerous sister *tropes; a complex and overarching theory of readers' emotional response to lit. (see AFFECT, EMOTION); and a highly complex semantic-cognitive analysis of denotation (see CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION), *metaphor, and suggestion, ling. capacities identified as enabling the readers' emotional and aesthetic responses.

We can divide the hist. of Sanskrit poetics into three phases: first, an early stage, from the discipline's mostly lost origins in the first centuries of the Common Era to about the 8th c., during which it was primarily concerned with imparting the prescriptions of poetry. A second stage, from the 9th c. to the 15th c., was marked by repeated attempts to turn the early discussion into a respectable, coherent theory, on a par with Sanskrit's other branches of thought, and by an increasing focus on reading rather than writing poetry. During a third phase, which lasted until the early colonial era, Sanskrit poetics reinvented itself as a prestigious theory that attracted thinkers from other disciplines and provided space and tools for philosophical and theological issues outside poetics proper. While this tripartite division is crude and while earlier disciplinary strands continued to thrive concurrently with the new ones, it may help to frame the important voices, topics, and tensions in the long hist. of Sanskrit poetics.

I. Early History. Sanskrit poetics must have evolved late relative to the poetry itself. The first extant works of this discipline are Bhāmaha's Kāvyālaṃkāra (Ornamenting Poetry), written in the 6th or 7th c. CE, and Daṇḍin's Kāvyādarśa. These works lag behind Sanskrit's first surviving narrative poems and plays by Aśvaghoṣa (fl. 2d c. CE) and Kālidāsa (fl. 4th c.), even though the poetry assumes some codified knowledge about it. It is also clear that Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin follow predecessors whom they occasionally name, and fragments of this earlier discussion are traceable. But it is telling that later authors hardly ever refer to ancient sources: in the eyes of posterity, Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin are the discipline's founding fathers.

Indeed, Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin were deeply influenced by ideas and analytical tools that were first formulated in separate, more established knowledge systems. These include the authoritative Veda-related trads. of grammar, which devised a highly complex descriptive tool kit and a metalinguistic idiom for the analysis of vast ling. phenomena; Mīmāṃsā (Vedic hermeneutics), which developed a sophisticated philosophy of lang. for the purpose of clarifying Vedic statements and countering the Buddhist critique of the Veda; and Nyāya (logic), which produced, among other things, a comprehensive theory of inference, oral testimony, and verbal debate with the aim of examining the validity of Vedic utterances. Another corollary of Vedic scripture worth mentioning here is the separate science of *prosody, which Daṇḍin dubs a "raft for those who sail the sea of poetry." Common to all these disciplines was their focus on lang., a trajectory shared by the nascent poetics. A major question of Sanskrit poetics was what distinguishes the lang. of poetry from other "things made of language," as Daṇḍin put it. In a way, Bhāmaha's and Daṇḍin's works are generative grammars for poetic lang.; Bhāmaha's even has a chapter dedicated to grammatical issues per se.

In addition to the Veda-related knowledge systems, Sanskrit poetics was also influenced by practical and artistic discourses that had a ling. dimension to them. Particularly important in this connection is dramaturgy (Nāṭyaśāstra), where aspects of stage plays, incl. plot construction, character types, and various poetic qualities of the script have already been theorized. Although Sanskrit did not develop an independent discipline of rhet., practical knowledge regarding eloquent and persuasive speech, accumulated in South Asian courts and chanceries and preserved in inscriptional *panegyrics, also influenced Sanskrit poetics. The latter strand of knowledge, like the poetry it accompanied, was closely associated with the royal court.

These varied influences are apparent in the discipline's early phase, when theoreticians were busy documenting the charming elements of poetry, whether euphonic, syntactic, or semantic, in an approach reminiscent of grammar's description of all elements of the lang. from the level of phonemes on. The key category in this investigation was the alaṃkāra* or ornament (to the body of a poem), a highly flexible concept allowing for a wide variety of aesthetic effects and analyses. Under this heading, the quintessential literary devices of simile (upamā) and metaphor (rūpaka) were defined and analyzed according to their propositional structure (A is like B; A is B) and the logical relationship they entail (semblance, identity). The method and lang. for analyzing such figures were borrowed originally from grammar, where both figures were described as occurring in normal nominal compounds (as in snow-white or moon-face). A second group of alaṃkāras allowed for the intimation of similarity through propositions of "doubt" (saṃśaya: "is this a lotus, or is it your face?") and its "resolution" (nirṇaya: "The luster of the lotus simply cannot shame the moon. / For, after all, the moon has it soundly defeated. / This therefore must be nothing but your face."). These were modeled after steps in the logicians' syllogism. A third group of ornaments, defined by their emotional content (e.g., rasavat, "flavorful"), reflected the insights of theorists of drama, who analyzed a play's ability to evoke certain emotional "flavors" or rasas. Other ornaments mimicked courtly speech behaviors, such as the elegant pretext (paryāyokta), veiled critique (aprastutapraśaṃsā), and artful praise (vyājastuti); and still others involved auditory effects, such as *alliteration (anuprāsa) and twinning (yamaka).

In addition to ornaments, two other early categories need mention here: Bhāmaha and Daṇḍin defined a set of literary qualities (*guṇa*s) such as lucidity (prasāda) and intensity (ojas), and explained how these combine in regional poetic dialects (although these were ideal-type dialects that poets could adopt regardless of their region), and flaws (*doṣa*s) that hinder the success of poetry (anything from nongrammaticality and loose construction to obscenity). The early works also include a cursory mapping of literary genres (both in verse and prose) and of literary langs. of the cosmopolitan variety (which, in addition to Sanskrit, included a few Middle Indic langs. collectively known as Prakrits). But there is no attempt to present anything like a rigorous conceptual framework that incorporates all the different elements of analysis. The early trad. was not invested in developing a universal theory of poetics or aesthetics, but rather in cataloging, defining, and illustrating the various figurative and ornamental devices, typically exemplified on the level of single verses created ad hoc for the purpose of discussion and primarily under the catchall category of alaṃkāra.

Nonetheless, the discussion was not entirely particularistic or atheoretical. General aesthetic (and socioaesthetic) criteria were occasionally invoked in debating the value of certain devices. E.g., Bhāmaha did not endorse factuality (svabhāvokti) in the description of (typically natural) entities, whereas Daṇḍin believed that such portrayals, although more typical of scientific idiom, are welcome in poetry as well, if the entities in question are pretty in and of themselves. Still, both agreed that a certain type of "crookedness" or indirection (vakrokti) is the defining characteristic of poetic expressivity. Precious little is said about this crookedness. Bhāmaha mentions it in the context of poetic intensification or *hyperbole (atiśayokti). His example concerns the dita tree: so white is its blossom that it becomes entirely invisible in moonlight, when its presence can only be inferred by the humming of bees. This is not the most straightforward way of describing the tree, but it is precisely the circuitous highlighting of its ties with moonlight, which replicates the hue of its flowers, and with the melodious bees, which call to mind its fragrance, that, according to Bhāmaha, allows the poet to capture its unworldly beauty. For Daṇḍin, a key to poetic crookedness is the poet's exploitation of polysemy and other ling. accidents to create additional layers of signification. This "embrace" (śleṣa) of extra signification into the text, a phenomenon far wider in scope than *paronomasia and *allegory combined, emerged as a serious theoretical problem in Sanskrit poetics, partly because of its capacity to inhabit and replicate the entire spectrum of tropes. Bhāmaha was at pains to contain śleṣa and present it as an encapsulated form of *figuration, but for Daṇḍin, it is coterminous with crooked expressivity.

Indeed, Daṇḍin's work offers a subtle but holistic framework, wherein a self-reflexive interplay exists between a host of ornamental devices that liken, intentionally confuse, or blatantly identify entities from the poem's here and now (say, a woman's face) and those of a figurative realm (the moon), and those that playfully question or sever the ties between the two realms: from "distinction" (vyatireka), where the face is said to excel the moon; to "dissimilarity" (viṣama), where the two are said to be worlds apart; and "incongruity" (ananvaya), where the very notion that the beloved's face can have a parallel is effectively denied by comparing it to itself. Daṇḍin's inventory of ornamental devices hints at the relations between such unions and separations and indicates how ling. doubling can heighten the coexistence of these contradictory trajectories every step of the way.

II. Middle Period: Sanskrit Poetics in Kashmir and Beyond. Starting in the last decades of the 8th c., the Himalayan kingdom of Kashmir strove to turn itself into the center of Sanskrit learning and arts. Here, thinkers first ventured to make Sanskrit poetics an independent and respectable science (śāstra). Several tendencies typify the long-standing and highly influential discussion on poetics in Kashmir. First was the push for systematization: This trend is first illustrated by Vāmana, who worked at the court of Kashmir's King Jayāpīḍa (r. 779–813) and whose treatise on poetics deliberately mimics Pāṇini's aphorisms on grammar. Among his theoretical innovations, Vāmana demonstrated that the highly heterogeneous alaṃkāras are analyzable within a single and coherent paradigm, as variations on the basic formula of the simile. But while many later thinkers agreed that simile was the core of Sanskrit's figuration, the subjecting of all tropes to a single analysis acquired little following. This failure indicates the danger in oversystematization, when the discipline's multifaceted conceptual insights are put in a formal straitjacket.

A second dominant trend was the large-scale incorporation of semantic theories. An early example is in the work of Udbhaṭa, Vāmana's colleague at the same court. Udbhaṭa sought to move from a formal/logical analysis of tropes to grounding them in specific semantic capacities and cognitive scenarios. Consider Udbhaṭa's own illustration of metaphor: "Pouring moonlight-spray / from their lunar jars, / the night-maidens watered the heavens, / that garden whose blossoms are stars." Earlier writers dubbed the metaphorical identification at play here "forming" (rūpaka), since of the two entities, one—namely, gardeners—lends its form (rūpa) to the other—namely, moonrise. Udbhaṭa, however, explained this process not by the proposition of identification or the notion of form lending but by a secondary ling. capacity (guṇavṛtti) it necessitates: the primary denotative function of a word such as "spray," as soon as it is equated with "moonlight," is blocked and gets replaced by qualities that are only metaphorically associated with "spray," such as purity and coolness. Rudraṭa, who followed Udbhaṭa by several decades, showed similar tendencies in his innovative analysis of "embrace" or manufactured *polysemy (*śleṣa). Whereas earlier writers dealt with the tendency of polysemy to inhabit the propositional structures of simile, metaphor, and other tropes, Rudraṭa was interested in exploring the cognitive interplays between the two sets of meaning (supplanting, supplementing, etc.) in a śleṣa and their charms.

A third important tendency was the gradual assimilation of a separate discussion, much of which was also taking place in Kashmir, concerning theatrical performance and the spectators' response to it. Unlike Aristotle's notions of *mimesis and *catharsis, this debate highlighted a fixed set of eight or nine emotional states on the part of the depicted character and/or actor and the dramatic conditions that allowed the spectator to experience, or "taste," them in a special aesthetic form. Kashmiri theorists were increasingly drawn to discussing such emotional "flavors" (rasas) in poetry as well. Thus, in addition to writing on tropology, Udbhaṭa composed a (now lost) commentary on the ancient treatise on dramaturgy, and Rudraṭa divided his work on poetics proper between alaṃkāras and rasas, although still without a theoretical framework combining the two types of concepts.

All these trends are combined masterfully in the Dhvanyāloka (Light on Suggestion) of Ānandavardhana, one of the trad.'s seminal figures, who worked at the court of Kashmir's King Avantivarman (r. 855–83). Ānandavardhana merged the aesthetic theory of drama, which highlights the evocation of rasas, with a teleological hermeneutic model derived from the discipline of scriptural analysis (Mīmāṃsā), according to which all the elements of a text are seen as subordinate to the production of a single overriding import (a dictum, in the case of the Veda). For him, the overriding telos of poetry is inducing rasa. This goal cannot, of course, in lit., be achieved by means of artistic performance, as on stage. It comes about instead through suggestion, a semantic capacity beyond denotation and metaphor that, as he points out, none of his predecessors had recognized. This newly discovered ling. power is potentially informative (vastu-dhvani) when facts are intimated, or figurative (alaṃkāra-dhvani), when tropes are implied; but, in poetry, these analytically separable types of insinuation ultimately culminate in the suggestion of an emotional flavor (rasa-dhvani). Indeed, Ānandavardhana subordinated all the other elements his predecessors had identified—and in particular the poetic ornaments—to emotive suggestion, which he identified as poetry's "soul." Ānandavardhana, thus, cleverly inverted his discipline's old root metaphor to support his new theory: literary ornaments, he said, just like bracelets and necklaces, can embellish an already beautiful body, but they cannot explain its intrinsic charm.

