V. Future Tasks. Probably the most important task of a hermeneutics of the future that tries to mediate between the mod. and the contemp. approach is a systematic differentiation between the various functions of understanding. While some forms of understanding are inevitably oriented toward the mens auctoris, other forms are oriented toward the content with which the mens auctoris is struggling; therefore, they can transcend what the author has in mind and point to the unintended consequences of his speech acts. In both cases, however, an interpretation can succeed or fail, and it is hard to see how such a statement is legitimate without a commitment to some form of realism and to some methods that allow us to evaluate whether an approximation to reality has occurred. Since a correct interpretation presupposes familiarity with the topic of the interpretandum and since sometimes such knowledge may be fostered by a misunderstanding of the author's intention, there can occur fruitful misunderstandings that allow a new understanding on a deeper level. Furthermore, every hermeneutic effort has to recognize that expression may be distorted by fear but also by techniques of detachment, such as *irony and the deliberate use of fictionality, by which some truth is hinted at in an indirect way. In this sense, the hermeneutics of the artwork is the discipline's most complex and elusive task.

■ F.W. Farrar, History of Interpretation (1886); H. Kretzschmar, "Anregungen zur Förderung musikalischer Hermeneutik," Jahrbuch der Musikbibliothek Peters 9 (1902); C. Robert, Archaeologische Hermeneutik (1919); J. Wach, Das Verstehen, 3 v. (1926–33); B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1941); L. Strauss, Persecution and the Art of Writing (1952); M. Heidegger, Being and Time, trans. J. Macquarrie and E. Robinson (1962); E. Betti, Allgemeine Auslegungslehre als Methodik der Geisteswissenschaften (1967); E. D. Hirsch, Validity in Interpretation (1967); P. Ricoeur, Freud and Philosophy, trans. D. Savage (1970); K.-O. Apel et al., Hermeneutik und Ideologiekritik (1971); J. Habermas, Knowledge and Human Interests, trans. J. J. Shapiro (1971); D. Ihde, Hermeneutic Phenomenology (1971); G. H. von Wright, Explanation and Understanding (1971); H.-E. H. Jaeger "Studien zur Frühgeschichte der Hermeneutik," Archiv für Begriffsgeschichte 18 (1974); P. Ricoeur, The Conflict of Interpretations, ed. D. Ihde (1974); H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method, trans. G. Barden and J. Cumming (1975); P. Szondi, Einführung in die literarische Hermeneutik (1975); D. C. Hoy, The Critical Circle (1978); R. Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1979); H. Brinkmann, Mittelalterliche Hermeneutik (1980); J. Derrida, Margins of Philosophy, trans. R. Bass (1982); R. J. Bernstein, Beyond Objectivism and Relativism (1983); K.-O. Apel, Understanding and Explanation, trans. G. Warnke (1984); D. Davidson, Inquiries into Truth and Interpretation (1984); J. Caputo, Radical Hermeneutics (1987); S. Fish, Doing What Comes Naturally (1989); P. Grice, Studies in the Ways of Words (1989); G. Bruns, Hermeneutics, Ancient and Modern (1992); Legal Hermeneutics, ed. G. Leyh (1992); J. E. Malpas, Donald Davidson and the Mirror of Meaning (1992); W. Alexander, Hermeneutica generalis (1993); J. Weinsheimer, Eighteenth-century Hermeneutics (1993); R. Brandom, Making It Explicit (1994); J. Grondin, Introduction to Philosophical Hermeneutics (1994); G. Scholz, Ethik und Hermeneutik (1995); W. Dilthey, Hermeneutics and the Study of History, ed. R. A. Makkreel and F. Rodi (1996); P. Redding, Hegel's Hermeneutics (1996); V. Hösle, "Philosophy and the Interpretation of the Bible," Internationale Zeitschrift für Philosophie 2 (1999); O. R. Scholz, Verstehen und Rationalität (1999); Biblical Hermeneutics, ed. B. Corley, S. Lemke, G. Lovejoy (2002); The Cambridge Companion to Gadamer, ed. R. L. Dostal (2002); Is There a Single Right Interpretation? ed. M. Krausz (2002); G. Abel, Zeichen der Wirklichkeit (2004); T. M. Seebohm, Hermeneutics (2004); V. Hösle, Der philosophische Dialog (2006); H. Krämer, Kritik der Hermeneutik (2007); A. Spahn, Hermeneutik zwischen Rationalismus und Traditionalismus (2009).

V. Hösle

HERMETICISM. This trans. of the It. term ermetismo (derived from the name of the Egyptian god Thoth, Gr. Hermes Trismegistus, the mythical author of occult texts) is used to refer to the most widely known autochthonous trend in 20th-c. It. poetry and extended by analogy to describe the general tendency of contemp. poetry toward inaccessibility of lang. and multivalence of meaning. The term gained wide critical currency after the publication of Flora's study La poesia ermetica, but the "school" had identified its origins in a group of poets gathered around the Florentine literary review La voce (1908–13), as well as in the Orphism (orfismo) professed by Arturo Onofri and Dino Campana. The Canti orfici (1914) of the latter is now regarded as the first full manifestation of the new trend. The main exponents of the school between the two wars were Giuseppe Ungaretti and Eugenio Montale. Its third-wave representatives include Mario Luzi, Sandro Penna, Alfonso Gatto, and Piero Bigongiari.

Salient features of the ars poetica of the ermetici are a blind faith in the miraculous virtues of the Word, often considered more as sound than as sense (poignant instances are some of Ungaretti's programmatic poems in L'Allegria: "Il porto sepolto" or "Commiato"); a renewed awareness of the polysemous nature of all utterance (see POLYSEMY); a reliance on the subconscious and irrational drives of the psyche; a partiality for mental processes based on intuition rather than logic and, hence, a favoring of oneiric techniques of description (good instances are the first two poems in Salvatore Quasimodo's Acque e Terre). The great tool of the hermeticist poetic discourse is the analogue, the art of the *simile, in the Aristotelian sense of the sudden grasp of "similarity in things dissimilar." Arthur Rimbaud and Georg Trakl are figures often mentioned, esp. in relation to Campana's poetic chimaeras; the roots of the hermetic movement have also been traced to E. A. Poe and Novalis. The parallels with Fr. *symbolism, esp. Stéphane Mallarmé and Paul Valéry, are evident.

In contemp. It. literary historiography, a sociological-political interpretation of hermeticism has taken hold. The only "form of rebellion" (Tedesco) available to the poet in totalitarian times is an "evasion into the self," a solipsistic clausura, "an island of salvation" (Bo). The historicist interpretation has even been extended to the positing of a secret code, allegedly worked into hermetic texts by secretly antifascist authors. Similar trends exist in countries with widely differing socio-political situations (e.g., Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, H.D. and Wallace Stevens in Eng.; Federico García Lorca and Juan Ramón Jiménez in Sp.; Paul Éluard in Fr.; Osip Mandelstam in Rus.). Hermeticism was part of a cyclical recurrence of trobar clus*, a concept of poetry as magic and hypnosis, keyless mystery, Orphic descent into the dark nether regions of the soul.

See OBSCURITY.

■ A. Onofri, Il nuovo Rinascimento e l'arte dell'Io (1925); F. Flora, La poesia ermetica (1936); M. Apollonio, Ermetismo (1945); F. Giannessi, Gli ermetici (1951); M. Petrucciani, La poetica dell'ermetismo italiano (1955); O. Ragusa, "French Symbolism in Italy," RR 46 (1955); V. Orsini, Ermetismo (1956); S. Ramat, L'ermetismo (1969); C. Bo, "Due testimonianze di letteratura contemporanea," Letteratura Italiana 24 (1970); N. Tedesco, La condizione crepuscolare (1970); L. Anceschi, Le poetiche del Novecento in Italia (1973); M. P. Predmore, La poesía hermética de Juan Ramón Jiménez (1973); M. Strazzeri, Profilo ideologico dell'ermetismo italiano (1977); D. Valli, Storia degli ermetici (1978); La critica e gli ermetici, ed. M. Fioravanti (1978); F. Di Carlo, Letteratura e ideologia dell'ermetismo (1981); L. Woodman, Stanza My Stone: Wallace Stevens and the Hermetic Tradition (1983); J. Cary, Three Modern Italian Poets: Saba, Ungaretti, Montale, 2d ed. (1993); A. Dolfi, Terza generazione (1997).

T. Wlassics; E. Livorni

HEROIC COUPLET. A rhyming pair of Eng. heroic (that is, *iambic *pentameter) lines, most often used for *epigrams, verse essays, *satires, and narrative verse and the dominant form for Eng. poetry from ca. 1640 to ca. 1790. The Eng. created the heroic couplet in the 16th c. by imposing a regular iambic stress pattern and a regular *caesura (falling normally after the fourth, fifth, or sixth syllable) on the old Chaucerian decasyllabic line (see DECASYLLABLE) and by imposing on the Chaucerian couplet (called "riding rhyme" by George Puttenham and George Gascoigne) a regular hierarchy of pauses—respectively, caesural, first-line, and end-of-couplet—adapted from the Lat. *elegiac distich. This form, in which the end of the couplet regularly coincides with the end of a sentence, would later be called "closed," as opposed to the "open" type, in which there is no such coincidence of line and syntax.

The transformation of the Chaucerian line into what Puttenham and John Dryden called the "heroic" line was evolutionary, spanning the 16th c. from ca. 1520 to 1600 (Thompson). But the imposition of the hierarchy of pauses on the loose couplet inherited from Chaucer was more dramatic, taking place almost explosively between 1590 and 1600, when numbers of Eng. poets translated and adapted Lat. poems in elegiac distichs—chiefly the Amores and Heroides of Ovid and the Epigrammaton of Martial—achieving or approximating a correspondence of couplet to distich. Christopher Marlowe's trans. of the Amores accomplishes a virtually unexceptionable equivalence:

> sive es docta, places raras dotata per artes;
> sive rudis, placita es simplicitate tua.
> est, quae Callimachi prae nostris rustica dicat > carmina—cui placeo, protinus ipsa placet.
> est etiam, quae me vatem et mea carmina culpet—> culpantis cupiam sustinuisse femur.
> molliter incedit—motu capit; altera dur est—
> at poterit tacto mollior esse viro.
>
> (If she be learn'd, then for her skill I crave her,
> If not, because shees simple I would have her.
> Before Callimachus one preferres me farre,
> Seeing she likes my bookes why should we jarre?
> An other railes at me and that I write
> Yet would I lie with her if that I might.
> Trips she, it likes me well, plods she, what then?
> Shee would be nimbler, lying with a man.)

Other poets significant for the devel. of the form were Nicholas Grimald (who preceded the wave), John Harington, John Marston, Thomas Heywood, Joseph Hall, Michael Drayton, Ben Jonson, and John Donne.

The immediate result of this structural imitation was the affixing onto Eng. couplets of the Lat. distich's hierarchy of pauses and of a correspondingly balanced rhet. Note the balances above between the sharply demarcated lines of single couplets—"If . . . / If not . . ."—and the sharply divided halves of single lines—"If . . . then"; "Trips . . . plods." Eng. rhyme, which had the same closural power as the recurrent half-line pattern in the *pentameter of the Lat. distich, allowed the Eng. measure, once it outgrew its dependence on the Lat. model, to become much more flexible and thus absorb the modifications by which successive Eng. poets from Donne to George Crabbe transformed it into a medium of great expressive power.

At the same time, the heroic couplet also underwent a second major devel., beginning with Marlowe's Hero and Leander (1593) and extending until about 1660, in which the formal elements, the rhyme, and all the pauses were subsumed and all but concealed. This process, which Marlowe himself practiced cautiously, was carried further by George Chapman in his trans. of the Odyssey (1614) and in William Chamberlayne's long romance Pharonnida (1659). This "romance" or "open" couplet pointedly rejected the emphasis and definition established by the closed couplet; here, rhyme and syntax do not parallel and reinforce each other, and the formal elements work against sense, creating mystery and remoteness instead of clarity and precision. But the romance couplet vanished from Eng. poetry before the Restoration, to be revived—briefly, and appropriately—by such romantic poets as John Keats (Endymion), Leigh Hunt (The Story of Rimini), and Thomas Moore (Lalla Rookh).

Meanwhile, the closed couplet was refined and extended in the 17th c. by such poets as Francis Beaumont and George Sandys, then Edmund Waller, John Denham, and Abraham Cowley, and thus handed on to Dryden (practicing 1660–1700) and Alexander Pope (practicing ca. 1700–45). The heroic couplet as all these poets understood it is both described and exemplified in the famous lines from "Cooper's Hill" (1642) that Denham addressed to the Thames:

> O could I flow like thee, and make thy stream
> My great example, as it is my theme!
> Though deep, yet clear, though gentle, yet not > dull,
> Strong without rage, without ore-flowing full.

As this widely known and widely imitated little passage illustrates, the closed couplet provides continuous support in its half line, line, and couplet spans for certain rhetorical devices and corresponding intellectual procedures, particularly *parallelism ("deep . . . gentle . . . / Strong . . . full"), with which poets enforced systems of induction, and *antithesis ("gentle . . . not dull"), with which they determined comparisons and refined analyses. They often intensified such patterns with the elliptical figures *zeugma and *syllepsis ("O could I flow like thee, and [could I] make thy stream") and with inversion ("Strong without rage, without ore-flowing full"). The argumentative and persuasive implications of such practices were esp. pertinent to an age empirical in intellectual tendency and social in cultural orientation.

Dryden chiefly developed the oratorical possibilities of the heroic couplet, addressing large, potentially turbulent groups: in theatrical prologues, men and women, or fops and gentlemen; in satires, Whigs and Tories, or Puritans and Anglicans. He projected himself not as an individual but as a spokesman, a representative of one faction or, if possible (as in the opening of Astraea Redux), of sensible Englishmen in general. In Religio Laici, he concludes his exposition of how Catholics and Protestants both in their own way abuse the Bible:

So all we make of Heavens discover'd Will
Is not to have it, or to use it ill.
The Danger's much the same; on several Shelves
If others wreck us, or we wreck our selves.

Notice, first, Dryden's use of the formal aspects of the closed couplet—the definitive use of caesura in the second and fourth lines and the emphasis of the rhymes—and, second, the way he unifies the two sides, partially by using plural pronouns, himself taking the position of spokesman for both.

Pope developed the heroic couplet into a primarily social—as opposed to Dryden's political—instrument. He presented himself as a sensible gentleman addressing either an intimate friend—as in the opening lines of the Essay on Man—or an attentive society—as in the Essay on Criticism—or, as in his mature essays and epistles, both at once. In this conversational exchange with his friend Dr. John Arbuthnot, the sensible (if sensibly exasperated) gentleman asks who has been hurt by his social satire:

Does not one Table Bavius still admit?
Still to one Bishop Philips seems a Wit?
Still Sappho—'Hold! for God-sake—you'll offend:
No Names—be calm—learn Prudence of a Friend:
I too could write, and I am twice as tall,
But Foes like these!—One Flatt'rer's worse than all;
Of all mad Creatures, if the Learn'd are right,
It is the Slaver kills, and not the Bite.

Notice, first, the caesura-defined parallel in line 5, and the formally illuminated antithesis, dividing both "Foes . . . [and] Flatt'rer" and the two conversationalists, in line 6; and, second, Pope's and his friend's awareness, although they are in intimate talk, that the walls have ears. Dryden in his most characteristic achievements aimed at political harmony or what he called "common quiet." Pope aimed, rather, at generally shared understanding or what he called "common sense."

The heroic couplet, modified in various ways, supported the generation of great poets who followed Pope, esp. Samuel Johnson, Charles Churchill, Oliver Goldsmith, and Crabbe. And even when Eng. culture shifted its focus from general understanding to individual expression—and quite properly revived the open couplet—several poets, chief among them Lord Byron, still found the closed couplet useful for public satire. Robert Browning ("My Last Duchess") and Matthew Arnold used the heroic couplet in the Victorian period; T. S. Eliot composed a heroic couplet section for The Waste Land, which he wisely excised when Ezra Pound made him see that he could not compete with Pope; and Robert Frost produced several exemplary heroic couplet poems (e.g., "The Tuft of Flowers"). Among more recent examples (see Steele, Caplan), A. D. Hope's extended use of the heroic couplet in Dunciad Minor stands out.

See BLANK VERSE, HEROIC VERSE.

■ Schipper; F. E. Schelling, "Ben Jonson and the Classical School," PMLA 13 (1898); G. P. Shannon, "Nicholas Grimald's Heroic Couplet and the Latin Elegiac Distich," PMLA 45 (1930); R. C. Wallerstein, "The Development of the Rhetoric and Metre of the Heroic Couplet," PMLA 50 (1935); G. Williamson, "The Rhetorical Pattern of Neo-classical Wit," MP 33 (1935–36); E. R. Wasserman, "The Return of the Enjambed Couplet," ELH 7 (1940); Y. Winters, "The Heroic Couplet and Its Recent Revivals," In Defense of Reason (1943); W. C. Brown, The Triumph of Form (1948); W. K. Wimsatt, "One Relation of Rhyme to Reason," The Verbal Icon (1954); J. H. Adler, The Reach of Art (1964); J. A. Jones, Pope's Couplet Art (1969); W. B. Piper, The Heroic Couplet (1969); G. T. Amis, "The Structure of the Augustan Couplet," Genre 9 (1976); H. Carruth, "Three Notes on the Versewriting of Alexander Pope," Michigan Quarterly Review 15 (1976); An Heroic Couplet Anthology, ed. W. B. Piper (1977); Thompson; Brogan, 389 ff.; P. Deane, At Home in Time: Forms of Neo-Augustanism in Modern English Verse (1994); T. Steele, " 'The Bravest Sort of Verses': The Heroic Couplet," Finch and Varnes; D. Caplan, Questions of Possibility (2005), ch. 4.

W. B. PIPER; S. CUSHMAN

HEROIC VERSE, heroic meter, heroic poetry. The term came to be used for *epic in the Middle Ages and after. Isidore of Seville in his Etymologiae (7th c. CE) defines heroic poetry (carmen heroicum) as being so named "because in it the affairs and deeds of brave men are narrated (for heroes are spoken of as men practically supernatural and worthy of Heaven on account of their wisdom and bravery); and this meter precedes others in status." In the Ren., Marco Girolamo Vida proclaims the subject of his De arte poetica (On Poetic Art, 1527) to be heroic poetry, though, in fact, it consists mainly of practical advice for poets derived from Horace and Quintilian. Torquato Tasso in his Discorsi del poema eroico (Discourses on the Heroic Poem, 1594) advocated a more romantic conception of epic but also insisted on accurate depiction of historical reality; he also wrote "heroic sonnets" celebrating great men and events of the past. John Dryden opens the Preface to his trans. of Virgil (1697) with the statement that "a heroick Poem, truly such, is undoubtedly the greatest Work which the Soul of Man is capable to perform."

Heroic meter is the *meter characteristic of heroic poetry: in cl. Gr. and Lat., this was, of course, the (dactylic) *hexameter. With the emergence of the Romance vernaculars from low Lat., however, poets in each lang. sought a line form that would represent the equivalent or analogue of the noblest meter of antiquity, the hexameter, the canonical meter of the epic trad. These were the hendecasyllable (versi sciolti) in It.; first the *alexandrine, then the décasyllabe in Fr.; and first the *fourteener, then *blank verse in Eng. Thomas Sébillet and Joachim du Bellay brought into Fr. use the term vers héroique for the décasyllabe, but Pierre de Ronsard, opposing the *decasyllable, used it rather for the alexandrine.

Heroic verse is still today the most neutral term for the ten-syllable, five-stress line in Eng. otherwise called iambic pentameter or decasyllable. Each of the latter two terms, while acceptable for general usage, carries with it connotations that are not historically accurate in every age and, hence, should be used with care. The former implies associations with *classical prosody that many now feel inappropriate ("feet"), while the latter implies ones with Romance prosody that are equally inappropriate (syllabism as the chief criterion). It is certainly true that, in the first half of the 16th c., when Eng. poets were rediscovering or simply constructing the line that was to become the great staple of Eng. poetry, most of them had been given training at school in Lat. metrics. Others, however, were very familiar with continental verse models, chiefly It. and Fr., that offered a line of 10 to 12 syllables with variable stressing equally available for adaptation into Eng. The point is that all the Romance models were isomorphs of the cl. line that adapted itself to the varying ling. constraints of each new lang. into which it was imported.

■ R. C. Williams, The Theory of the Heroic Epic in Italian Criticism of the 16th Century (1921); Curtius, ch. 9; Weinberg; Concepts of the Hero in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, ed. N. T. Burns and C. J. Reagan (1975); J. M. Steadman, Milton and the Paradoxes of Renaissance Heroism (1987); Heroic Epic and Saga, ed. F. J. Oinas (1978)—surveys 15 national lits.; G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); O. B. Hardison Jr., Prosody and Purpose in the English Renaissance (1989); W. J. Kennedy, "Heroic Poem before Spenser," and M. A. Radzinowicz, "Heroic Poem since Spenser," The Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. A. C. Hamilton et al. (1990); B. Murdoch, "Heroic Verse," Camden House History of German Literature, Vol. 2: German Literature of the Early Middle Ages, ed. B. Murdoch (2004).

T.V.F. Brogan

HETEROGRAM (Gr. éteros, "another"; gram, "writing"). A text in which no letter of the alphabet appears more than once. One of many forms of *constraint that were adopted by the *Oulipo group in France, the heterogram became the basis for heterogrammatic verse (also known as threnodials), an extremely demanding poetic form invented by Georges Perec (1936–82) and illustrated in four works, Ulcérations (Bleedings, 1974), Alphabets (1976), La clôture (In Closure, 1980) and Métaux (Metals, 1985). In its most basic form, Perec's heterogram is a cube consisting of 11 poems of 11 lines; each line is written from an isogram or a series of the 11 most common letters in a given lang. Each line of the poem is an *anagram of the isogram. In Fr., the most commonly used letters are all present in the title Ulcérations, Perec's first heterogrammatic cycle. In Eng., the most felicitous name for the practice, a single word made up of the 11 most commonly used letters, is threnodials, which derives from threnody, meaning a *lament or a *dirge. Though heterogrammatic verse is composed on a grid that displays the anagrammatic matrix, the poem also enjoys a second, free-verse lineation in print, one that is capitalized, punctuated, and more legible to the eye. In some cases, heterogrammatic verse is printed separately from its block-shaped blueprint.

After having established the basic rules of the form, Perec further experimented with its potentiality: in Alphabets, he reduces to ten the letters in the basic isogram and proceeds to write 16 chapters of eleven 11-line stanzas, each of which includes one of the 16 letters not included in the base isogram; in the 17-poem cycle La clôture, he returns to the original 11-letter isogram, but he introduces the principle of a joker, adding one additional letter to the series (printed as §) and extends the matrix by one line; finally, in Métaux, Perec uses a 12-letter isogram (an allusion to the *alexandrine verse form), and two jokers per line, in order to craft seven heterogrammatic *sonnets consisting of 14 matrix lines of 14 letters each. The novelty and highly restrictive difficulty of heterogrammatic verse may explain why few others have practiced the form. Among the few exceptions are Oskar Pastior's (1927–2006) Ger. adaptations of Perec's form in Okular ist eng oder Fortunas Kiel (The Narrow Eyepiece or Fortune's Keel, 1992) and Ian Monk's (b. 1960) "A Threnodialist's Dozen" (1998), the first poem of which is printed below as illustration of the heterogram:

S L I T H E R O N D A
S H I N D A R E T O L
E A D T H I S L O R N
A R T S L I N E D O H
T O S I L A N D H E R
N O T E S H A R D L I
L T O N E S H A R D I N H A L E D I T S O R
D E R S L A I N T O H
A N D S O R E L T H I
S T H R E N O D I A L

Slither on, dash in,
Dare to lead this lorn art's line doh to si land her notes' hard lilt.

One shard inhaled, its order's lain, to hand Sorel
this threnodial.

See aleatory poetics, avant-garde poetics, conceptual poetry, formalism, lipogram, modernism, morale élémentaire.

■ W. F. Motte, "Georges Perec on the Grid," French Review 57 (1984), and The Poetics of Experiment: A Study of the Work of Georges Perec (1986); B. Magné, "Quelques considérations sur les poèmes hétérogrammatiques de George Perec," and M. Ribière, "Alphabets déchiffré," Cahiers Georges Perec 5 (1992); J.-J. Poucel, "The Arc of Reading in Georges Perec's La Clôture," YFS 105 (2004).

J.-J. Poucel

HETEROMETRIC, heterometrical, polymetric; technically, "anisometrical" (as in Schipper). (1) Of stanzas taken singly or nonstanzaic poems: composed of lines of differing lengths and metrical structures. The *sap-phic, the Lat. *elegiac distich, and *tail rhyme are examples of stanzaic forms that mix longer and shorter lines. Variation of line length has been a significant factor in a number of lyric genres that have metrical form, certainly in cl. and in med. Lat. poetry, but particularly so after the flowering of *Occitan poetry in the 12th–14th cs. (Elwert). The interplay between long lining and short may take three forms: alternation, as in the elegiac distich and one important type of *ballad meter; longer lines punctuated by short ones—the general phenomenon of "tailing"; and short lines closed by longer ones, as in the *Spenserian stanza. Fr. vers mêlés are heterometric (see VERS LIBRES CLASSIQUES). Sense (1) is what is usually meant by the term heterometric. (2) Of stanzaic poems: heterostrophic—i.e., subsequent stanzas not in correspondence or *responsion to the first. In strophic compositions that consist of more than one stanza, it is the norm that whatever metrical pattern is established in the first stanza will be duplicated in subsequent ones (they are said to respond). Most often the first stanza is *isometric, but even if it is heterometric, all following stanzas in an isometric (isostrophic) poem are identical, i.e., heterometric in precisely the same way: in Eng. poetry, the great masters of the isometric poem in heterometric stanza are John Donne, Thomas Hardy, and W. H. Auden. Note that, in the regular ode, the *antistrophe responds metrically to the opening *strophe, and even in some free verse, which is not metrical and is built on a base not primarily aural but visual, the poet will establish a visual shape—the equivalent of a stanza—and then reiterate that shape exactly, giving a visually isometric effect. In some radical genres such as the descort, however, each stanza is different metrically from every other—i.e., the poem as a whole is truly heterometric. Such forms are rare, but one conspicuous example is the irregular or *Pindaric ode. In cl. prosody, older terms for isometric and heterometric are homoeomeral and polyrhythmic.

See RHYME COUNTERPOINT, STANZA.

■ Schipper; Elwert; K. D. Vishnevsky, "The Law of Rhythmical Correspondence in Heterogeneous Stanzas," Metre, Rhythm, Stanza, Rhyme, ed. G. S. Smith (1980).

T.V.F. BROGAN

HETERONYM. This concept enters poetry primarily through the work of the Port. modernist Fernando Pessoa. Pessoa composed verse under his own name (orthonym) as well as heteronyms or discrete personalities, each with his own *biography, poetic *voice, and engagement with the traditional genres of the Western literary trad. The main heteronyms are Alberto Caeiro, Ricardo Reis, and Álvaro de Campos. Pessoa's fictitious but independent poets emerge from the depersonalization of mod. consciousness, self-estrangement, and the dismantling of *romanticism's "I." In effect different lyric subjects, the heteronyms are autonomous of Pessoa's own poetic identity. As one among many poets, Pessoa himself may be yet another heteronym. The multifaceted, centerless poetic project reveals a crisis or emptiness of being, a negation of a coherent literary selfhood. Pessoa encapsulates the essence of heteronymy with his injunction "Be plural like the universe."

See PERSONA; PORTUGAL, POETRY OF.

■ K. D. Jackson, Adverse Genres in Fernando Pessoa (2010).

J. BLACKMORE

HEXAMETER. Strictly speaking, any line of verse composed of six metrical feet. The only such line with a major role in lit. hist. is dactylic hexameter, for which hexameter is usually shorthand. It was the meter of the earliest and most prestigious poetry of cl. antiquity and became the dominant meter for nondramatic verse in cl. Gr. and Lat. lit. The basic template is a 17-syllable line of five *dactyls (– ∪ ∪) and a concluding *spondee (– –); individual lines occasionally show that pattern: "quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum" (Aeneid 8.596). For individual dactyls, spondees can be substituted, though never for all five and seldom in the fifth foot; a line can, in fact, be as short as 13 syllables: "monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum" (Aeneid 3.658, with vowels elided in the first three feet). Most lines are from 14 to 16 syllables, and variation of dactyls and spondees is part of the craft: "aurea subnectens exsertae cingula mammae" (Aeneid 1.492: – ∪ ∪ | – – | – – | – – | – ∪ ∪ | – –). In most cases the conclusion of the line is marked by the regular cadence – ∪ ∪ | – x (the so-called adonean *colon), though a spondee in the penultimate foot is occasionally used for special effect. Rhythmic pacing is also managed by shifting the location of a *caesura. It usually occurs within the third, less often within the fourth foot; a caesura between the third and fourth feet, which would divide the line in two, is avoided. A caesura bisecting the third foot is called penthemimeral, one bisecting the fourth is called hephthimeral. The portion of a line preceding a penthemimeral caesura (the pattern – ∪ ∪ – ∪ ∪ –) is known as a *hemiepes (half-epic) and is used as a building block in other cl. meters. A word break between the fourth and fifth feet, rare in Homeric epic, is associated with *pastoral poetry and is known as the bucolic diaeresis.

At some times and places, stricter rules are also observed; a particularly stringent set is employed for one of the last great effusions of cl. Gr. poetry, the 48-book Dionysiaca of Nonnus from the 5th c. CE. The meter in its basic form, however, appears fully developed no later than 700 BCE as the meter of the Homeric epics; Hesiod also uses it exclusively. By the 6th c. BCE, it has been adapted to a couplet form, the so-called *elegiac distich, which consists of a dactylic hexameter and a truncated version of itself that is called a *pentameter (in effect, a double hemiepes); this meter has its own hist. as the meter of epigram and love poetry. Both meters are used in Lat. by Ennius in the early 2nd c. BCE. Throughout cl. antiquity, dactylic hexameter proper remains the almost exclusive meter of narrative verse, as well as pastoral and didactic poetry and, in Lat., *satire. As Lat. shifts over to qualitative rhymed verse in the Middle Ages, a hybrid form known as *leonine verse becomes popular, though its regular use of internal rhyme has the significant effect of breaking the august long line into smaller units: "Orpheus Eurydice sociatur, amicus amice, / matre canente dea, dum rite colunt hymenea" (Hugh Primas). Unrhymed quantitative hexameter poems such as Virgil's Aeneid and Ovid's Metamorphoses nevertheless continue to be read as major embodiments of the prestige of cl. civilization, and new poems in the meter continue to be written. It is still the main vehicle for Lat. verse composition (some productions by the young Arthur Rimbaud were his first pub. works).

With the Ren. come both a revived use of the hexameter in Neo-Lat. poetry and attempts to transfer it in some form into the vernaculars: as a vehicle for translating cl. poetry and potentially as an authoritative verse form for the developing national lits. Esametri italiani are debuted in the Certame Coronario, a public literary contest staged by Leon Battista Alberti and Leonardo Dati in 1441 to promote poetry in the vernacular; there is some follow-up by other It. poets into the next century. An ambitious attempt is mounted by the Pléiade* poet Jean-Antoine de Baïf, who founds an Académie de Poésie et de Musique (1567–73) expressly to develop and promulgate rules for truly quantitative Fr. verse on the cl. model (vers mesurés à l'antique*); the results are modest but still command respect. In England, the linguistic change from ME to mod. Eng. seems to open the possibility of a comparable shift in *Eng. prosody. The hexameter, as it happens, falls exactly between the two indigenous claimants to Eng. poetry's dominant meter: the *iambic pentameter that is Chaucer's principal medium and a seven-beat iambic line—the *fourteener—that is a typographical rearrangement from the traditional 4-3 *ballad stanza. Both were used for trans. of the Aeneid published in the course of the century—the former by Gavin Douglas (1553) and (without rhyme) Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey (1554–57), the latter by Thomas Phaer (1562) and Thomas Twynne (1573)—but in humanist circles, there was influential opinion that an appropriately anglicized dactylic hexameter was needed. Roger Ascham quotes in his Scholemaster (1570) from an Eng. Odyssey in purportedly quantitative hexameters; in 1582, Richard Stanyhurst publishes four books of the Aeneid in his version of the original meter, together with his own detailed rules for determining Eng. *quantity. The eccentricity of those rules and the bizarreness of Stanyhurst's diction ("Lyke bandog grinning, with gnash tusk greedelye snarring") attract a good deal of mockery, but better poets—Philip Sidney and Thomas Campion most notably—are also drawn to the possibility of Eng. quantitative verse and experiment with it in various meters, with varying degrees of success. Two of the embedded poems in the first version of Sidney's prose romance Arcadia (1590, 1593) are in hexameters written to his own quantitative rules, though quantity has a way of coinciding with stress: "When that noble toppe doth nodd, I beleeve she salutes me; / When by the winde it maketh a noyse, I do thinke she doth answer." By the 17th c., however, the effort has run its course, and the accentual-syllabic iambic pentameter is firmly established as the touchstone meter for Eng. poetry.

More straightforwardly qualitative but unrhymed dactylic hexameters (with an accentual trochee generally acceptable as the equivalent of a spondee) make a place for themselves in later periods. The publication of the first three cantos of F. G. Klopstock's Der Messias in 1748 establishes the meter as a viable one in mod. Ger. J. W. Goethe uses it successfully for his epic Hermann und Dorothea (1797), where part of the effect is the way in which the classicizing form plays off against the contemp. setting of the French Revolution. The unrhymed elegiac distich also takes root in Ger. Goethe employs it for some of his most personal poems; at one point in his Römische Elegien, he represents the composition of dactylic hexameters as love play: "Oftmals hab ich auch schon in ihren Armen gedichtet / Und des Hexameters Mass leise mit fingernder Hand / Ihr auf den Rücken gezählt" (even in her arms I have often composed poetry and, tapping with my hand, softly counted out the beat of the hexameter on her back; 5.15–17). A trans. of the Iliad into hexameters by Nikolai Gnedich, completed after 20 years of work in 1829, made a big impression in Rus. literary circles. Alexander Pushkin praised it extravagantly and was moved to experiments of his own in unrhymed hexameters and elegiacs. Both meters are used in Rus. poetry into the 20th c., esp. for trans.; Valery Bryusov, a leader of the symbolist movement, produced an esp. striking hexameter trans. of the Aeneid (pub. posthumously in 1933). Robert Southey's Vision of Judgment (1821; famously parodied by Lord Byron the next year in a poem of the same name) is the first of a line of 19th-c. Eng. poems in unrhymed hexameters. The best known is H. W. Longfellow's Evangeline (1847), a love story set in mod. hist., somewhat on the model of Hermann und Dorothea. The effect of the meter there is largely one of solemnity: "This is the forest primeval. The murmuring pines and the hemlocks, / Bearded with moss, and in garments green, indistinct in the twilight, / Stand like Druids of eld, with voices sad and prophetic." Alfred, Lord Tennyson, on the other hand, decided that hexameters in Eng. are "only fit for comic subjects"; his mockery of some attempts to have it otherwise became famous: "These lame hexameters the strong wing'd music of Homer! / No—but a most burlesque barbarous experiment" ("On Translations of Homer"). Tennyson's distaste is related to the seriousness with which he regarded quantity. The late 19th and early 20th cs. saw renewed attempts, by Robert Bridges and others, to reestablish Eng. verse, and with it the Eng. hexameter, on a quantitative basis, but they proved infertile. Cecil Day-Lewis was more influential in using a loosely defined six-stress line, suggesting the cl. meter but not attempting any strict observance of its rules, for his trans. of Virgil (1952): "I tell about war and the hero who first from Troy's frontier, / Displaced by destiny, came to the Lavinian shores." Such a form has proved very popular for trans. from cl. epic and continues to be used. The unacknowledged contours of the ancient meter can at times be sensed beneath the verse and prose of mod. writers, esp. those with cl. training. James Joyce's Ulysses (1922) opens with 14 syllables cadenced as a dactylic hexameter, spondaic in the fifth foot.

See CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES.

■ Omond; R. Burgi, A History of the Russian Hexameter (1954); Maas; W. Bennett, German Verse in Classical Metres (1963); J. Thompson, The Founding of English Metre (1961); D. Attridge, Well-weighed Syllables (1974); West; Gasparov, History.

G. BRADEN

HIATUS. The grammatical and metrical term for the gap that is created by pronunciation of contiguous vowels, either within a word or (more commonly) word-terminal and following word-initial. The effect of the juncture is a slight catch or pause in delivery. The alternative is to remove one vowel via *elision. In Eng. like other langs., the indefinite article (a) has an alternate form (an) that exists specifically to prevent hiatus. In both prose and poetry, hiatus has been deemed a fault since at least the time of Gorgias and Isocrates; Cicero and Quintilian (Institutio oratoria 9.4.34 ff.) discuss it at length. In the cl. langs. (see CLASSICAL PROSODY), hiatus was common in Gr. epic poetry, with and without shortening of the first vowel, but rarer in Lat. Occitan had no strict rules about elision and hiatus; in OF, hiatus was generally tolerated until the 14th c.: there is no elision to prevent hiatus in the Saint Alexis (about 1040), but in Jean Froissart, there are 132 cases of elision against five of hiatus (Lote). In *French prosody since François de Malherbe (17th c.), the use of hiatus was proscribed. In It., hiatus is generally avoided, as it is in Sp., though in Sp. it was the rule into the late 14th c., after which time its frequency waned. Richter summarizes the cl., Ren., and Fr. views; distinguishes nine types of hiatus; and gives statistics and examples for each type. Pope's mimetic example, "Though oft the ear the open vowels tire" (Essay on Criticism 2.345), is more famous than it is offensive, and indeed the strict censuring of hiatus in Fr. and Eng. neoclassical crit. seems mainly genuflection to the ancients, for elision is common in speech.

Debra San classifies two other types of hiatus: narrative and grammatical. Narrative hiatus is the logical or chronological interruption of story line by flashbacks, tangents, and authorial commentary. Grammatical hiatus varies from the insertion of an adjective between an article and the following noun to the more noticeable *tmesis. Subject-verb hiatus, a form of grammatical hiatus, is the syntactical interruption between the subject and verb in a sentence over a number of poetic lines by subordinate clauses, parenthetical insertions, and other phrases.

■ A. Braam, Malherbes Hiatus Verbot (1884); A. Pleines, Hiat und Elision im Provenzalischen (1886); J. Franck, "Aus der Gesch. des Hiat im Verse," ZDA 48 (1906); Thieme, 370—cites 12 Fr. studies; Bridges; J. Pelz, Der prosodische Hiat (1930); W.J.H. Richter, Der Hiat im englischen Klassizismus (Milton, Dryden, Pope) (1934); Lote 3.87; A. Stene, Hiatus in English (1954); P. Habermann and W. Mohr, "Hiat," Reallexikon II; Maas, sect. 141; Elwert, 62–67; Morier; D. San, "Hiatus of Subject and Verb in Poetic Language" Style 39 (2005).

T.V.F. BROGAN; D. VERALDI

HIEROGLYPH (Gr., "sacred carving"; Fr. hiéroglyphique, for the style of writing used by ancient Egyptians among other cultures to represent abstract ideas, sounds, or objects through graphic figures). A ling. or anthropological account of hieroglyphs might begin with the recovery of the Rosetta Stone in 1799, which led Jean-François Champollion to recognize the previously undetected phonetic function of the script. An account of how hieroglyphs influenced poetic and philosophical currents from Plato through postmodernism, however, must concentrate on how their assumed symbolic function inspired a range of metaphorical, often mystical interpretations.

Although Plato remained skeptical of the illusory truths bodied forth in writing, his method of allegorical interpretation (see ALLEGORY, CLASSICAL POETICS) and his conception of Egypt as a land of ancient learning remained foundational for Neoplatonic and hermetic philosophers through late antiquity who saw the hieroglyph as a lost, ideal lang.—a sacred carving, as its etymology suggests, that required decoding. After fading from view during the Middle Ages, hieroglyphs and the philosophies that engaged them emerged again in the early Ren. with the recovery of Horapollo's Hieroglyphica in 1419. Horapollo's inventive, though often spurious, interpretations inspired widespread fascination with hieroglyphs among humanist philosophers, artists, and writers. This fascination revitalized interest in med. nature symbolism, increased the repertoire of symbols for painters and writers, and lent the act of inventing and interpreting such symbols an air of ancient authority rooted in the origins of lang. and learning.

As the Ren. spread across Europe, attention to hieroglyphs themselves was gradually displaced by a more diffuse brand of hieroglyph-inspired thinking. Thus, hieroglyphs came to influence all kinds of cultural productions, from *visual poetry and the finely wrought *conceits of *metaphysical poetry to painting and the popular *emblem trad., and from commemorative medals and cryptic imprese to academic debates about the possibility of a universal system of symbols.

As the Ren. gave way to Enlightenment reason, the influence of hieroglyphs receded. In reaction to the cultural prominence of strict rationality, however, renewed forms of hieroglyphic thinking emerged in Ger. *romanticism, Am. transcendentalism, Fr. *symbolism, and related movements where the hieroglyph again became the specimen of an idealized, more immediate relationship between word and world, human beings and nature, sign and signified (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER).

In the 20th c., hieroglyphs continued to inform a range of work. Guillaume Apollinaire's Calligrammes (1918), e.g., consciously engages the hieroglyphic trad.

(see CALLIGRAMME), and Ezra Pound turned to Chinese characters as earlier writers turned to the hieroglyphs, exaggerating their pictorial quality to divine an ideal model for poetic expression. Focusing on the Americas, Charles Olson developed a poetics inspired by Mayan hieroglyphs. In Brazilian *concrete poetry and other visual poetries of the later 20th c., hieroglyphic thinking persists in the desire to get beyond words to something more originary and authentic.

■ E. Iversen, The Myth of Egypt and Its Hieroglyphs (1961); L. Dieckmann, Hieroglyphics (1970); Speaking Pictures, ed. M. Klonsky (1975); J. T. Irwin, American Hieroglyphics (1980); T. C. Singer, "Hieroglyphs, Real Characters, and the Idea of Natural Language in English Seventeenth-Century Thought," Journal of the History of Ideas 50 (1989).

A. VANDER ZEE

HINDI POETRY. The heritage of Hindi lit. is a palimpsest inscribed with a range of dialects and with multiple sensibilities. Though the contemp. poetry mostly reflects a standardized mod. lang. and articulates ideas parallel to those of many mod. lits., it also contains deep resonances of its premod. legacy. An outline of Hindi poetry must, therefore, survey a period of several centuries, from the time that Hindi and other northern Indian langs. first emerged as distinct forms of regional speech from earlier Sanskrit-derived langs. such as Prakrit and Apabhraṃśha.

One of the greatest strengths of premod. culture—its often oral medium—is also one of the greatest impediments to our knowledge of its early circumstances. The ebullient genres of *ballads of the seasons, marriage songs (see EPITHALAMIUM), versified saws and aphorisms, bardic *panegyrics, devotional *hymns and prayers, and many other such phenomena typical of Indian culture certainly predate any written record of their existence. Only in recent times has this oral trad. begun to fade, eclipsed by the easy seductions of the mod. media (see ORAL POETRY).

Following these dimly perceived early genres of Hindi verse that left little written record of their existence, the most powerful catalyst to the trad. was a flowering of devotional religion, or Bhakti, in northern India in the 15th and 16th cs. (see DEVOTIONAL POETRY). This period saw the emergence of a newly "emotional" style of devotionalism in which human relationships served as paradigms for the love of God; though primarily Hindu in orientation, it shared many general characteristics with parallel trads. of ecstatic Sufism. The image of Viṣṇu (Vishnu) as a compassionate deity, esp. in his incarnations as Kṛṣṇa (Krishna) and as Rāma, was a compelling focus, and the loci of the earthly lives of these deities, earlier recorded in the sacred geographies of Sanskrit lit., were transformed from textual abstractions into palpable centers of devotional worship and pilgrimage.

Descriptions of the sports of the heroic and sublimely beautiful Kṛṣṇa in the bucolic setting of Braj, Kṛṣṇa's "earthly paradise" on the banks of the river Yamuna to the south of mod. Delhi, had long featured in such Sanskrit texts as the *Purāṇa*s (esp. 4th–9th cs. CE). In the 12th c., Jayadeva's sensuous Sanskrit poem Gītagovinda added Kṛṣṇa's consort Rādhā to the picture. The love of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa became a favorite theme for generations of "poet-saints" in successive centuries, with figures such as Sūrdās (early to mid-16th c.) achieving fame for the beauty of their compositions and the incisiveness of their devotional vision. Their poems were mostly written in Braj Bhasha, the dialect of Hindi that was and is spoken in the Braj region, sometimes assumed (ahistorically) to be Kṛṣṇa's own lang. With the exception of some exegetical commentaries, most composition was in rhymed verse, and many genres were intended for singing. The poetry was typically eulogistic, sweetly celebratory, and ecstatic in tone: and though the Braj poets inherited aesthetic codes and literary tropes from the Sanskrit trad., they showed enormous creativity in their evocations of Kṛṣṇa as the divine lover who was simultaneously the supreme deity—God himself. Certain themes became firm favorites: the pranks of Kṛṣṇa the child-god; the sensuality of his persona as a voluptuous youth; the appeal of his seductive flute; his moonlit "round-dance" with the gopīs; his secluded assignations with Rādhā; and in thematic counterpoint, his status as a savior who bestows grace on his devotees.

The most popular genre consisted of individual songs, *bhajan*s, which were disseminated by performance, eventually to be written down and compiled in anthols. The sacred content of the songs made ms. copying an act of piety that brought its own rewards; written and oral recensions would often develop side by side. For all the prestige of the great poets, matters of authorship counted for little, and many a poet's corpus grew steadily over the centuries. Textual ascription can sometimes be validated on the basis of whatever mss. have survived the rigors of climate, the appetites of insects, and the indifference of custodians. For most devotees of such poetry, however, authenticity depends on spiritual potency rather than dry historiography.

The asocial mores of Kṛṣṇa-as-lover were complemented by the impeccable moral rectitude of Rāma, hero of the epic Rāmāyaṇa. Told in many langs. over at least two millennia, this narrative found its vernacular exemplar in the Rāmcaritmānas, a magisterial poem by the brahmin Tulsīdās (1532–1623) begun in 1574. Tulsī's epic was written in Awadhi, the dialect spoken around Rāma's capital of Ayodhya toward the eastern end of the Hindi area; but in his choice of both lang. and poetic form, Tulsī was also following the precedent of such Sufi poets as Manjhan (fl. mid-16th c.) and Jāyasī (b. ca. 1494) whose allegorical Awadhi romances Madhumālatī and Padmāvat (respectively) had pioneered this epic format some decades earlier. This formal connection between genres whose communities have become differentiated—if not mutually alienated—in more recent times reminds us that a rich symbiosis existed between various different religious paths in premod. India. Today's misplaced association of Tulsīdās with an intolerant Hindu chauvinism is belied by the wit, subtlety, and sublime perceptiveness of his poetic voice.

Another strand in the fabric of premod. poetry is of similarly devotional character but has a different coloration. Throughout the late med. period, a loose grouping of poets known as the sants, typically from the lower strata of society (as opposed to the mostly high-born Kṛṣṇa and Rāma poets), chose a more uncomfortable, abstract, and hard-hitting rhet. for their religious songs and verse. The best-known figure in this trad. is the weaver Kabīr, born in the mid-15th c. Kabīr's poetic vision perceives God as transcending all form, whether anthropomorphic or otherwise; the poet roundly excoriates priesthood, ritual, scriptures, and all the trappings of organized religion advocating a personal search for the divine within the human soul. Kabīr's bānī or sacred utterances are recorded in three main recensions with little material held in common between them. One of the three is the Gurū Granth Sāhib of the Sikh faith that was founded by another sant poet, Kabīr's contemp. Gurū Nānak (1469–1539), who wrote in Punjabi (see PUNJABI POETRY).

Religion was not the only theme in premod. poetry. With the enrichment of courtly culture during the Mughal period, poets enjoying the *patronage of local kingdoms began to compose highly sophisticated verse with a more worldly flavor and a more self-consciously literary orientation. The subject of their brilliantly ornate verse was often poetry itself, and in their elaboration of tropes, they drew on two complementary aspects of Indian literary trad. First, their rhetorical typologies embroidered the age-old poetics of Sanskrit lit.; and second, the well-established figures of Kṛṣṇa and Rādhā became the perfect hero and heroine to model these elegant tropes. Braj Bhasha continued to serve as the dialect of choice for poetic composition, regardless of the native tongue of the individual poet. This new mode of poetry, written for (and sometimes by) the regional kings of northern India, came to be called rīti—a "stylist" mode, an embodiment of literary style; but the borders between this and devotional verse were always porous, with traffic flowing continuously between the complementary genres.

The 19th c. saw deep-seated changes in Indian society as Eng.-lang. culture made its presence felt with increasing strength. Interregional communications improved, the printing press arrived, a middle-class disposition developed, the small minority of Indians literate in Eng. grew steadily; and as the century progressed, a Victorian ethos penetrated deep into the consciousness of many writers. Lit. came to be seen as a medium through which social change might be effected; and as though to distance this new consciousness from the old tropes of rīti and devotional poetry, writers began to switch dialects, forsaking the sweetly lyrical associations of Braj Bhasha for a more utilitarian idiom in Khari Boli, the dialect from the Delhi region that already served as a lingua franca across the Hindi-speaking north. Poetry found a new rival in the rapid devel. of prose genres, often inspired by new models in Western fiction and polemics and expressed in the nascent media of Hindi newspapers and jours. The spirit of the age was represented in the person of the polymath Bharatendu Harishchandra of Banaras (1850–85), who maintained the old Braj idiom in his verse while leading a generation of writers in the new style of Khari Boli prose.

Unsurprisingly, new poetic conventions in Khari Boli took some time to find their feet, and the early accomplishments were to have little enduring appeal for Hindi readers; few poets from the opening years of the 20th c. are enjoyed today. But a confident new style was not long in coming, with poets such as Suryakant Tripathi "Nirala" (1896–1961) and Mahadevi Verma (1907–87) writing Khari Boli verse of great power and personality. The headstrong, eccentric Nirala strode the literary stage in moods of anger, sadness, and deeply humanist compassion, while the lyrical laments of Mahadevi reminded readers of the passionate outpourings of a 16th-c. forebear, the Rajasthani princess Mīrābāī, whose Kṛṣṇa songs are among the most enduring voices from any period of Hindi poetry. The romanticist idiom of Mahadevi and other like-minded poets writing in the 1920s was dubbed Chāyāvād (Shadowism); but like many a derogatory sobriquet, the name stuck, becoming a neutral title for this loosely affiliated group of poets. A more populist style was that of Harivansh Rai Bachchan (1907–2003), a teacher of Eng. lit. at Allahabad University; his romantic, Khayyām-and-Fitzgerald-inspired Madhuśālā (The House of Wine), won him a huge following at *kavi sammelan*s or poetic symposia, which have always been successful in projecting Hindi poetry well beyond the small cliques of intellectual literati.

Following Chāyāvād, several schools of poetry rose and set. Pragativād enshrined a progressivist agenda, and the subsequent Prayogvād was experimentalist in character: such labels and themes show the Hindi poets' engagement with Western literary trends. But rather than pursuing the ephemeral fashions of modernist idiom, we may rather mention a single voice, one that defines the mid-20th c. more than any other. S. H. Vatsyayan (1911–87) was a champion of the so-called Nayī Kavitā or New Poetry, and perhaps its finest exponent also. His pseud. Agyeya (also transliterated Ajneya, and meaning "the unknowable"), alludes to the secret smuggling of his early nationalistic writing from a British jail cell during the independence struggle. Agyeya was both a novelist and a poet. Like many of the other poets featured in the volumes of verse compiled under his editorship, he wrote in a style that combines the sonorous grandeur of the cl. Sanskritic heritage with the variously gritty, sweet, and forceful vernacular idiom of contemp. Hindi speech. This combination is seen in its fullest glory in his long poem Asādhya Vīṇā (The Unmastered Veena, alluding to the most cl. of India's lutes), a long and deeply emotive poem written in 1961. Rich with description and allusion, this poem functions as a summation of the Hindi poetic trad. thus far, ranging from the humanist concerns of today, through the romanticism of earlier decades, back to the diction and musical phrasing of the premod. poets; echoing through all these modalities is an apprehension of the broader Indian trad., rooted in its cl. past and flowering in the creative energy of a forward-looking present.

Contemp. Hindi poetry has many moods, registers, and styles—from the popular lyrics of cinema (themselves rooted in traditional genres of music and poetry) to the intellectually rigorous verse of such poets as Muktibodh (pseud. of Gajanan Madhav, 1917–64), Raghuvir Sahay (1929–90), and Kunwar Narain (b. 1927). The parallel trad. of Urdu verse is also accessible to speakers of Hindi, esp. when performed at recitals where distinctions of script (Devanagari for Hindi, Persian for Urdu) melt away. The old devotional poetry of Braj and Awadhi may no longer be popular with mainstream writers, but its echoes still resound, and it has never been relinquished by the Hindi-speaking public. Thus, inscriptions from every layer of Hindi's poetic palimpsest remain visible to the readers of today, inspiring many to wield pens of their own.

See INDIA, POETRY OF; RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY; URDU POETRY.

■ Ajneya, Nilāmbarī (1981)—Eng. trans.; K. Schomer, Mahadevi Varma and the Chayavad Age of Modern Hindi Poetry (1983); R. S. McGregor, Hindi Literature from Its Beginnings to the Nineteenth Century (1984); Songs of the Saints of India, trans. J. S. Hawley and M. Juergensmeyer (1988); D. Rubin, The Return of Sarasvati: Translations of the Poems of Prasad, Nirala, Pant and Mahadevi (1993); Manjhan, Madhumālatī: An Indian Sufi Romance, trans. A. Behl and S. Weightman (2000); New Poetry in Hindi: Nayi Kavita, an Anthology, ed. and trans. L. Rosenstein (2003); K. Narain, No Other World: Selected Poems, trans. A. Narain (2008).

R. SNELL

HIP-HOP POETICS. The terms hip-hop and rap are sometimes used as synonyms. Adding to the confusion, the definitions of both forms remain in flux, since the music continues to develop with impressive speed. In a widely held formulation, though, rap refers to syncopated verbal performance, while hip-hop refers to a broader movement of music, fashion, and culture, incl. MC and DJ performances, graffiti, and breakdancing. According to this definition, rap constitutes an aspect of hip-hop. Hip-hop also includes many subgenres, whether based in regions (such as East Coast, West Coast, and Dirty South), styles and themes (such as crunk, gangsta, political, neosoul, club bangers, and reggaetón) or period (such as old school and new school).

One way to understand hip-hop is to trace its historical devel. In the 1970s, the music arose from postindustrial urban environments, most notably, the South Bronx (Rose 1994). Credited to the Sugarhill Gang, a band assembled for a 1978 studio session, the song "Rapper's Delight" is often cited as introducing hip-hop, largely an underground, local art form, to a broader audience. (Conflating the terms, the title mentions "rapper" and the opening words name "hip-hop.") Set to the beat of Chic's song "Good Times," "Rapper's Delight" offered party music designed for the dance floor. Recorded in a studio, the song signaled a change. Suggesting hip-hop's commercial potential, it inspired a host of new recordings, several of which produced more distinguished songs. (Chuck D of Public Enemy, for instance, called the song "a miracle" [quoted in Chang, 2005]). As a consequence, songs recorded in studios gained popularity, and hip-hop recording artists claimed the top status previously afforded to DJs performing in local venues.

From its beginning, hip-hop has exploited emerging technologies, most notably turntable and sampling techniques. The sources for sampling ranged from the political to the funky. Public Enemy, for instance, sampled speeches by Louis Farrakhan and songs by James Brown, whose drumbeats and shouts became an industry staple. Technology introduced new means of distribution and promotion, as well as new recording techniques. Hip-hop developed into an art both "transnational" and "multiregional" (Perry 2004, 10). Thriving hip-hop scenes exist in countries as culturally different as France, Germany, and Japan, as well as in many Ar.-speaking nations.

Many of the early songs featured loose, four-stress, *end-stopped lines. For instance, in "Proud to Be Black," Run-DMC addressed the audience, "Listen party people here's a serious song / It's right not wrong, I should say right on." As hip-hop developed, the artists favored more extravagant rhyming, piling *internal rhyme upon external and rhyming several consecutive lines. Multiple unstressed syllables allow the artist to accelerate his or her delivery, speeding over the words in a tour de force. Accordingly, the speed of the performances increased, presenting a dense field of *rhyme, not a numerically patterned scheme. Many performers employ rhyme in several distinctive ways. Occasionally, they wrench the rhymes, adding stress to a syllable or changing pronunciation (see WRENCHED ACCENT). Other performers rhyme with a pointedly regional accent. At such moments, they express an identity rooted in a particular place, often defined against other hip-hop scenes. Finally, some artists pause within end words in order to achieve a punning effect, producing an effect akin to a heavy *enjambment. In a famous example, Jay-Z boasts in Kanye West's "Diamonds from Sierra Leone (Remix)," "I'm not a businessman, / I'm a business, man!"

Hip-hop has generated much controversy over its expressions of misogyny, homophobia, and incitements to violence. (One of the music's fiercest critics, Stanley Crouch, decries "the aggressive, hedonistic vision of rap" and "the conventional amorality of gangster rap" [Crouch 2004]). In the more limited sphere of poetics, it faces the question of whether it should be classified as poetry. Such debates often reveal more about the participants' aesthetic commitments than about the work under discussion. In several notable ways, the procedures of hip-hop artists differ from those of print-based poets. In the most manifest difference, contemp. poets generally write for the page, while hip-hop artists perform their words (see PERFORMANCE). Yet this distinction hardly remains absolute. Numerous Web sites feature countless hip-hop lyrics for listeners to study apart from the music. In this respect, the listeners respond to the performers' ambition: many hip-hop artists eagerly claim the status of the poet. Indeed, the Am. context witnesses a historical reversal, as hip-hop artists often remain more committed to verse's most visible markers than many poets do. Hip-hop artists employ rhyme much more frequently, blending comic and serious verse techniques. Rare in contemp. poetry, *doggerel remains a prominent mode in hip-hop. In short, hip-hop artists delight in verse techniques and attitudes often decried as either old fashioned or déclassé; in the process, they show how vital they remain and how contemp. they sound.

See CLOSE RHYME.

■ T. Rose, Black Noise (1994); S. Crouch, The Artificial White Man (2004); I. Perry, Prophets of the Hood (2004); J. Chang, Can't Stop Won't Stop (2005).

D. CAPLAN

HISPANO-ARABIC POETRY. See AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF.

HISTORICISM. A critical mode that argues that the ultimate meaning of a poem is located in hist. Historicism places poetry within specific social and cultural configurations of the past, as well as within the narratives conceived to describe that past. It tends to be defined against a formalist trad. that stresses the most valuable thing about poetry is that it is not historical, that it is not tied to time, that it gestures or even stands beyond the mutability of hist. to articulate eternal truths about God, nature, or human beings. Historicism and *formalism, nevertheless, are not distinct; they regularly interpenetrate one another in a variety of ways. One way of defining the hist. of historicism, then, is to chart the shifting interdependence of *form and hist.

This interpenetration begins with the theories of mimesis put forth by Plato and Aristotle. In the Republic, Plato's Socrates bans from the community all poets (except those writing hymns to the gods or eulogies of virtuous men) because poets try to pass off representations as true things. Using poetry's mimesis as a guide for living seems to make the historical conditions of pleasure and pain, rather than ahistorical reason, the guides to life. Plato's denunciation of poetry, nevertheless, tends to be poetic: poets are ironically denounced in Plato's artfully constructed dialogue (Derrida 1981; Else). In the Poetics, Aristotle instead stresses that human beings are naturally given to representation, and he distinguishes poetry as a more philosophical form of mimesis than hist. because it speaks of universals. Hist. relates things that have happened, while poetry speaks of things that may happen or should happen. Poetry overcomes hist. and gestures at the ideal through unified form: the integrity of art, its status as discrete object (e.g., the logic of a plot having a beginning, a middle, and an end) is a means of overcoming historical particularity toward universal truths (Else).

The arguments of Plato and Aristotle are influential in the debates concerning scriptural interp. of later antiquity and the Middle Ages, particularly as articulated by Augustine, Anselm, and Aquinas; the line between sacred and secular-historical is complexly rethought as the line between *sign and signification (Colish). With the flourishing of vernacular lits. in the later Middle Ages and Ren., the arguments surrounding scriptural interp. were applied increasingly to poetry. The most influential example is Dante's argument in Convivio that poetry, like scripture, is allegorical and points beyond itself to sacred truths (Colish; Auerbach 1961). Nevertheless, Ren. writers, esp. Petrarch, often stressed that poetry could be a worthwhile activity in itself that pointed only to its own negotiated meanings (Freccero). Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy summarizes many Ren. commonplaces when he insists that poetry is superior because it has nothing to do with hist.: loosely following Aristotle, he argues that while historians are tied to nature, to a narration of things as they happened, poets are tied only to "the zodiac of [their] own wit" and are able to imagine things better than they ever were. This argument becomes specifically historical, though, when Sidney insists that poetry has a didactic function: to teach by delighting. While he initially argues that poetry is not mimetic—it does not follow nature—he concludes, contradictorily, by suggesting that the unusual mimesis of poetry has a historical function (Miller).

These ancient, med., and Ren. arguments continue to form the basis of understandings of the interrelation of hist. and poetry. But the emergence of science in the 17th and 18th cs. promised something else: an account of poetry that was true according to scientific method. This scientific account emerged in tandem with a reconceptualization of "history" itself, which became increasingly theorized according to Giambattista Vico's verum et factum principle: "the true and the made are interchangeable" (Jay). Hist. (what Vico called the world of nations) was comprehensible to humankind because the human mind was itself a product of the hist. it sought to understand. Nevertheless, this reconceptualization of hist. and the scientific method that accompanies it have had a complex relationship. As Auerbach noted, "strict scientific methods are not applicable to historical phenomena or to any other phenomena [such as poetry] that cannot be subjected to the special conditions required by scientific experimentation." Though historical research is exacting and attempts to set in motion scientific criteria, it is also always "an art that works with scholarly material" (Auerbach 1965). The status of hist. and lit. as both social entities and scholarly disciplines, as well as the general mod. project of historicism itself, is predicated upon the uneasy triumph of scientific empiricism and the division of knowledge that accompanies it. The burden of literary historicism since the Enlightenment has been an effort to coordinate the goal of empiricism in historiography with the reconceptualization of lit. as an ahistorical entity (McKeon).

This combination of cl. theories of mimesis coupled with mod. conceptions of objectivity has resulted in a number of paradoxical reconfigurations of the long-standing tension between poetry and hist. There emerges an often uneasy alliance between, on the one hand, conceptions of poetic inspiration, individual genius, cults of beauty, and emphases on poetic form and autonomy; and on the other hand, a stress on art's imitation of life and nature, on the importance of realism, on art's social function, and of a spirit of an age (zeitgeist) that fundamentally determines the meaning of art. The first of these alliances finds an origin in Immanuel Kant's Critique of Judgment, which emphasizes the autonomy and sublimity of aesthetic experience. Kant outlines the operation of the mind of a subject to argue that taste is disinterested and objective. This theory becomes forcefully expressed first in the Sturm und Drang* movement and later in romanticism generally. The source of a poem is neither the representation of the historical world nor the representation of a higher ideal (God or a Platonic form). Rather, poetry originates in the inner feelings and mental operations of the poet. Poetry, and aesthetic expression generally, is thus seen as radically separate from the historical world. Indeed, for Victorian writers such as John Ruskin and Oscar Wilde, beauty in art becomes an end in itself. Echoing Sidney, Wilde asserts in the preface to The Picture of Dorian Gray that "the artist is the creator of beautiful things" and "no artist desires to prove anything" (see AESTHETICISM). This stress on form apart from hist. likewise is a principle of the *New Criticism of the 20th c., as well as, to a lesser extent, *Russian formalism (Jameson 1972). Despite their assault on romantic conceptions of poetic inspiration, the New Critics held on to the sense of art as radically distinct from hist. by shunning all extrinsic features and focusing only on the so-called intrinsic features of a poem (Brooks, Wimsatt).

Against this loose alliance of formalism has played out an equally loose alliance of historical crit. that has sought as its ideal an objective account of a work of art as a function of historical process. Eighteenth-c. critics' stress on "taste" is also a stress upon following what they imagined to be natural. Art itself should be "Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed," as Alexander Pope insisted in An Essay on Criticism. Samuel Johnson insisted that lit. should be "a just representation of things really existing and actions really performed" (Wellek), which led him to decry John Milton's "Lycidas" as artificial and insincere. Likewise, in the realism of the 19th-c. historical novel (Lukács 1962) and in Matthew Arnold's insistence that lit. can guarantee social stability by inculcating the best that is thought and said, the governing assumptions are that lit. is a historical force. In the 20th c., the treatment of lit. as an expression of a period stands behind the History of Ideas school (Lovejoy) and Tillyard's Elizabethan World Picture. Despite its vilification of the hist. of ideas, Marxist ideological critique shares the assumption that a work of art can be demystified to reveal the historical operations that set it in motion. Recalling Plato, some Marxists see works of art as misleading expressions of a dominant ideology that turn people (or actively dupe them) from a historical truth—the operation of class struggle (Eagleton).

Yet if these two strands of formalism and historicism are distinct, they have never been separable. As in Sidney's Defence of Poesy, the assertion of poetic autonomy tends to reveal its own historicity. William Wordsworth insisted in the Preface to the Lyrical Ballads not only that poetry originates in "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings" but that this "emotion" must be "recollected in tranquility." This insistence imagines less an isolated genius than a particular historical imagination (Liu), and it recalls Vico's conception of hist. as made by humans. The aestheticism of Ruskin and Wilde is likewise inseparable from their outspoken socialism. And the New Critical stress on poetic autonomy and objective analysis is regularly invoked less as an end in itself than as a means of overcoming the shattered, fragmented consciousness of modernity (Adorno 1981, Lukács 1964).

The historical view likewise has been shown to have a formalist or idealist logic of its own. The great Ger. historian Leopold von Ranke insisted that historical writing ought to show "wie es eigentlich gewesen." Am. historians in particular took that phrase as a call for empiricist objectivity—to describe an event "as it really was." But "eigentlich" also meant "essentially" in a Hegelian sense. In Ranke's reception and in putatively empirical historicism generally, idealism and objectivity keep moving in and out of each other (Novick). Similarly, White stresses that historical writing tends to depend on particular literary genres (tragedy, comedy) as much as on a clear account of events "wie es eigentlich gewesen," really or essentially.

If poetry and hist., then, have always been complexly intertwined concepts and practices, the most compelling historical crit. has tended to begin with this recognition and attempted to clarify a particular manifestation of this old problem. Certainly, the most influential account of art's relation to hist. has been by G.W.F. Hegel, whose conception of art is based in large part upon Kant's Critique of Judgment. Hegel's use of Kant may initially seem surprising because the third critique has also become the basis of a formalist trad. indifferent, or actively hostile, to historicized understandings of art. In Critique of Judgment, Kant famously describes aesthetic objects as "purposiveness without purpose" ("Zweckmäßigkeit ohne Zweck"). Artworks cannot be subsumed under another concept but should be enjoyed in themselves. Nevertheless, Hegel incorporates this Kantian argument into his philosophy of hist., where "history" names the gradual unfolding of Spirit. Hegel too insists that art is purposeless, in the sense that it cannot be said to have utility. But it does exhibit an "internal teleology," a logic that is the operation of Spirit. Art is, thus, a contemplative consciousness that comes to know Spirit and does this through its form.

Whereas Aristotle sees such objectification as a question of mimesis, Hegel sees art, and the internal logic of a particular work, as an ontological concern. As a result, it is not accurate to say that a work "represents" Spirit. Rather, a work is a particular mode of consciousness. Art for Hegel is, thus, not Vorstellung (representation) but Darstellung (presentation) or Scheinen (manifesting). Art manifests or embodies, rather than represents, and what it ultimately manifests, for Hegel, is Spirit. And since hist. is the unfolding of Spirit, art likewise manifests a particular historical stage of consciousness (Taylor).

Hegel's rewriting of the formal integrity of an art object as an expression of a historical consciousness has been the basis of many 20th-c. aesthetic theories. What changes is what exactly is expressed in the form of a work of art, and here Karl Marx's critique of Hegel has been deeply influential. For Marx, Hegel has everything upside down: rather than imagining the material world as an expression of an abstract spirit, the abstract spirit expresses a historical, material world. What is expressed in a commodity, or in a work of art, is not Spirit but a mode of production: a system of making, reproducing, and distributing the things that are necessary for people to live. Certainly the theorist who propounded and advanced this conviction more than any other was Theodor Adorno, who insisted that any historical analysis must be formalist. The logic of the work is the social logic of the world that produced it, a logic that is otherwise not available for analysis (Adorno 1997, Jameson 1990).

Recent returns to historicism in the last 40 years ought to be seen in this broader perspective. What has changed significantly is the concept of hist. and the Enlightenment criteria of objectivity. As Montrose argued, poststructuralism, and New Historicism esp., focused on both the "historicity of texts" as well as the "textuality of history" (see also Attridge, Bennington, and Young). Hist. became imagined as a text that is, consequently, subject to the hermeneutic and epistemological difficulties of any text (Derrida, Dilthey, Fish), rather than as a spiritual manifestation, a mode of production, or a series of objective facts. Most critical schools of the last 40 years have emerged in part to amplify or address this shift (reader response, New Historicism, systems theory; see Fish; Gallagher and Greenblatt; and Luhmann). Particularly influential have been Althusser's reimagination of hist. through a Lacanian conception of lang., so that, as Jameson (1981) argues, lit. expresses the "political unconscious," the otherwise unrepresentable manifestation of hist. itself; and Foucault's devel. of an "archeology of knowledge" that examines the intersection of power and knowledge. The textualization of hist. has meant that questions of mimesis have acquired renewed force. The Platonic and Aristotelian conceptions of mimesis remain crucial but have been rethought through Foucault's concept of "discourse" (see also Gallagher and Greenblatt). Thus, poetry is imagined in relation to an epistemē or system of knowing. And yet this imagining of epistemēs has set the uneasy relation of formalism and historicism in motion once again. On the one hand, an epistemē ends up closely resembling the integrity of a work of art: it has an immanent logic that controls operations within it. The textualization of hist. threatens to end historical thinking itself by collapsing temporal difference into textual difference: a triumph of a new, ahistorical formalism (Jameson 1991). Conversely, the question of how to demarcate an epistemē or field reintroduces the difficulties of objective historical analysis as such and reanimates the effort to create a historicism that is a science and an analysis of aesthetic judgment that is objective (Bourdieu).

See HISTORY AND POETRY, MARXISM AND POETRY, NEW HISTORICISM.

■ M. Arnold, Culture and Anarchy (1869); E.M.W. Tillyard, The Elizabethan World Picture (1943); A. O. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being (1950); C. Brooks, "The Formalist Critic," KR 13 (1951); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954); Wellek, v. 1; E. Auerbach, Dante, Poet of the Secular World, trans. R. Manheim (1961); G. Lukács, The Historical Novel, trans. H. and S. Mitchell (1962), and Realism in Our Time, trans. J. and N. Mander (1964); E. Auerbach, Literary Language and Its Public in Late Latin Antiquity and in the Middle Ages, trans. R. Manheim (1965); M. L. Colish, Mirror of Language (1968); L. Althusser, Lenin and Philosophy and Other Essays, trans. B. Brewster (1971); M. Foucault, The Archeology of Knowledge and the Discourse on Language, trans. A. M. Sheridan Smith (1972); F. Jameson, The Prison-House of Language (1972); H. White, Metahistory (1973); J. Freccero, "The Fig Tree and the Laurel: Petrarch's Poetics," Diacritics 5 (1975); C. Taylor, Hegel (1975); T. Eagleton, Marxism and Literary Criticism (1976); J. Derrida, Writing and Difference, trans. A. Bass (1978); Fish; T. W. Adorno, "Cultural Criticism and Society," Prisms, trans. S. and S. Weber (1981); J. Derrida, Dissemination, trans. B. Johnson (1981); F. Jameson, The Political Unconscious (1981); P. Bourdieu, Distinction, trans. R. Nice (1984); M. Jay, Marxism and Totality (1984); G. F. Else, Plato and Aristotle on Poetry (1986); J. T. Miller, Poetic License (1986); L. Montrose, "The Elizabethan Subject and the Spenserian Text," Literary Theory / Renaissance Texts, ed. P. Parker and D. Quint (1986); Post-Structuralism and the Question of History, ed. D. Attridge, G. Bennington, and R. Young (1987); P. Novick, That Noble Dream (1988); W. Dilthey, Introduction to the Human Sciences [1883], Selected Works, ed. R. A. Makkreel and F. Rodi, v. 1 (1989); A. Liu, Wordsworth and the Sense of History (1989); F. Jameson, Late Marxism (1990), and Postmodernism, or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); M. McKeon, "The Origins of Interdisciplinary Studies," Eighteenth-Century Studies 28.1 (1994); T. W. Adorno, Aesthetic Theory, trans. R. Hullot-Kentor (1997); Derrida; C. Gallagher and S. Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism (2000); N. Luhmann, Art as a Social System, trans. E. M. Knodt (2000).

C. WARLEY

HISTORY AND POETRY. The distinction between hist. and poetry is a traditional subject of debate, and it continues to matter because it has been so difficult to establish. Historians often defend the veracity of their discipline by distinguishing it from poetry, but this would not be necessary if their work were not also literary in some essential way. Poets often call on the time-honored opinion of Aristotle, who placed poetry above hist., though these appeals to authority only show how hard it is to define the special claims of poetic lang. Thus, hist. and poetry serve as foils for one another, pushed together or pulled apart by the intellectual and polemical needs of the time.

In the beginning, there was no difference between hist. and poetry. Though most organized societies established some sort of rote record keeping at a very early stage, the first narrative hists. were poetic. In Europe, Homer established a record of the heroic past that became the accepted starting point for centuries of later hists. In India, the same role was played by the Mahābhārata and the Rāmāyaṇa. Even in China, where precise court records were essential to the legitimacy of a reign, the scribes who kept these records also sang and transcribed historical poems. Confucius is said to have arranged and edited the two great anthols. of their work, one historical, the Classic of Documents, and the other poetic, the Classic of Odes (Ng and Wang). The authority of such foundational works affected historical accounts in many cultures for centuries: even John Milton's History of Britain includes an account of the mythical Brutus, who was supposed to have linked the founding of Britain back to the Aeneid.

In ancient Greece, the earliest historians cast themselves as rivals to and substitutes for Homer. The opening lines of Herodotus's Histories echo the beginning of the Iliad and also state the specific claims of historiê, a term that originally meant "inquiry." Though Herodotus accepts the basic historicity of the Homeric accounts, he also corrects them where necessary. In doing so, he establishes a basic distinction between the authority of the poet and that of the historian. The poet of the Iliad invokes the muses and bases his account on the inspiration they provide. Thus, his knowledge exceeds that of an ordinary human, and his vantage point on events is essentially unlimited. Herodotus, on the other hand, relies on autopsy, testimony, and common sense; thus, he is limited to what human beings might themselves have witnessed. The limitations of this sort of account, however, are supposed to be outweighed by its veracity. Thucydides, therefore, disdains the accounts of poets because their claims cannot be verified (Peloponnesian Wars 1.21).

The most famous and influential distinction between hist. and poetry, that of Aristotle in the Poetics, codifies this difference in authority. Hist., in this account, relates what has happened, whereas poetry can also relate what may happen or what should happen (1451b). Poetry, therefore, is the higher art; untethered to the actual, it can ascend from the particular to the universal. Actually, despite its great authority, Aristotle's definition is itself quite particular. Enclosed as it is within a larger discussion of unity of action, one that takes tragedy as its normative example, Aristotle's discussion is swayed by the threat of aesthetic disunity. "Of all plots and actions," he says, "the episodic are the worst" (1452a). A literary form such as hist., in which events are transcribed for no other reason than that they happened and in no other order than the one in which they occurred, violates Aristotle's notions of the shapeliness of art.

Thus, a great deal of the territory between hist. and poetry is left untouched by Aristotle's famous distinction. Since the point at issue is the shape of narrative, lyric poetry is ignored. Though the shift from verse to prose seems momentous, and not unrelated to other distinctions between inspired accounts and verifiable ones, Aristotle dismisses it. On the other side as well, Aristotle leaves out a good deal of what is now implied by the term history. He approaches it simply as a kind of writing, one that had still to establish itself. There is, in fact, no notion in Eur. antiquity generally of hist. as a pattern of events quite separate from particular historical accounts, no sense of hist. as a mode of explanation or a kind of knowledge (Press, Unger). For this reason, Aristotle's distinction did not matter much until it had been pulled from its own time and context and reapplied in the Ren.

As long as hist. is nothing more than a kind of writing, as it was for Eur. antiquity, then it will naturally share a great deal with poetry. Thus, Lucian's How to Write History (ca. 165 CE) suggests that the historian should "have a touch and share of poetry," though it also cautions against "poetry's wild enthusiasm." Quintilian also considered hist. "a kind of prose poem" (10.1.31). Hist. and poetry differ in degree but not in kind; even so fundamental a distinction as that between fact and fancy is of little use in distinguishing them. Ancient historical accounts showed a marked tolerance for mythic material, as long as it was generally received as if true, and the crucial distinction in judging competing accounts was objectivity rather than factuality (Marincola, Unger). Since hist. and poetry were thought of as rhetorical arts, both were expected to use figurative lang. for persuasive and decorative purposes, though perhaps in varying concentrations.

Only in Christian historiography does the figurative achieve an importance sufficient to affect the relation of hist. to poetry, perhaps even to determine the difference between them. Typological interpretations of the Bible, meant to link the OT to the NT as prophecy to fulfillment, also ascribed a particular shape to the passage of time, one not apparent on the face of events. Within the apparent welter, leading nowhere, there was a pattern and a direction. For Augustine, it was this pattern, read figuratively, that distinguished the hist. of the City of God from the literal passage of time (Press). Thus, Christian historiography proposed a kind of hist. quite different from the mere aggregate of temporal accounts and a meaning of the term history distinct from literary composition altogether. "History," as a meaningful movement in time, now became the object of study for hist., a scholarly discipline. And though this lifted hist. out of the ruck of literary rhet., the distinction between mere events and "History" was itself inherently figurative and thus implicitly poetic.

Since historical research and interest were preconditions of the rebirth of ancient scholarship in the Ren., the discipline of hist. enjoyed a singular authority among Ren. humanists. In this context, the dignity of hist. depended on its truthfulness, in contradistinction to the fables and romances of the Dark Ages. For the first time in the writing of Eur. hist., the discovery and evaluation of documentary evidence and the weighing of different sources—and not eyewitness testimony—formed the basis of the historian's authority. For the It. humanists in the ars historica trad., figurative lang. was disdained as useless ornament, and hist. was placed above poetry because truth was more effective at teaching and motivation (Cochrane). However, some humanist scholars defended the use of retrospectively composed speeches in works of hist. on the grounds that these offered the same sort of general truth as poetry (Grafton). A contemporaneous but unrelated movement in China resulted in the removal of poetry, as frivolity, from the civil examinations, in favor of cl. and historical knowledge as applied to current events (Ng and Wang).

In both Europe and China in the early mod. period, the systematization of knowledge resulted in various schemes of codification, in which poetry and hist. were usually assigned to different columns. Francis Bacon's The Advancement of Learning (1605), e.g., divides human knowledge into the categories of philosophy, poesy, and hist. Bacon defines poetry as "feigned history," higher in one way than real hist. because it can offer a moralized presentation of events, lower in another since it is not true (2.4.1). For other Ren. writers, the use of "fained materials" was to be reprehended, along with "Oratorial or Poetical Notions" (Lowenstein). When Ren. poets called on Aristotle, then, it was because the art of *"feigning" seemed in need of defense. Edmund Spenser, George Puttenham, and Philip Sidney all relied on Aristotle in claiming an aesthetic advantage for poetry, as more able to rearrange events into pleasing patterns, and a moral advantage, as capable of showing what ought to be or can be as well as what is (Levine).

In his Defence of Poesy (1595), Sidney also claimed that the best historians of the cl. past had written poetically and not just factually. This was literally true in his own time, when many of the most prominent historians were also poets and vice versa. Walter Ralegh, Samuel Daniel, and Milton all composed national or universal hists., while later John Dryden was poet laureate and historiographer royal. This is the situation that obtained commonly in China as well, where many court historians were also distinguished poets (Ng and Wang). In fact, despite the energy used in early mod. Europe attacking and defending the art of feigning, it proved quite difficult to draw a definitive line between hist. and poetry. Since even Bacon accepted certain fables and marvels as fact, and even the most rigorous hist. depended inevitably on rhetorical devices of some kind, hist. and poetry seemed to differ in degree and not in kind. Even Lodovico Castelvetro, one of the most adamant of humanists where hist. was concerned, could only claim meekly that "the subject matter of poetry ought to be similar to that of history, and resemble it, but it should not be identical" (MacLean).

The philosophes of the Enlightenment were even more adamant in their preference for fact and somewhat more specific in their dislike of figurative lang. In the entry on the topic in his Philosophical Dictionary (1764), Voltaire refused to admit figurative lang. into hist., "for too many metaphors are hurtful, not only to perspicuity, but also to truth, by saying more or less than the thing itself." Poetic accounts, like fabulous ones, were relegated to a past that had not enjoyed the benefits of Newtonian science. Even in the case of epic poetry, Voltaire preferred work that was based on fact. But he was willing to admit as "fact" unprovable accounts that had long been accepted, and he was also concerned to distinguish his own historical work, which had been shaped so as to rival the drama and dignity of tragedy, from mere chronicle (White 1978). Historical writing, in other words, was still considered a branch of lit. and was taught as such, and it was just as difficult for Voltaire as it had been for Castelvetro to differentiate the literary techniques of the historian from those of other writers.

The increasing rationalization and specialization visible since the Ren. did inevitably have the effect of forcing each kind of learning to define its own domain. For the romantics, then, the tension between hist. and poetry was part of a larger conflict between reason and emotion, fact and fancy, science and lit. Writing the entry on "Hist." for the Encyclopedie moderne (1828), Prosper de Barante dated this split to the moment at which Herodotus took his departure from heroic poetry. Thus, "the real was separated from the ideal, poetry from prose, the pleasures men allow themselves in the domain of the spirit from the positive aspects of life" (Gossman). When William Wordsworth refers to Aristotle's distinction in the Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800), he augments the traditional reasons for the superiority of poetry over hist. by claiming that, in the former, the past is "carried alive into the heart by passion." Poetry, he claims, effects an immediate and affective tie, unencumbered by all the obstacles placed in the way by the historian's lumber. To T. L. Peacock's charge that poetry is nothing more than defective hist., P. B. Shelley's Defence of Poetry (1821) responds by claiming that it effects an emotional identification across time that is stronger and more profound than factual hist. can ever be: "it arrests the vanishing apparitions which haunt the interlunations of life, and veiling them, or in language or in form, sends them forth among mankind."

Shelley claims that "all the great historians, Herodotus, Plutarch, Livy, were poets," creators of "living images," though held back by the limitations of historical form, and many of his contemporaries who wrote hist. aspired to escape those limitations and achieve the immediacy of the poetic image. Thomas Carlyle, e.g., declared in an 1834 letter to his brother that his French Revolution was to be "an epic poem." In his 1830 essay "On History," he saw the past as "a real Prophetic Manuscript," a kind of poem in itself, available in full to no one but obscure in particular to anyone who approached it as mere fact. Thus, the gap between hist. and poetry was closed from the far side, as it were, and the romantic historian took a role "similar to that of the Romantic poet" (Gossman). In this context, to reconnect past with present was to restore a more general unity, lost as human faculties grew farther apart over time. For Jules Michelet, e.g., the work of a genuine historian was to effect a spiritual resurrection, not only to recount some facts about the past (White 1978).

At the same time, a very different kind of hist. writing arose, partly in response to romantic fiction. Drawn to the novels of Walter Scott, Leopold von Ranke was shocked to discover that the Middle Ages as represented in contemp. documents bore little resemblance to their fictionalized counterpart. His determination to see the past "wie es eigentlich gewesen," lifted free of its original context and freely trans. as it was, became the motto for academic hist. in Europe (Bentley). Though Ranke's immediate influence was limited to Europe, the trend toward an academic, purely factual hist. was worldwide, and the remains of traditional poetic forms were removed from Arab and Bengali hist. as well (Iggers and Wang). And yet Ranke himself was not at all antipathetic to poetry, nor did he believe that hist. should be told without recourse to larger patterns of meaning, figurative or symbolic (Braw, Breisach). Even for Ranke, the distinction between mere recording and actual hist. lay in the ability of the latter to "recreate" and to do so in a way "related to poetry" ("On the Character of Historical Science").

Nonetheless, the 20th c. began with positivist hist. posed starkly against a poetic trad. for which the *lyric was the paradigmatic form. J. B. Bury's 1903 address, "The Science of History," forthrightly declared the claims of historical science, free of speculative metaphysics and of poetic ornament (Breisach), while Ezra Pound's disdain for the "'germanic' system of graduate study" can represent the poet's response. And yet many historians, led chronologically if not intellectually by Benedetto Croce, attacked the positivist definition of hist. as a science, while many mod. poets, Pound foremost among them, were inspired methodologically by historical research into the past. Pound particularly revered Lorenzo Valla, who gave humanist hist. its illustrious beginning by exposing the donation of Constantine as a forgery. Though *modernism may seem to be antihistorical by definition, Pound was hardly the only modernist who aspired to write "a poem including history." Mod. poets such as Pound, W. B. Yeats, and T. S. Eliot shared with their Victorian predecessors a desire to make the past speak, one so strong it strained against the constraints of lyric form and brought forth time-traveling works like The Cantos and The Waste Land.

In recent times, the notion that the writing of hist. is inevitably a rhetorical task has been presented by Hayden White as if it also meant that the writing of hist. is essentially rhetorical. This position has attracted much opposition from historians for whom an admission of the rhetorical, the figurative, and the poetic into their work seems to mean the abandonment of truth. Still, historians continue to call upon some form of literary distinction to differentiate their work from mere chronicle. And it remains difficult to distinguish hist., as a pattern of events and a form of knowledge, from the group of writings called hists. without some recourse to figurative understanding of a kind difficult to distinguish from that of the poets.

■ R. Unger, "The Problem of Historical Objectivity," History and Theory 11 (1971); H. White, Metahistory (1973); G. Press, "History and the Development of the Idea of History in Antiquity," History and Theory 16 (1977); H. White, Tropics of Discourse (1978); E. Cochrane, Historians and Historiography in the Italian Renaissance (1981); J. Kenyon, The History Men (1983); L. Gossman, Between History and Literature (1990); H. Lindenberger, The History in Literature (1990); D. Lowenstein, Milton and the Drama of History (1990); G. MacLean, Time's Witness (1990)—Eng. poetry, 1603–60; S. Lu, From Historicity to Fictionality (1994)—on China; J. Marincola, Authority and Tradition in Ancient Historiography (1997); J. Levine, The Autonomy of History (1999); F. Ankersmit, Historical Representation (2001); Turning Points in Historiography, ed. Q. Wang and G. Iggers (2002); M. Bentley, Modernizing England's Past (2005)—Eng. historiography, 1870–1970; O. Ng and E. Wang, Mirroring the Past (2005)—imperial China; J. D. Braw, "Vision as Revision: Ranke and the Beginning of Modern History," History and Theory 46 (Dec. 2007); E. Breisach, Historiography, 3rd. ed. (2007); A. Grafton, What Was History? (2007); A Global History of Modern Historiography, ed. G. Iggers and Q. Wang (2008).

M. North

HITTITE POETRY. The great bulk of the lit. recovered from Hattusa (Boğazköy/Boğazkale, located about 62 miles northeast of Ankara), capital of the Hittites from the 17th to the early 12th c. BCE, was written in prose. A metrical analysis of those texts definitely composed in bound lang., such as the mythological compositions known as "Songs," is difficult because of a number of technical characteristics of the script in which they are written: as a syllabary, cuneiform is unable to render precisely the phonology of an IE lang. such as Hittite, since it cannot express consonant clusters adequately, esp. at the beginning or end of words. Furthermore, the Hittite scribes often used *ideograms for many common lexemes, thus concealing their phonological shape from the uninitiated reader. Finally, breaks between lines of poetry are quite often not indicated either by line breaks or by punctuation, which was not a feature of cuneiform texts in any event.

The earliest scrap of Hittite poetry we possess, a soldier's *lament, is included in an historical text composed in the 16th c. BCE:

Nesas waspus[1] Nesas waspus[2] // tiya-mu[3] tiya[4] nu-mu annasmas[1] katta arnut[2] // tiya-mu[3] tiya[4] nu-mu uwasmas[1] katta arnut[2] // tiya-mu[3] tiya[4] (Clothes of Nesa, clothes of Nesa—approach me, approach!

Bring me to my mother—approach me, approach!
Bring me to my uwa—approach me, approach!)

The basic principle underlying this Hittite versification is phrasal stress, namely, regular lines of four stresses each, falling into two cola (see COLON). The rules governing the presence or absence of stress (on, e.g., enclitics, noun phrases, and adverbs)—whose details still remain somewhat obscure to mod. scholars—have been shown to be applicable in Hittite prose as well. Therefore, this type of poetry is a native Anatolian ling. phenomenon and not, as had been suggested previously, the result of trans. into Hittite of poems originally composed in the Hurrian or Akkadian langs. It seems that *assonance, *alliteration, *rhyme, and synonymous *parallelism also played some role in Hittite poetry, but none of these techniques was structural to its practice.

Many of the *incantations and short hymns featured in Hittite ritual and cult employ at least some elements of poetic lang., but it is the "Songs" adapted from Hurrian-lang. forerunners that best illustrate Hittite poetry. These include the constituents of the Kumarbi Cycle: the "Song of Emergence" (often referred to today as "Kingship in Heaven"), the "Song of Hedammu," the "Song of Ullikummi," the "Song of Silver," the "Song of the Protective Deity," as well as the "Song of the Sea" and the Hurro-Hittite bilingual "Song of Release."

Despite the seeming aberrance of the final line, this quatrain from the "Song of Ullikummi" provides a good impression of the style of Hittite *epic poetry:

Kumarbis[1]-za hattatar[2] // istanzani[3] piran daskizzi[4] nu idalun[1] siwattan[2] // huwappan[3] sallanuskizzi[4] nu-za Tarhuni[1] menahhanda[2] // idalawatar[3] sanhiskizzi[4] nu Tarhuni[1] // tarpanallin[2] sallanuskizzi[3]

([The god] Kumarbi takes wisdom into his mind.
He rears a bad day as Evil.
He seeks evil for the Storm-god.
He rears a rival for the Storm-god.)

See SUMERIAN POETRY.

■ H. Th. Bossert, "Gedicht und Reim im vorgriechischen Mittelmeergebiet," Geistige Arbeit 5 (1938); H. G. Güterbock, "The Song of Ullikummi," Journal of Cuneiform Studies 5 (1951); I. McNeill, "The Metre of the Hittite Epic," Anatolian Studies 13 (1963); S.P.B. Durnford, "Some Evidence for Syntactic Stress in Hittite," Anatolian Studies 21 (1971); H. Eichner, "Probleme von Vers und Metrum in epichorischer Dichtung Altkleinasiens," Hundert Jahre Kleinasiatische Kommission, ed. G. Dobesch and G. Rehrenböck (1993); O. Carruba, "Poesia e metrica in Anatolia prima dei Greci," Studia classica Iohanni Tarditi oblata, ed. L. Belloni et al. (1995); O. Carruba, "Hethitische und anatolische Dichtung," Intellectual Life of the Ancient Near East, ed. J. Prosecky (1998); H. A. Hoffner, Hittite Myths, 2d ed. (1998); H. C. Melchert, "Poetic Meter and Phrasal Stress in Hittite," Mír Curad, ed. J. Jasanoff et al. (1998); R. Francia, "'Montagne grandi (e) piccole, (sapete) perchè sono venuto?' (in margine a due recitativi di Iriya, CTH 400–401)," Orientalia 73 (2004); G. Beckman, "Hittite and Hurrian Epic," A Companion to Ancient Epic, ed. J. M. Foley (2005); G. Beckman, "Hittite Literature," From an Antique Land, ed. C. S. Ehrlich (2008).

G. BECKMAN

HOMODYNE AND HETERODYNE. Terms taken from the science of radio waves by Knight in 1939 to describe the coincidence (homodyne) and conflict (heterodyne) between word accent and (quantitative) verse *ictus in the Lat. *hexameter of Virgil, and from this usage expanded to refer to other patterns of alignment between accent and ictus in Gr. and Lat. poetry. Knight and others have argued these concords and discords were used by Virgil and other poets for expressive purposes, as instanced, e.g., in the distinctive discord in the fourth foot of the Virgilian hexameter. Other scholars have questioned such a view, finding the coincidences and conflicts fortuitous.

■ W.F.J. Knight, Accentual Symmetry in Vergil, 2d ed. (1950; rpt. with corrections, 1979); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963), 89–134; Allen.

J. W. HALPORN

HOMOEOTELEUTON (or homoioteleuton, Gr.; "similar endings"; cf. homoioptoton). This term first occurs in Aristotle (Rhetoric 5.9.9; 1410b2) but (though the phenomenon may be found in Gorgias) is normally applied to cl. Lat. (see Quintilian 9.3.77–80). It describes identical or similar inflectional case endings on words in proximity, whether in prose or verse, as in Cicero's famous "Abiit, abscessit, evasit, erupit"; most often the words are at the ends of cola (in prose) or lines (in verse). Aristotle distinguishes three types of sound similarity in endings. When homoeoteleuton occurs at the end of two or more lines in succession, it becomes "case rhyme"—as when Cicero ends three consecutive *hexameters with monebant, ferebant, and iubebant. But it should be understood that homoeoteleuton is not an instance of *rhyme, strictly speaking, for, in inflectional langs., similarity of word ending is the rule rather than the exception, so often can scarcely be avoided. In noninflected, positional langs., such as Eng., by contrast, the poet must labor for the phonic echo. Word endings in homoeoteleuton bear grammatical information, but that is all. In a system where these do not exist, rhyme poses phonic similarity precisely to point up the semantic difference of the roots. Homoeoteleuton is chosen by the lang.; rhyme is chosen by the poet. True rhyme first appears in the Christian Lat. hymns of the 3rd to 4th cs. CE. Still, it is clear that homoeoteleuton was a distinct and intentional stylistic device and was capable of some range of effect. It is more common by far in Lat. than in Gr. By a curious turn, something of the same effect was later achieved in rime grammaticale as practiced in 15th- and 16th.-cs. Fr. poetry by the rhétoriqueurs*. The general association of homoeoteleuton with grammatical necessity (i.e., similarity) and rhyme with intentional artfulness (i.e., semantic difference) is evident in the problematic proposition by W. K. Wimsatt, a proponent of *New Criticism, of the difference between homoeoteleuton and rhyme as a figure for the difference between prose and poetry.

See GRAMMATICAL RHYME.

■ P. Rasi, Dell'omoeoteleuto latino (1891); W. K. Wimsatt, "One Relation of Rhyme to Reason," MLQ 5, no. 3 (1944); N. I. Herescu, La Poésie latine (1960); E. H. Guggenheimer, Rhyme Effects and Rhyming Figures (1972); Lausberg, 360–63; L. Håkanson, "Homoeoteleuton in Latin Dactylic Verse," Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 86 (1982); Lanham; Norden; D. R. Shackleton Bailey, Homoeoteleuton in Latin Dactylic Verse (1994); S. Friedberg, "Prose and Poetry," PoT 26 (2005).

T.V.F. BROGAN; N. GERBER

HOVERING ACCENT (Ger., schwebende Betonung). A term taken up by Jakob Schipper from F. B. Gummere and embraced by his students and a number of 19th- and 20th-cs. metrists (e.g., E. W. Sievers, B. ten Brink, M. Kaluza, R. M. Alden, J. Malof, D. Attridge) for cases in *scansion where stress seems to be equally disposed on two adjacent syllables. Originally, the concept was offered to solve the problem of a word stress not in alignment with metrical *ictus. Ten Brink confined "level stress" to equal manifestation of both stress and ictus "in delivery," but to later metrists, it meant that "the stress seems to hover over two syllables, uncertain upon which it should alight" (G. R. Stewart), i.e., in scansion. Seymour Chatman has attacked it as a purely paper ambiguity. G. M. Hopkins employs contiguous strong stressing in that his whole aim is to "spring" loose the alternating stresses of Eng. metrical verse.

See ACCENT.

■ Schipper 1.91; Schipper, History 138; A. Eichler, "Taktumstellung und schwebende Betonung," Archiv 165 (1934): G. B. Erné, "Die schwebende Betonung als Kunstmittel in der Lyrik," Diss., Berlin (1944); Chatman; G. R. Stewart, The Technique of English Verse (1966); Wimsatt and Beardsley.

T.V.F. BROGAN

HUDIBRASTIC VERSE. A specific form of octosyllabic verse with distinctive polysyllabic and mosaic rhymes, a satirical tone, and frequently impious imagery—widely imitated but never equaled—employed by Samuel Butler (1612–80) in his popular Hudibras (1663–78). The meter would appear joggingly monotonous were the reader not kept constantly engrossed in the conversational, sparkling wit and constantly alert for the unexpected rhymes, many of them feminine (see MASCULINE AND FEMININE), which, as an anonymous writer has remarked, "seem to chuckle and sneer of themselves." Butler speaks, e.g., of Dame Religion, > Whose honesty they all durst swear for,

> Tho' not a man of them knew wherefore;

and of a time when

> The oyster women picked their fish up
> And trudged away to cry, No Bishop.

See MOCK EPIC.

■ E. A. Richards, Hudibras in the Burlesque Tradition (1937); I. Jack, "Low Satire: Hudibras," Augustan Satire, 1660–1750 (1952); C. L. Kulisheck, "Swift's Octosyllabics and the Hudibras Tradition," JEGP 53 (1954); Saintsbury, Prosody; L. S. Catlett, "An Odde Promiscuous Tone: A Study of the Prosody of Hudibras," DAI 32 (1971).

L. J. ZILLMAN

HUITAIN. In Fr. poetry, an eight-line *strophe (see OCTAVE) in eight- or ten-syllable lines, written on three rhymes, with one of these appearing four times and with the same rhyme for the fourth and fifth lines. The order is commonly ababbcbc, sometimes abbaacac. The huitain may be a complete poem in eight lines, or it may be employed as the structural unit for longer poems. In the 15th c., François Villon wrote his Lais and the body of Le grand testament and most of its *ballades in huitains. The form was popular in France in the first half of the 16th c. (e.g., Clément Marot), and it was sometimes employed in 18th-c. *epigrams. In his Petit traité de poésie française (1872), Théodore de Banville regrets the abandonment of the huitain by mod. Fr. poets and calls it (with the *dizain) "perhaps the most perfect thing our lyric art has produced."

■ Kastner; Patterson.

A. G. ENGSTROM

HUMORS. The idea that a person's traits of character and behavior depend on a balance of four bodily fluids or "humors"—blood, phlegm, and black and yellow bile—can be traced to Hippocrates (5th c. BCE), though it finds its main exponent in Galen (2d c. CE), the Gr. physician who systematized medical knowledge. In The Anatomy of Melancholy (1621), Robert Burton explored the effects of melancholy, which was caused by an excess of black bile. Phlegm created a phlegmatic character; yellow bile, a choleric character; blood, a sanguine character. Burton and other such Ren. writers as Thomas Linacre, Thomas Elyot, and Thomas Wright adapted and explored these theories and emphasized the connection between physical and psychological balance that led to a well-balanced personality and to *decorum.

In 1597, George Chapman dramatized the theory in A Humourous Day's Mirth. Following Chapman's lead, Ben Jonson wrote a number of comedies of humor: Every Man in His Humour (1598) and Every Man out of His Humour (1599) are the clearest examples; but in his introduction to The Magnetic Lady (1641), Jonson suggests that all his comedies have been studies of humors.

In the "Induction" to Every Man out of His Humour, Jonson says that a person suffers from a humor > when some one peculiar quality

> Doth so possess a man, that it doth draw
> All his affects, his spirits, and his powers,
> In their confluctions, all to run one way,
> This may be truly said to be a humor.

He also derides those who have overused the term humor until it has become commonplace and those who affectedly claim a humor when they have a small idiosyncrasy. To Jonson's mind, a true humor is a dangerous and corrupting sickness; the *comedy takes root in the process of its correction.

Restoration comedy revived and altered humors comedy, with Thomas Shadwell's claim to be Jonson's heir nearly devastated by John Dryden in "MacFlecknoe" (1682). In the comedies of both and of their successors, humoral characters shade into the Witwouds, Horners, Lovewells, and Lady Cockwoods of comedy of manners. From that devel., eccentric characters or characters dominated by single pronounced traits populate novels from Henry Fielding to Charles Dickens. ■ P. V. Kreider, Elizabethan Comic Character Conventions (1935); J. J. Enck, Jonson and the Comic Truth (1957); J. D. Redwine Jr., "Beyond Psychology," ELH 28 (1961); N. G. Siraisi, Medieval and Early Renaissance Medicine (1990); G. K. Paster, The Body Embarrassed: Drama and the Disciplines of Shame in Early Modern England (1993); M. C. Schoenfeldt, Bodies and Selves in Early Modern England (1999); L. García-Ballester, Galen and Galenism, ed. J. Arrizabalaga et al. (2002); M. Floyd-Wilson, English Ethnicity and Race in Early Modern Drama (2003); G. K. Paster, Humoring the Body: Emotions and the Shakespearean Stage (2004).

F. Teague

HUNGARY, POETRY OF. The origins of Hungarian poetry can be traced back to the oral trad. of tribes that settled in the Carpathian basin around the 9th c., although there is no record of these primarily shamanistic songs and their afterlife is part of Hungarian folklore, not lit. The trad. of pagan *bards was, after the establishment of a Christian Hungarian state at the end of the 10th c., slowly absorbed by entertainers of the Middle Ages (see JONGLEUR). The first literary record can be dated from the end of the 12th c. (a funeral sermon) and the first instance of lyric poetry, The Lament of Mary, from the second half of the 13th c. This *lament, like most early Hungarian poetry, is based on Lat. models; however, it is not a trans. in the mod. sense of the word but a recreation, a poetically powerful rendering of Mary's loss, using both rhyme and *alliteration. Chronicles from the 11th to the 14th c. frequently recorded ancient legends ("The Legend of the Miracle Stag," "The Legend of Álmos") that became part of the poetical trad. and formed the basis for later retellings, most notably by the 19th-c. poets Mihály Vörösmarty (1800–55) and János Arany (1817–82).

The early poetry of Hungary was predominantly Lat., and the first significant Hungarian poet, Janus Pannonius (pseud. of János Csezmiczei, 1434–72) wrote exclusively in Lat. His poetry is steeped in Ren. humanism; after completing his education in the cultural centers of Italy, he became bishop in the southern city of Pécs. The poetry of Pannonius follows cl. antiquity in its form (*epigrams and *elegies were favored) and the humanist rhet. of 15th-c. Lat. in its lang. but stays connected to Hungarian topography and experiences. His accomplishment was to bring Ren. humanism to Hungary and to leave the first body of work to bear the mark of an independent poetic voice.

The Reformation saw the first partial, and later complete, trans. of the Bible (the work of Gáspár Károli [1529?–91], pub. 1590), which instantly enriched the poetic trad. of Hungary. A notable example of this influence can be seen in the Psalm trans. of Albert Szenci Molnár (1574–1639). Other important figures of this period include the writer and publisher Gáspár Heltai (ca. 1490–1574), the Bible translator János Sylvester (ca. 1504–1551), and Péter Bornemissza (1535–84). An important evolving poetic genre of the period is the *song, often accompanied by music, with Sebestyén Tinódi Lantos (1510?–56) as its most important contributor. The main theme of his collected songs (Cronica, 1554) is the struggle against Turkish rule, thus establishing an important strand in Hungarian lit. concerned with the country's independence and the fate of its inhabitants. Another important new genre emerging at the end of the 16th c. is that of versified narratives, best exemplified by Péter Ilosvay-Selymes's The Story of the Remarkable Miklós Tholdi's Extraordinary and Brave Deeds, and with the work of Albert Gergei, whose The Story of Prince Argirus and a Fairy Virgin is based on the It. bella istoria. This secular narrative poetry is devoid of didactic elements and, through its concise style and colorful descriptions, marks an important moment in the devel. of Hungarian lit.

Although not the first to write lyric poetry in Hungarian, Bálint Balassi (1554–94) is the first outstanding lyricist of the Hungarian lang. His oeuvre consists of martial poetry (he was active in politics and warfare against the Turks; "In Praise of the Outposts"), love songs ("When He Met Julia, He Greeted Her Thus"), and religious poetry ("He Prays to God"); and his innovations include a new verse form (the Balassi stanza) and the conscious composition of complete sets of poems, with cycles arranged into tightly structured eds. With Balassi, Hungarian poetry reaches maturity in both lang. and form, and his poetry can be compared to accomplishments in other Eur. langs. in the 16th c. He inspired a group of followers, notably János Rimay (1569–1631), a mannerist poet who exemplifies the transition from the late Ren. to the *baroque.

The major poet of the baroque era is Count Miklós Zrínyi (1620–64); his 15-canto *epic The Siege of Szigetvár follows the epic ideals exemplified by Virgil and the It. Torquato Tasso but adapts them into a uniquely Hungarian version, with the heroic battle of his great-grandfather against the army of the Ottoman Empire as its subject. Zrínyi himself became an accomplished general in the fight against the Turks and a leading political figure of his time; although poetry was not his primary concern, he was conscious of the importance of a literary legacy and published his epic, along with his love poems, in 1651. The Siege of Szigetvár is built around cl. norms but also uses the rhyming and compositional patterns of earlier Hungarian narrative poetry. The epic form remains an important element in 17th-c. Hungarian poetry; besides Zrínyi, the most important contributor is István Gyöngyösi (1629–1704), whose pseudoepics focus on current events and are characterized by both rich baroque lang. and a political purpose.

Popular poetry of the 17th c. is mostly political in its nature, as Hungary's quest for independence remained a major concern. Anti-Turkish and anti-Hapsburg sentiments are at the core of the so-called kuruc poems, a collection of popular songs from the decades between 1670 and 1710, the time of the freedom fights that ended with the armed struggle led by Count Ferenc Rákóczy II (1676–1735). As often happens in Hungarian hist., the efforts for independence ended in heroic defeat; this further strengthened the important thematic trad. of defeat and loss in the poetry of Hungary. Mod. philology has proved many of the kuruc songs to be the fabrications of Kálmán Thaly (1839–1909), not unlike James Macpherson's Ossian; but, as a cultural idiom, it is part of Hungarian lit.

The intellectual hist. of 18th-c. Hungary followed major Eur. trends. By the century's end, Enlightenment ideals were increasingly accepted, culminating in the movement of the Hungarian Jacobins, heavily influenced by the Fr. Revolution. As the official langs. of the country were still Ger. and Lat., the establishment of the Hungarian vernacular became a goal of the progressive intelligentsia, effectively uniting political and literary goals. The most important representatives of this movement were Ferenc Kazinczy (1759–1831) and János Batsányi (1763–1805), both of whom made invaluable contributions toward establishing an independent Hungarian literary community, with proper institutional support.

The most important lyric poet after Balassi is Mihály Csokonai Vitéz (1773–1805); despite many hardships and a brief life, he was able to produce remarkable poetry that is characterized by strong musical qualities, a *rococo playfulness, and great symbolic power ("To the Echo of Tihany," "To Hope"). His love poetry (addressed to Julianna Vajda, whom he called Lilla) is among the best ever written in Hungarian. Csokonai was a great innovator, who used his knowledge of Eur. artistic and philosophical trends of his time to enrich the poetic trad. of his native tongue. An admirer of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Csokonai appears at the end of the Hungarian Enlightenment. The other important poet at the turn of the 18th and 19th cs. is Dániel Berzsenyi (1776–1836), a reclusive nobleman who became the greatest master of cl. verse forms in Hungarian, successfully transplanting the most difficult Gr. and Lat. metrics into a Hungarian poetic idiom ("The Approaching Winter"). Berzsenyi is not a pure classicist, however; his poetry demonstrates preromantic tendencies, and his influence can be felt well into the 20th c.

The Reform Age, as the first half of the 19th c. is commonly called in Hungarian intellectual hist., was focused on the political progress championed by the liberal nobility. The literary achievements are grouped under the label of *romanticism, and this period is arguably the golden age of Hungarian poetry, with a wealth of canonized masterpieces. Ferenc Kölcsey (1790–1838), a critic, poet, and leading literary figure, became the author of the national *anthem; his poetry is marked by both *classicism and romanticism ("Vanitatum Vanitas," "Huszt"). The poetic oeuvre of Vörösmarty is probably closest in its qualities to Eur. romanticism, both in voice and scope. He began with epic poetry; his The Flight of Zalán (1825), a heroic epic written in *hexameter, made his reputation in literary circles, although it is less often read than his later lyric and philosophical poetry ("Appeal," "Thoughts in the Library," "On Mankind"). His late masterpiece "The Ancient Gypsy" is one of the greatest expressions of the desperation following the failure of the 1848–49 War of Independence. The poet forever associated with this war and the preceding revolution of 1848 and one of the best-known poets both in and outside Hungary is Sándor Petőfi (1823–49). Petőfi was the first true Hungarian literary celebrity and the first national poet who tried to earn his living as a writer. His life and death at the battle of Segesvár are part of the nation's cultural memory. Petőfi's poetry is influenced by folk poetry; he transformed the short song into an expression of his poetic *persona, while also creating longer, narrative poetry, incl. the remarkable "John the Valiant" and "The Hammer of the Village." His love poems are classics of the genre ("At the End of September"), and the most important political poem in the Hungarian trad. is his "National Song," written and performed on the outbreak of the 1848 revolution. A counterpoint to Petőfi's short life and popular oeuvre is that of his friend Arany, who created the greatest examples of the *ballad in Hungarian ("Bards of Wales," "The Two Pages of Szondi"), and wrote superb epic poetry (Toldi Trilogy). His late poetry ("Autumn Bouquet") shows great emotional and lyrical maturity and successfully redefines the cliché of the young romantic poet. Arany is known for his intellectual integrity, and his impact on the devel. of the Hungarian poetic lang. cannot be overestimated.

The second half of the 19th c. sees the disillusionment after the failed War of Independence slowly diminish, as economic progress transforms the Austro-Hungarian Empire into a mod., developing state. János Vajda (1827–97), a major, if uneven, poet, is known for his philosophical pessimism; while József Kiss (1843–1921) became the first Hungarian poet with a Jewish background and an interest in representing the urban experience. The century's turn saw an unprecedented rise in the numbers of literary publications and marks the start of the golden age of mod. Hungarian lit., which centers around the writers associated with the literary review Nyugat (The West), published between 1908 and 1941. The goal of Nyugat was to introduce the achievements of Eur. lit. through trans. and to create a platform for the progressive elite of Hungarian lit. Like many in his generation, Endre Ady (1877–1919) was heavily influenced by Fr. *symbolism; his poetry is considered the starting point for the mod. age in Hungarian lit. His unique style is easily recognizable; his main themes are the backwardness of his country ("At the Gare de l'est," "Upward Thrown Stone"), and his love for Léda ("Beautiful Farewell Message"), along with religious poetry. Ady provokes both controversy and admiration, and his legacy has undergone several changes, but his influence on his contemporaries is undeniable. Árpád Tóth (1886–1928) is best described as a melancholy symbolist, whose basic mood is one of sad longing; part of his poetic oeuvre, as is typical for the Nyugat generation, is trans. from Eng., Fr. and Ger. Gyula Juhász's (1883–1937) lifelong battle with depression left a mark on his musical, art nouveau-influenced poetry; besides the Anna cycle (chronicling his unfulfilled love), he is known for his landscape poetry depicting the river Tisza around the southern town of Szeged. The two greatest poets belonging to the first generation of Nyugat are Mihály Babits (1883–1941) and Dezső Kosztolányi (1885–1936). Babits, who translated Dante's Divine Comedy, was a true poeta doctus whose erudition influenced the themes and style of his poetry. He spoke out against World War I in "Before Easter," and his late masterpieces "The Book of Jonah" and "Jonah's Prayer" foreshadow the looming catastrophe of Europe in a beautiful biblical voice. Kosztolányi has a different poetic persona; his early "Laments of a Poor Little Child" show the influences of modernist trends such as *impressionism and *expressionism, while his late poetry is focused on death and the great questions of life, in part following stoic sentiments. Kosztolányi's writing is always crafted with great attention to the poetic medium, his beloved Hungarian lang.

The most important poetic genius of the interwar period is Attila József (1905–37), a tormented man with a difficult upbringing who suffered from psychosis: his genuine, sincere poetry is a towering achievement. He wrote in many forms, with a keen sense of composition, while experimenting with varied poetic sensibilities. Some of his poetry is politically charged, as he sought to give voice to the working poor; more important, though, his poetry can be characterized as an honest exploration of the depths of torment, sometimes presented in a seemingly simple and straightforward manner ("With a Pure Heart," "Ode," "For My Birthday," "By the Danube"). He took his own life at the age of 32, leaving a poetic heritage that has never been surpassed.

The international avant-garde (*futurism and expressionism) is the main influence on the poetry of Lajos Kassák (1887–1967), who chiefly employed *free verse. His style changed during his lifetime, but his political activism was always tied to a search for progressive forms of literary expression ("The Horse Dies, the Birds Fly Away"). Kassák was also a painter, typographer, and graphic artist, with an interest in the visual qualities of poetry, and promoted early avant-garde art forms through the jours. he edited.

A member of the second generation of the Nyugat, the poet Lőrinc Szabó (1900–57) chronicled the evolution of his own self and the hist. of his relationships. Szabó became a master of the *sonnet, which he arranged into book-length cycles, besides being a prolific translator. The fate of Miklós Radnóti (1909–44) was marked by his heritage: as a baptized Jew, he fell prey to the discriminatory Jewish laws introduced in the 1930s and died in a forced-labor camp, leaving behind the most significant Hungarian Holocaust poetry ("Forced March," "Razglednica"). He was a classically oriented poet, who used cl. forms as a refuge against the ever-growing horrors of Nazi Europe. Another representative of this generation, Gyula Illyés (1902–83), wrote mostly in free verse, under the influence of Fr. surrealism and expressionism, and later became part of the populist writers' movement. He was well regarded by the socialist government of the postwar period, though he struggled to maintain his independence. Sándor Weöres (1913–89), the creator of *nursery rhymes that are known to almost all Hungarians, is a poet of immense erudition and great talent, who has an unparalleled ability to evoke musical qualities in his complex, universal poetry influenced by both Eastern philosophies and Western mysticism. A very different kind of poet, János Pilinszky (1921–81), used a reduced, bare lang. to comunicate the anxieties of a moral being in the 20th c., always struggling with questions of faith. He belonged to a group of poets gathered around Újhold (New Moon), the short-lived but significant postwar literary magazine; it also included the poet Ágnes Nemes Nagy (1922–91).

The great survivor of 20th-c. Hungarian poetry is György Faludy (1910–2006), who was acquainted with József yet lived into the 21st c. His poetic persona can be described as a vagabond, traveling and experiencing life to the fullest. He spent a considerable part of his live in exile (after being imprisoned by the communist regime) but returned in 1988, before the political changes. Among his best known work is his trans. of François Villon, first pub. in 1934.

An important part of Hungarian culture comes from Transylvania, now part of Romania, where the greatest number of Hungarians live outside Hungary. Domokos Szilágyi (1938–76) should be mentioned as a poet from this region whose ling. and formal invention is noteworthy, while András Ferenc Kovács (b. 1959) is a living Transylvanian poet who reinterprets (through palimpsest and *pastiche) the greater heritage of Eur. poetry with considerable poetic force.

A humorous tone, political engagement, and confessional themes dominate the poetry of György Petri (1943–2000), who was part of the antiestablishment of the 1970s and 1980s. The leading female poet of the contemp. era is Zsuzsa Rakovszky (b. 1950), a careful examiner of the fragility and insecurity of human experience. A prolific, though uneven, contemp. poet well known for his philosophical yet playful poetry, Dezső Tandori (b. 1938) is associated with the renewal of the poetic idiom in the 1970s. Two notable contemp. poets are János Térey (b. 1970), who experiments with longer verse narratives, and Dániel Varró (b. 1976), whose sense of rhyme and poetic tone is displayed in his playful and often intertextual poetry.

Since 1989, Hungary has undergone many transformations, and Hungarian poets are trying to find their role and tone in a world marked by new and powerful modes of communication, a new evolving social structure, and changes in the consumption of lit. Because of its relative ling. isolation, Hungarian poetry is still not widely known in the outside world, although new anthols. have been published and recent trans. may bring new audiences to its hidden gems.

■ Anthologies: Magyar Poetry (1908), Modern Magyar Lyrics (1926)—both trans. and ed. W. N. Loew; The Magyar Muse, ed. and trans. W. Kirkconnell (1933); Magyar versek könyve, ed. J. Horváth (1942); A Little Treasury of Hungarian Verse, ed. and trans. W. Kirkconnell (1947); Hungarian Poetry, ed. E. Kunz (1955); Hét évszázad magyar versei, ed. I. Király et al., 4 v. (1978–79); Old Hungarian Literary Reader, ed. T. Klaniczay (1985); The Face of Creation: Contemporary Hungarian Poetry, ed. and trans. J. Kessler (1988); In Quest of the "Miracle Stag," ed. A. Makkai (1996); The Colonnade of Teeth: Modern Hungarian Poetry, ed. G. Gomori and G. Szirtes (1997); Magyar nőköltők a XVI. századtól a XIX. századig, ed. M.S.Sárdi (1999).

■ Bibliographies: Bibliography of Hungarian Literature, ed. S. Kozocsa (1959); A. Tezla, An Introductory Bibliography to the Study of Hungarian Literature (1964)—annotated; and Hungarian Authors: A Bibliographical Handbook (1970).

■ Criticism and History: F. Toldy, A magyar költészet története (1867); G. Király, Magyar ősköltészet (1921); J. Horváth, A magyar irodalmi népiesség Faluditól Petőfiig (1927), and A magyar irodalmi műveltség kezdetei (1931); A. Schöpflin, A magyar irodalom története a XX. században (1937); T. Kardos, Középkori kultúra, középkori költészet (1941); J. Horváth, A magyar vers (1948); J. Waldapfel, A magyar irodalom a felvilágosodás korában (1954); T. Kardos, A magyarországi humanizmus kora (1955); A. Szerb, Magyar irodalomtörténet (1958); A magyar irodalom története, ed. M. Szabolcsi, 4 v. (1966); P. Rákos, Rhythm and Metre in Hungarian Verse (1966); J. Horváth, Rendszeres magyar verstan (1969)—systematic Hungarian poetics; A. Karátson, Le symbolisme en Hongrie (1969); A. Kerek, Hungarian Metrics (1971); L'Irréconciliable: Petőfi, poète et révolutionnaire, ed. S. Lukácsy (1973); M. Szegedy-Maszák, Világkép és stílus (1980); Pages choisies de la litterature hongroise des origines au millieu du XVIIIe siècle, ed. T. Klaniczay (1981); Vándorének, ed. M. Béládi (1981)—Hungarian poets in Western Europe and overseas; A History of Hungarian Literature, ed. T. Klaniczay (1982); B. Pomogáts, A nyugati magyar irodalom története (1982); L. Czigány, The Oxford History of Hungarian Literature (1984); A nyugati magyar irodalom 1945 után, ed. M. Béládi et al. (1986). E. Kulcsár Szabó, A magyar irodalom története 1945–1991 (1993); M. Szegedy-Maszák, Literary Canons: National and International (2001); G. Szirtes, An Island of Sound: Hungarian Poetry and Fiction before and beyond the Iron Curtain (2004); A magyar irodalom történetei, ed. M. Szegedy-Maszák et al. (2007); L. C. Szabó, A magyar költészet századai (2008).

V. Varga

HYBRID POETRY. The term hybrid poetry came to be used informally in the 1990s to describe a growing stylistic eclecticism in late 20th-c. poetry of the U.S. It refers to the fusion of styles that had been experienced by some as separate polarities before the 1980s. With the publication of the anthology American Hybrid, the term began to receive wider attention. In her intro., Cole Swensen notes that "while extremes remain, and everywhere we find complex aesthetic and ideological differences, the contemporary moment is dominated by rich, uncategorizable writings, often hybrids that mingle attributes from previous 'camps' in diverse and unprecedented ways." Although in a practical sense all poetry is hybrid, the term hybrid proposes a botanical conceit to explain how apparently competing strains might have influenced each other in the evolving course of the art.

What is hybridized in hybrid poetry? A form that passed into Am. poetry in the 1980s might be described something like this: on the one hand is poetry that emphasizes personal or emotional expressiveness, often with a first-person, apparently autobiographical speaker. It ranges in style from the restrained writings of Elizabeth Bishop to the intimate poems of James Schuyler and Frank O'Hara to the explosive poetry of Robert Lowell, Allen Ginsberg, and their heirs. Though it sometimes uses *surrealism, it mostly employs tropes of *realism. Poetry from the other strain foregrounds, rather than emotional expression, the materiality of lang. It is attracted to procedures that call into question the authority of a subjective speaker and representation itself; it points to its own processes of composition, employing disjunctive or fragmentary syntax as an alternative to conventional grammar.

How these different strains arose will be a source of historical inquiry as the poetic canon is continually reconstituted. As Swensen notes, mid-19th-c. poetry provides one point of entry: the turbulent, often revolutionary values of romantic poets were taken up, addressed, and often opposed by other writers, particularly by symbolists after Charles Baudelaire—including Arthur Rimbaud and Stéphane Mallarmé—who tried to establish distance from the personal expressiveness of *romanticism; the sense of poetry as oppositional was brought forward into the modernist enterprise. Yet if the Fr. symbolist avant-garde questioned the values of romantic poetry—the idea of nature as an ally, an emphasis on subjective experience, and the primacy of the feeling function—they also embodied many romantic values in their own practices, desiring freedom to choose subject matter and style, promoting the belief in the power of art and imagination to be forces of change. Romantic and postsymbolist poetry were hybridized, even as some of their features—esp. attitudes toward nature and urbanity—were not.

In the Anglo-Am. *modernism of the 1920s and 30s, braiding poetic practices from the previous century was also common. Robert Frost and E. A. Robinson created the clear traditions of naturalism in narrative poetry. T. S. Eliot's poetry, using images from Fr. *symbolism to render mod. urban atmospheres, attracted disciples from the *Fugitives to Robert Lowell and beyond. Ezra Pound collaged fragments of pastoral, medieval voices and urban song for his Cantos, and the self-proclaimed Objectivists identified Pound and W. C. Williams as twin progenitors. Gertrude Stein's abstract, cubist experiments resurfaced in the feminist lyric innovation of the 1980s as well as in *Language poetry. Indeed, techniques such as *collage and *cubism accelerated processes of poetic hybridization.

The 1950s and 60s saw a number of attempts to discern (and sometimes to reconcile) the two strains—perhaps most notably, Robert Lowell's acceptance speech for the National Book Award of 1960, in which he situated his work between what he called "the raw and the cooked" in contemporaneous poetry. In American Hybrid, Swensen notes the significance of the publication of Donald Allen's 1960 anthology The New American Poetry 1945–1960, which "brought all marginal poetries together, naming them and throwing them into sharp focus, [marking] the beginning of their demarginalization." In 1965 Robert Kelly and Paris Leary's anthology A Controversy of Poets arguably tried to hybridize the prevailing divisions. Beginning with the early 1980s, continual shifts not only in aesthetic values but in the polarization of camps give rise to complexly hybridized poetic practices. Much new poetry of the 21st c.—particularly that of lyric innovation—reflects oppositional features of avant-gardes, including an interest in the materiality and structure of language, without sacrificing emotional content or topical subject matter.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS, BLACK MOUNTAIN SCHOOL, OBJECTIVISM.

■ The New American Poetry 1945–1960, ed. D. Allen (1960); A Controversy of Poets, ed. P. Leary and R. Kelly (1965); An Exaltation of Forms, ed. A. Finch and K. Varnes (2002); American Women Poets in the 21st Century, ed. C. Rankine and J. Spahr (2002); C. Rankine and L. Sewell, American Poets in the 21st Century: The New Poetics (2007); American Hybrid, ed. D. St. John and C. Swensen (2008); R. Shepherd, Lyric Postmodernisms (2008).

B. HILLMAN

HYMN. An ancient Gr. liturgical and literary genre that assimilates Near-Eastern and specifically Heb. trad. in the Septuagint trans. (LXX) of the OT, the hymn was introduced into Christian trad. in the Gr. NT and the Lat. Vulgate Bible and by the Gr. and Lat. fathers, and has continued to flourish in Western culture in both liturgical and literary trads. down to the 21st c. Other trads. represented in Asian and in early Am. cultures, as well as in those of ancient Akkad, Sumer, and Egypt that influenced Heb. trad., are important but lie beyond the scope of this entry.

The Gr. noun hymnos refers to a song, poem, or speech that praises gods and sometimes heroes and abstractions. Hymns are in lyric measures, *hexameters, elegiac couplets, and even prose in late antiquity; the longest critical discussion of the hymn by the rhetorician Menander, Peri Epideiktikon (3d c. CE), makes no distinction between prose and verse. Most of the Gr. lyric hymns (mainly fragments by Alcaeus, Simonides, Bacchylides, Timotheus, and Pindar) were probably sung in religious worship. Similarly, the hexameter Orphic Hymns with their markedly theurgic emphasis may have been designed for religious purposes, although such abstractions as Justice, Equity, Law, and Fortune, as well as the Stars, Death, and Sleep, are subjects of praise. Thucydides refers to one of the hexameter Homeric Hymns as a prelude or preface; these presumably were literary introductions to epic recitations. The famous philosophic hymn by the Stoic Cleanthes (4th–3d c. BCE) is probably literary rather than liturgical in intention, as are the Hymns by the Neoplatonic philosopher Proclus (5th c. CE), although there is a significant theurgic element in the latter. The six extant Hymns of the Gr. poet Callimachus, in hexameters and elegiac couplets, are certainly literary emulations of the Homeric Hymns, and the long prose hymns of the apostate Emperor Julian (4th c. CE) could not have been used in worship.

When the LXX translators came to the Heb. OT, they used the nouns hymnos, psalmos (song or tune played to a stringed instrument), ode (song), and ainesis (praise), and the related verbs (hymneo, etc.) to translate a variety of Heb. words for praise, song, music, thanksgiving, speech, beauty, and joy. Several psalms are identified in their titles as hymns (e.g., 53, 60), incl. sometimes the explicit use of both words, psalmos and hymnos (6, 75; see PSALM). The psalms are also identified with odes or songs in several titles (e.g., 51), sometimes in the expression "a song of a psalm" (ode psalmou, 65), at others as "a psalm of a song" (psalmos odes, 67 and 74). Psalm 136.3 connects ode and hymnos; and, in two similar NT passages, all three terms are mentioned together with the implication of rough equivalence (Eph. 5:19, Col. 3:16).

While literary hymns were not a popular or important genre in pagan Roman adaptations of Gr. literary forms, Lat. Christians of the 4th c., influenced by the hymn singing of the Eastern Church, revived and introduced both literary and liturgical hymns into the Lat. West. This revival is also reflected in Jerome's Vulgate trans. of the Bible, where the transliterations hymnus and psalmus are regularly employed (along with a more accurate and consistent trans. of the OT Heb.). In his Confessions (9.7), Augustine remarks on the introduction of the singing of hymns and psalms in Milan by Ambrose. Isidore's influential Etymologiae (7th c.) identifies the Psalms of David as hymns (1.39.17) and asserts that, properly speaking, they must praise God and be sung, although in another work he notes that Hilary of Poitiers (also 4th c.) first composed hymns in celebrations of saints and martyrs (De ecclestiacis officiis 1.7).

Ambrose's short hymns (eight quatrains of iambic dimeter) are explicitly trinitarian and were intended to counteract Arian doctrine, which had itself apparently been fostered by hymns of an Arian bent. Considerable suspicion remained in the 6th and 7th cs. over the liturgical use of hymns composed by men as opposed to the divinely inspired Psalms of the Bible. But the unquestioned orthodoxy of Ambrose himself probably helped the hymn become accepted as a regular part of the liturgy along with the psalmody. As the Middle Ages progressed, many brilliant new hymns were added to the Lat. hymnody, from the great passion hymn "Vexilla regis prodeunt" by Fortunatus (7th c.) and the "Veni, Creator Spiritus" (trans. by John Dryden) to Thomas Aquinas's hymns for Corpus Christi day and the Franciscan "Stabat mater." Closely related to the hymn is the med. "prose" or sequence. Noteworthy are the works of Notker Balbulus (9th–10th cs.) and of Adam of St. Victor (12th c.), and the magnificent Franciscan "Dies irae."

The Reformation renewed the suspicion of hymns among many Protestants. Although Martin Luther composed hymns from paraphrases of the Psalms and other portions of the Bible, he also translated hymns from the Roman breviary and wrote original ones. John Calvin, on the other hand, who opposed the use of man-made hymns in congregational worship, retained the poet Clément Marot to create a metrical psalmody or psalter in Fr., and the Calvinistic position strongly influenced the Anglican and Presbyterian churches in Great Britain in the 16th and 17th cs. The renderings of the Anglican psalmody by Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins (2d ed., 1549), generally infelicitous but set in *ballad meter, may have prompted many Eng. poets of the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods to experiment with trans. of the Psalms (Philip and Mary Sidney produced an entire psalter, while John Milton translated 17 psalms in a variety of verse forms); but in popular terms, the Sternhold-Hopkins psalter was enormously successful.

The Roman Catholic Church experienced a different problem. The great influence of Ren. humanism led to a succession of more or less unfortunate revisions of the hymnody beginning with that by Leo X in 1525 and ending with Urban VIII's in the early 17th c. The motive was to turn the late cl. and med. Lat. of the hymns and sequences into good cl. Lat.

It remained for the Eng. nonconformist minister Isaac Watts to revive the writing of original hymns in the 18th c. and turn the primary focus of hymns away from literary artistry back to the rugged emotional expression of strong religious beliefs (Hymns and Spiritual Songs, 1707–9). As the 18th c. progressed, there occurred an enormous outpouring of hymns, along with new metrical versions of psalms, in the works of John and Charles Wesley, John Newton, Augustus Montague Toplady, Edward Perronet, the poet William Cowper, and many others, some of which (e.g., those by Charles Wesley) have great lyric power.

This outpouring continued in the 19th c. The works of Fanny Crosby and Katherine Hankey and the musical arrangements of W. H. Doane are preeminent among those of literally hundreds of writers and composers. New hymns were composed to the end of the 20th c. (e.g., by Doris Akers and Stuart Hamblen) and continue to this day (e.g., by Andraé Crouch and Ralph Carmichael). New and revised hymnals are still being arranged.

At about the same time that Ambrose introduced congregational hymn singing to the Christian church in Milan, the Christian poet Prudentius (ca. 348–405) wrote Christian literary hymns in the manner of the pagan poets of antiquity. Although some of Prudentius's creations are brief enough to be sung congregationally, many of his hymns are much too long for worship, and all have obvious literary and poetic pretensions. The fine lyric measures in two of his collections (Peristephanon and Cathemerinon) celebrate mainly saints and martyrs.

The cl. literary hymn was revived during the Ren. in both its Prudentian and secular forms. Pope Paul II's 140-line *sapphic "Hymnus de passione" (15th c.) could have been written by Prudentius, but Giovanni Pontano's (1426–1503) sapphic "Hymnus in noctem" (from his Parthenopei) imitates Catullus's lyric celebration of Diana. Pontano also wrote Christian literary hymns in Lat. elegiacs. Another Neo-Lat. poet, Marcantonio Flaminio (1498–1550), who wrote probably the best liturgical hymns of the Ren. (in Ambrosian dimeters), also composed a celebrated literary lyric, "Hymnus in Auroram."

Michele Marullo's 15th c. Hymni naturales were found by many in the Ren. to be too thoroughly pagan in subject and tone as well as form. There were other celebrated Christian literary hymns in the Ren., esp. those by Marco Girolamo Vida in the early 16th c. (Hymni, 1536). The later vernacular poets follow the lead of the Neo-Latinists. Pierre de Ronsard, along with Marullo the most prolific writer of literary hymns, composes both explicitly Christian and secular, philosophical hymns along with mythological celebrations. The first two of Edmund Spenser's Four Hymns celebrate love and beauty in a cl. philosophical (and Petrarchan) way, while the latter two celebrate heavenly (i.e., Christian) love and beauty.

These two trads. continue in Neo-Lat. and the vernacular lits., most notably in George Chapman's two long hymns in The Shadow of Night (1594), in Raphael Thorius's celebrated Hymnus tabaci (1625), in several of Richard Crashaw's long Christian literary hymns, James Thomson's "A Hymn on the Seasons," John Keats's "Hymn to Apollo," and P. B. Shelley's "Hymn to Intellectual Beauty," "Hymn of Apollo," and "Hymn of Pan."

While liturgical hymns tend simply to start and stop, the literary hymn frequently has an Aristotelian coherence—a beginning, middle, and end. Typically, it begins with an invocation and *apostrophe. The main body will narrate an important story or describe some moral, philosophic, or scientific attribute. A prayer and farewell provide the conclusion. The hist. of literary hymns is marked by great stylistic variation and rhetorical elaboration, depending on the writer's object of praise and his conception of the relation of style to content. The definitive survey of this trad. remains to be written.

See ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, POETRY OF; EGYPT, POETRY OF; GREEK POETRY; HEBREW POETRY; INDIA, POETRY OF; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; LATIN POETRY; LAUDA; SUMERIAN POETRY.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: Analecta hymnica medii aevi (1886–1922); Early Latin Hymns, ed. A. Walpole (1922); Mystical Hymns of Orpheus, trans. T. Taylor (1896); Lyra Graeca, ed. and trans. J. Edmonds, 3 v. (1922); Proclus's Biography, Hymns, and Works, trans. K. Guthrie (1925); Poeti Latini del Quattrocento, ed. F. Arnaldi et al. (1964); Hymni latini antiquissimi XXV, ed. W. Bulst (1975); Hymns for the Family of God, ed. F. Bock (1976); New Oxford Book of Christian Verse, ed. D. Davie (1981); English Hymns of the Nineteenth Century, ed. R. Arnold (2004).

■ Criticism and History: G. M. Dreves, Aurelius Ambrosius (1893); R. Wünsch, "Hymnos," Pauly-Wissowa, esp. 2.119, 3.145 ff.; Manitius; "Psalters," Dictionary of Hymnology, ed. J. Julian, 2d ed., 2 v. (1907); L. Benson, Hymnody of the Christian Church (1927); P. Von Rohr-Sauer, English Metrical Psalms from 1600 to 1660 (1938); O. A. Beckerlegge, "An Attempt at a Classification of Charles Wesley's Metres," London Quarterly Review 169 (1944); H. Smith, "English Metrical Psalms in the Sixteenth Century and Their Literary Significance," Huntington Library Quarterly 9 (1946); R. E. Messenger, The Medieval Latin Hymn (1953); Raby, Christian; Reallexikon II 1.736–41; Bowra; L. Benson, The English Hymn (1962); J. Szövérffy, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung, 2 v. (1964–65); C. Maddison, Marcantonio Flaminio (1966); H. Gneuss, Hymnar und Hymnen im englischen Mittelalter (1968); P. Rollinson, "Renaissance of the Literary Hymn," Renaissance Papers (1968); C. Freer, Music for a King (1971); J. Szövérffy, Iberian Hymnody: Survey and Problems (1971); J. Ijsewijn, Companion to Neo-Latin Studies (1977); J. Szövérffy, Guide to Byzantine Hymnography (1978); Menander Rhetor, ed. and trans. D. Russell and N. Wilson (1981); J. Szövérffy, Religious Lyrics of the Middle Ages: Hymnological Studies and Collected Essays (1983); P. S. Diehl, The Medieval European Religious Lyric (1985); J. Szövérffy, Concise History of Medieval Latin Hymnody (1985); and Latin Hymns (1989);W. D. Furley, "Praise and Persuasion in Greek Hymns," JHS 115 (1995); D. Sheerin, "Hymns," Medieval Latin, ed. F.A.C. Mantello and A. G. Rigg (1996); M. Depew, "Enacted and Represented Dedications: Genre and Greek Hymn," Matrices of Genre, ed. M. Depew and D. D. Obbink (2000); C. Léglu, Between Sequence and Sirventes (2000); J. R. Watson, "Hymn," A Companion to Victorian Poetry, ed. R. Cronin, A. Chapman, A. H. Harrison (2002); Sapientia et Eloquentia, ed. G. Iversen and N. Bell (2009).

P. Rollinson

HYPALLAGE (Gr., "exchange"). A device of syntactic displacement that changes the reference of words in syntagms or sentences: a word, instead of referring to the word it logically qualifies, is made to refer to some other. As such, hypallage is one species of *hyperbaton. Henry Peacham, the Tudor rhetorician, writes, "Open the day and see if it be the window." Shakespeare found many uses for the device; many of them exhibit, in the misplacing of the words, mental disturbance or confusion or (witty) dimness of wit. Bottom, appropriately, has several, incl. "I see a voice. Now will I to the chink, / To spy and I can hear my Thisby's face" (A Midsummer Night's Dream 5.1.189–90). Hypallage indicates the speaker's mental confusion in Slender's remark, "All his successors (gone before him) hath done't; and all his ancestors (that come after him) may" (Merry Wives of Windsor 1.1.13). The most common example of hypallage is the transferred epithet, a figure characteristic of Virgil, Edmund Spenser, Shakespeare, and John Milton, which has some effects of *personification. Lausberg, discussing "die metonymischen Epitheta," distinguishes syntactical and other varieties, e.g., Caesar's "This was the most unkindest cut of all" (Julius Caesar 3.3.188) and Othello's "Alas what ignorant sin have I committed?" (4.2.70). T. S. Eliot has "Winter kept us warm, covering/Earth in forgetful snow" (The Waste Land). We would today be tempted to call many examples spoonerisms.

■ M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); Lanham; Lausberg; Morier; A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982).

R. O. Evans; T.V.F. Brogan; A. W. Halsall

HYPERBATON. A technical term from the cl. art of rhet., hyperbaton is a generic name for a variety of figures of speech that transpose words within a sentence. Figures contained under the umbrella of hyperbaton include anastrophe (transposition of two words in a sentence); *hysteron proteron (syntax or sense placed out of logical or temporal order); *hypallage (transposition of the natural relationship between two elements in a proposition); *tmesis (separation of a compound word by the insertion of another word); and *parenthesis (insertion of a word, phrase, or sentence into an already complete sentence), among others. These figures deviate from ordinary word order by means of reversal, transposition, and interruption; together they constitute some of the most widely used rhetorical devices in poetry. Although hyperbaton is more common in Gr. and Lat. writing than in noninflected langs. that depend on word order for sense, poets writing in the Eur. vernaculars have nevertheless made frequent use of its constructions. Through syntactical displacements, hyperbaton may emphasize a particular word or idea, convey an emotional state, or fulfill the demands of poetic meter. The result may be humorous—as in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, when Bottom cries, "I see a voice. Now will I to the chink, / To spy and I can hear my Thisby's face"—as well as lyrical—as in Emily Dickinson's poem, "From cocoon forth a butterfly / As lady from her door / Emerged—."

Longinus offers the most extensive ancient discussion of hyperbaton, calling the figure "the truest mark of vehement emotion." According to this view, the figure imitates the speech of a person who has been carried away by a violent feeling: "while under the stress of their excitement, like a ship before a veering wind, they lay their words and thoughts first on one tack then another, and keep altering the natural order of sequence into innumerable variations" (Peri hypsous [On the Sublime]). Such a conception of hyperbaton indicates how the figure could be included in the list of syntactical displacements through which psychoanalytic crit. reads the unconscious intentions of the subject (Lacan). However, although hyperbaton may imitate the natural speech of a person afflicted with great emotion, cl. theory understands it to be the product of rhetorical technique. Quintilian claims that, without figures such as hyperbaton, lang. would be "rough, harsh, limp, or disjointed," with words "constrained as their natural order demands" (Institutio oratoria).

Like other rhetorical figures, definitions of hyperbaton rely upon an idea of ordinary, natural, or normal lang. against which its lexical transpositions can become legible. The Gr. word literally means "to overstep," and Lat. and Eng. trans. of hyperbaton—such as transgressio and "the trespasser"—convey its association with acts of transgression (Quintilian, Institutio oratoria; George Puttenham, Arte of English Poesie). This thematic of transgression can become a part of the figure's meaning in a poetic context, as when Edmund Spenser uses hyperbaton to describe the actions of a deceitful man in bk. 6 of The Faerie Queene:

> For to maligne, t'envie, t'use shifting slight,
> Be arguments of a vile donghill mind,
> Which what it dare not doe by open might,
> To worke by wicked treason wayes doth find,
> By such discourteous deeds discovering his base kind.

The grammatical disorders of hyperbaton may also imply a corresponding social disorder, as suggested in Winston Churchill's reputed comment to an officious newspaper editor: "This is the kind of impertinence up with which I will not put." Hyperbaton is rarely used today as a term of literary analysis, as deviations in word order now seem coincident with poetic lang. itself, rather than a particular form of figuration.

See ORNAMENT, RHETORIC AND POETRY, SCHEME.

■ J. Lacan, "The Insistence of the Letter in the Unconscious," YFS 36–37 (1966); H. Weil, The Order of Words in the Ancient Languages Compared With That of the Modern Languages (1978); B. Vickers, In Defense of Rhetoric (1988); B. Dupriez, A Dictionary of Literary Devices (1991); Lanham; G. Burton, "Silva Rhetoricae" (rhetoric.byu.edu).

J. C. MANN

HYPERBOLE (Gr., "throwing beyond"). Hyperbole is a figure of speech marked by flagrant exaggeration. From Deut. 1:28 where "cities are fortified to heaven" to Virgil's "Twin rocks that threaten heaven" (Aeneid 1.162) to Shakespeare's "it smells to heaven" (Hamlet 3.3), hyperbole is common across all lits. Isocrates invokes the trope by name, calling his subject "a god among men" (Evagoras 72). Aristotle recognized it as a type of metaphor and suggested it demonstrates a vehemence associated with youth or anger (Rhetoric 1413a). Quintilian identifies it with comic wit as "an elegant straining of the truth" (Institutio oratoria 8.6.67).

Because hyperbole pushes comparison past simple credibility, the Ren. critic George Puttenham designated it as a figure of "immoderate excesse" and dubbed it the "over reacher" (The Arte of English Poesie 3.7). Though the suitability of diction to subject matter has been a primary topic among critics from antiquity to today, the distortion of truth in hyperbole is instantly recognizable. Hyperbole succeeds by making propositions that are either impossible—"What is he . . . whose phrase of sorrow / Conjures the wandering stars, and makes them stand / Like wonder-wounded hearers?" (Ham. 5.1)—or that are linked to a "comparative absolute": "Zenocrate, the loveliest maid alive, / Fairer than rocks of pearl and precious stone" (Christopher Marlowe's Tamburlaine, 1.1.3). The use of hyperbole in drama produces different effects from those it produces in poetry; overextension may be less tolerable in a poetic speaker than a tragic protagonist, for whom the added dimension of action may be measured against expression in ways unavailable to the poet.

Hyperbole achieves its end by a seeming contradiction, as a truth is nonetheless understood somewhere short of the false mark. Beyond speech, it is considered a "figure of thought" and is related to the forms of understatement *litotes and *meiosis.

■ G. Genette, "Hyperboles," Figures I (1966); G. V. Stanivukovic, "'Mounting above the Truthe': On Hyperbole in English Renaissance Literature," Forum for Modern Language Studies 43 (2007).

K. MCFADDEN

HYPERMETRIC (Gr., "beyond the measure"). A line that has at least one extra syllable that is not part of the regular metrical pattern. The term is used in two distinct ways in cl. poetry. In lyric meters, particularly *ionics, hypermetric refers to a line that has one or more extra syllables at its beginning (see ANACRUSIS). The second application of the term is to an extra syllable at the end of the line. This extra syllable, however, elides with the initial syllable of the next line so that, prosodically, the extra final syllable is not counted. A line that does have an extra felt syllable at the end is properly called hypercatalectic. An elided final syllable is relatively common in lyric but very rare in epic. Because it does not occur in Gr. hexameter, its appearance in some 20 lines of Virgil's poetry has attracted considerable attention.

In OE poetry, the term denotes a half line expanded by means of an additional stress (see ENGLISH PROSODY, GERMANIC PROSODY). In OE poetry, particularly in Beowulf, hypermetric lines have occasioned considerable prosodic dispute. Attempts have been made to find a theoretical origin for the practice of hypermetrics, as well as to construct a taxonomy for hypermetric lines, studying, among other things, the relationship between extra stresses and patterns of *alliteration.

■ Sievers; A. J. Bliss, The Metre of "Beowulf," 2d ed. (1962); J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of "Beowulf," 2d ed. (1966); Brogan; West; G. Russom, Old English Meter and Metric Theory (1987); G. P. Goold, "Hypermeter and Elision in Virgil," Vertis in usum, ed. J. F. Miller, C. Damon, and K. S. Myers (2002); T. A. Bredhoft, "The Three Varieties of Old English Hypermeter Versification," N & Q 50 (2003).

R. A. HORNSBY; T.V.F. BROGAN; D. KUTZKO

HYPOGRAM (Gr., "subscription" or "something written below"; de Man trans., "sub-text or, better, infra-text"). Hypogram came into use among 20th-c. semioticians to describe the "theme-word" (mot-thème) or absent text, seme, or presupposition that furnishes a nucleus from which a poem's "given" structure (see MATRIX) takes its form. According to the hypothesis guiding Ferdinand de Saussure's study of Lat. verse between 1906 and 1909, words, names, or clichés hide below the surface of a text, identifiable only by distributions of ungrammatical phonemic features in the surface text. Saussure variously employed the terms anagram, paragram, and hypogram to describe this encoded dissemination of a key term, reserving the latter esp. for the instance of a proper name or master word (as when the name Pindarus is dispersed through the opening verses of the Aeneid). Saussure may first have theorized the hypogram in work on Vedic hymns and subsequently discovered them in a trans-historical range of Gr. and Lat. poetry from *Saturnian verse to Angelo Poliziano. He searched for but found no cl. doctrine governing the use of hypograms; rebuffed by the few contemporaries he queried about their existence (incl. It. poet Giovanni Pascoli, perhaps the last celebrated Lat. versifier), Saussure abandoned his search. Saussure's notions, which contradicted his contemporaneous theory of the arbitrariness of the ling. sign (l'arbitraire du signe), were both ridiculed and mythologized by commentators after the rediscovery of his notebooks in the 1960s and subjected to the critique that the limited phonetic distribution of a particular lang. made it possible to find unlimited patterns absent of authorial intention. For such critics, Saussurean hypograms are the result of subjective modes of reading, rather than intrinsic aspects of a text discoverable by an empirical method.

Nevertheless, semioticians in the 1970s, esp. Riffaterre, shifted and extended the definition of hypogram to describe the way in which any poem is produced around an absent semantic nucleus. Whereas Saussure stressed a particular keyword distributed phonemically throughout the text, Riffaterre described the hypogram as a "unit of readable meaning susceptible of grammatical predication." When hunger, e.g., is granted as the hypogrammatic nucleus of Arthur Rimbaud's poem "Fêtes de la faim" or nothing in Stéphane Mallarmé's "–yx" sonnet, the poem's many ungrammatical features become intelligible. The purpose of the poem is not to reveal the hypogram but to hide it. Reading practices defined by a search for a hypogram substitute figurative elaboration for referential reading. De Man considered Riffaterre's to be "the most reliable didactic model" in its day, but Culler observes that Riffaterre's reduction of poetic structure to a game or experiment ("a calisthenics of words") can diminish *interpretation into the puzzling out of a proper "solution." Hypogrammatic interpretation has also been called "cipher-type montage" and has a legacy in the compositions of the contemp. Fr. poet Jacques Roubaud.

See SEMIOTICS AND POETRY.

■ T. Blount, Glossographia (1656); F. de Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale, ed. C. Bally and A. Sechehaye [1916], trans. W. Baskin (1974); J. Starobinski, Les Mots sous les mots: Les anagrammes de Ferdinand de Saussure, trans. O. Emmet (1979); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); J. Culler, The Pursuit of Signs (1981); D. Shepheard, "Saussure's Vedic Anagrams," MLR 77 (1982); P. de Man, "Hypogram and Inscription," The Resistance to Theory (1986); W. Gordon and H. Schogt, "Ferdinand de Saussure: The Anagrams and the Cours," The Emergence of the Modern Language Sciences, ed. S. Embleton et al. (1999); J.-J. Thomas and S. Winspur, Poeticized Language: The Foundations of Contemporary French Poetry (1999); S. Metzidakis, "Replacing Literary History: With Hypograms or Paragrams?" L'Esprit Créateur 49 (2009).

H. FEINSOD

HYPOMETRIC (Gr.; "less than a measure"). Poetic forms lacking in prosodic fullness in relation to the norm; contrast *hypermetric. The nature of the lack varies from *prosody to prosody. Quantitative: in Amores 1, Ovid wittily announces he set out to write of heroic matters in *hexameters, but Love stole a foot from every other line—so yielding the *elegiac distich he had in mind all along. Accentual: Shakespeare's sonnet 145 is in *iambic *tetrameter rather than in the conventional *pentameter—the only hypometric sonnet in the sequence. Syllabic: early Japanese poetry often used lines shorter or longer than the normal fives and sevens; from about the 9th c., however, the hypermetric (ji amari) was allowed, whereas the hypometric (ji tarazu) was proscribed, a rule followed rigorously until recent times. *Catalexis, by contrast, refers to a specific line or colon short on its end in an otherwise regular poem.

See ACEPHALOUS.

E. MINER

HYPORCHEMA (Gr., pl. hyporchemata). Gr. choral song accompanied by dancing. Hyporchema was supposed to have been invented by Thaletas of Gortyn in Crete (7th c. BCE), but Athenaeus found its origins in Homer (cf. Odyssey 8.261 ff.). It was characterized by its use of *cretic measures. As a hymn, the hyporchema was akin to the *paean in honor of Apollo, as it was later to the *dithyramb in praise of Dionysus. Pindar, e.g., wrote both hyporchemata and paeans. In *tragedy, the term was applied by Eucleides, an authority cited by Tzetzes, to lyric passages where the chorus was evidently dancing. Consequently, some mod. scholars have unnecessarily imagined it as a kind of lively *stasimon, e.g., in several passages of Sophocles, where jubilation of the chorus at the arrival of glad tidings is followed by the catastrophe of the play.

■ E. Diehl, "Hyporchema," Pauly-Wissowa; Schmid and Stählin; A. M. Dale, Collected Papers (1969)—esp. ch. 3; R. Seaford, "The Hyporchema of Pratinas," Maia 29 (1977–78); Michaelides; A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, The Dramatic Festivals of Athens, 2d ed. (1989).

R. J. GETTY; T.V.F. BROGAN

HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS. Contrasting ways of connecting clauses or phrases, whether in prose or in verse. In a hypotactic style, one specifies the logical relationships among elements, rendering the entailments and dependencies among them explicit by placing them in a hierarchy of levels of grammatical subordination. The main clause is connected to the dependent elements by subordinating conjunctions (while, because, if, etc.) or by relative pronouns (who, which, that, etc.). Hypotaxis also may extend beyond the sentence boundary, in which case the term refers to a style in which the logical relationships among sentences are explicitly rendered.

In a paratactic style, the logical relationships among elements are not specified but are left to be inferred by the reader. Within the sentence, a paratactic style may connect clauses or phrases at the same grammatical level with coordinating conjunctions (employing *polysyndeton) or without coordinating conjunctions (employing *asyndeton). The relationships among sentences can be paratactic as well, as in Caesar's famous claim, "veni, vidi, vici."

Hypotaxis and parataxis are each capable of varied poetic uses. Because hypotactic styles specify the logical connections among their elements, they lend themselves to establishing the sense that the main poetic idea has been meditated upon and seen from all its angles. Hypotaxis can also suggest that the speaker is somewhat detached from the immediacy of the action, perhaps to enable a deeper purchase upon its nature or a more reflective account of its meaning. Finally, a hypotactic style lends itself to registering qualifications, hesitations, and mixed feelings since it provides the grammatical means of weighing conflicting moments against each other.

Parataxis, by contrast, is esp. suited to rendering thoughts and actions from the urgent perspective of a participant caught in the immediate flow of events. As a hypotactic style lends itself naturally to an analytical point of view, so a paratactic style lends itself naturally to the rush and chaos of life as it is lived in the immediate first-person. A hypotactic style sometimes indicates the desire to evaluate the subject of the poem with a this-worldly intellect; a paratactic style sometimes indicates the desire to gain poetic access to the otherworldly power readers associated with archaic or primitive texts.

Because it leaves the logical relationship among terms unspecified, a paratactic style is useful in circumstances where the meaning of an event or the nature of its connections should be suggested by the author or inferred by the reader, as in the "subverted metaphors" frequently employed in haiku (see JAPAN, MODERN POETRY OF) or in pantun, where the relationship between two observations (in the first form) or between two couplets (in the second) is implied but unstated. The tendency to leave the connections implicit also makes possible a slightly different relationship between author and reader since the author does not so much explain a thought as require the reader to achieve that thought by a leap of imagination. Thus, parataxis is particularly useful when a meaning is designed to be shown rather than said, as in the famous example of Ezra Pound's "In a Station of the Metro." That the connections must be suggested rather than defined makes a paratactic style also capable of implying that the poem registers a power beyond its ability to articulate, that it sees its elements as brightly lit particulars that direct the attention into a fraught and unspeakable background where the power of the narration is, as in the Abraham episode in Genesis (in Auerbach's famous reading of that episode in Mimesis), a function of the disparity between the terseness of the narration and the immensity and obscurity of the ultimate subject of that narration. Auerbach says of this kind of parataxis that "it is precisely the absence of causal connective, the naked statement of what happens—the statement which replaces deduction and comprehension by an amazed beholding that does not even seek to comprehend—which gives this sentence its grandeur."

Many interesting effects can be achieved by playing the tone against the grain of the syntax. In a letter to Sidney Cox in 1915, Robert Frost jeered at "Solway Ford" by Wilfred Gibson, noting that if one were to "look at the way the sentences run on," one would discover that "they are not sentences at all in my sense of the word." Clearly, Frost did not mean that the sentences were ungrammatical but that they did not have what he calls the "sentence sound," the unmistakable syntactic tang of living utterance. Part of the problem seems to be the unintentionally comic disparity between the syntax of the passage and its intended tone. The poem turns on a moment of violence in which the protagonist's horse rears and breaks free, overturning his wagon upon him and leaving him pinned beneath it, to await the incoming tide by which he will be drowned. Gibson is horrified by the scene and wishes us to feel that horror. But the sentence in which this violent action is rendered is a stately, complexly hypotactic word temple. The effect of adopting a hypotactic rather than a paratactic syntax is to distance the observer and the poet from the action. One might imagine wishing to do so for purposes of irony, but it is hard to see irony in the long sentence that Gibson actually wrote, which begins, "The empty wain made slowly over the sand." Compare, for instance, the syntax in the moment of violent action in Wilfred Owen's "Dulce et Decorum Est," in which a column of retreating British soldiers during World War I is suddenly caught up in a barrage of gas shells. In the passage beginning "Gas! GAS! Quick, boys!" the sentences are long, but the syntax is intensely paratactic. Later in the poem, Owen adopts a pointedly hypotactic syntax, meant to reflect bitterly not only upon the distance between the civilian's point of view and the soldier's but also upon the meaning of the heritage of cl. eloquence summed up in Horace's motto that it is sweet and fitting to die for one's country. Frost himself renders the chainsaw accident in "Out, Out—" in surprisingly hypotactic lang.; but in that poem, the tension between the syntax and the meaning is meant to capture the speaker's inability to come to terms with the violence of the scene. Unlike Gibson, Frost is well aware of the strangeness of the syntax he uses, and he exploits it to give a nightmarish unreality to the moment of the accident. Although the sentences are quite short, they all seem to be fragments of a longer hypotactic sentence the speaker cannot get straight.

Paratactic styles are often underlined by anaphora (repeated words or phrases at the beginning of sentences or verses). Anaphora is particularly characteristic of folk or archaic styles of narration—the Bible, say, or the Child ballads. Anaphora often places events in a flow of rhapsody where the coherence of the passage is provided not by articulating the logical connections among the events but by tapping into the sense that this story has been retold so often that its inevitabilities go without saying. Anaphora initiates a flow of eloquence that presumably can just keep on going—it may not articulate the relationships among the successive objects, but it places them in a context of unending rhetorical abundance. Walt Whitman's anaphoric catalogs are a good example of the alliance between parataxis and anaphora.

See ANAPHORA, CATALOG.

■ Auerbach; T. W. Adorno, "Parataxis: Zur späten Lyrik Hölderlins," Gesammelte Schriften, ed. R. Tiedemann and H. Schweppenhäuser, v. 11 (1974); R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (1981); J. L. Jugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry (1981); A. Easthope, Poetry as Discourse (1983); R. Silliman, The New Sentence (1987); F. Jameson, Postmodernism, or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); B. Perelman, The Marginalization of Poetry (1996); L. Hejinian, The Language of Inquiry (2000); Lord.

J. BURT

HYSTERON PROTERON (Gr., "the latter [as] the earlier"). A specific type of *hyperbaton or syntactic dislocation: the figure in which the natural order of time in which events occur is reversed, usually because the later event is considered more important than the former, e.g., Xenophon, "trophe kai genesis" (Memorabilia 3.5.10)—in William Shakespeare's phrase, "for I was bred and born"; and Virgil, "Moriamur et in media arma ruamus" (Aeneid 2.353)—"Let us die and rush into battle." George Puttenham, recalling the Eng. proverb "the cart before the horse," calls it "the preposterous" (Arte of English Poesie, 1589) but distinguishes between effective and ludicrous examples. Hysteron proteron may also represent inversion of the social or natural order: "How wild a Hysteron Proteron's this, which Nature crosses, / And far above the top the bottom tosses" (Joseph Beaumont, Psyche 1.85). But in poetry, the device may be highly effective without seeming preposterous, as in P. B. Shelley's "I die! I faint! I fail! ("The Indian Serenade"). Compare the logical fallacy of petitio principii.

■ S. E. Bassett, "H. P. Homerikos," HSCP 31 (1920); Lausberg; P. Parker, Shakespeare from the Margins (1996), chap. 1.

R. O. EVANS; A. WATSON

I

IAMBE. A Fr. satiric poem of variable length in rimes croisées (abab cdcd, etc.), in which *alexandrines alternate throughout with *octosyllables. The iambe, whose name is rooted in the satirical trad. going back to the bitter iambics of the Gr. poet Archilochus (fl. 648 BCE), came into Fr. as a generic term with the posthumous publication of the Iambes of André Chénier (1762–94) and Les Iambes (1830–31) of Auguste Barbier. Isolated examples of the form are also to be found in Victor Hugo ("La Reculade," Les Châtiments) and Théophile Gautier ("Débauche," Premières poésies). Violent contrasts in rhythm from line to line make the Fr. iambe a remarkably appropriate vehicle for satire; the brevity of the octosyllable interrupts the amplitude of the alexandrine with a sense of urgency and exasperation; the broad, oratorical movement of the longer line gives way to the looser rhythms and private voice tones of the shorter one:

> Nul ne resterait donc . . .
> Pour cracher sur leurs noms, pour chanter leur supplice?
> Allons, étouffe tes clameurs;
> Souffre, ô coeur gros de haine, affamé de justice.
> Toi, Vertu, pleure si je meurs.
>
> (A. Chénier, Iambes XI)

■ T. de Banville, Petit traité de poésie française (1872); Kastner; A. Chénier, Oeuvres complètes (1958); M. Grammont, Le Vers français, rev. ed. (1961), and Petit traité de versification française, 10th ed. (1982).

A. G. Engstrom; C. Scott; D. Evans

IAMBIC (Gr. iambos; Ger. Jambus). The chief meter in most cl. and mod. prosody. Iambic meter is based on the iamb, a metrical *foot consisting of a short or unstressed syllable followed by a long or stressed syllable. In Lat. poetry, the iamb was comprised of this short and long syllable pair; in Gr. it was a *metron consisting of this plus a preceding *anceps and long syllable: x – ⏑ –. The word iambos (pl. iamboi) first appears in Archilochus and is used for a distinct genre of poetry, namely, *invective; this generic association was carried into Roman times. The name for the meter thus derived from the genre with which it was originally associated, not vice versa. Originally, the word iambic may have arisen from occasions on which ritual songs (some of them lampoons) were sung and danced. Archilochus uses iambic metra in *trimeters, *tetrameters, and *epodes; and the Ionian poets who preferred it have come to be known as "iambographers."

Iambic was thought in antiquity to be the rhythm nearest to common speech. Throughout Gr. and Lat. poetry, iambic in trimeter and tetrameter is the standard meter for recitation forms, esp. dramatic *dialogue. The Lat. iambic dimeter became, with Augustine, Ambrose, and Hilary of Poitiers, the standard line for the early Christian *hymn, making it perhaps the chief meter of the Middle Ages and the ancestor of the mod. tetrameter, very important in Rus., and second only to the pentameter in Eng. and Ger. The same claim has been made in mod. times about Eng. as was made by the ancients about Gr. (Aristotle, Rhetoric, bk. 3)—namely, that iambic is the rhythm of common speech.

This view—that much poetry is iambic because lang. is iambic—may be bolstered by the recognition that iambic rhythm is, more simply, an alternating pattern and that, given any system of two values (on-off, long-short, stressed-unstressed), alternation is the simplest pattern capable of being generated. On the other hand, alternation clearly describes *trochaic meters just as well as it does iambic. Several important psychological experiments in the 20th c. showed that when auditors are presented with an alternating series of weak and strong tones that are perfectly isochronous (equidistant), they invariably hear them as grouped into binary units—i.e., iambic or trochaic, most often trochaic. When the intensity of the stress is increased, the units are perceived as trochaic. When the stress, or the interval after the stress, is lengthened, the units are perceived as iambic. In general, when intervals are irregular, the series will be heard as trochaic. More recently, Hayes has claimed that the apparent asymmetry between iambs and trochees is based on an extralinguistic principle of rhythmic grouping called the iambic/trochaic law. According to this model, the basic properties of rhythmic structure may determine ling. stress.

All these experiments report on only primary (simple) rhythmic series and not on lang. In contrast, it has also been argued that lang. itself is in fact a secondary rhythmic series where multiple rhythms are enacted, and interact, across the same space simultaneously. When the events are words, lang. imposes a secondary or counterrhythm on top of the phonological rhythm of stresses and unstresses that is morphological and syntactic (see RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM); here, word types and word boundaries matter. Morphological factors have been shown to be real and important forces in cl. meters (see BRIDGE). We must realize that readers' and auditors' perceptions of lines as "iambic" or "trochaic" depend on both phonotactics and morphotactics within the metrical frame. Trochaic rhythms are sensitive to (1) the word shapes used to fill the pattern (trochaic words are needed frequently) and (2) alteration of the beginnings or ends of the sequences (*catalexis is important), whereas iambic rhythms seem not to be sensitive to either. *Anacrusis is common in iambic verse but virtually impossible in trochaic, catalexis is unusual, and word shapes are largely immaterial—iambic verse accepts virtually any. Halpern argues persuasively that iambic meter is a more complex and subtle meter because it is capable of effects of modulation not possible in any other meter, whether trochaic, ternary, or purely accentual. Iambic meter, i.e., is not the reverse of trochaic but rather in its own class altogether.

Disruption of an iambic meter might seem attainable in several ways: extra stresses in the line, missing stresses in the line, or extra unstressed syllables without loss of stresses (extra syllables). But iambic generally tolerates occasional extra syllables and dislocations of stress placement very well, esp. at major syntactic boundaries such as the beginning of the line and the *caesura. In general, contiguous stresses are the most serious problem for iambic meters. The general principles of rhythm apply: as long as the reader's perceptual frame, the "metrical set," is not broken, considerable variation is possible. Further, the lang. has an efficient mechanism for demoting heavy contiguous stresses and for promoting weak stresses in runs of unstressed syllables so as to even out the rhythm. Older prosodists who advocated the notion of trochaic "substitutions" in iambic verse perhaps failed to grasp that such feet are not trochaic; so long as the iambic metrical set is preserved, they are perceived as complications, not violations. This suggests that the terms iambic and trochaic should be applied only to meters, not units of meters.

Several important poets have felt that iambic rhythm is tyrannous: Ezra Pound observed that "the god damn iamb magnetizes certain verbal sequences" (Letters 1950); for the vers-librists and imagists, then, "to break the pentameter, that was the first heave" (Canto 81), and the means were "to compose in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in sequence of a metronome" ("A Few Dont's by an Imagiste" [1913]), means Pound claimed to have found in *Occitan poetry and Chinese. Breaking the iambic rhythm is precisely the effect G. M. Hopkins sought to achieve with *"sprung rhythm."

Various iambic meters have now been identified both in poetry and in common speech patterns (by literary scholars and linguists, respectively) across a diverse range of lang. contexts, incl. Korean, Somali, Paumari, and Hungarian.

See BINARY AND TERNARY; DIPODISM, DIPODIC VERSE; PYRRHIC; SPONDEE.

■ J. M. Edmonds, Elegy and Iambus (1931); A. D. Knox, "The Early Iambus," Philologus 87 (1932); E. Pound, "Treatise on Metre," ABC of Reading (1934); H. Woodrow, "Time Perception," Handbook of Experimental Psychology, ed. S. Stevens (1951); J. Thompson, "Sir Philip and the Forsaken Iamb," KR 20 (1958); Maas; M. Halpern, "On the Two Chief Metrical Modes in English," PMLA 77 (1962); D. W. Cummings and J. Herum, "Metrical Boundaries and Rhythm-Phrases," MLQ 28 (1967); Dale; M. L. West, Studies in Greek Elegy and Iambus (1974); P. Fraisse, Psychologie du rythme (1974); G. Nagy, "Iambos: Typologies of Invective and Praise," Arethusa 9 (1976); Halporn et al.; Brogan; M. L. West, Introduction to Greek Metre (1987); J. Thompson, The Founding of English Metre, 2d ed. (1989); B. Hayes, Metrical Stress Theory (1995); G. Powell, "The Two Paradigms for Iambic Pentameter and Twentieth-Century Metrical Experimentation," MLR 91 (1996); M. J. Duffell, "'The Craft So Long to Lerne': Chaucer's Invention of the Iambic Pentameter," Chaucer Review 34 (2000); Iambic Ideas, ed. A. Cavarzere, A. Aloni, and A. Barchiesi (2001); Formal Approaches to Poetry, ed. B. E. Dresher and N. Friedberg (2006); Duffell.

T.V.F. BROGAN; S. S. BILL

IAMBIC SHORTENING or brevis brevians (Lat., "a short syllable shortening"). A linguistic phenomenon whose consequences are of special importance for the metrics of early Lat. poetry. In the syllabic series ⏑ – or ⏑ – x, the syllable immediately preceding or following the natural word accent may be counted short; thus ⏑́ – may become ⏑́ ⏑, as in Terence, Eunuchus 8: ex Graecis bŏnīs, where the final syllable of bonis (naturally long) counts as short because the word accent falls on bo-; or ⏑ – x́; may become ⏑ ⏑ x́, as in Terence, Eunuchus 22: stratus măgĭstrátus, where the second syllable of magistratus though long counts as short because the natural word accent falls on the following a. A short monosyllable, or a disyllable with the first syllable short and the second elided, can alter a following long to a short, e.g., Plautus, Aulularia 483: ĕt īllae. It is then a phenomenon of juncture (sandhi) and involves more than a preceding short.

