As an example of metrical contrafactum, consider the 18 Occitan contrafacta of "La grans beutatz e.l fis ensenhamens" by the troubadour Arnaut de Maruelh. These all borrow the rhyme scheme of the model song. One advantage of this recycling of verse structure in the same lang. is that the melody can easily be adapted to each new poem. The possibilities of *intertextuality are rich, because the imitative group includes several literary genres: courtly love songs versus political songs, soliloquies versus dialogic songs. In this network, there is also a poem attributed to a female troubadour or trobairitz. In fact, recovery of the trobairitz repertoire may be possible only because of research into contrafacta, since women's poetry of the period is often closely responsive to that of male poets; only one song by a woman (the Comtessa de Dia) appears in the manuscript with its music.

A more complex example of the metrical contrafactum is the group of songs apparently based on Bernart de Ventadorn's "Can vei la lauzeta mover," a courtly love song. These imitations include Occitan, Fr., Ger., and Lat. pieces. Here, the melody of each is known, and it is clear that these melodies are not identical. Oral transmission can explain these variations up to a point, but it also seems clear that the basic melody was adapted to each new text. Among these songs are two by Philip the Chancellor of Paris that are loose trans. of each other, one in Fr. and one in Lat. Their melodies are slightly different from one another, which seems to indicate an effort to adapt the melody to the trans.

Networks of contrafacta set the same melody or sound structure in different contexts, among a changing and often expanding set of literary references. E.g., some melodies traveled between secular and religious milieux. One well-known instance is the group of melodic contrafacta apparently built on the short melody of the Gregorian chant "Ave maris stella." From the simple religious piece grew longer, more complex melodies incl. several courtly songs and a Galician-Port. cantiga to the Virgin Mary. Tischler showed links between many religious and secular pieces, among them both monophonic and polyphonic works. Hardy has also shown that some textual contrafacta, while they imitate poetic aspects incl. the verse structure, appear with different melodies for each poem.

In the Middle Ages, Eng. poetry did not participate in the networks of lyric contrafacta. However, some similar borrowings are to be found there, e.g., the Lat. song "Perspice christicola," which is sung to the same music as the Eng.-lang. double canon Sumer is icumen in.

In the Ren., the term contrafactum came to have a more expansive meaning. In music, the polyphonic masses of the 16th c. were often based on one line or even one word from a secular melody. Taken out of context, this short segment was combined with up to four other voices singing the Gr. and Lat. text of the Roman mass. An example of this type of mass is Josquin des Prez's Missa L'Homme armé, which uses as its tenor the melody of a popular song. Often, the line of verse from the short, borrowed song was lost in the mass, and the intertextual allusion had to be understood through familiarity with the original secular song. There are also networks of secular and religious borrowings within the works of the 16th-c. composer Pierre de la Rue: on the same melody, he wrote a five-part chanson on the Fr. poem "Incessament mon povre cuer lamente," a contrafactum mass using the same popular melody as its tenor, and a contrafactum motet in Lat., Sic Deux dilexit.

In poetry, early mod. contrafacta often involve the reworking of an earlier text through its words, its melody, or both to effect a change in the underlying cultural values: e.g., from sacred to profane or vice versa, from imperialist to critical of the imperial enterprise, from male- to female-voiced. The most common kind of contrafactum in the Ren. is the adaptation of love poetry to sacred purposes. Petrarch's Canzoniere was adapted into several contrafacta (e.g., Girolamo Malipiero, Il Petrarca spirituale) that rendered the poems into unequivocally Christian statements. (In Eng., this kind of adaptation is sometimes called sacred parody, but that term can also refer to the usage of conventions from love poetry for sacred purposes as opposed to the rewriting of actual poems.) Eng., Sp., It., and other langs. witness many instances of contrafactual writing in which the change occurs along an axis other than the spiritual: so one of the most famous intertextual exchanges of the period in Eng. starts from Christopher Marlowe's idealist "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" ("Come live with me and be my love") and extends to the many adaptations and replies (by Walter Ralegh, John Donne, and others) that criticize the original poem.

There are many later examples of contrafacta. Some of Mozart's operas inspired contrafactum masses, such as the anonymous Don Giovanni Mass in G major and Mass in C major after Cosi fan tutte, both for four soloists, chorus, and orchestra.

See COMPANION POEMS.

■ I. Frank, Trouveres et Minnesaenger (1952); L. L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation (1954)—defines sacred parody; B. W. Wardropper, Historia de la poesía lírica a lo divino en la cristiandad occidental (1958)—classic study with attention to Sp. trad.; F. Gennrich, Die Kontrafaktur im Liedschaffen des Mittelalters (1965); F. Noy, record jacket notes to Cansos de trobairitz, Hesperion XX, EMI-Réflexe (1978); H. van der Werf, The Extant Troubadour Melodies (1984); J. H. Marshall, "Pour l'étude des contrafacta dans la poésie des troubadours," Romania 101 (1980); M. L. Switten, "Modèles et variations: St. Martial de Limoges et les troubadours," Contact de langues, de civilisations et intertextualité. IIIe congrès AIEO (1990); Le rayonnement des troubadours, Colloque AIEO, ed. A. Touber (1990); Tenso 16.1 (2001)—sp. iss. on the contrafactum, see esp. I. Hardy, "Stratégies d'emprunt dans l'oeuvre de Raoul de Soissons"; H. Tischler, Conductus and Contrafacta (2001); D. Kullmann, The Church and Vernacular Literature in Medieval France (2009).

C. PHAN

CONVENTION. Any rule that by implicit agreement between a writer and some of his or her readers (or of the audience) allows the writer certain freedoms in, and imposes certain restrictions on, his or her treatment of style, structure, genre, or theme and enables these readers to interpret the work correctly. Combining social and objective functions, literary conventions are intersubjective; they hold (like ling. conventions) the normative force that underlies the possibility of communication at all.

Unlike users of ling. conventions, readers who are party to literary conventions may be very few indeed, else a writer could never create a new convention (e.g., *free verse or *sprung rhythm), revive an old convention (such as *alliterative meters in mod. langs.), or abandon an old convention (the pastoral *elegy). Readers who are ignorant of—or at least out of sympathy with—the convention must to some extent misinterpret a work that exemplifies it; and when the number of such readers becomes large, writers may abandon the convention—though, of course, works that exemplify it remain to be interpreted. Samuel Johnson in his judgment of "Lycidas" is an instance of a reader who misinterprets a work because he is out of sympathy with its conventions (Life of Milton).

Conventions govern the relations of matter to form, means to ends, and parts to wholes. Some examples of conventions of style are the rhyme scheme of the *sonnet and the diction of the *ballad; of structure, beginning an *epic *in medias res and the strophic structure of the *ode; of genre, representing the subject of a pastoral elegy as a shepherd; of theme, attitudes toward love in the Cavalier lyric (see CAVALIER POETS) and toward death in the Elizabethan lyric. The function of any particular convention is determined by its relation to the other conventions that together form the literary system. At any point in the hist. of its transmission, this system provides for the finite articulation of infinite literary possibilities.

Conventions both liberate and restrict the writer. Because conventions usually form sets and are motivated by traditional acceptance, a writer's decision to use a certain convention obliges him or her to use certain others or risk misleading the reader. The conventions of the epic, e.g., allow a writer to achieve effects of scale but compel him or her to forgo the conversational idiom of the metaphysical lyric (see METAPHYSICAL POETRY).

To break with conventions (or "rules") is sometimes thought a merit, sometimes a defect; but such a break is never abandonment of all conventions, merely replacement of an old set with a new. William Wordsworth condemns 18th-c. poetry for using poetic diction (Preface to the 1800 Lyrical Ballads); Leavis condemns Georgian poetry for adhering to "19th-century conventions of 'the poetical'" (see GEORGIANISM). The institutional character of convention supports theories of literary change based on the dialectic of trad. and innovation. In *New Criticism, "conventional 'materials'" are "rendered dramatic and moving" by the individual work (Brooks), while in *Russian formalism, dominant conventions change in function as they are displaced by the nascent ones they potentially contain.

Innovation results in new conventions. While established conventions may become, like ling. conventions, unconscious and apparently arbitrary, their reliance on implicit social agreement suggests that new conventions arise through nonexplicit cooperation, in the manner of social games of coordination (Lewis, Pavel). Genre theorists hold that when the "traits" of individual works of lit. no longer conform to the "type" specified by an established convention, they may begin to form the "type" of a new convention and thus set a new "horizon of expectation" for writers and readers (Hirsch, Jauss).

The social nature of conventions also distinguishes them from universals; hence, e.g., neo-Aristotelian restrictions of the term convention to denote "any characteristic of the matter or technique of a poem the reason for the presence of which cannot be inferred from the necessities of the form envisaged but must be sought in the historical circumstances of its composition" (Crane). *Structuralism concedes the conventionality of all norms but seeks to identify the universal laws of relation by which they are organized. The pervasiveness of convention accounts in poststructuralism for the absorption of subjectivity and authorial intention into écriture, the autonomous productivity of writing as an institution (Barthes 1953), and for the concept of a plural, "writable" text whose meaning is unintelligible in traditional, "readerly" terms and must be written or invented by its readers (Barthes 1970). In *New Historicism, the social basis of literary conventions allows for their resituation in relation to the conventions of nonliterary discourse and of nondiscursive practices and institutions.

Because conventions mediate between *nature and its representation, as well as between authors and readers, different theories of convention (and different historical periods) will lay differing stress on their relation to universals, natural imperatives, trad., society, or the individual.

■ J. L. Lowes, Convention and Revolt in Poetry (1922); F. R. Leavis, New Bearings in English Poetry (1932); Brooks; R. S. Crane, The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry (1953); R. Barthes, Writing Degree Zero, trans. A. Lavers and C. Smith (1968); R. M. Browne, Theories of Convention in Contemporary American Criticism (1956); E. D. Hirsch Jr., Validity in Interpretation (1967); D. K. Lewis, Convention (1969); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1974); S. R. Levin, "The Conventions of Poetry," Literary Style: A Symposium, ed. S. Chatman (1971); V. Forrest-Thomson, "Levels in Poetic Convention," Journal of European Studies 2 (1972); J. Culler, Structuralist Poetics (1976), and "Convention and Meaning: Derrida and Austin," NLH 13 (1981); L. Manley, Convention, 1500–1750 (1980), and "Concepts of Convention and Models of Critical Discourse," NLH 13.1 (1981)—spec. iss. "On Convention: I"; M. Steinmann, "Superordinate Genre Conventions," Poetics 10 (1981); H. R. Jauss, Toward an Aesthetic of Reception, trans. T. Bahti (1982); NLH 14.2 (1983)—spec. iss. "On Convention: II"; C. E. Reeves, "The Languages of Convention," PoT 7 (1986), and "'Conveniency to Nature': Literary Art and Arbitrariness," PMLA 101 (1986); T. Pavel, "Literary Conventions," in Rules and Conventions, ed. M. Hjort (1992); J. Wood, "Truth, Convention, Realism," How Fiction Works (2009).

M. Steinmann; L. Manley

CONVERSATION POEM. A type of informal, colloquial poem whose tone is meant to echo relaxed conversation. In Eng., the term originates in S. T. Coleridge's subtitle for his *blank-verse meditative lyric "The Nightingale" and has since been applied to other of his poems, incl. "The Eolian Harp," "This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison," and "Frost at Midnight," as well as to William Wordsworth's Tintern Abbey poem ("Lines"). Like the dramatic *monologue, which it anticipates, the conversation poem situates itself between speech and writing, between artifice and spontaneity, and between the subjectivity of the lyric voice and the objectivity of dramatic exchange. Coleridge characterized both "Fears in Solitude" and "Reflections on Having Left a Place of Retirement" (originally subtitled "A Poem which affects not to be Poetry") as sermoni propriora, citing Horace's rubric for his Epistles and Satires ("more appropriate for conversation"). While Horace's epistles (and such Eng. imitations as Alexander Pope's "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot") provided models for the conversation poem's informal, intimate, yet serious tone, William Cowper's The Task influenced its relaxed, frequently enjambed blank verse, its use of colloquialisms, and its apparent immediacy and spontaneity.

Central to most conversation poems is a "native auditor" (Rajan) who receives the poet's words and helps intensify the sense of immediacy. Wordsworth's The Prelude, in which Coleridge functions as auditor, can be read as an epic conversation poem, while Coleridge's "To William Wordsworth," in which the auditor replies to the poet, as an inverted conversation poem. In later 19th- and 20th-c. poetry, the dramatic monologue tends to eclipse the conversation poem, although Robert Pinsky's "An Explanation of America" is a striking late 20th-c. example of the mode.

Another kind of conversation poem was invented by Guillaume Apollinaire shortly before World War I. Although he tried his hand at the genre as early as 1901 (in "Les Femmes"), the final version did not emerge until later, after he had assimilated the lessons of *cubism. In the early version, which was eventually published in Alcools (1913), two German women sew and chat before a cozy fire. Neighborhood gossip is interspersed with remarks addressed to various servants. The conversation is accompanied by a poetic narrative that contrasts the comfortable interior with the harsh winter outside. In the best symbolist trad., the poem attempts to create a certain état d'âme (mood). The most famous example, titled "Lundi rue Christine" (Monday Christine Street), evokes a visit to a seedy café, juxtaposing random snatches of conversation with random sights and sounds. Conceived as a dynamic verbovisual *collage, the composition describes what the poet sees, hears, and thinks. What distinguishes the poèmes-conversation from other works, Apollinaire explained, is that "le poète au centre de la vie enregistre en quelque sorte le lyrisme ambiant" (the poet at the center of life records, as it were, its ambient lyricism). Although he serves primarily as a voice recorder, the poet also functions as a camera. Since conversation poems consist of a series of radical juxtapositions, the reader necessarily participates in their construction.

■ G. M. Harper, "Coleridge's Conversation Poems," Quarterly Review 484 (1925); R. H. Fogle, "Coleridge's Conversation Poems," Tulane Studies in English 5 (1955); M. H. Abrams, "Structure and Style in the Greater Romantic Lyric," From Sensibility to Romanticism, ed. F. W. Hilles and H. Bloom (1965); A. S. Gérard, English Romantic Poetry (1968); P. Renaud, Lecture d'Apollinaire (1969); T. Rajan, Dark Interpreter (1980); T. Mathews, Reading Apollinaire (1987); P. Barry, "Coleridge the Revisionary: Surrogacy and Structure in the Conversation Poems," RES 51 (2000); J. R. Barth, "The Biographia Literaria as Conversation Poem: The Poetry of Coleridge's Prose," Coleridge Bulletin 16 (2000); P. Magnuson, "The 'Conversation' Poems," The Cambridge Companion to Coleridge, ed. L. Newlyn (2002).

A. Richardson; W. Bohn

COPLA. Since the Sp. term copla often means simply "stanza," it is necessary to specify the type, such as copla de arte mayor (see arte mayor) or copla de arte menor (see arte menor). The copla de pie quebrado, which developed during the 14th and 15th cs., is any variation of the copla de arte menor in which one or more lines have been reduced to half length (four syllables or their equivalent) or half lines have been added or both. The most famous, though not the most common, has the rhyme scheme ABcABcDEfDEf (capital letters denote full-length lines) and is often called copla (or estrofa) de Jorge Manrique or copla manriqueña after the author of the famous Coplas por la muerte de su padre. The copla real (also called décima*, décima falsa, estancia real, or quintilla doble) is an important 15th-c. variation of the copla de arte menor. It is a ten-line octosyllabic strophe, the equivalent of two quintillas, the two usually having different rhyme schemes. The copla real was widely used in the 16th c. but in the 17th gradually gave way in popularity to one of its late 16th-c. variations, the espinela*.

See cantar, judeo-spanish poetry.

■ F. Rodríguez Marín, El alma de Andalucía en sus mejores coplas amorosas (1929); D. C. Clarke, "The Copla Real" and "The 15th-C. Copla de Pie Quebrado," HR 10 (1942); Navarro; D. H. Darst, "Poetry and Politics in Jorge Manrique's Coplas por la muerte de su padre," M&H 13 (1985).

D. C. Clarke

COQ-À-L'ÂNE (Fr., "cock and bull"). Name derived from an OF proverbial expression, "C'est bien sauté du cocq a l'asne" (That's a fine spring from cock to ass), which was, and still is, used to describe an incoherent manner of speaking or writing. The content of the genre is the satiric treatment of the vices, faults, and foibles of persons, social groups, or even institutions. Clément Marot, who created the form in 1530, was the author of four coq-à-l'âne, all of them generally in the form of octosyllabic verse epistles of varying length. Joachim du Bellay discusses the coq-à-l'âne in La Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse (1549).

■ C. E. Kinch, La Poésie satirique de Clément Marot (1940); Patterson; H. Meylan, Epîtres du coq-à-l'âne (1956); P. Zumthor, "Fatrasie et coq-à-l'âne," Mélanges offerts à R. Guiette (1961); C. A. Mayer, "Coq-à-l'âne: Définition-Invention-Attributions," FS 16 (1962); I. D. McFarlane, Renaissance France, 1470–1589 (1974); C. Lastraioli, "Deux coq-à-l'âne retrouvés (1554–1561)," Journal de la Renaissance 1 (2000).

I. Silver

CORNISH POETRY. The Cornish lang. was spoken in parts of Cornwall until the end of the 18th c. and was revived in the early 20th c. It belongs to the Brythonic or "P-Celtic" branch of the Celtic lang. family and is more closely related to Breton than to Welsh. While Old Cornish (9th–12th cs.) left no literary remains, several works have survived from the Middle Cornish (13th–16th cs.) and Late Cornish (17th–18th cs.) periods. Most Middle Cornish lit. consists of stanzaic verse, incl. a number of plays on religious themes that were performed in a distinctive type of open-air theater in the round known as a "playing place" or plen-an-guary. These plays and a closely related poem on the Passion were likely written by the canons of Glasney College in Penryn, a religious foundation dissolved in 1549. The work of Late Cornish poets is more varied, comprising a number of short poems as well as one OT play. Revived Cornish has also produced a significant body of verse lit.

The oldest surviving Middle Cornish verse is a 36-line fragment written on the back of a legal document dated 1340. This "Charter Fragment" may be an actor's part from an unknown play in which an unidentified speaker offers comic advice on marriage to a young couple. Its versification is atypical, since it uses an irregular (possibly accentual) *meter and contains a number of rhymed *couplets, which are otherwise quite rare in Middle Cornish. All other Middle Cornish verse is written in stanzas of four to thirteen lines, using rhyme schemes similar to those found in ME poetry. Unlike Eng., Cornish verse uses a syllabic meter with seven or, occasionally, four syllables to the line. There is no regular pattern of accentuation, and rhymes involving unstressed syllables (like dá : hénna or bára : hénna) are commonplace. The lack of a Cornish-speaking nobility during the Middle Cornish period likely prevented Cornwall from developing the complex poetic forms and ornamentation typical of med. Ireland and Wales, since there were no patrons to support a class of professional poets. As a result, Middle Cornish verse does not feature the *alliteration, internal rhyme, or cynghanedd found in most Breton, Welsh, or Ir. poetry (see BRETON POETRY; IRELAND, POETRY OF; and WELSH POETRY).

The best-known work of Cornish lit. is the trilogy of biblical plays known as the Ordinalia, preserved in a ms. of the mid-15th c. The three plays are Origo Mundi (2,846 lines), which presents a series of episodes from the OT; Passio Christi (3,242 lines), which depicts Christ's life, persecution, and death; and Resurrexio Domini (2,646 lines), which treats Christ's resurrection and ascension and the death of Pontius Pilate. A fourth play on the subject of the Nativity may have existed but has not survived. The principal stanza type in the Ordinalia is a six-line verse form rhymed aabccb or aabaab, sometimes extended to aaabcccb. Variants in which the b lines have only four syllables predominate in Resurrexio Domini, while alternate-rhyme stanzas (abababab or abab) are common in Origo Mundi. The poem Pascon Agan Arluth, "The Passion of Our Lord," is also found in a 15th-c. ms. It covers much of the same material as Passio Christi and contains some verses that are also found in that play. At 2,074 lines, Pascon Agan Arluth is the only lengthy poem from the traditional Cornish period, and it is written almost entirely in stanzas of eight 7-syllable lines rhymed abababab.

Two other Middle Cornish dramas are known from 16th c. mss., the only med. plays from Great Britain that deal with saints who are not mentioned in the Bible. Beunans Meriasek, "The Life of St. Meriasek" (4,569 lines, dated 1504), features three largely independent storylines concerning St. Sylvester and St. Meriasek (Meriadoc). Meriasek is the patron saint of Camborne, where the play may have been performed. Bewnans Ke, "The Life of St. Kea" (3,308 lines), is known from an incomplete ms. of the late 16th c. and tells the story of the patron saint of Kea parish. The second half of Bewnans Ke is particularly remarkable, as it comprises the only extant Arthurian material in traditional Cornish: an account largely derived from the 12th-c. Historia Regum Britanniae by Geoffrey of Monmouth. The versification of these two plays is substantially similar to that of the Ordinalia, although a new stanza form rhymed ababcddc with a characteristically short fifth line is prevalent in Beunans Meriasek and predominant in Bewnans Ke.

The play Gwreans an Bys, "The Creation of the World" (2,549 lines, dated 1611), is linguistically Late Cornish but continues the Middle Cornish literary trad., incorporating several passages from Origo Mundi. Gwreans an Bys has a more mod. feel than the Middle Cornish plays, and there is no clear evidence that it was written for performance in a plen-an-guary. Although the meter is less regular, seven-syllable lines are still the norm in Gwreans an Bys, and the verse forms used, while differing from those of the 16th-c. plays, are clearly derived from them. Most other Late Cornish verse dates from the late 17th and early 18th cs. and represents a sharp break from Middle Cornish practice. Late Cornish poems are comparatively short, deal with secular themes, and often use verse forms modeled on those of contemp. Eng. poetry. These works typically have an accentual rather than a syllabic meter, which may reflect a stronger Eng. influence on the stress patterns of Cornish as well as the bilingualism of the poets, many of whom were not native Cornish speakers.

The Cornish revival of the 20th and 21st cs. has also produced works of significant literary merit. Peggy Pollard's plays imitate Middle Cornish verse forms and offer a satirical reinterpretation of the Middle Cornish dramatic trad. Both N.J.A. Williams and K. J. George have also written verse dramas using stanza forms and stylistic elements found in the Middle Cornish plays. Richard Gendall's work is perhaps best known through the music of Brenda Wootton, who performed many of his songs. While many contemp. poets address themes directly related to the lang. and Cornish identity, the poetry of J.A.N. Snell and Tim Saunders treats a wide range of topics, using verse forms inspired by Eng. and Celtic sources as well as traditional Cornish lit.

■ The Ancient Cornish Drama, ed. and trans. E. Norris, 2 vols. (1859, rpt. 1963); The Passion: A Middle Cornish Poem (1860–61), Gwreans an Bys (1864), Beunans Meriasek (1872)—trans. M. Harris, 1977: all ed. W. Stokes, Transactions of the Philological Society (1860–61, 1864); H. Jenner, "The History and Literature of the Ancient Cornish Language," Journal of the British Archaeological Association 33 (1877), and Handbook of the Cornish Language (1904); D. C. Fowler, "The Date of the Cornish Ordinalia," MS 23 (1961); R. Longsworth, The Cornish Ordinalia: Religion and Dramaturgy (1967); P. B. Ellis, The Cornish Language and Its Literature (1974); O. J. Padel, The Cornish Writings of the Boson Family (1975); J. A. Bakere, The Cornish Ordinalia: A Critical Study (1980); T. D. Crawford, "The Composition of the Cornish Ordinalia" and "Stanza Forms and Social Status in Beunans Meriasek," Old Cornwall 9 (1979–85); The Creacion of the World, ed. and trans. P. Neuss (1983); B. Murdoch, Cornish Literature (1993); The Wheel, ed. T. Saunders (1999); Looking at the Mermaid, ed. A. Kent and T. Saunders (2000); Nothing Broken, ed. T. Saunders (2006); Bewnans Ke, ed. and trans. G. Thomas and N.J.A. Williams (2007); B. Bruch, "Medieval Cornish Versification: An Overview," Keltische Forschungen 4 (2009).

B. BRUCH

CORONA or Crown of Sonnets. Like the catena (chain), the corona (crown or garland) is one of several formal devices in It. poetry for joining a series of *sonnets to one another (see SONNET SEQUENCE). In the simple corona, the last line of each of the first six sonnets is used as the first line of the succeeding sonnet, with the last line of the seventh being a repetition of the opening line of the first; a further restriction prohibits the repetition of any given rhyme sound once it has been used in the series. We find the corona appearing early in the hist. of the It. sonnet with Fazio degli Uberti's series on the seven deadly sins. A more complex corona, not unlike the *sestina, consists of a sonetto magistrale preceded by 14 dependent sonnets: the first of these begins with the first line of the master sonnet and ends with its second line; the second sonnet begins with its second line and ends with its third, and so on, until the 14th sonnet, which begins with the 14th line of the master sonnet and ends with its first; the master sonnet then closes the interwoven garland. In Eng., the best-known corona is that which serves as the prologue to John Donne's Holy Sonnets; it consists of seven sonnets, one on each mythic stage in the life of Christ, beginning and ending with this line: "Deigne at my hands this crown of prayer and praise." Written shortly before 1610 (pub. 1633), Donne's corona draws on both the It. trad. of the Corona di sonetti and a specific way of reciting the rosary; he may well have known, too, Annibale Caro's famous corona of 1588 linking nine sonnets and George Chapman's "Coronet for his Mistress Philosophy" of 1595 linking ten. A 20th-c. example is the "Corona de sonetos" (1953) written in blank verse by the Brazilian poet Geir Campos.

See CONCATENATION, RING COMPOSITION.

■ L. L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation (1954); W. Mönch, Das Sonett (1955); R. Alter, "Saul Tchernikhovsky: To the Sun: A Corona of Sonnets," Literary Imagination 3 (2001); B. Spurr, "The Theology of La Corona," John Donne Journal 20 (2001); A. Patterson, "Donne's Re-Formed La Corona," John Donne Journal 23 (2004).

E. L. RIVERS; T.V.F. BROGAN

CORONACH (Gael.; "wailing together"). A funeral *lament or *dirge originating in Ireland and in the Scottish highlands. The term owes its currency in Eng. lit. hist. to Sir Walter Scott, who refers to the custom in his novels and introduces into his Lady of the Lake (3.16) a coronach of his own composition beginning, "He is gone on the mountain. / He is lost to the forest, / Like a summer-dried fountain, / When our need was the sorest. . . ." According to Scott's account, the coronach was usually sung by women.

A. PREMINGER

CORRELATIVE VERSE (Lat. versus rapportati, Fr. vers rapportés). A literary style and subgenre in which lines or stanzas exhibit two (or more) series of elements, each element in the first corresponding to one in the same position in the second, respectively. This structuring device is known as correlation. An epigram in the Greek Anthology (3.241) provides an example: "You [wine, are] boldness, youth, strength, wealth, country / To the shy, the old, the weak, the poor, the foreigner." Examples of correlation are found in Gr. poetry from the 3d c. BCE and in Lat. poetry from the 1st c. CE. Med. Lat. poets were very fond of the device, as were the Occitan *troubadours, and early Ren. poets made use of it (Étienne Jodelle, "Des Astres"; Joachim du Bellay, Amours 17). A special type of correlative verse, the disseminative-recapitulative type, used by Petrarch, spread, together with *Petrarchism, throughout Italy, France, Spain, and England in the 16th and early 17th cs. Examples include Philip Sidney's "Vertue, beautie, and speeche, did strike, wound, charme / My heart, eyes, ears, with wonder, love, delight" (Arcadia, book 3; see also Astrophil and Stella 43, 65, 100; Certain Sonnets 18); Shakespeare's "Ho! hearts, tongues, figures, scribes, bards, poets, cannot / Think, speak, cast, write, sing, number—ho!— / His love to Antony" (Antony and Cleopatra 3.2.16–18); and John Milton's "Air, Water, Earth / By Fowl, Fish, Beast, was flown, was swum, was walkt" (Paradise Lost 7.502).

Correlative verse has been found in Sanskrit, Persian, Ar., and Chinese poetry (Alonso 1944) and thus seems to be one form of structure available to any verse trad.

■ D. Alonso, "Versos plurimembros y poemas correlativos," Revista de la Biblioteca, Archivo y Museo del Ayuntamiento de Madrid 13 (1944); D. Alonso and C. Bousoño, Seis calas en la expresión literaria española (1951); Curtius 286; D. Alonso, "Antecedentes griegos y latinos de la poesía correlativa moderna," Estudios dedicados a Menéndez Pidal, v. 4 (1953); J. G. Fucilla, "A Rhetorical Pattern in Renaissance and Baroque Poetry," Studies in the Renaissance 3 (1956); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); D. Alonso, "Poesía correlativa inglesa en los siglos XVI y XVII," Filología moderna 2 (1961); and Pluralità e correlazione in poesia (1971); H. Zeman, "Die 'Versus Rapportati' in der deutschen Literatur des XVII. und XVIII. Jahrhunderts," Arcadia 9 (1974).

T.V.F. BROGAN; R. MIGNANI

CORRIDO. See CHICANA/O POETRY; ROMANCE.

COSSANTE. A Galician-Port. verse form popular from the 12th to the 14th c. and composed of parallel *couplets, the first ending in i sounds and the next ending in a sounds. The couplets are separated by a *refrain, with each a couplet repeating the thought of the previous i couplet. In addition, the second line of the first i couplet becomes the first line of the second i couplet, and the a couplets follow the same pattern. The line pattern can be schematized this way: abr(i), abr(a), bcr(i), bcr(a), cdr(i), cdr(a), where r is the refrain. The first half of the following 13th-c. alba* by Nuno Fernandes Torneol provides an example:

> Levad', amigo que dormides as manhanas frias:
> toda-las aves do mundo d'amor dizian.
> Leda m' and' eu.
>
> Levad', amigo que dormides as frias manhanas:
> toda-las aves do mundo d'amor cantavan.
> Leda m' and' eu.
>
> Toda-las aves do mundo d'amor dizian.
> do meu amor e do voss' enmentarian.
> Leda m' and' eu.
>
> Toda-las aves do mundo d'amor cantavan, > do meu amor e do voss'i enmentavan.
> Leda m' and' eu.

The first and second stanzas urge the friend to arise and listen to the birds sing about love. The third and fourth stanzas repeat the lines about the birds singing but clarify that their song is about the love between the speaker and the listener. This example shows how each i or a stanza repeats one idea from the previous i or a stanza before adding new information in the next line.

The use of parallel stanzas and repeated lines creates a weaving pattern known as leixa-pren, a dance term signifying two lines of dancers or singers alternating turns. In fact, early cossantes were originally accompanied by music. The word itself probably comes from cosso, a type of enclosed dance floor. In the Faerie Queene 2.12.71, Edmund Spenser provides an Eng. example of leixa-pren:

> The joyous birds, shrouded in cheerful shade,
> Their notes unto the voice attempered sweet;
> Th' angelical soft trembling voices made
> To th' instruments divine respondance meet;
> The silver sounding instruments did meet
> With the base murmur of the water's fall;
> The water's fall with difference discreet,
> Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call;
> The gentle warbling wind low answeréd to all.

The cossante has its origins in the folk songs of the women from the Galician-Port. region (see GALICIA, POETRY OF; PORTUGAL, POETRY OF). Sp. and Port. trobadores and jograes, court singers and minstrels (see TROUBADOUR, JONGLEUR) traveled the countryside and noted the cantigas de amigo sung by the Galician women as they remembered their absent lovers (see CANTIGA). In turn, these men formalized the cantigas and presented them in the royal courts. Many cossantes, though written by male poets, retain the female speaker as well as the natural imagery that was prevalent in folk songs of the time.

Also, the region was home to the Christian pilgrimage city of Santiago de Compostela, and it is believed that the natives borrowed the form of repeating couplets from the Psalms or from the call and response of two choirs.

Whatever its origins, the cossante was popular for a few centuries until the Castilian lang. began to replace Galician. This occurred after the death of one of the most notable writers of the cossante, the Port. King Diniz, in 1325.

A more recent example of the cossante comes from W. H. Auden, in the "Lauds" section of Horae Canonicae. Though criticized by Fuller for dropping the required rhyme scheme, Auden employs a line pattern rather than a rhyme scheme, using ing and l endings rather than i and a sounds, and he does not develop the typical theme of the cossante. Also, he connects his last stanza to the first by setting the first line of the first couplet as the second line in the last couplet, a closure usually not found in traditional cossantes.

■ A.F.G. Bell, Portuguese Literature (1922); M. Newmark, Dictionary of Spanish Literature (1956); G. Brenan, The Literature of the Spanish People (1957); Introduction to Spanish Poetry, ed. E. Florit (1991); J. Fuller, W. H. Auden (1998).

K. V. BROWDER

COUNTERPOINT. Since the early 19th c., counterpoint, originally a musical term referring to textures in which multiple melodies sound at the same time, has sometimes been adopted—often very loosely and, more recently, with less of the musical analogy intact—to describe various kinds of tension or interplay between elements in poetry.

G. W. F. Hegel was apparently the first to make the analogy between features of poetry and musical counterpoint, but G. M. Hopkins, in applying the term to a rhythmic effect he admired in John Milton's Samson Agonistes and elsewhere, was the first to employ the analogy with any precision. For Hopkins, a contrapuntal effect occurs when, e.g., feet of one kind substitute for two consecutive feet in a regular metrical context, thus "mounting" a secondary rhythmic pattern on the one already established by the meter. The effect can only be local and fleeting, according to Hopkins, because frequent or sustained substitutions "spring" the rhythm, destroying the meter and thereby eliminating the primary rhythmic pattern against which the second one must play. Counterpoint, Hopkins believes, can therefore not exist in "sprung rhythm." Many have criticized Hopkins's notion, viewing the passages he cites from the trad. as mere variations on the meter or as solecisms. Others have pointed out that, because in poetry two rhythms are never actually sounded at the same time, *syncopation, the term for the play of musical rhythms against expectations, would be a more precisely analogous term for the effect Hopkins describes (e.g., Hollander).

Still, Hopkins's implication that meter is merely one pattern of expectation created within a passage, rather than a fixed or abstract constant in the poem, makes him an important precursor for mod. theories about poetry, which tend to see rhythm as a multileveled and dynamic interplay of perceptual groupings, anticipations, trads., and local and global effects. Over the 20th c., Hopkins's term counterpoint—now freely redefined and broadly or narrowly applied—became common in descriptions of formal properties in poetry, in spite of continuing complaints about its imprecise and misleading implications (see Attridge, Cureton, Holder). The term has been used for a wide array of poetic interrelationships, incl. those between phrase or word boundary and foot boundary (Fowler, both 1966), between normative and variant stress patterns in phrases (Chomsky and Halle, Gates), and even between the so-called residual "native" strain of four-beat accentual rhythm and the more mod. accentual-syllabic trad. (Malof).

The most common and widely accepted usage since the middle of the 20th c. has referred to the interplay in metrical poetry between the metrical "set" or expectation of regularity and the actual rhythm of the poem, variously called "speech rhythm," "prose rhythm," or the rhythm of the "phonological phrase." This usage is often very loose, without clear definition and with little indication of what kinds of variation—e.g., foot substitutions or changing levels of stress in the strong syllable positions of the metrical scheme—actually count as counterpoint and which are simply acceptable variations within the meter. More recently, the term has been adopted to refer to the interplay between syntactical grouping or juncture and the line end; in that sense, counterpoint has been argued to be the central defining tension of *free verse (Hartman, following Fowler, but see Holder). Loose, imprecise, inconsistent, and ambiguous as current usages of the term are, in the absence of more exact and generally accepted terms for the specific kinds of interplay or tension in poetry, poets and readers from across the poetic spectrum have found the word useful in describing what they think poetry does.

See PROSE RHYTHM, RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM, SPRUNG RHYTHM, SUBSTITUTION.

■ G. M. Hopkins, "Author's Preface" and "To R. W. Dixon (June 13, 1878)," Poems and Prose, ed. W. H. Gardner (1953); J. Malof, "The Native Rhythm of English Meters," TSLL (1964); R. Fowler, "Structural Metrics," Linguistics 27 (1966), and "Prose Rhythm and Meter," Essays on Style and Language (1966); Chomsky and Halle; P. Kiparsky, "Stress, Syntax, and Meter," Lang 51 (1975); C. O. Hartman, Free Verse (1980); Attridge, Rhythms; Hollander; R. Gates, "T. S. Eliot's Prosody and the Free Verse Tradition," PoT 11 (1990); Cureton; A. Holder, Rethinking Meter (1995).

P. WHITE

COUNTERPOINT RHYTHM. Often manifest as *syncopation, a rhythmical effect produced by metrical variation, that is, by temporary departure from the dominant metrical base, so that two rhythmic patterns are said to coexist simultaneously. However, it might be truer in perception to say that one rhythm, the underlying meter, is momentarily interrupted, or supplanted, by another. Thus, in these lines from W. B. Yeats's "Leda and the Swan" (x denotes weak syllables, / strong ones):

x / x / x / / / x /
A sudden blow: the great wings beating still x / x / x x / x / x /
Above the staggering girl, her thighs caressed
x x / / x / / x x /
By the dark webs, her nape caught in his bill

the dominant *iambic is interrupted in the first line by a *spondee in the fourth foot, in the second line by an *anapaest in the third foot—"stagg'ring" would maintain the meter but lose the aptness of the metrical "stagger"—and in the third line by a *pyrrhic substitution in the first foot, a spondaic substitution in the second, and a *trochaic substitution in the fourth. All this counterpointing expresses rhythmically the physical and psychological turmoil generated by Zeus' descent on Leda.

But intermittent single-foot substitutions like these are not sufficient to create counterpoint rhythm as described by G. M. Hopkins ("two or more strains of tune going on together"). If an alternative rhythm is to be mounted on, or heard against, a given metrical base, then (1) it should normally occupy at least two consecutive feet (and particularly, perhaps, what Hopkins calls the "sensitive" second foot), and (2) it should constitute a reversal of the dominant meter (trochaic rhythm mounted on iambic, dactylic on anapaestic). Criterion (2) is a necessary qualification both because pyrrhic and spondaic feet can only be substitute feet, not substitute rhythms, and because any counterpointing of, say, a rising rhythm (iambic) by another rising rhythm (anapaestic) will produce not counterpoint rhythm but what Hopkins calls logaoedic* or mixed rhythm.

Counterpoint* is a term designed to capture rhythmic "bifocality," the interweaving of rhythms realized and unrealized, actual and projected. For Hopkins in particular, counterpoint rhythm is a useful, logical bridge between *running rhythm and *sprung rhythm. But we need to be sure that what works well as a notion of rhythmic layering or complexity corresponds to a perceptual reality.

■ G. M. Hopkins, "Author's Preface on Rhythm," The Poetical Works of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. N. H. Mackenzie (1992).

C. SCOTT

COUNTRY HOUSE POEM. A kind of poem, developed esp. in 17th-c. Britain, that celebrates the home of a patron, friend, or model of the poet, treating the house and its landscape as an instance of civility and culture. The original country house poem in Eng. is Aemilia Lanyer's "Description of Cookeham" (1611), which concerns the house of Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland; but the most famous example in the period is Ben Jonson's "To Penshurst" (1616), a tribute to the Sidney family's estate. Such poems commonly rehearse and embellish an aristocratic family's view of its origins and achievements, depict a personified landscape as their paradisiacal setting, and enable the poet her- or himself to show (or imagine) a connection to the family through service, invented *myth, or strategic erudition. The most admired country house poem of the period is probably Andrew Marvell's "Upon Appleton House" (written ca. 1651, pub. 1681).

See CAVALIER POETS; DESCRIPTIVE POETRY; ENGLAND, POETRY OF; LANDSCAPE POEM.

■ G. R. Hibbard, "The Country House Poem in the Seventeenth Century," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 19 (1956); R. Williams, The Country and the City (1973); D. E. Wayne, Penshurst: The Semiotics of Place and the Poetics of History (1984); H. Jenkins, Feigned Commonwealths (1998); H. Dubrow, "Guess Who's Coming to Dinner? Reinterpreting Formalism and the Country House Poem," MLQ 61 (2000).

R. GREENE

COUPE. Coupes are the vertical or oblique bar-lines used to separate measures and so indicate the rhythmic segmentation of the Fr. line (cf. Eng. foot divisions), usually according to breaks in the sense. Normally, they fall immediately after each accented (usually word-final) vowel inside the line. In fact, the coupe marks the occurrence of accentuation, and although it is usually accompanied by syntactic juncture in varying degree, it has no necessary connection with juncture; the *alexandrine traditionally contains four accented vowels—one before the *caesura, i.e., the obligatory, predetermined mid-line coupe (//), one at the rhyme, and two mobile accents (/)—and so in Alphonse de Lamartine's "Ainsi, / toujours poussés // vers de nouveaux / rivages," the measures are 2/4//4/2. The coupe is a tool of analysis, a convenience in *scansion that has little bearing on the enunciation of the line, although it does have some consequences for enunciation where the Fr. e atone (or mute e) is concerned. In this case, it is possible to identify three types of coupe. First, when a tonic syllable is followed by an articulated (unelided) e atone, it is customary to place the coupe immediately after the accented vowel, so that the e atone is counted as the first syllable of the following rhythmic measure. This coupe, called the coupe enjambante, produces a seamless and supple continuity in the reading of the line, e.g., Jean Racine's "Pour qui / sont ces serpents // qui si / fflent sur vos têtes" (2/4//2/4). There may, however, be syntactic or expressive reasons for choosing to mark a juncture after the e atone, esp. if it is followed by punctuation, so that the e atone more properly belongs with the accented vowel rather than initiating the measure that follows (coupe lyrique, sometimes called coupe féminine), e.g., Arthur Rimbaud's "Le Poè / te vous dit: // ô lâches, / soyez fous!" (3/3//3/3). The coupe lyrique is fairly exceptional, however, producing rhythmic disruption, fragmentation, and discontinuity, and generally represents a conscious choice on the part of the reader. The coupe épique, common in mod. poetry, is used when the reader omits an e atone, conforming to natural Fr. speech rather than the artificial, traditional rules of prosody, in order to maintain a regular syllable count, e.g., Michel Houellebecq's "Elle avait / trent(e)-cinq ans // ou peut-ê / tre cinquante" (3/3//3/3), in a poem of 16 alexandrines, where the reader adheres to the strong 6 + 6 metrical context by acknowledging that, in order to observe the caesura correctly and produce 12 syllables rather than 13, the first *hemistich requires a coupe épique and the second a coupe enjambante.

See FOOT.

■ Mazaleyrat; C. Scott, A Question of Syllables (1986); B. de Cornulier, Art poëtique (1995); Morier; M. Gouvard, La Versification (1999) and Critique du vers (2000); Le Vers français, ed. M. Murat (2000).

C. SCOTT; D. EVANS

COUPLET (from Lat. copula). Two contiguous lines of verse that function as a metrical unit and are so marked either by (usually) rhyme or syntax or both. This two-line unit appears in many poetries, incl. Sanskrit (e.g., the śloka of cl. epic; see INDIAN PROSODY; G. Thompson), Chinese (the couplet appeared in the Shijing, composed during the Zhou dynasty [1046–256 BCE]; see CHINA, POETRY OF), Ar., and Persian (see GHAZAL). Since the advent of rhymed verse in the Eur. vernaculars in the 12th c., the couplet has counted as one of the principal units of versification in Western poetry, whether as an independent poem of a gnomic or epigrammatic nature (see EPIGRAM), as a subordinate element in other stanzaic forms—two of the principal stanzaic forms of the later Middle Ages and the Ren., ottava rima* and *rhyme royal, both conclude with a couplet, as does the Shakespearean *sonnet—or as a stanzaic form for extended verse composition, narrative or philosophical. In each of these modes, the tightness of the couplet and closeness of its rhyme make it esp. suited for purposes of formal conclusion, summation, or epigrammatic comment. In dramatic verse, the couplet occurs in the cl. Fr. drama, the older Ger. and Dutch drama, and the "heroic plays" of Restoration England. It also fills an important function in Elizabethan and Jacobean drama as a variation from the standard *blank verse, its principal use being to mark for the audience, aurally, the conclusion of a scene or a climax in dramatic action. The couplet occupies a unique and interesting position in the typology of verse forms. Standing midway between stichic verse and strophic, it permits the fluidity of the former while also taking advantage of some of the effects of the latter.

In the med. Fr. epic, the older assonanted laisse* gives way to rhyme in couplets around the 12th c. The earliest examples, such as the Cantilene de Sainte Eulalie and the Vie de Saint Léger, are in closed couplets (Meyer). Chrétien de Troyes (fl. after 1150) seems to have introduced enjambement, which by the 13th c. is common (e.g., Raoul de Houdenc). After the Chanson de Roland (early 12th c.), first the decasyllabic, then the alexandrine couplet is the dominant form of OF narrative and dramatic poetry (see DECASYLLABLE). In the hands of the masters of Fr. classicism-—Pierre Corneille, Moliére, Jean Racine, Jean de La Fontaine—the couplet is end-stopped and relatively self-contained, but a freer use of enjambment is found among the romantics. Under Fr. influence, the alexandrine couplet became the dominant metrical form of Ger. and Dutch narrative and dramatic verse of the 17th and 18th cs. Subsequently, a more indigenous Ger. couplet, the tetrameter couplet called Knittelvers, was revived by J. W. Goethe and Friedrich Schiller. The term couplet is sometimes used in Fr. prosody with the meaning of stanza, as in the couplet carré (square couplet), an octave composed of octosyllables.

In Eng. poetry, though the octosyllabic or iambic tetrameter couplet has been used well (see OCTOSYLLABLE), by far the most important couplet form has been isometric and composed of two lines of iambic pentameter. As perfected by John Dryden and Alexander Pope, the so-called *heroic couplet is "closed"—syntax and thought fit perfectly into the envelope of rhyme and meter sealed at the end of the couplet—and in this form dominates the poetry of the neoclassical period: "Know then thyself, presume not God to scan," says Pope in the Essay on Man, "The proper study of Mankind is Man." When meter and syntax thus conclude together, the couplet is said to be end-stopped.

The couplet is "open" when enjambed, i.e., when the syntactic and metrical frames do not close together at the end of the couplet, the sentence being carried forward into subsequent couplets to any length desired and ending at any point in the line. This form of the couplet is historically older and not much less common than the closed form in Eng. poetry as a whole. It was introduced by Chaucer and continued to be produced (e.g., Edmund Spenser, "Mother Hubberd's Tale" [1591]; Nicholas Breton, The Uncasing of Machivils Instructions to His Sonne [1613]) well into the 17th c. during the very time when the closed or "heroical" couplet was being established. George Puttenham and other Ren. critics labeled this older form "riding rhyme." It was further explored in the 19th c. (e.g., Robert Browning), proving then as ever esp. suited for continuous narrative and didactic verse. Long sentences in enjambed couplets constitute the rhymed equivalent of the *"verse paragraph" in blank verse. In a medial form between closed and open, each two-line sentence ends at the end of the first line of the couplet, making for systematic counterpointing of syntax against meter.

Not all Eng. couplets are isometric, however. Poets as diverse as George Herbert and Browning have developed couplet forms that rhyme lines of unequal length: "With their triumphs and their glories and the rest. / Love is best!" (Browning, "Love among the Ruins"). A related heterometric form of couplet that developed in Gr. and Lat., a hexameter followed by a pentameter, came to be known for its generic usage as the elegiac distich*. Passed down through the Middle Ages as a semipopular form (e.g., the Distichs of Cato), it survived into mod. times (see DISTICH), often as a vestigial visual format with alternate lines indented, as in W. H. Auden's "In Praise of Limestone" or the first section of "The Sea and the Mirror." In the late 20th and early 21st cs., a two-line, couplet-like stanza established itself as the common visual format of much unrhymed, nonmetrical verse, e.g., A. R. Ammons's Garbage.

■ Schipper; P. Meyer, "Le Couplet de deux vers," Romania 23 (1894); C.H.G. Helm, Zur Rhythmik der kurzen Reimpaare des XVI Jahrhunderten (1895); C. C. Spiker, "The Ten-Syllable Rhyming Couplet," West Virginia University Philological Papers 1 (1929); P. Verrier, Le Vers français, v. 2 (1931–32); G. Wehowsky, Schmuckformen und Formbruch in der deutschen Reimpaardichtung des Mittelalters (1936); E.N.S. Thompson, "The Octosyllabic Couplet," PQ 18 (1939); F. W. Ness, The Use of Rhyme in Shakespeare's Plays (1941), esp. ch. 5, App. C; B. H. Smith, Poetic Closure (1968); J. A. Jones, Pope's Couplet Art (1969); W. B. Piper, The Heroic Couplet (1969); Brogan, 389 ff.; Gasparov, History; J. P. Hunter, "Formalism and History: Binarism and the Anglophone Couplet," MLQ 61 (2000); The Bhagavad Gita, trans. G. Thompson (2008)—intro. note on the trans.

T.V.F. BROGAN; W. B. PIPER; S. CUSHMAN

COURTLY LOVE (Fr. amour courtois). A literary and social construct of the Middle Ages that originated in the poetry of the *troubadours in southern France in the late 11th c. As distinguished from other types of love, courtly love is characterized by its ennobling effect on the male lover who assumes a subservient position in relation to the beloved, the idealization of the woman loved, and certain codes of conduct, whether implicit or explicit, that guide the lover in his amorous pursuit.

Although initially a product of the Occitan courts (see OCCITAN POETRY), the influence of courtly love expanded during the Middle Ages to include a variety of langs. and genres. This novel expression of love in the poetry of the troubadours, where it was typically known as fin'amors, was soon imitated in the northern Fr. poetry of the trouvères* and esp. in the romances of Chrétien de Troyes; in Ger. poetry (Minnesang) and romance of the 12th and 13th cs.; in the It. poetry of the 12th-c. stil nuovo poets (see DOLCE STIL NUOVO) and esp. in Dante's Vita nuova (1292–93); in Eng. lit. most notably in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde (composed in the 1380s); and finally, in the poetry and prose of the Iberian peninsula in the 14th and 15th cs. The ling. diversity of courtly love attests to its importance throughout the Middle Ages and into the Ren. The types of works that exemplify courtly love include lyric poetry, romances both in verse and prose, short narratives such as lais, and works of nonfiction, the best known of which is Andreas Capellanus's late 12th-c. treatise De amore, also known as De arte honesti amandi. The structure of the De amore clearly reflects the profound influence of Ovid's Ars amatoria and Remedia amoris on the topic of love in med. lit. more broadly. While the De amore is ostensibly an exhaustive and scientific treatment of love, it is generally considered ironic. Its wry tone somewhat complicates our understanding of the information it provides about love.

Scholars have long contested both the meaning and origins of courtly love, as well as its existence as a historical phenomenon. While there is general agreement that the works of Ovid influenced the *tropes of love in med. lit., the extent of that influence is disputed because courtly love differs in several respects from Ovidian love, most notably in the idealization of women. The meaning of courtly love is often tied to its origins, which are as much concerned with the hist. of the term as an instrument of crit. as they are with the literary and social contexts of the southern and northern Fr. courts in the late 11th and early 12th cs.

Whether this particular expression of love is new to the Middle Ages has been debated, with the polarizing assertions that courtly love inaugurated the Western trad. of romantic love (Lewis, Rougemont), or that it is a universal sentiment with a particular expression in the context of med. feudal and court life. As Dronke has proposed, "'[T]he new feeling' of amour courtois is at least as old as Egypt of the second millennium B.C., and might indeed occur at any time and place." In his influential study, Boase summarized the various theories of origins for courtly love as Hispano-Arabic, Chivalric-Matriarchal, Crypto-Cathar, Neoplatonic, Bernardine-Marianist, Spring Folk Ritual, and Feudal-Sociological and concluded that the Hispano-Arabic and Feudal-Sociological theories complement each other by exposing different aspects of the origin of courtly love. The variety of origins advanced for courtly love mirrors the many claims about its meaning and interpretation. The debates have, in large measure, pointed to contradictions inherent in the concept of courtly love, which has been interpreted as simultaneously sexual and spiritual, ennobling and vilifying, in which women are cast as both idols and the passive objects of male desire. The courtly woman is also ambiguous, for she is both lady and master, feminine and masculine. In troubadour poetry, the lady is often referred to as midons (my lord). Feminist and gender-oriented approaches to courtly love have also underscored the ambiguities behind the courtly lady, the male lover, and courtly love as a whole. Focusing on these contradictions, Kay (2000) sought to establish courtly love as a mediating discourse between clerical and aristocratic ideologies, which are themselves contradictory in 12th-c. court life. In a similar vein, Jaeger (1994, 1999) has argued that the origins of courtly love lie in the civilizing effect of the clergy on the aristocracy and in the influence of the cathedral schools on the courts. According to Jaeger, the discourse of courtly love derives from the discourse on friendship between noblemen; consequently, the shift in the 12th c. of this notion from men to women created a conflict between a traditionally virtuous love among male public figures and a contradictory erotic discourse about the love of women.

As a critical term, courtly love was first introduced in 1883 by Paris as an explanation for the illicit love between Guenevere and Lancelot in Chrétien de Troyes's romance Le Chevalier de la charrette (also known as Lancelot, ca. 1174–81). The tenets of this love are its ennobling effect on the lover, its idolatrous nature, the primacy of social transgression (usually adultery), and the necessity of secrecy to maintain the adulterous relationship. Lewis posited the relevance of this notion to other med. texts, incl. poetry, and ascribed attributes similar to those proposed by Paris, namely, "Humility, Courtesy, Adultery, and the Religion of Love." The concept of courtly love came under considerable critical scrutiny in the 1960s and 1970s when scholars, notably Robertson (1962), Donaldson, and Benton, opposed the term, arguing that its applicability was, in fact limited, to a single text (Chrétien's Lancelot) and suggesting that it was anachronistic on the grounds that the phrase is virtually unknown in the Middle Ages. With the exception of two extant works from the second half of the 13th c., the lyric poem "Gent Es" of the troubadour Peire d'Alvernhe and the Occitan romance Flamenca, the Middle Ages left no other traces of the expression courtly love (amor cortes in Occitan). Robertson further disputed the concept on the grounds that the promotion of adulterous love in Christian culture was implausible. In the same vein, Benton challenged the historical relevance of courtly love since legal and court documents from the period make no mention of it. While the lack of historical documents demonstrates that courtly love was neither a political nor a juridical institution, scholars largely agree that the social dimension of courtly love constituted a form of aristocratic play or diversion. Thus, the "courts of love" mentioned by Andreas are not to be understood in a literal sense. After these attacks on the terminology and the very existence of courtly love as a concept, the majority of studies on the subject have been divided in their support or rejection of courtly love. Most notably, Frappier offered a defense of courtly love as a concept but promoted the use of the Occitan phrase fin'amors as a replacement for the controversial term. The debates about the origins and meaning of courtly love, as well as the inherent contradictions in med. love poetry and romance, continue to spur interest in a topic whose exact definition and boundaries may never be precisely known.

See GENDER AND POETRY, GHAZAL, LOVE POETRY, MEDIEVAL POETICS, MEDIEVAL POETRY, PERSIAN POETRY, QAṢĪDA.

■ G. Paris, "Lancelot du Lac," Romania 12 (1883); Lewis; D. de Rougemont, Love in the Western World (1939), trans. M. Belgion (1956); D. W. Robertson Jr., A Preface to Chaucer (1962); A. J. Denomy, The Heresy of Courtly Love (1965); E. T. Donaldson, "The Myth of Courtly Love," Ventures 5 (1965); P. Dronke, The Medieval Lyric (1968); The Meaning of Courtly Love, ed. F. X. Newman, esp. J. B. Benton, "Clio and Venus" (1968); J. Frappier, "Sur un procès fait à l'amour courtois," Romania 93 (1972); R. Boase, The Origin and Meaning of Courtly Love (1977); D. W. Robertson Jr., Essays in Medieval Culture (1980); C. S. Jaeger, The Envy of Angels (1994) and Ennobling Love (1999); S. Kay, "Courts, Clerks, and Courtly Love," Cambridge Companion to Medieval Romance, ed. R. Krueger (2000); E. J. Burns, "Courtly Love: Who Needs It?" Signs 27 (2001); S. Kay, Courtly Contradictions (2001); E. J. Burns, Courtly Love Undressed (2002); Discourses on Love, Marriage, and Transgression in Medieval and Early Modern Literature, ed. A. Classen (2004); D. A. Monson, Andreas Capellanus, Scholasticism, and the Courtly Tradition (2005); J. A. Schultz, Courtly Love, the Love of Courtliness, and the History of Sexuality (2006).

K. A. BROWN

COURTLY MAKERS. A term first used by George Puttenham in The Arte of English Poesie (1589) to describe the ideal Eng. poet. Poets were frequently called makers in that century; the word poet* is derived from the Gr. poiein, "to make." Puttenham's term singles out court poets, and their forms and themes, as part of his defense of Eng. poetry.

Puttenham selects two sets of Tudor courtier-poets as examples of courtly makers. The original set included Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey, while the second included a number of Puttenham's Elizabethan contemporaries. Of the first two poets, Puttenham writes that they introduced It. verse to Eng., "polished our . . . vulgar Poesie" and were "the first reformers of our English meetre and stile."

Literary critics since Puttenham have focused on Wyatt and Surrey's formal innovations, esp. Wyatt's trans. and imitations of Petrarch's *sonnets and Surrey's *blank verse trans. of books 2 and 4 of Virgil's Aeneid. Until recently, both were placed in a teleological account of Eng. verse that saw them as beginning the struggle toward iambic regularity, Wyatt with less success than Surrey.

Beginning in the 1980s, literary critics turned their investigations to the contexts of Henry VIII's and Elizabeth I's courts and their social and material cultures. Rather than using those contexts to dismiss courtly poems as (in Lewis's famous characterization) "a little music after supper," Greenblatt argues that the poems of courtly makers constituted a kind of conduct, produced by the social ambience of the court, with high, sometimes fatal, stakes. Scholars have since shown how themes common to courtly poets—incl. slander, hypocrisy, and the fickleness of fortune, friends, and lovers—relate to the imbalances of power that poets confronted at court. More recently, Greene has pointed out the participation of court poetry in a rhet. of imperialism, while Dolven accounts for courtly poetry as presenting a distinctive kind of style.

■ C. S. Lewis, English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Excluding Drama (1954); J. Stevens, Music and Poetry in the Early Tudor Court (1961); R. Southall, The Courtly Maker (1964); P. Thomson, Sir Thomas Wyatt and His Background (1964); A. Ostriker, "Thomas Wyatt and Henry Surrey: Dissonance and Harmony in Lyric Form," NLH 1 (1970); S. Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning (1980); S. Woods, Natural Emphasis (1985); R. Greene, Unrequited Conquests (1999), ch. 3; J. Dolven, "Reading Wyatt for the Style," MP 105 (2007).

R. Kaplan

COWBOY POETRY. Poetry written for and about the North American ranching culture, often by those involved personally in the way of life. A parallel trad. exists in Australian bush poetry, South Am. *gaucho poetry, and among horseback herding people worldwide. Logsdon has noted that "it is probable that no other industry or occupation continues to produce from its ranks as many poets as does the cattle industry and cowboying." Cowboy poetry descends from *georgic, *pastoral, and romantic *nature poetry (see ROMANTICISM; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS). Forms and modes range from unadorned *imagery (similar to *haiku; see RENGA) to *narrative, *lyric, *sonnet, *ode, *ballad, *free verse, and more. All methods of analyzing poetry may be applied to cowboy poetry, incl. narratology and *oral-formulaic theory, as well as postcolonial (the Am. West as "colony" of the East Coast or the rural as "colony" of the urban), feminist, ecofeminist, ecocritical, and Marxist approaches. Folklorists have done extensive investigation of cowboy songs and poetry, but the poetry has escaped serious analysis as lit.

In 1886, Lysius Gough became perhaps the first pub. cowboy poet when he self-published 1,000 copies of his verse composed "on the trail in 1882." Rancher William L. "Larry" Chittendon's Ranch Verses was published in New York in 1893. Cowboy songs and poetry were also being published and analyzed in Charles Lummis's Old West magazine during the first decade of the 20th c. Several important cowboy poets published single-author books in the second decade: Henry Herbert Knibbs (Songs of the Outland, 1914; Riders of the Stars, 1916), Charles Badger Clark (Sun and Saddle Leather, 1915), Arthur Chapman (Out Where the West Begins, 1917), and Carmen William "Curley" Fletcher (Songs of the Sage, 1917). Possibly the best craftsman among the classic cowboy poets, Clark seldom used the same rhyme scheme or metrical pattern twice. In June 1918, Poetry published a review of three cowboy poets: Arthur Chapman, Knibbs, and Clark.

> Could you turn to a land that was trailless
> And live, as they lived, without salt?
>
> (Chapman, "The Old Trapper Speaks")

> Did you ever wait for daylight when the stars > along the river
> Floated thick and white as snowflakes in the water > deep and strange, ...
>
> (Knibbs, "The Shallows of the Ford")

> The wind was rein and guide to us;
> The world was pasture wide to us . . .
>
> (Clark, "The Tied Maverick")

Important later poets include Frank Linderman (Bunchgrass and Bluejoint, 1921), Bruce Kiskaddon (Rhymes of the Ranges, 1924), E. A. Brininstool (Trail Dust of a Maverick, 1926), Gail Gardner (Orejana Bull, 1935), S. Omar Barker (Sunlight through the Trees, 1954; Rawhide Rhymes, 1968), and Paul Zarzyski (All This Way for the Short Ride, 1996).

Cowboy poetry can be divided into two kinds: written by or for the working class, and written by or for the landowner class. Although analysis of the latter kind has not been done, some critics have commented on the characteristics of working-class poetry. Many favorite poems among the ranching working class come from Kiskaddon, who wrote for a rural audience, who originally composed his poetry for publication by the Western Livestock Journal during the 1920s and 1930s, 30 to 40 years after the trail drives ended, and who worked only briefly as a cowboy himself.

> I'll be poor, of course, but astride a horse,
> And breathing the western air.
>
> (Kiskaddon, "The Air That They Breathe Out West")

As in the georgic trad., working-class poetry like Kiskaddon's consistently emphasizes the virtues of living on the edge of wild nature and embracing poverty, work well done, husbandry, and cowboy values. The poetry seems simple, but words and assumptions familiar to readers within the culture contribute depth of experience—for instance, the sense of mutual respect between horse and rider implied in the preposition "astride." An anonymous poem about a stereotyped dude heroically riding "The Zebra Dun," often credited to a black cook, is a favorite of rural audiences because it turns on one word—"thumbed"—into a complex study of friendship, humility, and work. This version was collected by John A. Lomax (Cowboy Songs, Ballads, and Cattle Calls from Texas, n.d.):

> He thumbed him in the neck, and he spurred him as he whirled
> To show us flunky punchers he was the wolf of the world.

The "dude" thumbed (not "thumped" as is often printed and heard) the horse he is given to ride: i.e., he scratched his two thumbs up opposite sides of the horse's neck, which causes even the gentlest horse to buck and will increase the effort in one already given to bucking. An audience that understands the word thumb realizes that the dude is actually a disguised cowboy, probably hungry, thumbing a horse that could barely buck off a dude, and hoping for a job offer from the boss without either insulting the crew by out-riding them or making his wants too explicit. Horses often play the role of dragons or tricksters, but heroes are hard to find in the best poetry written for the working class. Instead, themes stress humility, equality, and responsibility to encourage the reader or listener to maintain the ideals of conduct.

Narrative cowboy poetry, esp. as used orally within ranching culture, can be analyzed through critical views developed for Native Am. storytelling. E.g., Basso explains how stories are often used for "stalking" in Apache storytelling, meaning to target people listening to reform their conduct. This is similar to the reasons that a poem like "The Zebra Dun" might be recited within cowboy culture: to teach a young person how to apply for a job, to help a newcomer feel welcome, to chastise someone for talking too much, or to remind each other of the finer points of friendship. Just mentioning the name of the poem is often enough, as is mentioning the place where a particular Apache story happened. Allen argues that labeling marginalized lits. as "folklore" is condescending, since much Native Am. lit. is "known only to educated, specialized persons who are privy to the philosophical, mystical, and literary wealth of their own tribe." Rhyming may also help conjure a mythic time and place, similar to the traditional opening of "humma-hah" (long ago) with which, Silko explains, Pueblo storytellers begin their stories in order to provide distancing.

While cowboy poetry has been stereotyped as representing a white male perspective, Hal Cannon, in a preface to his 1968 ed. of Fletcher's Songs of the Sage, has observed the mix of ethnic backgrounds among cowboys and argues that "with its own creed, dress, fancy gear, language, poetry and songs, [cowboy identity] often outwardly replaces ethnicity altogether." Within the culture, the word cowboy is more often a verb than a noun, referring to the work and carrying no more inherent racial or gender bias than words like teach and teacher or poem and poet. As the Arizona poet Sally Bates notes in the unusually named "Generic Titles,"

> if you're gonna call me a cowgirl
> . . . Then you better start callin' them bullboys

When female characters appear in the poetry, they are often admired for possessing greater intelligence, stamina, patience, bravery, and cowboy skills than the men. Wives and daughters inherit ranches as often as do sons. In many small Western towns, the mayors, judges, commissioners, and other governing officials have traditionally been women (Wyoming was the first state to grant women the right to vote). Collections of cowboy poetry written by women have appeared, as well as bawdy poetry written by both genders.

Another misconception is that all cowboy poetry is rhymed. E.g., Rudolph Mellard was writing free verse in the 1920s and published it later (Along the Way with Horses and Me, 1975):

> . . . reason is a mighty poor thing to lean on
> When you are in a hurry.

Walter Campbell (writing as Stanley Vestal) was publishing *blank verse in 1927 (Fandango):

> The tender naked spider with his rope,
> The cowboy of the grass, who rides the wind.

The contemp. rodeo cowboy poet Zarzyski writes primarily in free verse and challenges the boundaries and definitions of cowboy poetry in many ways. In "The Hand," Zarzyski condemns racism by comparing a white aristocrat's small, "tissue-paper appendage" to a black laborer's large, calloused hand. He combines the cowboy-culture definitions of the words hand (a highly skilled cowboy) and heart (evoking the capacity for hard work) with landscape imagery to admire the "buttes and mesas" of honest labor eroded into the black man's hand and remarks that the size of the hand determines the size of the fist, which, in turn, indicates the size of the heart. Highly skilled cowboys are called hands or top hands or good hands. Both horses and cowboys are called handy and are judged by their hard-working hearts. Cowboy poetry often emphasizes equality based on skill in work, elevating and celebrating working-class skills and values. Although the white aristocrat in the poem wants the world to notice the "difference" between his own hand and that of the black laborer, Zarzyski bestows a cowboy's admiration on the laborer's hand.

Still another popular misconception is that many cowboy poets were illiterate, but examples of the poorest grammar (perhaps rebel or "tawny" grammar, as H. D. Thoreau called it in "Walking," 1861) often comes from the pens of college graduates such as Gardner (Dartmouth) or Lomax (Harvard). One final misconception is that the poetry comes from an oral rather than a written trad. According to one historical publication (strangely titled Prose and Poetry of the Livestock Industry, which collects hist. and biographical sketches, no poetry) published by the National Live Stock Association in 1905, cowboys did sing to quiet nervous cattle on the trail but not often to each other. Writing poetry, however, probably did fit their quiet, observational, and introspective lives.

Untangling the hist. of cowboy poetry from cowboy songs and romantic cowboy myth is challenging. Two early folklorists, N. H. "Jack" Thorp (Songs of the Cowboys, 1908) and Lomax (Cowboy Songs and Frontier Ballads, 1910), created an interest in the performing cowboy with their collections of cowboy songs and probably inspired the singing cowboys of radio and the movies during the 1930s and 1940s. In the mid-1980s, folklorists again revived interest in cowboy poetry and song through the Cowboy Poetry Gathering in Elko, Nevada, which blossomed over time into 150 gatherings in many Western states. Many of the poems recited at the first gatherings were thought to be anonymous and from the trail-driving era, and the performers reciting them were billed as authentic cowboy poets. Cowboy poetry can, of course, be performed by working cowboys, ranchers, or simply performers dressed as cowboys; appropriation and commercialization of the culture are common. The immensely popular, colorful, and entertaining oral performances drew audiences interested in a romantic historical view that evokes campfires, guitars, banjos, harmonicas, and cowboys singing to the longhorns or the moon on the long trails to Montana. These performances, and the poetry now being written esp. for performance, could perhaps be classified as *performance poetry. Quality and authenticity are always contested, and definitions, classifications, and boundaries are still evolving. Most of the poems recited at the early gatherings have since been identified as coming from the poets already mentioned and published after 1890 when the trail drives ended. Many of those poets had brief and sometimes no experience as working cowboys.

More than personal experience, audience seems critical to the cowboy poet's purpose. When the audience changes—esp. in the mind of the poet—the poetry changes. As the gatherings attracted a wider urban audience, the participating poets began composing a different kind of poetry. E.g., some participants used the stage to combat urban stereotypes about ranching, livestock, and cowboys who were being represented as a dying culture: exotic, lawless, uneducated, and exploiting valuable natural resources. The performers and poets also pushed boundaries to include subjects popular with audiences such as the Vietnam War, backyard horses, and politics.

Gioia has praised cowboy-poetry gatherings as one of the "new bohemian" groups reviving poetry outside the "intellectual ghetto" of academia and away from the reach of literary theory and crit., insisting that the revival of cowboy poetry (by the Western Folklife Center) and the publication of several new collections of both old and new poetry have been a boon. Others argue that the performance and entertainment aspects have changed the poetry. Glotfelty (2008) summarizes several controversies: "Experimentation in subject and form has generated lively debates within the field about whether cowboy poetry must rhyme, whether its subject must be ranch life, whether its authors must be cowboys, whether the poetry should be intended for recitation, whether cowboy poetry is folk art or art, and whether cowboy poetry is evolving or has lost its way."

Critics of cowboy poetry often concentrate on the form or mode in which it is presented, but the widespread popular appeal of the poetry may owe something to its philosophical stance—a question that merits further analysis. Much cowboy poetry revisits the ideals of freedoms, rights, and responsibilities that stand behind democratic and religious trads., promoting forgiveness, inclusion, hard work, and the rejection of artifice or possessions. While the details or story line may include livestock, ranch life, tools of the herding trade, or horsemanship skills, the accumulation of those details is about relationships (with land, animals, gods, and one another), identity, instruction, warning, reflection, and all the many topics that poets have been interested in since poetry first sprang from the hoof print of Pegasus.

See ENVIRONMENT AND POETRY.

■ Anthologies: Cowboy Poetry, ed. H. Cannon (1985); The Whorehouse Bells Were Ringing, ed. G. Logsdon (1989); New Cowboy Poetry, ed. H. Cannon (1990); Maverick Western Verse, ed. J. C. Dofflemyer (1994); Graining the Mare, ed. T. Jordan (1994); Leaning into the Wind, ed. L. Hasselstrom (1997); Cowgirl Poetry, ed. V. Bennett (2001); Open Range, ed. B. Siems (2004)—all of Kiskaddon's work.

■ Criticism and History: A. C. Henderson, "Cowboy Songs and Ballads," Poetry 10 (1917); and "Far-Western Verse," Poetry 12 (1918); E. W. Said, Orientalism (1979)—interpreting the exotic other and cultural appropriation; L. M. Silko, "Landscape, History, and the Pueblo Imagination," Antaeus 57 (1986); P. Allen, "The Sacred Hoop: A Contemporary Perspective," The Sacred Hoop, 2d ed. (1992); D. Gioia, Can Poetry Matter? (1991); b. hooks, "Eating the Other," Black Looks (1992); D. Gioia, "Notes toward a New Bohemia," http://www.danagioia.net (1993); A. H. Widman, Between Earth and Sky (1995); The Ecocriticism Reader: Landmarks in Literary Ecology, ed. C. Glotfelty and H. Fromm (1996); K. Basso, Wisdom Sits in Places (1996); Borrowed Power, ed. B. Ziff and P. Rao (1997); B. Nelson, "Every Educated Feller Ain't a Plumb Greenhorn," Heritage of the Great Plains 33 (2000); Cowboy Poetry Matters, ed. R. McDowell (2000); Cowboy Poets and Cowboy Poetry, ed. D. Stanley and E. Thatcher (2000); D. Gioia, "Disappearing Ink," HudR 56 (2003); B. Nelson, "Dana Gioia Is Wrong about Cowboy Poetry," Western American Literature 40 (2006); C. Glotfelty, "A Gathering of Cowboy Poetry," Literary Nevada, ed. C. Glotfelty (2008); A Companion to the Literature and Culture of the American West, ed. N. Witschi (2011); Western Folklife Center, http://www.westernfolklife.org.

B. B. NELSON

CREATIONISM (Sp. Creacionismo). An aesthetic movement proposed by the Chilean poet Vicente Huidobro (1893–1948), regarded as both the precursor and the founder of Sp. Am. vanguardism. According to Huidobro's own account, "creationist" was the name given to him when, as a young poet whose work had been steeped in _modernismo_, he delivered a speech in 1916 at the Ateneo Hispano-Americano in Buenos Aires, asserting that "the poet's first condition is to create, the second one, to create, and the third one, to create." Huidobro was perhaps the most productive Lat. Am. writer of manifestos of his generation and cultivated a distinctive theory of poetic creation. Within the proliferation of "isms" in the early 20th c (*futurism, *Dadaism, *ultraism, *surrealism), creationism extolled the virtues of pure, antimimetic, and autonomous art. This autonomous art is to be understood in relation to another vanguardist tenet: the interaction of art with life. For Huidobro, the aesthetic phenomenon should exist like a plant, a star, or a fruit, with its own reason for being. A new reality, the poem imitates the constructive laws of the latter but not its appearances. Thus, in his "Ars poética" (1916, 1918), Huidobro challenged his fellow poets: "Why sing of roses, oh poets? Make them bloom in the poem."

Upon his arrival in Paris at the end of 1916, Huidobro immersed himself in its cultural life and soon participated actively in the Fr. vanguard movement, known as literary *cubism (exemplified by Pierre Reverdy, Guillaume Apollinaire, and Max Jacob). In 1922, Huidobro exhibited _Salle 14_, a series of painted poems, in which he reflected on issues of representation, originality, and referentiality in a manner that evoked cubist practices. His creationist ideas can be viewed as a variation of literary cubism, although Huidobro fashioned himself as a precursor ("contemporary poetry begins in me"). Chronology aside, creationism can be understood as a radical individualization of the idea of the vanguard movement.

Like many vanguardist expressions, Huidobro's poetry also seeks the recreation of lang. itself. _Altazor_ (1931), his poetic masterpiece of seven cantos, dramatizes a new era in which the poet's vision is that of a divine game of lang. Falling out into space, Altazor's body is consumed with the old lang. of poetry, and a new lang., progressively more radical, is created. An antipoet and "high-hawk" aeronaut, Altazor travels into the realms of nothingness, the "infiniternity." He asserts, "I speak in the name of a star no one knows / I speak with a tongue moistened by unborn seas." In pursuit of a new poetic lang., Altazor resorts to wordplay: "There is no time to lose / Look here swoops the monochronic swallow / With an antipodal tone of approaching distance / Here swoops the swallowing swallow / At the horislope of the mountizon." The last canto ends in total disintegration toward *glossolalia: "lalalee/ Eeoh eeah/ ee ee ee oh/ Ahee ah ee ahee ah ee ee ee ee oh eeah."

See CHILE, POETRY OF; SOUND POETRY.

■ _Vicente Huidobro y el Creacionismo_, ed. R. de Costa (1975); V. Huidobro, _Altazor_, trans. and intro. E. Weinberger (1988); V. Unruh, _Latin American Vanguards_ (1994); R. de Costa, _Vicente Huidobro_ (1996); _Vicente Huidobro_, ed. C. Goic (2003); J. Read, _Modern Poetics and Hemispheric American Cultural Studies_ (2009).

R. SARABIA

CRETIC or amphimacer (Gr., "long at both ends"). In cl. prosody, the metrical sequence – ⏑ –, sometimes felt as a segment of iambo-trochaic and used alongside iambs and trochees or, like iambic and trochaic, in external compounding with *aeolic units. On other occasions, as is obvious from *resolution of either long syllable, the cretic is really a form of the *paeon, and cretic-paeonic measures, though rare in the choruses of Gr. *tragedy, are not infrequent in *comedy. The cretic meter, different from most other Gr. meters, is thought to have been of foreign origin, from a Cretan poet named Thaletas in the 7th c. BCE. Cretics occur in early Roman drama and are also common in the _clausulae_ of Cicero. An example in the former is the song of Phaedromus in Plautus, _Curculio_ 147–54:

– ⏑ – – ⏑ – – ⏑ – – ⏑ –
pessuli, heus pessuli, vos saluto lubens

– ⏑ – – ⏑ – – ⏑ – – ⏑ –
vos amo, vos volo, vos peto atque obsecro

Duckworth reproduces the meaning and meter of these lines thus: "Bolts and bars, bolts and bars, gladly I greetings bring, / Hear my love, hear my prayer, you I beg and entreat."

Like most other of the more complex Gr. feet, cretics do not exist in the mod. vernaculars except as experiments, but some Ren. songs are in stress-analogue cretics, and the song "Shall I die? Shall I fly?" attributed in 1985 to Shakespeare, is in cretic dimeters. Cretic lines appear in Alfred, Lord Tennyson's "The Oak."

■ G. E. Duckworth, _The Nature of Roman Comedy_ (1952); Maas; Koster; Crusius; C. Questa, _Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto_ (1967); Snell; West; G. T. Wright, "The Meter of 'Shall I Die,'" _Eidos_ 3 (1986).

R. J. GETTY; A. T. COLE; T.V.F. BROGAN

CRITICISM

I. Meanings of the Term
II. History
III. Divisions of Criticism

The most common meaning of the word _criticism_ is the expression of disapproval on the basis of perceived faults, and historically, in the domain of lit., much crit. has been the *evaluation of literary productions. Since the 19th c., however, there has been a great expansion of types of writing about lit., and the notion of crit., as determined by the oppositions in which the term figures, has become harder to characterize.

I. Meanings of the Term. The capaciousness and variability of the term _criticism_, when connected with lit., as in _literary criticism_, emerge in specific contrasts in which it figures: _criticism_ is opposed to _literature_, certainly, as writing about lit. rather than lit. itself, though some of the most elegant and imaginative crit., from Horace's _Ars poetica_ and Alexander Pope's _Essay on Criticism_ to Jacques Derrida's _Glas_, takes a literary form. Crit. is often opposed to scholarship: the latter produces information, while the former may use such knowledge but offers *interpretation and opinion. Yet this is an opposition that many scholars and critics quite reasonably would contest: scholars cannot produce good scholarship without interpreting and evaluating, and critics must be at least minimally knowledgeable to produce valuable crit. Crit. has been opposed to theory: crit. deals with particular works, while theory discusses general principles of interpretation and method, but the authoritative Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism does not attempt to decide which essays it presents are crit. and which are theory, and Wimsatt and Brooks's earlier Literary Criticism: A Short History is a hist. of arguments about conceptions of lit. More narrowly, lit. crit., the discussion of the form and meaning of literary works, is sometimes opposed to lit. hist., an enterprise focused on broad narratives of cultural production rather than on the qualities of works themselves. This contrast, which once seemed decisive—in the era of the *New Criticism it mattered whether one was a literary historian or a literary critic—has faded, and in the 21st c., the different manifestations of lit. hist. are seen as forms of lit. crit.

Despite these functional contrasts, the term criticism in its broad sense has come to mean any sort of writing about lit., though its primary meaning today is professional, academic writing about lit. While a drama critic reviews plays and performances and a poetry critic evaluates new volumes of verse, criticism today is associated with the academy rather than journalism. Yet, since so many projects in contemp. academic crit. involve discussion of social and cultural topics that literary works help to illuminate, criticism has come to seem less and less appropriate as a broad term to describe the writing that professors of lit. produce. A better term has yet to appear, though, and for the purposes of this article, criticism is writing about lit., whether evaluative, interpretive, historical, or formal and technical.

II. History. What is today called literary criticism in the Western trad. can be traced back to various modes of judgment, praise or blame, of archaic *song and its performances. Singing contests and symposia were among the contexts in ancient Greece for the exercise and articulation of critical judgment; but a properly literary crit. comes into being only with the emergence of a conception of poetry as a verbal artifact, subject to grammatical and rhetorical analysis, formal classification, and technical evaluation. The classicist Ford writes in The Origins of Criticism, "Only when singers became 'poets,' craftsmen of words rather than performers, could a properly 'poetic' literary criticism emerge as the special knowledge that discerns the excellence of poetry so understood." Such crit. depends on a system of *genres that prescribes the correct telos or aim of each type of song and what is appropriate to each, making possible judgments of success.

For most of its hist., Western lit. crit. is linked to generic categories based on *mimesis—genres differing according to what is represented. Aristotle's Poetics provided a framework of genre theory later developed by Ren. theorists and critics. *Poetics, in the sense of a general account of literary possibilities and the rules or conventions of each, is central to the Western trad. of crit. Linked with the generic orientation of poetics are writings about poetry, such as the Ars poetica and Geoffrey of Vinsauf's Poetria nova, which offer advice to poets while discussing poetry's possibilities. The rhetorical analysis of efficacious speech, an important critical trad. of the premod. era, is also linked to a genre-based crit. Writers on *rhetoric, from Quintilian on, are concerned with *invention and *decorum and cite abundant literary examples to illustrate rhetorical techniques.

As early as Plato, whose attack on Homer and on the fables offered by poets illustrates the polemical nature of much of the critical trad., there is discussion of what sort of knowledge poetry offers, whether particular sayings of poets are true and valuable. The Neoplatonic trad. rehabilitates pagan myths and poetic fables by proposing allegorical interpretations. The practice of commenting on sacred texts, in both the Jewish and Christian trads., contributes to the *hermeneutic resources of lit. crit., as in Porphyry's explanation of Homer's episode of the Cave of the Nymphs in book 13 of the Odyssey as an *allegory of the soul's fall into the world and Dante's "Letter to Can Grande" describing his Divine Comedy in terms of the Christian method of fourfold interpretation of scripture (see EXEGESIS). Crit. of the Ren. explores the possibilities of national, vernacular lits. and their relation to the cl. past and its models. Critical writing of the 17th and 18th cs. continues the evaluative mode but also foregrounds discussions about the relation of lit. to audiences and about concepts of *taste.

The revolution in the concept of lit. that occurs in that generally revolutionary time of the late 18th and early 19th cs. breaks with a conception of lit. linked to generic norms. The shift from a concept of lit. as *mimesis to a concept of lit. as expression disables the primary strain of evaluative crit.: assessment of works in terms of the norms of genres, of verisimilitude, and appropriate expression, specifically the appropriateness of the means of expression to the genre and topic.

This shift in the concept of lit. is ultimately transformative for lit. crit.: no longer is its task to assess the performance of a text in terms of generic norms; a much broader field is open to it. Within this new framework, which gradually comes into play for crit. over the course of the 19th and 20th cs., crit. may still pursue the evaluative project, but since the generic norms are no longer given, it must inquire what the norms should be for the evaluation of a given text. Increasingly, crit., which before 1850 is seldom interpretive, has claimed the task of telling us what works mean. If the work is expressive, then crit. elucidates what it expresses: the *genius of the author, the spirit of the age, the historical conjuncture, the conflicts of the psyche, the functioning of lang. itself. (Such conceptions of what a text might express are the basis of so-called critical schools.) A fundamental paradox of the expressive model of lit. is that the work is mute and the critic must speak for it, unfolding the hidden meaning. What the discourse of the text appears to say is not what the work says: the literary critic must articulate the significance of these mute words. In place of a mimetic crit. that determines the genre and generic perfection of a work based on the action it imitates, there arises an expressive crit. that shows how works express the state of affairs, the lang., or the genius that gave rise to them.

This new expressive poetics opens a vast range of possibilities for lit. crit., ultimately enabling the efflorescence of crit. of the second half of the 20th c. Within the generalized expressive model, where works may express everything from the ideology of a historical situation to the fundamental negativity of lang. or the impossibility of lit. itself, lit. crit. has given itself immense scope, an array of possible "approaches" that may seem to have little to do with each other or to be fundamentally antagonistic, even though they derive from the same principle—the principle that makes lit. crit. fundamentally interpretive yet also hostile to the idea that the work has a message: there is no simple message but a vast range of configurations that the work may express.

The *New Criticism, which became the dominant paradigm for crit. in the mid-20th c., presented itself as antiexpressive: the achieved literary work does not express something; it embodies a complex drama of attitudes, as its formal devices qualify and inflect any direct assertion. But ultimately, for the New Criticism, the work comes to be about lit. itself or about the fusion of form and meaning that lit. seeks to achieve.

It was *structuralism, a major antiexpressive, antiinterpretive project, that sought to account for literary effects by setting forth the codes and conventions of literary and cultural systems that make them possible, that paradoxically spurred the devel. of a wide range of interpretive critical practices. In treating lit. as one cultural practice among others and claiming that wherever there is meaning there is a system that makes that meaning possible, structuralism described multiple discursive practices and cultural codes. Opening up the domain of signification, it in effect encouraged the remarkable exfoliation of critical possibilities that became "approaches" to interpretation, allowing the flourishing of cultural studies, feminism, gender theory, queer studies, ethnic studies, Foucauldian discourse analysis, and postcolonial crit., not to mention various historicisms (see CULTURAL STUDIES AND POETRY, FEMINIST APPROACHES TO POETRY, GENDER AND POETRY, POSTCOLONIAL POETICS, QUEER POETRY). No longer were the expressive possibilities limited to the genius of the author or the spirit of the age. Insofar as all human experience and the imagination of its limits is matter for lit., no realm or conjuncture is too remote or implausible to be something lit. might express in the interpretive paradigm.

III. Divisions of Criticism. There are several different ways of conceiving of the domain of crit.: it can be divided (1) according to the aim or purpose of writing about lit., (2) according to the aspect of literary works to which critical writing gives special importance, or (3) according to the theoretical orientation or particular body of knowledge adduced in writing about lit. These different sorts of divisions intersect and overlap, but they provide a sense of the range of crit.

Crit. can be described according to its purposes or functions. There is evaluative crit. that judges whether writers have done well or badly and aims to tell readers which works they should read and value. Such crit. may be focused on new productions, as in journalistic reviewing, or on the critical heritage of the past. When generalized, this sort of crit. becomes prescriptive poetics: advice or rules for writing well, which can be quite formal and technical. As opposed to evaluative crit. in a judicial mode, impressionistic crit. aims to recount a personal response, helping readers to appreciate a given work, author, or literary mode.

Central to the Western trad. have been writings on the general nature of poetry, apologies for poetry, aimed at defending it in a given cultural context and describing its powers and possibilities. Generalized and systematized, this may become descriptive poetics, which aims to account for the general possibilities of poetry or lit.

Much writing about lit. has had an explicit moral, religious, or political purpose: to explore how one should live, to clarify one's place in the world, one's relation to the divine, or more recently, to enlist lit., through its insights or omissions, in advocating political and social change. One version of interpretive crit. that aims as social change is critique (of which there are various schools), which seeks to lay bare the political implications of cultural practices and institutions. Much crit. of this sort involves interpretation of literary works, but there is also a broad category of interpretive or hermeneutic crit. that explores the meaning of a work as part of a professional lit. crit. aimed at advancing knowledge in a particular domain (whether of a historical period or a literary form or an author's achievement). Crit. of the late 20th c. often sees itself as advancing understanding of lit. and society while also performing social and cultural critique.

Moreover, crit. can be characterized by the aspect of literary work on which it focuses. Abrams's influential account in The Mirror and the Lamp of the four factors in the literary transaction—the "world," the "author," the "audience," and the "work"—distinguishes mimetic, expressive, pragmatic, and objective crit., depending on which factor is the focus. A more refined and specific account would list under "world," historical and sociological crit., cultural studies, and also thematic crit. and archetypal or myth crit.; under "author," biographical crit., some psychoanalytic crit., and genetic crit. (for problems of literary genesis); under "audience," reception theory and reader-response crit., and some rhetorical crit.; and under "work," textual crit. (the establishment of the text), stylistics, linguistic crit., rhetorical crit., and formalist crit. (see LINGUISTICS AND POETICS, FORMALISM).

Finally, there are distinctions among types of critical writing based on the particular bodies of theoretical reflection on which they draw. The list of possible critical schools is potentially large, but some readily identifiable ones are Marxist crit., psychoanalytic crit., deconstructive crit., feminist crit., gay and lesbian crit. (queer theory), the *Geneva school or phenomenological crit., structuralism and semiotics, *Russian formalism, neo-Aristotelian or *Chicago school crit., *Frankfurt school crit., New Criticism, empirical science of lit., *New Historicism, *New Formalism, cultural studies, postcolonial crit., and ecocrit. (see PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY; SEMIOTICS AND POETRY). Most such modes of crit. can be viewed as operations of contextualization, where literary works are read and interpreted in the context of a body of particular concerns, whether these be accounts of the nature of lang. and meaning (as with deconstruction and structuralism) or a set of social and political concerns (as with feminism, gay and lesbian crit., and ecocrit.).

Professional academic crit., which in the 21st c. dominates the field of lit. crit., frequently takes the form of a contestation of premises or conclusions of other critics, as it seeks to further our understanding of literary works. Much of this crit. enlists literary works in projects that are defined by broad cultural themes: the interpretation of literary works serves as a way to investigate the culture and society that they help to create and that they embody. As lit., in a digital age, transforms itself from the fixed text that originally made lit. crit. possible to a performance whose success and conditions of possibility demand to be evaluated, some more traditional functions of crit.—poetics and evaluation—may become central once again.

See CLOSE READING, CULTURAL CRITICISM, POSTSTRUCTURALISM.

■ Abrams; Wellek; Frye; Wimsatt and Brooks; V. B. Leitch, American Literary Criticism from the Thirties to the Eighties (1988); CHLC; The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, ed. V. Leitch et al. (2001); A. Ford, The Origins of Criticism (2002); The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. M. Groden et al., 2d ed. (2005).

J. CULLER

CROATIAN POETRY. Owing to its firm ties with the Western world and the direct influences of Ren. humanism, Croatia developed a sophisticated lit. as early as the 15th c. The father of Croatian lit., Marko Marulić (pseud. of Marcus Marulus Spalatensis, 1450–1524) was born in Split and was a renowned Eur. humanist. In addition to philosophical and religious treatises in Lat., he wrote poetry in Croatian and is best known for his Judita (1501, pub. 1521) about which he explicitly stated that it is written "in Croatian verses," thus officially giving literary status to his native lang. On the matrix of the biblical story of Judith, he vividly describes in doubly rhymed dodecasyllabic lines the perils that his own nation faced before the Ottoman invasion.

Oral traditional poetry, in particular *ballads and lyric *songs, though widely disseminated throughout the region, left deeper traces only on the older layers of Croatian lit. This is particularly visible during the Ren. when poets in Dubrovnik and along the Dalmatian coast wove elements of Petrarchan and *troubadour style with local traditional poetry to create a unique amalgam (see OCCITAN POETRY, PETRARCHISM). The predominant meter is dodecasyllabic, while the thematic range tilts heavily toward love subjects, with some religious and patriotic verses. A central collection was offered by Nikša Ranjina (1494–1582), who started compiling the works of his contemporaries in 1507. Some of the most prominent names included are those of Sigismund Menčetić (1457–1527), a well-traveled writer of noble background who produced some of the period's most erotic verses, and the cleric Džore Držić (1461–1501), who wrote more restrained, sincere verses. Mavro Vetranović (1483–1576), the most prolific writer of the Dubrovnik circle, was known for his moralizing, metaphysical, and politically colored poetry.

Aside from Dubrovnik, the island of Hvar was the site of important literary activity during this period. It yielded highly respected authors such as Hanibal Lucić (ca. 1485–1553), whose Petrarchan verses are some of the best on this side of the Adriatic and whose dialogic verse narrative Robinja (Slave Girl, written before 1530) is the first Croatian secular play. Mikša Pelegrinović (ca. 1500–62) wrote what is likely the most popular piece of the Croatian Ren., Jedupka (The Gypsy), in the vein of Florentine masquerades, with a series of related love poems. Petar Hektorović (1487–1572) is best known for his piscatorial eclogue Ribanje i ribarsko prigovaranje (Fishing and Fishermen's Conversation, 1556, pub. 1568), a philosophical meditation on the virtues of a simple life that also includes the earliest recordings of two traditional oral songs, bugaršice.

The first Croatian novelistic work combining verse and prose is Planine (The Mountains, 1536, pub. 1569) by Petar Zoranić (1508–1569) of Zadar, which provides a patriotic vision of the Croatian Arcadia. Nikola Nalješković (ca. 1500–87) was not only a central figure in Dubrovnik literary circles and left a remarkably diverse corpus of works in terms of genre, incl. a collection of love poetry. From this younger group of Dubrovnik writers, the most renowned today is Marin Držić (1508–67), although mainly for his comedies and pastoral plays (many of them in verse) rather than for the love poetry of his youth. Dinko Ranjina (1536–1607), who like most Croatian writers of this period had close ties with Italy, published his Pjesni razlike (Poems of Difference, 1563) in Italy; many of them echo traditional poetry. Dominko Zlatarić (1558–1613), also of Dubrovnik, became known for his own poetry but was perhaps even more renowned for his trans. of cl. and contemp. lit.

The greatest Croatian author of the *baroque period, Ivan Gundulić (1589–1638), also marked the summit of Dubrovnik's literary achievements with his reflexive poem in three *cantos Suze sina razmetnoga (Tears of the Prodigal Son, 1621), the pastoral play Dubravka (1628), and the *epic Osman (1621–38). In the first, Gundulić introduced a longer form, which became particularly popular in this period as a vehicle for pondering the question of sin and the transitory nature of human existence. His unfinished Osman (two of the planned 20 octosyllabic rhyming cantos were not completed) focuses on a highly pertinent issue: the precarious balance between the Eur. and Ottoman powers. Gundulić's poem, though structurally influenced by Torquato Tasso's La Gerusalemme liberata, does not share the It. author's reliance on events from the distant past but draws his complex narrative line from a contemp. Polish-Turkish battle.

Gundulić's contemp. Ivan Bunić (1591–1658) is a reflexive and sensual writer whose poems are akin to those of metaphysical poets and are often colored with cl. motives. Ignjat Đurđević (1675–1737) was the last great writer of the Dubrovnik Republic; his It. and Lat. poetry is characterized by tight forms and restrained subject matter, while his verses in Croatian are considerably more playful and imbued with the spirit of local traditional poetry. In the continental region, the promising literary career of Fran Krsto Frankopan (1643–71), one of the most erotic and patriotic writers of the time, was cut short by his execution at the hands of the Hapsburgs. One of the most popular Croatian books of all time, Razgovor ugodni naroda slovinskoga (Pleasant Conversation of the Slavic People, 1756), was written by a Franciscan monk of Dalmatia, Andrija Kačić-Miošić (1704–60), in the decasyllabic verse of folk poetry and offers a chronicle (albeit fictional) of the Slavs.

Ivan Mažuranić (1814–90), a recognized writer and the governor of Croatia during the period of national awakening, was most famous for his epic Smrt Smail-Age Čengića (Smail-Aga Čengić's Death, 1846), which describes in the style of traditional epics the Montenegrin rebellion against the Turks. He also completed Gundulić's Osman. Patriotic and reflexive, the poetry of Petar Preradović (1818–72) raised awareness of the importance of the national lang. at a time when Croats could not use their mother tongue for official purposes. Silvije Strahimir Kranjčević (1865–1908) was a similarly politically engaged poet whose anguish and calls for social justice were often rendered through the use of cl. motifs.

Antun Gustav Matoš (1873–1914) was a harbinger of *modernism and a great practitioner of the *sonnet form who shifted the focus to introspective themes and insisted on the supremacy of the aesthetic dimension. Other Croatian modernists greatly influenced by Matoš were Vladimir Vidrić (1875–1909) and Ljubo Wiesner (1885–1951), while Vladimir Nazor (1876–1949) remained faithful to Dalmatian motifs. Janko Polić Kamov (1886–1910), known as a Croatian poet-rebel, wrote expressionist verses condemning the hypocrisy of middle-class dogmas (see EXPRESSIONISM). Antun Branko Šimić (1898–1925) was a master of concision and introduced *free verse to Croatian lit. Despite his early death, the expressionistic features of his only published collection had a lasting impact. Augustin Tin Ujević (1891–1955), a disciple of Matoš, likewise holds an important place for his poems of human suffering and exuberant elation. The musicality of his expression and his ling. opulence, combined with an ability to transcend the realm of the personal and convey universally recognizable mental states, make him unquestionably the most influential Croatian poet.

Miroslav Krleža (1893–1981), the greatest Croatian prose writer, also left a considerable lyric opus, much of it dealing with social themes. Ivan Goran Kovačić (1913–43) is known for his antifascist poem Jama (The Pit, 1943), while Dobriša Cesarić (1902–80) and Dragutin Tadijanović (1905–2007) have been praised for poetry that celebrates nature and the simple life but also for vignettes of everyday life rendered with seemingly effortless style. Nikola Šop (1904–1982), a Croatian poet from Bosnia, drew the attention of W. H. Auden with his Christian mystic verses and cosmic metaphors. Auden translated some of Šop's poetry into Eng. Jure Kaštelan (1919–90) and Josip Pupačić (1928–71) are both quintessential poets of the south, with the sea permeating their poems, though, in the case of Kaštelan, war also appears as a focal theme of his early period. Along with Pupačić and Kaštelan, Vesna Parun (1922–2010) marked a new postwar generation that introduced a more personal tone in a variety of subjects. Parun is particularly well known for her intimate love poetry.

Ivan Slamnig (1930–2001) gained the status of the most ironic Croatian poet and a ling. innovator whose expression bursts with neologisms, archaisms, and other wordplay. Anxiety, loneliness, and helplessness are central features in the poetry of Slavko Mihalič (1928–2007), who combines the everyday and the sublime with powerful eloquence. Antun Šoljan (1932–93), inspired by the Anglo-Am. school, in particular T. S. Eliot, wrote intellectual poetry, while Daniel Dragojević (b. 1934) shows a philosophical orientation, often employing paradox in order to invert the world and reveal its true meaning. The lexically rich poetry of Drago Štambuk (b. 1950) employs both his native Dalmatian and cosmopolitan imagery, while that of Anka Žagar (b. 1954) plays with the notion of semantic concretization, merging stream of consciousness, syntactic distortions, and neologisms to offer one of the most engaging oeuvres in the contemp. Croatian poetic scene.

■ Anthologies: Hrvatske narodne pjesme, ed. N. Andrič et al., 10 v. (1896–1942); Zlatna knjiga hrvatskog pjesništva od početaka do danas, ed. V. Pavletić (1970); Leut i truba, ed. R. Bogišić (1971); Antologija hrvatskog pjesništva ranog moderniteta, ed. S. P. Novak (2004); Utjeha kaosa, ed. M. Mićanović (2006); Antologija hrvatskoga pjesništva, ed. A. Stamać (2007); Love Lyric and Other Poems of the Croatian Renaissance: A Bilingual Anthology, ed. and trans. J. S. Miletich (2009).

■ Criticism and History: J. Torbarina, Italian Influence on the Poets of the Ragusan Republic (1931); A. Kadić, Contemporary Croatian Literature (1960); R. Bogišić, O hrvatskim starim pjesnicima (1968); I. Slamnig, Hrvatska versifikacija (1981); S. P. Novak, Povijest hrvatske književnosti (2003).

A. VIDAN

CROSS RHYME (Ger. Kreuzreim, überschlagender Reim; Fr. rime brisée, rime croisée). Also known as envelope rhyme or enclosed rhyme, cross rhyme is now commonly used to refer to the abab pattern of end words in a quatrain (Perloff, Scott, Adams). But as Schipper has pointed out, when two long lines of a rhyming *couplet are connected by a rhyme before the *caesura as well as by a rhyme at the end of the line (interlaced rhyme, rime entrelacée), they will seem to be broken up into four short lines of cross rhyme, and some overlap between the terms is understandable. Most common in long-line verse, such as the med. Lat. hexameter, cross rhyme also features prominently in certain Ir. stanza forms, such as the droighneach and the rannaigheacht mhor, both of which have at least two cross rhymes in each couplet (Turco).

■ Schipper, History; M. Perloff, Rhyme and Meaning in the Poetry of Yeats (1970); C. Scott, The Riches of Rhyme (1988); L. Turco, The Book of Forms (2000); S. Adams, Poetic Designs (2003).

W. Hunter

CUADERNA VÍA. A Sp. meter (also called alejandrino, mester de clerecía, nueva maestría) in which syllable counting was used for the first time in Castilian, though the line soon deteriorated or was modified to one of somewhat more flexible length. It was introduced, probably under Fr. influence, in the first part of the 13th c. or earlier by the clergy (hence, the name mester de clerecía in contrast to the mester de juglaría, or minstrel's meter, typical of the popular *epic and other narrative poetry). This meter, particularly in the work of its earliest known exponent, Gonzalo de Berceo (late 12th–mid-13th c.), is notable for its rigidity of form: syllables are counted carefully; each line consists of two *hemistichs of seven syllables each; the lines are grouped into monorhymed quatrains having true rhyme rather than *assonance. According to Fitz-Gerald, *hiatus was obligatory, though various forms of *elision and metrical contraction were permitted. An example of the cuaderna vía from the work of Berceo is the following:

> Yo Maestro Gonzalvo de Berceo nom-> nado, iendo en romeria, caeci en > un prado, verde e bien sencido, de > flores bien poblado; logar cobdi-> ciaduero pora homne cansado.

The best-known works written largely in cuaderna vía are Juan Ruiz's Libro de buen amor and Pero López de Ayala's Rimado de Palacio, both from the 14th c. The cuaderna vía was employed for most of the serious poetry written in the 13th and 14th cs., but it was completely supplanted in the 15th by the arte mayor*.

■ J. D. Fitz-Gerald, Versification of the Cuaderna Vía as Found in Berceo's "Vida de Santo Domingo de Silos" (1905); J. Saavedra Molina, "El verso de clerecía," Boletín de filología 6 (1950–51); Navarro; C. F. Fraker, "'Cuaderna vía' and Narrative," Justina: Homenaje a Justina Ruiz de Conde, ed. E. Gascón-Vera and J. Renjilian-Burgy (1992); P. Ancos-García, "La forma primaria de difusión y de recepción de la poesía castellana en cuaderna vía del siglo XIII," DAI 65 (2005).

D. C. Clarke

CUBA, POETRY OF. See caribbean, poetry of the.

CUBISM. A school in the visual arts led by Pablo Picasso and Georges Braque in Paris, ca. 1907–25, which, in part as a reaction against impressionism, stressed the geometrical forms conceived to be inherent in the objects it represented—hence, "les petites cubes," which irritated Henri Matisse but which ironically led to the name of the school. Although three stages have been postulated for this school (Gray), cubism is commonly divided into an "analytic" stage, which dissects the inherent geometrical forms of objects, emphasizing them through a limited palette, and a "synthetic" stage, in which fragments of various objects are reintegrated into a new, self-consciously aesthetic object. At its most sophisticated, synthetic cubism evolved techniques of *collage and papier collé, incorporating fragments of real objects into the composition, incl. fragments of verbal texts, thereby challenging a naive acceptance of either visual or verbal representation. Cubism was enthusiastically embraced by the Fr. poet Guillaume Apollinaire, who praised the cubist aesthetic in his Les Peintres cubistes (1913), thus encouraging a critical controversy still waged today as to whether there is such a genre as cubist lit. in general or cubist poetry in particular. In part because Apollinaire (and later Pierre Reverdy and e. e. cummings) denied being a cubist poet, and in part because of a theoretical questioning of the validity of transferring a term from one artistic medium to another, several critics have denied the existence of cubist lit. altogether (Decaudin). However, the term cubist literature was accepted as early as 1941 (Lemaître) and has subsequently gained so much acceptance that James Joyce, T. S. Eliot, William Faulkner, Wallace Stevens, cummings, Ford Madox Ford, Gertrude Stein, Max Jacob, and Alain Robbe-Grillet have all been called cubist writers. The diversity of these writers has led some critics to conclude that cubism best describes the 20th-c. perspective (Sypher) and critical temperament (Steiner).

Despite its increased acceptance, the term cubist poetry has very different meanings in the hands of different critics. Since, in contrast to *imagism, *vorticism, or *futurism, there is no poetic cubist *manifesto, it is possible to find cubist poetry defined as a style marked by "new syntax and punctuation, based on typographical dispersion" (Admussen); as a poetic movement between futurism and *expressionism (Hadermann); or as a style characterized by an unusual amount of "punning, contradiction, parody, and word play" in order to create the *ambiguity so characteristic of visual cubism (Steiner). Cubist poetry is variously confined to the writings concurrent with the cubist school, esp. 1912–19 (Carmody) or to the works typically printed in Nord-Sud, a jour. ed. by Reverdy (Admussen), or it is extended to works marked by visual fragmentation, such as that of cummings or Louis Zukofsky; works obsessed with perception, such as Stevens's "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird"; or works constituted by multiple voices and temporal layers, such as Eliot's The Waste Land.

Even within the visual arts, cubism proved to be a highly complex and diffuse movement; and it is reasonable to expect that such diversity would be reflected in the poetry as well, as various poets appropriated different facets of cubism into their work. Thus, W. C. Williams's "The Red Wheelbarrow," with its continually changing in perspectives, and Eliot's Waste Land, with *fragments of various langs., disrupted narrative, and multifaceted *allusions, constitute relatively simple and complex versions of the "analytic" pole of poetic cubism. In contrast, Stevens's "Man with the Blue Guitar," which stresses its ambiguous status as a representational object by frustrating its own ability to represent, may be described as the poetic embodiment of synthetic cubism. Some poets such as Pound and Eliot incorporate not only multiple allusions but the so-called found poem (see FOUND POETRY) as well, thus approaching the montage or collage that some critics find most characteristic of cubist lit.

In the case of Stein, her Tender Buttons in particular has been considered in the context of cubism as a result of its focus on alternative ways of perceiving and evoking objects. Readers have often found Stein's "A Seltzer Bottle" or "A Red Hat" as baffling and unlike their reported objects as Juan Gris' "Violin and Glass" or Braque's "Candlesticks and Playing Cards." In her essay "Portraits," Stein writes of Tender Buttons, "the thing that excited me very much at that time and still does is that the words or words that make what I looked at be itself were always words that to me very exactly related themselves to that thing the thing at which I was looking, but as often as not had as I say nothing whatever to do with what any words would do that described that thing."

In a very different way, the attention to visual form inherent in visual cubism invites such *visual poetry as Apollinaire's "Coeur couronne et miroir" or such *concrete poetry as his "Lettre-Océan." The visual impact of the verbal text is further explored in such experimental poetry as Henri Chopin's "il manque tourjours l'y" or Eugen Gomringer's "the black mystery is here" (Steiner), both of which stress their status as artistic objects. More radically, the conjunction of visual and verbal texts typical of the later cubist paintings, as well as the tendency toward the fragmentation or "analysis" of form characteristic of all cubist works, may be realized in such complicated pieces as Marius de Zaya's "mental reactions," in which the fragmentation and reassembly of a poem by Agnes Ernst Meyer with visual forms undermines the distinction between the two arts altogether (Bohn). But the most typical visual mark of cubist poetry is the rupture of normal *stanza, *line, and word boundaries, which creates a visual text even less conventional than that of *free verse. The most famous practitioner of this strategy is cummings, whose work includes sentence fragments and open parenthetical phrases, embodying disjunctive forms at the syntactic level.

While it is not possible to devise a list of characteristics that will be present in every "cubist" poem, it is possible to say that, along the spectrum of analytic and synthetic interpretations, cubist poetry is likely to be characterized by a highly self-conscious sense of its own *modernism; attention to visual form (which may move toward the composition of very precise, blocklike stanzas bearing an affinity to imagism or toward a more radical arrangement of the printed page); a rupturing of conventional poetic and semantic forms; and a thematic preoccupation with multiple perspectives, leading to a questioning of the representation itself. Finally, the very fragmentation of form that was ironically so characteristic of a movement preoccupied with form encouraged the blurring of genre and media distinctions, giving rise to the *prose poem of Max Jacob and others or to such intermedia as Zukofsky's epic-length "A," which evolves from poetic to musical composition.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS.

■ G. Lemaître, From Cubism to Surrealism in French Literature (1941); C. Gray, Cubist Aesthetic Theories (1953); F. Carmody, "L'Esthétique de l'esprit nouveau," Le Flaneur des deux rives 2 (1955); W. Sypher, From Rococo to Cubism in Art and Literature (1960); F. Steegmuller, Apollinaire: Poet among the Poets (1963); G. Stein, Writings and Lectures 1909–1945 (1967); R. Admussen, "Nord-Sud and Cubist Poetry," JAAC 27 (1968); J. Golding, Cubism (1968); B. Dijkstra, The Hieroglyphics of a New Speech (1969); G. Kamber, Max Jacob and the Poetics of Cubism (1971); E. Frye, Cubism (1978); P. Hadermann, "De Quelques Procédés 'cubistes' en poésie," Actes du VIIIe Congrès de l'Assoc. Internationale de Littérature Comparée (1980); F. Igly, Apollinaire: Poète ami et défenseur des peintres cubistes (1982); "Cubisme et Littérature," spec. iss. of Europe: Revue littérature Mensuelle 638–39 (1982), esp. Decaudin; W. Marling, William Carlos Williams and the Painters, 1909–1923 (1982); W. Steiner, The Colors of Rhetoric (1982), incl. bibl.; H. Sayre, The Visual Text of William Carlos Williams (1983); M. Perloff, The Dance of the Intellect (1985); W. Bohn, The Aesthetics of Visual Poetry, 1914–1928 (1986); J. V. Brogan, Part of the Climate: American Cubist Poetry (1991); P. Nicholls, "From Fantasy to Structure: Two Moments of Literary Cubism," Forum for Modern Language Studies 28 (1992); J. Pap, " 'Entre quatre murs': Reverdy, Cubism, and the Space of Still Life," Word & Image 12 (1996); S. Scobie, Earthquakes and Explorations: Language and Painting from Cubism to Concrete Poetry (1997); R. Havard, "Jorge Guillén, Picasso, and the Language of Cubism," Anales de la literatura española contemporánea 32 (1997).

J. V. BROGAN; B. TATE

CUECA CHILENA. A South Am. popular dance song, also called chilenita, zamacueca, and zamacueca peruana, which is an eight-line seguidilla* in which the basic quatrain is separated from the estribillo* (refrain) by the insertion of a line that is a repetition of the fourth line plus the word sí (yes).

■ F. Hanssen, "La seguidilla," Anales de la Universidad de Santiago de Chile 125 (1909).

D. C. Clarke

CULTURAL CRITICISM. During its devel. from the 18th c. onward, cultural crit. in the West has been preoccupied with the social roles of the arts and intellectuals; the uses of education and literacy; the effects of population increase and economic transformations stemming from industrial capitalism; the functions of institutions, esp. the nation state and the media; the relative status and value of popular (low, mass) and canonical (high) culture; and the possibilities for social improvement and political change. Given such concerns, it is not surprising that cultural critics share interests and methods not only with certain anthropologists, communications and media specialists, journalists, historians, and sociologists, but with a wide array of literary critics, incl. nowadays Marxists, myth critics, philologists, semioticians, New Historicists, ethnic critics, feminists, postcolonial critics, and various independents and mavericks. The task of cultural crit., as shaped by contemp. cultural studies, is to analyze and assess the sociohistorical roots, distribution networks, and ethicopolitical impacts of communal artifacts, practices, and organizations. Its methodologies include textual exegesis, historical inquiry, and survey and interview techniques, as well as institutional, ideological, and ethical analyses. Poetry is subject to cultural crit.

One of the perennial preoccupations of cultural crit. is the definition and conceptualization of the term culture. In ordinary usage, the word displays a wide range of designations: it names intellectual and artistic practices and works, notably lit., music, visual arts, theater, philosophy, and crit.; it describes processes of intellectual, moral, and aesthetic devel.; it indicates the distinctive way of life of a people, period, or humanity; it signals refinement of *taste, judgment, and intellect; and it includes manners, *conventions, myths, and institutions. Thus, culture refers simultaneously to processes and products, to material and symbolic production, to specific and general human devel., to everyday social practices and elite arts, to ethics and aesthetics, to subcultures and civilization. Among cultural critics and theorists, the ambiguity of the word and the continuous contention surrounding the idea reveal less a failure to come to terms or to isolate a discrete object of inquiry than a recurring magnetic pull, a multifaceted quality of attraction, and a struggle, characteristic of both the concept and the enterprise of studying culture. Tylor's still influential definition succinctly suggests the richness of the term: culture is "that complex whole which includes knowledge, belief, art, morals, law, custom, and any other capabilities and habits acquired by man as a member of society."

Arnold's formulations on culture in Culture and Anarchy mark a watershed in the hist. of Western cultural crit. Arnold sums up and transforms a trad. of thought extending from Jonathan Swift and Giambattista Vico through Edmund Burke and J. G. Herder to William Cobbett, S. T. Coleridge, and Thomas Carlyle. Culture is the pursuit of a best self and a general perfection motivated by passion for pure knowledge and for social and moral right action effected by reading, observing, and thinking about the voices of human experience in art, science, poetry, philosophy, hist., and religion. Culture leads people to see things as they are; to increase their sympathy and intelligence; to make right reason and the will of God prevail; to do away with social classes; to render everywhere current the best that has been thought and known in the world; to practice free and spontaneous, disinterested play of thought transcending stock notions and habits; and to attain complete, harmonious perfection. The enemies of culture include confusion, religious zeal, individualism, sectarianism, machinery, industrialism, and anarchy. For Arnold, culture engenders dissatisfaction with, and purgation of, the vulgar philistinism typical of industrial capitalist life. Promoted through education undertaken by the state (a collective apparatus embodying higher reason), culture serves as a principle of authority to counteract tendencies toward social disintegration. The agents of culture are a saving remnant of intellectuals who come from all classes, raise themselves above class spirit, work optimistically and nonviolently, and avoid as much as possible direct political action.

For the poet-critic Arnold and many other cultural critics, poetry is one among a number of arts and sciences that document sociohistorical conditions and, more important, that enlighten the mind and spirit. Poetry serves an ethicopolitical role in society, providing a high ground for personal devel. and social crit., which are linked to a broad project of social reform undertaken by the educational establishment and the state. In the Arnoldian trad., cultural crit. seeks to foster through the free play of consciousness a better social self and a better world. Thus, poetry is valued not primarily for its aesthetic refinement or for its insight into the artist's soul or for its power to entertain us or purge our emotions (as given in formalist, expressive, and affective theories of Western poetics, see AFFECT, FORMALISM), but rather for the efficacy of its agency in social action (the mimetic and didactic functions).

One impulse of cultural crit. is not to place lit. in a hierarchy of aesthetic forms but rather to situate all literary works within a network of other related cultural forms and practices. Yet another impulse is to focus on superior works, on the best that humankind has created, judging most popular and mass forms as degraded and inferior, particularly those produced in the era of mod. industrial capitalism. Arnold is usually taken as representative of the elitist strand of thought, which culminates in various complex ways during the early and mid-20th c. with such politically diverse groups of influential cultural critics as the *Frankfurt school, New Critics (see NEW CRITICISM), New York intellectuals, and Scrutiny circle. For these thinkers, lit. and culture constitute superior achievements of human excellence critical of the poor state of mod. civilization. In secularized Western societies, culture also frequently comes to serve displaced religious functions, advocating right action, humility, and harmony.

It is against the tendencies to construe culture as a body of superior works, a standard of excellence, or a repository of ruling-class values that Williams argues in Culture and Society, the leading contemp. study of the hist. of cultural crit. For Williams, a culture is "not only a body of intellectual and imaginative works; it is also and essentially a whole way of life." The skilled, intelligent, creative activities that constitute culture include, e.g., gardening, metalwork, carpentry, and active politics, as well as all forms of theater, music, lit., and art. Culture is and should be common not selective, democratic not dominative. Like traditional cultural forms, new modes of cultural practice such as photography, television, cinema, broadcasting, and advertising can be understood and evaluated only by reference to the lived experience of everyday life, to the whole way of existence of a people, incl. its habits, memories, and institutions. Significantly, the productions and processes of numerous class factions and subcultures make it evident that struggle and contradiction characterize culture. Such phenomena discredit static and nostalgic views of culture as a permanent harmonious entity available for an elite minority.

In a representative analysis of Ben Jonson's famous, long *country house poem "To Penshurst" (1616), written in praise of an aristocratic estate, Williams not only appreciates the rural setting and the hospitality figured by lavish meals but assesses what is missing in the sumptuous details: "The actual men and women who rear the animals and drive them to the house and kill them and prepare them for meat; who trap the pheasants and partridges and catch the fish; who plant and manure and prune and harvest the fruit trees: these are not present; their work is all done for them by the natural order." The poem omits the labor, not to mention the property relations, that stands behind the gracious country house. As elaborated in The Country and the City, Williams judges this superior aesthetic artifact ultimately a "mystification" when set in the larger context of postmedieval Eng. hist. running up through the 20th c. In his book, Williams both historicizes and demystifies five centuries of pastoral poetry, criticizing the combined ethics of consumption and the obliviousness to labor characteristic of developing capitalist culture and elite poetic trad.

From the 1970s into the 21st c., cultural crit. in the trad. of Williams was transformed into a new discipline—cultural studies—housed in the university. Meanwhile, the Arnoldian trad. continued most noticeably in the nonacademic learned media, particularly cultural reviews like The New Criterion (founded in New York in 1982). At this crossroads, cultural studies displayed a liberal left orientation, while cultural crit. exhibited conservative center-right values. This split flared most dramatically during the culture wars of the 1980s and 1990s. A main point of contention concerned educational priorities assigned great works over popular culture (Shakespeare versus Bob Dylan). Another area of dispute involved the relative importance ascribed to aesthetic quality versus both the socially critical and the compensatory utopian dimensions of the arts. Many other areas of contention continue between left- and right-oriented critics of culture, incl. the roles as well as the relevance of social belonging versus individualism, secularism versus religion, class struggle versus harmony, welfare state versus laissez-faire capitalism, and socially engaged lit. versus art for art's sake.

Much of the poetry crit. and poetics of the late 20th and early 21st cs. reflects the distinctive preoccupations of contemp. cultural crit. and cultural studies locked in culture wars. What cultural critics of all orientations agree on, however, is their long-standing obligation to enter national public spheres in defense of education and literacy focused on the literary *canon (newly expanded for many) for purposes of pleasure, enlightenment, and ethicopolitical uplift.

See CULTURAL STUDIES AND POETRY.

■ M. Arnold, Culture and Anarchy (1869); E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture (1871); F. R. Leavis, Mass Civilization and Minority Culture (1930); T. S. Eliot, Notes towards the Definition of Culture (1948); E. Wilson, The Triple Thinkers, rev. ed. (1948); A. L. Kroeber and C. Kluckholn, Culture (1952); R. Williams, Culture and Society: 1780–1950 (1958); T. W. Adorno, "Cultural Criticism and Society," Prisms, trans. S. Weber and S. Weber (1967); R. Williams, The Country and the City (1973); L. Johnson, The Cultural Critics (1979); R. Williams, "Culture," Keywords, 2d ed. (1983); Classics in Cultural Criticism I, ed. B.-P. Lange (1990); Classics in Cultural Criticism II, ed. H. Heuermann (1990); T. W. Adorno, "On Lyric Poetry and Society," Notes to Literature, ed. R. Tiedemann, trans. S. W. Nicholsen, v. 1 (1991); Contemporaries in Cultural Criticism III, ed. H. Heuermann and B.-P. Lange (1991); F. Mulhern, Culture/Metaculture (2000)—leading hist. of cultural crit. and cultural studies; Counterpoints: Twenty Five Years of "The New Criterion" on Culture and the Arts, ed. R. Kimball and H. Kramer (2007).

V. B. LEITCH

CULTURAL STUDIES AND POETRY. The discipline (or better, interdiscipline) known in the academy today as cultural studies emerged out of several foundational projects of the 1950s, notably Hoggart's The Uses of Literacy and Williams's Culture and Society, and no less out of a chain of intellectual antecedents such as the morally attuned Eng. literary critic F. R. Leavis, the It. political philosopher Antonio Gramsci, the Fr. Marxist philosopher Louis Althusser, and the Fr. sociologist Pierre Bourdieu, among many others. From this array of influences and models, cultural studies derives certain values that condition its approach to poetry and poetics. To begin with, it focuses on low, mass, and popular culture as opposed to works of high culture. Often emphasizing ideology critique over stylistic analysis or moral evaluation, it tends to study the social forces embedded in artifacts and institutions, sometimes with less concern for, say, artists' lives or aesthetic forms. Moreover, cultural studies often directs its analysis along axes of race, class, and/or gender in the service of multiculturalism. Practitioners of cultural studies renounce the role of the traditional intellectual as disinterested connoisseur and custodian of high culture in favor of the activism and commitment of the public intellectual and engaged field researcher. What usually preoccupies cultural studies is the hegemonic order variously characterized in recent times as postmod. consumer society, postindustrial free-market capitalism, and global empire. The discipline brings attention to resistances to the dominant order at all levels, with a special interest in social margins, micropolitical countercurrents, and creative reappropriations. When it turns to poetry, then, cultural studies often investigates figures, events, and phenomena apart from the main currents as well as socially critical forms and approaches (see MICROPOETRIES).

Gramsci's concept of hegemony has made a decisive contribution to contemp. cultural studies and thus to how cultural studies addresses poetry and poetics. Building on the prior Marxist view that culture is a politicized, subordinating force used by ruling elites to portray their ideas and values as universal, Gramsci distinguishes between coercive domination and negotiated leadership. The success of a controlling group's ideology—which is relative, temporary, and challengeable—depends not only or even primarily on repressive political control through legal, administrative, military, and educational apparatuses, but on freely given civil consensus molded through the family, church, workplace, union, private school, media, and arts—i.e., through civil society. The leadership of the dominant group needs continual renewal and maintenance in order for its values and interests to shape consciousness and to constitute common sense. In this context, revolution requires much more than seizing the economic means of production or securing the various arms of government; it entails changing the hearts and minds of contending groups and cementing them into a unity. In contrast to Arnold's landmark view of culture (see CULTURAL CRITICISM), Gramsci's account shows social harmony, perfection, and order to be strictly relative (if not fictitious); highlights group antagonism and social contradiction; represents civil society as part of the state; stresses everyday activities and negotiations; and presents the state not as a stable embodiment of higher reason but as an agency of dominant-group leadership constantly bargaining with other groups. Where Arnold portrays intellectuals as an elite clerisy above class spirit and direct political action, Gramsci depicts them as a large and active, heterogeneous ensemble of teachers, journalists, clergy, doctors, lawyers, military officers, technicians, managers, policy makers, and writers, who engage in a vast number of organizational functions linking strata of culture into a consensual, historical bloc. So, while poets may solidify, question, or attack the hegemonic order, they cannot elude it.

Among the most cited pioneering works of U.S. cultural studies is Said's critical hist., Orientalism. This work fuses, in a now typical blend, critical protocols developed by the social theory of Gramsci, the cultural theories of Arnold and Williams, and the Fr. philosopher Michel Foucault's historiography of discourse. From his postcolonial perspective, the Palestinian-Am. Said construes the long hist. of Franco-Brit.-Am. writing on the Near Eastern Orient as a massive and systematic, disciplinary discourse depicting, structuring, and ruling over the Orient in a consistently racist, sexist, and imperialist manner. Texts scrutinized by Said, a professor of lit., range from scholarly books, political tracts, and journalistic reports to travel narratives, religious and philological studies, and literary works, poetry included. In passing, he cites more than three dozen Eur. poets ranging from Homer and Aeschylus to W. B. Yeats and Paul Valéry, most of whom come in for crit. Among institutions supporting Orientalism are presses, foundations, businesses (esp. oil companies), missions, military and foreign services, intelligence communities, media, and universities. The hegemonic consensus about the East produced and continually reproduced by mod. Orientalism—the institutionalized Western ideological "science" of the Orient—bears little relation to actual human life. On this point Said observes, "Orientalism failed to identify with human experience, failed also to see it as human experience." Another key lesson he draws is that "study, understanding, knowledge, evaluation, masked as blandishments to 'harmony,' are instruments of conquest." Like many scholars of cultural studies, Said, following Foucault, regards knowledge as joined indissolubly to interest and power, all enabled and constrained by interlocking institutions. This view contradicts Arnold's celebrated ideas concerning the attainability of pure knowledge, disinterested thought, harmonious perfection, and the benign rational state. Said ties the knowledge–interest–power nexus to aggressive nation states (where mod. colonial conquest originates), showing the limitations of Arnold's optimistic view of the state. Nevertheless, the Arnoldian legacy of cultural crit. survives in Said's traditional humanistic commitments to see things as they are, to respect actual human experience, to advocate social and moral right, to increase understanding and sympathy, and to struggle against religion, esp. in its most zealous forms.

Cultural studies in the Anglo-Am. academy, like other postmod. interdisciplines such as women's studies and ethnic studies, ranges widely across materials and fields. It concerns itself notably with contemp. popular culture and media, as well as with the institutions of civil and political society. While cultural studies-oriented literary critics typically examine fiction—e.g., working-class novels, romances targeted at women, and science fiction—they turn to poetry, by comparison, more rarely. This lack of attention is esp. true of the Brit. cultural studies pioneered during the 1970s and 80s at the famous University of Birmingham Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies (CCCS), founded by Hoggart. An interest in poetry, on the other hand, is found somewhat more often in U.S. cultural studies during the 1980s and thereafter.

A primary project of poetry scholars dedicated to cultural studies involves expanding the canon of poetic texts to include more low genres and marginal writers frequently selected from the ranks of ethnic, immigrant, and women poets. This work has led to new anthols., hists., and critical studies of poetry, as in Nelson's Repression and Recovery and his Anthology of Modern American Poetry. In most such work, the emphasis falls on the documentary, communal, and moral dynamics, as well as the creativity and originality of poets and poetries. This being the case, traditional belletrism is not so much jettisoned as it is repositioned amid social hists., countercultural energies, and ethicopolitical resistances.

In the hands of cultural studies, and particularly in the grip of affiliated contemporaneous postcolonial theory, the Eurocentric core of national lits. has more or less opened to regional, hemispheric, and global transnational formations such as Black Atlantic, Pacific Rim, and inter-Am. poetries. Nevertheless, the devel. of the field of cultural studies, like most academic fields, retains distinctive national frameworks. Specialists of anglophone cultural studies, for instance, distinguish sharply between Australian, Brit., Canadian, and U.S. cultural studies.

From the outset in the 1980s, U.S. cultural studies has criticized contemp. mainstream official verse culture while both defending vanguardist experimental poetry and consecrating minority and popular poetries. (Cultural studies regularly pluralizes formerly unified concepts such as lit. and poetry in line with the promotion of "difference" characteristic of postmod. theory.) For instance, contemp. official verse culture is sometimes represented by the "workshop poem" associated with university programs in creative writing. This so-called MFA poem consists of 20–40 prosaic free-verse lines cast in a confessional, sometimes ironic mode, which is appreciated by magazine editors and classroom teachers for its *concision, approachability, *sincerity, and epiphanic wisdom (see CONFESSIONAL POETRY). In addition to being criticized as a hegemonic genre, a formula, and a commodity, the workshop poem is judged severely by some cultural studies-oriented critics for furthering a notion of the self that is unreflectively suited to consumer society. It may be said to represent such values as possessive individualism, narcissism, and sentimental romantic solitude. Against the cult of the personal poetic voice, cultural studies in the U.S. has sometimes advocated *Language poetry, produced out of a movement of the 1970s and after opposed to the privatized expressive self and the well-made journalistic poetry of bourgeois confessionalism and subjective realism.

Among the opposing poetries of most interest to cultural studies are feminist, ethnic, and diasporic works, as well as experimental ones. But also of interest are popular poetries such as rap or *hip-hop, *poetry slam, spoken-word, and *blues. It is worth noting that these latter forms—oral, nonprint, improvisational, and *performance-based—appeal to nonacademic and antiestablishment audiences in large numbers. They employ conventional forms, notably stanzas, rhymes, and unmistakably rhythmic lines. The speakers of popular poetries often represent the direct vernacular voice of a community rather than the allusive learned script of the solitary elite artist. The venues for these works include bars, bookstores, and festivals rather than classrooms and libraries. Audiences consist of local scenes and subcultures aggregated in national and international networks.

Sometimes remarked by cultural studies, there are noteworthy instances of established poets in the U.S. today, both academic and independent, going beyond the university classroom and the auditorium. Forsaking the workshop poem and engaging with the public, this is unaffiliated grassroots cultural studies. To take the U.S. case again, there is the thriving Poetry in the Schools Program started in the 1970s; the hugely successful Favorite Poem Project initiated in 1997 by the academic and poet laureate Robert Pinsky; and the various high-profile public campaigns undertaken by the conservative poet-critic Dana Gioia since the early 1990s, but esp. during the early 21st c. in his role as chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts. In his provocative essays, in particular, Gioia champions the rise of popular poetry and the new bohemia surrounding it, noting its return to musicality and traditional forms and registering its move beyond obscure vanguardism and the enervated university with its solipsistic guild of Creative Writing.

Scholars of cultural studies have a major complaint against still-dominant accounts and views of poetry as self-expression. According to cultural studies, poetry is discourse. This key proposition underlines the fact that poetry is communal, dialogic, and intertextual. Further, it is embodied and agonistic. Cultural studies stands against the structuralist and poststructuralist idea of lang. as a play of floating signifiers only loosely linked to concepts and things. What is at issue here is the lyric "I" often portrayed as isolated, original, disembodied—a persistent romantic icon and mystification. To the contrary, cultural studies insists on the social foundations of discourse and subjectivity. Neither poetic lang. nor poets are beyond or outside the social order. Theodor W. Adorno, the Ger. cultural critic who is another formative influence on the interdiscipline, put it this way in "On Lyric Poetry and Society" (1957): "the lyric work is always the subjective expression of a social antagonism." As a consequence, the iconic poet of mod. avant-gardism, formerly seen as an isolated generic renegade, is recast as a social figure whose resistance to society is culturally symptomatic despite whatever singular features any one instance might exhibit.

During more recent decades under the sign of neoliberalism, the postmod. poet has been pictured as a member of the so-called creative class, a historically new social role fashioned esp. by chambers of commerce and city planners. Cultural studies registers this transformation with dismay but not surprise. Social architects today seek to redesign urban downtowns complete with lofts, art galleries, coffee shops, and bookstores fit for bourgeois bohemians (engineers, doctors, and professionals with money). Holders of fine-arts degrees and professors of creative writing belong to the creative class, academic poets included. (Between 2000 and 2009, U.S. colleges and universities awarded more than 40,000 university degrees in creative writing.) The main point here is not simply that the social roles of poets and poetry change through hist. but that today the poet belongs to and is often co-opted by higher education, entertainment, and business interests. This turn of events is unusual within the long historical sequence of poetry's patrons from city-states, churches, monarchies, and aristocracies to book-reading publics, universities, and media conglomerates (see PATRONAGE). Not surprisingly, there is among cultural-studies scholars some nostalgia for earlier times and much glumness about poetry's current incorporation. The poet as social outsider and independent critic survives as an ideal, as in Damon's The Dark End of the Street. In this context, popular and minority poetries serve compensatory roles: they keep alive for large audiences not only the socially critical and outsider missions of poetry but also its appeals to emotion, musicality, representation, and ethical judgment.

Cultural studies is often criticized for a set of perceived shortcomings that bear on its treatment of poetry. Despite the vitality of cultural studies as an approach to international lits. and societies (e.g., those of Latin America), the field is too often monolingual, overlooking the multilingual dimensions of national as well as transnational lits. And despite the visibility of scholarly networks of medievalists and early modernists who consider themselves practitioners of cultural studies, too much work in this interdiscipline is presentist, displaying little serious scholarly interest in premod. cultures. Above all, it is sometimes argued that the antielitism and expansion of literary canons characteristic of cultural studies avoid the question of quality. When all is said and done, what are the criteria for great works of lit.? The scholar of cultural studies is said to suffer bad conscience for being both the supposedly independent critic and the hired hand of culture, which is to say he or she is a certified component of the culture industries; such a critic and the field at large operate primarily and profitably inside university and publishing worlds. Each of these charges is partly true and yet easily refuted by reference to the versatility, range, and ambition of contemp. cultural studies. On balance, cultural studies has proven to be a dynamic force in expanding poetic canons and critical protocols, as well as accrediting a wide array of new audiences and poetries.

See CANON, CULTURAL CRITICISM.

■ M. Arnold, Culture and Anarchy (1869); R. Hoggart, The Uses of Literacy (1957); R. Williams, Culture and Society: 1780–1950 (1958); A. Gramsci, Selections from the Prison Notebooks, ed. and trans. Q. Hoare and G. N. Smith (1971); M. Foucault, Discipline and Punish, trans. A. Sheridan (1977); E. Said, Orientalism (1978); Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies, Culture, Media, Language (1980); S. Hall, "Cultural Studies: Two Paradigms," Culture, Ideology, and Social Process, ed. T. Bennett et al. (1981); R. Johnson, "What is Cultural Studies Anyway?" Social Text 16 (1986–87)—landmark conspectus on CCCS methodology; Marxism and the Interpretation of Culture, ed. C. Nelson and L. Grossberg (1988); W. Kalaidjian, Languages of Liberation: The Social Text in Contemporary American Poetry (1989); C. Nelson, Repression and Recovery: Modern American Poetry and the Politics of Cultural Memory, 1910–1945 (1989); D. Gioia, Can Poetry Matter? (1992); M. Damon, The Dark End of the Street: Margins in American Vanguard Poetry (1993); A. A. Berger, Cultural Criticism (1995); C. Beach, Poetic Culture (1999); Anthology of Modern American Poetry, ed. C. Nelson (2000); R. Wilson, Reimagining the American Pacific (2000); J. Harrington, Poetry and the Public (2002); G. Turner, British Cultural Studies, 3d ed. (2002); D. Gioia, Disappearing Ink: Poetry at the End of Print Culture (2004); A. Gilbert, Another Future: Poetry and Art in a Postmodern Twilight (2006); V. B. Leitch, "Late Contemporary U.S. Poetry," Living with Theory (2008); Poetry and Cultural Studies: A Reader, ed. M. Damon and I. Livingston (2009); J. Read, Modern Poetics and Hemispheric American Cultural Studies (2009); Favorite Poem Project, http://www.favoritepoem.org.

V. B. LEITCH

CURTAL SONNET. In the preface to his Poems, G. M. Hopkins coins the name "curtal-sonnet" for "Pied Beauty" and "Peace," poems "constructed in proportions resembling those of the sonnet proper, namely 6 + 4 instead of 8 + 6, with however a half-line tailpiece." Feeney calls Hopkins's concern with the mathematical proportions of these sonnets "playful," noting that the word curtal not only means curtailed, or shortened, but once referred to animals with their tails cut short. The curtal sonnet is, as Hirsch and Boland point out, "three-fourths of a Petrarchan sonnet shrunk proportionately" and may be contrasted with the expanded *caudate sonnet. Lawler takes issue with Fussell and others who criticized the curtal sonnet for failing to perform "the fundamental Petrarchan action . . . of complication and resolution." Lawler claims that the curtal sonnet allowed Hopkins to prize harmony and praise over the argument of the Petrarchan volta, moving richly by paradoxes "out of unity, through multiplicity, and then back to unity." Ever the innovator, Hopkins inspired contemp. versions of the curtal sonnet (Chad Davidson, Leon Stokesbury, Richard Foerster) and may have led the way for other "contracted" sonnet experiments—the "truly emaciated sonnet" (Anthony Hecht on Arthur Rimbaud's "Drunk Driver"), the short-line sonnets of Elizabeth Bishop, the "curtal double sonnets" of John Poch, the one-syllable-line sonnet of Brad Leithauser, and the "minimalist sonnet" and "extended minimalist sonnet" of Mona Van Duyn.

See CAUDA.

■ G. M. Hopkins, "Preface," Poems (1876–89); P. Fussell, Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (1979); J. Lawler, Hopkins Re-Constructed (1998); The Penguin Book of the Sonnet, ed. P. Levin (2001); J. Feeney, The Playfulness of Gerard Manley Hopkins (2008); The Making of a Sonnet, ed. E. Hirsch and E. Boland (2008); J. Poch, "Sonnets, Chad Davidson and Fly Fishing," 32Poems.com (2008).

L. R. SPAAR

CYBERTEXT. A term used by theorists to describe the functioning of dynamic texts in a variety of media. Merging the prefix cyber- from Wiener's cybernetics, or science of communication and control, with the term text* from poststructuralist literary theory, it identifies a distinctive structure for the production and consumption of verbal meaning.

The defining feature of a cybertext is not an aesthetic, a set of themes, a provenance, or a medium but a particular computational organization. Cybertexts operate through a series of feedback loops that link texts and their users in mutually constitutive exchanges of information. Like all circuits, cybertextual feedback loops consist of a relay of inputs and outputs in which a user's action—a throw of coins in the I Ching, a click on a hypertextual link, a swipe of the mouse in an electronic game—reconfigures available interpretive options by altering the material organization of the text.

Cybertexts can be constructed in print, on a computer, or by hand. In addition to printed books (Julio Cortázar's novel Rayuela [Hopscotch]), electronic hypertexts (Shelley Jackson's Patchwork Girl), and digital poems (John Cayley's riverIsland), the form could also be said to include ancient divination systems (I Ching), early computer programs (Joseph Weizenbaum's Eliza), text-based digital games (Myst), multiuser domains (MUDs), and real-time virtual worlds (Second Life).

The simplest example of a literary cybertext is the digital form known as hypertext, anticipated by the post–World War II computer engineers Vannevar Bush and Ted Nelson; elaborated in fiction composed between 1985 and 1995 by writers such as Jackson, Michael Joyce, and Stuart Moulthrop; and disseminated on diskettes by Eastgate Systems. In all genres, hypertext contains three distinct components: links, chunked texts or lexia, and multiple reading paths. By clicking on a succession of links, a user navigates through related sections of a text or between related parts of different texts in the same retrieval system. Each click materially alters the text by closing one set of options and opening another.

In introducing the term cybertext, Aarseth paired it with a second coinage to emphasize the "nontrivial" effort this form demands from its users. Like other hermeneutic structures (see HERMENEUTICS), cybertexts are interactive in the general sense that text and interpreter act on or influence each other; but the effort involved to navigate a cybertext, play a textual game, or interact in a MUD is, in Aarseth's terminology, ergodic. From the Gr. ergon + hodos, or "work" and "path," this term describes the combined actions of individuals and mechanisms that produce sequences of events in computational interactions.

The term emerged with the devel. of second-generation electronic lit. composed after 1995 for presentation on the World Wide Web. Whereas first-generation electronic lit., composed by writers who began to experiment with computers in the late 1950s, remained predominantly text-based, second-generation electronic lit. combines text with graphics, sound, animation, video, and other multimedia components. A more capacious term than hypertext, cybertext offers a critique of two opposed critical responses to early hypertext: a tendency, on the one hand, to apply poststructuralist literary terms to electronic texts without taking account of the shift in the material apparatus, and a tendency, on the other hand, to treat digital texts as radically different from their mechanical and print precursors. For Aarseth, Hayles, and other digital theorists, cybertexts are textual engines that operate outside conventional author-text-message paradigms and must be understood as computational engines.

As complex systems that evolve unpredictably from an initial set of simple elements, cybertexts of all sorts display emergent or nonlinear behavior that develops in tandem with a user's actions. As a textual category, this term opens the literary canon both to earlier avant-garde projects such as Robert Grenier's Sentences, a box containing 500 5-x-8 cards with typewritten phrases a user can lay out in multiple configurations, and to dynamic interactive compositions engineered for the wireless reading devices and mobile platforms of the future.

See COMPUTATIONAL POETRY, ELECTRONIC POETRY.

■ N. Wiener, Cybernetics: Or Control and Communication in the Animal and the Machine (1948); E. J. Aarseth, Cybertext: Perspectives on Ergodic Literature (1997); N. Montfort, "Cybertext Killed the Hypertext Star," electronic book review (2000), http://www.electronicbookreview.com/thread/electropoetics/cyberdebates; N. K. Hayles, Writing Machines (2002); C. T. Funkhouser, Prehistoric Digital Poetry (2007).

A. MORRIS

CYNGHANEDD. In *Welsh poetry, an elaborate system of sound correspondences involving accentuation, *alliteration, and internal rhyme occurring within a single line of verse. G. M. Hopkins described the various types of cynghanedd as "chimes" and admitted that they were a main influence on his own formal experiments. Cynghanedd was well developed in Welsh by the 14th c., although not finally codified until the Caerwys Eisteddfod of 1523. Cynghanedd was, and still is, a main feature of Welsh "strict-meter" poetry, but it has often been practiced, with varying degrees of strictness, in the free meters as well and in mod. times even in *vers libre. There are four basic types of cynghanedd (all examples below are taken from Dafydd ap Gwilym's 14th c. poems Y Seren [YS, The Star] and Yr Wylan [YW, The Seagull]):

(1) C. lusg (dragging cynghanedd) is the simplest kind of cynghanedd and only occurs in lines with a feminine ending. The sixth syllable of the line is stressed and rhymes with the final syllable of the first stressed word in the line: "mi a g*áf* | heb war*áf*un" (YS 15). In the cywydd* meter, c. lusg may only be used in the first line of a rhymed *couplet. C. lusg resembles the pattern of internal rhyme found in middle and early mod. *Breton poetry, a case of parallel devel. that is likely related to the penultimate word stress that predominates in Welsh and most dialects of Breton.

(2) In c. groes (cross cynghanedd), the line of verse is divided into two parts, and the consonants in the first part of the line are repeated in the same order in the second part, as in "*LLáTai DR*úd | i'w *LLéTy DR*áw" (YS 6). Except when the cynghanedd is "uneven" (see below), the consonants at the end of each half line (like the final d in drud) do not usually participate in the cynghanedd. In a more elaborate variant called c. groes o gyswllt (connected c. groes), however, one or more consonants at the end of the first half of the line also count as part of the second half line for purposes of repetition, as in "*N*a THaLiéSiN | ei *THLýS*ach" (YW 24), where the n of "Taliesin" answers the initial N of the line.

(3) C. draws (oblique cynghanedd) is similar to c. groes; but in this case, the line is divided into three parts, and the consonants of the first part are repeated in the third part of the line: "o*CH* w*ŷR* | [erioed ni] *CHaR*awdd" (YW 22). Here, the words erioed ni do not participate in the cynghanedd.

(4) C. sain (sound cynghanedd) combines the internal rhyme of c. lusg with the consonantal repetition of c. groes and c. draws. Here, the line is divided into three parts. The first two parts of the line rhyme, while one or more consonants from the second part are repeated in the same order in the third part: "ei charu'r wyf | gwbl Nwyf | *N*awdd" (YW 21).

In addition to this fourfold division, c. groes, c. draws, and c. sain may be further categorized according to whether the two sections with repeated consonants end with stressed vowels (c. gytbwys acennog, "even stressed cynghanedd"), unstressed vowels (c. gytbwys ddiacen, "even unstressed cynghanedd"), or one of each (normally c. anghytbwys ddisgynedig, "uneven descending cynghanedd," where the first half line ends with a stressed vowel and the second half line with an unstressed vowel; the opposite pattern is called c. anghytbwys ddyrchafedig, "uneven rising cynghanedd," but is rare except in c. sain).

The rules of cynghanedd stated above are only a broad outline, and there are many exceptions and special cases, some of which relate to the phonology of the Welsh lang. Much of the skill and delight of cynghanedd poetry lies in the variation of types in successive lines and in the contrasting of vowel sounds alongside the repetition of consonants. It is an art form capable of a very rich, subtle, melodious, and highly wrought effect that has been extensively exploited by Welsh poets.

See CELTIC PROSODY.

■ Morris-Jones; Parry, History, chap. 5 (app.); G. Williams, Introduction to Welsh Poetry (1953), app. A; E. I. Rowlands, "Introduction" to Poems of the Cywyddwyr (1976); A. Lloyd and D. Evans in Poetry Wales 14 (1978); R. Bromwich, Aspects of the Poetry of Dafydd ap Gwilym (1986); Welsh Verse, ed. T. Conran, 2nd ed. (1986)—long intro. and appendix on meter; E. Rowlands, "Cynghanedd, Metre, Prosody," in Jarman and Hughes, vol. 2, rev. D. Johnston (1997); The New Companion to the Literature of Wales, ed. M. Stephens (1998); Myrddin ap Dafydd, Clywed Cynghanedd (2003); A. Llwyd, Anghenion y Gynghanedd (2007).

D. M. Lloyd; T.V.F. Brogan; B. Bruch

CYWYDD (pl. cywyddau). Along with awdl and englyn*, one of the three classes of the 24 strict meters in *Welsh poetry. There are four varieties of cywydd, but normally the term is used to refer only to the c. deuair hirion popularized by Dafydd ap Gwilym in the 14th c. This form of cywydd comprises a variable number of heptasyllabic lines grouped in rhyming *couplets. One line of each couplet ends with a stressed syllable and the other with an unstressed syllable, producing asymmetric rhyme pairs of the form dáncing : king, similar to the rinn agus airdrinn of the Ir. deibhidhe meter. The earliest known examples of the cywydd are without cynghanedd*. Dafydd, however, embellished most of his lines with cynghanedd, and in the 15th c., it became obligatory to include cynghanedd in every line. Another common ornament in cywyddau is cymeriad, whereby two or more adjacent lines are linked by the repetition of a letter, sequence of consonants, word, or phrase at the beginning of each line. The 14th to the early 16th cs. are known as the Cywydd Period in Welsh poetry because cywydd became the staple Welsh meter during this time. It was revived in the 18th c. by Goronwy Owen and Ieuan Fardd and is still popular today.

See CELTIC PROSODY.

■ Morris-Jones; T. Parry in Transactions of the Honourable Society of Cymmrodorion (1939), 203–31; and Parry, chap. 6; E. Rowlands in Ysgrifau Beirniadol 2 (1966); R. Bromwich, Aspects of the Poetry of Dafydd ap Gwilym (1986); Welsh Verse, ed. T. Conran, 2d. ed. (1986)—long intro. and appendix on meters; Jarman and Hughes, vol. 2, rev. D. Johnston (1997); The New Companion to the Literature of Wales, ed. M. Stephens (1998).

D. M. Lloyd; T.V.F. Brogan; B. Bruch

CZECH POETRY. The first poems to appear in the Czech lands were hymns in Old Church Slavonic that date to the 9th c. The Lat. Legenda Christiani (Legend of a Christian), about the lives of St. Ludmila and her grandson Václav (Wenceslaus), is one of the first great poetic compositions to emerge. By the 11th c., religious poetry in Lat. had taken root, while poetry in the vernacular remained scarce.

Widely acknowledged as the first work in the vernacular, the hymn "Hospodine pomiluj ny" (Lord, Have Mercy on Us), ca. 10 or 11th c., echoes the Kyrie Eleison and impresses with its lyricism and melodic sophistication. The Czech hymn "Svatý Václave, vévodo České země" (Saint Wenceslas, Duke of the Bohemian Land), ca. 12th c., is also noteworthy. These hymns derive from 14th-c. mss. The 13th-c. prayer codex of Kunhuta, abbess of the St. George convent in Prague, contains the powerful poem known as the Ostrov Hymn, "Slovo do světa stvořenie" (The Word before the World's Creation) and the hymn "Vítaj kráľu všemohúcí" (Welcome King Omnipotent).

In the early 13th c., the Přemyslid rulers extended their domain and encountered Germanic cultural and poetic trads. The contact resulted in the courtly poetry of the Minnesang*, which dominated Czech poetry in the late 13th c. Among long poems outstanding is the powerful Alexandreis or the Alexandriad (anonymous), composed ca. 1300 and based loosely on Gualtier de Châtillon's Lat. Alexandriad, though it is highly original in its treatment of the exploits and character of the warrior. Another anonymous long poem, Dalimilova kronika (the Dalimil Chronicle, early 14th c.) is marked by its strongly nationalistic bent. The early 14th c. sees Czech verse legends of early Christian figures such as Judas and Pontius Pilate. These were later followed by the brilliant verse legends of St. Procopius and of St. Catherine. The Legend of St. Catherine is outstanding for its use of the erotic lang. of *courtly love poetry and its vivid portrayal of Catherine's passion during her martyrdom.

By the 14th and 15th cs.—the heyday of Czech poetry—the courtly love poetry of the Western Eur. trad. exerts a strong influence. The name of Master Zavíš stands out for the high love lyric, filled with the feudal ethos and the sense of impossible love. The almost 9,000-verse Czech version of the story of Tristan and Isolde (Tristan a Izolde), ca. 14th c., is based on the Ger. recension. Satirical poems about university life also emerge, such as "Svár vody s vínem" (The Dispute of Water and Wine), the exceptional "Podkoní a žák" (The Groom and the Scholar), and Czech-Lat. *macaronic verses. Satires not in the "university vein" included the ca. mid-14th c. works "Satiry o řemeslnících a konšelích" (Satires on Tradesmen and Aldermen) and "Desatero kázanie božie" (The Ten Divine Commandments).

The 15th-c. Hussite revolution marked a drastic change in forms and styles. The years of Hussitism saw the rise of poems of moral edification and poetic pamphleteering. Allegorical verse was also popular, the best example being the Hussite dialogue "Hádání Prahy s Kutnou Horou" (Quarrel of Prague with Kutná Hora). Here Kutná Hora is a hag defending Catholicism, while Prague, a beautiful woman, represents the Hussite cause. The Catholics countered with the infamous "Píseň o Viklefici" (Song of the Wycliffite Woman). For the first time, Czech religious songs replaced the Lat. liturgy.

With the election of the Hussite king Jiří z Poděbrad (1420–71), humanism, influenced by It. culture, emerged as a potent force. Under the influence of Giovanni Boccaccio and others, Jiří's son Hynek z Poděbrad (ca. 1450–92) wrote erotic poems incl. "Májový sen" (May Dream, ca. 1490). Outstanding examples of Lat. verse by Czech Catholics include the Ad sanctum Venceslaum satira (Complaint to St. Wenceslaus, 1489) by the nobleman Bohuslav Hasištejnský z Lobkovic (ca. 1461–1510), the epicurean verses of Šimon Fagellus Villaticus (pseud. of Šimon Bouček, ca. 1473–1549), and the works of Jan Hodějovský z Hodějova (d. 1566). The most important piece to emerge from this circle is the inspired Lat. version of the Song of Songs, composed by David Crinitus z Hlaváčova (1531–86).

The defeat of the Czech Protestants after the Battle of White Mountain (1620, the culmination of the Thirty Years' War) had a decisive and detrimental effect on a literary level. The Catholic victory meant that Lat. verse returned to the fore; education and administration were conducted in Lat. The Czech literary lang. survived among determined émigrés fleeing Catholic Hapsburg rule. Most famously Jan Amos Komenský (or Comenius, 1592–1670) staunchly tried to keep literary Czech intact. From his exile in Amsterdam, Komenský had an agenda for Czech poetry: it should be unrhymed and based on quantitative—i.e., cl.—metrics. His Czech versions of the Psalms and the Song of Songs demonstrate this system's strengths. In Czech lands, Catholic poetry in Lat. enjoyed a phenomenal resurgence, esp. through the work of Bohuslav Balbín (1621–88).

Religious poetry was key during the *baroque period. Brilliant poetry was written by Catholic poets such as Adam Michna z Otradovic (1600–76), composer of several collections of religious songs, and Bedřich Bridel (also known as Fridrich Bridelius, 1619–80), a Jesuit missionary and highly philosophical poet, author of the famed "Co Bůh? Člověk" (What is God? Man? 1658). Of note too is the Jesuit poet Felix Kadlinský (1613–75), who wrote a version of Friedrich von Spee's "Trutz-Nachtigal oder geistliches poetisch Lustwäldlein" (1649) on the love of Christ and of nature: courtly love poetry is reconceived as the soul longs for Christ as her groom. Catholic hymnbooks were compiled to offset the Protestant hymnbooks that had previously dominated: Václav Holan Rovenský's (1644–1718) Capella regia musicalia (1693) is a fine example. Secular poetry of the baroque is usually considered weak, though the work of Václav Jan Rosa (ca. 1620–89) gives examples of well-formed love lyrics. Outstanding among the period's satirical poems is Václav František Kocmánek's (1607–79) "Lamentatio Rusticana" (Lament of the Countrymen, 1644).

By the mid-18th c., religious prose had risen to dominance, though Catholic spiritual verse proved to be a stable force in lyrical poetry. Other verses on topics from sheep farming to gingerbread making also emerged during this time, along with folk songs and popular melodies. These last would exert a great influence over Czech poets of the "Revival" period.

The Národní obrození or Czech National Revival dates to the 1770s and 1780s. At the end of the 18th c., the Czech lands underwent dramatic changes, incl. the introduction of a new religious tolerance and the end of the feudal system under Hapsburg ruler Josef II. The ed. of the verse anthol. Básně v řeči vázané (Poems in Metrical Verse, 1785, some of which he composed himself), Václav Thám (1765–1816) is widely considered the father of mod. Czech poetry. The collection included imitations of *anacreontic verse alongside adaptations of Czech baroque poetry. The *ode and the *mock heroic/epic came to prominence, along with a shift, under the influence of Josef Dobrovský (1753–1829), to accentual meters. Antonín Jaroslav Puchmayer (1769–1820) also set out to develop a specifically Czech poetic style at this crucial juncture. Among his anthols. are the five-volume Sebrání básní a zpěvů (Collection of Poems and Songs, 1795), and Nové básně (New Poems, 1798). His own work includes animal fables (another newly popular genre), "Óda na Jana Žižku z Trocnova (Ode to Jan Žižka, 1802), and "Na jazyk český" (Ode to the Czech Language, 1816). Another giant of the revival, Josef Jungmann (1773–1847) did not write much verse but contributed innovations in *sonnet form and a narrative poem. In 1818, Pavel Josef Šafařík (1795–1861) and František Palacký (1798–1876) wrote the groundbreaking Počátkové českého básnictví obzvláště prozódie (Elements of Czech Versification, especially Prosody), which once again promoted cl. (quantitative) meters over accentual ones.

The Slovak poet Jan Kollár (1793–1852), who wrote in Czech, composed the best of the early romantic works, "Slávy dcera" (Daughter of Slavia) in 1824; in this *sonnet sequence, the love of the poetic "I" for a maiden becomes an *allegory for his bond with his native land. Another romantic poet followed James Macpherson's lead in creating an ancient pedigree for his native trad. Václav Hanka (1791–1861) forged two mss. written in quasi-med. Czech: the Rukopis královédvorský (Dvůr Králové Ms., 1817) and the Rukopis zelenohorský (Zelená Hora Ms., 1817), great poetic works in their own right.

The greatest of the Czech romantics, Karel Hynek Mácha (1810–36), gained notoriety for the scandalous publication of his seminal work Máj (May, 1836). Mácha revolutionized *prosody in Czech with this narrative poem by using iambs, a form to which Czech is particularly unsuited. The poem describes the love of a bandit, Vilém, for Jarmila, a young woman who has been seduced by his father. Karel Havlíček Borovský (1821–56) is remembered for his acerbic wit and the satirical poem "Křest sv. Vladimíra" (The Christening of St. Vladimir, 1876), which bucks all regnant institutions and ideologies.

A new generation of Czech writers came to prominence in 1848. Deeply influenced by Mácha, they gathered around the jour. they named Máj in his honor. These poets included Jan Neruda (1834–91), the leading member of this group (whose name was later taken as a pseud. by Pablo Neruda); Vítězslav Hálek (1835–74); and Karolina Světlá (1830–99). Another important poet, Karel Jaromír Erben (1811–70), reached his apogee in the balladic collection Kytice z pověstí národních (Bouquet of National Legends, 1853).

In the late 19th c., writers split into two factions. The poets who congregated around the jour. Lumír, such as Jaroslav Vrchlický (1853–1912), espoused cosmopolitanism in Czech letters, while those who wrote for the jour. Ruch were known as the national poets; the dominant figure was Svatopulk Čech (1846–1908). These writers were intent on preserving specifically Czech, or Slavophile, trads.

By the end of the century, the work of poets Otokar Březina and Petr Bezruč marked a turn to *symbolism. Březina's (1868–1929) use of free rhythms influenced poetry in the 20th c. and beyond. The Silesian poet Bezruč (1867–1958) created a mod. prophetic *persona in his Slezské písně (Silesian Songs, 1909) and fashioned poems about the oppression of Czechs under Ger., Polish, and native aristocratic powers. *Realism was represented by the poet Josef Svatopluk Machar (1864–1942), who exposed social injustice in his poetry, e.g., the oppression of women in "Zde by měly kvést růže" (Here Should Roses Bloom, 1894). Decadent poets, allied with the jour. Moderní revue, included Karel Hlaváček (1874–98), whose poetry follows the typical decadent aesthetics of eroticism and decay; and Jiří Karásek ze Lvovic (1871–1951), whose collections Sexus necans (1897) and Sodoma (1895) abound in allusions to sadomasochism and necrophilia.

The installation of the First Republic (1918) marked a revolution in Czech lit. *Cubism, *futurism, and civilism emerged as prominent movements in poetry and the arts. Leftism dominated the new schools, and Czech poetry generally found a key influence in Karel Čapek's (1890–1938) groundbreaking trans. of mod. Fr. verse, The poetist movement, influenced by *Dadaism and futurism, called for a poetry that would merge all arts and mod. life together in a playful, populist manner. Poetism had its great theorist in the multitalented Karel Teige (1900–51) and was cultivated by poets such as Vítězslav Nezval (1900–58), Jaroslav Seifert (1901–86), and Konstantin Biebl (1898–1951).

Nezval later passed through a surrealist phase only to turn subsequently to a more socialist realist poetry. Seifert left the Communist Party in the 1930s and abandoned his experimental poetry in favor of a lyrical intimacy. He survived most of his poetist brethren and won the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1984. The poets František Halas (1901–49) and Vladimír Holan (1905–80) also emerge in the interwar period. Halas's highly religious poetry explores mysticism and notions of time. Holan is best known for his postwar works; during communist rule, he went into self-imposed home exile.

The postwar communist regime imposed severe restrictions on writers; socialist realism became the official literary doctrine. Only long after Stalin's death in 1953 did the censorship relax; esp. after 1964, writers were granted greater freedom of expression. The jour. Květen (May) published the sui generis poetry of the poet and immunologist Miroslav Holub (1923–98), among others, and long-banned poets began to publish once more. The late 1960s also witnessed a return to extraordinary poetic forms: experimental and surrealist modes were embraced by Emanuel Frynta (1923–75), Josef Hiršal (1920–2003), Ladislav Novák (1925–99), and Vratislav Effenberger (1923–86).

After the Warsaw Pact invasion of 1968, many writers emigrated, while others wrote for the samizdat (self-publication) press, "for the drawer," or had their mss. published abroad. By the 1980s, a new generation of poets began to rebel against the so-called normalization. Their work is aggressive and at times purposefully controversial. In samizdat and even in official publishing houses, younger poets like Jáchym Topol (b. 1962), whose collection Miluju tě k zbláznění (I Love You to Insanity, 1991) caused an uproar with its intentional vulgarity; Sylva Fischerová (b. 1963); and Zuzana Brabcová (b. 1959) dominated the "subversive" scene.

The fall of Communism in 1989 marked a radical change in Czech lit. Works by many illegal, oppressed, and exiled authors working under the communist regime were published for the first time, and the authors themselves were rehabilitated. The most celebrated poets of recent years include Petr Kabeš (1941–2005), whose poetry draws on skaz, direct speech, and colloquialisms; and Petr Borkovec (b. 1970), who combines prosodic virtuosity with precise observations documenting this most recent period of upheaval in Czech culture. He enjoys popularity with readers and critics alike and has earned an international reputation.

■ J. Goll, Anthologie české lyriky (1872); České květy: výbor naší lyriky, ed. K. Adamec et al. (1890); Česká poesie XIX věku (1897–99); Bělohorské motivy: jubilejní anthologie z české poesie, ed. J. V. Frič and J. Werstadt (1920); Modern Czech Poetry, ed. and trans. P. Selver (1920); An Anthology of Czechoslovak Poetry, ed. C. A. Manning, A. V. Čapek, A. B. Koukol (1929); Anthologie de la poésie tchèque, ed. H Jelínek (1930); Lyrika českého obrození (1750–1850), ed. V. Jirát (1940); J.Vilikovský, Staročeská lyrika (1940); The Soul of a Century: A Collection of Czech Poetry in English, ed. R. A. Ginsburg (1942); Počátky novočeského básnictví: Počátky novočeského básnictví, ed. K. Polák (1946); J. Mukařovský, Kapitoly z české poetiky (1948); B. Václavek, Od umení k tvorbe: studie z prítomné ceské poesie (1949); Nová česká poesie: výbor z veršů XX. století, ed. F. Buriánek et al. (1955); J. Jíša, Česká poesie dvacátých let a básníci sovětského Ruska (1956); A Book of Czech Verse, ed. A. French (1958); A Handful of Linden Leaves: An Anthology of Czech Poetry, ed. J. Janu (1960); A. M. Píša, Stopami poezie: studie a podobizny (1962); Versované skladby doby husitské, ed. F. Svejkovský (1963); F. X. Šalda, O poezii Uspoř, ed. M. Petříček and B. Svozil (1970); Three Czech Poets: Vítězslav Nezval, Antonín Bartusek, Josef Hanzlík, trans. E. Osers and G. Theiner (1971); Anthology of Czech Poetry, ed. A. French (1973); The Pipe: Recent Czech Concrete Poetry, ed. and trans. J. Valoch and bpNichol (1973); Česká poezie 17. a 18. století, ed. Z. Tichá (1974); Pohledy: poezie, ed. J. Balík et al. (1974); Tisíc let české poezie, ed. J. Hrabák (1974); V. Kolář, Mladé zápasy: studie o mladé poezii (1981); Vzkazy: výbor ze současné české poezie, ed. J. Badoučková (1976); R. Jakobson, Poetry of Grammar and Grammar of Poetry, ed. S. Rudy (1981); A.M.K. Píša, Vývoji české lyriky: studie a recenze (1982); Zbav mě mé tesknosti, ed. M. Kopecký, Lat. trans. R. Mertlík (1983); M. Kubínová, Proměny ceské poezie dvacátých let (1984); Rytířské srdce majíce: česká rytířská epika 14. století, ed. E. Petrů et al. (1984); Z. Pešat, Dialogy s poezií (1985); The Poet's Lamp: A Czech Anthology, ed. and trans. A. French (1986); The New Czech Poetry, ed. J Cejka et al. (1988); Z. Hrubý, Na strepech volnosti: almanach české poezie (1989); M. Červenka, Slovník básnických knih: díla české poezie od obrození do roku 1945 (1990); Na strepech volnosti: almanach umlčene české poezie, ed. J. Horec (1991); M. Červenka, Styl a význam: studie o básnících (1991); Vrh kostek: česká experimentální poezie, ed. J. Hirsal, B. Grögerová, Z. Barborka (1993); J. Trávníček, Poezie poslední možnosti (1996); Prague 1900: Poetry and Ecstasy, ed. E. Becker et al. (1999); Six Czech Poets, ed. and trans. A. Büchler (2007); Up the Devil's Back: A Bilingual Anthology of 20th-Century Czech Poetry, ed. B. Volková and C. Cloutier (2008).

M. Sternstein

D

DACTYL (Gr., "finger"). In *classical prosody, a metrical foot consisting of one long syllable followed by two short ones. In the mod. prosodies based on *accent, an accented syllable followed by two unaccented ones (e.g., suddenly, ominous). Dactyl is the metrical basis of much of cl. Gr. and Lat. poetry: in narrative verse, it is used particularly for the *hexameter and *elegiac distich, and in lyric, it is used alone and with other cola, esp. the epitrite, in various combinations known collectively as dactylo-epitrite. These latter did not survive the cl. age, though the dactylic hexameter remained the meter for much Lat. art verse through most of the Middle Ages. In the transition from Lat. to the vernaculars, however, it lost place to iambic—which even in antiquity had been the meter felt to be closest to common (Gr.) speech and had been used for recitation meters such as dialogue in drama—as the staple meter of art verse and *epic. Dactylic verse was, however, revived in Ger. by August Buchner in his opera Orpheus (1638), arousing a brief vogue, evidenced in Simon Dach and Friedrich von Logau.

The dactyl is usually mentioned in handbooks of Eng. metrics along with the *anapest and perhaps the *amphibrach as the three mod. ternary meters (see BINARY AND TERNARY), but in running series, these are almost impossible to differentiate, esp. if the line ends are ambiguous. If dactylic meter was suited to Gr., it was less suited to Lat., with its stress accent, and even less suited to the mod. langs. Hence, the status of this metrical foot in mod. times is completely the reverse of its cl. prestige: it is now used mostly for *light verse and humorous subgenres, such as the recent *"double dactyls."

■ A. Köster, "Deutsche Daktylen," Zeitschrift für Deutsches Altertum und Deutsche Literatur 46 (1901); Wilamowitz, pt. 2, ch. 10; Koster, ch. 4; Dale, ch. 3; Halporn et al.; Snell; West; C. Golston and T. Riad, "The Phonology of Classical Greek Meter," Linguistics 38 (2000).

T.V.F. BROGAN

DACTYLO-EPITRITE. The name given by the 19th-c. metrists A. Rossbach and J. C. Westphal to a compound rhythm extensively attested in ancient Gr. lyric poetry, esp. Pindar. Its basic components were felt to be – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – – or – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – (full or catalectic dactylic tripodies) and – ⏑ – – and – – ⏑ – (respectively, second and third *epitrite). It is now standard practice to describe the rhythm, more precisely and economically, with a modified version of the symbols introduced by Paul Maas: D (– ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ –), e (– ⏑ –) and – (a single syllable that may be either long or short but is usually long in the Pindaric examples of the meter—hence, the original use of the term epitrite as a label for sequences better described as *iambic and *trochaic metra with long *anceps). The employing of successive or alternating instances of D and e, usually though not always separated by an anceps, yield forms such as the following:

– e – D	iambelegus
D – e – (e)	elegiambus
D – D	choerilean
D – e – D	platonicum
– e – D – e –	pindaricum

D is occasionally extended into – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – or – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – and e x occasionally replaced, through a kind of *anaclasis, with – ⏑ ⏑ –.

Maas's notation brings out clearly the interrelations of the various combinations of D, e, and – —different lengths cut, as it were from the same rhythmical cloth, which begin or end immediately before or after e, D, or –. The sequences attested in Gr. lyric of the 7th and 6th cs. BCE appear alongside much longer ones in later periods, but the character of the earliest attested example, two elegiambi by Alcaeus in which D and – e – are separated by word end, suggest that the rhythm began as a brief, *asynartete combination of the first two and a half feet of a dactylic *hexameter with the corresponding portion of an iambic *trimeter. Subsequent devels. would, on this theory, have allowed expansion of dactylic D into D – D, etc., on the model of iambic or trochaic – e – e and e – e –, as well as the elimination of obligatory word end between line segments containing D and those containing e.

The rhythm is, by lyric standards, a highly regular one; and it was associated, perhaps for that reason, with *encomium, *epitaph, and the poetry of moral reflection. In the Hellenistic period, it seems to have become a preferred metrical vehicle for "educated bourgeois lyric" (West)—most notably in Aristotle's frigidly correct "Hymn to Virtue."

See ENHOPLIAN.

■ Maas, sec. 55; A. M. Dale, Metrical Analyses of Tragic Choruses I. Dactylo-Epitrite (1971); metrical appendices to the Snell and Snell-Maehler eds. of Pindar (8th ed., 1987–89) and Bacchylides (10th ed., 1970); West, Sec. IIe, III8, and IVa.

A. T. COLE

DADA. Dada emerged in Zurich in the midst of World War I from the collaboration of a group of refugee artists united by their intense disdain for the Eur. culture that had brought about the war. Centered at the Cabaret Voltaire from 1916 through 1918, the original Dada artists and writers—Hugo Ball, Tristan Tzara, Richard Huelsenbeck, Marcel Janco, and Hans (Jean) Arp—articulated the most extreme forms of modernist cultural rebellion of the early 20th c. (see MODERNISM). The nature of their assault on political, artistic, and ling. discourse distinguished them from their contemporaries and has posed a constant challenge to generations of artists to confront the essential instability and inauthenticity of all meaning systems. Few artists have been able to meet that challenge, incl. the Dadaists themselves. Thus, while Dada spread widely in the postwar period to other artistic centers (e.g., Berlin, Paris, New York, and cities throughout Europe), it soon proved unsustainable and was succeeded by forms of artistic and political action more aesthetically programmatic and culturally progressive. While these subsequent movements are now solely of historical interest, however, the Dada challenge has continued to spur writers and artists, esp. in the postmod. era.

Like many modernist movements of the late 19th and early 20th cs., Dada questioned bourgeois society and its prevailing aesthetic conventions and sought to establish the bases and practices of a new art appropriate to its time. Dadaist rebellion, however, laid bare the underlying dynamics of modernist and avant-garde innovation: the primacy of negation within all new creation. Janco identified this dynamic as two "speeds" of creativity. The first, the "negative speed," was a "purifying and scandalous force to consume the past and open up a new creative route." That route comprised the second, "positive speed," which Janco saw manifest in "pure, childlike, direct [and] primal" actions. Although he argued that these "speeds" were distinct, in actual Dadaist texts and performances, they seemed simultaneous, at times indistinguishable. The childlike, primal actions could be seen as destructive of existing order as much as constitutive of the new. Caws aptly described Dada "as the place where the 'yes' and the 'no' meet." Because Dada expressed so adamantly the absoluteness of that "no," every "yes" Dadaists asserted was haunted by the potency of negation. "Let each man proclaim: there is a great negative work of destruction to be accomplished," Tzara wrote; and Georg Grosz, looking back at Berlin Dada, admitted that the artists and their art could not escape that destruction: "ours was completely nihilistic. We spat on everything, including ourselves."

Most significantly, Dada poets spat on the tools of their creative work: their words, and more broadly, on lang. itself. To the Dadaists, lang., as an essential organ of the cultural order, had been debased, indeed defiled by the bourgeois world. Its complicity in constraining how human beings saw, understood, and judged their lives had to be revealed and reviled. Consequently, all Dadaist writing entailed a radical critique of the nature, power, and authority of lang. The "negative speed" of Dadaist poetic production was manifest in the movement's efforts to subvert all lang. systems through transgression of the most basic components of meaning: its sonic, semiotic, and semantic operations. Dadaist works and performances disrupted grammar and syntax, manipulated semantic associations of words and phonemes, and dissected lang. into its elements, such as syllables, letters, and brute sounds.

The Dadaist disruption of lang. should be seen in relation to the wider modernist investigation of lings. and aesthetics, such as that evident in It. and Rus. *futurism. For instance, F. T. Marinetti's immaginazione senza fila e le parole in libertà (wireless imagination and words in freedom) texts also disrupted syntax, largely by reducing poetic lines to strings of conjoined nouns and verb infinitives. Such experiments were not intended, however, to challenge the foundations of basic discourse but rather to make it more efficient and powerful by quickening and intensifying direct, intuitive communication between poet and audience. Alternatively, Rus. futurists, such as Aleksei Kruchenykh and Velimir Khlebnikov, deconstructed poetic lang. to focus on its semantic and phonetic components in the hope of "scientifically" establishing new ling. combinations leading to a new literary lang.

The Dadaists' disruptions of conventional ling. behavior signaled a far more aggressive, even nihilistic assault on the role of lang. than either group of futurists envisioned. Dada poetry and esp. its public performances, whether at the Cabaret Voltaire or in postwar political demonstrations in Berlin and literary events in Paris, mocked society, lang., and the aesthetic realm. Dadaists demonstrated an intense delight in smashing idols, and they reveled in the liberating and purifying spirit of their nonsensical creations. Rebellion was at once angry, sardonic, naughty, and playful. Dismantling of lang. proved both a demystifying and purifying activity through which the "second speed" of Dada might announce new forms of expression and new contents.

The poet's incantation of raw sounds or chance play with semantically rich if surprising images resulted for many in a sense of being attendant at the recovery of a primal state of creativity. Negation unleashed creation. Although it is often difficult to distinguish the two in any particular Dadaist work, within the *cacophony produced by simultaneous readings of poetic declamations in three langs.; the incantation of onomatopoeic constructed "words"; the conjoining of widely disparate words through *aleatory methods to create nonsensical, paradoxical, or at best semantically ambiguous images; and the fragmentation of words into deracinated syllables or manipulated alphabetic images, the Dada poets simultaneously destroyed literary values, reduced meaning to levels of blatant absurdity, and also uncovered an immediately experienced realm of imaginative freedom. While chanting his "sound poems," such as "gadji beri bimba" and "elefantenkarawane," Ball believed himself to be entering a primitive, subconscious state that connected him both to a child's trembling encounter with sacred and mystical being and to the sources of a new spiritual awakening.

Like many modernist writers and artists, Dadaists were fascinated by the idea of the primitive and the instinctual presumed to have been repressed by the strictures of civilization but potentially accessible within everyone who could break down the internalized operations of the social order. And like the expressionists and later the surrealists (see EXPRESSIONISM, SURREALISM), in their idealization of the unsocialized drawings of children, the schizophrenic's supposedly direct access to unconscious processes, and the seemingly irrational rituals of non-Western "primitives," Dadaists shared both a nostalgia for a lost state of primal connection with self and the world and a romantic hope that it could be recovered through the revitalized powers of a purified imagination.

Even as their inherently nihilist transgressions threatened to undermine any work they composed, Dada poets and artists created artworks in an effort to transform the human order. Thus, as much as the intensity of Dadaist negativity encompassed not only bourgeois academic conventions but modernist innovations as well, Dadaists never completely denied an inherently modernist utopian faith that a new lang., hence a new imaginative vision, and ultimately a new way of being in the world could result from their art.

To sustain that hope, that "positive speed," every Dada poet and artist eventually moved away from the radical "no" within the Dadaist moment toward a more sustainable and collective "yes." Some, like Janco and Arp, imagined an art more attuned to the spiritual longing of mod. life while others, like Marcel Duchamp, consigned themselves to ironic games of aesthetic self-reflection, and others allied themselves with more programmatic avant-garde art movements, such as surrealism (Tzara), or threw themselves into political activism (Huelsenbeck, Raoul Hausmann). Some simply left art altogether and pursued another vocation (Janco). In the process, Dada died as a literary and artistic movement.

Nonetheless, the Dadaist challenge to the authority of all forms of discourse has remained and has been recalled whenever the bases of cultural and artistic meaning are questioned. Dada's critique of the cultural and ling. order has found resonance in poststructuralist thought and in the neo-avant-garde of the postmod. era. Dada poetry's strategies of ling. dismantling inform the ironic games of appropriation and *pastiche in recent poetry, e.g., *visual or *concrete poetry, sound or "noise" creations, or *Language poetry. Absent from much of contemp. Dada-inflected work, however, is the sense of rage and rebellion that motivated the original Dadaists and that linked them to the spirit of modernist despair and utopianism. In its place, contemp. cultural critique has assumed increasingly academic forms of ironic manipulation of discourse systems with little hope of—or desire for—an art of purifying scandal.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS, POSTMODERNISM, POSTSTRUCTURALISM, PRIMITIVISM, RUSSIAN FORMALISM, SOUND POETRY.

■ The Dada Painters and Poets, ed. R Motherwell (1951); Als Dada Begann, ed. P. Schifferli (1957); M. Sanouillet, Dada á Paris (1965); M. A. Caws, The Poetry of Dada and Surrealism (1970); M. Grossman, Dada (1971); M. Janco, "Dada at Two Speeds"; T. Tzara, "Dada Manifesto"; and G. Grosz and W. Herzfelde, "Art Is in Danger," all in Dadas on Art, ed. L. Lippard (1971); Dada et le surréalisme, ed. M. Tison-Braun (1973); Dada, ed. G. Ribemont-Dessaignes (1974); S. Foster and R. Kuenzli, Dada Spectrum (1979); Dada/Dimensions, ed. S. Foster (1985); J. Freeman, The Dada and Surrealist Word-Image (1989); R. Meyer, Dada Global (1994); Crisis and the Arts: The History of Dada, ed. S. Foster, 10 v. (1996–2005); M. Pegrum, Challenging Modernity (2000); R. Sheppard, Modernism—Dada—Postmodernism (2000); The Dada Reader, ed. D. Ades (2006); R. Kuenzli, Dada: Themes and Movements (2006); L. Dickerman et al., Dada: Zurich, Berlin, Hannover, Cologne, New York, Paris (2008).

C. RUSSELL

DANCE AND POETRY

I. Historical Convergences
II. Poetry on Dance

I. Historical Convergences. In the cultures of Crete and ancient Greece, dancing and poetry were linked in ritual and religious practice. A wide variety of dances dedicated to deities were performed with song and music; worship of Apollo included the hyporchema*, a mimetic dance accompanied by song. In the late 6th c. BCE, the City Dionysia competition generated the *dithyramb, composed of *choruses of citizens circling within the space of the orchestra while intoning poetry, directed by a poet who often led the movements; singing and dancing choruses also punctuated performances of *tragedies and *comedies. In cl. Gr. civilization, the interweaving of voice, movement, and music—the concept of mousikē—was central to cultural practice in state functions and private gatherings alike (see MUSIC AND POETRY). Poetry and dance were important components of entertainments and celebrations and frequently appeared together on the after-dinner menu of symposia, providing material—as recorded by Xenophon—for philosophical debate. Plato emphasized the role of dance in the education of a well-rounded citizen, and Socrates famously expounded on the benefits to the mind of a body kept healthy by dancing, foreshadowing Friedrich Nietzsche's dancing philosopher.

The early Christian era saw various polemics and prohibitions against dance, although Eur. med. texts and paintings carry descriptions of round dances accompanied by song. The late med. danse macabre genre in woodcuts and paintings features an early instance of dialogue between dance and *dramatic poetry, frequently consisting of images glossed by exchanges between Death and his victims. Dance took on a more positive allegorical cast in the Ren., as scholars and artists, reemphasizing the ancient concept of the music of the spheres, developed the image of celestial bodies participating in a cosmic dance, as in John Davies's "Orchestra, or a Poem of Dancing" (1596). This metaphysical *trope provided the ground for the court ballets and *masques of 16th- and 17th-c. Italy, France, Spain, and England: large-scale spectacles featuring music, poetry, dance, drama, and extravagant stage designs, they offered images of a universal harmony that carefully mirrored the harmonious social order presided over by the monarch. Poets such as Ben Jonson composed masques whose descriptive verses give some idea of their choreography and whose meter is carefully calibrated to the rhythm of the dance steps, being particularly marked at certain points to guide dancers through complicated moves. The It. ballo choreographer Fabritio Caroso explicitly underlined the homology between steps in dance and poetry—both measured, as he noted, in *feet (see METER)—and even invented steps based on lyric (particularly Ovidian) meter, e.g., the spondeo. (Some mod. scholars have made the controversial suggestion that Homeric *epic was itself structured by dance rhythm.) The Ren. also saw the appearance of dance manuals and treatises that argued for the significance of dance as an art form, an argument buttressed in poetry by Soame Jenyns's The Art of Dancing (1727).

During the Enlightenment, in opera and ballets d'action, dance gravitated increasingly in the direction of narrative: telling a story rather than merely serving as decoration or diversion. The early 20th c. would see a revolt, however, against cl. ballet's subordination to the machinery of plot and what were seen as constricting techniques of expression. Inspired in part by Nietzsche's writings on Gr. tragedy and the chorus, a variety of dancers across Europe and North America turned once more toward the ideal of mousikē, forging close links with poetry and music, as well as painting. In freeing dance from the demands of narrative or drama, the first generation of mod. dancers were seen as bringing it closer to poetry—or as Rudolf Laban wrote of Isadora Duncan, "[She] reawakened a form of dance-expression, which could be called dance-lyrics, in contrast to the mainly dramatic dance forms of ballet."

Several of these dancers experimented with combining the two art forms, claiming inspiration by poems or having their performances accompanied by poetry. Duncan performed the Idylls of Theocritus and the Homeric Hymn to Demeter alongside readings of poetry. The Fr. futurist Valentine de Saint Point combined dance and poetry of her own composition in what she termed "metachoric" performances (see FUTURISM). Even the dissonant *Dada dances of the Germans Mary Wigman and Sophie Taeuber-Arp, set to readings of Nietzsche or of *nonsense verse, might be seen as probing the possibility of mousikē in war-torn modernity. Others turned to recent reworkings of Gr. culture in their experiments with fusing ancient and mod., poetry and dance. Vaslav Nijinsky's Afternoon of a Faun, for instance, is an interpretation of a Gr.-styled poem by Stéphane Mallarmé, "L'Après-midi d'un faune." In 1934, Kurt Jooss choreographed a full-length Persephone, with text by André Gide based on the Homeric Hymn to Demeter, and music by Igor Stravinsky. Martha Graham frequently experimented with poetry as source and structure: in the solo Dithyrambic in 1931, the 1940 Letter to the World (an homage to Emily Dickinson), and Hérodiade (1944), a piece for two female dancers inspired by an unfinished poem by Mallarmé. The choreographer Merce Cunningham, known for his collaborations with artists in other media (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS), prepared two pieces with the Canadian poet Anne Carson, Nox and Stacks (2011).

This narrative of harmonies between the two art forms might also be written in a more dissonant key, taking into account meditations on the hierarchical or historical precedence of one or other mode of discourse. Gr. and Roman treatises on oratory mapped out repertoires of effective gestures to accompany speech yet cautioned against excessive mimeticism; Quintilian pointedly distinguished between orator and dancer (although later dancers would themselves proscribe pantomimic gesture; see MIME). Enlightenment debates over the origin of lang. pressed particularly on its relation to the body, seeking to determine whether speech or gesture took historical precedence. Jean-Jacques Rousseau meditated on the enduring question of dance's universality of gesture, its capacity to communicate more easily across cultures than lang. because of a transnational and transhistorical human grammar of movement. And at the turn of the 20th c., the Cambridge Ritualists confidently placed dance at the origin of human expression.

II. Poetry on Dance. Poems about dance, rather than constituting a genre unto themselves, appear intermittently in the corpus of established poets; they may present dance as a narrative, as a lyrical expression of feeling, as an interpersonal duet (frequently between the speaker and a desired other), or, very occasionally, from the point of view of the performer. Considered broadly, poems tend to align dance with either the social or the artistic, ethics or aesthetics. In the former camp, dance is conceived as a pattern of social organization, from the utopian (social ritual, e.g., Luis Palés Matos's "Black Dance") through the practical (court and civil society, e.g., Friedrich Schiller's "The Dance") to the dystopian (the "sudden mobs of men" of Wallace Stevens's "Sad Strains of a Gay Waltz"); movement in these poems is often carefully choreographed within a fixed structure, as in the image on Achilles' shield in the Iliad, whose lines trace the to-and-fro movements of a chain dance. The second camp, which treats dance as an art form in its own right, tends toward more mimetic patterning, straining to capture the movements of the performer in its own rhythms and syntax (Gertrude Stein's "Susie Asado," R. M. Rilke's "Spanish Dancer"). These latter poems insist that dance fully activates the body of the artist (whether performer or choreographer—the two are usually merged), with a complementary kinesthetic effect on the viewer; by inscribing dance in their poems, poets seek to harness some of this power of movement.

In the symbolist period (see SYMBOLISM), dance's seeming evanescence as an art form was recast as a moment of full *presence, an ideal integration of signifier and signified (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER): W. B. Yeats's dancer in "Among School Children" fused with the dance itself, coinciding wholly with a meaning or expressive intention pursued in vain by the writer. In Mallarmé's famous dictum ("Ballets"), "the dancer is not a woman dancing, for these juxtaposed reasons: that she is not a woman, but a metaphor summing up one of the elementary aspects of our form: knife, goblet, flower, etc.; and that she is not dancing, but suggesting, through the miracle of bends and leaps, a kind of corporal writing, what it would take pages of prose, dialogue, and description to express, if it were transcribed: a poem independent of any scribal apparatus." Symbolist poets were indeed some of the first professional dance critics: Théophile Gautier, Mallarmé, Paul Valéry. From the latter half of the 19th c. through the early decades of the 20th, they and their followers watched an eclectic mix of solo dancers and troupes—from La Cornalba and the Tiller Girls to Anna Pavlova and the Ballets Russes—perform a range of cl., expressivist, "ethnic," and machine-inspired dances, and produced an abundance of poetry in response. Dance became the focal point for intermedial artworks, interwoven with music, scenery, costumes, and lighting effects by well-known avant-garde contemporaries. But intermediality has in many ways always characterized the encounter between dance and poetry, with appeals to a third or fourth art form (music, painting, sculpture) to heighten the multisensory kinesthesia promised by their meeting. This phenomenon is encapsulated in W. C. Williams's 1944 poem "The Dance," inspired by a Ren. painting of a village dance: its identical opening and closing lines provide a static frame for the whole, but what comes between them ramps up visual, tactile, and sonorous effects to gather dance into the embrace of poetry.

■ Poems of the Dance, ed. E. Dickson (1921); R. von Laban, Modern Educational Dance (1948); Dance in Poetry, ed. A. Raftis (1991); G. Brandstetter, Tanzlektüren (1995); E. Goellner and J. Shea Murphy, Bodies of the Text (1995); A. Koritz, Gendered Bodies/Performing Art (1995); The Dance, ed. E. Fragos (2006); S. Mallarmé, Divagations, trans. B. Johnson (2007); The Ancient Dancer in the Modern World, ed. F. Macintosh (2010); J. Townsend, The Choreography of Modernism (2010); C. Preston, Modernism's Mythic Pose (2011).

M. Clayton

DANISH POETRY. See denmark, poetry of.

DANSA. Occitan lyric genre, commonly of three stanzas, set to a lively tune of popular cast. An opening respos or *refrain (A) was perhaps repeated after each stanza, of which the second part matched the form and tune of the respos, while the two symmetrical halves of the first part were independent of it: schematically, A bba(A) bba(A) bba(A) for a three-stanza piece. The OF balete shows the same structure.

■ GRLMA 2.1B; Bec; Chambers; G. Avenoza, "La dansa: Corpus d'un genre lyrique roman," Revue des langues romanes 107 (2003).

J. H. Marshall

DARK ROOM COLLECTIVE. As Harvard undergraduates, the poets Thomas Sayers Ellis and Sharan Strange founded the Dark Room Reading Series in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1987. The series became known as the Dark Room Collective and supported burgeoning and established Af. Am. writers through a communal network free of particular aesthetic or political ideologies. Among others, the collective launched Kevin Young, Natasha Trethewey, John Keene, Major Jackson, and Carl Phillips. Young's renewal of elegiac and *blues poetry; Trethewey's lyrical explorations of Southern hist. and Af. Am. culture; and Jackson's urbane, formal sophistication are illustrations of the Dark Room Collective's influence on contemp. Am. poetry.

See african american poetry; united states, poetry of the.

■ Anthologies and Criticism: Giant Steps: The New Generation of African-American Writers, ed. K. Young (2000); E. Alexander, The Black Interior: Essays (2007); B. Reed, "The Dark Room Collective and Post-Soul Poetics," African American Review 41.4 (2007).

■ Novels and Poetry Collections: J. Keene, Annotations (1995); C. Phillips, The Rest of Love: Poems (2004); N. Tretheway, Native Guard (2007).

W. Muyumba

DEAD METAPHOR. An expression that was originally metaphorical but no longer functions as a *trope and is now understood literally, e. g., "tail light," "foot of the mountain," "head of state." Scholars differ as to how and why a metaphor becomes "dead." The common theory holds that the cause is repeated use over time. If the meaning generated by a metaphor is based on the tension it establishes between two things—subject and analogue, *tenor and vehicle, target and source—normally perceived to be different, then a dead metaphor has lost that tension. Thus, while we may refer to the base of a mountain (tenor) as its "foot" (vehicle), we no longer see it as involving a reference to an object in nature in terms of a human body part.

To conflate dead metaphor with either *cliché or idiom is a mistake, since metaphors can be conventional without being literal (e.g., "the eyes are windows on the soul," "Juliet is the sun") and since some etymological dead metaphors can be unexpectedly fascinating (e.g., "pedigree" from the Fr. for "foot of a crane," "magazine" from the word for "storehouse"). Cognitive linguists and philosophers of lang. point out that the very terms "literal" and "metaphorical" are historically and socially dependent and that dead metaphors can indicate interesting conceptual frameworks (e.g., "a car is an animal") that may be very much alive.

See metaphor.

■ W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954); O. Thomas, Metaphor and Related Subjects (1969); M. C. Beardsley, "The Metaphorical Twist," Essays on Metaphor, ed. W. Shibles (1972); D. Davidson, "What Metaphors Mean," On Metaphor, ed. S. Sacks (1979); E. C. Traugott, "'Conventional' and 'Dead' Metaphors Revisited," The Ubiquity of Metaphor, ed. W. Paprotté and R. Dir-ven (1985); D. E. Cooper, Metaphor (1986); G. Lakoff, "The Death of Dead Metaphor," Metaphor and Symbol 2.2 (1987); R. W. Gibbs, The Poetics of Mind (1994); Z. Radman, "Difficulties with Diagnosing the Death of a Metaphor," Metaphor and Symbol 12.2 (1997); R. Claiborne, Loose Cannons, Red Herrings, and Other Lost Metaphors (2001).

N. Friedman; A. L. French

DECADENCE (Lat., de-cadere, "falling away"). A term used ostensibly in reference to periods or works whose qualities are held to mark a "falling away" from previously recognized conditions or standards of excellence. The term is often applied to the Alexandrian (or Hellenistic) period in Gr. lit. (ca. 300–230 BCE—see ALEXANDRIANISM) and to the period in Lat. lit. after the death of Augustus (14 CE—see LATIN POETRY). In mod. poetry, decadence has been identified most persistently in the works of the Fr. symbolist-decadent movement of the late 19th c. (coinciding with a sense of national decline after the Franco-Prussian War of 1870), whose influence in the British isles encouraged native tendencies already nurtured by the ideas of Walter Pater, the poetry of D. G. Rossetti and A. C. Swinburne, and the general ambience of *Pre-Raphaelitism (see SYMBOLISM). Symbolist influence was widespread also among the poets of fin de siècle Europe outside France, incl. Russia, where there was a vital symbolist movement. It did not significantly affect the poetry of the United States until the 20th c., although E. A. Poe was himself a progenitor of important ideas and practices of the Fr. symbolists.

In a limited sense, decadence may be seen as exemplified in the tastes and habits of such fictional characters as Petrus Borel's Passereau l'Ecolier, Gabriele D'Annunzio's Count Andrea Sperelli-Fieschi d'Ugenta, J.-K. Huysmans's Des Esseintes, Poe's Roderick Usher, Thomas Mann's Gustav von Aschenbach, Auguste Villiers de l'Isle-Adam's Axël d'Auersperg, and Oscar Wilde's Dorian Gray and Lord Henry Wotton; in passages like those on the lang. of decaying civilizations by Charles Baudelaire and Théophile Gautier; in the apostrophe of Stéphane Mallarmé's Hérodiade to her mirror; in Paul Verlaine's verses beginning "Je suis l'Empire à la fin de la décadence"; in Valery Bryusov's scandalous one-line poem, "Oh, cover your pale legs"; in Aubrey Beardsley's self-described "strange hermaphroditic creatures wandering about in Pierrot costumes or modern dress; quite a new world of my own creation"; in the sumptuous paintings and illustrations of Léon Bakst, Alexandre Benois, Konstantin Somov, and the other artists associated with the jour. The World of Art; in Wilde's Salomé and Ernest Dowson's famous poem to Cynara; in the affectations of Count Robert de Montesquiou-Fezensac; and in the remarkable production in 1891 of Paul-Napoléon Roinard's Cantique des cantiques in the perfumed atmosphere of Paul Fort's Théâtre d'Art. Decadence in this sense was often a mannerism of the sort prevalent in the England of the Yellow Nineties, with its brilliant and superficial fin de siècle aesthetic pose that played perhaps a more significant role than is generally recognized in opposing the crushing force of the current materialism. But the word decadence has come to be used by hostile critics in a larger sense than this.

If there was a single figure that captivated the decadent imagination and served as decadence's unofficial muse, it was the biblical character of Salome, whose image circulated among the male writers and artists who dominated literary and artistic circles throughout fin de siècle Europe. Salome figured prominently in Mallarmé's Hérodiade; in Gustave Flaubert's short story "Hérodias," which directly influenced Jules Massenet's opera Hérodiade; in numerous paintings and illustrations by Gustave Moreau, incl. Salome Dancing before Herod and The Apparition, which are discussed at length in Huysmans's so-called breviary of decadence, À rebours; in Wilde's play Salomé, which inspired Beardsley's illustrations to the play, as well as Richard Strauss's opera Salome; and in Alexander Blok's poem "Venice II," where "Salome stealthily walks by / With [the poet's] bloody head." With her extravagant jewels and veils and seductive dance in exchange for the head of John the Baptist, Salome responded not only to the decadent fascination with aestheticism, exoticism, and eroticism but to male anxieties at the fin de siècle in the face of the rise of the new woman and the dance-hall girl. Although Salome was the subject of intense fascination among male writers and artists, who identified with the symbolically "castrated" John the Baptist as well as with the femme fatale Salome, the Jewish princess also became the source of inspiration for women writers and artists associated with symbolists and decadent circles. Thus, Mirra Lokhvitskaya drew on the attributes of Salome in fashioning her unabashedly feminine poetic persona, while Zinaida Gippius, who adopted an unmarked, masculine voice for her highly restrained metaphysical poetry, was known to appear in literary circles à la Salomé in ultrafeminine attire and with a jewel suspended from her forehead.

In addition to gender ambiguity and anxiety, which were reflected in, among other things, the decadents' complex attraction to and identification with the femme fatale Salome, a basic characteristic of decadence has been a failure to recognize objective or timeless values that transcend and give form and direction to individual experience and effort. In these terms, the decadent poet is seen living in a state of Heraclitian or Bergsonian flux, with his values confined within narrowly egocentric limits and unlikely to satisfy his desires. Here the poet tends to be concerned not with "the fruit of experience" but with "experience itself" and with private sensations; and his poems are likely to reveal a number of the following "decadent" characteristics: ennui; a search for novelty, with attendant artificiality and interest in the unnatural; excessive self-analysis; feverish hedonism, with poetic interest in corruption and morbidity; abulia, neurosis, and exaggerated erotic sensibility; aestheticism, with a stress on "art for art's sake" in the evocation of exquisite sensations and emotions; dandyism; scorn of contemp. society and mores; restless curiosity, perversity, or eccentricity in subject matter; overemphasis on form, with a resultant loss of balance between form and content—or interest in lapidary ornamentation, resulting at times in disintegration of artistic unity; bookishness; erudite or exotic vocabulary; frequent employment of *synaesthesia or transpositions d'art; complex and difficult syntax; experiments in the use of new rhythms, rich in evocative and sensuous effects alien to those of trad. and often departing from the mathematical principles of control in established prosody; substitution of coherence in mood for coherence and synthesis in thought; "postromantic" irony in the manner of Tristan Corbière, Jules Laforgue, and the early T. S. Eliot; *obscurity, arising from remote, private, or complicated imagery; and a pervasive sense of something lost—a nostalgic semimysticism without clear direction or spiritual commitment, but with frequent reference to exotic religions and rituals, e.g., to tarot cards, magic, alchemy, Rosicrucianism, Theosophy, the Kabbalah, Satanism, and the like.

From the foregoing summary emerge certain fundamental distinctions between the symbolist and the decadent, distinctions that derive from the decadent's essential condition, that of an artist whose symbolist aspirations are constantly thwarted by a persistent *naturalism. For all his efforts to create for himself an existence of infinitely renewed moments, to concentrate life into a sequence of sensations, the decadent is fatally bound to hist., and a Darwinian hist. at that. While the symbolist inhabits a world of seamless and cumulative duration, a world of temporal synthesis, which accounts for his peculiar equanimity in the face of external events, the decadent endures the forces of heredity, which characteristically produce an oscillation between febrility and neurasthenia, culminating in psychological exhaustion. Untouched by disorders of the nerves, the symbolist can submerge personality in the play of universal analogy, can "yield the initiative to words" (Mallarmé); the decadent, on the other hand, feels bound to protect and promote personality, to isolate the self, by the exercise of irony and a vigilant self-consciousness. Consequently, the mask of the decadent is not the symbolist's mask of self-transcendence or self-surrender but the dandy's mask of self-defense, of noncommitment. Paradoxically, then, the decadent needs the very society he rejects as an audience against which he can measure his superiority; his art is thus more aggressive than the symbolist's, more intent on strategies of outrage and shock. For this reason, perhaps, the decadent's rebellion by blasphemy and sacrilege often takes place within the framework of Catholic orthodoxy, while the symbolist's "religion" is either atheistic or syncretic.

But the decadent's ineradicable naturalism is most evident in a stubborn materialism, both in taste and style. The decadent is a collector and connoisseur of aesthetic objects with which he can fill his spiritual vacuum and dissociate himself from grosser forms of materialism. Unlike the symbolist, therefore, the decadent aims to aestheticize or refine the object, rather than transform it. And his style is equally materialist; it collects words like aesthetic objects, like possessions, whether they be archaisms, neologisms, technical terms, or exotic images, and sets them, like jewels, in a finely wrought syntax designed to show them off. For all his ostensible rejection of Parnassian (see PARNASSIANISM) and naturalist principles, the decadent remains a descriptive rather than transmutative writer; he can name only words or objects that already have an inherent value for him. In his falling short of symbolist ideals, in the paradoxes of his existence, in his exasperated failure to break free from naturalism, the decadent assumes a certain tragic grandeur.

In keeping with this naturalistic coloring, Laurent thought he could identify certain characteristics of a physiognomie décadente: a lack of forehead; prognathous features; oddly shaped heads ("plagiocéphales, oxycéphales, acrocéphales"); deformed noses; glabrous, asymmetrical faces; wide ears; enormous cheek bones, and so on. All this was a continuation of the thesis of Max Nordau's Entartung (Degeneration, 1892), which found that the Fr. symbolists "had in common all the signs of degeneracy and imbecility." G. B. Shaw's The Sanity of Art (1895) was an effective reply to this sort of nonsense.

See AESTHETICISM, GEORGIANISM, HERMETICISM.

■ T. Gautier, "Charles Baudelaire" (1868); D. Nisard, Études de moeurs et de critique sur les poètes latins de la décadence, 4th ed. (1878); A. Symons, "The Decadent Movement in Literature," Harper's Magazine 87 (1893); E. Laurent, La poésie décadente devant la science psychiatrique (1897); A. J. Farmer, Le Mouvement esthétique et "decadent" en Angleterre (1873–1900) (1931); W. Binni, La poetica del decadentismo (1949); M. Praz, The Romantic Agony, 2d ed. (1951); J. M. Smith, "Concepts of Decadence in 19th-Century French Literature," SP 50 (1953); A. E. Carter, The Idea of Decadence in French Literature, 1830–1900 (1958); K. W. Swart, The Sense of Decadence in Nineteenth-Century France (1964); P. Jullian, Esthètes et magiciens (1969); P. Stephan, Paul Verlaine and the Decadence, 1882–90 (1974); Pascoli, D'Annunzio, Fogazzaro e il decadentismo italiano, ed. R. Tessari (1976); M. Calinescu, Faces of Modernity (1977); L. C. Dowling, Aestheticism and Decadence (1977)—annotated bibl.; J. Pierrot, L'Imaginaire décadent, 1880–1900 (1977); M. Lemaire, Le Dandysme de Baudelaire á Mallarmé (1978); R. Gilman, Decadence (1979); Terras, "Decadence"; Degeneration, ed. J. E. Chamberlain (1985); J. D. Grossman, Valery Bryusov and the Riddle of Russian Decadence (1985); J. R. Reed, Decadent Style (1985); J. Birkett, Sins of the Fathers (1986); B. Dijkstra, Idols of Perversity (1986); L. C. Dowling, Language and Decadence in the Victorian fin de siècle (1986); D. Pick, Faces of Degeneration (1989); B. Spackman, Decadent Genealogies (1989); G. A. Cevasco, Three Decadent Poets (1990)—annotated bibl.; C. Paglia, Sexual Personae (1990); E. Showalter, Sexual Anarchy (1990); E. Donato, The Script of Decadence (1993); M. H. Pittock, Spectrum of Decadence (1993); A. Sinfield, The Wilde Century (1994); D. Weir, Decadence and the Making of Modernism (1995); E. Hanson, Decadence and Catholicism (1997); R. K. Garelick, Rising Star (1998); Perennial Decay, ed. L. Constable, D. Denisoff and M. Potolsky (1999); C. Bernheimer, Decadent Subjects, ed. T. J. Klein and N. Schor (2002); G. C. Schoolfield, A Baedeker of Decadence (2003); O. Matich, Erotic Utopia (2005); K. MacLeod, Fictions of British Decadence (2006); The Cambridge Companion to the Fin de Siècle, ed. G. Marshall (2007).

A. G. Engstrom; C. Scott; J. Presto

DECASYLLABLE. A line of ten syllables; metrical structures built on it vary, but normally the term refers to the Fr. décasyllabe and the Eng. *iambic pentameter. In Fr. verse, the decasyllable appeared about the middle of the 11th c., in La Vie de St. Alexis and Le Boèce, with a *caesura after the fourth syllable and two fixed accents on the fourth and tenth syllables: so 4//6, with 6//4 as a possible variant form; 5//5, perhaps the oldest version of the decasyllable, also occurs both in the med. period and among poets of the 19th c. The classic 4//6 form leads one to expect a line of three rhythmic measures, one in the 4 and two in the 6; the description of the 5//5 alternative by Bonaventure des Périers (early 16th c.) as "taratantara" (2 + 3) suggests the expectation of two measures in each *hemistich of 5. With the appearance of the Chanson de Roland (early 12th c.), the decasyllable became the standard line of Fr. epic and narrative verse, i.e. the chansons de geste*, until the appearance of the *alexandrine at the beginning of the 12th c., which gradually supplanted it. In OF lyric verse, it is more common than the octosyllable, making it the principal Fr. meter from the 14th c. to the mid-16th c., when the poets of the Pléiade appropriated the alexandrine for the lyric, too (Joachim du Bellay referred to the decasyllable as the vers héroïque; Pierre de Ronsard dubbed it the vers commun and employed it in his Franciade [1572], albeit against his better judgment). Thereafter, the alexandrine became the standard line for most serious poetry in Fr., though the decasyllable continued to play an important role: in the 17th and 18th cs., it served the *ballade, the *epigram, the *ode, the *mock epic, (e.g., Jean-Baptiste-Louis Gresset's Ver-Vert [1734]), the *verse epistle (Jean-Baptiste Rousseau), and comedy (Voltaire) and appeared among the vers mêlés of the fable; the intermittent use of the 5//5 version, alongside 4//6, in the 19th c. (Pierre de Béranger, Alfred de Musset, Marceline Desbordes-Valmore, Victor Hugo, Théophile Gautier, Charles Baudelaire, Théodore de Banville, Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle) often harked back to its med. origins in song (e.g., chansons de toile) but was susceptible to other modalities, while in the hands of Paul Verlaine, Arthur Rimbaud, and Jules Laforgue, the line also became a site of metrico-rhythmic polymorphousness; in the 20th c., Paul Valéry was prompted by the decasyllable's insistent rhythmic shape to adopt it for "Le Cimetière marin" (1922), although he acknowledged its lack of popularity, characterized it as "poor and monotonous," and recognized the need to "raise this Ten to the power of Twelve." Ironically, it is in vers libre* that the decasyllabic line recovered much of its lost status, whether as an "authentic" decasyllable, metrically constituted, or as a nonce string of ten syllables.

In Italy, the endecasillabo (11 syllables but with a feminine ending) appeared early in the 12th c. and was used by Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. Chaucer may have discovered the line in their work (the last syllable would have been dropped in Eng. pronunciation), if he had not already become acquainted with the corresponding Fr. meter. In any case, the decasyllabic line in Chaucer's hands took on the five-stress alternating pattern later to be called iambic, a form that, regardless of whether one counts syllables or stresses or both, and despite the considerable variation it enjoyed in the 15th c., as Chaucer's successors tried to imitate a meter they imperfectly understood, was secured by the authority of Chaucer's reputation until "rediscovered"—i.e., reconstructed—by Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey, in the early 16th c. In the hands of Philip Sidney, Edmund Spenser, and William Shakespeare, the Eng. decasyllable—given the Latinate name pentameter by the classicizing Ren.—became the great staple meter of Eng. poetry and the foundation of *blank verse, the *heroic couplet, the *sonnet, and many other stanzaic forms; it has been estimated that some 70 percent of Eng. poetry of the high art-verse trad. has been written in the iambic pentameter line.

■ Bridges; P. Valéry, "Au sujet du Cimetière marin," Oeuvres I, ed. J. Hytier (1957); G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); J.-P. Bobillot, "Entre mètre et non-mètre: le « décasyllabe » chez Rimbaud," Parade Sauvage 10 (1994); B. de Cornulier, Art poëtique (1995); M. J. Duffell, "'The Craft So Long to Lerne': Chaucer's Invention of Iambic Pentameter," Chaucer Review 34 (2000); A. English, Verlaine, poète de l'indécidable (2005).

T.V.F. Brogan; C. Scott

DÉCIMA. Sp. metrical term used loosely to denote any ten-line stanza but now usually used as the equivalent of espinela*, occasionally of copla real. The first décimas approximating the final form were the 14th- and 15th-c. ten-line variations of the copla de arte menor. The décima italiana, probably first used in the 18th c., is an octosyllabic *strophe rhyming ababc:dedec, the c rhymes being oxytones and the *colon denoting a pause. Other meters, particularly the *hendecasyllable with *heptasyllable, may be used, and the rhyme scheme and the position of the pause may vary, or lines may be unrhymed, provided that the two oxytones rhyme and are found one at the end of the strophe and the other at the pause. This strophe is related to the It. ten-line stanza, decima rima.

See lauda.

■ A. Paredes, The Décima on the Texas-Mexico Border (1968); Navarro; A. Paredes and G. Foss, The Décima on the Texas-Mexican Border (1968); Formas narrativas de la tradición oral de México, ed. M. Zavala Gómez de Campo (2009).

D. C. Clarke

DECIR (Sp., "to say" or "to compose," often used with the adverb bien [well] to denote the act of writing poetry; also spelled dezir). The act of writing or a poetic composition, used primarily in rubrics of the 15th-c. cancioneros* and by their poets. Although scholarship has opposed cantiga canción (see CANTIGA) and decir by designating one as a fixed form set to music and sung and the other as read, recent studies indicate that the terms coincided, as music was not a consistent designator of genre, and most cancionero poetry appears to have been recited or silently read (Gómez-Bravo). The decir typically treats didactic or political rather than amatory matters and consists of an indeterminate number of octosyllabic arte menor*, dodecasyllabic arte mayor*, or mixed-verse coplas*. Related to other terms of med. rhet. such as dictar (to compose) and the ars dictaminis (the art of writing pleasingly), the term decir was used to indicate competence in poetic composition related to the arts of rhet. and grammar (ars poetriae) and ars dicendi following Quintilian's definition in Institutio oratoria: "rhetoric ars est bene dicendi" (rhetoric is the art of speaking well, 2.17.37). Although the terms could be used interchangeably, decir became the favored term for a poetic composition and for the act of writing poetry, replacing dictado and dictar, from the mid-14th to mid-15th c.: "salve en la manera del trobar e del dezir" (save in the manner of invention and of proper composition; Libro de buen amor, S45–4, 14th c.); "dezires muy limados e bien escandidos" (very refined and well measured poetic compositions; Cancionero de Baena, PN1, Prologue, 15th c.).

■ Le Gentil; F. López Estrada, Introducción a la literatura medieval española (1952); T. Navarro Tomás, Metrica española (1956); Cancionero de Juan Alfonso de Baena, ed. B. Dutton and J. González Cuenca (1993); A. M. Gómez-Bravo, "Decir canciones: The Question of Genre in Cancionero Poetry," Medieval Lyric, ed. W. D. Paden (2000).

M. GALVEZ

DECORUM (Gr. to prepon, "what is decorous"). The cl. term decorum refers to one of the criteria for judging those things whose excellence lends itself more appropriately to qualitative than to quantitative measurement. This definition depends on the ancient distinction between two types of measure posited by Plato in The Statesman (283d–85a) and adopted by Aristotle in his ethical, political, rhetorical, and literary treatises. Excess and deficiency, Plato says, are measurable in terms of not only the quantitative largeness or smallness of objects in relation to each other but each object's approximation to a norm of "due measure." All the arts owe the effectiveness and beauty of their products to this norm, to metron, whose criteria of what is commensurate (to metrion), decorous (to prepon), timely (to kairon), and needful (to deon), all address themselves to the "mean" (to meson) rather than to the fixed, arithmetically defined extremes. This distinction is central to literary decorum, because lit. shares its subject matter and certain principles of stylistic representation with the disciplines of law, ethics, and rhet., which also are concerned with the qualitative analysis and judgment of human experience.

With respect to subject matter, Aristotle says that poetry treats human actions (Poetics 2, 4, 6–9) by revealing their universal significance in terms of the "kinds of things a certain kind of person will say or do in accordance with probability or necessity" (Else trans., 9.4). The kinds of things said or done will indicate certain moral qualities (poious) of character that, in turn, confer certain qualities (poias) on the actions themselves (6.5–6). Extending the terms of Plato's Statesman (283d–85b, 294a–97e) to ethics, law, and rhet., Aristotle defines the concept of virtue necessary to evaluate such qualities of character as a balanced "disposition" (hexis) of the emotions achieved by the observation of the "mean" (mesotes) relative to each situation (Nicomachean Ethics [EN] 2.6). Likewise in law, equity is a "disposition" achieved through the individual application of a "quantitatively" invariable code of statutes for (amounts of) rewards and penalties to "qualitatively" variable and unpredictable human actions. As the builder of Lesbos bent his leaden ruler to a particular stone, so the judge, in drawing upon the universal law of nature (to katholou), might rectify the particular application of civil law by making a special ordinance to fit the discrete case (EN 5.7, 10). Equity brings these universal considerations to bear by looking to the qualitative questions of the legislator's intentions and of the kind (poios) of person the accused has generally or always been in order to mitigate his present act (Rhetoric 1.13.13–19).

With respect to stylistic representation, all verbal (as opposed to arithmetical) expression is qualitative and rests content if it can establish a likely similarity (rather than an exact equivalence) between things (Plato, Cratylus 432ab, Timaeus 29cd). *Diction achieves decorum by a proper balance between "distinctive" words, which contribute dignity while avoiding obtrusiveness, and "familiar" words, which, while avoiding meanness, contribute clarity (Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.2–3, Poetics 21–22). Lang. in general achieves decorum if the style expresses the degree of emotion proper to the importance of the subject and makes the speaker appear to have the kind of character proper to the occasion and audience. The greater the subject, the more powerful the emotions the speaker or writer may decorously solicit. The more shrewdly he estimates the "disposition" that informs the character of his listeners, the more he can achieve the "timely" (eukairos) degree of sophistication appropriate to the occasion (Rhetoric 3.7; cf. Plato, Phaedrus 277bc).

Influenced by the Middle Stoicism of Panaetius and Posidonius, Cicero did most to define and transmit the relation of literary decorum to ethics and law, suggested by such words as decor and decet, in his philosophical and rhetorical treatises (De officiis 1.14, 93–161; De oratore 69–74, 123–25). From his reformulation of Platonic, Aristotelian, and Isocratean attitudes, there flowed an immense variety of literary and artistic applications of the concept by grammarians, poets, rhetoricians, historians, philosophers, theologians, and encyclopedic writers on specialized disciplines. Most exemplary, perhaps, of the vitality and versatility of this trad. is Augustine's adaptation of it to Christian oratory and exegesis in De doctrina christiana, where, while virtually rejecting the cl. doctrine of "levels of style"—to which decorum was often reduced—he gave the cl. principle of decorum new life and applications (see Auerbach).

Like the "mean" and "disposition" of ethics and equity, decorum is an activity rather than a set of specific characteristics of style or content to be discovered, preserved, and reproduced. It is a fluid corrective process that must achieve and maintain, instant by instant, the delicate balance among the formal, cognitive, and judicative intentions of literary discourse. Its constant resistance to imbalance, taking different forms in different periods, never offers a "solution" to be found or expressed by literary "rules" with which later neoclassical theorists often try to identify it. As soon as they reduce it to a doctrine concerning either a given kind of subject or a given kind of style or a fixed relation of the one to the other, decorum ceases to exist, because its activity is a continuous negotiation between the two. For the forms that particular reductions or recoveries have taken, the reader must look to those literary controversies endemic to the period, genre, or issue of interest.

■ E. M. Cope and J. E. Sandys, The Rhetoric of Aristotle, 3 v. (1877); G. L. Hendrickson, "The Peripatetic Mean of Style and the Three Stylistic Characters," AJP 25 (1904); and "The Origin and Meaning of the Ancient Characters of Style," AJP 26 (1905); J.W.H. Atkins, Literary Criticism in Antiquity, 2 v. (1934); W. Jaeger, Paideia, 3 v. (1943)—cultural background; E. De Bruyne, Études d'esthétique médiévale, 3 v. (1946)—med. background; M. T. Herrick, The Fusion of Horatian and Aristotelian Literary Criticism, 1531–1555 (1946); Curtius, ch. 10; Norden; H. I. Marrou, Histoire de l'éducation dans l'antiquité, 5th ed. (1960)—cultural background; Weinberg; F. Quadlbauer, Die antike Theorie der Genera Dicendi im lateinischen Mittelalter (1962); C. O. Brink, Horace on Poetry, 3 v. (1963–82); G. F. Else, Aristotle's Poetics: The Argument (1963); E. Auerbach, Literary Language and Its Public in Late Latin Antiquity and in the Middle Ages, trans. R. Manheim (1965), ch. 1; T. A. Kranidas, The Fierce Equation (1965); M. Pohlenz, "To prepon," Kleine Schriften, ed. H. Dorrie (1965); A. Patterson, Hermogenes and the Renaissance (1970); T. McAlindon, Shakespeare and Decorum (1973); Murphy; W. Edinger, Samuel Johnson and Poetic Style (1977)—18th-c. background; W. Trimpi, Muses of One Mind (1983)—see index; K. Eden, Poetic and Legal Fiction in the Aristotelian Tradition (1986); J. Mueller, "The Mastery of Decorum: Politics as Poetry in Milton's Sonnets," CritI 3 (1987); T. Krier, Gazing on Secret Sights: Spenser, Classical Imitation and the Decorum of Vision (1990), chs. 3–5; S. D. Troyan, Textual Decorum: A Rhetoric of Attitudes in Medieval Literature (1994); W. V. Clausen, Virgil's "Aeneid": Decorum, Allusion, and Ideology (2002); R. Sowerby, "The Decorum of Pope's Iliad," Translation and Literature 13 (2004); A. Paternoster, "Decorum and Indecorum in the 'Seconda redazione' of B. Castiglione's 'Libro del Cortegiano,'" MLR 99 (2004); L. Kurke, Aesopic Conversations (2011).

W. Trimpi; F. L. Blumberg

DEEP IMAGE. The Deep Image school of poetry, more than any other movement of the time, proved to be both a watershed and a catalyst for the diverse energies suddenly appearing in Am. lit. and culture throughout the 1960s. It gave rise to a poetry whose characteristics recombined elements of other groups (esp. the *Black Mountain school) with a new energy source, Sp. *surrealism, to produce what two of its central apologists, George Lensing and Ronald Moran, define as a poetry of "the emotive imagination." The base element of this poetry is the *image, and its "form" is a dreamlike, rather than objectively recognizable, progression of images, whose aim is not to dismantle the reader's sense of self and the world but to startle her into quiet, unwilled acts of recognition. In this poetry, also known as deep-image poetry (the term was first used by Robert Kelly in his essay "Notes on the Poetry of Deep Image"), the poet's inner self and the outer world become landscapes described and fused by images that treat both as physical yet highly charged phenomena. In the best of these poems, the poet brings self and reader into a shared, exploratory state of mind that involves both in an associational journey to an open-ended sort of closure—a final image that feels like revelation yet leaves the participants feeling suspended and pleasantly provoked.

The Deep Image movement, although it arose partly in response to the spirit of the decade, nevertheless came about largely through the singular energy of Robert Bly, who promoted it as an antidote to modernist aesthetics (see MODERNISM). His and William Duffy's magazine, The Fifties, which began in 1958 and soon became The Sixties, flourished throughout the decade as the showcase for writers they felt would steer contemp. Am. poetry in the direction it needed to go: inward, toward the underexplored regions of the psyche, by means of startling but rightly intuited images. The magazine also provided Bly with an arena for the impassioned, reductive, provocative lit. crit. for which he became famous, a crit. that ranks intuition over rationalism and *imagery over discourse as a means of penetrating, for a moment, the reader's subconscious.

If Bly's sense of mission inspired him to dismiss Shakespeare and the entire formal Eng. trad. with a theatrical sweep of his pen, it also made him recognize and offer to the public North Am. poets for whom images were a mode of thought rather than skillfully crafted decoration—poets such as James Wright, Galway Kinnell, W. S. Merwin, David Ignatow, Donald Hall, William Stafford, and Louis Simpson. Bly also produced and published trans. of Eur. and Latin Am.

poets whose work, more than any other single factor, startled a younger generation of poets into seeing new possibilities for their own energies. Esp. influential were Bly's trans. of the Ger. writers Gottfried Benn and Georg Trakl, Sp. writers Federico García Lorca and Antonio Machado, Peruvian writer César Vallejo, Chilean writer Pablo Neruda, Fr. writers René Char and Paul Éluard, and numerous other 19th- and 20th-c. poets from Norway, Latin America, and other parts of Europe. All of them, Bly maintained, had "passed through surrealism" and, as a result, spoke from that fecund area of the subconscious where spirituality resides. This spirituality, as Bly demonstrated both in his crit. and his own poetry, derives its force from the natural world, from silence and solitude, and equips the writer to confront the complexities of mod. life.

Like the Black Mountain poets, Bly sought to explore the self in an area beyond that of ego, an area that might offer "organic" truth of its own. He mapped this area via the psyche, using ground broken by Sigmund Freud and Carl Jung to highlight the associative powers of the mind as it responds to resonant imagery and opens the self to depths that must be acknowledged despite pressures from the culture and the individual's self-protective efforts to avoid them. Although the Black Mountain poets concerned themselves more with the physical body than with the image as a basis for their "organic poetry," much of the work they produced in the 1960s, esp. that of Denise Levertov, Gary Snyder, and Robert Creeley, explored and revealed new depths of interaction between the self and the physical world; in the process, it addressed itself to nature and to perception in resonant new ways. Bly recognized this achievement by publishing and discussing their poetry at length in his magazine. Indeed, another of the many repercussions of Bly's energetic revamping of the poetic imagination in America was the melting of boundaries between these two important movements, one of which was legitimately avant-garde in the 1950s and one of which seemed an inevitable condensation of the energies burgeoning anyway, throughout the culture, in the 1960s.

See, UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE.

■ R. Kelly, "Notes on the Poetry of Deep Image," Trobar 2 (1961); "Introduction," Contemporary American Poetry, ed. D. Hall (1962); R. Bly, Leaping Poetry (1972); P. Zweig, "The New Surrealism," Contemporary Poetry in America, ed. R. Boyers (1974); C. Altieri, Enlarging the Temple (1979); R. Bly, "A Wrong Turning in American Poetry" and "What the Image Can Do," Claims for Poetry, ed. D. Hall (1982).

■ Poetry: R. Bly, Silence in the Snowy Fields (1962); W. S. Merwin, The Moving Target (1963); L. Simpson, At the End of the Open Road (1963); W. Stafford, Traveling through the Dark (1963); J. Wright, The Branch Will Not Break (1963); G. Kinnell, Flower Herding on Mount Monadnock (1964); R. Bly, Light around the Body (1967); W. S. Merwin, The Lice (1967); G. Kinnell, Body Rags (1968); M. Strand, Reasons for Moving (1968); J. Wright, Shall We Gather at the River (1968); W. S. Merwin, The Carrier of Ladders (1970); M. Strand, Darker (1970).