Consider a verse by Kālidāsa (fl. 4th c.) describing the god Śiva when awakened from deep meditation by the beautiful Umā: "Śiva, his calm somewhat disturbed, / like the ocean when the moon begins to rise, / cast his eyes on Umā's face / with its balsam pear of a lip" (trans. adapted from McCrea). Umā's lip is identified here with the red balsam pear, and Śiva's disturbed composure is likened to the ocean's turbulence during moonrise, implying that Umā's face is the moon. Earlier theorists would have analyzed this verse using the categories of metaphor and simile. But for Ānandavardhana, its poetic effect rests on its emotional content, namely, Śiva's budding love for Umā, which these literary ornaments serve only to enhance. Śiva's falling in love, argues Ānandavardhana, is neither denoted nor brought about through metaphorical usage. Rather, it is suggested by the poet's depiction of Śiva's loss of composure and gazing at Umā's beautiful face. Actors on stage evoke emotional states through bodily gestures, and sensitive spectators can "taste" the flavor of the depicted love. But Ānandavardhana argued that responsive readers too can enjoy the same flavor, thanks to Kālidāsa's skilful use of suggestion. Indeed, he demonstrated that his new semantic-aesthetic theory empowered Sanskrit literati to engage, perhaps for the first time, in serious lit. crit.: he identified the chief emotional components in the great epics, judged some classics by their success in producing a good balance among the different "flavors," and maintained that it is only dhvani* that explains both the genius of masters such as Kālidāsa and the possibility of meaningful innovation in poetry.

Initially stirring a heated debate, Ānandavardhana's thesis was adopted by all Kashmiri thinkers after 1100 CE. With dhvani as its centerpiece, the Kashmiri strand of Sanskrit poetics emerged as a unified, hierarchical, and powerful theory. The highly influential Kāvyaprakāśa (Light on Poetry, ca. 1100) by Mammaṭa, yet another illustrious Kashmiri thinker, provided a definitive synthesis of Kashmiri poetics following Ānandavardhana's intellectual revolution.

Mammaṭa used the different capacities of lang. as described by Ānandavardhana—denotation, metaphorical usage, and suggestion—to explain the existence of different grades of poetry. It is at its best when dominated by suggestion that leads to the tasting of emotions (dhvani); ranking second is "ancillary suggestion" (guṇībhūtavyaṅgya), poetry whose suggested content is subordinate, aesthetically or otherwise, to what is directly or metaphorically expressed; finally, "flashy" (citra) poetry is devoid of suggestion and based only on other ling. capacities. Within this gradation, the discipline's different analytical categories were put to use: suggestive processes and emotional flavors were crucial for the analysis of dhvani, while the charm of "flashy" poetry was analyzed using the alaṃkāra tool kit, which Mammaṭa revisited at length. If Ānandavardhana led a "paradigm shift" in Sanskrit poetics, Mammaṭa signaled the resumption of "normal science." The overall framework he provided invited new studies on alaṃkāras, rasa-related matters (in poetry or dramaturgy), semantics, and cognition, either in independent treatises or commentaries on older works (Mammaṭa's own work in particular). "Normal science" also meant that the new theory was now used in the analyses of poems by leading literati and commentators such as Arjunavarmadeva (fl. 13th c.) and Mallinātha (fl. 14th c.), both of whom lived outside Kashmir.

And yet the discipline's paradigm shift was never complete, as the new paradigm was ridden by several irresolvable tensions. The subsequent discussion was, thus, never entirely "normal" and was primarily driven by these frictions. One important friction was between the new theoretical framework with dhvani at its center and the earlier conceptual apparatus, in particular the alaṃkāras. Note that, despite the rather marginal role Ānandavardhana assigned these devices, he was unwilling to dispose of them altogether. At the same time, his theory, for all its universality, did not really explain the aesthetic effects of individual alaṃkāras, esp. in poetry that was not oriented toward the suggestion of emotional flavors, and this problem found no real solution in Mammaṭa's synthesis. After Mammaṭa, the discipline increasingly regravitated toward the analysis of the expressivity, structure of, and interrelations among the many "ornaments" of poetry. This analysis was carried out outside the dhvani framework and often resisted any overriding scheme. A clear indication of this tension is that Sanskrit poetics, now claiming dhvani as its greatest theoretical achievement, nonetheless came to be called the Science of Literary Ornaments (alaṃkāras), or Alaṃkāraśāstra.

Another problem was the location of rasa and how readers accessed it. Ānandavardhana left out of his discussion the mysterious process by which readers "savor" the emotions of depicted characters while avoiding the complications of sharing the love of others or the potential unsavoriness of emotions such as grief or fear. Another pair of seminal Kashmiri thinkers, Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka (fl. ca. 900) and Abhinavagupta (fl. ca. 1000), tried to fill this lacuna by producing yet another semantic theory of literary lang. modeled after Mīmāṃsā, one that came with a groundbreaking aesthetic psychology. Both argued that, just as a Vedic passage that describes a sacrificial act has the pragmatic effect of producing a desire to take similar action in the faithful, so lit. has a special kind of "illocutionary" power (bhāvanā) to produce an aesthetic experience in readers. This experience, they argued, is necessarily pleasurable because lit. abstracts characters of their individuality, precisely by identifying Umā's face with the moon and similar "alienating" features of literary lang.; it thus enables readers to "taste" love for no one in particular or to experience fear that is stripped of any frightening cause. Rasa is, thus, the experience of emotions in the pure state, outside the boundaries of subject and object, self and other, an experience that leads to a rapturous state that both Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka and Abhinavagupta compared to the religious ecstasy of self-transcendence. In the case of Abhinavagupta, this comparison was further colored by his nondualist metaphysics, according to which the rasa experience resulted from the temporary removal of a veil covering the ultimate self (ātman). But whereas Ānandavardhana's theory became a consensus, those of Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka and Abhinavagupta were not: the location and experience of rasa remained an unresolved question. There were even those who postulated that rasa was overrated. As early as the late 10th c., a Kashmiri thinker named Kuntaka cataloged a large variety of aesthetically pleasing elements. These included both "ornaments" and "flavors" but also many other aspects of poetry—from the name of a work to its strategies of *intertextuality—all of which he viewed as part of an expanded but very loosely defined catalog of poetry's "crooked" nature. Many of the items on Kuntaka's vast catalog could not find a place in a rasa-dominated theory.

This rasa-centered tension is related to another friction, between Kashmir and the rest of the subcontinent. The centuries-long intellectual hegemony of the small northern vale notwithstanding, work of literary thinkers elsewhere was not suspended. These thinkers paid close attention to the discussion in Kashmir but often had their own ideas about where the discipline should go. Particularly worthy of mention here are King Bhoja of Dhār (r. 1011–55) and the Jain mendicant Hemacandra (fl. 11th c., Gujarat). Both these highly prolific writers composed encyclopedic texts on poetics, and both attempted their own syntheses of the field. Like Kuntaka, both combined the theories coming from Kashmir with a vast variety of other materials, incl., in the case of Hemacandra, ideas about how poets should work and lead their lives. While the syntheses of Bhoja and Hemacandra never proved as influential as Mammaṭa's, they did produce innovative arguments and followers, esp. with respect to the question of rasa. Bhoja saw the Kashmiri discussion as obsessed with the reader, where in fact, he believed, rasa was located in the depicted character. This character-centered model of rasa is crucial to the socially normative function of lit. as understood by Bhoja, for whom the emotional experience of characters such as Rāma functions didactically as a model for emulation. As for Hemacandra, two of his direct students, Rāmacandra and Guṇacandra, boldly challenged the Kashmiri theory that the experience of rasa is necessarily pleasant, even when the underlying emotions are not. Rather, they believed, the aesthetic flavor of the emotion is not very different from the emotion itself (i.e., grief is the "flavor" of grief), even if the spectator/reader can intellectually appreciate, and thus enjoy, the skill involved in evoking it. These views reflect an undying resentment against the powerful rasa theory of Abhinavagupta and also, in the case of these Jain thinkers, to its specific theological inflection.

Another noteworthy tension pertains to Sanskrit poetics' constant borrowing from older and prestigious knowledge systems while attempting to establish itself as an independent discipline. A clear manifestation of this tension is in Ānandavardhana's crowning of the hierarchical semantic model, which he borrowed wholesale from Mīmāṃsā, with a ling. capacity not recognized in the discipline of Mīmāṃsā or, for that matter, in any South Asian philosophical school. Indeed, most of Ānandavardhana's immediate critics attacked his postulating the ling. capacity of suggestion for the evocation of rasa. Even after this argument subsided, the need for respectability for Sanskrit poetics and independence as a branch of thought continued to be felt in the subsequent discussion.

III. New Poetics in Early Modernity. The clearest indication that something fresh was happening in Sanskrit poetics starting around the 1500s is that the literary theorists themselves began to label in profusion particular views and viewers as new. Researchers have only started to explore this trend, found across Sanskrit knowledge systems around this time, and identify what, in fact, was novel in the last active period of Sanskrit poetics. Here we will mention several areas of innovation, using two of the discipline's last towering figures as our primary reference point: Appayya Dīkṣita (1520–93), who was associated with several minor courts in South India, and Jagannātha Paṇḍitarāja, so-called King of Pundits at the Mughal court of Shāh Jahān (r. 1628–58) in the north.

Newness in this era consists, first, of a new engagement with the old topics. Early mod. writers approached the received categories with an acute historical awareness of a sort the discipline had never before seen. They tended to write in a pioneering essay style, where the product, in the form of refined answers to older, unresolved questions, was often subjugated to the process: an exercise in the hist. of ideas. An example is Appayya Dīkṣita's essay on *simile in his incomplete magnum opus Citramīmāṃsā (Investigation of Figuration). While the essay does provide a new definition for one of the discipline's quintessential tropes, it focuses more on previous formulations and the difficulties facing any attempt to capture simile accurately.

Historical awareness is tied to a new methodology, partly related to the procedures and jargon of Sanskrit's Navyanyāya (New School of Logic), of applying unprecedentedly demanding standards of intellectual rigor, consistency, parsimony, and clarity in dealing with the disciplinary issues. This methodology emboldened explorations about which earlier generations had seemed hesitant. Appayya Dīkṣita, e.g., described suggestion as a process involving attention to subtle clues and the systematic elimination of alternative conclusions that is not unlike deduction. This rather subversive view of dhvani forced Sanskrit literati to revisit a position that had been emphatically rejected many centuries before, namely, Mahimabhaṭṭa's (ca. 1050) critique of Ānandavardhana's "suggestion" as another name for inference.

Jagannātha, who wholeheartedly opposed Appayya's views on dhvani, was nonetheless receptive to other bold suggestions inspired by the same rigorous method. Consider, e.g., his breathtaking survey of the views on rasa in his encyclopedic Rasagaṅgādhara (Ocean of Rasa), another example of the discipline's new historicity. Here Jagannātha reports not unfavorably that the new view on the rasa experience is that it is based on a temporary identification with a fictive character, made possible by the reader's sensitivity, which is theoretically analyzed as a form of a cognitive defect. It is this "defect" that allows the reader to feel, while the illusion lasts, the character's emotion, such as Rāma's love for Sītā. This novel view, as presented by Jagannātha, audaciously inverts Abhinvagupta's cl. metaphor. For Abhinavagupta, the rasa experience results from the temporary removal of a veil covering the self, but, for Jagannātha's contemporaries, it results from the imposition of a veil. Thus, in this case, the new position moves away from mysticism and metaphysics to a logical stance and a mundanely oriented psychology. The same is true with respect to the joyousness of the experience. For Abhinavagupta, the question receives an automatic and extreme answer in the mystical doctrine of the inherently blissful nature of the self, which needs only to be unveiled to shine forth. But the new position allows for the possibility that the identification with a suffering character may produce a mixture of pleasure and pain, even if pleasure is more dominant.