■ W. M. Lindsay, Early Latin Verse (1922); E. Fraenkel, Iktus und Akzent im lat. Sprechvers (1928); H. Drexler, Plautinische Akzent Forschungen, I, II (1932), index (1933); O. Skutsch, Prosodische und metrische Gesetze der lambenkürzung (1934); C. Questa, Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto (1967), 31–70; W. Mańczak, "Iambenkurzung im Latin," Glotta 46 (1968); Allen; A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, "Latin Prosody and Metre: Brevis Brevians," CP 75 (1980).

J. W. HALPORN

ICELAND, POETRY OF. (For information on Icelandic poetry before 1550, see NORSE POETRY.) Considering the difficult living and cultural conditions in Iceland after its literary peak in the 12th to 14th cs., and esp. the period from 1600 to 1800, with its severe cold, epidemics, famines, volcanic eruptions, and oppressive political conditions under Danish rule, it is remarkable that there was any Icelandic poetry at all at this time. Poetry's success was facilitated by a fairly high rate of literacy as well as an almost universal custom of composing, memorizing, and reciting verse.

Whether oral or literary, secular or religious, popular or learned, poetry was to remain the principal genre of Icelandic lit. for centuries after the Reformation in 1550, only giving way to works of prose in the late 19th and early 20th cs. One notable feature is Icelandic poets' use of *alliteration, a poetical device common to many Germanic literary trads. in the Middle Ages but surviving into the mod. period only in Iceland. Traditional alliteration was not seriously challenged until Icelandic modernists started advocating and practicing *free verse around the middle of the 20th c., and it is still used sporadically in mod. Icelandic poetry and lyrics.

The introduction of paper in the 16th c. had a greater impact on Icelandic poetry than two other phenomena from the same period, the introduction of Danish Lutheranism and printing (which was monopolized by the Church until 1772). Paper made it economically feasible for farmers and priests all over the country to copy mss., and through these copies, as well as extensive memorization, secular lit. was disseminated. The kenning-based, alliterative and rhymed narrative poetry known as rímur held sway over other kinds of secular poetry from the 14th to the 19th cs., whereas Lutheran *psalms came to prominence in religious poetry during the Reformation; their impact proved enduring.

Bishop Guðbrandur Þorláksson (ca. 1541–1627) laid the foundations for the reformed lit. of the country by publishing and commissioning psalms and other religious poetry. His Vísnabók (Book of Poems) of 1612 bears witness to the strength of the poetic trad. in Iceland. Whereas in countries such as Denmark and Germany clerical writings shaped the lang., in Iceland the Church had to rise to the level of the vernacular. Earlier trans. of Lutheran hymns into Icelandic had failed miserably in this respect. Bishop Guðbrandur thus enlisted the service of the best poets he knew for this volume, such as the Reverend Einar Sigurðsson (1538–1626), among whose poems is a tender *lullaby on the birth of Jesus, "Kvæði af stallinum Kristí" (Poem on Christ's Cradle) in the popular dance meter vikivaki. His son, the Reverend Ólafur Einarsson (1573–1659), also a notable poet, contributed a gloomy complaint on the times to Vísnabók. In a rare instance of poetic genius passing from parents to children through three generations, Ólafur's son, the Reverend Stefán Ólafsson (ca. 1619–88), became one of the leading poets of the 17th c. He wrote, as did his father, complaints on laborers and Icelandic sloth, as well as love lyrics and poems about the pleasures of tobacco, drink, and horses.

A poet who wrote little in this light, worldly vein was the Reverend Hallgrímur Pétursson (1614–74), indubitably the major poet of the 17th c. in Iceland. He did not, like Stefán Ólafsson, mock the common people, but he was not shy about attacking the ruling classes. After commenting on Pilate's error in consenting to Jesus' death in his 50-poem cycle Passíusálmar (Hymns of the Passion, 1666), Hallgrímur adds, "God grant that those in power over us avoid such monstrous offenses" (hymn 28). As a religious work, the Passíusálmar is unsurpassed in Icelandic lit. and a *baroque tour de force, full of striking imagery. An excellent shorter hymn, "Um dauðans óvissan tíma" (On the Uncertain Hour of Death), is still sung at funerals, a good example of the role that poetry of a high order has played in Icelandic life. Hallgrímur also wrote three rímur cycles and other secular poems, such as "Aldarháttur" (Way of the World), contrasting the degenerate present with the glorious period of the past Icelandic Commonwealth.

Two figures stand out in 18th c. Icelandic poetry. Jón Þorláksson (1744–1819) wrote several popular short poems, incl. one on a dead mouse in church ("Um dauða mús í kirkju"), and long trans. of Alexander Pope's Essay on Man, John Milton's Paradise Lost, and F. G. Klopstock's Messias, the latter two in fornyrðislag. Eggert Ólafsson (1726–68) was a child of the Enlightenment who, having studied natural hist. in Copenhagen and made a survey of Iceland, preached the beauty and usefulness of Icelandic nature in poems such as "Íslandssæla" (Iceland's Riches) and the long *georgic "Búnaðarbálkur" (Farming Poem).

This positive attitude toward Icelandic nature, along with a yearning for independence, became an important feature of Icelandic *romanticism, whose major poet is Jónas Hallgrímsson (1807–45). Apart from his lyrical descriptions of nature, which tend toward the *pastoral but also include sublime elements, as in "Ísland"—which begins "Iceland, frost-silvered isle! Our beautiful, bountiful mother!"—he is remembered for his poems on the pain of lost love and for his mastery of many poetic forms, incl. (for the first time in Iceland) the sonnet and terza rima. The other great romantic poet is Bjarni Thorarensen (1786–1841), who portrayed nature in *similes and *personifications and tended to glorify winter rather than summer, esp. in his poem "Veturinn" (Winter). He also raised a traditional Icelandic genre, the memorial poem, to a new height. Quite different from these Copenhagen-educated men is the poor folk poet and wood-carver Hjálmar Jónsson (1796–1875), known as Bólu-Hjálmar. His large body of verse includes personal invective, rímur, bitter complaints about poverty, and poems about death.

One of the greatest poets of the later 19th c. is Matthías Jochumsson (1835–1920), a free-thinking parson and newspaper ed. who wrote inspired lyrics, hymns, and memorial poems and also made masterful trans. of four of Shakespeare's tragedies. Around the turn of the century, Einar Benediktsson (1864–1940) was a powerful figure who, as a kind of latter-day Eggert Ólafsson, sought to improve Iceland by forming international corporations to mine gold and harness water power. He used lang. as he used wealth, to gain power, and his nature poems, like "Útsær" (Ocean), are rich with the imagery of opposing elements in nature and his view of the pantheistic force uniting all things.

As the 20th c. wore on, Icelandic poetry was pulled in two opposite directions, toward social engagement or a kind of realism on the one hand and introspective lyricism or *modernism on the other. A number of poets took sides in this respect, but some swung between the opposing poles throughout their careers. Steinn Steinarr (1908–58) came to the rapidly modernizing town of Reykjavík as a poor youth in the late 1920s, and in his first collection (1934), he produced poems of social protest, sympathizing with hungry workers who "don't understand / their own relationship / to their enemies." This same poem, "Veruleiki" (Reality), in free verse, goes beyond skepticism of the social order, however, to speak of the illusory nature of existence itself. This note of doubt, alienation, and nihilism later became predominant in Steinn's finely pruned, paradoxical poems, the longest and most highly regarded of which is the poetic cycle Tíminn og vatnið (Time and the Water, 1948), an enigmatic and symbolic meditation probably meant to be sensed rather than comprehended.

Many poets followed the example of the modernists of the 1950s—the so-called Atómskáld (Atom Poets) such as Sigfús Daðason (1928–96)—and tried to break with trad., experimenting with various poetic practices of modernism. Others tried to merge the mod. with the traditional in order to benefit from both. Hannes Pétursson (b. 1931) has produced sensitive and meticulously crafted lyrics on a variety of subjects incl. Icelandic folklore, historically charged Eur. locations (the prison camp at Dachau, the Strasburg cathedral), and cl. figures like Odysseus. He writes on such themes as the emptiness of lang. and humankind's separation from nature. His poetical cycle Heimkynni við sjó (Living by the Sea, 1980) marks a return to nature and a new awareness of surroundings and oneself, rendered through arresting images and metaphors. More often, however, the city shows itself to be the natural habitat of the mod. poet, as witnessed by the urbane and imaginative poetry of Kristján Karlsson (b. 1922) and Sigurður Pálsson (b. 1948). But Gyrðir Elíasson (b. 1961) has also proved that a fresh look at nature is still possible in postmod. times, tinged though it may be with romantic sympathies and otherworldly broodings.

Women were instrumental in transmitting and developing folk poetry through the centuries, but few became prominent as poets in their own right until the 20th c. Unnur Benediktsdóttir Bjarklind (1881–1946), who published under the pseud. Hulda, revived and developed such rhapsodic folk-poetry genres as þulur (sing. þula) and also became one of the main proponents of *symbolism (or neoromanticism) in Iceland. Another breakthrough in women's poetry came with the first volumes of the poems of Vilborg Dagbjartsdóttir (b. 1930), published in the 1960s. Since then, many Icelandic women have made their name as poets, with work ranging from the sensual lyricism of Nína Björk Árnadóttir (1941–2000) to the clear-eyed and socially engaged poetry of Ingibjörg Haraldsdóttir (b. 1942) to the poetical playfulness of Steinunn Sigurðardóttir (b. 1950).

■ Bibliographies: P. Mitchell and K. Ober, Bibliography of Modern Icelandic Literature in Translation, 3 v. (1975–97)—trans. of works since the Reformation to the late 20th c.

■ Criticism and History: A History of Icelandic Literature, ed. D. Neijmann (2006); Íslensk bókmenntasaga, ed. V. Ólason, H. Guðmundsson, and G. A. Thorsson, 5 v. (1993–2006); M. Eggertsdóttir, Barokkmeistarinn (2005)—Hallgrímur Pétursson and baroque poetry; S. Y. Egilsson, Arfur og umbylting (1999)—Jónas Hallgrímsson and Icelandic romanticism; E. Þorvaldsson, Atómskáldin (1980)—modernism in Iceland; Þ. Þorsteinsson, Ljóðhús (2007)—on Sigfús Daðason.

■ Primary Texts: Bishop Guðbrand's "Vísnabók" 1612, ed. S. Nordal (1937)—facsimile with Eng. intro.; Hymns of the Passion by Hallgrímur Pétursson, trans. A. C. Gook (1966); Íslenzkt ljóðasafn, ed. K. Karlsson, 6 v. (1974–78)—comprehensive anthol. of Icelandic poetry; Bard of Iceland: Jónas Hallgrímsson, Poet and Scientist, ed. and trans. D. Ringler (2002); Stúlka: Ljóð eftir íslenskar konur, ed. H. Kress, 2d ed. (2001)—an anthol. of poetry by Icelandic women; The Postwar Poetry of Iceland, trans. S. A. Magnússon (1982); Brushstrokes of Blue: The Young Poets of Iceland, ed. P. Valsson, trans. D. McDuff (1994).

R. Cook; S. Y. Egilsson

ICONICITY. A natural resemblance or analogy of form between a word (the signifier) and the object it refers to (the signified; see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). In the semiotics of C. S. Peirce, every sign mediates between its referent and a meaning; the relation among signifier, signified, and meaning is, in effect, triangular. Three types or modes of representation are recognized; hence, three possible relationships may obtain between the sign and its object. If the relation is cognitive (thought) but arbitrary, the sign is a symbol. Thought is carried on in terms of signs; hence, meaning itself is a sign relation. If the sign is in physical proximity to its object, then the sign is an index: smoke is an index of fire. If there is resemblance between sign and object, the sign is an icon: mimicry by a professional mime is iconic. Icons, like indexes, are not genuine or full-bodied signs for Peirce but are inferior, though they may be common or even prolific; icons "can represent nothing but Forms and Feelings."

Peirce's concept of iconicity is important because it refutes the traditional critical denigration of mimetic sound effects in poetry such as *onomatopoeia by showing that the mimetic function is a key component of the representational system itself. Mimetic effects in poetry may now be seen not as quaint aberrations or mere "poetical" devices but, rather, natural extensions of a process always at work in lang. Considerable ling. research in the 20th c. confirmed that iconicity operates at every level of lang. structure (phonology, morphology, syntax) and in virtually every known lang. worldwide. Beyond speech itself, iconicity also functions in visual representations of lang., e.g., sign lang. (particularly evident), and in several writing systems and writing-based picture-signs (*hieroglyph, *ideogram, phonogram, rebus). And verbal iconicity can be correlated with visual forms of iconicity in painting and poetic imagery.

In poetry, prosodic iconicity can be found operating at every level of the text, from a wide range of mimetic sound effects to expressive rhythms and "representative meter," to iconic syntax; and in the visual mode of the poem, from mimetic subgenres such as *concrete poetry to mimetic strategies of deployment in *free verse (see VISUAL POETRY).

See COGNITIVE POETICS; ICONOLOGY; MIMESIS; SEMIOTICS AND POETRY.

■ C. S. Peirce, Collected Papers, ed. C. Hartshorne and P. Weiss, 8 v. (1931–58); D. L. Bolinger, Forms of English (1965); R. W. Wescott, "Linguistic Iconism," Lang 47 (1971); S. Ullmann, "Natural and Conventional Signs," and T. Todorov, "Literature and Semiotics," The Tell-Tale Sign, ed. T. A. Sebeok (1975); T. A. Sebeok, "Ico-nicity," MLN 91 (1976); W. K. Wimsatt, "In Search of Verbal Mimesis," Day of the Leopards (1976); Y. Malkiel, "From Phonosymbolism to Morphosymbolism," Fourth LACUS Forum (1978), supp. by D. B. Justice, "Iconicity and Association," RPh 33 (1980); R. Cureton, "e e cummings: A Case Study of Iconic Syntax," Lang&S 14 (1981); J. N. Deely, "Antecedents to Peirce's Notion of Iconic Signs," Semiotics 1980, ed. M. Herzfeld and M. D. Lenhart (1982); J. Haiman, Natural Syntax: Iconicity and Erosion (1985); Iconicity in Syntax, ed. J. Haiman (1985); M. Nänny, "Iconic Dimensions in Poetry," On Poetry and Poetics, ed. R. Waswo (1985); W. Bernhart, "The Iconic Quality of Poetic Rhythm," Word and Image 2 (1986); W. Nöth, Handbook of Semiotics (1990); European Journal of English Studies 5.1 (2001)—spec. issue on iconicity; From Sign to Signing, ed. G. W. Müller et al. (2002); Outside-In-Inside-Out, ed. C. Maeder et al. (2005); M.-Y. Tseng, "Common Foundations of Metaphor and Iconicity," Cognitive Poetics. ed. G. Brône and J. Vandaele (2009); Signergy, ed. J. Conradie et al. (2010).

T.V.F. Brogan

ICONOLOGY. The study of icons (images, pictures, or likenesses). It is thus, as Gombrich argues in Art and Illusion, a "science" of images, which not only "investigates the function of images in allegory and symbolism" (see ALLEGORY, SYMBOL) but explores what we might call "the linguistics of the visual image," the fundamental codes and conventions that make iconic representation and communication possible. Iconology, thus, has links with philosophy, esp. the field of *semiotics or the general science of signs, as well as with psychology, particularly the analysis of visual perception (Arnheim) and the imaginary (see IMAGE, IMAGERY, IMAGINATION). More modestly, iconology may be described as a "rhetoric of images" in a double sense: first, as a study of "what to say about images"—e.g., the trad. of "art writing" that goes back to Philostratus's Imagines (ca. 220 CE) and is centrally concerned with the description and interpretation of a work of visual art; second, as a study of "what images say"—i.e., the ways in which images speak for themselves by persuading, telling stories, or describing states of affairs. Iconology also denotes a long trad. of theoretical and historical reflection on the concept of imagery, a trad. that, in its narrow sense, probably begins with such Ren. handbooks of symbolic imagery as Cesare Ripa's Iconologia (1592) and culminates in Panofsky's influential Studies in Iconology. In a broader sense, the critical study of the icon extends to theological and philosophical concepts such as the biblical concept of the imago dei, the notion that human beings are created "in the image and likeness" of God. The Platonic concept of the eikon crops up in the notion of eikasia (cf. Eng. "icastic"), the perception of images, appearances, and reflections (Republic 509e); in the theory of art, where it is linked with *mimesis (Republic 598e–99a; see IMITATION); and in basic models of being and knowing. Peters notes that, for Plato, "the visible universe is the eikon of the intelligible one."

The concept of the icon may best be understood as oscillating between a very general sense (the notion of "likeness" or "similitude") and a fairly specific reference to visual representations by means of likeness (e.g., paintings, statues, photographs). Peirce's semiotic theories and mod. ling. research provide the foundation for the mod. understanding of iconicity: in Peirce's theory, iconic signs include such things as algebraic equations, diagrams, phonetic mimicry, and sugar substitutes. The notion of the icon enters poetics in both its general and specific senses. Theories of *metaphor, figurative lang., and allegory, all of which involve the analysis of verbal analogies, similitudes, and comparisons, invoke the general sense of the icon as a relationship of likeness. The New Critical idea of the poem as a "verbal icon" (Wimsatt) whose formal structure incarnates its propositional content is the formalist version of poetic iconicity (see NEW CRITICISM). The more specific sense of the poetic icon conceives it as a poetic "image," not in the sense of similitude but as a verbal representation of a concrete (usually visual) object. Vivid descriptions of places, objects, works of art (see EKPHRASIS), and persons, while not themselves "iconic" in the general sense, are seen as eliciting mental images in the reader, evoking a kind of secondary visual representation. Sometimes the notion of an "iconic" poetic image may be reserved for highly charged symbolic objects (John Keats's urn, S. T. Coleridge's albatross), but it may equally well be applied to more common materials. Experimental genres such as *concrete poetry, pattern poetry, and *visual poetry that array the text into the visual shape of an object are of central interest for the ways they combine the general notion of iconic likeness with the specific strategies of visual representation.

Poetics often moves between these two senses without much critical self-awareness. Aristotle's Rhetoric (3.4) uses eikon in the general sense to denote comparison or *simile; Quintilian calls it a kind of comparison "which the Greeks call eikon and which expresses the appearance of things and persons" (Institutio oratoria 5.11.24); Henry Peacham defines icon as a "forme of speech which painteth out the image of a person or thing by comparing forme with forme, quality with quality, one likeness with another" (Garden of Eloquence, 1577). As the Ren. interest in the naming and classifying of stylistic and rhetorical devices waned, the term icon almost disappeared from poetics. The all-purpose term image took its place in poetic theory until the mod. revival of semiotics reopened the question of iconicity as a general problem.

Most early mod. studies of literary or poetic iconology, e.g., Tuve, are compilations of specific symbolic motifs (see also Aptekar, Frye, Landow, Ziolkowski). These studies, which generally attempt to reconstruct the meanings associated with particular visual images, might better be called "iconographies," reserving the term iconology for studies that raise more general questions about the conditions under which poetic images acquire meaning and of the nature of literary similitude, resemblance, and iconicity (see Panofsky, Bialostocki, and Mitchell for discussion of the distinction between iconography and iconology). Panofsky, most famously, treats iconography as a kind of dictionary of visual motifs that can be translated into words, reserving iconology for the larger sphere of the grammar, syntax, and even the ontology of images in their broad historical and cultural context. Most comparative studies of the "sister arts" of poetry and painting, regulated by the Horatian maxim ut pictura poesis*, are poetic "iconographies" that try to clarify the meaning of poems by reference to the pictorial scenes or works of art they describe. Iconology in its more general sense would raise questions about the status of iconic representation in the specific text, its genre, and its cultural context, as in Gilman's exemplary study, which not only provides a great deal of information about the iconographic resources of Eng. poetry in the 17th c. but situates these data in the context of the religious and political struggles over the relative value of visual and verbal representation.

Iconology, then, is not just the interdisciplinary study of imagery in a variety of media but a historical and theoretical inquiry into the nature of imagery, with special emphasis on the difference (as well as the similarity) between iconic and verbal representation. Images and words, despite their easy conflation in phrases like "poetic imagery" or "verbal icon," carry with them a hist. of radical differentiation, articulated in oppositions such as *nature and *convention, space and time, the eye and the ear—what Rancière has called "the distribution of the sensible." These oppositions are frequently associated with distinctions of class, race, gender, and political or professional identity (Mitchell 1986). What Leonardo da Vinci (or his 19th-c. eds.) called the paragone or contest of poet and painter, verbal and visual artist, often becomes a figure for competing if not antithetical modes of being and knowing, most fundamentally the gap between the speaking self and the seen or imagined other. Ultimately, the word-image difference inscribed in the concept of iconology finds itself mapped on to species difference, and the ling. barrier between human beings and animals is overcome by their shared participation in the world of images and visual perception.

Iconology, thus, comes to lit. and poetry with a sense of its own impropriety, as a discipline focused on nonverbal forms of representation. It is the intrusion of the visual and pictorial into the realm of voice, hearing, and lang., the entrance of similitude into the (ling.) territory of "difference," the colonization of writing by painting (or vice versa). The subject matter of iconology is both the desire for and resistance to the merging of lang. and imagery. The political psychology and anthropology of iconic representation—the analysis of such phenomena as idolatry, iconoclasm, iconophobia, fetishism, scopophilia, voyeurism, and iconophilia—are as important to the discipline of iconology as the meaning of any particular image.

See EMBLEM, FIGURATION, PAINTING AND POETRY, SOUND.

■ C. S. Peirce, "The Icon, Index, and Symbol," Collected Papers, ed. C. Hartshorne and P. Weiss, 8 v. (1931–58), v. 2; C. Morris, "Aesthetics and the Theory of Signs," Journal of Unified Science 8 (1939); E. Panofsky, Studies in Iconology (1939); E. H. Gombrich, "Icones Symbolicae: The Visual Image in Neo-Platonic Thought," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 11 (1948); R. Arnheim, Art and Visual Perception (1954); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954); E. Panofsky, "Iconography and Iconology," Meaning in the Visual Arts (1955); Frye; J. Hagstrum, The Sister Arts (1958); E. H. Gombrich, Art and Illusion, 2d ed. (1961); J. Bialostocki, "Iconography and Iconology," Encyclopedia of World Art, ed. B. S. Myers (1963); H. Weisinger, "Icon and Image: What the Literary Historian Can Learn from the Warburg School," Bulletin of the New York Public Library 67 (1963); J. Hagstrum, William Blake (1964); R. Tuve, Allegorical Imagery (1966); F. E. Peters, Greek Philosophical Terms (1967); J. Aptekar, Icons of Justice (1969); J. V. Fleming, The "Roman de la Rose": A Study in Allegory and Iconography (1969); G. Hermeren, Representation and Meaning in the Visual Arts (1969); U. Eco, A Theory of Semiotics (1976); W.J.T. Mitchell, Blake's Composite Art (1978); T. Ziolkowski, Disenchanted Images (1977); W.J.T. Mitchell, Iconology (1986); Ikonographie und Ikonologie, ed. E. Kaemmerling (1979); B. Bucher, Icon and Conquest (1981); Image and Code, ed. W. Steiner (1981); G. C. Argan, "Ideology and Iconology," The Language of Images, ed. W.J.T. Mitchell (1982); G. Landow, Images of Crisis: Literary Iconology, 1750 to the Present (1982); Ransom, esp. "Wanted: An Ontological Critic"; E. Gilman, Iconoclasm and Poetry in the English Reformation (1986); K. Moxey, "Panofsky's Concept of 'Iconology,'" NLH 17 (1986); W.J.T. Mitchell, "Iconology and Ideology," Works and Days 11–12 (1988); J. Rancière, The Politics of Aesthetics, trans. G. Rockhill (2004).

W.J.T. MITCHELL

ICTUS (Lat., "beat"). Long disputed as a term, the concept of ictus goes by a variety of other less satisfactory names, esp. metrical accent, prosodic accent, and metrical stress. As it is currently conceived, *meter is a pattern of prominent and nonprominent, or marked and unmarked, positions that together form a distinct pattern, the *line. Ictus is the most neutral term for each marked or prominent position. As an element of the abstract pattern that is meter, ictus is marked in each verse system by the phonological feature that is phonemic for its lang.—*accent in stress-based langs., *pitch in tone langs., length or *duration in quantitative langs. In the Eng. iambic pentameter, e.g., the five even syllables are ictic, meaning that, in the most neutral or normative realization of this meter, these syllables will be stressed. According to the traditional account, some variations from this pattern were allowed for, esp. reversing the stressing on the first and second syllables. It was disputed whether this should be accounted for at the level of realization, i.e., in the actual line (in which case a stress falls under nonictus and a slack under ictus) or at the level of meter, by positing the permissibility of *substitution (a *trochaic foot could be substituted for an *iambic one, with stress now agreeably falling under ictus). The former option seems very undesirable, but the difficulty with the latter option lies in explaining why only some substitutions seem to be allowed and why their frequencies in the five feet of the line are very differential.

Neither option, however, infringes on the fundamental distinction between meter, as an abstract pattern applicable to all lines, and rhythm, the actualization in each specific line. In the cl. Gr. *hexameter, the first five of the six feet may be *dactyls or *spondees; the sixth must be a spondee. The number of syllables is thus variable, but the first position in each foot is ictic. On this analysis, it would seem that ictus corresponds to the concept of arsis (in mod. usage) and thesis in ancient usage, namely, a subdivision of the *foot into two elements (regardless of how many syllables occupy each element) of which only one is prominent (see ARSIS AND THESIS). In antiquity, the terms arsis and thesis were used to describe the movement of the foot or the hand in keeping time with the rhythm of a verse; Roman writers like Horace and Quintilian, however, used them in the sense of a raising or lowering of the voice and so reversed their senses from Gr. usage, a confusion brought into the mod. world by Richard Bentley and others in the 18th c. Nevertheless, ictus denotes the marked or prominent position in the foot.

It is important to remember that, at the level of meter, all ictuses are equal, whereas, in the rhythm of the actual line, stresses often vary considerably in their weights, some primary, some secondary, some even weaker. It was the signal accomplishment of mod. metrics to articulate the relation between the latter and the former as the *relative stress principle: it does not matter how strong, in absolute terms, a stress under ictus is so long as it is stronger—even if by a hair—than the syllable under nonictus. In the account given by structural metrists, stresses under nonictus can undergo *demotion and weak stresses under ictus *promotion; effectually, this means that ling. stresses are altered or adjusted in weight under the influence of the metrical grid.

In *classical prosody, the term was used in the 20th c. by scholars who held that the quantitative meter of Lat. poetry was, in fact, made audible not by length but by a stress accent. Beare, however, thinks that such an assumption "may be due merely to our craving to impose on quantitative verse a rhythm which we can recognize." Discussion of the controversy may be found in Allen.

See HOMODYNE AND HETERODYNE.

■ C. E. Bennett, "What Was Ictus in Latin Prosody?" AJP 19 (1898), with crit. by G. L. Hendrickson in 20 (1899); E. H. Sturtevant, "The Ictus of Classical Verse," AJP 44 (1923); E. Kapp, "Bentley and the Modern Doctrine of Ictus in Classical Verse," Mnemosyne 9 (1941); Beare, esp. chs. 5, 14; P. W. Harsh, "Ictus and Accent," Lustrum 3 (1958); P. Habermann and W. Mohr, "Hebung und Senkung," Reallexikon II 1.623–28; A. Labhardt, "Le Problème de l'Ictus," Euphrosyne 2 (1959); O. Seel and E. Pöhlmann, "Quantität und Wortakzent im horazischen Sapphiker," Philologus 103 (1959); H. Drexler, "Quantität und Wortakzent," Maia 12 (1960); L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); Allen, esp. 276 ff.; E. Pulgram, Latin-Romance Phonology: Prosodics and Metrics (1975); Morier; Brogan; J. Luque Moreno, Arsis, Thesis, Ictus (1994); R. P. Sonkowsky and F. Halberg, "Latin Verse-Ictus and Multimodal Entrainment," Electronic Antiquity 2 (2005).

T.V.F. BROGAN

IDENTICAL RHYME. Prototypical "exact" rhymes, e.g., cat / bat, require sonic likeness (at/at) paired with sonic difference (c/b). In *rich rhyme, sonic difference may disappear, but clear semantic difference remains, e.g. may / May. Identical rhyme (sometimes tautological rhyme) extends the likeness of rich rhyme further, indicating a repetition not just of the sound and spelling of a word but of its meaning. The very existence of identical rhyme has been a source of significant critical disagreement, as has the question of its desirability.

In his influential essay on rhyme, W. K. Wimsatt asserted that "[e]ven identical words may rhyme." Many critics, however, argue that a repeated word cannot be identical to the word that precedes it: if a word is repeated, it is necessarily in a new context with a new meaning. If nothing else, the repeated word registers as a repetition. Lotman argues that "[i]dentical (repeating) elements are functionally not identical if they occupy different structural positions."

If the status of identity in identical rhyme is one issue, its status as rhyming is another: many critics have argued over whether identical rhyme ought to be called rhyme at all. Abernathy points to the presence of ostensibly identical rhymes in otherwise unrhymed poems, such as the blank verse of Robert Browning's The Ring and the Book and even John Milton. Since these repetitions occur in verse contexts in which rhyming is forbidden, it becomes clear that they do not count as rhyme. If the formal characteristics of Abernathy's blank-verse examples suggest that identical rhyme is not rhyme, however, others point to the example of fixed forms such as the sestina and the ghazal to suggest that identical rhymes exemplify the best qualities of rhyme. In the sestina, W. K. Wimsatt argues, "[T]he same set of rhyme words is repeated in six different stanzas. But here the order changes, and so does the relation of each rhyme word to the context. That is the point of the sestina." For Lotman, the repetition of words in the ghazal "reveals the diverse aspects of one concept." J. I. Wimsatt, however, cautions against using the refrain words of fixed forms as exemplars of identical rhyme. Refrain words are "systematic, part of the form," but identical rhyme "is unsystematic, and as a result confusing and fatiguing." From this perspective, much of what has been explored as identical rhyme might more productively be called *refrain.

Other possibilities for classifying identical rhyme as something other than rhyme have also been suggested. Rhetorical *antistrophe is one possibility. Scott uses the term "terminal repetition," which raises the question of how identical rhyme is to be distinguished from simple *repetition. Scherr distinguishes rich from identical rhyme in Rus. poetry as "homonymic" versus "repetend" rhyme.

Whether one believes that identical rhyme exists, it seems clear that some spectrum runs from rich rhymes, in which words are used in two unquestionably different senses, to cases that approach identical rhyme. If one assumes the existence of such a spectrum, something like identical rhyme appears to be more frequent in Eng., esp. in Chaucer and John Gower, than might be supposed. Both rich rhyme and identical rhyme have been more freely accepted in several other trads., incl. OF and MHG. And if, as has been suggested, the refrain words of fixed forms are if nothing else theoretically similar to identical rhyme, the phenomenon has a global scope: the ghazal, e.g., is prevalent in several Middle Eastern trads.

■ E. Freymond, "Über den reichen Reim bei altfranzösischen Dichtern bis zum Anfang des XIV Jahrh," ZRP 6 (1882); A. Tobler, Le Vers français (1885); J. Möllmann, Der homonyme Reim im Französischen (1896); C. von Kraus, "Der rührende Reim im Mittelhochdeutschen," ZDA 56 (1918); J. Fucilla, "Parole identiche in the Sonnet and Other Verse Forms," PMLA 50 (1935); W. K. Wimsatt, "One Relation of Rhyme to Reason," MLQ 5 (1944); A. Oras, "Intensified Rhyme Links in the Faerie Queene," JEGP 54 (1955); P. Rickard, "Semantic Implications of Old French Identical Rhyme," NM 6 (1965); R. Abernathy, "Rhymes, Non-Rhymes, and Antirhyme," To Honor Roman Jakobson, v. 1 (1967); J. M. Lotman, The Structure of the Artistic Text, trans. G. Lenhoff and R. Vroon (1977); Scott; Scherr; A. H. Olsen, Between Earnest and Game (1990)—homonymic rhymes in Gower; J. I. Wimsatt, "Rhyme/Reason, Chaucer/Pope, Icon/Symbol," MLQ 55 (1994).

T.V.F. Brogan; E. J. Rettberg

IDEOGRAM. Thought to be ancient and exotic, the ideogram is best seen as a productive mod. Eur. fiction. Invented by Jean-François Champollion in the course of deciphering the Egyptian hieroglyphics, which were used sometimes to represent sounds and sometimes to represent ideas, the term ideogram is now commonly associated with the Chinese writing system and its derivatives. Its use in poetry and poetics derives from Ezra Pound's efforts to found a modernist poetic on the *"image," defined as "that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time." Visual *imagery had long been a distinguishing mark of poetry in Western theory; Pound's extension of the concept was suggested by Ernest Fenollosa's essay The Chinese Written Character as a Medium for Poetry (1903, pub. 1919). Fenollosa saw in "Chinese writing . . . something much more than arbitrary symbols. It is based upon a vivid shorthand picture of the operations of nature. . . . It speaks at once with the vividness of painting and with the mobility of sounds."

Although Chinese philology includes in its classification of written characters the categories "pictogram" (xiangxing), "index" (zhishi), and "semantic compound" (huiyi), the ideogram results from the contact of langs. and writing systems. It compensates for a perceived weakness in alphabetic writing. Fenollosa, followed by Pound, conceives the ideogram to transcend the condition of representation altogether: "In reading Chinese we do not seem to be juggling mental counters, but to be watching things work out their own fate." For his Cantos, Pound developed an "ideogrammic method" of juxtaposition of "luminous details," eschewing syntactic subordination and building structures of association through conceptual rhyme. This composition method has been adopted for many subsequent long poems, e.g., Charles Olson's Maximus sequence.

Fenollosa's account of Chinese writing combined painting, motion, and sound, alluding to the infant cinema. Sergei Eisenstein, apparently independently, drew on the "ideogram" (in his usage chiefly the compound or huiyi character, joining two meanings to make a third) in his theory of cinematic montage. Inherently a multimedia object as well as an interlinguistic one, the ideogram concentrates the energies of *modernism, covering all the arts and the 20th-c. political spectrum from communism to fascism. Having outlasted its original purpose of dislodging Edwardian standards of verse decorum, it contributes to the syntax of every subsequent movement.

See chinese poetry in english translation.

■ S. Eisenstein, Film Form, trans. J. Leyda; (1949); E. Pound, Selected Prose 1909–1965, ed. W. Cookson (1975); Welsh; L. Géfin, Ideogram (1982); E. Fenollosa and E. Pound, The Chinese Character as a Medium for Poetry, ed. H. Saussy et al. (2008); C. Bush, Ideographic Modernism (2010).

H. Saussy

IDYLL, idyl (Gr. eidyllion [diminutive of eidos, "form"], "short separate poem"; in Gr., a pastoral poem or idyll is eidyllion Boukolikon). One of the several synonyms used by the Gr. grammarians for the poems of Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus, which at other times are called bucolic*, eclogue*, and pastoral*. Theocritus's ten pastoral poems, no doubt because of their superiority, became the prototype of the idyll. In the 16th and 17th cs., esp. in France, there was frequent insistence that pastorals in dialogue be called eclogues, those in narrative, idylls. In Ger., Idylle is the ordinary term for pastoral. Two biblical books—Ruth and Song of Songs—are sometimes called idylls, which may be taken to illustrate the latitude of the term. Note that Alfred, Lord Tennyson's Idylls of the King (1859) is hardly pastoral. Perhaps Tennyson thought that the use of the term was appropriate: each idyll contains an incident in the matter of Arthur and his knights that is separate (or framed) but at the same time connected with the central theme; the contents treat the Christian virtues in an ideal manner and in a remote setting. But there is very little in Robert Browning's Dramatic Idylls (1879–80), which mainly explore psychological crises, to place them in the pastoral trad. The adjectival form, idyllic, is more regularly and conventionally applied to works or scenes that present picturesque rural scenery and a life of innocence and tranquillity, but this has little specific relation to any poetic genre.

See georgic.

■ M. H. Shackford, "A Definition of the Pastoral Idyll," PMLA 19 (1904); P. van Tieghem, "Les Idylls de Gess-ner et le rève pastoral," Le Préromantisme, v. 2 (1930); P. Merker, Deutsche Idyllendichtung (1934); E. Merker, "Idylle," Reallexikon II 1.742–49; J. Tismar, Gestörte Idyllen (1973); T. Lange, Idyll und exotische Sehnsucht (1976); K. Bernhard, Idylle (1977); R. Böschenstein-Schäfer, Idylle, 2d ed. (1977); V. Nemoianu, Micro-Harmony: Growth and Uses of the Idyllic Model in Literature (1977); J. B. Pearce, "Theocritus and Oral Tradition," Oral Tradition 8 (1993); S. Halse, "The Literary Idyll in Germany, England, and Scandinavia, 1770–1848," Romantic Prose Fiction, ed. G. Gillespie (2008).

T.V.F. Brogan; J. E. Congleton

IMAGE. Image and imagery* are among the most widely used and poorly understood terms in poetic theory, occurring in so many different contexts that it may well be impossible to provide any rational, systematic account of their usage. A poetic image is, variously, a *metaphor, *simile, or figure of speech; a concrete verbal reference; a recurrent *motif; a psychological event in the reader's mind; the vehicle or second term of a metaphor; a *symbol or symbolic pattern; the global impression of a poem as a unified structure.

The term's meaning and use have also varied radically depending on time and place. While the concept has been at the center of *Chinese poetics for centuries, for instance, its prominence in Western criticism is a relatively mod. phenomenon. Frazer argues that the term first becomes important to Eng. crit. in the 17th c., perhaps under the influence of empiricist models of the mind. Thomas Hobbes and John Locke use the term as a key element in their accounts of sensation, perception, memory, imagination, and lang., developing a "picture-theory" of consciousness as a system of receiving, storing, and retrieving mental images. The term continues to play an important role in *neoclassical poetics, usually in accounts of description. Joseph Addison, in the Spectator papers on the "Pleasures of the Imagination" (nos. 411–21, 1712), argues that images are what allow the poet to "get the better of nature": "the reader finds a scene drawn in stronger colors and painted more to the life in his imagination by the help of words than by an actual survey of the scene which they describe."

In *romantic and postromantic poetry and poetics, the image persists in a sublimated and refined form and is often defined in opposition to "mental pictures" (Edmund Burke) or to the "merely descriptive" or "painted," ornamental images of 18th-c. poetry. S. T. Coleridge's distinctions between symbol and *allegory ("living educts" versus a mere "picture language") and *imagination and *fancy (creative versus remembered images) consistently appeal to a difference between a "higher," inward, intellectual image and a lower, outward, sensuous one. The notion of the poetic symbol, along with the poetic process as an expressive rather than mimetic endeavor, helps to articulate the notion of the romantic image as something more refined, subtle, and active than its neoclassical predecessor. Modernist poetics often combines (while claiming to transcend) the neoclassical and romantic concepts of the image, urging poets to make their lang. concrete and sensuous while articulating a theory of poetic structure that regards the entire poem as a kind of matrix or crystallized form of energy, as if the poem were an abstract image (see modernism). Thus, Ezra Pound stresses the importance of both the psychological and structural features of the image when he famously defines it as "that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time." In part because of the powerful influence of *imagism as propounded by Pound and others, image, however ambiguously defined, is treated in much 20th-c. crit. as though it were synonymous with poetry itself. Lewis offers a declaration that could stand in for any number of mod. and contemp. poets: "the image is the constant in all poetry, and every poem is an image."

Understandings of image shifted through the 20th c. and into the 21st as critics grappled with the increasing prominence of visual media. Whereas at the beginning of the century, modernists turned to the visual image as a source of immediacy and presence, an increased sensitivity to forms of mechanical and later digital reproduction made it seem inevitable that the image would offer a different lesson: that images do not offer direct access to reality but point always instead to other images. Like words, they are governed by their own grammars and rhets. and must be interpreted according to specific conventions. Rather than strive for the iconicity of the image, then, postmodern critics stress the etymological relation between image and imitation. Words and images share the common condition of all representation, woven together into a mediated web of signs and simulations.

A critique of the concept of the poetic image would probably begin by noting that it tends to blur a distinction that underlies a large tract of poetics, namely, the difference between literal and figurative lang. An image is, on the one hand, "the only available word to cover every kind of simile [and] metaphor" (Spurgeon); on the other hand, it is simply "what the words actually name" (Kenner), the literal referents of lang., concrete objects. Pound's treatment of the concept is again illustrative. One of his instructions for would-be imagists is that a poem should offer a "direct treatment of the 'thing' whether subjective or objective." Emphasizing at once its immediacy and, by putting "thing" in quotation marks, calling that directness into question, Pound suggests that the image can reconcile the subjective and objective character of *representation. The image, in other words, designates both metaphor and description, both a purely ling. relation between words and a referential relation to a nonlinguistic reality, both a rhetorical device and a psychological event. This confusion is most evident in theories of metaphor that follow Richards's influential distinction between tenor and vehicle. Is Shakespeare's metaphor "Juliet is the sun" to be understood as an image because "sun" is a concrete noun that evokes a sensuous picture in the reader's mind? Or is the whole expression an image because it insists on a "likeness" between two unlike things? Is an image, in short, a bearer of sensuous immediacy and presence or a relationship formed by the conjunction of two different words and their associated vocabularies? Is it a mode of apprehension or a rhetorical device? Whatever we may understand as the meaning of the term image in any particular context, it seems clear that the general function of the term has been to make this distinction difficult, if not impossible.

What could be at stake in perpetuating confusion between metaphor and description or between figurative and literal lang.? One possibility is that the figurative-versus-literal-lang. distinction is itself untenable, and the ambiguous use of the term image is simply a symptom of this fact. Image, understood in its narrow and literal sense as a picture or statue, is a metaphor for metaphor itself (a sign by similitude or resemblance) and for mimetic representation or *iconicity. Since literary representation does not represent by likeness the way pictorial images do, literary representation is itself only and always metaphorical, whether or not it employs particular figures. (Goodman argues, for instance, that representation, properly speaking, only occurs in dense, analogical systems like pictures and that a verbal description, no matter how detailed, never amounts to a depiction). The literal-figurative distinction itself appeals to an implicit distinction between "letters" (writing) and "figures" (images, pictures, designs, or bodies in space). The concept of "poetic imagery" is, thus, a kind of *oxymoron, installing an alien medium (painting, sculpture, visual art) at the heart of verbal expression. The motives for this incorporation of the visual arts are usually clear enough: the whole panoply of values that go with painting—presence, immediacy, vividness—are appropriated for poetry. But there are equally powerful motives for keeping the incorporation of the visual under control, for seeing the visual arts as a dangerous rival as well as a helpful ally. G. E. Lessing, in Laokoön (1766), thought that the emulation of the visual arts by lit. would lead to static, lifeless description, while Burke (A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful, 1757) argued that visual imaging was a vastly overrated aspect of literary response, incompatible with the opacity he associated with true literary sublimity. Within this trad., the rivalry between word and image is frequently animated by anxieties about other forms of difference, chiefly those related to race, gender, and sexuality. Thus, as both Mitchell and Heffernan demonstrate, ekphrasis* is often understood as a struggle between masculine poet and feminized image. The recurrent figure of the blind poet, whose blindness is a crucial condition of his insight and freedom from merely "external" visual images, reminds us that the boundaries between images and texts, figures and letters, the visual and the verbal are not so easily breached in Western poetics.

Another place where the contradictory tendencies of poetic imagery may be glimpsed is in the area of reader response. Here the image plays the role of a supplement to the poetic text (Derrida). It opens an empty space to be filled by the activity of the reader's imagination. Ideally, it completes the text in the reader's mind, in the world it projects, in the "spaces" between its words, bringing the "vision" of the poem sensuously, perceptually alive; but it may equally well open a threatening space of indeterminacy. Thus, the voice and sound—aural "images" such as *rhyme, *rhythm, *onomatopoeia, and *tone—are the first place to look for perfect iconicity in poetry. But what of the imperfect, secondary icons—the "mental pictures" that voice and sound produce, the imaginary spaces—theater, dream vision, movie, map, or diagram—that arise out of the reading experience? Poetics discloses a certain ambivalence toward these phenomena. While visualization, for instance, is universally acknowledged as an aspect of reader response, there is still considerable resistance to treating it as a legitimate object of literary study. The supposed "privacy" and "inaccessibility" of mental images seem to preclude empirical investigation, and the supposed randomness of visual associations with verbal cues seems to rule out any systematic account. But mental imagery has taken on a whole new life in the work of postbehavioral cognitive psychology. Literary critics who want to talk about poetic imagery in the sense of readers' visual response would do well to consult the work of philosophers and psychologists such as Jerry Fodor, Nelson Goodman, Ned Block, and Stephen Kosslyn, who have conducted experimental studies of visualization and mental imaging. Ludwig Wittgenstein's critique of the "picture theory" of meaning (Philosophical Investigations, 1957) also ought to be required reading for those who think of images as private. If mental images are an essential part of the reading experience, why should it be any more difficult to describe or interpret them than the images offered in Sigmund Freud's The Interpretation of Dreams?

At the same time, psychologists experimenting in the field of mental imaging might attend to poets and critics who have dealt with this question. It seems obvious, for instance, that mental imaging cannot be a subject of laboratory investigation alone but must be understood in the context of cultural hist. Some cultures and ages have encouraged reader visualization far more extensively than others: "quick poetic eyes" and the "test of the pencil," e.g., were the slogans of 18th-c. poetics, which urged the reader to match his or her experience with conventional, public models from painting and sculpture. We might ask why Shakespeare seems to have been singled out as the principal object of traditional image studies in Eng. crit. One answer may be that the study of imagery is part of the transformation of each Shakespearean play from a promptbook for the theater into a printed text for private reading. The first such study, Walter Whiter's A Specimen of a Commentary on Shakespeare (1794), was published in the same era that saw Shakespeare move from the playhouse to the study and heard Charles Lamb's famous argument that "the plays of Shakespeare are less calculated for performance on a stage, than those of almost any other dramatist whatever" ("On the Tragedies of Shakespeare," 1811; see CLOSET DRAMA). For Lamb, the inadequate visual and aural presence of mere actors on stage was to be replaced with "the sublime images, the poetry alone . . . which is present to our minds in the reading." Whatever its merits, Lamb's argument makes it clear that the issue of mental imaging is not solely a matter for experimental investigation but entails deeply disputed cultural values—the rivalry of visual and aural media (incl. the "breach" or "hinge" between written and spoken lang. explored by Derrida); the contest between art understood as a public, performative mode and its role as a private, subjective refuge; the notion of authorial *intention as a mental representation ("vision" or "design") that stands before or behind the poem.

The very idea of the mental image seems inextricably connected with the notion of reading as the entry into a private space (the Lockean metaphor of the mind as a camera obscura or "dark room" into which ideas are admitted through sensory apertures reinforces, with a kind of metaimage, this picture of mental solitude in an interior space filled with representations). It is not surprising, then, that the concept of the poetic image in all its ambivalence holds part of the central ground of poetics, serving as both the mechanism of reference to and deferral of an external, imitated or projected reality; as the projection of authorial intention (but also of unauthorized "unconscious" meaning); as the ling. ligature that composes figures of speech and thought and decomposes them into a general condition of lang. and consciousness; as the realm of freedom and dangerous uncertainty in reader response. Future crit. of the poetic image must, at minimum, take account of the historical variability of the concept and resist the temptation to dissolve poetic expression into the universal solvent of "the image."

See DESCRIPTIVE POETRY, ENARGEIA, FIGURATION, IMITATION, MIMESIS, PAINTING AND POETRY, UT PICTURA POESIS.

■ E. Pound, Pavannes and Divisions (1918); H. W. Wells, Poetic Imagery (1924); S. J. Brown, The World of Imagery (1927); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (1928); J. Dewey, "The Common Substance of All the Arts," Art as Experience (1934); C. Spurgeon, Shakespeare's Imagery and What It Tells Us (1935); I. A. Richards, The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936); C. Brooks, "Metaphor and the Tradition," Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939); L. H. Hornstein, "Analysis of Imagery: A Critique of Literary Method," PMLA 57 (1942); C. D. Lewis, The Poetic Image (1947); R. B. Heilman, This Great Stage: Image and Structure in "King Lear" (1948); R. H. Fogle, The Imagery of Keats and Shelley (1949); W. Clemen, The Development of Shakespeare's Image (1951); Abrams; Wellek and Warren, ch. 15; Frye; F. Kermode, The Romantic Image (1957); H. Kenner, The Art of Poetry (1959); R. Frazer, "The Origin of the Term Image," ELH 27 (1960); M. Hardt, Das Bild in der Dichtung (1966); P. N. Furbank, Reflections on the Word "Image" (1970); J. Derrida, Of Grammatology, trans. G. C. Spivak (1974); N. Goodman, Languages of Art (1976); S. Kosslyn, Image and Mind (1980); T. Ziolkowski, Disenchanted Images (1977); The Language of Images, spec. iss. of CritI 6.3 (1980); N. Block, Imagery (1981); M. A. Caws, The Eye in the Text (1981); Image and Code, ed. W. Steiner (1981); W. Steiner, The Colors of Rhetoric (1982); Articulate Images, ed. R. Wendorf (1983); P. de Man, "Intentional Structure of the Romantic Image," The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984); Image/Imago/Imagination, spec. iss. of NLH 15.3 (1984); W.J.T. Mitchell, Iconology (1987); P. Yu, The Reading of Imagery in the Chinese Poetic Tradition (1987); J. Heffernan, Museum of Words (1993); H. Belting, Likeness and Presence, trans. E. Jephcott (1994); W.J.T. Mitchell, Picture Theory (1994); S. Durham, Phantom Communities (1997); K. Jacobs, The Eye's Mind (2001); J. Rancière, The Future of the Image, trans. G. Elliott (2007); E. B. Loizeaux, Twentieth-Century Poetry and the Visual Arts (2008).

W.J.T. MITCHELL; B. GLAVEY

IMAGERY

I. Culture and Criticism
II. Sense, Mind, and Language
III. Imagery and Discourse

I. Culture and Criticism. Imagery, like the related word imitate, invokes the power of imagination, the cultural uses and dangers of likeness, and the baffling confluence of concrete and abstract, literal and figurative, body and mind, matter and spirit. One index of the cultural volatility of imagery is its place in religions. Religious trads. such as Judaism oppose the worship of images as false; Islam avoids the representation of all divinely created forms, although Islamic exegesis addresses the uses and limits of inner and outer meaning; Hinduism and Buddhism embrace imagery; and many shamanistic religions employ totemic images. Rich Christian trads. of sacramental imagery are accompanied by strong countercurrents of iconoclasm, as in the Iconoclastic Controversy of the 8th and 9th cs. in the Eastern Church and the Protestant Reformation. Problems of imagery are implicit in Midrash and in patristic and med. biblical exegesis, esp. in the devel. of the four senses of scripture.

Images occupy a critical place in the Gr. philosophical mediation of the material and the ideal. Plato distinguishes true ideas from false likenesses, images being at a double remove from reality, and he credits neither painting nor poetry as knowledge. Aristotle recognized the central role of imagery in the formation of thought, and by identifying structures of representation, he legitimized the arts as forms of truth. Roman commentators such as Horace, Longinus, and Quintilian spoke of imagery and its uses in poetry and rhetoric. Horace coined the formula ut pictura poesis (as is painting, so is poetry), drawing upon an aphorism attributed to Simonides of Ceos by Plutarch, who praised the historians whose lively prose made readers see actions described in words. The rhetorical figure ekphrasis* was widely used by Gr. and Roman writers for imagery that makes something appear in poetry as if present, "laying it out before the eyes," in the words of Cicero's De oratore.

The genre of the dream vision and med. descriptive formulas like the blason or laisses similaires are rich sources for imagery in theory and practice. In the widely disseminated Ren. convention of *Petrarchism, description of the imago vera of the beloved object erects a symbolic infrastructure embodying subject and object, and the theoretical structure of Petrarchan imagery is a major source of *Renaissance poetics. But the consideration of imagery as a category in literary theory and practice begins with early mod. lit. crit., Frazer argues, in the 16th and 17th cs. (also Furbank, Legouis [in Miner], and Mitchell [1986]).

The functions of the term during the Ren. were still largely fulfilled by the figures of rhetorical copia, a persuasive writing style marked by abundant *schemes and *tropes. Figurative lang. was viewed as both an ornament and a means of embodiment. Erasmus and other Ren. practitioners promoted enargeia, vivid, pictorial imagery that achieves copia through its sheer quantity and detail.

Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1595) makes a paradoxical claim for the excellence of poetry among the rival arts: he contends that the poet "nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth," for poets work through the senses to move a will infected by the passions away from vice through images of virtue. For Sidney, the delightful instruction of imagery fuses the abstraction of philosophy and the concrete example of hist. Nicolas Boileau similarly calls on the animation and warmth of imagery as a source of poetic power.

II. Sense, Mind, and Language. With the growth of skepticism and empiricism in the late 17th and early 18th cs., interest turned to the cognitive function of imagery. The epistemology of Thomas Hobbes and the associationist psychology of John Locke led to a way of looking at poetry in which the image was the connecting link between experience (object) and knowledge (subject). An image was reproduced in the mind as an initial sensation was produced in bodily perception. Thus, when the eye perceives a certain color, a person will register an image of that color in the mind—"image" because the subjective sensation experienced will be a copy of the objective phenomenon of color.

Of course, the mind may also produce images when remembering something once perceived but no longer present or reflecting on remembered experience or combining perceptions and the products of imagination or hallucinating out of dreams and fever. In literary usage, imagery thus comes to refer to images produced in the mind by words that refer to sense perceptions and to the many artistic permutations of sense impression, memory, and fabrication.

G. E. Lessing's Laokoön (1766), an influential critique of the arts as systems of signs, argues against the equation of imagery in the visual and verbal arts, distinguishing time and space as the proper places of poetry and painting. The descriptive poetry of the 18th c. often dwelt on imagery of landscape in the memory and words of the observing subject. Creative power was assumed to reside in the *"imagination," a volume of images entering and circulating in the mind. With romantic transcendentalism, the world appeared as the garment of God, the abstract and general residing in the concrete and particular, and Spirit was felt to be immanent in Matter. *Nature was itself divine, and nature poetry, a way to body forth the sacred. Imagery, therefore, was elevated to the level of *symbol, to become an embodiment of truth and a central issue of poetry and crit. In "Tintern Abbey," William Wordsworth claims to find in the contemplation of sensual experience a source of conscious life: "While with an eye made quiet by the power / Of harmony, and the deep power of joy, / We see into the life of things."

Science and lit. shared an interest in the powers of imagery during the latter 19th c. The philologist Max Müller accounted for metaphorical imagery as an organic part of the growth of lang., rather than as an *ornament. To conceive of immaterial things, human beings must express them as images of material things because human lang. lags behind conceptual needs. So lang. grows through *metaphor, from image to idea. The word spirit, e.g., has as its root meaning "breath"; as the need to express an immaterial conception of soul or deity emerged, an existent concrete word stood for the new abstract meaning.

Francis Galton's experiments in the psychology of perception (1880) suggested that people differ in their image making. While one person may reveal a predominant tendency to visualize his or her reading, memories, and ruminations, another may favor the mind's "ear," another the mind's "nose," and yet another may have little imagery at all. Other psychologists, such as the Am. Joseph Jastrow, became interested in ambiguous images, suggesting that perception was not just the result of external sense data but also a product of the mind.

Symbolist poets frequently turned to synaesthesia to confound the separate senses of experience and to expose the richness of the poet's soul (see SYMBOLISM), as in Charles Baudelaire's poem "Correspondances," which evokes forests of symbols that have powers of infinite expansion; exotic and unfathomable things, like amber, musk, and incense, enrapture the soul and senses. Arthur Rimbaud's "Voyelles" ("Vowels") seeks an arbitrary dislocation of perceptions and understanding: "A black, E white, I red, U green, O blue."

Psychology often categorizes images through the senses: visual (sight, brightness, clarity, color, and motion), auditory (hearing), olfactory (smell), gustatory (taste), tactile (touch, temperature, texture), organic (awareness of heartbeat, pulse, breathing, digestion), and kinesthetic (awareness of muscle tension and movement). The role of different senses emerged as one way of categorizing poetic imagery early in the last century of crit. A line of John Keats's poetry might be tactile and organic—e.g., "For ever warm and still to be enjoy'd, / For ever panting, and for ever young" ("Ode on a Grecian Urn"). Themes such as behavior, location, and time may also classify imagery in relation to such matters as warfare, eating, hair, the domestic, the urban, birds, mountains, morning, or summer.

Critics in the early 20th c. cataloged images and identified dominant sets or clusters of images within a poem or a poet's oeuvre, a *genre, or a literary period or style, drawing analogies to themes, authorship, historical or biographical origins, organic form, or the symbolic organization of cultural forms like *myth or *archetype. When the meaning and function of imagery were adapted as markers of the literary in theories about poetic lang. and creation, imagery became one of the key terms of the *New Criticism. Knight (1930) found in imagery a pattern below the level of plot and character that is an index of the intellectual content of Shakespeare's plays. Warren (1946) saw in the Rime of the Ancient Mariner a symbol of the artist-archetype, embodied in the figure of the Mariner, torn between the conflicting and ambiguous claims of reason (symbolized by the sun) and the imagination (symbolized by the moon). Burke (1941) compared S. T. Coleridge's letters with image-clusters in the Ancient Mariner and concluded that the albatross symbolizes the poet's guilt over his addiction to opium, thus illuminating the motivational structure of the poem. But I. A. Richards in Principles of Literary Criticism, like Galton, found that the sensual perception of images in poetry differed radically from one reader to another and excluded visual imagery from crit., focusing instead largely on the semantic operations at work in imagery.

Sensory imagery, however concrete or referential, comes to be seen in many forms of 20th-c. crit. as exercising complex figurative functions. Freudian and Jungian theories of mind look toward the complex function of images in personality and culture. Structuralist ling. theory defines lang. as an arbitrary system of signs through which reference is always mediated, and the understanding of imagery as a system of signs is similarly transformed. Verbal and visual imagery in ling. and philosophical theory offered famous illustrations of the function of the sign. Ferdinand de Saussure, e.g., produces a diagram of the tree, and Ludwig Wittgenstein borrows from Jastrow the image of the duck-rabbit to explore the roles of mind, lang., and sense.

Richards introduced terms such as tenor and vehicle* that often came to be used to explain the structure of imagery not as purely sensual but as figurative lang., and similar terms may be found in structuralist poetics. In Robert Burns's *simile "my love is like a red, red rose," images like the color, texture, or odor of a rose are figures for a lady's blush, her delicate skin, her fragrance. Burns's speaker is saying that his lady is to him as June is to the world, bringing rebirth and joy. The lady makes him feel as spring makes him feel: the ground of comparison is a set of feelings and associations. The imagery of the vehicle (the rose) and of the tenor (my love) are discrete objects related by thinking and feeling and writing and reading human subjects. Those associations are the ground of the simile that connects vehicle and tenor. The poem presents imagery of rose and of lady, and the qualities attributed to these objects intersect. But the rose and the lady are not images of one another. As Gertrude Stein observed, a rose is a rose is a rose.

Yet powerful imagery invites us to forget that distinction. An image involving *synecdoche, e.g., blurs the distinction of part and whole or container and thing contained—as in a ruby-red glass of wine. Just which object is ruby red, the glass or the wine? Where is the ruby if one cannot drink or taste it and it will not hold liquid? Or would a red object that has a taste, like a cherry, create likewise illogical imagery?

The mixing of images can be comical when it produces a material absurdity, as in the line "I smell a rat, Mr. Speaker; I see him floating in the air, but I will yet nip him in the bud." But Quintilian (see CATACHRESIS) argued that such imagery may be effective when it borrows an available term for one that does not exist, and such fused images easily enter the canon of poetry, as in Hamlet's "to take arms against a sea of troubles." Here if we do not imagine from the lang. of the character a demented warrior slashing at the sea with his sword, we may imagine two separate sets of images related in metaphor—feeling overwhelmed by troubles as by the inundation of the sea and doing something about them as when a warrior arms himself and marches out to meet the enemy.

Such understanding of imagery reflects a social and historical understanding of lang. Even decorous poetic imagery may violate the norms of sense perception, as when poetry flattens images into the merely picturesque, a danger Wordsworth contemplates in the lines "hedgerows hardly hedge-rows, little lines / Of sportive wood run wild: these pastoral farms, / Green to the very door" ("Tintern Abbey"). Precious imagery eclipses the role of the senses in description, as in Belinda's awakening in Alexander Pope's Rape of the Lock: "Sol thro' white curtains shot a tim'rous ray." In satiric or grotesque poetry (see SATIRE), imagery often conjoins visual objects incongruously, piling them up, or exposing shame or weakness for comic or absurd effect and challenging norms of *decorum and belief, as in the gutters of Jonathan Swift's "Description of a City Shower," where "dead cats and turnip-tops come tumbling down the flood."

In some imagery like the metaphysical *conceit, a trope that marks one of the major interests of early 20th-c. crit. (Wells, Rugoff, Tuve, Miller; see METAPHYSICAL POETRY), poets are licensed to challenge the reader with an image that reveals a significance that first appearances would make seem unlikely.

Similar interest in overlapping imagery may be seen in the imagist movement of the early 20th c., where one image may be defined through another distinctly apart from it as an "intellectual and emotional complex" perceived through lang. "in an instant of time" (see IMAGISM). In Ezra Pound's "In a Station of the Metro," for instance, faces in a crowd are seen as petals on a bough. According to Pound, a poem of this sort tries to record the precise instant in which a thing outward and objective transforms itself or darts into a thing inward and subjective.

Critics such as Roman Jakobson working in the school of *Russian formalism approached lit. as organized violence committed on ordinary speech. Lit. deviates from and thus empowers speech through devices such as *meter or imagery—these deviations make it lit.

III. Imagery and Discourse. Mid-20th-c. devels. in speculative and experimental psychology, involving phenomenology, epistemology, and cognitive psychology, questioned what mental imagery is. Block, e.g., argued against the objection that internal pictures are nonexistent because we do not have pictures in the brain and an inner eye with which to see them. Images are verbal and conceptual to Block, who proposed that there are two kinds of imagery, one that represents perception in roughly the same way pictures do, the other that represents as lang. does, i.e., conceptually. Block also contended that some images combine pictorial and verbal elements and that the real question is what types of representation are possible. Furbank, on the other hand, after giving a very useful hist. of the term image to the imagists, reveals the ambiguities and confusions involved in using the terms image and concrete to describe qualities of the verbal medium. We should not confuse abstract with general or concrete with specific. Concrete, e.g., does not necessarily mean "sensuous," and that which is specific may very well also be abstract. The only actual physical element of poetry is found in the subvocal or silent actions of tongue and larynx as a poem is recited or read. Furbank has suggested that we drop the term imagery altogether. Cognitive psychologists and neuroscientists over the second half of the 20th c. revived interest in imagery and gathered empirical evidence about the status of sense imagery and mental imagery, looking at the interference of motor and visual perception, e.g., or at examples of mental rotation or analogue images.

Mitchell (1986) places the entire issue of imagery within the broad historical context of knowledge as a cultural product (see ICONOLOGY, IMAGE). He has provided a chart of the "family of images" to indicate the different meanings of imagery: graphic images (pictures, statues, designs) are found in art hist.; optical images (mirrors, projections) in physics; perceptual images (sense data, "species," appearances) in philosophy and theology; mental images (dreams, memories, ideas, phantasmata) in psychology and epistemology; and verbal images (metaphors, descriptions, writing) in lit. crit.

Imagery frequently enters into deconstructive philosophy and crit. as an occurrence of false origins or priority. Images may be the necessary supplements of originals (like the Platonic "Form of the Good") that cannot be otherwise known. Images involving binaries (such as black and white) include their opposites as a black or white object does not. In work such as "Plato's Pharmacy," Jacques Derrida offers a critique of the logic of Plato's imagery; Derrida's own work often relies on playful images to unsettle received ideas, as in the image of Plato dictating to a writing Socrates in The Post Card. P. de Man's work deconstructs the unity of the figural icon or the notion of dominant figures and looks to ways in which critical insight depends on blindness to assertion and yielding to the knots of lang.

One feature of postmod. *Language poetry of recent decades is an emphasis on the materiality of the signifier rather than its reference to a prior material object or experience; here, imagery is not the product of a material sense perception but a material function of lang., as in Lyn Hejinian's claim in "Happily" (2000) to write with inexact straightness in a place between phrases of the imagination.

Mitchell (1986) has promoted the study of iconology across the media and of the relations of visual and verbal representations in the context of social and political issues. His argument concerning the nature and function of imagery averts a mere binary between the empiricist positivism and deconstruction. Both our signs and the world they signify are a product of human action and understanding, and although our modes of knowledge and representation may be arbitrary and conventional, they are the constituents of the forms of life—the practices and trads. within which we make epistemological, ethical, and political choices. The question is, therefore, not simply "what is an image?" but more "how do we transfer images into powers worthy of trust and respect?" Discourse, Mitchell concludes, projects worlds and states of affairs that can be pictured concretely and tested against other representations.

Approaching the problem from a sociopolitical-historical perspective, Weimann would remind us that, while for mod. critics the meaning of a poem is secondary to its figures, for Ren. and metaphysical poets the meaning was primary. Here he agrees with Tuve that mod. interpretations fail to do justice to the intentions and structures of earlier works. Metaphor, he says, is neither autonomous nor decorative; rather, it relates human and universe, and the link or interaction between tenor and vehicle is the core. Hist. is part of the meaning of a metaphor. Shakespeare's freedom of ling. transference reflects the social mobility of his era, an age of transitions and contradictions. That neoclassical critics did not value Shakespeare's rich imagery but preferred plot over diction reflects their own view of the person in society. This valuation was reversed during the romantic age, but even the romantics did not place form over meaning. Modernist poets and critics, Weimann argues, emphasizing the autonomy of a literary work and its spatial patterns, have removed lit. from both hist. and its audience (see AUTONOMY; MODERNISM). In seeking liberation from time and space and from hist. into myth, this trad. has rejected the mimetic function of lit. in cl. crit. (see MIMESIS), as well as the expressive principle of *romanticism. Metaphor is now seen as an escape from reality and has become severed from its social meaning. In reply, Weimann calls for an integration of the study of imagery within a more comprehensive vision of lit. hist.

Yu's analysis of Chinese imagery suggests ways in which the study of poetic imagery can be enriched further by means of comparative studies. She sees a fundamental difference between "attitudes toward poetic imagery in classical China" and "those commonly taken for granted in the West." Western conceptions are based on the dualism of matter and spirit and on the twin assumptions of mimesis and fictionality: poetry embodies concretely a transcendent reality, and the *poet is a creator of hitherto unapprehended relations between these two disparate realms. The Chinese assumption, by contrast, is nondualistic: there are indeed different categories of existence—personal, familial, social, political, natural—but they all belong to the same earthly realm, and the poet represents reality both in a literal sense and by joining various images that have already been molded for him by his culture. Thus, the Chinese poetic and critical trads. reveal the conventional correspondences used by the poets in their efforts to juxtapose images so as to suggest rather than explain meaning.

■ Criticism and History: W. Whiter, A Specimen of a Commentary on Shakespeare (1794); W. Spaulding, A Letter on Shakespeare's Authorship of "The Two Noble Kinsmen" (1876); Richards; S. J. Brown, The World of Imagery (1927); F. C. Kolbe, Shakespeare's Way (1930); C. Spurgeon, Shakespeare's Imagery and What It Tells Us (1935); U. Ellis-Fermor, Some Recent Research in Shakespeare's Imagery (1937); K. Burke, Attitudes toward History (1937); G. W. Knight, The Burning Oracle (1939); M. B. Smith, Marlowe's Imagery and the Marlowe Canon (1940); K. Burke, The Philosophy of Literary Form (1941); L. H. Hornstein, "Analysis of Imagery," PMLA 57 (1942); G. W. Knight, The Chariot of Wrath (1942); E. A. Armstrong, Shakespeare's Imagination (1946); Brooks; R. B. Heilman, This Great Stage (1948); D. A. Stauffer, Shakespeare's World of Images (1949); T. H. Banks, Milton's Imagery (1950); W. H. Clemen, The Development of Shakespeare's Imagery (1951); F. Marsh, Wordsworth's Imagery (1952); J. E. Hankins, Shakespeare's Derived Imagery (1953); Frye; J. W. Beach, Obsessive Images (1960); R. Frazer, "The Origin of the Term 'Image'," ELH 27 (1960); G. W. Knight, The Crown of Life (1961); G. W. Williams, Image and Symbol in the Sacred Poetry of Richard Crashaw (1963); D. A. West, The Imagery and Poetry of Lucretius (1969); P. N. Furbank, Reflections on the Word "Image" (1970); S. A. Barlow, The Imagery of Euripides (1971); Seventeenth-Century Imagery, ed. E. Miner (1971); W. E. Rogers, Image and Abstraction (1972); J. Doebler, Shakespeare's Speaking Pictures (1974); R. Weimann, Structure and Society in Literary History (1976); J. H. Matthews, The Imagery of Surrealism (1977); V. N. Sinha, The Imagery and Language of Keats's Odes (1978); R. Berry, Shakespearean Metaphor (1978); T. Cave, The Cornucopian Text (1979); de Man; V. S. Kolve, Chaucer and the Imagery of Narrative (1984); J. Steadman, Milton's Biblical and Classical Imagery (1984); J. Dundas, The Spider and the Bee (1985); W.J.T. Mitchell, Iconology (1986), Art and the Public Sphere (1993), and Picture Theory (1994); V. A. Kolve, Telling Images (2009).

■ Figurative Language: M. Müller, Lectures on the Science of Language, 2d ser. (1894); F. I. Carpenter, Metaphor and Simile in Minor Elizabethan Drama (1895); G. Buck, The Metaphor (1899); J. G. Jennings, An Essay on Metaphor in Poetry (1915); H. W. Wells, Poetic Imagery (1924); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (1928); E. Holmes, Aspects of Elizabethan Imagery (1929); I. A. Richards, The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936), and Interpretation in Teaching (1938); M. A. Rugoff, Donne's Imagery (1939); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939); R. Tuve, Elizabethan and Metaphysical Imagery (1947); C. D. Lewis, The Poetic Image (1947); H. Coombs, Literature and Criticism (1953); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954); F. Kermode, The Romantic Image (1957); C. Brooke-Rose, A Grammar of Metaphor (1958); O. Barfield, "The Meaning of the Word 'Literal'," Metaphor and Symbol, ed. L. C. Knights and B. Cottle (1960); M. Peckham, "Metaphor," The Triumph of Romanticism (1970); E. E. Ericson, "A Structural Approach to Imagery," Style 3 (1969); G. Lakoff and M. Johnson, Metaphors We Live By (1980); R. J. Fogelin, Figuratively Speaking (1988); J. Witherow, "Anger and Heat: A Study of Figurative Language," Journal of Literary Semantics 33 (2004).

■ Journals: Journal of Mental Imagery; The Literary Image; Word & Image.

■ Mental Imagery: F. Galton, "Statistics of Mental Imagery," Mind 5 (1880); G. H. Betts, The Distributions and Functions of Mental Imagery (1909); J. K. Bonnell, "Touch Images in the Poetry of Robert Browning," PMLA 37 (1922); E. Rickert, New Methods for the Study of Literature (1927); J. E. Downey, Creative Imagination (1929); R. H. Fogle, The Imagery of Keats and Shelley (1949); R. A. Brower, The Fields of Light (1951); Wellek and Warren, ch. 15; The Language of Images, ed. W. T. J. Mitchell (1980); Imagery, ed. N. Block (1981); P. Yu, The Reading of Imagery in the Chinese Poetic Tradition (1987); W.J.T. Mitchell, "The Pictorial Turn," Artforum 30.7 (1992); M. Tye, The Imagery Debate (1992); W.J.T. Mitchell, "What Do Pictures Want?" October 77 (1996); N.J.T. Thomas, "Mental Imagery," Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, ed. E. N. Zalta, http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/fall2010/entries/mental-imagery.

■ Symbol and Myth: O. Rank, Art and Artist, trans. C. F. Atkinson (1932); R. P. Warren, "A Poem of Pure Imagination," The Rime of the Ancient Mariner by Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1946); Crane; P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain (1954); H. Musurillo, Symbol and Myth in Ancient Poetry (1961); P. Wheelwright, Metaphor and Reality (1962); K. Burke, Language as Symbolic Action (1966); A. Cook, Figural Choice in Poetry and Art (1985).

S. Foley

IMAGINATION

I. Distinctions from Fancy; General Scope
II. Ancient, Classical, and Medieval
III. Renaissance and 17th Century
IV. 18th Century and Romanticism
V. Later 19th and 20th Centuries

I. Distinctions from Fancy; General Scope. Imagination derives from Lat. imaginatio, itself a substitute for Gr. phantasia. During the Ren., the term fancy*—connoting free play, mental creativity, and license—often eclipsed imagination, considered more as reproducing sense impressions, primarily visual images. By ca. 1700, empirical philosophy cast suspicion on fancy; imagination seemed preferably rooted in the evidence of sense data. Thomas Hobbes, nevertheless, retains "fancy" and is perhaps the last Eng. writer to use it to signify the mind's greatest inventive range. John Dryden describes imagination as a capacious power encompassing traditional stages of composition: *invention, fancy (distribution or design), and elocution (style). G.W. Leibniz contrasts les idées réelles with les idées phantastiques ou chimériques (Nouveaux essais). Many, incl. Joseph Addison, use fancy and imagination synonymously, but Addison calls his important Spectator series (nos. 409, 411–21) "Pleasures of the Imagination." More susceptible to prosodic manipulation in verse, the term retains a higher place in poetic diction than in crit. (e.g., William Collins's "Young Fancy thus, to me divinest name"). But in England and particularly in Germany, writers increasingly distinguish the terms before S. T. Coleridge's definitions in Biographia Literaria (1817). By 1780, Christian Wolff, J. G. Sulzer, J. N. Tetens, and Ernst Platner make explicit distinctions. Coleridge recognizes this by claiming himself the first "of my countrymen" to distinguish fancy from imagination. But several Eng. writers record distinctions between 1760 and 1800.

Since 1800, and to some degree before as well, poets and critics have considered imagination the chief creative faculty, a "synthetic and magical power" responsible for invention and originality (Coleridge). Writers have associated or identified imagination with *genius, *inspiration, *taste, visionary power, and prophecy (see also EXPRESSION, IMITATION, ORIGINALITY). During the past three centuries, no other idea has proved more fruitful for poetics and critical theory or for their intersection with psychology and philosophy. Before the watershed in the hist. of the idea during the late 17th–19th cs., commentaries and poetics generally accord imagination an important but ambivalent role: judgment or understanding must trim its vagaries and correct its wayward force. Ancient poets, philosophers, and psychologists consider imagination a strong and diverse power; but, unregulated, it produces illusion, mental instability (often melancholy), bad art, or madness. Yet imagination becomes the chief criterion of Eur. and Am. *romanticism. Even if we speak of romanticisms in the plural, imagination is important to each one. Not only philosophers and psychologists, but critics and poets elevate it as a prime subject of their vital work. William Wordsworth's The Prelude proclaims imagination as its main theme; John Keats's "Lamia" and great odes debate in symbolic terms the function and worth of imaginative art. To a surprising extent, the transcendental or "critical" philosophy in Germany and America explores and elaborates the idea, spawning theories that champion the process and function of art as the final act and highest symbolic expression of philosophizing.

II. Ancient, Classical, and Medieval. In the book of Genesis, two forms of imagination emerge, bara, which signifies creatio ex nihilo (Gen. 1:27), and yatsar, the creation of the human from the dust of the earth (human shares a root with earth, dust, or soil). The Western trad. usually reserves creatio ex nihilo for God alone, with human imagination as an echo or lesser exercise of it. However, the myths of Prometheus, Faust, and Frankenstein challenge this. Some critics detect a challenge, too, in writers such as J. W. Goethe and even John Milton. Ancient stories and myths of a demiurge or figure, often in female form, necessary to inspire and actually to carry out divine creation, find expression in later writers (e.g., P. B. Shelley, W. B. Yeats). Similarly, the Gr. *muses are all female.

Ancient religious texts can criticize imagination: "the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth" (Gen. 8:21). Yet the same texts are interpreted to provide for a positive imagination that facilitates a dialogue between the human and divine. Coleridge identifies Logos as the communicative intellect in God and man and suggests that it is the ultimate power of making, "the Creator! and the Evolver!"

What may be called a mystical sense of imaginative unity joining the divine or universally creative with the human emerges in poets such as Rūmī and William Blake, for each uniquely so. Sufi teaching approximates imagination with the idea of barzakh, a realm partaking of spirit and matter. The Vedic trad. presents imagination, too, as the higher power of the gods creating and sustaining all reality, as well as a human power realizing and partaking of this larger harmony.

Aristotle advances in De anima the cl. definition of imagination: mental reproduction of sensory experience. In this elegant simplicity, imagination registers sensory impressions immediately present in the act of perception. With sense data absent, imagination becomes a form of memory, mother of the Muses. Aristotle discusses the role of imagination in what John Locke will call "the association of ideas," central to empirical psychology. David Hume, Joseph Priestley, the associationists in general, William Hazlitt, and to some degree Wordsworth will later view imagination in terms of heightened associations of ideas (either unconscious or determined by conscious choice) coexisting with feelings and passions, thus giving all associative operations a subjective and affective element. Imagination thus forms the basis of taste, by definition grounded in the perceiving subject, an argument Edmund Burke broaches in his Enquiry into the Sublime and Beautiful (1757) and later at the core of Immanuel Kant's Kritik der Urteilskraft (Critique of Judgment, 1790).

But in the Poetics, where Aristotle pursues a structural or generic approach based on dramatic texts, he skirts the function of imagination. The audience's imaginative response projecting sympathy and identification (pity and fear) may be inferred, but Aristotle does not analyze imagination as crucial to either reception or production.

Plato distrusts the artist's imagination and assigns it an essentially reproductive duty (copying a copy). In psychological terms, the soul passively receives an image, which reflects an idea. However, the Platonic nous (reason) carries a force similar to later conceptions of creative imagination. Philip Sidney and F.W.J. Schelling, among others, will later interpret Plato's thought and image-laden writing to counter Plato's own condemnation of poetry and poets. For Plotinus, the imagination (phantasy) is a plastic, constructive faculty that can change and alter experience, permit or realize a form of intellectual intuition or insight. Phantasy comes in two forms. The lower—linked to sense and the soul's irrational power—may harmonize with the higher, which reflects ideas and the rational. Plotinus and Proclus are among several who provide antecedents for Coleridge's "primary" and "secondary" imagination. As Plotinus considers nature an emanation of soul and soul an emanation of mind, his thought adumbrates a large system of nature and sense, idea and soul, cosmos and mind, creator and creativity, all interconnected through imaginative power. Elements of this thought recur in the hermetic philosophers, Jakob Boehme, Blake, Schelling, and Coleridge. Plotinus provides implications for mimetic theory and for a poetics that spills into theodicy, where the external world is "the book of nature" or, as Goethe and others later express it (before the Rosetta Stone is deciphered), a divine "hieroglyphic." Using this general idea, R. W. Emerson and H. D. Thoreau develop their own angles of vision, as do the Naturphilosophen in their search for connections between the forces and laws discovered by natural science and poetry conceived as an inventive power creating its own related—but original—nature.

From the beginning, imagination thus possesses roots both in empiricism based on sense experience and in transcendentalism. Its function may be seen in terms of natural and psychological phenomena, perception, acquisition of knowledge, creative production of art, and even, as Baruch Spinoza says, the prophets who receive "revelations of God by the aid of imagination" (Tractatus theologico-politicus, 1670). These manifestations are not mutually exclusive but interact, as in the thought of Giordano Bruno, who conceives of sense, memory, emotion, cognition, and the divine mind all linked through imagination. Many writers divide the power into levels or degrees, with adjectives denoting particular functions (e.g., re/productive, erste/zweite/dritte potenz, primary or secondary, creative, sympathetic, perceptive). The Prelude traces a maturation of the power through different stages. The explosion of Ger. analytical terms for imagination in the 18th c. is staggering (Einbildungskraft, Phantasie, Imagination, Fassungskraft, Perceptionsvermögen, Dichtungsvermögen, or Dichtkraft—with variants, and more). Since antiquity, then, images produced by this power have been variously considered as materially real or as appearances and pure illusion or even as idealized forms. Poetry, dreams, divine inspiration (madness and prophecy), delusion, and emotional disturbances—all involve one or more activities of imagination. It therefore harbors the greatest potential not only for insight and intuition but for deception and illusion.

Horace, long influential in Western poetics, barely mentions imagination in his Ars poetica. This absence, coupled with Platonic distrust of imagination and later neoclassical emphasis on verisimilitude and *decorum in imitation (what much 18th-c. and romantic theory scorns as mere "copy"), diminishes the place of imagination in poetic theory for centuries after Horace. Although Philostratus declares imitation inferior to phantasy and Quintilian connects imagination (visiones) with raising absent things to create emotion in the hearer, not until the rediscovery in the 16th c. of the Peri hypsous (On the Sublime) attributed to Longinus do Eur. critics turn more to the power he describes: "moved by enthusiasm and passion you seem to see the things whereof you speak and place them before the eyes of your hearers." Nicolas Boileau translates Longinus; in England, John Dennis and Alexander Pope spread his views. The useful, if rough, distinction between "Aristotelian" and "Longinian" crit. stems largely from divergent emphases on imagination and its corollaries for mimetic theory.

Med. views of imagination vary, with Aristotelian rather than Platonic influence dominating. Yet, both emerge in Thomas Aquinas and Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides). Ibn Sīnā (Avicenna) and Rūmī place imagination above intellectual reason in pursuing knowledge and enlightenment. In Scholastic thinkers, imagination continues its role of connecting and representing a link between the material and the spiritual. Although they theorize little, writers such as Dante, Chaucer, and the poet of Piers Plowman create a visionary or comprehensively imaginative rendering of experience.

III. Renaissance and 17th Century. Giovanni Pico della Mirandola's De imaginatione sive phantasia (ed. and trans. H. Caplan, 1971) collects from the cl. and med. trads. but stresses vision as the primary or archetypal sense, circumscribing the possibility of a larger poetics founded on imagination. George Puttenham summarizes Ren. notions of imagination in the production of poetry and emphasizes the link between poet as creator and a divine creator (see RENAISSANCE POETICS). Sidney and J. C. Scaliger call the poet a "creator" (Ben Jonson calls him a "maker"), implying that such creation imitates or follows nature rather than copies it. Hence, a dichotomy should not be established between imitation and creative imagination; it is possible to ally them, as Coleridge does in On Poesy or Art. As Coleridge frequently says, to distinguish is not necessarily to divide. Even with Sidney (and later Leibniz, Joshua Reynolds, Shelley, and Thomas Carlyle), imitation not so much duplicates nature as it echoes divine creative power. The 19th-c. Platonist Joseph Joubert will claim that the poet "purifies and empties the forms of matter and shows us the universe as it is in the mind of God. . . . His portrayal is not a copy of a copy, but an impression of the archetype." Thomas Macaulay will call this the "imperial power" of poetry to imitate the "whole external and the whole internal universe." For Anthony Ashley Cooper, the third Earl of Shaftesbury, the poet is a "just Prometheus under Jove," and the variation on the Ovidian phrase—a god or daemon in us—becomes common in discussions of imagination. During the Sturm und Drang* and romantic eras, the theme of Prometheus further modifies the connection between divine creative energy and human poetry. In Blake's Christian vision, these powers merge as the "divine-human imagination"; Schelling calls genius "a portion of the Absolute nature of God." Poetry for Shelley elicits

"the divinity in man." Coleridge considers the secret of genius in the fine arts to make the internal external and the external internal; in religious terms, Jesus is the living, communicative intellect in God and man—suggestively phrased in Emerson's "living, leaping Logos."

Ren. psychologists, among them Philipp Melancthon, Veit Amerbach, and esp. Juan Luis Vives, advance increasingly sophisticated views of the mind wherein imagination and the association of ideas play important roles. Sidney and Edmund Spenser consider imaginative power central to both theory and practice. Shakespeare uses imagination (or fancy as its equivalent) suggestively, as in the Chorus of Henry V. In Eng. critical discussion of imagination, Theseus's lines in A Midsummer Night's Dream (5.1) become the most-quoted verses (Milton's Paradise Lost also figures prominently). Although close reading reveals Theseus's distrust of "strong" imagination and its "tricks," identifying imagination with madmen, lovers, and poets—whose tales may never be believed—Hippolyta reinterprets all the players and the night's action as a totalized myth which "More witnesseth than fancy's images, / And grows to something of great constancy."

Francis Bacon's view of rhet. and poetry must be spliced together from many writings. Two trends emerge. He splits rational or scientific knowledge from poetic knowledge, which is "not tied to the laws of matter." But this bestows greater freedom on imagination to join and divide the elements of nature, to appeal to psychological satisfaction rather than verisimilitude, and to permit the imitation of nature to differ from nature itself not only in the medium of presentation but in its appeal to moral value—and to what would later be called aesthetics and the sublime. Later these premises resurface often, incl. Addison's "Pleasures of the Imagination," Hume's "Of the Standard of Taste," and Reynold's Discourses (esp. 6, 7, and 13), where imagination rather than the matter-of-fact becomes "the residence of truth." In The Advancement of Learning, Bacon mentions an "imaginative or insinuative reason," a concept Matthew Arnold repeats. But Bacon concludes, "I find not any science that doth properly or fitly pertain to the imagination."

Hobbes fails to see the capacious possibilities of Bacon's scheme for crit. or the arts, but his contributions to empirical psychology open other avenues and begin to supply the science Bacon found wanting. For Hobbes, the "compounded imagination" forms "trains of ideas" or "mental discourse" that evolves into judgment or sagacitas. In "compounding" images and directing these associations to larger designs, the "contexture" of imagination offers a picture of reality. This suggests what thinkers in the next century commonly express: imagination subsumes judgment. In 1774, Alexander Gerard's Essay on Genius explicitly declares this.

Locke coins the phrase "association of ideas" in the Essay Concerning Human Understanding (4th ed., 1700). Originally, he means idiosyncratic links between mental representations peculiar to an individual, a process Laurence Sterne explores in Tristram Shandy. But the phrase, like William James's "stream of consciousness," changes signification and soon stands for a pervasive habit of mind, both conscious and unconscious, akin to Hobbes's mental discourse and trains of compounded ideas. Locke receives little credit for recognizing imagination as a strong faculty because he criticizes poetry and shows scant sympathy for art and he distrusts figuration in lang. But the "tabula rasa" tag oversimplifies his epistemology and psychology. He states that "the mind has a power," an innate power (distinguished from innate ideas, which it never possesses) "to consider several" simple ideas "united together as one idea; and that not only as they are united in external objects, but as itself has joined them." As in Bacon, the active formation of complex ideas in "almost infinite variety" need not correspond to nature.

Replying to Locke's difficult arguments about innate ideas, Leibniz in his Nouveaux essais quotes Aristotle's De anima: "There is nothing in the mind not previously in the senses—except the mind itself." Here, as George Santayana later notes, Leibniz uncovers the germ of Kant's critical philosophy. In Leibniz—and in Hobbes's and Locke's ascription of an active power forming complex ideas or trains of them—imagination acquires a central position in a new, flexible faculty-psychology with its accompanying facultative logic.

IV. 18th Century and Romanticism. Addison brings these concepts within the ken of critical theory and poetics. "The Pleasures of the Imagination" arise from comparing our imaginative perception of nature with our perception of art, where art is itself an imitation of nature achieved through the artist's imaginative production that "has something in it like creation; it bestows a kind of existence. . . . It makes additions to nature." The interest rapidly becomes psychological and involves a projective faculty, active and passive, productive and reproductive. Like Pico, Addison emphasizes vision but remarks that the pleasures of imagination > are not wholly confined to such particular authors as are conversant in material objects, but are often to be met with among the polite masters of morality, criticism, and other speculations abstracted from matter, who, though they do not directly treat of the visible parts of nature, often draw from them their similitudes, metaphors, and allegories. . . . A truth in the understanding is . . . reflected by the imagination; we are able to see something like colour and shape in a notion, and to discover a scheme of thoughts traced out upon matter. And here the mind . . . has two of its faculties gratified at the same time, while the fancy is busy in copying after the understanding, and transcribing ideas out of the intellectual world into the material.

The material and the intellectual or passionately moral worlds fuse through imagination; matter and spirit find a common faculty and may be represented by a single image.

In part derived from Addison's crit., Mark Akenside's popular poem The Pleasures of the Imagination combines empirical and Platonic elements. Imagination "blends" and "divides" images; its power can

"mingle," "join," and "converge" them—phrases that anticipate Coleridge's "secondary" imagination. Collins and Joseph Warton downgrade satiric and didactic verse; Warton proclaims that "invention and imagination" are "the chief faculties of a poet." Edward Young links originality and genius with imagination; Gerard, whom Kant later praises as "the sharpest observer of the nature of genius," says, "it is imagination that produces genius." Gerard, Priestley, and William Duff extend associationist and empirical psychology to give a fluid model of the mind, not rigid or compartmentalized. Hazlitt concludes, "the imagination is an associating principle" assuring "continuity and comprehension of mind," a definition allied with his remark that poetry portrays the flowing, not the fixed. Emerson gives a twist to this organic process by hinting at a Neoplatonic foundation in "The Poet": "the endless passing of one element into new forms, the incessant metamorphosis, explains the rank which the imagination holds in our catalog of mental powers. The imagination is the reader of these forms."

In Italy, L. A. Muratori advances a mutually beneficial combination of intellect and imagination to produce "artificial" or "fantastic" images applied metaphorically and charged with emotion. Vico's Scienza nuova (1725, 1744) mentions a recollective fantasia but, more important, examines how poetic imagination creates the basis for culture through the production of myths and universal patterns that shape understanding of both nature and human nature. Largely ignored during his lifetime, Vico produced ideas that continue to influence historiography, anthropology, education, and imaginative writers such as James Joyce.

While Samuel Johnson and Hume generally distrust the imagination, they stress its pervasive ability to supplant reason. Imagination for Hume becomes the central faculty and for Johnson, in his morality and psychology, the main concern. Both appreciate the role of the passions in strengthening imaginative activity and the association of ideas. They yoke the cl. theory of passions, further developed in the Ren., to empirical psychology. Hume sees imagination as a completing power acting on suggestiveness; he claims that the elements a writer creates "must be connected together by some bond or tie: They must be related to each other in the imagination, and form a kind of unity which may bring them under one plan or view." As Coleridge defines "the secondary" imagination, it "dissolves, diffuses, dissipates, in order to re-create; or where this process is rendered impossible, yet still at all events it struggles to idealize and to unify."

The associationists—among them Lord Kames (Henry Home), Archibald Alison, Hugh Blair, Gerard, Hazlitt (to some extent), and others—stress imaginative association as pervasive; it determines taste. Images and sense data receive modifying "colors" of feeling and passion, a notion Wordsworth uses. The emphasis on feeling fused with perception or cognition may be compared with Richards's (1929) later discussion of "emotive" versus "intellectual" belief or T. S. Eliot's *"dissociation of sensibility."

In Burke's Enquiry, the imaginative arts become the "affecting arts." Because they trigger the completing imagination of reader or audience, "suggestion" and *"obscurity" attain positive value in poetry and visual art. This helps explain the growing interest in literary forms and genres not rigidly fixed but fluid, also the fascination in Blake, Novalis, and others for aphorism and the importance of the literary *fragment in the early 19th c. The imagination of the reader becomes regarded as an important critical concept, too, ranging from Dryden's and Locke's "assent" to Coleridge's "willing suspension of disbelief." Sulzer, in his Allgemeine Theorie der Schönen Künste, notes, "the imagination of those who hear or see the artist's work comes to his aid. If through any of the latent qualities in the work this imagination takes on a vivid effect, it will thereupon complete what remains by itself."

Sensing expansion of the idea, Burke claims in his Enquiry (6th ed., 1770) that to imagination "belongs whatever is called wit, fancy, invention, and the like." Hazlitt later remarks, "this power is indifferently called genius, imagination, feeling, taste; but the manner in which it acts upon the mind can neither be defined by abstract rules, as is the case in science, nor verified by continual unvarying experiments, as is the case in mechanical performances." Critics analyze passages of poetry as reflecting the pervasive operation of imagination, one aspect of what Coleridge first calls "practical criticism," a forerunner of the *New Criticism.

Adam Smith bases his Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759) on the sympathetic identification that imagination allows us to extend to others. As James Beattie says, "the philosophy of Sympathy ought always to form a part of the science of Criticism." Hazlitt later states that "passion, in short, is the essence, the chief ingredient in moral truth; and the warmth of passion is sure to kindle the light of imagination on the objects around it." The application in crit. is found in Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Keats, culminating rhetorically (along with much else) in Shelley's Defence of Poetry: "the great secret of morals is love; or a going out of our own nature, and an identification with the beautiful . . . not our own. A man . . . must imagine intensely and comprehensively; he must put himself in the place of another and of many others. . . . The great instrument of moral good is the imagination; and poetry administers to the effect by acting upon the cause. Poetry enlarges the circumference of the imagination." Applications of what Coleridge calls "sympathetic imagination" are crucial to changes in dramatic crit. Before 1800, William Richardson, Thomas Whatley, and Maurice Morgann approach Shakespeare in this fashion, and Coleridge becomes the most brilliant exponent of such psychologically based crit., a forerunner of the psychological criticism of the 20th c.

The idea of imaginative sympathy also affects theories of poetic lang.: it should be "natural" and "spontaneous." *Metaphor, *personification, and figurative writing in general are now viewed less as *ornament and more as essential to impassioned "natural lang." Theories of the primitive origin of lang. (Jean-Jacques Rousseau, J. G. Herder, Duff, Lord Monboddo [James Burnett], and many recapitulations, incl. Shelley's and G.W.F. Hegel's) strengthen connections between imagination, poetry, early develop. of societies and their langs., and figurative speech in general (see ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS). As Hazlitt says, exemplifying the connection between imagination and the fascination with figurative lang., a metaphor or figure of speech requires no proof: "it gives carte blanche to the imagination." In the best poetry, images are "the building, and not the scaffolding to thought." What is true not only may but must be expressed figuratively and is a specially valid form of knowledge. Hazlitt, neither a religious enthusiast nor a transcendentalist, even says imagination holds communion with the soul of nature and allows poets "to foreknow and to record the feelings of all men at all times and places."

Blake's emphasis falls heavily on imagination as a power ultimately communicating and sharing with the holy power of creation, a vision that culminates in an Edenic state. "All things Exist in the Human Imagination," "Man is All Imagination," so also "God is Man & exists in us & we in him." "The Eternal Body of Man . . . The Imagination, that is, God himself," is symbolically "the Divine Body of the Lord Jesus." We are "Creating Space, Creating Time according to the wonders Divine of Human Imagination."

Wordsworth's ideas of imagination evolve from the Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800), through its 1802 version, to a new preface and "Essay Supplementary" in 1815. In The Prelude, he describes the infant:

> . . . his mind
> Even as an agent of the one great mind,
> Creates, creator and receiver both,
> Working but in alliance with the works
> Which it beholds.—Such, verily is the first > Poetic spirit of our human life.

Cf. Coleridge's definition of "primary" imagination: "the living Power and prime Agent of all human Perception, and . . . a repetition in the finite mind of the eternal act of creation in the infinite I AM." Coleridge began the Biographia as a preface to his own volume of verse, in part answering and modifying Wordsworth, but expanded it to a critical exposition and autobiography of his literary life that pivots on a reply to Wordsworth's published ideas concerning fancy and imagination. Coleridge considers that Wordsworth too closely links fancy and imagination and explains imagination too exclusively via associationism.

In the 1815 Preface, Wordsworth tries to explain how imagination creates as well as associates. The power becomes for him so vast it challenges all conception, as with the apostrophe in The Prelude after crossing the Alps, or later: "Imagination, which, in truth, / Is but another name for absolute power / And clearest insight, amplitude of mind, / And Reason in her most exalted mood." Wordsworth also claims: "Imagination having been our theme, / So also hath that intellectual Love, / For they are each in each, and cannot stand / Dividually." He uses his idea of imagination to establish new grounding in poetic lang. and vindicates it in his practice (though not always in perfect conformity with his theoretical statements). He chooses not to exert a systematic philosophical concern for the idea as Coleridge does. He even considers that the word imagination "has been overstrained . . . to meet the demands of the faculty which is perhaps the noblest of our nature."

Keats explores the idea of sympathetic imagination and *"negative capability," a search for truth or reality without any compulsive reaching after fact. Many of his letters and poems are undogmatic speculations on the value, "truth," and nature of the imaginative inner life. Shelley, regarding reason more in its deductive and experimental mode, contrasts it sharply with imagination and, on this distinction, builds his Defence of Poetry. The essay recapitulates many earlier devels. He constructs his argument through powerful images and analogies rather than by Keats's "consequitive reasoning." Shelley's impassioned and figurative prose actualizes its own subject. He emphasizes the unconscious power of imagination over the conscious will in poetic composition.

Coleridge, familiar with philosophical devels. of the idea since Plato and Aristotle, fuses and transforms them into the most suggestive and fruitful critical observations of Eng. romanticism. Though he never completes a systematic work that includes extended discussion of imagination, his theoretical pronouncements and practical insights provide rich ground. He combines Brit. empirical psychology, Platonism and Neoplatonism Scholastic and hermetic philosophies, and Ger. transcendentalism. The result is more than an admixture: he crystallizes and connects issues of perception and constitutive or regulative ideas, of associationism, of theories of lang. and poetic diction, and of the function of imagination into a mimesis that "humanizes" nature not only by reproducing natural objects and forms (the "fixities and definites" manipulated by fancy) but also by imitating the living process through which they exist and through which we feel and realize them. Unlike many contemp. Ger. writers (e.g., J. G. Fichte or Schelling), he applies the theory of imagination at the level of individual phrase and *image in the crit. of poetry.

Symbols for Coleridge are "living educts of the imagination, of that reconciling and mediatory power which, incorporating the reason in images of the sense, and organizing (as it were) the flux of the senses by the permanence and self-encircling energies of the reason, gives birth to a system of symbols, harmonious in themselves and consubstantial with the truths of which they are the conductors" (The Statesman's Manual). This definition is virtually identical to Bishop Robert Lowth's discussion of "mystical allegory" in De sacra poesi Hebraeorum (1753). Thus, even in the symbol as defined by Coleridge, we see elements of prophecy and its earlier critical devel. Various romantic definitions of symbol, allegory, myth, and schema, whether from Kant, Schelling, K.W.F. Solger, Hegel, or others, rely on imagination. Coleridge enlarges, reformulates, and applies the idea of imagination in ways seminal for poetics. He may be regarded as the most important progenitor of the New Critical valuation of *organicism and of *unity.

The Brit. devel. of the idea thus draws from both Platonic and Neoplatonic strains as well as from the line of 18th-c. empiricism initiated by Hobbes and Locke. With Coleridge, and to some extent Shelley and Carlyle, Ger. transcendental philosophy further enriches the anglophone trad., just as Brit. writing on the subject vitalized Ger. thought in the 18th c. The Ger. background draws heavily on Spinoza, Locke, Leibniz, Wolff, Addison, Shaftesbury, the "Swiss Critics" J. J. Bodmer and J. J. Breitinger, A. G. Baumgarten, Hume, and the associationists (histories of associationism are written in 1777 by Michael Hissmann and in 1792 by J.G.E. Maass). In the later 18th c., Ernst Platner, Herder, and Sulzer extend discussion into psychology, lit., culture, and myth. Sulzer declares that "mythological poems must be considered as a lang. of imagination. . . . They make a world for themselves." Tetens, the most eminent psychologist of the era, breaks the power of imagination into different levels responsible for perception, larger associations and cognition, and ultimate poetic power. He profoundly influenced Kant, and Coleridge read him carefully.

The issue in Kant is central and vexing; his presentations of imagination are multiple. Taking a less than clear-cut but prominent place in the Critique of Pure Reason, imagination is "an active faculty of synthesis" operating on sense experience, "a necessary ingredient of perception itself" that mediates between senses and understanding. But "a transcendental synthesis of imagination" also exists, so that, again, imagination is both an empirical and a transcendental faculty or power. In the Critique of Judgment, imagination is vital to the analytic of both beauty and the sublime. It is not simply reproductive and operating under "the laws of association" but also "productive and exerting an activity of its own." Kant tries to reconcile empirical views of the "reproductive" imagination with those derived from imagination in its "pure" or "productive" mode; this leads to a "tertium medium" joining the two, an idea Coleridge also suggests in the Biographia. In our perceptions, Kant claims, we "introduce into appearances that order and regularity which we name nature." In aesthetic theory, he stresses the "free play" of imagination and how, combined with taste, it draws an analogy between beauty and morality through the medium of the symbol.

Fichte proclaims "all reality is presented through the imagination." On the faculty of "the creative imagination . . . depends whether we philosophize with or without spirit . . . because the fundamental ideas . . . must be presented by the creative imagination itself. . . . The whole operation of the human spirit proceeds from the imagination, but an imagination that can be grasped no other way than through imagination." He elevates imagination as the most important epistemological faculty and bases philosophy on it. In part to resolve potential contradictions or dualities in Kant and to escape Fichte's more abstract epistemology, Friedrich Schiller writes his Ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (1795), where free play of imagination becomes Spieltrieb (the "play drive"). With antecedents of imagination as "play" or "free play" in Bacon, Kant, C. M. Wieland, and G. E. Lessing, Schiller explores imagination as an aesthetic state of being that oscillates (recalling Fichte's "schweben der Einbildungskraft") between "form" and "sense" drives. This aesthetic imagination renovates the soul and permits it to be "fully human," opening a line of utopian thought. An extensive transcendental poetics develops with Schiller, the Schlegels (A. W. and Friedrich), and Novalis. They all hold imagination to be of supreme importance in the psychological and epistemological grounding of art.

Schelling constructs his System des transzendentalen Idealismus (1800) on the idea of imagination, which in that and other works he carries further than perhaps any other thinker. It is central to his philosophy of nature and of mind as one larger system ensured by the unifying revelation of the work of art. The Kunstprodukt combines the force of nature with that of mind into something that had not previously existed in either. Imagination creates the myths that secure all cultural and spiritual significance. Finally, the artist's imagination generates the most comprehensive symbols; in them, knowledge realizes its highest manifestation. Art becomes necessary to complete philosophy; philosophy's highest goal is the philosophy of art, ultimately based on imagination in divinity, artist, philosopher, and audience.

Hegel's Aesthetik (1835) utilizes imagination or "Geist" (spirit) as a key element for his historical and critical views but does not much enlarge the theory of imagination. Goethe emphasizes imagination, though in unsystematic fashion. The hermeneutic trad. from Friedrich Schleiermacher through Wilhelm Dilthey and down to Hans-Georg Gadamer relies on imagination as an instrument of knowledge and interpretation, with Gadamer roughly retaining the older distinction between imagination and discursive reason as that between Wahrheit (truth) and Methode (method). (See HERMENEUTICS.)

Romantic writers provide the idea with its most comprehensive formulation and make the highest claims for imagination. It stands directly related to—and necessary for—perception, memory, sympathy, images, ideas, knowledge, morality, worldviews, poetry, prophecy, and religion. Santayana proclaims Emerson the first mod. philosopher to base a system on imagination rather than reason. Schelling or Coleridge may have a stronger claim, though Coleridge's later thought increasingly grasps a fuller reason, both discursive and intuitive, as subsuming imaginative power. Even a brief review of romantic manifestations of imagination threatens to expand infinitely.

Perhaps the greatest "romantic" claim is that imagination resolves contradictions and unifies the soul and being of creator and receiver, writer and reader, subject and object, and human nature and Naturgeist alike. Imagination, says Coleridge, "reveals itself in the balance or reconciliation of opposite or discordant qualities: of sameness, with difference; of general, with the concrete; the idea, with the image; the individual, with the representative." Coleridge, Schelling, Schiller, and Shelley all say that imagination or poetry calls upon the "whole" soul or individual. To characterize this activity Coleridge coins two words: in an 1802 letter, "co-adunating" (from the Lat. "to join" or "to shape into one"); and in the Biographia, the famous "esemplastic" (with its analogous Gr. basis). Schelling notes an actual etymology reminiscent of Herder: "In-Eins-Bildung" (making into one) for "Einbildungskraft." The traditional way of expressing this unifying action, recognized in Neoplatonic and hermetic circles, was to say, as Wordsworth does, that imagination "modifies" or throws "one coloring" over all its productions. As the resolution of contradictions or antinomies, imagination could be seen as a metaphysical, psychological, and artistic principle—as Kant said, a "blind power hidden in the depths of the soul"—that unifies noumenal and phenomenal, sensory and transcendental, mind and spirit, self and nature (e.g., Fichte's Ich and Nicht-Ich), even freedom and necessity. The power thus resolves Cartesian dualism and all subject/object, ego/world, Aristotelian/Platonic or Neoplatonic divisions. It drives all dialectical process and provides genuine knowledge. However, this view is tempered; Coleridge often stresses the reconciliation of opposites as much as their unity.

V. Later 19th and 20th Centuries. Such full-dress syntheses left scant room for further analysis or higher claims. Arguably, imagination had come to stand for many ideas, not one. The associated terms and adjectives grew confusing, and G. H. Lewes remarked that "there are few words more abused."

John Ruskin posits three modes of imagination and an elaborate, schematic division of fancy and imagination. He stresses the intuitive grasp of art rather than its reasoning or analysis. Walter Pater echoes Coleridge to some degree, as Wallace Stevens will, but neither adds a new dimension to the theory of imagination. In Germany, Theodore Lipps's studies of Einfühlung or *empathy are related to an imaginative grasp of living truth; in this connection, G. M. Hopkins's *"inscape" also suggests an intuition of object and the feelings it arouses. Oscar Wilde's simultaneous attacks on realism and on unrealistic romances in "The Decay of Lying" are playful defenses of what earlier had been called "feigning," now phrased in more provocative and paradoxical lang. than Sidney's or Shelley's.

Babbitt, while unsympathetic to romanticism, nevertheless develops a theory of ethical imagination similar to 18th-c. discussions. Benedetto Croce's aesthetics and poetics lean heavily on a productive imagination (fantasia) that acts under the influence of intuition and feeling to produce a unifying image. Though without extensive elaboration on the theory of imagination as such, anthropological, psychological, and psychoanalytical studies by J. G. Frazer, Claude Lévi-Strauss, Sigmund Freud, Carl Jung, Mircea Eliade, and others have significantly deepened concerns voiced by Vico and Thomas Blackwell. The interest here, as to some extent with Ernst Cassirer's theory of the symbol, is more with the formation and importance of the individual image or myth than with all the powers once attributed to imagination. The study of dreams and artistic creativity draws more attention to imagination. Richards, through his scholarship and crit. of late 18th-c. figures and esp. through Coleridge on Imagination, combines elements of a romantic aesthetic with mod. psychology and helps create the New Criticism.

Collingwood, positing imagination as a mediating faculty between sense and intellect, refashions romantic theory and attempts to give it consistent shape. Imagination provides knowledge guaranteed by the work of art, which raises perception, feelings, creation, and expression to consciousness through a concrete act. He jettisons higher claims and focuses on a comprehensive aesthetic, but the currency and effect of his views—fundamentally out of step with *postmodernism—diminish in the second half of the 20th c. More recently, neurophysiologists have attempted to analyze areas of the brain, while developmental psychologists have empirically studied artists', scientists', and children's creative activities to determine the functions played by brain hemispheres, biochemistry, the environment, habit, and association in the imaginative process, incl. poetry. Results have been mixed, with no single theory or explanation emerging.

But the notion of imagination as a reconciling or unifying power is generally opposed to the spirit of literary *modernism and postmodernism. Nor is it central to phenomenological approaches. More stress falls on the power of the individual image, or images juxtaposed, e.g., in *imagism or the metaphysical revival. Claims for art to save and enlighten, or to provide special knowledge, are reduced. Detractors of the New Criticism simplify and attack the concept of organic unity. However, though less massively than in romantic poetics, the idea of imagination continues to play a role in postmodernism. *Structuralism offers affinities with romantic organicism and an imaginative, intellectual reconstruction of reality, the creation of this "simulacrum," itself an imitation and not a copy. In mod. crit., studies of imagination in individual writers continue to proliferate. Paul Ricoeur, Emmanuel Levinas, and Jacques Derrida engage the idea. Deconstruction shuns any unifying power to resolve contradictions and builds itself—or rather deploys its various moves and strategies—in part by exploiting those contradictions or divisions. But while deconstruction seems a polar opposite of imaginative unity and organic synthesis, the romantic theory of imagination itself thrives on such contradictions and polarities. In one sense, imagination and deconstruction are allied: in crit. or philosophy, they distrust any formal system for either analysis or creativity; they rejoin poetry and philosophy through the medium of words and through a consideration of the nature and the hist. of writing in general, and figurative lang. in particular. Artists consistently retain faith in imagination, as does Doris Lessing in her

2007 Nobel lecture: "But the storyteller will be there, for it is our imaginations which shape us, keep us, create us—for good and for ill. It is our stories that will recreate us, when we are torn, hurt, even destroyed. It is the storyteller, the dream-maker, the myth-maker, that is our phoenix, that represents us at our best, and at our most creative."

■ I. Babbitt, Rousseau and Romanticism (1919); G. Santayana, Character and Opinion (1921); H. C. Warren, History of Association Psychology (1921); B. Croce, Aesthetic, trans. D. Ainslie (1922); Richards, esp. ch. 32; L. P. Smith, "Four Romantic Words," Words and Idioms (1925); M. W. Bundy, The Theory of Imagination in Classical and Modern Thought (1927); I. A. Richards, Practical Criticism (1929); M. W. Bundy, "'Invention' and 'Imagination' in the Renaissance," JEGP 29 (1930), and "Bacon's True Opinion of Poetry," SP 27 (1930); R. Wellek, Kant in England (1931); A.S.P. Woodhouse, "Collins and the Creative Imagination," Studies in English, ed. M. Wallace (1931); I. A. Richards, Coleridge on Imagination (1934); D. Bond, "'Distrust of Imagination' in English Neoclassicism," PQ 14 (1935), and "Neoclassical Psychology of the Imagination," ELH 4 (1937); R. G. Collingwood, Principles of Art (1938); C. D. Thorpe, The Aesthetic of Hobbes (1940); K. R. Wallace, Bacon on Communication and Rhetoric (1943); W. J. Bate, "Sympathetic Imagination in 18th-Century English Criticism," ELH 12 (1945); W. J. Bate and J. Bullitt, "Distinctions between Fancy and Imagination," MLN 60 (1945); W. J. Bate, From Classic to Romantic (1946); W. Stevens, The Necessary Angel (1951); A.S.P. Woodhouse, "Romanticism and the History of Ideas," English Studies Today, ed. C. Wrenn and G. Bullough (1951); Crane; Abrams; E. L. Fackenheim, "Schelling's Philosophy of the Literary Arts," PQ 4 (1954); Wellek, v. 1; M. H. Nicolson, Science and Imagination (1956); R. Cohen, "Association of Ideas and Poetic Unity," PQ 36 (1957); Wimsatt and Brooks; E. D. Hirsch Jr., Wordsworth and Schelling (1960); E. Tuveson, The Imagination as a Means of Grace (1960); W. P. Albrecht, Hazlitt and the Creative Imagination (1961), chs. 1, 3, 5; F. Yates, The Art of Memory (1966); T. McFarland, Coleridge and the Pantheist Tradition (1969); H. Mürchen, Die Einbildungskraft bei Kant (1970); R. Barthes, "The Structuralist Activity," Critical Essays, trans. R. Howard ([1963] 1972); W. Wetherbee, Platonism and Poetry in the Twelfth Century (1972)—for imagination and ingenium; R. Scholes, Structuralism in Literature (1974), ch. 6; E. S. Casey, Imagining (1976); M. Warnock, Imagination (1976); J. Derrida, Writing and Difference, trans. A. Bass (1978); J. Engell, The Creative Imagination (1981); D. Tracy, The Analogical Imagination (1981); D. P. Verene, Vico's Science of Imagination (1981); T. Todorov, Theories of the Symbol, trans. C. Porter ([1977] 1982); P. de Man, The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984); E. Dod, Die Vernünftigkeit der Imagination (1985)—on Schiller and Shelley; T. McFarland, Originality and Imagination (1985); M. Kipperman, Beyond Enchantment (1986)—Eng. poetry and Ger. idealism; C. G. Ryn, Will, Imagination and Reason (1986)—on Babbitt; W. C. Chittick, The Sufi Path of Knowledge (1989); Coleridge, Keats, and the Imagination, ed. J. R. Barth and J. L. Mahoney (1989); Coleridge's Theory of Imagination Today, ed. C. Gallant (1989); B. Croce, Essays on Literature and Literary Criticism, ed. and trans. M. E. Moss (1990); R. Kearney, The Wake of Imagination (1994); F. Burwick, Poetic Madness and the Romantic Imagination (1996); W. K. Mahony, The Artful Universe (1998)—Vedic imagination; J. R. Barth, "Imagination," New Dictionary of the History of Ideas, ed. M. C. Horowitz (2004).

J. Engell

IMAGISM. A school of *free verse that developed between 1912 and 1917; it originated in London but developed largely in the U.S., where it had a stronger impact. Imagism opposed the excesses of Victorian poetry by insisting upon an ascetic, disciplined poetic technique; Kenner famously called its stress upon compression and direct presentation a form of "technical hygiene." Equally important, however, was the example imagism set for the promotion and circulation of modernist verse. As early as 1917, Harold Monro could write that the imagists "took every possible opportunity of preparing themselves a public." Instrumental in both respects were the numerous critical and polemical writings issued on imagism's behalf by Ezra Pound and others, documents that have been as influential as the poems themselves.

Imagism was initially disseminated through the cultivation of relationships (and controversies) through a few key modernist "little magazines": Poetry: A Magazine of Verse, The Glebe, and The Little Review in the U. S.; and The New Age and The New Freewoman (later The Egoist) in Britain. The January 1913 issue of Poetry featured three poems by Hilda Doolittle, signed "H.D., 'imagiste,'" and a report on the London scene by Pound mentioned "[t]he youngest school . . . that has the nerve to call itself a school." The March 1913 Poetry included F. S. Flint's essay "Imagisme" and Pound's "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste." Flint reported that, rather than producing a *manifesto, the school had come up with only a few rules: "1. Direct treatment of the 'thing,' whether subjective or objective. 2. To use absolutely no word that did not contribute to the presentation. 3. As regarding rhythm: to compose in sequence of the musical phrase, not in sequence of a metronome." He also mentioned a fourth principle, "a certain 'Doctrine of the Image,' which they had not committed to writing [and which] did not concern the public." This hermetic quality, like H.D.'s identity, was a calculated effect of imagist self-promotion, but it also pointed to a visionary aspect of imagism that was evident in "A Few Don'ts." Here, Pound defined the image as "that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time" before providing a new list of technical proscriptions.

Whereas imagism has been called the first Eng.-lang. avant-garde, it can also be understood as a reaction against Eur. avant-garde movements (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS). Rainey, for instance, has shown how Poundian imagism developed in direct response to the sensational London reception of F. T. Marinetti's *futurism. Whereas futurism called for the destruction of the past, Flint's essay posited that the imagists "were not a revolutionary school; their only endeavor was to write in accordance with the best tradition." Yet if imagism was intended to be, in Rainey's phrase, "the first anti-avant-garde," it nevertheless circulated with the currency of an avant-garde movement.

The first phase of imagism culminated in the anthol. Des Imagistes (1914), which included poems by Flint, Amy Lowell, W. C. Williams, Allen Upward, Ford Madox Hueffer, and James Joyce, in addition to those of Pound, H.D., and Richard Aldington. The *anthol. form testified to imagism's ambiguous attitudes toward modernity and trad. On one hand, the anthol. was a patently commercial form that had been exploited for the avant-garde by Marinetti and whose economic potential had been realized by Edward Marsh's much more conservative Georgian Poetry collection (see GEORGIANISM). On the other hand, the anthol. had been the form that preserved the ancient trads. upon which the core imagists had drawn and this authenticated their deepest aspirations in a way that would not have been true for Marsh or Marinetti. Aldington and H.D. had strongly relied on the Greek Anthology* (H.D.'s first poems appeared under the title "Verses, Translations, and Reflections from 'The Anthology'"), and Pound and Upward's Chinese sources had been, as they knew, preserved in two ancient anthols., one compiled by Confucius, the other by Qu Yuan. This particular admixture of ancient Gr. and Asian sources pointed to the movement's origins at the heart of the Brit. Empire.

Such dynamics were less characteristic of imagism's second phase. Pound abandoned the movement following a bitter dispute with Amy Lowell concerning the group's leadership. A special issue of The Egoist ed. by Aldington in 1915 attempted to consolidate the movement while charting new directions, notably engagement with World War I. Instituting a more democratic representation of the poetry, Lowell made imagism the financial success Des Imagistes had not been with three annual anthols. titled Some Imagist Poets in 1915, 1916, and 1917. These included the imagists' own programmatic prefaces, but their earlier strictures were relaxed to enable them to claim a place within a continuum of "all great poetry." Lowell's promotional genius inspired a wide readership but also a host of recruits (and parodists); although Lowell had archly told Pound that he could not copyright the word imagism, she eventually would look into the possibility of copyrighting the name herself.

The Lowell-Aldington regime attenuated imagism's earlier visionary, psychological claims. Pound's first citation of the "School of Images" had situated "Les Imagistes" as "the descendants of the forgotten school of 1909," the Poets' Club led by the philosopher T. E. Hulme. Inspired by Henri Bergson, Hulme had stressed the centrality of an "intuitive language" comprised of "visual concrete" poetic images. Whereas an older trad. of crit. focused on the deeply materialist and antiromantic quality of the image (qualities that highlighted its differentiation from Fr. *symbolism), a more recent phase, led by Tiffany's study of Pound, has given renewed attention to the image's simultaneously material and metaphysical character and has drawn it into conversation with Marxian and Freudian theory. Pound's famous juxtaposition of natural and metropolitan images in the haiku-inspired "In a Station of the Metro" can thus be understood as the means of summoning an archaic vision of the dead. An appreciation of the simultaneously objective and visionary character of the image is equally essential for reading H.D., whose work remains the preeminent embodiment of imagist doctrine. In the early "Epigram (After the Greek)," H.D.'s condensation of an ancient, anonymous epitaph endows the original with a new emphasis upon the union of love with absence and death:

> The golden one is gone from the banquets
> She, beloved of Atimetus,
> The swallow, the bright Homonoea:
> Gone the dear chatterer;
> Death succeeds Atimetus.

H.D.'s poem makes explicit the fascination with dead cultures implicit in Pound's poem, doing so in a series of rhythmic cadences, with the single metaphor of a bird that has taken flight.

See CHINESE POETICS.

■ E. Pound, Ripostes (1912); F. S. Flint, "Imagisme," Poetry 1 (1913); The Egoist, Special Imagist Number (May 1, 1915); T. E. Hulme, Speculations, ed. H. Read (1924); E. Pound, Letters, ed. D. D. Paige (1950); S. K. Coffman, Imagism (1951); E. Pound, Literary Essays (1954); F. Kermode, The Romantic Image (1957); H. Kenner, The Pound Era (1971); D. Perkins, A History of Modern Poetry, v. 1 (1976), ch. 15; H.D., End to Torment (1979); M. Levenson, A Genealogy of Modernism (1984); S. S. Friedman and R. B. DuPlessis, Signets (1990); R. G. Babcock, "Verses, Translations, and Reflections from 'The Anthology,'" Sagetrieb 14 (1995); Z. Qian, Orientalism and Modernism (1995); D. Tiffany, Radio Corpse (1995); L. Rainey, Institutions of Modernism (1998); Amy Lowell, ed. A. Munich and M. Bradshaw (2004); A. Thacker, "'Mad after Foreign Notions,'" Geographies of Modernism, ed. P. Brooker and A. Thacker (2005).

J. BRADDOCK

IMITATION. Refers to three broad facets of poetics—theories of *representation, practices of instruction, and strategies for writing in response to authorial and textual models. These senses can be distinguished analytically, but historically and conceptually they share a large measure of overlap. Though much critical reflection focuses on the status of representation, imitation has a significant performative dimension as a means to constitute and shape modes of identity, expression, and imagination. From cl. antiquity through the Enlightenment, imitation is a central feature in discussions of lit. and the arts (particularly the visual arts and music) as well as education, social and political institutions, and scientific understanding. From the romantic era onward, it is generally eclipsed by *originality or *imagination as a heuristic category for describing, analyzing, and evaluating artistic production. Imitation remains, however, a key for engaging trad. in mod. lit. and for positioning works and performance in *postmodern, *postcolonial, and globalized culture.

In theories of representation, imitation conventionally translates Gr. mimesis*. Mimesis probably referred originally to ritual impersonation involving masks, gestures, music, song, and dance. Plato expands this range of meaning and reveals some of the abiding contradictions and tensions within imitation. In books 2 and 3 of the Republic, he voices concern over the power exercised by *myths as cultural narratives and by the speeches in *tragedy as they shape the character of future guardians of the city. The prime issue is the content of verbal imitation: violent and disgraceful episodes in Homer, Hesiod, and the tragic poets can potentially corrupt the young by offering examples that compromise a heroic ethos. In book 10, Plato tries through dialectic to establish the truth-value of imitation, hence the credibility and utility of artistic representation. He locates mimesis at a third remove from reality (after the ideal Form and its concrete embodiment in the object represented through art). His exemplary agent in this discussion is the painter who, like the poet, deals with appearance instead of being and appeals to passions rather than the higher principle of reason. In late dialogues (notably the Sophist and the Timaeus), Plato seems to hold open some possibilities for imitation as a means of grasping reality. It applies, for instance, to explaining institutions and first principles. But he never fully resolves the questions raised in the Republic. In later thinkers, Plato's critique of imitation as a copy or counterfeit of reality sustains a long trad. of skepticism about art as well as a troubled recognition of its capacity to influence belief and action.

Aristotle approaches imitation in the Poetics by distinguishing its medium, objects, and mode, and he implicitly addresses the concerns raised by Plato. Defining the objects of imitation as the actions of greater and lesser men, he finds a place for the passions in the theory of *catharsis and asserts the power of verbal imitation to portray (at least in tragedy) what we would not want otherwise to see or endure—precisely the content that generates anxiety in the Republic. At the same time, he shifts the philosophical basis of imitation by associating poetry with universals and hist. with particulars as objects of knowledge. Imitation, he argues, is not a condition of misapprehension but the product of two human instincts, a pleasure in learning and an innate attraction to harmony and *rhythm. It does not copy nature or reproduce a chronology of events but presents instead a transposed, artificial rendering of action with its own internal, structural coherence.

A double trad. follows from Plato and Aristotle. By one account, imitation is an imperfect and derivative copy of reality that can produce only illusion. By the other, imitation is a craft of making verbal structures and artifacts that exhibit organization and *unity and correspond meaningfully to human action and experience. These positions share important ground with other trads. that emerge in antiquity and the Middle Ages. Neoplatonic imitation reflects the hierarchy of Plato's Forms. In Boethius's 6th-c. De musica, the mathematical proportion of sounds mirrors relations such as those of body to soul or the rational order of the created universe. Christian writers approach ludic imitation in starkly diverging ways. Paul sees the Apostles as men doomed to die in a spectacle of martyrdom for the world, angels, and humankind (1 Corinthians 4:9). Bernard of Clairvaux (Epistula 87) amplifies Paul's metaphor of ludic imitation into an ironic form of humility in which suffering provokes ridicule in the secular world but joy when seen from a divine perspective. Tertullian (De spectaculis) rejects ritual and theatrical imitation as idolatry.

Augustine offers a notable example of the profound ambivalence attached to imitation. In his Confessions, he records his pleasure and moral confusion at seeing the death of Dido enacted on the stage and following the wanderings of Aeneas, ignorant all the while, he says, of his own spiritual death and moral vagrancy. He finds the danger repeated in the effects of imitation on his friends at public games and the theater. In his De musica, poetry is said to produce not only deceptive images but images of images (phantasmata) that lie at the very entrance of error. The med. encyclopedists Isidore of Seville and Hrabanus Maurus carried forward Augustine's critique of imitation in their descriptions of theater. By contrast, in the widely cited definition of *comedy ascribed to Cicero by the grammarian Donatus, imitation operates as a reliable guide to knowledge of the social world: comedy is "an imitation of life, a mirror of custom, and image of truth." The key terms of this formulation—"imitation," "mirror," and "image"—apply equally, of course, to the critique and defense of imitation, depending on the value ascribed to *figuration. In the De vulgari eloquentia, the first vernacular poetics, Dante gives a "true definition of poetry" as "a fiction expressed in verse according to rhetoric and music." His definition follows in the general line of Aristotle's view and assumes that imitation produces a "construction" (in this case the form of the It. canzone*) that derives from the objectified, externalized art of making things.

Horace's Ars poetica effects a decisive trans. of theories of imitation from cl. antiquity to later literary periods. Among the precepts he offers, Horace directs "the schooled imitator [doctum imitatorem] to look toward the model of life and manners and create lively expression there" (317–18). Amplifying his dictum that poets wish either to benefit or please their audiences, he urges, "Let whatever is made with the aim of pleasing be close to true things [proxima ueris]" (338). Horace follows the doctrine of literary *decorum to regulate imagination and expression and to communicate with an audience by recognizing its expectations. At the same time, he gestures toward a criterion of verisimilitude, in which art reflects nature and social behavior and can be judged by its correspondence to commonly perceived reality. A crucial displacement occurs, however, from Aristotle's definitional approach to imitation. Horace presents a rhetorical understanding of the persuasive, socially constituted congruence thought to hold between representation and reality.

Horace's view established a framework in which Aristotelian imitation was received in the Middle Ages and the Ren. Although William of Moerbeke produced an accurate Lat. trans. of the Poetics (1278), the version that exercised some limited influence was Herman Alemannus's trans. of Averroës's Ar. Middle Commentary on the "Poetics" (1256). In Herman's trans., imitation is assimilatio (likening), and it draws on common experience and appeals to the faculty of imagination in the service of reaching moral judgments and apportioning praise and blame. The synthesis of Aristotle and Horace continues in the early mod. period in Antonio Minturno's assertion that imitation involves recognition chiefly based on manners and morals (De poeta, 1559). Lodovico Castelvetro's trans. of and commentary on the Poetics (1570, rev. 1576) renders imitation as rassomiglianza (likeness) and bases the concept on verisimilitude, though it distinguishes literal copying from the craft required of the poet. J. C. Scaliger's Poetices libri septem (1561), while asserting the primacy of art over nature, equates imitation with verisimilitude and argues for the didactic ends of representation.

In Ren. England, Roger Ascham's The Scholemaster (posthumously pub. in 1570) touches briefly on the theoretical dimensions of imitation in comedy and tragedy, citing Plato's discussion and evoking the analogy between poetry and painting. The analogy recurs in Philip Sidney's definition of poetry in his Defence of Poesy (1595), where it joins Aristotelian mimesis to serve the Horatian ends of instruction and pleasure: "Poetry therefore is an art of imitation, for so Aristotle terms it in the word mimesis—that is to say a representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture with this end, to teach and delight." Sidney goes beyond the idea of imitation as a reproduction, however, as he places the work of art created by poetic imagination (the "golden" world) above nature (the "brazen" world). George Puttenham (The Arte of English Poesie, 1589) judges poetry "an art not only of making, but also of imitation" but establishes a hierarchy that locates divine and natural instincts as the highest causes of aesthetic creation, followed by experience, and ending in imitation.

Imitation as an instructional practice is already implicit in Plato's moral concerns with the effects of representation. It becomes especially prominent in the rhetorical pedagogy of antiquity and the Middle Ages, in which it supplements talent (ingenium), curricular instruction (ars), and practice (exercitatio). Within pedagogy, imitation divided into two complementary spheres: it taught morals by copying the example of virtuous men and shaped rhetorical and literary style by following models from a *canon of orators and authors. The connection between morals and acquired verbal facility begins at least with Isocrates and remains a constant feature of the trad. In Cicero's De oratore (2.22–23), the first step toward the formation of an orator is the choice of someone to imitate, the second is practice, and the third is written composition. Imitation, building on the instructional techniques of grammar, involves a close analysis of texts. Writing extends to paraphrase and trans., in verse and prose, as well as to set exercises and invented speeches. Seneca's Epistula 84 (to Lucilius) offers three metaphors for imitation widely cited in the Ren., the Enlightenment, and beyond: writers should copy bees who gather their materials from many sources and blend them into one compound; like food in the body, materials must be digested and made into one substance; and the mind should hide what it has used and bring forth what it has made, in a relation like that of child to father.

In its dual sense of imitation, the rhetorical trad. significantly broadens the scope of imitation beyond copying or representation. Models of conduct and style are embodied and performative. One decides whom to imitate and, thus, absorbs and produces an ethical *persona and a style of expression—or, better, a repertoire of expressive styles. Henry Peacham's The Garden of Eloquence (1577, 1593) follows cl. doctrine in saying that an orator reproduces not only what was said previously by his model but his utterance, *pronunciation, and gesture. (Ovid ascribes these skills to Morpheus, the son of Somnus, in Metamorphoses 11.) Models of rhetorical imitation also have an acknowledged hist. In the Brutus, Cicero gives an account of orators and public figures, which includes exemplary practitioners, monitory cases, and even examples of the risible and ridiculous. The creation of a moral agent, speaker, or poetic stylist is thus a dynamic interchange between examples and living beings who absorb and transform influences. While Quintilian acknowledges that a significant portion of art depends on imitation, he holds that imitation by itself is not adequate (Institutio oratoria 10.2.4), any more than authoritative models are themselves without blemishes. His discussion turns fundamentally on the reciprocity of imitation and *invention and on the exercise of judgment (10.2.14). Emulation serves as a middle term between imitation and invention; it reflects, moreover, the shifting ratios of deference and assertive rivalry by which one establishes authority and becomes in turn a model for imitation. This process depends not merely on the ability to internalize models but on the critical capacity to analyze their grammatical and rhetorical structures and to locate them within social and political hist.

The Ren. debate on *Ciceronianism reframes the issues that emerged in antiquity. Unlike Cicero and Quintilian, who confronted the authority of Gr., humanists faced a practice of Lat. writing already securely in place within nearly every facet of official culture, as well as vernaculars with growing claims to documentary functions and literary prestige. Cicero's Lat. offered a standard for prose, as did Virgil's for poetry. Ciceronians argued for an absolute standard of correctness, while their opponents, perhaps most notably Erasmus in his satirical dialogue Ciceronianus (1528), emphasized the radical contradiction of restricting imitation to one source while expecting writers to exercise critical judgment, emulate the ancients, and generate an authentic but independent equivalent to the original. The pragmatic resolution for most theorists was to admit a multiplicity of models for imitation. If this step led away from an impossible standard, it did not fully resolve other problems, such as locating selfhood within a derivate writing and speaking subject, assimilating the Bible and Christian authors into a canon, dealing with historical changes in lang., or decontextualizing vocabulary and phrasing in order for them to remain useful as sources for expression.

Imitation serves a variety of performative aims besides rhetorical training. In med. Lat., the verb imitari is used in the ceremony of ordination in the sense of realizing an ideal that has grown out of faith and teaching. The 12th-c. Tegernsee Accessus ad auctores, an introduction to canonical authors for schoolboys, credits Ovid with writing in imitation of women's voices in the Heroides for the purpose of demonstrating which ones should and should not be imitated. A 13th-c. commentary on Geoffrey of Vinsauf's Poetria nova, the most influential of the med. prescriptive "arts of poetry," praises Geoffrey as both a rhetor and an orator and observes of the latter, "to speak artfully is to imitate the precepts of art [artis precepta]." Dante sets out the principle that vernacular poets should imitate the ancients, who drew on grammar and rules, while he in his role as commentator is bound to imitate learned works on poetic doctrine (De vulgari eloquentia 2.4.3). In the Canterbury Tales, the frame tale for Chaucer's narrative is premised on imitating fictional characters performing speech acts: "Whoso shal telle a tale after a man, / He moot reherce as ny as evere he kan / Everich a word, if it be in his charge" ("General Prologue," 1731–33). In preaching and devotion, Catholics and later Protestants find models for spiritual imitation in Christ, the saints, and the martyrs.

Several challenges to the pedagogy of imitation arise within the rhetorical trad. In his treatise Peri hypsous (On the Sublime; discovered by Francesco Robortello in 1554 and widely promulgated by Nicolas Boileau's trans. of 1674), Longinus treats the violent feelings created by great writing and lang., which aim at emotional transport and ecstasy rather than persuasion. Imitation and emulation are means by which the soul can shape itself imaginatively from the models of great writers in order to produce this effect and communicate it to an audience. Longinus's comparison for the *sublime is the inspiration of the Pythian priestess who delivers her oracles, as if divinely impregnated by the vapors of Apollo's sacred cave. His method is to imagine what Homer, Plato, Demosthenes, or Thucydides would have said when elaborating and expressing an elevated idea. In the 16th c., Michel de Montaigne, by contrast, exploits the potential of imitation and the emulation of style to a radically different end from transport and ecstasy. Ostensibly subordinated to the authors yet able to conceal his borrowings from them, he argues in his essay "On Books" (Essais 2.10) that his object is to know his natural rather than acquired faculties. He resituates the Horatian formula so that he reads intermittently and selectively for pleasure and for the usefulness of self-knowledge and the conduct of life. The "maistres du mestier" (for him Lat. writers) serve not as models to absorb but as known points against which to measure a self at once deferential and resistant to the influences that have helped shape it. Besides the challenges represented by Longinus and Montaigne, imitation comes under the pressure of historical shifts both within and against the project of Ren. humanism. The querelle des anciens et des modernes* (quarrel of ancients and moderns), begun in late 17th-c. France and continued in England, had as its immediate question whether to follow the models of cl. writers or the new learning derived from method and science. Behind that question lay foundational disputes over imitation. Were the models of the ancients common to human nature and, therefore, immediately applicable, even familiar (as they were to Petrarch and others), or were they historically specific and in some measure remote? What kind of learning might imitation of the ancients convey to an age that had begun to distinguish science and the arts as increasingly distinct realms of knowledge?

Imitation as a strategy of writing emerges from the instructional practice of grammar and rhet. The aim is to produce a work that stands in some significant relation to canonical masterpieces, whether as a text that appropriates the prestige of its literary predecessors or as one that seeks to rival them. In this respect, imitation becomes a form of invention, the discovery of the materials and informing plan of a work. Horace's advice on depicting character—either follow convention or devise something self-consistent (Ars poetica 119)—expanded to include the entire project of composition. It underwrites the distinction that appears in med. prescriptive poetics between materia executa or pertractata (subject matter already treated) and materia illibata (subject matter not yet treated in poetry or prose). Both kinds require imitation, though their strategies of composition differ.

For materials treated by earlier writers, Geoffrey of Vinsauf urges his students not to follow the vestigia verborum (the footsteps of the words) but to be silent where the source text speaks and to speak where it is silent. Geoffrey's term vestigia is itself a gesture toward literary imitation, for it evokes the ending of the Thebaid where Statius directs his poem to follow Virgil's Aeneid at a distance and always honor (or speak to) its footprints: "longe sequere et uestigia semper adora" (Thebaid 12.817). Following a text, in this sense, implies a critical reading of the source and a recognition of what the source leaves unexamined or unexpressed. For materials not yet treated, the process of composition depends on a form of imitation that likewise generates a parallel work, often in style or genre. The rota virgiliana* described in John of Garland's Parisiana poetria sets out three corresponding lists of topics for *pastoral, *georgic, and *epic poetry according to rank, place, occupation, and accoutrements; in so doing, it charts a course for a poetic career (the cursus honorum by which a writer advances from lower to higher genres), and it offers an image of the social order. Such "material" invention originates in the Virgil commentaries of Donatus and Servius, and the authorial paradigm remained vital for Jacopo Sannazaro, Pierre de Ronsard, Torquato Tasso, Edmund Spenser, Miguel de Cervantes, and John Milton among others. The writer of new materials composes his work within discursive conventions that immediately link it to generic intertexts.

Imitation depends on a relocation of authorial and textual models, and it seeks to create not replicas but counterparts responsive to changed historical contexts. Virgil appropriates Homer's Odyssey and Iliad, respectively, in the two halves of the Aeneid. Dante redirects Virgil's unfinished imperial epic to a Christian cosmos in the Divina commedia, while Mapheus Vegius offers a form of narrative closure by adding a 13th book to Virgil's poem. The poet Prudentius (ca. 348–405) composes a body of work informed by the idea of creating Christian equivalents to cl. genres, notably but not exclusively in rewriting Virgil's battle scenes as contests between virtues and vices in the Psychomachia. Ovid's Ars amatoria provides a model for med. Lat. homoerotic verse and material for generic imitations such as the elegiac comoediae. The stories of Thebes, Troy, and Rome, which served as the mythical-historical foundation of Eur. political narratives, found vernacular expression and chivalric contexts in the 12th-c. Fr. romans d'antiquité. Chaucer's self-appointed disciple John Lydgate calls his master "Dant in Englyssh," by which he means to recognize Chaucer's overt gestures toward Dante and perhaps to identify the *dream vision of the incomplete House of Fame as a functional analogue to the Commedia, different in scale but comparable in theme. Boccaccio, Ariosto, Tasso, Spenser, and Cervantes negotiate a different ratio of genre and literary prestige by adapting the popular and chivalric romance to epic and the novel.

Ren. writers show a particularly keen understanding of what imitation involves as a principle of composition, particularly as it grows out of pedagogy and a curriculum of reading. Ascham emphasizes the faculty of judgment required to follow a literary model, and he describes two approaches to imitation, one a dissimilar treatment of the same material and the other a similar treatment of different material. Ben Jonson follows the same principles in asserting that a poet or maker must "bee able to convert the substance, or Riches of an other Poet to his owne use" (Timber). Focusing on Petrarch's ambitious body of writing, Greene (1982) proposes that four kinds of imitation can be distinguished within the humanist trad.: reproductive (following a cl. subtext with reverential fidelity), eclectic (mixing a variety of allusions and sources), heuristic (revealing yet distancing subtexts), and dialectical (staging the resistance or ambivalence of a work to its subtext).

In later periods, imitation has a diminished though continuing presence in poetic theory and literary production. John Dryden sees imitation as a form of trans. in which a writer can diverge from the words and sense of the source and take "only some general hints from the Original" ("Preface Concerning Ovid's Epistles," 1680). The imitation of nature is a commonplace of aesthetic theory through the neoclassical period. In the early 19th c., William Hazlitt's "On Imitation" (1817) contends that imitation excites curiosity and comparison, and so "it opens a new field of inquiry, and leads the attention to a variety of details and distinctions not perceived before." Romantic, postromantic, and mod. writers employ imitation to evoke rather than recreate earlier works and to delineate their own modernity (see MODERNISM, ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS). Imitation designates the unclosed gaps with the original texts in Ezra Pound's trans. of the OE "Seafarer" (1911) and James Joyce's Ulysses (1922), in surrealist retellings of cl. tragedy and myth (see SURREALISM), and in Robert Lowell's Imitations (1961). In postmod. writing and performance, imitation stands behind the principle that cultural expression depends on reproducing earlier cultural forms. In Af. Am. lit. and culture, *signifying operates as a practice of simultaneous imitation and troping. Postcolonial writing takes the dominant forms and myths of Eur. lit. as one point of departure for recontextualizing and challenging the legacy of imperialism.

The mod. critics most committed to revisiting imitation are the mid-20th-c. *Chicago school, notably R. S. Crane, Richard McKeon, and Elder Olson, who proposed a neo-Aristotelian emphasis on imitation of human actions as the basis of literary art (contra the then-dominant attention of the *New Criticism to *form, rhet., and figuration); and the Fr. critic René Girard, who developed an ambitious theory according to which the literary imitation of reality reveals the more profound processes of imitation—of desire for an object, and finally of violence against an enemy—at the root of culture itself. The Canadian critic Northrop Frye placed imitation near the center of a systematic account of the distinctiveness of lit., which as an imitation of typical (rather than particular) action is more philosophical than hist. and as an imitation of general (rather than specific) thought is more historical than philosophy; but Frye was more interested in the genres, forms, and modes that result from imitation than the process itself. The Ger. philologist Erich Auerbach was less thoroughgoing than these contemporaries, but his Mimesis (1946, trans. into Eng. 1953), which concerns the interpretive rather than theoretical issues occasioned by imitation, is probably the most influential treatment of the concept in the 20th c. The concept of *intertextuality devised by Julia Kristeva and adapted by Roland Barthes, Gérard Genette, and other poststructuralist theorists provides a means for situating the literary *work within a network of previous *texts, *conventions, and codes (see POSTSTRUCTURALISM). The anxiety of *influence plotted by Harold Bloom as a struggle of assertion and belatedness operates within the dialectical structure of imitation. In recent theorizing about authorship, imitation emerges not only as a means of self-definition but as a gesture toward hist., culture, and politics.

See FEIGNING, REPRESENTATION.

■ H. Gmelin, "Das Prinzip der Imitatio in den romanischen Literaturen der Renaissance," Romanische Forschungen 46 (1932); R. McKeon, "Literary Criticism and the Concept of Imitation in Antiquity," MP 34 (1936); J. De Ghellinck, "Imitari, Imitatio," Bulletin du Cange 15 (1941); R. S. Crane, The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry (1953); Curtius; Weinberg; R. Girard, Deceit, Desire, and the Novel, trans. Y. Freccero (1961), and To Double Business Bound (1978); D. A. Russell, "De imitation," Creative Imitation and Latin Literature, ed. D. West and T. Woodman (1979); G. W. Pigman III, "Versions of Imitation in the Renaissance," RQ 23 (1980); T. M. Greene, The Light in Troy: Imitation and Discovery in Renaissance Poetry (1982); J.-C. Carron, "Imitation and Intertextuality in the Renaissance," NLH 19 (1988); CHLC; G. Gebauer and C. Wulf, Mimesis: Culture—Art—Society, trans. D. Reneau (1995); J. M. Ziolkowski, "The Highest Form of Compliment: Imitatio in Medieval Latin Culture," Poetry and Philosophy in the Middle Ages, ed. J. Marenbon (2001); European Literary Careers: The Author from Antiquity to the Renaissance, ed. P. G. Cheney and F. A. de Armas (2002).

R. R. EDWARDS

IMPRESSIONISM. Impressionism as a term related to poetry owes its existence to a poetic ambition, prevalent roughly between 1890 and 1910, inspired by the visual arts and focused on achieving ever neater verbal subtlety and nuances in poems, novellas, and lyrical, mainly one-act, plays. It exemplified the Horatian conception of ut pictura poesis*, although with a specific emphasis on subjectivity in expression. But impressionism also suggested the possibility of blending inwardness with expressiveness. Claude Monet's painting Impression: Soleil Levant (1874) exposed this new style for the first time to viewers who were mainly used to mimetic renderings of nature and social life in the visual and literary arts.

Etymologically speaking, phrases like "making an impression," "being impressionistic," or creating something in an "impressionist style" offer three different categories related to the concept and conception of impressionism. The Latin word impressio, from which impressionism derives, contains a range of meanings itself. It refers to the art of rhetorical articulation, to traces of particular phenomena and their imprint on the soul, and to a military attack. Even the latter is of interest here in view of the way that impressions are intended to strike, if not overwhelm, the spectator.

"Being impressionistic" is a postimpressionist quality judgment of some ambiguity, for it suggests texts or arguments that are highly illustrative or colorful but also lack coherence and discursive stringency. "Making an impression" is normally associated with a person's making his or her mark. In aesthetic terms, however, it is the artistic object and, through it, the work of art that impresses the viewer or, in more general terms, the recipient.

Impressionism is the theory of visual impact in the arts connected with a sense of the incomplete; after all, the impressionist only wishes to give a particular impression of the artistic object. That is to say, impressionism is a fundamental expression of a subjective point of view. The evocative yet subtle use of color, light, shade, and often blurred contours in paintings by Claude Monet, James Whistler, or Max Liebermann emphasizes the representation of mere segments of a broader picture.

The poetics of impressionism considers mainly atmosphere and objects as well as the effective emancipation from their "real-world" surroundings. Impressionism is, therefore, antimimetic but also antihistorical. It was as much a reaction against *realism in art and lit. as a rejection of *historicism. Instead, it favored challenging the receptive capacity of the senses as well as the sheer feeling for things and situations. Therefore, the Goncourt brothers, e.g., as historians of the present, were in their personal journals as impressionist as Marcel Proust, Peter Altenberg, or even Franz Hessel, whose book Spazieren in Berlin (1929), recognized by Walter Benjamin as a literary masterpiece, represents perhaps the last example of a distinctly impressionist approach to modernist writing. Benjamin himself, like K.W.F. Schlegel and Friedrich Nietzsche before him, exemplified and practiced impressionism in philosophy, or rather he treated thought as if it were an intellectual impression. In turn, this approach illustrated the tension between the "ideal" of ideological stringency—in Benjamin's case, Marxism—and the attraction of plurality offered by impressionism. In intellectual terms, then, impressionism was, in the age of isms, essentially an anti-ideological ideology.

In poetry and poetic prose, though, impressionism lived off the suggestiveness of sound and rhythm supported by tantalizing verbal images (e.g., in Stéphane Mallarmé's "L'Après-midi d'un faune," 1876). By 1900, literary impressionism had become a genuinely Eur. literary phenomenon, with Gabriele D'Annunzio in Italy; Paul Verlaine, Paul Bourget, early André Gide, and Marcel Proust in France; Maurice Maeterlinck in Belgium; J. P. Jacobsen and Herman Bang in Denmark; and Knut Hamsun in Norway. But the hub of literary impressionism lay in Ger.-lang. cultures with, to mention but a few names, Detlev von Liliencron, early Hugo von Hofmannsthal and R. M. Rilke, Richard Dehmel, Max Dauthendey, Eduard Keyserling, early Robert Walser, Leopold von Andrian, and early Stefan Zweig. The crossovers among impressionism, *symbolism, and Jugendstil are of particular interest, as is the way in which impressionism transformed into *expressionism. In England, the most elaborate *manifesto on impressionism can be found in Ford Madox Ford's essay pub. under the same title in 1914. Together with Verlaine's "Art poétique" (1884), it provides the poetological framework for a conception of artistic expression that never really obtained the status of a movement. Ford traces impressionism back to William Hogarth and his Analysis of Beauty (1753) but argues "that one is an Impressionist because one tries to produce an illusion of reality—or rather the business of Impressionism is to produce that illusion." Arguably, the greatest illusion of the impressionists was to think that this position could be maintained.

■ R. Hamann, Der Impressionismus in Leben und Kunst (1907); A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter im Impressionismus (1911); M. Picard, Das Ende des Impressionismus (1920); H. Breysig, Eindruckskunst und Ausdruckskunst (1927); K. Brösel, Veranschaulichung im Realismus, Impressionismus und Frühexpressionismus (1928); L. Thon, Die Sprache des deutschen Impressionismus (1928); O. Walzel, Wesenszüge des deutschen Impressionismus (1930); R. Moser, L'Impressionisme français (1951); J. Gibbs, "Impressionism as a Literary Movement," Modern Language Journal 36 (1952); J. Lethève, Impressionistes et symbolistes devant la presse (1959); K. Brinkmann, Impressionismus und Expressionismus in deutscher Literatur (1960); H. Sommerhalter, Zum Begriff des literarischen Impressionismus (1961); R. Hamann and J. Hermand, Impressionismus (1972); U. Karthaus, Impressionismus, Symbolismus und Jugendstil (1977); H. Marhold, Impressionismus in der deutschen Dichtung (1985); Geschichte der deutschen Literatur, vom 18. Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart, band II/2, ed. V. Žmegac (1995).

R. Görner

INCANTATION (Lat. incantare, "to chant, bewitch, cast a spell"). Use of a ritualistic formula spoken or chanted to produce a magical effect or *charm; more generally, a *chant used in magical ceremonies or sorcery: "With nigromaunce he wolde assaile / To make his incantacion" (John Gower, Confessio amantis 3.45). Also the magical spell itself: "Double, double, toil and trouble" (Shakespeare, Macbeth 4.1.10, 20, 35). Frazer discusses incantation under homeopathic magic, though several of his examples are not magic but simply petitions to gods or spirits to undertake a desired action. Similar are other ancient examples such as the Babylonian incantations, which are ritualistic formulas associated with the act of burning images of one's enemies (the great Mesopotamian series of incantations are known as the Surpu and Maqlû, both words meaning "burning"); the verbs are usually in the optative rather than the indicative mood ("may it happen" rather than "it will happen"), suggesting prayer rather than magic. In Hittite, at the dedication of a building, a piece of copper is deposited in the foundation with the incantation, "as this copper is firm and sound, so may the house be firm and sound." Related are such voodoo practices as thrusting pins into a doll to cause pain or death, usually accompanied by an incantation.

See SOUND.

■ J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough, 3d ed., 12 v. (1905–15); B. Meissner, Babylonien und Assyrien (1920–25); G. Meier, Die assyrische Beschwörungssammlung Maqlû (1937); R. Lesses, "Exe(o)rcising Power: Women as Sorceresses, Exorcists, and Demonesses in Babylonian Jewish Society," Journal of the American Academy of Religion 69 (2001); A.-L. Siikala, Mythic Images and Shamanism: A Perspective on Kalevala Poetry (2002).

R. O. Evans

INCA POETRY. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

INCREMENTAL REPETITION. F. B. Gummere's phrase for a rhetorical device he believed to be a distinguishing feature of the Eng. and Scottish popular *ballads. In incremental repetition, a line or stanza is repeated successively with some small but material substitution at the same crucial spot. A sequence of such repetitions accounts for the entire structure of some few ballads, incl. "Edward" and "Lord Randall." The latter uses incremental repetition in the form of question and answer; "The Maid Freed from the Gallows" combines this with the "climax of relatives," another typical form. More commonly, though, incremental repetition spans a passage of only three or four stanzas, and it is frequently confined to the lines of a single quatrain, as in the following stanza from "Sir Hugh; or, The Jew's Daughter":

> Then out and came the thick, thick blood,
> Then out and came the thin;
> Then out and came the bonny heart's blood,
> Where all the life lay in.

This kind of repetition is different from the kind of additive repetition found in "This is the House that Jack Built" or "The Twelve Days of Christmas." Gummere thought incremental repetition a test of a true oral ballad, but later scholars have demurred (Gerould); Bertrand H. Bronson shows the influence of the music.

Though incremental repetition is common in the Eng. and Scottish ballads, it is also found in much *oral poetry or oral-derived poetry, from the ancient Sumerian Epic of Gilgamesh to Old Welsh poetry to Port. folk song to Zulu song to songs of the Teleut in Siberia, not to mention other Anglo-Am. folksongs that are not ballads. It is also occasionally used as a prose device, e.g., by James Joyce. Incremental repetition is but one of a number of devices characteristic of oral poetry and *song that facilitate composition and memorization; in audition, it sometimes produces an effect of suspense or emotional intensification. In songs and ballads, it can enhance the music by reducing the density of the verbal component and by reinforcing parallels established by the repeated melody.

■ F. B. Gummere, The Popular Ballad (1907), esp. 117–24; L. Pound, Poetic Origins and the Ballad (1921)—sharply critical; G. H. Gerould, The Ballad of Tradition (1932), 105ff.; K. Jackson, "Incremental Repetition in the Early Welsh Englyn," Speculum 16 (1942); B. H. Bronson, Traditional Tunes of the Child Ballads (1959); D. K. Wilgus, Anglo-American Folklore Scholarship since 1898 (1959); R. D. Abrahams and G. Foss, Anglo-American Folksong Style (1968); B. H. Bronson, Ballad as Song (1969); W. F. H. Nicolaisen, "How Incremental Is Incremental Repetition?" Ballads and Ballad Research, ed. P. Conroy (1978); R. B. Kershner, "The Artist as Text: Dialogism and Incremental Repetition in Joyce's Portrait," ELH 53 (1986).

A. B. Friedman; E. Doughtie; T.V.F. Brogan; A. Watson

INDETERMINACY. Denotes a lingering state of indecision with regard to the meaning of a given sign, statement, or text, marking the lack of a stable context for *interpretation. Indeterminacy tends to be an exclusive category that implies an irresolvable conflict between discrete meanings and interpretations (i.e., the four irreconcilable meanings that Miller finds in William Wordsworth's "Resolution and Independence"), as opposed to *polysemy, which is often an inclusive category that implies a plurality of meanings and contexts for interpretation where their sheer proliferation, not their irresolvability, is the central issue. Indeterminate texts are composed of terms that do not cohere in a consistent interpretation and, therefore, remain obscure and enigmatic, leading to a suspension of meaning. As a critical term, indeterminacy gained currency in poststructuralist lit. crit. (see poststructuralism), which emphasized what Hartman called "a hermeneutics of indeterminacy" or "a type of analysis that has renounced the ambition to master or demystify its subject (text, psyche) by technocratic, predictive, or authoritarian formulas."

Indeterminacy is brought about when no single meaning or interpretation may be adequately fixed around a given text, because of a radical separation of signifiers from their signifieds. Indeterminate texts are, thus, characterized not by the "depth" of complex intertextual relations and different associative and metaphoric connections but by disjunctive metonymic relations that give rise to a peculiar "surface tension." In indeterminate texts, the symbolic evocations generated by words on the page are no longer grounded in a coherent discourse, so that it becomes impossible to decide which of these associations are relevant and which are not. This displacement of meaning corresponds to the basic situation of Saussurean ling. in which "there are only differences without positive terms." The ling. sign is reduced to an ultimate differential unit, which is then combined with other differential units in a signifying chain according to the laws of a closed system. Lacan has termed this phenomenon "the sliding of the signified under the signifier" and claimed that it is the outcome of the nature of the signifier, which "always anticipates meaning by deploying its dimension in some sense before it." Thus, e.g., at the level of the sentence, one might consider a chain of signifiers that is interrupted before the significant term is introduced (in such combinations as "The fact remains . . .," "For example . . .," "Still perhaps . . .," etc.). According to Lacan, these chains of signifiers, supposedly meaningless, make sense, despite lacking an explicit reference, and that sense becomes all the more oppressive for having been denied. Similarly, in indeterminate texts, signifiers cease to be "signifiers of something" and become "signifiers to someone"; while they may have no clear referential function, they retain emotive and conative functions (see poetic function). The definitive discussion of indeterminacy in mod. poetry is that of Perloff.

See aporia; difficulty; sign, signified, signifier.

■ M. Perloff, The Poetics of Indeterminacy (1981); F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics, ed. C. Bally and A. Sechehaye, trans. R. Harris (1983); J. H. Miller, The Linguistic Moment (1985); B. J. Martine, Indeterminacy and Intelligibility (1992); G. Graff, "Determinacy/Indeterminacy," Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. F. Lentricchia and T. McLaughlin, 2d ed. (1995); Artifice and Indeterminacy: An Anthology of New Poetics, ed. C. Beach (1998); J. Ashton, "'Rose Is a Rose': Gertrude Stein and the Critique of Indeterminacy," Modernism/Modernity 9 (2002); U. Wirth, "Derrida and Peirce on Indeterminacy, Iteration, and Replication," Semiotica 143 (2003); J. Lacan, "The Instance of the Letter in the Unconscious," Écrits: A Selection, trans. B. Fink (2004); J. Medina, "Anthropologism, Naturalism, and the Pragmatic Study of Language," Journal of Pragmatics 36 (2004); G. Hartman, Criticism in the Wilderness, 2d ed. (2007); J. Lezra, "The Indecisive Muse: Ethics in Translation and the Idea of History," CL 60 (2008).

N. Pines

INDIA, ENGLISH POETRY OF. Two figures dominate 19th-c. Indian poetry in Eng.: Henry Louis Vivian Derozio (1809–31), a Eurasian of Port. descent, and Toru Dutt (1856–77). There could have been a third, Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1824–73, no relation to Toru); but after publishing one book, he more or less gave up writing in Eng. in favor of his native Bengali, becoming the first great mod. poet in that lang.

"Born, and educated in India, and at the age of eighteen he ventures to present himself as a candidate for poetic fame," Derozio wrote in the preface to Poems (1827), his first book. It bore the impress of its times: the Scottish Enlightenment, the poetry of Lord Byron and P. B. Shelley, and the Gr. war of independence all found their way into it. The new lit. that marks its beginning with Derozio has since had many unsatisfactory names: Indo-Eng., India-Eng., Indian Eng., Indo-Anglian, and even Anglo-Indian. In "The Harp of India," the famous opening *sonnet of Poems, the poet sang of India before there was an India to sing of or sing to: "Thy music once was sweet—who hears it now?" Later, often decades later, others in the Indian langs. picked up the nationalist theme. An irony of Brit. colonialism was that, as it expanded, it also, through education, spread the Eng. lang. among Indians, which, in the argumentative Indian mind, planted the seed of freedom not only from colonial rule but from religious and social orthodoxies. Derozio taught at the Hindu College in Calcutta, where his radical ideas greatly influenced his students, some of whom were among the earliest Indian poets and prose writers in Eng.

Derozio died at 22, of cholera. Toru Dutt was 21 when she died of tuberculosis; her only book to be published during her lifetime was a volume of trans.

of Fr. poetry. The poets in Dutt's A Sheaf Gleaned in French Fields (1876) include Victor Hugo, Alphonse de Lamartine, Gérard de Nerval, Charles Baudelaire, and Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle. Dutt clearly was a poet of wide literary tastes and, as a translator, handled a variety of verse forms with ease, unafraid to use the spoken idiom when required. All this is evident in her own poems as well. "Sita," "Baugmaree," and "Our Casuarina Tree," which appeared in the posthumous volume Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan (1882), are among the finest lyrics in Indian poetry. As A. Chaudhuri pointed out, in "Baugmaree," which is the name of the Calcutta suburb where the Dutt family had its country house, the poet adapts the sonnet in ways that It., Eng., and the other Western Eur. poetries had not seen.

During the last decades of the 19th c. and in the first half of the 20th, much poetry was written that is now forgotten but not entirely forgettable. Fredoon Kabraji's (1897–1986) self-deprecating title A Minor Georgian's Swan Song (1938) is representative—but he is a better poet than the title suggests. The postindependence poets—Nissim Ezekiel (1924–2004), Jayanta Mahapatra (b. 1928), A. K. Ramanujan (1929–93), Arun Kolatkar (1931–2004), Kamala Das (1934–2009), Keki N. Daruwalla (b. 1937), Dom Moraes (1938–2004), Dilip Chitre (1938–2009), Eunice de Souza (b. 1940), Adil Jussawalla (b. 1940), Arvind Krishna Mehrotra (b. 1947), Agha Shahid Ali (1949–2001), Manohar Shetty (b. 1953), Imtiaz Dharker (b. 1954)—had little to do with the 150-year-old trad. of Indian poetry in Eng. In the absence of critical eds. or even anthols., most of this poetry was unavailable to them anyway. Like the 19th-c. poets, they had to start afresh, assembling their trad. however they could. They fashioned it from what they found at hand (the Bhakti poets) and farther afield (G. G. Belli, Robert Browning, W. B. Yeats, André Breton, T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, W. C. Williams, Robert Lowell).

"My backward place is where I am," Ezekiel, the preeminent Indian poet in Eng. after independence, wrote in "Background, Casually" (1976), both describing his location and stating its centrality to his poetics. His low-key, plain style marked a clear shift away from poets like Sarojini Naidu (1879–1949), whom Mahatma Gandhi called the nightingale of India, and Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950), who had preceded Ezekiel. Ezekiel called his first book A Time to Change (1952). Staying clear of Indian myths and legends, he is also the first poet to write about the Indian city, in his case Bombay, a "Barbaric city, sick with slums, / Deprived of seasons, blessed with rains," as he called it in "A Morning Walk" (1959).

Kolatkar, Chitre, Mahapatra, and Ramanujan, like M. M. Dutt, wrote in Eng. as well as in their native tongues (Kolatkar and Chitre in Marathi, Mahapatra in Oriya, Ramanujan in Kannada). Das, under the pseud. Madhavikutty, was a renowned writer of short fiction in Malayalam, a fact largely unknown to her Eng. readers. Ramanujan, Kolatkar, Chitre, and Mehrotra also translated from the Indian langs. (Tamil Sangam poetry, Prakrit love poetry, the Bhakti poets Nammalvar, Tukaram, and Kabīr). Their trans. mirrored their Eng. poems, just as their Eng. poems mirrored their trans. Poets also ran publishing cooperatives (Clearing House, Newground, Praxis) and edited magazines (Poetry India, Chandrabhāgā) and anthols. The canon of Indian poetry in Eng. has been shaped not by Indian scholars but by the poets.

Ramanujan wrote a poetry of self-revealing masks. Even his inventive stanza shapes were another mask in his poetic wardrobe, behind which the falling, plunging self was terrifyingly visible. Ramanujan's reputation as a poet, at least in the United States, where he taught at the University of Chicago, has been eclipsed by his reputation as a folklorist, essayist, and trans., as the inventor of Tamil poetry for contemp. times.

The most remarkable Indian poet of the 20th c. was Kolatkar, who created two independent, major bodies of work in two langs., Eng. and Marathi. Jejuri (1976), a sequence of 31 poems about a visit to a temple town of the same name in Maharashtra, established his international reputation. He published three more volumes, two of which appeared in the year he died and the third posthumously. He was an elusive figure who had a horror of mainstream publishers. At the heart of his work lies a moral vision, the basis of which is the things of this world, precisely, rapturously observed: "A sawed off sunbeam comes to rest / gently against the driver's right temple" ("The Bus," 1976).

The postindependence poets and their 19th-c. predecessors may seem to have little in common, but the parallels of cosmopolitanism, bilingualism, and trans. are too striking to be missed.

See ASSAMESE POETRY; BENGALI POETRY; GUJARATI POETRY; HINDI POETRY; INDIA, POETRY OF; KANNADA POETRY; KASHMIRI POETRY; MALAYALAM POETRY; MARATHI POETRY; NEPALI AND PAHARI POETRY; NEWAR POETRY; ORIYA POETRY; PUNJABI POETRY; RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY; TAMIL POETRY AND POETICS; TELUGU POETRY; URDU POETRY.

■ Ten Twentieth-Century Indian Poets, ed. R. Parthasarathy (1976); N. Ezekiel, Collected Poems (1989); The Oxford India Anthology of Twelve Modern Indian Poets, ed. A. K. Mehrotra (1992); B. King, Modern Indian Poetry in English, rev. ed. (2001); J. Ramazani, "Metaphor and Postcoloniality: A. K. Ramanujan's Poetry," The Hybrid Muse (2001); A. Chaudhuri, "A State of Commerce," The Telegraph (April 7, 2002); A History of Indian Literature in English, ed. A. K. Mehrotra (2003); Early Indian Poetry in English, ed. E. de Souza (2005); B. King, Three Indian Poets, rev. ed. (2005); The Bloodaxe Book of Contemporary Indian Poets, ed. J. Thayil (2008); A. K. Mehrotra, "The Emperor Has No Clothes," Partial Recall (2011).

A. K. MEHROTRA

INDIA, POETRY OF

I. Ancient Period (ca. 1200 BCE–1200 CE)
II. Middle Period (ca. 1200–1800 CE)
III. Modern Period (since ca. 1800)

The term Indian poetry commonly refers to an immense and diverse body of poetry produced on the Indian subcontinent and by authors of subcontinental origin, since about 1200 BCE. Also known as South Asia, this region is now divided into seven nations (incl. India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Nepal, and Sri Lanka) and is as large and varied as western Europe. Indian poetry does not belong to a unified, monolingual trad. but rather is a constellation of interacting trads. in about 25 major lit. langs., many of which are used widely for everyday communication in South Asia in mod. times.

The subcontinental langs. have preserved their poetic trads. in oral as well as written forms, using a dozen different script systems of indigenous and foreign origin. The langs. belong to four families: Indo-Aryan, Dravidian, Austro-Asiatic, and Sino-Tibetan. Of these, the Indo-Aryan and Dravidian langs. have been predominant as literary media and, since about 1000 CE, they have been strongly associated with specific geographical regions within the subcontinent. At the same time, langs. from abroad, such as Persian (between the 13th and 19th cs.) and Eng. (since the late 18th c.), have periodically come into widespread use, greatly complicating Indian ling., regional, national, and cultural identities, as well as conceptions of poetry, genre, and aesthetics.

This article surveys the general patterns and transformations in poetry of the subcontinent as a well-defined multilingual area over time. It focuses on the most important poetic practices and innovations of each historical period and on changes in poetics and in historical and cultural circumstances. The broad historical divisions here are the ancient period (ca. 1200 BCE–1200 CE), which includes the early *epic period (ca. 600 BCE–400 CE) and the cl. Sanskrit period (ca. 400–1200 CE); the middle period common to many langs. (ca. 1200–1800); and the mod. period (ca. 1800 to the present). For details of particular Indian poetic trads., consult the entries by lang.

I. Ancient Period (ca. 1200 BCE–1200 CE)

A. Conceptions of Poetry. For about 2,500 years, Indian theorists and literati have frequently used the word kāvya for poetry to distinguish it from other kinds of verbal composition. In its earliest and narrowest meaning (ca. 600 BCE), kāvya characterizes the poetry of the Rāmāyaṇa, which is epic in scope, narrative in structure, and lyrical in effect, with relatively straightforward *syntax and *diction. In a second, wider meaning (ca. 200 CE onward), kāvya signifies composition in verse or prose, designed to give its audience an experience of rasa, the aesthetically fashioned representation of emotions.

In its widest sense (popular ca. 700–1200 CE), kāvya designates the full range of imaginative composition, in verse (padya), prose (gadya), and mixtures of the two (miśra, campu). It includes drama and performance texts, which often are multilingual in the cl. period, with different characters speaking in different langs. or social and regional dialects for verisimilitude. Kāvya in this sense further includes prose narrative, both "fictional" (kathā) and "nonfictional" (ākhyāyikā), covering what we now call *myth, legend, short story, novella, novel, moral tale, fable, biography, and history. Kāvya in the latter part of the ancient period thus coincides with the meaning of lit. itself (sāhitya), although the term still does not cover the "total order of words" (vānmaya) in a given lang. Within this framework, Indian theorists distinguish between dṛśya kāvya, poetry that has to be "seen" to be properly understood (*dramatic poetry and *performance), and śravya kāvya, poetry that needs only to be "heard" to be grasped fully (epic, *lyric, prose).

B. Early Epic. The period during which the major epics, the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata, were probably composed (ca. 600 BCE–400 CE) constitutes an essential backdrop for later Indian poetry. Society at this time is almost entirely Hindu, with the institutions of caste, endogamy, and Vedic ritual already in place, along with the proscriptions against pollution. The two epics represent a world in which Hinduism as a polytheistic way of life was divided mainly between followers of the major gods Viṣṇu and Śiva and in which the subcontinent is organized politically into small and large republics ruled by dynasties of kings. Works belonging to this period are composed, preserved, and transmitted orally, using elaborate techniques of memorization and verification; indigenous script systems and writing (with a stylus, on prepared bark or palm leaf) become available only around the 2d c. BCE. In this setting, the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata appear as heroic *sagas in verse that draw on bardic materials and conventions, folklore, romance, and hist., with many themes resonating strongly with the Troy cycle of stories and Gr. and Roman myths, and hence pointing to shared IE sources.