L. ULLMAN

DEFAMILIARIZATION. "The technique of art is to make objects 'unfamiliar,' to make forms difficult, to increase the difficulty and length of perception because the process of perception is an aesthetic end in itself and must be prolonged. Art is a way of experiencing the artfulness of an object; the object is not important." In this famous passage from "Iskusstvo kak priem" ("On the Newest Russian Poetry," 1917), the Rus. formalist Viktor Shklovsky coined the term ostranenie, a neologism often trans. into Eng. as "defamiliarization" or, less commonly, "estrangement" or "alienation." Defamiliarization refers to the artist's and critic's attention to the "devices" and formal elements of literary creation. The purpose of art, in this view, is to impart the sensation of things as they are perceived, not as they are known. Perception, moreover, becomes an aesthetic end in itself, with a focus on the reading process.

The idea of defamiliarization grew from the formalists' analysis of futurist *manifestos and poetry (see FUTURISM). The manifestos play with the form by incorporating poetry, artwork, and creative prose. The term the futurists use for this aesthetic instigation is sdvig or shift in perception. The focus lies in making the lang. and the form in which it is presented strange and uncomfortable so that the process of perception slows down and alters.

In Roman Jakobson's theory of poetics, the poet strives to liberate the word from the signified, from communicative meaning, thereby restoring it to the level of aesthetics. For Jakobson, formal defamiliarization connotes that which separates poetic lang. from the mundane (bytovoj iazyk). He characterizes Velimir Khlebnikov's writing as laying the device bare ("obnazhennost',—otsutstvie opravdatel'noj provolki" ["Iskusstvo kak priem"]).

The notion of defamiliarization in poetry predates the Rus. formalists. E.g., in De vulgari eloquentia (On Vernacular Eloquence, 1304), Dante sets out to prove that there is an "illustrious vernacular," which should be venerated as a lang. suitable for poetry the same as the "sacred, solemn and eternal Latin language." He seeks to prove that the vernacular can be poetic, that the poetic exists in the mundane.

The idea of using the familiar lang. because it has paradoxically become unfamiliar prompts William Wordsworth in his Preface to Lyrical Ballads (1800) to propose the use of "the real language of men" to replace the "gaudiness and inane phraseology" of the erudite, neoclassical style that dominated contemp. writing at the time. Wordsworth exceeds even Dante in his critique of elevated poetic speech in favor of ordinary lang. Wordsworth complicates the discussion, though, when he seeks to rediscover the "language really used by men" yet sees the need to "throw over them a certain coloring of imagination, whereby ordinary things should be presented to the mind in an unusual aspect."

Defamiliarization is the basis of Yuri Tynianov's claims regarding literary evolution. Tynianov's thesis revolves around the idea that the defamiliarized itself, at some point, must become automatized. Literary evolution is, thus, both motivated by and results from defamiliarization. The Rus. formalist theory of defamiliarization was influential in 20th-c. critical theory, possibly, most significantly in Bertolt Brecht's Verfremdung theory of alienation in theater.

■ Russian Formalist Criticism: Four Essays, ed. L. Lemon and M. J. Reis (1965); A. Kruchenykh and V. Khlebnikov, Slovo Kak Takovoe (1969); Texte Der Russischen Formalisten Band I-IV: Texte zur Theorie des Verses und der poetischen Sprache, ed. M. Imdahl et al. (1972); D. Laferriere, "Potebnya, Shklovskij and the Familiarity: Strangeness Paradox," Russian Literature 4 (1976); R. H. Stacy, Defamiliarization in Language and Literature (1977); V. Erlich, Russian Formalism: History—Doctrine, 4th ed. (1981); Russian Formalism: A Retrospective Glance, ed. R. L. Jackson and S. Rudy (1985); R. Jakobson, Language in Literature, ed. K. Pomorska and S. Rudy (1987); J. Striedter, Literary Structure, Evolution, and Value: Russian Formalism and Czech Structuralism Reconsidered (1989); V. Shklovsky, Theory of Prose, trans. B. Sher (1990); I. Gregson, Contemporary Poetry and Postmodernism: Dialogue and Estrangement (1996); L. Trotsky, Literature and Revolution, ed. W. Keach, trans. R. Strunsky (2005); "Estrangement Revisited (II)," PoT 27.1 (spec. iss., 2006); S. Jestrovic, Theatre of Estrangement: Theory, Practice, Ideology (2006); D. Robinson, Estrangement and the Somatics of Literature: Tolstoy, Shklovsky, Brecht (2008); Ostranenie, ed. A. Van Den Oever (2010).

Y. Lorman

DEIXIS. Deictics (or shifters, embrayeurs) are features of lang. involving a reference to a specific act of communication in which they are used; deixis is the process of deictic speech. Deictic terms refer to a present situation of utterance and its speaker rather than to a fixed object, concept, or reality. Common deictics are those of time (e.g., now, today), space (e.g., here, this town), person (I, you), and social position (e.g., formal and informal address); but many ling. elements such as demonstratives, verb tenses, and anaphoric articles are potentially deictics, depending on how they refer to the situation of utterance. In each case, the reality to which the deictic term refers is solely a "reality of discourse" (Benveniste): the instance of deixis can be identified only within the discourse that contains it and, therefore, has no meaning except in the context in which it is produced. In lit., and esp. in poetic lang., deictics function as important interpretive devices. By alluding to a real or hypothetical situation of utterance (such as the present moment from which a poem is spoken within its fiction) and relating it to other situations (e.g., a past event that informs that present) or by collapsing such distinctions (as Walt Whitman and *Language poetry often do), deictics are factors in the establishment of a poetic *persona, temporality, and relation to hist.

See linguistics and poetics.

■ U. Weinreich, "On the Semantic Structure of Language," Universals of Language, ed. J. Greenberg (1966); E. Benveniste, Problems in General Linguistics, trans. M. E. Meek (1971); R. Jakobson, "Shifters and Verbal Categories," Jakobson, v. 2; Culler; O. Ducrot and T. Todorov, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Sciences of Language, trans. C. Porter (1979); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991).

N. Pines

DEMOTION. In Eng. versification, when three consecutive syllables or single-syllable words are stressed in a line whose metrical pattern has been securely established—by preceding lines or by a reader/performer's sense of its trad. ("this is a tetrameter stanza"; "these are pentameter lines")—the middle syllable is experienced as "demoted," although it may have exactly the same stress, emphasis, or loudness as the adjacent words or syllables. Derek Attridge states a rule for this demotion thus: "A stressed syllable may realise an offbeat when it occurs between two stressed syllables." The reader/performer recognizes that to maintain the metricality of the work, only the first and third emphasized syllables will "carry the *beat."

E.g., when Thomas Hardy speaks about being undistressed "By hearts grown cold to me," an established expectation of a *trimeter line will demote "grown" between "hearts" and "cold." When Emily Dickinson, writing of agony, says that "The eyes glaze once, and that is Death," the four-beat expectation is realized by the demotion of "glaze."

Demotion can also occur in a second metrical circumstance that Attridge defines as being "after a line-boundary and before a stressed syllable." In Shakespeare's song beginning with the tetrameters "Full fathom five thy father lies; / Of his bones are coral made," the initial stressed word, "Full," is demoted.

Both "after a line-boundary" and "between two stressed syllables" conditions are in play when Alexander Pope's pentameter states that "True ease in writing comes from art, not chance," where a performer can experience demotions of both "True" and "not."

Demotion thus allows these additionally stressed lines better to convey, within the alternations of familiar patterns, Hardy's and Dickinson's heightened emotions, the depth of a father's drowning, and the strength of Pope's conviction about artful writing.

■ Attridge, Rhythms; Carper and Attridge.

T. Carper

DENMARK, POETRY OF. *Rune inscriptions prove the existence of a lost heroic poetry in Denmark, known only from Saxo Grammaticus's Lat. prose and hexameter rendering in Gesta Danorum (ca. 1200). Bjarkamál (The Lay of Bjarke)—whose heroes also appear in the OE poems Widsith and Beowulf—and the so-called Lay of Ingjald celebrate courage and loyalty, reflecting an aristocratic ethos that epitomizes the ideals of the Viking age.

During the Middle Ages (1100–1500), Danish poetry follows the Eur. models of courtly and sacred poetry. In the five lyric poems to the Virgin Mary attributed to Per Räff Lille (ca. 1450–1500), *troubadour influences blend with imagery from the biblical Song of Songs. The anonymous Den danske Rimkrønike (The Danish Rhymed Chronicle), a hist. of the Danish kings, is an important work in Knittelvers*. The dominant genre of the Middle Ages, however, is the folk *ballad, which reached Denmark from France in the early 12th c. In the 16th c., poetry in the vernacular was still med. in spirit and form, notably subject to a growing Ger. influence in the wake of the Lutheran Reformation.

In the 17th c., as the Ren. reached Denmark, efforts were made to create a Danish *national poetry on cl. models. Anders Arrebo (1587–1637) produced a religious epic, Hexaëmeron (ca. 1622, pub. 1661), describing the six days of Creation. Based on Guillaume de Salluste du Bartas's La Sepmaine, it is composed partly in twice-rhymed *hexameter, partly in *alexandrines. The artificiality of the poem's cl.-mythological diction is offset by descriptive details from Scandinavian nature and folk life. Following Martin Opitz's Das Buch der Deutschen Poeterey (The Book of German Poetics, 1624), Hans Mikkelsen Ravn (1610–63) in 1649 published a manual of prosody with illustrations, making available to future poets a varied formal repertoire. Anders Bording (1619–77) is noted for his *anacreontic verse, but he also single-handedly published a rhymed monthly newspaper, Den Danske Mercurius (The Danish Mercury, 1666–77), composed in stately alexandrines. Thomas Kingo (1634–1703), a much greater poet, was able to exploit fully the new formal variety. His principal achievement is his two volumes of church hymns, still sung today, Aandelige Siunge-Koor (Spiritual Choirs, 1674–81). With their thematic counterpoints, sensuous imagery, and often high-strung metaphors, Kingo's hymns are unmistakably *baroque in style, the highlights being his Easter hymns.

In the early 18th c., Fr. neoclassicism entered Danish lit., mainly because of the activity of the Dano-Norwegian Ludvig Holberg (1684–1754). Best known for his bourgeois prose comedies, Holberg in his verse *mock epic Peder Paars (1719–20) showed himself to be a brilliant satirist. The rationalism of Holberg, and of the period, is counterbalanced, however, by a sentimental undercurrent, represented by Ambrosius Stub (1705–58) and Hans Adolf Brorson (1694–1764). Stub practiced a wide variety of genres, from religious lyrics to drinking songs. His concise, graceful form and light, melodious rhythms are influenced by the It. operatic aria, and his delicately picturesque style reveals *rococo features. Brorson, a religious Pietist, also composed hymns in complex meters derived from the elegant rococo aria, with its dialogue and echo effects.

Danish neoclassicism was continued by a group of Norwegian authors living in Copenhagen, members of Det norske Selskab (The Norwegian Society; see NORSKE SELSKAB), while Johannes Ewald (1743–81), a preromantic deeply influenced by the Ger. poet F. G. Klopstock, championed the claims of subjectivity. Ewald's mythological dramas on ON themes are largely forgotten, but his pietistically inspired lyric verse is very much alive. He excelled in the religious ode, exemplified by Rungsteds Lyksaligheder (The Joys of Rungsted, 1773), where nature description is a vehicle for the glorification of God. The only noteworthy poet of the last 20 years of the century was Jens Baggesen (1764–1826), a mercurial spirit who alternated between cl. and romantic sensibility in accordance with the tenor of his personal experience.

Adam Oehlenschläger (1779–1850) achieved the breakthrough of *romanticism in Danish poetry; his first collection, Digte (Poems, 1803), was inspired by the aesthetics of the Jena school of Friedrich Schelling, A. W. Schlegel, and K.W.F Schlegel as mediated by the Copenhagen lectures of Henrich Steffens (1802). These poems signified a fierce rejection of the rationalist spirit of the 18th c., together with a rediscovery of Nordic hist. and mythology and a glorification of the creative genius who alone is capable of a unified view of nature and hist. Oehlenschläger increased his range in Poetiske Skrifter (Poetic Writings, 1805), which contained prose and poetry, narrative cycles, drama, lyric, and ballads and romances in varying meters. After 1806, Oehlenschläger's subjectivism is tempered by the growing influence of J. W. Goethe's and Friedrich Schiller's objective poetry and the Heidelberg romantic school, reorienting his work—as well as Danish lit. generally—toward national and patriotic themes. Nordiske Digte (Nordic Poems, 1807) included several dramas based on ON figures and themes. The narrative cycle Helge (1814), with its impressive array of metrical forms and styles marking subtle shifts of moods, rises to Sophoclean heights in the concluding dramatic episode. Prompted by Oehlenschläger's publication of Digte (1803), A. W. Schack von Staffeldt (1769–1826) published his own collection titled Digte (1804), and later Nye Digte (New Poems, 1808). Staffeldt's poetry, with its emphasis on the poet's longing to bridge the separation between this world and a divine, Platonic world of Ideas, received little attention during his lifetime but is now considered an important contribution to Danish romanticism. The work of another romantic, N.F.S. Grundtvig (1783–1872) was more national in inspiration. Grundtvig, while more a cultural leader than a poet, created an enduring literary monument in his hymns. With their union of humanism and Christianity and their pervasive imagery taken from the Danish landscape and Nordic mythology, they represent a unique poetic achievement.

Around 1830, Danish poetry moved toward greater realism and psychological diversity, its focus shifting from an idealized past to a more complex present. Johan Ludvig Heiberg (1791–1860), the theorist of romantisme, as this movement has been called, managed to shuttle elegantly between actuality and the dream world in his romantic plays. Christian Winther (1796–1876) blended lyric and narrative elements in the *idyll, as in Træsnitt (Woodcuts, 1828). Winther's formal virtuosity is demonstrated in the romance Hjortens Flugt (The Flight of the Hart, 1855), set in med. times and employing a modified *Nibelungenstrophe. The cycle of love poems Til Een (To Someone, 1843, 1849), in which eros is worshipped as a divine force, is notable for its poignant lyricism. The brief lyrics of the Heinrich Heine–inspired Erotiske Situationer (Erotic Situations, 1838) by Emil Aarestrup (1806–56), with their picturesque detail, psychological complexity, and emotional dissonance, express a distinctly mod. sensibility—sophisticated and sensual—and represent a high point in Danish love poetry. While the early work of Frederik Paludan-Müller (1809–76) is fraught with aestheticism, Adam Homo (1841–48), a three-volume novel in verse, embodies a rigorous ethical philosophy. Through its portrait of a gifted, opportunistic antihero who pays for worldly success with the loss of his soul, the book presents a satirical picture of contemp. Danish culture.

After *naturalism was introduced by the critic Georg Brandes (1842–1927) around 1870, writers turned their attention to political, social, and sexual problems—fitter subjects for prose than poetry. Yet Brandes was important to both Jens Peter Jacobsen (1847–85) and Holger Drachmann (1846–1908), each with a distinctive profile as a poet. The sparse but first-rate lyrical production of Jacobsen, known chiefly as a novelist, was published posthumously as Digte og Udkast (Poems and Sketches) in 1886. Unique are his "arabesques," capriciously winding free-verse *monologues—the first modernist poetry in Denmark—whose intellectual probing is veiled in colorful ornamental lang. and evocative moods. The youthful Digte (1872) of Drachmann more directly echoed the radical ideas of Brandes, as in the poem "Engelske Socialister" (English Socialists). But soon Drachmann abandoned ideology for personal lyricism. In Sange ved Havet (Songs by the Sea, 1877), his best collection, the sea is perceived as an image of his own protean spirit. With Sangenes Bog (Book of Songs, 1889) radicalism reappeared, though now tempered by an awareness of age and mutability that lends a poignant existential resonance to the texts. Through his free rhythms and melodiousness, formal inventiveness, and unprecedented range of moods and attitudes, Drachmann renewed the style of romantic verse and made an extraordinary impact on subsequent Danish poetry.

Both Drachmann and Jacobsen, as well as Charles Baudelaire and Paul Verlaine, influenced the neoromantic movement of the 1890s in Danish poetry, which rejected naturalism in favor of an aesthetic demand for beauty and a mystically colored religiosity. Its program was formulated in Taarnet (The Tower, 1893–94), edited by Johannes Jørgensen (1866–1956), who with Stemninger (Moods, 1892) had introduced the dreams and visions of *symbolism into Danish poetry. Jørgensen's later poetry is marked by his 1896 conversion to Catholicism. After 1900, he further refined his condensed mode of expression, employing simple meters and rhythms to express a fervent religiosity. A more consistent follower of Fr. symbolism, as both a metaphysical and an aesthetic theory, was Sophus Claussen (1865–1931). This outlook is evident in his erotic poetry, where the surface sexual theme masks an underlying ontology, one of irreducible opposites. Claussen was deeply concerned with the nature of the creative process and with the poet's role. In his last major collection, Heroica (1925), a highlight of Danish poetry, art and beauty are invoked as the only means of spiritual survival in a materialistic world. Notable is the poem "Atomernes Oprør" (Revolt of the Atoms), a dystopian fantasy in which Claussen shows himself to be the last great master of the hexameter in Danish poetry. Other major neoromantics were Viggo Stuckenberg (1863–1905), Helge Rode (1870–1937), and Ludvig Holstein (1864–1943). While Stuckenberg's melancholy meditations on love's tragedy are executed with an exquisite sense of style, Rode's ethereal poems verge on the ecstatic. The best of Holstein's unadorned lyrics derive from his pantheistic vision of the unity of the human being and nature.

Danish poetry of the 20th c. encompasses diverse currents and styles, determined partly by international vogues, partly by sociopolitical events. The period before World War I replaced the introverted neoromanticism of the 1890s with *realism. A Jutland regional lit. emerged, dominated by Jeppe Aakjær (1866–1930). The central poet of the period, and one of Denmark's greatest writers, was the Nobel Prize winner Johannes V. Jensen (1873–1950). His first collection, Digte (Poems, 1906), a milestone in mod. Danish poetry, centers on a conflict between longing and a zest for life, alternating with Weltschmerz. Characteristic are a number of prose poems in which Jensen voices his worship of 20th-c. technology, together with a yearning for distant places and periods rendered in timeless, mythic images. After 1920, he used more traditional meters as well as alliterative ON forms. Jensen's poetry constitutes a unique blend of precise observation, philosophical reflection, and romantic vision. His innovative poetic *diction, with its incongruous mixture of crass realism and refined sensuousness, bold visionary imagery and muted lyricism, has been enormously influential.

During and after World War I, a generation of poets emerged who, inspired by Jensen and by *expressionism in painting and in Ger. poetry, endeavored to create new forms of beauty. Most sensational was Emil Bønnelycke (1893–1953), whose exuberant zest for life and glorification of technology were expressed in hymnlike prose poems, but Tom Kristensen (1893–1974) was artistically more accomplished. In Fribytterdrømme (Buccaneer Dreams, 1920), Kristensen conveyed the restless spirit and explosive primitivism of the Jazz Age in an orgiastic display of color and sound. In the poem "Reklameskibet" (The Show Boat, 1923), Otto Gelsted (1888–1968) charged expressionist art with pandering to commercialism and neglecting fundamental human concerns from a Marxist point of view.

The poetry of Nis Petersen (1897–1943) and Paul la Cour (1902–56), the dominant figures of the 1930s, is also informed by humanist concerns. Petersen's anguished verse voices concern for the predicament of Western culture. La Cour, whose sensibility was formed by Claussen and mod. Fr. poets, stressed the redemptive nature of poetry. His Fragmenter af en Dagbog (Fragments of a Diary, 1948), which mingles philosophy, poetic theory, and verse, profoundly influenced the poets who came to maturity during the war. The surrealist Jens August Schade (1903–78) defined his attitude to the times by espousing a Lawrencian *primitivism. His Hjertebogen (The Heart Book, 1930) contains sexually explicit love poems, along with nature impressions transformed by erotic feeling and a cosmic imagination.

Under the pressure of war and Nazi occupation, the 1940s instilled new vigor and urgency into Danish poetry. Two distinct responses to the brutality and destructiveness of World War II were evident: an activation of political consciousness, on the one hand, and an intensive quest for a meaningful, often metaphysical worldview, on the other. Inspirational was the work of Gustaf Munch-Petersen (1912–38), a literary existentialist who foreshadowed postwar *modernism; through his death in Spain fighting Fascism, he became the prototype of the committed writer. Possessed by a vision of total union between conscious and subconscious, dream and reality, and stimulated by the *imagism and *surrealism of the Swedish and *Finland-Swedish modernists, Munch-Petersen created a remarkable poetry that expressed a personal myth of self-making and self-liberation. Another paradigmatic poet was Morten Nielsen (1922–44), whose hard, weighty, unfinished verse oscillates between an existentialist affirmation of self and renunciation and death. Closely related to these two figures was Erik Knudsen (1922–2007), who, torn between beauty and politics, increasingly used poetry as the vehicle for a Marxist critique of society.

The central poets of the 1940s, following la Cour, saw poetry as a means of personal and cultural redemption. Striving for a form that would mirror their perception of a fragmented reality, they shaped a richly symbolic style inspired by T. S. Eliot and R. M. Rilke. The absence of a shared cultural and spiritual heritage, together with messianic longings, was most convincingly expressed by a group of poets whose original forum was the jour. Heretica (1948–53). Ole Sarvig (1921–81) and Ole Wivel (1921–2004) both embodied the pattern of rebirth after cultural catastrophe in their poetry, utilizing essentially Christian symbolism. Thorkild Bjørnvig (1918–2004) saw poetry itself as a liberating force. In his first, Rilke-inspired collection, Stjærnen bag Gavlen (The Star behind the Gable, 1947), eros is the predominant theme, treated with classic discipline in stanzas of great musicality and substance. In the 1970s, Bjørnvig changed the focus of his poetry to deal with ecological issues.

Others pursued different paths, unaffected by ideology or metaphysical probing. Tove Ditlevsen (1918–76) followed trad. and wrote rhymed verse in a neoromantic style. Piet Hein (1905–96) in his 20 volumes of Gruk (Grooks, 1940–63) combined scientific insights with a skillful, epigrammatic play of words and ideas. And Frank Jæger (1926–77), an elusive successor to Schade, noted for his verbal wizardry, cultivated the *idyll, though in a broken form with an ominous undertone.

During the 1960s, an extroverted poetic experimentalism emerged, directed both against the materialism of the mod. welfare state and against prevailing ivory-tower literary attitudes. This change was largely due to Klaus Rifbjerg (b. 1931), the most versatile Danish postwar writer. Rifbjerg's verse registers the chaotic plenitude of experience in technological society by means of a fractured syntax and a vast, often technical-scientific vocabulary. Rifbjerg's two early collections Konfrontation (1960), with its photographically precise observations of the mod., technical world, and Camouflage (1961), which draws on cinematic montage and free association in a surrealist search for origins and a liberated self, profoundly affected Danish modernism. The themes of Rifbjerg's many subsequent collections of poetry are diverse and include everyday life, politics, and mythology.

A continuation of the introspective approach of the 1940s is evident in the poetry of Jørgen Sonne (b. 1925), which is marked by intellectual complexity and formal rigor, and Jørgen Gustava Brandt (1929–2006), who used myths and religious symbols to express a longing for epiphany.

In the mid-1960s, a tendency emerged toward ling. experimentation and concretism (see CONCRETE POETRY), the use of words as building blocks possessing intrinsic value, without reference to any other reality. This structuralist approach is present in Romerske Bassiner (Roman Pools, 1963) by the Marxist poet Ivan Malinowski (1926–1989). In the esoteric, systemic texts of Per Højholt (1928–2004), a major figure in Danish poetic modernism, lang. is transformed into intellectually challenging signs and closed symbols. Characteristic for Højholt's experimental and often humorous approach are Poetens hoved (The Poet's Head, 1963), Turbo (1968) and the 12 volumes of his Praksis (Practice, 1977–96) series. In his similarly untraditional and experimental poetry, the very productive Peter Laugesen (b. 1942) uses a genre-defying and self-reflective poetic lang. inspired by *Beat poetry, surrealism, and Zen Buddhism to expose and confront the ideological lang. of power and society. Wordplay and verbal *ambiguity also characterize the popular, witty, and thought-provoking verse of Benny Andersen (b. 1929). Klaus Høeck (b. 1938) uses systematic compositional principles inspired by mathematics, ling., and other forms in his often monumental poetry collections, as in Hjem (Home, 1985), where lang. is recast into complex structures in an attempt to illustrate the poet's striving to define God. Poul Borum (1934–96) connected visual perception with existential reflection. The poetry of Henrik Nordbrandt (b. 1945) often displays a sense of melancholia expressed in paradoxical metaphorical descriptions of an existential interplay between presence and absence.

Inger Christensen (1935–2009) used complex systems and principles to shape her poetry. An important work in Danish modernism, det (it, 1969), incorporates terms from the work of the linguist Viggo Brøndal and is structured according to mathematical systems. In Alfabet (Alphabet, 1981), the alphabet and the Fibonacci sequence (1-2-3-5-8-13-etc.) are used to create a compositional structure. A classic in Danish literature, Sommerfugledalen—et requiem (Butterfly Valley: A Requiem, 1991) combines a received poetic structure, the *sonnet sequence, with mod. and existential themes: life, death, memory, lang.

Following the political and social changes of the late 1960s and early 1970s, Danish poetry became more realistic. The poems of Vita Andersen (b. 1942) revolve around childhood experiences and the workplace, and the collections of Marianne Larsen (b. 1951) analyze sexual repression, class struggle, and imperialism from a feminist perspective.

By the end of the 1970s, a new poetry, frequently referred to as body modernism, began to emerge, building on the ling. experiments of the 1960s but with a focus on the body, city life, and a sense of alienation. F. P. Jac (1955–2008) created a unique poetic lang., breaking up grammatical categories and constructing new words and expressions. Jac's Misfat (1980) is typical for the period with its insistence on erotic and bodily ecstasy as a liberating force and its fascination with the nightlife of the city, themes that also characterize the poetry, both desperate and ecstatic, of Michael Strunge (1958–86). City life is also the preferred environment in City Slang (1981) by Søren Ulrik Thomsen (b. 1956). In Hjemfalden (Reverted, 1991) and Det skabtes vaklen (The Wavering of Creation, 1996), Thomsen reflects on death, loneliness, and aging, using intricate poetic lines. The poetry of Pia Tafdrup (b. 1952) combines the erotic with images of nature in rhythmic, sensuous lang. Dronningeporten (Queen's Gate, 1999) interweaves images of water in nature (sea, river, rain) with an inner emotional landscape.

Danish poetry of the 1990s incorporated ling. and postmod. awareness with an interest in everyday life. In Mellem tænderne (Between the Teeth, 1992), Kirsten Hammann (b. 1965) dismissively describes the body in playful, ironic, and colloquial lang. Pia Juul (b. 1962) experiments with the poetic voice, creating a fragmented, dialogical poetry that mirrors everyday spoken lang. in sagde jeg, siger jeg (I said, I say, 1999). The emotionally charged poetry of Naja Marie Aidt (b. 1963) is centered on everyday life. The complex, hermetic poetry of Simon Grotrian (b. 1961), inspired by surrealism, concretism, and baroque poetry, combines striking poetic images with religious elements.

A multidimensional mix of poetic styles, genres, topics, and influences characterizes the poetry of young Danish poets after 2000. Ursula Andkjær Olsen (b. 1970) plays with lang. by breaking up and reassembling colloquial phrases and *dead metaphors in a combination of styles, commenting on daily life, ideology, politics, commercials, and other topics. Similarly multifaceted and unconventional, in style and content, is kingsize (2006) by Mette Moestrup (b. 1969).

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: Oxford Book of Scandinavian Verse, ed. E. W. Gosse and W. A. Craigie (1925); The Jutland Wind, ed. R. P. Keigwin (1944); In Denmark I Was Born, ed. R. P. Keigwin, 2d ed. (1950); Twentieth-Century Scandinavian Poetry, ed. M. S. Allwood (1950); Modern Danish Poems, ed. K. K. Mogensen, 2d ed. (1951); Danske lyriske digte, ed. M. Brøndsted and M. Paludan (1953); A Harvest of Song, ed. S. D. Rodholm (1953); Den danske Lyrik 1800–1870, ed. F.J.B. Jansen, 2 v. (1961); P. Hein, with J. Arup, Grooks (1966–78); Danish Ballads and Folk Songs, ed. E. Dal (1967); A Book of Danish Ballads, ed. A. Olrik (1968); A Second Book of Danish Verse, ed. C. W. Stork (1968); Anthology of Danish Literature, ed. F.J.B. Jansen and P. M. Mitchell (1971); A Book of Danish Verse, ed. O. Friis (1976); Contemporary Danish Poetry, ed. L. Jensen et al. (1977); F. Paludan-Müller, Adam Homo, trans. S. I. Klass (1980); Seventeen Danish Poets, ed. N. Ingwersen (1981); Scandinavian Ballads, ed. S. H. Rossel (1982); Digte fra 1990'erne, ed. N. Lyngsø (2000); Danske forfatterskaber, ed. S. Mose, P. Nyord, O. Ravn, 4 v. (2005–6); I. Christensen, Alphabet, trans. S. Nied (2001); P. Tafdrup, Queen's Gate, trans. D. McDuff (2001); I. Christensen, Butterfly Valley: A Requiem, trans. S. Nied (2004), and it, trans. S. Nied (2006).

■ Criticism and History: A. Olrik, The Heroic Legends of Denmark (1919); C. S. Petersen and V. Andersen, Illustreret dansk Litteraturhistorie, 4 v. (1924–34); H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Own Day (1929); E. Bredsdorff et al., Introduction to Scandinavian Literature (1951); P. M. Mitchell, A Bibliographical Guide to Danish Literature (1951); J. Claudi, Contemporary Danish Authors (1952); F.J.B. Jansen, "Romantisme européen et romantisme scandinave," L'Âge d'Or (1953); Danske metrikere, ed. A. Arnoltz et al., 2 v. (1953–54); S. M. Kristensen, Dansk litteratur 1918–1952, 7th ed. (1965); and Den dobbelte Eros (1966)—on Danish romanticism; F.J.B. Jansen, Danmarks Digtekunst, 2d ed., 3 v. (1969); Modernismen i dansk litteratur, ed. J. Vosmar, 2d ed. (1969); S. H. Larsen, Systemdigtningen (1971); P. M. Mitchel, History of Danish Literature, 2d ed. (1971); Nordens litteratur, ed. M. Brøndsted, 2 v. (1972); Opgøret med modernismen, ed. T. Brostrøm (1974); Dansk litteraturhistorie, ed. P. H. Traustedt, 2d ed., 6 v. (1976–77); P. Borum, Danish Literature (1979); S. H. Rossel, History of Scandinavian Literature 1870–1980 (1982); Digtning fra 80'erne til 90'erne, ed. A.-M. Mai (1993); P. Stein Larsen, Digtets krystal (1997); and Modernistiske outsidere (1998); Danske digtere i det 20. århundrede, ed. A.-M. Mai, 4th ed., 3 v. (2000); E. Skyum-Nielsen, Engle i sneen (2000); Læsninger i dansk litteratur, ed. P. Schmidt et al., 2d ed., 5 v. (2001); J. Rosiek, Andre spor (2003); E. Skyum-Nielsen, Dansk litteraturhistorie, 1978–2003 (2004); Dansk litteraturs historie, ed. K. P. Mortensen and M. Schack, 5 v. (2006–9).

S. Lyngstad; S. H. Rossel; J. K. Nielsen

DESCORT (Occitan, "discord"). Occitan and OF lyric genre, courtly in substance, heterostrophic in versification. The descort, like the lyric lai*, was constructed from stanzas or versicles, each different from the others but each showing twofold (sometimes three- or fourfold) metrical and musical symmetry. The title referred to this irregularity, to the contrast between lively tunes and melancholy words, and, in one exceptional case, to the five different langs. used in the five stanzas.

■ H. R. Lang, "The Descort in Old Portuguese and Spanish Poetry," Beiträge zur romanischen Philologie: Festschrift Gustav Gröber (1899); I. Frank, Répertoire métrique de la poésie des troubadours, 2 v. (1953–57); J. Maillard, "Problèmes musicaux et littéraires du descort," Mélanges . . . à la mémoire d'István Frank (1957), and Évolution et esthétique du lai lyrique (1963); E. Köhler, GRLMA 2.1B; R. Baum, "Le Descort ou l'anti-chanson," Mélanges de philologie romane . . . Jean Boutière (1971); J. H. Marshall, "The Isostrophic Descort in the Poetry of the Troubadours," RPh 35 (1981); D. Billy, "Le Descort occitan: Réexamen critique du corpus," Revue des langues romanes 87 (1983); Chambers; E. W. Poe, "Lai-descort," Medieval France: An Encyclopedia, ed. W. W. Kibler et al. (1995).

J. H. Marshall

DESCRIPTIVE POETRY

I. Classical and Late Antiquity
II. The Modern Period

I. Classical and Late Antiquity. Descriptive poetry in the West concerns the theory and practice of description in versified texts. Descriptive poetry is not a genre in itself, but descriptive portrayal has always played an important role in verse art, in a trad. reaching back to the oldest surviving poetic texts. Its tenacity is epitomized in Horace's well-known phrase ut pictura poesis* (Ars poetica 361), which, divorced from its context, became a Ren. dictum encapsulating the aspiration of poetry to portray its subject matter quasi-visually. Ultimately, description should be considered as a strategy and an instancing of the doctrine of *imitation (see MIMESIS). Plato's condemnation (Republic 10) of the powerful mimetic arts of epic and tragic poetry as dangerously misleading "copies of copies" was historically superseded by Aristotle's defense of imitation as satisfying a natural instinct for knowledge and instruction, hence, an effective means of learning. This article aims to point out some of the diverse functions of description in Western poetry, recognizing that its presence in Eastern lits. is equally widespread and profound.

In practice, descriptive technique has been applied mainly (1) to the female body, as in the biblical Song of Solomon (1.5, 10, 15; 4.1–7, 10–15; 6.4–7, 10; 7.1–9; but at 1.13–14 and 5.10–16 the man's body is eulogized) and the Fr. blason*; (2) to human surroundings and habitat, whether natural or cultivated landscape or crafted architecture; and (3) to isolated objects, whether utensils or representational works of art.

Cl. rhetoricians elaborated a theory of description (ekphrasis*, descriptio) for practical use, but it was equally applicable, with certain modifications, to poetry. Gr. and Lat. rhetorical handbooks frequently cited poetic examples, esp. *epic, to illustrate their points. Ekphrasis, one of the elementary rhetorical exercises (progymnasmata), was intended to train pupils in the art of "bringing a subject before the eyes [of the audience]." Events and actions unfolding in time were as appropriate to ekphrasis as static entities such as cities, landscapes, and buildings. The mod. distinction between the narrative thread and interpolated descriptive "digressions" does not apply in antiquity. Quintilian (8.3.68–70, quoted by Erasmus, De copia 2.5) shows how the summary phrase "a sacked city" can be expanded to show in action the unfolding process of its devastation in pictorial detail. This example would apply not only to prose oratory but to versified poetry, as can be seen from the fact that the quotations in 6.2.32–33 are all from the Aeneid.

Vividness or enargeia* is the effective quality deriving from poetic description. Both rhetorical and poetic arts connect the subjective faculties of the performer (poet, actor, or orator) who delivers the text to those of the audience. The stimulation of inward vision in the *imagination and the arousal of concomitant feelings are closely linked. The practical aim is to evoke the scene of an action or the situation of an object. Longinus praises passages in tragedy where the poet seems to have been actually present at the scene (De sublimitate 15). The immediacy of the effect of subjective representation is more important than the strict truth of its contents. In poetry, the intended effect was the qualitatively more striking one of ekplexis—astonishment, amazement—which permitted, even encouraged, the depiction of fantastic, supernatural, and mythological creatures such as the Furies, allegorical personifications (e.g., the figure of Discord in Iliad 4.442, which is praised at the expense of the description of Strife in the pseudo-Hesiodic Shield of Herakles in De sublimitate 9), and powerful events such as the battle of the Titans in the Gigantomachia.

Aristotle (Rhetoric 1411b–1412a) always uses the adverbial phrase "before the eyes" (pro ommathon) as a concrete synonym for the abstract notion of "vivid(ness)." And he goes further in asserting that this quality produces an effect of "actuality": the Gr. term is energeia; and lexical confusion with enargeia may stem from this source. The aim of such representation remains that of vitality. Aristotle recommends the use of adjectives of visual or tactile qualities and even more of verbs of motion (esp. present participles) and adverbial phrases representing active movement. He draws his examples from Euripides and Homer.

The Homeric poems were composed long before any extant rhetorical handbook, yet they are full of vividly described events and places. The most famous descriptive passage in Homer is indubitably the ekphrasis of the shield of Achilles in Iliad 18. The account of the object is presented in a narrative form: Homer depicts Hephaestus actually making the object and describes the scenes on the shield as if they were unfolding in time. Poetry, thus, invests static spatial objects with vitality by transfusing into them its own rhythmic, temporal succession.

Such use of description for vividly heightened narrative and for pictorial set pieces can be found throughout the hist. of epic in authors such as Apollonius of Rhodes, Nonnus, and Virgil. Virgil adopts Homer's device of the shield (Aeneid 8) but takes the finished object as the point of departure for his description. He takes each scene portrayed as the occasion for a prophetic excursus on the future glory of Rome. Different kinds of allegorical exegesis were applied to Homer's descriptions by late antique interpreters (e.g. Porphyry, On the Cave of the Nymphs). Allegorical significance was detected in Virgil's (descriptive) *pastoral poetry by Servius and others.

The highly polished, smaller-scale genres such as the *epigram, pastoral, and *epyllion developed in the Hellenistic age also made use of concentrated description, usually of places and scenes, as in Theocritus's Idylls. The physical characteristics and attributes of the pastoral context are explicitly described either by the author or in the speech of the characters (see ECLOGUE; IDYLL). Here, descriptions constitute a nostalgic evocation of a state of rustic innocence remote from urban life, mores, and lit. But the bucolic locus amoenus might equally stand for quiet leisure, necessary for sophisticated poetic learning, a simple, agreeable metaphor for otium (see BUCOLIC, GEORGIC). In Roman poetry, this theme is developed in accounts of the Golden Age such as in Virgil's fourth Eclogue, Horace's 16th Epode, and, with irony, in Catullus 64.

Isolated objects such as a rustic cup (Theocritus, Idylls 1.27–56), a ship ("Phaselus ille," Catullus 4; Horace, Odes 1.3) or a water droplet caught in a crystal (Claudian, Epigrams 4.2.12, a set of nine different descriptions of the same thing) can be found alongside poems addressed to (and evocative of) real places ("O funde noster," Catullus 44; "O Colonia," Catullus 17) or imagined locations, like the Palace of the Sun and the dwellings of Sleep and Fame in Ovid's Metamorphoses.

In descriptions of weather, meteorological eulogy (e.g., of spring, Horace, Odes 1.4) may be developed as political allegory (e.g., storms as a metaphor for civic turbulence: Horace, Odes 1.2), as observations on the social economics of agriculture (Odes 2.15), or as a parable of Fortune and her consolations (Odes 1.9); this practice is still evident in the 19th c.

The use of description in dramatic action finds its natural function in evoking absent scenes (remote in time and space), and esp. in messenger speeches that describe a (usually violent) action that has taken place offstage. Where this device includes reported speech, it is related to the progymnasma called prosopopoeia* or ethopoeia, which consists of a re-creation of the words of an individual in a certain situation (see ETHOS), an exercise that would have trained an author in the composition of pithy, highly characteristic, direct speech. Longinus cites passages from tragedy to illustrate the dramatic effect of description and to underline the need for the poet to use the visual imagination in the composition process (De sublimitate 15). In Euripides' Hecuba (444–83), the chorus of captive Trojan women contrasts the beautiful images of their memories of the sea, the sun, and the winds with the misery of their present plight and surroundings. Talthybius then enters to relate (518–82) the sacrifice—or murder—of Polyxena by Neoptolemos, son of Achilles. His speech is full of vivid descriptive detail; and his representation of Polyxena's physical beauty, her decorous pudeur, and radiant nobility (557–70) evokes *pathos by the intensity of its contrast with the barbarity of the act.

The importance of description in intensifying the rhetorical effect and dramatic impact of messenger speeches is attested by Erasmus (De copia 2.5; rev. 1532 ed.) as part of his analysis of description as a powerful device of oratory in all prose and verse genres. Erasmus's treatment includes four divisions: descriptio rei, personae, loci, and temporis. He cites examples from lyric, dramatic, and epic poetry, as well as from prose speeches, historiography, and "natural science." It remains the most comprehensive classicizing Ren. survey.

*Didactic poetry such as Hesiod's Works and Days, Lucretius' De rerum natura, and Virgil's Georgics uses descriptive passages and *personification to invest the subject matter with immediacy and vitality. Such appeals to the visual imagination may also have reinforced the poets' didactic intentions since ancient memory techniques relied on visualization to store information in the form of images.

In the early centuries CE, parallel devels. can be seen in the use of description in poetry and rhet. Under the Roman Empire, rhet. changed from a practical instrument used in courtrooms—and, thus, directly concerned with real human actions—to a highly sophisticated art form, a display of the orator's skill and ingenuity. Judicial rhet. is replaced by epideictic. School exercises such as ekphrasis became an end in themselves rather than a means. Speeches were often composed for particular occasions to praise objects such as cities, temples, or civic landmarks. Statius's Silvae—a collection of poems describing villas, statues, society weddings—illustrates the use of description in poetry for similar ends (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY).

In Byzantium, which continued the trad. of ancient epideictic, versified poetry often replaced prose rhet.: long ekphraseis were composed in poetic meter using a literary, quasi-Homeric lang. Paul the Silentiary's verse ekphrasis of Hagia Sophia was publicly recited, like an epideictic speech, at the second consecration of the church in 563. Like prose ekphraseis, these metrical works reproduce a viewer's sense impressions of the building (glittering gold, variegated marble) and expound its spiritual significance, thus translating the inner response to the subject matter or its figural decoration of biblical scenes. These inward reactions are described in a radically subjective manner: they do not normally provide accurate information as to the exact appearance of the object. Nor are they exact in the archaeological sense, permitting the detailed and precise reconstruction of an original. This is a legacy of the emotive function of description in rhet., where vraisemblance is more important than truth to nature.

II. The Modern Period. Descriptive technique is crucial to the effect of Ren. epic. In TorquatoTasso's Gerusalemme liberata, the interpenetration of vivid imagery, pictorial intensity, and psychological discernment powerfully emphasizes the seriousness of Rinaldo's desertion and reconversion. The fantastic, mythic-encyclopedic vision of the "Mediterranean" (canto 15), the enchanted palace and gardens of Armida (15, 16), and the picturesque review of the Egyptian armies (17) are all resolved into the transfiguration of Rinaldo (canto 18).

Ancient pastoral was revived in Ren. Neo-Lat. eclogues (Petrarch, Boccaccio) and in long poems such as Jacopo Sannazaro's Arcadia. In England, Philip Sidney also wrote an Arcadia, and Edmund Spenser used descriptive technique in evoking the surroundings of the "Bower of Bliss" episode in The Faerie Queene. John Milton composed pastoral poems in both Lat. ("Damon") and Eng. ("Lycidas") and used the pastoral setting for his depiction of Eden in Paradise Lost (4.689 ff.). But the whole epic is permeated by startling descriptive and visual style: Satan's call-to-arms ("Pandaemonium," 1.283 ff.) of his legions and their terrestrial advance (4.205 ff.), the portrayal of Raphael (5.246 ff.), and Michael's representation to Adam of a vision of the future course of hist. down to the Flood (bks. 11, 12) are all splendid examples, as is Satan's temptation of Christ in Paradise Regain'd (4.25 ff.).

In the 17th c., Nicolas Boileau (L'Art poétique 3.258 ff.) recommended a rich and sensuous elegance in description so as to avoid tedium, inertia, and cold melancholy and to relieve the austerity of the severe high style in epic and romance. Here too, description should enliven narrative. Boileau's acknowledged master is Homer. Jean Racine's messenger speeches (récits) are also animated through description (Phèdre 5.6.1498–1592; Andromaque 5.3.1496–1524; Iphigénie 5.6.1734–90).

Perhaps the finest example, in this period, of description functioning as laudatory rhet. is Jean de La Fontaine's long (though incomplete) Le Songe de Vaux (1659–61), which describes the architecture and gardens of Nicolas Fouquet's Château of Vaux-le-Vicomte and the spectacular celebrations prepared there for Louis XIV in 1661. The poem was intended as a monument in verse to Fouquet's worldly glory and munificence. The close relation in antiquity between ekphrasis/descriptio and encomion/laus is preserved in Fr. 17th-c. *classicism. Of equal interest is the cycle of odes by Racine, Le Paysage, which describes a journey on foot to a Jansenist convent. It is a eulogy of the retired, contemplative religious life, couched in the pastoral terms of the idyll.

In Germany, the most significant text on poetic description to appear is G. E. Lessing's Laokoön (1766), which, although it had immediate polemical intent in a dispute with Johann Winckelmann, presents a pivotal analysis of the effects of poetry in comparison with painting and sculpture. Lessing quotes the epigrammatic statement attributed by Plutarch to Simonides, "painting is dumb poetry and poetry speaking painting," to show that, although there may be similarity or even identity of mental and spiritual effect ("vollkommene Ähnlichkeit der Wirkung") between two different arts, their technical systems of construction and expression remain irreducibly different. Lessing exemplifies his theoretical exposition by citing examples from Virgil and Homer, but he draws on a formidable range of cl. sources, as well as citing Ludovico Ariosto, Milton, and Alexander Pope. The Laokoön is arguably the fundamental Western text for any appraisal of poetic description.

J. W. Goethe rarely presents such full description as can be found in Ilmenau (which like Zueignung continues a moral allegory) or Ein zärtlich jugendlicher Kunimer; but Harzreise im Winter shows more typically how vivid sense perception, subjective emotion, and moral reflection are everywhere interwoven in the fabric of Goethe's poetry. A couplet from the seventh Roman Elegy ("Now the sheen of the brighter ether illumines the stars; Phoebus the god calls forth forms and colors") shows how closely his poetic eye informs the "Theory of Colors" (Farbenlehre). And the light-hearted parable Amor als Landschaftsmaler puts in a humorous light Goethe's intuitive sense that Eros is the motivating force in art as well as in nature.

In the Eng. 18th c., James Thomson's The Seasons (1730) initiated a literary fashion for poems describing the working conditions and settings of agricultural life, the pictorial elements of landscape, anecdotal details of rustic existence, and humanity's relation to nature. But the specific genre of topographical poetry was not recognized until 1779, when Samuel Johnson characterized it as "local poetry, of which the fundamental subject is some particular landscape . . . with the addition of such embellishments as may be supplied by historical retrospection, or incidental meditation" (Life of Denham); this prescription of landscape as subject matter restricts the wide historical application of the inherent power of vivid description of all kinds of objects. Hence, the genre needed to be sustained by strength of style. Dr. Johnson's observations were made in regard to John Denham's "Cooper's Hill" (1642); and indeed, he found Denham's style to possess compact strength and concision. Denham had made paraphrastic trans. of Virgil in 1636, and some bucolic fragments of these found their way into "Cooper's Hill" (Bush).

In the hands of William Wordsworth, the technical limits and psychological distinctions of sense perception respected by earlier writers are dissolved. The early poems An Evening Walk and Descriptive Sketches (1793) show an attention to natural detail close to 18th-c. practice. But the tendency in "Tintern Abbey," the "Intimations" ode, and The Prelude (e.g., the opening of bks. 6 and 12) is to dissolve the separate boundaries of sense and cognition so as to achieve an utterly subjective union with an undifferentiated pantheistic nature. This utterly inward response to nature took to an extreme Johnson's recommendation to include in descriptive poetry the fruits of "incidental meditation"; and in so doing, it spelled the end of the topographical poem as such. Wordsworth's response is rapturous and utterly involving, but he rarely provides the common natural details of description for the reader to absorb and process mentally and so to translate into congruent images.

In Germany, Heinrich Heine's Die Harzreise (1824) and Die Nordsee (1825–26) show that the confrontation of a traveler on foot with the natural landscape in the hills or on the coast could still form the basis for an extended cyclical poem. But the concrete representation of landscape tends to fragment into a series of vignettes that cohere only by virtue of the underlying current of the poet's subjective response. The telling descriptive detail used by Friedrich Hölderlin and Eduard Mörike always serves the ends of emotion or of metaphysical speculation. Mörike's fantasy island landscape of Orphid and Hölderlin's baffling Hälfte des Lebens are two instances of descriptive evocation utterly dissimilar in approach.

For various mod. poets (Charles Baudelaire, Stéphane Mallarmé, T. S. Eliot, George Seferis, W. H. Auden, R. M. Rilke, Yves Bonnefoy), the descriptive values of image and *metaphor can be seen as an essential quality in poetic perception. Trace elements of sensation, drawn from experience and recombined to form images, are presented so as to stimulate vivid awareness of the external world or to express particular, sometimes extreme inner states. The result is a kind of "psychological description" (as detected by De Robertis in Giacomo Leopardi's Canti) that portrays an "interior landscape," the Weltinnenraum of Rilke, or the spiritual pilgrimage toward Bonnefoy's arrière-pays. Even the ekphrastic poems-about-paintings of Bruno Tolentino ("About the Hunt," "Those Strange Hunters") contain more of the reflective "embellishments . . . of incidental meditation," i.e., of imaginative appraisal of the subject matter, than an accurate verbal reconstitution of their subjects' physical construction. For C. P. Cavafy, too, the act of radically subjective appropriation is the kernel of vivid poetic narrative: "You won't encounter [Odysseus' adventures] unless you carry them within your soul, unless your soul sets them up in front of you" (Ithaka). And Giuseppe Ungaretti's "Choruses Descriptive of Dido's States of Mind" (La Terra promessa) attempt a direct physiognomy of the soul rather than of the external symptoms of emotion.

The mod. rural descriptions and nature poems of R. S. Thomas, Seamus Heaney, Ted Hughes, and Charles Tomlinson show neither the sophisticated pastoral ease of the urbanite at leisure nor the pantheist fervor of an idealizing imagination such as Wordsworth's, but rather a grim confrontation with the pitiless harshness, even brutality, of the natural world they observe. They describe unsentimentally the struggle for survival within the animal kingdom and the dogged, heroic resistance of real farmers to nature's destructive power.

Altogether, description on a broad canvas, elaborate, explicit, and comprehensive in scope, was probably less common in 19th- and 20th-c. poetry than concentration on intensity of descriptive detail in the imagery of lyric. And while the persistence of certain conventional themes, which create the fictional assumption of a travel jour. or pilgrimage, or of a poetic monument to a piece of architecture or sculpture or of a versified record of a geographical or topographical survey may give the initial impression that there is a specifically descriptive genre, there is, in fact, always another governing intention (moralizing, didactic, persuasive, emotive) that is served, rather than conditioned, by the technique of description, which is rather to be considered as a rhetorical-poetic strategy to be applied in genres established on other grounds, as occasion demands.

See ICONOLOGY, IMAGE, IMAGERY, NATURE, PAINTING AND POETRY, SCULPTURE AND POETRY.

■ E. W. Manwaring, Italian Landscape in 18th-Century England (1925); M. Cameron, L'Influence des 'Saisons' de Thomson sur la poésie descriptive en France (1759–1810) (1927); R. A. Aubin, Topographical Poetry in 18th-Century England (1936); D. Bush, English Literature in the Earlier 17th Century (1945); G. De Robertis, Saggio sul Leopardi (1960); R. L. Renwick, English Literature 1789–1815 (1963); J. Arthos, The Language of Description in 18th-Century Poetry (1966); A. Roper, Arnold's Poetic Landscapes (1969); J. W. Foster, "A Redefinition of Topographical Poetry," JEGP 69 (1970); G. Genette, Figures III (1972); P. Hamon, "Qu'est-ce qu'une description?" Poétique 2 (1972); H. H. Richmond, Renaissance Landscapes: English Lyrics in a European Tradition (1973); J. B. Spencer, Heroic Nature: Ideal Landscape in English Poetry from Marvell to Thomson (1973); R. Williams, The Country and the City (1973); J. Gitzon, "British Nature Poetry Now," MidwestQ 15 (1974); E. Guitton, Jacques Delille (1738–1813) et le Poème de la nature en France de 1750 à 1820 (1974); D. Lodge, "Types of Description," The Modes of Modern Writing (1977); J. G. Turner, The Politics of Landscape: Rural Scenery and Society in English Poetry, 1630–1660 (1979); B. Peucker, "The Poem as Place," PMLA 96 (1981)—the lyric; "Towards a Theory of Description," ed. J. Kittay, YFS 62, spec. iss. (1981); R. Barthes et al., Littérature et réalité (1982); A. Reed, Romantic Weather (1983); C.-G. Dubois, "Itinéraires et impasses dans la vive représentation au XVIe siècle," Litt. de la Ren. (1984); J.A.W. Heffernan, The Re-Creation of Landscape (1984); D. E. Wellerby, Lessing's "Laocöon": Semiotics and Aesthetics in the Age of Reason (1984); J. Applewhite, Seas and Inland Journeys: Landscape and Consciousness from Wordsworth to Roethke (1986); J. Holden, "Landscape Poems," Denver Quarterly 20–21 (1986); E. W. Leach, The Rhetoric of Space: Literary and Artistic Representations of Landscape in Republican and Augustan Rome (1988); B. Costello, Shifting Ground: Reinventing Landscape in Modern American Poetry (2003); A. Fletcher, New Theory for American Poetry (2004); K. Goodman, Georgic Modernity and British Romanticism (2004); W. Spiegelman, How Poets See the World: The Art of Description in Contemporary Poetry (2005); J. Koelb, The Poetics of Description (2006); B. Costello, Planets on Tables: Poetry, Still Life, and the Turning World (2008).

R. H. WEBB; P. WELLER

DEVOTIONAL POETRY. Although the distinction between religious poetry in general and devotional poetry in particular is never absolute, devotional poetry is often recognizable for its tendency to address a divinity, a sacred thing, or a religious figure. Poetic addresses with religious meaning constitute part of the sacred lit. of many religions, and they often influence later trads. in devotional poetry. Because of its reliance on poetic *address, devotional poetry shows a close kinship with *lyric poetry, and it often uses an intimate, first-person voice. Yet this first person may stand for a community rather than an individual, and devotional poetry, esp. when sung or chanted, may serve liturgical functions. This article concentrates on devotional poetry in Hinduism, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. In general and in this article, the term excludes polemical and homiletic poetry, as well as *epics and other long narrative forms, though these may include devotional forms and serve devotional purposes.

Much devotional poetry portrays the relation to the divine in terms of wonder and praise, but some concerns painful experiences of affliction, guilt, unfulfilled longing, estrangement, and doubt. Its most common forms are prayer, meditation, and *hymn; and its purposes include praise (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY), supplication, *complaint, *lament, consolation, self-examination, and confession. How the divine is experienced and understood—whether as master, parent, lover, judge, king, confessor, creator, teacher, savior, or friend—often determines the poetic mode by which it is addressed, and this mode in turn determines the classes of thoughts and feelings that the poetry expresses.

Many devotional trads. employ a highly metaphorical lang. to describe experiences of the unseen. In general, such lang. reflects the representational challenge posed by devotional poetry's central concern with the relationship between human and divine, body and soul. Specific metaphors, esp. those drawn from erotic experience and from human governmental and disciplinary structures, suggest links between devotion and these areas of experience, though the significance of these links varies.

The Hindu devotional trad. begins with the Rig Veda, a collection of Sanskrit hymns, prayers, and supplications possibly dating to the 15th c. BCE. The Rig Veda is one of the four Vedas, the most sacred texts of the Hindu religion, and it is thought that its verses were recited by Vedic priests during ritual sacrifices. The most important influence on Indian devotional poetry since antiquity was the Bhakti movement, which began around the 6th c. CE in the Tamil-speaking south and spread through northern India over the next thousand years, enriching lit. in many langs (see INDIA, POETRY OF). The movement emphasized inner experience over external forms, and universal access to God over control by a priestly hierarchy. Bhakti poet-saints incl. Kabīr (15th c.) and Sūrdās (16th c.) have influenced such mod. writers as Rabindranath Tagore and Robert Bly.

The Heb. Bible also contains important poetic texts, incl. the Song of Solomon, which trad. has taken to license the erotic expression of devotional feeling; the book of Job, an important source for later poetry of affliction; and, above all, the Psalms, which mix confession with praise, supplication with thanksgiving, and fear with love, sometimes in a tone of bold familiarity (see PSALM; PSALMS, METRICAL). Later Heb. devotional poetry, such as that of Solomon Ibn Gabirol (ca. 1021–55) and Jehudah Halevi (ca. 1074–1141), the two greatest poets of the Heb. Golden Age in Spain, remains deeply biblical. Gabirol's Keter Malkhut (Kingly Crown) combines numerous themes of the Psalms: praise for God's attributes and the work of creation, the contrast between God's magnificence and the speaker's sin and insignificance, the hope of mercy, the recognition of God's wrath, and gratitude for God's goodness in saving the speaker.

Christian devotional poetry is also greatly indebted to biblical models such as the Psalms, esp. the seven *penitential psalms, as well as to early Christian hymns such as those of Prudentius and Ambrose (both 4th c.). To the themes of the psalter, Christian poetry adds an emphasis on absolution and redemption through the Incarnation, Passion, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ; Roman Catholic poetry also meditates on the lives of the saints and the Virgin Mary. The doctrinal controversies and spiritual intensity of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation reinvigorated Christian verse. Biblical forms and themes mixed with new devotional practices and with courtly forms such as the *sonnet and the Ren. lyric to produce, in the vernacular lits. of Europe, many of Christian poetry's highest achievements. These include the stirring hymns of Martin Luther in Germany; the mystic journey of St. John of the Cross's Noche oscura del alma (Dark Night of the Soul) in Spain; the metrical psalters composed by Clément Marot and Théodore de Beza in France and by Philip Sidney and Mary Sidney in England; the spiritual sonnets and religious lyrics of John Donne, George Herbert, and many others in England; and the late *metaphysical poetry of Edward Taylor's Preparatory Meditations in colonial New England. Victorian poets such as G. M. Hopkins also wrote distinguished devotional verse.

Although several verses in the Qurʾan criticize poets (26:224–26), the following verse (26:227) allows for exceptions; and in the 9th and again in the 13th c., Sufi mystics developed an exceptional body of poetry expressing a personal, loving relationship to Allah. Thirteenth-c. Sufi poets include Ibn al-Arabī, Ibn al-Fāriḍ (both Arabic), and Rūmī (Persian), whose central theme is perhaps the power of divine love to transcend cultural and religious differences. Also important in Islam is the qaṣīda*, or praise poem, which was adapted to express devotion to the Prophet Muhammad, typically celebrating his birth, attributes, exploits, and powers. The most famous example is the "Qaṣīdat al-Burdah" (The Mantle) of the Egyptian Sufi poet al-Būṣīrī (ca. 1212–96), itself modeled on the 7th-c. poem of the same name said to have been presented to Muhammad by Kaʿb ibn Zuhayr.

Devotional poetry has traditionally been one of the literary forms most available to women, and female poets have made important contributions to most of its trads. Rābiʿah al-ʿAdawīyah (d. 801) profoundly influenced the devel. of Sufi devotional poetry by introducing its emphasis on love and mystic union.

Kāraikkāl Ammaiyār (6th c.), a devotee of Śiva, was an early Tamil Bhakti poet-saint. Mīrābāī (15th c.) remains one of the most beloved poet-saints of the later Bhakti trad.; her emphasis on Krishna's physical beauty and her desire to share her bridal bed with him raise questions about the gender of devotion. The Christian devotional revival of the 16th and 17th cs. drew notable contributions from St. Teresa of Ávila in Spain; Gabrielle de Coignard and Anne de Marquets in France; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz in Mexico; and Aemilia Lanyer, An Collins, and Hester Pulter in England. Christina Rossetti is second in reputation only to Hopkins among practitioners of the Victorian devotional lyric. Emily Dickinson treats many devotional themes while tending more toward uncertainty than to the comforts of faith.

Dickinson anticipates an important trend in 20th-c. devotional poetry. Some poets have reacted to the modernist themes of the crisis of civilization and the death of God by amplifying the elements of complaint and doubt already present in many devotional trads. Wallace Stevens's "Sunday Morning," T. S. Eliot's Four Quartets, Anthony Hecht's "Rites and Ceremonies," and Louise Glück's The Wild Iris ask more questions than they answer, showing that devotional poetry can be written in the interrogative mood.

See LITURGICAL POETRY, RELIGION AND POETRY.

■ H. Brémond, Prière et Poésie (1926); L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation (1954); W. T. Noon, Poetry and Prayer (1967); R. Woolf, The English Religious Lyric in the Middle Ages (1968); T. Cave, Devotional Poetry in France, c. 1570–1613 (1969); B. K. Lewalski, Protestant Poetics and the Seventeenth-Century Religious Lyric (1979); G. B. Tennyson, Victorian Devotional Poetry (1981); A. Schimmel, Mystical Poetry in Islam (1982); R. Strier, Love Known (1983); R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (1985); P. S. Diehl, The Medieval European Religious Lyric: An Ars Poetica (1985); N. Cutler, The Poetics of Tamil Devotion (1987); J. N. Wall, Transformations of the Word: Spenser, Herbert, Vaughan (1988); M. Schoenfeldt, Prayer and Power (1991); R. Rambuss, Closet Devotions (1998); R. Targoff, Common Prayer: The Language of Public Devotion in Early Modern England (2001); F. B. Brown et al., "Poetry," The Encyclopedia of Religion, ed. L. Jones, 2d ed. (2005); J. S. Hawley, Three Bhakti Voices (2005).

K.J.E. GRAHAM

DHVANI (Sanskrit, "suggestion," "sound"). The origin of the dhvani school in Sanskrit poetry is lost in obscurity. But it is Ānandavardhana (820–90) who developed the theory of dhvani into an elaborate system, assimilating in the process all the earlier theories of poetry such as rasa (flavor), alaṃkāra* (*ornament), and rīti (a theory of the lang. of lit.), and propounded that dhvani or suggestion is the soul of poetry: kāvyasyātmā dhvani. The doctrine is based on the threefold power of the word, abhidhā, lakṣanā, and vyāñjanā, producing, respectively, three kinds of meaning: vācyārtha (the literal meaning), lakṣanārtha (the figurative meaning, developed through a *trope), and vyāñjanārtha (the suggested meaning, which subsumes and replaces the earlier two meanings). The vyāñjanā consists not in the utterance of something new but in suddenly revealing, almost in a flash, what is already there, as a jar is revealed when a lamp is lit. According to Ānandavardhana, dhvani is not something mystical but is grasped by disciplined readers of poetry. It is an all-embracing principle that explains the structure and functions of all the other schools—alaṃkāra, rīti, rasa, etc. Rasa, e.g., is only the effect of dhvani. The poetry of suggestion is regarded by many Sanskrit poetic theorists, anticipating the poetics of *symbolism in 19th-c. France, as more powerful than the poetry of description.

See SANSKRIT POETICS, SANSKRIT POETRY.

■ Daṇḍin, Kāvyādarśa (1924); Vāmana, Kāvyālaṃkārasūtra (1928); Bharata, Nāṭyaśāstra (1950); P. V. Kane, Sāhityadarpaṇa: Paricchedas I, II, X Arthālaṃkāra with Exhaustive Notes (1965); Rudraṭa, Kāvyālaṃkāra (1965); Ruyyaka, Alaṃkārasarvaśva (1965); R. Mukherji, Literary Criticism in Ancient India (1966); Bhāmaha, Kāvyālaṃkāra (1970); Dhvanyāloka of Ānandavardhana, ed. K. Krishnamoorthy (1974); S. K. De, History of Sanskrit Poetics (1976); K. Kapoor, Literary Theory: Indian Conceptual Framework (1998); B. Pal, Alamkāra-Vicintā (2007).

M. K. RAY

DIAERESIS, also spelled "dieresis" (Gr., "division"). Refers either to the division between successive vowels within a word or, in cl. prosody, to the coincidence of word end with the end of a metrical foot. In the former meaning, the term denotes both the phenomenon itself and the accent once used commonly to mark it: e.g., "naïve." In the latter meaning, it is used to distinguish a metrical pause between two feet from a pause within a foot, known as a *caesura. West has pointed out that this is a mod. extension of Quintilian's use of the term, but it is valuable nonetheless, particularly in analyzing dactylic hexameters. The diaeresis at the end of the fourth foot is commonly referred to as "bucolic" by virtue of its frequency in Hellenistic *bucolic poetry. However, the major precedent for this diaeresis is to be found in Homer's epic, where it occurs in more than 60% of his verse. A syntactic pause at the bucolic diaeresis can often lead to various poetic effects, such as *enjambment. David has suggested that the bucolic diaeresis reflects a continuation between epic and mod. Gr. dance, but this remains controversial. This diaeresis, in its function as a secondary or "late" caesura often leading to enjambment, can also be seen as an influence on mod. poetry, such as the opening lines of T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land.

■ J. Halporn et al.; M. L. West, "Three Topics in Greek Metre," CQ 32 (1982); M. Clark, Out of Line (1997); A. P. David, The Dance of the Muses (2006).

R. A. HORNSBY; T.V.F. BROGAN; D. KUTZKO

DIALECT POETRY. A dialect is a particular way of speaking and writing a lang. Although there is no test to determine precisely when a set of conventions becomes a dialect or when a dialect becomes a discrete lang., a dialect is generally understood to possess a distinctive grammar, vocabulary, and pronunciation that may or may not be intelligible to other speakers of the lang. Dialects are often identified with ethnic groups, social classes, or geographic regions within cultures or nation-states, and they are thought to emerge historically from social or territorial separation. Several dialects may coexist on relatively equal footing within a lang., but, more often, one set of conventions (usually that of the ruling class or the most powerful region or ethnic group) predominates and is institutionalized as the standard lang. Consequently, dialects may be stigmatized as uneducated or provincial ways of speaking, although they may also be praised for possessing a vigor and authenticity that the standard lang. lacks.

Although every lang. has dialects, dialect lits. have developed only in certain langs. (diglossic langs. such as Chinese or Ar., for instance, tend not to have dialect lits., despite having a huge range of dialects). A dialect poem is a composition in a poetic genre that uses ling. conventions different from the conventions of the standard lang. and specific to an identifiable region, class, or ethnic group. Because dialects may possess idiosyncratic vocabularies and also variant pronunciations, dialect poems may be recognized by their use of characteristic words and expressions, as well as by unconventional orthography. The orthographic variations take two forms: cacography, or "eye-dialect," which provides nonstandard spellings without fundamental changes to pronunciation (such as "sez" for "says") and is thus a phenomenon of print; and phonetic spelling, which denotes a distinct pronunciation (such as "gwine" for "going"). The orthographic conventions that often strikingly identify a dialect poem also raise the question of whether dialect poetry is best understood as an oral- or print-mediated lit. Although dialect poetry may use phonetic spellings to convey distinctive speech accents, the print materiality that creates dialect poetry's aural significations indicates that dialect poems should not be understood as exclusively, or even originally, orally mediated forms of expression. It may be more helpful to think of dialect poems generically, as recognizable kinds of writing meant to signal identifiable modes of speaking.

Early instances of dialect poetry come from cl. Gr., which was composed in four dialects—Ionic, Attic, Aeolic, and Doric—each of which became so strongly associated with specific genres that poets used the dialect appropriate to the genre, not necessarily their native dialect. The Homeric epics were composed in Ionic, the dialect of western Asia Minor; Ionic Gr. became associated with *epic poetry and the *dactylic hexameter line. By the cl. period, Ionic had merged with Attic Gr., spoken in Athens. Attic, the prestige lang. of Hellenism after the Alexandrian conquests, was the lang. of the tragedians, and it became identified with the drama and a refined purity and elegance of style. Aeolic, described as "barbarous" in Plato's Protagoras, was spoken around Lesbos and was used by Sappho and Alcaeus. Aeolic became associated with *lyric and *melic poetry, with *glyconic meter, the hendecasyllabic line, and the *sapphic and *alcaic stanzas. The choral *ode developed out of Doric Gr., the dialect of the western and southern Aegean, which was considered a broad and rustic style of speaking. The most celebrated Doric poet was Theocritus, the founder of *pastoral poetry. A rougher "Doric" style would henceforth characterize the bucolic poetry of later centuries.

Although the speaking of Lat. differed widely across the Roman imperium, no dialect lits. developed. The growth of the Lat.-derived Romance langs. slowly gave rise to vernacular lits.: though written in Lat., Dante's De vulgari eloquentia (ca. 1304) defended vernacular langs. as appropriate vehicles for poetry and song. Strictly speaking, all med. Eur. lit. in the vernacular was composed in dialect, since ling. standardizations did not begin in earnest until the 17th c.

Since the 18th c., lang. has been closely affiliated with social and national identity, and lit. has accrued significance as the carrier of a community's sense of itself. In consequence, ling. policies often oscillate between efforts to maintain "pure" literary standards through centralized institutions (such as the Académie Française or the Turkish Lang. Assoc.) and efforts to protect local and distinctive ways of speaking (as in the UNESCO initiative on endangered langs.). Within the framework of mod. literary and ling. nationalism, dialect lit. has held varied political and social meanings, at times celebrated for embodying an authenticity or identity specific to a nation's imagined trads., at other times, particularly moments of crisis, boding the danger of corruption or fragmentation within the communal order.

Fr. is one case of sharp distinction between the centralized regulation of lang. and a profusion of dialects at the peripheries. OF grew from a combination of Lat. and Celtic langs. and was split between the langues d'öil of northern France and the langues d'oc of the south. Lyric poetry came primarily from the southern *troubadours, who composed songs on courtly love in the Occitan dialects, and the northern trouvères, who used the Norman dialects. The chansons de geste and the romans, epic song cycles like the Arthurian romances, also came from the northern dialects, which became the primary dialect of med. Fr. poetry in forms like the *ballade, rondeau, aubade, and lai. In 1539, Francis I decreed that a composite version of the northern dialects would be the monarchy's administrative lang., and efforts to reform and standardize spelling and grammar began. The centralization of ling. and literary authority continued through the cl. Fr. period, culminating in the establishment of the Académie Française in 1635. However, Fr. imperialism proliferated Fr. dialects around the world, and in many places—such as Québec—poetry in Fr. dialect has fostered a local identity opposed to reigning structures of power, as in the work of Gaston Miron. In Haiti, the dialect poetry of Félix Morisseau-Leroy inspired the Créole Renaissance, and movements like Créolité use Fr. Creole poetry in anticolonial cultural politics.

Italy is different in that for centuries the standard literary lang. did not subordinate dialect poetries to provincial or minor status. The political fragmentation of the It. peninsula after the fall of Rome allowed many regional dialects to emerge. Largely because of the prestige of Dante and Petrarch, Tuscan It. assumed preeminence as the written standard among educated Italians after its endorsement by Pietro Bembo during the Cinquecento. However, Italy remained polyglot; at the time of national unification in the 19th c., only a small minority was familiar with the literary standard, and dialect poetries have been a continuous trad. since the 17th c., with major poets writing in dialect. These have included Giovanni Meli (Sicilian), Salvatore di Giacomo (Neapolitan), and Giuseppe Belli (Romanesco), among many others.

The literary and ling. hist. of Ger. offers a third case: like Italy, the Ger.-speaking zone was divided geographically and politically, and the written standard that emerged in the 17th and 18th cs. was remote from all spoken forms. In the late 18th c., romantic philologists like J. G. Herder championed the use of spoken Ger. as a literary lang., arguing that lit., esp. folklore and folk songs, formed the national spirit. This turn to Volkspoesie reached high points in the Märchen of the Brothers Grimm and the Alemannic poetry of J. P. Hebel. At the same time, however, the High Ger. of central Germany—the poetic lang. of J. W. Goethe and Friedrich Schiller, among others—was promulgated as the spoken standard, displacing other dialects and making later dialect poetry, such as that of Klaus Groth, self-consciously provincial.

Eng. has an esp. complex hist.: OE, or Anglo-Saxon, was a loose collection of Germanic dialects (influenced by Lat. and Celtic langs.) spoken and written in portions of Britain after the Saxon invasions of the 5th c. OE survives in an assemblage of writings, the most famous being Beowulf, an epic poem in the West Saxon dialect composed sometime before 1000 CE. Britain's ling. order changed profoundly after the Norman invasion in 1066, which made Lat. and the Norman dialect of OF the official langs. of church and state. ME developed out of the fusion of Anglo-Saxon and Norman and became a literary lang. sometime after 1200. Though ME lacked a written standard, in the 14th c. the London dialect gained hegemony as the city's cultural and political power increased. This dialect achieved literary distinction in Chaucer's poetry, which combined it with five-stress, decasyllabic lines and rhyming *couplets, both Fr. importations. While Enlightenment projects like Samuel Johnson's Dictionary of the English Language (1755) promoted a Latinate literary standard, the mid-18th-c. Ballad Revival and *graveyard poetry popularized a rural, archaic "Saxon" sensibility that contrasted with the metropolitan polish of the Augustan poets. Many different dialect poetries subsequently became popular, incl. the Ayrshire Scots poems of Robert Burns and the Northamptonshire poems of John Clare. William Barnes's poems in Dorset inspired Alfred, Lord Tennyson and Thomas Hardy to compose poems in the dialects of Lincolnshire and Wessex, while Samuel Laycock wrote well-received poems in a Lancashire working-class dialect. The British Empire, meanwhile, created anglophone dialects around the world, which exist in strong tension with other local langs. and the normative, Oxbridge-derived "BBC English." Dub poetry, which originated in Jamaica in the work of Linton Kwesi Johnson and others, is one example of a creole Eng. poetry that has attained a global audience.

Eur. colonial enterprises in the Americas, along with Af. slavery, brought dozens of Atlantic langs. into contact with thousands of indigenous langs. Across Latin America the collision of colonial, Af., and Amerindian langs. and cultures created Afro-Creole dialects that became the basis for literary movements like poesía negra*, which blended Caribbean vernaculars with Af.-derived song forms into expressions of the black underclass, as in the poetry of Nicolás Guillén. Other trads. derive from rural work cultures of the postindependence era. The most prominent of these is probably gauchesco, the cowboy poetry of the Southern Cone most famously embodied in José Hernández's epic Martín Fierro. *Gaucho poetry employed traditional song forms, colloquial idioms, and phonetic spellings to evoke an idealized, rural way of life that was ideologically central to emergent national identities in Argentina and elsewhere.

Although Britain dominated colonial North America after the Seven Years' War, Eng. competed with many Eur., Af., and indigenous langs. Combined with the continent's geographic spread, this multilingualism created highly distinct regional and ethnic dialects. The first prominent dialect poetry emerged early in the 19th-c. U.S. with the minstrel songs composed in imitation of Af. Am. speech patterns. In the antebellum era, Am. dialect writing was primarily a satiric form of critique, heavily dependent on cacography, while after the Am. Civil War the use of dialect became ethnographic, valuing representational precision to portray the "local color" of regions across the country. Though the comic use of ethnic dialects continued into the 20th c. in the songs of vaudeville, *Harlem Renaissance authors legitimized a vernacular dialect poetry ideologically linked to *blues and jazz (see JAZZ POETRY). More recently, Nuyorican Eng., a Latino dialect of New York City, has had a distinguished poetic trad. centered on the *Nuyorican Poets Café.

See AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY; CANADA, POETRY OF; CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE; ENGLAND, POETRY OF; UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE; YIDDISH POETRY.

■ P. Bembo, Prose della volgar lingua (1525); W. Barnes, Poems of Rural Life, in the Dorset Dialect (1844); S. Laycock, Lancashire Rhymes (1864); G. Milner, "The Dialect of Lancashire Considered as a Vehicle for Poetry," Papers of the Manchester Literary Club 1 (1875); B. Croce, Poesia Popolare e Poesia d'Arte (1933); C. D. Buck, The Greek Dialects (1955); J. P. Hebel, Gesammelte Werke, v. 1 (1958); Poesía Gauchesca, ed. J. B. Rivera (1977); L. R. Palmer, The Greek Language (1980); The Invention of Tradition, ed. E. Hobsbawm and T. Ranger (1983); K. Brathwaite, History of the Voice (1984); J. DeFrancis, The Chinese Language (1984); The Hidden Italy, ed. and trans. H. W. Haller (1986); G. Miron, The March to Love, ed. and trans. D. G. Jones (1986);

H. L. Gates Jr., Figures in Black (1987); R. D. Grillo, Dominant Languages (1989); F. Brevini, Le parole perdute (1990); B. Anderson, Imagined Communities (1991); P. Bourdieu, Language and Symbolic Power, trans. G. Raymond and M. Adamson (1991); A Handbook of the Troubadours, ed. F.R.P. Akehurst and J. M. Davis (1995); Twentieth-Century Latin American Poetry, ed. S. Tapscott (1996); L. Bonaffini, "Translating Dialect Literature," World Literature Today 71 (1997); G. Jones, Strange Talk (1999); L. McCauley, "'Eawr Folk,'" Victorian Poetry 39 (2001); G. Lewis, The Turkish Language Reform (2002); The Cambridge Encyclopedia of the World's Ancient Languages, ed. R. D. Woodard (2004); L. K. Johnson, Mi Revalueshanary Fren (2006); S. K. Lewis, Race, Culture, and Identity (2006); D. Ahmad, Rotten English (2007); M. Cohen, "Paul Laurence Dunbar and the Genres of Dialect," African American Review 41 (2007); A. Dawson, Mongrel Nation (2007); R. Epstein, "'Fer in the north; I kan nat telle where,'" Studies in the Age of Chaucer 30 (2008); T. L. Burton and K. K. Ruthven, "Dialect Poetry, William Barnes and the Literary Canon," ELH 76 (2009).

M. C. Cohen

DIALOGUE. Denotes an exchange of words between or among dramatized speakers in lit., whether or not their speeches are written with a view to theatrical representation. Dialogue has characterized writing for the stage at least since the first actor stepped out from a chorus, although there are also important uses of *monologue in the drama. In poetic as in theatrical dialogue, a responsive conversation expresses diverse viewpoints, which are thereby opened to possible change. The device allows a wider range of ideas, emotions, and perspectives than is readily available to a single voice and reliably generates dramatic conflict of a kind that a collection of discrepant monologues, such as Edgar Lee Masters's Spoon River Anthology or even Robert Browning's The Ring and the Book, does not. Monologues tacitly interrupted and poems in which one framing voice introduces another main voice are not legitimate examples of dialogue, which demands interactive response. Dialogue impels all forms in which it appears toward dramatic confrontation, even as it tends to favor the rhythms and nuances of speech.

The best known cl. examples are the Socratic dialogues of Plato, written in prose but apparently based on 5th-c. BCE dramatic mimes by Sophron and Epicharmus. Cl. authors included verse dialogue in satiric, *pastoral, and philosophical poems. Lucian modeled his prose Dialogues of the Dead on Plato but used the form primarily for satiric and comic purposes. Numerous satires of Horace became models of vivid colloquial exchange between poetic speakers. Virgil's *eclogues presented short pastoral dialogues in verse. Dialogue in poetry often remained purely literary, although it also encouraged *recitation, as in formal philosophical disputation and such musical developments as the love duet, liturgical antiphony, and oratorio.

Verse dialogue flourished in the Middle Ages in debates and *flyting. The dualistic philosophical temper of the age fostered dialogue, as in The Owl and the Nightingale. A typical subject was the debate between the soul and the body. *Med. romances and *allegories used dialogue in ways that raise a doubt as to whether they were solely for reading or were also meant to be staged. Many Asian poems fit this description as well. The 13th-c. Roman de la Rose employed multiple speakers for satiric and dramatic purposes, while the Fr. débat and parlement were forms of *poetic contest that influenced the med. devel. of the drama, François Villon's dialogue between heart and body being a notable example. Popular ballads often included more than one speaker to heighten dramatic tension or suspense, as in "Lord Randall" and "Edward."

The Ren. revived specifically philosophical dialogue in verse, related to the devel. of prose dialogues by Thomas Elyot, Thomas More, and Roger Ascham. Torquato Tasso called the dialogue imitazione di ragionamento (imitation of reasoning), claiming that it reconciled drama and (its cognate and companion since Plato) dialectic. In the 16th and 17th cs., John Heywood's "Dialogue of Proverbs" and Margaret Cavendish's dialogue poems were effective examples of the form. Songs in question-and-answer format by Shakespeare and Philip Sidney emphasized the link between dialogue and the interrogative mode. Multiple voices in Edmund Spenser's Shepheardes Calender recalled the dialogue trad. of Virgil's Eclogues. Notable Ren. examples of dialogue poems include Samuel Daniel's "Ulysses and the Siren" and Andrew Marvell's "Dialogue between the Soul and the Body." Courtly *masques (Ben Jonson, John Milton) prominently combined dialogue with music and lyrics, a combination that was also adapted for interludes within stage comedy and romance. Allegorical poems like John Dryden's The Hind and the Panther provided an occasion for dialogue, as did 18th-c. direct-speech poems like Alexander Pope's "Epilogue to the Satires." The adoption of multiple speakers in the Scots ballads of Robert Burns and the Dorset eclogues of William Barnes suggests some affinity between dialogue and dialect.

The romantic predilection for lyrical solo did not prevent the deployment of dialogue in poetic experiments by Lord Byron, John Keats, and esp. P. B. Shelley. Ger. and Scandinavian writers of songs and ballads made widespread use of the device. Victorian efforts to contextualize the romantic lyric chiefly took form in the dramatic monologue, but Alfred, Lord Tennyson; Browning; Matthew Arnold; and Thomas Hardy all used dialogue in poems as well as verse dramas. Revived interest in prose dialogue appears in Oscar Wilde and later, in France, in the dialogue experiments of Paul Valéry.

Twentieth-c. poetry exhibits further blurring of generic distinctions pertinent to this topic. "A Dialogue of Self and Soul" is only the clearest example of W. B. Yeats's frequent reliance on traditional verse dialogue. Writings by Samuel Beckett, Dylan Thomas, and Robert Frost suggest the role of poetic dialogue in a wider variety of dramatic and nondramatic forms. Polyphonic, juxtapositive, and commentatorial modes in T. S. Eliot and esp. Ezra Pound often read like dialogue by other means. Call-and-response conventions have revitalized dialogue in poetry from the Af. diaspora. Implied dialogue in lyrics by Geoffrey Hill and Ted Hughes objectifies the subject and produces heightened dramatic tension. In all these ways, as in the Victorian dramatization of the monologue, dialogue poems deemphasize the autonomy of the poetic word, stressing instead the conditional aspects of utterance. Dialogue thus retains an important place, even as traditional distinctions between verse and poetry, lit. and performance, are questioned and explored.

The historically recurrent overlap among dialogue, dialectics, and dialect finds its major mod. theorist in the Rus. critic Mikhail Bakhtin. Although Bakhtin's writings emphasize the novel, his analysis of the role of the "dialogic" has implications for understanding all literary meaning. On Bakhtin's showing, even ostensible monologues always harbor a conditioning dialogic element. This view implicitly decenters the authority often claimed for first-person lyric or poetic narrative. For Bakhtin, the unsaid, the partially said, and the equivocally said are as potentially meaningful as the clearly said; and these moreover, like all lang. uses, result from social forces, whose contending interplay it remains the privilege, and accordingly the ethical duty, of dialogue to play out.

See PREGUNTA.

■ E. Merrill, The Dialogue in English Literature (1911); E. R. Purpus, "The Dialogue in English Literature, 1660–1725," ELH 17 (1950); W. J. Ong, Ramus, Method, and the Decay of Dialogue (1958); F. M. Keener, English Dialogues of the Dead (1973); J. Mukarovskij, The Word and Verbal Art, trans. and ed. J. Burbank and T. Steiner (1977), ch. 2; M. E. Brown, Double Lyric (1980); D. Marsh, The Quattrocento Dialogue (1980); M. M. Bakhtin, The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist (1981); A. K. Kennedy, Dramatic Dialogue (1983); T. Todorov and M. M. Bakhtin, The Dialogical Principle, trans. W. Godzich (1984); Bakhtin, ed. G. S. Morson (1986); J. R. Snyder, Writing the Scene of Speaking (1989); The Interpretation of Dialogue, ed. T. Maranhão (1989); G. S. Morson and C. Emerson, Mikhail Bakhtin (1990); D. H. Bialostosky, Wordsworth, Dialogics, and the Practice of Criticism (1992); M. S. Macovski, Dialogue and Literature (1992); M. Eskin, Ethics and Dialogue (2000); K. Njogu, Reading Poetry as Dialogue (2004).

B. A. NICHOLS; H. F. TUCKER

DICTION. Diction signifies the words or phrases chosen for a piece of writing. It is the Latinate equivalent of Gr. lexis, which was accepted as Eng. usage by the OED in the second ed. (first citations in 1950 [citing MP]; Frye [1957]). Lexis is a more useful term than diction because more neutral, but it is still chiefly used in ling. (OED, sense 1.2), not in poetics. It is important to distinguish "the diction of poetry" from "poetic diction" (esp. in the 18th-c. sense). "Poetic diction" or even just "diction" may elicit only the question of unusual lang. rather than questions concerning all the lang. of poetry.

The primary rule for thinking about diction is that words in a poem always exist in relation, never in isolation: "there are no bad words or good words; there are only words in bad or good places" (Nowottny). Otherwise, classifying diction can be a barren exercise, just as concentrating on isolated words can be barren for a beginning poet. Consistency within the chosen area of diction is necessary for a well-made poem, and consistency is not always easy to achieve. Listening for a poem's range of diction enables the reader to hear moves outside that range. Great skill in diction implies that a poet knows words as he or she knows people (Hollander 1988), knows how "words have a stubborn life of their own" (Elton), and knows that words need to be "at home" (Eliot, Little Gidding, the best mod. poetic description of diction "that is right").

Some useful categories for studying diction may be drawn from the OED's introductory matter (now also online), where vocabulary may be examined as follows: (1) identification, incl. usual spelling, pronunciation, grammatical part of speech, whether specialized, and status (e.g., rare, obsolete, archaic, colloquial, dialectal); (2) etymology, incl. subsequent word formation and cognates in other langs.; (3) signification, which builds on other dictionaries and on quotations; and (4) illustrative quotations, which show forms and uses, particular senses, earliest use (or, for obsolete words, latest use), and connotations. Studies of diction might test these categories for any given poem. In common usage, meaning refers to definition under category (3), but meaning as defined by the OED incl. all four categories. And meaning in poetry, fully defined, includes all functions of a word.

Diction includes all parts of speech, not simply nouns, adjectives, and verbs. Emphasis on what is striking tends to isolate main parts of speech and imposes a dubious standard of vividness (though see ENARGEIA). Even articles matter (cf. Walt Whitman and E. M. Forster on passages to India). Verb forms matter (see Merrill, 21, on first-person present active indicative). Prepositions can have metaphorical force or double possibilities (e.g., "of," a favorite device of Wallace Stevens; see Hollander 1997). The grammatical structures of different langs. offer other possibilities for plurisignation and ambiguity (see SYNTAX, POETIC).

Discussions of diction often pull more toward polemics than poetics. It may be impossible to separate the two, but the effort is essential (Nowottny is exemplary). S. T. Coleridge's dictum should be remembered: every great and original author "has had the task of creating the taste by which he is to be enjoyed" (cited by Wordsworth 1815), a task that perforce includes polemics. Thus, T. S. Eliot's attacks on the Keats–Tennyson line of diction, esp. as developed by A. C. Swinburne, are better read generically in terms of *charm and *riddle, as Frye does (1976). Similarly, it is important not to read mod. assumptions about diction back into older poetry. (See Strang, on reading Edmund Spenser's work in Spenser's lang., not "as if he were writing mod. Eng. with intermittent lapses into strange expressions.") Critics need to pay attention to historical scholarship on the contemporaneity or *archaism of words—often difficult to assess.

There are only a few general questions concerning diction, and they have remained for centuries. The most fruitful may be the more particular ones. One long-standing general issue is whether a special diction for poetry exists or should exist. This, in turn, depends on how poetry is defined or what type of poetry is in question. Of discussions in antiquity, those by Aristotle, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Horace, and Longinus are the most important. Aristotle's few remarks remain pertinent: poetic diction should be both clear and striking: "ordinary words" give clarity; "strange words, metaphors" should be judiciously used to give surprising effects, to make diction shine and to avoid diction that is inappropriately "mean." In the Middle Ages and early Ren., the issue of diction became important as med. Lat. gave way to the vernaculars. Dante's De vulgari eloquentia (On Vernacular Eloquence, ca. 1304) is the central text in the questione della lingua. Dante classifies diction according to various contexts. E.g., in DVE 2.7, he gives detailed criteria for words suitable for "the highest style." Some are as specific as in Paul Valéry's well-known search for "a word that is feminine, disyllabic, includes P or F, ends in a mute syllable, and is a synonym for break or disintegration, and not learned, not rare. Six conditions—at least!" (Nowottny). Dante sees that the main question, as so often, is appropriateness or *decorum. He also stresses appropriateness for the person using a given lexis (e.g., sufficient natural talent, art, and learning), a criterion largely unfamiliar today.

The term poetic diction is strongly associated with 18th-c. poetry, largely because of William Wordsworth's attacks on it in the Preface to Lyrical Ballads. Wordsworth notes that Lyrical Ballads includes "little of what is usually called poetic diction," by which he means the *epithets, *periphrases, *personifications, archaisms, and other conventionalized phrases too often used unthinkingly in Augustan poetry. As against Thomas Gray, e.g., who wrote that "the language of the age is never the language of poetry" (letter to R. West, April 1742), Wordsworth advocated using the "real language of men," esp. those in humble circumstances and rustic life. But Wordsworth laid down many conditions governing such "real language" in poetry (e.g., men "in a state of vivid sensation," the lang. adapted and purified, a selection only).

Coleridge (1817), with his superior critical mind, saw that "the language of real life" was an "equivocal expression" applying only to some poetry, and there in ways never denied (chaps. 14–22). He rejected the argument of rusticity, asserting that the lang. of Wordsworth's rustics derives from a strong grounding in the lang. of the Eng. Bible (authorized version, 1611) and the liturgy or hymn-book. In any case, the best part of lang., says Coleridge, is derived not from objects but from "reflection on the acts of the mind itself." By "real," Wordsworth actually means "ordinary" lang., the lingua communis (cf. OED, Pref., 2d ed.), and even this needs cultivation to become truly communis (Coleridge cites Dante). Wordsworth's real object, Coleridge saw, was to attack assumptions about a supposedly necessary poetic diction. The debate is of great importance for diction. It marks the shift from what Frye calls a high mimetic mode to a low mimetic one, a shift still governing the diction of poetry today. (In Fr. poetry, the shift comes a little later and is associated with Victor Hugo [Preface to Cromwell, 1827].)

Coleridge disagreed with Wordsworth's contention that "there neither is, nor can be any essential difference between the lang. of prose and metrical composition." Though there is a "neutral style" common to prose and poetry, Coleridge finds it notable that such a theory "should have proceeded from a poet, whose diction, next to that of Shakespeare and Milton, appears to me of all others the most individualized and characteristic." Some words in a poem may well be in everyday use; but "are those words in those places commonly employed in real life to express the same thought or outward thing? . . . No! nor are the modes of connections; and still less the breaks and transitions" (chap. 20). In Coleridge's modification of Wordsworth's well-intentioned arguments, readers may still find essential principles applicable to questions of poetic diction.

The 20th c., in one sense, took up Wordsworth's argument, steadily removing virtually every restriction on diction. The 21st c. now generally bars no word whatever from the diction of poetry, at least in the Germanic and Romance langs. Struggles over appropriate diction in the 19th c. included attacks on the romantics, Robert Browning, and Whitman. Attempts by Robert Bridges and others to domesticate G. M. Hopkins's extraordinary diction are well known. In the early 20th c., Edwardian critics with genteel notions of poetry objected to Rupert Brooke's writing about seasickness and to Wilfred Owen's disgust at the horrors of World War I (Stead). Wordsworth's "real language of men" was twisted by some into attacks on any unusual diction whatsoever—difficult, local, learned—a problem to this day, though now less from genteel notions than egalitarian ones inappropriately extended to the diction of all poetry. Yet the diction of poetry may still be associated with the lang. of a certain class—see Tony Harrison's poems playing standard Eng. against working-class Eng. But if poetry now generally admits all types of diction, it remains true that the diction of poetry—of the Bible, Shakespeare, and the ballads, e.g.—needs to be learned. Otherwise, most older poetry, as well as much contemp., cannot be well read at all (Vendler). The diction of the authorized version of the Bible and of the Gr. and Lat. classics has influenced Eng. poetry for centuries. Virgil's diction in *eclogue, *georgic, and *epic was admired and imitated well past the Ren. (see IMITATION, INFLUENCE). The strategies and effects of *allusion should not be overlooked.

Historical changes in the lang. make the use of good dictionaries mandatory. In Eng., the OED is the most generous and its quotations invaluable, but other dictionaries are also needed (e.g., of U.S. Eng., for etymology). The elementary philological categories of widening and narrowing and raising and lowering in meaning are useful. (Cf. wanton, where solely mod.

senses must not be applied to John Milton's use, or even as late as Bridges's "Wanton with long delay the gay spring leaping cometh" ["April, 1885"]; gay is well known.) Hidden semantic and connotative changes must be esp. watched, along with favorite words in a given time (Miles). The diction of some mod. poets pays attention to historical ling., while that of others is largely synchronic; readers should test.

Etymologies are stories of origins. The etymologist cares whether they are true or false, but a poet need not (Ruthven); mythologies are for the poet as useful as hists. Philology may include certain assumptions about poetic diction (see Barfield against Max Müller). Etymologies may include hists. of war and struggle (for nationalism involves lang. just as class does). Poets may exploit the riches of etymology (see Geoffrey Hill's Mystery of the Charity of Charles Péguy on Eng. and Fr. diction). Etymology may function as a "mode of thought" (Curtius) or as a specific "frame for trope" (see Hollander 1988, on Hopkins) or both. Invented or implied etymologies can also be useful (silva through Dante's well-known selva links by sound and sense with salveo, salvatio, etc.). Milton plays earlier etymological meaning against later meaning, such play functioning as a trope for the fallen state of lang. (Cook). Eng. is unusually accommodating, combining as it does both Latinate and Germanic words. Other important word roots should also be noted (cf. the etymological appropriateness of sherbet in Eliot's "Journey of the Magi").

Diction may be considered along an axis of old to new, with archaism at one end and innovation (incl. neologism) at the other. Archaism may be introduced to enlarge the diction of poetry, sometimes through native terms (Spenser, Hopkins). Or it may be used for certain genres (e.g., literary imitations of oral ballads) or for specific effects, ironic, allusive, or other. Innovation may remain peculiar to one poet or may enlarge the poetic lexicon. Neologisms (new-coined words) tend now to be associated with novelty more than freshness and sometimes with strained effects. The very word indicates they are not common currency. Some periods are conducive to expanding diction in general (the mid-14th c., the late 16th c.) or to expanding diction in some areas (the lang. of digital technology, nowadays, though not yet in general poetic diction). Where poets do not invent or resuscitate terms, they draw on vocabulary from different contemporaneous sources (see the OED categories). Foreign, local, and dialectal words, as well as slang, are noted below. The precision of terms drawn from such areas as theology, philosophy, or the Bible must not be underestimated, for controversy can center on one word. Studies working outward from single words (e.g. Empson; Lewis; Barfield on ruin) are valuable reminders of historical and conceptual significance in diction.

Shakespeare has contributed most to the enlargement of our stock of words; critics regularly note how often he provides the first example of a given word in the OED. He adapts words from the stock of both Eng. (e.g., lonely, presumably from Sidney's loneliness) and other langs. (monumental, from Lat.); he apparently invents words (bump); he shifts their grammatical function (control as a verb rather than a noun), and more. He possesses the largest known vocabulary of any poet, but it is his extraordinary use of so large a word hoard (as against ordinary recognition) that is so remarkable.

Most new words are now generally drawn from scientific or technical sources, though poetry makes comparatively little use of them. In the 18th c., poets could say that "Newton demands the Muse" (see M. H. Nicholson's title), but poets today do not generally say that "Einstein demands the Muse." A. R. Ammons is one of the few mod. poets exploiting the possibilities of new scientific diction: e.g., zygote (1891, OED) rhymed with goat; white dwarf (1924, OED 2d ed.); and black hole (1969). Of the large stock of colloquial and slang expressions, many are evanescent or inert, though special uses may be effective. Shakespeare's gift for introducing colloquial diction is a salutary reminder not to reject colloquialisms per se. Or see Stevens (Shucks, Pfft in "Add This to Rhetoric") or Merrill (slush [funds] in "Snow Jobs"). The same may be said of slang, a vernacular speech below colloquial on a three-part scale of (1) standard or formal Eng., (2) colloquial Eng., and (3) slang. (See The New Partridge Dictionary of Slang and Unconventional English, 8th ed. rev. [2006].) Slang may come from the lingo of specialized trades or professions, schools, sports, etc., and may move up through colloquial to standard Eng. It appears more often in prose than in poetry. But poetry can make effective use of it from François Villon's underworld slang of the 15th c. to T. S. Eliot's demobbed in The Waste Land. For a brief telling discussion of the question, see George Eliot, Middlemarch, chap. 11.

Along the axis of old to new, the most interesting question is why and how some diction begins to sound dated. Archaisms and innovations alike are easy to hear. So also is the diction we designate as, say, 18th-c. or Tennysonian or Whitmanian. But what is it that distinguishes the poetic diction of a generation ago, and why do amateur poets tend to use the diction of their poetic grandparents? The aging of words or the passing of their claim on our allegiance is of continuing interest to poets as part of the diachronic aspect of their art.

Different types of poetry require different lexical practice, though such requirements vary according to time and place. *Oral poetry makes use of stock phrases or epithets cast into formulas (see FORMULA). Some of Homer's epithets became renowned, e.g., poluphloisbos (loud-roaring) for the sea (see Amy Clampitt's echo of this). Compound epithets in OE poetry are known by the ON term kenning* and sometimes take the form of a riddle. Different genres also require different practice (Fowler), a requirement much relaxed today. Epic required a high-style diction, as did the *sublime (see Monk). Genres of the middle and low style drew from a different register. *Satire usually works in the middle style but allows much leeway, esp. in Juvenalian as against Horatian satire. Any diction may become banal—e.g., that of the 16th-c. sonneteers or that of some *pastoral writers (cf. Coleridge, Letters, 9 Oct. 1794: "The word 'swain' . . . conveys too much of the Cant of Pastoral"). *Connotation or association is governed partly by genre and is all-important for diction.

Diction also depends partly on place. The largest division in Eng. is between Great Britain and the U.S., but poetry from elsewhere (Africa, Asia, Australasia, Canada, the Caribbean, Ireland) also shows important differences. Establishing a distinctive poetic style in a new country with an old lang. presents peculiar problems that novelty in itself will not solve. Within a country, diction will vary locally, and poets can make memorable uses of local terms (Yeats of perne in "Sailing to Byzantium," Eliot of rote in The Dry Salvages; Whitman uses native Amerindian terms). The question of dialect shades into this. Robert Burns and Thomas Hardy draw on local and dialectal words. Hopkins's remarkable diction derives from current lang., dialectal and other, as well as older words; some (e.g., pitch) have specific usage for Hopkins (see Milroy). The use of Af. Am. vernacular Eng. is familiar (Paul Laurence Dunbar, Langston Hughes, James Weldon Johnson; see AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY); Derek Walcott includes the Creole of St. Lucia. Foreign diction or *xenoglossia, a special case, works along a scale of assimilation, for standard diction includes many words originally considered foreign. Considerable use of foreign diction (apart from novelties like *macaronic verse) implies a special contract with the reader, at least in societies unaccustomed to hearing more than one lang. Diction may also vary according to class (see above). It is doubtful if it varies in a general way according to gender.

Interpretive categories are numerous, and readers should be aware of them as such; even taxonomies are interpretive. Beyond the categories already mentioned, diction may be judged according to the degree of "smoothness" (Tennyson as against Browning is a standard example; see Frye 1957), centering on the large and important question of sound in lexis (cf. Seamus Heaney on W. H. Auden: "the gnomic clunk of Anglo-Saxon phrasing . . ." [The Government of the Tongue (1989), 124]). Or diction may be judged by the degree of difficulty (Browning, Hopkins, Eliot, Stevens), though once-difficult diction can become familiar. Strangeness in diction can contribute to the strangeness sometimes thought necessary for aesthetic effect (Barfield) or for poetry itself (Genette, arguing with Jean Cohen, also compares the ostranenie [*defamiliarization] of the Rus. formalists and the lang. of a state of dreaming). Some poets are known for difficult or strange diction (e.g., Spenser, the metaphysical poets, Whitman, Browning), but readers should also note consummate skill in quieter effects of diction (e.g., Robert Frost, Philip Larkin, Elizabeth Bishop).

Distinctive diction is part of what makes a poet familiar, and the diction of a poet may be studied in itself (see Fowler). The discipline of the art of diction is still best understood by studying the comments and revisions of good poets.

■ General Studies: W. Wordsworth, "Preface, Lyrical Ballads, 3d ed. (1802), incl. "Appendix on . . . Poetic Diction"; and Wordsworth, "Essay, Supplementary to the Preface" (1815); S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (1817); Aristotle, Poetics, trans. I. Bywater (1909); O. Elton, "The Poet's Dictionary," E&S 14 (1929); W. Empson, The Structure of Complex Words (1951); D. Davie, Purity of Diction in English Verse (1952); Curtius; Frye; C. S. Lewis, Studies in Words (1960); W. Nowottny, The Language Poets Use (1962)—essential reading; J. Miles, Eras and Modes in English Poetry, 2d ed. (1964); K. K. Ruthven, "The Poet as Etymologist," CQ 11 (1969); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction, 3d ed. (1973)—important reading; F. W. Bateson, English Poetry and the English Language, 3d ed. (1973); A. Sherbo, English Poetic Diction from Chaucer to Wordsworth (1975); N. Frye, "Charms and Riddles," Spiritus Mundi (1976); Fowler—excellent on diction and genre; G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse (trans. 1982), esp. 75–102; J. Merrill, Recitative: Prose (1986); J. Boase-Beier, Poetic Compounds (1987); C. Ricks, The Force of Poetry (1987); A. Ferry, The Art of Naming (1988); J. Hollander, Melodious Guile (1988); H. Vendler, The Music of What Happens (1988); S. Adamson, "Literary Language," CHEL (1992), v. 3, 539–653; v. 4, 589–692; J. Hollander, The Work of Poetry (1997).

■ Specialized Studies: S. H. Monk, The Sublime (1935); V. L. Rubel, Poetic Diction in the English Renaissance (1941); J. Arthos, The Language of Natural Description in 18th-Century Poetry (1949); M. M. Mahood, Shakespeare's Wordplay (1957); Wimsatt and Brooks, ch. 16; A. Ewert, "Dante's Theory of Diction," MHRA 31 (1959); C. K. Stead, The New Poetic (1964); G. Tillotson, Augustan Poetic Diction (1964); W.J.B. Owen, Wordsworth as Critic (1969); H. Kenner, The Pound Era (1971), esp. 94–191; D. Alighieri, Literary Criticism of Dante Alighieri, ed. and trans. R. S. Haller (1973); J. Milroy, The Language of G. M. Hopkins (1977); N. Hilton, Literal Imagination: Blake's Vision of Words (1983); M. H. Abrams, "Wordsworth and Coleridge on Diction and Figures," The Correspondent Breeze (1984); R.W.V. Elliott, Thomas Hardy's English (1984); C. Ricks, T. S. Eliot and Prejudice (1988); R.O.A.M. Lyne, Words and the Poet (1989)—Virgil; B.M.H. Strang, "Language," Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. A. C. Hamilton et al. (1990); E. Cook, Against Coercion: Games Poets Play (1998); C. Miller, The Invention of Evening (2006).

E. Cook

DIDACTIC POETRY

I. Concept and History
II. Antiquity
III. Medieval, Renaissance, Enlightenment
IV. 19th and 20th Centuries

I. Concept and History. Didaktikos in Gr. relates to teaching and implies its counterpart: learning. "All men by nature desire knowledge" (Aristotle) and all experience (embodied in lang., says Benedetto Croce); hence, all lit. (in the broadest sense) can be seen as "instructive."

Given such interacting complexities, our problem becomes one of "historical semantics" (Spitzer): of modulations and transformations (Fowler) of the didactic concept, and of attempts to distinguish it from near neighbors such as *allegory, *archetype, *myth, *symbol, *fable, and *satire. The category of unconscious or unintended teaching could lead us astray into infinite mists and abysses. (What do we learn from "Jabberwocky"? That "nonsense" can make an attractive poem.) Aware of such proliferating contexts, we try to focus here chiefly on poetry that clearly intends "useful teaching," embodying Horace's "instruction and delight" in the genre of didactic poems.

Basic categories relate to the contents of poems, inseparable from their forms. In De vulgari eloquentia, Dante specified the worthiest objects as safety, love, and virtue—his corresponding poetic themes being war, love, and salvation (or morality: "direction of the will"). To these we add *knowledge (science and philosophy), beauty (aesthetics), efficiency (e.g., "How to" run a farm or write a poem), and *information ("Thirty days hath September"). Mod. discussions have tended to emphasize the problematics of knowledge and morality. M. C. Beardsley treated "the Didactic Theory of literature" as seeing "a close connection between truth and value." He mentions De rerum natura, but no one reads Lucretius' poem today for information on materialism and atomic theory; Beardsley wants rather to clarify the relations among "predications," cognition, and how readers submit poems to experiential "testing"—with reference to "philosophical, economic, social, or religious" doctrines. Arnold Isenberg confronted the "strong case" of "the didactic poem or essay" in an intricate analysis.

Another necessary preliminary is Alastair Fowler's concept of "mode," illuminating the continuing life of genres. Fowler writes that "modal terms never imply a complete external form" and "tend to be adjectival"—as in "didactic essay" or "didactic lyric." He finds it remarkable that "several important literary kinds, notably georgic, essay, and novel, are not supposed to have corresponding modes. Can it be that these modal options have never been taken up? By no means." Once we accept modal extensions of didacticism, its presence and power throughout the hist. of poetry become obvious.

II. Antiquity. Didactic modes probably preceded the invention of alphabets and writing. Indeed, for oral trads. (religious and secular), rhythm and *metaphor have always been used to aid memory and enliven ritual; such speculations about prehistoric poetry are confirmed by surviving fragments and mod. anthropology. Religious scriptures in all langs. tend to be "poetic," mingling freely epic hist. (narrative), *hymn and *psalm, and prophetic vision and preaching. In the Judeo-Christian Bible, e.g., there are elements of poetic drama, philosophy, practical wisdom (*proverbs), and parable in didactic modes.

The Greeks first, in Europe, distinguished clearly between poetry of *imitation (Homer) and versified science (e.g., the lost poem by Empedocles); within mimetic uses of melodious lang., between "manners" of narration and drama; and within the latter, analyzed the tragic *catharsis (Aristotle) with comedy, *epic, and other "kinds" in the background. Plato banished the poets from his ideal republic because they taught lies about the gods and aroused and confused men's passions. Two main tendencies of the didactic in verse were created by Hesiod (8th c. BCE): in Theogony, knowledge about the gods, their origins and stories, problems of culture—moving toward philosophic abstractions; and in Works and Days, "how to" farm and the like—toward practical and specific information. Each kind (details are fragmentary) leaned toward a different style and *meter (e.g., Aratus' "Phainomena" used hexameters); and in later Alexandria, the latter emphasis (erudition, technical information) became popular (e.g., Nicander of Colophon).

The Romans derived from the Greeks not only gods and ideas but most of their poetic genres (translating and adapting Empedocles and Aratus, e.g.). Four major Lat. poets wrote masterpieces that transformed didactic poetry creatively: (a) Lucretius' De rerum natura became the prototypical "philosophic" poem (Santayana) in the Empedocles and Theogony line, invoking the values of sense-experience and materialistic metaphysics. (b) Virgil's Georgics, derived from Hesiod, became the popular "how to" poem: running a farm, living with the seasons, keeping bees, and so forth (see GEORGIC). (c) Horace, on his Sabine farm, wrote not only *odes, satires, and epistles but letters of practical advice to poets (Epistulae ad Pisones, i.e., the Ars poetica), some of his ideas and phrases becoming proverbial: e.g., "the labor of the file," "in the midst of things," "from the egg," and "make Greece your model." Finally, (d) Ovid's versified advice related chiefly to "sex and society" (Ars amatoria), a Lat. primer in matters of love. Manilius wrote a five-book poem on astrology (ed. A. E. Housman); and there were others.

Lat. poets gave priority to instructing citizens and artists in a variety of subjects. Satire developed beyond light-hearted Horace to bitter Juvenal (The Vanity of Human Wishes). And in Asia, esp., poetry was central to Confucian teaching. Hindu philosophy is embodied in Vedic hymns (with the Upaniṣads); Buddhism, in epic poems (Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaṇa); and Persian "teaching" is embodied for Westerners in ʿUmar Khayyām's Rubáiyát (*quatrains) and the Avesta of Zoroaster. The scripture of Islam, the Qurʾan, is quintessential *Arabic poetry.

III. Medieval, Renaissance, Enlightenment. Christian lit. in Europe was almost entirely didactic. Even in mimetic (narrative and dramatic) modes, its central purpose was to impart religious doctrines and values (see Curtius, chap. 3 and passim). E.g., Martianus Capella, On the Marriage of Mercury and Philology (Menippean satire), Roman de la Rose, and Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene (allegory), Dante, Chaucer—didactic elements are everywhere. Vagabond scholars mixed orthodox doctrine and symbols with irreverent satire and "pagan" feeling (see GOLIARDIC VERSE). Med. lit. is dense with rhymed chronicles, encyclopedias, devotional manuals and saints' lives, popularized excerpts from church doctrine, and collections of aphorisms. Early modes of theater in western Europe—mysteries and moralities, passion plays—aimed to combine indoctrination with celebration and entertainment. This is also true of the late *masque, where the allegorical teaching is increasingly subordinated to spectacle and dance. John Milton's Comus (1637), e.g., ends with a moral: "Love Virtue."

The emerging Ren. and Reformation saw Lat. poetry enriched by the vernacular langs. In Germany, e.g., didactic works included Luther's Bible, Bescheidenheit by "Freidank" (1215–16), Der Renner by Hugo von Trimberg (ca. 1300), Narrenschiff by Sebastian Brant (1494), Narrensbeschwörung and Gauchmatt by Thomas Murner (1514, 1519). In Spain, such authors as Francisco Pacheco, Lope de Vega, and Miguel de Cervantes wrote didactically at times. In Italy, literary theory flourished, reaffirming cl. ideals and finding Virgil a "better teacher" than Cato (but Girolamo Fracastoro wrote that "teaching is in a measure the concern of the poet, but not in his peculiar capacity" [1555; emphases added]). Such satires as those of Giuseppe Parini and Ludovico Ariosto mingled didactic elements with satire and autobiography; and the Georgics were imitated. In France, François Rabelais and Michel de Montaigne virtually created a lit. that excelled in raison as well as esprit; masterpieces by Jean Racine and Molière shaped the nation's emerging trad. and education; Denis Diderot preferred the Georgics to Virgil's other poetry; A. Chenier's enthusiasm for "modern" science parallels that of J. W. Goethe and the Eng. romantics; and Jacques de Lille trans. Virgil and wrote Les Jardins.

But the didactic line (and problem) was most clearly developed, perhaps, in England, as in Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1595, passim—but, despite Plato, the poet is for Sidney not a liar: "he nothing affirms and therefore never lieth"). Milton's great epic attempt was "to justify the ways of God to men." The Restoration in England (one of whose classics is John Dryden's Virgil), like the neoclassic century that followed, was a long period of transitions leading to *romanticism. Dryden wrote political, historical, satiric, religious, and theological poems and trans. all four of the great Lat. didactic poets; Alexander Pope wrote An Essay on Criticism (1711) and other imitations of Horace, philosophic and "moral" essays in verse, and The Dunciad (1742–43), a didactic and *mock-epic satiric masterpiece; and it is hardly necessary to insist on the didacticism of Jonathan Swift and Samuel Johnson. As Chalker puts it, important poems in the georgic trad. "were often remote from any practical purpose, although others were didactic in intention" (emphasis added).

The emergence of Newtonian science (see Nicolson) and the Royal Society (Abraham Cowley's poems) bore poetic fruit. New concepts of *nature and light (optics) mingled with the descriptive paysage moralisé in complex ways, transforming georgic trad. most effectively in James Thomson's The Seasons (1730; see Cohen). We recall Dr. Johnson's distinction: the poet "does not number the streaks of the tulip." Grierson and Smith's hist. (1944) shows the dominance of didactic and satiric modes, as well as the representative "timid revolt" of Thomas Gray in his odes, yet few poems are more blatantly moralistic than Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard." The scientific (informative and theoretic) tendencies bore strange and influential fruit in Erasmus Darwin's poems (e.g., The Botanic Garden, 1791). And we recall the variety of didactic elements in George Crabbe, Oliver Goldsmith, and Robert Burns: the Am. and Fr. Revolutions did make a difference.

IV. 19th and 20th Centuries. After 1800, didactic aims and methods underwent radical transformations. The main shift was one from a *neoclassical use of models to a growing variety of philosophies and ideologies, followed by later compromises that made the term Victorian almost synonymous with moralizing in prose and verse—as in Thomas Carlyle, R. W. Emerson, Alfred, Lord Tennyson, John Ruskin, some pre-Raphaelites, and Matthew Arnold. Few poets are more obviously didactic than William Blake, e.g., but his mode became one of vision and prophecy, of what we now see as "myth-making." William Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge wrestled with didacticism, esp. in odes and poems of meditation ("The Growth of a Poet's Mind"); and though Coleridge lived to regret it mildly, he did conclude The Rime of the Ancient Mariner with a moral.

In P. B. Shelley's Defense, Milton's "bold neglect of a direct moral purpose" (emphasis added) is seen as proof of that poet's genius; but neither Blake nor Shelley was unaware that to seek "to justify the ways of God to men" was to be essentially didactic. True, Shelley wrote in the preface to Prometheus Unbound that "didactic poetry is my abhorrence"—meaning poetry whose teaching "can be equally well expressed in prose" (I. A. Richards' "separable content"—implying superficial moralizing); but surely in Prometheus and elsewhere, Shelley was, and understood himself to be, a prophet-teacher, one of the "unacknowledged legislators" of the world. Thus, Wimsatt and Brooks characterize his critical position correctly as a "rhapsodic didacticism" and "a didacticism of revolution."

The opposites of the Horatian pleasure–use polarity often tend to meet. A strong antididacticism usually emerges in opposition to a boringly conservative culture (cf. Blackmur's "intolerable dogma"). When E. A. Poe attacked "the heresy of the Didactic" (a position later adopted by the Fr. symbolists and others), it was because, like Shelley, he was surrounded by inept poetasters spouting clichés; and Walt Whitman (whose didacticism has been compared to that of Blake and Wordsworth) picked up Poe's (and Emerson's) idea of working "indirectly" and symbolically. Even the fin de siècle proponents of art for art's sake were themselves moralists in rebellion against Arnold's "Barbarians" and "Philistines." But the older, moralizing trad. of W. C. Bryant, H. W. Longfellow, J. G. Whittier, and others in America and England had a strength of its own. In the 20th c., the best poets (e.g. W. B. Yeats, W. H. Auden) were ardently "engaged" in various social, political, philosophical, and religious controversies.

Mod. didacticism assumed protean forms that could no longer be forced into the genre classifications of the Ren. and Enlightenment. We can follow this process clearly through Wellek's History of Modern Criticism: when A. W. Schlegel discusses "the didactic philosophical poem," he falls into the trap (for Wellek) of defining all poetry as "esoteric philosophy"—excusable, however, when one means, as the romantics did, "a poetic philosophy, a thinking in symbols as it was practiced by Schelling or Jakob Boehme." In this, Wellek is disparaging inferior poems "held together merely by logic." Similarly, Wellek remarks that "with the years Wordsworth's point of view became . . . more and more simply didactic and instructive" (emphases added). Still, Wellek quotes Wordsworth (1808): "every great poet is a teacher: I wish either to be understood as a teacher, or as nothing." This debate about the changing nature of didacticism took a variety of shapes in England, America, and Europe. Yet what long poem in Eng. had a more clearly didactic intent (i.e., interpretation of hist., fate) than The Dynasts—Thomas Hardy's War and Peace? Since the substance of such teachings has become increasingly complex, fragmented, and problematic, we find the emphasis now falling on conflict, dialectics, quest, doubt, psychology, existential immediacy, and pluralism rather than on any fixed doctrine.

For instance, in a poem such as Karl Shapiro's Essay on Rime, in much of T. S. Eliot, in the Ezra Pound of The Cantos, and in Wallace Stevens's "meditations," we witness modal transformations of the didactic. Robert Frost's inveterate didacticism finds expression by transformations of cl. eclogue and pastoral (e.g., "Build Soil," "The Lesson for Today"; see Empson; and see ECLOGUE and PASTORAL). Mod. degradations of didacticism, of course, occur in the use of poetry for propaganda or even advertising. Anglo-Am. poetry is esp. rich in works with historical, regional, geographic, philosophic, and political substance. The "how to" motif is still evident when Pound writes an ABC of Reading or John Hollander a versified textbook on prosody. One thinks of such old-new genres as utopian (and dystopian) narrative and science fiction; and there is a strong didactic element in mod. satire (R. Campbell, A. M. Klein). A recent study by H. J. Blackham devotes a chapter to "Modern Instances" and concludes with "The Message" (cf. Scholes).

The didactic mode is very much alive in mod. lit. (possibly more in prose than in verse); and many of the traditional didactic genres have undergone complex transformations and modulations. We find not only "modern georgics" (Frost, Louis MacNeice), but *epigrams (Ogden Nash), parodies without number, parables (Franz Kafka), and other genres aiming at some sort of didacticism. Critical theory, however, has tended either to skirt the issues or to convert the didactic mode into related categories.

See BEAST EPIC, BESTIARY, CRITICISM, EXEMPLUM, FABLIAU, SPRUCHDICHTUNG.

■ R. Eckart, Die Lehrdichtung: ihr Wesen und ihre Vertreter, 2d ed. (1909); G. Santayana, Three Philosophical Poets (1910); W. Kroll, "Lehrgedicht," Pauly-Wissowa; I. A. Richards, "Doctrine in Poetry," Practical Criticism (1929); H. M. and N. K. Chadwick, The Growth of Literature, 3 v. (1932–40); T. S. Eliot, The Uses of Poetry and the Uses of Criticism (1933); W. Empson, Some Versions of Pastoral (1935); G. Solbach, Beitrag zur Beziehung zwischen deutschen und italienischen Lehrdichtung im Mittelalter (1937); H.J.C. Grierson and J. C. Smith, A Critical History of English Poetry (1944); M. H. Nicolson, Newton Demands the Muse (1946); R.A.B. Mynors, "Didactic Poetry," Oxford Classical Dictionary (1949); Curtius; Wellek; D. Daiches, Critical Approaches to Literature (1956), chaps. 3–4; T. S. Eliot, On Poetry and Poets (1957), esp. "The Social Function of Poetry"; Wimsatt and Brooks; M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958); G. Pellegrini, La Poesia didascalia inglese nel settecento italiano (1958); E. Neumann, "Bispél," W. Richter, "Lehrhafte Dichtung," and H. Zeltner, "Philosophie und Dichtung," Reallexikon II; B. F. Huppé, Doctrine and Poetry (1959); W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature (1960); R. Cohen, The Art of Discrimination: Thomson's "The Seasons" and the Language of Criticism (1964); H. de Boor, Fabel und Bispél (1966); L. L. Albertsen, Das Lehrgedicht (1967); L. Lerner, The Truthtellers (1967); R. Scholes, The Fabulators (1967); J. Chalker, The English Georgic (1969)—good bibl.; C. S. Lewis, Selective Literary Essays (1969); B. Sowinski, Lehrhafte Dichtung im Mittelalter (1971); A. Isenberg, "Ethical and Aesthetic Criticism," Aesthetics and the Theory of Criticism (1973); C. Siegrist, Das Lehrgedicht der Aufklarung (1974); B. Boesch, Lehrhafte Literatur (1977); B. Effe, Dichtung und Lehre (1977)—typology of cl. didactic genres; Hesiod, Works and Days, ed. M. L. West (1978), "Prolegomena"—excellent comp. survey; R. L. Montgomery, The Reader's Eye (1979); GRLMA, v. 6, La Littérature didactique, allegorique et satirique; Europäische Lehrdichtung, ed. H. G. Rötzer and H. Walz (1981); Fowler; R. Wellek, "Criticism as Evaluation," The Attack on Literature and Other Essays (1982); M. B. Ross, The Poetics of Moral Transformation: Forms of Didacticism in the Poetry of Shelley (1983); "Literature and/as Moral Philosophy," NLH 15, spec. iss. (1983); K. Muir, Shakespeare's Didactic Art (1984); L. Sternbach, Subhasida: Gnomic and Didactic Literature (1984)—Indian; H. J. Blackham, The Fable as Literature (1985); W. Spiegelman, The Didactic Muse (1990).

T.V.F. BROGAN; S. J. KAHN

DIFFICULTY. Resistance to swift and confident interpretation. While the term more accurately denotes an interpretive experience in affective terms—as "the subjective counterpart to resistance" (Prynne)—difficulty is a quality conventionally attributed to poems themselves. By putting the communicative efficacy of lang. at risk, poetic difficulty prompts readers to question their normative reading practices, reconsider what may count as understanding or the proper end of reception, and seek alternative methods of achieving that end. Difficulty may serve also as an index of lyric privacy, suggesting that the speaker's very intent—not just the voiced address—is turned away from the poem's audience, availing an aura of overheard authenticity (Mill). Whereas *obscurity is a specifically visual metaphor and may result from neglect, difficulty may be experienced, as Diepeveen suggests, according to any of the three primary conceptual metaphors for understanding: as obstacles to seeing, grasping, or following.

When Dante warns that those "in piccioletta barca" (in your little bark) may not be able to follow his poetic navigations through the Paradiso (2.1) and John Milton invokes Urania to "fit audience find, though few," for the second half of Paradise Lost (7.31), each poet acknowledges that most readers will encounter difficulty. William Wordsworth, whose prefatory manifestos anticipate readerly anxiety and exemplify a growing concern to manage it, likens the poet of taste-making *genius to "Hannibal among the Alps, . . . called upon to clear and often to shape his own road" and suggests that readers should not expect to travel the same road with ease ("Essay, Supplementary," 1815). Latané argues that Robert Browning's Sordello helped sponsor an "aesthetics of difficulty."

But the currency of difficulty as a critical term rose dramatically with *modernism's characteristic challenges to the legitimacy of traditional forms, aesthetic criteria, and hermeneutic methods. Bernstein jocularly refers to "the outbreak of 1912" as "one of the best-known epidemics of difficult poetry." T. S. Eliot, pairing his expectation that "refined sensibilit[ies]" would represent the culture's "variety and complexity" with the symbolist poet's inclination "to force, to dislocate if necessary, language into his meaning" speculated in a 1921 review "that poets in our civilization, as it exists at present, must be difficult." The imperative core of this multiply hedged aside has been credited broadly for difficulty's revaluation as a potential poetic good. Wallace Stevens's later dictum "The poem must resist the intelligence / Almost successfully" and his call for "venerable complication" are also frequently cited promotions of difficulty. Poirier faulted Eliot and his champions for conceiving a "compendiously learned and disjointed" difficulty as a form of "cultural heroism."

Critical controversy about modernist difficulty often has grouped around such poetic features as esoteric *symbolism, imagist *concision, intertextual and polyvocalic montage, disjunctive *syntax and alogical sequencing, typographical play, and techniques of *defamiliarization (Viktor Shklovsky's ostranenie). In A Survey of Modernist Poetry, the earliest ostensibly retrospective study of the literary period, Riding and Graves present the difficulty for "the plain reader" of poems by Eliot and e. e. cummings as characteristic, and they distinguish G. M. Hopkins as a modernist because his "unconventional" diction, *prosody, and notation ensured that his poems "had to be understood as he meant them to be, or understood not at all." Eastman's popular critique of "the cult of unintelligibility" exemplified by cummings and Gertrude Stein was typical of detractors who suspected difficulty to be symptomatic of decadent freedoms, indistinct forms, and elitist exclusivity. Defenders argued that many canonical poems were intrinsically difficult, and that time has not always dispelled their difficulty. The critical reputation of the *metaphysical poets, esp. John Donne, was resurrected by the New Critics with the aid of such arguments. They defended the difficulty of certain contemp. poems as similarly integral. Blackmur wrote of Stevens's "The Comedian as the Letter C," e.g., as having "the merit of difficulty—difficulty which when solved rewards the reader beyond his hopes of clarity," a species, moreover, that he assiduously distinguished from Ezra Pound's and Eliot's, respectively (see NEW CRITICISM).

In the pursuit of professional objectivity, however, modernist critics who defended difficulty as a poetic attribute tended to discount as irrelevant to interpretation even predictable affective responses (see AFFECTIVE FALLACY). Ostensibly countering such formalist biases, Stanley Fish argued in Surprised by Sin (1967) that, as he later put it, "the difficulties one experiences in reading [Paradise Lost] are not to be lamented or discounted but . . . seen as manifestations of the legacy left to us by Adam when he fell"; Fish then extended his claims regarding "Milton's strategy . . . to make the reader self-conscious about his own performance" to other historically disparate works. On this view, difficulty itself may be read—not just overcome in preparation for a reading—much as, according to Grice's coeval theory of conversational implicature, an expression that flouts one or more maxims of manner may alert listeners to circumstances that preclude greater perspicuity even as they discern the expression's sense. In Reading the Illegible, Dworkin similarly attributes significance to difficulty at the materialized extreme where interpretive resistance results from a visually prosodic or paragrammatic poem's "erasures, overprintings, excisions, cancellations, [or] rearrangements" of a source text thus rendered at least partially unreadable. Relying on the redemptive logic of such systems as information theory (with its positive valuation of noise), various conceptions of the sublime, and George Bataille's general economy, Dworkin accounts for the salvaging of apparently forfeited textual meaning—in Rosmarie Waldrop's Camp Printing and Jackson Mac Low's Words nd Ends from Ez, e.g.—as insight regarding political and material situation or as affect.

Stein, for whom the syntactical ambiguity occasioned by her omission of commas manifested an attractive inner vitality, had long since broached an erotics of difficulty: "Why if you want the pleasure of concentrating on the final simplicity of excessive complication would you want any artificial aid to bring about that simplicity. . . . When it gets really difficult you want to disentangle rather than to cut the knot." Vincent likens negotiating the difficulty of certain "queer" lyrics (e.g., John Ashbery's or Hart Crane's) to homosexual cruising, claiming that, in both cases, "boredom, disenchantment, fear, shame, and even disgust are likely components of desire and excitement." Presenting difficulty as a "poetic device," Hejinian borrows lang. from Peter Nicholls to ally it with a sense of sincerity shared by philosopher Emmanuel Levinas and objectivist poets Louis Zukofsky and George Oppen that "involves 'exposure to the claims of others . . . [,] an acceptance of what exceeds the self' . . . in unassimilable surpluses of meaning, in impossible games, in rage, in disruptive and disordering pleasure, in laughter" (see OBJECTIVISM). As difficulty is experienced at the juncture of thought and feeling, its appreciation would seem to hold out opportunities for a reversal of what Eliot identified as a *"dissociation of sensibility" prevailing since Donne.

Of the four sources of difficulty Eliot addressed in his 1932–33 Harvard lectures, two correspond to receptive attitudes: anxious overpreparedness, cleverly dubbed "gallery fright," and "novelty" (readerly underpreparedness). His remaining two sources originate, intentionally or unintentionally, with the author. Steiner's more sophisticated, influential taxonomy also distinguished four types. "Contingent" difficulty is referential, allusive; archaic and foreign diction, proper nouns, slang, and other idiolects may need to be looked up. "Modal" difficulty, in contrast, is elusive and manifests itself as an empathic impasse with respect to a poem's apparent nexus of values. While Steiner focused on temporal changes in expectation as the cause, Shetley notes that such difficulty results as readily from crossing between contemporaneous interpretive communities. Steiner's third type, "tactical" difficulty, with "its source in the writer's will or in the failure of adequacy between his intention and his performative means," recalls Aesopian responses to censorship and parabolic restrictions of understanding to initiates; here Steiner echoes Eliot's call on the poet "to dislocate . . . language into his meaning," and, as Shetley observes, such difficulty is essential to lyric's "project . . . of embodying subjectivity in the impersonal and resistant medium of language." Finally, "ontological" difficulty, as Steiner defines it, breaches "the contract of ultimate or preponderant intelligibility between poet and reader, between text and meaning."

Steiner's four types seem, like Eliot's, to fall into two pairs—difficulty for which the reader or the poet is responsible, respectively. Yet, intentional, implicative versions of Steiner's first two types exist. For instance, Brooks and Warren's midcentury approach to The Waste Land—that Eliot situates the mod., secular reader in "the position of the knight in the Grail legends," bewildered among thickets of *allusion, forced to feel and question the apparent meaninglessness of his or her condition—ascribes a tactical use to referential and modal difficulty alike. Paul Celan's obliquely allusive, semantically and syntactically fractured, neologistic, elliptical poetry is the most cited exemplar of ontological difficulty, yet the proliferation of compelling readings suggests that this type, too, is not securely distinct from the tactical. Even highly competent readers are liable to experience difficulty not as any one recognizable type but as a threat to expected cooperation between the poet and themselves, uncertainty about how to proceed, and doubt regarding whether the apparent obstacles are significant guides or the result of authorial exclusivity or incompetence. The terminological vagueness of difficulty significantly corresponds to the vagueness of a reader's perplexity; to classify the source of difficulty is to begin to dispel it.

Ashbery and Jorie Graham are the two Eng.-lang. poets whose work has most provoked continued disputation regarding difficulty in the second half of the 20th c. and since. A 1976 New York Times Magazine profile titled "How to Be a Difficult Poet" secured the adjective to Ashbery. Shetley encapsulates numerous attempts to account since then for Ashbery's difficulty, arguing that the poet sought "to make reading difficult again" by systematically flouting the New Criticism's dramatistic techniques of making difficult poems accessible. Ashbery's selection of Graham's "On Difficulty" for The Best American Poetry of 1988 coincided with her establishment as an importantly difficult poet, a reputation she has earned with her syntactically sustained errancies—part wandering inquiry, part tactical "wrong"-doing—and sophisticated extrapoetic defenses of difficulty's value in her own and others' poetry. The Language movement has influentially framed difficulty as a marker and medium of social critique in its collaborative efforts to expose, in Hejinian's words, "the world view (and ideology) secreted not only in our vocabulary but at every linguistic level incl. the ways in which sentences are put together" and to explore "new ways of thinking by putting language (and hence perception) together in new ways" (see LANGUAGE POETRY).

See OBSCURITY.

■ J. S. Mill, "Thoughts on Poetry and Its Varieties" [1833], Dissertations and Discussions (1859); T. S. Eliot, "The Metaphysical Poets," Times Literary Supplement (1921); L. Riding and R. Graves, A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1928); M. Eastman, The Literary Mind (1931); R. P. Blackmur, "Examples of Wallace Stevens," The Double Agent (1935); G. Stein, "Poetry and Grammar," Lectures in America (1935); W. Stevens, "Man Carrying Thing" and "The Creations of Sound," Transport to Summer (1947); Brooks and Warren; Frye; J. H. Prynne, "Resistance and Difficulty," Prospect 5 (1961); G. Steiner, "On Difficulty," On Difficulty and Other Essays (1978); S. Fish, "Literature in the Reader: Affective Stylistics," Is There a Text in This Class? (1980); D. E. Latané Jr., Browning's "Sordello" and the Aesthetics of Difficulty (1987); R. Poirier, The Renewal of Literature (1987); H. P. Grice, "Logic and Conversation," Studies in the Way of Words (1989); V. Shetley, After the Death of Poetry (1993); L. Hejinian, "Barbarism," Language of Inquiry (2000); J. E. Vincent, Queer Lyrics (2002); L. Diepeveen, The Difficulties of Modernism (2003); R. Kaufman, "Difficulty in Modern Poetry and Aesthetics," Just Being Difficult?, ed. J. Culler and K. Lamb (2003); C. Dworkin, Reading the Illegible (2003); I. Yaron, "What Is a 'Difficult Poem'? Towards a Definition," Journal of Literary Semantics 37 (2008); C. Bernstein, Attack of the Difficult Poems (2011).

A. L. OSBORN

DIMETER (Gr., "of two measures"). A line consisting of two measures. In *classical prosody, the *metron in *iambic, *trochaic, and *anapestic verse is a dipody (pair of feet); hence, the cl. iambic dimeter contains two metra or four feet. But in mod. prosodies, the concept of the metron was never established: here -meter is synonymous with foot. The Eng. iambic dimeter, therefore, consists of two feet, the trimeter of three feet, etc. This terminology applies only to *accentual-syllabic verse, which is regular: *accentual verse—e.g., a line of two stresses but a variable number of syllables—is not, properly speaking, a dimeter. Short-lined verse in Eng., such as the *Skeltonic, is rarely regular enough to be called dimeter, though dimeter lines feature in the *Burns stanza and the *limerick. More regular examples do occur, particularly in the 16th- and 17th-c. lyric, e.g., Michael Drayton's "An Amouret Anacreontic" and Robert Herrick's "To a Lark." More recent approximations include W. H. Auden's "This Lunar Beauty" and Donald Justice's "Dreams of Water."

T.V.F. Brogan; J. M. Cocola

DINDSHENCHAS (Gael., Dind, "eminent, notable place"; senchas, "ancient, traditional lore"). Collections of med. Ir. didactic material. The Ir. poet, the fili, was expected to know the meaning and historical significance of every place name, every geographical and topographical feature in Ireland, and that knowledge is what dindshenchas represents. The earliest extant collection of dindshenchas material is in the Book of Leinster (mid-12th c.). Two types of collection occur there, one consisting entirely of verse and the other of prose accounts, each with a single *quatrain that occurs at or near the end. This prose type occurs in several later mss. as well. A third type consists of a prose account followed by verse, and this type is represented in many mss. from the 14th to 16th cs. The poetry is of the dán díreach type, and the number of quatrains ranges from only a few to 80. The majority of the poems are without attribution, but a few are attributed to poets and monastic literati of the 9th to 11th cs. Thurneysen and Gwynn argued that the prose and poetry accounts of individual articles were originally separate and that they were integrated by around the beginning of the 13th c. However, Tomás Ó Concheanainn has argued that the full and original form of the dindshenchas is that in which each place-name legend is given first in prose and then in verse and that the so-called "metrical dindshenchas," that is, the verse-only versions, were abstracted from the underlying original, the prose with single quatrain versions being abridged forms of the original.

See celtic prosody, fili.

■ W. Stokes, "The Bodleian Dinnshenchas," Folklore 3 (1892); "The Edinburgh Dinnshenchas," Folklore 4 (1893); "The Prose Tales in the Rennes Dindshenchas," Revue Celtique 15 (1894), 16 (1895); R. Thurneysen, Die irische Helden- und Königsage bis zum siebzehnten jahrhundert (1921); The Metrical Dindshenchas, 5 vols., text and trans. by E. Gwynn (1903–35; rpt. 1991); M. O Daly, "The Metrical Dindshenchas," Early Irish Poetry, ed. J. Carney (1965); C. Bowen, "A Historical Inventory of the Dindshenchas," Studia Celtica 10/11 (1975/76); T. Ó Concheanainn, "The Three Forms of Dinnshenchas Érenn," pt. 1, The Journal of Celtic Studies 3, no. 1 (1981); pt. 2, 3, no. 2 (1982); Williams and Ford.

P. K. Ford

DINGGEDICHT. (Ger., "thing-poem"). A form of poetry exemplified most copiously by the Neue Gedichte that R. M. Rilke (1875–1926) wrote during his middle period, 1902–8, which he spent mostly in Paris. These poems represent concrete objects and situations (as well as a pictorially perceived constellation of things or actions) in a style of factual precision and semantic concentration. Their exactitude results from intense observation, which promises, usually in a concluding epiphany, to yield insights into the essential, though often ineffable, nature of things. A poem written as a Kunst-Ding is the complete opposite of an inspirational poésie du coeur (poem of the heart) and may be said to be the ideal symbolist poem (see symbolism). Its detached concern with objective facticity abstains from evoking moments of emotive proximity between the reader, the (implicit) lyrical persona, and the artistic "counterworld" into which they enter. The evocation of "inner" experiences, when not altogether limited to epiphanous instances, opens an interior space that is a sacral nowhere, an imaginary locus (das Imaginäre). This is to say that the Dinggedicht, strictly defined, enacts a process of transformation in which select forms and objects (delicate animals and flowers, exceptional human beings, artful constructs) are turned into aesthetic entities. In other words, a select item of factual reality is made into an aesthetic object (Ding) that exists, fully self-contained and self-sufficient, only as lang.; it is insubstantial. Paradoxically, it is the unattainable intent of this lang. to fill this void by transmuting itself into the real, incarnate presence of the "thing" or "image" invoked.

Historically, Rilke's perfection of thing-poetry after 1900 reflects a pervasive notion that quotidian life had become aggressively inimical to poetic sensibilities. The most influential response to this traumatic realization was Friedrich Nietzsche's defiant claim (made first in The Birth of Tragedy, 1871) that art, not morality, is "the true metaphysical activity of this life" and "that the existence of the world is justified only as an aesthetic phenomenon." Rilke's own reorientation was guided primarily by his perception of Auguste Rodin and Charles Baudelaire (as mediated by the exemplary sculptor) and, after 1907, by the equilibrium of colors achieved in the paintings of Paul Cézanne. Though he must have been familiar with some examples of the Dinggedicht—the term was not introduced into scholarly discussions until 1926—in Ger. postromantic verse (Eduard Mörike, Friedrich Hebbel, C. F. Meyer), the poésie objective of *Parnassianism (Théodore de Banville, Théophile Gautier, Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle, J.-M. de Heredia, and others) left no traces in his aesthetic reflections.

Convincing evidence for the general (and individually modified) relevance of the Dinggedicht can be found in the poetics of *imagism (i.e., in Ezra Pound's definition of image as "that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time"), in T. S. Eliot's concept of the *objective correlative, and in the early poetry of W. C. Williams ("no ideas but in things"), Marianne Moore, Gertrude Stein, Vicente Huidobro, and Wallace Stevens that gives priority to the objective status of physical phenomena over the perceiving mind. Hence, "object-poem" (Sandbank) has established itself as the term's most felicitous Eng. equivalent.

See CREATIONISM, OBJECTIVISM.

■ W. G. Müller, "Der Weg vom Symbolismus . . . zum Dinggedicht . . . ," Neophilologus 58 (1974); D. Wellbery, "Zur Poetik der Figuration . . . ," Zu R. M. Rilke, ed. E. Schwarz (1983); S. Sandbank, "The Object-Poem: In Defense of Referentiality," PoT 6 (1985); L. Ryan, "Rilke's Dinggedichte: The 'Thing' as 'Poem in Itself,'" Rilke-Rezeptionen—Rilke Reconsidered, ed. S. Bauschinger and S. L. Cocalis (1995); L. Powell, The Technological Unconscious in German Modernist Literature (2000).

M. WINKLER

DIPODISM, DIPODIC VERSE. Dipody (literally, two-footed) has been used to describe (1) a metrical unit larger than the *foot, (2) a kind of *meter, and (3) a rhythmic tendency. This line by John Masefield ("A Ballad of John Silver") can be described as eight trochees, the final foot catalectic, lacking a final syllable: "Shé was bóarded, shé was lóoted, shé was scúttled tíll she sánk." More sensitive ears, however, will hear four primary stresses (ˊ) and four secondary stresses (ˋ): "Shè was bóarded, shè was lóoted, shè was scúttled tìll she sánk." Moreover, there is a regular pattern pairing each primary stress with a secondary stress, creating four dipodes, each consisting of two trochees, the second trochee more emphatic than the first. Thus, a dipodic meter describes a regular pattern of primary and secondary stresses combining feet hierarchically into the larger metrical unit of the dipode.

The term dipody was first applied to Eng. verse in 1857 by Coventry Patmore, who borrowed it from *classical prosody. In cl. prosody, iambic, trochaic, and anapestic meters are usually counted dipodically rather than as feet. Iambic *trimeter, e.g., describes not three iambs as it would in Eng. but three dipodes, each having two feet. In each dipode, the first foot can be either iambic or spondaic, but the second foot must be iambic.

Patmore argued that dipody formed the foundation of all Eng. verse, incl. *iambic pentameter, making dipody a rhythmic principle as well as a meter. During the metrical experimentation of the late 19th c., many—incl. Masefield—wrote in dipodic meters. These poems have also been described as tetrasyllabic, quadruple, or paeonic verse (a *paeon is a four-syllable foot). Masefield's line can be described as "third paeons," the third syllable receiving the strong stress: "She was bóarded."

A perceptual basis for dipodism was established when Woodrow's experiments in 1909 indicated that primary stress on the first member of a subjective group of four usually produces secondary stress on the third. In 1930, Stewart first articulated a comprehensive theory of dipody in Eng. In 1959, Wimsatt and Beardsley argued that their theory of meter explains why "no great English poems" have been written in dipodic meters. Since then, dipodic meters have been left out of many practical handbooks.

In 1982, Attridge revised key portions of Stewart's argument. For Attridge, dipody does not underlie all verse but is one of several linguistic resources available: dipody usually plays a role in the most rhythmically insistent poetic forms, but iambic pentameter structurally resists dipody. Citing data gathered by Tarlinskaja in 1976, Attridge explains that folk poetry typically places the primary stress first, while literary poetry tends to place the secondary stress first. While the pattern in Masefield is secondary-primary, Attridge hears a primary-secondary pattern in the F. J. Child ballad "Thomas Rhymer": "Her skírt was òf the gráss-green sìlk, / Her mántel òf the vélvet fìne." Scholars of OE and of ME have argued whether these prosodies were dipodic, and scholars such as Turco use dipodic to refer to any group of feet, requiring no hierarchy of primary and secondary stresses.

See MEDIEVAL POETICS, METRON, RELATIVE STRESS PRINCIPLE.

■ C. Patmore, Essay on English Metrical Law (1857); H. Woodrow, "A Quantitative Study of Rhythm," Archives of Psychology 14 (1909); G. R. Stewart, The Technique of English Verse (1930); Wimsatt and Beardsley; Tarlinskaja; Attridge, Rhythms; L. Turco, The New Book of Forms (1986); D. Taylor, Hardy's Meters and Victorian Prosody (1988)—19th-c. experiments; T. Cable, The English Alliterative Tradition (1991); Gasparov, History.

M. L. MANSON

DIRGE. A song for the dead, sung at the funeral ceremony, at the procession, or afterward; the ancients made some generic distinctions. The Eng. term derives from the beginning of the antiphon in Lat. of the Office of the Dead ("Dirige, Domine . . .") adapted from Psalms 5:9. As a literary genre, the dirge developed out of Gr. funerary songs, particularly the epicedium*, the song sung over the dead, and the threnos, sung in memory of the dead. The Gr. dirge influenced the Lat. nenia, laments sung by hired professional poets, but these never became a literary genre, nor did the laudatio funebris, the public funeral oration. Originally a choral *ode, the threnody evolved into a *monody that was strophic in form and employed various metrical systems; it is common in Gr. poetry after the 6th c. BCE, and the distinction between epicedium and monody was still recognized in the Ren. (Puttenham).

Although in ancient lit. the dirge was sometimes influenced by the consolatio and closely connected with the *elegy, its chief aim was to lament the dead, not to console survivors—cf. the *lament for Hector at Odyssey 24.746 ff. But the subject matter included lamentation and eulogy, often with consolatory reflections, *apostrophes, and invocations. Not only human beings but animals might be mourned (cf. Catullus 3). In Gr., Simonides, Pindar, and the Alexandrian poets used the genre; in Lat., Calvus and Catullus used it first, and Propertius brought it to its greatest perfection (4.11). The meter in Lat. was the *hexameter or the *elegiac distich. The med. writers combined the Lat. form with the Church's lamentation for the dead, employing in the process Christian themes. Eng. examples of dirges include Henry King's "Exequy" on his young wife, R. W. Emerson's "Threnody on His Young Son," and George Meredith's "Dirge in Woods."

See ENDECHA.

■ R. Leicher, Die Totenklage in der deutschen Epik vom der Ältesten Zeit bis zur Nibelungen-Klage (1927); G. Herrlinger, Totenklage um Tiere in der antiken Dichtung (1930); E. Reiner, Die rituelle Totenklage der Griechen (1938); V. B. Richmond, Laments for the Dead in Medieval Narrative (1966); M. Alexiou, The Ritual Lament in Greek Tradition (1974); E. Vermeule, Aspects of Death in Early Greek Art and Poetry (1979); Poèmes de la mort de Turold à Villon, ed. and trans. J.-M. Paquette (1979); Do Not Go Gentle: Poems on Death, ed. W. Packard (1981); Japanese Death Poems, ed. and trans. Y. Hoffmann (1986); R. J. Cutter, "Saying Goodbye: The Transformation of the Dirge in Early Medieval China," Early Medieval China 10–11 (2004); Puttenham.

R. A. HORNSBY; T.V.F. BROGAN

DISCORDIA CONCORS. Derived through the reception of Pythagorean thought during the Ren., the phrase discordia concors received its canonical formulation in Franchino Gafurio's De harmonia musicorum instrumentorum (1518), which adapted Philolaus's definition of harmony into the maxim harmonia est discordia concors (harmony is discord concordant). The expression is an inversion of concordia discors, a doctrine common to the Empedoclean theory of elements (see Horace, Epistles 1.12). Significant for Ren. mathematics, music, and poetics, the legacy of discordia concors as a concept for lit. crit. was secured by Samuel Johnson's use of the phrase to critique the unnatural imagery of *metaphysical poetry.

See CONCEIT, MUSIC AND POETRY, NEOCLASSICAL POETICS, RENAISSANCE POETICS.

■ S. Johnson, "Life of Cowley," Lives of the English Poets (1781); H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker (1934); R. Wittkower, Architectural Principles in the Age of Humanism, 5th ed. (1998).

C. DONALDSON

DISSOCIATION OF SENSIBILITY. The phrase appeared in T. S. Eliot's "The Metaphysical Poets" (1921), where Eliot proposed that "something . . . happened to the mind of England between the time of Donne or Lord Herbert of Cherbury and the time of Tennyson and Browning. . . . Tennyson and Browning are poets, and they think; but they do not feel their thought as immediately as the odour of a rose. A thought to Donne was an experience; it modified his sensibility." To explain the change, Eliot proposed a "theory": "the poets of the 17th century, the successors of the dramatists of the 16th, possessed a mechanism of sensibility which could devour any kind of experience. . . . In the 17th century a dissociation of sensibility set in, from which we have never recovered; and this dissociation . . . was aggravated by the influence of the two most powerful poets of the century, Milton and Dryden." The first consequence was that "while the language became more refined, the feeling became more crude"; the second was the "sentimental age," which "began early in the 18th century, and continued. The poets . . . thought and felt by fits, unbalanced; they reflected."

What caused the dissociation of sensibility? In "Milton II" (1947), Eliot suggested that it involved issues at stake in the Eng. Civil War. The breakup of the Christian Eur. order, with which the dissociation of sensibility coincides, was in Eliot's view the central event of Eur. cultural hist., as it was for some of his New Critical followers. Those adopting the term have assigned responsibility variously to Thomas Hobbes (Brooks), Francis Bacon (Knights), Cartesian dualism (Willey), and the rise of capitalism (Kramer). It has also been suggested that a dissociation of sensibility is a permanent cultural condition that poetry specifically addresses (Altieri).

Eliot may have adapted the phrase from a sentence in Remy de Gourmont's essay on Jules Laforgue, but the "sensuous apprehension of thought" is one of the ideals of romantic poetics (Kermode). Eliot later backtracked and denounced both Donne and Laforgue for dissociating thought and feeling; in 1931 he argued that "in Donne, there is a manifest fissure between thought and sensibility." Still, a hypothetical "dissociation" and the identification of two distinct lines in the hist. of Eng. poetry inform modernist lit. hists. such as F. R. Leavis's Revaluation (1936) and C. Brooks's Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939). The view that 19th-c. Eng. and Am. poetry suffers from sentimentalism and makeshift philosophizing was for a time crucial to claims for the significance of modernist poetry.

See SENSIBILITY.

■ R. de Gourmont, "La Sensibilité de Jules Laforgue," Promenades littéraires 1 (1904); T. S. Eliot, "The Metaphysical Poets" (1921, rpt. Essays); "Donne in Our Time," in A Garland for John Donne, ed. T. Spencer (1931), and "Milton II" (1947, rpt. On Poetry and Poets, 1957); B. Willey, The Seventeenth-Century Background (1934), ch. 5; L. C. Knights, "Bacon and the Seventeenth-Century Dissociation of Sensibility," Scrutiny 11 (1943); R. Tuve, Elizabethan and Metaphysical Imagery (1947), ch. 7; F. W. Bateson, "Dissociation of Sensibility," Essays in Criticism 1–2 (1951–52); F. Kermode, Romantic Image (1957), ch. 8; J. E. Duncan, The Revival of Metaphysical Poetry (1959); J. Kramer, "T. S. Eliot's Concept of Tradition," New German Critique 6 (1975); E. Lobb, T. S. Eliot and the Romantic Critical Tradition (1981); P. Meisel, The Myth of the Modern (1987); L. Menand, Discovering Modernism (1987); C. Altieri, "Theorizing Emotions in Eliot's Poetry and Poetics," in Gender, Desire, and Sexuality in T. S. Eliot, ed. C. Laity and N. Gish (2004).

L. MENAND

DISSONANCE. The quality of being harsh or inharmonious in rhythm or sound; akin to *cacophony. Insofar as the terms may be distinguished, cacophony is that which is harsh-sounding in itself, while dissonance is that which is discordant or inharmonious with what surrounds it. Dissonance, rather than cacophony, is invoked in discussions of *rhythm; and while cacophony is sometimes unintentional, dissonance usually implies deliberate choice. By extension, the term may also refer to other elements in a poem that are discordant in their immediate context: tonality, theme, imagery (*catachresis), or syntax (*anacoluthon). Just as there is frequent confusion between the euphonious and the musical, so too there is a tendency among critics and readers to identify dissonance with the unmusical. But as Northrop Frye reminds us, music is concerned not with the beauty but with the organization of sound. A musical discord is not an unpleasant sound but an energetic one. Applying this principle to poetry, we can say, with Frye, that when we find harsh, barking accents, crabbed lang., mouthfuls of consonants, and the like, we are likely to be reading a poet influenced by music. Robert Browning ("Not a plenteous cork-crop: scarcely") and G. M. Hopkins ("sheer plod makes plough down sillion / Shine") made notable use of dissonance. It is also frequently found in Fr. *baroque, Eng. *metaphysical, and Sp. mannerist poetry.

See EUPHONY, MANNERISM, SOUND.

■ J. B. Douds, "Donne's Technique of Dissonance," PMLA 52 (1937); A. Stein, "Donne's Harshness and the Elizabethan Tradition," SP 41 (1944); N. Frye, "The Rhythm of Recurrence: Epos," Anatomy of Criticism, and "Lexis and Melos," Sound and Poetry, ed. Frye (both 1957); A. Ostriker, "Thomas Wyatt and Henry Surrey," NLH 1 (1970); M. Gibson, "The Poetry of Struggle: Browning's Style," VP 19 (1981); S. F. Walker, "The Wrong Word at the Right Time," Proceedings of the Tenth Congress of the International Comparative Literature Association, ed. A. Balakian et al., vol. 2 (1982); E. DeLamotte, "Dissonance and Resolution in Four Quartets," MLQ 49 (1988); M. A. Evans, "Soubresaut or Dissonance? An Aspect of the Musicality of Baudelaire's 'Petits Poèmes en prose,'" MLR 83 (1988).

L. BISHOP; A.WATSON

DISTICH. A pair of metrical lines, a *couplet, *heterometric in cl. poetry but usually *isometric in mod. In cl. poetry, the most common type is the *elegiac distich, consisting of a dactylic *hexameter followed by a dactylic *pentameter and often used for *epigram. The widely known Distichs of Cato carried the form of the distich from Lat. into the Middle Ages; it is still common in mod. Gr. poetry. But with the emergence of the romance vernaculars, the couplet (most often octosyllabic) was normally isometric and rhymed. Thomas Sébillet was the first to use the term distique in *French prosody, where it retained more currency than in Eng.

■ G. Soyter, "Das volkstümliche Distichon bei den Neugriechen," Laographia 8 (1925); Disticha Cantonis, ed. M. Boas (1952); Koster.

T.V.F. BROGAN

DIT. A type of med. Fr. composition of notorious nebulousness, the generic specificity of which is often called into question by mod. critics (indeed, many scholars would consider the Roman de la Rose a self-proclaimed roman, to be the most important med. dit). The designation first appeared around 1200 and continued to be used frequently through the 14th c. The only constants of the dit are its relatively brief length (at least before the mid- to late 14th c.), verse form, and the fact that it was usually spoken (or read) rather than sung. With the exception of drama, it was the only major nonlyric verse genre in Fr. of the later Middle Ages and often served as a site for *lyric insertion. Its verse form is usually nonstanzaic (rhyming octosyllabic couplets are esp. common), but two stanzaic forms—rhymed quatrains of *alexandrines and strophes d'Hélinand (12 octosyllabic lines, aabaabbbabba)—are not uncommon. Critics often remark on the didactic aspirations of the dit (see DIDACTIC POETRY)—particularly when didacticism is taken to include the religious, satirical, moral, and courtly—and on the strong presence of a first-person speaker throughout the entire poem (in contradistinction to the romance). In the later Middle Ages in particular, the dit was the privileged form for ambitious explorations of the relationship between personal experience and knowledge. Famous practitioners include Rutebeuf, Guillaume Le Clerc de Normandie, Huon Le Roi, Henri d'Andeli, Beaudouin de Condé, Jean de Condé, Guillaume de Machaut, Jean Froissart, and Christine de Pizan. Texts described as dits by authors or rubricators often receive another generic label, such as conte, *fabliau, traité, complainte, lai*, and sermon. The term's fluidity may result from its ability to denote a text conceived of as the result of poetic composition; early on it often appears paired with the term trouver (to compose).

■ J. Cerquiglini, "Le Clerc et l'écriture: Le 'Voir dit' de Guillaume de Machaut et la définition du 'dit'," Literatur in der Gesellschaft des Spätmittelalters, ed. H. U. Gumbrecht (1980); M. Zink, La subjectivité littéraire: autour du siècle de saint Louis (1985); J. Cerquiglini, "Le Dit," La littérature française aux XIVe et XVe siècles, ed. D. Poirion (1988); M. Léonard, Le dit et sa technique littéraire des origines à 1340 (1996); A. Armstrong and S. Kay, Knowing Poetry: Verse in Medieval France from the "Rose" to the "Rhétoriqueurs" (2011).

E. ZINGESSER

DITHYRAMB. A genre of Gr. choral *lyric or *melic poetry performed in honor of Dionysus. The earliest reference (Archilochus, frag. 77) associates the dithyramb with drunken revelry: "I know how to lead the beautiful dithyramb-song of Lord Dionysus when my mind is thunder-struck with wine." The genre's origins are obscure, but Arion is credited with introducing formal improvements and a circular *chorus in Corinth at the beginning of the 6th c. BCE, while, at the end of the same century, Lasus of Hermione improved the music and dance and helped establish dithyrambic contests at Athens. Dithyrambs were also performed at Delos during the winter months when they replaced *paeans to Apollo. Judging from extant 5th-c. examples and from the names given by Alexandrian editors (e.g., Bacchylides, the Sons of Antenor, the Youths, or Theseus), heroic narratives, often unconnected with Dionysus, later became a prominent feature of the genre. Although Simonides was a leading composer of dithyrambs (credited with 56 victories in contests), not a verse remains. We possess only fragments of Pindar's two books of dithyrambs but have substantial portions of five dithyrambs and the beginning of a sixth by Bacchylides (Jebb, Burnett). In the 4th c., the dithyramb underwent considerable modification—and evident decline—at the hands of Philoxenus and Timotheus, who originated what is sometimes called the New Dithyramb (Smyth) by abolishing the strophic structure and introducing solo singing along with musical and verbal virtuosity (Pickard-Cambridge). Since there is no appreciable difference between the style of Pindar's and Bacchylides' surviving dithyrambs and that of their other poems, the later reputation of the dithyramb for extreme license (cf. Horace, Odes 4.2) must stem from its later stages of devel. Although *hymns to Bacchus continued to be written (e.g., Horace, Odes 2.19, 3.25), the genre of dithyramb was moribund by the 2d c. BCE. In mod. usage, dithyrambic characterizes a style that is ecstatic, vehement, or unpredictable; probably the best-known mod. example in this mode is John Dryden's "Alexander's Feast."

See GREEK POETRY.

■ O. Crusius, "Dithyramb," Pauly-Wissowa; H. W. Smyth, Greek Melic Poets (1900); R. C. Jebb, Bacchylides (1905); H. Färber, Die Lyrik in der Kunsttheorie der Antike (1936); A. E. Harvey, "The Classification of Greek Lyric Poetry," CQ 5 (1955); A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, Dithyramb, Tragedy and Comedy, 2d ed. (1962); A. P. Burnett, The Art of Bacchylides (1985); R. Hamilton, "The Pindaric Dithyramb," Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 93 (1990); A. D'Angour, "How the Dithyramb Got Its Shape," CQ 47 (1997).

W. H. RACE

DITTY, dittie, dictie, etc. (Lat. dictum, dict, a saying). In ME, ditty denoted a composition or treatise and then a piece of verse; by the 16th c., it had come to mean the words of a song. As a verb, ditty could mean to sing a song or to set words to music—now obsolete. In Thomas Morley's Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practical Musicke (1597), the section on how to fit music to a text is titled "Rules to be Observed in Dittying," and Samuel Daniel in A Defence of Ryme (1603) remarks that feminine rhymes are "fittest for Ditties." But in its mod. sense a song or tune, esp. a light or simple one, ditty has almost lost its association with words.

■ L. E. Auld, "Text as Pre-text: French Court Airs and Their Ditties," Literature and the Other Arts, ed. D. L. Rubin (1993).

E. DOUGHTIE

DIVAN. A Middle Persian word (also spelled as diwan) borrowed in Ar., Armenian, Pashto, mod. Persian, Turkish, and Urdu to refer to a collection of poems or the corpus of a single poet. The same word exists in several langs. for a list or register, the state or legal council, chancery, administrative and bureaucratic branches of the government, state records, written scrolls, bureaucrats, a site for governmental records, and a hall for official meetings in Islamic states. The usage of divan in poetics—not for a genre but for a form of traditional publication since the Abbasid period (750–1258) by Ar. philologists (many of them of Persian origin) to assemble the works of pre-Islamic Arab poets—is likely related to the other usages, associated with words, letters, records, and a particular kind of seat associated with high rank, contemplation, conversation, and leisure culture.

Typically, the divan of a poet contains all of his or her poetic works without the long poems (masnavīs*). Most mss. (or mod. eds.) are organized according to (Asian) poetic forms, usually with qaṣīdas* first, then ghazals*, qiṭ'as*, and rubā'ī* last. The order of these forms within a section follows the logic not of chronology but of the alphabet. The rhyming word in combination with the first word of the first line of each poem nearly always determines its place among other poems of its kind. However, early Arab and Persian mss. are generally not arranged alphabetically but often grouped by subject.

The Ger. trans. of the divan of the 14th-c. Persian poet Ḥāfiẓ in the early 19th c. inspired the first collection of poems in Europe that used the word divan in its title: J. W. Goethe's West-östlicher Divan (West-Eastern Divan, 1819), his largest collection of lyric poems and one of the first mod. examples of cross-cultural and transnational poetics. While adopting Islamic and Persian themes (such as Suleika, the wife of Potiphar in the Joseph story in the book of Genesis, and saqi the cupbearer) as well as incorporating various metaphors of cl. Persian poetry (e.g., moth, candle light, pearl), Goethe does not arrange the poems according to the received model. Following the organizational logic of Joseph Hammer-Purgstall's Ger. trans. (1812) of Ḥāfiẓ's Divan, Goethe structures his Divan thematically in books: "The Book of the Singer," "The Book of Love," "The Book of Paradise," and so on.

While a collection of cl. poems in traditional forms is still often published as a divan or complete works, the poems of 20th-c. and contemp. poets are less frequently published under the rubric but are simply designated as a collection or collected works.

See ARABIC POETRY, GERMAN POETRY, PERSIAN POETRY, TURKISH POETRY.

■ E. G. Browne, A Literary History of Persia, 4 v. (1902–28); J. Rypka, History of Iranian Literature, trans. K. Jahn (1968); Der Diwan von Mohammed Schemsed-din Hafis, trans. J. F. Hammer (1973); Divan-i Hafiz, ed. P. N. Khānlarī (1982); J. Rūmī, Divan-i Shams-e

Tabrizi, trans. R. A. Nicholson (2001)—selected trans.; Z. Safa, Tarikh-i Adabiyat dar Iran, 16th ed., 8 v. (2001)—hist. of lit. in Iran; Le Divan: Oeuvre lyrique d'un spiritual en Perse au XIVe siècle, trans. C.-H. de Fouchécour (2006)—Fr. trans. of Ḥāfiz; The Collected Lyrics of Ḥáfiz of Shíráz, trans. P. Avery (2007)—Eng. trans.; General Introduction to Persian Literature, ed. J.T.P. de Bruijn (2009).

S. Shamel

DIZAIN. In Fr. poetry, the dizain is either a short poem of ten lines or a ten-line stanza within a longer form, such as the *ode, the ballade, the chanson, or the chant royal. As a separate poem, it was popular in the 15th and 16th cs. as a composition of octosyllabic or decasyllabic lines that, in the work of Clément Marot and Mellin de Saint-Gelais, had the rhyme scheme ababbccdcd. Maurice Scève composed the first Fr. canzoniere*, Délie (1544), with 449 decasyllabic dizains, all but 15 following this scheme. Used uniformly as the sole building unit for an entire Petrarchan sequence, the dizain scévien thus marks the transition between med. lyric forms such as the *rondeau or the chanson and the *sonnet. Thomas Sébillet in his Art poétique françoys of 1548 associates both dizain and sonnet with the epigram: for him, the dizain is "l'épigramme aujourd'hui estimé premier," while the "sonnet n'est autre chose que le parfait épigramme de l'Ita. comme le dizain du Français" (the sonnet is nothing but the perfect epigrammatic form in It. as the dizain is in French). As employed later by the Pléiade, the dizain has the rhyme scheme ababccdeed, is less often found as a separate poem, and may be composed of verses of different lengths. Three or five dizains, each group with an envoi*, form together a ballade or a chant royal, respectively. Those med. forms are banished by the Pléiade; but in the wake of François de Malherbe, the dizain continues to be the most widely used stanza in the cl. ode. With the scheme ababccdeed and in octosyllables, it is taken over into Rus. versification in the 18th c. by Mikhail Lomonosov and Gavrila Derzhavin. Several dizains appear in Philip Sidney's Old Arcadia and New Arcadia (e.g., the dialogue between Strephon and Claius after book 4 in the Old, book 2 in the New): they do not, however, keep the double internal *couplets and mirror-image rhyme scheming of Scève's model. As a separate poem, the dizain is revived in the 19th c. by François Coppée and Paul Verlaine.

See France, poetry of; petrarchism; sonnet sequence.

■ P. Martinon, Les Strophes (1912); H. Chamard, Histoire de la Pléiade, v. 4 (1941); T. Sébillet, Art poëtique françoys, ed. F. Goyet (1990); E. M. Duval, "From the Chanson parisienne to Scève's French Canzoniere: Lyric Form and Logical Structure of the Dizain," A Scève Celebration: Délie 1544–1994, ed. J. C. Nash (1994); B. de Cornulier, Art poétique: Notions et problèmes de métrique (1995); C. Alduy, Politique des "Amours" (2007).

I. Silver; T. V. F. Brogan; C. Alduy

DIZER (Galician-Port., "to say"). A satirical song in Galician-Port. during the 13th and 14th cs. composed to speak ill (mal dizer) of someone, often in the form of obscenities. In the corpus of Cantigas d'Escarnho e de Mal Dizer (Songs of Mockery and Insult), authors sometimes use the terms dizer and razões to indicate words as opposed to tunes (sões).

See cancionero/cancioneiro, cantiga.

M. Galvez

DOCHMIAC or dochmius (Gr., "slanted"). A metrical sequence found almost exclusively in Gr. tragedy, chiefly in passages expressing intense emotion, agitation, or grief. The basic form is x – – ⏑ – (the commonest form x ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ –), but there are about 30 varieties, and they also appear combined with iambs. Some metrists (e.g., Snell) do not acknowledge the existence of dochmiacs outside of Gr. drama; others find them in Pindar and Bacchylides. Lat. metrists sometimes group such structures among bacchiac cola (see bacchius) or catalectic bacchiac dimeters (Crusius). The anaclastic (see anaclasis) form is called the hypodochmiac (– ⏑ – ⏑ –).

■ Maas; N. C. Conomis, "The Dochmiacs of Greek Drama," Hermes 92 (1964)—the fundamental collection of material and statistics; Koster, chap. 12; Crusius; Dale, chap. 7; Halporn et al.; Snell; West.

J. W. Halporn

DOCUMENTARY POETICS is less a systematic theory or doctrine of a kind of poetry than an array of strategies and techniques that position a poem to participate in discourses of reportage for political and ethical purposes. In this, it is documentary in two potentially conflicting senses: it consists of, concerns, or is based on purportedly objective records of facts or events but uses those records to support, elaborate, or advance an often passionately held partisan position. At once factual and ideological, documentary poetics engages both the empirical world in which we live and the political or ethical ideals through which we navigate that world.

Most fully elaborated in film crit. and theory, the term documentary was coined in 1926 by the filmmaker John Grierson to describe Robert J. Flaherty's account of Polynesian island life in the film Moana. Three variants of the *genre emerged in the 1920s and early 1930s: Flaherty's romanticized documentaries portraying native cultures, Grierson's sponsored documentaries promoting governmental or corporate solutions to contemp. social problems, and Dziga Vertov's avant-garde documentaries foregrounding the camera as a "mechanical I . . . showing the world as it is" in service of a revolutionary Marxist analysis. Each of these iterations of the form positioned itself against the burgeoning Hollywood entertainment industry, established a relationship with viewers based on a claim to objective representation of actuality, and insisted on the truth-value and social consequence of its findings.

Like Walt Whitman, who held that "the true use for the imaginative faculty of modern times is to give ultimate vivification to facts, to science, and to common lives," the poets of *imagism and *objectivism who laid the groundwork for documentary poetics pushed aside scholastic logic, romantic introspection, and Victorian didacticism to think with or through things. "Thinking," Ernest Fenollosa declared, "is thinging." "Consider the way of the scientists," Ezra Pound exhorted aspiring imagists in 1913: begin by learning what has already been established, scrutinize the data, and persuade not by force of personality but through discovery of facts. While imagism led to such brief, intense poems as Pound's "In a Station of the Metro" (1913) or H.D.'s "Oread" (1914), the turmoil following World War I drew modernists toward longer hybrid forms that could include historical, civic, scientific, legislative, or journalistic information. The public records embedded in such works as Pound's Malatesta, Jefferson, and Confucian Cantos (1925, 1934, 1940); W. C. Williams's Paterson (1946–58); Charles Olson's Maximus Poems (1960–75); Susan Howe's Articulation of Sound Forms in Time (1987); Rosmarie Waldrop's Shorter American Memory (1988); and Mark Nowak's Shut Up Shut Down (2004) are documentary in both senses of the word: they turn, i.e., empirical, historical fact to passionate political use.

The most distilled iteration of facts in documentary poetics emerges in the Am. 1930s. Mike Gold's and Tillie Olsen's excerpts from workers' correspondence; Muriel Rukeyser's citations of congressional hearings, medical reports, and stock ticker readouts in Book of the Dead; and Charles Reznikoff's condensations of legal documents in Testimony coincided with the rise of documentary photography and photojournalism, newsreels, and documentaries, the Federal Theater Project's living newspapers, and on-the-spot radio broadcasts by such reporters as Edward R. Murrow and William Shirer. Poets aimed, in Whitman's words, "to give ultimate vivification to facts" or, in Rukeyser's words, "extend the document" by lineating instances of violence, hatred, suffering, and injustice.

The social, political, and epistemological crises of the 1960s put terms like objective, factual, or truthful under withering scrutiny. In response to the demystification of the ideal of transparency, documentarians in all the arts turned to notions of spontaneity and authenticity as guarantors of the real: just as cinema verité filmmakers such as Frederick Wiseman foreswore scripting, lighting, and staging, jazz musicians such as Dizzy Gillespie and Charlie Parker composed in the moment of performance, Jack Kerouac developed a free-form "spontaneous bop prosody," and Allen Ginsberg documented his generation and attacked the military-industrial establishment in the explosive breath units of such poems as Howl and "Wichita Vortex Sutra" (see BEAT POETRY).

Skeptical of the romantic interiority that accompanies improvisatory composition, such 21st-c. poets as Mark Nowak and Claudia Rankine sample the journalistic, corporate, and governmental records of a media-driven globalized economy. Resistant to unified perspective, their poems participate in a broad culture that operates through the sharing and recombining of data. Often but not necessarily digitized, this information-age database poetics, like the documentary poetics of the 1930s and 1960s, makes empirical and ethical use of archival materials.

As Nichols emphasizes, the term documentary is relational or comparative. Just as documentary filmmakers position themselves against mainstream cinema, documentary poets position themselves against the late romantic lyric. The flexible inventory of strategies and techniques that constitute documentary poetics, however, rests on shared assumptions about the purpose of poetry, the poet's responsibility to objective or empirical knowledge, and the imperative of ethical action in the face of social crisis and catastrophe.

See ELECTRONIC POETRY; INFORMATION, POETRY AS; MODERNISM.

■ W. Whitman, "A Backward Glance O'er Travel'd Roads," Leaves of Grass (1891–92); E. Pound, "A Few Don'ts," Poetry 1 (1913); L. Zukofsky, "An Objective," Poetry 37 (1931); M. Rukeyser, U.S. 1 (1938); L. Chisolm, Fenollosa (1963); W. Stott, Documentary Expression and Thirties America (1973); D. Vertov, "Kino-eye" (1926), Kino-Eye, ed. A. Michelson (1984); Theorizing Documentary, ed. M. Renov (1993); B. Nichols, Introduction to Documentary (2001); M. Vescia, Depression Glass (2006); P. Aufderheide, Documentary Film (2007).

A. MORRIS

DOGGEREL (origin unknown). Rough, poorly constructed verse, characterized by either (1) extreme metrical irregularity or (2) easy rhyme and monotonous rhythm, cheap sentiment, and triviality. George Saintsbury and others formerly used the term as a pejorative for stress verse. Chaucer refers to his burlesque "Tale of Sir Thopas" as rym dogerel, and Samuel Johnson stigmatized its vices with a famous parody:

> As with my hat upon my head
> I walk'd along the Strand,
> I there did meet another man
> With his hat in his hand.
>
> (G. Steevens in Johnsonian Miscellanies, ed. G. B. Hill, v. 2 [1897])

Northrop Frye has characterized doggerel as the result of an unfinished creative process, in which a "prose initiative" never assumes the associative qualities of true poetry, revealing its failure in an attempt to resolve technical difficulties through any means available (Hinsey). There are, however, some works of real poetic value in which features of doggerel are deliberately used for comic or satiric effect. John Skelton, Samuel Butler, and Jonathan Swift are all masters of artistic doggerel, and much Ger. knittelvers* also achieves a brilliant parodic effect.

See ACCENTUAL VERSE.

■ P. Reyher, Essai sur le doggerel (1909); Frye; E. Hinsey, "The Rise of Modern Doggerel," NER/BLQ 19, no. 2 (Spring 1998); N. Page, In Search of the World's Worst Writers (2001).

L. B. PALACHE

DOLCE STIL NUOVO (It. "Sweet new style"). Term commonly used to designate a group of late 13th-c. It. love poets and to describe the special character of their *lyric production. The term first appears in Dante's Purgatorio (24.57), where it defines his poetic style (stil), separating it from that of the earlier Sicilian and Guittonian poets and describing its characteristics as audibly and intellectually pleasing (dolce) and new in concept (nuovo). Generally speaking, Dante's term has considerable validity: the "sweetness" of his style is attained, analysts have discovered, through a careful selection and ordering of words of pleasurable sound. The "newness" most probably refers to the poet's inventive variations on traditional poetic themes.

The literary background from which the Dolce stil nuovo emerged was chiefly Occitan *troubadour poetry, a trad. two centuries old and still vital in Italy at the time of Dante's birth. From *Occitan poetry, the stilnovisti learned the conventions of *courtly love with its religious overtones, its idealization of women, its emphasis on nobility (gentilezza), and its faith in the ennobling effect of love on the lover. A second influence important for the stil nuovo is the Franciscan revival, which stressed sincerity, simplicity, and a feeling for the unity of the human being with nature. For their poetry that transcends the secular adoration of woman, the stilnovisti adapted the lang. and imagery employed for the mystical adoration of the Virgin by the Marian cults. Philosophy, too, had an important influence on the stil nuovo. From Guido Guinizzelli to Guido Cavalcanti and even Petrarch, all the important stilnovisti had contact with the University of Bologna, where Thomistic theology and medicine were taught, both of which were allied to the great 13th-c. revival of Aristotelianism. Avicenna on medicine and Averroës on Aristotle were also influential. The joint result of these several influences was to deepen the analysis of love found in the poetry of the Dolce stil nuovo. In fact, it has been suggested that the philosophical and often metaphysical bent of stil nuovo poetry is its most distinctive characteristic (Vossler). Another important influence is that of the *Sicilian school of poets, which flourished in the first half of the 13th c. and whose most prominent figure is the notary Giacomo da Lentini, the probable inventor of the *sonnet.

The first poet in the so-called school of the Dolce stil nuovo is the jurisconsult Guido Guinizzelli, who composed the important doctrinal canzone* "Al cor gentil rempaira sempre amore." His emphasis on the poetics and thematics of praise was imitated by Dante in many poems, most notably in his well-known sonnet in the Vita nuova, "Tanto gentile e tanto onesta pare." Guinizzelli repeats the troubadour commonplaces but seems to expand on the basis of Platonic doctrine: the eyes (as in Plato's Republic, book 4) are the most beautiful part of the body—the windows of the soul. The saluto (greeting) ranks second (in accordance with Aristotle's teaching of the "smile"). Love and the noble heart are one and the same; love cannot exist anywhere save in a noble heart, and a noble heart cannot exist without love. This nobility is of the spirit, not of heredity through blood or worldly riches; it derives from one's innate virtue. In Guido's conception, the beloved activates the lover's inborn disposition toward good and is instrumental in raising the lover's soul to the Highest Good, making for communion with the Absolute and the Eternal. Guinizzelli's method is Scholastic, but his manner is distinguished by use of scientific observation of natural phenomena in images and similes to objectify the internal sensations of love.

Guido Cavalcanti, Dante's "first friend" (primo amico), devoted his doctrinal canzone "Donna me prega per ch'eo voglio dire" to his Christian, neo-Aristotelian understanding of love. His treatment of love's origins and nature may show some Averroistic influence, but in the main, his work consists of profoundly intimate reveries on feminine beauty. Amid the agitation and anguish caused by his state, he is haunted by the phantom of love and the specter of death.

In the Vita nuova, Dante discloses his personal poetic and amorous iter through a combination of poems and prose narratives or glosses that, by recounting his love for Beatrice, summarizes in a specific way the general outline of the evolution of the love-lyric trad. The early poems in the Vita nuova are pervaded by morbid introspection, anguish, and self-pity that derive from Cavalcantian models. The first canzone of the Vita nuova ("Donne ch'avete intelletto d'amore") marks the break with these attitudes and embraces Guinizzelli's view of love; from this point, the poems of this work adhere to the theme of praise and contain elements of the Platonic outlook, particularly seeing the beloved as angelic. The death of the lady in the case of Dante's Beatrice (as well as of Petrarch's Laura) is a supreme milestone in the pilgrim's progress in love. Having died, she becomes an angelic form who, through the light of the eyes and radiance of the smile, leads the lover, as true guide and symbol of virtue, to God in his goodness, the ideal of perfection. In Dante's Convivio (1304–7), we learn (2.15.10, 3.12.2–3, 4.2) that he reserved a special manner of sweetness of expression for rhymes of love and that his conception of amore included the eager pursuit of knowledge. In his unfinished Lat. treatise De vulgari eloquentia (ca. 1304), Dante elaborates (2.8, 12) on his ideas on style (the tragic being the highest), lang. (the illustrious vernacular being the sweetest), form (the canzone being the noblest), and meter (the *hendecasyllable being the most excellent). In the same work, he names Cavalcanti, Lapo Gianni, himself, and Cino da Pistoia, whom he favors esp. for his subtlety and sweetness, as those poets who composed lyrics in the high style. Dante's remarks have led some critics to believe in the existence of a more or less self-conscious "school" of the Dolce stil nuovo. More likely, it was simply a loosely organized group of friends with more or less common poetic interests. Critics have added to the supposed group Gianni Alfani and Dino Frescobaldi. Later poets such as Guido Novello da Polenta (Dante's host in Ravenna during his exile) and Giovanni Quirini imitate the essential traits of the Dolce stil nuovo.

Petrarch throughout his several reworkings of the Canzoniere shows much influence of the Dolce stil nuovo. However, he was not altogether successful in his attempt to subjugate his great passion to the Dantean ideal. His awareness of this dilemma is expressed in the crescendo and diminuendo, the ebb and flow, throughout his carefully contrived poetic collection. Later followers of the stilnovisti include Matteo Frescobaldi, Franceschino degli Albizzi, Sennuccio del Bene, Giovanni Boccaccio (the last two, poetic correspondents of Petrarch), Cino Rinuccini, and Giovanni Gherardi da Prato.

Through the influence of Petrarch, the conventions of the stil nuovo were spread throughout Europe, profoundly affecting the develop. of lyric poetry in France, Spain, England, and elsewhere. Lorenzo de' Medici, the reviver of *Petrarchism for the It. Quattrocento, consciously imitated the stil nuovo. He also appreciated the minor stilnovisti, as evidenced by his letter to Frederick of Aragon accompanying the anthol. of early It. poetry he compiled for Frederick.

See ITALY, POETRY OF.

■ Criticism: K. Vossler, Mediaeval Culture, trans. W. C. Lawton (1929); A. Figurelli, Il Dolce stil nuovo (1933); A. Lipari, The Dolce Stil Nuovo according to Lorenzo de' Medici (1936); J. E. Shaw, Guido Cavalcanti's Theory of Love (1949); E. Bigi, "Genesi di un concetto storiografico: 'dolce stil nuovo,'" Giornale Storico della Letteratura Italiana 132 (1955); M. Valency, In Praise of Love (1958); Fisher; G. Petrocchi, "Il Dolce stil nuovo," Storia della letteratura italiana, ed. E. Cecchi and N. Sapegno (1965); P. Boyde, Dante's Style in His Lyric Poetry (1971); E. Pasquini and A. E. Quaglio, Lo Stilnovo e la poesia religiosa (1971); M. Marti, Storia dello stil nuovo, 2 v. (1973); R. Russell, Tre versanti della poesia stilnovistica (1973); E. Savona, Repertorio tematico del dolce stil nuovo (1973); Wilkins; G. Favati, Inchiesta sul dolce stil nuovo (1975); F. Suitner, Petrarca e la tradizione stilnovistica (1977); M. Marti, "Stil nuovo," Enciclopedia dantesca, v. 5 (1978); V. Moleta, Guinizzelli in Dante (1980); A. Solimena, Repertorio metrico dello Stil nuovo, 1980—metrical index; G. Gorni, Il nodo della lingua e il verbo d'amore (1981); I. Bertelli, La Poesia di Guido Guinizzelli e la poetica del "dolce stil nuovo" (1983); I. Bertelli, I fondamenti artistici e culturali del "dolce stil nuovo" (1987); L. Pertile, "Il nodo di Bonagiunta, le penne di Dante e il Dolce Stil Novo," Lettere Italiane 46 (1994).

■ Primary Texts: Rimatori del Dolce Stil Nuovo, ed. L. di Benedetto, 2d ed. (1939); Guido Cavalcanti, Rime, ed. G. Favati (1957); Poeti del Duecento, ed. G. Contini, 2 v. (1960); Dante's Lyric Poetry, ed. and trans. K. Foster and P. Boyde, 2 v. (1967); Poeti del Dolce stil nuovo, ed. M. Marti (1969); The Poetry of Guido Cavalcanti, ed. and trans. L. Nelson Jr. (1986); The Poetry of Guido Guinizzelli, ed. and trans. R. Edwards (1987).

L. H. GORDON; C. KLEINHENZ

DOL'NIK (pl. dol'niki). Rus. accentual meter. Unlike Rus. syllabotonic (or *accentual-syllabic) meters, which have a constant syllabic interval between ictuses, the dol'nik has a variable interval of one or two syllables. The dol'nik remained an oddity in late 18th- and 19th-c. Rus. poetry, in which syllabotonic meters predominated; it appeared only in poems stylized after folk songs or trans. In Ger. and Eng., the equivalent of the dol'nik appeared toward the end of the 18th c. and was based on native folk verse, but the popular 19th-c. Rus. trans. of Ger. and Eng. accentual ballads used mostly syllabotonic verse. Thus, the dol'nik does not carry folkloric connotations in Rus. poetry, unlike its equivalent in Eng. and Ger. Only in 20th-c. Rus. verse does the dol'nik become widespread, esp. in the work of the symbolist Alexander Blok. By 1930, the three-stress dol'nik had become one of the staple meters of Rus. poetry; Joseph Brodsky often made use of the meter.

Although the dol'nik exists in three-, four-, and variable-stress lines, that with three ictuses prevails. The *anacrusis, the number of syllables before the first stress, may be fixed or may vary; the line end is usually rhymed. The line tends to consist of eight syllables (excluding syllables after the last stress); the first *ictus coincides with the third syllable, the second ictus with the fifth or sixth, and the third with the eighth. Some poets use an isosyllabic line in which the second ictus is fixed on the sixth syllable, a variant sometimes called *logaoedic verse.

■ A. Kolmogorov and A. Proxorov, "O dol'nike sovremennoj russkoj poézii," Voprosy iazykoznaniia (1963, 1964); J. Bailey, "Some Recent Developments in the Study of Russian Versification," Lange&S 5 (1972); Gasparov; G. S. Smith, "Logaoedic Metres in the Lyric Poetry of Marina Tsvetayeva," Slavonic and East European Review 53 (1975); Tarlinskaja; Terras; Scherr; M. Wachtel, The Development of Russian Verse (1998); G. S. Smith, "The Development of Joseph Brodsky's Dol'nik Verse, 1972–1976," Russian, Croatian and Serbian, Czech and Slovak, Polish Literature 52.4 (2002).

J. O. BAILEY; C. DOAK

DOUBLE DACTYL. A *light verse form in two quatrains. The last lines of the quatrains must rhyme, using a dactylic foot followed by a stress. The other six lines are all hexasyllables of two dactylic feet, hence the name. The first line is a nonsense phrase, usually "Higgledy piggledy," the second line a proper name, and the second line of the second quatrain a polysyllable, the more recondite the better.

Blosody-frosody
Ralph Waldo Emerson
Thought transcendentally
Far beyond form.
Often he suffered from Humdrumophobia
Probably worsened by Some Harvard dorm.

The form is notoriously flippant. Paul and Naomi Pascal and Anthony Hecht invented double dactyls in the early 1950s; in the 1960s, Hecht and John Hollander published the first collection.

■ A. Hecht and J. Hollander, Jiggery Pokery (1966); W. Espy, Almanac of Words at Play (1980); A. Harrington, Tersery Versery (1982).

F. Teague; S. Cushman

DOZENS. A game of exchanging, in contest form, ritualized verbal insults, which are usually in rhymed *couplets and often profane. The term is probably a literate corruption of the vernacular doesn'ts, relating to forbidden lang. activity. The game is practiced now mostly among adolescent Af. Am. males, though its origin is thought to lie in the verbal insult contests of West Africa. The dozens is a subcategory of *signifying. Sometimes referred to as woofing, sounding, cutting, capping, or chopping, the ritual is most often called playing the dozens. The subjects of the insults are frequently the relatives of the verbal opponent, esp. his mother, and the insults are frequently sexual. A mildly phrased example of the dozens technique and style would be "I don't play the dozens, the dozens ain't my game, / But the way I loved your mama is a crying shame."

The players of the dozens must display great skill with *rhyme, *wit, and *rhythm to win the approval of their audience. The dozens is partly an initiation ritual that teaches a player how to hold his equilibrium by learning to master the power of words and humor. The exchange takes place as a verbal duel in which words and humor are chosen to sting, so that the opponent will be goaded to either greater lexical creativity or defeat. Langston Hughes draws on the trad. of the dozens, particularly in his long poetic work Ask Your Mama (1961), as do Richard Wright and Ralph Ellison. Several genres of popular music, most recently *hip-hop, have maintained the visibility of the dozens in mass culture.

See flyting, invective, poetic contests.

■ R. D. Abrahams, Deep Down in the Jungle (1970); Rappin' and Stylin' Out, ed. T. Kochman (1972); W. Labov, Language in the Inner City (1972); L. W. Levine, Black Culture and Black Consciousness (1977); G. Smitherman, Talkin and Testifyin (1977); H. L. Gates Jr., The Signifying Monkey (1988); M. Morgan, "The Africanness of Counterlanguage among Afro-Americans," Africanisms in Afro-American Language Varieties, ed. S. Mufwene (1993); J. R. Rickford and R. J. Rickford, Spoken Soul (2000); E. Wald, The Dozens (2012).

E. A. Peters

DRAMATIC MONOLOGUE. See monologue.

DRAMATIC POETRY

I. Definition
II. Dramatic Poetry and Drama in Verse
III. Dramatic Poetry and Performance Theory
IV. Dramatic Poetry in the Theater

I. Definition. Dramatic poetry is at best an intrinsically contestable critical category and at worst a violent oxymoron, sparking the theoretical and historical friction between performance and poetry, theater and writing, action and lang. For Aristotle, drama is one kind of poesis, but within his analysis of drama, lang.—the verbal, poetic dimension of plays—is subordinate to plot, character, and thought. In the context of the Poetics, this hierarchy makes sense because dramatic mimesis is composed not of words but of deeds (the "imitation of action"). Dramatic poetry implies that words are defined in relation to the work of the theater's other instruments of mimesis—the temporal structure of the event, its plot; the practices of acting and the projection of character, or ethos; the design of music and spectacle—principally conveyed not by lang. but by actors, "with all the people engaged in the mimesis actually doing things" (Poetics 1448a). Nonetheless, drama has a persistent association with formally inventive lang., from the range of verse forms encompassed by tragedy and comedy in Aristotle's era to the verbal richness of much contemp. drama, even when that drama is written in prose. Cohn pointed out in the previous edition, "Western critics have interpreted the phrase dramatic poetry in three main ways: (1) lyrics or short poems that imply a scene; (2) plays that are valorized with the adjective 'poetic'; and (3) dramas whose dialogue is calculatingly rhythmed—in rhythms that are often regularized into meters and that are usually presented as discrete lines on the page." As Cohn recognized, resigned to treat dramatic poetry as synonymous with "verse drama," these definitions are inadequate. The first embraces lyric poems written from the perspective of individual characters and so understands drama—as a mode of cultural production involving *performance as well as scripted lang.—in metaphorical terms: for all their "drama," Robert Browning's "My Last Duchess" or T. S. Eliot's "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" are not conceived for embodied mimesis. The second turns the word poetic into a term of approbation, without critical purchase on the function or purpose of lang. in performance. The third—verse drama—segregates a class of drama according to the accidents of culture and hist.: emphasizing the use of verse rather than the distinctive contribution that verbal design makes to the conception of dramatic action. Although verse has had a complex impact on drama and its performance, "dramatic poetry" points toward a more searching problem, having to do with the functioning of writing in the making of drama, a form of poesis extending beyond words, in which—to recall Austin's discussion of performative speech—scripted words are expected to do things well beyond what the words themselves say. More than verse drama, dramatic poetry is a term of theoretical inquiry, pointing to the troubled interface where writing meets performance in the definition of drama.

II. Dramatic Poetry and Drama in Verse. Dramatic writing has a longstanding historical connection with verse. The reciprocity between drama and ritual is often marked in the ceremonial character of dramatic performances staged in connection with religious or civic events or with the formalities of an aristocratic court reflected by patterned and often elevated lang. In Eur. drama, the lineage of scripted dramatic performance originates in the 6th- and 5th-c. BCE Gr. civic festivals sponsoring competitions in the performance of *dithyrambs (large choruses of men or boys), tragedy (a trilogy of three tragedies composed by a single playwright, followed by a satyr play), and eventually comedy; the major festival, which sponsored the plays of the surviving dramatists Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes, was the Athenian City Dionysia, held annually in March–April. Cl. Gr. tragedy used a variety of verse meters for the *chorus, while individual roles (like the chorus, all played by men) were assigned iambic trimeter and developed a characteristic structure: a prologue, in which a single character—the Watchman in Aeschylus's Agamemnon, Dionysus in Euripides' Bacchae—opens the play; the parodos, or singing/dancing entrance of the chorus; a series of episodes in *dialogue between individual characters, punctuated by choral odes, with their characteristic verbal (and, logically, physical) movements of strophe*, antistrophe*, and epode*; and, after the stunning catastrophe, the exodos of the chorus. In comedy, Aristophanes deployed a wider range of metrical forms both for choruses and for individual speeches. Roman drama, initially based on Gr. models, was first performed in the 3rd c. BCE and quickly developed its own formal and thematic identity; the verse meter of Plautus's comedies was generally based on the trochaic *septenarius, though with considerable latitude, while Terence consistently favored the iambic *senarius and Seneca scrupulously employed the iambic trimeter.

The decline of the Roman Empire brought the decline of its institutions, incl. theater; while popular performance surely persisted, formal, written drama emerges—uneasily—as an instrument of the Church, in the versified *tropes that minimally illustrated and enacted portions of the Roman Catholic Mass, beginning in the 9th or 10th c. CE. The Lat. tropes were very occasionally adapted into vernacular langs.—as in the 12th-c. Anglo-Norman Jeu d'Adam—but the energetic vernacular drama of 14th- and 15th-c. Europe was also typically based on religious themes, either in the scriptural narratives of the great Corpus Christi cycles or the theological debate of the morality plays, and developed indigenous verse forms as well. Though the verse of the anonymous Wakefield Master, involving the deft balance of assonance and rhyme in a complex nine-line stanza form, is best known, the Eng. cycles (Wakefield, York, Chester, and N-Town) generally make fine use of the metrical trads. and alliterative verse of the period, echoed in the surprisingly fluid use of a basic octosyllabic line in the 15th-c. Fr. farce Master Pathelin.

In Europe, then, verse plays an important role at the origin and devel. of dramatic writing from Athenian tragedy through both the Lat. and vernacular forms of med. drama to the two principal venues of dramatic performance in the early mod. period: the commercial public theater and the more stylized theater of the aristocratic courts. Verse coordinates with elevated subject matter and the elite social world of a specific audience in other early dramatic trads., linking aesthetic to social functions in cl. Sanskrit drama and in the *Nō theater of the med. Japanese court, much as in the Stuart court *masque and the neoclassical Fr. drama of the 17th c. In some theatrical genres, however, the elaborate verbal script is held apart from the sphere of enactment. In the South Asian dance drama Kathakali, the performers are accompanied by song and narration, but they do not speak themselves; in the Ramlila—a ten-day enactment of Ram's battle with Ravan in the Rāmāyaṇa—the actors improvise their performance, coordinating it with the simultaneous recitation of the Hindu epic.

The pervasive devel. of two institutions—print publishing and the secular commercial theater—redefined the practices of dramatic writing and performance in 16th- and 17th-c. Europe. Though most of the printed drama in the period was propelled by the theater's need for new material, a developing notion of "lit." as a distinct, valuable genre of writing coordinated with the perception of dramatic poetry's signifying a special class of drama, in which an elaborate verbal structure has a value independent from its utility in instigating or sustaining stage performance. And yet, segregating the complexities of dramatic composition in verse from the intricacies of dramatic writing in prose miscasts the literary and theatrical hist. of Western drama. Many of the early mod. masters of dramatic verse—Shakespeare and Ben Jonson among them—were masters of dramatic prose and masters of stagecraft as well, shaping verse or prose and various dramatic genres to meet the demand of specific theaters and their audiences. A richly pointed prose sustains the hist. of comic drama, from Niccolò Machiavelli's satiric Mandragola (1518) through Jonson's Bartholomew Fair (1614) to the plays of William Wycherley, George Etherege, William Congreve, George Farquhar, Oliver Goldsmith, and R. B. Sheridan in the 17th and 18th cs.; and to mods. like Oscar Wilde, G. B. Shaw, and Tom Stoppard, much as comedy from Shakespeare to Molière to Caryl Churchill has also been written in a fluent and supple verse.

Verse is undeniably associated with social class in Eur. drama, the privileged mode of courtly works like the masque and the plays of Fr. neoclassicism; it is also associated with aristocratic characters in the plays of the early mod. Eng. commercial theater and sustains related notions of dramatic *decorum. In his Defence of Poesy (written ca. 1580, pub. 1595), Philip Sidney complains about the mingling of verse and prose, which implies a "mongrel" blending of tragedy and comedy (see VERSE AND PROSE); and Félix Lope de Vega's El arte nuevo de hacer comedias (1609) similarly encourages Sp. poets to avoid blending high and low subjects, suggesting different verse forms as appropriate to different events: *décimas for complaints, *sonnets for those waiting in expectation, *tercets for serious matters, and *redondillas for love. Expanding Lope's principles, a typical role in one of Pedro Calderón de la Barca's plays moves through a range of verse forms, each appropriate to the ethical and dramatic situation of the moment. Rather than multiplying verse forms, 17th-c. Fr. theater relies on the poet's mastery of the *alexandrine couplet, the vehicle of heroic clamor in Pierre Corneille, of balanced wit in Molière, and of probing ethical dilemma in Jean Racine, while Eng.-lang. verse drama typically relies on the more fluid informality of *blank verse.

The association between verse and high, serious, "tragic" drama in early mod. Europe is a matter of convention, regardless of whether writers like Christopher Marlowe, Shakespeare, Jonson, or Racine considered themselves part of a "poetic" heritage. The rising prestige of Shakespeare as a poet in the later 18th and 19th cs., alongside the democratization of literacy and lit., lends dramatic poetry its mod. inflection, the sense that the value of a play's verbal composition, its poetry, is independent of its functioning in theatrical representation. The great Eur. poets of the romantic period succeeded in some measure in writing a theatrically ambitious verse drama, notably G. E. Lessing's Nathan der Weise (1779), Friedrich Schiller's Maria Stuart (1800), Heinrich von Kleist's durable comedy The Broken Jug (1808) and his scarifying tragedy Penthesilea (1808), S. T. Coleridge's Remorse (1813), Lord Byron's Manfred (1819), P. B. Shelley's The Cenci (1819, staged at the Thèâtre Alfred Jarry by Antonin Artaud in 1935), Alexander Pushkin's Boris Godunov (1825), Alfred de Musset's Lorenzaccio (1834), Robert Browning's A Blot in the 'Scutcheon (1843), and Alfred, Lord Tennyson's Becket (1895).

In 1881, Émile Zola called for poets to recognize "that poetry is everywhere, in everything": poetic lang. appeared, by the late 19th c., incapable of addressing the dramatic situations of mod. life. After a brilliant and theatrically successful career as a verse dramatist culminating in Brand (1866) and Peer Gynt (1867), Henrik Ibsen, e.g., decided to address a broader contemp. audience about mod. social life with plays written in prose. And yet, while some contemporaries complained about the unpoetic superficiality of Ibsen's lang., his prose—rigorously impoverished of decoration—enables the slightest nuance to gain richly "poetic" depth: the icy, black water of Nora's imagined suicide, Hedda's "vine leaves in his hair," the secret demons of will and desire that flay Solness's flesh. Indeed, the attraction of verse remained strong: Ibsen's great rival August Strindberg wrote prose and verse dramas throughout his career, as did other playwrights now sometimes remembered for their naturalistic plays, such as Gerhart Hauptmann. Maurice Maeterlinck wrote symbolic dramas in an image-laden prose; and, without resorting directly to verse, Frank Wedekind frequently experimented with lang. in ways that resisted a strict division between naturalistic prose and more evocative poetry.

Foregrounding the artifice of the play's verbal dimension, mod. verse drama resists the subordination of its lang. to the representational "surface" characteristic of naturalism's attention to everyday life. For this reason, in the 20th c. dramatic poetry becomes increasingly cognate with a deeply antitheatrical impulse visible in the work of a range of playwrights largely continuing the trad. linking verse to elevated subject matter and philosophical introspection: Edmond Rostand's durable Cyrano de Bergerac (1897) and the plays of Stephen Phillips, Maxwell Anderson, Christopher Fry, and Paul Claudel, among many others. Dramatic poetry, though, also provided an alternative means of using lang. to impel the potential innovation of theatrical experience; here, the varied use of verse and prose in the plays of W. B. Yeats, Eliot, W. H. Auden, and Auden's collaborations with Christopher Isherwood, as well as the more experimental work of Gertrude Stein and Samuel Beckett, charts an effort not to withdraw dramatic poetry from theatricality but to use lang. to explore new means of articulating writing with stage action. The intercalation of different verse forms, or of verse with prose, also jibes with the critical disorientation at the heart of Bertolt Brecht's Verfremdungseffekt (usually translated as "alienation effect" or "distancing effect"), visible in his own plays like Saint Joan of the Stockyards (1931) and The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui (1941) and in the function of *song throughout his plays. The use of verse as a means of emphasizing the theatrical work of dramatic lang. sustains much of Peter Weiss's work (incl. his best known play, The Persecution and Assassination of Jean-Paul Marat as Performed by the Inmates of the Asylum of Charenton under the Direction of the Marquis de Sade, widely known as Marat/Sade [1963]), as well as embodying a postcolonial concern for the politics of lang. and performance genres in several of Wole Soyinka's plays, notably The Lion and the Jewel (1963); in Aimé Césaire's adaptation of Shakespeare, A Tempest (1969); and often in the plays of Derek Walcott. Verbal experiment sustains much contemp. dramatic writing, often writing conceived to generate political or social friction in performance: Caryl Churchill's satiric Serious Money (1987), John Arden's drama, the brilliant use of verse and song alongside the prose of Edward Bond's plays. Several playwrights whose lang. is formally inventive yet not restricted either to formal or *free verse—Thomas Bernhard, Heiner Müller, María Irene Fornes, Suzan-Lori Parks—are precisely engaged in the problem of dramatic poetry.

III. Dramatic Poetry and Performance Theory. Given that different performance conventions construct the force of lang. in and as performance, what does poetic writing contribute to drama? In one sense, poetry lends its distinctive verbal density to the dramatic event, creating an opportunity for form, imagery, and meter to be woven into the conceptual practices of performance. Yet while mod. poets sometimes assume that poetry should govern the practices of the stage, the most enduring experiments in dramatic poetry tend in a different direction. Yeats's Plays for Dancers coordinates an imagistic moment of intense, verbalized perception against the parallel, speechless, physical expression of dance to music. Rather than taking the physical expression of theater merely to illustrate the verbal "meanings" of the poetry, Yeats's plays provoke a rich reciprocity between the ultimately incompatible discourses of lang. and movement, poetry and embodiment in the theater.

Among playwrights, Eliot most searchingly attempted to chart the extent to which it was possible for dramatic composition to alter, even revivify, the circumstances of performance. Although Eliot's writing about dramatic poetry spans his career—from "The Possibility of a Poetic Drama" and "Rhetoric and Poetic Drama," both of which appeared in The Sacred Wood (1920), to Poetry and Drama (1951)—his obituary for the music-hall star Marie Lloyd expresses his canniest vision of theater, the sense that the "working man" who saw Lloyd in the music hall and "joined in the chorus was himself performing part of the act; he was engaged in that collaboration of the audience with the artist which is necessary in all art and most obviously in dramatic art" (Selected Essays). From his early dramatic monologues onward, Eliot's poetic imagination engaged with drama; turning to the writing of plays, he explored how writing might galvanize the social ritual of theatrical performance, might provide a means to shape that collaboration among poet, performers, and participating audience through the process of playing.

But while Eliot typically takes dramatic poetry as synonymous with verse drama, his most experimental play, Murder in the Cathedral (1935), demonstrates that it is not the difference between verse and prose that identifies the force of poetic drama but the ways lang. engages with the means of theater. Murder in the Cathedral is largely written in prose, using different modes of written discourse—the Chorus's rhythmically chanted verse, Thomas's prose sermon, the Knights' Shavian apology—to afford different opportunities for collaboration in the dramatic event. In Poetry and Drama, Eliot confessed that he may have been chasing a "mirage," a verse drama at once composed "of human action and of words, such as to present at once the two aspects of dramatic and of musical order." New forms of verbal composition (here limited to verse drama) might afford powerful, innovative forms of human action, which would—taking up the distinction between drama and music—use representation, the dramatic fiction, to render the present, transitory harmonies of the performance itself significant. Eliot imagined that this design of theatrical experience could take shape only through verse, rather than through a systematic use of verbal/oral genres to reposition the work of lang. on the stage. Perhaps he was looking in the wrong direction: the play that would transform the Western theater's sense of the overlapping of lang. and event, dramatic poetry and the music of experience, the represented fiction and the ephemeral thereness of performance, took the stage the following 1952–53 season, at an obscure Parisian theater, written in Fr. by an Ir. expatriate named Samuel Beckett, its lyrical prose betrayed by its prosaic title, En Attendant Godot.

That is, as opposed to verse drama, dramatic poetry seizes the theoretical function of lang. in theatrical performance. In the middle decades of the 20th c., dramatic poetry provided a critical code for imagining the work of dramatic writing as instigating new forms of performance, action not subordinated to the rhet., politics, or sociology of theatrical verisimilitude (see Bentley, Fergusson, R. Williams). In the U.S., the Living Theatre—which would become notorious for its participatory spectacles in the late 1960s and 70s—charted the consequences of using poetry to instigate new performance, staging Paul Goodman's plays, Gertrude Stein's Doctor Faustus Lights the Lights (1938), Eliot's Sweeney Agonistes (1932), John Ashbery's The Heroes (1950), W. H. Auden's The Age of Anxiety (1947), W. C. Williams's Many Loves (1961), and Jackson Mac Low's The Marrying Maiden (1961). What this drama and many of the most innovative plays since Beckett—Sam Shepard's Tooth of Crime (1972), Peter Barnes's The Bewitched (1974), Müller's Hamletmachine (1977), Parks's The Death of the Last Black Man in the Whole Entire World (1990), Sarah Kane's 4.48 Psychosis (1999)—suggest is that, while some forms of dramatic innovation arise in theatrical practice (the opportunities afforded by the box set, electric lighting, simultaneous video, V. E. Meyerhold's biomechanics, Artaud's theater of cruelty, Brecht's epic theater), others are summoned by new forms of writing, writing that demands a different accommodation to, and often the invention of, new performance practices. And while that writing is not always in verse, what defines it as dramatic poetry is an original imagination both for the interplay between words and for the interplay among words and the material signification they will inevitably impel, mediate, and be absorbed into in the process of dramatic performance.

How should we understand the function of scripted lang. in the Western trads. of drama and its performance? Dramatic poetry imagines a recalibration of the agency of writing in the process of theater; it implies a significant role in dramatic poesis for its verbal element, lang. In Western theater—esp. since the rise of print and the incorporation of printed plays into lit. as books—this role has sometimes been imagined as determinative, as though the poet created the play in lang. and theatrical performance has a secondary ministerial function merely to execute the poet's completed work in the medium of performance. But the words on the page cannot determine their performance. As Austin discovered, in "performative" speech, words do not make statements; sometimes—as in the sentence "I promise" or the "I do" of a marriage ceremony—they "do things": to speak the words is to act within a sustaining context of performance *convention, convention that limits what, how, and whether the performance performs. In this sense, the notion of theater as executing the text's direction might form one paradigm of performance but is hardly essential to dramatic performance, nor is it illustrated by the hist. of theatrical practice, the unfolding narrative of changing ways to make writing do work as theater in the changing performative conventions of the stage.

While one line of critique has attempted to restrict dramatic performance to the appropriate "stage presentation" of a literary work fixed and complete as dramatic poetry (see Brooks and Heilman; see also Lehmann), the real challenge of understanding dramatic poetry is to model its contribution to the performance process, a process that arises outside and beyond the control of the text. Dramatic poetry animates the dual scene of performance, the fictive play and its theatrical playing, where lang. is the instrument of the actor's work, what he or she has to work with in the creation of something that is not poetry, not even principally verbal: theatrical and dramatic action. Recalling Burke's "dramatistic" model for the analysis of actions—any action can be conceived in terms of the ratio between the act, agent, agency, purpose, and scene of performance—dramatic performance foregrounds an inherently duplicitous event, in which the represented acts, agents, purposes, and scene of the dramatic fiction can be created (and known to the audience) only through their implication by the material grammar of theatrical practice, the acts we understand as theatrical performance, the actors as agents of stage action, the leading purposes of the production, the scene of the theater itself. Dramatic poetry occupies a dual agency, at once the fictive dialogue between characters—the agency of their actions—and the actor's agency, i.e., his or her instrument for embodied mimesis, for making play. In performance, dramatic poetry may or may not be privileged among a given theater's various agencies—visual design, movement vocabulary, vocal production—for articulating dramatic action through the theatrical event. Although Yeats based his Plays for Dancers on an understanding of the Japanese Nō, Nō performance clearly situates its writing within a highly conventionalized performance trad.: the actors are masked, follow a generally prescribed trajectory around the stage, adopt patterned gestures, and give voice to the text (singing it) in largely determined ways (some of the characters' lines are spoken by the seated musicians as well). Rather than seeming subordinate to the structure and meaning of the script, performance seems to govern how the densely ornate, "literary" script will be incorporated as an event.

IV. Dramatic Poetry in the Theater. The study of dramatic poetry is often undertaken in purely literary terms, considering *prosody and *meter, *imagery and *metaphor, structure and theme. These elements are important and may well bear on performance. The meter of Shakespeare's plays creates a range of opportunities for actors: Romeo's sudden monosyllables when he first sees Juliet; the tension between the intensification and evacuation of meaning in King Lear's "Never, never, never, never, never." But while purely verbal structures may provide opportunities, how or whether they are seized and transformed into action, depends on the behavioral conventions of contemp. performance. Dramatic poetry is always altered by its theatrical use, even when those uses are seen as scrupulously "faithful" to the play: the heavily built "realistic" Shakespeare of the 19th c. necessitated the reordering of scenes and extensive cutting of the text for the play to be staged in a reasonable duration; despite his elegant delivery of Hamlet's verse, Laurence Olivier cut roughly half the text and the roles of Rosencrantz, Guildenstern, and Fortinbras from his 1948 Oscar-winning film; most Eng.-lang. productions of Molière's plays today substitute blank verse or heroic couplets for the Fr. alexandrines.

While dramatic poetry is changed by performance, it also makes demands on performance that the contemp. theater struggles to engage: in the 1880s and 1890s, Ibsen's leading female roles—Nora Helmer in A Doll's House or Hedda Gabler—were difficult for actors to perform because they violated generic (and gender) performance conventions; Master Builder Solness, with his deeply disorienting discourse of demonic wish fulfillment, seemed nearly impossible to accommodate to the demands of the contemp. framing of dramatic character. Ibsen's lang. required a new approach to making dramatic poetry signify in the register of stage "character." Later, the inaction of Beckett's Waiting for Godot seemed, perhaps purposely, both undramatic and untheatrical, at least until Beckett's peculiar poetry was seen to invoke and transform a familiar performance discourse: the fractured coupling of vaudevillians, Gogo and Didi, as an eternal, poignant, even allegorical Laurel and Hardy. Some plays—Djuna Barnes's Antiphon (1958); nearly all of Stein's drama; Adrienne Kennedy's Funnyhouse of a Negro (1962); the "synthetic fragments" of Müller's Germania Death in Berlin (1978), Despoiled Shore Medea-material Landscape with Argonauts (1982), and various "performance texts"; Parks's America Play (1994), Venus (1996), Fucking A (2000), with their strikingly idiosyncratic typographic design on the page—illustrate how dramatic poetry puts pressure on theatrical practice, enforcing a search for new modes of articulation, enunciation, and embodiment.

Perhaps the most familiar example of this problem is the notion of the animating "subtext" of desire, a through-line of psychological action trending toward a distinctive "objective" that the director Konstantin Stanislavski devised in his work on Anton Chekhov's refractory plays. Chekhov's poetry is elusive and indirect; the writing did not conform to conventional notions of dramatic action at the turn of the 20th c. and so seemed not to provide an appropriate agency for acting. Harmonizing each actor/character's objective into the overall purpose of the production, Stanislavski developed the notion of the emotional subtext, the act that the actor/character was attempting to perform through the often-elliptical script. The subtext implies the essential fungibility of the words on the page: the words may say one thing, but they enable the actors to do something else with them, to seduce, challenge, insult, rebuke, flatter. As Eliot knew, words fail; for Stanislavski, dramatic action is falsified by what the words say, even as it is enabled by what the words can be made to do (the script's "I love you" might be sustained in performance as "I really dislike you" or "I am trying to hurt you by telling you 'I love you'" or "I hate myself"). Stanislavski found a means to transform Chekhov's dramatic poetry into dramatic performance by framing lang. as agency, a means to use the poetry to perform a legible, significant act. It is a measure of Stanislavski's theatrical imagination—and, perhaps, of the compromised place of poetry in mod. theater—that his terms are now essential to any discussion of Chekhov, of mod. drama, and of a significant range of mod. performance training.

Although Stanislavski's invention of the theatrical means for Chekhov in the theater is a specific case, it suggests that drama is always performed in cultural and theatrical circumstances redefining its poetry (it is notable, but not surprising, that Chekhov was not impressed with all of Stanislavski's decisions as a director). Classic drama, now incl. Chekhov, of course, inevitably provides the agency for performances unimaginable to the poet. The Taming of the Shrew, The Merchant of Venice, Othello today are animated by contemp. attitudes about gender, religion, race; words such as woman, Jew, black signify differently from the way they did on the early mod. stage, implicating the speaker (both actor and character) in different ethical terms, as a different kind of agent; and their performance also implicates us, as agents of contemp. theater and society. Even lines that seem to describe the action they perform—Herod's "I stamp! I stare! I look all about!" from the Coventry nativity play—clearly provide the actor with the instigation to action, an action that will gain its specific force and meaning from the way the actor uses the lines (esp. given the ms.'s stage direction that Herod "rages in the street").

Dramatic writing is writing for use, and even writing that seems to direct its performance evinces this truth: Beckett's Quad (1981)—a play that exists entirely in stage directions, which command actors to circumnavigate and bisect a square-shaped pattern in a specific sequence—has given rise to an arresting range of productions. Indeed, one of the most surprising turns of mod. literary and theater hist. has to do with Beckett's plays in the theater. Although dramatic poetry has generally been equated with the dialogue, taking stage directions as merely theatrical instruments extrinsic to the play's literary identity, in the 1980s Beckett's stage directions became the center of an important critical controversy, as several productions—JoAnne Akalaitis's Endgame at the American Repertory Theatre in 1984, Gildas Bourget's pink-set Fin de partie at the Comédie Française in 1988, an all-women Waiting for Godot by De Haarlemse Toneelschuur the same year, Deborah Warner's environmental Footfalls in London in 1994, the casting of twin sisters as Didi and Gogo in a 2006 Godot in Pontadera, Italy—drew legal attention for changing the theatrical scene imaged in the text. What this controversy illustrates is the fact that the propriety of dramatic poetry is determined not on the page but by the social, theatrical, and (here) legal structures through which poetry and performance are defined.

Indeed, George Tabori's idiosyncratic productions of Waiting for Godot usefully refract this question. In his 1984 Godot at the Munich Kammerspiele, the actors playing Didi and Gogo sat at a table, text in hand, apparently rehearsing the play, reading stage directions aloud, working themselves deeply into "performance," and then pulling back to examine the script: the production allegorized the ways writing, rather than governing stage practice, is an instrument in the actors' hands, used to create something else, a performance. In Tabori's 2006 Godot at the Berliner Ensemble, the actors frequently extemporized with the audience and—more to the point—had an ongoing conversation with the prompter, seated at her table just outside the circular playing area. Rather than staging the "performance" as an objectified image, derived from the text and situated frontally before the audience, this production conceived dramatic performance as transactional, dramatic poetry sustaining a collaboration between the institutionalized conventions of performance (the prompter) and the individual temperament of the actors, and between the actors—who, in any production, are always available to us, speaking for themselves as well as "in character"—and the audience, collaboration sustained by the actors' ongoing ironic byplay about the play and their performance of it. For some audiences, no doubt, Tabori's Godot approached travesty, epitomized by the moment when Didi and Gogo knocked over the tree in Act 2, perhaps confirming Beckett's withering remark to his biographer Deirdre Bair that, in his ideal drama, there would be "no actors, only the text." And yet, as Tabori's productions suggest, dramatic poetry is an important but not necessarily the governing instrument of theater: dramatic performance will locate dramatic poetry as poetry in a Burkean ratio to the other elements of theatrical action, an event in which the poetry is recomposed in the immediate bodily and spatial discourse devised by actors and audiences.

Dramatic poetry summons a poetics of duplicity, suggesting that while lang. might have a range of function in the dramatic fiction, it will be remade by the process of production into specific actions that cannot be anticipated from the words alone. What does the actor do on Othello's line "And smote him, thus," the line in which he executes the terrible justice of Venice—the justice he once exercised on the turbaned Turk who "traduced the state"—on himself? In the late 19th c., the It. actor Tommaso Salvini created a sensation by seeming to hack away at his sinewy throat with a small knife. Other actors have opted for different gestures: Anthony Hopkins grinning ironically as he plunges a silver poniard into his abdomen; Laurence Fishburne, strangling himself with his necklace as he takes the "circumcised dog" by the "throat," before finishing his work with a knife to the heart. If how this gesture is performed frames our sense of the event—how Othello acts shaping what Othello means, what the experience and so the content of this justice is—then how much more significant is every nuance and shading of the actor's transformation of words into deeds. What does the actress perform with Cordelia's "Nothing": a repudiation of Lear's inappropriate question? Insolence directed toward her sisters? Fearful self-protection? Punctilious coolness? Posture and movement, vocal tone, the production's general conventions of address, the entire corporeal armature of social behavior—rendered esp. significant through the marked conventions of stage acting—will operate with this single word to make it work, do significant work here, work that must say and do much more than "Nothing."

Finally, dramatic poetry is both material to be reshaped (words made into acts) and an instrument, an agency of theatrical labor, something the agents of the production both work on and work with to fashion the performance. A specific performance is neither implicit in nor derivable from the text alone. Since poetry is the dual agency of both dramatic (fictional) and theatrical (actual) activity onstage, can we finally distinguish meaningfully between presence and representation in performance? In any fully dramatic performance, even those most insistent on a scrupulous "fidelity" to "the text," presentational immediacy is the principal node of our engagement in the play. Echoing S. T. Coleridge, this effect has been seized as a "willing suspension of disbelief," but the reference to "belief" is a distraction: belief in the dramatic fiction is never significantly in play in the theater—we are always aware that Olivier is not murdering anyone, even though Othello is. Yet Othello cannot be distinguished from Olivier; Othello is what Olivier is doing, making there with us, an enacted poetry that disappears the moment the actor loses his bearings or we our concentration. To swing into action, leap to the stage, and save Desdemona is not merely to mistake the role of the audience but to mistake the event entirely and so destroy it: Desdemona will not be saved; she will simply stop being there as the actress stops working and calls for the police.

Dramatic performance refuses a strict opposition between word and deed, speech and action, representation and presentation, the drama and its performance. Although the poet's work is completed with the framing of the dramatic poem, we may well feel that Antigone or Phèdre or Hamletmachine have a semantic identity richer than the other tools and materials of theatrical performance. While dramatic poetry will be actualized in means that lie outside the script, specific opportunities for using dramatic poetry emerge in clearer outline when the text is conceived in relation to the performance practices of its original theater, esp. when—as is the case with Shakespeare or Chekhov—the playwright worked within a specific stage architecture, system of production conventions, and with a given acting company. For all the character's famous seductiveness, the Cleopatra of Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra is a considerably ironic role, availing itself of the verbal japes typical of the cross-dressing boy actor and drawing our attention to the convention as well: Cleopatra, after all, commits suicide in order to avoid seeing "some squeaking Cleopatra boy my greatness," exactly what Shakespeare's original audiences saw. Chekhov wanted Stanislavski—drawn to serious, sentimental roles—to play the part of Lopakhin in The Cherry Orchard; though Stanislavski chose to play Gaev, perhaps Chekhov wanted the performance to resist framing Lopakhin as a stereotypically comic peasant. So, too, some playwrights have been closely involved in staging their work, leaving a record of their intentions with regard to theatrical production. Beckett came to direct many of his plays and (perhaps surprisingly) often revised his own texts to accommodate an altered sense of the work the text could do as performance. For stage productions of Not I (1972), he came to prefer dropping the silent Auditor, nonetheless insisting that this role be retained in published scripts of the play.

Beyond that, dramatic poetry sometimes appears to allegorize thematic aspects of the animating ethical dynamics of its originating theater, particularly if we seize the role as an instrument for doing, rather than as the representation of a fixed character. The potentially incoherent seriality of the role of Hamlet, demanding a strikingly distinct temperament in every scene, speaks to an early mod. anxiety about the stability of the ethical subject, one perhaps recorded in the poetry, too, in Hamlet's or, his tendency to multiply adjectives—"Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless villain!"—in an ultimately vain attempt to fix the nature of human character (and much else) in words. The harrowing exploration of a tormented psychological inscape in Ibsen's Rosmer similarly engages with the instability of the mod. "self"; the repetitive expressionless movement of Parks's Black Man with Watermelon in Death of the Last Black Man in the Whole Entire World signifies within an embodied, and alienated, historical discourse for the evocation "race" in performance.

And yet plays are limited neither to their original theaters nor to their original circumstances of production. One of the lessons of the reconstructed Globe Theatre in London is that its productions articulate a complex historical ambivalence, enabling us to see some of the working elements of Shakespeare's poetry in an open-air platform theater, but with the constant recognition that, despite the authentic timbers, hand-made costumes, and even reconstructed accents and performance techniques, we are participating in a specific form of mod. performance—the living-hist. historical reconstruction—taking its place along other mod. performance genres, the living-hist. museum, the theme park, performance art, and contemp. Shakespeare production, for that matter.

Along similar lines, critics sometimes imply that dramatic performance is a special genre of performance, one in which theatrical meaning should be determined by the aims of the poet, that the rhetorical purpose of dramatic performance is precisely to evince the poet's work. Some dramatic trads. have been notably conservative in this regard, often by massively restricting the repertoire, and strictly codifying legitimate training and performance practice so as to establish a relatively unchanging relation between poetry and its performance: Japanese Nō is a familiar case in point, as is the Comédie Française. Yet while this understanding appears to subordinate stage to page, it actually suggests just the opposite. It is the practice of the stage that encodes the signs of proper "fidelity" to the poetry: rhythmic utterance, for instance, or a pause at line endings. Whether it is speaking the verse emphatically without motion or gesture (Yeats rehearsed his actors in barrels), wearing doublet and hose for mod. Shakespeare, or adopting the Method "crouch" to express an emotional volatility ready to spring into being: to the extent that these behaviors signify fidelity to a specific play, they do so by encoding the poetry in a specific regime of performance, one both outside and beyond the imagination of the text.