Another novelty is in the status of Sanskrit poetics, which finally comes to enjoy considerable cross-disciplinary prestige and asserts its autonomy from other branches of learning. Several trends are indicative of this change. First, poetics suddenly began to attract scholars in the authoritative fields of grammar, logic, Mīmāṃsā, and Vedānta, who composed in profusion treatises or commentaries in poetics (Appayya himself is a writer on Mīmāṃsā and Vedānta who took to poetics). Second, reversing the pattern characterizing the previous millennium, concepts and terminology from Sanskrit poetics were now widely applied to other philosophical, theological, and sectarian discussions. The most famous example of this is in the works of Rūpa Goswamin and his followers, who made a new "devotional" (Bhakti) rasa the centerpiece of a soteriology, wherein acting in Kṛṣṇa's cosmic play led to tasting his essence. Both Appayya and Jagannātha reject the "devotional rasa," but Appayya himself applies the poetical toolkit to a sectarian debate concerning the theological message of the Rāmāyaṇa. Arguing against attempts by followers of Viṣṇu to appropriate this epic poem (and also against Ānandavardhana's claim that its main suggested content is the flavor of compassion), Appayya used his subversive notion of dhvani to assert that the Rāmāyaṇa is scattered with subtle clues about the power of the god Śiva and is, therefore, carefully designed to suggest his supremacy. Third, late thinkers such as Jagannātha constantly maintain that the stances of poetics are independent of those of all other knowledge systems. Indeed, at the heart of this "new poetics" is an appeal to the taste and sensibilities of the expert reader as the only authority in a discipline that had a rather turbulent hist. and never possessed a core (sūtra) treatise of unchallenged command. This stance is both the source of a new confidence in early mod. poetics and a cause of anxiety when, as in the case of Jagannātha's critique of Appayya, the reader's judgment is thoroughly contested.

Anxiety may also be understood in the context of new external challenges. For centuries, Sanskrit literary culture maintained a largely stable set of conventions, characters, and scenarios; and the basic tool kit of Sanskrit poetics did not significantly change since the introduction of dhvani. But in the second half of the second millennium CE, this long-standing trad. found itself in a radically new political context and facing increasing competition from a series of fully formed and confident literary cultures: regional lits. in Telugu, Hindi, and a host of other South Asian literary langs.; Persian, the prestige lang. of India's Muslim courts, incl. the mighty Mughals; and finally Eng., the lang. of colonial power. The extent to which Sanskrit literary culture reacted to these new challenges is still open to debate. In poetics, to be sure, one can detect the presence of new realities. Appayya Dīkṣita invents a pair of poetic ornaments for the reworking of *proverbs, and one of his examples is explicitly presented as translating a popular Telugu saying. Then, there is the "new" position famously reported by Jagannātha, namely, that out of Mammaṭa's three "conditions" for composing poetry—talent, learning, and training—only the first was essential. It has been argued that this stance reflects the new ideal of spontaneity claimed by Hindi's devotional poets. It has also been suggested that Jagannātha's ideas and poetry bear traces of Persian lit., in which he was well versed. These traces, however, are peripheral to the main current of Sanskrit poetics in early modernity. Despite the fact that every writer on alaṃkāra and rasa was fluent in at least one regional lang. and although the regional literary cultures constantly engaged with Sanskrit's cosmopolitan model, Sanskrit poetics remained largely oblivious to devels. in the vernaculars. The discipline likewise ignored Persian, even as many literati received patronage from Muslim rulers and even though some Sanskrit poets undertook daring experiments of incorporation and trans. In the 19th c., when Eng. gradually became the lang. of power, education, and lit. in South Asia, the discipline of Sanskrit poetics, not unlike other Sanskrit knowledge systems, dwindled and came to be studied more as an object of mod. intellectual and cultural hist. than practiced as the living and ever-innovative trad. that it once was.

IV. A Summary History of Sanskrit Poems and Poets

I. The Origins of Kāvya. Lit. in India—and in particular poetry in an early form of the Sanskrit (Saṃskṛtam) lang.—has a hist. of least 3,500 years, from roughly the second millennium BCE to the present. An IE (Indo-Aryan) lang. spoken and used primarily by social and cultural elites in early and med. India, Sanskrit continues to serve as a medium of creative expression in mod. India as well. At some point in the early centuries of the Common Era, the descriptive designation Sanskrit becomes synonymous with what was previously conceived of as only a sophisticated register of lang. (bhāṣa) itself. The word Sanskrit connotes sophistication, a lang. that has been "processed," "crafted," and "refined." While ordinarily it is the notion of lang. processed by grammar that is intended in the appellation Sanskrit, poetry in Sanskrit—esp. "classical" belles lettres—also bears the qualities of refinement, sophistication, and high levels of craftsmanship.

In the interest of precision and concision, the focus of this entry is on Sanskrit poetry understood as belles lettres (kāvya, vānmaya, sāhitya), whose origins may be fixed around the several centuries prior to the beginning of the Common Era and whose cl. period culminates around the 12th c. CE; Sanskrit poetry more or less in the cl. style, however, continues to be written and received to the present day. The existing corpus from these centuries alone is, at a conservative estimate, at least 1,000 times larger than what has survived in cl. Gr. While certainly relevant to a broader discussion of Sanskrit lit., this entry excludes any elaboration on the multiple genres of Sanskrit poetic lit. that precede, prefigure, and inform what ultimately comes to be called kāvya—lit. (largely in verse and written, though with a strong emphasis on recitation and oral transmission) consciously crafted as an art form that is predominantly secular and humanist in scope. While kāvya can be written in numerous langs.—at least 40, incl. the various regional langs. of premod. South Asia (Prakrit) and the several Jain langs. called the Apabhraṃśa—the preponderance of extant poems are in Sanskrit. Kāvya subsumes most poetic forms (*lyric, *narrative, *dramatic, *panegyric, etc.), but its significance as "imaginative literature" excludes (for the Sanskrit intellectual trad.) sacred scripture (āgama), such as the versified collection of ancient hymns to Vedic gods and poems of Vedic life (Rig Veda), e.g., or the flashes of poetry in the early Buddhist Pali *canon known as the Tripiṭaka (Three Baskets). While often regarded as the "longest poem in the world" (seven times the length of the Iliad and the Odyssey together) and replete with elements of kāvya, the great *epic Māhabhārata (The Great Story of Bharata's Descendants) technically falls out of the purview of kāvya since it is regarded as a work of received "history" or "tradition" (itihāsa) and also a discourse on ethics and morality (dharmaśāstra), likewise the store of versified myths and legends known as purāṇa.

Since the Mahābhārata sometimes refers to itself as a kāvya, however, and contains within it the widely translated Bhagavad-Gītā (The Song of the Lord)—a lyrically charged philosophical poem regarded both as lit. and scripture—many plausibly consider it as among the earliest Sanskrit poems. The other "historical" epic of the ancient period that complements the Mahābhārata certainly fits the category of kāvya by all emic estimations: in fact, the Rāmāyaṇa (Rāma's Journey) is considered to be the first poem (ādi-kāvya) in Sanskrit and its author Vālmīki the first poet (ādi-kavi). Both epics (assuming some semblance of a final form sometime around the beginning of the Common Era) take in a wide scope, subsuming Vedic India's social, political, moral, spiritual, and aesthetic imagination. The Mahābhārata creatively details the dynastic struggles and ultimate destruction of early Indian royalty (the self-styled lunar dynasty) centered on Yamuna river settlements north of mod. Delhi. A dramatically tragic and gloomy work—punctuated with moments of romance, comedy, *riddles, and *hymns, prosaic moralizing, and the epiphanic grandeur of divine revelation (Kṛṣṇa as God)—the Mahābhārata has been the single greatest source for later Sanskrit poetry's narrative themes. The poetry of the Mahābhārata is often described as a rough diamond, with frequent irregularities in terms of standard grammatical practice (magnificently described and codified sometime in the 4th or 5th c. BCE by the grammarian Pāṇini) and loaded with oral formulas of stock *epithets and *similes; in contrast are the later mahākāvyas (great courtly epic poems) and *muktaka*s (loose *stanzas and *epigrams), written in pristine cl. Sanskrit and fancied as chiseled diamonds with favored angles and cuts. Unlike the confused status of the Mahābhārata as kāvya, the Rāmāyaṇa prefigures the major elements (through a narrative of poetry's origins embedded in the story itself) that will come to define Sanskrit kāvya for at least two millennia: a self-conscious literariness that contains complex *tropes (of sound and sense) and is composed in the most popular Sanskrit meter (that can be sung, recited, with or without musical instrumentation); a consistent narrative trajectory with choice interludes; and the devel. of the all-important aesthetic concept of rasa, or taste (treated below). The structure of the Rāmāyaṇa is akin to a classic fairy tale with important culture-specific twists and turns (prince meets princess, evil demon abducts princess, prince defeats demon and saves princess, prince and princess live happily ever after) or of a picaresque novel (hero-prince is initiated into manhood through a series of adventures and misfortunes while exiled from his kingdom). The Rāmāyaṇa, reflecting a seminal moment in the dynastic hist. of the kings of the "solar dynasty" clustered around a tributary of the great river Gaṅgā, simultaneously functions as a great devotional text, with the hero Rāma as an avatar of Lord Viṣṇu. Like the Mahābhārata, the Rāmāyaṇa has been an immensely important source text for later Sanskrit poets.

II. Elements of Sanskrit Poetry. While, according to many proverbial formulations in Sanskrit, the poet is not beholden to any rules, literary theorists over the centuries have observed and marked essential presuppositions for the production and appreciation of Sanskrit poetry. Recent commentators on Sanskrit poetry have emphasized its "impersonal" stamp, its oscillation between explicit frankness and understated sublimity, and its occasionally impassioned or disturbing lyricism. Another aspect of much of Sanskrit poetry is its frequent didactic, proverbial, but generally nonmoralizing tone. Med. literary critics continually emphasize that kāvya teaches softly and indirectly like a lover, whereas other genres teach like a master (śāstra) or a friend (itihāsa-purāṇa). Ubiquitous also is the notion that the purpose of kāvya is to delight and to create an uplifting (maṅgala) atmosphere; to bring pleasure, solace, scholarly and worldly erudition, as well as indirect moral instruction to the audience; and to shower the poet with fame and wealth.

Kāvya is characterized by a polished and self-conscious use of poetic lang. that crosses seamlessly over such generic formulations as lyric or epigram (padya), epic (itihāsa), drama (nāṭya), lyrical prose (gadya), extended hymn (stotra), and prose narrative (ākhyāna, ākhyāyikā, kathā). Whereas the practice of lit. crit. on individual poems (as well as on prose, drama, etc.) is scanty before mod. times, analysis of the lang. of poetry and the study of its effects have been given ample attention in Sanskrit poetics. Some argue that kāvya presupposes "kāvya theory" and, in essence, they are mutually constitutive, the full appreciation of which (like cl. music) requires some measure of theoretical familiarity and training. The great masters of Sanskrit poetics (from the 6th c. CE onward) draw many of their ideas from earlier texts like the Nāṭyaśāstra (A Treatise on Drama), the foundational text on dramaturgy, and the encyclopedic Agnipurāṇa (Ancient Lore of Agni, Lord of Fire). For nearly a thousand years, they debate a variety of definitions for kāvya and its broader significance. Kāvya can be recited and visualized in performance (dṛśya) as in drama, or it can be solely recited and aurally received (śravya). Kāvya can be further divided along three formal and three evaluative axes. Formally, it can be prose (gadya), verse (padya), or a mixture of prose and verse (miśra) known as campu-kāvya. It can be judged as either a superior composition (uttama), a mediocre one (madhyama), or an inferior composition (adhama). The values on which to judge superiority, mediocrity, or inferiority are themselves multiple, one of the most common being the extent to which a poem suggests meaning rather than explicitly delivering it.