Vālmīki, the original author of the Mahābhārata, is recognized as the "first kavi" or ur-poet, and the poem itself is the "original kāvya," standing at the head of the subcontinent's lit. trads. Vālmīki defines the śloka as the ideal vehicle for poetic emotion as well as verse narrative, and his virtuoso handling of this unrhymed metrical verse form (resembling a closed *couplet, divided by *caesuras into quarters) becomes an enduring model for subsequent craftsmanship in narrative, dramatic, and lyric verse. The Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata together define some of the overarching subjects of Indian poetry: dharma (law, duty, obligation), justice, war, love, and the irrevocability of vows, curses, and promises. Most important, they become reservoirs of stories from which poets of all subsequent generations draw. At the level of technique, they invent framed narratives, in which smaller stories are nested inside larger tales, and the outermost frame gathers them all into a cohesive poetic structure. Emboxed narratives find their way from the epics into the Buddhist Jataka tales (4th c. BCE) and the Hindu Panchatantra fables (2d c. CE), and ultimately into Somadeva's Kathasaritsagara (11th c. CE); from these widely circulated texts, the device then migrates to Persian, Ar., the Romance langs., and Eng., influencing the poets of the 1001 Nights as well as Giovanni Boccaccio and Chaucer.

C. Classical Sanskrit. By the cl. period (ca. 400–1200 CE), Indian society had become more varied; besides numerous caste divisions (jatis), it included many new ethnic communities with distinctive ways of life. The primeval forests had been cleared; the Indo-Gangetic plains and the Deccan Plateau were well populated; networks of roads connected market towns, pilgrimage centers, ports, and royal capitals, signifying a shift toward urban culture, travel, and prosperity. Politically, republics had given way to imperial formations covering large portions of the subcontinent. Hinduism was still the predominant religion, but it now emphasized large public temples, pilgrimage sites, and domestic rituals and flourished alongside Buddhism and Jainism as alternative worldviews.

In verse, cl. Sanskrit poetry centered around three primary classes of texts. (1) The category of mahākāvya and dirgha-kāvya, poems in "major forms" divided into sargas (cantos, chapters, sections), which devised large-scale structures for the saga of a royal clan, the heroic battle poem, and the courtly epic (written to order for a patron), among other subgenres. (2) The category of laghukāvya and khanda-kāvya, which consisted of short and medium-length poems, poetic segments, and fragments and extracts from longer works. It included the subhāṣita, a beautifully crafted verse that could stand on its own, as well as the poetic sequence, a thematic arrangement of separate verses or passages. (3) The category of kośa or edited *anthology brought together short poems, either by a single author or by many hands, often arranged by form and theme. In later centuries, the cl. mahākāvya and dirgha-kāvya (rather than the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata) became the practical models for epics and long poems in the mod. Indian mother tongues; the subhāṣita served as the norm for brevity, elegance, and lyricism; and the kośa, secular and inclusive, defined the ideal anthol. of poetry.

In addition, cl. Sanskrit expanded the concept of kāvya to include prose works as well as drama. The ākhyāyikā (the short or extended "true story") provided new frameworks for biographical and historical writing, whereas the kathā, a short tale that retells a received narrative or narrates an invented fiction, showcased fantastic events as well as verisimilar representations of human characters (both individuated figures and stock types), together with social and psychological realism. The nataka or poetic play in several acts (a variety of dṛṣya kāvya) created the model of multilingual drama in a mixture of prose and verse, with the former utilized for dialogue and the latter for emotional intensity, foregrounding, and *allusion. While ancient Gr. drama is distinguished by its invention of *tragedy and Aristophanic *comedy, the distinction of cl. Sanskrit drama lies in its invention on stage of the heroic romance, the farce, and esp. the romantic comedy (as in Kālidāsa's [4th c. CE] Śakuntalam).

As a distinctive style, kāvya in its cl. phase sought to create a verbal texture pleasing to both the ear and the mind and became an aesthetic model for the later Indo-Aryan and Dravidian langs. It involved not only rasa but extensive figuration and embellishment (alaṃkāra*), the use of indirect suggestion (dhvani*) over and above *connotation and denotation to convey meaning, a display of learning in the arts and sciences, an intricate syntax and an enormous vocabulary, and a wide variety of complicated *meters and verse forms. Thematically and formally, esp. in the category of short or fragmentary poems, cl. kāvya opened up a fresh range of generic possibilities for subsequent Indian poetry, from descriptions of the seasons, *confessional poetry, *epigrams, and *erotic poetry to *hymns and prayers, philosophical reflections, *didactic poetry, and even short dramatic *monologues. The richness of cl. kāvya style revolved around concrete *imagery, precise representation, nuanced *emotion, refinement of sensibility, and memorability.

Passing through a number of well-defined phases (in Sanskrit, from Vedic to epic to cl.; in cl. Tamil, from caṇkam to epic to devotional), Indian poetry of the ancient period came to constitute a massive, multiform body of verbal composition. In the middle and mod. periods, this body became a repository of *commonplaces for poets and audiences to tap and a *canon to which they could respond, as they created fresh configurations of lang., theme, aesthetics, religious belief, social thought, and politics.

II. Middle Period (ca. 1200–1800 CE)

A. Historical and Cultural Changes. The middle period begins and ends at different times for langs. and regions of the subcontinent; but most poetic trads. undergo vital transitions in the late 12th and late 18th cs., so its common historical span may be specified as 1200–1800. In the largest internal change marking the end of the cl. and the beginning of the middle period, Sanskrit ceases to be the primary medium of literary composition, giving way to writing in about 15 mother tongues. Similar to the transition from Lat. to the vernaculars in Europe around the same time, this ling. and literary shift is accompanied by a selective but concerted devaluation of the ancient Indian past and particularly by the rise of new chauvinisms centered around the geographical domains of the various mother tongues.

This cultural transformation coincides with several other historical changes. By about 1200, gradual Muslim conquest, migration, and settlement on the subcontinent had led to Muslim imperial rule, which lasted for six centuries. Indian society was more mixed and fragmented, being characterized by a foreign ruling elite, new immigrant and settler communities from central and western Asia, and segregation among different races, religions, and langs. By the 13th c., Islam was the religion of power, Buddhism had migrated out of the Indian mainland, and Hinduism had been altered by the emergence of Bhakti. Islam brought its own divisions: the Sunni, Shiʾa, and Sufi religious communities, as well as the Ar., Persian, and Turkish ling. communities (each with its own literary trads.). Moreover, by the 13th c., the technology of writing with reed pen and ink on paper had arrived on the subcontinent, drastically altering the material existence and possibilities of lit. Under such circumstances, the change of verbal medium, from half a dozen ancient literary langs. dominated by Sanskrit to about 15 regional mother tongues and two or three foreign langs., engendered far-reaching changes in the very conception of poetry and its functions.

B. Bhakti Poetry. The most prominent literary, religious, and social movement of the middle period is Bhakti ("devotion" to a god, often classified as theism), which began in the far south (the Tamil region) after the 6th c. and spread with surprising success over the subcontinent by the 16th c. Despite ling. diversity and local and regional variations, Bhakti poetry has common features across a dozen major langs. The movement involves several thousand poets, called bhaktas and sants, as well as many disparate "communities" or "paths" (sampradayas, panthas) focused variously on Viṣṇu and his avatars, Śiva, Devi (the universal goddess), or an undifferentiated godhead.

In Bhakti poetry, which strongly parallels Christian mystical poetry in late med. and early mod. Europe, a poet expresses his or her intensely personal devotion to a particular god, goddess, or godhead. True poetry in this trad. must be spontaneous, urgent, personal, and "divinely inspired" and should be composed in the more natural mother tongue than in an artificial lang. like Sanskrit. Bhakti poets and poems, therefore, tend to be more immediate, colloquial, autobiographical, confessional, and dramatic than many of their cl. counterparts, swerving away from impersonal kāvya on a significant scale. Most Bhakti poetry is composed in short or minor forms of local or regional origin (not borrowed from Sanskrit), and it is usually metrical and uses verse forms with end rhyme (rare in the cl. langs.). Many poems in the trad. are addressed to fellow worshippers; others are addressed to a god or to the poet's audience and, hence, are unlike Western lyrics. Short Bhakti poems are set to music and sung, often in a congregation; and they are also used frequently in such performance arts as dance, dance-drama, and folk theater (see DEVOTIONAL POETRY).

Bhakti alters the historical evolution of poetry on the subcontinent on several fronts. It is the first comprehensive movement in the new regional lits. emerging at the end of the cl. period, and it shapes their characteristic topoi and themes, forms and genres. Socially and politically, many bhaktas and sants are radicals who substantially modify or even reject the Hinduism and priestly culture of the ancient period; some belong to very low or "untouchable" castes, and they participate fully in the movement's outspoken "counterculture." In religious, theological, and philosophical terms, Bhakti defines a major alternative to ritualized "salvation" in ancient Hinduism, and it provides the central impetus for Sikhism, a new religion that arose in the 16th c. Notable formal innovations in short Bhakti poems include an opening *refrain, which becomes prominent in musical performance; and a concluding signature line that explicitly identifies its author, in marked contrast to the impersonality of the subhāṣita and of laghukāvya in cl. Sanskrit.

III. Modern Period (since ca. 1800)

A. Colonization and Modernity. For large parts of the subcontinent, the mod. period of hist. begins with Brit. rule in the mid-18th c., whereas literary modernity appears only in the 19th. Many material, ideological, and practical factors contribute directly and indirectly to this large-scale transition from a "traditional" to a "modern" society: the military success of a foreign power on the subcontinent; the establishment of a rationalized system of administration (in contrast to the disarray of late Mughal administration in the 18th c.); the introduction of journalism, newspapers, and periodicals, as well as of a comprehensive postal system; the formation of a full-fledged, multilingual print culture; the emergence of a public sphere that allowed rational debate on issues of common concern (in spite of colonial censorship); the popularity of civic associations and literary societies, modeled on Eur. institutions; Brit. and Eur. critiques of traditional Indian culture; and esp. the availability of Western-style education in schools, colleges, and universities.

In the later 19th c., Indian poets began encountering Anglo-Am. literary works and reading Eng. trans. of Gr., Roman, and mod. Eur. lits. Many of them subsequently began to imitate their Western predecessors and contemporaries, significantly changing the formal, thematic, and generic complexion of the lits. in indigenous langs. The Westernization of India under Brit. rule also went one step further: it created the poet who wanted to write poetry of the Anglo-Am. kind directly in the Eng. lang. But the modernity of Indian writing after about 1800 does not consist solely in its Westernization, and Indian writers did not become mod. merely by imitating Euro-Am. writers. In most Indian mother tongues, the 18th and 19th cs. were largely periods of very complex, creative interaction among local, regional, subcontinental, and international trads., leading as much to reactionary traditionalism and reactive nationalism as to stimulating cultural syncretism.

The overall effect of colonization on Indian poetry was thus multifaceted and far-reaching: the encounter with Eur. cultures drove Indian writers to experiment with poetry markedly different from anything the Indian trads. themselves had invented; it went hand in hand with a renewed interest in their own trads. of the ancient and middle periods; and it introduced yet another foreign literary lang., Eng., into the Indian babel. These effects have continued from the early 19th c. to the present, and the grafting of Western "influences" onto "indigenous" sensibilities has resulted in a hybrid lit. that has broken away sharply from many of the patterns in Indian poetry of the preceding three millennia. Ādhunik kāvita (mod. poetry) swerves away in complicated ways from prācīn kāvya (ancient or old poetry), whether that of cl. Sanskrit or of the Bhakti movement, and pushes kāvya and kavitā across new frontiers.

B. Modern Poetic Genres. The shift away from the poetry and poetics of the middle period was signaled by a concerted change in poetic forms, themes, conventions, images, metrical frames, and structural principles, as well as by radical changes in the conception of who the poet (kavi) is, what his or her functions are, and how his or her audience is constituted. Moreover, the transformed situation of Indian poets in the 19th and early 20th cs. generated new attitudes, concerns, tones, and voices: they explored enjambed lines (see ENJAMBMENT), Elizabethan *blank verse, Eng. epic conventions, Miltonic *similes, and romantic lyrics; experimented with specific Eur. and non-Indian verse forms grafted onto Sanskrit-based prosody; and elaborated themes related to nation, identity, and social, religious, and political change. This multifarious transition led to writing that, when placed beside earlier Indian poetry, strikes a remarkably cosmopolitan, mod. note; but its novelty, whether in the indigenous langs. or in Eng., does not result simply from a rejection of the Indian past.

The varieties of creative synthesis in mod. Indian poetry are evident in the new genres that appeared in the 19th and 20th cs. Among them are the long philosophical or speculative poem, epic in size and scope and envisioning a new worldview (e.g., Aurobindo Ghose's [1872–1950] Savitri in Eng., G. M. Muktibodh's [1917–64] Andhere men in Hindi); the nationalist epic, retelling an ancient Hindu myth or story, esp. from the Rāmāyaṇa or the Mahābhārata (e.g., Michael Madhusudan Dutt's [1824–73] Meghanādvadha in Bengali, Jaishankar Prasad's [1889–1937] Kāmāyanī in Hindi); the long sequence of short poems, whether religious, philosophical, satiric, or personal in theme, modeled on the Western poetic sequence as well as on premod. Indian sequences (e.g., Rabindranath Tagore's [1861–1941] Gitanjali in Bengali; Subramania Bharati's [1882–1921] "prose poems" in Tamil; Rajagopal Parthasarathy's [b. 1934] Rough Passage in Eng.); the short metrical lyric in a mod. rhymed stanza form, sometimes set to music, as well as the modernized lyric based on premod. Indian and foreign verse forms (e.g., Faiz Ahmed Faiz's [1911–84] ghazals*, nazms, and gits in Urdu; B. S. Mardhekar's [1909–56] and Vinda Karandikar's [1918–2010] abhangas in Marathi; Buddhadev Bose's [1908–74] *sonnets in Bengali); and the "free-verse" poem, varying in length from a few lines to several hundred and ranging in theme from autobiographical and confessional to mythological, political, and historical (e.g., the love poems of P. S. Rege [1910–78] in Marathi; the political poems of Dhoomil [1936–75], Shrikant Verma [1931–86], and Raghuvir Sahay [1929–90] in Hindi; the bilingual poetry of A. K. Ramanujan [1929–93] in Eng. and Kannada and of Arun Kolatkar [1932–2004] in Eng. and Marathi; and *protest poetry, Dalit poetry, and contemp. feminist and women's poetry in most langs.).

In the course of these devels., the tensions between modernity and trad., Indianness and Westernization, have played a shaping role. Like many of their 19th-c. predecessors, 20th- and 21st-c. Indian poets reject certain aspects of their past but at the same time make use of it, achieving a modernity in which Westernization and Indianness stand in a constant and constantly productive conflict. As a result, mod. Indian writers, critics, and common readers now refer to all varieties of poetry as kāvya; in its broadest usage around the millennial moment, kāvya, thus, embraces a vast quantity of diverse poetry in about 25 major langs. produced over some 3,000 years.

See ASSAMESE POETRY; BENGALI POETRY; GUJARATI POETRY; HINDI POETRY; INDIA, ENGLISH POETRY OF; KANNADA POETRY; KASHMIRI POETRY; MALAYALAM POETRY; MARATHI POETRY; NEPALI AND PAHARI POETRY; NEWAR POETRY; ORIYA POETRY; PUNJABI POETRY; RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY; TAMIL POETRY AND POETICS; TELUGU POETRY; URDU POETRY.

■ A. B. Keith, A History of Sanskrit Literature (1928); An Anthology of Sanskrit Court Poetry, trans. D.H.H. Ingalls (1965); The Mahābhārata, trans. C. V. Narasimhan (1965)—handy abridgement; A. K. Ramanujan, Speaking of Śiva (1973); The Mahābhārata, trans. J.A.B. van Buitenen, 3 v. (1973–80); E. C. Dimock et al., The Literatures of India (1974)—compact intro.; E. Zelliot, "The Medieval Bhakti Movement in History," Hinduism, ed. B. L. Smith (1976)—a balanced subject guide; D. Kopf, The Brahmo Samaj and the Shaping of the Modern Indian Mind (1979)—historical and cultural contexts; Hymns for the Drowning, trans. A. K. Ramanujan (1981); S. Lienhard, A History of Classical Poetry (1984); The Rāmāyaṇa of Vālmiki, trans. R. Goldman et al., 5 v. (1984–2005); The Bhagavad-Gītā, trans. B. S. Miller (1986); Poems of Love and War, trans. A. K. Ramanujan (1986)—from cl. Tamil; Songs of the Saints of India, ed. and trans. J. S. Hawley and M. Juergensmeyer (1988); S. K. Das, A History of Indian Literature, 3 v. (1991–2005)—incomplete but informative; The Oxford Anthology of Modern Indian Poetry, ed. V. Dharwadker and A. K. Ramanujan (1994)—selections from 15 langs.; A. K. Ramanujan, Collected Essays (1999); Kabir: The Weaver's Songs, trans. V. Dharwadker (2003); Literary Cultures in History: Reconstructions from South Asia, ed. S. Pollock (2003)—best crit. overview of major Indian lits.; S. Pollock, The Language of the Gods in the World of Men (2006)—excellent, comprehensive.

V. DHARWADKER

INDIAN PROSODY

I. Classical Languages: Sanskrit, Prakrit, and Tamil
II. The Modern Vernaculars

I. Classical Languages: Sanskrit, Prakrit, and Tamil. Indian metrics is one of the world's most complex prosodic trads. Though perhaps best treated historically, it must in an article such as this be surveyed formally. Indian meters fall into three main types: (a) those that fix the *quantity of each syllable (varṇavṛtta), (b) those that fix the total quantity of each line (mātrāvṛtta), and (c) those that appear to mix the two types (śloka). Like the metrics of Gr. and Lat., Indian versification is based on a prosodic distinction between heavy and light syllables. A heavy syllable contains a long vowel or a short vowel followed by two or more consonants. A light syllable contains a short vowel followed by at most one consonant. The distinction of vowel quantity is inherent in the phonology of Sanskrit and the other Indian langs.

A. Fixed-syllable Meters. The elegant meters of cl. Sanskrit poetry are of this type. The general formula calls for four usually identical feet (pāda), which in practice may vary from eight to 21 or more syllables each. Mandākrāntā (the meter of Kālidāsa's Meghadhūta) may be taken as an example. Each of its four 17-syllable feet realizes the following pattern: G G G G L L L L G / G L G G L G x (G = guru, or heavy syllable; L = laghu, or light syllable; x = a syllable of variable quantity; "/" marks the yati, or *caesura). Less common meters may vary identical first and third feet with identical second and fourth feet or may have four different feet, but the principle remains the same: the quantity of each syllable is predictable and the sequence or pattern is fixed. In *recitation, a chanting intonation is usually employed, modeled on the quantitative sequence of the line. Though some common recitative patterns are noticeable, each reciter may also cultivate a personal style. The names of the meters generally scan in the meter and often suggest appropriate associations: mandākrāntā, ([a lady] slowly approaching).

B. Fixed-Line or Moric Meters. Here the quantity of the total line is fixed by considering a laghu worth one "measure" (mātrā; cf. Lat. mora*) and a guru two. Free variation of syllables within the line is, however, restricted by several conventions, which demonstrate the influence of a regular *beat—indicating that these meters were probably sung. It is forbidden, for instance, that the beat fall on the second half of a guru syllable. If we assume one beat every four mātrās (three, five, and six are also possible), this convention will, in effect, articulate the line into groups (gaṇa) of four mātrās each, which have only the shapes G G, G L L, L G L, L L G, or L L L L, each signaled by an initial beat. The āryā, which probably originated in popular, non-Sanskritic milieux and remained the meter of choice for cl. Prakrit poetry, may serve as a typical example: it is composed of two lines, the first of which must contain 30 mātrā, the second 27. The simple tetramoric pattern (above) is, however, complicated (and syncopated) by adding to seven of these gaṇa an eighth of two mātrās (for a total, in the first line, of 30), and, further, in the second line, by reducing the sixth gaṇa to a single laghu (i.e., 27). Convention also restricts the kinds of gaṇa that do, in fact, occur in given loci in the verse; e.g., in the āryā, L G L is possible only for the second and fourth gaṇa. The meters of the songs of the Gītagovinda (13th c.) and those employed in middle Indic *devotional poetry and in the mod. north Indian langs. are generally of the moric type, which is subject to extreme variation. Beginning with the Gītagovinda, end rhyme is frequently associated with moric meter, and later vernacular poetry is regularly rhymed. *Alliteration, though not unknown in earlier poetry, also becomes an increasingly prominent feature of moric verse. As may be surmised, the correlation of moric meter with song is in the mod. period even more marked.

The meters of the Dravidian langs. of the south (Tamil, Telugu, Kannada, Malayalam) are based on a somewhat more complicated *scansion (in certain circumstances, treating as light even a syllable containing a long vowel); but during the long course of coexistence and mutual contact, there has been a give and take of both theory and practice with the Sanskritic north. The oldest Dravidian (viz., Tamil) meters greatly resemble the moric meters of the Prakrits, employ alliteration with great effect, and are definitely rhythmical (cf. again the Gītagovinda). On the other hand, they often feature initial rhyme, based on the first interior consonant of the line—virtually unknown in the north. Lines most commonly consist of four feet (cīr) comprising two or three syllables (acai). The earliest treatise on prosody in the Dravidian langs. is the Ceyyuḷiyal chapter of the Tamil Tolkāppiyam (3d to 5th cs. BCE). The cl. meters prevailed until the end of the first millennium CE, when folk meters were popularized by devotional poets.

C. Śloka. The most common Sanskrit meter is partly fixed, partly free. Śloka (praise) is both a type and a species, deriving in its special *epic and later form (after 500 BCE) from the meters found in the oldest extant Indic text, the Rig Veda (ca. 1500–1000 BCE). The cl. śloka is like type (a) in that it is composed of four feet, each of which must have eight syllables; but it is like (b) in that its line appears to fall into two four-syllable halves, the first of which is quantitatively quite free (though x L L x does not normally occur), the second of which is obligatorily L G G x in odd feet and in even feet L G L x. A "trochaic" cadence, thus, alternates with an "iambic." Many variations on this pattern are, however, found. The older Vedic meters (chandas) are composed generally of feet with 8, 11, or 12 syllables. Of the eight-syllable meters, some have three feet (gāyatrī), some four (anuṣṭubh). This latter is evidently the ancestor of the cl. śloka, but it lacks, along with the other Vedic meters, the contrast between even and odd feet. Its usual shape is x G x G /L G L x. The 11-syllable meters (triṣṭubh) generally have the same attack and the same cadence but add a middle sequence of L L G (/). The jagatī adds a syllable to the triṣṭubh but is otherwise like it. Like the anuṣṭubh, the triṣṭubh and jagatī have descendants in the cl. metrics—the family of 11-syllable meters called upajāti, and 12-syllable meters such as the popular vaṁśastha and drutavilambita. The style of śloka recitation is more or less uniform over all of India, testifying to its antiquity. The Vedic meters have been deformed by the superimposition of later prosodic features, such as the obligatory sandhi (ling. junctures) of the cl. lang. and are only dimly perceptible in the (otherwise) beautiful ritual chanting of the Vedic priest, itself the likely precursor of cl. Indian music.

The śloka is not "poetic" in the usual Western sense, however. Though it is metrical, it is functionally the equivalent of Western prose in that it is the mode of choice for an entire range of literate composition, from epic (Mahābhārata, Rāmāyaṇa) and *fable (Kathāsaritsāgara) to grammar (Vākyapadīya) and astronomy (Sūryasiddhānta)—doubtless reflecting the importance of memorization in Indian religious and cultural trad.

The study of prosody is very old in India, being counted as one of the six "ancillaries of the Veda" (vedāṇga). A sūtra attributed to Piṇgala, portions of which may be as old as 600 BCE (the rest as late as 500 CE), describes about 160 meters, but surprisingly not the śloka that we know. In the late cl. period (after 900 CE), an elaborate technical lit. (chandaḥśāstra) grew up, based on Piṇgala, wherein were defined the various meters in actual use and, with mathematical completeness, many meters merely possible. Associations with moods, time of day, and colors were sometimes also made, testifying to an effort to integrate metrics into the larger domain of aesthetics.

II. The Modern Vernaculars. Throughout the med. and early mod. periods, the end-stopped rhyming couplet was the preferred medium of expression for poets in the New Indo-Aryan langs. (Hindi, Punjabi, Gujarati, Marathi, Bengali, Assamese, and Oriya). As in cl. Sanskrit, lines are usually divided by caesurae into two, three, or four feet (pāda or caraṇ). The most popular verse form for the vast number of devotional lyrics produced in this period is the pad, a stanza of from four to eight lines (but often extended to several more), all having the same metrical structure and frequently the same rhyme. Often the lyric begins with a shorter line that in *performance serves as a *refrain. Alliteration is prevalent throughout the med. period; among the poets of Rajasthan, it becomes obligatory.

On the whole, Hindi poets favored moric meters, esp. those with a tetramoric pattern. It appears that the poets normally had a specific rhythmic cycle (tāla) in mind when they chose the meter. Often this was a cycle of 16 beats divided into four equal sections, the common time of Indian music. The majority of lyrics have 16 morae in the first foot of each line and from 10 to 16 in the second.

The dohā is a rhyming couplet commonly used for aphorisms, as well as for longer narrative and *didactic poetry. The first foot of each line has 13 morae and the second 11. In the case of Kabīr and other sant poets, it is called sākhī, and in the ādigranth of the Sikhs, it is termed salok (from Sanskrit śloka, of which it was the vernacular equivalent). The basic unit of the narrative poems composed in the Avadhī dialect of Hindi (notably the Sufi romances and the Rāmcaritmānas of Tulsīdās) was a stanza of from five to eight distichs in the 16-moric caupāī meter followed by a dohā.

Hindi poets also used syllabic meters, the most common being two types of quatrains called savaiyā and ghanākṣarī. The former has lines of 22–26 syllables with a trisyllabic rhythm and a medial caesura; the ghanākṣarī line has three feet of eight syllables and a fourth of seven or eight. The tetrasyllabic rhythm of the latter prevailed in other vernaculars, which used mainly syllabic meters. The most common meter in Eastern India (Bengali, Assamese, and Oriya) was the payār, a rhyming couplet used for both lyric and narrative poetry. Here, each line has 14 syllables divided 8 + 6 but subdivisible into a 4 + 4 + 4 + 2 structure. Another popular couplet form was the tripadī, of which each line has two feet of equal length, often with end rhyme, followed by a third that is slightly longer, e.g., 6 + 6 + 8 or 8 + 8 + 10.

Similar to the payār are the abhaṇga and the ovī, the most popular forms used by Marathi poets. The shorter type of abhaṇga is composed of rhyming octosyllabic sections; the longer abhaṇga has lines of four feet (6 + 6 + 6 + 4 syllables) with the second and third rhyming. The ovī is considered a folk meter from which the abhaṇga derived. Its first three feet are of equal length and have end rhyme, while the fourth is slightly shorter and rhymeless.

These are the most common types of meter. The theorists describe many more, of which several are adaptations of Sanskrit meters or permutations of the basic vernacular ones, but the more recondite meters are usually confined to the work of scholastic court poets. Poetry in Urdu stayed within the Perso-Ar. trad., using principally the ghazal* and masnavī* forms.

Med. and mod. Tamil poets retained their purely indigenous meters, those who composed in the other Dravidian langs. (Kannada, Telugu, Malayalam) more readily assimilated the meters and vocabulary of Sanskrit. Kannada and Telugu poetry, of which the earliest examples emerged about a thousand years ago, used meters derived from Sanskrit as well as Dravidian meters that are found earlier in Tamil, adapting some of them to the Sanskrit method of *scansion. Though Telugu poets were stricter in observing metrical rules, they modified the Sanskrit meters more than their Kannada counterparts and also accepted *enjambment. Many of the meters used in Malayalam bear Sanskrit names but are freer than Sanskrit in their syllabic structure.

A form of *prose poem in Kannada is found in the short vacana (utterances) of Basavaṇṇa (12th c.) and subsequent Vīraśaiva poets of Karnataka. Comparable, though more regular, are the vākh of the Kashmiri female saint Lalla (or Lal Ded; early 14th c.): these are quatrains of approximately seven syllables and four stresses in each line with occasional rhyme. In the 19th c., familiarity with Eng. poetry encouraged Bengali poets, and later those writing in other langs., to experiment with *blank verse and enjambment. Rabindranath Tagore, besides writing blank and *free verse, maintained the moric trad. but simplified the rules for measuring quantity by giving all open syllables the value of one mora and all closed syllables two.

See ASSAMESE POETRY; BENGALI POETRY; CLASSICAL PROSODY; GREEK POETRY; GUJARATI POETRY; HINDI POETRY; INDIA, POETRY OF; KANNADA POETRY; MALAYALAM

POETRY; MARATHI POETRY; ORIYA POETRY; PUNJABI POETRY; TAMIL POETRY AND POETICS; TELUGU POETRY.
■ E. W. Hopkins, The Great Epic of India (1901), esp. ch. 4; E. V. Arnold, Vedic Metre (1905)—the standard authority; A. B. Keith, A History of Sanskrit Literature (1920), esp. ch. 20, secs. 3–4; H. Weller, "Beiträge zur Metrik der Veda," Zeitschrift für Indologie und Iranistik 12 (1922); J. Hermann, "Über die älteste indischer Metriker und ihr Werk," Indian Linguistics 3 (1933); H. D. Velankar, "Apabhraṁśa Metres," Journal of the University of Bombay (Arts) 131 (1933), 137 (1936); and "Chandaḥ kośa," Journal of the University of Bombay (Arts) 131 (1933)—rpt. as App. 2 to his Kavidarpaṇa (1960); A. C. Chettair, Advanced Studies in Tamil Poetry (1943); H. N. Randle, "Sanskrit and Greek Metres," Journal of Oriental Research 17 (1947); H. D. Velankar, "Prosodical Practices of Sanskrit Poets," Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society n.s. 24–25 (1948–49); H. Weller, "Metrica," Beiträge zur indischen Philologie und Altertumskunde (1951); V. Raghavan, "Sanskrit and Prakrit Metres," Journal of the Madras University 23 (1952–53); L. Renou, L'Inde Classique, v. 2 (1953), App. 2, and "Sur la Structure du Kavya," Journal Asiatique 247 (1959); M. Sinha, The Historical Development of Medieval Hindi Prosody (1964); A. K. Warder, Pali Metre (1967); A. D. Mukherji, "Lyric Metres in Jayadeva's Gitagovinda," Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal (1967, pub. 1969); H. Jacobi, Kleine Schriften (1970); P. Kiparsky, "Metrics and Morphophonemics in the Rigveda," Contributions to Generative Phonology, ed. M. K. Brame (1972); D. Matthews and C. Shackle, "Note on Prosody and Metre," An Anthology of Classical Urdu Love Lyrics, ed. D. Matthews and C. Shackle (1972); Indian Literature, ed. A. Poddar (1972); N. Sen, Early Eastern New Indo-Aryan Versification (1973); Allen; G. Nagy, Comparative Studies in Greek and Indic Metre (1974); S. Pollock, Aspects of Versification in Sanskrit Lyric Poetry (1977); S. Subrahmanyan, The Commonness in the Metre of the Dravidian Langs. (1977); J. F. Vigorita, "The Trochaic Gayatri," ZVS 93 (1979); C. E. Fairbanks, "The Development of Hindi Oral Narrative Meter," DAI 42 (1982); S. Lienhard, A History of Classical Poetry: Sanskrit–Pali–Prakrit, ed. J. Gonda (1984); E. Gerow, "Jayadeva's Poetics and the Classical Style," JAOS 109.4 (1989)—spec. iss.; J. S. Klein, On Verbal Accentuation in the Rigveda (1992); W.P. Lehmann, "Poetic Principles in the South Asian Literary Tradition: Interrelatedness of Grammar, Prosody, and Other Elements of Language," College Literature 23.1 (1996); M. Witzel, "Sarama and the Panis: Origins of Prosimetric Exchange in Archaic India," Prosimetrum: Crosscultural Perspectives on Narrative in Prose and Verse, ed. J. Harris and K. Reichl (1997); U. Niklas, "A Short Introduction to Tamil Prosody, Part I," Kolam 3 (1999); A. Sharma, "Of Śūdras, Sūtas, and Ślokas: Why is the Mahābhārata Preeminently in the Anuṣṭubh Metre?" Indo-Iranian Journal 43 (2000); A. S. Deo, "The Metrical Organization of Classical Sanskrit Verse," JL 43 (2007); A. Mahoney, "The Feet of Greek and Sanskrit Verse," Greek and Latin from an Indo-European Perspective, ed. C. George et al. (2007).

E. Gerow (cl. langs.);
A. W. Entwistle (mod. vernaculars)

INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE

I. Amazonia
II. Tahuantinsuyu
III. Anahuac
IV. Turtle Island

Knowing what may or may not constitute the roots of poetry and poetics indigenous to America involves factors specific to the continent. The first issues from its sheer size and shape, esp. in the midriff tropical zone. Extending northwest from Brazil, the Am. tropics cover one fifth of the globe, an ancient, unbroken, and culturally rich landmass found on no other continent. Then, from Alaska to Tierra del Fuego, confidently identified langs. and even lang. families are myriad, some written long before Rome could impose its alphabet. In Mesoamerica (roughly the tropics north of the isthmus and self-defining as Anahuac), stone inscriptions written in the visible lang. known as tlacuilolli* in Nahuatl—a script that may represent sound while depending on the phonetics of no particular speech—date back more than two millennia and find elaborate expression in scrolls, maps, and screen-fold books of native paper and deerskin (known as the codices). Before and after the Classic Period (3d to 10th c. CE), the related story of lowland Maya *hieroglyphs is similar. Their speech-specific phonetics were transcribed into the Roman alphabet after the invasion, in the Chilam Balam books of Chumayel and other Yucatecan towns, notable for their poetic wordplay with philosophical paradoxes and puns emanating from understandings of time both long resident and Eur.

Once arrived, the Eur. invaders are notorious for having burned whole libraries of books in Mesoamerica. On the Pacific Rim, the same fate was accorded in the Andes to libraries of Inca texts written in the knotted cord script known in Quechua as the quipu. It is now slowly becoming apparent (Julien, Brokaw) that the quipu recorded in Quechua—besides statistical information pertinent to the pastoral economy and subjects of the Inca Tahuantinsuyu and their calendar—kingship drama, chronicles, and liturgy, notably the *hymns in praise of the supreme Inca, sun king and shepherd/llama herder. In 18th-c. Europe, these served as a source for the Encyclopédie (notably in its entry on script) and inspired the royal performances at Versailles known as Indes galantes that were enhanced by Jean-Philippe Rameau's music and Jean-François Marmontel's prose.

Besides cultural geography, ling. diversity, and written precedent, most telling of all these given factors in America are the recent revisions of the archaeological underpinnings on which lit. hist. and geography ultimately rely. Most salient is the case of Amazonia now recognized as the site of the continent's oldest ceramics (Neves), while the clarification of texts inscribed at Chavin de Huantar, the metropolis on the uppermost Amazon that served as portal to the Pacific Ocean, confirmed them as an enduring ideological premise (Burger, Salomon 2004). In the isthmus that joins South America to Anahuac east to west, pointers to ancient travel routes in fresh eds. of classic texts such as the Toltec lament (Popol Vuh, 6065–67; Cantares mexicanos, folio 26v) are corroborated in the 1570 Relaciones geográficas of Cholula and Tepeaca and by archaeology at San Agustín (Colombia), Subtiaba (Nicaragua), and Yojoa (Honduras). Similar attention has been paid to the northwest continuations of Mesoamerica (Neurath), long distorted by U.S. discourse on its Southwest, esp. when it touches the open wound of Turtle Island's Ghost Dance. Chosen in 1825 by the Iroquois historian David Cusick to refer to America north of Mexico, Turtle Island has long been the term used by the Algonkian peoples to refer to the widespread territory of their langs.

In this predicament, a useful way to proceed is to rely wherever possible on native authority and start by acknowledging a category of classic texts that weld political hists. onto the world ages of Am. genesis, whose conception and scope make them poetry in the fullest sense. At the same time, we need not relinquish that wondered sense of a New World that animated thinkers in the late 16th c., before the fetters of Eur. ideology and social control (let alone mapping) had tightened. Of these, Michel de Montaigne merits close attention, for the pair of Am. Essais that effectively chart the continent, profoundly unsettling the authority of the Bible and the Greco-Roman classics. "Des cannibales" (1580) acknowledges the lowland rainforest of America as a prime source of poetry. "Des coches" (1588) does the same for the Inca and the Aztec empires along the continent's Pacific Rim, Montaigne having read in the meantime Francisco López de Gómara's Historia general de las Indias (1552).

With Montaigne and native validation in mind, we proceed, then, by discussing in turn four first sources of New World poetry: Amazonia, Tahuantinsuyu, Anahuac, and Turtle Island, each in its way an indispensable precedent for poetry composed in indigenous speech and in imported Port., Sp., and Eng. A corresponding range of poems trans. and in the original is available in Alcina Franch, Péret 1969, Rothenberg 1972, and Dorn and Brotherston, while Tomlinson provides wide overall contextualization. For drama in verse, see Meneses.

I. Amazonia. As the allies of the Fr. who ensured them victory over the Tupiniquin and the Port., the Tupinamba of Brazil (or France Antarctique) were invited to Henry II's court at Rouen in 1550, where they reenacted their triumph in a rainforest setting, singing songs of victory in their lang. A precedent for Montaigne, the event effectively belonged to the Americanist royal court trad. furthered at Versailles in the Indes galantes performances, which lauded Louis the Sun King in terms borrowed from Inca liturgy. Direct contact with the Tupinamba at Rouen under Charles IX and acquaintance with someone who had lived in their territory provided Montaigne with the two examples of native poetry that he included in "Des cannibales."

In the genre of the taunt (carbet), Montaigne's first cannibal poem fuses standard Eur. fear of naked savages who terrify enemy captives by threatening to eat them with the core drama of the Christian Eucharist and actual instances of anthropophagy among the Europeans of Montaigne's day. For their part, as members of the Tupi-Guaraní lang. family and culture, the Tupinamba authors of the taunt explicitly draw on notions of transubstantiation and eschatology widespread in extensive poetic texts composed in Tupi terms and in the Tupi tongue. In them, a principal reference is the yvy tenonde (Land without Ill), an obtainable earthly paradise that has for centuries inspired pilgrimage along the length of the Amazon. Fleeing Eur. invaders in 1549, a group of coastal Tupi are reported to have traveled up to Chachapoyas, the ancient Andean city of circular ruins. After missionary beginnings, these texts have come to constitute an enduring focus for anthropology in Brazil, in the work of Egon Schaden, Curt Nimuendajú, and more recently Eduardo Viveiros (Sá). They are usefully complemented in Eng. by Whitehead's ed. of the autobiographical Warhaftige Historia (1557) by Hans Staden, who, when captive, heard Tupi taunts firsthand, in the flesh as it were.

In his essay, besides the taunt, Montaigne dwells on a Tupi poem he called *anacreontic, which asks a snake to allow the speaker to copy the exquisite designs on its skin, in a girdle he would give to his lover. Reviled in biblical teaching, the snake here is honored in an interspecies dialogue characteristic of Amazonian poetics. It plays on the idea of the snake's pride in its speckled hue, paying keen attention to visual design in the serpentine labyrinths likewise found on the continent's oldest known ceramics. In Marajó, the island at the river's mouth, these reached extremes of sophistication.

The Tupi trad., which includes Guaraní, the first lang. of Paraguay, for centuries served as the lingua franca or Lingua Geral of lowland South America. In the 20th c., it was enriched by no less than two trans. (by Eduardo Saguler in 1951 and Dacunda Díaz in 1996) of José Hernández's Martín Fierro, the great gaucho epic of the Argentinean pampa (see GAUCHO POETRY), being ethnically the despised mother tongue of the eponymous hero; more recently, it has come to play a role in the cultural politics of MercoSur. The poetics of this trad. delights in exploring how word concepts are born in the first place and inhere in trains of thought. These are superbly exemplified in the classic work Ayvu rapyta of the Mbya Guaraní, a title that means something like the source of human lang.; through intense cogitation, it establishes the rain forest itself as the mid-earth from whose trees lang. flows.

The concentration on dream and the flow of thought, the dreaming of the world into existence seen as a precondition for deed and creation, may be held to typify Amazonian genesis and characterize work of Umasin Panlon and other authors of FOIRN (Federação das Organizações Indígenas do Rio Negro). Musings on these beginnings by the Witoto gathered by Preuss begin thus:

> a phantasma, naino, nothing else > the father touched the image of the phantasm > touch a secret, nothing else > the father Nainu-ema, who-has-the-phantasm, > held it by a dream > to himself > thought hard about it

Rothenberg translated Preuss's text to great effect in Technicians of the Sacred, a foundational work of *ethnopoetics.

Studies and anthols. of Tupi-Guaraní poetry and poetics (Cadogan 1959, Bareiro Saguier) have abounded since Montaigne's pioneer commentary, and the trad. has been indispensable to the growth of Brazilian lit. Poems and songs in Lingua Geral were collected in the late 19th c. by João Barbosa Rodrigues, when they could still be heard in the markets and festivals in the lower Amazon. He gave the result of his labors under the hybrid title Poranduba amazonense, an abundant anthol. of texts that reserves a special place for the Amazonian midwife. We learn of the greenstone muiraquitã, the charm typically carved in the form of early vertebrates like the frog or the fish and bestowed on the father of the female rather than the male child; the lean new moon and the full moon mirrored in the lake that yields the muiraquitã; moons as measures of time, sidereal (27.32 nights) when black-faced incestuous male and synodic (29.54 nights) when female lying in her hammock; and the armadillo (tatu), whose dance leads to safety deep in the forest.

In their ed. of Joaquim de Sousândrade's substantial epic O Guesa (1888), Augusto and Haroldo de Campos have drawn out the significance of these precedents for the remarkable sequence of cantos known as Tatuturema, the armadillo dance-song that celebrates local understandings of genesis. In the complex societies characteristic of Manaus and the confluence of the Amazon with the Rio Negro, Lingua Geral also preserved the legends and the night music generated by the "devil" Jurupari (Medeiros).

Jurupari, himself a recalcitrant product of the midwife cult and the focus of a major epic, affirms his gender and his origins by tracing them to the Milky Way and a gestation period said to last ten (sidereal) moons rather than the usual nine (synodic). He does this when literally orchestrating his federation. He bestows on each of its 11+3 wind instruments, seen and played exclusively by males, word-poem definitions, each belonging to a distinct lang. or dialect of multilingual Manaus, overall Arawak to the east and Tucano to the west. Jurupari appears as the lure in the Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro of Charles Darwin's contemp. A. F. Wallace (ch. 17) and, after him, in Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray (ch. 11).

The Mbya Guaraní Ayvu rapyta epitomizes lowland South America as a poetics of dreaming the world into being that is simultaneously cosmogony, a genesis poetic in dealing with primordial origins (Cadogan 1959). In the Carib trad., it is matched as such by Watunna of the Soto and by the Makunaima corpus of their Pemon neighbors. Recalled in poetically dense Adeni (a kind of script within speech) and ritually recited at the annual harvest festival of its name, Watunna (Civrieux) recounts the felling of the great tree whose branches and roots conjoined sky and earth and whose petrified stump is the Marahuaca massif, the Soto homeland in Venezuela. The felling precipitates a great flood and reveals Marahuaca to be a watershed common via the (hydrographically improbable) Casiquiare canal to both the Amazon and the Orinoco.

The felled tree also initiates the saga of agriculture, the first seedlings being brought from Roraima, a petrified tree stump to the northeast and a botanical El Dorado fondly recalled in Pemon dream songs. While people work in the fields learning to plant from the birds, the known loners tapir and jaguar engage in a wry dialogue that opposes the former's slow wits with the keen senses of the latter in the wild forests of the night (William Blake's bright-burning tiger began life as a jaguar from Surinam). The climax of the whole planting saga comes when Huioo, the great water snake, seeing all the birds flying resplendent above, leaps up in the air to join them, crying "I want my feather crown." There could hardly be a clearer pointer to the multiple meanings embodied in the hybrid bird-reptile figure revered throughout the continent and seminal in Mesoamerican genesis as the plumed serpent Quetzalcoatl.

Gathered by Theodor Koch-Grünberg, the Pemon texts deal with these and cognate motifs, like love for an evanescent fish bride, a fearsome father-in-law figure, and the trickster evident elsewhere in Carib lit. that came to inspire Mário de Andrade's epochal novel Macunaíma (1928).

In Surinam, the story of the Trio culture hero Pereperewa lends Carib creation a particular resonance at the moment when he is taken by his fish bride to meet her alligator father, who proves to be a creature of many simultaneous identities (Rivière). Reflected in the dark waters of the river, his red cayman eyes produce terror, as does his size as he rises to reveal the load he carries on his back like a canoe, a word synonymous with alligator. Surviving the encounter, Pereperewa learns the advantages of cultivation, in food he is able to take back to his people: peanuts, chili peppers, squash, and the Amazonian staple manioc.

Archaeology is now corroborating the deeper reverberations of the Pereperewa story, fine example of Carib poetry that it is, in a cultural coherence that runs for millennia along the entire length of the Amazon. Toward the headwaters in the west, in the ancient city of Chavin, an obelisk carved about three millennia ago to represent two caimans and named after the Peruvian who excavated the city in the 1920s, Julio Tello, identifies the achievements of Amazonian agriculture as the "gifts of the caiman," specifying exactly the same examples as the Trio do today, far away toward the mouth of the Amazon.

If Tupi-Guaraní and Carib texts indicate the ancient and rich relationship between lowland South America and the Andes, so too do those of a third major Amazonian group, the Bororo-Gé, with whom Claude Lévi-Strauss in the 1930s began the work that culminated in the four volumes of Mythologiques (1964–71), the Bororo being the author of his primary myth. In their own Enciclopédia (1962–76), the Bororo highlight the dual role of the jaguar, founding father both terrestrial as the occupant of the last of the 7 caves and celestial as the first of the 11 constellations to rise over the eastern horizon. Implicit throughout their culture and songs and quite explicit in their painted jaguar skins (adugo biri), the significance of the Bororo pair of prime numbers 7 and 11 can, in its turn, be traced back to stonework at Chavin. There, to either hand in the great circular court, pairs of jaguars with such night-sky identification process toward the exit.

In the Muisca kingdoms that are now Colombia (Krickeberg), lowland precedent is celebrated in the corpus of greenstones directly reminiscent of the muiraquitã. One such from Sopó, adorned with the customary midwife motifs of frog and fish, is illustrated in Alexander von Humboldt's great work Vues des cordillères et monuments des peuples indigènes de l'Amérique (1810, plate 44), where it merits a commentary as substantial as that he accords to the Mexica Sunstone (plate 23). This logs the Guesa's indiction at 15 years (when the annual difference between sun and moon amounts to 15 nights and the difference between synodic and sidereal cycles of the moon amounts to 15 moons). Drawing on accounts of Muisca belief recorded by Pedro Simón and others, Humboldt's commentary on this greenstone directly inspired the first attempts in independent Latin America at the cl. Eur. epic genre, not only O Guesa but Andrés Bello's Silvas americanas (1823).

Within the larger Chibcha category, in lang. the Muisca are kindred of the Kogi of northern Colombia, the Cuna of Panama, and the Talamanca of Costa Rica. Kogi songs and legends are notable for naming the 11 constellations that match those of the Bororo and Desana in Amazonia and for monitoring the now ever-higher snow line in their mountains. A prime focus for the Cuna is the declaration by Nele de Kantule of the isthmian republic in 1925 within but independent of Panama.

Extensive and often recorded as verse or incantation in its own local script, Cuna lit. hinges on the ikala or "way," a mode proper to curing, initiation, the rhythms of the moon (Ni), childbirth (Mu), supporting the dead on the journey into the afterlife (Serkan), therapy, cosmogony (Pap), and political hist. that, in being inseparable from myth, is necessarily poetic. Performed over the course of a night once every moon, women sitting in a middle circle with men on three sides of the room, the most comprehensive is the Tatkan ikala, which stretches from beginnings of the world to the present. It falls into four parts: cosmic comings into being; epic deeds of culture heroes (Neles); migrations and foundings of villages; and the invasion from Europe and its current consequences (Kramer).

Echoes of Amazonia are constant: the first forefather's two wives, one brown/black, the other white; the felling of the great tree of life, Palu uala, and the consequent flood; lunar incest instigated by the brother who advances on his sister's hammock in the dead of night, she being able to stain his face black, the whole being explicitly referred to the female synodic moon and the quicker male sidereal moon; and successive catastrophes inflicted on the world (flood, darkness, storm, warfare) that elaborate the world-age genesis story.

Diagnostic of the Chibcha territory common to the Muisca and the Cuna are creatures and objects formed of gold, the man named El Dorado celebrated in Muisca myth and goldwork and known as Organ in the ikala, and the specifically Cuna Olopatte, the golden platter on which early heroes arrive on earth. Also, explicit in the Pap ikala, though rare in world-age genesis in South America, is the epic that follows the course of the inner planets (Mercury and Venus), which appear to pass through the underworld in moving from the western sunset to the eastern dawn.

II. Tahuantinsuyu. In Quechua, the lang. of the Inca empire, Tahuantinsuyu means four districts. Montaigne finds poetry in its road system and sheer social organization: the causeway that ran "straight, even and fine" from Quito to Cuzco and the well-stocked palatial inns (tambos) along the way. Returning in conclusion to his title and theme ("Des coches"), he admires the blind courage of those who tried unsuccessfully to save Atahuallpa, in his litter, from Francisco Pizarro, in a tragedy that, unknown to Montaigne, entered the cycle of Quechua kingship drama (Lara 1957, 1969).

The early 17th-c. Quechua text known as the Huarochirí Manuscript (1991) makes clear the antiquity of the Tahuantinsuyu concept, tracing its beginnings to the deeds of Huarochirí's own culture hero Pariacaca. Commemorated by a stairway that joins Apurimac and the headwaters of the Amazon to Rimac (Lima) on the Pacific coast, Pariacaca starts life as a glorious snow-covered mountain on Huarochirí's horizon. With cosmic force, Pariacaca tames both the rainforest Antisuyu and the coastal Condesuyu, the latter supplying his demand for spondylus or thorny redshell oyster. Brought fresh to the highlands from the equatorial seas of Ecuador, spondylus had value as shell adornment and as shellfish delectable to eat. The bivalve spondylus (mullo) stands most tellingly as the initial glyph on the Tello obelisk at Chavin, and its mouth-womb is a motif in coastal ceramics, notably among the Moche, 1–500 CE.

Through his son, Pariacaca sets up the first Tahuantinsuyu dynasty, which passing through Ayacucho and other centers, eventually becomes Inca in Cuzco. Archaeologically, the fourfold Tahuantinsuyu emblem—the open Andean cross—is to be seen on the Tello obelisk, opposing Antisuyu caiman to Condesuyu spondylus, with Chinchasuyu extending to the north and Collasuyu to the south. Unambiguous and unmistakable, this open-cross emblem is also found in the isthmus, suggesting widespread recognition north and west of Chinchasuyu, to the very threshold of Anahuac.

As evidence of idolatry gathered by the mestizo priest Francisco de Ávila (who provided a brief Sp. trans. of the earlier chapters), the Huarochirí text leaves little doubt about the power of pagan belief in world-age genesis expressed through worship of huacas (phenomena, natural and constructed, of imposing size and significance), in cults centered typically on mountains like Pariacaca, the stairway over its shoulder that links Amazonian Apurimac with Rimac and canals on the continental watershed engineered to reverse the water flow in favor of Antisuyu and Amazonia. The narrative begins with the initial pair of destructions of the world through flood and solar eclipse; before each, a llama, through its finer senses, warns its duller human masters of approaching catastrophe, and each is tied to a period of five days. Though the biblical parallel is acknowledged in the flood, in the Andes, people are saved not by Noah but a mountain they flee toward. The eclipse provokes the uprising of pastoral creatures like the llama who foresaw it, a rebellion that results from the breaking of the interspecies contract that enables pastoralism in the first place. Christian ideology was seen to have broken this contract by privileging human over other life.

Thereafter, attention focuses on Pariacaca himself as main actor in the world-age genesis. Raining down volcanic fire, he destroys the primeval cannibal Caruincho, along with Caruincho's consort, and sets up Huaca guardians toward both Amazonia (Antisuyu) and the ocean (Condesuyu), thereby explicitly establishing the beginnings of Tahuantinsuyu. He then punishes the neighboring Colli for failing to respect fundamental laws of hospitality, sending them winds of hurricane force, evidence being found in eroded rocks of human shape. Like the first pair of catastrophes of flood and eclipse, this pair of events—rain of fire and hurricane—too is tied to periods of five days each, a score in all.

A first concern in the Huarochirí text is Pariacaca's precedence over the main god in the Inca system, Viracocha. In Quechua, Viracocha is the focus of extensive liturgy, most concisely the hymns or prayers of the Zithuwa ritual (Rowe 1953) that accords him the *epithets earth-maker, lightning, guardian of crops, and herder of humans and llamas alike.

A work contemp. with the Huarochirí narrative, Guáman Poma's (ca. 1535–1616) El primer nueva corónica y buen gobierno (ca. 1615; see Murra and Adorno), registers the very geography of the Inca Tahuantinsuyu in terms of the music, dance, and song characteristic of each quarter and the metropolitan center, Cuzco. Intercalated with page-framed images, this alphabetic text in Quechua and Sp. notes its immediate source as quipu records. In its own version of world-age genesis, people of each successive world age are distinguished by such features as clothing, houses, and style of prayer. Poma's work reveres the pastoral llama, who at the raymi solstice festival literally gives the keynote for the Inca emperor to begin the songs and music proper to Cuzco at the center of the four suyu.

El Inca Garcilaso de le Vega (1539–1616) gives a privileged version of this heritage in his Comentarios reales (1609), also contemp. with the Huarochirí narrative and Poma's Corónica. Garcilaso confirms the literary functions of the quipu in recording poetry and chronicle, as well as counts of llama herds and people. He includes a hymn collected by Blas Valera (1545–97) in a trilingual version—Quechua, Sp., and Eng.—as well as a love poem, measures of his taste as courtly scion of the imperial Inca. The two Quechua poems quoted by Garcilaso had the egregious distinction of being chosen by J. G. Herder as "voices of the people in song" (Stimmen der Völker in Liedern), songs of wild Am. people at that ("die Wilden"). Persuasive as Herder's sense of Stimmen may be, his venture into Inca hymnology exemplarily signals a mismatch between beginnings of Eur. romantic need and this branch of Am. poetics with its courtly pastoral underpinnings:

> Viracocha, you say > may the sun be, may the night be > in peace, in safety > sun, shine on and illume > the Incas, the people, the servants > whom you have shepherded

The kingship verse drama Apu Ollanta (1735) exerted such strong appeal in colonial times that Spain outlawed performances of it after Tupac Amaru II's uprising of 1780, which foreshadowed independence. Deriving from the Quechua haraui (elegiac song; cf. haravek, the term for poet) and integrated early into *Spanish prosody, the verse form known as the yaraví enjoyed great appeal during this period, thanks initially to the martyr poet Mariano Melgar (1790–1815), while Wallparamachi and his guerrilla fighters sang in Quechua to further their struggle. Extremely sensitive accounts of similar forms in context, like the huayno and the jailli, are found in the novels and essays of José María Arguedas (1911–69), the anthropologist-poet who compiled the landmark collection Canto Kechwa (1938). The resilient huayno conjoins native and mestizo and respects distinctive styles in Huamanga, Apurimac, and elsewhere (Rowe 1996). Some idea of the powerful political charge these trads. acquired during the Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) era can be had from the well-titled volume Sangre de los cerros (1987) by the Montoya brothers. Their broader aesthetic potential is patent in the work of Odi González (b. 1962) and the trilingual (Quechua, Sp., Eng.), New York-based Fredy Amilcar Roncalla (b. 1953), among others. At the turn of the century (1905), Alencastre, a landowner from Cuzco (see Warak'a 1999), had been preceded at the other end of the social scale by Tarmap pacha huaray, an anthol. of Quechua poems from Tarma got together by self-professed pariahs ("unos parias").

Expatriate for much of his life in Paris, the poet César Vallejo (1892–1938) repeatedly acknowledged a debt to his Andean birthplace, from the exquisitely figured gold panels of the Cuzco Coricancha (Nostalgias imperiales, 1918) and the wave-and-step motifs of the coastal architecture (Escalas melografiadas, 1923) to the drama of Inca power (La piedra cansada, 1938), based on a legend told in Poma's chronicle.

Poetry in Ecuador is known in Quichua, a version of the Inca Quechua that, dating back to Atahuallpa's Quito, has its own Amazon approaches (Harrison). As for Bolivia, the superbly documented study of indigenous lits. in the Andes by Arnold and Dios Yapita has made it possible for the first time in Eng. to appreciate the immense wealth and complexity of the entire region's poetry and poetics. This is strikingly so with regard to the Aymara and Collasuyu precedent for Inca and Quechua practice, within the pastoral economy and ideology characteristic of the Andes, starting with Cuzco's appropriation of Tiahuanaco herds. The authors are able to show how much is owed in Andean song and drama to the Aymara, from the quipu numeracy of tethering and the weft and warp of the textile text to principles of origin and rulership.

Diagonally opposite Chinchasuyu and its extension into Colombia and the isthmus, Collasuyu has its heart in Lake Titicaca and the pastoral wealth of the Aymara in Bolivia (Lara 1947) and finds its southern frontier in what is now Chile. On the other side of this Tahuantinsuyu frontier stand the fiercely resistant Mapuche, who, having held off the Inca, did the same when the Spaniards arrived, to be commemorated in Alonso de Ercilla's epic La Araucana (1569–89).

Known as Ftah Mapu in their lang. (Mapudungun), Mapuche territory concentrates in the landscape of the southern cordillera (Pire Mahuida) around Lacar and the lakeland passage between Chile and Argentina, which functions likewise as the setting for world-age genesis far more ancient than those nation states. In this case, refuge from the flood is sought in Mount Threng Threng and the fossil-rich strata of Trompul, bones of the fish to which protohumans reverted. Foro-lil (bone-stone), these fossils kilometers above sea level correspond to nocturnal shades who emerge to haunt as snake, bird, and vampire, with fin-wings and beady eyes that stare back through time (it was here that such fossils were shown to Darwin during his voyage on the Beagle). The floodwater threshed up by the snake Kai-Kai in the mountain lakes finds parallels along the ocean coast in terrifying tidal waves and tsunami known as tripalafken. After the catastrophes of the world ages, the Mapuche community clusters around the emblematic tree of the Pacific coastal forests as the face carved in the east-facing Rehue and defers to the insight and curing power of the Machi shaman (most often a woman).

Reflecting the cultural resilience and political wisdom that has enabled them still to defend at least some small part of their territory, the poetry of the Mapuche, reborn in 1966 in the work of Sebastián Queupul (b. 1944), stands out on the continental map. Ül (Song) is the title of a 1998 collection of four poets: Leonel Lienlaf (b. 1969), Elicura Chihuailaf (b. 1952), Jaime Luis Huenún (b. 1967), and Graciela Huinao (b. 1956), whose work privileges their native tongue (Vicuña).

Previously recognized and translated into Sp. by the Chilean poet Raúl Zurita (1989), Lienlaf contrives to recover the sensibility that brings together for the Mapuche, in their lang., world-age genesis, military struggle initially against the sword and the Christian cross, and then "pacification" by machine gun on both sides of the Andes. Enduring over "a hundred generations" and threaded into the Rehue and the Machi chant, time is marked in tree growth by rupamum (footsteps). This is the time of ancient trans-Andean memories, recorded just after World War I by Kössler-Ilg, that extend from world-age genesis to the late 19th-c. resistance led by Calfucurá.

Chihuailaf is notable for choosing to translate into Mapudungun the fellow Chilean poet Pablo Neruda (1904–73) in Ti kom vl (1995). The poems and volumes of Neruda's that Chihuailaf selects, and the way he plays Mapudungun against Sp., brilliantly begin to recover for Chile exactly the imaginative possibilities that Neruda came to dream of during and after his Am. epic Canto general (1950). Translated as "Todos los cantos," the title poem breathes local life and hist. into the elegiac image of the trees and stones of Arauco that closes the first canto of Neruda's epic, peopling and enlivening them in ways unsuspected half a century ago.

III. Anahuac. Known as Anahuac between the seas, Atlantic to the north and Pacific to the south, and as Amoxtlan (the "land of books" in Nahuatl), Mesoamerica has long held a special position in the geography of the continent. Montaigne's encounter with it is striking, since, as proof of its high civilization, in his second Am. essay he actually cites the cosmic poem of world-age genesis: "They believed the state of the world to be divided into five ages, as in the life of five succeeding Suns, whereof four had already ended their course or time." Montaigne had translated his text from Gómara's Sp., who, in turn, had drawn on Motolinía (pseud. of Fray Toribio de Benavente, 1482–1568), an early extirpator of idolatry in Cholula, deeply familiar with the Nahuatl lang. inherited by the Mexica or Aztecs.

The extant version of this cosmic poem closest to the Nahuatl trad. of the Aztecs and their predecessors is found in the Cuauhtitlan Annals (ca. 1570; Bierhorst 1992) and begins:

Y ynin ce tonatiuh onmanca yn itzinecan
4 atl yn itonal mitoa atonatiuh yc ipan in ye yquac yn mochih yn atocoac.
Yn anenenztihuac
yn tlaca michtihuac

Y ynic ome tonatiuh onmanca
4 ocelotl yn tonal catca motenehua ocelotonatiuh ypan mochiuh
tlapachiuh yn ylhuicatl

(The first sun to be founded has the Sign Four Water, it is called Water Sun.
Then it happened that water carried everything away

everything vanished people changed into fish.

The second sun to be founded has the Sign Four Jaguar
it is called Jaguar Sun.
Then it happened
that the sky broke down)

The Nahuatl text goes on to tell how, since the sun no longer followed its course, night came and, in the dark, people were torn to pieces by jaguars plunging from the sky; this was the time of the giants. In the third sun, called 4 Rain, fire and volcanic ash (tezontli) rained down, and rocks boiled and twisted up; in the fourth, 4 Wind, wind carried everything away, and people changed into monkeys. Having of its own accord started to move (a pun on ollin, which also denotes both rubber and earthquake), the current fifth sun, 4 Ollin, will end in earthquake and hunger.

Anticipating Western geology and evolutionary theory by several centuries, the cataclysms and metamorphoses of Anahuac genesis take us back to tlacuilolli, the visual lang. of Mesoamerica from which the Nahuatl had been transcribed. Of the several examples of this world-age story that exist on paper and in stone in tlacuilolli, easily the most monumental is the Aztec or Mexica Sunstone or Piedra de los soles, the inscribed basalt disk that before the invasion proclaimed the world-age story in Tenochtitlan's Templo Mayor. In chronological terms, the sunstone locates the 5,200 or so years of our current fifth world age, named Nauh (4) Ollin, as a fifth (in the thumb-fingers proportion 1:4) of the precessional year that, in turn, forms a core unit of the many millions of years of genesis inscribed in Maya hieroglyphs and reflected in tlacuilolli.

The recovery of the sunstone in 1790 from under a corner of Mexico City's nearby cathedral enabled Humboldt to publish an image of it with an extensive commentary in his Vues des cordillères. Ideologically, the event fomented the independence cause. In poetics, susceptible to decipherment in many pages of alphabetic prose yet succinct and synchronic in its circular form, a map of simultaneity, the sunstone has come to be acknowledged as a superb poem in the visual lang. tlacuilolli. In early 20th-c. Europe, it became the prompt for the first of Guillaume Apollinaire's "concrete" Calligrammes, "Lettre-Océan" (see CALLIGRAMME, CONCRETE POETRY, VISUAL POETRY).

In Anahuac, the fullest alphabetic account of this cosmic saga can be found in the Popol Vuh, the "Bible of America" written in the mid-16th c., in their lang., by the Maya Quiché of Guatemala. A narrative in paired verses, this text starts from the very beginnings of time and falls into two parts. These hinge on the creation of humankind from maize, a motif developed, e.g., in Classic Period hieroglyphic texts at Palenque that correlate the event with the start of the Olmec and Maya Era just less than 5,200 years ago. In the ingenious way that the text itself offers clues about how they connect and interweave, the main phases of part I can be seen to correspond to the sunstone, notably the metamorphoses into fish in the flood of the first age and into monkeys (elder brothers of the Hero Twins) in the hurricane of the fourth; these events are recounted in Nahuatl in the Cuauhtitlan Annals and Leyenda de los soles. Esp. vivid and also reflected in Maya art are the domestic revolt in the eclipse in the second age, the Twins' childhood taming of bird-reptile monsters in the volcanic landscape of the third age, and their epic descent to the underworld Xibalba that prepares for the maize creation.

The line of tlacuilolli texts to which the sunstone account belongs begins in the east with the world-age Map of Coixtlahuaca, the town that controlled the east-west tribute road taken by the Mexica in the reign of Moctezuma I (1440–69).

At the first level, the Coixtlahuaca text is overtly a map of four places subject to that city, which, again in the simultaneity characteristic of tlacuilolli, may be read both as town toponyms and as emblems of the world ages. Mictlan (southeast) and Teotlillan (northeast) recall flood and eclipse, while Nexapa (southwest) and Tepexic (northwest) recall rain of fire and hurricane. While this is the pattern inherited in the sunstone, the Mexica make one critical change. For Coixtlahuaca, the fish-tail caiman seen rising from volcanic ash in Nexapa (curiously reminiscent of the life form inscribed on Chavin's obelisk) reappears above in Tepexic, endowed with Quetzalcoatl feathers, atop a twin peak baring tooth and claw. For Tenochtitlan, the two caimans encircle the disk with imperial might, fish tails above, arms and heads (crowned by the septentrion) below. Moreover, their form invokes the metamorphic Xiuhcoanahual, the ophidian familiar that, for the Mexica, configures world-age genesis and the gyres of time counted out on the literal scales of the sunstone caiman.

The sunstone likewise reworks the central chapter of Codex Borgia of Cholula, whose chronicles tell of the road east toward the isthmus and beyond, to Popayan and South America. Like the affine screen-folds Cospi and Vaticanus B, Codex Borgia opens with an eight-page chapter based on human gestation, the 9x29 nights of the tonalpoualli, which simultaneously may be read as the succession of suns and in space as a map of Anahuac between north and south seas, dazzling tlacuilolli prospects of tropical America seen from south (east to right) and north (east to left). Read from top to bottom, the 10 + 8 pages of Borgia 's central chapter focus rather on Mesoamerica's other main time cycle, the year of 18 Feasts each of 20 days, beginning with the summer solstice, and involve a turn at midwinter from the end of one side of the screen-fold text to the start of the other. In the switch from recto to verso, the text even contrives visually to register the winter solstice as the passage through the underworld followed by the inner planets and the hero twins of the Popol Vuh. The codex pages configure a supremely elegant time map of tropical America.

The highland Maya Popol Vuh of the Quiché coincides with and interestingly differs on doctrinal points of diet from the genesis account of the neighboring Cakchiquels, on the shores of Lake Atitlan. This focus is also that of the Quiché dance drama Rabinal Achí. Like Ollanta and other Inca kingship propaganda and like an abundance of missionary plays in Quechua, Tupi, Nahuatl, and other langs. whose roots are deeply pre-Cortesian, this highland Maya work explores the boundaries between verse and theater, as Tedlock expertly shows in his ed. (2003).

The lowland Maya version of world-age genesis, transcribed in part into the alphabet from hieroglyphic stanzas (Alvarez), is found in the Chilam Balam books of the towns of Yucatan (Barrera Vásquez and Rendón). The Book of Chumayel excels in its witty play with biblical notions of time, the successive invasions of the peninsula in which the Christians come third, and the riddles of Zuyua that are invitations to brilliant conceptual insight formally derived from political tests of candidates for official position in the Katun calendar system.

In the dense polyphonic epic that issues into the current world age and Era, the hieroglyphic antecedent (Dresden Codex) has recently been shown to resolve the long-standing debate about correlating its inaugural date (4 Ahau 8 Cumku) with the Roman calendar (Julian day 584.283 in the year 3114 BCE).

Reflecting on the consequences of Eur. arrival, the Book of Chumayel draws on the hieroglyph-based prophecy chronicles of the Katun and Tun calendar cycles. (As Cuceb, the latter are meticulously edited in Bierhorst's Four Masterworks). One such prophecy chronicle begins thus:

> [T]he true God, the true Dios, came, but this was the origin too of affliction for us. The origin of tax, of our giving them alms, of trial through the grabbing of petty cacao money, of trial by blowgun, stomping the people, violent removal, forced debt created by false testimony, petty litigation, harassment, violent removal . . .

Such incredulous pain echoes that expressed in Nahuatl in the Tlatelolco Annals (1528) and indeed exemplifies a whole mode of postinvasion composition (León-Portilla 1964a).

Because of its scale and ambition in presenting world-age genesis in sharply poetic terms, the Huarochirí Manuscript has been referred to as the Popol Vuh of the Andes. Apt, the comparison requires that we acknowledge the level of theoretical understanding that, during the second world-age eclipse, may equate the pastoral llamas who rebelled in the Andes with their nearest domesticated equivalents in Mesoamerica, dogs and turkeys.

As the provenance of screen-fold books, notably Codex Borgia, Cholula was known as the Rome of New Spain. Guardian of cults stemming from the Olmec, this pyramid city was a major precedent for the Mexica, as they make clear in postinvasion codices like Telleriano Remensis and in the Nahuatl of their "Twenty Sacred Hymns."

Looking for evidence of idolatry, the Franciscan missionary Bernardino de Sahagún (ca. 1499–1590), whose 12-book Florentine Codex (completed 1577) grew from the four, dense tlacuilolli chapters of the Tepepulco Manuscript, found these hymns so devilish and difficult that he refrained from trying to translate them from Nahuatl. He left the originals to an appendix to book 2, while book 6 deals with the challenges posed by Nahuatl poetics. Their huge poetic power was acknowledged by D. G. Brinton in the title he gave to his Eng. trans. Rig Veda Americanus, a key volume in his Philadelphia Library of Aboriginal American Literature series (1882–90). An important way of facing the difficulty posed by the hymns has proved to be recognizing their dependence on the rich poetic capacity of tlacuilolli. The hymn to the rain god Tlaloc, e.g., relies on a multiple pun involving the semantics of the XX Signs, their respective numbers in the series as Snake lightning (V), Jaguar thunder (XIV), and Rain (XIX), and the sheer phenomenon of storm. The arithmetic (V + XIV = XIX) is clearly legible in the hypnotic image of Tlaloc seen on the penultimate page of a book from Teotlillan (Codex Laud 45), where this rainmaker is revered as ocelocoatl, the Jaguar-Snake of the Nahuatl hymn, and can be seen roaring thunder from under his elaborate Jaguar headdress, while holding the Snake scepter of lightning.

A similar case is the celebration of Itzpapalotl, the Obsidian Butterfly (hymn 4), whose name in tlacuilolli when read as a calendrical date comprises numbers belonging to the set of 9 Night Powers (Yoalitecutin) and the 13 Fliers (Quecholli). Central to these 13 as number 7, the butterfly's metamorphic body conjoins the vitreous edge that, like obsidian, is sharp but brittle with the beauty of the wing that, lacking the vertebrate strength of the other 6+6 fliers, is easily damaged. Relying on the fact that Hermes (Mercury) goes around the sun 22 times every seven years, Itzpapalotl's hermetic teachings underlie the considerable corpus of Chichimec lit. in which, abused and seeking vengeance, she leads the Chichimec archers south into the tropics from Chicomoztoc, their desert fastness that translates as "Seven Caves." As the eponymous Mariposa de obsidiana (in Garibay's trans., 1958), Itzpapalotl also prompted one of the most powerful poems in Octavio Paz's (1914–98) Águila o sol (1950).

In order to function practically, the Mexica tribute system relied on a multilevel arithmogram that correlates the districts in the quarters west, south, east, and north of Tenochtitlan with the tonalpoualli nights of human gestation, synodic and sidereal moons, and the days of the year. The tribute due from each district is listed in the tlacuilolli Matrícula de tributos, to which Codex Mendoza adds a map (a quincunx oriented to west). The analogies to Cuzco's Tahuantinsuyu are strong, and, in each case, songs served as tribute items of value that characterized cultural geography. Demanding the performance of a song in the lang. and style of a region was a right of conquest in Cuzco and Tenochtitlan alike, which links further back again to the Tupi carbet.

In the imperial court of Tenochtitlan, this practice helped form the collection of poems known as Cantares mexicanos. Copious, this Nahuatl work encompasses poems both ancient, like a Toltec lament that also appears in the Popol Vuh, and mod., like those that parody Christian liturgy. Revealing overall the immense richness inherent in the Nahuatl term for poetry itself (xochi-cuicatl, "flower-song"), it draws on well-recognized modes proper to mourning ("orphan"), planting ("green"), and war ("enemy").

After the invasion, analogous encodings of precious knowledge in concept and number continue to inform the shamanic rhetoric of ritual cure, as in the Maya Ritual of the Bacabs (Arzápalo) and the Nahuatl Tratado of 1629.

The range and power of native poetry in contemp. Mexico are evidenced in the first volume of Carlos Montemayor's Escritores indígenas actuales (1992). A strength of this volume is to show the survival of poetic speech in the three main lang. families of Mexico, Otomanguan, Maya, and Nahuatl. In Otomi, Thaayrohyadi Bermúdez appeals to that people (and their Purépecha neighbors) who have lived longest along its banks for the life and health of the river Lerma, threatened as it increasingly is by attitudes and policies rooted in the exploitative ideology of the invasion begun by Christopher Columbus. Its concentration on the idea of water, primal and unpolluted, curiously echoes what is known of the celebrated poet-king of Texcoco, Nezahualcoyotl (1402–72), named in the Cantares mexicanos, whose first compositions are recorded in Otomi.

We have seen the bridging role of the isthmus between Meso- and South America corroborated from the east in the Andean cross emblem chakana found in the ceramic codex of Yojoa in the ambit of the Maya metropolis Copan (Honduras), while from the west, Nahuatl lies at the root of the names Guatemala, Cuzcatlan (El Salvador), and Nicaragua. A theater piece focused on the tall tales of the widely traveled pochteca (trader and tax collector) published in Brinton's library as The Gueguënce: A Comedy-Ballet in the Nahuatl-Spanish Dialect of Nicaragua (1883) reveals wit sustained by the intense cultural traffic to and fro along the isthmus. For its part, the ceramic codex of Yojoa in the Ulua homeland of the Lenca juxtaposes motifs that include the Olmec caiman whose maw is a cave, the dancing armadillo of the Amazonian midwives, the literal runner bean of coastal Peruvian ceramics, the jaguar defending the night with tooth bared and claw unsheathed, the monkey pochteca, the rebellious turkey of the eclipse, the craftsman whose deep inspiration flows vertebrally from a fishy forebear, and well-dressed Maya dignitaries of the nearby metropolis Copan, also in Honduras.

In mod. times, the isthmus spirit can be seen to suffuse the remarkable line of Nicaraguan poets Rubén Darío (1867–1916), Pablo Antonio Cuadra (1912–2002), and Ernesto Cardenal (b. 1925), who have all recognized native America as a chief source. The poems in Cardenal's Homenaje a los indios americanos (1970) work directly from native texts from the entire continent. Before him, Cuadra had found a manifold reference for his poetry in the doble yo (double I) concept, a human head that is shielded by and beneath a back and head that belong to a powerful beast. This motif is seen alike in Amazonian stone sculpture, in San Agustín at the headwaters of the Magdalena in Colombia, in the isthmus and, most magnificently, in the statues of Maya potentates. As for Darío, the modernista founder of Sp. Am. poetry (see MODERNISMO), he spoke for his work and the movement as a whole when, in the "Palabras liminares" to Prosas profanas (1896), he wrote that, if poetry was to be found in "nuestra América," then it would be in the old things, in the legendary Indian, the refined and sensual Inca, the lowland and highland Maya cities of Palenque and Utatlan, and the great Moctezuma's golden throne. The Otomanguan family is also represented by Zapotec, in Victor de la Cruz's (b. 1948) Guchachi' Reza, supported by artist Francisco Toledo, which has included trans. of Bertolt Brecht's poetry. For its part, like that of Rigoberta Menchú (b. 1959), the work of the contemp. Maya Quiché poet Humberto Ak'abal (b. 1952) defends the Maya world in his native lang. and in Sp. as living perception.

IV. Turtle Island. A century and a half after Montaigne, Anahuac's northern continuity with parts of America now occupied by the U.S. and Canada inspired Lorenzo Boturini (1702–1753), a student of Giambattista Vico, to write Idea de una nueva historia de la América septentrional (1746). The base of mod. codices scholarship, this "new idea" relies heavily on the royal library built up by Nezahualcoyotl (Lee) in Texcoco, on the east bank of the highland lake, which Boturini cataloged and tried to reassemble. Texcoco is the focus of the Romances de los Señores de la Nueva España, an extensive anthol. of Nahuatl poetry that complements the Cantares mexicanos of Tenochtitlan on the west bank, being similarly based on both ancient memory and current tribute practice (Garibay 1964–68).

In documenting their origins in Texcoco, Nezahualcoyotl and his ancestors celebrated the Chichimec saga that had first brought them south across the tropical line from the 7th c. on, led by the obsidian butterfly Itzpapalotl from their homeland Chicomoztoc (Seven Caves). Visually, the most brilliant version of this saga is to be found in Codex Borgia, where the butterfly is seen about to emerge from her cocoon under seven caves marked by the stars of the septentrion, on a path that leads east, north, and west before plunging south. For its part, at Tepexic the Coixtlahuaca map establishes the hermetic nature of her teachings, literally, by correlating in Seven Caves the cycles of the moon and the planet Mercury (Hermes), in the synodic formula that approximates the nights of four moons with the 116 of the planet, and the sidereal formula that does the same for three moons and 88 nights of the planet.

Exactly this hermetic logic pervades corresponding sagas of crossing the tropical line told by those who live north of it, northwest of Mesoamerica. The exemplary case is that of the Zuni, who as neighbors have the Keres-speaking Pueblo to the east and the Hopi (in speech, kin to the Nahua) to the west. Culturally, the coherence of this landscape has long been embodied in the quincunx of mountains seen in Pueblo murals, which later gave shape to the sand or dry paintings of the Navajo, and their corresponding chants or ways (Wyman). The novel Ceremony (1976) by the Laguna Pueblo Leslie Marmon Silko (b. 1948) focuses on Tsepina, the turquoise mountain closest to home, later called Tsodzil by the Navajo, where it generates power both poetic and therapeutic. The same power imbues the verse in her Storyteller (1981).

In their genesis, the Zuni emerge through rooms that are world ages, upward, as in the architecture of multistory Pueblo houses. They then migrate to find their location on the Continental Divide, between the headwaters of the Rio Grande (southeast) and those of the Colorado River (southwest). Recalled in ceremonies over the year and in corresponding iconography in underground kiva temples, the story falls into episodes and culminates in the arrival of Sp. invaders from Mexico, who were successfully resisted, and then of the U.S. in the last years of the 19th c. When the U.S. was still invading, a particularly sensitive account of this trad. was given by Frank Cushing, who learned the Zuni lang. and went to live among them. A century later, Tedlock published versions performed in his presence in Finding the Center, a magnificent work that adjusts typography to the needs of ethnopoetics.

Identified at dawn by the macaw feather he wears in his hair as he rises before the sun heliacally, the Zuni hero Nepayatamu by night is honored at the kiva shrine of the Milky Way Newekwe. From the four sides of Newekwe and after four moons, he hails his planet's return, sheltering the metamorphic butterfly in his flute. He shares these hermetic characteristics with counterparts among the Pueblo to the east like the "Sun youth" in Boas's Keresan Texts and among the much-visited Hopi, where the butterfly is enshrined at Awatobi and where, journeying back and forth across the tropical line, it is inseparable from genesis and the birth of maize. Throughout this territory, in the hermetic butterfly complex, there are specific and striking echoes of the poetry and visual art of Anahuac, particularly the major cities of Teotihuacan and Cholula.

In the story they tell of themselves as invaders of the Pueblo in Diné Bahane' (Zolbrod), the Navajo make many of these connections plain. The case of the Apache is comparable, and as Athapaskan relatives, they defended together a last frontier that stretched from Mexico and Apacheria to the Black Hills of Dakota.

The debt to the Anahuac codices, esp. their quatrefoil and quincunx maps, is patent in the sand or dry paintings laid out on the hogan floor to complement the therapeutic chants of the Navajo ways over as many as nine nights. Mutually enriching each other as they do in tlacuilolli fashion as visual and verbal lang., the dry paintings and the chants may fairly be regarded as literary bedrock among the Navajo, a celebrated example being the Kledzhe Hatal (Night Chant, last of Bierhorst's four masterworks). Moreover, this is a living trad., from which poets who write in Navajo, like Luci Tapahonso (b. 1953), may draw strength.

In defining territory, the Navajo paintings serve as an excellent guide to cultural hist. Toward the Great Plains that stretch northeast beyond the mountains, we see and hear the buffalo. Shot steadily after 1864 from transcontinental trains so as to starve still-resistant Indians to death, the buffalo embodies time and life itself on the plains. According to the Sioux Winter Counts by High Hawk and Brown Hat (Mallery), it is Buffalo Woman who brings the first gifts to the peoples of the plains, the tobacco peace pipe, maize of four colors and in all its preparations, the tipi circle, and their respective songs, which become a main ingredient in the dazzling visions of Black Elk.

Belief in the return of the buffalo to the plains was fundamental to the Ghost Dance of 1890, coincident with the Wounded Knee massacre. To remain undaunted in the face of ever more violent white assault, tribes from Mexico to Canada and from California to Oklahoma gave each other their songs, ascribing to them the value they had had as tribute items among the Aztecs and the Inca. The trance sought in the songs brought back, too, the ghosts of many thousands of the fallen. On those grounds, Bierhorst (1985) has argued strongly for detecting a similar dimension in the Cantares mexicanos.

"We shall live again," a main refrain in the songs heard by such poets as Gary Snyder (b. 1930) and echoed repeatedly in subsequent U.S. mass movements, implies concern with beginnings, notably among the Arapaho and Cheyenne, a principal contingent in the dance (Mooney 1896). The tongue of both is Algonkian, called the "language of America" by Roger Williams in 1643, which stretches east across the continent to include those who first encountered the Eng. in Massachusetts, in Manhattan, and with Powhatan. Algonkian genesis is typified in the song to the turtle (Bruchac), which, floating in the cosmic ocean, has borne the weight of the earth itself since "the beginning of human existence."

Adherence to this "floating island" version of Am. genesis became paramount among the Algonkian-speaking Ojibwa, midway between west and east around the frontier lakes that feed the uppermost Mississippi (a focus mapped in Lévi-Strauss's Mythologiques). Before Europeans arrived, these beliefs sustained the Midewiwin, a shamanic society where initiation demanded knowledge of sacred songs whose syllables and stanzas correspond to designs inscribed on birch-bark scrolls (Dewdney). This Mide writing seemed dangerous enough to Anglican missionaries to warrant suppression and Christian replacements, likewise on birch bark but printed alphabetically. Through his Ojibwa wife, Schoolcraft gained privileged insight into this trad. (see also Carr).

Among much else, texts in Mide script graphically chart the chants of genesis, the trance journey through zenith and nadir (in which in shamanic time nights are years, as they can be in the Winter Counts, as indeed they actually are near the pole), and the power of Manito. Widely shared Algonkian belief in the trance journey much strengthened the uprisings led by the Ottawa Pontiac in 1761 and by his Shawnee successor Tecumseh. Depicted in the scrolls, one of the five most powerful Manitos is the turtle who sustains the earth. Represented ubiquitously in the artwork of Turtle Island, this creature inaugurates the epic of the Lenape (Delaware), of which Constantine Samuel Rafinesque provided a version in Mide script entitled Walum Olum (1836; later included in Brinton's Philadelphia library). The importance of these precedents today are made clear in the example of Gerald Vizenor (b. 1934), the Ojibwa novelist who began his career by compiling an anthol. of poetry in his lang.

In northern Appalachia, these beliefs were incorporated into the Iroquoian genesis, which is why, in his Sketches of Ancient History of the Six Nations (1825), the Iroquois historian Cusick referred to the whole of America north of Mexico as Turtle Island, distinguishing it from lands farther south with their early knowledge of maize and of humankind's simian forebears (this before Darwin). Belief among the Canadian Iroquois in the turtle that created the island which became the first earth was noted by the Jesuit Joseph-François Lafitau (1681–1746) in 1724. The turtle that can burrow to the very heart of the earth is invoked in the curing chants written by the Cherokee (Iroquoian neighbors in Appalachia) in their Sequoya syllabary (Mooney 1992). The syllabary texts draw likewise on shared Iroquoian reverence for maize as one of the three sisters who are the "three graces" in their common agricultural hist., maize, beans, and squash. Graphic antecedents may be found in the mound culture ceramics at Cahokia.

The syllabary texts also respect the power of moundbuilder forebears in southern Appalachia who, according to the chants, still live inside the Cherokee mounds, as a hidden resource in defense. Thereby they establish effective links, often in precise detail, with cultural norms current over a thousand years ago, detected today also among the Yuchi and the Musgokee and their neighbors.

Apart from impinging on the initial framing of the U.S. constitution, the Five (later Six) Nations of the Iroquois left a magnificent record of themselves in their Ritual of Condolence, another of Bierhorst's four masterworks. The rhet. relied on what Lafitau called the council style of the Iroquois; its chronology was extensive, and, in it, nights could count for years.

Farther west, connections can be made with Iroquoian speakers beyond the Mississippi, such as the Caddo and the Pawnee, whose Hako ceremony entered western poetics in 1900, having been recorded on the ethnologist Alice Fletcher's (1838–1923) phonograph.

At the turn on the 20th c., H. W. Longfellow's "Song of Hiawatha" (1855) was massively propagated throughout the U.S. school system and was the most read and performed poem of its day. Founder of the Iroquois League of Nations, its eponymous hero lives a life heavily reliant on Algonkian legend, as critics never tire of noting. What tends to be less noticed is the imaginative precision of Mide song symbols in the Eng.-lang. poem and Turtle Island perspectives that had been shared in any case by both Algonkian and Iroquois. Perhaps yet more consequentially, Hiawatha proved to be a major factor in Carl Jung's hypothesis of the collective unconscious and his break with Sigmund Freud.

See GUARANÍ POETRY, INUIT POETRY, MAPUCHE POETRY, NAVAJO POETRY.

■ H. R. Schoolcraft, Historical and Statistical Information Respecting the History, Condition and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States (1851–57); H. Hale, The Iroquois Book of Rites (1883); The Lenape and Their Legends (1884); Ancient Nahuatl Poetry (1887); and Rig Veda Americanus: Sacred Songs of the Ancient Mexicans (1890), all ed. and trans. D. G. Brinton; G. Mallery, Picture-Writing of the American Indians (1893); J. Mooney, The Ghost-Dance Religion and the Sioux Outbreak of 1890 (1896); A. C. Fletcher, Indian Story and Song from North America (1900); K. T. Preuss, Die Religion und Mythologie der Uitoto (1921); M. Austin, The American Rhythm (1923); R. Harcourt and M. d'Harcourt, La musique des Incas et ses survivances (1925); F. Boas, Keresan Texts (1928); W. Krickeberg, Märchen der Azteken und Inkaperuaner, Maya und Musica (1928); J. M. Arguedas, Canto Keshwa (1938); A. M. Garibay, Poesía indígena de la Altiplanicie (1940); J. Lara, Poesía popular quechua (1947); A. G. Day, The Sky Clears: Poetry of the American Indians (1951); N. M. Holmer, The Complete Mu-Igala in Picture-Writing: A Native Record of a Cuna Indian Medicine Song (1953); J. H. Rowe, "Eleven Inca Prayers from the Zithuwa Ritual," Kroeber Anthropological Society Papers 8–9 (1953); B. Kössler-llg, Indianermärchen aus den Kordilleren (1956); El libro de los cantares de Dzitbalche, ed. A. Barrera Vásquez (1956); J. M. Arguedas, The Singing Mountaineers: Song and Tales of the Quechua (1957); and Floresta literaria de la América indígena (1957); J. Alcina Franch, Floresta literaria de la Améica indígena (1957); J. Lara, Tragedia del fin de Atawallpa (1957); A. M. Garibay, Veinte himnos sacros de los nahuas (1958); Ayvu rapyta, ed. L. Cadogan (1959); Anthologie des mythes, legends et contes populaires d'Amérique, ed. B. Péret (1960); M. A. Asturias, Poesía precolombina (1960); K. A. Nowotny, Tlacuilolli: Die mexikanischen Bilderhandschriften, Stil und Inhalt (1961); A. Barrera Vásquez and S. Rendón, El libro de los Libros de Chilam Balam (1963); N. M. Holmer, Dos cantos shamanísticos de los indios cunas (1963); A. M. Garibay, Poesía náhuatl (1964–68); M. León-Portilla, Las literaturas precolombinas de México (1964a); and El reverso de la conquista: Relaciones aztecas, mayas e incas (1964b); La literatura de los Guaraníes, ed. L. Cadogan (1965); J. Lara, La literatura de los quechuas (1969); P. Rivière, Marriage among the Trio (1969); M. de Civrieux, Watunna: An Orinoco Creation Cycle, trans. D. Guss (1970); F. W. Kramer, Literature among the Cuna Indians (1970); M. Edmonson, The Book of Counsel: The Popol Vuh of the Quiché Maya of Guatemala (1971); G. Reichel-Dolmatoff, Amazonian Cosmos: The Sexual and Religious Symbolism of the Tukano Indians (1971); J. Rothenberg, Shaking the Pumpkin: Traditional Poetry of the Indian North Americas (1972); D. Tedlock, Finding the Center: Narrative Poetry of the Zuni Indians (1972); E. Cardenal, Homage to the American Indians, trans. M.

Altschul and C. Altschul (1973); M. C. Alvarez, Textos coloniales del Libro de Chilam Balam de Chumayel y textos glíficos del Códice de Dresde (1974); J. Bierhorst, Four Masterworks of American Indian Literature: Quetzalcoatl, The Ritual of Condolence, Cuceb, The Night Chant (1974); S. Dewdney, The Sacred Scrolls of the Southern Ojibway (1975); G. Brotherston, Image of the New World: The American Continent Portrayed in Native Texts (1979); R. Bareiro Saguier, Literatura guaraní del Paraguay (1980); G. Poma, El primer nueva corónica y buen gobierno, ed. J. V. Murra and R. Adorno (1980); "In Vain I Tried to Tell": Essays in Native American Ethnopoetics, ed. D. H. Hymes (1981); G. Vizenor, Summer in the Spring: Ojibwa Lyric Poems and Tribal Stories (1981); P. G. Roe, The Cosmic Zygote: Cosmology in the Amazon Basin (1982); T. Meneses, Teatro quechua colonial (1983); Songs from This Earth on Turtle's Back, ed. J. Bruchac (1983); L. C. Wyman, Southwest Indian Dry Painting (1983); Treatise of Ruiz de Alarcón [1629], ed. J. R. Andrews and R. Hassig (1984); Diné Bahané: The Navajo Creation Story (1984), trans. P. Zolbrod; J. Bierhorst, Cantares mexicanos: Songs of the Aztecs (1985); Technicians of the Sacred, ed. J. Rothenberg, 2d ed. (1985); M. León-Portilla, Coloquios y doctrina Cristiana: Los diálogos de 1524 (1986); R. Arzápalo Marín, El ritual de los bacabes (1987); R. E. Montoya and L. Montoya, La sangre de los cerros (1987); J. Sherzer and A. C. Woodbury, Native American Discourse: Poetics and Rhetoric (1987); R. Harrison, Signs, Songs and Memory in the Andes: Translating the Quechua Language and Culture (1989); F. Salomon, The Huarochirí Narrative: A Testament of Ancient and Colonial Andean Religion, trans. F. Salomon and G. L. Urioste (1991); J. Bierhorst, History and Mythology of the Aztecs: The Codex Chimalpopoca (1992); G. Brotherston, The Book of the Fourth World: Reading the Native Americas through Their Literature (1992); R. L. Burger, Chavin and the Origins of Andean Civilization (1992); J. Mooney, History, Myths and Sacred Formulas of the Cherokee (1992); H. Carr, Inventing the American Primitive: Politics, Gender and the Representation of Native American Literary Tradition (1996); W. Rowe, Ensayos arguedianos (1996); D. Bahr, L. Paul, V. Joseph, Ants and Orioles: Showing the Art of Pima Poetry (1997); G. Brotherston, Painted Books from Mexico (1997); E. Chiauilaf, Ti kom ül: Todos los cantos (1998); C. Vicuña, Ül: Four Mapuche Poets (1998); The Sun Unwound: Original Texts from Occupied America, trans. E. Dorn and G. Brotherston (1999); K. Warak'a, Taki Parwa/22 Poemas, trans. O. Gonzáles (1999); C. Julien, Reading Inca History (2000); J. de Sousândrade, O Guesa [1888], ed. A de Campos and H. de Campos (2002); S. Medeiros, Makunaíma e Jurupari: Cosmogonias ameríndias (2002); M. León Portilla, Códices: Los antiguos libros del Nuevo Mundo (2003); Rabinal Achi: A Mayan Drama of War and Sacrifice, ed. and trans. D. Tedlock (2003); D. Arnold and J. de Dios Yapita, "The Nature of Indigenous Literatures in the Andes," Literary Cultures of Latin America, ed. M. J. Valdés and D. Kadir (2004); L. Sá, Rain Forest Literatures: Amazonian Texts and Latin American Culture (2004); F. Salomon, The Cord Keepers (2004); G. Brotherston, Feather Crown (2006); E. G. Neves, Arqueologia da Amazônia (2006); G. Tomlinson, The Singing of the New World: Indigenous Voice in the Era of European Contact (2007); J. Lee, The Allure of Nezahualcoyotl: Pre-Hispanic History, Religion, and Nahua Poetics (2008); J. Neurath, Por los caminos del maíz: Mito y ritual en la periferia septentrional de Mesoamérica (2008); H. Staden, Warhaftige Historia [1557], ed. N. Whitehead (2008); G. Brokaw, A History of the Khipu (2010).

G. Brotherston

INDONESIAN POETRY is written in Bahasa Indonesia, the national lang. of the Republic of Indonesia and a distinct dialect of Malay. There are approximately 740 different langs. spoken across the archipelago; although most of these have had extensive oral poetic trads., only eight have longstanding written lits.—Javanese, Balinese, Sundanese, Malay, Minangkabau, Batak, Macassarese and Buginese (McGlynn). A "mod. Indonesian poetry" is the product of sociopolitical and educational changes that gathered momentum from the beginning of the 20th c. Indonesia became a unitary state in 1945; the Indonesian lang. was defined as separate from Malay in 1928 during the emerging nationalist movement and has developed its own lit., most commonly written by young, well-educated, urbanized men and relying on the market distribution of printed books and literary magazines.

Mod. Indonesian poetry is conventionally considered to have begun in 1922 with the publication of Andalas Nusa Harapan (Sumatra, Island of Hope) by the Sumatran-born poet Muhammad Yamin (1903–62). The poems collected in this brief anthol. combine the traditional four-line couplets of the indigenous pantun* with the longer sonnet form characteristic of the Dutch Neo-romantic movement of 1880 that the emerging Indonesian poets had studied in school. Driven by powerful emotions (real or imagined), this first generation of Indonesian poets contemplated the beauty of nature from a careful distance and were commonly left in a condition of profound melancholy connected to a nostalgia for previous states of emotional comfort. Such longing (rindu) found its origins variously in memories of one's parents, childhood, home village, local scenery, cl. monuments, and religious certainty. Yamin's "Sedih" (Sorrow, 1934) is typical of this poetry. The sonnet opens with an evocation of the Barisan Mountain ranges of Central Sumatra and of a distant village that seems to be calling the wanderer home. Alone and uncared for, he sadly remembers his father, now deceased, lying in a grave covered with a basil plant and a single frangipani. The form and lang. are reasonably mod.; the concluding images are common pantun images: the frangipani is found in cemeteries, and the word for "basil" (selasih) rhymes with "love" (kasih).

The outstanding poet of the 1920s to 1930s was Amir Hamzah (1911–46). A prince deeply steeped in traditional Malay lit., Hamzah imbued these romantic conventions with deeply felt grief arising from his own failed relationships. In his youthful poetry, Buah Rindu (Fruits of Melancholy, not pub. until 1941), the relationships were with his mother, his home in East Sumatra, and the woman with whom he had fallen in love only to lose her in her unwilling marriage to another. In his mature verse, Nyanyi Sunyi (Songs of Loneliness, pub. earlier, 1937), Hamzah channeled his frustration into an angry, empty search for an absent God. While other poets of this period—Rustam Effendi (1903–79), Sanusi Pane (1905–68), and Sutan Takdir Alisjahbana (1908–94)—were struggling to find more contemp., though still elegant, forms of Indonesian, Hamzah is sometimes considered "the last Malay poet" because of his use of a vast cl. vocabulary, trad. quatrains, and familiar patterns of imagery.

Indonesia was occupied by Japanese military forces from 1942 to 1945 and fought for its independence from the Dutch from 1945 to 1949. Such circumstances obviously made beauty and melancholy into more difficult topics. A complete change in form, subject matter, and emotional content was brought about in a short period by the bohemian poet Chairil Anwar (1922–49). Writing under the influence of Eur., particularly Dutch, poetry of the 1930s, Anwar used *free verse to describe feelings of alienation and desolation (sepi) experienced in dark, tightly confined, urban settings. Anwar's influence was powerful and can be discerned in the work of his close peers Asrul Sani (1926–2004) and Rivai Apin (1927–95). The name of Sitor Situmorang (b. 1924) is particularly worthy of note: Sitor has intensively explored themes of place and love over five decades.

A middle position was achieved with the emergence of a New Generation of poets in the 1950s. Relatively free of Eur. models and confident in their use of Indonesian, they turned to regional themes. Ajip Rosidi (b. 1938) dealt in depth with the society, as well as the folk and Islamic spirituality, of West Java; he was also a strong proponent of writing in Sundanese. W. S. Rendra (1935–2009) was both a major poet and dramatist; his work focused on the lives of "the ordinary people" of Central Java. He also wrote personal love poems and more widely based works drawing on a Catholicism colored by pantheism. In the poem "Litani Domba Kudus" (Litany for the Holy Lamb, 1955), Christ is a white flower, an ivory dove, a king dwelling among paupers, and a golden deer. "Sebuah Dunia Yang Marah" (An Angry World, 1960) concludes:

> God always weeps and understands.
> Is always stabbed. Always betrayed.

In these poems, God is most to be found in "the enemies of the police": soldiers, prostitutes, the unemployed and beggars ("Masmur Mawar" [Rose Psalm], 1959).

Free literary expression was increasingly suppressed under the later regime of Sukarno (president from 1945 to 1967). As the nation moved increasingly to the Left, major themes became "heroism," "social destiny," "great principles," and "praise of the fatherland and the masses, and historical optimism" (Mohamad). These same themes continued to be prominent in the early work of the Generation of 1966, under the second Indonesian president Suharto (president from 1967 to 1998), only to be almost completely dropped in a second wave of personal poetry that developed after 1968. The one outstanding exception was Taufiq Ismail (b. 1937), who was able to carry his political concerns into a humorous and wide-ranging social analysis of the problems of the Suharto era.

Three major directions can be discerned in this newer work. The first was the gentle lyricism of Sapardi Djoko Damono (b. 1940), esp. as found in his anthol. dukaMu abadi (the Eternal Sorrow of God, 1969). Sapardi developed a carefully contrastive pattern of imagery, describing the human pilgrimage between life and death in terms of the natural progression of day to night.

A second direction was the emergence of a strong female voice for the first time. Particularly important was the work of Toeti Heraty (b. 1933). Sapardi searched for a God whom he doubts exists; in Sajak-sajak 33 (33 Poems, 1971), Toeti sought an equally impossible object—a love in which she could participate as an equal and not as an object. The rituals of status, role-playing, and emotional control are analyzed in her poetry as the tools by which open and honest relationships are avoided.

The third direction was the move toward "concrete absurdist" poetry, esp. at the hands of Sutardji Calzoum Bachri (b. 1942). Sutardji's poetry emphasized sound at the expense of meaning and claimed to be returning poetry to the realm of the preliterate spell. His major topics were the violence of sexual relations, the pain of everyday existence, and the awesome arbitrariness of the divine. Perhaps his most intriguing poem is "Q," composed of the Ar. letters "alif," "lam," "mim" (known in the Qur'an as "the mysterious letters"), and a series of exclamation marks. The letters may stand for "Allah" and "Muhammad."

The mid-1980s mark a further turning point in the devel. of mod. Indonesian poetry. The poets who emerged during this decade had been born after independence, wrote naturally in Indonesian, and had been formed by Indonesian lit. Their work moved in two different directions. Some were caught up in the worldwide Islamic Revival, bringing an affirmative Muslim orthodoxy to the center of Indonesian poetry, contrary to the "mod." secularism or doubt that had prevailed throughout the rest of the century. Among the New Sufis were Emha Ainun Nadjib (b. 1953), Ahmadun Yosi Herfanda (b. 1956), and Acep Zamzam Noor (b. 1960). Others, such as Sitok Srengenge (b. 1965) and Dorothea Rosa Herliany (b. 1963), remained defiantly concerned with the complexities of their own emotions and the repressive environment of the late Suharto era. Herliany rejected the uncertainty about relationships that characterized Toeti Heraty's poetry and in Kill the Radio demanded dominance rather than equality.

The decade after the Reformation movement of 1998 has seen all these writers continue to grow in depth and subtlety. New writers have, of course, continued to appear, including a significant number of women writers, esp. Rieke Diah Pitaloka (b. 1974), Shinta Febriany (b. 1979), and Putu Vivi Lestari (b. 1981). Indonesian lit. has also begun to move into cyberspace. Together, the writers of the 1980s and their new peers are described as the Generation of 2000, a reference not to their set place in Indonesian writing but to their future promise.

■ Anthologies and Translations: Pujangga Baru (1962); Gema Tanah Air (1948); Angkatan 66 (1968), all ed. H. B. Jassin; Anthology of Modern Indonesian Poetry, ed. B. Raffel (1970); Complete Poetry and Prose of Chairil Anwar, ed. and trans. B. Raffel (1970); Ballads and Blues: Selected Poems of W. S. Rendra, ed. and trans. B. Raffel and H. Aveling; Contemporary Indonesian Poetry (1975), Arjuna in Meditation (1976), Secrets Need Words (2001), all ed. and trans. H. Aveling; Angkatan 2000 dalam Sastra Indonesia, ed. K. L. Rampan (2000); D. R. Herliany, Kill the Radio (2001), Saint Rosa (2006), both trans. H. Aveling.

■ Criticism and History: H. B. Jassin, Chairil Anwar (1954), and Amir Hamzah (1962); A. Teeuw, Modern Indonesian Literature, 2 v. (1967, 1979); B. Raffel, The Development of Modern Indonesian Poetry (1967); G. Mohamad, "Njanji Sunji Kedua," Horison, April (1969); H. Aveling, A Thematic History of Indonesian Poetry: 1920 to 1974 (1974); M. H. Salleh, Tradition and Change in Contemporary Malay-Indonesian Poetry (1977); Indonesian Heritage, ed. J. McGlynn (1998); Cyber Graffiti, ed. S. Situmorang (2004).

H. Aveling

INFLUENCE. A term in mod. critical theory that offers a specific account of both the origin and nature of literary works, incl. poetry. In particular, the term accounts for a *poet's making of a *poem out of an antecedent work. E.g., when John Milton produced a milestone in Eng. poetry, his *pastoral *elegy "Lycidas" (1637), we often say that he was influenced by the major pastoral elegy of the previous century in Eng., the "November" *eclogue of Edmund Spenser's Shepheardes Calender (1579). The nature of that relation—encompassing *imitation, *invention, citation, and many other modes of appropriation and creation—is what the term influence entails.

According to the OED, the word influence means "flow in" and thus has a hydrologic etymology, splitting along two courses, designated 1 and 2a: "The action or fact of flowing in; inflowing, inflow, influx: said of the action of water and other fluids" and "in Astrol. the supposed flowing or streaming from the stars or heavens of an etherial fluid acting upon the character and destiny of men." In both cases, influence functions as a figure for the idea of a clear trajectory, route, or path connecting one point with another; the points form "dyads of transmission, from one unity (author, work, tradition) to another" (Clayton and Rothstein). In poetic theory, the concept shows how one poet influences another or, to reverse the trajectory, how one poet is influenced by another: critics speak of Spenser's influencing Milton and of Milton's being influenced by Spenser. Hence, influence becomes a key term for discovering the presence of a previous poet or poem in a later author or work; it constitutes one of the most potent principles of literary analysis from the 14th c. into the 21st: that works of lit. originate in previous works of lit. As such, influence suggests a clear practice for *interpretation: we are to read a poem in terms of the major influences on it.

According to the OED, the meaning of influence as "the flow of water" dates to the 16th c., when, e.g., William Harrison writes in Holinshed's Chronicles (1577–87), "The Towie [River] . . . taketh in the influences of diverse waters in one chanell"; the astrological meaning traces to the 14th c., when Chaucer writes in Troilus and Criseyde (ca. 1374), "O Influences of thise hevenes hye! / Soth is, that vnder God ye ben oure hierdes" (3.618–19). Starting in the 15th and 16th cs., poets use the term in its more literary sense. For instance, John Lydgate in his Lyfe of St. Albon (1439) writes, "I stande in hope his influence shall shyne / My tremblyng penne by grace to enlumyne" (Aij, cited OED). In the 17th c., writers often use the astrological meaning to represent literary influence, as Nathaniel Baxter does in Sir Philip Sidney's Ourânia (1606) when speaking of "Spencers influence."

As a term of mod. critical theory, however, influence traces to the 18th c. and fundamentally to the 19th. Neither John Dryden nor Alexander Pope uses the word, although S. T. Coleridge uses it much as we do today (Bloom 1973). All these writers are intensely interested in a single historical problem: how to create a great work of lit. in the aftermath of the Ren., when writers such as Spenser in The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596), Shakespeare in Hamlet (1601), and Milton in Paradise Lost (1667, 1674) cast such a luminous shadow across the literary landscape. The Ger. poet J. W. Goethe felt himself lucky precisely because he was not Eng. Writers during the Augustan and romantic eras begin to suffer considerable "anxiety" about the influence that past Eng. poets such as Milton were exerting on them, and the problem continues into the Victorian era and on into the 20th c. As John Keats summarizes the issue, when confiding to Richard Woodhouse in 1818, "there was nothing original to be written in poetry; . . . its riches were already exhausted—and all its beauties forestalled."

Not until the 20th c., however, does the concept of poetic influence get fully theorized. Reacting to the Ger. trad. of Quellenforschung (source study), three major coordinates are the lit. crit. of Eliot, Bate, and Bloom. In "Tradition and the Individual Talent," Eliot famously confronts the problem that "tradition" poses to the poet's "individual talent." For Eliot, individual talent is the problem that poets inherit in the romantic notion of an autonomous poetic *genius, according to which the poet creates a poem out of the crucible of his own imaginative *inspiration, detached from what Eliot calls "predecessors." A solution lies in the poet's conscious decision to work from the literary trad.: "we shall often find that . . . the most individual parts of his work may be those in which the dead poets, his ancestors, assert their immortality most vigorously." Hence, "No poet . . . has his complete meaning alone. His significance . . . is the appreciation of his relation to the dead poets." In this way, "The progress of an artist is a . . . continual extinction of personality."

In The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970), W. J. Bate calls that burden "the greatest single problem that modern art . . . had to face." Locating the problem in "the remorseless deepening of self-consciousness" in the 18th c., Bate explores "the writer's loss of self-confidence as he compares what he feels able to do with the rich heritage of past art and literature." The 18th c. forms "the essential crossroad between . . . the . . . 'Renaissance' and . . . the 'modern,'" becoming "the first period in modern history to face the problem of what it means to come immediately after a great creative achievement." According to Bate, the solution to the problem lies in "something ancestral rather than parental": the poet relies on "the 'leapfrog' use of the past for authority or psychological comfort: the leap over the parental—the principal immediate predecessors—to what Northrop Frye calls the 'parental grandfather.'" Bate's emphasis on "anxiety" responds to previously idealizing models of literary transmission, such as E. R. Curtius's European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages (trans. 1953), which presents the literary trad. as "the medium by which the European mind preserves its identity through the millenniums." Bate's deidealizing approach lays the foundation for the most important theorist of influence in the 20th and 21st cs.

Bloom has written several books on "the anxiety of influence"—the title of his most famous book, which is subtitled "a theory of poetry." Bloom's equation of "influence" with "theory" is bold and decisive: "this short book offers a theory of poetry by way of a description of poetic influence, or the story of intra-poetic relationships." "Poetic history, in this book's argument," he continues, "is held to be indistinguishable from poetic influence, since strong poets make that history by misreading one another, so as to clear imaginative space for themselves." The act of misreading, which Bloom terms "misprision," allows the poet to contend with his anxiety in confronting a strong predecessor. In fact, Bloom moves Bate's project ahead to the romantic poets, and he develops his model of misprision into "six revisionary ratios," which he terms "clinamen," "tessera," "kenosis," "daemonization," "askesis," and "aprophrades"—terms designed to trace a complex process by which the ephebe or young poet revises the precursor or strong poet: (1) the poet begins by "swerving" from his precursor; (2) he "completes" the precursor by fulfilling something not in the original; (3) he creates "discontinuity" with the precursor; (4) he counters the precursor's "sublimity"—his highest artistic achievement; (5) he puts himself in a position to create "solitude" from the precursor; and (6) finally, he has the confidence to reopen his work consciously to the precursor as an act of will.

Bloom derives his theory of influence in response to three major strands of poetic theory: the romantic notion of autonomous genius; "the impasse of Formalist criticism"; and the universalizing of "Archetypal criticism" (see ARCHETYPE, FORMALISM). As the concept of "struggle" at the heart of the process indicates, Bloom relies on the psychoanalytic theory of Sigmund Freud, in particular the Oedipus complex: just as a son struggles with his father, so the strong poet struggles with his predecessor. But whereas Freud turns the struggle into a comedy or romance, by which the process of "sublimation" is "the highest human achievement," involving "the yielding-up of more primordial for more refined models of pleasure," Bloom refuses to abandon the dark melancholy of the poet's struggle.

As this short hist. indicates, a theory of poetic influence tends to focus on the figure of the poet, in particular on his mind, and to emphasize psychic and compositional agency. As such, influence is an "author-centered" and "evaluative concept" (Clayton and Rothstein). Following from Freud, Bloom's model centers on the poet's consciousness as an agent of creation—what goes on inside the psyche of the strong poet as he tries to invent a poem out of his titanic wrestling match with a father-poet. At the heart of influence, then, is the poet's creative psychology, the crucible out of which a poem is born.

Moreover, Bloom's model of influence can be "a theory of poetry" because he insists that the only point of reference for a poem can be another poem (the cardinal principle of *structuralism), not culture, hist., or politics. When Bloom was theorizing influence, a countertheory was emerging, known as *New Historicism, which reads poems by eschewing "intra-poetic relationships" to foreground the effects of social, political, and economic institutions. The overwhelming influence of New Historicism has likely inhibited further theorizing of influence.

Bloom's model rejects the ethical program assigned to poetry by Aristotle and Horace and later by a number of early mod. theorists who argue that the pleasure of poetry has utility in society, that it promotes virtue or civic duty. "The poet," summarizes the romantic poet P. B. Shelley, "is the unacknowledged legislator of the world." In contrast, Bloom's theory derives from a much less studied theorist of poetry, Longinus, who seeks to account for the greatness of literary works through the poet's imitation of another poet's work, a phenomenon Longinus calls the *sublime, a heightened mode of discourse that aims for spiritual transport, not ethical conduct.

As the terms of this discussion intimate, influence has historically been gendered. For Bloom, the strong poet and the precursor poet are both male. However, feminist critics from the 1970s on have made a major contribution to influence studies. Working from Virginia Woolf's A Room of One's Own (1929), which emphasizes the absence of strong female writers as a model for contemp. women, feminists question Bloom's male-centered approach, as Kolodny does; and they conceive how women poets influence one other, as Showalter (1977) does. Such an appropriation quickly extended to theories of minority writing—for instance, in Smith's manifesto for a black feminist criticism.

The theory of influence plays a significant role in current critical practice, if less so in theory. For, except for Bloom and his immediate heirs, no significant theory of influence has emerged in the 21st c. (The New Critical Idiom series does not include a volume on "Influence," instead subsuming the topic under *"Intertextuality.") Nonetheless, scholars and literary critics continue to cite Bloom; to work on relations among poets (and poems) in terms of influence, incl. preromantic authors; and to apply its specific principles: imitation, *allusion, echo. One extension of the Bloomian theory of influence comes with what classicists term "double allusion," by which one poet uses a single point of reference to allude to or show his or her influence by more than a single precursor (McKeown) and sometimes to allude to one precursor in order to target another (Cheney 1997).

Since influence posits the poet's mind in relation with a precursor, it continues to have a vital connection to the concept it most often is understood to oppose, intertextuality. Strange bedfellows, influence and intertextuality form a concerted project to disrupt the unitary notion of autonomous authorial genius; together, they buttress one of the seminal undertakings of literary theory in the late 20th c.: the "death of the author," announced by the Fr. theorist Roland Barthes.

Curiously, most theorizing about influence neglects writers' own fictions of influence, together with their supporting metaphors. While influence is itself a *metaphor, poets have been representing the concept for centuries. To take a single example, in The Faerie Queene (4.2.34), Spenser pauses to record the influence of Chaucer, because England's new national poet wishes to continue a story that Chaucer left unfinished in "The Squire's Tale":

> Then pardon, O most sacred happie spirit,
> That I thy labours lost may thus revive,
> And steale from thee the meede of thy due merit,
> That noen durst ever whilest thou wast alive,
> And being dead in vaine yet many strive:
> Ne dare I like, but through infusion sweete
> Of thine owne spirit, which doth in me survive,
> I follow here the footing of thy feete,
> That with thy meaning I may the rather meete.

Here, Spenser uses a principle of "infusion sweete" to show how the poetic "spirit" of Chaucer "survive[s]" in him. The word infusion has a hydrologic etymology and means "the action of pouring in (a liquid)" (OED, def. 1), although it also has a theological significance, namely, "the action of infusing some principle, quality, or idea, into the mind, soul, or heart; esp. the imparting of a priori ideas or of divine grace" (def. 2). Hence, Spenser imagines the pouring of Chaucer's spirit into his own as a providentially ordained process of influence, an act of grace that leads to the creation of great nationalist verse. In accord with this etymology, Spenser speaks of "Dan Chaucer, well of English undefyled" (4.2.32.8), thereby identifying his precursor as an Eng. fountain of purified influence. For poets interested in tracing their artistic genealogy, as well as for critics interested in lit. hist., literary relations, authorial agency, and *close reading of poetic texts, influence continues to be a major tool of invention and crit.

See EVALUATION, HERMENEUTICS, HISTORICISM, MUSE, ORIGINALITY, PARODY, PASTICHE, ROMANTICISM.

■ T. S. Eliot, "Tradition and the Individual Talent," The Egoist 6 (1919); Frye; C. Guillén, "The Aesthetics of Literary Influence," Literature as System (1971); H. Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence (1973), A Map of Misreading and Kabbalah and Criticism (both 1975), Poetry and Repression and Figures of Capable Imagination (both 1976), and Wallace Stevens (1977); E. Showalter, A Literature of Their Own (1977); S. M. Gilbert and S. Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic (1979); J. Hollander, The Figure of Echo (1981); H. Bloom, Agon and The Breaking of the Vessels (both 1982); T. M. Greene, The Light in Troy: Imitation and Discovery in Renaissance Poetry (1982); J. Guillory, Poetic Authority (1983); R. Helgerson, Self-Crowned Laureates (1983); J. Loewenstein, Responsive Readings (1984); The New Feminist Criticism, ed. E. Showalter (1985)—esp. A. Kolodny, "A Map of Reading: Gender and Interpretation of Literary Texts," and B. Smith, "Toward a Black Feminist Criticism"; N. Lukacher, Primal Scenes (1986); Ovid: "Amores," ed. J. C. McKeown, 4 v. (1987–); H. Bloom, Poetics of Influence (1988) and Ruin the Sacred Truths (1989); R. R. Edwards, The Dream of Chaucer (1989); Intertextuality, Allusion, and Quotation, ed. U. J. Hebel (1989); Influence and Intertextuality in Literary History, ed. J. Clayton and E. Rothstein (1991); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991); J. Shapiro, Rival Playwrights (1991); P. Hardie, The Epic Successors of Virgil (1993); C. Martindale, Redeeming the Text (1993); G. Allen, Harold Bloom (1994); W. J. Kennedy, Authorizing Petrarch (1994); H. Bloom, The Western Canon (1995); L. A. Renza, "Influence," Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. F. Lentricchia and T. McLaughlin, 2d ed. (1995); P. Cheney, Marlowe's Counterfeit Profession (1997); S. Hinds, Allusion and Intertext (1998); H. Bloom, Genius (2002); R. R. Edwards, Chaucer and Boccaccio (2002); P. Hardie, Ovid's Poetics of Illusion (2002); C. Ricks, Allusion to the Poets (2002); W. J. Kennedy, The Site of Petrarchism (2003); M. Orr, Intertextuality (2003); C. Martindale, Latin Poetry and the Judgement of Taste (2005); P. Cheney, Shakespeare's Literary Authorship (2008); H. Dubrow, The Challenges of Orpheus (2008); H. Bloom, The Anatomy of Influence (2011).

P. CHENEY

INFORMATION, POETRY AS. John Guillory defines information as "any given (datum) of our cognitive experience that can be materially encoded for the purpose of transmission or storage"—distinct from fact on the one hand and knowledge on the other. The study of poetry of information accommodates two senses of information: one is quantitative and is derived from information theory, the influential branch of applied mathematics founded by C. E. Shannon after World War II, while the other is qualitative, concerned with the nature and application of information in poetry. From the standpoint of information theory, information, like matter or energy, is an object of quantitative analysis; for instance, it is a constitutive factor in feedback and equilibrium, the concepts developed by cybernetics that enable study of control and communication systems in animals, human beings, and machines. The Rus. linguist Roman Jakobson, whose intellectual formation was in structuralist ling. and *semiotics, was influenced by information theory from about 1950, and its assumptions (compounded by his interpolations) color some of his important work of that era, such as his description of the binary character of phonology in Fundamentals of Language (1956). After Jakobson, the earliest adaptations of information theory to poetics were the Ger. philosopher Max Bense's theory of "aesthetic information" and the Brazilian poet Haroldo de Campos's extension of that concept to the severely minimal poems of Stéphane Mallarmé, Gertrude Stein, and his *Noigandres group—all instances of what Campos calls, following Bense and the mathematician Benoît Mandelbrot, a "low informational temperature."

By contrast, the qualitative approach to the poetics of information often recognizes a more inclusive definition of the term (with less distinct boundaries against fact and knowledge) and theorizes a practice by which the poem includes, sometimes by parataxis (see HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS) or juxtaposition, reportage, statistics, or other kinds of information that are usually considered nonpoetic or even antipoetic. This approach considers information a discourse or idiolect among others available to the poem (e.g. *confessional, *descriptive, or *prophetic); it is a rejoinder to Ludwig Wittgenstein's famous declaration that "a poem, even though it is composed in the language of information, is not used in the language-game of giving information" (Zettel, 1967). A poem of information in this sense may be long or short, lyrical or discursive, subjective or impersonal. But it tends to test the boundaries of poetic or *lyric convention, esp. the distinction between what Jakobson called the *poetic function and the corresponding "referential" function, in which content is communicated for its factual value. A poem of information, we might say, brings the referential function into poetic lang. in a vivid, sometimes an aesthetically or socially radical way. (While this poetics of information partly coincides with *documentary poetics, the latter tends to be based more often in actual documentary sources such as government records and archival material.)

The poetry of information has a long hist. in versified genealogies, almanacs, and other poems for use; but it is esp. visible in mod. and postmod. poetry in the U.S. and elsewhere, where it occupies several modes. Walt Whitman initiates the modernist poetry of information in "Song of Myself" (1855). From a certain angle, public poetry has always been a poetry of information. However, Whitman stretches *mimesis so that the social space of the poem indicates the possibility of—and the need for—lyric structures that embody new ranges of information. Whitman's *catalogs assemble a great deal of factual observation:

> The crew of the fish-smack pack repeated layers of halibut in the hold,
> The Missourian crosses the plains toting his wares and his cattle,
> The fare-collector goes through the train—he gives notice by the jingling of loose change,
> The floormen are laying the floor—the tinners are tinning the roof—the masons are calling for mortar,
> In single file each shouldering his hod pass onward the laborers; . . .
>
> (307–11)

What is important here is not the information itself but a new paradigm of social lyric, in which information comes between the "I" and the "you" as an object of exchange, an idiolect within the general lang. of the poem, and finally a medium of disjunction and connection. Whitman's representative "I" makes a social contract with a representative "you"—a subject position many readers, many citizens, may enter. Where information appears, this contract is often enacted through parataxis, one observation following another in parallel constructions that can seem direct and unmediated. And yet the paratactic logic of observation and enumeration does more than assemble facts; its juxtaposition of information about sexes, classes, occupations, and regions opens a virtual social space in the poem, making the poem a figure of society. E.g., Whitman writes,

> The blab of the pave . . . tires of carts and sluff of boot-soles and talk of the promenaders,
> The heavy omnibus, the driver with his interrogating thumb, the clank of the shod horses on the granite floor,
> The carnival of sleighs, the clinking and shouted jokes and pelts of snowballs,
> The hurrahs for popular favorites . . . the fury of roused mobs,
> The flap of the curtained litter—the sick man inside, borne to the hospital . . .
>
> (146–50)

Such information had not been previously considered fit for lyric poetry, esp. in such a paratactic, telegraphic presentation. Whitman's poetics of information has antecedents in *narrative poetry, for instance in the catalogs, lists, and descriptions of *epic; but in the context of his interest in representativeness as both an aesthetic and a political dimension of the poem, Whitman's paratactic juxtapositions inspired a modernist exploration of poetry as including society and hist. in new ways. In the spirit of Whitman's poetics of information, Ezra Pound articulated the possibility of long poems "including history" (ABC of Reading, 1934). Many of Pound's poems accommodate a more radical notion of inclusion than the conventional model of *occasional verse allows; while Alfred, Lord Tennyson's "The Charge of the Light Brigade" (1854) or Thomas Hardy's "The Convergence of the Twain" (1915) can be said to refer to hist., Pound's Cantos (1925–72) attempt to make historical consciousness actual in a construct of words, instructing and engaging a more active reader. Many U.S. poets continued to develop the capacity for fact and observation—and with it, the fullness of *representation—opened by Whitman and Pound. An anecdotal approach to the poetry of information can be found in the work of Charles Reznikoff (see OBJECTIVISM), esp. in Testimony (1934) and Holocaust (1975).

In the early 21st-c. U.S., the poetics of information can connect with approaches to poetries as different as neo-Marxism and Buddhism: as they do in their own ways, it analyzes and critiques the politics of subjectivity, discourse, and visibility. The poetics of information may also engage with ecopoetics, as poets inform their readers about climate change or the age of the earth in the social space of the poem (see ENVIRONMENT AND POETRY). In an "information society" in which information is monetized, politicized, and weaponized, recent U.S. poetry has increasingly embraced its role as a channel for conveying and a ground for critical reflection on the politics and economics around data of all sorts. Among the many mod. and contemp. U.S. poets in this mode are Lorine Niedecker, Muriel Rukeyser, Robert Hayden, Amiri Baraka, Michael S. Harper, Laura Mullen, Joseph Lease, Eleni Sikelianos, Julie Carr, Brenda Coultas, Camille Dungy, and Juliana Spahr.

Outside the U.S. and the trad. begun by Whitman, the poetics of information tends to emerge irregularly, in response to social circumstances and aesthetic impulses. Two examples follow. The Fr. poet Francis Ponge developed a definitional poetry, notably in Le parti pris des choses (Siding with Things, 1942), where poems describing oysters, snails, or bread are both objective, following the bodies and uses of these objects with minute attention in the tone of a lecture, and stubbornly subjective. "Neuer Zweck der Armee Hadrians" (The New Purpose of Hadrian's Army, 1979), by the Ger. poet Volker Braun, is based on an extended anecdote from Roman antiquity that would not be out of place in a work of hist. except for the speaker's avowal that he reads the anecdote "between the lines," thus acknowledging that historical information has been adapted not only materially to verse but to the inferential perspective of poetry.

See ARTIFACT, POETRY AS; FICTION, POETRY AS; KNOWLEDGE, POETRY AS; PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY; POIĒSIS.

■ L. Spitzer, La enumeración caótica en la poesía moderna (1945); C. E. Shannon, "A Mathematical Theory of Communication," Bell System Technical Journal 27 (1948); N. Wiener, Cybernetics (1948); Jakobson and Halle; M. Bense, "Klassification in der Literaturtheorie," Augenblick 2 (1958); J. L. Foster, "Pound's Revision of Cantos I–III," MP 63 (1966); R. Jakobson, G. Fant, and M. Halle, Preliminaries to Speech Analysis, 9th ed. (1969); R. P. Creed, "Beowulf on the Brink: Information Theory as Key to the Origins of the Poem," Comparative Research on Oral Traditions, ed. J. M. Foley (1987); W. R. Paulson, The Noise of Culture: Literary Texts in a World of Information (1988); N. Wiener, The Human Use of Human Beings: Cybernetics and Society (1989); Chaos and Order, ed. N. K. Hayles (1991); E. Grimm, "Mediamania? Contemporary German Poetry in the Age of New Information Technologies: Thomas Kling and Durs Grünbein," Studies in Twentieth-Century Literature 21 (1997); N. K. Hayles, How We Became Posthuman: Virtual Bodies in Cybernetics, Literature, and Informatics (1999); J. Guillory, "The Memo and Modernity," CritI 31 (2004)—the poetics of the memo; P. Laszlo and R. Lapidus, "Nothing Added, Nothing Subtracted," SubStance 33 (2004)—spec. iss. on "overload"; T. Terranova, "Communication beyond Meaning: On the Cultural Politics of Information," Social Text 22 (2004); H. de Campos, "The Informational Temperature of the Text," trans. J. Tolman, Novas, ed. A. S. Bessa and O. Cisneros (2007); S. McCaffery, "From Muse to Mousepad: Informatics and the Avant-Garde," Phrasis 49 (2008); J. Van de Walle, "Roman Jakobson, Cybernetics and Information Theory: A Critical Assessment," Folia Linguistica Historica 29 (2008); A. Galey, "Networks of Deep Impression: Shakespeare and the History of Information," ShQ 61 (2010); L. H. Liu, "The Cybernetic Unconscious: Rethinking Lacan, Poe, and French Theory," CritI 36 (2010).

J. LEASE

IN MEDIAS RES (Lat., "into the middle of things"). The device of beginning an *epic poem, drama, or work of fiction at some crucial point in the middle of a series of events that both initiates a subsequent chain of incidents and at the same time follows as the result of preceding ones. Thus, the author may work forward and backward in time to narrate the story or action. The effect is to arouse the reader's suspense and interest quickly. The phrase is taken from Horace's Ars poetica (147–48): "Always [the poet] hastens to the outcome and plunges his hearer into the midst of events as though they were familiar, and what he despairs of treating effectively he abandons." The suggestion that a poet should not begin "at the beginning" derives from Aristotle's argument in the Poetics that a plot is a specific arrangement of incidents unified by probability and necessity, not by sequence. Aristotle is recalling Homer: the Odyssey begins with the shipwreck of Odysseus after some ten years of wandering the Mediterranean, and the Iliad is not about the entire siege of Troy but a single episode in the last year of the war.

Horace's formulation became a standard convention and was discussed as such throughout the Middle Ages. During the Ren. in medias res was revived, critics distinguishing between "natural" (i.e., chronological) and "artificial" order. The effect of "artificial" order is to fold the temporal sequence of the narrative so that the poem opens at an esp. dramatic moment and then, at a later moment, includes a retrospective episode that recounts the origin of the events. The events depicted in John Milton's Paradise Lost, e.g., begin chronologically with the rebellion of Satan, the war in heaven, and the expulsion of the fallen angels; but the poem itself opens with the activities of the fallen angels in hell (books 1–2) after the expulsion. The plot moves forward from this point until books 5 and 6, when Raphael tells Adam of the dire consequences of disobeying God's laws. In other words, the convention has made it more complex, more polyvalent.

By contrast, a simpler version of in medias res is invoked by Edmund Spenser in the "Letter to Ralegh" purporting to explain The Faerie Queene. Spenser explains that the final meaning of all the adventures will be withheld until the last (12th) book of the poem—which, however, he never completed. The model of in medias res adopted by Ludovico Ariosto in Orlando furioso is a more complex variation on the convention: "artificial" order justifies multiple plotting, frequent digressions, and a mosaiclike arrangement of flashbacks and continuing narratives.

After the neoclassical period, the formal requirement of in medias res was ignored, but the precedent it established for complex enfoldings of narrative time is preserved in the device of flashback and the narrative reminiscence, as, e.g., in William Faulkner's novel The Sound and the Fury.

■ J. W. Draper, "The Narrative Technique of the Faerie Queene," PMLA 39 (1924); C. O. Brink, Horace on Poetry, 2 v. (1963–71); F. Quadlbauer, "Zur Theorie der Komposition in der mittelalterlichen Rhetorik und Poetik," Rhetoric Revisited, ed. B. Stock (1982); O. B. Hardison Jr., "In medias res in Paradise Lost," Milton Studies 17 (1983).

O. B. Hardison; R. A. Hornsby

IN MEMORIAM STANZA. A four-line stanza in iambic tetrameter, rhyming abba; so called from its use in Alfred, Lord Tennyson's In Memoriam (1850):

> I hold it true, whate'er befall;
> I feel it, when I sorrow most;
> 'Tis better to have loved and lost
> Than never to have loved at all.

Although Tennyson believed himself the originator of the stanza, it may be found in 17th-c. poetry, notably Ben Jonson ("An Elegy": "Though beauty be the mark of praise") and Lord Herbert of Cherbury ("An Ode upon a Question moved, whether Love should continue for ever?"). Before In Memoriam, Tennyson used the stanza in a few political poems. Early fragments of In Memoriam employ an abab stanza.

The abba form evokes traditional love poetry by recalling the octave of the Petrarchan *sonnet. The "measured" lang. of the tetrameter line, in contrast to the pentameter line of sonnets, produces a sense of something lost; the line's curtness suggests the poet's skepticism about the efficacy of lang. to express feeling and meaning, and implies an effort toward self-control.

Later uses of the stanza are rare; they include Oscar Wilde's "Symphony in Yellow" and Philip Larkin's "The Trees."

■ Schipper, History; E. P. Morton, "The Stanza of In Memoriam," MLN 21 (1906), and "Poems in the Stanza of In Memoriam," MLN 24 (1909); Saintsbury, Prosody; S. Gates, "Poetics, Metaphysics, Genre: The Stanza Form of In Memoriam," VP 37 (1999).

A. Preminger, E. T. Johnston

INSCAPE AND INSTRESS. In his essay "Poetry and Verse," G. M. Hopkins defines poetry as "speech only employed to carry the inscape of speech for the inscape's sake." Inscape is the central term in Hopkins's personal metaphysics. He coined the word by analogy with landscape to signify the cosmic patterns that structure the world. Just as he can speak of an Alpine glacier that is "swerved and inscaped to the motion of the mass," so too his theory holds that poetry (as speech) can discover deep affective meaning in patterns of human lang. sound. "Some matter and meaning is necessary," but such meaning has only an ancillary function as "an element necessary to support the shape which is contemplated for its own sake."

Hopkins's coinage of inscape antedates his discovery of the works of the Scholastic philosopher Duns Scotus, which he felt was "a mercy from God." After that, he reports, "When I took in any inscape of the sky or sea I thought of Scotus" (Journal, August 3, 1872). Scotus's realism enriched and valorized his concept. Louis Mackey comments that the "inscape" Scotus enabled Hopkins to see was "the network of forms [Scotistic "formalities"] that you see when you look at a thing through its haecceity [thisness]. . . . For Scotus insists on the full reality and intelligibility of the individual, the reality of the formalities discerned in things by the mind and the unity of the individual."

Hopkins often uses the term instress together with inscape. Instress is the force that vitalizes inscape for the perceiver. In his writings, Hopkins uses both terms for the first time in a note on the realism of the 5th c. BCE philosopher Parmenides, written around 1868: "I have often felt when I have felt the depth of an instress or how fast the inscape holds a thing that nothing is so pregnant and straightforward to the truth as simple yes and is." Of the numerous times the poet employs the terms in his writings, a jour. entry of Dec. 12, 1872, is one of the more suggestive. He reports closely observing the grass of the fells while walking with a Mr. Lucas: "I saw the inscape . . . freshly, as if my eye were still growing, though with a companion the eye and the ear are for the most part shut and instress cannot come."

■ The Correspondence of Gerard Manley Hopkins and Richard Watson Dixon, ed. C. C. Abbott (1935); The Letters of Gerard Manley Hopkins to Robert Bridges, ed. C. C. Abbott (1935); C. Devlin, "The Image and the Word," Month 3 (1950); G. Hartman, The Unmediated Vision (1954); The Journal and Papers of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. H. House (1959); M. Lichtmann, The Contemplative Poetry of Gerard Manley Hopkins (1989); D. Brown, Hopkins's Idealism (1997); L. Mackey, Peregrinations of the Word (1997); J. Wimsatt, Hopkins's Poetics of Speech Sound (2006).

J. I. Wimsatt

INSPIRATION (Lat., "breathing in"). A concept that explains how a poet harnesses psychic and corporeal energies to make a poem. It often refers to a heightened state of being, through which the poet gains expressiveness and fluency. The typical scene of inspiration involves a subject who composes by encountering something outside common human experience, a force of alterity that can be integrated into a poetic process.

The Western concept of inspired poetics has roots in the Homeric epics, the Iliad and the Odyssey (ca. 800 BCE). Both begin with invocations to the supernatural Muses, a central trope of inspiration (see MUSE). Hesiod's Theogony (ca. 700 BCE) opens with a description of the Muses' breathing (empneō) a divine voice into the poet. In these works, the inspired state enhances memory, accuracy of description, and fluidity of speech.

Plato's dialogue Ion (4th-c. BCE), in which Socrates engages with a *rhapsode, established and perpetuated the concept of inspiration as enthousiasmos. Enthusiasmos, literally being filled with a divinity, connects poetic inspiration with possession, pure passivity, and ecstatic recitation. This version—known later as furor poeticus* or poetic frenzy—became a dominant model for inspiration, although it is not exactly the same version reflected in Homer or Hesiod's inspired poetics. After Plato's influential dialogues, incl. the Symposium and Phaedrus, inspiration is equated with ecstasy.

The association of inspiration with divination manifests itself in the concept of the Roman vates* or poet as divine seer. Virgil, e.g., opens the Aeneid (29–19 BCE) with an invocation to the Muse and later in the poem claims the visionary power of the vates (7.41). Ovid, like Hesiod, asks the gods to "breathe into" his poetic work in the first lines of the Metamorphoses (1.3). Cicero uses the term afflatus* (a blowing or breathing upon) for inspiration in his influential treatise on rhetoric De oratore (2.194).

A divine spirit that fills and overwhelms a composing subject also appears in early Heb. poetics and has a relationship to the originary animating breath of God described in Genesis. Figures like the poet-prophet David embody a dynamic between active and passive composition that resonates with poetic frenzy, even though the word inspiration itself is not used in the Hebraic trad. When God inspires prophets, the result is often a physiological experience that intensely affects the body (Is. 21:3, Jer.).

Inspiration persists and evolves after antiquity. The Ar. poet-critic Ibn Shuhayd, writing in med. Cordoba, discusses poetic inspiration at length in his Treatise of Familiar Spirits and Demons (ca. 1025). He advocates for poetry that is inspired, rather than simply a display of technical skill. This text fuses a pre-Islamic belief that each Ar. poet has an individual, inspiring genie with an Islamic brand of Neoplatonism. Med. Christian poets also labored to reconcile their religious belief with figures like the Muses. Dante negotiates sacred and secular inspiration (as well as the inspiring influence of Christian and non-Christian poets) throughout the Divine Comedy (written 1307–21).

The attempt to rework cl. concepts of inspiration continued in the Ren. Marsilio Ficino made a major contribution to this project when he translated Plato's dialogues, incl. Ion (1484), into Lat. Later works by Pontus de Tyard (Le solitaire premier, 1552) and Francesco Patrizi (Discorso della diversità de' furori poetici, 1553) further adapted and promoted inspiration as Neoplatonic poetic frenzy. Guillaume de Salluste du Bartas's influential La Muse Chrestiene (1574) christianizes the Muse in the figure of Urania. This kind of syncretism also appears in Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1595), in which he aligns the biblical poet-prophet David with the Roman vates. These treatises on inspiration reflect the changing and contested status of poets in the early mod. cultural moment, as well as larger debates on the social use of poetry.

The Sp. humanist and physician Juan Huarte moved toward a new model of inspiration in his work Examen de ingenios (1575), by developing a physiological account of poetic fury aligned with Galenic humoral theory. Writing in the same moment that the Port. poet Luís de Camões invokes the Muses for his epic The Lusiads (1572), Huarte's analysis of most poets' "overheated" temperaments emphasizes their inborn talent and anticipates significant shifts in the concept of inspiration that would fully develop in the 18th c. When John Milton invoked a Protestant Muse for his Christian theodicy Paradise Lost (1667, 1674) and claimed that his epic was "unpremeditated verse" (9.24), he made one of the last clear expressions of a Ren. trad. of inspired poetics. Late 17th-c. interest in Longinus's 1st-c. treatise Peri hypsous (On the Sublime) demystified inspiration, recasting it as an aesthetic and rhetorical effect of the *sublime. This secular brand of inspiration sprung from the poet's own mind, rather than arriving from the outside, through external forces (i.e., the Muses, God). Inspiration became the product of native *genius and *imagination, the mark of expansive human creative potential.

*Romanticism embraced inspiration as a dominant poetic mode, often involving an encounter with nature. P. B. Shelley reworks the model of Neoplatonic unbidden authorship and makes a forceful claim for the inspired poet's cultural authority in his treatise A Defence of Poetry (1821). He describes inspiration as arising within the poet, ignited by an external force, in a figure similar to the commonplace of the Aeolian harp. S. T. Coleridge's "Kubla Khan" (written 1797–98, pub. 1816) refigures ecstatic composition as a kind of dream work, exploring poetic imagination's potential. Working within a strain of Ger. romanticism, Friedrich Hölderlin aligns inspiration with a philosophical practice that collapses the opposition between the unbridled genius and the poetic technician.

Literary *modernism resisted the elevated status of inspiration that romanticism had produced, by further anchoring it in the psyche's operations. Sigmund Freud's theory of the unconscious resonated with postromantic theories of inspiration, and T. S. Eliot argued against a mystified sense of inspiration, characterizing it in psychological terms as "the sudden lifting of the burden of anxiety and fear"—in short, a lifting of repression. Laura Riding Jackson, writing in the 1920s, encapsulates this line of modernist thought in one sentence: "mystery was replaced by science; inspiration by psychology." Paul Valéry characterized inspiration as a naïve theory of creativity, yet the term eventually reemerged in his work as viable, but only when displaced from the poet onto the reader; Valéry likened the poet to a technician and the poem to "a kind of machine" designed to give the reader an inspired feeling. André Breton and the surrealist movement further stripped inspiration of its spiritual connotations and reframed it as an experimental dispossession and loss of authorial control, through techniques such as automatic writing (see SURREALISM).

In a different mode, the Beat poet Allen Ginsberg embraced a sacred poetic register and adopted a prophetic tone; the title of his collection Mind Breaths (1978) also reestablished the etymological connection between inspiration and breath. Such figures of inspiration continued to develop in tandem with changing social roles for the poet, from political commentator to 20th-c. mystic. The poet-prophet, however, became an exception in a period of emergent *poststructuralism that emphasized textuality over authorship or voice.

Postmod. poets, like modernists before them, resisted traditional figures of inspiration. And yet, poetics after the 1950s returned to breath itself as a principle of composition—as exemplified by Charles Olson's influential essay "Projective Verse" (1950)—suggesting the literal sense of inspiration. The movement of experimental Am. *oral poetry, represented by the postmod. poet David Antin's improvised "talk-poems," evokes ancient connections between inspiration and breath in "live" performances that recall the oral composition of Gr. epic. Juliana Spahr's work This Connection of Everyone with Lungs (2005), though following a trad. of poststructuralist inflected *Language poetry, explores breath as an organizing principle for poetry and politics. For Spahr—who writes against a notion of self-contained *originality that has a long hist. as the antithesis of inspiration—the act of drawing in a breath situates the poet in an environment of interconnected human and nonhuman beings.

Literary theorist Maurice Blanchot anticipated such repurposing of inspiration when he returned to the foundational myth of Orpheus in his critical work The Space of Literature. For Blanchot, the arrival of inspiration is a "désoeuvrement": a moment of "unworking" or a "non-event" that affirms the work of poetry in an undoing of the poet's subjectivity. Blanchot shifts away from the bounded agency of the "productive" poet and refocuses instead on the nonteleological and even "posthuman" potential revealed in the moment of inspired composition. Blanchot's intervention, like the work of some postmod. poets, reaffirms inspiration as a concept that continues to inform poetic discourse in the 21st c.

See INFLUENCE, INVENTION, PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY, WIT.

■ A. Avni, "Inspiration in Plato and the Hebrew Prophets," CL 20 (1968); M. Blanchot, The Space of Literature, trans. A. Smock (1982); J. Guillory, Poetic Authority: Spenser, Milton, and Literary History (1983); P. Valéry, "Poetry and Abstract Thought," The Collected Works of Paul Valéry, ed. J. Mathews (1985); J. M. Ziolkowski, "Classical Influences on Medieval Latin Views of Poetic Inspiration," Latin Poetry and the Classical Tradition: Essays in Medieval and Renaissance Literature, ed. P. Godman and O. Murray (1990); R. Macksey, "Longinus Reconsidered," MLN 108 (1993); F. Burwick, Poetic Madness and the Romantic Imagination (1996); T. Clark, The Theory of Inspiration (1997); J. Huntington, "Furious Insolence: The Social Meaning of Poetic Inspiration in the 1590s," MP 94 (1997); P. Murray, "Poetic Inspiration in Early Greece," Oxford Readings in Ancient Literary Criticism, ed. A. Laird (2006); G. Regn, "Double Authorship: Prophetic and Poetic Inspiration in Dante's Paradise," MLN 122 (2007); J. Rasula, Modernism and Poetic Inspiration (2009).

M. URSELL

INTENSITY. Intensity, although chiefly a romantic standard of poetic excellence, has a long hist. Its most famous cl. statement is in Longinus's Peri hypsous (On the Sublime, 1st c. CE) with its emphasis on the superiority of original *genius to trad., of strong emotion to restraint. Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1595) similarly underlines the superiority of the poet to the philosopher partly on grounds of intensity that can "strike, pierce, [or] possess the sight of the soul." John Dryden's recognition in his Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668) of the intensity of Shakespeare's imagery can be seen in Neander's observation that "when he describes anything, you more than see it, you feel it too." Thomas Hobbes and John Locke among other Brit. empirical philosophers did much to challenge 18th-c. rationalism and to emphasize the power of sensation. Nicolas Boileau's trans. of Longinus in 1674 stirred wide interest in literary circles; but Edmund Burke's treatise On the Sublime and the Beautiful (1757) was even more influential, with its characterization of the sublime as "productive of the strongest emotion which the mind is capable of feeling" or as producing "astonishment."

It is among the romantics that intensity receives its fullest expression. William Wordsworth speaks of poetry as "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings" (Preface to Lyrical Ballads, 1800). P. B. Shelley contends that it is impossible to read the most celebrated writers of his day "without being startled with the electric life which burns within their words" (A Defence of Poetry, 1821). William Hazlitt's "gusto" embodies one of the most powerful descriptions of intensity in art—"power or passion defining any object" ("On Gusto," 1816).

His emphasis on poetry's need for a firm grasp of reality is reflected in John Keats's idea of *negative capability—"the excellence of every art is its intensity capable of making all disagreeables evaporate from their being in close relationship with Beauty and Truth" (letter of 1817).

E. A. Poe's attraction to intensity is evidenced in his requirement that poems be short, that stories be such that they can be read in one sitting ("The Poetic Principle," 1848). Subsequent 19th-c. advocates of art for art's sake continued this trad., with Walter Pater searching for "the focus where the greatest number of vital forces unite in their purist energy," arguing that "to burn always with this hard, gemlike flame, to maintain this ecstasy is success in life" (Preface, The Renaissance, 1873).

But, in general, the late 19th c. saw a marked shift away from the emphasis on intensity in art. Major examples include Matthew Arnold's praise for great human actions and his unhappiness with situations where "suffering finds no vent in action" (Preface, Poems, 1853); the more scientific methodology of C. A. Sainte-Beuve and Hippolyte Taine in studying connections between work and author, work and the spirit of the age; and Leo Tolstoy's stress on the social responsibility of art. More notable still is the critical writing of T. S. Eliot, with its focus on trad., on objectivity, on intelligence in the poet, and on the idea of the *objective correlative. The increasingly scientific and textually oriented approaches of the Am. *New Criticism downplayed intensity in favor of *irony and structure, while *poststructuralism and esp. deconstruction questioned fundamental presumptions of authorial presence and textual meaning, offering, instead of perceived intensity, delight in the play of lang.

■ T. R. Henn, Longinus and English Criticism (1934); S. Monk, The Sublime (1935); W. J. Bate, From Classic to Romantic (1946); Abrams; W. Jackson, Immediacy (1973); J. Engell, The Creative Imagination (1981); J. L. Mahoney, The Whole Internal Universe (1985); P. Veyne, Epilogue, Roman Erotic Elegy, trans. D. Pellauer (1988); T. McFarland, William Wordsworth (1992); F. Ferguson, Solitude and the Sublime (1992).

J. L. Mahoney

INTENTION. The question of the relevance and value of intention has been at the center of debate in literary theory for well over half a century, and the controversy is far from reaching a satisfactory resolution. In Anglo-Am. literary theory, the debate found its central terms in W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley's well-known essay, "The Intentional Fallacy." Here Wimsatt and Beardsley characterize all crit. that takes account of authorial intention in the production of a literary work as committing a serious "fallacy" and resolve the question in favor of New Critical formalism (see new criticism).

Wimsatt and Beardsley deny not the presence of intention in the structure of a poem, but the usefulness of any genetic analysis of intention. A genetic analysis attempts to give a causal explanation of how literary works are created. Many genetic theorists claim that their accounts provide criteria for deciding whether the poet succeeds in producing the poem he or she intends to produce and that such criteria also provide a more valid (because more objective) methodology for the appreciation and judgment of the poem. Wimsatt and Beardsley reject this claim.

The anti-intentionalist position denies that knowledge of a poet's intention is necessary to the proper critical appreciation and judgment of a poem. It extends this denial to the romantic claim for the relationship of the poet's personality to his poems. Wimsatt and Beardsley further argue that poems are verbal structures made out of public lang., which is governed by the conventions of a lang. community; any ambiguity or obscurity in a poem occurs not because a private lang. has crept into the poem but because the conventions of a lang. community permit it, since it adds to the poem's aesthetic richness. Anti-intentionalists such as Wimsatt and Beardsley argue that a great deal of crit. confuses inquiries beginning with "why" (our reasons for finding a poem interesting and successful) with inquiries beginning with "how" (the way the poem came about).

The rejection of intentionalist crit. was part of a more comprehensive attack on *romanticism launched earlier in the 20th c. by T. E. Hulme and T. S. Eliot. For the modernists, romantic critics such as Walter Pater, C. A. Sainte-Beuve, and Hippolyte Taine are the antagonists whose method of appreciation and judgment of poetry is genetic. The romantic writers and critics place great emphasis on individual experience and inner vision, which constitute for them central aspects of the work an artist produces. Consequently, artists no longer have a common set of problems that critics can understand and appraise. Given the emphasis on the peculiar qualities of a poet's vision, *sincerity, *originality, *spontaneity, and adequacy become the romantic criteria of crit. Wimsatt and Beardsley and other modernist critics reject these criteria as irrelevant to the interpretation of literary works.

Anti-intentionalists argue that, in the process of writing, poets often abandon their original intention or include elements not central to that intention. If a poet changes intention in the course of writing a poem, we can no longer consider the original intention as the standard for judging. On this view, authorial intentions are at best a posteriori ratiocinations important to take into account but also subject to scrutiny in the light of the finished work of art. Moreover, in the cases of anonymous poetry, of Homer and Shakespeare, and of most other poetry of the past, there is no way of determining the poet's intention. Finally, there is the Socratic argument about the inherent unreliability of the poet's capacity to explain his or her intention.

The controversy over the role of intention is part of a larger dispute on more fundamental questions about what a work of art is and what is proper to crit. The anti-intentionalist position conceives the theoretical problems of creativity and crit. as definitional and conceptual ones to be settled by rigorous logical scrutiny;

Wimsatt and Beardsley, therefore, assert that "it is not so much a historical statement as a definition to say that the intentional fallacy is a romantic one."

Romanticism, however, is a historical phenomenon that gave rise to a host of conceptual and definitional problems not resolvable by some unitary and objective logical procedure. Moreover, intentionalists such as E. D. Hirsch Jr. question Wimsatt and Beardsley's distinction between poetic lang. and ordinary lang. Hirsch insists that all uses of lang. "are ethically governed by the intention of the author." On this view, the author is the determiner of the meaning of his or her work because, without that, we have no compelling normative principle for validating one interpretation and rejecting others. Without some knowledge of what an author set out to do, we cannot reasonably judge how well she did it; otherwise, a critic is liable to condemn the work for not being the kind of work the critic happens to approve of—i.e., the kind of work the author never set out to create in the first place.

In much broader studies of lang. and discourse, philosophers and theorists such as Michel Foucault and Jacques Derrida have proposed radically anti-intentionalist views that contest any notion of author, origin, intention, the literary, or oeuvre. Poststructuralist forms of crit. characterize the author as a product of the work rather than the other way around (see POSTSTRUCTURALISM). Thus emerged a powerful view that there can be a thought without a thinker, an action without an agent, a poem without a poet. On this view, literary works are necessarily a part of lang. as autonomous discourse that cannot be constrained by presumably unassailable objective criteria of crit. Once critics reject the poet's own intention for interpretation of her literary work, there is no way to curtail the freedom critics acquire in interpreting the work. In contrast to this structuralist and poststructuralist anti-intentionalist position, the anti-intentionalist formalist position supports and consolidates modernist aesthetics, in an attempt to elaborate objective criteria for interpretation and evaluation of texts. For modernist literary theorists and critics, the poststructuralist conception of lang. operates at a level where it essentially undermines the very conception of crit. as a discipline.

In this context, P. de Man, although a strong deconstructive critic, is a thoroughgoing anti-intentionalist throughout his work in a rather formalist sense. From his Blindness and Insight to his radically deconstructive phase, he distinguishes between ordinary and literary lang. For de Man, the everyday use of lang. is marked "by the duplicity, the confusion, the untruth" (1971), whereas literary lang. is characterized by "its separation from empirical reality" (1971). This view is affirmed in his Allegories of Reading where de Man stresses the absolute centrality of the nonempirical mechanisms of literary lang. Holding a strict notion of authorial impersonality, de Man argues that the relation of the author's intention to her work is always a contingent one. In effect, although radically opposed to New Critical formalism in terms of his overall deconstructive perspective, de Man remains closely allied to the New Critical anti-intentionalist stance and, thus, to the importance of the uniquely self-contained nature of the literary work. Consequently, the real opposition in the context of intention is not between de Man and the New Critics but between New Criticism and those influenced by such poststructuralist thinkers as Foucault and Derrida.

However, not all forms of contemp. crit. reject the concept of intention. In fact, whenever feminist scholars, pursuing a form of *New Historicism, underline the importance of women's agency and, therefore, of intention, causality, and change, they refuse to take a Foucauldian New Historicist stance that conceptualizes power as faceless, anonymous, and irresistible. There is, of course, no consensus among scholars within feminist studies, postcolonial studies, Af. Am. studies, Latin Am. studies, and Af. studies, among others, on the question of intention, and they do not all take a strictly Derridean or Foucauldian stance. Indeed, since critics within these and other related fields seek to explore the relationship of literary texts to extraliterary and extradiscursive forces and pressures and to the material world, they cannot altogether avoid—and they often embrace—concepts of agency, identity, intention, experience, and event.

Whenever we talk about a literary work's ability not just to adapt and vary received or currently dominant discourses and practices but actually to create new ones, we are talking about its writer's ability to intervene into discourse and thus into literary history and politics. Such an intervention cannot always avoid intentional considerations. One of the crucial premises of at least some inquiries in feminism, postcolonial studies, and Af. Am. studies is that literary writers within their fields are able to give voice and form to aspects of experience rarely articulated in lang. and lit. Moreover, when we talk about the historicity of every text's production and reception, the needs and interests of its author and readers can play a role in the construction and interpretation of that text, even when these interests and needs are produced by a multiplicity of social and historical forces.

In sum, modernist anti-intentionalists give considerable logical power and coherence to their position and its formalist and organicist criteria, and they succeed in showing the limitations of romantic criteria. Structuralists and poststructuralists, from their different philosophical perspectives, also propose views of lang. and discourse that radically question the category of intention but in ways that would also reject New Critical formalism. Yet none of these forms of crit. can succeed in showing that intentionalists are entirely wrong, for there are always numerous ways by which other critics can show how art, personality, and consciousness are indissolubly linked together, making it important and sometimes indispensable for the critic to take into account historical, cultural, material, and biographical contexts for the proper interpretation and judgment of literary works. The category of intentionality itself cannot be eliminated completely from literary crit. because, at some level, we are always aware of the distinction between nonhuman and human products. The conflict between intentionalists and anti-intentionalists arises because they hold different theories about the nature of works of art and about lang.; given their conflicting perspectives, neither position can be reduced to a version of the other or eliminated. The dispute about the relevance of intention is a peculiar one, for the conflict about the nature of literary works is not empirical, resolvable by standard modes of observation and confirmation, but fundamental and conceptual.

See BIOGRAPHY AND POETRY; INTERPRETATION.

■ T. S. Eliot, The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (1933); The Critic's Notebook, ed. R. W. Stallman (1950), ch. 8; Abrams; W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Intentional Fallacy," The Verbal Icon (1954); I. Hungerland, "The Concept of Intention in Art Criticism," Journal of Philosophy 52 (1955); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958); E. D. Hirsch Jr., Validity in Interpretation (1967); R. Maier, " 'The Intentional Fallacy' and the Logic of Literary Criticism," CE 32 (1970); P. de Man, Blindness and Insight (1971); J. Derrida, Speech and Phenomena, trans. D. B. Allison (1973)—critique of authorial intention in the phenomenology of Husserl; G. Hermeren, "Intention and Interpretation in Literary Criticism," NLH 7 (1975); E. D. Hirsch Jr., The Aims of Interpretation (1976); On Literary Intention, ed. D. Newton-de Molina (1976); W. K. Wimsatt, "Genesis: An Argument Resumed," Day of the Leopards (1976); J. W. Meiland, "Interpretation as a Cognitive Discipline," Philosophy and Literature 2 (1977); P. de Man, Allegories of Reading (1979); K. K. Ruthven, Critical Assumptions (1979), ch. 9; P. D. Juhl, Interpretation (1980); S. Raval, "Intention and Contemporary Literary Theory," JAAC 38 (1980); J. M. Ellis, "Wittgensteinian Thinking in Theory of Criticism," NLH 12 (1981); M. C. Beardsley, The Aesthetic Point of View (1982), ch. 11; J. Searle, Intentionality (1983); H. P. Grice, Studies in the Way of Words (1989); A. Patterson, "Intention," Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. F. Lentricchia and T. McLaughlin, 2d ed. (1995); J. T. Shawcross, Intentionality and the New Traditionalism (1992); J. Farrell, "Intention and Intertext," Phoenix 59 (2005).

S. RAVAL

INTENTIONAL FALLACY. "The Intentional Fallacy" is the title of a 1946 article by William K. Wimsatt, Jr. and Monroe C. Beardsley. The essay argues against the notion that literary texts should be interpreted in light of authorial intention, understood as an independent design or plan in the author's mind. Authorial intention, they argue, is inaccessible to the reader outside of the evidence present in the poem itself. When critics appeal to intention, they are, therefore, asking readers to turn away from the poem toward supplementary texts such as jours., notebooks, and letters. In contrast, Wimsatt and Beardsley argue that poems are public productions, separable from their moments of creation.

The essay established many of the key tenets of the *New Criticism. In particular, it solidified the idea that poems are autonomous organic structures, to be evaluated based upon the critic's assessment of their internal patterns of sound and meaning. The essay also reaffirmed the New Critics's distrust of biographical and historical crit., as well as their attraction to the antiromantic, impersonal aesthetic developed by writers like T. E. Hulme and T. S. Eliot.

Since its publication, "The Intentional Fallacy" has set the terms for much subsequent debate about the nature of *interpretation. In particular, its critique of the romantic myth of authorship prefigures the "death of the author" thesis popularized by Roland Barthes. Other critics, esp. those associated with neopragmatism, challenged Wimsatt and Beardsley's work. In particular, Steven Knapp and Walter Benn Michaels argue that the intentional fallacy depends upon an incoherent distinction between textual meaning and authorial intention. This distinction leads critics to believe that they must access an author's innermost thoughts before accurately interpreting the words on the page. For Knapp and Michaels, in contrast, there is no such thing as intentionless meaning; all literary interpretation is oriented toward determining authorial intention.

See INTENTION.

■ W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Intentional Fallacy" and "The Affective Fallacy," The Verbal Icon (1954); R. Barthes, "The Death of the Author," Image-Music-Text, trans. S. Heath (1977); S. Knapp and W. B. Michaels, "Against Theory," Against Theory, ed. W.J.T. Mitchell (1985).

S. SCHRYER

INTERNAL RHYME (Ger. Inreim, Binnenreim; It. rimalmezzo). Refers to the Eng. cover term for a variety of rhymes that occur not at the end of the line but within the line. Internal rhyme, therefore, shifts emphasis away from line endings and often away from the interplay between lines to the interplay between words. While the terminology is not standardized across prosodies, the typology of forms includes (1) rhyming (a) a word at line end with a word or words in the same line or (b) in another; or (2) rhyming (a) words within a line with each other but not with a word at line end or (b) a word or words within one line with a word or words in another but not with a word at line end. E.g., G. M. Hopkins uses types (1a) and (2a) in "Carrion Comfort": "That my chaff might fly; my grain lie, sheer and clear. / Nay in all that toil, that coil." Charlotte Smith employs internal rhyme more subtly with type (2b) in "Ode to Death":

> Friend of the wretched! wherefore should the eye > Of blank Despair, whence tears have ceased to > flow,
> Be turned from thee?—Ah! wherefore fears to die
> He, who compelled each poignant grief to know,
> Drains to its lowest dregs the cup of woe?

Types (1a) and (2a) occur within a single line, types (1b) and (2b) usually in two consecutive lines. Type (1a), Ger. Inreim or Mittelreim, Fr. rime léonine or renforcée, most often rhymes the word at line end with the word at the *caesura: this form developed in the Middle Ages and is known as *leonine rhyme and the form that in English prosody is usually meant by the phrase internal rhyme. Type (2a), Ger. Binnenreim, most often rhymes two words inside the same line and is sometimes in Eng. called sectional rhyme; if the rhyming in a long-line couplet is ——a ——a ——b / ——a ——a ——b, splitting into short-line verse will give *tail rhyme. Type (1b), Ger. Kettenreim or Mittenreim, Fr. rime batelée, most often rhymes the line-end word of one line with the caesural word of the next or vice versa; Eng. prosodists sometimes call this caesura rhyme. In the Fr. rime brisée, caesura rhymes with caesura and end with end; this was already developed in leonine verse and is treated here as *cross rhyme. Both Fr. and Ger. forms developed from med. Lat.; Meyer gives a full taxonomy of types. The Fr. terms for these elaborately interlaced sound patterns were developed mainly by the Grands Rhétoriqueurs* of the late 15th and early 16th cs. Internal rhyme has also been an important structuring agent in non-Western oral poetries. Lao and Thai poetries, e.g., feature yoked-word rhyme, which strings together rhyme after rhyme to heighten musical-performative aspects of lang. and which has been difficult to replicate in Eng. trans. Internal rhyme is also a chief characteristic of *hip-hop poetics.

■ K. Bartsch, "Der innere Reim in der höfischen Lyrik," Germania 12 (1867); Meyer; Patterson; W. Vogt, "Binnenreime in der Edda," Acta Philologica Scandinavica 12 (1938); H. Forster, "Der Binnenreim (Reimformel)," Sprachspiegel 37 (1981); Brogan; C. Compton, "Lao Poetics: Internal Rhyme in the Text of a Lam Sithandone Performance," Papers on Tai Languages, Linguistics, and Literatures, ed. C. J. Compton and J. F. Hartmann (1992); A. Bradley, Book of Rhymes: The Poetics of Hip Hop (2009).

T.V.F. Brogan; J. Chang

INTERPRETATION. Arguably the first, or earliest, principle of interpretation is that one understands a text—an oracle, a commandment, a scriptural parable—when one recognizes how it applies to oneself. For St. Augustine and Martin Luther, among many others, to interpret is (for better or worse) to see one's life in light of the text. Such a principle is foundational for legal hermeneutics, where interpretation always involves the application of texts to situations at hand. Mod. hermeneutics is often said to begin with the recognition that texts are, nevertheless, historical documents whose intelligibility belongs to the time and place of their composition. Friedrich Schleiermacher (1786–1834) attempted to square ancients and moderns by distinguishing between historical and psychological dimensions of interpretation. E.g., he formulates the basic principle of cl. philology as follows: "To understand the text at first as well as and then even better than its author" ("Compendium of 1819"). As in Petrarch's reading of Cicero, this means learning to inhabit the world of another person—bridging time, not piercing a veil. But Schleiermacher gives this idea a strong subjective turn when he proposes that, in addition to historical research, there is "a divinatory method [that] enables us to reconstruct the creative act that begins with the generation of thoughts which captivate the author and to understand how the requirement of the moment could draw upon the living treasure of words in the author's mind in order to produce just this way of putting it and no other" ("The Academy Addresses of 1829"). In the words of Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911), "we strain to get inside a speaker" (1996). Interpretation is more than the *exegesis of meanings because meaning is not just a logical entity but is a life expression (Lebenaüsserung), i.e., an expression of the lived experience (Erlebnis) of someone from the past. Experience is something that can be understood not from the outside or at a distance but only by living through it; and insofar as hist. is composed of experiences, it can only be understood internally, i.e., by reliving it, or what Dilthey calls Nacherleben, the key word of Dilthey's hermeneutics. Nacherleben means projecting oneself into the expressions that come down to us from the past, breathing one's life into them, and making them live again as they did when they were first composed.

Twentieth-c. thinking, by contrast, has stressed the historical limitations of such a task. As G.W.F. Hegel (1770–1831) had already insisted, "No one can escape the substance of his time any more than he can jump out of his own skin" (1985). Thus, for Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), interpretation can proceed only according to suppositions that our own cultural horizon makes available to us: "If, when one is engaged in a particular concrete kind of interpretation, one likes to appeal [beruft] to what 'stands there,' [but] then one finds that what 'stands there' in the first instance is nothing other than the obvious undiscussed assumption [Vormeinung] of the person who does the interpreting" (1962). This poses, however, a fundamental difficulty, familiar to anthropologists: how can we understand things that are not of our world? Heidegger's idea is analogous to the ancient practice of *allegory: understanding means the appropriation and integration of what is alien into our scheme of things. All interpretation is a form of trans.—hence, Hans-Georg Gadamer's (1900–2002) famous line, "We understand in a different way if we understand at all" (1989).

What interests Gadamer, however, is the question of what happens when texts refuse to be appropriated in this way. Gadamer identifies the "classical text," e.g., as one that causes us to reflect critically on the concepts and categories by which we usually make sense of things. Paradoxically, a "hermeneutical experience" is not an experience of intelligibility; it is rather "the experience of being brought up short by the text" (1989), something that is closer to the Socratic experience of being called into question than to Dilthey's notion of Erlebnis. Indeed, Gadamer refers explicitly to Hegel's concept of experience as Erfahrung, which entails the sense of undergoing a journey, trial, or crisis in which we leave behind some prior certainty or ground, some settled belief or self-understanding. Gadamer's point is that the cl. text makes a normative claim on us that requires a reinterpretation of ourselves, which means an alteration not just of our subjective disposition or perspective but of the world we inhabit. Paul Ricoeur (1913–2005) makes a similar point when he figures the text not as an author's originating intention but as the projection of a possible world that invites a critical comparison with our own. The aim of interpretation, Ricoeur says, "is no longer an intention hidden behind the text, but a world unfolded in front of it. The power of the text to open a dimension of reality implies in principle a recourse against any given reality and thereby the possibility of a critique of the real," to which he adds this interesting point: "It is in poetic discourse that this subversive power is most alive" (1981). By "poetic discourse," Ricoeur means principally narrative texts, whose mimetic power is oriented toward the future insofar as it projects a possibility that we might take up and put into play in order to change the world we inhabit. Fredric Jameson (b. 1934) proposes a comparable idea when he speaks of the potentially utopian character not just of narratives but of cultural artifacts in general. Imagine interpretation as the devel. of alternative forms of life.

For Gadamer, it is not only the text that comes down to us from the past (or from any time or place other than our own) that requires us to alter our way of thinking in order to comprehend it. In "The Relevance of the Beautiful," he argues that the same is true of the modernist work of art—the "hermetic" poetry of Stéphane Mallarmé, the cubist *collage, Marcel Duchamp's Readymades, and atonal music are among his examples. Here it appears that what understanding is called on to understand are its limits, its finitude, perhaps even its own impossibility. As Theodor Adorno (1903–69) says in his Aesthetic Theory, "Aesthetics cannot hope to grasp works of art if it treats them as hermeneutical objects. What at present needs to be grasped is their unintelligibility." There is nothing self-evident about artworks, particularly in our time when, as Adorno says, the task of the artist is "to make things of which we do not know what they are." Gadamer's response to this interpretive antinomy is to say that we can no longer regard the artwork from a distance as if it were a contemplative object, much less a bearer of meanings. On the contrary, in order to experience the work at all, we need to situate ourselves as participants in the temporality of its formal construction. To elucidate this idea, Gadamer invokes the model of the festival that invites us to enter into the play of its events, where play is not a rule-governed activity but is rather a form of Aristotle's phronesis or practical wisdom, knowing (or, more often, learning) how to make one's way in an unprecedented situation where familiar concepts and categories no longer apply. Openness to what is singular and irreproducible, unpredictable and offering no return on investment, is what makes the experience of *modernism, and perhaps of all art, possible. But this openness leads to a two-way street: "Every work," Gadamer says, "leaves the person who responds to it a certain leeway, a space to be filled in by himself" (1986). The work is more event than entity; its form is always open to the future, and so is our relation with it: "It is important to note that all interpretation points in a direction rather than to some final endpoint, in the sense that it points toward an open realm that can be filled in a variety of ways" (1976). In this respect, the interpretation of the work, and indeed the work itself, is always an ongoing project—an idea that has considerable prominence in contemp. North Am. poetics, with its notion of *"open form." E.g., in "The Rejection of Closure," the poet Lyn Hejinian (b. 1941) writes, "The 'open text,' by definition, is open to the world and particularly to the reader. . . . [It] often emphasizes or foregrounds process, either the process of the original composition or of subsequent compositions by readers, and thus resists the cultural tendencies that seek to identify and fix material and turn it into a product; that is, it resists reduction and commodification."