The hist. of Western theater is a hist. of change: the workable practices for transforming dramatic poetry into theatrical play dynamically reciprocate with forms of social behavior, with ideas about identity and society, with notions of the purposes of art. To see Shakespeare's The Winter's Tale in a regional summer Shakespeare festival in the U.S. or directed by Sam Mendes at the Old Vic in London or directed by Robert Wilson at the Berliner Ensemble is more than seeing three "versions" of one "play" (let alone an event directly cognate with the play that might have taken place in Shakespeare's London). It is to see three distinct articulations of the purpose and agency of dramatic poetry, the materialization—with all that the word implies for the resources of time, talent, space, audience—of three distinct ideas of what dramatic performance is and is for and how its poetry might be forcefully configured as something else, dramatic action. Much as the self-evident "meanings" of poems change as they are read in new locations, with new purposes, and as part of changing systems of social and cultural understanding, so dramatic poetry—performed in a more extraverted, embodied, public fashion, through articulate but changing conventions of signification—will inevitably provide the instrument for new, unanticipated action and experience in the theater. Lang. and narrative are embedded in the world as well as in lit., and plays—whether classics like Medea and King Lear or more recent work like Kane's Blasted (1995) or Gao Xingjian's The Other Shore (1986)—seem, in a given time and place, to afford certain possibilities of performance, some familiar and conventional, some surprising and unexpectedly effective, some so controversial as to raise the question of whether they work, perform theatrical work with the poetry at all. While it may appear to compromise the poetic integrity of the text, the transformation of words into legibly embodied acts—acts that necessarily exceed, qualify, remake the text as our understanding of its theatrical agency changes—is what enables the continued vitality, the performative force, of dramatic poetry and dramatic performance.

See AUTO SACRAMENTAL, CLASSICAL PROSODY, CLOSET DRAMA, COMEDY, GENRE, HUMORS, MIME, MONOLOGUE, POETICS, REALISM, TRAGEDY.

■ Literary Criticism and History: L. Abercrombie, "The Function of Poetry in the Drama," Poetry Review 1 (1912); M. E. Prior, The Language of Tragedy (1947); C. Brooks and R. B. Heilman, Understanding Drama (1948); G. F. Else, Aristotle's Poetics (1957); R. Lattimore, Poetry of Greek Tragedy (1958); D. Donoghue, The Third Voice (1959); M. Bieber, History of the Greek and Roman Theater, 2d ed. (1961); M. C. Bradbrook, English Dramatic Form (1965); V. A. Kolve, The Play Called Corpus Christi (1966); J. Scherer, La Dramaturgie classique en France (1968); J. Barish, Ben Jonson and the Language of Prose Comedy (1970); R. Williams, Drama from Ibsen to Genet (1971); H.H.A. Gowda, Dramatic Poetry from Medieval to Modern Times (1972); K. J. Worth, Revolutions in Modern English Drama (1972); A. P. Hinchcliffe, Modern Verse Drama (1977); O. Taplin, Greek Tragedy in Action (1978); J. Baxter, Shakespeare's Poetic Styles (1980); D. Breuer, Deutsche Metrik und Vergeschichte (1981); C. Freer, The Poetics of Jacobean Drama (1981); G. R. Hibbard, The Making of Shakespeare's Dramatic Poetry (1981); E. Havelock, Preface to Plato (1982); T. Rosenmeyer, The Art of Aeschylus (1982); A. Brown, A New Companion to Greek Tragedy (1983); G. Hoffmanm, "Das moderne amerikanische Versdrama," Das amerikanische Drama, ed. G. Hoffman (1984); G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); J. W. Flannery, W. B. Yeats and the Idea of a Theatre (1989); D. Bair, Samuel Beckett (1990); W. B. Worthen, Modern Drama and the Rhetoric of Theater (1992); R. Cohn, "Dramatic Poetry," New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger et al. (1993); M. Bristol, Big-Time Shakespeare (1996); F. Zeitlin, Playing the Other (1996); Aristotle, Poetics, trans. M. E. Hubbard (1998); J. S. Peters, Theatre of the Book (2000); R. McDonald, Shakespeare and the Arts of Language (2001); T. Eagleton, Sweet Violence (2002); J. Enders, The Medieval Theater of Cruelty (2002); S. Orgel, The Authentic Shakespeare (2002); N. Slater, Spectator Politics (2002); J. Enders, Death by Drama and Other Medieval Urban Legends (2005).

■ Theater History: N. Díaz de Escovar and F. de P. Lasso de la Vega, Historia del teatro español, 2 v. (1924); H. C. Lancaster, History of French Dramatic Literature in the 17th Century, 9 v. (1929–42); A. Nicoll, A History of English Drama, 1660–1900, 6 v. (1952–59); A. Nicoll, English Drama 1900–1930 (1973); F. H. Sandbach, The Comic Theatre of Greece and Rome (1977); J. Barish, The Antitheatrical Prejudice (1981); W. B. Worthen, The Idea of the Actor (1984); J. R. Roach, The Player's Passion (1985); A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, The Dramatic Festivals of Athens, 2d ed. (1989); Nothing to Do with Dionysos?, ed. J. Winkler and F. Zeitlin (1990); M. McKendrick, Theatre in Spain, 1490–1700 (1992); A New History of Early English Drama, ed. J. D. Cox and D. S. Kastan (1997); T. Hauptfleisch, Theatre and Society in South Africa (1997); Cambridge History of American Theatre, ed. D. Wilmeth et al., 3 v. (1998); S. Chatterjee, The Colonial Staged (1998); World Encyclopedia of Contemporary Theatre, ed. D. Rubin et al., 5 v. (2000); Encyclopedia of Latin American Theater, ed. E. Cortés and M. Barrea-Marlys (2003); M. Banham, A History of Theatre in Africa (2004); N. Bhathia, Acts of Authority/Acts of Resistance (2004); Cambridge History of British Theatre, ed. P. Thomson et al. (2004); Contemporary Theatres in Europe, ed. J. Kelleher and N. Ridout (2006); P. Zarrilli, B. McConachie, G. J. Williams, C. F. Sorgenfrei, Theatre Histories (2006); J. Hollander, Indian Folk Theatres (2007); O. Okagbue, African Theatres and Performance (2007); A. Versenyi, Theatre in Latin America (2009).

■ Theory and Performance Studies: S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (1817); É. Zola, Le naturalisme au théâtre (1881); T. S. Eliot, The Sacred Wood (1920); W. B. Yeats, Essays (1924); H. Granville-Barker, On Poetry in Drama (1937); K. Burke, A Grammar of Motives (1945); E. Bentley, The Playwright as Thinker (1946); Eliot, Essays; J. L. Barrault, Reflections on the Theatre (1951); T. S. Eliot, Poetry and Drama (1951); F. Fergusson, Idea of a Theater (1953); A. Artaud, The Theater and Its Double, trans. M. C. Richards (1958); W. H. Auden, The Dyer's Hand (1962); R. Barthes, On Racine, trans. R. Howard (1963); P. Brook, The Empty Space (1968); J. Cocteau, "Préface de 1922," Les Mariés de la Tour Eiffel (1969); M. Goldman, Shakespeare and the Energies of Drama (1972), and The Actor's Freedom (1975); B. Brecht, Brecht on Theatre, ed. and trans. John Willett (1977); J. L. Styan, The Shakespeare Revolution (1977); B. Beckerman, Dynamics of Drama (1979); H. Blau, Take up the Bodies (1982); O. Mandel, "Poetry and Excessive Poetry in the Theatre," Centennial Review 26 (1982); M. Carlson, Theories of the Theatre (1984); C. J. Herington, Poetry into Drama (1985); C. W. Meister, Dramatic Criticism (1985); B. O. States, Great Reckonings in Little Rooms (1985); M. Esslin, The Field of Drama (1987); H. Berger Jr., Imaginary Audition (1989); E. Fischer-Lichte, Semiotics of Theatre (1992); S. B. Garner Jr., Bodied Spaces (1994); U. Chaudhuri, Staging Place (1995); S-L. Parks, "From Elements of Style," The America Play and Other Works (1995); J. L. Austin, How to Do Things with Words, 2d ed., ed. J. O. Urmson and M. Sbisá (1997); J. Wise, Dionysus Writes (1999); M. Puchner, Stage Fright (2002); B. Bennett, All Theater Is Revolutionary Theater (2005); H.-T. Lehmann, Postdramatic Theatre (2006); W. B. Worthen, Print and the Poetics of Modern Drama (2006); R. Weimann and D. Bruster, Shakespeare and the Power of Performance (2008); E. Fischer-Lichte, Transformative Power of Performance (2008); Companion to Shakespeare and Performance, ed. B. Hodgdon and W. B. Worthen (2008); K. Stanislavski, An Actor's Work, ed. and trans. J. Benedetti (2008); W. B. Worthen, Drama: Between Poetry and Performance (2010).

W. B. Worthen

DREAM VISION. A literary work describing the dream(s) of a first-person narrator identified with the author. Although religious and apocalyptic visions were composed from late antiquity on, the literary genre flourished in Europe from the 12th through the early 16th c. Its major antecedents included biblical dreams and revelations, Macrobius's commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis (ca. 5th c.), and Boethius's De consolatione philosophiae (early 6th c.). Significant themes included erotic desire, religious or philosophical questions, and social critique, subgenres that could be combined in a single work. The genre is defined by a frame that sets the narrator's actual circumstances against the dream, but many influential works borrowed its conventions for waking visions (as in De consolatione philosophiae, Alain de Lille's De planctu naturae, Dante's Divina commedia, John Gower's Confessio amantis, and Christine de Pizan's Livre de la cité des dames). Dream visions were frequently allegorical (see ALLEGORY) and had close ties to debate lit., emphasizing a sequence of reported speeches. The narrator often wanders in a field or garden on a spring morning before falling asleep and dreams of a densely symbolic landscape in which he converses with various *personifications, is instructed by an otherworldly mentor, or overhears debates among nonhuman interlocutors such as birds or the body and soul. The dreamer is typically distressed by love or melancholy in waking life and is characterized as isolated, naïve, or awkward; the vision develops the tension between his ignorance at the time of the dream and the wisdom of the poet writing with the benefit of experience. This double consciousness underscores the self-conscious quality of the dream vision, calling attention to the author and the artifice of his *persona. Debates over the interpretation of dreams and their supernatural, psychological, or somatic origins inform the genre's epistemological and hermeneutic concerns, allowing it to explore the truthfulness of literary fictions, the relationship between natural and divine knowledge, and the limits of human reason. Many visions associate the ephemeral and multivalent dream form with irresolvable debates and unanswered questions rather than with fully revealed truth, and the vision may or may not provide a remedy for the dreamer's initial suffering.

The dream vision first attained popularity in France with the genre-defining Roman de la Rose (ca. 1230, ca. 1270–80) and the philosophical De planctu naturae (composed mid-12th c.), which were followed by the courtly amatory poems of Guillaume de Machaut and Jean Froissart. The form was embraced by the major poets of late 14th c. England, notably in Chaucer's four long dream-vision poems, which inspired many imitations, and in the alliterative trad. best exemplified by Pearl and by William Langland's Piers Plowman. Dream visions maintained their popularity throughout the 15th c. in works by John Lydgate, John Skelton, and several Scottish poets but declined ca. 1500, esp. with the resurgence of *lyric as a vehicle for poetic introspection. Dreams remained a popular literary device, however, and later analogues to the framed narrative vision appear in John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and in works by John Keats and James Joyce.

See MEDIEVAL POETICS, MEDIEVAL POETRY.

■ H. R. Jauss, La Génèse de la poésie allégorique française au moyen âge (1962); C. Hieatt, The Realism of Dream Visions (1967); E. Kirk, The Dream Thought of "Piers Plowman" (1972); A. C. Spearing, Medieval Dream Poetry (1976); K. L. Lynch, The High Medieval Dream Vision (1988); J. S. Russell, The English Dream Vision (1988); S. F. Kruger, Dreaming in the Middle Ages (1992); Reading Dreams, ed. P. Brown (1999); K. L. Lynch, Chaucer's Philosophical Visions (2000).

A. Walling

DUB POETRY. See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE.

DURATION. One of the three intonational characteristics of spoken sound, the other two being stress (see ACCENT) and *pitch. In poetry, duration concerns the timing of syllables, words, and lines, such timing being either actual or conventional—much more so the latter than the former. Actual duration falls under the category of *performance or *recitation. Adjustment of the duration of syllables in utterance, i.e., in the reading of the line, is a matter of delivery speed or tempo: this is not a part of the poem itself—i.e., of meter—but of personal choice and style in delivery. Some readers will read more slowly, deliberately, or expressively than others. Still, some ling. features of the line obviously affect tempo, the chief among these being morphology. It has long been known to poets in England that large numbers of monosyllables slow down delivery of the line, while polysyllables, by contrast, speed it up: Alexander Pope makes much use of monosyllables in his mimetic lines in the Essay on Criticism, particularly "Though ten low words oft creep in one dull line" (2.347)—to which compare the speed of "A needless Alexandrine ends the song"—; and the contrast is pointed up starkly in Shakespeare's "The multitudinous seas incarnardine, / Making the green one red" (Macbeth 2.2.59–60). To some degree, this is simply a function of the fact that heavily monosyllabic lines contain more junctures (pauses). Because of the limitations of the human vocal apparatus, the maximum delivery rate is about eight syllables per second (Lehiste). Langs. control change of duration for semantic and signaling purposes: one of the most important is final lengthening before terminal juncture. Syllables may be lengthened to signal the end of a syntagm, in speech or line, in poetry: this phenomenon is well attested in IE and Gr.

But more important than actual durations in verse are conventional ones, and by far the most important of these is the opposition of long and short, known as *quantity. This much-disputed contrast holds perhaps the central position in the hist. of Western prosody from archaic Gr. down to the 19th c. At least some ancient grammarians held that certain vowels were long, others short; the ancient metrists (metrici; see METRICI AND RHYTHMICI) held that the former were twice the length of the latter; they then devised a set of rules (incl. other criteria) for classifying syllables as "long" versus "short" and on this basis constructed a quantitative prosody (see CLASSICAL PROSODY). The ancient musical theorists (rhythmici), however, held that there were more distinctions than 2:1 and that some syllables were indeterminate. But over time, actual vowel (or even syllable) length quickly lost ground to conventional classification. Length was indeed phonemic in cl. Gr., but in the subsequent evolution of the cl. langs., it was lost, so that auditors no longer heard a long/short distinction at all. Nevertheless, the notion that syllables could be grouped into long versus short persisted among grammarians and prosodists literally for millennia. Mod. linguists distinguish between "tense" and "lax" vowels (Jakobson and Halle; see Jakobson, 1.550 ff., and Chomsky and Halle, 68–69, 324–26).

The time value of one short syllable was called a *mora by some of the ancient grammarians and has been used by mod. prosodists from time to time (see METER). The temporality or duration of syllables is a phenomenon of interest to performance theory in regard to tempo and the semantic cues tempo changes can deliver; it is of interest to metrical theory in that some verse systems use length, as others do stress or pitch, as the marker of the meter—but only when that intonational feature is phonemic.

See BINARY AND TERNARY, FOOT, MEASURE.

■ P. Barkas, Critique of Modern English Prosody (1934); Jakobson; Jakobson and Halle; Chomsky and Halle; I. Lehiste, Suprasegmentals (1970), ch. 2; Allen, esp. ch. 4; Brogan; West; R. P. Newton, Vowel Undersong (1981); I. Lehiste, "The Many Linguistic Functions of Duration," New Directions in Linguistics and Semiotics, ed. J. E. Copeland (1984); J. Clark, C. Yallop, J. Fletcher, An Introduction to Phonetics and Phonology, 3d ed. (2007); B. de Cornulier, "Minimal Chronometric Forms: On the Durational Metrics of 2-2 Stroke Groups," Towards a Typology of Poetic Forms, ed. J.-L. Aroui and A. Arleo (2009); X. Zheng, "The Effects of Prosodic Prominence and Serial Position on Duration Perception," Journal of the Acoustical Society of America 128 (2010).

T.V.F. BROGAN

DUTCH POETRY. See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE.

DYFALU. A poetic technique in *Welsh poetry that reaches its highest excellence in the work of Dafydd ap Gwilym (14th c.) but that long remained current practice and, after its degeneration, was ridiculed by Ellis Wynne in his Visions of the Sleeping Bard (1703). The term also means "to guess" and has affinities with the *riddle and the *kenning. Dyfalu at its best is an animated play of fancy, whereby the object on which the poet's mind dwells—be it the stars or mist or a bird, a girl's yellow hair or her white arms—is rapidly compared in a concatenation of *metaphors of strong visual imagery with other objects in nature. The stars are the sparks of a conflagration lit by the saints, berries belonging to the frozen moon, the reflection of hail on the sun's bright floor. This onrush of metaphors is well suited by its exuberance to convey Dafydd ap Gwilym's exciting vision of the ever-renewed miracle of creation. Other poets, such as Dafydd Nanmor in the 15th c., employ the same device with fine effect, but later it became mechanical and stereotyped.

■ J. Vendryes, La Poésie galloise des XIIe–XIIIe siècles dans ses rapports avec la langue (1930); Parry, History, chap. 6; R. Loomis, Dafydd ap Gwilym: The Poems (1982); R. Bromwich, Aspects of the Poetry of Dafydd ap Gwilym (1986); Jarman and Hughes, vol. 2, rev. D. Johnston (1997), esp. chap. 5; The New Companion to the Literature of Wales, ed. M. Stephens (1998).

D. M. LLOYD

E

ECHO VERSE. A poem of which the final syllables of the lines are repeated, as by an echo, with the effect of making a reply to a question or a comment, often contrastive, punning, or ironic. A critic of 1665 calls it a "kind of Poem imitating the resounding Rocks, wherein the last Syllables of a sentence repeated, give answer to a question in the same, or divers, and sometime a contrary sence." The poem is sometimes set in *couplets, the echo words alone forming the even lines, as in the following examples: "Qu'est-ça du monde la chose la plus infame? / Femme!" (Gracien du Pont, 1539); "Echo! What shall I do to my Nymph when I go to behold her? / Hold her!" (Barnabe Barnes, 1593). Postclassical echo verse is found in Fr. as early as the 13th c. (Kastner) and was known to the troubadours but was given its name only in the 16th c. by du Pont. The examples in the Greek Anthology inspired a vogue for echo poems in Fr., It., and Eng. verse of the 16th and 17th cs., which are also associated with the *eclogue on account of *stichomythia. Well-known examples are by Johannes Secundus, Joachim du Bellay, Martin Opitz, George Herbert ("Heaven"), Jonathan Swift ("A Gentle Echo on Woman"), A. W. Schlegel ("Waldgespräch"), and G. M. Hopkins ("The Leaden Echo and the Golden Echo"). Found most often in *pastoral poetry and drama, echo verse has unrequited love as its commonest subject but has also been used for religious poetry, political satire, and society verse. In structure, echo verse would seem to be one (particularly effective) species of *close rhyme or else *rich rhyme. Hollander takes the return of the sound in echo as a *trope for the mode of *allusion itself.

■ Kastner, 62–63; E. Colby, The Echo-Device in Literature (1920); J. Bolte, Die Echo in Volksglauben und Dichtung (1935); A. Langen, Dialogisches Spiel (1966); J. Hollander, The Figure of Echo (1981); T. Augarde, Oxford Guide to Word Games, 2d ed. (2003).

T.V.F. Brogan; L. Perrine

ECLOGUE (Gr. ek + leg-, "to pick from"). As a noun, ekloge was used to describe harvesting crops, drafting soldiers, electing leaders, reckoning accounts, and sampling texts; then in Lat. as ecloga, its meaning was specialized to, e.g., part of a poetry book (Statius, Silvae, 3 Pref. 20: summa est ecloga, "is the last component"). The term was similarly used by commentators for Horace's Epistles 2.1 and book of Epodes, also for the ten components of Virgil's Bucolics (or Eclogues), perhaps by the poet himself defining them as parts of a designed book (Hutchinson, Van Sickle). The Virgilian example focused eclogue to mean short dialogue or monologue with more or less oblique *allegory of politics, erotics, and poetics, all presented in dramatic form (enabling their early and recurrent theatrical success) as speech by herdsmen (pastores), from which later came the name pastoral* for a *genre featuring shepherds.

At his book's climax, Virgil also invented the mytheme of Arcadia as song's origin and ideal, challenging the Sicily of Gr. Theocritus, whose *idylls (little forms), were collected as Boukolika (about cowherds). They featured herders of cattle, sheep, and goats, dramatizing an old Gr. cognitive *metaphor, to herd thoughts (boukolein; Gutzwiller). Deploying herdsmen in heroic meter (epos), Theocritus prefigured the tension between *bucolic and heroic themes, characters and plots that was to animate Virgil and later trad., with recurrent contrasts between slight and great.

Eclogue as pastoral allegory in the manner inaugurated by Virgil recurs in subsequent Lat. Bucolics (Calpurnius, Nemesianus) and served Dante to defend his Divine Comedy in a programmatic eclogue to Giovanni di Virgilio. Outdoing Virgil's ten, Petrarch assembles 12 eclogues into a bucolic book, declaring himself moved by "lonely woods" to write something "pastoral" (Epistolae familiares 10.4). Emulative eclogue books proliferate, among them Giovanni Boccaccio's miscellany of 16 (Bucolicum carmen . . . distinctum eglogis, following Petrarch with allegorical meaning "beneath the bark"); 12 Christian eclogues of Antonio Geraldini; six of Jacopo Sannazaro featuring fishermen (piscatores); ten of Mantuan's pious Adulescentia (mentioned with affection by Shakespeare); and 12 in Edmund Spenser's Shepheardes Calender (1579), programmatically mingling erotics and metapoetics with court flattery and religious satire, also turning ekloge, ecloga (Gr., Lat.), egloga (Italianate Lat., It.), égloga (Sp.), eclog (Eng.), and eclogue (Fr., Eng.) into "aeglogue," explained as "Goteheards tales" by Spenser in the appended commentary he attributes to the otherwise unidentified E. K. (cf. Gr. aiges + logos). Affirming the allegorical and cognitive heritage of eclogues, George Puttenham's Arte of English Poesie (1589) says that an eclogue is written "not of purpose to counterfeit or represent the rusticall manner of loves and communication, but under the vaile of homely persons and in rude speeches to insinuate and glaunce at greater matters."

As such, the eclogue prompted remarkable diversity of cognitive applications apart from books, e.g., in Fr., Pierre de Ronsard's Bergeries, eclogues et mascarades (which was acted at court); in Sp., Garcilaso de la Vega's Églogas; and in Eng., Alexander Barclay's Eclogues and Barnabe Googe's Eglogs. The cognitive outreach spread to produce, e.g., town eclogues (John Gay, Jonathan Swift, Mary Wortley Montagu, Royall Tyler) and still prompts scattered pieces, e.g., from W. H. Auden and Seamus Heaney; and sequences or books, e.g., from W. Antony, Derek Walcott, and David Baker, extending too the pastoral realm of "green thought" (Andrew Marvell) to mod. ecology in the widespread coinage ecologue.

■ W. W. Greg, Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama (1906); R. F. Jones, "Eclogue Types in English Poetry of the Eighteenth Century," Journal of English and Germanic Philology 24 (1925); A. Hulubei, L'Églogue en France au XVIe Siècle, Époque Des Valois (1515–1589) (1938); D. Lessig, Ursprung und Entwicklung der Spanischen Ekloge Bis 1650; mit Anhang Eines Eklogenkataloges (1962); E. Bolisani and M. Valgimigli, La Corrispondenza Poetica di Dante Alighieri e Giovanni di Virgilio (1963); W. L. Grant, Neo-Latin Literature and the Pastoral (1965); W. Antony, The Arminarm Eclogues (1971); G. Otto, Ode, Ekloge und Elegie Im 18. Jahrhundert Zur Theorie und Praxis Französischer Lyrik Nach Boileau (1973); D. Walcott, "Italian Eclogues [for Joseph Brodsky]," The Bounty (1997); D. Baker, Midwest Eclogue (2005); K. Belford, Ecologue (2005); K. Gutzwiller, "The Herdsman in Greek Thought," Brill's Companion to Greek and Latin Pastoral, ed. M. Fantuzzi and T. Papanghelis (2006); P. McDonald, Pastorals (2006); I. Twiddy, "Seamus Heaney's Versions of Pastoral," Essays in Criticism 56 (2006); G. O. Hutchinson, Talking Books: Readings in Hellenistic and Roman Books of Poetry (2008); J. Van Sickle, Virgil's "Book of Bucolics": The Ten Eclogues Translated into English Verse (2011).

J. Van Sickle

ECOPOETRY. See environment and poetry.

ÉCRITURE. In his lit. crit. from the early 1950s on, the Fr. scholar Roland Barthes elaborated on an intransitive use of the verb to write (écrire) by which he meant to shift emphasis from the something written to writing (écriture) itself. Writing, in Barthes's work, becomes a free activity from which the writer derives a gratuitous pleasure (jouissance). Contra Jean-Paul Sartre, the political charge of writing would be carried not in the content or communicated meaning but in the act of writing, as lit. itself becomes a subversive practice.

In the 1960s, Barthes's work was important for the contributors to the literary review Tel Quel* (such as Philippe Sollers and Julia Kristeva) for whom formal experimentation in literary works was a political gesture worked on and through lang., the medium of the political. The critical work of Tel Quel tended to valorize writers and poets who produced what they called limit texts, writings that could be read as presenting a radical challenge to conventional notions of lit. A *canon of authors developed incl. figures such as Stéphane Mallarmé, the Comte de Lautréamont, James Joyce, Antonin Artaud, and Georges Bataille.

In the second half of the 1960s, Jacques Derrida contributed often to Tel Quel, and in his work, the notion of écriture underwent a further transformation. For Derrida, following Martin Heidegger, Western thought is metaphysical in its entirety and has never placed in question the privilege accorded to presence. It is only with the historical closure of this metaphysical project in the 19th c., a moment most often associated in Derrida's work with G.W.F. Hegel's system of philosophy, that it becomes possible to read in the trad. the mechanism of exclusion through which it was able to constitute itself. For Derrida, metaphysics is "logocentric," meaning that it has privileged speech (because of the presumed proximity of the speaking subject to the word spoken) over writing (characterized through the "dangerous" traits of loss and absence from the subject), which it has tended to marginalize. Through his reading of the phenomenologist Edmund Husserl and engaging with the broader structuralist and psychoanalytic context of postwar Fr. thought, Derrida developed a generalized conception of writing that radically questioned the metaphysical notion of presence. In work published in 1967 (Of Grammatology; Writing and Difference; and Voice and Phenomenon), he argued that the present does not exist as the purity of an origin but is constituted as an effect of writing (écriture). No longer understood as secondary and representational, écriture in Derrida's work is a subversive notion calculated to disrupt the trad. of Western thought.

Derrida's further qualification of the metaphysical trad. as "phallogocentric" was taken up and developed by feminist critics and authors in the 1970s. In "Le Rire de la Méduse" ("The Laugh of the Medusa," 1975), Hélène Cixous first used the term écriture feminine to designate a writing practice that attempts a break with a trad. in which the feminine has been excluded. In Cixous's discourse, écriture feminine is not simply writing produced by women, nor does it imply a female author. It refers, rather, to a writing that seeks to undo a trad. understood to be profoundly aligned with masculinity, creating the space for a previously impossible discourse and creative practice.

See poststructuralism, text.

■ R. Barthes, Writing Degree Zero, trans. A. Levers and C. Smith (1967); J. Kristeva, Revolution in Poetic Language, trans. M. Waller (1984); R. Barthes, A Barthes Reader, ed. S. Sontag (1993); P. ffrench, The Time of Theory: A History of Tel Quel (1960–1983) (1995); J. Derrida, Of Grammatology (1974), trans. G. Spivak, rev. ed. (1997); J. Derrida, Writing and Difference, trans. A. Bass, 2d ed. (2001); H. Cixous, White Ink: Interviews on Sex, Text and Politics, ed. S. Sellers (2008).

B. Norman

ECSTATIC POETRY. Ecstasy, associated by many with rapture, vision, mysticism, alcohol, drugs, or sex, derives from the Gr. ekstasis (ex [out of] + histanai [to stand, to place]) and signifies a motion away from stasis, of being "beside the self." It implies a foray from an ordinary to an extraordinary situation, from a normal or contained to an altered or unusual state, from one condition or knowledge to another.

Little wonder that poetry is closely allied with ecstasy. Ecstasy as phenomenon and poetic act preoccupied the earliest writers, finding expression in ancient Heb., Gr., Asian, Persian, Tamil, and Bhakti poetry, as well as in the work of thinkers like Plato, who in the Ion refers to the Bacchic frenzy of poets and in the Republic insists on exiling them because of their imaginative threat to civil order. Plotinus, Longinus, and others related ecstatic states to the condition of the poet and poetry.

Ecstatic poetry may seem a tautology. But is the poetic effort of every delirious lover or religious zealot an ecstatic poem? Mordell considers ecstasy the first condition of all poetry, arguing that traditional classifications—epic, dramatic, pastoral, didactic, and elegiac—are artificial and that only ecstatic utterances are genuine. By contrast, Valéry points out that "a poet's function . . . is not to experience the poetic state: that is a private affair. His function is to create it in others." The carnal twitch of verses like "There once was a girl from Nantucket" and wooings of the "Roses are red / Violets are blue" ilk cannot compare with the pent erotic lyricism of Emily Dickinson in the "Master" letters ("No rose, yet felt myself a' bloom, / No bird—yet rode in Ether") or the desire-whetted declarations of the Shulamite in the Song of Songs: "Let me lie among vine blossoms, / in a bed of apricots! / I am in the fever of love" (trans. A. and C. Bloch).

Barnstone posits five precincts of poetic ecstasy: rage and anger; madness; felicity and enthusiasm; secular love and physical union; and the rapture of mystical union, religious and profane. The poet's task, he writes, "is to note the [ecstatic] experience, describe it as best one can, note the specific physical and spiritual manifestations, and then hope that the reader . . . will be convinced at least of the authentic occurrence of the experience itself."

An ecstatic poem, then, must not only, or even necessarily, concern itself with an ecstatic subject but itself enact an ecstatic experience, whether through strategies of figuration and displacement, as in 9th-c. Chinese poet Yuan Chen's lines, "I cannot bear to put away / the bamboo sleeping-mat: / / that night I brought you home, / I watched you roll it out" ("The Bamboo Mat," trans. D. Young); the incantatory effects of music and rhythm, exemplified by G. M. Hopkins's "My cries heave, herds-long; huddle in a main, a chief- / woe, world-sorrow; on an age-old anvil wince and sing—"; paradox and juxtaposition, prominent in Sappho's address to Aphrodite: "But you, O blessed one, / smiled in your deathless face / and asked what (now again) I have suffered and why / (now again) I am calling out" (fragment 1, trans. A. Carson); and other syntactic manipulations, such as Pablo Neruda's "Body of skin, of moss, of eager and firm milk. / Oh the goblets of the breast! Oh the eyes of absence!" ("Body of a Woman," trans. W. S. Merwin).

Formally and temperamentally, there appear to be "yes" ecstatics, whose method and subject involve affirmation, an overflow of feeling (St. Teresa of Ávila, Walt Whitman, Hart Crane) and "no" ecstatics, for whom denial, distance, negation, even death, blur boundaries of self (Sappho, Dickinson, St. John of the Cross, Paul Celan). When the Sufi poet Rūmī calls love an ocean and the Milky Way a flake of foam floating in it, or the Bhakti mendicant Mīrabāī says, "Friends, I am mad / with love and no one sees" (trans. J. Hirschfield), one feels the powerful transgression by which words of ardor and of the romance of oblivion are made holy, and vice versa. Such ecstatic utterance suggests, as Barthes argues, that "the brio of a text is its will to bliss."

See CHARM, EROTIC POETRY, INCANTATION, INSPIRATION, INTENSITY, RELIGION AND POETRY, SUBLIME.

■ A. Mordell, The Literature of Ecstasy (1921); P. Valéry, "Poetry and Abstract Thought" [1939], The Art of Poetry, trans. D. Folliot (1958); R. Barthes, A Lover's Discourse, trans. R. Howard (1978); W. Barnstone, The Poetics of Ecstasy (1983); A. Carson, Eros the Bittersweet (1986); Holy Fire, ed. D. Halpern (1994); Burning Bright, ed. P. Hampl (1995); Women in Praise of the Sacred, ed. J. Hirschfield (1995); The Erotic Spirit, ed. S. Hamill (1996).

L. R. SPAAR

ECUADOR, POETRY OF. The hist. of Ecuadorian poetry has been divided into common Latin Am. periods: pre-Hispanic, colonial, 19th c., and contemp. But it also has been divided in accordance with international literary movements—*baroque, *neoclassical, romantic, modernist, postmodernist, realist, and so forth. While pre-Hispanic poetry remains to be reconstructed to enter the Ecuadorian *canon and the making of a list of nationally recognized poets has largely depended on literary critics' predilections and their relations to power, it is commonly accepted that the Jesuits Jacinto de Evia (b. 1629) and Juan Bautista Aguirre (1725–86), whose work shows the influence of Sp. poets of their times such as Luis de Góngora and Francisco de Quevedo, are the first poets of Ecuador. Aguirre's poetry is baroque and satirical and reflects the political dilemmas of the period, namely, the dominance of regionalism and the conflict between Ecuadorians from the coast and those from the Andean highland. During the 19th c., José Joaquín de Olmedo (1780–1847) wrote the epic poem "La victoria de Junín: Canto a Bolívar," and his poetic contributions have been widely celebrated in literary anthols. (Franco, Anderson Imbert and Florit).

Dolores Veintimilla de Galindo (1829–57), the only 19th-c. female poet to be studied in Ecuador at present, combines in her work a romantic style with a questioning of the limits imposed on women during the independence period. Her poem Quejas (Complaints), usually cited as a testimony of personal suffering and the social misunderstanding of women, also foretells the poet's suicide. Luis Cordero (1833–1912), a former president of Ecuador (1892–95), wrote epigrammatic and satirical poems in Quechua and in Sp. (Echeverría, Mera, Molestina).

At the beginning of the 20th c., the young poet Medardo Angel Silva (1898–1919) embraced in his life and work the transition between late romanticism and modernismo. He played the piano, read several langs., and wrote poetry and urban chronicles in a local newspaper. He also disdained money, fame, and power, displaying a belated, decadent Baudelairean style as a flâneur in Guayaquil. His hidden Af.-Ecuadorian ancestry and his early, tragic death are topics of gossip as well as scholarship (Benavides).

Equally important is the contribution of the avant-garde Hugo Mayo (1897–1988). Mayo's style was mainly abstract, hermetic, and humorous; and he was one of the most influential figures of the 20th c., providing new ling. and imaginative avenues to be rediscovered by later poets.

During the first half of the 20th c., Ecuadorean and international scholars agree, the work of Alfredo Gangotena (1904–44), Jorge Carrera (1902–78), and Gonzalo Escudero (1903–72) represents the most challenging poetry of Ecuador. Partly because of their family influences and economic positions, these three poets were in constant literary exchange with other poets around the world, and much of their work was translated into Fr., Eng., and Ger. Their poetry is mainly personal, metaphysical, and religious. But social issues also emerge in their works and remind us of their shared convictions about justice and freedom. César Dávila (1919–67) followed the steps of his three predecessors but embraced a more fantastic and abstract lang. in his work. His preference for obscuring the meaning of his poems became more relevant to poets such as Efraín Jara (b. 1926); Oswaldo Calisto Rivera (1979–2000, also known as Cachivache); and others who promote an obscure, bookish, and pedantic style as fundamental literary values of the late 20th c. Dávila also wrote short stories and, to the surprise of many, a long poem titled Boletín y Elegía de las Mitas to protest the inhumane conditions endured by Indians since the Sp. conquest. His tragic end occurred in Caracas, and his poetry immediately became razón de culto for young readers.

Jorge Enrique Adoum (1926–2009) and Hugo Salazar Tamariz (1923–99) were friends and contemporaries of Dávila. Their poetry is clearly marked by Marxist political convictions and, thus, by socialist realism and the style of the Rus. poet Vladimir Mayakovsky. The volumes of their collected poems, recently released in Ecuador, provide examples of social concerns and give us a clear idea of hegemonic literary discourses in the context of the cold war.

During the last half of the 20th c., Ecuadorian poetry matured and slowly became more international and ambitious. Hence, it reflects varied personal views shaped by global and national events, as well as inevitable literary influences from Europe and the U.S., while presenting a wide range of contemp. styles, voices, and themes. Ecuadorian poetry from the second half of the 20th c. includes the work of Carlos E. Jaramillo (b. 1932), David Ledesma (1934–61), Fernando Cazón (b. 1931), and other members of the Grupo Madrugada (Group of the Dawn) and the Generación Huracanada (Wrecked Generation) of the late 1950s and 1960s. The poets of these groups were united in revolt against governmental violence, repression, and social injustice, both domestic and worldwide. During the 1970s, the decade of the last Ecuadorian military dictatorship, Hipólito Alvarado (b. 1934), Agustín Vulgarín (1938–86), Euler Granda (b. 1935), Antonio Preciado (b. 1941), Humberto Vinueza (b. 1942), Julio Pazos (b. 1944), Sonia Manzano (b. 1947), Fernando Nieto (b. 1947), Javier Ponce (b. 1948), and Hernán Zúñiga (b. 1950, best known as a painter) were actively involved in developing and experimenting with new forms of poetry. The voice of the poor, represented through the use of urban colloquial lang. such as that of Guayaquil, was a special concern of the group Sicoseo, with Nieto as its mentor and leading figure.

The poetry of two members of Sicoseo—Fernando Balseca (b. 1959) and Jorge Martillo (b. 1957)—as well as that of Maritza Cino (b. 1957), Edwin Madrid (b. 1961), Eduardo Morán (b. 1957), Roy Sigüenza (b. 1958), and Diego Velasco (b. 1958) belongs to the 1980s. These poets were highly influenced by Ecuadorian predecessors but also by their times: the return of democracy to Ecuador, the end of national and international communist aspirations, and the impact of postmod. culture.

Among the dozens of new poets whose work has appeared in recent years are Siomara España (b. 1976), Luis Alberto Bravo (b. 1979), Augusto Rodríguez (b. 1979), Alex Tupiza (b. 1979), Victor Vimos (b. 1985), Ana Minga (b. 1983), and Dina Bellrham (1984–2011). They have been actively involved in public literary events and exchanges with poets from other countries and are the most innovative voices of their groups (Buseta de papel, Reverso), making extensive use of blog writing and integration of poetry with the visual arts (Iturburu and Levitin).

See COLONIAL POETICS; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ V. E. Molestina, Lira Ecuatoriana (1866); J. A. Echeverría, Nueva lira ecuatoriana (1879); J. L. Mera, Ojeada histórico-crítica sobre la poesía ecuatoriana (1893); E. Anderson Imbert and E. Florit, Literatura hispanoamericana (1970); O. H. Benavides, The Politics of Sentiment: Imagining and Remembering Guayaquil (1970); J. Franco, An Introduction to Spanish-American Literature (1975); Tapestry of the Sun: An Anthology of Ecuadorian Poetry, ed. F. Iturburu and A. Levitin (2009).

F. ITURBURU

EDDA. The two 13th-c. Icelandic eddas share a backward-looking, collecting aspect, ancient pagan mythic contents, and a literary-historical relationship; yet the Prose Edda and the Poetic Edda contrast sharply as literary works and often constitute different fields of research.

The appellation derives from a single sentence in an early 14th-c. Uppsala ms.: "This book is called Edda; Snorri Sturluson composed it. . . ." Edda is indistinguishable from the common noun meaning "great grandmother" and so may refer to the hoary age of the tales. But the purpose of the Prose Edda (also called Younger Edda or Snorri's Edda) is cultural renewal. Snorri (ca. 1178–1241), the best-known author from the most vital period of Icelandic lit., aimed to teach younger generations the poetics of the intricate traditional verse, chiefly the type now known as skaldic. Despite its cultural specificity, the Prose Edda resembles other Icelandic treatises on grammatica, and continental impulses have been convincingly asserted. Finished 1220–23 and structured in four parts, it teaches metrics (102 different named stanzas), poetic diction (esp. *kennings), and most famously mythological background; this is couched in a brilliant narrative dialogue that distances pagan stories from the contemp. Christian audience. The Prologue further sets a euhemerizing Christian scene for the whole; but Snorri's authorship is disputed.

When the main ms. of the Poetic Edda (Codex Regius 2365 4to; c. 1270) was rediscovered in the 17th c., scholars deemed it the probable chief source of the Prose Edda and transferred the name Edda; thus, the Poetic Edda is also called The Elder Edda (or, following an early misattribution, Sæmund's Edda). The Poetic Edda is an anthol. of some 29 poems (several composite) and prose transitions; the first 11, telling *myths, are ordered by the principal god concerned—Odin, Freyr, Thor, and minor divinities. The manuscript's second section arranges *heroic poems according to supposed chronology of events. A fragmentary second ms. (AM 748 4to; 14th c.) is unordered. Besides mythological and heroic narrative, *gnomic material occurs in both sections of the Poetic Edda. Of the four meters used, one, "old lore meter" (fornyrðislag), is closely matched in OE, OHG, and Old Saxon and so stems from Germanic antiquity. The poems are variously dated 9th to 13th cs., but as products of an oral period and oral transmission, they are not dateable with precision. The ms. opens with a poem of great beauty, mystery, and cultural importance, Völuspá (The Sybil's Prophecy), a sweeping survey of the origin and end of the universe, perhaps composed toward the end of the pagan era (late 10th c.). As a whole the mythic and heroic material of the Poetic Edda belongs to the most precious intellectual heritage of early Europe; the Prose Edda overlays such cultural-historical value with superb self-conscious artistry of a fully literate Christianity.

See GERMANIC PROSODY, NORSE POETRY, ORAL POETRY.

■ S. Sturluson, Edda, trans. A. Faulkes (1987); J. Kristjánsson, Edda and Saga (1988) and The Poetic Edda, trans. C. Larrington (1996); T. Gunnell, "Eddic Poetry," A Companion to Old Norse-Icelandic Literature and Culture, ed. R. McTurk (2005)—see also other relevant chapters.

J. HARRIS

EGYPT, POETRY OF

I. The Old Kingdom (ca. 2750–2260 BCE)
II. The Middle Kingdom (ca. 2134–1782 BCE)
III. The New Kingdom (ca. 1570–1070 BCE)
IV. The Coptic Period (284–640 CE)
V. Poetry in Arabic (640–present)

Poetry in Egypt passed through epochal changes in langs.: the ancient Egyptian, the Coptic, and the Ar. Whatever continuity there may be has less to do with any constant poetic heritage than with the common history and psychology of the Egyptian people.

The ancient Egyptian era is subdivided into three periods.

I. The Old Kingdom (ca. 2750–2260 BCE). We can suppose that, in addition to the poetry written in heightened lang. by educated scribes, there existed a less sophisticated "poetry," which was simple and humble, represented in the singing of the working people in accompaniment to their work.

The poetry in elevated langs. can hold place beside the achievements of the Egyptians in the artistic and technical spheres. They took pleasure in giving artistic shape to their songs, tales, and a world of contemplation extending beyond the quotidian routine and religion (Erman).

All that scribes wrote falls into short lines of equal length. Knowing nothing about their sound, we can regard them as verse, but their *meter remains unknown. It is generally supposed, however, that there are verses esp. characterized by the free *rhythm. In the early 1970s, Assmann argued that it was necessary to view Egyptian lit. (esp. poetry) not only as an instrument for the systematizations of religious or social rules but also as autonomous cultural discourse. Lichtheim (1973) based her literary classification on three categories: free prose; poetry (esp. characterized by the use of *parallelism or a mixed genre she calls "systematically structured speech"); and orational style. Egyptian literary texts were not read silently by individuals but were recited on special occasions.

Of the old poetry, little survived. What remains is only formulas and religious *hymns (songs of praise, chorales, *carols, *psalms). They are spirited and suggestive. The pyramid texts contain a collection of ancient formulas concerned with the destiny of the blessed dead kings, hymns, and banquet songs glorifying the deceased (Hassan).

During the fifth dynasty (2750–2625 BCE), the autobiography acquired its characteristics: a self-portrait in words mingling the real and the ideal, and emphatically eulogistic. The instructions in wisdom are a major literary genre created in the Old Kingdom (Lichtheim 1973).

II. The Middle Kingdom (ca. 2134–1782 BCE). Egypt's cl. age introduced extensive literary works in a variety of genres with accomplished command of forms. In the composition known as The Eloquent Peasant, rich in *metaphors and other poetic *imagery, the art of fine speaking was made to serve the defense of justice. Hymns to the gods are a close relation to the biblical psalms, and hymns to the kings were expressed in emotionally charged poems. The Story of Sinuhe, the crown jewel of Middle Kingdom lit., employs three styles: prose, poetry, and oration. The narration is interspersed with three poems, each being an example of a genre. Other genres include coffin texts and didactic writing. The so-called coffin texts were written in the intermediate period between the Old and Middle Kingdoms. Coffins of nonroyal well-to-do persons were inscribed with spells designed to protect the dead against the perils of the netherworld. Didactic lit. (wisdom and the genre of instruction) was not just the guidelines of a father to his son but the contemplation of profound problems of the human condition.

The theme of national distress or even human torment was only a literary topos that required no basis in society ("The Complaints of Khakheperr-Sonb"). The author addresses his complaints to his heart, and poetic elaboration uses overstatements.

In the "Satire of the Trades," a father instructs his son in the duties and rewards of the scribal profession, ridiculing the other trades. The composition is in the orational style.

III. The New Kingdom (ca. 1570–1070 BCE). One characteristic of ancient Egyptian poetry in general is the integrating of elements from different genres such as teachings, laments, eulogies, and oral compositions. But the *epic form appears for the first time in the Kadesh Battle inscriptions of Ramses II in the long section known as the Poem. Hymns to the gods are another genre in which the New Kingdom went beyond the Middle, depicting new trends of religiosity: the god of all who is accessible to the pious individual. A large number of hymns are addressed to the sun god. A qualitative change, the doctrine of the sole god worked out by Amonhotep IV, Akhenaten's monotheistic teachings, followed.

The Book of the Dead is the continuation of the coffin texts. Instead of being inscribed on coffins, the spells are now written on papyrus scrolls, grouped into chapters and accompanied by vignettes (Lichtheim 1976).

Although *lyric poetry was well developed in the Middle Kingdom, love lyrics seem to be a creation of the New Kingdom. Love poems are rich in elaborate puns, metaphors, and rare words. Calling them love poems, rather than love songs, emphasizes their literary origin. The lovers referred to each other as brothers and sisters. The poems have the conceptual accessibility and the pithiness of lang.

IV. The Coptic Period (ca. 284–640 CE). In the earliest stage of Christianity, poetry and religion were rather coextensive, but at a later stage, poetry separated itself to some extent from religion. Drama also separated itself from liturgy. The relation between religion and poetry, however, was closest in the lyric. The lyric expressed the individual's sense of awe, wonder, or guilt in the presence of the sacred. Mystic poets used erotic metaphors to express their epiphanies.

The Coptic lang. and literary trad. use familiar, simple, and direct expressions inspired by the Bible. The influence of the NT can be found not only in the ideas but also in symbols and *diction.

V. Poetry in Arabic (640–present). In 640 CE, the forces of Islam conquered Egypt, and some Arab tribes settled in Egypt. Their poets produced mainly vainglorious poems in meter and rhyme, part of the collective trad. However, Egyptian poetry developed historically under political and social conditions different from those in many Arab countries, and it changed in isolation. Egypt attracted many Arab poets in pursuit of rewards and settlement. Many remarkable Arab poets visited Egypt, among whom were Jameel Bothaaina (d. 701) and Kothayer Azza (ca. 660–723), two poets of platonic love; and Abū Nuwās (756–814) and Abū Tammām (788–845). Under the reign of Tulunides (868–905), Egypt had many poets, e.g., al-Kassem ben Yehia Almaryamy (d. 928) and al-Hussain Ibn Abel-Salam (d. 871). The great poet al-Bohtory (b. ca. 821) praised Ahmed Ibn Tulun and his successor. After ending his relation with his patron Saif Al-Dawlah in 951, the great Ar. poet al-Mutanabbī (915–65) came to Cairo and lavishly praised the ruler Kafur. When the latter did not respond to the poet's political ambitions, al-Mutanabbī fled at night and cruelly satirized him.

In later centuries, Ibn Maṭrouh (1196–1251), Bahāʾ al-dīn Zuhayr (1186–1258), Ibn Nubatah al Misri (1287–1366) and Ṣafī al-Din al-Ḥillī (d. 1349) made Cairo an important cultural center.

The poetic genre that had dominated poetry was *eulogy, which was initially meant to depict the ideal image of the perfect man. Soon the *panegyric lost much of its credibility, and the genre became imitative, repetitious, and tedious.

After the caliphate disintegrated, small regions were governed by many minor rulers, many of whom did not speak Ar. and had no interest in poetry. Over long periods, poetry stagnated; artificial embellishments and wordplay took the place of serious concerns. This kind of poetry was contemporaneous with enduring experiments in Sufi and religious poetry, a prominent representative of which was Ibn al-Fārid (ca. 1181–1235). His mystical poetry was characterized by its rich imagery of symbolic wine and love. Al-Būṣīrī (ca. 1212–96) wrote the "Qaṣīdat al-Burdah" (Mantle Ode), a luminous *ode in praise of the Prophet.

Bahāʾ al-dīn Zuhayr, born in Mecca, spent most of his life in Egypt. He was a favorite of the Ayyubid ruler al-Malek al-Ṣaleh. His poems were lucid, simple, and very close to spoken lang.

Egyptian cultural life was roused from its lethargy by Napoleon's expedition of 1798, with little immediate effect on poetry. Mohamed Ali's cultural innovations were in the sphere of education. Egyptian students were sent to study in France; the Bulaq printing press was founded; and Enlightenment books were ordered to be trans. leading to an important trans. movement and a shift in readership, which was confined earlier to the traditional Islamic scholars (Starkey). A major role in the devel. of the literary revival was played by the press.

A great part of Ar. poetry had declined from the fall of Baghdad in 1258 to the Fr. occupation of Egypt in 1798. Mahmoud Sami al-Barudi (1835–1904) tried to restore the style, spirit, and trads. of the great Ar. poets. This was possible only through the availability of eds. of their collections of poems by the printing press. The Eur. concept of neoclassicism, however, does not apply to al-Barudi and his successors, Ahmad Shawqī (1869–1932) and Hāfez Ibrāhīm (1871–1932). Al-Barudi wrote mainly in the manner of pre-Islamic poets about love, war, and desert life in a tribal heroic society. At his best, he was a conscious innovator with an ability to express vividly his subjective experiences through traditional idioms.

After Al-Barudi, it is possible to speak of a school that included Shawqī, Hāfez, Ismail Sabri (1854–1923), Ali al-Jarem (1881–1949), and others, although it was a school without theoretical foundations. The trad. considered the poet as the spokesman of his nation, the enlargement of his tribe, which was a function long lost (Badawi). Shawqī, the *poet laureate, initially composed panegyrical poems on official occasions. The Brit. authorities exiled him; he went to Spain, where he reflected his deep nostalgia for Egypt. After his return, he expressed the popular attitude toward national and social subjects and refused to be the mouthpiece of the court. During this period, he wrote most of his poetic dramas. He used the idioms and imagery of traditional Ar. poetry to address contemp. social, cultural, and political concerns. The critic Taha Hussain described him and comparable poets as mere revivalists, but in 1927 he was called the Prince of Poets by fellow Arab poets.

A great Lebanese poet, Khalīl Muṭrān (1872–1949), who settled in Egypt, was one of the first Arab romantic poets to create new themes and imagery, in addition to his full mastery of conventional poetic diction. In Egypt, he had many admirers, among them many prominent romantic poets such as Ibrāhīm Nājī (1898–1953), ʿAlī Maḥmūd Ṭāhā (1901–49), and Saleh Jawdat (1912–76), who all joined the Apollo group founded by Aḥmad Zakī abu-Shādī (1892–1955) in 1932. The group included members writing in different styles, but all worked for "lofty poetical ideals," as the group stated in its *manifesto. Abu-Shādī was not considered a great poet, but he was a versatile experimenter with muwashshaḥ forms (a postclassical form of Ar. poetry arranged in stanzas), Eng. *free verse and *sonnets, but with no followers.

The movement called al-Dīwān (The Register) appeared at the turn of the 20th c. in opposition to Shawqī and Hāfez. It aspired to be a new direction that endeavored to establish a genuine Egyptian lit. under the influence and guidance of Western literary romantic ideas. This trend was defended by Mahmoud Abbas al-ʿAqqād (1889–1964), Abdel-Raḥmān Shukrī (1886–1958), and Ibrāhīm Abdel-Kader al-Māzinī (1889–1949). Their so-called revolution tried to find the appropriate form to express the Egyptian national spirit, but it did not lead to new forms: the Ar. literary trad. dominated the poetry of this movement.

After World War II, there were attempts to formulate new forms of poetic discourse to express new national and popular requirements. Sometimes, these attempts were under the banner of what was called "commitment," i.e., commitment to revolutionary subjects of independence and social justice, whose prominent contributors were the leftist poets Kamal Abdel-Halim (1926–2004) and Abdel-Rahman al-Sharqawi (1920–87). A leading figure in that movement was Fouad Haddad (1927–85), who wrote in colloquial Ar. Those poets published in leftist magazines, e.g., Almalayeen (Millions) and Al Kateb (The Writer), as well as in other cultural reviews of daily newspapers. The movement for what was called modern poetry was wider than the commitment in themes, incl. quotidian and existential experiences. It included among many poets Ṣalāḥ ʿAbd al-Sabūr (1931–81), Ahmad Ḥ. Hijazy (b. 1935), and Muḥammad Miftāḥ al-Faytūrī (b. 1936?). Abd-Alsabour wrote dramatic pieces on the theme of cosmic distress. Hijazy was the poet of the Arab revolution, though his views radically changed later. What was known as mod. poetry in Egypt was mainly based on the single foot (tafʿela) rather than the complete meter (baḥr) and on a variety of rhymes.

The generation that followed in the 1960s included Amal Dunqul (1940–83), Mohamad Afifi Matar (1935–2010), and Mohamad Ibrahim Abu-Sinna (b. 1937), who were of different orientations. Dunqul was popular for his poems against the official politics. Abu-Sinna is known for his revolutionary romantic verses. Afifi Matar was known for his significant contribution to experimental poetry and his influence on the next generation of poets.

The 1970s were the years of the defeat of the Arab national project after the war with Israel and the occupation of Arab territories in 1967. Two groups of poets issued collective manifestos in Egypt: Idāʾa 77 (Illumination) and Aswât (Voices). These groups were similar in experimental orientation and their rejection of the traditional canon. They set themselves apart from the poets of the 1950s and 1960s and opposed the status quo. Among the Idāʾa group were Helmy Salem (b. 1951), Hassan Tilib (b. 1944), Refʿât Sallam (b. 1951), Mahmoud Nasim (b. 1955) and Shaʾban Youssef (b. 1955). The Aswât group included Abdul-Monʾim Ramadan (b. 1951), Ahmad Taha (b. 1948), Ȧbdul Maqsud Ȧbdul-Karim (b. 1956), Mohamed Eid Ibrahim (b. 1955), and Mohamed Sulaiman (b. 1946), who also experimented with *prose poems in the 1990s. Their poetry abandoned ideology and nationalism, focusing on personal and relative truth. Other Egyptian poets, such as Mohamed Salih (1940–2009), Fathy Abdulla (b. 1957), Fatma Qandil (b. 1958), and Ali Mansour (b. 1956), did not belong to either of the two groups but became prominent for their prose poems (Mehrez). Since the 1990s, the poetry scene has been characterized by the predominance of the prose poem.

■ M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature, v. 1: The Old and Middle Kingdoms (1973), foreword by A. Loprieno (2006); M. Badawi, A Critical Introduction to Modern Arabic Poetry (1975); S. Mureh, Modern Arabic Poetry, 1800–1970 (1976)—devel. of its forms and themes; J. Brugman, An Introduction to the History of Modern Arabic Literature in Egypt (1984); S. Mehrez, "Experimentation and the Institution, The Case of Idāʾa 77 and Aswât," Alif 11 (1991); A. Erman, Ancient Egyptian Poetry and Prose, trans. A. Blackman (1995); S. Hassan, Encyclopedia of Ancient Egypt, v. 17 and 18:

Ancient Egyptian Literature (2000)—in Ar.; J. Assman, The Mind of Egypt: History and Meaning in the Time of the Pharaohs, trans. A. Jenkins (2002); S. Deif, History of Arabic Literature, v. 7: Epoch of States and Emirates, Egypt (2003)—in Ar.; R. Allen, "The Post-classical Period: Parameters and Preliminaries," Cambridge History of Arabic Literature: Arabic Literature in the Post-Classical Period, ed. R. Allen and D. S. Richards (2006); M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature, v. 2: The New Kingdom, 2d. ed., foreword by H. Fischer-Elfert (2006); P. Starkey, Modern Arabic Literature (2006).

I. Fathy

EISTEDDFOD (bardic session or assembly; pl. eisteddfodau). A main feature of Welsh literary activity that can be traced back with certainty to the 15th c. and perhaps to the bardic festival held by Lord Rhys in 1176 at Cardigan. The early eisteddfod was an assembly of the guild or order of bards, convened under the aegis of a distinguished patron, and in the 16th c. even under royal commission. Its chief function was to regulate the affairs of the profession, such as the establishment of metrical rules and the issuance of licenses to those who had completed the prescribed stages of their apprenticeship. Awards were also granted for outstanding achievements in poetry and music. The most important of these eisteddfodau were Carmarthen (ca. 1450) and Caerwys (1523 and 1567). Decay then set in, and the institution degenerated to the tavern eisteddfodau of the 18th c. After a period of decline, the eisteddfod was revived during the 19th c., and Welsh immigrants brought the trad. with them to North America, Argentina, and Australia. Today, the National Eisteddfod of Wales is a cultural festival of wide range and influence that provides for poetry, prose, drama, massed choirs, and other vocal and instrumental music. It has given much-needed patronage and publicity to poetry and has enabled several important literary critics to impose standards and to mold literary taste. Since the 20th c., eisteddfodau promoting indigenous linguistic, musical, and literary trads. have been held in Cornwall, the Channel Islands, and other countries. While not directly related to the Welsh eisteddfod trad., the Scottish Royal National Mod fulfills a similar function in Scotland.

See welsh poetry.

■ E. J. Evans, The History of the Eisteddfod, diss., University of Wales (1913); T. Parry, Eisteddfod y Cymry: The Eisteddfod of Wales, trans. R. T. Jenkins (1943); Stephens.

D. M. Lloyd; B. Bruch

EKPHRASIS (pl. ekphraseis). Detailed description of an image, primarily visual; in specialized form, limited to description of a work of visual art. Ekphrasis is a term proper first to cl. rhet. but becomes a key part of the art of description in poetry, historiography, romance, and novels. As Hagstrum contends, ekphrasis probably entered mod. poetry from Gr. romance. While mod. ekphrasis has never belonged exclusively to a single genre, certain kinds of ekphraseis have become associated with particular styles and forms—the *blason and the Petrarchan lyric, e.g.

Ekphrasis in rhet. was used to focus and amplify emotions, with the rhetor lingering over key aspects of an image in order to persuade his audience (Cicero, De oratore; Quintilian, Institutio oratoria). Ekphrasis in this regard is often conflated with enargeia*, Aristotle's term not just for visual detail, but for *tropes of animation (Rhetoric 3.11.2). Ekphraseis were also a crucial part of the rhetor's method for memorizing a speech. All a rhetor's examples or major points of argument could be "placed" in imagination in a particular part of a mental image—the 12 houses of the zodiac, imagined in a wheel, were often used for this purpose. The rhetor then needed to recall only the image to have access to the items stored there. Detailed mental images were a crucial part of this art of memory from Gorgias (Encomium of Helen) forward, and in this context, emotionally powerful images were particularly important. The formative example here is of the poet Simonides of Ceos, who was able to identify the victims of a building collapse by remembering exactly where they had been seated during dinner (Cicero, De oratore). In the med. period, the ars memoria have a rich hist., with several texts devoted to describing and understanding the *imagery deemed necessary to remembering (Thomas Bradwardine, De memoria artificial adquirenda, among others).

The poetic representation of works of visual art was promoted by the trad. most often identified with Horace of ut pictura poesis* (as is painting, so is poetry). Theories of the sister arts held not only that poetry and painting (as well as music) would present the same subject matter but that their moral content, instructional value, and affective potential were parallel. While the sister-arts trad. has never disappeared, the status of the poetic image has undergone significant shifts. During the Reformation, as Gilman shows, iconoclastic approaches to worship made ekphraseis both dangerous and desirable. Poetic ekphraseis took a reader's attention from exterior, potentially idolatrous imagery and pointed inward to the mind and soul; however, the images of poetry were understood to be deeply powerful and thus required great care in their use. In the 20th c., the imagist poets sought to renew the power of poetry to set objects before the reader's eyes and used stripped-down forms of description to attempt to create a sense of visual immediacy (see imagism).

The most famous ancient examples of ekphrastic descriptions of art were frequently imitated in med. and Ren. writing and include Homer's description of Achilles' shield in the Iliad, the shield of Aeneas in Virgil's Aeneid, and the tapestries of Arachne and Minerva in Ovid's Metamorphoses. Buildings have also been important subjects, as with John Milton's description of Pandaemonium in Paradise Lost or with the Ren. trad. of the *country house poem. More rarely, ekphraseis may also represent music, as in Thomas Mann's Magic Mountain or John Dryden's "Alexander's Feast."

There is a rich variety of ekphrastic description beyond those of works of art, as may be seen in the med.

*dream vision, the Petrarchan blason of a woman's beauty, or in *emblem poems. Landscape description is one of the more common forms of ekphrasis, and gardens are also a rich subject (Andrew Marvell's "The Garden" is a particularly powerful example, where the last stanza pictures a parterre with a sundial and zodiac). *Georgic poetry, with its representations of labor, is also home to ekphrastic description of landscape and its alterations.

Ekphraseis serve many (nonexclusive) purposes. Some are virtuoso displays of poetic skill intended to align the author with the cl. trad., esp. with Virgil (as part of the poetic apprenticeship identified with Virgil's movement from *pastoral to georgic and then *epic). With the med. ars memoria, images were understood to have mental power, allowing vast amounts of information to be collated and stored in the mind; detailed description was essential to this function. Some images have almost magical meanings, as with elements of dream visions or with Gnostic writings. Other ekphraseis, as with emblem poems, are offered as subjects of religious meditation (George Herbert, Richard Crashaw, John Donne). Religious iconography may also determine which visual elements in a poem receive detailed description (as with the pentangle in Sir Gawain and the Green Knight); other objects or places may be carefully drawn in order to emphasize allegorical meaning (Gawain's armor) or ritual (Gawain's hunt—some ekphraseis in Gawain serve multiple purposes). Some ekphraseis are used to emphasize cultural norms or exemplary kinds of virtue; in the country house poem, e.g., the landowner's hospitality, power, taste, and lineage are made manifest by descriptions of his property (Andrew Marvell's "Appleton House" or Ben Jonson's "To Penshurst"). At times, ekphraseis are hidden, used as puzzles or to indicate esoteric knowledge, as in Donne's "A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning," where a compass sketches out a circle with a pinpoint at its center—the alchemical symbol for gold—while the poem evokes gold "to airy thinness beat." While ekphraseis perhaps most often are of objects of beauty, the grotesque and ugly are represented as well (the contents of London's gutters in Jonathan Swift's "A Description of a City Shower" or the decayed face of the prostitute in his "A Beautiful Young Nymph Going to Bed").

Ekphraseis play important roles in novels, too. They may be used in many of the ways listed above, but they also come into new prominence with the realist novel. The proliferating objects of the mod. world populate the 19th-c. novel, and the details of 19th-c. interiors or the clutter of the city form the backbone of realism. In novels as well as in poetry, ekphrastic descriptions also may be used to create foci that bring subjective experience into play, so that the emotions of a character emerge through description of the external world. This is often the case in epistolary fiction, as with Belford's description of Clarissa's prison in Samuel Richardson's Clarissa or the landscapes of Charlotte Smith's Desmond.

The psychological and neurological mechanisms underlying ekphraseis are becoming better understood, as cognitive science has begun to explore imagery across the senses. While most investigations have focused on visual imagery, there have also been investigations of the imagery of sound, taste, touch, and smell, as well as on effects, like those of motion, that involve combinations of imagery from across the five senses (Scarry, Starr).

See AFFECTIVE FALLACY, COGNITIVE POETICS, DESCRIPTIVE POETRY, ICONOLOGY, IMAGERY, LANDSCAPE POEM, PAINTING AND POETRY.

■ Curtius; F. Yates, The Art of Memory (1965); M. Krieger, "Ekphrasis and the Still Movement of Poetry; or Laokoön Revisited," The Poet as Critic, ed. F. McDowell (1967); E. Gilman, Iconoclasm and Poetry in the English Reformation (1986); J. Hagstrum, The Sister Arts (1987); W.J.T. Mitchell, Iconology (1987); J. Hollander "The Poetics of Ekphrasis," Word and Image 4 (1988); M. Carruthers, The Book of Memory (1990); J.A.W. Heffernan, Museum of Words: The Poetics of Ekphrasis from Homer to Ashbery (1993); M. Doody, The True Story of the Novel (1996); M. Carruthers, The Craft of Thought (1998); E. Scarry, Dreaming by the Book (1999); The Medieval Craft of Memory, ed. M. Carruthers and J. Ziolkowski (2002); E. Freedgood, The Ideas in Things (2006); C. Wall, The Prose of Things (2006); G. G. Starr, "Multisensory Imagery," The Johns Hopkins Handbook of Cognitive Cultural Studies, ed. L. Zunshine (2010).

G. G. STARR

ELECTRONIC POETRY. Also known as e-poetry, digital poetry, new-media poetry, hypertext poetry, and computer poetry, all but the last of which have been used more or less interchangeably. Whereas once computer poetry might have been assumed to denote combinatory texts automatically generated from the formal rules and logic of a computer program (a practice dating back to the 1950s), the shift to electronic poetry is indicative of the much wider spectrum of creative activity now taking place, with poets using personal computers as platforms for compositions intended to be encountered and experienced in native digital format. Electronic poetry as it is discussed here should, therefore, not be confused with poetry that is only incidentally distributed through electronic media, such as a poem reproduced in the online ed. of a magazine or review; rather, electronic poetry seeks to exploit the unique capabilities of computers and networks to provide a text whose elements and behaviors would not "translate" to the printed page.

Electronic poems typically include one or more of the following: multimedia, animation, sound effects or soundtracks, reader interaction in the form of choices or other participatory features, and automated behaviors. Electronic poetry can exist in a networked environment such as the World Wide Web where it is accessed via a browser, or it can take the form of standalone works that are installed either as software or (even) as room-sized immersive environments. There are hundreds if not thousands of e-poets working today, there are workshops and conferences devoted to the practice, and there are (electronic) jours. and collections as well as dedicated competitions to promote and disseminate the work. Public readings and "open-mouse" events are increasingly common. Some poets identify themselves exclusively as e-poets, while others see electronic experimentation as merely one element of their writing practice. Electronic poetry has been written in Eng., Fr., Sp., Ger., It., Rus., Chinese, Korean, and undoubtedly other langs. Among non-Eng. writers, there has been a particularly important trad. in France, notably the work of Philippe Bootz and the L.A.I.R.E. group that founded the electronic jour. Alire: A Relentless Literary Investigation in 1989. The Writing Machine Collective is a more recent Hong Kong-based group that has produced innovative and dynamic work.

There is no way to unify or summarize the diversity of electronic poetry under a common method or theme; some of it is whimsical, some of it serious with high-literary pretensions; some of it is narrative, some of it is confessional, and some of it is self-referential and stochastic in the trad. of the 20th-c. avant garde. All electronic poets, however, would surely admit to some level of fascination with digital technology and the way in which its formal logics can be superimposed upon that other formal system par excellence, lang. John Cayley's windsound (1999), which introduced his technique of transliteral morphing, is exemplary here. Cayley's poem supposes grids of legible texts, one atop the other, and exposes the process of transformation by which one morphs into another through looping letter replacements. Visually and aurally, the experience of windsound is that of watching constellations of letters appear on a black canvas, coalescing into individual words and complete lines. A computer-generated voice (actually multiple voices) reads the generated text over the sound of wind and other effects; as the voice reads, the text is subtlety shifting, creating the illusion of constant motion, like wind (perhaps) over water. The piece is approximately 25 minutes in length.

The ability to incorporate time as an element of textual composition is, in fact, one of the most pronounced features of electronic poetry, since, unlike poetry printed on the page, the author can maintain some control over the pace of a reader's progress through the text. Brian Kim Stefans's "The Dreamlife of Letters" (2000), a remix of an e-mail message originally authored by Rachel Blau DuPlessis, thus uses the popular animation tool Flash to create a series of kinetic and concrete texts that follow an alphabetical progression. The reader is merely a spectator. David Knoebel's "click poetry," as he calls it, employs somewhat different conventions. In "A Fine View," the reader follows a brief narrative of roofers taking a smoke break amid the rafters of a half-completed job; the text scrolls toward the viewer, who must read more rapidly than is perhaps comfortable in order to take it all in before it disappears off the edges of the screen—there is no way to pause or rewind. We then see that the "reader," in fact, occupies the position of a cigarette butt, falling through the rafters (like the absent compatriot whose story they tell) toward a concrete foundation below. The rafters, we recognize, are the lines of text themselves.

Electronic poetry is no less material or embodied than other forms of poetry; indeed, it is arguably more so, since any electronic poem will be embedded amid complex layers of technologies and producers. Just as poets have repeatedly responded to the intro. of new writing technologies—such as the typewriter—so too do electronic poets engage with new and emerging software tools and data formats, often bending or breaking the technology as they seek to exploit its capabilities for maximum effect while simultaneously commenting—self-reflexively—on the properties of the medium. Jim Rosenberg's ongoing series of experiments with diagrammatic texts (since the late 1960s) have explored a variety of electronic media and formats, incl. HyperCard, HTML, and Java. Daniel C. Howe and Aya Karpinska's "open.ended" (2004) uses the Java programming lang. to present the reader with two graphical cubes rendered one inside the other; the reader is able to rotate and spin the faces of the cubes to reveal layers of shifting text written on each, yielding compositions of indeterminate scope—one may choose to restrict one's reading to the text of a single face or explore the cubes, whose content is constantly changing, at greater depth.

While electronic poetry's native habitat is the computer, occasionally poets also seek to create a fuller or more immersive environment for their work. William Gibson's "Agrippa" (1992) was originally included on a diskette embedded at the back of an artist's book of the same name published by Kevin Begos Jr. with etchings by the artist Dennis Ashbaugh; famously, Gibson's text was programmed to encrypt itself after a single reading, although the poem has long since been transcribed and posted to the Internet. Stephanie Strickland's V: WaveSon.nets / Losing L'una is an "invertible book" published in 2002, with a URL at its center leading to the third leg of the composition, V: Vniverse, available only online as an interactive work. Oni Buchanan's Spring (2008) includes a CD-ROM that features Flash-animated versions of "The Mandrake Vehicles," a sequence whose print form in the volume explores processes of poetic formation and deformation. Noah Wardrip-Fruin's Screen (2002) was designed for a CAVE, a room-sized virtual-reality environment. Texts appear on the walls of the CAVE and appear to approach and recede; the reader can interact with them through gesture and motion, batting them back and forth. Screen is, in fact, a collaborative work, involving a small group of poets and programmers, a common occurrence for electronic poetry. As one might imagine, preserving and archiving electronic poetry for posterity is already presenting daunting challenges for librarians and collectors.

Meanwhile, the older practice of computer poetry, where computers are programmed to generate poetic compositions, is still practiced. Such work tends to be playful, focused more on the pleasures of found or chance texts, rather than on overly earnest attempts to have the machine script poetry that might conceivably pass for human-authored (see FOUND POETRY). This activity also now finds an added dimension in so-called *codework, which appropriates the actual langs. of computer programming for poetic expression. Perl poems, e.g., use the lang. Perl to create texts that are both computationally executable (they can be "run" as valid Perl code) but also lyrically compelling. Writing Perl poetry is popular with professional coders because they find the constraints of the form challenging. "Listen" (1995) by Sharon Hopkins is among the best known and has been published in the Economist and the Guardian. It begins

```
#!/usr/bin/perl
APPEAL:
listen (please, please);
```

More experimental practitioners of codework, such as Alan Sondheim and Mary-Anne Breeze (Mez), are less interested in producing executable texts than in using code as a vehicle to explore the semantic boundaries of lang. and textuality.

As for the future of electronic poetry, there is no way to predict except to say that it will surely embrace multiple futures. Mobile platforms such as cell phones and iPods are becoming venues for literary experimentation via their texting features. The links, feeds, and tags of "Web 2.0" engage even conventional writers in some highly unorthodox writing practices; poets have even experimented with using the game engines from multiplayer worlds like DOOM and Second Life to provide a repurposed writing environment. What electronic poetry demonstrates above all is perhaps a constant human appetite to make over space, virtual and otherwise, into surfaces suitable for inscription.

See COMPUTATIONAL POETICS, CONCRETE POETRY, CYBERTEXT, VISUAL POETRY.

■ Select Critical Studies: C. O. Hartman, Virtual Muse (1996); L. Pequeño Glazier, Digital Poetics (2002); New Media Poetics, ed. A. Morris and T. Swiss (2006); C. T. Funkhouser, Prehistoric Digital Poetry (2007); N. K. Hayles, Electronic Literature (2008); M. G. Kirschenbaum, Mechanisms (2008).

■ Select Poets and Resources: Alire: http://motsvoir.free.fr/; J. Andrews: http://www.vispo.com/; BeeHive: http://beehive.temporalimage.com/; O. Buchanan, Spring (2008); J. Cayley: http://www.shadoof.net/in/; Eastgate Systems: http://www.eastgate.com/; The Electronic Literature Collection, vol. 1 (2006), http://collection.eliterature.org/1/; The Electronic Literature Organization: http://www.eliterature.org; The Electronic Poetry Center: http://epc.buffalo.edu/; The Iowa Review Web: http://research-intermedia.art.uiowa.edu/tirw/; D. Knoebel: http://home.ptd.net/~clkpoet/; J. Nelson: http://www.secrettechnology.com/; Poems That Go: http://www.poemsthatgo.com/; J. Rosenberg: http://www.well.com/user/jer/; The Writing Machine Collective: http://www.writingmachine-collective.net/.

M. G. KIRSCHENBAUM

ELEGIAC DISTICH, elegiac couplet (Gr., elegeion). In Gr. poetry, a distinctive meter consisting of a *hexameter followed by an *asynartete combination of two end-shortened dactylic tripodies (– ∪ ∪ – ∪ ∪ – + – ∪ ∪ – ∪ ∪ –). It is, thus, a species of *epode (sense 2), in which the second line (later analyzed as a *pentameter consisting of a central *spondee between pairs of *dactyls and *anapests) gives the distinctive and satisfying effect of medial and final shortening (*catalexis). Originally used by the 6th- and 7th-c. BCE writers Archilochus, Callinus, Tyrtaeus, Theognis, and Mimnermus for a variety of topics and occasions—flute songs, symposiastic and poetic competitions, war songs, dedications, *epitaphs, inscriptions, *laments on love or death—it came to be associated thereafter with only one, i.e., loss or mourning—hence, *elegy in the mod. sense. It seems to embody reflection, advice, and exhortation—essentially "sharing one's thoughts." Threnodies, ritual laments, or cries uttered by professional poets at funerals may also have used the meter.

Outside the "elegiac" context, whether on love or death, the *distich was specifically the meter of *epigrams, esp. after the 4th c., when literary imitations of verse inscriptions were cultivated by the Alexandrian poets. This fixation of meter to genre lasts the longest. Ennius introduced it into Lat. and later the skill of Martial ensured its passage into the Middle Ages. In Lat., the love elegy emerges as a major genre, characterized in the Augustans (Tibullus, Propertius, Ovid) by a preference, not noticeable in Catullus and his Gr. predecessors, for sense pause at the end of each couplet. A further refinement, esp. evident in Ovid and his successors, was the requirement that the final word in the pentameter be disyllabic. In the opening lines of the Amores, Ovid jokes that, though he intended to write of things epic—hence, in *hexameters—Cupid first stole a foot from his second line, then supplied the poet with suitable subject matter for the resulting combination of hexameter and pentameter by shooting him with one of his arrows.

In the Middle Ages, the elegiac distich was associated with *leonine verse, where it acquired rhyme. In the Ren., it was imitated, along with other Gr. quantitative meters, and such efforts were revived in the 18th and 19th cs. Examples are found in Eng. in works by Edmund Spenser, Philip Sidney, S. T. Coleridge, Arthur Clough, Charles Kingsley, and A. C. Swinburne; in Ger., by F. G. Klopstock, Friedrich Schiller, J. W. Goethe, and Friedrich Hölderlin; and in It., by Gabriele D'Annunzio. Coleridge's trans. of Schiller's elegiac distich is well known: "In the hexameter rises the fountain's silvery column, / In the pentameter aye falling in melody back." Naturalized into the accentually based prosodies of the vernacular meters, it was imitated in isometric couplets, as in Christopher Marlowe's Ovid, whence it exerted influence on the devel. of the *heroic couplet.

■ R. Reitzenstein, "Epigramm," Pauly-Wissowa, 6.1

(1907); K. Strecker, "Leoninische Hexameter und Pentameter in 9. Jahrhundert," Neues Archiv für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 44 (1922); C. M. Bowra, Early Greek Elegists, 2d ed. (1938); P. Friedländer, Epigrammata: Greek Inscriptions in Verse from the Beginnings to the Persian Wars (1948); M. Platnauer, Latin Elegiac Verse (1951); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); T. G. Rosenmeyer, "Elegiac and Elegos," California Studies in Classical Antiquity 1 (1968); D. Ross, Style and Tradition in Catullus (1969); M. L. West, Studies in Greek Elegy and Iambus (1974); A.W.H. Adkins, Poetic Craft in the Early Greek Elegists (1984); R. M. Marina Sáez, La métrica de los epigramas de Marcial (1998).

T.V.F. Brogan; A. T. Cole

ELEGIAC STANZA, elegiac quatrain, heroic quatrain. In Eng., the iambic pentameter quatrain rhymed abab. While it had been frequently employed without elegiac feeling or intention by other poets, e.g., Shakespeare in his sonnets and John Dryden in his Annus Mirabilis, the term elegiac stanza was apparently made popular by its use in Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (1750), though, in fact, the association of the *quatrain with *elegy in Eng. appears at least as early as James Hammond's Love Elegies (1743) and was employed "almost invariably" for elegiac verse for about a century thereafter (Bate)—cf. William Wordsworth's "Elegiac Stanzas Suggested by Peele Castle."

■ W. J. Bate, The Stylistic Development of Keats (1945).

T.V.F. Brogan; S. F. Fogle

ELEGY

I. History
II. Criticism

I. History. In mod. usage, an elegy is a poem of loss or mourning. The term is Gr., its initial significance metrical: elegeia designates a poem in elegiac *couplets. In antiquity, the meter is used for a range of subjects and styles, incl. the kind of combative, promiscuous love presented in the poetry of Propertius, Tibullus, and Ovid. The popularity and prestige of what is still called Roman love elegy make elegy a loose synonym for "love poem" in early mod. usage, though the cl. exemplars are not generally "elegiac" in what becomes the dominant sense of the term. The meter, however, was also popular for *epitaphs, both literal and literary; all the Roman elegists also wrote elegies in the mod. sense, and in antiquity, the metrical term also becomes a synonym for *"lament." Neo-Lat. poets from the 15th-c. on compose new works in elegiac couplets, and attempts are made to transfer the meter to the vernaculars. Among the most successful is J. W. Goethe's, incl. a collection of Römische Elegien (1795), scandalously sensual love poems, defiantly unmournful. Some critics (such as J. C. Scaliger in the 16th c.) try to theorize a common ground between Roman love elegy and lament for the dead (both involve *complaints); the popularity of *Petrarchism in the Ren. strengthens a feeling that absence and frustration are central themes in *love poetry; and along these lines, "dire-lamenting elegies" (Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona) can be recommended to a would-be seducer. This composite understanding of the genre, however, is never fully worked out and gradually fades.

The most important cl. models for the later devel. of elegy are *pastoral: the lament for Daphnis (who died of love) by Theocritus, the elegy for Adonis attributed to Bion, the elegy on Bion attributed to Moschus, and another lament for Daphnis in the fifth *eclogue of Virgil. All are stylized and mythic, with hints of ritual; the first three are punctuated by incantatory *refrains. The elegies on Daphnis are staged performances within an otherwise casual setting. Nonhuman elements of the pastoral world are enlisted in the mourning: nymphs, satyrs, the landscape itself. In Virgil, the song of grief is paired with one celebrating the dead man's apotheosis; the poem is usually read as an *allegory on the death and deification of Julius Caesar. Virgil's poem becomes particularly influential and adaptable. In the 9th c., Paschasius Radbertus composes an imitation in which the nuns Galathea and Phyllis sing of a deceased shepherd monk as a figure for Christ. At the prompting of humanism, Ren. poets experiment with the pastoral elegy and use it for a range of personal, political, and symbolic reference. Few collections of pastorals in the Ren. are without at least one elegy, and there are important stand-alone examples, such as Clément Marot's "Eglogue" on the death of Louise of Savoy (1531). John Milton composes two full-fledged pastoral elegies: Epitaphium Damonis in Lat., on a close friend (1639), and "Lycidas" in Eng., on a schoolmate (1637). The latter is widely regarded as Milton's first major poetic achievement and the most successful vernacular instance of the genre. It was, nevertheless, sharply criticized in the next century by Samuel Johnson for its artificiality; he speaks for a growing disenchantment with the genre. Major poets, however, can return to it in full dress: P. B. Shelley in "Adonais" (1821) on the shockingly early death of John Keats, W. B. Yeats in "Shepherd and Goatherd" (1918) on an unnamed shepherd who "died in the great war beyond the sea." The presence of the genre can also be felt in less-adorned poems, in the general sense that the countryside is the right place for elegiac feeling (Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," 1750) or in the arch affirmation of natural sympathy with which W. H. Auden opens his elegy on Yeats (1939).

Pastoral, however, is only a specialized trad. within the wider field of poetic treatments of death and loss. Such poems (which may or may not call themselves elegies) show an immense diversity, within which filiations can be complex. Some important examples are really sui generis; among the few unforgettable Eng. poems of the first decade of the 16th c. is John Skelton's Philip Sparrow, 1,400 unpredictable lines on the death of a young girl's pet bird. The object in question is usually another person, often specifically identified: an important public figure or someone with a close personal connection to the poet, such as a spouse, lover, parent, child, or friend. Elegies on other poets are particularly common; elegies for oneself are at least as old as Ovid's exile poems. Elegies for groups or classes of people (esp.

those killed in war) date back to the Greeks but become a particular feature of the 20th c. (such as Anna Akhmatova's Requiem (1935, pub. 1963) on the "nameless friends" lost in the Stalinist terror of 1935–40). Poems can present themselves as epitaphs or as containing epitaphs, sometimes addressing a visitor to the cemetery (siste viator). Even in times that value poetic artifice at its most elaborate, poems of personal grief—such as Henry King's "Exequy" on the dead wife he calls "his matchless never to be forgotten friend" (1634)—can be strikingly direct in their effect. In 20th-c. writing, the appetite for directness becomes conspicuous, at times brutal ("he's dead / the old bastard"; W. C. Williams, "Death" [1930]). It is, however, an equally famous resource of elegies to proceed by complicated indirection. In Chaucer's The Book of the Duchess (ca. 1368), occasioned by the death of his patron's wife, the dreaming narrator cannot acknowledge that occasion until the last of the poem's 1,300 lines, long after the reader has divined it. The mourning in Keats's ode "To Autumn" (1819) is almost entirely subliminal and inexplicit, but strong enough to make three stanzas of seasonal description one of the touchstone lyrics in the lang.

Some important elegies are expansive in their reach. In Walt Whitman's "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" (1860), a child (as in Philip Sparrow reacting to the death of a bird) hears from the sea a message of "Death, death, death, death, death" that is also the start of a visionary poetic calling. Paul Valéry's "Le Cimitière marin" (1922) sets an individual attempt at spiritual and intellectual transcendence amid the felt presence of the dead in a seaside graveyard at noon (its text is appropriated by Krzysztof Penderecki for "Dies irae" [1967], an oratorio on Auschwitz). Perhaps the most distinguished 20th-c. poems to call themselves elegies are R. M. Rilke's Duineser Elegien (written 1912–22), which move between a sense of insufficiency and loss basic to human consciousness—"And so we live, and are always taking leave"—and a higher order of awareness among beings whom the poet calls "Angels."

II. Criticism. Critical thought about elegy has been an attempt to come to grips with this diversity, sometimes inadvertently amplifying it. Despite, e.g., current acknowledgment that they have little claim to the term, a number of poignant OE poems have for 200 years been called elegies in a move so closely associated with a sense of their value that the designation is unlikely to change. The prestige and longevity of the genre have increased its variety, and it has often splintered and become unrecognizable to itself; an important "school of elegy," for instance, in early 19th-c. Rus. poetry produced poems that share emotional intimacy and style but little topical focus. A mountain setting is required by the trad. of cl. Ger. elegy identified in Ziolkowski's study of Friedrich Schiller's originary "Der Spaziergang" (1795). Yet wherever we draw the boundaries of kind, some version of elegy is pervasively written about in every lang.

Critics writing in Eng. seem to agree that the topics of loss and death and the speech act of lament characterize the genre; that its mode is primarily *lyric, with certain characteristic generic markers (*apostrophe, exclamation, *pathetic fallacy, epideixis, pastoral topoi, *allusion, *epitaph); and that its indigenous moods are sorrow, shock, rage, longing, melancholy, and resolution—often in quick succession. Most literary historians have understood elegy as closely linked to the hist., theory, and decorum of cultural practices of mourning. Pigman's Grief and Renaissance Elegy and Sacks's The English Elegy are two particularly influential studies, both pub. in 1985, that continue to set questions and topics for later scholars. While studies vary in the extent of their embrace of psychoanalysis or cultural hist., they concur in describing the elegy as, in Pigman's phrase, "a process of mourning." Pigman identifies a shift in Reformation views and practices of mourning with consequences for elegy; Sacks sees the conventions of the genre from Edmund Spenser to Yeats as answerable to psychological needs. Later critics weigh in with some mix of social hist., psychology, and aesthetic analysis. Ramazani registers a protest by mod. elegy against normative cultural models of mourning; Zeiger, Kennedy, and others explore the importance of elegy as a resource for traumatic collective grief over breast cancer, AIDS, and the events of September 11, 2001; Spargo explores the psychological dimension of the form with philosophical attention.

Other puzzles invite attention. Why, if elegy is "a process of mourning," are so many elegies lyrics with little narrative or processional content? Standard definitions of elegy can strain against the temporality of lyric. Elegy's recourse to emotion seems incompletely explained by psychological or social models of grief or even by a notion of the poem as expressive. The emotions represented by the poem and the emotional experience that the poem offers to the reader are distinct; their trajectories need not coincide. They can, of course—as when, in a practice shared by other contemp. readers, Queen Victoria and George Eliot annotated the text of Alfred, Lord Tennyson's In Memoriam (1850) so that it referred to their own lost loves. Such evidence suggests that elegy is a kind of manual or liturgy for personal use; this function of the genre encouraged criteria such as *sincerity or Johnson's "passion" to dominate critical evaluation of it. Yet such criteria seem ill suited to the power of poems such as "Lycidas," Spenser's "Daphnaida," Whitman's "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," and Auden's "In Memory of Sigmund Freud," which lament the deaths of persons who were not, in the standard sense of the term, "mourned" by the authors. Neither do current theories about the genre's purposes, collective or private, account for the numerous elegies of animals, objects, and so forth or for the peculiar ludic uses of the form by poets like Skelton, Emily Dickinson, Robert Burns, and the anonymous author of "Groanes from Newgate, or, An elegy upon Edvvard Dun, Esq. the cities common hangman, who dyed naturally in his bed the 11th of September, 1663."

The publication of elegy awaits further study. Chaucer's ms. Book of the Duchess is thought to have been produced for and performed at anniversary memorial events continuing long after the death of the duchess. With the advent of print, volumes of elegy were collected and printed to honor particular deaths (such as the famous volumes for Philip Sidney and the one containing "Lycidas"). Print also facilitated the voluminous appearance of elegy in broadside, and in the 17th c., the form developed what now seems like an incongruous affinity for *acrostics and *anagrams. Cavitch (2002) describes the publication of elegy in early New England with a traveler's report that there was not "one Country House in fifty which has not its Walls garnished with half a Score of these Sort of Poems." The changing forms of publication suggest a different hist. of elegy from what crit. might lead us to expect and also disabuse us of the sense that that hist. has reached any kind of conclusion.

See BLUES, CORONACH, DIRGE, ELEGIAC DISTICH, ELEGIAC STANZA, ENDECHA, EPICEDIUM, GRAVEYARD POETRY, MONODY.

■ E. Z. Lambert, Placing Sorrow: A Study of the Pastoral Elegy Convention from Theocritus to Milton (1976); T. Ziolkowski, The Classical German Elegy 1795–1950 (1980); G. W. Pigman III, Grief and English Renaissance Elegy (1985); P. Sacks, The English Elegy (1985); C. M. Schenck, Mourning and Panegyric (1988); D. Kay, Melodious Tears: The English Funeral Elegy from Spenser to Milton (1990); J. Ramazani, Poetry of Mourning: The Modern Elegy from Hardy to Heaney (1994); E. Schor, Bearing the Dead: The British Culture of Mourning from the Enlightenment to Victoria (1994); W. D. Shaw, Elegy and Paradox (1994); M. F. Zeiger, Beyond Consolation: Death, Sexuality, and the Changing Shapes of Elegy (1997); M. Homans, Royal Representations: Queen Victoria and British Culture 1837–1876 (1998); J. Hammond, The American Puritan Elegy (2000); M. Cavitch, "Interiority and Artifact: Death and Self-Inscription in Thomas Smith's Self-Portrait," Early American Literature 37 (2002); R. C. Spargo, The Ethics of Mourning (2004); M. Cavitch, American Elegy (2007); D. Kennedy, Elegy (2007); The Oxford Handbook of the Elegy, ed. K. A. Weisman (2010).

G. BRADEN; E. FOWLER

ELISION (Lat., "striking out"; Gr., synaloepha). In prosody, the general term for several devices of contraction whereby two syllables are reduced to one. The Gr. term synaloepha nowadays tends to be restricted to only one form; other terms formerly used for elision in cl. prosody include crasis and synizesis. The forms of elision are: (1) aphaeresis*: dropping of a word-initial syllable (vowel); (2) syncope*: dropping of a word-internal syllable; (3) apocope*: dropping of a word-final syllable (vowel); (4) synaeresis*: coalescing of two vowels within a word; and (5) synaloepha: coalescing of two vowels across a word boundary, i.e., ending one word and beginning the next. (The corresponding terms for addition of a syllable to the beginning, middle, or end of a word are prosthesis, epenthesis*, and proparalepsis, respectively.)

Collectively, these are sometimes called, on the analogy of rhet., the "metric figures" (Elwert); Johann Susenbrotus, e.g., gives a taxonomy, calling the types of elision metaplasms, i.e., the class of figures for adding or subtracting a letter or syllable. Elision of whole words or phrases is ellipsis*. Probably at least some of the older terminology is confused, and certainly many prosodists over the centuries have failed to grasp that the reductive processes at work here are normal linguistic ones, not "poetical" devices peculiar to metrical verse. The shortening of words and smoothing out of the alternation of vowels and consonants are both common processes in speech. The opposite of elision is hiatus*.

In Gr., elision, variable in prose but more regular in poetry, is indicated by an apostrophe (') to mark the disappearance of the elided vowel (generally short alpha, epsilon, and omikron as well as the diphthong ai occasionally in Homer and in comedy); but when elision occurs in Gr. compound words, the apostrophe is not used. In Lat., a final vowel or a vowel followed by final m was not omitted from the written lang.; but as a rule, it was ignored metrically when the next word in the same measure began with a vowel, diphthong, or the aspirate h. In the mod. vernaculars, the apostrophe was retained to indicate graphically certain types of elision, but outside these, there is a larger case of words that have syllabically alternate forms in ordinary speech, e.g., heaven, which some speakers pronounce as a disyllable, some as a monosyllable. This syllabic variance is, of course, useful to poets who write in syllable-counting meters; thus, Sipe shows that in the overwhelming number of cases, Shakespeare chooses the one or other form of such words, which she terms "doublets," so as to conform to the meter.

There is some presumption that the number of syllables in the word that fits the *scansion of the line will be the number uttered in *performance (reading aloud) of the line. Robert Bridges, however, who has one of the seminal mod. discussions, uses the term elision in a special sense, to denote syllables that should be elided for purposes of scansion but not in pronunciation, a theory that divides scansion from performance. Ramsey has termed this "semi-elision," in his crit. of Bridges's position. The problem of poets' alteration of the syllabic structure of their lang. for metrical purposes is far more complex than is usually assumed; indeed, the very problem of determining what was ordinary speech practice at various times in the past itself is very difficult. Most of the hist. of Eng. metrical theory from ca. 1650 to 1925 could be framed in terms of dispute about elision, i.e., syllabic regularity.

■ T. S. Omond and W. Thomas, "Milton and Syllabism," MLR 4–5 (1909–10); Bridges; Omond; W. J. Bate, The Stylistic Development of Keats (1945); P. Fussell Jr., "The Theory of Poetic Contractions," Theory of Prosody in 18th-Century England (1954); A. C. Partridge, Orthography in Shakespeare and Elizabethan Drama (1964); Chatman; R. O. Evans, Milton's Elisions (1966); J. Soubiran, L'elision dans la poésie latine (1966); D. L. Sipe, Shakespeare's Metrics (1968); Allen;

P. Ramsey, The Fickle Glass (1979), appendix; West; Elwert, Italienische.

T.V.F. Brogan

ELLIPSIS (or eclipsis; Gr., "leaving out," "defect"; Lat. detractio). The most common term for the class of figures of syntactic omission (deletion). (Omission or deletion of syllables for metrical purposes is treated as *elision). Ellipsis as a genus includes several species: ellipsis of conjunctions between words is brachylogia, between clauses, *asyndeton; ellipsis of a verb (in a different sense) is *zeugma; ellipsis of a clause, particularly the main clause (B) after a subordinate (Y) in a construction such as "If X, then A; if Y then B"—e.g. "If you will do it, all will be well; if not, . . ."—is anapodoton. These differ from figures such as *aposiopesis, the dropping of the end of a sentence, leaving it incomplete, in that, in ellipsis, the thought is complete; it is only that a word or words ordinarily called for in the full construction but not strictly necessary are omitted (since obvious). This obviousness that makes the omission possible is, therefore, much facilitated by the use of *parallelism of syntactic members in the construction, which explains the importance of such parallelism for achieving that effect of compression, the hallmark of the closed *heroic couplet. So Alexander Pope has "Where wigs [strive] with wigs, // [where] with sword-knots sword-knots strive" (The Rape of the Lock 1.101).

Gr. rhetoricians permitted omission of substantives, pronouns, objects, finite verbs, main clauses, and (more rarely) clauses; poets since the Ren. have allowed omission of almost any member so long as the meaning remains clear (Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 9.3.58). Shakespeare has "And he to England shall along with you" (Hamlet 3.3.4) and "when he's old, cashiered" (Othello 1.1.48). Mod. poets (e.g., Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, W. H. Auden, W. C. Williams) have found ellipsis esp. useful for conveying the speed and clipped form of colloquial speech and for expressing emotion.

See syntax, poetic.

■ E. A. Abbott, A Shakespearean Grammar (1886), 279–94—extensive lists of examples; Group μ, 69 ff.; Corbett—prose examples; E. Rozik, "Ellipsis and the Surface Structures of Verbal and Nonverbal Metaphor," Semiotica 119 (1998); J. Merchant, "Fragments and Ellipsis," Linguistics and Philosophy 27 (2004); The Syntax of Nonsententials, ed. L. Progovac et al. (2006).

T.V.F. Brogan

EL SALVADOR, POETRY OF. According to the Sp. scholar Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo, no country as small as El Salvador should be able to lay claim to so many fine poets. The hist. of Salvadoran poetry is characterized by two salient features: individuals who shine like beacons among their contemporaries and the tragic nexus between lit. and politics.

The Salvadoran poetic trad. dates to before 1524, when Pedro de Alvarado conquered the pre-Columbian kingdom of Cuscatlán. Its principal inhabitants, the Pipiles, spoke Nahuatl, an Aztec lang. Although no record remains of Nahuatl lit., echoes of its sung poetry have survived in oral trads. Oswaldo Escobar Velado (1919–61) and Salarrué (pseud. of Salvador Salazar Arrué, 1899–1979) employed features of Nahuatl poetry, incl. formulaic repetitions, *parallelisms, a fondness for diminutives, a profusion of *metaphors, and creation myths.

Some poetry of note was produced during the colonial era, mainly by Sp. administrators or clerics. The colonial poet Juan de Mestanza (b. 1534) lord mayor of Sonsonate between 1585 and 1589, was praised by Miguel de Cervantes for his witty *sonnets. A national lit. arose during the Salvadoran struggle for independence (1811–59). The first national poet, Miguel Alvarez Castro (1795–1856), wrote neoclassical patriotic verses, such as "A la muerte del Coronel Pierzon" (Upon the Death of Colonel Pierzon, 1827).

*Romanticism prevailed from mid-century to the first decade of the 20th. Significant poets in this mode were Juan J. Cañas (1826–1918), who composed the national anthem, and Antonia Galindo (1858–93), the first major woman poet. Two talented romantics whose careers were cut short by suicide were José Calixto Mixco (1880–1901) and Armando Rodríguez Portillo (1880–1915). The multifaceted work of Vicente Acosta (1867–1908) reflects a shift from romanticism to the novel aesthetic of modernismo.

The high priest of Salvadoran modernismo was Francisco Gavidia (1864–1955), a pioneer in the application of Fr. forms to Sp. poetry. In such poems as "Stella," "La ofrenda del bramán" (The Brahman's Offering), "Sóteer o tierra de preseas" (The Savior or Land of Precious Things), and "La defensa de Pan" (In Defense of Pan), Gavidia addressed national themes in many forms, incl. romances* (ballads) and redondillas (Sp. quatrains). The next poetic movement in El Salvador was costumbrismo (lit. of customs and manners), represented by Alfredo Espino (1900–28). Espino's posthumous collection, Jícaras tristes (Gourds of Sadness, 1930), celebrated El Salvador's natural wonders and indigenous heritage.

La Matanza (the Great Slaughter) in 1932 of more than 30,000 peasants ushered in six decades of turmoil until the brutal civil war between 1980 and 1992. During this time, writing became a medium for evading or confronting political horror. Claudia Lars (pseud. of Carmen Brannon, 1899–1974) became known as "the divine Claudia" for her mastery of cl. meters to treat spiritual, mystical, and erotic themes. Meanwhile, some poets strove to preserve truth and beauty from the contamination of politics, among them Vicente Rosales y Rosales (1894–1980), Serafín Quiteño (1899–1952), and Hugo Lindo (1917–85). Raúl Contreras (1896–1973) wrote a series of haunting sonnets under the pseud. Lydia Nogales.

During these decades, a constellation of women poets cultivated cl. forms (particularly the sonnet) and a lyrical idiom to explore a gamut of themes. Noteworthy names include Alice Lardé (1896–1983), María Loucel (1899–1957), Lilian Serpas (1905–85), Berta Funes Peraza (1911–98), Matilde Elena López (1922–2010), and Mercedes Durand (1933–99). Hypnotic images and *surrealism were the hallmarks of Emma Posada (1912–97). Lydia Valiente's (1900–76) book Raíces amargas (Bitter Roots, 1952) employed choral verse in a proletarian voice to denounce injustice.

Defiance and rebellion motivated successive poetic generations, the first of which included Pedro Geoffroy Rivas (1908–79) and Antonio Gamero (1917–74). Escobar Velado's 10 sonetos para mil y más obreros (10 Sonnets for a Thousand Workers and More, 1950) inspired the Committed Generation, represented by Italo López Vallecillos (1932–86), Tirso Canales (b. 1930), and Manlio Argueta (b. 1935), who in turn influenced "the poetry of combat and resistance" by José María Cuéllar (1942–80) and Miguel Huezo Mixco (b. 1954). Marxist fervor infuses the work of guerrilla-poet Roque Dalton (1935–75), a master of *collage who blended verse with songs, letters, reportage, and historical chronicles. Claribel Alegría (b. 1924), a Salvadoran-Nicaraguan, combined revolutionary commitment with aesthetic refinement in such collections as Sobrevivo (I Survive, 1978) and La mujer del río Sumpul (The Woman of the Sumpul River, 1987). Alegría also excels at poetry of sensuous lyricism, incl. love poems for her deceased husband and translator Bud Flakoll (Thresholds/Umbrales, 1996).

Among the poets straddling the civil war are Roberto Armijo (1937–97), Roberto Cea (b. 1939), and Alfonso Kijadurías (b. 1940). Undoubtedly, the most talented nonpartisan poet is David Escobar Galindo (b. 1943). From his first collection, Las manos en el fuego (Hands in the Fire, 1967), to his most recent, El poema de David (David's Poem, 2007), he displays mastery of versification.

Since the civil war, Salvadoran poets at home and among the diaspora in North America, Australia, and Europe, incl. Ricardo Lindo (b. 1947), Javier Alas (b. 1964), Álvaro Darío Lara (b. 1966), and Luis Alvarenga (b. 1969), have eschewed partisan ideologies to probe the paradoxes of identity and existence. Liberated women poets, incl. Claudia Herodier (b. 1950), Silvia Elena Regalado (b. 1961), Brenda Gallegos (b. 1972), and Claudia Meyer (b. 1980), explore sex and desire in a range of registers, from the controlled passion of Carmen González Huguet (b. 1958) to the graphic eroticism of Dina Posada (b. 1946) in "Plegaria al orgasmo" (Prayer to Orgasm, 1996). In conclusion, as anthologies by Poumier (2002) and Amaya (2010) attest, poets of different generations, genders, and styles continue to build upon El Salvador's vibrant literary trad.

See COLONIAL POETICS; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ La margarita emocionante, ed. H. Castellanos Moya (1979); L. Gallegos Valdés, Panorama de la literatura salvadoreña (1981); Poesía de El Salvador, ed. M. Argueta (1983); Indice antológico de la poesía salvadoreña, ed. D. Escobar Galindo (1988); Piedras en el huracán, ed. J. Alas (1993); Alba de otro milenio, ed. R. Lindo (2000); R. C. Boland, "A Short History of the Literature of El Salvador," Antípodas 18.19 (2002); Poésie Salvadorienne du XX Siècle, ed. M. Poumier (2002); Una madrugada del siglo XXI, ed. V. Amaya (2010).

R. C. BOLAND

EMBLEM. The printed emblem typically consists of three parts: motto (inscriptio), image (pictura), and *epigram (subscriptio). Applied emblems frequently consist of only a motto and an image. So-called nude emblems are not illustrated but contain descriptions of the image. The emblem presents an argument composed of words and pictures. It is too simplistic to say that the pictura illustrates the texts or that the epigram explains the meaning of the motto and the image. Emblems are more than the sum of their parts, and this innovative practice of reading combinations of words and images reorients readers' thinking and understanding. The genre began with the publication of Emblematum Liber (1531) by the It. jurist Andrea Alciato (Alciati, Alciatus); many of the early emblematists were lawyers (Hayaert). In the following centuries, the emblem often expanded from a single page or opening of the book to lengthy, often multilingual text-image constructions consisting of several mottos and numerous paratexts that could include poetry, prose commentaries, marginalia, sermons, references to the liturgical year, and other literary and devotional materials.

During the 16th and 17th cs., emblems emerged as a culturally significant innovation whose presentation of texts and images often introduced new meaning into traditional modes of expression. Authors and artists worked with printers and publishers to produce emblem books on topics ranging from natural hist. and politics to love and religion. Emblems were integral to the print and material culture of Ren. and baroque Europe. Emblem production was not limited to the printed page, and applied emblems were painted, carved, and etched both onto decorative objects, such as tankards and furniture, and in architectural spaces, incl. churches, town halls, manor houses, and hospitals (Bath 1994, 2003; McKeown). Emblems were enacted in the theater (Schöne 1993) and embellished court pageants and funerals (Bøggild-Johannsen, Choné, Young 1988, Wade 1996). Emblematics formed a pan-Eur. genre in Lat. and thousands of books were produced in all vernacular langs. (Daly 2008, Russell 1999). At a time when national langs. were developing their discrete lits. in the wake of humanism, emblems became one of the primary vehicles of cultural knowledge, expressing highly complex ideas in compact and compelling forms.

Emblems emerged from several trads., the most important of which is the impresa. Ren. iconologies (such as the foundational Iconologia of Cesare Ripa) provided encyclopedias of pictorial and allegorical meanings, while collections of proverbs and adages (such as Erasmus's Adagia and the Greek Anthology*), together with heraldry and hieroglyphics (a famous treatise on the latter by Horapollo was published by Aldus Manutius in 1505), contributed to the making of the emblem. The

Fr. trad. of portraying the emblem as a cohesive graphic unit, often within an elaborate decorative frame, was esp. important to the early devel. of the printed genre.

Several early mod. print genres might be considered emblematic, while not portraying emblems in the strict sense. Such highly allegorical arts require what might be termed an emblematic cast of mind, i.e., the mental agility to follow and (re-)create analogues, to make intellectual parallels, and to parse words and texts according to new visual contexts. These genres can include broadsheets, illustrated fables (such as eds. of Ovid and Aesop), paupers' bibles, dances of death, and other dual-media literary phenomena. Printer's marks and title pages from this period are often emblematic as well (Wolkenhauer). All these examples require new readings of words and pictures that created the practice of thinking and reading emblematically.

The emblem revival of the 19th c. gave impetus to mod. emblem studies and the appearance of new, innovative emblem books. Emblem books continue to be printed in mod. times, as evidenced by Lucie-Smith's Borrowed Emblems, Finlay's Heroic Emblems, Davidson and Buchanan's The Eloquence of Shadows, and the leaf book on Alciato by Bregman.

Important bibls. of emblem books have been published for national trads.: Sp. (Campa) and Fr. (Adams, Rawles, and Saunders); for religious trads. (Daly and Dimler); and for important individual collections (McGeary and Nash; Heckscher and Sherman; Visser and Westerweel). The scholarly journal Emblematica and the series Glasgow Emblem Studies are devoted entirely to the genre.

See BAROQUE, HIEROGLYPH, RENAISSANCE POETICS, VISUAL POETRY.

■ J. Landwehr, Dutch Emblem Books (1962); M. Praz, Studies in Seventeenth-Century Imagery, 2d ed. (1964); E. Lucie-Smith, Borrowed Emblems (1967); J. Landwehr, German Emblem Books 1531–1888 (1972); and French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese Books of Devices and Emblems 1534–1827 (1976); I. H. Finlay, Heroic Emblems (1977); A. Young, Henry Peacham (1979); P. Daly, Literature in the Light of the Emblem (1979); and Emblem Theory (1979); D. S. Russell, The Emblem and Device in France (1985); P. Daly, The English Emblem and the Continental Tradition (1988); The English Emblem Tradition, ed. P. Daly et al., v. 1 (1988); J. Landwehr, Emblem and Fable Books Printed in the Low Countries (1988); A. Young, The English Tournament Impresa (1988); Andrea Alciato and the Emblem Tradition (1989), ed. P. Daly; P. Campa, Emblemata Hispanica: An Annotated Bibliography of Spanish Emblem Literature to the Year 1700 (1990); P. Choné, Emblèmes et pensée symbolique en Lorraine, 1525–1633 (1991); A. Schöne, Emblematik und Drama im Zeitalter des Barock, 3d ed. (1993); M. Bath, Speaking Pictures: English Emblem Books and Renaissance Culture (1994); P. Davidson and H. Buchanan, The Eloquence of Shadows: A Book of Emblems (1994); Emblemata: Handbuch zur Sinnbildkunst des XVI. und XVII. Jahrhunderts, ed. A. Henkel and A. Schöne, 3d ed. (1996); M. R. Wade, Triumphus Nuptialis Danicus: German Court Culture and Denmark (1996); P. Daly and R. Dimler, The Jesuit Series (1997–); A Bibliography of French Emblem Books of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, ed. A. Adams, S. Rawles, A. Saunders, 2 v. (1999, 2002); P. Daly, "Emblem," Encyclopedia of the Renaissance, ed. P. F. Grendler (1999); D. Russell, "The Genres of Epigram and Emblem," CHLC, v. 3, ed. G. P. Norton (1999); J. Manning, The Emblem (2002); M. Bath, Renaissance Decorative Painting in Scotland (2003); Digital Collections and the Management of Knowledge: Renaissance Emblem Literature as a Case Study for the Digitization of Rare Texts and Images, ed. M. R. Wade (2004); C.-P. Warncke, Symbol, Emblem, Allegorie (2005); B. Bøggild-Johannsen, "Ritual and Representational Aspects of the Royal Funeral Ceremonial in Early Modern Denmark," Tod und Trauer, ed. T. Fischer and T. Riis (2006); S. McKeown, Emblematic Paintings from Sweden's Age of Greatness: Nils Bielke and the Neo-Stoic Gallery at Skokloster (2006); A. Bregman, Emblemata: The Emblem Books of Andrea Alciato (2007); Companion to Emblem Studies, ed. P. Daly (2008); V. Hayaert, Mens Emblematica et Humanisme Juridique: Le Cas du Pegma cum Narrationibus Philosophicis de Pierre Coustau, 1555 (2008); P. Boot, Mesotext Digitised Emblems, Modelled Annotations and Humanities Scholarship (2009).

M. R. WADE

EMOTION

I. Reader's Emotion
II. Poet's Emotion
III. Recent Developments

A poem involves two people, writer and reader; and a discussion of the place of emotion in poetics from cl. antiquity to the 21st c. can be divided accordingly. The division is chronological as well as logical: until the end of the 18th c., emphasis fell on the reader's emotion; after *romanticism, it tended to shift to the poet's, and then in the 20th c., emotion itself became an esp. problematic topic. Recent scholarship on the emotions, which this article will review by way of conclusion, has considered both standpoints.

I. Reader's Emotion. A good poem moves the reader: this has been a critical truism (perhaps even the critical truism) since lit. crit. as we know it began, though the reading of a poem as an emotional experience has moved from the center of attention, replaced by reading as an interpretive activity. The emotion may be aroused for purely aesthetic purposes—for "delight"—or else as an indirect means of inciting to virtue (see DIDACTIC POETRY). This latter is the Horatian view that poetry is both dulce et utile—that it "teaches delightfully"—and it is by far the more common in the Ren.: it can be illustrated from almost any early mod. poet who discusses his or her craft:

> O what an honor is it, to restraine
> The lust of lawlesse youth with good advice . . .

> Soone as thou gynst to sette thy notes in frame,
> O, how the rurall routes to thee doe cleave:
> Seemeth thou dost their soule of sence bereave . . .
>
> (Edmund Spenser, The Shepheardes Calender, "October" 21–22, 25–27)

Is the emotional effect normative—i.e., can we say that a good poem arouses strong emotions and a bad poem does not? Aristotle probably thought not: he admits in the Poetics that terror and pity can be aroused by the spectacle (a lesser element of poetics), though it is preferable to raise them by the words; and he does not indicate that the less preferable method arouses a weaker or even a different emotion. The usual answer, however, has been "yes." When Philip Sidney confesses in the Defence of Poesy, "I never heard the olde song of Percy and Duglas, that I found not my heart mooved more then with a Trumpet," he clearly assumes that this is a testimony to the poem's excellence. This normative view was carried much further in the 18th c., when it was claimed explicitly and at length (notably by Denis Diderot) that the good poet must be judged by his power to arouse our emotions. This tenet of neoclassical doctrine passed unchanged and naturally into romantic poetics.

One common objection to using one's emotional reaction as a touchstone is that it is completely subjective: a poem has many readers, and they cannot compare their private emotions. One theoretical reply to this is contained in the doctrine of intersubjectivity (as formulated, e.g., by Morris): the use of lang. as a means for comparing purely private experiences. Nonetheless, the objection is useful if taken as a warning to the practical critic to talk about the matter of the poem rather than the emotion it arouses; for the latter will result either in vagueness, as in most impressionistic or rhapsodic crit., or in such physiological descriptions as A. E. Housman's account of his skin bristling, or Emily Dickinson's "If I feel physically as if the top of my head were taken off, I know that is poetry."

A poem, then, arouses in the reader an emotional response that can be intersubjective. What is this emotion like? The first question here is whether there is such a thing as a purely aesthetic emotion. The experience of reading, say, a satire of Alexander Pope is not the same as being angry, but critics are divided on whether the difference can profitably be described by postulating a specifically poetic or aesthetic emotion, which is distinct from anger and all the other "life" emotions, such as fear and love.

For the Horatian, the emotion induced by reading good poetry was usually called, quite simply, pleasure; but it was clearly thought of as a special kind of pleasure, and there was some discussion in the 18th c. of its exact nature (e.g., by David Hume in his essays on tragedy and "the standard of taste" and by Immanuel Kant in the Critique of Judgment). Early 20th-c. critics who believed in a special aesthetic emotion include Clive Bell ("The starting point for all systems of aesthetics must be the personal experience of a particular emotion. . . . All sensitive people agree that there is a peculiar emotion provoked by works of art") and T. E. Hulme ("You could define art as a passionate desire for accuracy, and the essentially aesthetic emotion as the excitement which is generated by direct communication"). One can also mention Sigmund Freud, who believed that there was a "purely formal, that is, aesthetic pleasure" offered by poetry, and who also (not surprisingly) believed that it was unimportant: an "increment," a "bribe," to release a greater pleasure arising from deeper sources in the mind. Freud held exactly the opposite view to Hume (and William Wordsworth) on this point: for him, the aesthetic pleasure, or fore-pleasure, is a trigger that releases a discharge of emotion that provides the true enjoyment of lit. On the other hand, for Hume the aesthetic pleasure "softens," while for Wordsworth it "tempers" the passions.

Up to the 18th c., the two main views of the reader's emotion were the Horatian (that it was a pleasure) and the Aristotelian (that it was a *catharsis). There is a potential contradiction between these two in that the latter view would tend, implicitly, to deny the aesthetic emotion: it is real pity and real terror that are to be felt. In mod. times, the aesthetic emotion is denied by those who repudiate an ivory-tower or esoteric view of lit.: by Marxists; by Richards (who says curtly that "psychology has no place for such an entity" in Principles of Literary Criticism); and, in effect, by Dewey, who, though he uses the term "aesthetic emotion," complains that those who believe in "an emotion that is aboriginally aesthetic . . . relegate fine art to a realm separated by a gulf from everyday experiences."

In speaking of the reader's emotions, one must mention those critics who deny that emotion has any place at all in reading. This denial can reflect mainly theoretical motives, as in the case of Vivas, who wishes to substitute *"attention" as the key concept; or as part of a specific literary program, as in the case of T. S. Eliot. Not always consistent, Eliot suggested that the emotions provoked by a work of art "are, when valid, perhaps not to be called emotions at all." This can be linked with his doctrine of impersonality (he tends to think of an emotion as something personal, even self-regarding); sometimes he prefers the term feeling. The "calm" or "cold" that these writers find in the poetic response might by others be considered a kind of emotion, but there is a real cleavage here. What no one (presumably) denies is that, even if the poem kills the emotion, it must deal with a situation that would have aroused emotion in the first place.

Richards maintained that a response to poetry is highly complex, and reading a poem a matter of emotional accommodation and adjustment. He prefers, however, to speak of the attitudes ("imaginal and incipient activities or tendencies to action") that poetry organizes in the reader "for freedom and fullness of life." This organization is the function of emotive lang., sharply distinguished by Richards from referential lang., which makes statements (see PSEUDO-STATEMENT).

Empson, whose view of lang. was influenced by Richards's, goes even further in The Structure of Complex Words in not wishing to discuss the emotions aroused by words: "Normally they are dependent on a Sense which is believed to deserve them"; the way to discuss the emotional impact of a poem is to analyze the structure of sense and implication in its key words.

Other 20th-c. formalist critics, such as the New Critic Wimsatt and the philosopher Beardsley (see AFFECTIVE FALLACY), argued that lit. crit. should focus on "the poem itself" rather than its effects, incl. emotional effects, on the reader. By and large, structuralist and poststructuralist critics also minimized the importance of emotion to either the creation or the interpretation of poetry. Deconstructing a text, as described by Derrida and his followers, is primarily a matter of intellect rather than feeling; similarly, for Barthes, interpretations are constructed through manipulating various "codes" of reading, although Barthes does acknowledge the quasi-sexual pleasure of engaging with a "writerly" text in new and playful ways. Much *cultural criticism, incl. feminist crit., has marginalized emotion because it emphasizes the political rather than the individual, but since 2000 that distinction has been challenged by several critics (see esp. Ngai). There has been some attention to feminist emotional responses in reader-response crit., but most of the attention (e.g., Fetterley) has been focused on prose fiction.

II. Poet's Emotion. Most of the remaining problems are best discussed under this heading. The first point to note is that consideration of the emotion of the poet must be a descriptive and not a normative inquiry. A poem in itself can never offer conclusive evidence that the poet did not feel a certain emotion, nor (except on certain rather naïve theories) that he or she did; this external, biographical fact can only be established separately and has no critical relevance. Ruskin tried to classify certain forms of poetry as worse than others according to whether the poet was insincere or—worse still—deliberately, in hardness of heart, weaving intricate metaphors "with chill and studied fancy" (see SINCERITY). Here we have left lit. crit. for moralizing. As a reaction against this sort of thing, some aestheticians (notably Beardsley and Osborne) have tried to make logical mincemeat of the very concept of artistic expression. It is much easier for them to do this when they are considering it as a normative concept than when treating it as part of literary psychology.

As part of such a descriptive inquiry, there is a great deal to say about the poet's emotion. First, does a poet need to feel any? The view that he does not—that Shakespeare's sonnets, say, are literary exercises—repels most readers; however, it is a view that seems to be supported by the pronouncements of some poets, very conscious of the impersonality and labor involved in composition. The Horatian-Ren. critical trad., with its manuals of instruction and its advice on *decorum, has little to say on the poet's feelings but a great deal to say on craft. Even the famous line in the Ars poetica, "si vis me flere, dolendum est primum ipsi tibi" (if you wish to make me weep, you must first feel grief yourself), is addressed to characters in a play and refers simply to the need for good writing or good acting. It might be thought that the Platonic doctrine of *inspiration runs counter to this trad., but as expressed by Plato (and, generally, by everyone else) this has nothing to do with the poet's emotions: inspiration comes to the poet from without and enables him, with the Muse's help, to solve problems in his craft that would defy his unaided wit—but they remain problems of craft. The doctrine that art is the expression of emotion is one we owe to the romantic movement; earlier statements of it are very hard to find.

Is the emotion expressed in a poem the same as that originally experienced by the poet? Most of the difficulties here vanish if we reject too naïve a view of the temporal priority of this original emotion. What a poem expresses is clearly not the emotion of the poet before he began writing it, but it may be his original emotion insofar as the writing of the poem helped him to discover, even to feel it: "Expression is the clarification of turbid emotion," says Dewey. Alexander, however, prefers to postulate two emotions, the material passion ("the passions appropriate to the subject") and the formal passion (the "passion proper to the artist" that guides him "more surely than conscious ideas . . . unifying his choice of words . . . into an expressive whole"). This formal passion is clearly the equivalent for the poet of the aesthetic emotion of the reader; Alexander suggests that the material passion need not be present, citing the example of dramatic poetry: "It is not necessary to suppose that Meredith or Shakespeare actually felt the emotions of his characters, but only that he understood them." Murry, however, who advances an extreme version of the expression theory, would prefer to say that the material passion is not the emotion of Macbeth but that of Shakespeare about the Macbeth situation, which is expressed by the play as a whole and which Shakespeare presumably felt as well as understood.

The central difficulty in any view of art as the expression of emotion is to find a way of indicating that the poet, though in the grip of an emotion, is also in control of it: that he or she is possessed by emotion but also possesses it. A critic's way of resolving this paradox may often show the heart of his doctrine. A typical Victorian answer is that of Ruskin, for whom the second-order poet is in the grip of his feelings (or chooses to write as if he were), whereas the first-order poet has command over himself and can look around calmly. When it comes to applying this distinction to poems, Ruskin shows a naïveté that is almost ludicrous: the great poet's "control of emotion" consists mainly in avoiding *metaphor and factually untrue statements, even in preferring *similes to metaphors.

Since genuine emotion, in real life, may well be accompanied by complete inarticulateness, we need to distinguish between its expression in a poem and the symptoms in which it issues in actual situations. Croce views expression as either aesthetic or naturalistic: "there is . . . an abyss . . . between the appearance, the cries and contortions of some one grieving at the loss of a dear one and the words or song with which the same individual portrays his suffering at another time." Dewey makes a distinction between giving way to, and expressing, an impulse: raging is not the same as expressing rage, and he links it with his more general theory that the arresting of the physiologically normal outlet of an impulse is the necessary precondition of its transformation into a higher level of experience. Perhaps the most valuable formulation of the difference is that of Collingwood, who distinguishes between expressing and betraying an emotion, linking this with his view of art as an enlarging and clarifying of consciousness.

These are philosophical formulations; to the poet and practical critic, what matters is the application of the distinction to the actual lang. of poetry. The classic instance of failure to draw this distinction is Samuel Johnson's attack on John Milton's "Lycidas" on the grounds that "where there is leisure for fiction, there is little grief." The naturalistic discharge of grief may have no such leisure, but its expression has. This element of control in expression was no doubt one of the things S. T. Coleridge wished to indicate by attributing to imagination "a more than usual state of emotion, with more than usual order" and that Eliot was thinking of when he described poetry as "an escape from emotion." Eliot's objections to Hamlet spring from a feeling that loose emotion, inadequately expressed, is betrayed in the play, though he shows some uncertainty whether the emotion is Shakespeare's or also Hamlet's.

Wordsworth's account of poetry as originating in "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings" looks like a discharge theory, but he goes on to add that, as well as having "more than usual organic sensibility," the poet must be someone who has "thought long and deeply." Wordsworth was, in fact, usually aware (though he is inconsistent) that the emotion as expressed is not the same as that originally felt: in his account of emotion recollected in tranquillity, he remarks that the recollected emotion, that which issues in the poem, is "kindred" to the original one.

Of all mod. theorists, the one who perhaps comes closest to a view of art as the mere discharge of emotion is Freud. He happens to be talking of the reader's emotions, but his view (already mentioned) seems relevant here. He recognizes no element of control in the "release of tension" provided by lit. and sometimes indicates a view of art that equates it with indulgence in wish fulfillment. (At other times he holds what amounts to a cognitive view.) Carl Jung, though his interpretation is different, holds the same view of what the poetic emotion is like and describes it with the same metaphors: "the moment when the mythological situation appears is . . . as though forces were unloosed of the existence of which we had never even dreamed; . . . we feel suddenly aware of an extraordinary release." There can be no doubt that the distinction between expressing and betraying is invaluable in the actual crit. of lit. Collingwood applies it, briefly but brilliantly, to Thomas Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles and to Ludwig van Beethoven; it provides the best terminology for sorting good from bad in writers such as P. B. Shelley, Thomas Carlyle, and D. H. Lawrence.

How does emotion work in the creative process? If writing a poem is like driving a car, the emotions can be thought of either as the destination or the gasoline—the subject of literary creation or the force that makes it possible. Eliot holds the first view: "What every poet starts from is his own emotions," he says in contrasting Shakespeare to Dante, and he suggests that Dante expresses not belief but certain emotions of believing. Alexander, on the other hand, holds the second view: "The artist aims to express the subject which occupies his mind in the means which he uses. His purpose may be dictated by passion but is still a passionate purpose." The resolution of this dispute (which seems at least partly terminological) lies outside literary theory, but the dangers and implications of each view are worth noting. If you believe that the poet's emotions are the subject of a poem, you are likely to emphasize, even overemphasize, the typicality of poems dealing explicitly with emotions, such as Shakespeare's sonnets, Coleridge's "Dejection: An Ode" and even (as in the case of many romantic critics) lyric poetry in general. If, on the other hand, you regard emotion as merely the fuel, you have to deal with the fact that the writing of philosophy, psychology, even mathematics may often be fueled by emotion. The romantic doctrine of the presence of the writer's emotion as not merely external cause but in some way intrinsic to the product at least had the advantage that it provided a criterion for distinguishing poetry (more generally, imaginative lit.) from other forms of writing.

III. Recent Developments. The decline of romantic theories and the rise of critical positions such as *formalism and *structuralism in the 20th c. tended to direct attention away from the question of emotion. Structuralist theories, which treat lit. by the methods of ling., often assimilated poetry to other forms of lang., and their emphasis on codes led to a concentration on the activity of the lang. rather than on the resulting experience. Even the influential school of reader-response crit. has tended to concentrate on responses that, in Culler's words, "are generally cognitive rather than affective: not feeling shivers along the spine, or weeping, but having one's expectations proved false, or struggling with an unresolvable ambiguity."

Theories of the dispersed or decentered subject, deriving from Louis Althusser, Jacques Lacan, and Roland Barthes, which eliminate or at least minimize the autonomous creative act, naturally also minimized the importance of emotion: if there is no autonomous subject, then there is no originating emotion. Kristeva sees poetic lang. (by which she means the lang. of *modernism) as a struggle against oppression by the social order and an attempt to express the subversiveness of immediate experience, which she calls desire, but it is an impersonal desire, not an individual experience of desiring.

Beginning in the 1960s and 1970s, however, anti-emotion theories have been challenged by literary theorists influenced by the recent explosion of research into the emotions by psychologists (Lazarus, Ekman, Scherer, Frijda, Zajonc), philosophers (Solomon, Nussbaum, de Sousa, Wollheim, Prinz), neuroscientists (LeDoux, Damasio), anthropologists (Harré, Lutz), and others. The result has been a clearer understanding of what emotions are and why we have them. In turn, this has enabled critics to examine the relationships between emotion and poetry from an empirical perspective. Despite continuing disputes about more specific issues, a consensus has emerged about the most important components of emotion:

1. Emotions appraise or evaluate the environment in terms of their significance to my survival or well-being or that of "my group." Emotions make salient or pick out for special attention the threatening, the offensive, the admirable, and so forth.

2. Some (Solomon, Nussbaum, Gordon) have argued that these appraisals are evaluative judgments, such as the judgment that I have been insulted or that I am in danger. Others think of these appraisals as more like perceptions of value: for the psychologist Frijda emotional experience is "the perception of horrible objects, insupportable people, oppressive events." The philosopher Wollheim has a similar view: emotions provide us "with an orientation, or an attitude to the world—emotion tints or colours" the world.

3. It is widely agreed that bodily changes are important in emotion. James famously argued that, without an awareness of bodily changes, there would be nothing emotional about an emotion; it would simply be a "cold and neutral . . . intellectual perception" that, e.g., an offense has occurred. Frijda stresses that among the relevant bodily changes are "changes in action readiness," evoked by the appraisal of situations or events that impinge on a person's concerns. Emotions not only appraise the world as dangerous or offensive; they ready us to deal with the world as so appraised.

4. These various bodily changes are often consciously experienced as feelings, such as a feeling of flushed cheeks and racing heart. The neuroscientist Damasio makes a slightly different distinction. In his terminology, emotions are patterns of bodily response: primary emotions are responses that are preprogrammed, such as fear of a sudden loud sound, and secondary emotions are responses to mental images of more complex stimuli, involving some kind of evaluation. A feeling of emotion, on the other hand, is the brain's registration of these patterns of bodily response. (Paradoxically, this means that Damasio's "feelings" are not always consciously felt.)

5. Many theorists think of emotions as processes, initiated by an appraisal, resulting in bodily changes of various sorts that prepare for action and that may be registered in consciousness as feelings. On this view, the function of emotion is to get us to respond rapidly to important "adaptational encounters" with the environment. However, although the initial emotional response seems to be urgent and automatic, human beings typically monitor their responses for their appropriateness and try to "regulate" or "manage" them as the emotional process unfolds.

How can the theory of emotion contribute to poetics? Recent emotion theory can throw light on both the nature of poetic expression and readers' emotional responses as well as their interaction. Understanding the emotions expressed by a romantic lyric poem typically involves understanding the emotional perspective from which the poem is written. Thus, the dramatic speaker in John Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale" expresses his appraisal of the mundane world as dominated by "the weariness, the fever and the fret" and his perception of the nightingale as the creator of a song that transports him into a timeless world of art and beauty. Moreover, Keats is not simply betraying his emotions but articulating and elucidating them as a result of cognitively monitoring the emotional experience after the fact: as Wordsworth put it, he is "recollecting" an emotional experience "in tranquility."

Ribeiro has noted that by far the majority of poems are lyric poems written from the first-person perspective, in which we are invited to "identify" with the poetic speaker and "appropriate" the viewpoint expressed as our own. The discovery of "mirror neurons" in macaque monkeys has fueled speculation that humans can empathize with the feelings of others by "simulating" their emotional experiences. Some theorists (Currie, Feagin, Goldman) have adopted the idea that "identification" with a narrator or dramatic speaker amounts to "simulation" or adoption "off-line" of the speaker's emotional states. Thus, when we respond emotionally to Shelley's dramatic speaker who cries "I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!" we may be adopting "off-line" the anguish and despair expressed by this speaker and thereby coming to empathize with him. In such cases, my emotions may guide me to a better understanding of the poetic speaker and what he or she is expressing in the poem. Something similar may happen in narrative poetry if the narrator is also the main protagonist, as in Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. Readers are encouraged to take the perspective of the mariner and to experience the events described as he describes them (see ABSORPTION), although we might spare an occasional thought for the importuned wedding guest.

One question about this idea is whether poetry or lit. in general is capable of arousing emotions in its readers at all. Philosophers of lit. have debated (e.g., in Emotion and the Arts) the so-called paradox of fiction, i.e., the question whether actual emotions are aroused by characters in lit. or whether it is only make-believe that we feel such emotions. The paradox arises out of the "appraisal" theory of emotion: if sadness, say, requires that we judge that we have suffered a loss, then why should we respond with horrified sadness to Keats's story of Isabella, if the story is entirely fictional and no one's head has actually been buried in a pot of basil? Some (Walton) say that the emotions aroused are "quasi-emotions," having the physiological components of emotion without the requisite evaluative judgment, whereas others think that emotion systems respond as reliably to thoughts or imaginings about a loss as they do to an actual loss and that we feel genuine emotion for fictional characters (Robinson).

A related "paradox of tragedy" considers why we should respond with pleasure or positive emotions to Oedipus Rex or King Lear, which depict events that are painful. One response that goes back to Hume is that the formal features of a well-written tragedy distract us from the unpleasant content. In terms of recent emotion theory, the formal devices that shape a great tragedy can act as psychological defenses or coping mechanisms, helping us to deal with or manage the powerful emotions evoked by the story (Robinson).

More generally, Fish's early essay "Affective Stylistics" describes how a good poem controls the individual reader's emotional responses to subject matter by formal manipulations. In that essay, he seems to assume an ideal reader who will respond as the poem—or the poet—wants us to respond. Later versions of affective reader-response theory, such as Holland's, recognize that individual readers bring their own experiences and temperaments to bear on their readings. In later essays, Fish argues that different readings are associated with different "interpretive communities," but he no longer emphasizes readers' emotional responses. Nevertheless, readers' emotional responses are often important in interpretation and evaluation not only for grasping what emotions the poem expresses but also more generally for bringing salient features of the poem to attention. Of course, different readers from different interpretive communities and with different background assumptions will tend to find salience in different places, nor are all readers' emotional responses appropriate to the poem (despite what Fish and others sometimes seem to claim). However, interpretation requires not just emoting but reflecting on our emotional responses. The reflective critic will deem some of his or her responses inappropriate and idiosyncratic and hence irrelevant to understanding.

Recently there have been a few attempts (Gerrig, van Peer, Harris) to study empirically how readers respond emotionally to lit., incl. poetry. Several studies focus on the perspective readers take on what is happening in a literary work. Empirical evidence suggests that readers do indeed "mentally situate themselves at a particular locus within the scene being described," typically one that is the same as or close to the main protagonist. This has implications for the reader's emotional responses: e.g., readers find a probe term faster if it coincides with the protagonist's emotional state. In general, it seems as though emotion theory and empirical research into the reception of poetry will continue to further our understanding of poetry and its emotional effects.

See ETHOS, JAPANESE POETICS, NEOCLASSICAL POETICS, PATHOS, RHETORIC AND POETRY, ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS.

■ J. Ruskin, "The Pathetic Fallacy," Modern Painters (1856), 3.4; B. Croce, Aesthetic, trans. D. Ainslie (1909); T. S. Eliot, "The Perfect Critic," The Sacred Wood (1920); S. Freud, "The Relation of the Poet to Day-Dreaming," Collected Papers, trans. G. Duff, v. 4 (1925); J. M. Murry, The Problem of Style (1925); C. G. Jung, "On the Relation of Analytical Psychology to Poetic Art," Contributions to Analytical Psychology, trans. H. G. Baynes and C. F. Baynes (1928); I. A. Richards, Practical Criticism (1929); S. Alexander, Beauty and Other Forms of Value (1933); J. Dewey, Art as Experience (1934); E. Vivas, "A Definition of the Aesthetic Experience," Journal of Philosophy 34 (1937); R. G. Collingwood, Principles of Art (1938); C. W. Morris, Foundations of the Theory of Signs (1938); Eliot, Essays, esp. "Tradition and the Individual Talent," "Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca," and "Dante"; W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Affective Fallacy," The Verbal Icon (1954); W. Empson, The Structure of Complex Words (1951); E. Kris, Psycho-analytic Explorations in Art (1952); H. Osborne, Aesthetics and Criticism (1955)—ch. 7 attacks the expression theory; Wimsatt and Brooks, ch. 14; S. O. Lesser, Fiction and the Unconscious (1957); H. Osborne, "The Quality of Feeling in Art," British Journal of Aesthetics 3 (1963); N. N. Holland, The Dynamics of Literary Response (1968), and "The 'Unconscious' of Literature," Contemporary Criticism, ed. M. Bradbury and D. Palmer (1970); S. Fish, "Literature in the Reader: Affective Stylistics," NLH 2 (1970); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1974); and The Pleasure of the Text, trans. R. Miller (1975); N. N. Holland, 5 Readers Reading (1975); and "Unity Identity Text Self," PMLA 90 (1975); J. Derrida, Of Grammatology, trans. G. C. Spivak (1976); R. C. Solomon, The Passions (1976); S. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? (1980); J. Kristeva, Desire in Language, trans. T. Gora et al. (1980); R. Zajonc, "Feeling and Thinking: Preferences Need No Inferences," American Psychologist 35 (1980); J. Fetterley, The Resisting Reader (1981); W. James, The Works of William James, ed. F. H. Burkhardt, 3 vols. (1981); J. Culler, On Deconstruction (1982); R. Zajonc, "On the Primacy of Affect," American Psychologist 39 (1984); N. Frijda, The Emotions (1986); R. Harré, The Social Construction of Emotions (1986); R. de Sousa, The Rationality of Emotion (1987); R. M. Gordon, The Structure of Emotions (1987); C. Lutz, Unnatural Emotions: Everyday Sentiments on a Micronesian Atoll and Their Challenge to Western Theory (1988); K. Walton, Mimesis as Make-Believe (1990); R. Lazarus, Emotion and Adaptation (1991); C. Bell, "The Aesthetic Hypothesis," Art in Theory, 1900–1990, ed. C. Harrison and P. Wood (1992); R. Gerrig, Experiencing Narrative Worlds (1993); A. Damasio, Descartes' Error: Emotion, Reason, and the Human Brain (1994); G. Currie, "Imagination and Simulation: Aesthetics Meets Cognitive Science," Mental Simulation, ed. M. Davies and T. Stone (1995); P. L. Harris, The Work of the Imagination (1995)—on experiment by M. Rinck and G. H. Bower; Collected Writings of T. E. Hulme, ed. K. Csengeri (1996); S. Feagin, Reading with Feeling: The Aesthetics of Appreciation (1996); J. LeDoux, The Emotional Brain (1996); Emotion and the Arts, ed. M. Hjort and S. Laver (1997), esp. J. Levinson, K. Walton, G. Currie, D. Matravers, and N. Carroll; R. Wollheim, On the Emotions (1999); M. Nussbaum, Upheavals of Thought: The Intelligence of Emotions (2001); K. Scherer, "The Nature and Study of Appraisal: A Review of the Issues," Appraisal Processes in Emotion, ed. K. Scherer et al. (2001); W. van Peer and S. Chatman, New Perspectives on Narrative Perspective (2001); G. Currie and I. Ravenscroft, Recreative Minds (2002); A. Damasio, Looking for Spinoza: Joy, Sorrow, and the Feeling Brain (2003); P. Ekman, Emotions Revealed (2003); R. C. Solomon, Not Passion's Slave (2003); J. Prinz, Gut Reactions: A Perceptual Theory of Emotion (2004); J. Robinson, Deeper Than Reason: Emotion and Its Role in Literature, Music and Art (2005); A. Goldman, Simulating Minds (2006); N. Frijda, The Laws of Emotion (2007); S. Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2007); R. C. Solomon, True to Our Feelings (2007); A. C. Ribeiro, "Toward a Philosophy of Poetry," Midwest Studies in Philosophy 33 (2009); P. C. Hogan, What Literature Teaches Us About Emotion (2011).

L. D. Lerner; J. Robinson

EMPATHY AND SYMPATHY. Empathy is usually defined as projection of oneself into the other or identification with the other, but the term, in fact, has referred to many divergent phenomena in both psychology and aesthetics. Coined by E. B. Titchener to translate a technical term, Einfühlung, and first used by Theodor Lipps in 1897 in a psychological analysis of aesthetic appreciation, empathy originally meant a fusing of self with (or loss of self-awareness in) the object of one's attention. The conception (if not the term) was developed by both R. H. Lotze and F. T. Vischer in elaboration of Hegelian aesthetics, which made empathy constitutive of beauty. In the social sciences, its meaning shifted to the ability to put oneself in the place of another, imaginatively, or to experience what the other's feelings must be like. Sigmund Freud saw empathy as emerging from identification by way of imitation, a third stage in our taking on the attitudes of others. Some theorists of *interpretation have made empathy in a broad sense basic to hermeneutic understanding, but not Wilhelm Dilthey, whose Nacherleben (mistranslated as "empathy") is quite different from Einfühlen.

Significant contributions to the conception of empathy have also been made by Max Scheler and Martin Buber. Buber's characterization of empathy allows us to see how the term could be put to use in readings of romantic poetry (see Fogle, Bate, Bloom): "Empathy means, if anything, to glide with one's own feeling into the dynamic structure of an object, a pillar, or a crystal or the branch of a tree, or even of an animal or a man, and as it were to trace it from within, understanding the formation and motoriality of the object with the perceptions of one's own muscles." Though other theorists do not share this emphasis on the visceral, most agree in contrasting the term empathy with sympathy, which is seen as more reflective, comparative, and cognizant of one's own feelings. This sense of empathy has been predominantly applied in studies of poetry. More recently, empathy and sympathy, distinguished in a different way, have been the focus of studies of the novel, its social content and context, as well as the dynamics of the reader's participation (identification, imitation).

Fogle saw empathy as the source of *personification in poetry and the basis for all *metaphor that endows the natural world with features of mind or human feeling. As such, he identified it with "what modern critics have termed the mythical view" and thus with "the essential attitude of poetry and art." In a narrower sense, empathy refers to metaphors that convey the meaning of an object by evoking a physical (kinesthetic) response to it. John Keats's lines in Hyperion, "crag jutting forth to crag, and rocks that seem'd / Ever as if just rising from a sleep, / Forehead to forehead held their monstrous horns," aptly illustrate the empathic interpretation of objects by physical suggestion. However, there is a paradox in such usage insofar as it implies projection of features not actually to be found in the object (see pathetic fallacy), since empathy is otherwise taken as a form of knowledge or insight.

In its projection into or identification with the object (the metaphysical crux of romantic nature poetry), empathy is distinguishable from sympathy by its element of sensation and its more intimate union with its object—sympathy runs parallel, while empathy unites. The importance of sympathy to poetics lies in its relation to extrapoetic issues. The sympathetic imagination, e.g., makes possible organized social action by awakening us to the kinship of all things. In S. T. Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, the Ancient Mariner's crime is a failure of sympathy toward a creature that has already been associated with humanity: "As if it had been a Christian soul, / We hailed it in God's name" (see also negative capability).

In A Treatise of Human Nature, David Hume found no human quality "more remarkable, both in itself and in its consequences, than that propensity we have to sympathize with others, and to receive by communication their inclinations and sentiments, however different from, or even contrary to our own." Hume saw sympathy as essential to the spread of attitudes and manners, as well as the intersubjective communication of feelings. In both cases, sympathy was a sort of contagion that seemed unreflective to the subject, although a philosopher could trace the swift conversion of idea into impression. In The Theory of Moral Sentiments, Adam Smith made sympathy more reflective and deliberate, depending on our imagining what we would feel in the other's place. He stressed its affinity to compassion and pity but used it "to denote our fellow-feeling with any passion whatever." Smith drew on Stoic self-command and sympatheia (a cosmic as well as social bond).

Starting with Marshall, and then Roberts and Hinton in parallel, sympathy became central to studies of the novel, with persistent attention to its problematic or ambivalent nature, as the reader enters into—and derives pleasure from—the fictional sufferings of the hero or, more often, heroine. Both Roberts and Hinton focus not only on Samuel Richardson's Clarissa but on Henry James's The Portrait of a Lady; Boudreau has chapters on Henry and William James, and (like Roberts) on Nathaniel Hawthorne. Focusing on relations between men, Crain devotes two chapters each to Charles Brockden Brown and R. W. Emerson. "The spectator" of Smith's moral theory and the affinity of sympathy and theatricality or spectacle (representation) seen by Marshall in Anthony Ashley Cooper, the third Earl of Shaftesbury, resurface in the "scenes of sympathy" discussed by Jaffe. Miranda's speech in The Tempest 2.2, cited by Marshall, provides the link for Ratcliffe's readings of dramatic *monologues by Robert Browning, W. H. Auden, and Samuel Beckett that allude to the passage. Keen's wide-ranging study of "narrative empathy" identifies empathy with the sympathy of Hume and Smith and explores it in readers, the market, authors, and academic opponents of empathy.

See ABSORPTION, AFFECT, EMOTION.

■ H. Lotze, Microcosmos, trans. E. Hamilton and E.E.C. Jones (1886); T. Lipps, Ästhetik (1903), Leitfaden der Psychologie (1906), and Psychologische Untersuchungen (1907–13); V. Lee, The Beautiful (1913); M. Scheler, The Nature of Sympathy (1913); H. S. Langfeld, The Aesthetic Attitude (1920); I. A. Richards et al., Foundation of Aesthetics (1925); G. H. Mead, Mind, Self and Society (1934); W. J. Bate, From Classic to Romantic (1946), ch. 5; R. H. Fogle, The Imagery of Keats and Shelley (1949), ch. 4; M. Buber, Between Man and Man, trans. R. G. Smith (1955); R. L. Katz, Empathy, Its Nature and Uses (1963); H. Bloom, Shelley's Mythmaking (1969); W. Perpeet, "Einfühlungsästhetik," Historisches Wörterbuch der Philosophie, ed. J. Ritter (1971–2007); M. F. Basch, "Empathic Understanding: A Review of the Concept," Journal of the American Psychoanalytic Association 31 (1983); D. Marshall, The Figure of Theatre (1986), and The Surprising Effects of Sympathy: Marivaux, Diderot, Rousseau, and Mary Shelley (1988); N. Roberts, Schools of Sympathy, Gender and Identification through the Novel (1997); L. Hinton, The Perverse Gaze of Sympathy (1999); A. Jaffe, Scenes of Sympathy: Identity and Representation in Victorian Fiction (2000); C. Crain, American Sympathy: Men, Friendship and Literature in the New Nation (2001); K. Boudreau, Sympathy in American Literature (2002); B. Lowe, Victorian Fiction and the Insights of Sympathy (2007); S. Keen, Empathy and the Novel (2007); S. Ratcliffe, On Sympathy (2008).

R. H. FOGLE; J. BARNOUW

ENARGEIA (Gr. arges, "bright"; Lat. evidentia, inlustratio, repraesentatio). Enargeia or vividness is defined in cl. rhetorical treatises as a quality that appeals to the listener's senses, principally that of sight. In the Progymnasmata (School Exercises), enargeia is, with sapheneia, or clarity, one of the defining characteristics of ekphrasis*, the description in poetry of pictorial scenes on objects (a shield, a vase). Aristotle mentions enargeia in the Rhetoric (1410b36), but it is Quintilian who gives the most detailed treatment of the property in cl. rhet.: by penetrating the visual imagination of the listener and involving him in the subject of the speech, the orator can persuade more effectively than through logical argument alone (8.3.62). To achieve enargeia, the orator must use his visual imagination (phantasia) to evoke the scene mentally (10.7.15). He then represents this vision in the delivery of the speech, producing an analogous image, and the concomitant feelings, in the minds of the audience (6.2.29–32). One important descriptive technique for vivid portrayal is the selection and disposition of significant detail (8.3.66, 9.2.40). The theory of enargeia supposes a close reciprocal relation between mental images and the arousal of *emotion (see PATHOS) and is thus linked to the notion of psychagogia—leading or enchanting the mind.

Outside practical rhet., enargeia was also felt to be a desirable quality in historiography and, esp., poetry. The Lat. rhetoricians often drew their examples of enargeia from Virgil, as the Greeks did from Homer. Ancient commentaries on Homer and on Attic *tragedy frequently draw attention to vividly pictorial passages and phrases. For Longinus (On the Sublime 15), vivid *imagery (which he usually refers to as "phantasia") is one means of attaining the *sublime. But he makes an important distinction between the use of such imagery by the orator, who must keep within the bounds of credibility, and by the poets, who are free to invent and elaborate fabulous subjects.

The psychological mechanism linking mental imagery and emotion was known to Aristotle (Rhetoric 1411b–1412a), who used the concrete adverbial phrase "before the eyes" rather than the abstract term vividness to signify the effect of such vision. For Aristotle, mental picturing produces the semblance of vitality and actuality: the Gr. for this is energeia, a term that has often been confused with enargeia.

■ J. H. Hagstrum, The Sister Arts (1958); T. Cave, "Enargeia: Erasmus and the Rhetoric of Presence in the Sixteenth Century," L'Esprit Créateur 16 (1976); L. Galyon, "Puttenham's Enargeia and Energeia: New Twists for Old Terms," PQ 60 (1981); G. Zanker, "Enargeia in the Ancient Criticism of Poetry," Rheinisches Museum für Philologie 124 (1981); S. K. Heninger Jr., "A World of Figures: Enargeiac Speech in Shakespeare," Fanned and Winnowed Opinions: Shakespearean Essays, ed. J. W. Mahon and T. A. Pendleton (1987); R. Meijering, Literary and Rhetorical Theories in Greek Scholia (1987); Corbett; F. Dumora-Mabille, "Entre clarté et illusion: l'enargeia au XVIIe siècle," Littératures classiques 28 (1996); R. Cockcroft, "Fine-Tuning Quintilian's Doctrine of Rhetorical Emotion: Seven Types of Enargeia," Colección Quintiliano de Retórica y Comunicación 2 (1998); Lausberg; I. Lunde, "Rhetorical Enargeia and Linguistic Pragmatics: On Speech-Reporting Strategies in East Slavic Medieval Hagiography and Homiletics," Journal of Historical Pragmatics 5 (2004).

R. H. WEBB; P. WELLER

ENCOMIUM. Strictly, a Gr. choral lyric performed "in the revel" (komos) to celebrate a person's achievements. More generally, the name is applied to any poem praising a human rather than a god (Plato, Republic 607a; Aristotle, Poetics 4), and it coincides with other designations such as *panegyric and *epinikion.

In the generic categories devised by the Alexandrian librarians to classify Gr. choral lyric, encomium referred to poems that were less formal than epinikia and that were probably, like the *skolion, performed at banquets. Simonides brought the genre to its maturity, but no examples of his encomia are extant; only fragments remain of the encomia of the two most important subsequent authors, Pindar (fr. 118–28) and Bacchylides (fr. 20Aa–g). In its broadest application, encomium becomes indistinguishable from praise as a subdivision of epideictic oratory (Aristotle, Rhetoric 1358b18 ff.). Both the first Sophistic movement (5th c. BCE) and the second (2d c. CE) produced prose encomia of frivolous and paradoxical subjects (Pease), forerunners of Erasmus's Moriae encomium (The Praise of Folly).

Although encomiastic passages can be found throughout Greco-Roman poetry (Burgess), salient examples include Theocritus, Idylls 16 and 17; Horace, Odes 4.4 and 4.14; (Tibullus) 3.7; and the anonymous Laus pisonis. Encomia continue to be written in the Byzantine period (Viljamaa), the Middle Ages (Baldwin), and the Ren. (Hardison, Garrison).

See EPIDEICTIC POETRY.

■ Pauly-Wissowa; T. Burgess, Epideictic Literature (1902); G. Fraustadt, Encomiorum in litteris Graecis usque ad Romanam aetatem historia (1909); A. S. Pease, "Things without Honor," CP 21 (1926); C. S. Baldwin, Medieval Rhetoric and Poetic (1928); A. E. Harvey, "The Classification of Greek Lyric Poetry," CQ 5 (1955); H. K. Miller, "The Paradoxical Encomium with Special Reference to Its Vogue in England, 1600–1800" MP 53 (1956); O. B. Hardison Jr., The Enduring Monument (1962); W. Meinke, Untersuchungen zu den Enkomiastischen Gedichten Theokrits (1965); T. Viljamaa, Studies in Greek Encomiastic Poetry of the Early Byzantine Period (1968); J. D. Garrison, Dryden and the Tradition of Panegyric (1975); A. W. Nightingale, "The Folly of Praise: Plato's Critique of Encomiastic Discourse in the Lysis and Symposium," CQ n.s. 43 (1993).

W. H. RACE

ENDECHA. A Sp. *dirge or *lament, usually written in five-, six-, or seven-syllable lines; the even-numbered lines have *assonance, though any simple rhyme scheme in true rhyme and any type of verse may be used, since the name refers primarily to subject matter. The *strophe employed in the endecha real, however, introduced in the 16th c., is usually limited to four lines, generally three *heptasyllables plus one *hendecasyllable, the second and fourth lines assonating and the others left unrhymed. The position of the hendecasyllables may vary, or the strophe may alternate hendecasyllables with heptasyllables. Alternating rhyme (serventesio) may also be used. The short-line forms, according to Le Gentil, are found as early as the 15th c., although the typical assonance of the learned poetry is a devel. of the 16th. The endecha is sometimes called romancillo. A famous example is Félix Lope de Vega's Pobre barquilla mia.

■ Le Gentil; M. Alvar, Endechas judeo-españoles (1968); Navarro; E. Gutwirth, "A Judeo-Spanish endecha from the Cairo Geniza," Mediterranean Language Review 6–7 (1993).

D. C. CLARKE

END-STOPPED lines are those in which meter, syntax, and sense come to a conclusion at line end. "Conclusion" is, however, not an unequivocal absolute: syntactically, the end of a phrase is the minimum requirement, but end of clause or sentence is normal: "Hope springs eternal in the human breast; / Man never is, but always to be, blest," Alexander Pope says (Essay on Criticism). A single *line may be said to be end-stopped, but the term normally applies to the *couplet, and particularly the closed *heroic couplet of 18th-c. Eng. poetry, as well as to the *alexandrine of Fr. classicism. The term end-stopped is opposed to run-on or enjambé (see ENJAMBMENT), terms used to describe the free and uninterrupted carry over of syntax from one line to the other, as in most Eng. *blank verse and most *romantic poetry.

A. PREMINGER; T.V.F. BROGAN

ENGLAND, POETRY OF

I. Old English, 650–1066 CE
II. Middle English, 1066–1500
III. The Renaissance, 1500–1660
IV. The Restoration and the Eighteenth Century, 1660–1789
V. The Romantic Period, 1789–1830
VI. The Victorian Period, 1830–1900
VII. Modernism to the Present, from 1901

I. Old English, 650–1066 CE. When Lat. literary culture took hold in early med. England, one surprising result was a flourishing of vernacular verse in a wealth of *genres, from sophisticated *riddles and emotionally intense *lyrics, to long biblical narratives and *epics such as Beowulf. Although writing occurred almost exclusively in monastic scriptoria where Lat. predominated, OE poetry developed alongside Anglo-Lat. lit. Nearly all OE poems survive as copies in four codices dating from the late 10th or early 11th c.: the Exeter Book, the Vercelli Book, the Beowulf or Nowell Codex, and the Junius ms. It is, therefore, extremely difficult to establish dates of composition or to track changing metrical patterns. Nonetheless, we know that OE poetry was composed at least from the late 7th through the 11th c. In his Ecclesiastical History of the English People (completed 731 CE), Bede (673–736) describes a body of written vernacular biblical verse, which he attributes to the miracle of an illiterate lay worker named Cædmon (fl. 657–79) whose divinely inspired songs were transcribed by the brothers at Whitby. The illustrated Junius ms., clearly the work of multiple authors, contains the long biblical verse narratives Genesis, Exodus, Daniel, and Christ and Satan, although its hist. is obscure. A few OE poems, such as "The Battle of Brunanburh," "The Battle of Maldon," and "Durham," can be securely dated to the late 10th and 11th cs. because they refer to contemp. events.

OE poetry's stress-based, *alliterative verse was cultivated from traditional, probably oral, forms in the context of Lat. versification and Saxon poetry written on the continent (see GERMANIC PROSODY). This verse bears affinities to *accentual verse, which is organized by count of stresses rather than syllables, but its emphasis is on patterns of alliterating stresses that bind half lines across a *caesura; the total number of stressed syllables in a line can vary, although syllabic count, a feature of Romance prosodies (see SYLLABIC VERSE), may have been a consideration for some OE poets. Literary interchange, particularly with Carolingian courts and with Rome, was rich and complex. Some Anglo-Saxon authors knew an array of cl. and early med. *Latin poetry, incl. Virgil's Aeneid, and Lat. meter was among the topics taught at Canterbury in the 7th c. by Archbishop Theodore and Abbot Hadrian, both from the Gr.-speaking Mediterranean. This confluence of langs. and poetic *conventions generated a robust verse suitable for lyric, martial, or religious poetry. *Kennings and other metaphoric compounds (such as hran-rad, "whale-road," for "sea" and ban-hus, "bone-house," for "body"), *litotes, strings of appositional modifiers, and a heroic, aristocratic tenor feature prominently. OE poets experimented with *rhyme, and occasionally with stanzaic form and *macaronic verse. Poets who composed in OE probably also composed Anglo-Lat. poetry, which shares some characteristics with OE poetry. A good deal of alliterative, rhythmic OE prose survives, and the line between prose and poetry is sometimes unclear.

OE poets experimented with first-person *voice, using it to realize emotional intensity and to sustain *unity, often with self-conscious reference to poetic composition. The speakers of lyrics such as "The Wanderer," "The Seafarer," "The Riming Poem," and "The Order of the World" meditate poignantly on the transience of worldly joy, offering poetic imagination and their own experience as a bridge to wisdom and theological understanding. The poet Cynewulf, whose dates are uncertain, muses on his own artistry and on salvation as he disperses the letters of his name, encoded in *runes, across each of the lyric epilogues to "Fates of the Apostles," Christ II, Elene, and Juliana. The speaker of Widsith (far-traveler) seems the voice of poetry itself, cataloguing his successes as a court poet for kings whose historical existence far exceeds a single lifespan. Objects often speak, particularly in riddles, which share qualities with both lyric and *gnomic poetry. In Riddle 26, the first-person voice speaks of itself as both a living animal and an ornamented gospel book made from the animal's skin, and vaunts its salvific qualities. In "The Dream of the Rood," the first *dream vision in Eng., the rood describes itself as a living tree and a jeweled cross and commands the dreamer to compose its story. OE poetry maintains strong ties to material culture, and some objects, such as the Alfred Jewel, also bear first-person inscriptions. Most notably, a runic poem corresponding to a portion of "The Dream of the Rood" is carved into the stone shaft of the 8th-c. Northumbrian Ruthwell Cross. First-person lyric also punctuates long historical poems such as Beowulf, particularly at points of transition, where it links narrative segments and distant times.

In many poems of different genres, this dramatic voice turns dialogic. In the saints' lives Andreas, Juliana, Guthlac A, and Elene, and in the epic Christ and Satan, rhetorically heightened episodes—such as Andrew's probing interrogation of Christ, Juliana's and Guthlac's verbal duels with demons, Elene's interchange with the Jewish priest Judas, and the fallen Satan's dialogue with his inferiors—anchor the narrative structures and dramatize didactic lessons. Different in tone but no less dramatic are the Advent Lyrics (also known as Christ I), a series of *apostrophes inspired by the Advent antiphons and addressed mainly to God, Christ, or Mary, with the exception of Lyric VII's cagey dialogue between Joseph and Mary regarding her pregnancy.

Many OE poems are considered trans., although their inventive reworkings of sources attest to a process that brought extensive study, bold interpretation, and poetic imagination to bear on even the most sacred texts. The epic Genesis, a portion of which translates an Old Saxon poem, begins with the apocryphal fall of the angels and includes an unusual version of the temptation. Hagiographical poems such as Andreas (on the Apostle Andrew's conversion of the cannibal Mermedonians), Juliana (an early Christian virgin-martyr tale), and Elene (a version of St. Helen's discovery of the true cross) work freely with multiple Lat. versions, adapting them to the heroic style characteristic of OE poetry. Although most trans. are biblical or hagiographical, the Exeter Book, a diverse *anthology of poetry, contains three trans. from Physiologus ("The Panther," "The Whale," and "The Partridge") and "The Phoenix," which translates and then interprets the "De Ave Phoenice" attributed to Lactantius.

All long narrative OE poems except Beowulf are biblical or hagiographical. What these poems have in common, however, is historiography. Anglo-Saxon authors, beginning with Bede, worked assiduously to weave northern Eur. hist. into the strands of universal hist., dominated by biblical Heb. genealogy and the ascendance of the Roman Empire. Despite its many fantastical elements, Beowulf is deeply grounded in hist.: it documents the military and territorial campaigns of the Danes, Swedes, and Geats; it describes Grendel as "kin of Cain," thus incorporating its narrative into the sweep of biblical hist.; and it features ancestors who also appear in genealogies of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and other historiographical texts. Together with more localized martial poems such as "The Battle of Maldon" and native saints' lives like the Guthlac poems, this epic stakes a claim for Eng. in literary hist.

II. Middle English, 1066–1500. The later Eng. Middle Ages bear witness to an intense period of literary experimentation. Almost all of this experimentation is in poetry; nonrhythmic prose is not a coherent medium (with cultural prestige, genres, and so on) in literary Eng. composition until after the invention of the printing press in about 1450. The experimental impulse originates from a fundamental ling. change: in the aftermath of the Norman Conquest (1066), which roughly divides the two phases of the Middle Ages in England, Norman poetic practices collide with OE practices to produce the first flowering of ME poetry, incl. The Owl and the Nightingale (late 12th c.). It deploys debate conventions that appear in both OE and Fr. but also uses a continental octosyllabic line and mixes courtly Fr. vocabulary into its largely Eng. lexicon. The synergy between Fr. and insular lang. and literary convention yields new literary forms from the 12th through the 14th c. These new forms arise both in *narrative and lyric poetry and in both religious and secular contexts, though one upshot of the experimental energy of the period is that both of these oppositions—narrative versus lyric, religious versus secular—are examined and reinvented by the end of the Middle Ages, particularly in the large-scale narrative fictions of the major poets of Edwardian, Ricardian, and Lancastrian England.

In the first phase of ME narrative poetry, the literary landscape is dominated by biblical paraphrase, hagiography, and homily. Incl. Genesis and Exodus (1250), the South English Legendary (late 13th c.), the Gospel of Nicodemus (1325), the Poema morale (ca. 1170), and the Ormulum (ca. 1200), these religious narratives announce their primary cultural purpose as didactic, though many (the Ormulum in particular) have a clear and sustained interest in lang., *rhythm, and the aesthetic field in which didacticism is produced.

Early lyrical poetry, too, is often religious in theme. Many early religious lyrics are structured as apostrophes to the Virgin Mary, while others are prayers to Jesus. As in OE poetry, some of the most interesting religious lyrics are dialogic, for instance containing an exchange between Mary and Jesus. There is no single unifying or typically "Eng." lyrical form for religious verse in the period; instead, a wide variety of Fr. and Lat. verse forms and meters are adapted to the exigencies of Eng. stress patterns. Line lengths and *rhyme schemes in lyric poetry are variable, as are the lengths of stanzas and the prosodic patterns within lines.

Contemporaneous with biblical narratives and *devotional poetry, more secular poetic works appear in early ME as well. Early secular lyrics are deeply indebted to Fr. and Norman amatory lyric forms; again, as poets adapt these forms to ME, a great deal of formal innovation results. These early experiments with lyrical form, *meter, and *syntax prove a crucial resource for later makers of large-scale fictional narrative, who interpolate short lyrical passages into their larger works.

Extensive, nonbiblical narrative poetry has often been categorized either as fact-based historical chronicle or as fictional *romance, though recent scholarship suggests that the boundary demarcating "fact-based" hist. from "fictional" romance may have been far blurrier in the Middle Ages than it seems to mod. readers, since many of the "romance" narratives clearly understand themselves as historical, pertaining either to Brit. prehist. (Lawman/Layamon's Brut, ca. 1205; King Horn, ca. 1225; Havelock the Dane, ca. 1280), Lat. prehist. (the Alexander romances Alisaunder, Alexander and Dindimus, and Wars of Alexander; and the Trojan hists. Gest Historiale of the Destruction of Troy, ca. 1350–1400, and the Seege of Troye, ca. 1300–25), or, more rarely, Fr. hist. Toward the 14th and 15th cs., the Arthurian romances flourish, incl. the alliterative Morte Arthure, the ballad Legend of King Arthur, and the justly famous Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, which synthesizes insular and Fr. verse forms (*alliteration with rhyme; long verses with stanzaic organization), narrative and lyrical formal strategies (large-scale chronological story told through an intricately versified stanzaic form), and historical and fantastic material (Trojan backstory and supernatural contemp. events). Largely through its formal complexity, Gawain constitutes what many scholars see as the pinnacle of romance invention in ME.

Another reason for the critical accolades to Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, however, is its larger context, both in the ms. in which it appears (Cotton Nero A.x) and the literary movement to which it bears witness, the Alliterative Revival. The Cotton Nero ms. contains Gawain and three other poems: Cleanness, Patience, and Pearl, all of which seem to have been composed by the Gawain poet. Patience is a dramatic and animated paraphrase of the book of Jonah, and it thus represents a late and unusually artful instance of biblical paraphrase narrative. Cleanness ranges more widely in its plot, covering stories of the Flood, the destruction of Sodom, and Belshazzar's feast. In Pearl, courtly lang. blends with theological content to create an elegant meditation on the nature of loss: the dreamer-poet mourns the loss of his "precious pearl," a daughter who has died in infancy. The poem's elaborate artistry and profound rendering of human emotion find no parallel in ME poetry. Though Pearl is unique in having end rhyme, alliterative patterning, and stanzaic structure, the rest of the Cotton Nero poems are also formally intricate, written in an alliterative meter, which is the staple meter of all those poems that have come to be loosely denominated as the Alliterative Revival. The generic multiplicity and stylistic variation of Cotton Nero A.x suggest that its poet was very much part of his or her cultural moment: the corpus of works composed in this late phase of ME lit. by the major authors is likewise characterized both by synthesis and revision of extant and authoritative literary forms and genres.

Of late med. writers, William Langland (ca. 1330–1400) is the first and arguably the most influential. Of the over 50 surviving copies of his Piers Plowman (written ca. 1360–87), there are three authorial versions, A, B, and C. These three revisions, though unquestionably motivated in part by aesthetic concerns, are likely also responses to the sociopolitical and theological controversies that wracked England in the middle and late 14th c., incl. the culmination and end of King Edward III's tumultuous reign and the increasing theological threat posed by the reform-minded Wycliffites and Lollards. Responding to these sociopolitical pressures, in each of Langland's revisions the poem changes its theological shape and political tenor, though, in all cases, it is rubricated into a visio, which recounts the dreaming narrator's vision of the social ills of 14th-c. England, and a vita, which recounts his pilgrimage to Truth. Langland's poem is notoriously slippery of genre, encompassing not only dream vision and pilgrimage narrative but consolation, autobiography, *personification allegory, debate, philosophy, trial drama, and apocalypse. Moreover, its episodic construction and its three distinct versions make the basic plot of the poem very difficult to tease out, though this resistance to interpretation may have been what made the poem wildly successful and influential in its own time, by inspiring readers to engage actively with the strangeness and complexity of its ideation and its self-conscious positioning both as a literary work and a sociopolitical and theological treatise.

Whether Chaucer (ca. 1345–1400) read Langland's marvelously complex poem remains an open issue, although the thematic and formal consonances in their major works (both tell pilgrimage narratives; both are interested in the interplay between *allegory and autobiography; both work with the Boethian consolatio genre; both stitch together a series of shorter vignettes into a more expansive fictional narrative; both are profoundly interested in the social fabric of 14th-c. England) make it seem likely that Chaucer was at least somewhat influenced by Piers Plowman, particularly later in his career. The precise chronology of Chaucer's poetry is unknown, although it is usually divided into an earlier "French" period (influenced by Jean de Meun, Guillaume de Machaut, and Jean Froissart) and a later "Italian" period (influenced by Dante and Boccaccio). Many of Chaucer's early works are either trans. (Roman de la Rose) or dream-vision narratives that work within and reinvent the conventions of the debate genre, while also being written for particular occasions (Book of the Duchess commemorates the death of Blanche of Lancaster; Parliament of Fowls is a Valentine's Day poem). By the mid-1380s, Chaucer's poetry took a significant turn. He translated Boethius's De Consolatione philosophiae into prose, and spent much of the rest of his life revisiting its themes in his poetry. Based on Giovanni Boccaccio's Il Filostrato, Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde, for instance, sets a star-crossed love affair against the historical events of the Trojan War as a pre-Christian test case for Boethian philosophy. In particular, in this poem, Chaucer stages the inevitable tragedy of the Trojan War as an occasion for meditating on the Boethian notions of fate versus free will, the nature of fortune, and the emptiness of worldly desire.

Having completed his antiquarian and philosophical romance, Chaucer turned his energies toward the contemp. reality of late med. England as his primary subject matter: by the late 1380s, he was working on the unfinished collection of ten extant fragments that are now known as the Canterbury Tales. The "General Prologue" that opens the poem describes the 29 characters on a pilgrimage to Canterbury both as occupational types (e.g., a lawyer, a parson, a wife) and as unique individuals. Throughout the Tales, to fulfill the terms of a tale-telling contest, each pilgrim tells a prologue and then a tale to the rest of the pilgrims. Chaucer likely derived his inspiration for this narrative invention from Boccaccio's Decameron (see ITALY, POETRY OF) and, in all likelihood, from the Ar. frame tale (see ARABIC POETRY). In the Canterbury Tales, however, Chaucer experiments with the templates he inherits. First, he devises a dynamic interplay between the prologue and the tale, which complicates each speaker's character and his or her place in the larger social world. Second, he develops distinct and socially situated voices for all his pilgrims; in doing so, he engages with and undercuts the genre of estates' satire, which depicts the world as comprised of only three basic social groups, clergy, warriors, and workers. Third, each pilgrim tells a tale that fits into and often reinvents an available literary genre: romances, *fabliaux, *fables, sermons, saints' lives, allegories, *tragedies, and exempla all appear in the Tales. In its use of dialectic structure to devise characters who are at once types and individuals, in its exploding of social ideology, and in its relentless will to integrate a polyphony of different literary modes, voices, and genres into a single, unified, and remarkably realistic composition, the Canterbury Tales remains one of the most innovative compositions of the Middle Ages in any lang.

Where Langland's career was influenced by Edwardian politics and Chaucer's by Ricardian, John Gower's (ca. 1330–1408) poetic career straddles the late Ricardian and early Lancastrian positions, and his poetry reflects that historical positioning—indeed, his magnum opus the ME Confessio amantis (written ca. 1386–90) has two prologues, one written in dedication to Richard II, the other to Henry IV. After the prologue follow eight books, each of which comprises a series of moral tales organized around the central theme of sin and right behavior. Seven sections draw from penitential manuals in the period; the outlier responds to the emerging vernacular Fürstenspiegel genre, also known as mirror for princes. This genre (which also includes Chaucer's "Tale of Melibee" in the Canterbury Tales, as well as certain passages from Piers Plowman) seems to gain power in the literary imagination of the late Ricardian and early Lancastrian periods, perhaps in response to the political turmoil of the period, as Richard II is forcibly deposed and Henry IV comes to power. Couching what could be incendiary political content carefully in literary form, Gower enfolds his gargantuan compilation of didactic exempla into a tidy fictive frame, adapted from the dream-vision narratives of Boethius, Jean de Meun, and Alan of Lille, in which a lover (Amans, later revealed to be Gower himself) seeks amatory counsel from a beneficent teacher (the Confessor). Perhaps because of the political bent of his writings or the overtly moralizing thrust of his composition and certainly because of Chaucer's famous dedication of his Troilus to "moral Gower," Gower was absorbed into lit. hist. as a "moral" writer, more concerned with didacticism than pleasure or entertainment.

The two most significant poets of the 15th c. are John Lydgate (ca. 1370–1449) and Thomas Hoccleve (ca. 1370–1430), both of whom read Chaucer extensively, and at least Hoccleve likely also read Langland and Gower. Lydgate is esp. well known for his *aureate diction, his assembly of extensive works of hist., and his interest in the mirror-for-princes genre. Over the course of his long poetic career, however, he composed in nearly every important med. genre and, thus, represents a synthesis and culmination of ME poetic hist. Like Lydgate, Hoccleve experiments with a variety of poetic genres and modes, ranging from religious lyric to autobiography, from political poems to a voluminous mirror for princes. But Hoccleve also picks up from his Ricardian and Lancastrian forebears an ironic fluency and self-mocking tone, which make him seem startlingly "mod." and his works a bridge between the Middle Ages and the early poetry of the Ren.

III. The Renaissance, 1500–1660. When William Caxton opened England's first printing press in Westminster in 1476, he not only disseminated a standard early mod. Eng. but also helped establish Eng. as a literary lang. Caxton printed Eng. poetry—Gower, Lydgate, and Chaucer—for the first time. He also published trans. of cl. and continental poetry, making available various literary models for future generations. As the 16th c. unfolded, printing and literacy increased, and Eng. education was transformed by humanism—"the new learning" imported from continental Europe with its cornerstone disciplines of rhet. and eloquence. Particularly in the second half of the century, inventive, well-made poetry was useful and often esteemed; it elevated the lang. and thereby England itself, as well as the poet's own status. The Reformation also thrust poetic lang. into the forefront of culture. Distrustful of the ecclesiastical hierarchies of the established church, Protestants sought truth in scripture itself (trans. now into the vernacular) and embraced devotional verse as a pathway to God.

Usually considered England's first Ren. poet, John Skelton (ca. 1460–1529) was on the cusp of this new momentum. Learned and versatile, Skelton tutored the young Prince Henry (later Henry VIII) in the court of Henry VII, and he wrote occasional poetry celebrating the reign of the Tudors. Most of his poems, however, exhibit an independent mind, by turns reflective, playful, and satiric. He draws on ME forms and conventions, esp. alliteration, but develops his own contemp. voice, particularly when he writes in the style later dubbed Skeltonics—short, rhyme-rich lines featuring colloquial diction and rhythms. Skelton's major poems include The Bouge of Court (1499), an allegorical dream vision warning of court corruption; "Speak, Parrot," "Colin Clout," and "Why Come Ye Not to Court?" (written ca. 1522), fierce *satires lambasting the powerful Cardinal Thomas Wolsey; and Philip Sparrow (written ca. 1509), an exaggerated *elegy for a young girl's pet, replete with liturgical *allusion and structure, spiritual instruction, social satire, erotic suggestion, everyday emotion, and reflections on cl. and Eng. poetry.

Thomas Wyatt (1503–42) is widely considered the first great Eng. poet of the Ren. Rigorously educated in the humanist trad. and a diplomat for Henry VIII, Wyatt was well prepared to represent the complexities of the Tudor court, particularly the intermeshing of political and personal desires. Wyatt's verse letters and satires warn of court corruption, and his dozens of poems about love recount and enact disillusionment, incl. his much-anthologized *rhyme-royal masterpiece "They Flee from Me" (ms. ca. 1530s); his lyrics for musical accompaniment, such as "My Lute, Awake" (ms. ca. 1530s); and the *sonnets he adapts from Petrarch's Canzoniere, such as "Whoso list to hunt" (ms. ca. 1526–27) based on Canzoniere 190 "Una candida cerva" (see PETRARCHISM). Wyatt's Petrarchan sonnets are the first known sonnets in Eng. excepting Chaucer's trans. of Canzoniere 132 in Troilus and Criseyde. Wyatt also translated the seven penitential psalms, introducing terza rima to Eng. and representing David as a prototype of the reformed Protestant seeking his own intimate connection to God.

Wyatt's poems were not printed during his lifetime but circulated in ms., the expected mode of publication for the courtly elite through the 16th c. Such mss. often found their way into print after an author's death and sometimes before. In 1549, Wyatt's penitential psalms appeared in print, and eight years later, 97 of his secular poems were published by an enterprising printer, Richard Tottel, in a popular collection of poems titled Songes and Sonettes and later known as Tottel's Miscellany*.

Tottel's collection also featured the poetry of Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey (1517–47), a fact noted prominently on the title page. High-born, polished, and ambitious, Surrey was still famous a dozen years after he had lost his head to an aging, suspicious Henry VIII. Surrey adapted sonnets from the Canzoniere into Eng. as his friend Wyatt also did, but Surrey is credited with inventing the Eng. sonnet (later called the Shakespearean sonnet), by organizing the 14 lines into three quatrains and a couplet (ababcdcdefefgg) instead of the It. sonnet's *octave (abbaabba) and *sestet (rhyming in several ways, incl. cdcdcd or cdecde). Surrey also developed *blank verse in Eng. for the first time, translating books 2 and 4 of Virgil's Aeneid into lines of unrhymed iambic pentameter.

Another popular book in the second half of the 16th c. was A Mirror for Magistrates (1559), a collection of poems by various authors recounting the downfall of princes and other powerful figures in Eng. hist. With various additions and deletions, the collection was reprinted eight times between 1559 and the end of the century and has engaged students of early mod. political culture since then. Poetically, it is not generally distinctive, but there are exceptions, incl. the chilling "Induction" and "Complaint of Henry, Duke of Buckingham" by Thomas Sackville (1536–1608).

Queen Elizabeth I began her long reign in 1558. Exceptionally intelligent, fluent in several ancient and mod. langs., and educated by leading humanists of the day, Elizabeth I wrote her own famous speeches, volumes of official and personal correspondence, and a handful of poems. She understood the theatrical nature of monarchy and the myriad ways political and poetic lang. inform each other, and she expected her courtiers to understand these subtleties as well. She also undersood the capacity of poetry (in a popular play or in love poems circulating at court) to engage, instruct, unite, or distract people. Moreover, her reinstatement of "the reformed religion," Anglican Protestantism, fostered the translating into Eng. of biblical verse, as well as the composing of original devotional poetry.

In 1560, having returned to England from exile during Mary's reign, Anne Lock (1530–after 1590) published the first known *sonnet sequence in Eng., A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner (1560), appended to a trans. of four sermons by John Calvin. The sequence includes five prefatory sonnets followed by 21 sonnets dilating on a passage in Psalm 51. From a family of moderate means and personally acquainted with the Scottish Calvinist John Knox, Lock received an excellent education for a woman of the period. While many intellectual leaders of the later 16th c. advocated literacy in women, few encouraged them to study rhet., the lifeblood of humanism and poetics.

Isabella Whitney (fl. 1567–73), a servant through at least part of her life, was thus unusual in her publishing of a love *complaint (ca. 1567) and a collection of poems and prose, A Sweet Nosgay, or Pleasant Posye (1573). The latter is based on Hugh Plat's anthol. The Flowers of Philosophy (1572) but evidences Whitney's female experience, colloquial voice, and sense of purpose. In some poems, such as "The Will and Testament," an elegy for the London her impoverishment required her to leave, we find her appropriating conventional male genres with wit and self-assurance.

George Turberville (1544–97), Barnabe Googe (1540–94), and George Gascoigne (1534–77) also wrote compendiums of verse and prose in the 1560s and 1570s. All favored a mostly straightforward *plain style. The numerous engaging poems in Gascoigne's A Hundred Sundry Flowers (1573), include "Gascoigne's Lullaby," in which the poet offers subtle wisdom in direct speech, blending melancholy and humor, self-mockery and self-acceptance.

Known to later times as "the poet's poet," Spenser (1552–99) appeared in the late 1570s with a very different poetic sensibility. Spenser embraced Eng. on every level—semantic, syntactic, etymological, and musical. He reveled in abstract metrical and aural patterns while simultaneously immersing readers in a unique lexicon, one that included OE terms, Chaucerian words, ornate phrases, and original coinages in which spelling itself was a medium of expression, able to make a pun, recall an etymology, or sound a chord. Spenser launched his career with The Shepheardes Calender (1579), a collection of 12 *eclogues, one for each month, in various forms and meters, some *monologues, some dialogues. Published with fine woodcut illustrations and scholarly notes like those accompanying cl. lit., the printed text insisted on its own importance. Furthermore, by making his debut in the *pastoral mode as Virgil had done with his Eclogues, Spenser placed himself in the most august literary *canon, and he put the Eng. lang. in the prestigious company of Lat. and Gr. as one of the world's great literary langs. He continued these associations in "Astrophel" (1595), a pastoral elegy for his friend and fellow poet Philip Sidney based on Virgil's fifth eclogue. In 1595, Spenser also published his Amoretti, an elaborate Petrarchan sonnet sequence, and in the same volume, his Epithalamion, a wedding-day gift for his bride (see EPITHALAMIUM).

Spenser's greatest work is The Faerie Queene, an allegorical epic that aims to "fashion a gentleman or noble person in vertuous and gentle discipline," as Spenser explains in a letter to Walter Ralegh, arguing that "delight" and "doctrine by ensample" are better teachers than "good discipline . . . sermoned at large" and "doctrine . . . by rule." Elizabeth I is the Faerie Queene, he explains, who "in a dream of vision" has inspired Arthur (not yet king) to find her. Arthur possesses Aristotle's 12 moral virtues, and each of 12 books of the epic will follow the adventures of a knight representing one of these virtues. Spenser ultimately wrote six books of 12 cantos each, and two cantos of a seventh book. These last two cantos, later known as the "Mutability Cantos," recount the goddess Mutability's attempt to reign over all other forces and her compelling but unsuccessful trial in Nature's court. Faerie Queene books 1–3 were published in 1590, books 1–6 with the "Mutability Cantos" in 1596. Cl. allusion abounds in the Faerie Queene, but Eng. hist. and legend are also pervasive. In many obvious ways, the epic celebrates Elizabeth I and Tudor rule, but it is also a complexly satiric, richly suggestive text, full of surprises and contradictions. Spenser created a new stanza for his masterpiece, nine iambic lines—eight pentameter, the ninth hexameter—rhyming ababbcbcc. The *Spenserian stanza feels like an expansion and intensification of rhyme royal and makes the Faerie Queene all the more suspenseful, thought-provoking, musical, and even mesmerizing.

Born the same year as Spenser, Walter Ralegh (1552–1618) was an ambitious courtier and explorer as well as a poet. Although Ralegh perfected that meshing of poetic and political rhet. so valued by Elizabeth I, particularly in "The Ocean to Cynthia," his long poem of praise for the queen who (for a while) raised him to great status, he is better known for his cynical and world-weary *lyric poems recounting human vanity and the futility of life, e.g. "On the Life of Man," "The Lie," "Nature that washed her hands in milk," and "Even such is time." A more playful poem is "The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd," a shrewd response to Christopher Marlowe's seductive "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love." Ralegh's poems circulated in ms. and also appeared in various miscellanies of the late 16th and early 17th cs., most notably the popular The Phoenix Nest (1593).

In Thomas Hoby's 1561 trans. of Baldassare Castiglione's Il Cortegiano (The Courtier), the premier handbook for Ren. courtiers, Castiglione advises courtiers "to practice in all things a certain sprezzatura [nonchalance], so as to conceal all art and make whatever is done or said appear to be without effort and almost without any thought about it." It is this quality exactly that describes the poetry and prose—and indeed, the person—of Philip Sidney (1554–86). Born to enormous power and privilege, Sidney was politically ambitious as well as a champion of the Eng. lang. and a great patron of fellow poets. His own poetry and prose circulated in ms. in the 1570s and 1580s, entertaining and inspiring an elite circle of readers, incl. his younger sister, Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke, who soon became a poet in her own right. Sidney dedicated to Mary the Old Arcadia (also known as The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia), a prose romance bejeweled with 78 lyric poems, incl. the beautiful double *sestina "Ye Goteherd Gods." In 1579, Sidney circulated his rhetorically dashing Defence of Poesy (1595; also called An Apology for Poetry) in which he refutes charges against poetry (and lit. in general) with sparkling logic, learning, and wit.

Sidney's most influential work is his sequence of sonnets and songs Astrophil and Stella, consisting of 108 mostly Petrarchan sonnets and 11 songs in various forms. Astrophil (lover of stars) woos and muses on Stella (star), representing ever-changing states of mind and a sophisticated literary self-consciousness. Petrarch's Canzoniere is the prototype for Sidney's sequence, but Astrophil's passion takes place in the present-day Elizabethan court, and Stella is well aware that she is being pursued. Astrophil's voice is youthful, energetic, ironic, playful, defiant, self-mocking—and ultimately dejected. Astrophil and Stella caused a stir when it appeared in print in 1591 after Sidney's premature death, prompting the publication of numerous sonnet sequences during that last decade of the century, incl. Samuel Daniel's Delia (1592), Michael Drayton's Idea's Mirror (1594), and Spenser's aforementioned Amoretti (1595).

It was most likely within this decade as well that William Shakespeare (1564–1616) wrote most or all of the sonnets that would be published in 1609, probably surreptitiously, under the title Shakespeare's Sonnets. This text is not only the most innovative and psychologically complex of all the sonnet sequences but also arguably one of the greatest collections of lyric poems in Eng. Developing further the Eng. sonnet first established by Surrey, Shakespeare represents the mind in many moods and patterns of thought. His sonnets do not sound like imitations of other sonnets but instead seem driven by lived—and living—experience. Vulnerability, anxiety, longing, rejection, confidence, disgust, worldliness, anger, regret, hope, jealousy, and depression are all palpable at various points in the sequence. In many of the poems, the speaker tries to meet his most profound challenge, confronting the ravages of time and the facts of mortality; as he says succinctly in sonnet 64, "Ruin has taught me thus to ruminate, / That time will come and take my love away." These confrontations are esp. moving because Shakespeare's speaker does not seek conventional consolations nor defer to religious views. He is not dismissively cynical but unrelentingly analytical and self-scrutinizing. His sonnets revise and explore themselves before our eyes, and repeatedly they implicate us, the readers of the future, for the beloved can only live on in the poem's lines "as long as men can breathe, and eyes can see."

Shakespeare's sonnets are also unconventional because the poet-lover addresses not a lady but a beloved young man (in sonnets 1–126), and when he does address a lady (in sonnets 127–52), we learn quickly that she is neither ideal nor unattainable; to the contrary, she and the poet-lover are sexual partners. With pleas, praise, questions, accusations, confessions, and hard-won yet unresolved insight, the speaker represents the crises of intimacy and identity provoked by these relationships.

The sonnet sequence was not the only popular genre of the 1590s. Also popular were long narrative poems based on erotic tales in cl. (usually Ovidian) mythology, called epyllia* by 19th-c. scholars. The best of these are Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis (1593) and The Rape of Lucrece (1594), and Christopher Marlowe's unfinished Hero and Leander (1598). Venus (99 stanzas of ababcc iambic pentameter) and Hero (409 *heroic couplets) are masterpieces of lush, seductive storytelling, dazzling rhet., erotic tension, and comedic use of syntax, meter, and rhyme. Lucrece, 265 stanzas of rhyme royal, is all these things but in a darker key.

Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke (1561–1621), was the most accomplished female writer of the 16th c. She translated Petrarch's Trionfo della Morte (Triumph of Death) into Eng. terza rima and Robert Garnier's Antonius, A Tragœdie (1592) into Eng. blank verse. Antonius probably influenced Elizabeth Cary, Lady Faulkland (1585–1639) in her writing of the *closet drama, The Tragedy of Mariam (1613), the first original blank-verse play by an Englishwoman. Pembroke's greatest achievement was her completion of a trans. of the Psalms begun by her brother Philip Sidney, who had translated 43 of the psalms by the time of his death. Pembroke translated the remaining 107 psalms, incl. the 22 poems that make up Psalm 119. She was meticulous in her consultation of sources in Eng., Fr., and Lat., but she artfully cast the psalms into varying Eng. forms and meters and wove into the poems her own sensibility and arguably female perspective. Her psalms, thus, convey both deference and boldness, scholarship and innovation. Particularly interesting are the two original dedicatory poems that survive with one ms. copy of the sequence. In "Even now that care," the more formal of the two, Pembroke addresses Queen Elizabeth. In "To the Angell Spirit of the most excellent Sir Philip Sidney," she addresses her late brother's spirit—at least, she begins to, but images of his death interrupt her, and she finds herself conjuring not Philip's spirit but her own memory. She struggles to resume her dedication, succeeds somewhat, but again is distracted by grief and self-doubt. Throughout the poem, Pembroke's anguished longing flares up as she strives to maintain the dedication's lofty diction and apparent purpose. The result is a compelling poetic voice. Although not published until the 19th c., the Sidney Psalter circulated widely in its own time. John Donne, among many poets influenced by the text, praised the siblings' collaboration in his poem, "Upon the Translation of the Psalms by Sir Philip Sidney, and The Countess of Pembroke" (1621). Other important poets influenced by the psalter include Aemilia Lanyer, George Herbert, Henry Vaughan, and John Milton.

Among the poets Pembroke invited into her circle of *patronage was Daniel (1562–1619), who addressed his sonnet sequence Delia (1592) to Pembroke herself. Daniel also wrote A Defence of Ryme (1603) in which he celebrates the Eng. lang. and the poetic forms it generates, not only praising the sensual pleasures of lang. but associating these pleasures with reason, judgment, and memory. Daniel's essay is an answer to the somber tract Observations in the Arte of English Poesie (1602) by a young and temporarily didactic Thomas Campion (1567–1620), who, at that point in his career, advocated writing Eng. poetry in "numbers"—quantitative meter, as in Lat. (see CLASSICAL PROSODY, QUANTITY). Happily for readers and listeners, Campion did not spend much more time in theoretical arguments. He wrote instead some of the most beautiful unrhyming and rhyming Eng. lyrics in his age, many of which he set to music.

In the rapidly growing city of London in the last decades of the 16th c., the art and business of theater took root and flourished. Each week, thousands of Londoners (up to 15,000 by one estimate) visited worlds beyond their own, witnessed human character and conflict on a grand scale, and listened to thousands of lines of poetry. Some plays were written in prose, but predominantly, they were written in iambic pentameter, usually in blank verse. Able to represent a person thinking or speaking in a fairly natural yet elevated way, iambic pentameter developed in lyric, narrative, and dramatic genres at once.

In 1587, the tempestuous university wit Marlowe (1564–93) transfixed audiences with the blank verse of his two-part tragedy Tamburlaine the Great. In the next few years, until his death in a tavern brawl at age 29, Marlowe confirmed his place as the Elizabethans' most exciting dramatist with a series of highly successful plays: Doctor Faustus (written ca. 1588), The Jew of Malta (written 1589), and Edward II (written ca. 1593). Marlowe's protagonists compelled audiences with their self-aggrandizing speeches replete with Latinate polysyllabic words and sweeping metaphors, all in thundering *end-stopped iambic pentameter. Marlowe was the star poet-playwright when Shakespeare arrived on the scene in the late 1580s or early 1590s. The rivalry that ensued benefited both dramatists and, of course, their audiences. At Marlowe's death, Shakespeare had written seven plays. He would write almost 30 more.

In the early plays, Shakespeare's lines are frequently end-stopped like Marlowe's. Unlike Marlowe's, Shakespeare's lines also sometimes rhyme, particularly when love-struck characters strive to woo—in Love's Labour's Lost (written 1594–95), A Midsummer Night's Dream (written 1595–96), As You Like It (written 1599–1600), and Much Ado About Nothing (written 1598–99), e.g. In Romeo and Juliet (written 1594–95), the star-crossed lovers create a sonnet when they first speak with each other (1.5.93–106). Dialogue in later plays rarely rhymes, but magic spells, riddles, and *chants surely do (witness Macbeth [written 1605–6], or The Tempest [written 1611]), and rhyming songs can be found in nearly every play, from *lullabies to drinking songs to country ballads at sheep-shearing festivals.

As his career progressed, Shakespeare explored with increasing nuance the expressive possibilities of blank verse, esp. *enjambment. The result is a poetry that highlights the stops and starts of troubled thought, the momentum of suspicion, ambition, or anger, the questions and obsessions of grief or love, and subtle degrees of understanding, cooperation, curiosity, tension, or antagonism between characters. Esp. in later plays—King Lear (written 1606), Antony and Cleopatra (written 1606–7), The Tempest, The Winter's Tale (written 1611–12), and others, Shakespeare's enjambments are as powerful as John Milton's will be in Paradise Lost.

In his plays as in his sonnets, Shakespeare demonstrates fluency in the *diction, idioms, and rhetorical styles heard in many venues of the day, from street to court, village to university, craftsman's shop to merchant's office—and with these, a heightened perception of political, social, and esp. interpersonal contexts for lang. This fluency and perception yield a wide range of complex, credible characters and perpetual metaphoric richness.

In the late 1590s, the brilliant and irascible Ben Jonson (1572–1637) established himself as a superb writer of satiric comedy with Every Man in his Humour (written 1598) and Every Man out of his Humour (written 1599). His numerous plays include the masterpieces Volpone (written 1605–6), Epicoene or the Silent Woman (written 1609–10), The Alchemist (written 1610), and Bartholomew Fair (written 1614). Jonson constructed his plays according to cl. rules for drama, but they are as urban and contemp. as can be in lang., plot, and reference.

Until the Puritans closed the theaters in 1642, many playwrights succeeded in entertaining London audiences with rousing and sometimes innovative dramatic verse, incl. John Webster (ca. 1578–1625), John Fletcher (1579–1625), Thomas Middleton (1580–1627), Philip Massinger (1583–1649), and Francis Beaumont (1584–1616). However, no plays engaged and influenced poetry as much as Shakespeare's did, and no poets beyond Shakespeare, Jonson, and, to a lesser extent, Marlowe achieved greatness as narrative or lyric poets.

As a conventional period of literary study, the 17th c. begins in 1603, the year of Queen Elizabeth I's death and King James I's accession, and runs to the Restoration in 1660, though anthols. and academic courses often follow Milton's career through the writing and publication of Paradise Lost, which closes this signal episode in Eng. lit. hist. James I was an advocate not only of plays but of *masques—lavish, symbolic court theatricals in which the nobility themselves performed. Jonson tried his hand at this genre early on in the new reign and triumphed so thoroughly that he quickly became the court's premier writer of masques, a position he held for more than two decades. With their seductive musical verse, nuanced allegory, and carefully calibrated timing and proportions, Jonson's masques established a new standard in the genre.

As a lyric poet, Jonson modeled himself on his beloved Gr. and Roman poets, favoring their genres of *epigram and satire and alluding to them frequently. His poems evoke ease and polish whether reflecting on personal struggles or making social overtures. In elegies for his children, "On My First Son" (1616) and "On My First Daughter" (1616), he is earnest and vulnerable. In his epigrams, he is ironic and amused. We hear an affable, epicurean, and intermittently self-effacing voice in "Inviting a Friend to Supper" (1616) and a polished witty tone in his flattering poems to patrons, most notably his famous *country house poem "To Penshurst" (1616). In 1616, Jonson published grandly his own collected works in folio ed., making sure as Spenser always had that the importance of his work was evident in its very presentation. Seven years later, Jonson wrote a tribute to the contemporary he envied and admired most. "To the Memory of My Beloved, Master William Shakespeare, and What He Hath Left Us" appeared in the First Folio of Shakespeare's plays (1623). Aptly, he addresses Shakespeare as "Soul of the age!" and asserts, "He was not of an age, but for all time!"

John Donne (1572–1631), considered by many to be one of England's greatest poets, was born the same year as Jonson and, like Jonson, was prolific, ambitious, and often keenly satirical. Both poets were fluent in colloquial and dramatic speech. However, where Jonson's voice is measured and cultivated, Donne's is passionate, argumentative, and immediate: "For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love!" the speaker begins in one poem; "Busy old fool, unruly Sun!" in another. Donne foregrounds colloquial diction and syntax, enjambment, exclamations, imperatives, and references to the speaker's immediate surroundings. His unexpected metaphors yoke specific and abstract phenomena in contemp. science, travel and exploration, recent political and social events, and everyday objects and happenings. Critiquing the presence of these *conceits and arguments in love poetry, John Dryden accused Donne of "affecting the metaphysics." The term stuck, but not in the pejorative sense Dryden had intended (see METAPHYSICAL POETRY). In some poems, Donne's speaker swaggers and brags about sexual conquests; in some, he unleashes all his rhetorical cleverness to seduce a desired other. In many other Songs and Sonnets, his speaker attests to loving one woman profoundly and rejects the conventional dichotomies of body and soul to represent the completeness of that love. "Nothing else is," he argues in "The Sun Rising."

For practical as well as philosophical reasons, Donne converted to Anglicanism as a young man. He saw no benefit in dying for Catholicism as his uncles and brother had done. He was not eager to be an Anglican priest, but after years of struggling to support a large family (ten children at the final count) and believing, as he writes in one of his famous sermons, that "No man is an Island, entire of it self," he responded to King James I's urging that he take orders. Donne rose quickly in the church, becoming Dr. Donne, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, in his early forties and writing sermons of arresting eloquence and imagination. He also wrote some of England's greatest religious poetry, incl. the famous Holy Sonnets (1633). Petrarchan instead of Eng. in form, the octave-sestet structure of these poems dovetails with Donne's dramatic sentences: dependent clauses build in intensity; then at line nine, there is a shift to a simpler lexicon and syntax.

Although religious verse was the most conventionally acceptable kind of poetry for women to write, Aemilia Lanyer's (1569–1645) Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum (1611), a retelling of Christ's passion in stately rhyme royal with a protofeminist agenda, was anything but conventional. Appended to Salve Deus was "Description of Cookeham," a country house poem published before (and possibly written before) Jonson's "To Penshurst." In heroic couplets, Lanyer honors and mourns the house in which she spent her formative years under the guardianship of a noble family.

While the middle-class Lanyer dared enter the realm of patriarchal theology, the aristocratic Lady Mary Wroth (ca. 1587–1651) braved the male-dominated sphere of secular lit., particularly the genres popularized by her uncle Philip Sidney. Wroth wrote both the first pastoral romance and the first secular sonnet sequence to be published by a woman: The Countess of Montgomery's Urania (1621), an epic-length romance incl. more than 50 poems; and Pamphilia to Amphilanthus (1621), a Petrarchan lyric sequence of 103 sonnets and songs. Wroth also composed the unfinished but already epic-length pastoral romance Love's Victory, a sequel to Urania.

At his death, George Herbert (1593–1633) left to a friend the fate of his unknown collection of sacred poems The Temple. The volume appeared in print soon after and became so popular it was reprinted at least seven times before the end of the century. To dazzling and often haunting effect, Herbert juxtaposes ideas, events, and imagery in unexpected ways; he is as metaphysical as Donne. However, where Donne exhibits a rhetorician's persuasive intensity, Herbert gives us a storyteller's quiet magnetism, using original stanza forms, enjambment, shifting verb tenses, and other techniques to involve our attention. And while Donne speaks to and about God in urgent, sometimes violent lang., Herbert's addressing of God evokes the trust between a child and a loving parent. At the same time, Herbert conveys a profound awareness of the paradoxes involved in his project, incl. the central fact that the very medium of his relationship to God, poetry, could be merely "pretense" and "fine invention." Among Herbert's most admired poems are "The Pulley," "The Collar," "Love III," and the *technopaegnion "Easter Wings." A few of the many poets who emulated Herbert did so with skill and independence enough to forge distinctive voices of their own, particularly Henry Vaughan (1621–95), Richard Crashaw (ca. 1613–49), and Thomas Traherne (1637–74).

In contrast to Herbert, *Cavalier poets were liber-tines who admired the bawdy *classicism and elegant metrical verse of Jonson and, of course, were influenced by the sexual frankness of Donne's Songs and Sonnets. In general, they supported the institutions of King Charles I and the Anglican Church; some even fought for the king in the Civil War and fled the country during Oliver Cromwell's government. Among the best-known Cavaliers are those followers of Jonson known as the Tribe of Ben (also called Sons of Ben), incl. Robert Herrick (1591–1674), Thomas Carew (1595–1640), and John Suckling (1609–42).

Herrick was the foremost member of the tribe and wrote two spirited tributes to the elder poet. Though an Anglican preacher and author of Noble Numbers, a collection of sacred verse, Herrick was a secular poet above all. His Hesperides, the volume of poems pub. with Noble Numbers in 1648, includes some of the most joyful poetry of the century or any century—fine-tuned, playful, erotic poems often in iambic trimeter or tetrameter about the small wonders and sensual pleasures of country life, friendship, and love. The flip side of Herrick's focus on beauty and pleasure is his keen awareness of mortality, and he makes this awareness plain in numerous poems, particularly his much-anthologized "To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time" ("Gather ye rosebuds while ye may").

Katherine Philips (1632–64) was the most accomplished and admired female poet of her generation. In her poems for close female friends—e.g., "Friendship's Mystery, To my Dearest Lucasia," and "To Mrs. M.A. at Parting"—she argues in elegant metaphors that friendship between women is greater than military conquest, political power, or other measures of success in a patriarchal world. In "A Married State" she warns women about the unending the burdens that follow "love's levity." She is also known for the explicitly political "Upon the Double Murder of King Charles" and the intensely personal elegies for her infant son Hector, in which she struggles to reconcile hard facts with conventional consolation. Philips circulated her work but seems to have agreed with other intellectual women of her day, incl. her close friend, the brilliant letter writer Dorothy Osborne (1627–95), that it was unseemly for a woman to display her feelings and opinions publicly. Most likely the 1664 volume of Philips's poems was published without her knowledge.

Milton (1608–74) is universally considered one of England's greatest poets. His far-reaching imagination, tremendous ambition, profoundly sensitive ear for the music and rhythms of lang. (with echoes of Spenser and Shakespeare, yet his own synthesis and subsuming of these), and deeply considered knowledge of the Western world, particularly of biblical hist. and ancient langs. and lits., are evident already in "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity," written when Milton was 21 (see NATIVITY POEM). Other early work includes "On Shakespeare" (1632), pub. in the second folio, and "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso," companion poems in iambic tetrameter couplets addressed to Mirth and Melancholy, respectively, that reenact contrasting states of mind and ways of being. Comus, a masque performed at Ludlow Castle in 1634, anticipates major themes of Paradise Lost, incl. seduction. In "Lycidas," a pastoral elegy pub. in a 1637 volume of commemorative verses on his classmate and fellow poet Edward King, Milton questions the meaning and possibilities of life, death, poetry, pleasure, faith, fame, and authority of all kinds—literary, religious, and political. These are questions and anxieties he confronts in all his work, but always anew, with added complexity, self-consciousness, or vision. Milton makes every form he uses his own. In his sonnets, enjambment and nimble syntax sometimes double the power of words and lines, and sentences of multiple dependent clauses and interweaving rhymes draw the reader to an intense experience of thought.

Through the Civil War and Interregnum, Milton turned from poetry to political writing and action, publishing radical, influential arguments for freedom of the press, divorce, and republican government. In the first decade of the Restoration, having endured one severe loss after another (the death of both his first and second wives and an infant daughter, the loss of his eyesight, and the failure of his hopes for the revolution and republic), he wrote his first and greatest epic poem Paradise Lost. His purpose was no less than to "justify the ways of God to men," and his attempt yields a hybrid of cl. epic, Christian prophecy, and recent Brit. revolutionary hist. Since it was first printed in ten books in 1667 and then in its final form of 12 books in 1674, the epic has not failed to engage, provoke, inspire, anger, vex, and dazzle its readers. Paradise Lost gives us a Satan who says, "the mind is its own place, / And in itself can make a hell of heaven, / A heaven of hell"; a God who resembles at times King Charles I and at times Cromwell; an Adam and Eve who love each other more humanly than any god could have imagined; vivid scenes of hell, heaven, paradise, and chaos; suspenseful, persuasive dialogue, and soliloquies that expose the contradictory inner travails of the mind. In his invocations to books 1, 3, 7, and 9, Milton reflects on the project with varying degrees of confidence, ambition, humility, and doubt.

The poetic career of Milton's friend Andrew Marvell (1621–78) spanned the Civil War, Interregnum, and first two decades of the restored monarchy. Like Milton, Marvell was a worldly, multilingual scholar, poet, and statesman deeply involved in the political complexities of his day. Unlike Milton, Marvell exuded flexibility and ironic detachment in both his life and work. His sophisticated rhyming couplets, often in iambic tetrameter, contrast strikingly with Milton's late style of boldly enjambed blank verse. During the Protectorate, Milton served as Cromwell's secretary for foreign tongues and Marvell as Milton's assistant. When the Protectorate crumbled, Marvell not only evaded reprisal but became a member of Parliament and probably facilitated Milton's release from prison in 1660. Marvell's political poems—incl. commendatory verses on both Cromwell and Charles II—are polished and canny, imparting irony only to those who are looking for it. His pastoral poems—"The Garden," the group of "mower" poems, and many more—simultaneously embrace and interrogate the idea of pastoral. Marvell's love poems are frequently grouped with Donne's and described as metaphysical, a particularly apt description of Marvell's "The Definition of Love" and his tour de force, "To His Coy Mistress." In this widely anthologized poem, Marvell's speaker concludes: "though we cannot make our sun / Stand still, yet we will make him run."

IV. The Restoration and the Eighteenth Century, 1660–1789. The variety of topics and tones achieved in Restoration and 18th-c. poetry reminds us of the now-lost status of poetry in society: not only was it considered the most important genre for treating weighty matters—political, social, or religious—but it could touch the smallest events of daily life. To teach and be taught are desires that animate much Restoration and 18th-c. poetry. Many poems teach their readers how to live morally, where such instruction is often inseparable from 18th-c. readers' growing preoccupation with the search for happiness. Such guidance is heard in Samuel Johnson's (1709–1784) counsel to "raise for Good the supplicating Voice, / But leave to Heav'n the Measure and the Choice" (The Vanity of Human Wishes, 351–52 [1749]). The expanding presence of poetry coincides with a time in which poets and readers came from a wider range of social and educational backgrounds than ever before in Eng. lit. While many writers and readers knew poetry by exchanging it in ms., the availability of relatively inexpensive print materials, incl. broadsides, chapbooks, and periodicals, significantly increased poetry's accessibility to new readers eager for its pleasures and wisdom.

With Janus-faced vision, Restoration and 18th-c. writers transformed poetic practices and criteria. On the one hand, many poets attended to cl. models, as did their immediate predecessors in the Ren., and through trans. made the classics available to readers untrained in Lat. or Gr. Trans., however, was often an exercise of modernization, where the poet "imitated" the old text to make it new, renovating it to the concerns, tastes, and langs. of the present. Restoration and 18th-c. poets changed the landscape of poetry in Eng. by their experiments not only with the classics but with *kinds (e.g., the *georgic) and modes (e.g., satire). At the beginning of the period, the traditional hierarchy of kinds tied poetic achievement to difficulty: thus, an excellent pastoral, nearer the bottom of the hierarchy, could never equal an excellent epic, at the top. An easy crit. of this era's poetry is that it produced no great epic, yet this judgment resuscitates the hierarchy of poetic kinds that many poets worked to dismantle. Many of the cultural functions of epic were supplanted by the works of John Dryden (1631–1700) and Alexander Pope (1688–1744), who translated into Eng. Virgil and Homer, respectively. Numerous writers in this era revised the functions of epic by developing the range of *mock epics, satire, and the encyclopedic quality of the long *descriptive poem in blank verse. With various genres and modes often used and modified by a single poet, this period saw the proliferation of hybrids and new kinds of poems that cumulatively reorganized and redefined poetic voice and values. The wit of Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (1681) lies as much in its verbal inventiveness as in its mixture of biblical prophecy, satire, and hist. to create didactic political allegory. The revisions of the lyric by John Wilmot, the Earl of Rochester (1647–80), turned this "lower" kind into a scathing critique of power relations, desire, and hypocrisy. Anne Finch (1661–1720) blended pastoral, "retirement" poetry, autobiography, and religious confession in "The Petition for an Absolute Retreat" (1713). Among the new generic achievements was the congregational *hymn, associated esp. with Charles Wesley (1707–88). Variations on the hymn and other religious verse are among the major accomplishments of Christopher Smart (1722–71; Jubilate Agno [written ca. 1758–63] and A Song to David [1763]) and William Cowper (1731–1800) in the Olney Hymns (1779).

Restoration and 18th-c. poets' experiments with the lyric often mix private matters with public ones. In the Restoration, the *song is the dominant kind of lyric poem and partakes of a social setting (even if on an intimate scale) in its framework of a musical performance. Similarly, the era's revisions of the *ode, originally an elevated form of the lyric intended for public occasions, rapidly expanded this kind to treat a range of more personal topics and experiences far from its traditional uses. Anne Finch's ode "The Spleen" (1701) addresses this condition, known today as depression, to pursue its "still varying" and "perplexing form." Never abandoned in the Restoration and earlier 18th c., the sonnet reemerged as an important shape for the lyric in the second half of the century. But by this time, poets were using the brevity of the form to focus less on the qualities of Petrarchan love and more on the speaker's sensitive perceptions of the landscape. In the last decades of the 18th c., Anna Seward (1742–1809) and Charlotte Smith (1749–1806) would develop the sonnet to treat a new range of topics, such as Smith's meditations on the speaker's suffering in contexts that replace Petrarchan frames with material exigencies.

Such changes in poetic kinds combined with other forces to further the inclusiveness of poetry. One of the era's most transformative values is its fascination with occasions. Tuned to large and small events, occasional poetry articulates affairs of state (e.g., Dryden's Annus Mirabilis, 1667) or affairs of the day (e.g., John Winstanley's "To the Revd. Mr— on his Drinking Sea-Water," 1751). Poetry's role in affairs of state did not deter women writers from engaging in the same, as seen in Anna Letitia Barbauld's (1743–1825) "Corsica" (1773). Critiques of gender norms and patriarchy invoked poetry's role as a vehicle of political and social intervention (e.g., Mary Collier's The Woman's Labour [1739]). Concern with social and political issues informed the extraordinary satires of this era. Even an incomplete roll call reminds us of the heterogeneity in topic and tone of these works: Rochester's "Upon Nothing" (1679), Aphra Behn's "The Disappointment" (1680), Dryden's "MacFlecknoe" (1682), Jonathan Swift's "Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift" (1739), Pope's Dunciad (final version, 1743), Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's Six Town Eclogues (printed in part 1716, in full 1747), Mary Leapor's "Man the Monarch" (1751), and Charles Churchill's Night (1761).

Writers changed the practice and values of poetry by experimenting with kinds as well as with the *couplet and blank verse. Couplets could continue for short or long *verse paragraphs, conveying complex arguments where structures within the couplet enabled *amplification, example, *antithesis, and *parallelism. With couplets, writers could achieve the clarity, formality, and lapidary compression that suited the poet's public voice and role in affairs of state. Just as effectively, couplets evoked the cadences of conversation or jaunty humor that made poetry and daily life inseparable for those who could write or read it. In his extraordinary dexterity with the couplet, Pope reveals the invisible sylphs: "Transparent forms, too fine for mortal sight, / Their fluid bodies half dissolv'd in light" (The Rape of the Lock 2.59–62 [1714]). In "Eloisa to Abelard" (printed in different versions 1712–17), his couplets express the force of Eloisa's desperate command to Abelard: "Come, if thou dar'st, all charming as thou art! / Oppose thy self to heav'n; dispute my heart; / Come, with one glance of those deluding eyes, / Blot out each bright Idea of the skies" (281–84).

Blank verse offered a flexible form different from the couplet but also allowed for any number and size of verse paragraphs. James Thomson's (1700–48) expansive blank verse and richly descriptive diction in The Seasons (first printed in its entirety in 1730) demonstrated that the seriousness and beauty of the form was not confined to Milton's achievement in his major poems. In The Task (1785), Cowper's blank verse is as various as the kinds and modes from which he borrows. He layers the tones of stately pronouncement, compassion, satiric attack, and prophetic warning in this description of urban poverty: "'Tis the cruel gripe / That lean hard-handed poverty inflicts, / The hope of better things, the chance to win, / The wish to shine, the thirst to be amused, / That at the sound of Winter's hoary wing, / Unpeople all our counties, of such herds / Of flutt'ring, loit'ring, cringing, begging, loose / And wanton vagrants, as make London, vast / And boundless as it is, a crowded coop" (3.826–34).

Elastic forms and genres for varied subjects complemented the era's changing aesthetic values. The *verse epistle is an important case where genre and relation—the letter—are also an aesthetic value that was for the first time fully developed in Eng. by poets in this era. Unrestricted by "high" or "low" subject matter, the verse epistle values sociable exchange, but it esp. explores how the "private" can be read by the "public" to assert the relations between these domains (e.g., "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot," 1735). The epistolary poet expects, or imagines, that the reader can write back, and although such a sense of conversation and participation is often elite, it epitomizes how so many poems were written and read as social actions. The verse epistle's compelling paradox of privacy and exposure was one of several means used by Restoration and 18th-c. writers to shape an aesthetics of intimacy that was also social.

Aesthetic values such as *wit, the *sublime, the *imagination, *taste, and *sensibility drove shifts in the topics, forms, and langs. of poetry. Empiricism opened worlds of sensory perceptions with widely divergent literary results, from the philosophical and sexual libertinism of the Restoration to the cult of sensibility associated esp. with the middle and end of the 18th c. The lang. of the senses draws much into its orbit in the era's poems of natural description. In Finch's "A Nocturnal Reverie" (1713), the senses work with animating imagination to describe the moment "When in some River, overhung with Green, / The waving Moon and trembling Leaves are seen" (9–10). Thomson's The Seasons explores the processes of *nature that include the human and divine but could not have been so expressed without empirical attention to detail: "Th' uncurling Floods, diffus'd / In glassy Breadth, seem thro' delusive Lapse / Forgetful of their Course. 'Tis Silence all, / And pleasing Expectation" (Spring, 159–62). In "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (1750) by Thomas Gray (1716–71), the fading of "the glimmering landscape on the sight" turns the speaker toward the air, which "a solemn stillness holds," and the sounds of twilight "where the beetle wheels his droning flight" (5, 6, 7). As poets looked at and listened to the world around them, they also saw and heard themselves: a heightened self-consciousness about perception and creative processes gives the faculty of *imagination supreme power in Mark Akenside's (1721–70) The Pleasures of Imagination (1744), Joseph Warton's (1722–1800) The Enthusiast: Or, the Lover of Nature (1744), and Thomas Warton's (1728–90) The Pleasures of Melancholy (1747). Imagination shifts from its earlier sense (the common human capacity for image making) to a rarified individual talent; and genius*, long understood as something one could have or participate in, becomes a term limited to and originating in the rare artist-figure. The increasing attention to taste, often seen as an attempt to instate another form of cultural and social hierarchy on literary value in the growing print culture, likewise turned the hierarchy of poetic kinds into an inward scale where tasteful aesthetic judgment defined new poetic values.

The cult of sensibility, with its pendulum of self-absorption and social consciousness, privileged an individual's perceptions and feelings that could also extend to sympathy with the sufferings of those oppressed by patriarchy, poverty, or slavery (e.g., George Crabbe's [1754–1832] The Village, 1783, and Cowper's "The Negro's Complaint," 1789; see EMPATHY AND SYMPATHY). Sensibility privileged *intensity of feeling as an index of aesthetic merit—in poet and reader—and as a moral good. Readers looked anew at *oral poetry, esp. the *ballad. A fascination with "untutored" poets who possessed "natural" genius extended the langs. of and criteria for poetry. Thomas Percy's (1729–1811) Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765) heightened the interest in indigenous trads. and langs. (whether real or imagined, as in James Macpherson's [1736–96] The Works of Ossian, 1765, and Thomas Chatterton's [1752–70] Rowley poems, posthumously collected in 1777) and prepared for a growing appreciation of *dialect poetry, incl. that of Robert Burns (1759–96).

V. The Romantic Period, 1789–1830. The romantic period in Eng. poetry is traditionally considered to date from 1789, the beginning of the Fr. Revolution.

While the poetry of William Blake (1757–1827) had a modest impact when first published, Blake is now regarded as one of the most original Eng. poets and a major figure in the romantic movement. His early Songs of Innocence and of Experience (1794) foreshadowed the interest in simple lang., as well as the fascination with the imaginative world of childhood, that would later characterize the work of William Wordsworth (1770–1850) and S. T. Coleridge (1772–1834). Blake's prophetic poems, meanwhile, incl. The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1790), The Four Zoas (1797), and Milton (1804), display in extreme form the political radicalism and the visionary imagination that typify much romantic writing. The form of these later poems is also significant: written predominantly in long, unrhymed lines that resist regular meter, they anticipate the innovations of Walt Whitman.

Nearly as radical as Blake's work, and more directly influential, was Wordsworth and Coleridge's Lyrical Ballads (1798), probably the most important single volume of poetry of the romantic period. Its protagonists are rustic, often marginalized figures—vagrants, madwomen, a mentally retarded child—but they are not sentimentalized and are always treated as individuals. The poems are written, for the most part, in deliberately simple lang., avoiding the elaborate diction of much 18th-c. poetry. Wordsworth, who wrote the great majority of the volume, defended these choices in his famous Preface to the 2d ed. (1800). Perhaps the chief claim of the preface, however, is that the true importance of any situation (and of any poem) is wholly subjective, deriving from the feeling it engenders in the perceiver; poetry, then, ultimately reflects not the world but the self. This notion is exemplified by the poem commonly known as "Tintern Abbey," the last in the 1798 Lyrical Ballads, in which Wordsworth's speaker surveys a landscape, not to reveal its inherent or universal significance, but to explore its personal meanings and associations.

Most of Wordsworth's greatest poetic accomplishments are concentrated in the years immediately after Lyrical Ballads, yet they cover a wide variety of genres. His "Ode: Intimations of Immortality" (1804), like "Tintern Abbey," regrets the loss of youthful immediacy and seeks recompense in a greater sense of human sympathy. Wordsworth's masterpiece, The Prelude, was largely complete by 1805, though not pub. until after his death (1850). A blank-verse autobiographical epic, The Prelude traces the growth of the poet's mind and sensibility, exploring how his "love of nature" led to a "love of mankind." Although it follows a roughly chronological organization, the poem focuses not on what would usually be considered major life events but on what Wordsworth calls "spots of time"—moments of sudden, often fearful perception, which are not fully understood at the time and which for that very reason continue to haunt and shape the poet's imagination. Beginning in 1802, Wordsworth also began composing sonnets, a form that had been revived toward the end of the 18th c. Wordsworth's sonnets, which in their mingling of public and personal concerns harken back to those of Milton, contributed to the popularity of the form through the rest of the 19th c.

Wordsworth developed many of his theories and practices in collaboration with Coleridge. The latter's poetic output was relatively small, but his three vivid and often psychologically harrowing supernatural poems—The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798), "Kubla Khan" (1816), and "Christabel" (1816)—have bewitched generations of readers. "Christabel" also reintroduced into Eng. poetry (outside the ballad) the widespread use of *accentual verse (see CHRISTABEL METER). But Coleridge's most important contribution to Eng. poetic hist. was his devel., in such pieces as "The Eolian Harp" (1795) and "Frost at Midnight" (1798), of the *conversation poem—short, blank-verse lyrics characterized by their colloquial style, which prefigure the dramatic monologues of the Victorians.

The next generation of romantic poets appealed to their readers' emotions even more directly than Wordsworth and Coleridge had, while at the same time exhibiting a keener sense of irony and skepticism. Felicia Hemans (1793–1835), for instance, won tremendous popularity with her early poems of passion and patriotism, but her most important work, Records of Woman (1828), mingles these themes with a more critical view of the trials faced by women throughout hist. Lord Byron (1788–1824), meanwhile, first achieved fame with the publication of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1812), the eponymous hero of which is brooding and passionate, yet at the same time world-weary and cynical. This figure of the so-called Byronic hero, who was quickly identified with the poet himself, reappears under various names in a series of Orientalist romances (The Giaour, 1813; The Corsair, 1814) that won Byron adulation throughout Europe. But Byron's greatest work by far was his last, the sprawling comic picaresque Don Juan (1819–24), left unfinished at his death. Irreverent (even blasphemous) and sentimental at once, Don Juan set new standards both for satire and for narrative in Eng. poetry.

Byron's friend P. B. Shelley (1792–1822) was, with Blake, the most radical and politically engaged of the romantic poets, although his poetry, like Blake's, tends toward metaphysical abstraction, even in such an explicitly topical work as the populist Mask of Anarchy (1832). Much of Shelley's best poetry (incl. the Mask) went unpublished in his lifetime, as did his brilliant critical treatise A Defence of Poetry (1840), which defines the act of poetic composition as a noble but ultimately futile attempt to recapture an original moment of fleeting inspiration. The same theme, of the idealistic pursuit of evanescent beauty, informs Shelley's finest lyric poems, incl. "Hymn to Intellectual Beauty" (1817) and "To a Skylark" (1820), as well as his great allegorical narratives, such as "Alastor" (1816). Shelley's full powers are on display in "Adonais" (1821), his elegy for John Keats, which while eschewing religious consolation (Shelley being a self-proclaimed atheist) expresses a deep faith in the ability of the human imagination to transcend all things, incl. death.

Keats (1795–1821), the latest born as well as the shortest lived of the major Eng. romantics, developed with astonishing rapidity over the course of his brief career. The lushly sensuous lyrics of his first volume of poems (1817) and his extended cl. reverie Endymion (1818) display enormous promise, often self-consciously: many of Keats's early sonnets, such as "On First Looking into Chapman's Homer" (1817), candidly describe his eager poetic ambition. That promise found fulfillment in the handful of masterpieces Keats went on to compose before tuberculosis rendered him too weak to write, most of which were published in his final volume of verse (1820). These include two romances, "Lamia" and "The Eve of St. Agnes," both rich in brilliant description, which explore the troubled interaction between the world as we know it and the immortal world of dreams; and Hyperion, a powerful epic fragment in Miltonic style. The most enduring works of Keats's final period are his great odes—incl. "Ode to Psyche," "Ode on a Grecian Urn," "Ode to a Nightingale," and "To Autumn"—which in controlled yet richly textured lang. explore the pains and challenges of mortal life and the ability of art to redeem or overcome them. Although he died in relative obscurity, Keats gained a devoted following, which has increased ever since, through the sheer beauty of his poetry; and his unstinting commitment to (in his words) "a life of sensations rather than of thoughts" has earned him a place beside Wordsworth as an archetype of the romantic poet.

VI. The Victorian Period, 1830–1900. By the time Queen Victoria came to the throne in 1837, almost all the major romantic poets had either died or ceased writing their best poetry. The traditional division of 19th-c. Eng. poetry into "romantic" and "Victorian" (Victoria reigned until 1901) is therefore sensible, although the new generation of poets that began publishing in the 1830s remained deeply influenced by their immediate predecessors. One significant difference lay in their avoidance of the directly personal, confessional style of poetry popularized by Byron and Shelley—a reticence reflected in the early work of Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–92), who went on to become *poet laureate and a dominant figure of the period. The finest poems of his first two volumes (1830, 1833), incl. "Mariana" and "The Lady of Shalott," focus, like many romantic poems, on an isolated, introverted consciousness, but that consciousness is explicitly not the poet's own. This preference for displaced self-consciousness led Tennyson shortly afterward to develop (at the same time as Robert Browning, but independently) the classic Victorian form of the dramatic monologue; his paired monologues "Ulysses" and "Tithonus" are exemplary of the genre.