The unique creations of Sanskrit poetry are ultimately informed by the lang. Sanskrit's particular ling. characteristics (case inflection, variable syntax and word order, euphonic coalescence of sound sequences, limitless potential to compound words to create specific meaning, etc.) render a body of poetry that is at once flexible and restrained: flexible in that poets are free to create complex syntax patterns and inscribe within them hosts of simultaneous literary effects, incl. extremely complex and subtle rhythms of *assonance and *alliteration alongside expressions within the same word or compound unit carrying multiple meanings. Even double narrative poems are possible and common in Sanskrit, where entire texts are read in two or more senses. A long parade of more or less interchangeable synonyms for commonly occurring entities goes a long way in providing Sanskrit poets with the freedom to match the sonic with the semantic in ways that are unique, e.g., from what is available to poets of other cl. or mod. Indian langs.

Synonyms also enable the Sanskrit poet to function within the extraordinary restraints placed on him or her by metrical considerations. Since the metered hymns of the earliest Vedic poets, Sanskrit poetry has marked itself—like poetry in other cl. langs.—by strict adherence to metrical principles. Thus, the most common meters consist of four feet with a defined number of syllables (or syllabic instants) allowed within each foot. These meters are governed by certain defined principles (a short or long syllable preceding a conjunct consonant or a diphthong, e.g., is considered metrically long). *Caesuras are present, though optional or variable for many meters. Sanskrit poets also work within a circumscribed world of signifying conventions (kavi-samaya), although they frequently reinvent these *conceits in the service of creating novel images and meanings. Nevertheless, unlike other literary trads. in South Asia, Sanskrit poetry reveals a consistent conformity to the notion that *inspiration and *imagination flow free so long as they violate neither convention nor a factual precision within that conventionalized world that could stand the test of critical analysis.

While all genres of imaginative lit. fall more or less under the scope of kāvya, the two major divisions of Sanskrit poetry are mahākāvya and laghukāvya. The mahākāvya are grand, multicantoed entertainments employing multiple meters and telling a story or a part of a story from one of the great epics or narrative cycles. Laghukāvya, on the other hand, take various forms that reflect such genres as the epigram, short lyrics about seasons, *love poetry and erotica, extended devotional poems to gods and goddesses, hymns to nature, reflective philosophical poems, and loose collections of verses on all of the above topics and also such common themes as adolescence and old age, eulogies to kings and patrons, emotional states such as greed and anger, scenes of village and field, and works about all the social groups that comprise the Sanskrit imaginaire. These poems may be in any one of multiple meters (or combinations thereof)—easily recitable and memorizable in a variety of tunes and bearing names such as the vasanta-tilaka (mark of spring) and sārdūlavikrīḍitam (tiger's play). Many Sanskrit poets place as much effort on producing dazzling sound effects as they do on producing profound sense. Often Sanskrit verses are at once compact of form and broad in expression. *Imagery is refined, exacting, and concrete, assuming visceral and emotional semiotic codes whose suggestive qualities need to be elucidated by a trained reader. Frequently, Sanskrit poets compose playful verse, fully taking advantage of the extensive punning available to them in the lang. Sometimes, however, kāvya verses can be dreamy or impassioned.

III. The Production and Appreciation of Sanskrit Poetry. According to literary critics, the competent Sanskrit poet must possess, in addition to inborn imaginative power (śakti, pratibhā), a broad cultural education about the world and its ways (vyutpatti). Once the poet has married these two qualities and embarked on his profession as a poet, he must then uninterruptedly practice (abhyāsa) his art. Being the creator in the "boundless world of poetry," as the 9th-c. literary theorist Ānandavardhana puts it, the Sanskrit poet could in principle treat any subject he desires. Sanskrit poetry reveals the breadth of the Sanskrit poet's erudition and training. Part of the standard curricula of a Sanskrit poet included such subjects as erotics and scripture, logic and the arts, political science and the natural world, and, of course, Pāṇinian grammar. The able poet could describe with equal facility scenes of city and forest, things royal and rustic, the psychic world of lovers and ascetics, the abstruse details of philosophy and the earthy charms of drunken revelry. In essence, all four of the traditionally formulated Vedic "ends of human life" (puruśārtha) were open to the poet's explorations: virtue (dharma), power (artha), pleasure (kāma), and spiritual freedom (mokṣa). While the poet is rarely a moralist (in the way authors of philosophical, religious, or legal treatises could be), Sanskrit poetry is filled with moral aphorisms (subhāṣita) that often encapsulate in pithy form the spirit of entire passages composed in prose.

According to Sanskrit literary critics throughout hist., one who would appreciate Sanskrit poetry essentially has to have a modicum of the cultural training, sensibility, and experience of the poet in order to be one who can "be of one mind and heart" (sahṛdaya) with the poetry. Another way theorists understand the appreciator of Sanskrit poetry is as a rasika—one who can "taste" in aesthetic terms the flavors of poetic composition (rasa). The "theory of rasa" stands as the most important discourse of Indian poetics and essentially comprises an entire knowledge system of the modes, mechanics, and psychology of art production and art reception. The eight rasas roughly correspond to the major genres of popular cinema: the romantic comedy (śṛṅgāra), the sad story evoking pity (karuṇā), the uplifting heroic drama (vīra), the action film (raudra), gore (bibhatsā), horror (bhayānaka), the slapstick comedy (hāsya), and science-fiction fantasy (adbhuta). A more subtle, not universally accepted, and heavily theorized "ninth rasa" is known as śānta, or the rasa of contemplative peace that one associates with meditation practice. Alongside these eight (or nine) chief rasas are differently numbered sets of transient aesthetic experiences, such as envy, anxious tension, shame, pride, excitement, depression, confusion, and indignation. Any short or long Sanskrit poem, according to theorists who observe poetry in practice, should have one predominant rasa and perhaps other secondary ones. These same theorists variously characterize the rasa experience of drama and of poetry as either utterly similar, utterly different, or somewhere in between.

IV. A Summary History of Sanskrit Poems and Poets. The early hist. of cl. Sanskrit poetry (distinct from the epic poetry of the Mahābhārata and the Rāmāyaṇa) ranges from kāvya royal *panegyrics (praśasti) on stone inscriptions (the earliest one in Sanskrit being the famous Junāgaḍh inscription of Rudradāman from the 2th c. CE) to free-floating, Indian miniature paintinglike stanzas (muktaka) collected later into anthols. (kośa) such as the 10th-c. Subhāṣitaratnakośa (Treasury of Well-Spoken Verse), collected by a Buddhist monk named Vidyākara, or the 12th-c. Saduktikarṇāmṛta (Nectar for the Ears in the Form of Good Verse). Many aphorisms in these collections also come from fable and literary-folkloric texts such as the Pañcatantra (Five Strategies for Worldly Success), Hitopadeśa (Fables Offering Good Advice), and Kathāsaritsāgara (The Ocean of Rivers of Stories). In terms of Sanskrit poetry understood as kāvya, however, most commented upon are the lengthy, canto-bound court poems (mahākāvya, sargabandha) of Aśvaghoṣa and Kālidāsa, both flourishing one after the other sometime (dates are debated) between the last century before the Common Era and the early centuries of the Common Era. Aśvaghoṣa's two poems describe the early life and awakening of Prince Siddhartha Gautama (Buddhacarita) and the Buddha's leading his half-brother Nanda from worldly society to the monastery (Saundarānanda).

Kālidāsa—hailed as the greatest of all Sanskrit poets—left two surviving mahākāvya in addition to two dramas and two laghukāvya. The two mahākāvyas treat the regal dynastic hist. of the Raghu clan (Raghuvaṃśa), of which Rāmā is the best-known king, and the lyrical retelling of the courtship and marriage of Lord Śiva and goddess Pārvatī, culminating in the birth of their son, the god of war Kumāra (Kumārasambhava). Kālidāsa's plays include Mālavikāgnimitra (The Story of Mālavikā and Agnimitra), a "middle-class" love story; the Vikramorvaśiya (The Story of Urvaśī Won through Valor), whose theme is drawn from the legendary romance of Pururavas and Urvaśī; and the world-famous Abhijñānaśākuntala (Recognition of Śakuntalā), about the romance and tribulations of lovers Śakuntalā and King Duṣyanta. Kālidāsa's Meghadūta (The Cloud Messenger), a long lyric poem of about 100 connected verses composed in the same meter (khaṇḍakāvya), is celebrated as one of the most refined pieces of poetry ever composed in Sanskrit. Most well-known of the "messenger" genre (sandeśakāvya), the poem personifies a cloud bringing a comforting message between separated lovers across a vast span of natural and urban landscape, perceptively commenting on the scenes of life below along the way. Another poem attributed to Kālidāsa is the short "Ṛtusaṃhāra" (On the Various Seasons).

After Kālidāsa, there are at least 300 surviving specimens of mahākāvya and numerous laghukāvya. Although there are multiple canons of Sanskrit poetry within which traditional Sanskrit audiences have immortalized significant works, the five model poems of the mahākāvya genre are composed by Kālidāsa, Bhāravi (early 7th c. CE), Māgha (late 7th c. CE), and Śrīharṣa (mid-to-late 12th c. CE). Kālidāsa's two mahākāvya works have already been discussed above. The other three draw the subject matter of their plots strictly from the Mahābhārata: Bhāravi's Kirāṭārjunīya (Arjuna and the Kirāṭa), Māgha's Śiśupālavadha (Śiśupāla's Slaying), and Śrīharṣa's Naiṣadhīyacarita (The Life of Nala). The Kirāṭārjunīya inaugurates a poetic trad. that proudly incorporates the considerable weight of a Sanskrit intellectual's learning with the delicate craftsmanship of a wordsmith skilled in shaping meter, trope, and thought into refined stanzas. The other two poems, by Māgha and Śrīharṣa, have for centuries been studied, commented on, and emulated by Sanskrit intellectuals and poets. Other well-received poems include works by 7th-c. mahākavis Kumāradāsa (Jānakiharaṇa [The Abduction of Sītā]) and Bhaṭṭi (Rāvaṇavadha [Rāvaṇa's Slaying], aka Bhaṭṭikāvya). This latter work artfully tells the story of the Rāmāyaṇa while simultaneously exemplifying the aphorisms of Pāṇini's Aṣṭādhyāyi, a masterpiece of descriptive grammar from the 4th c. BCE. The Bhaṭṭikāvya eventually becomes the major source for the devel. of both an indigenous Javanese Rāmāyaṇa trad. and a broader interest in kāvya culture. From the 9th and 10th cs., important works include the Haravijaya (Victory of Śiva) by Ratnākara and Kapphinābhyudaya (The Rise of Kapphina) by Śivasvāmin. The 11th c. produced several notable mahākāvyas, incl. Bilhaṇa's Vikramāṅkadevacarita (The Life of His Majesty King Vikramāṅka) and Padmagupta's Navasāhasāṅkacarita (The Life of King Navasāhasāṅka).

Many of the great prose and short poems of Sanskrit lit. were written in the 7th c. Among works of epigrammatic poetry, the most famous is Bhartṛhari's Śatakatrayi (Three Sets of One Hundred Verses) on love, life, and world-weariness. Bāṇa's (or Bāṇabhaṭṭa's) romance narrative Kādambarī (named after the heroine), Subandhu's Vāsavadattā (also named after the heroine), and Daṇḍin's Daśa-kumāra-carita (The Tale of Ten Young Princes) rank among the great prose works of Sanskrit lit. Bāṇa's Caṇḍīśataka (One Hundred Verses to the Goddess Caṇḍī) and Mayūra's Sūryaśataka (One Hundred Verses to the Sun) represent two of the finest examples of intricate kāvya panegyrics structured around a "century" of verses. The most famous lyric on love's various forms also appears around this time in the oft-anthologized collection of verses known as the Amaruśataka (One Hundred Verses of King Amaru), a work that treats the entire spectrum of moods associated with courtship, romance, and consummation in specific social contexts—from the longing for love, its loss and recovery, to specific reactions of elation and depression experienced by lovers at different stages of a passionate relationship. Also from this period are well-known literary dramas, incl. Bāṇa's historical play Harṣacarita (The Story of King Harṣa), Harṣa's Ratnāvali (Princess Ratnāvali), and Bhaṭṭanārāyaṇa's Veṇisaṃhāra (The Tying Up of the Braid). The 8th c. produced one of the great literary dramatists of Sanskrit lit. in Bhavabhūti, whose three plays Mahāvīracarita (The Life of the Great Hero Rāma), Mālatīmādhava (The Romance of Mālatī and Mādhava), and Uttararāmacarita (The Later Life of Rāma) have drawn much comment over the centuries. The last work, a sensitive exploration of the inner conflicts and psychic trauma that torment the characters of the Rāmāyaṇa, has been hailed by many over the centuries as the finest specimen of Sanskrit drama. A notable laghukāvya from the 11th c. includes Bilhaṇa's Caurasuratapañcāsika or Caurapañcāsika (Fifty Verses on Secret Love or Fifty Verses of the Love Thief). From the 12th c., there is the unique and much-translated work Gītagovinda (Love Songs of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa) by the poet Jayadeva; this poem, about Kṛṣṇa and Rādhā's love, has the structure of a mahākāvya but is essentially a collection of lyrics that fuses devotional passion and erotic love in ways much emulated and explored by succeeding trads. of lit., music, dance, and painting.