Just so, for Gadamer the model of the festival implies that the experience of the work is not a private, subjective experience; rather, "it consists in the experience of community" (1985). In this sense, understanding is, as he says elsewhere, more "a mode of being [than] a consciousness of something" ("The Philosophical Foundations of Twentieth-Century Philosophy"). Recall Ludwig Wittgenstein's (1889–1951) famous remark from his Philosophical Investigations: "To imagine a language is to imagine a form of life." The same principle applies to the work of art, as Stanley Cavell (b. 1926) argues in an essay on atonal music: "The language of tonality is part of a particular form of life, one containing the music we are most familiar with. . . . No wonder we want to preserve the idea of tonality: to give all that up seems like giving up the idea of music altogether." However, the problem in this event is not with atonality but with ourselves insofar as we are just fixed in place, schooled in received ways of experiencing music. Cavell thinks of this as an anthropological problem in which understanding atonality, being able to experience it as music, means "naturalizing ourselves to a new form of life, a new world." To make sense of anything new, we must change.

Art historians often take a more conceptual approach to the question of what counts as art. In "The Artworld," Arthur Danto (b. 1924), referring to Andy Warhol's pop art, puts it this way: "What in the end makes the difference between a Brillo box and a work of art consisting of a Brillo box is a certain theory of art. It is the theory that takes it up into the world of art, and keeps it from collapsing into the real object which it is. . . . Of course, without the theory, one is unlikely to see it as art, and in order to see it as part of the artworld, one must have mastered a good deal of artistic theory." In other words, one cannot tell that a thing is an artwork just by looking at it. One has to see the work as the instantiation of an art concept. Indeed, conceptual artists like Sol Lewitt go even further: "Ideas alone can be works of art: they are in a chain of development that may find some form. All ideas need not be made physical."

Danto's idea of the priority of the "artworld" is sometimes called an "institutional" theory of art, where the question of what counts as art is answered by galleries, museums, auctions, and art historians. This is not entirely wrong, but it would be more fruitful to recall the historical interdependence of poetry and poetics, where poetics refers to what poets themselves, in contrast to literary critics and historians, have written about poetry—Horace, Dante, Edmund Spenser, William Wordsworth, Mallarmé. The poem is, whatever else it is, the instantiation of its poetics, and this fact calls for study. From the zaum*' poems of the Rus. futurists to the recent ling. experiments of the North Am. Language group (see LANGUAGE POETRY), we find multiple and heterogeneous variations on Mallarmé's idea that poetry is made of words but not of what we use words to produce—meanings, descriptions, self-expressions ("Crisis in Poetry"). Not that the poem excludes these things, but one misses the point if one construes the poem simply as a form of mediation (the argument, interestingly of a famous essay by Susan Sontag [1933–2004], "Against Interpretation"). The point is to find new ways of experiencing what the Rus. futurists called the "word as such."

One could go from here to investigate such innovations as *visual poetry or *concrete poetry, *sound poetry, and recent experiments in holography in which one alters a poem as one proceeds through its virtual space. In each of these cases, but particularly in "holopoetry," our relation to the work becomes a matter of increasing complexity. As the Brazilian poet and media artist Eduardo Kac (b. 1962) explains, "I try to create texts which can only signify upon the active perceptual and cognitive engagement on the part of the reader or viewer. This ultimately means that each reader 'writes' his or her own texts as he or she looks at the piece." Here surely is a telling example of Gadamer's idea that understanding the modernist work means entering into the temporality or play of its formation. Indeed, one could say that "holopoetry" embodies the regulating idea of the entire hist. of interpretation, which is that there is no making sense of anything from a distance. One always has to enter a new world, a new form of life, and make the thing one's own.

See CRITICISM, HERMENEUTICS.

■ L. Wittgenstein, Philosophical Investigations, trans. G.E.M. Anscombe (1953); S. Mallarmé, "Crisis in Poetry" [1896], Selected Prose Poems, Essays, and Letters, trans. A. Cook (1956); M. Heidegger, Being and Time [1929], trans. J. Macquarrie and E. Robinson (1962); A. Danto, "The Artworld," Journal of Philosophy 61.19 (1964); F. Petrarca, Letters from Petrarch, trans. M. Bishop (1966); S. Sontag, "Against Interpretation" [1964], Against Interpretation and Other Essays (1966); W. Dilthey, "The Construction of the Human World in the Human Sciences" [1916], Dilthey: Selected Writings, ed. and trans. H. P. Rickman (1976); H.-G. Gadamer, "Composition and Interpretation" [1961], Philosophical Hermeneutics, trans. D. E. Linge (1976); F. Schleiermacher, "Compendium of 1819" and "Academy Addresses of 1829," Hermeneutics: The Handwritten Manuscripts, ed. H. Kimmerle, trans. J. Duke and J. Forstman (1977); F. Jameson, The Political Unconscious (1981); P. Ricoeur, Hermeneutics and the Human Sciences, ed. and trans. J.B. Thompson (1981); The L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E Book, ed. B. Andrews and C. Bernstein (1984); H.-G. Gadamer and F. Hegel, Introduction to the Lectures on the History of Philosophy [1839], trans. T. M. Knox and A. V. Miller (1985); H.-G. Gadamer, "The Relevance of the Beautiful" (1974), The Relevance of the Beautiful and Other Essays, ed. R. Bernasconi, trans. F. G. Lawrence (1986); M. Perloff, The Futurist Moment (1986); T. W. Adorno, Aesthetic Theory (1970), ed. G. Adorno and R. Tiedemann, trans. R. Hullot-Kentor (1987); H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method (1960), 2d ed., trans. J. Weinsheimer and D. G. Marshall (1989); G. L. Bruns, Hermeneutics: Ancient and Modern (1992); E. Kac, "Holopoetry, Hypertext, Hyperpoetry," Holographic Imagining and Materials, ed. T. H. Jeong (1993); J. Drucker, The Visible Word: Experimental Typography and Modern Art, 1909–1923 (1994); W. Dilthey, "The Development of Hermeneutics" (1900), Hermeneutics and the Study of History, ed. R. Makkreel and F. Rodi (1996); S. Lewitt, "Sentences on Conceptual Art" (1969), Conceptual Art: A Critical Anthology, ed. A. Alberro and B. Stimson (1999); L. Hejinian, "The Rejection of Closure" (1983), The Language of Inquiry (2000); S. Cavell, "Aesthetic Problems of Modern Philosophy," Must We Mean What We Say?, rev. ed. (2002); R. D. Hume, "The Pitfalls of 'Historical Interpretation,'" PQ 89 (2010).

G. L. BRUNS

INTERTEXTUALITY. A term in mod. critical theory that defines a *text (incl. a poem) in terms of its relation to other texts. In particular, the term characterizes the nature of a work as constituted by other texts, rather than originating in a precursor text or being made up of words that refer to something outside textuality.

In the late 1960s, the Bulgarian-Fr. cultural critic Julia Kristeva coined the term intertexuality in response to "traditional" models of *interpretation. Such models grant agency to the author, who controls the work through conscious design, relying on "intentional" *allusions to verifiable authors and works. Kristeva uses intertexuality to challenge this unitary notion of the autonomous author in command of an individuating authority. For her, all texts are necessarily "dialogic": "any text is constructed as a mosaic of quotations; any text is the absorption and transformation of another . . . , and poetic language is read as at least double." Specifically, she imagines the poetic field in terms of "three dimensions of textual space": "writing subject, addressee and exterior texts." This field operates along two axes. A horizontal axis connects the writing subject and the addressee via the word, while a vertical axis connects the word with exterior texts (Kristeva 1986). By placing the word at the crossroad of the poetic field, Kristeva replaces the traditional notion of poetic origin with an "impersonal field of crossing texts" (Clayton and Rothstein), at once downplaying the role of the author and reader and compelling the text itself to come into view: "The notion of intertextuality replaces that of intersubjectivity" (Kristeva 1986).

In Kristeva's original formulation (1967), the Fr. word intertextualité combines the preposition inter (between, among) with the noun textualité (textuality). But, as Miller observes, the word originates in the Lat. intertextos, "intertwined," and derives from Ovid's Metamorphoses. Ovid tells how the female weaver Arachne challenges the goddess Athena to a weaving contest by producing a tapestry woven with stories of gods and mortals: "The edge of the web with its narrow border is filled with flowers and clinging ivy intertwined [intertextos]" (6.126–27). For Miller, Kristeva, and others, intertextuality becomes a term for speaking about the wovenness of texts, their interconnectedness, their participation in a web of discourse—replacing the conventional metaphor of path, road, or route. A text is always an intertext, a part of a network of other texts. Consequently, a commentator should abandon "source-hunting" (Quellenforschung), allusion-identification, and *imitation as a viable hermeneutic.

Kristeva develops intertextuality by combining the ideas of Fr. structuralist linguist Ferdinand de Saussure with those of the Rus. formalist critic Mikhail Bakhtin. Saussure emphasizes the relational nature of meaning and of texts, which he understands to be largely free of social situations. For Saussure, the arbitrary relation between the "signifier" (the pure sound) and the "signified" (a category of things: a horse standing for all horses) constitutes the ling. sign, and the sign designates real-world referents. In contrast, Bakhtin emphasizes the situational nature of meaning and texts, arguing that lang. is always embedded in its social environment. This means that the relation between signifier and signified, word and object, is not clear-cut, but is, rather, characterized by "ambivalence." By combining the views of Bakhtin and Saussure, Kristeva develops an "intertextual" theory of lang. and texts, at once relational and situational.

In a hist. of intertextuality, Kristeva's Fr. colleague Roland Barthes is instrumental in developing the theory: "any text is an intertext . . . a new tissue of past citations. Bits of codes, formulas, rhythmic models, fragments of social languages, etc., pass into the text and are redistributed within it" (1981). The tissues are always both countless and anonymous. Since texts are "intertextual," they can have no single origin in the *genius of an autonomous author; therefore, they cannot be stabilized for the reader. Yet Barthes goes beyond Kristeva by relocating agency in the receiver rather than in either the text or the creator of texts. This shift leads Barthes to speak famously of "the death of the author"—one of the most potent phrases in mod. critical theory. Readers, rather than authors, are responsible for the pleasure derived from a text (as opposed to its "meaning"), and the reader's task begins by abandoning faith in any pathway connecting the author with earlier authors, the text with previous texts, or the text with the world.

Yet not all theorists of intertextuality have been willing to give up either the author or the notion of stabilized meaning. Decisively, both Genette and Riffaterre return the concept of intertextuality to Saussurean stability: texts are intertextual, but the intertext has a definite meaning; thus, the reader can track its significance. In this way, Genette and Riffaterre overcome one of the gravest liabilities of Kristeva and Barthes: the impracticality of any definition of intertextuality that sees the text as made up of countless, anonymous bits.

The work of Genette and Riffaterre rubs shoulders with that of Bloom on *"influence," the traditional term that Kristeva and her colleagues combat. Bloom argues for what Barthes (1981) calls a "myth of filiation" as the crucible of poetic creation: a "strong poet" invents a work in a conscious "misreading" of his "precursor" (Bloom 1973)—a literary relationship between one poet and another modeled on Sigmund Freud's Oedipus complex. While Bloom shares with Genette and Riffaterre the fundamental knowability of texts, rather than the famed "undecidability" posited by the Fr. critic Jacques Derrida, he joins Kristeva and Barthes in dismantling the romantic notion of the solitary poet's genius.

Recent writers also use Kristevan intertextuality to retheorize modernity as *"postmodernism," breaking down the usual binaries between the two (e.g., between "works" that serve a "purpose" and "texts" that are endlessly in "play"), instead emphasizing interconnectedness. Since postmodernism "works within the very system it attempts to subvert," writes Hutcheon (1985), it is double-coded. Hutcheon's theory of "parody" has been esp. compatible with the intertextuality at the heart of postmodernism. She recalls that "para in Greek can also mean 'beside,' and therefore there is a suggestion of an accord or intimacy instead of a contrast. . . . Parody, then, . . . is repetition with difference" (Hutcheon 1985). As such, parody "is the perfect postmodern form": "it paradoxically both incorporates and challenges that which it parodies. It also forces a reconsideration of the idea of origin or originality that is compatible with other postmodern interrogations of liberal humanist assumptions" (Hutcheon 1988).

Kristeva's revolutionizing of lang. and meaning has had two other important extensions. First, feminism also returns agency to intertextuality. In "Arachnologies," Miller uses Ovid's Arachne myth to contest postmodernism's suspicion about "the subject," thereby creating space for female autonomy in a patriarchal world. Second, postcolonialism rejects the emancipatory celebration claimed by Barthes and his heirs when decentering the authorial subject. For Bhabha, as for Gates and others, such decentering furthers the Western project oppressing minorities—a project charted by Michel Foucault, who emphasizes the restrictions placed on the subject by institutions that "discipline and punish." Specifically, Gates argues that Af. Am. writing has a double *voice and, thus, is deeply intertextual, self-conscious in its discourse of both a black vernacular and standard Eng.

If theories of influence locate "struggle" in the mind of the author, theories of intertextuality feature an ideological struggle: "All texts, therefore, contain within them the ideological structures and struggles expressed in society through discourse" (Allen 2000). Such struggles have both a political and a gender dynamic: a "gender politics." Sexuality is a recurrent topic in such theorizing, as Miller and Bloom intimate. Yet it is Freud's Fr. psychoanalytic heir Jacques Lacan who influentially theorizes textuality in terms of the subject's desire for a "lack" it cannot fulfill. Like Derrida, Barthes, Kristeva, and Foucault, Lacan mounts a major critique of the master-myth of Western culture, patriarchal logocentrism (the authority of the father's word), emphasizing instead a feminizing intertexual "otherness."

The revolution mounted in France toward the end of the 20th c. should not elide what Miller uncovers in Ovid: that intertextuality traces to cl. culture, in particular to the Socratic dialogue and Menippean satire. Scholars find versions in the other main cl. literary critics, Aristotle, Horace, and Longinus, as well as in the Roman rhetoricians Cicero and Quintilian, and in such early mod. Eur. writers as Dante and Michel de Montaigne. Arguably, the greatest "theorist" for intertextuality is the author who has proved most impermeable to both textual origins and stability: Shakespeare (Garber).

Intertextuality has underwritten a vast change in how culture sees the world, from the new gold standard, global interdisciplinarity, to the World Wide Web, acmes of ideological and electronic intertexts, respectively. Intertextuality proves invaluable for the study of poetry and poetics because it challenges the simplistic notion of a text's having a stable origin, instead recognizing poetry's dialogism. In intertextuality, texts are interconnected, interdependent, polyvocal, part of a network of authors, works, and readers. Most usefully, however, intertextuality can become a critical helpmeet to influence, allowing the reader to recognize in a given text both a clear myth of filiation and an intricate network of connection. In practice, critics now attend to both "allusion and intertext" (Hinds). For instance, John Milton is well known in Paradise Lost to appropriate an inward hell from Christopher Marlowe's Doctor Faustus, but this does not mean that Milton's tormented Satan originates solely in Marlowe's devil Mephistopheles. For Marlowe did not invent an inward hell, although we no longer know what he read when he put the idea onto the Elizabethan stage. Instead, the best we can do is locate origins in such figures as John Calvin, Thomas Aquinas, and Bonaventure, and trace its afterlife to Milton. In this way, our reading of Satan's agon can depend on both theories of influence and theories of intertextuality. Both theories seem required to read the poem with care.

See FORMALISM, HERMENEUTICS, POSTSTRUCTURALISM, STRUCTURALISM.

■ J. Lacan, Écrits (1966); J. Kristeva, "Bakhtin, le mot, le dialogue et le roman," Critique 239 (1967), and Semeiotikè (1969); H. Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence (1973); F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics, ed. C. Bally and A. Sechehaye, trans. W. Baskin (1974); J. Culler, "Presupposition and Intertextuality," MLN (1976); J. Derrida, Of Grammatology, trans. G. C. Spivak (1976); M. Foucault, Discipline and Punish, trans. A. Sheridan (1977); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); M. M. Bakhtin, The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist (1981); R. Barthes, "Theory of the Text," Untying the Text, ed. R. Young (1981); M. Foucault, "What Is an Author?" The Foucault Reader, ed. P. Rabinow (1984); J. Kristeva, "Word, Dialogue, and Novel," The Kristeva Reader, ed. T. Moi (1986); N. K. Miller, "Arachnologies," Subject to Change (1986); M. Garber, Shakespeare's Ghost Writers (1987); H. L. Gates Jr., The Signifying Monkey (1988); L. Hutcheon, A Poetics of Postmodernism (1988); Intertextuality, Allusion, and Quotation, ed. U. J. Hebel (1989); Intertextuality, ed. M. Worton and J. Still (1990); Influence and Intertextuality in Literary History, ed. J. Clayton and E. Rothstein (1991)—esp. "Figures in the Corpus: Theories of Influence and Intertextuality"; C. Martindale, Redeeming the Text (1993); G. Allen, Harold Bloom (1994); G. Genette, Palimpsests, trans. C. Newman and C. Doubinksy (1997); S. Hinds, Allusion and Intertext (1998); G. Allen, Intertextualty (2000); L. Hutcheon, A Theory of Parody, 2d ed. (2000); R. Barthes, "The Death of the Author," Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, ed. V. B. Leitch et al. (2001); M. Orr, Intertextuality (2003); H. K. Bhabha, The Location of Culture, rev. ed. (2004); P. Cheney, "Milton, Marlowe, and Lucan: The English Authorship of Republican Liberty," Milton Studies 49 (2008); M. Juvan, History and Poetics of Intertexuality, trans. T. Pogacar (2008).

P. CHENEY

INTUITION

I. In Aesthetics and Poetics
II. In Poetry

I. In Aesthetics and Poetics. The term intuition owes its importance in mod. poetics to Benedetto Croce's use of it in his Estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale (The Aesthetic as the Science of Expression and of the Linguistic in General, 1902), where he identifies it with *expression. Rejecting as naïve the popular view of intuition as a completely subjective phase of the cognitive process, Croce lays down this warning: "it is impossible to distinguish intuition from expression in this cognitive process. The one appears with the other at the same instant, because they are not two, but one." Also, "to intuit is to express; and nothing else (nothing more but nothing less) than to express." In 1915, Croce acknowledged that his own dissatisfaction with his 1902 account of intuition had led to its "conversion" into the "further concept of pure or lyrical intuition." Under the influence of Giovanni Gentile (La filosofia dell'arte [Philosophy of Art], 1931) as well as Giambattista Vico and G.W.F. Hegel, Croce had delivered his Heidelberg lecture in 1908 on "Pure Intuition and the Lyrical Character of Art," where the term's meaning deepens to include the "successful union of a poetic image with an emotion."

By the time he is done, Croce has given an aesthetic theory of intuition that is a theory of expression and of *imagination as well. By identifying it with expression and imagination, Croce was able to give his use of intuition a measure of variety and novelty it probably could not have sustained on its own. Croce nearly makes us forget that, before Immanuel Kant took it up with fresh insight, the concept had already had a long hist. in med. Lat. as intuitus, and an even longer hist. in its original Gr. form, nous.

It was C. S. Peirce who pointed out that the Lat. term intuitus—which Kant puts in parentheses after the Ger. equivalent, Anschauung—first occurs as a technical term in Anselm's Monologium (11th c.). Anselm, Peirce explains, had tried to draw a clear distinction between seeing things through a glass darkly (per speculum) and knowing them "face to face," calling the former speculation and the latter intuition. In a famous passage of the Monologium, Anselm writes, "[T]o the supreme Spirit, expressing [dicere] and beholding through conception [cogitando intueri], as it were, are the same, just as the expression of our human mind is nothing but the Intuition of the thinker." Some students of Ezra Pound's Cantos, commenting on the so-called Anselm canto (105), have suggested that the entire Monologium may be read as an adumbration of what T. S. Eliot called the objective correlative*.

In the Proslogium, Anselm would later attempt to show that, in the concept of God intuited through Christian faith, enough is contained to "prove" discursively that anything so conceived must not only be thinkable but exist. Pressing his argument (against the fool who has said in his heart "there is no God"), Anselm compares the human intuition of God with a painter's intuition of a painting he has actually painted, as contrasted with his intuition of the same before he has painted it. This so-called ontological "proof" of God's existence, later advanced by René Descartes, G. W. Leibniz, and Baruch Spinoza, prompted many later critics to attack Anselm. And foremost among them was Kant.

Intuition lies at the heart of Kant's entire intellectual paradigm. In his first critique, the Critique of Pure Reason (1781), Kant is at pains to distinguish two kinds of intuition: first, a receptive kind, which enables the understanding (Verstand) to take in phenomenal sensations in the a priori forms of space and time and as related to one another causally; and second, a nonreceptive kind, which Kant does not hesitate to characterize as a "productive imagination." It provides the understanding with a store of supersensory things-in-themselves, not knowable through sensory experience. A proper name for it, says Kant, is "intellectual intuition." The chief supersensory ideas it provides are soul, world, and God. However grand their suggestiveness, those ideas have no empirical validity: they belong entirely to intellectual intuition. The understanding cannot "prove" to itself whether they exist.

In Kant's second critique, the Critique of Practical Reason (1788), the entire context of his argument derives from one of the three supersensory ideas provided by intellectual intuition, namely, the soul or human psyche. As the subjectivity of reason, the soul is made "aware" of itself not in the process of trying to know itself but in that of being or willing itself. Kant's critique shows that, for the practical reason, the will can in no sense be a phenomenon related by laws of necessity to other phenomena; on the contrary, it is a noumenon or thing-in-itself, unaffected by anything external to it and, therefore, completely free, answering only to itself for how it responds to the a priori "categorical imperative" by which its ends are determined intuitively.

But intuition rises to a still higher level in Kant's third essay, the Critique of Judgment (1790). At the outset, Kant speaks of a "great gulf" yawning between the two previous critiques, "between the realm of the natural concept, as the sensible, and the realm of the concept of freedom, as the supersensible." What is needed, he says, is "a third mediating principle," an a priori intuitive synthesis of the opposed perspectives of nature (which mind comprehends only through its phenomenal impressions on the understanding) and freedom (where mind is at home with itself in its inner, noumenal reality). A table at the beginning of the third critique shows it is "art and beauty in general" that must "bridge the gap" between the two.

Only art or aesthetic experience, Kant explains, can provide the needed a priori intuitive synthesis, precisely because it is neither natural nor free in itself and yet participates, at least apparently, in both. In nature, the mind seeks knowledge; in freedom, it wills or desires; in art, it neither seeks knowledge nor wills, but rather finds itself viewing things intuitively—William Wordsworth in his Excursion (4.1295) will call it a "passionate intuition"—so as to link the realms of nature and freedom together in what amounts to a great *metaphor or intuitive synthesis. Despite his Humean skepticism, Kant allows himself to speak of the "divine mind" as author of that "highest synthesis of the critical philosophy." Having identified it as "that reason which creates the content at the same time with its forms," Kant adds that it here appears at last as "intellectual perception or intuitive understanding."

Hegel remarked that, in rising through his three critiques to the concept of intellectual intuition or intuitive understanding as the governing principle of the experience of purposiveness and beauty in nature and art, Kant merits the kind of praise Aristotle accorded Anaxagoras in Gr. antiquity. When Anaxagoras first said that nous (understanding in general or reason) rules the world, "he appeared," says Aristotle, "like a sober man among drunkards." Awed, like Kant, by the spectacle of the night sky with its "undisturbed circling of countless worlds," Anaxagoras had concluded that it could only be the result of a mind or nous, a divine intuitive reason that sorts out the original constituents of things in order to join like to like in a well-ordered whole (kosmos). Still, as Aristotle notes, Anaxagoras wavers between assigning his nous completely to the human being's thinking soul (like Kant in his first critique) and proclaiming its total objectivity as the "soul-stuff" of the sensory world of nature.

In Plato and, even more, in Aristotle and the Neoplatonists, the nous of Anaxagoras retains its original significance as the divine mind that gives order to all things. It comes finally to be conceived as a pure act of "thinking thinking about thinking" (nóesis noéseos nóe- sis). The human soul or psyche, like everything else that is, "imitates" or "participates" in that pure act in the measure of its natural potencies. The psyche receives intuitively—quite as Kant will later explain it—the principles of its theoretical, practical, and productive kinds of rational activity. Through rational making, men and women build the cities or states in which they are able, individually and collectively, to behave rationally. And it is only when their making and behaving have acquired habitual excellence that human beings can have the experience of sharing, however briefly, in the divine existence of thinking, thinking about thinking, which is the height of sophia or wisdom. The good habit or virtue of making well is technē or art; of behaving well, it is phronesis or prudence; of explaining well, it is epistemē, or excellence in discursive reasoning. Nous or intuitive reason is what ultimately activates all three; but when the three become one at the pole, like the meridians on the globe, it is sophia, the highest intuitive reason joined with the highest discursive reason, that absorbs the other two (the highest good and the highest beauty) in its highest truth.

Through Jerome, Augustine, and Thomas Aquinas, the form of rational intuition that activates practical reason will get a special name: synderesis. But it will be left to Dante to do the same for the productive reason, or fine art. Dante will dare to say that his whole Divina commedia, in which he sought to "write like God," was for him a metaphoric, intuitive vision, completed to perfection in his "creative imagination" (alta fantasia), before he applied himself to the task of writing it down. Love, he says, helped him to turn his vision into poetry by dictating words in his heart (see INSPIRATION). Fortunately, he had native talent—ingenium or *genius—and had acquired the traditional poetic skills (ars) through long practice (usus), to be able to do some justice to love's divine dictation; otherwise, as he says, his trying to write like God might have looked rather like the efforts of a goose to fly like an eagle.

For a rounded view of the importance of intuition as an aesthetic concept that does full justice to its long hist., one must turn to Hegel's Aesthetics. Hegel makes use of intuition to distinguish the three great kinds of art that have characterized the civilizations of ancient Greece, the Near and Far East, and Eur. Christendom. The three are the cl., with its ideal reciprocal adequacy of content and form; the symbolic, which falls short of that ideal, presenting a reciprocal inadequacy of constituents, the results of which are sometimes ugly but sometimes tremulously *sublime in Kant's sense of the term; and the romantic, which transcends the cl. reciprocal adequacy—as Shakespeare does in his characterizations of Falstaff and Hamlet and Dante does at the close of his Paradiso, where, after telling us that his creative imagination finally experienced a vast intuitive power shortage (all'alta fantasia qui mancò possa), he permits us to share with him, intuitively, the dizzying heights of art in the process of transcending itself as art.

The same insight permits Hegel to treat comprehensively the great *epic, *lyric, and dramatic genres or voices of poetry and to predict that poets of the future in the Western world are apt to find the lyric *voice more vital than the other two voices of poetry. As a living experience, epic poetry belongs to the beginnings of a people's national hist., just as *dramatic poetry does to the decades of its full maturity. Lyric poetry has no special time in a people's hist.; therefore, its voice is never silent. From that Hegelian vantage point, it is possible to explain why theorists of art since Kant who have counted on intuition to tell them what is actually living for them in aesthetic experience have tended to emphasize the ideal of the lyric in poetry and of musical subjectivity among all the arts. That has been so from Arthur Schopenhauer and Friedrich Nietzsche down through Henri Bergson (The Creative Mind) and Jacques Maritain (Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry, 1953). René Wellek saw in it a tendency to abolish the "whole concept of art as one of the distinct activities of man" by collapsing the rich legacy of traditional artistic distinctions into a crude "unity of experience" that makes all things subjectively and intuitively one. Still, Hegel's best insights permit us to say on Croce's behalf that, when he faithfully scrutinized his personal aesthetic experience, he found indeed that its depths resounded, for him at least, with a voice of singularly lyrical intuitive inspiration.

II. In Poetry. Poetic intuition differs from sensation because it is neither passive nor psychological; it is a oneness of person and world expressed in lang. In the other arts, its lang. may be song or shape or gesture. It is knowledge, but of an immediate kind and, thus, is prior to conceptual, judgmental, discursive knowledge. There is no claim in poetic intuition that its world is either real or unreal or that that world and the experiencing person are distinct; because it is not a self-conscious experience, it does not even contain the claim that it is itself poetic intuition. Although it is possible to extract concepts and abstract ideas from a poem, in the poem experienced as a poem, these ideas are fused within the intuition.

Vico, who may be credited as the originator of this conception of poetry, argued that Homer conceived of Achilles not as a courageous individual or as an example of courage or as courage itself but as an utter fusion of all of these. In poetic intuition, in other words, individuality and universality are identical (see CONCRETE UNIVERSAL). Poetic intuition, moreover, is radically distinct from perception, which is the basis of empirical knowledge. If one perceives "the blue spot here and now," one observes it as part of a spatial and temporal and chromatic framework, a structure already composed by conceptual thought. It is, of course, possible to perceive rather than intuit poems, to consider their space and time as part of some large, conventional structure within which we live our days. But to do so is to miss the poems as poems. Space and time are abstractions by means of which we think and perceive the world. But poetic intuition creates the world and, with it, our living sense of space and time. The crudeness or fineness of our very ideas of space and time is, thus, derivable from the quality of our poetic, intuitive experience. Finally, in its purest form, the concept of poetry as intuition is at odds with the idea of poetry as self-expression. In a poetic intuition, self and world, subject and object, are immediately identical. This is the way the world begins. This is the way the self begins. On its basis alone, we construct our distinctions, self and world, space and time, real and unreal, truth and error, even beauty and ugliness.

After Croce, theories of intuition in the 20th c. were pursued from directions he might never have anticipated but with results that, in some cases at least, he would have found congenial. Expressionist theories of poetry, which are the last inheritors of *romanticism and of which poetic intuition is one, had surprising strength through much of the 20th c. In Italy, the publication of Gentile's Philosophy of Art in 1932 effectively put an end to the currency of Crocean expressionism; but in Switzerland and France, the rise of the *Geneva school of critics during the same decade produced a strong form of intuitivist crit. This, however, is based now on Bergson, existentialism, and (esp.) phenomenology. Here too the operating assumption is that a reader will, through inseeing or intuition, come into a rapport with the imaginative space of the text and, through it, that of the poet, the authenticity of which is taken as guaranteed. On the basis of this guarantee, one can then say that the ordinary category boundaries between subjective and objective are indeed dissolved, and along with them the usual concerns of critics with the gaps or spaces between the world and the world as embodied in words. In such intuition, one is literally seeing through words into the very life of things. Eng. trans. of *Geneva school phenomenological crit. brought its methods into currency in America in the 1960s. The subsequent assaults on referentiality and determinate meaning that were associated with deconstruction (see POSTSTRUCTURALISM), however, sought to dissolve all possibility of intuitive readerly rapport with the text, much less with the poet, as convenient but vain delusions built on a one-sided metaphysics. Perhaps more productive were devels. in reader-response crit., which sought to reestablish links between particular readers and works, at least, and perhaps even to restore links among readers themselves, and so guarantee intuitive authenticity, via the concept of readerly and social *convention. Nevertheless, intuitivist theories of poetry, like phenomenological philosophy, provide the most radical alternative to traditional Western dualist metaphysics. Most of the great Western poets have indicated implicitly or explicitly their belief in the power of intuition to bypass the circuits of feeble human rationality and fickle human perception, going straight to the source. "If a sparrow come before my window," said John Keats, "I take part in its existence and pick about the gravel." Whether such entering-in upon the conscious lives of other selves, other beings not human, and even events beyond all selfhood be dream or truth is a question that seems, finally, less important than the evident fact that it proceeds from a human capacity certain beyond cavil and one that poetry above all arts, for some reason, makes central.

See INVENTION.

■ G.N.G. Orsini, Benedetto Croce (1961); M. E. Brown, Neo-Idealistic Aesthetics: Croce, Gentile, Collingwood (1966); M. R. Westcott, Psychology of Intuition (1968); B. M. Reed, "Carry on, England: Tom Raworth's 'West Wind,' Intuition, and Neo-Avant-Garde Poetics," Contemporary Literature 47 (2006); A. Piper, "Intuition and Concrete Particularity in Kant's Transcendental Aesthetic," Rediscovering Aesthetics, ed. F. Halsall, J. Jansen, and T. O'Connor (2009).

A. PAOLUCCI; H. PAOLUCCI (AESTHETICS AND POETICS); M. E. BROWN; T.V.F. BROGAN (POETRY)

INUIT POETRY

I. Traditional Song and Poetry
II. Contemporary Song and Poetry

The Inuit (pl. form; sing. Inuk), formerly called Eskimos—a term considered offensive by many Inuit—live along some 5,000 miles of Arctic coastline, so comments about any one aspect of their culture are generalizations. As noted by both anthropologists and Inuit political organizations, however, the Inuit have a strong ling. and cultural connection across the circumpolar world. The Inuit lang. belongs to the Eskimo side of the Eskimo-Aleut family, and it has two branches: Inuit—known as Kalaallisut in Greenland; Inuktitut, Inuinnaqtun, or Inuvialuktun in Canada; and Iñupiaq in Alaska—and Yup'ik, spoken in several varieties in Alaska and Siberia. Traditional Inuit poetry is generally performed, rather than written and read, and it is often accompanied by drum, choral background, or dance. While the contemp. corpus includes verse written in the Western trad., Inuit poetry continues to be a highly musical production, with an emphasis on *performance and the sung and spoken word.

I. Traditional Song and Poetry. Traditional Inuit poetry takes a variety of forms and was often composed to be performed in the qaggiq (communal celebration house). As Lowenstein points out, many of the songs reflect on the process of song-making, often via comparison to a task such as hunting or to material objects or crafts. This practice of *metaphor illustrates both the skill required to create songs that would be subject to public evaluation and the extent of their value or usefulness to the community. Inuit poetry was ceremonial, possessing powers to make changes in the physical world, but it was also commonplace, a part of everyday life.

The Inuit songs known best to outsiders were recorded in the early 20th c. by the anthropologist Diamond Jenness and by the Greenlandic poet and scholar Knud Rasmussen. Rasmussen's trans., in particular, have been widely disseminated and republished, though they have often been stripped of important contextual information in the process. Rasmussen attempted to organize Inuit poetry into the following four categories: *charms, hunting songs, songs of mood, and songs of derision. More recently, Emile Imaruittuq, an elder from Igloolik, described the following three categories of songs:

A. Pisiit (pl. form; sing. pisiq), or personal songs. Although the term pisiit is now often used to refer to *hymns, the more traditional pisiit tell stories and express the singer's feelings and often make use of the ajaajaa (*refrain). This category would encompass Rasmussen's songs of mood and hunting songs. According to Imaruittuq, pisiit can also be called qilaujjarusiit, which indicates that they are performed with a drum dance. In terms of content, the lyrics are often highly metaphorical, and they may contain a lesson for the listeners. Imaruittuq notes that while pisiit could be performed by someone other than the owner or composer, credit was always given before the singing. A song whose lyrics have been altered by successive singers is called an ikiaqtagaq (split song). In the western (Copper Inuit) region, Jenness noted a variety of drum song called aton but was unable to distinguish it from the pisiq.

B. Iviutiit (pl. form; sing. iviutiq), or songs used to ridicule or embarrass people, often as part of a duel. Called "songs of derision" by Rasmussen, these song duels have a judicial function in that each singer is allowed to voice complaints against the other in public, and each is given an opportunity to respond. They may provide a cheerful, loving correction or a vicious assault on a reputation. The song duel varies greatly from one area to another, occasionally involving boxing, and is usually also considered entertainment. Iviutiit make use of comical euphemisms, often explicit in content (see POETIC CONTESTS).

C. Sakausiit (pl. form; sing. sakausiq), or songs used by angakkuit (shamans). Rasmussen called these charms or magic songs and recorded several examples. The Igloolik shaman Avva, for instance, knew songs that could be used to stop bleeding, to make heavy things light, to call spirit helpers, or to attract game. These powerful tools were guarded by their owners (though Rasmussen succeeded in trading for some of them). The use of obscure or archaic *diction—the highly metaphoric lang. of the angakkuit—frequently makes the sakausiit incomprehensible even to native speakers.

II. Contemporary Song and Poetry. As soon as Christian missionary projects and whalers brought written texts to the Arctic, Inuit began using syllabic and alphabetic orthographies to write their langs. The technology of writing, however, was more often employed pragmatically and rhetorically in the composition of letters, diaries, and political documents, rather than in the creation of books of poetry. As the Church became a dominant force in the Arctic, the performance of pisiit, iviutiit, and sakausiit fell out of favor, even as many elders continued to compose and sing songs. The older song texts, meanwhile, have been extensively collected, translated, and republished by eds. such as Jerome Rothenberg, James Houston, Guy-Marie Rousselière, Charles Hoffman, Edward Field, John Robert Colombo, Edmund Carpenter, and Tom Lowenstein. McCall and others have pointed out, however, that the publishing process, while well intentioned, has tended to strip songs of the context that gives them meaning—esp. in cases where the identity of the composers has been omitted. In this form, they appear more like *lyric poems than an accurate representation of Inuit poetry.

As McGrath observes, there is not a large body of Inuit poetry well known outside the Inuit homeland, but within Inuit communities, the trad. is flourishing. Inuit poetry is rarely published in chapbooks or in collections, but some writers, such as Greenland's Aqqaluk Lynge or Labrador's Philip Igloliorti, have published books of verse. More commonly, Inuit poetry can be found in smaller, community-based publications or online. McGrath has argued that the four genres identified by Rasmussen can also be applied to the contemp. corpus. The mood poems, she observes, are now written about mod. life in the communities and are often worked into photographs, drawings, or prints so that illustration and text are indivisible. Magic chants and incantations are no longer evident, but Christian hymns, trans. or adapted from Eng. and Danish or composed originally in Inuit lang., are widely promulgated. The hymns of Rasmus Berthelsen are known throughout Greenland, while in Canada, Armand Tagoona was a well-known composer of Christian songs. Hunting continues to be a major theme in Inuit poetry, but rather than being memorial or personal, hunting poems now tend to express a longing by young, urban writers for the old way of life. Many of these works also carry an environmentalist message, reflecting larger concerns in the North about the impacts of resource devel. and climate change (see ENVIRONMENT AND POETRY). In mod. Inuit poetry, the song duels and derisive poems generally do not exist in their traditional form, having been banned by Christian missionaries, but certain elements have survived. The question-answer sequence and the repeated use of the interrogative are features of contemp. Inuit political poetry, though the respondent is as likely to be a garbage can or an alien from Mars as a snowy owl or an offended husband.

The devel. of the *epic is a major innovation in mod. Inuit poetry; Frederik Nielsen's trilogy on Qitdlaussuaq traces the 18th-c. Inuit migration from Canada to Greenland; Alootook Ipellie's long poem "The Strangers" describes the Inuit occupation of the Arctic from ancient times and examines the consequences of Eur. contact; Villads Villadsen's Christian epic Nalusuunerup Taarnerani (In Heathen Darkness) describes the death of the last Norseman in Greenland and the eventual conversion and baptism of Aattaaritaa the exorcist. The politically inspired poems are sometimes purely *didactic but are more frequently satiric and ironic.

Even in the 21st c., written Inuit poetry does not entirely represent the contemp. Inuit poetic corpus. Indeed, the most vibrant Inuit poetry continues to be sung and performed rather than confined to the page. Despite the interventions of the Church and of the schools, the somewhat isolating activities of reading and writing are not esp. popular in many Inuit communities; instead, the works of musical performers such as Charlie Adams, Charlie Ningiuk, Henoch Townley, Tumassi Quitsaq, Laina Tullaugak, Leena Evic, Susan Aglukark, Elisapi Isaac, Lucie Idlout, Tumivut, and Beatrice Deer are recognized throughout the Arctic; and the lyrics of their songs constitute a poetic trad. that is constantly being revised, referenced, and reperformed by other Inuit artists—rather like the traditional ikiaqtagaq or adapted song. This is not to say that Inuit poets are traditional; rather, they braid their song trads. with other musical and poetic influences. As documented by Inuit circumpolar music blogger Stéphane Cloutier, the extensive music scene in Kalaallit Nunaat (Greenland) features many *hip-hop artists. Increasingly, even Inuit writers do not seem to be relying on print publication to disseminate their work, as spoken-word artists like Mosha Folger and Taqralik Partridge are already acquiring a significant following through the use of online media sites. These younger artists expand on a range of themes related to contemp. Inuit life and identity, and, notably, many of them continue to compose in their own lang. This ling. persistence ensures that the audience of contemp. Inuit poetry is primarily Inuit, unlike the Eng.-lang. poetry of other contemp. indigenous trads., which is more readily accessible to mainstream readers.

See ANTHROPOLOGY AND POETRY; CANADA, POETRY OF; ETHNOPOETICS; FLYTING; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; MUSIC AND POETRY; ORAL POETRY; POETRY SLAM.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: H. Rink, Tales and Traditions of the Eskimo, trans. R. Brown, 2 v. (1875); W. Thalbitzer, "Old Fashioned Songs," Phonetical Study of the Eskimo Language (1904); H. Roberts and D. Jenness, Songs of the Copper Eskimos (1925); K. Rasmussen, Report of the Fifth Thule Expedition, 1921–24, v. 7–9 (1930–32); Anerca, ed. E. Carpenter (1959); I Breathe a New Song, ed. R. Lewis (1971); Eskimo Poems from Canada and Greenland, ed. T. Lowenstein (1973); Kalaallit Taallaataat Nutaat INUIT Ny Gronlandsk Lyrik, ed. K. Norregaard (1980); Paper Stays Put, ed. R. Gedalof (1980); Poems of the Inuit, ed. J. R. Colombo (1981); C. Berthelsen, Gronlandsk Litteratur (1983); "Alaska Native Writers, Storytellers and Orators," spec. iss. of Alaska Quarterly Review 4.3–4 (1986); Northern Voices, ed. P. Petrone (1988); M. Aupilaarjuk, E. Imaruittuq, et al., "Pisiit, Songs," Perspectives on Traditional Law, ed. J. Ooste, F. Laugrand, W. Rasing (2000); Words of the Real People, ed. A. Fienup-Riordan and L. Kaplan (2007).

■ Criticism and History: S. Frederiksen, "Henrik Lund, A National Poet of Greenland," American Philosophical Society 96 (1952); and "Stylistic Forms in Greenland Eskimo Literature," Meddelser om Gronland 136 (1954); E. Carpenter, "Eskimo Poetry: Word Magic," Explorations 4 (1955); H. Lynge, "The Art and Poetry of Greenland," Greenland Past and Present, ed. K. Hertling et al. (1971); R. Wiebe, "Songs of the Canadian Eskimo," Canadian Literature 52 (1972); R. McGrath, Canadian Inuit Literature (1984); R. Pedersen, "Greenlandic Written Literature," Handbook of North American Indians, ed. D. Damas, v. 5 (1984); C. Berthelsen, "Greenlandic Literature: Its Traditions, Changes, and Trends," Arctic Anthropology 23 (1986); R. Hulan, Northern Experience and the Myths of Canadian Culture (2002); S. McCall, "I Can Only Sing This Song to Someone Who Understands It," Essays on Canadian Writing 83 (2004); Uqalurait: An Oral History of Nunavut, ed. J. Bennett and S. Rowley (2004); D. Serkoak, A. Meekitjuk-Hanson, P. Irniq, "Inuit Music," Nunavut Handbook, ed. M. Dewar (2004); S. Cloutier, "Inuit Circumpolar Music" (2010), http://pisiit.blogspot.com/; K. Martin, "Is an Inuit Literary History Possible?" American Indian Culture and Research Journal 34 (2010); L. J. Dorais, The Language of the Inuit (2010).

R. McGrath; K. Martin

INVECTIVE. A personal attack or *satire, often scurrilous, formerly written mainly in verse. Invective is to be differentiated from satire on the grounds that it is personal, motivated by malice, and unjust; thus, John Dennis remarks that satire "can never exist where the censures are not just. In that case the Versifyer, instead of a Satirist, is a Lampooner, and infamous Libeller." Invective is as old as poetry and as widespread; in the West, it appears (if not in the Homeric Margites) at least as early as Archilochus, who wrote an invective against Lycambes; other notable Gr. examples include those by Hipponax against Bupalus, by Anacreon against Artemon, and others by Xenophanes, Timon of Phlius, Sotades (see SOTADEAN), Menippus, and (less virulently) Callimachus. Indeed, iambic meter itself (see IAMBIC) is in its earliest, Ionian form so called specifically because of its association with invective, which has the specific characteristics both of a speaker giving vent to personal hatred and of common speech for its vehicle, to which iambic meter was thought by the ancients to conform. In Lat., invective is written, though in a wider variety of meters, chiefly by Catullus (see CHOLIAMBUS), Ovid (Ibis), Martial, and Varro. In the Middle Ages, Petrarch's invective against doctors, Invective contra medicum, is notable; in the Ren., the scope of personal invective was expanded considerably by the invention of printing, which provided broadsides, bills, and *ballads particularly well suited for rapid and wide dispersal of political invective and satire. Eng. invective of this sort abounds particularly in the Restoration and 18th c.; indeed, the Eng. word lampoon (from the Fr. slang term lamper, "to guzzle, swill down") dates only from the mid-17th c. John Wilmot, the Earl of Rochester's History of Insipids, a Lampoon (1680) is but one of many of his and of others. John Dryden, a master of invective, nevertheless deplores it in his "Discourse concerning the Original and Progress of Satire" (1693) as both illegal and dangerous. After 1750, however, verse invective, like other verse genres such as *narrative poetry, rapidly gave ground to prose as the medium of choice, except in the (remarkably durable) trad. of the *epigram, incl. scurrilous and vindictive epigrams, which were produced in the 20th c., notably by J. V. Cunningham.

See DOZENS, FLYTING, TOAST.

■ J. Addison, Spectator, no. 23; An Anthology of Invective and Abuse (1929) and More Invective (1930), both ed. H. Kingsmill; J. C. Manning, Blue Invective

(1973); The Book of Insults, Ancient and Modern, ed. N. McPhee (1978); Tygers of Wrath: Poems of Hate, Anger, and Invective, ed. X. J. Kennedy (1981); A. Richlin, The Garden of Priapus (1983); The Devil's Book of Verse, ed. R. Conniff (1983); The Blasted Pine: An Anthology, ed. F. R. Scott and A. J. M. Smith (1965)—Canadian; R. M. Rosen, Old Comedy and the Iambographic Tradition (1988); H. Rawson, Wicked Words (1989); G. J. van Gelder, The Bad and the Ugly: Attitudes towards Invective Poetry (Hija') in Classical Arabic Literature (1989); K. Swenson, Performing Definitions (1991); L. Watson, Arae: Curse Poetry in Antiquity (1991); A. Sáenz-Badillos, "Hebrew Invective Poetry: The Debate between Todros Abulafia and Phinehas Halevi," Prooftexts 16 (1996); G. Nagy, The Best of the Achaeans, 2d ed. (1999)—chs. 12–13; P. M. Thornton, "Insinuation, Insult, and Invective: The Threshold of Power and Protest in Modern China," Comparative Studies in Society and History 44 (2002); I. Ruffell, "Beyond Satire: Horace, Popular Invective and the Segregation of Literature," Journal of Roman Studies 93 (2003); M.-H. Larochelle, "L'Invective ou le rapprochement conflictuel," Dalhousie French Studies 74 (2006).

T.V.F. Brogan

INVENTION (Lat. invenire, "to come upon"). The practical discovery and gathering of materials that constitute a discourse or, alternately, a faculty of the poet or rhetor to make something new of existing matter or ex nihilo. In poetic composition, invention variously describes the discovery or creation of subject matter, as well as the formal and structural handling of that subject matter. Examples of invention as poetic form and structure are Aristotle, Poetics 14; Boccaccio, Genealogia deorum gentilium 14.7 (1360); Joachim du Bellay, La Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse 1.8 (1549); J. C. Scaliger, Poetices libri septem 1.1 (1561); and Alexander Pope, Preface to the Iliad (1715).

Ancient theories of rhet. named inventio (discovery) as the first step in the construction of an oratorical or literary work, followed by dispositio (arrangement), elocutio (expression), pronuntiatio (delivery or *pronunciation), and memoria (memory). Inventio is the most complex and significant of the steps; it refers not only to finding out a topic for composition but to devising the materials for composition through compilation, exploration, and discovery. Inventio, as Cicero explains, is "the excogitation of true or plausible things which render one's cause probable." The foundational texts on rhetorical inventio are Aristotle, Rhetoric 1–2; the anonymous Rhetorica ad Herennium 1.2.3; Cicero, De inventione 1.7.9 and De oratore 1.3.142, 2.19.79; and Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 3.3.1.

During the Ren., the rhetorical understanding of invention is coupled with, and to some extent supplanted by, the mod. notion of invention as innovation. In The Advancement of Learning (1605), Francis Bacon argues that "the invention of speech or argument is not properly an invention, for to invent is to discover that which we know not, and not to recover or resummon that which we already know" (2.13.6). Invention continues thereafter to be used to describe poetic composition. But whereas poetic invention had once indicated the process of allowing a topic to emerge out of the materials at hand, it now begins to signify the original innovation of an author working on those materials. Ancient theories of rhetorical inventio had always acknowledged the ingenuity of the rhetor, though it was the ingenuity of discovering an already extant truth. When invention comes to be associated with empirical and technological ingenuity, poetic invention, for its part, begins to connote creation as well as discovery. Invention remains bound to matter, but differently so. In the mod. era, the term invention, already important to the arts of lang., becomes common to the lexicons of science and technology as well.

In the premod. era, by comparison, invention was a term that crossed over between rhet. and logic. Distinguished from techniques of *style and eloquence, inventio involves that part of rhet. most connected with the intellect. Despite the relative demotion of rhet. within the Scholastic trad. that flourished in Eur. universities from 1100 to 1500, theories of invention continued to be developed in that trad. precisely because invention was identified as the logical aspect of rhet. The Scholastics tended to focus on the character of invention in judicial (or forensic) oration at the expense of the other branches of rhet.: deliberative (political and legislative) and demonstrative (epideictic and poetic) oration. But when humanists like Rodolphus Agricola and Peter Ramus moved to reassign inventio and dispositio or judicium to the field of logic, thereby limiting rhet. to pronunciatio and elocutio alone, all three branches of oratory (juridical, legislative, and poetic) were implicated in the move. This had the paradoxical effect of restoring credit to poetic invention for having a logical and intellectual character, rather than a strictly rhetorical function. The isolation and elevation of inventio and dispositio (or judicium) also inaugurated a new interest in defining the difference between them. And that distinction between inventio and judicium would eventuate in a trad., culminating in the 18th c., that sought to define poetic invention over and against judgment (Pope, Essay on Criticism 1.114 [1711], Preface to the Iliad; Alexander Gerard, Essay on Genius [1774]). The peculiar legacy of invention, and esp. poetic invention, has to do with its characterization as the logical part of rhet. and the rhetorical part of logic.

Even as inventio was being brought under the aegis of logic, commentators were concerned to preserve the understanding of inventio as the discovery of matter, rather than a purely abstract or intellectual initiative. In his Rule of Reason (1551), Thomas Wilson, pace Agricola, reverses the order of inventio and dispositio to indicate that invention derives its matter out of the arrangement and organization of prior discourses and arguments. Invention might be reassigned to logic—in effect, rescuing rhet., or at least certain fundamental rhetorical practices, from ill repute—as long as the fundamentally material and practical character of inventio was reiterated.

An analogous set of tensions can be glimpsed in the question of whether poetic invention should concern itself with the proper imitation of *nature. Some poets and critics have made a point of differentiating invention from imitation*, understanding the very nature of invention to be autonomous rather than derivative in its production of subject matter (Horace, Ars poetica 119–20; Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 10.2.12; Samuel Johnson, Rambler no. 121 [1751]; Edward Young, Conjectures on Original Composition [1759]). Others have indicated that poetry can achieve its desired effects only through the proper imitation of past works or of nature (Plutarch, Moralia 17–18; Aquinas, In libros posteriorum analyticorum expositio 1, Lectio 1 [ca. 1268]; Pierre de Ronsard, Abrégé de l'art poétique françois [1565]; John Dryden, Parallel betwixt Poetry and Painting [1695]; and Johnson, "Preface to Shakespeare" [1765]). Philip Sidney conceives of poetic invention as a kind of autonomous form of imitation: "only the poet [of all human artists] . . . lifted up with the vigor of his own invention, doth grow in effect another nature, in making things either better than nature bringeth forth, or, quite anew, forms such as never were in nature" (Defence of Poesy, 1595). Imitation is a relatively flexible category in Western mimetic theories (see MIMESIS), since it can refer to the *representation of both the physical world and potential or imagined worlds. In Sidney's formulation, invention imitates "what may be or should be": the "golden world" that poetry brings into being.

If in the Ren. a principle of innovation was brought forward out of the cl. concept of invention as discovery, it was *romanticism that brought forward the sense of poetic invention as an *expression of mind, though this emphasis on poetic invention as creative or divine genius can be found in Longinus's treatise Peri hypsous (On the Sublime) and Seneca's moral epistles (see ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS). Mind, rather than matter, became the primary touchstone for romantic theories of poetic invention; indeed, the mind itself rivals the vital *organicism of nature. The poet invents by transcending ordinary thought and by transforming ordinary matter, through *imagination as distinct from imitative *fancy or mechanistic reason (S. T. Coleridge), through spontaneous and original thought and feeling (William Wordsworth), or through an empirically derived but ultimately intuitive vision of ideal reality (P. B. Shelley). Invention is still strongly identified with intellection, but, for the romantics, poetic style and figure, rather than logic, define that identity.

The Sophists used the term kairos to indicate an aptness of rhetorical composition that occurs at the right moment and in the right place: a kind of serendipity. Invention, as Attridge has observed, "is an experience of coming upon a form, a phrase, a solution that seemed, in retrospect, to have been waiting in advance, or even one of being found by the form, phrase, or solution in a moment of illumination." And yet, "What is an invention in the eyes of its creator . . . actually becomes one only in its reception by the culture at large." Invention, Attridge points out, is a term that refers to both the event and its result. Whether it is the ancient rhetorical understanding of invention as finding out the extant matter for a discourse or the Ren. understanding of invention as bringing forth new meaning out of matter or the romantic understanding of invention as the original expression of mind, invention occurs when an act of composition rightly coincides with an act of observation or reception. And invention names the quality of a composition that is new but makes one think it was always there to be discovered.

See AGUDEZA, PRONUNCIATION, WIT.

■ D. L. Clark, Rhetoric and Poetry in the Renaissance (1922); C. S. Baldwin, Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic (1924), and Medieval Rhetoric and Poetic (1928); M. W. Bundy, "'Invention' and 'Imagination' in the Renaissance," JEGP 29 (1930); W. G. Crane, Wit and Rhetoric in the Renaissance (1937); F. Solmsen, "The Aristotelian Tradition in Ancient Rhetoric," AJP 62 (1941); M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); Abrams; R. McKeon, "Imitation and Poetry," Thought, Action, and Passion (1953); W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500–1700 (1956); W. J. Ong, Ramus, Method and the Decay of Dialogue (1958); Weinberg; G. A. Kennedy, The Art of Persuasion in Greece (1963); C. Vasoli, La dialettica e la retorica dell'Umanesimo: 'Invenzione' e 'Metodo' nella cultura del XV e XVI secolo (1968); E. J. Ashworth, Language and Logic in the Post-medieval Period (1974); L. Jardine, Francis Bacon: Discovery and the Arts of Discourse (1974); Murphy; L. D. Martin, "Literary Invention," CritI 6 (1980); P. Bagni, "L'Inventio nell'ars poetica latino-medievale," Rhetoric Revalued, ed. B. Vickers (1982); G. Bruns, Inventions (1982); S. Crowley, The Methodical Memory (1990); Lausberg; D. Attridge, The Singularity of Literature (2004); J. Lauer, Invention in Rhetoric and Composition (2004); R. Greene, Five Words (2013).

R. KALAS

IONIC. The metrical unit ⏑ ⏑ – –, and meters composed in such metra (see METRON) or derived from it. In Gr. poetry, pure ionic meters found wide use in *monody (esp. Anacreon), choral lyric, and the choruses of Gr. tragedy (particularly Euripides) and comedy. For other varieties of ionic rhythms, see GALLIAMB(US), ANACREONTIC. *Aeolic and ionic meters are closely related and were often confused with one another by the ancient grammarians. Pure ionics are found in Horace, Odes 3.12 (probably an imitation of Alcaeus, from 108 [Lobel-Page]), but mixtures of ionics and other meters are found in Plautus. The pure ionic is sometimes called the "lesser ionic" or ionic a minore. The so-called "greater ionic" or ionic a maiore (– – ⏑ ⏑) is a later Hellenistic devel., found particularly in the *sotadean, which also had its Lat. imitators; an example is provided by Varro, Satirae Menippeae 489. Accentual imitations of lesser ionics in Eng. poetry include Robert Browning's "In the midnight, in the silence of the sleep-time" and John Frederick Nims's "The Young Ionia" (Knowledge of the Evening [1960]). Some mod. metrists have entertained the idea that the sequence xx// in the first four syllables of the Eng. *iambic *pentameter is a kind of analogous ionic foot.

■ Hardie; Wilamowitz, pt. 2, chap. 9; Koster, chap. 9; Crusius; Dale, chap. 8; Halporn et al.; West.

J. W. Halporn; T.V.F. Brogan

IRANIAN POETRY. See PERSIAN POETRY.

IRELAND, POETRY OF

I. Poetry in Irish: Sixth to Ninth Centuries
II. Poetry in English: Eighteenth Century and the Celtic Revival
III. Irish Poetry: After Yeats (Irish and English)

I. Poetry in Irish: Sixth to Ninth Centuries. As the oldest vernacular lit. north of the Alps, Ir. poetry, according to the Old Ir. Auraicept na n-Éces (Primer of the Poets), consisted of "what was best then of every language . . . what was widest and finest was cut into Irish" (Ó Cathasaigh). Although the country was never colonized by Rome, the native Ir. nevertheless adapted an alphabet from some knowledge of Lat., perhaps as early as the 2d c. CE, called ogam, inscribed on upright stones. Oral Ir. lit. is believed to long precede the 5th c. arrival of the literate Lat. culture of such missionaries as Patrick; but in the oldest existing tablets and vellum (from the 6th and 7th cs., respectively), the vernacular tongue, often expressed in verse, already coexists with ecclesiastical texts in Lat. By the 8th c., missionaries from Ireland reversed the direction of literary exchange, carrying back to Europe instruction in cl. learning as they founded monasteries in Scotland and on the continent. With the displacement of their Druidic religion by Christianity in the 5th c., Ir. poets who composed orally (filid, sing.fili*) maintained their identity as scholars and poets, even as their verse now shared the meters of church and legal texts (Ó Cathasaigh).

The earliest Ir. verse, which had originated in the same IE system as did Sanskrit and Gr. verse (see CELTIC PROSODY; also Watkins), was gradually incorporated into complex rhyming syllabic meters. Scholars once thought that this change occurred under the influence of late Lat. verse, but more recent scholarship argues, to the contrary, that the versification of early Ir. poetry influenced med. Lat. verse. In Ireland, the most famous collection of poems in this style by the Ir. Latinists is Hisperica Famina (Western Orations; 7th c.). This Hisperic or rhyming style was subsequently employed in the OE "Rhyming Poem." As Christianity became established in Ireland in the 6th c., the roles of the native filid coexisted with those of monastic clerics and jurists in a system of aristocratic *patronage, but it was to the scholars of the monasteries that this task largely fell. Clerics in the Ir. monasteries who copied, for preservation and dissemination, sacred texts also compiled the pre-Christian lit. of Ireland, incl. tales of destructions, cattle raids, and wooings (Ó Cathasaigh). At this time, the poems being composed by the Ir. filid, patronized to promote the claims to property and power of his king (MacCana, Caball and Hollo), consisted typically of encomiastic genealogies and hists., but they also included more fanciful narratives, incl. the voyage saga (echtrae). From the 6th to the 12th c., verse is introduced into what is predominantly prose (Ni Mhaonaigh) in what is called *prosimetrum. E.g., in the voyage tales to the Otherworld (immrama) and in Buile Shuibne (Sweeney's Frenzy, the tale of an exiled king who achieves enlightenment in the wilderness), poetic passages give emphasis to already heightened emotion. Predominantly alliterative and unrhymed (retoiric), the poetry of this period also included rhyming syllabic forms (nuachrotha, "new forms"). The use of roscad, a form of obscure verse, was restricted to esoteric contexts.

Lyrics from med. Ir. scribes also survive, much of it in the margins of Lat. mss., escaping not just the task at hand but also the traditionalism of the filid. Early Ir. nature poetry at its best can be seen in the 9th or 10th c. Writing during a period of Viking raids on Ireland, the poet describes the reddened bracken, "its shape hidden; / The wild goose has raised his familiar cry" (MacCana, trans. G. Murphy).

Bardic or cl. Ir. poetry is usually dated from 1200–1600, a period in which the turmoil of the Norman invasion was exacerbated by the displacement of the native monasteries with continental institutions. The important role of the *poet in sustaining the social order was reinforced under a new confederation of learned families, contributing to the standardization of poetic forms in the aristocratic families of Scotland as well as Ireland. In families that came to include assimilating Anglo-Norman Catholics, poetry was the hereditary vocation of professional poets. The once separate functions of the learned filid and the nonliterate *bard now merged in the figure of the poet whose verse is both composed and performed orally, the latter accompanied by harp, even though a written record often would follow (Wong). Dán díreach (strict verse) is the generic name for the syllabic meters that were to be the hallmark of Ir. poetry in religious verse as well as court poetry until the 17th c. Virtuosity and artifice, learned lang. and ornateness were prized, contributing to the distinctive styles of the lore of places (dindshenchas*, mod. spelling dinnseanchas) and the narrative or laoithe poems concerning roving warriors (fiana) known as fianaigheacht. They included *ballads, a "vibrant and earthy manifestation of popular Gaelic culture" (Caball and Hollo), and they retained their popularity in high as well as low culture (see James Joyce's Finnegans Wake). Less elaborate forms were employed, however, as early as the 12th c. in love poems termed dánta grádha, which were once believed to have been composed contemporaneously with the amour courtois of Fr. trad. (see COURTLY LOVE), arriving in Ireland with Norman settlers. The trad. in Ir. now seems more likely to have been a "nonprofessional stream of Gaelic literary culture coterminous with the professional," what Caball and Hollo call an "amalgam of traditions" in which the earliest datable poem was composed by the Anglo-Norman Gerald fitz Maurice (1357–98). It was a "cosmopolitan combination of Gaelic, English and broader Eur. literary cultures," according to Caball and Hollo, to which aristocratic women as well as men contributed. Adapting to Ir. such forms as the *echo poem (echoing the beginning and ending of *quatrains), poems written by both sexes explore more personal subjects such as the impact of sectarian difference in relationships, and they came to include poems of male friendship (see Piaras Feiritéar [ca. 1600–53]).

After the military defeat of the Ir. chieftains at Kinsale in 1601 and the flight of the earls in 1607 to the courts and armies of Catholic Europe, for some decades Ir.-lang. writers often wrote from the courts, monasteries, and battlegrounds of Europe, preserving and expanding the filid trad., incl. the ongoing chronicling of Ir. hist. since antiquity. But with the Cromwellian settlements of 1652–54, the defeat of James II in 1690, and the ensuing Penal Laws, the economic structure that had supported the privileged status and function of the poet crumbled. Thus, much of the poetry of the 17th and 18th cs. is overtly political, a poetry of defiance, of mourning for the old order and contempt for the new. Aogán Ó Rathaille (ca. 1670–1729) and his contemporary Dáibhí Ó Bruadair (ca. 1625–98) inherited the residual role of the fili that in their own lifetime was abruptly withdrawn. Ó Bruadair, reduced to agricultural labor, in a trans. by the 20th-c. poet Michael Hartnett ruefully remembers the pen he once wielded: "From guiding the run of the clay-blade my knuckles all swollen are / And the spadeshaft hath deadened my fingers" (cited in Wong). By the 18th c., the poet Eoghan Rua Ó Súilleabháin (ca. 1748–84) makes a colorful poetic *persona of his life as a spailpín (itinerant laborer) in Munster. Reflecting the massive social and political upheaval of the 17th c., the form and content of postbardic poetry remains ornate, but increasingly, like the folk poetry of the period, it is colloquial in diction and tone and is composed in accentual rather than syllabic verse. It is also adapted to the purposes of *satire. If Jonathan Swift, a Dublin contemporary of Ó Rathaille's, was notorious for Eng.-lang. love poems that convert feminine allure into sexual threat, Brian Merriman (1750–1805) in a mischievous poem titled The Midnight Court written in Ir. in 1780 (but drawing on the Eur. trad. of the court of love) offered such an explicit and exuberant sexual empowerment of women, led by the goddess Aoibheall, that it would be censored in Eng. trans. well into the 20th c.

Already by the beginning of the 18th c., there is a different use of the pre-Christian myth of "Ireland" as the goddess Sovereignty or Ériu, the possession of whom legitimates Ir. kinship. Now personified as captive to a foreigner, she appeals to the poet in *dream visions to win her freedom. The vision, or aisling, poem, derived from Jacobite trads., would culminate in the 18th c. with such poems as "The Churchyard of Creagán" by Art Mac Cumhaigh (ca. 1738–73) and "Gile na Gile," ("Brightness Most Bright") by Ó Rathaille in which "our mild, bright, delicate, loving, freshlipped girl" falls prey to "that black, horned, foreign, hate-crested crew" (Kinsella 1981). There is a decline of literacy in the Ir. lang., such that, by the 19th c., Eng. was rapidly becoming the vernacular lang. of Ireland, a process accelerated by the famine of the 1840s and the massive emigration that followed. In the poetry and in the life of the blind poet and musician Antaine Raiftearaí (1779–1835) may be seen the merging of literary style with folk music and *ballad but also the invention of a new trad.: the sorrowful last survivor of a noble past. It was once presumed by scholars that Gaelic culture had sunk to that of an impoverished and oppressed peasantry. Poets were, it is true, reduced to employment as hedge-school masters, minstrels, or (as in Ó Bruadair's example) agricultural laborers, and certainly poetry moved closer to the people and the oral trad., even employing song meter (amhrán). But Denvir questions the widespread notion that the Ir.-lang. poet had become, as in James Macpherson's enormously popular reclamation for Scots (and Brit.) heritage of the Fenian warrior-poet Ossian, merely a moribund relic of a dying culture. "Celticism," which, in the late 18th-c. idiom of *romanticism, promoted the stereotype of the bard as a living relic, belies the lively exchanges across ling. borders in the everyday life and the lit. of Ireland at that time as well as the ongoing vitality of the filid heritage, both in the poems and ballads being written and in the oral contributions by storytellers (seanchai).

An example of the interfusion of the two may be witnessed in a major example of the bardic lament of the 18th c. as it was influenced by the oral keening trad. of women. Eibhlín Dubh Ní Chonaill's (c. 1743–c. 1800) celebrated Lament for Art O'Leary was occasioned by the murder of her husband, who resisted compliance with the Penal Laws. It survived through oral performances into the 20th c. The success of such poetry in the trad. of the filid was facilitated by devices that include the *repetition of the beginning in the ending lines and conchlann, the repetition of the last word of a stanza to initiate the stanza that follows (devices still employed by such 21st-c. poets as John Montague and Paul Muldoon). If in the 18th and 19th cs. the forms of high culture enter into popular usage, anonymous folk poetry written in the 17th and 18th cs. was itself sometimes composed mainly in accentual meters in forms that were technically sophisticated. "Roísín Dubh" ("Dark Rose") extends the aisling trad., but there are also homelier love poems of the time such as "Remember that Night," in which the speaker urges her beloved to "come some night soon / when my people sleep." She promises, on that night, to "put my arms round you / and tell you my story" (Kinsella 1981). Such continuity with the cultural wealth of the past was enabled in the 19th c. by a scribal culture in the Ir. lang. that was given new life by such Eng. institutions in Ireland as the Ordnance Survey, to which local poets contributed. It also, however, as Denvir notes, meant that the poetry largely sought "Gaelic and Catholic triumphalism" rather than the republicanism of the largely Eng.-speaking United Irishmen.

II. Poetry in English: Eighteenth Century and the Celtic Revival. The devel. in Ireland of a literate, middle-class, and urban Eng. lang. culture, Catholic as well as Protestant, early in the 18th c. supported a growing publishing industry. Jonathan Swift (1667–1745) ambivalently acknowledged the vitality of ongoing Ir.-lang. social mores in poems such as "The Description of an Irish-Feast " (1720), and he translated at least one song by the blind Ir. harper Turlough Carolan (ca. 1670–1738). Swift, if less hostile than Edmund Spenser (1552–99), who wrote The Faerie Queene from the rebellion and plantation of Munster, enlarges a trad. where alienation was often the defining experience for the nonnative, expatriate, or Anglo-Irish poet. For Swift's contemporary Mary Barber (ca. 1685–1755), the troubles of Ireland are a metaphor for the straitened domestic circumstances of women. Indeed, political sovereignty in Ireland, in the bardic past underwritten by the sexual union of the native leader to "Sovereignty," making fecund the soil, becomes an ironic dream.

While the Gaelic Revival at the end of the 19th c. would celebrate a demotic trad. "racy of the soil," (Denis Florence MacCarthy, 1817–82), a more complicated picture is already available at the end of the 18th c. in a poem, written by an Irishman living in England, that at once celebrates and mourns a struggling rural culture: "The Deserted Village" by Oliver Goldsmith (1728–74). A half century later, the Great Famine, in which at least half a million Ir. people died and hundreds of thousands emigrated on less favorable terms than did Goldsmith, would devastate Ir. culture on all levels. While such poets as Jeremiah Joseph Callanan (1795–1829) would collect from Ir. speakers the fairy tales circulating in a still-populous countryside that would soon be deserted, by 1850 the Famine had produced a veritable subgenre of rural lit. in such notable works as the 1849 "The Year of Sorrow" by Aubrey de Vere (1814–1902); "The Famine Year" by the mother of Oscar Wilde, Jane Elgee Wilde (Speranza, ca. 1821–96); and a decade later the publication of Laurence Bloomfield in Ireland, one of the major long poems in Eng. of the century, by William Allingham (1824–89).

Before the Famine, Ireland produced poets whose work parallels that of the Eng. romantic period: Mary Tighe (1772–1810), whose Psyche influenced John Keats; and two members of the United Irishmen, William Drennan (1754–1820) and James Orr (1770–1816). The most celebrated Ir. poet of the period was Thomas Moore (1779–1852), a close friend of Lord Byron's but also of Robert Emmet's, the executed leader of the 1803 uprising. Moore in his 1807 elegy for Emmet, "Oh! Breathe Not His Name," established the tone and theme of the Ir. political *elegy, praising self-sacrifice as an act of national renewal. Moore's unabashedly sentimental lyrics set to music, Irish Melodies, stoked an ongoing enthusiasm for ballads, incl. nationalist ballads revived from 1798. The continuing frequency of anonymous or pseudonymous publication in 19th-c. Ireland, contrary to what we might expect, may have proved poetically enabling for poets such as James Clarence Mangan (1803–49), who, under other names and in voices shaped by different langs., forged a distinctively "non-English" voice out of estrangement from his own speech, incl. in his revivals of the Ir. aisling in his version of the anonymous "Roísín Dubh" ("Dark Rose") and "Kathleen Ny-Houlahan." If for Mangan and Young Ireland the personal lyric of Eng. romanticism had become a mask that questioned "authenticity," such masks become ostentatious in the prose of Oscar Wilde (1854–1900). In Wilde's own Ir. ballad, however, "The Ballad of Reading Gaol," the anger is undisguised. Samuel Ferguson (1810–86), who wrote "Dialogue between the Heart and Head of an Irish Protestant," would provide W. B. Yeats (1865–1939) with another poetic counter to the stereotype of the ardent, heartfelt, and bardic Celt.

Yeats, Ireland's most celebrated poet, collected rural folk tales even as he promoted the poetry, and the nationalist politics, of Young Ireland. At the same time, in his own, early poems, he cast these Ir. themes in relation to those of the Eng. romantic poets he admired, P. B. Shelley and William Blake. Yeats sought to enlarge the scope of Celticism—in his poems but also in the Ir. nation—by promoting two other commitments to which he would devote his life. The first was to the occult, which culminated with A Vision (1925, rev. 1937), an ambitious recasting into the "gyres" of temporal change his lifelong investigation of historical patterns first cast in such notions as the mask, the phases of the moon, and the construction of individual identity within larger structures of fate. Its influence may be seen in "The Second Coming" with its concluding lines "And what rough beast, its hour come round at last, / Slouches towards Bethlehem to be born?" The second, more personal commitment was to the militant nationalist Maud Gonne (1866–1953), famous for her courage and her beauty, who, in refusing his repeated proposals of marriage, forced Yeats to make of "mere words" a model for the mod. love poem in Eng. As Yeats came to find aesthetically and intellectually crippling both Fenian nationalism and the Gaelic League with which he had allied his early literary interests, he developed a style that he hoped would seem "a moment's thought" ("Adam's Curse"), a poetry "as cold / And passionate as the dawn" ("The Fisherman"). Such art in its "arrogance" returned to the Protestant and Ascendancy heritage of Swift's savage indignation, even as Yeats assumed, as poet, the mask of "the wise and simple" figure of the "folk" in "The Fisherman." "All those things whereof / Man makes a superhuman, / Mirror-resembling dream" ("The Tower") Yeats claimed for the Ir. poet, even in the face of a world war larger than Ireland's "Troubles," for "All things fall and are built again / And those that build them again are gay" ("Lapis Lazuli").

III. Irish Poetry: After Yeats (Irish and English). The event that gave Yeats the title of perhaps the best-known elegy of the 20th c., "Easter, 1916"—with its *refrain "All changed, changed utterly: / A terrible beauty is born"—ended early the life of Patrick Pearse (1879–1916), the poet who gave to the Ir. lang. revival, as O'Leary writes, "a personal, and recognizably modern, voice." Pearse was best known for his overtly patriotic "Míse Eire." The Ir.-lang. trad. gathered new strength by the middle of the 20th c. in poems that responded to contemp. life in Ireland, and beyond, as in Máirtín Ó Direáin's (1910–88) "All This and the Hydrogen Bomb Too." Máire Mhac an tSaoi (b. 1922), celebrated for producing a poetic subject subversive of narrow attitudes toward women and sexuality in Ir. lang. culture, is followed by one female successor, Biddy Jenkinson (b. 1949), who has said that the Ir.-lang. poet should be a "trouble-maker." Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill (b. 1952), the most celebrated Ir.-lang. poet of her generation, puts the "language issue" (in a poem so titled, in Eng.) into "the lap, perhaps, / of some Pharaoh's daughter" ("Ceist na Teangan") while in "Dubh" (Black), she writes powerfully of ethnic violence in mod. Europe while echoing the figure of the Roisín Dubh (see Mangan). Ní Dhomhnaill—with Michael Davitt (1950–2005), Gabriel Rosenstock (b. 1949), and Cathal Ó Searcaigh (b. 1956)—emerged in the generation of Ir.-lang. poets influenced at University College Cork by Seán Ó Riordáin (1916–77) and Sean Ó Tuama (1926–2006). Michael Hartnett (1941–99), already a distinguished writer of poetry in Eng., at mid-career published critically acclaimed collections in Ir.

Samuel Beckett (1906–89), was—like many 20th-c. Ir. poets—influenced by the Irishman best known for his prose and his facility with langs., James Joyce (1882–1941). Perhaps following their examples in prose, and in personal mobility, more than their poetry, their successors, sharing a cosmopolitan skepticism of cultural nationalism and an awareness of how insularity may look from elsewhere, include Denis Devlin (1908–59), Pearse Hutchinson (b. 1927), and a few modernist contemporaries, such as Trevor Joyce (b. 1947), but also, and more vitally, such recent Ir. poets as Harry Clifton (b. 1952), Peter Sirr (b. 1960), Vona Groarke (b. 1964), Conor O'Callaghan (b. 1968), Justin Quinn (b. 1968), Catriona O'Reilly (b. 1973), David Wheatley (b. 1970), Sinead Morrissey (b. 1972), and Leontia Flynn (b. 1974).

Of the distinguished poets writing immediately after Yeats (one of whom was Padraic Fallon [1905–74]), it was the native Dubliner Austin Clarke (1896–1974) who brought Joyce's polyvocal playfulness and criticism of sexual hypocrisy into his poetry, even as he drew authoritatively on prosodic devices from the Ir. and, in poems such as "Aisling" and "The Straying Student," Gaelic themes. Another satirist of an Ireland isolated from Europe by neutrality in the war and culturally restricted by Catholicism at home was a poet who grew up in rural Monaghan, Patrick Kavanagh (1904–67), best known for the scathing rural realism of The Great Hunger but late in life a celebrant, like Clarke, of sexual love and bodily realities in "Canal Bank Walk" and "The Hospital." From the North, Louis MacNeice (1907–63), who made his reputation as a chronicler, in verse and in radio drama, of wartime and postwar London, wrote with equal deftness of the languid satisfactions of the Eng. suburbs and his own aversion and devotion to an Ireland of "dolled up Virgins / and your ignorant dead" ("Valediction"). He is particularly remembered for his ambitious and emotionally nuanced Autumn Journal, which follows into its private, fragile places the waxing and waning of love during the months, in London, when the rumblings of war cast in new light the day to day. MacNeice wrote memorable lyrics, precise in diction, elegant but informal in voice, and almost always tonally dark—such as "Snow," "Meeting Point," "Sunday Morning," and "The Sunlight on the Garden"—that particularly influenced the poets of the North of the next generation. A Protestant contemporary who stayed in Ulster, John Hewitt (1907–1987) was another source of influence in the North.

On both sides of the Ir. border poets emerged in the postwar decades who, by the early 1970s, had received such international acclaim that a second 20th-c. revival in Ireland was proclaimed in the Am. popular press, one that has been too restrictively called the Ulster Renaissance. In the South, the writers included John Montague, born in America in 1929 and raised in the North, and the author of the major historical narrative of the Ir. Troubles, The Rough Field, a sequence that is modernist and even postmodernist in its juxtaposition of past and present, of historical voices and artifacts, family lore, and personal lyric. Richard Murphy (b. 1927), who has written with frankness and stark beauty about the natural world and sexuality and about relationships with men as well as women, has evoked his own haunting by the land, sea, and cultural life of the west of Ireland. The leading Ir. poet of his generation, Thomas Kinsella (b. 1928), has made the Dublin of his ancestors a topos as memorable as Joyce's, where what he calls "established personal places" may "receive our lives' heat" and, in so doing, "adapt in their mass, like stone" ("Personal Places"). At the same time, he has been, after Yeats, the poet in Ireland who has combined with a personal, and sometimes angry, voice—cadenced so naturally, often in *free verse, that its rhetorical power and even eloquence follows an innate urgency—with an effort to imagine sweeping, transhistorical patterns of recurrence, repossession, and renewal that give purpose to the most intimate and sometimes brutal acts of kinship and conquest. A translator and scholar of Ir.-lang. poetry (incl. a major trans. of The Tain), adopting for his own themes the early Ir. Book of Invasions, Kinsella has resourcefully exploited what he has called the "gapped and polyglot" trad. of Ir. poetry. The strength of poetry south of the border, and its international reach, may be witnessed in such successors as Brendan Kennelly (b. 1936), Eamon Grennan (b. 1941), Paul Durcan (b. 1944), and Dennis O'Driscoll (b. 1954).

Site of Ambush, a formally achieved and historically precise rendering of an ambush in the Ir. War for Independence, was published in 1975 by a young (and polyglot) scholar of the Eng. Ren., Eiléan Ní Chuilleanáin (b. 1942). She writes with equal poise and power of the quiet heroism of women's lives, sometimes in traditional roles of mourning and in preserving and renewing the past, as in "The Architectural Metaphor," which reminds us that, however "out of reach" might be the help we seek, we may see, through metaphor, where we dwell with fresh vision, "the world not dead after all." In the first Ir. revival, there were, of course, women poets, incl. Katharine Tynan (1861–1931) and Dora Sigerson Shorter (1866–1918); they were followed by mid-century by the example of Mhac an tSaoi and Blanaid Salkeld (1880–1959). The arrival of Ní Chuilleanáin and of Eavan Boland (b. 1944), the latter assuming the role of spokesperson for what she calls, in the subtitle of her 1995 Object Lessons, "the life of the woman and the poet in our time," ushered in a new perspective on Ir. trads. Boland's version of Pearse's "Mise Eire" is, e.g., an ironic overturning of the aisling convention. Boland in particular has inspired Paula Meehan (b. 1955), even as Meehan also has developed an inimitable idiom by drawing on trads. from Am. poetry, Buddhism, and proletarian North Dublin. Of that same generation of distinguished Ir. women poets is Moya Cannon (b. 1956) and the Ger.-born Eva Bourke (b. 1946). Medbh McGuckian (b. 1950), a Catholic poet from the North, praised for poems that seem postmod. in shifting rapidly between abstraction and intimate, sensual particularity, evokes political threat—with an increasing attunement in later volumes to republican hist. as it enters into male bodiliness—but always with a sense of the possibility that lang. may itself alter ("radicalize") the very root of the speaking tongue or metric foot or native culture, offering "a seed-fund, a pendulum / pressing out the diasporic snow" ("Dream-Language of Fergus").

Seamus Heaney (b. 1939), a Nobel laureate and the best-known Ir. poet of the current age, was part of the Belfast scene in the early 1970s that encouraged McGuckian and fellow students at Queens University, Paul Muldoon (b. 1951) and Ciaran Carson (b. 1948). Heaney, from his first poems, made palpable and universal the rituals of daily life on a Derry Catholic farmstead. Yet he also writes movingly of sorrow in such communities, whether the deaths are political or personal, as in "Clearances:" "A soul ramifying and forever / Silent, beyond silence listened for." Of Heaney's own generation, which included the Honest Ulsterman founder James Simmons (1933–2001), and a little later Tom Paulin (b. 1949), two other poets have enjoyed distinguished careers and international reputations. Derek Mahon (b. 1941) combined the forms of high Yeatsian rhet. with a voice that undercut its own stance, calling "poetry" a "dying art / An eddy of semantic scruple" ("Rage for Order"), driven by a postapocalyptic vision in which in "a lost hub-cap is conceived" whatever "ideal society" will "replace our own" ("After Nerval"). Michael Longley (b. 1939) is a keen observer of a quieter, more humane nature in such poems as "Madame Butterfly," yet his "Ceasefire" is perhaps the poem most often quoted on the Troubles and the hopes that followed the event that gave the 1994 poem its title.

Muldoon, while he has approached the Troubles more obliquely than these Northern predecessors, has developed dazzling, dizzying rhyme schemes (as in the 150-page *sestina "Yarrow"). His formal ingeniousness, combined with liberties taken with the sonnet and with Yeats's ottava rima (and with bodies that are, like his own previous themes and even phrases, subject to disfigurement), has driven Muldoon's inimitable and arresting explorations of love and abjection in a time of violence, a hist. that he does not limit geopolitically to the North of Ireland. As much a poet of the cold war (and later the Am. wars in the Islamic world) as of the Troubles that he knew close up in rural Armagh, Muldoon's "voice" is thrice removed and yet intimate and invasive when the imprisoned hunger strikers speak (as mushrooms) in "Gathering Mushrooms": "lie down with us now and wrap / yourself in the soiled grey blanket of Irish rain." Carson, who learned Ir. in his Belfast home, has made a dual career as a prolific producer of musical and verbal arts that cross the boundaries among poetry, prose, song, trans., and even ethnography, suggesting new possibilities for imagining trads. in both langs., Ir. and Eng., as they spar with and spur one another. As he writes in "Hamlet," in passing the time at the local pub, hist. itself comes alive, proposing new endings to tragic episodes, because conversation is itself time, so the past, hedged by words that "blossom" in creative, oral exchange, "flits incessantly into the present."

■ Anthologies in English and Translations from Gaelic: The Love Songs of Connacht and The Religious Songs of Connacht, ed. and trans. D. Hyde (1893, 1906); Bards of the Gael and Gall, ed. and trans. G. Sigerson (1897); Selections from Ancient Irish Poetry, ed. and trans. K. Meyer (1911); An Anthology of Irish Verse, ed. P. Colum (1922); Love's Bitter-Sweet, ed. and trans. R. Flower (1925); K. A. Jackson, Studies in Early Celtic Nature Poetry (1935); 1000 Years of Irish Poetry, ed. K. Hoagland (1947); A Celtic Miscellany, ed. and trans. K. A. Jackson (1951); Irish Poets of the Nineteenth Century, ed. G. Taylor (1951); Early Irish Lyrics, ed. and trans. G. Murphy (1956); Kings, Lords and Commons, ed. and trans. F. O'Connor (1959); Love Poems of the Irish, ed. and trans. S. Lucy (1967); The Penguin Book of Irish Verse, ed. B. Kennelly (1970); The Book of Irish Verse, ed. J. Montague (1974); An Duanaire, 1600–1900: Poems of the Dispossessed, ed. and trans. T. Kinsella and S. O'Tuama (1981); Early Irish Verse, ed. and tran. R. Lehmann (1982); Poets of Munster, ed. S. Dunne (1985); The Bright Wave, ed. D. Bolger (1986); The New Oxford Book of Irish Verse, ed. T. Kinsella (1986); Contemporary Irish Poetry, ed. A. Bradley (1988); Contemporary Irish Poetry, ed. P. Fallon and D. Mahon (1990); Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing, ed. S. Deane, 3 v. (1991); Modern Irish Poetry, ed. P. Crotty (1995); Wake Forest Anthology of Irish Women's Poetry, 1967–2000, ed. P. O'Brien (1999); Writing Irish, ed. J. Myers Jr. (1999); Field Day Anthology of Irish Literature: Vols. IV–V: Irish Women's Writing and Traditions, ed. A. Bourke et al. (2002); In the Chair: Interviews with Poets from the North of Ireland, ed. J. Brown (2002); The New Irish Poets, ed. S. Guinness (2004); Irish Literature, 1750–1900, ed. J. Wright (2008); Anthology of Modern Irish Poetry, ed. W. Davis (2010); The Penguin Book of Irish Verse, ed. P. Crotty (2010).

■ Bibliographies: R. I. Best, A Bibliography of Irish

Philology and of Printed Irish Literature (1913); K.G.W. Cross and R.T.A. Dunlop, A Bibliography of Yeats Criticism, 1887–1965 (1971); R. Bromwich, Medieval Celtic Literature: A Select Bibliography (1974); M. Lapidge and R. Sharpe, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature, 400–1200 (1985); K.P.S. Jochum, W. B. Yeats: A Classified Bibliography of Criticism (1990).

■ Criticism and History: E. O'Reilly, A Chronological Account of Nearly Four Hundred Irish Writers (1820); E. A. Boyd, Ireland's Literary Renaissance (1916); D. Corkery, The Hidden Ireland (1924); A. De Blacam, Gaelic Literature Surveyed (1929); R. Flower, The Irish Tradition (1947); M. Dillon, Early Irish Literature (1948); E. Knott, Irish Syllabic Poetry, 1200–1600 (1957); C. Watkins, "Indo-European Metrics and Archaic Irish Verse," Celtica 6 (1963); C. Donahue, "Medieval Celtic Literature," Fisher; Early Irish Poetry, ed. J. Carney (1965); P. L. Henry, The Early English and Celtic Lyric (1966); P. Power, A Literary History of Ireland (1969); O. Bergin, Irish Bardic Poetry (1970); H. Bloom, Yeats (1970); J. E. Stoll, The Great Deluge: A Yeats Bibliography (1971); T. Brown, Northern Voices: Poets from Ulster (1975); Two Decades of Irish Writing, ed. D. Dunn (1975); R. Finneran, Anglo-Irish Literature: A Review of Research (1976); D. Perkins, A History of Modern Poetry, 2 v. (1976, 1987); S. O'Neill, "Gaelic Literature," Dictionary of Irish Literature, ed. R. Hogan et al. (1979); G. J. Watson, Irish Identity and the Literary Revival (1979); R. Welch, Irish Poetry from Moore to Yeats (1980); T. Kinsella and S. Ó Tuama, An Duanaire: Poems of the Dispossessed, 1600–1900 (1981); Ireland: A Social and Cultural History, 1922–79, ed. T. Brown (1981); A. N. Jeffares, Anglo-Irish Literature (1982); The Pleasures of Gaelic Poetry, ed. S. MacReammoin (1982); S. Deane, Celtic Revivals (1985), and A Short History of Irish Literature (1986); R. Garratt, Modern Irish Poetry (1986); D. Johnston, Irish Poetry after Joyce (1986); E. Longley, Poetry in the Wars (1986); P. L. Marcus, Yeats and the Beginning of the Irish Renaissance, 2d ed. (1987); Tradition and Influence in Anglo-Irish Poetry, ed. T. Brown and N. Grene (1989); P. MacCana, "Introduction: Early and Middle Irish Literature (c. 600–1600)," Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing, ed. S. Deane, v. 1 (1991); The Chosen Ground, ed. N. Corcoran (1992); Improprieties, ed. C. Wills (1993); E. Boland, Object Lessons: The Life of the Woman and the Poet in Our Time (1995); D. Kiberd, Inventing Ireland (1995); T. Kinsella, The Dual Tradition (1995); Modernism and Ireland, ed. P. Coughlan and A. Davis (1995); S. Ó Tuama, Repossessions (1995); P. Haberstroh, Women Creating Women (1996); B. Howard, The Pressed Melodeon (1996); S. Deane, Strange Country (1997); S. Matthews, Irish Poetry (1997); P. McDonald, Mistaken Identities (1997); G. Schirmer, Out of What Began (1998); A. Fogarty, " 'The Influence of Absences': Eavan Boland and the Silenced History of Irish Women's Poetry," Colby Quarterly 35 (1999); E. Grennan, Facing the Music (1999); Poets of Modern Ireland, ed. N. Corcoran (1999); F. Brearton, The Great War in Irish Poetry (2000); J. Goodby, Irish Poetry since 1950 (2000); D. Kiberd, Irish Classics (2000); D. O'Driscoll, Troubled Thoughts, Majestic Dreams (2001); N. Vance, Irish Literature after 1800 (2002); Cambridge Companion to Contemporary Irish Poetry, ed. M. Campbell (2003); A. Gillis, Irish Poetry of the 1930s (2005); H. Clark, The Ulster Renaissance (2006); Cambridge History of Irish Literature, ed. M. Kelleher and P. O'Leary (2006)—esp. essays by T. Ó Cathasaigh, M. Ní Mhaonaigh, M. Caball, K. Hollo, A. Fogarty, N. Buttimer, M. Campbell, G. Denvir, D. Wong, P. O'Leary, L. de Paor, D. Johnston, G. Batten, and B. Nic Dhiarmada; A Companion to Irish Literature, ed. J. Wright, 2 v. (2010).

G. Batten

IRONY. According to the Roman rhetorician Quintilian (ca. 35–100 CE), irony is saying something other than what is understood. By the time Quintilian offered this definition, there were already two intertwined philosophical and rhetorical trads. considering the scope and definition of irony, and this twin hist. continues to this day. Irony is at once a general attitude and a localized figure of speech; it can be as broad as the Socratic commitment to knowing that one does not know and as specific as substituting one word for its opposite.

Irony can be considered philosophically as a mode of life or a general relation to knowledge and understanding. It is usually accepted that this philosophical trad. begins with Plato's Socrates, whose mode of questioning in Plato's dialogues is to accept the terms of his interlocutors' definitions and then to push those definitions (occasionally) to the point where the meaning of the discussed term either dissolves completely, leaving only a gap (aporia*), or at least points to the need to create a definition that is more adequate than the common acceptance of a term's use. Socrates is described in the dialogues as deploying eironeia, which in the Gr. tragedies prior to Plato had designated deception or lying but which in the dialogues comes to refer to a strategy for attaining truth, a strategy that appears to accept the terms of common sense and received wisdom but ultimately exposes ordinary lang. to be inadequate. When Socrates asks Thrasymachus, in Plato's Republic (ca. 380 BCE), for a definition of "justice" and Thrasymachus replies that "justice is the advantage of the powerful" or "justice is paying back what one owes," Socrates accepts these definitions and then goes on to ask whether one would still call "just" actions undertaken by those in power who were mistaken about their own interests or whether returning an ax to a madman could still be a case of justice. Thrasymachus is baffled and accuses Socrates of irony, suggesting that (for Thrasymachus, at least) there is something pernicious about Socrates' undermining of everyday lang. and accepted usage. This sense that irony is undermining and linguistically and socially pernicious begins with Plato and continues into the 21st c. Aristotle (384–322 BCE), in his Ethics and Rhetoric, after Plato, suggested that the responsible citizen of good character should not remain distant and detached from everyday truth claims, norms, and conventions. Irony is socially irresponsible in its undermining of shared political conventions. Cicero (106–43 BCE) also claimed in De oratore that the active and engaged participant in a polity would use rhetorical strategies within his own context but would not, as Socrates seemed to do, have such a distanced attitude to the entire lang. that no engagement or meaning would ever be possible or secure. In the 19th c., both philosophers (Søren Kierkegaard, 1813–55) and literary critics (such as the Ger. romantics associated with the Athenaeum jour.) celebrated Socrates as the only "true" character insofar as he lived his life aware of the impossibility of coinciding completely with everyday lang. In the 21st c., both celebrations and denunciations of Socratic irony remain in force. The Am. pragmatist Richard Rorty (1931–2007) suggested that, given the necessary impossibility of establishing an absolute truth on which a society might establish its norms, all we can do is adopt our norms and political vocabularies, remaining aware that there is a certain provisional and contingent nature to all truth claims. We may be publicly sincere but privately ironic. Rorty endorses a Socratic mode of irony as a general attitude toward life and knowledge, and an acceptance that everyday definitions and conventions can never be adequate to some putative universal and final sense. Rorty's irony has been criticized as an abandonment of philosophical responsibility and as an overly postmod. failure to consider the difficult questions of truth, legitimation, and justification (just as Socrates was ultimately deemed by the court of Athens to have corrupted the youth). Yet Rorty himself criticizes one of the more complex aspects of Socrates' irony: by suggesting that everyday definitions are inadequate to define or establish a final sense for concepts such as justice, truth, beauty or the good, Socratic irony assumes that, when one uses irony to negate or distance oneself from everyday understanding, there will emerge some other, better, universal meaning.

Rorty is in keeping with post-20th-c. refusals to consider that a meaning or sense might transcend ordinary usage and conventions. There has been a widespread rejection of any such "Platonism," any idea that there might be a universal meaning for concepts, such as "justice," and that ordinary lang. ought to be corrected by an appeal to some proper and essential sense. For this reason, many of the 20th-c. and contemp. readings of the two modes of irony, either as a limited rhetorical device or as a style of living whereby one distances oneself from conventions, have been negative. That is, it is not assumed that when one "says something other than what is understood," there is some proper or universal sense that lies outside common sense. For Rorty, this attempt to "'eff' the ineffable" is a mistake that irony ought to cure. Irony should destroy rather than encourage the demands for universal truth claims. Accordingly, Socratic irony was reinterpreted in the 20th c., with philosophers and literary critics arguing that Socrates indicates a specific way of life, an awareness that there is no ultimate truth or essence of humanity and that one must simply form oneself as a literary character.

In addition to being a general attitude or point of view whereby one might characterize entire texts as ironic—such as Jonathan Swift's Modest Proposal of 1729 and its "logical" argument for cannibalism as a means of solving the problem of hunger and poverty—irony is also a *trope. Socrates' use of irony was wide ranging, sometimes encompassing a critical attitude toward knowledge—accepting that one uses a lang. even if it remains inadequate to capture the higher and essential truths of concepts such as truth and beauty—but sometimes restricted to specifically rhetorical cases of irony. Here, rather than the mode of a character or way of life, there is the substitution of one term for its opposite, so that Socrates will hail a sophist as "wise" when the context of the dialogue and its devel. suggest otherwise. One way in which this contrariness of meaning—Quintilian's "saying something other than is understood"—can be explained is through a theory of tropes. If other figures, such as *metaphor, substitute like for like, irony substitutes opposites. Irony differs from other tropes or figures in its capacity to work differently according to context and differently within context, depending on who is reading or listening and how one is situated in relation to the speaker. Jane Austen's opening of Pride and Prejudice (1813)—"It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune, must be in want of a wife"—is read as irony only if one does not accept the economic norms of the bourgeois marriage market. James Joyce's opening sentence of "The Dead" (1914)—"Lily, the caretaker's daughter, was literally run off her feet"—is marked as ironic only if one has the ling. resources to know that one cannot be literally run off one's feet. Irony has a hierarchical dimension, excluding some members of the audience from its "other" or implied sense.

That "other sense" remains difficult to secure and accounts for the multiple senses and levels of irony. These could be summarized as the following:

1. Simple rhetorical irony, the substitution of one sense for another. (Samuel Johnson's example from the dictionary of 1755 was "Bolingbroke was a holy man," an example that demonstrates that the implied sense would always depend on context and assumed values.)

2. Dramatic irony, where a character speaks in such a manner that the audience or reader recognizes the limited or contradictory nature of his or her speech. This occurs in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar when Marc Antony repeatedly declares that "Brutus is an honorable man" while detailing Brutus's duplicity. In this case, a character is using irony as a figure within his own context. More complex dramatic irony occurs in Macbeth where the audience hears the witches' predictions in one sense, Macbeth in another; and this is compounded if we anticipate the tragic course of events to follow. Dramatic irony is not confined to on-stage drama. It includes cases in which the audience or reader understands something quite different from the speaker's intended sense and can include nonfictional cases. We can perceive an irony in Martin Luther King's famous "I have a dream" speech, e.g., if we know that, for all his hope, events would run entirely contrary to his envisioned and expected future. In cases of fictional texts, characters such as those in Robert Browning's dramatic monologues can express extreme religious propriety or love, while the events narrated by that very character reveal the opposite. In "My Last Duchess," the character declaring his love reveals himself to be violently controlling, while "In the Spanish Cloister" is spoken from the point of view of a morally zealous monk whose accusations of his fellow monastery inhabitants disclose his own envy and malevolence.

3. Tragic irony, where events follow a course despite, and often because of, characters' attempts to control their own fate. The audience sees a course of events unfolding, despite the characters' efforts to command their own destiny. It is Oedipus's attempt to avoid the predicted killing of his own father, e.g., that leads him to pursue the course of events that he has sought to avoid.

4. Cosmic irony occurs when the universe or cosmos appears to correct, or fly in the face of, our expectations. This has a literary mode, as in Thomas Hardy's novel Tess of the D'Urbervilles (1891), in which the peasant family's attempt to regain its honorable lineage results in the ruin of the well-meaning and noble Tess. This sense of cosmic contrariness captures one of the dominant popular uses of the word irony, when sports commentators, newscasters, or popular songwriters use ironic to signal that, despite our intentions, life plays itself out in a contrary direction.

5. Romantic irony is defined by the Ger. literary theorists of Jena in the Athenaeum jour. and taken up by 20th-c. theorists such as Paul de Man, Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe, and Jean-Luc Nancy, defines irony as the "permanent parabasis of tropes," suggesting that irony is not limited to a figure of speech within a text but opens a point of view outside the text's own frame—*parabasis—in which the reader or audience gains a sense of the text as text, not as a sign referring to some proper sense or meaning.

6. Postmod. irony is generally diagnosed or celebrated as the recognition of a loss of stable or shared meaning. Those like Rorty or (in different ways) de Man regard irony as a liberation from the idea that words are direct markers of some underlying meaning or natural referent. Others regard postmod. irony as nihilistic, as evidence for a loss of faith in public legitimation and shared understanding.

7. Irony as a trope or the substitution of a word for its opposite can range from sarcasm, the aim of which is usually to wound, such as John Searle's "That was a brilliant thing to do," to a negation without a secure opposed sense as in W.H. Auden's use of the word "clever" in his poem "September 1, 1939": "as the clever hopes expire / Of a low dishonest decade."

See NEW CRITICISM, PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY.

■ Institutio oratoria of Quintilian, trans. H. Butler (1921); D. Muecke, Irony (1970); W. C. Booth, A Rhetoric of Irony (1974); A. Mellor, English Romantic Irony (1980); D. Muecke, Irony and the Ironic, 2d ed. (1982); P. de Man, The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984); J. Searle, Expression and Meaning (1985); P. Lacoue-Labarthe and J. Nancy, The Literary Absolute, trans. P. Barnard and C. Lester (1988); C. Lang, Irony/Humor: Critical Paradigms (1988); S. Kierkegaard, The Concept of Irony, with Continual Reference to Socrates, trans. L. M. Capel (1989); R. Rorty, Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity (1989); E. Behler, Irony and the Discourse of Modernity (1990); G. Vlastos, Socrates, Ironist and Moral Philosopher (1991); C. Colebrook, Irony (2004).

C. COLEBROOK

ISOCHRONISM OR ISOCHRONY. Refers to the rhythmic organization of speech into equal intervals of time. Most mod. discussions derive from Kenneth Pike's distinction between "stress-timed" and "syllable-timed" langs. Proponents of isochronism claim that, in stress-timed langs. (incl. Eng.), isochronism operates in such a way that the distance between stressed syllables is held constant in speech regardless (within limits) of the number of syllables between them; unstressed syllables between stresses are either lengthened or shortened in timing in order to keep the intervals isochronous. (Notice that isochronism is operative in music: musical bars are all equal in duration regardless of how many notes actually fill each one, and by convention, the first note in every bar bears a stress.)

A considerable amount of recent research into speech rhythm has been devoted to the phonetic reality behind the concepts of stress-timing and syllable-timing. In an analysis of large corpora from Chinese and Eng. natural speech (Benton et al., 2007), it was found that Chinese and Eng. fall into distinct rhythm categories. But a comparison of individual speaker data showed an overlapping continuum across both langs. The results thus remain ambiguous, and within certain more localized contexts, isochrony does seem to occur. And it may not be necessary that the intervals be objectively equal, so long as they are perceived to be equal. Acoustic measurements have failed to confirm perfect isochrony in speech production, but there is evidence that listeners impose rhythmic structure on sequences of interstress intervals. In the syllable-timed langs. such as Fr., by contrast, it is the syllables that are evenly spaced. Here isochrony comes closer to having both objective and subjective reality.

Some temporal prosodists, who hold that timing rather than stressing is the basis of meter, have applied the concept of isochronism to the *scansion of Eng. poetry. This approach has not worked well on *accentual-syllabic verse, but most types of *accentual verse, by contrast, probably show some degree of isochronism because they are not far removed from song. A good example is *ballad meter: since ballad texts were originally almost always set to music, the isochronism probably derives from the residue of the musical structure. However, some metrists insist that isochronism can only be a feature of *performance, never of meter.

■ C. Patmore, "English Metrical Critics," North British Review 27 (1857); P. Verrier, Essai sur les principes de la métrique anglaise, 3 vols. (1909–10)—esp. vol. 3; J. E. Duckworth, "An Inquiry into the Validity of the Isochronic Hypothesis," DAI 26 (1966), 5424A; J. S. Hedges, "Towards a Case for Isochronous Verse," 1975 Mid-American Linguistics Conference Papers, ed. F. Ingemann (1976); I. Lehiste, "Isochrony Reconsidered," JPhon 5 (1977); C. Bouzon and D. Hirst, "Isochrony and Prosodic Structure in British English," Speech Prosody, Nara, Japan (2004); M. Benton, L. Dockendorf, W. Jin, et al., "The Continuum of Speech Rhythm: Computational Testing of Speech Rhythm of Large Corpora from Natural Chinese and English Speech," ICPhS 16 (2007), Saarbrücken: 1269–72; V. Dellwo, A. Fourcin, and E. Abberton, "Rhythmical Classification of Languages Based on Voice Parameters," ICPhS 16 (2007).

T.V.F. Brogan; I. Lehiste

ISOCOLON AND PARISON. Parison (Gr., "almost equal") describes syntactic members (phrases, clauses, sentences or lines of verse) showing *parallelism of structure. In short, they are identical in grammar or form. Isocolon (Gr., "equal length") denotes members that are identical in number of syllables or in *scansion. Two members could show parison without isocolon: the number and types of words would match identically, but the words themselves would not match in number of syllables. Conversely, two members could be isosyllabic and even identical rhythmically without having exact correspondence of members. But normally parison implies isocolon as well. Sometimes an obvious word is elided in the second member: "The ox hath known his owner, and the ass his master's crib." Isocolon is particularly of interest because Aristotle mentions it in the Rhetoric as the figure that produces symmetry and balance in speech and, thus, creates rhythmical prose or even measures in verse; cf. Quintilian 9.3.76. In rhythmical prose, it is important for establishing the various forms of the cursus. Vickers gives examples of parison: "As Caesar lov'd me, I weep for him; as he was fortunate, I rejoice at it; as he was valiant, I honour him; but as he was ambitious, I slew him" (Julius Caesar 3.1.24); and of isocolon: "Was ever woman in this humour woo'd? / Was ever woman in this humour won?" (Richard III 1.2.227). The parison by Nathaniel in Love's Labour's Lost (5.1.2) is famous.

■ Norden; A. Quinn, Figures of Speech (1982)—esp. 77–79; Vickers; B. Vickers, Classical Rhetoric in English Poetry, 2d ed. (1989).

T.V.F. Brogan

ISOMETRIC, isometrical (from Gr., "equality of measure"); in cl. prosody, "homoeomeral." The OED dates the earliest uses of "isometric" and "isometrical" to the first half of the 19th c. Although cl. stichic verse is isometric, every line having the same length and meter (see stichos), sequences of metrical lines unbroken by stanzas would not necessarily have to be isometric. Most stanzaic poems are isometric: the metrical structure of the first stanza is repeated identically in subsequent ones. A few—e.g. *tail rhyme and the *sapphic—are not.

See heterometric, stanza.

T.V.F. Brogan; S. Cushman

ITALIAN PROSODY

I. Introduction
II. Meter
III. Rhyme
IV. Poetic Forms

I. Introduction. At its beginnings in the 13th c., It. poetry imitated many of the themes and forms of Occitan and OF poetry (see occitan poetry; france, poetry of). Med. Lat. rhythmical verse also exerted a strong formal influence on many of the nascent vernacular lyrical modes in Italy. In addition to his preeminence as Italy's leading poet, Dante (1265–1321) was the first among many well-known theoreticians of prosody. In the Vita nuova (ch. 25), Dante expresses his views on the hist. of poetic composition in the Eur. vernaculars and argues that, on the model of their Gr. and Lat. predecessors, It. poets should be allowed to use rhetorical figures. He also recognizes not only the seriousness of lit. but his own role as an inventive artist and his place in the literary trad.

Dante's literary career essentially retraces the trajectory of *lyric poetry in 13th-c. Italy, from the Sicilian school through the Dolce stil nuovo; thus, his remarks on and practice of *versification are of particular importance for the It. poetic trad. In his unfinished treatise, De vulgari eloquentia (On Vernacular Eloquence, ca. 1304), Dante situates poetic praxis within a more theoretical discussion of the nature of poetic lang., esp. the search among the various It. dialects for a sufficiently noble literary lang., one that would be, in his terms, "illustrious, cardinal, courtly, and curial" (1.17.1; see dialect poetry). Such a lang. would be the proper medium for refined lyric poetry in the "high" or "tragic" style on one of the three noble themes: prowess in arms, love, and moral virtue (2.2.7). From the "question of language," Dante passes to an extended discussion of metrical forms (2.3.1–3), particularly the construction of the canzone*: the grammatical structure of the verse period, the qualities of words, varying line lengths, the aab structure of the canzone stanza, and the particular nature of rhyme words and rhyming devices. While intending to treat this last point in the (unwritten) fourth book of the treatise, Dante discusses the ordering of the canzone through placement of rhymes and discourages certain practices: excessive use of the same rhyme, equivocal rhymes, and rhymes with harsh sounds. Not extant—if they were ever written—are sections on the ballata and *sonnet, both of which belong to the "middle" style. Nevertheless, Dante's codification of It. prosody served as a touchstone for centuries of both praxis and crit.

II. Meter. It. metrics is based both on number of syllables and on the position of the primary accent in the line, the latter being the determining factor in meter. Syllables are counted only up to the last accent; if any follow it, they are ignored. Hence, the *hendecasyllable (endecasillabo), the most excellent of meters according to Dante and the one most appropriate for subjects in the high style, is not necessarily determined by the presence of 11 syllables, as its name implies, but rather by the placement of the primary accent on the tenth syllable and a secondary stress on either the fourth or sixth syllable. While a "normal" hendecasyllable (endecasillabo piano) adheres to the 11-syllable model, it may have as few as 10 syllables (endecasillabo tronco) or as many as 12 or 13 (endecasillabo sdrucciolo or bisdrucciolo). Contiguous vowels must often be elided for a verse to scan (see ELISION), via either *synaloepha or *synaeresis. At other times, such vowels must be pronounced separately, via dialoepha (across a word boundary) or *diaeresis (within a word).

After the hendecasyllable, the seven-syllable line (settenario) is the next most popular It. meter, with the principal stress always on the sixth syllable, as in "Il Cinque Maggio" by Alessandro Manzoni (1785–1873). Dante notes that verses with an odd number of syllables (3, 5, 7, 11) are generally to be preferred; thus, we find verses in all periods of It. lit. with five syllables (quinario: major stress on the fourth), as, e.g., in "La pioggia nel pineto" by Gabriele D'Annunzio (1863–1938). Although in early It. poetry the trisillabo (major accent on the second syllable) is generally found only as a rhyming component (internal rhyme: rimalmezzo) of a longer verse, it sometimes appears as a separate verse. The trisillabo, however, occurs with some frequency in mod. poets, as in D'Annunzio's "La pioggia nel pineto" (14–15), where he combines a quinario with a trisillabo. Dante holds the nine-syllable line (novenario: major accent on the eighth syllable) in contempt for giving "the impression of being three lines of three syllables" (De vulgari eloquentia 2.5.6; trans. Haller), but it has been used by Gabriello Chiabrera (1552–1638), Francesco Redi (1626–98), Giosuè Carducci (1835–1907), Giovanni Pascoli (1855–1912), and D'Annunzio.

Dante considers lines with an even number of syllables decidedly less noble (2.5.7), perhaps because the regularity of the stress pattern led to a monotonous cadence. Nevertheless, there are numerous examples of octosyllabic verse (ottonario, accent on the seventh syllable), esp. in poems of popular inspiration; similarly, we have examples of six-syllable verses (senario, accent on the fifth syllable) and four-syllable verses (quadrisillabo, accent on third).

Many early narrative poems were written in stanzas composed of 14-syllable lines, alessandrini, which imitate OF verses; these are essentially double *heptasyllables (doppi settenari, accents on the sixth and thirteenth syllables) with a *caesura after the first settenario. They were also called versi martelliani, after Pier Jacopo Martelli (1661–1727), who composed tragedies in this meter based on the model of Pierre Corneille and Jean Racine, and were used subsequently by Carlo Goldoni (1707–93) and Giuseppe Giacosa (1847–1906) in their comedies and by Carducci in his Rime nuove. Decasyllables (decasillabi, accent on tenth syllable) also were first modeled on OF meters; these enjoyed a certain popularity in the 19th c. with Manzoni, Giovanni Berchet (1783–1851), Giuseppe Giusti (1809–50), and Pascoli.

Both in the Ren. and in the 19th c., we find examples of the imitation of cl. meters. The first conscious attempts were made by Leon Battista Alberti (1404–72) and Leonardo Dati (1360–1425), who composed It. *hexameters for the poetry contest—the certame coronario—of 1441. Ludovico Ariosto (1474–1533) tried his hand at reproducing the Lat. *iambic *trimeter in hendecasyllables. In the 16th and 17th cs., Claudio Tolomei (1492–1555) and Chiabrera attempted to resolve the conflict between the Lat. quantitative and the It. accentual systems. Carducci also experimented with "barbarian" poetry (metrica barbara)—for such it would have appeared and sounded to the ancients—based on accentual imitations of cl. meters, e.g. Virgilian hexameters and Catullian *elegiac distichs. In his Odi barbare, Carducci is esp. indebted to Horace.

III. Rhyme. Rhymes in It. are exact. Rhyme sounds are identical from the major stress to the end of the word: amóre / dolóre; compí / sentí; cántano / piántano. *Eye rhymes (rime all'occhio), which are apparently but not actually identical, are infrequent (pálmi / sálmi / almí; Dante, Inferno 31.65, 67, 69). Examples of composite rhymes (rime composte) may be found in early poetry (chiome / oh me; Inferno 28.121, 123) and esp. in the poetry of Guittone d'Arezzo (ca. 1225–93) and his followers. Other unusual sorts of rhyme found among the early lyrics include equivocal rhyme (traductio, where the word is the same but has a different meaning), derivative rhyme (replicatio, where the rhyme words have the same root), and *rich rhyme (rima cara, ricca, where an uncommon word form is used).

In the early lyrics, there is a phenomenon known as Sicilian rhyme (rima siciliana), which refers to words that in the dialect of the Sicilian poets would have rhymed because of the identity of the vowels e and i, and o and u. Thus, diri (= dire) and taciri (= tacere), as well as tuttu (= tutto) and muttu (= motto), rhyme in Sicilian, but not in It. When the Sicilian lyrics were copied into mss. by late 13th-c. Tuscan scribes, these forms were "Tuscanized," i.e., regularized orthographically, and thus emerged rhymes such as ride / vede (Sicilian ridi / vidi) and ascoso / incluso (Sicilian ascusu / inclusu).

Generally speaking, most med. It. poetry is rhymed, although we do find occasional examples of *assonance or *consonance, as e.g., in the Laudes creaturarum of St. Francis of Assisi (1182–1226), and some examples of versi sciolti*, poems with unrhymed lines, the first example of which is the anonymous 13th-c. poem "Il mare amoroso." This It. variety of *blank verse was reintroduced in the Ren., first by Giangiorgio Trissino (1478–1550) in his *epic L'Italia liberata dai Goti.

IV. Poetic Forms. For Dante, the canzone represents the height of artistic perfection. It developed in Italy under the direct influence of the Occitan canso*, the

OF chanson, and the German Minnesang*. Canzoni generally have several *strophes composed mainly of endecasillabi and settenari, all of which follow the same structure (a one-stanza canzone is called a cobbola). Canzoni composed entirely of shorter meters are called by the diminutive canzonette; these were esp. privileged in the 17th and 18th cs. by Chiabrera, Carlo Innocenzo Frugoni (1692–1768), Pietro Metastasio (1698–1782), and Giuseppe Parini (1729–99).

The essential division of the canzone strophe is bipartite, the first part being termed the fronte and the second the sirma. The fronte usually divides into two (sometimes three) equal parts called "feet" (piedi); the sirma sometimes divides into two equal parts called volte or giri. The passage from fronte to sirma, which marks the change from one musical pattern to another, is generally known as the diesis. Some canzoni conclude with a commiato (envoi*), a short stanza generally having the same pattern as the sirma (or a part of it), in which the poet sometimes addresses his composition and instructs it where it should go, with whom it should speak, what it should say, and so on.

These rules were followed rigidly until the 17th c., when the rise of the canzone libera signaled the abandonment of prosodic uniformity among strophes. Poets were thus presented with two possibilities: following the older, traditional forms or the newer, freer models. While some poets adhered in part to the earlier modes (Vittorio Alfieri [1749–1803], Vincenzo Monti [1754–1828], Ugo Foscolo [1778–1827], Manzoni, Carducci), most followed the newer forms, perhaps best exemplified by Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837) in his Canti.

Other important forms include the ballata, which arose in the mid-13th c. as a song to accompany a dance and has essentially the same form as the canzone, except that the ballata begins with a refrain, the ritornello or ripresa, which in performance was repeated after each stanza and the last rhyme(s) of which recurs at the end of each stanza. The ballata was very popular in the Middle Ages and Ren. and found illustrious practitioners in Dante, Petrarch (1304–74), Lorenzo de' Medici (1449–92), Angelo Poliziano ([Politian] 1454–94), and Pietro Bembo (1470–1547). It was revived briefly in the late 19th c. by Carducci, Pascoli, and D'Annunzio. The lauda* adopted the metrical form of the secular ballata under the guidance of its first great practitioner, Jacopone da Todi (1236?–1306), but its very popular use for religious subjects did not extend past the 15th c. In imitation of the Occitan *troubadour Arnaut Daniel (fl. 1180–95), Dante introduced the *sestina; later practitioners include Petrarch, Michelangelo (1475–1564), Carducci, D'Annunzio, and Giuseppe Ungaretti. The 14th c. saw the advent of other lyrical modes, esp. the madrigal and caccia. In the 16th and 17th cs., the madrigal became the preferred form to be set to music, e.g., by Giovanni Palestrina (ca. 1525–94) and Claudio Monteverdi (1567–1643); the caccia disappears after the 16th c.

The sonnet, arguably the single most important creation of It. prosody, was apparently invented in the second quarter of the 13th c. by Giacomo da Lentini (fl. first half of 13th c.), a notary at the court of Frederick II in Sicily. Although perhaps formed by the reduction of two strambotti (see STRAMBOTTO), it more likely developed in imitation of the strophe of the canzone. In early It. lit., the rhyme schemes of the quatrains and tercets are more flexible than later. The sonnet was also used as the vehicle for *verse epistles in the tenzone (see TENSO), an exchange of sonnets in which a topic or question was proposed for discussion to one or more poets. (Generally, as the tenzone developed, it became the rule that the response would have the same rhymes and metrical scheme as the initial sonnet, hence the phrase "rispondere per le rime," to reply by the rhymes.) Under the influence of Petrarch, perhaps its most important practitioner, and *Petrarchism, the *sonnet sequence spread throughout Europe. It. poets who have cultivated the sonnet include Michelangelo, Torquato Tasso (1544–95), Alfieri, Foscolo, Carducci, and D'Annunzio, although its popularity in It. has steadily diminished since the 17th c.

In narrative poetry, ottava rima*, used first by Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–75) for his verse narratives (Teseida, Filostrato, Ninfale fiesolano), became the staple for both the epic and the popular cantare, which had for its subject matter cl. and med. myths and legends, as well as contemp. political events and humorous tales. Following Boccaccio's lead, the great epic poets of the Ren. used ottava rima for their chivalric poems (Matteo Maria Boiardo [1441–94], Orlando innamorato; Ariosto, Orlando furioso; and Tasso, Gerusalemme liberata), as did other poets such as Luigi Pulci (1432–84, Morgante), Politian (Stanze per la giostra), Giambattista Marino (1569–1625, Adone), and Alessandro Tassoni (1565–1635, La secchia rapita).

*Allegory, *didactic poetry, and the dream vision generally were composed in terza rima, following the great model of Dante's Divina commedia. Thus, Boccaccio used terza rima in the Amorosa Visione, Petrarch in the Trionfi, and Fazio degli Uberti (ca. 1307–70) in the Dittamondo. In later centuries, terza rima, often in the form of the capitolo*, was incorporated by poets for a variety of compositions: *satires (Ariosto, Francesco Berni [?1497–1535], Alfieri, Leopardi), historical fictions (Niccolò Machiavelli [1469–1527]), *eclogues (de' Medici), amorous elegies (Ariosto, Foscolo, Carducci), and political allegories (Monti).

The rules of It. prosody were essentially fixed for subsequent poets in the first two centuries of It. lit., because of the examples of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio and due to the work of early compilers of metrical treatises such as Francesco da Barberino (1264–1348; Documenti d'Amore [1306–13]), Antonio da Tempo (ca. 1275–1336; Summa artis rithimici vulgaris dictaminis [1332]), and Gidino da Sommacampagna (fl. late 14th c.; Trattato dei ritmi volgari [1381–84]). To be sure, metrical innovation has always taken place, particularly in the 20th c. with literary movements such as *futurism and *hermeticism. Nevertheless, while prosodic forms are no longer followed strictly, poets still imitate, albeit unconsciously, the cadences of traditional verse.

See CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES; FROTTOLA AND BARZELLETTA; GRAMMATICAL RHYME; HIATUS; ITALY, POETRY OF; MOSAIC RHYME; VERSO PIANO; VERSO SDRUCCIOLO; VERSO TRONCO.

■ G. da Sommacampagna, Trattato dei ritmi volgari, ed. G.B.C. Giuliari (1870); P. E. Guarnerio, Manuale di versificazione italiana (1893); F. Flamini, Notizia storica dei versi e metri italiani (1919); R. Murari, Ritmica e metrica razionale italiana (1927); V. Pernicone, "Storia e svolgimento della metrica," Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di letteratura italiana, ed. A. Momigliano, v. 2 (1948); M. Pazzaglia, Il verso e l'arte della canzone nel "De vulgari eloquentia" (1967); A. B. Giamatti, "Italian," in Wimsatt; La metrica, ed. R. Cremante and M. Pazzaglia (1972); D. S. Avalle, Sintassi e prosodia nella lirica italiana delle origini (1973); F. Caliri, Ritmica e metrica (1973); Spongano; M. Fubini, Metrica e poesia, 3d ed. (1975); Literary Criticism of Dante Alighieri, ed. and trans. R. S. Haller (1977); Antonio da Tempo, Summa artis rithimici vulgaris dictaminis, ed. R. Andrews (1977); L. Castelnuovo, La metrica italiana (1979); D. Alighieri, Opere minori, ed. P. V. Mengaldo (1979); M. Shapiro, Hieroglyph of Time: The Petrarchan Sestina (1981); Brogan—bibl. to 1981, supp. in Verseform (1988); F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); Elwert, Italienische; A. Menichetti, Metrica italiana (1993); S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994).

C. KLEINHENZ

ITALY, POETRY OF

I. Duecento: The 1200s
II. Trecento: The 1300s
III. Quattrocento: The 1400s
IV. Cinquecento: The 1500s
V. Seicento: The 1600s
VI. Settecento: The 1700s
VII. Ottocento: The 1800s
VIII. Novecento: The 1900s

I. Duecento: The 1200s. The Middle Ages, from the fall of the Roman Empire to the 1300s, was long regarded as merely an epoch of barbarism. Mod. historiography, however, has rediscovered the period from Charlemagne to the birth of the Romance vernacular lits. as a time of fervent incubation, a preparation for the cultural rebirth of the 13th and 14th cs. During this period, the autonomous existence of the Neo-Lat. langs. became evident. The first documents of It. lang. and lit.—from the doubtful Indovinello veronese (Veronese Riddle, 9th c.) and the Ritmo laurenziano (Laurentian Verse, ca. 1150) to St. Francis's "Hymn," Jacopone's poems, and the Sicilian and Tuscan love lyrics—should be examined in the light of three conditioning facts: (1) the political conformation of the It. Peninsula—the constant tension between temporal and ecclesiastical power and its result, the Guelph-Ghibelline wars; (2) the influence of Fr. and Occitan literary models—the Fr. lang. precedes It. by a century or more, the delay usually being attributed to a tenacious survival of Lat., though it also reflects the absence of a central power, hence a slower evolution of feudal structures in the peninsula; and (3) the widespread religious revival beginning around the year 1000 and its vast influence throughout the 1300s.

Directly related to the latter is the religious order founded by Francis of Assisi (1182–1226), who is also the first It. poet worthy of note. His "Cantico delle creature" (Song of the Creatures, also known as the Laudes creaturarum), a thanksgiving hymn by and for the creature to the Creator, reflects a spirit of humility and simple faith, as well as a newfound wonder at the beauty of the creation and an implicit refusal to see earthly life as a mere valley of tears. The primitive diction should not mislead the reader: Francis is a conscious inventor of poetry. This can be seen in the careful structure of the hymn, in the purposeful ambivalence of word choice, and in the celebrated adjectival series that define each "member" of the grace-giving choir.

The genre of the lauda*, enriched by the example of med. Lat. liturgical lit., became high poetry in the hands of Jacopone da Todi (1236?–1306), an attorney spiritually reborn after the tragic death of his wife. Jacopone vigorously opposed the power plays of Pope Boniface VIII (Dante's archenemy) and was excommunicated and imprisoned by him; a number of the approximately 100 extant laude by Jacopone are against the simony of the Church (e.g., "O Papa Bonifazio"). Jacopone's best poetry is inspired by his feeling of isolation in his mystical passion, and his masterpiece, the "Donna del Paradiso" (Lament of Mary), presents Christ's passion as seen through the eyes of his mother. Here Jacopone reaches lyric heights never before attained in It. poetry.

The first matrix of It. literary trad. is the *Sicilian school. Centered at the court of Frederick II (1194–1250), the group devolved from the Occitan *troubadour trad., superimposing the rituals of feudal bondage and court protocol onto a concept of love, its only topic, in which the perfect submission by the lover corresponds to the heavenly perfection of the lady. The school had great cultural importance, and its major exponent, the notary Giacomo da Lentini (first half of 13th c.), probably invented the sonnet. Mentioned by Dante as the foremost poet of the Magna Curia, Giacomo was a faithful adapter of the troubadours' and trouvères' schemata of fin'amors (see COURTLY LOVE). Other members of the Sicilian school were Giacomino Pugliese (fl. 1325–50), Rinaldo d'Aquino (?1227–81), and Pier delle Vigne (ca. 1190–1249?).

The emperor Frederick, himself a poet, had vainly attempted to unify his Ger. and It. domains against violent ecclesiastical opposition. During his reign arose the Ghibelline (imperial) and Guelph (papal) factions, antagonists for over a century in It. politics. After the battle of Benevento (1266), which marked the end of the Hohenstaufen dynasty, the practice of poetry survived but was transplanted to Tuscany in central Italy. Its first noteworthy heir, Guittone d'Arezzo (ca. 1225–93), a Guelph exiled from his homeland, renewed and enriched the earlier lyric trad. by extending its topics to ethical and social concerns. As an extension of the trobar clus, Guittone's hermetic poems sound cold and artistically stifling. His technically complex style attracted imitators, such as Chiaro Davanzati (d. 1304) and the abstruse Monte Andrea (fl. 2d half 13th c.). Guittone's poetic corpus is both a bridge and a hurdle to be overcome between the Sicilians and the first great flowering of It. lyric, the school of the Sweet New Style, the Dolce stil nuovo*.

The very existence of such a "school," posited only by a vague reference in Dante's Purgatorio, is unsure. Certain, however, is a common conception of love as "dictator" (inspirer and despot). The Bolognese judge Guido Guinizzelli (ca. 1240–76), praised by Dante as the father of the style dolce (sweet, not bitterly harsh, as in Guittone) and nuovo (original), left a celebrated summary of the new amorous ars poetica in his canzone* "Al cor gentil": true nobility comes not from lineage but from virtue; love is a positive force: through the lady, admired from afar, the lover with a "noble heart" attains spiritual perfection. Guido's corpus (about 20 extant texts) shows a youthful vitality, also present in Dante's Vita nuova. Among the numerous adepts of the Sweet New Style are Lapo Gianni (d. after 1328), Gianni Alfani (fl. late 13th–early 14th cs.), Dino Frescobaldi (1221–1316), and the prolific Cino da Pistoia (ca. 1270–1336), usually viewed as a link between Dante and Petrarch. The maturity of the school is represented by Guido Cavalcanti (ca. 1255–1300), Dante's "primo amico" (first friend), whom legend depicts as a haughty loner, an image probably inspired by his poems (52 extant), his ars poetica, and theory of love, captured in the complex canzone "Donna me prega." Cavalcanti's interest in the mechanics of feelings, esp. the anguish of love, gives him a "morbid and mournful" air, as he observes the torment of his own soul. In his concept of love, the sight of a "real" woman stimulates the lover to form an idea of beauty that pervades his soul and, in turn, prods him to strive vainly toward the "original."

Parallel to the stilnovo, a trad. of jocose (or bourgeois) poetry developed. The "Contrasto" by Cielo d'Alcamo (ca. 1200–50) is a highly artistic, lively amorous dialogue between a cynical minstrel and a clever young woman. The Sicilian court poets' recurrent topics (praise, submission) and artful ling. koiné are the ironic subtext to this still-enjoyable little masterpiece. *Parody of stilnovo themes results in shrill outbursts in Cecco Angiolieri (1260–1313?), the skilled Sienese sonneteer (over 100 extant poems), whose themes include wild quarrels with his lady (Becchina, who is no lady), tavern brawls, the sorry state of his purse, and the stinginess of his parents. Cecco is no Italian Villon, as he has been called. His texts are meant for recital in the inn or square; the punch lines are ideally completed by guffaws from the guzzlers. A gentler realism inspires the sonnets of Folgóre, poet of San Gimignano (ca. 1265–before 1332), reflecting the chivalric ceremonies of polite society. The frank pursuit of pleasure here is tempered by a code of behavior based on good taste.

II. Trecento: The 1300s. In retrospect, the first hundred years of It. lit. appear as preparation for Dante's poetry. This perception, philologically speaking, is quite correct. Aesthetically, however, a veritable chasm separates Duecento poetry from the Divina commedia (Divine Comedy). For valid parallels, one must turn to the fine arts and Giotto (ca. 1267–1337) or to philosophy and Thomas Aquinas (1225–74).

Little is known of Dante Alighieri's life. Born in 1265 in Florence into a Guelph-leaning family of lesser nobility, he studied rhet. with Brunetto Latini (ca. 1220–94). Lasting influences on his youth included his friendship with Cavalcanti; his discovery of his own talent for poetry; and, esp., his love for a Beatrice Portinari, wife of the banker Simone dei Bardi. Remaining devoted to Beatrice in her life and after her death, Dante recounts their lopsided love story in the Vita nuova (New Life); in his magnum opus, written to honor this young woman who died at 25, Beatrice is present from beginning to end. Dante never mentions his wife Gemma and their children (two sons, Jacopo [1289–1348] and Pietro [1300–64], wrote commentaries on their father's work). After 1295, documents attest to Dante's participation in the civic life of his city; in 1300, he became one of six priori (cabinet members) in a Florence torn between the two factions of the Guelph party: Blacks, subservient to Rome, and Whites, anti-imperial but resistant to papal hegemony. Dante sided with the latter. In 1301, he was sent by his party, then in power, as ambassador to Pope Boniface VIII, who promptly detained him, while the Blacks, with Fr. and papal help, seized power in Florence. Dante, sentenced in absentia to be burned at the stake, never again set foot in his city. In exile over 19 years, he hoped at first to deserve recall on the strength of his learning: he produced works on lings. (De vulgari eloquentia [On Vernacular Eloquence], in Lat., incomplete), philosophy (Convivio [The Banquet], unfinished), and political science (Monarchia). Scholars date the composition of the Divine Comedy from 1307 to the year of Dante's death in Ravenna, 1321.

The Vita nuova (1292–93) is a collection of poems connected by prose passages relating a tenuous love story from the meeting between Dante and Beatrice, both aged nine, to her death in 1290 and beyond. It is a story made up of abstract emotions, the most daring "real" event being Beatrice's one-time reciprocation of Dante's greeting. Neither autobiography nor total fiction, the Vita nuova is rather a typology of youthful love, pervaded by a quasi-religious, mystical solemnity and by an oneiric vagueness of detail. Dante's Rime comprise the poems excluded from the Vita nuova and those written after 1293, incl. the canzoni of his maturity and exile; closest to the inspiration of the Comedy is the poem "Tre donne" ("Three Women").

The 14,233 verses of the Comedy (for Dante, comedy and tragedy refer to both content and style) took 15 years to compose. In addition to the glorification of Beatrice and the exile's wish to show his worth, the purpose of the poem is expressed in Dante's letter to Can Grande (Epistle 13, of debated attribution) as the messianic mission "to lead the living out of a state of misery into a state of bliss." The poet achieved his literary purpose of fashioning with words a world that in its miraculous credibility vies with God's own creation. We must remember that the Comedy is a fiction, the work of a poet and master storyteller, not of the Holy Spirit. This obvious truth sets a limit to symbolic interpretation, even though the med. practice of *allegory is ever-present in the text. What distinguishes Dante's from earlier otherworldly journeys is that his predecessors are all allegory; we read Dante after seven centuries for what we find beyond his didactic purposes. Allegory is a premise of the narratio, flexible and often ambiguous: it is part of the polyvalence present in all enduring poetry. While Beatrice and Virgil may be, respectively, "theology" and "reason," we believe and love them primarily because Dante "forgot," more often than not, their roles as abstractions.

The Comedy is the fictive, visionary account of a redemptive journey through hell and purgatory to paradise and God, by a pilgrim, Dante Alighieri, who is guided first by Virgil, later by Beatrice, and finally by St. Bernard. Hell holds the souls of the damned, distributed into nine "circles" set up according to Aristotle's categories of sin (incontinence, violence, fraud [heresy was unknown to the Greek]). Purgatory is segmented into the seven deadly sins of Christian dogma (with Ante-Purgatory and Earthly Paradise bringing the number of divisions to nine). Paradise comprises the nine heavens of Ptolemy's geocentric universe, from the seven planetary spheres to the fixed stars, the Primum Mobile, and the Empyrean, abode of all the souls happy in the sight of God. The recurrence of the number three and its multiples, as well as other divisions in the edifice, such as the 100 canti or the strophic scheme of three lines of eleven syllables each—terza rima*—or the *canto and episode parallelisms and contrasts at corresponding "locations" in the three cantiche are important for Dantean exegesis.

Of the three canticles (34 + 33 + 33 canti), Inferno is the most dramatic and suspenseful. Memorable characters and events dominate several canti: Francesca's story of love and death, Farinata's "war memoirs," Chancellor Pier delle Vigne's suicide, Ulysses's last voyage, the prison "cannibalism" of Count Ugolino of Pisa. Purgatorio is the realm of elegy, subdued sadness, and hopeful yearning: it is the most "earthly" cantica, with feelings of brotherly affection. Paradiso is the triumph of Beatrice, who is both symbol and real woman. Among the blessed, absolute equality is the rule: no character should emerge. The sequence of heavens is transformed into a transcendental fireworks display of growing intensity. Humanity is never absent from the rarefied mysticism signaling God's presence. And the great saints appear in person to test, prod, warn, and guide the pilgrim toward fulfillment. God, thanks to Dante's magnificent intuition, is depicted here not as the bearded elder of Judeo-Christian iconography but as a blinding point of light immeasurably both far and near. In Paradiso, Dante gives evidence of his most sublime, mature genius.

Dante's robust spirituality, unshaken religious convictions, and firm belief in the continuity of social structures were rooted in the apparent stability of the "old" world, the thick Ages in the Middle. The curriculum vitae of Francesco Petrarca (Petrarch, 1304–74) coincides with a historical moment of accelerated change and crumbling certainties. Petrarch appears much closer to us than does Dante: closer than the generation or two that actually separate these two quasi-contemporaries. The mod. instability of Petrarch's psychic makeup is manifest in his vast correspondence, in his treatises (e.g., on "solitude," on the "remedies against Fortune"), and esp. in his Lat. Secretum (Confessions), which is a microscopic analysis of that nameless something that forever anguished his soul. Born in Arezzo of a Florentine bourgeois family in exile, Petrarch was brought up in southern France. He studied jurisprudence at Montpellier and Bologna. On April 6, 1327, his destiny was redirected when he met, in Avignon, Laura, the unidentified woman whom he loved in life and in death (she died of the plague in 1348) and whom he immortalized in his poetry. Petrarch is the forefather of humanism, the revival of Greco-Roman culture that would dominate the next century. His work in Lat. is immense, esp. his epic in hexameters, Africa, which procured him the title and crown of *poet laureate conferred by the Senate of Rome on April 8, 1341. The uncontested arbiter of Eur. lit., Petrarch lived the latter half of his life mainly in Italy.

Petrarch expected enduring fame from his Lat. work; immeasurably superior are his modestly titled (with affected scorn) Rerum vulgarium fragmenta (freely rendered, "Italian bits and pieces") or Canzoniere. In spite of his expressed desire to burn the collection, he kept revising and perfecting the ms. to his dying day. The 366 poems (317 sonnets, plus 29 canzoni, nine *sestinas, seven ballate, and four *madrigals) record the earthly (not at all merely spiritual) passion inspired by Laura, even after her "flight to heaven." Petrarch is the last great representative of the troubadour trad. (afterward there will be epigones and *Petrarchism). Some critics have doubted the very existence of Laura, assuming her to be a composite of the poetic trad. While the "love story" behind the stylized abstractions is clearly an unrequited love, the human passion of the poet, with its ebb and flow over the years, its brief joys and long despair, its cries and silences, and its phases of resignation and rebellion, recreates the anonymous Beloved, body and soul. Although Petrarch veils and stylizes his earthly model, the living warmth of his words makes the reader mentally recreate Laura. There is no direct description of her in the Canzoniere, yet we never lose sight of her.

There is something artful if not artificial in this process—the something that made De Sanctis remark that, while Dante was more poet than artist, Petrarch was more artist than poet. Nevertheless, readers have always privileged the poems written about Laura and the self-analytic pauses. Set aside the opening and closing pieces as well as the few nondirectly Laura poems, and what remains engraved in memory are the dreamy evocation of the fateful day (no. 2); the old pilgrim (16) on his way to Rome; a solo e pensoso walk across the fields (35); the tired prayer of the penitent (62); a lovely shape made of transparencies (90 and the famous 126); the cameretta (little room) of the poet (234); and, in the death of Laura, the inexorable march of days and years (272), the useless return of spring (310), and the sad song of a nightingale telling us that "nothing here below delights—and lasts" (311). A certain repetitiveness has been observed in the Canzoniere; but, in fact, the work was meant to be sampled in small doses, rather than by continued perusal. A monochrome uniformity is genuine in Petrarch's only other It. verse work, the later Trionfi. Heavily allegorical, unfinished and unrefined, these series of Dantesque terzine sing the "triumphs" of Love, Chastity, Death, Fame, Time, and Eternity.

Among the minor Trecento poets are the late stilnovista Fazio degli Uberti (ca. 1305–67) from Pisa; the courtly poet Antonio Beccari (1315–before 1374) from Ferrara; the prolific Florentine popularizer of vernacular lit., Antonio Pucci (ca. 1310–88); and the fine author of ballads Franco Sacchetti (ca. 1330–1400). The third component of the great Trecento triumvirate, Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–75), father of mod. storytelling, was an uninspired but evidently inspiring versifier—e.g., Chaucer's vast and undervalued debt to Boccaccio's Filostrato (1336?), the romance of Troilus in octaves and Teseida (1341?), an epic, the Palamon and Arcite story. Boccaccio's own "Vita nuova" (Commedia delle ninfe, 1341) and allegorical vision in terzine (Amorosa visione, 1343?) influenced in turn Petrarch's Trionfi. There are more than 100 lyric compositions also attributed to Boccaccio, counting the ballads from the frame of the Decameron.

III. Quattrocento: The 1400s. The sudden blossoming of vernacular lit. in the 14th c. carried in it the seeds of decadence or rather of exhausted retrenchment during the first half of the next century. Petrarch and Boccaccio (and protohumanist Dante) were indeed the fountainhead of the cultural movement called humanism, essentially an enthusiastic revival of Lat. lit. (as opposed and "superior" to It. lit.). The trend, initially a passion for cl. learning and a rediscovery of many major texts of Lat. and Gr. antiquity, by degrees became a belief in the panacea of cl. education, capable of "freeing" humankind. The main creative tenet of this new *classicism was imitatio, theorized by Petrarch and the basis for the later Petrarchism. The new blooming of Lat. lit. highlights such well-known humanists as Giovanni Pico della Mirandola (1463–94), Lorenzo Valla (1406–57), Coluccio Salutati (1331–1406), Giovanni Pontano (1426–1503), and Marsilio Ficino (1433–99). Far from being slavish imitators, the humanists in fact ended by "dethroning the ancients from their exalted position" (Guarino, in Bondanella) by reexamining under the microscope of philology the old texts and by historicizing classicism. Humanism was nothing short of a discovery of hist. in the mod. sense of the word.

Poetry in It. continued to be produced, marginally as it were, often in its "lower" species as imitations of popular song. The Venetian patrician Leonardo Giustiniani (1338–1446) became a sort of bestseller on account of his talent for reproducing the sonorities and easy grace of the canzonette sung by gondoliers on the laguna. The same taste for the simple diction of popular genres inspired the Florentine Luigi Pulci (1432–84), but with a different result. Pulci is a "humorist" in the true sense of the word: for him, life was a "harmonious mixture of sweet and bitter and a thousand flavors." Not merely a parody of the solemnities of the Fr. chansons de geste*, Pulci's mock-heroic "epos" Morgante is the amusing product of a whimsical comic genius. Its rough model is enriched by characters alive on the page—in spite of their irrational capriciousness. In addition to the usual types, Pulci introduced Morgante, the giant, inspirer of Rabelais; the ribald monster Margutte who dies of immoderate laughter at a gross practical joke; and the amusing "logician" fiend Astaroth, spokesman for Pulci's religious doubts and occult leanings.

Matteo Maria Boiardo (1441–94) made reference in a serious vein to the same material. Pulci's attitude toward the Carolingian sources had reflected popular Tuscan city-bred tastes; Boiardo brought to them the conservative provincial atmosphere of northern courtly life. The incomplete Orlando innamorato (Roland in Love) injects Arthurian elements into the chivalric material: all-conquering love now presides over the knights' and ladies' adventures. The poem is a whirlwind of disparate episodes, unified, if at all, by overwhelming passion and vigorous action. The idiom, of strong regional flavor, hindered wide diffusion of the original; up to the 19th c. Orlando was read in Tuscanized versions done by Francesco Berni and others.

Florence, transformed from Dante's comune into a signoria under the Medicis, reacquired its cultural centrality during the second half of the century. Pulci's lord protector, Lorenzo de' Medici (1449–92, known as Il Magnifico), was himself a versatile poet. Critical appraisals of Lorenzo's poetry range from enthusiastic endorsement of his artful masquerades to viewing his output as the pastime of a statesman, the amusement of a dilettante. In truth, he was simply one of the many skillful literati of his court. His principal merit, other than his all-important patronage, lies in his vigorous defense of literary It.: Lorenzo contributed in a decisive way to the final prevalence of the Tuscan-Florentine trad. and the decline of literary writing in Lat.

Still, it may well be that Lorenzo's most enduring achievement was the discovery of the poetic talent of Politian (Poliziano), pseud. of Agnolo Ambrogini (1454–94) from Montepulciano (hence the name). Politian became a leading humanist, rediscovering and editing ancient texts. Apart from his poetry in Lat. and Gr., Politian wrote canzoni and other lyric poems. In his masterwork, the unfinished Stanze (Strophes, in ottave), he retells allegorically the meeting between Giuliano de' Medici, a youth devoted to pleasure and adventure, and the nymph of unearthly beauty Simonetta (Vespucci). The airy lightness of the Stanze is a poetic miracle, every octave a mixture of reminiscences, references, and reminders (Homer, Horace, Virgil, Dante, Petrarch, and many others), but the result appears perfectly natural. Moments of noble melancholy accent the pellucid text, mementos of the fragility and transience of all earthly things. Politian is the first poet of mod. times whose subject is poetry; a poet's poet, he saw lit. as the essence of life.

Composed during the last two decades of the century, the Arcadia of Jacopo Sannazaro (1458?–1530), a mixture of prose tales and *pastoral songs, has enjoyed great fortune over the years, cyclically renewed and, in a way, enduring into our own times of recurrent ecological lamentation. "Antimetropolitan" yearnings (anachronistic already at inception) for a nonexistent rural simplicity, together with the immemorial myth of a lost Golden Age, inspire this early environmental manifesto.

IV. Cinquecento: The 1500s. The Rinascimento, the It. Ren., is the age of artistic and literary splendor between the age of humanism and the advent of *baroque. Its poetic practice is pervaded by the heritage of the Trecento, esp. Petrarch (Dante was considered a "primitive" by this age of refinement), filtered through the classicism that prevailed in the 15th c. The Rinascimento is the age of Petrarchism, an age not only of servile *imitation of the themes and style of the Canzoniere, not only the fashionable organization of one's poetic output into an ideal love story, but an adherence to the Platonic ideal of love and to the ling. ideal of purity, harmony, and elegance of expression, which later deteriorated into mere technical virtuosity. The patron saints of the Eur. 1500s were Petrarch and Plato; however, Aristotle's Poetics was also rediscovered and deeply, at times obsessively, studied—and in part misconstrued. The tenet of imitatio became paramount. Literary genres were rigidly codified, just as social behavior came to be governed by a code—its great documents are Baldassare Castiglione's Il Cortegiano (The Courtier, 1528) and Niccolò Machiavelli's Il Principe (The Prince, 1532). At the threshold of this great age stands the historically important but poetically insignificant Cardinal Pietro Bembo (1470–1547), friend of Lorenzo and Politian. Bembo, as codifier of Petrarchism and Platonism, is the embodiment of the Ren. His Rime (Poems) are little more than textbook examples to illustrate his theories, but his treatise, Prose della volgar lingua (Writing in the Vernacular, 1525), became something of a bible for the literati of the century. This inclusive codification of literary taste and ling. choice had a decisive influence on the diction of authors from Ludovico Ariosto to Torquato Tasso.

The essence of the Rinascimento is best revealed in the epic romance Orlando furioso (The Frenzy of Roland), whose author, one of the most likeable figures in the annals of It. lit., is Ludovico Ariosto (1474–1533). Ariosto's minor work illustrates the frustrations of a harried existence. His lyric poetry was inspired by his lifelong devotion to Alessandra Benucci, whom he married secretly so as not to forfeit ecclesiastical benefits. The seven Satire recount his travels and reflections. The last years of life were devoted to the definitive revision of his epic poem (pub. in 1532 in 46 canti). Orlando, 30 years in the making, pools the experience of the minor work, the warmth and immediacy of the love poetry, the detached and smiling wisdom of the Satire, and the character sketching of his theatrical pieces. The external occasion for the poem was Boiardo's unfinished Orlando innamorato: the Furioso completes the story, closely following its sources in the Carolingian epic cycle and the Celtic Arthurian legends in narrative detail but renewing the material with poetic license. This master storyteller holds hundreds of threads in hand at once and unerringly weaves them into an immense coherent tapestry. The great movers of the threefold plot are Ariosto's passions: first, love conceived as an earthy emotion, frankly sensual; second, the forms of knightly behavior and of court ritual; third, an insatiable appetite for adventure. Voltaire noted that Ariosto is always "superior" to his material: he tells his story "jokingly"—taking seriously and yet mocking his inventions: hence, the frequent authorial intrusions (comments, tongue-in-cheek explanations, ironic misdirection); hence, the fable-like and dreamy atmosphere around Ariosto's knights and ladies. Painstaking realism of detail fuses with an oneiric vagueness of context. The description of Atlante's castle and the invention of the lunar travels of Astolfo are emblematic of this attitude.

The form of the Orlando furioso is nothing short of prodigious. The octaves of *narrative poetry—woody and lagging in Boccaccio's youthful poems, prosily stammering in Pulci's Morgante, loosely dressing Boiardo's laborious inventions—coincide here, for the first time in It. poetry, with the "breathing" of author and reader. Ariosto lives in his octave, in the six (the alternately rhymed verses) plus two (the clinching couplet) pattern of his *strophe, each one a microcosm, in its perfectly controlled and yet wondrously airy architecture, of the entire magnificent construction.

Ariosto's Petrarchan love lyrics are undistinguished products of the age, similar to myriads of contemp. songbooks. Little talent emerges from the crowd of the Cinquecento petrarchisti. Monsignor Giovanni della Casa (1503–56), remembered for his Galateo (Book of Manners), shows a nostalgia for robust emotions and monumental imagery. Two women poets introduce a welcome variation in a field dominated by the stylized male psychology of emotions: Vittoria Colonna (1492–1547), of aristocratic family and patroness of artists, authored a conventional songbook; Gaspara Stampa (1523–54), probably of low social standing, occasionally allows life to show through her imitative verse. Even more creatively, the feverish and disordered rhythms of a passionate existence seem to influence her songs, which are suggestive of entries in a love diary.

Intimations of the incipient baroque taste have been detected in Luigi Tansillo (1510–68). His too-easy sonorities, abuse of color, predilection for horrid landscapes, and colloquial touch seem, indeed, to point toward Giambattista Marino. But more noteworthy than the lyric output of the age and its vast and forgotten epic feats (the best are Giangiorgio Trissino's L'Italia liberata dai Goti [Italy Freed from the Goths], Luigi Alamanni's Avarchide, and Bernardo Tasso's Amadigi) is its humorous or light verse. Two cultivators of this genre had vast influence throughout the following century. Francesco Berni (1498–1535), Tuscan refurbisher of Boiardo's epic, is the wellhead of the bernesco poem, still jokingly cultivated in Italy—a buffoonery of "sitcom" heavy on puns. Written in an irresistibly funny It. modeled on Lat. (or a Lat. bastardized by It.), the mock-heroic epic Baldus by Merlin Cocai (pseud. of the rebellious Benedictine monk Teofilo Folengo, 1491–1544) extends Pulci's Morgante by recounting the farcical adventures of Baldus, a descendant of Rinaldo.

The last great poetic voice of the Ren., Torquato Tasso (1544–95), is the spiritual forerunner of baroque poetics. Most likely inheriting a psychic disorder, he became distraught by the mental effort required to produce his masterwork, the epic Gerusalemme liberata (Jerusalem Delivered, 1581). Episodes of irrational behavior at the court of Ferrara and aimless excursions across the peninsula eventually led to Tasso's confinement for seven years in the dungeon asylum of Sant'Anna. Pirated eds. of his poem, attacks from pedantic critics, and obsessive religious doubts exacerbated his illness; he died in Rome. His minor work alone would be sufficient to give him a high rank among the Petrarchans and epic poets of his century. His nearly 2,000 lyrics (Rime) are a workshop in which the poet perfected techniques and experimented with sentimental situations; these are interspersed with lyrics of admirable invention and masterful execution, esp. his madrigals, a genre congenial to Tasso's evanescent moods. The Petrarchan model here appears at one remove, filtered through the Petrarchans of the early 1500s—Bembo, della Casa—as indeed Petrarch will be read through Tasso by the next generation of poets, Marino and his school. The chivalric poem Rinaldo (12 canti of ottave) betrays the adolescent's hand as well as features that will later govern the inspiration of his epic. Already here, the war chronicle of the sources is constantly squeezed out by courtly love. Tasso first favored the *idyll, and his pastoral play Aminta is rightly spoken of in the same breath with his lyric output: its theatrical pretext gives way to the emotional situations and flights of pathos in the Rime.

Whether La Gerusalemme liberata is the first full poetic manifestation of the incipient baroque age (some critics hold that the very terms baroque and Marinism are misnomers for "Tassism" and "Tassomania") or, inversely, the last bloom of the "sane" Rinascimento is an academic question; and interestingly, it parallels the great 17th-c. controversy (which engaged Galileo Galilei) on the relative worth of the two great narrative poems of the preceding age, those of Ariosto and Tasso. Tasso's epic, its pretext the last phase of the First Crusade, has a cast composed of both lifeless historical characters and fictive personae of the poet himself, each endowed with throbbing life. To Ariosto's objectivity, detachment, and *irony, Tasso opposes his subjectivity, participation, and sentimentality. All the great passionate characters of the oft-abandoned plot are facets of Tasso's psychic makeup, exhibiting the excesses and morbidity that landed their creator in Sant'Anna. The Gerusalemme is, in this sense, a truly autobiographical epos. Long traverses through Aristotle's poetics and the theory of the epic preceded and accompanied the feverish composition, but the rules reaffirmed were soon discarded by Tasso's more powerful sentimental inspiration. The Crusade cedes place to the multiple, strangely disturbed love stories of the variously and wrongly assorted couples. The whole is immersed in an overheated atmosphere of gratuitous heroism, white and black magic, cliffhangers cum heavenly intervention, duels to the death, and battle scenes of vast confusion. In the Orlando furioso, the good-natured "colloquial" voice of Ludovico the Amiable constantly tended to overdub the narrator, while in the Gerusalemme, Torquato's falsetto breaks through, fitfully as it were, to lend his creations a hundred diverse intonations of emotional disorder.

Tasso's ottava, ordered into obsessive parallelisms and chiastic contrasts, offers an ineffable musicality and a psychomimetic finesse never before heard. It is masterfully torn by the high drama of *enjambments. Indeed, Tasso addresses his poem to a new audience of a new age and sensibility, that of the Counter-Reformation, an age of earthshaking upheavals. This critical view allows us to reevaluate Tasso's reworking of Gerusalemme conquistata (Jerusalem Recovered), a text of vaster and more solemn architecture, characterized by a baroque heaviness of pace and expression and universally judged a complete failure until the late 20th c. The characteristics of Gerusalemme conquistata are in evidence in Tasso's late poem Il mondo creato, a ponderous account of the Creation similar in flavor to an overripe fruit.

V. Seicento: the 1600s. The 17th c., a Golden Age in the Spain of Luis de Góngora and Miguel de Cervantes, in the France of Jean Racine and Jean de La Fontaine, and in the England of the metaphysical poets, was long considered to have been an age of decadence in Italy. Its dominant Tassesque aesthetics certainly revealed the exhaustion of a long-mined vein, an exasperation of the drive for outward perfection yearned for by the Ren. The age frittered away its heritage in an obsessive search for originality and "marvels." Foreign (Sp.) and papal domination in the peninsula, the newborn religious dogmatism imposed by the Counter-Reformation, the general lowering of ethical standards owing perhaps to the riches from the New World, and the universal instability of ideas in this age of scientific revolution have all been indicated as causes for the alleged poetic aridity of the age. The baroque age in Italy adopted the ars poetica of the late Ren., developing Tasso's theories and example toward a concept of poetry as a nonrational activity, and it endorsed a view of literary production and appreciation based on *taste and feeling.

Giambattista Marino (1569–1625), a Neapolitan, became the high priest of the new school of writing usually called *Marinism (also Seicentismo, conceptism, and manierismo). He was the theorizer and the most prolific practitioner of the poetics of meraviglia (of astonishment—at all costs), a style in search of the arduous and the complex. A genre loved by Marino and the marinisti was poetry on art (e.g., his collection Galleria), a species of poetry feeding on itself (his Lira, [Lyrics]) and pillaging all preexistent lit.—as does Marino's masterpiece the Adone (Adonis), in almost every one of its 40,000 verses. The poem is truly a miracle of words growing on words and never managing to cover the void under them.

Among Marino's contemporaries, two poets sought independence from the master: Gabriello Chiabrera (1552–1638), whose *anacreontic songs are another "reading" of Tasso, and Alessandro Tassoni (1565–1635), remembered for his mock-heroic Secchia rapita (The Ravished Pail, 1622). The most notable recovery of late-20th-c. crit. is the poetry of the philosopher Tommaso Campanella (1568–1639), whose work closely parallels the metaphysical songs of John Donne, George Herbert, and Richard Crashaw (see METAPHYSICAL POETRY). This Calabrese monk suffered a monstrous fate, 30 years in prison (several years in the flooded underground dungeon of St. Elmo with hands and feet chained) for heresy and rebellion. Campanella's poems, owing to their forbidding complexity of concepts and diction, were judged by their rare readers almost devoid of interest. But today these canzoni, esp. the beautiful "Hymn to the Sun," composed in the depth of St. Elmo, strike us as the "missing link" in It. baroque poetry. In his translucent verses, the chained poet attains the lyrical height for which Marino always strove but rarely reached.

VI. Settecento: The 1700s. The latter half of the 1600s produced a general decadence in poetry. The antibaroque backlash came as a call to "return to nature," to observe the limits of good taste and common sense, and to renew imitatio and the cult of the classics. The adepts of this neoclassical revival congregated in the Academy of Arcadia (a loose association of literati, self-defined "shepherds"), founded in 1690 by Queen Christina of Sweden, then in exile in Rome. Arcadia promoted pastoral poetry, sobriety of lang., and faithfulness to trad., discarding the whole Marinist century to hark back to Sannazaro's Cinquecento. However, this school also became in turn the matrix of mediocre versifiers of derivative bucolic idylls. An intermittently genuine poetic voice is heard in the tenuous lyrics of the great libretto dramatist Metastasio (pseud. of Pietro Trapassi, 1698–1782), poet-in-residence for most of his life at the Hapsburg court in Vienna. His many melodramas (e.g., Didone abbandonata, Olimpiade, Demoofonte, and Demetrio) are deservedly famous. In his Canzonette (Songs), Metastasio introduced a facile sentimentalism and an evanescent lyricism that he, unlike his predecessors, couched in down-to-earth lang.

René Descartes' rationalism influenced practically all intellectual trends in 18th-c. Italy. The influence of the Fr. Encyclopedists—Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Denis Diderot—on the one hand and of the Ossian craze, with the nocturnal and sepulchral fashion it brought with it, on the other, became paramount. The first civic poet of Italy, the Lombard Giuseppe Parini (1729–99), represents the sober awakening of the age leading to the Fr. Revolution. A seriousness of ethical purpose and a sense of mission in his social crit. distinguish this Catholic priest, ed., and schoolteacher. Parini is remembered for his long and unfinished poem of bitter social comment, Il giorno, depicting one day in the life of a "giovin signore," a young man about town. The satire, ferociously allusive and resentful, and seldom attenuated by the smile of superior comprehension, seems at times shot through by a secret nostalgia for the world of fashion and elegance. Parini is the first in the hist. of It. poetry to have obtained from the "short" hendecasyllable effects vying with those of the flexible cl. hexameter.

The essence of pure poetry—as opposed to the practically ambitious engagé verse of Parini—is represented by the domineering figure of the preromantic playwright Vittorio Alfieri (1749–1803), scion of an old aristocratic family from Italy's Piedmont region. The first fruit of his illumination, the tragedy Cleopatra, was followed by a feverishly fertile decade of dramatic production (1776–86): 18 more tragedies, dramatic verse in dialogue form. The Alfierian hero, a pure revolutionary, acts out the abstract libertarian rebellion of the poet's soul, scornful of any pragmatic effort at real social progress. Alfieri's stay in Tuscany afforded him time to refine his Piedmontese, Frenchified ling. and cultural background. In Paris in 1789, he was at first wildly enthusiastic about, then bitterly disappointed in, the Fr. Revolution. In 1792, he escaped the Terror to spend his last years in Florence writing six comedies, his violent anti-Fr. Il misogallo (The Francophobe), and his celebrated Vita (Memoirs), with its relentlessly, almost breathlessly drawn portrait of the poet-hero.

Alfieri represents the Sturm und Drang* of It. poetry. His collection of lyrics (Rime) amounts to a spiritual autobiography of a soul tormented by dreams of immensity. The idealized and idolized figure of the poet, alone, in haughty solitude, looms large. The Petrarchan subtext of these poems signifies a return to the source; it is the manifestation of a genuine "elective affinity" rather than the obligatory imitation of an earlier century. However, the greatest lyric poetry of this "lion of Asti" is to be found in his tragedies, texts of a lyrical essentiality, of an elliptic diction, a barebones structure, and an unrelenting pace. By critical consensus, Alfieri's most acclaimed tragic pieces, Saul (1882) and Mirra (Myrrha, 1887), are staged poems on the *sublime.

VII. Ottocento: The 1800s. The Arcadian trend had sown the seeds of a rebirth of taste for cl. ideals of beauty. In Italy, these preromantic stirrings coincide with a short period of neoclassical predominance in art (Antonio Canova) and lit. concurrent with the Napoleonic age. The two movements, Arcadism of the late 1700s and *neoclassicism of the early 1800s, shared an attention to form, an aesthetics based on the renewed concept of the sublime, a taste for the genuine and primordial, and a purism in the medium of art. Ippolito Pindemonte (1735–1828), remembered for his Poesie campestri (Rustic Verses), and Vincenzo Monti (1754–1828) were the most coherent adepts of the new trend.

The poetic genius of the imperial intermezzo was Ugo Foscolo (1778–1827). His poetry fuses the classicist's love for perfection of form with the heritage of Parini and Alfieri and with Eur. *romanticism. Born of a Gr. mother on the Ionian island of Zante, Foscolo was, so to speak, a congenital classicist in his psychic makeup. His tempestuous age provided the background for a truly romantic curriculum of wars and turbulent loves. In 1802, he published Ultime lettere di Jacopo Ortis (Last Letters of Jacopo Ortis), an epistolary novel of love and suicide inspired by J. W. Goethe's Werther. Foscolo's 12 sonnets (among them the masterpieces "Alla Musa," "A Zacinto," "Alla sera," and "In morte del fratello Giovanni") and his two major *odes (1800–03) are perfect expressions of the cl. ideal implanted in a romantic soul. His principal claim to posthumous glory should have been the three-part hymn Le Grazie (The Graces), a vast corpus of *fragments composed over the course of 20 years. The immaterial lightness of diction and verse can only increase our regret at the structural sketchiness of the magnificent torso. Though 20th-c. exegesis, with its bias for the fragmentary, has rediscovered this great mass of poetic wreckage, attempts at a coherent reconstruction have not been wholly convincing. The entire experience of the poet's "life in art" is the true theme of the poem.

Foscolo remains best known for his "Dei sepolcri" (On Tombs, 1806), written in 295 blank verses. The theme, occasioned by the Napoleonic decree prohibiting burial within urban limits, is left behind, replaced by a poetic meditation on life and death, on the immemorial rites of burial, on fame surviving the tomb, and on the great men of the past and their sepulchers. The evocation of the nocturnal cemetery, the "triumph" in the Petrarchan sense of posthumous glory over death, the celebration of memory as a cenotaph to greatness, the motif of tears and consolation—all are close to the central topics of romanticism. In his "Sepolcri," Foscolo emerges as the "father of Italian romanticism."

The new mode of conceiving the human condition given by romanticism, with its components of Enlightenment rationalism and Restoration *historicism, with its taste for the unsophisticated and primordial, and with its repertory of lugubrious themes came of age in Italy in the 1820s. It. romantics, who first gathered around the Florentine periodical Conciliatore (1818–19), distinguished themselves from their fellows in Germany and England by their concern with the social and ethical role of lit. The Risorgimento (It. national "Resurgence," a movement that would result in 1860 in the birth of a unified mod. Italy) was an important factor, mainly through the educative influence of such protagonists as the patriot Giuseppe Mazzini (1805–72), the publicist Vincenzo Gioberti (1801–52), and the literary historian Francesco De Sanctis (1817–83).

The great models—Friedrich Schiller, Lord Byron, François-René de Chateaubriand, and Walter Scott—had only limited direct influence on literary works. The most conventional It. romantic poet, Giovanni Berchet (1783–1851), left a thin collection of songs and ballads, which is a veritable index of the items dear to Eur. romanticism. Berchet's theoretical Lettera semiseria (Semiserious Letter) had a lasting impact on the reception of romantic ideology. A more interesting figure is Niccolò Tommaseo (1802–74), the blind lexicographer and Dante scholar and author of lyric poetry of "cosmic nostalgia" and a prophetic tone. The bitterness of a bleak existence inspired the Tuscan Giuseppe Giusti (1809–50), who wrote poetry marked by sarcasm and despair. Alessandro Manzoni (1785–1873) is best known for his great novel I promessi sposi (The Betrothed); his verses are marginal products, but his five "Hymns" (1812–22), of deep religious inspiration, his commemorative poems, and the choral passages from his plays Carmagnola (1820) and Adelchi (1822) show the great novelist's precise diction as well as the characteristic undercurrent of I promessi sposi: compassion for the humble, the disinherited, and the marginal.

The realistic penchant of the romantic movement in Italy, its bias for the popular and immediate, favored the flowering of *dialect poetry. The traits of dialectal speech included a down-to-earth tone, a direct documenting of life, and a built-in smile owing to the use of dialectal variation as a vehicle of low humor. The two greatest It. dialect poets show a taste for the "slice of life," for a ready plebeian wit, and for the antiliterary spirit congenital to the realistic facet of romanticism. Carlo Porta (1775–1821) derived some of his inspiration from the decidedly nonpoetic contacts through his clerk's window in the Milan tax offices. His masterworks are versified novelle: the "disasters" of a semiderelict (the "Giovannin Bongee" stories), the "lamentations" of a poor street fiddler (bow-legged "Marchionn"), and the tale of a streetwalker ("Ninetta del Verzee"). Porta's laughter never becomes a sneer; behind his smile, one often senses the sadness of the wise. The encounter with Porta freed Giuseppe Gioacchino Belli (1791–1863) from his failed attempts at It. verse and opened up the dialect of the Roman plebs as inspiration. A minor cleric, Belli left behind about 2,000 sonnets (pub. in the 1880s) inspired by a violent anticlericalism, irreverent and often obscene. He too is a poet of metropolitan low-class life—vagrants and beggars, monks and spies, flunkeys and whores—with an infusion of prelates.

The greatest poet of mod. Italy, Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837) was born to an impoverished aristocratic family in Recanati. The poet's professed revulsion for his backward hometown and his disciplined upbringing (esp. the conservatism of his father) have been made much of in critical attempts to trace the roots of his cosmic pessimism. Young Giacomo spent his adolescence in obsessive studies, amassing an astonishing amount of writing: verses, plays, and learned (though all compilative) essays and treatises, almost blinding himself in the process. Though merely the products of a pedantic youth, the early works have been shown to contain the germ of Leopardi's later and most persistent leitmotif: the attraction to illusions and delusions, the heroic striving toward an abstract glory marking one's passage on earth (for Leopardi, humankind's only existence). These *motifs are recurrent in the immense notebook collection, the Zibaldone (1815–32). The clash of nature and reason, the dominant theme of the Enlightenment, was at first given by young Leopardi a Rousseauian solution (benign nature vs. the ills brought on by human reason), but the contrary prevails in his later work: hostile nature, a "stepmother" for humankind, undermines all human endeavors. The romantic elements influencing Leopardi's system underwent a characteristic transformation: the denial of the poet's social role (and the belief in *pure poetry, anticipating the "decadent" poetics to come), a materialistic worldview, a refusal of almost all nonlyric content, and a bias for the "pathetic" based on "immediacy" of feeling.

The concepts of "infinity" and "remembrance" are the cornerstones of Leopardi's best verse and are strongly present in his poetry until 1821, when the poet "escaped" from Recanati. "Rimembranze" (Recollections) and "Appressamento della morte" (Nearness of Death), written at age 18, experiment with fashionably lugubrious topics; a number of engagé compositions and poetic meditations show Leopardi's search for his poetic voice. He discovers it in the idyll "La Vita solitaria" (Life of Solitude) and esp. "La Sera del dì di festa" (Sunday Night). The tension is maintained through the whole (short) poem in the admirable "Alla luna" ("To the Moon"); however, "L'Infinito" ("The Infinite"), a poem of a mere 15 lines written before the poet's flight from his family, is universally recognized as his masterwork—it is, with Dante's "Tanto gentile," the most renowned It. lyric. Its contents are of a lightness and evanescence that elude paraphrase. Its last line with its sign of cupio dissolvi (the "sweetness of shipwreck") ties Leopardi to such key texts of mod. poetry as Arthur Rimbaud's "Le Bateau ivre" and Stéphane Mallarmé's "Brise marine."

The years 1822–28, a period of uneasy independence interrupted by desperate returns to Recanati, mark an intermission in Leopardi's poetry. He fitfully produced the Operette morali (Little Moral Exercises, 1824), pensive and ironic dialogues on ontological questions, in this pause, a gathering of strength before his second creative period (ca. 1828–30), an economically forced return to Recanati for 16 months of ennui. The cosmic meditation of "Canto notturno" (Nocturne of a Nomadic Shepherd in Asia) is "one of the supreme mod. songs of existential anguish" (Perella, in Bondanella). "A Silvia" (written in Pisa, "perhaps the most poignant elegy in the Italian language"), "Le Ricordanze" (Memories), and "Il Sabato del villaggio" (Saturday in the Village) are the most characteristically Leopardian texts in his collection of Canti (1831), with their tone of thoughtful melancholy and disconsolate contemplation of the nullity of all things under the empty heavens. The elegy "La Quiete dopo la tempesta" (The Calm after the Storm) looks for happiness in death.

Leopardi lived to see his Canti published in a definitive ed. in 1836. Their themes have a common denominator: the loss of dreams—of youth, of happiness, of heroic existence—a loss restated with calm despair in the cruel light of cold and godless reality. The meter is a kind of early *free verse: discarding the strophic models of the past, Leopardi relied on a loose rhythm, now expanded freely, now suddenly restrained. While the incisive "A se stesso" (To Himself) is a pitiless spiritual self-portrait, the poet facing his bleak universe and murmuring his final renunciation, the late elegies "Amore e morte" (Love and Death) and "Tramonto della luna" (Moon Setting), as well as his last poem, "La ginestra" (The Desert Flower), seem to be not only the conclusion of an experience but a hint at another incipient search for new directions.