Tennyson's greatest work was In Memoriam (1850), his hauntingly beautiful book-length elegy for his friend Arthur Hallam. In contrast to the earlier lyrics, In Memoriam is avowedly a deeply personal poem. Yet its widespread appeal—it was a best seller and quickly made Tennyson a household name—derives from its extraordinary ability to connect private grief to issues of major public concern, incl., most notably, the contemp. struggle between traditional religious faith and mod. scientific discoveries. Tennyson's later achievements include Maud (1855), a sensational narrative in the spasmodic mode conveyed entirely through lyrics (see SPASMODIC SCHOOL), and Idylls of the King (1859–85), a 12-book, blank-verse epic recounting the rise and (more successfully) decline of King Arthur's Camelot.

Robert Browning (1812–89) is often paired with Tennyson as the representative Victorian poet, but his reputation came late because of the frequent obscurity of his poetry. Browning's reputation today rests almost entirely on his dramatic monologues, of which he is the acknowledged master. His early monologues ("My Last Duchess," 1842; "The Bishop Orders His Tomb," 1845) tend to feature vivid, often grotesque speakers who reveal more about themselves than they intend and frequently undermine their own purpose in speaking. The *irony is gentler in the mature monologues of his two most important collections, Men and Women (1855) and Dramatis Personae (1864), which include such psychologically nuanced portraits as "Andrea del Sarto" and "Rabbi Ben Ezra." Browning's experiments with the dramatic monologue culminate in his most ambitious work, the epic-length The Ring and the Book (1868–69), in which the story of an obscure 17th-c. murder case is retold from nine viewpoints. In its characterization of the speakers and protagonists, the poem, which finally won Browning his overdue recognition, reaches a Shakespearean pitch of complexity and profundity.

When Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806–61) married Robert Browning in 1846, her reputation far exceeded his, and it grew even greater with the publication of her Sonnets from the Portuguese (1850), which was written during their courtship. Sonnets from the Portuguese (the title is deliberately misleading: the poems are not trans.) is the first amatory sonnet sequence in Eng. since the Ren. and represents a brilliant contribution to, and revision of, the genre. Just as impressive is Browning's experimental verse novel about a professional woman writer, Aurora Leigh (1856). Alongside these longer works, Browning produced lyric poems on a wide range of social and political issues, incl. child labor, the It. struggle for independence, and most movingly abolition ("The Runaway Slave at Pilgrim's Point"). Her poetry was a major source of inspiration for a younger generation of women, incl. Christina Rossetti, Augusta Webster, and, in the U.S., Emily Dickinson.

Religious faith and its mod. vicissitudes form a recurrent concern of mid-Victorian poetry. Much of Matthew Arnold's (1822–88) best poetry, such as "The Scholar-Gipsy," laments the aimlessness of mod. life, esp. the loss of a simple, reliable religious faith (notably in "Stanzas from the Grande Chartreuse" and "Dover Beach"). Arnold's friend A. H. Clough (1819–61) also wrote extensively about a rapidly secularizing world—although his most accomplished poem, the urbane epistolary romance Amours de Voyage (1855), is in a very different vein. Christina Rossetti (1830–94), by contrast, maintained a devout Anglo-Catholic faith, which is reflected in her large body of typically brief, breathtakingly understated religious lyrics. Her best-known and most original poem, however, Goblin Market (1862), though it has religious overtones, differs sharply from the majority of her work. Cast as a children's fairy tale, yet filled with surprisingly graphic violence and sexuality, it remains one of the era's most fascinating works. Similarly devout but of a very different texture are the poems of the Jesuit G. M. Hopkins (1844–89), which, when finally pub. in 1918, had a profound impact on modernist poetics. Hopkins's highly original experiments with what he called sprung rhythm*, together with his heavy use of alliteration, neologism, and knotty syntax, lend his poems of religious praise and occasional religious despair (the so-called terrible sonnets) extraordinary force and conviction.

Some Victorian poetry aimed at realism, incl. E. B. Browning's Aurora Leigh and George Meredith's (1828–1909) Modern Love (1862), a subversive sonnet sequence (the "sonnets" have 16 lines) detailing the breakdown of a marriage. But realism was mostly ceded to the increasingly dominant genre of the novel, while poetry moved in an opposite direction. Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828–82), for instance, the brother of Christina and one of the founders of the *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood of painters (see PRE-RAPHAELITISM), extended the often ornate, medievalizing style of his painting to his poetry as well; his sonnet sequence The House of Life (1881) contrasts with Meredith's in its heavy use of allegory. William Morris (1834–96), another member of the Pre-Raphaelite circle, wrote primarily on legendary themes, recounting stories from the Arthurian trad. and, more unusually, from Norse sagas. Perhaps the most significant poet of this group was the spectacularly talented A. C. Swinburne (1837–1909), whose celebrations of pagan sensuality were partly inspired by the work of the Fr. poet Charles Baudelaire (see FRANCE, POETRY OF; SYMBOLISM), but whose style of fluid verbal and imagistic profusion is all his own.

Influenced by these precedents, as well as by the theories of Walter Pater, poets of the aesthetic movement of the 1880s and 1890s (incl. Oscar Wilde, Ernest Dowson, Michael Field, and the young William Butler Yeats) turned away from the moral and social concerns of much mid-Victorian verse to concentrate on the cultivation of beauty for its own sake (see AESTHETICISM). The most enduring work from the end of the century, however, is A. E. Housman's (1859–1936) A Shropshire Lad (1896), a collection of deceptively simple, deeply melancholic lyrics of pastoral nostalgia. A similarly melancholy pessimism, though more ironic, marks the poetry of Thomas Hardy (1840–1928), who is usually classed (and who classed himself) as a Victorian poet, even though the majority of his poems were written in the 20th c. Hardy's verse is characterized by idiosyncratic vocabulary and often contorted syntax reminiscent of Robert Browning. His finest work, a series of elegies for his late wife titled Poems of 1912–13, looks back even more to In Memoriam—but, crucially, without the ultimately consolatory faith and resolution displayed by Tennyson's poem 60 years earlier. The fracturing of faith and form, which had been foreshadowed by Tennyson and which grew more pronounced across the Victorian period, prepared the way for the major poetic devels. of the 20th c.

VII. Modernism to the Present, from 1901. From Hardy's pessimistic belated romanticism to the aestheticism (tinged with Ir. cultural nationalism) of the early Yeats (1865–1939), the voices of the early 20th c. remained rooted in 19th-c. styles and concerns, accommodating changing historical circumstances in contradictory ways. Rudyard Kipling (1865–1936) projected an expansive view of Eng. imperial culture, while others reconsidered the domestic fate of received forms. Robert Bridges (1844–1930) explored the syllabic resources of traditional prosodies and introduced sprung rhythm through the posthumous publication of Hopkins. Anthologized between 1911 and 1922, Georgian poets included such popular figures as Walter de la Mare (1873–1956) and John Masefield (1878–1967), as well as D. H. Lawrence (1885–1930; see GEORGIANISM). Georgian anthols. also introduced a generation of writers best known for increasingly bitter depictions of World War I (1914–18). Moving from Rupert Brooke's (1887–1915) patriotic sonnets and Edward Thomas's (1878–1917) ambivalent *bucolics to the pointed ironies of Siegfried Sassoon (1886–1967) and Wilfred Owen (1893–1918), *war poetry progressively deployed the resources of 19th-c. lyricism to call its underlying values into question, systematically turning experience against inherited notions of beauty.

Gathering force before the war and consolidating an ambitious aesthetic program after it, *modernism assailed such values comprehensively, introducing new forms and subjects, often challenging conventional distinctions between verse and prose. Fusing the influence of Fr. symbolism after Baudelaire and Gustave Flaubert with the iconoclasm of later *avant-gardes such as F. T. Marinetti's It. *futurism, early modernists such as T. E. Hulme (1883–1917) and F. S. Flint (1885–1960) rejected expressive rhetorical modes in favor of a spare free verse predicated on the image (see IMAGISM). Codified in the manifestos and prosodic experiments of the Am. Ezra Pound (1885–1972), early modernism absorbed the influence of historically distant forms (such as the Occitan trobar clus and the Chinese *ideogram) and registered shifts under way in other arts, from painting and sculpture to architecture and music. The Poundian avant-garde (captured in Wyndham Lewis's journal Blast (1914; see VORTICISM) traded insular frames of reference for the expatriate's cosmopolitan London, attuned to multiple trads. and langs. and populated by artists from Ireland, North America, and Europe, working in every medium. Before memorializing his departure from London with Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (1920) and embarking on The Cantos, Pound consolidated extensive networks of literary magazines significantly dedicated to new poetry. The open forms most identified with a modernist style have never been uncontroversial, often associated with Am. rather than Brit. idioms, but may nonetheless be found in figures as various as Edith Sitwell (1887–1964) and Mina Loy (1882–1966).

Pound also impressed his influence on the work of Yeats and of contemporaries such as James Joyce (1882–1941) and T. S. Eliot (1888–1965). High modernism of the early interwar years aspired to more monumental forms, culminating in the publication (in Paris) of Joyce's Ulysses (1922). Poetically, the period is galvanized by the austere turn of Yeats's most anthologized work, driven to explicitly political and philosophical themes from The Wild Swans at Coole (1919) to The Tower (1928). The pressures of Ir. politics and the emergent Free State pervade "Easter, 1916" and "Meditations in Time of Civil War" (1923) while "Leda and the Swan" (1928) and "The Second Coming" (1920) link social turbulence to the esoteric historical views propounded in A Vision (1925) and adduced as artistic models in "Among School Children" (1926) and "Sailing to Byzantium" (1927). Uniting private mythology with an insistently public and prophetic voice, the stark verse of Yeats's late serial epitaphs such as "Under Ben Bulben" (1939) and "The Circus Animals' Desertion" (1939) projects an oracular shadow over later Eng. and Ir. poets alike.

It was Eliot, however, who most decisively shaped the period's aesthetic as poet, critic, and later ed. at Faber and Faber, still England's premier poetic imprint. Prufrock and Other Observations (1917) decomposed the form of the dramatic monologue in a fragmented arrangement of densely orchestrated figures and rhythms, stylistically derived from Stéphane Mallarmé, Jules Laforgue, and Eng. metaphysical poetry but set against the mundane scenes of the mod. city. This effect was heightened in "Gerontion" (1920), which maintained the monologue's shape but abandoned any single identifiable voice, while other poems from Ara Vos Prec (1919) explored the satiric possibilities of stricter forms, inspired by Théophile Gautier's quatrains (see PARNASSIANISM). Eliot's resonant musical conception of free verse, designed not to displace meter and rhyme but rather to restore their harmonic variety and intensity, sought to create an impersonal classicism capable of rendering the "simultaneous existence" and "simultaneous order" of "the whole of the literature of Europe from Homer," as he writes in "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919). For Eliot, "poets in our civilization, as it exists at present, must be difficult. . . . The poet must become more and more comprehensive, more allusive, more indirect, in order to force, to dislocate if necessary, lang. into his meaning" ("The Metaphysical Poets," 1921). The Waste Land (1922) enacted this argument poetically. Compressed to 434 lines by Pound's severe editing, Eliot's masterpiece discarded unities of narrative and voice, compiling allusive fragments of other texts into an intricate depiction of London and interwar Europe. Setting refrains from Dante, Baudelaire, and Richard Wagner alongside an array of mythic elements and demotic passages, the poem paradoxically shored fragments against ruins, juxtaposing haunting signs of cultural sterility with a rich archive of elusive critical meanings, buttressed by Eliot's own (often ironic) annotations. Eliot's Anglican conversion is reflected in Ash Wednesday (1930) and in the looser meditative tone of Four Quartets (1936–42), concerned with theological problems of time and hist. and, in "Little Gidding" (1942), with the searing experience of the second war.

The 1930s witnessed ambivalent reactions to modernism's recondite styles, most notably in the work of W. H. Auden (1907–73) and the poets around him: Cecil Day-Lewis (1904–72), Stephen Spender (1909–95), and Louis MacNeice (1907–63). Radicalized to varying degrees by the influence of Karl Marx and Sigmund Freud and by the decade's political and economic crises, Auden's generation balanced traditional forms against contemp. subject matter. The terse lyricism of Auden's (usually untitled) early poems and the political urgency of longer works such as The Orators (1932) gave way to more resigned tones by the decade's end. MacNeice's Autumn Journal (1939) and Auden's Another Time (1940) record the turn of the Spanish Civil War and the more general Eur. collapse before an ascendant Fascism. Auden's emigration to the United States prompted a series of more meditative volumes, often preoccupied with religious and philosophical matters: New Year Letter (1941), For the Time Being (1945), The Age of Anxiety (1947). Elsewhere, the 1930s saw the devel. of modernist tendencies in other directions. Hugh MacDiarmid (pseud. of Christopher Grieve, 1892–1978), the leading voice of the Scottish renaissance, adapted *collage forms into Scots with A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle (1926) and mingled nationalist and communist programs through In Memoriam James Joyce (1955). David Jones (1895–1974) probed Welsh lang. and culture to explore the memory of war with In Parenthesis (1937) and Catholic liturgy in The Anathémata (1952).

With Yeats's death, Eliot's increasing reticence, and Auden's departure, mid-century poetry lost its guiding authorities. The light verse of John Betjeman (1906–84) and exuberant neoromanticism of Dylan Thomas (1914–53) gathered popular followings but never defined durable trajectories, while singular figures such as R. S. Thomas (1913–2000) in Wales and Norman MacCaig (1910–1996) and W. S. Graham (1918–1986) in Scotland received less popular attention. The definition of a recognizable postwar style instead fell to the *Movement, comprising the poets grouped around Philip Larkin (1922–84) in anthols. of the 1950s, incl. Donald Davie (1922–95), Kingsley Amis (1922–95), Elizabeth Jennings (1926–2001), and Thom Gunn (1929–2004). Explicitly rejecting both modernist obscurantism and neoromanticism in favor of accessible plain speech, the Movement sought to restore insular trads. (championing Hardy, e.g.). The wry postimperial sensibility of the Movement lyric as perfected by Larkin uses insistently regular stanzas and meters to measure the ironic distance between a rich cultural heritage and the diminished realities of postwar social life. Poems such as "Church Going" (1954) and "The Whitsun Weddings" (1958) adopt a detached but elegiac attitude toward increasingly anachronistic rituals, while later pieces like "High Windows" (1967) exploit and preserve a tension between apparently degraded everyday speech and scattered moments of vision that it fails to eclipse.

Resistance to the Movement's perceived gentility, polemically intimated in The New Poetry (1962, 1966), catalyzed more expansive styles in succeeding generations, often receptive to both traditional and modernist formal practices. Ted Hughes (1930–98) developed a distinctively bardic voice, grounded in the immediacy of an often ruthless nature. Volumes from The Hawk in the Rain (1957) to Crow (1970) use animals to conjure scenes of primal violence and transformation, while later sequences concentrate on the slower rhythms of rural life at the fringe of mod. devel. Hughes's extremity is perhaps matched only by that of Sylvia Plath (1932–63), whose posthumous Ariel (1965) fuses confessional and naturalist elements with nightmarish visions of 20th-c. hist. Jon Silkin (1930–97) and Charles Tomlinson (b. 1927) have suffused a deep awareness of Eng. lit. hist. with the influence of other cultural and poetic trads. Roy Fisher (b. 1930) has adapted collage techniques to an ongoing excavation of his native Birmingham. The densely textured lang. of Geoffrey Hill (b. 1932), developed in King Log (1968) and Mercian Hymns (1971), turns Eliotic difficulty to the work of historical meditation and recovery, mixed in later volumes with implacable strains of religious and political prophecy. Tony Harrison (b. 1937) has infused the precision of modernist classicism with an unsparing political urgency, anchored in the perspective of working-class Leeds.

The Brit. Poetry Revival of the late 1960s and early 1970s saw the resurgence of more distinctly experimental strains, resistant to mainstream conventions and enabled by the proliferation of loosely affiliated networks of small presses. With the appearance of his late masterpiece Briggflatts (1966), the spare but sonorous musicality of Northumbrian modernist Basil Bunting (1900–85) inspired an eclectic array of younger poets, as did a host of postwar Am. and Eur. avant-gardes. Though short-lived, the revival left behind vibrant artistic scenes in northern England, in London, and in Scotland, with Edwin Morgan (1920–2010) and Ian Hamilton Finlay (1925–2006). In the work of figures from Tom Raworth (b. 1938) and Allen Fisher (b. 1944) to Maggie O'Sullivan (b. 1951), it also systematically integrated other arts and media. Elsewhere, the intensely wrought manner of J. H. Prynne (b. 1936) has fostered a range of more academic and self-consciously critical styles, garnering international interest even when resisted by the Brit. mainstream. The same synthesis of formal and conceptual rigor marks the work of younger figures from Veronica Forrest-Thomson (1947–75) to Denise Riley (b. 1948).

More general notice has gathered to poets emerging from Northern Ireland, from John Montague (b. 1929) to the group originally centered in Belfast, incl. Michael Longley (b. 1939), Derek Mahon (b. 1941), and Seamus Heaney (b. 1939), perhaps the most widely read Eng.-lang. poet of the era. Like Yeats, Heaney has synthesized and reworked Eng. and Ir. trads. alike, crafting a lyricism that simultaneously imbibes and seeks to transcend place and historical circumstance. More recently, the intricate verbal dexterity of Paul Muldoon (b. 1951), elusive syntax of Medbh McGuckian (b. 1950), and adventurous long lines of Ciaran Carson (b. 1948) have united an expansive sense of postmodern play with an often fraught sense of Ir. hist.

Recent laureates Andrew Motion (b. 1952) and Carol Ann Duffy (b. 1955) have emphasized accessibility in mainstream poetic culture, respectively recovering elements of the Movement's legacy and developing an inclusive dramatic populism alert to larger social issues. Often sustained by an expanding economy of prizes and writing programs, the New Generation of the 1990s includes Simon Armitage (b. 1963), Lavinia Greenlaw (b. 1962), Kathleen Jamie (b. 1962), and Glyn Maxwell (b. 1962), among numerous others. Furthermore, the poetic culture of the late 20th and early 21st cs. has expanded to new sites and incorporated accents from beyond the Brit. archipelago, ranging from the dub rhythms of Linton Kwesi Johnson (b. 1952) to the diasporic hists. underlying the work of David Dabydeen (b. 1955) and Grace Nichols (b. 1950).

See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE; ENGLISH PROSODY; IRELAND, POETRY OF; LATIN POETRY; MEDIEVAL POETICS; MEDIEVAL POETRY; NEOCLASSICAL POETICS; POSTCOLONIAL POETICS; PREROMANTICISM; RENAISSANCE POETICS; RENAISSANCE POETRY; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS; SCOTLAND, POETRY OF; WELSH POETRY.

■ General: T. Warton, History of English Poetry (1774–81); S. Johnson, Lives of the English Poets (1781); Brooks; S. Fish, Surprised by Sin: The Reader in "Paradise Lost" (1967); B. H. Smith, Poetic Closure (1968); H. Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence (1973); R. L. Colie, The Resources of Kind (1973); P. H. Fry, The Poet's Calling in the English Ode (1980); Attridge, Rhythms; J. A. Winn, Unsuspected Eloquence: A History of the Relations between Poetry and Music (1981); C. Ricks, The Force of Poetry (1984); Hollander; H. Vendler, Voices and Visions (1987); J. Hollander, Melodious Guile (1988); H. Vendler, The Music of What Happens (1988); C. Ricks, Essays in Appreciation (1996); S. Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002); T. Eagleton, How to Read a Poem (2007); The Oxford Handbook of the Elegy, ed. K. A. Weisman (2010). Digital Resources: Early English Books Online, http://eebo.chadwyck.com/home; Eighteenth-Century Collections Online, http://gale.cengage.co.

uk/product-highlights/history/eighteenth-century-collections-online.aspx; Orlando: Women's Writing in the British Isles from the Beginnings to the Present, http://library.mcmaster.ca/articles/orlando-womens-writing-british-isles-from-beginning-present; Perdita Manuscripts: Women Writers, 1500–1700, http://www.amdigital.co.uk/Collections/Perdita.aspx; Literature Online, http://lion.chadwyck.com; Representative Poetry Online, http://rpo.library.utoronto.ca.

■ Old English. Anthologies: Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records, ed. G. Krapp and E. Dobbie, 6 v. (1931–53); An Anthology of Old English Poetry, trans. C. W. Kennedy (1960); Poems of Wisdom and Learning in Old English, ed. and trans. T. A. Shippey (1976); The Old English Riddles of the Exeter Book, ed. C. Williamson (1977); A Choice of Anglo-Saxon Verse, ed. and trans. Richard Hamer (1981); Anglo-Saxon Poetry, trans. S.A.J. Bradley (1982); Old English Minor Heroic Poems, ed. Joyce Hill (1983); The Earliest English Poems, trans. M. Alexander (1991); The Old English Elegies, ed. A. L. Klinck (1992); Sixty-Five Anglo-Saxon Riddles, ed. and trans. L. J. Rodrigues (1998); Old and Middle English, ed. E. Treharne (2000); Eight Old English Poems, ed. J. C. Pope, rev. R. D. Fulk (2001); The Word Exchange: Anglo-Saxon Poems in Translation, ed. G. Delanty and M. Matto (2010). Criticism and History: Essential Articles for the Study of Old English Poetry, ed. J. B. Bessinger and S. J. Kahrl (1968); S. B. Greenfield, The Interpretation of Old English Poems (1972); F. C. Robinson, Beowulf and the Appositive Style (1985); S. B. Greenfield and D. G. Calder, A New Critical History of Old English Literature (1986); N. Howe, Migration and Mythmaking in Anglo-Saxon England (1989); G. R. Overing, Language, Sign, and Gender in Beowulf (1990); K. O'Brien O'Keeffe, Visible Song (1990); Old English Shorter Poems: Basic Readings, ed. K. O'Brien O'Keeffe (1994); Beowulf: Basic Readings, ed. P. S. Baker (1995); Cynewulf: Basic Readings, ed. R. E. Bjork (1996); Beowulf: A Verse Translation, ed. D. Donoghue, trans. S. Heaney (2002); The Poems of MS Junius 11, ed. R. M. Liuzza (2002); T. A. Bredehoft, Early English Metre (2005); E. M. Tyler, Old English Poetics: The Aesthetics of the Familiar (2006); J. D. Niles, Old English Heroic Poems and the Social Life of Texts (2007); R. R. Trilling, The Aesthetics of Nostalgia (2009). Digital Resources: Labyrinth: Resources for Medieval Studies, http://www8.georgetown.edu/departments/medieval/labyrinth/; Internet Medieval Sourcebook, http://www.fordham.edu/halsall/sbook.html; The Electronic Exeter Anthology of Old English Poetry: An Edition of Exeter, Dean and Chapter MS 3501 (DVD-ROM), ed. B. J. Muir (2006); Dictionary of Old English: A to G online, http://tapor.library.utoronto.ca/doe/; The Electronic Beowulf, ed. Kevin Kiernan, http://www.uky.edu/~kiernan/eBeowulf/guide.htm.; Old English Newsletter Bibliography Database, http://www.oenewsletter.org/OENDB/index.php; Norton Anthology of English Literature: Middle Ages, http://www.wwnorton.com/college/english/nael/middleages/topic_4/welcome.htm.

■ Middle English. Anthologies: Secular Lyrics of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries, ed. R. H. Robbins, 2d ed. (1955); Historical Poems of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries, ed. R. H. Robbins (1959); Early Middle English Verse and Prose, ed. J. A. W. Bennett and G. V. Smithers (1968); A. C. Spearing, Readings in Medieval Poetry (1987); Alliterative Poetry of the Later Middle Ages, ed. T. Turville-Petre (1989); A Book of Middle English, ed. T. Turville-Petre and J. A. Burrow (1996). Criticism and History: P. Dronke, The Medieval Lyric (1968); J. A. Burrow, Ricardian Poetry (1974); Middle English Alliterative Poetry and Its Literary Background, ed. D. A. Lawton (1982); A. C. Spearing, Medieval to Renaissance in English Poetry (1984); J.A.W. Bennett and D. Gray, Middle English Literature (1986); Medieval Literary Theory and Criticism, c. 1100–c. 1375, ed. A. J. Minnis and A. B. Scott (1988); P. Zumthor, Toward a Medieval Poetics, trans. P. Bennett (1992); Medieval Lyric: Genres in Historical Context, ed. W. Paden (2000); C. Chism, Alliterative Revivals (2002); The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. D. Wallace (2002). Chaucer: C. Muscatine, Chaucer and the French Tradition (1957); D. W. Robertson Jr., A Preface to Chaucer (1962); B. F. Huppé, A Reading of the "Canterbury Tales" (1964); E. T. Donaldson, Speaking of Chaucer (1970); P. M. Kean, Chaucer and the Making of English Poetry (1972); J. Mann, Chaucer and Medieval Estates Satire (1973); D. R. Howard, The Idea of the "Canterbury Tales" (1976); V. A. Kolve, Chaucer and the Imagery of Narrative (1984); C. Dinshaw, Chaucer's Sexual Poetics (1989); P. Strohm, Social Chaucer (1989); J. Fleming, Classical Imitation and Interpretation in Chaucer's "Troilus" (1990); H. Marshall Leicester, The Disenchanted Self (1990); L. Patterson, Chaucer and the Subject of History (1991); S. Lerer, Chaucer and His Readers (1993); D. Wallace, Chaucerian Polity (1997); C. Cannon, The Making of Chaucer's English (1998); K. L. Lynch, Chaucer's Philosophical Visions (2000); M. Miller, Philosophical Chaucer (2004); L. Scanlon, Narrative, Authority, and Power (2004). Fifteenth-Century Poets: A. Renoir, The Poetry of John Lydgate (1967); D. Lawton, "Dullness and the Fifteenth Century," ELH 54 (1987); D. Pearsall, "Hoccleve's Regement of Princes: The Poetics of Royal Self-Representation," Speculum 69 (1994); P. Strohm, England's Empty Throne (1998); E. Knapp, The Bureaucratic Muse (2001); J. Simpson, The Oxford English Literary History, Vol. 2: Reform and Cultural Revolution, 1350–1547 (2002); M. Nolan, John Lydgate and the Making of Public Culture (2005). Gawain-/Pearl Poet: M. Borroff, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (1962); J. A. Burrow, A Reading of "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight" (1965); L. D. Benson, Art and Tradition in "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight" (1965); L. M. Clopper, "Pearl and the Consolation of Scripture," Viator 23 (1992); A. Putter, An Introduction to the Gawain-Poet (1996); A Companion to the Gawain-Poet, ed. D. Brewer and J. Gibson (1997); M. Borroff, Traditions and Renewals (2003). Gower: R. Peck, Kingship and Common Profit in Gower's "Confessio amantis" (1987); R. F. Yeager, John Gower's Poetic (1990); J. Simpson, Sciences and the Self in Medieval Poetry (1995); D. Aers, Faith, Ethics and Church (2000); L. Staley, "Gower, Richard II, Henry of Derby, and the Business of Making Culture," Speculum 75 (2000); D. Watt, Amoral Gower: Language, Sex, and Politics (2003); P. Nicholson, Love and Ethics in Gower's "Confessio amantis" (2005). Piers Plowman: M. Bloomfield, "Piers Plowman" as a 14th-C. Apocalypse (1962); K. Kerby-Fulton, Reformist Apocalypticism and "Piers Plowman" (1990); S. Justice, Writing and Rebellion: England in 1381 (1996); E. Steiner, Documentary Culture and the Making of Medieval English Literature (2003); N. Zeeman, "Piers Plowman" and the Medieval Discourse of Desire (2006).

■ Renaissance. Anthologies: English Poetry of the Seventeenth Century, ed. G. Parfitt (1992); English Poetry of the Sixteenth Century, ed. G. Waller (1993); The Penguin Book of Renaissance Verse, ed. D. Norbrook and H. Woudhuysen (1993); Women Poets of the Renaissance, ed. M. Wynne-Davies (1999); Early Modern Women Poets, ed. J. Stevenson and P. Davidson (2001); Poetry and Revolution: An Anthology of British and Irish Verse, 1625–1660, ed. P. Davidson (2001); Sixteenth-Century Poetry, ed. G. Braden (2005); Seventeenth-Century British Poetry, 1603–1660, ed. J. Rumrich and G. Chaplin (2005); Metaphysical Poetry, ed. C. Ricks and C. Burrow (2006); The New Oxford Book of Seventeenth-Century Verse, ed. A. Fowler (2008); New Oxford Book of Sixteenth-Century Verse, ed. E. Jones (2009); Elizabeth I and Her Age, ed. S. Felch and D. Stump (2009); Women Writers in Renaissance England: An Annotated Anthology, ed. R. Martin (2010); The Broadview Anthology of British Literature: v. 2: The Renaissance and the Early Seventeenth Century, ed. J. Black et al., 2d ed. (2010). Criticism and History: S. Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning (1980); J. Guillory, Poetic Authority (1982); Re-memembering Milton: Essays on the Texts and Traditions, ed. M. Ferguson and M. Nyquist (1988); The Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. A. C. Hamilton (1990); A. R. Jones, The Currency of Eros: Women's Love Lyric in Europe, 1540–1620 (1990); The Cambridge Companion to English Poetry, Donne to Marvell, ed. T. Corns (1993); A. Marotti, Manuscript, Print, and the English Renaissance Lyric (1995); D. K. Shuger, Habits of Thought in the English Renaissance: Religion, Politics and the Dominant Culture (1997); Worldmaking Spenser: Explorations in the Early Modern Age, ed. P. Cheney and L. Silberman (1999); A. Hadfield, The English Renaissance, 1500–1620 (2000); A Companion to Early Modern Women's Writing, ed. A. Pacheco (2002); A Companion to English Renaissance Literature and Culture, ed. M. Hattaway (2002); D. Norbrook, Poetry and Politics in the English Renaissance (2002); Reading Early Modern Women, ed. H. Ostovich and E. Sauer (2002); Renaissance Poetry and Its Formal Engagements, ed. M. Rasmussen (2002); R. Smith, Sonnets and the English Woman Writer, 1560–1621 (2005); Early Modern Poetry: A Critical Companion, ed. P. Cheney, A. Hadfield, G. Sullivan (2006); J. Griffiths, John Skelton and Poetic Authority (2006); John Donne's Poetry, ed. D. Dickson (2007); A. Nicolson, Quarrel with the King: The Story of an English Family on the High Road to Civil War (2008); Aemilia Lanyer: Gender, Genre, and the Canon, ed. M. Grossman (2009); The Cambridge Companion to Early Modern Women's Writing, ed. L. Knoppers (2009); H. Dubrow, The Challenges of Orpheus: Lyric Poetry and Early Modern England (2011). Digital Resources: Voice of the Shuttle: Renaissance and Seventeenth Century, http://vos.ucsb.edu/browse.asp?id=2749; Luminarium: Renaissance and Seventeenth Century, http://www.luminarium.org; Mr. William Shakespeare and the Internet, http://shakespeare.palomar.edu/; CERES Cambridge English Renaissance Electronic Service, http://www.english.cam.ac.uk/ceres/; Norton Anthology of English Literature—16th Century and Early 17th Century, http://www.wwnorton.com/college/english/nael/welcome.htm; CRRS Centre for Reformation and Renaissance Studies, http://crrs.ca/; The Folger Shakespeare Library, http://www.folger.edu/; The English Renaissance in Context (ERIC), http://sceti.library.upenn.edu/sceti/furness/eric/index.cfm; Representative Poetry Online, http://rpo.library.utoronto.ca/display/index.cfm; John Milton—The Milton-L Home Page, https://facultystaff.richmond.edu/~creamer/milton/; The Milton Reading Room, http://www.dartmouth.edu/~milton/reading_room/contents/index.shtml; Christ's College Cambridge—400th Anniversary Celebration of Milton, http://www.christs.cam.ac.uk/milton400/index.htm; The Edmund Spenser Homepage, http://www.english.cam.ac.uk/spenser/; The Sidney Homepage, http://www.english.cam.ac.uk/sidney/index.htm.

■ Restoration and the Eighteenth Century. Anthologies: Kissing the Rod: An Anthology of Seventeenth-Century Women's Verse, ed. G. Greer et al. (1989); Eighteenth-Century Women Poets, ed. R. Lonsdale (1989); Amazing Grace: An Anthology of Poems about Slavery, 1660–1810, ed. J. G. Basker (2002); Poetry from 1660 to 1780: Civil War, Restoration, Revolution, ed. D. Wu and R. DeMaria (2002); Eighteenth-Century English Labouring Class Poets, ed. J. Goodridge et al., 3 v. (2003); The Poetry of Slavery: An Anglo-American Anthology, 1764–1865, ed. M. Wood (2003); Eighteenth-Century Poetry, ed. D. Fairer and D. Gerrard (2004); British Women Poets of the Long Eighteenth Century, ed. P. R. Backscheider and C. Ingrassia (2009); Restoration Literature, ed. P. Hammond (2009); The New Oxford Book of Eighteenth-Century Verse, ed. R. Lonsdale (2009). Criticism and History: E. Rothstein, Restoration and Eighteenth-Century Poetry, 1660–1780 (1981); J. Sitter, Literary Loneliness in Mid-Eighteenth-Century England (1982); D. B. Morris, Alexander Pope: The Genius of Sense (1984); A. Williams, Prophetic Strain: The Greater Lyric in the Eighteenth Century (1984); M. A. Doody, The Daring Muse: Augustan Poetry Reconsidered (1985); C. Gerrard, The Patriot Opposition to Walpole (1994); B. Parker, The Triumph of Augustan Poetics (1998); S. Kaul, Poems of Nation, Anthems of Empire (2000); W. J. Christmas, The Lab'ring Muses (2001); D. H. Griffin, Patriotism and Poetry in Eighteenth-Century Britain (2002); D. Fairer, English Poetry of the Eighteenth Century (2003); P. R. Backscheider, Eighteenth-Century Women Poets and Their Poetry (2005); P. Hammond, The Making of Restoration Poetry (2006); W. Overton, The Eighteenth-Century British Verse Epistle (2007); P. M. Spacks, Reading Eighteenth-Century Poetry (2009); J. Sitter, The Cambridge Introduction to Eighteenth-Century Poetry (2011). Digital Resources: Eighteenth-Century Resources, http://ethnicity.rutgers.edu/~jlynch/18th/index.html; 18thConnect, http://www.18thconnect.org; Literary Resources on the Net, http://ethnicity.rutgers.edu/~jlynch/Lit; Voice of the Shuttle, http://vos.ucsb.edu.

■ Romantic Period. Anthologies: New Oxford Book of Romantic Period Verse, ed. J. McGann (1993); English Romantic Writers, ed. D. Perkins (1995); British Literature, 1780–1830, ed. A. Mellor and R. Matlak (1996); British Women Poets of the Romantic Era, ed. P. Feldman (1997); Romantic Women Poets, ed. A. Ashfield (1998); Longman Anthology of British Literature: The Romantics and Their Contemporaries, ed. S. Wolfson and P. Manning (1999); New Penguin Book of Romantic Poetry, ed. J. and J. Wordsworth (2001); Romanticism, ed. D. Wu (2006); Romantic Poetry, ed. M. O'Neill and C. Mahoney (2008). Criticism and History: Abrams; H. Bloom, The Visionary Company (1961); G. Hartman, Wordsworth's Poetry, 1787–1814 (1964); M. H. Abrams, Natural Supernaturalism (1971); K. Kroeber, Romantic Landscape Vision (1975); M. Jacobus, Tradition and Experiment in Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads (1976); A. Mellor, English Romantic Irony (1980); J. McGann, The Romantic Ideology (1983); H. Vendler, The Odes of John Keats (1983); S. Curran, Poetic Form and British Romanticism (1986); M. Levinson, Wordsworth's Great Period Poems (1986), Keats's Life of Allegory (1988); J. Watson, English Poetry of the Romantic Period, 1789–1830 (1992); K. Kroeber, Ecological Literary Criticism (1994); J. J. McGann, The Poetics of Sensibility (1996); M. O'Neill, Romanticism and the Self-Conscious Poem (1997); S. Wolfson, Formal Charges (1997); J. Chandler, England in 1819 (1998); S. Wolfson, Borderlines: The Shiftings of Gender in British Romanticism (2006); Cambridge Companion to British Romantic Poetry, ed. J. Chandler and M. McClane (2008); D. Gigante, Life: Organic Form and Romanticism (2009).

■ Victorian Period. Anthologies: Victorian Poetry and Poetics, ed. W. Houghton and G. R. Stange (1968); New Oxford Book of Victorian Verse, ed. C. Ricks (1987); Victorian Women Poets, ed. A. Leighton and M. Reynolds (1995); Nineteenth-Century Women Poets, ed. I. Armstrong and J. Bristow (1996); Penguin Book of Victorian Verse, ed. D. Karlin (1997); Broadview Anthology of Victorian Poetry and Poetic Theory, ed. T. Collins and V. J. Rundle (1999); The Victorians, ed. V. Cunningham (2000); Victorian Poetry, ed. F. O'Gorman (2004); Decadent Poetry, ed. L. Rodensky (2007); Victorian Women Poets, ed. V. Blain (2009). Criticism and History: E.D.H. Johnson, The Alien Vision of Victorian Poetry (1952); R. Langbaum, The Poetry of Experience (1957)—dramatic monologue; C. Ricks, Tennyson (1972); D. Mermin, The Audience in the Poem (1983); H. F. Tucker, Tennyson and the Doom of Romanticism (1988); E. Griffiths, The Printed Voice of Victorian Poetry (1989); A. Leighton, Victorian Women Poets (1992); I. Armstrong, Victorian Poetry (1993); Y. Prins, Victorian Sappho (1999); M. Reynolds, The Realms of Verse, 1830–1870 (2001); B. Richards, English Poetry of the Victorian Period, 1830–1890 (2001); Companion to Victorian Poetry, ed. R. Cronin, A. Chapman, A. Harrison (2002); R. Cronin, Romantic Victorians (2002); The Fin-de-Siècle Poem, ed. J. Bristow (2005); H. F. Tucker, Epic: Britain's Heroic Muse (2008); L. K. Hughes, Cambridge Introduction to Victorian Poetry (2010); V. Cunningham, Victorian Poetry Now (2011). Digital Resources: Nineteenth-century Scholarship Online, http://www.nines.org/; Romantic Circles, http://www.rc.umd.edu/; William Blake Archive, http://www.blakearchive.org/blake/; British Women Romantic Poets, http://digital.lib.ucdavis.edu/projects/bwrp/; Poetess Archive, http://unixgen.muohio.edu/~poetess/; Rossetti Archive, http://www.rossettiarchive.org/; Morris Online, http://morrisedition.lib.uiowa.edu/; Swinburne Project, http://swinburnearchive.indiana.edu/swinburne/www/swinburne/.

■ Modernism to the Present. Anthologies: Georgian Poetry, ed. E. Marsh (1911–22); Des Imagistes (1914) and Catholic Anthology (1915), both ed. E. Pound; Some Imagist Poets (1915); New Signatures (1932), New Country (1933), and Faber Book of Modern Verse (1936), all ed. M. Roberts; Oxford Book of Modern Verse, ed. W. B. Yeats (1936); The New Apocalypse, ed. J. F. Hendry (1939); New Verse, ed. G. Grigson (1942); Faber Book of 20th-Century Verse, ed. J. Heath-Stubbs and D. Wright (1953); Poetry of the 1950s, ed. D. J. Enright (1955); New Lines, ed. R. Conquest (1956); The New Poetry (1962), ed. A. Alvarez, rev. ed. (1966); Children of Albion, ed. M. Horovitz (1968); British Poetry since 1945, ed. E. Lucie-Smith (1970); Oxford Book of Twentieth-Century English Verse, ed. P. Larkin (1973); Oxford Book of Contemporary Verse, ed. D. J. Enright (1980); Penguin Book of Contemporary British Poetry, ed. B. Morrison and A. Motion (1982); A Various Art, ed. A. Crozier and T. Longville (1987); The New British Poetry, ed. G. Allnutt et al. (1988); Conductors of Chaos, ed. I. Sinclair (1996); Penguin Book of First World War Poetry [1979], ed. J. Silkin, rev. ed. (1996); Out of Everywhere, ed. M. O'Sullivan (1996); Penguin Book of Poetry from Britain and Ireland since 1945, ed. S. Armitage and R. Crawford (1998); Harvill Book of Twentieth-Century Poetry in English, ed. M. Schmidt (1999); Other: British and Irish Poetry since 1970, ed. R. Caddel and P. Quartermain (1999); Bloodaxe Book of 20th Century Poetry from Britain and Ireland, ed. E. Longley (2001); Anthology of Twentieth-Century British and Irish Poetry, ed. K. Tuma (2001); Norton Anthology of Modern and Contemporary Poetry, ed. J. Ramazani, R. Ellmann, R. O'Clair (2003); New British Poetry, ed. D. Paterson and C. Simic (2004). Criticism and History: A. Symons, The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899), rev. ed. (1919); I. A. Richards, Science and Poetry (1926); F. R. Leavis, New Bearings in English Poetry (1932); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradi- tion (1939); Eliot, Essays; D. Davie, Purity of Diction in English Verse (1952); and Articulate Energy (1955); H. Kenner, The Pound Era (1971); D. Davie, Thomas Hardy and British Poetry (1972); S. Hynes, The Auden Generation (1975); D. Perkins, A History of Modern Poetry, 2 v. (1976, 1987); B. Morrison, The Movement (1980); V. Cunningham, British Writers of the Thirties (1988); D. Davie, Under Briggflatts: A History of Poetry in Great Britain, 1960–1988 (1989); N. Corcoran, English and Irish Poetry since 1940 (1993); A. Duncan, The Failure of Conservatism in Modern British Poetry (2003); R. Stevenson, The Last of England? (2004); P. Middleton, Distant Reading (2005); P. Barry, Poetry Wars (2006); S. Broom, Contemporary British and Irish Poetry (2006); J. Ramazani, A Transnational Poetics (2009). Digital Resources: The First World War Poetry Digital Archive, http://www.oucs.ox.ac.uk/ww1lit/; The Modernist Journals Project, http://dl.lib.brown.edu/mjp/.

K. Davis (OE); E. Johnson (ME); E. H. Sagaser (Ren.); J. Keith (Restoration and 18th C.); E. Gray (Romantic and Victorian); C. D. Blanton (Mod. to Present)

ENGLISH PROSODY

I. Old English
II. Middle English
III. Modern English

I. Old English (ca. 500–1100 CE). OE verse, like that of the other early Germanic langs. (Old Saxon, OHG, ON), is composed in hemistichs or verses linked by *alliteration into long lines. Despite some technical differences between the strict metrical style of Beowulf or Exodus and the freer style of the late poem "The Battle of Maldon" (ca. 991), the extant trad. during the four centuries from Cædmon's "Hymn" (ca. 670) to the Norman Conquest (1066) is remarkably homogeneous. The main variation from this normal *meter is the infrequent *hypermetric verse (Ger. Schwellvers). Of the 30,000 lines of OE poetry, there are fewer than 950 hypermetric verses, which usually occur in clusters and exceed the normal metrical limit by several heavy syllables.

It has sometimes been said that OE poetry is in the "strong-stress" trad. along with mod. *accentual verse on the assumption that each hemistich contains two main stresses and an indeterminate number of unstressed syllables. Although it is obvious that word stress is an important element of OE meter (alliteration depends on it), it has also become clear in studies of the past four decades that OE meter is a complex mix of at least three elements that are usually assigned to different metrical typologies: stress, quantity, and syllable count. At present, there is no agreement on which element is most basic and which two are derivative. In addition to these phonological determinants, some studies posit word shape as a prime (Russom, Bredehoft).

It has always been known that quantity was an element of OE meter, although its position was considered secondary: in summaries of OE meter for handbooks and anthols., it was often omitted altogether. The technicalities involve *resolution (whereby a short stressed syllable is grouped with the following syllable into a unit) and suspension of resolution. Renewed attention to Kaluza's Law has highlighted the importance of syllable quantity in the formulation of an adequate theory (Fulk).

Syllable counting is the least obvious of the elements to figure into a statement of OE meter. A glance down a page of OE poetry in a mod. ed. confirms the variable length of lines that seem far from being "syllabic." However, the accordion-like expansion of the OE line is permitted only in certain specified parts of the verse. Elsewhere, there is a close matching of syllable or "syllable equivalent" with the abstract metrical unit, the "position" or "member." Because a pattern of four members was posited in the most influential study of OE meter (Sievers), there is nothing radical in beginning with a one-to-one mapping of syllable (or syllable equivalent) and metrical unit. A syllable-count pattern is generally accepted for a reconstructed IE meter (manifested in Avestan and, with secondary quantitative patterns, in Vedic). Just as Gr. meter seems to have developed by expanding the syllable count through quantitative equivalences, esp. in the dactylic hexameter, so possibly did Germanic meter (although distinguishing historical derivation from convergent innovation within a limited repertoire of possible elements is beyond reach). ON meter reflects syllable count even better than OE, the meters of Old Saxon and OHG much less so.

If Sievers's system invites these speculations in its "four members," this aspect has been completely displaced by his simultaneous but more tangible reification of the "five types," the most common patterns of syllables bearing full stress, secondary stress, and weak stress. The five types (labeled A through E) appear in every intro. to OE poetry of the past century, and the scheme serves as a convenient taxonomy for mnemonic, pedagogical, and classificatory purposes:

A	/ x / x	gomban gyldan
B	x / x /	þenden wordum wēold
C	x / / x	ofer hronrāde
D	/ / \ x	cwēn Hrōðgāres
E	/ \ x /	flōdýþum feor

Still, one may question whether Sievers's types are the cause (the paradigm) or the effect (epiphenomena of a more basic pattern) and in any event whether the types are compatible with the two-stress idea. Types D and E regularly have three stresses (with the lightest falling on a syllable that elsewhere counts as a full *ictus), and many types A and C appear to have only one stress.

The most obvious feature of the earliest poetry in the Germanic langs. is alliteration. As with *rhyme in later accentual-syllabic verse, alliteration does not determine metrical structure, which is easily discoverable without this cue. This superficial feature survived the rupture in the trad. caused by the Norman Conquest.

II. Middle English. ME prosody, a highly controverted field, has achieved little consensus as to the exact nature and origin of forms or even basic terminology. What is beyond dispute is that between the late tenth and late 14th cs., metrical innovation in ME verse flourished, encouraged by complex influences both foreign and native.

A. Evolution of the Native Tradition. Alliterative poetry of the cl. OE type continued to be written up to the Norman Conquest, the last poem in the strict meter arguably being The Death of Edward in 1066, on the event that brought about William's invasion. By the time of The Description of Durham, ca. 1104–9, only superficial elements of the meter remain, and the early ME verse that followed (e.g., The Departing Soul's Address to the Body, The First Worcester Fragment, Layamon's Brut) is clearly "looser" than OE alliterative verse. Whether it was modernized in lang. and meter from the cl. OE trad. or descended from a "popular" oral trad. or developed from the "rhythmical alliteration" of Wulfstan's and Ælfric's prose, early ME verse does share some features of OE verse. Lines are composed of two half lines usually linked by alliteration. However, half lines carry a greater number of unstressed syllables than in OE meter, and the rising and falling rhythm (x / x / x) predominates. Rhythmic patterns are irregular and cannot usefully be categorized on the basis of Sievers's five types (see sect. I above). Both alliteration and *leonine rhyme are treated as ornaments, but often neither alliteration nor rhyme occurs.

B. Middle English Accentual-Syllabic Verse. By the early 12th c., rhyme comes into use as a structural principle, borrowed probably from med. Lat. (e.g., Godric's Hymns, ca. 1170) but also under the influence of Fr., particularly the Anglo-Norman vers décasyllabe. Finally, it supplants alliteration altogether. The adaptation of Anglo-Norman and Fr. models to Eng. phonology leads to the octosyllabic couplet in contours of alternating stress, a staple of ME verse, as in John Gower's Confessio amantis and Chaucer's House of Fame. Octosyllabic verse in a variety of forms—couplets, the ballade stanza, cross-rhymed quatrains, and octaves—continues through the 15th c. (see OCTOSYLLABLE).

A number of other forms indebted to both med. Lat. and Anglo-Norman models come into play at the end of the 12th c.: a long line in mixed lengths of 12 and 14 syllables rhyming in couplets, quatrains, or octaves; the *Burns stanza; and the ballade. It is believed that couplets of the 14-syllable line, by adding internal rhyme and breaking at the half lines into short-line quatrains, produced "8s and 6s," a form isomorphic to *ballad meter. The same internal rhyme breaks the alliterative long line into a short alliterative complex that persists from Layamon through the late *tail-rhyme stanzas (e.g., Sir Degrevaunt). Tail rhyme, also derived from med. Lat. and Anglo-Norman exemplars, becomes the characteristic stanza of the Eng. metrical romances, usually in six- or 12-line stanzas. The addition of rhyme to the ornamental alliterative line produces a wide range of stanzas, as in the celebrated Harley lyrics. Generally speaking, the addition of rhyme coincides with a shift from accentual to accentual-syllabic verse, so that the number of syllables and the number and position of stresses in the line become relatively fixed. ME verse normally imitates the simple binary meters characteristic of med. Lat. verse, e.g., the Poema morale (ca. 1170), which imitates the Lat. septenarius.

C. The Alliterative Long Line. Alliterative composition in prose and rhymed verse continues throughout the 13th and 14th cs. in a broad continuum of styles derived from both the native trad. and from Lat. and Fr. The Harley lyrics (ms. composed ca. 1340–50) beautifully illustrate the difficulty of sorting out the separate strands. Of the 18 alliterative lyrics, 15 are arguably in a mixed iambic-anapestic meter more akin to meters found in Alfred, Lord Tennyson; Robert Browning; A. C. Swinburne; and Robert Frost than to anything in OE or early ME (hence, the apparent familiarity of the rhythms of these poems). For the rhythm of early 14th-c. lyrics, studies of "strict stress-meter" in Eng. by Tarlinskaja (cf. Rus. dol'nik)* are more revealing than comparisons with OE meter.

For the so-called Alliterative Revival of the mid-14th c., no substantial recent scholarship has examined the old problem of the external reasons for this remarkable flowering in the West Midlands. However, much progress has been made in understanding the metrical structure. These discoveries make it more difficult to trace a natural evolution, as Oakden did, from late OE through Layamon at the turn of the 13th c. to the Alliterative Revival of the late 14th and early 15th cs. Meanwhile, the term Alliterative Revival has been questioned in recent scholarship for ignoring much poetry of the 13th and 14th cs. that would show a more continuous trad. if our records were more complete.

It is not clear that our fuller understanding of the metrical structure can be tied to datable cultural and intellectual trends or the influence of other langs. It is equally unclear how the similarities with OE meter can be established as derivative from the earlier stage: e.g., both trads. have a highly specified element of syllable count, but it is hard to know whether this element was handed down as a metrical artifice or if the syllable count and departures from it in extra unstressed syllables are to be expected in a stress-timed language: in both OE and ME, the intervals between stresses appear to be regulated, as opposed to a syllable-timed language like Fr., in which the intervals between syllables are (see ISOCHRONISM OR ISOCHRONY).

What can be specified precisely for poems like Sir Gawain and the Green Knight is the metrical structure of the second half of the long line (the b-verse) in terms of syllables that receive a metrical beat and syllables that do not. For the most part, the syllables that receive a beat are the stressed syllables of lexical words (esp. nouns and adjectives) and syllables that do not receive a metrical beat (thus forming an offbeat) are syllables of function words and unstressed syllables of lexical words. The requirements are technical but crucial for any generalization about Eng. metrical typology in the Middle Ages: the b-verse must contain two beats and exactly one "strong dip" or "long dip" (two or more metrically unstressed syllables—Duggan, Cable); furthermore, the verse must end with exactly one unstressed syllable (Putter et al.), and the vowel of that syllable must be a schwa (Yakovlev). Having stated all these prescriptions for the b-verse, one can hypothesize that the a-verse is "otherwise, anything," i.e., any combination of long and short dips and of schwa and nonschwa vowels that does not meet the requirements for the b-verse. The two halves of the long line would then be "heteromorphic" (a term introduced by McIntosh but used only at the level of the foot); efforts to confirm or falsify this hypothesis are part of the ongoing scholarship in ME metrics. Meanwhile, there are exceptions to all the "rules" stated above (and resulting disagreements among metrists), and William Langland's Piers Plowman has more exceptions than most.

D. Chaucer and the 15th Century. The declining fortunes of Anglo-Norman in the mid-14th c. seem to have encouraged a shifting of attention to strict Fr. forms, and Chaucer's indebtedness to native ME prosody has proved increasingly difficult to demonstrate. Chaucer can certainly use ornamental alliteration, particularly in battle scenes (e.g., "The Knight's Tale," 2601 ff.), but his clearest adaptation of native ME prosody, in the tail rhyme and bob lines of "Tale of Sir Thopas," is satiric. In The Parliament of Fowls, Chaucer abandons the octosyllabic couplet for *rhyme royal, his staple stanza for formal poems (Troilus and Criseyde), and a form related to the *monk's tale stanza. Chaucer also imitates the Fr. triple ballade ("Complaint of Venus") and *rondel and the It. *terza rima ("A Complaint to His Lady"); Anelida and Arcite contains much prosodic experimentation.

But Chaucer's most significant technical achievement is the heroic or decasyllabic line (see DECASYLLABLE) in couplets, derived perhaps by expanding the octosyllabic couplet, perhaps from the rhyme royal stanza; its origin is disputed, so the very terms used to refer to it have never been settled. Chaucer is the first to use the five-beat or iambic pentameter couplet in Eng. (either in the prologue to the Legend of Good Women or in an early version of the "Knight's Tale"). Most prosodists agree that Chaucer's line has a predominantly "iambic" rhythm with variations: line-initial trochaic substitution (occasionally after the caesura), secondary stress on polysyllables, elision, and occasional weak stresses. Chaucer's greatness as a metrical artist lies in his skill at tensing rhetorical and syntactic accent against the basic metrical pattern.

Chaucer's enormous influence after his death in 1400 preserved his verse forms through the 15th c. It is not clear that his disciples understood what they imitated, although part of the problem may be gaps in our mod. understanding analogous to faulty readings of Chaucer before mod. texts were edited and the phonology of final e was established. John Lydgate's prosody, which influenced nearly every 15th-c. poet, is known especially for the "broken-backed" line, in which only a caesura appears to separate two strong stresses. However, an assumption of Chaucerian phonology will often justify a final e even if it is not written in the ms., and many lines become smoother. In fact, some of the undeniable badness of Lydgate's verse may result from an insistent, artificial regularity rather than from the stumbling rhythms that have usually been perceived. The 15th c.'s main contribution is the *carol, though the pentameter couplet and rhyme royal are its staple forms.

III. Modern (after 1500)

A. 16th and Early 17th Centuries. Early mod. Eng. verse represents competing trads.: (1) cl. quantitative verse, from Gr. and Lat. models (both strophic and hexameter lines), which proved incompatible with the accentual structure of Eng.; (2) "old-fashioned" accentual and alliterative poetry favored by John Skelton and others, a native form surviving until midcentury in the *tumbling verse of the popular stage; and (3) the decasyllabic line, originating with Chaucer, sustained by his successors, and modified by the Eng. imitators of Petrarch and his It. and Fr. followers. Losing interest in quantitative schemes, Tudor poets and dramatists taught themselves to convert the patterns of cl. meters, especially iambic, to an accentual verse system in which accent or stress, not length, determines the measure. Early forms employed until almost the 17th c. include *fourteeners and *poulter's measure, but the iambic pentameter line soon began to show its flexibility and expressive powers in various tonal registers. Favored by Thomas Wyatt in some of his most successful sonnets, the form was taken up without rhyme by Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey, for his trans. of part of the Aeneid and then used by Thomas Sackville and Thomas Norton for their political tragedy Gorboduc (1571). In the hands of Philip Sidney, Christopher Marlowe, Edmund Spenser, Shakespeare, and Ben Jonson, the iambic pentameter line revealed qualities that transformed lyric verse, helped usher in the greatest period of Brit. drama, and determined the future of Eng. poetry.

The virtues of the blank verse line derive from its moderate length, the ten syllables avoiding the liability of the longer line to split in half and of the short line to sound childish. The particular dynamic of *blank verse, especially for drama, dwells in the tension between, on the one hand, the semantic energies and grammatical claims of the sentence and, on the other, the rhythmic regularity of sequential pentameter lines (Wright). Poets exploited the variety of blank verse by finding that (1) the midline phrasal break could be variously located, (2) stressed syllables might be unequal in strength (and unstressed ones, too), (3) variations in the placement of stressing in the line could confer grace and energy, and (4) with occasional, even frequent, *enjambment, a passage could flow smoothly through unequal grammatical segments and seem as much speech as verse.

Discovering the malleability of the line, some poets developed its capacity for variation so thoroughly as to threaten the security of the pentameter frame. The later Shakespeare, John Webster, Thomas Middleton (in dramatic verse), and especially John Donne (in his Satyres, Elegies, and letters) exaggerate such features as enjambment, elision, inversion and other accentual variations, line length (both abbreviated and extended), and multiple pauses within the line. In achieving a speech-like immediacy, they vastly expanded the tonal possibilities of the form. Donne also pursued such variety in his Songs and Sonnets, leading Jonson to complain that he should be hanged for not keeping the accent. This vigorous period of innovation was contemporaneous with the less extreme prosodic experiments of Jonson and his followers. Their commitment to cl. forms and balanced lines gave rise to less radical but equally significant creativity with rhythm, rhyme, and length of line.

B. Later 17th and 18th Centuries. Spenser, Jonson, and George Herbert became the models for much lyric verse of the 17th c., with most poets endorsing Samuel Daniel's conservative view about the value of rhyme (A Defence of Ryme, 1603). Donne's successors (see METAPHYSICAL POETRY), down through Andrew Marvell, John Milton, and Jonathan Swift, employ the tetrameter couplet as a balanced form for conveying subtle and sometimes ironic argument. The multiplicity of the blank verse line attracted an unparalleled voice in Milton, who chose it for Paradise Lost and explicitly defended it in a prefatory note to the poem. Prosodically correct (though in accordance with rules that are apparently his own—see Bridges, Sprott, and Weismiller) and extraordinarily resourceful, his epic verse, audaciously blank, keeps the grand grammatical sentence boldly diverging from yet counterpoised with the equally heroic line.

But it is the *heroic couplet, deriving from the decasyllables of Chaucer and Jonson and usurping the rhythmic possibilities of the blank-verse line, that becomes the sovereign form in Eng. poetry for over a century. It invited Edmund Waller, John Denham, John Dryden, and eventually Alexander Pope to exploit its hospitality to antithetical words and phrases: they built oppositions into the line or set line against line in a seemingly inexhaustible display of verbal balance, polish, ingenuity, and "bite." *Odes, Pindaric or Horatian, afforded the resourceful poet a different variety of challenging formal (and cl.) structures. Augustan prosodists (Edward Bysshe, Richard Bentley, and Henry Pemberton) and critics (Samuel Johnson) condemn departures from metrical norms, but toward the end of the century, monotony and desire for change eventually hastened the return of blank verse, esp. as a medium for reflection. At the same time, the rediscovery of the ballad stimulated the writing of lyric poems in looser forms and encouraged other variation in poems with an iambic base.

C. 19th Century. Liberated from the couplet, romantic poetry explores rich veins of blank and stanzaic verse of various shapes and dimensions (Curran). But the century's poets soon divide into opposing distinct prosodic camps: one moves toward accentual verse, with its strong recurrent pattern of regular beats, the other toward free verse and its highlighting of the rhythmical phrase. The first group tries on various modes: triple meters (E. A. Poe and H. W. Longfellow), anapestic variation in iambic verse (Browning, Swinburne, Thomas Hardy), the accentually *sprung rhythm of the *"Christabel" meter and G. M. Hopkins, and *dipodic rhythms (Browning, George Meredith, Rudyard Kipling), all of which, as they strengthen both the equality and the isochronism of the beat, diminish the role of expressive variation within the line. Tennyson and Browning are exceptional in their ability still to write compelling blank verse. The second party prefers early types of free verse, expressive (as in Walt Whitman) of loosely measured sequences of self-reliant perceptions. The ordered lines of Ren. and Augustan verse, apparently representing some combination of natural order, the forces of authority, and social and political hierarchies, begin increasingly to lose their appeal as the century proceeds. They yield to the romantic and postromantic quest for a vehicle appropriate to the inner experience of a human subject deprived of religious and social certainty.

D. 20th Century. The most influential voices soon make free verse the chief metrical mode. Ezra Pound and W. C. Williams embrace Whitman's elevation of the rhythmic phrase, apparently imitating ordinary speech but often introducing such effects as unexpected rhyme and audacious rhythmic play. Certain modernist poets mix familiar forms, including blank verse, with a freer prosody, as in T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land, where disintegration is a principal motif. Some of Whitman's self-proclaimed followers (e.g., Allen Ginsberg and the Beat poets) eschew conventional forms almost entirely. Poets who often retain traditional meters (e.g., Wallace Stevens, Robert Lowell, John Berryman) adapt them freely, as if they represented some order of reality, sanity, or conduct only dimly and intermittently descried; and in many major poets, traditional forms recur, sometimes brilliantly redeemed (W. B. Yeats, Robert Frost, W. H. Auden, Richard Wilbur, Philip Larkin, Anthony Hecht, and several contemp. Eng. poets). Other forms explored by 20th-c. poets (esp. Marianne Moore and Auden) include *syllabic verse, which furnishes a concealed formal structure, and *concrete poetry. Late in the century, many *Language poets consciously represent their subversion of form as an attack on the social conventions and practices of capitalism; and Af. Am., Caribbean, and postcolonial writers, grown increasingly accomplished and prominent, promote their own cultural forms, often in combination with the conventions of the Eng. trad. Fed by all these strains, Eng. poetry at the beginning of the 21st-c. has contrived a truce between the surety of familiar forms and the liberty of the individual voice, with poets adjusting the emphasis according to their bent.

Analysis of poetic modes comes generally after the fact, but in every period, prosodic crit. has a moralistic flavor, with many critics and poets disdaining their predecessors: e.g., 19th-c. poets, such as John Keats and Matthew Arnold, sometimes dismissed their Augustan precursors as writers of mere prose. Inconclusive debate has always attended the effort to relate prosody to meaning. Pope's famous dictum that "the sound should seem an echo to the sense," illustrated with his lines about "swift Camilla," represents one side of the case; the other is taken by Johnson, who (also famously) dismisses the general applicability of the contention. In various periods, poets, critics, and readers have sensed a semiotic function of prosody without being able to generalize persuasively about it. The regular pentameter line and the internal aural challenges to it represent a wider contest between order and individuality, and in the 20th c., the failure of traditional forms often signifies personal and social collapse. Some feminist critics have identified traditional meter with the restrictions of patriarchal control: Emily Dickinson, e.g., is said to have mostly avoided iambic pentameter as connoting the forces of Father and Christianity. But there is little agreement on such an iconic function of prosody.

See ALLITERATION; ENGLAND, POETRY OF; FREE VERSE; HEROIC VERSE; RHYTHM; SOUND; STANZA; VERSIFICATION.

■ Old English: Sievers; M. Kaluza, A Short History of English Versification (1911); J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of "Beowulf," 2d ed. (1966); A. J. Bliss, The Metre of "Beowulf," 2d ed. (1967); T. Cable, The Meter and Melody of "Beowulf" (1974); Brogan, sect. K; G. Russom, Old English Meter and Linguistic Theory (1987); W. Obst, Der Rhythmus des "Beowulf" (1987); R. D. Fulk, A History of Old English Meter (1992); B. R. Hutcheson, Old English Poetic Metre (1995); S. Suzuki, The Metrical Organization of "Beowulf" (1996); T. A. Bredehoft, Early English Metre (2005).

■ Middle English: General: Schipper; K. Luick Englische Metrik (1893); B. Ten Brink, The Language and Metre of Chaucer (1920); J. P. Oakden, Alliterative Poetry in Middle English, 2 v. (1930–35); A. McI. Trounce, "The English Tail-Rhyme Romances," Medium Ævum 1–2 (1932–34); F. Pyle, "The Place of Anglo-Norman in the History of English Versification," Hermathena 49 (1935); P. F. Baum, Chaucer's Verse (1961); M. Borroff, "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight": A Metrical and Stylistic Study (1962); M. D. Legge, Anglo-Norman Literature and Its Background (1963); Pearsall; Brogan, sect. K; U. Fries, Einführung in die Sprache Chaucers (1985); A.V.C. Schmidt, The Clerkly Maker (1987); M. Tarlinskaja, Strict Stress-Meter in English Poetry (1993). Alliterative Revival: J. R. Hulbert, "A Hypothesis Concerning the Alliterative Revival," MP 28 (1930); R. A. Waldron, "Oral-Formulaic Technique and Middle English Alliterative Poetry," Speculum 32 (1957); E. Salter, "The Alliterative Revival," MP 64 (1966–67); T. Turville-Petre, The Alliterative Revival (1977); A. McIntosh, "Early Middle English Alliterative Verse," and D. Pearsall, "The Alliterative Revival," Middle English Alliterative Poetry, ed. D. A. Lawton (1982); H. Duggan, "The Shape of the B-Verse in Middle English Alliterative Poetry," Speculum 61 (1986); T. Cable, The English Alliterative Tradition (1991); R. Hanna, "Alliterative Poetry," Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. D. Wallace (1999); C. Chism, Alliterative Revivals (2002); H. Zimmerman, "Continuity and Innovation: Scholarship on the Middle English Alliterative Revival," Jahrbuch für Internationale Germanistik 35 (2003); A. Putter, J. Jefferson, and M. Stokes, Studies in the Metre of Alliterative Verse (2007); N. Yakovlev, "Prosodic Restrictions on the Short Dip in Late Middle English Alliterative Verse," YLS 23 (2009).

■ Modern: Schipper; Smith—texts of Ren. prosodists; Schipper, History; Bridges; Omond; O. Jespersen, "Notes on Metre," rpt. in his Linguistica (1933); G. W. Allen, American Prosody (1934)—dated but not yet replaced; S. E. Sprott, Milton's Art of Prosody (1953); P. Fussell, Theory of Prosody in Eighteenth-Century England (1954); Wimsatt and Beardsley; Saintsbury, Prosody—eccentric theoretically; J. Thompson, The Founding of English Metre (1961); M. Halpern, "On the Two Chief Metrical Modes in English," PMLA 77 (1962)—fundamental; Chatman; K. Shapiro and R. Beum, A Prosody Handbook (1965); W. B. Piper, The Heroic Couplet (1969); J. Malof, A Manual of English Meters (1970); D. Attridge, Well-Weighed Syllables (1974); D. Crystal, "Intonation and Metrical Theory," The English Tone of Voice (1975); Tarlinskaja; E. Weismiller, "Blank Verse," A Milton Encyclopedia, ed. W. B. Hunter et al. (1978); H. Gross, ed., The Structure of Verse, 2d ed. (1979); C. O. Hartman, Free Verse (1980); Brogan—full list of references with annotations; Hollander; D. Wesling, The New Poetries (1985); S. Woods, Natural Emphasis (1985); S. Curran, Poetic Form and British Romanticism (1986); G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); O. B. Hardison Jr., Prosody and Purpose in the English Renaissance (1989); A. Finch, The Ghost of Meter (1993); H. Gross and R. McDowell, Sound and Form in Modern Poetry, 2d ed. (1996); R. McDonald, Shakespeare's Late Style (2006); J. Longenbach, The Art of the Poetic Line (2007).

T. CABLE (OE); R. H.OSBERG AND T. CABLE (ME); G. T. WRIGHT AND R. MCDONALD (MOD.)

ENGLYN (pl. englynion). Along with awdl and cywydd*, one of the three classes of the 24 strict meters of *Welsh poetry. Six of the eight varieties of englynion are quatrains, and the most common line length is the heptasyllable. The earliest forms are *tercets, like the e. milwr (warrior's englyn) that consists of three lines linked by end rhyme, or the e. penfyr (truncated englyn) that resembles the first three lines of an e. unodl union (see below). The famous early Welsh poems of the Llywarch Hen and Heledd cycles are series of such englynion, often joined to one another by cymeriad, the repetition of a word or phrase at the beginning of each englyn. After the 12th c., tercets gave way to *quatrains with lines linked by *rhyme or proest (see ODL). Since the 12th c., the most popular variety has been the e. unodl union (direct monorhyme englyn), a quatrain of lines of ten, six, seven, and seven syllables. The main rhyme in the first line appears one to three syllables before the end of the line and rhymes with the ends of the other three lines. The final one to three syllables of the first line are known as the cyrch or gair cyrch (reaching-out word; cf. G. M. Hopkins's "outriders") and must echo or alliterate with the first few syllables of line two. While the gair cyrch need only be related to what follows by means of light alliteration, strict cynghanedd* has been observed in all other parts of the englyn since the 15th c. The end rhyme in the last two lines is always between a stressed and an unstressed syllable (as in Eng. kíng : dáncing or hónest : bést), a rule preserved since the 13th c. and also found in the Welsh cywydd meter. If the second couplet (esgyll, "wings") precedes the first two lines (paladr, "shaft"), the form is called e. unodl crwca ("crooked" monorhyme englyn).

See CELTIC PROSODY.

■ Morris-Jones; Early Welsh Gnomic Poems, ed. K. Jackson (1935); K. Jackson, "Incremental Repetition in the Early Welsh Englyn," Speculum 16 (1942); Parry, History; Welsh Verse, ed. T. Conran, 2nd ed. (1986); Early Welsh Saga Poetry, ed. J. Rowland (1990); The New Companion to the Literature of Wales, ed. M. Stephens (1998); A. Llwyd, Anghenion y Gynghanedd (2007).

T.V.F. BROGAN; D. M. LLOYD; B. BRUCH

EN(H)OPLIAN, en(h)oplios, en(ho)plion (Gr., "in arms," "martial"). A metrical term first attested in Aristophanes (Clouds 638) where, however, its exact reference is unclear. Later writers use it more or less interchangeably with prosodion or prosodiakos to designate various forms, all of which contain the sequence – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – preceded and/or followed by some additional element. When it follows, this element is a single syllable, long or short; when it precedes, it may also be a double short. One form of enoplian (⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – –) is thus identical with the *paroemiac, others with sequences frequently found in *dactylo-epitritic. Some mod. metrists have argued for the existence of a free version of the rhythm as well, similar to the paroemiac but allowing some substitution of single for double shorts. Such "single-short" enoplians are more usually and more correctly analyzed as *aeolic.

■ A. M. Dale, "Aeolic: (2) Prosodiac-Enoplian"; K. Itsumi, "Enoplion in Tragedy," CQ 34 (1984); B. Gentili and L. Lomiento, "Kat' enoplion Meters," Metrics and Rhythmics: History of Poetic Forms in Ancient Greece, trans. E. C. Kopff (2008).

A. T. COLE

ENJAMBMENT (Fr., enjamber, "to straddle or encroach"). The continuation of a syntactic unit from one line to the next without a major juncture or pause; the opposite of an *end-stopped line. While enjambment can refer to any verse that is not end-stopped, it is generally reserved for instances in which the "not stopping" of the verse is felt as overflow, esp. in relation to some poetic effect, as in the opening lines of Shakespeare's sonnet 116: "Let me not to the marriage of true minds / Admit impediments." In these lines, the desire not to admit impediments to the marriage of true minds is enacted poetically because the sentence "refuses" to stop at the line's end. One way to emphasize enjambment is to combine the use of enjambment with *caesura (mid-line pause), as demonstrated in the following passage from Hamlet: "[The world is] an unweeded garden / That goes to seed; things rank and gross in nature / Possess it merely. That it should come to this!" (1.2.135–7). The enjambments and caesuras in these lines reinforce the image of a weedy garden outgrowing its proper boundaries, as well as the jumps in Hamlet's thoughts.

Enjambment can give the reader mixed messages: the closure of the metrical pattern at line end implies a pause, while the incompletion of the phrase says to go on. These conflicting signals can heighten tension or temporarily suggest one meaning only to adjust that meaning when the phrase is completed. To some degree, enjambment has been associated with freedom and transgression since *romanticism; such associations are predicated on a norm of end-stopped verse and sparing use of enjambment, in relation to which the enjambment appears liberating. Enjambment ultimately depends on expectation of a pause at line's end; if verses are enjambed routinely, readers may perceive the text as something like prose.

Cl. *hexameter is mainly end-stopped, as is Sanskrit verse. Though Homer's hexameters are more frequently enjambed than, say, those of the Hellenistic writers, it is often hard to discern poetic motivation behind the enjambments (the effect of enjambment in *oral poetry and in *song may be different from that of written verse). Virgil uses enjambment in ways that sometimes seem poetically motivated and sometimes not. Enjambment can be found in biblical Heb. and cl. Ar. verse, but it is not the norm. Enjambment is the norm in Old Germanic alliterative verse, incl. OE, where rhyme is unknown and lines are bound together by alliteration used to mark the meter. Prior to the 12th c., enjambment is rare in OF poetry: the trouvère Chrétien de Troyes (fl. after 1150) seems to have been the first poet in the Eur. vernaculars to break his verses systematically. By the 15th c., enjambment is widely used, and even more so in the 16th, esp. by Pierre de Ronsard (who coined the term) and the poets of the Pléiade*. In the 17th c., enjambment was impugned by François de Malherbe and later Nicolas Boileau. These neoclassical authorities, however, allowed its use in certain circumstances—in *decasyllabic poetry and in the less "noble" genres such as comedy and *fable. Occasionally, enjambment occurs even in tragedy.

Since André Chénier (1762–94), enjambment has been accepted in all genres in Fr. The device was exploited to the full by Victor Hugo, whose famous enjambment at the beginning of Hernani—"Serait-ce déjà lui? C'est bien à l'escalier / Dérobé" (Is he already here? It must be by the secret staircase)—had the force of a manifesto (because adjectives generally follow nouns in Fr., Hugo is able to place dérobé [secret] on the other side of the line break). Enjambment was a fundamental characteristic of the vers libéré* of the later 19th c. and the vers libre* that emerged from it. In *French prosody, enjambment has been a subject of controversy: since Fr. rhythms are in essence phrasal, line-terminal accents tend to coincide with significant syntactic junctures. Consequently, the terminology for analyzing types of constructions in enjambment is more developed in Fr. prosody than in Eng.

In Eng., enjambment was used widely by the Elizabethans for dramatic and narrative verse. The neoclassical *couplet drove most enjambment from the scene in the 18th c., but the example of John Milton revived it for the romantics, who saw it as the metrical emblem for liberation from neoclassical rules. (In Milton, enjambment is sometimes used to thwart readers' expectations—to provide a momentary shock of error that may be likened to a recognition of living in a fallen world.) William Wordsworth makes frequent use of enjambment in his *blank verse poems ("Tintern Abbey," The Prelude), as does John Keats (Endymion). G. M. Hopkins's *"sprung rhythm" introduces "roving over" (metrical and syntactic enjambment) so that "the scanning runs on without a break from the beginning . . . of a stanza to the end." 20th-c. poets like W. C. Williams and e. e. cummings use enjambment so frequently that it is the rule rather than the exception in many of their poems.

Since at least the mid-19th c., poets have made increased use of what is sometimes called "hard enjambment"—enjambment so striking it cannot help but be felt. Enjambment of this sort might include enjambment across stanzas (as when Charles Baudelaire, speaking of how the "belly and breasts" of his mistress "advanced" toward him in "Les Bijoux" ["Jewels"], places the verb advanced at the beginning of a stanza); enjambment separating articles or adjectives from their nouns (as in Williams's Spring and All: "under the surge of the blue / mottled clouds driven from the / northeast—a cold wind."); and enjambment that splits a word across a line (as in Hopkins's opening to "The Windhover": "I caught this morning morning's minion, king- / dom of daylight's dauphin"). Perception of hard enjambment, like the perception of enjambment in general, depends on such factors as the reader's experience and literary-historical context. No comprehensive taxonomy of types or effects of enjambment exists.

See LINE, VERSE AND PROSE, VERS, REJET.

■ M. Parry, "The Distinctive Character of Enjambment in Homeric Verse" (1929), rpt. in Parry (1971); J. Hollander, "'Sense Variously Drawn Out: Some Observations on English Enjambment," Vision and Resonance (1973); H. Golomb, Enjambment in Poetry (1979); S. Cushman, William Carlos Williams and the Meanings of Measure, chap. 1 (1985); R. Silliman, "Terms of Enjambment," The Line in Postmodern Poetry, ed. R. Frank and H. Sayre (1988); A. Sanni, "On tadmin (Enjambment) and Structural Coherence in Classical Arabic Poetry," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 52, no. 3 (1989); C. Higbie, Measure and Music: Enjambment and Sentence Structure in the "Iliad" (1991); M. E. Clark, "Enjambment and Binding in Homeric Hexameter," Phoenix 48 (1994); M. L. Shaw, "Verse and Prose," The Cambridge Introduction to French Poetry (2003).

T.V.F. BROGAN; C. SCOTT; S. MONTE

ENSALADA. A Sp. poem consisting of lines and *strophes of varying lengths and rhyme schemes, generally depending on the music to which the poem is sung. According to Henríquez Ureña, the earliest known ensalada is one by Fray Ambrosio Montesinos (d. ca. 1512) found in Francisco Asenjo Barbieri's Cancionero musical de los siglos XV y XVI (no. 438). The ensalada apparently was never very popular.

■ P. Henríquez Ureña, La versificación irregular en la poesia castellana, 2d ed. (1933); Le Gentil; Navarro; M. Gómez, "The Ensalada and the Origins of the Lyric Theater in Spain," Comparative Drama 28 (1994).

D. C. CLARKE

ENSENHAMEN. A didactic poem in Occitan, ordinarily composed in a nonlyric meter, such as rhymed *couplets, and designed to give advice or instruction to a person or a class. Some of the poems are like books of etiquette. Others are addressed to the *jongleurs who sang the poets' compositions, telling them the things they should know and how they should perform their task. The knowledge expected is doubtless exaggerated, but the poems have a certain interest for what they reveal about contemp. taste in literary and other matters.

■ G. E. Sansone, Testi didattico-cortesi di Provenza (1977); D. A. Monson, Les "ensenhamens" occitans (1981).

F. M. CHAMBERS

ENVELOPE. The envelope pattern is that form of repetition in which a rhyme (sound), phrase, line, or stanza recurs so as to enclose other material, giving the structural pattern abba; chiasmus*, derived from rhet., is another term for the same structure. Most often, a phrase or line will bracket a stanza or whole poem; a complete stanza may also enclose a poem or section of a poem. Envelope has the effect of framing the enclosed material, giving it unity and closure: the reader recognizes the return to the original pattern after movement away in the interim. Related but less specific effects include those of the *burden in the *carol, the *refrain, and *incremental repetition; in these, the reiterated line gains meaning or force from the new material preceding each occurrence of it, but there is no sense of bracketing or framing. The single-line envelope, as it applies to a stanza, may be seen in James Joyce's "I Would in That Sweet Bosom Be" and, as it applies to an entire poem, in Robert Frost's "Acquainted with the Night." A stanza used as an envelope for an entire poem may be seen in William Blake's "The Tyger" and in John Keats's "The Mermaid Tavern." Envelope rhyme (Ger. umarmender Reim, Fr. rime embrassée) is the rhyme scheme abba or any expanded version thereof; a quatrain having such rhyme is sometimes called the envelope stanza: the *In Memoriam stanza is an iambic tetrameter envelope stanza.

See RING COMPOSITION.

■ C. B. Hieatt, "On Envelope Patterns and Nonce Formulas," Comparative Research on Oral Traditions, ed. J. M. Foley (1987); C.A.M. Clarke, "Envelope Pattern and the 'Locus Amoenus' in Old English Verse," N&Q 50 (2003).

S. F. FOGLE; T.V.F. BROGAN

ENVIRONMENT AND POETRY. Environmental poetry, or ecopoetry, is related to the broader genre of nature poetry but can be distinguished from it by its portrayal of nature as threatened by human activities (see NATURE). Scattered examples of such concerns appear throughout the hist. of poetry, but clusters of poems about the natural world endangered by humans are apparent above all in Eur. romanticism and in poetry connected to the rise of the mod. environmentalist movement since the 1960s. The emergence of environmentally oriented literary and cultural crit.—or ecocriticism, for short—since the early 1990s has substantially contributed not only to the study of such poetry but also to a new look at nature poetry more broadly conceived.

Environmentally oriented studies of poetry have focused above all on Brit. romanticism and contemp. Am. poetry, with some additional work on Ger., Japanese, and Lat. Am. devels. While the natural world in Eur. romantic poems has often been understood as a metaphor for the poet's mind, ecocritics such as Jonathan Bate and Karl Kroeber tend to place a new emphasis on the romantics' engagement with the materiality of nature and their acute sense of the deterioration of wild and rural landscapes during processes of enclosure and industrialization. Such motifs can be traced in the works of major poets such as William Blake, William Wordsworth, S. T. Coleridge, and P. B. Shelley; but they have also led to the critical revaluation of the work of John Clare, whose poetry had played a more marginal role in the romantic canon. Clare's sharp eye for the details of the natural world and his anguish over the transformation of the landscape around him make his poetry a model for later forms of ecologically oriented poetic expression.

Poetry influenced by mod. environmentalist thought emerged in a variety of countries between the late 1950s and the early 1970s. In spite of certain shared themes—fears over deforestation, soil erosion, air and water pollution, urban sprawl, mechanization and commodification of nature, resistance to nuclear plants and weapons, and the decline of indigenous, sustainable ways of life, e.g.—this kind of poetry took shape under different cultural circumstances and with different emphases. In the U.S., ecopoetry connected not only with the desire to return to nature expressed in some parts of the 1960s counterculture but also with a long trad. of nature writing extending back to R. W. Emerson, H. D. Thoreau, Walt Whitman, Mary Austin, Willa Cather, and Aldo Leopold. In addition, poets such as Wallace Stevens, W. C. Williams, and Charles Olson, whom one would be reluctant to call "nature poets," had nevertheless explored local places with close attention to both nature and culture. The ecological poetry of Gary Snyder, Wendell Berry, Robinson Jeffers, A. R. Ammons, W. S. Merwin, Mary Oliver, and Joy Harjo, to name a few of the most prominent writers, could therefore situate itself in a long trad. of lyrical descriptions and celebrations of the natural world, as well as in a trad. of poetic critiques of mod. society that highlighted its alienation from nature, its scientific and instrumental rationalism, its capitalist drive to commodification, and its large-scale and anonymous institutions. Some of these critiques draw on older models of Am. society, as is obvious in the Jeffersonian agrarianism of Berry's poetry; on Native Am. ways of life, as in Harjo's poems; or on other cultures with what are understood to be their different perspectives on the natural world. Snyder's poetry, e.g., which has commanded by far the greatest amount of ecocritical attention, combines references to Native Am. models of knowledge and inhabitation with allusions to Chinese and Japanese trads. of thought about humans' connection to the environment. While formally most of this poetry follows fairly well-established high modernist models of *free verse, the jour. Ecopoetics, first published in 2001, has dedicated itself to connections between environmentalist thought and more experimental, lang.-oriented forms of poetic expression. In this vein, ecocritics have also begun to reexamine the work of poets such as Charles Olson, Larry Eigner, and Lorine Niedecker.

Lat. Am. poets have also increasingly made environmental concerns part of their poetic works. As critics such as Niall Binns, Roberto Forns-Broggi, and George Handley have pointed out, reverence for Mother Earth, the celebration of natural landscapes, and the reflection on precolonial, indigenous ways of life have a long trad. in various Lat. Am. lits.; such elements are visible in some of the works of the best-known 20th-c. poets, such as the Chileans Pablo Neruda and Gabriela Mistral and the Nicaraguan Ernesto Cardenal, but also in those of indigenous poets who have only more recently been integrated into the poetic canon—partly as a consequence of increased environmental awareness and the questioning of rapid modernization processes—e.g., the Mapuche poets Elicura Chihuailaf and Leonel Lienlaf. If some of Neruda's and Cardenal's later works take a clear ecological turn, the intensifying awareness of an ecological crisis is even more obvious in the work of others, such as the Chilean Nicanor Parra and the Mexicans José Emilio Pacheco, Homero Aridjis, and Alberto Blanco, in which pollution, species extinction, and devastated urban landscapes figure prominently. Aridjis, in particular, has become well known in Mexico and abroad for his environmentalist activism as director of the organization Grupo de los Cien (Group of 100), which has, in turn, popularized his ecologically engaged poetry inside and outside Mexico.

In Germany, a country with one of the most politically successful environmentalist movements, environmental poetry in the 1960s and 1970s emerged from a different literary and political background. Poetic engagements with nature had featured prominently in Ger. poetry at least as far back as the romantic age, but National Socialism had appropriated many of the crucial elements of this trad.—symbols such as the Ger. oak, the forest, and the attachment to one's home soil—in such a way that they became exceedingly difficult for poets interested in the emergent Green movement, many of whom were politically engaged and left-oriented, to use. In addition, nature poetry in the 1930s and 1940s had mostly been written by writers intent on evading direct engagement with the political realities of the time, so that "conversations about trees," famously denounced in Bertolt Brecht's 1939 poem "An die Nachgeborenen" as "almost a crime" because they evaded ongoing atrocities, smacked of political escapism. It was, therefore, against the thrust of recent hist. that poets such as Nicolas Born, Heinz Czechowski, Hans Magnus Enzensberger, Erich Fried, Sarah Kirsch, Günter Kunert, Richard Pietraß, and many others had to reintroduce nature as a prominent lyrical theme. Some Ger. ecopoetry emerged during and around demonstrations against nuclear plants and airport-runway projects and therefore took the shape of militant songs and chants. But the more properly lyrical ecopoems, too, stand out by an overall more pessimistic and combative tone than those of Am. ecopoets, who denounce contemp. society angrily but also celebrate landscapes, views, and hikes in a manner only rarely found in the works of their Ger. counterparts.

Studies of environmentally oriented poetry have so far been mostly carried out for individual countries and poets. Comparative studies that consider the genre in the context of culturally divergent attitudes toward modernization, technology, and urban landscapes, as well as against the context of different political and literary trads., are only beginning to emerge.

■ W. Emmerich, "Kein Gespräch über Bäume: Naturlyrik unterm Faschismus und im Exil," Exilliteratur 1933–1945, ed. W. Koepke and M. Winkler (1989); J. Bate, Romantic Ecology (1991); A. Goodbody, "Deutsche Ökolyrik: Comparative Observations on the Emergence and Expression of Environmental Consciousness in West and East German Poetry," German Literature at a Time of Change 1989–1990, ed. A. Williams, S. Parkes, and R. Smith (1991); K. Kroeber, Ecological Literary Criticism (1994); J. Elder, Imagining the Earth, 2d ed. (1996); J. Egyptien, "Die Naturlyrik im Zeichen der Krise: Themen und Formen des ökologischen Gedichts seit 1970," Ökologie und Literatur, ed. A. Goodbody (1998); R. Forns-Broggi, "¿Cuáles son los dones que la naturaleza regala a la poesía latinoamericana?," Hispanic Journal (1998); and "Ecology and Latin American Poetry," The Literature of Nature, ed. P. D. Murphy (1998); L. M. Scigaj, Sustainable Poetry (1999); J. Bate, The Song of the Earth (2000); J. S. Bryson, ed., Ecopoetry (2002); N. Binns, "Landscapes of Hope and Destruction: Ecological Poetry in Spanish America," The ISLE Reader: Ecocriticism, 1993–2003, ed. M. P. Branch and S. Slovic (2003); The West Side of Any Mountain, ed. J. S. Bryson (2005); G. B. Handley, New World Poetics (2007).

U. K. Heise

ENVOI, envoy (Fr., "a sending on the way"). A short concluding stanza, often addressed to a noble patron (frequently "Prince") and summarizing the argument of a lyric. In the *sestina, the envoi normally consists of three lines, in the ballade of four, and in the chant royal of either five or seven, thus repeating the metrical pattern as well as the *rhyme scheme of the half stanza that precedes it. During the great period of the OF fixed forms, it restates the poem's major theme, serving as an interpretive gloss within the poem itself. For this reason, the Occitan troubadours called their envois tornadas (returns).

Among the Eng. poets, Walter Scott, Robert Southey, and A. C. Swinburne employed envois. Chaucer wrote a number of ballades in which he departs from the customary form by closing with an envoi that is equal in length to a regular stanza of the poem, usually his favorite *rhyme royal. In mod. imitations, the envoi is often ironic or satirical and may be addressed to any entity related to the poem, e.g., "birds" (N. E. Tyerman's "Ballad: Before My Bookshelves"), "bookmen" (Lionel Johnson's "Ballade of the Caxton Head"), "moralists" (Brander Matthews's still humorous "The Ballade of Fact and Fiction"), and so on.

■ H. L. Cohen, Lyric Forms from France (1922); R. Dragonetti, La Technique poétique des trouvères dans la chanson courtoise (1960), pt. 1, ch. 4; Tarlinskaja, ch. 7; Gasparov, History.

A. Preminger; D. J. Rothman

EPANALEPSIS (Gr., "a taking up again"; Lat. resumptio, "a resumption"). In cl. rhet., a figure most often defined as the repetition of a word or words after intervening words, either for emphasis (e.g., "Hell at last / Yawning receiv'd them whole, and on them clos'd, / Hell their fit habitation" [Milton, Paradise Lost 6.874–76]) or for clarity, as to resume a construction after a lengthy parenthesis (Demetrius, On Style 196; e.g., "Say first, for Heav'n hides nothing from thy view, / Nor the deep Tract of Hell, say first what cause / Mov'd our Grand Parents" [Paradise Lost 1.27–29; cf. Milton's "Lycidas" 1.165]).

In Ren. and modern rhet., epanalepsis is more specifically defined as the practice of ending a clause or sentence or line or stanza with the word at its beginning. In verse, the repeated words most often begin and end a line, as in Philip Sidney's "They love indeed who quake to say they love" (Astrophil and Stella 54), but they may also be internal, as in Shakespeare's "Blood hath bought blood, and blows have answered blows; / Strength match'd with strength, and power confronted power" (King John 2.1.329). John Donne brackets each stanza with an epanaleptic line in "The Prohibition." Peacham says epanalepsis is used "to place a word of importance in the beginning of the sentence to be considered, and in the end to be remembered." Various types have been distinguished in Walt Whitman's poetry: more than 40% of the lines of Leaves of Grass employ epanalepsis of one sort or another. It is one of T. S. Eliot's most conspicuous and effective devices in Four Quartets. Like *anadiplosis, where the repeated word ends one line and begins the next, epanalepsis strikingly marks the limits of signifying syntagms: "Possessing what we still were unpossessed by, / Possessed by what we now no more possessed" (Robert Frost, "The Gift Outright"). Epanalepsis also appears in prose: Zimmerman identifies it in E. A. Poe's story "The Black Cat" in the sentence "Evil thoughts became my sole intimates—the darkest and most evil of thoughts"; he opines that the device creates a gloomy effect of enclosure, immurement. Vickers, by contrast, sees a playful use of epanalepsis in the sentence "Cemetery put in of course on account of the symmetry" from James Joyce's Ulysses.

■ A. N. Wiley, "Reiterative Devices in Leaves of Grass," American Literature 1 (1929); Lanham; A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982); B. Vickers, In Defence of Rhetoric (1988); Vickers; Corbett; B. Zimmerman, Edgar Allan Poe (2005).

R. O. Evans; T.V.F. Brogan; A. W. Halsall; A. L. French

EPENTHESIS (Gr., "putting in"). The addition of a syllable within a word, usually for metrical *equivalence or rhetorical emphasis (puh-leeze for please). Epenthesis includes anaptyxis (the addition of a vowel) and excrescence (the addition of a consonant); the most common epenthetic vowel in Eng. is the schwa, the toneless and neutral vowel added to please in the example above. Metrical or rhythmic epenthesis often establishes ironic parallelism (as in Irving Berlin's rhyming of "Rockefellers" with "umbrellas" in "Puttin' on the Ritz"). The Brazilian poet Haroldo de Campos's "circuladô de fulô" (written 1965; pub. in Galáxias, 1984) takes its first lines (incl. those three opening words) from a minstrel song descended from the Galician-Port. cantiga* overheard by Campos in northeast Brazil: the minstrel's original words were probably "circulado de flores," which A. S. Bessa translates as "'rounded by flowers." A deformation of flores, "fulô" would then be perhaps a mimetic epenthesis (in which Campos imitates a local pronunciation) or a case of epenthetic *defamiliarization.

See elision, tmesis.

R. Greene

EPIC

I. History
II. Theory

I. History

A. Definitions. An epic is a long narrative poem of heroic action: "narrative," in that it tells a story; "poem," in that it is written in verse rather than prose; "heroic action," while reinterpreted by each major epic poet, in that, broadly defined, it recounts deeds of great valor that bear consequence for the community to which the hero belongs. An epic plot is typically focused on the deeds of a single person or hero, mortal though exceptionally strong, intelligent, or brave, and often assisted or opposed by gods. Epic is set in a remote or legendary past represented as an age of greater heroism than the present. Its style is elevated and rhetorical. To compose an epic has often been viewed as the foremost challenge a poet can undertake, and the enduringly successful epics are a small and select group.

A distinction is commonly drawn between oral or "primary" epic, which has its origins in oral *performance, and literary or "secondary" epic, composed as a written text. Oral poetry is performed by a skilled singer who improvises on familiar material, drawing on a stock of *formulas, fixed phrases in particular metrical patterns, like an improvising musician's repertory of riffs. The oral poet also employs formulaic type-scenes, such as the feast, assembly, arming of the hero, or single combat, which can be varied as the context requires. In the 1920s, a young Am. scholar, Milman Parry, demonstrated that the Iliad and the Odyssey bear traces of oral composition. The Homeric epithets, or characterizing phrases—"strong-greaved Achaians," "Agamemnon, lord of men"—vary, Parry noted, according to grammatical case and position in the line, a phenomenon best accounted for by origins in oral performance. Parry subsequently tested his hypothesis by recording living oral poets in the Balkans, who improvised using formulaic lines, phrases, and scenes in similar fashion. Trads. of oral heroic poetry exist in Egypt, Arabia, Kirghistan, Mali, and elsewhere (see oral-formulaic theory).

The distinction between oral and literary epic is not absolute and can mislead if treated too rigidly. Poems that have been passed down unwritten into recent times can be considered oral in a straightforward sense, but, in cases such as the Iliad, we are necessarily dealing with written texts, whose proximity to a prior oral trad. is a matter of conjecture. The Iliad contains traces of oral composition, but the text we have is not itself an oral poem, nor should we assume that it was the first version to be transcribed. Primary epic is sometimes described as "traditional," but, in fact, both primary and secondary epic are traditional forms of art; the process of traditio or handing down takes place directly in primary epic, at a distance in secondary epic. In oral poetry, the matter of the song and the art of recitation are handed down from *bard to bard, presumably through sustained personal contact. In literary epic, the new poet signals participation in the epic trad. by imitating formal, thematic, and stylistic elements of previous epics, so that an informed reader may readily sense the relation between old and new. While all genres contain such imitative gestures, they are esp. prominent in epic, where the presence of the old in the new is strongly felt.

To define epic broadly as any long narrative poem of heroic action has the advantage of inclusiveness. It recognizes the artistry of heroic narrative poems around the world and allows for cross-cultural comparisons such as the studies carried out by Parry and his student Albert Lord. The disadvantage of applying the term epic to poems around the world is that to do so effaces the trads. to which each poem belongs. The Babylonian Epic of Gilgamesh, the Sanskrit Mahābhārata, the OF Chanson de Roland, the OE Beowulf, and the South Slavic oral poems recorded by Parry and Lord in the 1930s—not to mention the Odyssey and the Iliad—all qualify as narrative poems of heroic action, but to call them all epics is to subsume them within a category that would have been unrecognizable to their authors and first audiences. They are most accurately understood within their own cultural contexts, on their own generic terms.

The term epic has a long hist. of usage in a narrower sense, to refer to the trad. of heroic narrative poetry written in conscious descent from the Iliad and the Odyssey by way of Virgil's Aeneid. That the two Homeric poems were the source of this trad. was taken as fact in antiquity and never forgotten; but while the prestige of Homer's name endured, the texts themselves became, in most of Europe, lost poems in a lost lang. from late antiquity into the Ren., known only in *fragments and redactions. The Aeneid was received as a classic virtually from the moment of its appearance; since it was written in Lat., it never lost its familiarity, and it retained its status as the paradigmatic epic even after the 16th c. when the Homeric poems became more widely known in Europe. More than any other poem, the Aeneid established the conventions of epic as they were understood by later poets; while many of these conventions originate in Homer, their Virgilian versions would become the most widely imitated. These conventions, described in greater detail below, include stylistic elements such as extended *similes, elevated *diction, and *epithets; formal elements such as the proem, bringing the audience in medias res, digression, and prophecy (see PROPHETIC POETRY); recurrent scenes such as the celestial descent, the earthly paradise, the *catalog, the locus amoenus, ekphrasis*, and katabasis. No epic poem contains every conventional feature, and no feature is present in every poem. The unity of the genre is best understood in terms of Ludwig Wittgenstein's concept of family resemblance, "a complicated network of similarities overlapping and criss-crossing: sometimes overall similarities, sometimes similarities of detail" (Philosophical Investigations). Thinking of generic unity in this way releases the critic from the fruitless task of distinguishing between essential and accidental features of epic and from the equally fruitless task of determining which poems deserve inclusion; as Greene saw it, poems participate in the epic mode to different degrees.

B. Conventions. (i) Proem. An epic poem conventionally begins with an introductory passage or *proem (Lat. proemium, "preface" or "introduction"). The proem includes a proposition or brief statement of the poem's subject. The choice of words in the proposition is of special significance since it indicates the poem's major themes and emphases, frequently with a revisionary gesture toward previous epics. As so often, the paradigmatic instance is Virgilian. The first words of the Aeneid, "arma virumque cano" (I sing of arms and a man) allude, in "arms," to the martial subject matter of the Iliad and, in "man," to the lone voyaging hero of the Odyssey, thus indicating Virgil's aim to encompass the subjects of both Homeric poems within his own. The proem also includes an invocation, where the poet invokes the assistance of the *Muse to inspire his song. In Gr. mythology, the Muses are the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, goddess of memory; the Muse associated with epic poetry is named Calliope. The convention of invoking the Muse derives from epic's origins in oral performance. In Gr. oral trad., the invocation was a prayer, overheard by the audience, offered at the start of each performance to the Muse or Muses, patron deities of the professional singer. The convention was retained in literary epic, with postclassical poets understanding it in symbolic or Christian terms. A third element commonly found within the epic proem is a dedication, or expression of homage by the poet toward an earthly patron or head of state. Thus, e.g., Statius addresses the Roman emperor Domitian at the beginning of the Thebiad: "And you, glory added to Latium's fame, whom, as you take on your aged / father's enterprises anew, Rome wishes hers for eternity . . ." (1.22–4).

Secondary proems and invocations are sometimes to be found within a poem, typically preceding heightened moments or major changes of scene.

(ii) In medias res. The Lat. phrase in medias res means "into the midst of things" and refers to the epic convention of beginning not at the earliest point of the story but with the action already under way. The phrase derives from Horace's Ars poetica. A poet telling of the Trojan War, Horace writes, should not begin with Helen's birth from an egg:

> He gets right to the point and carries the reader
> Into the midst of things, as if known already . . .
>
> ("To the Pisos," 147–49)

In this passage, Horace is discussing the skill, necessary to all narrative poets, of capturing the interest of the audience from the outset. It is the reader or listener (Lat. auditor), not the poem, who is to be carried into the middle of events. While Horace's example is taken from the epic subject of Troy, he is not making a point about epic specifically. The phrase in medias res came to be understood and applied, however, as prescribing a particular nonlinear shape for epic narrative: the poem was to start at the heart of the story, usually with a burst of action, and fill in the chronologically prior events at a later point. This understanding probably came about through the combination of Horatian precept with Virgilian example. The Aeneid begins not with the fall of Troy but with the Trojan exiles approaching their destination, when the goddess Juno drives them off course with a violent storm; once on shore, Aeneas recounts earlier events in a flashback. Among numerous later examples, Marco Girolamo Vida's Christiad (1535), a Neo-Lat. epic on the passion of Christ, begins not with Christ's birth but with his entry into Jerusalem; Luís de Camões's Lusiads (1572), which tells of Vasco da Gama's voyage from Portugal to India, begins with the Port. mariners already past the Cape of Good Hope and approaching Mozambique.

(iii) Forms of digression. The nonlinear shape of epic narrative has other conventional features. If the poem begins by bringing the reader in medias res, prior events must be filled in subsequently. One standard way of doing so is through an embedded narrative told by a guest to a host after a meal, when the host, having fulfilled the first obligations of hospitality, may with courtesy put questions, and the refreshed guest may answer at leisure. Thus, Odysseus relates his famous "wanderings" to the Phaeacian king Alcinous and his court; Aeneas tells of the fall of Troy and the Trojans' subsequent journey to Dido and her court at Carthage; and in John Milton's Paradise Lost, the angel Raphael descends to Adam and Eve, is welcomed as their guest, and thereafter tells them of the war in heaven and the creation of the world.

Another form of digression is the epic prophecy, in which a seer furnishes the hero with an account or vision of future events. Through prophecy, the legendary past in which the epic is set can be linked to the historical present from which it is told. Typically, the prophet is a supernatural character or prophesies by supernatural means. The prophecy takes place in a special setting reached by a guided journey: in the underworld (see katabasis, below) or the heavens or during a sea voyage. A distinctive subcategory is the dynastic prophecy, in which the seer tells or shows the hero a genealogy of glorious descendants. Prophetic digression can also be expressed by the narrative voice, as in this succinct Miltonic example: "So clomb this first grand thief into God's fold: / So since into his church lewd hirelings climb" (Paradise Lost 4.192–93).

A third form of epic digression is the episode or incident loosely connected to the primary epic plot. The tale of Olindo and Sofronia in Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata, book 2, is an example. Heroic poems in the chivalric *romance trad., such as Ludovico Ariosto's Orlando furioso and Alonso de Ercilla's La Araucana, are highly episodic. In the Poetics, book 9, Aristotle deprecates episodic plot, which he defines as a structure in which "the episodes or acts succeed one another without probable or necessary sequence"; the Odyssey, he felt, was properly unified, because Odysseus's various adventures were sufficiently connected to one another. In the early mod. period, after Aristotle's Poetics gained renewed influence in the 16th c., the subject of episodes received considerable attention from literary critics. Some authors criticized Orlando furioso and other romances for violating Aristotelian unity of action; others praised their episodic plots for their variety; others such as Torquado Tasso sought a middle way, attempting to reconcile the pleasures of romance with Aristotelian principles.

(iv) Katabasis. Among the most distinctive of epic conventions is the katabasis (Gr., "descent") or descent to the underworld. As so often, Virgil's treatment is inspired by Homer, and it is Virgil's that becomes paradigmatic. Odysseus's visit to the land of the dead in the Odyssey, book 11, is not, strictly speaking, a katabasis but a nekuia, or summoning of ghosts, though the place's location is indistinct, Odysseus reaches it by ship. The journey of Aeneas to the underworld in the Aeneid, book 6, is a heightened supernatural episode rich in symbolic detail, through which Aeneas gains a fuller understanding of his mission and its fated consequences. Aeneas's journey involves several parts: first, elaborate ritual preparation for the descent, guided by the Cumaean Sibyl, priestess of Apollo; second, passage through the various regions of the underworld, encountering familiar ghosts; last, Aeneas's meeting with his father Anchises in Elysium, abode of the blessed. Anchises explains to his son the progress of the soul from death to rebirth and shows him a spiritual pageant of famous Romans culminating in Virgil's own time. The episode has proven among the most influential in Western lit. The whole of Dante's Divine Comedy could be described as a Christianized expansion of the Aeneid, book 6. In Orlando furioso, Ariosto includes a katabasis touched with travesty; the dynastic heroine Bradamante is treacherously dropped down a hole and happens to land at the tomb of Merlin, who shows her a dynastic pageant of her glorious descendants, enacted by conjured demons. The Mammon episode in Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene is a form of katabasis.

(v) Celestial vision. Epic narrative moves between heaven and earth, juxtaposing the earth-bound perspectives of mortal characters with the exalted viewpoint of gods. On rare occasions, a mortal hero is allowed to see from a higher perspective, either by means of a vision or a literal ascent. Like the katabasis, such episodes involve a supernatural guide and show exceptional divine favor to the recipient; they provide the hero with higher knowledge, often prophetic or metaphysical, with which he returns enlightened to his earthly endeavor. Where the katabasis provides knowledge from below, the celestial vision provides knowledge from above. In ancient epic, certain heroes are granted brief moments of privileged sight, in which a god removes the film from their vision (Diomedes at Iliad 5.127–28, Aeneas at Aeneid 2.604–6). The more sustained form of celestial vision, however, is a postclassical convention, incorporating elements of the *dream vision and the genre of apocalypse or revelation, whose best-known instance is the last book of the NT. Dante's Paradiso is the most extended example of an epic celestial vision; others include Astolfo's voyage to the moon in Orlando furioso; Goffredo's dream vision in Gerusalemme liberata, book 14; Redcrosse Knight's vision of the New Jerusalem in The Faerie Queene; and Michael's instruction of Adam in the last two books of Paradise Lost.

(vi) Ekphrasis. An ekphrasis (Gr., "description") is a verbal account of a work of visual art. The description of Achilles' shield in the Iliad, book 18, is the epic prototype. Made for the hero by the god Hephaestus, the shield is decorated with images of the heavenly bodies, scenes of a city at peace, and scenes of a city at war; its imagery has been subject to a wide range of interpretation. Virgil uses ekphrasis to describe legendary events prior to the poem's main narrative and historical events posterior to it: the doors of Juno's temple in Carthage are decorated with scenes from the Trojan War, and Aeneas's divinely wrought shield is decorated with scenes of future Roman triumphs. Later poets would follow Virgil in using ekphrasis to link epic past with historical present. Thus, in Orlando furioso, the walls of Tristan's castle show the deeds of Frankish kings from Sigibert to Francis I, while in The Lusiads, the painted flags of Vasco da Gama's ship depict Port. heroes from the legendary founding of the nation to the 15th c.

(vii) Aristeia. The aristeia (Gr., "prowess") is an episode in which a warrior performs great exploits on the battlefield. The model here is the Iliad, which contains five major aristeiai whose characteristic elements were widely imitated by later poets. These elements include the arming of the hero; his killing of enemy champions; his driving the enemy before him in a rout; an initial setback (a wound or removal from battle), followed by prayer to the gods, reinvigoration, and return to combat. An aristeia does not necessarily end in victory, even in the short term; often the episode concludes with the hero driven back, wounded, or even killed. The aristeia provides one means of introducing variety into battle scenes. By exalting secondary warriors earlier in the poem with their own aristeiai, the poet can amplify the deeds of the primary hero; to do so, however, requires of the poet sufficient skill to describe gradations of extraordinary valor. In the Iliad, the first four aristeiai of Diomedes, Agamemnon, Hector, and Patroclus are genuinely impressive; when Achilles finally enters the fighting, however, his irresistible accomplishment in killing exceeds anything that has come before.

(viii) Locus amoenus. The locus amoenus (Lat., "delightful place") is an earthly paradise, a place of bliss and repose. It features lush gardens, splashing fountains, tame creatures, clement weather, fruit-bearing trees, and often the promise of sexual pleasures. Its mythological antecedents include the Elysian fields of cl. trad. and the Garden of Eden in Genesis; its representation in epic owes much to the *pastoral trad. In Ren. epics such as The Faerie Queene and Gerusalemme liberata, earthly paradises frequently prove false; their pleasures are created by enchantment, and they are inhabited by temptresses who would lure the hero from his duties. Benign versions include Dante's earthly paradise atop Mt. Purgatory, Venus's isle of love in the Lusiads, and, above all, Milton's Paradise, a representation of the Garden of Eden itself.

C. Style. Epic is written in an elevated *style, befitting its subject matter. *Archaisms and poetic diction are accepted in epic to a greater extent than in genres dealing with subjects closer to their readers' quotidian experience. In poems written in Eng. or mod. Romance langs., Latinisms and Latinate forms are common. Stylistic features include the epithet or characterizing phrase, such as "swift-footed Achilles" or "Hector, breaker of horses." Also common is *periphrasis, an indirect expression used in place of a direct one, as in "Cytherea's son" for Aeneas (Paradise Lost 9.19). Of special note is the epic simile, an extended comparison in which the vehicle (the term used to describe) is developed beyond its ground of analogy with the tenor (the term described), so that the simile becomes a miniature tale unto itself (see TENOR AND VEHICLE). Here, for instance, Milton's Satan is described lying on the fiery lake of hell:

> . . . in bulk as huge
> As whom the Fables name of monstrous size,
> Titanian, or Earth-born, that warr'd on Jove,
> Briareos or Typhon, whom the Den
> By ancient Tarsus held, or that Sea-beast
> Leviathan, which God of all his works
> Created hugest that swim th' Ocean stream:
> Him haply slumbring on the Norway foam
> The Pilot of some small night-founder'd Skiff, > Deeming some Island, oft, as Sea-men tell,
> With fixed Anchor in his skaly rind
> Moors by his side under the Lee, while Night
> Invests the Sea, and wished Morn delayes:
> So stretcht out huge in length the Arch-fiend lay > Chain'd on the burning Lake.

The difficulty of maintaining an appropriately high style over the course of a long poem, without lapses into grandiosity on the one hand or *bathos on the other, is one reason that successful epics have been rare.

Epic's marriage of high style and heroic matter makes possible the parodic subgenre of *mock epic, where the high epic style is applied to low, everyday, or absurd subject matter, creating a humorous mismatch.

D. Women in Epic. There is a long trad. of women warriors in epic. A lost epic, the Aethiopis of Arctinus of Miletus, recounted the story of Penthesileia the Amazon queen, who was an ally of the Trojans. The most influential example of the type is Virgil's Camilla, leader of the Volscians, who fights against the Trojans in an impressive aristeia until she is killed by a javelin. Her successors include Bradamante and Marfisa in Orlando furioso, Clorinda in Gerusalemme liberata, and Britomart in The Faerie Queene. Ariosto's Bradamante combines the figures of woman warrior and dynastic spouse; formidable with sword or lance, she is also the legendary progenitrix of the House of Este, Dukes of Ferrara and Ariosto's patrons. Spenser follows Ariosto in this combination; his Britomart is a female knight who allegorically embodies the virtue of chastity and the mythical ancestor of Queen Elizabeth. Tasso's Clorinda is both warrior and tragic lover. Raised a Muslim, she is beloved of the Christian knight Tancredi, who mortally wounds her in an eroticized duel and baptizes her as she dies.

Another recurrent female character type impedes the hero's progress, keeping him from his path through seduction or constraint until he breaks free and abandons her. The prototypes here are Calypso and Circe in the Odyssey. Calypso is an immortal nymph who keeps Odysseus for herself on her island until commanded by the Olympian gods to let him go. Circe, also an island nymph, lures men into her house and, by witchcraft, transforms them into beasts; once Odysseus, with divine assistance, breaks her spell, she becomes his lover and assists him. In the Aeneid, the woman with whom the hero dallies and delays becomes a tragic figure. Virgil's Dido is a mortal woman, the widowed queen of Carthage; when Aeneas and his Trojans are shipwrecked on her shores, she falls in love with him, and they live as a couple until the gods intervene, commanding Aeneas to depart—whereupon she kills herself. Virgil leaves no doubt that Aeneas must leave Dido to fulfill his destiny, and Roman readers would note her association with Carthage, Rome's old enemy; but the queen is portrayed sympathetically as a victim of circumstance, an unfortunate (infelix) casualty in the founding of Rome. Many readers have shared the reaction of the young Augustine, who shed tears for Dido's death. Ren. versions of these figures include Alcina in the Orlando furioso, Armida in the Gerusalemme liberata, and Acrasia in The Faerie Queene; these similarly named characters are ill-intentioned temptresses from whose clutches seduced knights must be rescued. Although the epic trad. generally represents such female characters as a temptation that the male hero must overcome to carry out his mission, they appeal powerfully to hero and readers alike; these episodes have often been recognized as among the most memorable in their respective poems. An intriguing version of Dido appears in La Araucana and belongs to a robust "Defense of Dido" trad. that was esp. popular in Spain.

Discussion of the right relation between the sexes becomes a major theme in at least two epics of the Ren. The marriage of Adam and Eve, companionate yet hierarchical, is an important focus of Paradise Lost. Orlando furioso carries on a running discussion about women's virtue, sometimes ironically and sometimes in earnest, with Ariosto frequently giving voice to what in 16th-c. terms would have been a profeminist position.

Epics written by women include Enrico ouvero Bisancio acquistato (Enrico, or Byzantium Conquered, 1635), by the Venetian Lucrezia Marinella; the biblical epic Iudith by the Fr. woman of letters Marie de Calages (1660); and the creation poem Order and Disorder (1679; first complete ed. 2001), identified in 2001 as the work of Lucy Hutchinson.

E. Divine Action. Epic is primarily concerned with the deeds of mortals, but its most powerful characters are gods. In the Iliad, the Odyssey, and the Aeneid the Olympian gods intervene frequently in human affairs, assisting some and destroying others. Sometimes the gods act in the interest of justice as they see it; sometimes they act on their own prerogative or even whim. Their enormous power is neither good nor evil; it simply is. The supreme Olympian god (Zeus in Gr., Jupiter in Lat.) holds final authority, but he allows wide latitude to his fellow Olympians to act as they see fit, and so they do. This latitude allows for factions or competing interests among the gods, which play a major structural role in cl. epic plot. The quarrelsome, anthropomorphized gods of epic scandalized some readers even in antiquity, Plato among them, but since they figured so prominently in the most prestigious poems of the age, they were too important to ignore.

How to Christianize divine action was one of the enduring problems of postclassical epic. Christian poets who sought to imitate Homer and Virgil assumed that a mod. epic that would rival the ancients required a supernatural element of some kind; they also knew that, in this respect, their cl. models could not be followed too closely. The pagan gods were no longer acceptable, but what could be put in their place? One approach, derived from the long hermeneutic trad. of reading the gods of cl. epic allegorically, was to introduce allegorized divine characters. These might be *personifications, like Milton's Sin and Death; they might be the Olympian gods themselves in allegorical guise, as in the Lusiads, Petrarch's Africa, or Spenser's "Mutability Cantos." Another approach, derived from the chivalric trad., was to replace intervening gods with magic: enchanted woods, mythical beasts, sorcerers, demons, and the like. A third approach, the most distinctively Christian, was to substitute God and Satan for the community of Olympian gods, as in Vida, Tasso, or Milton. None of these approaches was without its difficulties.

II. Theory

A. Classical and Alexandrian Greek. The rich epic trad. of the Greeks (Homer, Hesiod, Arctinus, Antimachus) was at first criticized more from an ethical than a literary standpoint. Xenophanes (frag. 11, Diels-Kranz), e.g., objected to Homer and Hesiod's depiction of gods as thieves, adulterers, and deceivers. In the Republic, Plato combines the ethical and literary when he attacks Homer for teaching the young morally pernicious ideas by the method of *imitation. Since, for Plato, Homer is also the founder of *tragedy, both genres stand condemned.

For Aristotle, too, poetry is imitation, but from this, he draws a radically different conclusion. Not only is imitation natural to humans, but, as intensified by tragedy, it can produce, by means of pity and fear, a katharsis ton pathematon (see CATHARSIS). That for Aristotle this puzzling but evidently drastic effect is also valid for epic follows from his acceptance of another Platonic insight, that epic is inherently dramatic. Since, unlike Plato, Aristotle argues that drama is the superior genre, the best epic must be Homer's because it is already "dramatic" (an adjective that Aristotle may have coined). Since Aristotle believes that drama (Gr., "that which is done") is important, it follows that the action has primacy. Not the soul of the hero but the mythic interaction of personae is the soul of the play, and indeed Aristotle criticizes epics that assert their unity merely by hanging a collection of disparate adventures onto a well-known name. Aristotle demands organic unity from the epic and requires that it be eusynopton (easily grasped in its totality) and that it not exceed the length of dramas shown at one sitting, a period of time usually calculated at 6,000 or 7,000 lines. Apollonius of Rhodes's Argonautica, written in Alexandria (3d c. BCE), exactly meets the criterion.

Aristotle objects to the confusion of epic and historical narrative, perhaps because he has a strict notion of the historian's duty to record. He ignores the fact that already Thucydides, e.g., had used mythical models to interpret events. He disapproves of the versification of Herodotus, but in allowing for "poetic" or imaginative prose, Aristotle opened the door to the mod. epic novel. The definition of epic attributed to his pupil and successor as head of the Lyceum in Athens, Theophrastus, as "that which embraces divine, heroic, and human affairs," shifts the emphasis from form to content. Aristotle's modification in the Rhetoric of his views on vocabulary is related. The Poetics had laid down that epic vocabulary should be clear but elevated, marked by the use of poetic words or "glosses." The later Rhetoric, however, under the impulse of Euripides, permits the use of words from the lang. of everyday life. He accepts as Homeric the comic Margites (The Crazy Man; cf. Orlando furioso), now lost, a silly account in mixed meters of a bumpkin who is not even sure how to proceed on his wedding night. Such openness contradicts Plato's severity and that of many later "Aristotelians."

The scholia or interpretive comments written in the margins of Homeric mss. prove that, after Aristotle, a practical crit. was worked out that preserved and extended his insights. Here, the Iliad and the Odyssey are regarded as tragedies, though the notion was not lost that Homer was also the founder of comedy. The contrast between epic and hist. is maintained. "Fantasy" is praised (cf. Dante, Paradiso 33.142) both as pure imagination and as graphic visualization of detail. Nonlinear presentation of the story may be made and at a variety of ling. levels.

The Certamen, also called the Contest of Homer and Hesiod, is extant in a text from the 2d c. CE but is believed to stem from an earlier work by Alcidamas (4th c. BCE). From antiquity, the question of which poet wrote first, and therefore had greater claim to legitimacy, existed, as did the idea that a *poetic contest had taken place between the two. In the Certamen, which expands on a brief mention of a competition in the Works and Days (8th c. BCE), Hesiod wins because his works deal with the domestic and agricultural, rather than the martial. This issue of the domestic as an appropriate focus for epic will appear again in Milton's Paradise Lost and in later explorations of the relationship between novel and epic.

Callimachus in Alexandria (3d c. BCE) shared Aristotle's objections to the versification of Herodotus. In rejecting the eulogistic epic, he worked out, in his own epic Hecale, a different kind of Homer-imitatio from the straight comparison of the mod. champion to a Homeric counterpart, a type apparently sought by Alexander the Great from the poetaster Choirilos of Iasos. Too little of Callimachus's epic Galateia now survives to make judgment possible, but his Deification of Arsinoe in lyric meter set the precedent for the appeal by a junior deity to a senior for elucidation that would become a topos* of the Lat. eulogy (e.g., in Claudian and Sidonius Apollinaris) and even be adapted by Dante in the first canzone of the Vita nuova. Since this topos had Homeric precedent (Iliad 1.493 ff.), Callimachus was indicating which parts of the Homeric legacy were imitable and how. In his elegiac Aetia, Callimachus advanced Hesiod as the figurehead of his new approach to epic.

The Argonautica is a further demonstration of the Alexandrian theory of epic. Out of their element in the heroic ambience, the characters collectively and Jason individually are often gripped by amekhanie (helplessness). Unified by verbal echoes of the red-gold icon of the fleece, the poem underplays the conventionally heroic in showing both the futility of war and the degradation of the hero who, dependent on a witch's Promethean magic, eventually becomes the cowardly murderer of Apsyrtus. Homeric allusions point the lesson, and the reader knows from Euripides that eventually the marriage of Jason and Medea will end not in triumph but in disaster (see ALEXANDRIANISM).

B. Classical and Medieval Latin. The Callimachean and Apollonian epic, i.e., the kind written by scholar-poets, treated the lit. of the past by *allusion and reminiscence in a polyphonic way. Catullus, the bitter foe of historical epic, also uses this technique in his poem 64. Similarly, in the Aeneid, Virgil uses Homer as a sounding board rarely for simple harmony but to secure extra and discordant resonance for his mod. symphony. Thus, Dido is at once the Odyssey's Calypso, Circe, Nausicaa, and Arete, and the Iliad's Helen and Andromache. Aeneas is Odysseus, Ajax, Paris, Agamemnon, Hector, and Achilles. There is no end to the sliding identities and exchanges (metamorphoses) of the characters. The poet who had quoted from Callimachus in Eclogue 6 in order to introduce an Ovidian poetic program and had progressed to epic through the Hesiodic Georgics, may, therefore, be properly regarded as Callimachean. But he is also Aristotelian, both in the dramatic nature of his poem and in its tragic affinities. In Italy, Aeneas gropes toward victory over the bodies of friend and foe alike. Vengeful Dido, by the technique of verbal reminiscence and recurrent imagery, is never absent from the poem. And although the epic exalts the origins of Rome, "umbrae" (shadows) is characteristically its last word.

The first Alexandrians were scholar-poets, and the third head of the library, Eratosthenes, still exemplified this ideal. But the early divergence of the two vocations led to a split between creative and critical sensibilities. Horace's Ars poetica (1st c. BCE), described by an ancient commentator as a versification of the prose treatise of the Alexandrian scholar Neoptolemus of Parium, though clearly in its emphasis on the vates more than this, recommends by its form a musicality in which arrangement and correspondence, interlace and arabesque, will replace the pedestrian logic of prose. A Roman and an Augustan, Horace moves beyond Callimachus when he urges that the poet, without in any way betraying Gr. refinement, must also be a vates*, engaged with his society and with the reform of public morals. This is an aspect of cl. epic subsumed by Dante in his allusion to Orazio satiro (Inferno 4.89).

Finally, Horace, who spoke of Homer's "auditor" (listener), took for granted a feature of ancient epic theory now often overlooked. Epic did not cease to be oral with Homer. The power of Virgil's "hypocrisis" (acting ability), the "sweetness and marvelous harlotries" of his voice, are attested in the Life written by Donatus (4th c. CE). This Aristotelian closeness to drama again implies polyphonic composition. According to this understanding of Virgil, there cannot be a single, univocal, "right" interpretation of the action.

However, with Virgil, epic, generally concerned with reflecting and establishing the self-identity of the culture that produces it, becomes heavily invested in the political. Virgil casts Aeneas as the first of a line of rulers culminating in the emperor Augustus, thus tying the foundation of Rome to the Trojan War and rewriting Aeneas's adventures as a myth of imperial foundation. He reinvents the crafty hero of the Odyssey as the ideal Roman character: Aeneas is an extraordinary warrior, but he is pius and obedient, qualities that were more valued by imperial Rome, and are, in the Aeneid, responsible for its founding. If Virgil's dramatic qualities are polyphonic, his narrative is nonetheless what M. Bakhtin, writing about epic in the mid-20th c., would term "monologic": the Aeneid's story is told in the inimitable and defined voice of a national identity that, as Quint argues, accepts its own version of events as absolute and ignores the possibility of another, outside voice. While the voices of marginalized figures—the abandoned Dido, the defeated Rutulians—continually intrude, Virgil's epic is nonetheless the act of a civilization writing its own self-contained and victorious hist.

The crit. by Agrippa of the Aeneid for its communia verba, recorded by Donatus in his Life of Virgil, shows that there had developed even under Augustus the theory that epic, as the most sublime of genres, demanded the most sublime lang. Petronius's implied crits. of Lucan in the Satyricon prove the persistence of this notion. At the end of cl. antiquity, the same theory received a fatally deceptive application. Rhetorica ad Herennium (ca. 86–82 BCE), influential in the Middle Ages, distinguished three styles, high, middle, and low; and, conveniently, Virgil had written three major poems: obviously, the Eclogues must exemplify the low style, the Georgics the middle, and the Aeneid the high. This was the doctrine that eventually found its med. canonization in the rota virgiliana* (Virgilian wheel) devised by John of Garland. By this, names, weapons, even trees that could be mentioned in the different styles were carefully prescribed. One part of the deadly consequences of this doctrine was that the opening toward comedy in the epic (the Margites) was lost. Yet even the late antique commentator Servius had remarked of the Aeneid, book 4, "paene comicus stilus est: nec mirum, ubi de amore tractatur" (the style is almost comic, and no surprise, considering the theme is love), and the trad. of Virgilian epic practice does not reject the comic.

Stung by Platonic crit. of Homer's "lying," Gr. Stoic philosophers in particular had developed a method of interpreting the Homeric narrative in symbolic terms intended to rescue its moral and theological credibility. In his efforts to reclaim all the genres for the new religion, the Christian Lat. poet Prudentius (ca. 348–405) wrote the epic Psychomachia, in which the contending champions were no longer flesh-and-blood heroes but abstract qualities of the soul. It was only a short step from this to allegorizing Virgil's Aeneid, the most important example of this being Fulgentius (late 5th–early 6th c.). Highly praised allegorical epics have been written, of which the most important is probably Spenser's incomplete Faerie Queene (1590, 1596; see ALLEGORY).

The critical failure of later antiquity meant, in effect, that any epic theory that was to make sense had to be recoverable from the practice of major poets. This fact lent even greater significance to the already towering figure of Dante, since it was he who, as the author of the epic Divine Comedy in the vernacular, broke decisively with both med. prescription and practice. He acknowledges the influence of Virgil's style (Inferno 1.85–87), and invokes in reference to his own journey that of Aeneas to the underworld, during which the future hist. of Rome is revealed to him (2.13–27). However, even as Dante is influenced by Virgil's political vision of epic, the epic journey is here recast as a personal and internal process, the struggle of the Christian soul to find God; the grandeur of conquest becomes the humility of spiritual seeking.

C. Renaissance to Modern. The Ren. critics (Marco Girolamo Vida, De arte poetica, 1527; Francesco Robortello, In librum Aristotelis de arte poetica explicationes, 1548; Antonio Minturno, De poeta, 1559; L'arte poetica, 1563) were often prescriptive rather than descriptive. Armed with the Poetics (trans. into Lat. by Giorgio Valla in 1498, 1536; Gr. text 1508; It. trans. 1549) and eventually with an amalgam of Aristotle and Horace, they advanced to war down the "unclassical" in epic but were largely the unconscious victims of old ideas. J. C. Scaliger, the most gifted scholar among them (Poetices libri septem, 1561), uses the evidence of lang. to decry Homer and exalt Virgil: the display by Homer of humilitas, simplicitas, loquacitas, and ruditas in his style must make him inferior to the Roman. If Virgil echoes Homer's description of Strife in his picture of Fama in book 4 of the Aeneid, that is an excuse for loading Homer with abuse. And just as ruthlessly as Agrippa with Virgil, these critics set about Dante, Ariosto, and Tasso for their unclassical backsliding.

In particular, because of the runaway popularity of Ariosto's Orlando furioso (1516), the issue of what kinds of subject matter, lang., and formal structure could be considered legitimately epic was of great interest in Italy in the mid-16th c. A number of critics objected to Ariosto (often in the strongest terms) because of his lack of moral purpose and, more significant, his failure to adhere to Aristotle's requirements for both a single, unified story and "probability" (which for Aristotle meant persuasiveness rather than, as for these critics, the absence of the fantastic). Attempting to rescue Ariosto from his detractors, Giambattista Giraldi Cinthio (Discorso intorno al comporre dei romanzi, 1554) and Giambattista Pigna (I romanzi, 1554) wrote that Ariosto's text was not a bad epic, but of a distinct genre with its own narrative conventions and subject matter: the romance. Cinthio argued against the stultifying *classicism of his contemporaries, suggesting that, as cultures and tastes develop, so too do literary forms, which should be judged by practical example rather than by abstract theory. According to the precept set by Ariosto and his predecessor Matteo Maria Boiardo, epic tells the story of one man, romance the story of many; thus, the latter has a more episodic, less unified structure than epic. The publication of Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata (1581) brought the discussion to near-fever pitch: his work was frequently pitted against Ariosto's, and both were praised as an example of Aristotelian unity (Camillo Pellegrino, Il Carrafa, 1584) and dismissed as a work of inferior artistry. Tasso, responding to the debate (Discorsi dell'arte poetica, 1587, although composed 1567–70), takes the part of the Aristotelians, insisting that romance and epic are not discrete genres and that, instead, Ariosto's loose structure and multiplicity of action make for a highly flawed epic.

The political nature of Virgilian epic continues in the Ren. Camões's Lusiads builds on an ostensibly prosaic story—the trading expedition of da Gama—to write a glorious and elaborate Port. hist. Tasso's portrayal of the First Crusade as the rightful liberation of Jerusalem by an army of virtuous Christians is intended to stir up support for the Catholic ambition, during the Counter-Reformation, of capturing Jerusalem from Ottoman control. Spenser's layered allegory is a celebration of Queen Elizabeth I in the figure of the "Faerie Queene" Gloriana, while it simultaneously casts her as the direct descendant of Gloriana and King Arthur. The poem, moreover, deals with a number of contemp. political issues, incl. the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots; anxieties about Catholicism and the empire of Philip II; and England's colonial interest in Ireland.

In Eng., Milton (Paradise Lost, 1667, 1674; Paradise Regain'd, 1671) was greatly influenced by both It. example and precept. He knew Giacopo Mazzoni's Difesa della Commedia di Dante (1587) and the theoretical work of Tasso, whose old patron, Count Manso, he had met during his travels in Italy (1637–39). He quotes from the Orlando furioso at the beginning of Paradise Lost (1.16, cf. Orlando furioso 1.2.2). And yet Paradise Lost is a self-consciously Eng. work, employing a traditionally Eng. meter and thoroughly Protestant in its theology. Milton's Epitaphium Damonis (1639) toys with the idea of a historical epic on Arthurian legends, and his notebooks, preserved in Cambridge, show that he considered a dramatic treatment of the same topics and of the story of Adam. In returning to epic, he fixed on this theological theme, to which the closest cl. parallel would be Hesiod's Theogony. It enabled him to set out his profoundest beliefs in the origin of the moral order of the universe, the human condition, and the Christian promise of atonement. Like Hesiod, moreover, Milton moves away from the subject matter of the Virgilian trad., the "Warrs, hitherto the onely Argument / Heroic deem'd" (Paradise Lost 9.28–29). His epic contains an extended martial episode—the war in heaven, in which Satan's followers rebel against divine authority—but the work is largely domestic in its focus, portraying the relationship between Adam and Eve as one of shared work, untainted sexuality, and great mutual love, thus prefiguring the domestic focus of the novel. Milton's assumption in the poem of a difficult lang., criticized by Samuel Johnson, is part of the struggle to convey truths larger than life. His Paradise Regain'd uses a simpler style to depict Christ's rebuttal of the temptations of Satan, emphasizing his humanity rather than divinity and, in Dantean fashion, his humility rather than glory.

In the 17th c., Fr. critics adapted and propagated the It. recension of Aristotle's rules, emphasizing *unity, *decorum, and verisimilitude, although the first trans. of the Poetics into Fr. did not appear until 1671. André Dacier's ed. and commentary (La Poétique d'Aristote contenant les règles les plus exactes pour juger du poème héroique et des pièces de théâtre, la tragédie et la comédie, 1692) became standard. This and other critical works (René Rapin, Réflexions sur la poétique d'Aristote, 1674; René le Bossu, Traité du poème épique, 1675) were regarded as normative throughout Europe. The epics they inspired have been universally regarded as failures.

By the late 17th. c., in Eng., epic was both a major influence and a source of anxiety. It was impossible to write epic in the straightforward manner of the Ren. poets; the genre was no longer part of current literary practice, and any attempt to produce it was to self-consciously and artificially to delve backward into the archaic. The poets of the Restoration and 18th c. wrote mock epic, which both parodied, portraying the trivial or the ridiculous in lofty style (John Dryden, "Mac-Flecknoe," 1682; Alexander Pope, The Rape of the Lock, 1714; and The Dunciad, 1743) or mocking lofty lang. (Samuel Butler, Hudibras, 1663–78), and reverenced the original epic form. Both Dryden and Pope produced trans. of cl. epics. The continued public interest in early epic is likewise reflected in James Macpherson's 1760–62 publication of Ossian, which he claimed to have translated from an ancient Gaelic text and which sparked controversy between those who insisted on its inauthenticity (Samuel Johnson among them) and those who argued for its antiquity and formal unity. In an argument that proved enormously influential even into the 20th c., G.W.F. Hegel theorized that epic, as a primitive form, was the expression of a nation's unified character, system of values, and worldview; the age of technological modernity cannot produce epic because people no longer engage vitally with the world around them (Lectures on Aesthetics, compiled 1835–38).

Conflict with France and increasing status as an imperial power helped to spur a resurgence of epics or works with significant epic characteristics in 19th c. Eng. (Dentith, Tucker). The romantics admired the vast cultural and poetic scope of the epic but were less intimidated by it than their predecessors: P. B. Shelley is as quick to criticize what he sees as the derivative efforts of Virgil as he is to praise Homer, Dante, and Milton (Defence of Poetry, 1821). However, poets who addressed martial, political, or national themes confronted the same potential archaism that had troubled writers in the previous century and a half, with widely varying results (Walter Scott, Marmion, 1808; Alfred, Lord Tennyson, Idylls of the King, 1859–85; William Morris, Sigurd the Volsung, 1876). At the same time, another kind of epic emerged, which dealt with nonmartial, contemp. subject matter and which was largely unhampered by issues of archaism because it addressed directly the values and concerns—here, primarily issues of selfhood and individual experience—of the age that produced it. In The Prelude (1805, pub. 1850), William Wordsworth adapts the traditional proem to declare human intellect and emotion, as well as a few intangibles (e.g. Truth, Beauty, Love) his epic subjects; Lord Byron's worldly and satirical Don Juan (1819–24), through the adventures of an oft-seduced innocent, reinscribes the epic conventions into a world-weary and ironic voice; Elizabeth Barrett Browning's Aurora Leigh (1856) uses a lofty and heroic style to narrate the adventures of an intellectually gifted young woman, who, in turn, insists that epic heroism is possible in any age.

But it is the novel that has proven the most resilient and productive descendant of the epic trad. Two 20th.-c. studies, Georg Lukács's Theory of the Novel (1916) and Bakhtin's essay "Epic and Novel" (written 1941, pub. 1970), have been influential in examining the relation between the two genres, which, following Hegel, they see as an issue of antiquity versus modernity. For Lukács, epic expresses a "totality" of collective experience that precludes individualism because the society that produces epic is utterly unified; the novel is the mod. attempt to recover that sense of totality, now lost, by reshaping the world through a process of individual experience. Bakhtin argues that epic deals with a founding hist. that exists before any sense of a transitory present and that, therefore, its perspective is absolute: there is no possibility of reinterpretation because there are no outside voices. The novel, by contrast, consists of many voices in a world of mutable time. For both, epic is the product of an absolute totality: Lukács sees the novel as heralding the loss of this totality, while for Bakhtin, it signals its triumphant overthrow. In addition, novels frequently address similar questions of modernity, often casting themselves as a derivation of or departure from antiquity (Scott, Ivanhoe, 1819; Gustave Flaubert, Madame Bovary, 1856–57]). Perhaps most famously, George Eliot's Middlemarch (1871–72) draws on St. Theresa's "epic life" as a symbol to explore the frustration that passionate and inspired young women encounter in an age that allows them few opportunities for greatness. The novel ends on a domestic note, as its heroine redirects her potentially epic nature to marriage and private life.

This is not to say that the cl. epic was effaced by modernity or the birth of the novel. On the contrary, literary *modernism of the early 20th c., which was deeply influenced by the unprecedented violence of World War I, brought with it an interest in reviving and reincorporating the trad. T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land (1922), Ezra Pound's many publications of the Cantos (1925–72), and James Joyce's Ulysses (1922) reinvent the stories and themes of cl. epic to reflect a new kind of consciousness, marked by disillusionment, fragmentation, and discontinuity. Ulysses translates the vast scope of the Homeric epic to a novel spanning only one day and dealing with ordinary, middle-class characters and concerns; far from the monologic epic spirit or the polyphony of Virgil's style, Joyce's novel is a cacophony of voices and thoughts, and it is often impossible to distinguish the thoughts of one character from the voice of another or from the narrator.

The creation of epic continues in recent years; the most prominent example is Derek Walcott's Omeros (1990), which translates Homeric elements into a story dealing with African hist. and working-class protagonists on a Caribbean island. Omeros is, like the epics of the Virgilian trad., explicitly political, bringing to light the effects of colonialism and slavery and imbuing the lives of its disenfranchised characters, as Dentith observes, with epic importance and dignity.

See NARRATIVE POETRY, ORAL POETRY.

■ Criticism and History: H. T. Swedenberg, The Theory of the Epic in England, 1650–1800 (1944); C. M. Bowra, From Virgil to Milton (1945), and Heroic Poetry (1952); E.M.W. Tillyard, The English Epic and Its Background (1954); R. A. Sayce, The French Biblical Epic in the Seventeenth Century (1955); T. M. Greene, The Descent from Heaven: A Study in Epic Continuity (1963); R. Durling, The Figure of the Poet in Renaissance Epic (1965); J. M. Steadman, Milton and the Renaissance Hero (1967); A. B. Giamatti, The Earthly Paradise and the Renaissance Epic (1966); M. R. Lida de Malkiel, Dido en la literatura española (1974)–on the Defense of Dido; L. Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, trans. B. Reynolds (1977); Parry; F. Blessington, "Paradise Lost" and the Classical Epic (1979); G. Nagy, The Best of the Achaeans (1979); M. Murrin, The Allegorical Epic (1980); M. M. Bahktin, "Epic and the Novel," The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist (1981); S. Revard, The War in Heaven (1980); A. Fichter, Poets Historical: Dynastic Epic in the Renaissance (1982); J. Kates, Tasso and Milton: The Problem of Christian Epic (1983); L. Robinson, Monstrous Regiment: The Lady Knight in Sixteenth-century Epic (1985); C. Martindale, John Milton and the Transformation of Ancient Epic (1986); R. Martin, The Language of Heroes (1989); A. Parry, The Language of Achilles and Other Papers (1989); D. C. Feeney, The Gods in Epic (1991); J. B. Hainsworth, The Idea of Epic (1991); A. Lord, Epic Singers and Oral Tradition (1991); A. Ford, Homer: The Poetry of the Past (1992); S. Wofford, The Choice of Achilles: The Ideology of Figure in the Epic (1992); C. Burrow, Epic Romance: Homer to Milton (1993); P. Hardie, The Epic Successors of Virgil (1993); D. Quint, Epic and Empire (1993); M. Desmond, Reading Dido (1994); M. Murrin, History and Warfare in Renaissance Epic (1994); J. Watkins, The Specter of Dido: Spenser and Virgilian Epic (1995); F. Moretti, Modern Epic (1996); G. Teskey, Allegory and Violence (1996); Epic Traditions in the Contemporary World: The Poetics of Community, ed. M. Beissinger, J. Tylus, S. Wofford (1999); Lord; J. Everson, The Italian Romance Epic in the Age of Humanism (2001); Horace, The Epistles of Horace, trans. D. Ferry (2001); Statius, Silvae, ed. and trans. D. R. Shackleton Bailey (2003); R. Padrón, The Spacious Word: Cartography, Literature, and Empire in Early Modern Spain (2004); A Companion to Ancient Epic, ed. J. M. Foley (2005); J. C. Warner, The Augustinian Epic, Petrarch to Milton (2005); T. Gregory, From Many Gods to One: Divine Action in Renaissance Epic (2006); S. Zatti, The Quest for Epic: From Ariosto to Tasso (2006).

■ Theory: D. Comparetti, Vergil in the Middle Ages, trans. E.F.M. Benecke (1895); Faral; J. E. Spingarn, History of Literary Criticism in the Renaissance, 2d ed. (1925); H. Strecker, "Theorie des Epos," Reallexikon I 4.28–38; E. Reitzenstein, "Zur Stiltheorie des Kallimachos," Festschrift Richard Reitzenstein (1931); Lewis; M.-L. von Franz, Die aesthetischen Anschauungen der Iliasscholien (1943); M. T. Herrick, The Fusion of Horatian and Aristotelian Literary Criticism, 1531–1555 (1946); Auerbach; Curtius; Frye; Weinberg; D. M. Foerster, The Fortunes of Epic Poetry: A Study in English and American Criticism 1750–1950 (1962); F. J. Worstbrock, Elemente einer Poetik der Aeneis (1963); G. N. Knauer, Die Aeneis und Homer (1964); A. Lesky, A History of Greek Literature, trans. J. Willis and C. de Heer (1966); K. Ziegler, Das hellenistische Epos, 2d ed. (1966); J. K. Newman, Augustus and the New Poetry (1967); E. Fränkel, Noten zu den Argonautika des Apollonios (1968); S. Koster, Antike Epostheorien (1970); Classical and Medieval Literary Criticism, ed. A. Preminger et al. (1974); Homer to Brecht: The European Epic and Dramatic Tradition, ed. M. Seidel and E. Mendelson (1976); R. Häussler, Das historische Epos der Griechen und Römer bis Vergil (1976); G. S. Kirk, Homer and the Oral Tradition (1976); R. Häussler, Das historische Epos von Lucan bis Silius und seine Theorie (1978); J. K. Newman, The Classical Epic Tradition (1986); S. M. Eisenstein, Nonindifferent Nature [1964], trans. H. Marshall (1987); R.O.A.M. Lyne, Further Voices in Vergil's "Aeneid" (1987); D. Shive, Naming Achilles (1987); B. Graziosi, Inventing Homer: The Early Reception of Epic (2002); S. Dentith, Epic and Empire in Nineteenth-Century Britain (2006); H. F. Tucker, Epic, Britain's Historic Muse 1790–1910 (2008).

T. B. Gregory (hist.); J. K. Newman; T. Meyers (theory)

EPICEDIUM (Lat.; Gr. epikedeion, "funeral song"). A song of mourning in praise of the dead, sung in the presence of the corpse and distinguished from threnos, a *dirge, which was not limited by time or place. The word does not occur before the Alexandrian period, or in Lat. before Statius (1st c. CE), although the lamentations over the bodies of Hector and Achilles in Homer are, properly speaking, epicedia. The epicedium became very popular in the Hellenistic period and was widely imitated in Lat. lit. It was accompanied by a solemn dance with music provided by a flute in the Lydian mode. Written originally in a variety of meters, it was confined after the cl. period entirely to elegiac *distichs and *hexameters. Epicedia also included lamentations in verse for pet animals and birds (e.g., Catullus 3; Ovid, Amores 2.6; Statius, Silvae 2.4 and 5).

See elegy, lament.

■ Pauly-Wissowa; G. Herrlinger, Totenklage um Tiere in der antiken Dichtung (1930); W. Kese, Untersuchungen zu Epikedion wid Consolatio in der rümischen Dichtung (1950); D. C. Allen, "Marvell's 'Nymph,'" ELH 23 (1956); M. Alexiou, The Ritual Lament in Greek Tradition (1974); H. H. Krummacher, "Deutsche barocke Epikedeion," Jahrbuch der Deutschen Schillergesellschaft 18 (1974); Michaelides.

P. S. Costas; T.V.F. Brogan

EPIDEICTIC POETRY. In the strict sense, poetry that follows the model of epideictic (or demonstrative) oratory, one of the three kinds of eloquence according to Aristotle's Rhetoric—the others being deliberative or political and forensic or legal—and the one in which, absent any urgent need to persuade, the speech can be appreciated for its own sake along with the object praised or blamed. The term can be used in a looser sense to designate any poetry that eulogizes someone or something, but it is usually employed in cases in which the praise feels "oratorical," whether or not it can be traced back to rhetorical models also used in prose. In ancient Greece, lyric forms dedicated to the act and function of extolling the gods, rulers, or victors at the national games (as in Pindar's epinicia) predated the formalization of epideictic eloquence in prose; poets of later eras, on the other hand, could follow such lyric templates while also borrowing from rhetorical ones. The fullest ancient presentation of the formulas is the Peri epideiktikon ("On Epideictic Oratory") of Menander (3d c. CE). Among the types are *encomium, *panegyric, *elegy, and *epithalamium, but places and objects can be praised as well as human subjects—whence formulas for praise of births, deaths, weddings, or victories, but also cities, monuments, public holidays, personal gifts, landscapes, and works of art.

While an important aspect of poetry (and a justification for it as well), the epideictic function was not always allowed to govern poetry rhetorically. An epic such as Virgil's Aeneid praised the emperor Augustus but found indirect ways to do so while developing the poem's fiction. In the lyric genre, Horace's Carmina imitated Sappho as well as Pindar: cl. lyric poetry, which "sang" of various objects, did not necessarily praise or blame them. Later in Rome's imperial period, however, as epideixis tended to overtake other forms of oratory, it also came to dominate poetry: many of the subjects treated, great or small, were posited as objects of praise and developed along recognized patterns. This remained the norm during much of the Middle Ages, esp. in Lat. Epideixis in poetry often came with an aestheticizing effect, which increased as the object of praise moved from the public sphere to more private domains; the mode that best encapsulated this trend was ekphrasis* or description of a beautiful object, often a work of art. Thus, the epideictic established a rhetorical niche for poetry, an area in which the aesthetic of praise fostered the praise of the aesthetic, within a larger culture of eloquence.

The poets of the Ren., who inherited much of antiquity's poetic trad., remained tempted by this arrangement, in which specialized forms of praise could deal with a wide variety of objects and circumstances and fulfill numerous social or political duties under an aesthetic patina. But they were just as likely to question or overturn it: on the one hand, they pushed their rhet. of praise toward *paradox and *satire; on the other, rather than contenting themselves with the regulated aestheticization of the praiseworthy, many of these poets went back to the original models of the *epic and *lyric genres, which practiced praise in different, less codified terms. Thus, while someone like Pierre de Ronsard was fully versed in the motifs of epideictic rhet., he also thought that poetry alone, in its unruly way, could deliver the highest, most powerful, and most civic form of eulogy (as Pindar had shown); and he refused at the same time to be constrained (any more than Horace had been) by such a lofty mission. Praising himself and his calling above all, he reserved the right to "immortalize" whatever he wanted, from the king of France to a wine glass; but he could also denounce praise as courtly flattery, unworthy of a true poet. He often praised or blamed his targets according to the degree of their support for poetry, subtly wove compliments into the veils of fabulous narratives, and put epideictic hyperboles to work in a different field—notably love poetry, as Petrarch had done in his Canzoniere by claiming that his beloved Laura was worthier than even Aeneas or Scipio.

In this way epideictic poems became rife with ambiguities, suggesting at once how poetry could find its proper place within a rhetorical frame and how it could escape from that place or adapt that frame to its own purposes. Something of the range of these possibilities appears in the following Eng. examples, which find distinctive ways to practice and inflect epideixis: Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella (praise as well as blame of a desired woman), Edmund Spenser's Epithalamion (a celebration of the poet's wedding), John Donne's Anniversaries on the Death of Elizabeth Drury (a funeral elegy), and Ben Jonson's "To Penshurst" (praise of a country house).

■ O. B. Hardison Jr., The Enduring Monument (1962); D. Ménager, Ronsard (1979); J. B. Allen, The Ethical Poetic of the Later Middle Ages (1982); C. Kallendorf, In Praise of Aeneas (1989); L. Pernot, La rhétorique de l'éloge dans le monde gréco-romain (1993); R. D. Lockwood, The Reader's Figure (1996); Poétiques de la Renaissance, ed. P. Galand-Hallyn and F. Hallyn (2001); L'éloge du prince, ed. I. Cogitore and F. Goyet (2003); J. A. Burrow, The Poetry of Praise (2008).

F. Cornilliat

EPIGRAM (Gr. epigramma, "inscription"). An ancient form, first carved on gravestones, statuary, and buildings. Epigrams encompass an almost infinite variety of tone and subject, but they are defined by *concision (relatively speaking: while many epigrams are two to four lines long, others are considerably longer). Many but certainly not all epigrams aim for a point or turn. Alone and as part of other forms, the epigram has many formal affiliations. Longer epigrams can shade into *elegy or *verse epistle. Poetic *epitaphs are a subgenre of epigram, and *emblems, *proverbs, aphorisms, maxims, and adages have often been shaped into epigrams. The *sonnet, particularly the Eng. sonnet, with its structure of three *quatrains and a concluding *couplet, has strong roots in the epigram.

Epigrams influenced Western poetry through two cl. sources: the Greek Anthology* and Roman epigrammatists, esp. Catullus and Martial. The Greek Anthology is additive, incl. poems written over the course of more than a thousand years, a gathering first begun by Meleager around 90 BCE. It originates the concept of *anthology itself (literally, "garland or gathering of flowers"), a collection arranged by some kind of ordering principle. Greek Anthology epigrams range from epitaphic to erotic, from invitations to thank-you notes, from satiric to polemical to moral; most are in *elegiac distichs. In the 10th c. CE, Constantine Cephalas, a Byzantine Greek, compiled a 15-part anthol., combining and rearranging earlier collections. In 1301, Maximus Planudes compiled an expurgated version, the first to appear in print (in 1494; called the Planudean Anthology). It had a profound effect on subsequent Neo-Lat. and developing vernacular poetry. In 1606, Claudius Salmasius (Claude Saumaise) discovered a copy of Cephalas's version of the anthol. in the Elector Palatine's library in Heidelberg. This full version, known as the Palatine Anthology, was finally published between 1794 and 1814 in 13 volumes.

Roman devels. of the epigram trad. bear the stamp of particular authors. Especially influential are Catullus and Martial, who arranged epigrams in groups unified by the presence of a witty, observant persona. Catullus's epigrams of everyday life and intimate social relationships demonstrate the form's lyric potential. Martial explicitly modeled his epigrams on Catullus's but developed a much sharper degree of social *satire, underscored by the strong closure effected by a point or turn.

Ren. poetry embraced the epigram: from anthol.-influenced collections incl. sonnet sequences (e.g., Clément Marot in France), to incisive satiric epigrams influenced by Martial (e.g., Baltasar Alcázar and Juan de Mal Lara in Spain), to aphoristic commonplaces. The extensive treatment of the epigram by important theorists such as J. C. Scaliger (Poetices libri septem [Seven Books of Poetics], 1561) and George Puttenham (The Arte of English Poesie, 1589) established it as a core cl. genre. Because of its antiquity and brevity, the epigram was central to humanist education, trans. and imitated by pupils throughout Europe. Thomas More's and Étienne Pasquier's Neo-Lat. epigrams exemplify the international humanist culture that remained vibrant through the 17th c.

In Eng., notable 16th-c. epigrammatists include John Heywood, John Harington, and John Davies. The mature flowering of the Eng. epigram came in the 17th c. with Ben Jonson, Martial's most influential Eng. imitator. His epigrams combine cl. learning with dramatic accuracy; they range from miniature portraits of city and court denizens ("To My Lord Ignorant": "Thou call'st me Poet, as a terme of shame: / But I have my revenge made, in thy name"), to *epideictic epigrams of named personages and touching epitaphs such as "On My First Son." Emblems, most famously Francis Quarles's, yoked epigrams with images. George Herbert wrote Lat. epigrams, and not only his Eng. poetry but his very conception of The Temple as a linked poetic book is indebted to the epigram trad. Richard Crashaw's divine epigrams are shockingly physical performances of baroque compression. Robert Herrick experimented with *tone and subject; Hesperides includes hundreds of epigrams ranging from versified maxims to social satire, Catullan love lyrics, and epitaphs for flowers, pets, and himself. While Andrew Marvell also wrote discrete epigrams, "Upon Appleton House," with its tight, allusive stanzas, is one of the great achievements of the epigram trad.

At different historical moments, the two epigrammatic strains (brief lyrics, on the one hand, pointed aphorisms or satires, on the other) can coexist, or one can dominate. In a sense, the epigram was most pervasive in the long 18th c. John Dryden, Nicolas Boileau, Alexander Pope, Voltaire, J. W. Goethe, and Friedrich Schiller wrote epigrams; and, more generally, the centrality of the couplet to *neoclassical poetics is an epigrammatic devel. By the late 18th c., however, many poets reacted against pointed wit and turned to epigram's lyric potential. Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" combines aphoristic formulations with elegiac reverie; and William Wordsworth, while explicitly rejecting epigrammatic wit, worked extensively with epigram's subgenre, epitaph. Nevertheless, the pointed epigram remained important. William Blake returned to epigram's origins, engraving poetry with image. The proverbs embedded in Blake's Marriage of Heaven and Hell ("The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom") foreshadow the strongly turned, witty aphorisms of Oscar Wilde, Mark Twain, and Dorothy Parker. W. S. Landor is a notable epigrammatist, and epigram is the building block of Lord Byron's mock epic Don Juan. Antonio Machado and Fernando Pessoa make an epigrammatic mode available as a stance or perspective.

American poetry has fostered a brilliant epigram trad. Emily Dickinson's aphoristic, gathered poems are epigrams. Ezra Pound's imagistic "In a Station of the Metro" attempts to fuse epigram and *haiku (see JAPAN, MODERN POETRY OF); H.D., Wallace Stevens, and W. C. Williams used the epigrammatic mode to capture direct address and strong imagery; J. V. Cunningham's epigrams are explicitly cl. Because of its ling. compression, strong turn, and use of rhyme for point, epigram continues to be a dominant form in contemp. lyric poetry.

■ T. K. Whipple, Martial and the English Epigram from Sir Thomas Wyatt to Ben Jonson (1925); J. Hutton, The Greek Anthology in Italy (1935) and The Greek Anthology in France and the Latin Writers in the Netherlands (1946); H. H. Hudson, The Epigram in the English Renaissance (1947); I. P. Rothberg, "Hurtado de Mendoza and the Greek Epigrams," Hispanic Review 26 (1958); B. H. Smith, Poetic Closure (1968); G. Hartman, Beyond Formalism (1970); R. L. Colie, The Resources of Kind: Genre-Theory in the Renaissance (1973); A. Fowler, Kinds of Literature (1982); A. Cameron, The Greek Anthology: From Meleager to Planudes (1993); D. Russell, "The Genres of Epigram and Emblem," CHLC, v. 3, ed. G. P. Norton (1999); Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. S. Hornblower and A. Spawforth, 3d ed. (2003); A. W. Taylor, "Between Surrey and Marot: Nicolas Bourbon and the Artful Translation of the Epigram," Translation and Literature 15 (2006); W. Fitzgerald, Martial: The World of the Epigram (2007); Brill's Companion to Hellenistic Epigram, ed. P. Bing and J. Bruss (2007).

A. B. COIRO

EPINIKION, also epinicion, epinician. A triumphal song, an *ode commemorating a victory at one of the four great Gr. national games. It was sung either on the victor's arrival at his native town, during the solemn procession to the temple, or at the banquet held to celebrate his victory. The ordinary epinikion consisted of a number of groups, each of three stanzas (*strophe, *antistrophe, *epode), and contained an account of the victory of the hero, a myth (the most important part of the poem, relating the victor's deed to the glorious past of his family), and the conclusion, which returned to the praise of the victor and ended with reflective admonitions or even a prayer. The most eminent representatives of this type of composition are Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchylides. One of the latest epinikia on record is that composed by Euripides for Alcibiades on the occasion of the latter's victory in three chariot races at Olympia (420 BCE).

■ Schmid and Stählin; M. R. Lefkowitz, The Victory Ode (1976); Michaelides; Pindar's Victory Songs, ed. and trans. F. J. Nisetich (1980); K. Crotty, Song and Action (1982); W. Mullen, Choreia (1982); A. P. Burnett, The Art of Bacchylides (1985); L. Kurke, The Traffic in Praise (1991); H. W. Smyth, Greek Melic Poets (1900, rpt. 2006).

T.V.F. BROGAN; P. S. COSTAS

EPIPLOKE (Gr., "plaiting" or "weaving together"). A term occasionally applied by ancient metrists to metrical sequences capable of alternative *scansion depending on where the *colon or *metron boundary is located—e.g., x – ⏑ – x – ⏑ – x, which will be *iambic if a boundary precedes each *anceps, and *trochaic if it follows. Such sequences were seen as composed of an "interweaving" of the alternative forms involved—iambic with trochaic, *ionic (⏑ ⏑ – –) with choriambic (– ⏑ ⏑ –), bacchiac (⏑ – –) with *cretic (– ⏑ –) (see CHORIAMB, BACCHIUS). With the exception of *dochmiacs and dipodic *anapests, all Gr. rhythmical types are subject to interweavings of this sort, and certain verse structures are better described as epiploke than as a succession of discrete cola and metra, division into units of this latter sort becoming possible, if at all, only once the verse design is instantiated in a particular line, *strophe, or antistrophe. There is, however, no agreement as to the frequency of such structures or their general importance in the Gr. prosodic system.

■ Hephaestion, Enchiridion, ed. M. Consbruch (1906), 110–11, 120–21, 127; A. M. Dale, Collected Papers (1969); T. Cole, Epiploke (1988), ch. 1.

A. T. COLE

EPITAPH (Gr., "writing on a tomb"). A funerary inscription or a literary composition imitating such an inscription. Literate cultures have often commemorated the dead in artful epitaphs: e.g., laudatory epitaphs combining ornate prose and verse were an important premod. Chinese literary genre, while cl. Ar. inscriptions combined prose biography with verse warnings of divine judgment.

In the West, pithy Gr. verse grave inscriptions, most influentially in elegiac couplets, arose in the 7th c. BCE. Epigrammatists through the Hellenistic period composed both inscriptional and pseudoinscriptional epitaphs, some ribald and satiric. Many appear in book 7 of the Greek Anthology*. With expressive brevity epitaphs lament, beg remembrance, proclaim fame, warn of death's inevitability, and bid the passerby enjoy life or imitate the deceased. The dead sometimes "speak" (imperiously or imploringly) to the visitor, as in Simonides' famous elegiac distich on the Spartans at Thermopylae ("Go, stranger, tell the Spartans / That here obedient to their laws we lie").

Poets of Augustan Rome adapt the epitaphic voice of the dead for highly original fictional epitaphs (e.g., Horace's Odes 1.28, Propertius's Elegies 1.21). They also influentially provide pithy epitaphic self-descriptions: an elegiac *distich ancient biographers ascribe to Virgil encapsulates his life and achievement, Propertius and Tibullus incorporate two-line epitaphs on themselves in their love elegies, and Ovid provides a two-couplet epitaph imploring fellow lovers to wish his bones lie soft (a traditional formula) in Tristia 3.3. Virgil's Eclogues 5 and Ovid's Amores 2.6 also influentially conclude lengthy *laments with brief *panegyric epitaphs providing forceful closure and the consolation of fame. The Silver Lat. epigrammatist Martial writes much-admired satiric epitaphs and tender ones on beloved slave boys and pets.

Early Christian and med. epitaphs combined commemoration with memento mori verses, proclamations of the afterlife, and requests for prayers. Lat. and then vernacular formulas like the grimly chiastic "As you are now, so once was I, / As I am now, soon you must be" appear on med. to 19th-c. gravestones. Numerous Ren. epigrammatists, by contrast, recall cl. accents of restrained grief or praise of individual achievement, such as the 15th-c. Neo-Lat. poet Michele Marullo: "Here I, Alcino, lie: my mourning parents buried me. / That is life's and childbirth's reward"; "His ancestry if you are told, you will feel contempt, but you will admire his deeds. / The former derives from fortune, the latter from character." Giovanni Pontano's De tumulis (Of Grave Mounds, 1505) combines cl. and Christian motifs in epitaphs on family and friends. Seventeenth-c. Eng. epigrammatists produce memorable epitaphs. Ben Jonson's "On My First Daughter" describes the mourning parents with third-person restraint; depicts the daughter Mary in a feminized heaven; tenderly plays (as is common in epitaphs) with her name; and closes with Roman solicitude for her earthly remains. "On My First Son" laments before deploying epitaphic formulas and a Martial echo to express Jonson's paternal pride tempered by a wish henceforth not to be attached "too much" to what he loves. Jonson's disciple Robert Herrick writes self-consciously modest epitaphic tributes to humble creatures (infants, his maid, his dog) as well as to himself.

Eighteenth- and 19th-c. inscriptions for the social elite were often verbose, bombastic panegyrics; critics lambasted "sepulchral lies" (Alexander Pope). In his essay on epitaphs, Samuel Johnson warned against falsehood but approved omitting faults. Yet poets continued to write epigrammatic epitaphs both for panegyric, as in Pope's heroic couplet on Isaac Newton ("Nature, and Nature's Laws lay hid in Night. / God said, Let Newton be! And all was Light"), and *satire. Alexis Piron mocked the Fr. Academy that had rejected him: "Ci-gît Piron, qui ne fut rien, / Pas même académicien" (Here lies Piron, who was nothing, / Not even a member of the Academy). With a terse somberness recalling Gr. epitaphs, by contrast, Herman Melville's Civil War epitaphs commemorate unnamed soldiers' tragic honor.

Late 18th- and 19th-c. poets also treat the epitaph as spur to *lyric. Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" influentially meditates on people's desire for remembrance, exemplified by humble churchyard epitaphs, before concluding with the poet's own epitaph. William Wordsworth, the author of three essays on the genre, composed epitaphs, lyrical responses to epitaphs, and poems such as "The Solitary Reaper" adapting motifs such as the address to the passerby. Walt Whitman's "As Toilsome I Wander'd Virginia's Woods" incorporates a "rude" one-line Civil War inscription as its insistent refrain.

In the 20th-c. West, grave inscriptions largely disappeared as a serious poetic form with the decline of the living's contact with the buried dead. Poets have continued to write comic, satiric, and fictional epitaphs (such as Thomas Hardy's Gr.-indebted epitaphs on cynics and pessimists and those on an imaginary Midwestern town's inhabitants in Edgar Lee Masters's Spoon River Anthology, 1915). Poetic epitaphs on soldiers and victims of war have been the most common type of serious epitaph, such as Rudyard Kipling's and A. E. Housman's World War I compositions. Otherwise, poets composing epitaphs have self-consciously revised the tropes of a genre whose anachronism is part of the point. R. M. Rilke's epitaph on himself, "Rose, oh pure contradiction, delight / in being nobody's sleep under so many / eyelids," hermetically addresses the rose, a symbol of poetry itself, rather than the reader. W. B. Yeats's self-epitaph from "Under Ben Bulben," "Cast a cold eye / On life, on death. / Horseman, pass by," substitutes for the cl. pedestrian wayfarer an equestrian evoking antiquated Ir. nobility and deploys cl. pithiness to demand not respect or pity for the dead but heroic disdain for the mortal. Anne Carson's Men in the Off Hours (2000) contains pithy, highly enigmatic "Epitaphs" on "Evil," "Europe," and "Thaw," evoking cl. epitaphs' elegiac couplets but written as if they were partially comprehensible fragments from bygone civilizations. Carson also discovers in ms. crossouts a new form of epitaph, where "all is lost, yet still there."

See ELEGY, EPIGRAM.

■ P. Friedländer, Epigrammata: Greek Inscriptions in Verse from the Beginnings to the Persian War (1948);

W. Peek, Griechische Grabgedichte (1960); R. Lattimore, Themes in Greek and Latin Epitaphs (1962); E. Bernhardt-Kabisch, "Wordsworth: The Monumental Poet," PQ 44 (1965); G. Hartman, "Wordsworth, Inscriptions, and Romantic Nature Poetry," From Sensibility to Romanticism, ed. F. W. Hilles and H. Bloom (1965); L'Epigramme Grecque, ed. A. E. Raubitschek (1968); G. Grigson, The Faber Book of Epigrams and Epitaphs (1977); E. Bernhardt-Kabisch, "The Epitaph and the Romantic Poets: A Survey," Huntington Library Quarterly 30 (1978); P. Ariès, The Hour of Our Death, trans. H. Weaver (1981); D. Fried, "Repetition, Refrain, and Epitaph," ELH 53 (1986); K. Mills-Court, Poetry as Epitaph: Representation and Poetic Language (1990); J. Scodel, The English Poetic Epitaph: Commemoration and Conflict from Jonson to Wordsworth (1991); A. Schottenhammer, "Characteristics of Song Epitaphs," Burial in Song China, ed. D. Kuhn (1994); A. Petrucci, Writing the Dead: Death and Writing Strategies in the Western Tradition, trans. M. Sullivan (1998); K. S. Guthke, Epitaph Culture in the West (2003); W. Waters, Poetry's Touch: On Lyric Address (2003); W. Diem and M. Schöller, The Living and the Dead in Islam: Studies in Arabic Epitaphs, 3 v. (2004).

J. Scodel

EPITHALAMIUM (Gr., "in front of the wedding chamber"). The term epithalamion (Lat. epithalamium) categorizes texts concerning marriage, but epithalamia are as varied in their structures and tonalities as the occasions they commemorate. They range from poems that sedulously engage with norms established by earlier participants in the genre to ones linked to their predecessors merely by their subject matter. Some are unambiguously and joyously celebratory; others, such as John Suckling's "Ballade, Upon a Wedding," parody the participants, the event, and the convention, while yet other texts uneasily occupy shifting positions on that spectrum. Similarly, the genre encompasses everything from poems erotic enough to court the label of pornography, notably the work of the Neo-Lat. writer Johannes Secundus, to some that virtually ignore sex. Different though epithalamia are in these and other ways, they typically offer a particularly valuable occasion for studying the interaction of literary conventions and social practices and pressures on issues ranging from gender to politics to spatiality.

Reflected in the name of the genre, the folk practice of singing outside the room where the marriage is consummated lies behind later versions of the epithalamium. The Song of Solomon and Psalm 45 offer scriptural antecedents. Many Gr. and Lat. poems, notably Theocritus's Idyll 18, describe weddings; but by far the most influential cl. contributions are three poems by the Roman poet Catullus: 61, 62, and 64. The imitation of these earlier models common in later poems mirrors the concern for lineage thematized in the poems themselves.

Although the Middle Ages witnessed the use of epithalamic lang. in descriptions of mystical spiritual marriages, the genre did not enjoy a vogue until the Ren. That period saw numerous Neo-Lat. epithalamia, as well as an extensive discussion of both literary and folk versions of this mode in the monumental Lat. text by J. C. Scaliger, Poetices libri septem (Seven Books of Poetics, 1561). The Fr. poets participating in the genre include Clément Marot and Pierre de Ronsard. Contributions from the Sp. Golden Age often incorporate the allegorical figure of Fame; indeed, many epithalamia in the early mod. era, incl. Edmund Spenser's Prothalamion (1596), court *patronage through eulogistic tributes to the participants in a royal or aristocratic wedding. By far the most influential Eng. instance, however, is Spenser's Epithalamion (1595), written for his own wedding. The popularity of the genre soared in the 17th c., with John Donne, Ben Jonson, and Robert Herrick, among others, writing such lyrics. Epithalamia also appeared in 16th- and 17th-c. plays and in *masques.

Versions arise in many other cultures and eras as well. Asian trads., e.g., include ancient poems praising members of the couple. Alfred, Lord Tennyson's In Memoriam (1850) ends on verses about a wedding, an example of the elegiac elements so common in wedding poetry (perhaps encouraged by the tale of the fatal events at the marriage of the mythological poet Orpheus). Among the many 20th-c. epithalamia are wedding poetry by W. H. Auden, James Merrill, and Gertrude Stein.

Common conventions of the Eng. and continental trads. include praise of the couple; invocations of the mythological figure associated with marriages, Hymen; prayers for children; allusions to dangers that must be avoided; and references to houses and thresholds. Often the poet assumes the role of master of ceremonies. *Refrains frequently appear, as do images of nature and warfare, as well as references to political events, the latter exemplifying the social and public orientation of many epithalamia. Critics often divide the genre into two types: the so-called lyric epithalamium, which generally describes the events of the wedding day in chronological form, as Catullus 61 does; and the epic epithalamium, exemplified by Catullus 64, which recounts a mythological story connected with a marriage. Other scholars have, however, challenged this binary categorization, stressing that some poems fit imperfectly and many others not at all.

In addition to the elegiac propensities exemplified by the work of Tennyson and many other poets, the genre of marriage often effects its own flirtations or marriages with and divorces from many other poetic genres. *Pastoral elements are common. The epithalamium borrows from Petrarchan love poetry and often also offers a countervailing vision in which conjugal happiness replaces the frustrations often though not invariably associated with Petrarchism. Epithalamia within masques, a number of which celebrate weddings, gesture toward an affinity between those modes that encapsulate recurrent characteristics of wedding poetry: both that genre and masques are concerned to acknowledge but contain threats, esp. to communal order, and both emphasize the relationship between individuals and the community. Esp. intriguing is the link between the paraclausithyron, a convention that portrays a lover attempting to gain admission to the house of the beloved, and the epithalamium: on one level, the wedding poem is a potential sequel or alternative to this sort of "closed-door poem," while spatially it reverses positions, placing the lover within an enclosed space suggested by its title and the rest of the community outside.

See BLASON, EPIDEICTIC POETRY.

■ English Epithalamies, ed. R. Case (1896); J. McPeek, Catullus in Strange and Distant Britain (1939); T. M. Greene, "Spenser and the Epithalamic Convention," CL 9 (1957); A. Hieatt, Short Time's Endless Monument (1960); V. Tufte, The Poetry of Marriage (1970); High Wedlock Then Be Honored, ed. V. Tufte (1970); J. Loewenstein, "Echo's Ring: Orpheus and Spenser's Career," English Literary Renaissance 16 (1986); C. Schenck, Mourning and Panegyric (1988); T. Deveny, "Poets and Patrons: Literary Adulation in the Epithalamium of the Spanish Golden Age," South Atlantic Review 53 (1988); H. Dubrow, A Happier Eden (1990); J. Owens, "The Poetics of Accommodation in Spenser's 'Epithalamion,'" SEL 40 (2000); B. Boehrer, "'Lycidas': The Pastoral Elegy as Same-Sex Epithalamium," PMLA 117 (2002).

H. DUBROW

EPITHET. A modifier specifying an essential characteristic and appearing with a noun or a proper name to form a phrase. The word derives from the Gr. epitheton (attributed, added), which Lat. grammarians considered to be equivalent to "adjective." Isidore of Seville writes that epithets "are called either adjectives (adiectivus) or additions, because they are 'added to' (adicere, ppl. adiectus) nouns to complete the meaning." In mod. scholarship, the term designates a rhetorical device whose best known examples come from Homer, such as the first elements of "wine-dark sea" and "swift-footed Achilles." They appear in formulaic constructions, i.e., each phrase follows a metrical pattern and conveys an essential idea. In this rhetorical sense, epithets are not restricted to single adjectives; they may include nouns or phrases. Conveying what is essential to the noun continues to characterize epithet even in later centuries when the phrase is not formulaic. George Herbert's "quick ey'd love," which resembles the Homeric "gray-eyed Athena," and John Milton's "all-ruling heaven," which William Wordsworth later adopted, illustrate this defining characteristic. The distinction between epithet and adjective, however, is not always clear.

The formulaic nature of older epithets is not limited to Gr. and Lat., which inherited them as a feature indigenous to IE verse, as with the Homeric phrase for "imperishable fame" (κλέος ἄφθιτον), which has an exact analog in the ancient Rig Veda (śrávas ákṣitam). Still other formulaic epithets find parallels among various IE poetic trads. However, the device extends beyond IE languages. Epithets or constructions very like them can be found, e.g., in med. Ar. love poetry, Twi literature of Ghana, and early Japanese court poetry known as waka*, which calls them makura-kotoba (pillow words).

In Eng. lit., the device has an older hist. than, for instance, the Homeric imitation in Edmund Spenser's "rosy-fingred Morning." Beowulf and other OE poems made frequent use of formulas like æþeling ær-god, "pre-eminent prince," and kennings like lyft-floga, "air-flier, dragon" and freoðu-webbe, "peace-weaver, lady." The appositive syntax allowed multiple epithets in lines like he on ræste geseah / guð-werigne Grendel licgan, / aldor-leasne, "he saw Grendel lying in rest, battle-weary, lifeless." Another influence in Eng. and elsewhere, though difficult to measure, may be the litanies in Christian liturgy, which include sequences such as Jesu potentissime, Jesu patientissime, Jesu obedientissime, Jesu mitis et humilis corde. Not limited to Christianity, the repetition of epithet-like names for the divine is a feature of religious trads. throughout history.

The device can be extended. Once it becomes well established, an epithet can stand alone, such as "The Philosopher," meaning "The Philosopher Aristotle." This omission of the noun was known in cl. rhet. as *antonomasia. In a "transferred epithet," the modifier typically specifies a human attribute and applies it to an inanimate noun (e.g., "angry crown," "condemned cell"). A colloquial use since the 19th c., which owes little to the rhetorical device, applies to any offensive or abusive term, e.g., "racial epithet."

■ B. Groom, The Formation and Use of Compound Epithets in English Poetry from 1579 (1937); L. H. Ofosu-Appiah, "On Translating the Homeric Epithet and Simile into Twi," Africa 30 (1960); F. C. Robinson, "Beowulf" and the Appositive Style (1985); A Waka Anthology, trans. E. A. Cranston (1993); The Etymologies of Isidore of Seville, trans. S. A. Barney et al. (2006); M. L. West, Indo-European Poetry and Myth (2007).

D. G. DONOGHUE

EPITRITE, epitritic (Gr., "one-third as much again"). One of the four categories of rhythm, in Gr. prosody, for any foot containing one short and three long syllables: so described because the ratio of two longs to a long and a short is, in temporal units, 4:3. The position of the short syllable determines the description of the epitrite as first, second, third, or fourth (respectively, ⏑ – – – , – ⏑ – – , – – ⏑ – , – – – ⏑), but the first and fourth were avoided by Gr. poets as unrhythmical.

See DACTYLO-EPITRITE.

■ Koster; West; J. M. v. Ophuijsen, Hephaestion on Metre (1987).

R. J. GETTY; T.V.F. BROGAN

EPODE (Gr., "after-song"). (1) Gr. lyric *odes of the archaic and cl. periods often consisted of three parts: the *strophe and *antistrophe, which were metrically identical, i.e., in *responsion, and the concluding epode, which differed in meter. Ben Jonson called them, usefully, "turn," "counter-turn," and "stand." Collectively, they are called a "triad." Stesichorus used extended sets of such triads for lyric narrative, Pindar and Bacchylides composed *epinikion odes in triads, and the choral songs of Attic drama often contain an epode after one or more sets of responding strophes and antistrophes. The Gr. noun epōidos (Lat., epodos), which was originally an adjective, was feminine in gender when used to designate the last part of a triad (epōidos strophē). (2) When masculine (epōidos stichos), it denoted the second (and occasionally third), shorter *colon of a brief strophe, consisting in most cases of a *hexameter or an *iambic *trimeter followed by a colon in *dactylic or iambic meter. The poems composed of strophes with such alternating meters in their two (or three) cola are also called epodes. The archaic poets Archilochus and Hipponax used this kind of composition, often for personal *invective, e.g., Archilochus' "Cologne Epode," recounting a seduction. In the Hellenistic age, epodic composition was adapted to book poetry, as in Callimachus' Iambi 5, 6, and 7 and in some *epigrams. Horace introduced the form into Lat. in his epodes, which he called Iambi.

■ Dale; Maas; West.

R. J. Getty; J. W. Halporn; K. J. Gutzwiller

EPYLLION. The Gr. word epyllion (a diminutive of epos, "word," "hexameter verse," "hexameter poem") meant "versicle" or "short poem," often in a pejorative sense. From the first half of the 19th c., it has been used in the sense "little epic" to refer to short narrative poems in *dactylic hexameters. The Gr. *epic trad. has provided one early example in the pseudo-Hesiodic Shield, which describes a shield used by Heracles in combat. The epyllion was particularly cultivated in the Hellenistic era, in correlation with a new critical distinction between poiēma, "short poem," emphasizing word choice and stylistic arrangement, and poiēsis, "long poem," conceived as a complex weaving of plot and characterization. Hellenistic epyllia, which ran from about 100 to more than 1,000 lines in length, i.e., short enough to fit on one papyrus bookroll, presented mythical narratives that subverted the heroic trad. by shifting the focus to previously marginalized characters, such as the elderly, the poor, women, herdsmen, and even animals. The poem presented a single episode, often illuminated by a digressive secondary story, sometimes in the form of an ekphrasis*. The interest was placed on personal relationships, involving romance or emotional bonds between persons of different status. Early epic, the Homeric *hymns, and narrative *lyric provided models, reworked by humanization and humor. The style was highly polished, with choice vocabulary and learned allusions. The most famous epyllion was Callimachus' now fragmentary Hecale, recounting the modest entertainment of Theseus by the elderly Hecale; other Hellenistic examples include Theocritus's Hylas and Baby Heracles, the Theocritean Heracles the Lionslayer, and Moschus' Europa. Epic *parodies, such as the Battle of the Frogs and Mice, also fit the category. Epyllia were favored by the Lat. *neoterics, as exemplified by Catullus 64 on the marriage of Peleus and Thetis inset with an ekphrastic digression on the abandonment of Ariadne. Other Lat. examples are the pseudo-Virgilian Culex, Moretum, and Ciris. In the Augustan Age, the epyllion form began to appear within other genres: Virgil's *didactic Georgics ends with the Aristaeus epyllion featuring a digressive account of Orpheus and Eurydice, and Ovid's Metamorphoses was constructed as a series of epyllia, which heavily influenced early mod. examples. Epyllia were again composed in late antiquity, in both Gr. (Triphiodorus' Sack of Ilion, Colluthus' Rape of Helen, and Musaeus' Hero and Leander) and in Lat. (Dracontius). The term epyllion has been applied to certain Eng. Ren. poems (e.g., Christopher Marlowe's Hero and Leander, William Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis), Fr. poems of the Pléiade* school (e.g., Pierre de Ronsard's Hymnes, Jean-Antoine de Baïf's Ravissement d'Europe), and Ger. *rococo poems.

■ M. M. Crump, The Epyllion from Theocritus to Ovid (1931); W. Allen Jr., "The Epyllion," TAPA 71 (1940); J. F. Reilly, "Origins of the Word 'Epyllion'," CJ 49 (1953–54); W. Allen Jr., "The Non-Existent Classical Epyllion," SP 55 (1958); Elizabethan Minor Epics, ed. E. S. Donno (1963); A. Maler, Der Held im Salon (1973); W. Keach, Elizabethan Erotic Narratives (1977); K. J. Gutzwiller, Studies in the Hellenistic Epyllion (1981); G. W. Most, "Neues zur Geschichte des Terminus 'Epyllion'," Philologus 126 (1982); É. Wolff, "Quelques précisions sur le mot 'epyllion'," RPh 62 (1988); D. F. Bright, The Miniature Epic in Vandal Africa (1987); C. U. Merriam, The Development of the Epyllion Genre (2001); A. Bartels, Vergleichende Studien zur Erzählkunst des römischen Epyllion (2004); R. Hunter, "Epic in a Minor Key," Tradition and Innovation in Hellenistic Poetry, ed. M. Fantuzzi and R. Hunter (2004); A. Hollis, "The Hellenistic Epyllion and Its Descendants," Greek Literature in Late Antiquity, ed. S. F. Johnson (2006); Callimachus: Hecale, ed. A. Hollis (2009).

K. J. Gutzwiller

EQUIVALENCE. In its strict metrical sense, equivalence is key for understanding both cl. and mod. *versification in Eur. langs.; in its more recent meaning, equivalence is one of the foundational principles of metrical theory.

In *classical prosody, equivalence is sometimes used to denote *resolution, the metrical principle whereby one longum may replace two brevia. Thus, in the epic hexameter, *spondees may replace certain *dactyls, typically in the sixth foot, as Homer does in the first line of the Odyssey, or in the sixth and third feet, as in the first line of the Iliad. The principle or system of metrical equivalence (based on orthography) justifies such substitution of feet, not any actual temporal ratio of one long being equal to two shorts, though that belief has persisted since ancient times. The rules of syllable equivalence, thus, allow metrical variety in successive lines while ensuring identity in their *measure, i.e., conformity to the *meter.

In the older Eng. metrists, the sense of equivalence is less clear than in the cl. langs. Some, even up to the 20th c., argued that Eng. could be scanned just like Gr. or Lat.; others argued these durational values could be heard and felt, still others that they were a useful convention of lesser temporal accuracy. The stress-based concept of foot equivalence came to dominate over time, in the sense that George Saintsbury gives it: the metrical "foot or group-system requires correspondence of feet or groups, and this . . . at once enjoins and explains . . . the main charm of English poetry," even though such correspondence is "not mathematically" exact: "the elasticity of the system" ensures "its suitableness to the corresponding elasticity of English verse."

The mod. theoretical sense of equivalence is fundamental to all contemp. ling. understanding of meter. This understanding derives from the realization that the equivalence between syllables and stresses is generalizable to all notions of ling. measurement and, hence, central to the very conception of a verse system itself. One of the most influential formulations is Roman Jakobson's classic dictum of 1958 (originally in Sebeok): "the poetic function projects the principle of equivalence from the axis of selection into the axis of combination" (see POETIC FUNCTION). According to Jakobson, lang. has multiple functions and becomes poetic in function whenever equivalence becomes not merely ornament but "the constitutive device of the sequence." Thus, any given sentence, such as "the child sleeps," is arrayed on two principal axes, one lexical, simultaneous, vertical (the paradigm); the other syntactic, sequential, horizontal (the syntagm). A speaker selects "child" from the lexicon's register of equivalent nouns (infant, baby), as she does with the verb "sleeps," then combines them serially in the syntagm to complete the utterance. Items in the paradigm are related by equivalence (similarity-dissimilarity), items in the syntagm by contiguity; cf. the factors of similarity and proximity in Gestalt psychology. In ordinary speech and prose, the principle controlling both the selection and arrangement of words is essentially semantic (referential), but in poetry, the "principle of equivalence" is foregrounded and words with different syntagmatic functions are also presented as potentially equivalent. Poetic lang. heightens its substantiality and memorability by increasing the degree of its orders through selection and *repetition of an element so as to effect a pattern. The principle of equivalence, which equates words in the vertical register of lang., can equate other features in poetry and thus become superimposed on the horizontal sequence as well (see RESPONSION). Rhyme is a good example of this, but so are words or syllables in similar metrical positions, entire lines, stanzas, and so on.

Equivalence is esp. prominent in metrical verse, where multiple ling. features are deployed systematically. Equivalence, however, is not the meter but the system that makes the meter possible. The particular features the meter employs (stress, length, pitch, syllable count) are determined by the lang. and by the poet, and the specific pattern the meter will assume is mainly a convention. Meter, then, is a *synecdoche for equivalence, but equivalence is a metonym for parallelism; indeed, Jakobson identifies parallelism as "the fundamental problem of poetry." As with the meter, so with all the other formal elements in the poem—sound patterning, rhetorical figures, lexical echo and allusion, syntactic metaplasm, stanza forms, and even generic conventions: in every case "equation is used to build up a sequence." Equivalence is, thus, "the indispensable feature inherent in any piece of poetry." The great difficulty in discussing it has to do with the fact that equivalence is a nonreferential function of lang. and, therefore, quite challenging to construe as if it were syntagmatic. It is perhaps best thought of not as propositional but rather as a kind of speech act, a transreferential ordering of lang.

In sum, when similarity (equivalence) processes are superimposed on contiguity processes, the superimposition compounds the degree of organization—the amount of order—in the words, thereby increasing the meaningfulness of the words without increasing their number, raising the amount of readerly attention necessary for comprehension, and marking the text aesthetically. Equivalence increases meaningfulness by adding new levels of functionality to semantics and brings into play every numerable or patterned function of lang., from rhythm to stanza to the full range of poetic effects, all the way up to the largest possible generic concerns.

See VERSE AND PROSE.

■ Bridges, App. F; A. W. de Groot, Algemene Versleer (1946); R. Jakobson, "Closing Statement: Linguistics and Poetics," Sebeok, rpt. in Jakobson, v. 3; Saintsbury, Prosody, v. 1, App. 1; S. R. Levin, Linguistic Structures in Poetry (1962); Versification: Major Language Types, ed. W. K. Wimsatt (1972)—see M. Halle and S. J. Keyser, "The Iambic Pentameter"; D. Attridge, Well-Weighed Syllables: Elizabethan Verse in Classical Metres (1974); Hollander, esp. "The Metrical Frame"; O. Jespersen, "Notes on Metre" (1901), The Structure of Verse, ed. H. Gross, rev. ed. (1979); R. Bradford, A Linguistic History of English Poetry (1993).

T.V.F. BROGAN; D. J. ROTHMAN

EROTIC POETRY. Whereas *love poetry necessarily involves feelings of affection, erotic poetry deals with sexual passion or desire. This simple theoretical distinction becomes impossibly complex to maintain in practice. There are love poems, such as Thomas Hardy's "Neutral Tones," that are not particularly erotic, and erotic poems, such as Pietro Aretino's Sonetti Lussuriosi (Lust Sonnets), that have nothing to do with love. But, obviously, the two categories often overlap: many love poems are erotic, and many erotic poems deal with affection or strong feeling.

Part of the difficulty with categorization is that "eroticism" is in many ways a subjective quality that is ultimately judged by the reaction of the reader rather than the content of the text itself. Judgments about what is erotic, like judgments about what is funny, are extremely personal and seldom swayed by external opinion. Nonetheless, one might define an erotic poem as any poem that clearly (if not necessarily explicitly) has sexual desire or passion for its subject. Like all poetry, erotic poetry is a literary artifact, shaped by cultural and generic expectations. It should not generally be taken as hard evidence for either the personal sexual practices of the poet or of the normative sexual practices of the poet's culture and society. Erotic poetry can, however, give valuable insight into how certain practices were culturally imagined in different places and times. It can also be revelatory about cultural fears and fantasies regarding various forms of sexual activity.

Erotic poetry in the form of marriage songs from Mesopotamia survives from as early as the second millennium BCE. Egyptian poems from the 13th and 12th cs. BCE describe the attractions of the beloved's body and the torment of unfulfilled sexual desire, as well as boasting of the joys of consummation and possession of the beloved. The OT Song of Solomon (3d or 4th c. BCE) draws strongly on these earlier trads. Despite (or because of) its powerful erotic imagery, the Song of Solomon was interpreted allegorically from a very early date as an expression of God's love for Israel, or in the Christian trad., Christ's love for the Church (see ALLEGORY). This allegorization of eroticism was to prove a powerful model for passionate religious poetry in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. In the Song of Solomon, as in earlier Egyptian and Mesopotamian erotic poetry, the speakers are both male and female, whatever the gender of the author may have been.

Some of the earliest surviving erotic poems in the Western trad. are the homoerotic Gr. lyrics of Sappho (7th c. BCE), which describe the sensations of unfulfilled sexual yearning in exquisite detail: speechlessness, hot flashes, sweating, trembling, paleness. Although Sappho's poems describe a woman's desire for another woman, the symptoms she lists would become canonical for lovesick men and women, whatever their object of desire, in both medical texts and imaginative lit. until the mod. period.

Though the Homeric poems have relatively little to say in detail about sexual passion, eroticism firmly enters the *epic trad. with the story of Dido and Aeneas in Virgil's Aeneid. Michel de Montaigne was famously impressed with the erotic intensity of Virgil's description of Venus making love to her husband Vulcan in book 8 of the Aeneid. Eroticism continued to play a large role in Ren. epics such as Ludovico Ariosto's Orlando fursioso, Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata, and Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene. John Milton's Paradise Lost is more restrained in this regard, though he does emphatically praise sexual pleasure in the prelapsarian marriage of Adam and Eve and suggests that angels also enjoy some form of pleasurable conjunction.

Catullus introduced Gr. models of erotic lyric into Lat. poetry, but the most influential Lat. writer of erotic poetry is Ovid. His Amores describes a young man's passionate affair with a young woman. His Ars amatoria offers tongue-in-cheek advice on how to seduce women successfully, and his Metamorphoses is a catalog of sexual encounters between humans and gods that explores all forms of sexual relations, incl. rape, incest, lesbianism, male homoeroticism, fetishism, and narcissism. Ovidian poetry too was revived during the Ren., notably in the Eng. narrative poems of Christopher Marlowe and Shakespeare.

Little erotic poetry survives from the early med. period, but by the late Middle Ages, Fr. *fabliaux (later adapted by Chaucer in the Canterbury Tales), the Carmina Burana, and the verse of François Villon all foreground a rough bawdiness set in opposition to the developing trads. of *courtly love. In the early 16th c., Aretino took a similarly parodic stance in writing his Sonetti Lussuriosi—poems that used the Petrarchan *sonnet form for the explicit and rude depiction of sex, rather than elegantly composed expressions of love.

In 17th-c. England, John Donne's poetry combined overt eroticism with a wide range of passionate and tender emotion to create some of the most resonant and complex love poetry in Eng. But in general, early mod. Eng. poetry reserved explicit eroticism for satirical, comic, or parodic poems. Some texts, like Thomas Nashe's narrative known both as "Nashe's Dildo" or "Choice of Valentines," mocked the fragility of male sexual prowess. This theme was taken up in Restoration poetry by both John Wilmot, the Earl of Rochester, and Aphra Behn. Michelangelo, Shakespeare, and Richard Barnfield all wrote love poetry to beautiful young men, but there is little explicitly homoerotic or lesbian verse extant from the early mod. period.

The romantic poets' valorization of strong passion was generally accompanied by a decorousness in lang., even when, as in S. T. Coleridge's "Christabel," the subject was lesbian vampires. In the mid-19th c., Charles Baudelaire depicted the horrors of diseased sexuality with shocking explicitness. Paul Verlaine and Arthur Rimbaud wrote openly of homosexual desire, as did Walt Whitman, albeit more politely.

Erotic poetry in the 20th c. was both more explicit and more varied in its themes than at any time since the cl. period. From the ecstatic celebrations of sexuality in Pablo Neruda to the openly gay poetry of Allen Ginsberg and Adrienne Rich, eroticism was explored, expressed, and celebrated with a frankness that would have been astonishing in earlier periods.

See GAY POETRY, LESBIAN POETRY, LOVE POETRY, PETRARCHISM, PRIAPEA.

■ G. E. Enscoe, Eros and the Romantics (1967); Dronke; S. Minta, Love Poetry in Sixteenth-Century France (1977); J. H. Hagstrum, Sex and Sensibility: Ideal and Erotic Love from Milton to Mozart (1980); T. A. Perry, Erotic Spirituality: The Integrative Tradition from Leone Ebreo to John Donne (1980); R.O.A.M. Lyne, The Latin Love Poets from Catullus to Horace (1981); P. J. Kearney, A History of Erotic Literature (1982); A. Richlin, The Garden of Priapus: Sexuality and Aggression in Roman Humor (1983); J. H. Hagstrum, The Romantic Body: Love and Sexuality in Keats, Wordsworth, and Blake (1985); G. Woods, Articulate Flesh: Male Homoeroticism and Modern Poetry (1987); P. Veyne, Roman Erotic Elegy: Love, Poetry, and the West (1983), trans. D. Pellaur (1988); D. O. Frantz, Festum Voluptatis: A Study of Renaissance Erotica (1989); A. R. Jones, The Currency of Eros: Women's Love Lyric in Europe, 1540–1620 (1990); C. Paglia, Sexual Personae: Art and Decadence from Nefertiti to Emily Dickinson (1990); B. Talvacchia, Taking Positions: On the Erotic in Renaissance Culture (1999); I. Moulton, Before Pornography: Erotic Writing in Early Modern England (2000); J.C.B. Petropoulos, Eroticism in Ancient and Medieval Greek Poetry (2003); S. Guy-Bray, Loving in Verse: Poetic Influence as Erotic (2006); S. Fredman, Contextual Practice: Assemblage and the Erotic in Postwar Poetry and Art (2010).

I. F. Moulton

ESPERANTO POETRY began with the booklet International Language Esperanto, pub. in Warsaw in 1887 by Lazar Ludvik (Markovich) Zamenhof (1859–1917) under the pseud. Dr. Esperanto (one who hopes). The booklet included three poems—one trans. and two original—to demonstrate that this proposed second lang. for international use was no lifeless project but a potential living lang. Zamenhof also produced numerous Esperanto trans., incl. Hamlet (1894) and the entire OT. The earliest Esperanto magazines published poetry, early poets drawing on their native trads. to establish poetic norms for Esperanto. Numerous periodicals now publish trans. and original Esperanto poetry. Esperanto lit. runs to several thousand volumes, and the Esperanto lang. is used or understood by several million speakers in the world. Esperanto is a planned, Eur.-based language with simplified grammar and pronunciation but a large vocabulary of fresh and interesting word forms and grammatical combinations unknown in Eur. langs., e.g., Eugen Michalski's poetic coinage chielenas (goes upward to the sky), in which -as denotes the present tense, -n direction toward, and -e the adverbial ending, while chiel- is the root associated with sky or heaven, chielo. Thus, chiele = in the sky; chielen = toward in-the-sky; and chielenas = is toward in-the-sky.

Serious projects for universal langs. began in the 17th c. with George Dalgarno (1661) and John Wilkins (1668) and engaged the attention of René Descartes, G. W. Leibniz, and Isaac Newton. Apart from Esperanto, only Volapük (1880) and Ido ("offspring"; 1908), a modification of Esperanto, developed any significant following, now dissipated. By 1900, Esperanto spread beyond Poland, Russia, and Germany to Western Europe. Collections of poems appeared, incl. three by the Czech Stanislav Schulhof (1864–1919) and the polished and musical Tra l'silento (Through the Silence, 1912) of Edmond Privat (1889–1962). Antoni Grabowski (1857–1921), friend of Zamenhof and skilled linguist, published an international anthol., El parnaso de popoloj (From the People's Parnassus, 1913), and a brilliant trans. of the Pan Tadeusz of Mickiewicz (1918). His audacious ling. experiments prepared for the flowering of Esperanto poetry. The Hungarians Kálmán Kalocsay (1891–1976), in Mondo kaj koro (World and Heart, 1921), and Gyula Baghy (1891–1967), in Preter la vivo (Beyond Life, 1922), led the way. They founded the influential magazine and publishing company Literatura Mondo (Literary World) in 1922.

Zamenhof's interest in Esperanto lit. aimed to create an Esperanto literary and cultural trad., to expand and test the lang. by stretching it to its limits, and to demonstrate that it was as capable of expression as any ethnic lang. Unlike some other projects for an international lang. (none of which withstood the test of time), Esperanto did not spring fully armed from its creator's head. Zamenhof's 1887 booklet contained only the basis of Esperanto; others expanded its lexicon and discovered latent syntactic and morphological possibilities. Kalocsay, in numerous trans. and original poetry (esp. Strechita kordo [Tightened String], 1931), sought diversity: his work includes lyrics, *free verse, and strict verse forms. The Rus. Eugen Michalski (1897–1937) wrote introspective poems of startling *imagery and ling. experiment. While Privat and Kalocsay demonstrated Esperanto's affinities with the Eur. trad., Michalski sought originality. But Stalinism claimed Michalski's life and silenced the talented Nikolai Hohlov (1891–1953). Kalocsay dominated the interwar years as mentor, ed., and publisher. Kalocsay and Gaston Waringhien's Parnasa gvidlibro (Guidebook to Parnassus, 1932) with its Arto poetika and glossary of literary terms and neologisms helped establish an Esperanto trad.; in 1952, Kvaropo (Quartet) extended this trad. This work, by four Brit. poets incl. William Auld (1924–2006), began a new era. Auld's La infana raso (The Child Race, 1956), a modernist poem of great variety and technical virtuosity, is widely regarded as the most impressive achievement of Esperanto poetry to date, though rivaled by the epic breadth of Poemo de Utnoa (Utnoa's Poem, 1993) by the Catalan Abel Montagut (b. 1953). Poets of Auld's generation include the Icelander Baldur Ragnarsson (b. 1930), whose collected works La Lingvo Serena (The Serene Language, 2007) established him as the leading poetic voice of the day. Other major contributors to Esperanto poetry in the latter years of the 20th c. include the Brit. scholar Marjorie Boulton (b. 1924), the Czech Eli Urbanová (b. 1922), the Japanese Miyamoto Masao (1913–1989), the Brazilians Geraldo Mattos (b. 1931) and Roberto Passos Nogueira (b. 1949), the South African Edwin de Kock (b. 1930), and the Rus.-Israeli Michael Gishpling (b. 1924).

The poetic trad. has been enriched by numbers of East Asian poets, among them Ueyama Masao (1910–1988) of Japan and Armand Su (1936–1990) and Mao Zifu (b. 1963; Kantoj de Anteo [Songs of Anteo], 2006) of China, representative of a long history of Esperanto in China and Japan, where the lang. was associated with anarchist and left-wing causes and with efforts at romanization. The task of codifying and establishing this poetic trad. has fallen in part on a succession of writers on the ling., prosodic, and cultural issues involved in writing Esperanto poetry, among them Auld, Ragnarsson, and Gaston Waringhien (1901–91) of France, who also wrote exquisitely crafted poetry under the pseud. Georges Maura.

In the Esperanto poetic trad., trans. and original work are closely linked. Trans. incl. many of Shakespeare's plays (some by Kalocsay and Auld), his Sonnets (trans. Auld), Luís de Camões's Lusiads, Dante's Divine Comedy, the Kalevala, the Qur'an, and works by J. W. Goethe, Charles Baudelaire, Sophocles, Antônio de Castro Alves, Federico García Lorca, ʿUmar Khayyām, Rabindranath Tagore, and many others. Anthols. of national lits. (Eng., Scottish, It., Catalan, Chinese, Estonian, Swedish, Australian, Hungarian, and others) are frequently pub., with trans. of poetry.

With its concision and suitability for ling. experiment, Esperanto poetry has developed faster than the novel or drama, though in recent years many original novels have appeared. Esperanto's lexicon has expanded: Zamenhof's initial vocabulary comprised fewer than 1000 roots, from which perhaps 10,000 words could be formed. The largest contemp. dicts. now contain 20 times that number. The lexicon remains largely Eur., but Esperanto grammar and syntax resemble isolating langs., like Chinese, and agglutinative langs., like Swahili and Japanese. The future of Esperanto poetry is promising. Poets such as Zifu and Montagut, Mauro Nervi (b. 1959) of Italy, Krys Ungar (b. 1954) of Britain, Jorge Camacho (b. 1966) of Spain, and Gonçalo Neves (b. 1964) of Brazil live in an era of increased scholarly attention to Esperanto. Esperanto appears to have established itself as a ling. and cultural community with its own critical norms and standards.

■ W. Auld, The Development of Poetic Language in Esperanto (1976), and Enkonduko en la originalan literaturon de Esperanto (1979); P. Ullman, "Schizoschematic Rhyme in Esperanto," Papers on Language and Literature 16 (1980); Esperanta antologio, ed. W. Auld (1984); H. Tonkin, "One Hundred Years of Esperanto: A Survey," Language Problems and Language Planning 11 (1987); D. Richardson, Esperanto: Learning and Using the International Language (1988)—learning the lang.; P. Janton, Esperanto: Language, Literature, and Community (1993)—lang., lit., and community; H. Tonkin, "The Role of Literary Language in Esperanto," Planned Languages, ed. K. Schubert; J. Pleadin, Ordeno de verda plumo (2006)—encyclopedia; H. Tonkin, "Recent Studies in Esperanto and Interlinguistics," Language Problems and Language Planning 31 (2006); G. Sutton, Concise Encyclopedia of the Original Literature of Esperanto (2008).

H. Tonkin

ESPINELA. An octosyllabic ten-line Sp. stanza form having the rhyme scheme abba:accddc. There is a pause after the fourth line as indicated by the colon. The *strophe was supposedly invented by Vicente Espinel (1550–1624) and so named after him, though the form is found as early as ca. 1510, in the Juyzio hallado y trobado. The espinela is occasionally augmented by two lines rhyming ed. Also called décima* or décima espinela, the espinela has been termed "the little sonnet," and justly so since some of the most beautiful lines in Sp. poetry (e.g., in Pedro Calderón's La vida es sueño) have taken this form. Since the late 16th c., the espinela has been widely employed. One of the most self-reflexive instances is the Peruvian modernist Martín Adán's La rosa de la espinela (1939), a collection of espinelas in which the rose as an emblem of transcendent vision and the stanza form are yoked in reciprocal relation.

■ D. C. Clarke, "Sobre la espinela," Revista de Filología Española 23 (1936); J. Millé y Giménez, "Sobre la fecha de la invención de la décima o espinela," HR 5 (1937); J. M. de Cossío, "La décima antes de Espinel," Revista de Filología Española 28 (1944); J. Milléy Giménez, "Espinelas in the Juyzio hallado y trobado (c. 1510)," Romance Notes 13 (1971); Navarro; J. M. Micó, "En la orígenes de la espinela: Vida y muerte de una estrofa olvidada: La novena," Romanistisches Jahrbuch 56 (2005).

D. C. Clarke

ESTAMPIDA (Occitan; OF, estampie). Lyric genre of pseudopopular type, its music closely related to instrumental dance tunes. The structure of the latter (schematically az1az2 bz1bz2 cz1cz2, in which z1 and z2 are differently cadenced versions of a recurring musical tail piece) is reflected in the heterostrophic form of most OF examples. In the few Occitan pieces, a similarly structured but shorter tune matched a single stanza of text and was then repeated for following stanzas, giving a regular isostrophic verse form.

■ F. Gennrich, Grundriss einer Formenlehre des mittelalterlichen Liedes (1932); Bec; P. M. Cummins, "Le Problème de la musique et de la poésie dans l'estampie," Romania 103 (1982); Sayce, ch. 9; Chambers; D. Billy, "Les Empreintes métriques de la musique dans l'estampie lyrique," Romania 108 (1987); T. J. McGee, "Estampie," Medieval France, ed. W. W. Kibler (1995).

J. H. Marshall

ESTILÍSTICA (Sp., "stylistics"). Sp. philology of the early 20th c. was concerned with the hist. of lang. and the philological and historicist study of lit. according to the principles of the Escuela Española de Filología (Sp. School of Philology), headed by Ramón Menéndez Pidal. From the 1930s onward, a branch of scholarship called estilística emerged from this school and would go on to occupy a prominent place in the panorama of the discipline, not only in Spain but internationally—for instance, in Am. comparative lit. Its initiator was the scholar Amado Alonso, and its most famous exponent (who by coincidence had the same surname) was the writer Dámaso Alonso.

Amado Alonso's approach to *stylistics stands eclectically between two schools of thought, the positivist Stylistique of Charles Bally, a disciple of Ferdinand de Saussure, and the idealist Stilforschung of Leo Spitzer, a follower of the philosophy of Benedetto Croce and the ling. theory of Karl Vossler. In two essays collected in the posthumous volume Materia y forma en poesía, Alonso proposes "the intimate knowledge of the literary work" (a Vossler–Spitzer axiom) and the study of the "expressive values of the language" (Bally's axiom) as the means to achieve it. Faced with the challenge of identifying the historical and social forces that gather and resolve in the work of a particular author, stylistics will put this resolution in question: "all artistic endeavor is the result of the union of the individual with the social, of liberty with establishment; admitting both extremes, traditional criticism has focused on the social; stylistics, on the individual." However, ling. inquiry into *style is not in any way isolationist but requires a historical or cultural dimension to complete it. If any stylistic account that does not consider lang. is incomplete, then any account that relies solely on lang. is inadmissible.

Dámaso Alonso's doctrine of stylistics can be characterized as following Bally in form and Spitzer in substance. While he accepts structuralist categories, he reinterprets them, as in his new reading of the influential dichotomies put forward by Saussure, langue/parole and signifier/signified (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER).

As an idealist, D. Alonso refuses to begin from an abstraction like langue (lang. as system), arguing that all we have is parole (lang. in use) in two senses: that which is common to all langs. and that which is peculiar or unique to one lang. The first is the object of grammar, the second, of stylistics, which may examine ordinary or literary uses of lang., since, between the two, the only real difference is one of "nuance or degree."

This statement, in opposition to Bally's doctrine, was defended later by Eugenio Coseriu and others. Although one may refer to literary stylistics, the view of lit. as merely a form of potentiated common speech cannot be sustained without qualification, since words signify only within a system and in context. The same words, when inserted in a different system, become other words.

The opposition signifier/signified is also reinterpreted by D. Alonso from an idealist position. The signifier is not only an acoustic image but its exteriorization, "anything in speech that modifies, on any scale, our psyche." For this reason, Alonso considers the signifier of the work the sum of partial signifiers.

Signified does not mean concept, according to D. Alonso, but implies instead a complex inner world of objective and subjective aspects that represent reality and includes the individualizing characteristics of this reality received through the senses; the assignment to a certain genre, through the operation of the intellect; and the attitude of the speaker facing this reality, expressed emotionally. Alonso sees the work of lit. as an entity, a complete sign, composed of a total signifier (A) and a total signified (B), each of which contains its respective complex of partial signifiers (a^1, a^2, a^3, . . . , a^n) and partial signifieds (b^1, b^2, b^3, . . . , b^n). Because of the linear aspect of lang., the sign has to be formed from successive pairs of a–b and "any other motivational ties that may exist between them, according to how successful the poetic organism is." Given this background, Alonso proposes two paths of critical approach, one "external," the other "internal." The external proceeds from signifier to signified, justifying the choice of signifiers in light of the signifieds available. Inversely, the internal route tries to assess "how creative feeling, thinking and will are impelled toward their own shaping, just as matter, unfashioned, seeks out its mold."

In fact, there are numerous examples of the "external" route, but it is more difficult to find specific cases of the "internal"—following the successive corrections of a poem, e.g. In the end, the attempt to reproduce the creative itinerary, to bridle the uncontrollable and ineffable from the interior, is a chimera, but an inevitable preoccupation of the poet-critic.

The Sp. school of stylistics developed initially in Argentina, after A. Alonso emigrated there in 1927. Later, inspired by D. Alonso, the school extended to several Latin Am. countries such as Brazil, Colombia, Chile, and Cuba, notably in the work of the critic Roberto Fernández Retamar. In Spain, stylistics continues as a critical approach, but ultimately, as in the case of the Stylistique and the Stilforschung, it has become a focus or an antecedent to the mod. critical fields of *semiotics, pragmatics, neorhet., and literary discourse analysis.

See LINGUISTICS AND POETICS.

■ L. Spitzer, Linguistics and Literary History (1948); D. Alonso, Poesía española: ensayos de métodos y límites estilísticos (1950); C. Bally, Traité de stylistique française, 3d ed. (1951); A. Alonso, Materia y forma en poesía (1954); M. A. Garrido Gallardo, La musa de la retórica: problemas y métodos de la ciencia de la literatura (1994); El Lenguaje literario: Vocabulario crítico, ed. M. A. Garrido Gallardo (2009), esp. chs. 1.3 and 4.3.

M. A. GARRIDO GALLARDO

ESTONIA, POETRY OF. The Estonian lang., like Finnish, has the word accent on the first syllable, is highly inflected, and tends toward polysyllabism. Its relatively small number of initial consonants favors *alliteration, which, however, is unobtrusive because of the unemphatic articulation. Oral folk poetry, recorded in hundreds of thousands of texts, features an octosyllabic, trochaic meter that is shared with the other Balto-Finnic peoples. Alliteration within lines and semantic *parallelism between lines are characteristic:

Igav on olla iluta,
hale olla laulemata,
kole käo kukkumata,
raske rõõmuta elada!

(Boring to be without beauty,
sad to be without song,
terrible without a bird's twitter, hard to live without happiness!)

Written poetry and metrical trads. began with trans. Lutheran hymns; Reiner Brockmann (1609–47) also wrote dedicatory verses in Estonian. The first known example of a poem written by a native Estonian is "Lament about the Destruction of Tartu" (1708) by Käsu Hans. Serfdom and Baltic-Ger. social, economic, and political domination harnessed the intellectual life of the Estonians until the early 19th c. Poets of the Estonian national renaissance drew inspiration from folklore, cl. antiquity, and Finnish and Ger. romantic and preromantic poetry. The first notable poet, the short-lived Kristjan Jaak Peterson (1801–22), wrote inspired Pindarics. F. R. Kreutzwald's epic Kalevipoeg (1857–61), based on runic folk ballads and meter, owed much to Elias Lönnrot's Finnish Kalevala. The powerful patriotic lyrics of Lydia Koidula (1843–86) developed the romantic lied genre. A more intimate poetry emerged later in the century, exemplified in the profoundly personal, tragic symbolism of seemingly simple lyrics by Juhan Liiv (1864–1913). *Symbolism in its Western form, intellectually searching, emphasizing individualized, sophisticated style, appears in the verse of the Noor-Eesti (Young Estonia) group; its leader Gustav Suits (1883–1956) was torn between high flights of emotion and bitter, satirical skepticism. The quiet, introspective mysticism of Ernst Enno (1875–1934) and the sensitive island landscapes of Villem Grünthal-Ridala (1885–1942) added new wealth of lang., imagery, and versification to a rapidly expanding lit.

Toward the end of the World War I, shortly before the Estonian declaration of independence in 1918, a new group, named after a mythological bird, Siuru, inaugurated an era of lyrical exuberance and extreme individualism in both form and content. Its leaders, Marie Under (1883–1980) and Henrik Visnapuu (1889–1951), later abandoned subjectivism for strenuous thought, universal themes, and firmly crystallized form. Under, the greatest master of lyrical intensity, passed through psychological and metaphysical crises culminating in a poetry of extraordinary translucency and human insight, expanded by the eclectic but keenly picturesque aestheticism of Johannes Semper (1892–1970). The deeply rooted native tendency toward symbolism reasserted itself in a disciplined new form among the Arbujad (Magicians) group, including Uku Masing (1909–85), Bernard Kangro (1910–94), Heiti Talvik (1904–47), and Betti Alver (1906–89). Keenly aware of the great trad. of Eur. poetry and thought, these poets sought "to enclose in slim stanzas the blind rage of the elements" (Talvik, "Dies irae," pt. 12 [1934]), imposing the finality of perfect expression on the emotional turbulence of a world heading toward chaos.

After World War II, during Stalinist rule in Estonia, socialist realism was compulsory. Only those who left Estonia could write freely; among them were Under, Kangro, and Suits, succeeded by Kalju Lepik (1920–99), the surrealist Ilmar Laaban (1921–2000), the lyrical dialect poet Raimond Kolk (1924–92), and Ivar Grünthal (1924–96). Ivar Ivask (1927–92), ed. of Books Abroad, wrote Baltic Elegies in Eng., concluding the rich, tragic hist. of Estonian poetry in exile.

In Soviet Estonia, the Stalinist poetry of Juhan Smuul (1922–71) demonstrated professionally crafted eloquence. Other pre-Soviet poets were persecuted: Talvik died in a Siberian labor camp, his gravesite unknown. Alver refused to cooperate with the Soviets, earning the label of "formalist," which barred publications until the 1960s; she was a moral compass for emerging poets. Debora Vaarandi (1916–2007) broke from her earlier Stalinist praise poetry in 1957, reviving lyrical attention to "simple things." Alver and other Arbujad expelled from the Writers Union in the 1940s were rehabilitated; among them was August Sang (1914–69), whose humane, self-deprecating poetry signaled a "new beginning."

After Stalinism, a revival of poetry was spearheaded by Jaan Kross (1920–2007), writing in an Aesopian style, and by Artur Alliksaar's (1923–66) surrealist-absurdist wordplay. From 1959 to 1961, Ain Kaalep (b. 1926), notable for creating Estonian equivalents of cl. Gr. and Lat. meters, precipitated a public debate over *free verse; the poetry of Kross and of Ellen Niit (b. 1928) was also accused of displaying "decadent tendencies." The mid-1960s witnessed existential despair and the mysticism of nature, followed by a return to formal verse, *irony, and *surrealism in the 1970s. Hando Runnel (b. 1938) confronted the imminent destruction of the Estonian nation through Sovietization. Jaan Kaplinski's (b. 1941) austere, epiphanic free verse opened windows to Buddhism and ecological harmony. Viivi Luik's (b. 1946) mystical nature poetry shifted in the 1970s to express muted rage bordering on despair. The polyphonic lyricism of Paul-Eerik Rummo (b. 1942), the ironical personae employed by actor Jüri Üdi (Juhan Viiding, 1948–95), and the masterfully crafted, reserved love poetry of Doris Kareva (b. 1958) still hold their power. New works by these authors who emerged during the Soviet "thaw" are major cultural events today. In the Soviet period, an explicit distance between poet and lyric first person protected authors from accusations of disloyalty if their works contained subversive ideas; Kaplinski's intensely personal poems reconnected author and works. Poetry's status as semi-sacred ritual dissolved with the end of censorship in the late 1980s, and metaphorical lang. of tragic intonations gave way to antipoetry or metapoetry, with the occasional comic twist.

Under the Soviets, Runnel's and Rummo's censored poetry circulated in ms.; a more radical underground poetry appeared in the mid-1980s, when Matti Moguči (pseud. of Priidu Beier, b. 1957), produced three volumes of obscene and offensive poems, among them the ironic "Hymn to the KGB." In the 1990s, Sven Kivisildnik's (b. 1963) "politically incorrect" parodies desacralized Rummo and other prophets of the Soviet period. Pronouncing himself a "national poet," he wrote aggressive, sarcastic, and innovative haiku that rails against the market economy and commercialism. The mercilessly honest fs (pseud. of Indrek Mesikapp, b. 1971) continues trads. of social crit., but he is above ground, a recipient of national poetry awards.

In recent decades, a new generation has stretched the limits of physical form, publishing in virtual hypertext, on beer-bottle labels, and even in a deck of playing cards doubling as an anthol. of new poetry. Valdur Mikita's (b. 1970) ironic poems force a reader to interpret pictograms. Poetry has merged with song in punk, rap, slam, and improvised regilaul performances; some argue that performers such as Tõnu Trubetsky (b. 1963) belong to pop culture, not poetry. Poets today play with a mixture of langs. and orthographies, melding together high and low style, folk poetry and mod. slang. Ethnofuturism, a fluid term invented by Karl Martin Sinijärv (b. 1971), embraces a new current that joins archaic, uniquely Estonian form or content with futuristic content or form. Kauksi Ülle's (b. 1962) poems in Võro, the lang. or dialect of southern Estonia, are emblematic. On the other hand, Margus Konnula (b. 1974) in Tarczan (1998) presents the mass-culture, cosmopolitan Tarzan in the national, archaic form of the 19th-c. epic Kalevipoeg; neither hero nor form offers a satisfactory frame for Estonian poets gazing into their lit.'s future. The future foundations, however, are clearly intertextual. Hasso Krull's (b. 1964) "Meter and Demeter: An Epic" (2004) experiences in 100 stanzas the destruction of the world by deluge and the creation of the world that follows or precedes, in the myths of many nations and epochs. Its untranslatable medium contains multiple allusions to Estonian literary trad., from regilaul to Kaplinski, connected by rhythms, sounds, and grammatical concepts available only in the Estonian lang., at times merging future, present, and past tense:

kui lõpeb vihm
siis on lõppenud kõik nii lõppenud et ainult vesi on alguses ikka veel olemas

(When the rain ends
then all has/will have ended so ended that only water is/will be remaining in the beginning)

■ Anthologies: An Anthology of Modern Estonian Poetry, ed. W. K. Matthews (1953); Kalevipoeg, ed. J. Kurman (1982); Contemporary East European Poetry, ed. E. George (1985); Ilomaile, ed. J. Kurrik (1985); Sõnarine, ed. K. Muru, 4 v. (1989–95); Varjatud ilus haigus, ed. K. Pruul (2000); Windship with Oars of Light, ed. D. Kareva (2001), and Six Estonian Poets in Translations of Ants Oras (2002); Anthology of Estonian Traditional Music, ed. H. Tampere et al. (2003)—field recordings of folk songs with Eng. trans.; A Sharp Cut, ed. H. Krull (2005), http://www.estlit.ee/public/A_Sharp_Cut.pdf.
■ Criticism and History: W. F. Kirby, The Hero of Esthonia, 2 v. (1895)—on Kalevipoeg; W. K. Matthews, "The Estonian Sonnet," Slavonic and East European Review 25 (1946–47); E. Nirk, Estonian Literature (1987); E. Annus et al., Eesti kirjanduslugu (2001); I. Tart, Eestikeelne luuleraamat 1638–2000 (2002)—statistical poetic analysis of 4,887 books by 933 authors; M. Väljataga, "Vee uputuste vahel," Eesti Express (Feb. 9, 2004); A. Annist, Friedrich Reinhold Kreutzwaldi Kalevipoeg (2005); Estonian Literary Magazine, http://elm.einst.ee; Looming—annual poetry surveys in March issue; Estonian Literature Centre, http://www.estlit.ee.

A. Oras; I. Ivask; G. Šmidchens

ESTRIBILLO. A refrain in Sp. lyrics and ballads that apparently originated in the zéjel, of Ar. origin. The zéjel came through the Galician-Port. to the Sp. court lyric in the 14th c., where it developed into the cantiga*, which, in turn, produced various types of poems during the pre-Ren. period. In the early period, the estribillo was the introductory stanza—stating the theme and often called cabeza or texto—of a poem and was repeated at the end of each stanza of the poem; cf. the Eng. *burden. Later, it is sometimes found only at the end of each stanza.

■ Le Gentil; Y. Malkiel, "Spanish estribillo 'refrain': Its Proximal and Distal Etymologies," Florilegium Hispanicum, ed. J. S. Geary et al. (1983); Navarro.

D. C. Clarke

ETHIOPIA, POETRY OF

I. Folk Poetry
II. Church-inspired Poetry
III. Modern Poetry

Ethiopian poetry can be divided into three groups: traditional folk songs and poetry; church-inspired poetry; and mod. poetry. After Ethiopia became officially Christian in the early 4th c., it established educational institutions that standardized rules for poetic creation and influenced both traditional and mod. poetry.

I. Folk Poetry. Folk poetry is found in all of Ethiopia's approximately 80 cultural groups and langs., although most of what exists in print is in the national lang., Amharic, and the northern lang. Tigrinnya. Professional singer-poets (azmarî) are admired for their ability to compose songs on the spur of the moment, commenting on day-to-day matters. *Ballads are rare; short, pithy poems are more common and popular. The most common kinds of folk poetry are the following:

(a) love songs, often expressing nostalgia for a desired girl or woman, such as a *lament written by a local governor when he received news that his wife had taken a lover;
(b) *dirges, mostly performed in standardized form by professional wailing women, although specific poems about the dead person are often composed by members of the bereaved family;
(c) songs celebrating important historical events. These are plentiful in so-called royal chronicles, which have been written since the 13th c.;
(d) imperial praise songs; sometimes also songs mocking an unpopular emperor, e.g., Téwodros II;
(e) martial songs (shillela and fukkera), which are performed either by warriors or by hired minstrels and which consist of boasts about heroic deeds;
(f) litigation in poetic form. There was a time when plaintiff and defendant conducted their own cases in court in poetic form, and the one who impressed and pleased the listeners most won the case, irrespective of right or wrong;
(g) *occasional verse by professional singers, who compose songs and also sing and play an instrument (mostly the one-stringed violin, krar). They often improvise and comment on a situation as it occurs, in some cases composing songs on behalf of competing groups, e.g., of two men who both want the same woman; but political messages may also be passed on in this way, often in cryptic form. The cryptic form in such contexts is usually a vulgarized application of what is called the "wax and gold" (sem-inna-werq) method of writing poetry developed in ecclesiastical institutions of learning (see below), based on puns and double meanings. Ambiguity has served the need for secrecy often associated with political power in Ethiopia, where too-open expressions of opinions and sentiments could be risky.

II. Church-inspired Poetry. Qiné, or church-inspired poetry, is both religious and secular, distinguished by form rather than content. It is primarily written in Geez (old Ethiopic) and Amharic. Such poems are named after their forms (depending on the number of syllables in a line and the number of lines in the poem). The originator of this poetic form is commonly believed to be St. Yaréd, who lived in the holy city of Aksum in the 6th c.; but some of the religious poetry beloved in Ethiopia is ascribed to St. Efrem of Edessa, who lived in the 4th c. and translated into Geez. Qiné was further developed in the Amhara culture from the 16th c. or somewhat earlier. Prominent qiné poets include Yohannis Geblawî (15th c.), Tewaney (16th c.), and Kifle-Yohannis (17th c.).