In a hist. so varied and long, many other kāvya works bear mentioning, not the least of which are the difficult-to-date dramas of the very early playwright Bhāsa, incl. Svapnavāsavadatta (The Vision of Princess Vāsavadatta) and the vastly popular Mṛcchakaṭika (Little Clay Cart) by Śūdraka. Essentially an offbeat romantic comedy—at the center of which is a financially strapped hero, an intelligent courtesan as his romantic interest, and a sociopathic villain and his entourage—this latter play has been adapted numerous times over the centuries on the stage, in books, and in film. Also important to mention are influential works in Māhārāṣṭrī Prakrit such as Hāla's Sattasaī (Seven Hundred Poems)—the oldest collection of lyric poetry in any Indian lang.—and Pravarasena's Setubandha (Building the Bridge), both of which preceded and served often as intertexts with kāvya composed in Sanskrit. Govardhana's 12th-c. Āryasaptaśati is an especially well-known collection of erotically charged lyric stanzas, modeled on Hāla's Prakrit work and, in turn, profoundly influential for similarly themed works that emerge later in regional langs. like Bihāri's Sattsai in Hindi. Prior to but esp. after the 12th c., in the form of genres of Sanskrit poetry already detailed and in newer creative formats, there are hosts of poems and poets that deserve attention. These poems range from the cl. mahākāvya to the historical mahākāvya; messenger poems in the style of the Meghadūta; Sanskrit collections of similar works earlier produced in Prakrit; adaptations of popular works; and hosts of erotic, hagiographic, and religious poems (covering the vast spectrum of India's religions, incl. Hindu, Buddhist, Jain, Islamic, and Christian themes). The reader is directed to the 20th-c. lit. hists. of Sanskrit lit. cited at the end of this entry for detailed information about the numerous Sanskrit poems composed between the 13th and 20th cs.

Since the first centuries of the Common Era, kāvya and poetry in the style of Sanskrit kāvya have also been composed and chiseled in the archaeological record of what today are the nation-states of Myanmar, Thailand, Cambodia, Indonesia, Malaysia, and Singapore. Though deserving, Sanskrit poetry from the 19th to 21st cs. has thus far received little sustained scholarly attention. However, poets, scholars, and Indian governmental bodies such as the Rashtriya Sanskrit Sansthan (National Institute of Sanskrit) are promoting the continuing production and study of mod. Sanskrit lit. through various scholarly projects and programs. In contemp. India, Sanskrit poetry continues to be written, performed, and published alongside lit. in the 20 or so other Indian langs. Numerous magazines and jours. (such as Saṃskṛta Vimarśaḥ and Saṃskṛta Sāhitya Pariṣat) publish the work of Sanskrit poets working in contemp. India, and "gatherings of poets" (kavi-sammelana) continue to recite and share their work in centers of Sanskrit learning and diverse public spaces. Since the 1970s, a biannual gathering of international scholars of Sanskrit known as the World Sanskrit Conference has also provided a forum for poets from all over the world to share their literary compositions with each other.

SAPPHIC. In early Gr. poetry, an important *aeolic verse form named after Sappho, a Gr. poet from the island of Lesbos of the 7th–6th c. BCE. Prosodically, this form has been of interest to poets throughout most of the hist. of Western poetry; generically, it has evoked ever-increasing interest in the subjects of gender and love vis-à-vis poetry (see GENDER AND POETRY), most recently poetry written by women.

The term sapphic refers to both a meter and a stanza form. The sapphic line, called the lesser sapphic, is a *hendecasyllable of the pattern – ⏑ – x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – –. The sapphic stanza consists of two lesser sapphic lines followed by a 16-syllable line that is an extended form of the other two: – ⏑ – x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – x + – ⏑ ⏑ – –. This latter has been analyzed in several ways; one traditional account sees the last *colon as an *adonic colon (– ⏑ ⏑ – –) and treats it as a separate line, giving the sapphic stanza four lines in all. Sappho's contemporary Alcaeus also used the stanza and may have been its inventor. Catullus composed two *odes in sapphics (11 and 51), the second of which is a trans. and adaptation of Sappho frag. 31 (Lobel-Page); with these poems, he probably introduced the sapphic into Lat. poetry, but it is not certain. It is Horace, however, who provided the sapphic model for subsequent Roman and Eur. poets; in his Odes, he uses the form 27 times, second in frequency only to *alcaics. Horace also makes a single use (Odes 1.8) of the greater sapphic *strophe, i.e., an Aristophaneus (– ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – –) followed by a greater sapphic line of 15 syllables (– ⏑ – – – | ⏑ ⏑ – | – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – –), which can be analyzed as a sapphic hendecasyllable with an inserted *choriamb. His treatment of the sapphic as a four-line stanza canonized that form for posterity. Seneca sometimes uses the separate elements in a different order, e.g., by arranging a continuous series of longer lines with an adonic clausula.

In the Middle Ages, the sapphic acquired rhyme and was instrumental in the transition from metrical (quantitative) to rhythmical (accentual) meter (Norberg). After the hexameter and the iambic dimeter quatrain (for *hymns), it is the most popular verse form of the med. period: there are 127 examples in Analecta hymnica (Selected Hymns). In the Ren. and after, accentual versions of the sapphic became three lines of 11 syllables followed by a fourth line of five, the whole in trochees and *dactyls. The fourth line instances the phenomenon of tailing or end shortening well attested in other stanza forms (see TAIL RHYME).

The revival of Horatian influence on poetics evoked wide interest in the sapphic stanza among poets and prosodists in Italy, France, Germany, England, and Spain. Leonardo Dati used it for the first time in It. (1441), followed by Galeotto del Carretto, Claudio Tolomei, and others; in the 19th c., experiments were made by Felice Cavallotti and by Giosuè Carducci (Odi barbare). Estéban de Villegas is the chief practitioner in Spain. In the 18th-c. Ger. revival of interest in quantitative verse, F. G. Klopstock varied an unrhymed stanza with regular positional changes of the trisyllabic foot in the lesser sapphic lines; later, August von Platen and others essayed the strict Horatian form. In Eng., sapphics have been written by Philip Sidney (Old Arcadia; Certain Sonnets 25); Isaac Watts (Horae lyricae); Alexander Pope ("Ode on Solitude"); William Cowper ("Lines under the Influence of Delirium"); Robert Southey ("The Widow"); Alfred, Lord Tennyson; A. C. Swinburne (Poems and Ballads); Thomas Hardy (the first poem in Wessex Poems); Ezra Pound ("Apparuit"), and John Frederick Nims (Sappho to Valéry, 2d ed., 1990). The sapphic has been the longest lived of the cl. lyric strophes in the West. But full studies of its hist. in several vernaculars still remain to be written.

SATANIC SCHOOL. Derogatory term coined by Robert Southey in his preface to A Vision of Judgement (1821) for those poets "of diseased hearts and depraved imaginations" whose works exude "a Satanic spirit of pride and audacious impiety." While Southey mentioned no names, the preface clearly targeted Lord Byron, with whom Southey had been quarreling for some years; the critique probably extends to P. B. Shelley and Thomas Moore as well. Southey warned, "[T]his evil is political as well as moral" and ominously prophesied "where the manners of a people are generally corrupted, there the government cannot long subsist." Byron retaliated with his own parodic vision of judgment; he mocked Southey for his transformation from a youthful republican to a staunchly conservative poet laureate. A few 19th-c. critics used Southey's term, contrasting the Satanic school with the Lake school, but the term never gained widespread acceptance. More enduring is the concept of the Satanic hero, understood as a cursed Cain figure doomed to self-destruction, as in Byron's Manfred (1817). This figure draws on John Milton's Paradise Lost and J. W. Goethe's Faust and prefigures the poète maudit* as developed later by Charles Baudelaire and his successors.

SATIRE. Satire is both a mode and a genre of verse and prose lit. that adopts a critical attitude toward its target with the goal of censuring human folly. Satire is an eminently versatile form whose structure, style, tone, and subjects vary across a wide spectrum, but generally intends, as Jonathan Swift states, "to mend the world" ("A Vindication of Mr. Gay and The Beggar's Opera").

In terms of its purpose, satire is polemical, contentiously attacking its victims with the hope of dissuading readers from vice and persuading them (to greater and lesser degrees) toward virtue. In terms of structure, satire is primarily a borrower of literary and rhetorical forms, using other genres to support its didactic agenda (see Guilhamet). As Paulson describes it, satire explores the lowest range of potential human actions within a framework or fiction that best serves its ridiculing function (Fictions of Satire). Some of satire's favorite housing fictions include diatribe (the outraged declamations of Lucilius and Juvenal); Socratic-style dialogue (the sermones or conversations of Horace and the more cynical dialogues of Lucian); epic (Lucian's True History, which parodies the works of Homer and Herodotus; Nicolas Boileau's *mock epic Le Lutrin and Alexander Pope's The Dunciad and The Rape of the Lock, which parody the works of Virgil and John Milton); romance (Petronius's Satyricon, Voltaire's Candide, Samuel Butler's Hudibras, Lord Byron's Don Juan); burlesque (e.g., the ridiculing of Homer in the Battle of the Frogs and Mice); the *encomium (the ironic praises of Erasmus's Praise of Folly and John Dryden's "MacFlecknoe"); beast fable (Apuleius's The Golden Ass [or Metamorphoses], the med. tales of Reynard the Fox, Edmund Spenser's "Mother Hubberds Tale"); epistle (Pope's "To a Lady" and "To Dr. Arbuthnot"; Mary Wortley Montagu's "An Epistle from Mrs. Yonge to Her Husband"); religious complaint (cf. the parodies of the med. Goliard poets; the *dream vision of William Langland's Piers Plowman, Chaucer's "Pardoner's Tale," T. S. Eliot's "The Hippopotamus"); *pastoral (Aphra Behn's "The Disappointment," Swift's "A Description of the Morning" and "A Pastoral Dialogue"); civic poetry (Samuel Johnson's London, W. H. Auden's "The Unknown Citizen, e. e. cummings's "next to of course god america"); treatise (Swift's deeply ironic A Modest Proposal and A Tale of a Tub, and Pope's Peri Bathous); travel narrative (e.g., Swift's Gulliver's Travels); and drama (the Gr. Old Comedy of Aristophanes, the humor plays of Ben Jonson, John Gay's The Beggar's Opera). In fact, there are few if any genres that the satiric mode cannot adopt with effects that range from the richly comic to the devastatingly tragic. Similarly, there are few if any media that satire cannot inhabit, including mod. favorites such as film (Dr. Strangelove), television, and the Internet. Since the focus of the present article is on poetry and poetics, many major artistic, dramatic, and novelistic satires are beyond its scope, such as the paintings of William Hogarth; select dramas of Molière, Henry Fielding, William Congreve, W. S. Gilbert, G. B. Shaw, Oscar Wilde, and Caryl Churchill; the novels of George Orwell (Animal Farm, 1984), Charlotte Gilman (Herland), and Joseph Heller (Catch-22); the satiric writings of Mark Twain and Ambrose Bierce; the satiric cartoons and essays of the magazine Punch; and so on.