The reaction to the excesses of romanticism, such as the lachrymose sentimentalism of the Prati-Aleardi school, took place in Italy under a double flag, *realism and classicism. On the one hand, the call for a return to the sanity of everyday life as the master theme of literary *mimesis was spread by a largely Lombard group of poets known as Scapigliati (the unkempt ones)—a movement parallel to the Fr. Bohème. The salient figures of the movement, the Boito brothers, Camillo (1836–1914) and Arrigo (1842–1918, also remembered for his librettos); Emilio Praga (1839–75); and Carlo Dossi (1849–1910) professed an ars poetica based on the "slice of life." For the most part, they produced "little proses in verse," unwittingly turning upside down Charles Baudelaire's ambition of petites poèmes en prose.

The classicists' reaction, on the other hand, to the romantic mania for *originality had at first a rather ineffectual leader in Giacomo Zanella (1820–88), who revived the minor neoclassical trad. of Monti and Pindemonte, a trend largely exhausted by mid-century. The heritage of classicism in Alfieri and Foscolo, and even in the young "civic" Leopardi, was pressed into the service of antiromanticism by Giosuè Carducci (1835–1907), a poet of vast authority who was the uncontested focal point of It. fin de siècle poetry. Carducci attempted to confer dignity and discipline on a field that, by his maturity, had lost or refused both. Carducci, chair of It. at Bologna, was "the last great literatus" Italy had. His professed ideal of a "sane, virile, strong-willed" lit. has lost most of its appeal in mod. times; his reclaiming for the poet the immemorial function of vates* has an archaic flavor. His lyric production in traditional form appeared in the collections Levia gravia (Light and Heavy, 1861–71), Giambi ed epodi (Iambs and Epodes, 1867–69), and Rime nuove (New Verses, 1861–87). Carducci believed in the possibility of transplanting Greco-Lat. metrics into It. versification; while probably overrated as a prosodic experiment, it makes an interesting curiosum out of his most discussed volume, Odi barbare (Barbaric Odes, 1877–89).

VIII. Novecento: The 1900s. Currents as diverse as positivism and *decadence, the Voce and the Ronda groups, the Twilight poets and the futurists, *hermeticism and neorealism not only coexist but in retrospect appear to be interdependent elements of the same whole. Two monumental figures, Gabriele D'Annunzio and Giovanni Pascoli, preface and condition contemp. poetry; neither strictly belongs to a "school," but each recapitulates and anticipates several.

Carducci today appears firmly rooted in the century of Leopardi and Manzoni, while the poetry of Giovanni Pascoli (1855–1912), his successor at Bologna, stretches far into our own. Some of his best-known pieces from Poemetti (1897) and Canti di Castelvecchio (1903) most surely have been swept away by the tears shed over them (e.g., "Cavallina storna" [The Dappled-Gray Pony], memorized by generations of schoolchildren). But his thin first collection, Myricae (1891), remains the cornerstone of mod. It. poetry. The title "Tamarisks" hints at the "lowly shrubs" of the fourth eclogue, but this "last descendant of Virgil" is not merely a poet of simple rustic scenes, as his themes seem to suggest. His quaint syntax and vocabulary, invasive *onomatopoeia, dialect and Lat. words, and exotic and technical terms, e.g., signal the complexity underlying his deceptively simple landscapes. Pascoli's interest never fixes on the positive spectacle of human labor in the fields; his rural tableaux radiate a mysterious feeling, an almost religious stupor. A pattern in Pascoli's constructions may be discerned: a rural view is sketched out by broad brush strokes, then filtered and "undefined" through some optical disturbance: haze, mist, fog. A minimal sign of life appears, slowed at once almost to a standstill. The *cadence remains "the beating of his own heart" (Garofalo, in Bondanella)—though with the constant sinking feeling of skipped beats. At last, a tiny acoustic element is added to the landscape—the chirping of a bird, the rustle of leaves, a snatch of faraway singing. That is all, but the whole remains miraculously suspenseful, suggestive not of something "else" but of itself. Even the most allegorical-seeming texts of Pascoli—e.g., his best poemetti, "Il vischio" (Mistletoe) and "Digitale purpurea" (Foxglove)—suggest, rather than a meaning, an abstract horror, a visionary experience of evil. The tragedy of Pascoli's life, the unsolved murder of his father in 1867, fixed his poetic age at 12: there is a sense of bewildered wonder in front of an uncomprehended world, the urge to escape, the need for refuge—a need he soon identified with poetry. In the poet's psyche, the unknown assassin assumes the features of humankind, driven on by the eternal enigma of evil. In an 1897 essay, "Il fanciullino" (The Child), Pascoli shaped this very concept into an ars poetica.

If Pascoli's "life in art" had few events, D'Annunzio (1863–1938) construed his life as a work of art. A cross between Friedrich Nietzsche's "superman" and J. K. Huysman's Des Esseintes (À rebours, 1884), he was the last vates of It. lit. "More a rhetorician than poet" (Sapegno), a "dilettante di sensazioni" (Croce), D'Annunzio titled his mature collection Laudi (1903–4). Composed of three parts, Maia, Electra, and Alcyone, it is a laus vitae, a celebration of life, in which he seems intoxicated by his own exultation. His extraordinary imitative skill fills his writing with disparate echoes: some from the Fr. and Eng. Parnassians (see PARNASSIANISM) and *Pre-Raphaelites, some deliberate impersonations of stilnovo and OF masters. This mimetic bent reflects D'Annunzio's principal characteristic, the musicality of his verse. The best of D'Annunzio is often his most extreme: poems in which the thematic pretext is at its baroque flimsiest and the text a polyphony, as in "La pioggia nel pineto" (Rain on the Pine Trees).

In a 1910 article ("Poets on the Wane," in De Bernardi) Borgese defined as crepuscolari a group of young poets whose cult of quotidian themes and slipshod expression seemed to signal the end of a great lyric trad. The term took root without its negative connotation and denotes a tone shared by most verse published in the decade preceding World War I. Not a formal school, Waning Poetry was as much a derivation from as a reaction to Pascoli's mystic rusticism and D'Annunzio's pompous alexandrinism. Poesie scrittie col lapis (Poems Written with a Pencil) by Marino Moretti, Armonie in grigio et in silenzio (Harmonies in Gray and Silence) by Corrado Govoni, Piccolo libro inutile (Useless Booklet) by Sergio Corazzini—the very titles of these slim volumes announce deliberate colorlessness and monotony, everyday emotions about banal objects. The most versatile member of the group was Corrado Govoni (1884–1965), who later became a futurist. Dying at 20, a consumptive Sergio Corazzini (1886–1907) declined the title of poet for that of a "weeping child" who "knows nothing but how to die." Two poets of the first rank are customarily included here: Aldo Palazzeschi (1885–1974) exceeds all labeling and warrants treatment apart; Guido Gozzano (1883–1916) survived tuberculosis long enough to see the success of his Colloqui (1911). Gozzano's mild irony blends with his mild yearning.

Historically, "crepuscularism" and *futurism rise from the same impulse, the need to escape D'Annunzio's dominance and Pascoli's classicism. Futurism burst on the scene with the 1909 *manifesto of F. T. Marinetti (1887–1944). Marinetti trumpeted activism at all costs, adventure and aggression, speed and the triumph of the machine, destruction of the past, war as the "hygiene" of hist., and scorn for women and sentiment. The very scope of its ludicrous claims killed the school; after its disintegration (1915), however, futurism was adopted by National Socialism, Marinetti becoming a sort of poet laureate of the regime. Still, Marinetti's poetics had a vast and, on the whole, salutary influence. His main thesis—simultaneity of impression and expression (hence, fusion of object and image)—influenced Guillaume Apollinaire's *calligrammes, *Dada, *cubism, and Vladimir Mayakovsky. In Italy, futurism's best adherents soon developed in different directions, turning against its ontological claims (Gian Pietro Lucini, Ardengo Soffici [1879–1964]) or deriving from its libertarian impulse a ludic concept of poetry (Govoni, Palazzeschi).

Gian Pietro Lucini (1867–1914), between his early Parnassian sonnets and his late antifuturist stance, published his theory of free verse in Marinetti's review ("Poesia," 1908) and then his Revolverate (Gunshots, 1909). Resistance to time attests to the greatness of Palazzeschi, a much appreciated novelist. The production of his "poetic" decade (1905–15) differs from the humorless declamation of mainline futurists. Its wit and charm are seen in his celebrated phonomimetic "Fontana malata" (Ailing Fountain). His "L'incendiario" (The Arsonist) records the urge to break with trad.—without the obsessive need for activism or ling. anarchy.

A flourishing literary culture in the years preceding World War I gave rise to a number of periodicals, many of them Florentine. The most influential, La voce (1908–13), was directed by Giuseppe Prezzolini (1882–1982), who gathered together a heterogeneous group of collaborators. La voce became associated with nearly all the trends in vogue during its run. It offered a first forum to the best-known autochthonous poetic movement in 20th-c. Italy, later called hermeticism*. The forefather of this novel trobar clus, Dino Campana (1885–1932), came to notice after the "school" had gained notoriety with Giuseppe Ungaretti and Eugenio Montale. Campana is often compared to Rimbaud and Georg Trakl for his aimless wanderings over the world, interrupted only by his stays in mental asylums (he was permanently committed in 1918), and for his poetics of total faith in the magic of the word. The Canti orfici (1914) refer to Orpheus: here poetry is a descent into hell and a religion for initiates.

Two other influential poets who matured in the La voce context produced poetry in a vein related to Campana's. The existential adventure of Clemente Rébora (1885–1957), not less erratic than Campana's, took place all within, as a lifelong struggle with his own soul and a periodically despairing search for superior truth. Rébora's only inspiration is his need to find the all-encompassing word. His aptly titled Frammenti lirici (1913) and Canti anonimi (1922) record in their daring analogies, in Rébora's characteristic "imagine tesa" (taut imagery), a "sort of transcendental autobiography" of powerful originality (Contini). Camillo Sbárbaro (1888–1967) sang the "monotonous recurrence of indifferent life," withdrawing from the bustle into his private drama, in Resine (Amberdrops, 1911) and Pianissimo (1914).

The review La ronda (1919–23) welcomed the voices of reaction to the cult of originality in prewar poetry. Its founder, Vincenzo Cardarelli (1887–1959), advocated a return to the classics (esp. Leopardi and Manzoni), i.e., to syntax, logic, and immediate comprehension. The progress of hermetic poetry, supported by parallel trends abroad among the Fr. and also in T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound, proved irresistible. Its principal exponents are less typical of its program than its lesser adepts (Salvatore Quasimodo [1901–68], Alphonso Gatto [1909–76], Mario Luzi [1914–2005], Leonard Sinisgalli [1908–81], Vittorio Sereni [1913–83]). All share the quasi-mystical concept of "poetry as life," as a magic formula capable of revealing, under the semblances of this phenomenal world, "universal reality" (Manacorda).

Giuseppe Ungaretti (1888–1970) will be long appreciated for his prosodic innovation, based on the lesson of Rimbaud's Illuminations and Mallarmé's Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice). Fragmenting the vers libre* of his futurist beginnings, Ungaretti eliminated punctuation and transformed poetic diction into a series of fragments lit up by intermittent floodlights. His first book of verse, Allegria (1916; repub. in 1923 with a preface by Benito Mussolini) remains the overture to a new phase of It. poetry. The title of his collected poems, Vita d'un uomo (A Man's Life), points to his dominant theme, the sublimation of his experiences, though these, esp. in the verse of the 1930s and 1940s, at times remain untranslated into poetry.

Eugenio Montale (1896–1981) may well be perceived as the true heir to Pascoli. His poetry is Pascolian in its resignedly hopeless scrutiny of the "ontological mystery," its vague desire for an escape route from the male di vivere (both "pain of life" and "evil of living"), for a "broken seam / in the net that constrains us." Pascolian, too, is Montale's characteristic of transforming emotion into landscape. Pascolian is, in his epoch-making Ossi di seppia (Cuttlefish Bones, 1925), Montale's metaphysical and baroque mythmaking, soberly desolate as it is. Much has been made of the political texts by antifascist Montale (from Occasioni, 1939, to Satura, 1971), endlessly deciphered by immense and often too-hermetic exegesis.

Variously related to hermeticism are four poets: Umberto Saba (1883–1957), Cesare Pavese (1908–50), Sandro Penna (1906–77), and Pier Paolo Pasolini (1922–75). Saba was in a sense prehermetic; his Canzoniere (Songbook) "reads as a 19th-century work" (Debenedetti). His simplicity and trite diction prompted critics to see in him an authentically popular poet. It slowed recognition and led Saba to publish a chronicle (1948) effectually advertising his own songbook. A typical motif is animal life related to human behavior. Pavese offered a model of antihermetic poetry in his realistic and matter-of-fact poesie-racconto (story-poems) in Lavorare stanca (Hard Labor, 1936), but the project failed both in this role and as a matrix of poetry.

"Hermetic" in a special sense ("coding" for this gay poet was a must), Penna's only topic is love, dolce pena, "cross and delight," "strange joy" (the last two are titles of collections). This "vigorous outsider" was also an ermetico in his refusal of easy legacies, in his ironclad rule of conciseness, and in his stenographic imagery. His best poems, always centered on his beloved ragazzi, are prodigies of a balanced moment suspended in timelessness. Everything is burned off in the white heat of the poet's dogged hammering at the "right word." Pasolini, the filmmaker whose 1957 Le ceneri di Gramsci (Gramsci's Ashes) is widely acknowledged as one of the most important collections of poetry published in the postwar period, had a different and more tragic purity of voice. Paroxysms of paradox interrupt his song. The popular brand of Marxism he professed never overcame his bourgeois values. Pasolini took idiosyncrasy for ideology: the pangs of libido appear in some of his purposely controversial and perhaps less enduring pieces as the stirrings of hist.

Around the critic Luciano Anceschi (1911–95) and his influential periodical Il Verri sprang into being the self-styled Gruppo 63 (so called from its founding meeting at Palermo in 1963). Three poets associated with it are likely to mark the last decades of the 20th c. with their names: Antonio Porta (1935–89), Andrea Zanzotto (1921–2011), and Edoardo Sanguineti (1930–2010). In their verse, the ling. revolution begun by Pascoli comes full circle; his weakening of the tie between signifier and signified reaches the final stage of divorce. The movement has been compared in its sound and fury to futurism; however, the poetry initially born out of and later in some cases opposed to Gruppo 63 is distinguished by a theoretical rigor unknown to Marinetti et al. Porta was first brought to critical notice by the collective volume I novissimi (1961). His poems reveal a strongly individual voice and have an eerie capacity to suggest, behind a deliberately gray diction, vast threatening conspiracies by unknown objects and persons. Porta went beyond his novissimi origins and alliances. Some critics distinguish his poetry as the first real novelty after hermeticism.

Zanzotto "joined" the group after the fact, as it were. His early collections—Dietro il paesaggio (Behind the Landscape, 1951), Elegia (1954), Vocativo (1957), and IX Ecloghe (1962)—are characterized by traditional form (Zanzotto even wrote Petrarchan sonnets, the only 20th-c. poet to do so outside of parody). Zanzotto's arcane Arcadia suggests spectral visitations, séances of literary ghost-evoking. Lang. acts here as a trance-inducing drug. New revolutionary techniques appear with La beltà (Beauty, 1968) and subsequent collections of ever-increasing textual complexity.

An original member of the Palermo group, Sanguineti had anticipated in his Laborintus (1956) its ideological and technical characteristics. A shocked Pavese refused to consider seriously Sanguineti's early samples, and Zanzotto later called them the "record of a nervous breakdown." Sense in Laborintus is replaced by obsessive *paronomasia. Sanguineti's collected poems, Segnalibro (Bookmark, 1982), and esp. his Novissimum Testamentum (1986), rank him with the best of contemp. Eur. poets.

Among the poets active in the second half of the 20th c., Franco Fortini (1917–94) and Paolo Volponi (1924–94), engagé writers of the older generation, deserve more than a summary listing, as well as Luciano Erba (1922–2010), Maria Luisa Spaziani (b. 1924), Giovanni Raboni (1932–2004), Dario Bellezza (1944–96), and Fabio Doplicher (1938–2003). Curiously, while the dialects of the peninsula had seemed doomed by 20th-c. mass education and media diffusion, poetry in dialect shows no sign of decadence. Among its practitioners, heirs to Meli, Porta, and Belli, were the first-rate poets Virgilio Giotti (1885–1957) and Giacomo Noventa (1898–1960). A generation of younger poets is gathered in the anthol. ed. by Giancarlo Pontiggia and Enzo Di Mauro, La parola innamorata (The Enamored Word, 1978): Maurizio Cucchi (b. 1945), Giuseppe Conte (b. 1945), Milo De Angelis (b. 1951), Valerio Magrelli (b. 1957), and Cesare Viviani (b. 1947).

See, ITALIAN PROSODY, RENAISSANCE POETICS, ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS.

■ Criticism; History, Specialized; Primary Texts: E. Underhill, Jacopone da Todi, Poet and Mystic (1919); E. Garin, Il Rinascimento italiano (1941); F. Flora, La poesia ermetica (1947); C. Calcaterra, Il Barocco in Arcadia (1950); A. Momigliano, Saggio sull' "Orlando Furioso" (1952); A. Bobbio, Parini (1954); A. Galletti, Il Novecento (1954); Marino e marinisti: opere scelte, ed. G. Getto, 2 v. (1954); Lirici del Settecento, ed. B. Maier (1960); Poeti del Duecento, ed. G. Contini, 2 v. (1960); A. Viscardi, Storia della letteratura italiana dalle origini al Rinascimento (1960); E. H. Wilkins, The Life of Petrarch (1961); Leopardi's Canti, trans. J. H. Whitfield (1962); G. Santangelo, Il secentismo (1962); M. Bishop, Petrarch and His World (1963); J. V. Mirollo, The Poet of the Marvelous: Giambattista Marino (1963); G. Petronio, Il Romanticismo (1963); A. Del Monte, Le origini (1964); B. Maier, Il Neoclassicismo (1964); G. Singh, Leopardi and the Theory of Poetry (1964); J. H. Whitfield, Giacomo Leopardi (1964); T. G. Bergin, Dante (1965); C. P. Brand, Torquato Tasso . . . and His Contribution to English Literature (1965); Complete Poems and Selected Letters of Michelangelo, trans. C. Gilbert (1965); G. Pozzi, La poesia italiana del Novecento (1965); Dante's Lyric Poetry, ed. K. Foster and P. Boyde (1967); M. Fubini, Ritratto dell'Alfieri (1967); G. Getto, L'interpretazione del Tasso (1967); G. Contini, Letteratura dell'Italia unita, 1861–1968 (1968); G. Manacorda, Storia della letteratura italiana contemporanea (1968); P. Nardi, La Scapigliatura (1968); W. Binni, Saggi alfieriani (1969); P. Dronke, The Medieval Lyric (1969); T. G. Bergin, Petrarch (1970); Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," trans. J. Tusiani (1970); Enciclopedia dantesca, ed. U. Bosco, 5 v. (1970–78); A. Vallone, Dante (1971); L. Anceschi, Le poetiche del Novecento in Italia (1973); M. Marti, Storia dello stil nuovo (1973); C. P. Brand, Ludovico Ariosto: A Preface to the "Orlando Furioso" (1974); G. Debenedetti, Poesia italiana del Novecento (1974); R. Griffin, Ludovico Ariosto (1974); Francis Petrarch Six Centuries Later: A Symposium, ed. A. Scaglione (1975); M. Fubini, "Arcadia e Illuminismo," Dal Muratori al Baretti (1975); A. Seroni, Il decadentismo (1975); Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," trans. B. Reynolds (1975–77); Petrarch's Lyric Poems, trans. R. M. Durling (1976); U. Bosco, Petrarca (1977); G. Getto, Carducci e Pascoli (1977); M. Fubini, Ugo Foscolo (1978); Il Novecento, ed. G. Grana, 10 v. (1980); The New Italian Poetry: 1945 to the Present, ed. and trans. L. R. Smith (1981)—bilingual anthol.; T. Barolini, Dante's Poets (1984); K. Foster, Petrarch (1984); U. Foscolo, Poesie e carmi, ed. F. Pagliai et al. (1985); C. Kleinhenz, The Early Italian Sonnet (1986); A. R. Ascoli, Ariosto's Bitter Harmony (1987); P. Hainsworth, Petrarch the Poet (1988); New Italian Poets, ed. D. Gioia and M. Palma (1991); Shearsmen of Sorts: Italian Poetry 1975–1993, ed. L. Ballerini (1992); S. Sturm-Maddox, Petrarch's Laurels (1992); Dante, Vita Nuova, Rime, ed. D. De Robertis and G. Contini (1995); Petrarch, The Canzoniere, trans. M. Musa (1996); Come leggere la poesia italiana del Novecento, ed. S. Carrai and F. Zambon (1997); L. Pulci, Morgante, trans. J. Tusiani (1998); Gruppo 63:

l'antologia, ed. N. Balestrini and A. Giuliani (2002); G. Pascoli, Poesie, ed. M. Pazzaglia (2002); M. Arcangeli, La Scapigliatura poetica Milanese e la poesia italiana fra Otto e Novecento (2003); Gruppo 63: critica e teoria, ed. R. Barilli and A. Guglielmi (2003); La poesia italiana del Novecento, ed. M. Bazzocchi and F. Curi (2003); N. Merola, Poesia italiana moderna: da Parini a D'Annunzio (2004); Dopo la lirica: poeti italiani 1960–2000, ed. E. Testa (2005); A. Manzoni, Le poesie, ed. V. Marucci (2005); La poesia italiana del secondo Novecento, ed. N. Merola (2006); S. Zatti, The Quest for Epic: From Ariosto to Tasso, trans. S. Hill (2006); Twentieth-Century Italian Poetry, ed. E. Ó Ceallacháin (2007); G. Leopardi, Canti, trans. J. G. Nichols (2008); An Anthology of Modern Italian Poetry in English Translation, ed. and trans. N. Condini (2009).

■ History, General: A. Momigliano, Storia della letteratura italiana (1936); F. Flora, Storia della letteratura italiana, 4 v. (1940–41); N. Sapegno, Compendio di storia della letteratura italiana, 3 v. (1954); J. H. Whitfield, A Short History of Italian Literature (1960); F. De Sanctis, History of Italian Literature (1870), trans. J. Redfern (1968); Storia della letteratura italiana, ed. E. Cecchi and N. Sapegno, v. 8–9 (1969); I classici italiani nella storia della critica, ed. W. Binni, 3 v. (1971–77); Dizionario critico della letteratura italiana, ed. V. Branca (1973); Wilkins; Orientamenti culturali: La Letteratura italiana: I maggiori, I–II; I minori, I–IV; Le correnti, I–II; I contemporanei, I–VI (1975–); Letteratura italiana, profilo storico, ed. I. De Bernardi et al., 3 v. (1980); M. Puppo, Manuale critico bibliografico per lo studio della letteratura italiana (1985); B. Croce, Essays on Literature and Literary Criticism (1972), ed. and trans. M. E. Moss (1990); Storia della civiltà letteraria italiana, ed. G. Bárberi Squarotti, F. Bruni, and U. Dotti (1990–96); Storia della letteratura italiana, ed. E. Malato (1995–); Dictionary of Italian Literature, ed. P. and J. C. Bondanella, rev. ed. (1996); Storia generale della letteratura italiana, ed. N. Borsellino and W. Pedullà (1999); Medieval Italy: An Encyclopedia, ed. C. Kleinhenz et al., 2 v. (2004); Encyclopedia of Italian Literary Studies, ed. G. Marrone et al., 2 v. (2007); Seventeenth-Century Italian Poets and Dramatists, ed. A. N. Mancini and G. P. Pierce (2008).

T. Wlassics; C. Kleinhenz; E. Livorni

ITHYPHALLIC (Gr., "erect phallus"). An iambotrochaic *colon of the form – ⏑ – ⏑ – x, which can be regarded as the remainder of a catalectic iambic *trimeter after the *caesura after the second *anceps. According to the scholia to the ancient metrist Hephaestion, the ithyphallic received its name from its use in the procession of the phallos at the festival of Dionysus (cf. Aristophanes, Acharnians). It is often used as a colon or a closing element (*clausula) in the iambic songs in Gr. drama (see DACTYLO-EPITRITE); in Aristophanes' Wasps (248–72), it is used with a colon consisting of an iambic *dimeter. It is also used in the *epodes of Archilochus and the epodic forms Horace derived from him. An ithyphallic of the form – x – x – – is often used by Plautus with *cretics (– ⏑ –), and sometimes it is used as a clausula in a short cretic system (Pseudolus 921) or together with iambic quaternarii (Curculio 103–04).

■ W. M. Lindsay, Early Latin Verse (1922); Maas; C. Questa, Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto (1967); Dale; Halporn et al.; Snell; West.

J. W. Halporn

J

JAPAN, MODERN POETRY OF

I. Tanka
II. Haiku
III. Free Verse

While many mod. Japanese poets adapted traditional forms such as tanka (see WAKA) and haiku (see HAIKAI) in directions compatible with mod. concerns and interests, others cultivated mod. verse forms influenced by the West. The following traces the devel. of mod. tanka, mod. haiku, and mod. free verse.

I. Tanka. Mod. tanka began with an explosion of polemic stimulated by the introduction of new literary forms and ideas that accompanied the opening of Japan to the world in the mid-19th c. A tanka is simply a different name for the waka, a term dating back to the beginning of the genre, meaning a short poem written in a fixed pattern of 5-7-5-7-7 syllables, with various conventions relating to subject, vocabulary, and so on. In the closing years of the 19th c., both terms were used simultaneously to refer to the same verse genre, but the word tanka was preferred by poets who considered themselves reformers. Old-style tanka known as kyūha-waka had been dominated by the Outadokoro (Palace School) poets who were associated with courtier families and with the imperial family itself, which had authorized the establishment of the office of Palace Poetry in 1871. Opposed to the hidebound, moribund mode of expression favored by these poets, such young iconoclastic writers as Ochiai Naobumi (1861–1903), his pupil Yosano Tekkan (1873–1935), and Masaoka Shiki (1867–1902), better known as a haiku reformer but who also took up the banner of tanka renewal, wrote several critical essays arguing for tanka as high lit. open to the new intellectual currents from the West, rather than an exercise in trad. Tekkan's "Bōkoku no On" (Sounds Ruinous to the Country, 1895) and Shiki's "Utayomini atauru Sho" (Letters to a Tanka Poet, 1898) are typical of the attacks launched by reformers in their attempts to revivify tanka composition. A number of the reformers advocated the explicit linking of tanka to shintaishi (new-style verse), the new free-verse form imported from the West, esp. Tekkan who called for tanka to be renamed tanshi (short poems). In their efforts to dissolve the barriers hitherto existing between traditional modes of poetry like tanka and the new *free verse modeled on Western poetry, several of the reformist poets also composed free verse and prose to stake their claims for tanka as art. The first fruits of this new style of tanka came from poets associated with the Myōjō (Morning Star) magazine, above all from the brush of Yosano Akiko (1878–1942), the wife of Tekkan. Akiko's first tanka collection Midaregami (Tangled Hair, 1901) shocked the traditional tanka world with its daring, sensual poems openly celebrating female sexuality and its use of diction and imagery never seen before in tanka.

By 1910, literary naturalism had become all the rage in Japan and tanka poets moved variously to embrace a plainer, more naturalistic style of expression. By this time the leadership role in tanka composition had passed from poets associated with Myōjō to poets associated with the Araragi (Japanese Yew Tree) magazine. The most important poet of the period was Ishikawa Takuboku (1886–1912), who was originally linked to Myōjō. Takuboku's first tanka collection, Ichiaku no Suna (A Handful of Sand), was published in 1910 and focused in clear, limpid verse on the poet's sensibility: his existential loneliness and spiritual malaise. The following tanka by Takuboku, first pub. in 1909, is typical of his poetry:

Jinjō no odoke naramu ya	Not just a common buffoon
Naifu mochi shinu mane o suru	Knife in hand, faking suicide
Sono kao sono kao	That face that face

Takuboku popularized the fashion for writing tanka as a three-line verse (earlier it had been written in a single unbroken line), and his intensely personal angst amid the new, mighty metropolis of Tokyo captured legions of readers.

The leading poet of the Araragi coterie was Saitō Mokichi (1882–1953) who emerged as one of the greatest tanka poets of the 20th c. Trained as a psychiatrist, Saitō was originally attracted to modernist modes of writing imported from the West, although he eventually rejected modernist poetics in favor of a more traditional aesthetic (see MODERNISM). The greatest modernist poet of the prewar period was Maekawa Samio (1903–90), who originally came to attention because of his "proletarian" tanka, written in a free meter, that extolled left-wing activism. In 1930, Samio turned his back on his proletarian comrades with the publication of his first volume of tanka, Shokubutsusai (Botanical Revels). This collection of 574 tanka was imbued with the modernist poetics of writers like Jean Cocteau. Samio openly embraced Fr. surrealist techniques (see SURREALISM), as the following dislocatory verse from this volume demonstrates:

Toko no ma ni	In the alcove
Matsurarete aru	Placed on a pedestal
Waga kubi o	My head.
Utsutsu naraneba	Because this is not real
Naite miteishi	In tears I stared at it.

In 1926, the famous tanka poet Shaku Chōkū (better known as Orikuchi Shinobu, 1887–1953) had declared the tanka was well on the way to extinction. Samio's ri-poste in the form of modernist verse was itself criticized in Matsumura Eiichi's 1934 article titled "Tanka Sanbunka" (Prosifying Tanka), which took Samio as well as other poets like Mokichi to task for using foreign vocabulary in their verse (see XENOGLOSSIA). What actually brought tanka to the brink of extinction was World War II. The mass of xenophobic prowar tanka penned by Samio and Mokichi, and just about everybody else, led to a disastrous drop in artistic standards and provoked revulsion on the part of postwar poets against the tanka genre itself and its long association with Japanese trad. The first substantial attack on tanka appeared in May 1946. The critic Usui Yoshimi (1905–87), in an article titled "Tanka e no Ketsubetsu" (Farewell to Tanka), criticized tanka poets for their unquestioning support of the war and for the awful verse produced as a result. The philosopher Kuwabara Takeo (1904–88) followed up a like-minded attack on haiku with an article in January 1947, titled "Tanka no Unmei" (The Fate of Tanka), that argued the tanka form itself was unable to express the mod. world or the mod. spirit. Other attacks on tanka swiftly followed. This storm of crit. led to a loss of confidence among tanka poets esp. younger poets only beginning to come to notice. Established poets like Kondō Yoshimi (1913–2006) and Miya Shūji (1912–86) led the counterattack and revived tanka by composing verse simultaneously celebrating and criticizing the U.S. occupation, which lasted until the end of 1951. Poets such as these also attempted to document the war in their tanka, realistically and graphically expressing the emotions of the Japanese people.

Tsukamoto Kunio (1922–2005) was the leading avant-garde tanka poet in the immediate postwar period. Such tanka had been suppressed during wartime because of its connections to Western art and lit. Tsukamato sought to reestablish the literary credentials of tanka in the face of attacks on the genre itself by emphasizing the literary and artistic qualities of the genre. By the 1960s and 1970s, tanka had been restored to legitimacy as a literary art but the genre did not regain the prestige and influence that it had wielded before and during the war. Poets like Terayama Shūji (1935–83), who was also active as a free-verse poet and dramatist, wrote innovative and fresh tanka that in its use of free meter and subject seemed appropriate to the new age. Women tanka poets also occupied a larger part of the poetry scene than before. Baba Akiko (b. 1928) became a powerful presence from this period onward not only for the cl. elegance of her verse that hearkened back to the waka trad. but for her tanka crit. and scholarship. Tawara Machi (b. 1962) created a sensation with her debut volume Sarada Kinenbi (Salad Anniversary, 1987), which sold over a million copies and became the most successful tanka collection of the mod. era. Composed in simple colloquial diction, this collection told of the love affair of the young woman narrator, breaking completely with the more ornate style of older tanka still favored occasionally by mod. poets. A flood of similar collections followed, most of which imitated Machi's style. The 100-year debate over whether to compose tanka in colloquial rather than cl. lang. seemed by the 21st c. to have been won in favor of the former, with the success of Machi and her followers. But many amateur tanka poets prefer to cleave to older models of tanka; and as cl. waka are still widely read and also taught in schools, there seems little possibility that the cl. style will disappear altogether. In that respect, tanka still retains a sense of continuity with cl. waka poetry, linking the poetry of the present with the literary legacy of a past over a millennium in length.

II. Haiku. By the mid-19th c., haiku was trapped in a cultural discourse that saw the genre as something more than lit.; indeed, some schools of traditional haiku argued that haiku was not lit. at all but a unique expression of the Japanese spirit, something akin to religion. Such schools saw great haiku masters like Matsuo Bashō (1644–94) as spiritual gurus rather than excellent poets. On the other hand, haiku was composed by a host of ordinary people as a pastime or hobby expressing their personal feelings or simply documenting the events in their lives. This led to a crisis of legitimacy about whether haiku could actually be described as a serious literary art, a crisis that was exacerbated by the introduction of Western poetry and ideas that accompanied the opening of Japan to the world in the mid-19th c. (in some respects, the debate is still ongoing). By and large, serious haiku poets themselves did not share in this pessimism about the nature of the genre (arising primarily out of its extreme brevity, only 17 syllables in total), but a number of haiku poets felt the need to address the issue.

Masaoka Shiki, the most important haiku poet and reformer of the late 19th c., took up this issue in a series of essays pub. between 1889 and 1895 and argued not only that the haiku of his time was banal, nothing but *doggerel, but that Matsuo Bashō, the saint of haiku himself, wrote mostly rubbish. Shiki took the view that, for haiku to be considered as lit., it needed to be evaluated by literary criteria, not by extraliterary considerations that had elevated Bashō to sainthood and that maintained the moribund schools of traditional haiku of the day.

In the first few decades of the 20th c., Shiki's legacy was split into two schools or factions: one led by Kawahigashi Hekigotō (1873–1937), who advocated haiku written in a mod. free meter format, and the other led by Takahama Kyoshi (1874–1959), who defended the traditional diction of haiku with its fixed syllabic 5-7-5 pattern, season words, and fixed topical themes. Both poets claimed the mantle of Shiki's successor, and for most of the 20th c., the two schools continued to flourish independently. Hekigotō preferred to call his poems tanshi (short free verse), following some early tanka poets, rather than haiku. Among Kyoshi's followers, the names of Murakami Kijō (1865–1938) and Iida Dakotsu (1885–1962) are prominent. Both poets composed haiku along traditional, conservative lines, with a strong focus on nature and natural phenomena, incl. animals and insects. Hekigotō's free-verse school included radical poets like Ogiwara Seisensui (1884–1976), who did away with season words, for instance, and also Nakatsuka Ippekirō (1887–1946), whose poetry took haiku to a new depth of experimentation where the verse becomes almost abstract. The traditional school was centered on the magazine Hototogisu (Cuckoo) founded by Kyoshi. Kyoshi's preferred aesthetic was shasei (sketching from life) advocated by his master Shiki, but Kyoshi interpreted this in a more conservative manner, stressing how haiku should evoke past literary assocs. Although the Cuckoo school dominated prewar haiku circles, by the 1930s a number of poets had turned against its traditional aesthetic in favor of a more modernist style closer to the free-verse school. Mizuhara Shūōshi (1892–1981) and Yamaguchi Seishi (1901–94) led the charge. These two poets stressed musical rhythm and unconventional subjects, respectively. In the late 1920s and 1930s, a school of proletarian haiku emerged, based in Kyoto University, which stressed working-class topics. The poets in the Kyoto school achieved fame by being arrested in 1940 as "spies," presumably because of their left-wing sympathies.

During World War II, in common with tanka poets, haiku poets produced a prodigious quantity of prowar, xenophobic verse mostly devoid of literary merit, and this led to fierce attacks on the genre after the war's end. The Kyoto University philosopher Kuwabara Takeo's famous essay "Dainigeijutsuron—Gendai Haiku ni tsuite" (A Second-Class Art—On Contemporary Haiku), pub. in November 1946, argued that haiku was a mere craft, not lit. Kuwabara used the technique developed by the Brit. lit. critic I. A. Richards to ask a group of intellectuals to evaluate 15 haiku by various famous haiku poets and a few completely unknown amateurs. The result was that practically none of the intellectuals could tell the difference between the haiku "masterpieces" and the unknown works. Kuwabara's attack plunged the contemp. haiku world into despair and undermined many of the tenets of traditional haiku. Consequently, conventions relating to fixed topics, meter, and so forth were largely abandoned by postwar poets, who composed difficult, abstract verse close to the kind of free verse (shi) composed by various mod. poets. Two prominent postwar poets whose poetry can stand for this trend (at times their verse can be very demanding) and who were esp. celebrated for their literary skills are Nakamura Kusatao (1901–83) and Kaneko Tōta (b. 1919).

Contemp. haiku is notable for the large number of women poets now composing verse. Fujiki Kiyoko is an example of a poet who has become increasingly recognized as an important writer. Fujiki's first book of haiku appeared in 1934, and her wartime verse and erotic poetry have become esp. acclaimed. Her poetic trajectory parallels the practice of many contemp. female tanka poets who also write explicitly erotic verse. Kadokawa Haruki (b. 1942) is another important contemp. haiku poet. The heir to the Kadokawa publishing empire, he has also achieved success as a businessman, film director, and producer. Kadokawa has won many awards for his haiku, which treat a variety of themes in powerful, terse lang., incl. his 2004 collection about life in prison (he was jailed for possessing cocaine). The association between haiku and autobiographical themes seems inescapable given the brevity of the form and the long association of the genre with the life journeys of many famous poets. For this reason, haiku still retains a strong attraction for millions of amateurs who use haiku to record and explore their inner lives in workmanlike lang. with no particular ambition to imitate the austere beauty achieved by haiku masters.

III. Free Verse. Japanese free-verse poetry (shi) originally began from trans. of a group of mostly Eng. poems, which were collected into a single volume (also containing some original poetry), entitled Shintaishi Shō (A Collection of Poetry in the New Style, 1882). Three scholars translated these poems into Japanese, none of whom had any reputation as poets. The trans. poetry came from a variety of authors and included extracts from various of Shakespeare's plays and poetry by H. W. Longfellow; Charles Kingsley; Alfred, Lord Tennyson; and Thomas Gray. Many of the poems were translated into a 7-5 syllabic sequence based on the traditional meter of waka. Other influences helped shape the devel. of Japanese "new-style" verse: trans. of hymns, poetry composed in Chinese by Japanese poets (called kanshi in Japanese—the word for free verse, shi, arises from this; see CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN), trans. of Brit. military ballads, and songs for children written in simple colloquial Japanese. The chief difference between "new-style" verse and traditional genres of poetry like tanka and haiku was the length and structure of the poems: new-style verse could continue for many stanzas, unlike the exceedingly brief verse of trad. poetry, and did not necessarily follow the metrical structure of traditional genres of poetry. Shimazaki Tōson (1872–1943) was the first major poet to compose verse using the new style. He wrote four volumes of poetry between 1897 and 1904 (when his collected poetry appeared) before he abandoned poetry for fiction and subsequently achieved fame as a novelist. Tōson's musical, romantic verse used the diction of cl. Japanese to achieve a fresh yet elegant tone. He borrowed themes and imagery from cl. lit. as well as phrases from trans. of Western verse and hymns. His success spawned numerous imitators who followed their master in blending elements from cl. waka with themes taken from trans. of Western verse to produce new-style poetry that was pleasing to the ear but still managed to suggest something of the novelty of Western verse. A number of leading new-style poets like Yosano Akiko, Ishikawa Takuboku and Kitahara Hakushū (1885–1942) also wrote tanka, confirming that new-style verse was an intermediate or hybrid form bridging the gap between cl. poetry and free verse.

The first collection to be written entirely in free verse, defined here as poetry composed not in the 7-5 meter and using colloquial rather than cl. grammar, was Kawai Suimei's (1874–1965) volume Kiri (Mist), which was published in May 1910. However, another poet called Kawaji Ryūkō (1888–1959), who belonged to Kawai's circle, also wrote a celebrated volume of free verse, titled Robō no Hana (Wayside Flowers) that came out a mere three months later and is often cited as the first volume of free verse to appear in Japan. Kawai's poems are mostly *prose poems, and Kawaji's collection contains poetry first published in 1907, so this may explain the reason for Kawaji's prominence. Various manifestos arguing for free verse rather than new-style verse or traditional genres of poetry had already appeared, the earliest being Toyama Masakazu's (1848–1900) 1895 essay advocating a movement to write poetry using contemp. Japanese. Also, in 1892, the famous novelist Natsume Sōseki (1867–1916) issued a call for poetry to follow the example of Walt Whitman's free verse. The movement toward free verse had several consequences. A number of outstanding collections of free verse soon resulted, incl. Takamura Kōtarō's (1883–1956) Dōtei (The Journey, 1914); Hagiwara Sakutarō's (1886–1942) Tsuki ni Hoeru (Howling at the Moon, 1917); and Miyazawa Kenji's (1896–1933) Haru to Shura (Spring and Ashura, 1924). Many poets were reluctant to abandon the elegant beauty of cl. diction and continued to compose verse in a mixture of cl. and colloquial syntax or composed verse in both modes. E.g., Hagiwara's last collection Hyōtō (The Iceland, 1934) was written entirely in cl. Japanese, unlike the bulk of his earlier collections. Inspired by trans. of Paul Verlaine, Charles Baudelaire, and like-minded Fr. and Ger. symbolist poets, poets belonging to the Japanese symbolist school were esp. noteworthy for their mixture of cl. and colloquial. The two most prominent such poets were Susukida Kyūkin (1877–1945) and Kambara Ariake (1875–1952). Later poets inherited their mantle, most notably Murō Saisei (1889–1962) and Miyoshi Tatsuji (1900–64). Japanese modernist poetry also embraced free verse enthusiastically—avant-garde poets like the Dadaist Takahashi Shinkichi (1901–87; see DADA) and the surrealist poet Nishiwaki Junzaburō (1894–1982; see SURREALISM) produced powerful dislocatory collections. Takahashi's self-proclaimed Dadaist collection published in 1923 and Nishiwaki's 1933 collection Ambarvalia, which explored the landscape of Tokyo devastated by the 1922 earthquake using techniques developed during his stay in Europe, are both landmark works of poetry.

The advent of World War II inspired a vast outpouring of patriotic and xenophobic verse. After the war, many poets sought to conceal their wartime verse (generally marked by its lack of literary merit) by deleting such poetry from their later collections. In the 1950s and 1960s, the poet and critic Yoshimoto Takaaki (1924–2012) led the charge to expose the wartime writings of these poets as part of the resurgence of the Left (Yoshimoto was widely acknowledged as the leader of the Japanese New Left) in intellectual circles. Yoshimoto did have some sympathy for those poets who underwent a mea culpa and renounced their wartime writings, esp. the poet Takamura Kōtarō, whose verse he championed. The school of poets obsessed with the war and its aftermath has become known as the "postwar" school, although originally they were called the Arechi (Wasteland) group, after the name of the journal in which their poetry was published. These poets and their successors wrote only free verse, thus assuring the victory of this form over hybrid varieties of poetry incorporating cl. diction. Prominent among this group were Tamura Ryūichi (1923–98), Ayukawa Nobuo (1920–86), Kuroda Saburō (1918–80), and, later, Yoshimoto Takaaki. Their premise was that postwar Japan was a wasteland, virtually a colony of the U.S., so in order to write poetry it was necessary to take up issues such as the war and the suffering it entailed, as well as the legacy of the U.S. occupation. Women poets like Ibaragi Noriko (1926–2006) and Ishigaki Rin (1920–2004) who achieved prominence from the 1950s onward wrote verse with similar concerns but with a stronger focus on the role of women in daily life and society at large.

Opposing the "ideology" of this school, which dominated postwar poetry for a decade or more, was an eclectic group of poets united in very little save their concern with poetic lang. and its limits. Inheriting Nishiwaki's surrealist bent, Yoshioka Minoru (1919–90) dominated poetry circles in the 1950s and 1960s; his powerful style used the ambiguity and indeterminacy of lang. in a masterful way and captured the allegiance of many contemp. poets. His 1958 collection Sōryo (Monks) successfully imported the older, prewar modernist trad. into the postwar era. Other poets who were obsessed with lang.—so much so that later critics have called them the "language school"—include Suzuki Shiroyasu (b. 1935) and his successor Nejime Shōichi (b. 1948) who used poetry to transgress the accepted boundaries of decorum concerning sexuality and violence. Like Nejime, Tomioka Taeko (b. 1935) has gone on to a successful career as a novelist, but her poetry of the 1960s established a powerful precedent for women poets to follow, with her long, trademark monogatari (tale) poems—seemingly endless dialogues defamiliarizing gender, among much else. One of her successors, Isaka Yōko (b. 1949) has extended this technique to everyday life and achieved a solid reputation from the 1970s onward. Irisawa Yasuo (b. 1931) also explored the long "tale" poem, concentrating on Japanese trad. in his celebrated 1968 collection Waga Izumo Waga Chinkon (My Izumo, My Requiem), which could also be read as a parodic homage to T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land. Yoshimasu Gōzō (b. 1939) also works in this vein, reading his saga-style poetry aloud to receptive audiences who come to hear his famous oral performances. Shiraishi Kazuko (b. 1931) writes long poetry that seems as much utterances of a seer as anything else and has also been acclaimed by her peers for her achievements.

Tanikawa Shuntarō (b. 1931) has often been mentioned as a possible candidate for the Nobel Prize in Literature, a tribute to his extraordinary gifts as a poet. From his first collection Nijū Oku Kōnen no Kodoku (20 Billion Light Years of Loneliness, 1952) to his famous 1968 collection Tabi (Journeys) and his award-winning 1993 collection Seken Shirazu (The Naïf), his journey as a poet has traversed the entire half-century since the war. A master of verse form, Tanikawa has often experimented with rhymes and other complex metrical devices, exploring the beauty and pathos of everyday life in lang. as fresh as it is readable.

Poets since the 1970s have generally acknowledged Tanikawa's preeminence as a poet but often dispute his emphasis on audience-oriented *performance poetry, instead emphasizing poetry as conceptual art, a kind of abstract art marked by difficulty and indeterminancy. "Language" poets of the 1970s and 1980s like Arakawa Yōji (b. 1949) and Iijima Kōichi (b. 1930) have been succeeded by like-minded poets of a younger generation, most notably Inagawa Masato (b. 1949) and Hiraide Takashi (b. 1950). Itō Hiromi (b. 1955), now resident in the U.S. and active also as a novelist, was the quintessential feminist poet of the 1980s and 1990s, with volumes like Teritorii Ron II (On Territory 2, 1985) establishing her mastery of disruptive, *collage-style verse questioning gender and the self itself. Since the dawning of the 21st c., Japanese poets have moved more in the direction of *performance than abstract art, but the challenge of poetry competing in the crowded space of print publication, whether printed paper or cybertext, continually stimulates poets to go beyond recognized boundaries of lang. and convention to stake a claim for poetry as significant art.

■ M. Ueda, Modern Japanese Haiku (1976); J. Beichmann, Masaoka Shiki (1982); A. Heinrich, Fragments of Rainbows (1983); D. Keene, Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature in the Modern Era, v. 2 (1984); M. Saitō, Red Lights, trans. S. Shinoda and S. Goldstein (1989); An Anthology of Contemporary Japanese Poetry, ed. and trans. L. Morton (1993); Modern Japanese Tanka, trans. Makoto Ueda (1996); S. Shimaoka, Shi to wa Nanika (What Is Poetry?, 1998); J. Beichman, Embracing the Firebird (2002)—on Yosano Akiko; H. Kawana, Modan Toshi to Gendai Haiku (The Modern City and Contemporary Haiku, 2002); L. Morton, Modern Japanese Culture (2003); L. Morton, Modernism in Practice: An Introduction to Postwar Japanese Poetry (2004); Columbia Anthology of Modern Japanese Literature, ed. J. Rimer and V. Gessel, 2 vols. (2005–7); T. Saigusa, Shōwa Tanka no Seishinshi (A Spiritual History of Shōwa Tanka, 2005); N. Ōta, Nihon Kindai Tankashi no Kōchiku (The Construction of Modern Tanka History in Japanese, 2006).

L. Morton

JAPAN, POETRY OF. Japanese poetry has a recorded hist. of approximately 1,500 years, and the art has occupied a central position in the nation's cultural life. While the term Japanese poetry generally applies to verses in the vernacular, i.e., poetry in Japanese, it also refers in its most inclusive sense to poetry by Japanese, incl. that written in Chinese, which until mod. times was the lingua franca of East Asian literati. Vernacular poetry is called waka* (or yamato uta, Japanese poem or Japanese song) or simply uta (poem or song); poetry in Chinese by Japanese poets is called kanshi (see CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN), though that term is also used in Japan for Chinese poetry composed by Chinese. Many Japanese poets composed in both langs. When considered in the context of the geographical boundaries of the Japanese archipelago, the term poetry of Japan also includes other poetic trads., incl. those of the Ryūkyū Islands and the Ainu, which are beyond the scope of the discussion below.

The evolution of premod. Japanese vernacular poetry is characterized by shifting ratios of oral versus written expression, native inspiration versus foreign assimilation, public versus personal subject matter, "high" versus "low" topics, court versus plebeian poetic practice, ritual or political versus belletristic purpose, and conventionality versus originality. And yet it maintains certain consistencies throughout, the predominant one being the lyric *voice—the ostensibly personal expression of emotion. The premod. Japanese poet generally reserved more discursive or philosophical matters for poetry in Chinese (which, to be sure, also employed the lyric approach). The emotions expressed in vernacular poetry, furthermore, were inspired most importantly by the four seasons and by love, the latter often conveyed through metaphors drawn from nature. Other important topics were lamentation, travel, and congratulation. Though early song included various other topics, such as warfare, those considered appropriate for orthodox vernacular poetry generally came to be fixed early in the written hist. of the medium, as did acceptable treatments, images, and vocabulary. Although Japanese poetic practice could encompass original inspiration, it also placed great store on the conventional, esp. in public, multipoet settings where it might be more desirable to fit in than to stand out. After standardized poetic forms and meter coalesced from irregular preliterate songs, they too remained constant, nearly always being based on alternating segments of five and seven morae (see MORA). *Hypermetric or *hypometric segments sometimes occurred. Both short and long segments have an underlying four-beat rhythm, with the last beat of a short segment being a rest. Early Japanese poetry, most of which dates from the 7th and 8th cs. CE, includes the chōka (long poem) of an unfixed number (usually a few dozen) of alternating five- and seven-morae segments and two final segments of seven morae; the sedōka (head repeating poem) of 5-7-7-5-7-7 morae segments; the katauta (half poem) of 5-7-7 morae segments; the bussokusekika (Buddha's footstone poem) of 5-7-5-7-7-7 morae segments; and most notably the tanka (short poem) of 5-7-5-7-7 morae segments. The last of these became so popular in the ensuing Heian period (794–1185) that the term waka grew to be generally synonymous with it, and that is how it will be used below. The chōka came to be employed only infrequently, and the sedōka, katauta, and bussokusekika disappeared entirely. The 31-morae waka retained its creative vitality through the med. era (1185–1600), though as that era progressed, many of the finest poetic minds increasingly turned to linked verse (renga*), in which a group of poets alternately linked 17- and 14-morae poems into hundred-verse chains. But even linked-verse poets also composed waka. After the turn of the 17th c., orthodox waka was eclipsed in popularity by other poetic forms such as comic waka (kyōka), haikai* linked verse (haikai [no] renga or renku), and haiku (see below), though it continued to be widely composed.

The visual layout of a Japanese poem on the page is variable and not necessarily reflective of the 5-7 morae structure. It may be written in one or several lines or artfully arranged on a page decorated with colored underpainting. But no matter how it is recorded on paper, the oral qualities of vernacular Japanese poetry remain vital. These include *alliteration and *assonance, but generally not end rhyme, since the fact that nearly all morae in Japanese end with one of a small number of vowels makes rhyme altogether too facile.

Waka poetry also figured prominently in other literary genres, e.g., poem tales (utamonogatari, short narratives that hinge on a poem or poems), diaries and travel lit. (see JAPANESE POETIC DIARIES), prose fiction (monogatari, such as Genji monogatari [The Tale of Genji], ca. 1008 CE, which contains hundreds of waka poems), and drama (such as nō* plays). While poetic composition in Chinese was generally the domain of certain highly literate courtiers and clerics, mostly male, the ability to compose waka was for centuries a necessary polite accomplishment of all court men and women, being central to their education, social interaction, and self-definition. Therefore, unlike other Japanese literary arts such as the nō drama or monogatari recitation, Japanese court poetry was practitioner-oriented, its makers constituting its audience. This resulted in a very sophisticated level of reception and crit., and there remains an enormous body of theoretical and commentarial work (karon, literally, "treatise on Japanese poetry"; see JAPANESE POETICS). As the med. period progressed, Japanese poetry became an object of study and enjoyment among warriors and commoners, who likewise began to contribute to the corpus of anthols. and commentaries.

The hist. of Japanese poetry began before the advent of a Japanese writing system, with anonymous bards composing orally on concerns commonly held by the communities they served. These early vernacular songs were simple and declarative, and some of their basic topics, such as love, death, and travel, remained central to the vernacular poetic trad. thereafter, as did the tendency to express those topics against a backdrop of nature. They also dealt frequently with relations between gods and the human world, the border between poetry and religious ritual being porous. With the gradual acquisition of the Chinese writing system, the Japanese began to read Chinese poetry and prose, and the continental example thereafter provided an ever-growing resource through which—and against which—Japanese poetry developed. The 8th c. saw the compilation of the oldest extant anthols. of poetry by Japanese in Chinese (Kaifūsō [Florilegium of Cherished Airs], 751 CE) and in the vernacular (Man'yōshū*, Anthology of Ten Thousand Leaves; last dated poem, 759), both of which include verses of earlier origin. The approximately 4,500 poems in Man'yōshū bear witness to the transition during the 7th and 8th c. from early oral vernacular song to a rich and complex written vernacular poetic trad., in which anonymous and communal expression gave way to highly wrought works by named individuals who possessed a sense of historical poetic devel. Increasing courtly sinophilia produced three anthols. of kanshi in the early 9th c., but thereafter the vernacular voice resurfaced publicly in the first imperially sponsored collection of Japanese verse, Kokin wakashū (Anthology of Ancient and Recent Japanese Poetry [abbreviated Kokinshū*], 905), which established the basic orthodox lexicon, topics, and treatments for the subsequent 20 imperially commissioned anthols. (the last being Shinshoku kokin wakashū [New Continued Anthology of Ancient and Recent Japanese Poetry, 1439]), as well as the vast number of anthols. that poets privately compiled. The preface to Kokinshū is important for its expression of the character and desiderata of the native poetic idiom, notably the idea (itself borrowed from China) that poetry is essentially lyrical, that it "takes the human heart as seed, which burgeons forth in myriad words as leaves." This affective-expressive nexus characterizes the essence of the Japanese poetic medium. But even as it exploited certain approaches from Chinese verse of the Six Dynasties (222–589 CE), Kokinshū poetry rigorously excluded Sino-Japanese vocabulary and natural imagery not found in the archipelago. Orthodox waka retained this unadulterated native lexicon throughout the premod. era.

In the late Heian and med. periods, Japanese poetry became increasingly intertextual, expanding the boundaries of the 31-morae form through quotations from earlier waka. The eighth imperial poetic anthology, Shinkokin wakashū (or Shinkokinshū, New Anthology of Ancient and Recent Japanese Poetry, 1217), is emblematic of this shift. At this time as well, hereditary poetic houses developed, as did secret trads. that were handed down within those houses to buttress their authority. The tone of waka poetry became more melancholic and the Buddhist sense of evanescence more pronounced. This med. aesthetic of bittersweet beauty in perishability is also seen in the nō drama and tea culture, as well as in formal linked verse. Vast numbers of kanshi also continued to be composed, however, notably within the Zen establishment, and later among literati of the early mod. (Tokugawa or Edo) period (1600–1868).

But orthodox Japanese poetic composition was always paralleled by unconventional haikai forms that flouted the topical, thematic, and lexical strictures of formal work. During the social upheaval of the late med. period, such poetry came increasingly to be seen as its own legitimate poetic way, wherein Sino-Japanese vocabulary and aspects of daily life or bawdy humor could be celebrated, just as kyōgen comic plays came to coexist with the classic nō theater. Though the term haikai was also used in reference to unconventional waka, it was more frequently employed in the context of linked verse, and eventually the first verse of such sequences, the hokku, came to stand alone and later be termed haiku. Matsuo Bashō (1644–94), who became Japan's most famous premod. poet, participated in numerous haikai linked-verse sessions, and some hokku originally composed to initiate 36-verse sequences were later used alone in other contexts. But even as the short 17-morae form was coming into its own, the poet and fiction writer Ihara Saikaku (1642–93) was working in the other direction, single-handedly creating sequences of linked haikai that reached many hundreds of verses in length. Bashō also introduced poetic meter and techniques from haikai into his prose writing, creating a genre known as haibun*.

With the collapse of the Tokugawa shogunate and the restoration of ostensibly direct imperial rule under Emperor Meiji in 1868, the predominant foreign literary influences no longer entered from China but from Europe and the United States, and Japanese poets began experimenting with new forms (shintaishi) and new approaches such as *surrealism (see JAPAN, MODERN POETRY OF). While orthodox waka and composition in Chinese gradually declined in popularity, haiku remains widely practiced. Contemp. Japanese poets have also experimented with modernizing the waka through the use of new vocabulary and topics. Japanese poetry, which during the premod. period was almost entirely contained within the boundaries of the archipelago, has also begun to exert an influence outward, evidenced notably by the composition of haiku and linked verse in other langs.

■ Criticism and History: R. H. Brower and E. Miner, Japanese Court Poetry (1961); E. Miner, An Introduction to Japanese Court Poetry (1968); J. T. Rimer and R. E. Morrell, Guide to Japanese Poetry (1975); D. Keene, World within Walls: Japanese Literature of the Pre-Modern Era, 1600–1867 (1976); J. Konishi, A History of Japanese Literature, v. 1, trans. A. Gatten and N. Teele (1984), A History of Japanese Literature, v. 2, trans. A. Gatten (1986), A History of Japanese Literature, v. 3, trans. A. Gatten and M. Harbison (1991); H. C. McCullough, Brocade by Night: "Kokin Wakashu" and the Court Style in Japanese Classical Poetry (1985); Miner et al; M. Morris, "Waka in Form, Waka in History," HJAS 46.2 (1986); D. Keene, Seeds in the Heart: Japanese Literature from Earliest Times to the Late Sixteenth Century (1993); D. Keene, Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature of the Modern Era (1999); Medieval Japanese Writers, ed. S. D. Carter, v. 203 of Dictionary of Literary Biography (1999); K. Kawamoto, The Poetics of Japanese Verse, trans. S. Collington, K. Collins, and G. Heldt (2000).

■ Translations: Japanese Literature in Chinese, trans. B. Watson, 2 v. (1975–76); Songs of Gods, Songs of Humans: The Epic Tradition of the Ainu, trans. D. L. Philippi (1979); From the Country of Eight Islands: An Anthology of Japanese Poetry, trans. H. Sato and B. Watson (1981); Waiting for the Wind: Thirty-Six Poets of Japan's Late Medieval Age, trans. S. D. Carter (1989); C. Drake, "A Separate Perspective: Shamanic Songs of the Ryukyu Kingdom," HJAS 50:1 (1990); Classical Japanese Prose, trans. H. C. McCullough (1990); Classical Japanese Poetry, trans. S. D. Carter (1991); A Waka Anthology, Volume One, trans. E. A. Cranston (1993); Early Modern Japanese Literature: An Anthology, 1600–1900, ed. H. Shirane (2002); Dance of the Butterflies: Chinese Poetry from the Japanese Court Tradition, trans. J. N. Rabinovitch and T. R. Bradstock (2005); A Waka Anthology, Volume Two, trans. E. A. Cranston (2006); Traditional Japanese Literature, ed. H. Shirane (2007).

H. M. HORTON

JAPANESE LINKED VERSE. See RENGA.

JAPANESE POETIC DIARIES. The Eng. term Japanese poetic diaries translates no single term used with consistency across the hist. of "diaries" (niki, nikki; ki, kikō) in Japanese trad. The practice of keeping more or less dated or dateable records, in either cl. Japanese or Chinese, that include poetry texts of one or more genres was practiced among imperial court officials and the aristocratic elite of the Heian period (794–1185). It continued to flourish and evolve as a mode of cultural production that marries writing in prose with the collection and contextualization of poetry in many different forms serving various purposes throughout Japan's premod. hist. While the practice has never completely died out—examples can be found for Meiji (1868–1912) and later years as well—it no longer forms a main current of Japanese cultural production.

Poetic diaries that have survived from the early 10th c. point to the function of poetry—both native tanka or waka* (short verse in Japanese) and kanshi (verse in Chinese; see CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN)—as an important form of cultural capital in the shifting rivalries between members of the Fujiwara regental house and the imperial family (reigning sovereigns as well as still-active abdicated or "retired" ones). Diaries, as well as poetic collections (kashū or ie no shū) with more or less extended headnotes, were produced by members of all three groups: the regents' households as well as the entourages of sitting and abdicated emperors. The 10th-c. practice of diary keeping by writers associated with the Fujiwara and other aristocratic families provided a patrimony of precedents for future clan heads to consult. As Heldt has argued in The Pursuit of Harmony, it also may have implied—because it mimicked the practice of diary keeping that had been carried on by court officials historically within the imperial palace—a symbolic equivalence between the regental and the imperial households. Heldt reads Ki no Tsurayuki's Tosa nikki (The Tosa Diary, 935) within this context as the attempt of a middle-ranking courtier to engage or maintain patronage ties with the high aristocracy via the display of his own talents as a desirable member of the entourage of proxy poets, scribes, and calligraphers surrounding the regent's and its rivals' households. Others have called attention to the impact of male-authored "poetic diaries" (also sometimes labeled "poetic tales" [uta monogatari]) composed by writers associated with the Fujiwara regents throughout the 10th c., culminating in the well-known Kagerō nikki (The Gossamer Diary, after 974), a poetic diary by a secondary wife of Regent Fujiwara Kaneie (see Mostow).

The Kagerō nikki fits easily within a genealogy of Fujiwara cultural production. It narrates its author's 21 years of marriage to Fujiwara Kaneie, highlighting in part the amorous and poetic talents of Kaneie. Just as important, it displays the poetic skills of the diarist herself, a valuable member of Kaneie's extended household. Yet the complexity of the Kagerō nikki's prose and its apparent influence on poetic diaries by later aristocratic wives and ladies-in-waiting suggest the devel. of a differently configured set of motives, forms, and implied readers in the 11th c.

At the outset of her diary, the Kagerō author explicitly signals her engagement with the genre of fictional tales. She writes in opposition to the "empty words" of the old tales, she claims, "in the form of a memoir" for those who might ask about "the lives of the well -born." But in fact the rhetorical density of the Kagerō's narrative portions heralds the sophisticated intertexual play between diary and tale genres that will characterize a number of subsequent poetic diaries, most notably the Sarashina nikki (The Sarashina Diary, after 1058), and the Izumi Shikibu nikki (The Diary of Izumi Shikibu, late 11th c.?; see Sarra). Deliberate blurring of generic boundaries between poetic diaries and fictional narratives (tsukuri monogatari) by women from middle-ranking families is visible as late as Towazugatari (An Unrequested Tale, after 1306), the memoir of a lady-in-waiting who drew self-consciously on episodes from The Tale of Genji (ca. 1008) to craft a record of her life at court and her wanderings as a Buddhist nun. Poetic diaries by mid-Heian and Kamakura period women (1185–1336) often call attention to the diarist's talent in both poetry and prose narrative, with the increased emphasis on narrative implying perhaps the importance of imperial and high-aristocratic women as the diarists' primary audience.

With the establishment of the military government at Kamakura and the increased physical mobility of the literate elite throughout the Kamakura and Muromachi periods (1336–1573), the practice of writing poetic travel diaries (kikō) proliferated. These diaries include not only the traditional courtly waka but the med. genre of renga* (linked verse), and finally in the Tokugawa period (1600–1867) haikai* (comic linked verse) and haibun* (poetic prose), which the poet Matsuo Bashō (1644–94) brought to such ripeness. Med. and early mod. poetic diaries bespeak their authors' involvement in establishing or perpetuating their reputations as heads of poetic schools. Their intended readers were other poets and aspiring practitioners of poetry.

One rhetorical feature linking med. poetic travel diaries to each other as well as to earlier and later diaries is the trad. of utamakura (poetic toponyms) that informs many of them. An itinerary of actual sites conventionally associated with specific poetic images as far back as the Heian period or earlier provides a structural framework for many poetic travel diaries. Thus, when the poet-nun Abutsu visited Yatsuhashi on her journey to Kamakura, recorded in Izayoi nikki (Diary of the Waning Moon, ca. 1283), the poem she composed on the place/place-name deliberately echoes earlier poets' compositions on the same site. Each poem memorializing such sites records the moment at which the diarist's composition joins a poetic dialogue about the place that had been ongoing for centuries. Such poems were also understood to function as ritualized forms of greeting to the resident spirit or deity of the place. The early 17th c. saw the rise of print culture and the spread of literacy beyond the courtly and warrior elites. Along with these profound sociohistorical shifts, a new spirit of parody and linguistic play informs the practice of poetic diaries, as it does so many other early mod. cultural practices. Bashō's poetic diaries sometimes self-ironically record the bouts of performance anxiety that encounters with utamakura inspired in him. He famously laments his failure to produce a poem at Yoshino in Oi no kobumi (Rucksack Notebook, 1687). Although poems by Bashō are conspicuously absent in his account of his visit to Matsushima in Oku no hosomichi (Narrow Road to the Interior, 1689), with its rich Chinese-influenced parallel constructions and allusions, his prose description of the place is a tour de force of the new form of haibun he pioneered in this, his most famous poetic diary.

Bashō's poetry and poetic diaries ultimately found readers beyond Japan, becoming central texts in the 20th-c. cross-cultural trad. of haiku poetry first promoted by the imagistes, a group of Anglo-Am. modernist poets publishing under the leadership of Ezra Pound immediately before World War I (see IMAGISM). The influence of poetic diaries by Heian and early med. women writers has been similarly far-reaching. Canonized by mod. scholars of "national literature" in Japan, early Japanese "women's memoir literature" became a vital source of inspiration for Japanese women writers throughout the 20th c.

See JAPAN, POETRY OF.

■ The Izumi Shikibu Diary, trans. E. Cranston (1969); Lady Daibu's Poetic Memoirs, trans. P. Harries (1980); L. Miyake, "The Tosa Diary," The Woman's Hand, ed. P. Schalow and J. Walker (1996); H. Shirane, Traces of Dreams (1998); E. Sarra, Fictions of Femininity (1999); T. Suzuki, "Gender and Genre," Inventing the Classics, ed. H. Shirane and T. Suzuki (2000); M. Horton, Song in an Age of Discord (2002); The Journal of Sōchō, trans. M. Horton (2002); At the House of Gathered Leaves, trans. J. Mostow (2004); T. Yoda, Gender and National Literature (2004); J. Wallace, Objects of Discourse (2005); R. Kubukihara, "Aspects of Classical Japanese Travel Writing," spec. iss. of Review of Japanese Culture and Society 19 (2007); G. Heldt, The Pursuit of Harmony (2008).

E. SARRA

JAPANESE POETICS. Japanese poetics was shaped by the nature of poetic composition as a social practice among the Heian (794–1185) court aristocracy. The practice spread among the warriors and monks in the castle towns and temples of the med. age (1186–1600) and came to include merchants and commoners of the Edo period (1600–1868). Waka* or tanka, the five-line poem of 5-7-5-7-7 syllables, recorded since the early 8th c., remained the cl. genre, with earlier forms like the long poem (chōka) and later genres like renga* and haikai* (linked poetry) and hokku (or *haiku) being variations of it. This means that, apart from subtle historical changes, poetic lang. and themes remained largely the same, with the only revolutionary change occurring when the formerly barred Chinese loan words and daily-life vocabulary came to be included in the Edo period. The authors of poetic treatises were practicing poets themselves, and their readers were students or disciples who needed to acquire the art as a social skill, proof of their qualification as civilized persons. Many of the treatises were like textbooks devised for pedagogical purposes. They invariably included a brief hist. of the practice, usually tracing its primordial origins in the age of the gods as recorded in the first hist. books (Kojiki, 712; Nihongi, 720) or citing earliest examples from the first poetry anthol., the Man'yōshū* (ca. 759), and from the 21 imperial anthols. commissioned by successive emperors until 1433. Other sections would consist of long passages of citation of exemplary poems, often with critical comments; equally numerous were stories or anecdotes (utamonogatari, setsuwa) about the circumstances in which a poem was composed or about particular poets and their deep devotion to the art. A significant portion was devoted to practical instruction about poetic diction and techniques, such as the use of "pillow words" (makura kotoba), conventional epithets associated with particular words—e.g., "Izumo, of the rising eight-fold clouds" or "Nara, of the good blue earth"; the use of joshi or preface, a metaphorical intro. to the main statement of the poem; the technique of punning or double meaning (kakekotoba); and the deploying of word pairs linked by association (engo). There was from early on a penchant for numerical categories and classifications such as "the nine grades of waka" (waka kuhon) or "the six types of poetry" (rikugi)—they were useful for distinguishing among the countless riches of the accumulated archives—and always, in the endeavor to define the appeal of specific poems and styles, a nurturing of the aesthetic sensibility.

There were also treatises, however, that dealt with first-order questions such as the essential nature and function of poetry. The Kokinshū* Preface (905), written by Ki no Tsurayuki at the beginning of Japanese poetics, is a case in point:

> Japanese poetry has its seed in the human heart-mind [kokoro], which sprouts into a myriad leaves of words [koto no ha]. The person who lives in this world, faced with life's teeming events and circumstance, expresses what he feels in his heart through the medium of things visible and audible. Listen to the warbler crying among the flowers, the croaking of the frog dwelling in the waters—is there any among creatures vital and alive that does not break out in song? It is poetry that moves heaven and earth without the use of force, stirs to compassion the demons and deities invisible to the eye, harmonizes relations between men and women, and pacifies the heart of raging warriors.

As is often observed, this opening passage comprehends all the elements of a poetic performance: the world, the poet's inner response to it, the lang. he or she uses to communicate it, and the natural imagery that is its embodiment or figure. This is essentially a lyrical poetics: a poem is an effluence of the heart in response to being moved by experience; it comes into being as a natural process. Further, its primary method is imagistic *figuration. Finally, the Preface defines the social aspect of poetic function as persuasion without physical force, the pacific containment of violence, be it political or sexual. In sum, poetry is the quintessential art of civility, as confirmed by its social usages, whether in ritual ceremonies, banquets, or quotidian communication, or as the lang. for negotiating the complications of a private relationship.

The Kokinshū preface established the parameters of poetics on the twin concepts of the heart-mind and lang., or content and form, requiring a judicious balance between them. Its understanding of poetry as lyric was modified crucially by the leading Shinkokinshū* (1201) poets in the early med. period. Shunzei, in particular, redefined the poem as an impersonal symbolic construct of the true nature of reality as apprehended in the Tendai Buddhist philosophy of the three truths, i.e., phenomena apprehended according to three orders of understanding as (1) empty in lacking an inner unchanging core; (2) provisionally real in arising and disappearing according to mutable circumstance; and (3) middle or ambiguous in being beyond the dualism of the first two orders while encompassing them. In this new poetics, the process of composition is likened to meditation (shikan, literally, stillness and insight), and the poem is seen as the figuration of that deep and concentrated state of mind. Shunzei writes in Korai fūteishō (Poetic Styles from Antiquity to the Present, 1197, rev. 1201):

> In the opening passage of the work called Tendai shikan, there are these words written by Shōan Daishi: "The luminous tranquility of stillness and insight was yet unheard of in ages past." The very sound of these words, evoking limitless depths, fathoming a remotely inward significance, awesome and splendid, is like the good and bad in poetry, the endeavor to know its deep mind, difficult to convey in words; and yet it is precisely this analogy that enables us to comprehend it in the same way. . . .
>
> It is true that the one are golden words of Buddhist scripture, full of a deep truth, while the other seems to be but an idle game of empty words and fine phrases. And yet it manifests a profound significance in things and can be the circumstance which leads one to the Buddhist way. Moreover, because delusion is of itself wisdom, the Lotus Sutra says, "Properly explained, the secular classics . . . and the actions of mundane existence are all following the True Dharma." And the Fugenkan teaches, "What is the thing that is designated sinful, what designated fortunate? Neither sin nor fortune possesses a subject; the mind is of itself empty." Consequently, here also in speaking of the deep way of poetry, I draw upon its similarity to the three truths of the empty, the contingent, and the middle [kū.ke.chū no sandai] and write of it in the same terms.

The med. theory of a symbolic poetry produced an aesthetics of evocation manifest in the pursuit of such qualities as aura or overtones (omokage, yojō) and ineffable depth (yūgen), and the eschewing of clarity of meaning as banal.

In the treatise Sasamegoto (Murmured Conversations, 1463–64), the renga poet-monk Shinkei would found poetic process on discipline in the mind-ground (shinji shugyō) and describe the highest poetry as one that is "constituted solely of nuance," with no specific meaning to convey but with the power to evoke an experience of ultimate reality. Similarly, while maintaining impartiality as a general principle, he drew attention to the marvelous effects produced by soku (the distant link), as distinct from shinku (the close link), in the structure of waka and renga. Distant and close name the perceived space between the upper and lower parts of a waka or between any two contiguous verses in a linked poetry sequence. This mediate space will seem close when the poem's lines, being closely connected phonologically, syntactically, and semantically, constitute an integral unity, but distant when a *caesura divides the poem into two disparate parts and there is no overt semantic connection between them. Instead, the silent link demands to be intuited or interpreted by the audience.

The use of hidden or subtle linkages between verses in Bashō-school haikai of the Edo period, called variously nioi, fragrance, or hibiki, resonance, manifests the same preference and is similarly motivated by a desire to evoke the interpenetrability of all phenomena or the boundlessness of the mundane when seen through enlightened eyes. Haikai began as a rebellion against the extreme refinement of cl. renga and the proliferation of minute rules of composition in its late stages. Haikai reveled in the low and vulgar aspects of ordinary life, eschewed the pure Japanese of cl. poetic diction, and favored harsh-sounding Chinese compounds and nonsensical colloquial expressions. Edo poetics was divided between high and low, the refined and the vulgar (ga and zoku), and derived great amusement in the incongruous mixing of the two orders of social reality. But Bashō later tired of amusement for its own sake and succeeded, after much struggle, in elevating the mundane by giving it a sheen of numinosity learned from Taoism, Zen, and med. aesthetics, such that, to the poet, there is nothing that does not own its own unique beauty in the larger scheme of things. As he writes in Oi no kobumi (Rucksack Notebook, 1687):

> All art is one in nature, whether in Saigyō's waka, Sōgi's renga, Sesshū's painting, or Rikyū's tea. In matters of art, one follows the dynamic creativity of nature and makes a friend of the four seasons. The man of art sees nothing that is not a flower, longs for nothing but is a moon. Those who do not see flowers are like barbarians, those who do not long for the moon are akin to the birds and beasts. One must leave the barbarians and leave the company of beasts, constantly pursuing nature, always returning to the four seasons.

■ J. Konishi, "Association and Progression," HJAS 21 (1958); Fujiwara Teika's Superior Poems of Our Time, ed. and trans. R. H. Brower and E. Miner (1967); "The Mumyōshō of Kamo no Chōmei and Its Significance in Japanese Literature," trans. H. Katō, Monumenta Nipponica 23 (1968); E. Cranston, "Water Plant Imagery in Man'yōshū," HJAS 31 (1971); "Ex-Emperor Go-Toba's Secret Teachings," ed. and trans. R. H. Brower, HJAS 32 (1972); E. Cranston, "The River Valley as Locus Amoenus in Man'yō Poetry," Studies in Japanese Culture, ed. Japan P.E.N. Club (1973); W. LaFleur, "Saigyō and the Buddhist Value of Nature," History of Religions 13 (1973–74); E. Cranston, "The Dark Path: Images of Longing in Japanese Love Poetry," HJAS 35 (1975); J. Konishi, "The Art of Renga," Journal of Japanese Studies 21 (1975); "Rules for Poetic Elegance," trans. N. Teele, Monumenta Nipponica 31 (1976); E. Ramirez-Christensen, "The Essential Parameters of Linked Poetry," HJAS 41 (1981); S. Carter, "Rules, Rules, and More Rules: Shōhaku's Renga Rulebook of 1501," HJAS 43 (1983); W. LaFleur, The Karma of Words (1983); J. Wixted, "The Kokinshū Prefaces: Another Perspective," HJAS 43 (1983); On the Art of the Nō Drama: The Major Treatises of Zeami, trans. J. Rimer and M. Yamazaki (1984); "Fujiwara Teika's Maigetsushō," ed. and trans. R. H. Brower, Monumenta Nipponica 40 (1985); "Tamekanekyō Wakashō," trans. R. Huey and S. Matisoff, Monumenta Nipponica 40 (1985); M. Morris, "Waka and Form, Waka and History," HJAS 46 (1986); "The Foremost Style of Poetic Composition: Fujiwara Tameie's Eiga no Ittei," ed. and trans. R. H. Brower, Monumenta Nipponica 42 (1987); T. Ikeda, "Continuity and Discontinuity in Renga," Acta Asiatica 56 (1989); E. Miner, "Waka: Features of Its Constitution and Development," HJAS 50 (1990); J. Rabinovitch, "Wasp Waists and Monkey Tails," HJAS 51 (1991); I. Smits, "The Poem as a Painting: Landscape Poetry in Late Heian Japan," Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, 4th ser., 6 (1991); M. Ueda, Literary and Art Theories in Japan (1991); C. Drake, "The Collision of Traditions in Saikaku's Haikai," HJAS 52 (1992); M. Horton, "Renga Unbound," HJAS 53 (1993); D. Bialock, "Voice, Text, and the Question of Poetic Borrowing in Late Classical Japanese Poetry," HJAS 54 (1994); R. Bundy, "Santai Waka: Six Poems in Three Modes," Monumenta Nipponica 49 (1994); Conversations with Shōtetsu, ed. S. Carter, trans. R. Brower (1994); R. Raud, The Role of Poetry in Classical Japanese Literature (1994); C. Crowley, "Putting Makoto into Practice: Onitsura's Hitorigoto," Monumenta Nipponica 50 (1995); The Distant Isle, ed. T. Hare et al. (1996); E. Kamens, Utamakura, Allusion, and Intertextuality in Traditional Japanese Poetry (1997); K. Kawamoto, The Poetics of Japanese Verse (2000); S. Carter, "Chats with the Master: Selections from Kensai zōdan," Monumenta Nipponica 56 (2001); M. Meli, "'Aware' as a Critical Term in Classical Japanese Poetics," Japan Review 13 (2001); P. Qiu, "Aesthetic of Uncoventionality: Fūryū in Ikkyū's Poetry," Japanese Language and Literature 35 (2001); R. Huey, The Making of the Shinkokinshū (2002); S. Klein, Allegories of Desire (2002); P. Atkins, "The Demon-Quelling Style in Medieval Japanese Poetic and Dramatic Theory," Monumenta Nipponica 58 (2003); Japanese Poeticity and Narrativity Revisited, ed. E. Sekine (2003); R. Raud, "The Heian Literary System: A Tentative Model," Reading East Asian Writing, ed. M. Hockx and I. Smits (2003); Hermeneutical Strategies: Methods of Interpretation in the Study of Japanese Literature, ed. M. Marra (2004); K. Kimbrough, "Reading the Miraculous Powers of Japanese Poetry," Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 32 (2005); R. Bundy, "Solo Poetry Contest as Poetic Self-Portrait," Monumenta Nipponica 61 (2006); Matsuo Bashō's Poetic Spaces: Exploring Haikai Intersections, ed. E. Kerkham (2006); W. Denecke, "'Topic poetry is all ours': Poetic Composition on Chinese Lines in Early Heian Japan," HJAS 67 (2007); G. Heldt, The Pursuit of Harmony (2008); Literature and Literary Theory, ed. A. Ueda and R. Okada (2008); E. Ramirez-Christensen, Emptiness and Temporality (2008); Shinkei, Murmured Conversations, ed. and trans. E. Ramirez-Christensen (2008); R. Thomas, The Way of Shikishima (2008).

E. Ramirez-Christensen

JAVA, POETRY OF. See INDONESIAN POETRY.

JAZZ POETRY. The diverse range of instrumental and vocal music categorized as jazz (and its precursor and counterpart, blues*) functioned throughout much of the 20th c. as a colorful symbol, a structuring principle, and a totalizing—and tantalizing—trope for writers, filmmakers, visual artists, and even (when considering the age of art deco) architects. Jazz has greatly influenced other literary genres such as the novel (consider Ralph Ellison's treatment of Louis Armstrong in Invisible Man or Toni Morrison's *signifying on "The Trombone Blues" in the novel Jazz). Yet poetry is arguably the genre through which we can best see and hear how the divergent improvisatory stylizations of jazz aesthetics permeate America's literary and cultural landscape.

What would America be without jazz music? Less rhythmically complex and conceptually daring. What would Am. poetry be without jazz poetics? Less performatively vibrant and innovative. The invigorating, if originally contested, presence of jazz as the muse for a substantial body of Am. poetry can be traced back to the art form's emergence in the early 1920s. The revolutions of *modernism and the *Harlem Renaissance (also known as the New Negro Renaissance)—parallel and intersecting youth movements—marked shifts in *taste, culture, mood, art, and, of course, music that altered the content, form, and *performance of poetry. The devels. in jazz and the evolution of Am. poetry had related trajectories that were not lost on writers of the time. Other periods in which jazz poetry has flourished as a style and in performance were the eras of the *Beats and the *Black Arts movement, and, more recently, the New Renaissance movement in black writing from the 1990s to the present.

Jazz poems are animated esp. by the productive tension between what is written and what is spoken. They blur the boundaries between what is seen and what is heard. Yet do recitals of jazz-influenced poems remain consistent irrespective of the performance venue, or do they change over time and under different circumstances? Performance is central to jazz composition because improvisation produces innovation. The demands for improvised jazz poetic forms might require that each performed iteration of the poem be recognizably different from the previous one. In some instances, collaborative endeavors between poets and jazz musicians have produced compositions that, in live or recorded form, establish a new poetic work. Yet many poets deeply influenced by jazz tend to perform their verses without substantial changes, whether they perform with or without musical accompaniment. Moreover, requiring such continual variation would preclude an appreciation of other ways that improvisation enters jazz poetry at the moment of composition, a moment of performance on the page or the computer screen.

In the musico-cultural climate of the early 21st c., jazz music is typically associated with virtuosic performance, rigor, and sophistication. Thus, the quibble over whether verse alluding to or incorporating jazz aesthetics merits the label jazz poem reflects the creative prestige associated with this music. However, in part because the earliest venues for jazz (and ragtime—and blues for that matter) performances were often bordellos, after-hours juke joints, and cabarets, the music's association with sex and licentious or illicit behavior greatly influenced the less-than-enthusiastic response to poets, such as Langston Hughes, who used jazz early and often in their work. "To A Black Dancer in 'The Little Savoy,'" from Hughes's The Weary Blues (1926), e.g., isolates key corporeal features celebrating a dark "Wine-maiden / Of the Jazz-tuned night" whom Hughes apostrophizes: "Lips / Sweet as purple dew, / Breasts / Like the pillows of all sweet dreams . . ."

Hughes's contemporary Countee Cullen eschewed jazz poetry. In the February 1926 issue of Opportunity, in a review of The Weary Blues, Cullen questioned whether "jazz verse" could ever belong to "that dignified company, that select and austere circle of high literary expression which we call poetry" and regarded Hughes's "jazz poems as interlopers in the company of the truly beautiful poems in other sections of the book" (O'Meally). In fact, Hughes's response to Cullen and others such as the archetypal "Philadelphia clubwoman" representing those who were "ashamed" that Af. Americans "created jazz" was to assert an intrinsic connection between racial "theme and treatment" and "the meanings and rhythms of jazz" in his poetry. As he observed in "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (1926), "[J]azz to me is one of the inherent expressions of Negro life in America; the eternal tom-tom beating in the Negro soul."

Hughes's essentialist link between black expressive culture and jazz emphasizes its racial dimensions. True enough, black expressive culture has placed a distinct value on oratorical, rhetorical, and musical virtuosity that has influenced the hist. of poetic performance. Jazz has expressed not only in Hughes's terms "Negro life" and "Negro soul" but the heart and soul of America. Some of the first white Am. poets to allude to jazz music or its milieu included Vachel Lindsay, Carl Sandburg, Mina Loy, and Hart Crane. This does not mean that their poems were composed in a way that fully embodied and respected the jazz ethos. Loy and Lindsay both tended to associate jazz with *primitivism and *decadence.

Until the recent advent of hip-hop's globalization (itself an outgrowth of jazz; see HIP-HOP POETICS), jazz was arguably the U.S.'s best-known indigenous art form. Yet the jazz cadence of Am. lit. and culture extends beyond geographic boundaries (O'Meally). Anderson describes how the "jazz poet draws upon the various traditional/nontraditional (African and/or European) cultural elements and forges a unique expression of individual and racial or musical identity through his or her poetry." While the poetry of Hayden Carruth, Robert Creeley, and Clark Coolidge has long been associated with jazz influence, many poets from diverse multiethnic cultures within and beyond the Americas, such as Lawson Fusao Inada, Joy Harjo, Sherman Alexie, and Matthew Shenoda, are deeply engaged in blues and jazz poetics. Jazz and its lit. transcend black/white and Af./Eur. dichotomies.

In jazz poetry, poetic structure thrives on the artful balance between discipline and freedom, silence and noise, and presence or absence of notation. The white space beyond and between lines informs pacing within the poem. Jazz music embodies a comparable balance between creative freedom and disciplined restraint that is essential to crafting verse, whether in *meter, *free verse, or more experimental prosodies. Fundamental protocols of jazz are improvisation, collaboration, and live performance. Each of these involves an explicit expressive exchange among the musicians and an implicit dynamic exchange between the performers and the audience.

The emphasis on mutually attentive listening means that the often-used term jazz accompaniment is not adequate to describe jazz poetry performances. Given the catalyzing effect of collaboration, jazz interaction or jazz communication more suitably denotes what, ideally, occurs between poets and musicians. The dynamic range of this communicative style can be heard in Langston Hughes's collaboration with the bassist Charles Mingus, among others, on the album The Weary Blues, recorded in the wake of bebop and at the height of the poetry-read-to-jazz movement closely associated with the Beat poets. Other poets whose collaborative performances and jazz verse deserve mention are Amiri Baraka (and his New Ark Orchestra), Jayne Cortez (who recorded eight jazz and poetry albums with her band the Fire Spitters), Yusef Komunyakaa, Ntozake Shange, Michael S. Harper, Sonia Sanchez, Al Young, Quincy Troupe, and Tracie Morris.

The emphasis on rendering collaborative and solo versifying audible within a legible medium is best seen in poems written about jazz figures such as John Coltrane, Billie Holiday, Charlie Parker, and Thelonious Monk. In fact, the Coltrane poem is a subgenre in the poetry about musicians. During the Black Arts era, Sanchez, Baraka, and Haki Madhubuti (Don Lee) often wrote poems about Coltrane that used excessive orthographic and phonological alteration and included marginalia as performance cues to overcome what Henderson called "the cold technology of the printed page." Lee's "Don't Cry, Scream" informed readers to "sing / loud / & / high"; his tribute in "the sixties" (when "a trane / came / out") uses *epenthesis to signal Coltrane's sound "screameeeeeeeeeeeeee-ing." Baraka's poem "AM/TRAK" exhibits a comparable protraction of vowels and consonants in his echo of Coltrane's "scream": "blow, oh honk-scream (bahhhhhhhhh—wheeeeeeeee)"!!! . . . (Black Art). Likewise, Sanchez parenthetically instructed her readers to sing "slowly to the tune of my favorite things" in "a / coltrane / poem." Her poem aims to transcribe a particular movement in Coltrane's "My Favorite Things"—as well as the tune's triple-meter feel—through the spacing and stressing of "dum" and "da":

(softly da-dum-da da da da da da da da da / da-dum-a till it da da da da da da da da da builds up) da-dum-da da da.

Baraka, Sanchez, and other poets attempting to evince oral effects in a textual medium chose jazz tunes that were well known beyond aficionados so that the effectiveness of their phonological and orthographic techniques could be better realized. However, as the popularity of jazz decreased, both a tonal and formal shift became evident in Coltrane poems from the 1980s and 1990s to the present; these poems became less "visually aggressive on the page" than those of the Black Arts era. Indeed, Elizabeth Alexander's poem "John Col" demonstrates this change, while alluding to W. B. Yeats's "Easter, 1916" and a slogan of the Black Arts and Black Power movements:

the bloody footlights cup the dark where red and black are beautiful

a terrible beauty a terrible beauty a terrible beauty a horn

And this brass heartbeat this red sob this this
John Coltrane Col
trane song.

In contrast to "sheets of sound"—the description of Coltrane's rapid-fire succession of notes in his style of the 1950s, first used by Ira Gitler, the jazz critic of Down Beat magazine, on the liner notes to Coltrane's 1958 album Soultrane—Alexander's poem is pared down to a minimal number of words. Other recent poets involved in versifying Coltrane's evolutions in musical style, form, and technique include Kamau Daood, Nathaniel Mackey, Cornelius Eady, A. Van Jordan, and Linda Susan Jackson.

Much of the poetry driven by jazz music has been influenced by its male-centered homosocial milieu. Yet poets have offered distinct challenges to the conventional conflation of instrumental virtuosity with masculine virility. Close attention to the poetic visualizations of the jazz instrumentarium by poets such as Cortez and Shange sheds light on the existence of a corporeality that stretches beyond the hegemonic representations of the trumpet's shape and sound and of the embodiment of jazz more generally. Cortez explores the symbolic implications of Duke Ellington's album of jazz and narrative text The Drum Is a Woman when she asks, "If the drum is a woman,"

> why are you pounding your drum into an insane > babble . . .
> why are you choking your drum
> why are you raping your drum > why are you saying disrespectful things > to your mother drum your sister drum > your wife drum and your infant daughter drum

Cortez does not reject the masculinist metaphor but embraces it figuratively to protest violence against women. Considering gender and sexuality reveals other striking facets of jazz poetics—for instance, how many poets identify the curvilinear shape of musical instruments as voluptuous female lovers and muses. Shange, e.g., maps various jazz instruments onto the territory of the body in her poem "I Live in Music." She draws on the physical shape of brass and string instruments for visual effect, claiming "i got 15 trumpets where other women got hips / & an upright bass for both sides of my heart." In so doing, Shange reappropriates the woman as aesthetic object of the male instrumentalist in jazz poetics.

The so-called renaissance in black writing from the 1990s to the present reflects a continuum and expansion of jazz aesthetics developed during the New Negro and Black Arts periods. All the recent poets named are heirs to the advances in techniques for translating musical forms into poetic performance made by Hughes, Shange, Troupe, and others. Of special note is the emergent movement from improvisatory aesthetics and instrumentality in jazz poetics to stylistic looping and percussive thematics in sound-directed hip-hop poetics. The writing and performances by poets Tracie Morris, Saul Williams, and Jessica Care Moore offer examples.

Although jazz poetry has existed since the beginning of the 20th c., efforts to compile and categorize it did not flourish until near the end. In the 1990s, several anthols. appeared, incl. Sasha Feinstein and Yusef Komunyakaa's two-volume Jazz Poetry Anthology (1991, 1996) and Nathaniel Mackey and Art Lange's hybrid anthol. Moment's Notice: Jazz in Poetry and Prose (1992).

See AFRICAN-AMERICAN POETRY; UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE.

■ S. Henderson, "The Forms of Things Unknown," Understanding the New Black Poetry (1973); The Jazz Cadence of American Culture, ed. R. G. O'Meally (1998); T. J. Anderson, Notes to Make the Sound Come Right: Four Innovations of Jazz Poetry (2004); M. D. Jones, The Muse Is Music: Jazz Poetry from the Harlem Renaissance to Spoken Word (2011).

M. D. JONES

JE NE SAIS QUOI (Fr., "I know not what"). Refers to a first-person experience of a "certain something" with intense effects that is difficult to explain or even express. Since the 18th c., it has been used principally as a literary term and an aesthetic response, but it was always and remains able to articulate problems of explanation and expression in a wide range of contexts. The very elusiveness inherent in the term divides opinion: some dismiss the je ne sais quoi as a refuge of ignorance concealed in an affectation; others prize its poetic potential to trace in lang. the shape and feel of phenomena that cannot be fully known but that change everything.

Precursors—the Lat. nescio quid (Cicero, Augustine), It. non so che (Ludovico Ariosto, Ludovico Dolce, Torquato Tasso), and Sp. no sé qué (Teresa of Ávila, St. John of the Cross)—are applied disparately to love, religious experience, and art. Sixteenth-c. uses of the Fr. phrase (Joachim du Bellay, Les Regrets, 1558; François Rabelais, Cinquiesme livre, 1564; Michel de Montaigne, Essais, 1580), while similarly disparate, are lexically inventive and semantically rich: in Essais (1.28), e.g., Montaigne conjures with adjectival forms of the phrase ("c'est je ne sçay quelle quinte essence de tout ce meslange" [It is I know not what kind of quintessence of all this commixture]) to capture the "nescioquiddity" of perfect friendship. The je ne sais quoi first attains prominence as a substantive and a concept in 17th-c. France. As in Montaigne, it animates poetic explorations of human *affect in all its enigmatic power (Pierre Corneille, Rodogune, 1645; Blaise Pascal, Pensées, 1670); but it also features in philosophical disputes about occult qualities (René Descartes, Principes de la philosophie, 1647; Jacques Rohault, Entretiens sur la philosophie, 1671; Gabriel Daniel, Suite du voyage du monde de Descartes, 1696) and looms ever larger in discussions of literary and social distinction (François Ogier, Apologie pour M. de Balzac, 1628; Claude Favre de Vaugelas, Remarques sur la langue française, 1647; Chevalier de Méré, Lettres, 1689). The Fr. term enters Eng. as "four French words, contracted as it were into one" (Thomas Blount, Glossographia, 1656), an elegant neologism with sublime possibilities. It receives its most extensive treatment in a text that bears its name, the fifth conversation of Dominique Bouhours's Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène (1671), which urbanely presents the je ne sais quoi as a concept applicable to all enigmas. Bouhours's treatment is immediately attacked for its mixture of the sacred and profane (Jean Barbier d'Aucour, Sentiments de Cléante, 1671), and the je ne sais quoi soon appears overstretched and undone by its own success as a word in literary vogue, ridiculed—in an age of préciosité* when poetic posture often betrays social position—as a vacuous affectation of the polite circle (Molière, Les Femmes savantes, 1672; Thomas Shadwell, The Virtuoso, 1676; Abbé d'Ailly, Pensées diverses, 1678; William Congreve, Double Dealer, 1694). Later authors have portrayed it variously as the properly enigmatic quality at the heart of aesthetic experience or philosophical endeavor (B. J. Feijóo, "El no sé qué," 1733; Pierre de Marivaux, Le Cabinet du philosophe, 1734; Montesquieu, Essai sur le goût, 1757; Vladimir Jankélévitch, Le Je-ne-sais-quoi et le Presque-rien, 1980) and that a poetic style may be best equipped to put into words.

See NEOCLASSICAL POETICS, SUBLIME, TASTE.

■ E.B.O. Borgerhoff, The Freedom of French Classicism (1950); G. Natali, "Storia del 'non so che,'" Lingua Nostra 12 (1951); E. Köhler, "Je ne sais quoi," Romanistisches Jahrbuch 6 (1953–54); E. Haase, "Zur Bedeutung von 'je ne sais quoi' im 17. Jahrhundert," Zeitschrift für französische Sprache und Literatur 67 (1956); A. Porqueras Mayo, "Funcion de la formula 'no sé qué' en textos literarios españoles (siglos XVIII–XX)," Bulletin hispanique 67 (1965); L. Marin, Sublime Poussin (1995); N. Cronk, The Classical Sublime (2002); R. Scholar, The "Je-Ne-Sais-Quoi" in Early Modern Europe (2005); E. Camp, "Metaphor and That Certain 'Je Ne Sais Quoi,'" Philosophical Studies 129 (2006).

R. SCHOLAR

JINDYWOROBAK. An Adelaide-based nationalist movement in Australian poetry that flourished from the late 1930s to the 1950s. Its chief theorist was Rex Ingamells (1913–55), who, in his keynote essay "Conditional Culture" (1938), wanted "to free Australian art from whatever alien influences trammel it." The emphasis was on "environmental values," and Ingamells sought to banish Brit. poetic idioms in a deeper artistic engagement with Australia's own landscape and hist., ancient as well as mod.—hence, Jindyworobak, an Aboriginal word from the Wuywurrung lang., meaning "to annex, to join" (Ingamells).

Aboriginality was crucial to Ingamells's radical project, serving to define its mixed legacy. Sharing the then-common view that Aborigines were a dying race, the Jindyworobaks felt free to appropriate indigenous culture for literary purposes, notably the concept of Alchera or Alcheringa—obliquely trans. from the Arrernte lang. as the "Dreamtime"—which they celebrated in purely figurative terms as the spirit of the land.

Though the Jindyworobaks' primitivism has some affinities with *modernism, their poetry was broadly traditional in form, ranging from nationalistic stridency to intimate lyricism. Initially, some use was made of Aboriginal words, Ingamells's experimental poems in this vein being much derided. However, the verse of Roland Robinson (1912–92) continues to attract interest, incl. his respectful poetic transcriptions of Aboriginal Eng. Other major Jindyworobak poets were Ian Mudie (1911–76), William Hart-Smith (1911–90), and Flexmore Hudson (1913–88).

Many poets of varied commitment passed through the pages of the annual Jindyworobak Anthology (1938–53), and they contributed to the *pastoral emphasis in much postwar Australian poetry. With the rise of indigenous poets since Oodgeroo Noonuccal (Kath Walker, 1920–93) in the 1960s, fewer nonindigenous Australian poets have attempted Aboriginal themes, yet Jindyworobak elements arguably abide in the poetry of Les Murray (b. 1938) and Billy Marshall-Stoneking (b. 1947), among others.

See AUSTRALIA, POETRY OF; PRIMITIVISM.

■ R. Ingamells, "Conditional Culture," The Writer in Australia, ed. J. Barnes (1969); The Jindyworobaks, ed. B. Elliott (1979); H. McQueen, "Inadvertent Grandeur," The Black Swan of Trespass (1979); L. Murray, "The Human-Hair Thread," Persistence in Folly (1984); R. Sellick, "The Jindyworobaks and Aboriginality," Southwords, ed. P. Butterss (1995).

P. KIRKPATRICK

JINGLE (ME gyngle). Any verse that catches the listener's ear, often through bouncy rhythms and exaggerated sound repetition, esp. *rhyme and *alliteration. Some jingles verge on *nonsense, emphasizing sound qualities over meaning, e.g., the classic nursery rhymes "Eeny meeny miny mo" and "Hickory dickory dock." Jingles are easily memorized and repeated, but they tend to achieve their staying power less through *euphony than through insistence. The initial pleasantness of a jingle may quickly turn toward irritation: in "Punch, Brothers, Punch" (Tom Sawyer Abroad), e.g., Mark Twain recounts a comic incident in which the lines "Punch, brothers! Punch with care! / Punch in the presence of the passenjare!" invaded his mind, creating an "idiotic burden" in which he "suffered, and cried, and jingled all through the evening." Twain's unwelcome mental refrain comes from a newspaper advertisement, but the most prominent instance of mod. jingles is in television and radio advertising, where companies exploit the mnemonic qualities of jingles in the hope of selling products. The term has long had pejorative connotations. Joseph Addison (Spectator no. 297) criticizes John Milton for often affecting "a kind of Jingle in his Words" in Paradise Lost, but Milton himself had prefaced his *epic by scorning the "jingling sound of like endings" represented by end rhyme.

■ Oxford Book of Nursery Rhymes, ed. I. Opie and P. Opie (1951); L. M. Scott, "Understanding Jingles and Needledrop: A Rhetorical Approach to Music in Advertising," Journal of Consumer Research 17 (1990); R. F. Yalch, "Memory in a Jingle Jungle," Journal of Applied Psychology 76 (1991)—psychological study of jingle as mnemonic.

L. PERRINE; T.V.F. BROGAN; E. J. RETTBERG

JITANJÁFORA. A kind of *sound poetry where words invented for their acoustic qualities may alternate with or imitate real ones. The term was borrowed in 1929 by the Mexican critic Alfonso Reyes from the first stanza of "Leyenda," a poem by the Cuban Mariano Brull: "Filiflama alabe cundre / ala olalúnea alífera / alveola jitanjáfora / iris salumba salífera." In several articles that Reyes later republished in 1942 as "Las jitanjáforas," he called them "[c]reations that address not reason, but rather the senses and the imagination. Words here do not seek a useful goal. They play on their own." The emergence of the jitanjáfora in avant-garde Cuban poetry of the 1920s has been linked to a nationalist desire to imitate the music and dance of Afro-Cuban rituals; however, Brull admired Paul Valéry's notions of *pure poetry, and Emilio Ballagas was aware of Gertrude Stein's avant-garde writing that played with sound and nonsense. Besides Brull and Ballagas, other Cuban poets such as Ramón Guirao, José Tallet, and Nicolás Guillén cultivated the genre, but jitanjáforas can also be found in other poets, incl. canonical figures of the Hispanic trad., such as Félix Lope de Vega and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, as well as in Eur. *Dada poets and many other literary trads.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; DANCE AND POETRY; MUSIC AND POETRY; NONSENSE VERSE; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ A. Reyes, "Las jitanjáforas," La experiencia literaria (1942); C. Bousoño, El irracionalismo poético (1977); M. J. de Navascués, "Hacia una estilística de la jitanjáfora," Revista de literatura 53 (1991); M. Arnedo, "'Afrocubanista' Poetry and Afro-Cuban Performance," MLR 96 (2001).

O. CISNEROS

JONGLEUR (Fr. jongleur, Occitan and Catalan joglar, Sp. juglar, Port. jogral, It. giullare). A med. *minstrel in France, Spain, Portugal, or Italy. Although the word dates only from the 8th c., jongleurs seem to have existed in France from the 5th c. to the 15th. The term was applied to performers of various kinds—acrobats, actors, and entertainers in general, as well as musicians and reciters of verse. Like minstrels, jongleurs were often condemned for irregular behavior but sometimes found to have a role in salvation. Chaucer used Eng. janglere (from the Fr.) for a tale teller like himself; juggler meant an entertainer, one who amuses people, until it came to mean "one who practices juggling" in the 19th c. (OED). See the OE scop*, the Celtic bard*, and the ON skald (see NORSE POETRY).

The Occitan joglar performed lyrics composed by a troubadour whom he served as a singing messenger, perhaps accompanying himself with an instrument or alternating song with instrumental performance. The troubadour might name the jongleur in the tornada, with instructions to take the song to an addressee who could be expected to reward him for it. Thus, a given song was usually entrusted to one jongleur, but the troubadour might commission several jongleurs with different songs during his career, occasionally revising a given song for a second performer. During the 12th and 13th cs., the relative frequency of such mentions of jongleurs declined, suggesting that oral diffusion was being gradually replaced by written transmission.

The OF jongleur performed not only the lyrics of the trouvères* but chansons de geste*, *medieval romances, saints' lives, *fabliaux, miracle plays, and other narratives. The chansons de geste were originally performed to a simple melody and, according to the oral-formulaic theory, were composed in performance by a technique similar to that of the 20th-c. illiterate Yugoslavian guslar (Lord, Duggan); but some scholars maintain that the jongleurs read the chansons de geste from a book even in the earliest times. They probably did the same with romances and saints' lives, texts that frequently depict the narrator as a jongleur.

See MEDIEVAL POETRY.

■ E. Faral, Les Jongleurs en France au moyen âge (1910); Jeanroy; R. Morgan, "Old French Jogleor and Kindred Terms," RPh 7 (1954); R. Menéndez Pidal, Poesia juglaresca y origines de las literaturas románicas (1957); J. Duggan, The Song of Roland: Formulaic Style and Poetic Craft (1973); W. D. Paden, "The Role of the Joglar," Chrétien de Troyes and the Troubadours, ed. P. S. Noble and L. M. Paterson (1984); W. A. Quinn, "Chaucer's Janglerye," Viator 18 (1987); R. E. Harvey, "Joglars and the Professional Status of the Early Troubadours," Medium Aevum 62 (1993); P. Dronke, The Medieval Lyric, 3d ed. (1996); J. W. Baldwin, "The Image of the Jongleur in Northern France around 1200," Speculum 72 (1997); I. Marchesin, "Les Jongleurs dans les psautiers du haut moyen âge," Cahiers de civilisation médiévale 41 (1998); G. Noto, Il giullare e il trovatore nelle liriche e nelle biografie provenzali (1998); S. Orlando, "Letteratura e performance in antichi testi romanzi (spagnoli e italiani)," European Medieval Drama 3 (1999); Lord; S. Menegaldo, Le jongleur dans la littérature narrative des XIIe et XIIIe siècles (2005); C. Symes, A Common Stage: Theater and Public Life in Medieval Arras (2007).

W. D. PADEN

JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY. Poetry sung, recited, or written in the Judeo-Sp. (Judezmo, Ladino) dialect, in the various postdiasporic communities of the Sephardic Jews—North Africa (Morocco, Algeria) and the Eastern Mediterranean (the Balkans, Greece, Turkey, Israel)—after their exile from Spain in 1492. By contrast, in Western Eur. centers such as Amsterdam, Bayonne, and Leghorn, there were Jewish authors who did not write in the Judeo-Sp. dialect but continued to form part of the Hispanic (Sp. or Port.) literary trads. Judeo-Sp. poetry may be organized into the following generic categories: complas (popular religious or didactic songs), cantigas* (*lyric songs), romansas (traditional *ballads), endevinas (riddles), and refranes (*proverbs). Complas can be considered essentially written lit.; the other genres are oral (see ORAL POETRY). Following World War II, a special subgenre of Sephardic poetry, written in Judeo-Sp. and in Fr., commemorated the tragic events of the Holocaust. In recent decades, poets and singers working both within and without the Sephardic trad. have adopted Judeo-Sp. as a poetic lang. According to Balbuena, this late wave of poetic production in Judeo-Sp. shows how the lang. is used as a tool for creating Sephardic identity in the diaspora. Traditional Sephardic romansas and cantigas have been increasingly recorded by contemp. artists whose musical reconstructions of traditional settings have been studied by Cohen and by Gutwirth.

Complas (Sp. coplas*) are strophic poems usually of paraliturgical content, by both known and anonymous authors, and are the most characteristic Sephardic genre. Typically, they are sung and often are *acrostic poems presenting the letters of the Heb. alphabet or of the author's name. Since they are essentially part of a written trad., they are generally sung by men, unlike the romansas, which are usually performed by women. Among the most traditional complas are those for the festivity of Purim, composed in the 18th and 19th cs., that relate the biblical story of Esther or evoke the joys of the holiday in *strophes of varying lengths, with short or long verses in zéjelesque rhyme (aaab; see ZÉJEL), often incl. a *refrain (cf. It. ballata; see ITALIAN PROSODY). Other complas celebrate the festivities of Hanukkah, Passover, Pentecost, the Sabbath, the Rejoicing of the Torah, and Arbor Day. There are also dirgelike complas (Kinot) that commemorate the destruction of the Temple (70 CE) and other tragic events in ancient Jewish hist. Other complas of a moralizing, admonitory bent (complas de castiguerio) preach the glories of God and warn against the illusory nature of worldly attractions. Complas del felek (destiny) present the life and customs of late 19th- and early 20th-c. Sephardic Jewry from a satirical or humorous perspective. In complas de Tebariá are celebrated the praises of the city of Tiberias, of venerable sages who lived there, and of miracles concerning its Jewish population. Attias and Peretz published another group of poems, Complas de 'Aliyá (Songs of Return to Zion, 1996), which give voice to the Jews' longing for redemption and return to Jerusalem in all its glory. Those complas by Abraham Toledo, devoted to the life of Joseph and first published in 1732—part of a subgenre designated as complas hagiográficas—constitute for Hassán (1982) perhaps the single greatest poem in Judeo-Sp. In reworking the biblical account of Joseph's life (Gen. 37: 39–45), Toledo used numerous elements from folklore, rabbinical commentaries, and traditional life, presented with lyrical verve, lexical versatility, and rhetorical strength. In comparison to such genres as ballads and proverbs, which have strong Hispanic connections, the study of complas has, until recently, been gravely neglected.

Cantigas are traditional lyric songs, frequently of Hispanic origin in form and content, but, in the Eastern trad., with significant Gr. and Turkish lexical, structural, and thematic influences. Although love in all its vicissitudes is the predominant theme, there are also lyric songs devoted to various functions in the traditional life cycle: cantigas de boda (wedding songs), de parida (birth songs), and endechas* (*dirges). Romero (2009) has published a collection of mod. Balkan cantigas on the subject of women's liberation. Many Sephardic lyric songs, esp. in the Eastern communities, are of relatively recent origin (late 19th and early 20th c.) and often consist of *quatrains in *couplets with *assonance; some are modeled on Gr. originals, while others are imported from Spain or Sp. America. But other lyric songs attest to a venerable Sephardic trad. going back to med. Hispanic origins. The parallelistic rhymes of some Eastern poems and of many Moroccan wedding songs—similar to that of the primitive Sp. and Port. lyric—confirm the med. character of the Judeo-Sp. cantiga trad. Some of these songs, given esoteric kabbalistic interpretations, eventually formed part of the liturgy of the Sabbatean donmeh sect of Islamized Jews in Turkey and have been edited and translated by Peretz.

Romansas (Sp. romances) are traditional ballads in assonant octosyllabic verse. In content, they are essentially similar—in some cases, genetically related—to *narrative poetry current in other Eur. communities. No other Sephardic genre is so closely linked to its med. Hispanic origins, and none has received as much scholarly attention. Judeo-Sp. ballads can be documented from as early as 1525 through verses used as tune indicators in Heb. hymnals. Several 18th-c. mss. are known, and numerous Eastern ballads were collected and printed in popular Heb.-letter chapbooks in the late 19th and early 20th cs., most recently anthologized by Weich-Shahak (1997, 2010). There are Sephardic ballads derived from med. Sp. and Fr. epics; others concern events in Sp. and Port. hist. or tell stories from the Bible, cl. antiquity, or med. adventure romances (see MEDIEVAL ROMANCE); still others concern a variety of topoi (prisoners and captives, the husband's return, faithful or tragic love, the unfortunate wife, the adulteress, amorous adventures, tricks and deceptions). Some ballads function as *epithalamia (wedding songs), others as dirges, still others as *lullabies. Though a majority of Sephardic ballads have med. or 16th-c. Sp. counterparts, others can be shown to derive from mod. Gr. narrative poetry; some were undoubtedly created in the exile communities by the Sephardim themselves. Bénichou's studies of oral trad. as a creative artistic process are essential to ballad crit.

Endevinas (riddles) are often rhymed and, like *proverbs, should count as a part of Sephardic traditional poetry. Of all genres, the riddle has been the most gravely neglected by scholarship. Little fieldwork has been done to collect riddles, and the known Eastern repertoire is still radically limited. Nothing is presently known of the Moroccan Sephardic riddle trad. As far as origins are concerned, a preliminary assessment indicates that Eastern Judeo-Sp. riddles are about evenly divided between texts of med. Hispanic origin and adaptations from Turkish and Gr. In many cases, however, it is impossible to point to a specific origin.

Refranes (proverbs) have been abundantly collected in Heb.-letter chapbooks since the late 19th c. by the Sephardim themselves and also by Western scholars such as Foulché-Delbosc and more recently by the Israeli scholar Tamar-Frizer. Some Sephardic proverbs agree exactly with their Sp. counterparts, while others have obviously been taken over from Gr., Turkish, or biblical Heb. sources.

See HEBREW POETRY; LITURGICAL POETRY; PORTUGAL, POETRY OF; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

■ M. Attias, "Shelôshah shîrê Tsîyôn," Shevet va-'Am 4 (1959); P. Bénichou, Creación poética en al romancero tradicional (1968); M. Alvar, Endechas judeo-españolas (1969), and Cantos de boda judeo-españolas (1971); S. Armistead, J. Silverman, I. Katz, Folk Literature of the Sephardic Jews (1971–94); M. Attias, Cancionero judeo-español (1972); E. Romero, "Complas de Tu-Bishbat," Poesía: Reunión de Málaga, ed. M. Alvar (1976); L. Carracedo and E. Romero, "Poesía admonitiva," Sefarad 37 (1977); S. Armistead et al., El romancero en el Archivo Menéndez Pidal (1978); I. Hassán and E. Romero, "Quinot paralitúrgicos," Estudios Sefardíes 1 (1978); S. Armistead and J. Silverman, "El antiguo romancero," Nueva revista de filología Hispánica 30 (1981); L. Carracedo and E. Romero, "Refranes," Sefarad 41 (1981); P. Díaz-Mas, "Romances de endechar," and E. Romero, "Las coplas sefardíes," Jornadas, ed. A. Viudas Camarasa (1981); S. Armistead and J. Silverman, En torno al romancero (1982); I. Hassán, "Visión panorámica," Hispania Judaica, ed. J. M. Solà-Solé (1982); S. Armistead and J. Silverman, "Adivinanzas," Philologica Hispaniensia in Honorem Manuel Alvar, ed. M. Alvar (1983); And the World Stood Silent: Sephardic Poetry of the Holocaust, trans. I. J. Lévy (1989); M. Attias and A. Peretz, Shireʿaliyah (1996); S. Armistead, "Nueve adivinanzas de Estambul," Sefarad 58 (1998); J. Cohen, "Review of Judeo-Spanish ('Ladino') Recordings," Journal of American Folklore 112 (1999); M. Balbuena, Diasporic Sephardic Identities (2003); H. Pomeroy, An Edition and Study of the Secular Ballads in the Sephardic Ballad Notebook of Halia Isaac Cohen (2005); R. Foulché-Delbosc, 1313 proverbios judeo-españoles (2006); Las coplas de Yosef, ed. L. Girón-Negrón and L. Minervini (2006); A. Peretz, Mayim, esh ve-ahavah (2006); M. Ha-ʿElion, En los kampos de lah muerte (2008); A. Tamar-Frizer, La palabra en su hora es oro (2008); E. Romero, "Textos poéticos," Sefarad 69 (2009); S. Weich-Shahak, Romancero sefardí de Oriente (2010); E. Gutwirth, "Archival Poetics," Bulletin of Spanish Studies 88 (2011).

S. G. Armistead; J. H. Silverman; D. A. Wacks

K

KANNADA POETRY. Kannada, belonging to the Dravidian family of langs., has the second oldest lit. among all the living langs. of South Asia. The earliest specimen of Kannada writing, the Halmiḍi inscription (ca. 450 CE), shows that Kannada must have been in use as a medium of poetry for some time already. The earliest complete extant text, the Kavirājamārga (9th c., the oldest work in Kannada on poetics, largely following the theories of the Sanskrit author Daṇḍin), gives the names of many older poets of whose works only the fragments that are quoted in this text remain. The meters of this earliest Kannada poetry resemble those of Old Tamil to some extent but are a clearly independent devel. of Dravidian prosody. In 2008, the government of India granted Kannada the official status of "classical language."

Jainism was the dominant religion in the Kannada-speaking part of India until the 12th c. CE, and correspondingly the oldest period of Kannada lit. hist. is dominated by Jaina authors. The oldest independent poetic works that have been preserved in their entirety are the two writings of Paṃpa (10th c.), whom still today some critics consider the greatest Kannada poet. His Ādipurāṇa (completed 942), containing the hagiographical account of the life of the first Tīrthaṅkara, one of the holiest persons in Jainism, and his Vikramārjunavijayam (959), based on the Mahābhārata, are considered the greatest masterpieces of Old Kannada poetry. Paṃpa and his contemps. Ranna and Ponna are commonly referred to as the ratnatraya or "three jewels" of Kannada lit. Other Jaina purāṇas in the same caṃpu style (a mixture of poetry and prose) continued to be written for several centuries.

The best known works of Kannada poetry in and out of India are the vacanas, which are among the most influential literary works in the lang. The vacana (saying) is a particular genre that originated in Kannada in the 11th c. and rose to immense popularity in the 12th c. because of its use as a medium of religious communication in Vīraśaivism, a Śaivite Hindu reform movement. A vacana is a *prose poem, usually a few dozen words in length; it lacks audible rhythmical structural elements but as a rule does have a rhythmic structure in its syntax, with syntactic structures being repeated as a device for underlining parallel metaphorical expressions. Thousands of vacanas from the 12th c. have been preserved. The most prominent vacanakāras (vacana poets) are Basava, who was the main organizer of the Vīraśaiva movement; his spiritual teacher Allama Prabhu; his nephew, the theologian Cennabasava; and the female mystic Mahādēviyakka. The vacana lit. also marks an important turning point in Kannada ling. hist., and a Kannada speaker today can read and understand the majority of 12th-c. vacanas more or less without the help of special aids. Several excerpts from vacanas have become popular sayings far beyond the Vīraśaiva community. Vacanas are still written today.

Another high point in Kannada lit. hist. was reached in the writings of the haridāsas or "servants of Hari," i.e., devotees of the god Viṣṇu. This devotional lit. is associated with the Vaiṣṇava (Viṣṇuite) Hindu reform movement initiated by the philosopher Madhva (1238–1317). The highly lyrical compositions of the haridāsas were in part inspired by earlier Vaiṣṇava devotional poetry by the Āḻvārs in Tamil, esp. by the writings of the aforementioned Kannada vacanakāras. Puraṃdaradāsa (1485–1565) is generally considered the foremost among the haridāsa poets, for his poetic imagery and the musicality of his writings; he is also considered the father of Carnatic [South Indian cl.] music. Comparable in fame is his contemp. Kanakadāsa (1491–1580), who wrote not only short lyrical pieces but longer narrative and allegorical poems.

The high quality of mod. poetry in Kannada has been recognized on an Indian national level: the most prestigious national literary award, the Jnanpith Award, has been awarded to seven Kannada writers, among them the three poets Kuveṃpu (pseud. of K. V. Puṭṭappa, 1904–94, known mainly for his rewriting of the Rāmāyaṇa epic in Kannada) in 1967; Aṃbikātanayadatta (pseud. of D. R. Bendre [Dattātreya Rāmacaṃdra Bēṃdre], 1896–1981, linguistically the most virtuosic poet in mod. Kannada) in 1973; and Vināyaka (pseud. of V. K. Gokak [V. K. Gōkāka], 1909–92, epic poet) in 1990. Other leading poets of the 20th c. were Gopalakrishna Adiga [Gōpālakṛṣṇa Aḍiga] (1918–92), who is considered the most important representative of the navya or modernist movement, and the highly popular romantic lyricist K. S. Narasimhaswamy [K. S. Narasiṃhasvāmi] (1915–2003), famous esp. for his collection Maisūru mallige, (1942). In most recent devels., the socially critical dalita movement has produced one noteworthy poet, Siddalingaiah [Siddhaliṃgayya] (b. 1954).

See INDIA, POETRY OF; TAMIL POETRY.

■ R. Narasimhacharya, Karṇāṭaka kavicarite, 2d ed. 3 v. (1972); A. K. Ramanujan, Speaking of Śiva (1973)—selected vacanas; R. S. Mugali, History of Kannada Literature (1975); Modern Kannada Poetry, ed. C. Kanavi and K. Raghavendra Rao (1976)—bilingual Kannada-Eng. anthol.); 60 Years of Kannada Poetry, ed. G. S. Sivarudrappa and L. S. Seshagiri Rao (1977); K. V. Zvelebil, The Lord of the Meeting Rivers (1984)—selected vacanas of Basava; A String of Pearls, ed. H. S. Shivaprakash and K. S. Radhakrishna (1990); W. J. Jackson, Songs of Three Great South Indian Saints (1998)—incl. sects. on Puraṃdaradāsa and Kanakadāsa; The Epic of Nēmi (Nēmināṭha-purāṇa) of Karṇapārya, trans. S. Anacker (2002).

R. ZYDENBOS

KASHMIRI POETRY. Kashmiri poetry is a multiply referential term: geographically, signifying poetry written from the Kashmir Valley or from the wider region of Jammu and Kashmir that has been territorially disputed between India and Pakistan since 1947; linguistically, signifying poetry written in Koshur, the lang. indigenous to the valley or poetry written in the other langs. in use in Jammu and Kashmir, incl. Persian, Urdu, Hindi, and Eng. Arising from a threshold region between Central and South Asia, the term Kashmiri poetry in all senses testifies to a multiethnic ecumene defined by cultural diversity and political instability. Iconic within this rich poetic corpus are the med. Sufi philosopher-poets writing in Koshur: Lalleshwari or Lal Ded (b. ca. 1335; she is known by both her Sanskritized name Lalleshwari and its more affectionate, vernacularized version Lal Ded [grandmother Lal] in Koshur), who used the gnomic quatrain form vakh (see GNOMIC POETRY); Noor-ud-Din or Nund Rishi (1377–1438), composing in another quatrain form, shrukh; and Habba Khatoon (fl. late 16th c.), who perfected the lyrical lol form. On this vernacular Sufi trad. was erected a literary modernism, from the foundational Ghulam Husain Mahjoor (1885–1952) to the contemp. poet Abdul Rahman Rahi (b. 1925), creators of a poetry that laments in and exalts the Kashmiri mother tongue within a competitive multilingualism. Since the 1990s, a Hindi poetry of exile has been developed by Agni Shekhar (b. 1956), among others, testifying to a specific Kashmiri Hindu subjectivity. The Kashmiri-Am. poet Agha Shahid Ali (1949–2001) transformed these affective complexities by expressing them in a finely wrought Eng.-lang. idiom that united Eur. (e.g., canzone*) and Urdu (e.g., ghazal*) poetic forms, paid homage to poets of exile worldwide, from the Palestinian Maḥmūd Darwīsh (1941–2008) to the Russian Osip Mandelstam (1892–1938), and infused Islamic sacred hist. with a sharp awareness of the politics of nationalism. Ali's anthols. The Country without a Post Office (2000) and Rooms Are Never Finished (2002) constitute an exquisitely refined, poignant, and haunting lyrical record of the Kashmir conflict, its roots and its emotional consequences.

See HINDI POETRY; INDIA, ENGLISH POETRY OF; INDIA, POETRY OF; PERSIAN POETRY; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY; URDU POETRY.

■ G. Grierson, Lalla-Vakyani or The Wise Sayings of Lal-Ded—A Mystic Poetess of Ancient Kashmir (1920); G. M. Sufi, Kashir (1948); N. C. Cook, The Way of the Swan: Poems from Kashmir (1958); T. Raina, An Anthology of Modern Kashmiri Verse, 1930–1960 (1972); B. B. Kachru, Kashmiri Literature (1981); C. Zutshi, Languages of Belonging: Islam, Regional Identity and the Making of Kashmir (2004); A. J. Kabir, Territory of Desire: Representing the Valley of Kashmir (2009).

A. J. KABIR

KENNING (pl. kenningar). A multinoun substitution for a single noun, e.g. "din of spears" for battle. Although found in many poetries, the kenning is best known from Old Germanic verse. Kennings are common in West Germanic poetry, and scholars have recognized a kenning in the expression of "corpse-sea," i.e., "blood," on the Eggjum runic inscription from western Norway, ca. 700 CE. ON eddic poetry (see EDDA) also makes use of kennings, but their greatest importance was in skaldic poetry.

In med. Icelandic rhet., the verb kenna (við), "make known (by)," was used to explain these expressions: "din" (the base word in mod. analysis) is "made known" as battle by "of spears" (the determinant). The determinant may be in the genitive case, as here, or may attach to the base word to form a compound (spear-din); the base word takes the morphological and syntactic form of the concept the kenning replaces. In skaldic poetry, the determinant could, in turn, be replaced by another determinant; if "flame of battle" means "sword," then "flame of the din of spears" makes an acceptable kenning. Snorri Sturluson, the 13th-c. poet and man of letters and the first to attempt a rhet. of kennings, called this example tvíkennt (twice-determined) in the commentary to Háttatal in his Edda. If another determinant were added, to make a four-part kenning, he would call it rekit, "driven." Snorri cautioned against "driven" kennings with more than six parts.

The relationship between the base word and determinant(s) could be essentially metonymic, as in "Baldr's father" for Odin, or metaphoric, as in the examples above. The kennings of West Germanic poetry, frequently used in connection with variation, tend toward the first category, those of skaldic poetry toward the second. Many skaldic kennings rely on Norse mythology or heroic legend for the links between the parts; thus, poetry is the "theft of Odin" because he stole it from the giants. In skaldic poetry, the number of concepts for which kennings may substitute is limited to about 100, among which warrior, woman, weapons, and battle are well represented. Since the base words tend to be fairly stereotyped (kennings for "woman" often have the name of a goddess as base word, e.g.), the system is relatively closed, but kennings make up nearly all the nouns in skaldic poetry, and the verbs are not important. Having imposed on themselves this closed system, the skalds exploited it brilliantly. In skaldic poetry, the sum of the kennings is, to be sure, greater than their parts, but the best skalds made every word count.

See NORSE POETRY.

■ R. Meissner, Die Kenningar der Skalden (1921); H. van der Merwe Scholtz, The Kenning in Anglo-Saxon and Old Norse Poetry (1927); H. Lie, "Natur" og "unatur" i skaldekunsten (1957); R. Frank, Old Norse Court Poetry (1978); Snorri Sturluson, Edda, ed. A. Faulkes (1982–98); E. Marold, Kenningkunst (1983); M. Clunies Ross, Skáldskaparmál (1986); F. Amory, "Kennings, Referentiality, and Metaphors," Arkiv för nordisk filologi (1988); G. Holland, "Kennings, Metaphors, and Semantic Formulae in Old Norse dröttkvætt," Arkiv för nordisk filologi (2005).

J. Lindow

KHARJA (also xarja; Sp. jarcha). The term kharja, along with its less common variant, markaz, refers to the final segment (Ar. *quf*l) of the Andalusi poetic form known as the muwashshaḥ (Sp. moaxajá). Developed in *Al-Andalus (i.e., Muslim Iberia) as a performative poetic genre in cl. Ar. and Heb. during the 10th c. CE, the muwashshaḥ is characterized by its highly structured strophic form. In Ar., the noun kharja can mean "exit" or "departure," as well as "projection" or "conspicuous part," and both semantic domains have more or less equal importance for the kharja, given its placement at the end of the muwashshaḥ (a kind of "exit segment") and the ling., discursive, and thematic prominence that the kharja enjoys within the poem as a whole. For scholars of med. Iberian lit., the kharja is significant because of its early devel., as well as the fact that just over 60 of them were composed (at least partially) in a Romance dialect particular to Muslim Iberia.

Perhaps the most polemical aspect of kharja research over the past several decades has been the question of its origins. The pressing question for scholars concerned with Romance lit., e.g., has been whether the Ibero-Romance kharjas emerge from a preexisting popular lyric trad. (Armistead 1982, 1985, 1987; García Gómez; Lapesa; Menéndez Pidal 1951; Monroe, 1982, 1985). For Arabists, the issue of primary interest has been to determine how Andalusi strophic poetry in general derived from Ar. poetic genres inherited from the East (Abū Haidar 2001, 2005; Hitchcock 1973, 1977, 1980, 1985; Jones). Much of the debate surrounding the kharjas, which reached its highest levels during the 1980s, has been the result of the perceived incommensurability of these two scholarly projects. Recent scholarship has sought to bring together arguments from both disciplines to form a more contextualized, performance-oriented understanding of Andalusi lang. and culture (Corriente, Rosen, Zwartjes).

Scholarly interest in the kharjas grew dramatically after the publication in 1948 of Samuel M. Stern's discovery of a relatively large number of Romance kharjas in the Heb. muwashshaḥāt found in the Cairo Geniza. This interest quickly prompted eds. in Spain to begin to include the Romance kharjas in literary anthols.; thus, what are essentially the final verses of cl. Ar. and Heb. strophic poems soon became a mainstay within poetic collections aimed at university and secondary-school students in Spain and beyond. In almost all cases, these kharjas were published without the muwashshaḥāt from which they had been extracted, and in mod. Sp. trans.

In his late 12th-c. treatise on Ar. poetry, Ibn Sanāʾ al-Mulk (1155–1211) argues that "the kharja is the spice of the muwashshaḥ, its salt and sugar, its musk and amber. It is the close of the muwashshaḥ; it must, therefore, be beautiful; it is its seal; nay, it is the beginning, although it is at the end" (trans. Stern 1974). Unavoidably recontextualized and multilingual components of Andalusi strophic poems, the kharjas—whether written in Romance, Andalusi Ar., or some combination of the two (leaving aside the small subgroup of *panegyric and religious kharjas written in cl. Ar. and Heb.)—provide a potentially rich and complex textual locus for the study of Andalusi lang. use, musical composition, and communicative practice.

■ R. Menéndez Pidal, Discurso acerca de la primitiva poesía lírica española, leído en la inauguración del curso de 1919 a 1920 (1919); S. M. Stern, "Les vers finaux en espagnol dans les muwaššahs hispano-hébraïques: Une contribution à l'histoire du muwaššah et à l'étude du vieux dialecte espagnol 'mozarabe,'" Al-Andalus 13 (1948); R. Menéndez Pidal, "Cantos románicos y andalusíes, continuadores de una lírica latina vulgar," Boletín de la Real Academia Española 31 (1951); R. Lapesa, "Sobre el texto y lenguaje de algunas jarchas mozárabes," Boletín de la Real Academia Española 40 (1960); R. Hitchcock, "Some Doubts about the Reconstruction of the Kharjas," BHS 50 (1973); E. García Gómez, "Métrica de la moaxaja y métrica española: Aplicación de un nuevo método de medición completa al 'Ğaiš' de Ben al-Jatīb," Al-Andalus 39 (1974); S. M. Stern, Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry (1974); R. Hitchcock, "Sobre la 'mama' en las jarchas," Journal of Hispanic Philology 2 (1977); A. D. Deyermond, Las jarchas y la lírica tradicional (1979); R. Hitchcock, The Kharjas as Early Romance Lyrics (1980); and "Las jarchas treinta años después," Awraq 3 (1980); A. Jones, "Romance Scansion and the Muwaššahāt: An Emperor's New Clothes?" Journal of Arabic Literature 11 (1980); and "Sunbeams from Cucumbers? An Arabist's Assessment of the State of Kharja Studies," La Corónica 10 (1981); S. G. Armistead, "Speed or Bacon? Further Meditations on Professor Alan Jones," and J. T. Monroe, "¿Pedir peras al olmo? On Medieval Arabs and Modern Arabists," La Corónica 10 (1982); A. Jones, "Eppur si muove," La Corónica 12 (1983); S. G. Armistead, "Pet Theories and Paper Tigers," La Córonica 14 (1985); R. Hitchcock, "The Interpretation of Romance Words in Arabic Texts: Theory and Practice," La Corónica 13 (1985); S. G. Armistead and J. T. Monroe, "Beached Whales and Roaring Mice: Additional Remarks in Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry," La Corónica 13 (1985); and "Poetic Quotation in the Muwaššah and Its Implications: Andalusian Strophic Poetry as Song," La Corónica 14 (1986); S. G. Armistead, "A Brief History of Kharja Studies," Hispania 70 (1987); F. Corriente, Modified ʿArūḍ: An Integrated Theory for the Origin and Nature of Both Andalusi Arabic Strophic Poetry and Sephardic Hebrew Verse (1991); J. T. Monroe, "Zajal and Muwashshaha: Hispano-Arabic Poetry and the Romance Tradition," The Legacy of Muslim Spain, ed. S. K. Jayyusi (1992); A. Sáenz-Badillos, "Nueva propuesta de lectura de las xarajāt con texto romance de la serie hebrea," Revista de Filología Española 74 (1994); O. Zwartjes, The Andalusian Xarja-s: Poetry at the Crossroads of Two Systems? (1995); F. Corriente, Poesía dialectal árabe y romance de Alandalús (1997); O. Zwartjes, Love Songs from al-Andalus: History, Structure and Meaning of the Kharja (1997); A. P. Espósito, "The Monkey in the Jarcha: Tradition and Canonicity in the Early Iberian Lyric," Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies 30 (2000); T. Rosen, The Muwashshah (2000); J. A. Abū Haidar, Hispano-Arabic Literature and the Early Provençal Lyrics (2001), and "The Muwashshahat and the Kharjas Tell Their Own Story," Al-Qantara 26 (2005).

V. Barletta

KIND. Essential to both the production and reception of lit. during the Ren., kind (sometimes species) was the Eng. term for *genre or the grouping of works into types according to a variety of characteristic properties. Some of the variables that informed judgment on kind include manner of representation (narrative, dramatic, "mixed," *lyric), style of *diction (high, middle, or low), the nature and scope of subject matter, prosody, plot structure, social status of characters, and length. The concept of kind encompassed prescriptive guidelines for composing poetry that would bring about certain affective outcomes (e.g., *satire is supposed to hold up vice to ridicule), as well as evaluative descriptions of the qualities deemed to be held in common. Major poetical kinds of the period, e.g., *epic, *tragedy, *comedy, *pastoral, and the *sonnet, were often placed in a hierarchy of cultural value—with epic, tragedy, and *hymn vying for supremacy. Several kinds either new (e.g., the *emblem) or revived from antiquity (e.g., the essay, the *encomium) flourished in the Ren., though some burgeoning kinds, such as the *tragicomedy, were the subject of critical controversy for their hybridity. Theorists of poetry (esp. in Italy, where such theorizing proliferated in the 16th c.), notably J. C. Scaliger (Poetices libri septem, 1561), Lodovico Castelvetro (Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e sposta, 1570, 1576), and Antonio Minturno (De poeta, 1559), developed their ideas about kind chiefly in dialogue with Aristotle, whose Poetics had established a scheme for poetic kinds. In the second half of the 20th c., literary scholars by and large claimed that kinds are properly understood to be "instrument[s] . . . of meaning" (Fowler 1982), interpretive "frames" for looking onto the world (Colie), and "shared assumptions" about how lit. was supposed to function (Orgel). Kind was itself a topos* in which ideas were exchanged about the historical devel. of, and contemp. relationship among, literary forms.

■ J. C. Scaliger, Select Translations from Scaliger's Poetics, trans. F. M. Padelford (1905); J. E. Spingarn, A History of Literary Criticism in the Renaissance, 2d ed. (1924); N. H. Pearson, "Literary Forms and Types; or, A Defense of Polonius," English Institute Annual 1940 (1941); Weinberg; R. L. Colie, The Resources of Kind (1973); T. Todorov, "The Origin of Genres," NLH 8 (1976); S. Orgel, "Shakespeare and the Kinds of Drama," CritI 6 (1979); H. Dubrow, Genre (1982); A. Fowler, Kinds of Literature (1982); L. Castelvetro, Castelvetro on the Art of Poetry, trans. A. Bongiorno (1984); Renaissance Genres, ed. B. K. Lewalski (1986); English Renaissance Literary Criticism, ed. B. Vickers (1999); L. Danson, Shakespeare's Dramatic Genres (2000); A. Fowler, "The Formation of Genres in the Renaissance and After," NLH 34 (2003); La notion de genre à la Renaissance, ed. G. Demerson (2004); The Formation of the Genera in Early Modern Culture, ed. C. L. Guest (2009); J. Roe, "Theories of Literary Kinds," A New Companion to English Renaissance Literature and Culture, ed. M. Hattaway (2010).

F. L. Blumberg

KNITTELVERS (also Knüttelvers, Knüppelvers, Klippelvers, Reimvers). Originally a Ger. verse measure from the 15th to the early 17th c. that appeared in all poetry that was not sung and thus had great influence on the devel. of lyric, epic, and dramatic verse. From the Middle High Ger. knittel, meaning "rhyme," but also sometimes called Knüttelvers (from knüttel or keule meaning "club") because of its irregular rhythm.

Since the 18th c., the term knittelvers (originally a Ger. designation for Lat. verse in leonine hexameters) has been used to describe two types of four-stressed rhymed couplets in Ger. and Scandinavian verse: "free Knittelvers" (freier Knittelvers) consists of lines varying in number of syllables (usually 6–15 per line); "strict Knittelvers" (strenger Knittelvers), primarily a 16th-c. phenomenon sometimes called Hans-Sachs-Vers, consists exclusively of eight-syllable masculine and nine-syllable feminine lines in couplets. Knittelvers can be traced back to Otfrid of Weissenburg who, using Lat. verse as a model, introduced couplets into Ger. verse in the 9th c. Free Knittelvers predominates in the Shrovetide plays (Fastnachtsspiele) of Hans Rosenplüt and Hans Folz in the 15th c.; strict Knittelvers prevails from the late 15th to the late 16th c. (e.g., Sebastian Brant, Hans Sachs, Johann Fischart). Led by Martin Opitz, 17th-c. poets rejected both forms and used Knittelvers as a derogatory term to refer to the unwieldly rhythms and crude subject matter—usually humorous or satirical, often earthy and pithy, sometimes even obscene—of these 16th-c. couplets.

In the 18th c., free Knittelvers was revived by J. C. Gottsched and used later by J. W. Goethe (Hanswursts Hochzeit, Jahrmarktsfest zu Plundersweilern, and parts of Urfaust, Faust, and the West-östlicher Divan), Friedrich Schiller (Wallensteins Lager), and other poets (J. G. Herder, G. A. Bürger, J.M.R. Lenz), e.g.:

> Habe nun, ach, die Philosophie,
> Medizin und Juristerei,
> Und leider auch die Theologie
> Durchaus studiert mit heißer Müh.
> Da steh ich nun, ich armer Tor,
> Und bin so klug, als wie zuvor.
>
> (Goethe, Urfaust)

In general, the metrical form of 19th-c. Knittelvers (as in J. F. Eichendorff, Heinrich Heine, Eduard Mörike, Friedrich Hebbel, Theodor Storm, Gottfried Keller, and Theodor Fontane) and turn-of-the-century Knittelvers (Detlev Liliencron, Richard Dehmel, Arno Holz, Arthur Schnitzler) is quite similar to that written in the late 18th c. In the 1780s, however, Goethe's contemporary Karl Arnold Kortum developed a new form of Knittelvers (Die Jobsiade, 1784, 1799) consisting of quatrains in which a masculine couplet is followed by a feminine couplet. Many lines are extremely long (15 or more syllables), with the result that syllables bearing word-stress often occur in metrically unstressed positions:

/ / / /
So kann man nur hier das Rätsel lösen
/ /
Was die Kapitel sechs und sieben
/ /
beschreib'ne Krankheit gewesen

(Die Jobsiade)

Kortum's variant of Knittelvers was later imitated by Wilhelm Busch, Julius Bierbaum, and most successfully by Frank Wedekind (Santa Simplicitas; Politische Lieder), but it has not been used since.

In the 20th c. Gerhart Hauptmann, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Max Mell, Peter Weiss, and Peter Hacks have used Knittelvers in dramatic works, and poets such as Bertolt Brecht, Karl Kraus, Peter Huchel, Wolf Biermann, and Christoph Meckel wrote short poems in this verse form. Knittelvers was used by Kurt Tucholsky for a number of cabaret texts and a long political-satirical poem (Die verkehrte Welt in Knüttelversen dargestellt von Kaspar Hauser, 1922). Today, Knittelvers continues to be used as a medium for political and social *satire and *parody, and to depict lower-class people in burlesque, *mock-heroic, and tragicomic situations. These couplets are often used in children's verse and are spoken at carnival festivities (Fasching) in Mainz and elsewhere in local dialects as well as in standard Ger.

■ O. Flohr, Gesch. des Knittelvers vom 17. Jahrhundert bis zur Jugend Goethes (1893); E. Feise, Der Knittelvers des jungen Goethe (1909); A. Heusler, Deutsche Versgesch, 3 v. (1925–29), esp. v. 3; W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960); H.-J. Schlütter, "Der Rhythmus im strengen Knittelvers des 16. Jahrhunderts," Euphorion 60 (1966); H. Heinen, Die rhythmisch-metrische Gestaltung des Knittelvers bei Hans Folz (1966); D. Chisholm, Goethe's Knittelvers (1975), "Der deutsche Knittelvers—alt und neu," Akten des VII (1985), and "Prosodic Aspects of German Hexameter Verse," PoT 16.3 (1995); C. Wagenknecht, "Knittelvers, Meistersang, Kirchenlied," Deutsche Metrik (2007).

D. H. Chisholm; K. Bowers

KNOWLEDGE, POETRY AS. What does a poet want? W. H. Auden asks himself that in a brief, cryptic, question-filled poem of 1937 titled "Orpheus." "What does the song hope for?" he wonders. A simple, creaturely joy? Or a deep, human level of understanding? Does the poet desire "To be bewildered and happy?" Or, Auden speculates, does the poet seek "most of all the knowledge of life?" (italics added).

In lang., the mirror opposite of the social world, pride of place comes last. Auden's "Orpheus" locates the notion that poets might most intensely crave "the knowledge of life" at the end of its array of questions. The idea concludes a stanza, and the sonorous disyllabic ripple of the word "knowledge" in a line otherwise entirely filled with staccato monosyllables gives that term a formal idiosyncrasy implying authorial endorsement. According to the hints "Orpheus" gives, poets go down into the compositional underworld of poetry not for love or happiness or melody but to win the darker, deeper prize of "knowledge."

Auden's bold poetic claim resonates interestingly with its critical moment. A long vernacular trad. extending from the *troubadours through *medieval poetics and *Renaissance poetics and best articulated in Auden's time by the *New Criticism insists that poetry bears or offers a distinctive kind of knowledge about the world. The New Critics' position, developed by John Crowe Ransom and Allen Tate, among others, was that poetry creates "a kind of knowledge which is radically or ontologically distinct" from science or other disciplines (Ransom 1941). Science, hist., and other discourses give us the world in diagram or abstract, but poetry provides what Ransom called "the world's body" and Tate, "a whole object."

This idea has survived only fitfully among the influential critical preoccupations of the past two generations. True, a certain strand of writing within both recent and contemp. poetry crit. focuses on the philosophical dimensions of poetry. The etymological roots of philosophy notwithstanding, however, this approach does not strictly relate to an interest in poetry encoded with any specific body of expertise or set of beliefs. Instead, with subject matter positioned as little more than the necessary enabling pretext for reflection, like the insignificant grain of grit stimulating the oyster, philosophical crit. typically focuses on a special kind of thought process that poetry is supposed to dramatize or enable, leading to a "thinking more rigorous than the conceptual," as Martin Heidegger asserted in "Letter on Humanism" (1947). Academic critics still write about poets' knowledge of their precursors or of, say, astrological or medical discourse. But since the critical focus on a poet's understanding of an intellectual trad. or a political moment almost always correlates with deference to his or her conscious *intentions in a poem, this procedure has become almost suspect in a discipline troubled by issues of ling. referentiality and wary over biographical or intentionalist reductions of literary texts (see BIOGRAPHY AND POETRY).

To compound these difficulties, granting poetry—the most archaic of the major *genres—a special, privileged epistemological status or advocating for it as the embodiment of knowledge (or any of the related concepts in the general semantic field, such as *belief, *information, or wisdom) sometimes suggests a retrograde cultural stance. Ludwig Wittgenstein's delphic warning not to forget "that a poem, even though it is composed in the language of information, is not used in the language-game of giving information" (Zettel, 1967) is one that a reader encounters almost monotonously in the pages of contemp. scholarship on poetry.

Indeed, for some commentators, poetry has been defined precisely by its opposition to a certain kind of positivistic knowledge. This trad. goes back at least as far as Samuel Johnson's Imlac, who tells Rasselas that it is not the business of the poet to "number the streaks of the tulip, or describe the different shades of the verdure of the forest" (Rasselas, 1759). For Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer, writing in the immediate postgenocidal, post-Hiroshima period, knowledge was tyranny, and poetry was its antithesis: "For the Enlightenment, anything which cannot be resolved into numbers, and ultimately one, is illusion; modern positivism consigns it to poetry" (Dialectic of Enlightenment, 1947). From the mid-20th c. on, critics have frequently spoken of poetry, tacitly or explicitly, dismissively or honorifically, as the negation of knowledge, as a content- and proposition-empty genre, freighted with seams of *irony, *indeterminacy, and *ambiguity that seem antithetical to the pursuit of truth. Indeed, in some of the most influential crit. of the last 50 years, poetry has come to seem like a track leading away from intellectual or empirical clarities and from any specific knowledge about the world. That is the case, e.g., with Hartman's account of William Wordsworth's disengagement from the natural scene he found spread before him in the Alps and Hartman's claim that this disengagement was the precondition for Wordsworth's growth as a poet. This was so, Hartman argued, because "blindness to the external world" constituted "the tragic, pervasive and necessary condition of the mature poet."

But what many critics for many reasons have demurred from, many poets have endorsed. For them, Auden's suggestion (that poets want to achieve a "knowledge of life") remains beautiful and appealing because it remains central to the poetic calling. Whether esoteric or exoteric, intellectual or practical, universal or personal, the drive for knowledge is enduringly one of the announced ambitions of *lyric poetry. It might even seem that part of every poet whom anyone has felt it worth thinking about could be represented by Alfred, Lord Tennyson's Ulysses, whose hopeless but heroic quest is to "To follow knowledge like a sinking star, / Beyond the utmost bound of human thought."

Occasions when poets assertively link poetry to some species of knowledge are widely distributed through lit. hist., esp. in the works of self-consciously and ambitiously learned writers. John Milton, for instance, stressed the connection between knowledge and a personal knowing of God. And, at the opening of Paradise Lost, he prayed for metaphysical inspiration (or divine knowledge), asking "What in me is dark / Illumine, what is low raise and support, / That to the height of this great argument / I may assert eternal Providence." Across the subsequent centuries, other poets have returned repeatedly, if from very different angles, to the strong relation between poetry and knowledge. Johnson (a poet) censured Alexander Pope's Essay on Man because its "penury of knowledge" vitiated its formal beauties ("Life of Pope," 1781). "Poetry is the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge," Wordsworth wrote (Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads, 1800), and P. B. Shelley claimed that poetry is "the centre and circumference of knowledge" (A Defence of Poetry, 1821). Their successor, Matthew Arnold, sustained the romantic affiliation of knowledge with poetry while faulting *romanticism because "with plenty of energy, plenty of creative force, [it] did not know enough" ("The Function of Criticism at the Present Time," 1864; italics added).

What knowledge meant for each of these writers varies considerably. E.g., its unspoken ground alters from biblical certainties in Milton's case through humanistic learning with Johnson and something akin to experience or observation in Wordsworth on to a revolutionary, counterempirical mysticism in Shelley and a bedrock of socially acceptable literary touchstones and periodical learning in Arnold. But the thrust of ideas about a singular correlation between poetry (itself a term with many meanings) and knowledge is persistent.

Poetic claims to knowledge have hardly diminished during the century of *modernism and its aftermath, nor has this linking of poetry and knowledge ever been a purely anglophone phenomenon. It is hard for many readers of mod. poetry to think about knowledge in poetry without remembering T. S. Eliot's "After such knowledge, what forgiveness?" and Elizabeth Bishop's "At the Fishhouses," in which the abstract word "knowledge" sounds out starkly among Bishop's welter of naturalistic detail: "It is like what we imagine knowledge to be . . . / and since / our knowledge is historical, flowing, and flown." During the same era, poets of many trads. and cultures were making similar claims and connections. Thus, in 1944, the Martinican poet Aimé Césaire insisted that "poetic knowledge [connaissance] is born in the great silence of scientific knowledge." And for the Mexican poet Octavio Paz (in the opening words of The Bow and the Lyre [1956]), "[P]oetry is knowledge [conocimiento], salvation, power, abandonment." Here again, what each poet means by the umbrella term "knowledge" varies considerably, but each identically insists on the presence of a special kind of significant content in poetry.

If we accept for a moment the poets' declarations that poetry is knowledge, then this must mean that the knowledge in question is a justified and correct belief about something in particular. This is because knowledge always has a subject. (We can know nothing about something, but it is impossible to know something about nothing.) The types of knowledge in which poetry has traditionally dealt can be broadly divided into five categories. First, there is poetic knowledge as mythic or historical memory or as "the tale of the tribe" (Kipling via Pound, Guide to Kulchur, 1938). This is the kind of knowledge that the Epic of Gilgamesh records for posterity in its tales about the triumphs of the eponymous king of Uruk or that the Homeric *epics codify in their accounts of the war between the Greeks and the Trojans and its consequences. (This knowledge-as-memory trad. reaches a parodic termination in Eliot's pathos-filled attempt to cram a massively fragmented and enigmatic account of several millennia's worth of Western cultural memory into The Waste Land.) Second, poetic knowledge can be the result of access to supernatural or divine truth, as when Dante explains to the reader at the start of the Paradiso that he has been "in that Heaven that knows His light most, and [has] seen things, which whoever descends from there has neither power, nor knowledge, to relate." Nevertheless, he adds, "whatever, of the sacred regions, I had power to treasure in my mind, will now be the subject of my labour." (This metaphysical trad. ramifies into the multiple branches of heterodox knowledge secreted in subsequent poetry, from the "continued Allegory, or darke conceit" supposedly ciphered into The Faerie Queene [Edmund Spenser, "Letter to Ralegh"] through to the intricate occult symbolism woven into the work of later writers such as Stéphane Mallarmé, W. B. Yeats, and Robert Duncan.) Third, poetry has been on occasion a means of recording a body of practical expertise or experience, a poetry of knowledge as it were, such as one finds in the accounts of sowing and harvesting in James Thomson's The Seasons or in Thomas Hardy's poetry about rural labor. (It is from this trad. that the modes of *confession and witness in poetry—so crucial to the writing of poets as diverse as Wilfred Owen, Paul Celan, and Adrienne Rich—derive.) And fourth, knowledge and poetry can commingle as knowledge of poetry, a discernible impression within a poem of expertise or adroitness with the genre itself. This kind of knowledge manifests internal self-awareness through allusions that demonstrate a familiarity with past poetic trads. or through overt technical virtuosity, whether of a traditional kind, using "[c]omplicated verse forms of great technical difficulty, such as Englyns, Drott-Kvaetts, Sestinas" (Auden, "Making, Knowing and Judging," 1956), or of an experimental and individualistic kind, as in the "mak[ing] it new" of Walt Whitman, Emily Dickinson, and innumerable later poets.

Finally, there is one other important kind of knowledge found in poems, a kind both pervasive and elusive, which stands at an angle to the trads. of substantive knowledge in poetry just described and which is perhaps a subtle counterpoint to those trads. That is the knowledge that simultaneously recognizes its own literal untruthfulness and its figurative veracity. Some have called it "poetic fiction," and virtually all poets, not least the erudite poets of the knowledge trad., have indulged in it seriously and to the genre's immense benefit.

Contemplating the multiplicity of assertions from poets across many centuries about how poetry and knowledge are deeply interconnected with one another, it is hard not to wonder whether some critics' distaste for the idea is not an aberration, like a brief interlude of *Alexandrianism within a larger epoch of dogmas. The necessary relations between a claim to special knowledge and a claim to special authority make the subject a politically ambiguous one. But enough practitioners have argued that poetry seeks a unique knowledge that it is difficult to dismiss such an idea out of hand. To an extent, the assertion that poetry directly knows anything specific as a genre or that particular poems contain some unique or particular kind of knowledge is hard to analyze in the medium critics write in, prose. And yet poets keep returning to the theme of knowledge in poetry and keep insisting on its importance. Given this reality, one way of thinking about the presence of knowledge in poetry might be to search for its aura or haze rather than for its exact location. Like it or not, poetry has a species of knowledge in the way that Joseph Conrad's narrator, using a poetic *metaphor, said that Marlow had a species of understanding: "to him the meaning of an episode was not inside like a kernel but outside, enveloping the tale which brought it out only as a glow brings out a haze, in the likeness of one of these misty halos that sometimes are made visible by the spectral illumination of moonshine" (Heart of Darkness, 1902).

Auden implied that poets will always be intoxicatingly tempted to search for a "knowledge of life." As long as that search lasts, scholars reading poets' works will continue to be provoked, discomfited, and inspired by their diligent hunts for the life (or the afterlife) of knowledge.

See ARTIFACT, POETRY AS; FICTION, POETRY AS; GAI SABER; INFORMATION, POETRY AS; PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY; POET.

■ J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1938), and The New Criticism (1941), esp. "Wanted: An Ontological Critic"; Brooks; G. Hartman, Wordsworth's Poetry: 1787–1814 (1964); A. Tate, "Literature as Knowledge" and "Tension in Poetry," Essays of Four Decades (1968); O. Paz, The Bow and the Lyre, trans. R.L.C. Simms (1973); E. Miner, "That Literature Is a Kind of Knowledge," CritI 2 (1976); Poetic Knowledge, ed. R. Hagenbüchle and J.T. Swann (1980); Poetry and Epistemology, ed. R. Hagenbüchle and L. Skandera (1986); J. Simpson, "Poetry as Knowledge: Dante's Paradiso XIII," Forum for Modern Language Studies 25 (1989); A. Césaire, "Poetry and Knowledge," Lyric and Dramatic Poetry 1946–1982, trans. C. Eshleman and A. Smith (1990); M. Scroggins, Louis Zukofsky and the Poetry of Knowledge (1998); R. Geuss, "Poetry and Knowledge," and G. W. Most, "Poetry, Knowledge, and Dr. Geuss," Arion 11 (2003); R. von Hallberg, "Lyric Thinking," TriQuarterly 120 (2005); Poetry, Knowledge and Community in Late Medieval France, ed. R. Dixon and F. E. Sinclair (2008); T. Pfau, "'All Is Leaf': Difference, Metamorphosis, and Goethe's Phenomenology of Knowledge," SIR 49 (2010); R. Scharfman, "Aimé Césaire: Poetry Is/ and Knowledge," Research in African Literatures 41 (2010).

N. JENKINS

KOKINSHŪ. The Kokinwakashū (Collection of Old and New Japanese Poems), often known as Kokinshū, is an anthol. of Japanese court poetry (waka*) compiled ca. 905. The most widely circulated version of the text consists of 1,111 poems in 20 volumes, plus prefaces in Japanese and Chinese. Compiled by a committee of poets headed by Ki no Tsurayuki (ca. 868–945), following a command from Emperor Daigo (r. 897–930), the Kokinshū occupies a uniquely significant position in Japanese lit. hist. as the first imperially commissioned anthol. (chokusenshū) of waka. The Kokinshū represented a reemergence of waka into public life following a period in which poetry in Chinese (kanshi; see CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN) had enjoyed overwhelming popularity at court and came to be heavily canonized and vastly influential, regarded by later Japanese poets as a seminal text in the hist. of waka.

The poems of the Kokinshū are almost all in the standard 31-syllable form of court waka, although the collection also includes a handful of poems in other, older forms rarely seen in later chokusenshū. Kokinshū poetry uses refined and elegant lang., frequently has a witty or questioning tone, and is often characterized by intricate wordplay, a feature greatly facilitated by the rhetorical device most often associated with Kokinshū poetry, the "pivot word" (kakekotoba), a type of literary pun. Poems are typically preceded by a headnote identifying their author, topic, and the circumstances of their composition.

Commissioned to preserve for posterity "old poems" not included in the Man'yōshū* and their own poems, the compilers of the Kokinshū selected compositions that can be broadly classified into three groups: older poems, from before the mid-9th c.; poems by court poets from the recent past (mid- to late 9th c.) and poems by contemp. poets, incl. Tsurayuki and the other Kokinshū eds. The Kokinshū includes works by 130 named poets, while approximately 450 poems are recorded as anonymous compositions. Much editorial attention was paid not only to the selection of poems but to the arrangement and sequencing of poems within the volumes of the anthol. The two main topics of poetry in the Kokinshū are the seasons (v. 1–6) and love (v. 11–15); other topics include felicitations (v. 7), travel (v. 9), laments (v. 16), and miscellaneous subjects (v. 17–19). Poems are assigned to each volume based on their topics and carefully ordered within each volume. For instance, the first volume of spring poetry starts with poems mentioning New Year's Day (the first day of spring under the lunar calendar), then continues with poems featuring various spring phenomena—flora, fauna, court festivals—in the order in which they were conventionally supposed to occur. A similar pattern is seen in the other books of seasonal poetry. Poems in the volumes of love poetry follow a loose narrative arc, moving from the first stirrings of desire in volume 11 to the aftermath of separation in volume 15.

The importance of Kokinshū in the later court-poetic trad. is due not only to its poetry but in large part to the influence of its prefaces in presenting an idealized view of waka. Drawing in part on Chinese models, including the Great Preface to the Shijing* (Classic of Poetry, also known as the Book of Songs), Tsurayuki's Japanese preface, starting with the famous declaration that "Japanese poetry takes the human heart as its seed, becoming myriad leaves of words," came to be revered by later poets as the definitive statement on the divine origins, illustrious hist., and expressive and pragmatic nature of Japanese court poetry. In addition to its literary qualities, the Kokinshū, like other chokusenshū, had an important sociopolitical function by virtue of its connection to the imperial line. A chokusenshū served to demonstrate the prestige of the commissioning emperor by presenting outstanding poems as representative of his reign, while simultaneously affirming the social order engendered by his rule.

Initially legitimized as an authoritative text by its imperial commission, the Kokinshū was recanonized in the late 12th c. as a poetic classic of unrivalled prestige and remained at the apex of the poetic canon for centuries to come. The structure and lang. of the Kokinshū served as models for later chokusenshū and for acceptable waka diction in general, and within the highly intertextual poetics of cl. waka, the Kokinshū became a major source of allusion for later poets. A large body of commentarial texts and ritual practices known as the "transmissions on the Kokinshū" (kokin denju) developed around the Kokinshū, passed down through generations of waka poets. As the composition of waka came to be seen as tantamount to a religious vocation and poets came to be worshiped as deities, the Kokinshū came to be revered almost as a sacred text. Although the Kokinshū was decanonized in the late 19th c., supplanted in critical esteem by the earlier Man'yōshū, its authority in matters relating to the composition and crit. of Japanese court poetry for the preceding eight centuries had been without parallel.

See JAPANESE POETICS.

■ J. Konishi, "The Genesis of the Kokinshū Style," HJAS 38 (1978); Kokinshū, trans. L. Rodd and M. Henkenius (1984); H. McCullough, Brocade by Night (1985); Kokin Wakashū, trans. H. McCullough (1985); G. Heldt, The Pursuit of Harmony (2008).

A. E. COMMONS

KOOTENAY SCHOOL. The Kootenay School of Writing (KSW) is a nonprofit writer-run center in Vancouver, British Columbia, formed in 1984 that has promoted *avant-garde poetics in Canada. Uniquely organized as a collective with a small but constantly fluctuating membership, KSW has been long associated with a "politicized understanding of . . . art and literary production" (Klobucar and Barnholden). The school was formed in Vancouver in 1984, after the closure of David Thompson University College in Nelson, British Columbia, by former DTUC instructors and students, including poets Tom Wayman (b. 1945), Colin Browne (b. 1946), and Jeff Derksen (b. 1958). Important KSW poets, in its early phase, include Dorothy Trujillo Lusk (b. 1953), Colin Smith (b. 1957), Peter Culley (b. 1958), Kevin Davies (b. 1958), and Deanna Ferguson (b. 1962). In the 1990s, a number of important feminist poets became associated with the school, incl. Melissa Wolsak (b. 1947), Lisa Robertson (b. 1961), Nancy Shaw (1962–2007), Catriona Strang (b. 1966), and Susan Clark (b. 1954). Later members of the KSW collective have included Edward Byrne (b. 1947), Michael Barnholden (b. 1951), Stephen Collis (b. 1965), Andrew Klobucar (b. 1967), Reg Johanson (b. 1968), Roger Farr (b. 1970), Aaron Vidaver (b. 1970), and Donato Mancini (b. 1974). KSW has been associated with several jours., incl. Writing Magazine (1980–92), Raddle Moon (1983–2002), and W (1999–), as well as the small press Tsunami Editions (1986–2001), which published first books by a number of KSW poets. Often eschewing its status as a cultural institution, KSW has, nevertheless, developed a considerable international reputation.

See CANADA, POETRY OF.

■ Writing Class: The Kootenay School of Writing Anthology, ed. A. Klobucar and M. Barnholden (1999); J. Wiens, The Kootenay School of Writing (2002); P. Butling and S. Rudy, Writing in Our Time: Canada's Radical Poetries in English, 1957–2003 (2005); C. Burnham, The Only Poetry That Matters: Reading the Kootenay School of Writing (2011).

S. COLLIS

KOREA, POETRY OF

I. Classical Period
II. Modern Period

I. Classical Period. Cl. Korean poetry pre-20th c. is divided into two categories according to medium: one written in Korean and the other, hansi, written in cl. Chinese. Prior to the creation of han'gŭl, the Korean alphabet, in the mid-15th c., Korean-lang. poetry was transcribed in Chinese characters, sometimes with variations in the system, borrowing sounds and meaning to signify the original Korean. Even after the promulgation of the Korean alphabet, however, cl. Chinese maintained its prestige as the official written lang. of the ruling class until 1894, the year of the Kabo Reform, when Korea officially adopted han'gŭl as the national alphabet.

A. Silla Dynasty. Historical records witness singing and dancing as significant aspects of ancient Korean life. Koreans believed in the power of singing, music, and dance as ways to communicate with humans or the heavenly spirits. There are, however, few direct literary records from before the establishment of the Unified Silla kingdom (668–918).

The first Korean literary genre is Silla's most noteworthy, the songs called hyangga or "native songs." Fourteen hyangga are included in the monk Iryŏn's book Samguk yusa (Remnants of the Three Kingdoms, late 13th c.). The songs range in style and subject matter, from playful folk songs such as the "Sŏdongyo" (Song of Sŏdong) and "Hŏnhwaga" (Flower Offering Song), which suggest that folk songs were absorbed into the hyangga repertoire, to Buddhist devotional hymns and songs dedicated to exemplary hwarang (young knights). These hyangga were recorded in hyangch'al, a method using Chinese characters to represent sounds and meanings of the Korean lang. rather than as Chinese trans.

Folk songs ascribed to the Koguryŏ (37 BCE–668 CE) and the Paekche kingdoms (18 BCE–663 CE), with titles only, are included in the 15th-c. Koryŏ sa (History of Koryŏ); the text of one Paekche song is found in the Akhak kweböm (Primer for Music Studies, 1492). Quan Tang shi (Complete Tang Poetry), a Chinese compilation, includes works by several Silla poets such as Ch'oe Ch'i-wŏn (b. 857) and Kim Ka-gi (d. 859), while the 8th-c. Nihon shoki (Chronicles of Japan) refers to a Paekche man who taught Chinese-style gigaku, or Buddhist ceremonial dance, in Japan.

B. Koryŏ Dynasty. The Koryŏ dynasty (918–1392) instituted a state civil-service examination in 958, patterned on the Chinese system, which used Chinese literary, philosophical, and historical sources and materials. One result of this official centering of Chinese materials was the importance of hansi (the Chinese shi* and fu*, poetry and rhyme prose) in Korean literary compositions. A multiplication of individual works and anthols. and the emergence of writers like Yi Kyu-bo (1168–1241), Ch'oe Ch'ung (984–1068), Kim Hwang-wŏn (1045–1117), and Chŏng Chi-sang (d. 1135), as well as the Chungnim kohoe (Bamboo Grove Assembly), a group of seven highly regarded poets of the late 12th c., are a few examples of Koryŏ interest in hansi genres.

The hyangga trad. continued into Koryŏ, the best-known example being the series of 11 devotional hymns composed by the Buddhist monk Kyunyŏ (923–73). The monk Chinul's (1128–1210) disciple Hyesim (1178–1234) wrote hansi poems on sŏn (Zen) subjects and collected Buddhist tales, meditation puzzles, *allegories, and poems in a 30-v. anthol. Sŏnmun yŏmsong (1226) or "Praise and Puzzle in Sŏn Literature." The monk Ch'ungji (1226–93) focused in his poetry on the plight of the Korean people during the late 13th-c. Mongol campaign against Japan, when they were forced to build and man an invasion fleet. References to other Buddhist monks are included in the Haedong kosŭng chŏn (Lives of Eminent Korean Monks, 1215).

Notable among Koryŏ writings and lit. were the mostly Chinese-lang. (with Korean-lang. refrains) kyŏnggi-style songs, or kyŏnggich'e ka, of which the "Hallim pyŏlgok" (Song of the Capital, 13th c.) is exemplary. Koryŏ-era popular songs in Korean, sogyo, mostly about love, collected in the Akchang kasa (Lyrics for Akchang, 16th c.), include "Kasiri" (Would You Go?) and "Ch'ŏngsanpyŏlgok" (Song of the Green Hills). Kim Pu-sik's (1075–1151) Samguk sagi (History of the Three Kingdoms) and Iryŏn's (1206–89) Samguk yusa, a compilation from many sources of Korean legends, myths, hists., biographies, songs, and spells, are major landmarks in Korea's political, cultural, and lit. hist.

C. Early Chosŏn. The first two hundred years of the Chosŏn dynasty, from its founding in 1392 until the invasions by the Japanese armies of Hideyoshi in 1598, was a period of great artistic creativity and accomplishments, both cultural and scientific. The new dynasty was only 50 years old when its fourth king, Sejong (r. 1418–50), promulgated a new phonetic alphabet, now known as han'gŭl, for the Korean lang. Composition in the Korean vernacular flourished, esp. in two verse forms, the three-line sijo and the longer kasa. Many anthols. of these works were assembled and published later, in the 18th and 19th cs.; various groups coalesced around schools of literary thought, preferences for Chinese or Korean forms of expression, and not infrequently, political-philosophical outlooks.

Akchang was a verse form written for performance at state ceremonies with a distinct political purpose to praise the founding of the dynasty. The two best-known examples are associated with King Sejong. The first, Yongbi ŏch'ŏn ka (Song of the Dragons Flying to Heaven), was composed at Sejong's order, to praise the dynasty's founders while presenting a ceremonial alternative to resentments still lingering at the overthrow of the preceding Koryŏ dynasty. It was completed in 1445 as hansi, then translated into Korean, annotated, and finally published two years later in an ed. of 550 copies, distributed at court. Sejong himself is said to have written the other notable akchang, Wŏrin ch'ŏn'gang chi kok (The Song of Moonlight on One Thousand Waters, 1449) a remembrance of Queen Sohŏn, who had died in 1446.

The sijo is a three-line verse form, originally composed for musical performance. There are several ways of singing, characterized by a deliberate slowness. In singing 40 to 50 syllables, the popular sijo ch'ang (sijo song) style takes three to four minutes, while kagok, the style performed by professional singers, takes as much as ten. The deliberate slowness of a sijo performance is said to bring the performer and audience into a state of tranquility and profound concentration. While syllable count is not fixed, it does play a role in patterns of syllable distribution among the four phrases that constitute the sijo lines. For the first two lines, the usual syllable count is 3-4-3 (or 4)-4. The third line, with a regular sequence of 3-5-4-3 syllables coupled with a "twist" or "turn" at the beginning of the line, brings the poem to a conclusion. Though sijo is widely believed to date back to the late Koryŏ period, its historical origins are obscured by the relatively late creation of the Korean alphabet. The yangban gentry class provided its main authors at least until the 19th c., while most of the sijo anthols. date from the 18th c. or later.

Even though many sijo and vernacular Korean poems are about the enjoyment of life, one characteristic feature of Korean lit. is a seriousness of literary expression, esp. in the works of the ruling class. One of the most famous examples is the exchange between the Koryŏ loyalist Chŏng Mong-ju (1337–92) and Yi Pang-wŏn (1367–1422), son of the founding Chosŏn king Yi Sŏng-gye. The story associated with Chŏng's famous sijo relates that the king's son organized a banquet and invited Chŏng, then offered a somewhat mocking, metaphorical toast couched in a sijo, urging Chŏng to stop his resistance to the changing times. Chŏng's reply has become known as the "Tansim ka" or "Song of a Loyal Heart":

Though this body die and die a hundred times again,
White bones become but dust,
a soul exist, then not,
Still, this heart wholly for my lord:
How could it ever change?