Before Western models of mod. education became common in Ethiopia (primarily during the reign of Emperor Haile Selassie, 1930–74), most Ethiopians who sought an education went to religious institutions called "church" or "priest schools" or to monastic schools for higher learning, where they could learn to appreciate and create qiné. A prominent feature of this poetry is the use of "wax and gold." Its basis is the Monophysite conception of Christ professed by the Ethiopian national church. In this belief, Christ was God and man, but his manhood was only a shell that hid his real, divine essence. The poetry framed on this model is not only ambiguous but also contains a superficial meaning (the wax) that "hides" the genuine message (the gold). The rules of this poetry are complicated and take years to master. Main centers for teaching this type of poetry are found in the provinces of Gojjam (at Gonj, Weshira, and Méch'a), Begémdir (at Ch'ereqa in Dawint, and in the town of Gonder), Wello (at Tabor in Sayint), and Lasta (at Abdîqom in Wadla). The main forms of qiné have names according to how many syllables there are in a line (e.g., Gubaé Qana, 4+4; Ze-Amlakîyyé, 4+4+4; Wazéma, 6+4+4+3+3; Meweddis, 9+4+5+3+3, etc.; there are 13 main forms). There are two different main styles of qiné, taught in the schools of Gonj and Wadla, respectively.

Religious poetry is found, e.g., in parts of the Diggwa, which contains songs for Lent, ascribed to St. Yaréd; Zimmaré, sung after Mass; Mewasît, which are prayers for the dead; Qiddasé, sung during Mass but containing also the Hourly Prayers, the Horologium (satat/seatat); Selamta, songs of praise to God and homage to saints. There is no congregational singing in this church, and the songs/hymns are mostly performed by church-educated but unordained persons known as debtera; but there are also occasions (mainly on public religious holidays) when priests perform songs accompanied by drums and sistra, and the rhythm is beaten with prayer-staffs, while the priests dance on the pattern of OT Levites.

St. Yaréd is believed to have both composed hymns and set them to music. The Ethiopian church is conservative and has preserved old songs with little innovation in its liturgies or *anaphoras (of which the church has 14); but new poetry is constantly being made in other contexts. Here the secular use of the poetic styles developed in monastic institutions is marked. A well-known name among church-trained people who used the "wax and gold" model both for serious poetry and in other contexts was Aleqa (scholar) Gebre-Hanna Gebre-Mariyam, who was in the service of several emperors in the 19th c. Many of Ethiopia's foremost mod. poets have also been exposed to this kind of poetry and use it (sometimes somewhat freely) in their modernized poetry.

III. Modern Poetry. Ethiopia was only marginally influenced by the colonial movement and, thus, has kept much more of its traditional culture than the rest of Africa. Mod. Ethiopian poetry has received significant influences from outside, esp. the West and mostly from poetry written in Eng. but also to some extent Fr. and It. However, even the most Westernized poets have retained strong traditional elements, not least as this was passed on by church institutions. Among the foremost mod. poets is Kebbede Mikaél (1914–98), whose first foreign lang. was Fr. and who did not attend Ethiopian church schools. He wrote nationalistic poems (and may be regarded as a forerunner of *Negritude poetry) in opposition to the It. invasion and occupation of Ethiopia (1935–41). Mengistu Lemma (1928–88) was educated in both church and mod. schools and became an advocate of the socialist revolution of 1974. He has more humor in his poems than is common in Ethiopian writers. One of the foremost mod. poets, more experimental and more influenced by foreign models than those mentioned above, was S'eggayé (Tseggaye) Gebre-Medhin (1936–2006). Because he coined new Amharic words based on old Ethiopic as well as Eng. roots or ideas, his poetry is often considered difficult but of a high artistic order. Debbebe Seyfu (1950–2000), often inspired by visions of a more prosperous Ethiopia, also often played on words in keeping with the "wax and gold" device. A poet of a lighter kind was Afeqerq Yohannîs (1927–80), whose poems were much read and sung by Ethiopia's most popular singers. Almost all poets, and writers generally, in Ethiopia are men, but a few women authors are coming up, incl. the pioneer Siniddu Gebru (1916–2009), though she published only one book of poetry.

Poetry is popular in Ethiopia, and many try their hands at it, often in praise of the ruler or prevailing ideologies. Western churches have put down roots in Ethiopia and introduced congregational singing. The quality often shows more enthusiasm than talent, but dedicated and capable poets are not lacking, even with limited opportunities to express rebellious ideas. Ethiopian poetry is usually idealistic, expressing hope for the country and encouraging fellow Ethiopians to promote the best interests of their native land. Poets of note in more recent years include Aseffa Gebre-Mariyam Tesemma (b. 1935), the author of the national *anthem, and Aberra Lemma (b. 1953).

■ E. Littmann, Die altamharischen Kaiserlieder (1914); Hiruy Welde-Sillasé, Mis'hafe qiné (1926), and Iné-nna wedajocché (1935); Mahteme-Sillasé Welde-Mesqel, Amarinnya qiné (1955); M. Kamil, Amharische Kaiserlieder (1957); Haddis Alemayyehu, Fiqr iske meqabir (1965); Habte-Mariyam Werqineh, T'intawî ye-Îtyopiya timhirt (1970); R. K. Molvaer, Tradition and Change in Ethiopia: Social and Cultural Life as Reflected in Amharic Fictional Literature ca. 1930–1974 (1980); Mengistu Lemma, Yegi'iz qinéyat, yenne t'ibeb qirs (1987); Gebre-Igziabiher Elyas and R. K. Molvaer, Prowess, Piety and Politics: The Chronicle of Abeto Iyasu and Empress Zewditu of Ethiopia (1909–1930) (1994); R. K. Molvaer, Socialization and Social Control in Ethiopia (1995); "About the Abortive Coup Attempt in Addis Abeba from 5 Tahsas to 8 Tahsas 1953 (14–17 December 1960)," Northeast African Studies 3 (1996); Black Lions: The Creative Lives of Modern Ethiopia's Literary Giants and Pioneers (1997); and "Siniddu Gebru: Pioneer Woman Writer, Feminist, Patriot, Educator, and Politician," Northeast African Studies 4 (1997); Ayele Bekerie, Ethiopic: An African Writing System: Its History and Principles (1997); R. K. Molvaer, "The Achievement of Emperor Téwodros II of Ethiopia (1855–1868): From an Unpublished Manuscript by Aleqa Tekle-Îyesus (Aleqa Tekle') of Gojjam," Northeast African Studies 3 (1998); "Afewerq Yohannis and Debbebe Seyfu: Notes on Ethiopian Writers of the Late Twentieth Century," Northeast African Studies 6 (1999); and "Some Ethiopian Historical Poems," Aethiopica 9 (2006).

R. K. Molvaer

ETHNOPOETICS Gr. ethnos, "nation"; and poiēsis, "creation, a making-process." The term was coined in 1968 by the poet and anthologist Jerome Rothenberg in collaboration with George Quasha as a parallel term to "ethnomusicology." Thus, to paraphrase a cl. definition of the latter, ethnopoetics could be said to comprise "the study of social and cultural aspects of [poetry] in local and global contexts" (Pegg). Ethnopoetics, which emerged in the 1960s and 1970s, generally refers to the develop. of an interest among poets and scholars, esp. anthropologists, in (1) a hypothetical worldwide body of poetry, equivalent in value, that included materials heretofore deemed crude, "primitive," or "uncivilized," such as folk poetry and oral trads., shamanistic incantations, anonymously or collectively composed works, and other nonliterary verbal events saturated with meaning for their particular cultures; (2) the humanistic and expressive value of alternative (poetic, e.g.) ethnographic writing; and, in response to the decentralization of "highbrow" art in the post-1968 academic curriculum, (3) the study of and/or participation in poetry movements, poetic practices and activities, and bodies of work that reflected the lives and aspirations of politically or socioeconomically underrepresented members of the world's many communities, as well as in underrepresented aspects (hidden social hurts and hists., collective origins, and so forth) of more traditionally canonical verse. Most broadly, the movement sought to locate poetry and the poetic in a global range of utterances and local expressive practices, focusing initially on the collection, trans., and sometimes emulation by Western (esp. U.S.) scholars and poets of indigenous verbal artifacts as "poetry." The intentions were to acknowledge the cultural and aesthetic sophistication of these expressions, to introduce the Western literary establishment to these powerful cultural writings, and to declare them equal in significance and achievement to the canon of poetic masterpieces by individuated and revered poets. Major participants in the movement have included Rothenberg and Quasha; anthropologists Dell Hymes, Barbara Tedlock, and Dennis Tedlock (also a poet and literary trans., of, among other texts, the Mayan Popol Vuh); linguistics scholar Ulli Beier; poets Armand Schwerner, Charles Stein, and Nathaniel Tarn (who also holds a doctorate in anthropology); and others who translated, wrote, anthologized, or otherwise edited jours. and books showcasing the traditional praise songs, incantations, verbal ceremonies, or individual poems of indigenous people and poets writing with an awareness of their ethnic trads. One of the major tenets of the movement, stated in the first issue of the jour. Alcheringa, a key publication, was "to combat cultural genocide in all of its manifestations" (Rothenberg and Tedlock, 1975); emphasis on the "tribal" as a concept and a specific social formation and of a vatic or bardic understanding of poetics permeates much of the movement's discourse.

Critiques of ethnopoetics have arisen in response to theoretical revisions of both "nationalism/ethnicity" and "poetry"—the two primary components of the neologism. "Nation" has been complicated by "postnationalism," "ethnicity" by "hybridity," and "poetry" by "poetries" and by critical approaches that do not attend to distinctions in genre. Until the late 1980s and 1990s, ethnopoetics primarily consisted of efforts by Western, majority-culture poets and scholars to bring globally underrepresented poetries to the attention of other Western, majority-culture poets and scholars under the banner of an avant-garde modernist universalism (ethnopoetics claims kinship with the Western avant-garde's attraction to "primitivism"), coupled with a desire to heal cultural damage. However, some postcolonial critics later faulted ethnopoetics for cultural imperialism and a failure to put such works in their appropriate historical and political context. The tendency of ethnopoetics to find similarities across cultures conflicted with the poststructuralist emphasis on difference and incommensurability, as well as skepticism about the distinction between oral and written trads.

A wider understanding of ethnopoetics might consider the historical and intellectual relationship between ethnography and poetry/poetics, incl. (1) poetry or poetic writing by ethnographers (incl. Ruth Benedict, Renato Rosaldo, Edward Sapir, Michael Taussig, Ruth Behar, Susan Stewart, and others) that embodies or thematizes elements common to both ethnographic and literary inquiry, such as the experience of ling. and cultural defamiliarization, the participant-observation method of fieldwork, cultural documentation, the problem of "self"-positioning, and the ethics and violence of representation; (2) repoliticized scholarship and creative work by indigenous or ethnic subjects and communities about themselves that portray their own complexity as not merely tribal or ethnic but also as cosmopolitan, hybrid, or multi-influenced aesthetic and social agents; and (3) continued exploration of "cultural poetics" as a valid mode of scholarly inquiry, and the need for social engagement in poetic praxis.

■ Critical Studies: Modern Poetry from Africa, ed. U. Beier and G. Moore (1962); Technicians of the Sacred, ed. J. Rothenberg, 2d ed. (1985), and Shaking the Pumpkin (1972); J. Rothenberg and D. Tedlock, "Statement of Intention," Alcheringa 1 (1975); R. Finnegan, Oral Poetry (1980); D. Tedlock, The Spoken Word and the Work of Interpretation (1983); Symposium of the Whole, ed. J. Rothenberg (with D. Rothenberg) (1985); M. Taussig, Mimesis and Alterity (1992); B. Tedlock, The Beautiful and the Dangerous (1992); S. Stewart, On Longing (1993); Poems for the Millennium, ed. J. Rothenberg and P. Joris, 3 v. (1995–2008); S. Hartnett and J. Engels, "'Aria in Time of War': Investigative Poetics and the Politics of Witnessing," in The SAGE Handbook of Qualitative Research, ed. N. Denzin and Y. Lincoln (2005); M. Taussig, Walter Benjamin's Grave (2006); K. Stewart, Ordinary Affects (2007).

■ Journals: Alcheringa; A Gathering of the Tribes; Cultural Anthropology; XCP: Cross-cultural Poetics; Tropiques.

■ Web Sites: C. Pegg, "Ethnomusicology," Grove Music Online, ed. L. Macy, http://www.grovemusic.com; UbuWeb: Ethnopoetics, http://www.ubu.com/ethno.

M. Damon

ETHOS (Gr., "custom," "character"). In cl. rhet., one means of persuasion: an audience's assessment of a speaker's moral character (e.g., honesty, benevolence, intelligence) primarily as reflected in the discourse, although at least secondarily dependent on the speaker's prior reputation. In the Rhetoric 1:1356a, Aristotle distinguishes three ways of achieving persuasion: ethical (ethos), emotional (pathos*), and logical (logos); and although he comes close to affirming ethos as the most potent means of persuasion, he gives it the least theoretical devel.; that devel. must for the most part be traced outside rhet., in the works of moral philosophers on virtue. From the standpoint of education, however, ethos became historically the most widely addressed principle of rhet., as theorists from the Sophists through the Ren. humanists made the study of ethics a central means of preparing students for civic responsibilities. Along with pathos, ethos serves to distinguish rhet.'s inclusive concerns from dialectic's more exclusive concentration on formal validity in logos. Although ethos centers in the speaker and pathos in the audience, the force of ethos consists in arousing *emotions; and the nature of pathos, or what emotions can be aroused, depends on the character of their host.

This conceptually close relation between ethos and pathos is evident not only in cl. rhetorical treatises but in the long trad. of writing *"characters." This literary genre, comprised of short disquisitions on personality types and behaviors, originated with Aristotle's pupil Theophrastus and achieved high popularity in the Ren. The devel. of "humoral psychology" and such works as Ben Jonson's Every Man in His Humour further reveal the traditionally close union of ethos and pathos (see HUMORS). From the standpoint of rhet., ethos in poetry bears obvious relations to *persona and authorial identity: ethos is, in sum, the strategic rationale of both, a determinant of the audience's response to the speaker or speakers in a text as well as to the artist as speaker of a text, investing the latter speaking role with something of the ethos-driven quality of auctoritas, famously described by Virgil as belonging to that orator who, "influential in piety and deeds," can rule the ignoble mob with words (Aeneid 1.148–53). Among mod. critics, ethos has figured in the discussion of such subjects as the distinction between dramatized and undramatized speakers, or between dramatic *monologues and *lyric poems, as well as in discussions of the morality of impersonal narration and the character of implied authors.

See RHETORIC AND POETRY.

■ M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947), ch. 5, 9; G. T. Wright, The Poet in the Poem (1962); E. Schütrümpf, Die Bedeutung des Wortes éthos in der Poetik des Aristoteles (1970); Group μ, ch. 6; S. Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning (1980); W. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction, 2d ed. (1983); C. Gill, "The Ethos/Pathos Distinction in Rhetorical and Literary Criticism," CQ 34 (1984); W. Booth, The Company We Keep (1988); J. M. May, Trials of Character: The Eloquence of Ciceronian Ethos (1988); Corbett, esp. 80–86; E. Schütrumpf, "The Model for the Concept of Ethos in Aristotle's Rhetoric," Philologus 137 (1993); Lausberg; Ethos et pathos: Le statut du sujet rhétorique, ed. F. Cornilliat and R. Lockwood (2000); R. Amossy, "Ethos at the Crossroads of Disciplines: Rhetoric, Pragmatics, Sociology," PoT 22 (2001); F. Woerther, "Aux origines de la notion rhétorique d' 'èthos,'" Revue des Études Greques 118 (2005); D. Randall, "Ethos, Poetics, and the Literary Public Sphere," MLQ 69 (2008).

T. O. Sloane

EUPHONY (Gr., "good sound"). Euphony, particularly in dramatic works and poetry, is a smoothness and harmony of sounds that are agreeable to the ear and pleasing in the physical act of pronouncing them or in the mental act of their unvoiced performance.

John Milton begins his elegiac "Lycidas" with euphony's engaging calmness, "Yet once more, O ye Laurels, and once more, / Ye Myrtles brown, with ivy never sere," before turning to the more rugged sounds of *cacophony, the opposite of euphony, as he speaks of his own poetry's unmellowed maturity: "I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude."

Sometimes it is difficult to determine the part played by such sound effects. Reader/performers of the final line of Elizabeth Barrett Browning's sonnet that begins "How do I love thee? Let me count the ways" are unlikely to experience cacophony in "I shall but love thee better after death"—even though the line contains the same sh, b, d, and r sounds as Milton's dissonant line about plucking "berries harsh and crude." What the line says is likely to suppress possible perceptions of discordance.

Euphony is evident in W. B. Yeats's poem "Adam's Curse" when the poet praises labor "to articulate sweet sounds together," bringing the result of his own effort to our attention by means of euphonious harmonies of sound and meaning in a memorable phrase. His concluding line for "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," about "lake water lapping," is a study in the soothing lowering of vowel sounds from e to a to o: "I hear it in the deep heart's core."

Alexander Pope, in his Essay on Criticism, demonstrates that "The Sound must seem an Eccho to the Sense" with his own euphonious lines: "Soft is the Strain when Zephyr gently blows, / And the smooth Stream in smoother numbers flows" (365–67). However, Pope also notes that euphony can be overdone by "tuneful Fools," who "Equal syllables alone require, / Tho' oft the Ear the open Vowels tire" (340, 344–45).

See SOUND.

■ L. Bishop, "Euphony," Lang&S 18 (1986).

T. CARPER

EVALUATION

I. Authorial Intention
II. Morality
III. Aesthetics
IV. Historical Representativeness
V. Critiques of Evaluation in Criticism

Evaluation refers to an appraisal of the worth or goodness of a poem or of a part or aspect of a poem (an image, metaphor, theme, metrical scheme, etc.) or of a larger work or oeuvre. Debates about evaluation are often closely tied to questions of *canon. Evaluation was once considered a central task of *criticism, but its place in crit. is now contested, having been supplanted to a large degree by *interpretation. The criteria for evaluation implicitly depend on specific theories of poetry and of authorship and thus vary widely. Indeed, von Hallberg (2003) has argued that a great poem is by definition sui generis; thus, evaluative criteria cannot even be established in advance of the poems themselves.

Poetic values are often divided into "intrinsic" and "extrinsic" categories. Intrinsic values are used to measure the worth of a poem "in itself," i.e., in its capacity as a poem. Extrinsic (or instrumental) values are used to measure the success with which poems meet aims that do not depend on their status as poetry. Intrinsic values are usually seen as "in bounds," whereas extrinsic values are often regarded as representing an illegitimate attempt to marshal poetry to other nonpoetic, interested ends. Yet to designate a value "intrinsic" or "extrinsic" is already to make an argument about what constitutes the art of poetry, making the categories themselves subject to debate.

This article will review some major evaluative criteria and then describe critical challenges to the project of evaluation.

I. Authorial Intention. In "The Intentional Fallacy," Wimsatt and Beardsley lambaste the pervasive practice (by Longinus, J. W. Goethe, Benedetto Croce, and others) of evaluating poems on the basis of the success with which they fulfill the author's intentions—to express a particular sentiment, to create a particular effect, to display mastery of a form, and so on (see INTENTIONAL FALLACY). A critic evaluating a poem by the criterion of *intention judges the craft or skill with which the poet has executed a preexisting vision. Wimsatt and Beardsley assert that authorial intention is an extrinsic criterion, having no bearing on the poetic quality of a poem, and is therefore out of bounds for evaluating poetry. While intention has remained a point of critical debate, it has lost the association with evaluation maintained by Wimsatt and Beardsley and taken on interpretive associations, as the title of a key contribution to the intentionality debate, Hirsch's Aims of Interpretation, indicates.

II. Morality. By the criterion of morality, the critic examines the moral goodness of a poem's intended or expressed sentiments or its capacity to produce moral sentiments or behaviors in a reader. This criticism assumes that a central aim of poetry is to exert a moral and humanizing influence on society and is often associated with earlier critics, such as Matthew Arnold and F. R. Leavis. In later decades, however, moral crit. has also played a role in postcolonial, feminist, and ethnic studies, as well as other projects. In a famous critique of Heart of Darkness, Achebe asserted, "The question is whether a novel which celebrates this dehumanization [of Africans] . . . can be called a great work of art. My answer is: No, it cannot." Likewise, Rainey argues that feminist critics have rehabilitated the poet H.D. on the basis of "current moral concerns," which he considers illegitimate.

III. Aesthetics. Immanuel Kant's Critique of Judgment has powerfully influenced the study of aesthetics; following Kant's description of beauty, many critics implicitly or explicitly consider aesthetic qualities to be simultaneously subjective (located in an individual experience or encounter) and universal (apprehensible by all who encounter the aesthetic object). Aesthetic evaluation measures any number of values, incl. beauty, sublimity, aesthetic distance, *wit, sense of play, or a feeling of transcendence.

An aesthetic consideration that deserves special mention is novelty. In the 20th c. in particular, we begin to see a tendency to speak of poetry as a form of invention analogous to the inventions of science and industry. Thus, Winters writes that "a poem in the first place should offer us new perceptions, not only of the exterior universe, but of human experience as well; it should add . . . to what we have already seen." Pound goes so far as to propose the hist. of poetry as "a twelve-volume anthology in which each poem was chosen . . . because it contained an invention, a definite contribution to the art of verbal expression." Von Hallberg (2003) cites Pound and other poets as precursors to his own implication of novelty in aesthetic evaluation: "The fully realized poem in one sense sets its own terms for success. . . . Each poem [is] an isolato or wonder." As Vendler puts it, the good poem is "strenuous, imaginative, vivid, new."

IV. Historical Representativeness. Representativeness is widely agreed to be an extrinsic value, incl. by those who argue for its importance. It values knowledge of a particular time period, oeuvre, *genre, or other category. It is often adduced as the rationale for revising canons through syllabi, anthols., etc., to include popular lit. or work by less traditionally visible authors. E.g., Packer concedes that most popular 19th-c. Am. poetry is not "fully achieved" but argues that "[t]o study these different species of poetry . . . gives us access to nineteenth-century culture in a way that nothing else can." Such criteria may be aesthetic (representative of a popular style) or social (representative of a social or political zeitgeist).

V. Critiques of Evaluation in Criticism. In the second half of the 20th c., newer critical approaches presented a powerful challenge to evaluation's legitimacy as a scholarly enterprise. This was not an appeal to extrinsic values but rather a challenge to the objectivity and historical responsibility of evaluation itself. Historicist, feminist, and Marxist scholars, among others, questioned whether evaluative criteria were portable across historical periods and the human populations. Many such critics, influenced by the sociology of Pierre Bourdieu and the hist. of Michel Foucault, have emphasized the role of institutions, power, and wealth in creating social value. The historicist critic Wolosky argues that the ability to maintain dialogue with contemp. political discourses is an intrinsic feature of 19th-c. Am. poetry, implying that poetry of different periods and trads. must be evaluated each on its own terms. Likewise, the feminist critics Gilbert and Gubar have pointed out the often all too literal ways in which poetic creativity was defined as a manifestation of the author's masculine vigor. Such critics have argued that evaluation too often relies on circular reasoning, in which unexamined preexisting values are taken to confirm the greatness of certain poems, which is, in turn, used to confirm the values with which we began.

See AESTHETICISM, HISTORICISM, HISTORY AND POETRY.

■ I. A. Richards, Practical Criticism (1929); J. Dewey, Theory of Valuation (1939); Y. Winters, In Defense of Reason (1947); W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Intentional Fallacy," The Verbal Icon (1954); G. Hough, An Essay on Criticism (1966); W. K. Frankena, "Value and Valuation," Encyclopedia of Philosophy (1967); E. Pound, "How to Read," Literary Essays of Ezra Pound, ed. T. S. Eliot (1968); N. Frye, "On Value-Judgments," The Stubborn Structure (1970); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1974); E. Olson, On Value Judgments in the Arts (1976); E. D. Hirsch Jr., The Aims of Interpretation (1976); C. Achebe, "An Image of Africa: Racism in Conrad's Heart of Darkness," Massachusetts Review 18 (1977); M. Foucault, Discipline and Punish, trans. A. Sheridan (1977); S. M. Gilbert and S. Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination (1979); P. Bourdieu, Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgement of Taste, trans. R. Nice (1984); F. R. Leavis, Valuation in Criticism, ed. G. Singh (1986); W. C. Booth, The Company We Keep (1988); B. H. Smith, Contingencies of Value (1988); H. Vendler, The Music of What Happens (1988); L. Rainey, "Canon, Gender, and Text: The Case of H.D.," College Literature 18 (1991); R. von Hallberg, "Literature and History: Neat Fits," Modernism/Modernity 33 (1996); P. C. Hogan, "Poetic Universals," PoT 18 (1997); "A Cambridge Literary History of the U.S. Forum," spec. iss., American Literary History 15.1 (2003): see A. DuBois, "Historical Impasse and the Modern Lyric Poem"; A. Filreis, "Tests of Poetry"; B. L. Packer, "Two Histories Contending"; R. von Hallberg, "Literary History and the Evaluation of Poetry"; S. Wolosky, "The Claims of Rhetoric: Toward a Historical Poetics (1820–1900)."

N. CECIRE

ÉVORA CRITICS. The label is attributed to 17th-c. Port. intellectuals whose activity as critics and theorists of poetry centered on Manuel Severim de Faria (1583–1655), choir director of Évora cathedral. Their activity probably began in 1615, when Luís da Silva de Brito (d. 1632) gave a lecture on poetry and poetics in Évora's Academia Sertória. But it was after Severim published a *panegyric of Luís de Camões and an analysis of his The Lusiads (Discursos Vários Políticos, 1624) that the polemical nature of the Évora critics came through in full. Manuel Pires de Almeida (1597–1655), who was born in Évora and studied at its university, soon opposed Severim's views. Writing and controversy on *epic poetics followed during the 1630s and 1640s, involving also João Franco Barreto (1600?–74), João Soares de Brito (1611–64), and Manuel de Galhegos (1597–1665). Issues included *imitation, mythology, verisimilitude, the beginning *in medias res, and the comparison of The Lusiads with other poems (esp. with Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata, 1581, and Gabriel Pereira de Castro's Ulisseia, 1636). The most intense polemic revolved around the interpretation of King Manuel's dream in Canto 4 of Camões's poem. The massive and very influential commentary on The Lusiads by Manuel de Faria e Sousa (1590–1649), published in Madrid in 1639, reflects the author's ongoing polemic with Almeida, esp. in issues such as the hero, epic form, and allegorical interpretation. All the critics named above exchanged correspondence assiduously on matters of poetry and poetics. Generally speaking, all of them praised Camões highly, but Almeida and Galhegos pointed out vehemently what they thought to be the poet's errors. The most important contributions of the Évora critics to Western poetics occur esp. when the poetry (mostly that of Camões) leads them to lively discussions of theory and impels them toward rethinking anew the inherited rules of *neoclassical poetics.

See PORTUGAL, POETRY OF.

■ A. S. Amora, Manuel Pires de Almeida (1955); H. Martins, Manuel de Galhegos (1964); M. L. Gonçalves Pires, A Crítica Camoniana no Século XVII (1982); J. C. Miranda, "Camões/Tasso: um confronto," Revista da Universidade de Coimbra 33 (1985); M. Severim de Faria, Discursos Vários Políticos, 4th ed. (1999); T. Cochran, Twilight of the Literary (2001); Ulisseia, v. 2, ed. J.A.S. Campos (2004)—for texts by Severim and Galhegos about this epic; M. C. Ferreira Pires, Os Académicos Eborenses na Primeira Metade de Seiscentos (2006).

H.J.S. ALVES

EXEGESIS. One of a family of terms belonging to the art and science of *hermeneutics, the word is used for the explanatory and critical *interpretation and elucidation and application of a text, originally an authoritative or canonic text (e.g., scripture), for the understanding of a secondary audience. A root of the word appears in Acts 15:12: "Then all the multitude kept silent, and gave audience to Barnabas and Paul, declaring [exegeomai] what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them." But the term has often implied an esp. detailed interpretation; also built into this is the assumption that exegesis is directed to passages that are not obviously self-explanatory and need supplementary exposition or unfolding to be comprehended properly.

Historically speaking, exegesis is almost inevitably associated with the expounding of the Bible, in part because of the long-term devel. of exegesis in the West, from Hellenistic times, and incl. rabbinic commentaries as found in collections of Midrash and the Talmud. Observance of the Jewish law required halakic exegesis or guidance as to how the law was to be observed and applied and how transgressions were to be avoided. Exegetical operations, both past and present, include glosses and running commentary on a text—keyed to it, annotating it, and placed beside or below it on the same or a facing page —to function somewhat like a Targum or trans.

From Augustine on, it is axiomatic for figural interpretation that "In the Old Testament the New is concealed, in the New the Old is revealed" (Quaestionum in Heptateuchum libri septem). Augustine also theorized exegetical practice in book 3 of his De doctrina christiana, from a rhetorician's point of view. Thomas Aquinas cites Gregory of Nyssa on biblical rhetoric: "in one and the same sentence, while it describes a fact, it reveals a mystery" (Summa Theologica 1q.1a.10). The systematic exposition of scripture in these lights culminated in the medievals' "fourfold method" of treating any given text from the Bible as having a quadruple sense—a literal (or historical) sense (sensus historicus) and three less literal senses: an allegorical (or Christological or typological or figural or figurative) sense, a moral (or tropological) sense, and an "anagogic" or ultimate sense.

The audience was informed, in the proper exposition of the four possible senses of scripture, of what it must know, believe, do, and expect, according to the following popular formulation (apparently by Augustine of Dacia):

> Littera gesta docet, quid credas allegoria,
> Moralis quid agas, quo tendas anagogia
>
> (The literal teaches what happened, the allegorical what you should believe, the moral what you should do, the anagogic where you are going.)

Aquinas made refinements on the literal sense—in relation to what is primarily or directly meant by obviously figurative speech in the scriptures (where the vehicle is not the tenor, as when God's arm means not a limb but his "operative power"; see TENOR AND VEHICLE).

In the writings of the early med. theologians known as the church fathers, the three allegorical senses found from Cassian on (Collations 14:8) have a temporal aspect. The Christological or typological sense pertains to the "historical" Jesus, in the past; the moral sense to a Christian's moral conduct, in the present; and the anagogic sense (a second typological sense) to the destinies of the creation and the church, in the future. Insofar as events recorded in the OT are understood as signs and "types" of things to come in the NT, they are both "allegorical" and future-oriented already—and insofar as events in the NT are oriented on the eschaton (end-time), they can be deemed allegorical foreshadowing as well.

The Christological or second sense develops out of readings of the OT already found in the NT, i.e., whenever matters from the former are treated as adumbrating or betokening the mysteries and revelations of the latter. An obvious model here was the existence of such prophetic motifs and "prooftexts" as a New Law and New Covenant as found in Jer. 31–32, a New Jerusalem as found in Isa. 52, a New Temple as in Ezek. 40, a second Moses in Deut. 18:18, and a new Davidic king and a new Exodus in Isa. 11. The Israelite prophets promised that the God who had acted in the past would do so again. Thus, his past actions became readable as "types" of his future ones, esp. in the life, ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ and in his church and in the lives of his followers—esp. the lives of the saints and martyrs but also in the life of any Christian who had been baptized into Christ's death, died unto sin, and expected to be raised from the dead to share in his glory. Noah's passage through the Flood, the Israelites' through the Red Sea, the Israelites' and Joshua's and Elijah's over the Jordan River, e.g., could all be read by the Christian expositor as types of an initiation procedure whereby the initiate is "born again" through the application of water or immersion in it: namely, the sacrament of Baptism, which exegetes also read into the waters of Siloe (John 9).

The third or moral sense figures heavily in parenesis, or preaching from scripture, and in homilies. In his report of the fourfold method in the Convivio, Dante says this sense "is the one that lecturers should go intently noting throughout the scriptures for their own behoof and that of their disciples": that is, this sense was the basis for sermons and homilies instructing congregations and communicants in how to conduct their lives. It necessarily read scripture as applying parabolically, in the way Luke's Jesus asked his audience to read his story of the Good Samaritan: "go thou and do likewise."

The fourth or anagogic sense, which reveals a mystic or ultimate or eschatological meaning or purpose, gets added to the other three, in conjunction with the lengthening of Christian hist. and the delaying of the parousia, or second coming of Christ, but also in concert with a tendency in Christianity to become a form of gnosis or initiation into an esoteric form of knowledge—a knowledge of "mysteries." Thus, Paul at Gal. 4:24, on Sarah and Hagar: "Now these are things spoken allegorically [allegourmena]: these women are the two covenants," where the election of Sarah is reassigned to the church, and the diselection of Hagar (and, thus, the Hagarenes) is now applied to the synagogue or the Jews—all of whom were descended from Sarah—and not Hagar.

The Neoplatonic biblical commentaries of Philo and Origen had distinguished between a literal or physical sense and psychical and/or spiritual senses, where Paul distinguished between the letter and spirit of the Old Law and where apologists for Christianity discovered New Covenant fulfillments of Old Covenant promises and prefigurations. Influential in the devel. of such a fourfold scheme may have been the four levels of knowledge in Plato (illusion of appearances, opinion of impressions, deductions of reason, and participation in the Forms), and the four senses of causation in Aristotle (material, instrumental or efficient, formal, and final). Thus, the Platonic kind of knowledge goes behind the veil of initial impressions, while the Aristotelian kind of causal explanation (for the existence or occurrence of anything) is teleological. It also seems possible that the somewhat parallel rabbinic division of scriptural interpretation into simple interpretation (Peshat, as in paraphrase and literal trans.), allusion or implied meaning (Remez), interpretive and homiletic (Derash), and secret, esoteric, allegorical, or mystical (Sod) influenced the Christian fathers. Derash, e.g., "is a subjective method which attempts to make the text applicable to the time of the exegete" (Encyclopedia Judaica) and so accommodates itself to the secondary audience also implied for the moral sense.

In the term intratextual exegesis, a contemp. biblical scholar refers to a feature internal to the scriptures themselves, for no responsible commentator can fail to recognize the echoes of scripture in scripture and indeed to hear one scripture actively interpreting another, as Luther's commentaries regularly report. But where Christian medievals and their heirs understood the OT to prophesy Christ, mod., scientific exegetes are generally concerned to keep the historical Jesus out of the immediate range of the OT's implication or intention.

By the time of Dante, examples of one or another of the four senses were more than available to interpreters and exegetes as a predictable matrix for commentary on scripture, owing to synoptic annotations and previous commentaries, assembled from and depending on patristic authorities, such as the Glossa Ordinaria (once attributed to Walafrid Strabo), the interlineal gloss attributed to Nicholas of Lyra, and the Distinctiones or encyclopedic compilations of figurative explanations of specific words. (The plurality and nominal integration of interpretations of the words in the Gospels can be most readily sampled in Aquinas's Catena Aurea in the 13th c. and Cornelius à Lapide's Great Commentary in the 17th.)

The two most common stock examples of the fourfold method are the interpretation of the Exodus and Jerusalem, and Dante avails himself of both: the Exodus in his famous letter to his patron Can Grande and Jerusalem in a long passage in his Convivio. For the fourth sense, Dante says, regarding the anagogy of the Exodus, "When the soul goeth forth out of sin, it is made holy and free," which really seems to be a version of the moral sense (with the old typology of Pharaoh as the devil). The anagogic sense of Jerusalem can be Cassian's "city of God which is the mother of us all" or, later, in Guibert of Nogent's variation, "the life of the celestial citizen who sees the face of God revealed in Zion" (Commentary on Genesis). The first sounds appropriate to a monastery under the rule of an abbot or abbess, the second more likely to have been affected by the emergence of a med. citizenry living in urban centers (Morris). But the readings agree that the anagogic Jerusalem is not Zion in Palestine but the Kingdom of God at the end of hist.

Exegetes expounding the allegoric sense, in practice, are not necessarily univocal, yet exegesis tends to refer itself to interpretations preauthorized by trad. or scriptural indications themselves. Ambrose's commentary on—or exegesis of—Jesus' refusal to rebuke his disciples' exaltation of him, where he says that, if they were silent, the very stones should cry out, insists on Jewish obduracy and hardheartedness: "Nor is it wonderful that the stones against their nature should chant forth the praises of the Lord, whom His murderers, harder than the rocks, proclaim aloud, that is, the multitude, in a little while about to crucify their God, denying Him in their hearts whom with their mouths they confess." But Origen's exegesis of the same text makes us the hardhearted party, while also implying a new election to the Jews' place: "When we also are silent, (that is, when the love of many waxeth cold), the stones cry out, for God can from stones [Heb. baneh] raise up children [Heb. ben] to Abraham" (Aquinas, Catena Aurea, In Lukam). Origen has leapt across the gap between different sayings of Jesus to suggest that the stones have a symbolic life of their own and that this needs to be brought to bear by the exegete.

Dante might have known both the above readings, when he extends the fourfold exegetical method to the reading of poetry:

> This exposition [of poetry] must be both literal and allegorical; and that this may be understood it should be known that writings may be taken and should be expounded chiefly in four senses. The first is called the literal, and it is the one that extends no further than the letter as it stands; the second is called the allegorical, and is the one that hides itself under the mantle [or veil] of these tales, and is a truth hidden under beauteous fiction [or: "under a beautiful lie"]. As when Ovid says that Orpheus with his lyre made wild beasts tame and made trees and rocks approach him; which would say that the wise man with the instrument of his voice maketh cruel hearts tender and humble; and moveth his will such as have the life of science and of art; for they that have not the rational life are as good as stones. (Convivio, trans. Wicksteed)

Was Orpheus a spell caster like the Pied Piper or a rhetor and persuader like Jesus addressing the potentially hard of hearing and hardhearted or the uneducated (or ineducable)? Knowing the degree of such an interpretation's preestablishment in the exegete's own culture is the main index as to whether such deductions are to be seen as an appliqué or as intrinsic—or as conventional or deviant. When interpretation has gone inside the text, as may happen editorially or in the practice and mode of allegory, the resulting internal or intratextual exegesis can oblige external commentary to become somewhat echoic—as if carrying coals to Newcastle by moralizing a song that (as Spenser's Faerie Queene initially announces) has already been moralized.

A contrasting term is eisegesis, or discovering in a text significances that are not there and cannot be justified by an honest—as opposed to a facetious—appeal to that text. When Chaucer's Friar (in the "Summoner's Tale") says "Glosynge is a glorious thyng," the preaching trad.—or exegesis as a performative art—is mocked for its abuses, as a self-indulgent, exhibitionistic, vainglorious, sterile, tangential, and shadow-chasing exercise without any genuine catechetical or homiletic effectiveness. Dante's (or Beatrice's) animadversions on fantastical and meretricious spiels by loquacious preachers or teachers as vulgar showmen imply the same censure of exegetical licentiousness and excess (Paradiso 29, 109–11). The partisan reading of a text to extract an ideologically, politically, or socially acceptable sense from it is also reprehended in the Qur'an: "He it is Who hath revealed unto thee the Scripture wherein are clear revelations—They are the substance of the Book—and others allegorical. But those, in whose hearts is doubt, pursue, forsooth, that which is allegorical, seeking dissension by seeking to explain it" (Surah III, 6f., after Pickthall trans.) But mod. interpretive techniques thrive on ambiguities, anomalies, *aporia, disconnects, misreadings, mistrans., lapses, gaps, suppressed information, and self-contradictions in texts; and have developed an almost neorabbinic exegetical armamentarium on their basis. Traces of the quadrivial method survive in Northrop Frye's "Theory of Symbols" ("literal," "formal," "mythical," "anagogic") in his Anatomy of Criticism (1957), which is indebted to Ernst Cassirer's hist. of spiritual signs and the footsteps of God in Christian thought, in v. 2 of his Philosophy of Symbolic Forms: Mythical Thought (1955).

In conclusion, exegesis is a term for the methodical interpretation (and interrogation) of texts, originally a theological kind of exposition practiced by the rabbis and the church fathers on the polysemous sacred page (as above); it has since been more widely used for the sustained application of critical and interpretive technique to any text being studied or searched for its less than wholly manifest or obvious meaning or implication, in order to give—or construct—a more exploded or unveiled or fuller view of it. The text in question is most often a more complex one, a literary or philosophic one, or one figuring in the study of the humanities and/or the social sciences.

When James Joyce says in Finnegans Wake, "Wipe your glosses with what you know," he may imply that the exegete needs to appeal to context to determine what a text means (or is really saying), or he may suggest that philological study of cognates, etymologies, etc., allows one to translate or understand what one is reading. But he may also come close to Frye's suggestion that not only the works of Jakob Boehme but all other texts as well are picnics to which the author brings the words and the reader the meanings. In the hist. of interpretation, the interpreter has often brought with him or her some version of the fourfold method. But where once they were Pauline, Alexandrine, patristic, rabbinic, or kabbalistic, in the latter day the lenses focused on a text can be those of the Marxist, Freudian, Jungian, Straussian, Lacanian, feminist, deconstructionist, New Historicist, etc., depending on the training, the school, and the prehensions and preconditioning of the exegete but also on his or her own convictions and experience.

■ Migne, PL, v. 112; H. Caplan, "Four Senses of Scriptural Interpretation and the Mediaeval Theory of Preaching," Speculum 4 (1929); C. Spicq, Esquisse d'une histoire de l'exégèse latine au moyen âge (1944); H. A. Wolfson, Philo, 2 v. (1947); F. Stegmüller et al., Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 11 v. (1950–80); J. Daniélou, Bible et Liturgie, la théologie biblique des sacrements and des fêtes d'après les Pères de l'Église (1951); D. W. Robertson Jr., and B. F. Huppé, "Piers Plowman" and Scriptural Tradition (1951); Empson; G.W.H. Lampe and K. J. Woolcombe, Essays on Typology (1957); J. Chydenius, The Typological Problem in Dante (1958); R.P.C. Hanson, Allegory and Event (1959); H. de Lubac, Exégèse medieval, 4 v. (1959); B. M. Casper, An Introduction to Jewish Bible Commentary (1960); S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh, trans. G. W. Anderson (1954);

J. Daniélou, From Shadows to Reality: Studies in the Biblical Typology of the Fathers (1950), trans. W. Hibberd (1960); T. F. Glasson, Moses in the Fourth Gospel (1963); The Cambridge History of the Bible, ed. P. R. Ackroyd et al., 3 v. (1963–70); A. C. Charity, Events and Their Afterlife: The Dialectics of Christian Typology in the Bible and Dante (1966); J. S. Preuss, From Shadow to Promise: Old Testament Interpretation from Augustine to the Young Luther (1969); J. Pelikan, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600) (1971); C. Morris, The Discovery of the Individual, 1050–1200 (1972); Biblical Studies: The Mediaeval Irish Contribution, ed. M. McNamara (1976); M.-D. Chenu, La théologie au douzième siècle, 3d ed. (1976); J. Pelikan, The Growth of Mediaeval Theology (600–1300) (1978); P. Ricoeur, Essays on Biblical Interpretation, ed. L. S. Mudge (1980); J. Marenbon, From the Circle of Alcuin to the School of Auxerre: Logic, Theology, and Philosophy in the Early Middle Ages (1981); L. Goppelt, Typos (1939), trans. D. H. Madvig (1982); F. Kermode, The Genesis of Secrecy (1979); de Man; B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages, rev. ed. (1983); G. Evans, The Language and Logic of the Bible: The Earlier Middle Ages (1984); J. Freccero, Dante: The Poetics of Conversion, ed. R. Jacoff (1986); J. L. Kugel and R. A. Greer, Early Biblical Interpretation (1986); A Guide to Contemporary Hermeneutics, ed. D. K. McKim (1986); H. Fisch, Poetry with a Purpose: Biblical Poetics and Interpretation (1988); R. E. Kaske et al., "Biblical Exegesis," Medieval Christian Literary Imagery (1988); G. D. Fee, Garments of Torah: Essays in Biblical Hermeneutics (1989); M. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (1989); H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method, trans. J. Weinsheimer and D. G. Marshall, 2d rev. ed. (1989); Annotation and Its Texts, ed. S. Barney (1990)—esp. J. C. Nohrnberg, "Justifying Narrative: Commentary in Biblical Storytelling"; Medieval Literary Theory and Criticism c. 1100–c. 1375: The Commentary Tradition, ed. A. J. Minnis, A. B. Scott, and D. Wallace (1991); K. Hagen, Luther's Approach to Scripture as Seen in His "Commentaries" on Galatians: 1519–1538 (1993); H. Bornkamm, Luther and the Old Testament, trans. E. W. and R. C. Gritsch, 2d ed. (1997); A. Grafton, The Footnote (1997); The Margins of the Text, ed. D. C. Greetham (1997); G. D. Fee, The Exegetical Imagination: On Jewish Thought and Theology (1998); P. M. van Buren, According to the Scriptures: The Origins of the Gospel and of the Church's Old Testament (1998); P. S. Hawkins, Dante's Testaments: Essays in Scriptural Imagination (1999); C. V. Kaske, Spenser and Biblical Poetics (1999); R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 2d ed. (1999); R. Hollander, "Dante Theologus-Poetam," Dante Studies 118 (2000); G. D. Fee, To What End Exegesis? (2001); H. Bloom, A Map of Misreading, 2d ed. (2003); B. Van Name Edwards, "The Manuscript Transmission of Carolingian Biblical Commentaries," Carolingian Biblical Exegesis homepage (2005), http://www.tcnj.edu/~chazelle/carindex.htm; "Exegesis and Study" and "The Third Period" sub "History of the Text," both sub "Bible," Encyclopedica Judaica, ed. F. Skolnik and M. Berenbaum, 2d ed., v. 3 (2007).

J. Nohrnberg

EXEMPLUM. A short, embedded narrative used to illustrate a moral point. The term is applied chiefly to the stories used in med. sermons, first in Lat., then in the vernaculars, and derived from both cl. rhet. and the parables of the NT; the illustrative *anecdote is still, perhaps, the commonest feature of public speaking. The most famous source of such stories was the Lat. prose Gesta Romanorum (late 13th c.), but collections for the use of preachers were also made in verse, e.g., Handlyng Synne (begun 1303) by Robert Mannyng of Brunne, a treatise on the Seven Deadly Sins with illustrative stories, adapted from the Fr. Somme le Roy. A secular use is shown in John Gower's Confessio amantis (written ca. 1386–90), where the exempla illustrate sins against Venus. Chaucer's "Pardoner's Tale" furnishes the best Eng. example; not only the main story but many lesser narratives too are used as exempla of the Pardoner's text. The ME Alphabet of Tales (trans. late 15th c.) lists exempla under rubrics such as Abstinence, Adulation, etc. The MHG form is the Bîspel.

See didactic poetry.

■ J.-T. Welter, L'Exemplum dans la littératur religieuse et didactique du moyen âge (1927); Curtius; E. Neumann, "Bîspel," and J. Klapper, "Exempel," Reallexikon II; G. R. Owst, Literature and Pulpit in Medieval England, 2d ed. (1961); H. de Boor, Fabel und Bîspel (1966); F. C. Tubach, Index exemplorum: A Handlist of Medieval Religious Tales (1969); J. D. Lyons, Exemplum (1990); D. Roth, "Das Exemplum zwischen illustratio und argumentatio. Zum Exempla-Gebrauch in der 'Disciplina clericalis,'" Mittellateinisches Jahrbuch 29 (1994); Unruly Examples, ed. A. Gelley (1995); Les Exempla médiévaux, ed. J. Berlioz (1998); J. Aragüés Aldaz, "Deus Concionator": Mundo predicado y retórica del "exemplum" en los Siglos de Oro (1999); H. E. Keller, "Zorn-Prüfstein der Exemplarität? Eine Fallstudie zum Exemplar und seinen Paratexten," Anima und sêle: Darstellungen und Systematisierungen von Seele im Mittelalter, ed. K. Philipowski and A. Prior (2006); E. Palafox, "Medieval Spanish Exempla Literature," Castilian Writers, 1200–1400, ed. G. Greenia and F. A. Domínguez (2008).

R. P. apRoberts; T.V.F. Brogan

EXOTICISM. In a narrow sense (sometimes called "pure" exoticism), the depiction of the distantly foreign or strange for the sake of novelty or picturesque effect, without concern for accuracy or comprehension. More broadly, however, exoticism describes any extended use in Western lit. of non-Western, esp. "Oriental," settings, motifs, or cultural references, whether for merely decorative or more serious purposes.

Exotic implies "outside"; hence, in Occidental poetry, it refers to what is "outside" the Western trad. In Homer, parts of Asia are presented as alien and bizarre; Aeschylus in The Persians and Euripides in The Bacchae portray Asia as (respectively) despotic and sensual, irrational and effeminate, connotations that persisted throughout later Western lit. hist. With Roman ascendancy, Orient emerges as a term for Asia and North Africa, associated by Virgil, Propertius, Juvenal, and other Roman poets with luxury, barbarous customs, magic, and colorful dress. In med. and early mod. Eur. poetry, the Orient is identified with Islam, appearing as Christendom's political and religious antagonist in the Chanson de Roland, the Poema del Cid, in Ludovico Ariosto, in Torquato Tasso, and in Luís de Camões's The Lusiads. This Orient is at once exotic and familiar, with Islam a parodic distortion of Christianity and Muslims sometimes chivalrous and sometimes treacherous, colorful, fierce, and inclined to sorcery and sensuality. In Ren. and neoclassical poetic drama, from Christopher Marlowe and Shakespeare through Pierre Corneille, William Davenant, and John Dryden to Joseph Addison and Samuel Johnson, Oriental settings—esp. such border areas as Islamic Spain and the Mediterranean—underscore divided religious and political loyalties socially and, psychologically, characters' internal conflicts between (Oriental) irrationality and eroticism and (Occidental) rationality and duty.

Several devels. foster the prominence of literary Orientalism in the 18th and early 19th cs.: the cult of chinoiserie in gardening and the decorative arts; Antoine Galland's trans. of the 1001 Nights (1704–08) and its many imitations; the new interpretation of the Bible, advanced by Robert Lowth, J. G. Eichhorn, and J. G. Herder, as essentially Oriental; and the rise of Oriental studies with such important trans. as Sir William ("Oriental") Jones's A Persian Song of Hafiz (1771) and Shakuntala (1789)—all associated with (if not implicated in) the establishment of Eur. hegemony over the East, esp. the Brit. Empire over India. Picturesque exoticism becomes prominent in such works as William Collins's Persian Eclogues (1742) and William Beckford's Vathek (1786), a prose Oriental fantasy that influenced Eng. and Fr. romantic poets. At the same time, a measure of cultural relativism, enabled by the new historicism of Giambattista Vico and Herder, can be seen in Lowth's use of "Oriental" poetry to criticize neoclassical standards of taste (De sacra poesi Hebraeorum, 1753) and in the fabrication of an Oriental perspective for the social satire of Montesquieu, Oliver Goldsmith, and Voltaire, strategies closely related to *primitivism.

Orientalism in romantic poetry is marked simultaneously by exoticism and by the more profound cultural interest in Asia exemplified by Friedrich Schlegel's Über die Sprache und Weisheit der Indier (1808). In works such as J. W. Goethe's West-östlicher Divan (1819) and Victor Hugo's Les Orientales (1829), the Orient provides both a picturesque locale (as in paintings by Eugène Delacroix and Jean-Auguste Ingres) and a cultural alternative. Although the Eng. romantics were deeply interested in Asian mythologies, picturesque exoticism lay behind the popularity of such poems as W. S. Landor's Gebir (1798), Robert Southey's Thalaba (1800), Lord Byron's Giaour (1813), and Thomas Moore's Lallah Rookh (1816). François René de Chateaubriand, Alphonse de Lamartine, and Gérard de Nerval wrote poetry that reflected their literary pilgrimages to the Near East. Edward FitzGerald's trans. of The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám (1859), one of the most popular poems of the Victorian period, reflected a renewed Brit. interest in *Persian poetry, shared by FitzGerald's friend Alfred, Lord Tennyson and by Matthew Arnold, whose Sohrab and Rustum (1853) is based on the Shāhnama, the Persian national epic.

Thereafter, as Europe comes to be seen as increasingly dull, colorless, and mechanized, a purer exoticism, emphasizing the new, the strange, and the sensuous and associated more with China and Japan than with India and the Near East, develops in the poetry of Théophile Gautier and Judith Gautier, whose Livre de jade (1867) esp. inspired such poets of the exotic as J.-M. de Heredia and Charles Cros, with a later Ger. analogue in Hans Bethge. Similarly, in America the cultural interest in India evidenced in R. W. Emerson and Walt Whitman eventually yields to the exoticism of the imagist poets John Gould Fletcher and Amy Lowell (see IMAGISM), although Ezra Pound's engagement with Chinese thought and poetics through Ernest Fenollosa runs much deeper. Late 20th-c. poet-travelers like James Merrill manifest a relation to the exotic at once nostalgic and ironic, as technological advances in transportation and communications make the distant near and its strangeness familiar.

■ W. L. Schwartz, The Imaginative Interpretation of the Far East in Modern French Literature, 1800–1925 (1927); P. Jourda, L'Exotisme dans la littérature française depuis Chateaubriand (1938); R. Schwab, La Renaissance orientale (1950); E. S. Shaffer, "Kubla Khan" and The Fall of Jerusalem (1975); C. Le Yaouanc, L'Orient dans la poésie anglaise de l'époque romantique, 1798–1824 (1975); E. Said, Orientalism (1978); B. Yu, The Great Circle (1983); C. Daileader, "Back Door Sex: Renaissance Gynosodomy, Aretino, and the Exotic," ELH 69 (2000); T. Morton, The Poetics of Spice (2000); G. Huggan, The Postcolonial Exotic (2001); V. Bazin, "'Just Looking' at the Everyday: Marianne Moore's Exotic Modernism," Modernist Cultures 2 (2006); L. Morton, The Alien Within (2009)—on 20th-c. Japanese lit.

A. RICHARDSON

EXPLICATION. A procedure for interpreting poetry that was conceived and developed in the 20th c. under several auspices: in France as explication de texte* according to principles articulated by the literary critic Gustave Lanson, director of the École Normale Supérieure, and others; and in the U.S., the U.K., and other Eng.-speaking countries under the influence of I. A. Richards, William Empson, Cleanth Brooks, and other critics whose work was identified sympathetically by John Crowe Ransom in the book The New Criticism (1941). Explication typically involves a statement of the argument or theme of the poem, an inventory of formal and rhetorical elements, and a running annotation of difficult or opaque items. In this sense, explication is often closer to commentary, glossing, or exposition than to a thorough *interpretation, or what is known idiomatically in Eng. as a reading. The Fr. explication de texte is more formalized and more attentive to authorial *intention and the social milieu of a poem than Anglo-Am. explication: a directive from the Fr. Ministry of Education in 1938 stipulates a set of practices that must be observed in "l'explication française," incl. putting "ourselves in the author's place," and concludes that "it would be illogical and arbitrary to separate, in the interpretation of a text, form from content, thought from language." The same year, Brooks and Robert Penn Warren published Understanding Poetry, the most influential handbook of the *New Criticism, which poses questions and demonstrates methods far more than it gives directives. Professional readers with intellectual origins in other trads. such as the Am. literary historian Harry Levin, the Czech critic René Wellek, and the Rus. linguist Roman Jakobson sometimes performed explications in the course of their historical or theoretical investigations. Closely associated with pedagogy but also a staple of sophisticated analysis, the procedure became a common currency across methodological and other divisions throughout the 20th c.

In the New Criticism, "explication is often a process of 'explicitating' the implied cognitive content of metaphors or other figures in a poem" (Strier). Working toward rendering poems intelligible, explication as decipherment attends to detail; it is perhaps a paradox that, by explaining *diction, unbraiding *syntax, observing *connotations, and confronting *difficulty in all its manifestations, teachers work to move novices away from "single-layered readings" and toward appreciation of poetic complexity (in the economy of explication, always an honorific concept). Explication's glosses are preliminary to the work of "reading for complexity," first steps before the student or reader is ready to recognize a poem's "competing patterns." Some ages in lit. hist. are nearly constituted by explication: confronted with the obliquities of *modernism, e.g., a poetry rendered almost "inarticulate" by its difficulty, readers found that "poetry must be explicated to speak" (Strier). Even so, apologists for avant-garde poetries may resist what is most characteristic of explication, the preliminary acts of recasting nodes of poetic obscurity and novelty into more familiar terms. For the Fr. philosopher Jacques Rancière, "explication is not necessary to remedy an incapacity to understand"; rather, "that very incapacity provides the structuring function of the explicative conception of the world." By this logic, explicators make themselves necessary by inventing a self-serving world split between the knowing and ignorant; "explication is the myth of pedagogy."

Today, the term explication is less a drawing of battle lines than it was in the heyday of the New Criticism from about 1940 to 1960. To claim to explicate a poem now is not necessarily to align oneself with a particular method or theory. If explication implies untangling syntactic knots, annotating arcane or archaic words, and identifying historical or local references, this work is in the service of interpretation, a search for complexity and richness. In its current workaday sense, explication is an alternative term for close reading*. Others locate the essence of explication in the explanatory addenda that scholarly editors supply in annotated eds., responses to Steiner's first kind of difficulty, "something that 'we need to look up.'" Procedures of "practical criticism" can claim a venerable, mixed parentage (incl. biblical *exegesis, *textual criticism of Shakespeare, and pedagogical expedients for students unversed in poetic trads.). But the familiar kind of leisurely but detailed stroll through a poem that follows the usual sense of explication, a process of unhurried clarification and making salient, where care is taken to identify and comment on all cruxes, landmarks, or shifts of tone or figure, is difficult to find in print before the 20th c.—and is becoming scarcer in the 21st. Of course, explication will survive as long as there are readers. But as the procedure (in its guise as close reading) is now called into question by digital humanists who argue for computer-driven modes of reading, as textual crit. becomes increasingly skeptical of the possibility of a definitive ed., and as annotators are less interested in fixing than in multiplying meanings, it might be wondered whether the practice of explication that was ubiquitous and inevitable in the past century will remain so in the current one.

See FORMALISM.

■ Criticism and History: W. K. Wimsatt, "Explication as Criticism," The Verbal Icon (1954); Brooks and Warren; H. Kenner, "The Pedagogue as Critic," The New Criticism and After, ed. T. D. Young (1975); R. Strier, "The Poetics of Surrender: An Exposition and Critique of New Critical Poetics," CritI 2 (1975); G. Steiner, "On Difficulty," On Difficulty and Other Essays (1978); F. Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (1980); J. Stout, "What Is the Meaning of a Text?" NLH 14 (1982); H. Levin, "The Implication of Explication," PoT 5 (1984); J. Rancière, The Ignorant Schoolmaster: Five Lessons in Intellectual Emancipation, ed. K. Ross (1991); D. Mao, "The New Critics and the Text-Object," ELH 63 (1996); D. P. Britzman, "On Refusing Explication: Toward a Non-Narrative Narrativity," Resources for Feminist Research 25 (1997); M. Welsh, "Hypotheses, Evidence, Editing, and Explication," Yearbook of English Studies 29 (1999); N. L. Chick, H. Hassel, A. Haynie, "Pressing an Ear against the Hive: Reading Literature for Complexity," Pedagogy 9 (2009).

■ Collections of Brief Explications: C. Paglia, Break, Blow, Burn (2005); H. Vendler, Dickinson: Selected Poems and Commentaries (2010); S. Burt and D. Mikics, The Art of the Sonnet (2010).

D. FRIED

EXPLICATION DE TEXTE. In literary analysis, explication de texte may be considered similar to *close reading. It originated as a mode of analysis typical to the Fr. educational system, in which the student provides a commentary on a short literary work or an extract from a longer work. The term may also be applied to the analysis of an extract from a philosophical text.

When explication de texte was established as a way of approaching Fr. lang. texts in the 18th and 19th cs., it was, to a large degree, modeled on prælectio as practiced in the schools of ancient rhet., where the reading and interpretation of poetic works would furnish future orators with suitable embellishments for their speeches. Explication de texte became an official element of the baccalaureate examinations in 1840, at which time the cl. heritage and the norms established in the previous century resulted in an emphasis on rhet. The devel. of good *taste and the moral well-being of the pupil were also important considerations in *interpretation. Through the work of Gustave Lanson (1857–1934), the consideration of broader social and historical forces was integrated into the commentary of texts. The tools of neoclassical rhet. and socio-historical analysis were, however, inadequate to the task of explicating the poetry of the late 19th c., esp. the highly self-reflexive work of some of the leading symbolists, whose practice tended to draw attention to the "material" and sonorous qualities of lang. In the 20th c., analysis of texts from this period led to a reconsideration of the practice of explication de texte.

During the latter half of the 20th c., the two terms of the practice, explication and texte, were persistently questioned, and this self-consciousness has become a significant aspect of the reading of a work. The writings of Roland Barthes (1915–80) were particularly influential in drawing attention to the problems of presuming knowledge of what a *"text" is and what is entailed by *"explication." Poststructuralist analysis (see POSTSTRUCTURALISM) tended to emphasize the "openness" as opposed to the *"closure" of the text. An open text refuses the allocation of a determinate meaning, which, in turn, engages readers, involving them in the processes of the production of meaning. In Barthes's terminology this would be a "writerly" text (texte scriptable) and the closed text a "readerly" text (texte lisible). The writers and theorists associated with the jour. Tel Quel*, which represented an important intervention in the field of lit. crit. in 1960s France, recognized the political implications of the open text, which they understood as presenting a radical challenge to explication de texte, institutionalized as reading practice by the bourgeoisie. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Jacques Derrida (1930–2004) worked closely with the Tel Quel group, and in his work, he associated the closed text with the metaphysical concept of the "book," which he argued had been superseded.

These critiques have unseated the notion that there could be a "correct" reading of any text and led to a recasting of explication de texte as an interminable, open-ended process. Explication de texte went from being the close analysis of the text in itself to the self-critical analysis of the literary object and the presuppositions of that analysis.

■ P. Sollers, L'écriture et l'expérience des limites (1968); R. Barthes, "The Death of the Author," Image-Music-Text, trans. S. Heath (1977); J. Derrida, Dissemination, trans. B. Johnson (1981).

B. NORMAN

EXPRESSION. In "What Is Poetry?" (1833), John Stuart Mill proposes that "[p]oetry and eloquence are both alike the expression or utterance of feeling." Mill's proposition draws on a theory of expression developed in antiquity. By the time of Cicero, elocutio (the attunement of expression to subject matter) had long been considered indispensable to an orator in "conciliating, informing, and moving the feelings of the audience" (De oratore 2.28, 3.5–6). Cicero followed Aristotle (Rhetoric 1356a, Poetics 1455a) in declaring the eloquent expression of feeling essential to both rhet. and poetry, but it was Horace who first transformed this notion of expression into an aesthetic imperative: "if you would have me weep, you must first feel grief yourself" (Ars poetica, 102–3).

In The Mirror and the Lamp (1953), M. H. Abrams identifies Horace's injunction as a precursor to the expressive theory of poetry that emerged during the decades following the Enlightenment. This "radical shift . . . in the alignment of aesthetic thinking" gained momentum with the decline of cl. and neoclassical aesthetics in the late 18th c. (see CLASSICISM, NEOCLASSICAL POETICS). During this period, the Aristotelian classification of poetry as a species of mimesis* (Poetics 1447a) was superseded by an aesthetic theory that stressed the primacy of the expression of the poet's *emotions and *imagination. "Aristotle . . . considered the essence of poetry to be Imitation," wrote J. Keble in his review of J. G. Lockhart's Life of Scott (1838): "Expression we say, rather than imitation; for the latter word clearly conveys a cold and inadequate notion, of the writer's meaning."

This revolution in aesthetics began on the Continent, where, in the early 18th c., Giambattista Vico's Scienza nuova (1725) defined poetry as a spontaneous, natural lang. "formed by feelings of passion and affection." A decade later, in his Enquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer (1735), Thomas Blackwell claimed the lang. of poetry to be "Words taken wholly from rough Nature, and invented under some Passion." This hypothesis was adapted and expanded throughout the century in works such as Charles Batteux's Les beaux arts réduits à un même principe (1747), J. G. Herder's Abhandlung über den Ursprung der Sprache (1772), and Hugh Blair's Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres (1783), but it received its most canonical formulation in William Wordsworth's Preface to the second ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800): "all good poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings." Wordsworth's declaration, which assumes *spontaneity and subjectivity to be integral to expression, became a central tenet of romantic poetics and has been invoked repeatedly in analyses of the post-Ren. lyric trad.

The lyrical mode of expression advocated by Wordsworth prevailed throughout the 19th c. In his book Esthétique (1878), Eugene Véron elaborated on Wordsworth's ideas by claiming that "art is the manifestation of emotion, obtaining external interpretation either by the expressive arrangement of lines, forms, or colors, or by a series of gestures, sounds and words brought under a particular rhythm." In his Essay on Style (1888), Walter Pater pushed this claim even further: "all beauty is in the long run only fineness of truth, or what we call expression, the finer accommodation of speech to that vision within." A generation later, Benedetto Croce's Estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale (1902) adapted these ideas to advance one of the most significant postromantic theories of expression.

All poetry, asserts Croce, is lyrical inasmuch as it constitutes an act of expression; however, rather than directly representing emotion, expression manifests as an idea, or composite mental image, derived from the poet's intuition. The aesthetic value of expression is, therefore, determined by the accordance of the idea to the emotion it expresses. In this respect, Croce's theory approaches T. S. Eliot's notion of the *objective correlative as the "only way of expressing emotion in the form of art." Ernst Cassirer, one of the foremost critics of Croce's aesthetics, has disputed elements of this theory, challenging its reduction of art to expression and its failure to differentiate between expression as an act and as a mode. In Philosophie der symbolischen Formen, v. 3 (1929), Cassirer proposes an alternative theory of expression that extends beyond the boundaries of art to encompass the "expressive function" of consciousness.

In the mid-20th c., the lyricist and idealist poetics of critics like Croce and Cassirer were largely supplanted by *structuralism and *semiotics. An example of this can be found in Louis Hjelmslev's Prolegomena to a Theory of Language (1943), which adapted Saussurean ling. to advance a theory of expression based on the concept of "sign function" (the interdependence between the expression and content of a sign; see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). The sign, according to Hjelmslev, is never simply an expression pointing to content outside itself; rather, it is a matrix of intersecting planes of expression and content, which are "coordinate and equal entities in every respect." Adopting elements of Hjelmslev's model, Umberto Eco's Trattato di semiotica generale (1975) characterized aesthetic expression as a type of communication. "[T]he aesthetic text," writes Eco, "represents a sort of summary and laboratory model of all the aspects of sign function"; i.e., a semiotic sequence constituted by the combination of signs and codes in a "system of mutual correlations"; these "correlations," argues Eco, structure the "aesthetic idiolect" (or "key") of the text.

See LYRIC; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS.

■ T. S. Eliot, The Sacred Wood (1920); W. R. Roberts, Greek Rhetoric and Literary Criticism (1928); G.N.G. Orsini, Benedetto Croce (1961); J. Hospers, Artistic Expression (1971); T. I. Bayer, "Art as Symbolic Form: Cassirer on the Educational Value of Art," Journal of Aesthetic Education 40 (2006).

G. COSTA; C. DONALDSON

EXPRESSIONISM. Expressionism refers to an avant-garde movement in the arts in Germany from approximately 1910 to 1920 that developed first and most prominently in the visual arts (painting, sculpture, lithographs, and woodcuts) before spreading into the verbal arts (drama, poetry, and prose fiction), as well as into music and film. In any medium or genre, the term has always encompassed a broad range of very different works, which has made attempts at a narrow definition of expressionism problematic and contradictory, esp. in the case of literary expressionism. Nonetheless, early scholarship, esp. after the hiatus of World War II, contributed greatly to recovering the works, defining their significance, and establishing principal lines of interpretation, though expressionism was often viewed as a separate and singular phenomenon apart from Ger. *modernism, as exemplified by the figures of R. M. Rilke (poetry), Thomas Mann (fiction), and Bertolt Brecht (drama). Scholarship has since sidestepped the question of a specific definition of expressionism by emphasizing the affiliations and affinities of a heterogeneous expressionism with Ger. and Eur. modernism as well as other *avant-garde poetics (*futurism, *vorticism, *surrealism, and *Dada). This approach allows broad synthetic and theoretical perspectives that bring literary expressionism into the mainstream of Ger. and Eur. modernity and allow greater attention to individual, often highly idiosyncratic, writers of significance who did not fit easily into prior discussions of expressionism. The greater degrees of generality and specificity highlight the role of expressionism in Ger. modernism.

Both artists and writers of expressionism share common influences such as, above all, Friedrich Nietzsche, whether the ecstatic life-affirming side or the analytical-nihilistic side; and the art historian Wilhelm Worringer, whose works Abstraktion und Einfühlung (Abstraction and Empathy, 1908) and Formprobleme der Gotik (Form in Gothic, 1911) were read as scholarly *manifestos for contemp. expressionism, providing it with aesthetic justification and an artistic lineage. In comparison to the preceding generation of impressionism in painting, realism-naturalism in lit., and esp. academic classicism, expressionism aims for concentrated and provocative intensity of expression in each medium, which means departure from the inherited norms of composition and an embrace of nonnaturalistic representation on multiple levels. Painters such as Erich Heckel, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Otto Mueller, Emil Nolde, Max Pechstein, Karl Schmidt-Rottluff of the Bridge group in Dresden (Die Brücke, 1905–11); Wassily Kandinsky, August Macke, Franz Marc, Gabriele Münter, Alexej von Jawlensky, and others of the Blue Rider group in Munich (Der Blaue Reiter, 1909–12); and others such as Max Beckmann, Otto Dix, Georg Grosz, Oskar Kokoschka, Paul Klee, Ludwig Meidner, and Egon Schiele used vivid, even garish colors, large color fields, tilted perspectives, heavy brushstrokes, edgy lines, and little modeling, proportion, or draftsmanship to create magical or unsettling, satirical or apocalyptic landscapes and figures. Both painters and writers borrowed from non-Western sources, particularly Af. art (see PRIMITIVISM), and rejected cl. ideals of harmonious beauty: indeed, the opposite would lead toward truth. These artists shared cafés and jours. with the writers of expressionism (many were dual talents), as well as influences, ideals, and themes, such as alienation from society (the outsider), rejection of bourgeois norms, return to nature, and antirationalism (madness or exaltation, physical vitality or sickness, instinct and animality, sexuality). Writers added a rhetorical dimension of apocalyptic pathos and messianic fervor even before World War I.

The lit. of expressionism divides into three phases before, during, and after World War I. Poetry, the most concentrated form, is also the most representative of the poetics: in the anthology Menschheitsdämmerung (Twilight/Dawn of Humanity, 1920) the poems (by Gottfried Benn, Georg Heym, Jakob van Hoddis, Else Lasker-Schüler, Alfred Lichtenstein, Ernst Stadler, August Stramm, Georg Trakl, and Franz Werfel, among others) range from rhetorical pathos, often evoking the brotherhood of humankind, to a truncated "telegram" style—the longest and shortest lines of poetry in Ger.; from darkly lyrical symbolism to brutal cynicism and rhapsodic "absolute ciphers"; from apocalyptic visions of death and destruction to grotesque satire. The principal poetic features are stark imagery and contrasts, staccato rhythms, elevated rhetorical apostrophes, and abrupt discontinuities (see HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS), shared by the prose of expressionism (by writers such as such as Benn, Alfred Döblin, Carl Einstein, Kasimir Edschmid, Albert Ehrenstein, Heym, Franz Jung, Gustav Sack, Carl Sternheim, and Werfel, among others). The drama of expressionism, whether by painters (Kokoschka), by poets (Benn, Stramm), or by dramatists (Walter Hasenclever, Georg Kaiser, Reinhard Sorge, and Ernst Toller) stripped down the naturalist stage to bare essentials of decor, plot, and dialogue in order to convey anguish (the Schrei or scream) or mystical spirituality (Geist or mind/spirit) in allegorical fashion. Highly stylized and abstract stage compositions with heightened contrasts in paint, sound, and lighting emphasize the stark oppositions of characters and the importance of physical (or verbal) gesture, much of which carried over into early film in the Weimar period, as in the prototypical Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1920). The politics of expressionism (both social critique and utopianism) emerged fully and forcefully during and after World War I, though expressionism influenced artists and writers on both ends of the political spectrum (Communism and Fascism). In 1934, Georg Lukács's condemnation of expressionism for its escapism in his essay "Größe und Verfall des Expressionismus" (Greatness and Decline of Expressionism), like Klaus Mann's denunciation of Benn in his essay "Gottfried Benn: Geschichte einer Verwirrung" ("Gottfried Benn: The Story of a Confusion," 1937), led to a debate over expressionism among exiles. Nazism condemned the movement as "degenerate." Nonetheless, expressionism exerted a strong influence in the arts after World War II, in Germany and beyond.

■ Menschheitsdämmerung, ed. K. Pinthus (1920); W. Sokel, The Writer in Extremis (1959); W. Rothe, Expressionismus als Literatur (1969); R. P. Newton, Form in the "Menschheitsdämmerung" (1971)—study of prosody; G. Perkins, Contemporary Theory of Expressionism (1974); R. F. Allen, German Expressionist Poetry (1979); Begriffsbestimmung des literarischen Expressionismus, ed. H. G. Rötzer (1976); Expressionism Reconsidered, ed. G. Pickar and E. Webb (1979); R. Brinkmann, Expressionismus (1980)—international research report; Expressionismus: Manifeste und Dokumente zur deutsche Literatur, 1910–1920, ed. T. Anz and M. Stark (1982); R. F. Allen, Literary Life in German Expressionism (1983); Die Autoren und Bücher des literarischen Expressionismus, ed. P. Raabe (1985); N. H. Donahue, Forms of Disruption (1993); German Expressionism: Documents, ed. R.-C. Washton-Long (1993); Dawn of Humanity: A Document of Expressionism, ed. J. Ratych, R. Ley, R. C. Conard (1994); R. Rumold, The Janus Face of the German Avant-Garde (2002); A Companion to the Literature of German Expressionism, ed. N. H. Donahue (2005).

N. H. DONAHUE

EYE RHYME (sight rhyme, visual rhyme). Two or more words that seem to rhyme visually, in that their spelling is nearly identical (they begin differently but end alike), but in pronunciation do not. Example: rough/cough/through/though/plough. Eye rhymes must be discriminated with care, for, although their quantity is greater than is often thought, they are a relative rarity. Many words that are spelled similarly but do not now seem to rhyme in the aural sense did rhyme in earlier stages of the lang. or do or did so in other dialects than our own; none of these is a genuine eye rhyme.

Still, poets have always been conscious of the visual dimension of poetry (Hollander's "poem in the eye"). This consciousness extends from larger effects—e.g., conceiving of the poem as a purely visual entity, in forms of *visual poetry such as pattern poetry and *concrete poetry—to smaller—e.g., playing with the visual shapes of words, chiefly in eye rhyme. Though eye rhymes certainly exist in cl. and med. Lat., the invention of printing in the West intensified interest. Poets of the past two centuries particularly have seen the correspondence of visual forms as an important strategy for expanding the domains and resources of poetry beyond those of traditional prosody.

Strictly speaking, eye rhyme is not a rhyme at all. But genuine instances of eye rhyme address the relations of sound to spelling in lang. and poetry. E.g., spelling differences in aural rhyme are invisible, whereas spelling similarities in eye rhyme are opaque: they are the marked form. *Rhyme is by definition sound correspondence, but insofar as spelling is meant to denote sound, we must both ignore it and, when necessary, pay attention to it. Hence, accurate knowledge not only of historical phonology and dialectology but of the spelling conventions of the lang. (the idea of a "correct" spelling scarcely exists before the 19th c.) is key to understanding rhyme in both the aural and visual senses. Eye rhyme thus raises the very question of the aural and (or versus) the visual modes of poetry.

■ Schipper, History; H. C. Wyld, Studies in English Rhymes from Surrey to Pope (1923); Hollander; K. Hanson, "Vowel Variation in English Rhyme," Studies in the History of the English Language, ed. D. Minkova and R. Stockwell (2002).

T.V.F. BROGAN; S. S. BILL

F

FABLE. A brief verse or prose narrative or description, whose characters may be animals ("The Cicada and the Ant") or inanimate objects ("The Iron Pot and the Clay Pot") acting like humans; or, less frequently, personified abstractions ("Love and Madness") or human types, whether literal ("The Old Man and the Three Young Men") or metaphorical ("The Danube Peasant"). The narrative or description may be preceded, followed, or interrupted by a separate, relatively abstract statement of the fable's theme or thesis.

I. History. Despite suggestions that the Panchatantra (transcribed ca. 3rd c. BCE) is the fountainhead of the Eur. fable, the genre probably arose spontaneously in Greece with Hesiod's poem of the hawk and the nightingale (8th c. BCE), followed by Archilochus's fragments on the fox and the eagle (7th c. BCE). The first collection of Gr. fables is attributed to Aesop (6th c. BCE) and is known to us through Maximus Planudes' 14th-c. ed. of a prose text transcribed by Demetrius of Phalerum (4th c. BCE). Phaedrus and Babrius were the first to cast the fable into verse, and their works attained such popularity that fables became part of school exercises.

Phaedrus (1st c. CE), the first fabulist we may reckon a poet, imitated Aesop in Lat. iambic senarii (see SENARIUS) but also invented many new fables, recounted contemp. anecdotes, and introduced political allusions. Babrius, writing in Gr. (2nd c. CE), went further by inventing racy epithets and picturesque expressions while enlarging the formula of the genre in the direction of *satire and the *bucolic; his Muthiamboi Aisopeioi, originally in ten books, is in choliambics (see CHOLIAMBUS), the meter of the lampoon. A famous collection by Nicostratus, also of the 2nd c., is now lost. Avianus (4th c. CE) paraphrased and expanded Babrian models, which he enriched with Virgilian and Ovidian phraseology for *mock-heroic effect. Romulus, a 10th-c. prose trans. of Phaedrus and Babrius, was later versified and enjoyed celebrity into the 17th c. But the best med. fabulist was Marie de France, who composed 102 octosyllabic fables (ca. 1200) combining Gr. and Lat. themes with insight into feudal society, fresh observation of man and nature, and Gallic irony. The Ysopets (13th and 14th c.) were Fr. verse trans. of older Lat. fables.

The Eur. *beast epic, in particular the Roman de Renart, owes much to many fables as told in antiquity and in their med. Lat. forms (notably Babrius and Avianus) and to Marie. It, in turn, influenced many fables, esp. those in the Ysopets and in Robert Henryson's late 15th-c. Moral Fabillis of Esope—an innovative version in lowland Scots Eng. Beast epic differs from fable not only in magnitude and in its exclusively animal cast of characters but also in its single, mock-heroic modality. *Bestiary differs from fable in its emphasis on the symbolic and allegorical meanings of the features or traits attributed to its subjects, animals both legendary and real.

The Fables choisies et mises en vers of Jean de La Fontaine (1621–95) are both summative and innovative. In the first two collections (1668), the Fr. poet adapted subjects and techniques from trans. of Phaedrus, Babrius, and Avianus, incl. Gilles Corrozet's Fables du très ancien Esope Phrygien (1542), which anticipated La Fontaine's use, in the same poem, of vers mêlés. The second collection and subsequent additions (1678–79; 1693) contained materials from Indic sources, incl. Le Livre des Lumières, a 1644 trans. of fables based on an 8th-c. Ar. version of the Panchatantra. Two features distinguish La Fontaine's Fables from their forerunners: first, they make thematically significant use of *pastiche and *parody across a wide spectrum of modes and genres; and second, they are systematically philosophical, setting forth, extending, and revising an Epicureanism derived from Lucretius and Pierre Gassendi.

La Fontaine was widely imitated during the 17th and 18th cs.: in France, by Eustache le Noble (1643–1711) and J.-P.-C. de Florian (1755–94); in England, by John Gay (1685–1732); in Spain, by Tomás de Iriarte (1750–91); and in Germany, by C. F. Gellert (1715–69). G. E. Lessing (1729–81) modeled his fables on Aesop.

In the first two decades of the 19th c., the Rus. Ivan Adreyevich Krylov (1768–1844) won wide acclaim for his trans. of La Fontaine and his original fables, still read for their satire and realism of matter and lang. The verse fable trad. was carried on in America by Joel Chandler Harris, who drew on Af. Am. trads. in his Uncle Remus collections (1881–1906).

II. Types. All fables are didactic in purpose but may be subdivided by technique into three categories: the assertional, the dialectical, and the problematic. Assertional fables plainly and directly expound simple ideas through a harmonious union of precept and example. The Aesopic trad.—ancient and mod.—is in the main assertional. Certain versions of the Panchatantra and other Indian collections are dialectical. They present assertional fables in a sequence where each is clarified, nuanced, or even corrected by those that follow. Problematic fables feature moral dilemmas or enigmatic presentation. Among the devices used to "problematize" a fable are omission of the thesis statement, unreliable or playful narration, subtle allusion to other literary works, verbal ambiguity, abstruse metaphors, and symbolism. Many fables by La Fontaine, Ambrose Bierce, and James Thurber are problematic because of one or more of these devices.

See FABLIAU, NARRATIVE POETRY.

■ L. Hervieux, Les Fabulistes latins depuis le siècle d'Auguste jusqu'à la fin du moyen-âge, 2d ed., 5 v. (1893–99); A. Hausrath, "Fabel," Pauly-Wissowa 6.1704–36; Krylov's Fables, trans. B. Pares (1921); F. Edgerton, The "Panchatantra" Reconstructed (1924); M. Staege, Die Geschichte der deutschen Fabeltheorie (1929); "Avianus—Fabulae," Minor Latin Poets, trans. and ed. J. W. Duff and A. M. Duff (1934); Marie de France, Fables, ed. A. Ewert and R. C. Johnston (1942); C. Filosa, La favola e la letteratura esopiana in Italia . . . (1952); Fables of Aesop, trans. S. A. Handford (1954); M. Guiton, La Fontaine: Poet and Counter-Poet (1961); M. Noejgaard, La Fable antique, 2 v. (1964–67); Babrius and Phaedrus, trans. B. E. Perry (1965)—invaluable intro. and appendices; H. de Boor, Fabel und Bîspel (1966); T. Noel, Theories of the Fable in the 18th Century (1975); H. J. Blackham, The Fable as Literature (1985); P. Carnes, Fable Scholarship (1985); R. Danner, Patterns of Irony in La Fontaine's Fables (1985); La Fontaine: Fables, ed. M. Fumaroli (1985)—excellent intros., bibl., commentary; G. Dicke and K. Grubmüller, Die Fabeln des Mittelalters und der frühen Neuzeit, ein Katalog der deutschen Versionen und ihrer lateinischen Entsprechungen (1987); M.-O. Sweetser, La Fontaine (1987)—commentaries and bibl.; C. D. Reverand, Dryden's Final Poetic Mode: The Fables (1988); P. Dandrey, La Fabrique des Fables (1991); A. Patterson, Fables of Power (1991); D. L. Rubin, A Pact with Silence (1991); J. Brody, Lectures de La Fontaine (1995); A. L. Birberick, Reading under Cover (1998); R. P. Runyon, In La Fontaine's Labyrinth (2000); The Complete Fables of Jean de La Fontaine, trans. N. Shapiro (2007).

D. L. Rubin; A. L. Sells

FABLIAU. A comic tale in verse that flourished in the 12th and 13th cs., principally in the north of France. While the name, which means "little fable" in the Picard dialect, suggests a short story, some fabliaux run over a thousand lines. Most are short, however, and share an unabashedly bawdy humor, focusing mainly on the body and its functions. From sexual excitation to excretory humiliation to gastronomic satisfaction, fabliaux focus on the materiality of everyday embodiment. Although cartoonish violence separates the fabliau from *realism, the attention to food, sex, and feces presents an unadorned view of bodily experience. Nearly all of the approximately 150 tales that can be called fabliaux were written in octosyllabic couplets, and although a few names, such as Rutebeuf, Philippe de Beaumanoir, Jean Bodel, and Gautier le Leu, have been associated with the fabliau, most examples remain anonymous.

Much debate surrounds the criteria for defining the genre itself, incl. audience and purpose of the fabliau. First proposed in 1883, Bédier's argument for the genre's bourgeois origins remained unquestioned until Nykrog's analysis, which pointed to the predominance of noble and lyrical sentiments in the fabliaux as proof of their courtly aims. Mod. scholars tend to favor the view that authors as well as audiences were not limited to any one social class, which means that fabliaux are not united by a single thematic purpose. Despite acknowledging greater thematic diversity, Noomen and Boogaard posit a more limited stylistic range for the fabliau (they accept only 127 tales, as opposed to Nykrog's 160).

More recent crit. has focused on the fabliau's challenge to systems of bodily order, incl. gender, status, and religion. Though many tales are antifeminist in their association of women with voracious sexual desire, the same narratives illustrate female ingenuity and superiority, often over foolish or arrogant husbands. If there is a prevailing theme in the plots of the fabliaux, it is that of "the trickster tricked." Besides gender, hierarchies of social status and religious authority are frequently subject to upheaval. Priests are humiliated, merchants are bilked, and husbands are fooled. Yet this emphasis on instability extends even further: scholarship of late has investigated the impact of fabliaux on the med. written lang., with some critics arguing that the vulgar lang. of the genre called for a new literary vocabulary. Other scholars have examined narrative presence in the poems, which is often marked by idiosyncratic asides suggesting an improvised oral performance. Since many of the tale's tellers are identified with the shiftless, scheming characters of the tales, poetic production is also associated with bodily disorder, primarily through the tales' impetus to laughter.

In the 14th c., the vogue of the fabliau spread to Italy and England, where Chaucer borrowed freely from the genre for several of his Canterbury Tales, most notably "The Miller's Tale" and "The Reeve's Tale." Fabliau trad. continued in the prose nouvelle, but the influence of the older form may be seen centuries later in the poetry of Jean de La Fontaine in France, C. F. Gellert in Germany, and I. A. Krylov in Russia.

See FABLE.

■ W. M. Hart, "The Fabliau and Popular Literature," PMLA 23 (1908), and "The Narrative Art of the Old French Fabliau," Kittredge Anniversary Papers (1913); J. Bédier, Les Fabliaux, 5th ed. (1925); J. Rychner, Contribution à l'étude des fabliaux, 2 v. (1960); The Literary Context of Chaucer's Fabliaux, ed. L. D. Benson and T. M. Andersson (1971); P. Dronke, "The Rise of the Medieval Fabliau," Romanische Forschungen 85 (1973); P. Nykrog, Les Fabliaux, rpt. with a "Post-scriptum 1973" (1973); Gallic Salt, trans. R. L. Harrison (1974); The Humor of the Fabliaux, ed. T. D. Cooke and B. L. Honeycutt (1974); T. Cooke, The Old French and Chaucerian Fabliaux (1978); Cuckolds, Clerics, and Countrymen, trans. J. Duval (1982); R. E. Lewis, "The English Fabliau Tradition and Chaucer's 'Miller's Tale,'" MP 79 (1982); P. Ménard, Les Fabliaux (1983); Nouveau recueil complet des fabliaux, ed. W. Noomen and N. van den Boogaard, 10 v. (1983–); R. H. Bloch, The Scandal of the Fabliaux (1986); C. Muscatine, The Old French Fabliaux (1986); J. Hines, The Fabliau in English (1993); L. Rossi, Fabliaux Érotiques (1993); S. Gaunt, Gender and Genre in Medieval French Literature (1995); N. J. Lacy, Reading Fabliaux (1999); B. J. Levy, The Comic Text (2000); J. A. Dane, "The Wife of Bath's Shipman's Tale and the Invention of Chaucerian Fabliaux," MLR 99 (2004); H. A. Crocker, Comic Provocations (2006).

A. Preminger; R. L. Harrison; H. Crocker

FANCY. The short form, common since the Ren., of fantasy (Lat. phantasia, transliterated from Gr. phanos, "image," and later replaced by imaginatio). In Western poetics, the hist., definition, and use of fancy in crit. and psychology are inseparably linked to that of *imagination, the two terms being sometimes distinguished but more often used similarly if not identically. Phantasia originally carried suggestions of creativity and free play of mind, a power generating images and combinations of images not previously found in nature or sense experience. Albertus Magnus uses the term this way, with imaginatio reserved for the static mental recording of perceived images. However, even in the Middle Ages, distinctions or inversions of the two terms occur. Thomas Aquinas uses them synonymously; in a later (failed) attempt to fix them, Joseph Addison does, too: usage did not stabilize in Eng. until the later 18th c. In Ger., a variety of terms (Phantasie, Einbildungskraft, Dichtungskraft, Perceptionsvermügen) are employed throughout the 18th and 19th cs. without consistency. In Italy, fantasia generally retains its "higher" stature as a creative and altering power, while immaginazione pertains more to a form of memory, the retention and reproduction of sense impressions. However, even here there is no rule; Giambattista Vico uses fantasia for both recollective and original productive functions.

In the period 1660–1820, Eur. crit. self-consciously turns to the issue of discriminating fancy from imagination. In England, despite early confusion, something of a norm is reached by the 1780s and 1790s. Thomas Hobbes employed fancy for the greatest creative range of mind, but John Dryden at least once subordinates fancy to imagination. Anticipating later devels., Dryden makes fancy responsible only for manipulation, rearrangement, and juxtaposition of images already created or experienced; in poetic composition, fancy is the power that distributes and arranges images already invented. Imagination encompasses both powers, as well as their formulation in words and figures of speech. Addison claims no difference between fancy and imagination but in practice tends to elevate imagination to a higher creative plane. As early as Lord Shaftesbury's Characteristics (1711), imagination is the stronger term, while fancy suggests "mental abandon," which Shaftesbury exemplifies by the same passage from Thomas Otway's Venice Preserved that S. T. Coleridge later quotes in the Biographia Literaria to illustrate fancy: "Lutes, lobsters, seas of milk, ships of amber."

In poetry, the elevation of the term imagination at the expense of fancy occurs a little later; until the romantic period, fancy is generally used in poetic diction. John Keats uses imagination heavily in his letters and in the late Fall of Hyperion; elsewhere, fancy may be a fickle power of pleasure ("Fancy"), a power of endlessly novel and procreative embellishment ("Ode to Psyche"), or potentially synonymous with imagination ("Ode to a Nightingale"). It is significant that William Wordsworth consciously chooses imagination as the key term in The Prelude; unlike Coleridge, he generally views fancy and imagination as differing in degree, not kind.

For Coleridge, fancy "has no other counters to play with, but fixities and definites. The Fancy is indeed no other than a mode of Memory emancipated from the order of time and space; and blended with, and modified by that empirical phenomenon of the will, which we express by the word choice. But equally with the ordinary memory it must receive all its materials ready made from the law of association" (Biographia Literaria, chap. 13). His definition has become a touchstone in part because it captures the essence of a set of emergent Eng. and Ger. distinctions. Fancy operates without a unifying design and does not meld, transform, or newly create images or ideas. Rather, it juxtaposes or connects them in a more mechanical fashion, appealing to novelty of sense impression instead of strength or grandeur of intellectual conception and power. Often described as "aimless" or "sportive," fancy suggests a phantasmagoria of passing, fixed images, whose mingling does not mutually transform or resolve or unify them into larger patterns. John Ruskin continues to distinguish the two terms in Modern Painters.

In Germany, Christian Wolff, Immanuel Kant, Jean-Paul, Friedrich Schelling, G.W.F. Hegel, Friedrich Schiller, J. G. Fichte, I. G. Fichte, J. N. Tetens, and J. W. Goethe all make distinctions between fancy and imagination, some elaborate, others casual. Schelling and at times Kant parallel the Eng. elevation of imagination (Einbildungskraft), while others, such as Jean-Paul, echo the It. supremacy of fancy (Phantasie) as the highest creative power. Benedetto Croce in the earlier 20th c. retains the It. primacy of fantasia, the equivalent of the Eng. imagination, while immaginazione corresponds roughly to fancy as Coleridge defines it. Aside from studies grounded in historical uses of the term, fancy has become increasingly rare as a serious concept in poetics and crit.

■ See bibliography for IMAGINATION.

J. Engell

FATRAS (also called fatrasie, fratrasie, resverie). An irrational and deliberately obscure piece of verse that, originating in the Middle Ages, constituted a mode of licensed regression into unreason, absurdity, and nonsense in which pleasure is taken in the creative and willful defiance of sense that the verse form celebrates. It is generally lively and joyous in style, full of word play, ridiculous associations of ideas, and deliberate nonsense. Charles-Victor Langlois defines two forms: the fatras possible, which offers a coherent text, and the fatras impossible, which, like the later coq-á-l'âne*, seems to make no sense at all. Qua genre, however, it is not the incoherence of content that constitutes the fatras but its special form: a *strophe of 11 lines, the first and last of which form a *distich placed at the beginning as the theme of the composition. This is known as the fatras simple. The fatras double is formed from this by "restating the initial [distich] in reverse order, and adding a second strophe of ten lines ending with an 11th, a restatement of line one of the [distich]" (Porter). Porter distinguishes between the fratrasie and the fatras, a later devel. The former is invariably composed of a single strophe of 11 lines, and its content is always irrational; in the fatras, the opening distich introduces the next 11 lines, serving as their first and last line and imparting a uniform rhythm to the whole poem.

See ADYNATON, FROTTOLA AND BARZELLETTA, NONSENSE VERSE.

■ C.-V. Langlois, "Watriquet, ménestrel et poète français," Histoire littéraire de la France, t. 35 (1921), 393–421 ; A.-M. Schmidt, "La Trésor des Fatras," Les Cahiers de la Pléiade 11–12 (1950–51); P. Zumthor, Histoire littéraire de la France médiévale (1954); L. C. Porter, La Fatrasie et le Fatras (1960); P. Zumthor, "Fatrasie et coq-à-l'âne," Fin du Moyen Âge et Renaissance (1961); E. G. Hessing and R. Viglbrief, "Essai d'analyse des procédés fatrasiques," Romania 94 (1963); Fatrasies, ed. J. P. Foucher (1964); W. Kellermann, "Über die altfranzösischen Gedichte des uneingeschränkten Unsinns," Archiv 205 (1968); Poésie et rhétorique du non-sens. Littérature médiévale, littérature orale, ed. S. Mougin and M. G. Grossel (2004).

I. SILVER; T.V.F. BROGAN; I. D. COPESTAKE

FEIGNING (also feynynge, faining, fayning; Lat. fingere, "to form" or "to make," "to mold" or "to sculpt" dough or clay; Gr. poiēsis). The verb feign derives from the same Lat. root as fiction, its nominal counterpart, to which it was closely related in the Ren. imagination. In Ren. Eng. poetry and poetic treatises, feigning denotes imaginative lit. (verse or prose) and its composition, and to feign means the act or art of fiction-making. Feigning also signified pretense or deception and, thus, supported moral arguments against poetry as falsehood. Both meanings of feigning are grounded in antiquity, notably Plato's indictment in the Republic of poetry as lies, opposed to philosophy's claims to truth. Artifice and dissembling were integral to Ren. court life; therefore, the semblance of *sincerity in the 16th-c. poet Thomas Wyatt's "hert unfayned" carried political as well as poetic import.

Chaucer represented the medieval distinction between feigning or fabling and truthful chronicle in The House of Fame (written ca. 1379–80), where Dares Phrygius, a Trojan mentioned in Homer's Iliad who supposedly wrote an eyewitness account of the war, criticizes Homer's epics as "feynynge" and "lyes." Common in Ren. poetics was the "apology," or defense of poetry's moral value, which sought to distinguish poetry from associations of *medieval romance. Arguing for the moral value of *dramatic and *epic poetry in the Defence of Poesy (written ca. 1580, pub. 1595), Philip Sidney positively values feigning as imaginative lit. in contradistinction to counterfeiting. For Sidney, the principles that poetry teaches extend into the public domain, where the exemplary knowledge that poetry promotes—surpassing that of hist. or philosophy—translates into virtuous action. Thus, Sidney's political imagination is structured by principles of poetic *imagination. Similarly, George Puttenham in The Art of English Poesie (written ca. 1579, pub. 1589) commends the poet's ability "to faine a thing that never was nor is like to be," where feigning denotes the superior products of *"wit" and *"invention" that allow a poet to describe things he never witnessed. *Pastoral poetry, notably Edmund Spenser's The Shepheardes Calender (1579), presents a fiction conscious of itself as such. Its numerous marginal glosses and the invented narrator, E. K., foreground questions of authority and authenticity that preoccupied *Renaissance poetics.

The several poetic connotations of feigning—faithful imitation, imaginative invention, and falsehood—demonstrate tensions in the historical debate over poetry's moral value. Moreover, in Ren. Eng., the variable spelling of feign (often as fain) and the homonymy of feign and fain (the latter as adjective or adverb meaning "glad" or "gladly, willingly") occasion considerable wordplay suggesting poetry's effects on the will (see Shakespeare's As You Like It, 3.3, and the first *sonnet of Sidney's Astrophil and Stella). Faining or feigning often connoted poetry's power of enchantment, appearing ambiguously in A Midsummer Night's Dream in an accusation against a designing lover who speaks "with faining voice verses of faining love" (1.1.31), inviting interplay between meanings of falsehood and seduction.

The primary meaning of feigning changed from the 17th c., when Ben Jonson glossed the poet's craft as "an art of imitation, or faining," demonstrating feigning as synonymous with poetic composition that produces "things like truths" but more valuable for their fabrication. John Dryden describes dramatic poetry as "feigned action," and John Milton treats feigned and fabled as literary synonyms. Samuel Johnson defines feigning in the Dictionary (1755) as both falsehood and fictionality: "to relate falsely; to image from the invention," although his primary definition cites Jonson on poetic invention. By the 19th c., feigning primarily referred to false conduct or forgery. The moral value of poetry became detached from the question of poetic value, and concerns about feigning were voiced primarily in discourses of public law and private self. Along with invention, feigning lost poetic meaning by the early 19th c.: revised eds. of the Dictionary omit poetic meaning in the definition for feigning but still include feigning in the definition of fable*.

Levao theorizes the importance of feigning in the vocabulary and intellectual consciousness of Ren. England. Levao identifies the "joint development[s] of historical consciousness, new-world exploration, astronomical speculation, and skeptical thought" as key factors in a culture of instability preoccupied "with the nature of poetic fictions," ultimately shaping a "vision of culture . . . not as structured by eternal categories, but as a distinctly human artifact." Since the Ren., critical intervention has reframed fiction and reality not as independent categories but as interactive modes producing the "imagined" text (Iser). Twentieth-c. studies of feigning often sought to deconstruct binary conceptions of *philosophy and poetry (Norris).

See ARTIFACT, POETRY AS; FICTION, POETRY AS; MIMESIS.

■ A. H. Shutz, "Did the Poets 'Feign' or 'Fashion'? Symposium 11 (1957); W. Nelson, Fact or Fiction (1973); C. Norris, "'That the Truest Philosophy is the Most Feigning': Austin on the Margins of Literature," Renaissance and Modern Studies 27 (1983); W. Iser, "Feigning in Fiction," Identity of the Literary Text, ed. M. J. Valdés and O. Miller (1985); R. Levao, Renaissance Minds and Their Fictions (1985); C. R. Kinney, "Feigning Female Faining: Spenser, Lodge, Shakespeare, and Rosalind," MP 95 (1998); R. E. Stillman, Philip Sidney and the Poetics of Renaissance Cosmopolitanism (2008).

R. LEWIS

FÉLIBRIGE. A Fr. literary assoc. founded in 1854 by seven Occitan poets who called themselves félibres, perhaps meaning "nurslings," as their leader Frédéric Mistral explained, because they intended to nurse at the bosom of wisdom. Through the annual publication of the Armana prouvençau (Provençal Almanac) and later L'Aiòli, they strove to reform Occitan spelling, to renew the lang., to compose great poetry, and to revive Occitan culture. Although they described their movement as a renaissance, they did not seek to revive poetry in the manner of the med. *troubadours. Joseph Roumanille organized the movement, which triumphed with the publication in 1859 of Mistral's romantic epic Mirèio (Mireille), and again in 1860 with Théodore Aubanel's collection of love poems, La Mióugrano entre-duberto (The Split Pomegranate). Originally limited to Provence in the narrow sense (east of the Rhône), Félibrige was reorganized in 1876 to include all the Occitan dialects and regions from the Atlantic to the Alps. In 1904, Mistral shared the Nobel Prize for poetry and philology. Perhaps the most lasting achievement of Félibrige was the impetus it gave to regional lit. in France, an impetus that continues into the 21st c.

See OCCITAN POETRY.

■ L'Anthologie du félibrige, ed. A. Praviel and J.-R. de Brousse (1909); E. Ripert, Le Félibrige, 3d ed. (1948); C. Camproux, Histoire de la littérature occitane (1953); Morceaux choisis des auteurs provençaux de la fondation du félibrige à nos jours, ed. L. Bayle, 2 v. (1969–71); R. Lafont and C. Anatole, Nouvelle Histoire de la littérature occitane, 2 v. (1970); T. R. Hart, "La Reneissènço Felibrenco," Journal of European Studies 25 (1995).

W. D. PADEN

FEMINIST APPROACHES TO POETRY

I. Early 20th-century Poetry and First-wave Feminism
II. Mid-20th-century Poetry and Second-wave Feminism
III. Late 20th- and Early 21st-century Poetry and Third-wave Feminism

Feminism has never been monolithic. Worldwide, feminism is articulated differently in different times and places and emphasizes those aspects of gender and sexual inequality characteristic of its local or national contexts. Even within a single time and location, feminists of different classes, races, sexualities, and religions have proposed conflicting analyses of patriarchal dynamics and institutions. Self-consciously articulated feminism—i.e., an analytical perspective that understands gender-based discrimination as systemic and as pervasive in private and public life—first became significant to a wide range of poets and to poetic analysis at the turn of the 20th c. in Europe and North America. Much pre-20th-c. poetry celebrates aspects of female intelligence and agency or protests misogynistic and patriarchal practices; poets such as Christine de Pizan (1365–ca. 1434) and Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806–61) also protested gender-based oppression. These antecedents were crucial to the development of both feminism and deliberately feminist poetics. This entry focuses on the intersections of feminist critical thought with the writing and reception of poetry, particularly in the U.S. and Europe, in rough alignment with what have been identified as the three major waves of Western feminism.

I. Early 20th-century Poetry and First-wave Feminism. *Modernism is notable as the first literary and artistic movement in which women played major roles internationally, not just by their writing but in developing its foundational ideas—incl. feminism—and in shaping literary production through editing and publishing. While feminist poetry was not always formally innovative, feminist approaches to poetry at the beginning of the century were strongly associated with experimental modernism. This period coined the words homosexuality (first used in Eng. in 1883) and feminism (perhaps as early as 1837 in France, 1894 in Britain, and 1910 in the U.S.). By the early 20th c., women's movements were rejecting the essentialized definitions of gender that had dominated 18th- and 19th-c. thought, advocating for social change and asserting women's equality with men across a wide spectrum of intellectual and creative fields. The goal was often to degender both women and men rather than to redraw the lines of gender distinction. Early Ger. and Rus. feminisms were more socialist in their understanding of labor and more influenced by notions of essential difference than Brit. or Am. feminisms, but all claimed membership in a "human sex" and demanded greater economic, legal, and social rights for women.

Theorizing women's writing in A Room of One's Own (1929), Virginia Woolf (1882–1941) proposes that "a woman must have money and a room of her own if she is to write fiction"; for women to write poetry, however, requires in addition the "habit of freedom and the courage to write exactly what we think." Woolf sees women's writing of poetry as particularly difficult because she assumes that poetry is the most prestigious literary genre, the genre most closely associated with the category of "*genius," defined as exclusively masculine, and the one demanding the strongest affirmation of the writer's self, given the assoc. of lyric with a speaking voice. Yet by 1929, significant numbers of women were writing explicitly feminist poetry.

As Woolf anticipated, women were most active as poets in countries where they enjoyed access to higher education and extensive economic and legal rights and in langs. where there was a long trad. of women writing poetry. At the turn of the 20th c., the countries most supportive of women's active involvement in literary movements were Russia, Germany, England, and the U.S. Female poets in the Rus. avant-garde who wrote from a feminist perspective about gender and women's lives included Anna Akhmatova (1889–1966), Zinaida Gippius (1869–1945), and Marina Tsvetaeva (1892–1941). This surge of gender-oriented poetry was relatively short lived. Following Josef Stalin's rise to power, Tsvetaeva and Gippius left Russia; Akhmatova remained, but publication of her work was banned from 1925 until shortly before her death (see RUSSIA, POETRY OF). In Germany, the "question" or figure of "woman" was fiercely debated in literary circles at the turn of the century, both because of the philosophical trad. of an idealized "eternal feminine" seen as most significantly manifest in creative men and because of Germany's powerful women's movements. The most significant feminist poet of these decades was Else Lasker-Schüler (1869–1945), whose poetry questioned categories of religion, sexuality, gender, and race. Surprisingly, although France was hospitable to lesbian and feminist expatriate writers, its own literary scene was inhospitable to feminism and strongly dominated by men; there were no prominent Fr. female poets in the first half of the 20th c. In Central and South America, Fr. symbolism influenced modernismo; its poets who explicitly challenged the social treatment of women and patriarchal domination include Delmira Agustini (Uruguay, 1886–1914), Dulce María Loynaz (Cuba, 1902–1997), and Gabriela Mistral (Chile, 1889–1957). Because It. *futurism defined itself in part around the celebration of masculinity and excoriation of femininity, women and feminism played a minor role in this movement. In Portugal, Irene Lisboa (1892–1958) and Judith Teixeira (1880–1959) were among those who challenged masculinist stances in poetry and crit. during the modernist period.

With the exception of Mina Loy (who was born in London), writers born in the U.S. dominated the production of modernist Anglo-Am. feminist poetry. Gertrude Stein's publication of Tender Buttons and Loy's first publication of poems in 1914, along with Loy's composition of a (posthumously pub.) "Feminist Manifesto" in the same year, usher self-consciously feminist analysis into Eng.-lang. poetry. Both Stein (1874–1946) and Loy (1882–1966) understand patriarchal psychological, economic, and sexual practices as impinging directly on women's creativity, as Stein articulates in her 1927 composition "Patriarchal Poetry." During the 1910s, H.D. (Hilda Doolittle, 1886–1961), Amy Lowell (1874–1925), Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892–1950), and Marianne Moore (1887–1972) were also publishing poetry that challenged traditional gender conventions, demanded or predicted greater rights for women, protested patriarchal oppression, and asserted women's empowerment in ways for the most part implicit or understated, following the modernist preference for conveying ideas in poetry without stating them directly. E.g., Stein's Tender Buttons describes food, rooms, and objects of domestic apparel or use in a series of cubist prose poems eschewing standard grammar and logic. Feminist readers have found these poems to celebrate the domestic and women's sexuality, through puns and *synecdoche involving suggestive words like petticoat, pink, and roast beef. In her poem "Marriage," Moore represents that "institution / perhaps one should say enterprise" as part of a patriarchal system in which "men have power and sometimes one is made to feel it" and as "requiring all one's criminal ingenuity / to avoid!" H.D. turns to Gr. and Egyptian mythologies to reenvision women's agency. Stein, H.D., and Moore all redefine aesthetics from a feminist perspective, understanding beauty as complex, "wind-tortured" (H.D.), embodied best in "thorns" rather than petals (Moore). The 1920s saw an increase in attention to sexuality, due in part to psychoanalytic conceptions of the sex drive and desire, accompanied by more frank and open avowal of desire in poetry by women. H.D. underwent analysis with Sigmund Freud, and some feminist critics regard Stein's sexual punning as influenced by Freud's theories of the unconscious. Lowell, H.D., and Stein wrote *lesbian poetry or fiction, although both Stein's and H.D.'s frankly lesbian work was published only much later.

Af. Am. women of the period articulated feminism within the context of a struggle for racial equality. Gwendolyn Bennett (1902–81) and Helene Johnson (1906–95) wrestled with the contradiction of embracing both the antibourgeois aesthetic of the new arts and affirming broad-based respect for middle-class black women, countering the prevalent "mammy" and "Jezebel" stereotypes. Female *blues singers Ida Cox (1896–1967), Ma Rainey (1886–1939), and Bessie Smith (1894?–1937) wrote and sang lyrics supporting black women's economic and psychological independence and celebrating female sexuality. Through experiment in figurative lang., poetic form, and topic, these and other poets mapped a feminist understanding of the links among economic, legal, and artistic systems of hierarchy and anticipated later theorizing of gender as both constructed and performed.

II. Mid-20th-century Poetry and Second-wave Feminism. With the gains in women's rights occurring in many countries following World War I, the international women's movement lost some of its impetus, and feminism as such waned in cultural force until the 1960s. During the 1930s, writers concerned with social justice were most apt to express those concerns in relation to Marxism or other socialist movements or in relation to racial and religious persecution. Muriel Rukeyser (1913–1980), who later turned to feminist themes, wrote poetry primarily about labor injustice. With World War II, women temporarily gained social and economic power as men were called into the military. This trend was sharply reversed in a postwar reaction that sent middle-class women back to domestic roles. The retreat from a bold vision of women's powers that began in the 1920s and that Betty Friedan (1921–2006) famously traces in magazine writing from the 1940s to the 1950s was evident in poetry as well; by mid-century, feminist perspectives were hardly visible. Gwendolyn Brooks (1917–2000) was exceptional for this period in publishing her Pulitzer Prize-winning Annie Allen (1949), with its "Anniad" rewriting the conventions of the masculinist epic. Puerto Rican Julia de Burgos (1914–53), too, continued writing feminist poetry from the 1930s to the 1950s—incl. her influential "Yo misma fui mi ruta" (I was my own path)—and Rosario Castellanos (Mexico, 1925–74) was advocating indigenous as well as women's rights by the late 1950s. The civil-rights and antiwar activism of the 1960s brought young women of the U.S. back into the public sphere and encouraged battles for social justice, incl. "women's liberation," in which feminist presses and jours., feminist poetry, and the feminist bookstores where it was sold played an important role.

The early career of Adrienne Rich (1929–2012) exemplifies the changes wrought by this second wave of feminism: having gained recognition from the male literary establishment in the 1950s, Rich struggled to perform as wife and mother of three while also producing as a poet. In the 1960s, she became involved in antiwar activism and the New Left, and her poetry began to reflect the feminist conviction that "the personal is the political" and to examine personal experience in terms of women's oppression within patriarchal society, albeit within the terms of humanism and a Jungian androgyny. For Rich, this new direction in her work required casting off the "asbestos gloves" of traditional formalism. By this time, she was directly representing her own life experiences, and by 1976 she identified publicly as a lesbian; by 1978, when she published The Dream of a Common Language, Rich was writing exclusively about and for women, offering forceful critiques of patriarchal society as she extended her influential self-debates about gender and sexuality.

In the early 1960s, new experimental movements had already proposed alternatives to the neatly contained aesthetics of late modernism and *New Criticism, but these New American poetries remained male-dominated. The gender-oriented perspectives of the women writing within these movements—Barbara Guest (1920–2006) in the *New York school, Diane di Prima (b. 1934) and Diane Wakoski (b. 1937) among the *Beat poets, Denise Levertov (1923–97) among the *Black Mountain writers, or slightly later, Sonia Sanchez (b. 1934) among the *Black Arts writers—often went unrecognized or were disparaged within the larger movements. The *confessional movement, in which Sylvia Plath (1932–63) and Anne Sexton (1928–74) were prominent, helped open a space for feminist writing that could address formerly taboo subjects and emotions. Those poets who were widely recognized as feminist in the 1970s typically wrote in a relatively accessible *free verse and offered bold first-person testimony to such female experiences as childbirth, menstruation, and female sexuality, along with celebrations of under-recognized female achievement in the past. Rather than seeing themselves as carrying on the work of first-wave women, their second-wave emphasis on gender difference limited their appreciation of earlier versions of feminism that focused on gender equality. Lucille Clifton (1936–2010), Nikki Giovanni (b. 1943), Judy Grahn (b. 1940), Carolyn Kizer (b. 1925), Irena Klepfisz (b. 1941), Alicia Ostriker (b. 1937), Marge Piercy (b. 1936), and Alice Walker (b. 1944) were among the many explicitly feminist poets of these decades. Such older poets as Elizabeth Bishop (1911–79) and Lorine Niedecker (1903–70) shared feminist concerns, even when they resisted that classification.

In the U.S. in the 1970s and early 1980s, some female poets who considered themselves feminists but were interested in experimental aesthetics rather than more straightforward personal statement found themselves marginalized in relation to both those recognized as feminist poets and the experimental Language group (see LANGUAGE POETRY). For, while the Language community was receptive to feminist thought and included such feminists as Rae Armantrout (b. 1947), Carla Harryman (b. 1952), and Lyn Hejinian (b. 1941), its major spokespersons were male, and its theorizing was not focused around gender. HOW(ever), a jour. founded in 1983 that looked to the achievements of experimental female modernists for models of feminist poetics, was a crucial outlet for such experimentalists as founding ed. Kathleen Fraser (b. 1937) and Rachel Blau DuPlessis (b. 1941). By this time, women of color, who had often felt their concerns ignored by both men of their own race and white women, were also disenchanted with the largely white middle-class feminist movement, which they saw as having overlooked its own racial and class privilege. Audre Lorde (1934–92) was among the most significant poets articulating the intersections of feminism and race, in both her poetry and nonfictional writing, incl. the influential 1984 essay collection Sister Outsider. As U.S. literary crit. moved toward "multiculturalism," white feminist writers attended more to the experience and perspectives of women of color, while poets of color with feminist commitments such as Paula Gunn Allen (1939–2008), June Jordan (1936–2002), and Gloria Anzaldúa (1942–2004) gained greater visibility.

In other places and poetic trads., feminism also lost prominence in the 1930s relative to other social justice concerns before returning to high visibility in the 1960s or later. In Germany, e.g., 1966 Nobel Prize-winning poet Nelly Sachs (1891–1970) focused her work more on personal stories of suffering (specifically of Jewish loss) than on feminist issues, as was typical of Ger. feminist poets until the 1970s. Ingeborg Bachmann (1926–73), who was among the most influential mid-century Ger.-lang. poets, turned to feminist analysis of human relationship only in the 1960s and in prose. Poets of later generations have been more likely to write from distinctly feminist perspectives throughout their careers, as Ursula Krechel (b. 1947) has done. In Britain, many feminist poets were also leftist activists or influenced by Marxism. By the 1970s, female poets such as Alison Fell (b. 1944), Michele Roberts (b. 1944), Michelene Wandor (b. 1940), and Carol

Ann Duffy (b. 1955), Britain's first openly gay *poet laureate, were publishing in identifiably feminist contexts. Black Brit. poets such as Grace Nichols (b. 1950 in Guyana) and Jackie Kay (Scotch-Nigerian, b. 1961) combine feminist concerns with issues of immigration, diaspora, postcolonialism, and race. Similarly, feminist poets in Wales (e.g., Gillian Clark, b. 1937), Scotland (Liz Lochhead, b. 1947), and Ireland (Eavan Boland, b. 1944) reconsider national identity and hist. in terms of gender. In Britain, as in the U.S., feminism was associated with a transparent and personal mode of writing for several decades, generating a tension between the experimental aesthetic of writers such as Wendy Mulford (b. 1941) and Denise Riley (b. 1948) or, later, Maggie O'Sullivan (b. 1951) or Caroline Bergvall (b. 1962) and the dominant, plain-spoken, consciousness-raising aesthetic. Canadian feminist poets, whether more formally conventional such as Margaret Atwood (b. 1939), Joy Kogawa (b. 1935), and Dionne Brand (b. 1953 in Trinidad), or more formally innovative such as Daphne Marlatt (b. 1942 in Australia) or M. NourbeSe Philip (b. 1947 in Tobago), have tended to receive more acknowledgment, particularly in academic contexts, than their Brit. counterparts.

III. Late 20th- and Early 21st-century Poetry and Third-wave Feminism. In the 1980s, the rise of poststructuralism and particularly the devel. of poststructuralist Fr. feminism by Luce Irigaray (b. 1932), Hélène Cixous (b. 1937), Julia Kristeva (b. 1941), Monique Wittig (1935–2003), and others profoundly shifted the directions of feminist thinking and writing throughout Europe and North America. This kind of theory, formulated partly in response to Freudian thinking about sexual devel. and identity and to Jacques Lacan's revisions of Freud, turned away from attempts to define "woman," emphasizing instead the role of lang. in the construction of subjectivity, itself something always in process, and exploring the relation between sexuality and lang. Irigaray theorizes a disruptive, nonlinear feminine form of writing (écriture feminine) from the female body that would challenge existing ling. structures, which were seen as phallocentric. Kristeva opposes the semiotic—a bodily drive within signification that is associated with the pre-Oedipal—to the symbolic and explicitly links the semiotic to the poetic. While some more experimental poets attempted to write the body and to inscribe the "polymorphous perversity" or "jouissance" thought to characterize female sexuality or, as Fr. poet Anne-Marie Albiach (b. 1937) does, to use typographical space to explore the position of the body, others who were less formally experimental explored the pre-Oedipal bond between mother and daughter. As varied in form as in its understandings of feminism, feminist poetry in the U.S. in the 1980s encompasses approaches to free verse as different as those of Alice Fulton (b. 1952) and Olga Broumas (b. 1949 in Greece), strict formalism like that of Marilyn Hacker (b. 1942), and multigeneric innovations such as those of Theresa Hak Kyung Cha (1951–82) or Susan Howe (b. 1937).

By the mid-1990s when young feminists—assertive, globally conscious, often more individualistic than collective in their orientation—began labeling themselves the "third wave," both feminist theory and feminist poetics had diversified. Poetry written to identify or celebrate distinctively female experience and to honor the courage of individuals suffering patriarchal persecution or oppression has continued to thrive. Additionally, as the influence of Language writing and its radically experimental analogues has spread, feminist experimentalism and the idea that profound ling. change may be a necessary foundation for social change have gained wider credence. Feminist theory increasingly informs or complements other critical discourses, particularly those concerned with marginality or oppression in an increasingly international context. Thus, postcolonial studies has heightened awareness of international feminist writing, such as that by Jamaican-born Louise Bennett (1919–2006) and Lorna Goodison (b. 1947), Indian Kamala Das (b. 1934), Afro-Cuban Nancy Morejón (b. 1944), and Bangladeshi Taslima Nasrin (b. 1962). This attention has increased awareness of many poets' marginalization by empire as well as gender and their consequently vexed poetic relations to the Eur. langs. that dominate international publication. As the field of queer studies has become more established, gender studies have often subsumed feminist studies as the academic field examining work that explores feminist concerns; e.g., Judith Butler has influentially theorized gender as a performed behavior, understanding lang. use as an aspect of this performance. Another subset of feminist theory has turned away from a lang.-based psychoanalytic focus and other stances obviously conducive to text-based analysis toward the economic and global concerns of transnational feminism. While there is no longer a widely recognized community of self-identified feminist writers or a predominant focus or style associated with openly feminist poetry in most Western nations, a vast number of writers throughout the globe, male and female, continue to register feminism's international transformation of understandings of identity, relationships, institutions, hist., and power in their poetry.

See GENDER AND POETRY, POLITICS AND POETRY.

■ One Foot on the Mountain, ed. L. Mohin (1979)—Brit. feminist poetry, 1969–79; Shakespeare's Sisters, ed. S. Gilbert and S. Gubar (1979); M. Homans, Women Writers and Poetic Identity (1980); A. Rich, On Lies, Secrets, and Silence (1980); This Bridge Called My Back, ed. C. Moraga and G. Anzaldúa (1981)—radical women of color; L. Bernikow, The World Split Open (1984); A. S. Ostriker, Thieves of Language (1986); A. Rich, Blood, Bread, and Poetry (1986); Making Waves, ed. Asian Women United of California (1989); R. B. DuPlessis, The Pink Guitar: Writing as Feminist Practice (1990); J. Butler, Gender Trouble (1990); P. G. Allen, The Sacred Hoop (1992)—Am. Indian trads.; No More Masks!, ed. F. Howe, rev. ed. (1993); Feminist Measures, ed. L. Keller and C. Miller (1994); C. Hogue, Scheming Women (1995); E. Boland, Object Lessons (1996); M. O'Sullivan, Out of Everywhere (1996); K. Whitehead, The Feminist Poetry Movement (1996); T. Threadgold, Feminist Poetics (1997); S. F. Friedman, Mappings

(1998)—feminism and cultural geography; Women Poets of the Americas, ed. J. V. Brogan and C. C. Candelaria (1999); A. Vickery, Leaving Lines of Gender (2000); L. Hinton and C. Hogue, We Who Love to Be Astonished (2001)—experimental writing and performance poetics; American Women Poets in the 21st Century, ed. C. Rankine and J. Spahr (2002); J. Dowson, Women, Modernism, and British Poetry 1910–1939 (2002); L. Kinnahan, Lyric Interventions (2004—Br. and Am. experimentalism); J. Dowson and A. Entwistle, A History of Twentieth-Century British Women's Poetry (2005); K. Fraser, Translating the Unspeakable (2005); E. Frost, The Feminist Avant-Garde in American Poetry (2005); J. Ramazani, A Transnational Poetics (2009).

L. Keller and C. Miller

FESCENNINE VERSES (versus Fescennini). A form of Lat. *occasional verse, chiefly lascivious wedding songs, of great antiquity, which perhaps originated as ribald or abusive songs sung at harvest festivals: Claudian's Fescennine verses for the wedding of Emperor Honorius are extant (cf. Catullus 61.126–55). Fescennine verses were roughly dramatic, taking the form of a dialogue between peasants, and were probably first composed in the *Saturnian meter. In antiquity, the name was derived either from fascinum, a phallic emblem worn as a charm, or, as is more likely, from the town of Fescennium in Etruria. In the period of the empire, Fescennine verses were so popular for personal invective that they were outlawed. Livy (7.2) implies that Fescennine verses developed into Roman satire and comedy, but this is disputed.

See epithalamium.

■ Pauly-Wissowa, "Fescennini"; W. Beare, The Roman Stage, 3d ed. (1968); G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman Comedy, 2d ed. (1994).

R. J. Getty

FICTION, POETRY AS. In Eng., the term fiction is apposite to the novel and the short story, but not necessarily to poetry. Readers assume that novelists draw loosely on facts and freely on the *imagination to create characters, stories, and objects; but they know that poems can be—but do not have to be—fictional. The fictional status of a work of lit. depends not on ling. or formal considerations but on cultural conventions such as the suspension of disbelief or the willingness to entertain possibilities and impossibilities. In a work of fiction, the audience is willing to approach what it is being told in a spirit of make-believe and to allow that the pronouncements of a narrator or a lyrical *voice may not correspond to the beliefs of an author. Moreover, the relation between a writer and his or her audience is a social one based on the understanding that the imagination does not have to adhere to facts. The social, almost contractual nature of this relationship is underscored by the sense of betrayal some feel when a work they thought was autobiographical or historical turns out to be grounded on the kind of fabrication that would have been readily accepted in a work of fiction.

Poems can be fictional if they are primarily about imagined characters, events, places, or objects; but poets do not have to accommodate fictionality when exploring feelings, ideas, or emotions—for instance when their poems are prayers, exhortations, or meditations on particular subjects. Poets can be deliberately indeterminate about the connections between their work and any external reality, as Federico García Lorca was in some of his Andalusian poems. And where it is openly nonfictional, poetry can range from the *occasional verse—as in funeral orations or commemorations of sporting events—to the autobiographical. William Wordsworth's The Prelude (1805, pub. 1850), which bears the subtitle The Growth of a Poet's Mind, registers the accidents and experiences that informed his inner world. Poetry can also bear witness to political or historical events, as in the Spanish Civil War poems of Pablo Neruda and César Vallejo. The religious *hymns and *panegyrics in praise of leaders and warriors that Plato would have countenanced for his republic would not count as fictional for a public expected to worship their gods and to venerate the deeds of real men.

The demarcation between the fictional and the nonfictional ought not to be confused with that between the figurative and the literal. A poem can be fictional without the use of a single *trope, but it can be nonfictional even when grammar appears to fail (see anacoluthon), as in the later poems of Paul Celan (in Fadennsoen and Eigedunkelt, whose titles are neologisms) that address human suffering in the wake of the Holocaust. In the early mod. period, *epic poems such as La Araucana (1569–89) by Alonso de Ercilla or The Lusiads (1572) by Luís de Camões were considered to be historical works of the highest rank, notwithstanding the interventions of mythological characters from the pagan world, which a Christian audience would have understood as true in a deeper sense than the merely literal. No reader in Elizabethan England would countenance the possibility that the heroine of Edmund Spenser's The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596) is a fictional character in the mod. sense. On the contrary, the poem's *allegory and *artifice were intended to honor the attributes of an exalted monarch. Since the devel. of mod. historiography in the 18th c., readers have had scruples about reading epic poems as historical documents. Nonetheless, there is a line of research, from Heinrich Schliemann's scholarship on the Homeric epics to Jesse Byock's recent studies of Nordic sagas, that has led to archaeological and historical discoveries based on what a contemp. sensibility could dismiss as pure invention.

Fictions are often inspired by personal experiences, historical or current events, moral dilemmas, philosophical conundrums, or other works of fiction. Since poems do not have to be fictional, they can simply be concerned with personal experiences, historical events, and the like. In both fictional and nonfictional modes, philosophers from Lucretius to Friedrich Nietzsche have expressed some of their fundamental insights in poems. For a poem to be considered fictional, it is not necessary to determine which of its elements are fabrications; nor does a poem have to be fictional to the exclusion of other orientations to reality (such as the historical, the intellectual, or the ritual). It is enough for the reader to recognize that central characters, places, objects, or events are likely to be imaginary. Fiction affords writers and readers the possibility of distancing themselves from the real, and this allows for difficult or controversial topics to be addressed with a measure of emotional, moral, legal, or political cover, although the rawness of a personal emotion can be intensified, as in Arthur Rimbaud's "Le Bateau ivre" (The Drunken Boat, 1871), by the liberties a poet can take through fiction. At most, fictionality allows writers and readers to explore alternative realities, to escape into worlds of fantasy different in kind from the actual world. But at the least and in poems of many sorts, fictionality allows writers to project their musings about what if, what might have been and what could be onto facts and images that come to life in the mind, producing a world different from actuality in degree rather than kind.

Some theorists of fiction place the emphasis on the notion of make-believe (Walton, Currie), others on the nonreferential (Cohn), on possible worlds (Pavel, Doležel), on suspension of disbelief (Lamarque and Haugum Olsen), or on pretense (Searle, Genette). There are important insights to be gained from each of these positions even if, as Davies and others have underscored, the recent scholarship on fiction abounds with unresolved polemics and gray areas. Some contend that the distortions of fiction are always in the offing of a poem because, in principle, any work of lit. may be read as if it were fictional. Others make the stronger claim that the lines between fiction and nonfiction are always blurred in both fictional and nonfictional works. The views of Richard Rorty, Jacques Derrida, Barbara Cassin, and other influential postmodernist theorists go in this direction.

There is no consensus among theorists of fiction regarding answers to searching questions such as what kind of emotional response a reader experiences when considering the fate of a fictional character (see EMOTION) or how and to what degree readers supplement the information they gather from their reading to engage with a fiction imaginatively or cognitively. At the same time, there are some fascinating convergences among theorists who approach fiction from diametrically opposed perspectives. Schaeffer, e.g., argues that *mimesis is at the heart of poetry in one way or another. Doležel, on the other hand, argues that the poetic imagination generates alternative realities as opposed to imitating reality. Notwithstanding their differences, Doležel and Schaeffer coincide in their assessment that fiction is a move away from reality that allows for a return to it with added perspective and value.

See ARTIFACT, POETRY AS; INFORMATION, POETRY AS; KNOWLEDGE, POETRY AS.

■ J. Searle, "The Logical Status of Fictional Discourse," NLH 6 (1974); T. Pavel, Fictional Worlds (1986); G. Currie, The Nature of Fiction (1990); K. Walton, Mimesis as Make-Believe (1990); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991)—intro.; G. Genette, Fiction and Diction, trans. C. Porter (1993); J.-M. Schaeffer, Pourquoi la Fiction? (1999); P. Lamarque and S. Haugom Olsen, Truth, Fiction and Literature (1994); L. Doležel, Heterocosmica: Fiction and Possible Worlds (1998); D. Cohn, The Distinction of Fiction (1999); D. Davies, Aesthetics and Literature (2007).

E. KRISTAL

FIGURA (Lat., "form," "kind," "figure"). First attested in Terence (Eunuchus 317), figura originally meant "plastic composition." Gr. philosophy distinguished between a sense of form that "informed" entities from within, akin to a structural principle (morphe or eidos) and a sense of phenomenal, perceptible form (schema or typos). In order to understand the devel. and significance of the term figura for lit., it is crucial to note that the word translated primarily the second, phenomenal sense of form. Accordingly, the word soon acquired additional meanings of perceptible, external, superimposed, and potentially transient form, incl. the imprint of a seal, shadow, ghost, and deceptive semblance.

In the 1st c. BCE, figura was also used to refer to ling. phenomena. Its first application for lang. was in the field of grammar, where it was used in the sense of "forms" or inflections of a word (Varro). Cicero uses the term in the context of rhet.; however, the figurae orationis in De oratore are not yet the rhetorical figures of speech (to which Cicero refers as formae) but the three levels of style and in a more general sense the various modes of eloquence.

With Quintilian, the rhetorical sense of figurae as figures of speech was established. The Institutio oratoria makes a distinction not only between figurative and "plain" modes of speech but between figures of speech and *tropes. While tropes substitute words for other words, figures constitute a larger category of lang. used in a rhetorical or poetic way (and at times they seem to include tropes as well). Quintilian's treatment of the topic became the dominant influence on med. and early mod. rhet., which also inherited the complications of the concept of rhetorical figures.

During the early centuries of Christianity, a new sense of figura emerged as a result of the church's attempts to build a correspondence between the Heb. Bible and the Christian NT. The Christian apologist Tertullian referred to the biblical character Hosea as figura futurorum (a prefiguration of future events), in which an image of Jesus can be identified prospectively (Adversus Marcionem 3, 16). Not rejecting the historical authenticity of characters and events in the Heb. Bible, Tertullian read them as figurae, i.e. real prophecies, of characters and events in the NT. In his retrospective interpretation, persons and episodes in both the Heb. Bible and the Christian NT are considered real (i.e., historical), but in the latter they are conceived of as realizations and fulfillments of their corresponding figurae in the former.

Tertullian's main source is Paul's First Letter to the Corinthians; but by the time of the Vulgate, the Lat. trans. of Paul's Gr. letters reflects the patristic notion of figura. When Paul refers to the Jews as "typoi" (examples) for the Christians in 1 Cor. 10:6, the Vulgate translates the Gr. by using the Lat. "figura." But when in the apocalyptic 1 Cor. 7:31, Paul refers to the "schema" (present form) of the world passing away, the Vulgate uses "figura" again. Thus, following the exegetical method developed by Tertullian and other early church fathers, figura emerges as the central concept of typological interpretations of both the scriptures and hist. itself. In this typological conception, *hermeneutics and ontology are closely related. The unfolding of hist. follows a textual pattern in which earlier events and characters signify not only themselves but later ones as well; at the same time, this unfolding of hist. also implies an ontological progression from the figura or semblance of things toward an apocalyptic veritas or truth. Hist. in this view is a process of revealing that which hides under the imprint or figura.

How the rhetorical and the Christian exegetical meanings of figura are related to each other is a vexed question. Originally, the rhetorical sense of figura referred to modes of speaking, while the Christian exegetical sense focuses on hermeneutical strategies. But the rhetorical and the exegetical senses soon merged, particularly in Christian authors who set out to produce texts that could be read in a Christian figural way. Dante, for instance, was both a theorist of the so-called fourfold *exegesis of the scriptures ("Letter to Can Grande") and a practitioner of the figural method in the Divina commedia, where historical "pagan" characters such as Virgil appear as figures or types whose fulfillments Dante encounters in the afterlife. While med. and early mod. Catholic readers and authors tended to use figurative exegesis to integrate Gr. and Roman events and characters into a Christian hist., post-Reformation Protestant authors returned to emphasizing the figurative interpretation of the Heb. Bible. Thus, John Milton's Paradise Lost is a comprehensive attempt to retell the story of the biblical fall as a figura of both the Christian Messiah and the contemp. events of his own times ("shadowy types to truth, from flesh to spirit" [12.303]). Better known in Eng. as typology, this sense of figuralism remains influential in certain trends of Protestant lit., particularly in America from the metaphysical poet Edward Taylor to R. W. Emerson.

In the 20th c., figura became an important term in literary studies following the work of the philologist and comparatist Erich Auerbach. His essay "Figura" (1944) remains the most influential treatment of the subject. Rather than a mere philological subject, however, for Auerbach the word figura held the key to the hist. of Western literary representation, which he expounded in his 1946 Mimesis. In order to uncover the significance of figura, Auerbach insisted on distinguishing it from allegory*: while allegory is a "spiritual" mode of *interpretation in that it denies reality from the sign itself, figura is a sign that signifies both itself and its own fulfillment. Auerbach admits that such a distinction is not always clear and, therefore, warns against oversimplifying the matter. The contrast between an allegory and a figura nevertheless emerges in his work as a contrast between Greco-Roman and Judeo-Christian modes of representing (and indeed perceiving) reality, with figura and figural modes of representation corresponding to the Judeo-Christian historical view of reality. While Auerbach's theory of figural mimesis is heavily indebted to 19th-c. *historicism and its emphasis on the historical nature of reality and while his preference for what he saw as the Judeo-Christian mode of figural representation must be understood in the context of Nazi Germany's penchant for Greco-Roman mythology, White has argued that Mimesis contains a particularly modernist concept of lit. hist., one that sees "Western literary history as a story of the fulfillment of the idea of figurality."

See FIGURATION, SYMBOL.

■ E. Auerbach, "Typological Symbolism in Medieval Literature," YFS 9 (1952); and "Figura," trans. R. Manheim, Scenes from the Drama of European Literature (1959); Typology and Early American Literature, ed. S. Bercovitch (1972); Reading the Text: Biblical Criticism and Literary Theory, ed. S. Prickett (1991); R. K. Emmerson, "Figura and the Medieval Typological Imagination," Typology and English Medieval Literature, ed. H. T. Keenan (1992); J. M. Gellrich, "Figura, Allegory, and the Question of History," Literary History and the Challenge of Philology, ed. S. Lerer (1996); J. Knape, "Figurenlehre," Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik, ed. G. Kalivoda et al. (1996); J. T. Shawcross, "The Christ Figura in Some Literary Texts: Image and Theme," Cithara 35 (1996); H. White, "Auerbach's Literary History," Figural Realism (1999); L. Costa Lima, "Figura as a Kernel of Auerbach's Literary History," Literary Research/Recherche Littéraire 17 (2000); L. Freinkel, Reading Shakespeare's Will: The Theology of Figure from Augustine to the Sonnets (2002); J. I. Porter, "Erich Auerbach and the Judaizing of Philology," CritI 35 (2008).

F. M. Aresu; D. Marno

FIGURATION. The transmutation of ideas into images, figuration is the product of the formative power of human cognition and is realized in all the ways in which verbal, mental, perceptual, optical, and graphic images interact. Figuration punctuates the complexity of time and space with interpretable forms, incl. all kinds of signs; the very idea of an "idea" is linked to seeing and hence to the eidolon or "visible image." Platonic trad. distinguishes between idea and image by conceiving of the former as a suprasensible realm of forms, types, or species and the latter as a sensory impression that provides a mere likeness (eikon). Mental imagery or figuration has been a central concern of theories of mind since Plato's cave allegory in the Republic and Aristotle's On Interpretation and continues to be a cornerstone of psychology, as in Gestalt construction of images. And at least since Macrobius's commentary on the dream of Scipio in Cicero's Orator, dreams and esp. visions have been understood as interpretable in various figural senses.

While it is a function of *allegory to personify abstractions, figuration works in the reverse direction, treating real persons or things in a formulaic way so that they become concrete or living ideas grounded in a shared quality. In med. literary fiction and interpretation, when the things treated are historical persons taking part in God's providential structuring of time (as in Dante's Divine Comedy), imbuing them with the power to delineate events, the resulting narrative is called *_figura_ (Auerbach). Yet _figura_ need not treat only Christian events; in the _Aeneid_, e.g., the hero arrives at the site of Pallanteum just when the rites of Hercules are being performed. The day is to be interpreted as significant because this arrival refers back to Hercules' own rescuing mission at the same site and at the same time prefigures the advent of the emperor Augustus, Virgil's patron, at the same site again, fresh from his triumph over Antony and Cleopatra at Actium. For Dante, in turn, Aeneas' founding of Roman civilization not only facilitates but prefigures the birth of Christ within the bounds of the empire and the resulting renovation of humanity. _Figura_, or narrative typology, is thus but one specialized instance of figuration, which is essential to all interpretive strategies.

In the constitution of literary works, figuration is the means whereby a system of beliefs and ideas is rendered palpable. A large quotient of figurative expression accounts for much of the traditional distrust of poetry among philosophers. Literary discourse provides authors with a great deal of latitude, whereas figures (taken in the sense of rhetorical strategies) that become part of ordinary lang. tend to lose their figural status. E.g., Lat. _pastor_, "shepherd," was augmented by a Christian figurative meaning, "head of the congregation," an idea that has survived, defiguralized, in mod. Eng. In texts, figuration retains a strong visual connotation: when Walter Pater uses the term _figure_ to represent the It. Ren., the model for the figure is always visual.

The hist. and theory of figuration is, therefore, bound up with the status of images. David Hume follows John Locke and Thomas Hobbes in the use of pictorial figures to describe the chains of cognition and signification: ideas are "faint images" or "decayed sensations" that eventually become linked by conventional associations with words. The ensuing conception of meaning traces it back to its origin in an impression, with the consequent understanding of lang. as the means of retrieving that original impression. The view of poetry and of lang. in general as a process of pictorial reproduction exemplifies one idea of figuration. In *romantic poetics, verbal, mental, and pictorial imagery were assimilated to the process of *imagination as redefined in opposition to the mere "recall" of mental pictures. Abrams finds that figures of *expression come to replace figures of *mimesis in the course of the 19th c. Indeed, an abstract figure such as the Coleridgean symbol displaces or subsumes the notion of the figure as a representation of material reality.

A progressive elevation or sublimation of the figure reaches its logical culmination when an entire poem is regarded as a figure, as in the "verbal icon" of Wimsatt, a synchronic structure embodying a complex figure. Poetic *iconicity ranges from a literal basis in shaped and concrete poems (see CONCRETE POETRY, CALLIGRAMME), in which the text is charged with pictorial features, to forms such as the *sestina, in which figuration is implicit, to ekphrastic poetry (see EKPHRASIS), where the text represents a work of visual art, to *dialogue forms, which appropriately figure the dialectical method of argumentation.

Formalist crit. programmatically demonstrates the congruence or lack of congruence among a poem's propositional content, its architectonics, and its figurative energies so as to display the many dynamic patterns cohering within the whole. The concept of the entire poem as figure notwithstanding, the main direction of figurative interpretation in the mod. era has been to proceed from the manifest or surface content to the word conceived as latent meaning, lying beneath the aesthetic surface. Freud's _Interpretation of Dreams,_ while not a text of lit. crit., articulates a poetics of dreaming that assimilates the psychic material of which dreams are made to the material of visual art. Dream analysis provides strategies for extracting the hidden verbal message from a possibly misleading and certainly inarticulate pictorial surface, namely, the four figurative processes of condensation, displacement, identification, and *symbolism.

The symbolic connection of dreams to experience is thus one of figuration, wherein symbols and the things symbolized are integrated in a speculative reality in which they participate mutually. The establishment of such invisible bonds is characteristic of poetic conceptions of the universe, which may, e.g., produce descriptions that intertwine physical setting and human emotion where connections of a causal type might otherwise have been invoked. Yet often a setting presented as figurative by a description, without overt justification, does the work of postulating so strong a participation between persons and environment that the smallest occurrence can assume permanent symbolic value.

See EXEGISIS, ICONOLOGY, IMAGE, IMAGERY, METAPHOR, PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY, RHETORIC AND POETRY, SCHEME, TROPE.

■ Abrams; W. K. Wimsatt, _The Verbal Icon_ (1954); S. Freud, _The Interpretation of Dreams_ (1955); E. Auerbach, "Figura," trans. R. Manheim, _Scenes from the Drama of European Literature_ (1959); Jakobson, "Linguistics and Poetics," _Selected Writings_, v. 3; A. Fletcher, _Allegory_ (1964); F. E. Peters, _Greek Philosophical Terms_ (1967); E. Panofsky, _Idea_ (1968); W.J.T. Mitchell, _Iconology_ (1986); M. and M. Shapiro, _Figuration in Verbal Art_ (1988); N. C. Burbules, G. Schraw, and W. Trathen, "Metaphor, Idiom, and Figuration," _Metaphor and Symbolic Activity_ 4 (1989); S. Lattig, "The Perception of Metaphor and the Metaphor of Perception: The Neurodynamics of Figuration," _Intertexts_ 9 (2005).

M. SHAPIRO

FILI (pl. _filid[h]_, mod. Ir. _file_, pl. _filí_). _Fili_ has always been the Ir. word for poet, and it is unfortunate that a considerable body of Ir. poetry (_filidheacht, filíocht_) is called in Eng. "bardic" poetry, with the misleading suggestion that it is the work of the Ir. bard (pl. _baird_; see BARD). The word _fili_ is cognate with the Welsh _gwel(-ed)_ (to see), and originally the fili was the "seer," the "diviner"; hence, it does not occasion surprise that _fili_ and _druí_ (druid) were at one time interchangeable words and that some of the knowledge of the fili was then regarded as knowledge gained by means of occult practices. However, the fili gained most of his knowledge by the more usual process of learning at school—there were special schools for filid—and the knowledge thus gained was always regarded as an important part of his qualifications. The fili in earlier times was not sharply distinguished from the breithem, "judge" (literally, the maker of judgments) and the senchaid, "historian," "reciter of lore"; indeed, it is possible that at one time he combined their functions with his own and that their emergence as separate classes is the result of specialization. The fili was from the beginning a member of an important and highly organized corporation classed among the saer-nemed (privileged classes). There were seven grades of filid, the highest being the ollam filed, a fully qualified fili appointed to the service of a king. A fili was usually attached to the household of a chief, his calling was hereditary, and the office of fili to the head of a clan was, in later times at any rate, often the prerogative of a particular family. He was at all times distinguished from the bard, whose qualifications and status were inferior. The word bard is derived from the Celtic bardos, who, among the Gauls, was predominantly the "singer of praise." It is sometimes assumed that the fili arrogated to himself the function of the bard as a singer of praise (as well as a proclaimer of satire) and that his function as such was overshadowed by those that he must have undertaken in part from the druid at the advent of Christianity. However that may be, singing the praise of his chief was the foremost function of the fili in the Middle Ages.

■ G. Murphy, "Bards and Filidh," Éigse 2 (1940); J.E.C. Williams, "The Court Poet in Medieval Ireland," PBA 57 (1971); Williams and Ford; L. Breatnach, Uraicecht na Ríar: The Poetic Grades in Early Irish Law (1987); P. A. Breatnach, "The Chief's Poet," Proceedings of the Irish Royal Academy (1983).

J.E.C. Williams

FINIDA. In 14th- to early 16th-c. Sp. poetry, the finida is the approximate equivalent of the remate* of the later canción petrarquista. Lang writes,

> Like the [Occitan] tornada, the finida serves as a conclusion to a poem, and with the tornada and kindred forms, such as the envoi, the desfecha, the estribote and others, this stanza was originally, in all probability, a sequence to a musical composition. According to the Leys d'Amors, the tornada repeats in its rhyme-order the second part of the last stanza in case this has the same number of verses; otherwise it may have one verse more or less than the last half-stanza. In the Portuguese . . . the finida, which is regarded as essential to a perfect composition, may have from one to four verses, and must rhyme with the last stanza or, if the poem be a cantiga de refram, with the refrain. The practitioners of the Cancionero de Baena (ca. 1450) appear to have followed the example of the Provençals and Catalans.

■ H. R. Lang, "Las formas estróficas y términos métricos del Cancionero de Baena," Estudios eruditos "in memoriam" de Adolfo Bonilla y San Martín, v. 1 (1927); Le Gentil; Navarro.

D. C. Clarke

FINLAND, POETRY OF

I. The Beginnings
II. The Rise of Finnish Poetic Language
III. The Modern Period

Finnish poetry has developed over a long hist., though the oldest extant texts written in Finnish date only from the early 19th c. and though some of its classics were initially written in Swedish. It presents a complex hist. of cultural and literary influences, but thematically and taken as a whole, it shows a remarkably unified inspiration from early oral trad. to contemp. *modernism. The Finnish lang. belongs to the non-IE, Finno-Ugrian group of langs. like Hungarian and Estonian. Finnish poetry has developed at the periphery of the IE family of langs. but has had close cultural contacts with the major movements of Eur. civilization.

I. The Beginnings. A rich treasury of traditional oral songs and tales, representing both the lyric and the epic genres, is extant, incl. about 1,270,000 lines and 85,000 variants of the poetry composed in the so-called Kalevala meter (trochaic tetrameter in its simplest form). These works are traditionally that of anonymous singers, men and women, but some of the principal singers are known by name, such as Arhippa Perttunen and Ontrei Malinen, both of whom were important sources for Elias Lönnrot's compilations, the epic Kalevala (1835, 1849), and the Kanteletar, a collection of lyrics and short narrative poems (1840–41). Finnish folk poetry consists of elements dating from different periods and deriving from various cultural strata. There is evidence of the existence of a vital oral poetry before the Swedish cultural and political expansion during the 12th c. that brought Christianity via Sweden to Finland. Finno-Ugric mythology, based on animistic and shamanistic religion, is an intrinsic part of the early cosmogonic poems, magic songs, and ritual incantations of this trad. Med. Christianity introduced new elements to Finnish folk poetry. *Ballads, legends, and *laments expressed both religious and secular themes, and poems sung at weddings or at burials reflected their function for the life of the community. In an exquisite cycle about the birth of Christ, a Finnish maiden, Marjatta, a variant of the Virgin Mary, becomes pregnant by eating cranberries (Finnish marja). The religious basis of these poems, which were composed by individual singers according to their poetic skill, derives from a fusion of native rituals, Catholic, and Gr. Orthodox beliefs.

While oral poetry survived in the agrarian parts mostly of eastern Finland, its importance decreased as other attempts were made to forge the Finnish lang. into a literary medium. Most important of these is Mikael Agricola's (1510?–57) trans. of the NT (1548), a decisive ling. landmark, as well as one of the first literary monuments of the Protestant era. At the end of the 17th c., Lat. and Swedish-lang. poems were composed, but the verse remained conventional and derivative, with the exception of a few names such as Juhana Cajanus (1655–81) and Jakob Frese (1691–1729). It was not until the rediscovery of the oral trads. in the 18th c., inaugurated by the study of Finnish folk poetry such as Henrik Gabriel Porthan's (1739–1804) De poesi fennica (1766–78), that Finnish-lang. poetry began to emerge from obscurity. The realization that the Finnish people had created poetry worthy of comparison with the Iliad and the Odyssey had an enormous impact in Finland. The lines by Arhippa Perttunen illustrate the proud self-assertion of a native poet:

> My own finding are my words
> my own snatching from the road.
>
> (Finnish Folk Poetry, trans. K. Bosley)

II. The Rise of Finnish Poetic Language. While Swedish-lang. poetry of Eur. orientation dominated literary production in Finland, examples of early Finnish-lang. poetry belong to the didactic and exhortatory trad. of the Enlightenment. The termination of Swedish rule in 1809 brought about an altogether new situation. A few Swedish-lang. poets, such as Frans Michael Franzén (1772–1847), whose poetry expressed a strong preromantic conception of nature and of humanity as divine creation, were also influential in the devel. of Finnish poetry. As the Napoleonic wars resulted in a redistribution of the northern territories of Europe, Finland fell under Rus. rule as a virtually autonomous Grand Duchy in 1809. This situation compelled the Finns, incl. the Swedish Finns, to turn their philosophical and literary attention to questions of Finnish national identity. It was an original moment in Finnish lit. hist. Helsinki became the center of Finnish cultural and literary life. The university was moved there from Turku in 1827, the Finnish Literary Society was founded in 1831, and the newspaper Helsingfors Tidningar (Helsinki News) began to appear in 1829. J. L. Runeberg (1804–77) became the foremost Swedish-lang. poet of that time with his Dikter (Poems, 1830). Combining a deep feeling for simple country folk with expert knowledge of both cl. lit. and Finnish oral trad., Runeberg renewed lyrical lang. with his mastery of technique. His epic poems in hexameters, e.g., the Elgskyttarne (Elkhunters, 1832), a narrative about love and hunting, demonstrate how cl. style can be effectively used to describe humble country life. His romanticism, both lyrical and patriotic, may be seen as an important precursor of the Finnish-lang. poetry that emerged in the 1860s.

Runeberg, the philosopher and writer J. W. Snellman (1806–81), Lönnrot (1802–84), and the writer and poet Zachris Topelius (1818–98) all shaped the Finnish national consciousness and cultural identity, but the conditions were not yet ripe for the production of Finnish poetry of merit. Lönnrot showed some genuine poetic talent in assembling the epic Kalevala by introducing lyric material into the narratives, adding songs, and replacing missing lines according to his vision. But the preeminent figure at the time was Aleksis Kivi (pseud. of Alexis Stenvall, 1834–72), primarily a playwright and novelist whose poetic achievement was not fully recognized until the 20th c. Kivi's contemporaries considered his poetry unfinished: it was more daring and personal than anything written at the time. Many of his poems were lyrical narratives that broke away from rhyming verse and used free rhythms, creating an intensity familiar from the folk lyric. From the mod. perspective, Kivi is recognized as one of the greatest Finnish poets.

After Kivi, there were no major poets until the end of the 19th c., though Kaarlo Kramsu (1855–95) and J. H. Erkko (1849–1906) played important roles in forging Finnish poetic lang. that could effectively express new social and historical themes. Industrialization, educational reforms, and new scientific thought were reflected in the work of Finnish novelists and dramatists, who explored the forms of Eur. *realism in the 1880s. Swedish-lang. poetry was mainly represented by J. J. Wecksell (1838–1907) and Karl August Tavaststjerna (1860–98), who reflects the new sense of alienation felt by the Swedish-speaking writers.

National neoromanticism was the term coined by the poet Eino Leino (1878–1926) to characterize certain currents in Finnish lit. and in the fine arts influenced by Eur. *symbolism. It combined enthusiasm, determination, and outstanding talent in all fields: the composer Jean Sibelius, the painter Akseli Gallen-Kallela, and the architect Eliel Saarinen were all representatives of Young Finland. A prolific poet, Leino developed an innovative technique that radically changed the Finnish poetic idiom. Leino put the stamp of originality on everything he wrote. While drawing on traditional sources such as myth and folk poetry for themes and motifs, he was fully versed in Eur. and Scandinavian lit., and translated Dante, Pierre Corneille, Jean Racine, J. W. Goethe, and Friedrich Schiller. His Helkavirsiä (Whitsongs, 1903, 1916) recreate the most ancient folk trads. in narrative lyrics of visionary character having a symbolic resonance that transcends the national sphere. Leino's lyrical lang. is supple and resourceful: in "Nocturne" (from Talvi-yö [Winter Night], 1905), the melodious lines evoke the infinite in a clearly defined space:

> The corncrake's song rings in my ears, > above the rye a full moon sails; . . .
>
> (trans. K. Bosley)

The inner dynamics of Leino's poetry spring from a fruitful tension between an ultraindividualistic, egocentric, amoral hero and a prophet-seer who could capture and articulate the complex spirit of his epoch.

Several of his contemporaries added other elements to the vigorously developing Finnish poetic lang. Leino's companion L. Onerva (1882–1972) provided a free spirit to explorations of femininity in sensual lyric verse, while Otto Manninen (1872–1950) and V. A. Koskenniemi (1885–1962) wrote in the Eur. classic mode. Manninen, a virtuoso poet, wrote clear, concise verse on symbolist themes and translated Homer, Gr. tragedy, and Molière. Koskenniemi expressed his pessimistic philosophy in tightly controlled verse inspired by ancient poetry. With Finland's independence in 1917, poetry reconfirmed its central role in the expression of both individual and social sentiments. And by 1920, Finnish poetic lang. had attained a variety and depth that guaranteed it a worthy place among Eur. lits.

III. The Modern Period. While Leino has a strikingly mod. timbre at times, modernism appeared in Finnish poetry only after World War I. This was in the unique work of the Finnish modernists writing in Swedish, such as Edith Södergran (1892–1923) and Elmer Diktonius (1896–1961). Literary modernism coincided with antipositivism in philosophy and was a reaction against 19th-c. empiricism and realism. In the 1920s, Eur. movements such as *futurism, *cubism, *constructivism, *expressionism, and *surrealism arrived in Finnish art and poetry almost simultaneously. Denying the ability of art to describe reality, the new poets increasingly turned away from mimetic art, even as they rejected the past and everything connected with it. This was first seen in lang. experiments, e.g., in Jääpeili (Ice Mirror, 1928) by Aaro Hellaakoski (1893–1952), in the poetry of Katri Vala (1901–44), in the prose of Olavi Paavolainen (1903–64), and in the early work of P. Musttapää (1899–1973). The new generation that brought modernism to Finland formed a group called the Firebearers, publishing albums and a jour. of that name, Tulenkantajat. The Firebearers issued a *manifesto in 1928, declaring the sacredness of art and life in tones reminiscent of the writings of the *Finland-Swedish modernists, but with an even greater fervor and passion. Vala and Uuno Kailas (1901–33) expressed these ideals, and by this time, all important literary movements had arrived in Finnish poetry. Another literary group, Kiila (The Wedge), devoted itself to radical socialism after 1936. Arvo Turtiainen (1904–80) and the novelist Elvi Sinervo (1912–86) were among its most important members, many of whom were imprisoned during World War II. The nation, divided by the Civil War (1918–19) following Finnish independence, unified again for the effort of the Winter War, but the schism was not closed until the postwar era, as is described by Väinö Linna (1920–92) in his epic trilogy Täällä Pohjantähden alla (Here under the North Star, 1959–62).

In the 1950s, poetic modernism in Finland turned antitraditionalist, dissociating itself from ordinary lang. While drawing inspiration from East and West, America and the Far East, its lang. became more hermetic. Paavo Haavikko (1931–2008), Eeva-Liisa Manner (1921–95), Helvi Juvonen (1919–59), and Marja-Liisa Vartio (1924–66) were among the most important poets, followed by other original talents such as Mirkka Rekola (b. 1931), Tyyne Saastamoinen (1924–1998), Lassi Nummi (b. 1928), and Pentti Holappa (b. 1927). Pentti Saarikoski (1937–83), whose first collection, Runoja (Poems), appeared in 1958, is not tied to any movement or decade. Saarikoski, a maverick genius and iconoclast, was one of the most learned of mod. Finnish poets, as well as a translator of Homer, Euripides, James Joyce, and others. With his Mitä tapahtuu todella? (What Is Going On, Really?, 1962) Finnish poetic lang. was taken to a new level where everything had to start from point zero in order to go on: the split word, the word mobile, the *collage, and the explicit rejection of poetic structure all conveyed a sense of both freedom and despair. Saarikoski's work culminated in a long, free-floating philosophical poem Hämärän tanssit (The Dances of the Obscure, 1983), written during the period when the poet lived in Sweden. It expresses the poet's yearning for beauty and the unification of all living things.

Rekola, Haavikko, and Manner, in their different ways, have been regarded as the leading Finnish modernists. Haavikko uses compelling rhythmic sequences and incantations to express, through a series of negatives, abstractions, and ironies, his skepticism about the relationship of lang. to the external world. It is an original vision, and in 1984, Haavikko received the Neustadt Prize for his achievement. Rekola, who was a candidate for the Neustadt Prize in 2000, studies lang. and perception in a universal trad. Manner has explored the conflict between magical order and logical disorder, as she calls it, and has brought to Finnish poetry, since her breakthrough collection Tämä matka (This Journey, 1956) a mythical dimension, a lang. suggestive of another reality.

Finnish poetry in recent times and since Finland's entry in the European Union in 1994 shows an unprecedented diversity; all directions seem possible. As the motto of the Firebearers once indicated, Finnish poetry has become receptive to world literary currents. Among the poets writing in contemp. Finland are Sirkka Turkka (b. 1939), Kari Aronpuro (b. 1940), Pentti Saaritsa (b. 1941), Kirsti Simonsuuri (b. 1945), Caj Westerberg (b. 1946), and Arja Tiainen (b. 1947). Saaritsa, Westerberg, and Simonsuuri are also major translators of world poetry into Finnish. The new generation is represented by Olli Heikkonen (b. 1965), Sanna Karlström (b. 1975), Teemu Manninen (b. 1977), Katariina Vuorinen (b. 1976), and numerous other poets born in the 1980s, and there is a new intellectual current in Finnish lit. Both poetry and prose continue occupying an important place in contemp. cultural life. Finnish-Swedish modernists like Bo Carpelan (b. 1926) and Solveig von Schoulz (1907–95) have carried on the earlier modernist trad. while adding new elements. In the present day, one is justified in speaking of Finnish poetry as including all verse written by Finns, whether in Swedish or in Finnish, and whether in or outside Finland.

■ Anthologies and Translations: Moderne Finnische Lyrik, ed. and trans. M. P. Hein (1962); Suomen kirjallisuuden antologia I–VIII, ed. K. Laitinen and

M. Suurpää (1963–75); P. Haavikko, Selected Poems, trans. A. Hollo (1974); Finnish Folk Poetry: Epic, ed. and trans. M. Kuusi et al., trans. K. Bosley (1977); E. Leino, Whitsongs, trans. K. Bosley (1978); Snow in May, ed. R. Dauenhauer and P. Binham (1978); Territorial Song: Finnish Poetry and Prose, trans. H. Lomas (1981); P. Saarikoski, Selected Poems, trans. A. Hollo (1983); Salt of Pleasure: 20th-Century Finnish Poetry, ed. and trans. A. Jarvenpa and K. B. Vähämäki (1983); E. Södergran, Complete Poems, trans. D. McDuff (1983); P. Saarikoski, Love and Solitude, trans. S. Katchadourian (1985); Modern finlandssvensk Lyrik, ed. C. Andersson and B. Carpelan (1986); B. Carpelan, Room without Walls: Selected Poems, trans. A. Born (1987); P. Saarikoski, Dances of the Obscure, trans. M. Cole and K. Kimball (1987); Ice around Our Lips:. Finland-Swedish Poetry, ed. and trans. D. McDuff (1989); The Kalevala, trans. K. Bosley (1989); Poésie et prose de Finlande, ed. M. Bargum (1989); Enchanting Beasts: An Anthology of Modern Women Poets in Finland, ed. and trans. K. Simonsuuri (1990); Contemporary Finnish Poetry, ed. and trans. H. Lomas (1991).

■ Criticism and History: E. Enäjärvi-Haavio, "On the Performance of Finnish Folk Runes," Folkliv (1951); J. Ahokas, History of Finnish Literature (1974); Modern Nordic Plays: Finland, ed. E. J. Friis (1974); T. Wretö, Johan Ludvig Runeberg (1980); The Two Literatures of Finland, spec. iss. of World Literature Today 54 (1980); M. Kuusi and L. Honko, Sejd och Saga (1983); T. Warburton, Åttio år finlandssvensk litteratur (1984); G. Schoolfield, Edith Södergran (1984); K. Simonsuuri, "The Lyrical Space: the Poetry of Paavo Haavikko," World Literature Today 58 (1984); Europe: Littérature de Finlande (June–July 1985); K. Laitinen, Literature of Finland: An Outline (1985); P. Leino, Language and Metre: Metrics and the Metrical System of Finland, trans. A. Chesterman (1986); K. Laitinen, Finlands Litteratur (1988); A History of Finnish Literature, ed. G. C. Schoolfield (1998); "Finnish and Finland-Swedish," The Oxford Guide to Literature in English Translation, ed. P. France (2000).

K. K. Simonsuuri

FINLAND-SWEDISH MODERNISTS. A group of path-breaking poets in Finland writing in Swedish during and shortly after World War I. Chief among these were Edith Södergran (1892–1923), Hagar Olsson (1893–1978), Elmer Diktonius (1896–1961), Gunnar Björling (1887–1960), Rabbe Enckell (1903–74), and Henry Parland (1908–30). They were influenced by Ger. *expressionism, Rus. *futurism, and Anglo-Am. *imagism, as well as other Eur. movements in philosophy, poetry, painting, and music, but cannot be defined as a separate school. Nor were they imitators; their work was a unique creation—a response to a turbulent period in Finnish hist. and culture—whose form varied according to their distinctive talents. Södergran was the clear pioneer: she published Scandinavia's first avant-gardist *manifesto, titled "Individual Art," in a Helsinki newspaper in 1918. She died in 1923 at age 31, but her radical poetry inspired an entire generation of Finland-Swedish modernists. Their poetic program, presented in two avant-garde periodicals, Ultra (1922) and Quosego (1928–29), represents the birth of modernism in Scandinavian poetry; elsewhere in the region, modernism did not emerge fully until the 1940s. Their program's revolutionary aesthetic defines poetry as a dynamic process whose forms give direct expression to instinctual and subconscious life while reflecting philosophical shifts in sensibility, intellectual and moral values, and sexual attitudes. Their work included many new poetic techniques, such as vers libre, unrhymed lines with free rhythms, a strong emphasis on associative imagery, and startling, spontaneous lang. Nature and animals are frequent tropes. They expanded the topics of poetry, dealing with the inner life of the individual as well as with contemp. society. Their strong influence can be seen in Sweden, particularly in the Fyrtiotalisterna* (the Poets of the 1940s), and throughout Scandinavia. They also influenced the Finnish modernist poets, the Firebearers.

See FINLAND, POETRY OF.

■ B. Carpelan, Studier i Gunnar Björlings diktning (1960); J. Wrede, Tidskriften Ultra (1970); E. Södergran, Love and Solitude: Selected Poems, trans. S. Katchadourian (1992); C. Zilliacus, Finlands svenska litteraturhistoria Andra delen (2000); U. Lindqvist, "The Paradoxical Poetics of Edith Södergran," Modernism/Modernity 13 (2006).

S. Lyngstad; K. K. Simonsuuri; U. Lindqvist

FIRESIDE POETS. The 19th-c. Am. poets H. W. Longfellow (1807–82), W. C. Bryant (1794–1878), J. G. Whittier (1807–92), J. R. Lowell (1819–91), and O. W. Holmes (1809–94) were known collectively as the Fireside poets; they were also sometimes called the Household or Schoolroom Poets. They did not self-identify as a literary circle: Bryant was involved in New York's Knickerbocker Club; Whittier was a farmer's son and a Quaker activist; and Longfellow, Holmes, and Lowell were Boston brahmins. Rather, these poets were linked and named by others for the prominence of their work in domestic (fireside) and pedagogical (schoolroom) settings. Their poems were disseminated through "Household Editions" meant to ornament middle-class parlors, and through textbooks such as the multimillion-selling McGuffey's Reader series. Regular meters, full rhymes, and accessible sentiments made a typical fireside poem easy to read, recall, and repeat. By the 1880s, a canon of "standards" emerged, incl., e. g., Holmes's "Old Ironsides" ("Ay, tear her battered ensign down!"); Longfellow's "Paul Revere's Ride" ("Listen, my children, and you shall hear . . ."); Whittier's "Barefoot Boy" ("Blessings on thee, little man!"); and Lowell's "The Vision of Sir Launfal" ("And what is so rare as a day in June?").

Children memorized such poems in school, and adults remembered them with nostalgia because—in recalling lines of poetry—they were recalling their own youth. In this way, fireside poems functioned much like later 20th-c. popular songs: they worked as repositories for personal and cultural memories. As they were canonized, the poems of the Fireside poets also served an ideological agenda, helping or pushing immigrants to assimilate, North and South to reconcile, and ethnic minorities to identify with the dominant group. Longfellow, esp., became an icon in Am. schoolrooms, representing not just literary virtues but white, middle class, New England values as well. At the same time, however, the Fireside poets were democratic in the sense that they were appreciated by a large section of the Am. public. Readers who knew fireside poems by heart tended to take ownership of them, quoting or parodying them in a range of contexts from sermons to scrapbooks. By the turn of the 20th c., the Fireside poets were an entrenched part of Am. popular culture; as one playground rhyme put it, "You're a poet / and don't know it, / your feet show it / they're long-fellows."

The Fireside poets fell from fashion in the early 20th c. Literary modernists promoted more esoteric and diverse (though often less accessible) forms of poetry, rebelling against what they saw as ossified Victorian conventions. In public schools, new pedagogies deemphasized memorization. Meanwhile, in the domestic sphere, recorded music and radios replaced recitation and parlor theatricals. In the later 20th c., after years of neglect, scholars renewed their interest in the Fireside poets, reading their work as expressions of literary sentimentalism and nationalism or as part of the hist. of childhood. The Fireside poets remain significant, however, mainly because they achieved a level of popularity and familiarity unmatched (thus far) by any other group of Am. poets.

See PERFORMANCE; RECITATION; UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE.

■ J. Justus, "The Fireside Poets," Nineteenth-Century American Poetry, ed. A. R. Lee (1985); K. Gruesz, "Feeling for the Fireside," Sentimental Men, ed. M. Chapman and G. Hendler (1999); A. Sorby, Schoolroom Poets (2005).

A. SORBY

FLARF. A 21st-c. school of experimental poetry in the U.S., initiated in 2001 when the Brooklyn poet Gary Sullivan and several friends attempted to write poems so execrable they would be rejected by an online vanity press. The group soon formed an e-mail collective in which they shared their work, collaborated, and developed various signature methods, incl. (but not limited to) the technique of using the Google search engine to mine the Web for verbal material.

Flarf is partly influenced by aspects of earlier avant-garde movements, incl. *futurism's strident trumpeting of new technology, *Dada's antiart ungainliness, *Oulipo's use of game-based *constraints, and *Language poetry's decentering of syntax and reference. Flarf shares with *conceptual poetry the habit of appropriating demotic and commercial discourse, but whereas conceptualist appropriation typically operates at the level of pure citation and transcription, Flarfists often take considerable liberties with their source materials, sculpting and reframing at will.

Increasingly, flarf has entered common usage to denote any form of Web-based verbal *collage or any purposely frivolous or incoherent poetry (e.g., "this is just some flarfy drivel I wrote when I was drunk"). It is also sometimes used as a verb (e.g., "she flarfed the senator's speech by replacing all the nouns with asshat").

■ Flarf: An Anthology of Flarf, ed. K. Mohammad, G. Sullivan, N. Gordon, and S. Mesmer (2013).

K. S. MOHAMMAD

FLEMISH POETRY. See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE.

FLESHLY SCHOOL OF POETRY. The name given by Robert Buchanan to D. G. Rossetti, A. C. Swinburne, and William Morris, together with the lesser-known poets Arthur O'Shaughnessy, John Payne, and Philip Bourke Marston. Buchanan coined the term in a review of Rossetti's Poems (1870) pub. in the Contemporary Review in 1871 under the pseud. Thomas Maitland. Rossetti replied in a letter to the Athenaeum. Buchanan then expanded his article into a pamphlet, pub. under his own name, incl. an answer to Rossetti and further attacks on Swinburne. Under the pressure of Buchanan's ad hominem attacks, Rossetti's mental and physical health collapsed. Swinburne counterattacked in his scathing pamphlet Under the Microscope (1872), continuing to taunt Buchanan in print until he sued Swinburne's publisher for libel in 1876. Buchanan retracted his crits. of Rossetti in the dedication to his novel God and the Man in 1881 and again more explicitly after Rossetti's death, but Rossetti's friends and family never forgave him.

The origins of the fleshly school controversy lay partly in the culture of Victorian literary journalism. Buchanan had published a hostile review of Swinburne's Poems and Ballads (1866) in the Athenaeum, which led to dismissive remarks about Buchanan's own poetry and that of his dead friend David Gray in articles by Swinburne and his friend W. M. Rossetti. In the late 1860s, Buchanan was supplanted by Swinburne and his circle as the in-house poets of the Fortnightly Review. When Buchanan published his ambitious poem The Book of Orm in 1870, it received poor reviews, while Rossetti's Poems were highly praised in a carefully orchestrated series of reviews written by his friends, incl. Swinburne and Morris.

There were also important aesthetic and ideological differences between Buchanan and his opponents. Buchanan disliked what he considered to be their affected poetic diction and forms, which he exposed through selective quotation and parody. More crucially, he objected to the sensuality of their poetry. Buchanan protested that he was not opposed to the representation of bodily desire itself, only to its elevation into the sole preoccupation of poetry without any spiritual or moral purpose. For all Buchanan's self-justifications, however, the real point at issue was how far it was appropriate to articulate the private realm of sexuality and desire in poetry. The fleshly school controversy thus represents a revealing and important moment in the continuing debate over, in Rossetti's words, "how much . . . is admissible within the limits of Art."

See AESTHETICISM, PRE-RAPHAELITISM.

■ T. Maitland [R. Buchanan], "The Fleshly School of Poetry: Mr. D. G. Rossetti," Contemporary Review 18 (1871); D. G. Rossetti, "The Stealthy School of Criticism," Athenaeum (Dec. 16, 1871); R. Buchanan, The Fleshly School of Poetry and Other Phenomena of the Day (1872); A. C. Swinburne, Under the Microscope (1872); R. Buchanan, "To an Old Enemy," God and the Man (1881)—expanded in 2d ed. (1882) and "A Note on Dante Rossetti," A Look Round Literature (1887); J. A. Cassidy, "Robert Buchanan and the Fleshly Controversy," PMLA 67 (1952); C. D. Murray, "The Fleshly School Revisited," Bulletin of John Rylands Library 65 (1982–83); J. Marsh, Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1999); G. Budge, "The Aesthetics of Morbidity: D. G. Rossetti and Buchanan's The Fleshly School of Poetry," Outsiders Looking In, ed. D. Clifford and L. Roussillon (2004); J. Holmes, Dante Gabriel Rossetti and the Late Victorian Sonnet Sequence (2005).

J. HOLMES

FLYTING. A Middle Scots word from the verb to flyte, "to scold, quarrel, vituperate." At the Stuart courts, it came to mean a contest in verse between two poets in which they insulted each other employing as much metrical expertise, wit, and outrageous invention as they could muster. The earliest surviving flyting is between William Dunbar and Walter Kennedy for the court of James IV. The best is between Alexander Montgomerie and Polwart, presumably Sir Patrick Hume of Polwarth, composed for James VI. These court entertainments are related to the Occitan tenso* and the Welsh ymryson*. Most probably, other flytings were composed that have not survived, but evidence for flytings earlier than Dunbar and Kennedy is lacking. The antiquity of such contests in Scotland is presumed. In England, although they are not called flytings as such, we have examples of similar contests: John Skelton's "Against Garnishe" (lacking Garnishe's responses) and "The Contention betwixt [Thomas] Churchyard and Camel" (1560).

The term flyting has been extended by scholars to apply to boasting and slanging matches between speakers in literary works. It is often applied to the scene in Beowulf between the hero and Unferth. This scene and others like it in *epic and *saga should properly be called vaunts. They are often in the context of a court, but they are not ludic contests between poets as in the genuine flyting. There is a close contender, however, in the ON Lokasenna.

Invective matches are found in other langs. as well, Ar., Gr., and It. A kind of folk flyting is represented by the *dozens and boys' verbal dueling documented in Turkey.

■ H. M. Shire, Song, Dance and Poetry of the Court of Scotland under King James VI (1969); A. Dundes, J. W. Leach, and B. Özkök, "The Strategy of Turkish Boys' Dueling Rhymes, JAF 83 (1970); W. Parks, "Flyting, Sounding, Debate: Three Verbal Contest Genres," PoT 7:3 (1986); R. D. Abrahams, "Playing the Dozens," Mother Wit, ed. A. Dundes (1990); W. Parks, Verbal Dueling in Heroic Narrative (1990); The Edinburgh History of Scottish Literature, ed. I. Brown, T. Owen, S. Manning, and M. Pittock, vol. 1 (2006).

E. SLOTKIN

FOLIA. Sp. stanza form. A popular four-line variation of the seguidilla* probably related to a Port. dance-song form and normally expressing a nonsensical or ridiculous thought. The lines may be octosyllabic or shorter; if the lines are not of equal length, the even-numbered are generally the shorter and very often—some think properly so—oxytonic. Its origin is unknown, but folías antedating 1600 are extant. The following example is from Miguel de Cervantes's Rinconete y Cortadillo:

> Por un sevillano
> rufo a lo valón
> tengo socarrado
> todo el corazón.

D. C. CLARKE

FOLK POETRY. See ORAL POETRY.

FOOT

I. Classical
II. Modern

I. Classical. The foot (Gr. pous, Lat. pes, Sanskrit mātrā ["measure"], Fr. pied, Ger. Takt or Versfuss) was a basic analytical unit for the prosodic analysis of verse in both the metrical and the musical theories of the ancient Greeks and Romans, consisting in metrical theory of *syllables and in musical theory of abstract temporal units (morae) measured in terms of the chronos prōtos (primary time). (See MORA; METRICI AND RHYTHMICI.) These fundamental elements—syllables or times—were organized at one higher level into *arsis and thesis, the two components, in most ancient accounts, of every metrical foot. (In Gr. theory, thesis refers to the metrically prominent part of the foot, arsis to the less prominent part.) Thus, combining two definitions given separately in the scholia to Hephaestion (2d c. CE), Marius Victorinus writes, "The foot is a definite measure of syllables, consisting of arsis and thesis, by which we recognize the form of the entire meter" (6.43, in Keil). Ancient theory classified feet according to (a) the ratio of the duration of arsis to thesis–musically in terms of primary times, metrically in terms of the values breve (◡) = 1, longum (–) = 2; and (b) the overall duration of the foot. A long syllable (longum) was one that ended with a long vowel, a diphthong, or a consonant; a short syllable (breve) ended with a short vowel. Although the duration of long syllables in speech was probably not exactly twice that of short syllables, this ratio was assumed for formal purposes, so that a *dactyl (– ◡ ◡), e.g., could be considered temporally equivalent to a *spondee (– –). The scheme for the simple feet of Gr. verse is as follows:

genos ison (1:1):
tetrasemic:	anapaest	(⏑ ⏑ –)
	dactyl	(– ⏑ ⏑)
genos diplasion (2:1, 1:2):
trisemic:	iamb	(⏑ –)
	trochee	(– ⏑)
hexasemic:	ionic a minore	(⏑ ⏑ – –)
	ionic a maiore	(– – ⏑ ⏑)
genos hēmiolion (3:2, 2:3):
pentasemic:	first paeon	(– ⏑ ⏑ ⏑)
	cretic	(– ⏑ –)
	bacchiac	(⏑ – –)

Other ratios are also found, and an alogos (Gr., "irrational") ratio, not expressible in terms of the lower integers, was also asserted by some.

Unfortunately, we do not have extant any complete exposition of ancient theory with illustrative analyses of extended passages of *lyric verse; even in antiquity, there were various not completely compatible accounts. Attempts in the 19th c. to interpret ancient theory and apply it to lyric verse, particularly to *aeolic meters, did not achieve satisfactory results. In the 20th c., cl. prosodists have generally rejected both the reality and the descriptive utility of the foot in favor of units defined strictly in terms of *responsion such as the *metron (double the length of the simple feet in some meters and indistinguishable in others) and the *colon (a longer metrical sequence having continuity). Cola, in particular, have been argued for both on metrical grounds and on grounds beyond the strictly metrical, such as their correspondence to repeated lexical/syntactic formulas.

There are good structural and historical reasons to pay attention to metra and cola. The rejection of the foot, however, has tended to sever metrical theory from its linguistic basis. The foot has become more established in phonological theory and cognitive psychology even as it has been called into question in literary studies of ancient and mod. versification. The foot, or something like it, is a principal unit of rhythmic organization in human behavior and perception (see discussion below). Verse achieves greater regularity than speech by constraining the number and sequence of permissible feet.

II. Modern. Ren. prosodists and critics, in reaction against medievalism, looked back to cl. antiquity for doctrine on the making of poetry. Many speak of verse's being organized only by syllable count "with some regard of the accent" (Philip Sidney, Defence of Poesy), but Brit. schoolchildren from Shakespeare through S. T. Coleridge learned to scan and write the forms of the Lat. feet at school, and John Donne in "A Litanie" speaks of "rhythmique Feete." As George T. Wright shows, in the early Tudor poets, one finds lines that are clearly composed by feet: they have disyllabic segmentation to excess. But the better poets soon discovered that the verse paradigms they learned at school could be manipulated at a higher level of sophistication; gradually, they began to write lines that could be composed, and understood, without such mechanistic rules yet that could still be scanned—though less simply—by such rules. Scholarly treatises on prosody continued for centuries to teach the doctrine of feet.

Further, from about 1550 to at least 1900, most Western metrical theories derived from *classical prosody, as that was reinterpreted in successive eras–particularly in the 19th c., which saw the rise of cl. philology in Germany. Common to all these theories was the presumption that, in metrical lines, syllables are to be taken together in groups, as metrical units; such units occupy a position in the theory midway between the metrical position (or syllable) and the *line. Both the concept of the metrical foot itself and the particular names and forms of the feet were taken directly from Gr., all of them being redefined as the accentual equivalents of the identical patterns in the quantitative prosody of cl. Gr. Thus, the Gr. *iamb, short + long (⏑ –), was reformulated as unstressed + stressed (x /). The Gr. notion of the metron in certain meters was ignored (as were, by and large, other cl. concepts such as the colon, the anceps syllable, and brevis in longo). Many prosodists continued to talk of longs and shorts—indeed, for centuries—but, in fact, stress and/or syllable count was the basis for most Western meters by about the 4th c. CE. Whether the foot was an element of poetic composition or merely of analysis—i.e., *scansion—remained an issue of dispute.

Classicizing prosodists in the 19th and early 20th cs., such as J. M. Schipper and G. Saintsbury, tried to map the forms and rules of cl. prosody directly onto Eng., resulting in the foot-substitution model, in which variations from a basic meter are described as substitutions of alternative feet, such as *"trochaic substitutions" in the *iambic line. Thus, highly complex patterns can be made by stringing together various feet. It is apparently this model that T. S. Eliot refers to in "Reflections on Vers Libre" (1917) when he writes, "Any line can be divided into feet and accents. The simpler metres are a repetition of one combination, perhaps a long and a short, or a short and a long syllable, five times repeated. There is, however, no reason why, within the single line, there should be any repetition; why there should not be lines (as there are) divisible only into feet of different types." Versions of this model—sometimes more linguistically sophisticated—are still widely used in poetry handbooks and textbooks.

A. Arguments for the Foot. After 1920, in the general repudiation by theorists of classicizing theories, a reaction abetted by the rising influence of *free verse and other footloose prosodies, the concept of the metrical foot was called into question. Given the grounds on which it had been justified, such suspicion was deserved. Nevertheless, there are several grounds on which one might yet argue that the foot is a useful component of a theory of *meter, and of Eng. meters in particular:

(1) Lit. hist. As mentioned above, the majority of poets in Eng. for several centuries were schooled in foot-based theories. Some knowledge of the concepts they were taught might help readers to understand these poets' practice and certainly would help to understand their prose writing about poetics.

(2) The very concept of meter as *measure, the measuring out of the flow of words in the line. Measuring requires a unit by which the measuring is done, like the bar lines on a musical score, the dividing lines of which are fictitious but useful. An analogy: the wall of a natural-log house may be 14 feet high and composed of 12 logs, no two of which are the same diameter. If the wall is taken apart, the logs will still have some kind of meaningful existence, but the feet will not. Yet it may still be useful to refer to 14 feet rather than 12 logs. Similarly, words, morphemes, and (to some extent) syllables are recognizable units independent of metrical context, while feet are not. Yet many have found the terminology of feet useful in describing poetic lines.

(3) Comparative metrics. There is at least one metrical unit between the levels of syllable and line in many of the verse systems of the world. These units, naturally, vary in positioning and scope. In the romance prosodies, such as Fr., the units are formed at the phrasal level rather than the word level. In Gr. and Sanskrit prosody, even theorists who do not use feet typically refer to some units, such as metra or cola, that can be combined into lines. In recent years, foot theory has even been applied to "accentual" OE prosody (e.g., by Geoffrey Russom) and to putatively syllabic verse forms such as Welsh englyn penfyr* (by Nigel Fabb).

(4) The structure of lang. itself. Several 20th- and 21st-c. linguists have developed the concept of a foot (or "stress group") as a basic unit of *rhythm, as a domain in which certain phonological rules apply and, in some cases, as a unit of information, in nonpoetic as well as poetic lang. In Great Britain, David Abercrombie, followed by M.A.K. Halliday, designated the foot as a stress followed by one or more optional unstressed syllables, one or more feet then comprising a "tone group," the last of which (usually) bears the sentence accent. In the U.S., Mark Liberman and Alan Prince, Elisabeth Selkirk, and many others developed a similar concept of the foot in phonology, only over a slightly smaller domain: Selkirk also distinguishes a "prosodic word." Indeed, much of the terminology of traditional verse theory, incl. the foot, has been adopted and adapted, from the 1970s onward, by the theories of autosegmental and metrical phonology and more recently by optimality theory. Researchers point out that many unrelated langs. tend to have stress on alternating syllables, so that one stressed and one unstressed syllable form a binary foot; ternary systems are rarer (although these claims are shored up by classifying some unstressed syllables as "extrametrical"). This phonological foot, though defined quite differently from Saintsbury's foot (e.g., it is frequently defined in terms of morae instead of or in addition to syllables), is now widely accepted as a unit in phonological theory–though how it applies to domains as large as a long line of verse is less well agreed upon.

(5) Perceptual psychology and cognitive science. There is evidence suggesting that segmentation or grouping is a natural process manifested in the perception of any rhythmic series. When subjects in experiments are presented with a sequence of identical or different stimuli ranging from roughly 0.5 to 8 times per second, they rapidly (and involuntarily) perceive and learn a rhythmic pattern. The most favored foot structure in such patterns has two differentiated elements. Acoustic stimuli that are differentiated are perceived as strong and weak on the basis of their differences in intensity, duration, and frequency. Trochaic feet are perceived if the strong element is louder and iambic feet if it is (significantly) longer. Linguistic feet also have some degree of temporal regularity; though they are not truly isochronous, they may seem so to listeners (see ISOCHRONISM OR ISOCHRONY). Thus, verse, like lang. and all information-delivery processes, segments the sound stream into units that are set in a relation of correspondence or equivalence with one another. Segmentation and repetition have come to seem fundamental cognitive and aesthetic processes.

Such segmentation does not have to be defined in terms of feet; e.g., some theorists prefer to use the musical terminology of *beats and offbeats, while others have seen the verse line as a string of weak and strong positions or as a "grid" of more and less strongly stressed syllables. However, such theories often wind up indirectly incl. similar kinds of principles, units, and rules (sometimes under different names); e.g., grid theory has evolved to include "bracketing" of feet and larger units. Without some form of segmentation, it would be impossible to distinguish regular or periodic metrical sequences (those that consistently repeat similar units) from irregular ones (those that do not).

B. Types. Assuming we call our units feet, the next question is how many types of feet there are, which entails the question of what principles are used to construct the foot. Even well into the 20th c., classicizing prosodists were inclined to admit nearly as many feet in Eng. poetry as in Gr.: Saintsbury lists 21 feet; as late as 1979, Paul Fussell admits six but thinks "it does no harm to be acquainted with" 11 others. But the great majority recognized, by the late 19th c., only four to six types: these included the two commonest binary feet—iambs (x/) and trochees (/x)—and ternary feet—dactyls (/xx) and anapests (xx/)—with the ternary feet far less common than the binary; and some metrists added spondees (//) and *pyrrhics (xx). The nature of Eng. phonology makes verse forms based primarily on spondees and pyrrhics impossible, but these units sometimes play a role in foot-substitution approaches to meter. A few other feet, such as *amphibrachs (x/x), have been used as the basis of metrical composition, but more rarely. Some mid-20th-c. structural linguists admitted dozens or even thousands more types of feet by making distinctions on the basis of linguistic features such as whether the stresses fall in mono- or polysyllables, whether the stresses are natural or promoted-demoted, or other features (see DEMOTION, PROMOTION). But these schemes complicated the analysis unnecessarily by mixing various levels of structure. E.g., there is good evidence that metrical rules distinguish between stress in polysyllables and in monosyllables (lexical stress in polysyllables is often more strictly constrained in what positions in the line it can occupy), but this fact can be handled more elegantly by keeping the levels separate and adding simple rules stating where each type of stress can go or at what level of stress particular rules apply. Most current theories number the foot types in Eng. poetry somewhere between two and five, depending on the principles and criteria applied.

Many prosodists would argue that a foot must contain at least two elements that differ from one another. These arguments posit alternation as a fundamental feature of rhythm that operates at every level of the linguistic hierarchy and is, hence, a fundamental process in verse design at several levels of metrical organization. As W. S. Allen puts it, the "principle of alternation is crucial to the manifestation of prosodic pattern, since without it there is only formless succession." The two elements of the foot have been variously termed arsis and thesis in cl. metrics, lift and dip in Old Germanic and OE metrics, and strong and weak positions or else ictus* and nonictus in mod. metrics. These positions in the metrical pattern are typically filled by syllables in the actual line—usually one syllable each, but sometimes more, as specified by the rules of the particular meter.

Some early 20th-c. metrists proposed the "monosyllabic foot"—i.e., a stressed syllable alone without any attached unstressed syllables (or stress plus a hypothesized pause)—to account for irregularities such as extra syllables, missing syllables, or displaced stresses in lines. In this view, sequences such as /xx/ in the first four syllables of the Eng. iambic *pentameter are seen not as a trochaic substitution or inverted foot followed by an iamb, but as a monosyllabic foot followed by a trisyllabic substitution—or, if stress always comes first, as a dactyl followed by a monosyllabic foot. But on the principle of alternation or opposition of heterogeneous members, monosyllabic feet are apparently not legitimate feet at all, but a contradiction in terms (a point made as early as Aristoxenus: "one chronos cannot make a foot"). Equally inadmissible would be all feet with homogeneous members such as the spondee, pyrrhic, *molossus, and *tribrach.

However, other metrists have suggested ways in which monosyllabic feet could play a role. First, if feet are based on morae rather than syllables (as they frequently are in metrical phonology), a two-mora (heavy) syllable can be a foot without violating the alternation principle. Second, temporalist poetic theorists such as George Stewart and Derek Attridge have argued that pauses corresponding to "implied offbeats," somewhat like musical rests, may follow a stress or beat to maintain rhythm in some circumstances, notably that of stress clash (roughly speaking, adjacent stressed syllables). Although Attridge's analysis avoids using feet, there is no a priori reason stress plus lengthening or silence could not form a two-part, strong-weak foot. This view is consistent with phonological theories claiming extra time added in such positions (even if the pause is much shorter than an actual unstressed syllable) and with poetic lines in which an unstressed syllable seems to be missing. E.g., in Shakespeare's "Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! Rage! Blow!" (King Lear), the expectation of iambic pentameter can only be met if we allow "Rage!" and "Blow!" to be feet by themselves. In P. B. Shelley's "To The Night," the line "Thy brother death came, and cried" (cited by Attridge) occurs in an iambic *tetrameter context; the line that rhymes with it is the regular eight-syllable "Thy sweet child Sleep, the filmy-eyed." These lines are congruent if we alleviate stress clash by hearing an "implied offbeat" (x) between "death" and "came:"

Thy bro | ther death | (x) came, | and cried

Thy sweet | child Sleep, | the fil | my-eyed

Foot-substitution theory deals with such lines only awkwardly. Popular verse such as *ballads, *nursery rhymes, and advertising *jingles provides many similar examples, as (less obviously) does literary iambic verse. Even where the syllable count is regular, as in Alexander Pope's pentameter line "And the pressed watch return'd a silver sound," Stewart argues that scanning the first four syllables as a trisyllabic foot (*anapest) followed by a monosyllabic foot corresponds better to readers' actual experience of the line than calling them two iambs (one stressed weakly, one strongly).

Monosyllabic feet aside, if every foot must contain just one stress along with its contiguous unstressed syllables, there can be only five types of binary and ternary feet: iamb, trochee, dactyl, anapest, amphibrach. But the latter three are very difficult to differentiate in running series, esp. when line ends are irregular and unpredictable: in mod. verse, the sequence x/xx/xx/xx/ may be felt as anapestic tetrameter with a missing first syllable, but it can also be amphibrachic with a missing final syllable—that perception depends on the larger context and on word and phrase boundaries in the line. In practice, all ternaries are effectively one meter, esp. in relatively long lines. The same argument has been made about the two binary meters, and the frequency of lines such as /x/x/x/ or /x/x/x/x/ in both iambic and trochaic contexts lends this claim some support. In that case, there are basically two types of meter in Eng.: *binary and ternary. However, Halpern (followed by others) has suggested that iambic differs from all trochaic, ternary, and accentual meters in that these latter do not admit of modulation. For him, there are only two classes of mod. meters, iambic and accentual. (See ACCENTUAL VERSE.)

C. Applicability. We have seen evidence that the foot can be more than a mere device for scansion, that it is a principle of structure. If, in fact, the foot is a fundamental element of rhythm, then it must play a role in both the composition and performance of rhythmic poetry. However, this does not necessarily mean that poets consciously think of feet as they compose, much less that readers think of feet as they perform aloud. One difficulty is that traditional foot-substitution scansion works only on regular verse. If irregularity exceeds a certain threshold, the idea of substitution becomes nonsensical, and we must turn to other ways of describing the rhythm. Another problem is that this device naturally tends to become reified, so that readers (and even poets) may come to believe that poets actually make verse foot by foot, laboring to find a dactyl or a molossus rather than to write rhythmic lines and sequences of lines. (Eliot remarks, in "The Music of Poetry," that "a study of anatomy will not teach you how to make a hen lay eggs.") The fact that feet are, arguably, one component of the verse structure does not tell us whether the poet composed, or the performer should recite, with feet in mind.

See ACCENT, COUPE, EQUIVALENCE, PERIOD, QUANTITY, RELATIVE STRESS PRINCIPLE, RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM, SYNAPHEIA, VARIABLE FOOT.

■ Classical: Keil; Wilamowitz; L. Nougaret, Traité de métrique latine classique (1948); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); Koster; Dale; W. S. Allen, Accent and Rhythm (1973); J. Halporn, M. Ostwald, and T. G. Rosenmeyer, The Meters of Greek and Latin Poetry, rev. ed. (1980); West; A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, Language and Metre (1984); A. S. Gratwick, Plautus: Menaechmi (1993); A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, The Prosody of Greek Speech (1994); Gasparov, History; L.P.E. Parker, The Songs of Aristophanes (1997); J. Parsons, "A New Approach to the Saturnian Verse," TAPA 129 (1999); G. Nagy, Homer's Text and Language (2004); C. Golston and T. Riad, "The Phonology of Greek Lyric Meter," JL 41.1 (2005); C. Questa, La Metrica di Plauto e Terenzio (2007).

■ Modern: G. Saintsbury, A History of English Prosody (1906–10), and Historical Manual of English Prosody (1910); Schipper, History; G. Stewart, The Technique of English Verse (1958); M. Halpern, "On the Two Chief Metrical Modes in English," PMLA 77 (1962); Chatman; C. L. Stevenson, "The Rhythm of English Verse," JAAC 28 (1970); W. S. Allen, Accent and Rhythm (1973); M. Shapiro, Asymmetry (1976); R. Jakobson, "Linguistics and Poetics" (1960), rpt. in Selected Writings, vol. 5 (1988); P. Fussell, Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (1979); Scott; Brogan, sect. E; D. Attridge, The Rhythms of English Poetry (1982); G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); J. A. Goldsmith, Autosegmental and Metrical Phonology (1990); Cureton; B. Hayes, Metrical Stress Theory (1995); K. Hanson and P. Kiparsky, "A Parametric Theory of Poetic Meter," Language 72.2 (1996); G. Russom, "Beowulf" and Old Germanic Meter (1998); M. Kinzie, A Poet's Guide to Poetry (1999); T. Steele, All the Fun's in How You Say a Thing (1999); N. Fabb, Language and Literary Structure (2002); N. Fabb and M. Halle, Meter in Poetry (2008).

A. M. DEVINE; L. D. STEPHENS; T.V.F. BROGAN; G. B. COOPER

FORM. As a term for the multiple systems that shape as well as convey information, form is a dynamic subject in philosophy and metaphysics, linguistic theory, literary analysis, visual and material arts, and culture at large. The OED gives 22 definitions, with subcategory refinements and variations. Even with a focus on poetry and poetics, coherent definition is difficult. Poetic form used to be binary: what was not content or context; the shape rather than the substance; any element or event of lang. not translatable, paraphrasable, or reducible to information. The binary entails a distinction between preexisting origin and material result, between determination and effect, between idea or feeling and its realization. Yet lang. theory from the 18th c. on (and poetic practice well before) has been challenging these binaries, most forcefully with the notion of constitutive form—form as active producer, not just passive register, of meaning.

To appeal to the Lat. root forma is suggestive but inconclusive, for it reproduces the question, indicating both an ideal abstraction (correlative to the Gr. eidos, "primary idea") and a material appearance or shape. Plato and Aristotle often stand for this difference: form as the unchanging, structuring principle; form as the structure of a particular instance. In the Platonic view, famously articulated in The Republic, bk. 10, form is a transcendent idea and essential ideal, distinct from merely suggestive material instantiations. For Aristotle, form is immanent, emergent, and coactive with its expressive materials—the several cases from which a general typology may be deduced. Platonic form is authorized by transcendent origin; Aristotelian form is realized in process, devel., and achievement.

Prose form may refer to macrostructures of argument, narrative, plot, or schemes of fictive organization; to the length and array of its composite units (chapters, paragraphs, sentences); or to the formation of the sentence by patterns of syntax, rhythm and sound, image and figure. Prose can be "poetic" in these aspects (and there is a genre of *prose poem); conversely, poetry may sound prosaic (as some complain about *blank verse), relaxing formal definition to evoke conversation or a pre-formal flux of consciousness. There are, moreover, composite forms: interplays of prose and verse, of visual and verbal forms. William Blake's pages show all this, as well as a visual poetics of verbal forms: the sublime walls of words, the semiotics of block letters and free-flowing script. Another form is the shaped poem (see VISUAL POETRY), such as George Herbert's "Altar" and "Easter Wings," with the poetic lines organized into a visual shape, to signify a close connection of informing subject and expressive form.

What distinguishes poetic form is the *line that is a poet's determination, not a compositor's. Lineforms may involve the suspense of *enjambment and the punctuation of blank space at the line's end—as in William Wordsworth's "There was a Boy": "in that silence, while he hung / Listening." While the compositor of the second ed. of Lyrical Ballads (in which this verse was first published) set the lines of its new Preface, the poet shaped this line and decided where to end it (here, to recruit the pause and cut to the suspense of "hung."). Blake is among those poets for whom even hyphenation can be poetic form, springing semantically pertinent syllables at a line's end, sometimes flouting standard practice ("Here alone I in books formd of me-/-tals")—this cut set to spring "me" from the medium. The form of a poetic line can follow, press against, or overturn metrical forms and trads.; it can be arranged in stanzas (regular or not, traditional or innovative), and play across end-rhyme patterns and rhyme fields. In all its events, poetic form signals a relation to trad.—whether using or refusing it, whether honoring or violating decorum, whether endorsing standards or applying a new signature. There is a trad. of auto-referential poetic forms, such as sonnets on the *sonnet.

Mindful of cl. theories, and with immediate debts to A. W. Schlegel, S. T. Coleridge distinguishes "mechanic form" from "organic form" (see ORGANICISM): "mechanic form" is the impression of "a pre-determined form, not necessarily arising out of the properties of the material," while "organic form" is "innate; it shapes, as it develops itself from within, and the fullness of its devel. is one and the same with the perfection of its outward form. Such as the life is, such is the form" (Lectures on Shakespeare). G. M. Hopkins's poetics of *inscape and instress evolve from this distinction. Like Hopkins, Coleridge reflects, even dramatizes, organic poetics in his practice. He may work a received form against the emotional and dramatic demands of the event at hand (his sonnet "To Asra" plays its "overflowing" passion across enjambments that challenge the orders of rhyme); or he may make the mechanics part of the meaning: the poetic forms of repetition that plague The Rime of the Ancient Mariner correlate the endless repetitions of the mariner's existential fate. Or he may use shifts in meter for dramatic effects, as in the leveling of a curse in "Christabel" (see CHRISTABEL METER).

Lang. itself is both a received form and material for transformation. Invoking the complexities of forma, Coleridge correlates outward shape with shaping principle, contingency with determinate forces, to theorize a living process materially realizing itself: "'Forma formans per formam formatam translucens' [forming form through formed form shining] is the definition and perfection of ideal art" (Biographia Literaria); "Something there must be to realize the form, something in and by which the forma informans reveals itself" ("Principles of Genial Criticism"). Formal practices are also contextually charged. In the era of the French Revolution, a discourse of "organic form"—seemingly liberated from prescription to follow the pulse of nature—could be invoked for principles of liberal education or could be harnessed to conservative ideology, to defend a system of unequal but complementary subjects on the model of nature. Thus, Edmund Burke on the hierarchy of classes, of rank and servitude stated in Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790): "Our political system is placed in a just correspondence and symmetry with the order of the world . . . moulding together the great mysterious incorporation of the human race . . . preserving the method of nature in the conduct of the state"; "The characteristic essence of property, formed out of the combined principles of its acquisition and conservation, is to be unequal."

Choices of poetic form signify, too. To write in *ballad form is to evoke an alliance, desired or ironized, with oral and popular culture; a *Spenserian stanza conjures Spenserian "romance." The difficulty of this last form, moreover, flaunts a poet's skill, as do other famously intricate forms, such as *terza rima or the *sestina and its multiples. A first-person blank-verse lyric recalls the soliloquies of William Shakespeare's tragic heroes, as John Milton knew when he dictated the great, anguished meditation on his blindness at the head of Paradise Lost, bk. 3. Milton's epic blank verse also bears a politics of form, which he advertised in 1674 as a recovery of "ancient liberty" from "the troublesom and modern bondage of Rimeing" for the sake of "apt Numbers, fit quantity of Syllables, and the sense variously drawn out from one Verse into another." To write a blank-verse *epic in the 19th c. is to declare not only a release from the regime of 18th-c. *couplets but an affection (with aesthetic or political prestige) for Miltonic poetics. When Wordsworth wrote about shepherd Michael in epic blank verse (rather than in a ballad), his challenge to decorum struck some contemporaries as unpoetic, ludicrous, or worse: the poetic wing of the French Revolution in advancing the lower classes to higher forms. But the quiet dignity brought tears to Matthew Arnold's Victorian eyes.

In 1818, William Hazlitt took a satiric perspective on the patent politics of mod. poetics: "rhyme was looked upon as a relic of the feudal system, and regular metre was abolished along with regular government" ("Living Poets"). Even so, such allegories are slippery. By 1814, Tory Wordsworth was writing a blank-verse epic (The Excursion), and Liberal Lord Byron was hewing to rhyme: "Prose poets like blank-verse, I'm fond of rhyme, / Good workmen never quarrel with their tools," he wrote in *ottava rima (Don Juan, 1819). In 1816, political liberals such as Leigh Hunt were wielding couplets with cheeky avant-garde flash. Even the affection in the 18th c. for orderly heroic couplets is no clear signifier: it may convey a neoclassical ethos (aesthetic, political, social) of balance and symmetry; or it may pose a highly wrought artificial contrast to the messiness of material life in its economic turmoil, political intrigues and perils, and unrelenting urban filth. A dramatic *monologue arrayed in *pentameter couplets, yet with rhythms and enjambments that mute meter and rhyme, stages an artifice of subtly crafted casual conversation—the canny form that Robert Browning devised for a duke speaking with affable condescension to a count's envoy about his last and (he hopes) next duchess.

When, in 1951, Cleanth Brooks contended that "form is meaning," he was holding faith with "the primary concern of criticism": "the problem of unity—the kind of whole which the literary work forms or fails to form, and the relation of the various parts to each other in building up this whole" ("Formalist Critic"). Yet Paul de Man saw in this "problem" a blind but incipient theorizing of form as indeterminacy, a "rhetoric of temporality" in which form can never achieve organic completion or totality ("Temporality"). As the dynamic register and producer of tensions, ironies, and contradictions, form, to de Man, necessarily subverts the "totalizing principle" in the mind of the poet and reader to open into a field of active, ceaseless negotiation ("Form and Intent").

Even critics such as Terry Eagleton in 1976, who tended to indict the stabilizing allure of literary forms for recasting "historical contradictions into ideologically resolvable form," have been rethinking the charge. By 1986, Eagleton was admitting that while a literary text is "constrained" by formal principles, it can also put these into question—a dynamic "most evident in a poem, which deploys words usually to be found in the lexicon, but by combining and condensing them generates an irreducible specificity of force and meaning." By 2007, he was writing about poetic form in terms with which Brooks (though with different social poetics) might concur:

> Form and content are inseparable in this sense—that literary criticism typically involves grasping what is said in terms of how it is said . . . . this seems true above all in poetry—a literary genre which could almost be defined as one in which form and content are intimately interwoven. It is as though poetry above all discloses the secret truth of literary writing: that form is constitutive of content and not just a reflection of it. Tone, rhythm, rhyme, syntax, assonance, grammar, punctuation, and so on, are actually generators of meaning, not just containers of it. To modify any of them is to modify meaning itself.

In theory, crit., and poetic practice, distillations of form from contexts, contents, and contingencies of event are difficult to manage because form is meaningful and meanings are formed. Lang. shaped in poetic form resists conscription as information for other frameworks of analysis; the forms are performative, informative, a context, a content, and an activity in reading. Our bibliographies are rife with titles that begin "Form and . . ." or "Forms of . . ." (often with the deconstructive pressure of a sequel, ". . . of Forms") or that pun into cognates of reform, deform, perform, inform, formal. Far from supplying a stable referent, form shapes the question, restlessly in play as a barometer of critical and theoretical investments. Form, poetry, and poetics seem destined to versatile, volatile, unpredictable transformations.

See FORMALISM, METER, NEW CRITICISM, RHYME, RUSSIAN FORMALISM, STANZA.

■ C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn (1947), and "The Formalist Critic," KR (1951); E. Cassirer, Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, trans. R. Manheim (1953); S. Langer, Feeling and Form (1953); K. Burke, Philosophy of Literary Form (1957); G. Hartman, Beyond Formalism (1970); P. de Man, "The Rhetoric of Temporality" (1969) and essays in Blindness and Insight (1971); C. Ricks, "A pure organic pleasure from the lines," Essays in Criticism (1971); Hollander; T. Eagleton, Criticism and Ideology (1976); P. Fussell, Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (1979); M. Perloff, The Poetics of Indeterminacy (1981); R. Barthes, The Responsibility of Forms, trans. R. Howard (1982); W. Keach, Shelley's Style (1984); J. H. Miller, The Linguistic Moment (1985); T. Eagleton, William Shakespeare (1986); D. Attridge, Peculiar Language (1988); J. Hollander, Melodious Guile (1988), and Rhyme's Reason (1989); The Politics of Poetic Form, ed. C. Bernstein (1990); M. Jay, Force Fields (1993); D. Attridge, "Literary Form and the Demands of Politics," in Aesthetics and Ideology, ed. G. Levine (1994)—also essays therein by Keach and Wolfson; P. Hobsbaum, Metre, Rhythm and Verse Form (1996); S. Wolfson, Formal Charges (1997); I. Armstrong, The Radical Aesthetic (2000); R. Strier, "How Formalism Became a Dirty Word, and Why We Can't Do without It," in Renaissance Literature and Its Formal Engagements (2002); D. Donoghue, Speaking of Beauty (2003); W. Keach, Arbitrary Power (2004); C. Levine, "Strategic Formalism," and H. Tucker, "Tactical Formalism," Victorian Studies (2006); P. Alpers, "Renaissance Lyrics and Their Situations," NLH 38 (2007); T. Eagleton, How to Read a Poem (2007); A. Leighton, On Form: Poetry, Aestheticism, and the Legacy of a Word (2007); M. Levinson, "What is New Formalism?" PMLA 122 (2007); Reading for Form, ed. S. Wolfson and M. Brown (2007).

S. J. WOLFSON

FORMALISM

I. Theory and Criticism
II. Poetry

I. Theory and Criticism. In crit. and theory, as in aesthetics, formalism signifies a concern with a work's formal features, not only its representational or thematic elements. For Brooks, "a good poem is an object in which form and content can be distinguished but cannot really be separated" (The Well Wrought Urn, "Afterword"). In the extreme formalism of the Eng. artist and critic Roger Fry, attention to form is indeed separated from and may even displace issues of content and meaning (Fried); Fry's elder contemporary, J.A.M. Whistler, titled his portrait of his mother Arrangement in Grey and Black. But for most formalist critics, the isolation of formal properties is only a necessary first step; the second step is to interpret those properties so as to connect their signifying power with the meanings produced by semantic and thematic elements. A work's form cannot finally be separated from its meaning because form itself, when interpreted, is an essential source of meaning.

Not confined to a single critical school, formalism is most closely associated with the linguistically oriented Rus. formalists and their efforts to define features and effects of poetic lang. (see RUSSIAN FORMALISM); with Am. New Critics' concern to eschew paraphrase and disclose the distinctive lang., structure, and organic unity of poems (see NEW CRITICISM); and with the Fr. pedagogical trad. of explication de texte*. Formalism's technique of detailed textual attention—*close reading—also links it with the philologically based crit. of E. R. Curtius and esp. Erich Auerbach and Leo Spitzer (who place little emphasis on works as artistic wholes) and, more loosely still, with the trad. of Ger. stylistics (Karl Vossler and Emil Staiger, among others). Close reading is also a feature of deconstruction, which rejects the New Critics' quest for textual unity in favor of the complex, often dissonant processes of signification, and of *New Historicism, which applies close reading to literary texts but also to nonliterary documents and cultural beliefs, practices, and objects—incl. material objects. While most of these modes of analysis employ techniques of close reading, however, New Criticism and contemp. neoformalism focus intently on the lang. and meaning of texts understood as formally unified wholes and complex organizations of meaning.

The New Critics, building on T. S. Eliot, I. A. Richards, and William Empson (preceded by S. T. Coleridge and, at a great distance, Aristotle), put formalist attention to lang. in the service of literary interpretation according to the following assumptions. The sources of a poem and the responses of its readers should be subordinated to examination of the literary object itself. Poetic lang. is rich, complex, and paradoxical, and poems are organic—but tensional—unities, "ironic" in Brooks's special sense of acknowledging contradictory alternatives to their formulations or attitudes, much as Andrew Marvell's poetry "involves . . . a recognition, implicit in the expression of every experience, of other kinds of experience which are possible" (Eliot). These verbal and thematic tensions intimate a view of experience that is "mature": it is complex, it refuses simplifications or slogans, and its affirmations fully acknowledge contrary experience and counteraffirmations. The poem, moreover, participates in the experience it represents, and as Wimsatt and others argue, is a verbal analogue of that experience rather than a mere reference to it.

Brooks and Ransom differ significantly on the concept of unity and on the poem's relation to the world. For Brooks, the poem's details, however recalcitrant, are finally absorbed into its overarching structure; the poet's task "is finally to unify experience." And the poem—"a simulacrum" of that unified reality—is "an experience rather than any mere statement about experience" (Brooks). In contrast, Ransom imagines a poem as "a loose logical structure with an irrelevant texture," a texture consisting of particulars that "the poem's logical argument or prose sense cannot fully absorb" (Ransom). The refractoriness of these textural elements mirrors the resistance of concrete, worldly particulars to modes of instrumental discourse (abstract, generalizing, scientific) that would assimilate and ontologically tyrannize over those particulars rather than know them for their own sake (Ransom 1938).

Starting in the last decades of the 20th c., formalist crit. has seen a resurgence, chiefly in the Am. academy and concerning Eng.-lang. poetry. While they are not organized as a school or movement, and some would resist labeling their work at all, recent neoformalists generally agree to reject or revise a number of New Critical assumptions, particularly the belief in organic unity, in a distinctively literary or poetic lang., in the intrinsic character of textual meaning, and in the text as a "given" object. Instead, they pursue close reading without the assumption of organic form or explore deconstructive and other models of textual heterogeneity and disunity or posit unity as an enabling fiction rather than an empirically verifiable quality—creating "makeshift, contingent wholes in order to study [literary and] cultural events and patterns" (Levine).

A similar move—positing a text's literariness or assuming that critical attention itself confers literariness—replaces the New Critical belief in intrinsic differences between literary and nonliterary texts; literary meaning, too, is the product of framing a text in a way that generates such meaning. Poetic speaker or *persona, *intention, and reference are similarly reconceived by neoformalists. In contrast to once-controversial arguments that a text's meaning can be only its author's intended meaning, some neoformalists extend the New Critical argument that speaker and intention (like audience) are internal rather than external phenomena. Others view intention, and even reference, as generated by a text on the model of back formation, a ling. process analogous to the narrative "prequel": enthuse produced by back formation from enthusiasm, e.g., or (comically) gruntled from disgruntled (Štekauer; Bogel). On this model, speaker, intention, and referent do not preexist—but are generated by—the text itself.

Addressing the reiterated charge that formalism ignores historical and social reality and retreats into an aestheticism the politics of which is quietist or worse, one strand of neoformalism explicitly links the study of literary form with hist., politics, and culture. Wolfson argues that "the articulation of form" should be understood "not merely as a product of social evaluations, but as a social evaluation itself, one of the texts in which culture is written." For Wolfson, "Romanticism's involvement with poetic form . . . participates in central discussions of its historical moment" (Wolfson). But if some critics view contemp. formalism as capable of revitalizing critical modes traditionally opposed—or immune—to formalist inquiry, they often refuse to assume that formalism is ancillary to historical crit. Instead, many contemp. practitioners see formal reading as a mode of historical or political crit. or vice versa and explore the convergence among these critical modes in ways that would have been unheard of in earlier formalisms.

Neoformalism has also fostered a rethinking of Kantian and post-Kantian aesthetics. One version of this rethinking concerns feeling, particularly pleasure—e.g., the possibility of staging affective identificatory moments between reader and text (Altieri). Another version moves toward the cognitive, the moral, and the constitution of human agency. It contends that "aesthetic experience is 'formal' because it provides the form for conceptual, 'objective' thought or cognition" and that "aesthetic form" contributes to "the possibilities of critical thought and agency," incl. moral agency (Kaufman; see also Knapp and Levinson).

If neoformalists share a single, fundamental belief, it is that there can be no meaning without form, that "formalism is a matter . . . of refusing to reduce reading entirely to the elucidation, essentially the paraphrase, of themes—theoretical, ideological, or humanistic" (Rooney).

II. Poetry. In virtually all eras and langs. until the 20th c., verse has been distinguished from prose by formal patterns of *meter, *rhyme, and other audible repeating structures of lang. (see VERSE AND PROSE). Perhaps because these repeating structures were previously so ubiquitous as to seem inseparable from verse, in the West it was only with the romantic period and the growth of *free verse that strict adherence to certain kinds of repeating structures became a conscious strategy and formalism (the OED documents the first usage of the word in 1840) a manifest poetic attitude.

After a century dominated by free verse, the role of form in poetry has become more evident. Formal devices, esp. meter, help cultures pass on poetic trads. through generations, even without writing, by making poems easier to memorize (see ORAL POETRY). Furthermore, meter sensitizes readers to lang. because its repeating elements are meaningful in their lang. (Kiparsky). Thus, *accent, carrying lexical meaning in Ger. but not in Fr., is a prosodic element in Ger. poetry (not in Fr. poetry), while *tone, carrying lexical meaning in Chinese but not in Eng., is a prosodic element in Chinese poetry (not in Eng. poetry). While these mnemonic and educational functions are less essential in the age of contemp. technologies, they still contribute to the value and importance of form. A third function of form is neurological and may have therapeutic as well as aesthetic implications: the repetitions of poetic structure appeal to the right hemisphere—the part of the brain that processes music. In this context, formal poetry is closer to music than to free verse and prose, both of which appeal to the part of the brain that processes logical thought (Jaynes). The hypnotic effect of formal poetry has been recognized by writers on poetics from Plato to Coleridge, and contemp. science may prove it to have pragmatic value: research in progress indicates that autistic people learn meter and strict poetic forms such as the *villanelle readily and suggests that poetic forms have a calming effect on the right hemisphere of the brain (Savarese).

Today, the term formalism refers both to the writing and reading of poetry in a way that foregrounds the unique role of ling. structures. Recent proponents of form in poetry, incl. the group known as the New Formalists, who achieved prominence in the 1980s and 1990s, cite its unifying and pleasurable (whether lulling or stimulating) effects and its potential appeal to a wide circle of readers (see NEW FORMALISM). Some cite the emergence of audio technologies and performance poetry as a major factor in the resurgence of form (see PERFORMANCE). Whatever the reasons, while formal poems have been a small minority of those published in the U.S. in the late 20th and early 21st cs., interest in form began to accelerate in the late 1980s and early 1990s, with handbooks, anthols., special issues of jours., and conference panels devoted to poetic form burgeoning.

At the same time that poetics of the late 20th c. was ostensibly dominated by conflict between the stereotypes of progressive "free" and hidebound "formal" verse, avant-garde exploratory poetry, particularly the procedural poets influenced by the *Oulipo movement through Jackson Mac Low, became increasingly concerned with questions of form. As Cushman remarks, formalism in the poetry of the U.S. "implies a profound engagement with various aspects of poetic form, regardless of whether they are traditional or avant-garde." After all, the Language poets' emphasis on "opacity" had been anticipated by the Rus. formalist emphasis on the "defamiliarization" of lang. (see LANGUAGE POETRY).

While form in Eng.-lang. poetry before the 20th c. was dominated by rhymed or unrhymed *iambic poetry, contemp. poetic form is radically altered because of the influence of avant-garde movements and trads., the intervening century of free verse, and the borrowing of forms from many cultures. Fr. and Japanese forms in the early 20th c., followed by the *blues, décima, ghazal*, and pantun* in the later 20th c., have all broken open and widened the idea of form. Nonetheless, a basic inclusive definition of form still suffices. Simply put, a formal poem is a poem structured by the predictable repetition of a lang. element or elements. Any lang. element can be repeated to structure a poem. The more conspicuous the repeated lang. element, such as accent in *accentual verse, the more "formal" the poem feels to us. (It is important to distinguish between structure and decoration; any poem can be decorated by *alliteration, but only a poem in which alliteration forms a predictable skeleton, such as OE alliterative verse, is structured by it).

The same definition of form and formal devices also largely applies to langs. other than Eng., in most of which the mod. Western trend of free verse displaced traditional forms during the 20th c.—e.g., Ar., Chinese, Farsi, Fr., Ger., Japanese, It., Nepalese, Norwegian, Port., Rus., and Swedish. In some of these langs., formalism subsequently made a slight resurgence, though the New Formalist movement in the U.S. has remained more organized and widespread than its counterparts in other countries. Organized resurgences of poetic formalism outside the U.S. today include the Swedish-Norwegian retrogardist movement, centered on the jour. Aorta pub. in Gothenburg, Sweden, and similar movements in Belgium, Estonia, and Slovenia. Where there is no organized movement, there are often individual scholars or poets with strong interests in formalism who are aware of Am. New Formalism (Amaral, Fricker). In an era when consumer novelty and incessant growth are giving way globally to the need for more sustainable structures, formalism may soon uncover new analogues for poetic form.

See ESTILISTICA, FOOT, PROSODY, REFRAIN, RHYTHM, SCANSION, SOUND, VERSIFICATION.

■ Theory and Criticism: J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1938), and The New Criticism (1941); Brooks; W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954); Brooks and Warren; Wellek and A. Warren; G. Hartman, "Beyond Formalism," Beyond Formalism (1970); T. S. Eliot, "Andrew Marvell," Selected Prose of T. S. Eliot, ed. F. Kermode (1975); V. Erlich, Russian Formalism, 3d ed. (1981); A. Liu, "The Power of Formalism: The New Historicism," ELH 56.4 (1989); S. Knapp, Literary Interest: The Limits of Anti-Formalism (1993); W. J. Spurlin, "Afterword: An Interview with Cleanth Brooks," The New Criticism and Contemporary Literary Theory, ed. W. J. Spurlin and M. Fischer (1995); S. J. Wolfson, Formal Charges: The Shaping of Poetry in British Romanticism (1997); R. Kaufman, "Everybody Hates Kant: Blakean Formalism and the Symmetries of Laura Moriarty," MLQ 61.1 (2000); P. Štekauer, English Word-Formation (2000); Renaissance Literature and its Formal Engagements, ed. M. D. Rasmussen (2002); C. Altieri, The Particulars of Rapture (2003); D. Donoghue, Speaking of Beauty (2003); M. Fried, Roger Fry's Formalism (2004); C. Levine, "Strategic Formalism: Toward a New Method in Cultural Studies," Victorian Studies 48.4 (2006); E. Rooney, "Form and Contentment," Reading for Form, ed. S. J. Wolfson and M. Brown (2006); M. Levinson, "What Is New Formalism?" PMLA 122 (2007), http://sitemaker.umich.edu/pmla_article/home/.

■ Poetry: V. Nabokov, Notes on Prosody (1965); Readings in Russian Poetics, ed. L. Matejka and K. Pomorska (1971); P. Kiparsky, "The Role of Linguistics in a Theory of Poetry," Daedalus (Summer 1973); P. Fussell, Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (1975); J. Jaynes, The Origin of Consciousness in the Breakdown of the Bicameral Mind (1976); The Structure of Verse, ed. H. Gross (1979); G. Doczi, The Power of Limits (1981); P. Steiner, Russian Formalism (1984); P. Oppenheimer, The Birth of the Modern Mind (1989); S. Cushman, Fictions of Form in American Poetry (1993); F. Capra, Web of Life (1996); Meter in English, ed. D. Baker (1996); After New Formalism, ed. A. Finch (1999); V. Amaral, "Poesia contemporânea nos Estados Unidos," Revista Garrafa (2005), http://www.ciencialit.letras.ufrj.br/garrafa7/9.html; C. Fricker, Living Together (2006); J. Tuo, "Origin and Evolution of New Formalism in American Poetry," Journal of Tianjin Foreign Studies University 5 (2007); Multiformalisms, ed. A. Finch and S. Schultz (2008); R. Savarese, "The Lobes of Autobiography: Poetry and Autism," Stone Canoe 2 (2008).

F. BOGEL (THEORY AND CRITICISM); A. FINCH (FORM)

FORMULA. Formula, theme, and story pattern are the structural units of oral composition delineated by the *oral-formulaic theory. Originally defined by Milman Parry in The Traditional Epithet in Homer (1928) as "a group of words which is regularly employed under the same metrical conditions to express a given essential idea," the formula has since been identified as the "atom" of oral-traditional phraseology in dozens of trads. South Slavic oral epic singers (guslari; see GUSLAR), e.g., identify their reči (words) as no smaller than a whole or partial poetic line (Foley 2002), a composite formula unit. The formula is to be distinguished from simple repetition on the basis of its consummate usefulness to the composing oral poet, who employs it not because of its rhetorical effect but because it is part of the traditional poetic idiom bequeathed to him by generations of *bards, an idiom that combines the practical and immediate value of ready-made phraseology with the aesthetic advantage of enormous connotative force.

Although earlier scholars, chiefly the Ger. philologists of the 19th c., had referred in general terms to formulaic diction (esp. Sievers's Formelverzeichnis and the ling. analyses of Düntzer), Parry was the first to describe the existence and morphology of this phraseological element with precision, to demonstrate its tectonic function, and to link the traditional phrase with composition in oral performance. His studies of Homeric epic (1928–32) showed how traditional composition was made possible by the bard's ability to draw on an inherited repertoire of poetic *diction consisting of formulas and formulaic systems, each system comprising a set of formulas that share a common pattern of phraseology. Thus, he was able to illustrate, e.g., how prosêuda (addressed) could combine with 11 different nominal subjects to constitute a metrically correct measure in the hexameter line (selections below):

prosêuda +
dia theaôn	(divine of goddesses)
mantis amumôn	(blameless seer)
dios Achilleus	(divine Achilles)
dios Odusseus	(divine Odysseus)

Parry understood the poet's task not as a search for original diction but as a fluency in this traditional idiom—i.e., as the talent and learned ability to weave together the ready-made diction and, occasionally, new phraseology invented by analogy to existing formulas and systems to produce metrically correct hexameters in ancient Gr. epic. Having concentrated in his 1928 thesis principally on the noun-epithet formulas so typical of Homeric style, Parry then broadened his examination in 1930 and 1932 to consider all of Homer's diction. His analysis of the first 25 lines of the Iliad and the Odyssey, which show graphically how Homer depended on formulas and systems to make his poems, remains a locus classicus for the interpretation of ancient Gr. epic lang.