Although satire can call upon a long hist. of formal conventions and rhetorical tropes such as *irony, *personification, and *hyperbole, satire is distinctive for its overt engagement (at varying levels of critical distance) with its immediate historical context ("all the things which men do . . . is the hodge-podge of my little book"; Juvenal, Satires 1.85–86), a fact that often makes the colloquial lang. and topical subjects of satiric verse obscure. Because satire criticizes the contemp. world, the satirist is frequently compelled to employ an array of self-protective structures, including a range of personae, apology, *allegory, and claims of innocent comedic intent; however, such gestures are belied by the satirist's bold assertion that his work alone offers "antidotes to [the] pestilential sins" of a morally diseased society (Everard Guilpin's Skialetheia, Prelud. 70). The satirist serves as self-appointed prosecutor, judge, and jury, exposing and condemning the worst excesses of human behavior, sometimes, like Horace, with the intention of improving the wicked through humorous moral instruction, and sometimes, like Juvenal, with the object of provoking the wicked to guilt, shame, rage, and tears (Horace, Satires 1.4.103–29 and Juvenal, Satires 1.166–68). Despite satire's standard defensive claim to employ only "feigned [i.e., fictitious] private names to note general vices" (John Marston's "To Him"; The Scourge of Villanie 8–9), the perception of libelous lampoons in satire has often drawn the attention of the authorities and has frequently provoked censorship, from the Roman Twelve Tables outlawing libelous verses (Cicero, De republica 4.12; Horace, Epistles 2.1.152–54) to Emperor Augustus's edict against "defamatory little books" (in Suetonius, Life of Augustus 55) to England's 1599 prohibition against the publication of satire, as well as the Theatrical Licensing Act of 1737.

As described by Kernan in The Cankered Muse, satire demonstrates a tension between the comic and the tragic strains; however, satire employs both as strategies in the service of its didactic and apotropaic agendas. Horace prefers his ironic mode of satire "to speak the truth with a laugh" (Satires 1.1.24), and Persius admires the comic ability of the "sly rogue" Horace to "touch every fault while his friend stands and laughs" (Satires 1.116–17). Anderson (1982) characterizes the Horatian comic mode as not merely witty but socially "constructive" and "humane" (39), and many Ren., Restoration, and Augustan-era imitators have been drawn to Horace's apparent benevolence and erudition. In his prefatory epistle to The Praise of Folly, Erasmus states his preference for the Horatian principle of delightful instruction and his dislike of Juvenal's "cesspool of secret vice"; in The Defence of Poesy (1595), Sir Philip Sidney, citing Persius's praise of Horace, says satire "sportingly never leaveth until he make a man laugh at folly"; and in An Essay on Criticism, Pope writes that Horace "charms with graceful Negligence, / And without method, talks us into sense" (653–54). The Juvenalian approach is more severe, denouncing the crimes rather than mocking the follies of a society where depravity is the norm. Anderson (1982) identifies the "tragic" character of the Juvenalian mode in its symbolic depiction of Roman degeneracy. Milton claims that true satire is "borne out of a Tragedy, so ought to resemble his parentage, to strike high" (An Apology 6.12–13), a vision shared by the banned group of Eng. Ren. satirists who preferred the Juvenalian tragic mode as a means to expose the moral excesses common at the end of the reign of Elizabeth I: "Satire hath a nobler vein / He's a Strappado, rack, and some such pain / To base lewd vice" (Guilpin). Where the comic satiric strategy employs fools as types of ridiculous behavior that are more instructive than threatening (like "the terrible people" of Ogden Nash's comic poem), the tragic strategy presents a hopeless world inhabited entirely by the wicked, which often includes the satiric speaker himself.

Although both the etymology of the word satire and the historical origin of the concept are equivocal, many of satire's defining characteristics can be traced back to a number of related trads. The word itself is derived from the Latin satura, meaning a "mixture," and is related to the Lat. satur, meaning "full." The Lat. grammarian Diomedes (late 4th c. CE) contends that satura may have derived from the satura lanx, the ritual plate overflowing with offerings to the gods; or from the word for a kind of stuffing made from various ingredients; or from the lex satura, a single legal proposition composed of a number of smaller issues. Diomedes links these separate roots: all, in one way or another, refer to the structure of satire as a miscellany poem, an array of different kinds of verse united by their common intent to ridicule a range of subjects, such as the miscellanies produced by the Roman poets Ennius and Pacuvius (see Keil). As an individual poetic genre, the Roman grammarian Quintilian (ca. 35–100 CE) claimed verse satire as a wholly Roman invention devoid of Gr. influence, with Lucilius as the first Roman to advance the genre (Institutio oratoria 10.1.96–97).

While it is true that the etymology of the word satire is not related to the Gr. word for satyrs (σατυρος; Lat. satyrus), as demonstrated by Isaac Causabon in 1605 (see De satyrica Graecorum poesi et Romanorum satira), the form and style of Roman verse satire owe much to the trad. of Gr. *invective poetry; Dryden explains in his 1693 work "A Discourse Concerning the Original and Progress of Satire," "And thus far 'tis allowed that the Grecians had such poems; but that they were wholly different in specie from that to which the Romans gave the name of Satire." Horace himself admits to the complementary nature of Gr. and Roman invective poetry, noting that Lucilius modeled his keen and witty satiric style on the Gr. playwrights of Old Comedy, Aristophanes, Eupolis, and Cratinus, changing only their meter while maintaining their freedom to assault the vicious in society by name (Satires 1.4.1–8). Diomedes' position is similar, claiming that Roman verse satire may have been named for the goat-legged companions of Dionysus because Roman satire discusses the same kind of laughable and shameful behaviors practiced by the Gr. satyrs. This idea of complementary stylistic trads. continued well into the Ren., as suggested by the conscious conflation of the two trads. in the spelling of the word as Satyre. Thomas Drant's 1566 definition of satire, e.g., claims that it was named either for the Satyrs or for the "waspish" god, Saturn. Intriguingly, Drant also wonders if the word might have the same origin as the Ar. word for "spear," referring to the satirist's method of skewering his targets. Similarly, Elliott claims the satiric poems of ancient Arabia (the hija') as an early example of satire's conventional use as a magical weapon intended to destroy one's enemies.

Other ancient rituals cited by Elliott as conceptual influences on satire include the Gr. phallic songs (*iambic verses intended to cleanse society as part of the fertility rites), the invective poetic curses of Archilochus (7th c. BCE), and the glám dícind satiric poems used by ancient Ir. bards to bring infamy and death upon those who displeased them. Dryden mentions two other influential Gr. trads.: the parody-rich silloi* poems, perhaps derived from Silenus, foster-father of Dionysus, and the Gr. satyr play (the only remaining example of which is Euripides' Cyclops), a play performed after three tragedies in which satyrs act as chorus in order to mock issues taken seriously in the preceding plays. Horace describes one other decidedly Roman poetic trad. underlying the conception of satire: the Fescennine ritual. As part of the harvest festivals, participants would hurl humorous rustic abuse at each other in alternating verses. Such liberal verbal freedom was made illegal, states Horace, only after its "cruel tooth" offended honorable families (Epistles 2.1.139–56).

Philosophically, cl. satire owes much to the Cynic and Stoic schools. Much of Juvenal's style is cynical in its iconoclastic perspective, angry tone, and declamatory rhet. Other cynic satirists of note include Menippus and his Roman imitator Varro, as well as Petronius, Lucian, John Marston, and John Wilmot, the Earl of Rochester. Shakespeare's railing satirists Thersites (Troilus and Cressida) and Apemantus (Timon of Athens) exemplify the Cynic trad. with their incessant barking at fools and hypocrites. Elements of Stoic philosophy, a softened version of Cynicism, are present in the satires of Persius and Juvenal, as when, e.g., Juvenal asserts in Satire 10 the virtues of wishing for a "healthy mind in a healthy body" (356) or as Johnson writes in his imitation titled The Vanity of Human Wishes (1749), "Pour forth thy fervors for a healthful mind, / Obedient passions, and a will resign'd" (359–60). However, one should not confuse a satirist's engagement with the institutions of his era with adherence to them; Highet (Juvenal, 93) argues that Juvenal rejected Stoic teachings (as suggested in Satire 13.120–24), a position supported by Coffey. Satirists conventionally present themselves as staunch individualists, the lone voice of reason driven to mock or to decry the wealth of abuses that surround them. With so much evil in the world, writes Juvenal, "it is difficult not to write satire" (1.30).

Structurally, the kind of Roman verse satire practiced by Lucilius, Horace, Juvenal, and later imitators such as John Donne and Pope, has elements in common with dramatic forms such as Gr. Old Comedy and Roman New Comedy. Roman verse satire is often framed as a rhetorical/dramatic debate between the satirist's speaking persona and an adversary, the former taking the position of vituperatio (blame) and the latter taking the position of laus (praise). The vice in question is then, as Randolph describes it, thoroughly examined in the first sect. of the poem, and the opposing virtue is recommended in the final sect. However, even within the confines of this generic structure, formal verse satire is rarely a stable form, flowing easily into congenial genres such as comedy, beast fable, and prose narrative. Horace, e.g., inserts the Aesopian beast fable of the town mouse and the country mouse into bk. 2, Satire 6, and Juvenal inserts an allegorical tale of a giant fish into satire 4.

In addition to formal verse satire, Quintilian mentions another "older type of satire" practiced by Menippus's Roman imitator Varro in which verse satire is mixed with prose (10.1.95–96). Dryden also mentions the influence of the cynical satires of Menippus and their manner of mixing several sorts of verse with prose, as well as their paradoxical tone of spoudogeloioi, or serious-laughter (64–67). In this category, Dryden places the works of Petronius, Apuleius, and Lucian, as well as John Barclay's picaresque novel Euphormionis Satyricon and his own Absalom and Achitophel and "MacFlecknoe." Given their cynical and unorthodox perspectives and despite their heavy reliance on prose, one could also place works such as Thomas More's Utopia, Miguel de Cervantes's Don Quixote, and Aldous Huxley's Brave New World under the Menippean umbrella.

The critical hist. of satire in the 20th and early 21st cs. is an uneasy stalemate between formalist and historicist perspectives. From the mid-1950s through the 1960s, the formalist or New Critical methodology recommended a mode of inquiry that rejected the historicists' concerns with literary origins in favor of exploring the conscious "artifice" of the poetry, i.e., the recurrent rhetorical and dramatic conventions of satire (see FORMALISM, HISTORICISM, NEW CRITICISM). One particularly innovative formalist study of the period is Frye's Anatomy of Criticism, in which satire is categorized among the four interrelated pregeneric mythoi (specifically, the mythos of winter). Frye argues that satire is a kind of "militant irony" whose structural scheme is the ironic application of romantic conventions to realistic contents. Some half-century later, the debate over the "historicity" of satire, meaning the nature and extent of satire's contact with its social context, continued, with scholars such as Bogel, Griffin, and Knight attempting to find a balance between historical conditions and formal traditions. In this context, the sociolinguistic theories of Mikhail Bakhtin are especially relevant for their ability to reconcile the dialogue between form and context in satire. Bakhtin argues that cl. "serio-comical" lit., which includes both formal verse and Menippean satire, is a precursor to the mod. novel, a form intended to provoke "the permanent corrective of laughter" that familiarizes and debases the loftier genres. Another of Bakhtin's contributions is his conception of "carnivalistic literature," a humorously profane remnant of folk culture and ritual that is deliberately contrasted against the usual hierarchical relationships of everyday life; another is his exploration of the ideological nature of Menippean satire as a carnivalized genre that combines topical and fantastic situations in order to test conventional truths, the effect of which is a challenge to all forms of orthodoxy.