(trans. D. McCann)

In 1416, in the aftermath of Sejo's (r. 1455–68) usurpation of the throne and assassination of its occupant, his own nephew Tanjong (r. 1452–55), Sŏng Sam-mun (1418–56), one of the "Six Martyred Ministers" put to death for a plan to return Tanjong to the throne, composed on the eve of his execution a sijo that echoes Chŏng's:

Once this body is dead and gone
you ask, what will it be?
On the highest peak of Pongnae Mountain a towering, spreading pine tree.
When sky and earth are filled with white snow, alone and green, green I shall be.

(trans. D. McCann)

Yi Hwang (1501–70), one of the great neo-Confucian philosophers of Chosŏn Korea, loved the song aspect of sijo and the positive effect that singing and listening could have on both the performer/composer and the audience. The woodblocks carved from Yi's own calligraphy for his Tosan sibigok (Twelve Songs of Tosan, 1565) are the oldest of all sijo source materials. Another prominent neo-Confucian scholar Yi I's (1536–84) "Kosan kugok ka" (Nine Songs from Kosan), which echoed a similar work by the Chinese philosopher Zhu Xi, also connotes the popularity of sijo among yangban elites. Chŏng Ch'ŏl (1536–93) composed dozens of sijo, in addition to four famous kasa poems. Some reflect his difficult political circumstances, others a more general philosophical outlook, and still others a directly didactic intent, as in the series written to instruct the people of the province where he had been sent as governor.

It is noteworthy that many sijo were ascribed to kisaeng, the female entertainer, some of whom must have been professional sijo performers. The most famous of all is Hwang Chini, the legendary author—in the absence of contemp. documentation, it is impossible to establish her authorship—of a half dozen truly remarkable sijo and a number of poems in cl. Chinese, a woman with a reputation for beauty, artistic accomplishments, as well as a singularly independent mind and will. One of her sijo reads, Alas! What have I done?

Didn't I know how I would yearn?
If only I'd said, Just stay,
how could he have gone? But stubborn
I sent him away, and know now
I never knew what it is to yearn.

(trans. D. McCann)

The kasa is the other major Korean vernacular verse form. It too uses a four-part line. Narrative and discursive, without stanza divisions, it was often used for travelogues, while upper-class women used the form to express their thoughts at the restraints of social norms. Some went on for hundreds of lines; in 16th- and 17th-c. practice, the final line would be marked by the sijo-like 3-5-4-3 syllable count. The first example of kasa is Chŏng Kŭg-in's (1401–81) "Sangch'un kok" (Song to Spring), praising life in the countryside. Chŏng Ch'ŏl's two famous travelogue kasa, "Sŏngsan pyŏlgok" (Song of Sŏng Mountain) and "Kwandong pyŏlgok" (Song of Kwandong), offer an exuberant view of the Korean landscape, while Chŏng's other two kasa, "Samiin kok" (Longing for the Beautiful One) and "Sok miin kok" (Again, Beautiful One), written in the dramatic persona of a woman abandoned, are read as expressions of Chŏng's own feelings at being dismissed from office and sent into exile. The "Samiin kok" is esp. noteworthy for its dramatic structure, built around the contrast between the natural passing of the seasons and the unnatural human tendency to let warm feelings turn and then stay cold.

Hŏ Ch'o-hŭi (1563–89), better known in Korea by her pseud. Nansŏrhŏn, wrote many highly regarded hansi, as well as two kasa, "Kyuwŏn ka" (Married Sorrow) and "Pongsŏnhwa" (The Touch-Me-Not).

D. Later Chosŏn. In the 17th c., after the Japanese invasion of Korea, the change of the East Asian political map—most prominently in the demise of the Ming dynasty, which had a strong bond with Korea and the rise of the Qing—led Korea to assert its own cultural identity. Kim Man-jung (1637–92), author of two novels in Korean, declared, "Only Korean vernacular can express genuine Koreanness." Sijo, with changes in form and vernacular subjects, and kasa, as a longer form, became more widely practiced by yangban literati moving away from strictly Chinese models and by women who, confined to the house, nevertheless encouraged the circulation of vernacular Korean works.

The life of the poet Pak Il-lo (1561–1643) marks a high point in the devel. of Korean vernacular poetry. His "T'aep'yŏngsa" (Song of Peace) marked the close of the 16th c.'s final devastating decade. While many of his sijo verse compositions are unimaginative restatements of Confucian precepts, his kasa are another matter entirely. The "Sŏnsangt'an" (Lament on the Waters, 1601) returns to the theme of the naval campaign against the Japanese. "Saje kok" (The Sedge Bank, 1611) is a portrait of a rural retreat. "Nuhang sa" or "Song of a Humble Life" (1611) combines realistic plot, vividly observed setting, and strikingly mod. vernacular dialogue in a unique expression of the traditional theme of rustic retirement.

Yun Sŏn-do (1587–1671) was a brilliant innovator in the sijo form and wrote numerous individual works and sijo sequences. The most famous of the latter is his Ŏbu sasi sa (Fisherman's Calendar, 1651), a four-part, four-season sequence on the pleasures of the fisherman's tranquil existence. These poems are notable for their clear and flowing vernacular diction, use of an onomatopoeic refrain, and controlled easing of the usual structural patterns of the sijo.

In the 18th and 19th cs., as Chosŏn society saw significant social changes and economic growth, the new sirhak, or practical learning group, produced localized, realist hansi. Chŏng Yag-yong (1762–1836), a famous encyclopedic scholar who produced almost 3,000 poems, declared, "I am a Korean; I compose Korean poetry." He meant Korean poetry written in cl. Chinese. While the circulation of vernacular Korean book narratives significantly increased, poetry in the vernacular also saw diversification in form and subject matter. Perhaps most obvious was the move toward freer expression of desire and emotion, which had been tightly controlled by neo-Confucian attitudes. Some yangban scholars composed sasŏl sijo, a longer version of sijo and kasa, depicting blatantly erotic scenes. These devels. coincided with the emergence of p'ansori, a performative art of singing and narrating stories, which negotiated a controversial position between kasa and the p'ansori-novel.

The 19th c. brought fundamental transformations to the whole of Korean society. Mid-century saw the defeat of China by Eur. powers, a seismographic change in the Asian cultural sphere. Sijo and kasa continued to be performed and composed, though without notable accomplishment. The practice of hansi faded, prompted by the abolition of the state examination system with the Kabo Reform of 1894, yet it continued through the 20th c. and into the present as a practice suitable for formal occasions. Sijo and kasa, often with rhythmic patterns fitted to Western music, were written and published to accommodate the changing world.

II. Modern Period. Beginning in the late 19th c., rapid social change was accompanied by a fundamental transformation of the cultural system. Most revolutionary was the replacement of cl. Chinese with han'gŭl as the official script. The pursuit of a high art in vernacular Korean defined the ensuing 20th c. In the age of imperialism, many Korean literati were also national leaders, and their literary jours. functioned as instruments for cultural change. A hist. of colonial rule, liberation, and subsequent national division directed Korean lit. toward a socio-political agenda that lasted into the final decade of the 20th c.

A. Japanese Colonial Period (1910–45). Liberation from conventional poetic form began with the *free verse imported from the West through Japan, where many Korean intellectuals studied. The beginning of a "new poetry" was announced in "Hae egesŏ Sonyŏn ege" (From the Sea to Youth, 1908) by Ch'oe Namsŏn, a poem that deploys the repeated refrain of the sea's voice urging change. Ch'oe had studied in Japan and brought back printing equipment to publish Sonyŏn (Youth), the first literary magazine devoted to the movement for a new Korean culture. Onoe ŭi mudo (Dance of Anguish), was published in 1921, an anthol. of trans. by Kim Ŏk (1895–1950) of Fr., Ir., and other poets. In 1923, Kim published the first mod. Korean poetry collection, Haep'ari ŭi norae (Song of Jellyfish). The trans. and poems presented a completely new voice in vernacular Korean. In 1925, one of Kim Ŏk's students, Kim Sowŏl (1902–34), published Azaleas, the most favored poetry book of the entire 20th c. Kim Sowŏl's poetry, imbued with the sense of sorrowful loss, brought folk-song rhythm to mod. poetry. The title poem remains his best-known work:

When you leave, weary of seeing me,
silently I shall send you on your way.

From Mt. Yak in Yŏngbyŏn, an armful of azaleas
I shall gather and scatter on your way.

Step by step on the flowers lying before you tread softly, deeply, and go.

When you go, weary
of seeing me,
though I die I shall not shed one tear.

(trans. D. McCann)

Hang Yong-un (1879–1944), a reformist Buddhist monk and a national leader in opposing Japan's colonial rule, also published a canonical poetry book, Nim ŭi ch'immuk (Silence of Love, 1926), evoking the absence of love as political metaphor. Many poems of the 1920s mix a nationalistic anger with sentimental tears. Yi Sang-hwa's (1901–43) "Ppaeakkin tŭl edo pom ŭn onŭka" (Will Spring Return to Stolen Fields?) and Yi Yuk-sa's (1904–44) "Chŏlchŏng" (The Summit) more directly lament the lost sovereignty.

The Korea Artista Proletaria Federatio (KAPF), organized by Marxist writers in 1925 and led by the poet and critic Im Hwa (1908–53), came to exert strong influence on the literary field. Yet political or ideological differences were accommodated in those days. Im Hwa, e.g., published his critique of Sowŏl's poems in the same jour., Kaebyŏk (Dawn), that had published Sowŏl's poems in the first place. Paek Sŏk (1912–95), a poet who with many others was classified in South Korea as having "gone North" after 1945, though in fact he merely stayed at his home following liberation, like So Wŏl used northern dialect and rural themes. Two poets from the modernist group Kuinhoe (Nine-Person Group), Chŏng Chi-yong (1902–50) and Yi Sang (1910–37), brought additional changes to Korean poetry in the 1930s. Chŏng, informed by *modernism, worked toward refining the mod. Korean lang. Yi Sang's surrealistic wit was a challenge to his contemporaries and remains so today. Yun Tong-ju (1918–45) reflected the turbulent colonial period; his works became widely popular following his death during imprisonment in Tokyo.

In 1938, Japan banned the Korean lang. in schools and, in 1941, the publication of Korean-lang. books. Writers either used the Japanese lang. or hid their works and waited.

B. After the Liberation. After liberation in 1945, accompanied by the North-South division of the country, writers occupied two positions in the political spectrum, Left or Right; but for an interval, during the two years or so known as the Liberation Space, they managed to write, publish, and engage in debate. Eventually, many of the leftists went to the communist North, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), while the nationalists remained in the Republic of Korea. Both states were established in 1948 and were at war with one another in 1950. Little remains known about the literary realm of the DPRK beyond its state-mandated ideology of Juche (self-reliance). In the South, following the Korean War's end in 1953, a new curriculum was established, built around the Korean lang., which had been banned in the late colonial period, while nationalism emerged as a guiding counterpart to the North's Juche state philosophy. Eager for work in vernacular Korean, the new generation of students welcomed the republication of books by such writers as Kim Sowŏl, Han Yong-un, and Yun Tong-ju.

During this period, Korean poetry also witnessed the arrival of two major poets, Sŏ Chŏng-ju (1915–2000) and Kim Su-yŏng (1921–68). Sŏ created an oeuvre impressive—in addition to its supple use of the Korean lang.—for its *imagery, *prosody, and vivid voice. One of his poems, "Tongch'ŏn" (Winter Sky), recaptures Kim Sowŏl's use of poetic gesture:

With a thousand nights' dream
I have rinsed clear the gentle brow of my heart's love, to transplant it into the heavens.
A fierce bird knows, and in mimicry arcs through the midwinter sky.

(trans. D. McCann)

Kim Su-yŏng, widely known as a political radical, opened a new imaginary space in Korean lang., urging readers to participate directly in the improvement of society. His poem "P'ul" (Grasses), pub. after his death, remains an emblematic statement of that democratic ideal:

Grasses lie down
Blown by the wind driving rain from the east grasses lie,
at last cried
As the day is overcast, they cried more, and lay again

Grasses lie
Faster than the wind they lie
Faster than the wind they cry
Earlier than the wind they rise

The day is overcast, and grasses lie to the ankle to the sole they lie
Later than the wind they lie
Earlier than the wind they rise
Later than the wind they cry
Earlier than the wind they smile
The day is overcast, and the grass roots lie.

(trans. Y.-J. Lee)

Sŏ Chŏng-ju was presented as a major poet in Korean school textbooks, while Kim Su-yŏng, whose poetry was full of images of revolution mixed with Korean-lang. expression that readers found difficult, was included only after the democratizing changes of the 1980s.

During the latter half of the 20th c., South Korea experienced rapid industrialization and economic growth, accompanied by a series of repressive military dictatorships. Like their predecessors at the beginning of the century, many Korean poets committed their energies to the democratization movement, giving the 1980s the name si ŭi sidae (the age of poetry). The works of poets like Chŏng Chi-yong, Paek Sŏk, and others who had "gone North," banned until 1987, met with enthusiastic interest. While many poets were arrested and imprisoned, their works still managed to produce sales of several million volumes, an exceptional sales record. In this period, two major poets, both victims of repeated imprisonments, became recognized in the outer world: Ko Un (b. 1933), esp. for his Maninbo, (Record of Ten Thousand People), completed in 30 books over 25 years (1986–2010), and Kim Chi Ha (b. 1941) for his revival of the p'ansori form and rhythm in dissident poetry. Ko Un's Maninbo project, started while he was imprisoned in solitary confinement, overturned the traditional idea of the elite family genealogical records known as chokpo. Kim Chi Ha's long, p'ansori-style poems such as Ojŏk (The Five Bandits), received substantial international acclaim during the 1970s when he too was being held in prison.

The 1990s in Korea saw the rise of women's poetry, which had been long neglected. A few women poets such as No Ch'ŏn-myŏng (1912–57) and Kim Nam-jo (b. 1927) had achieved some reputation earlier. Kim Hyesoon's (b. 1955) poems depicted a woman's interiority amid everyday life. Her unabashedly confessional works at times took a dramatic narrative form borrowed from shamanistic trad.

With the Korean economy flourishing in the 1980s, the poetry of Hwang Chi-u (b. 1952), Yi Sŏng-bok (b. 1952), and Chang Chŏng-il (b. 1963) brought pop culture themes laced with everyday trivial into their poetic subject matter. Their focus on the present and explicit commitment to colloquial expression are to be seen and heard among new poetic voices in the 21st c., among whom are a number of women poets grappling with issues of womanhood in 21st-c. Korea.

■ Anthologies and Translations: The Middle Hour: Selected Poems of Kim Chi Ha, trans. D. McCann (1980); Anthology of Korean Literature: From Early Times to the Nineteenth Century, ed. P. Lee (1981); Selected Poems of Sŏ Chŏngju, trans. D. McCann (1989); Modern Korean Literature, ed. P. Lee (1990); Sŏ Chŏngju: The Early Lyrics, 1941–1960, trans. B. Anthony (1991); Pine River and Lone Peak: An Anthology of Three Chosŏn Dynasty Poets, ed. and trans. P. Lee (1991); Selected Poems by Kim Namjo, trans. D. McCann and H. Y. Sallee (1993); R. Rutt, The Bamboo Grove: An Introduction to Sijo (1998); The Book of Korean Shijo, trans. K. O'Rourke (2002); The Columbia Anthology of Traditional Korean Poetry, ed. P. Lee (2002); The Columbia Anthology of Modern Korean Poetry, ed. D. McCann (2004); Everything Yearned For: Manhae's Poems of Love and Longing, trans. F. Cho (2005); Ko Un, Ten Thousand Lives, trans. Y. M. Kim, B. Anthony, and G. Gach (2005); Echoing Song: Contemporary Korean Women Poets, ed. P. Lee (2005); D. Choi, Anxiety of Words: Contemporary Poetry by Korean Women (2006); S. Kim, Azaleas: A Book of Poems, trans. D. McCann (2007); Ko Un, What?: 108 Korean Zen Poems, trans. B. Anthony, G. Gach, and Y. M. Kim (2008).

■ Criticism and History: P. Lee, Songs of Flying Dragons: A Critical Reading (1975); D. McCann, Form and Freedom in Korean Poetry (1988); B. Myers, Han Sŏrya and North Korean Literature (1994); Early Korean Literature: Selections and Introductions, ed. and trans. D. McCann (2000); The Record of the Black Dragon Year, trans. P. Lee (2000); P. Lee, A History of Korean Literature (2003); M. Pihl, The Korean Singer of Tales (2003); D. Seo and P. Lee, Oral Literature of Korea (2005).

Y.-J. Lee; D. R. McCann

L

LADINO POETRY. See JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY.

LAI (OF; Eng. lay; Ger. leich). A short narrative or lyric poem, perhaps based on Celtic material but primarily Fr., most of them secular and usually set to music. (1) In OF, the oldest narrative lais, almost always written in *octosyllables, are the contes or short romantic tales originated by Marie de France in the late 12th c. Most of them have Breton themes, chiefly love but also the supernatural. Marie's dozen lais take as their central interest true love, even if adulterous, in the face of marriages of convenience and abusive husbands. Later, the term lai became synonymous with conte. (2) The oldest lyric lais are by Gautier de Dargies, who flourished in the first third of the 13th c. The lyric lai is addressed to an earthly lady or to the Virgin, but it differs from other poems of this theme by varying the rhymes and syllable counts in its stanzas, without *refrain. One of the most interesting, by Ernoul le Vieux, has no love theme; it is the Lai de l'ancien et du nouveau testament. The OF lai may be related to the Occitan descort* (discord). In the 14th c., Guillaume de Machaut standardized the form; half of this century's 57 extant lais are by him. (3) The term Breton lay was applied in 14th-c. England to poems set in Brittany, written in a spirit similar to that of Marie's; sometimes these poems apply the term to themselves. About a dozen Breton lays are extant in Eng., among them Sir Orfeo, Sir Launfal, Emare, and Chaucer's "Franklin's Tale." Since the 16th c., lay has been used for song; in the early 19th c., the term was sometimes used for a historical ballad, e.g. Walter Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel.

See LEICH.

■ F. Wolf, Über die Lais, Sequenzen, und Leiche (1841); Lais et descorts française du XIIIe siècle, ed. A. Jeanroy et al. (1901); H. Spanke, "Sequenz und Lai," Studi medievali 11 (1938); G. Reaney, "Concerning the Origins of the Medieval Lai," Music and Letters 39 (1958); J. Maillard, Évolution et ésthetique du lai lyrique (1961); H. Baader, Die Lais (1966); M. J. Donovan, The Breton Lai: A Guide to Varieties (1969); K. W. Le Mée, A Metrical Study of Five Lais of Marie de France (1978); The Lais of Marie de France, 2d ed., trans. R. Hanning and J. Ferrante (1978); G. S. Burgess, The Lais of Marie de France (1987); G. S. Burgess, "Lai," Medieval France: An Encyclopedia, ed. W. W. Kibler (1995); C. J. Hatton, "Narrative Lai and Verse Romance: Generations and Intergeneric Play," DAI 65 (2004).

U. T. HOLMES; T.V.F. BROGAN

LAISSE. The OF epics or chansons de geste* are divided into sections or groups of lines of no specified length called laisses; in the Chanson de Roland, they range from 5 to 35 lines. Technically, laisses are not strophic because there is no *responsion of form from one laisse to the next; the length of each depends on how much emphasis the poet wishes to give its subject. Each laisse links together its lines with terminal *assonance or—in later poems—*rhyme; the distinction between *masculine and feminine is observed. Sometimes the content of a laisse is repeated item for item in one or two following laisses, though with differing assonance or rhyme; such repetitions are called laisses similaires. The mod. analogue is the *verse paragraph, though this is unrhymed.

■ J. Rychner, La Chanson de geste (1955), ch. 4; A. Monteverdi, "La Laisse epique," La Technique littéraire des chansons de geste (1959); B. Schurfranz, "Strophic Structure versus Alternate Divisions in the Prise d'Orange," RPh 33 (1979); R. M. Johnston, "The Function of Laisse Divisions in the Poema de mio Cid," Journal of Hispanic Philology 8 (1984); E. A. Heinemann, "Measuring Units of Poetic Discourse," Romance Epic, ed. H.-E. Keller (1987); D. Boutet, "Jehan de Lanson" technique et esthétique de la chanson de geste au XIII^e siècle (1988); J.-P. Carton, "A Contribution to the Study of Laisses Similaires in the Chanson de Roland: Repetition and Narrative Progression in Laisses 133–135," Olifant 21 (1997); E. A. Heinemann, "Toward a History of the Metric Art of the Chanson de geste: Laisse and Echo in the Opening Scene of the Three-Verse Version of the Prise d'Orange," Echoes of the Epic, ed. D. P. Schenck and M. J. Schenck (1998).

U. T. HOLMES; T.V.F. BROGAN

LAKE SCHOOL, Lake Poets, Lakers. These terms typically designate three Brit. poets of the romantic period: William Wordsworth, S. T. Coleridge, and Robert Southey. In 1802 in the Edinburgh Review, the hostile critic Francis Jeffery first referred to the three as a "sect" of poets, which in 1807 he coupled with "the Lakes of Cumberland" or the so-called Lake District in England. A December 1809 review calls them "The Bards of the Lake." By most accounts, the poets did not have enough in common to justify the grouping; in Biographia Literaria, Coleridge himself overtly objects to the identification of his work in this way, insisting on its uniqueness and originality. Fear of revolution, overshadowed by the recent revolution in France, initially inspired Jeffery's grouping of the three poets whose work he found doctrinaire and subversive. But by around 1814, the classification of the Lake school was generally accepted and no longer necessarily hostile. At first, the jibes were aimed against the new poets' political principles, but after the publication of the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads in 1800, with Wordsworth's and Coleridge's names now on the title page, the focus shifted to the innovations in poetics—simplicity in diction; novelty in meter; and, in content, the effort to focus on outsider figures of society and to naturalize the supernatural and make transcendent the natural. The association via geography was a metonym meant to imply an aesthetic of vulgar rusticity. Such a metonym, however, radically simplifies the complex concerns and poetics involved, as well as the significant differences among the philosophies, temperaments, and productions of the three poets.

See COCKNEY SCHOOL, ROMANTICISM.

■ D. Perkins, "The Construction of 'The Romantic Movement' as a Literary Classification" Nineteenth-Century Literature 45 (1990); J. Cox, "Leigh Hunt's Cockney School: The Lakers' 'Other,'" Romanticism on the Net 14 (May 1999), http://www.erudit.org/revue/ron/1999/v/n14/005859ar.html.

T.V.F. BROGAN; E. ROHRBACH

LAMENT. A poem or song of grief, frequently accompanied by instrumental music and by ritualized vocal gestures and symbolic movements such as wailing and breast-beating. As an element of ritual practices such as funerals, cultic worship, and formal rites of passage and leave-taking, and in representations of these practices in literary forms incl. epic, tragedy, and *elegy, lament reaches back to the beginnings of recorded culture: in the Mesopotamian city-laments of the 3rd millennium BCE, in Homer's Iliad and Odyssey (8th c. BCE), in the Epic of Gilgamesh (7th c. BCE), in the Heb. Psalms (13th–6th c. BCE) and book of Lamentations (6th c. BCE), and throughout the tragedies and pastorals of Gr. and Roman antiquity. From the Judaic trad., lament was carried over into the Christic (e.g., Christ's lament for Jerusalem in the 1st-c. gospels of Matthew and Luke) and the Islamic (e.g., in the "Lament" from Rūmī's 13th-c. poem Masnavī). In Sanskrit lit., "The Lament of Rati" is a celebrated passage from Kālidāsa's 5th-c. epic Kumārasambhava. In the Middle Ages, lament took shape in the Lat. planctus* and in the melancholy vernacular poems of the Exeter Book poets (Anglo-Saxon), the kharja* of Spain (Mozarabic), and the planh* of the troubadours (Occitan). Med. chansons de geste and Ren. epic poems abound in stylized laments for fallen heroes, and innumerable mod. poets have imitated the bucolic laments of Theocritus (3rd c. BCE) and Virgil (1st c. BCE) and the plangent refrain of Bion's famous "Lament for Adonis" (ca. 100 BCE). In 17th-c. Italy, the dramatic lament was popularized by Claudio Monteverdi and other composers and became an essential element of opera. Ritualized lament, with or without instrumental music, remains an important part of the mourning cultures of many societies, incl. the Druze nabd of Lebanon, the Irish keen, the k'u-ko of southern China, the Ga adowa of Ghana, the Setu laments of Estonia, and Af. Am. *blues.

Laments commonly figure collective as well as individual losses. They may protest the status quo, as in Tahmina's lament in Ferdowsi's 10th-c. Iranian epic Shahnama, or foster powerful identifications across sociopolitical divides, as in the many laments in Aeschylus's The Persians (472 BCE), which is as much about Athenian identification with the Persians they have destroyed as it is about Athenian joy at their defeat of the Persians at Salamis. Lament may give form to impulses of compunction, reconciliation, and forgiveness as well as despair, melancholy, and resentment. Although correspondence between representation and social practice is often obscure, archeological evidence (e.g., of Mycenaean funerary practices) and comparative anthropological evidence (e.g., of mod. Gr. ritual customs and beliefs) help supplement and clarify the literary record.

The suffering of captive women and the destruction of cities are prominent and frequently intertwined themes in ancient laments. Such laments may spur, even as they seek to manage, communal grief. The lamentations of women esp. are often marked as both dangerous and necessary—dangerous, because their public indulgence could give way to women's unchecked erotic passion or rage or exacerbate the grief of men, possibly inciting vengeance and other social disruption; necessary, because a community's potentially disabling grief requires an expressive channel, such as might be forbidden or stigmatized among men. Male lamentation abounds in ancient and mod. lits., sometimes celebrated as a masculine duty and achievement, sometimes criticized or interdicted as a feminizing practice. But in many societies, ancient and mod., women are thought to have a privileged relation to grief, and lamentation is often one of the few permissible, if constrained, forms of political expression available to them. Women tend to be the generic subjects of literary laments, even—or perhaps esp.—where the losses sustained by men and the genres (such as epic and tragedy) owned by men are thought to matter most, as in the kommoi shared with tragic choruses by lamenting heroines such as Electra, and in mod. instances like Britomart's Petrarchan lament in book 3 of Edmund Spenser's The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596). Women's losses are brought to the fore in other genres as well, incl. dramatic adaptations of Antigone's lament, from Sophocles' Antigone (5th c. BCE) to Griselda Gambaro's Antígona Furiosa (1986), and Irish poet Eileen O'Connell's (Eibhlín Dubh Ní Chonaill) literary transformation of folk mourning practices in her Lament for Art O'Leary (1773).

In mod. works like O'Connell's and Gambaro's, lament distinguishes itself from other poetic mourning genres, such as elegy and *epitaph, through its closer connection with ritual incantation and remains audible in Jewish and Christian psalms and in the Islamic marthiya. As one moves beyond poetry's religious domain, the term loses much of its distinguishing force—except in the musical trad., where lament has continued to receive distinctive formal treatment, esp. in oratorio and opera, from Monteverdi's Lamento d'Arianna (composed 1608) to Giacomo Carissimi's Jephte (ca. 1649), Henry Purcell's Dido and Aeneas (1689), G. F. Handel's Agrippina (1709) and Saul (1738), Modest Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov (1874), and Benjamin Britten's Turn of the Screw (1954). Mod. poems without musical settings that call themselves laments—from the late med. Scots "Lament for the Makars" by William Dunbar to the many soi-disant laments by Robert Burns, John Clare, Thomas Hardy, Felicia Hemans, Langston Hughes, Katharine Tynan, and W. C. Williams—may do so to reactivate the association not just with music as such but also with sung or chanted lang. as collective and communal expression, sometimes harkening back to the trads. of antiquity, sometimes using popular forms like the ballad.

See COMPLAINT, DIRGE, EPICEDIUM, MONODY.

■ S. Girard, Funeral Music and Customs in Venezuela (1980); S. Feld, Sound and Sentiment, 2d ed. (1990); C. N. Seremetakis, The Last Word (1991); P. W. Ferris Jr., The Genre of Communal Lament in the Bible and the Ancient Near East (1992); G. Holst-Warhaft, Dangerous Voices (1992); "Lament," spec. iss., Early Music 27.3 (1999); M. Alexiou, The Ritual Lament in Greek Tradition, 2d ed. (2002); N. Loraux, The Mourning Voice (2002); C. Dué, The Captive Woman's Lament in Greek Tragedy (2006); M. G. McGeachy, Lonesome Words (2006); R. Saunders, Lamentation and Modernity in Literature, Philosophy, and Culture (2007); C. Lansing, Passion and Order (2008); Lament, ed. A. Suter (2008).

M. CAVITCH

LANDSCAPE POEM. The term landscape has a variety of meanings, enfolding *nature and art, the actual world, and the world as it is seen in spatial extension and in imagination. Landscape in poetry has involved all these references. While some critics have identified a set of universal landscape values, rooted in evolutionary psychology, most agree that its meaning and organization have changed with historical changes in the social, economic, and environmental conditions of culture.

While landscape was rarely a poetic subject in its own right before the 18th c., the roots of the mod. landscape poem can be found in cl. lit. In ancient *epic, landscape played an important role in enhancing narrative, sometimes through *simile, other times through description. Landscape in Homer conveys the strategic vision of the hero, the range of terrain he experienced, or conveys the psychological and moral import of the adventure. An example of the latter is Calypso's grotto, which fans out from the hearth fire to the meadows: "it was indeed a spot where even an immortal visitor might pause to gaze in wonder and delight." Later Gr. and Roman texts introduced a dimension of scenery more concerned with the occupations, recreations, and emergent milieu of the individual. The georgic and the topos of the locus amoenus are cl. elements of landscape that would be carried forward into early mod. Eur. poetic trads.

But while cl. lit. emphasized the narrative and tonal possibilities of landscape, med. trads., distrusting the senses and materiality generally, approached landscape with a stronger analogical thrust, addressed to spiritual concerns. The wilderness of the Bible is not a place of expansive prospect, and the hortus conclusus of med. lit. has a strong allegorical force. Travel writing of the Middle Ages treats the landscape more as symbolic labyrinth than synoptic vista. Only with Petrarch's influential (and disputed) letter (Familiares 4.1) in which he describes his ascent of Mont Ventoux does the aesthetic of the single viewer's prospect really emerge, yet still in moral terms.

In the 17th c., with the conceptual and geographic divisions of space brought on by changes in science, exploration, and economics, landscape emerges as a major element of both painting and poetic description, in the case of poetry with attention to perceptual and phenomenological experience as such. While the analogical and symbolic dimension of landscape remains important, becoming increasingly ideological and moral as opposed to theological in its thrust, the principle of sensuous aliveness (enargeia*), stirring the imagination through pleasure and struggle, is pervasive in the poetry of Jean de La Ceppède, Jean de Sponde, Luis de Góngora, John Denham, John Milton, and Andrew Marvell. The *pastoral emerges in the 17th c. as a major genre, reviving Virgilian conventions but with a greater emphasis on the harmonious order of nature. In "L'Allegro," Milton writes, "straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures / while the landscape round it measures." In Paradise Lost, Adam has "prospect large" and takes in a "lovely . . . landscape" of variegated colors, vernal breezes, and abundant fruits. But as Satan approaches paradise, he encounters a "steep wilderness . . . grotesque and wild" that denies access to Eden, a rugged terrain that would appeal more to later, romantic tastes. The 17th c. in England also revives the cl. praise of the country house as an expression of republican virtues. Ben Jonson's "To Penshurst" and Andrew Marvell's "Upon Appleton House" are the most admired examples of the genre (see COUNTRY HOUSE POEM). Denham's "Cooper's Hill," though little read today, was celebrated in the 18th c. and provided a model for moralizing landscape that would guide Alexander Pope in his composition of "Windsor Forest," a poem that celebrates the reign of Queen Anne. Here, as in other forms of pastoral, the rural landscape is seen as a useful retreat into the pleasures of contemplation, but with reference to the struggles of the active life. In landscape poetry, 18th-c. writers also explored political challenges by displacing them imaginatively onto the more neutral theater of nature.

In Eng., the loco-descriptive poem emerges in the 18th c. as an independent project of *taste, increasingly propelled by aesthetic over didactic impulses. During this period, a new aesthetics of the picturesque emerges, applied not only to art and lit. but to estate organization and landscape architecture. Pope's "Epistle to Bathurst" and "Epistle to Burlington" offer discourses on the well- and ill-managed estates, respectively. Joseph Addison argues in Spectator nos. 411 and 412 on "the pleasures of the imagination," that the description of landscape is a form of imaginary possession, opening the way further to a liberation of taste from the control of power and wealth. The picturesque aesthetic sought to cultivate the natural environment along the principles of painting. James Thomson's The Seasons and Thomas Gray's "Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College" are firmly grounded in the aesthetic of the picturesque, as is William Wordsworth's early Descriptive Sketches. But the aesthetic of the *sublime in landscape began to emerge in these and other late 18th c. poems, displacing harmonious landscapes in the model of painter Claude Lorrain with wild and tempestuous lines inspired by Salvator Rosa. Such poems are often called "preromantic" because they contain elements of natural description and dynamic possibilities of phenomenological perception that *romanticism would draw out to a metaphysical dimension and identify with poetic imagination itself (see PREROMANTICISM).

The prospect poem becomes increasingly important in romanticism from Wordsworth to P. B. Shelley, where the psyche reaches out to find a spatial equivalent to its sense of an interior infinite. Rather than local detail and enargeia, the impulse of the landscape poem is now toward the grand "surmise" of the supernatural truth in or beyond the natural world. Whereas neoclassical poetry introduced analogical thought in the context of a pleasing environment, romantic poetry offers a secular revelation of a sublime power.

While Victorian poets such as Alfred, Lord Tennyson and Matthew Arnold retain a romantic taste for the picturesque and even the sublime in landscape, their poetry more often turns back toward moral and social reflection. Part of their skepticism toward the visionary project comes from the increasing prominence of science and eventually Darwinian theory. Thomas Hardy's landscapes in particular seem to question the visionary power of the landscape beholder, describing instead a landscape at once infused with human memory and association yet detached from human longings, purposes, and hist. Writing after World War I, W. H. Auden would use the landscape poem to reflect both on human suffering and indifference ("Paysage Moralisé," "Musée des Beaux Arts") and on worldly beauty and pleasure ("In Praise of Limestone").

Landscape has played a special role in Am. poetry, sometimes bearing the ideology of America as nature's nation. The poetic imagination shaped the challenges and pleasures of the New World, a boundless, undomesticated "virgin land," at least by Eur. standards, and a space of self-determination. William Cullen Bryant's "The Prairies" declares, "These are the gardens of the Desert, these / The unshorn fields, boundless and beautiful, / For which the speech of England has no name—/ The Prairies."

R. W. Emerson would have a major influence on Am. prospect poetry, connecting it to the transcendentalist project in which the "each" of nature's variety is informed by the luminous "all" of divine unity. Am. prospect poetry has also been associated with imperial ambition; the power of the gaze gives the beholder the feeling of authority over the world it organizes in its sight line.

By contrast, mod. Am. poetry has been wary of idealism and solipsism. Robert Frost's landscapes are often bleak or blighted—frozen swamps, dried-up brooks, abandoned farms. Frost emphasizes the role of the human in organizing the visible scene, yet his speakers are often out walking or working in uncertain ground. W. C. Williams in Paterson emphasizes a destructive human hist. embedded in landscape, but, like Marianne Moore and later Hart Crane, he imagines a resilient nature beneath human abuses and ultimately seeks to reconcile the natural and the built environment. Moore's long poem "An Octopus" describes Mt. Rainier in exuberant detail, celebrating "its capacity for fact" far greater than any human prospect.

Contemp. poets have also continued to celebrate the landscape as a focus of experience and a source of *metaphor, often reimagining romantic paradigms. They have modeled poetic stances that accommodate a dynamic and changing environment and acknowledge the mediations of lang. and culture. Elizabeth Bishop's richly detailed landscape poems, ranging in their latitude from Canada to Brazil, often circle back to reveal the yearnings and presumptions of the beholder. A. R. Ammons's poetry follows an Emersonian prophetic project, treating the landscape as a site of revelation, while simultaneously insisting on the insights of science and force of quotidian reality. His long poem Garbage presents a new turn in landscape poetry as human excess overwhelms the natural environment. John Ashbery draws heavily on landscape *imagery to present the mind's shaping of tentative but elusive prospects. Charles Wright's landscapes, often imagined through a lens of painterly abstraction, provide a space for contemplation of "the other side" and the idea of God. Charles Tomlinson, a Brit. poet influenced by mod. Am. poetry, has concentrated on phenomenological landscape description, evoking the otherness of the natural world while contemplating the traces in it of forgotten human stories. While the forms and ideology of landscape poetry have changed, it remains, then, a vital genre in contemp. poetry.

See DESCRIPTIVE POETRY, PAINTING AND POETRY.

■ Criticism and History, English: M. H. Nicolson, Mountain Gloom and Mountain Glory (1963); R. Williams, The Country and the City (1973); J. Turner, The Politics of Landscape: Rural Scenery and Society in English Poetry, 1630–1660 (1979); P. Fletcher, Gardens and Grim Ravines: The Language of Landscape in Victorian Poetry (1983); J. A. W. Heffernan, The Re-Creation of Landscape: A Study of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Constable, and Turner (1984); J. Applewhite, Seas and Inland Journeys: Landscape and Consciousness from Wordsworth to Roethke (1986); R. Gilbert, Walks in the World: Representation and Experience in Modern American Poetry (1991); Baroque Topographies, ed. T. Hampton (1992); C. Fitter, Poetry, Space, Landscape: Toward a New Theory (1995); T. Fulford, Landscape, Liberty and Authority (1996); R. Crawford, Poetry, Enclosure, and the Vernacular Landscape 1700–1830 (2002); B. Costello, Shifting Ground: Reinventing Landscape in Modern American Poetry (2003). French: C. Hogsett, "On Facing Artificiality and Frivolity: Theories of Pastoral Poetry in Eighteenth-Century France," Eighteenth-Century Studies 4 (1971); S. Mace, "Les Mutations de l'espace pastoral dans la poésie baroque," Études Litteraires 34 (2002). German: C. Tang, The Geographic Imagination of Modernity: Geography, Literature, and Philosophy in German Romanticism (2008).

Italian: Italian Landscape Poems, trans. E. Alistair (1993). Japanese: J. T. Sorensen, "Poetic Landscapes and Landscape Poetry in Heian Japan," PAJLS: Proceedings of the Association for Japanese Literary Studies 6 (2005).

B. COSTELLO

LANGUAGE POETRY. The ensemble of consciously avant-garde aesthetic tendencies and institutional and social practices known as Language poetry (also known as language-centered writing or, more popularly but less properly, L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E poetry) emerged in the 1970s and 1980s among a set of writers located primarily in the San Francisco Bay area, New York, and Washington, D.C. The group included Bruce Andrews, Rae Armantrout, Tom Beckett, Steve Benson, Alan Bernheimer, Charles Bernstein, David Bromige, Abigail Child, Clark Coolidge, Tina Darragh, Michael Davidson, Alan Davies, Ray DiPalma, Ted Greenwald, Robert Grenier, Carla Harryman, Lyn Hejinian, Susan Howe, Erica Hunt, P. Inman, Bernadette Mayer, Steve McCaffery, David Melnick, Nick Piombino, Kit Robinson, Leslie Scalapino, Barrett Watten, and Hannah Weiner, among others. Spurred by coinciding aesthetic, intellectual, and social commitments, these writers founded networks of publication and mutual support outside the mainstream literary establishment—jours. (such as Tottel's, This, Hills, and L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E), presses (Roof, Potes and Poets, O Books, The Figures, Tuumba, and Sun and Moon), reading and lecture series, and collaborations. Considered together, their poems, intellectual justifications for poetry, institution-building efforts, and embodiment of an ethos of engaged writing offered an energetic response to the literary, theoretical, and social forces shaping late 20th-c. Am. poetic culture.

Aesthetically, Language poetry was a rebellion against the perceived dominance of poetic modes that emphasized the fundamentally expressive and subjective nature of the art: the so-called *confessional poets' emphasis on self-inquiry and self-disclosure, or the Deep Image poets' embrace of "inwardness" and subconscious process (see DEEP IMAGE). Even the New American Poetry (though in many ways congenial to the Language poets for its embrace of aesthetic nonconformity) was faulted for its emphasis on spontaneous utterance and natural speech. In contrast, the Language poets emphasized the arbitrariness of signification and the constructive character of meaning-making. In their hands, lang. was neither a *mimesis of life nor a vehicle for the narration of selves, the communication of messages, or the transmission of feelings. It was, rather, a medium: matter to be arrayed, disassembled, and reconfigured; a sign system whose material basis and social function were an object of ludic inquiry ("the pleasure of the graphic or phonic imprint . . . their value as sheer linguistic stimuli" [McCaffery]) and serious critique ("to create conditions under which the productivity of words & Syllables & linguistic form-making can be felt, & given aesthetic presence" [Andrews 1996]). The emphasis on arbitrariness, indeterminacy, and making manifest the labor of assemblage could be seen working at every level of the poem: ling., figural, rhetorical. Where a poet less programmatically oriented toward innovation or method might use *metaphor to intimate unities (actual or desired) beneath the diverse ground of experience, the Language poet tends to emphasize the metonymic accident of sheer contiguity ("metonymy maintains the intactness and discreteness of particulars" [Hejinian]; see METONYMY). Rather than situating a speaker within a scene, the Language poem produces a discourse that is multifarious and unlocatable and resists idealizations such as *voice or character ("the allure of the spontaneous & personal is cut here by the fact of wordness" [Bernstein 1984]). Where an expressive poetics may inhabit the full range of *tones available to the socially situated person, Language poetry deliberately restricts itself to tones available to the act of reflection—though these might range widely from the coolly analytical to the comic and ironic to the ferociously negating. Thus, even the most lyrical of poets influenced by the poetics of Language (e.g., Armantrout or Michael Palmer) retain a deep suspicion of the sentiment that enters into their work.

The constructedness of lang. was not a merely formal or stylistic insight. It was accompanied by the idea that persons are, in crucial ways, themselves social constructs, subject to determination by systems of knowledge and power; and that the "lyric I" as a figure of sovereign self-possession and autonomous reflection is an ideological fiction by means of which the inchoate self might be rendered coherent and the determined self naturalized. This constructivist account of persons, though available within poetic trads. both ancient and mod., was given new force by the Language poets' encounter with a variety of literary and cultural theorists and philosophers. (In this sense, Language poetry can be seen as part of the enthusiastic Am. reception of *structuralism and *poststructuralism.) From *Russian formalism, the Language poets adopted the concept of *defamiliarization to describe their efforts to jolt readers out of conventional aesthetic sensibilities and habits of mind ("poetry is like a swoon, with this difference: / it brings you to your senses" [Bernstein, "The Klupzy Girl"]). From Jacques Derrida and Jacques Lacan, they derived theoretical support for the idea that all systems of meaning-making (ling., psychological, philosophical, ethical) are subject to the endlessly displacing and decentering energies of lang. Michel Foucault provided Language poetry with a sophisticated account of discourse (incl. literary discourse) as a theater of power in which the forms of knowledge and subjectivity are created and policed ("With afford, agree and arrange, use the infinitive. / I can't agree to die" [Bob Perelman, "Seduced by Analogy"]; while the Marxist theorists of the *Frankfurt school confirmed their lived observation that such power could be appropriated and corrupted by mass media and the consciousness industry.

As this eclectic and sometimes contradictory collection of theorists might suggest, the Language poets' interests in theoretical accounts of lang. and subjectivity were not chiefly academic, nor were they primarily a way of justifying stylistic practices or formal concerns. Rather, such ideas seemed to suggest the possibility of integrating their aesthetic commitments with passionately held political and ethical commitments. Some of the early political rhet. of the Language poets was explicitly Marxist in its class analysis, though "unorthodoxly" so in the accompanying suggestion that the intellectual and cultural work of poetry practices could itself count as a subversion of restrictive social arrangements ("let us undermine the bourgeoisie," [Silliman 1984]). Perhaps more typical were the more restrained accounts of the role that a formally challenging poetry could play in forming or reforming political consciousness. If the Language poets' social analysis occasionally conflated opposition to the perceived conformity or conservatism of the university writing workshop (one of the centers of what Bernstein has called "official verse culture") with other forms of social opposition, it was in the interest of imagining acts of *style as strategies of cultural and institutional critique. Likewise, if Language poems deliberately eschewed some traditional poetic satisfactions and foreclosed some traditional aesthetic responses (the luxuriousness of beauty, the sturdiness of craft, the consolation of wisdom), it was in order to place an ethical obligation to *attention at the center of the act of reading. Poetry that required a high degree of attentiveness and participation on the part of readers might reasonably hope to focus their attention on the constructive choices involved in meaning-making (e.g., the exclusions entailed by acts of signification and *closure; see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). It might also awaken readers' critical awareness of other forms of exclusion and policing taking place in and through lang. ("language control = thought control = reality control" [Bernstein 1986]). These forms of ling. idealism had particular appeal within the Vietnam-era "mediascape" in which many of the Language writers began their mature work. Even at a distance from these formative events, however, Language poetry retains a utopian strain, a sense of its political and social dissidence that no amount of mainstream success or institutional recognition has dispelled.

The forms of Language poetry have followed a similar revisionary trajectory. Some of the earlier works of Language poetry experimented with extreme ling. fragmentation—with lang. broken at the lexical or morphemic level and operating at or beyond the edges of intelligibility (examples include P. Inman, David Melnick, or Clark Coolidge). These radical experiments largely gave way to the techniques that Silliman arrayed under the label of the New Sentence: poems that are lexically intact and, in large measure, grammatically ordered but that, nonetheless, allow for high degrees of disjunction from sentence to sentence or element to element. With the admission of larger units of intelligibility came the possibility of staging more complex and diverse negotiations and interferences between discourses of self and of the social world. Thus, a poem like Hejinian's My Life (originally pub. in 1980 as 37 chapters of 37 sentences each) explores how a sense of biographical consciousness must be assembled from any number of loosely connected discursive acts and modes (concrete perception, abstract observation, recollection, meditation); while Howe's many complex negotiations with personal and historical materials dramatize both the excisions of patriarchal hist. and the reconstructive work of historical knowledge.

Language poets have historically preferred to emphasize the centrifugal nature of their practice, the diversity of the poets and styles arrayed beneath the name of the group. But they have also encouraged the perception there that exists a unified movement, through acts of collection and anthologization—Silliman's In the American Tree and Messerli's "Language" Poetries—or through retrospective narration, as in the recently completed "collective autobiography" of the West Coast Language poets, The Grand Piano (10 v., 2006–10). Indeed, over the last 40 years, Language poetry has undergone a dramatic transformation from a movement emphasizing numerousness and heterogeneity to one with identifiable central voices, theoretical defenses, and classic works. This transformation, so characteristic of earlier dissident artistic movements, may indeed partake in the inevitable irony of the mainstreaming of the avant-garde. But to say that Language poetry has shared the fate of other historical avant-gardes does not detract from its lasting influence. Even as its formal innovations take on a period sheen, are diverted into other channels, or are diluted into replicable gestures and motions, Language poetry's durable triumph may be seen in the increasing avant-gardism of the Am. mainstream. It may be the case that Am. poetry has always been unusually open to the renovating energies, to the new thresholds and anatomies of experimental *modernism; but the Language poets have succeeded in securing a widespread contemp. consensus that to write with a heightened awareness of lang. as medium is among the most vital currents in poetic art.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; POSTMODERNISM; UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE.

■ Anthologies: The L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E Book, ed. B. Andrews and C. Bernstein (1984)—esp. C. Bernstein, "Stray Straws and Straw Men," and R. Silliman, "If by 'Writing' We Mean Literature"; In the American Tree, ed. R. Silliman (1986); "Language" Poetries, ed. D. Messerli (1987); Onward: Contemporary Poetry and Poetics, ed. P. Baker (1996).

■ Criticism and History: M. Perloff, The Dance of the Intellect: Studies in the Poetry of the Pound Tradition (1985); B. Watten, Total Syntax (1985); C. Bernstein, Content's Dream: Essays 1975–1984 (1986); R. Silliman, The New Sentence (1987); S. McCaffery, North of Intention: Critical Writings 1973–1986 (1987); G. Hartley, Textual Politics and the Language Poets (1989); The Politics of Poetic Form: Poetry and Public Policy, ed. C. Bernstein (1990); C. Bernstein, A Poetics (1992); B. Andrews, Paradise and Method: Poetics and Praxis (1996); L. Hejinian, The Language of Inquiry (2000); J. Ashton, From Modernism to Postmodernism (2005); M.-Q. Ma, Poetry as Re-Reading: American Avant-Garde Poetry and the Poetics of Counter-Method (2008); O. Izenberg, Being Numerous: Poetry and the Ground of Social Life (2010).

O. Izenberg

LATIN AMERICA, POETRY OF. See argentina, poetry of; bolivia, poetry of; brazil, poetry of; chile, poetry of; colombia, poetry of; ecuador, poetry of; el salvador, poetry of; gaucho poetry; guaraní poetry; indigenous americas, poetry of the; mapuche poetry; mexico, poetry of; nicaragua, poetry of; peru, poetry of; spanish america, poetry of; uruguay, poetry of; venezuela, poetry of.

LATIN POETICS. See classical poetics; classicism; medieval poetics.

LATIN POETRY

I. Classical
II. Medieval
III. Renaissance and After

I. Classical

A. Preservation and Transmission. Key to the understanding of ancient Lat. poetry is the issue of transmission. Most of what we have depends for its survival on mss. written in the late antique and med. (sometimes even early mod.) period in western Europe. A very modest contribution comes from ancient written texts (Roman papyri, unlike Gr. papyri, are few, and rarely preserve poetry; epigraphy offers a substantial body of texts but often by marginal or nonprofessional composers).

When compared to the remains of other ancient cultures, however, the amount of accompanying evidence is staggering: archaeology, ling., numismatics, epigraphy, prose sources, and material culture in general offer a great deal (just as for cl. *Greek poetry, while, e.g., the other great premod. corpus of written poems, Vedic poetry, offers the fascinating problem of a rich corpus of mythology and religion in a well-documented lang. being accompanied by very tenuous material evidence; see sanskrit poetry).

Because of the fragility of papyrus and pergamene, only texts that have been copied at least once since the 4th c. ce had a chance to survive, i.e., to reach an age (the 14th–15th cs. in Western Europe) when the recuperation and circulation of antique texts was a major industry. The cl. Lat. texts have been sifted through a triple process of filtering:

—ancient canonization (the school system of the Roman Empire being the key, as it will be again in the mod. age when Eur. state-sponsored education is fundamental in the spread of cl. Lat. culture);
—a more occasional selection guided by med. agendas; and —the impact of random destruction and material damage.

This has important implications: educational value was crucial to survival. Authors without an obvious support in schooling, like Petronius (ca. 27–66 ce), Catullus (ca. 84–54 bce), and Lucretius (ca. 99–55 bce), have been close to disappearing. On the other hand, many of the canonical works have been preserved, and there is a family atmosphere: the authors tend to create a pattern of intertextual relationship based on the practice of *imitation. Our first impression of Lat. poetry is frequently related to the striking amount of self-consciousness: the individual poet has a constant awareness of his place in the *tradition and a subtle and supple strategy for rewriting past lit. hist. and inserting himself into it. The art of writing poetry in Roman society is a form of networking. The maximum density of this approach to poetic composition and self-promotion is found in the Augustan Age (a concept explicitly used by Horace), with Virgil's (70–19 bce) *pastoral poems, the Bucolics (or Eclogues), as a first *manifesto, and Virgil's Aeneid and Ovid's (43 bce–ca. 18 ce) Metamorphoses as the summae. Not by chance, the Augustan Age has been canonized and accepted as the climax and the cl. age of Roman lit. hist.

Considering the much that survives, it is easy to forget the losses. Numerous *fragments exist of crucial works that were often quoted in prose texts (through so-called indirect transmission), for instance, Ennius's (ca. 239–169 bce) *epic on Roman hist., the Annales; but other masterpieces such as Cornelius Gallus's (ca. 70–26 bce) love *elegies (except for a tiny papyrus fragment) and Ovid's *tragedy Medea have been lost. Then, of course, not all the poetry recovered has been available continuously since late antiquity. It is important to study Eur. culture with an awareness of changes related to successive rediscoveries of Roman texts in the age on humanism. At the end of the first commentary made on Lucretius's Epicurean poem in the early 16th c., a postscript by an It. scholar says, "I submit everything to orthodox belief," to which a different hand has added, "Everything, then, needs revising now."

B. Origins and Evolution. During the central part of the 3d c. bce, Rome, a mid-sized republican state in western central Italy, begins to grow at an impressive rate as a "conquest state." During the same period, inscriptions in Lat., some of them in poetic *meter, begin to rise in number and complexity (alphabetic writing already had a trad. of many centuries in Italy), and verse in Lat. appears and develops quickly into something that to us looks like a *national poetry or lit. (a double anachronism because both "literature" and "nationhood" have been shaped, in their current value, by Eur. modernity and bourgeois ideology). A local, autonomous, native Roman lit. never had a chance to surface.

Later on, the Romans—a community and an empire with a Lat.-speaking as well as a Gr.-speaking elite culture—view the generations between (roughly) the mid-3d c. and mid-2d c. bce as "the origins." They imagined lit. hist., a concept and practice in which they were pioneers, as a process of increasingly adequate Hellenization—a far cry from romantic ideas of national lit.

The meters are all based on adaptations of Gr. originals. The "primitive" *Saturnian looks like an outlier, but it may be the result of an older process of appropriation. As a rule, the most popular *genres have a lot of metrical adaptation and "freedom," while elite verse displays a "pure Greek" metrical style. Cicero (106–43 BCE) thought that the lines of verse in comic drama were so low-key that they were not recognizable as something different from prose; Horace (65–8 BCE) avoids this style when he writes iambic poetry, and he regulates and moderates the "freedom" of comic verse. Seneca (ca. 3 BCE–65 CE) creates a sophisticated but overcontrolled template for his tragic verse, not deterred by the effect of monotony that is being imparted to the end of the lines.

The metrical forms are all quantitative (see QUANTITY) and presuppose a melodic word *accent: intensive accent is not relevant. The importance of patterns of *alliteration, linking the initial parts of adjacent words, however, points to Germanic-Celtic areas more than to Hellenism as a parallel. After the unique explosion of creativity in Plautus's (ca. 254–184 BCE) *comedies, the style tends to be regulated by ascetic elitism and separated from colloquial expression, avoiding both low-life speech and "crude" Gr. loan words: the main later exception, the mysterious and transgressive Petronius, is not by chance also the only major artist who dares to combine poetry and prose (see PROSIMETRUM).

C. Roman Hellenism. Being oriented on Gr. models, Roman poetry has two dominant states of mind, not mutually exclusive: submission and competition. Most of the surviving texts already belong to a stage when Rome is master of the Gr. world, so there is a constant tension and interplay between Roman domination of Greece and Hellenic intellectual colonization of Roman minds.

Between Gr. and Roman poetry, there is one main difference: Roman poetry is monocentered, centripetal, obsessed with Rome, and works on a center-periphery model (evident, e.g., in Catullus, Virgil, and Horace and in *elegy). The lang. often has an artificial feel to it, as if the writers were lifting themselves up by the bootstraps, and lit. is strongly supported and invoked by existing political unity—while Greece is a ling. community where lang., education, and culture overcome a permanent state of political fragmentation and (often) confusion and instability.

Mythology and narrative are by default Gr.-oriented, while Rome tends to supply historical examples or alternatively produces daily life, waiting to be aestheticized or criticized according to the standards of the author. The author arbitrates between the poles of Hellenization and Romanness and capitalizes on this function, drawing power from it. Most genres of Roman poetry, in *narrative and theater, are based on the assumption that the poet will not create entirely new characters: the individuals are taken from mythology (in epic and tragedy) or from hist. recorded in prose (in historical epic and historical tragedy or praetexta) or from a limited repertory in stock characters (in Gr.-style comedy), and, of course, poetic skill will be evident from innovations and adaptations. In *satire, *epigram, and other less-than-elevated poetry, the assumption is that characters will be taken from daily life, although often with adaptations or pseuds.: those genres often programmatically decline "seriousness" and ambition, as if to justify their realism and direct intervention into social practice.

Other main differences are as follows: (1) Roman production is multigeneric from the start (a phenomenon rare in Gr. poetry, at least before Callimachus), so we have early Roman poets who already divide themselves among epic, theater, and other genres. (2) The Romans had prose from very early on, and there had been only a very brief time when poetry was not sharing the system with prose. (3) Thus, the Romans inherit a Gr. literary system that was already mature and ramified, the system that was in place in the 3d c. BCE, although they always have the option of going back to previous epochs and layers. (4) Roman poets are often very politicized, sometimes masters of *invective and political discourse, but they almost never inhabit a space of communal openness: there is very strong political pressure against freedom of speech of the kind practiced (and revived in Roman historical imagination) in Gr. archaic poetry or in Athenian Old Comedy. This situation favors the devel. of a rhet. of innuendo and of a tension between political control and authorial voice. Seneca addresses Nero and the opposition to Nero obliquely through a dark mythological theater; Ovid absorbs Augustan rhet. of urbanism and world domination and also criticizes Augustan bigotry and repression; Juvenal (ca. 55–127 CE) attacks the corruption of the previous regime; Horace sings about the impossibility of retelling the civil wars. (5) While early Gr. poetry is driven by a *performance culture and shows traces of oral composition (see ORAL POETRY), Roman poetry is from the beginning onward based on a ripe alphabetic culture: the poets show a recurring concern for "live" performance, but most of their work is oriented toward producing well-wrought scripts or scriptures. Horace's *lyric poems have an indirect and belated relationship to the issue of performance and *voice, and every single poem stands, or better, oscillates between its vocalized occasion and its inscription in the book.

What happened in Rome was not unavoidable, as we can see by contrasting the very different options of Etruscan civilization: the Etruscans invested in spectacles, like the Romans, and reveled in appropriations of Gr. images and lifestyles, but their appropriations are much less careful and respectful; moreover, they do not link the complex of leisure, art, and spectacle with the production of a systematic body of lit. in Etruscan. In Rome, the theater is a driving force during the first generations of Lat. poetry, but during the middle republic, aggressive "modernist" poets such as Lucilius (ca. 180–103 BCE) and Catullus begin to focus entirely on first-person poetry in textual format. Only one thing is clear about the origins: the initial impulse must have had to do not so much with interactions between Rome and Greece, but more with inter-Italic competition. Rome was surrounded by Italic communities that spoke incompatible langs. (Etruscan, Oscan), and "going Greek" was highly desirable to all of the emerging Italic elites. Only slightly later the phenomenon of Roman Hellenicity became entangled with the pace of conquest, first in the Gr.-speaking communities of the It. south and later all over the eastern Mediterranean. In this new phase, Lat. poems derived from Gr. models are competing not only with the Gr. models but with the furious acquisition of Gr. art, knowledge, and status symbols fueled by conquest, the slave trade, and plunder. Later, in the age of Caesar and Augustus, the Romans begin exporting a complex package of acculturation to the western Mediterranean, centered on urbanism and incl. Lat. lang. and lit. and Gr. educational values and aesthetics.

The position of Rome in relation to Gr. culture is crucial for the hist. of mod. Eur. *classicism. Roman appropriation and exploitation of Greece lives on in mod. ideas of the classics as a harmonious sum of Gr. and Lat. The primacy of Greece over Rome in the romantic imagination results in a compromise, where the Greeks are leaders in poetry and philosophy and the Romans, while lacking in the necessary originality and communal atmosphere, are role models of "mediation" and (often) imperial control. The Romans are the ones who absorb and transmit Gr. classics—as well as the Judaeo-Christian trad.—to western and northern Europe, and so ultimately to the superpowers of the 18th, 19th, and early 20th cs. Classics is, therefore, based on a double exceptionalism: while the miracle of Greece is self-evident and consists in absolute originality and creativity, the Roman miracle is about imitation, belatedness, and imperial opportunism. (The contingent nature of historical transmission blinded the Europeans to the fact that most of those "exceptions" were already present in Near Eastern cultures before the rise of Greeks and Romans.)

D. Genres and Authors. In ancient Rome, the *canon is initially formed by authors who impersonate and continue Gr. authors: only in the generation of Tibullus (ca. 55–19 BCE) and later Ovid do we begin to find authors who do not identify themselves as "new X," X being a canonical Gr. poet (e.g., Menander, Homer, Callimachus, Theocritus, Alcaeus). Ovid is also, not coincidentally, the first author who dispenses with the convention of *patronage (claiming a powerful figure as friend, protector, and, in some cases, sponsor of the work) and spreads the impression of a wide, anonymous circle of readers as a condition for his success. In a society without licensed products, copyright, and authentic mass media, this means pushing the idea of authorial independence as far as it will go until the early mod. period. Among Ovid's successors, only Martial (ca. 40–103 CE) operates on a similar scale and foregrounds the *book as his decisive medium. Before Ovid, Catullus and Horace had offered interesting combinations of a "face-to-face" approach, addressing individual poems to recognizable persons on specific occasions (see OCCASIONAL VERSE), and of a "generalist" approach, where the same poems are being shifted away from the occasion in the direction of a general public and hedge their bets on universal fame and circulation, while still bearing traces of their primary occasion.

The Roman poets who identify themselves as "new X" are masters of ambiguity: the new work can be perceived as surrogate or continuation in another lang. but also as substitute, stand-in, and direct competitor. The poets writing in Lat. have been learning those strategies from Gr. poetry itself, esp. from the rampant *intertextuality in authors who had become "poets for poets," such as Aristophanes, Aratus, Callimachus, Theocritus, and the epigram writers.

The poets use all the resources of tact, irony, and self-fashioning in this kind of self-conscious discourse, more or less the same resources that are necessary to cultivating patronage. In the generations after Ovid, for the first time we see Roman poets who more or less implicitly declare themselves "new versions" of a Roman, not a Gr., model. The most famous example (esp. in the med. reception) is Statius (45–96 CE), who uses his main models—Virgil, Ovid, Seneca, and Lucan (39–65 CE)—according to the sophisticated strategies developed by the Augustan authors on their own chosen Gr. forerunners. The closure of the Lat. canon after Juvenal is a decision of great importance, and it contributes, together with the Christian revolution, to the typically introverted nature of late antique poetry: its main hero is the talented but isolated court poet Claudian (ca. 370–404 CE), while Christian poetry will slowly develop its own classicism.

Ubiquitous in Roman poetry is the relationship with prose and with *rhetoric, often too easily deplored and criticized. Important too is the strand of *didactic poetry, again nourished by Gr. prose; the genre is influenced by the gigantic and isolated Lucretius and continued by Cicero, Virgil, Ovid, Manilius (fl. 1st c. CE), and less famous poets: in this trad., still active in the Ren., the formal resources of rhythm and beauty are intertwined with more or less strong claims to science and truth. Again, the idea of Roman Hellenism is crucial here, since the acquisition of science and information was inseparable from access to definitive Gr. sources in philosophy, biology, mathematics, and cosmology. Those issues play a fundamental role in the specific ideology of Roman epic (also in narrative and heroic guise) and in its claims to encompass the world and reveal its breadth and secrets. In fact, a didactic element was never absent in any given genre of Roman poetry because every Roman poet, from the erotic Propertius (ca. 50–after 16 BCE) to the fabulist Phaedrus (15 BCE–50 CE), is more or less implicitly "teaching" his audience about the cultural capital of Hellenism, as well as realizing his own vision.

A typical breakthrough, if we focus on the later Western trad., is the reinvention of first-person poetry.

Taking some cues from Gr. trads. such as epigram and other nonpublic genres, the Roman poets develop a style related to private life and individual sentiment: hence, the many innovations in lyric, elegy, satire, and epigram, and the rise of personal voice even in the epics of Lucretius, Virgil, and Lucan. This expansion of subjectivity is combined with severe restrictions in formulating political address to the public in communal situations. The strong presence of writing throughout the Roman era and the growth of a reading public (increasingly also of women readers) created the atmosphere for the devel. of love elegy, Horatian lyric, and satire, the main contributions to the literary system initiated by the Greeks with their institutionalization of textual production in the 4th c. BCE.

The poets of ancient Rome have a fundamental role in the idea of the author and of the poetic career, as it will develop in late med. Europe and beyond. Authors such as Virgil, Ovid, Propertius, Seneca, Lucretius, and Horace are present not only with their texts but in their complex of *persona, personal *voice, and biography. Some of them, like Virgil, acquire a definitive status as the ideal of the artist. In one respect, however, the "premodern" Romans do not anticipate later devels. From the origins to late antiquity, Roman canonical verse is dominated by male authors: women poets are attested but never claim a public role or rise to the prominence of Sappho or to the almost professional status of other Gr. *poetesses. Appropriating and impersonating women's voices, therefore, is a constant preoccupation of the Roman authors: this trend is celebrated in one of the Roman texts that claim maximum influence in the Middle Ages, Ovid's Heroides.

II. Medieval. Early evidence of Christian Lat. poetry is sparse and random. If Commodian (prob. fl. mid-3d c. CE), who offers doctrine and exhortation in an accentual approximation of the cl. *hexameter, was indeed a 3d-c. African, he is an isolated phenomenon. Indicative of things to come are two short narratives, written in skillful hexameters, on Jonah and on the destruction of Sodom (ca. 300), and the beautiful Phoenix (ca. 310), attributed to Lactantius (240–ca. 320), wholly pagan in detail but, to the early Middle Ages, plainly a celebration of the Resurrection—a fact recognized by the later Anglo-Saxon poet who produced a vernacular adaptation of this text.

A coherent Christian Lat. trad. emerges in the 4th c., deliberately conceived as an alternative to the pagan classics on which all learned Christians had been reared but drawing principally on the metrical, stylistic, and narrative conventions of Virgilian epic. The *cento of the poetess Proba (mid-4th c.) is a mere *pastiche of tags from Virgil, carefully arranged into a biblical narrative. What is innovative in Juvencus's (4th c.) hexameter rendering of the Gospels (ca. 330) and the freer version in Sedulius's (fl. 5th c.) Carmen paschale (ca. 430) is their ingenuity in adapting Virgilian style to Christian purposes; and Paulinus of Nola (353–431) expresses his resolve to repudiate pagan models and write a new kind of poetry in verse richly evocative of Virgil, Ovid, and Horace. Prudentius (ca. 348–405), master of many cl. styles and genres, was a brilliant original whose complex attitude toward both Christian and pagan culture we are only beginning to fathom. Alongside his two sequences of *hymns (the Cathemerinon and the Peristephanon), he produced a number of didactic poems on theological subjects. The Apotheosis, which opens with a hymn on the Trinity, considers the nature of Christ, while the Hamartigenia deals with the question of sin. His Psychomachia, a short epic on the conflict of virtue and vice in the human soul, greatly influenced med. iconography and offers one of the earliest and most enduring examples of Christian *allegory.

The Christian Lat. poets were to coexist with, and even displace, the great pagans in the school curriculum of the early Middle Ages, but they had few imitators. More significant for med. Lat. poetry was the hymnody that appeared as Lat. replaced Gr. as the lang. of the liturgy. The cumbersome, dogmatic verse of Hilary of Poitiers (310–66) can hardly have had a liturgical function, and the rhythmical prose of the great Te Deum, despite its early and abiding popularity, was not imitated; med. Lat. hymnody begins with Ambrose (ca. 340–97), who provided his Milanese congregation with meditations appropriate to the liturgical hours and calendar couched in four-line *strophes of iambic dimeter. Psychologically profound and written in beautiful and surprisingly cl. Lat., the Ambrosian hymns were widely imitated (most famously by Prudentius and Venantius Fortunatus [ca. 530–605]) and came to form the nucleus of the med. hymnaries; and their form, four-stress lines in *quatrains, has been preserved with only minor variations down to the present day, as may be seen in the metrical index of any hymnal.

The upheavals of the later 5th c. left their mark on the Christian Lat. trad. The bookish verse of Sidonius Apollinaris (d. 480) reflects its survival in an attenuated form in Gaul; the "epic" trad. of Prudentius and Sedulius enjoys a late flowering in the De laudibus Dei of Dracontius (ca. 450–500); and the verse in Boethius's De consolatione philosophiae (early 6th c.), a prosimetrum including a range of meters imitated from Horace and Seneca, is a last manifestation of inherited familiarity with cl. culture. The *verse epistles and *occasional poems of Fortunatus (535–604), charming and often brilliantly innovative, show a marked loss of syntactic and metrical fluency, though his passion hymns Vexilla regis and Pange, lingua are among the greatest of Christian hymns. The cl. trad. is still alive in the poems of Eugenius of Toledo (fl. ca. 650) and resurfaces with the Carolingian court poets, but new devels. were also taking place. *Rhyme and accentual meters begin to appear (see ACCENTUAL VERSE), most notably in Ir. hymnody, evidently influenced by native Celtic verse forms and the rules of rhythmical prose formulated by the Lat. grammarians, culminating in the Altus prosator of Columbanus (d. 597). Correct Lat. verse in quantitative meters continued to be taught in schools and written by the learned past the 16th c., but accentually measured Lat. verse is the rule after the 4th c., paving the way for the accentually based prosodies of the vernaculars (Beare). The riddles of Aldhelm (d. 709), which inaugurated a popular genre, imitate the African Lat. poet Symphosius (4th or 5th c.), and the metrical life of Cuthbert by Bede (673–736) is couched in a fluent hexameter shaped by 4th-c. Christian models; but the high points of 8th-c. It. Lat. poetry are a rhythmical poem in praise of the city of Milan (ca. 738) and the accentual verse experiments of Paulinus of Aquileia (d. 802). Paulinus's somber lament on the death of Eric of Friuli (799) is an early and influential example of the planctus, which became a popular form and may reflect the influence of vernacular trad.

The poets who came to the court of Charlemagne brought their culture with them; much of the poetry of Paul the Deacon (d. 802) was written before he left Italy, and Theodulf (d. 821) and Alcuin (d. 804) were products of thriving schools in Spain and England. But Charles and his court inspired new poetry. *Panegyric epistles by Alcuin and Theodulf, and the Karolus Magnus et Leo Papa (ca. 800) attributed to Einhard (ca. 770–840) celebrate Charles as the champion of political and cultural renewal and Aachen as a new Rome. The poetry of the court includes charming occasional poems by Paul the Deacon and Theodulf's satire on the courts of law, but its finest product is the Christian Lat. pastoral, best illustrated by Alcuin's nightingale poems, his O mea cella, a celebration of the scholarly life at Aachen, and "Conflictus veris et hiemis," probably his, which is both a pastoral and perhaps the first example of the debate poem or Streitgedicht. This form is imitated in Sedulius Scottus's (9th c.) "Certamen Rosae Liliique" (ca. 850) and in the "Eclogue" of the pseudonymous Theodulus (9th–10th c.), and was widely popular in later periods, e.g., The Owl and the Nightingale in ME.

The later 9th and 10th cs. produced further new departures. The hexameter narrative of an anonymous "Poeta Saxo" (ca. 890) celebrates the deeds of Charlemagne as an example for the Emperor Arnulf, and Abbo of St. Germain (9th c.) combines *war poetry with moral reflections on the state of France in a poem on the Norman siege of Paris (ca. 897). The remarkable epic Waltharius, commonly attributed to Ekkehard of St. Gall (900–73) but possibly earlier, balances the impulsive and bombastic heroism of Attila against the less heroic but more sophisticated behavior of Walter of Aquitaine and his companions, providing a perspective at once sympathetic and detached on the trad. of Germanic heroism and heroic poetry that it evokes. Vernacular culture is probably reflected also in the Ecbasis cuiusdam captivi (ca. 950), a rambling beast fable in *leonine hexameters apparently written for the edification of young monks; in the mid-11th-c. Ruodlieb, the adventures of a wandering knight, based partly on an oriental tale, provide an early foretaste of chivalric romance (see MEDIEVAL ROMANCE).

This period was also a time of innovation in religious music, its most significant form being the sequence, sung at Mass between the Epistle and the Gospel, in which the emotional and dramatic scope of religious lyric is greatly expanded. The origins of the sequence are much debated, though the impulse it reflects is present in emotionally expressive poems like the Versus de Lazaro of Paulinus of Aqueliea or the O mi custos (ca. 825) of Gottschalkof Orbais (d. ca. 867). A shaping influence (formerly thought to be the originator of the sequence) was Notker of St. Gall (d. 912), whose Liber hymnorum expresses a range of spiritual feeling, often in striking dramatic *monologues and set forth in rhythmically parallel phrases designed for antiphonal singing. The later scholar of St. Gall, Ekkehard, produced a number of sequences in the same style as Notker but with few original features. Notker's work anticipates the religious poetry of Peter Damian (1007–72) and Peter Abelard (1079–1142) and the great achievements of Franciscan hymnody.

The devel. of the secular lyric is even harder to trace, but as early as the mid-10th c. the lang. of the Song of Songs was being used to celebrate an idealized beloved in a way that clearly anticipates the courtly lyric of the 12th c. (see COURTLY LOVE). The mid-11th-c. Carmina Cantabrigiensia (Cambridge Songs) ms. includes the sophisticated "O admirabile Veneris idolum," addressed to a beautiful boy; "Levis exsurgit Zephirus," which dwells on the interplay of emotion and natural setting in the manner of high med. lyric; and the magnificent "Iam dulcis amica venito," here a passionate love song but found elsewhere in a form adapted to religious use. The 12th c. saw a great flowering of secular love lyric, ranging from imitations of popular song to elaborate essays in love psychology and courtoisie by poets such as Walter of Châtillon (b. 1135) and Peter of Blois (ca. 1135–1212). Many of the best of these are gathered in collections such as the early 13th-c. Carmina Burana, which also includes drinking songs, narrative love visions like Phyllis and Flora and Si linguis angelicis (which anticipate the Roman de la Rose), and satire in the trad. of *Goliardic verse, in which poets such as Hugh Primas (fl. ca. 1150) and the anonymous Archpoet of Cologne (fl. 1160s) make their own misfortunes and dissipations, real or imagined, an occasion for discussing the ills of the world.

Religious poetry, too, appears in new forms in this period. The sequence form, now evolved into accentual verse with a regular rhyme scheme, provided a model for the powerful series of planctus in which Abelard dramatizes the sufferings of such OT figures as Samson, Dinah, and the daughter of Jepthah. In the sequences of Adam of St. Victor (d. 1177–92), subtle allegorical and theological arguments appear in forms as intricate as any lyric poetry of the period, and the sonorous rhyming hexameters of the De contemptu mundi (ca. 1140) of Bernard of Cluny (fl. 2nd c.) give a new force to religious satire.

Side by side with these new departures is a steadily evolving trad. of "learned" Lat. poetry based on cl. models. Already in the late 11th c., Marbod of Rennes (1035–1123), Hildebert of Le Mans (1056–1133), and Baudri of Bourgueil (1046–1130) had produced a new, urbane poetry, Ovidian in form and manner and devoted to such topics as friendship and the cultivation of relations with noble patrons. The broadly Virgilian biblical epic of the pseudonymous Ger. poet Eupolemius (probably 11th c.) marked a new departure in the poetic treatment of scriptural material. Though this text belongs most clearly to the trad. initiated by Prudentius, Juvencus, and Sedulius centuries earlier, Eupolemius shows little respect for convention. The topic of his lengthy hexameter poem is a battle between good and evil; but fidelity to biblical narrative is not a priority, and biblical names are used sparingly. The renewal of cl. studies in the 12th-c. cathedral schools led to more ambitious exercises. Bernardus Silvestris's (ca. 1085–1178) Cosmographia (ca. 1147) and the De planctu naturae (ca. 1170) of Alan of Lille (ca. 1128–1202), philosophical allegories in the trad. of Boethius and Martianus Capella, exhibit a new assurance vis-à-vis the great authors of antiquity. Alan's Anticlaudianus (1182–83), on the creation of the perfect human, announces itself as a new kind of epic; and the Alexandreis (1182) of Walter of Châtillon, Joseph of Exeter's (12th c.) Ilias (1188–90), and John of Hauville's (d. ca. 1210) virtually all-encompassing Juvenalian satire Architrenius (1184) reflect similar ambition, while Geoffrey of Vinsauf provided a latter-day counterpart to Horace's Ars poetica in his Poetria nova (ca. 1210). Later critics such as John of Garland (d. 1258) and Hugh of Trimberg (fl. ca. 1280) could claim these writers as mod. auctores worthy of the respect and study accorded the ancients. In addition, the 12th and early 13th cs. produced a range of school poetry in less ambitious but widely popular forms: topical satires like the mock-visionary Apocalypse of Golias, aimed at ecclesiastical corruption, and the Speculum stultorum of Nigel of Longchamps (fl. ca. 1190), an elaborate beast fable allegorizing monastic ambition; narrative imitations of ancient comedy such as the Pamphilus, which had a lasting influence on love narrative in several langs.; and a body of pseudo-Ovidian poetry, incl. the mock-autobiographical De vetula, which was long considered an authentic Ovidian work.

A number of the greatest examples of med. religious poetry date from the later 13th c., notably the Philomena of John Howden (d. 1275), a meditation on the power of love as exemplified in the lives of Christ and the Virgin; the hymns and sequence for the feast of Corpus Christi traditionally attributed to Thomas Aquinas (1229–74), the highest achievement of theological poetry in the trad. of Adam of St. Victor; and the work of a number of Franciscan poets, above all the "Dies irae" and "Stabat mater dolorosa" associated with the names of Thomas of Celano (d. 1255) and Jacopone da Todi (1230–1306). But in other areas, the great proliferation of vernacular lit. led to a decline in the production of Lat. poetry, and the typical 13th-c. works are didactic treatises, designed to systematize and compress the materials of the traditional curriculum, secular and religious, in accordance with the needs of a newly compartmentalized system of education. Examples include the De laudibus divinae sapientiae of Alexander Nequam (d. 1217), an encyclopedic review of Creation as a manifestation of divine wisdom; the Aurora, a versified biblical commentary by Peter Riga (d. 1209); and the Integumenta Ovidii of John of Garland. The 14th c. produces such late flowerings as the devotional verse of the Eng. mystic Richard Rolle (d. 1349) and the powerful anatomy of the social ills of England in the Vox clamantis (1380–86) of John Gower (ca. 1330–1408); but the most significant work of this period, the Lat. verse of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, arguably belongs to the hist. of the Ren.

III. Renaissance and After. Rejecting med. varieties of Lat. poetry, Ren. humanists promoted a closer study of versification and forms from cl. antiquity. The result, from the 14th to the early 17th c., was an immense output of Lat. verse in cl. meters. Petrarch (1304–74) showed the way with hundreds of hexameters on various themes in his versified Epystole (1333–64); a hexameter epic on the Punic Wars, Africa (1338–41, left incomplete after much revision); and twelve *eclogues, Bucolicum carmen (1346–68), on poetry, politics, and contemp. hist. Further incursions into epic and pastoral marked the hist. of Lat. poetry in the 15th c., e.g., the incomplete Sforzias by Francesco Filelfo (1398–1481) about the rise to power of the poet's Milanese patron; a supplementary 13th book of the Aeneid by the humanist Maffeo Veggio (1406–58); and ten widely admired eclogues by Mantuan (Battista Spagnoli, 1447–1516) that recall cl. models while displaying a distinctive piety, humor, and satire.

Some of the best Ren. Lat. poetry appeared in cl. forms that Petrarch did not use, such as epigram, elegy, and *ode. Panormita (pseud. of Antonio Beccadelli, 1394–1471) initiated the Neapolitan Ren. with his Hermaphroditus (1425), two books of ribald epigrams that out-Martial Martial. His protégé, Giovanni Pontano (1429–1503), wrote *lullabies for his son (Neniae); Ovidian elegies for his mistresses (Parthenopeus and Eridanus), his wife (De amore coniugali), and deceased loved ones (De tumulis); and racy poems in *hendecasyllables for his male friends and their courtesans (Biae). At the Florentine studium, Cristoforo Landino (1424–98) compiled three books of Xandra (1443–60) in various meters about love, friendship, patriotism, and praise of the Medici. The posthumously published Carminum libellus of the Venetian humanist Pietro Bembo (1470–1547) offers tribute to friends and lovers in various meters.

Supremely conscious of its imitative debt to cl. texts, the finest Ren. Lat. poetry resonates with explicit echoes from ancient poetry. In Florence, Angelo Poliziano (1454–94) in five verse essays, Silvae (1475–86), urged poets to cultivate a cl. style. Poliziano wrought classically inspired epigrams (Epigrammata, 1498), as did his friend Michele Marullo (ca. 1453–1500) in poems about his exile from Constantinople and his love for his mistress Neaera. Marullo's four books of Hymni naturales illustrate tenets of Neoplatonic philosophy in various meters—hexameter, *alcaic, *sapphic, *iambic. The Neapolitan Jacopo Sannazaro (1458–1530) brought forth a steady flow of elegies and epigrams. His Piscatoriae (1526) adapts Virgilian pastoral to a seaside setting, while his short epic on Christ's nativity, De partu virginis (1526), appropriates formulas, expressions, and even entire lines from the epics of Virgil, Ovid, Claudian, and others.

The more Ren. humanists sought to recover the cl. past, the greater they realized their distance from it. One consequence was their effort to develop new forms and expand the repertory of Lat. poetry. The Venetian historian Andrea Navagero (1483–1529), e.g., destroyed his didactic verse but salvaged a lively experiment in pastoral epigrams, Lusus pastoralis (1530), which exerted great influence on later vernacular poetry. Girolamo Fracastoro (1483–1553), a professor of medicine at Padua, wrote Syphilis (1530), three books of hexameter verse attributing the origins of venereal disease to the New World and proposing a cure.

Amid early Reformation turmoil, a Benedictine monk at Mantua, Teofilo Folengo (1491–1544), wrote Baldus (1517–21), a rowdy hexameter epic in a *macaronic hybrid of Lat. and It. about an outlandish hero who hunts down witches, demons, and religious superstition. Presaging the Counter-Reformation in Rome, Marco Girolamo Vida (1485–1566) applied the principles of his versified De arte poetica (1527) to a six-book hexameter epic on the life of Jesus, Christias (1535), and a collection of Christian Hymni (1550). Another associate of the papal court, Marcantonio Flaminio (1498–1550), devoted himself to paraphrasing Psalms in cl. meters, Davidis psalmi (1546) and Carmina sacra (1551).

The devel. of Ren. Lat. poetry beyond the Alps followed similar patterns, confirming the stature of Lat. as a truly international lang. The Hungarian poet Janus Pannonius (1437–72) and the Ger. poet Conrad Celtis (1459–1508) wrote elegies, epigrams, hexameters, and hendecasyllables about their education in Italy and their efforts to bring humanist teachings to the North. The Dutch poet Joannes Secundus (1511–36) earned fame throughout Europe for his Basia, 19 erotic songs for his voluptuous mistress. The Fr. poet Salmon Macrin (1490–1557) graced the courts of Francis I and Henry II with a vast output of elegies, *epithalamia, political verse, and Christian hymns. The Scotsman George Buchanan (1506–82) issued a vast output of Lat. poetry that encompasses satire, tragedy, versified science, and trans. of the *Psalms.

With the devel. of the vernaculars and the prestige of their lits. throughout Europe in the 16th c., many poets who wrote superb Lat. lyrics turned decisively to their native langs. for important projects. Ludovico Ariosto (1474–1533) in Italy, Joachim du Bellay (ca. 1522–60) in France, and John Milton (1608–74) in England exemplify the trend. Some who wrote entirely in Lat. include two 17th-c. Jesuit poets, Maciej Kazimierz Sarbiewski (1595–1640) in Poland and Jacob Balde (1604–68) in Germany, whose religious lyrics accommodate scriptural themes to cl. meters. Though vernacular lit. gained complete ascendance, the composition of Lat. poetry survived in schools and universities well past the Ren. as an accomplishment proper to a cl. scholar.

See ALEXANDRIANISM, BYZANTINE POETRY, CLASSICAL POETICS, CLASSICAL PROSODY, DEVOTIONAL POETRY, GREEK POETRY, LITURGICAL POETRY, MEDIEVAL POETICS, MEDIEVAL POETRY, RENAISSANCE POETICS, RENAISSANCE POETRY.

■ I. Classical. Bibliographies and Histories: L'Année philologique 1—(1927–), http://www.anneephilologique.com/aph/; M. Schanz and C. Hosius, Geschichte der romischen Literatur, 4th ed. (1927–35); CHCL, v. 2; Handbuch der lateinichen Literatur der Antike, ed. R. Herzog and P. L. Schmidt (1989–2002); G. B. Conte, Latin Literature: A History (1999); The Oxford Handbook of Roman Studies, ed. A. Barchiesi and W. Scheidel (2010). Hellenization: G. Williams, Tradition and Originality in Roman Poetry (1968); E. Gruen, Studies in Greek Culture and Roman Policy (1990); D. Feeney, Literature and Religion at Rome (1998); R. Hunter, The Shadow of Callimachus (2006); A. Wallace-Hadrill, Rome's Cultural Revolution (2008). Language: J. Farrell, Latin Language and Latin Culture (2001); J. N. Adams, Bilingualism and the Latin Language (2003); La lingua poetica latina, ed. A. Lunelli (2011). Poetics, Intertextuality, and Genre: C. O. Brink, Horace on Poetry, 3 v. (1963–82); G. N. Knauer, Die Aeneis und Homer (1964); G. B. Conte. The Rhetoric of Imitation (1986); P. Veyne, Roman Erotic Elegy, trans. D. Pellauer (1988); D. C. Feeney, The Gods in Epic (1991); S. Hinds, The Dynamics of Appropriation (1998); T. Hubbard, The Pipes of Pan (1998); D. P. Fowler, Roman Constructions (2000); M. Wyke, The Roman Mistress (2002); F. Cairns, Generic Composition in Greek and Roman Poetry, 2d ed. (2007). Primary Texts and Authors: R. Heinze, Virgil's Epic Technique (1903); E. Fraenkel, Plautine Elements in Plautus (1922), and Horace (1957); W. S. Anderson, Essays on Roman Satire (1982); O. Skutsch, The Annals of Quintus Ennius (1985); M. Roberts, The Jeweled Style (1989); E. Courtney, The Fragmentary Latin Poets (1993); P. Hardie, The Epic Successors of Virgil (1993); D. Kennedy, The Arts of Love (1993); W. Fitzgerald, Catullan Provocations (1995); S. Braund, Juvenal: Satires Book I (1996); E. Gowers, The Loaded Table (1996); A. J. Boyle, Roman Tragedy (1997); M. Leigh, Lucan: Spectacle and Engagement (1997); C. Connors, Petronius the Poet (1998); E. Oliensis, Horace and the Rhetoric of Authority (1998); D. Sedley, Lucretius and the Transformation of Greek Wisdom (1998); K. McCarthy, Slaves, Masters, and the Art of Authority in Plautine Comedy (2000); K. Freudenburg, Satires of Rome (2001); P. Hardie, Ovid's Poetics of Illusion (2002); Ovid: Ars amatoria, book 3, ed. R. K. Gibson (2003); A. S. Hollis, Fragments of Roman Poetry, c. 60 BC–AD 20 (2007); S. J. Heyworth, Cynthia (2009); A. Feldherr, Playing Gods (2010). Roman Stage: The Tragedies of Ennius, ed. H. D. Jocelyn (1967); Seneca, Agamemnon, ed. R. J. Tarrant (1976); R. L. Hunter, The New Comedy of Greece and Rome (1985); A. J. Boyle, Roman Tragedy (1997); F. Dupont, The Invention of Literature (1999); Seneca, Thyestes, ed. R. J. Tarrant (2000); C. Marshall, The Stagecraft and Performance of Roman Comedy (2006). Social Background: A. Richlin, The Garden of Priapus (1992); P. White, Promised Verse (1993); T. N. Habinek, The Politics of Latin Literature (1998); J. Henderson, Writing Down Rome (1999); W. Fitzgerald, Slavery and the Roman Literary Imagination (2000); A. Keith, Engendering Rome: Women in Roman Epic (2000); S. Goldberg, Constructing Literature in the Roman Republic (2005); M. Lowrie, Writing, Performance, and Authority in Augustan Rome (2009). Studies of Reception: T. M. Greene, The Light in Troy: Imitation and Discovery in Renaissance Poetry (1982); L. Barkan, The Gods Made Flesh (1986); C. Martindale, Redeeming the Text (1992); D. Quint, Epic and Empire (1993); C. Burrow, Epic Romance (1993); Classical Literary Careers and Their Reception, ed. P. Hardie and H. Moore (2010); P. Hardie, Rumour and Renown (2012). Style, Meter, and Other Formal Aspects: L. P. Wilkinson, Golden Latin Artistry (1963); R.G.M. Nisbet and M. Hubbard, A Commentary on Horace: Odes, Book 1 (1970), A Commentary on Horace: Odes, Book 2 (1978); J. Wills, Repetition in Latin Poetry (1996); C. Questa, La metrica di Plauto e Terenzio (2007); L. Morgan, Musa pedestris (2010).

■ II. Medieval. Anthologies and Texts: MGH; Migne, PG and PL—the fullest collection of texts; Analecta hymnica—the fullest collections of hymns; Carmina Burana, ed. J. A. Schmeller, 4th ed. (1907)—the only complete text, later ed. by A. Hilka and O. Schumann, though only v. 1 (pts. 1–2), v. 2 (pt. 1), and v. 3 (pt. 1) have appeared (1931–71); Early Latin Hymns, ed. A. S. Walpole (1922); Medieval Latin Lyrics, ed. and trans. H. Waddell, 5th ed. (1948); The Goliard Poets, ed. and trans. G. F. Whicher (1949); F. Brittain, The Medieval Latin and Romance Lyric, 2d ed. (1951); Oxford Book of Medieval Latin Verse, ed. F.J.E. Raby (1959); Hymni latini antiquissimi xxv, ed. W. Bulst (1975); More Latin Lyrics from Virgil to Milton, ed. and trans. H. Waddell (1977); Seven Versions of Carolingian Pastoral, ed. R.P.H. Green (1980); Poetry of the Carolingian Renaissance, ed. P. Godman (1985)—long intro. Criticism, History, and Prosody: Keil—collects the principal med. Lat. grammarians and prosodists; Manitius—the standard lit. hist.; Meyer; H. Walther, Das Streitgedicht in der lateinische Literatur des Mittelalters (1920); Faral; "Mittellateinische Dichtung in Deutschen," Reallexikon I; Lote; Curtius; Raby, Christian and Secular; D. Norberg, Poésie latine rythmique (1954); Beare—good survey; M. Burger, Recherches sur la structure et l'origine des vers romans (1957); K. Strecker, Introduction to Medieval Latin, trans. and rev. R. B. Palmer (1957)—excellent intro. and bibl.; Norberg—best account of prosody; M.R.P. McGuire, Introduction to Medieval Latin Studies (1964); J. Szövérffy, Annalen der lateinische Hymnendichtung, 2 v. (1964–65); A. C. Friend, "Medieval Latin Literature," Fisher; Dronke; J. Szövérffy, Weltliche Dichtungen des lateinische Mittelalters, v. 1 (1970); C. Witke, Numen litterarum (1971); P. Klopsch, Einführung in die mittellateinische Verslehre (1972); Murphy—med. rhet.; F. Brunhölzl, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (1975–2003); P. Dronke, The Medieval Lyric, 2d ed. (1978); The Interpretation of Medieval Latin Poetry, ed. W.T.H. Jackson (1980); J. Stevens, Words and Music in the Middle Ages (1980); Brogan, 720 ff.; Norden—art prose; P. Dronke, The Medieval Poet and His World (1985); P. Godman, Poets and Emperors (1987); O. B. Hardison Jr., Prosody and Purpose in the English Renaissance (1989)—incl. med. Lat.; J. Szövérffy, Latin Hymns (1989); F. Mantello and A. Rigg, Medieval Latin: An Introduction and Bibliographical Guide (1996)—authoritative essays and bibls.; Lausberg—rhet; The Oxford Handbook of Medieval Latin Literature, ed. R. Hexter and D. Townsend (2012).

■ III. Renaissance and After. Anthologies: Poeti latini del quattrocento, ed. F. Arnaldi et al. (1964)—with It. trans.; Musae reduces, ed. P. Laurens, 2 v. (1975)—with Fr. trans.; An Anthology of Neo-Latin Poetry, ed. F. J. Nichols (1979)—with Eng. transs.; Renaissance Latin Verse, ed. A. Perosa and J. Sparrow (1979); Renaissance Latin Poetry, ed. and trans. I. D. McFarlane (1980). Criticism and History: L. Spitzer, "The Problem of Latin Renaissance Poetry," SP 2 (1955); J. Sparrow, "Latin Verse of the High Renaissance," Italian Renaissance Studies, ed. E. F. Jacob (1960); W. L. Grant, Neo-Latin Literature and the Pastoral (1965); J. Ijsewijn, Companion to Neo-Latin Studies (1977); W. J. Kennedy, Jacopo Sannazaro and the Uses of Pastoral (1983); D. Robin, Filelfo in Milan (1991); S. Murphy, The Gift of Immortality (1997); L. Piepho, Holofernes' Mantuan (2001); W. Ludwig, Miscella Neolatina (2004); J. C. Warner, The Augustinian Epic (2005); Petrarch: A Critical Guide, ed. V. Kirkham and A. Maggi (2009). Editions and Translations: G. Fracastoro, Syphilis, ed. and trans. H. Wynne-Finch (1935); C. Celtis, Selections, ed. and trans. L. Forster (1948); J. Milton, Variorum: Latin and Greek Poems, ed. and trans. D. Bush et al. (1970); A. Navagero, Lusus, ed. and trans. A. E. Wilson (1973); Petrarch, Bucolicum carmen, ed. and trans. T. G. Bergin (1974); M. G. Vida, De arte poetica, ed. and trans. R. G. Williams (1976); Petrarch, Africa, trans. T. G. Bergin (1977); J. Secundus, The Latin Love Elegy, ed. and trans. C. Endres (1981); A. Poliziano, Silvae, ed. and trans. C. Fantazzi (2004); M. Vegio, Short Epics, ed. and trans. M. Putnam (2004); P. Bembo, Lyric Poetry, ed. and trans. B. Radice (2005); G. Pontano, Baiae, ed. and trans. R. G. Dennis (2006); T. Folengo, Baldo, ed. and trans. A. E. Mullaney (2007); C. Landino, Poems, ed. and trans. M. P. Chatfield (2008); M. G. Vida, Christiad, ed. and trans. J. Gardner (2009).

A. Barchiesi (cl.); W. Wetherbee, T.V.F. Brogan, S. Penn (med.); W. J. Kennedy (ren.)

LATIN PROSODY. See classical prosody.

LATVIA, POETRY OF. The roots of Latvian poetry are found in Latvian folk songs called dainas. A single folk meter is characteristic across the territory of Latvia: eight trochaic syllables per line, four unrhymed lines per stanza, the first two lines proposing a general situation, the last two adding a specific comment:

Viena meita Rīgā dzied,
Otra dzied Valmierā;

Abas dzied vienu dziesmu,
Vai bij vienas mātes meitas?

(One girl sings in Riga,
Another sings in Valmiera;
They both sing the same song,
Are they the same mother's daughters?)

Dainas were first celebrated by the Ger. philosophers Johann Georg Hamann and J. G. Herder, who noted that the basic form was sung, not written. Written poetic trads. began with Lutheran hymns, most notably by Christopher Fürecker (ca. 1615–85). From the Reformation to the 19th c., Lutheran pastors and the grassroots Moravian Brethren unsuccessfully urged Latvians to reject dainas in favor of Christian songs.

A 19th-c. movement of Latvian intellectuals sought subject matter in national hist., folklore, and mythology. Juris Alunāns (1832–64) inaugurated Latvian poetry with Dziesmiņas (Songs) in 1856. Poems by Auseklis (pseud. of Miķelis Krogzems, 1850–79) became popular in choral performances at the National Song Festivals, established in 1873; his poem "Beverīnas dziedonis" (Singer of Beverina) retells a 13th-c. chronicle account of a singer who halted a war, establishing "the power of song," as a popular theme in Latvian poetry. Andrejs Pumpurs (1841–1902) created the national epic Lāčplēsis (Bearslayer), based on folktales and dainas.

In the 1880s, Marxism precipitated a deep ideological schism in Latvian lit.; Rainis (pseud. of Jānis Pliekšāns, 1865–1929), however, synthesized national hist. and mythology with a secular love of all humanity. Aspazija (pseud. of Elza Rozenberga-Pliekšāne, 1868–1943) combined neoromantic nationalism with social conscience and feminism in her flamboyant, sensual poetry. A group led by Kārlis Skalbe (1879–1945), Jānis Akurāters (1876–1937), and Kārlis Krūza (1884–1960) published an "art-for-art's-sake" *manifesto in the 1906 literary jour. Dzelme. Edvarts Virza (pseud. of Jēkabs Liekna, 1883–1940) dropped a bombshell of passionately erotic poetry with Biķeris (1907).

After Latvian national independence in 1918, Rainis and Aspazija were greeted as national heroes when they returned from exile in Switzerland. Publications of a new artistic association, Zaļā vārna (Green Crow), catalyzed creative energy. Diverse content and style reflected many political and social currents. *Expressionism left an impact on Pēteris Ērmanis (1893–1969), the first Latvian poet to experiment with *free verse. Urban poet Ēriks Ādamsons (1907–46) was introspective and complex, ironic and refined, scornful of rural simplicities. The opium-laced poems of Jānis Ziemeļnieks (pseud. of J. Krauklis, 1897–1930) are hallmarks of melodic beauty. Aleksandrs Čaks (pseud. of A. Čadarainis, 1902–50) is the most original modernist, carrying a tangible legacy to subsequent generations. Forceful and iconoclastic, mocking and ironic, stressing rhythm over rhyme, he shocked the traditionalists and fascinated the young.

During World War II, many emerging poets such as patriotic bard Andrejs Eglītis (1912–2006) and Velta Toma (1912–99) went into exile in the West. Other émigrés found their voice later, among them urban poet Linards Tauns (pseud. of Arnolds Bērzs, 1922–63), jazz-inspired Gunars Salinš (1924–2010), nuanced master of lang. Astrīde Ivaska (b. 1926), and witty existentialist Olafs Stumbrs (1931–96). The poetry of rock music inspired Juris Kronbergs (b. 1946).

In Latvia, Stalinism and World War II left cultural life in ruins. Soviet Latvian poet Linards Laicens (1883–1938), trans. of the Finnish epic Kalevala, was executed during Stalin's purges in Russia. The Soviets deported Leonīds Breikšs (1908–42) from Latvia, his gravesite unknown; he is remembered for his "Prayer," sung during the Singing Revolution of 1988–91. Knuts Skujenieks (b. 1936) was arrested for political activities in 1962 and sentenced to seven years' hard labor. In the final years of Soviet rule, poet of conscience Klāvs Elsbergs (1959–87) was killed when he fell from a high-rise window under suspicious circumstances.

In Soviet Latvia, socialist *realism was required. Among the best-known Stalinist praise poets were Arvīds Grigulis (1906–89) and Jānis Sudrabkalns (1894–1975). Mirdza Ķempe's (1907–74) loud political poems garnered official status, but her love poetry carried the power of truth, drawing young poets to her for mercilessly honest mentoring. Ojārs Vācietis (1933–83) was publicly ostracized for "ideological ambiguity" in his 1962 poem "Einšteiniana"; his first-person poem about Stalin's resurrection remained in ms. until 1987. Immensely popular Imants Ziedonis (b. 1933) expanded Vācietis's stylistic innovations, shaping conversational registers into musical free verse, addressing the reader directly and personally. Vizma Belševica (1931–2005) was first hailed, then silenced for eight years after her 1969 poem about a med. scribe who wrote secret notes in the margins of an official chronicle. Ārija Elksne (1928–84) likewise created islands of non-Soviet truth with her poems of gentle, feminine spirituality and love.

Most of these 20th-c. authors are also well represented in choral and pop songs; composer Imants Kalniņš (b. 1941) forged a particularly powerful combination of genres when he set to music poems by Māris Čaklais (1940–2003), multiplying political meanings hidden between the lines.

The 1970s and 1980s saw a rich influx of styles and themes through trans. by a generation of polyglot poets, among them Uldis Bērziņš (b. 1944), Leons Briedis (b. 1949), Dagnija Dreika (b. 1951), and the abovementioned Skujenieks; their poetry's transnational intertextual relations may never be fully unraveled. Others looked to native folklore. Ziedonis rediscovered the dainas' style and mythological content, while urban singing group Skandinieki revived authentic performance styles and melodies of oral poetry. Māra Zālīte's (b. 1952) simplicity and clarity echoed the powerful, grounded women's voices of folk song trad. Her librettos for musicals and rock operas resonated among the masses during and after the Singing Revolution.

Tension between censorship and honesty meant popularity for those who broke through barriers. The quirky poetry of Aivars Neibarts (1939–2001), e.g., juxtaposed words with phonetic similarities, producing playfully paradoxical, truthful statements. The loud, sometimes aggressive bravura of Māris Melgalvs (1957–2005) was a cover for sincere, vulnerable humanity; his poems were popularized by the underground rock group Pērkons. Poet Jānis Peters (b. 1939) entered politics proper as leader of the 1988 Latvian Writers' Union meeting, a public forum for free political discourse; he was later appointed independent Latvia's ambassador to Russia.

After freedom of speech was ensured by political independence, poetry was no longer needed to veil political statements; literary critic Berelis calls the 1990s a "post-prophetic era" when poets descended back to mortal life. Some lamented the sudden lack of interest in their experiments, but others such as religious poets Broņislava Martuževa (b. 1924) and Anna Rancāne (b. 1959) found broad resonance. Kornēlija Apšukrūma publishes large print runs of books popular as a source of handwritten inscriptions in greeting cards.

Poets and literary critics Māris Salējs (b. 1971) and Kārlis Vērdiņš (b. 1979) observe that poets nowadays are acutely aware of their social role. A 2005 manifesto by Gaiķu Māris (pseud. of M. Rozentāls, b. 1973) and Kikōne (pseud. of Edgars Mednis, 1984–2006) stressed respect for literary apprenticeship and the author's responsibility: "If the reader feels that the writer has wasted his time, then he reserves the right to kick, or pelt the author with rotten tomatoes."

The sense of social responsibility fosters epic, not lyrical expression, focusing on everyday experience in a larger, nonmaterial reality. Pēters Brūveris (b. 1957) sharpens perceptions through historical memory, reconstructing humanity out of the garbage of civilization. An awareness of lang. is ever present: Rūta Mežavilka's (b. 1971) grammatically crippled lines evoke deformities in life perceptions; the folksy Latgallian speech of Valentīns Lukaševičs (b. 1968) vibrates between witty rural identity and dark existentialism. For Inga Gaile (b. 1976) and Liāna Langa (pseud. of L. Bokša, b. 1960), fluid, organic images and a physical awareness of the body elicit a world of senses, not words. Latvian-Rus. poets Sergejs Timofejevs (b. 1970), Artūrs Punte (b. 1977), and Semjons Haņins (pseud. of Aleksandrs Zapoļs, b. 1970), leaders in the Orbīta group, publish bilingually and explore multimedia poetry.

Latvian poetry in the early 21st c. reached its largest audiences through musical performance. Heavy-metal group Skyforger and the rapper Ozols (pseud. of Ģirts Rozentāls, b. 1979) won acclaim abroad, but their success at home depended on effective poetry. Lyrics by Renārs Kaupers (b. 1974) and the popular Latvian band Brainstorm set the tone of the 2005 Youth Song Festival in Riga:

> Tie ir vārdi no manas tautas, un dziesma man arī no tās, > un es zinu, neviens manā vietā to nedziedās.
>
> (These are words that come from my people, and the song is also from them, > and I know that nobody else can sing it in my place.)

In contrast to images of civilization's decline and alienation that predominate in print, Kaupers projected an optimistic sense of responsibility for lang. and poetic trads., hinting at a richly multifaceted, resonant future for Latvian poetry.

■ Anthologies: Latvju modernās dzejas antoloģija, ed. A. Čaks and P. Ķikuts (1930); Latvju sonets 100 gados 1856–1956, ed. K. Dziļleja (1956); Lettische Lyrik, ed. E. Eckard-Skalberg (1960); Contemporary Latvian Poetry, ed. I. Cedriņš (1984); All Birds Know This, ed. Kristīne Sadovska (2001); Citā gaismā, ed. M. Lasmanis (2005)—Latvian poetry in the West; A. Pumpurs, Bearslayer, the Latvian Legend, trans. A. Cropley (2007); The Baltic Quintet, ed. E. Page (2008); Latvian Literature, 7 v. (2002–), http://www.literature.lv/; Krišjāņa Barona dainu skapis, http://www.dainuskapis.lv.

■ Criticism and History: E. Virza, La Littérature lettonne depuis l'époque de réveil national (1926); R. Ekmanis, Latvian Literature under the Soviets: 1940–1975 (1978); Linguistics and Poetics of Latvian Folksongs, ed. V. Viķis-Freibergs (1989); Latviešu literatūras vēsture, ed. V. Hausmanis et al., 3 v. (1998–2001); G. Berelis, Latviešu literatūras vēsture (1999); A. Cimdiņa, Introduction to Modern Latvian Literature (2001); J. Kursīte, Dzejas vārdnīca (2002); M. Salējs et al., Latviešu literatūra 2000–2006 (2007).

J. Silenieks; G. Šmidchens

LAUDA (Lat., "praise"). It. genre of religious origin and content. The lauda was first created probably as a vernacular equivalent or adaptation of the med. Lat. *hymn, e.g., the "Stabat mater" and the "Dies irae." Its devel. is connected with a 13th-c. cult, esp. widespread in Umbria in central Italy, the confraternity of the Scourgers (Flagellanti). The earliest surviving example is Umbrian in origin, the Laudes creaturarum (Praise of the Creatures; in It., ca. 1224) of Francis of Assisi. The greatest cultivator of the lauda, Jacopone da Todi (1236?–1306), set its range of topics (from simple thanksgiving to complex multivocal dramatizations of liturgical themes) and meters of great freedom and variety; the typical form was the ballata with a two-line ripresa (xx) and a four-line monorhymed stanza (aaax bbbx, etc.) composed generally of ottonari, *hendecasyllables, and *heptasyllables. Jacopone's more than 100 surviving laude found no direct imitators of note, but the genre survived into the 16th c.

See italian prosody; italy, poetry of.

■ G. Ippoliti, Dalle sequenze alle laudi (1914); P. Dronke, The Medieval Lyric (1969); M. Fubini, Metrica e poesia, 2d ed. (1970); Wilkins; D. L. Jeffrey, The Early English Lyric and Franciscan Spirituality (1975), ch. 4; Elwert, Italienische, sect. 90–91; P. S. Diehl, The Medieval European Religious Lyric (1985); S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994); G. Sica, Scrivere in versi (2003); A. Vettori, Poets of Divine Love: Franciscan Mystical Poetry of the Thirteenth Century (2004).

T. Wlassics; C. Kleinhenz

LAUREATE. See poet laureate.

LEICH. Poem in unequal stanzas, cultivated in Ger.-speaking areas in the 13th and 14th cs. Music survives for a few examples. The term leich originally designated an instrumental melody, a sense that persists in addition to that of the "nonisostrophic poem," a semantic loan on the pattern of OF lai*, first attested in Ulrich von Liechtenstein (mid-13th c.). The leich has affinities with the med. Lat. sequence, Occitan and OF descort*, OF lai, Occitan estampida*, and OF estampie. Like sequence and lai (but unlike descort), the leich may be used for religious as well as secular subject matter.

There are considerably more examples of the secular leich. Its themes are mainly those of Minnesang*. A new devel., not paralleled in the Romance analogues, is the introduction of a dancing section into the leich in Heinrich von Sax, Ulrich von Winterstetten, and Tannhäuser; this is associated with dactylic rhythms (Tanzleich). Tannhäuser is unique in introducing into the leich the didactic themes of princely *panegyric and lament for dead rulers.

The leich is usually considerably longer than most isostrophic poems. A high proportion of unique *strophes is characteristic of the religious leich and the Tanzleich. There may also be contiguous or noncontiguous repetitions of strophic patterns or partial or approximate response between sections. There is a proliferation of short rhyming units, with a high incidence of different types of rhyme. The leich is frequently divided into two halves, but in the Tanzleich, a ternary division is also found; internally, the strophes are frequently bipartite, less often tripartite. The religious leich has affinities with Lat. sequence, but in the main, the leich is more closely akin to its Romance analogues.

See GERMANIC PROSODY.

■ F. Wolf, Über die Lais, Sequenzen und Leiche (1841); O. Gottschalk, Der deutsche Minneleich (1908); R. J. Browne, "Stylistic and Formal History of the Middle High German Leich," Diss., Yale (1955); K. H. Bertau, Sangverslyrik (1964); H. Kuhn, "Leich," Reallexikon II; I. Glier, "Der Minneleich Im späten 13. Jahrhundert," Werk-Typ-Situation, ed. I. Glier et al. (1969); J. Maillard, "Lai, Leich," Gattungen der Musik, ed. W. Arlt et al. (1973); H. Spanke, Studien zu Sequenz, Lai und Leich (1977); O. Sayce, The Medieval German Lyric, 1150–1300 (1982); Tradition und Gattungsbewusstsein im deutschen Leich, ed. H. Apfelböck (1991).

O. L. SAYCE

LEONINE RHYME, VERSE. "Once rhyme invaded the hexameter," John Addington Symonds remarked, "the best verses of the medieval period in that measure are leonine." Also the worst (Raby). Ordinarily, the term refers to internal rhyme in the med. Lat. *hexameter (i.e., the word at line end rhyming with the word preceding the *caesura); technically, it denotes an oxytonic word ending (a "feminine" rhyme; see MASCULINE AND FEMININE). Though there are examples in cl. Lat. poetry (e.g., Ovid, Ars amatoria) and *epitaph verse, leonine rhyme flourished in med. Lat. after the 9th c., being so popular it was imitated in Ir., Eng. (the OE "Rhyming Poem"), Ger., and (esp.) Fr. It is regularly mentioned in the med. prosody manuals of ars metrica and séconde rhétorique*. Presumably the device came into verse from one of the clausulae of rhythmical prose, the cursus leoninus, though the origin of the term is uncertain: some trace it to Pope Leo the Great, others to Leoninus, a 12th-c. Benedictine canon of Paris (fl. 1135; see Erdmann).

Leonine verse refers to a hexameter-pentameter *couplet (not always rhymed), as in Eberhard's Laborintus—the meter known to antiquity as the *elegiac distich. Both in these couplets and in hexameter couplets, more elaborate schemes of internal rhyming quickly developed both in Occitan and OF such as rhyming the lines' first two *hemistichs together and last two together (Lat. versus interlaqueati, Fr. rime enterlacée, "interwoven rhyme"); or a double rhyme in the first line, a second double rhyme in the second, and a third binding the ends of the two lines—which by breaking gives the aabccb scheme of Fr. rime couée, *"tail rhyme." Thus, the partitioning of long-line Lat. verse via internal rhyme paved the way for a multitude of short-line lyric stanzas in the vernaculars.

■ W. Wackernagel, "Gesch. des deutschen Hexameters und Pentameters bis auf Klopstock," Kleinere Schriften, vol. 2 (1873); E. Freymond, "Über den reichen Reim bei altfranzösischen Dichtern," ZRP 6 (1882); Schipper 1.305 ff; Kastner; Meyer, 2.267; K. Strecker, "Leoninische Hexameter und Pentameter im 9. Jahrhundert," Neues Archi für ältere deutsche Geschichteskunde 44 (1922), 213 ff.; C. Erdmann, "Leonitas," Corona Quernea: Festgabe Karl Strecker (1941); Lote, 2.141 ff.; Curtius, 8.2–3; Raby, Secular, 1.228, 2.1; Norden.

T.V.F. BROGAN

LESBIAN POETRY. On the simplest level, lesbian poetry can be defined as poetry written by a self-identified lesbian poet on a clearly lesbian theme, such as erotic love for another woman. However, lesbian poetry comprises a wide field of works that may be written by self-identified lesbian poets, by poets presumed to be lesbian, by reclaimed lesbian poets whose lesbian content and themes may be "encoded," and indeed by any poet writing on themes that may be deemed lesbian. Lesbian scholars, perhaps most notably Faderman and Castle, include the vast poetry of lesbian implication—verse penned by poets known or thought to have had their primary emotional and erotic relationships with women and/or whose themes include overt or encoded references to intimate love between women. A subset of the larger field, lesbian-feminist poetry, arose from the lesbian-feminist movement of the 1970s and 1980s and is the most clearly identifiable lesbian poetry. Written by self-avowed lesbian poets with feminist political outlooks, lesbian-feminist poetry frequently takes lesbians or lesbianism as its subject matter. In the broadest sense, however, the themes of lesbian poetry range from lesbian love to feminist politics to lesbian-feminist revisionary myth-making to homophobia—or in some definitions any topic approached by the widely diverse population of lesbian poets. To limit the definition to women writing explicitly about women's same-sex love or living in cultures, eras, and situations that allow them to self-name as lesbians is an underestimation of the scope of the field.

The name lesbian poetry itself, and the genre, is traced by many to Sappho of Lesbos, Plato's "tenth muse." In The Highest Apple, Grahn traces the lineage of lesbian poetry from Sappho through an anonymous med. nun, a 19th-c. prostitute named Wu Tsao, Emily Dickinson, Amy Lowell, and Gertrude Stein, to herself and her contemporaries in the lesbian-feminist poetry movement of the 1970s and 1980s. H.D. invoked Sappho in early poems such as "Oread" and "Hermes of the Waves" in the 1910s, and Sappho's life is the central trope of Eloise Klein Healy's 21st-c. v. The Island's Project. Lesbians of color in the U. S. regularly look elsewhere for their points of origin and sources of inspiration. Joy Harjo (Creek/Cherokee) explicitly excludes herself from the story of "the fiery goddess in the middle of the island" in her poem "The Book of Myths" (1990). Audre Lorde looks to the women-loving trad. of her mother's Caribbean homeland, Carriacou, and to the female deities of her West Af. heritage; Gloria Anzaldúa names indigenous Mexican figures incl. Cihuatlyotl and La Malinche.

Faderman and Castle begin their anthologies of lesbian lit. with Katherine Fowler Philips (England and Wales, 1632–64) and Anne de Rohan (France, 1584–1646), respectively, flouting the Foucauldian orthodoxy that the identity "lesbian" (or "homosexual") did not exist before 1869. Both anthologists include Aphra Behn (England, 1640–89) and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (Mexico, ca. 1648–95). Castle traces representations of lesbian love in poetry written by men to the early 16th c. Vanita finds evidence of women's same-sex love depicted in ancient Sanskrit texts and in early verse representations of lesbianism written and performed by men who cross-dressed as women in the Indian rekhti poetry of the early 19th c. Faderman explains her choice of how to define lesbian in one instance by encouraging readers to think of lesbian as "an adjective" rather than "a noun"; Castle insists that it is possible to use the word lesbian in "the 'ordinary' or 'dictionary' or 'vernacular sense'," regardless of the cultural and historical specificity of the term; and Vanita argues that terms equivalent to "lesbian" and "gay" existed in various South Asian langs. long before the supposed Western invention of homosexuality as an identity in the 19th c. On the other hand, the historian Ng is "searching" among suggestive evidence rather than definitively finding lesbians in her germinal study of early 20th-c. homoerotic women's poetry in China.

Contemp. literary critics find themselves on more solid ground reading the lesbian poetry of 19th- and early 20th-c. writers such as Dickinson, Angelina Weld Grimké, and Edna St. Vincent Millay, whose "encoded" lesbian content can be understood through a combination of extant biographical evidence (such as Dickinson's letters to Sue Gilbert) and a knowledge of homoerotic tropes created by or available to the poets in their lifetimes. Many poets of the era employed natural imagery as metaphor for female genitals, e.g., Dickinson's "pea that duty locks"; or Lowell's "stiff, broad outer leaves; / The smaller ones, / Pleasant to touch, veined with purple; / The glazed inner leaves. / One by one I parted you from your leaves."

By fairly early in the 20th c., critics need look no further than the explicit lines of certain poets to find lesbian meaning in the contemp. sense. As early as 1919, Elsa Gidlow would "ask no man pardon" for daring to "taste with endless kisses" the "flesh, bitter and salt" of a clearly female lover. The lesbian-centered creative community of expatriate Paris in the 1920s and 1930s produced both overt and covert lesbian poetry. While Stein disguised lesbian lovemaking as "lifting belly" and orgasms as cows, her poems were explicitly sexual to those who could crack the code, esp. because she made no attempt to hide her relationship with Alice B. Toklas. At the same time, Renée Vivien (Pauline Tarn), lover of lesbian salon host Natalie Barney, employed no codes to obscure the lesbian eroticism of her work. Back in the U.S. in the same era, the lit. of the *Harlem Renaissance was replete with suggestive lesbian content, from the encoded lyric poetry of Grimké to the provocative lyrics of Ma Rainey's "Prove It on Me Blues," among the most explicit depictions of lesbianism and cross-dressing of the era: "They said I do it, ain't nobody caught me / Sure got to prove it on me / Went out last night with a crowd of my friends / They must've been women, 'cause I don't like no men / It's true I wear a collar and a tie . . . / Talk to the gals just like any old man . . ."

The 1940s and 1950s were repressive times, especially in the U.S., and much lesbian culture and lit. went underground for a time, even as World War II and its aftermath created the conditions for urban lesbian cultures in many U.S. cities. Important lesbian and bisexual women poets of the period include Elizabeth Bishop, May Swenson, and Muriel Rukeyser, the only one of the three to come out of the closet explicitly, after political tides shifted in the 1970s. Contemp. critics have noted that some of the historical figures claimed by lesbians from the pregay liberation era (before 1969), incl. writers, might more accurately be classified as bisexual or transgender (or transgender lesbian). For example, transgender author Leslie Feinberg claims Stein in addition to several prose writers. Bisexual activists point to Rukeyser, H.D., and Millay, all of whom incorporate lesbian themes in their work.

Spurred by the Women's Liberation movement and lesbian feminism of the 1960s and 1970s, a new generation began to uncover the forgotten and obscured works of earlier lesbians and to develop a clear, explicit lesbian poetry, "a whole new poetry beginning here," in the words of Adrienne Rich. Among the first salvos was Grahn's "Psychoanalysis of Edward the Dyke," which she deemed "unpublishable" in the mid-1960s, and "A Woman Is Talking to Death," chronicling her dishonorable discharge from the military for lesbianism in the early 1960s. Poetry became a major force in the lesbian-feminist movement, according to Melanie Kaye/Kantrowitz becoming as popular as "shakespeare [sic] in his own time" or "the audience for rock in the late sixties." In this, lesbian-feminist poetry resembled the politically engaged poetry of the many social and political movements of the era, such as the *Black Arts movement. The numerous feminist and lesbian periodicals of the era all published poetry, and most lesbian gatherings—political, literary, or otherwise—included poetry readings. Clausen went so far as to call feminism of that era "A Movement of Poets," many of whom were openly lesbian. Grahn, Lorde, and Rich were among the best-known lesbian poets of the period, which also saw the prominence of Pat Parker, Rita Mae Brown, Olga Broumas, Willyce Kim, Susan Griffin, and Marilyn Hacker. A larger number of lesbians of color gained visibility as they came into wider circulation in the 1980s and 1990s, among them Anzaldúa, Chrystos, Cheryl Clarke, Jewelle Gomez, Harjo, Cherríe Moraga, and Kitty Tsui.

Contemp. lesbian poetry tends to take the form of short, lyric, free verse, although some poets work in more traditional forms, and overall the category is quite heterogeneous. Grahn's poetry varies considerably in length from a few couplets to entire plays; Irena Klepfisz's "Work Sonnets" comprise a cycle of poems written in that strict form; and Hacker, notably, has utilized such demanding forms as the *sestina and *villanelle.

See FEMINIST APPROACHES TO POETRY, GAY POETRY, GENDER AND POETRY, LYRIC.

■ M. Kaye/Kantrowitz, "Culture Making," Sinister Wisdom (1980); E. Bulkin, "Introduction," Lesbian Poetry, ed. E. Bulkin and J. Larkin (1981); J. Grahn, The Highest Apple (1985); J. Clausen, "A Movement of Poets," Books and Life (1989); Chloe plus Olivia, ed. L. Faderman (1994); P. Bennett, "Lesbian Poetry in the United States, 1890–1990," Professions of Desire, ed. G. E. Haggerty and B. Zimmerman (1995); V. Ng, "Looking for Lesbians in Chinese History," A Queer World, ed. M. Duberman (1997); L. Garber, Identity Poetics (2001); Queering India, ed. R. Vanita (2002); The Literature of Lesbianism, ed. T. Castle (2003).

L. GARBER

LETRILLA (diminutive of Sp. letra, "letter," a short gloss). A Sp. poem generally written in short lines, often having a *refrain, and usually written on a light or satiric topic. Such poems can be found as early as the 14th c. at least but were apparently not given the name letrilla until much later. Famous examples are Luis de Góngora's "Ándeme yo caliente, / y ríase la gente" (As long as I am comfortable, / let people laugh) and Francisco de Quevedo's "Poderoso caballero es don Dinero" (A powerful gentleman is Sir Money).

■ Navarro.

D. C. CLARKE

LETTER, VERSE. See VERSE EPISTLE.

LETTRISME. A movement that first gained prominence in Paris following World War II. Founded by the Romanian expatriate Isidore Isou, who wished to reduce lang. to its constituent elements, lettrisme sought to displace *surrealism as the leading avant-garde movement. Since the early 1950s, Maurice Lemaître was lettrisme's principal theorist and chief organizer; Jean-Paul Curtay introduced several innovations. Lettrisme derives from the It. futurists' parole in libertà (words in freedom), from the Rus. futurists' exploration of transrational lang., zaum'* (see FUTURISM), and from the Dadaists' experiments with opto-phonetic poetry. Like *Dada, lettrisme is a violently antagonistic movement that attacks the foundations of bourgeois society through the medium of the written word by reducing the letters of the alphabet to a series of phonetic or visual counters. By emphasizing the autonomy of the individual letter at the expense of the larger word, lettrisme aims to destroy signification itself. Meaning is not just fragmented but totally effaced.

In theory (and to some extent in practice), the principles underlying lettrisme may be applied to all forms of human endeavor. While letterists have become involved in such areas as politics, economics, erotology, and even pharmacy, their more significant contributions have been in the realm of the arts. Of these, poetry and the plastic arts have provided the most fertile ground for experimentation. Lettrisme originally focused on *sound poetry, combining letters in various fashions according to their phonetic values, then *visual poetry, varying the size and shape of letters to produce the graphic equivalent of drawing. Usurping the traditional prerogatives of painting, graphic conventions were placed at the service of the visual composition, and the concept of visual poetry gave way to that of visual art.

A resolutely interdisciplinary movement, lettrisme juxtaposes elements such as letters, photographs, miscellaneous signs, and pictorial images in an attempt to transcend the limits of traditional representation. The ling. sign is stripped of its ling. function. Letters are powerless to assert themselves, and the whole field of signs is reduced to the status of random marks on the page. Lacking verbal identity, the letters function exclusively as pictorial signs, with the result that their significance derives according to the rules governing abstract art.

See CONCRETE POETRY, VISUAL POETRY.

■ I. Isou, Introduction á une nouvelle poésie et á une nouvelle musique (1947); M. Lemaître, Qu'est-ce que le lettrisme? (1954), and Bilan lettriste (1955); I. Isou, Les Champs de force de la peinture (1964); M. Lemaître, Lettrisme et hypergraphie (1966); J.-P. Curtay, La Poésie lettriste (1974); D. Seaman, Concrete Poetry in France (1981); S. Foster, Lettrisme (1983); J.-P. Curtay, Letterism and Hypographics (1985); R. Sabatier, Le Lettrisme (1989); W. Bohn, Modern Visual Poetry (2001).

W. BOHN

LIED (Ger., "poem," "song"; pl. Lieder). Etymological interchange notwithstanding, the name typically applied to a musical setting of a Ger. poem minimally calling for solo voice and piano. An early fixture of the home, the genre increasingly moved into the concert hall during the later 19th c.; Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauss contributed notable examples of the orchesterlied. Historians have evoked a myth-laden birth for the lied, with J. W. Goethe leading the way in verse and Franz Schubert in music. Scholars now see the genre emerging in the mid-18th c. to accommodate the growing market of amateur music makers who readily responded to the tuneful primacy of *songs by, among numerous others, Johann Friedrich Reichardt and Carl Friedrich Zelter. Nineteenth-c. Ger. idealism and its absorption with absolutism and transcendence helped conscript the lied for new purposes. A good example is Schubert's "An die Musik" (To Music), which lauds song's ability to transport one to "eine beßre Welt" (a better world). Like Schubert's more than 600 lieder, Ger. song at large has served an array of cultural needs, incl. identity formation and nationalism. With its heyday in the 19th c., pivotal composers, after Schubert, are Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, and Hugo Wolf. Enthusiasts seek out examples in which they find a perfect union of constituent elements: variously, verse and music or the interaction of voice and accompaniment. More practically, composers have drawn on a variety of means to meet a broad continuum of expressive ends. An important subcategory is the song cycle (Liederkreis, Liederzyklus) in which a composer sets to music a succession of poems. Schubert again commands with Die schöne Müllerin (The Beautiful Maid of the Mill, 1824) and Winterreise (Winter's Journey, 1827).

See MUSIC AND POETRY.

■ D. Stein and R. Spillman, Poetry into Song (1996); W. Dürr, Das deutsche Sololied im 19. Jahrhundert, 2d ed. (2002); Cambridge Companion to the Lied, ed. J. Parsons (2004); German Lieder in the Nineteenth Century, ed. R. Hallmark, 2d ed. (2009); Y. Malin, Song in Motion: Rhythm and Meter in the German Lied (2010).

J. PARSONS

LIGHT VERSE. The term light verse is an omnium gatherum. While light verse once referred principally to vers de société, the Fr. term for verse reserved for one's social circle to amuse or commemorate an occasion, its meaning now includes folk poetry, *nonsense verse, ribald verse, kitsch, and more. If the earlier meaning of the term was too narrow, it has now been stretched so far that it has lost its shape. The Library of Congress cataloging system has no subject heading for "light verse"; its closest approximation is "humorous poetry," suggesting one devel. in light verse is its movement to the comic mode.

If one follows the sense of light verse as vers de société, one might consider Matthew Prior's Poems on Several Occasions (1709) the first light verse collection in Eng., but Thomas D'Urfey's Pills to Purge Melancholy (1719) has a valid claim if one follows the sense of light verse as verse that is light-hearted. The first serious attempt to define the term came when Frederick Locker-Lampson compiled the anthol. Lyra elegantiarum (1867). As the title implies, Locker-Lampson preferred verse distinguished by its wit and polish and intended to amuse polite society. A series of anthologists has broadened the term to include poetry that is homely or comic. In The Oxford Book of Light Verse (1938), W. H. Auden held that light verse meant any poetry that is "simple, clear, and gay." He included performed poems, nonsense verse, and poetry of ordinary life; light verse was no longer aristocratic. While Auden was influential, however, not everyone followed his lead. In 1941, Michael Roberts explicitly distinguished between comic verse and "light verse or vers de société." In 1958, Richard Armour defined light verse as "poetry written in the spirit of play," then added that light verse "can safely be limited to what is called vers de société: humorous or witty verse that comments critically on contemp. life. It is usually to some degree funny" (14). Such anthologists as G. Grigson and W. Harmon have extended the definition of light verse even further to include bad poetry, *epitaphs, or Cole Porter's lyrics. Matters have been further complicated by Kingsley Amis who, in the New Oxford Book of English Light Verse (1978), argued that the best light verse is necessarily conservative; in this, he followed a view set forth by D. Macdonald in his 1960 parody anthol.

One result of this widening and blurring of meaning is that the term is sometimes used pejoratively to mean trivial or unimportant poetry. Because some critics now include the magnificently dreadful verse of writers such as William McGonigal or Julia Moore, the term is also sometimes used as a condemnation. Yet no one would dismiss Chaucer's tales, Ben Jonson's epigrams, Alexander Pope's Rape of the Lock, Lord Byron's Don Juan, Christina Rossetti's Goblin Market, or T. S. Eliot's cats—all of which find a place in both standard anthologies and in collections of light verse. Thus the term seems to have retained favorable connotations for sophisticated readers who know enough about what is "weighty" to recognize and enjoy what is "light." Some critics fear this audience may be diminishing. Grigson says that nonsense verse "is in danger now because it does demand an accepted idea of the nature of verse in general, a widely shared idea of the ways in which poetry works" (Nonsense Verse). In a hopeful devel., the American Academy of Arts and Letters has recognized the importance of light verse with the Michael Braude Award for Light Verse, a biennial award given for light verse in the Eng. lang., regardless of the author's nationality.

Many varieties of light verse depend on technical virtuosity, such as *limericks, *clerihews, and *double dactyls. The limerick is the oldest of these; the clerihew is the most anarchic, with its formalized irregularity; the double dactyl has attracted distinguished poets. Arguably the Japanese form of senryū also fits in this category. If one does not insist on the comic nature of light verse, then other polished fixed-term poems would be included: *ballads, double *ballade, *rondeau, *sestina, and *triolet. Finally, there is poetry distinguished by clever use of certain techniques: verse with interlocking rhymes like Edward Lear's limericks; *acrostics like Jonson's "Argument" to Volpone; verse with extensive *alliteration or *assonance. A mod. example of alliterative ingenuity is the poem by Alaric Watts that begins "An Austrian army awfully arrayed / Boldly by battery besieged Belgrade" and proceeds through the alphabet (see ABCEDARIUS). There is also *visual poetry and *concrete poetry such as Lewis Carroll's "Mouse's Tail" in Alice in Wonderland. In all such verse, the sophistication of the craft—ingenuity, skill, and polish—is apparent, the technique serving as foil to the content. The problem with defining light verse solely on technical grounds is that it then seems to include poetry not usually considered light. George Herbert's "Easter Wings" is shaped as craftily as Carroll's "Mouse's Tail," while G. M. Hopkins's "Spring and Fall: To a Young Child" plays with words in much the same punning way as many limericks do. But neither is light verse.

If one turns from technique to content, however, other problems arise. Auden focuses on content in his three categories of light verse: "poetry written for performance, to be spoken or sung before an audience"; "poetry intended to be read, but having for its subject-matter the everyday social life of its period or the experiences of the poet"; "such nonsense poetry as, through its properties and technique, has a general sense of appeal." His first category includes folk poetry such as riddles, folk songs, or the songs of Thomas Moore or Ira Gershwin. Yet one might object that all poetry is intended to be spoken to an audience, even if the audience is the reader speaking to self. The lyrics W. S. Gilbert wrote for Arthur Sullivan's music are hardly folk songs, although clearly light verse. Furthermore, the boundary between folksongs and popular songs or between popular songs and light opera is no longer clear, as the careers of Bob Dylan and Stephen Sondheim demonstrate. Auden's category of nonsense verse, however, is uncontroversial, for nonsense is among the oldest of light verse. As Grigson points out, "The moment literature develops, nonsense literature must be expected as both a counter-genre and an innocent game" (Nonsense Verse).

One of the few points on which most critics agree is that light verse requires the formal confines of verse form. The poet Ogden Nash illustrates this point: he regularly stretches metrical forms with his irregular line length, yet his work depends on the reader's recognizing the rules he violates. In "Very Like a Whale," e.g., his mock-attack on the lang. of poets is made more effective by the insistent rhymes nestled among the aggressively antimetrical lines. If one transmogrifies a limerick or double dactyl into prose, one destroys part of its essence. Were the content paraphrased in prose, it would be prosaic in every sense of that word, but in verse it amuses, felicitously. To argue that a crucial characteristic of light verse is that it must be in verse is pleonastic: better to argue that light verse must be playful and that a successful game requires rules that will be observed, if not necessarily followed.

■ Collections: Matthew Prior, Poems on Several Occasions (1709); Wit and Mirth, or Pills to Purge Melancholy, ed. T. D'Urfey (1719); Lyra elegantiarum, ed. F. Locker-Lampson (1867); Wit and Humour, Selected from the English Poets, ed. Leigh Hunt (1882); Speculum Amantis and Musa Proterva, both ed. A. H. Bullen (1888, 1889); A Vers de Société Anthology, ed. C. Wells (1900); Oxford Book of Light Verse, ed. W. H. Auden (1938); Faber Book of Comic Verse, ed. M. Roberts (1942); What Cheer, ed. D. McCord (1945); The Worldly Muse, ed. A.J.M. Smith (1951*); Penguin Book of Comic and Curious Verse*, ed. J. M. Cohen (1952); Silver Treasury of Light Verse, ed. O. Williams (1957); New Oxford Book of English Light Verse, ed. K. Amis (1978); Faber Book of Epigrams and Epitaphs (1978), ed. G. Grigson; Oxford Book of American Light Verse, ed. W. Harmon (1979); Faber Book of Nonsense Verse (1980) and Oxford Book of Satirical Verse (1980), both ed. G. Grigson; The Tygers of Wrath, ed. X. J. Kennedy (1981); Norton Book of Light Verse, ed. R. Baker (1986); The American Wits, ed. John Hollander (2003).

■ General: L. Untermeyer, Play in Poetry (1938); R. Armour, Writing Light Verse, 2d ed. (1958); T. Augarde, Oxford Guide to Word Games, 2d ed. (2003).

F. TEAGUE

LIMERICK. The limerick is the most popular form of comic or *light verse in Eng., often nonsensical and frequently bawdy, but this exacting verse form existed long before it got its name in the late 19th c.

The limerick form consists of five lines of *accentual verse rhyming aabba, the first, second, and fifth lines having 3 stresses, the third and fourth 2; the rhythm is effectually anapestic or amphibrachic. The first syllables of each line (and unstressed syllables elsewhere in the lines, though less frequently so) may be omitted. Although the fifth line typically provides a clinching statement or twist, in the early hist. of the form and until the late 19th c., the final line simply repeated the first. A good example of this earlier pattern is the popular nursery rhyme "Hickere, Dickere Dock" (1744), a poem that shares the limerick's structure but not its traditionally bawdy subject matter.

The earliest examples of the use of this short verse form date back to the 13th c.; however, the limerick form is associated in the popular imagination with Edward Lear (A Book of Nonsense, 1846). J. H. Murray, writing in 1898, deemed it an error to term Lear's nonsense verse "limericks," as his use of the form did not conform to the strict pattern outlined above, and indeed the term was not used by Lear himself to describe his own verse. Undoubtedly, however, the success of Lear's variations on this form led to its widespread and enduring popularity, and it was even adopted by such authors as Alfred, Lord Tennyson, A. C. Swinburne, Rudyard Kipling, R. L. Stevenson, and W. S. Gilbert, until, by the beginning of the 20th c., it had become a fashion. The tendency in the mod. limerick of using the final line for surprise or witty reversal in place of a repeated last line has now become the norm.

The most common theory regarding the origin of the name is the form's adoption as a parlor game in which party-goers were invited to extemporize a song that ended with the line "Will you come up to Limerick?" Other theories range from the belief that it was an old Fr. form brought to the Ir. town of Limerick in 1700 by returning veterans of the Fr. war to the idea that it originated in the *nursery rhymes published as Mother Goose's Melodies (1791).

See CLERIHEW, NONSENSE VERSE, POULTER'S MEASURE.

■ J. H. Murray, Notes and Queries (1898); L. Reed, The Complete Limerick Book (1925); Oxford Book of Nursery Rhymes, ed. I. and P. Opie (1951); A. Liede, Dichtung als Spiel, vol. 2 (1963); G. Legman, The Limerick (1964, 1988); W. S. Baring-Gould, The Lure of the Limerick (1972); The Limerick: 1700 Examples (1970, 1974), The New Limerick (1977), both ed. G. Legman; C. Bibby, The Art of the Limerick (1978); G. N. Belknap, "History of the Limerick," The Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America 75 (1981); Penguin Book of Limericks, ed. E. O. Parrott (1984).

T.V.F. BROGAN; A. PREMINGER; I. D. COPESTAKE

LINE (Sanskrit, pāda; Gr., stichos*, Lat. versus "verse"). The line is fundamental to poetry itself, for the line differentiates verse from prose: throughout most of recorded history, poetry has been cast in verse, and verse is set in lines (see VERSE AND PROSE). That is, verse is cast in sentences and lines, prose in sentences and paragraphs. The sense in prose flows continuously, while in verse it is segmented to increase the density of information and the awareness of structure. It is impossible that there could be verse not set in lines. It is possible there could be poetry not set in lines, if one defines poetry as verbal composition marked by a comparatively high degree of memorability, beauty, sublimity, delightfulness, instructiveness, figurativeness, ellipticality, intensity, uncanniness, linguistic patterning, or some combination of these or other qualities. Hybrid forms such as rhythmical prose (see PROSE RHYTHM) and the *prose poem demonstrate the poetic possibilities of prose, as do many moments in short stories, novels, essays, and longer nonfictional forms throughout the world. But we must assume that the preponderance of the world's poetry has been cast in lines, whether they read from left to right (e.g., Eng., Fr., Ger.), right to left (e.g., Heb. and Ar.), or top to bottom (e.g., cl. Chinese), precisely to take advantage of those resources which verse has to offer (see PROSODY). In English, usage of "line" (etymologically descended from Lat., līnum "flax") to signify the "portion of a metrical composition which is usually written in one line: a verse" (OED) dates from the second half of the 16th c. and reflects the growth of print culture (see below).

A. Structure. Readers and auditors of poetry perceive the line as a rhythmical unit and a unit of structure. As a unit of *measure, it is linked to its neighbors to form higher-level structures, and as a structure itself, it is built of lower-level units. In metrical verse the line is usually segmented into elements—*hemistichs, measures or metra (see METRON), or feet (see FOOT)—but it is the line which generates these intralinear units and not vice versa. Lines are not made simply by defining some unit of measure such as a foot and then stringing units together, because the units are susceptible of differential constraint at differing points in the line. The line, that is, has a shape or contour, and a structure as a whole, over and above the sum of its constituent elements. In various verse systems these elements are bound together in differing ways, such as structural alliteration in OE. It is true that, in the handbooks, meters are usually specified by the type of foot and number of feet per line—i.e. *monometer (a line of 1 foot), *dimeter (2 feet), *trimeter (3 feet), *tetrameter (4 feet), *pentameter (5 feet), *hexameter (6 feet), *heptameter (7 feet). But these simplistic descriptors do not capture the internal dynamics of a line, such as the Gr. hexameter.

How do readers and auditors recognize the line as a rhythmical unit? In *isometric verse, meter measures out a constant spacing, either of a certain number of events or a certain span of time (depending on one's theory of meter) which the mind's internal counter tracks in cognition; meter also provides predictable internal structure. The line can also be bound together by syntactic and rhetorical structures such as *parallelism and *antithesis which have their own internal logic of completion; these structures may or may not be threaded into meter: in biblical Heb. verse they are, in Whitman they are not.

B. Line End. Probably the most common strategy is to mark the end of the line, since without some sort of signal, we would not know where one line ended and a second one began. Traditionally the signal has been thought to be a *"pause," though not a metrical (line-internal) one but rather some kind of rhetorical or performative one. But this claim derives not from prosody (verse theory), or from claims about the nature or ontological status of poetry as *sound, but rather from assumptions put in play about *performance, about the reading aloud of verse. On this account, performers of poetry recognize the line as a unit (by seeing it as such when read from the page, for example) and mark its end in delivery with a linguistic pause or paralinguistic cue such as elongation of the final syllable. Auditors hear these cues, which cross or ignore syntax, as boundary markers.

An alternative conception of the signal, which depends rather on assumptions about the visual formatting of poetry on a page, is the stretch of empty space beyond the line, a stretch usually not aligned with the empty stretches beyond other lines, producing an appearance of jagged margining. This signal is perceived in reading and may be taken not only as a terminal marker but even as a part of structure (see below).

But both these answers specify phenomena after the line ends. A more powerful conception of the signal, not committed to any doctrine about either performance or format, would be, "some kind of marker," not after the final syllable of the line but in the final syllables of the line. In Gr. and Lat. poetry, where the meter is quantitative, auditors could recognize the ends of lines because they were marked by an alteration in the meter, either an increase in the formality in its closing syllables, a cadence*, or unexpected shortening at line end, catalexis.* In the hexameter, for example, the line closes on a spondee—two heavy syllables in succession—rather than a dactyl, a closural pattern which is obligatory. In post-cl. verse, line ends have been most often marked by some distinctive sound echo, chiefly *rhyme, though important also are the several other strategies of sound-repetition that are rhyme-like or exceed rhyme: *homoeoteleuton, *assonance, *identical rhyme. Short lines in particular seem to demand the support of rhyme, or else they will be mistaken for the cola that are parts of longer lines; this is a major factor in the devel. of the *lyric. Also important are strategies for end-of-line semantic emphasis: Richard Wilbur, for example, sometimes employs the strategy of putting important words at line end, words that may offer an elliptical synopsis or ironic commentary on the argument of the poem. All these strategies, taken together as devices for end-fixing, i.e. marking or weighting line ends to foreground them perceptually, constitute one of the most distinctive categories of metrical universals, conspicuous in a wide range of verse systems.

The phenomenon of extra syllables at line end is fairly extensive and a feature of several prosodies: line endings are classified depending on whether the last stress falls on the final syllable of the line (a "masculine" ending) or the penultimate one (a "feminine" one; see MASCULINE AND FEMININE). The distinction dates from at least Occitan poetry, and may date from ancient Gr. Classifying types of line endings was also one of the central "metrical tests" that several Brit. and Ger. Shakespeare scholars of the later 19th c. hoped would yield a definitive chronology of the plays. Spedding in 1847 suggested the "pause test," which tabulated frequencies of stopped vs. enjambed lines. Bathurst (1857), Craik, and Hertzberg discussed "weak endings"; Ingram (1874) distinguished types of these as "light" endings (enjambed lines ending on a pronoun, verb, or relative bearing only secondary stress, plus a slight pause) and "weak" (enjambment on a proclitic, esp. a conjunction or preposition, allowing no pause at all—see Brogan for citations).

C. Line and Syntax. The syllables of the line are the arena for deploying meter or rhythm; they are also the ground of syntax and sense: these two structures, line and syntax, overwrite the same space. Some verse forms regularly align line units with sense units; such lines are known as end-stopped.* The ("closed") *heroic couplet, for example, ends the first line at a major syntactic break and the second at a full stop (sentence end). But few forms do so every line. Systematic contrast or opposition of line units and sense units (line end and sentence flow) is the complex phenomenon known as enjambment.* In enjambed verse, syntax pulls the reader through line end into the next line, while the prosodic boundary suggests a pause if not a stop. In reading, the mind makes projections, in that pause, based on what has come before, about what word is most likely to appear at the beginning of the next line, expectations which a masterful poet will deliberately thwart, forcing rapid rereading: in Milton such error is the emblem of man's postlapsarian state. Certainly in modern times, at least, it has been thought that one of the chief functions of line division is to stand in tension with or counterpoint to the divisions of grammar and sense, effecting, in the reader's processing of the poem, multiple simultaneous pattern recognition. Even in enjambed verse, the word at line end, which the French call the contre-rejet (see REJET), receives some sort of momentary foregrounding or emphasis. This is not a matter of the word marking the end but of the end marking the word.

D. Aural Line and Visual Line. Since the advent of writing in Gr., ca. 750 BCE, and certainly since the advent of printing in the West, ca. 1450 CE, the line has had a visual reality in poetry, but long before that time and without interruption throughout print culture it has had an auditory one. This history gives the line—poetry itself—a fundamental duality, in the eye and ear, as both seen and heard (Hollander), a duality complicated, especially in the twentieth century and after by the ascendance of *free verse. Instances such as the ms. of the OE epic Beowulf (Cotton Vitellius A.xv), in which the alliterating four-stress metrical segments do not appear as individual lines, or a ms. of a Japanese haiku in which the seventeen-*mora form appears as a single vertical line, though usually represented by three lines in translation, raise interesting questions about the nature and integrity of lineation. But arguments about the historical or ontological precedence of the aural over the visual line miss the point: these forms are, for us now, both realities; the important question is how they affect each other—whether, for example, the break at line end demands a pause, performed or imagined. Two phenomena complicating discussion of the line as a visible entity are the *split line and the typographic runover. Both these phenomena force a distinction between the line as a concrete unit of printing and the line as an abstract unit of composition, which may not correspond to a single printed unit. In most modern printings of a Shakespeare play, for example, the two parts of a single iambic pentameter line split between two speakers appear on different lines on the page, the second indented to begin after the end of the one set above it. Meanwhile, in the first section of Allen Ginsberg's Howl, an abstract "line," which begins with the repeated, left-justified pronoun "who," may run over to many lines of print, making it unlikely that that line could ever be contained by a single line of print, even in a very large book. With the advent of *electronic poetry new possibilities arise for representing lines visually, and one can image even Ginsberg's longest line running horizontally unbroken across a screen, but the defiance of his gesture, setting two notions of "line" against one another, would be lost.

E. Line Forms. Up to the advent of free verse, line forms and line lengths are mainly determined by genre specification, so that poets who wish to write, say, in *elegiac distichs (hexameter plus pentameter), know or learn, by reading their predecessors, what forms have already been tried, for what kinds of subjects, with what kinds of tone, and with what success. In metrical verse, that is, line forms were mainly determined by history and convention, by the interplay of tradition and the individual talent; and the prosody which generated them was aurally based. Free verse, by contrast, foregrounded visual space and posited the line within a two-dimensional matrix where blanks, white spaces, drops, gaps, and other dislocations became possible. This is not to say that free verse abandoned aurality, for some poets, such as the Beats, Charles Olson with his "projective verse," and the proponents of *sound poetry and "text-sound," continued to speak programmatically of the line as based on the energy of the breath. It is only to say that visual prosody was made central to free verse at least in claim, and if aural prosody was at the same time not dispensed with, no poet seemed to wish or prosodist to be able, at least for the first century of free-verse practice, to give a definitive account of the relations of the one to the other.

To think, however, that the free-verse line can function solely as visual prosody, without the resources of aural prosody to aid it, is to commit what Perloff calls the "linear fallacy," making some free verse indistinguishable from prose chopped up into lines. The sonic and rhythmic devices of aural prosody offer poetry effects not available to prose: and if these are to be discarded, visual prosody must provide others, or else the distinction between prose and verse collapses. One might respond that several Eng. poets—Ben Jonson and Alexander Pope, to name but two—wrote out drafts of their poems first in prose before versifying them; and verse translators routinely work through intermediary prose versions. But this practice shows simply that they wished to clarify the argumentative or narrative structure first to get it out of the way, so as to concentrate on poetic effects.

See CLASSICAL PROSODY, FREE VERSE, METER, PROSODY, STANZA, STICHOS, VERSE AND PROSE, VERSIFICATION, VISUAL POETRY.

■ C. A. Langworthy, "Verse-Sentence Patterns in English Poetry," PQ 7 (1928); J. S. Diekhoff, "Terminal Pause in Milton's Verse," SP 32 (1935); A. Oras, "Echoing Verse Endings in Paradise Lost," South Atlantic Studies for Sturgis E. Leavitt (1953); C. L. Stevenson, "The Rhythm of English Verse," JAAC 28 (1970); D. Crystal, "Intonation and Metrical Theory," TPS (1971); C. Ricks, "Wordsworth," Essays in Criticism 21 (1971); B. Stáblein, "Versus," MGG, v. 13; H. McCord, "Breaking and Entering," and D. Laferrière, "Free and Non-Free Verse," Lang&S 10 (1977); J. Lotman, The Structure of the Artistic Text, trans. G. Lenhoff and R. Vroon (1977); D. Levertov, "On the Function of the Line," Chicago Review 30 (1979), Epoch 29 (1980)—symposium; M. Perloff, "The Linear Fallacy," Georgia Review 35 (1981), response in 36 (1982); Brogan; J. C. Stalker, "Reader Expectations and the Poetic Line," Lang&S 15 (1982); P. P. Byers, "The Auditory Reality of the Verse Line," Style 17 (1983); R. Bradford, "'Verse Only to the Eye'?: Line Endings in Paradise Lost," EIC 33 (1983); S. A. Keenan, "Effects of Chunking and Line Length on Reading Efficiency," Visual Language 18 (1984); The Line in Postmodern Poetry, ed. R. Frank and H. Sayre (1988); R. Pinsky, The Sounds of Poetry (1998); J. Longenbach, The Art of the Poetic Line (2008); E. B. Voigt, The Art of Syntax (2009); A Broken Thing: Poets on the Line, ed. E. Rosko and A. Vander Zee (2011).

T.V.F. BROGAN; S. CUSHMAN

LINGUISTICS AND POETICS. The denotations of both linguistics and poetics are complex and contested, so their relationship depends on how each is understood. Ling. is the study of human lang.; but language may refer to (1) the system, incl. phonology, morphology, syntax, and semantics, that defines ling. forms, i.e., grammar; (2) the established form-meaning pairings in that system, i.e., the lexicon; or (3) ling. behavior, i.e., the use of the grammar and lexicon to compose utterances for particular purposes. What poetics may refer to is often elaborated and debated, but for relating ling. to poetics, there is perhaps no better starting point than Aristotle's classification of the arts—for him, all forms of *imitation—according to their media, objects, and means of imitation. The art that poetics studies, presumably "poetry," is thus, in a definition that would be useful to reclaim for contemp. use, "the art that uses words only—either in prose or verse" (Poetics). If in this definition "words" is taken to mean more broadly language, then the relationship of ling. to poetics is that of the study of lang. to the study of art that is made from it.

Exploration of this relationship is implied already in Aristotle's mention in his Poetics of components of grammar and, conversely, in Dionysius Thrax's mention in his Art of Grammar of the poetic topic of metrics. It undergirds much of the work of historical ling. reconstruction that helped define ling. as a field in its own right in the 19th c., because poetic texts provided evidence for earlier forms of langs. But in the Eur. trad. at least, it was explicitly theorized only in the 20th c., most influentially in the work of Roman Jakobson.

Jakobson cast poetics explicitly as a subfield of ling., identifying what he called "the poetic function" (see POETIC FUNCTION) as one of several functions of lang., incl. its "emotive function" of expressing the state of the speaker, its "conative function" of making the addressee do things, and, perhaps most familiarly, its "referential" or communicative function of conveying information (1960). He defined this poetic function as "a focus on the message for its own sake," meaning a focus on its lang. as opposed to its source, audience, or context, etc. In this spirit, many fields of poetic inquiry have explored how lang. shapes the functions it performs, such as *speech act theory (Pratt), *stylistics (Fowler, Verdonk), and cognitive ling. and poetics (Lakoff and Turner, Tsur). But it is perhaps those fields that have engaged most directly with grammar, a dimension of lang. it does not share with other representational systems, that show best how fruitful this conception of poetics as ling. can be and also how, as Kiparsky (1987) argues, its exploration has sometimes been hampered by inadequacies in Jakobson's own structuralist assumptions about lang. and communication.

Jakobson defined the manifestation of the poetic function, its "empirical linguistic criterion," in one of the most famous sentences in literary theory: "The poetic function projects the principle of equivalence from the axis of selection into the axis of combination" (1960; italics in original). "Selection" and "combination" refer to ling. behavior, as Jakobson (1960) makes clear in his description of how ordinary utterances are constituted:

> If "child" is the topic of the message, the speaker selects one among the extant, more or less similar, nouns like child, kid, youngster, tot, all of them equivalent in a certain respect, and then, to comment on this topic, he may select one of the semantically cognate verbs—sleeps, dozes, nods, naps. Both chosen words combine in the speech chain. The selection is produced on the base of equivalence, similarity and dissimilarity, synonymity and antonymity, while the combination, the build up of the sequence, is based on contiguity.

Here, the term *"equivalence," however, like the "contiguity" it displaces, refers to the ling. system itself. How Jakobson's vision of the poetic function has been and can be understood as a substantive descriptive and theoretical claim, therefore, depends on its interpretation.

For Jakobson, the structuralist assumptions manifest in the passage—that a lang. consists of a set of elements defined through relationships of mutual similarity and difference and combined sequentially to produce speech—were implemented through the formalism of distinctive features being developed by the Prague Linguistic Circle of which Jakobson was a part. That *formalism simultaneously grounds lang. in its typical functional contexts, such as the physical mechanisms and the social setting of speech, and abstracts away from these contexts to create a formal system.

In Eng. phonology, e.g., the initial consonants of to, do, new, Sue, zoo, shoe, chew, Jew, loo ([t, d, n, s, z, ʃ,ʧ, ʤ, l] respectively) are all similar to one another in being made with the tongue against the roof (crown) of the mouth ([+coronal]). (Here square brackets enclose representations of speech sounds in the International Phonetic Alphabet and also their formal features.) At the same time, they are different from one another in other ways—crucially different, because those differences can create meaning differences (Saussure). In [t, d, n] but not the others, where the tongue meets the roof of the mouth the passage of breath is briefly stopped entirely ([+ stop]); in [n] but not [t, d] or any of the other coronals, passage of breath is allowed through the nose instead ([+nasal]); and in [t] as well as [s, ʃ, ʧ] vibration in the vocal cords is lacking, while [d] and the other coronals maintain it ([+voice]).

In the same way, in morphology, the Eng. personal pronouns we and they, e.g., are similar to one another in being [+plural]. But they are also different from each other in that we, like you and I and unlike they, he, she, or it, refers to participants in the speech event itself ([+participant]), as opposed to the event(s) the speech represents. And among the pronouns referring to participants, we is like I and unlike you in that it expresses the subjective point of view of the speaker ([+speaker]).

These features define the kinds of equivalences that, in Jakobson's description, define the sets of possibilities from which selections are made to produce combinations, which are themselves "based on contiguity." Within a simple (unaffixed) Eng. syllable (and subject to other constraints on syllable structure), e.g., they are the only consonants that can follow an [n]: Eng. has lent, land, lance, lens, lunch, flange; but not *la[np], *la[nb], *la[nf], *la[nv], *la[nk], *la[ng], etc. Thus, with respect to this sequencing, all [+coronal] segments are equivalent. Similarly, since person and number features are also registered on Eng. verbs in the present tense ([-past]), Jakobson's sleeps, dozes, nods, naps are equivalent to each other in bearing the features [-speaker, -participant, -plural] and available for selection to follow a noun sharing these features like child. In syntax, many equivalences are defined directly in terms of the contiguity relationships they enter into: sleeps, dozes, nods, naps are all verbs partly insofar as they follow nouns but not, say, determiners (the child sleeps, but not the sleeps*).

To return to the poetic function, then, and Jakobson's own example of selection and combination, if a speaker selects the particular combination the child nods, the poetic function may be subtly manifest in, e.g., the sequence of [d]s and more broadly of [+coronal]s; if he chooses instead the tot nods, it will be manifest in the sequences of [t]s and of the [+coronal +stop]s [t, n, d], and also of [a]s; and if he elaborates his utterance further to make the tot nods and naps, the poetic function becomes still more salient, manifest in all of the above, plus the sequence of [n]s, the extended sequence of vowels that are [+low] (the feature [a] shares with the [æ] of naps), and the sequence of verbs, themselves a sequence of [-speaker, -participant, -plural] forms. In this way, the sequencing of equivalents that manifests the poetic function calls attention to the resources the lang. makes available for the composition of an utterance and to their particular arrangement in that utterance.

These examples, of course, illustrate the poetic forms of *assonance, *consonance, and syntactic *parallelism; and in Jakobson's formulation, all traditional verse forms, which, following G. M. Hopkins, he terms "figures of language," imply the poetic function (1960). The very first line of Shakespeare's sonnet 12, e.g., introduces *alliteration (of count with clock and tells with time), *rhyme (of time with prime), *meter, and syntactic parallelism (of the adverbial clauses beginning with when), all of which can be understood as sequences of ling. equivalents calling attention to the lang. of the poem:

> When I do count the clock that tells the time,
> And see the brave day sunk in hideous night;
> When I behold the violet past prime,

> And sable curls [all] silver'd o'er with white;
> When lofty trees I see barren of leaves,
> Which erst from heat did canopy the herd,
> And summer's green all girded up in sheaves
> Borne on the bier with white and bristly beard:

What is esp. innovative about Jakobson's perspective on such forms, however, is the recognition that they involve not substantive identities but grammatical equivalences. Not only do the initial [t]s of tells and time alliterate with each other in spite of any differences in their pronunciations in their different contexts because they are [+coronal, +stop, –voice, –nasal], but, more subtly, they alliterate also with the initial [k]s of count and clock because those too are [+stop, –voice]. Equivalences like the latter are codified in some trads.—in Ir. the [+stop, –voice] consonants [p, t, k] count as equivalent in rhyme, e.g., (Malone)—but Jakobson's formulation interprets such equivalences as consequences not only of poetic convention but more deeply of grammatical structure. It is, thus, an invitation to explore poetic structure and ling. structure in parallel as mutually illuminating in all langs.

Beyond the ling. substance of this invitation, there are several profound poetic insights ensconced in Jakobson's formulation and the prodigious cross-linguistic study of ling. and poetics on which it is based. It decouples the question of what is poetic from the more culturally vexed question of what is poetry. The poetic function as Jakobson defines it appears not only in such canonized works as Shakespeare's sonnets but in many kinds of writing and speaking. It appears in well-crafted prose: in an April 10, 2007, New York Times article headlined "Science seeks Rx for lagging female libido," Natalie Angier describes how "the age-old search continues for a simple chemical fix, Cupid encapsulated, a thrill in a pill." It appears in political slogans: Jakobson observed it in "I like Ike" (1960), and half a century later the 2008 U.S. presidential primary saw signs proclaiming "Hispanics for Hillary" and "Obama 08." It appears in conversation: Tannen documents how interlocutors repeat the form of each others' utterances. One can even repeat the form of one's own, calling daily "Where's my kitty?" then (finding him) "How's my kitty?" and finally (picking him up) "Who's my kitty?" In all these examples, the poetic function is present but dominated by others, such as the referential, conative, emotive, or even phatic; in poetry, conversely, these other functions may likewise be present, but the poetic function is dominant (Jakobson 1960).

At the same time, Jakobson's formulation defines the poetic function as an explicitly aesthetic mechanism. Prior to his displacement to Prague, Jakobson had been a founding member of the Moscow Linguistic Circle, notable not only for its close collaboration of linguists and poets but for its engagement with new ideas about art more generally. The definition of the poetic function can be understood as a statement for the particular case of lang. of Viktor Shklovsky's influential idea that "the technique of art is to make objects 'unfamiliar,' to make forms difficult, to increase the difficulty and length of perception" (see DEFAMILIARIZATION). Sequences of ling. equivalents quite literally prolong attention to the lang. and invite difficult questions about it. And although Shklovsky's further claim that, in art, "the object is not important" may be far from Aristotle's concern for what makes an object suitable to be imitated in poetry, Aristotle's assumption that imitation is fundamental to art remains: Jakobson's formulation extends it from the object to the medium, since it is through imitation of itself (in the sequencing of equivalents) that lang. becomes poetic.

Jakobson's formulation also provides an empirical basis for inquiry into poetic universals and comparative poetics. One of the most exciting projects of the Prague Linguistic Circle was the search for ling. universals. In an important precursor to Noam Chomsky's influential hypothesis that the grammars of all langs. share their basic form because their possibilities are determined by an innate "language faculty" (1972), Jakobson and his colleagues explored commonalities across all langs., such as patterns of "markedness" whereby an unmarked characteristic may occur on its own but a marked one occurs only in conjunction with its unmarked counterpart. E.g., a lang. may or may not have other nasals in addition to the coronal [n], as Eng. has [m] and the final [ŋ] of rang; but no lang. seems to have others without [n]. A lang. may or may not have a special pronoun referring to the speaker and addressee together as Weri has tepir, "I and you," but no lang. seems to have such a pronoun without having one that can refer to the speaker and someone who is not the addressee; Weri also has tenip, "I and one other person who is not you," and Eng. allows we to mean that (Kiparsky and Tonhauser 2011). On this view, the equivalences whose sequencing manifests the poetic function are ling. givens not only of the particular lang. of a poetic composition but potentially of all langs.; and the otherwise surprising fact that, across unrelated and mutually unknown langs., the same figures of lang. are found in poetry—alliteration, rhyme, meter, and syntactic parallelism—begins to find an explanation. Theoretical claims about the poetic forms favored by a given lang. then also become possible: Jakobson held, e.g., that only features that are distinctive in a lang. can define the equivalences of its verse, a position with profound implications for historical devel. of verse forms across both time and place.

Finally, Jakobson's 1960 formulation relates the formal manifestation of the poetic function to the prevalence in poetry of *metaphor:

> [E]quivalence in sound, projected into the sequence as its constitutive principle, inevitably involves semantic equivalence, and on any ling. level any constitutent of such a sequence prompts one of the two correlative experiences which Hopkins neatly defines as "comparison for likeness' sake" and "comparison for unlikeness' sake."

E.g., the formal equivalence in both meter and syntax of Shakespeare's lines from sonnet 12 quoted above invites the inference that these are all somehow instances of the same thing, such as experiences of noticing the passing of time. At the same time, complete equivalence of meaning is always impossible, and the differences matter too; comparisons between human-made measures of time and natural ones or between life spans briefer than a human's and longer, sharpen perception of what each phrase refers to individually, as well as what the phrases do collectively. Even the alliteration beginning with count and clock, while perhaps not inviting comparisons between those particular words, does invite comparison between the abundance of the form in the *octave and its attenuation in the *sestet, until, after the nadir of line 13 in the same sonnet, robust alliteration reappears in line 14 with breed and brave, and so with the offspring who restores at least partly the losses that time brings:

> Then of thy beauty do I question make
> That thou among the wastes of time must go,
> Since sweets and beauties do themselves forsake,
> And die as fast as they see others grow,
> And nothing 'gainst Time's scythe can make defense
> Save breed, to brave him when he takes thee hence.

The alliteration thus offers its own version of the sonnet's narrative; and the metaphor in that is the ultimate one of poetry, the assumption that there is similarity or even grounds for comparison between lang. and what it represents—i.e., the assumption that lang. can ever imitate the world.

Yet for all the insights entailed by Jakobson's conception of the relationship of ling. to poetics, even this brief example of thoughts it might invite about an actual poem points to obstacles to seeing it as a theoretical position at all. At a sufficient level of generality and with a little freedom in what counts as a sequence, ling. equivalents can be found almost anywhere and produced to support almost any interpretation imaginable. This objection has been influentially articulated by, e.g., Stanley Fish with reference to some of the exuberantly linguistically informed crit. that followed Jakobson under the rubric of stylistics (Freeman 1970, 1981); and partly because of it, literary theorists since Jakobson have mostly turned their attention elsewhere. The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism (2001), e.g., even allowing for its explicit intention to go "beyond the earlier New Critical research into the 'literariness' of literature" (see NEW CRITICISM), counts only 11 of its 140 authors as addressing "language," of whom only four postdate Jakobson and none engages seriously with grammar.

In one sense, this silence is simply the fulfillment of Jakobson's claim that poetics is a subfield of ling.: it is largely in that field that the exploration he invited has been fruitfully pursued. That does not explain, however, why the results of such exploration have been disproportionately neglected, at least in Eng.-lang. literary studies, where exploration of poetry has continued apace. Kiparsky's (1987) analysis of the intellectual dimensions of this bifurcation acknowledges the theoretical obstacles but argues that they depend on particular assumptions in Jakobson's formulation that have been superseded.

Perhaps most fundamentally, Jakobson codified the relation of ling. to poetics just ahead of major devels. in how grammar is understood. Chomsky's (1965) generative conception of grammar as knowledge of the structure of possible utterances in a lang., in contradistinction to impossible ones, set a new standard for explicitness in grammatical description. That explicitness has maintained many of Jakobson's insights, incl. a crucial role for distinctive features (Chomsky and Halle, Goldsmith), but has also shown equivalence and contiguity relations among the entities they define to be only part of a much more complex grammar, hypothesized also to include structures that are "deep" as well as "surface," hierarchical as well as linear, and imposed by the mind as well as embodied in the particular elements of a given lang.'s systems of similarity and difference (Pinker). The entities, operations, and principles of grammar, understood by historical linguists since the 19th c. to be natural forms rather than human inventions (Foucault), are in the process of being discovered. Kiparsky (1987), therefore, decouples Jakobson's description of the "empirical linguistic criterion" of the poetic function from his particular conception of grammar, retaining the assumption of the centrality to poetic form of *repetition over the equivalence classes of grammar, while leaving more open to continuing inquiry the question of what grammar and its equivalences look like.

For verse, where these repetitions are patterned in ways that can themselves be formalized—where they are traditionally called "structural" or "obligatory" as opposed to "ornamental" or "optional"—it is possible to ask what, exactly, is being repeated and whether it can be formalized in ling. terms in the predicted way (Kiparsky 1973). In Shakespeare's sonnet 12, e.g., if the end rhymes are obligatory, forming a scheme ababcdcdefefgg, then beard in line 8 supplies some structure equivalent to one in herd in the same way that time provides one equivalent to prime.

This raises not only the descriptive question of what equivalence in the vowel system is allowing beard to rhyme with herd in a way that board would not but the theoretical one of why the final vowel and the consonants following it are the locus of a required equivalence in the first place. Is it because together they form a structure that plays a role in grammar and so are attended to as a unit in a way that other sequences would not be? These are questions that may be answered through exploration of more rhymes, suitably delimited by *work, *poet, *genre, and *tradition so as to support the inference of the formalization itself (Fabb 2002), together with exploration of relevant grammatical phenomena.

And discoveries have been made along these lines. E.g., drawing on a study of the rhymes of rock songs in Eng., Zwicky showed not only how shared features may suffice to define equivalents, such as [+nasal] in the rhymes of roam, grown, and bone in Bob Dylan's

"The Times They Are a-Changin'," but how certain segments in certain positions in syllables may be systematically irrelevant to rhyme, such as the final [d] in the rhymes of call, hall, and stalled in the same song. Such practices, once properly attended to, turn out not only to be common to canonical poets and similar to practices in other trads. but to be explicable in the patterning of features and organization of syllables in grammar and, as suggested by Kiparsky, parallel to what is found in the grammatical phenomenon of reduplication (Holtman). Similarly, exploration of alliteration has revealed subtle practices intricately related to phonological structure, not only in the early Eng. trad. but in many other langs., and again parallel to grammatical operations.

Perhaps of all verse forms, meter has been subject to the most thoroughgoing reconceptualization, as efforts to formalize it in terms of repetitions over equivalence classes have profited from discoveries about the grammar of *rhythm. Developing Jakobson's insight that "verse design determines the invariant features of the verse instances and sets up the limits of variation" (1960), Halle and Keyser (1966, 1971) suggested that a description of meter, like a description of a lang., should make explicit the poet's knowledge, conscious or not, of the form of possible as opposed to impossible lines in the meter. How, exactly, can lines like 2 and 3 of Shakespeare's sonnet 12, with their different patterns of both syllable count and stress, be understood as repetitions of a common structure that other imaginable but unmetrical arrangements of these elements would not share? As understanding of rhythm in phonology has advanced, with explicit theories positing how it is structured cross-linguistically in ordinary lang. (Liberman and Prince, Hayes 1995), various answers have been broached not only for the Eng. *iambic *pentameter (Kiparsky 1975, 1977; Hayes 1989) but for meters of, e.g., OE, Fr., It., Sp., Rus., Gr., Ar., Sanskrit, and Finnish. Fabb and Halle suggest a unified account of many of these meters; and the theory advanced in Hanson and Kiparsky with the addendum in Hanson (2009) proposes explicitly that all traditionally recognized metrical principles of syllable count (see SYLLABIC VERSE), stress placement (see ACCENT), *caesura and *enjambment, and *catalexis and extrametricality (feminine endings) can be modeled as parallels to phenomena in the grammar of rhythm.