These deductions were augmented as a result of fieldwork in the former Yugoslavia carried out by Parry and Albert Lord. Lord demonstrated that the Yugoslav guslar employed a similar formulaic idiom in the making of South Slavic epic, using stock phrases like lički Mustajbeže (Mustajbeg of the Lika), as well as more flexible formulaic systems, to compose his poem in oral *performance. With the benefit of a large corpus of unambiguously oral performances, incl. songs from the same guslar, Lord was able to show that virtually every line of South Slavic oral epic could be understood as a formula or member of a formulaic system.

During the period 1950–90, other scholars erected a series of comparative studies of the formula based on the Parry-Lord foundation, some treating ancient, med., and other ms. trads., others focusing on recoverable mod. trads.—e.g., Webber on formulaic frequency in the Sp. ballad; Magoun on the first 25 lines of Beowulf; Duggan on the OF chanson de geste*; Lord (1986) on comparative studies; Culley on the Bible; Edwards (1986, 1987) on ancient Gr.; Olsen (1986, 1987) on OE; Parks on ME; and Zwettler on Ar. Foley provides bibl. (1985) and detailed hist. (1988) of this 40-year period and its interdisciplinary roots.

Since the 1990s, scholars have shifted their attention to two linked problems. One concerns the discovery of ling. and metrical rules underlying the generation of formulas, which vary in structure and texture across different trads. (Foley 1990). Of special significance has been the question of whether the idiom is so predetermined and mechanical as to preclude verbal art as we know it, whether the oral poet can select esp. meaningful formulas appropriate to certain narrative situations and thus place his individual stamp on the composition, or whether some other aesthetic must be applicable. Increased emphasis has been placed on the contrasts as well as similarities among formulas, with attention to different trads., genres, and witnesses (e.g., mss. vs. acoustic recordings). Similarly, the referential fields of meaning commanded by formulas have been probed more deeply, a crucial direction of research because formulas and other structural units convey meaning not by abstract denotation but by idiomatic and metonymic reference to the trad. as a whole (Foley 1991 et seq.).

See ORAL POETRY.

■ H. Düntzer, Homerische Abhandlungen (1872); E. Sievers, "Formelverzeichnis," Heliand (1878); R. Webber, Formulistic Diction in the Spanish Ballad (1951); F. P. Magoun, "The Oral-Formulaic Character of Anglo-Saxon Narrative Poetry," Speculum 28 (1953); Parry; J. Duggan, The Song of Roland: Formulaic Style and Poetic Craft (1973); M. Nagler, Spontaneity and Tradition (1974); M. Zwettler, The Oral Tradition of Classical Arabic Poetry (1978); J. Foley, Oral-Formulaic Theory and Research (1985)—updates in Oral Tradition 3 (1988) and 12 (1997); R. Culley, "Oral Tradition and Biblical Studies," Oral Tradition 1 (1986); A. B. Lord, "Perspectives on Recent Work on the Oral Traditional Formula," Oral Tradition 1 (1986); W. Parks, "The Oral-Formulaic Theory in Middle English Studies," Oral Tradition 1 (1986); M. Edwards, "Homer and Oral Tradition: The Formula," Oral Tradition 1–2 (1986–87); A. Olsen, "Oral-Formulaic Research in Old English Studies," Oral Tradition 1–2 (1986–87); J. Foley, The Theory of Oral Composition (1988); Traditional Oral Epic (1990); Immanent Art (1991); The Singer of Tales in Performance (1995); and Homer's Traditional Art (1999); Lord; J. Foley, How to Read an Oral Poem (2002), and The Wedding of Mustajbey's Son Bećirbey as Performed by Halil Bajgorić (2004); Oral Tradition, http://journal.oraltradition.org.

J. M. FOLEY

FOUND POETRY. Found poetry, also called the poetry of citation or appropriation, is created by taking words, phrases, and, even more commonly, entire passages from other sources and reframing them as "poetry" by altering the context, frame, and format in which the source text appears. Found poetry is always intertextual: the intertext may be a recipe, a newspaper article, a personal letter, a document, an earlier poem, or—as is most common today—a text appropriated from the Internet (see INTERTEXTUALITY). The contemp. movement called *Flarf is essentially found poetry: its members "write through" Web sites or blogs, usually by following particular mathematical rules. Another contemp. movement using found text is the Fr. *Oulipo, which began its "researches" in the 1960s. Indeed, in the 21st c., it is difficult to find poetry that does not have some "found" component, the ne plus ultra exemplified by Kenneth Goldsmith's Day (2003), which is the transcription of the entire text of a single day's—September 1, 2000—New York Times from beginning to end, consolidating headlines, columns, and ads, so as to make one seamless and surprisingly novel text. Goldsmith himself calls such works "uncreative writing." His New York Trilogy of 2003–5 (Weather; Traffic; and Sports) is entirely found text: its transcription of the specific radio broadcasts in a given time period does not include a single word that the poet can call his own.

Found poetry originated in the early 20th c. in response to the new media and print technologies; it is often linked to *collage in the visual arts, although cubist collage still involves a blend of individual brushstroke and found text (see CUBISM). A more significant visual counterpart is the Duchampian Readymade—an "ordinary" object like a clothes hanger or comb that is recontextualized by its placement, framing, title, or caption. In France, the found poem or objet trouvé was popular with the pre–World War I avant-garde: an early example is Blaise Cendrars's "Me Too Boogie" (1914), which is a lineated version of a passage from a 19th-c. travel book about the natives of Tonga.

Cendrars's earlier "Le Panama ou les aventures de mes sept oncles" (Panama or the Adventures of My Seven Uncles) incorporates a train schedule from the Union Pacific Railroad and a prospectus for "Denver, the Residence City and Commercial Center."

Both *Dada and surrealist poets (e.g., Kurt Schwitters, Francis Picabia, André Breton) exploited found poetry, as did the great Viennese satirist Karl Kraus, whose long, unfinished poetic drama of the 1920s Die letzten Tage der Menschheit (The Last Days of Mankind), contains a wealth of documentary fragments, newsflashes, placards, and political speeches (see SURREALISM). The most prominent example for the Eng.-speaking reader is surely Ezra Pound's Cantos, which incorporates "real" letters by Thomas Jefferson and John Adams, papal documents, poems by Guido Cavalcanti, government and bank documents, extracts from Confucius, and so on. Pound's strategy was taken over by W. C. Williams in Paterson, by Charles Olson in the Maximus Poems, and by Louis Zukofsky in "Poem beginning 'The'" and "A." Another objectivist, Charles Reznikoff inserted lineated sections of law reports and similar documents into the fabric of his long poem Testimony (1979; see OBJECTIVISM).

But it is only in the information age that entire poems have been made from found text. In "Poem beginning 'The'," Zukofsky acknowledged his sources, as did Walter Benjamin in his monumental Arcades Project, made almost entirely of citations. In the case of contemp. poetry, however, the reader cannot be sure whether he or she is reading an "original" text or a found one. Susan Howe's The Midnight (2003), e.g., draws on biography, document, anthol., and letters, to create a poetic form where "original" and "found text" overlap and interact. Craig Dworkin's "Legion" (2003) is a rearrangement of the true/false questions of the first ed. of a 1942 psychological questionnaire, The Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory. And Caroline Bergvall's poem Via (2005) alphabetizes a series of Eng. trans. of the first tercet of Dante's Inferno, so as to create an entirely new and strange poem. In all these instances, found poetry confronts the media world of our moment and transforms its debris into complex verbal artifacts.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS, CONCEPTUAL POETRY.

■ M. Duchamp, The Writings of Marcel Duchamp, ed. M. Sanouillet and E. Peterson (1973); J. Bochner, Blaise Cendrars: Discovery and Re-Creation (1978); A. Compagnon, La Seconde Main (1979); M. Perloff, Radical Artifice: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media (1992); S. McCaffery, North of Intention (2000); C. Dworkin, Reading the Illegible (2003); M. Perloff, Differentials (2004); K. Goldsmith, On Conceptual Writing (2007); M. Perloff, Unoriginal Genius: Poetry by Other Means in the New Century (2010); Against Expression: An Anthology of Conceptual Writing, ed. C. Dworkin and K. Goldsmith (2011); K. Goldsmith, Uncreative Writing (2011).

M. PERLOFF

FOURTEENER. In Eng., a metrical line of 14 syllables, usually comprising seven *iambs, which since the Middle Ages has taken two distinct forms used for various kinds of poetry and thus exhibiting widely differing characteristics. When a pair of fourteeners are broken by *hemistichs to form a quatrain of lines stressed 4-3-4-3 and rhyming abab, they become the familiar "eight-and-six" form of *ballad meter called common meter or common measure. S. T. Coleridge imitated the looser form of this meter in "Kubla Khan," as did many other 19th-c. poets attempting literary imitations of "folk poetry." William Blake often used an unbroken fourteener in his "prophetic books," possibly in imitation of the biblical style from various Eng. trans.

The eight-and-six pattern was used widely in the 16th c. for hymns; indeed, Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins adapted it from contemp. song specifically to take advantage of its popularity and energy for their metrical *psalter. It was also used for polished lyrics such as Robert Herrick's "Gather ye rosebuds while ye may." Shakespeare uses it for comic effect in the "Pyramus and Thisbe" play performed by the "rude mechanicals" in A Midsummer Night's Dream. Closely related is *poulter's measure, a line of 12 syllables followed by a fourteener, which when broken into a quatrain gives the 3-3-4-3 pattern of short meter. But the fourteener was also used extensively in the 16th c. for the elevated genres, in particular for translating Lat. tragedy and epic. It is used for trans. of Seneca's tragedies by Jasper Heywood and others published by Thomas Newton in the Tenne Tragedies (1581) and by Arthur Golding for his trans. of Ovid's Metamorphoses (1567). The most famous and impressive use of fourteeners in Eng. is probably George Chapman's trans. of Homer's Iliad (1616). The contrast between the effect of fourteeners in popular and learned genres is striking:

> The king sits in Dumferline town
> Drinking the blood-red wine;
> "O whare will I get a skeely skipper
> To sail this new ship of mine?"
>
> ("Sir Patrick Spens")

> Achilles' banefull wrath resound, O Goddesse, that impos'd
> Infinite sorrowes on the Greekes, and many brave soules los'd
> From breasts Heroique—sent them farre, to that invisible cave
> That no light comforts; and their lims to dogs and vultures gave.
>
> (Chapman's Homer)

Opinions differ about the origins of the fourteener. Schipper calls it a *septenarius—more precisely, the trochaic tetrameter brachycatalectic—implying that it was derived from imitation of med. Lat. poems in that meter. The native influence of ballad meter is also obvious. But another explanation is equally likely: the great cl. epic meter, the dactylic hexameter, contains on average about 16 "times," and it may be that early Eng. translators thought the fourteener was the closest vernacular equivalent.

■ Schipper, History; P. Verrier, Le Vers français, v. 2–3 (1931–32); J. Thompson, The Founding of English Metre, 2d ed. (1989); O. B. Hardison Jr., Prosody and Purpose in the English Renaissance (1988); M. Hunt, "Fourteeners in Shakespeare's Cymbeline," N & Q 47 (2000).

O. B. Hardison; T.V.F. Brogan; S. S. Bill

FRACTAL VERSE. Fractal verse provides a way to conceptualize irregular poetic forms by drawing upon fractal geometry, a branch of chaos theory developed in the 1970s and subsequently popularized by the mathematician Benoît Mandelbrot. While Euclidean geometry describes smooth and regular forms, fractal geometry accounts for the irregular forms now recognized to predominate in nature, e.g., in the shapes of clouds or coastlines. Mandelbrot's coinage, fractal, emphasizes the fractured character of these complex forms as well as their fractional dimensions; their corrugated surface (made, for instance, from an infinitely long line within a finite area) gives fractals an added fraction of a dimension. Fractals are characterized by self-similarity across different scales. They are attractive to contemporary poets and critics because they mediate between chaos and order, allowing recognition of complex pattern where formerly only randomness or disorder had been observed. As Hayles insists, writing readily analyzed in terms of fractal geometry is not necessarily influenced by science. Rather, both lit. and science reflect culture; in the late decades of the 20th c., a cultural shift was evident as many disciplines moved toward challenging rigid binaries and attending to nonlinear dynamics. Like some who theorize fractal verse, Hayles notes commonalities between the science of chaos and *postmodernism, particularly poststucturalist thought.

The term fractal verse was introduced by the poet Alice Fulton in her essay "Of Formal, Free, and Fractal Verse: Singing the Body Eclectic" (1986) and further developed in "Fractal Amplifications" (1997). "Of Formal, Free, and Fractal Verse" stresses the need for ways to discern and discuss the orders found in irregular (*free verse) forms and offers fractal form as a promising analog. Among the "fractal precepts" Fulton proposes are that individual lines will be as richly detailed as the larger poem containing them; the poem will contain an infinite regression of details, "a nesting of pattern within pattern"; "digression, interruption, fragmentation and lack of continuity will be regarded as formal functions rather than lapses into formlessness"; and the occurrence of metrical patterns or rhythms in a poem will not predict the poem's subsequent metrical or rhythmic behavior. "Fractal Amplifications" engages more directly with complexity theory and postmodernism. Emphasizing that fractal verse is not based on a conventional usage of *voice, Fulton claims the form itself dismantles assumptions of the "natural" by breaking the "poem plane" as modernist free verse, according to Ezra Pound, broke the pentameter.

Other poets who have also seen potential in fractal geometry for appropriately current thinking about poetry have interpreted the relevance of fractals differently. Swensen, using fractal geometry to analyze poetry that makes innovative use of the visual page, emphasizes a multidirectional fractal motion that "infinitely complicates itself along a pattern of self-similarity." Retallack invokes fractals as models of "pattern-bounded unpredictability" that provide new ways of thinking about poetry's relation to extratextual reality, "redefining relationships between order and disorder, pattern and unpredictability, the finite and the infinite."

Critics have sometimes claimed for earlier poets, such as Gertrude Stein, Pound, or H.D., an intuition of fractal geometry before it was modeled by scientists. More often, critics have used the characteristics of fractals as analogs that illuminate previously underappreciated aspects of particular poets' writing, esp. their handling of *repetition (self-similarity) on varied scales.

See form, poststructuralism, science and poetry.

■ B. Mandelbrot, The Fractal Geometry of Nature (1983); N. K. Hayles, "Introduction: Complex Dynamics in Literature and Science," Chaos and Order (1991); C. Swensen, "Against the Limits of Language," Moving Borders, ed. M. M. Sloan (1998); A. Fulton, Feeling as a Foreign Language (1999); J. Retallack, The Poethical Wager (2003); N. Sala, "Fractal Geometry in the Arts: An Overview across the Different Cultures," Thinking in Patterns, ed. M. M. Novak (2004).

L. Keller

FRAGMENT (Lat. frangere, "to break"). In poetry, fragment connotes a broken part or detached piece of a complete and integral poem—either a whole that once existed or one that was never written and can only be imagined. The hist. of poetry witnesses a shift from the fragment made by time and circumstances (that which was once complete) to the intentional fragment (that which is written incomplete). In the Western trad., this shift occurs most prominently in the romantic period. Twentieth- and 21st-c. inheritors of the fragment form increasingly employed internal fragmentation within their works.

The fragment is as old and universal as the written poetic word. The lyric poet Sappho (fl. ca. 600 bce) has garnered particular attention for her 213 extant poems, only one of which survives in entirety. These fragments—and most incomplete ancient work—present a challenge to translators and interpreters alike. While some (Mary Barnard, Guy Davenport, Willis Barnstone) have approached Sappho's fragments as a venue for creation, transforming a few words into multistanza poems, others have strived for complete fidelity to Sappho's original text; Carson inserts brackets wherever the original papyrus was lost, thus implying "a free space of imaginal adventure."

It was largely the aesthetic behind cl. fragments that inspired the romantic vogue for the intentionally fragmentary poem in England and Germany. Even before the romantic era, Eng. poetry was read in unfinished form, often with biographical causes (such as death or a shift in creative interest) behind its incompletion; two significant examples are Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (late 14th c.) and Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene (1590, 1596). These never-finished works may have acclimated readerships to the more stylized fragments to come. However, it was the Ossianists that launched the romantic fragment genre in England. Drawing on the neoclassical fervor of his era, the Scottish poet James Macpherson published Fragments of Ancient Poetry, Collected in the Highlands of Scotland, and Translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language (1760) as his first "translations" of the fictional writer Ossian, inspiring a wave of "Hoax Poets" (see PREROMANTICISM).

During the romantic period, there are few major Eng. poets who did not produce fragment poems. S. T. Coleridge composed two for Lyrical Ballads (1798) and later wrote the significant fragments "Christabel" (1816) and "Kubla Khan" (1816), which resembles an opium dream in its intentional fragmentation. Lord Byron's Giaour (1813) is "three disjointed fragments" expanded piece by piece. John Keats's Hyperion (1820), which ends mid-line with the word "celestial," and The Fall of Hyperion (written 1819, pub. 1856) were both left unfinished. P. B. Shelley's corpus contains more fragments than that of any other romantic poet; notable among them are Posthumous Fragments of Margaret Nicholson (1810) and "The Triumph of Life" (1822). The popularity of these fragments can be contextualized in romantic aesthetic discourse. Espousers of the *sublime admired fragment poetry for its suggestion of nature's triumph over civilization, and the ruined aesthetic of the fragment appealed to the Eng. picturesque imagination. Meanwhile, the fragment's implication of the passage of time and its lack of temporal context aligned with the sic transit gloria mundi meditation.

While Eng. poets produced a body of work that can be called fragmentary in retrospect, Ger. romantic poets actively cultivated a fragmentary aesthetic. The Jena circle, founded by K.W.F. Schlegel and A. W. Schlegel, published a series of philosophical fragmentary epigrams in The Athenaeum (1798–1800). These short pieces, inspired by cl. fragments, often commented on the nature of the fragment form: as K.W.F. Schlegel writes, "Many of the works of the ancients have become fragments. Many modern works are fragments as soon as they are written." The Athenaeum fragments frequently questioned whether a whole exists at all. Preeminent fragment poets in the Ger. trad. are Friedrich Hölderlin and—much later—R. M. Rilke. Hölderlin, whose first fragments were posthumously published in Berliner Ausgabe (1913), often left unfinished lines and gaps in his pieces. Rilke, in his "Archaïscher Torso Apollos" ("Torso of an Archaic Apollo," 1908), explores the fragment theme in his ekphrasis* of a ruined sculpture. The Rus. poet Alexander Pushkin also drew inspiration from the circle, producing dozens of fragments and publishing a chapter of his novel in verse Evgenij Onegin (1825–32) in fragments.

In the 20th c., the fragment form was used to reflect the disjointedness of the psychological experience and convey a sense of general disorder. Guillaume Apollinaire juxtaposed fragment poems on a white page, unifying the disjunctive content of his text with white space (as in Calligrammes, 1918). Often lacking punctuation and connective verbs, his enigmatic poems call on the reader to imagine transitions. The imagists frequently borrowed from Sappho's lexicon. H.D. saw in her muse a "fractured sense of eternally being on intellectual borders," while Ezra Pound channeled Sappho in "Papyrus" (1916), employing the *concision and directness that would define the imagism. Pound also drew on the Japanese *haiku trad. (see RENGA), which often employed fragmentary syntax, to juxtapose images in floating, incomplete lang. (as in "In a Station of the Metro," 1913).

T. S. Eliot, who wrote in The Waste Land (1922) "these fragments I have shored against my ruins," employed abrupt shifts in speaker, lang., and time to impart a sense of psychological fragmentation and to reflect a war-torn political landscape. In this spirit, poets began to experiment with internal fracturing, employing sentence fragments and broken grammar within their works. Later, the Language poets of the 1970s (incl. Bruce Andrews, Michael Palmer, Ron Silliman, and Charles Bernstein) fragmented lang. until it no longer held conventional measures of meaning; through disjunctive lists of words and phrases, these poets shifted focus to the materiality of words (see LANGUAGE POETRY). More recently, hypertext poems enable readers to reorganize the content of a fractured text; in such cases, a poem is shattered by the medium itself and then pieced together by the reader (see ELECTRONIC POETRY).

As contemp. poets continue to publish pieces entitled simply "Fragment," one such poem by Seamus Heaney poses a question that may allude to the persistence of the fragment genre: "Since when," he asked, / "are the first line and the last line of any poem / where the poem begins and ends?"

See IMAGINATION, QIṬʿA, ROMANTICISM.

■ T. McFarland, Romanticism and the Forms of Ruin (1981); M. Levinson, The Romantic Fragment Poem (1986); E. W. Harries, The Unfinished Manner: Essays on the Fragment in the Later Eighteenth Century (1994); M. Greenleaf, Pushkin and Romantic Fashion (1997); N. Saul, "Aesthetic Humanism," The Cambridge History of German Literature, ed. H. Watanabe-O'Kelly (1997); D. Collecot, H.D. and Sapphic Modernism (1999); Del Frammento, ed. R. M. Losito (2000); C. Elias, The Fragment (2004); T. Hoagland, "Fragment, Juxtaposition, and Completeness," Cortland Review 33 (2006); Sappho, If Not, Winter: Fragments of Sappho, trans. A. Carson (2009); S. Jung, The Fragmentary Poetic (2009).

A. SLESSAREV

FRANCE, POETRY OF

I. Medieval to Early Modern
II. Early Modern to 20th Century

I. Medieval to Early Modern. To assume that poetry is a self-evident term, that it denotes, in Charles Baudelaire's expression, "rhythm and rhyme," or that it has inhabited since antiquity three well-defined categories—epic, dramatic, lyric—is to overestimate the transparency of these terms. Such categories are useful (e.g., scholars routinely speak about "lyric" and "epic" poetry in the Middle Ages) but even when they are applicable, these terms are unstable in meaning. The word poète (poet), e.g., comes into use in the 13th-c. Roman de la Rose, where it means "Latin poet" or "poet whom one glosses." In the 14th c., it comes to be used of vernacular poets, often with the primary sense of "allegorist." The words poésie or occasionally, as in the early 15th-c. poetic theorist Jacques Legrand, poetrie (in the etymological sense of "making" and even "feigning") also appear in the 14th c., although vernacular treatises of versification will not become arts poétiques until the middle of the 16th c. Indeed, poésie is not an esp. common term for vernacular verse in Fr. until the early mod. period.

While the earliest texts in Fr. date from the 9th c., there is almost nothing written in prose before the early 13th c. that would commonly be called "literary." In the Middle Ages, writing in verse is assimilated both to rhet. (part of the trivium of arts) and to music (part of the quadrivium of mathematical disciplines). Eustache Deschamps (ca. 1346–1407) commemorated ca. 1377 the great 14th-c. poet and composer Guillaume de Machaut in these terms: "the death of Machaut, the noble Rhetorician." In a treatise on versification, L'Art de dictier (1392), Deschamps defined verse as a kind of "natural music." The distinction between verse and prose was operative in the med. period. The It. scholar Brunetto Latini distinguished between these two "manners of speaking" in his 13th-c. Li Livres dou Tresor (ca. 1264), and the distinction had already given rise to much debate in the early 13th c.: verse had come to be seen as inherently mendacious, and many verse narrative works were translated into prose. The term seconde rhétorique* (second rhetoric) to distinguish verse from prose, common in the 15th c., appears first in Occitan, in the Leys d'amors (1356) often attributed to Guilhem Molinier, probably under the influence of the verse-prose distinction found in Brunetto. Yet "rhythm and rhyme" do not always make "poetry" in the early periods. E.g., after Aristotle's Poetics had been rediscovered and disseminated in the Lat. West in the 16th c., much effort was expended to determine which kinds of verse qualified for the title of poetry by virtue of being mimetic, i.e., of following Aristotle's idea that poetry required the imitation of reality (see MIMESIS).

The tripartite division of poetic genres that mod. readers often assume to be of cl. origin—epic, dramatic, lyric—owes more to the 19th c. (esp. G.W.F. Hegel's Aesthetics) than to antiquity. The triad does not appear in this form in Aristotle or Horace, in the Middle Ages or the early mod. period (though Antonio Minturno [ca. 1500–74] makes what seems a similar distinction in his De poeta of 1559). The word lyrique (lyric), often applied to a large part of the med. poetic corpus, does not appear in Fr. until the early 15th c. (as a calque for the Lat. lyrica, in a discussion of Horace). It denotes "lyric" poetry in the vernacular only from the 1490s and remains rare enough in the mid-16th c. for the young Joachim du Bellay to be mocked in print for using it as late as 1550. The mod. sense of lyric as personal verse becomes current in the 18th c. Similarly, épopée (epic) and roman (romance)—the latter being the more common term until the late Ren.—are not clearly distinguished either in the Middle Ages or the 16th c. (the prominent humanist poet Pierre de Ronsard called Homer's Iliad a "roman"). Although verse theater in Fr. certainly existed from very early times, the term dramatic seems to have appeared in the late 14th c. to denote verse compositions in which the several persons represented were clearly distinguished from an authorial persona. Thus, the problem of classification is a stubborn one. Familiar terminology may be useful but cannot be taken for granted.

A. The Middle Ages. A salient distinction in med. and Ren. poetics is between poetry written in rhyming couplets (rime plate) and that written in other schemes. The former tends to appear in longer narrative (e.g., romance) or narrative-didactic poetry (e.g., the Roman de la Rose) and in theater, while the latter in poetry on other topics, e.g., in amatory poetry. This distinction is not airtight: many stanzaic forms are lengthy and contain narrative and indeed "dramatic" elements (e.g., the dialogue poems, or joc-partits, of which there are a number of examples in Occitan and in early Fr. poetry). Moreover, chansons de geste* are not generally written in rime plate but instead in assonant or monorhyme stanzas. Short, fixed forms are also interspersed into longer narrative works in rime plate and even with prose, notably from the 14th-c. Guillaume de Machaut (ca. 1300–77) but also in the anonymous, probably 13th-c. *prosimetrum Aucassin et Nicolette.

The verse produced between ca. 1100 and 1470 in what is now France was written in two dialect groups, broadly speaking: OF, spoken in northern France (the langue d'oïl), and Occitan (what used to be called Provençal, the langue d'oc). A greater proportion of the narrative poetry we possess is in northern Fr. dialects, although there is a considerable corpus in both langs.

We have several hagiographic narrative poems in OF from before the turn of the millennium: the "Séquence de Sainte Eulalie," probably written at the end of the 9th c., about 50 years after the Strasburg Oaths of 842 (the first recorded text in OF and OHG), and the 10th-c. Vie de Saint Léger, in octosyllables. Another early saint's life is the 11th-c. Vie de Saint Alexis, in assonant decasyllables. Later important saints' lives include an account of St. Mary the Egyptian by the late 13th-c. poet Rutebeuf, in octosyllabic couplets.

The chansons de geste or "songs of great deeds" are patriotic accounts of aristocratic and royal valor, incl. in later cases stories of the crusades. The Chanson de Roland (early 12th c.), preserved in a ms. in the Bodleian Library in Oxford, recounts an episode in Charlemagne's war against the Moors in Spain. This is the earliest remaining long narrative poem in Fr. The form of the Chanson de Roland is a series of assonant stanzas or laisses* of unequal length, imbricating the material from one to the next. While this version, apparently not widely disseminated, survives only in the Oxford ms., the story was adapted in the 12th c. in rhyming verse. Other chansons de geste include the royal cycle, the cycles of Guillaume d'Orange and Doon de Mayence, and two cycles narrating the exploits of the crusades.

At most, two extant chansons de geste (the Oxford Roland and the Chanson de Guillaume) predate the earliest romances we possess. Most of the production of chansons de geste is contemporaneous with that of verse romance, although it continues for longer, verse romance giving way to prose romance before chansons de geste becomes unrhymed. Romance differs from chanson de geste in subject matter: chanson de geste is generally concerned with the matter of France, romance with the matter of Britain—in particular the stories of the Arthurian court, the Round Table, and the Grail—and the matter of Rome, consisting of adaptations of Lat. lit. such as Virgil's Aeneid. The trad. of verse historiography, e.g., the 12th-c. Wace, a court poet to the Eng. Henry II, or Gaimar's account of the battle of Hastings, which is the earliest surviving text in octosyllabic rhyming couplets, is important to the devel. of verse romance, where octosyllabic rime plate comes to predominate, although other verse forms occasionally appear, such as the 12-syllable line of the Roman d'Alexandre, from which the *alexandrine gets its name. Chrétien de Troyes' five verse romances of the later 12th c., incl. Lancelot, Erec et Enide, and the unfinished but much continued Li Contes del Graal, are sophisticated examples of the "romance" genre, voluminously imitated in other Eur. langs., notably Ger., in both verse and prose. The form of the romance gave birth to perhaps the most influential long narrative poem in med. Fr.: the Roman de la Rose, the work of Guillaume de Lorris (ca. 1205–40) and Jean de Meun (ca. 1240–1305). Guillaume's 4,056-line version, written ca. 1230, inspired a continuation more than four times longer. Guillaume's poem is an *allegory in which a young man of 20 enters a mysterious walled garden and falls in love with a rose he espies while looking into the fountain of Narcissus. Jean de Meun's continuation (ca. 1270–80) marshals a number of personified philosophical and ethical concepts (e.g., Dangier, Faulx Semblant) in a poem of initiation and encyclopedic knowledge liberally spiced with misogyny. The Rose was enormously popular; Chaucer translated part of it into Eng. The Rose informs much of the allegorical practice of the 14th and 15th cs., and the poem was widely read as late as the 16th c. (an adaptation, often attributed to the Ren. poet Clément Marot, was published in 1526). The long dits amoureux of Guillaume de Machaut, often interspersed with short lyric pieces set to music of his own composition—e.g., his Remède de Fortune and Voir dit—breathe the same Ovidian atmosphere as the Rose, a poem that they imitate, transform, and critique (see DIT).

Smaller-scale narrative forms include, in addition to saints' lives, e.g., the shorter narrative lays attributed to a 12th-c. Anglo-Norman poet who identifies herself as "Marie" from "France" (and whom the trad. has styled Marie de France [ca. 1135–1200]) as well as numerous *fabliaux (short, often bawdy stories of the sort that inspired Boccaccio's Decameron and Chaucer's Canterbury Tales). The humor and irony of the fabliau blossoms in Le Roman de Renart, a long satirical animal epic written in several parts or "branches," probably by several poets of the 12th and 13th cs.

Short poems, often in stanzaic, sometimes *heterometric fixed forms, not usually written in rhyming couplets, are conventionally considered "lyric" forms. Many of these were sung, or at least written in forms with musical conventions such as the later med. *rondeau and *ballade. The Occitan trad. is the earlier one, its influence waning after the Albigensian crusades of the early 13th c. *Occitan poetry, long somewhat neglected by Fr. scholars constructing a homogeneous national trad., despite its centrality to the devel. of OF "lyric," has been claimed by It. and Catalan scholars for their own literary hists. (see Burgwinkle et al.). Dante and Petrarch admired and imitated the poetry of, e.g., the 12th-c. *troubadour Arnaut Daniel.

No doubt the corpus of Occitan poetry is one of the most sophisticated, influential, and intellectually ambitious poetic trads. in Eur. lit. hist. Occitan poets are troubadours or "finders" of both words and music: the production of troubadour poetry seems to have spanned the social classes from the most elevated aristocrats to indigent traveling musicians. Many of the aspects of lyric poetry that contemp. readers might take, mistakenly, as mod.—self-reference and metatextual play, the blurring of the borders between the fiction of love and the artifice of poetry, the trenchant analysis of the circulation of desire—are already present in the earliest troubadour lyrics. The works of Guilhem IX, Duke of Aquitaine, such as his "Farai un vers de dreyt nien" (I will make a poem from entirely nothing; ca. 1100), have appealed to postromantic readers, who see there a reflection of their own concerns or a premonition of Stéphane Mallarmé's poetics of negation and ling. self-containment. The terrifying, cruel distance of the object of desire, the domna, reduced to a ling. sign or senhal*, has inspired the psychoanalyst Jacques Lacan and, through him, readers with psychological and philosophical interests. The knotty verse of Marcabru (associated with what is called the trobar clus* or closed style), has particularly spoken to recent readers (see the ed. [2000] by Simon Gaunt, Ruth Harvey, and Linda Paterson), although the more accessible trobar leu, e.g., the poetry of Bernart de Ventadorn, is also much read. Jaufré Rudel, who sang of the amor de lonh, or "love from afar," is perhaps the best known of the troubadours today. There is also a considerable body of troubadour lyric written by (or attributed to) women, known as trobaritz*, of whom the 12th-c. Comtessa de Dia is now perhaps most read. Unfortunately, a great number of the names of the trobaritz have disappeared. Still, ms. culture stressed the production of a poetic persona whose life was supposedly reflected in the poetry and tended to situate troubadours and trobaritz in a brief biographical fiction called a vida*.

Many of the early lyric songs in the langue d'oïl, OF, are anonymous chansons de toile, reverdies, chansons d'aube (see ALBA), or pastourelles*, dating from the 12th and 13th cs. The trouvères*, counterparts in northern France to the troubadours, took up many of the techniques and themes of troubadour poetry; these include the 13th-c. King of Navarre, Thibaut de Champagne (1201–53), a direct descendant of Guilhem IX and the great-grandson of Eleanor of Aquitaine, who wrote in Fr. (and was quoted by Dante). As was the case for the troubadours, many of the trouvères were aristocratic, although 13th-c. poets such as Rutebeuf, Gilbert de Berneville, and Adam de la Halle were commoners; the last two are associated with the flowering of Fr. poetry in the northern city of Arras, whereas Rutebeuf was Parisian.

It was esp. in the north of France that the musical trad. of med. poetry would develop in notable ways. With the refinements in mensural notation and consequently in polyphony in the 13th and 14th cs., such forms as the polytextual motet—a type of layered song counterposing several poetic texts—flourished. Adam de la Halle (ca. 1250–1306) cultivated the genre of the motet, which came to a very high level of sophistication in the works of the 14th-c. Guillaume de Machaut. Such songs, fusing Christian and cl. topoi, demand a complex process of reception. Since the texts, sung simultaneously, are not easily intelligible, interpretation depends as much on written texts (Machaut took great care in the presentation of his mss.) as on performance and requires, in particular, accounting for the text of the fragment of plainchant on which they were constructed. E.g., one of Machaut's motets, built on a fragment of *chant, the "tenor," recounting David's grief on the death of Absalom (the text is ego moriar pro te, "I will/would die for you"), collates two Fr. texts derived from the Ovidian myth of Narcissus and Echo. Fourteenth-c. poets also worked in the fixed forms that would be developed by late med. writers, the virelai* and particularly the rondeau and the ballade; these were cultivated by Machaut and his contemporaries and particularly by the poets of following generations who, unlike Machaut, were not generally composers, e.g., Deschamps, Christine de Pizan (1363–1430), Alain Chartier (ca. 1385–1433), and in particular Charles d'Orléans (1394–1465), who wrote hundreds of rondeaux and ballades, both in Fr. and, during a 25-year period of captivity in England, in Eng.

For mod. readers, perhaps the best known of all late med. poets is François Villon (1431–after 1463), a young Parisian with a colorful, much romanticized life. Villon, of whose biography we know little for certain, is the author of several extended works in autobiographical guise, incl. a Testament, detailing the mock legacy of a poor poet and interspersing refined examples of the ballade and the rondeau. Villon, who was once condemned to death and composed a *quatrain for the occasion of his hanging later adapted by François Rabelais (fl. early 16th c.), disappears without a trace after 1463. Collections of his poems are among the first printed poetry collections of late 15th-c. France; Clément Marot published an ed. of his poetry in 1533. Villon's Lais (Legacy, composed 1456) and Grand testament (composed 1461) are important laboratories for the devel. of a highly stylized first-person voice, the precursor for many later writers and for the romantic poète maudit* (cursed poet). It would be a mistake to assume that the type of mock-testament that Villon composes is an entirely new devel.; the genre has important 13th-c. antecedents in Jean Bodel, Baude Fastoul, and Rutebeuf.

The 15th c. saw important devels. in verse drama, both religious (e.g., the lengthy Mystère de la Passion, ca. 1425, or an even longer mid-century passion play attributed to Arnoul Greban) and secular, most notably the anonymous Farce de Maître Pierre Pathelin (1465), which Rabelais knew and which is still performed. Devels. in theater built on a lively native Fr. trad. of mystery plays and other varieties of med. drama, the latter exemplified already in the 13th c. by Adam de la Halle's plays Jeu de Robin et Marion, written in Italy for Charles I of Naples, and his Jeu de la Feuillée.

B. Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Although the 16th c. is one of the richest periods in the hist. of Fr. poetry, the 17th c. is often considered an era of relative decline, at least in nondramatic poetry. There is some truth to this received notion, even if it is also informed by ideologies of literary taste inherited from that century.

The historiography of Fr. lyric poetry in the 16th-c. has long cited Joachim du Bellay's La deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse (1549), an aggressive plea for the foundation of a new national poetry worthy of the cl. past, as a reference point. du Bellay's treatise, along with Pierre de Ronsard's Odes (1550), has rather too neatly divided the century into two halves. Many earlier commentators took du Bellay's dismissal of most of the poetic production in Fr. before his time at face value, when du Bellay's treatise, a polemical response to Thomas Sébillet's erudite Art poétique françoys of 1548, clearly aims to establish his poetry and that of his contemporaries as the foundation of a new Fr. trad. Although the period of poetic production falling roughly between 1549 and 1585 is one of the most impressive in the entire hist. of Fr. poetry, critical work on 16th-c. Fr. poetry in the last century has demonstrated the richness of the reign of François I (1515–47), and indeed the extent to which the poets of the Pléiade* build on humanist ideas already firmly in place early in the 16th c., and in some cases in the 15th c. as well. Both the pre-Pléiade poets and their poetic descendants imported It. forms (such as the *sonnet, brought into Fr. by Marot and Mellin de Saint-Gelais in the 1530s and made Fr. by the Pléiade in the 1550s), and philosophical currents such as Ficianian Neoplatonism that had already attracted the attention of Fr. readers by the end of the 15th c.

The *Grands Rhétoriqueurs stand at an awkward juncture in Fr. poetic hist., on the (arbitrary) border between "late medieval" and "Renaissance" poetics. The poets of the Grande Rhétorique, attached to the courts of Burgundy and France, develop a particularly complex poetics, playing on the possibilities of late med. allegory in intricate ways and developing verse forms and rhyme schemes of unparalleled complexity in the Fr. trad. A volume of "arts of second rhetoric" compiled by E. Langlois in 1902 is a useful primary source for the study of 15th-c. verse. The Grands Rhétoriqueurs, manipulating traditional fixed forms such as the rondeau and ballade, reworked these in ways that distanced them from their musical conventions. The rondeau, e.g., was reimagined in ways that made it difficult, even impossible, for the text to be set to music in the conventional way (Villon's "Mort, j'appelle de ta rigueur," from the Testament, is a good early example). In this, poetic practice reflects compositional practice among late 15th- and early 16th-c. composers such as Josquin des Prez (ca. 1450–1521).

The innovations of Grands Rhétoriqueurs such as Jean Meschinot, Jean Molinet, Guillaume Cretin, Jean Marot, and Jean Lemaire de Belges, poets long disparaged in the critical trad., certainly underlie many of the devels. in verse in the era of François I, most notably the work of Clément Marot (ca. 1496–1544), whose father, Jean, was also a court poet. Early poems by the young Marot show his mastery of the word games of the Grande Rhétorique, evincing as well his ability to play on the exigencies of poets obliged to curry favor with aristocratic patrons. Marot's collection L'Adolescence clémentine (1532) and its 1534 continuation are collectively a summa of late med. poetic forms. Marot later abandoned the fixed forms of the Middle Ages for more classically inspired ones, in particular the epigram. He is also responsible for some of the early trans. of Petrarch's poetry into Fr. (see PETRARCHISM). A strong supporter of religious reform who spent a number of years in exile for his beliefs, Marot is the author of still-popular trans. of the Heb. Psalms, a crowning achievement of his career. Nonetheless, it would be too simple to reduce Marot's poetics entirely to his religious faith. He translated, e.g., bawdy epigrams by Martial around the same time as the Psalms, and such an alternation of the worldly and the sacred represents the period. Marot's poetry is an important influence on the philosophically minded Maurice Scève (ca. 1511–64), the author of the first Petrarchan love sequence in France and the winner of a contest for the composition of blasons of the human body organized by Marot in 1536. The works of Scève's Lyonnese contemporaries Pernette du Guillet and Louise Labé are infused with Petrarchan lang. as well as topoi derived from Ficinian Neoplatonism. Neoplatonic ideas about music and poetry underlie much of lyric production after 1549, as in the works of the mathematician and poet Jacques Peletier du Mans (1517–82). The treatises of Scève's friend and disciple Pontus de Tyard (1521–1605) influenced the founding by Jean-Antoine de Baïf and Thibault de Courville in 1570 of a royal Academy of Poetry and Music, which was intended to resurrect the "effects of music" described in mythological stories like those of Orpheus and Amphion in the interest of promoting harmony within the kingdom.

Ronsard (1524–85) and du Bellay (ca. 1522–60) were the preeminent Fr. poets of their generation, and indeed, much of the poetry not only of the 16th but of the 17th c. should be read in relationship to Pléiade aesthetics and its rejection by 17th-c. theorists. Certainly, the body of Fr. poetry produced in the period of Ronsard's dominance is now among the most highly prized in the entire Fr. trad. More than any other poet, Ronsard naturalized the sonnet in Fr. in a number of important collections beginning with his Amours (1552), pub. with a musical supplement in 1552 and reissued in 1553 with an innovative, erudite commentary by Marc-Antoine Muret. Ronsard's contemp. du Bellay also published a number of significant sonnet collections, incl. L'Olive (1549), Les Regrets (1558), and Les Antiquitez de Rome (1558). Ronsard experimented with other, more metaphysically ambitious lyric works, incl. the Odes (1550) and Hymnes (1556), whereas du Bellay cultivated an intimate, "low" style and a melancholic meditation on the impermanence of things and the venal political ambitions of his contemporaries, one much inflected by Ovidian topoi. The poets of Ronsard's generation were much influenced by the distinguished humanist Jean Dorat, teacher of Ronsard and Baïf, who wrote principally in Lat. Other important members of the group initially called the Brigade and later the Pléiade included Pontus, Peletier, Étienne Jodelle, and Remy Belleau.

Of the generation following Ronsard, Philippe Desportes (1546–1606) and Agrippa d'Aubigné (1552–1630) are probably the most noted writers of lyric verse. The former inspired François de Malherbe's (1555–1628) call for the reform of Fr. versification often cited as the birth of neoclassicism in poetry. (In one of his most famous lines, Nicolas Boileau later praised Malherbe for bringing order to the alleged disorder of Pléiade poetics: "enfin Malherbe vint" [Finally Malherbe arrived].) Trad. has tended to situate 17th-c. poetic production between Malherbe's castigation of Pléiade and post-Pléiade verse and Boileau's orderly ideal of a balanced poetry whose regular cadences please and instruct the reader. Indeed, Boileau suggested, in his 1674 Art poétique, that little of note had happened in Fr. verse between Malherbe's reform in the opening years of the 17th c. and his own time. Of course, this is far from true: a number of worthy poets fit awkwardly into what has often been seen as the period's predominantly classicizing aesthetics: Théophile de Viau, Marc-Antoine Girard de Saint-Amant, Tristan l'Hermite, and Vincent Voiture are "lyric" poets whose posthumous reputations, although respectable, have suffered from ideological accounts of the Grand Siècle and its cl. rigor. In the 1630s and 1640s, Vincent Voiture resurrected late med. forms such as the rondeau in an effort to bring back the "elegant banter" (Boileau's expression) of Clément Marot's court poetry, while Viau had earlier been tried for "libertine" tendencies, in relation to the affair of the Parnasse des poètes satyriques (1622).

Both the 16th and 17th cs. saw the continued flourishing of *devotional poetry, a genre that often overlaps with the other lyric forms already discussed. The religious poems of Queen Marguerite de Navarre, e.g., the Miroir de l'ame pecheresse (1531), condemned initially by the Sorbonne and later translated into Eng. by Elizabeth I, are early 16th-c. examples. Jean de Sponde (1557–95) is no doubt the preeminent late 16th-c. religious poet. There are also a number of collections of Christianized love poetry by poets like Ronsard, intended to be sung by the devout, often to popular tunes (see CONTRAFACTUM). The 17th c. continues the trad. of devotional verse, notably in Jean de La Ceppède's Théorèmes (1613, 1621) or Claude Hopil's Les douces extases de l'âme spirituelle (1627). Contemplative religious poetry appears throughout the 17th c.; a significant late 17th-c. example of the genre is Racine's Cantiques spirituels (1694).

New forms of narrative poetry also appeared during these centuries. Du Bellay had called for the writing of "long poems," new Fr. "Iliads" based on the native mythical-historiographical trads. On a royal commission, Ronsard composed four books of an unfinished epic, La Franciade (1572), based on the story of Francus, a traditional account, attested as early as the 7th c., of the Trojan origins of the Fr. monarchy. But it is perhaps in the trad. of all-encompassing "scientific" poetry, a form with precedents in the encyclopedic tenor of such med. long poems as the Roman de la Rose, that we see the most original devels. Such poems as Scève's Microcosme (1562), a 3,003-line account of human knowledge and the fall of humankind, and Guillaume de Salluste Du Bartas's (1544–90) much longer and more influential La Sepmaine: ou, Creation du monde (1578) and Seconde Sepmaine (1584) are important in this vein, as is the somewhat more peculiar La Galliade, ou de la révolution des arts et sciences (1578, expanded 1582) by Guy Le Fevre de la Boderie, which claims that France is the wellspring of worldly knowledge. D'Aubigné's seven-book Les Tragiques, an immensely powerful account of the religious wars from a Protestant standpoint, begun by d'Aubigné in the 1570s but published anonymously only in 1616, is probably the most significant of the early mod. narrative long poems. Later in the 17th c., there are a number of epics on national themes, e.g., in the context of the conflict with Spain (such as works by Antoine Godeau and Georges de Scudéry), none of which seems to have gained much favor among readers then or now. *Mock epic has several instances at mid-century, in particular Paul Scarron's parody of the Aeneid entitled Virgile travesti (1648–52). For all this, the great master of 17th-c. narrative poetry, working on a much smaller scale, is probably Jean de La Fontaine (1621–95), whose Fables show a prodigious variety of verse styles. La Fontaine became, with the prose writers François de La Rochefoucauld and Jean de La Bruyère, a preeminent commentator on the social mores of Louis XIV's France. The rise of the cl. trad. of Fr. theater, culminating in the triumvirate of Corneille, Racine, and Jean-Baptiste Poquelin (i.e., Molière), is a central aspect of the devel. of Fr. verse in the 17th c., with important predecessors in such 16th-c. dramatists as Théodore de Beza, whose Abraham sacrifiant of 1550 is often called the first tragedy in Fr., and Robert Garnier, whose best known play is no doubt Les Juives (1583). Sixteenth-c. theater often intercalates lyric forms in imitation of the ancient choral odes separating the scenes of Gr. dramas. The regulation of verse conventions, in particular after the foundation of the Fr. Academy in 1635, means that the hist. of Fr. versification is inseparable from debates concerning the *decorum of drama.

II. Early Modern to Twentieth Century.

A. Eighteenth Century. Considered by many of his contemporaries the greatest poet of the c., François-Marie Arouet, known as Voltaire (1694–1778), is best known in poetry for his verse tragedy Zaïre (1732), but he tried his hand at many genres and forms. His epic La Henriade praises the ascension of Henri IV, who brought an end to the religious wars in France. He also wrote philosophical poems, which suited his antilyrical nature, in addition to satires and occasional verses celebrating such luminaries as Isaac Newton's Fr. translator, Mme. de Châtelet. Although verse was overshadowed during the Enlightenment by prose works (e.g., Voltaire's volumes on hist., his philosophical tale Candide, or Denis Diderot's monumental Encyclopedia), a few writers became famous for their poetic meditations on nature and landscapes. Jean-François de Saint-Lambert's Les Saisons (1769) explores both the sensorial richness of the months' cycle and the underlying harmony of the universe. Jacques Delille tested his verse in well-known trans. of Virgil's Georgics and John Milton's Paradise Lost and then proposed his own vision of natural beauty in Les Jardins ou L'Art d'embellir les paysages (1782). Other poets, such as Jean-Baptiste Rousseau or Jean-Baptiste Gresset, had already made names for themselves by openly opposing the Encyclopedists or by imitating classicist writers such as Boileau.

Once the century had ended and the Fr. Revolution had overturned both political and cultural orthodoxies, one victim of the Reign of Terror gained posthumous fame both as a martyr to tyranny and as the epitome of a poet's resistance to cold rationalism. André Chénier (1762–94) was condemned to the guillotine because, in newspaper articles, he had criticized the execution of Louis XVI. Although few of his poems had been published before his death, a footnote in François-René de Chateaubriand's Génie du christianisme (1802) helped turn Chénier into a legend. The note recounts that, on standing next to the guillotine, the poet had moved his hand to his forehead and said, "To die! I had something there in my mind!" Not only did this help turn the poet into a hero for counterrevolutionary Royalists in the 1820s, but it led a generation of romantic poets such as Alfred de Vigny (1797–1863) to align themselves with the legend of a misunderstood poetic genius and conflate the pathos of tragedy with a putative inner voice of poetry. Les Iambes, which Chénier wrote while he was imprisoned, is a skillfully crafted work of satire that uses Gr. and Lat. models that the author had read in the original. His Hymnes and Odes follow the model of occasional verse from the 18th c. but are often infused with passionate appeals for justice—as in his defense of Charlotte Corday, who had assassinated Marat, or in his most famous ode "La Jeune captive," which was inspired by a young woman Chénier met in prison. The woman's appeal to have her life spared, and the poet's reflection in the last two stanzas on his verse rendition of her appeal, became a model for the heart-cries that the romantics would emulate and develop.

B. Romanticism. Jean-Jacques Rousseau's final book, Les Rêveries du promeneur solitaire (Reveries of a Solitary Walker, 1782), set the tone for Fr. poetry in the first half of the 19th c. According to this prose account of walks taken by the author in the countryside around Paris and of others taken earlier when he lived near Geneva, Rousseau (1712–78) found refuge from his critics by making forays into nature. Such occasions restored the natural calm that he craved and led him to balance the movements of nature with his own search for happiness. Following his lead, the romantic poets Alphonse de Lamartine (1790–1869) and Victor Hugo (1802–85) would turn into verse the sort of meditations on loss, self-isolation, and nature's restorative power that Rousseau developed in his last book. A second group of writers, most notably Aloysius Bertrand (1807–41) and Charles Baudelaire (1821–67), refined the formal links forged by Rousseau between the rhythms of poetic prose and the cadence of walking by developing the new medium of prose poetry (see PROSE POEM).

Despite its brevity, Lamartine's Méditations poétiques et religieuses (1820) immediately earned its author praise for the simplicity of its evocations of past happiness and the smooth-flowing reveries that his verse sustained. In "Le Lac," the poet laments the inevitable passage of time, echoed in a lake's lapping waves, and asks the rocks and vegetation on the shore to attest to the moment of passion that he shared there, months earlier, while rowing his beloved who has since died. "L'Isolement" and "Le Vallon" imply in their descriptions of meadows and valleys an ascent toward the Christian paradise, with death proclaimed as a joyous release. Less religious but just as poignant in their depictions of the instability of human attachments are Marceline Desbordes-Valmore's Poésies (1830) and Les Pleurs (1833). The direct evocations of hardship (e.g., the illness and death of a child, abandonment by a lover) and subtle reversals of anticipated meanings near the ends of her poems are prime illustrations of poetry's power to surprise.

Hugo placed surprise at the heart of his romantic aesthetic, writing in Les Contemplations (1856) that, when reading lyric verse, "Il faut que, par instants, on frissonne, et qu'on voie / Tout à coup, sombre, grave et terrible au passant, / Un vers fauve sortir de l'ombre en rugissant!" (We must, at some moments, shudder when we see / All of a sudden, the dark, somber and terrifying movement / Of a wild verse emerge from the darkness roaring!). Having published in 1822 a first volume of verse that reworked legends of folklore (Les Odes et poésies diverses), Hugo set a new course with his second book, Les Orientales (1829). In it, he depicted distant lands while working out a broad variety of verse forms that detached lyric from the dominant alexandrine line that Chénier and Lamartine had used. Embracing exoticism was not a novelty, since Montesquieu had made the subject popular almost a century earlier with his Lettres persanes and exiled writers such as Chateaubriand had placed their prose dramas in distant countries (the latter's René and Atala are set in Amerindian territories around the Mississippi). Hugo too would undergo the rigors of exile in 1851 when he fled France to protest Napoleon III's reign, spending 19 years on the island of Guernsey. Yet by tying Hugo's poetry to a setting in Muslim North Africa and Spain, Les Orientales set in motion an appropriation of other cultures, epochs, and langs. that would become a hallmark of *romanticism and make its poetry a fundamentally composite genre.

In the shorter preface to Les Orientales, Hugo compared the new literary movement to a med. town whose irregular streets, winding between buildings of all types, and teeming citizenry, living amid disorder and change, represented the ferment of life. Instead of imitating Gr. and Roman subjects (as Chénier and earlier poets had done), Hugo challenged his contemporaries to engage readers with outbursts of energy and passion drawn not only from remote places (Egypt, Constantinople, or the Danube basin) but from different epochs (biblical times, the Middle Ages, or contemp. events). Alfred de Vigny rose to the challenge, evoking in such poems as "La Maison du berger" and "L'Esprit pur" the joy of being transported beyond the mod. world of railways and riches to seats of lasting power—nature's gradual changes or the realm of spiritual serenity. Another poet who defined poetry as a spiritual quest was Gérard de Nerval (1808–55). His two-volume Voyage en Orient chronicles his travels to North Africa, while his trans. of J. W. Goethe's Faust led him to discover Ger. mythology. In his collection of sonnets Les Chimères (1854), he excelled in transposing personal grief into psychological studies of heroes from ancient, Christian, or Eng. myths. Théophile Gautier (1811–72) lived for a period in Spain, and while there composed España (1845), which began the transpositions of paintings and sculptures that would exemplify his cult of beauty in Emaux et camées (1852).

Romanticism's complex appropriation of other worlds and the creation of composite verses that collated the diversity of France's colonial empire in Africa, the Caribbean, and the Pacific gained impetus from several writers who had first-hand knowledge of lands beyond Europe. Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle's Poèmes barbares (1872) draws on Hindu myths, tropical vegetation, and animals common to the Asian and Af. continents, as well as elements gleaned from the first 18 years of his life on a sugar plantation in Reunion, an island in the Indian Ocean. Like J.-M. de Heredia, who left his native Cuba in 1850 at age eight, Leconte de Lisle (1818–94) wrote finely crafted poems based on myths of different civilizations, and both poets began by publishing discrete poems in an anthol. entitled Le Parnasse contemporain in 1866. Along with François Coppée and other poets published in the collection, both authors adopted the name Parnassiens (see PARNASSIANISM) and developed the doctrine of art for art's sake first proposed by Gautier in 1836. According to Gautier, poetry could attain greatness only by abandoning any claim to moral pronouncements or the analysis of sentiment and by instead transposing into words the richness of color and composition exemplified in the plastic arts (see AESTHETICISM). Another poet of foreign birth, the Uruguay-born Isidore Ducasse (1846–70), published under the pseud. Comte de Lautréamont a long prose poem in six cantos, Les Chants de Maldoror (1869). It recounts in graphic detail the struggle between God and a romantic hero (whose name in the book's title illustrates romanticism's privileging of liminal moments between night and day: mal d'aurore). The publisher decided that, given the work's seeming immorality, it was better to distribute it outside France, which meant that it was little read until Remy de Gourmont praised its formal beauty in 1891. The composite genre of poetry in prose had been tried earlier by Aloysius Bertrand in his posthumous Gaspard de la nuit (1842). Most of its short texts are either portraits of artisans or detailed descriptions of landscapes, so that the work in its entirety is reminiscent of paintings by Johannes Vermeer and other Dutch artists. While acknowledging Bertrand, in the preface to Le Spleen de Paris (1869), Baudelaire pushed the hybrid genre in a new direction and linked the fluid rhythms of poetic prose to surprises and ecstatic moments found by a man walking through Paris. Giving his book the subtitle Petits poèmes en prose, Baudelaire also coined the term prose poems.

Widely considered the most important poet of the 19th c. and the writer responsible for placing poetry at the vanguard of artistic experimentation and ethical questioning, at least up until the surrealists of the 1930s, Baudelaire led a life marked by debt, illness, and a difficult stepfather. His early publications were reviews of the annual Parisian Salons, in which painters such as Eugène Delacroix exhibited their work. The first Fr. translator of E. A. Poe and an admirer of Gautier, he reoriented romanticism with his masterpiece Les Fleurs du mal, which was censored two months after its publication in 1857 for causing an outrage to morality. Baudelaire maintained that the judgment betrayed a misreading of his book since the poems' depictions of sadism, prostitution, and other addictions do not glorify evil but unmask the hypocrisy of his day. The first and longest section in the book, "Spleen et Idéal," also demonstrates what prevents human beings from achieving a romantic fusion with Beauty or Nature. First there is resignation to despair and then comes the numbing effect occasioned by merely satisfying our appetites, instead of embracing life's unpredictability and its fragile richness. The two poles of human experience—ecstasy or the enslavement to false value—are evoked in the transporting rhythms and promised happiness of "L'Invitation au voyage" and in the claustrophobic melancholy of the fourth "Spleen" poem that begins "Quand le ciel bas et lourd pèse comme un couvercle . . ." (When the low and heavy sky weighs like a lid). Although famous for his poetry, Baudelaire had to write prose articles and reports to pay his creditors. His death at age 46 came two years before the appearance of his complete volume of prose poems.

Hugo outlived almost all the preceding writers, and he kept in touch with devels. in the romantic movement, from Lamartine's introspective questionings to Baudelaire's experimental fusions of verse and ethics, prose and poetry. Hugo's own verse, however, followed its own trajectory. During his exile in Guernsey, he completed not only his novels Les Misérables and L'Homme qui rit but also satirical verses against Napoleon III, Les Châtiments, and some of his best-known poems. These appeared in the elegiac Contemplations (1856) and his epic recounting of humankind's rise to spirituality, La Légende des siècles, the three volumes of which were published in 1859, 1877, and 1883. The pantheistic beliefs that Hugo came to espouse during his exile were further developed in poems that appeared posthumously in Dieu and La Fin de Satan. When he died in 1885, Hugo was celebrated as a national hero, for his return to France in 1870 had coincided with the abdication of Napoleon III and a humiliating defeat of the Fr. army by Prussia. His body lay in state at the Arc de Triomphe but he had insisted before his death that his corpse be laid in a pauper's coffin. The procession taking the coffin on its workhouse hearse took six hours to move through the crowd and reach the Pantheon, where Hugo was then buried alongside France's greatest.

C. Symbolism. Stéphane Mallarmé (1842–98) wrote in his essay "Crise de vers" (1886, 1896) that Hugo's death was the turning point for Fr. poetry, since the fixed verse patterns that Hugo and the romantics had perfected had died with him. Mallarmé's disciple Paul Valéry (1871–1945) would later characterize the contrast between Hugo and Mallarmé by an elliptical formula: "Hugo: how to say everything in verse. Mallarmé: how to say nothing except what is verse." Not only does this motto point to a radical change, underscored by Mallarmé, in the sorts of things that poems should say—not *information, facts, or what the latter termed "l'universel reportage"—but it indicates a break in the way that a poem actually says anything. Versification was altered but so too was what it served. Both of these changes reverberated throughout the loosely associated group of poets known as the symbolists.

To start with versification, the freeing of verse had begun 20 years earlier. After Paul Verlaine's Poèmes saturniens appeared in 1866, more poems eschewed the standard alexandrine line and used lines of ten, eight, four, seven or five syllables. The last two cases were important since an uneven number of syllables meant that verses were no longer divisible into symmetrical halves, which allowed poems where the rhythms often ran from one uneven verse line into another. Verlaine (1844–96) developed this technique in his books Fêtes galantes (1869) and Romances sans paroles (1874), and the use of uneven syllabic lines became a credo in his poem "Art poétique," which called for allying poetry with music, while loosening semantic exactitude through combinations of sounds. Arthur Rimbaud (1854–91), who accompanied Verlaine during extended stays in Belgium and England, freed the alexandrine further from its stock rhythms by using run-on lines and surprising pauses at the beginnings or ends of the lines. His poem "A la musique" (written in 1870) goes beyond Verlaine since, in all his verses, Rimbaud blended innovative rhythms with ironic twists of meaning. So, when readers reach the end of "Le Bateau ivre" or "Les Effarés," they are shocked to find that what they assumed to be either the subject or the tone of the poem is upturned. Rimbaud's extremely short poetic career, from age 16 to 18, encompassed intense spells of creativity in which he not only produced experimental verses but pushed the prose poem to new heights—in Une saison en enfer (A Season in Hell, 1873) and Illuminations, which was published after his death.

Common to Verlaine's moody evocations of landscapes and solitude and to Rimbaud's complex staging of sentiments is the belief that a poem's force lies not in its mode of representation (or its ability to describe everyday scenes and emotions) but in the innovative effects that the poem produces for its readers. This lies at the heart of not only the symbolists' fascination with music but their emphasis on suggesting multiple meanings in the same poem, so that the text's patternings outdo in richness the events or thoughts that led to its composition. Jule Laforgue's parodies of romantic melancholy in Les Complaintes (1885) give a comic tone to this self-reflexivity, while Jean Moréas (1856–1910), who wrote a symbolist *manifesto in 1886, evokes the power of fleeting illusions in his collection Les Syrtes (1884). It was, however, Mallarmé's poetry that exemplified a poem's ability to stand as a self-sufficient object whose sounds and senses echo each other indefinitely. Although he published relatively few verses, some prose poems, and influential essays, his reunions every Tuesday with fellow poets helped establish him as the unofficial leader of *symbolism. His one collection of poems, Poésies, appeared in 1899, a year after his death, and contained "L'Après-midi d'un faune" (initially written for a staged performance to be accompanied with a score by Claude Debussy) along with sonnets that illustrated his goal of "painting not the thing but the effect that it creates."

Paul Valéry gave theoretical support to the symbolists' belief that a poem could create new experiences. Setting aside poetry in 1892, he devoted the next 20 years to writing down his reflections on mathematics, philosophy, and lang. in essays such as "Une soirée avec Monsieur Teste" and in notebooks that he would work on each morning after rising at 5:00. Covering a wide range of topics, the notebooks scrutinize the symbolic transformations, or what Valéry called a calculus, that give words their power. Rather than reflect preexistent ideas or thoughts, words for Valéry are integers in pragmatic calculations whose utterances are meant to change the world, thus anticipating by 40 years Ludwig Wittgenstein's writings on lang.-games and J. L. Austin's notion of performatives (see SPEECH ACT THEORY). Valéry also recognized that poetry has more potential for transforming the meanings of utterances than any other use of written symbols. If we consider his poem of 1891 "Narcisse parle" (which the poet would revise later in his career, in order to perfect its sonic transformations), we find the Gr. mythological hero voicing his last thoughts before suicide:

> Farewell, lost reflection on the sealed up waters,
> Narcissus . . . this very name is a tender fragrance
> To the delicate heart. Sprinkle for the shades of the departed
> This empty grave with petals from the funereal rose.

Not only do these lines take up aspects of the tragic search for self that Mallarmé had explored in his poem "Hérodiade" (1887), but they fuse a "name," a "fragrance," and a "heart" into one symbolic evocation by which the name becomes the fragrance, which in turn exchanges its "delicate" nature for the "tender" one associated with the heart. The fusion is helped by the phonetic properties of the name "Narcisse" that lends its sounds n (nom, name), ar (parfum, fragrance), and ss (suave, delicate) to the words following it. It is also helped semantically by the devel. of the flower code ("fragrance," "petals," "rose"), which is both a *metaphor for transient beauty and the context for the literal meaning of the common name "Narcissus." The aural properties of this particular word, in conjunction with its verbal associations, consequently turn it into the very name for the sadness-in-perfection that the poem unfolds. Valéry later took up writing verse long enough to publish his most famous collection, Charmes, in 1922. "Le Cimetière marin," one of its longer poems, is considered by many to be an illustration of Valéry's definition of poetic "charms"—"a prolonged hesitation [perceived by the reader] between [a verse's] sound and sense."

Another symbolist who pushed the boundaries of thought by creating a new poetic form was Victor Segalen (1878–1919). His collection Stèles (1914), written while the poet worked as a doctor in China, was based in part on two long journeys he made on foot and on horseback to the center of the country. Each stele offers lapidary pronouncements about different paths to joy. Paul Claudel (1868–1955) in his finely crafted prose poems Connaissance de l'Est (1914) drew inspiration from walking around Chinese cities. His later verse and dramatic works would use symbolist evocations of feeling as a path to Christian spirituality. Satirical poets had already put the performative power of poetry to new uses during the final decades of the 19th c. Meeting at the Chat Noir cabaret in Paris (1885–96), such fumiste writers as Alphonse Allais would perform spectacles overturning romantic or cl. works. Their biting humor and riffs on advertising and popular songs prepared the way for Dadaist performances a quarter-century later.

D. Avant-Gardes of the Twentieth Century. By 1912, Paris had become the cultural capital of Europe, attracting innovators in all branches of the arts. Important collaborations ensued between artists working in different media. Painters from abroad, such as Pablo Picasso, would join experimenters such as Sergei Diaghilev and his Rus. ballet troupe to produce works that set new aesthetic standards. The poet Guillaume Apollinaire (1880–1918) wrote program notes for Diaghilev's ballet Parade as well as the first essays explaining cubist painting to the general public (see CUBISM).

Poetry played a key role in the devel. of these avant-garde aesthetics (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS). In 1908, the young writer Jules Romains (1885–1972) published a book-length poem in two parts called La Vie unanime that called for a new form of lit., unanimism. Written in verses of varying syllabic counts grouped into regular stanzas, the book demonstrates how individual consciousness can be absorbed by the various rhythms of life around it—animal, chemical, electrical, machine or human. The massed comings and goings of city crowds inspired many of Romains's pages. F. T. Marinetti's "Futurist Manifesto," pub. in Paris a year later, cut poetry free from old myths such as idealizing statuesque beauty. It proposed instead that a new cult be formed around speed and the dynamism of machines. Blaise Cendrars's 1913 poem "Prose du Transsibérien et de la petite Jehanne de France" is an account written in *free verse of a train journey across Russia, and it evokes the giddiness of hurtling through time and space that futurists valued. Nevertheless, there is a tension in the poem between nostalgia for the past and the dynamism of fast travel (see FUTURISM).

The writer who best captured the exhilaration of the new horizons made possible by mass communication, the telegraph, and travel was Apollinaire. His book Alcools (1913) opens with the declaration "A la fin tu es las de ce monde ancien" and goes on to praise the poetry of advertisements, catalogs, and posters. After enlisting in the Fr. army in World War I, Apollinaire would write part of his most innovative volume, Calligrammes (1918), while serving at the front. Printed on army paper, the third part of the book was distributed to fellow soldiers, and it contains some poems lamenting lost comrades and turning the soldiers' routine and squalid conditions into beautiful testimonials. The visual form of some *calligrammes, scattering words and letters across the page, allowed Apollinaire to embed his verses within line drawings of a heart, a fountain, or a rifle. Mallarmé's philosophical poem Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice, 1897) had been the first work to exploit the entire space of a page, allowing readers to scan words in multiple directions, but Apollinaire's war poems and Pierre Reverdy's book Les Ardoises du toit (Roof Slates, 1918) used new typographical arrangements to evoke simple situations that resonate through a web of strong emotions (see TYPOGRAPHY).

As the reality of the Great War's slaughter and futility became known, some artists used poetry's performative force to attack the basis of everyday lang. that for them had been contaminated by politicians' speeches and jingoistic nationalism. In April 1916, a group of performers began an entertainment review, the Cabaret Voltaire, in a Zurich café. Their rallying cry was "Dada," which they defined not as an aesthetic movement but as a systematic destruction of meaning. The *Dada manifestos were not published but proclaimed in public alongside *performance poems—sound events juxtaposing phonemes from different langs. and recited by different performers. Paris became a center of Dada creativity once Tristan Tzara came there in 1920 to join writers of an experimental review called Littérature. Two of the writers, André Breton (1896–1966) and Philippe Soupault (1897–1990), had developed a technique of collaboratively transcribing dreams, which they called automatic writing. Others such as Robert Desnos (1900–45), Paul Éluard (1895–1952), and Louis Aragon (1897–1982) published poems in which sounds or typographical shapes were reinvented. These innovations precipitated calls for a new lyricism that would directly express the unconscious while being a collaborative endeavor, since artistic *"genius," according to these writers, was illusory. Their rallying call appeared in 1924 under the title Surrealist Manifesto, which borrowed its name from a term that Apollinaire had used earlier to describe artists' refusal to slavishly copy traditional forms.

Combining the iconoclastic force of Dada (esp. in their public denunciations of idealist art) with a new cult of feminine beauty, the surrealists wrote novels, essays, and poems that gave voice to nascent desire. Love lyrics such as Éluard's "L'Amoureuse" in Capitale de la douleur (1926) show that refusals of conventional logic (the poem begins "She is standing on my eyelids") can allow rhetorical figures to represent the all-encompassing power of passion. Fraught by internal struggles, *surrealism lost many of its members by the mid-1930s, after expelling Aragon for putting Communism before art or attacking rival groups such as the review Le Grand Jeu. The latter's cofounder, René Daumal, had set the foundations for a poetry of change and a rejection of self-identity in his Contre-ciel (1936). Although some surrealist poems such as Éluard's "Liberté" became famous statements of resistance during the Nazi occupation of France, by 1945 the movement had ceased being a mirror for important innovations in poetry.

E. Strands of Post–World War II Poetry. No one movement or set of aesthetic principles characterizes the broad diversity of poems published since 1950. Yet common strands in these works emerge once we examine three types of action that mod. poetry accomplishes in its efforts to change the world—political action, transformation of a person's interactions with the material world, and the forging of new connections with other forms of expression.

Poetry's power to disrupt not only political doxa but facile uses of lang. is brilliantly illustrated by René Char's wartime fragments collected in Feuillets d'Hypnos (1946) and by his finely crafted books La Parole en archipel (1962) and Aromates chasseurs (1975). However, it was outside France that one poem gained fame as a rallying cry for justice, not only in the Caribbean of which it speaks, but across the francophone world. Aimé Césaire's Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Notebook of a Return to the Native Land, 1939) is part narrative and part invective against the inequalities imposed by Caribbean plantation economies and colonialism. Its 174 stanzas in free verse are tightly organized around recurring phrases that rise in a concluding crescendo that calls on the black population of Martinique (and other islands) to shake off its collective shame and fight for self-determination. The first text to make use of the term négritude*, Césaire's poem inspired many writers in and beyond France to blend poetry and political commitment. The Guadeloupean writer Édouard Glissant (1928–2011) connected the hist. of Caribbean slavery to early epochs in the trade and uses of salt throughout his *long poem Le Sel noir (1960). Modeled on the renewed epic form of Saint-John Perse's Amers (1957), with its long stanzas of free verse and complex forms of address, Glissant scans lost civilizations of Carthage, Rome, and Celtic Brittany as well as Africa. He also turns Perse's chronicles of individual quests (most notably in Anabase, 1924) into a song of peoples on the move. Léopold Sédar Senghor developed Césaire's concept of négritude in his fusion of West African trads. and politically inspiring lyrics (Ethiopiques, 1956), while Raymond LeBlanc's Cri de terre (1972) unearths the violent suppression of Acadian culture in the coastal landscape of New Brunswick, Canada. Michèle Lalonde's poster-poem "Speak White" (1970) allies the call for Quebecois' self-respect to that of black pride. More recently, Herménégilde Chiasson and Robert Dickson have crafted poetic monuments to the anxieties of Fr.-speaking cultures in the anglophone Canadian Maritimes and Ontario.

A second strand of political poetry developed in the wake of Francis Ponge's (1899–1988) method of implying a materialist theory of happiness through meditations on objects and nature. The intricate prose poems of his Le parti pris des choses (1942) underscore modes of living that are in harmony with the rhythms of nonhuman organisms. "Notes pour un coquillage" argues that lang. should be used not as a mirror for ideas but as a tool for improving our lives with others, and this lesson was not lost on writers who turned to poetry in order to reinvigorate lang. and reconnect speakers with the material world. Eugène Guillevic (1907–97) developed his own minimalist forms of lyric that celebrate natural forces and the lessons they embody. Yves Bonnefoy (b. 1923), France's most famous poet of the second half of the 20th c., has written essays and poems in which a search for presence is the overarching goal; poets such as Philippe Jaccottet (b. 1925) have continued in this vein. André du Bouchet (1924–2001) wrote experimental poems in which the careful placement of a few words in unique typographical arrangements across entire pages is part of a conjoined exploration of lang.'s potential and of life rhythms connecting a walker to the hills he traverses. The poems of Jacques Dupin, André Frénaud, or Jacques Réda are less experimental than du Bouchet's, yet they continue to fathom the human body's relation to space, as does the work of Jacqueline Risset and James Sacré. Bernard Noël has developed a highly original form of philosophical poetry that proposes the singularity of bodily sensation as a counterweight to idealist illusions. In Noël's book La Chute des temps (1983), perceptions are transposed as events that allow us to escape the hold of clock time, grounding poetry in an awareness of living that is close to the self-sufficient joys described by Baudelaire.

A final group of writers has reinvented poetry's ties to other art forms. Beginning with Henri Michaux (1899–1984), the shared mechanics of writing and drawing have become central to poems that exploit typographical invention. Concrete poets Pierre Garnier (b. 1928) and Jean-Pierre Faye (b. 1925) moved beyond Apollinaire's shoehorning of spoken verses into calligrams and proposed new types of visual syntax (see CONCRETE POETRY). Pierre-Albert Jourdain (1924–91) and Michel Deguy (b. 1930) managed, in different ways, to draw innovative effects from varying their poems' visual shape. Emmanuel Hocquard (b. 1940) has experimented with poems written in a tabular form (in Théorie des tables) or with poetry and photography. Members of the *Oulipo group refuse the assumption that lyric verse expresses an individual's emotions and invented numerical patterns for syllabic and linear arrangement that place mathematical properties, rather than sentiment, at the heart of a poem. For instance, Jacques Roubaud's collection of verses ∈ (1967) is structured around moves in the Japanese game Go. Michelle Grangaud's Geste: narrations (1991) is composed of three-line stanzas (with lines of five, five, and eleven syllables), each of which recounts a circumstance that may be combined with other stanzas to produce an indeterminate number of narratives. By bringing into question the opposition between narrative and lyric, Oulipo writers and others such as Pierre Alféri and Dominique Fourcade might be said to have brought Fr. poetry full circle, since their work recalls the formal experiments of Occitan and early Fr. writers who blended elements of the two forms.

See CANADA, POETRY OF; CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE; MEDIEVAL POETRY; NEOCLASSICAL POETICS; RENAISSANCE POETRY; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS.

■ Anthologies, Manifestos, and Translations: Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie négre et malgache, ed. L. S. Senghor (1942); Modern French Verse, ed. P. Mansell Jones (1957); Anthologie de la poésie française du XVIème siècle, ed. F. Gray (1962); Anthology of Modern French Poetry, ed. C. A. Hackett (1967); A. Breton, Manifestoes of Surrealism, trans. R. Seaver and H. R. Lane (1969); La Poésie française des origines à nos jours: Anthologie, ed. C. Bonnefoy (1975); Modern French Poetry: A Bilingual Anthology, ed. P. Terry and S. Gavronsky (1975); Anthologie des grands rhétoriqueurs, ed. P. Zumthor (1978); T. Tzara, Sept manifestes Dada, Lampisteries (1978); L'Anthologie arbitraire d'une nouvelle poésie, 1960–82: Trente poètes, ed. H. Deluy (1983); The Random House Book of Twentieth-Century French Poetry, ed. P. Auster (1984); The Defiant Muse: French Feminist Poets from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. D. C. Stanton (1986); Anthologie de la poésie du XVIIe siècle, ed. J.-P. Chauveau (1987); Anthologie de la poésie lyrique française des XIIe et XIIIe siècles, ed. J. Dufournet (1989); La Poésie acadienne, 1948–1988, ed. G. Leblanc and C. Beausoleil (1992); Poèmes de femmes des origines à nos jours, ed. R. Deforges (1993); "La Poésie contemporaine en France," Littéréalité, ed. S. Villani (1994); Anthology of First World War French Poetry, ed. I. Higgins (1996); Les Poètes du Chat Noir, ed. A. Velter (1996); Anthologie de la poésie française, ed. J.-P. Chauveau, G. Gros, D. Ménager (vol. 1), M. Bercot, M. Collot, C. Seth (vol. 2) (2000); Anthologie de la poésie française du XX siècle, ed. M. Décaudin (2000); Anthologie de la poésie française du XVIe siècle, ed. J. Céard and L.-G. Tin (2005); Futurist Manifestos, ed. U. Apollonio (2009).

■ Criticism and History: T. de Banville, Petit traité de poésie française (1935); J. Paulhan, Clef de la poésie (1944); S. Bernard, Le Poème en prose de Baudelaire jusqu'à nos jours (1959); R. Lalou, Histoire de la poésie française (1963); M. Sanouillet, Dada à Paris (1965); G. E. Clancier, De Chénier à Baudelaire (1970); Essais de sémiotique poétique, ed. J. A. Greimas (1972); G. Brereton, An Introduction to the French Poets (1973); The Appreciation of Modern French Poetry: 1850–1950, ed. P. Broome and G. Chesters (1976); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); J.-M. Gleize, Poésie et figuration (1983); The Prose Poem in France: Theory and Practice, ed. M. A. Caws and H. Riffaterre (1983); M. Riffaterre, Text Production, trans. T. Lyons (1983); M. Bishop, Contemporary French Women Poets (1984–85); W. Calin, In Defense of French Poetry: An Essay in Revaluation (1987); R. Chambers, Meaning and Meaningfulness (1987); R. R. Hubert, Surrealism and the Book (1988); M. Collot, La Poésie moderne et la structure d'horizon (1989); J. Chénieux-Gendron, Surrealism (1990); C. Prendergast, Nineteenth-Century French Poetry: Introductions to Close Readings (1990); The Ladder of High Design: Structure and Interpretation of the French Lyric Sequence, ed. D. Fenoaltea and D. L. Rubin (1991); Poetry in France: Metamorphoses of a Muse, ed. K. Aspley and P. France (1992); "Mallarmè, Theorist of Our Times," ed. S. Winspur, Dalhousie French Studies 25 (1993)—spec. iss.; Understanding French Poetry: Essays for a New Millennium, ed. S. Metzidakis (1994); P. D. Cate and M. Shaw, The Spirit of Montmartre: Cabarets, Humor, and the Avant-Garde, 1875–1905 (1995); A. Gendre, Evolution du sonnet français (1996); La Poésie française du Moyen Age jusqu'à nos jours, ed. M. Jarrety (1997); C. Scott, The Poetics of French Verse (1998); E. S. Burt, Poetry's Appeal: Nineteenth-Century French Lyric and the Political Space (1999); S. Gaunt and S. Kay, The Troubadours: An Introduction (1999); J.-J. Thomas and S. Winspur, Poeticized Language: The Foundations of Contemporary French Poetry (1999); Poétiques de la Renaissance: Le modèle italien, le monde franco-bourguignon et leur héritage en France au XVIème siècle, ed. P. Galand-Hallyn and F. Hallyn (2001); F. Rigolot, Poésie et Renaissance (2002); M. Shaw, The Cambridge Introduction to French Poetry (2003); A Short History of French Literature, ed. S. Kay, T. Cave and M. Bowie (2003); G. W. Fetzer, Palimpsests of the Real in Recent French Poetry (2004); J. Acquisito, French Symbolist Poetry and the Idea of Music (2006); C. Chi-ah Lyu, A Sun within a Sun: The Power and Elegance of Poetry (2006); Sens et présence du sujet poétique: La poésie de la France et du monde francophone depuis 1980, ed. M. Brophy and M. Gallagher (2006); J. Petterson, Poetry Proscribed: Twentieth-Century (Re)Visions of the Trials of Poetry in France (2008); "Uncanny Poetry/ Méconnaissance de la poésie," ed. C. Wall-Romana, L'Esprit Créateur 49.2 (2009)—spec. iss.; Cambridge History of French Literature, ed. W. Burgwinkle, N. Hammond, and E. Wilson (2011); A. Armstrong and S. Kay, Knowing Poetry: Verse in Medieval France from the "Rose" to the "Rhétoriqueurs" (2011).

J. S. Helgeson (med. to early mod.);
S. Winspur (early mod. to 20th c.)

FRANCOPHONE POETS OF THE U.S. While poems written in Fr. can be found in the archives of some New England newspapers or as a curiosity among the minor work of writers such as Jack Kerouac and T. S. Eliot, they form a major component of the lit. hist. of Louisiana. Until recently, this body of poetry was virtually erased from the lit. hist. of the U.S.

Louisiana was established as a Fr. colony in 1699. Two Fr.-born writers of this era produced neoclassical poems distinguished more for their New World subject matter than their literary quality. Jean François Dumont de Montigny composed a long poem in *alexandrines about the 1729 Natchez Indian massacre of Fr. settlers. In the late 1770s, Julien Poydras de Lalande, who later served in the U.S. Congress, published two anonymous verse pamphlets and a signed poem praising Sp. governor Bernardo de Gálvez.

Following the Louisiana Purchase of 1803, Fr. became a means by which "Creole" descendants of colonial settlers, whether black or white, could differentiate themselves from the Eng.-speaking "Americans" whom they perceived to be crude and lacking in culture. Francophone newspapers flourished, and from the 1830s on, they published thousands of poems and stories by local writers. "Standard" or Parisian Fr. was the norm for literary writing, regardless of the regional dialect spoken at home.

Fr. romantic poets Victor Hugo, Alphonse de Lamartine, Alfred de Musset, and Pierre-Jean de Béranger influenced Louisiana poets of the first half of the 19th c. Tullius St.-Céran, Constant Lépouzé, Urbain David, and Auguste Lussan wrote historical odes on heroic subjects like the Battle of New Orleans or the July 1830 revolution. Louisiana "Creole of color" Victor Séjour, educated in France like many young men of his social class, wrote a poem that won him political favor about the return of Napoleon's ashes to Paris; he went on to become a famous Parisian playwright.

Brothers Dominique and Adrien Rouquette, educated in France, wrote long narrative poems reflecting their fascination with Native Am. culture and the Am. wilderness: Adrien became a hermit-priest ministering to a Choctaw Indian tribe. Alexandre Latil, diagnosed with leprosy while still in his teens, moved to a remote cabin and wrote moving poems about love, time, and loss. He published Les Éphémères (1841), a well-received poetry collection, prior to his death at 35.

Les Cenelles (1845), ed. Armand Lanusse, was the first literary anthol. by poets of color published in the U.S. Its title translates as "The Mayhaws," indigenous fruits from a prickly hawthorn shrub. The 85 poems by 17 free men of color take up typical romantic themes of love, death, and nature rather than race; but some poems present an ideal of feminine beauty that is darker than the blue-eyed blonde of continental Fr. romanticism, and others protest the hated social custom of plaçage between free women of color and white Frenchmen. The strongest poet in the anthol., Camille Thierry, later published the collection Les Vagabondes (1874) in France. Joanni Questy and Mirtil-Ferdinand Liotau contributed memorable lyrics, and Séjour's Napoleonic *ode was included.

In the second half of the century, Marxist themes appear in the works of Joseph Déjacques, Charles Testut, and Pierre-Aristide Desdunes—the latter a Creole of color. The Civil War inspired some odes to the Confederacy; those by F. Colin and Charles Délery are of better quality than most. Answering them were Joseph Chaumette's abolitionist verse pamphlet and numerous poems praising the bravery of black Civil War soldiers. During the Reconstruction, the topic of racial injustice erupted in impassioned poems by Pierre L'Hermite (a pseud.), Camille Naudin, Victor-Ernest Rillieux, and Desdunes, among others. Léona Queyrouze wrote a *sonnet sequence lamenting the 1891 massacre of 11 It. prisoners by a vigilante mob in New Orleans, while Jules Choppin published verse fables in Creole dialect.

Between 1916 and 1923, Louisiana banned the use of Fr. in schools and state facilities. Speaking Fr. became a mark of shame, the last Fr.-lang. newspaper closed down, and the francophone literary trad. all but died out. But the formation of the Council for Development of French in Louisiana (CODOFIL) in 1968 to preserve the state's Fr. heritage has reversed those trends and sparked a literary renaissance.

Unlike their predecessors, contemp. francophone poets have written most often in Cajun or Creole dialect rather than in standard Fr. The Cajun poets, descendants of the Fr. Acadians expelled from Nova Scotia by the Brit. in 1755, include the well-known musician Zachary Richard, winner of Canada's Prix Champlain for Literature; "Jean Arceneaux," the pseud. of Cajun folklorist Barry Ancelet; Beverly Matherne; Carol Doucet; Kirby Jambon; and David Cheramie. The hybrid Fr.-Af. "Creole" lang., denigrated as "dirty French" in previous century, has been the choice of poets Debbie Clifton and Sybil Kein.

■ A. Lanusse, ed., Les Cenelles (1848); A. Fortier, "French Literature in Louisiana," PMLA 2 (1886); R. L. Desdunes, Nos Hommes et Notre Histoire (1911); R. Caulfeild, The French Literature of Louisiana (1929); E. L. Tinker, Les Écrits de langue française en Louisiane au xixe siècle (1932); Creole Voices, ed. E. M. Coleman (1932); Cris sur le bayou, ed. B. J. Ancelet (1980); M. Fabre, "The New Orleans Press and French-Language Literature by Creoles of Color," Multilingual America, ed. W. Sollors (1998); Creole, ed. S. Kein (2000); M. Allain, ed., Louisiana Literature and Literary Figures (2004); N. Shapiro, ed., Creole Echoes (2004); C. Brasseux, French, Cajun, Creole, Houma (2005); D. Kress, "Pierre-Aristide Desdunes, Les Cenelles, and the Challenge of Nineteenth-Century Creole Literature," Southern Quarterly 44 (2007).

J. Kane

FRANKFURT SCHOOL. The unofficial, popular name for the Institut für Sozialforschung (Institute for Social Research), founded in 1923 and affiliated, except for its exile during the National Socialist regime and immediately thereafter, with the University of Frankfurt in Germany. The institute launched its work with the goals of innovating the methodologies and analytical possibilities for empirical social research; its work has focused on those (esp. the working class) who under duress confront the complexities of mod., industrial-capitalist society. Moreover, the Frankfurters sought to develop alternatives to what they considered the determinist rigidity of the orthodox Left and specifically Marxian theory, whether Social Democratic or Leninist. That rigidity, the Frankfurters argued, had contributed to the absence of a more robust critical consciousness and a sensing of agency among classes, groups, and individuals open to grasping and acting on the need for profound social transformation. Contesting such determinism, and esp. conceptual determinism, the Frankfurters began to rearticulate the importance of lit. and the other arts by noting, among other things, that Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels had themselves emphasized the links—apparently necessary, inextricable links—between imaginative/literary/aesthetic experience and the inculcation of both relentless critical thinking (the young Marx's famous call for "the ruthless critique of everything in existence") and sustained transformative action. Bringing Marx, Engels, and related precursors together with their own sense of how lit. and the other arts had sparked critical agency throughout hist. (and had done so with special urgency in the mod. period stretching from *romanticism through *modernism and *avant-garde experimentalism), the Frankfurters demonstrated their conviction that art could act decisively on structural, socioeconomic dynamics and might indeed be the means through which certain aspects of sociohistorical devel. could become apprehensible in the first place.

Institute figures contributing to Frankfurt lit. crit. and *interpretation include Max Horkheimer, Erich Fromm, Leo Löwenthal, and Herbert Marcuse. But by far the most important Frankfurt critics and interpreters of literary, aesthetic, and cultural works are Theodor W. Adorno, who was recruited by Horkheimer to join the institute, and Walter Benjamin, the institute's most significant collaborator. Benjamin's and Adorno's writings on poetry are concerned with Homer, the Occitan *troubadours, Dante, Shakespeare, J. W. Goethe, Friedrich Schiller, Friedrich Hölderlin, Heinrich Heine, P. B. Shelley, John Keats, Charles Baudelaire, Arthur Rimbaud, Stéphane Mallarmé, Eduard Mörike, Rudolf Borchardt, Georg Trakl, Stefan George, Guillaume Apollinaire, André Breton, Paul Éluard, Gottfried Benn, Ezra Pound, Bertolt Brecht, Federico García Lorca, W. C. Williams, Wallace Stevens, Paul Celan, and others. Benjamin and Adorno esp. underscore that not only lit. but precisely lit.'s ostensibly most subjective, individualist, ephemeral, fragile literary phenomenon—mod. *lyric poetry—illuminates human beings' historical and existential experience of (and capacity to judge and thus challenge) capitalist society.

In autumn 1938, Benjamin presented to Adorno—for publication in the institute's jour., the Zeitschrift für Sozialforschung—"The Paris of the Second Empire in Baudelaire," Benjamin's "first" Baudelaire essay. The essay in many ways attempts to continue—or relocate on the terrain of artistic construction and lyric-aesthetic experience—Marx's historiographic masterpiece, The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte (1852). Taking as his point of departure the Brumaire's fond though unsparing critique of the bohème's "conspiratorial" rebelliousness, Benjamin builds elaborate parallels and discovers the intersecting levels where Baudelaire's poetry itself becomes the intriguingly antisocial conspirator whose socioconceptual-imaginative limits are those of present society. Baudelaire's fantastic creativity, intelligence, intuition, and bitter subversiveness, gathered into and animating his unique artistic talent, yield a lyric poetry unprecedentedly mod. in its aim homeopathically to inhabit—and thereby make imagistically available—the very frame and machinations of the mod. socioeconomic limit-phenomenon at issue, exchange value. Baudelaire burrows into, captures, and presents exchange value's manifestation-identity in and as mechanical reproduction, in and as commodity form. Baudelaire does this by apparently making the poem itself into, or by greatly intensifying its already achieved status as, a commodity. Benjamin underscores Baudelaire's genius in reconjuring previous sociohistorical, sociolinguistic, and specifically poetic senses of what commodities (Fr. biens, marchandises, denrées, produits; Ger. Waren) have previously been (goods, services, things deemed commodious, convenient, useful, fine, desirable).

Benjamin contends that Baudelaire's poetry not only speaks of this overarching commodity hist. but devastatingly reenacts it into and as poetry's own historical trajectory. Through a time-lapse crosscutting whose unfolding logic stretches from cl. and neoclassical poetic langs. of form and style to journalistic and street argots of his own early–late 19th c. lifetime, Baudelaire re-sounds while cannily channeling, often with intended hyperostentation, those diverse poetic trads. (incl. centuries of experiment with poetry's heightening of rich and sensuous particularity, centuries of treating lyric as particularity made into poetic principle and practice) into contemp. imaginings of fashionable, materialistic-consumerist luxury. Imaginings that perversely wind up ratifying rather than contesting the very social and existential mod. abstraction, the very fact of rule by a predetermined concept (here, the mod. concept exchange value), that lyric's commitment to sensuous particularity presumably aims to oppose.

Consequently, the artistic-aesthetic "aura" that Benjamin famously connects to preindustrial hists. in which particularity was able (with imagination's capacity for spontaneous—neither random nor as yet conceptually predetermined—experience and judgment) to voice itself as something potentially universally communicable (although the given particular's seemingly governing or determining concept did not as yet exist): this aura, semblance-form or recognized critical aesthetic illusion that could make something seemingly glimpsed or dimly felt against the context of its empirical absence, this entire constellated dynamic of aura, critical aesthetic autonomy, and experience, Benjamin claims, "withers" in the era of mechanical reproduction, the era of exchange-commodity valuation. And so too must lyric poetry's previous life—as alpha and omega of aura—wither. Though shot through with a bitter irony whose strains of pathos can still register some trace of the once formidable, haunting note of protest that inhered in lyric song's traditional refusal to be bound by mere saying (by the mere denotative stating of an already determined status quo), lyric poetry—understood historically, and esp. since recent romanticism, as the artistic-aesthetic apotheosis of an emancipatory human ability to exceed or transcend given, already determined, conceptual limits, to insist on experiencing and judging past them—now confesses itself in Baudelaire to have become nothing but the mod. commodity or, more precisely, the final triumph of mod., mechanical, exchange-commodity valuation, as lyric's very song finds itself and its whole prior hist. unable to do more than musically describe, rather than exceed, the conceptual limits, the imprisoning walls, within which it along with everyone and everything else is now held or determined: exchange-commodity value. (Later poets' experiments in making the poem seem like, or even become fully subsumed into mod. commodity status are generally thought to trace their paths back to this Baudelairean moment, and—esp. in *postmodernism—from Benjamin's influential interpretations of it.)

But Adorno thinks that Baudelaire's poetry goes significantly further than the brilliantly symptomizing, bitter homeopathy of exchange value and commodity form that Benjamin identifies; Adorno believes that Baudelaire's lyric poetry finally stretches past exchange-commodity value limits and that some of Benjamin's earlier writings had already begun to articulate this extra, supercharged, critical distance in Baudelaire and later Baudelairean poets. Adorno therefore argues that in "The Paris of the Second Empire in Baudelaire," Benjamin now, in line with "The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction" (1935) and kindred essays, has unfortunately limited not only Baudelaire but himself too—has constrained his understanding of Baudelaire's, of advanced lyric's, and of mod. art's critical value—by adopting an essentially orthodox Marxist-Leninist, resolutely determinist approach to exchange-commodity value by no longer holding that the human agency potentialized in lyric/aesthetic experience, and the critical reflection thereby generated, have the capacity to project judgments and valuations that exceed the conceptual limits of exchange-commodity value. Observing that at key moments "The Paris of the Second Empire" redirects its treatment of Baudelaire's poetry back to the commodity and that Benjamin consistently claims—citing Marx—that the commodity is defined entirely by labor, Adorno insists otherwise, noting that Marx had emphatically refused to halt at such a definition.

Adorno here evokes the final movement in Das Kapital's historical critique of exchange value/commodity form. Marx shows that the commodity's value derives not only from the conceptual abstraction of labor time but, crucially, from an ongoing, socially taken yet unspoken (and only recently apprehensible and, still more recently, Marx urges, contestable) judgment that this very abstraction of labor time must or should be the final basis for valuation/judgment.

Marx avers that this ability to transcend the conceptual abstraction of labor time as the ultimate determinant of socioeconomic value would break open—initially, via aesthetic judgment—exactly what aesthetic judgment by definition (since Kant at least) offers the form or semblance but not yet the substance of: an already extant, determined and determining concept. In such Kantian-aesthetic breaking open of extant, substantive-objective conceptual determination, the recognized and engaged semblance-form, illusion-form, or aesthetic illusion underwriting aesthetic quasi-conceptuality lets subjects feel or experience their semblance-play with conceptual form as if this play already were substantive-determinative-objective conceptuality, though a conceptuality somehow freely chosen rather than deterministically, "coercively" compelled (as almost all substantive—already determined—concepts perforce are; e.g., one is not "free" but is rather "coerced" by objective reality and the concepts that represent it to "agree" with basic concepts of mathematics that make two plus two equal four). Aesthetic judgment thus begins to enact, in semblance-form or the subject's reflective "subjective" engagement (rather than substantive-objective, already determined content), the experience and process, crucial to the sensing of critical agency, of the subject's being enabled to form, make, or construct something not conceptually predetermined that might yet noncoercively establish a new objectivated (genuinely universalizable) concept and/or value. Marx reiterates the need to break open this question of value when he demands that socioeconomic value be subject to a judgment process that aims for potentially universal concepts and objective realizations of them that are not required to have started from the ruling concept exchange-commodity value based only in labor-time. Economic modernity until his moment, Marx further argues, has been a hist. leading to capitalism's self-interested emancipation of labor-time made into exchange value; that emancipation has not only made the specific concept of exchange value decisive for capitalist socioeconomic valuation but has signified the socioeconomic triumph of determinate conceptualization itself. This enshrining of a concept or of conceptuality itself as the source and regulative principle of socioeconomic value (as opposed to previous, precapitalist regimes' tendency to charge a person or group with representing, as sovereign, a body of beliefs or doctrines that need subjective inflection because they are not, as exchange value will be, conceptually-logically formulated and fixed) holds enormously generative possibilities for mod. socioeconomic productive capacity. But aside—or flowing—from this new "conceptualist" (and, thus, already objectively determined) mode of production's tendency to expand its social character and the quantity of goods produced while simultaneously intensifying the disparities of wealth and resource distribution comes an increasing disappearance of particularity (related to if not wholly caused by the disappearance of use as a determinant of value when value becomes subject to universal predetermination by a perforce abstract concept). This theme, already developed by Marx and Engels, famously becomes in Benjamin and then Adorno's writings "the crisis and withering of experience and aura."

Furthermore, given this historical relation between conceptual abstraction per se and exchange-value abstraction and then given that lang. is deemed by Marx, Engels, and the Frankfurters the favored medium for significantly communicable conceptuality, there is already in Marx and Engels the noteworthy intensification of a high romantic theme (rooted deeper still in cl. poetics and aesthetics): lyric poetry bears a special, radical relationship to conceptuality as such and, hence, in modernity, to conceptuality's concretely practically realized socioeconomic identity as exchange-commodity value. Because of its distilled relationship to the ling. medium (often seeming to be nothing but lang. itself being voiced past its object-objective status toward musical songfulness), lyric understandably figures as the artistic form closest to the medium of thought. Lyric semblance hence stands as the artistic-aesthetic experience closest to the very act of thinking or conceiving (albeit thinking or conceiving experienced as if not yet conceptually predetermined).

To paraphrase alternative formulations that Marx and Engels suggest and that the Frankfurters enunciate in a fuller, more sustained manner: each art has its own unique character; that of lyric is to take lang, (the presumably bottom-line medium of objectivity and conceptuality) and, first, to subjectivize it, making something that seems formally like a concept but does something that objective concepts generally do not do with their ling. medium: sing. Each of the arts has its mode or modes of semblance. In lyric, semblance primarily involves making speech acts appear, feel, as if their very logic has compelled them somehow to burst—naturally, justifiably, as it were—toward or into something within the full range of what can seem musical or songful, which, when enacted in the poem, seems necessary but not predetermined and which, in its bursting (in a manner inseparable from pleasure) the formal contours of extant conceptuality, allows subjects a renewed sense of capacity or agency vis-à-vis materials that can eventually, postaesthetically, be grasped as reconceived or newly conceived sociopolitical, historical, and/or ethical content.

In sum, lyric's dynamic and medium uniquely capture the conceptual basis of mod. socioeconomic valuation and, at the same time, in extending past ling. objectivity, critically stretch experience and judgment beyond extant conceptual boundaries or determinants (incl. the socioeconomically dominant concept of exchange-commodity value).

Rearticulating and elaborating in Frankfurt vocabulary the relevant notions from Marx and Engels, Adorno highlights how Benjamin intuitively grasps that Baudelaire takes as subject matter modernity's problematic socioeconomic apotheosis of determinate conceptuality—and, vice versa, that Baudelaire's tortured explorations of infernal, experience-denying mod. determinism register an abiding reality: the nonexperience of human beings for whom judgment has by definition been made external or irrelevant to the capacity for critical agency. Adorno therefore urges Benjamin to extend the analysis to consider whether Baudelaire's wager—about making a profoundly mod. lyric poetry just when the experiential conditions for significant lyric appear to have gone missing—might have to inculcate critique of the concept-practice exchange value. Benjamin goes on to write a second essay, "On Some Motifs in Baudelaire" (1939–40), that Adorno immediately feels (as he indicates in his writings) has taken poetics, aesthetics, and critical theory to a level that Benjamin alone could have reached. The reception hist. tends to confirm Adorno's assessment; "On Some Motifs in Baudelaire" is widely regarded as one of the great 20th-c. essays on mod. poetry, social analysis, and critical theory. While not giving up on philological method and immanent engagement with materials, Benjamin alters his view of Baudelaire's enterprise. Benjamin does not move Baudelaire thematically from seductive, intriguing but commodified brasserie backrooms to more revolutionary contributions at the barricade frontlines. Instead, he shows the poetry to be struggling formally with, rather than simply reproducing, exchange value and mechanical reproduction. Confronting mechanical reproduction's and exchange value's tendency to cause the withering of charged auratic distance and reflective experience/judgment, and the withering of uncompromising, searching lyric musicality, Baudelaire's poetry discovers critical (not consolatory or redemptive but probing) formal means to wrest a sense of aura from aura's absence; it discovers how to invest the seeming unavailability of reflective experience with the charge and force of reflective experience (so that one can become enabled to reflect, for starters, on what it means to appear to have lost reflective capacity itself). Baudelaire's poetry—in, as, lyric—discovers anew how to sing song's apparent impossibility and thereby to allow subjects to begin to apprehend both extant social determinations and human beings' critical capacity to feel and think past them.

These exchanges with Adorno lead Benjamin toward the drafting of Theses on the Philosophy of History (1940). Hence Benjamin's much-discussed angel of hist., hidden hunchback, and the notion of weak messianic power—and much more in the poetics of what remains to this day the Left's perhaps most celebrated self-critique of mechanistic determinism—appears to arise from intense engagement with mod. lyric's difficult explorations of aura, semblance character, and experience in confrontation with the concept-practice of exchange-commodity value. For his part, Adorno repeatedly indicates that Benjamin's acute enunciation of Baudelairean lyric's ability simultaneously to capture and exceed exchange-commodity value deeply colors everything Adorno proceeds to write not only about lyric but about the hist. and critical potential of the other arts as well. The influence evidences itself immediately in Adorno and Horkheimer's 1944 Dialectic of Enlightenment, in the critique of an instrumental rationality that causes conceptuality to lose contact with aesthetic-imaginative exploration of the difference and otherness residing beyond known predetermined conceptual borders, and in the text's various excursions, not least, the virtuosic treatment of the Odyssey's telling of Odysseus's self-torturing experience of the Sirens' song, a foreshadowing of lyric modernity's much later retrospective explorations of its own prehists. in the division of labor, and in the self-sacrifice Western culture seems ab ovo to have needed to pit against the intrigue or pleasure involved in processes of encountering realms of experience that beckon with new knowledge.

Furthermore, Benjamin's writings on Baudelaire prove generative for some of the greatest lyric talents of the middle to late 20th c. who read them, incl. Brecht and Celan, in a process of engagement that continues in today's poetry and poetics. Picking up various suggestions from Benjamin and from Brecht's critique of an uncritical and merely "culinary" poetics and aesthetics (a term both Benjamin and Adorno adopt), Adorno goes on to hint at ways of extending a distinction in early Benjamin between genuine and false aura. Thus a real, critical attempt to engage aura is often seen to involve poems or other art works effectively evoking it by appearing provisionally to abandon it—or by appearing to abandon "culinary," formulaic, grown-sterile versions of what aura has heretofore been.

Finally and perhaps most significantly for post-1945 culture, Benjamin's unfolding of the dynamics of aura and experience in Baudelairean lyric suffuses Adorno's notorious, terribly misunderstood meditations about the "barbarism" of "poetry after Auschwitz." Adorno—notably echoed in his "after Auschwitz" ruminations by, among others, his colleague Marcuse—resists any notion that fascism and the Nazi genocide can be assimilated even to some final nightmarish stage of exchange-commodity value and capitalism. But in considering fascism's eventual rise to power and its genocidal undertakings, he and other Frankfurters emphasize the importance of decades of a prefascist "experience of non-experience," of people's increasing sense of the irrelevance to dominant socioeconomic value of their individual and collective subjectivity and critical agency, and the sense of passivity—and far worse—that emerges as a consequence. Despite fraught relations with him, Adorno understands Celan's incomparable lyric poetry as the extraordinary, and extraordinarily grim, limit-case in the Baudelairean line, whereby poetry's very humanness in some sense requires it to become unprecedentedly brutal, "barbaric," and difficult in dedicating its life-giving semblance-experience experimentalism, its agency-and-critical-subjectivity-sparking awareness, precisely to the effort of conveying a glimpse of the meaning of the inconceivable elimination of particular life and, of course, particular experience and subjectivity—the poem's particularized sensing of the industrial elimination of millions of human subjects (grasped, as it is so hard to grasp, as individual murder on individual murder on individual murder on individual murder . . .)—that the genocide was. If ever a mod. lyric poetry has existed whose hazarded point of departure has had to involve radically exceeding all known versions of aura, to such a degree that readers may at first believe aura simply to have been abandoned, Celan's poetry, Adorno suggests, is it. This ultimate lauding of Celan constitutes, in what turns out to be a very late moment in Adorno's career—and in lines explicitly invoking Benjamin—a rediscovery of lyric's unique role in engaging the most difficult, significant hists. that confront us.

See ARTIFACT, POETRY AS; FICTION, POETRY AS; INFORMATION, POETRY AS; POLITICS AND POETRY.

■ T. W. Adorno, Prisms, trans. S. Weber and S. Weber (1967); W. Benjamin, Illuminations, ed. H. Arendt (1968); K. Marx, Critique of the Gotha Program, ed. C. P. Dutt (1970); D. Ricardo, On the Principles of Political Economy and Taxation, ed. R. M. Hartwell (1971); T. W. Adorno and Max Horkheimer, Dialectic of Enlightenment, trans. J. Cumming (1972); T. W. Adorno, Negative Dialectics, trans. E. B. Ashton (1973); W. Benjamin, Charles Baudelaire, trans. H. Zorn (1973); T. W. Adorno, Minima Moralia: Reflections from Damaged Life, trans. E. Jephcott (1974); S. Buck-Morss, The Origins of Negative Dialectics: Theodor W. Adorno, Walter Benjamin, and the Frankfurt Institute (1977); K. Marx, Capital: A Critique of Political Economy, trans. B. Fowkes (1977); W. Benjamin, Reflections, ed. P. Demetz, trans. E. Jephcott (1978); M. Jay, Marxism and Totality: The Adventures of a Concept from Lukács to Habermas (1984); F. Jameson, Late Marxism: Adorno, or The Persistence of the Dialectic (1990); T. W. Adorno, Notes to Literature, trans. S. W. Nicholsen, 2 v. (1991–92); M. Jay, The Dialectical Imagination: A History of the Frankfurt School and the Institute of Social Research, rev. ed. (1996); T. W. Adorno, Aesthetic Theory, ed. G. Adorno and R. Tiedemann, trans. R. Hullot-Kentor (1997); T. W. Adorno and W. Benjamin, The Complete Correspondence: 1928–1940 (1994), ed. H. Lonitz, trans. N. Walker (1999); W. Benjamin, The Arcades Project (1982), ed. R. Tiedemann, trans. H. Eiland and K. McLaughlin (1999); R. Kaufman, "Lyric Commodity Critique, Benjamin Adorno Marx, Baudelaire Baudelaire Baudelaire," PMLA 123 (2008); and "Poetry after 'Poetry After Auschwitz,'" Art and Aesthetics after Adorno, ed. J. M. Bernstein et al. (2010).

R. KAUFMAN

FREE VERSE

I. History
II. Form

Free verse is poetry without a combination of a regular metrical pattern and a consistent line length. The exact denotation of the term has long been disputed, and usage varies in whether other organizing principles such as rhyme scheme, syllable count, or count of strong stresses are excluded. Because most definitions are negative and/or metaphorical, the positive features characteristic of free verse are somewhat undefined. Free verse is normally divided into poet-determined lines (not dependent on page width, like prose or *prose poems); beyond that aspect, certain formal structures such as syntactic *parallelism, heavy *enjambment, conspicuous use of white space, or stress clash are frequently seen, but none is definitive. Some writers have argued that free verse is not, properly speaking, a verse form at all; yet, whether one calls it a verse form, a set of verse forms, or one end of a formal continuum, it has been common in Eng. and many other langs. since the 20th c.

I. History. The origins of free verse predate the 20th c. Scholars have pointed to possible predecessors such as ancient Heb. lit. and its mod. trans., esp. the King James Bible; the Epic of Gilgamesh; very early Gr. poetry; relatively loose *blank verse from the Ren.; the choruses of John Milton's Samson Agonistes; Fr. vers libres classiques* or vers libéré* of the 17th and 18th cs.; late 18th- and early 19th-cs. innovations such as Christopher Smart's *catalogs in Jubilate Agno, William Blake's prophetic books, James Macpherson's Ossianic poems, and S. T. Coleridge's "Christabel"; J. W. Goethe's and Friedrich Hölderlin's poetry in Ger., Alexander Pushkin's in Rus., other romantic-era poets, and rhythmical prose from various periods. Some of these antecedents influenced mod. free verse, while others may have merely anticipated it, just as some include arguably nonmetrical verse while others are simply innovations within constrained metrical trads. The more immediate ancestors of mod. free verse in Eng. come from the mid-to-late 19th c.: Walt Whitman most important among them, but also other innovators in Eng. and other langs., esp. the Fr. symbolists. From a formal point of view, 20th-c. poetry merely extends trends that were already in process.

But self-proclaimed "free verse" in Eng. has implied not only a set of formal practices or procedures but, at various times, a movement, a group-identity marker, and a political statement. Most important, it has marked a poet as "modern." Influenced by the vers libre* movement in Fr., which began in the 1880s, the free verse movement in Eng. began in the first two decades of the 1900s with T. E. Hulme, Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, W. C. Williams, H. D., D. H. Lawrence, Amy Lowell, and others. From the earliest days of the movement, poets and groups periodically published polemics arguing in favor of a line that "follows the contours of [the poet's] thought and is free rather than regular" (Hulme), "compos[ing] in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in the sequence of the metronome"

(Pound), "composition by field, as opposed to the old line, stanza . . ." (Charles Olson), "undisturbed flow from the mind of personal secret idea-words, blowing (as per jazz musician) on subject of image" (Jack Kerouac), etc. Prescriptions are often justified in terms of a desire for more direct expression of thought or for lang. that naturally or organically matches the form of its referent. Although the adoption of free verse has often been seen as part of a rebellion against some decadent prior order, the specific political engagement of that rebellion could range from Fascist sympathies to conservative Anglicanism to mild populism to open hedonism to mystical spiritualism to New Left activism to anarchism. All of these attitudes could also be found in metrically regular poetry of the same periods, though free verse may lend itself esp. easily to direct political statement. And free verse has always been marked by sharp differences among its practitioners over matters of both form and content. Free verse has continued to evolve, and new schools and movements (e.g., the *Beat poets, the *Black Mountain school, the *New York school, *Language poetry) have arisen periodically.

II. Form. Free verse allows immense formal diversity. Lines may be as short as a syllable (or even a typographical letter) or too long to fit within the margins of a printed page. Stress patterns may be as random as the lang. allows, or they may show notable parallelism. Line breaks range from emphatically *end-stopped to heavily enjambed. The visual arrangement of lines on the page may be exploited in various ways, from extra white spaces (to show pauses, create emphasis, or show different voices), to arrangement in concrete shapes, to serious derangement of syntactic structure such that the reader must piece the parts together like shards of a clay tablet (see TYPOGRAPHY, VISUAL POETRY). The syntax may be similar to that of everyday speech or that of formal prose, or it may be a specialized poetic grammar that would be considered telegraphic, ill-formed, or even incoherent in other contexts. The register may be learned and literary, colloquial and vulgar, or (often) conspicuously mixed (see DICTION). The poem may avoid traditional sound patterns such as *rhyme and *alliteration, or it may make extensive use of them. Poems may be densely rhythmic, casually conversational, or prosaically expository.

Various writers have proposed to divide free verse into categories. Many list types or schools based on a confluence of key formal features, usually identified with a particularly influential poet. Chris Beyers's A History of Free Verse is fairly typical in listing four such types: (1) the long line (e.g., in Whitman), (2) the short line (e.g., in Williams and H. D.), (3) verse "haunted by meter" (e.g., in Eliot), and (4) verse that "avoids tradition" (e.g., in Lawrence). Individual poets are undoubtedly influential on the practice of other poets. Furthermore, "schools" of poetry may cohere as much by ideologies, guiding metaphors about form, or social networks as by their actual poetic practice, so these relationships are important from a literary-historical point of view; however, basing a theory of formal types on particular poets is problematic: there is no one-to-one match between poets and forms.

An alternative approach to listing a finite number of types or schools is to explore the formal features exploited to varying degrees and in various combinations by most free-verse poets. Eleanor Berry's "The Free Verse Spectrum," e.g., proposes a five-dimensional descriptive matrix based on continuous axes rather than binary divisions. Implicit in this exploration of features is often the question of what, in the absence of regular meter or rhyme, makes this lang. poetic. An exhaustive list is not possible, but some prominent features follow:

A. Lineation. Division into lines is the one feature shared by all free verse (excluding prose poetry). Different poets and theorists handle line structure quite differently, but some important aspects include *rhythm, both in terms of timing and of salience; phrasing or grouping; segmentation of *attention; and visual effects.

The line is generally considered a unit of rhythm. Some writers have claimed that all the lines in a poem take approximately equal amounts of time to say or read, but this position can be defended empirically only for a limited number of free-verse poems. Similarly, the claim that each line is one breath is plausible for some poems but not for most. Poets do not even agree, in theory or in actual oral *performance, as to whether there is or should be a *pause at the end of each line. Instead, the lines may signal a more abstract kind of equivalence, segmenting the text into comparable units of attention, emphasis, or weight. A word, image, or phrase occupying a line by itself, or ending a line, tends to receive more focus than the same item buried in a long line.

Still, we probably do tend to read or speak longer lines faster than shorter lines and to slow down, at least slightly, at line breaks, bringing unequal lines closer to temporal equivalence. This tendency helps explain why some poets and critics say shorter lines speed a poem up, while others say they slow it down: word by word, they slow it down, but line by line, they speed it up.

Line length is the most commonly cited feature distinguishing one type of free verse from another. The distinction between the long, mostly end-stopped, often parallel, oratorical long lines of Whitman and the short, often enjambed, colloquial, imagistic lines of Williams is seen as basic. Again, free-verse lines can be virtually any length, and even Williams and Whitman vary their own lines, but this long/short distinction can be a useful starting point.

In most free verse, lines tend to correspond to phrases or clauses: as a default, line breaks will coincide with the more important phrase boundaries. Where line and phrase boundaries do not correspond, the lines are enjambed, and "tension" may result. Most free verse has some enjambment, and in some poems, it is the norm rather than the exception. Critics disagree on their evaluation of this as on so many issues; some denigrate line divisions that do not reflect the "natural" units of lang.; others criticize poems for a lack of tension between line and phrase, which they find flat or boring. In either case, the decision of where to break lines is a key element of free-verse *versification.

B. Stanzas. Another grouping effect happens not within the line but between lines: some free verse is basically stichic, with no obvious grouping of lines or grouping only into long verse paragraphs (see STICHOS). Other free verse is stanzaic or strophic, with lines grouped into units of similar numbers of lines (see STROPHE). Sometimes the grouping of lines is largely a visual device, in which the stanzas do not correspond to whole units of syntax, phonology, argument, or image; in other poems, the groupings are tightly linked and structural despite not being joined by predictable patterns of meter or rhyme. In other words, just as lines may be end-stopped or enjambed, stanzas may reinforce or undercut syntactic, phonological, and semantic units.

C. Parallelism. A common feature of verbal art worldwide is parallelism: the recurrence of similar units. This is true of metrically regular verse as well as free verse, but because free verse avoids the pervasive parallel structures of meter and rhyme, other kinds, esp. syntactic parallelism, tend to become more important. Syntactic parallelism frequently occurs in combination with rhetorical figures involving repetition of words or phrases. The best known of these devices is *anaphora, the repetition of words at the beginnings of lines, sentences, clauses, or phrases. (N.B.: anaphora is used differently in ling.). A well-known example is Allen Ginsberg's Howl: in pt. 1, over 60 lines are parallel relative clauses beginning with "who." Syntactic parallelism is easiest to recognize in combination with anaphora or similar devices, but quite possible without them. An example of parallelism with only minimal repetition of words is James Wright's "Spring Images," in which each stanza is a sentence of almost identical syntax:

> Two athletes
> Are dancing in the cathedral
> Of the wind.
>
> A butterfly lights on the branch
> Of your green voice.
>
> Small antelopes
> Fall asleep in the ashes
> Of the moon.
>
> (1971, 129)

D. Rhyme and Meter. Free verse generally avoids strict rhyme schemes, as in *sonnets or *ballads, and strict alliteration patterns, as in OE verse; however, free verse may include extensive sound patterning on an unpredictable basis. Virtually every possible type of sound repetition may occur: not only alliteration, *assonance, and rhyme but also more complex combinations of sounds. In some free-verse poems such effects are woven densely throughout, while in other poems, they are occasional ornaments. (See SOUND.)

Similarly, since free verse, by definition, avoids regular meter, there is no predictable pattern of recurrent feet (or of strong and weak positions) combined with a consistent line length; however, this statement does not mean that meter, in the sense of recurring patterns of stressed and unstressed syllables, or of rhythmic beats and offbeats, is irrelevant. First, some verse is explicitly composed in lines of a given number of strong stresses, with the total number of syllables unspecified. This patterning might qualify as an *"accentual" meter, but poems patterned this way are often called free verse. Second, recognizable metrical lines or line fragments occur prominently in some free verse; it remains free verse because these sequences are not consistent or predictable. Some critics link these flashes of metrical regularity to moments of heightened intensity in the poem or to iconic emotional values of different meters. Although the most-discussed sequences match well-known verse forms such as *iambic pentameter or *tetrameter, one also finds ad hoc metrical patterns that are repeated enough within a poem to be noticeable, but do not fit traditional metrical terminology.

On a more general, statistical level, there seem to be prosodic differences between the free verse and prose of a given poet even where no "ghosts of meter" are obvious. Some recent research suggests that free verse on average has more stress density, more stress clashes, more binary alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables, and more rhythmic units of a given number of syllables (e.g., four or six) than general prose. Certain grammatical and lexical differences correspond to these prosodic ones.

E. Intonation. Recent research has increasingly focused on intonation (pitch patterns) in free verse (see PITCH). Intonation is a factor in all speech, incl. poetry, but because it is not shown in writing, it has been underappreciated. Renewed interest has been buoyed by improved sound technology, by more sophisticated theories of intonation, and by the increased popularity of oral poetry performance—from traditional poetry readings to *poetry slams and other formats. Intonation is esp. important in free verse because, in the absence of meter and rhyme, intonation plays a primary role in signaling line ends, grouping of lines, parallelism, and other structural relationships. It also forms coherent rhythmic structures in itself, e.g., in sequences of alternating rising and falling tones, or in repeated complex contours.

F. Content. Subject matter is not necessarily different in free verse from metrically regular verse. Free verse appears to facilitate more "transparent" lang. in some poems, in which the form is hardly noticed, and this facility may have implications for the emotional effects that can be achieved. Also, the relation of form to content can be different for different types of free verse, although one can find exceptions to virtually any form–content pairing. Where lines are short, the reader's attention is drawn to individual words or short phrases, and this tendency lends itself to a focus on images or on words as words. Where lines are long, the attention is drawn more to the sweep of ideas and to larger rhythmic structures; this attraction may lend itself to a grander scale of arguments and comparisons, among other differences.

See FUTURISM, IMAGISM, LINE, METER, MODERNISM, OPEN FORM, PROJECTIVE VERSE, RHYME, SPRUNG RHYTHM, STANZA, SYLLABIC VERSE, VARIABLE FOOT, VORTICISM.

■ T. S. Eliot, "Reflections on Vers Libre," New Statesman 8 (1917); E. Pound, "A Retrospect," Pavannes and Divisions (1918); H. Monroe, "The Free Verse Movement in America," English Journal 3 (1924); T. E. Hulme, "A Lecture on Modern Poetry," Further Speculations (1936); Olson; D. Levertov, "Notes on Organic Form," Poetry 106 (1965); P. Ramsey, "Free Verse: Some Steps toward Definition," SP 65 (1968); J. Wright, Collected Poems (1971); C. Hartman, Free Verse: An Essay on Prosody (1980); R. Hass, Twentieth-Century Pleasures (1984); T. Steele, Missing Measures: Modern Poetry and the Revolt against Meter (1990); Cureton; J. Kerouac, "Essentials of Spontaneous Prose," The Portable Beat Reader, ed. A. Charters (1992); S. Cushman, Fictions of Form in American Poetry (1993); A. Finch, The Ghost of Meter (1993); H. Gross and R. McDowell, Sound and Form in Modern Poetry, 2d ed. (1996); H. T. Kirby-Smith, The Origins of Free Verse (1996); D. Wesling, The Scissors of Meter (1996); E. Berry, "The Free Verse Spectrum," CE 59 (1997); G. B. Cooper, Mysterious Music: Rhythm and Free Verse (1998); C. Beyers, A History of Free Verse (2001).

G. B. COOPER

FREIE RHYTHMEN. In Ger., this term refers to unrhymed, metrically irregular, nonstrophic verse lines of varying length. These lines can usually be distinguished from rhythmical prose not only by their visual arrangement on the page but by a tendency toward nearly equal intervals between stressed syllables, as well as phonological and rhythmic correspondences between lines. Freie Rhythmen represent the only major formal innovation that Ger. lit. provided to world lit. in the 18th c. Introduced by F. G. Klopstock in the 1750s (e.g., "Dem Allgegenwärtigen," 1758; "Frühlingsfeier," 1759) as a conscious revolt against the restraints imposed on Ger. poetry by Martin Opitz in the 17th c., freie Rhythmen are particularly appropriate as a medium for the free, unrestrained expression of feelings typical of the age of *sentimentality (Empfindsamkeit):

> Nicht in den Ozean der Welten alle
> Will ich mich stürzen! schweben nicht,
> Wo die ersten Erschaffenen, die Jubelchöre der > Söhne des Lichts
> Anbeten, tief anbeten und in > Entzückung vergehn!
>
> (Klopstock, "Frühlingsfeier")

They were used in the 1770s by J. W. Goethe in his "Great Hymns" ("Wanderers Sturmlied," "Ganymed," "Prometheus," "Mahomets Gesang," etc.) and later by Friedrich Hölderlin ("Hyperions Schicksalslied") and Novalis ("Hymnen an die Nacht"). Heinrich Heine contributed to the devel. of the form with the 22 poems that make up the two cycles of Die Nordsee (The North Sea) in 1825–26. Such romantic uses of freie Rhythmen influenced later Ger.-lang. poets such as Friedrich Nietzsche, Arno Holz, R. M. Rilke, Georg Trakl, and Gottfried Benn. Ger. terminology draws a clear distinction between freie Rhythmen and freie Verse*.

■ A. Goldbeck-Loewe, Zur Geschichte der freien Versen in der Deutschen Dichtung (1891); L. Bennoist-Hanappier, Die freien Rhythmen in der deutschen Lyrik (1905); E. Lachmann, Hölderlins Hymnen in freien Strophen (1937); A. Closs, Die freie Rhythmen in der deutschen Lyrik (1947); F. G. Jünger, Rhythmus und Sprache im deutschen Gedicht (1952); W. Mohr and A. Closs, "Freie Rhythmen," Reallexikon II; H. Enders, Stil und Rhythmus (1962); L. L. Albertsen, Die freie Rhythmen (1971), and Neuere deutsche Metrik (1984); B. Nagel, Der freie Vers in der modernen Dichtung (1989); C. Kohl, Rhetoric, the Bible, and the Origins of Free Verse (1990); C. Wagenknecht, Deutsche Metrik (1993); D. Frey, Einführung in die deutsche Metrik mit Gedichtmodellen (1996); S. Elit, Lyrik (2008); W. Blache, Heinrich Heine (2009).

D. H. CHISHOLM; K. BOWERS

FREIE VERSE (Fr. vers libre). (1) Rhymed lines in either iambic or trochaic meter throughout, but with a varying number of stressed syllables and, therefore, varying in line length. They were first used in It. *madrigals, then in Fr. fables and comedies, and in Ger. in the 18th c. by Barthold Brockes, Albrecht Haller, Christian Gellert, Friedrich von Hagedorn, G. E. Lessing, and Christoph Wieland. (2) Later, the term was used more loosely to refer to lines of varying length without any metrical constraints, distinguished from freie Rhythmen and rhythmical prose only by rhyme and occasionally by *assonance.

See FREE VERSE, VERS LIBRES.

■ L. Ern, Freivers und Metrik (1970); K. Birkenhauer, Die eigenrhythmische Lyrik Bertolt Brechts (1971); R. Kloepfer, "Vers libre—Freie Dichtung," Zeitschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Linguistik 3 (1971); H.-J. Frey and O. Lorenz, Kritik des freien Verses (1980); W. Deinert, "'Ist das noch ein Vers?' Tractatus metricopoeticus: Ueber den freien Vers und seine Abkömmlinge," Literaturwissenschaftliches Jahrbuch 24 (1983); H. Fricke, "Moderne Lyrik als Normabweichung," Lyrik—Erlebnis und Kritik, ed. L. Jordan et al. (1988); D. Lamping, "Zu den Anfängen von Brechts Lyrik in freien Versen," Wirkendes Wort 40 (1990); Moderne Lyrik (1991); and Das lyrische Gedicht (1993); C. Wagenknecht, Deutsche Metrik (1993); D. Frey, Einführung in die deutsche Metrik mit Gedichtmodellen (1996); S. Elit, Lyrik (2008).

D. H. CHISHOLM; K. BOWERS

FRENCH POETRY. See FRANCE, POETRY OF.

FRENCH PROSODY. Metrically, Fr. poetry is syllabic, based on a fixed number of syllables in each line that need not have the same duration or pitch contour. *Rhythm is based on word order, sound devices (*alliteration, *assonance, sound symbolism, etc.), modulations of vowel pitch (such as oratorical, affective, emotional, emphatic, logical, distinctive, contrastive, social, and local accents), and the *quantity or *duration of the syllables, all these in relation to the metrical foundation of the verse line. In most Fr. poems, rhythmic factors are not periodic (i.e., a pattern does not occur at least twice in the same order); the syllable count and the *stanza are metrically determinant. This means, as Louis Du Gardin argued in Les Premières Addresses du Chemin du Parnasse (1620), that a Fr. verse line cannot be metrical by itself but only in relation to another line. The perception of the poem as such depends on context ("equivalences contextuelles"; Cornulier 1982, 1995). Therefore, sentences in prose texts such as "Parce que c'estoit luy, parce que c'estoit moy" (Because it was he, because it was I; Michel de Montaigne, Essais) or "Et qui vit sans tabac, n'est pas digne de vivre" (Whoever lives without tobacco does not deserve to live; Molière, Dom Juan), despite their perceptible 6 + 6 rhythm, should not be considered as verse lines (vers blanc; see BLANK VERSE).

From the 16th to the 19th c., certain poets (e.g., Jean-Antoine de Baïf) and theorists (e.g., Marin Mersenne) tried to promote a form of Fr. poetry (i.e., the vers mesurés à l'antique*) based on differences in syllabic duration. They failed because this system was too complicated and too unlike the established one. The syllabic foundation of the Fr. verse line strongly prevailed over Latinate prosody: syllabation characterized the *prosody of "classical poetry" until the mid-19th c., even though, to the 18th c. at least, Fr. speakers probably differentiated heavy or long from light or short vowels.

This syllabic system is derived from med. Roman poetries. Poets of the Middle Ages produced different types of metrical combinations for which they drew on cl. Lat. prosody, Lat. prose, and a type of Lat. prosody that disregarded the position of accents or included the same number of words on each verse line (Norberg). The Cantilène de Sainte Eulalie (ca. 878), for instance, is a mixture of varying *couplets (lines of 10 to 13 syllables; some couplets have one *meter, others two) and of two langs. (Lat. and langue d'oil), and the Vie de Saint Léger (1040) is made up of iambic couplets whose final assonances make them sound like a combination of two distinct metrical systems. It is likely that the syllabic system prevailed in Fr. on account of its convenience for composition and reception.

Although the notion of *accent in the Fr. lang. is strongly controversial and covers different meanings of the word, some scholars since Scoppa have argued that the syllabic foundation of the verse lines, and of the 6 + 6 *alexandrine in particular, should be complemented by a fixed or varying number of accents. Since *meters reflect speech to some degree, the *hemistichs that constitute the verse line must contain emphasized or tonic syllables. In fact, these emphasized syllables owe their existence not to metrics but to the rhythms of speech: because the last vowel pronounced in a word group is usually emphasized in Fr., the last masculine vowel of any metrical pattern is necessarily emphasized. There is, in a word, no metrical stress. The strict cl. superimposition of syntax and meaning on the metrical pattern is not mandatory; it simply helps the reader or listener feel the rhythm:

Mais elle était du monde où les plus belles choses
Ont le pire destin,
Et rose elle a vécu ce que vivent les roses,
L'espace d'un matin.

(François de Malherbe, "Consolation à M. du Périer")

(But she was of the world where the most beautiful things
Have the worst fate;
And being a rose, she lived what roses live,
The space of a single morning.)

From the mid-16th c. to about 1830, poets tended to place words that could potentially receive stress at the end of a given metrical pattern. This allowed them consistently to avoid filling the last position of the pattern with a determiner, a pronoun that comes before its noun, a one-syllable preposition, a countable e, a word crossing over between the hemistichs, etc. (Cornulier 1982, 1995; Gouvard).

As illustrated in the above example from Malherbe, Fr. poetry has two types of verse lines. The shorter vers simples (lines 2 and 4) have from one to eight syllables. The longer vers complexes (lines 1 and 3) contain nine (5 + 4, 4 + 5), ten (4 + 6, 6 + 4, 5 + 5), eleven (5 + 6, 6 + 5), or twelve syllables (6 + 6) and are divided in two hemistichs. In cl. poetry, the *caesura clearly marks the frontier between the hemistichs; this metrical mark weakens under the attacks of poets from 1850 onward. Cornulier (1982) formulated a nonmetrical principle applied to Fr. prosody, known as la loi des huit syllabes, or the eight-syllable law: we are unable to sense the periodicity of acoustic signals of more than eight phonetic events. In Fr., identification of the exact number of syllables in a line is limited to eight. This cognitive limit explains why lines longer than eight syllables have to be divided. Nevertheless, there are some eight-syllable lines that contain a caesura (in the Middle Ages) as well as nine-syllable lines that do not (in Pierre de Ronsard).

The unstable e is one the most noticeable properties of Fr. poetry (Réda).It tends to differentiate poetry and spoken lang. Some parts of southern France aside, it has not been pronounced since the mid-16th c. (as in the word samedi, which yields "sam'di" [samdi] in spoken lang., instead of "samedi" [samEdi] in poetic diction), but it is articulated in Fr. poetry not followed by a vowel, an aspirated consonant 'h, or a line break:

L'alcyon, quand l'océan gronde,
1 23 4 5 67 8
Craint que les vents ne troublent l'onde
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

Où se berce son doux sommeil.
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

(Victor Hugo, "Le poète dans les révolutions")

(The Halcyon, when the ocean roars,
Fears the winds ruffle the waters
Where his sweet sleep rocks.)

By contrast, the e is elided before a vowel and before the nonaspirated consonant h:

Jeun(e) homm(e), ainsi le sort nous presse.
(Young man, thus is destiny pressing us)

At the end of the feminine verse line, the nonaspirated consonant h is not counted, as in the following examples from Charles Baudelaire:

Rien n'égale en longueur les boiteuses journées.
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

("Spleen")

(Nothing is as long as the limping days)

and:

C'est le Diable qui tient les fils qui nous remuent!
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

("Au lecteur")

(The Devil pulls the strings that move us!)

There is some dispute about the function of *rhyme in Fr. poetry. Some scholars, like Aquien, think it is a prosodic unit the function of which is to indicate the end of the verse line. Cornulier (1981, 2005) objects to these suggestions: if the second occurrence (the echo) may signal the end of a verse line, the first (the call) cannot. Furthermore, since this poetry is based on the repetition of a fixed number of syllables from one line to the next, the second occurrence of a stanza enables the perception of meter(s). Finally, if the last syllable of a group of words is necessarily emphasized, its repetition through rhyme has no metrical function (this is why Ronsard, Joachim du Bellay, and others could write nonrhymed poems). Rhyme, or the identity of the last counted vowel of two or more verse lines, should thus be seen as a rhetorical *ornament. Nevertheless, the *rhyme scheme has a metrical function since it guarantees the periodicity of stanzas:

Mignonne, allons voir si la rose	a	fem.
Qui ce matin avoit desclose	a	fem.
Sa robe de pourpre au Soleil,	b	masc.
A point perdu ceste vesprée	c	fem.
Les plis de sa robe pourprée,	c	fem.
Et son teint au vostre pareil.	b	masc.
Las! voyez comme en peu d'espace,	a	fem.
Mignonne, elle a dessus la place	a	fem.
Las! las ses beautez laissé cheoir!	b	masc.
Ô vrayment marastre Nature,	c	fem.
Puis qu'une telle fleur ne dure	c	fem.
Que du matin jusques au soir!	b	masc.
Donc, si vous me croyez, mignonne,	a	fem.
Tandis que vostre âge fleuronne	a	fem.
En sa plus verte nouveauté,	b	masc.
Cueillez, cueillez vostre jeunesse:	c	fem.
Comme à ceste fleur la vieillesse	c	fem.
Fera ternir vostre beauté.	b	masc.

Ronsard, Odes

(Darling, let's see if the rose that unfolded this morning its purple robe in the sun, has not lost tonight
the folds of its purple dress,
And its complexion, that is like yours.

Alas! see as in such a little space,
darling, on the ground,
Alas! Alas! It dropped its beauty.
Oh, really cruel mother Nature, since such a flower lasts
from the morning through the night.

Then, if you believe me, darling:
while your age blossoms,
in its most green novelty,
pick, pick your youth.
As for this flower, old age
Will tarnish your beauty.)

The rhyme scheme (aabccb) and the order of feminine and masculine rhymes of the first stanza are reiterated in the following stanzas, but the graphemes included in the rhymes change from one stanza to the other. To the degree that it becomes a periodic pattern, rhyme is metrically determinant. The description of cl. stanzas by Cornulier (1995) and Aroui (2000) is probably the most relevant. Cornulier shows that there are pure simple stanzas (aa) (abab) and (aabccb), mixed cl. stanzas (combination of pure simple stanzas), and inverted cl. stanzas (abba) and (aabcbc).

Since the end of the 18th c. and esp. since Hugo's preface to Cromwell (1827), many poets have tried to regenerate Fr. prosody, arguing that the cl. metrical foundation is not musical enough and hinders the successful implementation of rhythmic poetry. They have proposed to dissociate syntax from metrics, shifted the alexandrine caesura (e.g., from 6+6 to 8+4 or 4+8), and eventually broken the metrical foundation of the verse line (Gouvard), as in Arthur Rimbaud's "Qu'est-ce pour nous mon cœur . . ." (What does it matter to us, my heart . . .):

Tout à la guerre, à la + vengeance, à la terreur, Mon esprit! Tournons dans + la morsure : Ah!
passez,
Républiques de ce + monde! Des empereurs,
Des régiments, des co + lons, des peuples, assez!

(All to war, to vengeance, to terror, my Soul! Let us turn in the wound: Ah! disappear, republics of this world! Of emperors, Regiments, colonists, peoples, enough!)

There is no easy or permanent scansion for these lines. Rimbaud wished to destroy the alexandrine and cl. prosody with it. There is no perceptible periodicity. These lines are the culmination of what Murphy (1985) calls "déversification": between 1850 and 1870, poets gradually renewed syllabism. This led to the emergence of vers libre (free verse), which, as Roubaud has shown, has always been conceived in reference to the alexandrine. So deeply rooted in Fr. culture is syllabic poetry that its prosody remains the fundamental rhythmical basis even for contemp. poets.

The eight-syllable law and its consequences, or the binary foundation of cl. stanzas, suggest that a cognitive approach would be fruitful for future study of the origins and history of Fr. versification.

See VERS LIBÉRÉ.

■ A. Scoppa, Vrais Principes de la versification, développés par un examen comparatif entre la langue italienne et la langue française (1811–14); W. F. Patterson, Three Centuries of Poetic Theory (1935); Lote; Norberg; J. Roubaud, La Vieillesse d'Alexandre: Essai sur quelques états récents du vers français (1978); C. Scott, French Verse-Art (1980); B. de Cornulier, "La rime n'est pas une marque de fin vers," Poétique 46 (1981); and Théorie du vers: Rimbaud, Verlaine, Mallarmé (1982); H. Meschonnic, Critique du rythme: Anthropologie historique du langage (1982); C. Scott, Vers Libre: The Emergence of Free Verse in France 1886–1914 (1990); J. Bourassa, Rythme et sens: Des processus rythmiques en poésie contemporaine (1993); B. de Cornulier, Art poëtique (1995); C. Gérard, "The Structure and Development of French Prosodic Representations," L&S 41 (1998); R. Pensom, Accent and Metre in French (1998); J.-L. Aroui, "Nouvelles considérations sur les strophes," Degrés 104 (2000); J.-M. Gouvard, Critique du vers (2000); Le Vers français, ed. M. Murat (2000); Le Sens et la mesure: De la pragmatique à la métrique, ed. J.-L. Aroui (2003); R. Pensom, "La poésie moderne française a-t-elle une métrique?," Poésie 103 (2003); S. Murphy, Stratégies de Rimbaud (2004); J. Réda, L'Adoption du système métrique: Poèmes (1999–2003) (2004); M. Aquien, Le Renouvellement des formes poétiques au XIX^e siècle (2005); B. de Cornulier, "Rime et contrerime en traditions orale et littéraire," Poétique de la rime, ed. J. Dangel and M. Murat (2005); C. Scott, "État présent: French Verse Analysis," FS 60 (2006); G. Peureux, La Fabrique du vers (2009); T. M. Rainsford, "Dividing Lines: The Changing Syntax and Prosody of the Mid-Line Break in Medieval French Octosyllabic Verse," Transactions of the Philological Society 109 (2011).

G. PEUREUX

FRISIAN POETRY. Frisian, the nearest continental relative of Eng., was once the speech of an independent and extensive maritime nation along the North Sea coast but is today the lang. of a minority people living partly in the Netherlands and partly in Germany. It exists in three forms: East and North Frisian, spoken in Germany; and West Frisian, spoken in the Netherlands. Only West Frisian, which now has legal status both in the schools and in the public life of Netherlands Friesland (or Fryslân, its official name, in the Frisian lang.), has developed into a full-fledged literary lang. and Kultursprache.

As is the case with other Germanic peoples, lit. among the Frisians began with the songs of *bards celebrating the great deeds of kings and heroes, though none of those early epics has survived. What has survived is a valuable body of Frisian law, the earliest dating from the 11th c., in a distinctive form marked by such literary devices as *alliteration and *parallelism and often genuinely poetic in thought and feeling.

When, about the year 1500, Friesland came under foreign control, Frisian lost its position as the lang. of law and public life, and Frisian lit. sank to a low level. No great poetic figure appeared on the scene until Gysbert Japicx (1603–66), an eminent Ren. poet who with his Rymlerije (Poetry), pub. posthumously in 1668, reestablished Frisian as a literary and cultural lang. The 18th c. saw the rise of many followers and imitators of Japicx; however, no outstanding poetic figure came to the fore. In the 19th c., Eeltsje Halbertsma (1797–1858) dominated the scene; much of his work is folk poetry inspired by Ger. *romanticism. Another outstanding figure is Harmen Sytstra (1817–62), a romantic inspired by his country's heroic past, whose work reveals a desire to restore the old Germanic verse forms. The latter half of the 19th c. produced many folk poets, the most popular of whom were Waling Dykstra (1821–1914) and Tsjibbe Gearts van der Meulen (1824–1906). Piter Jelles Troelstra (1860–1930), with themes centering on love, nature, and the fatherland, ushered in a second romantic period.

The 20th c. ushered in a new spirit to Frisian poetry, perhaps most evident in the work of Simke Kloosterman (1876–1938), whose poetic art is both individualistic and aristocratic. In her poems, she gives intense utterance to the longings and disillusionments of love. Rixt (pseud. of Hendrika A. van Dorssen, 1887–1979) also wrote verse characterized by emotional intensity. A first-rate poet at the beginning of the century was Obe Postma (1868–1963), whose verse has vigor, penetration, and philosophical insight. Much of it is poetry of reminiscence; still more is a paean to life and the good earth. Postma was the first to use *free verse in Frisian and to use it well.

The new spirit came to full expression and brought about a literary renaissance in the Young Frisian movement, launched in 1915 and led by the daring young nationalist Douwe Kalma (1896–1953). A talented poet and critic, Kalma sharply denounced the mediocrity and provincialism of 19th-c. Frisian letters. With him and his movement, Friesland began to have an independent voice in Eur. culture. Kalma's genius appears at its freshest in his classic Kening Aldgillis (King Aldgillis, 1920), a historical play in *blank verse. Kalma's lyric poetry is technically skillful but often nebulous in content. His work—like that of his school—suffers from *aestheticism and a poetic jargon laden with neologisms and archaisms.

Among the poets of merit who had their start in the Young Frisian school are R. P. Sybesma (1894–1975), an excellent sonneteer, and D. H. Kiestra (1899–1970), a poet of the soil with a vigorous talent. For decades, the most popular poet was Fedde Schurer (1898–1968), a versatile artist who preferred national and religious themes. His early poems show the influence of Young Frisian aestheticism; those written after 1946 are more direct, unadorned, and mod. In 1946, he helped launch De Tsjerne (The Churn), the literary periodical with which most of the important names in Frisian letters were associated until 1968.

Around 1935, some of the younger poets, such as J. D. de Jong (1912–96), Ype Poortinga (1910–85), and G. N. Visser (1910–2001), showed signs of breaking away from the Young Frisian movement, both in spirit and in poetic diction. Douwe A. Tamminga (1909–2002) created his own poetic idiom, based largely on the lang. of the people that he transfigured and sublimated into pure art.

Since World War II, more than 600 books of poetry have been published in Friesland, half of which appeared since the 1990s because of easier ways of getting poetry into print. Postwar disillusionment and existential despair informed much of the poetry of the late 1940s and 1950s, when biting satire and experimental forms openly declared all trads. meaningless. Among the mod. voices were Anne Wadman (1919–97) and Jan Wybenga (1917–94), who led the way in experimental poetry. An experimentalist group led by Hessel Miedema (b. 1929), Steven de Jong (b. 1935), and Jelle de Jong (b. 1933) started its own jour., Quatrebras (1954–68). Miedema's De greate wrakseling (The Great Wrestle, 1963) in particular clearly demonstrated a refusal to be restricted by conventional thought or form. Sjoerd Spanninga (pseud. of Jan Dykstra, 1906–85) introduced exotic imagery from foreign cultures, esp. Asian, through a wide variety of forms. The verse of Marten Sikkema (pseud. of G. A. Gezelle Meerburg, 1918–2005), Freark Dam (1924–2002), and Klaes Dykstra (1924–97) was more traditional. Other older poets continued to write: Tamminga's In Memoriam (1968), written after his son's untimely death, is a masterpiece of profound thought and feeling cast in disciplined but fluid form. Tiny Mulder (1921–2010) is another distinguished poet who frequently effects a remarkable fusion of significant form and content and evinces a penetrating vision that affirms life without evading its horrors and sorrows. A similar life-affirming attitude can also be discerned in the poems by Tsjits Peanstra (pseud. of Tsjits Jonkman-Nauta, b. 1924), Berber van der Geest (b. 1938), Baukje Wytsma (b. 1946), Eppie Dam (b. 1953), and Margryt Poortstra (b. 1953). Deeply personal, erotic poetry was written by Ella Wassenaer (pseud. of Lipkje Post-Beuckens, 1908–83). A reactionary response toward earlier generations and movements can be found in the work of Tjitte Piebenga (1935–2007) and Trinus Riemersma (1938–2011), whereas a mock-serious tackling of Frisian reality pervades poems by Jan J. Bylsma (b. 1931) and R. R. vander Leest (b. 1933).

In 1967, in order to present poetry to the public at large, the idea of Dial-a-Poem was launched by F. S. Sixma van Heemstra (1916–99). This Frisian initiative, known as Operaesje Fers, was soon picked up all over the world. The group of poets who developed this idea included Josse de Haan (b. 1941), whose poems show affinities with *surrealism; Meindert Bylsma (b. 1941), whose work reflects a certain playfulness; and Daniel Daen (pseud. of Willem Abma, b. 1942), who has been not only prolific but consistently impressive in his ability to fuse the concrete and abstract.

From the 1970s until the 1990s, two journals dominated the Frisian literary scene: Trotwaer (Sidewalk, 1969–2002) and Hjir (Here, 1972–2008). Whereas the first initially contained many contributions by a group of young intellectuals–de Haan and Riemersma among them—who had joined hands to start a nonprofit publishing house, the second depended mainly on work written by young teachers, such as Sybe Krol (1946–1990), Piter Boersma (b. 1947), Jelle Kaspersma (b. 1948), and Jacobus Quiryn Smink (b. 1954). One of this group, Tsjêbbe Hettinga (b. 1949), gained international renown. His compact poetic idiom throbs with the longing to travel to mythical shores. Hettinga knows how to perform; his sonorous recitations attract large crowds. Hettinga's brother Eeltsje Hettinga (b. 1955) also wrote enticing poems and initiated poetic productions, e.g. Gjin grinzen, de reis (No Borders, the Voyage, 2004). Following the example of Tsjêbbe Hettinga, the most recent generation of poets—such as Anne Feddema (b. 1961), Elmar Kuiper (b. 1969), Nyk de Vries (b. 1971), Tsead Bruinja (b. 1974), and Arjan Hut (b. 1976)—is in the recitation of their poems as much performers as they are poets. With poets such as Harmen Wind (1945–2010), Wilco Berga (b. 1947), Jabik Veenbaas (b. 1959), and Albertina Soepboer (b. 1969), they write both in Dutch and in Frisian, unlike the older generations who were solely committed to the Frisian lang. However, Frisian identity continues to be a recurring topic, as in the work of Bartle Laverman (b. 1948), Cornelis van der Wal (b. 1956), and Abe de Vries (b. 1965). The 21st-c. successor to Trotwaer is the bilingual (Frisian and Dutch) periodical De Moanne (The Month/The Moon), while the monolingual Ensafh (Etcetera) has succeeded Hjir.

■ Anthologies: It sjongende Fryslân, ed. D. Kalma (1917); De nije moarn, ed. D. Kalma (1922); Fiifentweintich Fryske dichters, ed. F. Schurer (1942); Frieslands dichters, ed. A. Wadman (1949)—poetry since 1880, Dutch trans.; Friesische Gedichte aus West-, Ost- und Nordfriesland, ed. Y. Poortinga et al. (1973)—Ger. trans.; Country Fair: Poems from Friesland since 1945, trans. R. Jellema (1985); The Sound That Remains: A Historical Collection of Frisian Poetry, trans. R. Jellema (1990); Frisian Literature Today, ed. B. Oldenhof (1993); Hinter Damm und Deich: Die friesische Landschaft wie sie die Dichter sehen, ed. M. Brückmann et al. (1997)—poems in East, North, and West Frisian, Ger. trans.; T. Hettinga, Strange Shores/Frjemde kusten, trans. J. Brockway (1999); Gysbert Japix: Een keuze uit zijn werk, ed. P. Breuker (2003)—Dutch trans.; Droom in blauwe regenjas: Een keuze uit de nieuwe Friese poëzie sinds 1990, ed. T. Bruinja and H. J. Hilarides (2004)—Dutch trans.; Gjin grinzen, de reis/Geen grenzen, de reis/No Borders, the Voyage, ed. E. Hettinga (2004)—Dutch and Eng. trans.; O. Postma, What the Poet Must Know, trans. A. Paul (2004); Het goud op de weg: De Friese poëzie sinds 1880, ed. A. de Vries (2008)—Dutch trans.; Spiegel van de Friese Poëzie van de zeven- tiende eeuw tot heden, ed. P. Boorsma et al., 3d rev. ed. (2008)—Dutch trans.

■ Criticism and History: E. H. Harris, Literature in Friesland (1956); J. Piebenga, Koarte skiednis fen de Fryske skriftekennisse, 2d ed. (1957)—hist., http://www.sirkwy.nl/xmlboeken.html&bid=9&part=2; J. Smit, De Fryske literatuer 1945–1967 (1968); K. Dykstra, Lyts hânboek fan de Fryske literature, 2d ed. (1997)—survey of Frisian lit. from beginnings to 1990s, http://www.sirkwy.nl/xmlboeken.html&bid=76; T. J. Steenmeijer-Wielenga, A Garden Full of Song: Frisian Literature in Text and Image, trans. S. Warmerdam (1999); Handbuch des Friesischen/Handbook of Frisian Studies, ed. H. H. Munske et al. (2001); Zolang de wind van de wolken waait: Geschiedenis van de Friese literatuur, ed. T. Oppewal et al. (2006); Asega is het dingtijd? De hoogtepunten van de Oudfriese tekstoverlevering, ed. O. Vries (2007).

■ Web Sites: Tresoar: Fries Historich en Letterkundig Centrum, http://www.tresoar.nl; Sirkwy: Fryske literatuerside, http://www.sirkwy.nl.

B. J. Fridsma; H. J. Baron; J. Krol

FROTTOLA AND BARZELLETTA (It. "nonsense" [poem], corresponding to German Spass). In the late 14th c., the frottola was a type of It. popular verse, satiric, rambling, and written in very irregular meters and stanzas, with analogues in other Eur. poetries. Early examples are found in the poetry of Francesco di Vannozzo (ca. 1340–after 1389) and Franco Sacchetti (ca. 1332–1400). In the 15th and 16th cs., it evolved into a kind of ballata, composed in octosyllables (ottonari), and thus came to be referred to increasingly as frottola-barzelletta, i.e., a joke with didactic content. In the course of the century, this became an important medium for serious moral instruction. The barzelletta is a subspecies of the It. 15th-c. carnival song (canto carnascialesco), written for musical setting in octosyllables and often following the structure of the ballata grande in which the ritornello* or refrain often has the rhyme scheme abba. The barzelletta became very popular in the 15th and 16th cs. in the hands of practitioners such as Politian and Lorenzo de' Medici: one well-known example is Lorenzo's carnival poem, the "Trionfo di Bacco e Arianna."

See adynaton, coq-à-l'âne, didactic poetry, fatras, italian prosody, nonsense verse.

■ V. Pernicone, "Storia e svolgimento della metrica," Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di letteratura italiana, ed. A. Momigliano, v. 2 (1948); M. Pazzaglia, Teoria e analisi metrica (1974); Spongano; Wilkins; F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); Elwert, Italienische; S. Verhulst, La frottola (XIV–XV sec.) (1990); A. Menichetti, Metrica italiana (1993); S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994).

T. Wlassics; C. Kleinhenz

FU. This Chinese literary form first obtained prominence in the Han dynasty (206 bce–220 ce) and continued to be a major genre in the Chinese literary trad. Because the fu has no exact Western counterpart, a commonly accepted Eng. name for the genre does not exist. Although the trans. "rhapsody" is appropriate for the Han fu, in which declamation and recitation were important, other Eng. names such as *rhyme-prose, *prose poem, verse essay, exposition, or poetical description are acceptable. The mature form of the fu did not emerge until the Former Han dynasty, when poets such as Sima Xiangru (179–117 bce) and Yang Xiong (53 bce–18 ce) wrote the long, difficult poems that became the standard against which all fu ultimately are measured. This type of fu, which later anthologists classified as gu fu, or "ancient-style fu," has the following features: an ornate style, lines of unequal length, mixture of rhymed and unrhymed passages, elaborate description, hyperbole, repetition of synonyms, extensive cataloging, difficult lang., a tendency toward a complete portrayal of a subject, and often a moral conclusion. The formation of this genre is the product of multiple influences, incl. a set of rhymed riddles by the philosopher Xun Kuang (ca. 312–235 bce), the rhetorical prose of traveling persuaders of the Warring States period, and the Qu Yuan poems in the Chuci (Lyrics of Chu). The earliest datable fu is the "Fu on the Owl" by Jia Yi (ca. 200–168 bce). However, the gu fu did not reach its full devel. until the mid-2d c. bce when writers such as Sima Xiangru composed elaborate *epideictic compositions for the court. At the end of the Western Han (206 bce–8 ce) Yang Xiong attempted to combine effusive praise of the Han imperium with crit. of imperial extravagance. However, he soon rejected the genre for its failure to convey a moral message. It should also be noted that not all Han fu are epideictic pieces. Yang Xiong composed a personal piece on his poverty, the imperial concubine Favorite Beauty Ban (d. ca. 6 bce) wrote about her loss of imperial favor, and Cai Yong (132–92 ce) and others composed pieces about their travels. At the end of the Han, writers began to compose much shorter pieces that are usually called xiao fu (small expositions). The most famous examples are "Fu on Climbing a Tower" by Wang Can (177–217) and "Fu on the Luo River Goddess" by Cao Zhi (192–232).

During the early med. period (3d to 7th c.), some writers continued to write Han-style gu fu. Examples are "Fu on the Three Capitals" by Zuo Si (ca. 250–305) and "Fu on the Yangtze River" by Guo Pu (276–324). However, most of the best-known fu are on personal subjects. These include "Fu on Living in Idleness" and "Fu on Recalling Old Friends and Kin" by Pan Yue (247–300), "Fu on Lamenting the Departed" by Lu Ji (261–303), "Fu on Stilling the Passions" by Tao Qian (ca. 365–427), and the "Lament for the South" by Yu Xin (513–81). The early med. period is also known for the emergence of the pian fu or "parallel-style fu." These pieces are noted for their carefully wrought parallel couplets, heavy use of *allusion, and attention to delicate phrasing. Perhaps the best writer of such pieces was Jiang Yan (444–505), whose "Fu on Separation" and "Fu on Resentment" are regarded as masterpieces of this form. Another fu type that reached maturity during the early med. period is the yongwu fu (fu on things). These include fu that describe natural phenomena, scenery, birds, animals, plants, insects, musical instruments, and similar objects. Although there are famous Han dynasty examples such as the "Fu on the Parrot" by Mi Heng (ca. 173–98), early med. writers composed numerous such pieces. E.g., Fu Xuan (217–78) and his son Fu Xian (249–94) between them composed almost 100 yongwu fu.

Although the conventional view is that the fu declined beginning in the Tang dynasty (618–907), recent scholars have shown that the form continued to flourish through the Qing period (1644–1911). During the Tang period, the fu was one of the two literary forms that were required for the civil service exam. This form is usually called lü fu (regulated fu). Candidates wrote on a prescribed topic (usually a phrase from a cl. text) and had to follow a specified rhyme. Also during the Tang, a new type of fu, the wen fu or "prose-style fu" was introduced. This form was influenced by the new type of prose known as guwen or "ancient-style prose." The best-known examples of Tang wen fu are by Han Yu (768–824) and Du Mu (803–53), whose "Fu on the Epang Palace" is a common anthol. piece. The wen fu reached full maturity during the Song dynasty. The most famous pieces of the form are the "Fu on Autumn Sounds" by Ouyang Xiu (1007–72) and the "Fu on the Red Cliff" by Su Shi (1037–1101).

■ J. Hightower, "The Fu of T'ao Ch'ien," HJAS 17 (1954); H. Wilhelm, "The Scholar's Frustration: Notes on a Type of 'Fu,' " Chinese Thought and Institutions, ed. J. K. Fairbank (1957); Y. Hervouet, Un Poète de cour sous les Han (1964); B. Watson, Chinese Rhyme-Prose (1971); D. Knechtges, The Han Rhapsody (1976); W. Graham, "The Lament for the South" (1980); Wen xuan, trans. D. Knechtges, 3 v. (1982–96); D. Knechtges, "The Old Style Fu of Han Yu," T'ang Studies 13 (1995); P. Kroll, "The Significance of the Fu in the History of T'ang Poetry," T'ang Studies 13 (1995); K. Gong, Studies on the Han Fu, trans. and ed. D. Knechtges (1997); P. Kroll, "Seven Rhapsodies of Ts'ao Chih," JAOS 120.1 (2000).

D. Knechtges

FUGITIVES. The Fugitives were a group of literary intellectuals, most associated with Vanderbilt University, who produced the short-lived but influential little magazine The Fugitive (1922–25). The circle's most famous members were the poets Robert Penn Warren (1905–89), Allen Tate (1899–1979), Laura Riding (1901–91), John Crowe Ransom (1888–1974), Donald Davidson (1893–1968), and Merrill Moore (1903–57). The Fugitive was an early publisher and champion of the poetry of Hart Crane, and the turbulent later friendship of Crane and Tate began with Tate's work on the magazine. The Fugitives influenced subsequent generations of writers and critics in the South and elsewhere, incl. Cleanth Brooks, Jesse Stuart, Randall Jarrell, Peter Taylor, and Robert Lowell.

Finding southern lit. mired in "lost-cause" sentimentality and stifling gentility, the Fugitives tried to bring to it modernity and cosmopolitanism. "The Fugitive flees from nothing faster than from the high-caste Brahmins of the Old South," they announced in their opening number. They rejected the lush late Victorianism of Ernest Dowson and A. C. Swinburne (although many poems influenced by those poets appeared in The Fugitive), with the older members turning to Thomas Hardy, W. B. Yeats, and E. A. Robinson and the younger members championing T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound; but all of them strove, like similar circles in other cities, to flesh out the meaning of Pound's imperative to "make it new."

Although Ransom, Warren, and Brooks went on to become leading spirits of the *New Criticism, little crit. beyond reviewing went on in The Fugitive. Ransom did develop his idea of a tension between an abstract conception and the messy particulars of experience in his discussions with the Fugitives, ideas that bore fruit in his later thought about *concrete universals. Perhaps the movement's most important contribution to the devel. of New Criticism arose from the careful technical analysis they gave to each other's work as poets: their line-by-line attention to turns of phrase, their interest in problems of diction, their worrying of the relationship between the overall shape of a poem and of the poetic particulars that pull in other directions. It was perhaps as a writing workshop more than as a literary-critical movement proper that the Fugitives did most to shape the intellectual habits of New Criticism.

Although many of the Fugitives were later members of the *Agrarians, the Fugitives did not have the political or economic agenda of the later group. But their disciplined examination of poetry and their freedom of thought about it both began the literary renaissance of the 20th-c. South and gave the Fugitives a place in the broader literary world.

■ J. L. Stewart, The Burden of Time: The Fugitives and Agrarians (1965); C. Beck, The Fugitive Legacy (2001); M. Farrell, Collaborative Circles (2001).

J. Burt

FUROR POETICUS (Lat., "divine fury," "poetic madness," "poetic fury"; Gr. enthousiasmos). From Greco-Roman to early mod. times, the concept of a poet's possession by the *muses or a god such as Apollo, or later, the Christian deity. The term furor poeticus is not itself cl.; the exact locution appears first in humanist Neo-Lat. The most celebrated and influential treatment of this concept is found in several works by Plato. In the Phaedrus (244a–245a, 265a–b), furor poeticus is third of four forms of madness (manikḗ), and Plato describes the frenzied poet as insane. In the posthumous Laws (719c), he points out that when the poet sits on the muse's tripod, he is not in his right mind and that, unlike the legislator who must not give two rules about the same thing, the poet as imitator is often compelled to contradict himself. In the Ion (533d, 534b), which is perhaps the most damaging to the idea of human agency, Plato says both lyric and epic poets compose not by art but through divine possession; he compares poets to Corybantic revelers, insisting that "God" takes away the minds of poets and speaks through them while they, like divine prophets, remain in a state of unconsciousness. Poets, he adds, are holy, "winged," and unable to compose unless inspired and out of their senses. Akin to "mania" and at times "ecstasy," furor poeticus is described as a form of possession by the divine powers in which the poet is a passive vessel; the concept categorically removes human skill (and responsibility) from poetic production. Yet to understand furor poeticus only in these terms would be misleading, despite ubiquitous references to Plato throughout lit. hist. In actuality, early sources of this concept reveal no evidence of the complete surrender of human agency to the divine "breath," nor of human absence from the creative process (Tigerstedt). Homer clearly makes Demodokos a self-possessed and conscious "maker," inspired as he may be by the muse. Hesiod, though often thought to be the prime example of the possessed poet, does not demonstrate even in the Theogony a surrender of his poetic skills to manic, mantic, or ecstatic composition. Cicero (De divinatione 1:31.66) connects frenzy to the prophetic inspiration of Cassandra, noting that a god spoke through her. In a later passage (1:37.88), he links poetic inspiration to this frenzy, quoting Democritus and Plato. But he also significantly qualifies Plato's idea of frenzy by pointing out that lawyers too must have a similar passion to argue lawsuits. Placing furor poeticus in the forum or the law courts adds a grace note of balance to the sense of furor as divine mania. Horace quotes with some disdain Democritus's statement barring sane poets from Helicon and promises to teach Roman poets the importance of wisdom to their craft (Ars poetica 295–309). The elder Seneca rejects furor poeticus (Prologue 1ff.; Suasoriae, 3.7), although the younger Seneca defends it (Epistulae Morales 84.1–7; Burwick). The doctrine remained controversial. The myths of the prisci poetae, e.g., which are found in numerous ancient and Ren. sources, tend to defy the notion of madness. These inspired "first poets" such as Linus and Musaeus, however divine their auspices, clearly reflected the agency of self-conscious founders of civilization.

From Roman times onward, furor poeticus found resonance in the idea of a vates*, or prophet-poet, although the definitions were not coterminous. Statius (Silvae 2.7.3) contends that Lucan was the most inspired Roman poet, who like a sacerdos was "struck in his heart by learned frenzy" ("docto pectora concitatus oestro") and that Ennius, Varro, Ovid, and even Lucretius should yield to his madness. But Lucan himself, in a notorious address in the Bellum Civile (1.63-6), resisted the notion of poetic madness and claimed that Nero's divinity was all the inspiration needed to give strength to Roman poems (Hershkowitz). Nevertheless, the trad. of the vates was kept alive throughout late antiquity, as the legends attesting to Virgil's otherworldly auspices reflect. In his Etymologiae (book 7), Isidore of Seville (7th c.) defines the term vates, following Varro, as the "power of the mind" that accompanies poetic inspiration. Although he does not mention the divine or supernatural in connection with this power, he suggests the relation of the term to otherworldly intervention by placing the section on poets just before "De Sybillis" and "De magis." In the early 15th c., Coluccio Salutati (De Laboribus Herculis 1.3) seems to merge Isidore and Cicero (from the Pro Archia), asserting that divine inspiration gives poets the mental power of prophecy (Scott). Also in the 15th c., Leonardo Bruni observed that the "power" of the vates was divine in nature, deriving either from Venus or (when associated with vaticinium) from the muses (Greenfield). Later in the century, the influential Neoplatonist Marsilio Ficino subtitled his trans. of Plato's Ion "De furore poetico" and also wrote a famous letter in 1457 (not pub. until 1495) called "De divino furore." Congratulating his young correspondent on his verse and prose, Ficino asserts that he could not achieve so much at such an early age without the addition of divine frenzy to study and technique. Following Plato, he claims that the divine frenzy brings humans back to the knowledge they possessed before being imprisoned in the body. Ficino's friend Cristoforo Landino echoes this sentiment in his celebrated edition of Dante. The source of divine inspiration would seem a foregone conclusion in Dante's case—e.g., Boccaccio saw Dante as a poeta theologus, a divine interpreter (interpres divinus). Yet the line is blurred in Landino (as with much Neoplatonic writing) between the Christian god's divine inspiration and that of rehabilitated Greco-Roman gods and muses. Landino and Bruni thought normal people could suddenly be seized by furor poeticus, which would then allow a divine force to speak through them; Angelo Poliziano believed instead that the vatic quality was inherent in particular people from birth (Greenfield). But, despite these slight differences among these humanists, they were united in their aim. The defense of the divine spirit in the poet had a practical advantage at the end of the 15th c. In establishing the curricular innovations of the studia humanitatis, chief among which was the addition of poetry and hist. to the med. trivium of grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic, humanists such as Landino and Poliziano marshaled the poet's supposed divinity as justification for raising the poetic art to a central place in Ren. epistemology.

Although divine inspiration sometimes seems a doctrine, there was probably never full commitment to furor poeticus as the sole means of composing poetry (e.g., even Ficino sets divine frenzy beside study and technique). Human agency always played a part. In Astrophil and Stella 74, Philip Sidney half-jokingly rejects "poet's fury"; but in his Defence of Poesy, he discusses the Roman vates with approval, lending credence to the humanist argument for the centrality of the poet to education and social devel. Sidney extends the earlier humanist argument, claiming that poetry alone among the human disciplines is superior to nature; he presents the poet as a self-conscious manipulator of the "zodiac of his own wit." Sidney's contemporary George Chapman went to great pains to separate inspiration and Democritan insanity; Edmund Spenser, in contrast, invokes poetic "rage" as a form of human alienation, a "divine instinct" (E. K., The Shepheardes Calender), although he elsewhere expresses skepticism in regard to "courtly" Platonism (Huntington). Despite continuing ambivalence, however, poets (esp. epic poets) might still claim to be mere conduits through which the divine voice issued. In Paradise Lost (bk. 9:21–24), John Milton insists that his muse (Urania) "deigns / Her nightly visitation unimplor'd," dictates to him "slumb'ring," and inspires his "unpremeditated verse." But such an utter deprivation of agency, even if only fanciful, is rare. The reality of poetic production tended to preclude doctrinaire belief in furor poeticus.

In the 18th c., the doctrine of furor poeticus eroded considerably, being replaced by less Neoplatonic (and more pragmatic) ideas of poetic inspiration, poetic madness, and poetic production. Joshua Reynolds (Discourses on Art 6), discussing *"imitation," rejected the notion of inspiration as a mysterious "gift" because it diminished the importance of labor and application. In the romantic period, however, furor poeticus was seen as a means of liberating the *imagination from conformity (Burwick), although, as interest in clinical madness grew, it tended to be linked to insanity rather than divinity or cl. enthousiasmos. The idea of the "vatic" also became secularized, although it was not associated a fortiori with madness; as a poetic posture, it continued to appeal to poets as late as Walt Whitman, Robinson Jeffers, Allen Ginsberg, and Bob Dylan. In the contemp. idiom, poetry and madness remain linked, as, in certain contexts, do poetic inspiration and divine auspices.

See GENIUS, INSPIRATION.

■ Curtius; M. Foucault, Folie et déraison (1961); E. N. Tigerstedt, "Furor Poeticus: Poetic Inspiration in Greek Literature before Democritus and Plato, Journal of the History of Ideas 31 (1970); W. Scott, "Perotti, Ficino, and Furor Poeticus," Res publica litterarum 4 (1981); C. C. Greenfield, Humanist and Scholastic Poetics, 1250–1500 (1981); C. Kallendorf, "The Poeta Theologus in Italian Renaissance Commentary," Journal of the History of Ideas 56 (1995); F. Burwick, Poetic Madness and the Romantic Imagination (1996); J. Huntington, "Furious Insolence: The Social Meaning of Poetic Inspiration in the 1590s," MP 94 (1997); D. Hershkowitz, The Madness of Epic (1998); C. J. Steppich, 'Numine afflatur': Die Inspiration des Dichters im Denken der Renaissance (2002).

R. FALCO

FUTURISM

I. Italian
II. Russian
III. Other Futurisms

Futurism was the prototypical 20th-c. avant-garde movement in lit. and the arts, militant in its promotion of extreme artistic innovation and experimentation. Its stance was to declare a radical rejection of the past and to focus on the maximally new in art, technology, and politics, often combined with stylistic *primitivism. It rejected psychological sensitivity and the effete lyricism of *symbolism. Dynamism was glorified, as were all forms of rapid or violent movement such as war, airplanes, cars, radios, and electricity. Futurism sought out conservative social elements and confronted them in order to provoke a violent negative response. In contrast to symbolism, which was musically oriented, futurism showed a preference for the visual arts. Many of the futurist poets were also painters.

I. Italian. It. futurism began with the "Fondazione e Manifesto del Futurismo" (The Founding and Manifesto of Futurism), first pub. in Fr. in Le Figaro in Paris, February 20, 1909; here F. T. Marinetti (1876–1944) declared that a roaring car was more beautiful than the Victory of Samothrace, that no work without an aggressive character could be a masterpiece, that war was hygienic, and that museums were graveyards (which should be destroyed or visited rarely). In succeeding *manifestos, Marinetti enunciated the principles of futurism in relation to poetry. Parole in libertà (words in freedom) denoted lang. free of syntax and logical ordering and, thus, better able to convey intense *emotion rapidly. Immaginazione senza fili (wireless imagination) and analogia disegnata (pictorialized analogy) involved maximum freedom of *imagery and *metaphor. This led to the expressive use of *typography, with fonts of various sizes and styles being used in the same line or word and free disposition of words on the printed page, sometimes resembling a typographic *collage (e.g., Marinetti's "Joffre après la Marne" or "SCRABrrRrraaNNG," both 1919). Expressive typography and syntactic and metaphoric freedom were intended to give the effect of simultaneous sense impressions and superimposed time frames (simultaneità), e.g., Marinetti's famous poem "Bombardamento," which recreates by onomatopoetic and typographic means the 1912 siege of Adrianopoli. This and the other poems of Marinetti's most important book, Zang Tumb Tuuum (1914), provide successful illustrations of futurist poetics in practice, which also includes visual poems such as "Pallone Frenato Turco" (Turkish Hot-Air Balloon). There was an active cross-fertilization among the futurists, the cubist painters (see CUBISM), and Guillaume Apollinaire with his *calligrammes.

Marinetti was a brilliant public performer who could make reading a manifesto the high point of a literary evening or evoke the sounds of a whole battlefield single-handedly. "Futurist Evenings," the first of which occurred on January 12, 1910, were designed to create a scandal and often ended in riots, official protests, and arrests of the participants. Marinetti's skill in creating and exploiting this notoriety made futurism a major cultural force in a short period of time. At the same time, his financial independence allowed him to publish his own works and those of his associates in numerous eds. through his Milan publishing house, Edizioni Futuriste di "Poesia," which also put out a poetry jour. Futurism had centers in a number of other It. cities, notably Florence, where the futurist newspaper Lacerba was published January 1913–May 1915; with Marinetti's transforming participation from February 1913, Lacerba became a leading example of innovative typography. The two major collections of futurist poetry assembled by Marinetti are I poeti futuristi (1912) and I nuovi poeti futuristi (1925).

Most futurist poetry, incl. Marinetti's own early poetry, while futurist in theme, was closer in form to vers libre* than to parole in libertà, e.g., the works of Ernesto Cavacchioli (1885–1954), Luciano Folgore (1888–1966), and Aldo Palazzeschi (1885–1974), the last a poet of the first magnitude, esp. in his later work. Others, however, some of whom were primarily painters, produced significant works in the parolibrist manner, e.g., Carlo Carrà (1881–1966), Giacomo Balla (1871–1958), Franceso Cangiullo (1884–1977), Corrado Govoni (1884–1965), Ardengo Soffici (1879–1964), and Gino Severini (1883–1966). It is sometimes difficult to separate futurist works into poems and pictures since the two art forms were so closely intertwined. It. futurists also made innovative contributions to sculpture, architecture, theater, film, photography, and music. One other important element of It. futurism was a militaristic nationalism, which caused it to become aligned with Mussolini and Fascism for a time, this, in turn, producing an international revulsion against the movement that has only recently dissipated.

II. Russian. Marinetti claimed that Rus. futurism was a direct outgrowth of his It. movement. However, the chief Rus. representatives insisted that they had developed their ideas independently and differed significantly from the Italians. But little that is distinctively futurist except early poems by Velimir Khlebnikov (1885–1922) can be found in Russia before 1910. Information on It. futurism began to appear in Rus. periodicals by March 1909; thus, the influence of It. futurism on the early stages of Rus. futurism is probable. Both can be seen as emerging from symbolist antecedents in similarly traditional, preindustrial societies. Yet in quality and breadth of poetic practice, and to some extent in poetic theory, Rus. futurism clearly overshadows It. futurism. Without financial resources comparable to Marinetti's, Rus. publications had to be more modest in cost and number, but this was made a virtue by emphasis on a primitive, deliberately antielegant look. The Rus. movement has two branches, cubo-futurism and ego-futurism.

A. Cubo-Futurism, originally named Hylaea, had its first important publication in the manifesto and collection Poščečina obščestvennomu vkusu (A Slap at Public Taste, 1913). This manifesto, drafted in December 1912, was co-written and signed by David Burliuk (1882–1967), Aleksei Kruchenykh (1886–1968), Vladimir Mayakovsky (1893–1930), and Khlebnikov. Clearly based in style and content on the earlier It. manifestos, it advocated throwing Alexander Pushkin, Fyodor Dostoevsky, Leo Tolstoy, et al. from the "Steamship of Modernity" and attacked the leading members of the current literary establishment. It then called for increasing the vocabulary with arbitrary and derived words, declared a hatred for previously existing lang., and proclaimed the "samovitoe" (self-sufficient) word. The collection featured major poems by Khlebnikov, incl. "Bobèobi pelis' guby" (Bobeobi Sang the Lips, 1908–9), an example of cubism in verse in which a portrait is constructed of facial features expressed in abstract sounds. Khlebnikov was recognized as the most brilliant and inventive of the group. His experiments ranged from arcane neologisms to exotic verse forms, e.g., Razin (1920), written in *palindromes. Imagery in his poems reflects pagan and folk sources rather than urbanism. His poems were usually too complex to be popular, but his innovations still serve as an inspiration to present-day poets.

David Burliuk, the self-styled father of Rus. futurism, had first recognized Mayakovsky's poetic genius and had suggested the idea of *sound poetry to Kruchenykh. He was also responsible for the publication of a number of important futurist miscellanies. Though primarily a painter, Burliuk was also a prolific poet, with an antiaesthetic Rimbaudian bent.

Mayakovsky was a true urbanist who read his consonant-rich poetry from the stage in a powerful bass voice. A mixture of hyperbolic, egocentric imagery and painful sensitivity, his poems have a direct emotional impact. After the revolution, Mayakovsky willingly turned his poetic talent into a tool for political propaganda, and he was posthumously canonized by Stalin as the "Great Poet of the Revolution." His poems were published in massive eds., were memorized by generations of school children, and were given extensive, though restricted, critical attention by Soviet scholars. His lesenka (stepladder line), introduced in 1923, was adopted by many other poets of his time and remains a common device in Rus. poetry even today.

The idea of the "self-sufficient" word developed in the hands of Kruchenykh and Khlebnikov into zaum'* (transrational lang.), which in its most radical form was pure sound poetry. Although earlier experiments by Khlebnikov have certain features of zaum', the first true example is Kruchenykh's sound poem "Dyr bul ščyl" (Pomada, 1913), which is prefaced by the statement that the words do not have any definite meaning. Other poems by Kruchenykh consist entirely of vowels. In the 1920s, he produced a series of useful theoretical works on futurism.

The years 1913–14 were the high point of cubo-futurism, with publication of many books and performances of the dramas Pobeda nad solncem (Victory over the Sun) by Khlebnikov and Kruchenykh and Mayakovsky's Vladimir Majakovskij, Tragedija. The end of 1913 and beginning of 1914 saw a tour of 17 provincial cities by Burliuk, Mayakovsky, and Vasily Kamensky (1884–1961), the poet-aviator who wrote typographically elaborate "ferroconcrete" poems.

Other important poets briefly associated with this movement were the theoretician Benedikt Livšic (1886–1937), the dramatist Il'ja Zdanevič (1894–1975), the impressionist Elena Guro (1877–1913), and the early Boris Pasternak (1890–1960). The devel. of Rus. formalist literary theory (see RUSSIAN FORMALISM) is closely related to cubo-futurist practice, Roman Jakobson and Viktor Skhlovsky being associates of the futurists. Jakobson's move to Prague in 1921 stimulated the rise of a similar trend there. A number of later Rus. movements are to some extent based on futurism, e.g., *constructivism, LEF, OBERIU, and the Ničevoki (Nothingists). The works of Igor Terent'ev (1892–1937) and Aleksandr Tufanov (1877–1941) continued zaum' practice and theory.

B. Ego-Futurism. Based in Petersburg and claiming as its founder the popular poet-aesthete Igor' Severjanin (1887–1941), who was the first to use the term Futurizm in the Rus. context (1911), ego-futurism emphasized extravagant urban imagery, foreign words, neologisms, egocentricity, and experimentation in rhyme. Its moving force was Ivan Ignat'ev (1882–1914), who wrote a number of manifestos and ran a publishing venture, Peterburgskij glašataj (Petersburg Herald), which produced several miscellanies and books by group members. The most inventive of these was Vasilisk Gnedov (1890–1978), with his famous "Poema konca" (Poem of the End, 1913) consisting of a blank page performed with a silent gesture of resignation. Gnedov also wrote poems of one letter, word, or line, sometimes bordering on zaum'. A Moscow offshoot of ego-futurism, the Mezonin poezii (Mezzanine of Poetry, 1913), was led by Vadim Ščeršenevič (1893–1942), a prolific poet and publisher who later led the movement Imažinizm (Imaginism).

III. Other Futurisms. Futurism took root in a number of other Slavic national lits. In the Ukraine, Myxajl Semenko (1892–1937) proclaimed Kverofuturism (Querofuturism) in 1914, later named Panfuturism, and put out a series of books and a jour., Nova Generacija (New Generation, 1927–31). In Poland, futurist-style manifestos and poems were written by Jerzy Jankowski (1887–1941) as early as 1912. The Krákow poets Tytus Czyżewski (1880–1945), Bruno Jasieński (1901–38), and Stanisław Młodożeniec (1895–1959) formed a futurist group in 1919, as did the Warsaw poets Anatol Stern (1899–1968) and Aleksander Wat (1900–67), the two groups coming together in 1921–22 to produce two important collections, Jednodniówka futurystów (One-time Issue of the Futurists) and Nuż w bżuhu (Knife in the Stomach). Czech futurism, called Poetismus (Poetism), included among its founding members the poets Vitěslav Nezval (1900–58), Jaroslav Seifert (1901–86), Konstantin Biebl (1898–1951), and the artist and theoretician Karel Teige (1900–51). The Slovenes had Anton Podbevšek (1898–1981). Futurist movements flourished for a time (1917–23) in Georgia and Armenia as well.

In Spain, the influence of It. futurism was important to the Catalan poets Josep-María Junoy (1887–1955) and Joan Salvat-Papasseit (1894–1924) and others who wrote parolibristic poems with a strong visual dimension, as did members of the ultraist movement (1919–23), most notably Guillermo de Torre (1900–1971; see ULTRAISM). Port. futurism was short-lived, centering on the activities of José de Almada-Negreiros (1893–1970) in 1916–17. The Brazilian poet Mário de Andrade (1893–1945) and a few others also showed the influence of Marinetti. In England, *vorticism was futurist in style. Marinetti considered it a branch of his movement, but its leaders, Ezra Pound (1885–1972) and Wyndham Lewis (1882–1957), the publisher of Blast (1914–15), saw themselves as independents. By the early 1920s, other Eur. movements had taken the lead away from futurism and had begun to emphasize other qualities: *Dada (nihilism, the absurd), *surrealism (the subconscious), constructivism (functionalism). Some later movements still retained noticeable elements of futurism, e.g., concrete poetry, lettrisme, and sound poetry.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS, MODERNISM.

■ General: E. Falqui, Bibliografia e iconografia del Futurismo (1959); R. Poggioli, The Theory of the Avant-Garde, trans. G. Fitzgerald (1968); Z. Folejewski, Futurism and Its Place in the Development of Modern Poetry (1980); W. Bohn, The Aesthetics of Visual Poetry, 1914–1928 (1986); M. Perloff, The Futurist Moment (1986); J. J. White, Literary Futurism (1990); R. Humphreys, Futurism (1999); International Futurism in Arts and Literature, ed. G. Berghaus (2000); Futurist Performance (2001), ed. M. Kirby; M. Puchner, Poetry of the Revolution: Marx, Manifestos, and the Avant-Gardes (2006); Futurism and the Technological Imagination, ed. G. Berghaus (2009); D. Ohana, The Futurist Syndrome (2010); 100 Artists' Manifestos, ed. Alex Danchev (2011).

■ Italian: R. Clough, Futurism (1961); P. Bergman, "Modernolatria" et "simultaneità" (1962); Futurist Manifestos, ed. U. Apollonio (1970); F. Marinetti, Selected Writings, ed. R. Flint (1972); Per conoscere Marinetti e il Futurismo, ed. L. de Maria (1973); C. Tisdall and A. Bozzolla, Futurism (1977); Contributo a una bibliografia del futurismo italiano, ed. A. Baldazzi et al. (1977); N. Zurbrugg, "Marinetti, Boccioni and Electroacoustic Poetry," Comparative Criticism 4 (1982); G. Berghaus. The Genesis of Futurism: Marinetti's Early Career and Writings, 1899–1909 (1995), and Futurism and Politics (1996); M. Bentivoglio and F. Zoccoli, Women Artists of Italian Futurism (1998); Futurist Manifestos, ed. U. Apollonio and R. Humphreys (2001); Italian Futurist Poetry, ed. W. Bohn (2005); Critical Writings / F. T. Marinetti, ed. G. Berghaus (2006); Futurism: An Anthology, ed. L. Rainey, C. Poggi, L. Wittman (2009); C. Poggi, Inventing Futurism: The Art and Politics of Artificial Optimism (2009).

■ Russian: Manifesty i programmy russkogo futurizma, ed. V. Markov (1967); V. Markov, Russian Futurism (1968); V. Shklovsky, Mayakovsky and His Circle, trans. L. Feiler (1972); E. Brown, Mayakovsky, A Poet in the Revolution (1973); V. Barooshian, Russian Cubo-Futurism, 1910–1930 (1977); B. Jangfeldt, Majakovsky and Futurism, 1917–1921 (1976); B. Livshits, The One and a Half-Eyed Archer, trans. J. E. Bowlt (1977); S. Compton, The World Backwards (1978); Ardis Anthology of Russian Futurism, ed. E. Proffer and C. Proffer (1980); V. Erlich, Russian Formalism: History–Doctrine, 3d ed. (1981); A. Lawton, Vadim Shershenevich (1981); G. J. Janecek, The Look of Russian Literature (1984); V. Khlebnikov, The King of Time, trans. P. Schmidt (1985); Terras, "Centrifuge," "Futurism," "Zaum'"; J. R. Stapanian, Mayakovsky's Cubo-Futurist

Vision (1986); Russian Futurism through Its Manifestoes, 1912–1928, ed. A. Lawton and H. Eagle (1988); L. Magarotto, D. Rizzi, M. Marzaduri, Zaumnyi futurizm i dadaizm v russkoi kul'ture (1991); R. Jakobson, My Futurist Years, ed. B. Jangfeldt and S. Rudy, trans. S. Rudy (1997); M. Shkandrii, M. Mudrak, I. Holuizky, David Burliuk, 1882–1967 (2001); Russkii futurizm, ed. V. N. Terekhina and A. P. Zimenkov (2009); T. Harte, Fast Forward: The Aesthetics and Ideology of Speed in Russian Avant-Garde Culture, 1910–1930. (2009); B. Jangfeldt, Stavka-zhizn': Vladimir Maiakovskii i ego krug (2009); N. Gourianova, Aesthetics of Anarchy (2012).

■ Other Futurisms: Polska avangarda poetycka, ed. A. Lam, 2 v. (1969); W. Wees, Vorticism and the English Avant-Garde (1972); L'avanguardia a Tiflis, ed. L. Magarotto et al. (1982); M. Mudrak, The New Generation and Artistic Modernism in the Ukraine (1986).

G. J. Janecek

FYRTIOTALISTERNA (Swedish, "The Poets of the 1940s"). A group of modernist poets who contributed to the definitive breakthrough of lyrical *modernism in Sweden in the 1940s. The name of the group came from the jour. 40-tal (The 40s), which was published from 1944 to 1947 and edited by some of Sweden's leading poets and critics. Several young poets of the 1940s published their first poems in 40-tal, and the jour. played a crucial role introducing foreign modernists—such as T. S. Eliot, Federico García Lorca, Ezra Pound, Albert Camus, William Faulkner, and Franz Kafka—in Sweden by publishing trans. and critical essays. Fyrtiotalisterna embraced modernist styles and preferred *free verse over traditional lyrical forms. They were affected by World War II, and their poetry can be seen as a direct response to the war. Anxiety and disillusion are frequent themes, but the poems also strive to find a way out of those feelings. Fyrtiotalisterna were critical of ideologies, intellectual, analytical, and conscious of the world and its shortcomings, and their work emphasized the universal and objective over the subjective and personal. The poetry of Fyrtiotalisterna is sometimes said to be pessimistic, but it is a critical, short-term pessimism, aiming at analyzing the contemp. situation in order to move on into a better future—almost an optimistic pessimism, with hope of renewal at its core. Hope is often associated with love, which is another recurring theme in the poetry of the 1940s.

The leaders of the movement, Erik Lindegren (1910–68) and Karl Vennberg (1910–95), were critics as well as poets. Lindegren's mannen utan väg (The Man without a Way, 1942) became a bible for the new generation. The collection contained "shattered sonnets" in which the traditional *sonnet form was broken down into two-line stanzas without rhymes and with a compressed and violent imagery. Lindegren's next collection, Sviter (Suites, 1947), was less obtrusive, with a prominent love theme. Vennberg was the master of contrasts and opposites. In his poetry collections, poems that criticize contemp. society with biting irony intermingle with esoteric poems colored by mysticism. Rut Hillarp (1914–2003) wrote love poems in an analytical and problematizing spirit typical of the Swedish 1940s, using erotic imagery to explore gender and power hierarchies. The movement was broad and included numerous poets, such as Sven Alfons (1918–96), Werner Aspenström (1918–97), Ann Margret Dahlquist-Ljungberg (1915–2002), Elsa Grave (1918–2003), Ella Hillbäck (1915–79), Ragnar Thoursie (1919–2010), and Maria Wine (1912–2003). Fyrtiotalisterna have been associated mostly with poetry, but some writers connected to the group wrote prose fiction (e.g., Lars Ahlin, Stig Dagerman, Eva Neander, and Gösta Oswald).

■ L. Bäckström, Erik Lindegren (1962); K. E. Lagerlöf, Den unge Karl Vennberg (1967); I. Algulin, Den orfiska reträtten (1977)—on Fyrtiotalisterna; A. Cullhed, "Tiden söker sin röst" (1982)—on Lindegren's mannen utan väg; R. Lysell, Erik Lindegrens imaginära universum (1983); L. Elleström, Vårt hjärtas vilt lysande skrift (1992); On Karl Vennbergs lyrik (1992); A. Bränström Öhman, Kärlekens ödeland (1998)—on Hillarp; A. Johansson, Poesins negativitetk (2000)—on Vennberg; J. Björklund, Hoppets lyrik (2004)—on Hillbäck, Hillarp, Dahlquist-Ljungberg.

J. Björklund

G

GAELIC POETRY. See IRELAND, POETRY OF; SCOTLAND, POETRY OF.

GAI SABER (Occitan, Sp., "gay knowledge," also called gaia or gaya sciencia). The art of poetic composition and, thus, the skill of a lover or the knowledge of *courtly love. In the prologue to Las razos de trobar, an early 13th-c. grammatical manual that is the oldest in or about a Romance lang., Raimon Vidal proposes to teach lettered men the "saber de trobar" or art of poetic composition. As an address to an aristocratic Catalonian readership interested in establishing rules for the public performance and judgment of *Occitan poetry, Vidal's description is foundational for later grammatical treatises such as the Occitan ars poetria, the Leys d'Amors (Laws of Love, ca. 1330, revision 1355), attributed to Guilhem Molinier, and Enrique de Villena's Arte de trovar (ca. 1427–33). Referring to Vidal, these treatises develop the concept of gai saber as the knowledge of proper poetic composition codified through competitions (see POETIC CONTESTS), and the publication of grammatical treatises and works that cultivate its precepts. Consistent with med. principles of knowledge, this establishment and preservation of immutable rules make a science of poetry (Weiss).

The founders of the Consistori de la Sobregaia Companhia del Gay Saber (Consistory of the Merry Band of the Gay Knowledge), an academy established at Toulouse in 1323 to preserve the Occitan *troubadour lyric trad., produced the Leys as a poetic code that designates rules for composing Occitan poetry in annual competitions. The treatise gives descriptive definitions with examples of major poetic genres such as the vers*, canso*, sirventes*, dansa*, descort*, tenso*, partimen*, and planh*, as well as other technical terms. Although the consistory's members were composed of laymen who met unofficially to compose and perform Occitan poetry, their social profile as a confraternity and their celebration of Marian and *devotional poetry resemble the activities of the northern Fr. Puys founded by religious confraternities. The Toulouse Consistory aspired to give the Occitan lyric trad. a Latinate authority by emulating the ceremonies of the city's university: the competitions were treated as public examinations followed by bachelors' and masters' degrees in gaia sciencia. Villena refers to Raimon's Razos and the Leys d'amors, and describes the establishment of the Consistory in Toulouse and its continuation in Barcelona that includes a poetic competition, the publication of libros del arte (vernacular treatises), and royal sponsorship. He emphasizes the importance of complete rather than amateur poetic knowledge, giving a full account of all the rules necessary for understanding the art of poetry and of how these constitute the criteria by which poetry is judged. Poetry is regenerated as a branch of knowledge through not only a constant public verification of transmissible rules but the establishment of institutions and the revision of these rules in poetic treatises.

In addition to its place in med. considerations of poetic knowledge, 20th-c. thinkers turned to gay science and the consistory as a kind of "counterlaw" to the authority of the Church and Roman legal trad., one that emphasizes a wisdom found through the physical and spiritual experience of lovers (Goodrich, Dragonetti). Fascinated with the subversive spirit of gay science as erotic knowledge, Friedrich Nietzsche maintains in his Gay Science (1910) that any science must have a certain amount of erotic playfulness, which he associates with the art of the troubadours.

■ Monumens de la littérature romane, I–II: Las flors del gay saber, estier dichas Las leys d'Amor, I–III: Las flors del gay saber, estier dichas Las leys d'Amors, ed. A. Gatien-Arnoult (1841–49); Las Leys d'Amors: Manuscrit de l'Académie des jeux floraux, ed. J. Anglade (1919–20); The "Razos de trobar" of Raimon Vidal and Associated Texts, ed. J. H. Marshall (1972); R. Dragonetti, Le gai savoir dans la rhétorique courtoise: Flamenca et Joufroi de Poitiers (1982); Obras completas de Enrique de Villena, ed. P. M. Cátedra (1994); J. Weiss, The Poet's Art: Literary Theory in Castile c. 1400–60 (1990); P. Goodrich, "Gay Science and Law," Rhetoric and Law in Early Modern Europe, ed. V. Kahn and L. Hutson (2001); C. Léglu, "Language in Conflict in Toulouse: Las Leys d'Amors," MLR 103 (2008).

M. GALVEZ

GAITA GALLEGA. A two-hemistich verse having marked ternary movement and a variable number of syllables, usually averaging about ten or eleven. It is primarily a Galician-Port. meter used in Sp. popular (rarely learned) verse. It is thought to be related to the muiñeira, a song to be accompanied by the bagpipe. Henríquez Ureña writes, "It seems hardly necessary to note that this meter, in spite of its relationship with the 15th-c. arte mayor, cannot be confused with it, because, even in the most regular forms, it employs the anapestic decasyllable; moreover, the latter becomes characteristic of the new regular form."

■ P. Henríquez Ureña, Versificación irregular en la poesía castellana, 2d ed. (1933).

D. C. CLARKE

GALICIA, POETRY OF. Spreading from the pilgrimage center of Santiago de Compostela throughout Galicia and northern Portugal, Galician-Port. cantigas* were among the earliest lyric forms in the Iberian peninsula. Most of the secular cantigas are preserved in the Cancioneiro (Songbook) da Ajuda (mid-14th c.), Cancioneiro da Vaticana (end of 15th c.), and the Cancioneiro Colocci-Brancuti (now Cancioneiro da Biblioteca Nacional de Lisboa, 16th c.). King Alfonso X el Sábio (The Wise) was responsible for the religious Cantigas de Santa María (13th c.). Galician poets from 1200–1350, the period of greatest achievement, include Martín Codax, Afonso Eanes de Cotón, Bernal de Bonaval, Joan (García) de Guilhade, Joan Airas, Pai Gomes Chariño, Airas Nunes, Pero García, and Pedro Amigo de Sevilla. The Galician-Port. school, although following Occitan models (see OCCITAN POETRY), is best exemplified by the apparently native cantiga de amigo, a song of melancholy nostalgia by a maiden for her absent lover.

After the death of Portugal's King Diniz (1325), the old lyric declined; from 1400, Castilian began to replace Galician as the lang. of poetry in the peninsula. The bilingual Cancioneiro de Baena (1445) still has a few Galician poems by Macias "o namorado" (fl. 1360–90), the Arcediano de Toro (fl. 1379–90), and Alfonso Álvarez de Villasandino (1340?–ca. 1428). Until the 18th c., little written Galician poetry had been preserved. Diego A. Cernadas de Castro (1698–1777), "el cura de Fruime," wrote bilingual occasional verse and with Manuel Freire Castrillón (1751–1820) marks the gradual rebirth of Galician lit.

*Romanticism brought more interest in Galicia's past and its ancient lit., folklore, and other indigenous features. Among others, Antolín Faraldo (1823–53) defended Galician autonomy and, with Aurelio Aguirre (1833–58), the Galician Espronceda, promoted literary regionalism. Francisco Añón y Paz (1812–78), "el Patriarca," is remembered for his patriotic *odes and humorous compositions. Alberto Camino (1821–61), author of sentimental and elegiac verse, is a forerunner of the Rexurdimento (Renaissance) led by Rosalía de Castro (1837–85). The rebirth was signaled by the Floral Games of La Coruña in 1861, the winning poems of which were published in the Album de caridad (1862). In 1863, Castro published Cantares gallegos (Galician Songs), the first book written in Galician in the mod. period. In 1880, Castro's Follas novas (New Leaves) appeared. Castro also wrote in Castilian, but her social concerns are most obvious in Galician. Moreover, her themes include some of the earliest feminist statements in Galicia, if not on the peninsula. Two of her important contemporaries were Eduardo Pondal y Abente (1835–1917), who wrote Queixumes dos pinos (Complaints of the Pines), and Manuel Curros Enríquez (1851–1908), forced to emigrate to Cuba after writing anticlerical verse. There he wrote the nostalgic Aires da miña terra (Airs of My Land, 1880). Valentín Lamas Carvajal (1849–1906) sang elegiacally of the peasant life in works such as Espiñas, follas e frores (Thorns, Leaves and Flowers, 1875). Other poets of the later 19th c. are José Pérez Ballesteros (1883–1918), known for the three-volume Cancionero popular gallego (1885–1912); Manuel Leiras Pulpeiro (1854–1912); and Manuel Lugrís Freire (1863–1940).

Among contemp. poets, the lang. has become more sophisticated. *Troubadour trads., saudade, and Galician nationalism are still present, while numerous foreign poetic movements have also been influential. The foremost poets of the early 20th c. are Antonio Noriega Varela (1869–1947), Ramón Cabanillas (1876–1959), Victoriano Taibo (1885–1966), and Gonzalo López Abente (1878–1963). Noriegas's ruralism is close to that of the previous generation, but Cabanillas and López Abente reflect Sp.-Am. modernismo*. Taibo's peasant themes express his social commitment. The best poet of the avant-garde in Galician was the sailor Manoel Antonio (1900–30), who collaborated with the artist Álvaro Cebreiro in the iconoclastic manifesto Mais Alí (Beyond, 1922). During his lifetime, he published De catro a catro (Four to Four, 1928); posthumously, the nearly complete works have appeared, showing him to be a true disciple of *creationism in the manner of Vicente Huidobro and Gerardo Diego. Luis Amado Carballo (1901–27) wrote a more pantheistic, vanguard poetry. Ricardo Carballo Calero (1910–90), Florentino Delgado Gurriará (1903–86), Xulio Sigüenza (1900–65), and Eugenio Montes (1900–82) also wrote avant-garde verse before the Sp. Civil War. In the same period, there was Aquilino Iglesia Alvariño (1909–61), and above all, Luis Pimentel (1895–1958). Fermín Bouza Brey (1901–73), one of the best-known Galician writers of the postwar period, also employed elements of med. poetry in the so-called New Troubadorism; in the same vein was Álvaro Cunqueiro (1911–81). In the 1940s and 1950s, Luz Pozo Garza (b. 1922), María do Carme Kruckenberg (b. 1926), and Pura Vázquez (1918–2006) were, among others, the best-known poets, with a wide range of lyrical motives. The Galician landscape is present in the extensive works of Uxío Novoneyra (1930–99). His native mountains of Caurel were presented in a cosmogonic vision of himself. He is present in María Mariño's (1918–67) and Bernardino Graña's (b. 1932) poetry.

Since 1976, Galician poetry has undergone rapid change. The proliferation of texts and critical studies led to the identification of a Golden Age of poetry. Some, such as X. L. Méndez Ferrín (b. 1938), have followed Celso Emilio Ferreiro (1914–79) and Lorenzo Varela's (1917–78) social poetry, while others have maintained Antonio's avant-garde orientation, adding a tendency toward intimism (Claudio Rodríguez Fer, b. 1956), and biographical content (Antonio Tovar, 1911–84).

The last decades of the 20th c. saw the emergence of three poetic groups, each associated with a major metropolitan area—Vigo; A Coruña; and the spiritual and cultural center of Galicia, Santiago de Compostela—and each characterized by generational and poetic conditions. Already well established by the 1980s, the Vigo group of Víctor Vaqueiro (b. 1948) and Alfonso Pexegueiro (b. 1948) witnessed the emergence of Xavier Rodríguez Baxeiras (b. 1945) and, later, incorporated poets such as X. M. Álvarez Cáccamo (b. 1954) and Manuel Vilanova (b. 1944), who had previously written in Castilian. Also linked to the Vigo group are the younger poets of the Rompente group.

The A Coruña group, Nebulosa Poética (Nebulous Poetics), brings together a diverse stock of poets, some more representative of the group's philosophy than others. The cultural magazine Dorna, supported by a student group from the Universidad de Santiago de Compostela, provided a forum for mature and young voices alike: Luisa Castro (b. 1966), Ramiro Fonte (b. 1957), Luis Gónzalez Tosar (b. 1952), and Ana Romaní (b. 1962). Linked to the Cravo Fondo group are Xesús Rábade (b. 1949), Helena Villar (b. 1940), and Xulio and Xesús Valcárcel (b. 1953 and 1955, respectively). Darío Xohán Cabana's (b. 1952) excellent trans. of Dante and Petrarch were already regarded highly by the 1970s and 1980s. Cabana explores in sonnet form personal experience and the call of his homeland. And despite his meager output in Galician, José Ángel Valente (1929–2000) left a notable mark on its lyric with Cantigas de Alén.

Later poetic currents followed a more culturalist approach, incorporating elements of the Port., Eng., and Am. trads., as well as those associated with mod. and postmod. aesthetics. Characteristic of such a poetics are varied musical, visual, and philosophical references and the desire to establish a new, cultured discourse capable of voicing idiomatic and formal experimentation. New conceptualizations of space, metrical form, *rhythm, and *imagery accompany the assimilation and transcendence of a cl. past. Arcadio López Casanova (b. 1942) is an innovative and foundational figure in this vein. In Mesteres, physical and spiritual exile is embodied in a solemn soliloquy that recalls the tragic, polyphonic chorus of antiquity, as it evokes the land and men of Galicia. Also worthy of mention is the vast oeuvre of Méndez Ferrín and, no less so, the innovative work of Vilanova, whose collection E direivos eu do mister das cobras could be considered a Galician "happening."

The 1990s ushered in a new wave of perspectives (feminist, ecological, antimilitarist), questioned earlier modes of expression, and reread myth and trad. from a parodic, often subversive, standpoint. The written word's capacity to represent alienation and otherness is explored by María Xosé Queizán (b. 1939). Romaní projects the self onto a vast seascape through the Homeric characters Odysseus and Penelope. Chus Pato (b. 1955) prefers to transgress conventional *syntax; Marta Dacosta (b. 1966) fuses landscape and biography; and Helena de Carlos (b. 1964) is firmly anchored in a rigorous, cl. style. The poetry of Isolda Santiago (b. 1960), Yolanda Castaño (b. 1977), and Olga Novo (b. 1975) ranges from sensorial experience and preciosity to primeval, telluric, tribal eroticism. Antón R. Reixa (b. 1957) weaves colloquial, popular discourse with advertising; Xavier Santiago is drawn to the audiovisual experience of urban environments. Rafa Vilar (b. 1968) is known for his minimalist style; Martín Vega (b. 1975) for his meticulously refined, cosmopolitan style; and Xosé M. Millán Otero (b. 1964) for his seminal conception of the word. Rodríguez and Seara's anthol. (1997) draws together many of these poets who accompany a selection of their work with insightful, critical self-analysis. Still relevant is the creative voice of López Casanova, who, in Liturgia do corpo (Liturgy of the Body, 1983), presents a lyrical anthem of self-immersion in response to the inevitability of death. In the epic work of Manuel María (1929–2004), the voice revels before a humanized nature; and the vigor of Méndez Ferrín, in Estirpe (Origin, 1994), restructures origins, ethnicity, hist., and land.

Among the most critically acclaimed voices is that of Rodríguez Baxeiras, who received the leading prize for Galician poetry for Beira norte (North Border, 1997), a symbolic journey homeward, toward the interiority of the lyrical voice. The books of Fonte, cofounder of the poetic collective Cravo Fondo and an active participant in Dorna, fuse personal, intimate experience with plurality and acceptance. Miguel Anxo Fernán Vello's (b. 1958) celebratory, erotic discourse, and Pilar Pallarés's (b. 1957) life-affirming poetics have been equally successful among critics. Manuel Forcadela's (b. 1958) works pay homage and parody the early works of Román Raña (b. 1960), Paulino Vázquez (b. 1962), and Anxo Quintela (b. 1960). Rodríguez Fer combines critical essay writing with poetic, phonic, graphic, and above all, erotic experimentation. Among the poets exiled in Argentina who contributed significantly to Galician lyric are Varela, Eduardo Blanco Amor (1897–1979), and Luis Seoane (1910–79).

Several collectives have given impetus to poetic production: Brais Pinto (1950s), Rompente, Alén, and De amor e desamor. Galician jours.—Nordés, Cen Augas, Dorna, Escrita, A nosa terra, Nó—have provided space for both the established writers and the new. Luciano Rodríguez's anthol. Desde a palabra, doce voces (From the Word, Twelve Voices, 1985) gathers the most representative poetry of the early 1980s. Losada's (1990) and López-Barxas and Molina's (1991) anthols. assemble, with a few notable exceptions, a similar selection.

See BASQUE COUNTRY, POETRY OF THE; CATALONIA, POETRY OF; PORTUGAL, POETRY OF; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: Cancionero popular gallego (1886), ed. J. Pérez Ballesteros, 2 v. (1942); Alfonso X, el Sábio, Cantigas de amor, de escarño e de louvor, ed. R. Carballo Calero and C. García Rodríguez (1983); Antología de la poesía gallega contemporánea, ed. C. A. Molina (1984); Desde a palabra, doce voces, ed. L. Rodríguez Gómez (1986); Festa da palabra, ed. K. N. March (1989)—contemp. Galician women poets; Poesía gallega de hoy. Antología, ed. B. Losada (1990); R. de Castro, Poems, ed. and trans. A. M. Aldaz et al. (1991); Fin de un milenio. Antología de la poesía gallega íntima, ed. F. López-Barxas and C. A. Molina (1991); Para sair do século. Nova proposta poética, ed. L. Rodríguez Góez and T. Seara (1997).

■ Criticism and History: A. Cruceiro Freijomil, Diccionario bio-bibliográfico de escritores, 3 v. (1951–54); J. L. Varela, Poesía y restauración cultural de Galicia en el siglo XIX (1958); R. Carballo Calero, Historia da literatura galega contemporánea (1981); L. Méndez Ferrín, De Pondal a Novoneyra (1984); C. Davis, Rosalía de Castro e o seu tempo (1987); C. Rodríguez Fer, A literatura galega durante a guerra civil (1936–39) (1994); A. Tarrío, Literatura galega (1994); R. Raña, A noite nas palabras (1996); D. Vilavedra, Historia da literatura galega (1999).

A. Carreño

GALLIAMB(US). In *classical prosody, a catalectic *ionic *tetrameter, named after the Galli, the eunuch priests of the Gr. goddess Cybele. There is an anonymous Gr. fragment, sometimes attributed to Callimachus (from incerti auctoris 761 [Pfeiffer]) cited by the ancient metrist Hephaestion as an example of this meter, which, if true, would suggest it was developed by the Alexandrian poets; but the most famous example is Lat., Catullus 63. This takes the form of an anaclastic ionic *dimeter (⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – –) + a catalectic ionic dimeter (⏑ ⏑ – – ⏑ ⏑ –) with or without *anaclasis, and with numerous resolutions. In the second dimeter, the second long syllable (longum) is almost always resolved. The first verse of the poem is typical: super alta vectus Attis / celeri rate maria (⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – – | ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ ⏑ ⏑ –). In the 19th c., both Tennyson ("Boadicea") and George Meredith ("Phaethon") experimented with accentual imitations of galliambus.

■ G. Allen, "On the Galliambic Metre," The Attis of Caius Valerius Catullus Translated into Eng. Verse (1892); Wilamowitz; R. Pfeiffer, Callimachus (1985); Halporn et al.; West.

J. W. Halporn

GAUCHO POETRY. Taken literally, gaucho poetry is the name for poetic compositions, anonymous or otherwise, that deal with the life and adventures of the Argentinean cowboy.

Popular poetry, which had its origin in the Sp. romancero, flourished at the end of the 18th c. and reached its peak by the middle of the 19th c. In Uruguay and Argentina, learned writers invaded the field of folk poetry and produced a number of literary imitations of the style of early payadores or singers of popular poetry. The first of these poets was the Uruguayan Bartolomé Hidalgo (1788–1822), whose famous dialogues expressed the sentiments of the gaucho in regard to the war of independence against Spain. He was followed by the Argentine Hilario Ascasubi (1807–75), who played an active role in the struggle against the dictatorship of Juan Manuel de Rosas and who published a number of gaucho ballads dealing with the siege of Montevideo (Paulino Lucero o los gauchos del Rio de la Plata, 1839–51). Santos Vega, o los mellizos de la Flor (1851, 1872), his greatest achievement in this type of poetry, tells the story of two brothers, one of whom becomes an outlaw. The main value of the poem resides in its colorful and accurate description of country and city life in mid-19th-c. Argentina. Estanislao del Campo (1834–80) followed the example of these writers and employed pure gaucho dialect in his Fausto (1866), a parody of Charles Gounod's opera.

The greatest of the gaucho poems is Martín Fierro (1872, 1879) by the Argentine José Hernández (1834–86). A well-educated man and a writer deeply conscious of his social mission, Hernández set out to prove the moral fortitude of the gaucho and his right to gain a respectable position in the life of his country. Dealing with the problem of civilization and barbarism in the Am. continent, he criticized the defenders of "civilization" for their irresponsibility in ruthlessly destroying the trads. of native populations, esp. the nomad gauchos. Encouraged by the success of his poem, Hernández wrote a second part (1879) in which he told of Martín Fierro's return from the Indian country where he had sought refuge from persecution by the city authorities. The tone of this continuation is no longer rebellious but moderately didactic. Hernández's poem owes its immense popularity in Sp. America to its virile exaltation of freedom and courage, to its forceful display of nationalism, popular wisdom, and pride in the virtues of a people who hold fast to the trad. of their homeland. Most critics consider Martín Fierro the highest achievement of popular poetry in Sp. America.

See cowboy poetry; spanish america, poetry of.

■ The Gaucho Martin Fierro, trans. W. Owen (1935); M. W. Nichols, The Gaucho: Cattle Hunter, Cavalryman, Ideal of Romance (1942); Poesía gauchesca, ed. J. L. Borges and A. Bioy Casares, 2 v. (1955); Antología de la poesía gauchesca, ed. H. J. Becco (1972); F. E. Tiscornia, Poetas gauchescos (1974); H. J. Becco, Trayectoria de la poesía gauchesca (1977); J. B. Rivera, Poesía gauchesca (1977); R. A. Borello, "El Martín Fierro y la poesía gauchesca," Boletín de la Academia Argentina de Letras 54 (1989); J. Ludmer, "The Gaucho Genre," Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, ed. R. González Echevarría and E. Pupo-Walker, v. 1 (1996); R. A. Borello, La poesía gauchesca: Una perspectiva diferente (2000); W. Katra, "The Poetic Tradition of the Gaucho," Cowboy Poets and Cowboy Poetry, ed. D. Stanley and E. Thatcher (2000); G. Kirkpatrick, "Romantic Poetry in Latin America," Romantic Poetry, ed. A. Esterhammer (2002).

F. Alegría

GAY POETRY. Generically, the term gay poetry designates poems with homosexual themes written by gay male poets or male poets who had or have sex with other men. Defining the term, however, also necessitates addressing the practice of such designation, rather than focusing exclusively on the designated topics or content. As Woods (1998) notes, a male homosexual literary trad. is actually fabricated by the construction of politically and socially validating lists of forebears and relevant texts. In this sense, readers often "claim" gay poets, regardless of the writers' own identifications, the matter of particular poems, or even their oeuvre as a whole. Characteristics marking a poet or poem as within a gay poetry trad. may include an often (but not always) positive and explicit representation of same-sex encounters, affairs, or relationships; narrators' or other figures' identification as gay or homosexual (or historical and cultural variants of same-sex sexual and emotional relations, incl. uranian, invert, sodomite, catamite, pederast); implicit or heavily codified representations of gays and homosexuals or same-sex attraction, practices, or relationships; or public claims, common knowledge, or newly discovered evidence of the author's homosexual self-identification or same-sex sexual practices.

Claiming an author or text to construct a trad. of gay poetry does not occur without ideological motivations. As the Am. poet Robert Duncan wrote in his pioneering essay "The Homosexual in Society" (1944), when such designations were made through World War II, it was either to "contend" apologetically that "such an undeniable homosexual as Hart Crane . . . was great despite his 'perversion' " or to promote "the growth of a cult of homosexual superiority to heterosexual values." Dissatisfied with both rationales for designating a text or author as gay, Duncan discusses his alternate vision for gay poetry as a "battlefront toward human freedom." In the wake of devels. in Western gay and lesbian politics since the early 1970s, the apologetic reference to gay poetry has largely fallen by the wayside. Instead, usage of the term negotiates a cultural humanism similar to what Duncan favored, as well as the politically driven promotion of lit. that represents a sexual minority's identity-based experiences or interests. Drawn from various historical periods and geopolitical locations, examples of gay poetry are often thought by their readers and critics to encourage individuals' and a minority group's consciousness raising by promoting the recognition of the social and cultural validity of their sexual identities and same-sex physical and emotional relationships. While such a politically charged process of culture and trad. building still continues, since the late 1980s economic motives have tended to inflect or overrun both the cultural humanism and political motivation underlying the category of gay poetry, as the publishing industry increasingly uses the term to designate a marketing category.

If readers claim as a gay poet a writer who is identifiable through some other social or cultural rubric (such as nationality, religious culture, race, or ethnicity), his work may be read as intersectional (e.g., as representative of gay Af. Am. poetry, gay Chinese poetry, gay Eastern Eur. Jewish poetry, gay Turkish Muslim poetry, gay Cuban Catholic poetry). Yet second- or third-identity categories often modify sexual identity as a primary term of identification. Thus, the rubric gay risks being grossly misapplied to various cultures and periods that may have recognized same-sex sexual experience as defining only a physical act, rather than a social or even ontological category of person. Often such poetry is read through a Western lens, more specifically through the lens of a white, middle-class, Am. sexual minority politics that has tended to ignore differences between local articulations of "gay" identities and same-sex practices. Critics and anthologizers have often overlooked variances—such as pederasty or a cultural understanding of "homosexuality" as sexual passivity—so as to construct a literary heritage bearing positive representations of male-male same-sex love in all its articulations. Diverse global authors, texts, and poetic figures have been misappropriated in this fashion—incl. the ancient Mesopotamian Epic of Gilgamesh, Ovid's representation of Orpheus in the Metamorphoses, the 1st-c. BCE Roman poet Catullus, the 8th-c. Persian poet Abū Nuwās, 10th-through 13th-c. Japanese samurai poetry, 13th-c. Turkish *divan poetry by Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī and others, sonnets by Ren. luminaries Michelangelo Buonarroti and Shakespeare, and the 17th-c. devotional lyrics of Thomas Traherne and John Donne.

Building a gay trad. runs less risk of anachronism if claimants begin with the 19th c., when, according to philosopher Michel Foucault, homosexuality was "born" as an identifiable social category in the West. The juridical and medical emphasis of that categorization tended to read homosexuality as an antisocial "perversion." Some instances of 19th-c. gay poetry reinforce that understanding, such as the stormy four-year affair in the early 1870s between Fr. symbolist poets Arthur Rimbaud and Paul Verlaine. Begun with Rimbaud's self-introduction to Verlaine through a letter enclosing the renowned "Le Bateau ivre" (The Drunken Boat), their relationship, upon its ending, spawned Rimbaud's bitter prose-poem Une saison en enfer (A Season in Hell): "For I can say victory is won: the gnashing of teeth, the hissings of fire, the pestilential sighs are abating. All the noisome memories are abating." Yet not all 19th-c. gay poetry was the product of tempestuous personal passions. Indeed, later readers have claimed some of the period's gay poetry as models for nationalist and humanist political visions. The Am. Walt Whitman's long-term project Leaves of Grass (1855–92) joins a vision for building a national lit. and for universal betterment with a celebration of the "manly attachment" of "camerados." As he exclaims in "Scented Herbage of My Breast," "I will sound myself and comrades only, I will never again utter a call only their call, / I will raise with it immortal reverberations through the States, / I will give an example to lovers to take permanent shape and will through the States." A similarly political valence can be found in the Ir. writer Oscar Wilde's "Ballad of Reading Gaol," produced during his imprisonment in 1895 for "gross indecency." Though the poem does not comment on the homosexual nature of his offense, it is a benchmark of social protest poetry that exemplifies gay poetry's current of cultural humanism in its inveighing against the Brit. justice system: "every prison that men build / Is built with bricks of shame."

Most 20th- and 21st-c. poets claimed for a gay male poetic trad. are from the U.S. or Western Europe, although many Asians and Latin Americans are claimed as well. However, a number of early 20th-c. writers included in the gay poetic trad. wrote about erotic matters in ambiguous ways so as not to reveal them as same-sex affairs or were reticent about their own homosexuality or bisexuality until later in their careers, if at all. In the cases of writers like Jorge Luis Borges (Argentina), Stefan Georg (Germany), Marsden Hartley (U.S.), and Stephen Spender (U.K.), it is not clear why these figures may have been reticent about homosexuality in their work. Many readers and critics tend to personalize the decision of such writers to keep themselves or their poetry "in the closet" yet claim them as gay poets anyway. Based on evidence of similarly reticent gay poets, it can be noted that cultural pressures often are responsible for a reluctance to identify oneself as homosexual or to draw attention to ambiguated or even explicit same-sex content in one's work. Certainly, this is true of writers who recognized their poetry as outgrowths of religious (often Roman Catholic) cultures, such as Vicente Aleixandre (Spain), W.H. Auden (U.K.-U.S.), Gastón Baquero (Cuba-Spain), Eugénio de Andrade (Portugal), and José Lezama Lima (Cuba). Political pressures also led to gay closeting or reticence. Sometimes those pressures originated in the state, as in the threat of blacklisting that faced Am. writers such as James Merrill (U.S.) during the postwar McCarthy era. Even in leftist states, however, governments persecuted homosexuals and viewed same-sex love as incompatible with radicalism. Thus, many gay poets—such as Xavier Villaurrutia (Mexico) and Nicolás Guillén (Cuba)—remained relatively silent about homosexuality in and out of their work. At other times, political pressures combined with cultural ones, as in the desire to avoid charges of effeminacy so as to promote culturally, racially, or nationally revitalizing projects. Such a combination is witnessed in Latin Am. avant-gardists such as Mário de Andrade (Brazil) or *Harlem Renaissance poets such as Countee Cullen (U.S.), Claude McKay (Jamaica-U.S.), and Langston Hughes (U.S.). Sometimes poets' contemp. audiences simply were unable to recognize attempts at homosexual expression. The Af. Am. poet Richard Bruce Nugent, e.g., notes that his "Shadows" (1925) was well received as a race poem, but in fact he had set out to express "the lonesomeness" of being "otherwise stigmatized" as a homosexual black man.

Of course, from World War I into the early 1950s, some writers—incl. Mikhail Kuzmin (Russia), C. P. Cavafy (Greece), Fernando Pessoa (Portugal), Luis Cernuda (Spain), Paul Goodman (U.S.), Robert Duncan (U.S.), Salvador Novo (Mexico), and Robin Blaser (U.S.-Canada)—explicitly and positively represented same-sex eroticism or wrote about social struggles attending their homosexuality. Others, such as Charles Henri Ford (U.S.) and Parker Tyler (U.S.), exhibited a camp sensibility, parodying gender and sexual norms for self-identified homosexual audiences. Several U.S. homosexual poets, most notably Hart Crane, continued a visionary Whitmanic trad. during the interwar period. Whitman has greatly influenced homosexual poetry internationally as well. He is the subject of the Andalusian poet Federico García Lorca's "Oda a Walt Whitman" (1930), a critique of Americanization and commercialization and its negative effects on homosexual identity. Indeed, the poem proved a major influence for Duncan's aforementioned essay "The Homosexual in Society," since, in the ode, García Lorca attacks self-important, campy attitudes as the product of capitalist corruption and an undermining of gay poetry's potential for a humanist vision. García Lorca's engagement with Whitman was translated by Duncan's friend Jack Spicer in his pivotal book After Lorca (1955) and is invoked in several of his friend Stephen Jonas's odes and Orgasms series. The obscenity trial concerning Allen Ginsberg's Whitmanic epic Howl (1956) revolutionized gay poetry, supplying a benchmark whereby the poetic expression of male same-sex desire was legally recognized as freedom of speech and thus subject to protection by the First Amendment in the U.S. Not all postwar gay poetry was visionary or Whitmanic. Some of the period's most impressive gay poetry insists on a colloquial voice and a direct poetic realism. *New York school poet Frank O'Hara's concentration on the quotidian and the poetic detailing of his everyday experience led to the incorporation of much homosexuality in his work, and he even uses slang for a homosexual threesome ("Lucky Pierre style") to describe his poetics in his tongue-in-cheek "Personism: A Manifesto" (1959, pub. 1969). John Wieners adopted a similarly frank attitude, openly writing of his own homosexuality in his autobiographical lyrics, incl. "Two Years Later" (ca. 1964), "How to Cope with This?" (1968), and "Queer" (1968).

Much gay poetry became overtly politicized in the wake of the 1969 Stonewall riots in New York City and the subsequent establishment of the Gay Liberation Front (GLF), the first radical, rather than assimilationist, gay and lesbian political organization. In the U.S. during this period, gay poetry was characterized by both sexual playfulness and political consciousness. It gave license to straight poets such as Gerard Malanga (also remembered as Andy Warhol's assistant) to explore bisexual experiences and themes in their writing. For the more politically minded, the publishing of poetry was esp. important, as is seen the gay poetry journal Mouth of the Dragon, as well as in the lists of poet Paul Mariah's ManRoot Press and Winston Leyland's Gay Sunshine Press. Gay Liberation media also often featured short lyrics; even if the literary quality was poor, the poetry still valuably rendered same-sex desire visible and expressed that desire as the core of a coalitional antisexist, antiracist, anticapitalist, and antiwar politics. For instance, the first issue of the GLF's newspaper Come Out! (Nov. 1969) includes a poem by Michael F. Boyle lamenting his struggle with the closet ("I am trapped in Society's Web of Rules / And obey them all, in abject fear"). From the same issue, Ron Ballard's short quatrain "Voice from the Closet" metaphorically comments on how, until gay liberation, anonymous public sex in "tearooms" (public restrooms or water closets) had been a kind of "closet" that let homosexuals keep their sexuality secret and thus reinforced racist and imperialist hierarchies by not challenging the core issue of sexism (homophobic and patriarchal ideologies). Incorporating poetry into New Left and Gay Liberation politics happens in a more literary manner in Ginsberg's "Graffiti 12th Cubicle Men's Room Syracuse Airport" (1969), a found poem that pointedly links repressive sexual attitudes to wartime culture by mixing messages about same-sex desire ("I want a blow job Who do I call") with commentary about Vietnam ("All power to the Viet Cong!"). Many gay literary poets writing at this time, such as James Broughton, were newly out as homosexuals. Others already had been publicly homosexual and writing explicitly gay content but discovered new liberties in a political climate emphasizing gay visibility and pride. Sometimes this resulted in a poetry that could seem to be a frivolous celebration of sex, yet its political significance rested precisely in rendering gay sex visible. For a limited press run, the *Black Mountain poet and founder of Jargon Society press Jonathan Williams wrote his gAy BCs (1976). In this provocative poetic primer, each letter attributes gay sexual practices to men bearing common Eng. names ("ARTHURS are a-thirst!" and "CHUCKS, of course, suck"); the poem is followed by the New York school artist and writer Joe Brainard's sexually explicit illustrations of those acts. International poets exhibiting a similar gay sensibility have been appropriated for a gay poetry trad. through trans. Such figures include the Japanese poet Mutsuo Takahashi's The Penisist (1975). The former *Beat poet Harold Norse celebrates gay male cruising and anonymous sex ("Let Me Love All at Stillman's Gym," 1969) yet also inveighs against homophobic violence, police entrapment, and legal prejudice ("The Queer-Killers," 1970). After illness with testicular cancer, the gay Buddhist monk and performance poet John Giorno's Cancer in My Left Ball (1973) matched a celebration of homosexuality with politicized meditations on the frailty of all bodies. Antler's long poem "Factory" (1970) connects his gay sexuality and continuance of Whitman and García Lorca's visionary poetics to working-class consciousness and anticapitalist protest.