SATURNIAN (Lat. saturnius, "belonging or pertaining to the reign of Saturn"). The verse form used in the two earliest Lat. *epics, the trans. of the Odyssey by Livius Andronicus (ca. 280–200 BCE) and the Bellum Punicum of Naevius (ca. 270–201 BCE), and also of scattered *epitaphs, dedications, *proverbs, and *incantations composed or committed to writing in the 3d and 2d cs. BCE. Fewer than 200 instances survive; the example of Ennius (239–169 BCE) turned Lat. prosody to imitating Gr. quantitative meters, with the result that the saturnian was soon rejected in favor of the *hexameter for epic and the *elegiac distich and iambic *senarius for epitaphs and dedications. Horace's description of the horridus numerus Saturnius as a "grave virus" is an example of later taste in regard to it. Structure and origin are accordingly obscure—least so, perhaps, in those verses, roughly a third of the total, which show a 4-3-3-3 grouping of syllables into words or word groups, with a strong central break and *parallelism between groups or subgroups, reinforced by frequent *alliteration and *assonance: *vi*rum mihi, *c*ame*n*a, i*n*se*c*e *ver*sutum (Livius); im*mortales mortales* si*f*o*r*et *fasf le*r*e (Naevius epitaph).

The regularities here are too numerous and conspicuous to be accidental. Moreover, the structural principle is so unlike anything found in Gr. poetry and so similar to that attested in the balanced alliterative and assonantal dicola and tricola of early Lat. ritual formulas that the theory espoused by some metrists, both ancient and mod., of direct derivation from Gr. models is highly unlikely. One is left with two possibilities: either (as the name itself would suggest) a native Italic form (perhaps distantly related to the Old Ir. heptasyllable) or some early Gr. import domiciled in Italy for several centuries and thereby radically transformed by the time Livius and Naevius tried to give it literary status. Almost everything beyond this is highly problematic. Verses longer than those cited above can always be regarded as resolved versions of the 13-syllable "model," which might suggest the operation of quantitative principles; but there is no one quantitative scheme to which all or even a large majority of extant examples conform, and there exist shorter half lines with 4-2, 3-2 and 2-3 groupings of syllables that are equally hard to reconcile with a quantitative analysis. Explanations that posit the working of two or more different rhythmical principles (quantitative, syllabic, accentual) are, on the whole, more plausible than those that involve a single one. It is possible, e.g., that a quadripartite line originally based on grouping of syllables by 4s, 3s, and 2s evolved, under the influence of Gr. models, into a 13-syllable line with the same groupings but a generally iambo-trochaic movement, similar to that found in Macaulay's accentual imitation: "The quéen was ín her párlour, éating bréad and hóney." While such theories may resolve the quantitative irregularity of the verse form, the origins of the saturnian nevertheless remain conjecture.

SAUDOSISMO. A literary-poetic movement in Portugal founded by the Port. Renaissance (1912) group in Porto, whose best-known proponent was the poet Teixeira de Pascoaes (1877–1952). Based on saudade, or nostalgic yearning, a mainstay of Port. lit. since the Middle Ages, saudosismo was both a literary and a political-social doctrine, a resurgence of nationalistic sentiment prompted by the proclamation of the Port. Republic (1910) that attempted to capture the "national soul." Through articles in A Águia, Pascoaes and his contemporaries raised saudade above the status of national affect to a theory of humankind, a development of 19th-c. mystical-nationalist thought that would chart the future of the "Lusitanian Race" and would be revealed by poets. It was a religion, a philosophy, and a political credo. Fernando Pessoa (1888–1935) wrote about saudosismo but eventually abandoned it because of its traditional, neo-romantic leanings. As a movement of national renewal, saudosismo recalls Sebastianism or the earlier belief in the prophetic return of the lost King Sebastião (d. 1578) who was to deliver Portugal from the yoke of Sp. rule, which occurred between 1580 and 1640.

SCANSION

IV. Pros and Cons of Scansion

I. Definition and History. Scansion describes the structure of verse lines by breaking them down into their component feet and identifying the metrical character of the individual syllables. The word comes from the Latin scandere, "to climb," and scansio, "a climbing." Charlton T. Lewis and Charles Short, in their Latin Dictionary, suggest that figurative uses of the verb in Roman poetry (e.g., Lucretius's comment that living things climb step by step to maturity [On the Universe 2.1123] and Horace's remark that care climbs aboard a ship with the restless traveler [Odes 2.16.21]) led Late Lat. grammarians to adopt the idiom scandere versus—"to climb up, i.e., to measure or read [verse] by its feet." Other authorities (e.g., The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language, 4th ed., and The New Oxford American Dictionary, 2d ed.) speculate that the term originates in the custom of lifting and lowering the foot to keep time with a piece of music or poetry. Both hypotheses associate the human foot with the metrical foot (Gr. pous, Lat. pes) and involve the concept of verse as measure or count (Gr. metron, Lat. numerus). Terentianus Maurus, who toward the end of the 2nd c. ce composed a verse essay about metrics, appears to be one of the earliest writers to speak of scanning poetry (On Letters, Syllables, and Meters 547, 1753). Though one might suspect that scansion etymologically connects with scan in the sense of "examine closely," this latter denotation does not appear until the 16th c. and is an extension of the prosodic usage rather than an influence upon it.

Scansion and metrical analysis are almost as old as poetry. No sooner do poets start composing in meter than they begin exploring ways in which it can enhance meaning. When, for instance, at Iliad 23.221, Achilles is "calling to the spirit of poor Patroclus" and pouring out wine to the gods in honor of his dead friend, Homer contracts all the *dactyls of the *hexameter into *spondees, which create a solemn, heavy movement appropriate to his hero's act. Indeed, in Greek, sponde means "libation," and the prosodic spondee (spondeios) is so named because the foot, consisting of two long syllables, suits the slow rhythms of libational songs and chants. Further, the wine that mortals present the gods is unwatered—Homer himself speaks at Iliad 2.341 and 4.159 of the "unmixed libations," spondai akretoi, that conclude a truce or treaty—and this purely spondaic line about Achilles' devotions not only suggests their ceremonial gravity but also perhaps points to the undiluted nature of his offering and his grief:

ψυχην κικλησκων Πατροκληος δειλοιο
– – – – – – – – – – ––
psuchen | kikles | kon Pat | rokle | os dei | loio

(Ancient poets always treat the final syllable of the hexameter as long, even when it is short, as it is here, where it consists simply of an omicron—the theory being that the pause at the line end compensates for the syllable's brevity.)

By the cl. age, metrical analysis has become a subject of general literary interest and study, as we can infer from the amusing scene in Aristophanes' Clouds in which Socrates proposes to teach the ignorant farmer Strepsiades about trimeters and tetrameters and the dactyl. The very nature of the jokes—Strepsiades mistakes the meters for measures of commercial exchange and can understand daktulos only with respect to its common meaning of "finger," as in giving somebody the finger—indicates that the playwright trusts that his large and miscellaneous audience knows something about versification and the vocabulary employed to discuss it. By the same token, Gr. and Lat. writers on rhet., incl. Isocrates, Aristotle, Cicero, and Quintilian, discuss rhythmical arrangement in terms of short (Gr. brachus, Lat. brevis) and long (Gr. makros, Lat. longus) syllables and consider various prosodic topics as they relate to the composition of both verse and prose.

Metrical analysis, moreover, plays a critical role in the trad. of textual scholarship inaugurated in the Hellenistic period at the library in Alexandria. Prior to this time, Gr. lyric poetry seems to have been written out consecutively in the manner of prose; but Aristophanes of Byzantium (3rd–2nd c. bce), in his eds. of lyric writers, divides their poems into metrical cola in order to clarify the poems' linear and strophic structures (see COLON). Similarly, in part to facilitate the accurate reading of poems and the understanding of their meters, Hellenistic scholars develop various diacritical and punctuation marks; and as M. L. West indicates, the macron and breve signs we still use in scanning cl. verse appear as early as the 2nd c. BCE in papyri of scholarly copies of the poets "over vowels about whose quantity the reader might be uncertain because the words or forms were archaic or poetic." In addition, in Hephaestion's Guide to Meter (mid-2nd c. CE), we have a prototype of the student manual of prosody that lists different feet and rhythms and illustrates them with apposite passages of poetry.

Yet, as the word's relatively late appearance suggests, scansion seems most notably to reflect or respond to the linguistic conditions and educational needs of the postclassical world. In late antiquity, accent replaces length as the central prosodic element in Gr. and Lat.; and in the Middle Ages, Gr. falls into disuse throughout much of Europe, while the vernaculars supplant Lat. in everyday speech. Though Lat. remains, in the Middle Ages and beyond, a lingua franca for the intellectual community, it is no longer native to those who use it, nor do they speak it as the ancients did. Knowledge of metrics is essential for those wishing to comprehend the lang. and its lit. This situation grows even more critical during the revival of ancient learning in the Ren., when the humanists make the study of cl. Lat. the basis of elementary education and when the composition of quantitative Lat. verse becomes both a measure of scholastic achievement and a serious pursuit for many major poets from Petrarch to John Milton.

Scansion figures throughout Eng. lit. crit., which adopts the exercise from cl. studies. Both George Gascoigne, in his pioneering "Certain Notes of Instruction concerning the Making of Verse or Rhyme in English" (1575), and George Puttenham, in his Arte of English Poesie (1589), refer to scanning by name and supply sample scansions to illustrate their ideas about Eng. metrical structure. (Gascoigne uses an acute accent to register what we would call metrically accented syllables and a grave accent to mark metrically unaccented ones, while Puttenham scans with breves and macrons.) In the 17th, 18th, and 19th cs., the study of Eng. prosody is advanced by, among others, Ben Jonson, John Dryden, Thomas Warton, Thomas Sheridan, Samuel Johnson, Thomas Jefferson (whose underappreciated "Thoughts on English Prosody" anticipates, in its differentiation of degrees of accent, approaches to scansion adopted by 20th-c. linguists like Otto Jespersen), William Wordsworth, S. T. Coleridge, and Edwin Guest. Further, beginning with Nicholas Rowe, Shakespeare's editors apply metrical analysis to the texts of his plays, with a view to correcting mislineations in the folio eds. These mislineations had occurred for various reasons, including the practice, among the original compositors, of splitting verse lines in two, or of breaking up a prose passage into shorter lines as if it were verse, when there was too little text to fill a column or page. (Conversely, when the compositors needed to conserve space, they sometimes ran verse lines together in prose fashion.) During this time, metrical analysis also continues to figure in cl. scholarship, as is shown by Richard Bentley's celebrated discovery of the digamma. Bentley postulates that this consonant existed in archaic Gr. but had disappeared by the cl. age, when he realizes that its absence explains many apparent metrical glitches in the eds. of Homer from the Alexandrian period forward—particularly those cases where a word-ending short vowel followed by a word beginning with a vowel still receives full metrical value rather than being elided. Gr. verse generally avoids such hiatuses, and Bentley perceives that their occurrences in Homer often reflect the loss of the digamma that originally began the second word and separated the two vowels. Scansion becomes even more prominent in Eng. literary studies in the second half of the 19th c., when Eng. lit. enters school curricula as a formal discipline. This period launches a vogue for handbooks on Eng. meter that has continued ever since.

This period also witnesses the beginning of what will eventually become a widespread misapprehension that to write in a meter is to limit oneself to a single, rigid formula rather than to adopt a general pattern susceptible to various internal modulations; and several developments in scansion contribute to this misapprehension. For one thing, in the second half of the 19th c., Eng. prosodists increasingly use, in scanning, vertical bars to separate feet from one another, a practice relatively rare prior to this time. Since Eng. meters customarily entail a succession of metrically identical feet, the practice gives scanned lines a strong visual impression of uniformity that deflects attention from the rhythmical shadings the lines may possess when spoken. (Foot division does not produce this effect so markedly in cl. verse because its quantitative metric allows that a long syllable may at points replace two short syllables and that two shorts may replace one long. Hence, though the hexameters of Homer and Virgil, to take two obvious cases, are strictly isosyllabic in a durational sense, they usually contain a mix of dactyls and spondees.)

Another practice that emerges in this period and that emphasizes the structural regularity of metrical poetry at the expense of its tonal variety is the schoolroom exercise of having students verbally scan verse by sing-songing it in unison:

I *wan*dered *lone*ly as a cloud or

This is the *fo*rest pri*mev*al. The *mur*muring pines and the *hem*locks

Though this exercise highlights basic prosodic structures, it drains metered verse of its human inflections and natural rhythms.