Of all verse forms, perhaps the least systematically explored along these lines in the Anglo-Am. scholarly trad. has been syntactic parallelism, perhaps because it has never been obligatory in the Eng. poetic trad. But it is obligatory in some forms in many other langs., from the Heb. that Robert Lowth noted in De sacra poesi Hebraeorum (Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, pub. in Lat. 1753, trans. 1787) and the Rus. that Jakobson (1966) himself discussed to Chinese, Finnish, and many native langs. of the Americas; and devels. in syntactic theory since Jakobson's time have offered new ways to formalize it. (See CHINA, POETRY OF; FINLAND, POETRY OF; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; HEBREW PROSODY AND POETICS.) Certainly, syntactic parallelism plays a role in grammar itself: some constructions such as coordination mandate syntactic repetition, and the fact that all sentences and phrases have identical syntactic structures at some level of analysis is the basis of syntax.

If verse forms consist of repetitions of equivalences that figure in lang., then they involve imitation of lang. not only because each instance of repetition imitates another but also because all imitate their source forms in lang. This raises the question of whether repetition is necessary for the poetic function or whether what is necessary is simply imitation of lang. Nonsense literature, e.g., seems to imitate morphology not necessarily through repetition but through letting morphology run amok, creating not so much new words as imitations of old words that have lost their moorings to meaning: "The Moon was shining slobaciously from the star-bespringled sky" (Edward Lear, "The Story of the Four Little Children Who Went Round the World"; see also NONSENSE VERSE).

Similarly, the "free indirect style" found in the novel does not involve repetition but imitates fundamental aspects of lang. Expression of one point of view is demonstrably a grammatical property of any sentence (Benveniste): not only person and tense features such as [+speaker] but deictic modifiers (e.g., this, that; now, then; here, there—see DEIXIS) and other words and syntactic constructions that are inherently subjective must be interpreted from a single point of view established in the main clause (Kuroda, Banfield). Normally, the point of view is that of the speaker, so that an indirect report of another's speech or thought requires any first-person present tense in the original utterance to be shifted into third-person, past tense. In the "free indirect style," however, the third person and past tense of an indirect report are used without any subordinating reportive clause; and the point of view of the sentence not only can but in some cases must be taken to be that of the third-person subject: "The snail had now considered every possible method of reaching his goal without going round the dead leaf or climbing over it" (Virginia Woolf, "Kew Gardens"). As a speakerless imitation of speech and thought (Banfield), the style is certainly poetic in Jakobson's sense; as he notes with regard to fictitious speakers and addressees of poetry, "virtually any poetic message is a quasi-quoted discourse with all those peculiar, intricate problems which 'speech within speech' offers to the linguist" (1960). The novel is not distinct from poetry as Aristotle defined it, but rather one form of it; and it is to be expected that the poetic function should be somehow manifest in its characteristic lang.

A capacious view of poetics that encompasses the novel within its purview and shares important aspects of its genealogy with ling. and Rus. formalist aesthetics (see RUSSIAN FORMALISM) has also been advanced within the trad. of Fr. *structuralism (Todorov, Barthes), inspired by Propp's exploration of fairy tales to formalize narrative content in grammatical terms.

This line of inquiry's engagement with ling., however, has often been more metaphorical than substantive, seeming to contribute less to understanding literature "in its specificity" (Todorov, Eichenbaum) than to understanding elements it shares with other arts, since narrative can be represented in media other than lang.

Jakobson himself was far from uninterested in such elements of poetry. However, his conception of the poetic function of lang. distinguished it from the referential one; and alongside the devels. in theories of lang. mentioned above, devels. in theories of communication have shown that the distinction is crucial. As Kiparsky (1987) observes, under Jakobson's structuralist assumptions, meaning is treated as deriving from the same basic principles of equivalence and contiguity, similarity and difference assumed to govern ling. form, so that it may be encoded through selection and combination within the system, as can be seen in Jakobson's account of the composition of a ling. message quoted above. But for meaning, as for form, those principles have turned out to be only a small part of the picture: not only is ling. semantics itself no more reducible to them than is any other component of grammar; as Sperber and Wilson show, building on ideas of Grice, in ling. communication semantics itself contributes only one piece of information to a process of *interpretation. Far from being the decoding that a long trad. from Saussure to Jakobson himself assumed, that process is inferential, open-ended, and not specific to lang. at all.

Sperber and Wilson show, in fact, that literal representation of a thought in lang. is almost never the most efficient way to communicate it, and even the most ordinary utterances are designed to provoke a creative interpretive process. Most strikingly, the interpretive demands made by the figurative lang. esp. associated with poetry, incl. the metaphors discussed by Aristotle in his Poetics, *irony, and many other aspects of style, incl. repetition itself, are not fundamentally different from those made by ordinary lang. In neither case is meeting those interpretive demands a matter of ling. alone—a conclusion entirely consonant with the complexity of lang. that Jakobson sought to convey through his delimitation of poetics as ling.

See POETICS.

■ F. de Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale (1916); R. Jakobson, Selected Writings of Roman Jakobson, 8 v., ed. S. Rudy (1962–81)—esp. "Morphological Observations on Slavic Declension" (1959); "Linguistics and Poetics" (1960); "On the So-called Vowel Alliteration in Germanic Verse" (1963); "Grammatical Parallelism and Its Russian Facet" (1966); N. Chomsky, Aspects of the Theory of Syntax (1965); B. Eichenbaum, The Theory of the "Formal Method," trans. L. T. Lemon and M. J. Reis (1965); Russian Formalist Criticism: Four Essays, ed. L. T. Lemon and M. J. Reis (1965); V. Shklovsky, Art as Technique, trans. L. Lemon and M. J. Rieis (1965); R. Barthes, "Introduction à l'analyse structurale des récits," Communications 8 (1966); É. Benveniste, Problèmes de linguistique générale (1966); M. Foucault, Les mots et les choses (1966); M. Halle and S. J. Keyser, "Chaucer and the Study of Prosody," CE 28 (1966); Chomsky and Halle; Linguistics and Literary Style, ed. D. C. Freeman (1970)—esp. P. Kiparsky, "Metrics and Morphophonemics in the Kalevala" (1968); V. Propp, Morphology of the Folktale, trans. L. Scott, 2d ed. (1968); N. Chomsky, Language and Mind (1972); M. Halle and S. J. Keyser, English Stress: Its Form, Its Growth, and Its Role in Verse (1971); T. Todorov, La Poétique de la Prose (1971); P. Kiparsky, "The Role of Linguistics in a Theory of Poetry," Daedalus 102 (1973); S.-Y. Kuroda, "Where Epistemology, Style and Grammar Meet: A Case Study of Japanese," A Festschrift for Morris Halle, ed. S. Anderson and P. Kiparsky (1973); H. P. Grice, "Logic and Conversation," Syntax and Semantics 3: Speech Acts, ed. P. Cole and J. L. Morgan (1975); P. Kiparsky, "Stress, Syntax and Meter," Language 51 (1975); A. Zwicky, "Well, This Rock and Roll Has Got to Stop. Junior's Head is Hard as a Rock," Chicago Linguistic Society 12 (1976); P. Kiparsky, "The Rhythmic Structure of English Verse," and M. Liberman and A. Prince, "On Stress and Linguistic Rhythm," LingI 8 (1977); M. L. Pratt, Toward a Speech Act Theory of Literary Discourse (1977); Fish; Essays in Modern Stylistics, ed. D. C. Freeman (1981); A. Banfield, Unspeakable Sentences: Narration and Representation in the Language of Fiction (1982); D. Sperber and D. Wilson, Relevance: Communication and Cognition (1986); P. Kiparsky, "On Theory and Interpretation," The Linguistics of Writing, ed. N. Fabb et al. (1987); J. Malone, "Muted Euphony and Consonant Matching in Irish Verse," General Linguistics 21 (1987); B. Hayes, "The Prosodic Hierarchy in Meter," Phonetics and Phonology 1: Rhythm and Meter, ed. P. Kiparsky and G. Youmans (1989); G. Lakoff and M. Turner, More Than Cool Reason: A Field Guide to Poetic Metaphor (1989); J. Goldsmith, Autosegmental and Metrical Phonology (1990); H. Lasnik, "Metrics and Morphophonemics in Early English Verse," University of Connecticut Working Papers in Linguistics 3 (1990); S. Pinker, The Language Instinct (1994); B. Hayes, Metrical Stress Theory (1995); R. Fowler, Linguistic Criticism (1996); K. Hanson and P. Kiparsky, "A Parametric Theory of Poetic Meter," Language 72 (1996); A. Holtman, A Generative Theory of Rhyme (1996); N. Fabb, Linguistics and Literature (1997); A. Pilkington, Poetic Effects: A Relevance Theory Perspective (2000); Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, ed. V. B. Leitch (2001); N. Fabb, Language and Literary Structure (2002); P. Verdonk, Stylistics (2002); K. Hanson, "Formal Variation in the Rhymes of Robert Pinsky's The Inferno of Dante," Language and Literature 12 (2003); D. Minkova, Alliteration and Sound Change in Early English (2003); K. Hanson, "Meter," "Rhyme," Encyclopedia of Language and Linguistics, ed. K. Brown, 2d ed. (2005); D. Tannen, Talking Voices: Repetition, Dialogue and Imagery in Conversational Discourse, 2d ed. (2007); N. Fabb and M. Halle, Meter in Poetry: A New Theory (2008); D. Steriade, "The Phonology of Perceptibility Effects," The Nature of the Word: Essays in Honor of Paul Kiparsky, ed. K. Hanson and S. Inkelas (2008); R. Tsur, Toward a Theory of Cognitive Poetics, 2d ed.

(2008); K. Hanson, "Metrical Alignment," Typologie des formes poétiques, ed. J.-L. Aroui (2009); P. Kiparsky and J. Tonhauser, "Semantics of Inflection," Semantics: An International Handbook of Natural Language Meaning, ed. C. Maienborn, K. von Heusinger, P. Portner (2011).

K. Hanson

LIPOGRAM (Gr. leipo, "I leave"; gram, "writing"). A text in which a given letter or set of letters is deliberately left out. In contrast to the pangram, in which every letter of the alphabet is intentionally included (e.g., the quick brown fox jumps over the lazy dog), the lipogram is a form of constrained writing explicitly based on omission (see CONSTRAINT). A pangrammatic lipogram is a text in which all but one letter is deliberately included, as in this example where the letter s is excluded: the quick brown fox jumped over the lazy dog. If the principles of the lipogram are simple, its application may lead to intricate difficulties that vary in proportion to the frequency of the letters excluded.

The earliest examples make Lasus of Hermione (6th c. BCE) the first recognized lipogrammatist; his two *odes, now lost, excluded the sigma, probably for reasons of euphonical purism. Those odes, along with another written by Lasus's student Pindar (ca. 522–443 BCE), established the lipogram as the most ancient systemic artifice in Western lit. The oldest attested lipogram, De aetatibus mundi et hominis, written by the Egyptian Lat. grammarian Fabius Planciades Fulgentius (late 5th–early 6th c.), confirms the constraint's systemic possibility: the treatise is divided into 23 chapters (14 of which remain), the first written without the letter a, the second without b, and so on. Several early lipogrammatic works apply the *constraint to revise major works (the Iliad, the Odyssey, the Bible) in a similarly progressive fashion, rewriting discrete chapters without the corresponding letter. From the 17th c. to the present, a second significant trad. emerges, mostly in It. and Ger., defined by the omission of the letter r, which is a strong constraint in Ger., as it forbids the inclusion of any masculine relative (er, der, dieser, etc.). The most ambitious of these is Franz Rittler's (1732–1837) 198-page novel Die Zwillinge (The Twins, 1813). The third trad. of the lipogram, first developed in Spain, is the vocalic trad., where only vowels are banished. A smattering of lipogrammatic novellas was published in Spain by Félix Lope de Vega (1562–1635) and Francisco Navarrete y Ribera (1537–91), and in the anonymous novel Estebanillo González (1646); the Port. poet Alonso de Alcalá y Herrera (1599–1682) published Varios effetos de amor (Various Effects of Love, 1641), consisting of five novellas, each omitting the use of one vowel.

The difficulty of vocalic lipograms varies from lang. to lang., depending on the frequency of the vowel. E.g., Georges Perec's (1936–82) 300-page novel La Disparition (A Void, 1969) is a considerable feat because it omits the most common letter in Fr., the letter e. That novel, which recounts the mysterious disappearance of a character named Anton Voyl, has been broadly praised and translated, notably into Sp. as El Secuestro (The Abduction, 1997), which omits the letter a instead, the most common letter in Sp.

Univocalic (or monovocalic) lipograms are texts that exclude all but one vowel, like Perec's Les Revenentes (The Ghosts, 1972), which uses only words spelled with e (thus exploiting a lexicon entirely distinct from that used in La Disparition). The Canadian writer Christian Bök (b. 1966) has winningly illustrated Eng. univocalism in Eunoia (2001), which consists of five chapters, each exclusively devoted to one vowel, frequently including commentary on the adopted rule: "Thinking within strict limits is stifling."

Additional forms of the lipogram include the *anagram and, in Oulipian constraints, the prisoner's constraint (where d, g, h, j, k, l, p, q, t, and y are disallowed to give the paper-deprived prisoner more space for his memoirs), threnodials (see HETEROGRAM), and the following apostrophic lipograms: the beautiful in-law (belle présente, written exclusively with the letters in an addressee's name), the beautiful outlaw (belle absente, written exclusively with the letters missing from an addressee's name), and the *epithalamium (written exclusively with the letters in the bride and bridegroom's names). In contrast to the more visible tautogram (in which all words begin with the same letter) and the *acrostic, a lipogram may, if unannounced in the work itself, slip by unnoticed.

See ARTIFICE, AVANT-GARDE POETICS, OULIPO.

■ G. Perec, "History of the Lipogram," Oulipo: A Primer of Potential Literature, ed. and trans. W. F. Motte (1986).

J.-J. Poucel

LIRA. A Sp. stanza form of four, five, six, or, rarely, more than six Italianate *hendecasyllables and heptasyllables, the term denoting loosely any short-strophe canción in Italianate verse. The name was first applied to the form aBabB (capitals denote hendecasyllabic lines) and was taken from the end of the first line of Garcilaso de la Vega's "A la flor de Gnido." Garcilaso supposedly imitated it from Bernardo Tasso, who is credited with its invention. This form is sometimes designated the lira garcilasiana and has also come to be known as estrofa de Fray Luis de León, lira de Fray Luis de León, and quintilla de Luis de León for being popularized through Fray Luis de León's works and later being replaced in popularity by other forms, particularly the lira sestina (aBaBcC, also called media estancia).

■ Navarro.

D. C. Clarke

LITHUANIA, POETRY OF. Written lit. arose in Lithuania during the Reformation and Counter-Reformation. Before that, the poetic heritage of the nation was sustained by folk songs (dainos), of which about 200,000 have now been recorded and which are best represented by lyrical love songs. The lyrical nature of poetic expression is characteristic of dainos in general, and it is strongly evident even in the war songs and *ballads, while mythological songs are rare and *epic narratives are altogether lacking. The most typical of the dainos exhibit numerous diminutives and employ highly developed *parallelism and a rather intricate, sometimes erotic, symbolism. Because the text and melody are integrally connected in the dainos, *rhythm is of great importance; as a result of the free stress in Lithuanian, it is variable and often mixed. Rhyme, however, is not essential. The stanzas have mostly two, three, or four lines, either with or without a *refrain. Some older songs have no stanzas at all. The earliest collection of songs, Dainos (1825), was by Liudvikas Rėza (Rhesa, 1776–1840), the largest (4 v., 1880–83) by A. Juškevičius (1819–80); much more extensive collections have now been assembled by the Lithuanian Academy of Science. The trad. of folk poetry became a strong factor in the formation of the distinctly national character of Lithuanian poetry.

Written Lithuanian poetry begins in the 16th c. with versions of canticles and *hymns, incl. those of Martynas Mažvydas (Mosvidius, d. 1563), who also prepared, in Königsberg, the first printed Lithuanian book, Catechismusa Prasty Szadei (The Plain Words of the Catechism, 1547), a trad. of the Lutheran catechism, and prefaced it with a rhymed foreword. The most outstanding 18th c. work was Kristijonas Donelaitis's (Donalitius, 1714–80) poem Metai (The Seasons, 1765–75, pub. 1818), a 3,000-line poem in *hexameters that exhibits in forceful lang. a keen love and observation of nature and depicts vividly the life and character of the common people. Imbued with the Pietist spirit, the poem transmits a moving sense of the sacredness of life and of the earth.

A more active literary movement appeared at the beginning of the 19th c., marked first by pseudoclassicism and sentimentalism and later by *romanticism and a growing interest in Lithuanian folklore. The latter trend was particularly evident in the poetry of Antanas Strazdas (1760–1833), who was one of the first to merge the folk song trad. with personal expression. The next peak in the devel. of Lithuanian poetry was Antanas Baranauskas (1835–1902), whose picturesque poem Anykščių šilelis (The Grove of Anyksciai, 1858–59) is a veiled lament for Lithuania under the tsarist Rus. regime. Baranauskas was esp. successful in creating a melodious flow of lang. using a traditional syllabic versification that is not very well suited to Lithuanian. The pre-20th c. devel. of Lithuanian poetry was concluded by Maironis (pseud. of Jonas Mačiulis, 1862–1932), the creative embodiment of the ideals of the national awakening and a foremost lyric poet (see his collection Pavasario balsai [Voices of Spring], 1895). His formal and structural innovations, particularly the introduction of syllabotonic versification, exerted great influence on the growth of the new Lithuanian poetry. Two other poets writing in a lyrical mode in some respects similar to that of Maironis were Antanas Vienažindys (1841–92) and Pranas Vaičaitis (1876–1901).

At the beginning of the 20th c., the general relaxation of Rus. political pressure and an ever-growing cultural consciousness increased literary production and widened its horizon. New approaches were inspired by literary movements abroad. Already evident before World War I, these trends were fulfilled during the period of independence (1918–40) when Lithuanian poetry reached high standards of creative art. *Symbolism left a strong imprint on the early period, best represented by Balys Sruoga (1896–1947), also an outstanding dramatist; Vincas Mykolaitis-Putinas (1893–1967), later a leading novelist as well; and Jurgis Baltrušaitis (1873–1944) who, after achieving distinction among Rus. symbolists, began to publish verse in his native Lithuanian. In the 1920s, the more conservative trends were countered by futurist poets (see FUTURISM) who, led by Kazys Binkis (1893–1942), formed the group Keturi vėjai (Four Winds). Somewhat later, neoromanticism, neosymbolism, *aestheticism, and *expressionism appeared on the scene, while the group Trečias frontas (Third Front) advocated poetry with a leftist orientation.

These trends were transcended, however, by the achievement of the four leading poets of the second generation: Jonas Aistis (1904–73), a highly intimate poet and a master of subtle and refined expression; Bernardas Brazdžionis (1907–2002), whose poetry, sometimes stylistically innovative, sometimes rhetorical with prophetic overtones, is a synthesis of national trads.; Antanas Miškinis (1905–83); and Salomėja Nėris (pseud. of S. Bačinskaitė-Bučienė, 1904–45), both of whom transformed the best qualities of the dainos into their own personal expression. The traditional features leading to the poetry of the next generation were best reflected in the verse of Vytautas Mačernis (1920–44).

The annexation of the country by the USSR during World War II broke the natural flow of Lithuanian poetry by imposing the paralyzing specter of socialist realism; poets exiled in the West learned to use modes of Western culture to speak, above all, of the pain and virtues of exile. While some poets became eulogists of the Soviet system in Lithuania and others retreated into long silence, new authors came forth to claim the favors of the Muses. Eduardas Mieželaitis (1919–97), paradoxically a loyal communist of philosophical bent, did much to help Soviet Lithuanian poetry break through to a more mod. idiom. Justinas Marcinkevičius (1930–2011), also important as a playwright, was perhaps the most popular poet of that period, speaking with great devotion of love for his country and people. Judita Vaičiūnaitė (1937–2001) sings of love in an intimate urban setting and of myth in dreams of the past. Sigitas Geda (1943–2008) transforms both nature and myth into a single magical presence, his vision of the country and its soul. Marcelijus Martinaitis (b. 1936) mostly converses with his own and the nation's conscience about hist., myth, and the responsibility of being human. Janina Degutytė (1928–90) is an intensely personal, lyrical poet of great integrity and noble dedication to humanity.

The culturally saturated poetry of the dissident poet Tomas Venclova (b. 1937) is committed to philosophical meditations. His poetic lang. may appear direct and simple at times. It contains, though, many implicit intertextual associations with the body of world lit., political views on the life of the Soviet dictatorship, and personal experience of an emotional or intellectual nature. The bleak landscape of Europe's moribund postwar culture shaped Venclova's imagination; he began his career under Soviet occupation and was immediately confronted with its realities and art. In exile, he became the most widely known Lithuanian poet and critic, whose works and critiques of society and culture in the Eastern Bloc hold a longstanding association with the works of Czesław Miłosz and Joseph Brodsky.

A number of prominent poets belong to the second generation of writers who debuted in the 1970s. With their avant-garde orientation, they attempted to broaden literary horizons during the Soviet occupation and looked for ways of self-expression. For Nijolė Miliauskaitė (1950–2002), wife of the outstanding poet Vytautas Bložė (b. 1930), everyday reality itself is a highly poetic and leads to the revelation of metaphysical mystery. Rich in cultural allusions and inventive use of myth, the poetry of Kornelijus Platelis (b. 1951) is a medium for harmony. The meditative and compressed thoughtfulness of Donaldas Kajokas (b. 1953) evokes Eastern poetic trads. through pursuit of an ideal nirvana. Antanas A. Jonynas's (b. 1953) melodious poetry spans a range of emotions, from sentimentality to anxiety to *irony.

The generation of poets who matured during the years of independence share a postmod. worldview. Their rebellious despair and psychological distress are conveyed through polemics with traditional values, an ironic voice, and surrealistic images. Aidas Marčėnas (b. 1960) is a master of classic form, whose writings combine contexts of various cultures and lits., poetic visions and dreams that are surrealistically fused with a present reality. Related to the Eur. trad., the aesthetic works of Kęstutis Navakas (b. 1964) can best be described as a play of various combinations of time and space in search of lost time. Sigitas Parulskis's (b. 1965) attachment to the painful existential experiences during the Soviet regime is evident in his poetry.

In the West, the foremost poet was Henrikas Radauskas (1910–70). He spoke in lucid, calmly measured cl. verse of the beauty of the world seen as a carnival of love and death. His loyalty, however, is not with that world but with enchanting mysteries of poetic speech that it engenders. Kazys Bradūnas (1917–2009) looks inward and into the past to awaken the ancient spirits of his native land and engage them in an ongoing dialogue with Christianity and hist. in Lithuania. Jonas Mekas (b. 1922), one of the moving spirits of the "underground cinema" in New York, also writes nostalgic and pensive verse full of self-questioning and yearning for the truthful life. Algimantas Mackus (1932–64) found his own truth in a radical confrontation with the fact of exile that required him to transform all the images of hope and faith from the traditional cultural heritage into grim totems of death. Liūnė Sutema (pseud. of Zinaida Katiliškienė, b. 1927) chooses the opposite task of allowing the alien world to grow into the very tissue of her soul to rejuvenate both her and the land of remembrance she carries within. Her brother Henrikas Nagys (1920–96) embraces both emotional expressionism and neoromanticism. Alfonsas Nyka-Niliūnas (pseud. of Alfonsas Čipkus, b. 1919), a cosmopolitan existentialist of a deeply philosophical bent, contemplates the large and bleak presence of the cosmos through the window of Western civilization.

■ Anthologies: The Daina, ed. U. Katzenelenbogen (1935); Aus litauischer Dichtung, ed. and trans. H. Engert, 2d ed. (1938); Litauischer Liederschrein, ed. and trans. V. Jungfer (1948); The Green Oak, ed. A. Landsbergis and C. Mills (1962); Lithuanian Writers in the West, ed. A. Skrupskelis (1979); Selected Post-war Poetry, trans. J. Zdanys (1979); Sigitas Geda: Songs of Autumn, trans. J. Zdanys (1979); The Amber Lyre: 18th–20th Century Lithuanian Poetry, ed. J. Marcinkevičius and V. Kubilius (1983); Four Poets of Lithuania: Vytautas P. Bložė, Sigitas Geda, Nijolė Miliauskaitė, Kornelijus Platelis, trans. J. Zdanys (1995); Lithuania: In Her Own Words, ed. L. Sruoginis (1997); Breathing Free/Gyvas atodūsis, trans. V. Bakaitis (2001); Voices of Lithuanian Poetry, trans. L. Pažūsis (2001); Five Lithuanian Women Poets, trans. J. Zdanys (2002); Inclusions in Time: Selected Poems by Antanas A. Jonynas, trans. J. Zdanys (2002); Raw Amber: An Anthology of Contemporary Lithuanian Poetry, ed. and trans. L. Sruoginis (2002).

■ Criticism and History: B. Sruoga, "Lithuanian Folksongs," Folk-Lore 43 (1932); J. Mauclere, Panorama de la littérature lithuanienne contemporaine (1938); J. Balys, Lithuanian Narrative Folksongs (1954); A. Senn, "Storia della letterature lituana," Storia della letterature baltiche, ed. G. Devoto (1957); A. Rubulis, Baltic Literature (1970); R. Šilbajoris, Perfection of Exile (1970); Baltic Drama, ed. A. Straumanis (1981); Lithuanian Literature, ed. V. Kubilius (1997); T. Venclova, Forms of Hope: Essays (1999); Lietuvių literatūros enciklopedija (2001); R. Šilbajoris, A Short History of Lithuanian Literature (2002); Naujausioji lietuvių literatūra, ed. G. Viliūnas (2003).

R. Šilbajoris; D. Litvinskaitė

LITOTES (Gr., "plainness," "simplicity"). A form of *meiosis, employing (1) affirmation by the negative of the contrary ("Not half bad"; "I'll bet you won't" meaning "I'm certain you will") or (2) deliberate understatement for purposes of intensification ("He was a good soldier; say no more" for a hero). Servius, commenting on Virgil's Georgics 2.125, says, "non tarda, id est, strenuissima: nam litotes figura est" (not slow, that is, most brisk: for the figure is litotes). Litotes is used so frequently in Beowulf and other OE, ON, and Old Germanic poetry that it has become (with the *kenning) one of its distinguishing features, e.g., "ðæt wæs god cyning" (that was a good king), following a passage telling how the king flourished on earth, prospered in honors, and brought neighboring realms to pay him tribute. Chaucer's cook is described as "nat pale as a forpyned goost. / A fat swan loved he best of any roost" ("General Prologue," 205–6). John Milton has "Nor are thy lips ungraceful, Sire of men, / Nor tongue ineloquent" (Paradise Lost 8.18–19). Alexander Pope uses litotes as an effective satiric instrument.

Like meiosis, *hyperbole, *irony, and *paradox, litotes requires that the reader refer to the ostensive situation, i.e., to the utterance's pragmatic context, in order to perceive the disparity between the words taken literally and their intended sense. Group μ distinguishes litotes from meiosis, or "arithmetical" understatement ("one says less so as to say more") by restricting litotes to the "double" negation of a grammatical and lexical contrary. So Chimène's conciliatory remark to her lover, "Go, I do not hate you" (Pierre Corneille, Le Cid 3.4), negates the lexeme hatred, while at the same time the negative assertion posits the opposite series of statements referring to the degrees between loving and not hating. Thus, the seemingly negative construction of the litotes not only suppresses a positive seme, replacing it with the corresponding negative one, but replaces any one of a series of negative semes. Corbett illustrates how litotes may function in forensic rhet. with an example of the lawyer who assists his client "by referring to a case of vandalism as 'boyish highjinks.' A rose by any other name will smell as sweet, but a crime, if referred to by a name that is not too patently disproportionate, may lose some of its heinousness." Litotes in this instance functions like euphemism by reducing the resistance of the audience. In logic, the device corresponding to litotes is obversion.

The distinction between litotes and meiosis is that, in the former, calling a thing less than it is makes evident that it is actually larger, whereas in the latter, calling it less is meant to make it less.

■ K. Weyman, Studien Über die Figur der Litotes (1886); O. Jespersen, Negation in English and Other Languages (1917); A. Hübner, Die "Mhd. Ironie" oder die Litotes im Altdeutschen (1930); F. Bracher, "Understatement in Old English Poetry," PMLA 52 (1937); L. M. Hollander, "Litotes in Old Norse," PMLA 53 (1938); M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); C. Perelman and L. Olbrechts-Tyteca, The New Rhetoric, trans. J. Wilkinson and P. Weaver (1969); Lausberg; Morier; Group μ; Corbett.

R. O. Evans; A. W. Halsall; T.V.F. Brogan

LITURGICAL POETRY. In the Western world, liturgical poetry has encompassed a vast array of oral and written texts, from the early Lat. *hymns of Prudentius to the Jewish piyyutim of Palestine and Cairo to the 12th-c. sequences of Hildegard of Bingen to the liturgical poetics of contemp. writers such as Patrick Pritchett. Within many religious trads., the liturgy consists in considerable part of poetry composed, arranged, and altered to suit the formal demands of ritual practices. Established liturgical genres (Lat. octosyllabic hymns, e.g.) may endure for centuries, though with the capacity for tremendous variations of form, style, lang., and theme. In such cases, "liturgy itself" (a quite malleable category) gives rise to its own internal habits of formal innovation by provoking its ritual makers to experiment in new poetic idioms.

As a provocation to *invention, liturgy is similarly limitless in its influence on the literary field, which can be seen in some instances as an effect of liturgical practice in the domain of ritual. In the Brit. trad. alone, liturgy has spawned myriad inventions: the anonymous Old English Benedictine Office (early 11th c.), with its interspersing of Lat. doxology and alliterative lyric; John Skelton's Philip Sparrow (ca. 1509), which expertly parodies the Office of the Dead; and the Chester cycle's Shepherds Play (early 15th c.), which tropes the "Gloria in excelsis" to comic but moving effect. The Middle Scots poet William Dunbar actively poached the liturgy as part of a poetic sensibility that he shared with many vernacular writers of the Brit. Middle Ages. The polyglot literary culture of med. Britain—Ir., Welsh, Cornish, Lat., Fr., Eng., Scots—was ideally suited to formal experimentation across ling. boundaries, and it is no surprise to see poets in all these langs. consistently turning to liturgical latinitas as a source of ingenuity and *invention. Central to this experimentation were liturgical practices such as troping, which involved the interpolation of new ritual matter into existing liturgical. This aesthetics of insertion, dilation, and expansion became an important formal strategy for writers enlisting the liturgy as part of their poetic enterprise. Liturgical parodies (such as the "Venus Mass" attributed to John Lydgate and the Iberian trad. of the Misa de amores) formed an active part of this trad., and there seems little doubt that the boundaries between properly liturgical and nonliturgical poetry could be quite permeable.

The coming of a vernacular liturgy with the Book of Common Prayer (1549) instigated an equally innovative if now largely monolingual poetic trad. The metrical trans. making up The Bay Psalm Book (1640) are liturgical poetry of the highest order, as are many works by John Donne, George Herbert, and others. In the mod. period, poets such as W. H. Auden, David Jones, R. M. Rilke, Jerome Rothenberg, Denise Levertov, and numerous others have found deep and enduring inspiration from the text, music, and ritual forms of the liturgy, by any measure a foundational idiom for comprehending the hist. and develop. of poetry in any period or trad.

See COPLA; HEBREW POETRY; JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY; LATIN POETRY; PSALM; PSALMS, METRICAL; RELIGION AND POETRY.

■ J. J. Petuchowski, Theology and Poetry: Studies in the Medieval Piyyut (1978); B. Holsinger, "Liturgy," Middle English, ed. P. Strohm (2007); K. Sterlin, "Liturgical Poetry," Oxford Handbook of John Donne, ed. J. Shami, D. Flynn, M. T. Hester (2011).

B. Holsinger

LOGAOEDIC (Gr., "speech-song like" [cf., in music, Sprechgesang]). A term used sporadically by ancient metrists to refer to verses consisting of single long syllables in alternation first with double and then with single shorts: – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – x (the *alcaic decasyllable), ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – x (the Archebulean), etc. Some 19th-c. metrists took the term to imply actual *isochronism or durational equivalence between sequences containing single and double shorts and applied it to a much larger class of ancient forms consisting, so they believed, of metra in which the normal time values of long and short syllables were altered in such a way that *dactyl, *spondee, trochee, and a single long syllable were all durational equivalents. The *asclepiad in its Horatian form would accordingly be analyzed as a hexameter: – – | – ∪ ∪| – pp | – ∪ ∪ | – p ∪ | – pp, where p and pp indicate pauses or lengthenings of the preceding syllable equivalent in duration to, respectively, one and two short syllables. Though now generally rejected in favor of some sort of *choriambic or *aeolic analysis of the sequences once called logaoedic, the theory continues to have occasional defenders, particularly among classicists familiar with 18th- and 19th-cs. Western music. It encourages us to find in a piece of Gr. verse the equidistant strong stresses that one might look for in trying to set it to music or that an Eng. or Ger. reader would be inclined to introduce when reciting it. (Even so staunch an opponent of isochronism as Wilamowitz was, according to Shorey's reports, a "logaoedicist" despite himself when it came to such recitations.) And it becomes, with the elimination of the spondee and the addition of the first *paeon (– ∪ ∪ ∪) to its repertory of isochronous metra, the *sprung rhythm of G. M. Hopkins. In general, however, the term has not been used by metrists in reference to mixed binary-ternary (iambic-anapestic or trochaic-dactylic) meters in mod. Eng. verse.

See SYNCOPATION.

■ P. Shorey, "Choriambic Dimeter and the Rehabilitation of the Antispast," Transactions and Proceedings of the American Philological Association 38 (1907*);* L. Pearson, ed., Aristoxenus. Elementa Rhythmica (1990)—both works in favor of isochronous analysis; J. W. White, The Verse of Greek Comedy (1912)—against.

A. T. COLE; T.V.F. BROGAN

LONG POEM. The term is used almost exclusively for mod. poetry, usually in Eng. Charles Altieri notes that the mod. long poem is distinguished by a "desire to achieve epic breadth by relying on structural principles inherent in lyric rather than narrative modes." Incorporating other texts, lost voices, political speech, or bits of memory, the long poem foregrounds the writer's role in making a distinctive way through such often-resistant material.

A cluster of early 20th-c. poems put into play the tensions and possibilities that continue to mark the genre. Ezra Pound's Cantos (1925–72) invents a series of ling. rituals through which the poet seeks to gather and give voice to the "luminous details" of what he sees as his culture's religious, political, and literary heritage. In their eventual acknowledgment of the limits of one person's ability to make such a synthesis cohere, however, The Cantos made the writing of such a text its real subject, an idea that now dominates the genre. T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land (1922), sensing in its central figure's speechlessness before the world's "horns and motors" a way to move forward, comes to life in its own writing, weaving broken-off shards of the culture into a richly expressive inner idiom. Discovering that the nightly bombing of London during World War II opened new sources of inspiration even as it destroyed old forms, H.D.'s Trilogy (1944–46) attempts to "alchemize" a new manner of thinking out of melted-down bits of once-central texts. W. C. Williams, in Paterson (1946–58), responds to the work of his expatriate peers with "a reply to Greek and Latin with the bare hands," turning not to the shattered forms of trads. past but to the broken words of ordinary people, shaping the voices around him into a revolutionary epic form. Finally, Hart Crane's The Bridge (1930) focuses even more explicitly on Am. voices and hist., attempting to draw them toward a "mystical synthesis" suggested by the "unfractioned idiom" of the arcing Brooklyn Bridge. As with all these early moderns, Crane's charged lang., though driven by a shared dream, unfolds itself in a markedly individual way.

McHale has argued that, even as a "relatively stable modernist poetics was crystallized out from the churning heterogeneity of early-modernist innovation," what fell out of this official hist. "remained available for revisiting and reappropriation by later generations of innovators." This is clearly the case with the 20th-c. long poem, as we see the work of these predecessors mined over and over again by the writers who followed them. Keller usefully sorts these reappropriations into three groups: *epic-based poems; *lyric sequences; and experimental, less representational texts. While the categories overlap, they identify ways of mapping the confrontation of an individual sensibility and larger cultural concerns that remained central to the long poem as it continued to develop.

Long poems that draw on epic models established by the first generation of modernists work toward cultural synthesis while inevitably foregrounding the presence of the writer, whose selection and arrangement of material is everywhere at issue. As Pearce, Miller, and Gardner point out, Walt Whitman's "Song of Myself" (1855) is a notable model and expression of this tension. Important long poems in this trad. include The Maximus Poems (1960–75) by Charles Olson, The Anathémata (1952) by David Jones, and The Changing Light at Sandover (1980) by James Merrill.

Poems shaped as lyric sequences are often more autobiographical or singular in focus than their epic-based near-relations, investigating the ways "a number of radiant centers" (Rosenthal and Gall) cluster around or grow out of a single structure or form. Important poems here include John Berryman's Dream Songs (1969), Robert Lowell's Notebook 1967–68 (1969), Adrienne Rich's "Twenty-One Love Poems" (1978), and Rita Dove's Thomas and Beulah (1986). Wallace Stevens's "The Auroras of Autumn" (1950) and Theodore Roethke's "North American Sequence" (1964) are notable examples of sequences with meditative slants.

There has been a particularly strong flowering of innovative, lang.-based long poems, often disjunctive in form, in the years since the early modernists. Gertrude Stein's Tender Buttons (1914) is often acknowledged as a predecessor. These poems, while often focusing on political, philosophical, or historical themes, call particular attention to the way lang. itself, in its rhythms, silences, conventions, and expectations, offers a rich means of raising and engaging such issues. Notable poems in this category include Louis Zukofsky's "A" (1959–75), Robert Duncan's Passages (1968–87), Lyn Hejinian's My Life (1980, rev. and extended 1987), Michael Palmer's "Notes for Echo Lake" (1981), Rachel Blau DuPlessis's "Drafts" (begun 1985), and Susan Howe's "Souls of the Labadie Tract" (2007).

See MODERNISM, POSTMODERNISM.

■ R. H. Pearce, The Continuity of American Poetry (1961); L. S. Dembo, Conceptions of Reality in Modern American Poetry (1966); H. Kenner, The Pound Era (1971); C. Altieri, "Motives in Metaphor: John Ashbery and the Modernist Long Poem," Genre 11 (1978); J. E. Miller Jr., The American Quest for a Supreme Fiction (1979); M. A. Bernstein, The Tale of the Tribe: Ezra Pound and the Modern Epic (1980); C. Nelson, Our Last First Poets (1981); M. L. Rosenthal and S. Gall, The Modern Poetic Sequence (1983); M. Perloff, The Dance of the Intellect (1985); M. Dickie, On the Modernist Long Poem (1986); T. Gardner, Discovering Ourselves in Whitman (1989); J. Walker, Bardic Ethos and the American Epic Poem (1989); P. Baker, Obdurate Brillance: Exteriority and the Modern Long Poem (1991); J. Conte, Unending Design: The Forms of Postmodern Poetry (1991); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991); S. Kamboureli, On the Edge of Genre (1991); P. Quartermain, Disjunctive Poetics: From Gertrude Stein and Louis Zukofsky to Susan Howe (1992); L. Keller, Forms of Expansion: Recent Long Poems by Women (1997); M. Perloff, 21st-Century Modernism (2002); B. McHale, The Obligation Toward the Difficult Whole (2004); J. Moffett, The Search for Origins in the Twentieth-Century Long Poem (2007); H. F. Tucker, Epic: Britain's Heroic Muse 1790–1910 (2008).

T. GARDNER

LOVE POETRY

I. Issues and Assumptions
II. Thematic Overview
III. Conventions and Personae

I. Issues and Assumptions. Love poetry is one of the oldest and most widespread types of *lyric. It has come down to us from ancient Egyptian times, been authored by male and female poets, projected through and upon different sexual personae, and developed a host of striking and sometimes globally itinerant conventions. It has etched episodes in compelling plotlines and provided an imaginative space in which to articulate and contemplate the human emotions of affection, sexual passion, and idealism as these join in what we call love.

Though most anthologists would acknowledge love poetry's ongoing importance in the lyric trad., it was not always so recognized by 20th-c. Eur. and Am. critics. This had to do largely with reigning theoretical and historical assumptions, as Hancock points out in "Unworthy of a Serious Song?" For instance, the notion of poetic "impersonality" often made love poetry into something of an *oxymoron. T. S. Eliot, whose Waste Land and individual lyrics seldom engaged with the theme of love unless to describe its impossibility, also wrote in his critical essays of the poet's necessary "impersonality." And though many of the most appreciated mod. love poets could not easily be accommodated within this view, the position was taken up by a number of influential critics (particularly Wimsatt and Beardsley, and, more polemically, Barthes). In a commendable eagerness to emphasize poetry as lang. and text, such a critical assumption made it difficult to embrace love poetry when it dwelt, as was often the case, on seemingly "personal" themes.

Historical assumptions also hampered our understanding of love poetry. For instance, many Am. and Eur. critics of the 20th c. saw the subject of love poetry largely through the historical lens of *courtly love—a view that places the beginnings of love poetry with the 11th-c. Occitan poets. Authors such as Lewis and Rougemont provided influential hists. of Eur. love lyric, all stemming from this source. Though Dronke early pointed out the much more complex and variegated hist. of courtly love, situating it within a wider set of influences and themes, this broader view was not as often accepted as the one that saw the trad. in its more limited guise, thereby excluding a fuller hist. of love poetry.

A third problem for the study of love poetry has been the limited availability of texts from other parts of the globe. New anthols. of trans. poems have begun to remedy this gap, broadening our sense of what love poetry can be in different ling., geographical, and cultural settings. Thanks largely to this growing range of anthols., as well as fuller critical descriptions of poetry from around the world, we are beginning to gain a greater awareness of love poetry's diversity, from the earliest Egyptian love songs to the present. This article gestures toward some of this diversity, though it would be impossible to explore it fully. The list of readings included should amplify this brief discussion.

The continuing popularity of anthols. of love poetry itself bears comment. Readers have always appreciated the love lyric, even when critics have been more reticent. Perhaps readers read love poetry to reenvision their own understanding of love and, to some extent, their own sense of identity. This need not be a simple mirroring. Reading love poetry from different geographic, ling., and historical contexts expands our sense of love's possible meanings in our own lives and those of others. In this sense, love poetry is not only one of the most common types of poetry written but a type with particular audience appeal.

II. Thematic Overview. Love poetry imaginatively presents the vicissitudes of that human emotion we call love. But what is love? Is it sexual pleasure, passionate desire, religious enlightenment, joyful connection to another, a painful disruption and reconstruction of self, or a cherishing of another human being? Is it idealized or sexual, public or private, a sickness unto death or an exhilarating rebirth of the mind and the senses? If we are to believe the poets, it is all these and more. According to lang., culture, time, and individual poetic insight, love is constructed in an endless variety of ways. For love itself, as well as the poetry that represents it, is, at least in part, an imaginative construction. It may be performed in a variety of ways and with differing results.

Of the themes that have characterized love poetry across the centuries and in many cultures across the globe, the tension between ideal and earthly passion is one of the most pervasive. This is a theme sometimes supported by religious and philosophical thought and by popular poetic practice—and has varied in importance according to historical and cultural context. To generalize greatly, the love lyric in its earliest forms seems to embrace a more earthly love, while med. and early mod. poetry explore more idealizing strains. The enormously diverse love poetry of the late 19th, 20th, and 21st cs. tends again toward less idealized themes.

Our oldest known love poems from ancient Egypt reveal a frank appreciation of the earthly nature of love. Sensual themes drawn from popular song celebrate youth, nature, and the sheer pleasures—and at times, the pains—of love. These poems, existing in the oral as well as written trad., are believed to have directly influenced the Heb. Song of Songs composed centuries later. Their themes and their reliance on female as well as male speakers have persisted in African poetry to this day and assert themselves with renewed vigor in the mod. and contemp. love lyric of many cultures.

From Sappho's great love lyrics focused on erotic longing to other Gr. texts, there is a complex legacy of poetic meditations on love. Much Roman poetry—particularly that of Ovid and Catullus—while in many ways emulating the Gr. heritage, present a love poetry that is often playful and even cynical. Here, love is entertaining and sometimes dangerous—a passion to be controlled and, at times, purposely extinguished. Examples from this trad. continue over the centuries, turning to homosexual as well as heterosexual themes and later flourishing in parallel with idealizing strands.

It is not in these very early love lyrics but rather in Plato's Phaedrus and Symposium that we find the most idealizing demands of eros, as the desire for transcendence of the human for the divine. Erotic desire, often described in homoerotic or clearly homosexual terms, animates a view of love that seeks not mere earthly satisfaction so much as the continuation of passion, often until the self can fuse with the divine. It is such erotic love that Rougemont claims stands behind the courtly love trad. Death has an inevitable role to play here, often presented in love poetry through the death of the beloved (as in Dante's Vita nuova and Divina commedia), making consummation of love impossible and endless desire inevitable. But at times the death of the lover is suggested also as the outcome of ceaseless passion.

Centuries of Eur. love poetry beginning with the troubadours in the 11th c. celebrate a love that reaches beyond the material alone to ennoble lover and beloved. But as Hamill suggests, an idealizing spirit, with its aspiration to move from the human to a more transcendent love, is celebrated in many cultures and from very early times. In the Persian and the Ar. trads., e.g., where earthly love has a specific role in the ascent to the love of God, we find a rich vein of idealizing love poetry. Often laced with humor and irony, playing on complex ambiguities, such poetry is well known from the 9th c. onward, and its mystical aspirations reach us today through the love poetry of Andalusia as well as the powerful verses of Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī and the ghazals of Ḥāfiẓ. Indian poetry from the earliest Sanskrit and Bhakti has made sensual love at times the figure for spiritual yearning, as well as of sexual, courtly pleasure. Poetry by figures such as the 15th-c. Kabīr and Vidyāpati have inspired generations of poets around the world. In yet another context, we find the writing of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, where a unique rendering of religious and earthly love emerges in a Mexico recently transformed through violent cultural encounters.

Over the centuries, these two strains of poetry have persisted and often joined forces. Later centuries mark a few thematic junctures of particular interest. The luxuries of court settings and noble rank have, for instance, often contributed to the idealizing refinement of love poetry. This occurs in a good deal of med. and Ren. Eur. court poetry, where the social status of lover and beloved itself contributes to an expected lyric decorum.

One sees very different aristocratic poetries in the long, complex hist. of both Chinese and Japanese love lyric. Associated with the courts and often with royal figures, love poetry reveals sophisticated devels. in verse forms as well as themes. Each trad. stands alone and in some ways at odds with Eur. examples, though similar in its strong dependence on an aristocratic court culture for conventions of great poetic refinement, for a poetic play within stylized themes—as well as for material survival.

In the later Eur. romantic trad., the ideal and earthly produce a very different synthesis as poets depict a love both sexual and ennobling. But unlike their med. and Ren. precursors, and corresponding to different philosophical and religious expectations, these poets did not seek a divine goal outside earthly love but rather love's innate creativity. As Singer suggests in The Nature of Love, the lovers become ideal because they are lovers, filled with the creative spirit conveyed by the joining of sensuous and spiritual aspects of love—and the expectations of 19th-c. philosophy. Its themes often depict love as a path to death and destruction, but at other times more positive views prevail. With the romantic love lyric, courtly poetry's reliance on high social station gives way to a new openness to all social ranks, and women gain greater prominence as poets and as personae (see PERSONA).

Following in the wake of these more democratic and dialogical themes, love poets of the late 19th and 20th cs. begin to describe not only the experience of "falling in love" but what Singer describes as "being in love" and "staying in love." Though the theme of death also plays a role in this more mod. poetry, it tends to quicken the senses, making present pleasures and appreciations more intense, as it amplifies the importance of memory. An awareness of the transitory infiltrates amatory experience with heightened intensity.

Of course, the 19th c. brings not only a transformed love poetry to Europe: Europe brings the political and cultural context of colonial expansion, oppression, empire, and postcolonial response to much of the world. With colonial educational systems in Africa and India, e.g., came the invasion of cultures not only with guns and tools of commercial exploitation but with the insistent contact of different literary and poetic trads. Rich legacies of original-lang. poetry experienced an often violent encounter with the lyrics of Europe. What has emerged from this impact includes waves of trans., adaptations, new verse forms, and original inspirations, as well as reactions against the poetry of the colonizing nations. The ling., formal, and thematic effects of these encounters on the poetries of all trads. deserve ongoing study. For a genre as wide-ranging and diverse as the love lyric, such study has only begun.

Partly for this reason, it is hard to generalize about the themes of 20th- and 21st-c. love poetry across many cultures. However, a few salient qualities may be noted. First, in much if not most mod. love poetry, there is a muting of interest in highly idealizing themes and a greater acceptance of sexuality and sensuality. In many cultures, though hardly all, homosexual and lesbian themes become more frequent, as does poetry composed by women. Second, there is often a turn away from universal or stylized themes to the particulars of the individual love experience. The details of everyday life and sometimes the seemingly autobiographical elements connecting lover and beloved replace the earlier, more universal themes of yearning leading to transcendence. Third, a situated, particularized memory often replaces stylized imagery with cultural, historical, stylistic, and other thematic returns to the past. Fourth, mod. and contemp. love poetry is increasingly aware of its many poetic encounters over time and geographic space. These affect both themes and formal conventions.

III. Conventions and Personae. The conventions of love poetry include agreed-upon elements of style, genre, and structure that restrict the poet's work yet allow him or her to communicate with the audience or reader. A few have played a role in several different cultural and historical contexts. Some of love poetry's conventions relate to its themes, outlined above, but others deal in verse forms, imagery, and personae. Who do we imagine is speaking in a poem? How private does the lang. seem—or how public and rhetorical? Though a love poem may sometimes, through its particularity and detail, give the impression of a straightforward rendition of personal experience, it is always a fashioned, indirect expression, an imaginative performance in the medium of words. It is, in short, always art. Lang., with its constructions of *diction, *figuration, and *sound, intensifies the imaginative dimensions of the poem as it mediates any direct perception of sincerity.

A. The Secular Love Lyric: Ancient Egyptian and Hebrew. Our earliest love songs from ancient Egypt (1305–1080 BCE) provide examples of male and female personae, in each case imagining and/or addressing lovers of the opposite sex. Some humorous, some serious in tone—all offer the earliest known love songs, still a pleasure to read. They include poems of ecstasy, despair, a listing of the beloved's qualities, and descriptions of the more physical aspects of love. The openness and variety of these poems, their oral as well as written trad., remain ongoing traits, particularly evident, e.g., in later Swahili song. Female personae reappear in many African folk trads., inspiring later poets as well.

Scholars generally believe that the early Egyptian songs, very likely used for entertainment purposes, were popular in origin, though hardly naïve. The diction remains unpretentious, not stylized, and at times humorous and ironic. Imagery evokes the pastoral with its flowers, birds, and gardens. Highly crafted poems, they were likely sung as well as written. Their lines are not metered or rhymed but have a clear rhythm. Each song has a marked end point and most belong to larger cycles.

These early Egyptian songs were part of a trad. that seems to have influenced the best-known love poem in the world: the Song of Songs. Scholars now mostly agree that this poem, long read allegorically, is a secular love lyric—or collection of them—that was created by a sophisticated poet and was likely appreciated in popular recitation as well as elite writing. The many parts (or poems) of the Song offer different personae—incl. a woman, a man, and even groups. A young woman speaker dominates much of the poem, describing her desire and pleasure in love. These are fully reciprocated in the words spoken by the man. At times, a dialogue structure of alternating voices and matching images appears, creating a sense of mutuality between male and female personae. Nature imagery, some of it conventional, some of it astonishing in its metaphorical leaps, characterizes the poem, along with imagery from art and architecture. Though the verses are not metrical or rhymed, *parallelism and, at times, direct *repetitions, shape the text. The Song as a whole celebrates young love of a joyful, openly sexual nature but also includes references to death and to separation. With its *pastoral grace and delicate shading of love with death, the poem stands alone in the Heb. and indeed in subsequent trads.

B. Classical Greek and Latin Love Poetry. Fundamental to the Eur. trad. of love poetry are the cl. Greeks and Romans. Most famous among them is Sappho, a woman poet from Lesbos, whose texts are spoken in a woman's voice and most often concern affection, or passion, for other women. Whether Sappho herself was lesbian is something we cannot know—neither from the fragmentary corpus of her poetry nor from biographical data. But that her poetry often spoke through and about female personae and about erotic love we do know.

Derived from a long hist. of oral poetry, the *aeolic meter Sappho used may well go back to an IE base. With its self-conscious meditation and description of the lover's inner state, her verse may be the most famous love poetry in the Eur. trad. Bringing to the reader an interior world of love's suffering and reflection, Sappho along with Archilochus and Alcaeus ushered in the era of cl. poetry, with its quest for internal reflection. Anacreon followed. A lyric poet of great skill, whose rhythmic verse patterns were imitated by later writers, he often turned to humor rather than yearning—as he addressed both male and female lovers (see ALCAIC, ANACREONTIC).

When the Romans overcame the Greeks, the Lat. writers began to gain poetic hegemony. Yet these poets were keenly aware of their debts to the stunning Gr. trad. that came before. Catullus, whose learned and witty love poetry was addressed to Lesbia, evoking Sappho, was a case in point. Developing the Roman *elegy, based on Gr. models of alternating lines of dactylic hexameter and pentameter, Catullus's witty lyrics were followed by those of Tibullus and Propertius, with their own amatory elegies to beloved women. A poetry of high society, theirs was not a lyric of longing but of lively love affairs. But of all the Lat. love poets, Ovid was the master. His love elegies—incl. the Heroides, written through the personae of famous women from the cl. past—were particularly influential, as was his imagery with its martial motifs. In his Ars amatoria and the Remedia amoris, he satirically presented a view of love that influenced poets and readers for centuries to come, one in which male and female were each given new stature.

C. "Religions of Love." In the med. period, Eur. love poetry takes on a very different shape and distinctive set of forms as well as themes. Lewis, who in his Allegory of Love describes courtly love in terms of "Humility, Courtesy, Adultery and the Religion of Love," assigns its beginnings to 11th-c. Languedoc. The beloved woman, an idealized figure of high social status, inspires her male lover with a passion that ennobles him. Engaging in a sort of quest myth for union with her—but also for his own moral excellence—her lover begins a spiritual journey. A view of love shared by the troubadour poets of Occitania, then by the trouvères* in northern France and eventually by poets throughout Europe, the convention often depended on the imagery of Ovid but joined this to an idealization of the beloved, suggesting a religion of love, reminiscent of the cult of the Virgin Mary. In this courtly context, homosexual love was rarely voiced. Apart from the trobairity, women seldom were poetic speakers. The early, aristocratic cult of Eur. courtly love reached its pinnacle in the Dolce stil nuovo and the poetry of Dante, though it continued, with important thematic variations, in Petrarch's *sonnet sequence and subsequent renditions of the Ren. love lyric. In later centuries, homosexual motifs reappeared in the works of Shakespeare and Michelangelo, for instance, and the early idealism of love was also often challenged. But these early mod. versions remained largely aristocratic, attached to court life, with its refined lang. of the developing vernaculars. Throughout, many fixed verse forms emerged, such as the *villanelle, the *sestina, and the *canzone, though the 14-line *sonnet held the greatest appeal.

Ar. love poetry of the 7th to 10th c. developed the genre to an exquisite art form—comparable in some ways to the Eur. courtly love trad. Generally voiced by a male persona, it often described a service of love to a capricious lady. In the 9th c., such love service could take by turns idealizing and highly physical descriptions and at times included homosexual motifs. In the hands of some writers, such love poetry transformed into the fully mystical, with the poet expressing desire for a divine beloved.

Influenced by early Ar. forms and conventions, Persian poets produced similarly idealized personae and love songs. In the ghazal form, based on linked *couplets with associated imagery, a courtly love very like that of the Occitan poets appears. But in spite of its similarities to the Eur. versions, distinct differences remain. One was the greater weight given to the sensual elements of love, for earthly love was deemed a necessary step in the ladder of love. Another was the absence of adulterous love. A third difference was the acceptance of homoerotic motifs.

Throughout the Persian and much of the Ar. trad., the mystical love song remains an important form for centuries. Turning to an earthly or divine beloved, the eroticism of Rūmī and Ḥāfiẓ produced distinctive personae and a powerful, if highly ambiguous erotic trad.

The Indian lyric of idealized love was more varied than the Eur., Ar., or Persian, given the many langs.—such as Sanskrit, Prakrit, Tamil, Hindi, and Bengali, to mention a few—and religious motifs it expressed. Whether described as love in consummation or in separation and longing, the ancient Indian love lyric was often part of religious devotion. Poets such as Kālidāsa and Bhartṛhari address the god Śiva. In Indian religious belief, the gods can at times reciprocate. At others, the emphasis falls on the lover's continued yearning. In the Indian trad., female desire is as often celebrated as male. The 12th-c. female poet Mahādēviyakka, for instance, reveals her intense yearning and praise for Śiva, often described in very sensual terms. In more secular visions, a lover's memory may shuttle between moments of separation and consummation. Though the sensual may open out to a more mystical knowledge, it may also simply be addressed as one of the many aspects of love. The ambiguity and beauty of the verse of 15th- and 17th-c. love poetry offered by Kabīr, Bihāri Lal, and Mīrābāī remain part of the trad. in India and beyond.

D. Court Poetries. In Chinese and Japanese poetry of the cl. period, refined court poetries flourished. In China, early popular love poetry was widely appreciated, though sometimes later read allegorically by elite audiences. But already in the Southern Dynasties (420–589), love poetry held an important place in court culture. These poems of love were written according to specific conventions. For instance, though the poets were usually male, they took the persona of a woman in love. For the most part, these were songs of sadness, longing, and nostalgia, written from the viewpoint of the woman, left alone in her boudoir, awaiting her wandering lover. Written in series of five- or seven-character lines, the poems reveal subtle parallelisms of image and tone that unify them. The later Tang dynasty poets (618–907), particularly Li Bai and Du Fu, reached pinnacles of fame in an era when poetry had become an essential ingredient in court and professional culture. The achievement of the Tang was its establishment of regulated tone patterns within verse forms and, in terms of love poetry's themes, its exploration of the ambiguities of love. The Song dynasty (960–1295) often used a style of poetry called ci* that was tied to musical forms and particular melodies and revolved around courtesan culture. Topics of the lover's desire were often expressed in this versatile form. Late in the Ming dynasty (1368–1644), the ci was used again by the poet Chen Zilong, who exchanged lyrics with his courtesan lover Liu Shi (see SHI). Their equally passionate and talented verse reveals the devel. of female as well as male voices in poetry, one that continues into the contemp. period.

Japanese court poetry was likewise highly refined in its use of poetic form and lang. Collections of poems early presented a version of courtly love. Often a poetry of yearning, it could also at times celebrate consummation. Erotic images of tangled hair or wetness were frequently employed. And the theme of laments by passionate women was a long-lasting convention in Japanese love poetry all the way to the 20th c.

Poetry before the 13th c. was almost always associated with the courts. Compilers, who were also poets, joined short waka* poems together in long sequences. At other times, poets gathered for *poetic contests, Some of the most famous poets of the Japanese waka period are female—incl. Ono no Komachi and Izumi Shikibu.

Renga*, or linked poetry, existed early in the trad. but gained popularity in the Japanese Middle Ages and later in the 13th, 14th, and 15th cs. Poetry was, among other things, an art of communication—with other poets as well as the audience. Joint writing of renga was a frequent court event. When renga was composed there, women poets participated. From renga, the *haikai and eventually the *haiku developed. The 17-syllable haiku originated as the first links of renga sequences but eventually became separated for discrete appreciation. The haiku grew popular in Europe and the Americas, thanks largely to Ezra Pound. Often confined to a seasonal image from nature, it could also reflect upon love.

E. European Romantic Poetry. In Eur. *romanticism, when a merging of ideal and real was supported by philosophical views of the aesthetic in figures such as Immanuel Kant, Friedrich Schiller, S. T. Coleridge, and G.W.F. Hegel, the poetry of erotic love flourished. Through the work of the *imagination, feeling joined intellect as it engaged the reader with new, more "organic" (as opposed to "mechanical" and fixed) poetic form. Shakespeare, with his manifold sensibility and playful use of lang. and verse, was particularly admired. Nineteenth-c. figures such as William Wordsworth joined love with nature—and poetry with more colloquial diction. In a turn to more democratic themes, folk motifs arose. The *ballad soon finds a central place, as does the *ode, though *blank verse is often cultivated as a means to organic form. In the work of John Keats and Coleridge, the poet addresses a female beloved, though Lord Byron's poetry evokes both homosexual and heterosexual themes. Women began writing in greater number than before, and poets such as Christina Rossetti and Elizabeth Barrett Browning effectively transformed traditional forms and personae for their own purposes.

In Ger. poetry, J. W. Goethe turns to the ballad to evoke the folkloric past, as he also experiments with a number of other Eur. verse forms and the Persian ghazal. He writes Roman Elegies to describe a sexual awakening. At times addressing love songs to women as a source of creativity and pleasure, at others he explores homosexual themes. Schiller, in his idealizing mode, praises his beloved Laura, evoking the Petrarchan past.

In Fr. lit., the works of Jean-Jacques Rousseau sometimes inspired utopian versions of love based in marriage and virtue. But Fr. romantic poets were better known for their descriptions of the agony of love, a theme well described in Praz's book on the topic. Charles Baudelaire, with his impersonal persona and visions of sexuality and urban love, guided the love lyric toward a new realism invoking lesbians, prostitutes, and cadavers, all the while sculpting verses in traditional fixed verse forms. Arthur Rimbaud and Paul Verlaine would follow.

F. Modern Love Poetries. Love poetry has grown only more popular since the mid-19th c. Web sites as well as printed anthols. allow us to read lyrics from around the world and over the centuries. Poets continue to explore the genre, regularly registering its importance in the very titles of their works, as Hancock notes: Adrienne Rich ("Twenty-One Love Poems"), Anne Sexton (Love Poems), Pablo Neruda (Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair), Anna Akhmatova (Forty-Seven Love Poems), W. C. Williams (Journey to Love), Yehuda Amichai (Love Poems), Robert Graves (Poems about Love).

Vigorous in its production, the genre has again changed. Many poets of the 20th and 21st cs. welcome a greater openness to sexuality, while constructing a more particularized, seemingly "personal" articulation of amatory experience. Many also write with keener attention to historical, ling., and cultural situation.

More than at any time since the cl. period, the love poem embraces a new sexual frankness. Since the late 19th c., there has been an increasing inclusion of gay and lesbian poetries, as well as a less inhibited rendition of sensual love. This is clear enough in the anglophone trad. Walt Whitman, for instance, engages multitudes in his single "I," at times suggesting loves homosexual and heterosexual. Emily Dickinson brings a powerful female perspective to the erotic, Amy Lowell describes an ongoing lesbian relationship, and H.D. employs mythic figures to depict her love. W. H. Auden keeps gender uncertain in his poems.

If various renditions of earthly love have been welcome in Eur. and North Am. cultures, they have not been absent elsewhere. Latin-Am. love poetry has long embraced a warmly sensual experience of love—not only in the lyrics of Pablo Neruda, often considered the greatest love poet of the 20th c., but in those of many others as well. Gabriela Mistral, Carlos Drummond de Andrade, Octavio Paz, and younger poets such as Roberto Sosa and Coral Bracho have transformed the mod. love lyric through memory and reflection on the moment. Mod. Indian love poetry, known best through the writing of Rabindranath Tagore, imagines love in more than 20 Indian langs., often in productive exchange with Eur. and Am. styles. African poets, building on an ancient trad. of sensual love, popular song, and strong female voices, write texts in a wide variety of langs. and postcolonial contexts. From Léopold Sédar Senghor and Christopher Okigbo to Ifi Amadiume, poets join powerful imagery from Af. cultures to distinctive reflections on love. In contemp. Ar. and Persian poetry, love continues to thrive. Adūnis, writing in Ar., is one of the world's best-known poets. The astonishing poet Furūgh Farrukhzād had a transformative effect on Persian poetry, treating themes of love from a female perspective in an innovative and sometimes explicit manner. In China, love lyrics come to us from an array of male and female poets. The 19th-c. poet Wu Tsao included descriptions of lesbian love and sexual explicitness that shocked but prepared the way for later poets. Similarly, it was a woman who most transformed Japanese love poetry of the 20th c. Yosano Akiko's collection Midaregami changed conventional views of women's sexuality as it opened new veins of love poetry to men as well as women poets in the 20th c. Mod. Heb. showed renewed interest in secular love poetry in the 20th c., most famously in the work of Yehuda Amichai, but in later poets as well.

Exploring more earthly passions, mod. poetry also constructs more earthly, particularized descriptions—and with them a new imagination of love. No longer a vague desire for erotic fusion, love in contemp. poetry often prefers a cherishing of self and other over a longer term. Here, individual memory rather than fixed themes lends the poem depth and coherence.

Memory may invoke an image that illuminates an aspect of love, as happens, for instance, through the rural metaphors in Seamus Heaney's love lyrics addressed to his wife. But memory also inheres in poetic form and lang. The poet's very choice of such a form—Neruda's sonnets or Adrienne Rich's ghazals—elicits a conversation with poets and readers over time and space.

Other memories inhere in the lang. in which a poet writes. Lang. can evoke a postcolonial experience, or socioeconomic context, or nostalgia for a past, or an address to a particular audience. Available on the Web as well as in print form, contemp. love poetry in many cultures often turns to music for full expression, reminding us of its beginnings in the Egyptian love song. Thanks to the creativity of poets in different cultural sites, writing in varied langs. and drawing on a complex but increasingly accessible hist. of themes and conventions, fresh and exciting love poetry awaits the reader today.

See EROTIC POETRY, GAY POETRY, LESBIAN POETRY, PETRARCHISM.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: A Choice of Flowers: Chaguo la Maua; An Anthology of Swahili Love Poetry, trans. J. Knappert (1972); A Book of Love Poetry, ed. J. Stallworthy (1973); Love Songs of the New Kingdom, trans. J. L. Foster (1974—ancient Egypt); Sanskrit Love Poetry, trans. W. Merwin and J. Moussaieff Masson (1977); An Anthology of Modern Persian Poetry, trans. A. Karini-Hakkak (1978); The Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse, ed. T. Carmi (1981); Chinese Love Poetry, trans. A Birrell (1982); Love Poems by Women, ed. W. Mulford (1990); The Song of Songs, trans. M. Falk (1990); Greek Lyric Poetry, trans. M. West (1993); The Arc of Love, ed. C. Coss (1996)—lesbian love poetry; The Erotic Spirit, ed. S. Hamill (1996); Gay Love Poetry, ed. N. Powell (1997); What Sappho Would Have Said, ed. E. Donoghue (1997); Love Speaks Its Name, ed. J. D. McClatchy (2001)—gay and lesbian love poetry; Music of a Distant Drum, trans. B. Lewis (2001)—Ar., Persian, Turkish, Heb.; The Anchor Book of Chinese Poetry, ed. T. Barnstone and C. Ping (2005); Indian Love Poems, ed. M. Alexander (2005); Shambhala Anthology of Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. J. P. Seaton (2006); Bending the Bow, ed. F. M. Chipasula (2009)—African love poetry; Islamic Mystical Poetry, ed. and trans. M. Jamal (2009); The Oxford Book of Latin American Poetry, ed. C. Vicuña and E. Livón-Grosman (2009); Love Haiku, ed. and trans. P. Donegan and Y. Ishibashi (2010).

■ Criticism and History: Lewis; W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Intentional Fallacy," The Verbal Icon (1954); M. Valency, In Praise of Love (1958)—Ren. love lyric; H. Bloom, The Visionary Company (1961); R. H. Brower and E. Miner, Japanese Court Poetry (1961); Dronke; M. Praz, The Romantic Agony, trans. A. Davidson (1970); J. Scott, Love and Protest (1972)—Chinese love lyric; R. Barthes, "The Death of the Author," Image, Music, Text, trans. S. Heath (1977); E. Miner, Japanese Linked Poetry (1979); J. Walker, "Conventions of Love Poetry in Japan and the West," Journal of the Association of Teachers of Japanese 14 (1979); J. Hagstrum, Sex and Sensibility (1980)—early mod. love; A. Perry, Erotic Spirituality (1980); A. Schimmel, As Through a Veil: Mystical Poetry in Islam (1982); D. de Rougemont, Love in the Western World, trans. M. Belgion, rev. ed. (1983); M. Fox, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (1985); J. Hagstrum, The Romantic Body (1985); R. Scheindlin, Wine, Women and Death (1986); G. Woods, Articulate Flesh: Male Homo-Eroticism and Modern Poetry (1987); P. Veyne, Roman Erotic Elegy, trans. D. Pellauer (1988); A. R. Jones, The Currency of Eros (1990)—Ren. women poets; C. Paglia, Sexual Personae (1991); E. Selinger, What Is It Then between Us? (1998)—mod. Amer. love lyric; R. Greene, Unrequited Conquests (1999); T. Hancock, "Unworthy of a Serious Song?" CQ 32 (2003); and "The Chemistry of Love Poetry," CQ 36 (2007); C. Petievich, When Men Speak as Women (2007)—Islamic poetry; I. Singer, The Nature of Love, 3 v. (2009).

S. L. Bermann

LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE. Dutch, which is today the native lang. of about 23 million people, originated from Germanic dialects in the delta of the Rhine river, a region in western Europe historically named the Low Countries. An uprising against Sp. sovereignty in the late 16th c. led to the independence of the Dutch- and Frisian-speaking northern provinces, which formed a new country called the Netherlands. The Dutch-, Fr.-, and Ger.-speaking southern provinces remained under Sp. rule and, with the exception of the southeastern part that became Fr. territory, they later formed Belgium (in 1830) and Luxembourg (in 1839). The term Poetry of the Low Countries refers to poetry written in Dutch, combining both Dutch-speaking people from the Netherlands and from Belgium. The Dutch-speaking part of Belgium is also called Flanders, and its inhabitants are called Flemish. At some points in its hist., lits. from the Netherlands and from Flanders manifest considerable differences, yet they are considered by most scholars as belonging to the same overall ling. and cultural system. Dutch is also one of the langs. in former Dutch colonies; for Surinamese and Antillean poetry in Dutch, see CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE. In South Africa, the descendants of Dutch colonists speak Afrikaans, a lang. similar to Dutch. For Afrikaans poetry, see SOUTH AFRICA, POETRY OF.

The oldest example of Dutch poetic production, three verses of *love poetry written in the late 11th c. to test out a new quill pen, are the most famous lines in Old Dutch. The doubts about the geographical origin of the poem's author illustrate the difficulty in distinguishing Dutch from other Germanic and Anglo-Saxon dialects in that period.

During the Middle Ages, esp. the southern part of the Low Countries witnessed the successful production of *courtly love poetry in the vernacular. In this respect, the lyrics of Hendrik van Veldeke (ca. 1150–1210), a poet who wrote in a lang. still hesitating between Dutch and Ger., remain important. His influence on Ger. poets such as Wolfram von Eschenbach (ca. 1170–1220), Hartmann von Aue (ca. 1170–1210), and Gottfried von Strassburg (ca. 1165–1210) is widely acknowledged. The poems of Veldeke and of Duke Jan I of Brabant (ca. 1253–94) deal with courtly love in a traditional, rather formulaic manner: the beloved woman is idealized yet remains untouchable; hence, the feelings of the lover hover between ecstatic joy and depression. An original religious version of this ideal of courtly love is to be found in the mystical poetry by Hadewych (ca. 1210–60), a female mystic who evoked the adoration of God (whom she addresses as Love) along similar lines. Her Liederen (songs) and Visioenen (visions) correspond to attempts by the Beguine movement to develop an authentic female expression of divine love. Next to this lyrical poetry—preserved in the Gruuthuse Manuscript—there was also an important trad. of epic stories in verse. Particularly popular among these were the chansons de geste, epic poems about heroic knights, such as the anonymous 13th-c. Karel ende Elegast (Charlemagne and Elegast) and the satiric beast epic Vanden Vos Reynaerde (Reynard the Fox, ca. 1250), an original version of some branches from the Fr. Roman de Renart that mocks the courtly trad. *Didactic texts were also written in verse form. Works in Lat. that had traditionally been restricted to the religious world were made available to the lay elite because of Jacob van Maerlant (ca. 1230–90), who wrote the Spiegel historiael (Mirror of History), a popular rhymed chronicle of world hist. based on Vincent de Beauvais' Speculum historiale; and Jan van Boendale (1280–1351), who presented Der leken spiegel (The Layman's Mirror), a moralizing encyclopedic work that compiled all knowledge a layman needed for a virtuous life.

The economic prosperity of cities such as Bruges, Ghent, and Ypres led to an increase in self-awareness among the bourgeois elite. These cities used their influence to acquire special rights—"liberties"—from their sovereigns. The Chambers of Rhetoric represent a typical reflection of this urban pride in the 15th-c. Low Countries, mainly in the county of Flanders and duchy of Brabant. These associations of literary amateurs organized all kinds of festivities and had their own *poetic contests. By the end of the Middle Ages, poetry was thus no longer written exclusively for and by the nobility but became an integral component of the literary culture in cities and within the social class of citizens. Poetry was sponsored by city authorities as a way to transmit authority, pride, and moral guidance. Popular lyrical forms were the *refrain, a strophic poem that ended with an invocation of the Prince; the *ballad; the *song; and the *rondeau. The most important rhetoricians were Anthonis de Roovere (ca. 1430–82), the first official poet of the city of Bruges, and Matthijs de Castelein (1485–1550). The poet Anna Bijns (1493–1575) also wrote in the trad. of the rhetoricians, but her verses were best known for their explicitly Catholic and vehement polemics against rising Lutheranism. Several of these texts were exported in trans. through the city of Antwerp in Brabant, which in the 16th c. became a Eur. center of book printing. The Low Countries were then ruled by the mighty Hapsburg dynasty, which had extended its power from the Ger. empire over southern Italy and Spain to the Sp. colonies in the Americas and Asia. The cosmopolitan spirit of Antwerp is reflected in the Antwerps liedboek (Antwerp Songbook, 1544), a collection of Dutch lyrical texts that includes several adaptations of foreign songs.

By the end of the 16th c., an increasing number of poets became fascinated by the humanist thinking and artistic ideas of the Ren. The lyrical work of Petrarch and the poets of the Fr. Pléiade (Joachim du Bellay, Pierre de Ronsard) became esp. influential and were imitated in various ways, resulting in the successful introduction of the *sonnet in Dutch lit. by Lucas d'Heere (1534–84) and most notably by Jan van der Noot (ca. 1539–1600) in his volume Het bosken (The Forest, 1570), which combines the established trad. with Petrarchism and Ronsardian motives, making use of *alexandrines and *iambic pentameter. Of equal importance is Justus de Harduwijn's (1582–1636) later love poetry.

The combination of discontent with the increasingly centralistic policy of Hapsburg Spain that threatened old "liberties" and anger over the persecution of Protestants led to an anti-Sp. uprising in 1566 under the leadership of William of Orange. Thousands of pamphlets, lampoons, and songs functioned as war propaganda. In 1574, an anonymously edited selection of these songs was printed. Its name, Geuzenliedboek (Beggar Song Books), is a reference to a disparaging expression used by the Sp. authorities in reference to the Dutch rebels. The collection included the "Wilhelmus," a call of support for William's uprising, a song considered the world's oldest national *anthem.

The war against Spain ended in a stalemate. While the northern provinces gained independence in the late 16th c., the southern provinces remained under Sp. authority. As a result, the center of cultural and literary life shifted toward the north. In the 17th c., the so-called Golden Age, the Netherlands displayed enormous wealth, economically as well as culturally. Besides painting, lit. played an essential role in the cultural construction of a national identity. Poets were eager to raise the Dutch lang. to a prestige that could rival cl. Lat.; they celebrated the greatness of the Netherlands and its capital Amsterdam as the new Rome. Pieter Corneliszoon Hooft (1581–1647), who successfully applied the metrical innovations of the Ren. to his own dramas and sonnets, became one of the leading poets of the new country. In his castle Muiderslot, near Amsterdam, Hooft hosted regular meetings of writers, which included the sister poets Maria Tesselschade Visscher (1594–1649) and Anna Visscher (1584–1651). Another prestigious member of the Muider circle was the influential diplomat Constantijn Huygens (1596–1687). From erudite Neo-Lat. poetry and hermetic Dutch sonnets to vulgar farces, Huygens demonstrated remarkable literary mastery.

The relatively tolerant and economically prosperous Netherlands attracted tens of thousands of immigrants from all over Europe, incl. many religious and political refugees from the southern Low Countries, Sephardic Jews from Portugal, Ashkenazi Jews from Germany and eastern Europe, as well as Fr. Huguenots. Joost van de Vondel (1587–1679), a child of immigrants from the southern Low Countries, established himself as one of the greatest writers of his time; he is famous first and foremost for his theatrical works, but some of his poems have become classics as well. Of importance is Vondel's critical involvement with the religious and political intolerance of his time. While Vondel's work often dealt with complex theological issues, the Calvinist moral teachings of Jacob Cats (1577–1660) were intended for the common people. His poems and emblem books became popular in Eng. and Ger. trans. The genre of the profane and religious love *emblem, which may be considered a Dutch invention, became famous all over Europe.

With the creation of the East India Company (in 1602) and the West India Company (in 1621), the Netherlands became a major participant in Europe's colonial expansion. Colonial lit. was written mostly in prose, however, and the occasional poems rarely went beyond habitual clichés about the exotic Other. Jacob Steendam (1615–72), a resident in New Netherland, is interesting insofar as he was the first to write poetry about what would later become the United States.

In the southern Low Countries, much didactic religious poetry was produced, mainly in Jesuit circles. The Catholic emblems by the Jesuit Adriaen Poirters (1605–74), who was much influenced by Jacob Cats, gained lasting success.

During the 18th c., the cosmopolitan spirit of the Enlightenment stimulated growing scientific curiosity and the analysis of humans as rational beings. This led to the elaboration of the first Dutch grammars and numerous Dutch literary spectator magazines, which combined an encyclopedic vision on the world with strong moral principles. The philanthropic side of the Enlightenment was reflected in the educational poetry for children by Hieronymus van Alphen (1746–1803).

In the winter of 1794–95, a Fr. army, aided by a Dutch contingent of pro-Fr. "patriots," conquered the Netherlands. Pasquinades, lampoons, and songs played an important role in popular protest against Fr. rule, which lasted until 1813. In verses full of *pathos, poets such as Jan Frederik Helmers (1767–1813) and Hendrik Tollens (1780–1856) expressed a mixture of pessimism about the apathy of the present generation and hope that the fervor of times past might reawaken. The most significant poetic figure in the Netherlands in the early 19th c. was Willem Bilderdijk (1756–1813). Although he continued to use traditional alexandrines, his conviction that it is the poet's task to achieve a personal voice brings him in line with nascent *romanticism. Bilderdijk's Christian fervor corresponded to that of Isaac da Costa (1798–1860), a Jewish convert who was involved in Het Réveil, a Christian revival movement with significant influence in Dutch cultural and political life. An exceptional voice among the many clerical poets, who tended to give preference to the (Christian) message over aesthetic quality, was François HaverSchmidt (1835–94). Under the pseud. Piet Paaltjens, he wrote poems in which *irony, *sentimentality, and cynicism alternate.

In 1830, Belgium became independent. Most Dutch-speaking writers in Belgium opposed the fact that the young Belgian state promoted its communication almost exclusively in the Fr. lang. Rather than choosing the (predominantly Protestant) Netherlands as a model, these (predominantly Catholic) writers tried to construct an authentic Dutch-speaking identity. Strongly influenced by the romantic tendency to glorify the Middle Ages, they called themselves

Flemish after the once-powerful med. county. At first, the objectives of the members of this emancipatory Flemish movement were almost exclusively cultural and scientific. Scholars such as Jan Frans Willems (1793–1846) and F. A. Snellaert (1809–72) collected and edited old folk songs, stories, and poetry in Dutch. Complementary to this preoccupation with the past, attempts were undertaken to establish a new, genuine "Flemish literature" within the political context of a bilingual Belgium. This resulted in a large number of poems that were destined for specific occasions: *odes, heroic and historical verses, and didactic poems. Yet, in the same period, poets became increasingly aware of their "literary" status, of the fact that lit. could no longer be reduced simply to a ready-made ethical, religious, or political message.

The greatest genius of Flemish poetry in the 19th c. was Guido Gezelle (1830–99), professionally both a Catholic priest and a teacher. His work manifests brilliantly the ongoing process of literary autonomization (see AUTONOMY). On the one hand, Gezelle was preoccupied with the didactic function of his poetry. Numerous poems were written originally for specific religious occasions: baptisms, communions, ordinations, funerals. In this respect, his work can be characterized as ideological, preoccupied with values and norms. Yet, on the other hand, Gezelle explored the possibilities of poetic lang., combining romantic themes such as religious experiences and nature with fascinating formal experiments in *rhythm and *sound, verse form, even *typography. This latter dimension has been decisive in Gezelle's canonization as a major poet, even in modernist and postmodernist circles. However, poets such as Albrecht Rodenbach (1856–80) or Hugo Verriest (1840–1922), who wrote in Gezelle's trad., never managed to achieve similar fame.

Around 1880, a major event in this shift toward autonomous poetry—in contrast to the worn-out idea that lit. is a mere vehicle for the transfer of extraliterary ideas and norms—occurred in the Netherlands with the emergence of the Beweging van Tachtig (Movement of the Eighties). A group of young writers incl. Willem Kloos (1859–1938), Albert Verwey (1865–1937), Frederik van Eeden (1860–1932), and Herman Gorter (1864–1927) rebelled against predominantly didactic and edifying lit. Influenced by the work of John Keats and P. B. Shelley, they rejected putting literary work at the service of any ethical, religious, or social ideal. This radical worship of beauty and of subjective experience in lit. was famously summarized by Kloos in his often-quoted adage: "Art is the most individual expression of the most individual emotion." They called their new jour. De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), copying part of the name of the most prominent literary jour. of their time. This provocation proved to have a prophetic character; in short time, De Nieuwe Gids outshone De Gids (The Guide) as the guiding voice in the Dutch literary scene.

The cult of individualism and subjectivism and the plea for an autonomous lit. by the Movement of the Eighties influenced younger generations profoundly. Yet the movement's poets themselves soon abandoned their own radical poetics. Van Eeden became a world-reformer à la H. D. Thoreau and established a communal cooperative. Gorter, who had become famous for his impressionist (see IMPRESSIONISM) and sensitive verse in the epic Mei (May, 1889) and in his Liedjes (Songs), distanced himself from the "bourgeois individualism" of the movement. His later work reveals the influence of the philosopher Baruch Spinoza and the political ideas of Karl Marx. In his poems as well as in his essays, he started to glorify socialism. In this respect, he found a prominent supporter in the socialist poet Henriëtte Roland Holst (1869–1952).

Verwey founded a new jour. in 1905, De Beweging (The Movement, 1905–19). Influenced by the Ger. poet Stefan George and by Dutch symbolist painters such as Jan Toorop and Floris Verster, Verwey focused on the deepening of sensual experiences and spontaneous feelings in order to combine life and art. These ideas became prominent in the transformation of impressionist into symbolist poetry. Verwey influenced many poets of a younger generation, incl. P. C. Boutens (1870–1943), Adriaan Roland Holst (1888–1976), J. H. Leopold (1865–1925), and J. C. Bloem (1887–1966), who shared a sense of unfulfilled desire. Their poetry was characterized by an archaic lang., elaborate structure, and solemn tone. Although rooted in neoclassical trads. (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS), the emotional basis of their work was more romantic, and the influence of Charles Baudelaire is undeniable. The poetry of Leopold and Bloem is intimate, transforming sensory impressions into general emotions or a sudden revelation of harmony. Holst, on the other hand, sought his inspiration in Gr. and Celtic mythology (notably in the work of W. B. Yeats). The main representative of *symbolism in Flanders was Karel van de Woestijne (1878–1928). He started out with hypersensitive and individualist texts, in which meticulous self-analysis was formulated in periodic sentences, using many stylistic devices and ingenious symbolism. In his later work, the style is more sober and the themes are more universal: the "lyric I" considers itself a Modderen man (Muddy Man, 1920), a creature torn desperately between the sensuous earth and transcendental spirituality.

At the beginning of the 20th c., this long-established trad. of cl. poetry and poetics was fundamentally threatened by the sudden appearance of avant-garde lit (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS). Although traces of *futurism and *Dadaism may be found occasionally, *expressionism constituted the most important source of innovation. In Flanders, a group of young poets, pub. in the periodical Ruimte (Space, 1920–21), opted resolutely for *free verse and nonliterary *diction. Thematically, they incorporated explicit elements from mod. times, while advocating a general utopian solidarity among all humans. This strongly ethical "humanitarian expressionism" was put into practice by poets such as Wies Moens (1898–1982) and Marnix Gijsen (1899–1984) and for some time by Paul van Ostaijen (1896–1928), a major writer in Dutch lit. In Het Sienjaal (The Signal, 1918), van Ostaijen advocated a quasi-Franciscan idea of personal suffering and a social utopia in which the artist functioned as a major prophet of the ideal future. However, during World War I, he moved to Berlin and wrote Bezette Stad (Occupied City, 1921), which testifies to a resolutely Dadaistic and nihilistic stance. This chaotic experience of world and humankind was reflected in a fragmented style, reinforced by avant-garde typography. In his final years, van Ostaijen dismissed this "typographical expressionism" and began to write depersonalized, almost mystical verse, which demonstrated a strong musical and rhythmic awareness. This evolution toward *pure poetry or "organic expressionism," which he articulated in a number of theoretical and critical essays, was imitated by numerous younger writers, of whom Gaston Burssens (1896–1965) became van Ostaijen's main follower.

In the Netherlands, the leading Dutch poet in the 1920s was Hendrik Marsman (1899–1940), who was also thoroughly influenced by Ger. expressionism and the ideas of Friedrich Nietzsche. Marsman saw instinctive vitality, the unlimited celebration of life, as the best possible answer to desperation and degeneration. To evoke this new limitless subjectivity, he used hyperbolic lang. and cosmic imagery. However, this vital creativity concealed a strong fear of death or even a longing for destruction and an explicit death wish. In his later poetry, Marsman tried to expand this perspective of humankind into a vision of culture and the need to reconquer a natural paradise. With its prophetic message of a "vitalistic turn" and its desire for a compelling life, Marsman's Verzen (Verses, 1923) had an enormous impact on the younger generation.

Next to these avant-garde tendencies, however, cl. poetry remained a prominent trad. in Dutch poetry. Among the numerous adherents of this poetics, some authors gained lasting significance with their oeuvre. Richard Minne (1891–1965) opted for the observation of daily life in an ironic tone, Simon Vestdijk (1898–1971) for an elevated lang. and the principles of an established poetic trad. Gerrit Achterberg (1905–62) achieved an almost mythical status with his passionate neoromantic poems about the search for the deceased beloved and the perfect poem; his integration of nonliterary elements, from journalism as well as from various sciences, became exemplary for a new lang. of lit., in which precision prevailed over aesthetic principles. The most influential figure in this respect is Martinus Nijhoff (1894–1953). His combination of trad. with elements from *modernism reinforced the idea of common speech as a genuine lang. of poetry. The influence of T. S. Eliot is crucial for Nijhoff's view of poetry, as expressed in his essays and literary reviews. Nijhoff opted for a poetry in which contemp. reality was integrated as a topic. Yet he also made abundant use of mythology and symbols from cl. lit. His epic poem Awater (1934) illustrates the changing literary climate due to growing political tensions in the 1930s; he refuses to continue a certain type of poetry, in which, despite "seeing the ruins," poets would still "sing about the nice weather." Whether the dream of a new human in a new society will eventually be realized remains doubtful. His modernist belief in lit. as the last resource in a decaying world has often been discussed by later Dutch poets.

During World War II, literary life became much more difficult, esp. in the Netherlands where the Ger. occupiers installed a so-called Chamber of Culture in order to push along the Nazification of Dutch lit. As a result, most writers took their work to clandestine publications. Anthols. of resistance poetry, incl. the famous De achttien dooden (The Eighteen Dead, 1941) by Jan Campert (1902–43), were called Geuzenliedboeken (Beggar Song Books) in remembrance of the rebellious 16th-c. poetry during the war against Spain. Several authors—among them Marsman and Campert—died as a result of the war, while others emigrated.

After World War II, many poets considered the restoration and a revival of the literary trad. the best way to overcome the all-encompassing political, ideological, and cultural crisis in society. Hence, they continued to write neoclassicist verses, in which formal virtuosity and the personal expression of the inner self, combined with the sensory experience of the outer world and the use of symbols, still dominated. Within this traditional poetics, many writers managed to combine public success with lasting literary prestige: Maria Vasalis (1909–98), Ida Gerhardt (1905–97), Bertus Aafjes (1914–93), Ed. Hoornik (1910–70), Jan Greshoff (1888–1971), Karel Jonckheere (1906–93), Maurice Gilliams (1900–82), Hubert van Herreweghen (b. 1920), Anton van Wilderode (1918–98), and Christine D'haen (1923–2009).

In the 1950s, however, Dutch poetry was invaded by a movement of "experimental" poetry that in an aesthetic way anticipated the profound social and political changes that would disrupt Dutch society a decade later. A group of young poets, called the Vijftigers (Movement of the Fifties), engaged in vehement polemics with the neoclassicist tendency to ignore traumatic historical events. Instead, they sought their inspiration in *surrealism and, above all, in the view of artistic materiality propounded by painters such as Karel Appel, Pierre Alechinsky, and Christian Dotremont linked to the CoBrA Movement. They propagated an "experimental" and "corporeal" poetics, stressing irrationality and imagery instead of rational thought, pregiven schemata and forms. They abandoned elevated literary lang. and wanted to provoke and to challenge readers, rather than providing them with familiar themes and anecdotes.

The views of the Movement of the Fifties were formulated in a number of small periodicals such as Reflex, Braak, and Blurb. Later, Podium and its Flemish counterpart Tijd en Mens (Time and Man, 1949–55) were particularly influential in promoting experimental poetry. The first generation of experimental poets included Hans Lodeizen (1924–50), Bert Schierbeek (1918–96), Jan Elburg (1919–92), Simon Vinkenoog (1928–2009), Leo Vroman (b. 1915)—who emigrated to the United States and became an Am. citizen—and Remco Campert (b. 1929). They were later joined by H. C. Pernath (1931–75), Paul Snoek (1933–81), and Gust Gils (1924–2002).

The main representatives of the Movement of the Fifties were Lucebert (pseud. of L. J. Swaanswijk, 1924–94), Gerrit Kouwenaar (b. 1923), and Hugo Claus (1929–2008), who dominated Dutch poetry for several decades. Lucebert wrote rhetorical and associative poetry, using abundant imagery. His ambition was to express "the space of the entire life" in his own words. However, since human beings and the world are by no means one-dimensional entities, ambiguity and paradoxes abound in Lucebert's poetry. His work is theatrical, often inspired by his own drawings. In this respect, Lucebert may be regarded as the most radical representative of the Movement of the Fifties. In contrast, Kouwenaar transformed the poem into a "thing" of its own. To this end, the personal tone of the poet disappears in favor of a more abstract and general diction, thus creating an autonomous ling. construct. Gradually, Kouwenaar's hermetic lyrical work opened up to anecdotal and more subjective elements, resulting in a more comprehensible poetry. Claus depicts in his famous volume De Oostakkerse gedichten (The Oostakker Poems, 1955) a "vitalistic" world dominated by the senses and by instinctive erotic passion. However, since this primitive ideal is constantly threatened by the consciousness of the human being, Claus's later poetry integrated hist., society, and culture. Although the struggle between historical awareness and the desire for an unconscious life remains central, his later poems are characterized by the many references to Gr. mythology, the Bible, and J. G. Frazer's anthropological collection The Golden Bough (1890).

In the 1960s, a younger generation criticized experimental poetry for its excessively esoteric lang. and its contempt for the reading public. Instead, these writers advocated a "new realist" poetics, which took its inspiration from *Beat poets and pop art and which promoted a democratic art aimed at broad audience and explicitly related to daily life. Periodicals such as Barbarber and De Nieuwe Stijl (The New Style, a polemical reference to the modernist The Style) advocated this new realist view by introducing the idea of ready-mades: existing texts that were isolated and transformed into poetry (see FOUND POETRY). Barbarber-poets such as J. Bernlef (b. 1937) and K. Schippers (b. 1936) displayed a relativistic tone and humor in poetry that was influenced by Am. modernist poets such as e.e. cummings and Marianne Moore. New Style poets such as Armando (pseud. of H. D. van Dodeweerd, b. 1929), on the other hand, were more aggressive; they selected material about controversial themes such as sex and violence and banned any subjective interpretation. In Flanders, the poet's subjective view remained decisive in poetic diction. Whereas Roland Jooris (b. 1936) moved toward a more abstract lang., the bestselling Herman de Coninck (1944–97) adopted a melancholic tone. Myriam Van hee (b. 1952) and Luuk Gruwez (b. 1953) became known as "neoromantic" poets because of their personal and emotional involvement. Other prominent poets combine romantic motives with a profound self-analysis: Kees Ouwens (1944–2004) and Leonard Nolens (b. 1947) in a serious manner, Gerrit Komrij (b. 1944) more ironically and theatrically.

Generally speaking, Dutch poetry was dominated by two opposite trends in the 1970s. On the one hand, a number of writers opted for an autonomous, lang.-oriented poetry, taking Kouwenaar as a major example. This focus on the creative power of lang. characterized the work of Hans Faverey (1933–90) and the poets around the literary magazine Raster. On the other hand, many poets wrote anecdotal poems in an accessible parlando style. Famous representatives are Rutger Kopland (b. 1934), who later turned toward a more suggestive and abstract poetry; Jan Eijkelboom (1926–2008), Ed Leeflang (1929–2008), Judith Herzberg (b. 1934), and Eva Gerlach (b. 1948).

From the 1980s onward, Dutch poetry has been dominated by *postmodernism. Two orientations of postmod. poetry may be distinguished. Most poets opt for a rather intuitive, playful, and ironic variant of postmodernism. They articulate the problematic status of lang., world, and subject. Instead of merely expressing a fixed personality, the poet stages the "lyric I," often in a theatrical tone. The borders between high and popular culture are breached, and the fetishes of hectic mod. life become an intriguing theme. This view of lit. was promoted by a group of Dutch artists who called themselves the Maximalen (Maximals) as a critique of *minimalism. Although the Maximal group as such lasted only for a short period, its main representatives established a major trend in contemp. Dutch poetry. Joost Zwagerman (b. 1963) may be considered a spokesman of this generation: next to his numerous essays and novels, he writes poems that display an eagerness to show reality in a colorful and exuberant manner. The same can be said about Tom Lanoye (b. 1958), who is also praised for his novels and plays. Pieter Boskma (b. 1956) and K. Michel (pseud. of Michael Kuijpers, b. 1958) have gradually evolved toward a more abstract and philosophical poetry. A similar abundance of images dominates the poetry of Ilja Leonard Pfeijffer (b. 1968).

Next to this popular branch of postmodernism, other poets explore postmodernism more theoretically. Taking their inspiration from Jacques Derrida, Jacques Lacan, Slavoj Žižek, J.-F. Lyotard, and Paul de Man, they deconstruct the ultimate belief in lang. as an effective means of communication and a way to gain insight into the world and humanity. Instead, they propagate rupture and discontinuity, fragmentation and polyphony. *Intertextuality is used to dispel the illusion of coherence and a fixed meaning. Huub Beurskens (b. 1950), Marc Reugebrink (b. 1960), Dirk van Bastelaere (b. 1960), Erik Spinoy (b. 1960), Peter Verhelst (b. 1962), and Stefan Hertmans (b. 1951) are marked by the heritage of modernism. This is less the case for Arjan Duinker (b. 1956), Tonnus Oosterhoff (b. 1953), Nachoem M. Wijnberg (b. 1961), Peter Holvoet-Hanssen (b. 1960), and Jan Lauwereyns (b. 1969), who developed their own poetics, regardless of complex theoretical discussions. Postmodern influences can also be found in the eclectic poetry of H. H. ter Balkt (b. 1938) and Jacques Hamelink (b. 1939), who rewrite Dutch hist. in poetic *cantos.

In the early 21st c., Dutch poetry witnessed a boom of *performance poetry. Performing poets like Jules Deelder (b. 1944) and Bart Chabot (b. 1954), together with the 1960s legend Johnny van Doorn (1944–91), nicknamed the Selfkicker, influenced the slam poetry (see POETRY SLAM) of the youngest generation around Erik Jan Harmens (b. 1970), Ingmar Heytze (b. 1970), and Tjitske Jansen (b. 1971). Phenomena like the City Poet and the Poet of the Fatherland—the Dutch variant of the *poet laureate—proved to be successful strategies to reach a broad audience.

The growing importance of the work of first- or second-generation immigrants and colonial repatriates—such as the Dutch-Indonesian Marion Bloem (b. 1952), the Dutch-Surinamese Edgar Cairo (1948–2000) and Astrid Roemer (b. 1947), the Dutch-Antillean Alfred Schaffer (b. 1973), the Dutch-Moroccan Mustafa Stitou (b. 1974), the Dutch-Iraqi Al Galidi (b. 1971), and most notably the Dutch-Palestinian poet Ramsey Nasr (b. 1974)—reflects the steady transformation of the Netherlands and Flanders into multicultural societies.

See BELGIUM, POETRY OF; FRANCE, POETRY OF; FRISIAN POETRY; GERMAN POETRY; INDONESIAN POETRY.

■ Anthologies: Harvest of the Lowlands, ed. J. Greshoff (1945); Medieval Netherlands Religious Literature, ed. E. Colledge (1965); Reynard the Fox and Other Medieval Netherlands Secular Literature ed. E. Colledge, trans. A. J. Barnouw (1967); Living Spaces: Poems of the Dutch Fiftiers, ed. P. Glassgold (1979); Light of the World: An Anthology of Seventeenth-Century Dutch Religious and Occasional Poetry, ed. C. Levenson (1982); Fugitive Dreams: An Anthology of Dutch Colonial Literature, ed. E. M. Beekman (1988); Dutch Poetry in Translation: Kaleidoscope from Medieval Times to the Present, ed. M. Zwart (1989); From the Low Countries: Poetry from The Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg, ed. B. R. Strahan and S. G. Sullivan (1990); Contemporary Poetry of the Low Countries, ed. H. Brems and A. Zuiderent (1995); Dutch and Flemish Feminist Poetry from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. M. Meijer (1998); Modern Poetry in Translation 12: Dutch and Flemish, ed. T. Hermans (1998); In a Different Light, ed. P. C. Evans and L. Haft (2002); Landscape with Rowers, ed. J. M. Coetzee (2005).

■ Criticism and History: T. Weevers, Poetry of the Netherlands in its European Context (1960); J. Snapper, Post-War Dutch Literature (1972); R. P. Meijer, Literature of the Low Countries (1978); R. Nieuwenhuys, Mirror of the Indies: A History of Dutch Colonial Literature, trans. F. van Rosevelt (1982); S. Schama, The Embarrassment of Riches: An Interpretation of Dutch Culture in the Golden Age (1987); M. A. Schenkeveld-van der Dussen, Dutch Literature in the Age of Rembrandt (1991); F. P. van Oostrom, Court and Culture: Dutch Literature 1350–1450, trans. A. J. Pomerans (1992); Medieval Dutch Literature in Its European Context, ed. E. Kooper (1994); M. Spies, Rhetoric, Rhetoricians and Poets: Studies in Renaissance Poetry and Poetics (1999); A Literary History of the Low Countries, ed. T. Hermans (2009); J. Dewulf, Spirit of Resistance: Dutch Clandestine Literature during the Nazi Occupation (2010).

D. DE GEEST; J. DEWULF

LULLABY. Also known as cradlesong, hush song, night song, sleep song, and berceuse, a lullaby is a type of *lyric in which the poet takes on the role of a singer caressing, persuading, and commanding an addressee into stillness and sleep. Lullabies imitate a spontaneous song performed by a caregiver, most often by a woman, for a young child. Yet poets frequently depart from this convention of pragmatic, simple, female-voiced song to craft deceptively complex layerings of character and voice in the guise of a sleep song.

Often in the imperative mood, lullabies typically involve a contest of wills: between the singer and the listener, between a lover and a beloved, between the hopes of the singer and the cruelty of the world. Lang. is often contractual: the song may contain promises of gifts and pleasure if the listener consents to sleep, or threats and warnings of the suffering that will ensue if the listener does not. Matter varies from the command "sleep softly now" interspersed with lulling nonsense syllables to catalogs of actions in and around the home to thoughtful meditations on loss, desire, neglect, death, and despair.

Surviving med. lullabies are frequently presented as songs performed by a lovely maiden (often the Virgin Mary) whose words have been overheard, recorded, and commented on by an unseen poet. Occasionally, the addressee will engage in dialogue with the woman, but the dominant voice in these lullabies is that of the poet, who acts as an intermediary through whom readers may glimpse the intimate moment between mother and child. These lullabies usually take the form of *carols, with the *burden repeating some variation on the soothing syllables lullay and bas. A variation on this trad. of sacred lullaby, from the early 15th-c. Coventry Mystery Play, depicts mothers attempting to silence their infants in order to save them from the Massacre of the Innocents by singing a lullaby lamenting the children's imminent deaths.

While religious lullabies faded following the Reformation, a secularized version of the form continued to be popular in early mod. England. Throughout the 16th and 17th cs., in addition to lyrics that continued to lull an imagined child, lullabies were written for such addressees as mistresses, lovers, kings, queens, youth, and even abstract notions, such as the wanton impulses of the poet, as in George Gascoigne's "Lullaby" (1573). They also were a popular component of plays, incl. A Midsummer Night's Dream (1600) and The Play of Patient Grissell (1603), which both use the form to emphasize an uncanny mix of pleasure, command, and danger on the edge of sleep.

With increasing commercial attention to the creation of a separate genre of lit. exclusively for the entertainment and moral instruction of children, lullabies appeared in Isaac Watts's Divine Songs for Children (1720) and in Mother Goose's Melody, or Sonnets for the Cradle, published by John Newberry (1781). William Blake's cradle songs in Songs of Innocence (1789) and Songs of Innocence and Experience (1794), while drawing on the "child's song" aspect of the popular lullaby, use the form to produce sophisticated explorations of the innocence of infancy and the ensnaring chains of adult sexuality.

Lullabies have frequently been used as an instrument of cultural and class ventriloquism. While lullaby had long been a form in which an adult lyric masqueraded as a simple song of childhood and men claimed to sing as women, in the 19th and early 20th cs. this practice expanded to explicitly cross racial, ethnic, and class boundaries. Eng. men wrote lullabies in the personae of Scottish women, white Am. men wrote lullabies in the imagined voice and dialect of Af. Am. nurses, and white Am. women wrote lullabies that ventriloquized Native Am. women. Written by members of those minorities, however, lullabies are often powerful tools of cultural reclamation and celebration, as in Langston Hughes's "Lullaby (for a Black Mother)."

Recent controversies concerning lullaby revolve around what is and is not "true" or "real" lullaby. Critics such as F. E. Budd attempt to draw distinctions between folk, or popular, lullabies (sung by caregivers to children) and those poems written in imitation of folk lullabies. The first are dismissed as vulgar, pragmatic, unpoetic, sentimental nursery rhyming, while the second are celebrated as poems inspired by and improving upon a predominantly oral form. Against Budd, Daniel Tiffany asserts that the lullabies sung to children are "true" lullabies and that the increasing formalization of lullaby is part of a hist. of literary theft by poets of the dominant trads. Still other critics, such as Anne de Vries, emphasize the complicated range of satire and social commentary present in both folk and poetic lullabies and assert that there is no great difference between the two branches of the form.

See ORAL POETRY.

■ A.L.J. Gosset, Lullabies of the Four Nations (1915); A Book of Lullabies, ed. E. Smith (1925); A Book of Lullabies: 1300–1900, ed. F. E. Budd (1930); M. Warner, "Hush-A-Bye Baby: Death and Violence in the Lullaby," Raritan 10 (1998); N. Orme, Medieval Children (2001); A. de Vries, "The Beginning of All Poetry," Change and Renewal in Children's Literature (2004); D. Tiffany, "Fugitive Lyric," PMLA 120 (2005); S. Lerer, Children's Literature (2008).

B. WHEARTY

LYRIC (Gr. lyra, "lyre"). In Western *poetics, almost all poetry is now characterized as lyric, but this has not always been the case. Over the last three centuries, lyric has shifted its meaning from adjective to noun, from a quality in poetry to a category that can seem to include nearly all verse. The ancient, med., and early mod. verse we now think of as lyric was made up of a variety of *songs or short *occasional poems. Since the 18th c., brevity, subjectivity, passion, and sensuality have been the qualities associated with poems called lyric; thus, in modernity, the term is used for a kind of poetry that expresses personal feeling (G.W.F. Hegel) in a concentrated and harmoniously arranged form (E. A. Poe, S. T. Coleridge) and that is indirectly addressed to the private reader (William Wordsworth, John Stuart Mill). A mod. invention, this idea of lyric has profoundly influenced how we understand the hist. of all poetic genres.

In the early romantic period, lit. began to be divided into three large categories, culminating in J. W. Goethe's idea of the three "natural forms of poetry": lyric, *epic, and drama. The categories were then cast as ancient distinctions, but, in fact, lyric was a third term added to literary description by 18th- and 19th-c. lit. crit. (Genette). This is not to say that there were no ancient or med. or early mod. or 17th- or 18th-c. lyric poems, but that these poems were not understood as lyric in our current sense of the term. Fowler puts the situation most succinctly when he warns that lyric in literary theory from Cicero through John Dryden is "not to be confused with the modern term." A persistent confusion—among verse *genres, between historical genres and natural "forms," between adjective and noun, between cognitive and affective registers, between grammar and rhet., between privacy and publicity, and among various ideas about poetry—may be the best way to define our current sense of the lyric. It is a confusion that has proven enormously generative for both poets and critics.

The etymology of lyric is derived from the Gr. musical instrument used to accompany the songs of poets. In the Alexandrian period, when the texts taken from Gr. songs were collected in the library, the poems once sung in *performance were grouped together and called lyrics (Most). Thus, lyric was from its inception a term used to describe a music that could no longer be heard, an idea of poetry characterized by a lost collective experience. Most of the ancient poets we refer to as the earliest lyric poets (such as Sappho, Alcaeus, Anacreon, and Pindar) would not have understood this description. Plato and Aristotle did not use the term lyrikos in the Republic and the Poetics; before lyrikos began to be used as a term for songs once sung to the lyre, the key terms were melos (song) and melikos (song-like or melodic; see MELIC POETRY). Johnson (1982) has argued that "one thing about the nature of poetry that moderns have steadily recognized and that ancients could not recognize is the significance, the importance, of the inner stories that personal lyric imitates." If we think of the personal lyric not as a mod. invention but rather as a kind of poetry that modernity has come to recognize even retrospectively, then the absence of terms and concepts to describe ancient lyrics did not mean that ancient lyrics did not exist; on the other hand, there is abundant evidence to suggest that the reason for the absence of lyric as an important category in ancient poetics is that our notion of subjectivity, *emotion, and compression in poetry—in sum, the personal lyric—did not match ideas about poetry (or persons) in antiquity.

In early Lat. verse, the performance context that characterized the Gr. sense of lyrikos was replaced by "the generic fluidity and self-consciousness characteristic of Roman literature" (Lowrie). Catullus experimented with various meters to "suggest epigram or incipient elegy rather than lyric proper" and brought *sapphics into Lat. in his trans. of Sappho's fragment 31, but it is Horace who claimed to have brought sapphics and *alcaics to Lat. lit. in his own poetry (Lowrie). Both Catullus and Horace understood themselves to be writing poems that referred to Gr. poems once described as lyrikos, but the *odes and *hymns and *epigrams they wrote belong to genres specific to ancient Rome and often to genres they created themselves. To describe all these genres as lyric is to gloss over the dependence of Lat. verse on an enormous range of meters (*iambic, *ionic, *aeolic, *glyconic, *elegiac distich, *hendecasyllable, iambo-dactylic, dactylic hexameters, scazons) that would not have been grouped under a single category, even if Horace esp. understood his work in various meters as faithful to the lost ideal of songs once sung to the lyre by Sappho and Alcaeus.

Thus, while it is common for mod. discussions of lyric to include Sappho and Horace among early Western lyric poets, Sappho's performance to the lyre was not referred to as lyric in her own time, and when Horace referred to himself in his first ode as aspiring to join the lyrici vates by invoking those performances several centuries later, he did so in poems that may now seem to us brief, personal, and expressive (and so congruent with our mod. definition of lyric) but were understood in the 1st c. BCE not as lyrics but as odes. Indeed, before the early mod. period, one often finds that lyric is a rather abstract term for the miscellaneous and historically specific genres that now seem to us lyrical in retrospect. Sometimes the lyric proper is thought to have arrived in troubadour verse, but the elaborate med. distinctions among the many genres of such verse (e.g., chanson, tenso*, descort*, partimen*, alba*, pastourelle*, dansa*, sirventes*, cobla*) are lost when we describe troubadour poems as consistently or essentially lyric (Paden). Even when medievalists such as Zumthor apply the term lyric retrospectively to "a mode of expression entirely and exclusively referring to an I, which, although frequently no more than a grammatical cipher, nonetheless fixes the plane and modalities of discourse to the exclusion of any narrative element," they use the mod. sense of lyric as poetry that is nonnarrative and personally expressive in order to characterize a variety of med. verse practices.

The problem of when to date our mod. sense of the lyric extends into the early mod. period. As Greene (1999) has written, "[A]t the beginning of the early mod. period, one finds an incommensurability between what is then labeled as lyric and what we now call by that name: the technical term as received from classical Greek and the ill-defined corpus of brief, subjective writing in verse are approaching one another, but are not yet fully joined." Through the end of the 16th c., it was common for poets and critics to think of lyric (when they thought of it at all) as a loose collection of odes, *idylls, *paeans, and celebratory compositions; but in the same period, various verse genres began to be classified as lyric not only through a nostalgia for the ancient lyre but as a contemp. mode, as when George Puttenham distinguishes heroic, lyric, elegiac, and epigrammatic verse in his Arte of English Poesie (1589). Although the 16th and 17th cs. are often regarded as the era in which the lyric emerged and flowered across Europe, the lyric was one of many poetic varieties (as in Puttenham's list) and was often cast as the least important, the most occasional and ephemeral kind of poetry. Yet perhaps for this reason, Philip Sidney in his Defence of Poesy (pub. posthumously in 1595) responded to the marginalization of lyric verse by defending it in the strongest terms: "is it the Lyric that most displeaseth, who with his tuned lyre and well-accorded voice, giveth praise, the reward of virtue, to virtuous acts; who gives moral precepts, and natural problems; who sometimes raises up his voice to the height of the heavens, in singing the lauds of the immortal God?" Sidney's *personification of lyric attests to the personal expressive power beginning to be accorded to the idea in the later 16th c. At the same time, Sidney's personified ideal is still associated with an archaic version of lyric performance. While med. songs may have followed their own elaborate generic protocols, in the Ren., the Horatian idealization of a lost age in which the "tuned lyre and well-accorded voice" performed in concert began to do the work of genre.

With the rise of the *sonnet after Petrarch, "the early modern sonnet becomes the semi-official vehicle of contemporaneous lyric, and both theory and commentary respond to it as a given," as Greene (1999) argues. "I esteem a sonnet by Petrarch more highly than all the romances," Antonio Minturno wrote in L'arte poetica (1563), and it is also true that mod. critics have esteemed the Ren. sonnet more highly than the many other verse genres that circulated so promiscuously in the period. In an influential late 20th-c. argument, Fineman proposed that what we call early modern lyric originated out of conventions of epideixis or praise (Sidney's "lyre and well-accorded voice [that] giveth praise"; see EPIDEICTIC POETRY). In Shakespeare's Sonnets, Fineman argued, those early mod. notions of idealized lang. break down and are replaced by a new model of lyric subjectivity in which the divided subject of modernity "experiences himself as his difference from himself." The sonnet's formal qualities enable this shift, according to Fineman, since the final *couplet's turn can so aptly articulate a person at odds with himself. Surely, Greene (1999) is right to suggest that "one needs to detach Fineman's argument from the text to which it emphatically joins itself and retell the unsettling of lyric subjectivity through many more examples over a larger time-line," but it is remarkable that critics who want to find the emergence of what we have come to think of as mod. lyric tend to locate its beginnings in the Ren. sonnet and in Shakespeare's sonnets, in particular. Perhaps this is because, as Hollander has observed, "by the 1580s, a variety of poetic conventions had become assimilated to the notion of the 'lyric poem,' including 'sonnets' in both the strict and loose senses . . . epigrams, pastoral lyrics and so forth." In other words, perhaps the tendency to locate the emergence of the mod. lyric in the Ren. sonnet may be traced to the sonnet's popularity and distinction as "one of the few instances in which a genre is defined in terms of a verse form," a distinction that allowed the sonnet to stand as a concrete instance of the beginning of a historical shift in the definition of the lyric from idea to genre (Dubrow).

In the 17th c., the early moments of that historical shift in the lyric's definition proved esp. felicitous. As Saintsbury memorably rhapsodized on the Eng. trad., "in this seventeenth century of ours England was a mere nest of singing birds, a nightingale's haunt in a centennial May." He went on to remark that "it is rather a temptation to the abstract critic to inquire why it was that lyric properly so called was later than the other kinds in our Renaissance." T. S. Eliot famously answered that "the poets of the seventeenth century, the successors of the dramatists of the sixteenth, possessed a mechanism of sensibility which could devour any kind of experience. . . . [I]n the seventeenth century a dissociation of sensibility set in, from which we have never recovered" ("The Metaphysical Poets," 1921). Eliot's move to date mod. poetics from the 17th c.—a move enormously influential for the *New Criticism and perhaps not coincidentally parallel to Michel Foucault's chronology of modernity—may indeed have followed from a shift in sensibility, but it also followed from a shift in poetics, in which lyric became a more capacious category. That shift had been accomplished by the time that Eliot wrote in the 20th c., but its beginnings may be traced to the 17th c., a period in which short poems (often called songs) flourished in large part precisely because their marginalization as minor lit. in the 16th c. made the stakes of their composition and circulation so low. Remarkable amounts of verse circulated in ms., a practice that bound circulation to social relations and occasions. Those relations and occasions produced all kinds of poems—poems of imprisonment, poems for gift-giving, appeals for *patronage, *parodies of popular poems, *riddles for social diversion, libels or epigrams about known individuals—in all kinds of places; as Marotti remarks, such verse was written and read "not only on paper, but also on rings, on food trenchers, on glass windows (scratched with a pin or diamond), on paintings, on tombstones and monuments, on trees, and even (as graffiti) on London's Pissing Conduit." In this flourishing verse culture, the broad category of lyric was seldom invoked as an abstraction for such a varied array of short poems.

But, of course, (as Eliot suggested), the 17th c. was rife with anxiety about other categories, incl. (as Foucault suggested) the category of categories themselves. The promiscuous circulation of verse genres was checked and balanced by ambitious ideas about poetic genres. In Eng., John Milton's great *epic may be the most obvious instance of such ambition; if the lyric had not yet become one genre in the 17th c., the epic already seemed a belated genre in need of renewal. The 17th-c. poets that Eliot characterized (after Samuel Johnson) as *metaphysical poets were known in the period for their "strong lines," a term of disapprobation at the time. Throughout Europe and the colonial world, poets of many langs. associated with the *baroque and *mannerism made the short poem into a vehicle of philosophical speculation, a shift that sometimes demanded that the form of the verse be adapted to the argument. As John Donne wrote of the Psalms, poetry may take "such a form as is both curious, and requires diligence in the making, and then when it is made, can have nothing, no syllable taken from it, nor added to it"—a shift in structural conception that moved poetics toward the compositional principles that Goethe later associated with the "natural form" of the lyric. While lyric still functioned more as an idea than as a genre in the 17th c., ideas later to be associated with the lyric were already doing some of the work of genre in the period. That work was crystallized in two landmark publications by Nicolas Boileau that appeared together in 1674: a trans. of Longinus's Peri hypsous (On the Sublime) and the long poem L'Art poétique.

The neoclassicism of Boileau had an expanding influence on ideas about poetry at the end of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th cs. (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS). Although the term lyric does not appear in On the Sublime, the rendering of the only surviving version of Sappho's fragment 31 in the text of Longinus made an influential argument for an emerging concept of a more organic poetic form in the latter part of the 17th c. After the final lines of the fragment, which Anne Carson has recently translated as > . . . tongue breaks, and thin > fire is racing under skin > and in eyes no sight and drumming > fills ears

>
> and cold sweat holds me and shaking > grips me all, greener than grass
> I am and dead—or almost
> I seem to me.
>
> (Eros, the Bittersweet, 1998)

Longinus turns to his reader to ask, "Are you not amazed, how at one and the same moment [Sappho] seeks out soul, body, hearing, tongue, sight, complexion as if they had all left her and were external, and how in contradiction she both freezes and burns, is irrational and sane, is afraid and nearly dead, so that we observe in her not one single emotion but a concourse of emotions? . . . [I]t is her selection of the most important details and her combination of them into a single whole that have produced the excellence of the poem" (Campbell). As Prins has argued, Longinus turns Sappho into a lyric ideal by conflating "poet and poem: in his reading, Sappho is simultaneously losing composure and composing herself, falling apart in the poem and coming together as a poem that seems to speak, with heightened eloquence, to the reader." In part because of the circulation of Boileau's trans., the personified poetic force that Longinus attributed to fragment 31 established the *sublime as a conceptual bridge from the late baroque and mannerism through neoclassicism to *romanticism. The rage for Longinus not only enhanced and furthered Horace's idealization of Sappho's lyricism but pushed it in a new direction. In Boileau's trans., the identification between Sappho and her poem represents a further step in the devel. of an idea of the lyric as a genre of personal *expression. Boileau's neoclassicism was also expressed in an Art of Poetry to rival Horace's, in which he repeats the Horatian formula with the added instruction that poetry be "solide" (sound), or governed by reasonable principles:

> Qu'en savantes leçons votre muse fertile
> Partout joigne au plaisant le solide et l'utile.
> Un lecteur sage fuit un vain amusement
> Et veut mettre à profit son divertissement.
>
> (In prudent lessons everywhere abound,
> With pleasant join the useful and the sound;
> A sober reader a vain tale will slight,
> He seeks as well instruction as delight.)
>
> (4.86–89)

In Dryden's trans. as in Boileau's *alexandrines, the emphasis on the "lecteur sage" or "sober reader" speaks volumes. By insisting on the centrality of reason in the composition and consumption of poetry, Boileau resisted the 16th- and 17th-c. momentum toward making a passionate and personal lyrical idea into a mod. genre. Instead, his poetic lesson emphasized the *eclogue, the elegy, the ode, *tragedy, *comedy, *heroic verse, and epic as genres that could appeal to the decorous reader at the same time that they might prove the dictum that "Un beau désordre est un effet de l'art" (A beautiful disorder is an effect of art, 2.72). This is to say that, while the trans. of Longinus helped to further an ideal of personal lyricism, L'art poétique made lyricism not a genre but an intentional effect of defined verse genres that were to follow reasonable protocols rather than be swept up in flights of personal expression.

Indeed, the new neoclassical emphasis on generic *decorum led the young Alexander Pope to publish an anonymous adaptation of Boileau's treatise in his versified Essay on Criticism (1711). Following Boileau, Pope attributed reasonable critical *taste in verse genres to the principles of nature:

> First follow Nature, and your Judgment frame
> By her just Standard, which is still the same:
> Unerring Nature, still divinely bright,
> One clear, unchang'd and Universal Light,
> Life, Force, and Beauty, must to all impart,
> At once the Source, and End, and Test of Art.

It is often assumed that Pope and his Eur. contemporaries followed neoclassical prescriptions about the hierarchy of genres at the expense of the lyric, making much of the 18th c. into a nadir for lyric (excepting local trads. of *landscape, satiric, and discursive poetry) that would be redeemed only by romanticism. What Longinus meant by natural form was not what Pope and early 18th-c. poets meant by "Unerring Nature," a reasonable principle that dictated sharp distinctions among verse genres with specific social functions. The 18th-c. emphasis on "natural" social relations rather than on the transcendence of form has seemed in retrospect a marginalization or repression of the lyric. As Siskin has written (1994) with reference to England, if we think that the lyric flourished before and was repressed by the early 18th c., then "the history that results is that strange and developmental tale in which, after decades of dry reason, late 18th-c. Englishmen finally got in touch with their feelings" and revived the personal lyric as a vehicle of literary expression. One problem with that strange tale is that it supposes that, by the 18th c., the lyric had become a recognized poetic genre that could be marginalized by more decorous neoclassical verse genres. But the lyric was just emerging as a complex kind of verse, part idea and part genre, by the beginning of the century. What happened at different rates over the course of the 18th c. was that the archaic idea of poetic lyricism was pushed further away from the "just Standard" of genre, since that idea had begun to threaten to blur the lines between one category of verse and another.

In fact, it might be said that, rather than disappearing, the idea of lyric in Eng. and some other lits. had a lively career in the 18th c. precisely as a counterpoint to the hierarchy of verse genres. As Joseph Trapp wrote in his Lectures on Poetry Read in the Schools of Natural Philosophy at Oxford in the same year that Pope's Essay on Criticism circulated (1711), "As to the Nature of the Lyric Poem, it is, of all Kinds of Poetry, the most poetical; and is as distinct, both in Style, and Thought, from the rest, as Poetry in general is from Prose." On this view, the lyric became a genre that could transcend genre, both an alternative to and the realization of "all Kinds of Poetry." The kind of poetry most closely allied with this transcendent lyric ideal in the 18th c. was the ode, a term Trapp (like most critics in the period) uses interchangeably with lyric and a genre associated since the 17th c. with ancient lyricism. Abrams actually suggested in 1953 that "the soaring fortunes of the lyric may be dated to 1651, the year that Cowley's Pindaric 'imitations' burst over the literary horizon and inaugurated the immense vogue of the 'greater Ode' in England." By the middle of the century, the popularity of mod. versions of the ode (particularly those by William Collins and Thomas Gray) prompted Samuel Johnson to complain that the poets of odes modeled themselves on a primitive form of poetry written when the imagination was "vehement and rapid" and before science had been sufficiently developed to accustom the mind to close inspection and control: "From this accidental peculiarity of ancient writers, the criticks deduce the rules of lyrick poetry, which they have set free from all the laws by which other compositions are confined, and allow to neglect the niceties of transition, to start into remote digressions, and to wander without restraint from one scene of imagery to another" (Rambler, no. 158 September 21, 1751). Trapp had actually also suggested that Pindar "and the rest of the Grecians, receiv'd their Learning from the Nations of the East, the Jews and Phoenicians," thus not only granting the ode a transcendent lyricism but making it a transcendent vehicle of the hist. of civilization. Johnson turns that turn against itself in his complaint about the lyric's primitivism, but the notion that odes or lyrics (the terms were used practically as synonyms) were themselves vehicles of the hist. of culture would be influential for centuries to come. And perhaps the most important aspect of this turn is the symbiotic relationship between lyricism and crit.: "the criticks deduce the rules of lyrick poetry," according to Johnson, by not playing by the rules. At the same time, only a critic could understand the hist., significance, and value of that critical transgression—whether that critic valued it as did Trapp or disparaged it as did Johnson. As Siskin has written (1988), "from very early on, the English lyric has mixed with the critical, both in terms of poems being mixed with critical writing and in terms of the incorporation within those poems of critical features." But we could go further: since lyric had been an idea hovering over, among, and beneath various ideas of poetry for centuries, it rose in importance with the rise in importance of professional lit. crit. in the 18th c. Since all along the lyric had been more idea than genre, and in modernity became an idea that could transcend genre ("as distinct . . . from the rest, as Poetry is from Prose"), the idea of the lyric needed critics to understand and further it, and critics needed the slippery idea of the lyric as a field for debate.

Thus, the rise of the lyric as a mod. poetic ideal in the 18th c. went hand in hand with the lyricization of the ode and a shift in critical ideas of genre. As late as 1795, the Encyclopaedia Britannica defined lyric poetry by dividing it into three kinds: the Sublime ode, the Lesser ode, and the Song. Odes and songs were genres associated with specific social functions and occasions; lyric was an adjective that described an idea associated with those genres. Just as the sonnet was the representative genre aligned with lyric in the 16th c., and sonnets, odes, and songs were considered lyrical in the 17th c., throughout the 18th c. odes (greater and lesser, sublime or merely beautiful) and songs (set to music or as texts) were often the genres associated with an idea of lyric. Toward the end of the century, a tendency to divide lit. (itself a new category) into three distinct categories attached to large critical conceptions of generic functions rather than tied to a wide variety of actual social (or "natural") uses emerged, and these categories began to compete with the cultural work of particular genres. Although such critical division was an invention of the 18th and 19th cs., it claimed ancient origins, and later critics tend to forget that the late 18th c.'s move toward broad generic claims was not actually faithful to Aristotle or Plato or Horace or even to literary critics of early modernity (Genette). Instead, late 18th-c. poetics answered to a post-Enlightenment interest in systematic knowledge production that governed the emergence of the disciplines of natural science and economics (Poovey) and, thus, to a need to make the mobile lyric ideal into a defined genre with its own identifiable and exchangeable features and rules. So Johann A. Schlegel noted in Einschränkung der schönen Künste auf einen einzigen Grundsatz (1751) that a division of literary works into "lyric, epic, and drama" would correspond to the "subjective, subjective-objective, and objective" forms of representation, and Friedrich Hölderlin wrote in Sämtliche Werke (1790) that "in the tragic lies the completion of the epic, in the lyric the completion of the tragic, in the epic the completion of the lyric." In a note to the West-östlicher Divan (1819), Goethe went further in proposing what would be an enormously influential rethinking not only of the lyric but of the system of genres that made the lyric into a new third party to a way of thinking about lit.:

> One can combine these three elements [lyric, epic, dramatic] and get infinite variations on the poetic genres; that is why it is so hard to find an order by which to classify them side by side or in succession. One can, however, extricate oneself from the difficulty by setting the three main elements on a circle, equidistant from one another, and seeking exemplary works in which each element predominates separately. Then one can assemble examples that tend in one direction or the other, until finally the three come together and the circle is completely closed.

This division into a tripartite literary system in which the parts could work dialectically to form a coherent whole that corresponded to the whole of human comprehension ("subjective, subjective-objective, objective") or the entirety of literary possibility (when "the circle is completely closed") profoundly altered the literary critical function of literary genres and radically changed the understanding of lyric. When lyric shifted from its earlier uses as nostalgic adjective or transcendent idea to become part of a generic system, the hist. of poetic genres was, in turn, revised and rewritten.

In the 19th c., the new understanding of genre as hermeneutic rather than taxonomic generated large claims for the lyric as a vehicle of personal expression, but the theoretical social relations of self and other had not yet eclipsed the actual social relations in which verse was exchanged. The lyric was gradually transformed from an idea attached to various verse genres into an aesthetic ideal that eclipsed or embraced other verse genres, but the process was uneven. When Wordsworth and Coleridge called their 1798 collection of poems Lyrical Ballads, they nicely captured both sides of the coin of the "lyrical" currency in their era. "It is the honourable characteristic of Poetry," the Advertisement to the book begins, > that its materials are to be found in every subject which can interest the human mind. The evidence of this fact is to be sought, not in the writings of Critics, but in those of Poets themselves.

>
> The majority of the following poems are to be considered as experiments. They were written chiefly with a view to ascertain how far the language of conversation in the middle and lower classes of society is adapted to the purposes of poetic pleasure.

These distinctions between poets and critics and between "the language of conversation" and "poetic pleasure" speak to the direction of poetic discourse at the turn of the 19th c. On one hand, poetry is everywhere, but, on the other, it is imperative to distinguish between critical ideas about poetry and the practice of poets. On one hand, the poems this prose introduced "are to be considered experiments," not verse for particular occasions in particular genres; but, on the other, they borrow the lang. of the common people (who did exchange many particular genres on particular occasions) in order to make uncommon forms of "poetic pleasure." The Lyrical in the volume's title indicates the attempt to have poetics both ways—both aestheticized and common, both practical and theoretical. By 1798, then, lyric was coming to mean both the abstract genre that complemented the dramatic and the epic (i.e., the property of critics) and the essential poetry of the people (i.e., the original and expressive). The attempt in Lyrical Ballads to make both ways of understanding lyric work together was an index of how difficult it was to think about the lyric in both these ways at once.

As Abrams pointed out, that projection of "the lyric as poetic norm"—as the primary category for all poetry—began much earlier than Wordsworth's and Coleridge's "experiments," in the mid-18th-c. lyricization of the ode and the association of lyric with the primitive origins of civilization. According to Abrams, the 1772 publication of William Jones's Poems Consisting Chiefly of Translations from the Asiatick Languages, to which Are Added Two Essays I) On the Poetry of the Eastern Nations, and II) Essay on the Arts Called Imitative "deliberately set out to revise the bases of the neo-classic theory of poetry" and poetic genres. Jones did this, Abrams suggests, by weaving together "ideas drawn from Longinus, the old doctrine of poetic inspiration, recent theories of the emotional and imaginative origin of poetry, and a major emphasis on the lyric form and on the supposedly primitive and spontaneous poetry of Oriental nations." What the "Asiatick" primitive and spontaneous lyric shows, according to Jones, is that Aristotle was wrong: "poetry is not produced by imitation, but by a very different principle; which must be sought for in the deepest recesses of the human mind." Thus, well before Lyrical Ballads was published, the association of the lyric with an expressive theory of culture complemented its abstraction in the new mod. system of genres. This is why the folk *"ballads" that were actually exchanged by all kinds of people for all kinds of reasons could be rendered "lyrical" when they ceased to be ballads and became "experiments." And this is why the 19th c. was the period in which the lyric became a transcendent genre by remaining an idea that could blur the differences among specific verse genres that were actually very much in use in the same period. This is also why there was not one kind of poem in the romantic period that could be definitively named the romantic lyric; instead, there was still a wide range of verse genres in popular circulation that were beginning to be theorized as lyric at the same time that romantic poets were mixing popular genres (ballads and hymns, odes and songs, epistles and elegies) under the sign of the lyric.

Thus, rather than consolidating a sense of poetry as lyric, the 19th-c. definition of the lyric was deeply confused—though this state of confusion guaranteed a long and productive life for the lyric in both practical use and literary critical hist. In the first decades of the 19th c., Hegel famously elevated the lyric to the summit of his Aesthetics, since, in the spirit of his age, he understood the lyric as at once the least material and the most completely expressive art. But Hegel also cast the lyric as the most difficult of mod. genres, since in it the poet must become "the centre which holds the whole lyric work of art together"; and in order to do so, he must achieve a "specific mood" and "must identify himself with this particularization of himself as with himself, so that in it he feels and envisages himself." The point of such repetitive assertions for Hegel was that what was at stake in the lyric was no less than the achievement of subjectivity: "In this way alone does [the poet] then become a self-bounded subjective entity" (Totalität). That attainment of subjective wholeness would represent not only perfect expression but the dialectical accomplishment of historical progress, since, in his expression, the poet moves us all forward toward enlightenment. This idealist version of the lyric had the advantage of bringing together both sides of the contemporaneous ideology of lyric as aesthetic form and lyric as culturally expressive potential. Yet it resolved the potential conflict between those two ways of understanding lyricism by pushing the lyric ideal that much further away from the practice of actual poets, toward a utopian horizon.

The notion that the lyric was an ideal poetic form that no poet had yet achieved actually proved a generative model for poetics in the 19th c. In "Thoughts on Poetry and Its Varieties" (1833), Mill proclaimed that "lyric poetry, as it was the earliest kind, is also . . . more imminently and peculiarly poetry than any other: it is the poetry most natural to a really poetic temperament, and least capable of being successfully imitated by one not so endowed by nature." Here, Mill gathers the 18th-c. attribution of original or primal expression (already evident in Trapp and in Jones's antimimetic argument about "Asiatick" lyric) into the 19th-c. idealization of the lyric as subjective representation. Yet according to Mill, not even Wordsworth and P. B. Shelley, "the two English authors of our own day who have produced the greatest quantity of true and enduring poetry," could actually write lyric poetry that partook of both these qualities at once. While great, Mill laments that "the genius of Wordsworth is essentially unlyrical," and Shelley "is the reverse" in the sense that he had immense lyrical gifts but "had not, at the period of his deplorably early death, reached sufficiently far that intellectual progression of which he was capable." If for Hegel the ideal lyric poet would move civilization forward in his perfect self-expression, for Mill the ideal lyric poet would have to do two things no one had yet perfectly done: be the representative of both original nature and acquired culture. In "The Poet" (1844), R. W. Emerson echoed Mill's and Hegel's impossibly ideal characterizations of the lyric poet, casting that ideal as culturally democratic and Am., and lamenting that "I look in vain for the poet I describe." A young Walt Whitman was in the audience when Emerson gave his lecture in Brooklyn, and several years later claimed to be the poet of "lyric utterances" Emerson and Mill and Hegel and America had been looking for. To call the heroic poet of 19th-c. philosophy and Whitman's bravado lyric is to stretch the term very far indeed, but that is what happened to the definition of lyric in the second half of the 19th c. In the world of ideas, the lyric became "more imminently and peculiarly poetry than any other" verse genre, indeed, so much so that lyric and poetry began to be synonymous terms.

While the lyricization of all verse genres meant the creation of a lyric ideal in lit. crit., in the 19th-c. culture of mass print, lyric became a synonym for poetry in another sense by becoming a default term for short poems, a practical name for verse that did not obey the protocols of neoclassical genres such as the Pindaric ode or conform to the popular standards of ballads or hymns. While both neoclassical and popular genres persisted within the new print lyric, as Rowlinson has remarked, in the 19th c. "lyric appears as a genre newly totalized in print." In the titles of popular poetry volumes, lyric became the name for a generic alternative, as in Lays and Lyrics by Charles Gray (1841) or Legends and Lyrics by Adelaide Proctor (1863). These print uses of lyric shifted the sense of Lyrical Ballads (1798) or even of Alfred, Lord Tennyson's Poems, Chiefly Lyrical (1830) toward a simple noun that readers came to recognize. Both the expansion of lyric to describe all poetry in its ideal state and the shrinking of the term to fit print conventions and popular taste irked Poe, a writer always early to sense shifts or conflicts in the hist. of ideas. Before Whitman's "lyric utterances" stretched poetry beyond form, Poe declared in "The Philosophy of Composition" (1846) that "what we term a long poem is, in fact, merely a succession of brief ones," since "a poem is such, only inasmuch as it intensely excites, by elevating, the soul; and all intense excitements are, through a psychal necessity, brief." Poe's emphasis on an affective definition of form reached back to Longinus and echoed Coleridge, but it also proved influential for later 19th-c. theories of lyricism. To define the lyric not as the perfection of subjective representation or as primal cultural expression but as momentary sensation again made the lyric a mobile concept, adaptable to various kinds of poetry.

In practice, while there were all sorts of poems labeled lyrics in print and many gestures toward the lyricism associated with musical performance, there were also all sorts of self-conscious departures from "the lyric" in the poetry of the second half of the 19th c.—so much so that there were few poems critics would call purely lyric. Tucker has suggested that Robert Browning's dramatic *monologues have become models of what we now think of as lyric, since they represent fictional speakers, but he also suggests that the dramatic monologues "began as a dramatic response to lyric isolationism." Almost as soon as an ideal of personal lyric expression emerged in the 19th c., then, it was honored more often in the exception than as a rule.

By the end of the 19th c., the tendency to work variations on lyric in relation to social complexity moved toward an idea of lyric as a refuge from mod. life. In 1899, writing about the Fr. poets he called The Symbolist Movement in Literature, Arthur Symons asserted that "after the world has starved the soul long enough in the contemplation of the rearrangement of material things, comes the turn of the soul" to the lyric (see SYMBOLISM). In the early 1890s, the first eds. of Emily Dickinson's poems produced an unexpected publishing sensation, since the poetry characterized in the first volume as "something produced absolutely without the thought of publication, and solely by expression of the writer's own mind" became a model of lyric expression protected from what one review called "the mass of popular print." After having been idealized in the first half of the 19th c. and reinvented in the second half, the lyric at the end of the century began to be set against a culture increasingly viewed as decadent. That shift did not mean that the idea of the lyric lost its legacy as a vehicle of cultural transmission, but it did mean that the vehicle changed character. E.g., in 1896, when Paul Laurence Dunbar's Lyrics of Lowly Life was published in a fancy print ed., lyrics could represent an innocent version of black culture removed from the realities of the turn into the 20th c. If Dickinson became a lyric representative by being isolated from the public in which her lyrics would circulate, Dunbar became another representative by personifying a culture imagined as less mod. than America in the last decade of the 19th c.

In the 20th c., Walter Benjamin famously suggested that, in the previous century, "Baudelaire envisaged readers to whom the reading of lyric poetry would present difficulties" ("On Some Motifs," 1939). According to Benjamin, "it is reasonable to assume that only in rare instances is lyric poetry in rapport with the experience of its readers." Benjamin's sense of the lyric in the 1930s was probably not Baudelaire's in the 1850s, but what is remarkable about Benjamin's characterization of Baudelaire's relation to his century's lyricism is his focus on the distance between modernity and the lyric. Those theories continued to reverse early 19th-c. idealizations of the lyric: rather than positioning the poet as the hero of the future, mod. theories of the lyric tended to further imagine it as a lost ideal, a kind of poetry rendered obsolete by recent hist. One early notable exception to this trend was the Am. theorist of poetics F. B. Gummere, who suggested in The Beginnings of Poetry (1901) that mod. lyric poets create "an imagined community" that replaces the loss of a true communal poetry in modernity. In a response to Benjamin's characterization of a mod. community out of sync with the tenor of lyric poetry, Theodor Adorno (in "Lyric Poetry and Society," originally pub. 1957, trans. into Eng. 1974) unwittingly echoed Gummere by proposing that "the universality of the lyric's substance . . . is social in nature" and suggested that since "the lyric work is always the subjective expression of a social antagonism," mod. poetry is in accord with the experience of its readers. Far from being distanced from mod. life, for Adorno the difficulties of mod. poetry could themselves be understood to represent the condition of alienation of mod. life. Gummere's, Benjamin's, and Adorno's definitions of the lyric were all essentially Hegelian, but the ways in which the lyric circulated in the 20th c. were more influenced by the messier hists. of mass print and verse experiment that had intervened since the early 19th c. than by such utopian ideas.

In the first decades of the 20th c., as in the previous century when lyric became an umbrella term for many different kinds of poetry, there was not one verse genre one could call the modern lyric; rather, there were various verse experiments in what later 20th-c. crit. increasingly cast as the alienation of the mod. lyric subject. Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot, Robert Frost, W. C. Williams, and Wallace Stevens all wrote short poems we now call lyric, though they tended not to use that description of their work. As Eliot wrote in "The Three Voices of Poetry" (1957),

> The term "lyric" itself is unsatisfactory. We think first of verse intended to be sung . . . But we apply it also to poetry that was never intended for a musical setting, or which we dissociate from its music . . The very definition of "lyric," in the Oxford Dictionary, indicates that the word cannot be satisfactorily defined: "Lyric: Now the name for short poems, usually divided into stanzas or strophes, and directly expressing the poet's own thoughts and sentiments."
>
> How short does a poem have to be, to be called a "lyric"? The emphasis on brevity, and the suggestion of division into stanzas, seem residual from the association of the voice with music. But there is no necessary relation between brevity and the expression of the poet's own thoughts and feelings.

Eliot goes on to define lyric in Mill's terms, as "the voice of the poet talking to himself," but his impatience with older definitions signals another shift in the mod. sense of the term, from Mill's impossible ideal of lyricism to the normal condition of each individual's fractured private thoughts. That shift was influential for the mid-century "confessional" poets (see CONFESSIONAL POETRY), who might be thought of as pure lyric poets in Eliot's sense; but, again, by that point in the century, the term lyric had become very broad, as it began to be used to describe all first-person poetry.

If, in the first part of the 20th c., the notion of the lyric was still in flux, how did it become such a normative term by the middle of the century? In the hist. we have traced here, the idea of lyric began to do the work of a genre as early as the late 16th c., but it took 400 years before the lyric became synonymous with one poetic genre—or rather, 400 years before poetry was thought of as one lyricized genre. As the idea of genre itself changed in the 18th c., that shift advanced dramatically, but the discourses of poets and critics were not fully aligned in the 19th c., and the lyricization of poetry proceeded by fits and starts. It was only in the consolidation of 20th-c. lit. crit. that the process of lyricization was accomplished, and a broad idea of the lyric became exemplary for the reading of all poetry. That example emerged from and was reflected in the predominance of the *New Criticism, which took up a model of the personal lyric close to Eliot's as the object of literary *close reading. In different ways, Am. critics such as Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren in the late 1930s, W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley in the 1940s, and Reuben Brower in the 1950s assumed Eliot's definition of the personal lyric and used I. A. Richards's focus on individual poems in his "practical criticism" to forge a model of all poems as essentially lyric. That model was primarily pedagogical, but it became a way of reading that, in turn, influenced the way poems were written, and it remains the normative model for the production and reception of most poetry. Perhaps the most influential contemp. representative of this influential way of reading is Helen Vendler, who strongly advocates a definition of lyric as the personal expression of a fictional speaker, as "the genre that directs its mimesis toward the performance of the mind in solitary speech" (1997). Vendler believes that this "solitary" model of the lyric should be used to read all poetic genres at all moments in hist.

That model, while still assumed in much teaching of poetry, has since given way to poststructuralist critiques of lyric reading such as that of Paul de Man (like Vendler, a student of Brower, the New Critic who coined the phrase close reading), and to *postmodernism and *avant-garde poetics. When de Man wrote in "Anthropomorphism and Trope" in the late 20th c. that "the lyric is not a genre, but one name among several to designate the defensive motion of the understanding, the possibility of a future hermeneutics," he raised the question of how the lyric had become a matter of *interpretation, a way of reading. The hist. of the lyric is the hist. of the ways an idea has become a genre and the ways in which that genre has been manipulated by poets and critics alike. As in earlier centuries, the late 20th-c. reaction to the elevation of the lyric as a mode of professional reading (what Poovey has called "the lyricization of literary criticism") became a reaction-formation for and against a version of the lyric that could exist only in theory. In the 21st c., that purely theoretical sense of all postromantic personal poems as consistently lyric has prompted a critical and poetic turn away from a version of lit. hist. now retrospectively cast as consistent. In his intro. to the Ubuweb Anthology of Conceptual Writing (http://www.ubu.com/concept/), e.g., the poet and critic Craig Dworkin begins, > Poetry expresses the emotional truth of the self. A craft honed by especially sensitive individuals, it puts metaphor and image in the service of song.

>
> Or at least that's the story we've inherited from Romanticism, handed down for over 200 years in a caricatured and mummified ethos—and as if it still made sense after two centuries of radical social change. . . . But what would a non-expressive poetry look like?

As we have seen, the story of the lyric has hardly been "caricatured and mummified" during its long hist., nor has the hist. of the lyric precluded many "non-expressive" elements in poetry—not even, or perhaps not esp., for the last 200 years. Instead, the story of the lyric charts the hist. of poetics. The lesson of that hist. is that lyric has not always named the same thing, but neither has one kind of poem simply changed its name many times over the course of the many centuries the term has been in use. As of this writing, there is still an active debate in lit. crit. over the definition of the lyric. Culler has recently suggested that we try to "prevent a certain narrowing of conception of the lyric and a tendency, understandable given the realities of literary education today, to treat lyric on the model of narrative, so that the dramatic monologue becomes the model of all lyric." Instead, he urges that we retain a transhistorical definition of the lyric because "thinking of lyric as transnational and broadly historical opens up critical possibilities," particularly the possibility of comparative lit. crit. Both Dworkin and Culler tell only partial accounts of lyric as a concept. A sense of either "a caricatured and mummified ethos" or of historical and cultural continuity will not render the intricate turns in the hist. of the lyric or of ideas associated with lyric. When that hist. becomes visible behind or beneath critical and poetic fictions, it testifies to the tremendous malleability of the term, to the ways in which the lyric persists as an idea of poetry fixed at points by lit. hist., often frozen by lit. crit., but as subject to change as the definition of poetry itself.

See POEM, POETRY.

■ S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (1817); G. Saintsbury, Seventeenth-Century Lyrics (1892); K. Burke, "On Musicality in Verse," The Philosophy of Literary Form (1941); Brooks; Abrams, "The Lyric as Poetic Norm"; Frye; C. Guillén, Literature as System (1971); M. Foucault, The Archaeology of Knowledge [1969], trans. A. M. Sheridan Smith (1972); H. Gardner, The Metaphysical Poets (1972); W. Benjamin, Charles Baudelaire, trans. H. Zohn (1973); H. Friedrich, The Structure of Modern Poetry, trans. J. Neugroschel (1974); A. Welsh, Roots of Lyric (1978); S. Cameron, Lyric Time: Dickinson and the Limits of Genre (1979); J. Culler, "Apostrophe," The Pursuit of Signs (1981); A. Fowler, Kinds of Literature (1982); D. A. Campbell, Greek Lyric, Volume I: Sappho and Alcaeus (1982); W. R. Johnson, The Idea of Lyric (1982); G. Most, "Greek Lyric Poets," Ancient Writers: Greece and Rome (1982); P. de Man, The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984); Hollander; Lyric Poetry: Beyond New Criticism, ed. C. Hošek and P. Parker (1985)—esp. H. Tucker, "Dramatic Monologue and the Overhearing of Lyric," and J. Culler, "Changes in the Study of the Lyric"; J. Fineman, Shakespeare's Perjured Eye (1986); J. Culler, "The Modern Lyric: Generic Continuity and Critical Practice," Comparative Perspective on Literature, ed. C. Koelb and S. Noakes (1988); C. Siskin, The Historicity of Romantic Discourse (1988); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991)—esp. the intro.; G. Genette, The Architext, trans. J. E. Lewin (1992); A. Grossman, "Summa Lyrica," The Sighted Singer (1992); P. Zumthor, Toward a Medieval Poetics, trans. P. Bennett (1992); C. Siskin, "The Lyric Mix: Romanticism, Genre, and the Fate of Literature," Wordsworth Circle 25 (1994); A. Marotti, Manuscript, Print, and the English Renaissance Lyric (1995); M. Perloff, Wittgenstein's Ladder: Poetic Language and the Strangeness of the Ordinary (1996); H. Vendler, The Art of Shakespeare's Sonnets (1997); R. Greene, "The Lyric," CHLC v. 3, ed. G. P. Norton (1999); Y. Prins, Victorian Sappho (1999); "The System of Genres in Troubadour Lyric," Medieval Lyric, ed. W. D. Paden (2000); M. Poovey, "The Model System of Contemporary Literary Criticism," CritI 27 (2001); M. Rowlinson, "Lyric," A Companion to Victorian Poetry, ed. R. Cronin, A. Chapman, H. A. Harrison (2002); S. Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002); H. Vendler, Poets Thinking: Pope, Whitman, Dickinson, Yeats (2004); V. Jackson, Dickinson's Misery: A Theory of Lyric Reading (2005); H. Vendler, Invisible Listeners: Lyric Intimacy in Herbert, Whitman, and Ashbery (2005); M. Blasing, Lyric Poetry (2007); J. Culler, "Why Lyric?" PMLA 123 (2008); H. Dubrow, The Challenges of Orpheus (2008); R. von Hallberg, Lyric Powers (2008); R. Terada, "After the Critique of Lyric," PMLA 123 (2008); F. Budelmann, "Introducing Greek Lyric," Cambridge Companion to Greek Lyric (2009); M. Lowrie, "Lyric," Oxford Encyclopedia of Ancient Greece and Rome, ed. M. Gargarin and E. Fantham (2010); J. Culler, "Genre: Lyric," Genre: Collected Essays from the English Institute, ed. R. Warhol (2011).

V. JACKSON

LYRIC SEQUENCE. A collocation of lyrics, the lyric sequence is generally thought to have gained its vernacular identity in the Ren. and after from Petrarch (1304–74), who wrote and arranged his sequence called Rime sparse (Scattered Rhymes) or, alternatively, Canzoniere (Songbook) over 40 years. Both titles ironically point away from the rigorous ordering of Petrarch's 366 amatory and devotional lyrics, which manifests several patterns at once (formal, fictional, calendrical) to establish a continuum—or discontinuum, considering the newfound structural importance of the white space between the lyrics—that greatly exceeds the unities of earlier lyric collections. Petrarch's diverse models included the book of Psalms; the lyric volumes of Catullus, Propertius, and other Augustan poets; Dante's prosimetric Vita nuova (ca. 1292–93) and his short sequence Rime petrose (ca. 1296); and the 13th-c. chansonniers of the Occitan *troubadours.

For two centuries after Petrarch's death, the possibilities opened by the lyric sequence—to write lyric in extenso, allowing each poetic integer to hold its autonomy as it participates in a larger unity—attracted the efforts of poets in all the countries of Europe; Wilkins lists most of these, an astonishing array. The lyric sequence effectively became to *lyric what tragedy was to drama or what the novel would be to narrative—not merely a "form" but a complex of generic capacities. Some particularly interesting lyric sequences are written at the margins or in the hiatuses of the convention: the 24-*sonnet sequence (1555) by the Fr. poet Louise Labé dissents from the sexual politics of *Petrarchism; the Italians Giovanni Salvatorino and Girolamo Malipiero, believing Petarch's speaker insufficiently Christian, adapt the forms and much of the lang. of the Rime sparse to purely devotional experience in their respective works Thesoro de sacra scrittura

(ca. 1540) and Il Petrarca spirituale (1536); and, near the end of the century, after most Eur. cultures had temporarily exhausted the sequence, a generation of Eng. sonneteers between Thomas Watson's Hekatompathia (1582) and Michael Drayton's Idea (1600) undertook a frenzy of experimentation, refinement, and superstitious imitation of Petrarch (see SONNET). While a number of poets essentially non-Petrarchan in topics and ideology are attracted by the lyric sequence (e.g., George Gascoigne, the first to use the term sequence in Eng., in Alexander Nevile [1575], and Ben Jonson in The Forrest [1616]), nearly every sequence in this period interprets some aspect of Petrarch's rich achievement. Even such monuments of their vernaculars as Pierre de Ronsard's Sonnets pour Hélène (1578, enl. 1584), Luís de Camões's Rimas (pub. posthumously 1595, though written as early as the 1540s), and Shakespeare's sonnets (ca. 1593–99, pub. 1609) are, in the first analysis, responses to the Rime sparse as a compendium of organizational strategies—formal, characterological, devotional, political, speculative.

The principal trend in the 17th-c. lyric sequence develops its religious dimensions. Virtuoso events include Jean de La Ceppède's Théorèmes (1613, 1622), George Herbert's The Temple (1633), and John Donne's Holy Sonnets, incl. "La Corona," a seven-unit crown of sonnets (1633; see CORONA). The first major North Am. lyric sequence, Edward Taylor's Preparatory Meditations (written 1682–1725), arrives near the end of this line. The 18th and 19th cs., perhaps because of an attenuation of the formal resources of Petrarchism, perhaps from ineluctable shifts in Eur. poetics and ideologies, produce little of compelling interest in the form of the lyric sequence itself (though much important poetry within the form). The romantics composed numerous lyric sequences, but the unities of these works are generally looser than those of earlier specimens; one notices the tendency, as in Novalis and William Wordsworth, e.g., to announce a lyric sequence to be, in effect, a single poem, thus affirming the idea of its unity but waiving the actual tensions generated between strong integers and an equally strong unifying structure.

The most successful 19th-c. Eur. and Am. lyric sequences tend to be like Alfred, Lord Tennyson's In Memoriam (1850) in that they do not imitate Petrarch's outward forms and gestures but find contemp. analogues for his inventions—which perhaps inevitably means discarding the sonnet in favor of other constituents. Noteworthy and influential examples include Charles Baudelaire's Petites poèmes en prose (1869) and the hand-sewn fascicles of Emily Dickinson. While in earlier eds., Dickinson's lyrics were often arranged as suited the editor's fancy (i.e., in thematic groupings), work by scholars such as R. W. Franklin, Susan Howe, and Virginia Jackson has shed light on the sequential nature of Dickinson's poems and considered the relationships among poem, fascicle page, bound fascicle, and poetic oeuvre. Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass (1855 et seq.) is the most visionary of 19th-c. lyric sequences; his influence on the lyric sequence is virtually that of a New World Petrarch and has led to an extraordinary abundance of works in the mod. period, esp. in the U.S. and in Latin America. Whitman's legacy is particularly legible in Juan Ramón Jiménez's Diario de un poeta reciéncasado (1916), Pablo Neruda's Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada (1924), Hart Crane's The Bridge (1930), Federico García Lorca's Poeta en Nueva York (1930), Wallace Stevens's "Notes toward a Supreme Fiction" (1942), and Frank O'Hara's Lunch Poems (1964), among others.

Modernist upheavals included a reinvestment in the *long poem, creating certain challenges in attempting to distinguish between long poem and lyric sequence, but the term lyric sequence is most accurately applied to works that maintain a sense of tension between the unity or interrelation of the whole and the independent workings of each part. The term is particularly apt when individual integers in a sequence demonstrate some level of engagement with the lyric, be this understood as subject position, level of musicality, or aim toward brevity. Some, like Conte, have insisted on a further division between the lyric sequence and the postmod. poetic series, claiming for *"serial form" a deliberate absence of the arc, progress, or devel. they deem necessary for a lyric sequence and citing projects like Robert Duncan's Passages (1968–87) or Robert Creeley's Pieces (1968) as examples. Others, like Rosenthal and Gall, speak of "poetic sequence" rather than lyric sequence and include modernist epics such as Ezra Pound's Cantos and W. C. Williams's Paterson in this category.

Mod. and contemp. poets have invented a wide range of means of sustaining continuity throughout a sequence. Pablo Neruda's Veinte poemas explores *persona through the use of direct address and the creation of a distinct poetic voice, while John Berryman's 77 Dream Songs (1964) are held together by the character Henry, who both is and is not Berryman himself. O'Hara's Lunch Poems benefits from the conceit of the poems' spontaneous composition during his daily lunch breaks and his walks through Manhattan. The unity of Eugenio Montale's Ossi di Seppia (1925) derives from Montale's deep engagement with the Ligurian landscape, and that of Francis Ponge's Le parti pris des choses (1942) from sustained attention to commonplace objects. In The Sonnets (1964), Ted Berrigan breathes new life into the trad. of the sonnet sequence by combining surrealist techniques such as *collage and *aleatory procedures with epistolary address and fragmented narrative. Rosmarie Waldrop's *prose-poem sequence The Reproduction of Profiles (1987) derives unity from the syntactic patterning of Waldrop's intertextual engagement with Ludwig Wittgenstein, while the skillful use of repetition, the autobiographical tone, and the formal *constraint of a set number of poems with a set number of sentences make Lyn Hejinian's My Life (1980–87) an exemplary postmod. lyric sequence.

See ANTHOLOGY, CANZONIERE, RENGA.

■ E. H. Wilkins, "A General Survey of Renaissance Petrarchism," Studies in the Life and Works of Petrarch (1955); C. T. Neely, "The Structure of Renaissance Sonnet Sequences," ELH 45 (1977)—limited to Eng.; Arethusa 13 (1980)—five essays and bibl. on the Au-gustan volumes; M. L. Rosenthal and S. M. Gall, The Modern Poetic Sequence (1983); H. Vendler, The Odes of John Keats (1983)—the odes as a lyric sequence; N. Fraistat, The Poem and the Book (1985); Poems in Their Place, ed. N. Fraistat (1986)—on Eng. romantic collections; J. Freccero, "The Fig Tree and the Laurel," Literary Theory/Renaissance Texts, ed. P. Parker and D. Quint (1986); Hollier; T. P. Roche Jr., Petrarch and the English Sonnet Sequences (1989)—esp. on the religious elements of the early mod. sequence; J. M. Conte, Unending Design: The Forms of Postmodern Poetry (1991); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991); V. Jackson, Dickinson's Misery: A Theory of Lyric Reading (2005).

R. Greene; B. Tate

M

MACARONIC VERSE. Usually refers to the mixing of words, sometimes whole lines, of more than one lang. in a poem, most often for comic or satiric effect though sometimes (and more recently) with serious intent. Strictly speaking, a macaronic verse in its original sense entails not inserting foreign words but giving words of the poet's native tongue the inflectional endings of another lang. (Lat.), yielding a comic mock-Lat. When macaronic verse first appeared in earnest in the 12th c., vernacular (Fr.) phrases were interspersed in Lat. verses, but by far the more common practice has been the reverse, salting a poem in a vernacular lang. with Lat. or other foreign phrases (cf. abbreviations in scholarly prose and marginal glosses in med. mss., a practice to which macaronic verse may be related). Med. examples may be found in OF and It., are copious in MHG, and are more copious still in ME, though isolated earlier examples exist, notably the OE "Macaronic Poem." In Italy, the name of Tisi degli Odassi is associated with the earliest macaronics (Carmen maccaronicum, 1488), but Teofilo Folengo gave macaronic verse its renown through his famous mock epic Maccaroneae (1517–21); Folengo's anonymous Fr. translator in 1606 describes Folengo as the "prototype of Rabelais." According to Folengo, the name macaronic verse indicates a crude mixture—like that of flour, cheese, and butter in macaroni—and its burlesque appeal. The classic Fr. macaronic poet was Antoine de la Sablé; in Eng., some of John Skelton's verses are macaronic. But it was Ger. that maintained an affinity the longest for macaronic verse (Ger. Nudelverse) past the Middle Ages.

One of the rare examples of true macaronics in post-med. Eng. is the short 17th-c. *mock epic ascribed to William Drummond, Polemo-Middinia, in which Lat. terminations are skillfully tacked on to the Lowland Scots vernacular. Because it is multilingual and often plays on carryovers of both sound and sense from one lang. to another, macaronic poetry is most often a learned production, not a species of *nonsense verse; its comic element usually has a satiric edge. Its learned character has other import: in the ME examples, whole lines of Lat. are frequently inserted as quasi-refrains (see REFRAIN), and since the meter of both langs. often matches, macaronic poetry may have been an important vehicle for transporting the accentual rhythms of med. Lat. into Eng. Scholarly interest in the form revived in the early 19th c. (Morgan). In mod. times, both Ezra Pound (The Cantos) and T. S. Eliot (The Waste Land) have transformed the macaronic into a serious and important technique of poetic composition, allusion, and structure.

See XENOGLOSSIA.

■ F. W. Genthe, Geschichte der maccaronischen Poesie (1829); O. Delepierre, Macaronéana ou mélanges de littérature macaronique (1852); J. A. Morgan, Macaronic Poetry (1872); Die Floia und andere deutsche maccaronische Gedichte, ed. C. Blaümlein (1900); C. Sullivan, The Latin Insertions and the Macaronic Verse in "Piers Plowman" (1932); W. O. Wehrle, The Macaronic Hymn Tradition in Medieval English Literature (1933); U. E. Paoli, Il latino maccheronico (1959); B. Ristow, "Maccaronische Dichtung in Deutschland," Reallexikon II; L. Forster, The Poet's Tongues: Multilingualism in Literature (1970); P. S. Diehl, The Medieval European Religious Lyric (1985); T. Folengo, Macaronee minori, ed. M. Zaggia (1987); E. Archibald, "Tradition and Innovation in the Macaronic Poetry of Dunbar and Skelton," MLQ 53 (1992); S. Wenzel, Macaronic Sermons (1994); A. Sbraggia, Carlo Emilio Gadda and the Modern Macaronic (1996); M. Scalabrini, "The Peasant and the Monster in the Macaronic Works of Teofilo Folengo," MLN 123 (2008).

T.V.F. BROGAN; U. K. GOLDSMITH

MACEDONIAN POETRY. The hist. of poetry in what is now the Republic of Macedonia includes poetry composed in the Macedonian lang. and poetic trads. of other ling. groups. The focus here will be on poetry in Macedonian, with reference to other trads.

Macedonian poetry emerges from a rich heritage of folk song and folklore; the word pesna means both "poem" and "song." But the written trad. remained intermittent before the codification of standard Macedonian in 1945. Years of Turkish domination, followed by regional unrest and the partition of Macedonian territory in 1913, delayed the devel. of Macedonian as a literary lang. Publication in Macedonian was restricted or banned, and the lang. was dismissed as a dialect.

The lyric poem T'ga za jug (Longing for the South) by Konstantin Miladinov (1830–62), written in dialect and exploiting folk motifs, is recognized as foundational to mod. Macedonian poetry. Its impact is celebrated by its annual recitation at the opening of the acclaimed international festival, Struga Poetry Evenings.

The next major figure was Koĉo Racin (1908–43). Considered the father of mod. Macedonian poetry, Racin expanded his ling. resources by creating a supradialect; his cycle of poems Beli mugri (White Dawns), written in this medium, explores the fate of impoverished Macedonians. Other poets who published in Macedonian during this period include Venko Markovski (1915–88) and Kole Nedelkovski (1912–41). Macedonia's archives contain much poetry written in Macedonian during the interwar years by writers who were unable to publish their work.

The immediate postwar period saw three outstanding writers—Blaže Koneski (1921–93), Aco Šopov (1923–83), and Slavko Janevski (1920–2000)—shape the emerging lit. of standard Macedonian. These central figures enriched the formal and generic variety of Macedonian poetry, as they ranged from the socialist realism of Koneski's lyric poetry cycle Mostot (The Bridge) to folkloric *ballads, narrative poems, *sonnets, and intimate lyrics.

The so-called second-generation poets, incl. Gane Todorovski (1929–2010) and Mateja Matevski (b. 1929), wrote lyrics rich in metaphor and imagery. This group, together with younger contemporaries like Radovan Pavlovski (b. 1937), Ante Popovski (1931–2003), Vlada Uroševiḱ (b. 1934), and the internationally recognized Bogomil Gjuzel (b. 1939), devised new modes of expression enriched by contact with other poetic trads., notably Eur. *modernism.

The era of *postmodernism brought increased access to international currents. Katica Kulavkova (b. 1951) has written intimate and erotic poems pervaded by allusions to folklore, lit., and hist. Lidija Dimkovska (b. 1971) represents a new urbanism, employing lyric, narrative, and prose poetry to explore themes of science, technology, and cultural displacement. The haiku and haibun of Nikola Madzirov (b. 1972) and Vladimir Martinovski (b. 1974) have further expanded Macedonian poetry's formal repertoire.

Macedonia's multicultural, multiethnic society has produced acclaimed writers in Albanian, such as Salajdin Salihu (b. 1970) and Lindita Ahmeti (b. 1973); and Turkish, such as Ilhami Emin (1931), Fahri Ali (1948), and Meral Kain (b. 1976). Poetry in Romani and Aromanian is also published in Macedonia.

As this brief survey shows, Macedonian poets have participated in a wide array of literary movements, incl. *symbolism, modernism, and postmodernism. They have experimented with lang., refashioned conventional forms, and fused their rich religious and folkloric past with a variety of mod. and transnational themes.

■ Anthologies: Reading the Ashes: An Anthology of the Poetry of Modern Macedonia, ed. M. Holton and G. W. Reid (1977); Longing for the South/Contemporary Macedonian Poetry, ed. S. Mahapatra and J. T. Boškovski (1981); Contemporary Macedonian Poetry, ed. E. Osers (1991); The Song beyond Songs: Anthology of Contemporary Macedonian Poetry, ed. V. Andonovski (1997); The End of the Century: Macedonian Poetry in the Last Decade of the Twentieth Century, ed. D. Kocevski (1999); An Island on Land: Anthology of Contemporary Macedonian Poetry, ed. I. Čašule and T. Shapcott (1999); 20.mladi.m@k.poeti.00, ed. L. Dimkovska (2000); Unidentified Celestial Bosom: Anthology of Young Macedonian Poets, ed. T. Eternijan-Jovica and Z. Ancevski (2001); Makedonskata poezija vo svetot, ed. V. Smilevski (2002); Tisinata megu dva zbora: ars poetica: tematski izbor od sovremenata makedonska poezija, ed. K. Nikolovska and D. Ahmeti (2005); Ut pictura poesis: poezijata vo dijalog so likovnite umetnosti, ed. V. Martinovski, N. Vinca, and D. Ahmeti (2006); New European Poets, ed. W. Miller and K. Prufer (2008).

■ Criticism and History: B. Mikasinovich, D. Milivojević, M. Dragan, Introduction to Yugoslav Literature (1973); Dictionary of Literary Biography, v. 181: South Slavic Writers since World War II, ed. V. D. Mihailovich (1984); M. Szporer, "Postmodernist Yugoslav Poetry in Macedonia," World Literature Today 62 (1988); M. Drugovac, Istorija na makedonskata književnost XX vek (1990); Pregled na ponovata makedonska poezija, ed. T. Jovčevski (1996); Orpheus and Jesus: An Overview of Biblical Motifs in Contemporary Macedonian Poetry, ed. A. Popovski (2000); J. Koteska, Makedonsko žensko pismo: teorija, istorija i opis (2002); E. Šeleva, Otvoreno pismo studii za makedonskata literatura i kultura (2003); M. Gjurčinov, Nova makedonska književnost: 1945–1980 (2008); G. Stardelov, Osnovopoložnici na sovrementa makedonska poezija: Kočo Racin, Kole Nedelkovski, Venko Markovski, Slavko Janevski, Blaže Koneski, Aco Šopov, Gogo Ivanovski, ed. G. Stardelov (2008).

C. Kramer

MADRIGAL. A name given to an It. poetic and musical form in the 14th c. and to a different form in the 16th c. and later. The early madrigal, of which Petrarch's "Nova angeletta" (Canzoniere 106) is an example, consisted typically of two or three three-line stanzas with no set rhyme scheme followed by a couplet or ritornello*. The lines often comprised eleven syllables, sometimes seven. Musical settings used two or three voices, the lower of which may have been performed on an instrument. The same music was repeated for the stanzas, with different music for the ritornello.

In the 16th c., the musical madrigal used various kinds of poetic forms—the canzone*, the ballata, the *sonnet—as well as the madrigal proper, which had become a very free monostrophic verse form of about a dozen seven- and eleven-syllable lines with no fixed order or rhyme scheme, although they usually ended in a *couplet. The musical settings varied considerably but usually consisted of three to six voices in a mixture of polyphonic and homophonic textures. Many 16th-c. musical madrigals, notably those by Luca Marenzio, made a point of illustrating the sense or emotion of the text by means of musical conventions, so each phrase of the text was set to its own music. The subjects tended to be pastoral and amatory. Many of these texts are anonymous, but madrigal verses by Giovanni Battista Guarini, Pietro Bembo, Antonio Alamanni, and Jacopo Sannazaro were set, as well as sonnets from Petrarch and stanzas from the narrative poems of Ludovico Ariosto and Torquato Tasso.

This later style of madrigal influenced the Sp. villancico* and was adopted by composers in Germany, Poland, Denmark, and the Netherlands. Italianate madrigals flourished esp. in England. Although madrigals were imported as early as the 1530s, the Eng. seem not to have begun composing their own until after the publication in 1588 of Musica Transalpina, an anthol. of It. music with words in Eng. trans. The It. models made feminine rhyme a consistent feature of these trans. The earliest Eng. poem called a madrigal appears in bk. 3 of Philip Sidney's Old Arcadia (written ca. 1577–80), a 15-line poem of mixed six- and ten-syllable lines with masculine rhymes.

Some later Eng. writers such as Barnabe Barnes use the term madrigal loosely to designate lyrics in various forms (see Englands Helicon, 1600). Eng. madrigal composers set verses in many forms, some of which did resemble the It. madrigal.