As liberal gay politics have become increasingly "mainstreamed" (i.e., intertwined with capitalism and popular cultural representations), the term gay poetry now functions as a market category used in publishing and distribution, as well as in determining major international and national literary awards. This trend began in the 1980s, growing during the 1990s and into the 21st c. Understandably, then, the category gay poetry increasingly has more significance for readers, publishers, and consumers than it does for many writers. Some prominent Am. writers that lived through the heyday of gay liberation, incl. John Ashbery and Robert Duncan, were reluctant to identify themselves as "gay poets," even though they were openly homosexual. In order to advance the broader concerns of their work, rather than misreadings driven by identity politics, some have erased historical references to gay liberation, as in Ronald Johnson's revision and exclusion of poems from his Ark: The Foundations (1980). Still, many contemp. poets have identified or continue to identify their work as "gay" or "queer" or, in the least, do not resist such labels (Francisco X. Alarcón, Kazim Ali, Jeffrey Beam, Frank Bidart, Justin Chin, Henri Cole, CA Conrad, Dennis Cooper, Alfred Corn, Edward Field, Richard Howard, Kevin Killian, Wayne Koestenbaum, Timothy Liu, Jaime Manrique, D. A. Powell, Rodrigo Reyes, Reginald Shepherd, Aaron Shurin, and Emanuel Xavier). Many have consciously used poetry to address the impact of HIV/AIDs on gay populations (Rafael Campo, Mark Doty, Thom Gunn, Essex Hemphill, Assoto Saint). Worldwide, other recent poets have used gay themes to intervene in homophobic perception and institutional oppression of male sexual minorities, incl. Reinaldo Arenas (Cuba), Edwin Morgan (Scotland), Danton Remoto (Philippines), Severo Sarduy (Cuba-France), and Cyril Wong (Singapore). Others, such as Agha Shahid Ali (India), are more cautious about poetically disclosing their orientation.

■ Anthologies: The Male Muse, ed. I. Young (1973); Angels of the Lyre, ed. W. Leyland (1975); Orgasms of Light, ed. W. Leyland (1977); The Penguin Book of Homosexual Verse, ed. S. Coote (1983); The Son of the Male Muse, ed. I. Young (1983); Gay & Lesbian Poetry in Our Time, ed. C. Morse and J. Larkin (1988); The Road before Us, ed. A. Saint (1991)—black poets; Gay and Lesbian Poetry, ed. J. J. Wilhelm (1995); The Columbia Anthology of Gay Literature, ed. B.R.S. Fone (1998); A Day for a Lay, ed. G. G. Dillard (1999); Word of Mouth, ed. T. Liu (2000); The World in Us, ed. M. Lassell and E. Georgiou (2000); Masquerade, ed. J. Elledge (2004); Seminal, ed. J. Barton and B. Nickerson (2007)—Canadian poets; Mariposas, ed. E. Xavier (2008)—Latino poets; Our Caribbean, ed. T. Glave (2008).

■ Criticism and History: R. Duncan, "The Homosexual in Society" (1944), A Selected Prose, ed. R. J. Bertholf (1985); G. Woods, Articulate Flesh (1987); M. Foucault, The History of Sexuality, Vol. 1: An Introduction, trans. R. Hurley (1990); T. Yingling, Hart Crane and the Homosexual Text (1990); M. Maslan, Whitman Possessed (1991); J. Goldberg, Sodometries: Renaissance Texts, Modern Sexualities (1992); M. Moon, Disseminating Whitman (1993); S. Jones, Gay and Lesbian Literature since World War II (1998); R. K. Martin, The Homosexual Tradition in American Poetry, rev. ed. (1998); R. Rambuss, Closet Devotions (1998); G. Woods, A History of Gay Literature (1998); S. Bruhm, Reflecting Narcissus (2000); E. Bejel, Gay Cuban Nation (2001); J. E. Vincent, Queer Lyrics (2002); M. Cole, The Other Orpheus (2003); D. R. Jarraway, Going the Distance: Dissident Subjectivity in Modernist American Literature (2003); A.B.C. Schwartz, Gay Voices of the Harlem Renaissance (2003); B. Saunders, Desiring Donne (2007); M. Menon, Unhistorical Shakespeare (2008); M. D. Snidecker, Queer Optimism (2008); E. Keenaghan, Queering Cold War Poetry (2009)—Cuba and the U.S.

E. Keenaghan

GENDER AND POETRY. Gender norms and expectations are inevitably registered in poetic texts, whether or not the poet is consciously addressing them. Because gender is a salient feature of human experience, perceptions of gender necessarily affect representations of speech, social interaction, and human reflection. A poet's gender helps shape his or her perspective, just as a reader's gender conditions her or his responses to a poem. Poetry's links to gender become particularly apparent when poetic subgenres acquire gendered associations or when gender conventions become a self-conscious concern of poets and critics. Like gender norms themselves, the particular issues involving gender that are explored in poetic works vary across time and from culture to culture.

Because the writing of poetry was limited predominantly to educated men for many centuries, early poetry reflects largely masculine pursuits and perspectives. This is evident, for instance, in religious writing such as the Upanishads and much of the Heb. Bible; in OE, Gr., or Roman *epics; in the *pastoral poetry of Theocritus or Virgil, the *odes of Pindar and Horace, and the love poems of Ovid. Nonetheless, some early poetry celebrates women's strengths. Nordic saga often presents women as economically and emotionally independent, and in some Muslim epic trads., female characters are strong-minded, intelligent, and politically independent, as manifested in the woman-warrior motif in the Turkic Dede Korkut, the Persian Shahnāmeh, and the Ar. Sîrat al-amîra Dhât al-Himma. In the Western written canon, Sappho's widely celebrated *lyric poems provide an exception to the norm of male authorship, giving rise to an association of the lyric genre with the feminine. Many Japanese women also wrote poetry between the 7th and 10th cs., and there are female oral trads. in many cultures. Much of this earlier lit. reinforces established cultural norms for masculine and feminine behavior.

Gender becomes a more self-conscious focus of poetry as major cultural shifts call established gender norms into question. Such changes tend to occur as cultures develop attitudes and structures supporting women's education and participation in the public sphere, which in turn lead to greater numbers of women writing and reading poetry. Cultural and philosophical paradigm shifts also directly affect gender ideologies, which in turn affect who writes poetry, who reads it, the assumptions underlying its reception, and its content. Such shifts take place during the Ren., with the turn to the use of vernacular langs.; in the early romantic period, with the devel. of a gendered aesthetics; and in the modernist era, as revolutions in technology and in legal, educational, and economic systems lead to greater equality between women and men.

Early epic and religious verse depend in fundamental ways on gender hierarchy. Epic poetry was unabashedly masculine in its narrative, typically interweaving concerns with war, kingship, national politics, men's dangerous journeys through unknown realms, and male sexual prowess—as in Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, Virgil's Aeneid, the Nibelungenlied, and the Chanson de Roland. Women appear in such verse primarily as love objects or as obstacles to be conquered—e.g., as seductresses who stand in the way of masculine ideals of heroism and loyalty. Sacred writing assigns gender to figures of the divine in the verse of Hindu, Judeo-Christian, Buddhist, and other trads. In these major world religions, the central deity is male, although other powerful divine figures may be female. Aside from sacred texts, religious verse in the Christian trad. glorifies a masculine "God the Father" and often invokes a warrior-Christ, as in the mystic "Dream of the Rood." Dante's Divine Comedy is representative in imagining the individual's journey to God as a simultaneous journey to love, embodied for Dante in the inspirational and pure Beatrice. This narrative implicitly identifies the Christian as heterosexual male and the woman as his route to spiritual advancement. The med. *courtly love trad. secularizes this vision of ennobling love as manifest between a knight and a nobleman's wife. An alternative pattern of Christian verse represents the poetic speaker as a subservient "bride" or lover of Christ or as the ministrant of the Church, which is itself the "bride." Such gendering implies radically different stances when articulated by a man such as George Herbert in England or a woman such as Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz in Mexico, both writing in the 17th c.

John Milton's epic Paradise Lost combines gendered elements of the national and martial epic trad. with those of religious narrative in writing of an authoritative masculine God, battling armies of angels, and a hierarchically gendered Adam and Eve. Milton's powerful representation of this already well-established gendered narrative influenced generations of religious and secular poets. Female resistance to this view was already apparent 60 years earlier, when Aemilia Lanyer wrote "Eve's Apologie in Defense of Women" as part of her Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, a poem addressed specifically to women; while accepting the traditional view of Eve's responsibility for the Fall, Lanyer argued that women should not consequently be vilified. Later poets offer bolder revisions. Two hundred years later in the U.S., a young Emily Dickinson calls herself Eve and writes several poems redefining paradise or "Eden"; more radically, at the turn of the 20th c. Jewish Ger. Else Lasker-Schüler makes Eve a model of self-creation and the original producer of lang. Notions of Eve's responsibility for the fall into sin, caused by women's purported susceptibility to evil and powers of seduction, have nonetheless continued to influence poetic representations of women up to the present, as notions of Adam as the first created human favored by God with the gift of naming have influenced representations of men.

While epic verse remained the almost exclusive domain of male poets until the 20th c., in the med. period women participated in lyric trads. in Europe, Asia, and in the Arab world, though the number of women with the education and economic privilege that would allow them to write poetry was small. In Europe, convents were the primary site of education for women, and many female poets—like Hrotsvit, a 10th-c. Ger. poet and playwright; and Hildegard of Bingen, a 12th-c. Ger. philosopher, composer, and poet—belonged to abbeys. In contrast, Chinese Li Qingzhao grew up in a family of officials and scholars, and her poetry was already well known before her marriage in 1101, although only around 100 of her poems have survived. In Arab lands, from the 6th c. CE female poets gathered in literary salons hosted by women to perform their poetry, and poetry by women about love, liberation, and spiritual matters flourished in Muslim Spain and Portugal from the 10th through the 12th cs.

Gender difference became a distinct focus of poetry in the late med. querelle des femmes, a Eur. debate conducted largely among men about which sex is superior. This debate influenced numerous early mod. writers who praise women's intelligence and accomplishments and protest the social, legal, and economic restrictions imposed on them. Following this debate, Christine de Pizan's arguments against the degradation of women at the beginning of the 15th c. responded to misogynist doctrines in Jean de Meun's popular poem Roman de la Rose. Arguments about the capacities and nature of women also play out in such Ren. works as Ludovico Ariosto's epic Orlando furioso, retelling the Charlemagne legends in ways that suggest the physical, moral, and intellectual equality of women; or in Edmund Spenser's late 16th-c. epic The Faerie Queene, an allegorical celebration of Queen Elizabeth's monarchy. Shakespeare frequently undercuts gender conventions, as he does playfully in his verse dramas As You Like It and Twelfth Night, where male actors play women successfully impersonating men, thereby highlighting the artificiality of gender performance for both sexes.

While debates about gender are more readily inscribed in narrative, philosophical, and dramatic verse, a single perspective on gender is characteristic of the lyric because of its brevity and personal voice. The Ren. sonnet sequence typifies the masculine perspective dominant in Western lyric trads. until at least the late 19th c. In this trad., the woman is sometimes demonized, as in Shakespeare's "Dark Lady" sonnets, but more often idealized in an objectifying way. The beloved is the usually distant object of male desire; seen through the male gaze, her beauty is celebrated—often through the blason or listing of the woman's body parts, at the expense of her character and agency. Some of Shakespeare's early sonnets are addressed to a male beloved, providing precedent for explicitly homosexual love sonnets by such 20th-c. poets as James Merrill. Women have written sonnets almost since the form was invented: It. courtesan Veronica Franco wrote two sonnets, and her *terza rima poems challenged idealizing clichés of the Petrarchan sonnet trad. in the mid-16th c.; the first amatory sonnet sequence by an Eng. woman was Mary Wroth's Pamphilia to Amphilanthus in 1621. Perhaps similarly inspired by Shakespeare, women have also written love sonnets to those of their own sex—e.g., Gabriela Mistral in her 1914 Sonetos de la Muerte—and by the late 20th c. poets are writing explicitly lesbian love sonnet sequences, such as Marilyn Hacker in Love, Death, and the Changing of the Seasons and Adrienne Rich in her modified sonnet sequence "Twenty-One Love Poems."

Lit. of the med. and early mod. period articulated gender and sexual expectations largely through the depiction of character and relationships; at the beginning of the romantic era, Ger. philosophers and poets constructed a powerfully influential aesthetic distinguishing the beautiful and the *sublime in gendered terms: the beautiful was associated with the small, contained, delicate, and "feminine"; the sublime with grandeur, natural chaos, and unboundedness—the "masculine" (although, contrarily, women were also identified with nature, including both its nurturing and terrifying aspects). For Immanuel Kant, women were incapable of appreciating the sublime because of their limited moral capacity and weaker constitutions, while they were conceived as the embodiment of the beautiful. J. W. Goethe concludes Faust with reference to "das ewig Weibliche," the "eternal feminine," as drawing the striving male intellectual and artist upward to heaven, a formulation extending earlier representations of woman as the vehicle for man's access to the divine and the depths of his own soul. In Ireland Edmund Burke, in Scotland David Hume, and in the U.S., E. A. Poe articulate varieties of this assoc.—Poe famously remarking that the proper object of a poem is beauty and that the death of a beautiful woman is "unquestionably the most poetical topic in the world."

Romantic philosophical debate helped shape the gender dynamics within continental Eur., Brit., and Am. poetry of the 19th c. In the poems of William Wordsworth, P. B. Shelley, William Blake, and other Brit. romantics, nature is often a feminized other, what the (male) poet is not, typically figured as a healing force and sometimes as a terrifying one. The assoc. of women or the feminine with nature, which lacked the powers of speech, was among the cultural factors that silenced aspiring female poets in Britain or pushed potential poets toward nonpoetic genres. Am. transcendentalism also displaced women from poetic agency, in this case by conceiving poetic creativity as largely independent of all feminine presence, even as inspiration. On both sides of the Atlantic, the discourse on creativity was complex; even individual poets altered their constructions of nature and representations of the feminine, and of women, during their lifetimes. Typically, however, during this era, the poet was figured as male. Walt Whitman, who perhaps more than any other male poet attempted to acknowledge female equality and agency ("I am the poet of the woman the same as the man"), sexualizes this masculinist aesthetic in celebrating every aspect of his explicitly male body not only as part of nature but as key to his concept of the Am. "self."

Within a few decades of the earliest romantic poetry, female poets on both sides of the Atlantic were protesting aesthetic theory's implied abrogation of women's creative power. Felicia Hemans, Lydia Sigourney, Frances Harper, and others resisted romantic associations of women with passive nature in their assertion of women's subjectivity and agency, often with direct implications for public policy—as in Sigourney's poetry on Native Ams. and Harper's on slave women. E. B. Browning's long narrative poem Aurora Leigh constructs an ambitious female poet as its protagonist, thereby also revising the epic trad. as appropriately focused on the life of a woman. Emily Dickinson places the power and nuance of a philosophized and felt subjectivity at the heart of her experimental poetry. In the 1880s, Anglo-Jewish Amy Levy revises the dramatic monologue developed by Robert Browning so that it is spoken by a woman—e.g., "Xantippe," in the voice of Socrates' wife. As movements for greater rights for women gathered strength internationally, an increasing number of poets constructed unconventional female subjects to embody the century's social changes. Henry Wharton's 1885 trans. of Sappho also gave increased impetus to women's claims to the lyric "I" and encouraged the exploration of same-sex eroticism. At the turn of the 20th c., Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darío celebrated an almost hermaphroditic interchange of masculine and feminine principles (see MODERNISMO).

While 19th-c. thinkers typically gendered genius, the sublime, and hence the poet-as-creator as masculine, poetry itself came to be associated increasingly with the feminine and feminized *sentimentality, as did the arts of painting, dance, music, and theater. This identification occurred in part because of the growing popular and economic success of female writers, but it was also linked to larger patterns of gender anxiety, as industrialization and urbanization removed increasing numbers of men from professions requiring physical strength or associated with stereotypical masculinity. By the turn of the 20th c., cultural movements throughout the industrialized world manifested anxiety about changing gender norms through a discourse of aggressive masculinity—in religious, political, and professional as well as artistic spheres. The most authoritative discourse in the West had become that of technology and science, and as part of the devel. of modernism, male poets increasingly theorized the principles of their verse in the lang. of mathematics, science, impersonality, and abstraction in opposition to the increasingly feminized concept of sentiment. The early 20th-c. devel. of a scientific discourse of sexuality—particularly of a "third sex" or homosexuality—by writers such as Otto Weininger, Sigmund Freud, and Havelock Ellis encouraged some poets to explore sexual desire and pleasure with increasing frankness, while others perceived only greater anxiety and confusion about shifting gender norms and conceptions of the sexual. Representative of the period's (often queer) avowals of desire is Amy Lowell's 1919 "A Decade," with its representation of intercourse with her female partner of ten years: "the taste of you burnt my mouth with its sweetness." In contrast, Tristan Tzara's "Dada Manifesto" (1918) makes explicit the contrast between feminizing conceptions of the poet and an insistently masculinist *modernism, representing male sexual energy through images of speed, noise, and technological force: "We aren't sentimental," he states; we will "replace tears by sirens." Swiss and Ger. *Dada, It. *futurism, Rus. constructivism (with its commitment to abstraction), Anglo-Am. modernism, and later Fr. *surrealism all engaged in a discourse of masculinity, technology, or impersonality. Representative of this dominant masculine discourse is Ezra Pound's 1918 call for a new poetry that is "free from emotional slither." This aesthetic that devalued feeling, the popular, and the naïve and that elevated abstraction, the technical, and the complex became the cornerstone of the *New Criticism in the 1930s, leading to the mid-century canonization of poets who fit modernist criteria for greatness and to the devaluation of all poets—male and female—who participated in the 19th-c.'s popular sentimental trads. New Critical modes of reading also fostered neglect of the striking aspects of gender and sexual anxiety and of feminism manifest in some of modernism's most significant poems.

With the political movements for women's liberation and gay rights in the U.S. and Western Europe during the 1960s and 1970s, gender roles, the relation between sex and gender, and oppression based on gender or on sexual preference again became explicit concerns of much poetry. Reflecting greater social equality, women poets attempted longer, more ambitious forms, and greater numbers of women gained widespread recognition and publishing opportunities. In the closing decades of the 20th c., various forms of feminist theory, queer theory, and masculinity studies emerged. These theories and others, e.g., Donna Haraway's theory of the cyborg, have provided fresh models of psychosexual devel. and social analysis that encourage new thinking about gender in interpretations of poetic texts. Such theories have also provided new ground for poetic performance and representation of gender.

See FEMINIST APPROACHES TO POETRY, GAY POETRY, LESBIAN POETRY, POETESS, QUEER POETRY.

■ S. Gilbert and S. Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic (1979); P. G. Allen, The Sacred Hoop (1986)—Am. Indian trads.; A. Ostriker, Stealing the Language (1986); Rewriting the Renaissance, ed. M. W. Ferguson, M. Quilligan, and N. J. Vickers (1986); G. Hull, Color, Sex and Poetry (1987)—Harlem Ren.; J. DeJean, Fictions of Sappho, 1546–1937 (1989); M. Ross, The Contours of Masculine Desire (1989)—romanticism; S. Clark, Sentimental Modernism (1991); A. Mellor, Romanticism and Gender (1992); J. C. Frakes, Brides and Doom (1994)—med. Ger. epic; S. Gaunt, Gender and Genre in Medieval French Literature (1995); H. Sussman, Victorian Masculinities (1995); E. Stehle, Performance and Gender in Ancient Greece (1996); L. Keller, Forms of Expansion (1997)—contemp. long poems; Y. Prins, Victorian Sappho (1999); G. Schultz, The Gendered Lyric (1999)—19th-c. Fr. poetry; Reading and Writing the Ambiente, ed. S. Chávez-Silverman and L. Hernández (2000)—queer poetry in Latin Am. and Sp. culture; M. Simpson, Poetic Epistemologies (2000); Early Modern Women Poets (1520–1700), ed. J. Stevenson and P. Davidson (2001); The Poetry of Arab Women, ed. N. Handal (2001); Writing Gender and Genre in Medieval Literature, ed. E. Treharne (2002); P. B. Bennett, Poets in the Public Sphere (2003)—19th c. Am.; P. McCracken, The Curse of Eve, The Wound of the Hero (2003)—med. lit.; M. Davidson, Guys Like Us (2004); S. Wolosky, "Poetry and Public Discourse," Cambridge History of American Literature, ed. S. Bercovitch, v. 4 (2004); C. Miller, Cultures of Modernism: Marianne Moore, Mina Loy, Else Lasker Schüler (2005); J. Dowson and A. Entwistle, A History of Twentieth-Century British Women's Poetry (2005); C. G. Martin, Milton and Gender (2005); Medieval Constructions in Gender and Identity, ed. T. Barolini (2005); R. B. DuPlessis, Blue Studios: Poetry and Its Cultural Work (2006); Shadowed Dreams, ed. M. Honey, 2d ed. (2006)—Harlem Ren.; C. Bates, Masculinity, Gender, and Identity in the English Renaissance Lyric (2007); Deutsche Dichterinnen vom 16. Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart, ed. G. Brinker-Gabler, rev. ed. (2007)—Ger. women poets from the 16th c. to present; Japanese Women Poets, ed. S. Hiroaki (2007); Women and Medieval Epic, ed. S. S. Poor and J. K. Schulman (2007); Gender and Modernism, ed. B. K. Scott, 4 v. (2008).

L. Keller and C. Miller

GENERATIVE METRICS. A branch of ling. concerned with the metrical structure of poetry. Following basic tenets of generative ling., generative metrics understands poetic form as resulting from rule-governed behavior. Explicit statement of metrical competence, i.e., the native practitioners' knowledge of the system that underlies that behavior, is at the core of the research program of generative metrics. Describing and explaining variation in metrical systems within a single author, a single trad., or across trads. (typological variation) form an important part of this project because variation reveals the boundary between individual choices and the general principles grounded in the human-lang. faculty. Following early work by Roman Jakobson, generative metrics maintains that categories and properties available to natural metrical rules are those that are also independently needed in grammatical (phonological) rules of langs. This hypothesis informs the typological aspect of generative metrics and leads to a sharp distinction between natural and artificial aspects of poetic form: the former are grounded in the lang. faculty and are acquired and processed in the same unconscious way as the grammatical system, whereas the latter make part of what might be called "communicated" form (Nigel Fabb) and are subject to more explicit manipulation by the poet.

Two competing views of the nature of *meter have developed in generative metrics, namely, templatic and rhythmic theories. Originating in the early work of Morris Halle and S. J. Keyser and later advocated by Fabb, templatic (also called "serial" by Alan Prince) theories view the metrical pattern as an abstract series of positions (a template). Halle and Keyser define Eng. *iambic pentameter as a series of ten W(eak) and S(trong) slots; mapping between linguistic structure and meter is mediated by correspondence rules. Three such rules are adduced in order of increasing constraint: either stressed *syllables occur in only and in all S positions (violated by weak syllables in S positions) or in only but not in all S positions (violated by stresses in W positions); or stress maxima (fully stressed syllables falling between two unstressed syllables in the same syntactic constituent) occur in only but not in all S positions. Violations of the first two rules merely indicate metrical complexity (tension), but violations of the third render a line unmetrical.

Rhythmic theories, advocated by Paul Kiparsky, Bruce Hayes, and Prince, assume the metrical and the linguistic representations to be built out of the same basic components. In such theories, poetic meter, just like linguistic stress, is based on *rhythm (i.e., a recurring pattern). The S and W in metrical structure have the same meaning as the strong and weak syllables in the representation of stress. This devel. in metrics paralleled the new understanding of stress that was taking shape in linguistic theory in the 1970s. In contrast to earlier understanding of stress as an abstract feature, in the theory proposed by Liberman and Prince, stress was a matter of rhythm and of grouping.

Rhythm is usually (though not necessarily) understood as based on grouping of material into prosodic constituents (feet, dipodes, cola), following the traditional notion of metrical foot that had been abandoned by Halle and Keyser. (Unfortunate terminological confusion results from the fact that ling. borrowed many terms from traditional metrics, e.g., foot, iamb, trochee. This overlap in terminology underscores the synergy between metrics and ling.: the idea that rhythm is due to grouping originated in poetics; was adapted for its own needs by linguistic theory; and then, outfitted with new theoretical trimming, made its way back into metrics).

Tension can be expressed by the degree of agreement between the metrical and linguistic structures. In the majority of lines, there will be a mismatch between the lang. and the meter. Ling. Ss in metrical Ws cause labeling mismatches; when such Ss occur in a polysyllabic word, the line is unmetrical. Bracketing mismatches occur when the two patterns of W and S agree but the constituent structure is misaligned. Kiparsky argues that John Milton allows some labeling mismatches absent in Shakespeare, but such mismatches never occur simultaneously with bracketing mismatches. This fact would elude a theory of meter without constituent structure except by brute-force stipulation. Characteristically for generative metrics, constituent structure was reintroduced by Kiparsky not for any historical, intuitive, or ideological reason but because it allowed the theory to handle data that remained out of reach for the earlier theory.

An additional argument in favor of the rhythmic view is one of parsimony. Because rhythm is based on a recurring pattern of constituents, the range of potential meters that can be described with a rhythmic theory is smaller than what can be described using arbitrary templates. The more restrictive theory is more desirable, in absence of evidence to the contrary. But there remain some recalcitrant data. Aperiodic meters, such as the meters of Sanskrit and Gr. *lyric, appear to be based on templates consisting of a random sequence of weak and strong positions, without any pattern. Work by Ashwini Deo has shown that even such apparently "irregular" meters have an underlying rhythmic structure and, thus, are compatible with rhythmic theories.

In an important devel., Kristin Hanson and Kiparsky advanced a parametric theory of meter, using the tool developed in generative grammar to account for cross-linguistic diversity and limitations on it. A metrical system can be thought of as a set of choices in several general parameters that describe the structure of the meter and its realization. Hanson and Kiparsky argued that langs. make the choice among the available parameters in such a way as to maximize the use of the vocabulary in the meter ("metrical fit").

Later devels. in generative metrics parallel the progress in ling. Optimality theory (OT; first suggested by Prince and Smolensky in 1993), a theory of resolution of conflicting preferences, was applied to meter by Golson and Riad. Abandoning the assumption that meter is based on an underlying abstract template, these authors derive the patterns entirely from the interaction of conflicting constraints. The focus on the threshold of absolute metricality in early work in generative metrics reflected a similar trend in generative grammar; both domains have later addressed gradient acceptability. Sophisticated theories of linguistic gradience and variation have been applied to metrics. On the one hand, work by Hayes and MacEachern and by Kiparsky on folk verse has used OT to describe the way complex structural variation in quatrain types arises from a small set of conflicting general preferences. On the other hand, Fabb has argued that aspects of the metrical form that are gradient must be handled by a pragmatic component, separate from the grammatical component responsible for defining the limits of metricality.

At the core of the approach of generative metrics is the assumption of modularity, i.e., the understanding that not all aspects of a poetic work are to be explained at the same time and that poetry owes part of its complexity to the multiplicity of modules required for its processing. Because the scope of the approach is limited to structural aspects of verbal art, generative metrics represents a conspicuous example of the advantages and limitations of purely formal methods applied to problems in poetics.

See FOOT, FORMALISM, LINGUISTICS AND POETICS.

■ R. Jakobson, "On Czech Verse" (1923); M. Halle and S. J. Keyser, "Chaucer and the Study of Prosody," CE 28 (1966); "Illustration and Defense," CE 33 (1971); and English Stress (1971); K. Magnuson and F. G. Ryder, "Second Thoughts," CE 33 (1971); A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, "The Abstractness of Metrical Patterns," Poetics 4 (1975); P. Kiparsky, "Stress, Syntax, and Meter," Lang 51 (1975); R. P. Newton, "Trochaic and Iambic," Lang&S 8 (1975); and "The Rhythmic Structure of English Verse" LingI 8 (1977); M. Liberman and A. Prince, "On Stress and Linguistic Rhythm," LingI 8 (1977); B. Hayes, "A Grid-Based Theory of English Meter," LingI 14 (1983); Rhythm and Meter, ed. P. Kiparsky and G. Youmans (1989)—see esp. B. Hayes, "The Prosodic Hierarchy in Meter" and A. Prince, "Metrical Forms"; K. Hanson and P. Kiparsky, "A Parametric Theory of Poetic Meter," Lang 72 (1996); C. Rice, "Generative Metrics," GLOT International 2.7 (1997)—a general overview; C. Golston, "Constraint-based Metrics," Natural Language and Linguistic Theory 16 (1998); B. Hayes and M. MacEachern, "Quatrain Form in English Folk Verse," Lang 74 (1998); C. Golston and T. Riad, "The Phonology of Classical Greek Meter," Linguistics 38 (2000); N. Fabb, Language and Literary Structure (2002); A. Deo, "The Metrical Organization of Classical Sanskrit Verse," JL 43 (2006); P. Kiparsky, "A Modular Metrics for Folk Verse," Formal Approaches to Poetry, ed. E. Dresher and N. Friedberg (2006).

T.V.F. BROGAN; L. BLUMENFELD

GENERIC RHYME. A species of *near rhyme in which the rhyming syllables contain identical vowels followed by consonants that are not identical but belong generically to the same phonetic class. It is a characteristic prosodic feature of Ir. and Scottish Gaelic poetry, where, by the 8th c. CE, Ir. grammarians had differentiated six permissible rhyming groups: (1) p-t-c, (2) f/ph-th-ch, (3) b-d-g, (4) bh-dh-gh-mh-l-n-r, (5) m-ll-nn-rr-ng, and (6) s. Examples of generic rhyme also appear in passages of *Welsh poetry that may date from the 6th c. CE and involve consonant classes such as (1) d-g, (2) f-gh-w, (3) dd-l-r, (4) nt-nc, and (5) all nasal consonants and clusters of r + nasal. Among later Welsh poets, generic rhyming never became requisite, and Welsh grammarians came to refer to the device as "Irish." Occasional generic rhymes may be found in Eng. *nursery rhymes, particularly between the voiceless stops c, t, and p (". . . on the tree t*op* /; . . . the cradle will r*ock*") and between the nasal continuants m and n (". . . for my d*ame* /; . . . lives in the l*ane*").

See CELTIC PROSODY; RHYME; SCOTLAND, POETRY OF.

■ Canu Aneirin, ed. I. Williams (1938); G. Murphy, Early Irish Metrics (1961); Irish Syllabic Poetry, ed. E. Knott (1981); Early Welsh Saga Poetry, ed. J. Rowland (1990).

C. W. DUNN; B. BRUCH

GENEVA SCHOOL. The Geneva school of literary crit. brought together a group of phenomenological critics with varying ties to Geneva. Marcel Raymond and Albert Béguin, the earliest Geneva school figures, and Raymond's students Jean Starobinski and Jean Rousset were all directly associated with the University of Geneva. Georges Poulet, born a Belgian, taught in Switzerland for many years and was directly influenced by Raymond; Jean-Pierre Richard, a Frenchman, and J. Hillis Miller, an Am., have recognized Poulet's influence on their work. Not a "school" in the sense of having a common doctrine or manifesto, they are linked by a vision of lit. as a network of phenomenological perceptions and expressive lang. that delineates, throughout an author's work, an individual consciousness or cogito. Formal concepts such as poetry and prose are not important: the Geneva reader seeks individual patterns of awareness rather than aesthetic structures. Later Geneva critics have broadened their focus beyond individual authors to examine patterns of consciousness in art, music, cultural hist. and lang. itself. (This Geneva school should not be confused with an earlier Geneva school of ling. theory associated with Ferdinand de Saussure, Charles Bally, and Albert Sechehaye.)

The literary Geneva school has its roots in existential and phenomenological theory (Edmund Husserl and Gaston Bachelard), in romantic tradition, in the thematic hist. of ideas (A. O. Lovejoy), and in Henri Bergson's analyses of the perception of time. Rejecting "objective" views of a work (whether continental *historicism or Am. *New Criticism), the Geneva critics propose alternative techniques for analyzing the written text. Two influential studies, Raymond's From Baudelaire to Surrealism (1933) and Béguin's L'Âme romantique et le rêve (The Romantic Soul and Dream, 1939), examine passages by Fr. symbolists, Ger. romantics, and mod. Fr. poets as exploratory moments in a visionary search for reality. Lit., at this level, records the evolution of a preconscious awareness to a consciousness fully situated in time and space. Poulet's Studies in Human Time (1949–68) outlines a systematic methodology for this approach, first documenting ways that time and space are represented throughout an author's work and then plotting the personal coordinates of a developing creative consciousness. Thus, Victor Hugo experiences space first as formless movement in a void, a vague emptiness to be populated and conquered: filling both poetry and novels with a mass of concrete details, he discovers that such details are merely deceptive images hiding a discontinuous and empty reality. Geneva crit. has no formula for stating critical results: the same perceptions and experiences may be seen from a more subjective point of view (Poulet) or in an object-centered vision that recaptures the sensual logic of the mental landscape (Richard). Separate analyses may also be grouped in a larger period hist. Since the Geneva critics believe that lit. portrays the growth of a spiritual identity, they often situate individual patterns of consciousness within metaphysical contexts: within an awareness of true presence (Poulet), of divinity (Béguin) or immanent reality (Miller's early works), and within the precarious viability of expressive forms themselves (Starobinski, Miller, Rousset). A basic metaphor is that of an inner mental space, an initial unformulated awareness from which consciousness emerges to write its own narrative.

Geneva readers undertake an act of sympathetic identification with the literary cogito. They employ an essentially hermeneutic process of suspending presuppositions and waiting for the work to "signal" a route into its mental universe (a universe that is incidentally not limited to any one text but embraces everything the author has written). Richard cites poetry, essays, reviews, correspondence, notes, and even a fashion column in his detailed thematic study, L'Univers imaginaire de Mallarmé (Mallarmé's Imaginary Universe, 1961). Geneva critics have been criticized for going beyond acceptable boundaries of ling. interpretation in an attempt to espouse patterns of consciousness and for not valuing the separate identities of different works. Their "criticism of identification" necessarily precludes any judgment or evaluation according to exterior criteria, whether aesthetic, sociological, or political. Those who see lit. as an objective pattern of greater or lesser beauty or as an example of cultural production will not be content.

Geneva crit. typically emphasizes individual patterns of consciousness and an opposition to objective or "exterior" readings. It is a totalizing model whose unifying and humanistic tendencies are rejected by the impersonal ling. strategies of deconstruction. Geneva critics vary in their methods, however, and several have shown interest in the impersonal or at least transindividual structures of lang. over the last decade. Starobinski's Action and Reaction (1999) constructs a multidisciplinary semantic hist. to illuminate the textuality of human decisions. Miller, who rejected Geneva individualism in 1970 for the impersonal textuality of deconstruction, adopted a "rhetorical" approach that emphasized lang. and defined the act of reading as a performative speech act repeated and renewed in different situations. In The Medium Is the Maker, he effectively inverts the Geneva concept of unifying cogito by presenting identity as a decentered, variable nexus within the larger system of ling. exchange. The Geneva focus on patterns of consciousness in lit. and on the challenges of reading remains part of the critical landscape.

■ A. Béguin, L'Âme romantique et le rêve (1937); M. Raymond, From Baudelaire to Surrealism, trans. G. M. (1950); J. Rousset, La Littérature de l'âge baroque en France (1953); J.-P. Richard, Poésie et profondeur (1955); G. Poulet, Studies in Human Time I–IV, trans. E. Coleman and C. Dawson (1956–77); A. Béguin, Poésie de la présence (1957); J.-P. Richard, L'Univers imaginaire de Mallarmé (1961), and Onze Etudes sur la poésie moderne (1964); J. H. Miller, Poets of Reality (1965); S. N. Lawall, Critics of Consciousness (1968); J. Rousset, L'Intérieur et l'extérieur (1968); G. Poulet, La Conscience critique (1971), and Exploding Poetry, trans. F. Meltzer (1980); J. H. Miller, The Ethics of Reading (1987); J. Starobinski, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Transparency and Obstruction (1988), The Living Eye (1989), and Blessings in Disguise (1993), all trans. A. Goldhammer; J. H. Miller, Theory Now and Then (1991), Others (2001), and The Medium Is the Maker (2009); J. Starobinski, Action and Reaction, trans. S. Hawkes and J. Fort (2003).

S. N. Lawall

GENIUS. As now understood, the term genius derives from two Lat. roots, genius and ingenium. The first comes from gens, or family, whose tutelary spirits (e.g., Penates, as found in the Aeneid and alluded to in Ben Jonson's "To Penshurst") are identified with and embodied in men and worshipped on each birthday. In this sense, the Roman genius is comparable to the Gr. daimon (demon), a spirit that directs one's actions. Socrates regarded himself as directed by his daimon. Genius was also identified with the character of a place, as in genius loci. When Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire, daimon came to be thought of primarily as diabolical through the influence of Augustine and other church fathers (we still have in common parlance the phrase "evil genius").

The other root of genius, Lat. ingenium, referred more clearly to "natural talent or aptitude, proficiency." While the maxim poeta nascitur non fit steadily increased in popularity from antiquity to the 18th c., it was sometimes countered throughout this long period by ideals of acquired skill. E.g., the classically trained Jonson in the early 17th c. insisted poeta fit non nascitur.

Further, although it is tempting to see genius as referring only to the inner world of the poet and becoming synonymous with talent, in fact the notion of an accompanying spirit is never absent. The It. word ingegno captures the ambiguity of genius in the Ren., referring at once to natural talent and to the spirit that provides that talent. This ambiguity in which genius seems to exist both inside and outside is prevalent. The 17th-c. Eng. author John Marston insists that his "Genius" despises "Critickes rage" (Wharton); in this typical case, "genius" represents a separate entity capable of individual thought. In "Lycidas," John Milton describes the resurrected spirit of the dead Edward King as the "Genius of the shore," a Christianized reference to the Roman concept of genius loci—in this case, a tutelary figure.

It may be that for some authors talent was beyond craft, beyond reason, even beyond the rules of art, as in Alexander Pope's "Grace beyond the Reach of Art." But it would be overstating the case to say that all authors believed in the subordination of craft to genius, even after the advent of *romanticism. It is true that the long-lasting cult of J. W. Goethe's genius reflected a belief in the author's otherworldliness, but near the same time Joshua Reynolds (Discourses on Art) showed contempt for those who thought great art sprang from inspiration alone. Even "romanticized," the term genius always contained a modicum of craft—poeta fit. Lost, however, was the sense of a separate, accompanying spirit.

The concept of genius is developed most fully in *neoclassical poetics and in *preromanticism. Now "genius" became more than mere "talent"—although even here, one must be wary of generalizations. For instance, in Milton's famous ambiguity of the one "talent" that is "death to hide" (sonnet 19), the poet alludes to the biblical parable while referring to his own languishing talent. It is unlikely that Milton considered his "talent" anything less than "genius." By 1775, genius was unequivocally associated with inventiveness, creativity, and fecundity of *imagination. Genius surpasses talent just as the *sublime exceeds the beautiful. The semantic shift is essentially from genius as denoting those at the top of the class of mortal intellects to those above the mortal class altogether.

Immanuel Kant characterized genius as "the talent [natural endowment] that gives the rule to art," adding that, because talent itself belongs to nature, "Genius is the innate mental predisposition [ingenium] through which nature gives the rule to art" (Critique of Judgment). He claimed that genius was a talent for art, not for science; distinguished from taste, by which one judged a beautiful object, genius was required to make a beautiful object, the chief quality of genius being "originality." Kant rejects imitation and "teachability" in genius; only natural endowment and inspiration constitute it—not even Isaac Newton qualifies in Kant's judgment because Newton could show the steps he took to reach his discoveries, whereas "no Homer or Wieland" can show how his ideas originate. J. R. Lowell's later dictum, "talent is that which is in a man's power; genius is that in whose power a man is," echoes Kant's notion of genius with slightly different emphases and clearly signals the curtailment of poetic agency. The doctrines of *spontaneity and originality, those quintessential hieroglyphs of romanticism, degraded the idea of talent as skilled performance, highlighting a notion of creativity akin to furor poeticus without the balance of imitatio. In the Ren., and even up to the time of Reynolds, true imitation is a creative and inventive activity; after Kant, imitation loses this value. Important forces driving the shift are the 18th-c. tastes for the gothic, the *sublime, *primitivism, and other manifestations of the sub- and suprarational; and the adulation of Shakespeare as a natural genius.

Still, it can be misleading to suggest an overly schematic history or to see a petrified and polarized relationship between natural endowment and skill. Romanticism notwithstanding, the notion of skill in artistic production was reaffirmed often in the 19th and 20th cs., e.g., by W. D. Howells ("there is no 'genius'; there is only the mastery that comes to natural aptitude from the hardest study of any art or science" [Howells; Stokes]) and by Irving Babbitt in his essays on originality (1908) and on romantic genius (1919), a sweeping indictment of the romantic mythology of originality and genius.

Important documents in the hist. of the concept include Longinus, chs. 33–36 (first trans. into Eng. in 1554 and refracted for the 17th c. through Nicolas Boileau), Abbé Du Bos, Réflexions critiques sur la poésie et la peinture (1719), and Joseph Addison's Spectator essay no. 160 (Sept. 3, 1711). Between 1751 and 1774, 12 publications treat the concept of genius, incl. William Sharpe's Dissertation upon Genius (1755), William Duff's Essay on Original Genius (1767), and Alexander Gerard's Essay on Genius (written 1758, pub. 1774; ed. B. Fabian, 1966, with valuable intro.), the most important being Edward Young's Conjectures on Original Composition (1759), which is essentially a romantic manifesto. Young was a primary influence on Ger. Sturm und Drang*, where genius becomes a key concept, reformulated in the distinction between *fancy and imagination, whence S. T. Coleridge (Biographia Literaria, chs. 2, 15). Kant's Critique of Judgment (1790) is central. An important romantic episode occurs in William Hazlitt's two essays, on "Genius and Common Sense" (Table Talk) and on "Whether Genius Is Conscious of Its Power?" (The Plain Speaker). Charles Lamb's "The Sanity of True Genius" (1826) reasserts psychic balance.

■ W. D. Howells, "Editor's Study," Harper's Monthly 72 (1886); O. Schlapp, Kants Lehre vom Genie (1901); I. Babbitt, "On Being Original," Literature and the American College (1908); E. C. Stedman, Genius and Other Essays, ed. L. Stedman and G. M. Gould (1911); I. Babbitt, "Romantic Genius," Rousseau and Romanticism (1919); L. P. Smith, Four Words (1924); E. Zilsel, Die Entstehung des Geniebegriffs (1926);

H. Thüme, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Geniebegriffs in England (1927); B. Rosenthal, Der Geniebegriff des Aufklärungszeitalters (1933); H. Sudhiemer, Der Geniebegriff des jungen Goethe (1935); P. Grappin, La Théorie du génie dans le préclassicisme allemand (1952); Abrams; Wellek, v. 2; G. Tonelli, "Genius, Renaissance to 1770," and R. Wittkower, "Genius, Individualism," pt. 4, DHI, v. 2—with biblios.; Saisselin; J. Chance, The Genius Figure in Antiquity and the Middle Ages (1975); K. Frieden, Genius and Monologue (1985); J. Schmidt, Geschichte des Genie-Gedankens in der deutschen Literatur, Philosophie und Politik, 2 v. (1985); C. Battersby, Gender and Genius (1989); Genius, ed. P. Murray (1989); T. F. Wharton, " 'Furor Poeticus'—Marston and his Contemporaries," Explorations in Renaissance Culture 19 (1993); M.J.A. Howe, Genius Explained (1999); O.N.C. Wang, "Kant's Strange Light: Romanticism, Periodicity, and the Catachresis of Genius," diacritics 30 (2000); D. Dutton, "What is Genius?" Philosophy and Literature 25 (2001); C. Haynes, "Reassessing 'Genius' in Studies of Authorship: The State of the Discipline," Book History 8 (2005); C. Stokes, "In Defense of Genius: Howells and the Limits of Literary History," American Literary Realism 40 (2008).

T.V.F. Brogan; R. Falco

GENRE. Most broadly, the term genre designates the long and controversial hist. of literary classification from antiquity to the present. The practice of grouping individual texts into distinct categories, called genres, is common to writers and readers of all periods. But these genres are themselves contingent, historical. Writers' tendencies and readers' expectations regarding the identifying features of a particular genre—theme, *style, *form, vocabulary, *syntax, *address, *allusion, morphology, medium, and so forth—are highly variable, both synchronically and diachronically. While debate over the nature and attributes of particular genres sometimes devolves into a chicken-or-egg squabble (which comes first, the generic category or the individual work?), it is also one of the chief engines of lit. hist. Thinking about lit. in terms of genre both piques and gratifies the human appetite for classification—the urge to identify unidentical things. But the dynamism of generic change also drives powerful narratives of difference and autonomy. We may think of a text as an expressive (authorial) or communicative (textual) intention endowed with a form that makes its meaning intelligible to others, even across great distances of time and space. At the same time, we recognize it to be a set of discursive effects not fully reducible to recognizable intentions or formal rules. Genres insist on horizons of meaning and expectation (Jauss), but they also give rise, through each act of reading, to dialectics and questions (Conte 1986).

Genre means "kind" or "sort" and is etymologically related to words such as gender, genus, and beget. Not surprisingly, texts in generic groupings are often understood to possess a kin-like relation to one another. Texts in the grouping known as "epic," e.g., are commonly said to "belong" to that genre, very much as if it were a family or clan. There has been a wide variety of genealogical and biological models of generic change, from J. W. Goethe's organicism, to Ferdinand Brunetière's speciation, to Franco Moretti's stemmatism. Some—Brunetière is the chief example—have rightly been faulted for thinking too strictly in terms of naturalistic categories. But the work of recent critics as different from one another in kind as Fowler, Kristeva, and McKeon attests to the continuing viability of biological analogies for a wide variety of rhetorical, discursive, historicist, and materialist theorizations of genre that are all diachronic and antiessentialist. Even a genre theorist as profoundly skeptical of communicative intention as Jacques Derrida nevertheless speaks of genres in terms of a more generalized sociality. Like him, many readers prefer to think of a text as "participating in" rather than "belonging to" a particular genre.

Belonging, participation, and other anthropomorphisms of genre, such as miscegenation, locomotion, sterility, and even death, find a precursor in Aristotle, who, in his Poetics (4th c. BCE), credits the differentiation of poetic genres to differences not only in poetic objects but in poets' own characters: the kind of person you are (e.g., superior, serious, noble vs. inferior, base, vulgar) dictates, Aristotle (following Plato) reasoned, the kind of poem you will write. This characterological determinism did not uniformly dictate cl. poetic practice, which reflects more freely and self-consciously made decisions about what and how to write. But such associations between genre and human nature, behavior, and relationship nevertheless abounded in antiquity and persist in much later expressivist thinking about genre and its implications for literary studies. The mod. aestheticization of the sapphic fragment as *"lyric," for instance, has its origins in the ancient reification of the emotional timbre of the poet Sappho's voice.

What postromantics habitually call Sappho's "lyrics," however, do not find their original theorization in either Plato or Aristotle, to whom centuries of trad., as we will see, have confusingly attributed the critical establishment of a trio of "major" or "basic" genres: *epic, *dramatic, and lyric (cf. Hegel). The lyric—when characterized as poetry that is neither chiefly narrative (epic) nor chiefly imitative (dramatic), but rather directly expressive of the poet's own thoughts and feelings—is, in fact, precisely that which is absent or excluded from Aristotle's system. The genre system proper to Aristotle comprises the object (either the actions of superior characters or the actions of inferior characters) and mode (either narrative or dramatic) of poetic address. The four possible combinations are tragedy (superior-dramatic), epic (superior-narrative), comedy (inferior-dramatic), and parody (inferior-narrative). The two genres that matter most to Aristotle are epic and, above all, *tragedy. He gives *comedy and *parody short shrift, and what later theorists call "lyric" is nowhere to be found in the Poetics. The lit. of antiquity is full of types of poems—incl. *elegies, *odes, *epigrams, *epithalamia, and *epinikia—that, since the 16th c., have generally been classified as lyric genres. But this is a mod. classification, not an Aristotelian or aboriginal or "natural" one.

Many mod. inheritors of the Poetics, incl. major poets and theorists of the Ren. who got their Aristotle channeled largely through Horace's Ars poetica (1st c. BCE), were intensely devoted to further, more accurately construed fundamentals of Aristotelian genre theory, which included an emphasis on structural *unity and *mimesis, as well as a sense of literary kinds as both fixed in their rules and finite in their number. This devotion persisted through, and even beyond, the neoclassical era. Yet from Dante and Ludovico Ariosto to Ben Jonson (himself one of Horace's many Ren. trans.), John Dryden, Alexander Pope, and, much later, Matthew Arnold, some of the strongest advocates of cl. *decorum nevertheless insisted on maintaining a critical relation to it—reevaluating received rules and deviating from them in keeping with specific aesthetic or social goals, with the perception of a generally advancing understanding of the world, the object of poetic mimesis. As Pope puts it in his Essay on Criticism (1711),

> Learn hence for Ancient Rules a just Esteem;
> To copy Nature is to copy Them.
> Some Beauties yet, no Precepts can declare,
> For there's a Happiness as well as Care.
> Musick resembles Poetry, in each
> Are nameless Graces which no Methods teach,
> And which a Master-Hand alone can reach.
> If, where the Rules not far enough extend,
> (Since Rules were made but to promote their End)
> Some Lucky LICENCE answers to the full
> Th' Intent propos'd, that License is a Rule.

Pope's "lucky license" seems to anticipate later flowerings of arguments against inflexible and prescriptive concepts of genre—e.g., the individualistic arguments closely associated with the rise of continental and Brit. *romanticism. The late 18th and early 19th cs. saw an expansion and liberalization of genre theory and crit., an influential positing of open rather than closed generic systems. Many romantic writers felt that any historically determined set of fixed categories imposed on fresh poetic production was inadequate to new, dynamic theories of consciousness and growing confidence in the autonomy of aesthetic judgment. As human consciousness changed, they reasoned, new genres would continue to emerge. Other poets and theorists went even further, strongly resisting generic systematization of any kind (cf. Curran, Rajan). Although the idea that there exist only certain fixed, transhistorical genres has never been accepted without controversy, these romantic, post-Kantian devels. would be esp. consequential in the ongoing, contentious shifts in genre theory—shifts esp. visible beginning in the late 18th c.—away from taxonomics and toward *hermeneutics. Static taxonomics was largely rejected in favor of various competing historical models of generic devel. and transformation. And the principles of generic decorum that Aristotle and esp. Horace insisted on as normative standards linking the qualitative evaluation of poetry to the realm of human conduct would never regain their former influence.

This historical change is more comprehensively reflected, in part, in the transition from prescriptive models of genre (how poetry ought to be written) to descriptive-prospective models (how poetry has been and may yet be written). But this transition is not simply diachronic, no straightforward triumph of the mod. over the ancient. For, although it was Horace, and not Derrida, who coined the term "the law of genre" and although he insisted in his Ars poetica that mixed genres were monstrous violations of generic purity, yet Horace's own poetic practice, as Farrell demonstrates, is a thick forest of generic hybridization. Cl. poetry itself, as the example of Horace makes plain, frequently destabilizes cl. norms of genre. Indeed, the lack of congruence between theory and practice is the energizing, often conflicted condition of emergence for authors' individual works and for the historical appearance and transformation, in every period, of generic norms and expectations.

Still, for the sprawling Lat. and vernacular lits. of the Middle Ages, there were little anxious reflection and debate on the priorities of cl. poetics, such as would ensue from the rediscovery of Aristotle's Poetics in the early 16th c. Cl. terms persisted, but without much normative force; and they were supplemented by new terms, such as vision, legend, and romance. Yet there was no free-for-all. Many aspects of ancient rhet. and poetics were transmitted and adapted as schemata. And by the 13th c., the med. obsession with classification had focused its concentrated attention on Aristotle's recently translated works on logic, politics, ethics, and zoology. Moreover, both Christian dogma and Christian discourse entailed complex thematic and structural links across late Lat. Christian antiquity and the Middle Ages. Fowler, e.g., points to the extensive modulation of *allegory at the crossings of Christian and non-Christian canons. And Jauss provides a general warning against the retrospective imposition of a distinction between "spiritual" and "worldly" genres, pointing to the extraordinary range of models for med. literary genres found in the Bible, incl. *hymns, *laments, *sagas, legends, genealogy, letters, contracts, biographies, *proverbs, *riddles, parables, epistles, and sermons. Jauss also finds in med. genres, such as the courtly lyric, signs of the coming great shifts in the perceived purposiveness and autonomy of literary genres.

Indeed, with the later rediscovery of Aristotle's Poetics came not only a rededication to perceived cl. norms and a consequent sense of the impropriety and even alterity of med. "mixed" genres but a radical reinterpretation—really, as we have seen, a misreading—of the Poetics itself. The nonrepresentational genres—Genette calls them "a cloud of small forms"—that were effectively ignored by Aristotle as neither narrative nor dramatic became an increasingly important aggregate in Ren. genre theory and beyond. They were, as Genette observes, assimilated or promoted in two ways: first, by reclassifying nonimitative genres (those that imitate no action but merely express the poet's thoughts and feelings) as being in their own way imitative of the activities of thinking and feeling; second, and more radically, by rejecting the devaluation of the nonimitative genres and by elevating the status of their aggregative identity as "lyric" to the level of "epic" and "dramatic."

The hist. of the revaluation of genres, such as that of the ascendancy of lyric, is also a hist. of the recategorization of individual works and the reconfiguration of generic categories themselves. Lucretius's De rerum natura (1st c. BCE), e.g., has been variously classified as didactic epic, scientific poem, and verse sermon. Lucretius himself takes pains to justify his setting forth of Epicurean doctrine in "Pierian song," and Ren. theorists debated whether De rerum natura counted as "poesy" at all. Yet John Milton, like Virgil before him, found it to be an essential model for his own transformation of cosmological epic. In the late 18th c., it inspired the "poeticized science" of Erasmus Darwin. In the 19th c., Karl Marx simply classed De rerum natura with other philosophical treatises in his Jena dissertation, while Alfred, Lord Tennyson made Lucretius the subject of a dramatic *monologue discrediting his materialism. And Lionel Johnson's *lyric sequence, "Lucretius" (1895), opens with what one could call a Lucretian *sonnet, written, like De rerum natura, in hexameters.

As Johnson's sonnet helps to illustrate, the conventions of a genre may include formal, thematic, stylistic, and mimetic features: like many sonnets, it has 14 lines, it is about death, its language is elevated and meditative, and it seems to avoid direct address. Most commonly, a genre is constituted and recognized through shifting combinations, or ensembles, of such features. Deviations from the conventions of a given genre are often, as in Johnson's "Lucretius," small enough or self-conscious enough to highlight, rather than obscure, a particular text's generic resemblance to other texts. And while, generally speaking, the greater the deviation, the more attenuated the resemblance, sometimes it is, in fact, the more radical deviations—such as G. M. Hopkins's *curtal sonnets and Alexander Pushkin's *Onegin stanzas (also known as "Pushkin sonnets")—that are most effective at drawing fresh attention to the durability of received conventions.

Identifying such variations, though it may sometimes seem like a very specialized, even trivial, technical matter, has significant consequences for literary hist., crit., and theory. Shakespeare's sonnet 126, e.g., quite self-consciously stops two lines short of the conventional 14, signaling, among other things, the action of the "sickle hour" of death, referred to in line two, which cuts all love—and lovers—short. In the 1609 quarto, two pairs of italic brackets stand in for the missing (if this is a sonnet, we expect them to be there) 13th and 14th lines. But many later printings do not reproduce them. Is this sonnet unfinished? Does the typographically marked absence of the final two lines finish it? Does the absence of the brackets undo it? Either way, the perception of a gap between text and generic convention is a condition of interpretation, not only of the poem but of the published sequence of Shakespeare's Sonnets, to which it belongs. There are methodological consequences as well. Ignoring the typographic element means rejecting the interpretive significance of the 1609 text's nonverbal graphic elements—something to which materialist scholars would object. Accepting as a sonnet a 12-line poem embedded within a sequence of 14-line poems may call into question the integrity of the sequence. Refusing to accept a 12-line poem as a sonnet may call into question the sequence's stability and completeness.

By 1609, the sonnet was ubiquitous, and the popular *sonnet sequence was already well established as much more than a mere collection of individual poems. From their Dantean and Petrarchan models, both Philip Sidney and Shakespeare had learned a self-conscious style that begged—and sometimes beggared—the question of the relation between text-sequence and event-sequence. Structural ambiguity also helped blur the distinction between factual and fictional accounts, between author and persona. Later sonnet sequences, from John Donne's to Marilyn Hacker's, have continued to be written and read as implicit or explicit meditations, not only on autobiography but on narrative as such, and on the possible relation of nonnarrative or counternarrative poetry to themes of religious devotion, erotic love, and psychological interiority. Vikram Seth's The Golden Gate (1986), a book composed entirely of Pushkin sonnets, was very successfully marketed as a novel, prompting some to lament the further narrativization of all lit., while others celebrated the way novelistic discourse disseminated this traditional poetic form among new communities of readers.

Narratives may come in all sorts of genres, from the cl. epic and the Ren. sonnet sequence to the existential drama and the psychoanalytic case study. However, most theories of narrative and narrativity focus chiefly on literary fiction, esp. the novel. From the perspective of the present, the novel has become for many a *synecdoche for genre as such (cf. McKeon). When students in contemp. lit. classrooms refer to Hamlet or The Waste Land as a "novel," they are not necessarily making a simple category error but rather reflecting a broad cultural and critical shift toward treating the novel as paradigmatic of all that is interesting and dynamic in what Bourdieu calls the "literary field." Bakhtin's theory of the novel's exceptionality among other genres prompts his claim that lit. in the mod. era has undergone a process of "novelization." Not that other genres have grown to resemble novels in their features but that the nature of the novel—its status as the only "uncompleted" genre, its distinctive structural relation to the present, its fundamental plasticity, and its devotion to public autocritique—"sparks the renovation of all other genres . . . infects them with its spirit of process and inconclusiveness . . . implies their liberation from all that serves as a brake on their unique development" (Bakhtin 1981).

This remedial prescription for further generic devel. finds its counterpart in the wish to dispense altogether with the genre concept in literary analysis—a wish that had been gaining critical force since the 18th c. (cf. Schlegel) but that reached its furthest extreme in Croce's insistence that genre is a useless and even dangerous abstraction that draws attention away from each individual text's notable singularity, on which its aesthetic value, in Croce's view, depends. But Jauss and many others have given the lie to Croce's impossibly absolutist view of expressive singularity. For to be even minimally intelligible, any text, any expressive act, must refer to some set of conventions or norms against which its singularity can be noted and its novelty measured.

Post-Crocean reassertions and refutations of the meaningfulness and utility of the concept of genre are extremely diverse, ranging from Crane's neo-Aristotelianism, to Jakobson's emphasis on ling. structures and Bakhtin's on "speech genres," to Burke's posing of genres as frames of symbolic adjustment, to the competing anthropological structuralisms of Frye and Todorov, to Jauss's historical-systems model, to Miller's situational pragmatics, to Jameson's historical materialism, to Kristeva's *intertextuality, to Nelson's psychoanalytic reflections on genre as repetition compulsion, to Altman's work on film genres and Holt's on genre and popular music, to the reflexive questioning of critical genres in Stewart, Jackson, and Poovey. The diversity, sophistication, and ongoingness of such work testify to the stickiness of genre, not just as a concept that will not be shaken off but as that which provides the necessary traction for the mediation of literary and social discourse.

See CONVENTION, CRITICISM, KIND, VERSE AND PROSE.

■ K.W.F. Schlegel, Gespräch über die Poesie (1800); J. W. Goethe, "Naturformen der Dichtung," Noten und Abhandlungen zu besserem Verständnis des west-östlichen Divans (1819); F. Brunetière, L'évolution des genres dans l'histoire de la littérature (1890); B. Croce, Estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale (1902); K. Viëtor, "Probleme der literarischen Gattungsgeschichte," Deutsche Vierteljahrschrift für literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 9 (1931); Critics and Criticism, ed. R. S. Crane (1952); Frye; K. Burke, Attitudes Toward History (1959); R. Jakobson, "Linguistics and Poetics," Jakobson, v. 3; E. D. Hirsch, Validity in Interpretation (1967); C. Guillén, Literature as System (1971); P. Hernadi, Beyond Genre (1972); R. L. Colie, The Resources of Kind: Genre-Theory in the Renaissance (1973); Culler; G.W.F. Hegel, Aesthetics, trans. T. M. Knox, 2 v. (1975); T. Todorov, The Fantastic, trans. R. Howard (1975); J. Derrida, "La loi du genre / The Law of Genre," Glyph 7 (1980); M. M. Bakhtin, The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist (1981); F. Jameson, The Political Unconscious (1981); "Genre," spec. iss., Poetics 10.2–3, ed. M.-L. Ryan (1981); H. Dubrow, Genre (1982); H. R. Jauss, Toward an Aesthetic of Reception, trans. T. Bahti (1982); Fowler; J. Kristeva, Revolution in Poetic Language, trans. M. Waller (1984); C. R. Miller, "Genre as Social Action," QJS 70 (1984); A. Rosmarin, The Power of Genre (1985); M. M. Bakhtin, Speech Genres and Other Late Essays, trans. V. W. McGee (1986); R. Cohen, "History and Genre," NLH 17 (1986); G. B. Conte, The Rhetoric of Imitation, trans. C. Segal (1986); S. Curran, Poetic Form and British Romanticism (1986); Renaissance Genres, ed. B. K. Lewalski (1986); T. Todorov, Genres in Discourse, trans. C. Porter (1990); S. Stewart, Crimes of Writing (1991); G. Genette, The Architext, trans. J. E. Lewin (1992); T. O. Beebee, The Ideology of Genre (1994); C. B. Conte, Genres and Readers, trans. G. W. Most (1994); P. Bourdieu, The Rules of Art, trans. S. Emanuel (1996); R. Altman, Film/Genre (1999); Modern Genre Theory, ed. D. Duff (2000); Theory of the Novel, ed. M. McKeon (2000); T. Rajan, "Theories of Genre," CHLC, v. 5, ed. M. Brown (2000); V. Nelson, The Secret Life of Puppets (2001); "Theorizing Genres," spec. iss., NLH 34.2–3, ed. R. Cohen (2003); J. Farrell, "Classical Genre in Theory and Practice," NLH 34 (2003); V. Jackson, Dickinson's Misery (2005); F. Moretti, Graphs, Maps, Trees (2005); J. Frow, Genre (2006); "Remapping Genre," spec. iss., PMLA 122.5, ed. W. C. Dimock and B. Robbins (2007); F. Holt, Genre in Popular Music (2007); M. Poovey, Genres of the Credit Economy (2008).

M. CAVITCH

GEORGIA, POETRY OF. A written Georgian lit. starts with the beginning of the Christian era (4th c.). The earliest poetic forms are *psalms and *hymns, initially trans. from Gr. Over the next four or five centuries, Georgian monks, priests, and biblical scholars created an impressive body of ecclesiastical poetry. Ioane-Zosime (10th c.) was a tireless liturgical scholar, writer, translator, and poet, and the likely author of the hymn "Kebai da dibeai kartulisa enisai" (Praise and Glory to the Georgian Language), which suggests that Christ, in his Second Coming, will address the faithful in Georgian. Gradually, spiritual songs acquired more secular coloring, evolving into *lyric poems. From the early med. period to the beginning of the 20th c., poetry persists as the predominant mode of literary expression.

In the 11th and 12th cs., narrative poems emerged as the major genre of Georgian poetry. It reached its peak in the 12th c., under Queen Tamar (1184–1213). Among the distinguished poets of her court were Chkhrukhadze, Ioane Shavteli, and Shota Rustaveli; the last is acknowledged as the greatest master of Georgian poetic art. His epic poem Vepkhis tqaosani (The Man in the Panther's Skin) recounts the adventures of a young prince who aids his friend in search of his beloved, captured by devils. The poem's exceptional richness of vocabulary, powerful images, exquisite *alliterations, and complex rhyming are unsurpassed in Georgian poetry.

Rustaveli's poem became a paradigm for poets of the following four centuries, which mark a low point in the devel. of Georgian poetry. The themes and plots of The Man in the Panther's Skin are imitated in lyric and narrative poems alike. In the 16th and 17th cs., several Georgian kings distinguished themselves as poets. King Teimuraz I (1588–1662) translated Persian love poems, giving them a distinctly Georgian flavor. He also wrote an epic poem Tsameba ketevan dedoplisa (The Martyrdom of Queen Ketevan) dedicated to his mother, Queen Ketevan, who had been held hostage in Persia and was later tortured to death for refusing to renounce her Christian faith. King Archil II (1647–1713) wrote several didactic poems that contemplated the destiny of his country, religion, morals, and the art of poetry. Another writer of royal birth was Vakhtang VI (1675–1737), a poet, translator, and literary commentator. His refined allegorical love poems are tinged with mystical longing.

A far more radical innovator was David Guramishvili (1705–92), a Georgian nobleman who became an officer in the Rus. army. Although his major work, Davitiani (The Story of David), is written in traditional metrics, in his shorter lyrics he introduces a great variety of metrical forms and rhyming patterns inspired by folk poetry. Davitiani consists of several short narrative poems in which the author both expresses his religious and political thoughts and recounts his tumultuous and eventful life.

Bessarion Gabashvili (1740–91), better known as Besiki, was the next notable figure, a court poet of King Heraclius II. Love is the major theme of his remarkably elegant and sonorous lyrics. He also composed satirical poems aimed at his adversaries at the court.

In the early 19th c., Georgia was annexed by Russia, and Georgian nobility and intellectuals became acquainted with the literary trads. of Russia and Western Europe. Georgian poetry of the following decades displays romantic influences (see ROMANTICISM). The movement is best represented by Alexandre Chavchavadze (1786–1846), Grigol Orbeliani (1804–83), and Nikoloz Baratashvili (1817–45). Chavchavadze and Orbeliani express their pride in the Georgian heroic past or meditate on the country's lost glory. Other poems, marked with vibrant sensuality, praise the earthly joys of love, friendship, and feasting. However, Baratashvili is the epitome of Georgian *romanticism. In his best-known poem, "Merani" (The Steed), Baratashvili's poetic *persona is a passionate rebel challenging his destiny. In his only narrative poem, Bedi kartlisa (The Fate of Georgia), he contemplates the consequences of the last devastating battle of King Heraclius II against the Persian invaders. Baratashvili significantly reformed Georgian versification, introducing new metrical forms and integrating contemp. spoken lang.

The second half of the 19th c. is marked by increased dissatisfaction with oppressive Rus. policies. The most prominent figure of this generation was Ilia Chavchavadze (1837–1907). An outspoken critic of the policy of Russification and an advocate of an independent Georgian state, he wrote lyrical as well as narrative poems of patriotic appeal. His friend and contemporary Akaki Tsereteli (1840–1915) enjoyed far greater popularity among the general public, because of the clarity of his images, simplicity, and sonority of his lang. Many of his love poems have become popular songs. Vazha Pshavela (pseud. of Luka Razikashvili, 1861–1915) wrote poems in the vernacular of his native Pshavi, a mountainous region in Georgia. The tragic clash between the society's moral code and ethical concerns of an individual is the major theme of his narrative poems.

The first decade of the 20th c. witnessed a new surge of Western influence in a proliferation of poetic schools that assimilated simultaneously symbolist, futurist, and decadent forms and ideas. In 1916, a group of poets including Titsian Tabidze (1895–1937), Paolo Iashvili (1894–1937), and Giorgy Leonidze (1899–1966) raised the banner of the symbolist movement in Georgian poetry (see SYMBOLISM). These poets experimented boldly with vocabulary and versification and adjusted Western genres to the traditional forms of Georgian poetry. Georgian futurist poets—Nikoloz Shengelaia (1903–43), Simon Chikovani (1903–66), Shalva Alkhasishvili (1899–1980), and others—strained the potentialities of lang. to the breaking point, reflecting the same preoccupations as their Eur. and Rus. counterparts (see FUTURISM). Galaktion Tabidze (1891–1959), who did not belong to any literary group, is considered the most brilliant poet of the century. An acute sense of loneliness, mourning for loss, and at times a Baudelairean ennui and nostalgia find poignant expression in his fluid and sonorous verses.

After the socialist revolution of 1917, Georgia enjoyed a brief period of independence (1918–21), but in February 1921, the Red Army installed a Bolshevik government. A variety of poetic groups flourished through the 1920s. But the censorship's ever-tightening control resulted in the creative barrenness of the following two decades, as Georgian poets were required to extol the political and ideological superiority and economic achievements of the Soviet state. Several outstanding poets, incl. Tabidze and Iashvili, fell victim to the political purges of the late 1930s.

By the late 1950s, a new generation of poets emerged: Ana Kaladadze (1924–2008), Mukhran Machavariani (1929–2010), Otar Chiladze (1933–2009), Shota Nishnianidze (1929–99), and others. Taking advantage of the relatively liberal political atmosphere, they expressed their sentiments with remarkable vigor, imagination, and technical artistry. From the late 1960s, Lia Sturua (b. 1939), Besik Kharanauli (b. 1939), and many others embraced vers libre*. In subsequent decades, Manana Chitishvili (b. 1954), Tsira Barbakadze (b. 1965), Giorgi Lobzhanidze (b. 1974), Rati Amaglobeli (b. 1977), and others introduced new rhythms and styles. Kote Qubaneishvili (b. 1953) became the standard-bearer of the postmodernist generation whose flamboyant poetic vocabulary broke many literary taboos.

■ S. Rustaveli, The Man in the Panther's Skin, trans. M. S. Wardrop (1912); C. Beridze, "Georgian Poetry," Asiatic Review 17 (1930–31); R. P. Blake, "Georgian Secular Literature: Epic, Romance and Lyric (1110–1800)," Harvard Studies and Notes on Philosophy and Literature 15 (1933); J. Karst, Littérature géorgienne chrétienne (1934); History of Georgian Literature, ed. A. Baramidze, 6 v. (1962–78)—in Georgian; Georgishe poesie aus acht Jahrhunderten, ed. A. Endler (1971); L'avangardia a Tiflis, ed. L. Magarotto (1982); The Literature and Art of Soviet Georgia, ed. S. Dangulov

(1987); D. Rayfield, The Literature of Georgia: A History (1994); An Anthology of Georgian Folk Poetry, ed. K. J. Tuite (1994); H. I. Aronson and D. Kiziria, Georgian Language and Culture (1999).

D. Kiziria

GEORGIANISM. A naturalistic style associated with the five anthols. of Georgian Poetry (1912–22), ed. by the civil servant Sir Edward Marsh and containing poems by Rupert Brooke, Walter de la Mare, W. H. Davies, Wilfrid Gibson, D. H. Lawrence, Robert Graves, and Isaac Rosenberg, among others. Brooke, Gibson, de la Mare, and Lascelles Abercrombie were its original core, joined in 1916–17 by Graves and Siegfried Sassoon. To their discomfort, the final, weakest volume linked the Georgian brand name with J. C. Squire's London Mercury coterie. Lawrence welcomed the first volume as a "great liberation" from fin de siècle angst, but to its modernist enemies, Georgianism came to mean vague, sentimental rural lyrics in traditional forms, representing a retreat from modernity. Later defenders, however, saw it as an "English tradition" of natural speech-based verse that anticipated the *Movement's desire to return poetry to the ordinary reader. Although they were not published in Georgian Poetry, Edward Thomas and Robert Frost were associates of Gibson and de la Mare, and a looser sense of Georgian includes their style of carefully unemphatic, conversational poetry, distinct from the modernists' syntactic disorder and fragmented forms (see MODERNISM).

Modernist disagreement with Georgian poetry has tended to obscure their similarities, however. Like the imagists (see IMAGISM), the earlier Georgian volumes sought poems of intense emotion and direct impact, and in common publications like Harold Monro's quarterly jour. Poetry and Drama, both share a critical vocabulary of immediacy and sincerity. Ezra Pound, in fact, turned down an offer to be in the first Georgian anthol. for copyright reasons, though its success led him to adopt the anthol. format for Des Imagistes a year later. Whether in the amoral naiveté of the tramp-poet Davies, the mingled ecstasy and disgust of Abercrombie's verse dramas, or the abrupt *free verse of Lawrence, the Georgians' sometimes inept attempts to find poetry in the raw and unfiltered would nonetheless anticipate much later 20th-c. verse. The *war poetry of the third and fourth Georgian volumes is a natural extension of their ethos, while the recurrent Georgian interest in the uncensored imaginations of children and other nature figures would resurface a decade later among the Eng. surrealists (a connection anticipated by T. S. Eliot's 1924 Clark lectures, which compare Davies to Jean Cocteau).

Eliot's criticisms of Georgianism in the Egoist series "Reflections on Contemporary Poetry" (1917–19), on the other hand, detect in their tonal infelicities an emotional self-deception inherent in any mod. poet's trying to be simple in a complex society, incl. the imagists of Chicago's Poetry magazine. Edward Thomas shared Eliot's distaste for John Masefield's and Gibson's theatrical sincerity, and his own uninflected, meditative style has become one influential response. But Eliot saw their emotional and stylistic defects as a symptom of the insular, rootless self-satisfaction of Georgianism's Eng. middle-class readership, implying Georgianism was a cultural problem as much as a poetic movement. Criticizing Georgianism as "a style quite remote from life" ("Prose and Verse," Chapbook 22 [April 1921]), Eliot and Pound's formal shock tactics still sought the same vital and unimpeded relation between art and audience as Georgian Poetry originally wanted. And the fact that Eliot would publish many Georgians in Faber's "Ariel Poems" series of 1927–28 suggests that they were less enemies to be eradicated than individual poets of varying talents belonging to a rival "-ism," whose cultural difficulties with being both authentic and accessible modernism would itself take over.

■ R. H. Ross, The Georgian Revolt (1962); D. Hibberd, Harold Monro (2001); A. Jaffe, Modernism and the Culture of Celebrity (2005); P. Howarth, British Poetry in the Age of Modernism (2006).

P. Howarth

GEORGIC. A type of poetry that takes its name from Virgil's Georgics (29 BCE), the middle work in Virgil's career between his *pastorals (Eclogues, 39 BCE) and his *epic (Aeneid, 29–19 BCE). Sometimes earlier didactic verse, such as Hesiod's Works and Days or Lucretius's De rerum natura, which influenced Virgil's poem, are named as prototypes. The four books of Virgil's Georgics present themselves as a set of instructions or precepts (praecepta) for the tending (cultus) of crops, vines, cattle, and bees. They mix their precepts with myth, meteorological lore, philosophy, and narrative digression in order to represent the dignity—but also the difficulty and daily care—of rural labor. However, while Virgil's poem drew carefully from Greek and Roman agricultural and scientific treatises (Aratus, Varro, and others), it would not have served the practical needs of a real farmer; its audience was learned and urban, located largely in the circle of Augustus in Rome. As Virgil's central pun on vertere (to turn) and versus (the furrow in the field and a line of written verse) emphasizes, the Georgics are just as much about the poet's careful labor of representation within a larger field of cultivating activities. Highlighting and reflecting on its own medium, in other words, the poem offers a complex meditation on the affinities and differences between the tending of words and the culture of the ground. It is no accident, therefore, that the Georgics are the most carefully wrought and densely allusive of Virgil's works or that John Dryden's 1697 Eng. rendition promoted them as the "best poem by the best poet."

Instances of georgic before Dryden include Poliziano's Rusticus (1489), Luigi Alamanni's La Colitivazione (1546), and Thomas Tusser's Five Hundred Points of Husbandry (1573). In 17th-c. England, however, georgic is present more often as a mode or set of themes than as strict formal imitation. In The Advancement of Learning, Francis Bacon promoted his new science as a "georgics of the mind, concerning the husbandry and tillage thereof," and the georgic appealed widely to Bacon's followers later in the century (Abraham Cowley, Samuel Hartlib, John Evelyn, and others), who were interested in experiment, education, and estate management. It took Dryden's version, prefaced by an influential essay on the poem by Joseph Addison, to touch off a series of marked imitations, serious and mock, and to establish the georgic as a distinctive genre during the 18th c. Examples included John Philips's Cyder (1708), John Gay's Rural Sports (1713), William Somervile's The Chace (1735), Christopher Smart's The Hop Garden (1753), John Dyer's The Fleece (1757), and James Grainger's The Sugar Cane (1764). Among the several reasons for this proliferation was the appeal of Virgil's ambivalent and plangent celebration of empire to Britons whose awareness of their own nation's territorial ambitions and liabilities was similarly vexed, esp. after the Act of Union joining Scotland to England and Wales in 1707. Less imitative but far more influential, James Thomson's The Seasons (1730) and William Cowper's The Task (1785) merged georgic elements with other descriptive genres to produce long topographical poems that were the most popular verse of the century. These shaped the meditative, descriptive verse of the first generation of romantic poets, including Charlotte Smith, S. T. Coleridge, and William Wordsworth (see esp. Wordsworth's long philosophical poem The Excursion [1815]). After Wordsworth, in part because of the growing prominence of the novel and other prose genres dedicated to the tasks of daily life, georgic once again appears more often as a mode; its attitudes and concerns persisted, but informing a range of poetic and prose genres. Georgic verse maintained a foothold in 19th- and early 20th-c. America, where agrarian improvement and national expansion came later than in Britain. Its presence is more or less marked in the work of Joel Barlow, Walt Whitman, Robert Frost, Lorine Niedecker, Muriel Rukeyser, and others. In mid-20th-c. Brazil, one of the definitive poems of the *Noigandres school, Décio Pignatari's "terra" (1956, pub. 1962) was called by Haroldo de Campos a "concrete 'georgic'" for the way it retrieves the notion of the line of verse as a furrow.

Addison's "Essay on the Georgics" distinguished its subject sharply from pastoral, but as the aristocratic figure of the Ren. courtier receded behind the models of the working landowner and small independent proprietor, in practice these adjacent genres overlapped. For verse written from the mid-17th c. on, pastoral and georgic mark the ends of a spectrum of possibilities for writing about the countryside, as well as for representing the vocation of the poet. If pastoral's emphasis inclines toward the sympathy of nature, the spontaneity of production, and the leisure of the singer, the attention of georgic falls on the necessity of skill and effort to counteract the wayward tendencies of nature and civilization alike.

See CALENDRICAL POETRY, DESCRIPTIVE POETRY, DIDACTIC POETRY, ECLOGUE, GENRE.

■ D. Durling, The Georgic Tradition in English Poetry (1934); An Anthology of Concrete Poetry, ed. E. Williams (1967); J. Chalker, The English Georgic (1969); R. Cohen, "Innovation and Variation," Literature and History, ed. R. Cohen and M. Krieger (1974); R. Feingold, Nature and Society (1978); J. Barrell, English Literature in History (1984); A. Low, The Georgic Revolution (1985); A. Fowler, "The Beginnings of English Georgic," Renaissance Genres, ed. B. K. Lewalski (1986); K. Heinzelman, "Roman Georgic in a Georgian Age, TSLL 33 (1991); F. de Bruyn, "From Virgilian Georgic to Agricultural Science," Augustan Subjects, ed. A. Rivero (1997); K. O'Brien, "Imperial Georgic," The Country and the City Revisited, ed. G. Maclean, D. Landry, and J. P. Ward (1999); R. F. Thomas, Reading Virgil and His Texts (1999); T. Sweet, American Georgics (2001); R. Thomas, Virgil and the Augustan Reception (2001); K. Goodman, Georgic Modernity and British Romanticism (2004).

K. GOODMAN

GERMANIC PROSODY. The earliest poetry recorded in Germanic langs. takes the form of alliterative verse (AV), in which stress, syllable weight, and the matching of syllable onsets (i.e., *alliteration) all play structural roles. Although all the Germanic langs. eventually abandoned AV during the Middle Ages and adopted poetic forms characterized by *rhyme and alternating stress at equal intervals on the basis of Lat., Occitan, and OF models, the alliterative form appears to have been the only variety in use before Christian missionaries introduced writing on parchment and Lat. poetic types. The Roman historian Tacitus (Germania, ca. 98 CE) describes *oral poetry (or *songs, carmina) as the only form of historical lore among the early Germanic peoples, and presumably the form was AV, though this cannot be proved. Neither can AV be proved in connection with any of the references to songs performed by early Germanic people (often to the accompaniment of a lyre or harp) to be found in Gr. and Lat. sources of the 2d to the 6th c., incl. works of Procopius, Jordanes, and Venantius Fortunatus.

The form is usually assumed to have originated relatively late in Germanic prehist., since varieties of it are found in several early Germanic langs., which also offer evidence of a shared poetic trad. in the form of many items of chiefly or exclusively poetic vocabulary, e.g., OHG balo, Old Saxon balu, OE bealu, and Old Icelandic bǫl, all meaning "misfortune." The AV form cannot antedate the Common Germanic shift of accent to most nonprefixal initial syllables, since both alliteration and the metrical form depend on stress placement. This accent shift appears to have been a relatively late prehistoric devel. The earliest AV attested takes the form of brief runic inscriptions, beginning with the Norwegian Tune Stone of about 400 CE. The earliest datable examples in ms. are also mostly brief, coming from England. These include the nine-line "Hymn" of Cædmon (ca. 670, first found in mss. of the 8th c.), the five-line "Death Song" of Bede (735, found in 9th-c. mss.), and the two-line "Proverb from Winfrid's Time" (757–86). In addition, the 818-line "Guthlac A," in a ms. of the 10th c., purports (plausibly) to have been composed within a life span of the saint's death in 714. Several other Anglo-Saxon poems show archaic ling. and formal features resembling those encountered in "Guthlac A," but there is no reliable basis for dating them very precisely.

Quite small is the surviving corpus of AV in OHG, fewer than 250 lines all told, amounting to two poetic *fragments of the 9th c., Hildebrandslied (a heroic lay) and Muspilli (a sermon on the Last Judgment), plus a number of shorter poems (see GERMAN POETRY). In Old Saxon are preserved the 9th-c. Heliand (a life of Christ) in nearly 6,000 lines and the 337-line Genesis; another 600 or so lines of the latter are preserved in an OE trans. A comparatively large corpus of early Germanic AV comes from England (see ENGLAND, POETRY OF). Among the more than 30,000 lines of verse in OE, all the longer poems but Beowulf are based on Lat. sources, while the shorter lyrics (such as "The Wanderer" and "The Wife's Lament"), heroic compositions (such as "Waldere" and "The Fight at Finnsburg"), and wisdom poetry (such as "Precepts" and "Maxims I") tend to be more original compositions. The estimable corpus of surviving AV in ME is more diverse, incl. romances (such as Sir Gawain and the Green Knight and The Alliterative Morte Arthure), historical works (such as the Destruction of Troy and The Wars of Alexander) and works of religious and/or social commentary (such as Wynnere and Wastoure and Piers Plowman). Also sizable is the body of extant Old Icelandic AV (see NORSE POETRY), which differs from West Germanic AV in that its form is stanzaic. Of the various eddic meters (see EDDA), which are preserved in about 7,100 long lines, the commonest is fornyrðislag, which is also the meter that most closely resembles West Germanic AV. The dróttkvætt meter of most skaldic verse (a corpus of nearly 6,000 *strophes, mostly of eight lines each) resembles fornyrðislag with the addition of a trochaic cadence, with certain alliterative and syntactic adjustments.

In the earliest poetry in ms., the alliterative long line comprises two verses, an on-verse and an off-verse, linked by alliteration. An example from the OHG Hildebrandslied will illustrate:

x Px x P p x x Px
Mit gēru scal man geba infāhan.
(With a spear should one receive gifts.)

The alliterating words gēru and geba receive the greatest degree of stress, both being nouns. Syllables bearing a lesser degree of stress (man and -fā-, a pronoun and a verb root, respectively) are not required to alliterate; in fact, no stressed syllable after the first may alliterate in the off-verse. The remaining syllables are unstressed and alliterate only by coincidence. A vowel may alliterate with any other vowel, but each of the clusters sp, st, and sk (sc) alliterates only with itself.

Under the most widely accepted analysis of the form, that of Eduard Sievers, a typical verse comprises four metrical positions. Each position may be filled by one of three metrical entities: (1) a lift, which is usually a heavy, stressed syllable (represented by P in the scansion above), (2) a half-lift, which is a syllable of lesser stress, either heavy or light, or (3) a drop, which is paradigmatically one or more unstressed syllables (represented by x or xx, etc.). A stressed light syllable (represented by p above) may combine with another syllable to serve as a lift, a substitution known as *resolution; geba in the off-verse above, with a light initial syllable, is an example. In combination with the principle of four positions to the verse, restrictions on the placement of half-lifts ensure that the metrical pattern will conform to one of five types (see ENGLISH PROSODY). In addition, there are restrictions on the number of syllables that may appear in a drop, the count being more circumscribed in the coda of the verse, which, as in other IE verse forms, is more rigidly structured than the verse onset.

Alternative analyses have been proposed. Heusler (1925–29, 1941) argued that a verse comprises two isochronous measures (see ISOCHRONISM) that may be scanned using musical notation. In 4/4 time, a lift corresponds to a half note and a drop to a quarter or eighth note. Pope refined this analysis, filling the rests allowed by Heusler with notes on a lyre (though this explanation for rests will not serve for Scandinavian verse, which appears not to have been performed to the accompaniment of a musical instrument). Although isochronous theories are still discussed in some Ger.-lang. scholarship, they no longer play any prominent role in anglophone lit., in part because they are not easily reconcilable with the prevailing analysis of Sievers (despite the efforts of Pope). In particular, they ignore the requirement of four metrical positions to the verse that is fundamental to Sievers's analysis. More compatible with Sieversian approaches is the word-foot theory of Russom, according to which verses comprise feet whose contours correspond to the prosodic patterns encountered in the words of the lang. Allowable verse types are then determined by restrictions on the ways feet may be combined. Alternative analyses continue to be proposed because of the relative abstractness and complexity of Sieversian metrics, particularly because of the typological peculiarity of this approach, since quantity and stress (lexical and clausal) both play indispensable roles in the scansion. By contrast, the prosodies of related langs. are based either on syllable quantity alone (as in Gr. and Sanskrit, where the pitch accent is of no account in verse construction, and in Lat., where the stress accent plays no role) or on accent and/or syllable count alone (as in most mod. Eur. langs., in disregard of syllable *quantity). Despite its unusual nature, however, and the questions it raises about *performance and how the audience could have perceived the metrical template, the analysis of Sievers is verifiable as accurate in ways that the alternative analyses are not.

The prosodic contours allowed by the Sieversian framework dictate that the syntax of AV should differ from that of prose. Words of intermediate stress (or particles), such as finite verbs, pronouns, and demonstrative adverbs, are treated as stressed or unstressed in accordance with their position within the clause, as observed by Kuhn. They tend to be grouped before or immediately after the first lift, where they are unstressed; if they appear later in the clause, they bear *ictus. Two successive verses in Muspilli illustrate the principle: der inan uarsenkan scal: / pidiu scal er in deru uuicsteti (who shall let him fall: / therefore he shall on the battlefield). Here "scal" (shall) is stressed at the end of the clause in the first verse and unstressed in the first drop of the second verse. The regularity is observed with much greater fidelity in OE and in native Old Icelandic compositions in fornyrðislag than in Old Saxon and OHG; indeed, it is violated in the verses from Hildebrandslied cited above. It is probably no accident that in OE and Old Icelandic poetry, the use of particles is minimized: in these trads., unlike in Old Saxon and OHG, elimination of unstressed function words, esp. pronouns and articles, was plainly regarded as a stylistic virtue, with the result that Sievers's four-position principle is more plainly discernible in the verse structure.

Although a variety of AV forms arose in Scandinavia, primarily because of the thoroughgoing reduction of unstressed syllables in North Germanic, the older forms persisted nearly unchanged, at least in Iceland, until their demise (or fundamental modification) in the 14th c. The Sieversian patterns are as plain in poetry of the 10th c. as of the 14th. By contrast, even before the Norman Conquest, the form of OE AV was evolving: in some poetry of the late 10th c. and later, the four-position principle at the heart of Sievers's analysis is partly obscured, because of the increased use of particles, and most metrists agree that ME AV does not conform to this pattern at all. In form, some ME AV is less reminiscent of OE poetry than of the alliterative prose style adopted by the homilist Ælfric, ca. 1000 CE, though a genetic connection is dubitable because of the rarity of poetic vocabulary in Ælfric's works. In some other ME works descended from the OE alliterative trad., esp. Lawman's (Layamon) Brut (ca. 1200), even alliteration is not essential, as it may be replaced by rhyme. On the continent, where the structure of AV was looser, the appeal of Lat. forms was felt earlier: already ca. 868 (i.e., not long after the composition of the Heliand) the monk Otfrid in Alsace composed his Evengelienbuch, a gospel harmony in rhymed *couplets. By the MHG period, even alliteration had been discarded, and all that remained of the original alliterative form was the mid-line *caesura.

See GNOMIC POETRY, MEDIEVAL POETRY.

■ Sievers; A. Heusler, Deutsche Versgeschichte, 3 v. (1925–29); H. Kuhn, "Zur Wortstellung und -betonung im Altgermanischen," BGDSL (H) 57 (1933); A. Heusler, Die altgermanische Dichtung, 2d ed. (1941); J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of "Beowulf," rev. ed. (1966); W. Hoffmann, Altdeutsche Metrik (1967); J. Kuryłowicz, Die sprachlichen Grundlagen der altgermanischen Metrik (1970); J. K. Bostock, "Appendix on OS and OHG Metre," Handbook of Old High German Literature, 2d ed. (1976); D. Hofmann, Die Versstrukturen der altsächsischen Stabreimgedichte Heliand und Genesis, 2 v. (1991); G. Russom, "Beowulf" and Old Germanic Metre (1998); K. E. Gade, "History of Old Norse Metrics," The Nordic Languages, ed. O. Bandle et al., v. 1 (2002); S. Suzuki, The Metre of Old Saxon Poetry (2004); J. Terasawa, Old English Metre (2011).

R. D. FULK

GERMAN POETRY

I. Medieval
II. Early Modern
III. Seventeenth Century
IV. Eighteenth and Early Nineteenth Centuries
V. Nineteenth Century
VI. Twentieth Century

I. Medieval. The written record of Ger. poetry begins in the early 9th c. Charlemagne's biographer Einhard attests to the emperor's interest in preserving pre-Christian poetry (barbara et antiquissima carmina), but no collection of vernacular poetry predating the conversion of the Germanic tribes to Christianity has survived. The written remnants of this oral culture are few. Singular in its prominence is the Hildebrandslied (The Lay of Hildebrand), a 68-line *fragment in OHG in irregular alliterative long-line verse (*Germanic prosody) recorded around 830. Also rooted in pagan oral trad. are the two Merseburger Zaubersprüche (Merseburg magical charms).

With the consolidation of political power under the Carolingian dynasty (752–911), monasteries became the principal site of literary activity. Almost all extant vernacular texts served religious ends, incl. the Wessobrunner Gebet (Wessobrunn Prayer, ca. 814); Muspilli, a late-9th-c. fragment employing eschatological visions to promote a godly life; and the Old Saxon (Low Ger.) Heliand (The Savior, ca. 830), a gospel harmony in traditional alliterative verse. Theologically learned and a key document within OHG poetics, Otfrid of Weissenburg's Evangelienbuch (Gospel Book, ca. 863–71) demonstrated that end rhyme, an innovation derived from Lat. *hymns, could effectively replace *alliteration as the binding structure in a modified heroic long line. Rhyme is also used in the Ludwigslied (Song of Ludwig, ca. 882), a poem celebrating King Louis III of France as a Christian warrior-king, and in the short Petruslied (Song of Peter, ca. 900), the oldest known Ger. hymn, a strophic text with neumes, or musical notation, which probably served as a processional song.

While some vernacular poetry certainly persisted during Carolingian rule and later under the Ottonian and Salian emperors, textual evidence is scarce. Lat. prevailed, memorably in the dramas and verse of the abbess Hrotsvit of Gandersheim (ca. 935–973). A substantial 11th-c. collection of Lat. lyric poetry, Cambridge Song includes among its many poems of Ger. origin two *macaronic poems in OHG and Lat. Several Lat. verse narratives suggest vernacular ties, incl. a heroic epic loosely based on Germanic tribal hist. (Waltharius, 9th–10th c.), the first med. *beast epic Ecbasis captivi (Flight of the Prisoner, ca. 1045), and the romance epic (Ruodlieb, mid-11th c.). Only in the mid-11th c. did written Ger. texts begin to reappear, initially with a religious purpose. Prominent examples include the Ezzolied (Ezzo's Song, ca. 1064), a salvation hist.; the Annolied (The Song of Anno, ca. 1080), a hagiographic poem in praise of Archbishop Anno of Cologne that is also a world chronicle; and poems and a life of Jesus by the Lower Austrian recluse Ava (ca. 1060–1127), the earliest preserved works of a Ger.-speaking woman writing in the vernacular. Mystics such as Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179) continued to have their visions and songs recorded in Lat.

In the 11th c., powerful ducal and episcopal courts increasingly supplemented monasteries as sites of active literary interest. The Ger. lang. was changing as well. The transition from the dialects of OHG to MHG is generally dated from 1050. Verse narratives drawing on Fr. sources like Lamprecht's Alexanderlied (Song of Alexander, ca. 1150) and Konrad's Rolandslied (Song of Roland, ca. 1170) and adventure tales such as König Rother (King Rother, ca. 1150) and Herzog Ernst (The Legend of Duke Ernst, ca. 1180) registered new ling. and cultural confidence. Pointing to the future, in his Eneit (Aeneid, 1174–89) Heinrich von Veldeke (ca. 1150–1210) adapted the OF Roman d'Eneas in a polished MHG greatly admired by his contemporaries.

The courtly *epic was one of two poetic genres that flourished in the decades that followed, a 50-year period, 1170–1220, that defines the high point of MHG lit. The writers were typically aristocrats bound in service to a greater noble and writing under his patronage. Texts were performed orally, providing entertainment and instruction through an idealized fusion of Christian and chivalric principles. Poets found particular inspiration in Fr. texts (notably Chrétien de Troyes) and the Arthurian romances and Anglo-Celtic materials transmitted through them. Three poets stand out. The first, Hartmann von Aue (ca. 1160–65–after 1210), wrote two Arthurian epics (Erec, ca. 1180; Iwein, ca. 1200), a verse tract about minne or *courtly love (known as Die Klage [The Dispute] or Das Büchlein [The Little Book], ca. 1180–85), an atonement legend (Gregorius, ca. 1188), and an exemplary tale of self-restraint and compassion (Der arme Heinrich [Poor Heinrich], ca. 1195). Wolfram von Eschenbach (ca. 1170–1220), arguably the greatest of the three, is remembered principally for his Parzival (ca. 1210), a monumental work of some 25,000 lines in which the eponymous hero on an idiosyncratic quest finds the inner nobility and mature religious understanding essential to true knighthood. The third is Gottfried von Strassburg (d. ca. 1210), whose incomplete Tristan (ca. 1210) celebrates the endurance of love beyond all trial and suffering.

For one additional work of distinction, however, there is no known author. The violently tragic narrative of the Nibelungenlied (ca. 1200) reaches back to events and characters associated with the Germanic migrations of the 5th and 6th cs. and preserved in oral trad. Although set in the contemp. world of courtly culture, a heroic ethos motivates the action and leads to the final bloodbath. Unlike the courtly epics in rhymed tetrameter *couplets, the Nibelungenlied features some 2,300 four-line stanzas in the distinctive Nibelungenstrophe*.

Like the writers of courtly epics, the writers of courtly love poetry, the second major MHG genre, were primarily of knightly origin, composing and performing their works with musical accompaniment within aristocratic circles. A significant selection of their poetry, known collectively as Minnesang*, remains, although little of their music has been preserved. Early examples are localized in Upper Austria/Bavaria, 1140–70, where relatively simple poems employed the Nibelungenstrophe and featured indirect exchanges between male and female voices and other native forms. After 1170, *Occitan poetry mediated by troubadours and trouvères prompted more complex content based on courtly love conventions and formally sophisticated stanza structures. The Minnesang poet typically placed himself in service to a high-born lady of exceptional beauty and virtue, unattainable despite his musical wooing and display of virtuosity. Major poets among the some 150 whose works have been preserved include Friedrich von Hausen (d. 1190), Heinrich von Morungen (d. 1222), Reinmar the Elder (d. ca. 1205), and three poets also known for their courtly epics: Wolfram, master of the subgenre known as tagelied* (dawn song, alba*) in which lovers must part at daybreak; Heinrich von Veldeke; and Hartmann von Aue. The greatest is Walther von der Vogelweide (ca. 1170–1230), a professional poet who reinterpreted courtly trads. and expanded Minnesang to praiseworthy women of lower social standing. Walther also provided his patrons with encomiastic tributes and offered social-critical judgments in shrewd single- and multistanza poems (Spruchdichtung*), a flexible didactic genre of growing importance in the 13th c. He is the first important political poet in Ger.

Courtly love poetry had a long life. Poets sustained and modified its conventions for several centuries. Esp. in later decades, but already in the poems attributed to Neidhart (ca. 1185–1240), more patently sexualized encounters with villagers led to greater realism and also to parody and a trad. of bawdy satire. The images of courtly love were adapted to religious use by the visionary mystic Mechthild of Magdeburg (ca. 1207–1282). Minnesang is the first Ger.-lang. poetry to be preserved in elaborate ms. collections; the most important is the Grosse Heidelberger Liederhandschrift (Great Heidelberg Songbook, ca. 1300), also known as the Codex Manesse. Somewhat earlier, some 52 MHG stanzas were recorded in the Codex Buranus (ca. 1230), a compilation largely of Lat. *Goliardic verse best known as the textual source for Carl Orff's 1937 cantata Carmina Burana.

The 13th c. saw an expansion of didactic poetry. Spruchdichtung was used for tributes; *laments; and religious, moral, and political commentary. The most prominent practitioner was the widely admired Heinrich von Meissen, known as Frauenlob (Praise of Our Lady, ca. 1250–1318). The prolific and witty poet known as Der Stricker (The Weaver, ca. 1190–1250) spanned many genres, incl. *fables, romances, and short poems. Like a growing number of poets, he was not of knightly origin. Indeed, the world of chivalric valor was becoming increasingly anachronistic. In his satirical narrative Meier Helmbrecht (Farmer Helmbrecht, ca. 1268), Wernher der Gartenaere (mid- to late 13th c.) addressed the general social decay. Others settled for adventure and entertainment, writing romances, farcical tales, and continuations of popular epic material. Influential didactic works of the 13th and 14th cs. include Freidank's gnomic Bescheidenheit (Sagacity, ca. 1215–30), Hugo von Trimberg's (b. ca. 1230) moral sermon Der Renner (The Runner, 1300), and Heinrich der Teichner's (ca. 1310–1378) scolding Reimreden (Rhymed Speeches, 1350). The multistrophic leich* also flourished in the 13th and 14th cs., a virtuoso form employed in musical performance for large-scale themes, both religious and secular.

A growing body of vernacular religious poetry, largely trans. from Lat., served as popular paraliturgical aids: processional songs, pilgrimage hymns, Marian hymns and prayers, confessional poems and sequences. Several well-known hymns of anonymous provenance, incl. the 12th-c. "Christ, der ist erstanden" (Christ, he is risen; later expanded) and the 14th-c. Lat.-Ger. Christmas hymn "In dulci jubilo," remain in active use.

A belated and final example of the great med. poets of aristocratic origin, the Tyrolean Oswald von Wolkenstein (1377–1445), successfully recapitulated the major genres of MHG poetry. He also experimented with polyphonic structures, esp. in two-voiced love songs. But like so much written before 1450, Oswald's work was soon forgotten. A sustained recovery of MHG poetry would begin in the 18th c.

II. Early Modern. In the transition from late med. to early mod. society, the new urban centers and their interests came to dominate literary activity. Didactic poetry was retooled for the urban setting. Writing for a clerical and courtly audience, Heinrich Wittenwiler (ca. 1395–1426) had used a peasant wedding and ensuing conflict to depict a world of grotesque madness in his verse satire Der Ring (ca. 1410). In contrast, the Basel humanist Sebastian Brant (1457–1521) populated his Narrenschiff (The Ship of Fools, 1494) with fools from all social strata. The work achieved unprecedented renown, its verse couplets and woodcuts illustrating human folly (many by the young Albrecht Dürer) reprinted and trans., incl. a Lat. version that made it a Eur.-wide success. Amid a general proliferation of narrative verse in rhymed couplets, the Low Ger. animal fable Reinke de Vos (Reynard the Fox, 1498) proved esp. popular.

Secular and religious songs also flourished, many compiled in hand-copied mss. and after 1520 in print. Forms ranged from simple strophic songs (later idealized as folk songs, although largely of urban middle-class origin) to the complex stanza structures codified by the *Meistersingers, artisan poets who organized instructional schools to pass on their poetic and musical craft. The most famous was the Nürnberg shoemaker Hans Sachs (1494–1576). In Meistersang, religious topics dominated. In popular song, sociability was at the fore, even in the laments about the vicissitudes of love, in ballads narrating remarkable events, and in evocations of the solitary life of the journeyman.

A final major devel. in the transition to the new urban culture was the growth after 1400 of humanistic studies. In prosperous cities in the southwest of Germany, an educated elite promoted renewed attention to the ancients and to the poetics of a polished Lat. The new learning imported from Italy also found advocates in progressive courts and bishoprics and, less quickly, selected universities (Heidelberg, Erfurt, Tübingen, Wittenberg, Ingolstadt). The humanist vision would link learned culture across Europe and decisively affect the devel. of Ger. poetry in the 17th c. In the 16th c., however, urbane Neo-Lat. poetry, with its metrical and ling. virtuosity, remained a separate sphere from vernacular verse. The leading Ger. humanist Conrad Celtis (1459–1508), known for his erotic Amores (Loves, 1502), recovered forgotten Lat. texts from the Ger. past (incl. the dramas of Hrotsvit of Gandersheim). Celtis was crowned poeta laureatus (*poet laureate) by Emperor Friedrich III in 1487, the first Ger. to receive the honor.

The finest and most influential poet of the 16th c. was Martin Luther (1483–1546). In his Bible trans. (1522, 1534), Luther affirmed the vernacular and contributed to the gradual standardization of New High Ger. in his attempt to reach a transregional audience. His vividly powerful hymns, many using familiar melodies from religious and secular sources, include "Ein feste burg ist unser Gott" ("A Mighty Fortress Is Our God," 1528) and the Christmas hymn "Vom Himmel hoch da komm ich her" ("From Heaven Above," 1533). His activity led to a radical increase in literacy and set off a wave of song production.

Among the poets who responded with enthusiasm to the reform movement unfolding around Luther, the scrappy humanist Ulrich von Hutten (1488–1523) trumpeted his allegiance in his Ger. poem "Ain new Lied" (A New Song, 1521). A staunch defender, Hans Sachs greeted Luther as "Die Wittembergisch Nachtigall" ("The Wittenberg Nightingale," 1523) in an allegory first written as a Meistersang but then refigured for popular distribution in Knittelvers, a simple rhymed form that served as the common verse throughout the 16th c., later becoming directly associated with Sachs and his tone of homespun good humor.

The Reformation and the conflicts that it unleashed provided subject matter for Ger. poetry for the next 100 years. *Invectives flew off the presses. Internal strife among the reformers and counterattacks from Catholic intellectuals accompanied the violence and confusion of the late 16th c. Economic and social crises led to an increase in penitential poetry and expressions of a more individualized piety among Lutheran hymn writers, incl. women who also wrote hymns and *devotional poetry. Verse narratives continued to enjoy wide popularity, esp. those with a satirical purpose.

III. Seventeenth Century. What decidedly altered Ger. poetry in the 17th c. was the question of how the cultural practices of the learned elite who were writing a polished and erudite Lat. might be realized also in Ger. On the example of Ital., Fr., and Dutch poets who demonstrated that a learned vernacular literature was possible, the new standard was set by Martin Opitz (1597–1639) in his handbook Buch von der Deutschen Poeterey (Book of German Poetics, 1624). The reforms that Opitz introduced privileged alternating meters, pure rhymes, mastery of grammar and rhet., and a general literacy in the cl. and Neo-Lat. trads. He insisted on the coincidence of word accent and metric stress. If he was subsequently faulted for his overly prescriptive pronouncements, Opitz's larger vision of how the Ger. lang. might become an apt vehicle for learned culture unquestionably prevailed.

In the new Ger. poetry, eloquence and polish were highly prized but also *wit and conceptual *invention. Two of the most common genres emphasized the order and constraint of lang.: the *epigram and the *sonnet. But *Renaissance poetics and It. example legitimated a range of options, some defined by formal features and others by content. *Occasional verse and poetry with a didactic purpose flourished in all genres. *Emblem books, starting with Andrea Alciato's Lat. collection published in 1531 in Augsburg, made ideas and visual materials from the Ren. and classics widely available. After 1617, societies dedicated to the cultivation of the Ger. lang. (Sprachgesellschaften) served as intellectual and social networks in selected principalities and urban centers.

Yet Germany itself was split by confessional allegiances and divided into some 300 territories and principalities. In the absence of a single cultural center, regionalism prevailed. The Thirty Years' War (1618–48) devastated both the countryside and the cities, introducing financial chaos, famine, and widespread suffering. Unsurprisingly, poetry also displayed regional and confessional differences. While the widely used term baroque* usefully signals Ger. poetry's common cause with numerous Eur. vernacular lits., it should not obscure the diversity of texts written between 1600 and 1700.

Major poets after Opitz include Paul Fleming (1609–40), initially a Neo-Lat. love poet, who wrote elegant Ger. verse on Ren. models. The greatest poet of the 17th c., the Silesian Andreas Gryphius (1616–64), wrote rhetorically powerful sonnets, largely on somber themes capturing the traumas of the age and the transitory nature of human experience. The Silesian courtier Friedrich Logau (1604–55) mastered the epigram. Attentive to *pastoral themes as well as acoustic effects, the Nürnberg poets, incl. Georg Philipp Harsdörffer (1607–58) and Johann Klaj (1616–56), promoted dactylic verse, as did Philipp von Zesen (1619–89), and they developed a more mannerist style (see MANNERISM). The Breslau patrician Christian Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau (1617–79) proved a virtuoso master, intellectual, highly sensual, and ironic. His gallant verse, together with the works of his fellow Silesian Daniel Caspar von Lohenstein (1635–83), embodied the excesses of baroque poetry in the eyes of 18th-c. neoclassicists. A simpler, more personal tone was created by Johann Christian Günther (1695–1723), esp. in his love poetry.

Almost all 17th-c. poets wrote religious as well as secular poetry. The Jesuit Friedrich Spee (1591–1635) wrote mystical poetry blending pastoral and Petrarchan elements in his Trutz-Nachtigall (Defiant Nightingale, 1649). Johannes Scheffler (1624–77), who took the name of Angelus Silesius when he converted to Catholicism, collected his intellectually paradoxical epigrams and sonnets in his Cherubinischer Wandersmann (The Cherubinic Wanderer, 1675). The learned Lutheran mystic Catharina Regina von Greiffenberg (1633–94) wrote sonnets and songs marked by metaphorical inventiveness and evident delight in the natural world. The Lutheran pastor Paul Gerhardt (1607–76), the most significant hymnist since Luther, achieved a tone of simple devotion and clarity. Many of his hymns are still sung today, incl. his free trans. of "Salve caput cruentatum" as "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden" ("O Sacred Head now wounded"), the anchoring chorale in J. S. Bach's St. Matthew Passion.

Participation in the literary culture of 17th-c. Germany required education. Its formal institutions were closed to women, and only a few women were afforded the luxury of private tutoring enjoyed by Greiffenberg or Sibylle Schwarz (1621–38), daughter of a Greifswald patrician. Religious experience, however, increasingly legitimated the individual voice, and both men and women responded. The devotional hymns and poems by the Schleswig-Holstein dissenter Anna Ovena Hoyers (1584–1655) lacked metrical regularity and other signs of Opitz's reforms, but she was capable of an assertive verse in defense of her sectarian commitments. At the end of the 17th c., the introspection and emotionality of Pietist worship impelled Gottfried Arnold (1666–1714), Gerhard Tersteegen (1697–1769), Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–60), and some 100 new poets to song.

IV. Eighteenth and Early Nineteenth Centuries. The 18th c. witnessed broad social and intellectual changes incl. the postwar economic recovery of urban centers, the growing cultural influence of middle-class professionals, and the expansion of the book trade. Scientific wonder combined with a vital interest in perception to modify the lang. of theology and bring new visual energy to poetry. The Swiss scientist Albrecht von Haller (1708–77) probed central issues of moral philosophy in his verse treatises and celebrated the sublimity of Die Alpen (The Alps, 1729). The Hamburg patrician Barthold Heinrich Brockes (1680–1747) published nine volumes of his Irdisches Vergnügen in Gott (Earthly Delight in God, 1721–48) in which his physicotheological poetry proclaimed evidence of divine providence in every aspect of the natural order. The call of the Frenchman Nicolas Boileau and others for a renewed commitment to the classics was answered as poets polished the vernacular in trans. and adaptations from Lat. and Fr. In his Versuch einer critischen Dichtkunst (Attempt at a Critical Poetics, 1730), the Leipzig professor Johann Christoph Gottsched (1700–66) defined *neoclassical norms in a Ger. context and struggled to give order to the abundance of poetic forms. The poetic values of gallant verse found middle-class adaptation in the polished social songs of Friedrich von Hagedorn (1708–54) and in the playfully erotic *anacreontic poetry of Johann Wilhelm Ludwig Gleim (1719–1803) and many others. Christian Fürchtegott Gellert (1715–69) gave didacticism new poetic grace in his Fabeln und Erzählungen (Fables and Tales, 1746), the best seller of the century. In his verse narratives, Christoph Martin Wieland (1733–1813) combined a cultivated, elegant wit with urbane sensuality and accelerated the devel. of a transregional readership for Ger. poetry in his jour. Der Teutsche Merkur (The German Mercury, 1773).

Women were increasingly among the readers of poetry and, if more slowly, among its writers. Anna Luise Karsch (1722–91), a self-taught poet of humble origins and a voracious reader, was the most famous woman poet of the era, celebrated for her "native genius." After 1740, Eng. poetry joined Fr. and It. as models for emulation. John Milton's Paradise Lost became the focus of heated debates on the limits of the creative imagination. The new and the marvelous gained footing within a poetological discourse previously constrained by rationalist principles.

At midcentury, F. G. Klopstock (1724–1803) revealed the eruptive power of poetic lang. in the opening cantos of Der Messias (The Messiah, 1748–73), his epic of Christ's passion and triumph. In his bid to create the great Ger. epic, Klopstock introduced the *hexameter line and intensified syntax and diction. His imaginative breadth and affective rhet. offended those committed to neoclassical reforms but attracted readers putting the text to devotional use and writers eager to enhance Ger.'s expressive capacity. His Oden (Odes, 1771) became the basis for enthusiastic and even brash critical pronouncements, the most important by J. G. Herder (1744–1803), and accelerated discussion about original *genius and the *sublime. Klopstock eschewed rhyme and the simple alternating rhythms that dominated 18th-c. poetry and instead wrote *odes and *elegies in adapted cl. meters, in original meters of his own definition, and in free rhythms legitimated by the example of Pindar and the Psalms (see FREIE RHYTHMEN). He demonstrated how Ger. might serve as a vehicle for the depths of sentiment as well as hymnic sublimity, stimulating a vast poetry of sensibility (Empfindsamkeit) with its trope of heartfelt emotion.

On Klopstock's example, Herder proclaimed the ode and, with it, all lyric poetry, the highest of the literary genres. For Herder, true poetry resided in the premod. era, with Homer, the Hebrew Psalms, the songs of Germanic bards, Ossian, and similar works valued as songs of the people (Volkslieder). In his estimation, Klopstock came the closest of any mod. writer to recovering their lost immediacy and enthusiasm. Klopstock became the idol of many younger poets, incl. those in Göttingen who formed a fellowship around his example (the Hainbund), and who featured his poetry in a new transregional Musenalmanach. Such poetry almanacs became the principal vehicle for the distribution of poetry in the next decades. Ludwig Christoph Heinrich Hölty (1748–76), the strongest lyric talent in the group, followed Klopstock's example by employing cl. meters in his odes. Johann Heinrich Voss (1751–1826) later distinguished himself for his *idylls and his hexameter trans. of Homer. Friedrich Stolberg (1753–1835) and his brother Christian (1748–1821) enthusiastically echoed Klopstock's patriotic poetry. On the fringes of the Göttingen circle, Gottfried August Bürger (1747–94) made his name on the basis of his ballads and love poems.

J. W. Goethe (1749–1832) is not only the single most important heir to these midcentury transformations of Ger. poetry but a major participant in them. His specific attentiveness to Klopstock is evident in the remarkable free-rhythm poems written between 1772 and 1774, in which he probed the construction of poetic enthusiasm and emotional immediacy, incl. "Wandrers Sturmlied" ("The Wanderer's Storm Song"), "Ganymed," and "An Schwager Kronos" ("To the Postilion Chronos"). But unlike his peers, Goethe moved with decisive energy to create a poetry apart from and, indeed, well beyond the 18th-c. example. A dramatist, novelist, scientist, and court administrator in Weimar, as well as a poet, Goethe constantly experimented in terms of *genre, *voice, and *form, absorbing and reworking all that he appreciated from the most colloquial style to the highest hymnic verse and making most of what he wrote seem utterly effortless. What he created frequently became the genre's new paradigm, as, e.g., his recreation of the Lat. love elegy in mod. setting in the *elegiac distichs of the Römische Elegien (Roman Elegies, 1795) or the classic epic in the hexameters of Hermann und Dorothea (1797) with its response to the dislocations of the Fr. Revolution. Unlike Klopstock, Goethe remained appreciative of rhyme, although not wedded to its use. The relationships of love, desire, and creativity and the continuity and coherence of the natural world, with its analogues in human experience, became his greatest themes, to which he returned again and again. In Faust (1808, 1832) Goethe programmatically recapitulated much of the Eur. poetic trad. from Gr. trimeter, through folk song, Minnesang, Knittelvers, to Sp. trochees, Fr. *alexandrines, Eng. blank verse, and It. ottava rima and terza rima*. In his middle years, he turned to Persia and the Near East, engaging the poetry of Ḥāfiẓ (d. 1389) in a substantial lyric cycle, the West-östlicher Divan (West-Eastern Divan, 1819). He later wrote a smaller cycle evoking Chinese poetry, Chinesisch-Deutsche Jahres- und Tageszeiten (Chinese-German Seasons of the Year and Day, 1827), and he actively promoted his notion of world lit., envisioning dynamic exchange among literary cultures large and small with salutary political influence. With Goethe, Ger. poetry decisively achieved full Eur. stature.

No single poet has had as major an impact on Ger. poetry as Goethe. Consequently, it can be easily forgotten that, in the 1780s, Bürger, Hölty, Voss, even the early Friedrich Schiller (1759–1805) were better known as poets. Goethe was celebrated primarily as a novelist and dramatist in his first decades of writing. In the 19th c., he came to dominate Ger. letters and, in particular, Ger. poetry.

Schiller, primarily a dramatist and theorist, published poetry in the 1780s that seemed unlikely to compel broad interest; much was rhetorically cumbersome, sober, and overtly philosophical. But his lament at the loss of Gr. antiquity with its divinity-filled world in "Die Götter Griechenlands" ("The Gods of Greece," 1788) proved electrifying in its indictment of contemp. society for its mechanistic notions of nature and impoverished abstractions; and his hymnic "An die Freude" ("An Ode to Joy," 1785) sparked utopian dreams. (Ludwig van Beethoven's setting in his Ninth Symphony serves as the new Eur. anthem.) In partnership with Goethe after 1794, Schiller used his poems and essays to articulate an agenda for the renewal of Ger. culture that has become known as Weimar Classicism. "Das Ideal und das Leben" ("The Ideal and the Actual Life," 1795) can stand for multiple poems proclaiming the mediating function of aesthetic experience between the material and the ideal. In "Der Spaziergang" ("The Walk," 1795), an elegy in cl. distichs in which landscape poetry is recast for philosophical purposes, Schiller provides a cultural-historical meditation on human devel. from the blissful constraints of primitive experience through mod. alienation to the recovery of harmony at the heights of poetic consciousness. Both were published in Die Horen (The Hours), his high-minded but short-lived periodical, where he also published his theory of *naïve and sentimental poetry and other aesthetic treatises.

Schiller and Goethe collaborated on a collection of ballads that appeared in Schiller's Musenalmanach in 1797. The mod. *ballad rightly claims its generic roots in med. and early mod. oral trad. In its 18th-c. revival, Bürger's "Lenore" (1773) and Goethe's "Der König in Thule" ("The King of Thule," 1774) and "Erlkönig" ("The Elf King," 1782) consciously evoked earlier stylistic gestures and supernatural strains. The ballads of 1797, incl. Goethe's "Die Braut von Korinth" ("The Bride of Corinth") and "Der Zauberlehrling" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice") and Schiller's "Die Kraniche des Ibykus" ("The Cranes of Ibykus"), are more intellectually self-conscious. The ballad, and its variant the "Romanze" with generic links to Sp. and other Romance models, would prove to be a favored vehicle of the romantic poets, who emphasized its affinities with the folk song.

In his laments about the mod. age, its alienation and fragmentation, its deadening materialism and rationalism, Schiller inspired an entire generation of romantic poets. Their core narrative of a primal unity once experienced in nature, in childhood, in ancient Greece, the Middle Ages, and other cultural-historical moments given Edenic status, but now lost in the present, found endless variation in the expression of crisis and the quest for renewal and restoration. Aesthetic experience, the *imagination, and, above all, poetry itself became potential agents of redemption.

The single most compelling representation of the poet's plight in the present moment, intensified by acute knowledge of the richness of what has been lost appears in the works of Friedrich Hölderlin (1770–1843). The lost ideal is figured in images of plentitude, in a personalized and benevolent natural world vibrant with divinity, in the cultural-historical ideal of cl. Greece, and in idyllic images of childhood, home, and loving embrace. Hölderlin assigned heroic stature to the *poet, who most urgently and painfully bears the knowledge of the mod. day's impoverishment. The poet is also the purveyor of hope as he creates a remnant in poetic speech of what once was and anticipates what might yet be. Like that of many romantics, Hölderlin's vision of hist. was deeply rooted in Christian eschatological structures, an appropriation evident in his great elegy "Brod und Wein" ("Bread and Wine," 1800–01) and the late hymns such as "Patmos" (1802–03). The verbal power of his poetry is based on a richly inflected lang. indebted to Klopstock's example and his own intensive study of Gr. poetry, esp. Pindar and Sophocles; on intentional musicality; on the use of cl. forms; and on tautly structured lines with resonant symbolic *metaphors. Although 70 of Hölderlin's poems were published before his confinement in 1806 due to recurring mental illness, which lasted until his death, they were scattered and largely unknown. Appreciation for his great elegies and hymns and later fragments was made possible by the rediscovery of his works in the early 20th c.

Like Hölderlin, Friedrich von Hardenberg (1772–1801), who published as Novalis, transformed existing religious discourse to shape a syncretistic vision with a Christian core. Reversing the spatial trajectory of key Enlightenment terms, the quest in Novalis's single most important piece, "Hymnen an die Nacht" ("Hymns to the Night," 1800), a six-part *prose poem with lyric inserts, leads downward into the darkness of earthly despair and eroticized longing. Out of individualized anguish arises the emotionalized certainty that death marks the recovery of wholeness in the final mystical union with Christ as beloved. The poem was published in the Athenaeum, the principal organ of the romantic writers in Jena who sought to revolutionize philosophy and lit. by freeing them from rationalist and classicist constraints, and more boldly, to transform the human spirit.

Within the Jena circle, August Wilhelm Schlegel (1767–1845), in particular, worked to expand Ger. poetic forms by promoting Romance models. The Petrarchan sonnet became the signature genre of the romantic movement, produced in staggering quantity, and a lightning rod for attacks on its new poetic directions.

In Heidelberg, the second principal site of romantic activity, an enthusiasm for recovery of the Ger. past also had immediate impact on poetry. Achim von Arnim (1781–1831) and Clemens Brentano (1778–1842) gathered more than 700 poems from printed and oral sources and edited these "songs of the people" to make them compelling for mod. readers, to publish the landmark anthol. Des Knaben Wunderhorn

(The Youth's Magic Horn, 3 v., 1805–08). Herder had provided a precedent in 1778–79 with his successful two-volume collection of folk poetry drawn from international sources. But it is the Ger.-speaking world that is monumentalized in these "old German songs," the collection's subtitle. The simple strophic song, with its accessible diction, generally naïve tone, suggestion of orality, abundant rhyme, and thematic preoccupation with ordinary people and nature, became in the next decades a vehicle by which multiple poets sought to create a new Ger. poetry.

There was a precedent. In a large body of poetry that is mostly forgotten today, Ludwig Tieck (1773–1853) had scripted new formulas and metaphors for romantic verse devoid of cl. forms and mythology and inserted examples into his early narrative works. Brentano readily absorbed the new lang., but he also strained the simplicity of the folk-poetry model in his musically evocative verse, where his virtuosity was enhanced by the legacy of baroque and med. poetry. In repeating laments of estrangement and loss, he attested to the inadequacy of romantic aesthetic solutions to human existential need. After returning to his Roman Catholic faith in 1817, Brentano readdressed much of his creative effort to religious purposes. Joseph von Eichendorff (1788–1857) also adapted the forms and ambience of folk song in his ostensibly artless but carefully crafted poetry. His poems convey a pervasive longing for something beyond reach and definition and feature beautiful, ominous enticements from the imaginative depths, often explicitly erotic, that promise consolation and release. The answer Eichendorff endorsed in his poetry lay elsewhere, heavenward and in the future, located for him by his firm Catholic faith. But he never ceased evoking the attraction of the earthly enchantments whose power he repeatedly sought both to awaken and to constrain in his highly musical poetry.

Tieck, Arnim, Brentano, and Eichendorff all embedded their poems and songs in their novels (as did Goethe in Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre [Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, 1795]). Single collected volumes of poetry were still relatively rare. The most enduring legacy for this large body of romantic poetry is musical; Beethoven, Franz Schubert, Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, Hugo Wolf, Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauss, and many lesser composers have guaranteed its international fame as the Ger. lied*. Some poets, such as the epigonal romantic Wilhelm Müller (1794–1827), author of the cycles Die schöne Müllerin (The Beautiful Maid of the Mill, 1821) and Die Winterreise (Winter Journey, 1824), are known primarily through the musical settings of their works.

V. Nineteenth Century. In response to the events of the Fr. Revolution, Klopstock wrote a substantial number of poems celebrating its promise and later condemning its excesses. The Napoleonic invasion and the Wars of Liberation (1805–15) again led to excited poetic responses. Ernst Moritz Arndt (1769–1860), Friedrich de la Motte-Fouqué (1777–1843), and Theodor Körner (1791–1813) joined in the poetic call to arms. Unlikely forms such as Friedrich Rückert's (1788–1866) Geharnischte Sonette (Armored Sonnets, 1814) were also fielded in the fight for "folk and fatherland." The ballads and earnest folk songs of Ludwig Uhland (1787–1862) served political ends in gentler more conservative ways. Rückert later turned his attention as a scholar to irenic purposes, finding refuge in the rich poetic world of Persia and the Near East. Near Eastern forms, prominently the ghazal*, were popularized by him and August von Platen (1796–1835).

After 1815, most poets were keenly aware that not only a political era had passed but a poetic one; they were uncertain about the future and the status of poetic lang. An heir to the legacy of romantic tropes and forms and a master in his demonstration of the artifice as well as the seductive attraction of the world constructed from them, Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) used irony and self-deprecating humor to define dissonance and disillusionment as the 19th-c. poet's plight. His early collection Das Buch der Lieder (The Book of Songs, 1827) provides multiple variants on the theme of unrequited love, incl. the well-known "Loreley" and the rhythmically agile two-part cycle Die Nordsee (The North Sea, 1825–26). His verse satires Atta Troll (1843, rev. 1847) and Deutschland. Ein Wintermärchen (Germany: A Winter's Tale, 1844) written after emigration to Paris in 1831, where he lived out his life as a journalist and writer in political exile, mark his critical hostility to the political verse of his contemporaries as well as to the philistine culture of bourgeois Ger. society. In the freshest components of his Neue Gedichte (New Poems, 1844), Romanzero (1851), and later poems, Heine delivered sharp political and social commentary, grappled with his Jewish identity, and registered the suffering of debilitating illness that confined him to bed in his final eight years.

August Heinrich Hoffmann von Fallersleben (1798–1874), Ferdinand Freiligrath (1810–76), Georg Herwegh (1817–75), and others writing in the 1840s, the so-called Vormärz of optimism that preceded the failed revolution of 1848, produced rousing, occasionally bombastic songs to promote the liberal vision of Germany unity and radical reform. Many were set to familiar tunes, such as Hoffmann von Fallersleben's "Deutschland, Deutschland über alles" (1841), which became the national *anthem, 1922–45 (the third stanza serves as the current national anthem of the Federal Republic of Germany). After 1849, bitterness and silence largely replaced their boisterous verse.

Most poetry of the mid-19th c. registered Germany as a political and cultural backwater. In this period of resignation and restraint, the so-called Biedermeier* era, poets turned inward, socially and psychologically. The carefully ordered life and the cultivation of the homegrown idyll were accompanied by pronounced strains of melancholy, psychological frailty, and unsettling premonitions of unseen menace. Poets typically had a narrow range and used their art in varying ways to flee lives they experienced as deficient and distasteful. Platen polished his sonnets, odes, and imported verse forms, seeking an aesthetic refuge from life's muddle and guilt. Nikolaus Lenau (pseud. of Franz Nikolaus Niembsch, 1802–50), first built a reputation on evocations of the Hungarian landscape of his childhood and then made melancholy and despair the thematic core of his culturally pessimistic work. The best poets, such as Eduard Mörike (1804–75), demonstrated new ways to express elusive sensations, fleeting perceptions, and fragile moments of aesthetic pleasure. Mörike stands out for his exceptional facility in a range of inherited genres and verse forms, from cl. meters and sonnets to folk song, and for the evocative lyricism of his verse. Whether probing the unconscious or evoking the biological world of her beloved Westphalia in precise realist diction or grappling with received religious lang. to express faltering conviction, the lyric poetry and ballads of Annette von Droste-Hülshoff (1797–1848) reveal an interest in interiority, the instability of human identity, and the ambivalence of perception. Anchored and constrained by class and gender, the aristocratic Droste-Hülshoff repeatedly staged a surrendering to imaginative depths with varying consequences: fright, guilt, unresolved longing, and resignation or relief on return to the familiar but rarely any alteration in the external world of her poetic protagonists.

Even though the second half of the 19th c. has been widely considered hostile to poetry, epigonal poets such as the immensely popular and now forgotten Emanuel Geibel (1815–84) prospered. Poets remained largely unresponsive to industrialization, urbanization, secularization, and other large-scale social changes. Lyric poetry was confirmed as a refuge, domestic and psychological, from all that was shifting in the public sphere. Exceptions such as the Swiss realist Gottfried Keller (1819–90) struggled to find appropriate poetic voice. The period 1840–1914 witnessed an enormous growth in poetic anthols., which were deemed supremely fit for moral improvement, educational purposes, and social entertainment.

VI. Twentieth Century. The notion that poetry, and more broadly art and beauty itself, must proclaim a timeless realm apart from public and political life was embraced not only by middle-class readers but also by fin de siècle artists who otherwise rejected bourgeois notions of artistic consumption. They radicalized the claim: only apart from all things external and contingent can true art flourish. Mörike's "Auf eine Lampe" ("To a Lamp," 1846) and the Swiss Conrad Ferdinand Meyer's (1825–98) "Der römische Brunnen" ("The Roman Fountain," 1882) had prefigured the interest in self-sufficient artifacts and symbolic lang. transcending ephemeral experience. Stefan George (1868–1933) embodied aesthetic *modernism in its most elitist expression. From 1890 onward, he carefully printed his poems in stylized orthography in limited editions on fine paper as repositories of a poetic beauty otherwise lost to what he saw as a debased and vulgar civilization. Poetry served a sacred function in a sectarian cult with strong homoerotic attachment and messianic zeal. His collections include Das Jahr der Seele (The Year of the Soul, 1897) with its refined symbolic landscapes, and Der siebente Ring (The Seventh Ring, 1907) with its dreams of civilization renewed. Among the younger writers attracted to the aestheticist vision was the Viennese prodigy Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1874–1929), who wrote exquisite and surprisingly mature poetry while still of school age. In the ten years of his poetic production after 1890, Hofmannsthal evoked a world of impression in which the formal perfection of the poem served as the sole site of stability in a transient phenomenal world. Later, Hofmannsthal rejected this aestheticist vision—and with it, lyric poetry—on ethical grounds, turning to drama, opera, and other forms.

Rainer Maria Rilke (1875–1926), who began in Prague as a prolific but unexceptional poet, ended his career acclaimed as the major lyric voice of the early 20th c. A search for meaning distinguished each phase of Rilke's devel. and repeatedly altered his stylistic choices. His poems trace a general path from subjectivity and emotionalism in Das Stunden-Buch (The Book of Hours, 1905) via Das Buch der Bilder (The Book of Images, 1902, 1906) to a focus on external objects, particularly works of aesthetic value, in Neue Gedichte (New Poems, 2 v., pub. 1907–08). His Dinggedichte* implicitly underscore how alienated he believed mod. humans to be from the integrity and intensity of the phenomenal world. In the Duineser Elegien (Duino Elegies, 1923), a ten-poem cycle in free-rhythm verse, and the two-part cycle Sonette an Orpheus (Sonnets to Orpheus, 1923), works that are generally considered Rilke's greatest achievement, solutions for the human plight are proclaimed in the creative and transforming word, an aesthetic redemption that turns the visible world into an inner invisible one, bestowing purpose in the face of transience.

The creative energy that surged through the Ger.-speaking world after 1890 did not run its poetic course with George, Hofmannsthal, and Rilke. There was scarcely a poet of note who did not share a fundamental antipathy toward the perceived self-satisfactions of bourgeois society, with its sentimental heroic trappings, growing bureaucracy, philistine if prosperous tastes, and enforced propriety. Some marked their distance through fanciful ling. play, like Christian Morgenstern (1871–1914), best known for his humorous Galgenlieder (Gallows Songs, 1905). Others fashioned their lives as well as their poetry around imaginary identities and exotic alternatives to Wilhelmine society, such as the unconventional feminist Else Lasker-Schüler (1869–1945), whose protective disguises and ling. creativity could not, in the end, ward off forced exile as a Jew.

After 1910, a poetic explosion signaled the arrival of new, determinedly disruptive voices. *Expressionism was edgy and assertive; it broke decisively with the cadences of *aestheticism and the cult of the beautiful. Jakob van Hoddis's (1884–1942) disjunctive images ordered in simple rhymed stanzas in "Weltende" ("End of the World," 1911) became a model for multiple poetic collages, half-real, half-surreal. Apocalyptic anticipation marked the work of Georg Heym (1887–1912), and ling. experiments honed lang. to maximize intensity in the futurist poetry of August Stramm (1864–1915). Ernst Stadler (1881–1914) filled long irregular lines with vitalistic assertions. Expressionist poetry burned brightly and quickly. By the end of World War I, it yielded center stage to drama, where calls for a new man and a new community continued to be sounded. Menschheitsdämmerung (Dawn of Humanity, 1920), its signature anthol., was assembled retrospectively by Kurt Pinthus (1886–1975).

The Salzburg medical orderly Georg Trakl (1887–1914), who died from a drug overdose after the battle of Grodek, wrote purposefully hermetic poetry. Trakl employed resonant lang. with self-consciously repetitive and derivative images (often from the poetic repertoire of Hölderlin and the romantics), reassembled like fragments in associative structures. He obsessively filled his symbolic landscapes with signs of decline, disintegration, and guilt only partially clarified.

In terms of cynicism, Gottfried Benn (1886–1956), a physician, surpassed the provocations of his contemporaries in his early collections beginning with Morgue (1912). Benn later insisted on a stern and individualized cerebralism, denying the mod. human any consolation in nature or sentiment, religious community or social program of salvation (his public, if short-lived, affiliation with National Socialism notwithstanding). In his Statische Gedichte (Static Poems, 1948) largely written between 1935 and 1945, the poetic word in abstracted form is considered the sole authentic bulwark against nihilism and pure of the deceits of cultural hist. His late poems and his theory of absolute poetry in Probleme der Lyrik (Problems of Lyric, 1951) proved esp. attractive to young writers in postwar Germany, where he replaced Rilke as a poetic example.

But in the era of the Weimar Republic, other alternatives to Benn's stern modernism existed. The most radical was the short-lived culture of *Dada, created in 1916 by avant-garde artists in Zurich, the center of political and intellectual exile. Under Hugo Ball, the Cabaret Voltaire offered soirées pillorying established culture. Poetry performances included *sound experiments (from phonetic patterning to pure noise), repudiation of ling. sequencing (play with simultaneity and with stasis), and montage. Dada with a more political edge followed in Berlin in 1918 and other Eur. cities.

In other ways, poetry became more public. Cabarets and revues brought poetry onto the stage in the form of chansons and songs. Joachim Ringelnatz (pseud. of Hans Bötticher, 1883–1934), poet and cabaret performing artist, added humor to the scene, as did Erich Kästner (1899–1974). Kurt Tucholsky (1890–1935) wrote satirical poems with pointed political purpose.

The most important poet to arise out of this milieu was Bertolt Brecht (1898–1956). In his early collection Hauspostille (Devotions for the Home, 1927), Brecht deftly subverted a range of bourgeois pieties, incl. religious sentiment and idealizations of landscape and love. Under the banner of Gebrauchslyrik (useful lyric), he developed a verse free of psychological excess, public in its reporting, and often polemical in its instructional intent. Brecht typically set his understated speech in simple rhymed stanzas, largely devoid of metaphor but enriched by colloquial phrases, biblical lang. and hymns, and citations of well-known poems. Many of his social-critical songs and ballads were inserted into his plays. Substantial collections include the Svendborger Gedichte (Svendborg Poems, 1939), written in Danish exile after he fled Nazi Germany in 1933, and the laconic Buckower Elegien (Buckow Elegies, 1953) written after his 1948 return to East Berlin. Brecht's impact on poets both East and West in the second half of the 20th c. was singular.

With the founding of the German Democratic Republic (GDR) and the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) in 1949, two separate political cultures laid claim to the poetic past. The GDR proclaimed itself heir to all things progressive within Ger. lit., celebrating in particular the legacy of Weimar Classicism, Heine and the Young Germans, and the realistic-critical lit. of the Weimar Republic. Johannes R. Becher (1891–1958), who began as an expressionist poet, emerged as the embodiment of orthodox GDR verbal culture, embracing the forms and diction of traditional poetry to promote a new socialist society. He wrote the national anthem and became the minister of culture in 1954. Less orthodox but astute and inventive to the end, Brecht was the undisputed literary star and a major example for the next generation of GDR poets, incl. the laconic skeptic Günter Kunert (b. 1929) and the antiestablishment songwriter and performer Wolf Biermann (b. 1936). Modernism was suspect. Nature poets Peter Huchel (1903–81) and Johannes Bobrowski (1917–65) reinvigorated their genre as well as the landscapes they evoked with a sharpened focus on human activity and hist. In the 1960s, a younger, energetic generation of poets born in the 1930s altered the ongoing debate about poetry's function within socialist society by pressing the question of subjectivity and the expression of individual experience. The new poets wrote poetry that proved more critical, experimental, and personal than the conservative GDR cultural authorities desired. Within a decade, political realities led to censorship, harassment, and mounting disillusionment with the East German state and, after 1970, multiple relocations to the West. The forced expatriation of Biermann in 1976 proved a watershed. In the end Huchel, Kunert, and, from the 1930s generation, Reiner Kunze (b. 1933), Bernd Jentzsch (b. 1940), Sarah Kirsch (b. 1935), and Kurt Bartsch (1937–2010) left. Volker Braun (b. 1939), Heinz Czechowski (1935–2009), Rainer Kirsch (b. 1934), and Karl Mickel (1935–2000) remained. The 1980s saw growing disengagement. Younger poetic voices, uneasy within inherited ling. and political boundaries, placed a renewed emphasis on formal experimentation that would continue after the collapse of the GDR in 1989.

After the formation of the FRG in 1949, it was Benn who first dominated poetic discussion. His emphasis on form above content, on hist.'s emptiness, and on words stripped of ideology attracted younger writers seeking refuge from the trauma of the war years. Similarly, nature poetry seemed to offer a refuge, evoking a world of tangible plants and animals. Here also was continuity with the past. Among the authors associated with the example of Oskar Loerke (1884–1941) and the prewar jour. Kolonne (Convoy, 1929–32), the mythopoetic Wilhelm Lehmann (1882–1968) and Catholic Elisabeth Langgässer (1899–1950) evoked a natural world largely apart from human activity. Günter Eich (1907–72) proved more overtly political; Eich developed a terse, minimalist style that secured his postwar reputation. Writing in a lang. uncontaminated by National Socialism became a priority. Gruppe 47 (Group 47), a gathering of authors committed to renewing democratic lit. first convened by Hans Werner Richter (1908–93) in 1947, established a general modernism and encouraged critical opposition to the political restoration.

The most important new poetic voices came from outside the FRG. Austrian-born Ingeborg Bachmann (1926–73) asserted the need to reclaim poetic lang. in the present setting of disillusionment with bold metaphors and a desire for utopian dreaming coupled with fundamental unease about the present. Nobel laureate of 1966 Nelly Sachs (1891–1970) wrote more directly from her Swedish exile, where she survived the war, straining to say the unspeakable not only about the Shoah but about personal suffering. Romanian-born Paul Antschel, who changed his name to Celan (1920–70), witnessed to the past in a lang. that he experienced as both essential and suspect. The son of Ger.-speaking Jews who died in the Holocaust, Celan moved after the war to Paris and became a Fr. citizen. His early and best-known poem "Todesfuge" ("Death Fugue") in Mohn und Gedächtnis (Poppy and Memory, 1952) evoked the death camps in a musical counterpoint atypical in its fluidity and accessibility. Later works, such as the collections Sprachgitter (Speech-Grille, 1959), Atemwende (Breathturn, 1967), and Fadensonnen (Threadsuns, 1968), testified to growing despair and silence communicated in a lang. that had become fragmented, compounded, and parched. An accomplished translator of the Fr. symbolists as well as contemp. poets, the polyglot Celan estranged lang. to the limits of comprehension while underscoring the urgency of dialogue.

Lang. was also the immediate concern of poets reviving the international avant-garde trads. of ling. experimentation. They privileged phonetic, graphic, and morphological elements in order to liberate lang. from grammatical convention. Eugen Gomringer's (b. 1925) *concrete poetry isolated verbal materials in visual settings. Helmut Heissenbüttel (1921–96) inventoried words, writing "texts" rather than poems; Jürgen Becker's (b. 1932) "texts" also ignored traditional genre boundaries. In Austria, the Wiener Gruppe (Vienna Group) initiated bohemian events. H. C. Artmann (1921–2000) exploited dialect, and Friederike Mayröcker (b. 1924) experimented widely, incl. with montage. Ernst Jandl (1925–2000) evidenced humor as well as self-irony in performance and in his collections of sound poetry.

By the mid-1960s, ever more politically potent poetry was appearing. Already in the mid-1950s Hans Magnus Enzensberger (b. 1929) had faced the emerging social and political reality of postwar Germany more resolutely than most of his contemporaries. Versatile and ironic, he provoked and prodded in his richly allusive verse. Brecht's influence was increasingly evident. Günter Grass (b. 1927), Peter Rühmkorf (1929–2008), and Biermann, performing and publishing in the West, mobilized political sentiment in print and in concert. Erich Fried (1921–88), living in Great Britain, wrote outspoken political poetry, incl. Warngedichte (Poems of Warning, 1964) and und Vietnam und (and Vietnam and, 1966).

In counterpoint, the new subjectivity of the 1970s focused on everyday needs and personal experience. Rolf Dieter Brinkmann (1940–75), emerging from the counterculture, used seemingly banal moments to capture "snapshots" of everyday reality. Sarah Kirsch had long reflected on nature and love; her collection Katzenleben (Catlives, 1984), pub. after her 1977 departure from the GDR, marked a personal coming to terms with the writers' life within political and social constraints. The women's movement and the question of female subjectivity led both writers and critics to new appreciation of forgotten poets such as Karoline von Gunderrode (1780–1806) and to recognition of common themes of identity, exile, and loss in the poetry of Jewish women writers such as Lasker-Schüler, Sachs, Gertrud Kolmar (1894–1943), Rose Ausländer (1901–88), Mascha Kaléko (1907–75), Hilde Domin (1912–2006), and Ilse Aichinger (b. 1921).

Others shifted gears. Karl Krolow (1915–1999), known for modernist poems such as Fremde Körper (Foreign Bodies, 1959), grew more laconic and elegiac. In the 1980s, a general disillusionment characterized the work of many older and still-productive poets, who approached the future with apocalyptic visions and dire warnings. In contrast, younger poets writing in the 1980s and 1990s evidenced wider stylistic modes, a revival of hermetic poetic gestures, more explicit citations of the larger poetic trad., and a return to overt demonstrations of formal virtuosity. Technology often replaced nature as an imagery source. Thomas Kling (1957–2005) experimented with *typography and orthography, fractured syntax, and intertextual citations. Former East German Uwe Kolbe (b. 1957) combined radical subjectivity with ling. play.

In the 21st c., Ger. poetry continues to prosper, despite repeated assertions about its decline. Durs Grünbein (b. 1962) can be seen as representative of a great many poets working with questions of postunification culture who seek to keep alive the recent past and yet reclaim the larger Ger. poetic trad. The number of new poets continues to increase in a highly educated society, where their work is supported by a well-established system of jours., publishing houses, prizes, academies, civic grants, and media.

See AUSTRIA, POETRY OF; GERMANIC PROSODY; GESELLSCHAFTSLIED; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS; SWITZERLAND, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies. German*: Epochen der deutschen Lyrik, ed. W. Killy, 10 v. (1969–77); Seventeen Modern German Poets, ed. S. Prawer (1971); Lyrik des Barock, ed. M. Szyrocki, 2 v. (1971); Spätmittelalter, Humanismus, Reformation, ed. H. Heger, 2 v. (1975–78); Deutsche Dichterinnen vom 16. Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart, ed. G. Brinker-Gabler (1978); Lyrik-Katalog Bundesrepublik, ed. J. Hans, U. Herms, R. Thenior (1978); Lyrik für Leser: Deutsche Gedichte der siebziger Jahre, ed. V. Hage (1980); Modern deutsche Naturlyrik, ed. E. Marsch (1980); German Poetry, ed. M. Swales (1987); Deutsche Gedichte von 1900 bis zur Gegenwart, ed. F. Pratz, 2d ed. (1987); Frühe deutsche Literatur und lateinische Literatur in Deutschland 800–1150, ed. W. Haug and B. K. Vollmann (1991); Deutsche Lyrik des frühen und hohen Mittelalters, ed. I. Kasten (1995); Humanistische Lyrik des 16. Jahrhunderts, ed. W. Kühlmann, R. Seidel, and H. Wiegand (1997); Deutsche Lyrik des späten Mittelalters, ed. B. Wachinger (2006); Reclams grosses Buch der deutschen Gedichte, ed. H. Detering (2007); In welcher Sprache träumen Sie? Österreichische Lyrik des Exils und des Widerstands, ed. M. Herz-Kestranek and K. Kaiser, D. Strigl (2007). English: The Penguin Book of German Verse, ed. L. Forster, rev. ed. (1959); Anthology of German Poetry from Hölderlin to Rilke, ed. A. Flores (1960); The German Lyric of the Baroque in English Translation, ed. and trans. G. Schoolfield (1961); Modern German Poetry 1910–1960, ed. M. Hamburger and C. Middleton (1962); Twentieth-Century German Verse, ed. P. Bridgwater (1963); Anthology of German Poetry through the 19th Century, ed. A. Gode and F. Ungar (1964); The Penguin Book of Lieder, ed. and trans. S. Prawer (1964); An Anthology of Concrete Poetry, ed. E. Williams (1967); Medieval German Lyric Verse in English Translation, ed. and trans. J. Thomas (1968); German and Italian Lyrics of the Middle Ages, ed. and trans. F. Goldin (1973); East German Poetry, ed. M. Hamburger (1973); Twenty-five German Poets, ed. and trans. W. Kaufmann (1975); German Poetry, 1910–1975, trans. M. Hamburger (1977); German Poetry from 1750 to 1900, ed. R. Browning (1984); Austrian Poetry Today, ed. and trans. M. Holton and H. Kuhner (1985); Contemporary Austrian Poetry, ed. and trans. B. Bjorklund (1986); The Defiant Muse: German Feminist Poems from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. S. Cocalis (1986); Evidence of Fire: An Anthology of Twentieth-Century German Poetry, ed. R. Ives (1988); German Lieder, ed. P. Miller (1990); Menschheitsdämmerung/Dawn of Humanity, ed. K. Pinthus, trans. J. M. Ratych, R. Ley, R. C. Conard (1994); The Cambridge Songs, ed. and trans. J. Ziolkowski (1994); German Epic Poetry, ed. F. Gentry and J. Walter, trans. F. Ryder and J. Walter (1995); German Poetry in Transition, 1945–1990, ed. and trans. C. Melin (1999); Sovereignty and Salvation in the Vernacular, 1050–1150, ed. and trans. J. Schultz (2000); After Every War: Twentieth-Century Women Poets, ed. and trans. E. Boland (2004); The Faber Book of Twentieth-Century German Poems, ed. M. Hofmann (2005).

■ Criticism and History. German: Geschichte der politischen Lyrik in Deutschland, ed. W. Hinderer (1978); Die deutsche Lyrik, 1945–75, ed. K. Weissenberger (1981); Gedichte und Interpretationen, ed. V. Meid et al., 7 v. (v. 1–6, 1982; v. 7, 1997); Geschichte der deutschen Lyrik vom Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart, ed. W. Hinderer (1983); G. Schulz, Die deutsche Literatur zwischen Französischer Revolution und Restauration, 2 v. (1983, 1989); B. Sorg, Das lyrische Ich (1984); H.-G. Kemper, Deutsche Lyrik der frühen Neuzeit, 6 v. (1987–2002); G. Kaiser, Augenblicke deutscher Lyrik (1987); Deutsche Lyrik nach 1945, ed. D. Breuer (1988); Gedichte und Interpretationen: Deutsche Balladen, ed. G. Grimm (1988); W. Haubrichs, Die Anfänge: Versuche volkssprachiger Schriftlichkeit im frühen Mittelalter (1988); G. Kaiser, Geschichte der deutschen Lyrik von Goethe bis Heine, 3 v. (1988); Frauen dichten anders, ed. M. Reich-Ranicki (1998); 1400 Deutsche Gedichte und ihre Interpretationen, ed. M. Reich-Ranicki, 12 v. (2002); F.-J. Holznagel et al., Geschichte der deutschen Lyrik (2004); H. Korte, Deutschsprachige Lyrik seit 1945, 2d rev. ed. (2004); H. Hiebel, Das Spektrum der modernen Poesie, 2 v. (2005); B. Böschenstein, Von Morgen nach Abend (2006); R. Klüger, Gemalte Fensterscheiben (2007). English: P. Demetz, Postwar German Literature (1970); R. M. Browning, German Baroque Poetry, 1618–1723 (1971); G. Gillespie, German Baroque Poetry (1971); A. De Capua, German Baroque Poetry (1973); E. Blackall, The Emergence of German as a Literary Language, 2d ed. (1978); R. Browning, German Poetry in the Age of the Enlightenment (1978); Sayce; German Baroque Literature, ed. G. Hoffmeister (1983); S. Jaeger, The Origins of Courtliness (1985); P. Demetz, After the Fires: Recent Writing in the Germanies, Austria and Switzerland (1986); M. Hamburger, After the Second Flood (1986); German Poetry through 1915, ed. H. Bloom (1987); B. Peucker, Lyric Descent in the German Romantic Tradition (1987); J. Rolleston, Narratives of Ecstasy (1987); Modern German Poetry, ed. H. Bloom (1989); K. Leeder, Breaking Boundaries: A New Generation of Poets in the GDR (1996); D. Wellbery, The Specular Moment (1996); M. Gibbs and S. Johnson, Medieval German Literature (1997); W. Haug, Vernacular Literary Theory in the Middle Ages (1997); M. Lee, Displacing Authority (1999); Landmarks in German Poetry, ed. P. Hutchinson (2000); R. Owen, The Poet's Role: Lyric Responses to German Unification by Poets from the G.D.R. (2001); I. Stoehr, German Literature of the Twentieth Century (2001); C. Edwards, The Beginnings of German Literature (2002); Literature of the Sturm und Drang, ed. D. Hill (2003); A. Classen, Late-Medieval German Women's Poetry (2004); Early Germanic Literature and Culture, ed. B. Murdoch and M. Read (2004); German Literature of the Early Middle Ages, ed. B. Murdoch (2004); The Literature of German Romanticism, ed. D. Mahoney (2004); A New History of German Literature, ed. D. Wellbery (2004); German Literature of the Eighteenth Century, ed. B. Becker-Cantarino (2005); German Literature of the Nineteenth Century, 1832–1899, ed. C. Koelb and E. Downing (2005); The Literature of Weimar Classicism, ed. S. Richter (2005); German Literature of the High Middle Ages, ed. W. Hasty (2006); Early Modern German Literature 1350–1700, ed. M. Reinhart (2007); B. Bennett, "Histrionic Nationality: Implications of the Verse in Faust," Goethe Yearbook 17 (2010).

M. Lee

GESELLSCHAFTSLIED. A term narrowly applied to a four-part, polyphonic song, composed and performed by and for educated society during the *rococo and *baroque periods in Germany. Musical forerunners include It. part songs: the courtly, nonstrophic *madrigal, the strophic Neapolitan villanella (street song), and the canzone*. Gesellschaftslieder are usually composed to an existing melody sung by the tenor or the discantus but occasionally in one of the middle voices. Sixteenth-c. Gesellschaftslieder, commonly composed in bar form, are characterized by the melodic quality of all voices in the imitative style of the Fr. chanson. Although distinct from the Hofweise (court song) and the Volkslied (folk song), Gesellschaftslieder share thematic concerns of both genres, most prominently the pain and pleasure of love, as well as drinking songs. As in the 19th c., there was a close connection between the Gesellschaftslied and the flowering of Ger. lyrical poetry from 1620 to 1680 (e.g., Simon Dach, Martin Opitz, G. R. Weckherlin). Among important composers of the genre, Ludwig Senfl was the most prolific.

The term is more popularly used as a synonym for the 19th-c. geselliges Lied (sociable song)—a term also loosely employed for the Tafellieder of the late 18th and early 19th cs.—but usually refers to solo song with piano (or guitar or harp) accompaniment, performed in Ger. drawing rooms. The sociohistorical context into which the Gesellschaftslied was born witnessed J. W. Goethe's contribution to Ger. lyric poetry, the Enlightenment emphasis on Bildung und Kultur (education and culture), the rise of music printing, the devel. of the pianoforte, and the accompanying expectation of a modest musical ability in polite young men and women. Such a confluence of factors inspired the Goethe settings of J. F. Reichardt and C. F. Zelter, strophic songs that reflected textual nuances and were written for the amateur performer. Amateur performance has always had two levels—the safe and the accomplished, which reaches professional standards. Whereas the first is purely a source of entertainment, the second, while sharing this function, has a very strong educative value that improves the quality of music making in society in general. This interlocking dynamic existed in 19th-c. Germany, and an enormous difference in standards of performance and composition fall under the one rubric of Gesellschaftslied.

■ A. Reissmann, Das deutsche Lied in seiner historischen Entwicklung (1861); F. W. von Ditfurth, Deutsche Volks–und Gesellschaftslieder des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts (1872); M. Friedlaender, Das dt. Lied im 18. Jh., 2d ed., 2 v. (1908); R. Velten, Das Ältere dt. Gesellschaftslieder unter dem Einfluss der italienischen Musik (1914); M. Platel, Vom Volkslied zum Gesellschaftslied (1939); W. Flemming, "Gesellschaftslied," Reallexikon II; W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960); Die Lautenhandschrift des Prämonstratenserstiftes Strachov (Prag), ed. J. Klima (1976); M. M. Stoljar, "Speculum ludi: The Aesthetics of Performance in Song," Music and German Literature, ed. J. M. McGlathery (1992); L. Finscher, "Lied und Madrigal, 1580–1600," Music in the German Renaissance, ed. J. Kmetz (1994); J. Steinheuer: "Zum Wandel des italienisches Einflusses auf das deutsche Gesellschaftslied und vor allem das Quodlibet in der ersten Hälfte des 17. Jahrhunderts," Relazioni musicali tra Italia e Germania nell'età barocca: Loveno di Menaggio, ed. A. Colzani (1997).

L. Byrne Bodley

GHAZAL. A *monorhyme (aa ba ca, etc.) *lyric poem originating in Arabia as a thematic genre on love and later developed into a fixed form in Persian, Turkish, Urdu, and most other Islamicate lits. The Ar. root gh-z-l semantically encompasses the gazelle, the act of spinning/weaving, and, eventually, amorous talk with a woman; as a poetic genre, ghazal ranges in mood from elegiac to *anacreontic, from defeatist to mystically ecstatic. The ghazal motifs and imagery already appear in the nasīb of the pre-Islamic Ar. qaṣīda*, evoked both as the poet's pain at separation from his beloved and as nostalgic reverie of their youthful amorous exploits. In the Umayyad period (660–750), the ghazal developed into a stand-alone love poem, prosodically similar to the qaṣīda but shorter and preferably in meters suitable for singing. The early Ar. ghazal reflects two major schools or ideals of love, Hijazi and ʿUdhrī. In the Hijazi ghazal, at Mecca and Medina, an urbane and lighthearted mood prevailed, with poets like ʿUmar ibn Abī Rabīʿa (d. 712 or 721) often admiring and wooing the female pilgrims. Aristocratic beloveds were usually mentioned by name in the early ghazal, perhaps contributing to social and political problems for poets like al-ʿArjī (d. 737) and al-Aḥwaṣ al-Anṣārī (d. 729), who both wound up in prison. The Hijazi lover is deferential to his lady in the ghazal but hopes for and can achieve consummation of his love, while generally avoiding bawdry (obscene matter is the purview of the mujūn genre), though in the ghazals of Bashshār ibn Burd (d. 784) or in certain bacchic ghazals, this boundary is blurred. By contrast, the ʿUdhrī poets love chastely (famous among Eur. romantics through Stendhal's De l'amour and Heinrich Heine's Der Asra, "Welche sterben, wenn sie lieben"), separated by circumstance from their ladies and dying as ennobled martyrs to unfulfilled love—at least as portrayed in the vitas that later attached to ghazal poets like Jamīl (d. 701), or the legendary Majnūn, driven mad by his love for Laylā and proverbially known in Islamicate trads. for unwavering devotion. In the early Abbasid period (750–1258), the courtly ideal of unattainable love is exemplified in al-ʿAbbās b. al-Aḥnaf (d. ca. 808), whereas with Abū Nuwās (d. ca. 814), the ghazal turns away from naming an aristocratic lady toward an anonymous beloved who may be a slave or a server in the wine tavern and not infrequently male. The homoerotic environment and the anonymous beloved characterize the later ghazal trad., esp. in Persian, Turkish, and Urdu. Meanwhile, the elaboration of literary, legal, and medical theories of the stages and kinds of love, esp. eros, enabled Neoplatonic and mystical symbolism to attach to the ghazal during the 10th and 11th cs., particularly in Sufi circles. The ghazal ethos was acutely expressed in Andalusia by Ibn Zaydūn (d. 1071) and others, where the thematics also found expression in new fixed forms (e.g., muwashshaḥ, zajal; see ZÉJEL).

Persian *love poetry has roots in the Sasanian minstrel trad., incl. musical performance; but the images, motifs, and prosodic structures of Ar. were fundamental to the devel. of the Persian ghazal. From Persian poetry's earliest emergence in the 10th c., ghazal is an integral concept and technical term distinguishing the mode of love poetry from modes of *panegyric, *elegy, or satire across a variety of verse forms (qaṣīda, rubāʿī, qiṭʿa*). Persian poetry of the 9th–10th cs. produced many shorter poems focused on amorous themes, often for a wine symposium or royal banquet. Without abandoning its earthly and epicurean associations, love was, however, increasingly understood, esp. in the expanding Sufi contexts, as susceptible of pointing symbolically to the transcendental. Furthermore, by the 12th c., esp. in the work of Sanāʾī (d. ca. 1131), the Persian ghazal assumed the contours of a fixed form, later defined as a monorhyme poem (aa ba ca, etc.) of 5 to 14 lines, incl. a line, usually the last or penultimate, mentioning the poet's pen name (takhalluṣ). This last feature developed perhaps as a seal of authorship for ghazals sold to musicians as lyric texts, to be performed in the poet's absence. This "clasp line" also served as a device of *closure, for the poet to exit the mood of reverie, comment on the theme, or possibly dedicate the poem to a patron. Almost all subsequent Persian poets practiced this fixed-form ghazal, incl. Saʿdī (d. 1292), known for his inimitable simplicity and cultivation of both earthly and ethereal beloveds; Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī (d. 1273), who mastered the ecstatic mystical expression of the religion of love in the ghazal; Ḥāfiẓ (d. 1389), who turned the ghazal into a deep, complex meditation, at once carnal, sociopolitical, and mystical; and Ṣāʾib (d. ca. 1676), a prolific and careful craftsman of lang. who plumbed conventional motifs and images for new meanings.

This fixed-form ghazal spread to many kindred lits. in central and south Asia, incl. Anatolian (13th c.) and Chaghatay (15th c.) Turkish, as well as to Urdu (15th c.), where the influence of the Persian poets of the "Indian style" provided the model for Walī Dakanī (d. before 1725) but took on increasingly modernist casts in the ghazals of Mīrzā Ghālib (d. 1869) and Muḥammad Iqbāl (d. 1938). Though some contemp. Persian poets have excelled at the ghazal form (e.g., Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn Shahryār [d. 1988] and Sīmīn Bihbahānī [b. 1927]), it remains most vital in the Urdu tradition. Ger. trans. of the Persian ghazal deeply influenced J. W. Goethe, August von Platen, Friedrich Rückert, and the musical lieder; since about 2000, Am. poetry has witnessed a vibrant ghazal scene, largely informed by a 1969 experiment in New York involving Adrienne Rich, W. S. Merwin, William Stafford, and Mark Strand and their adaptations of Ghālib's poetry from literal trans. (pub. as Ghazals of Ghālib).

Once established as a fixed form, the cl. ghazal was no longer bound thematically to love, and a range of themes, esp. mysticism and speculative philosophy, panegyric, and politics, could be expressed. Typical locales of the cl. ghazal include the garden, the royal banquet or symposium, and the wine tavern, often in the spring at dawn after a sleepless night. The main characters include the lover, typically identified with the voice of the poet, at least until the takhalluṣ creates some distance from the speaking *persona of the poem. Usually enthusiastic and determined, he is, however, not often successful because of several factors: the beloved's hauteur, indifference, and downright cruelty; the watchful eye of the beloved's kinsmen or the presence of rivals; and the night watchman or morals police. The lover/drunkard is castigated by various blamers—kinsmen attempting to rescue the lover from irresolute self-destruction or religious and political figures of authority. Esp. in mystical poems, this is manifested as an antinomian revelry, with the poetic persona, often a qalandar dervish, exalting in his irreligion, loving an idol, abandoning the mosque for the tavern, and learning the secrets of life from a social outcast (rind), a tavern owner, or a Zoroastrian magus, in the role of saint and mystagogue.

See ARABIC POETICS, ARABIC POETRY, PERSIAN POETRY, TURKISH POETRY, URDU POETRY.

■ A. J. Arberry, "Orient Pearls at Random Strung," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 11 (1943); A. Pagliaro and A. Bausani, Storia della letteratura persiana (1960); E. Yarshater, "The Theme of Wine-Drinking and the Concept of the Beloved in Early Persian Poetry," Studia Islamica 13 (1960); History of Iranian Literature, ed. J. Rypka (1968); Ghazals of Ghālib, ed. A. Ahmad (1971); A. Hamori, On the Art of Medieval Arabic Literature (1974); M. Hillmann, Unity in the Ghazals of Hāfiz (1976); A. Schimmel, "The Emergence of the German Ghazal," Studies in the Urdu Ghazal and Prose Fiction, ed. M. Memon (1979); A. E. Khayrallah, Love, Madness and Poetry: An Interpretation of the Magnūn Legend (1980); G. J. van Gelder, Beyond the Line: Classical Arabic Literary Critics on the Coherence and Unity of the Poem (1982); R. Dankoff, "The Lyric in the Romance: The Use of Ghazals in Persian and Turkish Masnavīs," Journal of Near Eastern Studies 43 (1984); W. Skalmowski, "The Meaning of the Persian Ghazal," Orientalia Lovanensia Periodica 18 (1987); H. Moayyad, "Lyric Poetry," Persian Literature, ed. E. Yarshater (1988); W. Andrews, Poetry's Voice, Society's Song (1985); W. Feldman, "A Musical Model for the Structure of the Ottoman Gazel," Edebiyât 1 (1987); Intoxication: Earthly and Heavenly: Seven Studies on the Poet Hafiz of Shiraz, ed. M. Glünz and J.C. Bürgel (1991); The Legacy of Mediæval Persian Sufism, ed. L. Lewisohn (1992); C. Petievich, Assembly of Rivals: Delhi, Lucknow and the Urdu Ghazal (1992); R. Russell, The Pursuit of Urdu Literature (1992); R. Jacobi, "Theme and Variations in Umayyad G. Poetry," Journal of Arabic Literature 23 (1993); J. Stetkevych, The Zephyrs of Najd: The Poetics of Nostalgia in the Classical Arabic Nasīb (1993); R. Zipoli, Technique of the Ğawāb: Replies of Nawāī to Ḥ.āfiz. and Ğāmī (1993); F. Pritchett, Nets of Awareness: Urdu Poetry and Its Critics (1994); S. Enderwitz, Liebe als Beruf: ʿAbbās ibn al-Aḥnaf und das Ġazal (1995); J.T.P. de Brujin, Persian Sufi Poetry (1997); T. Bauer, Liebe und Liebesdichtung in der arabischen Welt des 9. und 10. Jahrhunderts (1998); P. Losensky, Welcoming Fighānī: Imitation and Poetic Individuality in the Safavid-Mughal Ghazal (1998); Encyclopedia of Arabic Literature, ed. J. S. Meisami and P. Starkey (1998); H. Mukhia, "Failure as Dissent in Urdu Ghazal," Modern Asian Studies 33 (1999); Ravishing Disunities: Real Ghazals in English, ed. S. A. Agha (2000); S. Shamīsā, Sayr-i ghazal dar shir-i fārsī (2001); J. S. Meisami, Structure and Meaning in Medieval Arabic and Persian Poetry (2003); S. R. Faruqi, "A Stranger in the City: The Poetics of Sabki Hindi," Annual of Urdu Studies 19 (2004); C. M. Naim, Urdu Texts and Contexts: The Selected Essays of C. M. Naim (2004); Ghazal as World Literature 1: Transformations of a Literary Genre, ed. T. Bauer and A. Neuwirth (2005); W. Andrews and M. Kalpakli, The Age of Beloveds (2005); F. Lewis, "The Transformation of the Persian Ghazal: From Amatory Mood to Fixed Form," Ghazal as World Literature II: From a Literary Genre to a Great Tradition, ed. A. Neuwirth et al. (2006); Hafiz and the Religion of Love in Classical Persian Poetry, ed. L. Lewisohn (2010); J.T.P. de Bruijn and E. Yarshater, "Ḡhazals i and ii," Encyclopaedia Iranica, ed. E. Yarshater, http://www.iranicaonline.org/articles/gazal-1-history and http://www.iranicaonline.org/articles/gazal-2; R. Blachère, A. Bausani, F. İz, "Ghazal," Encyclopaedia of Islam, 2d ed., ed. P. Bearman et al., Brill Online (2002–).

F. D. Lewis

GLOSA. A Sp. metrical form, also called mote or retruécano, closely related to the cantiga*, introduced in the late 14th or early 15th c. by the court poets. In its strict form, it is a poem consisting of a line or a short stanza, called cabeza (also mote, letra, or texto), stating the theme of the poem, and followed by one stanza for each line of the cabeza, explaining or glossing that line and incorporating it into the explanatory stanza, often at the end as a refrain. *Strophes may be of any length and rhyme scheme. Loosely, the glosa is any poem expanding on the theme presented in the opening stanza and usually repeating one or more lines of that stanza. A famous late 16th-c. glosa is one by Vicente Espinel beginning "Mil veces voy a hablar / a mi zagala."

■ H. Janner, "La glosa española. Estudio histórico de su métrica y de sus temas," Revista de Filología Española 27 (1943); Le Gentil; Navarro.

D. C. Clarke

GLOSSOLALIA (Gr. glossa, "tongue," and lalein, "to speak"). Glossolalia or glossolaly denotes "speaking in tongues" or "the gift of tongues." These two etyma occur together in 1 Corinthians 14:2 ("one who speaks in a tongue [lalein glosse] speaks not to men but to God; for no one understands him, but he utters mysteries in the Spirit"), though the term glossolalia gained quasi-technical connotations only when the Christian universalist William Fredric Farrar defined it as "soliloquies of ecstatic spiritual emotion" in his Life and Work of St. Paul (1879). In addition to its role in Christian thought and practice from Paul down to the mod. Pentecostal and charismatic movements, glossolalia has also been observed historically in Egyptian, Gr., Judaic, Islamic, and Nordic ceremonial trads. and in 19th-c. spiritualism, as well as ethnographically across the globe. Since the late 19th c., mod. poetic practice has made use of glossolalic speech codes for a range of deliberate purposes.

Interpretations of glossolalia can be grouped into three main arenas: theology, psychology, and ling. Theology understands glossolalia as credulous, inspired conversation with God occurring outside the domain of natural, intelligible lang. (although religious communities often believe such utterances can be "understood"). While psychology and anthropology both define glossolalia as vocalization born of a "disassociated" mental state, psychology has tended to pathologize glossolalia and anthropology to regard it more neutrally as ritual practice (e.g., "trance"). To linguistically inclined theorists from Roman Jakobson to W. J. Samarin to Michel de Certeau, glossolalia belongs to a family of practices that fabricate the semblance or "facade" of a lang. bereft of structural rules or referential functions, thus, one not causally linked to enthusiasm, belief, or disassociation. The extent to which such theorists distinguish glossolalia proper from other vocal manifestations (e.g., *xenoglossia, *nonsense, ventriloquism, skat, aphonic noise, invented langs., archaic sacerdotalism), as well as from other disassociative states (e.g., spiritual possession, vision, catatonia, hysteria), can differ. Certeau persuasively theorizes glossolalia as a ritual practice resulting from both a "need" or "imperative" to speak ("speaking in tongues" transgresses the order through which an individual is capable of "holding one's tongue") and a "belief" in speech (compensating for the meaninglessness of that which is spoken). He thus regards glossolalia as "vocal utopia"—a "non-language" within the realm of oral communication analogous to the "non-place" of utopia within society writ large. It is chiefly with this third, ling. inflection that glossolalic speech codes have been employed by mod. poets.

Perhaps owing to shifts in the fin de siècle economy of authority among the disciplines of ling., psychology, theology, poetry, and spiritualism, the late 19th and early 20th cs. may be regarded as a heyday for both the social-scientific theory and poetic practice of glossolalia. In the spiritistic milieus of Western Europe (esp. France and Germany), popular cases of glossolalic mediums were widely reported, most famously Flournoy's "Mlle. Helene Smith," whose "Martian" lang. Flournoy described as a "typical case of 'glosso-poesy,' of complete fabrication of all the parts of a new language by a subconscious activity." Oskar Pfister, an associate of Sigmund Freud, devoted considerable energy to the pyschoanalytic interpretation of glossolalia, misguidedly attempting strategies of decipherment.

Instances of glossolalia abound in the poetry of the historical avant-garde (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS), as well as in the work of its predecessors and successors (from Christian Morgenstern [Germany] to Claude Gauvreau [Quebec]), and its hist. overlaps significantly with that of the global devel. of sound poetry. Most of these poems contain an ambition to sacralize (or resacralize) instrumentalized lang. by conceptualizing poetry as ritualistic social communion predicated on words transcending their constitutive mundanity (e.g., Velimir Khlebnikov's zaum', which engages forms of glossolalic Rus. occultism—see RUSSIA, POETRY OF). "Gadji beri bimba," the characteristic glossolalic poems of Ger. Dada (see DADA), emerged from Hugo Ball's work on a burlesque manger play (some of its onomatopes, like "tumba ba-umf," are those of a trumpeting pachyderm in the caravan of the magi) and were vocalized in a liturgical register by Ball, who was dressed as a "magic bishop." These poems might even be characterized as metaglossolalia, acting out glossolalia itself by means of phonosymbolic motifs such as galassassa, glassala, and sassala.

The most systematic, self-conscious marriage of poetic art with glossolalic speech belongs to the Rus. symbolist Andrei Bely. His Glossalolija: Poema o zvuke (Glossalalia: A Poem about Sound), written in 1917 under the sway of anthroposophy and pub. in 1922, is an extensive exercise in glossolalic vocalization in the service of a ling. creation myth, in which the "eurhythmic" tongue is cast as protagonist: "before there were distinct sounds the tongue would leap, like a dancer, in its own enclosed sphere." Bely describes the poet-glossolalist as a gestural, historical linguist, who is "free to meditate for hours on the alternations of roots—across languages, throughout the centuries." But he ultimately privileges poet over linguist, owing to the poet's ability to "hear in the shudderings of the air the imprint of ancient meaning; and, by wrapping oneself in the image of muttering bygones, to resurrect that which has gone by." Bely implicitly argues what Jakobson expounds explicitly: that auditory *iconicity (i.e., phonosymbolism) is a dynamic generator of meaning in all lang. systems. This distinguishes Bely from his Fr. symbolist coevals, for whom poetic sound patterning is an impressionist gesture rather than a systemic object of fascination (see SYMBOLISM).

The introduction of recording technology to field ethnography by anthropologists (e.g., Felicitas Goodman's and W. J. Samarin's recordings or Peter Adair's classic cinema verité depiction of Appalachian snake-handler glossolalists) provided the necessary material conditions for later 20th-c. insights regarding the status of glossolalia as a ling. performance of pancultural proportions. Following Goodman's cross-cultural account, Paz argued that glossolalia is always attended (i.e., cross-culturally) by the story of "the reconciliation of languages" that traditionally opposes Babel: "the Gospel counters the diabolical cosmopolitanism of Babel with the spiritual cosmopolitanism of Jerusalem, and the confusion of tongues with the wondrous gift of speaking other tongues." However, in furnishing glossolalia with a genetic myth of cosmopolitanism (other tongues), Paz risks conflating glossolalia with xenoglossia.

Even as large communities of believers continue to speak in tongues, recurrent interest in glossolalia within ling., *poststructuralism, and postmod. poetics suggests the persistence of glossolalic longings in secular modernity (see POSTMODERNISM). Barth's postmodernist account ("The senselessest babble, could we ken it, might disclose a dark message, or prayer") stages lit. as the site of an attempted rapprochement between these seemingly antithetical domains. So too do some elements of a so-called postmod. poetics, from Allen Ginsberg's shamanic rituals (see Hungerford) to the ethnopoetic recordings of poets such as Maria Sabina.

See ONOMATOPOEIA, SOUND, TIMBRE.

■ T. Flournoy, From India to the Planet Mars: A Study of a Case of Somnambulism with Glossolalia, trans. D. Vermilye (1900); O. Pfister, Die psychologische Entratselung der religidsen Glossolalie und der automatischen Kryptographie (1912); Jakobson, v. 4, "Retrospect"; P. Adair, Holy Ghost People (1967); J. Barth, Lost in the Funhouse: Fictions for Print, Tape, Live Voice (1968); F. D. Goodman, Speaking in Tongues: A Cross-Cultural Study of Glossolalia (1972); W. J. Samarin, Tongues of Men and Angels (1972); and "Glossolalia as Regressive Speech," Language and Speech 16 (1973); R. Jakobson and L. R. Waugh, The Sound Shape of Language (1979); G. Rouget, Music and Trance, trans. B. Biebuyck (1985); O. Paz, Convergences, trans. H. Lane (1992); T. R. Beyer Jr., "Andrej Belyj's Glossalolija: A Berlin Glossolalia," Europa Orientalis 14 (1995); M. de Certeau, "Vocal Utopias: Glossolalias," Representations, trans. D. Rosenberg (1996); E. W. White, The Magic Bishop: Hugo Ball, Dada Poet (1998); A. Bely, Glossolalie, trans. T. Breyer (2004); A. Hungerford, Postmodern Belief (2010).

H. FEINSOD

GLYCONIC. Named after Glycon, a Gr. poet whose date and place are unknown, this metrical colon (x x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ –) was basic to *aeolic meters and so became common in Gr. and Lat. lyric poetry. It was used by the Gr. melic poets Alcaeus and Sappho and by later Gr. and Roman poets both for *monody and choral lyric (see MELIC POETRY). In lyric, the number of syllables is fixed; in choral lyric and drama, *resolution is permitted. Horace began his glyconics with two long syllables.

The catalectic form of the glyconic, x x – ⏑ ⏑ – –, is called the Pherecratean, after the Gr. comic poet Pherecrates (fl. late 5th c. BCE). Apart from anceps* in the final syllable, the Pherecratean permits resolution only in the quantities of the base (the first two syllables) and occurs, usually with one or more glyconics, chiefly in Anacreon, in the choruses of Gr. tragedy, and in Horace (in whom the base is regularly spondaic). An example is Horace's Odes 1.5.3. The hypercatalectic form of the glyconic (x x – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – –) is called the hipponactean.

■ Wilamowitz, pt. 2, ch. 4; Maas; Koster; Dale; Halporn et al.; Snell; West; K. Itsumi, "The Glyconic in Greek Tragedy," CQ 78 (1984); Gasparov, History; A. P. David, The Dance of the Muses (2006).

R. J. Getty; P. S. Costas; J. W. Halporn

GNOMIC POETRY. A gnome is a "short pithy statement of a general truth; a proverb, maxim, aphorism, or apophthegm" (OED). The name gnomic was first applied to a group of Gr. poets who flourished in the seventh and sixth cs. BCE, incl. Theognis, Solon, Phocylides, and Simonides of Amorgos. But gnomes were popular in ancient Egyptian, Chinese, Sanskrit, and Heb. lits. In the West, the poet Horace frequently employed gnomes, as did such Lat. authors as Cicero and Tacitus. A number of poetic collections of gnomes are preserved in early Germanic and Celtic lits., incl. the Old Ir. Instructions of King Cormac Mac Airt, several Middle Welsh gnomic poems, the ON Hávamál, and two OE poems known as Maxims I and Maxims II; gnomes occur frequently in OE narrative poems, incl. Beowulf. In the ME period, many gnomic utterances attributed to King Alfred the Great and others were gathered in poetic collections. Gnomic poetry was later cultivated in England by Francis Quarles (Emblems, 1633) and in France by Gui de Pibras, whose Quatrains (1574) imitated the gnomic poets.

See EPIGRAM, PROVERB, RIDDLE.

■ B. C. Williams, Gnomic Poetry in Anglo-Saxon (1914); K. Jackson, Early Welsh Gnomic Poems (1935); C. Larrington, A Store of Common Sense: Gnomic Theme and Style in Old Icelandic and Old English Wisdom Poetry (1993); S. Deskis, Beowulf and the Medieval Proverb Tradition (1996).

R. P. ApRoberts; P. S. Baker

GOLIARDIC VERSE. Goliardus (from which derive the Eng. Goliardic and Goliard) may be owed to the Lat. gula (gluttony), or Golias, the Lat. for Goliath, the OT figure famously slain by David (1 Sam. 17). The term may also have affiliations with the Ger. goljan (to sing), or the Fr. gailliard (happy man). Some have attributed the popularity of the term in the 12th c. and its application to a kind of writing to a letter in which Bernard of Clairvaux famously condemned Peter Abelard as a "Goliath" figure.

Whatever the origin of the term, the poetry designated by it has long been associated with the Ordo Vagorum, a counterfeit religious "order" of students joined by a love of poetic composition and anticlerical views, who, so the trad. holds, moved in the 12th and 13th cs. from one intellectual center to the next in search of like-minded companions and poetic inspiration. Closer to the truth is the idea that, in these centuries, students and their teachers, inhabiting the great centers of learning in France, Germany, and England and inspired by the new secularism, produced a form of poetic satire that loosely took as an organizing emblem the figure of Goliath.

That Goliath should become a central figure in a new poetic movement is perhaps owed less to Bernard of Clairvaux's influence and more to a med. trad. of viewing Goliath as a symbol of evil (and of seeing David as a prefiguration of Christ). And yet in the 12th c., this rather narrow identification was expanded and somewhat softened: Goliath became a figure in, or the "author" of, a new strain of satiric verse, while his persona, remaining fundamentally negative, came to include the learning associated with the schools attended by those of his "order." As Christian *exegesis transmogrified into a literary procedure, his personality thus became more complex.

Complex, too, are the themes of the poems organized under the Goliardic rubric. Some celebrate the pleasures of love and of drinking; some take to task the worst foibles of monastic and ecclesiastical corruption; others notice the beauties of nature. Of the more famous Goliardic poets, Walter of Châtillon, Hugh Primas of Orléans, and the Archpoet stand out as exemplars of a kind of poetic composition that negotiates the space between crit. of authority and the articulation of a discrete and even likeable subjectivity.

Part of that subjectivity is resident in and expressed by the so-called Goliardic meter. Lacking any direct connection with the cl. quantities of Greco-Roman versification (see QUANTITY), this meter is based instead on word accent (see ACCENTUAL VERSE), and its typical configuration consists of a stanza of four lines of 13 syllables each, with a *caesura after the seventh syllable and end rhyme consistent within each *strophe. Sometimes the fourth line of the stanza is a hexameter (called an auctoritas).

Goliardic verse is found in many places but most famously in the so-called Carmina Burana collection, an anthol. of 228 poems, many (though not all) of which are either properly Goliardic by dint of meter or in terms of theme or both, esp. poems 187–228. In fact, poem 219 of the collection famously announces the "formation" of the Ordo Vagorum by parodying Mark 16.15 while demolishing in its many lines the pretenses of ecclesiastical superiority, esp. against the backdrop of monastic reform, of which the Ordo Vagorum is but the latest instance.

See SATIRE.

■ H. Waddell, The Wandering Scholars (1927); G. F. Whicher, The Goliard Poets (1949); Carmina Burana, ed. A. Hilka, O. Schumann, and B. Bischoff, Band 1, v. 1–3 (1930–70), with commentary in Band 2, v. 1 (incomplete, 1961); Raby, Secular; P. G. Walsh, "Golias and Goliardic Poetry," Medium Aevum 52 (1983); P. G. Walsh, Love Lyrics from the Carmina Burana (1993); Hugh Primas and the Archpoet, trans. F. Adcock (1994).

J. Pucci

GRAMMATICAL RHYME (Fr. rime grammatical; Ger. grammatischer Reim, It. replicatio), sometimes etymological rhyme. Rhymes that employ related forms derived from a common root syllable or etymon, such as a verb and a noun, or otherwise play on the varying lexical forms of a stem, esp. by repeating the same rhyme word in a run of lines but in a different case each time, so with different inflectional endings: the effect is close to that of *monorhyme. This kind of rhyming would be regarded by most mod. poets as scarcely rhyme at all, for being too easy, but it was practiced in Occitan by the *troubadours, in OF (Chrétien de Troyes), and by the rhétoriqueurs, e.g., Rutebeuf and Mousket; it can be effective still in short runs. Austin has also noted grammatical rhyme in the collection of Gr. oracular writings know as the Sibylline books and Virgil's Eclogues. Mod. and contemp. examples appear often in Rus. poetry, notably, according to Worth, in Alexander Pushkin's Evgenij Onegin and in a more limited way, according to Wachtel, in Joseph Brodsky, whose grammatical rhymes in A Part of Speech are based less on morphology than on approximate grammar and etymology. Grammatical rhyme is not to be confused with homoeoteleuton*, "case rhyme," which is the Gr. term for agreement of inflectional endings on words, without any intent at rhyme strictly speaking: grammatical rhyme uses the identity of roots (whether obvious or not) counterpointed with the difference of endings precisely in a rhyme-like fashion, though on the grammatical-category level and expressly for a rhyme-like effect: it is, therefore, a lexical analogue of (phonic) rhyme, while homoeoteleuton is not. Equivocal rhyme (Fr. rime équivoque), closely related and very popular among the *Grands Rhétoriqueurs is discussed elsewhere (see MOSAIC RHYME). The structure treated as grammatical rhyme in *prosody is treated as *polyptoton in rhet.

■ A. Tobler, Le Vers français (1885)—177–78; R. Austin, "Virgil and the Sibyl," CQ 21 (1927); Patterson; D. Worth "Grammatical Rhyme Types in Eugenij Onegin," Alexander Pushkin: Symposium II, ed. A. Kodjak, K. Pomorska, and K. Taranovsky (1980); M. Wachtel, The Cambridge Introduction to Russian Poetry (2004).

T.V.F. BROGAN; J. CHANG

GRAVEYARD POETRY. A type of meditative poetry, graveyard poetry takes as its major themes a melancholy sense of mutability, the inevitability of death, and the hope of a future life, arriving at such moral generalizations as Thomas Gray's "The paths of glory lead but to the grave" and "Even from the tomb the voice of nature cries." Although there are some earlier examples (e.g., Andreas Gryphius's Kirchhofs Gedanken in the mid-17th c. in Germany), Thomas Parnell's "Night-Piece on Death" (1721) first develops the type that became fully established with Edward Young's Night-Thoughts (1742), Robert Blair's "The Grave" (1743), and Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (1750). In the latter half of the 18th c., graveyard poetry became widespread in Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden, France, and Italy, the best-known examples being Friedrich Karl Kasimir von Creutz's "Die Gräber" (1760) and Ugo Foscolo's "Dei Sepolcri" (1807).

■ P. von Tieghem, Le Préromantisme, 3 v. (1924–47) J. W. Draper, The Funeral Elegy and the Rise of English Romanticism (1929); E. Sickels, The Gloomy Egoist (1932); C.A.D. Fehrman, Kyrkogårdsromantik (1954); H. Weinbrot, "Gray's Elegy: A Poem of Moral Choice and Resolution," SEL 18 (1978); Studies in the Literary Imagination 39.1 (2006)—spec. issue on lit. and graveyards.

F. J. WARNKE; A. PREMINGER; L. METZGER

GREEK ANTHOLOGY. The Greek Anthology is a collection of more than 4,000 Gr. short poems (or epigrams*, a term that had a wide and disputed application), mainly composed in elegiac couplets and written between the 7th c. BCE and the 10th c. CE. It exists in two versions: the Palatine Anthology, which was an expansion, made around 940 CE, of a prior compilation made by Constantine Cephalas around 900 CE; and the Planudean Anthology, made in 1301 by Maximus Planudes and based on an abridged version of Cephalas's collection. Cephalas himself drew on a wide variety of sources, incl. anthols. of epigrams made by Meleager around the beginning of the 1st c. BCE, Philip of Thessalonica under Nero, Strato probably at the time of Hadrian, Agathias in the mid-6th c. CE, and others.

Mod. eds. of the Greek Anthology print the 15 books of the Palatine Anthology (it is named after the ms., which was found in the Palatinate Library of Heidelberg), and they add in an appendix (or book 16) several hundred poems in the Planudean Anthology that do not appear in the Palatine. The 15 books are arranged by subject, from the Christian epigrams of the first book to the *riddles of the 14th and the miscellany of the 15th (which includes shaped poems; see TECHNOPAEGNION). Among the most influential are book 5, *erotic poetry; book 6, dedicatory and votive epigrams; book 7, *epitaphs and other poems on death; book 9, "epideictic" pieces (descriptions of natural objects and works on art, stories, imagined speeches, inscriptions, and others); book 10, "protreptic" poems, which exhort or instruct readers; book 11, sympotic and satirical epigrams; and book 12, pederastic poetry.

The Planudean Anthology was arranged in a different order (in seven books), and it omitted or bowdlerized much material. This version was the source for almost all readers until the 19th c., so it was mainly in this form that the Greek Anthology exercised its enormous influence on Eur. poetry. After the first printing in 1494, poetry from the Greek Anthology was widely translated and adapted into Neo-Lat. and the Eur. vernaculars, and it spurred devels. in many kinds of short poems, incl. the *sonnet, *emblem, and *madrigal. It had its largest impact on the epigram, often being taken to represent a sweet, naïve, or charming alternative to the pointedness of Roman epigrams (esp. Martial's).

See ANTHOLOGY, BYZANTINE POETRY, ELEGIAC DISTICH, EPIDEICTIC POETRY, GREEK POETRY.

■ Complete Editions: Greek Anthology, ed. W. R. Paton, 5 v. (1916–18); Anthologie grecque, ed. P. Walz et al., 2d ed., 12 v. (1960–); Anthologia graeca, ed. H. Beckby, 2d ed., 4 v. (1965).

■ Selected Editions: Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology, ed. J. W. Mackail, 3d ed. (1911); The Greek Anthology: Hellenistic Epigrams, ed. A.S.F. Gow and D. L. Page, 2 v. (1965); The Greek Anthology: The Gar- land of Philip, ed. A.S.F. Gow and D. L. Page, 2 v. (1968); Further Greek Epigrams, ed. D. L. Page (1981).

■ Criticism and History: J. Hutton, The Greek Anthology in Italy to the Year 1800 (1935); and The Greek Anthology in France and in the Latin Writers of the Netherlands to the Year 1800 (1946); A. Cameron, The Greek Anthology from Meleager to Planudes (1993); Brill's Companion to Hellenistic Epigram, ed. P. Bing and J. Bruss (2007).

K. Haynes

GREEK POETICS. See alexandrianism; byzantine poetry; classical poetics.

GREEK POETRY

I. Classical
II. Medieval. See byzantine poetry.
III. Modern

I. Classical

A. The Preliterate Period (ca. 2000–750 BCE). The earliest Gr. verses preserved in writing date from the 8th c. BCE, and poetry has continued to be composed in Gr. from that time until the present day. But mod. research (see oral-formulaic theory) indicates that the Gr. poetic trad. is, in fact, far older than the introduction of writing. The nature of the word groups of which the Homeric *epics are largely composed (see formula), as well as the content of those epics, imply a preexisting oral trad. of dactylic heroic poetry extending back into the Bronze Age civilization of the Mycenaeans, which came to an end about 1100 BCE (see oral poetry). The *aeolic meters that are widely used in extant Gr. poetry, notably by Sappho and Alcaeus, presuppose an even more ancient oral trad. of *song, for they show clear affinities with the meters of the Indian Vedas; their ultimate origins may, therefore, date back as far as about 2000 BCE. It is also now generally recognized that Gr. poetry emerged from and participated in an ancient Near Eastern and Eastern Mediterranean cultural koiné. These links with the music, poetry, and culture of the ancient Near East are strongest perhaps in the preliterate and earlier archaic periods, but various kinds of cultural interaction almost certainly continued to influence Gr. verse throughout its hist.

The introduction of an alphabet specifically adapted to the recording of Gr., which took place not later than the mid-8th c. BCE, was no doubt the most important single event in the hist. of Gr. poetry. Gr. (and Eur.) lit. begins here, at the point where the songs could be fixed in permanent form and transmitted to posterity. Yet for many centuries after, Gr. poetry continued to bear the deep imprint of ancient oral trad., incl. two of its most distinctive characteristics: (1) its mythological and heroic content and (2) its long dependence on oral *performance as the means of reaching its public.

Ancient Gr. poetry in nearly all genres worked within a frame of reference provided by the traditional gods and the heroes of the Bronze Age. That mythic-legendary world afforded the poets both their basic story patterns and their paradigms of conduct. Heroic epic, many forms of choral *lyric, and *tragedy directly represented characters and incidents drawn from that world; epinikion and monodic lyric (see epinikion, monody) constantly evoked it as a standard against which the human condition might be measured.

For more than three centuries after the introduction of writing, Gr. poetry continued as before to be enacted orally, often with the accompaniment of music or dancing or both, before audiences as small as dinner parties and as large as the vast crowds at religious festivals—Plato (Ion 535d) mentions audiences of 20,000 for performances of epic at such festivals. Thus, Gr. poetry of the archaic and high cl. eras combined features that may at first sight seem contradictory. It had the elaboration, finish, and durability that belong to book poetry as opposed to oral poetry, yet insofar as its intended public was concerned, it remained an oral and often even visual and quasi-dramatic entertainment.

To this inheritance from the preliterate trad. may also be attributed certain other characteristics of archaic and high cl. Gr. poetry: its richness in aural effects (the immense variety and musicality of its quantitative meters, for instance, are unmatched in any Eur. poetry—see meter, quantity); the prominent part it played in the cultural life of the society as a whole; and the wide range of its human appeal, particularly in its most popular genres, epic and drama.

In dealing with ancient Gr. poetry, it must always be borne in mind that we have less than 5 percent of all that was originally produced—the tiny proportion that has made it through the processes of selection, reperformance, and preservation spanning the more than 2,500 years since the invention of the Gr. alphabet. This means that our story necessarily tracks and depends on the Greeks' own processes of *canon formation, which probably had their start already in the education system of 5th-c. Athens, continued in the work of the Hellenistic scholars in the 3d and 2d cs. BCE, and finally depended on whether Gr. texts made the crucial transition from papyrus (the writing material of the ancient world) to longer-lasting vellum in the 4th c. CE. Over the last 150 years, however, substantial ancient papyrus finds preserved in Egypt have significantly enhanced and diversified our knowledge of Gr. poetry, both supplementing our corpora of canonical poets and offering us vivid glimpses of the kaleidoscopic range and variety of Gr. verse beyond the cl. canon.

B. The Earlier Archaic Period (ca. 750–600 BCE). Thanks (it seems) to the introduction of writing, a great number of poems dating from this period were known to the later Greeks. With the exception of the major poems attributed to Homer and Hesiod, however, most of this work survives only in quotations, summaries, and allusions (and now, to some extent, in fragmentary papyrus finds), but these are enough to permit a sketch map, at least, of a complex literary landscape. All the major nondramatic genres of subsequent cl. poetry are already in existence, but they tend to be associated with particular regions. Of these, four stand out: Ionia, Lesbos, Sparta, and Boeotia.

The Ionic-speaking region embraced the central part of the west coast of Asia Minor and the islands that stretch from there toward Greece proper. Here, the most important and longest-lasting of all Gr. and Lat. verse forms—the dactylic *hexameter (– ⏑⏑ | – ⏑⏑ | – ⏑⏑| – ⏑⏑| – ⏑⏑| – –)—seems to have achieved its definitive form. The "formulas" of which the hexameters of Homer are largely composed show elements of several Gr. dialects, but the predominant and apparently latest stratum is Ionic. It is generally inferred that the trad. of hexameter composition, after passing through the bards of one or two other dialectal regions, culminated in Ionia; and, in fact, the oldest Gr. trads. concerning Homer place him in Chios or Smyrna, cities that belong to this region. Ionia, then, was the probable birthplace of the two great epics that later Greece, and later Europe, perceived as the fountainhead of their lit., the Iliad and the Odyssey. Since the 18th c., a debate has raged over the genesis, authorship, unity, and dates of completion of these poems (see the fourth section of the bibl., esp. the intro. to Parry). But one certainty at least remains: from the earliest period, they stood as models of the poetic art, above all for the satisfying *unity of their *plots and for their brilliant technique of characterization through speeches.

Also from Ionia during this period come the first examples of *iambic and elegiac poetry (see ELEGY). In both these genres, the poems were relatively short *monologues, predominantly concerned with war, political and personal *invective, and love; but the elegiac tended more than iambic to include a gnomic element, i.e., meditation and advice on various aspects of the human condition. Metrically speaking, iambic by the ancient Gr. definition embraced poems composed in the iambic trimeter (a three-metron or, in mod. parlance, six-foot iambic line: ⏑ – ∪ – | ⏑ – ∪ – | ⏑ – ∪ –) and in the trochaic tetrameter catalectic (– ∪ – ⏑ | – ∪ – ⏑ | – ∪ – ∪ | – ∪ –). The first of these was to have a rich afterlife in cl. (and to some extent later Eur.) lit. as the standard verse form for dialogue in drama. Elegiac poetry was composed in *elegiac distiches—a dactylic hexameter followed by a dactylic *pentameter, so-called (–⏑⏑ – ⏑⏑ – | – ∪∪ – ∪∪ –); this meter also was to become an enormously important medium, not least in the epigrams of the Greek Anthology.

The most famous and, so far as the Greeks were in a position to know, the first composer in both genres was Archilochus, of the Ionic island Paros (fl. 648 BCE). Some Gr. authors actually put his poetry on a level with that of Homer, in its very different way; the intensity and metrical perfection of his surviving *fragments seem to confirm that judgment. Archilochus was also the earliest known composer of a third variety of "iambic" poetry as anciently defined, the *epode, which consisted of alternating long and short lines predominantly in iambic or dactylic meters; this was a superb instrument for invective from Archilochus to the Roman Horace. Several other iambic and elegiac poets flourished in 7th-c. Ionia, esp. Semonides, Callinus, and Mimnermus. The only distinguished elegiac poet working on the Gr. mainland during this period was Tyrtaeus (fl. ca. 640 BCE), whose martial and political poems, composed in Sparta, survive in several extensive fragments.

The poetry of the Ionian region in all its genres is remarkable for the clarity of its expression and metrical form (the repeated line and the repeated *couplet are the only options available) and for a rather sophisticated realism. For lyricism during this period, one must turn elsewhere. Gr. lyric (or *melic) poetry by the ancient definition was poetry sung to instrumental accompaniment. In practice, it fell into two broad categories: choral lyric, which was normally a dance as well as a song and might be composed in an almost infinite variety of meters and stanza forms, and solo lyric (sometimes misleadingly called personal lyric), composed for accompanied singing only, in a more limited though still extensive range of meters, and falling into short stanzas, most often quatrains. Both kinds of lyric emerge from the mists of preliteracy during this period, primarily in two centers, Aeolic-speaking Lesbos and Doric-speaking Sparta.

From the late 8th into the early 6th c., a series of choral and solo lyric poets is recorded on the isle of Lesbos. Most of them, such as Terpander and Arion, are now scarcely more than sonorous names, but Sappho and Alcaeus, who both flourished ca. 600 BCE, have left many fragments of solo lyric poetry. Both composed in approximately the same range of aeolic lyric meters (two of the most famous aeolic stanza forms, the *sapphic and the *alcaic, are named after them), and in the same soft and musical Aeolic brogue, but, in content and tone, they are vastly unlike each other. For the power and beauty of her songs of love and loss, Sappho has no peer in Gr. lit. Alcaeus's songs on the turbulent politics of the island, his hymns to the gods, and, above all, his drinking songs, crisply and forcefully composed, were to prove of great influence on later Eur. lyric.

Seventh-c. Sparta was famed for the competitions in choral lyric at its great religious festivals (see POETIC CONTESTS), but the only one of its poets about whom anything significant is known is Alcman (second half of the 7th c.). From his numerous and in some cases quite substantial fragments, it can be deduced that his choral lyrics already embodied the most striking characteristics of the choral lyric genre as it was later known. The long polymetric stanzas of his First Partheneion, e.g., its extensively narrated examples from *myth or saga, its *gnomic passages in which the singers reflect on the universal meaning of their tale, can still find parallels in Pindar and Bacchylides a couple of centuries later.

In central Greece, Boeotia in this period saw the composition of a great number of poems; only three survive complete—the Theogony, the Works and Days, and the Shield of Herakles—but a fourth, the Ehoiai or Catalogue of Women, can now be restored to a considerable extent from papyrus fragments. Both the lost and the surviving poems of the Boeotian corpus were generally ascribed in ancient times to the great Hesiod, who seems to have flourished ca. 700 BCE, but most mod. critics deny the authenticity of the Shield and several that of the Ehoiai. In any case, all are composed in a medium that is virtually indistinguishable from that of the Homeric epics: the meter is the same, almost the same formulary is employed, and the same mixture of dialects is evident. But there the resemblance ends. The Hesiodic works show nothing of the architectonic skill of Homer or of his genius for realizing character through speech. They are essentially episodic codifications of ancient lore. The Theogony presents the origin and hist. of the Greek gods, organizing the material by generations; the Ehoiai followed the hist. of the heroic families by clans and, within clans, by generations; the Works and Days is a manual of the art of living, proceeding from ethical and political considerations to practical instruction in farming, navigation, and the rules of daily conduct. But this essentially catalogic principle of composition does not mean that Hesiod lacks art. Largely through the characteristically archaic techniques of *ring composition and significant *repetition, he succeeds in making his topics and episodes cohere within themselves and between each other. In addition, it is sometimes claimed that Hesiod represents the first self-conscious authorial "I" in Eur. lit.: thus, in the *proem to the Theogony and in a couple of metapoetic passages in the Works and Days, he builds up an impressive *persona of "Hesiod." But this claim to innovation over Homer is largely a mirage of historical preservation. It seems likely that ancient *bards in performance particularized themselves and their songs in prooimia or proems adapted to a local audience. While we have lost these prooimia for Homeric epic, we have them preserved for Hesiod; hence, the apparent difference of the lofty, seemingly anonymous third-person narration of Homeric epic vs. the self-revelatory intimacy and immediacy of the Hesiodic persona. Though debate still rages on this point within mod. scholarship, it seems likely that "Hesiod" and his foolish brother "Perses" (the addressee of the Works and Days) are fictive personae adapted to the needs of the didactic genre.

Much other hexameter poetry was composed in various regions of Greece during this period; the hexameter, in fact, seems early on to have become a kind of poetic koiné. Particularly important in its time was the Epic Cycle, a catena of medium-length epics by various hands that covered the entire Troy saga. Other epics since lost are known to have told of the legendary hist. of Corinth, the story of the Argonauts, and the house of Oedipus. Other extant examples of early hexameter poetry are certain poems in the heterogeneous collection that has come down to us under the title of the Homeric Hymns: at least Hymns II (to Demeter), III (to Apollo), and V (to Aphrodite) probably belong to this period. It is a remarkable fact that by about 600 BCE all the major nondramatic genres of Gr. poetry were already in existence: heroic epic, iambic, elegiac, solo and choral lyric, and, at least in some sense, *didactic (for Hesiodic poetry, though far wider in scope than the didactic poetry of later antiquity, was certainly its inspiration).

C. The Later Archaic Period (ca. 600–480 BCE). The diversity of later archaic Gr. poetry was great, but three general trends may be distinguished: the major poetic genres become less tied to specific regions of Greece (or more "Panhellenic"), and lyric poetry in particular shows a growing sophistication, metrically as well as intellectually. Also in this period, real, historically verifiable authors and poets first emerge into the full light of hist., since, in many cases, the earlier authors' names seem to be fictions standing for the poetic trads. and genres they are said to have invented or in which they were thought to excel. Composition in epic hexameters continued in many parts of Greece; some poems of the Epic Cycle and of the Hesiodic corpus, as well as several of the Homeric hymns, probably belong to the earlier part of this period. The most significant discernible devel. is the gradual disintegration of the system of formulas characteristic of the older epics. By the late 6th c., the first tentative signs of a "literary" or "secondary" epic may perhaps be made out in the work of Panyassis of Halicarnassus, an uncle or cousin of the historian Herodotus.

An outstanding exponent of both elegiac and iambic poetry was the statesman Solon (fl. 594 BCE), the earliest recorded Athenian poet. The quite substantial fragments of his work are partly gnomic or personal in content—in this, conforming to Ionian precedent—but the majority addresses political principles and issues connected with Solon's famous reforms of the Athenian economy and constitution. Across the Aegean, Hipponax of Ephesus (fl. 540 BCE) culminated the Ionian trad. of iambic invective and lampoon. His favorite meter was one that now appears for the first time, the scazon or limping iambic trimeter (⏑ – ∪ – | ⏑ – ∪ – | ⏑ – – –; see CHOLIAMBUS). The last of the major archaic elegists, Theognis of Megara (second half of the 6th c.?), is represented by a large number of poems, predominantly gnomic in character, in the 1,300-line anthol. of elegiacs that somehow survived the Middle Ages and now goes under the title of Theognidea, the only corpus of archaic elegiac poetry to be preserved through continuous ms. transmission. Finally, the elegiac, iambic, and hexameter fragments of Xenophanes of Colophon (ca. 570–478 BCE) open a new dimension in poetry, the philosophic and scientific; his penetrating physical and ethnographic observations and his crit. of Gr. anthropomorphic religion are expressed in lively and elegant verse. The two other poet-philosophers who followed him, Parmenides and Empedocles, belong rather to the hist. of philosophy than to that of poetry.

In lyric poetry, there were spectacular devels. Papyrus discoveries of the 1970s and 1980s have greatly enriched our knowledge of Stesichorus of Himera in Sicily, who seems to have flourished in the first half of the 6th c. They fully confirm the ancient trads. that he composed songs very much in the epic manner, and even approaching the epic scale, and also that he adopted or perhaps invented the practice of composing choral lyric by triads (*strophe, metrically responding *antistrophe, nonresponding epode), which is the most striking formal characteristic of subsequent Gr. choral lyric. Ibycus of Rhegium in southern Italy (fl. ca. 535 BCE) and Simonides of the Aegean isle of Ceos (556–468) each left superb fragments of lyric. Simonides, in particular, seems to have been a great innovative master, turning his hand to many different varieties of choral lyric, incl. the epinikion (which he may have originated) and the short epigram in elegiac distiches, a form that had an immense literary future before it.

Anacreon of Teos in Ionia (ca. 575–490) brought solo lyric poetry to heights of wit and technical polish that were matched in cl. times perhaps only by the Roman poets Catullus and Horace. His many brilliant fragments sing mostly of love and wine but also occasionally flare with trenchant abuse or touch on more somber themes of old age and death. Metrically, he was not a great innovator, but he seems to have been the first poet to make extensive use of the catchy rhythm ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – –, later called the *anacreontic after him. (This meter plays a great part in the extant collection of *light verse that seems to have been continuously composed in imitation of Anacreon through the Roman and Byzantine periods; this collection, which goes under the title Anacreontea, had great popularity and influence in 16th- to 18th-c. Europe.)

The most momentous poetic devel. in this period was the introduction of poetic drama. Officially sponsored performances of tragedy at the Great Dionysia festival in Athens are first attested in ca. 534 BCE and of *comedy in 486 BCE. The ultimate origins of both genres and their hists. down to the time of the great Persian invasion of Greece in 480–79 BCE are still problematic for want of adequate evidence; the archaeological evidence and (often contradictory) ancient accounts of the origins of drama are collected in Csapo and Slater. Our extant examples of tragedy and comedy date only from the ensuing period. In antiquity, Athens proudly claimed the invention of both tragedy and comedy, but this claim was not uncontested. In fact, abundant ancient evidence suggests that many different Gr. cities may have been developing different forms of choral drama more or less simultaneously in the 6th c. BCE. Thus, Herodotus (5.67) mentions "tragic choruses" performed in honor of a cult hero in 6th-c. Sicyon in the Peloponnese, while we have reports of early comic performances in Megara, in the Gr. city of Syracuse on Sicily, and of early satyr plays in Phleius (also in the Peloponnese). It is, moreover, noteworthy that, even in Athens, almost a third of the poets whose names are preserved as practicing tragic playwrights in the 5th c. are non-Athenian. The fact that we have extant dramas from Athens alone—that Athens essentially wins this ancient contest—may have more to do with political, economic, and military factors discussed below than with issues of literary or aesthetic quality. But once developed, the arts of tragedy, comedy, and satyr play were elaborated by the Athenians with great energy and success, so that drama (along with painted pottery) became one of Athens's great export commodities. Ancient evidence suggests that, already by the last two decades of the 5th c., Attic tragedy was being performed in southern Italy (and probably many other places in the Gr. world), while the 4th c. witnessed an explosion in the building of monumental stone theaters throughout the Gr. cities of the Mediterranean that scholars have connected with the expanding performance horizons of Attic drama.

D. The High Classical Period (ca. 480–400 BCE). After the Persian Wars, Athenian power and dominance reached their peak. The years between 479 and Athens's defeat by Sparta in 404 saw the creation of a naval empire in the eastern Mediterranean, the exaction of "tribute" from the allied Gr. cities of the empire, the Periclean democracy, the erection of the great buildings and sculptures on the Acropolis—and the composition of all the surviving masterpieces of Attic tragedy. Elsewhere in Greece, choral lyric continued to be practiced with great success. Our firsthand knowledge of the tragic art depends almost exclusively on the extant plays of the three most famous Attic tragedians, Aeschylus (525–456), Sophocles (496–406), and Euripides (ca. 480–406); the earliest surviving example, Aeschylus's Persians, was produced in 472. On the strictly dramatic aspects of the art, much is to be found elsewhere (see Lesky, Goldhill). Viewed in the context of Gr. poetry, tragedy is remarkable for the manner in which it appropriated and combined so many existing poetic genres. In tragic tone, in characterization through speech, and to some extent even in plot construction, the tragedians picked up and developed precedents in Homeric epic (as Aristotle implies throughout the Poetics, e.g., 1449b17: "anybody who can tell a good tragedy from a bad one can do the same with epics"). In metrics, they owed less to the epic than to iambic, solo lyric, and choral lyric. They added little to the existing repertoire of Gr. meters but combining freely metrical elements that had previously been confined to separate genres. The result, esp. in the choral odes and the arias of tragedy, is a poetry of unprecedented richness and variety in tone, tempo, and rhythm. Fifth-c. Attic tragedy is, thus, both a synthesis of all the earlier modes of Gr. poetry and the starting point of Eur. drama.

Probably an art of such power and wide popular appeal was bound, in time, to overshadow the traditional genres of Gr. poetry, and by the end of the 5th c., this process had taken place. Elegiac and solo lyric continued to be practiced until the last few decades but only falteringly. Choral lyric alone was still able to reach great heights, but even that genre faded out of hist. with the death of Pindar of Thebes (ca. 522–443). The most famous of all the choral lyricists, Pindar was master of a great range of song types for a variety of occasions. When the Hellenistic scholars came to edit his complete poems, they grouped them under the headings of hymns*, paeans*, dithyrambs*, partheneia (songs for girl choruses), hyporchemes* (dance poems), encomia, threnoi* (death laments), and epinikia (victory *odes); the titles may not in every case have reflected Pindar's intent, but they give a vivid notion of the diapason of Gr. choral lyric. Of all these, only the Epinikia, praising the victors at the four great athletic festivals, have survived intact through direct ms. transmission. Varying in length from one to thirteen triads, these odes concentrate not so much on the transient details of the athletic success as on its significance in the divine and human cosmos: the human victory is measured against mythological precedents the evocation of which—sometimes continuously, sometimes only in brief glimpses of dazzling vividness—may occupy much of the ode.

Pindaric poetry is not easy reading. It may well have been more readily comprehensible in its original performance, when it was heard and its message was reinforced by music and choral dancing; its allusiveness, the intricacy of its word placing and metrics, and the never-failing originality and precision of its diction keep a reader in constant tension. But it is poetry of unsurpassed metaphorical richness, intensity, and visionary power. Far more accessible is the choral lyric of Bacchylides of Ceos, many of whose songs—mostly epinikion odes and dithyrambs—have been discovered on papyri in mod. times. Bacchylides was a younger contemporary of Pindar, all of whose datable poems fall within the period 485–452. Clarity and grace mark his poetry; his meters are simple and tuneful, his mythical narratives interestingly chosen, visually evocative, and delicately ambiguous.

The first extant Gr. comedy is Aristophanes' Acharnians, produced in Athens in 425. Since antiquity, it has been customary to divide the hist. of the Attic comic art into three phases: Old, Middle, and New. Old Comedy extended from the institution of the comic contests at the Great Dionysia in 486 until the opening decades of the 4th c., but most of our knowledge of it depends on Aristophanes' 11 surviving plays. Of all the poetry created by the Greeks, Old Comedy has the widest metrical and stylistic range and allows by far the freest play of fantasy. Its basic dialect is the local vernacular—colloquial Attic speech in all its vigor and explicitness, sexual and scatological. Further, the extant Aristophanic comedies display an extraordinary aptitude for the *parody of every other poetic genre, not least of tragedy. But Old Comedy's single most extraordinary feature was its total freedom to create characters and situations. In most Gr. poetry up to that time, the basic narratives and characters were drawn from the ancient myths and sagas. The majority of Old Comic plots, however, seem to have been free fictions, some of them blossoming into poetic fantasies that might embrace Hades (as in Aristophanes' Frogs) or the entire universe (as in his Birds).

The last two or three decades of this period saw a revolutionary movement in Gr. music and poetry that is known to us primarily from allusions in Old Comedy, from a partially preserved lyric text, The Persians, by Timotheus of Miletus (fl. ca. 450–360), and from some of the songs in Euripides' late plays (as well as references to it by Plato, Aristotle, and later writers on music). This seems to have been mainly a musical revolution, provoked by the increasing professionalization of musicians—esp. pipe or aulos players—that resulted from the enormous, expanding popularity of tragedy and choral dithyramb throughout the Gr. world. Professional musicians were interested in developing a freer, more virtuoso style to showcase their skills. The references to this New Music outside of Timotheus and Euripides tend to be disapproving but are clearly tendentious and ideologically driven, an elite reaction to the rise to prominence of lower-class professional musicians. In relation to poetry, the most remarkable technical features of the New Music were its abandonment of the triadic arrangement of responding stanzas that had characterized all earlier lyric verse and the opening of a split between the words and the melody of a lyric (see MUSIC AND POETRY). For the first time, the evidence suggests, one syllable, instead of being set to one note, might be extended over several notes, as in the melisma of mod. song. These and other innovations in the instrumentation and performance of poetry effectively created a permanent break with the trad. of archaic and high cl. lyric poetry that had flourished since at least the early 7th c. In terms of preservation and posterity, these New Musical experiments were ultimately undone by a hostile conservative trad. Thus, although there is evidence that the songs of Timotheus continued to be learned and performed throughout the Gr. world for six centuries (until the 3d c. CE), they failed to make the crucial transition to vellum in the late antique period and so are almost entirely lost to us. For the Greeks (and so necessarily for us), the "lyric age" ended in 450 BCE, with Pindar and Bacchylides, the last of the canonical "lyric nine."

E. The Fourth Century BCE. From the perspective of what the Greeks canonized and preserved, the outstanding event in Gr. lit. of this period is the triumph of prose. Prose as a literary medium had developed rather slowly in the outer regions of the Gr. world from the mid-6th c. BCE onward. In Athens, it did not establish itself until the second half of the 5th c.; only in the 4th c.—and above all in the works of Isocrates, Plato, Xenophon, and Aristotle—did it acquire an unchallengeable position as the medium for the exploration of the deepest human concerns, philosophical, psychological, and political. Accordingly, the poet was gradually forced from his supreme role as universal teacher into the role of, at most, entertainer. The most flourishing variety of Gr. poetry in the 4th c. was comedy. Aristophanes' last surviving play, the Ploutos or Wealth (388), is often taken to mark the transition from Old to Middle Comedy. Certainly, the relative tameness of its central comic fantasy, its drastic reduction of the chorus's role, and its almost total elimination of any lyric element all seem to have been characteristics of Middle Comedy, which is conventionally dated ca.

380–320. New Comedy (ca. 320–250) is much more accessible to us, thanks to extensive papyrus discoveries. Most of these are plays by the most famous of the New Comic poets, Menander (ca. 342–291). The New Comic plots continue the trad. of Old Comedy in that they are fictional and set in contemp. Greece, but the fictions are now much more realistic, closer to mod. romantic comedy or situation comedy. Within this frame, Menander crafts exquisite plots and creates a long series of delicately shaded character studies. The predominant meter of his comedies is the iambic trimeter. Lyric now has no place in the fabric of the comedies, although they are divided into acts (regularly, it seems, five) by pauses in the scripts marked Khorou—"[song] of a chorus"—apparently songs unrelated to the dramatic action and probably not composed by the playwright. This last traceable phase of Gr. poetic drama, through the Lat. adaptations by Plautus and Terence, was to provide the formal model for both the tragedy and comedy of Ren. Europe: the five-act play in iambic verse.

Noncomic poetry apparently continued robustly throughout the 4th c., but the preserved remnants are pitifully meager. Tragedies continued to be produced in large numbers at the Great Dionysia in Athens, though, perhaps significantly, canonization of the three great 5th-c. tragedians was already taking place through reperformance of their plays alongside new compositions. The New Music movement in lyric poetry (see above) had apparently run its course by the middle of the century. The epic and elegiac poems by Antimachus of Colophon (fl. ca. 400) had their admirers in later antiquity. But at least to the Greeks' own perception (what they considered worth canonizing and preserving), the great era of Gr. poetry (dramatic and nondramatic) that had sustained itself continuously from the preliterate period had come to an end. The stage was clear for a new kind of poetry.

F. The Hellenistic Age (ca. 300–21 BCE). In Athens, New Comedy—the last survivor of any of the publicly performed cl. genres—continued in full vigor during the earlier part of this period. Elsewhere, the circumstances and character of Gr. poetry changed radically. The conquests of Alexander the Great (d. 323) had extended the power, and with it the lang., of the Greeks into the Near and Middle East, a shift soon followed by a shift in the focuses of literary activity. The newly founded Gr. metropolises, above all Egyptian Alexandria, attracted talent of every kind from wherever Gr. was spoken. But the new poetic culture that arose in those vast cities, with their diverse mixture of Gr.-speaking immigrants and native populations, was necessarily a culture of the book; its audience was no longer the citizen in the marketplace. The result was a learned poetry of exquisite technical finish and literary allusiveness—a poetry, for the first time in this story, analogous to that of Virgil, John Milton, or T. S. Eliot. At the same time, however, the Hellenistic poets were very conscious of the need to validate the new kind of poetry by ensuring the appearance of continuity with the older Gr. poetic trad. Many of the archaic genres were now revived in form, if transfigured in scope and tone. The most versatile of the Hellenistic poets, Callimachus (active in Alexandria ca. 280–245), offers a good example of the process. His Hymns deliberately recall the Homeric hymns of archaic Greece. Yet these Callimachean counterparts are not so much acts of piety as masterpieces of delicate wit and fantasy; and more than one of them incorporates a literary evocation of the festival at which it was to be imagined as delivered. Similar imitations and transpositions are to be found in Callimachus's Iambi, where Hipponax is an acknowledged model, and in his Aetia, where he invokes the precedents of Mimnermus and Hesiod.

In this general revival of the archaic genres, it was impossible that Homer should be neglected, but he now elicited very diverse literary responses. To Callimachus and many other Hellenistic poets, notably Theocritus, the vast scale and heroic temper of Homeric epic were no longer achievable or even desirable, for these men aimed above all at brevity, polish, and realism. They devised their own brand of narrative poetry, the brief epic, adopting (with refinements) the Homeric medium, the hexameter, but limiting the scale to a few hundred lines (see EPYLLION). Within this space, there could be no question of retelling a heroic saga; rather, the poet would illuminate a single heroic episode, bringing out its full color and detail. Examples of this form are Callimachus's fragmentary Hekale, Theocritus's Idyll 13 on Herakles and Hylas, and, at a later date, Moschus's Europa. A number of Hellenistic poets, however, did compose large-scale epics, though the only one that survives is the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius, a younger contemporary of Callimachus. In its versification, its lang., and its similes, this poem abundantly testifies to Apollonius's long study of Homer, yet in content and tone it is utterly un-Homeric. Apollonius's passive and hesitant hero, Jason, belongs rather to our world than to the world of Achilles and Odysseus, and the depiction in book 3 of Medea's love for him is a breakthrough in the psychological depiction of passion, at least in the epic context.

Hesiod was the alleged model for the many didactic poems composed in the Hellenistic period, though the wide human scope of Hesiodic poetry tended to be reduced simply to the versification of this technology or that. The most notable surviving example is Aratus's Phainomena, on astronomy and meteorology. The only altogether new genre created by the Hellenistic poets (or, if not created, adapted from subliterary songs and mummings of an earlier period) was *pastoral poetry. The earliest known examples are the work of Theocritus, who was approximately a contemporary of Callimachus and Apollonius. The collection of his poems that has reached us under the title of Idylls consists of relatively short pieces, mostly in hexameters, but only a minority of them are pastorals, and one of Theocritus's most brilliant dialogue poems, Idyll 15, is set in the multicultural hubbub of Alexandria itself. Both the nonpastoral and the pastoral poems display the Callimachean preference for brevity and precise detail, but, in his control of verbal music, Theocritus may be thought to surpass even Callimachus.

The great creative impetus of Hellenistic poetry was limited to the first half of the 3d c. BCE. Thereafter, very little new ground was broken. The various genres that were then reestablished or created continued to be practiced, but the surviving examples are of little poetic significance (see ALEXANDRIANISM).

G. The Roman Imperial Period. With the battle of Actium in 31 BCE, Rome's empire over the Mediterranean and Near East was decisively established. Paradoxically, it was the Roman poets who henceforth most successfully exploited the legacy of Hellenistic Gr. poetry; the three great poems of Virgil himself, for instance, would be inconceivable but for the precedents of Hellenistic pastoral, didactic, and epic. Though a great many poems were composed in Gr. under the empire, none matches the work of the major Roman poets in intrinsic interest or influence on subsequent Eur. poetry. Thus, the trad. of ancient Gr. poetry, while competently perpetuated during this period, was gradually losing its momentum. Two slow but steady devels., one ling. and the other social, were finally to bring that trad. to an end: a change in the pronunciation of Gr., whereby quantity is replaced by stress (see ACCENT), and the triumph of the Christian imagination over the pagan. From about the beginning of the Christian era, the distinction in colloquial Gr. speech between long and short vowel quantities began to disappear, and the musical pitch accent that had prevailed since archaic times began to be replaced by a tonic stress accent similar to that of mod. Gr. or Eng. Literary Gr. poetry responded only very slowly to these changes, but by the 6th c. CE, the characteristic Byzantine versification was well established, its guiding principle no longer syllable quantity but recurrent stress accent. In this fashion, Gr. poetry gradually lost the superb metrical system that, in the hands of Pindar, the Attic tragedians, and Theocritus, had generated such an incomparable wealth and variety of verbal music. Simultaneously, Gr. poetry was also being gradually distanced from pagan mythology—from the rich intellectual and imaginative resource that had provided it with its themes since the preliterate era. As a consequence of these two devels., Gr. poetry was no more the same art. No absolute date can be set to that final transformation, and exceptions to the general trend can always be found: for instance, scholars continued to compose verses in quantitative Gr. meters down through the Middle Ages and Ren. (see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES). But, effectively, the change had taken place by the end of the 6th c. CE.