A final and related factor that focuses awareness on the simplicity of metrical description and slights the complexity of metrical practice is Sidney Lanier's Science of English Verse (1880). In this work, which exerts considerable influence on prosodic thinking in the late 19th and early 20th cs., Lanier suggests that iambic verse is written in 3/8 time, involves an alternation of verbal eighth notes and quarter notes, and follows the sequence of tick-tack, tick-tack. This theory contributes to the notion, in Ezra Pound and others, that the rhythms of traditional versification are those of the metronome, itself an invention of the 19th c.

Overall, these developments serve as a warning that scansion and metrical analysis may, if misunderstood or misapplied, muddle the subject they aim to illuminate.

II. Notation. Most literary cultures devise notation to register the rhythmic or phonological properties of their lang. and poetry, and students of Eng. verse have explored many systems of scansion, incl. those involving letters, musical notes, numbers, and graphic representations. However, a simple group of symbols has generally held sway. Prior to the 20th c., Eng. prosodists usually signify metrically unaccented syllables with the breve (˘) cl. prosodists use to register short syllables. When signifying metrically accented syllables, they employ the macron (–) cl. prosodists apply to long ones. During the 20th c., the breve and macron give way to an x for metrically unaccented syllables and an acute accent (´) for metrically accented ones. This shift reflects a growing consensus that xs and acute accents better indicate that Eng. metric weighs syllabic stress and not, as the breve and macron might suggest, syllabic length. (Be it noted, however, that breves and macrons persist in some discussions of Eng. versification; and in other discussions, the two systems mix—the most common blend assigning breves to metrically unaccented syllables and acute accents to metrically accented ones.)

Another mark that often figures in scansion (esp., as has been noted, in the last century and a half) is a vertical bar to divide the individual feet of the line from one another; and here it is important to remember two points. First, scansion treats verse lines merely as rows of syllables. It concerns units of rhythm, not units of sense. Hence, as the line already cited from Homer demonstrates—and as some of the lines cited below testify—divisions between feet do not necessarily correspond to divisions between words, phrases, and clauses. Second, in scanning Eng. verse, we determine whether a syllable is metrically accented solely by comparing it with the other syllable or syllables of the foot in which it appears. We do not weigh it against all the other syllables in the line or poem. Nor do we concern ourselves with whether the foot's accented syllable is much heavier than its unaccented syllable or syllables or only a little heavier. Though such nuances will affect and enliven the specific rhythm of the spoken line, scansion cannot, with its simple descriptive tools, register their continual and shifting complexities.

With regard to more specialized aspects of notation, there exist wide and confusing variations of practice—sadly, no metrical Moses has ever climbed Parnassus and received an authoritative Ten Commandments of Scansion from Apollo—yet several devices appear with some frequency. In particular, when prosodists mark a feminine ending (i.e., an extra, metrically unaccented syllable at the end of a line), most place the x in parentheses to indicate that the syllable is, literally, "hypermetrical"—beyond the measure and having no effect on its identity (see HYPERMETRIC). For the same reason, they usually do not place, in front of the syllable, a vertical foot-division bar, a procedure that might mislead the casual observer into thinking that the syllable comprised an additional foot.

Conventional notation, then, renders as follows these lines from E. A. Robinson's "Eros Turannos" and Louise Bogan's "Cassandra." (Bogan's line has a feminine ending.)

x / x / x / x /
Tra di | tion, touch | ing all | he sees x / x / x / x / x / (x)
To me, | one sil | ly task | is like | another

Scansion thus demonstrates that Robinson's line is an iambic tetrameter, a line consisting of four iambic feet, and that Bogan's line an iambic pentameter, a line consisting of five iambic feet. Moreover, since any type of foot can be "substituted" for another, as long as such substitutions are not so frequent or so placed as to dissolve the meter, scansion can enable us to locate metrical variants and appreciate their effect in those cases where they serve an expressive purpose.

Occasionally, feet admit of different scansions, as is illustrated by the famous line from Shakespeare's Hamlet:

To be, or not to be: | that is | the question

Probably, most actors treat the fourth foot as trochaic: that is the question. Such a reading stresses the crux of Hamlet's situation: should he live and suffer the corruption he sees about him, or should he oppose it and thereby almost surely bring on his death? Yet an actor might speak the fourth foot as an iamb—that is the question—to emphasize the immediacy of Hamlet's predicament and the urgency of resolving it. (Either reading is metrically conventional. Historically, along with the feminine ending, the most common variants in Eng. iambic verse are a trochaic substitution at the beginning of the line and a trochaic substitution after a midline pause.)

III. Meter, Rhythm, and Scansion. One can steer clear of the confusions that sometimes plague scansion by bearing in mind that versification involves the concurrent but distinguishable phenomena of meter and rhythm. A meter is an analytic abstraction, a norm or basic pattern. For instance, the norm of the iambic pentameter is weak strong, weak strong, weak strong, weak strong, weak strong

Rhythm, on the other hand, concerns the realization of this pattern in living speech.

On rare occasions, as in this line from Thomas Traherne's "The Salutation," the poet's rhythm may replicate the normative pattern and consist of five successive two-syllable, rear-stressed phrases or words:

The earth, the seas, the light, the day, the skies

More frequently, the rhythm may entail an alternation of weak and strong syllables that tracks the norm fairly closely, as in this line from John Keats's "To Autumn":

And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue

However, most iambic pentameters do not feature uniform fluctuation. Rather, the alternation between weak and strong syllables will be relatively emphatic at some points and less so at others. Poets compose not only in feet but also in larger words, phrases, clauses, and sentences whose tones are not limited to minimal and maximal accent but incorporate innumerable gradations of stress.

In this respect, we might compare iambic pentameters to mountain ranges. Valleys and peaks alternate. But not every peak is an Everest, nor is every valley a Grand Canyon. For example, this line from Thom Gunn's "In Santa Maria del Popolo" features two peaks that are not very high:

Resisting, by embracing, nothingness

And this line from Wallace Stevens's "Sunday Morning" has a valley that is not very deep:

She causes boys to pile new plums and pears

Further, because the iambic line requires only the maintenance of the lighter-to-heavier fluctuation—and because the only requirement of an iamb is that its second syllable be weightier than its first—a metrically unaccented syllable at one point in the line may carry more speech stress than a metrically accented syllable at another point. This occurs in this line from Philip Larkin's "Vers de Société":

Beyond the light stand failure and remorse

"Stand" (the metrically unaccented syllable of foot three) has more speech stress than "and" (the metrically accented syllable of foot four). Even so, the line maintains the fluctuation of lighter to heavier syllables and scans conventionally:

x / x / x / x / x /
Beyond | the light | stand fail | ure and | remorse

Sometimes, a poet follows an iamb of two relatively light syllables with an iamb of two relatively heavy ones. When this occurs, the fluctuation in stress is suspended in favor of an ascent over four syllables. Philip Sidney, in the opening line of his sonnet to the moon, employs this scheme to reinforce sonically the image he presents:

With how sad steps, O moon, thou climb'st the sky

Some authorities scan feet like "new plums," "stand fail-," and "sad steps" as spondees and feet like "-ing by," "–ure and," and "With how" as *pyrrhics, in the belief that such feet are analogous to ancient spondees, which, as we observed earlier, consist of two long syllables, and ancient pyrrhics, which consist of two short ones. However, it is doubtful whether pyrrhics and spondees are generally helpful or necessary to the analysis of Eng. verse. Ancient metrics measure syllabic quantity, and long and short syllables can be identified by phonetic rules; hence, cl. pyrrhics and spondees are immediately recognizable metrical phenomena. In contrast, mod. Eng. meter measures syllabic stress, and this cannot be consistently determined by external principle but is often affected by verbal environment, grammatical function, rhetorical sense, or some combination of these factors. In particular, any of the lang.'s many monosyllabic words can serve, given the right context, as metrically accented or unaccented. Because of such variabilities and because successive syllables in Eng. rarely feature equal degrees of stress, Eng. pyrrhics and spondees are not so much objective metrical facts as rhythmical effects, the perception and identification of which must be to some extent subjective. Each reader must decide for him- or herself when two syllables are close enough in their stress properties to be treated as equal. More specifically, introducing routinely spondees and pyrrhics into the scansion of Eng. iambic verse misconstrues its nature, insofar as the practice implies that feet whose syllables are relatively close in weight are metrical variants, whereas such feet occur all the time in any naturally and competently written iambic poem.

IV. Pros and Cons of Scansion. Because scansion has at times contributed to confusions of metrical description with metrical practice, some have wondered whether we should scrap the exercise in favor of prosodic studies that more broadly address ways in which meters cooperate with the lexical and syntactical elements of lang. Might it be wiser, some have asked, to direct attention to phrasal and clausal arrangements in verse lines rather than focusing on little two- and three-syllable units? As Cunningham puts it, we might be better off "regarding a meter, not as a schematic diagram of scansions, but as a collection of syllabic-syntactic types . . . [for] this is the way we perceive meter when we read without hesitation or analysis, that is, poetically. We do not hear diagrams."

The approach Cunningham suggests merits the most serious consideration, holding out the prospect of engaging the actual process by which poets compose poems and readers experience them; still, there remains a strong case for retaining traditional scansion. To be sure, it construes words, phrases, and clauses merely as abstract feet, and this procedure sometimes appears peculiar and unnatural. Yet we should remember, again, that scansion concerns rhythmical organization, not verbal sense. And it is only reasonable, when discussing a type of rhythm, to speak of its most fundamental component, such as (in the case of iambic rhythm) a weak syllable followed by a strong one. Moreover, scansion provides a compact and comprehensive method for examining metrical structure. And though we would in theory benefit greatly from an account of all the syllabic-syntactic types relevant to a particular meter, compiling such a compendium would probably prove in many cases a practical impossibility. The Eng. pentameter, even when self-contained and end-stopped, can accommodate any number of syntactical forms. If we add arrangements that involve run-over lines—arrangements that traverse as well as interact with metrical units—the possibilities seem boundless.

Further, scansion does not exclude other kinds of analysis. Scanning by feet does not prevent our considering ways in which grammar and meter cooperate, any more than it precludes our appreciation of how the stress a syllable carries may be influenced by its verbal environment, grammatical function, or rhetorical sense. Ultimately, negative feelings about scansion mostly result from misunderstandings of it. And instead of jettisoning a system that has, whatever its quirks and deficiencies, fruitfully served centuries of poets and readers, we should try, as patiently as possible, to correct the misunderstandings. More specifically, whenever we discuss prosody, we should be careful to distinguish between meter and rhythm—between the comprehensive pattern of the norm and the many particular ways it can be realized in living speech.

Scansion and metrical analysis have served literary scholarship and education in the past and can continue to do so in the future. They may also encourage and support versification in an age when much imaginative lit. has gravitated to prose or to forms of free verse that, though valuable and interesting in themselves, explore concepts and cadences outside the registers of traditional metrics. Perhaps most important of all, metrical analysis and scansion may help us keep poetry, even as we acknowledge its grandeurs and mysteries, connected with the modest but nourishing disciplines of rhet., grammar, logic, and phonetics.

SCHEME. A technical term from the cl. art of rhet., a scheme is a general category of figurative lang. that includes any artful deviation from the ordinary arrangement of words. Unlike *tropes, which work on the signification of words, schemes involve only their arrangement, as in this *chiasmus: "I do not live to eat, but eat to live." This syntactical rearrangement may take a variety of forms, incl. changes in word order (anastrophe), the omission or repetition of words (*asyndeton, *antimetabole), or the use of parallel or antithetical grammatical structures (*isocolon, *antithesis). The term derives from schēma, one of many Gr. words for outward "form" or "shape," which was used to name a general concept of perceptible form in the arts of rhet., grammar, logic, mathematics, and music (Auerbach). In antiquity, schemes were often divided into schemes of words and of thought (schēmata lexeos and dianoias), although rhetors rarely agreed on a list of schemes that alter verbal expression without altering thought as well. Cicero (De oratore) and the anonymous Rhetorica ad Herennium use schēmata to refer to the three levels of style (grand, middle, simple), while Quintilian translates the term as figura, meaning "a configuration of language distinct from the common and immediately obvious form" (Institutio oratoria). In Lat. and vernacular rhets. after Quintilian, scheme becomes differentiated from its Lat. trans. (figura), becoming instead the term for a kind of rhetorical figure. Along with its counterpart trope, scheme persists as a subclassification of figure well into the 17th c., when it