Most of the Gr. poetry that survives from the Roman imperial period falls under one of three genres: didactic, epic, and epigram. Tragedy and comedy were no longer composed, and the few known examples of lyric poetry are not very striking either in substance or metric. The didactic poets followed closely in the steps of their Hellenistic predecessors, composing versified textbooks of varying interest and merit on such subjects as geography and fishing. Epic both mythological and *panegyric (i.e., celebrating the exploits of some political figure) was very widely composed. Much the most interesting example is the Dionysiaca composed by Nonnus of Panopolis in Egypt in the early 5th c. This story of the triumphant career of Dionysus, in 48 books (matching the total number of books in the Iliad and the Odyssey), is the last major Gr. poem in hexameters.

Alone among the Gr. genres, the epigram never fell out of fashion. This kind of brief, finely worked, and pointed poem, somewhat comparable in finish and compactness to the *haiku (see RENGA) or the *heroic couplet, most often took the form of one to four elegiac distichs. The earliest examples are inscriptions (epigrammata) on gravestones or votive objects of the archaic period. During the 5th c. BCE, the form was increasingly adapted to literary purposes, and the range of its content was extended beyond the funereal and dedicatory to many other human concerns—above all, love, humor, and wine. The great surviving corpus of epigrams, the Greek Anthology, put together for the most part by the 10th c. CE, is one of the most moving and impressive of all the monuments of ancient Gr. poetry. Within it are found epigrams by most of the famous poets, and philosophers too, composed over a span of approximately 14 centuries.

II. Medieval. See BYZANTINE POETRY.

III. Modern. As Greece's modernity is dated along with national independence (1828), any discussion about lit. in the expansive terrain of the post-Byzantine period necessarily concerns poetic instances of vernacular expression and is specifically tied to the multifarious uses of the Gr. lang. The institution of mod. Gr. lit. cannot be separated from the problem of the "proper" Gr. literary lang., and it can just as easily be said that the very hist. of mod. Gr. lit. (esp. poetry) ultimately decides the thorny issue identified as "the language question." This polemic involves advocates of the formal idiom (katharevousa—a constructed form with archaic resonance that literally means "pure") against advocates of the quotidian spoken idiom (dēmotikē—demotic), a fierce battle that began in mid-19th c. and ended, in favor of the second, with 1930s *modernism, even though katharevousa remained the official state lang. until 1976. But the overarching problematic of mod. Gr. poetry also involves an array of other lang. uses, from local dialects to diasporic idioms, which enable the coincidence of numerous ling. registers, much to the benefit of poetic creativity. This gives Gr. poets an extraordinary expressive range, often impossible to render in trans.

Between the fall of Constantinople to the Ottomans (1453) and the Greek War of Independence (1821–28), literate poetry flourished mainly in Gr. lands under Venetian influence, esp. Crete. What was later named the Cretan Renaissance is standard reference to the production of poetic romances that draw a great deal on It. models but have a distinctive character. The exemplary poet of the Cretan Ren. is Vitsentzos Kornaros (1553–1613), whose genre-defining epic romance Erot- okritos—a poem of 10,000 rhyming 15-syllable iambic verses in the Cretan dialect—narrates the chivalrous love of Erotokritos for the princess Aretousa and their union after long and arduous adventures of deception and intrigue. The most recognized antecedent is the Frankish romance Paris et Vienne (1487), with additional influences traceable to Ludovico Ariosto and the Cretan folk-song trad., but Kornaros forges a poetic idiom, whose innovation, within the parameters of the Gr. lang., is broadly recognized, thanks to Gr. modernist interpretations.

In the rest of the Gr. world under Ottoman rule, poetry flourishes in the folk-song form. From the painstaking collection of folk songs by folklorist Nikolaos Politis (1852–1921), we now recognize the heyday of this anonymous popular poetic form to be the 18th c., when a vast range of improvised love songs, songs of travel, *lullabies, and *dirges comprise poetic material of profound beauty and innovation, arguably superior to any poetry in Gr. since the close of the 9th c. In terms of both form and poetic lang., the Gr. folk song proved remarkably influential, even in the most experimental of romantic and modernist expressions.

The inaugural modernity of Gr. poetry belongs to Dionysios Solomos (1798–1857). Although Solomos was established as national *poet laureate because the first two stanzas of his "Hymn to Liberty" (1823—one of few poems completed and pub. in his lifetime) became the Gr. national *anthem, he is nonetheless characterized by inimitable experimentalism in both lang. and form, having introduced into Gr. a number of Western metrical forms (sestina, ottava rima, terza rima*) that freed Gr. poetry from the compulsion toward the 15-syllable verse. As a member of the Ionian aristocracy (the Ionian islands were never under Ottoman rule), Solomos was bilingual and certainly more adept in It. than Gr. Because of his struggle with the Gr. lang., he wrote in dēmotikē, itself a groundbreaking gesture in the devel. of mod. Gr. poetry. He was influenced philosophically by G.W.F. Hegel and Ger. *romanticism and, in literary terms, by cl. It. and his sparse knowledge of the Gr. folk-song trad. His Gr. poetic oeuvre is comprised of an extraordinary series of fragments and voluminous marginal notes in It., the ensemble constituting an as yet unmatched experiment in poetic modernity. Solomos's idiosyncratically inventive way of creating composite words in several ling. registers makes trans. exceedingly difficult. The pinnacle of Solomos's achievements is The Free Besieged, a long unfinished poem drafted between 1833 and 1847 in several versions that include rhymed 15-syllable and *free verse, single-verse fragments, interspersed prose, and a theoretical preamble—all experimenting with lyric, epic, and dramatic styles in order to capture the atmosphere of the heroic resistance and exodus of Messolonghi (1826) during the Greek War of Independence. Messolonghi, as the site of Lord Byron's demise, also inspired Solomos to a series of odes and fragments in Byronic style.

The other groundbreaking poet of this era, Andreas Kalvos (1792–1869), was also Ionian, and he, too, wrote his first texts (tragedies and dramatic monologues) in It. Later in life, he also wrote prose texts in Eng., having spent a good part of his life in England as a country squire. His only poetic output in Gr. is a book of Odes and Lyrics (1826), which was rejected by the Gr. intelligentsia of his day but granted him instant recognition in Fr. trans. Kalvos, too, is characterized by an idiosyncratic poetics that combines archaic and demotic metrics and ling. registers to produce an unusual manner, simultaneously stern and sentimental, intellectual and lyric, pagan and traditionally romantic. Kalvos's influence is traced explicitly in various modernist and contemp. experiments (notably the prosody movement of the 1990s), but his poetic legacy continues to produce vehement disputes. Both Solomos and Kalvos (like C. P. Cavafy later) wrote outside the national territory and in idiomatic Gr., prompting George Seferis to claim in 1936 that the inauguration of contemp. Gr. poetics belonged to "our three great deceased poets who did not know Greek."

In the aftermath of national independence, canonical Gr. romanticism flourishes in Athens, at the heart of national-cultural and intellectual life. The founder of the romantic school of Athens was Alexandros Soutsos (1803–63), a fervent admirer of Victor Hugo and Byron, whose exuberant romantic and patriotic writings, however, do not capture the spirit of their models. Though he was terse and vigorous as a satirist, Soutsos exercised a stultifying influence on Gr. poetry. Most representatives of this school were bound to an exaggerated romanticism, using a stilted formal idiom (katharevousa) for painstakingly patriotic poetry. Achilleas Paraschos (1838–95) is the leading figure in the last period of the school. His contemporaries were all overshadowed by his reputation, in spite of the greater sincerity and more delicate technique of many of their works. Some of them have come to be appreciated in recent years—Demetrios Paparrhegopoulos (1843–73) as a refined lyricist, Alexandros Vyzantios (1841–98) as sharp-witted satirist, and Georgios Vizyenos (1849–96) as the most important 19th-c. innovator of the short-story form.

About 1880, a young group of poets, influenced by the virulent crit. of Emmanuel Roidis (1836–1904), a brilliant novelist and public intellectual, formed the New School of Athens. They aspired to become the Gr. Parnassians (see PARNASSIANISM), masters of a restrained and objective art. The central figure was Kostis Palamas (1859–1943), a man of wide learning whose works blended not only the ancient and mod. Gr. trads. but the social and spiritual convulsions of the late 19th and early 20th cs. The Dodecalogue of the Gypsy (1907) is perhaps his crowning achievement. Its hero, the Gypsy musician, a symbol of freedom and art, gradually deepens into the patriot, the Greek, and finally the Hellene—citizen and teacher of the world. This powerful epic-lyric, together with The King's Flute (1910), a historical epic, and Life Immovable (1904), the most important of his lyric collections, solidified an enormous influence both on contemporaries of the school and their immediate successors. The poets of this generation should be credited for introducing *symbolism and free verse into Gr. poetry, much to the benefit of their 20th-c. counterparts.

Yet arguably the greatest poet of the mod. Gr. trad. remained untouched by Palamas's influence. C. P. Cavafy (1863–1933) was an Alexandrian by both birth and sensibility. His inimitable achievement was the creation of a mythical world of diasporic Hellenism characterized by *irony, eroticism, and a tragic vision that celebrates those who gracefully deviate from the norm or singularly embody what is fleeting and irreproducible or face disaster with honest self-awareness. Cavafy's mythographic universe parallels those fashioned by eminent contemporaries (W. B. Yeats, Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot) and has thus gained him a place in the pantheon of modernist poetry worldwide. Cavafy wrote both historical and lyric poetry with equally erotic sensibility and, more than any other Gr. poet, he can be said to embody a pagan spirit, unperturbed by the social and cultural institutions of his day. He remained uninterested in publishing and preferred to distribute his poetry in folios he variously assembled on his own, following no chronological order. He is, thus, quintessentially modernist in disregarding both the commercial sphere and the establishment of a legacy.

Cavafy exercised no influence on his contemporaries, although his influence on subsequent generations to this day is unsurpassed. The most significant of early 20th-c. poets succeeded in distinguishing themselves from the dominance of Palamas's poetics. Kostas Varnalis (1884–1974) rivals Palamas as a socially conscious poet, the first to bear a strong political voice and the inaugural figure in the long trad. of 20th-c. leftist poetics. Less directly influential but more poetically significant is Kostas Karyotakis (1896–1928). A complex man of great talent and fragile sensibility, Karyotakis wrote lyric and satirical poems with equal skill: witness Elegies and Satires (1927). His unfortunate liaison with the lyric poet Maria Polydouri (1902–30), his rejection of bourgeois patriotic propriety, and his subsequent suicide were later recognized to reflect a poetic sensibility of unusual daring, reversing belief that he epitomized the Gr. malaise of post-Asia Minor Catastrophe (1922). Counterposed to Karyotakis's sensibility is Angelos Sikelianos (1884–1952). Powerfully elegiac, Sikelianos construes Gr. nature and hist. in both Apollonian light and Dionysian mystery. With a rich diction and avowedly Delphic spirit, the natural landscape, the human form, and abstract thought are all brought into clear-cut relief in exceedingly singular lyrical form. Additionally, Nikos Kazantzakis (1885–1957), renowned as a novelist, deserves mention for the most conceptually daring work of his time: a formidable 33,333-line mod. sequel to the Odyssey (1938), written in Cretan dialect and radical (bordering on artificial) dēmotikē, in which the Odyssean hero, haunted by Nietzschean nihilism, searches for existential salvation in an incessant journey through various modes of thought.

The modernist movement, known as the Generation of the 1930s, having reconfigured the terms of the entire mod. Gr. poetic trad., still exercises a catalytic influence. Accordingly, it produced two Nobel Prize winners, George Seferis (1963) and Odysseus Elytis (1979), and the Lenin Prize recipient Yiannis Ritsos (1977); all three poets saw their work set to music by the composer Mikis Theodorakis in a gesture that brought the sensibility of Gr. modernism to a broad public. Seferis (1900–71) ushers a style, method, and vision in conversation with Eliot and Paul Valéry, by casting the mod. predicament in a Gr. literary landscape that encompasses ancient epic and tragic poetics, the Cretan Ren., and the entire demotic trad. in order to produce a new mythical lang. in dramatic free verse, rich in nuance while spare in decoration, which poeticizes a Gr. psyche in the midst of a ruined past to be overcome. This poetic project enhanced with carefully timed publications of literary essays, over a 30-year period, which sealed Seferis's unparalleled hegemonic influence on Gr. letters. Similarly committed to the project of Gr. modernism but in an entirely different style, Elytis (1911–96) wielded his influence more by virtue of a lyrical technique that crafts a personal mythology in celebration of the natural-material features of the Gr. imagination. Initially following a surrealist juxtaposition of disparate images in flamboyant lyricism, Elytis's gravity is measured by the intricate poetics of Axion Esti (1960), an extended secular hymn that draws on Gr. Orthodox liturgy, 19th-c. demotic trad., dramatic prose, and historical material from World War II to sculpt and praise the spiritual dimension of the Gr. psyche in the world of the senses.

Gr. *surrealism in this generation (in direct association with its Fr. strains) is exemplified by Andreas Embeirikos (1901–75), who was also the first Gr. psychoanalyst and who wrote in exceedingly ornate lang., occasionally adopting *archaisms with unabashed relish; and Nikos Engonopoulos (1910–85), who was also the most radical and yet most representative painter of his generation. Initially of this group, Nikos Gatsos (1911–92), who published only one poetry book in his lifetime, the sumptuous Amorgos (1943), is nonetheless considered one of the most influential figures of this generation because of his production of several hundred song lyrics, written with remarkable skill, imagination, and grace (and set to music by many Gr. composers, notably Manos Hatzidakis) that singlehandedly raised the genre to a high art form. Certainly worth mentioning here is Giorgos Sarantaris (1908–41), whose hapless death brought to an unjust end the work of the most important philosopher-poet in 20th-c. Greece.

The magnitude of this generation is sealed by Ritsos (1909–90), who, along with Cavafy and Seferis, is the most influential Gr. poet worldwide. An inordinately prolific poet, Ritsos excelled in several forms: traditional folk metrics (Epitaphios, 1936), long-form dramatic verse (Moonlight Sonata, 1956), and short, sparse object-oriented poems (Gestures, 1972), as well as a variety of theatrical and prose pieces. What unites these concerns is an overt political voice, for which Ritsos was exiled and interned in concentration camps for most of his life as an avowed communist. Ritsos favors tragic landscapes, where the old gods no longer survive, while dispossessed humans, wounded and still threatened by the civilization they inhabit in ruined cities and arid plains, envision alternate universes in material household details, dreamlike encounters, and new myths.

Ritsos's figure permeates the post-Civil War generation of leftist poets, who wrote in conditions of persecution what was named the poetry of defeat: poetry of profound irony and self-critique against the backdrop of the bleakest landscape, where glimpses of real friendship provide the only possible resistance. This reticent poetry of extreme talent, sensitivity, and responsibility is exemplified by Manolis Anagnostakis (1925–2005), Aris Alexandrou (1928–78), Tasos Leivaditis (1922–88), and Titos Patrikios (b. 1928). Also writing in this period, Miltos Sahtouris (1919–2005), Nikos Karouzos (1926–90), and Eleni Vakalo (1921–2001) are three major poets who work in a postsurrealist mode but cannot be categorized. Sahtouris paints nightmare dreamscapes of a world that appears to have survived the destruction of humanity, often with characteristic humor. Karouzos favors a highly personal idiom, sometimes cryptically invoking a pre-Socratic sense of the universe. Vakalo, also the premier art critic of her time, engages in a self-conscious poetry of the object, which implicates a beautifully open-ended, if stark, poetic persona.

The generation following, known as the Generation of the 1970s, wrote out of the experience of the Gr. Junta years (1967–74) and in the atmosphere of global youth culture, in the aftermath of an internationalist antiestablishment poetics that spans the range from *Beat poetry to rock-music aesthetics. This uncategorizable poetry incorporated a generally irreverent attitude toward bourgeois consumerist complacency by exploiting the full riches of colloquial speech, incl. imported terms and commercial monikers, and calling into question all orthodox beliefs and established positions, incl. gender roles and dogmatic political commitments. The tendency was to elucidate a bereft and absurd world in a lang. as contemporary as the drifting scene it depicted. Of the great number of poets in this generation, who emerged (often to submerge again in silence or long absence), it is worth noting, not as representative but by virtue of singular achievement and uniqueness, Dimitris Kalokyris (b. 1948), whose additional inordinate talents as storyteller, artist, art designer, pioneering publisher, and translator of Jorge Luis Borges are encapsulated in a poetry of magical effect; Maria Laina (b. 1947), who perfected a subtle, laconic, yet pulsating lyricism; and Dionysis Kapsalis (b. 1952), whose theoretical learning, studious contemplation of even minor traditional elements, and unequaled skill in the rhythmic use of the Gr. lang. (evident in his trans. of Emily Dickinson and Shakespeare's sonnets) pioneered a contemp. return to metrics.

The proliferation of poetic writing worldwide, aided by electronic media even if in the context of poetry's increasing irrelevance to popular art, renders all assessment of contemp. poetic production in Greece difficult. Yet there is no doubt that, of all literary forms, poetry has wielded the most decisive force in mod. Gr. culture. This gravity cannot be outmaneuvered. In the end, the future of Gr. literary expression will be waged on the permutations of continuing to fashion Gr. poetic lang., in whatever form this is to be actualized.

See CHORUS, CLASSICAL POETICS, CLASSICAL PROSODY, CLASSICISM, DRAMATIC POETRY, LATIN POETRY, NARRATIVE POETRY, TRAGICOMEDY.

■ Classical. Anthologies: Greek Lyric Poetry, ed. D. Campbell (1982)—Gr. text and commentary; Penguin Book of Greek Verse, ed. C. A. Trypanis, 3d ed. (1988); Hellenistic Poetry (1990) and Archaic Greek Poetry (1992), both ed. and trans. B. Fowler; Greek Lyric Poetry, ed. G. Hutchinson (2001)—Gr. text and commentary. Bibliographies: L'Année Philologique: Bibliographie critique et analytique de l'antiquité gréco-latine 1–(1927–), http://www.annee-philologique.com/aph/. Criticism and History: D. L. Page, Sappho and Alcaeus (1955); A. E. Harvey, "The Classification of Greek Lyric Poetry," CQ n.s. 5 (1955); W. B. Stanford, The Sound of Greek (1967); Parry; F. Cairns, Generic Composition in Greek and Roman Poetry (1972); K. J. Dover, Aristophanic Comedy (1972); M. L. West, "Greek Poetry 2000–700 BCE," CQ 23 (1973); and Studies in Greek Elegy and Iambus (1974); H. F. Fränkel, Early Greek Poetry and Philosophy, trans. M. Hadas and J. Willis (1975); W. G. Arnott, "Introduction," Menander, v. 1 (1979)—comedy; R. Janko, Homer, Hesiod, and the Hymns (1982); T. G. Rosenmeyer, The Art of Aeschylus (1982); A. P. Burnett, Three Archaic Poets (1983); M. Griffith, "Personality in Hesiod," Classical Antiquity 2 (1983); A. Lesky, Greek Tragic Poetry, trans. M. Dillon (1983); A. P. Burnett, The Art of Bacchylides (1985); T. Figueira and G. Nagy, Theognis of Megara (1985); J. Herington, Poetry into Drama (1985); E. L. Bowie, "Early Greek Elegy, Symposium and Public Festival," JHS 106 (1986); E. Bundy, Studia Pindarica, 2d ed. (1986); S. Goldhill, Reading Greek Tragedy (1986); G. F. Else, Plato and Aristotle on Poetry (1987); M. W. Edwards, Homer (1987); H. White, Studies in Late Greek Epic Poetry (1987); B. Gentili, Poetry and Its Public in Ancient Greece, trans. A. T. Cole (1988); G. O. Hutchinson, Hellenistic Poetry (1988); R. Lamberton, Hesiod (1988); R. Hamilton, The Architecture of Hesiodic Poetry (1989); R. P. Martin, The Language of Heroes (1989)—Iliad; A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, The Dramatic Festivals of Athens, 2d ed. (1989); G. Nagy, "Hesiod and the Poetics of Pan-Hellenism," Greek Mythology and Poetics (1990); S. Goldhill, The Poet's Voice (1991); L. Kurke, The Traffic in Praise (1991)—Pindar and choral lyric; J. Redfield, Nature and Culture in the "Iliad," 2d ed. (1994); A. Cameron, Callimachus and His Critics (1995); E. Csapo and W. J. Slater, The Context of Ancient Drama (1995); P. DuBois, Sappho Is Burning (1995); D. Konstan, Greek Comedy and Ideology (1995); M. Detienne, The Masters of Truth in Archaic Greece, trans. J. Lloyd (1996); R. Hunter, Theocritus and the Archaeology of Greek Poetry (1996); G. Nagy, Poetry as Performance (1996); F. I. Zeitlin, Playing the Other (1996); E. Bakker, Poetry in Speech (1997)—Homer; E. Stehle, Performance and Gender in Ancient Greece (1997); M. L. West, The East Face of Helicon (1997); A. Carson, Eros the Bittersweet, 2d ed. (1998); K. Gutzwiller, Poetic Garlands (1998)—

Hellenistic epigrams; D. Selden, "Alibis," Classical Antiquity 17 (1998); A. Carson, Economy of the Unlost (1999); G. Nagy, Best of the Achaeans, 2d ed. (1999); S. Stephens, Seeing Double (2003)—Hellenistic poetry in Egyptian context; E. Csapo, "The Politics of the New Music," Music and the Muses, ed. P. Murray and P. Wilson (2004); C. A. Faraone, The Stanzaic Architecture of Early Greek Elegy (2008); D. J. Mastronarde, The Art of Euripides (2010). General Histories: CHCL, v. 1; A. Lesky, History of Greek Literature, 2d ed. (1996). Primary Texts: Bibliotheca Teubneriana series (1888–)—crit. texts without trans.; Loeb Classical Library series (1912–)—texts, with facing trans., of all the major poets, incl. D. A. Campbell, Greek Lyric 5 v. (1982–93); D. E. Gerber, Greek Elegiac Poetry; and Greek Iambic Poetry (both 1999); Callimachus, ed. R. Pfeiffer, 2 v. (1949); Theocritus, ed. A.S.F. Gow, 2 v. (1950); D. L. Page, Poetae Melici Graeci (1962); M. L. West, Iambi et Elegi Graeci ante Alexandrum cantati, 2d ed. (1989–92); Oxford Classical Texts series (1980–)—good critical texts without trans. Prosody: Wilamowitz; Dale; Halporn et al; Snell; West.

■ Modern. Anthologies: Anthologia 1708–1933, ed. E. N. Apostolidis (n.d.); Modern Greek Poems, trans. T. Stephanidis and G. Katsimbalis (1926); Eklogai apo ta tragoudia tou Hellenikou Laou, ed. N. Politis, 3d ed. (1932); Modern Greek Poetry, trans. K. Friar (1973); Voices of Modern Greece, trans. E. Keeley and P. Sherrard (1981); Greek Poetry: New Voices, ed. D. Connolly (1999); A Century of Greek Poetry 1900–2000, ed. P. Bien et al. (2004); The Greek Poets: Homer to the Present, ed. P. Constantine et al. (2009). Criticism and History: P. Sherrard, The Marble Threshing Floor (1956); G. Seferis, On the Greek Style: Selected Essays in Poetry and Hellenism, trans. R. Warner and T. D. Frangopoulos (1966); M. Vitti, Storia della letterature Neogreca (1971); C. T. Dimaras, A History of Modern Greek Literature, trans. M. Gianos (1972); L. Politis, A History of Modern Greek Literature, trans. R. Liddell, 2d ed. (1975); A. Karantones, Eisagoge ste neoteri poiese, 4th ed. (1976); R. Beaton, Folk Poetry of Modern Greece (1980); Z. Lorenzatos, The Lost Center (1980); E. Keeley, Modern Greek Poetry: Voice and Myth (1983); D. Tziovas, The Nationism of the Demoticists (1986); G. Jusdanis, The Poetics of Cavafy (1987); V. Lambropoulos, Literature as National Institution (1988); D. Ricks, The Shade of Homer (1989); S. Gourgouris, Dream Nation (1996); D. Dimiroulis, O poiētēs ōs ethnos (1997); K. Van Dyck, Kassandra and the Censors (1998); D. Holton, Literature and Society in Renaissance Crete (2006).

C. J. Herington, L. Kurke (Cl.); E. Keeley, S. Gourgouris (Mod.)

GREGUERÍA. This Sp. word, which originally meant "confused outcry or vociferation," was used by the Sp. avant-garde writer Ramón Gómez de la Serna to designate short, witty prose texts he began producing around 1910. After Gómez de la Serna, many other writers cultivated this genre, incl. members of the Sp. poetic Generation of 1927. Gómez de la Serna first published stand-alone greguerías in periodicals and later as book-length collections. They are also the basic structure of many of his essays, short stories, biographies, novellas, and novels. Greguerías display a wide variety of forms and techniques and address many subjects, which makes the task of classification risky and endless. Some approaches have treated the greguería as an entirely new genre; others see it as related to aphorisms, proverbs, and maxims; still others have emphasized its humorous and imagistic or metaphoric qualities. The polymorphous nature of the greguería seems to defy all monolithic approaches. Some greguerías are related to the Spanish baroque, specifically to conceptismo and Baltasar Gracián's agudeza*, roughly equivalent to the Eng. notions of *conceit or *wit. They are also analogous to the romantic notion of the *fragment and to 20th-c. *imagism. Many of Gómez de la Serna's greguerías create witty *metaphors whose terms are dissimilar objects in the world, employing the form of the apposition (A:B): "Poplar: tree with green butterflies"; "Owl: feathered cat"; "Microphone: everyone's ear." Others exploit uncomplicated and humorous visual assocs. of letters and numbers: "8 is the hourglass of the digits"; "B is the wet nurse of the alphabet"; "The swan is the capital S of the lake's poem"; "q is p coming back from a stroll." Some constitute complex puns and alliterative word games: "Idem is a thrifty word"; "Wednesday: a long day by definition"; "Reminiscence: ruminating recollections." A vast number consists simply of striking concrete *images, mostly visual or synaesthetic, that combine sound, smell, and tactile sensations: "A tapping on the strainer: orange juice"; "Velvet of silence"; "Violets give off blue perfume" (see SYNAESTHESIA).

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

■ R. L. Jackson, "Toward a Classification of the 'Greguería,'" Hispania 48 (1964); R. Gómez de la Serna, Greguerías: Selección 1910–1960, ed. S. Prieto Delgado (1977); M. Durán, "Origen y función de la greguería," Studies on Ramón Gómez de la Serna, ed. N. Dennis (1988); Aphorisms: Ramón Gómez de La Serna, trans. M. González-Gerth (1989); W. Redfern, "Greguerías: Squeals/Pipsqueaks? The Work of Ramón Gómez de la Serna," Verbatim 28 (2003); "Greguerías by Ramón Gómez de la Serna," Translation: A Translation Studies Journal 1, trans. O. Cisneros (2005).

O. Cisneros

GUARANÍ POETRY. Though spoken in neighboring countries, Guaraní is present primarily in Paraguay, where, unique among Amerindian langs., it is the majority tongue of a nonindigenous and mestizo population of several million.

Of the considerable lit. in Guaraní, poetry is the dominant genre and the one that most exhibits Paraguay's historical spectrum from indigenous to nonindigenous. As sacred indigenous song of ñe'ẽ (word/soul), poetry has been present from the beginning, explaining and celebrating a vast cosmology that flows from the moment when Ñamandu Ru Ete (True Father Ñamandu) set life in motion by forming in himself the foundation of the word. Paralleling this trad., a corpus of campesino oral verse also developed in the colonial period, expressed often in the Guaraní-Sp. blend known as jopara, with a frequent focus on Christian religious themes.

Unfortunately, much remains unknown about this orature, and it was not accompanied by a significant written counterpart until after the catastrophic War of the Triple Alliance (1864–70), when Guaraní assumed greater importance as an emblem of nationalism. The decades between 1870 and the Chaco War against Bolivia (1932–35) saw themes of nature, love, war, and poverty woven into verse by Narciso R. Colmán, Manuel Ortiz Guerrero, Emiliano Fernández, and others. Following Paraguay's victory in the Chaco War, Guaraní's role in lit. expanded. Poets of the mid-20th c., among them Darío Gómez Serrato, Pedro Encina Ramos, Epifanio Méndez Fleitas, and Teodoro Mongelós, elaborated their predecessors' themes while adding distinctive experiments with rhyme, phrasing, and lineation.

The hardships of the Alfredo Stroessner dictatorship (1954–89) and the post-Stroessner period have seen considerable efforts to define a Guaraní poetics rooted in campesino life and Paraguay's diverse heritage. Protagonists in this effort have included Gumersindo Ayala Aquino, Félix de Guarania, Juan Maidana, Carlos Martínez Gamba, Lino Trinidad Sanabria, and Rudi Torga, all of whom use the Guaraní lang. as a conduit to express Paraguay's authentic teko (character).

What role Paraguay's indigenous heritage plays in this teko continues to be debated. The anthropological writings of Kurt Unkel Nimuendaju and León Cadogan concerning, respectively, the concepts of Yvy Marae'y (the Land without Evil) and ayvu rapyta (the basis of language) have encouraged much discussion. Whereas writers such as Encina Ramos used Eur.-inspired prosody to romanticize Guaraní mythology, recent poets like Susy Delgado, Ramón Silva, and Zenón Bogado Rolón have sought a deeper synthesis. They and others, incl. Miguelángel Meza, Feliciano Acosta, and Mario Rubén Álvarez, continue to explore the singular capacity of Guaraní to express Paraguay's particular confluence of cultures.

See COLONIAL POETICS; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

■ T. Méndez-Faith, Breve diccionario de la literatura paraguaya (1996); Poesía paraguaya de ayer y de hoy: tomo II, guaraní-español, ed. T. Méndez-Faith (1997); Antología de las mejores poesías en guaraní, ed. R. Torga (1998); F. Acosta, Ñe'ẽporãhaipyre guaraní, literatura guaraní (2000); Forjadores del Paraguay: Diccionario biográfico (2000); Antología de la poesía culta y popular en guaraní, ed. R. Bareiro Saguier and C. Villagra Marsal (2007); Literatura oral y popular del Paraguay, ed. S. Delgado and F. Acosta (2008); Portal Guaraní, http://www.portalguarani.com/autores.

T. K. LEWIS

GUATEMALA, POETRY OF

I. The Precolonial Period to the Nineteenth Century
II. The Mainstream Tradition (1920s–2010)
III. New Women's and Indigenous Poetry in Guatemala

I. The Precolonial Period to the Nineteenth Century. Poetry in Guatemala has served as a vehicle of emergent national expression, with the marked limitation that a great part of Guatemala's population has been made up of non-Sp.-speaking Indian peoples whose writings have disappeared. Even the Popol Vuh, the most important work in the Quiché lang. and a veritable storehouse of images that constantly reemerged in the poetry of the 20th c., was written after the arrival of the conquistador Pedro de Alvarado. The Rabinal Achí, a dramatic work involving dance and poetry, is thought to date from the 15th c. The administrative seat of Spain's Central Am. colonial rule, Guatemala dominated regional discourse for over 400 years, generating a canon of lit. based on Eur. models and centered on prose. From the 16th to the 19th c., poetic production took forms such as the villancico*, the sainete, the jácara, the tonada*, and the cantata, with poets such as Rafael Antonio Castellanos (ca. 1725–91) and Manuel José de Quirós (ca. 1765–90) writing music as well as verse.

In the 18th c., Rafael Landívar (1731–93) wrote his Rusticatio mexicana (1782) in Lat.; and in the early 19th, the Sp.-born Pepita Garcia Granados (1781–1845) broke religious and sexual taboos with her scandalous, salacious verse, while José Batres Montúfar (1809–44), influenced by Eur. *romanticism, wrote verse of satire, irony, wit, and political commentary. However, while the Nicaraguan modernist Rubén Darío drew on Fr. symbolism as opposed to the Sp. trad., to provoke a virtual revolution involving an aesthetically driven poetry, called modernismo, in much of Latin America and extending back to Spain, Guatemala's most important modernistas, Enrique Gómez Carrillo (1873–1927) and Rafael Arévalo Martínez (1884–1975), as well as most later Guatemalan writers, were better known for their prose than for their poetry.

II. The Mainstream Tradition (1920s–2010). The vanguardismo movement, Latin America's response to Eur. and U.S. avant-garde trends, saw the emergence of the first two Guatemalan poets of international stature, Miguel Ángel Asturias (1899–1974) and Luis Cardoza y Aragón (1901–92), both of whom began their careers as students living in Paris, studying pre-Columbian culture and absorbing the fashionable literary trends in the city's émigré community during the post-World War I period. The two writers shared an interest in *primitivism, *surrealism, and other avant-garde movements, as well as in Indian themes (indigenismo) that they related to such political themes as Central Am. unionism and democratic reforms. While Cardoza was perhaps Guatemala's greatest poet, bringing surrealism to bear on Latin Am. themes, he is better known for his memoirs and his essays on Guatemalan hist. and culture, as well as on the Mexican mural movement, esp. during his long period of exile in Mexico after the 1954 military coup in his native country. Asturias, a Nobel Prize laureate mainly known for his novels, became the most famous of the vanguardistas. While most of his poetry is forgotten, his work often figures in discussions of the representation of Mayan life and culture in contemp. Guatemalan lit.

The 1930s saw a growing emphasis on indigenismo in the work of Grupo Tepeus and other writers. The key figure was novelist Mario Monteforte Toledo (1911–2003), but the leading poets were Alfredo Balsells Rivera (1904–40) and Oscar Mirón Álvarez (1910–38), who frequently wrote on life in Guatemala City under the dictatorship of Jorge Ubico (1931–44).

The October Revolution of 1944 led to Juan José Arévalo's reform government (1945–51) and a new poetry alive to the moment. Inspired by Pablo Neruda's most militant poetry, Enrique Juárez Toledo (1910–99), Raúl Leiva (1916–74), and Otto Raúl González (1921–2007) formed Grupo Acento (Focus Group). Some years later, several group members joined Saker-ti, a literary-cultural group comprised mainly of young students and cultural workers, which sought to create a "democratic, nationalist and realist art" just as Jacobo Árbenz came to power (1951). Saker-ti included the poets Miguel Ángel Vazquez (b. 1922), Julio Fausto Aguilera (b. 1929), Melvin René Barahona (1931–65), Augusto Monterroso (1921–2003), and Carlos Illescas (1918–98), while the group's leading ideologue was the left-wing activist and polemicist Huberto Alvarado (1927–74). But the U.S.-supported coup of 1954 led to the silence or exile of many of the writers, some of whom pursued their work in Mexico and elsewhere.

With the 1954 coup, La Generación Comprometida (the Committed Generation) emerged in the 1960s as a new group of writers who questioned both U.S. imperialism and the political consensus represented by the October Revolution. Repudiating Asturias for accepting an ambassadorship in France, the group adopted his motto "the poet is a form of moral behavior" in their argument for poetry in the name of armed struggle. Otto René Castillo (1934–67) became the leader of the group, and his poem "Intelectuales apolíticos" (Apolitical Intellectuals) served as their poetic manifesto. Castillo's poetry, framed by simple metrical forms and emotionally direct lang., is more lyrical and metaphorical than epic and historical. In this, he typified his generation's reaction against the grand Nerudian model of political poetry, and the group's turn to a conversational tone popular in the early years of the Cuban Revolution. Castillo's book Vámonos patria a caminar (Let's Go!, 1965) contains themes of love and commitment, injustice and tragedy, revolutionary hope and death—incl. the premonition of his own end (he was executed by the military in 1967)—as part of the process leading to social transformation.

Meanwhile, poets such as Edwin Cifuentes (b. 1926), Arturo Palencia (1931–81), and Marco Antonio Flores (b. 1937) explored themes of alienation, conquest, subjugation, and rebellion. Gradually disillusioned with the Left in the late 1960s, Flores turned from poetry to the acidic, disenchanted prose fiction represented by his novel Los compañeros (Comrades, 1976). However, three poets of La Generación Comprometida—Luis Alfredo Arango (b. 1936), Francisco Morales Santos (b. 1940), and Roberto Obregón (b. 1946)—joined three older writers—Antonio Brañas (1920–98), Fausto Aguilera (b. 1928), and José Luis Villatoro (1932–98)—and one younger woman writer, Delia Quiñónez (b. 1946), to form the group El Nuevo Signo (The New Sign) in 1968.

The Nuevo Signo poets explored the crisis of conscience in the face of militarized society, lending their poetry a testimonial and denunciatory function. They sought to identify alternatives to continued military rule and explored the lang. and themes of the rural Guatemalan experience. Several members of the group came from poor, rural backgrounds and tended to focus on peasant themes. But Nuevo Signo's poetry was also a response to previous indigenist discourse in Guatemala. In place of Asturias's "lyric exaltation" of Indian and pre-Columbian myth and Castillo's celebration of Mayan roots, the Nuevo Signo writers strove for a more sober treatment of Indian realities.

Obregón began to publish in his teens, when he went to study in Moscow. In 1970, working with the guerrillas, he was "disappeared" by a Salvadoran army patrol. His surviving poetry exhibits a flair for dramatic and extreme metaphors centered on blood and fire, death and rebirth. Most of the Nuevo Signo writers tried to avoid partisan poetry, however, electing instead to explore the broader forces operating in Guatemalan society, with Arango emerging as the crucial master poet of his generation and Morales as the group's leading spokesperson. Nuevo Signo poets also sought to explore complex states of subjectivity while observing the 1960s idea that the personal is political.

Headed by Manuel José Arce (1935–85) and Carlos Zipfel (b. 1937) and joined by Margarita Carrera (b. 1929), Luz Méndez de la Vega (b. 1919), and others, Grupo Moira represented cosmopolitan, modernizing concerns defined by their interest in existentialist, psychological, and aesthetic themes. Arce and Zipfel were major lyric poets in the intimist mode. Before his death in 1985, Arce produced a remarkable body of political poetry. Meanwhile, Carrera and Méndez cultivated Freudian and feminist perspectives that opened the way to a serious body of women's poetry.

Two literary groups—La Galera (The Galley) and Grupo Literario Editorial RIN-78—emerged in the wake of the 1976 earthquake and continued military rule. Incl. writers such as Luis Eduardo Rivera (b. 1949), Roberto Monzón (1948–92), Otoniel Martínez (b. 1953), and Aida Toledo (b. 1952) and heralded by Enrique Noriega Jr.'s (b. 1949) ¡Oh banalidad! (1975), La Galera rejected the lit. of political denunciation and national transformation, expressing disillusionment with life in the nation and the lit. expressing it and valorizing poetry, aesthetics, and bohemianism.

Under Efrain Ríos Montt's dictatorship, several writers of varying political tendencies joined together in a kind of literary popular front to maintain a culture of writing and publishing activities in a period of retrenchment. Taking on the name of Grupo Literario Editorial RIN-78, the project included poets associated with Nuevo Signo and the new feminist poetry, as well as younger writers. The term RIN came from a Japanese *ideogram standing for unity, toleration, and diversity. Thus, the group did not attempt to articulate any particular political ideology but rather outlined goals that were "cultural and promotional." In a short period, they produced 36 books, incl. 15 of poetry.

After the failed military coup against the reformist government of Marco Vinicio Cerezo in 1987, a new group emerged playfully calling itself La Rial Academia (i.e., not the Royal [Real] but the Laughable Academy) and dedicating itself to attacking RIN-78's neutrality. While several of its members wrote about poetry, René Leiva (b. 1947) was one of the few to publish volumes of verse.

III. New Women's and Indigenous Poetry in Guatemala. There are some antecedents for women's poetry in 20th-c. Guatemalan lit. hist. Luz Valle (1896–1971), Magdelena Spinola (1886–1975), Romelia Alarcón de Folgar (1900–70), and Alaide Foppa (1914–80) were prominent women writers who sought to rise above the quietistic "feminine as opposed to feminist" mode of the upper-class poetisa model prevalent in Central America. Antimilitary resistance emerging among Guatemalan women poets of the 1970s would change that identification dramatically. A well-known feminist, Foppa became a political force in life and poetry after her children were disappeared and until she herself was disappeared in 1980. The youngest member of Nuevo Signo and the only woman among its founders, Quiñónez went to the forefront of an emerging movement of Guatemalan women's poetry. Ana Maria Rodas's (b. 1937) militant Poemas de la izquierda erótica (Poems of the Erotic Left, 1973) rebuked the machismo of the male revolutionary Left. More recently, several women poets—incl. Carmen Matute (b. 1944), Isabel de los Ángeles Ruano (b. 1945), and Aida Toledo (b. 1952)—showed their ability to write a richly layered, imagistic, and subjectivist poetry, often expressing eroticism, deep psychic disturbance, and metaphysical explorations while registering a political, specifically feminist agenda.

The most significant new devel. of the 1980s was, however, the appearance of a Mayan testimonial poetry practiced by men and women alike, incl. Nobel Peace Prize-winner Rigoberta Menchú (b. 1959). The first mod. indigenous voice was the Nuevo Signo member Luis de Lión (1940–84), an only partially ladinized Indian, who was disappeared by the military. After him came one of the initial members of RIN-78, Enrique Luis Sam Colop (b. 1955).

These three writers drafted their poems in Sp., offered as "translations" from the Quiché, in an invented indigenous tonality expressing the pain and resistance of their people. Similarly, Humberto Ak'abal (b. 1952) emerged in the 1990s as the first fully celebrated indigenous poet. In his work, the indigenous question is one not of radical separatism but of the creation of conditions for mutual recognition and respect. His poems draw upon Quiché trads. to reshape ling. and poetic norms in relation to dimensions of indigenous culture, emphasizing city versus country, the struggle against communal destruction, and the capacity of modernity and globalization to deepen rather than dilute indigenous cultural devel. Ak'abal includes elements of shamanism and magic in his texts, but he also employs ladino poetic trads. and tropes, enmeshing them with indigenous images.

In these indigenous writers and the new women poets, incl. many appearing in the 21st c., we see fresh beginnings for poetry in Guatemala's future. In the midst of globalization and local power struggles, poets shift their focus from national identity to more panindigenous and universal themes, linking Guatemala to the larger world, but never losing sight of their own local issues.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; COLONIAL POETICS; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ Poesía revolucionaria guatemalteca, ed. M. L. Rodríguez Mojón (1971); F. Albizúrez Palma and C. Barrios y Barrios, Historia de la literatura guatemalteca, 3 v. (1981–87); R. Armijo, "Introducción," Poesía contemporánea de Centro América, ed. R. Armijo and R. Paredes (1983); A. Chase, "Prólogo," Las armas de la luz: Antología de la poesía contemporánea de la América Central, ed. A. Chase (1985); D. Vela, Literatura guatemalteca (1985); Ixok amar·go: poesía de mujeres centroamericanas por la paz. Central American Women's Poetry for Peace, ed. Z. Anglesey (1987); Exodus: An Anthology of Guatemalan Poets, ed. A. Saavedra (1988); D. Liano, "Studio introduttivo," Poeti di Guatemala: 1954–86, ed. D. Liano, trans. A. D'Agostino (1988); J. Beverley and M. Zimmerman, Literature and Politics in the Central American Revolutions (1990); Nueva poesía guatemalteca, ed. F. Morales Santos (1990); M. Zimmerman, Literature and Resistance in Guatemala: Textual Modes and Cultural Politics from El Señor Presidente to Rigoberta Menchú (1995); Voices from the Silence: Guatemalan Literature of Resistance, ed. M. Zimmerman (1998).

■ Web Sites: B. Mateos, Palabra virtual: voz y video en la poesía iberoamericana, http://www.palabravirtual.com—sections on Guatemala; Poesía guatemalteca, http://www.poesiaguatemalteca.com/.

M. ZIMMERMAN

GUJARATI POETRY. For many years, Narsinh Mehta (15th c.) was the first known poet in the hist. of Gujarati lit., but after dozens of mss. of old Gujarati lit. were recovered from the protected Jain scriptoria at Jesalmer, the record of Gujarati poetic hist. was extended to the 11th c. CE. This new literary era was called the pre-Narsinh or Rāsā period and included many Jain and a few non-Jain texts. Among them, Jain texts such as Jinpadmasūri's Sirithulibhadda Fāgu (ca. 1334) and Rahshekhar's Neminātha Fāgu (ca. 1344) and non-Jain texts such as the anonymous Vasant Vilās (1452) stand out for their creative fervor. The med. Gujarati lit. that followed is divided into the Bhakti, Akhyān, and Vairagya periods. The sweet feminine melancholy of Mīrābāī, the master narratives of Premanand Bhatt (1649–1714), the exotic storytelling of Sāmal Bhatt (1718–65), the philosophical sarcasm of Akho, and the devotional eroticism of Dayārām enriched the med. canvas. The transcendental vision of med. Gujarati poetry was conveyed with native lyricism in varied oral and singable verse forms.

Under Brit. rule, new technological advances and educational policies and, in particular, the imported model of Eng. romantic poetry (see ROMANTICISM) brought the med. Gujarati era to an end. The literary period that followed continued until shortly after the departure of Brit. rule in 1947. This era is divided into three parts: the Reformist (1850–85), Pandit (1885–1915), and Gandhi (1915–45) periods.

Dalpatrām (1820–98) and Narmad (1833–86) emerged as the most significant poets of the Reformist period; the former was a conservative, and the latter was a radical reformer. Uneducated in Eng., Dalpatrām was influenced by Vraj poetics and was a master of prosody. His poetry was distinguished by wit and satire. Narmad, the first pioneer of the mod. era, adopted the Eng. romantic model and dealt with personal topics such as love and nature. In spite of his enthusiasm and quest for beauty, his verse is often considered inexpert.

The Pandit period was characterized by a discriminatory attitude toward Eng. values. Poets of this period chose instead to assimilate the Sanskrit and Persian trads. Narsinhrao Divetiā (1859–1937) continued in the romantic model, but other poets soon complicated this conservatism. The sculpturelike structure of Kavi Kānt's (1867–1923) Khandkavya, the verseless outburst of Nānālal's (1877–1946) platonic idealism, the pensive juvenile world of love and separation built by Kalāpi (1874–1900), and the robust poetic lang. of run-on verses inscribed by B. K. Thākore (1869–1952) were remarkable landmarks of the Pandit period of Gujarati poetry.

As Mohandas K. Gandhi entered the Indian political scene, the new themes of truth and nonviolence pervaded all spheres of life. While combating Brit. rule, Gandhi confronted the cardinal issues of untouchability, village reforms, and the unequal distribution of wealth. He aimed at simplicity and compassion and ultimately aspired to forge a universal brotherhood. The Gujarati poetry in this period appropriated the Gandhian vision. Two major poets, Sundaram (1908–91) and Umāshankar Joshi (1911–88), made experimental and often eclectic poetry in this vein. Their poetry railed against political and social inequality, calling for a humane and compassionate approach toward the downtrodden and the exploited. Meanwhile, the Bengali poet Rabindranath Tagore's (1861–1941) aesthetic theories were at work during this period.

Umāshankar Joshi, recipient of the prestigious Jnānpith Award, lived in three successive literary periods (the premodernist, modernist, and postmodernist periods). His poem "Chhinnabhinna Chhun," one of the seven components of his influential long poem Saptapadi, became the harbinger of the modernist period. Suresh Joshi (1921–86), who discarded much of the idealism of the Gandhian period; Rājendra Shāh (1913–2010), another Jnānpith Award-winner; and Niranjan Bhagat (b. 1926), a premodernist poet of urban inclination, provided the springboard for a new period of international poetry. Poetry of this era was concerned with pathos and the meaninglessness of contemp. life, private idiosyncrasy, repressed psyche, the subconscious, the inwardness of individual experience, the dislocation of logic, and the use of associative lang. Lābhshankar Thākar (b. 1935), with his *dissociation of sensibility, and Sitanshu Yashaschandra (b. 1941), with his surreal verve and apolitical tone, confidently carry on this trad.

In the latest phase of postmodernity, Gujarati poets explore new themes, such as Dalitism and feminism, in traditional forms such as ghazals* and songs. Meanwhile, Gujarati poetry continues to look toward new gravity and grandeur.

See BENGALI POETRY; INDIA, POETRY OF; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY.

■ N. Bhagat, "Experiments in Modern Gujarati Poetry," Indian Literature 21 (1978); R. Joshi, "Recent Trends in Gujarati Literature," Indian Literature 27 (1984); Modern Gujarati Poetry, trans. S. Ramanathan and R. Kothari (1998).

C. TOPIWALA

GUSLAR. An oral epic poet from the area known for much of the 20th c. as Yugoslavia; the trad. flourished in various regions from at least the 15th through the early 20th c., before becoming moribund. The term derives from the accompanying gusle, a (usually) one-stringed, lute-shaped instrument bowed by the singer, although some epic poets performed without the gusle, according to Murko. In the Ottoman Empire, Muslim guslars were attached to Turkish courts but later plied their trade chiefly in coffeehouses, esp. during Ramadan. In the Christian areas, performances took place at social gatherings and were attended by a cross-section of the village population. The singer's craft, most often a masculine avocation, was passed from father to son or from one guslar to another; learning the singing trad. was an informal process, with certain stages of private and public performance (Lord).

It was the guslars with whom Parry and Lord worked in evolving the *oral-formulaic theory, assisted by Nikola Vujnović, their native translator, interviewer, and transcriber, who was also a guslar himself. The Parry-Lord guslars from Novi Pazar, Bijelo Polje, and elsewhere are selectively represented in the series Serbo-Croatian Heroic Songs; a full ed. of the guslar Halil Bajgorić's The Wedding of Mustajbey's Son Bećirbey is available in book form (Foley 2004) and online as a hypertext edition with audio. The classic collection of epic performances from the Christian areas is Karadžić's Srpske narodne pjesme (selective trans. in Holton and Mihailovich). The most important mod. guslar was the Bosnian Avdo Medjedović, an illiterate singer who composed epics as lengthy as 18,000 lines. On the role of the guslar in the comparative study of oral trads., see studies below by Lord, Koljević, and Foley.

■ V. Karadžić, Srpske narodne pjesme (1841–62); Serbo-Croatian Heroic Songs (Srpskohrvatske junačke pjesme), ed. and trans. M. Parry, A. Lord, and D. Bynum (1953–); Lord; S. Koljević, The Epic in the Making (1980); J. M. Foley, The Theory of Oral Composition (1988); M. Murko, "The Singers and Their Epic Songs," trans. J. M. Foley, Oral Tradition 5 (1990); J. Foley, Traditional Oral Epic (1990), Immanent Art (1991), and The Singer of Tales in Performance (1995); Songs of the Serbian People, trans. M. Holton and V. Mihailovich (1997); J. M. Foley, Homer's Traditional Art (1999) and How to Read an Oral Poem (2002); The Wedding of Mustajbey's Son Bećirbey as Performed by Halil Bajgorić, ed. and trans. J. M. Foley (2004), http://oraltradition.org/zbm.

J. M. Foley

GYPSY POETRY. See romani poetry.

H

HAIBUN. A literary form developed in Japan that employs a combination of prose and haiku. A haibun may be as brief as a single terse paragraph followed by a single haiku or an extended work involving an alternation of prose and verse. Accordingly, the haikus may occur singly, in groups, or in linked series, between prose passages. The best known examples are the travel jour. Narrow Road to the Interior by Bashō (1694) and the autobiographical The Year of My Life by Issa (1819). The prose and verse sections of a haibun are intended to function discretely as self-contained texts; however, in combination, they enact a kind of dialogue between them, a compounding of points of view on the same situation or topic. While the form was developed by Bashō out of the haikai trad. of linked verses employing commonplace diction and a lighthearted tone, it has been used for a range of tones and themes; however, personal themes predominate. As with haiku, haibun has been adapted into many langs. and cultures. Its practice is cultivated by haiku societies, jours., and web sites; it is also practiced by poets such as James Merrill, Robert Hass, and Rachel Blau DuPlessis. The form has undergone variations as well: in Merrill's "Prose of Departure," the haiku and prose are connected syntactically, rather than being discrete elements; also, the first and third lines of each haiku rhyme. Others vary the form by not keeping to the strict syllable count of haiku or more flexibly employing *free verse.

See HAIKAI, RENGA.

■ K. Issa, The Year of My Life, trans. N. Yuasa (1972); E. Miner, Japanese Linked Poetry (1979); B. Ross, "North American Versions of Haibun and Postmodern American Culture," Postmodernity and Cross-Culturalism, ed. Y. Hakutani (2002); M. Bashō and D. L. Barnhill, Bashō's Journey: The Literary Prose of Matsuo Bashō (2005).

W. WENTHE

HAIKAI

I. Introduction
II. Formal Characteristics
III. History

I. Introduction. Haikai (literally, "comic"), more properly called haikai no renga (comic linked verse), refers to a number of poetic forms that emerged in the early mod. period in Japan (1615–1868). The term is used in Kokin waka shū (Ancient and Modern Waka Anthology, ca. 905; see KOKINSHŪ) to refer to unconventional or humorous waka*. With the devel. of renga* (linked verse) in the med. period (1185–1600), the term haikai no renga denoted a variety of humorous linked verse that was written between sessions of orthodox renga composition. As a courtly form, orthodox renga forbade the use of nonelegant words (such as Buddhist terms and Chinese compounds); haikai no renga, however, permitted it.

In the early mod. period, haikai no renga evolved into a form independent of both waka and renga. It held a special appeal for commoners, though members of all social status groups composed it. Haikai was most popular from the middle of the 17th to the end of the 18th c.; by the end of the 19th c., literary reformers abandoned it in favor of its modernized form, haiku (see JAPAN, MODERN POETRY OF).

II. Formal Characteristics. The main categories of haikai are linked verse (haikai no renga, renku) and hokku ("starting verse").

A. Linked Verse. Linked verse derives most closely from its med. ancestor, orthodox renga, and shares many of its conventions, such as the necessity of including a kigo (seasonal word or phrase) and the basic pattern of alternating verse links (ku), each 5-7-5 and 7-7 moras long. These links were usually composed by two or more poets working collaboratively in a single session. While, following renga conventions, it was possible to construct sequences of 50, 100, or even 10,000 links in length (or, at the other extreme, as few as two or three), the most common linked verse form was the kasen, the 36-link sequence that was the favorite of the Bashō school.

As in renga, haikai verse links were composed on the spot in a group setting; also, like renga poets, haikai poets commonly composed verses that were ambiguous enough to allow for multiple interpretations, thus maximizing the possibilities for linking. However, haikai differed from renga in two important ways: haikai-linked verse used haigon (haikai lang.); put another way, it could refer to "vulgar" (zoku) topics and situations that were not allowed in courtly verse. This included not only references to the everyday lives of commoners, incl. sexuality, but words of Chinese origin and Buddhist expressions. Furthermore, unlike orthodox renga, haikai-linked verse was expected to be humorous: this ranged from subtle, intellectual allusiveness to outrageous puns and coarse ribaldry.

The following are the two verses that begin a 36-link Bashō-school sequence. The sequence is included in Sumidawara (Charcoal Sack, 1694):

ume ga ka ni	amid the scent of plum blossoms
notto hi no deru	the sun rises, pop!
yamaji kana	mountain path
	Matsuo Bashō
tokoro dokoro ni	here and there
kiji no nakitatsu	pheasants cry out, flying
	Shida Yaba

Bashō's verse is typical of haikai in the sense that it employs a haigon, the colloquial expression notto (to rise effortlessly), creating a sense of immediacy and freshness as well as gentle humor. Such a word would have been prohibited in waka and renga. Yaba's verse links to it by adding another detail to the scene: birds that one would be likely to encounter on a mountain path. The pheasants' piercing cry resonates with the sharp surprise of the sun's sudden appearance.

B. Hokku. While Bashō and his disciples are regarded as the greatest proponents of linked verse, his school is also credited with the establishment of the hokku as an independent verse form. Hokku refers to the 17-mora-long verse (i.e., 5-7-5) that starts a sequence; it is the only verse of the sequence that can be composed outside of a haikai session by a poet working alone. For this reason, it originally became important as a means for teachers to instruct their disciples and for established poets to hone their skills. By the late 17th c., haikai enthusiasts had taken to experimenting with forms besides the long linked-verse sequences, and the autonomous hokku emerged as a favorite of poets like Bashō, who aimed to bring the standards of haikai more in line with those of the courtly forms waka and renga.

Like verses used in longer sequences, hokku are expected to include seasonal words and haikai lang. Hokku are also distinguished by the use of kireji (literally, cutting characters) that allow this short verse form to create a two-part structure that juxtaposes contrasting images:

hana ibara	brambles in bloom
kokyō no michi ni	as I climb the hill
nitaru kana	to my hometown

Yosa Buson

Here the seasonal word is "ibara," brambles. The kireji, "kana," comes at the end, setting the seasonal word apart from "kokyō no michi ni nitaru" (just like the ones on the road to my hometown) and inviting the reader to consider the connection between them.

As these examples show, the humor of haikai is often subtle, particularly in the verse of the poets that are most admired by mod. scholars and critics. Indeed, in most cases, it would be better to associate the most sophisticated haikai with the expression of a moment of insight or perception, esp. resulting from the juxtaposition of two incongruous images.

III. History. The earliest proponents of haikai no renga as a verse form independent of renga were Yamazaki Sōkan (1465–1553) and Arakida Moritake (1473–1549), both of whom are credited with beginning the process of extracting from haikai no renga the coarseness that often characterized it when it was composed as part of an orthodox renga session, yet retaining its appealing wittiness. Sōkan's Inu Tsukuba shû (Dog Renga Anthology, ca. 1540) is often called the first collection of verse in the new genre. Nearly a century later, Matsunaga Teitoku (1571–1653), an immensely learned scholar who excelled at nearly all forms of cl. Japanese verse, lent more prestige to the form with the publication of his haikai collection Enoko shū (Puppy Anthology, 1633). He also established a set of rules (shikimoku) for haikai composition such as had long existed for waka and renga. Teitoku sought to retain the elegant aspects of renga while allowing the use of haigon—making the existence of the haigon, rather than the presence of humor, the distinguishing feature of haikai. In doing so, Teitoku expanded the appeal of the genre beyond commoners; his own reputation for literary excellence was such that his school attracted socially elite samurai, scholars, and aristocrats.

Teitoku's success in attracting practitioners to the form was followed by that of Nishiyama Sôin (1605–82). Sôin's followers, called the Danrin school, regarded the Teitoku style as somewhat staid and dour; they instead emphasized haikai's comic possibilities, exulting in its potential for word play, wit, and bawdiness. The Danrin style was in keeping with the exuberance and flash of early mod. urban culture. Indeed, one of the Danrin school's most famous adherents, the popular fiction writer Ihara Saikaku (1642–93), was said to have been so skilled at yakazu (rapid-fire) haikai composition that he composed 23,500 verses at a public event that lasted a single day and night. Nevertheless, the Danrin school's lack of restraint was not to everyone's tastes, and there was considerable rivalry within the haikai community. By the late 17th c., while many haikai practitioners were drawn to the Danrin school's tendency to frivolity and others held fast to the Teitoku school's more conservative tastes, some poets, like Uejima Onitsura (1661–1738) took another route, aiming to infuse their verse with the authenticity (makoto) of expression that was the hallmark of courtly verse.

However, most of the credit for transforming this still somewhat disreputable offshoot of cl. renga into a serious literary form goes to Matsuo Bashō (1644–94). Bashō's reputation as the "saint" of haikai is in part due to the brilliance of his verse and in part due to the extreme devotion that he was able to inspire in his many followers. Bashō, esp. famous for his hokku, linked verse, and haibun (haikai prose, incl. the famous travel journal Oku no hosomichi [Narrow Road to the Interior]), distinguished himself not just as a writer but as the originator of an image of haikai poets as free-spirited vagabonds in the mode of med. pilgrim poets like Saigyō. He claimed that a similar aesthetic quality was present in "the waka of Saigyō, the renga of Sōgi, the paintings of Sesshū, and the tea ceremony of Rikyū" (in Oi no kobumi [Rucksack Notebook, 1687]) and argued that haikai also shared this quality. Bashō's habit of traveling earned him students throughout Japan. The most prominent among them (called Bashō's Ten Disciples, alluding to the famous students of Confucius) became instrumental in spreading his reputation; they were Takarai Kikaku, Mukai Kyorai, Naitō Jōsō, Sugiyama Sanpū, Hattori Ransetsu, Morikawa Kyoriku, Kagami Shikō, Shida Yaba, Nozawa Bonchō, and Tachibana Hokushi.

After Bashō's death, the humorous, gamelike aspect of haikai attracted large numbers of followers, and they treated it as a parlor game and occasionally even as a form of gambling. However, a countertrend emerged in the middle of the 18th c., centered around Yosa Buson (1716–83). Buson, more famous during his lifetime as a painter than a poet, was the most outstanding member of a group of latter-day Bashō admirers who sought to reclaim for haikai the gravity and seriousness to which Bashō-school poets aspired. Collectively known as the Bashō Revival movement, these poets—among them Ōshima Ryōta (1718–87), Tan Taigi (1709–71), and Katō Kyōtai (1732–92)—wrote verse that did not stylistically resemble that of the Bashō school but rather shared the view that haikai was an appropriate medium for the expression of sensitive emotions and profound insights.

By the beginning of the 19th c., the practice of linked-verse composition had almost completely disappeared. While there were still some impressive adherents of the genre, most notably Iwama Otsuni (1756–1823) and Kobayashi Issa (1763–1827)—the latter particularly famous for his verse focusing on simplicity and poverty—haikai lost a good deal of its momentum. A related form, senryū—humorous hokku without seasonal words—began to compete with haikai for followers. Haikai retained considerable popularity, but its practice was so centered on tsukinami (monthly) group meetings in which aspiring poets followed their teachers' directions dutifully and unimaginatively that in later decades the term tsukinami itself became derogatory. Late 19th-c. reformers, like Masaoka Shiki (1867–1902) and Naitō Meisetsu (1847–1926) revitalized haikai into a modernized genre, which they renamed "haiku."

See HAIKU, WESTERN; JAPAN, POETRY OF; JAPANESE POETICS.

■ R. H. Blyth, Haiku (1949–52); K. Yasuda, The Japanese Haiku (1957); H. Henderson, An Introduction to Haiku (1958); E. Miner, Japanese Linked Poetry (1979); From the Country of Eight Islands, ed. and trans. H. Sato and B. Watson (1981); The Monkey's Straw Raincoat, ed. and trans. E. Miner and H. Odagiri (1981); W. Higginson, The Haiku Handbook (1985); H. Shirane, "Matsuo Bashō and the Poetics of Scent," HJAS 42 (1992); Bashō and His Interpreters, trans. M. Ueda (1992); W. Higginson, The Haiku Seasons (1996); H. Shirane, Traces of Dreams (1998); The Path of Flowering Thorn, trans. M. Ueda (1998)—on Buson; Early Modern Japanese Literature, ed. H. Shirane and B. James (2002); D. L. Barnhill, Bashō's Haiku (2004); M. Ueda, Dew on the Grass (2004)—on Issa; C. A. Crowley, Haikai Poet Yosa Buson and the Bashō Revival (2007).

C. A. CROWLEY

HAIKU, WESTERN

I. Before 1910
II. Through the Two World Wars
III. Resurgence in the 1950s

From the time of Japonisme in painting (1850–1910), Japanese arts began to exert an unprecedented influence on Western art and artists. In the exchange between Japan and the West, the verse practice known as haiku—the term was coined by Masoka Shiki about 1900—would come to exert great influence over the entirety of the 20th c. and after. In Western langs., haiku is commonly arranged into three lines, a rendition of the Japanese syllabic pattern of five, seven, and five *moras, although, in Japanese, these often appear in a single line. An alternate designation is hokku (first verse), which implies a longer string of linked verses known as renga*. Haiku practice in the West typically presents verses rich in imagery, often juxtaposed in startling combinations. Furthermore, "stepping stones" of images running through longer verses (as Allen Ginsberg called Ezra Pound's practice) bring Western haiku into resemblance to traditional Japanese renga, the collaborative linked verse form of which haikai was a subgenre—albeit the Western adaptations are typically the product of a single poet rather than a group. The following article outlines some prominent adaptations of haiku into Fr., Am., Sp., and Lat. Am. poetry.

I. Before 1910. The Western adoption of haiku poetry began in 1905 when Paul-Louis Couchoud (1879–1959), who was also among the first translators of haiku, composed poems in Fr. in the fashion of haiku (pub. in 1905 in a booklet titled Au fil de l'eau). Other minor poets in France followed Couchoud's lead, copying and modifying his Fr.-lang. haiku poems and trans. A 1902 ms. of José Juan Tablada (1871–1945) of Mexico, Nao de China, reportedly included Sp.-lang. haiku, which would make him the first to adapt haiku to another lang. It is referred to as if it had been published, although it seems never to have been. Nonetheless, Tablada translated and published original haiku in the second decade of the 1900s, and, by the following decade, he had developed into an energetic promoter of the practice. Antonio Machado (1875–1939) of Spain was another early participant in haiku. His 1907 Soledades, Galerías, Otros poemas contains poems that were most likely haiku-inspired, although there is speculation that they derive from Sp. folk genres. The early imagists in London, encouraged by T. E. Hulme (1883–1917), adapted the extremely brief Japanese poetic forms of tanka and haiku to their experimental poetry (see IMAGISM).

II. Through the Two World Wars. From 1910 to 1919, many imagist poets produced poems with haiku-like juxtapositions. Imagist experimentation included Amy Lowell's (1874–1925) visual Japonisme in Pictures of the Floating World and Ezra Pound's (1885–1972) "hokku-like" "In a Station of the Metro." The depth of imagist engagement with haiku was indicated by Fletcher (1946): "I should say that the influence of haiku on the Imagists was more considerable than almost anyone has suspected." After imagist experiments, two Fr. poets, Julien Vocance (1878–1954) and Paul Éluard (1895–1952), became prominent. Both contributed haiku to the 1920 issue of Nouvelle Revue Française that declared 1920 "the year of haikai in France." Éluard's hybrids have elements of *Dada and nascent *surrealism. Publications in Spain and Mexico carried Tablada's haiku starting in 1919. Also in Spain, haiku found its way into the brevity of line and image formation of many of the Generation of 1927, incl. Federico García Lorca (1898–1936), and the poet at the forefront of avant-gardism in Spain, Guillermo de Torre (1900–71; see ULTRAISM). De Torre's haiku was hybrid with *visual poetry, bringing his accomplishments beyond what others had achieved. While the years of World War I and between the wars were very fertile times for the spread of haiku, from the mid-1930s and the Sp. Civil War, and to the end of World War II, the atmosphere that had fostered such international activities turned inhospitable; the activities of vanguard artists were viewed with distrust; and rather than risk the same fate as Lorca, many artists abandoned their avant-garde activities.

III. Resurgence in the 1950s. The 1950s saw a resurgence of avant-garde activity that generally included the writing of haiku. There was renewed interest in Japanese culture, Zen Buddhism, trans. of Japanese lit., and scholarly tracts on Japan. Among those in the *Beat movement, Jack Kerouac (1922–69), Allen Ginsberg (1926–97), and Gary Snyder (b. 1930), who resided in Kyoto for years, demonstrated great interest in Asia and Buddhism. Kerouac put haiku to jazz accompaniment in the late 1950s, but his haiku were collected and published only in 2003. Ginsberg discussed his connection to haiku as a connection between what he called "ellipsis" and condensed images. Snyder had been a student of East Asian langs.; his engagement with East Asian poetry is perhaps the greatest among all Western poets. However, it was not only North Americans who were haiku transformers in the 1950s. The concrete poets of Brazil, in particular Haroldo de Campos (1929–2003) and Pedro Xisto (1901–87), wrote haiku and engaged Asian poetics in their practice and theoretical writings (see CONCRETE POETRY). Furthermore, literary giants such as Jorge Luis Borges (1899–1986) wrote haiku in both the 1920s and the 1950s. In Mexico, Octavio Paz (1914–98) picked up the thread of avant-gardism as well as the haiku torch from his countryman Tablada. Paz's "Bashō An" contains the lines "vowels, consonants: / the house of the world" that, like the entire poem, self-consciously oscillate among ling. construct (haiku), its architectural, physical counterpart (Bashō's hut), and the phenomenological world. In so doing, they raise the Buddhist question of the relationship among conjurer-poet, poetic product, and constructing the greater world, a question that has long been at the heart of East Asian poetry. "Bashō An" simultaneously constitutes a tribute to and an enactment of haiku poetics and stands as a bridge between East and West of haiku image-pillars supporting poetics suspended across space-time.

See JAPANESE POETICS.

■ A. Neuville, Haïkaï et Tankas: Epigrammes à la japonaise (1908); Anthologie de la littérature japonaise des origines au XXe siècle, ed. M. Revon (1910); E. Pound, "Vorticism," Fortnightly Review 571 (1914); J. Vocance, "Cent Visions de Guerre," Grande Revue 5 (1916); and "Haï-kaïs," Nouvelle Revue Française 15 (1920); W. L. Schwartz, The Imaginative Interpretation of the Far East in Modern French Literature, 1800–1925 (1927); J. G. Fletcher, "The Orient and Contemporary Poetry," Asian Legacy in American Life, ed. A. Christy (1945); K. Yasuda, A Pepper Pod: Classic Japanese Poems Together with Original Haiku, trans. A. Neuville (1946)—foreword by J. G. Fletcher; R. H. Blyth, Haiku (1949); Breve Antologia Brasileira de Haikai, ed. E. Martins (1954); E. Miner, "Pound, Haiku, and the Image," HudR 9 (1956–57); G. Brower, Haiku in Western Languages (1972); J. R. Jiménez, "La difusión del haiku: Díez Canedo y la revista España," Cuadernos de Investigación Filológica 12–13 (1987); J. Johnson, Haiku Poetics in Twentieth-Century Avant-Garde Poetry (2011).

J. JOHNSON

HAITI, POETRY OF. See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE.

HARLEM RENAISSANCE. Harlem Renaissance must be taken as a synecdochal term in which Harlem, a neighborhood in New York City, stands for the variety of outposts of Af. Am. cultural production in the United States and abroad from the turn of the 20th c. into the late 1930s. The devels. that swelled the ranks of Af. Ams. in Harlem from 1915 to 1930—incl. the Great Migration; Harlem's international pan-Af. presence; middle-class social, political, and educational uplift organizations; strong newspaper outlets; and coteries of artists served well by a variety of theatrical and cultural institutions, as well as wealthy white patrons—were mirrored to lesser degrees in other locations such as Lynchburg, Virginia; Philadelphia; Washington, D.C.; and Chicago. Both Claude McKay and Langston Hughes spent substantial amounts of time in Europe. Thus, the term New Negro, given currency previously by John M. Henderson, Booker T. Washington, Sutton E. Griggs, and Hubert Harrison before becoming the title of renaissance-movement aesthetician Alain Locke's groundbreaking collection of art and essays, is more technically appropriate. It was a loosely cohesive movement, drawing variously on a variety of elements. Af. Am. *blues, *ballads, hollers, work songs, and game songs collected by folklorists or recorded commercially exerted their influence on writers such as Hughes, Sterling Brown, and Zora Neale Hurston. The local color and realist challenges to the plantation trad. by Frances Ellen Watkins Harper, Paul Laurence Dunbar, and Charles Chesnutt and the uplift and protest activities of Griggs, Ida B. Wells, Marcus Garvey, and W.E.B. Du Bois helped usher in elements of direct protest as well as a realistic focus on the dilemmas of rural citizens and the newly transplanted urban Af. Am. The New Poetry of writers like E. A. Robinson, Carl Sandburg, Vachel Lindsay, and Edgar Lee Masters—along with a strong strain of traditional Brit. romantic and Victorian poetry, all championed by anthologist William Stanley Braithwaite—helped create a strong variety of poetic expression. Run through the alembic of Af. Am. diversity and originality, these influences helped to give voice, much in the manner of the Ir. literary renaissance, as James Weldon Johnson pointed out, to proud nationalistic feelings among Af.

Ams. who sought appropriate group spirit and expression in their work.

Championing black artistic productions as a way of attaining full rights and participation in Am. society, the leading lights of the movement helped produce works that were varied in their consideration of "The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed"—the title of a feature in one of the major jours. of the renaissance, The Crisis, ed. by Du Bois and Jessie Fauset for the NAACP (Opportunity, The Survey Graphic, Fire!!, Negro World, and The Messenger were the other major jours.). Du Bois insisted that "all art is and must be propaganda," while Locke argued for aesthetic expression and freedom, but both clearly valued art for its aesthetic and political value in varying degrees. In poetry and prose, Johnson provided important early examples for younger artists to follow. Younger writers learned to explore character devel. and more subtly to employ the artistic nature of Af. Am. folk materials as a result of the variety of Johnson's achievements. He created more nuanced minstrel songs for the stage and cowrote the Negro national *anthem, "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" (1899). His psychological devels. of the "tragic mulatto" character and use of ragtime elements in Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912) showed how such materials could be referenced and developed. He published an influential selection and intro. to The Book of American Negro Poetry (1922, 1931), promoted oral sermons in The Book of American Negro Spirituals (1925) and The Second Book of American Negro Spirituals (1926), and created his own poetic versions of the sermons in his masterful God's Trombones (1927).

The radical experimentation in the poetry of Jean Toomer stemmed from his connection with Af. Am. folk roots in Georgia work songs, field hollers, and spirituals ("Cotton Song"), as well as his immersion in orientalism, *imagism, and symbolist techniques culled from his involvement in avant-garde literary movements and associations with Waldo Frank and Sherwood Anderson ("Sound Poem"). Though poets such as Hughes and Brown are frequently identified with the heavy use of blues, jazz, and spiritual materials in their work—often as these genres interact and overlap with each other—both also composed poetry in traditional Eur. forms, as Hughes insisted he be able to do in his seminal essay "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (1926). Brown himself made brilliant use of a black folk hero in his sequence of "Slim" poems, while mixing iambic pentameter, standard Eng., and folk elements in "Virginia Portrait" and "Strange Legacies." Hughes mixed poems with 12-bar blues structures as in "Morning After"; with blues dialogues as in "Early Evening Quarrel"; and with standard-Eng. poems as in "Negro," with its Chinese-box structure. Claude McKay, often typed as a traditionalist for his extensive use of the *sonnet form, was actually an experimental practitioner of the form, bringing new passions and hues into its domain ("If We Must Die"). Regarded through the lens of his early dialect poetry, the colonial background and training grafted onto his Am. and international experiences with socialism, and his clear appreciation for simple folk creation ("Negro Spiritual"), McKay's work reveals a sometimes radical use of traditional forms. Countee Cullen, the darling of the middle-class Af. Am. seeking educational credentials (Phi Beta Kappa) and traditional Eng. aesthetics in poetry (idolizing John Keats), introduced stark Af. Am. experiences into Eur. forms in poems like "Incident" and "Heritage," while not ignoring the experiences of folk-cultural figures such as the "Colored Blues Singer." Women poets of the era, published in the jours. and anthols. nearly as frequently as the men yet marginalized as overly genteel in subsequent crit., combined traditional themes (nature, love, heritage) and forms (sonnet, couplet, quatrain) with an Af. Am. focus in such poems as Angelina Weld Grimké's "Tenebris" and Gwendolyn Bennett's "Fantasy," while adding starker protest (Anne Spencer's "White Things"), introducing feminist issues and open forms (Spencer's "Before the Feast at Shushan"), and using colloquial diction (Bennett's "Song") in their work as well.

Although sometimes thought to have ended with the stock market crash in 1929, the renaissance continued to produce into the 1930s—Brown's Southern Road (1932), Hughes's The Dream Keeper and Other Poems (1932), and Mae Cowdery's We Lift Our Voices and Other Poems (1936), along with important prose volumes. Even beyond the 1930s, however, Harlem Renaissance writers continued to resonate with audiences and succeeding generations of artists such as Richard Wright and Gwendolyn Brooks in the Black Chicago Renaissance and Amiri Baraka and Sonia Sanchez in the *Black Arts movement; they had a profound influence on the hispanophone Caribbean Negrismo movement and the francophone *Negritude movement as well.

See AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY, AVANT-GARDE POETICS, DIALECT POETRY, JAZZ POETRY, ORAL POETRY.

■ The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. A. Bontemps (1972); A. Rampersad, The Life of Langston Hughes (1986); G. T. Hull, Color, Sex, and Poetry (1987); S. C. Tracy, Langston Hughes and the Blues (1988); Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance, ed. M. Honey (1989); G. Hutchinson, The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White (1995); The Best of the Brownies' Book, ed. D. Johnson-Feelings (1996); The Harlem Renaissance, 1920–1940, ed. C. D. Wintz, 7 v. (1992–96); Rhapsodies in Black: Music and Words from the Harlem Renaissance, comp. and prod. S. Amos (2000)—4-CD set; A.B.C. Schwarz, Gay Voices of the Harlem Renaissance (2003); Encyclopedia of the Harlem Renaissance, ed. C. D. Wintz and P. Finkelman, 2 v. (2004); Harlem Speaks, ed. C. D. Wintz (2007); After Winter: The Art and Life of Sterling A. Brown, ed. J. E. Tidwell and S. C. Tracy (2009).

S. C. TRACY

HAUSA POETRY. In the Hausa lang. as spoken in Nigeria, Niger, and parts of Ghana, the single term waka is applied to two closely related trads., song and written poetry (verse). Popular song and courtly praise singing are oral, professional, and instrumentally accompanied, typically with interaction between lead singer(s) and chorus. Poetry, on the other hand, is chanted without accompaniment, and reward for performance is not usually sought. Poems are composed in roman or in ajami (Ar.) script and often circulate in ms. or in printed form. Both song and poetry can be scanned according to patterns of heavy and light syllables. Song follows traditional patterns (Greenberg) or parallels instrumental accompaniment. Poetry usually has scansions corresponding to those of cl. Ar. meters. In song, the words of the lead singer are interrupted by the *refrains or repetition of the amshi (chorus); this may occasion variation in the length of "verses" between choruses. Commonly, poetry is in *couplets displaying syllable end rhyme or in five-line stanzas with end rhyme in the final line, supplemented by *internal rhyme in the first four lines. It has been claimed that, in some cases, tonal rhyme can accompany syllable rhyme.

Of the 16 cl. Ar. meters, nine are found in Hausa poetry (in descending order of frequency), kaamil, mutadaarik, mutaqaarib, rajaz, basiiṭ, waafir, khafiif, ramal, and ṭawiil. Claims for other meters require liberal interpretation of the cl. Ar. form. There is some controversy over whether the traditional Ar. method of analysis is appropriate to Hausa, even for meters of Ar. provenance (Galadanci, Schuh). Since at least the latter part of the 20th c., there has been cross-fertilization between song and poetry, with poets adopting meters that originated in song (Muhammad 1979).

Mod. poetry in roman script (starting in 1903) developed from the trad. of Islamic religious verse in ajami of the 19th c. Since at least the time of the Islamic jihaad (holy war) of Shehu Usman dan Fodio (1804), the propagation of the faith has involved the writing of Hausa poetry that circulated both in ms. form and through the performances of religious mendicants, often blind. Such poetry fell broadly into the categories of theology, praise of the Prophet, biography of the Prophet and his companions, admonition and exhortation, religious obligations, law, and astrology. While strictly religious poetry continues to be written, the 20th c. saw a great broadening in themes, which now cover such diverse subjects as Western education, hygiene, the evils of drink, filial piety, and many topical subjects such as the population census and the introduction of new currency. Poetry writing along with song has been an important part of the political process with the approach of Nigerian independence (1960); the Civil War (1967–70); the rise of political parties in northern Nigeria during the civilian political eras of the 1960s, 1980s, and 2000s; and the creation of new states in the 1980s and 1990s. To a considerable extent, Hausa poetry retains, as its most prominent characteristics, didacticism and a concern for social issues inherited from Islamic trad. Personal lyrical expression has traditionally been restricted to the category of madahu (praise of the Prophet), where the lang. of deep personal devotion, longing, and desire was both legitimate and appropriate. More recently, however, love poetry, which had in the past been private, entered the public arena through the publication of the anthol. Dausayin Soyayya.

Mod. Hausa poetry has been published regularly in the newspaper Gaskiya Ta Fi Kwabo (founded 1939), and prominent poets such as Akilu Aliyu, Mudi Sipikin, Na'ibi Wali, Salihu Kwantagora, and others have reached a wider audience in broadcasts over radio stations in northern Nigeria. Poetry-writing circles have been formed and have access to radio. While the majority of poets have been men, women such as Hauwa Gwaram and Alhajiya 'Yar Shehu have written on contemp. social and religious issues, following in the footsteps of the poet and translator Nana Asma'u, daughter of Shehu Usman dan Fodio, leader of the jihaad of 1804, and scholar in her own right (Boyd and Mack).

Song has been available on recordings since the 1950s and is a mainstay of radio programming and, more recently, television. The popular music of northern Nigeria is that of singers in traditional soloist and chorus ensembles, such as Mamman Shata and Musa Dan Kwairo (succeeded by his sons), and soloists accompanying themselves on stringed instruments, such as Dan Maraya Jos and Haruna Oji. A more recent devel., thanks to the burgeoning film and video industry, is film music, often in imitation of Indian film music but with Hausa metrical forms.

■ Anthologies: Wakokin Mu'azu Hadejia (Poems of Mu'azu Hadejia, 1955); N. Sulaimanu, et al., Wakokin Hausa (Poems in Hausa, 1957); Wakokin Sa'adu Zungur (Poems of Sa'adu Zungur, 1966); Tsofaffin Wakoki da Sababbin Wakoki (Old and New Poems of Mudi Sipikin, 1971); Wakokin Hikima (Poems of Wisdom, 1975); A. Aliyu, Fasaha Akiliya (The Skill of Akilu, 1976); Zababbun Wakokin Da da na Yanzu (Selected Poems of Yesterday and Today), ed. D. Abdulkadir (1979); B. Sa'id, Dausayin Soyayya (The Mellowness of Mutual Love, 1982); The Collected Works of Nana Asma'u, ed. J. Boyd and B. B. Mack (1997).

■ Criticism and History: J. H. Greenberg, "Hausa Verse Prosody," JAOS 69 (1949); D. W. Arnott, "The Song of the Rains," African Language Studies 9 (1969); M.K.M. Galadanci, "The Poetic Marriage between Arabic and Hausa," Harsunan Nijeriya 5 (1975); M. Hiskett, A History of Hausa Islamic Verse (1975); D. Muhammad, "Interaction Between the Oral and the Literate Traditions of Hausa Poetry," Harsunan Nijeriya 9 (1979) and "Tonal Rhyme: A Preliminary Study," African Language Studies 17 (1980); G. L. Furniss, Poetry, Prose and Popular Culture in Hausa (1996); R. G. Schuh, "Metrics of Hausa and Arabic poetry," New Dimensions in African Linguistics and Languages, ed. P.F.A. Kotey (1999).

G. Furniss; R. G. Schuh

HEBRAISM

I. Hebraism as a Form of Language
II. Hebraism and Hellenism
III. Hebraism as a Critical Term
IV. Christian Hebraism
V. Midrash and Kabbalah

I. Hebraism as a Form of Language. A Hebraism is a speech form in common use that has its origin in the Bible, particularly in the OT. Such Hebraisms are pervasive in all Eur. langs., particularly Ger. and Eng. In Ger., this is to be accounted for by the powerful and continuing influence of Martin Luther's Bible trans. (1522, 1534); in Eng., the trans. and paraphrasing of books of the Bible go back to the very beginnings of the lang. in OE and continue to the King James version of 1611 and beyond. The result is that Heb. speech forms, ranging from brief phrases to *proverbs, have become naturalized and are produced for the most part without users being aware of their Heb. origin. Examples are to escape "by the skin of one's teeth," "to go from strength to strength," "the ends of the earth," "out of the mouths of babes," to "wash one's hands of," "to be clothed in scarlet," "no rest for the wicked," "the way of a man with a maid."

In literary lang., Hebraisms are a constant presence for writers of all periods, but particularly concentrated use in Eng. may be noted in Francis Bacon, John Bunyan, William Blake, William Wordsworth, and D. H. Lawrence. William Tyndale claimed that "the properties of the Hebrew tongue agreeth a thousand times more with the English than with the Latin" (The Obedience of a Christian Man, 1528). Even Joseph Addison, a writer of more cl. taste, remarked that "it happens very luckily that the Hebrew idiom turns into the English tongue with a particular grace and beauty" (Spectator, no. 405).

II. Hebraism and Hellenism. As an abstract noun, Hebraism denotes the Heb. or biblical component in Western culture. Hebraism is often perceived as the opposite of Hellenism. Matthew Arnold popularized and sharpened this distinction in Culture and Anarchy (1869). The Hellenic legacy, he claimed, is aesthetic; the Hebraic legacy, moral: "The governing idea of Hellenism is spontaneity of consciousness; that of Hebraism, strictness of conscience." While the future of the human race is inconceivable without the passion for righteousness of the Heb. prophets, the exclusive emphasis on this aspect leads to the impoverishment of science, art, and lit. Arnold derived his ideal of Hellenism largely from the Ger. Hellenists, J. J. Winckelmann and J. W. Goethe, and his own contemporaries, Heinrich Heine and Wilhelm von Humboldt. But Arnold drew short of Winckelmann's radically anti-Christian sentiments and was not entirely comfortable with Humboldt's aim of ridding Christianity of its "Semitic" element in order to bring it closer to the Hellenistic ideal of human perfection to which he felt the IE peoples were naturally attuned.

Arnold's real target was evidently the Puritanism of the Victorian middle class, whom he spoke of as "Philistines"—borrowing the term from Heine. Their type of piety, he said, called for self-conquest—the Old Adam laboring under the burden of sin had to be "delivered from the body of this death." But it is questionable whether such evangelical piety—exemplified, as Arnold notes, by the letters of the apostle Paul and the writings of St. Augustine—really characterizes the cultural and religious message of the Heb. scriptures. Powys had a truer sense of the essentials of Hebraism when he spoke of "the human wisdom, the human sensuality, the human anger, the human justice . . . of this old shameless literature of the Old Testament." In this light, Hebraism has at least as much reference to the Old Adam as to the regenerate human being of Pauline Christianity.

Arnold modified his view of Hebraism in Literature and Dogma (1873), where he speaks of the prophets as using literary lang.; we must understand their words as human poetry rather than dogma. In fact, we need to bring to such texts an aesthetic taste no less refined than that required for the appreciation of the great texts of the Hellenic trad.

III. Hebraism as a Critical Term. The use of Hebraism in the general senses discussed above has often led to distortion. Critics have, however, also pointed to specific literary forms and modes of discourse associated with Hebraism or derived from Heb. sources, an attention that, increasing in recent years, has yielded a more discriminating and finely gauged understanding of the nature of Hebraism and its place in Western lit.

In the 3rd c., Longinus in a famous passage of his Peri hypsous (On the Sublime) had associated the *sublime with Hebraism, pointing to the first verses of Genesis as an example of grandeur of vision and lang. With the awakening of interest in Longinus starting with Nicolas Boileau (1674), increasing attention was given to Heb. examples of sublimity. Robert Lowth in his Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (1753) proposed biblical prophecy with its vehemence and passion as the perfect model of sublime poetry. Edmund Burke in defining the sublime (1757) cited passages from Job marked by power, darkness, and terror. Following Lowth's lead, the Ger. romantic philosopher J. G. Herder wrote a treatise (Vom Geiste der hebräischen Poesie, 1782) ardently praising the poetic *genius of the Hebrews; he viewed the Bible as a body of *national poetry that his own compatriots might emulate. Earlier he had written of the Song of Songs as an impassioned, oriental love poem. Hebraism, in short, provided a heady mixture of sublimity, *primitivism, and orientalism to offset the neoclassical tenets of the 18th c. Blake went even further: revising Longinus, he dismissed Homer, Ovid, Plato, and Cicero and declared "the Sublime of the Bible" to be the only true standard (Preface to Milton). He had in mind the "terrific" parts of his own longer poems, which consistently echo the lang. of the Heb. prophets and escape "the modern bondage" of rhyme and *blank verse (Preface to Jerusalem) to reproduce the effect of Heb. *parallelism. S. T. Coleridge in his Table-Talk likewise took it for granted that "Sublimity is Hebrew by birth." Hebraism thus helped to bring about a loosening of cl. restraints, an increasing preference for emotional intensity, and a freer prosody in the romantic period.

While this appreciation gave Heb. poetry an important role in the hist. of Eur. lit., the emphasis on sublimity suggests a somewhat limited understanding of Hebraism. Throughout his treatise, Longinus stressed "height of style," i.e., grandiloquence, finding his chief examples in Homer. The passage he chose from Genesis is from this point of view clearly untypical. "God said let there be light and there was light" is marked by extreme simplicity rather than grandiloquence. In the end, the rules and figures of rhet. listed by Longinus do not match such examples. And even when applied by Lowth and others to the more heightened examples of biblical poetry, something essential seems to be lost in the process of systematizing.

A different literary evaluation is that of Augustine, who in his Confessions (ca. 397) describes how disagreeably low and simple he found scripture on first encounter: "I could not bend down my neck to its humble pace." High though the meaning seemed to be, the lack of grandiloquence in the Psalms and Gospels offended his sense of *decorum. Later, as Auerbach has shown (1965), Augustine came to appreciate the power of this "humility," which challenged the cl. division of style into three types (high, middle, and low), as well as the artificial social structure that supported that division. The biblical style, combining as it did the sublime and the everyday, was thus an essentially subversive model, leading in the direction of a radical simplicity and realism both in prose and poetry. This model influenced the literary lang. of Europe in the Middle Ages and remained a latent force in the Ren. in spite of the moderating influence of other models and styles.

The Psalms in their simplicity and directness were perceived as a special example of this mode of Hebraism. Beginning with Petrarch (Salmi penitenziali, in Lat., 1347), many leading poets turned to them as a primary lyric model (see PSALM). In the 16th c., Clément Marot in France, and Thomas Wyatt, the Earl of Surrey (Henry Howard), and Philip Sidney in England found their poetic voices in their psalm paraphrases and trans. (see PSALMS, METRICAL). But the supreme achievement was that of the 17th-c. Eng. poets George Herbert, Francis Quarles, and George Wither. Herbert's collection The Temple (1633) shows the subtlest and most pervasive use of the psalter in this period. Responding to the dialogic character of the Psalms, Herbert achieved a dramatic tension lacking in other strains of lyricism in Eng.

> Look on my sorrows round!
> Mark well my furnace! O what flames,
> What heats abound!
> What griefs, what shames!
> Consider, Lord; Lord, bow thine eare,
> And heare!
>
> ("Longing")

In addition to other echoes, the last two lines of this example paraphrase the opening of Psalm 86, yet what we hear is Herbert's personal, authentic voice.

IV. Christian Hebraism. The 17th c. constitutes the apotheosis of Hebraism in Brit. lit. and in its political thought. In the Latin version of John 5:39, Jesus tells his disciples, "Scriptamini scripturas" (You search the scriptures), and the misinterpretation of this present indicative as an imperative led John Selden to lament, "These two words have undone the world. Because Christ spake it to his disciples, therefore we must all, men, women, and children, read and interpret the Scriptures" (Table Talk). But the theological aristocrats of the Reformation searched and found, in the Heb. Bible and in postbiblical rabbinic sources, the Jewish roots of Christianity. And where the political science of the earlier Ren. humanists, influenced by Greece and Rome, was secular in character, the later political works of Hugo Grotius, Selden, John Milton, and John Locke, crowded with references to the Heb. Bible, reflect the belief that it contains a political constitution, designed by God for the children of Israel (Nelson). And although its detractors may complain that the King James Bible of 1611 turns Heb., Aramaic, and koiné Gr. into a single ling. code rapidly adopted as "Church English," the lit. inspired by the King James Bible attests to its magnificence.

That inclusive lit. includes productions by Christian Hebraists such as Bishop Lancelot Andrewes, who contributed to the King James Bible trans., although his sermons, even after 1611, continue to refer to the Geneva Bible; and John Donne, whose sermons on the *penitential psalms reveal familiarity with rabbinic sources. At the other end of the religious and political spectrum is John Bunyan, "this soldier of Cromwell's New Model Army and nonconformist preacher," whose lang. and thought are nevertheless informed by the Bible trans. most closely associated with the monarchy and the established Church of England (Hamlin).

Milton is the most learned and most biblicocentric of the great Brit. poets. He composed his earliest surviving poems, paraphrases of Psalms 114 and 136, at age 15. His headnote to his 1648 metrical trans. of Psalms 80–88 calls attention to his "translat[ion] from the original," as do his marginal notations, incl. 18 separate transliterations of Heb. words and phrases and eight literal Eng. trans. that he explicitly states come directly from the Heb. Milton strives heroically to achieve Judaic self-understanding in Samson Agonistes. He changes details in his source, Judg. 13–16, but he determinedly retains as much of the original as is compatible with his vision. Milton's virtual obsession with the Bible—he refers or alludes to it 9,000 times in his De doctrina christiana alone—suggests that Samson, the primitive ruffian who so appalls some present-day readers, might not have appalled Milton. A Hebraic rather than an ironic reading would acknowledge the humanity of the chorus despite its flawed understanding, its capacity for fellow feeling, and its considerable spiritual and intellectual devel.; and while recognizing Manoa's shortcomings, it would also understand the love expressed by laying out money for one's child instead of laying it up for oneself and by preparing to devote the rest of one's life to nursing that child (1485–89). And since devaluing the chorus and Manoa devalues their ethnicity, a corrective reading compatible with a charitable rather than triumphalist Christianity would recognize Milton's use of a positive typology (congruity rather than disparity) and his transfer of terms from the Heb. Bible to the NT in order to emphasize God's ways with his faithful.

The great natural law theorists of the 17th c., such as Grotius and Selden, attempt to discover shared moral rules in the natural, precivil state of humankind that would provide a basis for relationships among human beings anywhere in the world. This is in part what makes their work a pioneering contribution to international relations. Instead of a Pauline dualism that pits the carnal children of loins against the spiritual children of faith, Grotius and Selden look for continuities among the cultures and religions of pagans, Jews, Muslims, and Christians. Their positive influence on Milton's poetry and prose is evident in his best work that, instead of eliding the Hebraic factor in a nature-grace dichotomy, emphasizes the compatibility of pagan natural law, Hebraic Mosaic law, and Gospel. The right order of ascending value in Milton's monistic prose treatises (Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, Tetrachordon, Areopagitica, Tenure of Kings and Magistrates) includes the lower in the higher without a turning away or rejection. This tripartite crescendo arrangement also informs some of Milton's most successful poetry: the devel. of the idea of katharos (pure) in the successive quatrains of his last sonnet, which begins with Euripides' Alcestis, extends to the levitical rites of purification after childbirth under "the old Law," and concludes with a vision of absolute purity in a Christian heaven; and the continuous but developing sense of the pastoral in "Lycidas," narrated by a shepherd whose consolation is measured, at least in part, by the progression in meaning of the very words shepherd and pastoral, from cl. aesthetics (64–84) through Hebraic-prophetic ethics (113–31) to the limitless reward of a Christian heaven purged of evil (165–85).

The first four books of Paradise Lost derive primarily from pagan authors, who are governed by natural law. The middle books draw most heavily on Hebraic revelation beyond nature's law, provided by the "Divine Interpreter," Raphael. The last books attempt systematically to debase the others by submitting both natural law and the Mosaic law to the judgment of Christian experience. Paradise Lost is a radically nostalgic work that insists relentlessly on the discontinuity between Christianity and earlier dispensations and thus between Christian postlapsarian life and a Hebraic paradise before the Fall. But the doctrinal use of negative typology contrasts with a synthesizing poetic imagination. Milton's most beautiful poetry can mingle the voices of Homer (the descent of Hermes) and Genesis (the visit of the three angels to Abraham) with his own (Raphael's descent to Paradise in book 5); or, with equal brilliance, Wisdom in Prov. 8:30–31 ("Then I was by him as a nurseling, and I was daily his delight, playing always before him"), the *muse Urania in book 7 of Paradise Lost, and Milton's Samson ("I was his nursling once and choice delight, / His destined from the womb" [633–34]).

V. Midrash and Kabbalah. A uniquely Heb. mode of discourse that has attracted critical attention in recent years is midrash. This term refers originally to the scriptural exegesis practiced by the Talmudic rabbis, involving homilies, parables, and the imaginative interweaving of different texts. It was further developed in later centuries by the Hasidic masters. Midrash is something between interpretive and creative writing. Kermode (1979) applies the term to the different versions of the Passion narrative. Thus, Matthew offers us a "midrash" on Mark: we have to do with retold tales, reinvented for new audiences. Such interpretive fiction is found in many literary genres. Samson Agonistes is a kind of midrash on Judg. 13–16, and Paradise Lost is a midrash on Gen. 1–3. The midrashic mode is of great importance for such mod. writers as S. Y. Agnon (Israel) and Jorge Luis Borges (Argentina) and is manifestly the basis of the work of the Fr. writer Edmond Jabès. Frye speaks of Franz Kafka's The Trial as a kind of "midrash" on Job. This model of interpretive or *hermeneutic discourse is congenial to some mod. theorists who welcome the merging of the critical and creative functions. It also sits well with the contemp. emphasis on *intertextuality. Meaning is thought to inhere not in texts but in the interrelations between them—as Bloom (1973) has it, "the meaning of a poem can only be another poem."

The last type of Hebraism to be noted is Kabbalah. In its origin, Kabbalah is simply an esoteric form of midrash. Its classic text, the Zohar (Book of Splendor), is a commentary on the Pentateuch aimed at uncovering its occult meaning, which has to do with the dynamic structure of the divine world itself and with primordial beginnings, rather than with hist. It has links with Gnosticism. Kabbalah aroused a great deal of interest among the humanists of the Ren., esp. Johann Reuchlin in Germany and Giovanni Pico della Mirandola and Francesco Giorgi in Italy. Its ideas gained currency (though often in distorted form) in the 16th and 17th cs. in combination with elements of alchemy and Neoplatonism.

The first major poet to give powerful expression to kabbalistic ideas and symbols was Blake. His notion of the giant Albion is derived from the kabbalistic Adam Kadmon, who "anciently containd in his mighty limbs all things in Heaven and Earth," while the mythological drama involving Blake's "Zoas" and their female "Emanations" bears a striking resemblance to the sexual inner life of the kabbalistic Sefirot. Similarly kabbalistic is Blake's notion of a primordial Fall from which all evil flows in the divine and human realms. These ideas (drawn intermediately from Emanuel Swedenborg and others) had a central influence on shaping Blake's poetry as a whole. Kabbalistic notions and images also emerged in the work of Victor Hugo, esp. his later, apocalyptic poems, and in the occult system developed by W. B. Yeats. In literary theory, Kabbalah has been claimed by Bloom (1975) as a crucial example of creative "misreading" and consequently as a model for "strong" poetry. Kabbalistic "misreadings" involving the radical subversion of normal lang. have also been seen as an anticipation of mod. trends. Idel speaks of Abraham Abulafia as "deconstructing language as a communicative instrument into meaningless combinations of letters." New meanings are then discovered from the resulting verbal fragments by a kind of free association.

In his final major work, Fisch (1999) engaged passionately with the erotics of Blake and P. B. Shelley. One of his central ideas is that Blake hated the law of the Heb. Bible both in itself and as it affected Milton but was in thrall to the Bible's Heb. poetry and to Milton's biblical poetry, which he identified with the sublime. And where Fisch himself points out the harm of Blake's thought, which ecstatically fuses self-knowledge, eros, and death, he also responds passionately to the beauty of Blake's poetry.

See CLASSICAL POETICS, CLASSICISM, HEBREW POETRY, HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS.

■ Background Studies: The Legacy of Israel, ed. E. R. Bevan and C. Singer (1928); D. Daiches, "The Influence of the Bible on English Literature," and F. Lehner, "The Influence of the Bible on European Literature," The Jews, ed. L. Finkelstein, 3d ed. (1960); S. W. Baron, A Social and Religious History of the Jews, 2d ed., v. 13 (1969), 160–201; and v. 15 (1973), 141–55; Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. R. Alter and F. Kermode (1987)—esp. the appendix, "General Essays."

■ Specialized Studies: J. C. Powys, The Enjoyment of Literature (1938); Leo Spitzer, "Understanding Milton," Essays on English and American Literature, ed. A. Hatcher (1962); Auerbach; D. Hirst, Hidden Riches (1964)—on occultism in Blake; H. Fisch, Jerusalem and Albion (1964)—on 17th-c. Heb.; F. Secret, Les Kabbalistes chrétiens de la Renaissance (1964); M. Roston, Prophet and Poet (1965)—on Lowth and the beginnings of romanticism; E. Auerbach, Literary Language and Its Public in Late Latin Antiquity and in the Middle Ages, trans. R. Manheim (1965)—ch. 1; D. J. DeLaura, Hebrew and Hellene in Victorian England (1969); A. A. Ansari, "Blake and the Kabbalah," William Blake, ed. A. H. Rosenfeld (1969); H. Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence (1973), and Kabbalah and Criticism (1975); F. S. Heuman, The Uses of Hebraisms in Recent Bible Translations (1977); F. Kermode, The Genesis of Secrecy (1979); J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry (1981), and "On the Bible and Literary Criticism," Prooftexts 1 (1981); N. Frye, The Great Code (1982); S. A. Handelman, The Slayers of Moses (1982); G. H. Hartman, "On the Jewish Imagination," Prooftexts 5 (1985); C. Bloch, Spelling the Word (1985)–on Herbert and the Psalms; Midrash and Literature, ed. G. H. Hartman and S. Budick (1986)—valuable bibl.; H. Fisch, Poetry with a Purpose (1988); Critics of the Bible 1724–1873, ed. J. Drury (1989); M. Idel, Language, Torah, and Hermeneutics in Abraham Abulafia (1989); E. Aizenberg, "Hebraism and Poetic Influence," Borges and His Successors, ed. E. Aizenberg (1990); D. Boyarin, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (1990); J. P. Rosenblatt, Torah and Law in "Paradise Lost" (1994); H. Fisch, The Biblical Presence in Shakespeare, Milton, and Blake (1999); J. Kugel, The Bible as It Was (1999), J. Rosenblatt, England's Chief Rabbi: John Selden (2006); G. Toomer, John Selden: A Life in Scholarship, 2 v. (2009); C. Goodblatt, The Christian Hebraism of John Donne (2010); E. Nelson, The Hebrew Republic: Jewish Sources and the Transformation of European Political Thought (2010); H. Hamlin, "The Pilgrim's Progress and the King James Bible," The King James Bible after Four Hundred Years, ed. H. Hamlin and N. W. Jones (2011).

H. FISCH; J. ROSENBLATT

HEBREW POETRY

I. Introduction
II. Biblical and Medieval
III. Modern

I. Introduction. Heb. lit. spans three millennia and ranks among the world's oldest. Heb. poetry began to appear at least by the 11th c. BCE and flourishes in contemp. Israel. Whatever gaps disrupted this virtually continuous literary flow should be attributed more to the loss of linking texts than to a diminution of creativity. Heb. poets may not always have been aware of their entire literary heritage, but most often they did have both a diachronic and synchronic knowledge of much of it.

In every age, the Heb. Bible has constituted the foundation and principal component of that heritage, a major source for literary forms, *symbols, rhetorical *tropes, syntactic structures, and vocabulary. There has been, however, no uniformity in metrical systems: these have varied from age to age and, following the biblical period, were usually adapted from those employed in the area where the Heb. poet happened to reside. In the Persian period (5th–4th cs. BCE), Aramaic began to replace Heb. as the vernacular in Palestine, continuing as the spoken lang. long into the Byzantine period (4th–7th cs. CE), while Gr. prevailed in the Mediterranean diaspora. With the rise of Islam in the 7th c., Ar. became the lingua franca for Jews of the Middle East, North Africa, and Spain. In Christian Europe, the various IE langs. were adopted. From the Middle Ages until the early 20th c., Yiddish was the vernacular used by the majority of Eur. Jewry as the centers of Jewish population shifted to Central and Eastern Europe. The interplay of these non-Hebraic langs. and lits. with Heb., the literary lang. of the Jews, broadened and altered Heb. poetry, affecting its syntax, vocabulary, themes, and genres.

The scope and variety of these phenomena make it as difficult to formulate a single comprehensive definition of Heb. poetry as it is to formulate one for world poetry. Still, the definition of poetry proposed by Barbara Herrnstein Smith is sufficient to accommodate the entire gamut of Heb. poetry: "As soon as we perceive that a verbal sequence has a sustained rhythm, that it is formally structured according to a continuously operating principle of organization . . . we are in the presence of poetry and we respond to it accordingly, expecting certain effects from it and not others" (Poetic Closure, 1968).

II. Biblical and Medieval

A. Biblical Poetry (1100 BCE–150 BCE). The Heb. Bible (or OT) is an assemblage of sacred texts composed over a span of about a thousand years. The earliest mss.—

primarily the Dead Sea Scrolls—date only from the 2d–1st c. BCE, but ling. and historical considerations provide a basis for ascribing the composition of most of the included texts to earlier centuries. The relative date and general period of most texts can be determined with some assurance, but the date of many poems and even of books remains controversial. Close to a third of the Heb. Bible is poetry. Many scholars believe the most salient feature of biblical poetry, like the Semitic, and esp. Ugaritic (13th-c. North Canaanite), poetry that preceded it, is parallelismus membrorum (Lowth) or *parallelism. There also appears to be a quasi-metrical feature in this poetry, in that the lines forming most *couplets and the occasional triplet are of similar length (Herder). Efforts to define the prosodic component more precisely are, however, unconvincing, usually involving manipulations of the received text to suit a particular theory. And no early Heb. poem maintains a consistent line length throughout.

No poetics of Heb. poetry was transmitted in ancient times. The earliest attempts to describe biblical *prosody were performed by some of the church fathers, who tended to compare contemp. Gr. and Lat. forms, and more extensive treatments by Jewish scholars began only in the Middle Ages (Cooper, Kugel 1979, Berlin 1991, Harris). Recent decades have seen several substantial efforts to describe biblical poetry (e.g., O'Connor, Alter, Berlin 1985, Watson, Pardee, Alonso Schökel).

Defining the basic components of biblical Heb. poetry depends on how one views the matter of *meter. Phonological meter in the strict sense, although proposed in one way or another since Sievers (1901; see, e.g., Stuart), cannot be established. Counting major words or word accents as one beat each, or counting syllables with or without attention to phonemic *accent, does not yield convincing results (Pardee, Vance). O'Connor has suggested instead a meter founded on syntactic constraints—only so many words, so many constituents, so many clauses within a line. The wide flexibility of the poetic line in the Bible leads Hrushovski to conceive of free rhythms ("rhythm[s] based on a cluster of changing principles") for biblical verse (cf. Dobbs-Allsopp 2009). Nevertheless, taken by itself, no prosodic or purely syntactic meter can be used to characterize a single line of biblical text as poetic. For that reason, most students of biblical poetry define the basic unit of verse as a two-part line (comprised of cola, *hemistichs, or *versets) or simply a couplet (of two lines). The poetic line is usually composed of two cola—sometimes three or four—that are parallel to each other.

While most descriptions of biblical parallelism up through the mid-20th c. focus on a reiteration of semantic sense and/or sentence structure, more recent accounts, influenced by Roman Jakobson's seminal work, highlight repetitions of ling. features in all areas of lang. Hrushovski summarizes the possibilities: "It may be a parallelism of semantic, syntactic, prosodic, morphological, or sound elements, or of a combination of such elements." Observing that there is more often repetition of sound within the line than between lines, Greenstein (1986–87) downplays the phonological element. He also separates out semantic content, which is context-dependent and unquantifiable, from the other, properly formal components and points to three primary features of biblical parallelism: first and foremost, relative balance of line length; second, a repetition of syntactic structure, on either the surface or underlying (deep) level, from line to line; and third, a distribution of conventionally associated words or phrases between the lines of the couplet. These can be a paradigmatically related set of words paired in the poetic trad. For example, rosh-qodqod (head, pate); yayin-damʿanavim (wine, blood of grapes); shamaʿ-bin (hear, discern) or a syntagmatically related set of words, known in biblical studies (Melamed) as the breakup of a stereotyped phrase (e.g., "Balaam son of Beor" split into "Balaam"—"son of Beor"). All parallel lines have at least one, and ordinarily more than one, of these three features.

Some of the repetitive patterns that constitute parallelism occur in biblical prose, esp. in legal formulations. However, this does not mean that the boundary between prose and poetry in the Bible is indistinct. For one thing, although an umistakably poetic couplet may be embedded within a distinctly prose context (e.g., Gen. 7:11b), in a full poem, the parallelisms occur in an uninterrupted series of couplets, triplets, and an occasional single line. For another, in addition to the properties of parallelism, biblical poetry is typically characterized by a number of optional tropes, incl. but not limited to syntactic deletion in the second line with lengthening of a nondeleted constituent as "compensation" to maintain the balance of line length (Geller); variations in word order (e.g., *chiasmus); *alliteration, *assonance, and *rhyme; *figuration; distinctively poetic *diction (e.g., tehom [sea, subterranean ocean]; maḥats [smite]); *ambiguity or double entendre; *paronomasia; terseness or *concision of expression—and more specifically, parataxis (see HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS) and nonuse of the relative pronoun (ʾasher), the direct-object marker (ʾet), and the definite article (ha-)—and other archaic ling. features (Robertson).

Moreover, in early biblical poetry, and in many later poems as well, there is a different, more archaic verbal system. In the earlier system, the present and future, or foreground, are expressed by the prefixed form yiqtol (old West Semitic yaqtulu), while the past, or background, is expressed by the suffixed form qatal (old West Semitic qatala). This system contrasts with that of biblical prose, in which the past is conveyed by wayyiqtol in clause-initial position and qatal in noninitial position, and the future by we-qatal clause-initially or yiqtol noninitially (Niccacci). Last but not least, biblical poetry is composed largely of verbal clauses with little embedding, while biblical prose tends to have nominal chains and embedded clauses. As Polak has shown, there is a direct correlation between the syntactic simplicity of poetic lines in the Bible and the oral character of Heb. verse. Be that as it may, if we bear all these criteria in mind, it is difficult not to recognize a biblical Heb. poem, or even a couplet, when we see one.

Consider this short song, which is quoted with an introduction in a prose narrative context (Num. 21:17–18):

ʿalí beʾér / ʿenú-láh
beʾér ḥaparúha sarím karúha nedibé haʿám
bimḥoqéq / bemishʿanotám

(Arise, O well! / Sing to it!
The well the princes have dug,
[The well] the people's leaders have excavated,
With their staffs, / with their walking-sticks.)

The poem is constructed of four couplets in parallelism. The first and last are either brief couplets or lines featuring internal parallelism. The middle two lines, longer than the first two but balanced between themselves, are a couplet, two roughly synonymous relative clauses with "well" as their head, each formed of the same syntactic pattern, except that the head ("well") is deleted in the second line. Note that the subject nounphrase in the second line is longer than that in the first line, compensating for the quasi-metrical weight that is lost as a result of the deletion. The last line (or couplet) comprises two fairly synonymous adverbial complements, which are structurally as well as lexically (the anaphoric preposition bi) repetitive. There is sound repetition in the first couplet between the first and last syllables. There is word repetition (beʾér) from the first couplet to the second. In the second couplet, the first line displays assonance between the first two words (b-r followed by p-r), while the verb in the second line echoes and rhymes with the verb in the first line. Archaic features include the omission of the definite article (ha-) in all but the third line (haʿam) and of the relative pronoun in both lines of the middle couplet. Each couplet is syntactically dependent on the preceding one, but from a purely semantic perspective, the second line of each couplet adds little to the sense. The entire song boils down to a single sentence—Arise, O well that the princes have dug with their walking sticks! It is typical of biblical poetry, however, to advance the message in steps, adding a point or a nuance here, burnishing or refining an image there. In this poem, parataxis governs the whole; there are no connectives. In later biblical poetry, parataxis decreases and variety and flexibility increase, but the essential features remain the same.

In ancient Semitic poetry preceding the Heb. Bible, such as the strongly cognate verse from Ugarit (see above), poetry serves as a narrative mode, as in an *epic as well as a *lyric mode, as in *hymns and prayers. Biblical poetry is characteristically nonnarrative. In biblical poetry, events are not recounted but dramatized (Lichtenstein). Moreover, poetry of any length in the Bible is always discourse—it is spoken by a named or implied speaker (Greenstein 2000). When the speaker expresses thoughts and feelings, it may be lyric (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, Linafelt). When the speaker gives instructions or advice, it may be *gnomic. The poetic discourse may take the form of hymns or *songs embedded in narratives (e.g., the Song at the Sea in Exod. 15, the Song of Deborah in Judg. 5, the prayer of Jonah in Jon. 2) or collected in the book of *Psalms; or of prophetic oracles, mostly assembled in the books of the prophets; or of *epigrams, as in the book of Proverbs. The *elegies of the book of Lamentations and the rhapsodies of the Song of Songs are in poetry. The contrasting functions of prose for narrative and poetry for discourse are well exemplified by the book of Job, whose narrative framework is prose and whose lengthy speeches are in poetry. There is a tendency toward parallelism, the hallmark of biblical poetry, in discourse within prose narrative as well.

*Imagery and *metaphor, though not invariably present in biblical poetry, are prominent in many genres and poems. Some metaphors, such as the wicked as a predator and the needy as vulnerable sheep, are the biblical poet's stock in trade. Most often, a particular figuration will not be employed for more than one instance at a time. Even in Psalm 23, the image of God as shepherd gives way to that of host, spreading out a table for the speaker in view of his adversaries. In the poetry of some of the prophets, Job, and other texts, however, an image or metaphor may pervade a large stretch of verse (e.g., Isa. 5:1–4) or even several chapters (for Jeremiah, see Jindo).

B. Extracanonical Works (i.e., works not included in the Heb. biblical canon). The book of Sirach (the sole apocryphal work, a substantial part of which is preserved in the Heb. original) and the Dead Sea Scrolls discovered in 1947–48 indicate that poetic activity did not cease after the canonization of the Heb. Bible in the 2d c. BCE Most scholars ascribe the apocryphal works to the 2d or 1st c. BCE, and their poetry is akin to that found in the wisdom lit. The author of Sirach at times displays a remarkable fluency and originality, as when he describes the High Priest's entry into the Holy of Holies on Yom Kippur:

How glorious (he was) when he emerged from the Sanctuary
And stepped out from inside the curtain;
Like a star shining through thick clouds,
Like a full moon on feast days,
Like the sun combing the King's palace,
Like a rainbow seen in the cloud,
Like a lily by a flowing stream,
Like a flower of Lebanon on a summer's day
Like the fire of frankincense upon the offering.
(50:5–9)

C. The Mishnaic and Talmudic Period (ca. 100 BCE–500 CE). The lit. that has survived from the Mishnaic-Talmudic era is primarily legal or homiletic, but it contains several *occasional poems celebrating important events in life: births, circumcisions, marriages, and epitaphs. These were preserved not for their aesthetic quality but because they honored important scholars. Stylistically, they mark a break with the biblical trad. Instead of parallelism, many use a four-colon line. The poems are not laced with biblical quotations, their vocabulary is a mixture of biblical and postbiblical words, and their syntax is late Heb.

D. The Byzantine Period (500–800). Piyyut (derived from Gr. poiētēs) or synagogue hymnography is distinctive in both its volume and its focus from biblical psalmody and poetry. This type of poetry was produced since the late Roman period in Jewish communities and congregations where poetry was allowed to embellish Jewish liturgy. Such compositions were preferably written for the Sabbath and festivals when statutory prayers were supposed to have a link with the theme of the day. The majority of Jewish liturgical poems (piyyutim) for the Sabbath relates to biblical topics or addresses ways of *exegesis with regard to biblical themes, whereas festival compositions extensively deal with the aspects of the holiday involved. Since the early 20th c., tens of thousands of piyyutim have been re-collected from the Genizah mss., deciphered, reconstructed, and edited in critical eds., with important results in particular for our knowledge of Byzantine-Jewish and Babylonian-Jewish liturgy and hymnology. By virtue of these textual studies, names and works of long-forgotten synagogue poets (paytanim) in different temporal and regional settings have been added to the corpus, leading to great progress in the knowledge about distinct piyyutic genres and forms. We would not have known otherwise about the significance and growth of the early qinot (threnodies), selihot (penitential hymns), 'avodot (compositions for the Day of Atonement), qedushta'ot or yozrot (multipart hymns for the Sabbath and festival morning services); nor would we have been acquainted with the names of great hymnists who have been crucial for the trad. of Piyyut.

Piyyut as a phenomenon in Jewish culture and lit. deserves further investigation concerning its interactivity with surrounding cultures and religions. Themes and motifs are not exclusively versified recounts of rabbinic-midrashic materials but also draw on other noncanonical and nonrabbinic sources or can be considered as intrinsically paytanic. Piyyut lang. is a fascinating combination of biblical, rabbinic, and "jargonic-piyyutic" grammar and vocabulary, at times mixed with elements from Aramaic and Gr.

Yose ben Yose (4th c.) is the first paytan whose name is known. He heads a line of major composers who wrote in Palestine between the 6th c. until after the Muslim conquest of Jerusalem in 636 CE, the most famous among them being Yannai (6th c.), Simeon bar Megas (6th c.), Yehudah (6th c.), Eleazar birabbi Qillir (7th c.), Yohanan ha-Kohen (7th c.), and Joseph ben Nisan (7th c.). During the 5th and 6th cs., the various piyyut forms became standardized and were usually inserted into key sections of the synagogue liturgy. These hymnists introduced consistent strophic and rhyme schemes; they also favored other intricate poetic structures and employed a rich variety of prosodic devices and lexical patterns. There can be little question that the cantor-poets were widely regarded as the mouthpiece of their communities. The med. Chronicle of Ahima'ats (1017–60) proves to be particularly informative in this regard, since it preserves an account of the Palestinian hazzan Ahima'ats who, during his visit to southern Italy, was invited to recite in synagogue the poems of other hymnists, incl. the poem of a locally rejected paytan called Silano. By adapting some of Silano's verses accusing the Karaites of heresy and favoring the Rabbanites, Ahima'ats succeeded in regaining the confidence of the Jerusalem rabbis, and he eventually rehabilitated Silano's piyyutim in his hometown. The story affords us some idea of the socioreligious context in which the cantor-poets functioned.

E. Muslim Spain (900–1100). The ling. studies of Heb. in the Islamic East in the hands of Saadia Gaon (882–942), Dunash Ibn Labrat (920–90), and others—some of them migrated from Iraq to Spain—stimulated the Jews of Muslim Spain to engage in a renaissance of Heb. lang. and lit. Andalusian-Jewish poets combined the role of poet and philologist and earned a living by their work by the patronage of Jewish aristocratic courtiers, who employed them for the sake of their status and position. The most famous example is Hasday Ibn Shaprut (ca. 915–975), the Jewish counselor of Caliph Abdarahman III of Córdoba, who maintained a coterie of Jewish poets at his court. These composers were aware of contemp. tastes as well as of the Jewish poetic trad., inducing them to emphasize a greater purity of Heb. in the biblical sense. Grammatical correctness was appreciated and a biblicist style was applied. However, they were also eager to invent new ways of composing in Heb. in close familiarity with the themes and techniques of Ar. poetry and poetics. Ar. influence is particularly felt in the description of themes such as love, wine, and nature in secular verse and in the use of metrical schemes that became standardized in both secular and liturgical poetry. But it was not only the new metrical forms that were borrowed from the Arabs: Heb. poets adopted the rules of composition fixed by the Arab rhetoricians, their rhyme patterns, and various other themes. They also favored the local Sp. version of the popular "girdle" poems or muwashshaḥāt. The last couplets of these compositions were often written in either Ar. or Sp., mostly derived from popular lyrics. These parting lines (see KHARJA) are very instructive for the comprehension of some of the surviving Ar. or Romance vernacular. Only when they wrote piyyutim or synagogue hymns did they sometimes adhere to traditional models. More often than not, they employed the Arab structures and techniques even in the religious domain. In terms of their Heb. diction, they eschewed the cavalier way by which the paytanim constructed words and phrases, considering these to be barbarisms. If the Arab rhetoricians had insisted that the lang. of the Qur'an was the epitome of good writing, their Heb. counterparts adhered to the biblical models, though on rare occasions they allowed themselves to draw their vocabulary from Talmudic sources. Because Heb. and Ar. are both Semitic langs., they infused Heb. words at times with Ar. connotations.

One of the most common genres was the Ar. ode or qaṣīda, which soon became the vehicle for *occasional verse written to celebrate an important event or to praise a patron (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY). The Heb. imitations of such poems would begin in a purely lyrical vein, describing the beauties of nature, a drinking party, or a meeting of friends or would develop a philosophical meditation; the poet would then shift into a laudatory mode praising a patron or colleague. A prolific poet was Samuel the Prince, Samuel Ibn Nagrela ha-Nagid (993–1056), who attained the powerful position of chief vizier of Granada and head of the Muslim army of the Berber king Habbus. Because of his military career, he wrote a great deal of secular poetry on the battlefield, a phenomenon never repeated by any other med. Heb. poet. He was followed by Solomon Ibn Gabirol (ca. 1021–55) from Malaga, a philosopher and poetic genius. His secular poetry includes amatory poems of much beauty, while his religious works give expression to his Neoplatonic ideas. In his lyric-cosmological composition Keter Malkhut (Kingly Crown, ca. 1041), he contrasts the glory of God the Creator with the tragic shortcomings of the human. Moses Ibn Ezra (1055–1135) was noted for his deep familiarity with Ar. poetry. Ibn Ezra is the leading theoretician of the Andalusian-Heb. school of poetry. His Sefer ha-'Iyyunim we-ha-Diyyunim (Book of Discussion and Commemoration, ca. 1135) is a valuable source for the study of aesthetic principles of Heb. secular poetry based on Ar. poetics. The standards of purity listed by Ibn Ezra were, in fact, valid for both liturgical and secular verse. A protégé of Ibn Ezra and the most renowned of all Andalusian-Heb. poets was Jehudah Halevi (ca. 1074–1141), born in the Christian north of Spain and also acclaimed as the author of a widely read philosophical treatise entitled the Kuzari (ca. 1140). His poem "Tsiyyon ha-lo tish'ali" (Zion, will you not ask; 1120–40), a song of love and longing for the land of Israel, was widely known and inspired many imitators. At the end of his life, Halevi indeed traveled to the crusader's kingdom of Palestine, reached Jerusalem, and died under unknown circumstances. The Andalusian school of Heb. poetry, of which Halevi undoubtedly is the most illustrious example, had a continuing influence on the trends emerging in Heb. secular poetry of Christian Spain.

F. Italian. The It. Jewish community was established in Roman times. Although it was small in numbers, it was highly cultured and, until the 19th c., made important contributions to the corpus of Heb. poetry. The first It. poet known to us is Silano of Venosa (9th c.), who wrote piyyutim in the style of the Palestinian school that had dominated It. Heb. poetry until the 12th c. Among Italy's leading paytanim were Shephatiah ben Amittai (d. 886) and Amittai ben Shephatiah (9th c.) of the Ahima'ats family and Meshullam ben Qalonymos (10th c.).

Between the 12th and 15th cs. the influence of Sp.-Heb. poetry—its syllabic meters, subject matter, and structures—prevailed, but vernacular It. forms were gradually introduced, esp. the sonnet in the 14th c. and terza rima in the 15th. The leading poets of this period were Benjamin ben Abraham degli Mansi (13th c.) and the renowned Immanuel of Rome (see below).

The final period begins at the close of the 15th c. and ends at the opening of the 20th. At first, we feel the impact of the Sp. Jewish exiles who reached Italy after 1492. Religious poetry is now dominated by the Kabbalah or Jewish theosophy. Secular poetry, on the other hand, reflected the increasing contact with It. culture. More It. poetic forms are introduced: the ottava, the canzone*, the canzonetta, the *madrigal, and blank verse (versi sciolti). Heb. poetic drama appears in the 17th c., to be followed by many such works in the 18th and 19th cs. Ar. quantitative meter is soon modified by the elimination of the distinction between short and long syllables so that the lines began to resemble the It. endecasillabo (see HENDECASYLLABLE; Pagis 1976). The 17th-c. poet Nathan Jedidiah of Orvieto even made an attempt to write poems in accentual meter (see ACCENTUAL VERSE), but the hendecasyllabic line prevailed.

Four poets stand out: Immanuel of Rome (1261–1332), Jacob and Immanuel Francis (16th c.), and Moses Hayyim Luzzatto (1707–46). Immanuel of Rome was undoubtedly the greatest of the Italians. His Mahberot Immanuel (Immanuel's Compositions) is a collection of maqamot containing 28 sections, the last of which, ha-tophet we-ha-Eden (Hell and Paradise), was inspired by Dante's Divina commedia. Immanuel first introduced the sonnet into Heb. poetry. His supple verse reflects the culture of the Ren.; his bawdy verses are a rarity in Heb. letters. Immanuel composed a rhetorical work in which he described the new forms in It. verse and insisted that the acutezza (agudeza* or *wit) of the poem's *diction and subject matter must be primary. By this term, he meant the use of surprise, either formally (*oxymoron) or conceptually (*paradox), by strange and complex metaphors or uncommon *conceits. In this, he was faithful to the *baroque school then current in Italy and Spain. Jacob and Immanuel Frances of Mantua wrote polemic satires against the supporters of Shabtai Zevi (17th c.), the mystical Messiah.

Luzzatto composed poems and allegorical *closet dramas similar to the It. works of his day. His first play, Migdal 'Oz (Tower of Strength, 1737), was modeled after Giovanni Battista Guarini's Il pastor fido. Luzzatto combined an awareness of 18th-c. science with a deep Kabbalistic faith. His achievement lies on the border between a late Ren. and a mod. worldview.

The Heb. poetry produced by premod. Ashkenazi Jewry was almost entirely religious, influenced by the Palestinian and It. schools. It consisted of liturgical hymns and dirges commemorating the massacres during the Crusades. A particular genre of martyrological poetry was the 'aqedah, which celebrated the sacrifice of Isaac as a symbol of the martyrdom of Jews.

Ephraim of Bonn (12th c.) has a fine example of this genre (discussed by Shalom Spiegel, The Last Trial), and U-netaneh toqef (10th c.), a prayer attributed to the martyr Amnon of Mayence, which still holds a prominent place in the Yom Kippur liturgy.

By the 16th c., the center of Ashkenazi Jewry had moved from Germany to Eastern Europe. The Jews in the Polish-Lithuanian kingdom expressed their piety by the meticulous observation of the halakhah (Jewish Law) and by the study of religious texts. They inhabited a cultural milieu that infrequently resorted to the arts—not even to the composition of religious hymns.

III. Modern

A. The European Period (1782–1918). At the end of the 18th c., a new kind of Heb. poetry emerged in Central Europe. This poetry was part of the Jewish Enlightenment, or Haskalah, a term derived from the Heb. word for intellect. From the Middle Ages until the 1780s, Heb. had been used primarily for religious texts, with the exception of works by the aforementioned It.-Jewish poets. The Jewish Enlightenment, in contrast, promoted the use of Heb. for educational, scientific, philosophical, and aesthetic works. The poems of the Haskalah, thus, came to be viewed as an alternative to the religious Heb. canon.

The Haskalah movement began in Germany with influential figures such as the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86) and the Ger. Jewish Hebraist, educator, and poet Naphtali Hirz Wessely (1725–1805). Wessely published the *manifesto of the movement, Divre Shalom ve-Emet (Words of Peace and Truth, 1782). Other important figures of the early movement were Isaac Eichel (1756–1804), a student of Immanuel Kant, and Baruch Lindau (1759–1849). Together they founded the first club of Enlightenment poets and thinkers, known as the Maskilim (Enlighteners or Proponents of Enlightenment); the club published the first Heb. periodical, Ha'me'asef (The Gatherer), a collection of mostly didactic Heb. poetry by contemp. writers.

The Haskalah soon spread to Jewish communities in Vienna and Prague and expanded eastward from there to the region of Galicia in Eastern Europe. By the middle of the 1820s, the movement had reached Russia. In all these places, the Maskilim advocated a rationalist intellectual Heb. discourse espousing universal and humanistic values, a strong commitment to Jewish society, and a wish to reform its traditional structures. They promoted openness to the ideas of the local Western culture; however, when it came to poetic form, they strictly followed the syllabic meters of the It. Heb. poets of the previous century. The Maskilim poets developed a new style of writing, a *collage of biblical Heb. phrases called melitsah. This style was described by the poet and thinker Shlomo Levisohn (1789–1821) in his 1816 book Melitsat Yeshurun (The Eloquence of Yeshurun).

While literary historians generally agree about the role of the Haskalah in the devel. of the new poetry, some date the emergence of mod. Heb. poetry only to the middle of the 19th c., while others place it as late as the end of the century. However, there is no doubt that the 1850s and 1860s saw rapid growth in the community of readers and in the publication of Jewish poems, poetry books, and periodicals such as Ha'magid (The Preacher), Ha'carmel (The Carmel), and Ha'melitz (The Advisor). A new Heb. lit. crit. also arose. In terms of style, the didactic epos of the Haskalah was replaced in prose with the new Heb. novel and in poetry with the modern *long poem.

In the mid-19th c., Heb. poetry grew to include a wider scope of themes and genres. Talented new poets soon established themselves as major Heb. writers, among them Micha Joseph Levenson (also known as Michal, 1828–52) and the most renowned poet of the Haskalah, Judah Leib Gordon (1830–92). Gordon's long poems were mostly on biblical themes. Some of his writings, however, included strong social and political messages, referring, e.g., to the condition of women in religious Judaism in Kutzo Shel Yod (The Point on Top of the Yod, 1878); criticizing religious dogmatism; or calling on the Jewish people to emancipate themselves (while also questioning their ability to do so), as in his poem "Hakitza Ami" (Awake My People, 1863).

Another strand of mod. Heb. poetry emerged with the pre-Zionist national movement, Hibbat Zion, in Eastern Europe, which brought about a wave of sentimental Heb. poems addressing or describing the national homeland. Poets writing about and to Zion included Mordecai Zevi Manne (1859–86), Naphtali Herz Imber (1856–1909), and Menahem Mendel Dolitzki (1856–1931).

In Italy, meanwhile, a few poets continued to write in Heb. Rachel Luzzatto Morpurgo (1790–1860), for instance, wrote mostly sonnets on religious, mystical, and secular themes. The work of the It. poet, philosopher, and biblical commentator Samuel David Luzzatto (also known as Shadal, 1800–65) reached Jewish communities beyond Italy and influenced the devel. of Jewish nationalism in lit. Mod. Heb. poets such as Hayyim Nachman Bialik were influenced also by the earlier work of Moses Hayyim Luzzatto (also known as Ramchal), a major It. Jewish writer who was considered by some to be the first mod. Heb. poet, predating even the works of the Haskalah poets. However, by the second half of the 19th c., Heb. poetry in Italy had declined, and Eastern Europe became its main center. Additionally, in the 19th c., a number of non-Eur. Jews composed Heb. verse. The Baghdadi-born Palestinian poet Avraham Barukh Mani (1854–82), e.g., wrote poetry in the It. Heb. style.

A major shift in Heb. poetry and in Jewish hist. took place around 1881–82, following the pogroms in Russia. These years mark the beginning of what Harshav has called the Modern Jewish Revolution, when ideas that had developed in relatively small circles for many years were rapidly adopted by millions of Jews. It was in this period that Hayyim Nachman Bialik (1873–1934) published his first poems. Bialik's poetry combined *accentual-syllabic meters from Rus. poetry with the rich sounds of the Ashkenazi pronunciation of Heb. In his poems, Heb. was not restricted to the vocabulary and syntax of the Bible but drew on the entire spectrum of Heb. lit. Bialik wrote about longing for Zion and life in the diaspora, about love, the struggle with faith, the pogroms, and much more.

Bialik's contribution to Heb. lit. included not only poetry, but major essays on lang. and lit. He was an influential ed. and publisher in Russia, Berlin, and, later, Tel Aviv. Though his production was relatively small, the quality and importance of his work, along with the prophetic tone of some of his poems, earned him the title of the Heb. *poet laureate. Many historiographies of Heb. poetry consider him the father of mod. Heb. poetry.

Bialik's contemp. Saul Tchernikhovsky (1875–1943) also furthered the devel. of an accentual-syllabic Heb. poetry and greatly enriched Heb. lit. with sonnets, *idylls, and other poetic forms. His trans. from ancient Gr., Akkadian, and Finnish, and his original poetic work in Heb., introduced his readers to Eur. myths, ideas, and verse forms. Bialik and Tchernikhovsky as well as other poets of the Heb. revival juxtaposed historical and national themes with a growing focus on the individual. Some of these poets were influenced by Eur. romanticisms and introduced to Heb. lit. elaborate descriptions of nature, thus expanding the vocabulary of the lang. to include names of flora and fauna. In this way, the Heb. poetry of this period contributed significantly to the revival of Heb. as a spoken lang.

Tchernikhovsky and Bialik were followed by major writers such as Jacob Fichman (1881–1958), Yehuda Karni (1884–1949), Zalman Shneor (1887–1959), and Jacob Steinberg (1887–1947).

B. Europe, 1918–48. The school of Bialik dominated Heb. poetry until the 1930s. By then, younger Heb. poets, many of whom had arrived in Israel following World War I and the Rus. Revolution, had begun to rebel against the older poets' linear and symmetrical forms, as well as their traditional sources and themes. Once used almost exclusively for rabbinical writings, Heb. had now become a full-fledged spoken lang., and the new poetry was tempered by the vernacular. It also reflected the Socialist-Zionist ideology of the pioneer culture, which was far less traditionally "Jewish" in theme and was permeated by the new Mediterranean landscape.

The most prominent "pioneer" poets were Nathan Alterman (1910–70) and Abraham Shlonsky (1900–73). Both were influenced by the Rus. revolutionary poets Alexander Blok, Vladimir Mayakovsky, and Sergei Esenin and by *expressionism. In their work, the ennui of the disintegrating urban Eur. culture, the destruction wrought by war, and the impending Holocaust vied with enthusiasm for the daring novelty of the reborn homeland, its bright but uncompromising colors, its sand dunes, and its sea. Another pioneer poet, Rachel Bluwstein Sela (1890–1931), wrote lyrical short poems in a clean and precise lang. that was influenced by the Rus. poet Anna Akhmatova and Rus. *acmeism. Rus. influence also made its way into Heb. poetry in Palestine through the works of the communist poet Alexander Penn (1906–72), who translated poems by Mayakovsky to Heb., and by Leah Goldberg (1911–70), a scholar, writer, and trans. (see RUSSIA, POETRY OF).

The uprooted poets of this generation wandered through the capitals of Europe, absorbing the cultures of their temporary homes. They were exposed not only to Rus. poetics but to Ger. expressionism, Fr. *symbolism, the existentialism of R. M. Rilke, Freudian and Jungian views of the arts, and much more. Many of these poets translated poems and plays from It., Fr., Rus., and Eng. into Heb. Shlonsky and Goldberg wrote poems and plays for both adults and children; Alterman published a highly influential political and satirical newspaper column in verse called Hatur Hashvi (The Seventh Column). Thus, in a relatively short period, these poets created a large canon of native Heb. Eretz Israeli poetry.

Another major figure in the devel. of Heb. poetry in Eretz Israel was the poet and activist Uri Zvi Greenberg (1894–1981). Greenberg broke away from Socialist-Zionist ideology to create a new poetic style with a messianic tone. For him, the "return" to the land was a return to God's historic covenant, a rejection of what he perceived as the "false" morality of the gentiles, and a dedication to the miracle of divine providence. Greenberg's style is often extravagantly Whitmanian. He eschews foreign verse forms, preferring the cadences of the biblical peroration and Jewish liturgical verse (piyyutim). His vocabulary is sometimes drawn from Kabbalistic texts.

Jonathan Ratosh (1908–81) and the Canaanite movement represented still another ideological direction in Heb. poetry. This movement tried to create a strong connection among land, lang., and poetry by reviving Canaanite sounds and the Canaanite pantheon. A very different connection between the land and poetic style can be found in the work of Esther Raab (1894–1981), Israel's first native-born woman poet, who was also the first to describe the landscape of Israel without the ambivalence of the immigrant poets.

While Heb. poetry of the early 1920s is characterized by modernist and experimental styles (see MODERNISM) and by its break from the rhythms and meters of the Ashkenazi pronunciation of Heb., much of the poetry written in the late 1920s, 1930s and even 1940s—esp. by poets from the Shlonsky-Alterman-Goldberg school—represented a return to constrained poetic expressions, to postsymbolism, and to the prosodic forms of the now established Eretz Israeli pronunciation.

While some poets from the 1920s onward wrote in *free verse, most were considered minor voices at the time. E.g., in 1923 in Vienna, David Vogel (1891–1944) published a collection of modernist lyric poems in free meter titled Lifnei Sha'ar ha-Afel (In Front of the Dark Gate). In Palestine, Avraham Ben-Yitzhak (1883–1950) experimented with a mod. form of biblical parallelism in "Bod'dim Omrim" (Loners Say, 1918) and in "Ashrei Hazor'im v'lo Yiktzoru" (Happy Are They Who Sow, 1930). Avot Yeshurun (1904–92) challenged readers with enigmatic, idiosyncratic, and complex poems and forms. Contrary to the ruling conventions of his time, he wrote in a lang. that openly reflected the multilingualism of both the immigrant writer and the land by including Yiddish and Ar. sounds and words. These poets were at the margins of the canon when their works were published; but the poets and critics of the next generation moved them to the center, as part of their revolt against Alterman, Shlonsky, and Goldberg.

C. Israeli Poets (1948–2010). With Israel's War of Independence in 1948, a new generation of Heb. poets arose. These were either native Israeli poets or products of the Heb. school system that the Zionists had established in Eastern Europe, who arrived in Palestine as young pioneers before the outbreak of World War II. For them, Heb. was a vibrant spoken lang., and Israel's landscape was the landscape of their youth, if not their infancy. While most no longer drew from the traditional religious world of Eastern Europe, the Bible and the Prayer Book (Sidur) continued to serve them as major sources, and biblical phrases, allusions, forms, and myths continued to occupy much of their poetry.

The older writers of the Israeli generation who began as junior members of the Shlonsky-Alterman school, such as Haim Guri (b. 1923), remained committed to the Socialist-Zionist ideology. Following the War of Independence and the mass immigration to Israel, however, many discovered that there were no simple solutions to the problems of their new society. Once independence was attained, individualism, which had been suppressed during the struggle, broke loose, and subjectivism became the rule.

In this era, poets such as Yehuda Amichai (1924–2000), Amir Gilboa (1917–84), and Abba Kovner (1918–87) abandoned the strict metrical and stanzaic patterns to which the Shlonsky-Alterman generation had adhered. Amichai chose his metaphors from quotidian experience—a newspaper headline, the terms of a contract, a cliché—as well as from traditional Jewish texts, to which he often gave an ironic twist. His poetry evoked a tension between the sacred and profane experiences of the mod. poet as a Jew, an Israeli, a Jerusalemite, and a human being.

By the 1950s, literary influences on Heb. poetry had become less Ger. or Rus., and more Anglo-Am. The poets known as the Statehood Generation, such as Amichai, Nathan Zach (b. 1930), Moshe Dor (b. 1932), David Avidan (1934–95), and Dahlia Rabikovitch (1936–2005), rebelled against the poetic style of Shlonsky and Alterman. Zach attacked what he termed the monotonous rhythms of Alterman and called for a new poetry in which line and stanza were freed from traditional rules. He also called for a new poetic diction characterized by semantic significance rather than mechanical regularity. He believed that poems should be not neatly rounded to a close but fluid and open-ended. Figurative lang. should be used sparingly: i.e., the poet should avoid manifestly poetic diction and syntax and draw upon everyday speech, incl. slang. Zach also attacked "objective" or "ideological" poetry: the artist, he believed, should concentrate on the subjective, existential experience of a complex mod. world. While not all the poets of the Statehood Generation followed Zach's views, most of them saw their work as an attempt to focus on the concrete, on the "here and now." In some of the poems of Avidan, e.g., the focus on the "now" meant constant questioning of the boundaries of the poetic lang. and form and bringing into poetry some of the sounds and patterns of the media and technology of a rapidly changing world. Toward the end of the 1960s, Avidan's poetry became even more concrete in an objectivistic and even pseudo-Talmudic manner.

Rabikovitch, a feminist poet whose sophisticated naïf poems have been widely acclaimed, focused on concrete and subjective experiences but in a rich lang. that drew from the many historical layers of Heb. Her collection Ahavat Tapu'ach Hazahav (The Love of the Orange, 1959) is lush with musical patterns. It is one of the most influential poetry collections of the later 1950s and the beginning of the 1960s, together with Zach's Shirim Shonim (Different Poems, 1960), Amichai's Shirim 1948–1962 (Poems), and Avidan's Masheu Bishvil Misheu (Something for Somebody, 1964).

In the 1960s, the poets Meir Wieseltier (b. 1941), Yair Horvitz (1941–88), and Yona Wallach (1944–85) created the Tel Aviv Circle and published some of the major works in mod. Heb. poetry. Wallach shocked Israeli readers with her daring expressions of sexuality and the decidedly Jungian bent of her poetry.

With the Lebanese War of the 1980s, Heb. poets reverted to more directly political poetry. In the wake of the war, several volumes of protest poetry appeared in which Zach and Rabikovitch, once the apostles of subjectivism, and younger poets such as Yitzhak Laor (b. 1948) participated. For Rabikovitch, this meant protesting oppression and suffering through intimate situations and the experiences of women and children. Political poetry, from both the Right and the Left, held sway until the 21st c. (see e.g., the work of Aharon Shabtai [b. 1939]).

Heb. poetry of the later 20th and early 21st cs. has been enriched by the interplay among multicultural Israeli voices. The works reflect the varied origins of both immigrants and their children and of different social and ethnic groups: the religious world of Zelda Mishkovsky (1914–84); the middle Eur. roots of Zach, Amichai, and Dan Pagis (1929–86); the Rus. Polish milieu from which sprang Kovner and Gilboa; the Anglo-Am. influences on T. Carmi (1925–94), Gabriel Preil (1911–93), who lived in New York, and Simon Halkin (1898–1987); the Mediterranean world of Mordecai Geldman (b. 1946); the Maghrebian world of Erez Biton (b. 1942); and the Arab-Jewish roots of Ronny Someck (b. 1951), Amira Hess (b. 1956), Haviva Pedaya (b. 1956), and Almog Behar (b. 1978).

Periodicals and jours. had been major venues for mod. Heb. poetry from its beginning, but the end of the 20th and beginning of the 21st cs. demonstrated a sudden growth in new jours. and a slight change in their role and format. It is difficult to predict which of the current directions in Heb. poetry will have a lasting influence, but the jour. appears to reflect a need for literary spaces that accommodate a diverse range of social, ethnic, and political affiliations, as well as the search for new poetic styles. Some of the jours. embodying these sentiments include Ha'Kivun Mizrach (To the East), a jour. focusing on Mizrahi and Arab-Jewish issues and questions of identity; Mashiv Haru'ach (Make the Wind Blow), a jour. devoted primarily to religious Heb. poetry; Mita'am: A Review of Literature and Radical Thought, ed. by Laor; Emda (Position), ed. by Ran Yagil, which calls for a return to modernist poetic values and to a new kind of poetic (but not social) elitism; Maayan (Spring), a forum for poetry in Israel and beyond; and the renewed format of Achshav (Now), a jour. that was instrumental in the devel. of Israeli poetry for many years and now appears in a new format. In 2005, a small group of poets and writers became associated with a new literary jour. titled Ho! Poets in Ho! strive to restore formal rhythms and rhymes to Heb. poetry and to create a poetry that is not specifically Israeli but more "cosmopolitan."

See AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF; HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS; JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY; YIDDISH POETRY.

■ I. Biblical: R. Lowth, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, trans. G. Gregory (1787); J. G. Herder, The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry [1783], trans. J. Marsh (1833); E. Sievers, Metrische Studien I–II (1901–7); G. B. Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry (1915); T. H. Robinson, The Poetry of the Old Testament (1947); E. Z. Melamed, "Break-up of Stereotyped Phrases as an Artistic Device in Biblical Poetry," Studies in the Bible, ed. C. Rabin (1961); S. Gevirtz, Patterns in the Early Poetry of Israel (1963); R. Jakobson, "Grammatical Parallelism and Its Russian Facet," Language 42 (1966); B. Hrushovski, "Prosody, Hebrew," Encyclopedia Judaica (1971); D. A. Robertson, Linguistic Evidence in Dating Early Hebrew Poetry (1972); A. M. Cooper, Biblical Poetics (1976); D. K. Stuart, Studies in Early Hebrew Meter (1976); S. A. Geller, Parallelism in Early Biblical Poetry (1979); J. L. Kugel, "Some Medieval and Renaissance Hebrew Writings on the Poetry of the Bible," Studies in Medieval Jewish History and Literature, ed. I. Twersky (1979); and The Idea of Biblical Poetry (1981); E. L. Greenstein, "How Does Parallelism Mean?" A Sense of Text (1983); M. H. Lichtenstein, "Biblical Poetry," Back to the Sources, ed. B. W. Holtz (1984); R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (1985); A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (1985); W.G.E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry (1986); E. L. Greenstein, "Aspects of Biblical Poetry," Jewish Book Annual 44 (1986–87); L. Alonso Schökel, A Manual of Hebrew Poetics, trans. L. Alonso Schökel and A. Graffy (1988); D. Pardee, Ugaritic and Hebrew Poetic Parallelism (1988); A. Niccacci, The Syntax of the Verb in Classical Hebrew, trans. W.G.E. Watson (1990); A. Berlin, Biblical Poetry through Medieval Jewish Eyes (1991); S. E. Gillingham, The Poems and Psalms of the Hebrew Bible (1994); M. O'Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure, 2d ed. (1997); F. H. Polak, "The Oral and the Written: Syntax, Stylistics, and the Development of Biblical Prose Narrative," Journal of the Ancient Near Eastern Society 26 (1998); E. L. Greenstein, "Direct Discourse and Parallelism," Studies in Bible and Exegesis 5 (2000—in Heb.); D. R. Vance, The Question of Meter in Biblical Hebrew Poetry (2001); R. A. Harris, Discerning Parallelism (2004); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, "The Psalms and Lyric Verse," The Evolution of Rationality, ed. F. L. Shults (2006); T. Linafelt, "Lyrical Theology: The Song of Songs and the Advantage of Poetry," Toward a Theology of Eros, ed. V. Burrus (2006); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, "Poetry, Hebrew," New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, v. 4 (2009); J. Y. Jindo, Biblical Metaphor Reconsidered (2010).

■ II. Medieval. Anthologies and Editions, in English: A Treasury of Jewish Poetry, ed. N. and M. Ausubel (1957); An Anthology of Modern Hebrew Poetry, ed. S. Y. Pnueli and A. Ukhmani (1966); The Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse, and trans. T. Carmi (1981); Wine, Women, and Death, ed. R. P. Scheindlin (1986); R. Loewe, Ibn Gabirol (1989); The Gazelle, ed. R. P. Scheindlin (1991); A. Schippers, Spanish Hebrew Poetry and the Arabic Literary Tradition (1994); The Modern Hebrew Poem Itself, ed. S. Burnshaw, T. Carmi, E. Spicehandler (2003); D. Bregman, The Golden Way, trans. A. Brener (2006); The Dream of the Poem, ed. and trans. P. Cole (2007). In Hebrew: Diwan of Yehudah ha-Levi, ed. H. Brody, 2 v. (1894–1930); J. Schirmann, Hebrew Poetry in Spain and Provence, 4 v. (1954–56); New Hebrew Poems from the Genizah, ed. J. Schirmann (1965); Israel Levin Jubilee Volume, ed. R. Tsur and T. Rosen (1994); Eretz Israel and Its Poetry, Studies in Piyyutim from the Cairo Geniza, ed. M. Zulay (1995); Jewish Palestinian Aramaic Poetry from Late Antiquity, ed. J. Yahalom and M. Sokoloff (1999); Tahkemoni or Tales of Heman the Ezrahite, ed. J. Yahalom and N. Katsumata (2010). Criticism and History, in English: S. M. Stern, Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry (1974); R. Brann, The Compunctious Poet (1990); Á. Sáenz-Badillos, A History of the Hebrew Language (1993); R. Drori, Models and Contacts (2000); The Literature of Al-Andalus, ed. M. R. Menocal, R. P. Scheindlin, M. Sells (2000); J. Tobi, Proximity and Distance: Medieval Hebrew and Arabic Poetry (2004). In Hebrew: E. Fleischer, Hebrew Liturgical Poetry in the Middle Ages (1975); D. Pagis, Change and Tradition in the Secular Poetry (1976); J. Schirmann, Studies in the History of Hebrew Poetry and Drama (1979); T. Rosen-Moked, The Hebrew Girdle Poem (Muwashshah) in the Middle Ages (1985); J. Yahalom, Poetic Language in the Early Piyyut (1985); D. Pagis, Hebrew Poetry of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance (1991), and Poetry Aptly Explained (1993); J. Schirmann and E. Fleischer, The History of Hebrew Poetry in Muslim Spain (1996); J. Schirmann and E. Fleischer, The History of Hebrew Poetry in Christian Spain and Southern France (1997); J. Yahalom, Poetry and Society in Jewish Galiliee of Late Antiquity (1999); J. Yahalom, "Poet-Performer in the Synagogue of the Byzantine Period,"

Continuity and Renewal, ed. L. I. Levine (2004); M. Rand, Introduction to the Grammar of Hebrew Poetry in Byzantine Palestine (2006). Byzantine Period and Muslim Spain: I. Davidson, Thesaurus of Mediaeval Hebrew Poetry (1924); J. Schirmann, "The Research on Spanish-Hebrew Poetry 1919–1939," Sedarim (1942); J. Schirmann's Bibliography of Studies of Mediaeval Hebrew Poetry 1948–1978: Accumulative Index, ed. E. Adler et al. (1989); Ma'agarim Online Historical Dictionary, http://hebrew-treasures.huji.ac.il (in Heb.); Piyyut Project of the Institute for the Research of Hebrew Poetry.

■ III. Modern. Anthologies, in English: Modern Hebrew Poetry, ed. and trans. R. F. Mintz (1966); "Israel," Modern Poetry in Translation, ed. R. Friend (1974); Modern Hebrew Literature, ed. R. Alter (1975); Fourteen Israeli Poets, ed. D. Silk (1976); Contemporary Israeli Literature, ed. E. Anderson (1977); Modern Hebrew Poetry, ed. and trans. B. Frank (1980); Modern Hebrew Poetry, ed., A. Mintz (1982); Israeli Poetry, ed. W. Bargad and S. F. Chyet (1986); Modern Hebrew Literature in English Translation, ed. L. I. Yudkin (1987); No Rattling of Sabers, ed. E. Raizen (1996); Found in Translation, ed. E. Friend (2007); Poets on the Edge, ed. T. Keller (2008). In Hebrew: Sifruthenu ha-Yafah, ed. J. Lichtenbaum, 2 v. (1962)—mod. Shirah Tse'irah, ed. B. Yaoz and Y. Kest (1980). Bibliographies, in English: Y. Goell, Bibliography of Modern Hebrew Literature in English Translation (1968)—7,500 items from 1880–1965; Bibliography of Modern Hebrew Literature in Translation (1975)—700 items since 1917; I. Goldberg and A. Zipin, Bibliography of Modern Hebrew Literature in Translation (1979–)—series providing current bibl. and extensive retroactive coverage. In Hebrew: Shishim ve-shisha Meshorerim, ed. Z. Stavi (1996); Shira Chadasha, ed. M. Izakson and A. Kosman (1997); Shirat Ha'tchiya Ha'ivrit, ed. B. Harshav (2000); Lanetsach Anagnech, ed. M. Shaket (2003); Ve-karati Lecach Ahava, ed. M. Dor (2008). Criticism and History, in English: D. Goldstein and B. Hrushovski, "On Free Rhythms in Modern Poetry," Sebeok; S. Halkin, Modern Hebrew Literature, 2d ed. (1970); E. Spicehandler, "Hebrew Literature, Modern," Encyclopaedia Judaica (1971–92); I. Zinberg, A History of Jewish Literature, ed. and trans. B. Martin, 12 v. (1972–78); E. Silberschlag, From Renaissance to Renaissance, 2 v. (1973–77); C. Kronfeld, On the Margins of Modernism (1996); D. Jacobson, Does David Still Play before You? (1997); R. Kartun-Blum, Profane Scriptures (1999); M. Gluzman, The Politics of Canonicity (2002); D. Miron, The Prophetic Mode in Modern Hebrew Poetry (2009). In Hebrew: J. Klausner, Historiyah Shel-ha-Sifrut ha-Ivrit ha-Hadashah, 6 v. (1930–50)—F. Lachover, Toldot ha-sifrut ha-Ivrit ha-Hadashah, 4 v. (1936–48)—mod.; A. Ben-Or, Toldot ha-Sifrut ha-Ivrit be-Dorenu, 2 v. (1954–55)—D. Miron, Arba' Panim ba-Sifrut ha-Ivrit Bat Yamenu (1962)—contemp.; A. M. Habermann, Toledoth Hapiyyut Vehashir (1970).

E. Spicehandler (intro., extracanonical, It., mod.); E. L. Greenstein (bib.); W. van Bekkum (med.); V. K. Shemtov (mod.)

HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS

I. Biblical
II. Medieval
III. Modern

I. Biblical

A. Prosody. Approximately one-third of the Heb. Bible (to which discussion is here confined) in many eds. is presented in a format that suggests that the content is to be viewed as verse. In fact, all talk of "verse" or "poetry" in the Bible is the result of mod. scholarly hypothesis, so that no discussion of biblical prosody can be entirely descriptive. No trad. about the nature of biblical prosody has survived for the received Masoretic text. To be sure, a number of passages termed "song" (shirah)—like the "Songs" of Miriam (Exod. 15), of Moses (Deut. 32), of Deborah (Judg. 5), and of David (2 Sam. 22), as well as a few Dead Sea texts—are so arranged as to suggest an effort at indicating verse. The special system of punctuation in the so-called "poetic books" (Psalms, Proverbs, and Job) as well as the format of their text in some biblical mss., incl. the Aleppo Codex (the earliest nearly complete form of the Masoretic text), may point in a similar direction; but we have no explicit statement of underlying prosodic principles. Early references by authors such as Josephus and the church fathers to cl. meters like *hexameters and *pentameters in the Bible are simply apologetic in nature, designed to appropriate for the Bible the heritage of the cl. Gr. trad., comprehensible to the Hellenistic audience and intended to elicit its respect.

Biblical study in the 18th and 19th cs. also attempted to force passages considered "poetic" into approximations of cl. meters. But by the late 19th c. and despite the efforts of no less a metrist than Eduard Sievers, it was generally recognized that prospects for exact scansions were chimerical, not least because of uncertainties in regard to key aspects of ancient Heb. pronunciation. A loose working hypothesis was reached that, without claiming to be an adequate statement of biblical prosody, still allowed prosodic considerations to play a role in practical exegesis.

An essential empirical fact is the general symmetry in clause length displayed in most passages that, on other grounds, might reasonably be termed "poetic." In books like Job or Psalms, most clauses consist of from two to six words, the majority having from three to five. (By contrast, in books like Genesis or Judges, mainly narrative in content, clause length seems to be random.) It is reasonable to suppose that passages with such symmetry form an expectation in the reader's mind that, after a certain number of words, a *caesura or line break will occur. The specific phonetic, and therefore prosodic, aspect is the silence, real or potential, awaited at the limit of expectation, which usually corresponds to clause closure. The unit so delimited is the line (in other common terminologies, *colon, *stichos, *hemistich, *verset). So firm is the perceptual base that long clauses tend to be analyzed as two enjambed lines: "wa'ani nasakti malki / ál ṣiyyon har qodši"

(For I have anointed my king / On Zion, my holy mountain [Ps. 2:6]).

Within lines, a meter might potentially be either isosyllabic or accentual. Syllabic analysis has been attempted several times, esp. for some early verse (Freedman, Stuart). But even recourse to a reconstructed ancient pronunciation cannot remove the many examples of syllabic asymmetry between lines. For this reason and many others, it is better to speak of rhythm rather than meter in discussing biblical prosody. The consensus has long been that the rhythmical basis for biblical prosody lies in the stresses of speech (the Ley-Sievers system). Heb. is a lang. with a strong stress accent that is phonemic (e.g., qáma, "she arose," vs. qamá, "rising" [participle]). The system may be summarized as follows: lines contain from two to six stresses, the great majority having three to five. Each metrical unit, or foot, receives a single stress, although long terms, usually of five or more syllables, may have two stresses. By "metrical unit" is meant in most cases what is commonly presented as a "word" in the Masoretic graphemic system.

The overall system has rightly been termed "semantic-syntactic-accentual" (Hrushovski). The essential device for linking verses or sense units together within the system is *parallelism of the *couplet (in other terminologies, bicolon, *distich, stichos). The great majority of couplets can be represented as 3:3, 2:2 (often doubled to 2:2::2:2, sometimes best analyzed as 4:4), and 3:2 (often analyzable as 5), where the numbers refer to words or stresses. Also present are slightly asymmetrical couplets like 2:3 or 4:3, etc. Extreme asymmetries like 4:2 or 2:4 are likely to be "regularized" by emendation metri causa, but the asymmetry may have been obscured in sung or chanted performance. A unit of three lines, the *triplet (tricolon, tristich) is also common, as well as the *quatrain. Larger units like *strophes are frequently discernible in context. Biblical verse rarely employs a single meter throughout a poem, although 3:3 is so common as to appear dominant. Alternations of 3:3 and 2:2 seem to occur esp. in early poems. Scansion of a given passage, therefore, often depends on one's assessment of the soundness of the text, interpretation of the meaning, and willingness to view certain elements as "extra-metrical." E.g., Isa. 1:1–2:

> Hear O-heavens/And give-ear, O-earth,
> For-YHWH has-spoken:
> Sons I-have-reared and-raised,
> But-they have-rebelled against-me!

may be scanned in several ways: as 2:2:2 + 3:3; or, if "For-YHWH has-spoken" is viewed as extrametrical, as 2:2 + 3:3; or, if one joins the monosyllabic preposition in the final line to its verb ("have-rebelled-against-me"), as 2:2 + 3:2. Such a loose system will never satisfy purists, who can point to passages in supposed "prose" that also scan quite regularly. Some have despaired of uncovering any biblical rhythm, and some have denied the very possibility of its existence. But since there are rhythmic symmetries accompanied usually by parallelism and a host of devices often associated with verse in other prosodies—*alliteration, *assonance, rhyme (all common if random in biblical verse), *archaisms, and *tropes—it has seemed to most scholars satisfactory as a general or working hypothesis to speak of biblical rhythm, if not meter, and prosody.

Parallelism is commonly included in discussions of biblical prosody because of the constitutive role it clearly plays in the rhythm of biblical verse. Most scholars include both grammatical and semantic aspects in parallelism. Aside from sporadic examples of earlier awareness, the concept and term of parallelism were introduced by Bishop Robert Lowth in the mid.-18th c. Lowth recognized two aspects of parallelismus membrorum: "constructive" (i.e., grammatical) or parallelism of form; and semantic or parallelism of meaning. He isolated three categories: "synonymous," "antithetic," and (a catchall) "synthetic." Despite the fact that the last category in particular was unclear, Lowth's classification remained basically unchanged until refined by G. B. Gray in the early 20th c. It is now generally recognized that the term "synthetic parallelism" has no real meaning.

The basic unit of parallelistic verse is the couplet, with its A and B lines (a triplet adds a C line, a quatrain a D line). Parallelism between individual members of the lines may be complete—a situation commonly represented by the schema abc/a'b'c' (each letter stands for a stressed metrical unit, those in the B line being marked with a prime)—but it is frequently partial or incomplete. The most common type involves *ellipsis, or "gapping," of an A-line term in the B line, in the deep structure of which it is, however, still present or "understood" (O'Connor). Apparently from a desire to maintain general syllabic symmetry, the approximate number of syllables in the gapped term may be "compensated" for by an expanded or longer B line parallel ("ballast variant"). A typical schema is abc/b'c'2.

Semantic correspondence between parallel terms extends from actual identity via repetition to varying degrees of synonymity and antonymity, to relationships that may be labeled complementary (eat/drink), merism (heaven/earth), whole-part or part-whole (Pharaoh and his hosts/his chief officers), metaphorical (the wicked/chaff), and epithetic (God/the Holy One of Israel), among others. Some parallel pairs, e.g., silver/gold or heaven/earth, are so common as to become virtual formulas. Such A- and B-line "word pairs" may stem from oral composition, but in most biblical verse represent merely a form of poetic diction. It is now known that word pairs and many other features of parallelism go back at least as far as the Ugaritic texts of the 13th c. BCE and form part of the extensive Canaanite heritage of biblical verse. Among the most striking parallel patterns is "climactic parallelism," which may be represented by the schema abc/abd, in which the first two words of the A line are repeated, but the last term is gapped and replaced at the end of the B line by another term. E.g., Ps. 92:10: "For-behold your-enemies, O Lord, // For-behold your-enemies shall-perish!"

Little work has been done on the hist. of biblical parallelism, although it is possible to discern a difference between an earlier, stricter form in which parallelism is mainly between individual constituents of the couplet and a later, looser form in which whole lines, or even couplets, are merely general semantic equivalents of other lines and couplets, as in Ps. 23:3–6. In general, parallelism allows almost endless variation without obscuring its basic contours. Roman Jakobson, who viewed parallelism as the basic device of all poetry, said that it activates all levels of lang.

B. Poetics. The Bible contains no explicit statements about poetics in regard to the nature of either poetry or poetic composition. However, an implicit poetics may be inferred from the complaint of the prophet Ezekiel that people consider him a mere "maker of parables" (Ezek. 21:5), a singer of "love songs, sweetly sung and skillfully played" (Ezek. 33:32). "Parables" (Heb. mashal, the meaning of which extends from "proverb" to larger literary compositions of several types) and secular song were the province of Wisdom in Israel, as was elsewhere in the ancient Near East the trad. of science, intellect, and conscious literary art. Although the "wise" probably claimed some type of inspiration for their productions, their art was viewed predominantly as an expression of human skill. Prophets, on the other hand, although employing the forms of poetic expression cultivated by the "wise," were believed to be mere "mouths," passive transmitters of divine messages. To view their oracles as "art" violated their prophetic function, even though, as Fisch has observed, their message achieved its effect partly via the literary artifice employed. Implicit in the conflict between prophecy and poetry is a poetics of tension between aesthetics and religion that has had a profound influence on Western culture. Meir Sternberg has explored similar tensions in the poetics of biblical narrative. Related to this is the Bible's remarkably free use of genre. Although form critics long ago isolated most of the genres used by biblical authors and related them to their analogues in the ancient Near East, analysis often shows that the traditional forms have been "sprung" or "undermined" (Fisch) by introducing an element of tension, esp. in hymns, where myth is combined with hist. in a manner unattested elsewhere in the ancient world. F. M. Cross has explored the historicizing of myth in Heb. texts. E.g., a key myth found in many places in the Heb. Bible centered on a cosmic battle between the deity and a sea monster (representing Chaos), followed by creation and, as a capstone, the erection of the divine palace, the shrine. These traditional elements are applied in a cl. biblical hymn, the "Song of the Sea" (Exod. 15), to the formative events of the "creation" of Israel—the exodus from Egypt and conquest of Canaan. However, the old mythical motifs of the theme are radically redefined, so that the cosmic foe, the sea, becomes the natural agent of the destruction of Pharaoh and his army, while the conquest is described in quasi-mythic terms as the establishment of a shrine on the hills of Canaan. The ambiguity that arises from the indeterminacy of hist. and myth results in that tension that gives the poem, as so much of biblical poetry, its transcendent dimension.

II. Medieval. Med. Heb. poetry comprises two distinct branches of verse, each governed by its own characteristic poetics and systems of versification. Generically speaking, these branches are piyyut (Gr. poesis, liturgical poetry) and nonliturgical or secular poetry. The poetic styles and verse forms developed by each branch varied widely according to epoch, historical school, and geographic center.

A. Prosody. Until the High Middle Ages, liturgical poetry predominated in Heb. writing to the complete exclusion of the secular. Piyyut emerged in Palestine (probably in the 4th c.) as a popular supplement to the increasingly standardized and fixed (prose) prayer. Additionally, complex poetic cycles (yotser and qedushta) whose themes were related to the weekly recitation of scripture were incorporated into the synagogue service. The genres of piyyut were thus determined by specific liturgical contexts, and piyyut texts were always intended for public recitation. The rules pertaining to form (most piyyutim were strophic), structure, and rhyme were also closely tied to the liturgical function of the poem. Idiosyncratic and complex rhymes (initial, internal, and terminal) are characteristic of early piyyut, but end rhyme eventually became the prevalent form. *Acrostics based on the 22-letter Heb. alphabet or the poet's name constituted an important formal feature of nearly all piyyut.

Over the course of its long evolution, piyyut came to employ four distinct systems of versification. In its earlier phases, it was composed in two verse forms similar to those found in the Heb. Bible, one based on an equivalent number of words in parallel versets, the other an accentual system based on three to five word stresses per line. Later, in a postclassical devel. (Spain, 10th c.), syllabic meters, which make no distinction in vowel length but fix the number of syllables per line (six to eight syllables per verset or line is common), were used extensively (see SYLLABIC VERSE). Finally, the quantitative meters associated with secular poetry (see below) were employed sporadically in strophic liturgical verse after the 10th c. (see QUANTITY).

Secular Heb. poetry emerged in Muslim Spain in the 10th c. as a subcultural adaptation of Ar. poetry. Two main verse forms were cultivated. The predominant type, written in the cl. mold of Ar. courtly poetry, forms one continuous sequence of lines, ranging from an epigrammatic couplet to a formal ode (qaṣīda) of more than 50 lines. Regardless of length, this type of composition is governed by a single meter and end rhyme that are carried through every line of verse without variation. Rhyme words ending in a vowel include the consonant preceding the vowel (CV); for words ending in consonants, the rhyme must encompass the preceding vowel and antepenultimate consonant (CVC). (See AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF.)

The second type of secular composition was strophic in form and closely connected to musical performance. The muwashshaḥ, as it was known in Ar. (Heb. shir ezor, "girdle poem"), was usually devoted to the genre of *love poetry or, in a secondary devel., to *panegyric. Conservative Ar. literati tended to regard the muwashshaḥ with disdain because it did not meet the strict prosodic requirements of cl. Ar. poetry. Jewish courtly circles, however, enthusiastically accepted it (11th c.), possibly on account of the prevalence of similar strophic forms in the pre-Andalusian piyyut. The muwashshaḥ employed the quantitative meters used in the cl. monorhyming poem but did so in a highly irregular fashion: i.e., the meter of the first part of a strophe often differed from that of the second part of the strophe. Additionally, the muwashshaḥ used quantitative meters in nonstandard patterns. Tonic elements may also have come into play, though this is a matter of dispute. Muwashshaḥāt also differed from poems of the cl. type in allowing great flexibility in the use of rhyme. One rhyme of the muwashshaḥ (that of the first part of the strophe) varies from strophe to strophe; a second rhyme (that of the last part of each strophe) remains fixed throughout the poem (e.g., aaabb, cccbb, dddbb). In addition to its appealing rhyme schemes and often complex metrical patterns, a striking feature of the muwashshaḥ is its kharja* (exit) or envoi. Heb. muwashshaḥāt frequently conclude with romance or colloquial Ar. kharjas (in Heb. script), usually in the form of a quotation from a popular Old Sp. or Hispano-Ar. love song.

The quantitative meters employed in both types of secular composition, as well as in some liturgical poetry, were created by means of an artificial system that transposed the distinctive prosodic patterns of Ar. into Heb. In Ar., as in cl. Gr., quantitative meters are based upon the distinction between long and short syllables. It is the pattern of long and short syllables that creates the different meters. A line of verse (Ar. bayt; Heb. bayit, "house") was typically composed of metrically equivalent versets made up of from two to four metrical feet (čamudim). Since cl. Ar. preserved the phonological values of long and short vowels to a greater degree than biblical Heb., the system required that certain liberties be taken with Heb. grammar and phonology. Twelve of the 16 basic cl. Ar. meters were reproduced in simplified form; with variants (lengthened or shortened metrical feet), the number of Heb. quantitative meters amounted to approximately 60. This Ar.-style quantitative prosody subsequently attained a normative status in various Near Eastern, Eur., and Mediterranean communities. It was still popular in Italy in the Ren., when Heb. poetry came under the influence of It. There, It. verse forms and poetic styles were assimilated into Heb.; eventually, quantitative metrics was exchanged for purely syllabic schemes akin to those employed in It.

B. Poetics. Secular poetry, which represented a fusion of Ar. form and style with biblical Heb. diction and imagery, was conventional in content and stylized in form. Its modes of expression and choice of themes were generally lyrical and descriptive (love and wine poetry as well as panegyric are well represented genres), and its purpose was to entertain and persuade. Manneristic virtuosity and rhetorical ornamentation were highly prized in secular verse, but, at least among the better poets, the importance attached to conventionality, rhetorical technique, and florid style did not preclude the expression of intense feeling, particularly in poems of a personal and occasional nature.

Piyyut, by contrast, was conceived as an ennobling poetry given over to the communal passion to draw closer to God. Until the 9th c., piyyut tended to be esoteric and elusive; it was suffused with arcane references to Talmudic texts and rabbinic interpretation of scripture and consciously lacking in metaphor and simile. After the 10th c., when liturgical poets of the Mediterranean lands were frequently engaged in the production of the prestigious secular verse, the prosody and style of secular poetry cross-fertilized piyyut. The old type of piyyut continued to be composed alongside newer, more intelligible piyyutim. The poets of Muslim Spain led the way, using many of the forms and genres of the postcl. Iraqi piyyut and creating some new ones of their own (notably the rĕshut, a short poetic meditation on the theme of the prose prayer), but they abandoned the eclectic and inventive lang. of early and cl. piyyut for the biblical purism they propagated in secular verse. Similarly, they revamped the austere poetics of the earlier piyyut trad., replacing it with the ornamental and decorative approach of their secular poetry. For most of the High and later Middle Ages, then, piyyut and secular poetry coexisted in "creative dissonance."

III. Modern

A. Prosody. Heb. prosody has not stagnated over the past 200 years. On the contrary, it has passed through stages of quick devel. and has changed to some extent at each of the major centers of Heb. poetry. From the beginning of the Ren., Heb. poetry—centered in Italy after the Jews were expelled from Spain—began to assimilate Eur. poetic styles and conventions. Immanuel of Rome (ca. 1261–1332), a contemporary of Dante, used the It. *sonnet form for lines written in Gr. meters. However, the natural accents of the Heb. lang. made it difficult to assimilate quantitative meter. Apparently, the pronunciation of long and short vowels in Heb. had been forgotten during the Middle Ages. The accepted substitution for the difference in length between parts of the foot, the t'nua (vowel) and the yated (one long and one short syllable), served Heb. poetry in Italy until the beginning of the 20th c. Hence, for 600 years (until 1900), the accepted meter of the Heb. sonnet was a hendecasyllabic line with a stress on the penultimate syllable (Landau).

The harbinger of mod. Heb. prosody was N. H. Weizel (1725–1805) in his Shirey Tiferet (1785–1805 [Songs of Glory]). Weizel sensed the strangeness of the meter used for Heb. poetry in Spain and also the difficulty of assimilating Gr. meter. In his desire to write a Heb. epic in a form similar to the Gr. hexameter, he devised a line of 13 syllables with a strong caesura and penultimate stress. He used couplets separated by unrhymed lines and at times the *envelope rhyme scheme, abba.

This system remained in effect until the Hibat Zion period (1881–97), though with variations.

During the Hibat Zion period, meter began losing its independence, and poetics increased its influence on prosody. In addition to the lyrical-didactic fusion that appeared during the Enlightenment, rhythm was introduced in questions and answers as composed by Abraham Ber Gotlover: "Why are you weeping, my People, and why are you crying out?" ("Nes Ziona," in Karton-Blum). This is even more apparent in Judah Leib Gordon: "What are we, you may ask; what is our life? / A People are we, like the Peoples around us?" (Eder Adonai [The Flock of God] in Karton-Blum). The dialogue, the quotations, the succession of ideas or feelings came to occupy a strong position and determined the nature of the meter and rhythm. Prosody was set aside and played a decreasing role in poetry, while the rhythm of the contents took its place. The stress on the contents intensified the persona of the artist and highlighted the new positive approach to what is holy to Israel and to the Zionist feelings expressed in the poetry (Karton-Blum).

After Weizel, all the common stanza forms of Eur. lit. appeared in Heb. poetry (Shpan). But today Weizel's meter seems something artificial, for it does not distinguish between naturally accented syllables and those whose accent is weak. The blurring of the tonic differences renders this meter as monotonous as the Heb.-Ar. meter of the Middle Ages. Only during the period of Hayyim Nachman Bialik (1873–1934) was a way found to absorb Gr. meter into Heb. poetry: accented syllables were treated as long, while unaccented syllables (or ones with a secondary accent) were treated as short.

During Bialik's generation, the dominant Ashkenazi vocalization of Heb. affected the poetry. This system stresses the penultimate vowel and pronounces certain vowels and consonants differently from the Sephardic pronunciation. For example, the vowel o is pronounced oy, and the consonant th is pronounced s. The tonic meter merged well with Ashkenazi pronunciation. One esp. notes the flexibility of the *amphibrach, well loved by Bialik (Benshalom). Use of the Sephardic pronunciation accepted in Israel today did not become widespread until the following generation (Shavit).

Saul Tchernikhovsky (1875–1943) trans. Gr. epic poetry into Heb. and thereby created the Heb. dactylic hexameter, in which *trochees take the place of *spondees (Shpan). The following generation (Jacob Kahan [1881–1967] and Jacob Fichman [1881–1958]) preserved the traditional rhythms; only Uri Zvi Greenberg (1895–1981) and Abraham Shlonsky (1900–73) completely broke with the earlier framework. Greenberg abandoned regular meter and rhyme to create an extended rhythm, which was the only means, he felt, to create a poem with the pathos necessary to express this generation's pain (Hrushovski). Shlonsky, on the other hand, disregarded meter altogether. After an extended struggle, Greenberg and Shlonsky succeeded in exchanging the Ashkenazi vocalization with the Sephardic pronunciation and began a new era in Heb. poetics and prosody. Jonathan Ratosh's (1908–61) poems are distinguished by a virtuoso rhythm built on repetition of sounds, words, and sentences that flow at a dizzying, intoxicating tempo. It is interesting that Nathan Alterman (1910–70), who is an extreme modernist with regard to lang., reverted to regular meter, esp. the *anapest, and to regular rhyme (though a certain estrangement is expressed in his use of assonance), but he found few disciples.

In contrast to Alterman, Nathan Zach (b. 1930) gave up all the forms of harmony, even the standard harmony of the stanza (the length of the lines, rhyming, assonance, etc.). Zach even criticized Bialik's rhythms as schematic and boring. Though he dealt at great length with the problems of prosody, it seems that poems whose contents had a dramatic flair affected his changes in prosody. In consequence of this trend, traditional prosody lost most of its effect on Heb. poetry. In contrast, Martin Buber, in his essay "On Culture" (Pnei Adam, [The Face of Man]) established the rule of rotation in culture. He maintains that when a culture declines to its low point or becomes most distant from its original sources, a striving toward rising higher develops and a desire to return to its sources. Something like this occurred also to the prosody and poetics of Heb. Apparently in line with this conception, at the height of Shlonsky's rebellion in prosody, there were already in Heb. lit. restrained artists such as Shin Shalom (1905–90) and Leah Goldberg (1911–70) who refrained from utilizing strangeness in their lang.; indeed, they returned to rhyming and meters within their poetic stanzas and even composed sonnets. Sonnets can be found even by the ironic and bitter Yehuda Amichai (1924–2000). Since the 1980s, restrained *modernism has played a dominant role in the prosody of Heb. poetry (rendering it meterless, rhymeless, and structureless).

In an insightful study, Aharon Mirsky revealed that the structure of the Heb. lang. creates a rhythm that can serve as an alternative to punctuation. This characteristic of the Heb. lang. has been exploited by end-of-the-century poets in order to create a mod. rhythm that is both moderate and pleasant to the ear and that relies on daily speech rhythms. This is how Zelda constructed her poems, basing them on the rhythm of speech and on functional rhythm (Bar-Yosef).

B. Poetics. The poetics of mod. Heb. has also been dynamic, changing from period to period in accord with its prosody. Moses Hayyim Luzzatto (1707–46) viewed lit. as "the creation of something good and pleasant," thus equating the artist with the aesthete. His conceptions of figurative lang. were derived from cl. rhet. His explanations were based on the Bible, and they concur with the approach that views the arts as decorative. Shlomo Levisohn (1789–1821) regarded the Bible as an example of the poetics of the sublime. The trans. of the Bible into Ger. and the preparation of the "Commentary" during Moses Mendelssohn's period (1729–86) created a poetics that also served the new poetry. Such poetry attempted to educate the Jewish nation and, therefore, had to be expressed in Heb., for it alone was understood by all Jewish people. At first, the poetry was composed in the lang. of the Bible, but this archaic diction reminded one more of ancient landscapes than of the current world. Words integrally linked in a poem proved to mean something else when taken out of context and thus distanced the poem from real life; the rhet. (melitsa) remained meaningless to most of its readers.

It was Bialik who created the synthesis of the lang. of the Bible, the sages, and the Middle Ages; he even created new words. His symbols are rich and romantic. His lang. is not built on completely figurative elements taken from ancient sources: his sources are familiar to us, yet they do not stand out in his poetry. Greenberg created symbols, such as "Sinai," "Jerusalem," "Massada," "light," "yearning," and "sublime," which refer to national myths (Kurzweil). Shlonsky rebelled against the poetic conventions of Bialik's period. He opposed usage of biblical similes; he drew his imagery from his current surroundings. He created metaphors and similes open to variable interpretation, such as "breasts of the night" and "night like the altar stone." Yet despite his estrangement from Bialik's style, there are those who speak of "Shlonsky in Bialik's bonds" (Hagorni).

The world wars, the Holocaust, and existentialism stimulated—though relatively late—the appearance of an expressionist poetics in mod. Heb. poetry (see EXPRESSIONISM). In this mode, the sentence, the word, and even sense are broken, incomplete. Following Shlonsky and Greenberg, Amir Gilboa (1917–84) and others use ambiguity for effect: at times a word is linked to what precedes it as well as what follows, as, e.g., "Also in the city on sidewalks you will run from them." The expression "you will run" (a single word in Heb.) is linked to "sidewalks" as well as "from them" (Barzel). For the same reasons noted above, *bathos is dominant in recent Heb. poetry, as in the poetry of Yehuda Amichai who writes, "The memory of my father is wrapped in white paper / Like slices of bread for the working day."

The poetry of the Holocaust, its symbols and metaphors, returned to Heb. poetry its exaltedness and pathos, esp. with regard to death, and thus Itamar Yaoz-Kest wrote in his Bergen-Belsen poems: "It seems that we were thrown into a fiery flame / Yet meanwhile we reflected on life and death" (in Österreich). Avner Treinin used allusions even to the stories of Joseph in his poem "The Striped Coat of the Man in the Camp": "And his brothers did not envy him / his striped coat / in which they, too, were dressed / when lowered from the [railroad] lines." The atmosphere in this poem is melancholy and elegiac, with no sarcastic attitude toward the terrors of the Holocaust.

Toward the close of the 20th c., the canon of Heb. poetry accepted even poems with a religious undertone such as those by Yosef Zvi Rimon, Aharon Mirsky, Zelda, Yaoz-Kest, and others. It seems that Heb. poetry continues to stream in two channels. On the one hand, we find leftist poetry with what remains of mod. rebellious poetics and prosody accompanied by a distancing from the lang. and culture of national sources. On the other hand, we find the minor conservative channel of poetics with restrained modernism that preserves the traditional character. The poets Yaoz-Kest, Mirsky, Zelda, Tuvia Ribner, Dan Pagis, Shlomo Zamir, Shalom Ratzabi, and others stand out in this trend.

See CLASSICAL POETICS, HEBRAISM, HEBREW POETRY, YIDDISH POETRY.

■ Biblical: R. Lowth, Lecture 19, De sacra poesi Hebraeorum, trans. G. Gregory (1753), "Preliminary Diss.," Isaiah (1778); E. Sievers, Metrische Studien (1901–7); G. B. Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry (1915, rpt. 1972 with essential "Prolegomenon" [with bibl.] by D. N. Freedman); T. H. Robinson, "Basic Principles of Hebrew Poetic Form," Festschrift Alfred Bertholet, ed. W. Baumgartner et al. (1950); P. B. Yoder, "Biblical Hebrew [Versification]," in Wimsatt; B. Hrushovski (in bibl. to sect. II below); F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic (1973); F. M. Cross and D. N. Freedman, Studies in Ancient Yahwistic Poetry (1975); D. Stuart, Studies in Early Hebrew Meter (1976); S. Geller, Parallelism in Early Biblical Poetry (1979), pt. 1 and app. B; D. N. Freedman, Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy (1980); M. O'Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure (1980); J. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry (1981), incl. survey of theories in sect. 7.2; W. Watson, Cl. Heb. Poetry (1984); R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (1985); A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (1985); The Hebrew Bible in Literary Criticism, ed. A. Preminger and E. Greenstein (1986); M. Sternberg, The Poetry of Biblical Narrative (1985); H. Fisch, Poetry with a Purpose (1988); L. Schoekel, A Manual of Hebrew Poetics (1988); W. Watson, Traditional Techniques in Classical Hebrew Verse (1994); J. P. Fokkelman, Major Poems of the Hebrew Bible, 3 vols. (1998–2003); Poetry of the Hebrew Bible, ed. D. Orton (2000); D. Vance, The Question of Meter in Biblical Hebrew Poetry (2001).

■ Medieval: B. Hrushovski, "Ha-shitot ha-ra'shiyot shel heḥaruz ha-'ivri min ha-piyyut' ad yameinu," Hasifrut 2 (1970–71); and "Prosody, Heb.," Encyclopaedia Judaica 13 (1971–72), 1203–24; E. Fleischer, Shirat ha-qodesh ha-'ivrit bi-ymei ha-beinayim (Hebrew. Liturgical Poetry in the Middle Ages), (1975); D. Pagis, Ḥiddush u-masoret be-shirat ha-ḥol ha-'ivrit bi-ymei ha-beinayim (Change and Tradition in Secular Poetry: Spain and Italy), (1976); R. Brann, The Compunctious Poet (1990); Joseph Tobi, Proximity and Distance (2004).

■ Modern: B. Z. Benshalom, Mishkalav shel Bialik (Bialik's meters, 1942); B. Kurzweil, Sifrutenu Hahadasha Hemshekh o Mahapekha (Our new literature—Continuation or revolution, 1959); S. Shpan, Masot Umehkarim (Essays and Studies, 1964); M. M. Buber, Pnei Adam (The Face of Man, 1965); N. Zakh, Zeman Veritmus Etzel Bergson Uvashira Hamodernit (Time and Rhythm in Modern Poetry, 1966); R. Karton-Blum, Ha- Shirah ha-'ivrit bi-tekufat Hibat Tsiyon (Hebrew Poetry during the Hibat Zion period, 1969); D. Landau, Hayesodot Haritmiyim shel Hashira (The Rhythmic Elements of Poetry, 1970); and "Hitpathut Hasonneta Basifrut Haivrit" (Development of the Sonnet in Hebrew Literature), diss., Univ. Bar-Ilan, Israel (1972); B. Hrushovski, Ritmus Harakhavut (The Rhythm of Extensity, 1978); U. Shavit, Hamahapekha Haritmit (The Rhythmic Revolution, 1983); H. Barzel, Amir Gilbo'a (1984); A. Hagorni, Shlonski Be'avotot Byalik (Shlonsky in Bialik's bonds, 1985); R. Tsur, On Metaphoring (1987); Ch. Bar-Yosef, Al Shirat Zelda (On the poetry of Zelda, 1988); D. Landau, Iduna shel Sheaga (The Refinements of Roars, 1990)—on lyric poetry; R. Tsur, Toward a Theory of Cognitive Poetics (1992), and Rhythm, Structure and Performance (1998); A. Mirsky, Signon Ivri (Heb. style, 1999).

S. A. Geller (biblical); R. Brann (medieval); D. Landau (modern)

HELLENISM. See classicism; greek poetry; hebraism.

HELLENISTIC POETICS. See alexandrianism; classical poetics.

HELLENISTIC POETRY. See alexandrianism; greek poetry.

HEMIEPES (Gr., "half-hexameter"). In cl. Gr. poetry, the metrical sequence – ∪ – ∪ ∪ –, which corresponds to the first half of a dactylic *hexameter, before the penthemimeral *caesura. This sequence took on a life of its own; it occurs alone and in various combinations with other cola in Gr. lyric verse. West suggests that, although it is conventional to think of the hexameter as six dactylic feet, in fact, it might better be thought of as two cola, hemiepes plus a *paroemiac, spliced together at the caesura with one long or two short syllables.

■ Wilamowitz; West; J. L. López Cruces, "Sobre la colometría de PMG 836 a (Philoxenus Leucadius) y SH 737 (Stratonicus Atheniensis)," Florentia Iliberritana 2 (1991); C. O. Pavese, "A tavoletta KN V(1) 114 + 158 + 7719 e l'origine dell'esametro dattilico," Atti e memorie del secondo congresso internazionale di micenologia, ed. E. De Miro et al. (1996).

R. J. Getty; T.V.F. Brogan

HEMISTICH (Gr., "half line"). A half line of verse; the two hemistichs are divided by the *caesura. In Gr., it usually forms an independent *colon. The device is used in Gr. and subsequent drama whenever characters exchange half lines of dialogue rapidly, giving the effect of sharp argument; in Gr., such a series is called hemistichomythia (see stichomythia, split lines). In other types of poetry, an isolated hemistich may give the effect of great emotional or physical disturbance, e.g., Virgil's isolated half lines in the Aeneid (1.534, 2.233), whence Shakespeare may have learned the device, but John Dryden eschews isolated hemistichs as "the imperfect products of a hasty Muse" (dedication to the Aeneid).

In Old Germanic poetry—i.e., in OE, OHG, and ON—the hemistich is the primary structural unit of the meter (see english prosody, germanic prosody, norse poetry). The first hemistich is technically called the a-verse (or on-verse), the second hemistich the b-verse (or off-verse). In the definitive typology of OE meter, Sievers showed that all the hemistichs in Beowulf could be reduced to orderly variations of only five types (A-E). Further, although each half line in Beowulf generally contains metrical patterns that could occur in the other half (disregarding *alliteration), hemistichs are by no means metrically interchangeable. A few hemistichs are exclusively first half-line types (e.g., type A with a light first lift and the expanded type D), and studies have shown that certain combinations of first and second half lines, while not prohibited, are avoided (e.g., two type As or two type Bs); consequently, the structure of the long line is far from being a random mixture of self-contained hemistichs. All this seems to imply that the poet put together hemistichs according to some definite principles as yet undiscovered. Recent studies have also shown the ME alliterative line to have a clearer hemistichic structure than was assumed by most 19th- and 20th-c. scholars.

■ Sievers; J. L. Hancock, Studies in Stichomythia (1917); A. J. Bliss, The Metre of "Beowulf," 2d ed. (1967); T. Cable, "Middle English Meter and Its Theoretical Implications," YLS 2 (1988).

T.V.F. Brogan; R. A. Hornsby; T. Cable

HENDECASYLLABLE. A line of 11 syllables, the hendecasyllable is significant in both the quantitative verse of Gr. and Lat. and in the accentual and syllabic prosodies of the mod. Romance langs., though as different meters. In *classical prosody, the hendecasyllable is the *phalaecean, which has the pattern ∪ ∪ (or ∪ –; – ∪; – –) – ∪ ∪ – ∪ – ∪ – ∪ and is chiefly associated with Catullus. But in the Middle Ages, as the quantitative or "metrical" Lat. verse was transformed into the accentually based "rhythmic" verse of the vernaculars, the It. endecasillabo seems to have evolved from the cl. *sapphic or iambic *trimeter; its relation to the Fr. décasyllabe in the earliest stages is disputed. In De vulgari eloquentia (On Vernacular Eloquence, 2.5, 2.12; ca. 1304), Dante defined the hendecasyllable as the most noble line of Italian prosody, the one most suitable for the highest forms of poetic expression in the vernacular and, as such, the preferred line for the canzone, the most illustrious of *lyric forms; the hendecasyllable has been the staple line of It. poetry since the 13th c. The names of the line forms in It. prosody are established by the place of the principal accent; thus, the normal hendecasyllable has 11 syllables, with a fixed stress falling on the tenth (the endecasillabo piano); normally in this form of the meter, the final word in the line is paroxytonic. Occasionally, lines of ten syllables occur; these are the analogues of the Romance *decasyllables and, in their unrhymed form and more distantly, the Eng. *iambic pentameter. Lines of 12 syllables also occur, the final word then being proparoxytonic. In addition to the major stress on the tenth syllable, the It. hendecasyllable is divided by a variable *caesura into two *hemistiches of unequal length, one a settenario and the other a quinario—with a corresponding secondary stress on either the sixth syllable (endecasillabo a maiore: "nel mezzo del cammín / di nostra vita") or the fourth (endecasillabo a minore: "mi ritrovái /; per una selva oscùra"). In the former, the settenario comprises the first hemistich, followed by the quinario, and vice versa in the latter. Given the large number of dispositions of the secondary stresses in the line, the hendecasyllable is the most versatile meter in It. prosody, being used in virtually every genre (canzone, ballata, sonnet, terza rima, ottava rima, *madrigal, and others) and for all subjects by most It. poets. A distinctive feature of many It. stanza forms is "the harmony of eleven and seven" (Ker), a mixing of hendecasyllables and *heptasyllables that carried over into Sp. prosody as well.

The Marqués de Santillana adapted the hendecasyllable to the Sp. sonnet form in 1444, and in general, the devel. of the hendecasyllable in Spain followed the same pattern as that in Italy. Heinrich Heine and J. W. Goethe imitated the It. hendecasyllable in Germany. In England, the iambic pentameter was influenced in its early stages (i.e., in both Chaucer and Thomas Wyatt) by the It. endecasillabo, but 11-syllable lines in Eng. are usually simply pentameters with an (extrametrical) feminine ending (see MASCULINE AND FEMININE): true hendecasyllables in Eng. after the Ren. are usually trans. or imitations of Catullus.

See CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES, VERSI SCIOLTI, VERSO PIANO, VERSO SDRUCCIOLO, VERSO TRONCO.

■ W. Thomas, Le Décasyllabe roman et sa fortune en Europe (1904); F. D'Ovidio, Versificazione italiana e arte poetica medievale (1910); W. P. Ker, "De superbia carminum," Form and Style in Poetry (1928); M. Serretta, Endecasillabi crescenti (1938); A. Monteverdi, "I primi endecasillabi italiani," Studi romanzi 28 (1939); V. Pernicone, "Storia e svolgimento della metrica," Tecnica e teoria letteraria, ed. M. Fubini, 2d ed. (1951); M. Burger, Recherches sur la structure et l'origine des vers romans (1957); D. S. Avalle, Preistoria dell'endecasillabo (1963); G. E. Sansone, "Per un'analisi strutturale dell'endecasillabo," Lingua e Stile 2 (1967); A. D. Scaglione, "Periodic Syntax and Flexible Meter in the Divina Commedia," RPh 21 (1967); I. Baldelli, "Endecasillabo," Enciclopedia Dantesca, ed. U. Bosco, v. 2 (1970); P. Boyde, "The Hendecasyllable," Dante's Style in his Lyric Poetry (1971); A. B. Giamatti, "Italian," in Wimsatt; F. Caliri, Tecnica e poesia (1974); Spongano; Wilkins; P. G. Beltrami, Metrica, poetica, metrica dantesca (1981); Elwert, Italienische; A. Menichetti, Metrica italiana (1993); S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994).

T.V.F. BROGAN; R. A. SWANSON; C. KLEINHENZ

HENDIADYS (Gr., "one through two"). The use of two substantives (occasionally two adjectives or two verbs), joined by a conjunction, to express a single but complex idea: one of the elements is logically subordinate to the other, as in "sound and fury" (Macbeth 5.5.27) for "furious sound." The figure appears in the Bible and in Gr. verse and prose but is not referred to before Servius (4th c. CE), who notes it in Virgil (e.g., pateris libamus et auro: we pour our libations from cups and gold = from golden cups—Georgics 2.192). In Gr., according to Sansone, hendiadys typically shows a "reciprocal" (21) relation between its two elements, "either of which could be logically and grammatically subordinated to the other" (19): thus pros haima kai stalagmon (A. Eumenides 247) may mean both "the dripping of the blood" and "the dripping blood" (20).

Virgil's hendiadys sometimes involves two distinct ideas (Hahn)—from cups and from gold—as well as a third that fuses them. The sum is elusive and complex. Shakespeare, mining the figure's mysterious and antilogical overtones, uses hendiadys far more than any other Eng. writer, often in conjunction with other kinds of doublets, to cast doubt on the authenticity of linguistic and social unions (couplings, contracts, marriages) and to provide a linguistic mirror for the internal agitation and ambivalence of troubled characters and plays. See esp. Hamlet (Wright, Kermode). Vickers, citing Kerl and Empson, disputes this view. Housman parodies Gr. hendiadys in "I go into the house with heels and speed"(emphasis added).

■ A. E. Housman, "Fragment of a Greek Tragedy," Bromsgrovian (1893), rpt. in Parodies, ed. D. Macdonald (1960); H. Poutsma, "Hendiadys in English . . . ," Neophilologus 2, no. 1 (1917); E. A. Hahn, "Hendiadys: Is There Such a Thing?" CW 15 (1921–22); E. Kerl, "Das Hendiadyoin bei Shakespeare," diss., U. of Marburg (1922); Empson; G. T. Wright, "Hendiadys and Hamlet," PMLA 96 (1981); K. T. Loesch and G. T. Wright, "Forum: Hendiadys," PMLA 97 (1982); D. Sansone, "On Hendiadys in Greek," Glotta 62 (1984); F. Kermode, "Cornelius and Voltimand," Forms of Attention (1985), and Shakespeare's Language (2000); B. Vickers, "Counterfeiting" Shakespeare (2002).

G. T. WRIGHT

HEPTAMETER. This term means a line of seven feet, but metrists have at times termed heptameters meters that have little resemblance to each other beyond syllable count, so the term is perhaps better avoided. It is occasionally used to refer to cl. meters such as the Lat. septenarius*, which is a brachycatalectic line of seven *trochaic feet, and it has been used by some prosodists for mod. meters such as the Ren. *fourteener, as in George Chapman's trans. of Homer, but this is not the same type of meter, has a different rhythm, and is used in radically different contexts. Still less is it an appropriate term for Eng. *ballad meter, which in its most common form is set in *quatrains of lines of 4-3-4-3 *accentual verse. Schipper uses this term more or less synonymously with septenary for ME poems in 14–15 syllables such as the Poema morale and Ormulum, but here too terminology implies a derivation and structure that now seem problematic. In mod. Eng. verse, the term is applicable mainly to the long line of William Blake's later prophetic books, a line that Blake said "avoided a monotonous cadence like that of Milton and Shakespeare" by achieving "a variety in every line, both in cadence and number of syllables." Syllable count actually ranges as high as 21. Blake's sources would seem to be the Bible (see VERSET), James Macpherson, and late 18th-c. Ger. experiments in long-lined verse such as those in Friedrich Hölderlin's Hyperion, but Blake himself claimed that the form was given him in automatic writing. Other 19th-c. instances are William Wordsworth's "The Norman Boy" and "The Poet's Dream" (coupleted quatrains); Lord Byron's "Stanzas for Music"; Walter Scott's "The Noble Moringer"; Elizabeth Barrett Browning's "Cowper's Grave"; and J. G. Whittier's "Massachusetts to Virginia."

■ Schipper; A. Ostriker, Vision and Verse in William Blake (1965); K. Raine, "A Note on Blake's 'Unfettered Verse,'" William Blake: Essays for S. Foster Damon, ed. A. H. Rosenfeld (1969).

T.V.F. BROGAN

HEPTASYLLABLE. In most metrical systems, lines of seven syllables are almost always variants of octosyllables, not an autonomous meter. In Eng., such lines appear most prominently in the verse form known as "8s and 7s," as in John Milton's "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso." In Fr., they are one form of vers impair, though the heptasyllables in Pierre de Ronsard's *odes are a deliberate imitation of Pindar, whose odes were printed in short lines in the 16th c. Only in *Italian prosody is the heptasyllable or settenari a major line form, being used in alternation with the *hendecasyllable, the endecasillabo. This mixing of lines of 7 and 11 syllables in stanzas is distinctive to It. prosody and very much exploited by poets. In the Welsh englynion, they were perhaps the original line length, later to be combined with 10s and 6s (see ENGLYN). Seven syllable lines are also prominent in Vietnamese poetry. Some 20th-c. Eng. poets such as Thom Gunn developed a basically syllabic heptasyllable line as kind of transitional form between meter and *free verse.

■ M. F. Moloney, "The Prosody of Milton's 'Epitaph,' 'L'Allegro,' and 'Il Penseroso'," MLN 72 (1957); R. Nelli, "Remarques sur le vers heptasyllabique français et occitan," Mélanges offerts à; Rita Lejeune, vol. 1 (1968); B. Vine, "On the Heptasyllabic Verses of the Rig-Veda," ZVS 91 (1977); Elwert, Italienische.

T.V.F. BROGAN; P. WHITE

HERMENEUTICS

I. Definition and Etymology
II. Ancient and Medieval
III. Modern
IV. Contemporary
V. Future Tasks

I. Definition and Etymology. Hermeneutics is sometimes understood as an art practiced by every human being engaging in social interactions, sometimes as a discipline of the humanities that builds on that art and elaborates explicit rules, sometimes as that discipline's philosophical justification. Hermeneutics deals not with unformed natural objects but with products of rational agents to which a meaning can be ascribed (interpretanda). Its basic operation is not explanation, as in the natural sciences, but understanding. A causal explanation of the genesis of the interpretandum is thereby not excluded, but it differs from the explanation of natural events (see Wright, Apel 1984). The products to be understood are not limited to texts: Hermann Kretzschmer published on musical and Carl Robert on archaeological hermeneutics. Also mute actions, perhaps even dreams and lapses, can be understood insofar as they express, according to Sigmund Freud, unconscious intentions. But since hermeneutics in its higher forms is itself a ling. activity, the understanding of products in the form of spoken or written lang. is its most congenial task. *Interpretation is itself a product of rational agents; thus, it can itself become the object of an interpretation. Since interpretation occurs in a lang., it presupposes antecedent, often unconscious hermeneutic acts that led to the interpreter's mastery of his own lang. On the other hand, the failure of our normal hermeneutic acts facing a novel interpretandum leads to the genesis of hermeneutics as theory. Thus, hermeneutics deals mainly with difficult interpretanda, either in a different or outdated lang. or in the same lang., but with various layers of meaning, such as in poetry. Poetry has, therefore, always been a privileged object of hermeneutics. Traditionally, hermeneutics has often focused on texts with authoritative claims, either religious or legal, whose interpretation was crucial for a culture. The desire to adjust the authoritative texts to the needs of the present often led to transcending what was intended by the text. The understanding of an interpretandum, however, has to be distinguished both from the constitution of its physical basis and the evaluation of its meaning, e.g., according to its truth or its aesthetic value. In the case of texts, the first task is fulfilled by *textual criticism. Even if the three tasks are conceptually different (understanding a text presupposes its establishment, and its evaluation presupposes its appropriate interpretation), in real life they are connected: textual crit. is not simply a mechanical work but has to look at the meaning of the words in order to constitute the most likely text; and often only the recognition of the truth of an assertion can convince us that we have really understood its meaning.

Etymologically, the term hermeneutics goes back to the Gr. hermēneutikê téchnē. There is a family of related terms, such as the verb hermēneúein (translate, interpret, explain, express, describe) and the nouns hermêneuma, hermēneía, and hermēneús. The last one is the oldest word (but not found earlier than in the 5th c. BCE) and has the original meaning "interpreter" (later also "agent," "broker"), coined with reference to the god Hermes, a mediator between gods and humans. In Plato's Statesman, a hermeneutic art is mentioned in connection with the mantic art (260d, cf. 290c); it is probably the art of interpreting divine signs, for, within a religious view, what are for us purely natural events can be interpreted since they appear as manifestations of the gods. In the (probably spurious) Epinomis, the hermeneutic and the mantic arts are criticized for knowing only what has been said but being unable to determine whether it is true (975c). In Gr., hermēneía signifies also the capacity for communication (Xenophon, Memorabilia 4.3.12), stylistic expression or gift of style (so in the title of the rhetorical work ascribed to Demetrius or in Dionysius of Halicarnassus's Pros Gnaion Pompēion epistolē [Letter to Pompey, 1.2]), or enunciation: so in the (probably later) title of Aristotle's work, translated as De interpretatione (On Interpretation) by Boethius, although it is hardly a hermeneutic work in the sense defined above. For poetics, Demetrius's work is the most important treatise of antiquity using the term hermēneía.

II. Ancient and Medieval. Even if the ancients do not have a discipline called hermeneutics corresponding to the mod. one, we find scattered hermeneutic reflections in their philosophical, poetological, rhetorical, mythographic, theological, juridical, and mantic lit. (Of the latter, oneiromantic works, dealing with dreams, may overlap with mod. hermeneutic interests.) Plato criticizes poets and rhapsodes for not really understanding what they say, since they are inspired by the gods (Apology 22a ff., Ion 533d ff.). In the Ion, terms related to hermēneús are used five times (534e f.); the rhapsodes are called interpreters of the interpreters, since the poets are interpreters of the gods (see also 530c). At the same time, Plato's Socrates hardly believes that his grammatically impossible interpretation of hekōn in Simonides' poem in accordance with Socrates' own ethical theory (Protagoras 345d ff.) captures the poet's *intention. He wants to show that the philosophical quest is independent of the interpretation of traditional authoritative texts: philosophy should be the standard of interpretation, rather than the other way around. In fact, Plato's Socrates mocks persons who hide behind the interpretations of poets and exhorts them to expose their own ideas, since it is not possible to find out what absent people believe (Hippias minor 365c f., Protagoras 347e). This is linked to Plato's privileging oral conversation ahead of all forms of written communication (Phaedrus 274b ff.), for only in conversation can the author react to crits. and expose what he really intends. Although this renders it likely that, as the Tübingen school, which focused on Plato's esoteric doctrines, teaches, Plato did not entrust all his philosophical beliefs to writing, the choice of the literary dialogue must have been motivated by the desire to imitate that form of intellectual exchange where the most thorough interpretation of the interlocutor's ideas is possible. At the same time, the anonymity of Plato's dialogues (not shared by Aristotle's and many of Cicero's dialogues, where the author is one of the interlocutors) makes it difficult to discern which position Plato himself supports. The differentiation between dialogical works and works in the first person (autoprósōpa) is ancient (Ammonius, Eis tas tou Aristotelous Katēgorias hypomnēma [Commentary on Aristotle's Categories]); no less is the distinction between the author's position and that of the interlocutors in his dialogues (Aristides Quintilianus, Peri mousikēs [On music]), even if an assertion by an interlocutor may also be on a different level a statement by the author himself (Cicero, Orator 13.42). Plato's crit. of poetry is not incompatible with his dialogues being themselves some of the artistically most complex works of antiquity. Plato does not want to eliminate poetry; he aims at a synthesis of *philosophy and poetry. Some of his remarks about poetry apply to his own work and are hints on how to interpret him (e.g., Symposium 223d, Republic 393c).

Not surprisingly, Plato's dialogues became themselves one of the favorite interpretanda of ancient hermeneutics (also two of the most influential theorists of hermeneutics in the 19th and 20th cs., Friedrich Schleiermacher and Hans-Georg Gadamer, were renowned Plato scholars). Albinus's Prologos, the anonymous Prolegomena tēs Platōnos philosophias (Prolegomena to Plato's Philosophy, earlier ascribed to Olympiodorus), and many individual commentaries of Platonic dialogues by Neoplatonists deal with the varieties of the dialogue form as well as with the concrete meaning of intricate passages. Sometimes later doctrines are read into them, but Proclus rightly insists on the hermeneutic maxim that the preludes of the Platonic dialogues must be connected with their main topics and deduces this from Plato's own statement in the Phaedrus (264c) that speeches are like organisms (Eis ton Platōnos Parmenidēn [Commentary on Plato's Parmenides]). Hereby he seems to imply the canon that an author's interpretation has to take into account his own remarks about interpretation.

The other great interpretanda of the ancients were religious texts. The allegorical interpretation of pagan myths began probably with Theagenes of Rhegium in the 6th c. BCE; it was fully elaborated by the Stoics. Lucius Annaeus Cornutus's work is preserved; it offers, based on mostly invalid etymologies, an interpretation of the divinities as natural elements. The Neoplatonic interpretation of the gods connects them to metaphysical strata of reality. Since only the Jewish and Christian religions are based on sacred books, the hermeneutics of the OT and NT are far more complex than the approach to pagan myths. Already the Hellenized Jew Philo of Alexandria offers, influenced by Plato and the Stoics, a philosophical interpretation of the OT, which recognizes a higher spiritual beyond the literal or sensual meaning (see, e.g., Peri Abraam [On Abraham] §200) and, thus, frees the Bible from statements either contradictory or morally unworthy of God; particularly extensive is Philo's Nomōn hierōn allegoria (Allegorical Interpretation of the Laws). Philo's philosophical approach had little impact on the rabbinic interpretation collected in the Mishnah and the Gemara, although the Talmudical hermeneutics also develops, from Hillel to Eliezer ben Jose, explicit rules to deal, e.g., with contradictions between biblical passages. Philo exerts a strong influence on Clement of Alexandria and Origen, the first systematic Christian theologian, who in Peri archōn (On First Principles) 4:1–3 articulates an analogous biblical hermeneutics, subordinating the literal to the allegorical sense

(the first not always being present; see ALLEGORY), and adding a third, psychic sense between the somatic and the pneumatic. Origen teaches that the literal interpretation may lead to Gnosticism (4:2,1,4) and insists that scripture offers rules for its own interpretation. In opposition to the school of Alexandria, the school of Antioch (Theodore of Mopsuestia) limits the allegorical interpretation. It was Ambrose's defense of an allegorical meaning in the Bible that facilitated Augustine's conversion, since he had been alienated by a literal interpretation of several of its passages (Confessions 5.14). The later Augustine not only dedicated several works to biblical *exegesis, but developed a biblical hermeneutics, particularly in the 12th book of the Confessiones (Confessions) and in De doctrina christiana (On Christian Doctrine). Its first book deals with the objects of Christian doctrine, its second and third with its signs, mainly with obscurities arising from unknown or ambiguous signs, respectively. At the end of the third book, which warns against interpreting literal expressions figuratively and vice versa, Augustine recommends the seven rules of Tichonius. From Johannes Cassianus onward, Christian biblical hermeneutics has known four senses: the literal, allegorical, tropological (moral), and anagogical (relating to the eschatology). (Also the rabbinical exegesis developed a fourfold approach to the Bible in the Pardes typology.) The second sense is linked to the interpretation of events of the OT as prefiguration of events in the NT, a doctrine present both in the Gospels and in the letters of Paul (Rom. 5:14, 1 Cor. 10:6; cf. Gal. 4:24 on allegorical interpretation). The theory of the fourfold sense determines the whole Middle Ages. Thomas Aquinas insists that the literal meaning, under which he subsumes the parabolic sense, must be the basis of all other senses (Summa Theologica 1q.1a.10). But there is also an allegorical sense since things, insofar as they are created by God, may be themselves signs of other things. Aquinas explains the use of metaphors in the Bible partly with human nature, partly with the necessity to address ignorant people (1q.1a.9, q.61a.1ad1, q.67a.4, 1/2q.98a.3ad2). In De Genesi (On the Genesis), Nicholas of Cusa extends the latter idea so far as to take seriously the possibility that the chronology of the OT may be completely wrong. But not only the Bible triggered complex hermeneutic efforts; no less impressive was the disagreement of ecclesiastical authorities. The prologue of Peter Abelard's Sic et non (Yes and No) discusses various strategies to overcome apparent contradictions: the text may be unreliable; the words may have a different meaning from other authors; the authority may have only quoted someone else without agreeing with him; he may have later revoked his earlier position; what comes across as a general statement may have been intended only with restrictions.

The importance of allegory was not limited to theology. The most original work of med. poetics, Dante's uncompleted Convivio (The Banquet), offers allegorical interpretations of three of his poems. In the "Letter to Can Grande" (if authentic), Dante defends the polysemous nature of the Divine Comedy, connecting its allegorical interpretation with the doctrine of the fourfold sense in scripture. Already in Vita nuova (New Life), Dante offered, for the first time in Western hist., interpretations of his own lyric in an autobiographical context. A complex doctrine of poetry is not limited to the Eur. Middle Ages but was also developed in the Kashmir school of lit. crit. by Ānandavardhana in the Dhvanyāloka (Light on Suggestion, 9th c.) and by his commentator Abhinavagupta in the Locana (The Eye, 10th to 11th c.), focusing on the concept of dhvani* or suggestion: the poetic value consists not in what is explicitly said but in what is only evoked.

III. Modern. While med. and large parts of ancient hermeneutics search mainly for the truth in paradigmatic texts, mod. hermeneutics develops methods for approaching the meaning of a text, while abstracting from its truth-claim. The humanities owe to this turn a new rigor; at the same time, the social cost was enormous, since now it was no longer possible to transform the trad. with the sincere belief that one still continued it: fundamentalism and revolutionary break became the alternatives. This turn had various causes, one being the Reformation's interest in the "real meaning" of the Bible against the constructions of the Catholic Church and Scholasticism (Matthias Flacius). Needless to say, Protestant hermeneutics was still oriented toward theological truth, but it had to develop philologically more reliable methods in order to grant its new claims plausibility. But also outside theology, progress in textual crit., new discussions of logic, the reception of Roman law, as well as the study of Aristotle and his commentators, led to the turn. J. C. Dannhauer's Idea boni interpretis (Idea of the Good Interpreter) of 1630, one of the first universal hermeneutics, and his Hermeneutica Sacra (Sacred Hermeneutics) of 1654 manifest this turn within the Lutheran church. Also important is the Cartesian Johannes Clauberg, who in his Logica vetus et nova (Old and New Logic) of 1654 wants to go beyond René Descartes, who had focused on the lonely subject. In Baruch Spinoza's Tractatus theologico-politicus (Theological-political Treatise), the new hermeneutics is directed against Maimonides who had read into the Bible his own philosophical convictions—now, however, to justify not a new form of religious orthodoxy but a detachment from the trad. According to Baruch Spinoza, nothing guarantees that the biblical texts contain truth, while at the same time it cannot be denied that, e.g., Joshua and probably the author of the text believed that the sun moved around the earth. This sharp distinction of the meaning of a text from its truth leads to the demand for a historical analysis of the single books of the Bible and to the denial of Moses's authorship of the Pentateuch. Giambattista Vico's Scienza nuova (New Science), which anticipates central tenets of J. G. Herder's philosophy, contains the seminal idea that the worldview of the archaic human (which returned in the Middle Ages) markedly differs from that of the mod. human. To understand the former, we need to translate the poetical statements in which he grasped the world into the rational lang. of modernity.

Thus, Vico finds historical events expressed by *myths. Eighteenth-c. rationalism fostered hermeneutic reflections, which can be found in scattered form in Christian Thomasius and Christian Wolff, in elaborated form in J. M. Chladenius's Einleitung zur richtigen Auslegung vernünftiger Reden und Schriften (Introduction to a Correct Interpretation of Rational Speeches and Writings) of 1742 and in G. F. Meier's Versuch einer allgemeinen Auslegungskunst (Essay of a General Art of Interpretation) of 1757. (Meier was a pupil of A. G. Baumgarten, who gave a new meaning to the word aesthetics, first in his Meditationes philosophicae de nonnullis ad poema pertinentibus [Philosophical Meditations on Some Aspects Belonging to Poetry] of 1735.) Both Chladenius and Meier are inspired by G. W. Leibniz, Chladenius particularly by Leibniz's Monadology when he speaks of the point of view (Sehepunckt) of the interpreter. In Der Streit der Fakultäten (The Conflict of the Faculties), Immanuel Kant developed hermeneutic rules to deal with the Bible, but neither he nor the Ger. idealists published separate books on hermeneutics. Still, J. G. Fichte, F.W.J. Schelling, and G.W.F. Hegel engage in interpretative activities of great complexity, among which Schelling's attempt to make sense of myths in his Philosophie der Mythologie (Philosophy of Mythology), posthumously pub. in 1856–57, deserves special mention because it addresses again the theoretical problem of understanding what seems alien to reason, myth. Both Schelling and Hegel have a profound interest in all the arts, particularly in lit., to which early *romanticism opened a new access. Inspired by the general philosophical revolution as well as the enormous growth in historiographic knowledge in the 18th c., around 1800 an explicit interest in hermeneutics arose, mainly among philologists, such as F. A. Wolf (Darstellung der Altertumswissenschaft [Exposition of the Science of Antiquity], 1807) and Schelling's pupil Friedrich Ast (Grundlinien der Grammatik, Hermeneutik und Kritik [Outlines of Grammar, Hermeneutics, and Criticism], 1808), who discusses the hermeneutic circle. Schleiermacher's Hermeneutik und Kritik mit besonderer Beziehung auf das Neue Testament (Hermeneutics and Criticism with Special Reference to the New Testament), pub. posthumously in 1838 but going back to studies begun in 1805, wrongly claims to be the first general hermeneutics. But it is a highly innovative work, partly thanks to the method of concept formation inspired by Ger. idealism. It stands on the ground of the mod. separation of meaning and truth: in theology, the philological and the dogmatic procedure are utterly different, and the interpreter must know which one he or she is following. Thus, Schleiermacher rejects the old doctrine of the fourfold sense and warns against projecting later religious ideas back into the NT. His book subdivides interpretation into grammatical and psychological, dealing with the general lang. and the individual peculiarities of the author, respectively. The psychological interpretation is further subdivided into psychological in the narrower sense and technical interpretation; while the first focuses on the stream of consciousness of the author, the second addresses his deliberate strategies of structuring his thoughts. Schleiermacher sometimes seems to suggest that the mens auctoris, the mental state of the author, is the last criterion for the correctness of an interpretation. At the same time, he speaks of unconscious acts of an author that the interpreter may reconstruct and recognizes the truth of the old saying that an interpreter can understand an author better than the author did himself, namely, by rendering things conscious in us that were unconscious in the author. On a methodological level, Schleiermacher favors both comparison and divination, the former being regarded as the male, the second as the female form of cognition. The 19th c. brings forth further attempts to found the historical and philological sciences, J. G. Droysen's Grundriss der Historik (Outline of the Principles of History) of 1868 and P. A. Boeckh's Encyklopädie und Methodologie der philologischen Wissenschaften (Encyclopedia and Methodology of the Philological Sciences) being the most prominent ones. Confronted with the quick ascent of the natural sciences, both neo-Kantianism (Wilhelm Windelband and later Heinrick Rickert) and Wilhelm Dilthey defend the autonomy of the Geisteswissenschaften (called "moral sciences" in contemp. Eng. discourse) in opposition to the natural sciences. Dilthey, himself an expert in the hist. of hermeneutics, tries to found the humanities in a philosophy of life that links understanding to an analysis of experience and expression. His Einleitung in die Geisteswissenschaften (Introduction to the Human Sciences) of 1883, however, never went beyond the first volume, even if the late Dilthey still published in 1910 the long essay Der Aufbau der geschichtlichen Welt in den Geisteswissenschaften (The Formation of the Historical World in the Human Sciences). The difficulties of the project have partly to do with Dilthey's growing insight into the paradoxes of *historicism: if everything is historically conditioned and relative, how can the idea of a valid foundation for historical work make any sense?

IV. Contemporary. The great trad. of rationalist hermeneutics from the 17th to the 19th c. came to a halt in the 20th c., and the disarray in which the humanities find themselves in the 21st c. is partly a consequence of the lack of a generally shared hermeneutic theory. Probably, the most important single figure responsible for its crisis is Martin Heidegger. Influenced by Dilthey's philosophy of life, Heidegger, in his 1927 work Sein und Zeit (Being and Time), embeds Verstehen (understanding) in Dasein (being-there, existence). Existence itself is a process trying to understand itself; thus, understanding is no longer an intellectual operation subject to a cognitive standard. Heidegger rejects the idea that the hermeneutic circle could be avoided; on the contrary, we should enter into it in the right way. The late Heidegger radicalizes the historicism that had come to dominate Ger. culture and offers a vision of intellectual hist. as discontinuous but at the same time leading away from an original contact with Being. His interpretations of pre-Socratic philosophy as well as mod. poets, such as Friedrich Hölderlin and R. M. Rilke, try to capture the hist. of this loss. His discussions of cl. philosophy seek to overcome the trad. of metaphysics by pointing to inner tensions and contradictions in the interpretanda (Verwindung)—a method perfected later by Jacques Derrida's deconstruction, which Derrida presented in texts themselves innovative from a literary point of view. Another attack on traditional hermeneutics came from political philosopher Leo Strauss, who pointed to the fact that the fear of persecution can lead authors to disguise their thought in their texts. It was, however, Heidegger's pupil H. G. Gadamer who in 1960 applied in Wahrheit und Methode (Truth and Method) Heidegger's basic starting point to a theory of the humanities. Gadamer starts his enterprise with an ontology of the artwork, which explains the importance of his book for aesthetics, but gives a bias to his later approach to the humanities in general. For while the illegitimacy of the *intentional fallacy is manifest in dealing with artworks, where the intention of the author cannot be the ultimate standard of interpretation, there may well be other forms of understanding in which this standard is appropriate. Gadamer's narrative of the hist. of hermeneutics is supposed to prove the mere historicity of the mod. objectifying method; he himself wants to return to a hermeneutics that sees the interpretanda primarily as places of possible manifestation of truth, to be discovered in a dialogical process in which the interpretanda are applied to contemp. concerns. His idea of the foreconception of completeness (Vorgriff der Vollkommenheit) is somehow analogous to the analytical philosopher Donald Davidson's principle of charity, according to which we have inevitably to presume that the bulk of the statements of an unknown lang. is true if we are to have a chance to learn to understand it. With this idea, both Gadamer and Davidson challenge the starting point of mod. hermeneutics and somehow return, even if on a higher level, to the earlier form that connected understanding to the grasping of truth. But whereas Davidson's argument is a transcendental one, Gadamer rejects any search for the justification of a concrete interpretation: understanding is, as in Heidegger, an event, not in need of criteria or methods. Instead, Gadamer relies on effective hist. (Wirkungsgeschichte), even if this means that he deprives himself of the possibility of distinguishing between correct interpretation and historically influential misunderstanding. Gadamer's approach was criticized early on by the It. legal historian Emilio Betti and the Am. E. D. Hirsch and most recently by Hans Krämer. Of particular importance in Germany was the crit. by Apel and Habermas. The latter reproached Gadamer for uncritically supporting trads. and introduced psychoanalysis and critique of ideology as intermediate forms between the natural sciences and the humanities. But the strongest defense of the hermeneutic relevance of psychoanalysis came from the Fr. philosopher Paul Ricoeur in De l'interprétation. Essai sur Freud (Freud and Philosophy: An Essay on Interpretation) of 1965 with the famous classification of Karl Marx's, Friedrich Nietzsche's, and Sigmund Freud's hermeneutics as one of suspicion. In the later Le conflit des interpretations (The Conflict of Interpretations), Ricoeur shows an extraordinary capacity of moving between hermeneutics, on the one hand, and *structuralism, psychoanalysis, phenomenology, and religion, on the other hand.

Analytical philosophy has for a long time shunned hermeneutics. When Richard Rorty took his leave from analytical philosophy, which he regarded as hopelessly committed to representationalism, he proposed hermeneutics as an alternative: not, however, as an alternative foundational enterprise but as a form of conversation and edification. But it is important to understand that hermeneutics as such is not committed to antifoundationalism, as we find it, e.g., in Stanley Fish's work: only its post-Heideggerian turn is. After Donald Davidson and Paul Grice, Robert Brandom's complex form of inferentialism, in which the undertaking and attributing of commitments play a decisive role, is an example of how contemp. analytical philosophy has developed a new interest in hermeneutics, while not being willing to relinquish the normative stance.