By the middle of the 17th c., the musical madrigal was dead in England and, in Italy, had been transformed by Caccini, Monteverdi, and others into concertato-style pieces with instrumental continuo that would rapidly evolve into the *baroque aria. But amateur singers in England revived some madrigals as early as the mid-18th c. They have been performed ever since.

■ K. Vossler, Das deutsche Madrigal (1898); The English Madrigalists, ed. E. H. Fellowes, rev. ed. (1956–76); E. H. Fellowes, English Madrigal Composers, 2d ed. (1948); A. Einstein, The Italian Madrigal, 3 v. (1949); A. Obertello, Madrigali Italiani in Inghilterra (1949); N. Pirrotta et al., "Madrigal," MGG; J. Kerman, The Elizabethan Madrigal (1962); English Madrigal Verse, ed. E. H. Fellowes, F. W. Sternfeld, D. Greer, 3d ed. (1967); B. Pattison, Music and Poetry of the English Renaissance, 2d ed. (1970); J. Roche, The Madrigal (1972); Wilkins; P. Ledger, The Oxford Book of English Madrigals (1978); A. Newcomb, The Madrigal at Ferrara, 1579–1597, 2 v. (1980); K. von Fischer et al., "Madrigal," New Grove; J. Chater, Luca Marenzio and the Italian Madrigal, 2 v. (1981); E. Doughtie, English Renaissance Song (1986); J. Haar, Essays on Italian Poetry and Music in the Renaissance (1986); W. Maynard, Elizabethan Lyric Poetry and Its Music (1986); I. Fenlon and J. Haar, The Italian Madrigal in the Early Sixteenth Century (1988); M. Feldman, City Culture and the Madrigal at Venice (1995); P. F. Cutter, "The Renaissance Madrigal: An Overview," Recapturing the Renaissance, ed. D. S. Wood and P. A. Miller (1995).

E. Doughtie

MAGYAR POETRY. See HUNGARY, POETRY OF.

MALAYALAM POETRY. It is very difficult to date the earliest Malayalam poetry with precision, since there is vast disagreement among scholars on when and how to distinguish Malayalam as a separate ling. entity, different from early Tamil or emerging from a common Proto-South-Dravidian root lang. There seems to have been a variety of coexisting local langs. in the region of today's Kerala, southwestern India, all loosely labeled as bhāṣa (Sanskrit, "language"). Early Malayalam has also occasionally been incorrectly subsumed under the category of Tamil (sometimes being called Kerala Tamil), the lang. of the larger, culturally dominant neighboring state of Tamil Nadu. The complex mod. Malayalam script developed from Vaṭṭeḻuttu (round script), a descendant of the Brahmī script, but has incorporated Grantha script elements to render non-Dravidian, Sanskritic lexicon and morphology. This fusion of Tamil and Sanskritic elements is characteristic of both the ling. and literary devel. of what is today called Malayalam. Almost the entire extant corpus of premod. Malayalam lit., i.e., the works composed between the 12th and 18th cs., is poetry, but the categorization of these works according to genres, schools, or literary trads. is still very much contested.

The 14th-c. Sanskrit grammatical treatise Līlātilakam distinguishes between various forms of regional langs.: the local bhāṣa; then maṇipravāḻam, which mixes bhāṣa with either Tamil or Sanskrit lexical and morphological elements, creating a blend of the two; and finally pāṭṭu, which does not conform to the Sanskritized style of maṇipravāḻam but seems rather influenced by Dravidian style and meter. Many Malayalam scholars have subsequently read maṇipravāḻam and pāṭṭu as a dichotomy of genres or schools, i.e., a more Sanskritized, possibly Brahminical fusion form of bhāṣa vs. a more Dravidian, Tamilized, non-Brahminical, and possibly lower-caste folk style (nāṭan pāṭṭu). However, it is not possible to distinguish clearly the existing works into either one of these categories. From a mod. critical viewpoint, the two categories of maṇipravāḻam and pāṭṭu might stand for a genre as much as for a distinct ling. devel., since they are both lexically and metrically different. The generic difference is important insofar as premod. Malayalam texts, esp. pāṭṭu, are deeply tied to various *performance trads., as Freeman argues, thus participating in a different kind of literary culture from, e.g., print poetry.

The earliest maṇipravāḻam works known today are Vaiśikatantram, Uṇṇiyaccīcaritam, Uṇṇiccirutēvīcaritam (all ca. 13th c.), and Uṇṇiyāṭicaritam (ca. 14th c.). These works are mainly concerned with courtesan culture, prostitution, the beauty of female physicality, and sexuality. The three latter works belong to the literary genre of campu, which blends poetry and prose. Another work named Anantapuravarṇṇanam (ca. 14th c.) describes the Viṣṇu temple in what is today the state capital of Thiruvananthapuram. Candrōtsavam (ca. 15th c.) is a love poem worshipping the moonlight in a female form. Sandēśa kāvyas (messenger poems), transmitting a message of love and inspired by the Sanskrit poet Kālidāsa's Meghadūta, were also produced during this period; some of the surviving poems are Śukasandēśa, Uṇṇunīlisandēśam, and Kōkasandēśam (all ca. 13th–15th c.). Prominent examples of pāṭṭu are the Rāmacaritam, a ca. 12th-c. rendition of the Sanskrit epic Rāmāyaṇa, and the Tiruniḻalmāla (rediscovered only in 1980), which describes the social life of a temple using Dravidian meter and orthography.

A later phase in the Malayalam pāṭṭu trad. (14th–15th cs.) has been strongly shaped by the three so-called Niraṇam poets whose work is referred to as Kaṇṇaśśan pāṭṭukaḷ (Kanassan poetry). A blend of Sanskrit and Dravidian meters, scripts, and lexicons is characteristic of their work. Ceṟuśśēri's Kṛṣṇagātha (ca. 15th c.) is a well-known example of pāṭṭu that has found its way into mod. culture by being sung as a *lullaby. The 16th-c. poet Eḻuttacchan is often referred to as the founding father of mod. Malayalam. His major works include retellings of the great Sanskrit epics Rāmāyaṇa and Mahābhārata (Adhyātma Rāmāyaṇam, Śrīmahābhāratam) in a lang. that combines characteristics of pāṭṭŭ, maṇipravāḷam, and folk lang. The Malayalam generic term for these stories told by a parrot narrator is kiḷippāṭṭŭ (parrot poem). It has found many subsequent imitators.

The interwoven relations between literary and performance art in Kerala are reflected in the devel. of āṭṭakkatha (dance story), a type of script for the dance drama kathakaḷi. Between the 17th and 18th cs., we find numerous āṭṭakkatha poems, some written by local rulers such as Kōṭṭayam Tamburān (ca. 17th c.), which were enacted in courts and temples. Thematically, they are often renditions of Sanskrit mythological stories (the well-known Naḷacaritam by Uṇṇāyivāryar, Kalyāṇasaugandhikam, and Gītagōvindam). Another 18th-c. example of the performance of lit. is the Kucēlavṛttam by Rāmapurattŭ Vāryar, a song to be recited on a boat and written in the Vañcippāṭṭŭ (boat song) meter. Tuḷḷalpāṭṭŭ, most prominently advanced by Kuñcan Nambiyār in the 18th c., is another poetic type of dance performance that still prevails in contemp. Kerala.

During the course of the 19th c., the lang. gradually developed toward what is mod. Malayalam today. The so-called Kēraḷa Varmma and Veṇmaṇi schools of poetry were characterized by their usage of more Malayalam words as opposed to Sanskrit loans. The pacca malayāḷam (pure Malayalam) movement attempted to reform the lang. by avoiding Sanskrit words but did not gain wider acceptance. The 19th c. witnessed a large number of trans. from Sanskrit, Eng., and other langs. into what is now "Malayalam." Koṭuṅṅallūr Kuṅṅikkuṭṭan Tamburān's Mahābhāratam dates from this period. The early 20th c. saw a new rise of mahākāvya (*epic poems), again following Sanskrit models, as well as devotional Bhakti poetry with a new take on mythological subjects. The most famous modernists and poetic innovators were Uḷḷūr S. Paramēśvarayyar (1877–1949), Vaḷḷattōḷ Nārāyaṇa Mēnōn (1878–1958), and Kumāran Āśan (1873–1924). Vaḷḷattōḷ and Āśan were also outspoken patriots and critics of social structures and the caste system. Increasing printing and publishing activities contributed to the wider circulation and reception of these literary works at the brink of modernity, while poets began to seek inspiration in indigenous as well as Western literary trads. (e.g., Eng. *romanticism).

The mod. and contemp. periods have been immensely prolific with regard to poetry. G. Śaṅkarakkuṟuppŭ (1901–78), Iṭaśśēri Gōvindan Nāyar (1906–74), Caṅṅampuḷa Kṛṣṇapiḷḷa (1913–47), M. Gōvindan (1919–89), P. Bhāskaran (1924–2007), Ayyappappaṇikkar (1930–2006), O.N.V. Kuṟuppŭ (b. 1931), K. Saccidānandan (b. 1946), Bālacandran Cullikkāṭŭ (b. 1957), and V. M. Girija (b. 1961) are a few of the writers shaping this era. Beginning with Bālāmaṇiyamma (1909–2004) and Laḷitāmbika Antarjanam (1909–87) at the turn of the 20th c., women found their way into an otherwise male-dominated literary sphere. Sugatakumāri (b. 1934) and Kamala Das (alias Mādhavikkuṭṭi or K. Surayya, 1934–2009) are among the best-known mod. women poets of Kerala. Twentieth-c. poetry took up virtually every aspect of mod. life, ranging from social and political issues to women's emancipation, and 21st-c. writing continues to find an engaged audience in Kerala's vibrant literary scene.

See INDIA, POETRY OF; RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY; TAMIL POETRY AND POETICS.

■ Anthologies and Translations: Malayalam Poetry Today, ed. K. M. Tharakan (1984); "Malayalam," Medieval Indian Literature, ed. K. Ayyappa Paniker, v. 3 (1999); Unnayi Varier's Nalacaritam, trans. S. Gopalakrishnan (2001).

■ Criticism and History: C. A. Menon, Ezuttaccan and His Age (1940); K. M. George, Rāmacaritam and the Study of Early Malayalam (1956); K. Chaitanya, A History of Malayalam Literature (1971); K. Ramachandran Nair, Early Manipravalam (1971); N. V. Krishna Warrior, A History of Malayalam Metre (1977); M. Līlāvati, Malayāḷakavitāsāhitya caritram (1980); E. Paramēśvaran Piḷḷa, Malayāḷasāhityam kālaghaṭṭaṅṅaḷiluṭe (1998); R. Freeman, "Genre and Society: The Literary Culture of Premodern Kerala," Literary Cultures in History, ed. S. Pollock (2003); Sampūrṇṇa Malayāḷasāhityacaritram, ed. P. Rāmacandran Nāyar (2008).

N. KOMMATTAM

MALAY POETRY

I. Traditional Malay Poetry
II. Modern Malay Poetry

The earliest records of the Malay lang. date from South Sumatra, ca 680 CE. Over the next thousand years, Malay spread to the Malay peninsula, Singapore, East Sumatra, coastal Borneo, and the South Celebes, as well as to parts of southern Thailand and the Philippines. It was both a court lang. and a commercial lingua franca and continues in Malaysia and Indonesia to be the lang. of the state, education, and mass communications. Traditional Malay poetry was composed in the regions named above. Mod. Malay poetry comes from Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei. The lang. is now called "Indonesian" in the Republic of Indonesia and has developed its own mod. poetry (see INDONESIAN POETRY).

I. Traditional Malay Poetry. This includes both oral and written genres. The best known oral form is the *pantun, a four-line verse, with four words to a line, each verse rhyming abab. Each stanza consists of two couplets: the first two lines present a sound pattern and an image, usually drawn from nature, that foreshadow the sound patterns and the explicit meaning to be found in the second couplet:

> Where have you gone to, where were you from?
> Weeds grow taller than grain.
> What year, what month, will time have spun
> Around to when we meet again?
>
> (trans. B. Raffel)

Although each stanza is self-contained, it is also possible to build "chains," in which the second and fourth lines of the first pantun become the first and third lines of the next pantun, and so on (pantun berkait). In this extended form, the Malay pantun has influenced Fr. and Eng. verse (pantoum).

The best known written form is the syair, a term deriving from the Ar. syi'r, although the Malay form is purely indigenous and has no actual connection with any Ar. or Persian form. Syair consist of long series of four-line stanzas recited to an audience, each stanza utilizing the same end rhyme. There are both narrative and nonnarrative syair. Nonnarrative syair deal with religious doctrines and practices, ethics, and such miscellaneous topics as the interpretation of dreams, astronomy, riddles, and the praise of particular people and places. The earliest extant syair are the works of the late 16th-c. religious scholar Hamzah Fansuri. Hamzah developed a mystical theology in short, terse verses, filled with Ar. and Persian words; his works were condemned and burned by antagonistic scholars in the court of Acheh. Narrative syair include romantic tales, accounts of historical events, the lives of religious figures, and moral allegories. One of the most popular romantic tales is the Syair Ken Tambuhan, a quest story drawn from Javanese mythology. The same motif of a prince's leaving the court and searching throughout the known world for his true love occurs in Syair Bidasari and many other texts as well. The syair form reached its greatest popularity in Indonesia in the late 19th c., when even contemp. murder mysteries were written in verse, thus laying the foundations for the emergence of a mod. prose fiction.

Other traditional Malay poetic forms include riddles, *proverbs, spells, the prose lyrics found in narrative tales, and the indefinite structures of the nazam, seloka, and gurindam.

II. Modern Malay Poetry. This is considered to have begun in 1934 with publication of a new style of poetry by Muhammad Yasin Ma'mor, in Majallah Guru, a magazine for village elementary-school teachers. Possibly influenced by Indonesian poetry, Yasin wrote personal works of melancholy longing provoked by the beauty of nature. Most of his poems used a four-line verse form; a few were written completely in *free verse. A more decisive break with traditional Malay verse came after World War II, with the rise of the Generation of the Fifties in Singapore. Members of the generation included teachers but also police officers and journalists. They sought a wide Malay audience and wrote in a simple, easy-to-understand style, which was particularly critical of the social breakdown they attributed to the war and the lingering effects of Brit. colonialism. A typical example is "Kami Anak Zaman Ini" (We Are the Children of This Age) by Masuri S. N., which praises past cultural glory, laments present widespread poverty, and looks forward to a time in which "full sovereignty" will be restored. Another is Usman Awang's "Pak Utih" (Father Utih). The poem falls into two sections: in the first, Usman describes Utih, "the meritorious peasant," and his life of grinding rural poverty and disease; in the second, Utih looks at the emerging nationalist politicians, with their luxury cars and rich banquets, wondering as he "still waits in prayer, Where are the leaders going in their limousines?"

A very different movement that appeared at this same time was labeled the Obscure Poetry movement. The movement emphasized symbolism and sound patterns in a way that was sometimes reminiscent of the first two lines of the pantun. Important poets in this trad. included A. S. Amin, Noor S. I., M. Ghazali, and, occasionally, A. Samad Said, better known as a novelist.

During the 1970s, a number of younger poets reached maturity and continued to dominate Malay poetry throughout the rest of the century. They were less interested in social themes, more concerned with personal emotion, and eager to experiment with new forms. Latiff Mohidin, a painter, wrote heavily imagistic poems, extending the "obscure" trad. Baha Zain used a graphic and harsh contemp. lang. as a way of addressing current social issues.

A. Ghafar Ibrahim moved beyond meaning to pure sound in some of his work: "Tak Tun" captures the rhythm of the village tambourine, "Tak Tun / taktak Tun Taktak Tak Tun Taktak Tak Tun . . ."; "Dundun cakcak" holds the beat of the drum, "dundun / chakchak / dun / chak / dundun / chakchak . . ."; while his poem "Gagak" (Crows) is shaped like an open beak and filled with the repetitious cry "gak, gak, gak . . .".

An ongoing exploration of mystical Islamic themes has marked the work of Kemala (pseud. of Ahmad Kamal Abdullah). His poetry contains references to prayer and the scriptures; to theological ideas of God, creation, the world as a system of signs, the religious community; to historical figures, incl. the Prophet Muhammad, but also his companions, other prophets and major Middle Eastern poets; and to claims of personal religious illumination. His lang. is rich and evocative, often existing for its own sake but as a way of evoking deep resonances in the heart of the Malay reader. The long poem "Ayn" (Signs), e.g., moves effortlessly across descriptions of the early life of Muhammad, his midnight ascent to Jerusalem, the Prophet's wife Aisyah, the 8th-c. Iraqi poet Rābiʿah al-ʿAdawīyah, the seven sleepers of Ephesus, and various Semitic prophets.

The work of State Literary Laureate Muhammad Haji Salleh is almost the complete opposite of that of Kemala. Muhammad is a major literary scholar. Educated first in Eng. and holding a doctorate in comparative literature from the University of Michigan, he has had to struggle to gain his own Malay identity. His verse is intellectual and absolutely understated. In the poem "Intektuil" (The Intellectual), he describes himself as "the victim of the question," caught between "the pain of emotion / and the thoughts born in his head," and this theme is extensively explored throughout his work.

As in Indonesia, there are fewer women poets writing in Malay than men poets. The two most prominent are Zurinah Hassan and Siti Zainon Ismail. Zurinah's work gently explores the mysteries and uncertainties of human relationships, esp. as these are expressed (or, more often, fail to be expressed) through ordinary speech. Siti Zainon's exploration of human and religious love is more sensuous than Zurinah's work.

Although Malay is the national lang. of Malaysia and the government has provided major publishing opportunities and rewards to encourage a national lit., there are few significant poets writing in Malay from other ethnic communities. The important exception is Lim Swee Tin. Of Chinese-Thai parentage, Lim speaks Hokkien, Mandarin, and Thai but feels that he expresses himself best in Malay. However, he avoids communal references in his work, in favor of a quiet introversion and a gentle nostalgia for a culturally unspecific past.

The support of the government has perhaps ensured the steady devel. of mod. Malay poetry along a path that has maintained quality but provided few radical challenges or different directions for the past 50 years. As Salleh insists in his contemp. rewriting of the cl. hist. Sejarah Melayu (Malay Annals, composed 1535–1612)—described by Winstedt as "the most famous, distinctive and best of all Malay literary works"—the contemp. author must write "so that from the past may rise greatness, / from our history we may learn the truth" (trans. Muhammad Haji Salleh).

■ Anthologies and Translations: Pantun Melayu, ed. R. J. Wilkinson and R. O. Winstedt, 2d ed. (1955); Modern Malay Verse, 1946–61, ed. O. Rice and A. Majid (1963); Selections from Contemporary Malaysian Poetry, ed. M. H. Salleh (1978); The Poems of Hamzah Fansuri, ed. G.W.J. Drewes and L. F. Brakel (1986); Malaysian Poetry 1975–1985, ed. A. K. Abdullah, trans. H. Aveling (1987); The Puppeteer's Wayang (1992), and Emas Tempawan (2004), both ed. M. H. Salleh; Bidasari, ed. J. Millie (2004).

■ Criticism and History: R. O. Winstedt, A History of Classical Malay Literature, 2d ed. (1961); B. Raffel, The Development of Modern Indonesian Poetry (1967); M. H. Salleh, Tradition and Change in Contemporary Malay-Indonesian Poetry (1977); H. M. Piah et al., Traditional Malay Literature, trans. H. Aveling, 2d ed. (2002).

H. Aveling

MAL MARIÉE. An OF lyric genre, within the larger class of women's songs, in which a woman complains that her father married her to a hateful husband against her will. The poet may say he overheard her lament, or witnessed an argument between her and her husband, or saw her meet her lover, or attempted to console her himself, or heard two women confiding in one another. In a variant type, a nun wishes her lover would deliver her from the convent. The metrical form is variable, incl. motets, rondeaux, rotrouenges, baletes, and chansons. Numerous examples are attested among OF lyrics of the 13th c., in the 15th to 16th cs., and among mod. folk songs; the med. genre is also well represented in It. and, more rarely, in Occitan (where it is termed the gilozesca), Galician, Sp., and ME. The heroine finds a counterpart in May, the young wife of January in Chaucer's "Merchant's Tale." For Bec, the origin of the mal mariée is to be sought among Fr. popular songs of the Middle Ages that must have coexisted with the early artistic versions.

See TROUVÈRE.

■ Bec; D. Evans, "Marie de France, Chrétien de Troyes, and the mal mariée," Chrétien de Troyes and the Troubadours, ed. P. S. Noble and L. M. Paterson (1984); Chants d'amour des femmes-troubadours, ed. P. Bec (1995); Songs of the Women Trouvères, ed. E. Doss-Quinby et al. (2001); S. M. Johnson, "The Malmariée Theme in Old French Lyric or What is a Chanson de Malmariée?" "Chançon legiere a chanter," ed. K. Fresco and W. Pfeffer (2007); H. Dell, Desire by Gender and Genre in Trouvère Song (2008), ch. 5.

W. D. Paden

MANIFESTO. The manifesto takes, and has always taken, many forms, some deadly serious, some flip to the extreme. From the celebrated "Communist Manifesto" to Valerie Solano's SCUM manifesto with its violent antimale diatribe, the political forms are widespread, a genre unto themselves. What interests us here is the aesthetic manifesto, quite another animal, although, of course, modeled on the political. And, to the extent that such formulas as "the personal is always political" make sense, the idea that the aesthetic has always some component of the political is equally powerful.

At the heights of aesthetic movements, the manifesto is common as an insistence on what is new about the movement one wants to celebrate, what it opposes and casts off, and what it would like to do now. It is a necessarily revolutionary genre, in whose atmosphere there reigns the spirit of Pierre Albert-Birot's 1913 movement Nowism, the extreme casting-off rite. The manifesto must be at once declamatory, loud, dramatic, and, above all, attention-seizing, if it is to work. The work is persuasive, the tone is certain, and the conviction, entire: otherwise, forget it.

It declares some sort of "we"-speak, as opposed to an individual "I"-speak, for the manifesto is, in general, a collective statement. (Of course, the opposite is true in such spoofs as Frank O'Hara's "personism," visible and necessarily individual.) What gives it essential intensity is its own presence, intoxicating enough to keep it going. It usually takes its own position seriously, a requirement for any effort at persuading others. And the others are the ones it must persuade, not the selves already "in" the movement.

There was a great moment of manifesto-madness, stretching from 1909 and the "Futurist Manifesto" up through the excitement of *cubism in France, of the Armory Show in New York, suprematism in Russia, *Dada in Switzerland, and then *surrealism, whose impact we are still feeling. (See the most essential of the manifestos in the anthol. Manifesto.) But the essential quality of a manifesto remains the forward-lookingness and the quality of standing alone: it is neither prefatory nor a postlude. What it aims at is implicit in its title: at once the sense of manipulation by the hand of the creator(s), the hand or "manus" and the showing forth of the "manifest."

Among all the possible sorts of manifestos are the poem-manifesto, the painting-manifesto, and so on, up to the self-reflective metamanifesto. Some of the more exciting examples are, from the Fr. field and in the political realm, Émile Zola's "J'accuse," the "Manifesto of the 121"at the moment of the Algerian crisis, and Aimé Césaire's "In the Guise of a Manifesto." In the field of architecture, Robert Venturi's "Non-Straightforward Architecture: A Gentle Manifesto" and in the field of art, J.A.M. Whistler's "Ten O'Clock," Lucio Fontana's "White Manifesto," the performance-art piece by Carolee Schneemann called "Meat Joy," and R. B. Kitaj's "Diasporist Manifesto" are invaluable pieces, just as influential as Guy Debord's "Society of the Spectacle." Each movement has its own way of manifesting what it is about, and there abound such documents in the major anthols.

The manifesto moment made its presence felt again, after the Lillehammer Conference of Literary Critics in May of 2008 and the pub. it celebrated: an issue of Rett Kopi in Norway with the special "manifesto" issue of 2007, edited by Ellef Prestsaeter and Karin Nygård, full of invaluable documents and essays from the world over, including reflections on Mina Loy's "Feminist Manifesto" by Joan Retallack; on Giacomo Balla's "Futurist Manifesto" by Emily Braun; on Alison Knowles's "Word Power Manifesto" by W.J.T. Mitchell; as well as a large group of selected manifestos, incl. those by Guillaume Apollinaire, Tristan Tzara, Isidore Isou, right up through Donna Haraway's "Cyborg Manifesto." Some articles are in Norwegian, some in Eng., but all bear witness to the excitement of the genre.

■ Theories of Modern Art, ed. H. B. Chipp (1968); L'Esprit Créateur 23.4 (1983)—special issue on the "manifesto"; Art in Theory, 1900–1990 (1993), ed. C. Harrison and P. Wood; Theories and Manifestoes of Contemporary Architecture, ed. C. Jencks and K. Kropf (1997); J. Lyon, Manifestoes (1999); Manifesto, ed. M. A. Caws (2001); Rett Kopi: Documenterer Fremtiden (2007)—special issue; M. A. Caws, "Poetry Can Be Any Damn Thing It Wants," Poetry 190 (2009)—intro. to eight manifestos on the centennial of the "Futurist Manifesto"; G. Yanoshevsky, "Three Decades of Writing on Manifesto: The Making of a Genre," PoT 30 (2009).

M. A. Caws

MANNERISM. Related to the Lat. manus (hand) but arriving in most Western vernaculars through the Lat. manuarius (operated by hand, pertaining to the hand), the substantive mannerist appears only in the second half of the 17th c. as a predominantly pejorative term to describe the excessive or affected use of style. This negative use of the term emerges against the backdrop of the classicist aesthetics of the 18th c. (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS), and the first recorded occurrence of the concept in Eng. is in John Dryden's trans. of the Fr. painter Charles Alphonse du Fresnoy's poetic treatise on painting, De arte graphica (1668). In this context, the notion of mannerism comes to be regarded as a deviation from the classicist ideal of using artistic practice to perfect the imitation of reality.

The pejorative use of the term remained dominant until the late 19th c., when Heinrich Wölfflin in his influential Renaissance und Barock (1888) defined mannerism as a period between the Ren. and the *baroque characterized by a crisis of Ren. aesthetic ideals. Following a series of attempts to introduce a neutral or even positive concept of mannerism as a period style in art hist. (Dvořák, Friedlaender), Hauser's Mannerism claimed to see in mannerism an authentic artistic expression of the social, economic, and spiritual crisis of the 16th and early 17th cs., thus effectively establishing mannerism as an artistic response to the onset of modernity. In response, Smyth in "Mannerism and Maniera" and Shearman in Mannerism challenged Hauser's "anxiety-mannerism" and introduced the notion of mannerism as a "stylish style." Smyth and Shearman contended that, while Hauser's theory of mannerism was essentially a projection of modernist (particularly expressionist and surrealist; see EXPRESSIONISM and SURREALISM) aesthetic ideals into the early mod. period, their conception of mannerism was restricted to a short-lived and self-aware movement in the arts (particularly painting, sculpture, and architecture), characterized by its emphasis on the artist's maniera (particular manner or style) and grazia (grace).

Literary scholars have often followed the shifting meanings of mannerism in art hist. but, at times, also introduced new, specifically literary versions of it. Wylie Sypher's Four Stages of Renaissance Style (1955), which offered a reading of Hamlet and John Donne's poetry in terms of mannerism, was influenced by the work of Dvořák and Hauser. Mirollo's Mannerism and Renaissance Poetry followed the accounts of Smyth and Shearman in isolating a trend in Ren. poetry characterized by the aesthetic ideal of grace and sprezzatura (the latter term originally referring to the elegant and nonchalant manner of self-conduct in Baldassare Castiglione's Book of the Courtier). Meanwhile, Curtius in Europäische Literatur und Lateinisches Mittelalter introduced a radically different notion of literary mannerism. Calling for a complete repudiation of the notion of the baroque and of period styles more generally, Curtius theorized mannerism as a constant tendency in lit. characterized by its taste for ornate lang., particularly for such rhetorical devices as *hyperbaton and *paronomasia. For Curtius, paradigmatic mannerist authors include the Roman poet Claudian and the Sp. poet Luis de Góngora; Baltasar Gracián's Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1648) was regarded by Curtius as the single most important early mod. theory of mannerism.

Although in art hist. mannerism is now generally accepted as a period style, in literary studies it remains an unstable concept. It has achieved more success in certain national literary trads. than in others; thus, in It.

lit., mannerism's currency as a concept is due, at least in part, to Quondam's study of mannerism in Neapolitan poetry. For Quondam, mannerism is defined by its tendency to remain within an established trad. (in the Neapolitan case, within *Petrarchism), while simultaneously pushing this trad. and its artistic-literary conventions to their limits. Quondam's study focuses on mannerism as a period style; more recent treatments of mannerism have interpreted it as a particular, constant tendency in lit. Link-Heer (1986, 2001) has offered a detailed hist. of the notion of maniera as a longstanding counterpart of and alternative to style. Relying on psychological accounts of mannerism (Binswanger), Agamben also suggested revising the relationship between style and manner by defining the latter as "taking distance . . . from language through an excessive, mannered adhesion to it." These and comparable accounts of mannerism as a concept of style pushed to its limits suggest that the notion may find further application in poetics.

See RENAISSANCE POETICS, RENAISSANCE POETRY, STYLE.

■ H. Wölfflin, "Der Verfall," Die klassische Kunst: Eine Einführung in die Italianische Renaissance (1899); W. F. Friedlaender, "Die Entstehung des antiklassischen Stiles in der italianischen Malerei um 1520," Repertorium für Kunstwissenschaft 26 (1925); M. Praz, Secentismo e Marinismo in Inghilterra (1925); M. Dvořák, "Über Greco und den Manierismus," Kunstgeschichte als Geistgeschichte (1928); Curtius; A. Hauser, Sozialgeschichte der Kunst und Literatur (1953); L. Binswanger, Drei Formen missglückten Daseins (1956); G. R. Hocke, Die Welt als Labyrinth: Manier und Manie in der europäischen Kunst (1957); C. H. Smyth, "Mannerism and Maniera," Studies in Western Art: Acts of the Twentieth International Congress of the History of Art, ed. I. E. Rubin, 4 v. (1963); A. Hauser, Mannerism: The Crisis of the Renaissance and the Origin of Modern Art, trans. E. Moshbacher (1965); J. Shearman, Mannerism (1967); A. Quondam, La parola nel labirinto: Società e scrittura del Manierismo a Napoli (1975); C.-G. Dubois, Le Maniérisme (1979); J. V. Mirollo, Mannerism and Renaissance Poetry (1984); U. Link-Heer, "Maniera: Überlegungen zur Konkurrenz von Manier und Stil," Stil, Geschichten und Funktionen eines kulturwissenschaftlichen Diskurselements, ed. H. U. Gumbrecht and K. L. Pfeiffer (1986); J. M. Steadman, Redefining Period Style: "Renaissance," "Mannerism," and "Baroque" in Literature (1990); P. Sohm, "Gendered Style in Italian Art Criticism from Michelangelo to Malvasia," RQ 48 (1995); B. Allert, "Maniera," The Feminist Encyclopedia of German Literature, ed. F. U. Eigler and S. Kord (1997); L. E. Semler, The English Mannerist Poets and the Visual Arts (1998); G. Agamben, "Expropriated Manner," The End of the Poem, trans. D. Heller-Roazen (1999); U. Link-Heer, "Manier, manieristisch, Manierismus," Ästhetische Grundbegriffe (ÄGB): Historisches Wörterbuch in sieben Bänden, ed. K. Barck et al. (2001).

D. MARNO

MAN'YŌSHŪ. The oldest extant anthol. of cl. Japanese poetry (waka*), it reached its current form in the late 8th (or perhaps early 9th) c. CE. At over 4,500 poems, it is the largest of the major waka collections and also the most varied in terms of poetic form, vocabulary, subject matter, and social position of authors. In 20 books arranged according to diverse principles, it was clearly compiled in stages by multiple editors. About half of the poems are anonymous, and named authors include early legendary and quasi-legendary figures: reliable attributions to historical individuals begin around the middle of the 7th c. The most recent poem was composed in 759, so the anthol. contains a bit more than a century's worth of dateable poetry. The title, literally "collection of ten thousand leaves," is generally taken to refer to the "myriad ages" of the future to which the work is consigned as a literary monument.

The Man'yōshū (MYS) includes a few dozen cl. Chinese-style compositions (seven-syllable shi* poetry, prefaces, essays, and letters), but it is indisputably an anthol. of Japanese-style poetry. The primary form is that which dominated subsequent waka history: the tanka* (short poem) in five lines of 5-7-5-7-7 syllables. But a notable feature is the prominent place of 264 chōka (long poems), of varying length but generally in lines of 5-7-5 . . . 7-5-7-7, and also the inclusion of over sixty sedōka (head-repeating poems) in six lines of 5-7-7-5-7-7—neither of which had the longevity of the shorter tanka form. Sets of poems are sequenced in various ways, perhaps most prominently the combination of chōka with subsequent tanka as *envois (hanka) that amplify or transform aspects of the long poem.

The mid- to late 7th c. was a formative period during which Chinese-style statecraft and also writing and literacy were established for the first time among the elites of the Japanese archipelago. Although scholars search for signs of remnant orality in this stratum of the anthol. and also in "songs" collected in early 8th c. hists., the impression given by most early MYS works is of a court poetry already well engaged in synthesizing and digesting its various influences. The following period of the anthol. is dominated by its greatest poet, Kakinomoto no Hitomaro (fl. late 7th–early 8th c.), who wrote grand public poetry on topics such as royal travels, a ruined capital, and elegies for princes, as well as more personal works on parting with wives and enduring the hardships of travel. Later major figures include Ōtomo no Tabito (665–731) and Yamanoue no Okura (660–ca. 733). Tabito pioneered poetry on sinified topics such as the joys of wine and plum blossoms in early spring and, as a court-appointed governor, was central to a provincial literary circle. His friend Okura experimented with themes inspired by Buddhist thought and secular Chinese legends and depicted poverty in terms unparalleled elsewhere in the waka trad. With 473 works Tabito's son Yakamochi (d. 785) is the best-represented MYS poet (Hitomaro is next with 91), composing at elegant banquets and in informal exchanges (often by letter) with friends, lovers, and relations. Hundreds of works are attributed to women: roughly a fifth of those by named authors, including the important early poet Princess Nukata and Yakamochi's aunt, Lady Ōtomo of Sakanoue (who follows Hitomaro in frequency, with 84 poems). An even larger proportion of anonymous poems feature female speakers.

Earlier books, arranged by reign and by mode, appear to have been compiled independently, perhaps as an official or quasi-official anthol., by the late 7th c. This core collection was then augmented, often with material drawn from earlier, now-lost anthols. Some of the resulting books focus on particular coteries; others organize hundreds of poems (many anonymous) by topical categories; as with the subsequent waka trad., the dominant concerns are love and the seasons. Later in the editing process, the final five books were added: a long, chronologically organized collection of poetry by Yakamochi and his associates that has been likened to a poetic diary.

The anthol. is a product of capital-centered elites, filled with poetry attributed to sovereigns, other royals, and the courtiers who served them, but it is also marked by interest in socially and spatially peripheral voices. One book contains "poems of the east" (Azuma-uta) in nonstandard dialect, while Yakamochi collected compositions by lowly border guards. Many anonymous poems seem rooted in rustic folk song, albeit formally regularized and reworked for metropolitan tastes.

Although there were periods when it was more cited than read, the MYS has been an important canonical work since the 9th c. Japanese poets, scholars, and critics have repeatedly turned to it as a fount of cl. verse, for it contains early instances of much that became essential to the trad.; but they have also looked to it for heterogeneous imagery, themes, and language with which to enrich and critique the poetic mainstream.

See JAPAN, POETRY OF; JAPANESE POETICS.

■ The Man'yōshū: The Nippon Gakujutsu Shinkōkai Translation (1965); The Ten Thousand Leaves, v. 1, trans. I. H. Levy (1981); P. Doe, A Warbler's Song in the Dusk (1982); M. Morris, "Waka and Form, Waka and History," HJAS 46 (1986); A Waka Anthology, v. 1, trans. E. Cranston (1993); J. Robinson, "The Tsukushi Man'yōshū Poets and the Invention of Japanese Poetry," diss., Univ. of Michigan (2004); T. Duthie, "Poetry and Kingship in Ancient Japan," diss., Columbia Univ. (2005); A. Commons, Hitomaro (2009); H. M. Horton, Traversing the Frontier: "Man'yōshū" Account of a Japanese Mission to Silla in 736–737 (2010).

D. B. LURIE

MAORI POETRY. See NEW ZEALAND, POETRY OF.

MAPUCHE POETRY. The historical territory of the Mapuche people coincides with large tracts of southern Chile and Argentina. The Mapuche lang., Mapuzungun, cultivated an *oral poetry in pre-Columbian times. During the early colonial period, missionaries of the Catholic Church, who were granted permission to travel through Mapuche territory, made frequent reference to the beauty and significance of the trad. of indigenous poetic song. In some cases, they studied and transcribed it in the original Mapuzungun. Shortly after Mapuche territory was colonized by the Chilean state in the late 19th c., well-known linguists, such as Rodolfo Lenz and Felix José de Augusta, collected and translated hundreds of Mapuche poems as part of a broader anthropological endeavor to salvage what they presumed to be the last remains of a doomed culture.

In the early 20th c., educated bilingual Mapuche began to write and publish in Sp. Most notable were the works of Manuel Manquilef in the 1910s and of Guillermo Igayman, Teodoberta Neculmán, and Anselmo Quilaqueo in the 1930s. The latter published Cancionero Araucano (Araucanian Verses) in 1939. In it, he invoked a glorious past when his people had bravely defended their homeland against the Sp. conquistadors: "Oh Arauco! / Remember how one day you spilt / your beautiful blood upon this beloved land / refusing time and again to give in." It was not only the past he wrote of, however. "You took revenge for the way you were punished, / and for that reason you rise up again [today]." In 1966, Sebastián Queupul published the first self-authored, bilingual collection of Mapuche poetry, Poemas mapuches en castellano (Mapuche Poems in Spanish). A small, low-cost production, it nevertheless marked an important milestone in Mapuche literary creation. The most widely cited poem of the book was "Arado de palo" (Wooden Plough), which wistfully recalled life in the rural community before the author moved to the more hostile environment of Santiago: "I want to turn over the earth with my wooden plough / And plant my simple words in the wilderness." And yet it was also a story of the survival of indigenous culture in the capital city.

Mapuche poetry experienced a boom in the context of redemocratization (after 17 years of military dictatorship) and the newly elected Concertación government's decision to embrace the rhet. of multiculturalism. In 1989, Leonel Lienlaf published Se ha despertado el ave en mi corazón (The Bird Has Awakened within My Heart), the first book by a Mapuche author to be taken on by a major publishing house in Chile. Lienlaf was also the first Mapuche writer to win a national literary award, the Santiago Municipal Literature Prize of 1990. Elicura Chihuailaf was awarded the same prize in 1997 for a collection of poems titled De sueños azules y contrasueños (Of Blue Dreams and Counterdreams, 1995).

Born in rural southern Chile, both Chihuailaf and Lienlaf move between the rural and urban environments. They write in Mapuzungun and Sp. The rural world infuses their verses, but, like Queupul, they address the problems of urban life, emphasizing the alienation and solitude felt by Mapuche migrants in Chile's urban centers. In the poem "Leyendas, visiones" (Legends, Visions, 1991), Chihuailaf writes, "in the city I am barely a rivulet / shrunken and in silence dying." Chihuailaf describes his poetry as oralitura: his incorporation of multiple voices, in particular, is inspired by the collective, oral trad. of his ancestors. Much of Lienlaf's poetic production is oral (recorded music, documentary film), and he addresses the limitations of the written word in one of his best-known poems "Rebelión" (1989): "My hand / told me the world / would not be written down." But his verses do not so much reject writing (after all, he has achieved a great deal by writing) as highlight the tension between the spoken and written word.

Lienlaf and Chihuailaf are the most renowned of Chile's Mapuche poets: they attend public conferences at home and abroad, and their verses—which are the subject of numerous scholarly studies—have been included in textbooks and museum exhibitions. But they are by no means the only ones to have achieved academic and popular recognition. At least 20 Mapuche writers have carved a place for themselves in national (and often international) literary circles. They are a highly diverse group, both in themselves—male and female, of different generations and territories, bilingual and monolingual, rural and urban based—and with regard to the poetry they produce. However, there are also strong links between them. They all assert their indigenous origins (making it either an explicit or implicit theme of their writings) and support the Mapuche political movement in its struggles against the Chilean state.

Since the late 1990s, the gritty, urban poetry of two Santiago-based writers—César Millahueique and David Aniñir—has attracted increasing attention. In Profecía en blanco y negro (Prophecy in Black and White, 1998), the former plays with a mixture of langs. and communication systems to represent the transcultural experience of the urban Mapuche population: "My codes jump from one program to another, from Word Perfect to Lotus, from Lotus to Windows; I feel the re-heated chips and the shadows staking everything to be a reality and a pacman eating the security codes." He also depicts harrowing scenes of a city dominated by the fear and repression of Augusto Pinochet's military regime. One of Aniñir's most paradigmatic poems is "María Juana la mapunky de la Pintana" (Maria Juna the Mapuche punk girl of la Pintana), in which he underscores the social exclusion of so many Mapuche in Santiago: "you are the Mapuche 'girl' of an unregistered brand / of the cold solitary corner addicted to 'that' bad habit / your dark skin is the network of SuperHyperArchi veins / that boil over with a revenge that condemns." It is a tragic story that Aniñir tells but with a strong sense of the potential for resistance.

Another recent devel. is the publication of the two-volume anthol. of Mapuche women writers: Hilando en la memoria (Spinning Memory, 2006–9), ed. by the Chilean scholar Soledad Falabella. These bring together 21 poets, incl. Graciela Huinao, María Isabel Millapan, Maribel Curriao, and Roxana Miranda Rupailaf. The poetry deals with recurrent themes such as orality and historic memory, but also points to the intersections between gender and race in 21st-c. Chile.

See ARGENTINA, POETRY OF; CHILE, POETRY OF; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

■ I. Carrasco Muñoz, "Las voces étnicas en la poesía chilena actual," Revista chilena de literatura 47 (1995); Ül: Four Mapuche Poets, ed. C. Vicuña, trans. J. Bierhorst (1998); J. Park, "Ethnogenesis or Neo-indigenous Intelligentsia: Contemporary Mapuche-Huilliche Poetry," Latin American Research Review 42 (2007); J. Crow, "Mapuche Poetry in Post-Dictatorship Chile: Confronting the Dilemmas of Neoliberal Multiculturalism," Journal of Latin American Cultural Studies 17 (2008); M. E. Góngora and D. Picón, "Poesía mapuche: Actualidad y permanencias. Entrevista a Jaime Huenún," Revista Chilena de la Literatura 76 (2010): http://www.revistas.uchile.cl/index.php/RCL/article/viewFile/9141/9142.

J. CROW

MARATHI POETRY. Dnyaneshwar's (1271–96) decision to compose the Bhavarthdeepika, a poetic commentary on the Bhagavad-Gītā, in Marathi, the common lang. of Maharashtra, instead of Sanskrit, the lang. of priests and scholars, was a radical gesture that inaugurated a powerful trad. of poetry in Marathi. Although Dnyaneshwar is the first major poet in Marathi, he was not the first; the poetry of the Mahanubhava, an esoteric sect, was preserved in a coded script that was discovered in the 20th c. and probably predated Dnyaneshwar.

Dnyaneshwar belonged to the pan-Indian Bhakti movement (see INDIA, POETRY OF), a spiritual movement that allowed the most marginal segments of feudal, casteist, and patriarchal Indian society to articulate their identities. The Bhakti movement fueled the evolution of mod. Indian langs. and cultures. The bulk of poetry composed in Maharashtra from the 13th to the 18th c. is Bhakti poetry and mostly oral-performative in nature. Dnyaneshwar's compositions are integral to the canon of the Varkari movement, the Marathi branch of the Bhakti movement.

Other major poets in the Varkari canon are Namdev (1270–1350), Eknāth (1533–99), and Tukaram (1608–49). These poets employed folk literary forms like abhanga, ovis, and bharud. Even if the poetry of Ramdas (1606–82) does not belong to the Varkari movement, it can still be located in the Bhakti trad. It is notable for its nationalistic and pragmatic vision. Another trad., more elitist and influenced by Sanskrit kāvya, is of poets like Waman Pandit (1608–95), Mukteshwar (1574–1645), and Moropant (1729–94) in the 17th and 18th cs. They continued the trad. of akhyana kāvya (narrative poetry), which was popularized earlier by Eknāth. The consolidation of the Maratha Empire during this period also made powadas (heroic ballads) and lavanis (romantic songs) composed by Shahirs (troubadours) like Honaji Bala (1754–1844) very popular.

Nineteenth-c. Brit. colonialism brought modernity to Maharashtra, and print capitalism and Western education caused a lasting shift in poetic practice. Once primarily oral and performative, poetry now appeared predominantly in print form and bore the distinct influence of the Western intellectual and poetic trads., incl. *romanticism, social reformism, and nationalism. The major poet of this period is Keshavsut (pseud. of Krishnaji Keshav Damle, 1866–1905). Other prominent poets of the period are Balkavi (pseud. of T. B. Thombre, 1890–1918), and Bahinabai Choudhary (1880–1951), an outstanding poet whose works were unavailable in her time as they were orally composed.

In the 1920s, a group of poets called Ravikiran Mandal, led by Madhav Julian (1894–1939), rose to prominence in Pune city. The group reacted against the social reformist tone and mystical effusions of the poets like Keshavsut and wrote soft and sentimental lyrics. They cultivated poetic forms like the *ghazal and the *sonnet. In the 1930s, Anil (pseud. of Atmaram Ravji Deshpande, 1901–82) introduced *free verse in Marathi. Other notable poets of the period are B. B. Borkar (1910–84) and Kusumagraj (pseud. of V. V. Shirwadkar, 1912–99).

B. S. Mardhekar's (1909–56) Kahi Kavita (1947) brought about another shift in Marathi poetry. These avant-garde poems express despair resulting from World War II, growing industrialization, urbanization, and the erosion of traditional values. Mardhekar's attempt to integrate the nonconformist aspects of Bhakti poetics with international modernist aesthetics is a significant characteristic of postcolonial cultural tendencies (see POSTCOLONIAL POETICS). Important contemporaries of Mardhekar, whose *modernism avoided avant-garde excesses, are Purushottam Shivaram Rege (1910–78), Indira Sant (1914–2000), and Vinda Karandikar (1918–2010).

From 1955 to 1975, *avant-garde poetics found its expression in the "little magazine" movement. The little magazines like Shabda, Vacha, and literary periodicals like Asmitadarsha had a distinct antiestablishment outlook, as in the complex, experimental, and challenging poetry by Arun Kolatkar (1932–2004), Dilip Chitre (1938–2009), Vasant Dahake (b. 1942), and Namdeo Dhasal (b. 1949). Their works bear the influence of international modernist and postmodernist poetry. The Dalit poetry, or "the poetry of the oppressed," influenced by the radically reformist philosophy of Babasaheb Ambedkar (1891–1956) and Jyotiba Phule (1827–90), exploded on the scene in the same period. Poets like Dhasal straddled both avant-garde and Dalit poetics. Feminism also began to emerge in this period. Malika Amar Sheikh (b. 1957) writes vigorous poetry that combines feminism with other dissenting political ideologies. In the 1980s, tribal poets like Bhujang Meshram (1958–2007) started writing poetry that combined their quest for tribal identity with protest against the exploitative social system, while poets like Arun Kale (1954–2008) continued the trad. of Dalit poetry.

Poetic idiom was transformed in the 1990s because of the social and cultural crises caused by the processes of globalization, technological revolution, and economic reforms. New little magazines like Shabadvedh (1989–2009) and Abhidhanantar (1992–2009) played an important role by providing a platform for new voices. New poetry engages with contemp. cultural crises and shows a shift in sensibility and lang. Some of the significant voices to emerge since the 1990s are Sanjeev Khandekar (b. 1958), Mangesh Narayanrao Kale (b. 1966), Saleel Wagh (b. 1967), Hemant Divate (b. 1967), Kavita Mahajan (b. 1967), Manya Joshi (b. 1972), Santosh P. Pawar (b. 1972), and Sachin Ketkar (b. 1972).

■ An Anthology of Marathi Poetry 1945–1965, ed. D. Chitre (1968); S. Deo, "Twentieth-Century Marathi Literature," Handbook of Twentieth-Century Literatures in India, ed. N. Natarajan (1996); Live Update: An Anthology of Recent Marathi Poetry, ed. S. C. Ketkar (2005); D. Chitre, "The Practice of Marathi Poetry: A Survey of Seven Centuries of Interruptions," New Quest 175–76 (2009).

S. C. KETKAR

MARINISM has three basic meanings: the style of Giambattista Marino (Naples, 1569–1625), Italy's major 17th-c. poet; his numerous It. followers (poeti marinisti), such as Claudio Achillini, Antonio Bruni, and Girolamo Preti; and Marino's limited influence on other Eur. writers. Marinism is usually used as a synonym for a poetic expression that hides a scarcity of meaning behind an excessive use of rhetorical devices. Marino's poetics is founded on the concept of meraviglia (marvel) that, according to Emanuele Tesauro, author of Il cannocchiale aristotelico (The Aristotelian Telescope, 1654), is a form of "brief rapture" (breve rapimento) which possesses the subject and renders him "speechless" (senza favella). To achieve this effect of intellectual suspension, Marinism relies on two fundamental devices: the so-called metaphor of opposition, which works as a bold enthymeme, and an ingenious appropriation of cl. and mod. literary models.

Marino's diverse production in verse and prose testifies to his exceptional erudition. His collection of lyrics La Lira (1602, 1614) subverts the logical structure and the rarefied tone of Ren. poetry, defies traditional versification, and explores unusual and even morbid topics. In La Galeria (1619), he illustrates real and imaginary paintings and sculptures, whereas in La sampogna (1620) he recounts famous myths (e.g., the abduction of Europa, Actaeon's death) from new, unexpected narrative perspectives. The principal manifesto of It. *baroque culture is Marino's treatise Dicerie sacre (1614), whose three parts investigate verbal and visual lang. ("On the Shroud of Turin"); music ("On the Seven Words of Christ"); and astronomy ("The Sky"). His poem L' Adone (1623), three times longer than Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata, expands the well-known, brief "mythic fable" through narrative detours, encyclopedic *catalogs, descriptions of "marvels," and a complex and highly metaphorical *syntax.

Marino's style exerted such a pervasive influence on It. lit. that it is impossible to draw a clear distinction between his enthusiastic followers and those who, like Gabriello Chiabrera and Tommaso Stigliani, theorize a sober, more cl. form of expression. The influence of Marinism is detectable in Eng. poets such as Richard Crashaw, who trans. the first book of Marino's La strage degli innocenti, William Drummond of Hawthornden, and Edward Sherburne. Although it has some similarities with other Eur. baroque movements, such as *préciosité and Gongorism, Marinism is essentially an It. literary phenomenon.

In Marinism, 17th-c. pessimism finds its most effective idiom, as in the poetry of Ciro di Pers, whose verses on the image of the clock are stunning meditations on time, and in the funereal Scintille poetiche of the Jesuit Giacomo Lubrano. Catholic spirituality sees in Marinism a poetics accordant with the spirit of Loyolan meditation. See, for instance, Lucrezia Marinella's canzoniere*, focused on the contemplation of sacred paintings, and Guido Casoni's La passione di Cristo, a visual poem divided into a series of symbolic forms, each synthesizing an essential moment of the incarnate Word's passion (e.g., the column, two scourges, the Cross, the hammer, three nails, the sponge, the spear, the stair, two dice).

See CONCEPTISMO; ITALY, POETRY OF.

■ B. Croce, Lirici marinisti (1910), and Storia dell'etá barocca in Italia (1925); J. V. Mirollo, The Poet of the Marvelous (1963); H. Friedrich, Epochen der italienischen Lyrik (1964); M. Guglielminetti, Tecnica e invenzione nell'opera di Giambittista Marino (1964); C. Jannaco, Il Seicento, 2d ed. (1966); C. Colombo, Cultura e tradizione nell'Adone di G. B. Marino (1967); G. Conte, La metafora barocca (1972); F. J. Warnke, Versions of Baroque (1972); Manierismo e letteratura, ed. D. Dalla Valle and G. L. Zardini (1986); Culture and Authority in the Baroque, ed. M. Ciavolella and P. Coleman (2003); E. Ardissino, Il Seicento (2005); E. Russo, Marino (2008).

A. MAGGI

MASCULINE AND FEMININE. The terms masculine and feminine have to do with how prosodic units end: a masculine ending has an accented syllable at the end, while a feminine ending has an unaccented syllable at the end. The distinction is applied to how lines end, as well as to rhymes and *caesuras. The rhyme between fount and mount, e.g., is said to be masculine, that between fountain and mountain feminine.

With ordinary feminine rhyme, the accented rhyming syllable is followed by an undifferentiated unaccented syllable, so that the rhyme in both cases is between fount and mount, with the unaccented -ain syllable being the same in both words. In some cases, the additional syllable is some sort of functional suffix, as with walking/talking and truly/duly.

Confusingly, the feminine rhyme is sometimes called double, even though the actual rhyme remains an affair of single accented syllables. An authentic double rhyme, such as that between childhood and wildwood, must now be called compound. That sort of rhyme seems to be feminine also, except that the less-accented syllables are differentiated. Use of double for feminine does facilitate the extension of terminology to triple (medicate/dedicate), quadruple (medicated/dedicated), quintuple (medicatedly/dedicatedly), and so forth.

Since most Eng. verse is *iambic, most Eng. verse lines, whether rhymed or not, end with an accented syllable. Lines that happen to end with an unaccented syllable are said to have a feminine ending, but the point is hardly worth making unless such endings occur in unusual abundance, as in Hamlet's soliloquy:

> To be or not to be—that is the question:
> Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
> The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
> Or to take arms against a sea of troubles
> And, by opposing, end them. To die, to sleep. . . .

Some have suggested that the feminine ending is less definite, resolute, decisive, or forcible, and some likewise account for the term feminine on the basis of an attribution of certain qualities to women; but all that is entirely subjective, impressionistic, and conditional. With Hamlet's meditation, however, the unusual number of successive feminine endings may contribute to a slower pace and more deliberate movement.

Because of the so-called "e feminine" in older Fr. and in ME, many lines in Chaucer end with an unaccented syllable, which later became mute:

> As lene was his hors as is a rake,
> And he nas nat right fat, I undertake. . . .

For Chaucer, that rhyme is feminine; for us, masculine.

The commonest sort of feminine rhyme places an unaccented syllable after an accented rhyming syllable, as in headed / breaded. In an uncommon sort, the second syllable is undifferentiated but does carry a level of secondary stress, as with headline / breadline.

The distinction between masculine and feminine also applies to a midline pause or caesura. The masculine caesura falls after an accented syllable:

> Let Rome in Tiber melt, || and the wide arch
> Of the ranged empire fall. || Here is my space.
> Kingdoms are clay; || our dungy earth alike
> Feeds beast as man; || the nobleness of life
> Is to do thus; || when such a mutual pair
> And such a twain can do't.
>
> (Antony and Cleopatra 1.1.34)

> The barge she sat in, || like a burnished throne,
> Burned on the water: || the poop was beaten > gold. . . .
>
> (Ant. 2.2.200)

Although much depends on a subjective response to a variable performance, the former may seem more definite and resolute, the latter indefinite and irresolute, with the possibility of a "dying fall."

Frequently in rhymed verse, a feminine rhyme will appear in an environment of mostly masculine rhymes, which are much commoner in Eng. There are very few poems that employ nothing but multiple rhymes, and all of them are humorous in one way or another. (Some suggest that the feminine rhyme is inherently paradoxical, since rhyme is defined by how a syllable ends; something after the end may seem contradictory.) Thomas Hardy's "A Refusal," on the denial of a memorial place in Westminster Abbey to Lord Byron, has no masculine rhymes. A few, such as "charity"/"clarity," are triple, but most are feminine in a variety of types. Many are ordinary ("dinner"/"sinner"); some involve *mosaic rhyme, in which one word rhymes with two ("stonework"/"own work"). A few are of the compound variety ("name mere"/"fame here").

Many poems place masculine and feminine endings in a recurrent pattern. The commonest pattern alternates feminine and masculine, as in A. E. Housman's "Epitaph on an Army of Mercenaries":

These, in the day when heaven was falling,
The hour when Earth's foundations fled,
Followed their mercenary calling
And took their wages and are dead.

Alternation of masculine and feminine is rarer and may be associated with comic syncopation:

Yankee Doodle went to town
A-riding on a pony
Stuck a feather in his hat
And called it macaroni.

Yankee Doodle keep it up
Yankee Doodle dandy
Mind the music and the step
And with the girls be handy.

G. M. Hopkins's It. *sonnet "The Windhover," with a rhyme scheme of abbaabba cdcdcd, uses masculine rhymes in the a and c positions, feminine in the b and d. In a small bonus, the accented syllable in the a rhyme ("wing," "thing," and so forth) is echoed by the unaccented syllable in the b ("riding"/"hiding"). A similar effect may be heard in "Epitaph on an Army of Mercenaries," where the masculine rhymes in the first stanza ("fled"/"dead") are echoed by the feminine rhymes in the second ("suspended"/"defended").

■ G. Saintsbury, Historical Manual of English Prosody (1919); P. W. Timberlake, The Feminine Ending in English Blank Verse (1931); F. Manning Smith, "Mrs. Browning's Rhymes," PMLA 54 (1939); Saintsbury, Prosody; P. Fussell, Poetic Meter and Poetic Form, rev. ed. (1979); W. Harmon, "Rhyme in English Verse: History, Structures, Functions," SP 84 (1987); P. Hobsbaum, Metre, Rhythm and Verse Form (1996); W. Harmon, "English Versification: Fifteen Hundred Years of Continuity and Change," SP 94 (1997); J. Hollander, Rhyme's Reason (2001).

W. Harmon

MASNAVĪ, also mathnavī. Also referred to as muthannā (doubled), athnayn athnayn (two by two), masnavī is one of the oldest poetic forms in the Persian-speaking world. Its most prevalent uses historically have been in epic-narrative, epic-romantic, epic-didactic, and homiletic expressions. It is a prosodic form (rhyme scheme) in which each *distich (bayt) consists of two metrically identical rhyming *hemistichs (miṣrā). Its Ar. counterpart, muzdawij, did not enjoy the general utility and thematic parameters of masnavī in Persian lit. Most masnavīs have been versified in two shorter rhyming schemes of Baḥr-i mutaqārrib-i muthamman and baḥr-i khafīf. Epic-heroic masnavīs, such as Shāhnāma (Book of Kings) of Firdawsī (b. 940) and Garshaspnāma (The Epic of Garshāsp) of Asadī Gurgānī (d. 1111), are works that aim to inspire patriotism. Sanāʾī's (d. 1130?) masnavī Ḥadīqat al-Ḥaqīqa (The Garden of Truth and the Path's Canon) and the voluminous Khamsa (Quintet) of Niẓāmī (d. 1209) best represent the mystical epic and epic-didactic, respectively. Often Niẓāmī's romantic masnavīs examine the failings of aristocracy. Sanāʾī's other masnavī, Sayr al-ʿibād alā al-Maʿād (The Journey of the Pious to the Point of Return), was a poetic and generative striving of the soul for perfection that served as a model for Farīd al-Dīnʿ Aṭṭār's (d. ca. 1221) Manṭiq al-ṭayr (Conference of the Birds), a series of mystical tales within an allegorical narrative of birds. Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī's Masnavī-i Maʿnavī (The Masnavī of Meanings) is a mystical manifesto that is simply referred to as "the Masnavī," and the poet's inspirations for it have become folklore. Firdawsī, Sanāʾī, ʿAṭṭār, Niẓāmī, and Rūmī are models for all who followed. Amir Khusrau of Delhi (d. 1325) expanded Niẓāmī's genre to include topical materials, and Maktabī (d. 1493) responded to Niẓāmī's legend by his own Laylī va Majnūn. Jāmī (d. 1492) adapted themes from his predecessors to present a mystical conception of love in his massive work of lucid Sufi lessons and meanings Haft Aurang (Seven Thrones). Saʿdī's (d. 1292) Būstān (The Garden) consists of exemplary tales followed by moral glosses. Auḥadī Marāghī (d. 1338) employed an epistolary format in his Manṭiq al-ʿushshāq (Lovers' Converse); ʿUbayd-i Zākānī (d. 1371) used masnavī for satirical purposes. Other masnavīs of note are Hilālī Shīrāzī's (d. 1535) rhetorically rich erotic-mystic Sihr-i Halāl (Lawful Incantation) and Shamʿu Parvāna (The Candle and the Moth). Masnavī was adopted into Turkish, Ottoman, and Urdu lit., where it also acquired considerable popularity.

See arabic poetry, persian poetry, turkish poetry, urdu poetry.

■ "Masnawi," Encyclopaedia of Islam, ed. M. T. Houtsma et al. (1913–34); The Mathnawī, ed. and trans. R. A. Nicholson, 8 v. (1925–40); G. E. von Grunebaum, "On the Origin and Early Development of Arabic Muzdawij Poetry," Journal of Near Eastern Studies 3 (1944); M. Molé, "L'Epopée iranienne après Firdosi," La Nouvelle Clio 5 (1953); G. E. von Grunebaum, Islam: Essays on the Nature and Growth of a Cultural Tradition (1955); "Mathnavī," Lughatnām-i Dihkhudā (Dihkudā's Lexicon), 52 v. (1958–); J. Rypka, History of Iranian Literature, 2d ed. (1968); P. J. Chelkowski, Mirror of the Invisible World (1975); W. L. Hanaway Jr., "The Iranian Epics," Heroic Epic and Saga, ed. F. J. Oinas (1978); J.T.P. de Bruijn, Of Piety and Poetry (1983); F. al-Dīn Aṭṭār, The Conference of the Birds, trans. A. Darbandi and D. Davis (1984); E.J.W. Gibb, A History of Ottoman Poetry, v. 1, 2d ed. (1984); S. Shamīsā, Sayrī dar Shiʿr-i Fārsī (Assessing Persian Poetry), (1984); Tahavvul-i Shiʿr-i Fārsī (Generative Morphology of Persian Verse), 4th ed. (1992); M. Rastagār-Fasāʾī, ʿAnvā -i Shiʿr-i Fārsī (1994); W. M. Thackston, A Millennium of Classical Persian Poetry (1994).

J. S. Meisami; A. Korangy Isfahani

MASQUE. The masque is an early mod. theatrical genre that flourished in Italy, France, and esp. England. It drew upon various kinds of entertainment that had arisen throughout Europe in the Middle Ages, and in England upon the mummings and disguisings that had become popular amusements on festive occasions, put on in the streets, as well as in halls and courts. The character of such productions took form in Italy when masked and ornately costumed figures presented as mythological or allegorical beings entered a noble hall or royal court, singing and dancing, complimenting their hosts, and, in the course of the entertainment, calling on the spectators to join them in dancing. In bringing the royal and noble personages into the company of supernatural beings, the entertainments often affirmed the relation of royalty to divinity. As a theatrical event, a masque is typically invested in *song, dance, and spectacle at the expense of plot or characters. Its performance in a courtly setting ensures that it will adopt a celebratory position toward the monarch and the aristocracy, but the mythological or allegorical nature of many masques might introduce ambiguities or equivocalities within the dominant tone. Following the transformative work of Stephen Orgel, masques have come to be regarded as complex representations of power and its tributaries. Scholars have studied how masques are connected to the pageant form, whether in the commercial theater or in civic shows; iconography; production techniques; and the relation among the elements of lang., dance, and music.

The ambitiousness of masques was taken to justify enormous expenditures for their productions. In Florence, the architect Filippo Brunelleschi and, in Milan, the younger polymath Leonardo da Vinci were called on to design scenery and to devise machines providing spectacular effects, creating heavenly and sometimes infernal vistas. Henry VIII brought the masque to England early in his reign, and it continued to play a minor but significant role in the theatrical and courtly cultures of his daughter Elizabeth I, until the Stuart kings embraced it vigorously. The It. term used for these entertainments, maschere (masks), was taken over by the Eng. as maske as early as 1513.

The poet and playwright Ben Jonson is credited with inventing the antimasque, a briefer entertainment ordinarily preceding the main one, and offering effectually the other side of the coin—comic treatment of the unruly forces and elements monarchy subdues, the grotesque persons contrasting with the gorgeous ones of the main masque.

Circe, a ballet de cour produced in Paris in 1581, helped set the mode for later Eng. masques in providing greater dramatic and thematic unity than had previously been usual. Jonson's conception of the masque as primarily the work of the poet went further in aiming for dramatic unity; in the Preface to Hymenaei (1606), he speaks of the theme and words of the masque as its soul, the spectacle and mime and dancing its body. The architect Inigo Jones, however, continued to stress the spectacular and, after ceasing collaboration with Jonson in 1631, was free to give full scope to the most elaborate visual effects. The Stuart kings supported his and others' work generously—James Shirley's Triumph of Peace (1634) was as richly produced as anything under Henry VIII. The interest in thematic and dramatic unity, however, continued, and was strengthened by the new custom of concentrating the action on a stage at one end of the hall.

The Elizabethan theater had made some place for maskings; the informal, improvised kind that was apparently very popular is briefly represented in Romeo and Juliet. More elaborate forms are present in Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale, and The Tempest. But the conventions that developed for combining music and dancing with allegory and spectacle excluded the tensions of drama; much of the controversy between Jonson and Jones concerned the question of how far the presentation of character and meaning were to challenge the choreography. In the Jacobean period, the establishment of the proscenium arch led to the devel. of a special genre that has been called the "substantive theatre masque." With the Restoration, masques were often assimilated in the new operatic works but were also sometimes offered as a special kind of opera, as one may think 18th-c. instances of John Milton's Comus were produced.

See DRAMATIC POETRY.

■ E. K. Chambers, The Medieval Stage (1903); A. Solerti, Musica, ballo e drammatica alla corte medicea dal 1600 al 1637 (1905); H. Prunières, Le Ballet de cour en France avant Benserade et Lully (1914); Designs by Inigo Jones for Masques and Plays at Court, ed. P. Simpson and C. F. Bell (1924); E. Welsford, The Court Masque (1927); A. Nicoll, Stuart Masques and the Renaissance Stage (1938); J. Arthos, On a Mask Presented at Ludlow Castle (1954); Songs and Dances for the Stuart Masque, ed. A. Sabol (1959); S. Orgel, The Jonsonian Masque (1965); J. G. Demaray, Milton and the Masque Tradition (1968); A. Fletcher, The Transcendental Masque (1971); Twentieth-Century Criticism of English Masques, Pageants and Entertainments, ed. D. M. Bergeron (1972); S. Orgel and R. C. Strong, Inigo Jones, 2 v. (1973); R. C. Strong, Splendor at Court (1973); S. Orgel, The Illusion of Power (1975); D. J. Gordon, The Renaissance Imagination (1976); G.W.G. Wickham, Early English Stages, 1300–1660, 2d ed. (1980); M. C. McGuire, Milton's Puritan Masque (1983); S. P. Sutherland, Masques in Jacobean Tragedy (1983); R. C. Strong, Art and Power (1984); S. Kogan, The Hieroglyphic King (1986); J. Limon, The Masque of Stuart Culture (1990); E. T. Jordan, "Inigo Jones and the Architecture of Poetry," RQ 44 (1991); M. Franko, Dance as Text: Ideologies of the Baroque Body (1993); H. Gatti, "Giordano Bruno and the Stuart Court Masques," RQ 48 (1995); The Politics of the Stuart Court Masque, ed. D. Bevington (1998); J. M. Smith, "Effaced History: Facing the Colonial Contexts of Ben Jonson's Irish Masque at Court," ELH 65 (1998); T. M. Greene, "Labyrinth Dances in the French and English Renaissance," RQ 54 (2001); S. Orgel, "The Case for Comus," Representations 81 (2003); K. Pask, "Caliban's Masque," ELH 70 (2003); B. Hoxby, "The Wisdom of Their Feet: Meaningful Dance in Milton and the Stuart Masque," English Literary Renaissance 37 (2007); S. Orgel, "Reconstructing the Spectacles of State," Ben Jonson Journal 17 (2010); L. Shohet, Reading Masques (2010).

J. ARTHOS; F. TEAGUE; R. GREENE

MATRIX. In Riffaterre's semiotic system, matrix refers to "the structure of the given" in a poem. Unlike the *hypogram, which has a phenomenal reality, the matrix is "an abstract concept never actualized per se: it becomes visible only in its variants, the ungrammaticalities." For Riffaterre, the poem results from the "transformation of the matrix, a minimal and literal sentence, into a longer, complex, and non-literal periphrasis." De Man points out that Riffaterre's use of the term matrix is (perhaps purposefully) inconsistent.

See PERIPHRASIS, SEMIOTICS AND POETRY.

■ M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); P. de Man, "Hypogram and Inscription," The Resistance to Theory (1986).

H. FEINSOD

MAYAN POETRY. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

MEASURE. (1) Because meter and measure both derive from Gr. metron*, which itself means measure, since the 15th c. they have been used nearly synonymously, in a general sense, to refer to the system of organization in a poem or the units that comprise that system; thus, in hymnody, common measure is also frequently referred to as common meter (see BALLAD METER). (2) In musical theories of prosody (see METER, PROSODY) that are based on the analogy of the verse measure to the bar in music, the metrical unit always begins with a stress and is usually referred to as a measure. (3) Historical meanings of measure include "tune," as early as the 14th c., and "dance," as early as the 16th.

(4) However, there is another sense in which the terms meter and measure are more divergent in reference, the latter associating itself more closely with rhythm* in a broader and looser sense than the more precise senses that the term meter suggests. In a regular meter, there is but one base foot or metrical unit, variations being strictly controlled, but in loose metrical verse or *free verse, the measures may vary considerably in size and shape depending on how they are scanned. Indeed, the crucial point to recognize about all systems of *scansion that employ measures rather than feet is that the successive measures in the line are dissimilar, disparate, and frequently unpredictable, unlike the predictable regularities of foot verse. Prior to the advent of free verse in Eng., the measure was mainly associated with music or musical scansion ([2] above). It is precisely because measure connotes regular ordering that free-verse measures must be based on principles radically divergent from traditional prosody if they are to avoid being found simply a contradiction in terms (see VARIABLE FOOT).

(5) In other langs., however—most of the Romance-lang. prosodies, e.g. (see Scott)—the measure has long been a fundamental and constitutive element of metrical analysis. In these systems, the verse measures conform to the natural phrasal groupings of the lang., each phrase having its dominant phrase stress and being demarcated by pauses of differing degree (see FRENCH PROSODY).

(6) In the largest sense, measure is a general trope for poetic order, even poetic epistemology, acknowledged by poets and critics alike: e.g., W. C. Williams held that verse must be measured in order to be verse. Indeed, measure is the key concept in Williams's thought. It is only by the act of measuring, he insisted, that we come to know the world. When we encounter something unknown, our standard of measurement can only be what we already know; hence, the measurements of cognition necessarily entail recognition. The operations of measure in verse reflect this epistemological repetition, in that measure involves the structuring of lang. to come by reference to lang. that has already passed. I. A. Richards attributes this backward-looking aspect of verse to "the influence of past words." When poets measure lang., they allow earlier words to determine the organization of later ones. The more tightly the organization of earlier words controls that of later ones, the more regular the pattern and the more likely it is that the measure is a meter.

In any event, measuring is a fundamental principle of verse structure, and such measure in verse realizes itself in and through the *line; measurement seems to inhere in the very concept and act of lineation. Perhaps a poet's measure is a meter that, through counting syllables or stresses or both, determines structure within the line; perhaps it is something looser that, through reliance on syntactic repetitions, visual patterns, or the intermingling of end-stopped and enjambed lines, develops patterns between or among lines. Either way, no matter how tightly the influence of past words controls its own internal structure, the line itself measures out lang. in ways that are essential and unique to verse.

See COLON, COUPE, FOOT.

■ Richards; P. Habermann, "Takt," Reallexikon I; H. Nemerov, "On the Measure of Poetry," CritI 6 (1979); Scott; S. Cushman, William Carlos Williams and the Meanings of Measure (1985); J. Holden, "Poetry and Mathematics," The Measured Word, ed. K. Brown (2001); M. Golston, Rhythm and Race in Modernist Poetry and Science (2008), esp. chap 5.

T.V.F. BROGAN; S. CUSHMAN

MEDIEVAL POETICS. The rich trad. of med. poetics is the product of many intersections in cl. reception, education, philosophy and theology, and debates over the claims of sacred and secular writings. These fields came to shape med. literary culture through the formal procedures of learning: the trivium arts of grammar, rhet., and logic, and scriptural and philosophical commentary. The structural and intellectual interests of med. poetics in Europe grew out of engagement with cl. antiquity and, in turn, provided the grounds for early mod. and mod. poetic practices and conceptions of poetic *knowledge.

Ancient grammarians taught ars recte loquendi (the art of speaking correctly) or proper usage; they also taught the uses of lang. in lit. The major Lat. grammatical works of late antiquity that remained standard in the med. West were Donatus's Ars minor and Ars maior (4th c. CE) and Priscian's Institutiones grammaticae (6th c. CE). The Roman grammarians used cl. Lat. poetry and prose to exemplify rules and usage, but they also used poetry to illustrate deviation from rules. The third section of Donatus's Ars maior, known in the Middle Ages as the Barbarismus, treats faults or mistakes (vitia) that occur through ignorance: "barbarisms," which occur in single words, and "solecisms," which occur in combinations of words. But such "faults" can also be deployed deliberately by the great poets, whose mastery of lang. gives them the "license" to deviate from correct usage: in these cases, the barbarism is a metaplasm or transformation (of the form of a word), and the solecism is a "figure" (schema), either a figure of speech (an *ornament of lang. such as *anaphora) or a figure of thought (which involves meaning in a larger sense). A further dimension of "faults" that Donatus includes is the *trope, a purely intentional poetic device that involves transference of a word from its "proper signification" to an "improper" one based on perceived likeness between things. The Donatan treatment of figures and tropes, along with other grammatical teaching on metrical forms, was carried into Christian poetics through Bede's De schematibus et tropis (ca. 710) which, like other works (now mostly lost) in the trad. of the "Christianized Donatus," substituted scriptural examples for cl. Lat. poetry.

The notion that poetry was a permitted deviation from correctness extended far beyond grammar pedagogy on figures and tropes, becoming a signature definition of poetic fiction. The 4th-c. Christian apologist Lactantius formulated a surprising case for poetry (the pagan mythologists) by claiming that poets do not lie but rather are licensed to refigure truth. It is, he says, the job of poets to transpose events into other representations by means of oblique figures (Divinarum institutiones 1.11). Lactantius's formulation was taken up by the 7th-c. Christian encyclopedist Isidore of Seville and from here passed to many later writers, incl. Vincent of Beauvais (13th-c. encyclopedist), Pierre Bersuire (14th-c. commentator on Ovid), and Giovanni Boccaccio, whose Genealogia deorum gentilium (1360) gave a resounding defense of poetry against the old Platonic and Christian charges that poetry is mere falsehood. This ancient and med. notion of licensed deviation stands behind Philip Sidney's pronouncement: "the poet . . . nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth" (Defence of Poesy, 1595). Donatus's grammatical framing of metaplasm, figure, and trope also permeated 13th-c. scholastic thought about lang. and its ambiguities (of which poetry was seen as a perfect test case). While mod. thought about poetic lang., the figures and tropes, correctly invokes cl. authorities as the ultimate sources of such distinctions and definitions, the very habit of relying on and reformulating the ancient authorities is the direct product of med. learning.

Grammarians were also the authorities on critical matters of emending and authenticating texts and ensuring their correct interpretation. The method associated with this function was the enarratio poetarum (commentary on the poet). In classroom teaching, this method incorporated *imitation of poems and similar exercises. The grammarian's enarratio formed the basis of med. textual *exegesis on both sacred and secular writings. But the practice of enarratio ranged across a continuum from gloss to schoolroom imitation to interpretive recasting, and ultimately—with the rise of vernacular lits.—trans. As the most basic critical and textual methodology, enarratio complemented the interests of cultural conservation in late Lat. antiquity and the early Middle Ages. Augustine compared Christian use of the wealth of pagan learning to the Hebrews taking the gold out of Egypt (De doctrina christiana 2 [397–427]), and, in general, early Christian writers recognized the necessity of conserving ancient trads. of knowledge. With the collapse of Rome, the imperative to preserve the old knowledge—for the sake of a Roman notion of "culture," as well as a fully Latinized Christianity—asserted itself in a process that the early Middle Ages conceptualized as translatio studii (the transference of learning, in this case from Greece and Rome to Christian Europe): along with many compendia of ancient learning, the cl. Lat. literary texts provided a benchmark of ancient authority. Virgil and later Ovid (whose popularity would burgeon in the 12th c.) were inexhaustible resources of philosophical and moral meaning, their writings the subjects of continuous exegetical reinvention. The Expositio Virgilianae continentiae of Fulgentius, a probably Christian mythographer and lexicographer of the late 5th c., essentially rewrites the narrative of the Aeneid according to its perceived philosophical content: the narrative order stays in place; but, read philosophically, it is no longer an example of artificial order (beginning in medias res*), but of natural order, revealing the stages of the philosophical life from birth (Juno's shipwreck in book 1) through enlightenment (the journey to the underworld in book 6) and maturity. The practice of such exegetical refashioning (in Lat. and the vernaculars) is an intensified form of the grammarian's enarratio poetarum, the engine of med. poetics.

Underwriting the power of enarratio was also the rhetorical trad., which gave precepts for composing and which moved beyond the grammarian's focus on lang. and usage to questions of form and style, function, effect, and the architectonics of a work. Cicero's De inventione and the pseudo-Ciceronian Rhetorica ad Herennium were the standard curricular sources, along with Horace's Ars poetica, which served for over a thousand years as a classroom manual of poetic composition; all these preceptive works acquired layers of commentary through the centuries, the Ad Herennium only after about 1100. While the legal and political contexts for Ciceronian rhet. evaporated during the later years of the Roman Empire, the value of teaching rhetorical *invention as a habit of thought was never in doubt. Following Cicero's De inventione and under the influence of Boethius's exclusive focus on invention in his De topicis differentiis (ca. 523), commentators (among them notably the 12th-c. scholars Thierry of Chartres and Petrus Helias) elaborated the theory of invention through topics (loci, seats of argument in logic), thereby linking the process of composition with the process of logical or indeed legal argumentation (act, quality of the act, agent, attributes of the agent, means, motive, and so on). At the same time, the Horatian doctrine of imitating canonical models answered the question of where to look for matter to be invented. In the course of the 12th and 13th cs., Horatian and Ciceronian precepts about composition were synthesized with grammatical study of literary texts in the distinctively med. genre of the ars poetriae, hybrids of prescriptive rhet. and literary analysis. These texts, esp. Matthew of Vendôme's Ars versificatoria (ca. 1175), Geoffrey of Vinsauf's Poetria nova (ca. 1210), Gervase of Melkley's Ars versificaria (ca. 1215), and John of Garland's Parisiana poetria (ca. 1229), brought the full architectural significance of rhetorical thought to bear on poetic and prose composition, in ways more streamlined and practical than in Horace's allusive and subtle Ars poetica. Assuming that composition would begin with imitation of cl. and now also med. literary models, the artes poetriae truncated explicit inventional teaching and focused on transformation of source or given idea through the rhetorical systems of arrangement (dispositio) and *style (elocutio), and esp. in the Poetria nova, the stylistic techniques of *amplification and abbreviation. Some later preceptive poetics, notably Dante's De vulgari eloquentia (ca. 1304) and Eustache Deschamps' L'Art de dictier (1392), resituate the theory within particular vernacular literary cultures.

Roman rhet. also gave a vocabulary for literary analysis of *genre and the figures and tropes. The oldest model of genre, from Aristotle's Rhetoric and restated in the Roman rhets., was that of the three "kinds" of rhet., deliberative, forensic, and epideictic: these categories were pressed into analytical service in Cassiodorus's influential 6th-c. commentary on the Psalms. From the De inventione (1.19.27) and the Ad Herennium (1.8.13), med. writers also derived a threefold classification of narrative: historia (a factual account of events), argumentum (a realistic fiction, a plausible narrative), and fabula (a fantastic story made up of impossible events). The category of fabula was taken up separately in Lat. Neoplatonist thought, where it had a spectacular career, discussed below. The tripartite distinction was repeated not only by encyclopedists (e.g., Isidore of Seville's Etymologiae [7th c.], Dominicus Gundissalinus's De divisione philosophiae [12th c.], the Speculum doctrinale of Vincent of Beauvais [ca. 1260, printed 1624], and literary and poetic theorists, such as Conrad of Hirsau [12th c.], the artes poetriae), but by theologians such as Thomas of Chobham (13th c.), who used it to classify the narrative modes of scripture and thus resolve the status of the parable. Another contribution of rhetorical thought was to 13th-c. scholastic refinements of scriptural genres. Cicero had used the term modus (manner) as a category for determining the state of mind in which someone undertakes a criminal action (De inventione 1.27.41). In the 12th c., the term modus acquired an equivalence with genus (a "way" of doing something). In the 13th c., modus was extended to the notion of literary "genre" itself: the Summa Theologica begun by Alexander of Hales (d. 1245) and completed by his students distinguished the "genres" of scripture in terms of the states of mind that different kinds of books produce, i.e., the "modes" of precept, example, exhortation, revelation, and prayer. Other 13th-c. commentators went on to distinguish between the narrative, admonitory, exhortative, preceptive, disputative, and epideictic modes of different books of the Bible. This can be seen as a definitive med. contribution to genre theory that looks forward to mod. conceptions of genre as a category not only of *form but of *affect.

Like grammar, rhetorical theory treated figures and tropes. But whereas grammatical thought treated them as permitted deviations from correctness, the compositional manuals of the rhetoricians approached figures and tropes as the necessary completion of the composition, the style (elocutio) that clothes or adorns naked matter that has been appropriately found (inventio) and arranged (dispositio). Thus, for the rhetoricians, style is part of the architecture of the poetic edifice (often spoken of as the decoration of the building that has been erected). Definitions of the tropes reflect not only the teaching in the lang. arts but the influence of logic and theology in the use of conceptual categories such as "transumption" (Geoffrey of Vinsauf and the 14th-c. Prague rhetorician Nicolaus Dybinus) and "similitude" (Gervase of Melkley).

Augustine's De doctrina christiana was a transformative influence on *hermeneutics and rhet., both sacred and secular. Its ling. thought is continuous with ancient grammar: it restates grammatical doctrines of lang. as a system of "conventional" signs by which humans make their thoughts known and further emphasizes written over spoken lang. as the object of its analysis. But in its semiotic scope, it far exceeds the grammars of its age, because it lays out a theory of sacred signs as well as human lang., incorporating an approach to the spiritual truths or "things" of scripture as the critical ground for any correct understanding of scriptural discourse. Most important, it redefines the principal part of rhet., invention or discovery (modus inveniendi), as a hermeneutical tool, a method of understanding or discovering what scripture means (1.1.1: the "means of discovering" what is to be understood in scripture). Since scripture is seen to have revealed all truth to be discovered, *interpretation is now the highest (indeed, the truest) form of literary activity. Thus, Augustine replaces traditional legal and logical procedures of invention with a program of close reading informed (though not limited) by Pauline notions of letter and spirit (3.5.9).

Aristotle's Poetics had its effect through logic and ethics. Long before it was translated into Lat. in 1278 by William of Moerbeke, it had been incorporated into Arab science as a division of logic. Arab scholars classified the parts of logic as represented by each work in Aristotle's logical works (the Organon), adding two further forms of logical inquiry represented by the Rhetoric and the Poetics. These last they understood as extensions of the tools of logic, each with its own particular devices of proof: the enthymeme for rhet. and the "imaginative syllogism" for poetics. This system focused on scientific method and its effects rather than on subject matter. According to the De scientiis of Al-Farabi (ca. 870–950), poetry constituted the weakest kind of proof when ranked against the other divisions of logic, but it was still a powerful ethical tool: "it is the property of poetics to cause, by means of its discourse, something beautiful or ugly, which does not exist, to be imagined in such a way that the hearer believes it, and despises it or desires it; for even though we are certain that it is not real, nevertheless our minds are roused to abhor or desire what is pictured forth to us" (De scientiis secundum versionem Dominici Gundisalvi, ed. J.H.J. Schneider [2006]). This account was transmitted to the Latin West in the 12th c. in trans. by Gundissalinus and Gerard of Cremona and was influentially restated by Thomas Aquinas in the Preface to his commentary on Aristotle's Posterior Analytics (1270): poetry is an "approximation [estimatio] through representation" that works through the device of similitude: "it is the poet's function to lead us to virtue through a fitting representation" (Opera omnia 1.2, Leonine ed. [1989]). Aquinas's teacher Albertus Magnus had given priority to the ethical dimension of poetry, seeing it as an instrument of moral philosophy, and his student Giles of Rome popularized the ethical argument in his De regimine principum (ca. 1277–80), which advised rulers to use poetic exempla as means of teaching and persuading the masses. The 12th-c. Arab philosopher Averröes extended the ethical justification of poetry in his "Middle Commentary" on Aristotle's Poetics, trans. into Lat. in 1256 by the Toledan translator Hermannus Alemannus. From Aristotle's suggestion that poetry originated in the genres of *invective and *panegyric (1448b25), Averröes asserted that all poetry is praise (of what is noble) and blame or censure (of what is ignoble), ethical and rhetorical categories that he equated with the genres of *tragedy and *comedy, respectively. But this is probably not the source of ideas of tragedy in works such as Dante's "Letter to Can Grande" (1321) or Chaucer's "Monk's Tale." The notion of tragedy as recitation of misfortunes is more likely to have been derived from Isidore of Seville and his partial synthesis of Lat. sources.

Philosophical commentary on poetic *myth and Christian (as well as Jewish) scriptural commentary were in some respects closely allied. Gr. divinatory exegesis had provided the essential vocabulary of allegoria and symbolon; Neoplatonist philosophers (Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus, early to late 3d c.) read Plato and Homer to reveal divine and cosmological truths beneath the text. Gr. Christian commentary of the same era (esp. the writings of Origen) borrowed much of the vocabulary and shared the method of theurgic reading, discovering divine unity beneath the textual surface. For the philosopher, the textual surface—however appealing—is mere *fable, fabula, a vehicle of the profound and abiding truths that lie beneath. The notion of fabula was classically formulated by Macrobius (early 5th c.) in his commentary on the dream of Scipio (from Cicero's De republica). Here fabula is that kind of fiction that conceals a philosophical truth: these are the myths used by Plato, Cicero, and other thinkers to keep philosophical truths undefiled by the ignorant and foolish. But for Christian exegesis, the surface or letter of the Bible is never untrue, and any apparent inconsistency or implausibility must be reconciled with deeper levels of spiritual meaning so that the true meaning may be understood. From this came the fourfold system of Christian biblical exegesis, an enduring method given its standard formulation by John Cassian in the 4th c. The Macrobian position, however, acquired new prestige in the 12th c. with the circle of Christian Platonists linked with the cathedral school of Chartres. In the vocabulary of William of Conches (ca. 1090–1154) and Bernardus Silvestris (fl. 1136–50), fabula is made equivalent to the term integumentum. According to the commentary on Martianus Capella attributed to Bernardus, figurative discourse is a "wrapping" (involucrum) that can be divided into *"allegory" and "integument": "Allegory is a discourse that envelops within a historical narration a meaning that is true and different from what is said on the surface, as in the story of Jacob wrestling. Integument is a discourse that encloses a true meaning under a fabulous narration, such as the story of Orpheus. . . . Allegory is appropriate to the divine page, integument to philosophy. . . . Let us note that integuments contain equivocations and multiple significations" (The Commentary on Martianus Capella's "De nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii" Attributed to Bernardus Silvestris, ed. H. J. Westra [1986]). In Bernardus's own writings, the notion of the polyvalent "integument" generated inspired interpretation (his Platonizing commentary on the Aeneid that far outstrips its Fulgentian source in imaginative power) and cosmographical allegory (his own Cosmographia). The philosophical truth claimed for "integumental" writing launched further allegorical inventions, notably the cosmic visionary poetry of Alan of Lille (ca. 1116–1202) and the influential vernacular *dream vision the Roman de la Rose (ca. 1230, ca. 1270–80) by Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun, which explicitly lays claim to philosophical authority by calling itself an "integument." The bold claims to theological authority for Dante's Commedia made in the "Letter to Can Grande" represent at once the most forceful extension of this secular philosophical trad. and its return to its earliest affiliations with scriptural exegesis.

A key technology of lit. crit. was the accessus ad auctores (introductions to the authors). These conventionalized introductions grew out of early grammatical commentary as well as rhetorical teaching of the topics and later out of Aristotelian theories of causation. They gave rise to a flexible discourse about form and meaning, but even more about authorship. In the accessus, the commentator became the voice of authorial *intention, explaining the author's motives in the belated terms of the meaning now imposed on the work. But these interpretive struggles defended the canonical value of questionable works: for instance, Ovid's erotic poems could be treated as ethical lessons because they illustrate the folly of promiscuity. These accessus, applied to any authoritative work to be studied (whether literary, theological, or scientific), also shaped the outlook of vernacular poets (e.g., Guillaume de Lorris, Jean de Meun, Dante, Chaucer, John Gower) who drew from their lang. and form to authorize their own mod. canonical ambitions.

See ENGLAND, POETRY OF; FRANCE, POETRY OF; GERMAN POETRY; HEBRAISM; ITALY, POETRY OF; LATIN POETRY; MEDIEVAL POETRY; MEDIEVAL ROMANCE; OCCITAN POETRY; RHETORIC AND POETRY; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: Medieval Literary Theory and Criticism, ca. 1100–1375: The Commentary Tradition, ed. A. J. Minnis and A. B. Scott (1988); Medieval Grammar and Rhetoric: Language Arts and Literary Theory AD 300–1475, ed. R. Copeland and I. Sluiter (2009)—both anthols. contain trans. and studies of many of the works cited.

■ Criticism and History: B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1941); R. McKeon, "Rhetoric in the Middle Ages," Speculum 17 (1942); H. de Lubac, Exegèse médiéval (1959–64); F. Quadlbauer, Die antike Theorie der genera dicendi im lateinischen Mittelalter (1962); E. Auerbach, Literary Language and Its Public in Late Latin Antiquity and in the Middle Ages, trans. R. Manheim (1965); W. Wetherbee, Platonism and Poetry in the Twelfth Century (1972); P. Zumthor, Essai de poétique médievale (1972); E. Jeauneau, Lectio philosophorum: Recherches sur l'école de Chartres (1973); P. Dronke, Fabula (1974); J. J. Murphy, Rhetoric in the Middle Ages (1974); G. Dahan, "Notes et textes sur la poétique au moyen âge," Archives d'Histoire Doctrinale et Littéraire du Moyen Âge 47 (1980); J. Allen, Ethical Poetics in the Later Middle Ages (1983); A. J. Minnis, Medieval Theory of Authorship (1984); R. Copeland, Rhetoric, Hermeneutics, and Translation in the Middle Ages (1991); H. A. Kelly, Ideas and Forms of Tragedy from Aristotle to the Middle Ages (1991); D. Kelly, The Arts of Poetry and Prose (1991); Lo spazio letterario del medioevo 1. Il medioevo latino, ed. G. Cavallo et al., 5 v. (1992–98); M. Carruthers, "The Poet as Master-Builder," NLH 24 (1993); M. Irvine, The Making of Textual Culture (1994); C. Baswell, Virgil in Medieval England (1995); P. Mehtonen, Old Concepts and New Poetics (1996); B. Stock, Augustine the Reader (1996); Lo spazio letterario del medioevo 2. Il medioevo volgare, ed. P. Boitani et al., 5 v. (1999–2004); A. Butterfield, Poetry and Music in Medieval France from Jean Renart to Guillaume de Machaut (2002); CHLC, v. 2, ed. A. Minnis and I. Johnson (2005); M. Camargo, "Latin Composition Textbooks and Ad Herennium Glossing: The Missing Link?" The Rhetoric of Cicero in Its Medieval and Early Renaissance Commentary Tradition, ed. V. Cox and J. O. Ward (2006); N. Zeeman, "The Gender of Song in Chaucer," SAC 29 (2007); A. R. Ascoli, Dante and the Making of a Modern Author (2007); The Cambridge Companion to Allegory, ed. R. Copeland and P. Struck (2010); M. C. Woods, Classroom Commentaries: Teaching the "Poetria nova" across Medieval and Renaissance Europe (2010).

■ Primary Texts: Alexander of Hales, Summa theologica, ed. B. Klumper (1924–48); Les arts poétiques du XIIe et du XIIIe siècles, ed. E. Faral (1924); Macrobius, Commentarii in somnium Scipionis, ed. J. A. Willis (1994), trans. W. H. Stahl (1952); Conrad of Hirsau, Dialogus super auctores, ed. R.B.C. Huygens (1955); Dante, Epistle to Can Grande, ed. and trans. P. Toynbee, 2d ed. (1966); Hermannus Alemannus, Expositio media Averrois sive "Poetria," De arte poetica, ed. L. Minio-Paluello (1968); Fulgentius, Expositio Virgilianae continentiae, ed. and trans. (in Fr.) E. Wolff (2009), trans. (in Eng.) L. G. Whitbread (1971); Alan of Lille, Anticlaudianus, ed. R. Bossuat (1955), trans. J. J. Sheridan (1973); Lactantius, Institutions divines, ed. and trans. P. Monat et al. (1973–2007); Bernardus Silvestris, Cosmographia, ed. P. Dronke (1978), trans. W. Wetherbee (1973); John of Garland, Parisiana poetria, ed. and trans. T. Lawler (1974); Bernardus Silvestris, Commentum super sex libros Eneidos Virgilii, ed. J. Jones and E. Jones (1977), trans. E. Schreiber and T. Maresca (1979); Alan of Lille, De planctu Naturae, ed. N. Häring, Studi medievali, 3d ser. 19 (1978), trans. J. J. Sheridan (1980); Donat et la tradition de l'enseignement grammaticale, ed. L. Holtz (1981); Thomas of Chobham, Summa de arte praedicandi, ed. F. Morenzoni (1988); Cassiodorus, Expositio Psalmorum, ed. M. Adriaen (1958), trans. P. G. Walsh (1990–91); Dante, De vulgari eloquentia, ed. A. Marigo, 3d ed. (1957), trans. M. Shapiro (1990); Bede, De schematibus et tropis, ed. and trans. C. Kendall (1991); Eustache Deschamps, L'Art de dictier, ed. and trans. D. M. Sinnreich-Levi (1994); Augustine, De doctrina christiana, ed. and trans. R.P.H. Green (1995); Isidore of Seville, Etymologiae, ed. W. M. Lindsay, 2 v. [1911], trans. S. Barney et al. (2006).

R. COPELAND

MEDIEVAL POETRY

I. Latin
II. Vernaculars

Although it is sometimes applied more widely (e.g., "medieval Japanese poetry"), the term medieval was coined by It. humanists to designate the period of Eur. culture between the end of Greco-Roman antiquity and the self-identified rebirth of the same in "Renaissance" Italy.

Since both the category and the historical period to which it refers are profoundly western Eur., in this article the term medieval refers to the period of Roman Catholic hegemony over the former western Roman Empire and its cultural productions. Terminal dates for the period vary, depending on the cultural variables under consideration (for a radical extension, see Le Goff); but in very general terms, we might place them at the definitive fall of the cl. Roman imperial system in the West (mid-5th c. CE) and the rise of It. humanism (15th c.).

Concerning the conception of poetry, med. verse is literary in the sense that it has been preserved in writing (for *oral poetry, see below). For its makers, performers, and audiences, poetry was an "art" in the Lat. sense of skill or craft—e.g., formal manipulation and topical recombination. It was understood in a hierarchy of arts, subsumed under grammar and rhet., and with grammar, rhet. and the rest of the seven liberal arts, set—officially, at least—in the service of (Catholic) theology.

Before the 13th c., the terms poetry, poet, and poem were most often reserved for writers of cl. antiquity. Before about 1050 CE, the words poet and maker were hardly ever used for a contemp. writer or versifier, even one who composed learnedly in Lat. meter; God was the sole Creator. It was applied to cl. poets somewhat pejoratively (e.g., Heloise [d. 1164] calls Ovid "poet of lust and doctor of disgrace"), though Virgil became the Poeta par excellence, as Aristotle eventually became Philosophus. Auctor was similarly affected. Versifiers were apt to designate their works as rhythmi, versus, or carmina, but not poemata.

Negotiations between and among the cultural hegemony of Lat. and Roman Catholicism, the emerging vernaculars, the literary langs. of the other Abrahamic religions, the authority of writing and the practices of oral composition and dissemination will characterize what we now call medieval European poetry. This article discusses principal trends and concepts; for med. poetry in particular langs., trads., and genres, please see the relevant entries.

I. Latin. Lat. is the lang. of official culture during this period; in med. usage, letters and literate almost always refer to the Lat. texts and the ability to decipher and produce them. Thus, clerical Lat. was by definition the lang. of reading and writing. From the Alps to Iceland, Lat. Christianity imposed an alphabet, writing materials, schools and libraries, and an idiom primarily developed for religious expression by a clerical class. It fused elements of Semitic and Hellenic diction, syntax, and figure with the Roman imperial lang.; it absorbed elements of the indigenous oral poetries of the empire's Celtic, Germanic, and Scandinavian peoples; it was affected, too, by the Arab world and lightly by Byzantium.

In the course of ten centuries, Western social systems changed radically, both collectively and regionally. Consequently, there were marked diversities, as literacy spread from the clerical elites to the noble and middle classes and then as the vernaculars became institutionalized in writing.

Esp. in the century following the Nicene Council (325 CE), brilliant, rhetorically trained Romans devoted themselves to developing and disseminating Christian doctrine and liturgy. They supplied the lang. of med. poetry, primarily in prose: Ambrose's *hymns and addresses, Jerome's trans. of scripture (the basis of the Vulgate Bible), and Augustine's doctrinal works expressed insensible realities in sensible terms. At the same time, Christian Roman versifiers cast Heb.-Christian poetry in traditional Lat. genres. This patristic writing, the staple of early med. schools and libraries, was popularized in sermons, liturgy, and paraliturgy as a unified body of doctrine, trad., legend, and myth that was, or might be, poetic.

A. Prosody and Verse Form. Med. Latin prosody evolved from quantitative meters (technically called "metrical verse" in the Middle Ages; see METER, QUANTITY) to *accentual verse ("rhythmical verse," "rhythms") and *rhyme. The great influx of nonnative speakers, at first from the east and later from the north, affected Lat. meters as early as the 2d c. CE; by the end of the 4th c., when Augustine testified that his students could no longer distinguish between long and short syllables, the transition from quantity to *accent had been completed. Though learned poets continued to compose quantitative meters throughout the Middle Ages, popular poets developed patterns derived in part from Lat. art prose, which had taken on "Asian" flourishes, incl. such homophony as *alliteration, *homoeoteleuton, and rhyme.

Isosyllabism (as in Augustine's Psalm against the Donatists), which restricted the greater variation inherent in the quantitative system, aided memory and helped preserve the text. Emphasis on linear units of thought (as in Ambrose's hymns), partly because of choral antiphony, stimulated the growth of patterned terminal rhythms, which acquired stress in the Germanic regions. By the end of the 7th c., homoeoteleuton and *assonance were common, and as Lat. increasingly became a scholastically acquired second lang., these figures of sound increased: by the 12th c., complex di- and trisyllabic rhymes are often found.

B. Modes and Genres. At the early centers of literacy, the basic modes of Lat. verse were hymnody, hagiography, and secular verse.

Hymnody was the heart of *lyric poetry, and scriptural *psalms and canticles its muscle. Hymns, defined as songs of praise, were written and used from the patristic period, most notably by Ambrose. Later, sequences developed in the Mass from the extension of Hebraic jubilations like the Alleluia. Hymns were admitted into general use in the Roman Office in the 12th c.; the philosopher Peter Abelard (d. 1142) was a prolific hymn-poet of astonishing metrical inventiveness. The mendicant orders, esp. the Franciscans of the 13th c., composed some of the most moving religious lyrics ("Stabat mater," "Dies irae") of the period.

Hagiography, which had arisen in the late cl. period, combines in various proportions biblical narrative, epideictic eloquence, and Gr. romance in tales for meditation, instruction, and pious entertainment (see DIDACTIC POETRY). Because in cloisters it was employed for reading in nocturnal office and in refectory as well as for private meditation, demand and supply were high. The Eastern trad. of monasticism introduced Byzantine narrative forms and devices. These narrative structures later informed secular narrative in the vernacular: *medieval romance is often markedly hagiographical.

Secular verse was proudly antiquarian at first, a means by which members of the clerical elite displayed their learning, sophistication, and political connections. The scholars, as the only literates, composed *occasional verse—epistles, *eclogues, *epigrams, *panegyrics, and the like—usually in quantitative meters. They provided the often imaginative verse chronicles and the specula or "mirrors" for leaders of church and state; these ranged from manners and advice to witty trifles for amusement. Even textbooks were sometimes cast into meter, partially as models. Roman poets (esp. Virgil and Ovid) formed the core of the school curriculum (accessus ad auctores), and *imitation was a principal pedagogical method. Thus, from the 11th c. onward, we have skilled imitations of Roman drama, *epic, and the erotic poetry of Ovid. Such exercises in imitation shaped the style and imagination of clerically trained writers when they turned their hands to writing in the vernaculars.

Collections of med. Lat. lyric survive in mss. from the 11th c., often as part of larger codices containing ecclesiastical works in prose. The so-called Cambridge Songs (11th c.) and the 20 love poems from the Ripoll monastery in the Pyrenees (12th c.), e.g., appear in mss. also containing the core curriculum of monastic Lat. education; the Carmina Burana (ca. 1230), however, constitute a freestanding volume. These collections are thematically, metrically, and even linguistically varied. Their topics range from devotions and moralizations through acerbic *satire to songs in praise of drink and carnal love; poems may be *macaronic or even fully bilingual, as in the case of some of the Carmina Burana and Cambridge Songs. The *parodies, drinking and love songs, and scurrilities are often called *Goliardic verse; the learned literate poets who composed them introduced an ecclesiastical art to a wider public. Esp. as they located posts in civic life as chaplains or chancellors, they were prime agents in adapting the forms, imagery, idiom, and melody of Lat. verse to secular concerns and the emergent vernaculars.

II. Vernaculars

A. First Surviving Poems. Poems and songs were composed, recited, and sung in the vernacular langs. long before they were recorded in writing.

But written texts are what we have to go by. The earliest vernacular documents are Eng. and are contemporaneous with Bede's description (Historia ecclesiastica 4.22) of Cædmon, the earliest identifiable Germanic poet (fl. ca. 670). According to Bede, Cædmon dreamed a hymn to the Maker of Heaven and Earth; thereafter, monastic doctors taught him scripture, which he converted to verse for their transcription.

Early Germanic verse was adapted transcription (Widsith, Beowulf), transference (Genesis), or imitation (Phoenix) of great poetic power. The earliest verses in the Romance vernacular (ca. 880) are a paraliturgical exaltation of an early virgin martyr, Eulalie, of unevenly decasyllabic assonant lines in a lang. that looks more Fr. than Lat. The same ms. contains both a Lat. Eulalia with lines borrowed from the Christian Lat. poet Prudentius (ca. 348–405), and the Ludwigslied, an OHG poem in rhyming *couplets in praise of Louis III (d. 882). Thus, the vernaculars of Western Francia are incorporated into ecclesiastical and political power structures.

Surviving mss. give evidence of a rich and varied vernacular poetic culture. As the idea of vernacular literacy takes root and becomes institutionalized, functional, practical literacy in the vernaculars spreads to the noble, merchant, and political classes, and with it, the audience for written forms of vernacular verse. There is religious vernacular verse (devotional lyrics, hagiography, didactic verse). There is secular med. verse (panegyric, satire, parody, narrative, epic, comic, romance, and erotic lyric). There are compositions as brief as an eight-line song in a 15th-c. Castilian *songbook and as long as the 21,750 lines of the Fr. Roman de la Rose (ca. 1230, ca. 1270–80), and verse as uncomplicated as the octosyllabic rhyming couplet and as challenging as the *sestina.

B. The Troubadours. But within all this variety, the med. vernacular poetry best known and most profoundly influential in the West is that invented in the late 11th c. by the *troubadours (Occitan trobadors, "finders," "inventors") in what is now southern France. Composing in the vernacular langue d'oc or Occitan, the troubadours made lyric poetry of extraordinary technical sophistication that emphasized forms, enigmas, ambiguities, acuity, and surprise. New stanzaic structures for each song, within the further restrictions of rhyme and rhythm, became requisite. Though troubadour poems engaged political satire (sirventes*), debate (tenso*, joc partit, partimen*), and literary games (trobar clus*), most influential in later centuries has been the love song (canso*) and the decidedly nonclassical ideology of erotic love that the troubadours called fin'amors ("refined love" or *courtly love).

The earliest troubadour whose works have survived in writing is Duke William IX of Aquitaine (1071–1126); the 12th c. witnessed an outpouring of troubadour lyric, spreading into neighboring regions. As war and Crusade destabilized Occitan life in the 13th c., the emigrating poets stimulated others elsewhere. In some regions (e.g., Catalonia, Aragon, and Italy), Occitan became the authoritative lang. of vernacular lyric, regardless of the poet's native lang. Soon the troubadour ethos and the forms and conceptual vocabulary of Occitan lyric were translated into Port., Eng., It., Castilian, Fr. (the trouvères*), and Ger. (the Minnesingers; see MINNESANG). The It. lyric began at the court of Frederick II in the so-called Sicilian school but soon burst out in the north, eventuating in the Dolce stil nuovo of Guido Guinizzelli and then Dante and his contemporaries—a spiritualizing and, in some ways, Platonizing of an earthbound trad. Dante's production in both Lat. and It. has the explicit aim of canonizing vernacular verse—transforming it into poetry equal in authority and prestige to that of cl. Rome. In the Divina commedia, Dante represents himself as apprenticing under and then superseding the ghost of Lat. epic, Virgil; Dante's Vita nuova (in It.) and the De vulgari eloquentia (in Lat.) argue for the respectability of vernacular letters (esp. in Occitan and It.).

Dante's two great Tuscan successors, Petrarch and Giovanni Boccaccio, returned his exalted vision to earth, catching in their quite different ways Dante's high conception of the poet's office. Petrarch, a multidimensional scholar but a priest of poetry, revived antiquity in receiving the laurel; his Lat. epic Africa was archaeology, but his Canzoniere, replete with feeling and perception, imposed a stamp, not always felicitous, on early mod. verse (see LYRIC SEQUENCE, PETRARCHISM). Boccaccio composed as his own epitaph studium fuit alma poesis (my study was nourishing poetry). Poeta was no longer an opprobrious word.

C. Cross-fertilizations. Though for the purposes of clarity we have divided med. poetry into categories including Lat. and vernacular, sacred and secular, narrative and lyric, oral and written, these categories were porous in the Middle Ages.

Marks of both oral and written composition have been observed (and debated) in the early vernacular epics, e.g., Beowulf (OE, preserved in a 10th-c. ms.), the Chanson de Roland (Song of Roland; Fr., 12th-c. Anglo-Norman ms.) and the Poema del Cid (Castilian, ms., ca. 1140). Though later written epics may adopt characteristics of oral composition (e.g., use of *formulas) as a generic marker and means of authorization, in the earliest surviving texts it is difficult to disentangle oral modes from oralizing and written modes of thought and production. References to oral trad. and to oral performance are common in vernacular narrative poetry as well, and oral folk motifs have long been identified in written vernacular lyric.

Prose and verse were far less separate literarily than they were in cl. practice. Med. writers might treat the same matter twice, once in prose for meditation and once in verse for recitation and/or memorization. Sometimes, in the model of Martianus Capella's Marriage of Philology and Mercury and Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy, they would alternate prose and verse, in the form called prosimetrum*. A similar practice may be seen in later secular works in the vernacular—e.g., in the chante-fable Aucassin et Nicolette* (Fr., 13th c.).

Contrast and color, more than formal unity, were desired. Thus, in the later Middle Ages, we have extensive works in verse that make a show of including multiple and contrasting metrical forms. E.g., the 14th-c. Castilian Libro de buen amor is mainly written in 14-syllable monorhymed quatrains characteristic of didactic and narrative verse but also includes devotional and erotic lyrics in multiple meters and, in one ms., a prose prologue in the form of a parodic sermon.

As this last example shows, sacred and secular were not mutually exclusive categories in med. poetry. The hymns mentioned above as early manifestations of med. verse spread to the marketplaces and were quickly adapted to profane use. Abelard, whose hymn production has already been mentioned, also wrote secular love poetry (whether in Lat. or the vernacular, we do not know) and, he says, took great pleasure in its popularity. Great med. Lat. poetry collections such as the Cambridge Songs and the Carmina Burana contain religious as well as secular and erotic verse; and vernacular (in these cases, Ger.), Lat., and plurilingual poems.

There is good evidence that "courtly love," traditionally the most Western of inventions, was constructed in part along the model of Hispano-Ar. poetry (Menocal; see AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF).

The most striking example of the porous boundaries between langs., registers, and modes in med. Eur. poetry is a genre of secular poetry invented in Islamic Iberia, probably in the late 9th or early 10th c.: the muwashshaḥ. The muwashshaḥ is composed in cl. Ar. or Heb. on themes of panegyric, love, or wine; at its conclusion (the kharja* or jarcha, "exit"), however, it turns from cl. to vernacular—vulgar Ar., Hispano-Ar., or Romance—and is often presented as the transcribed words of someone other than the poem's speaker, such as a woman, a member of the lower classes, or an animal.

Since the "Romance" kharjas were discovered by Samuel Stern in 1948, their interpretation has occasioned passionate debate among scholars. What is clear without a doubt is that the beginnings of Eur. lyric are profoundly hybrid, characterized by a mixture of elite and popular culture, oral and written transmission, Semitic and Romance, cl. and vernacular.

See CARMINA FIGURATA, CHANSON DE GESTE, FABLIAU, GAI SABER, JONGLEUR, JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY, LAI, LATIN POETRY, LITURGICAL POETRY, LOVE POETRY, MEDIEVAL POETICS, NOVAS (RIMADAS), OCCITAN POETRY, ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY, TROBAIRITZ.

■ S. Stern, "Les vers finaux en espagnol dans les muwaššaḥs hispano-hébraïques," Al-Andalus 13 (1948); Curtius; E. Auerbach, Literary Language and Its Public in Late Latin Antiquity and in the Middle Ages, trans. R. Manheim (1965); Dronke; Medieval Song, ed. and trans. J. J. Wilhelm (1971)—anthol.; R. Wright, Late Latin and Early Romance in Spain and Carolingian France (1982); W. D. Paden Jr., "Europe from Latin to Vernacular in Epic, Lyric, Romance," Performance of Literature in Historical Perspectives, ed. D. W. Thompson (1983); B. Stock, The Implications of Literacy (1986); M. R. Menocal, The Arabic Role in Medieval Literary History (1987); J. Le Goff, "For an Extended Middle Ages," The Medieval Imagination, trans. A. Goldhammer (1988); R. Copeland, Rhetoric, Hermeneutics, and Translation in the Middle Ages (1991); O. Sayce, Plurilingualism in the "Carmina Burana" (1992); P. Zumthor, Toward a Medieval Poetics, trans. P. Bennett (1992); Medieval Lyric, ed. W. D. Paden (2000); T. Rosen, "The Muwashshah," The Literature of Al-Andalus, ed. M. R. Menocal, R. P. Scheindlin, M. A. Sells (2000).

C. W. JONES; T.V.F. BROGAN; P. DAMON; C. BROWN

MEDIEVAL ROMANCE (OF roman, "vernacular," versus Lat.). Such tensions mark the *genre: trans. versus invention, oral versus written, verisimilar versus marvelous, passionate versus parodic, didactic versus diverting. Texts regularly claim to be trans., but sources are used selectively and stitched together creatively (cf. Chrétien de Troyes's "bele conjointure" in Erec et Enide, composed ca. 1160–70), lavishly embroidered with hundreds of lines of descriptive amplificatio, the genre's hallmark rhetorical mode (see AMPLIFICATION). Romance has been called a secondary genre, not in importance but with regard to trans. and because it is self-reflexive, often ironic, and intellectualized. Works such as the allegorical Roman de la Rose (composed ca. 1230, continuation ca. 1270–80) insist on not being "fables et mensonges" (fictions and lies). Despite rhetorical downplay of *invention, romances are understood as fiction. They are furnished with recognizable details from daily life but are not mere mimetic reflections; rather, they employ the familiar in the service of debating ideals of love, politics, gender, and poetry itself.

The generic term exists for both med. readers and mod. scholars. Intertextuality and hybridity mark this and other coexisting genres such as hagiography, chansons de geste (epics), lais, nouvelles or novelas, and *fabliaux. Formally, med. romances are long narratives in written form but intended for oral performance. In earlier periods, works are composed in versified rhyming *couplets, typical of works for performance. From the 13th c. on, verse and prose coexist, with increased private reading and also the notion that prose represented truth better than verse's *artifice. Prologues, excipits, and interjections often indicate an author's name, views, or accomplishments; but this is often all that is known. Many works are anonymous. Thematically, romances center on characters, often a couple. Narratives are typically quests of some kind. Young knights seek a fortune through "adventure," risk-taking exploits undertaken in hope of gain. Heroines are the ultimate prize but also often are significantly cleverer than heroes. Both suffer in love's service and examine emotions through psychomachia scenes staging personified virtues in conflict. Romances, with their fictive "other worlds"—the ancient past, Arthur's court, distant Byzantium, wild forests, fairy realms—offered a locus for imagining a better world. Associatively, many romances are collected in ms. codices that demonstrate awareness of genre, grouping works by form (octosyllabic rhyming couplets, for instance) or theme (e.g., Arthurian material).

The first works using the term are the romans d'antiquité, from the Anglo-Norman court of Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine in the mid-12th c. They adapt works from Lat. antiquity, often to genealogical ends. They are adapted into many langs. in later centuries. Benoît de Sainte-Maure's Roman de Troie (ca. 1165) establishes Trojan ancestry for the Britons; the Roman de Thèbes (composed ca. 1155) adapts Statius; Eneas (ca. 1160) adapts Virgil, transforming political allegories into courtly love narratives. Also Anglo-Norman, Wace's Roman de Brut (composed ca. 1155) adapts Geoffrey of Monmouth's Lat. Historia regum Britanniae (ca. 1136), celebrating Britain's "Celtic" past through tales of King Arthur and offering the first mention of the Round Table. Many of the authors wrote official hists. in Lat.; by putting stories "en romanz," they sought an alternative to "history," "truth," and glorifying kings. The incestuous desire tale of Apollonius of Tyre also has many vernacular renderings.

Romance themes have been grouped under three matières (subjects) following Jean Bodel's formulation in the Chanson des Saisnes (composed ca. 1196): respectively, that of France (Charlemagne, his peers, and the Christian wars against the Saracens); Bretagne (regarding Britain and Brittany, incl. Tristan and Arthurian material); and Rome (mentioned above). He called the Breton tales "vain et plaisant" (wanton and appealing), the antique "sage et de san aprenant" (wise and instructive), and for the Fr., "their truth is confirmed every day." The wedding banquet in Flamenca (composed ca. 1250–80) presents a more enumerative catalog: tales of Tristan, Troy, Alexander, Thebes, Ovid's Metamorphoses, OT battles, the Round Table, Merlin, the Saracen Vieux de la Montagne, Charlemagne, Clovis, and Pépin. Other scholarly categories include Oriental or Byzantine (e.g., Partonopeus de Blois, composed ca. 1173–85, with many trans.; Chrétien's Cligés, ca. 1170–77; versions of the Seven Sages of Rome), the roman réaliste (e.g., those set in France by Jean Renart, Gautier d'Arras, Philippe de Beaumanoir, and others, ca. 1200–60). The 13th-c. term roman d'aventure refers to the Arthurian quests of Gawain, Lancelot, Percival, and other knights of the Round Table (Chrétien de Troyes's works are major exemplars: Erec et Enide; Cligés; the unfinished Lancelot ou le Chevalier a la charette, 1174–81; Yvain ou le Chevalier au Lion, 1175–81; the unfinished Perceval ou le Conte du Graal, 1179–91). *Allegories of love compose another subgenre, exemplified by the Roman de la Rose, relating the author-narrator's service to the God of Love and the 21,750-line quest to "pluck" a rose. The term is used in the Roman de Renart's (composed ca. 1170) 27 branches recounting the scandalous, scatological, satirizing exploits of Renart the Fox outwitting courtly animals and laboring humans. Genealogical romances such as Mélusine (prose, Jean d'Arras, composed 1392–94; verse, Coudrette, 1401) recount fantastic family origins, e.g., the Lusignan line.

Med. romances flourished through the 15th c. and have been employed in establishing national identity, particularly in 19th-c. nationalist discourses. It is potentially misleading to present romances along national lines. Yet as texts in vernaculars, it is convenient to treat them by lang.

The over 200 extant OF romances had a major impact throughout Europe, with circulation, trans., and adaptations in what are now England, southern France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Germany, the Netherlands, Scandinavia, and Greece. The predominant OF form is the octosyllabic rhyming couplet. Decasyllables appear in some branches of the Roman d'Alexandre (composed 1170); other versions of these exploits of Alexander the Great were also written in 12-syllable lines, whence the term alexandrine*. The vast prose cycles spurn verse and other *ornament (Lancelot-Grail, ca. 1215–35; Prose Tristan, 1235–40; Post-Vulgate, 1235–40).

Occitan was considered the lang. of lyric, but two rollickingly parodic romances survive: the Arthurian Jaufre (composed ca. 1225) and the fragmentary Flamenca exemplifying the castia gilos motif, a love triangle castigating the jealous husband.

ME works begin to appear in the 13th c. and flourish during the Hundred Years' War (1337–1453). There are some 50 works. Some use octosyllabic couplets, others use *tail rhyme (rime couée); a few are alliterative, in OE style. The most famous authors are the anonymous Sir Gawain and the Green Knight poet (fl. ca. 1375–1400), Geoffrey Chaucer, and Thomas Malory, who redacted the entire Arthurian cycle in La Morte d'Arthur (finished 1469).

The Germanic trad.'s 50 to 80 works flourished from the mid-12th to the 15th c., characterized by virtuoso embellishment on Fr. sources. Most are in couplets, and they are often stanzaic. Hartmann von Aue's adaptations (Erec, composed ca. 1180; Iwein, ca. 1200) amplify considerably and increase narratorial interventions. Wolfram von Eschenbach's masterpiece Parzival (ca. 1210) examines love service and a spiritual side of knightly prowess. Many versions of Tristan exist. The Arthurian Widwilt is a late med. Old Yiddish adaptation of Wirnt von Gravenburg's popular Wigalois (ca. 1210).

A number of It. writers composed in Fr. Prose romances in Fr. found a market in Italy; It. versions of Lancelot, Tristan, and Merlin appear in the 13th and 14th cs. Carolingian, Trojan, Arthurian, and Ovidian tales and other works such as the Roman de la Rose were adapted into cantari, verse narratives in eight-line stanzas sung in public, from the mid-13th to 15th c. The Ren. verse epics by Luigi Pulci, Ludovico Ariosto, and Matteo Maria Boiardo embroider the Carolingian material in eight-line stanzas.

In Spain, versions of Alexander and Apollonius appear in the 13th c. The first original full-length Castilian romance is the Libro del Caballero Zifar (composed 1310). Catalan Arthurian texts include Curial y Güelfa (1443–60) and Joannot Martorell's Tirant lo Blanc (ca. 1460). Much attention is devoted to Miguel de Cervantes's Don Quixote (1605, 1615), the ultimate tribute to and *parody of romance.

Although the term romance is originally Fr. (indeed, ME often rhymes romaunce with France), the trad. extends beyond Western Europe. Precursors in Persian and Gr. trads. should not be dismissed. One of the earliest Fr. romances, Floire et Blancheflor (composed ca. 1145–60), a tale of young lovers and abduction set in Babylon, claims an obscure Ar. source; it is thematically related to the Arabian tale Neema and Noam, the Persian Varqa o Golšāh by ʿAyyūqī (11th c.), and the Hellenistic abduction narratives of the 3d c. BCE. It was translated from Fr. into various vernaculars (e.g., at least five separate Ger., Dutch, and Flemish versions ca. 1170–1300); from the Tuscan Il Cantare di Fiorio e Biancifiore (ca. 1300–1350), it was adapted into Gr. as Phlorios and Platzia-Phlora using 15-syllable Gr. *political verse. Although Celtic origins of the Tristan and Iseut (or Isolde) material have long been asserted, Welsh and Ir. versions (14th c.) postdate the Fr. fragments by Thomas (composed 1170–75) and Béroul (ca. 1155–87) and the splendid rendering of Gottfried von Strassburg (ca. 1210). The Persian Vis o Ramin by Fakharradin Gorgani (1050–55), however, shares numerous thematic parallels, if not the tragic ending.

■ Criticism and History: M. Schlauch, Romance in Iceland (1934); E. Vinaver, A la recherche d'une poétique médiévale (1970); A. Petit, Naissances du roman: Les techniques littéraires dans les romans antiques du XIIe siècle (1985); R. Dragonetti, Le Mirage des sources (1987); J. Bumke, Courtly Culture (1991); D. Kelly, Medieval French Romance (1993); E. Kooper, Medieval Dutch Literature in Its European Context (1994); R. Beaton, The Medieval Greek Romances (1996); P. Grieve, "Floire and Blanchflor" and the European Romance (1997); Norse Romance, ed. M. Kalinke, 3 v. (1999); F. R. Psaki, Chivalry and Medieval Italian Romance (2000); C. Jewers, Chivalric Fiction and the History of the Novel (2000); S. Kay, The "Chanson de Geste" in the Age of Romance (2001); D. Davis, "Greece ix. Greek and Persian Romances," Encyclopedia Iranica, ed. E. Yarshater (2002); K. Busby, Codex and Context: Reading Old French Verse Narrative in Manuscript (2002); G. Heng, Empire of Magic (2003); R. M. Stein, Reality Fictions (2006); J. Bliss, Naming and Namelessness in Medieval Romance (2008).

■ Reference Works: W. R. J. Barron, English Medieval Romance (1987); The New Arthurian Encyclopedia, ed. N. J. Lacey (1996); M. Zink, Medieval French Literature, trans. J. Rider (1995); The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Romance, ed. R. L. Krueger (2000).

S.-G. Heller

MEIOSIS (Gr., "lessening"; Lat. extenuatio). A figure employing understatement, usually to convey that a thing is less in importance (or size) than it really is; the opposite of *auxesis. Meiosis is often confused with *litotes, which, properly understood, affirms or increases the importance, usually by negating the contrary. Litotes, however, is laudatory in intent; meiosis is derogatory. Meiosis should be considered the genus, the more general term. J. C. Scaliger (Poetices libri septem 3.81) says that "true extenuatio is a form of criticism, not mere understatement." Group μ reminds us that, as a metalogism, meiosis functions, like *hyperbole, litotes, *irony, and *paradox, by implicit reference to an ostensive situation, i.e., to the extralinguistic, pragmatic context of the utterance (132–38).

Quintilian discusses meiosis as an abuse or fault of lang. that characterizes obscure style rather than one lacking ornament but indicates that, deliberately employed, meiosis may be called a figure (Institutio oratoria 8.3.50). George Puttenham distinguishes the function of meiosis more particularly: "If you diminish and abbase a thing by way of spight . . . , such speach is by the figure Meiosis or the disabler" (The Arte of English Poesie). The startling simplicity of a powerful meiosis is arresting in narrative; e.g., Dante's famous "quel giorno più non vi leggemmo avante" (We read no more that day) from the Paolo and Francesca episode (Inferno 5.138); or the concluding lines of William Wordsworth's "Michael." Meiosis may be used as a structuring device in a poem, as in A. E. Housman's "Long for me the rick will wait, / And long will wait the fold, / And long will stand the empty plate, / And dinner will be cold" (A Shropshire Lad 8); or it may dominate an entire poem, as in W. H. Auden's "Musée des Beaux Arts" and "The Unknown Citizen." Note also Shakespeare's later tragedies, esp. King Lear, wherein understatement often marks the most dramatic moments. In mod. times, however, what is unquestionably a valuable rhetorical device has fallen into some cultural disfavor, in part because of its abuse as a nearly obsessive Victorian locution.

■ M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); L. A. Sonnino, Handbook to Sixteenth-Century Rhetoric (1968); Lausberg; Group μ; Corbett.

R. O. Evans; T.V.F. Brogan

MEISTERSINGER. Late med. Ger. burgher poets (14th–16th cs., some attested as late as the 18th c.) who traced their ancestry traditionally to twelve Meister among the Minnesinger (see MINNESANG), incl. such figures as Walther von der Vogelweide (ca. 1170–1230), Wolfram von Eschenbach (ca. 1170–1220), and Heinrich Frauenlob (ca. 1250–1318), reputedly the founder of the first Singschule (singing school), in Mainz; the catalog of 12 Meister was first mentioned by Lupold Hornburg around 1340. Unlike many of the earlier poets, however, whose themes were often erotic, the Meistersinger concentrated largely on didactic material, mainly moral, religious, and political themes. To some extent Meistersang developed from the didactic Spruchdichtung* of the 13th and 14th cs. It was primarily intended for solo vocal performance. The Meistersang is transmitted in over 100 mss., some with melodies, incl. those ascribed to earlier poets such as Walther, but furnished with new texts.

From the end of the 14th c., Meistersinger were characterized by their organization into guilds, by their adherence to a system of rules and categories, and by the rigidly formalistic nature of their productions. Some scholars believe the guilds originated in groups of laymen organized by the Church to sing on public occasions. Before becoming a Meistersinger, an aspirant was obliged to work his way up through a series of grades from Schüler (pupil) through Dichter (poet) to the highest rank, Meister, yet even Meistersinger were restricted in their choice of material and technique. At the Schulsingen, or formal meetings, Meistersinger could treat only religious subjects; at the Zechsingen, however, informal meetings frequently held in taverns, a wider range of material was permissible, although amatory themes were not permitted for the songs until the 16th c. In technique, the Meistersinger were restricted to a certain set of Töne, or patterns of tune and meter; the metrical form was determined by the number of syllables and may have disregarded the natural accents of speech; often these forms display great intricacy. In fitting words to the Töne, the Meistersinger followed the Tabulatur, an extensive and pedantic code of rules that differed from school to school. The Meistersinger took over from the Minnesang a tripartite division of the stanza into two Stollen (together constituting the Aufgesang) followed by a third, differing section (the Abgesang)—structurally, a / a / / b (see CANSO)—which became a staple form. They called their songs Bar or Par and codified them in the Tabulaturen.

Famous Meistersinger include Hans Folz (d. ca. 1515), who successfully established the right of the Nuremberg Meistersinger to introduce new metrical patterns and melodies in place of the established forms; Lienhard Nunnenpeck (d. after 1515); Adam Puschmann (d. 1600); and, above all, Hans Sachs (1494–1576), the most prolific and the first to introduce Buhllieder (love songs). J. W. Goethe rediscovered Sachs in 1776 (see KNITTELVERS), and later Richard Wagner made him the hero of his opera Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, a work that gives a generally accurate (though somewhat idealized) picture of the Meistersinger, but which incorrectly ascribes appreciation of their art to the wider public and to the ruling class, whereas in fact such appreciation was confined almost entirely to their own social sphere. Although Meistersang is predominantly didactic lyric poetry, the later Meistersinger (Folz, Sachs, Jörg Wickram [ca. 1505–before 1562], Wolfhart Spangenberg [ca. 1570–1636]) also composed short stories and Shrovetide plays.

The Meistersinger flourished for the most part in the Rhineland, Swabia, Franconia, and the Ger. lands east of the Elbe. There were some individual Meister in the north, but the characteristic guild organization seems to have existed neither there nor in Switzerland.

■ Anthologies: Die Meisterlieder der Kolmarer Handschrift, ed. K. Bartsch (1862); Die Singweisen der Kolmarer Handschrift, ed. P. Runge (1896), facsimile ed. U. Müller et al. (1976); H. Folz, Meisterlieder, ed. A. L. Mayer (1908); Die Jenaer Liederhandschrift, facsimile ed. H. Tervooren and U. Müller (1972); Repertorium der Sangsprüche und Meisterlieder des 12. bis 18. Jahrhunderts, ed. H. Brunner and B. Wachinger (1986–87).

■ Criticism and History: A. Taylor, Literary History of Meistergesang (1937); C. H. Bell, Georg Hager, a Meistersinger of Nürnberg, 4 v. (1947), and The Meistersingerschule at Memmingen (1952); B. Nagel, Der deutsche Meistersang (1952); R. W. Linker, Music of the Minnesinger and Early Meistersinger (1962); A. L. Burkhalter, Minstrels and Masters (1968); Der deutsche Meistersang, ed. B. Nagel, 2d ed. (1971); H. Brunner, Die alten Meister (1975); B.-F. Schultze, Der Augsburger Meistersinger Onoferus Schwartzenbach (1982); F. Schanze, Meisterliche Liedkunst zwischen Heinrich von Mügeln und Hans Sachs, 2 v. (1983–84); R. Hahn, Die löbliche Kunst (1984); N. Henkel, "Die zwölf alten Meister," Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 109 (1987); M. Galvez, "1515, Ash Wednesday: A Cobbler-Poet Becomes a Master Author," A New History of German Literature, ed. D. E. Wellbery (2004); Im Wortfeld des Textes. Worthistorische Beiträge zu den Bezeichnungen von Rede und Schrift im Mittelalter, ed. G. Dicke, M. Eikelmann, and B. Hasebrink (2006); Aspects of the Performative in Medieval Culture, ed. A. Suerbaum (2010).

A. Classen

MELIC POETRY (Gr. melos, "member," "song"). Later called *lyric poetry by the Alexandrians, melic poetry refers loosely to Gr. poetry composed from the 7th through 5th cs. BCE, exclusive of *epic, *dramatic poetry, *elegy, and *iambic. Melic poetry was sung to the accompaniment of a lyre or woodwinds or both and was divided into two broad categories, monodic and choral. Monodic melic poetry (see MONODY), whose chief representatives were Sappho, Alcaeus, and Anacreon, was sung by a solo voice and often consisted of short stanzas, the two most important of which became known as *sapphic and *alcaic. Monodic melic poetry reflected *aeolic and Ionian trads., and its lang. tended to be more conversational and personal than the monadic type (Kirkwood, Bowra). Choral melic poetry, whose chief composers were Alcman, Stesichorus, Ibycus, Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchylides, was sung and danced by a *chorus and was often arranged in triads consisting of *strophe, *antistrophe, and *epode. In contrast to monodic melic poetry, its character was more public, and it employed a highly artificial lang. with strong Doric coloring. Choral melic poetry was classified by Alexandrian eds. into various genres, the most important being *hymns, *paeans, *dithyrambs, prosodia, partheneia, *hyporchemata, *encomia, *dirges, and *epinikia. Although we have fragments from all the major choral poets (ed. Edmonds, which must be supplemented by many recent papyrological additions), the most important extant representatives are Pindar (45 epinikia) and Bacchylides (14 epinikia and 6 dithyrambs).

See GREEK POETRY.

■ H. W. Smyth, Greek Melic Poets (1900); Bowra; H. Färber, Die Lyrik in der Kunsttheorie der Antike (1936); J. E. Sandys, The Odes of Pindar, 3d ed. (1937); Lyra Graeca, ed. J. M. Edmonds, 3 v. (1952)—superseded by Greek Lyric, trans. D. A. Campbell, 5 v. (1982–93); D. L. Page, Sappho and Alcaeus (1955); G. M. Kirkwood, Early Greek Monody (1974); Trypanis; CHCL, v. l; R. L. Fowler, The Nature of Early Greek Lyric (1987); M. Davies, "Monody, Choral Lyric, and the Tyranny of the Hand-Book," CQ 82 (1988); C. Golston, "The Phonology of Greek Lyric Meter," JL 41 (2005).

W. H. RACE

MELOPOEIA, PHANOPOEIA, LOGOPOEIA. Three poetic modes by which, in Ezra Pound's formulation, lang. is "charged or energized." Melopoeia charges words "over and above their plain meaning, with some musical property, which directs the bearing or trend of that meaning" ("How to Read"). This charging can take the form of simple mimesis (e.g., imitation of birdsong) but is generally more abstract. Pound further distinguishes three kinds of melopoeia: "(1) that made to be sung to a tune; (2) that made to be intoned or sung to a sort of chant; and (3) that made to be spoken . . . ." Phanopoeia is "a casting of images upon the visual imagination" (see IMAGISM). Chinese poets have excelled in the use of phanopoeia, which can be readily trans. from one lang. to another. Logopoeia "employs words not only for their direct meaning, but it takes count . . . of habits of usage, of the context we expect to find with the word, its usual concomitants, of its known acceptances, and of ironical play" (Pound, 170). Logopoeia relies on the reader to recognize lang. (whether from Dante, popular song, or *cliché) and to interpret the poet's (often ironical) stance toward it. T. S. Eliot's subversion of *pastoral invitation in the opening lines of "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" can be seen as an example of logopoeia.

■ E. Pound, ABC of Reading (1934); E. Pound, "How to Read," Literary Essays (l954); J. P. Sullivan, Ezra Pound and Sextus Propertius: A Study in Creative Translation (l964); H. N. Schneidau, Ezra Pound: The Image and the Real (l969); J. Hoogestraat, "Akin to Nothing But Language: Pound, Laforgue, and Logopoeia," ELH 55 (1988).

T. J. MATERER; P. KLINE

MESOAMERICA, POETRY OF. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

METALEPSIS OR TRANSUMPTION (Gr. metalepsis, from metalambanein, "to substitute"; Lat. transumere, "to take across"). A composite device, metalepsis involves transition from one *trope to another, where compressions of meaning are released along an associative string. The full meaning of the metalepsis may not be necessarily apparent or fully realized without the understood intermediate step. (See CATACHRESIS, mixed metaphor, where the resulting combination of tropes fails.)

As a trope, metalepsis occurs when a *metonymy is inserted into a phrase already figurative in itself. In a common example, "He is such a lead foot," lead is a metonymy (for heavy) that further charges the metaphor. While metalepsis may function to freshen a figurative use (as in R. W. Emerson's declaration that "language is fossil poetry"), an often-used metalepsis participates in the fossilization process and may speed its becoming *cliché ("an Achilles' heel").

Metalepsis has been treated somewhat dismissively by rhetoricians from antiquity to the Eng. Ren., who found it either showy or comic. In Quintilian's Institutio oratoria (8.6.38), it is "a trope that we give the impression of being acquainted with rather than one that we actually ever need." George Puttenham, in The Arte of English Poesie, calls it "the farfet [farfetched], as when we had rather fetch a word a great way off then to use one nerer hand to expresse the matter as well & plainer."

In contemp. poetry, its metaphorical compression has been used to offer a heightened state of *allusion. In Charles Wright's "Tattoos," the poet describes fainting as an altar boy, as "The sunlight—through St. Paul of the Twelve Sorrows—/ Falls like Damascus on me." (Damascus, in this instance, is an allusion to the biblical story of Saul's conversion on the road to Damascus.) In Wright's "Apologia Pro Vita Sua," the phrase "Landscape's a lever of transcendence" links the speaker's attention to the natural world via the mystic Simone Weil's dictum, "Contradiction is a lever of transcendence."

The meaning of this composite trope has widened from metonymy and metaphor into any figurative substitution into another. In this sense, Heather McHugh uses a metalepsis in "Etymological Dirge" as she writes, "We get our danger from the lord"; the word danger has a root in dominus, but "lord" is a charged substitution that stands in for this entire associative string.

The theoretical reputation for metalepsis (called "the figure of interpretive allusion" by John Hollander) is broadening as well in postmodern culture and contemp. critical discourse. Harold Bloom joined Hollander and Angus Fletcher in recognizing it as "indispensible term and concept," a powerful revisionary trope that is its own style and rhetorical strategy (with Freudian defense, projection, and introjection mechanisms). In this widened sense, transumption functions in the style of R. W. Emerson, John Milton, S. T. Coleridge, and major writers whose work absorbs a trad. and transforms it.

Fr. literary theorist Gérard Genette has applied metalepsis to narratology, when the story jumps from one voice level to another, transgressing the boundaries between "the world in which one tells and the world of which one tells," finding instances in the fiction of Laurence Sterne, Denis Diderot, Julio Cortázar, and Jorge Luis Borges among others. In theater, transumption can function in breaking "the fourth wall" (Diderot), violating the invisible barrier between the audience and the players. William Nelles draws a distinction between this and characters who view other characters, as in Hamlet: "Properly speaking, there is no metalepsis involved in the play within a play . . . but such interplay is implicitly active in all embedded narratives."

Such transumptive strategies operate in Anne Carson's "Essay on What I Think about Most," where the poet-philologist considers how an apparent listing error from a fragment by the Gr. poet Alkman ("three seasons, summer / and winter and autumn third / and fourth spring") programs a sense of surprise into the sudden appearance of the fourth. When the speaker of the verse-essay proposes "three things I like about Alkman's poem," then supplies an unannounced fourth one, a discursive strategy of transumption is in play. The effect of transumption in discursive and narratological approaches depends less on the compression demonstrated in the trope, but the effect is similar: a sudden transport between the world of the teller and the tale.

■ A. Fletcher, Allegory (1964); G. Genette, Narrative Discourse, trans. J. E. Lewin (1972); H. Bloom, Kabbalah and Criticism (1975); J. Hollander, The Figure of Echo (1981); H. Bloom, The Breaking of the Vessels (1982); W. Nelles, "Stories within Stories," Narrative Dynamics, ed. B. Richardson (2002).

K. McFadden

METAPHOR (Gr., "transference").

I. Critical Views
II. History
III. Recent Views
IV. Current Debates
V. Summary

A trope, or figurative expression, in which a word or phrase is shifted from its normal uses to a context where it evokes new meanings. When the ordinary meaning of a word is at odds with the context, we tend to seek relevant features of the word and the situation that will reveal the intended meaning. If there is a conceptual or material connection between the word and what it denotes—e.g., using cause for effect ("I read Shakespeare," meaning his works) or part for whole ("give me a hand," meaning physical help)—the figure usually has another name (in these examples, *metonymy and *synecdoche, respectively). To understand metaphors, one must find meanings not predetermined by lang., logic, or experience. In the terminology of traditional rhet., these figures are "tropes of a word," appearing in a literal context; in "tropes of a sentence," the entire context is figurative, as in *allegory, *fable, and (according to some) *irony.

Following Richards, we can call a word or phrase that seems anomalous the "vehicle" of the trope and refer to the underlying idea that it seems to designate as the "tenor" (see TENOR AND VEHICLE). An extended metaphor, as the name implies, is one that the poet develops in some detail. A *conceit is an intricate, intellectual, or far-fetched metaphor; a diminishing metaphor, one of its types, uses a pejorative vehicle with reference to an esteemed tenor. An extreme or exaggerated conceit is a *catachresis. Mixed metaphor, traditionally derided because it jumbles disparate vehicles together, has recently found some critical acceptance. *Dead metaphor presents fossilized metaphors in ordinary usage (e.g., "he missed the point").

What Quintilian said of tropes remains true today: "This is a subject which has given rise to interminable disputes among the teachers of literature, who have quarreled no less violently with the philosophers than among themselves over the problem of the genera and species into which tropes may be divided, their number and their correct classification." To say that metaphor is any trope that cannot be classified as metonymy, *hyperbole, etc., is to provide only a negative definition. Any attempt to define metaphor positively—e.g., "the application of a word or phrase to something it does not literally denote, on the basis of a similarity between the objects or ideas involved"—will inevitably apply to other tropes.

Some critics accept this consequence and call all tropes metaphors. But even this definition begs the question of how to distinguish the figurative from the literal or at best relegates it to accepted usage. If two species are members of the same genus on the basis of similarity, are they not "like" the genus and, therefore, like each other? Extension of this argument leads to the conclusion that all figures should be understood literally. On the other hand, every object is unique: "it is only the roughness of the eye that makes any two persons, things, situations seem alike" (Walter Pater).

Perfect literalness might be achieved by giving each object a unique name. In relation to that standard, a common noun is a metaphor because it provides a name that can be applied to different entities on the basis of a likeness between them. Hence, "literal" lang. can be considered metaphorical. Some argue that metaphor can result from grammar alone, without change of word meaning (see Grammatical Metaphor in biblio.). For advocates of conceptual metaphor theory, metaphors are representations of mental processes that are not revealed by ling. analysis. Others claim that metaphor is neither a ling. nor a cognitive issue but one based on the intentions of people using lang. for practical purposes. Concise treatment of the burgeoning field must exclude dozens of theories; Rolf and Leezenberg treat many that are not discussed below.

Despite these arguments and attempts to create a more satisfactory classification of figures, the definitions of the major tropes have remained unchanged since the cl. period. The most innovative attempts to clarify the status of metaphor have come from philosophers, linguists, and historians, who have explored metaphor's relation to propositional truth and meaning, to the origins of lang. and myth, to worldviews, scientific models, social attitudes, and ordinary usage. For their purposes, conventional and dead metaphors provide adequate examples for analysis. Scholars and literary critics, less concerned with theory than with practice, have usually accepted the imprecise accounts of metaphor handed down by trad. and focused their attention on its effects in particular poems. To say this is not to claim that the uses of metaphor in poetry are categorically different from those in other domains of lang. use but simply to call attention to the institutionalized character of poetry. The expectations in place when one starts reading a poem differ from those active in reading a newspaper or in conversing.

Emphasis in this discussion will be on poetics and the disciplines historically associated with that topic: rhet., philosophy, and lings. Discussion of metaphor has come full circle, reviving issues forgotten for centuries, while creating possibilities for further devels. A summary of what critics have usually said about metaphor, with some account of objections to traditional views, will provide a context for a brief discussion of historically important theories of metaphor and contemp. treatments of the subject.

I. Critical Views. Aristotle's discussion of *simile in the Rhetoric was until recently the starting point of most treatments of metaphor. In saying that Achilles "sprang at the foe as a lion," Homer used a simile; had he said "the lion sprang at them," it would have been a metaphor. In one case, according to Aristotle, the comparison is explicit (using like or as); in the other, the word lion is "transferred" to Achilles, but the meaning is the same. Quintilian endorsed Aristotle's view of metaphor as a condensed simile: "in the latter we compare some object to the thing which we wish to describe, whereas in the former the object is actually substituted for the thing." What Black has called the "comparison view" of metaphor is based on the grammatical form "A is B"; metaphor is seen as a condensed simile, meaning that A is (like) B. The "substitution view," as Black says, takes "the lion sprang" as the paradigmatic form of metaphor: rather than predicating a likeness, metaphor uses a figurative word in place of a literal one. Both these views are compatible with the reductive conception of metaphor as "saying one thing and meaning another," thus implying that the poet has gone out of the way to say something other than what was meant (perhaps in the interests of decorating an ordinary thought) and suggesting that, in reading poetry, one must dismantle metaphors to find out what the poem "really means."

A different conception of metaphor is necessary to sustain Aristotle's claim, endorsed through the centuries, that metaphor is the most significant feature of poetic style: "that alone cannot be learnt; it is the token of genius. For the right use of metaphor means an eye for resemblances." New metaphors are said to spring from the poet's heightened emotion, keen perception, or intellectual acuity; their functions are aesthetic (making expression more vivid or interesting), pragmatic (conveying meanings concisely), and cognitive (providing words to describe things that have no literal name or rendering complex abstractions easy to understand through concrete analogies). Emphasis on the value of concreteness and sensory appeal in metaphor is frequent. Some mod. critics treat metaphor under the general rubric *imagery (Bild has a corresponding importance in Ger. crit., as does image in Fr. crit.).

Opposing the comparison and substitution views, 20th-c. critics and philosophers developed more intricate accounts of the verbal and cognitive processes involved in metaphoric usage. Despite their differences, the "interaction" view (Richards, Black), "controversion theory" (Beardsley), and "fusion" view (espoused by New Critics; see NEW CRITICISM) all hold that metaphor creates meanings not readily accessible through literal lang. Rather than simply substituting one word for another or comparing two things, metaphor invokes a transaction between words and things, after which the words, things, and thoughts are not quite the same. Metaphor, from these perspectives, is not a decorative figure but a transformed literalism, meaning precisely what it says. Fusion theorists argue that it unifies the concrete and abstract, the sensual and the conceptual in a *concrete universal or symbol. An entire poem, if it is organically unified, can, therefore, be called a metaphor.

A less audacious explanation of the uniqueness of metaphor is discussed in the next section; at present, let us simply note what problems this view solves and what ones it creates. Treating all tropes as metaphors, the fusion theory frees crit. from the inconsistent classification systems handed down from antiquity. Synecdoche, as a species-genus or part-whole relation, can be imputed to any comparison whatever (everything being "like" everything else in some generic respect, or part of it, if the level of abstraction is high enough). Metonymy can be an empirically observed association (cause-effect), an entailment (attribute for subject), or a contingent relation (object for possessor). Since no single principle of classification governs these distinctions, one figurative expression can exemplify two or more tropes, as Antoine Foquelin observed (La Rhétorique françoise [1555]). Fusion theorists eliminate this problem and seek the new meanings released by metaphor, rather than reducing them to uninformative categories.

This freedom from pedantry can, however, entail a loss of precision leading to the neglect, if not the dismissal or misperception, of many tropes. The blurring of traditional distinctions leads to changes in the ways figures are construed. Pale death, which would now be considered a trite metaphor involving personification, was in the Ren. a metonymy (death, not personified, is the cause of the effect paleness). The verbal vitality created by tropes other than metaphor is categorized as imagery if it is sensory and *style if it is not. Similes, otherwise identical to metaphors, are automatically accorded a lower status merely because they use the word like or as—a sign of timidity in the eyes of the fusion theorist, who may see in simile new possibilities for describing the nature of lang.

Single-minded emphasis on the meaning of metaphor, apart from the semantic and grammatical details of its realization, can lead both mod. theorists and traditionalists to questionable interpretive practices. In most textbooks, the only examples of metaphor provided are in the form "A is B," despite the fact that this is not the most common grammatical form, "the A of B" ("th' expense of spirit") and "the A B" ("the dying year") being more frequent (see Brooke-Rose). When they encounter metaphorical verbs, adjectives, and adverbs, critics who seek new meanings in poetry are tempted to transfer the figuration of these word classes over to the nouns with which they are associated. If a speaker snarls a reply or has a green thought, the critic concludes that the poet has said that the speaker is a dog or wolf and that the thought is a plant. Samuel Johnson's line in The Vanity of Human Wishes describing those who gain preferment—"They mount, they shine, evaporate, and fall"—may be clarified through reference to fireworks or fog and mayflies (living for a day), but its power and meaning evaporate if one concludes that the metaphoric verbs are a roundabout way of saying that the rich and famous are like insects.

The alternative assumption would be that the poet wanted to connect figurative attributes to a noun that remains literal; the nominal "A is B" equation was, after all, available to the poet, along with the other grammatical forms that create identity (apposition, demonstrative reference) and presumably would be used if that were the meaning. The tendency to think that metaphors always equate or fuse entities (nouns) reduces the varied effects of metaphor in poetry to a single register. Poets may intend their figurative renderings of process, attribute, and attitude to evoke a range of relations, from suggestiveness to total fusion. If so, they are not well served by theorists who translate every figurative inclination into a declaration of equivalence. The affective and aesthetic functions of metaphor, usually mentioned in traditional accounts, have been emphasized by a few mod. critics who oppose the assumption that the purpose of metaphor is to convey meanings. Forrest-Thomson argues that "the worst disservice criticism can do to poetry is to understand it too soon." Mod. poets in particular try to forestall this haste by using metaphors that do not lend themselves to assimilation by the discursive elements of the text. Thus, they try to preserve poetry from reduction to paraphrastic statement. Shklovsky goes further, asserting that the purpose of new metaphors is not to create meaning but to renew perception by "defamiliarizing" the world: unlikely comparisons retard reading and force us to reconceive objects that ordinary words allow us to pass over in haste (see DEFAMILIARIZATION).

II. History. Four approaches have dominated all attempts to improve on the account of metaphor provided by the cl. trad. Some writers propose more logical classifications of the tropes. Others undertake semantic analysis of the ways in which features of a word's meaning are activated or repressed in figurative usage. These two modes of analysis blend into each other, but they can be distinguished from treatments of metaphor that emphasize its existential entailments—its relation to reality and to hist. rather than to logic and lang. The crudity of this fourfold classification must justify the brevity of the following discussion, which touches on only those treatments of metaphor that, from a contemp. perspective, seem crucial.

For Aristotle, metaphor has two functions and two structures. In the Poetics, its function is to lend dignity to style, by creating an enigma that reveals a likeness or by giving a name to something that had been nameless ("the ship plowed the sea"). But in the Rhetoric, metaphor appears as a technique of persuasion, used to make a case appear better or worse than it is. Mod. critics would say that kill, murder, and execute have the same denotation but differ in *connotation; for Aristotle, one of the three words would be proper in relation to a particular act, and the other two would be metaphors. From its rhetorical uses, metaphor acquires its reputation as a dangerous deviation from the truth, being for that reason castigated by Thomas Hobbes, John Locke, and other Enlightenment philosophers.

The four kinds of metaphor distinguished by Aristotle in the Poetics are of two structural types. One results from substitution (of species for genus, genus for species, or species for species), the two terms having a logical or "natural" relation to each other. The other type has an analogical or equational structure: A is to B as C is to D. Although only two of the four terms need be mentioned (A and D, or B and C), we must infer the other two in order to derive the meaning: "the evening of life" enables us to reconstruct "evening is to day as X is to life." Here we find the bifurcation that will henceforth characterize discussions of tropes: one type is based on accepted conceptual relationships (here, genus-species), and the other type includes all tropes that cannot be so defined. Species-genus and species-species relations are part of common knowledge; to cross from genus to genus, we need four terms that create what might be called a hypothetical likeness, one not given by logic or nature.

The species-genus relation is one of many that make it possible to infer the tenor from the vehicle. Identification of other such relations (e.g., cause for effect, container for contents) led to the proliferation of names for the tropes in rhet. Once they separated themselves from Aristotle's generic metaphor, it was necessary to define metaphor in such a way that it would not include the other tropes. Quintilian's solution—to say that metaphor is a substitution involving any permutation of the terms "animate" and "inanimate"—is not as unreasonable as it first appears. The dividing line between these two domains, which is a fundamental feature of lang. and culture, cannot easily be crossed by species-genus, part-whole, or subject-adjunct relations. Furthermore, animate-inanimate metaphors are strikingly frequent in poetry, as are animate-animate metaphors involving humans and nature. Analysis based on meaning later gave prominence to *personification and the *pathetic fallacy, appearance and reality, or inner and outer as the quintessential forms of metaphor.

Looking back on Quintilian from the perspectives provided by Giambattista Vico, the romantic poets, and semioticians, we can see that his untidy classification (which defines metaphor by reference to its subject matter, the other tropes by reference to "categorical" relationships) reveals something about the role of metaphor that escapes notice in any purely formal analysis. But when subject matter becomes the primary basis of classification, as it is in 19th- and 20th-c. studies such as those of Brinkmann, Konrad, and Spurgeon, the specificity of the tropes dissolves in the all-embracing category "imagery."

For the Ren., Quintilian's Institutio oratoria (pub. 1470) provided an orderly exposition of rhet. in place of the patchwork syntheses inferrable from other cl. texts; Quintilian's renown made him one target of Peter Ramus's campaign to reform the curriculum. Ramus concluded that there were four basic tropes: metonymy (connection through cause, effect, or adjunct), irony ("a change in meaning from opposites to opposites"), metaphor ("a change in meaning from comparisons to comparisons"), and synecdoche (species and genus). In Vico's Scienza nuova (New Science, 1725), these four become the basis of a hist. of lang. and civilization. In the age of the gods, metonymy ruled: lightning and thunder were a great effect of unknown origin, and humankind imagined the agent Jove as the cause. The age of heroes was one of synecdoche: men who held themselves to be sons of Jove embodied his abstract attributes. The age of men is the age of metaphor, in which likenesses are taken from bodies "to signify the operation of abstract minds"; and philosophy gives rise to what we call "literal" meaning.

Ramus is the precursor of mod. attempts to reduce tropes to a rationale, and Vico occupies the same position in relation to mod. discussions of metaphor's importance in the devel. of lang., though their successors are not always aware of this lineage. That lang. was originally metaphorical, mythic, and poetic is a common theme in *romanticism—e.g., in Jean-Jacques Rousseau, J. G. Herder, F.W.J. Schelling, and P. B. Shelley—but there is little evidence that Vico was their source (the idea can be found in Lucretius, among others). Müller, Werner, and Cassirer exemplify the Ger. thinkers who have developed this theory; Langer and Wheelwright contributed to its popularity in Am. crit. Nietzsche's contrary thesis—that lang. was originally concrete and literal in reference and that the abstract vocabulary now considered literal is, in fact, metaphorical—has recently attracted critical attention (de Man). But as Vico pointed out, it makes little sense to speak of lang. as either literal or metaphorical before it incorporates a distinction between the two. Even Gadamer's carefully worded claims about the historical and conceptual primacy of metaphor cannot escape Vico's objection.

The theories of metaphor proposed by Richards, Black, and Beardsley, which incorporate insights into the workings of lang. and meaning derived from 20th-c. analytic philosophy, provide an alternative to traditional accounts of metaphor as a substitution, comparison, or fusion of meanings. Sentences, Richards says, are neither created nor interpreted by putting together words with unique meanings. Any ordinary word has several meanings and a number of loosely associated characteristics; often it will be both noun and verb or noun and adjective. The varied traits or semes of a word's meaning are sometimes sorted into two groups—denotations (characteristics essential to a distinct sense of the word) and connotations—but in practice, this distinction is hard to maintain (see CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION). (In his precise and revealing analysis of this issue, MacCormac describes words as "fuzzy sets.") Only when placed in a context does a word take on one or more meanings, at which time some of its traits become salient and others are suppressed. It is often difficult to decide when we have crossed the line between literal and figurative usage. In the series "green dress" (dyed), "green field" (growing), "green shoot" (alive, despite color), and "green thought," connotations shift before becoming clearly metaphorical.

Richards looked on metaphor as a "transaction between contexts," in which tenor and vehicle combine in varied ways to produce meanings. Beardsley argues persuasively that metaphor is intentional: we find it in words, not in the objects to which they refer. Black's "interaction theory" contains an important distinction between the "focus" and "frame" of a metaphor (the figurative expression and the sentence in which it occurs). The focus brings with it not just connotations but a "system of associated commonplaces"—what Eco will later call "encyclopedic knowledge"—that interact with the frame to evoke knowledge shared by a speech community. To say "the lion sprang at them," meaning Achilles sprang, makes sense only because of common lore about the lion (a hunter, not an herbivore; sociable with its own kind, unlike the tiger, but not a herd animal; monogamous; a lone hunter, unlike the wolf). The lion cannot represent courage until, through a prior mapping of culture on nature, he is the king of beasts. Black emphasizes the "extensions of meaning" that novel metaphors bring to lang., but his theory has proved most useful in understanding the inherited and dead metaphors that structure a society's way of thinking and talking about itself.

III. Recent Views. Every innovative critical theory of the later 20th c. generated a new delineation of metaphor—either as the "other" of its own conceptual domain or as the very ground of its new insights. One of the most influential innovations has been Jakobson's opposition of metaphor to metonymy. In his view, metaphor results from the substitution of one term for another; it is characteristic of poetry and some literary movements, such as romanticism and *symbolism. Metonymy, based on contiguity, appears more frequently in prose and typifies *realism. Though they often cross disciplinary boundaries, these theories of metaphor can be classified as (1) ling. or semiotic (based on intralinguistic relationships or relations between signs of any sort); (2) rhetorical or pragmatic (involving a difference between sentence meaning and speaker meaning); (3) philosophical (emphasizing relations between words and reality or sense and reference); and (4) extended (treating nonlinguistic relationships in other disciplines).

The most ambitious semiotic attempt to identify ling. features of metaphor appears in A General Rhetoric, produced by Group μ of the University of Liège. They treat all unexpected suppressions, additions, repetitions, or permutations of ling. elements, from phonemes to phrases, as figures, the nonfigurative being a hypothetical "degree zero" discourse from which rhet. deviates. Metaphor results from an implicit decomposition of words into their semes (lexical features), some of which will be cancelled and others added when one word is substituted for another. The natural route for such substitutions is through species and genus, as Aristotle observed, and Group μ concludes that a metaphor consists of two synecdoches, the progression being either species-genus-species (the intermediate term being a class that includes the first and last terms) or whole-part-whole (here the central term is a class formed where the first and last overlap). Levin, using a more flexible scheme for the transfer and deletion of semantic features, shows that there are six ways to interpret a metaphor (his example is "the stone died"). He points out that the grammatical structure of many metaphors allows for the transfer of features in two directions: "the brook smiled" can either humanize the brook or add sparkle and liquidity to the idea of smiling. Although he analyzes metaphor as an intralinguistic phenomenon, Levin recognizes that Aristotle's fourth type, analogy, often depends upon reference to reality—a fact that Group μ overlooked. Thus, metaphor appears to escape formalization within a system. Eco's semiotic solution to this problem is to imagine an encyclopedia that describes all the features of reality not included in the semanticist's dictionary. For Riffaterre (1978), mimetic reference is only a feint that the literary text makes before refocusing itself in a network of semiotic commonplaces.

Proponents of *speech act theory are the most important representatives of rhetorical and pragmatic theories. They hold that metaphor cannot be explained through reference to relationships between words and their ling. contexts. They make a categorical distinction between "word or sentence meaning" and "speaker's utterance meaning." Metaphor, in their view, arises from a disparity between the literal meaning of the words used and what is intended by the speaker or writer. Words always retain their invariant "locutionary" definitions, but when used to make metaphors, there is something odd about them and the hearer infers unstated suggestions or meanings. Grice's theory of "conversational implicature" provides a set of rules and maxims for normal talk that, when violated, may alert us to the fact that someone is speaking figuratively. His theory, like Searle's, locates metaphor in a difference between utterance meaning and speaker meaning—the domain of pragmatics—and is subject to the same sorts of crit. that speech act theory has elicited (see Sadock in Ortony).

Searle and Grice are philosophers, but their theories entail empirical claims of relevance to linguists. In the work of Davidson and of Goodman, one finds more strictly philosophic treatments of metaphor. Meaning, in Davidson's view, involves only the relation between lang. and reality. He is willing to accept the pragmatic "distinction between what words mean and what they are used to do," but he denies the existence of metaphoric meaning: "metaphors mean what the words, in their most literal interpretation, mean, and nothing more." To this one might reply that if we did not realize they were patently false, we would not know they were figurative. Recognizing them as such, we may discover truths about the world, but this is not a consequence of some meaning inherent in the words. Goodman disagrees. In Languages of Art, he conceives of metaphor, like many other activities, as exemplification. Rather than applying a label to a thing, we use the thing as an example of the label, as when the lively appearance of the literal brook is seen as an instance of smiling. This reverses the direction of denotation: the example refers to the word, rather than vice versa, and the word may bring with it a whole schema of relationships that will be sorted anew in the metaphorical context. Goodman concludes that metaphor is "no more independent of truth or falsity than literal use."

Postponing discussion of deeper philosophical differences that divide theorists, one cannot help but note that they tend to privilege different moments in the interpretive process. At first glance, or outside time, metaphor is false (Davidson). Realizing that the creator of a metaphor means something else, one might create a theory of the difference between sentence and speaker meaning (Searle, Grice). When engaged in deciphering, a reader enacts the interaction theory—discovering new meanings—and the falsity of metaphor is forgotten. Truth usually results from testing many examples to find one rule; in metaphor, meaning emerges from repeated consideration of a single example, uncovering all its possibilities; and a hypothesis or generalization is the product of the process, not its inception. In accordance with information theory, the low probability of a word or phrase in a particular context implies that it carries a great deal of meaning.

IV. Current Debates. Through the work of Lakoff and Johnson, understanding of dead metaphors has been transformed. Most commonplace metaphors express a connection between a concept and a realm of experience. Among their examples of these conceptual metaphors are "argument is war" and "time is money." In their terminology, the conceptual term is the target, and the concrete term is the source. Each such "A is B" is a generic schema that can generate dozens of specific tropes, based on connections between the two domains. Their examples serve as reminders that not only nouns but adjectives, verbs, adverbs, and prepositions abound in tropes. As Searle remarked, conventional metaphors spring back to life when new aspects of the analogy are evoked (e.g., "he torpedoed my argument," "his refutation was a dud"). For Lakoff and Johnson, such interactions of the abstract and concrete are not simply analogies, and "conceptual metaphors" are not provisional aspects of lang. use. They exemplify the ways that we conceptually organize experience. War and argument cannot be separated from each other.

Poetics can certainly benefit from attention to conventional metaphors, long neglected in discussions of poetry. As Turner (1987) showed, a single domain such as kinship can generate hundreds of analogies that differ in interesting ways. He and Lakoff provide examples of how basic conceptual metaphors concerning life, time, and death occur in a wide range of traditional and contemp. poems. When metaphor is seen as a form of conceptual mapping rather than verbal expression, it has implications for psychology, anthropology, neurology, and cognitive science. If rooted in bodily experience, metaphor may reveal universal conceptual patterns; those specific to particular cultures might then be correlated with different langs. or modes of understanding (Kövecses). The cohesion of specific groups within a society may be strengthened by shared conceptual metaphors. If so, the topic is important for sociology, politics, and rhetorical studies of public relations and advertising.

When these devels. are connected with neurology and cognitive science, the scope and significance of the project become clear. What is at stake is nothing less than a unified theory of human behavior, mapping a progression from embodied experience, inscribed in neural pathways, to action, thought, and expression. This change has confirmed the relevance of earlier conceptions of metaphor. Jakobson's association of metaphor and metonymy with the right and left hemispheres of the brain, mentioned earlier, has led to numerous experiments that make use of neural imaging. The idea that abstract thought emerged from metaphor, as suggested by Vico, Rousseau, and Herder, gained support through two centuries during which philologists traced the evolution of word meanings. Metaphor is now a topic of discussion in many disciplines, treated in hundreds of articles annually. Following the ling. turn of the 20th c., the paradigmatic shift of the 21st c. may be a tropical turn.

For poetics, the emphasis on conceptual metaphor has been immensely valuable. In both crit. and pedagogy, poetry has been rescued from the modernist overemphasis on originality and recognized as dependent on conventional cultural codes that it shares with the lyrics of popular music. The hist. of poetry suggests that innovative metaphor may be even less common than conceptual metaphor theorists suggest. They have frequently treated three examples as innovative: "man is a wolf," "that surgeon is a butcher," and "my lawyer is a shark." Dicts. and poetry anthols. confirm the impression that these have existed for centuries. The human and animal kingdoms, with the lion as the king of beasts, were mapped onto each other long ago. The names of many species—rats, snakes, skunks, foxes, weasels—have literalized meanings referring to humans. Even condensed dicts. list two literal meanings for the humans known as wolves or as sharks; a "butcher," as noun or verb, literally means a botcher or a bungler. The elaborate schemas produced to account for how we understand such usage seem beside the point, unless they are hypotheses about the neural activity of those encountering such usage for the first time or hypotheses about how we understand literal statements.

The conceptual metaphor theory of Lakoff, Johnson, Turner, and their followers treats metaphor as a cognitive, not a ling., phenomenon. The theory has prompted empirical studies of figurative lang., based on data banks such as the British National Corpus (100,000,000 words from 20th-c. pubs.). One important result of such work is evidence that metaphors commonly used in conversation and prose are quite different from those produced by theorists as examples. Often the meaning is clear even when the literal "tenor" or "target domain" is indeterminate: when a man is "gaining ground" with a woman, should we think of war, affection, or territorial encroachment? Corpus analysts conclude that there is no clear-cut boundary between literal and figurative usage. Phrases and word couplings that were once either literal or figurative are now usually or always figurative—making them, in effect, literal. E.g., "heavy blow" and "pay a high price" are rarely used literally; a search for the phrase "old fox" turns up only the (literalized) metaphorical meaning. Those who construct examples for experimental purposes sometimes mistake commonplace for original metaphors, and vice versa (Stefanowitsch, Hanks, Deignan, Hilpert). Given the lack of agreement about the difference between figurative, literalized, and literal expressions, the gap between theory and empirical studies has not been bridged.

The antithetical view of metaphor—as uncommon insight rather than an oddity reducible to literal thought and expression—has long lacked a persuasive justification. Those who have proposed this view, from Aristotle to Davidson, have not supported it with convincing arguments. Fauconnier and Turner provide the best explanation we have of connections between metaphor, insight, and ling. innovation. Each of the two entities in the traditional "A is B" metaphor has a number of features (connotations or semes). We can list the features together in a hypothetical "generic space." The traits that they share and the context will usually indicate the implied meaning. The novel or emergent metaphor does not yield its meaning through that procedure; no revealing correspondence in the generic space is evident. That leads to reconsideration of traits not shared and the creation of what Fauconnier and Turner call a "blended space," from which unanticipated meanings may emerge.

The title of Turner's book Death Is the Mother of Beauty (a phrase taken from a poem by Wallace Stevens) provides an example of creative metaphor. Death ends life; how can it give birth? The traditional Grim Reaper and his scythe are replaced by a maternal force that "strews the leaves / of sure obliteration on our paths." The leaves are not cut down by an untimely scythe but fall when their time has come. The lines call attention to the natural, inevitable death that makes urgent the fulfillment of desire. Paradoxically, consciousness of death gives birth—to awareness of beauty's transience. An entire stanza prompts us to make these inferences and others concerning procreation; it directs but also multiplies the potential insights. Turner and Fauconnier are sensitive to the interaction of metaphor and other tropes in contexts that limit the possible meanings in some directions but thereby expand them in others.

V. Summary. The figural use of "metaphor" in mod. theory, through which it assimilates not only all other tropes (as in Aristotle) but models, analogies, and narrative methods as well, leads back to the question of whether the literal and figurative can be distinguished from one another. The simplest and in some ways most logical answers are that ling. meaning is all literal (Davidson) or all figural (Nietzsche). Children do not discriminate between the two in lang. acquisition, and there is little evidence that adult comprehension of literal and metaphorical usage involves different psychological processes (Rummelhart). Some argue that tropes can be entirely literal (see Grammatical Metaphor). Rather than attempting to identify rules capable of accounting for literal usage and then explaining figures as transformations or deviations from this set, one can treat literalness "as a limiting case rather than a norm" and develop a pragmatic theory of meaning in which metaphors need not be considered different from other usage (Sperber and Wilson).

Figurative indirectness also seems prevalent in Chinese and Japanese poetry. Varieties of parallel structure, the Chinese stylistic figures of bi (comparison) and xing (incitation, affective image), and the tendency to imply without asserting a relation between mood and scene imply a reticence at odds with propositional assertion (Owen, Cheng, Cai). The 20th-c. confrontation of truth and metaphor, based on the assumption that metaphor is an assertive predication, may have been misguided.

The analogies and metaphors that prompt insight do not have to appear in poetry. Many have emerged from our interactions with technology. Fauconnier and Turner call attention to the consequences of comparing a disruptive program in a computer to a virus in an organism. The analogy itself comes to life when one pursues its implications. Antibiotics will prove useless; the first line of defense would be to identify sources of the infection and methods of preventing it from entering the system. Determining the molecular structure (code) of the virus would be useful for the creation of feedback mechanisms that could neutralize its effects. Through the same kind of reasoning, the models used in scientific theories serve heuristic functions when familiar structures are used to map uncharted phenomena. Hesse and Kuhn extended Black's discussion of the subject in Models and Metaphors. Citing the work of Bachelard and Canguilhem, Derrida (1972) suggested that the function of metaphor in science is not merely heuristic. Hesse endorses Boyd's claim (in Ortony) that "metaphors are constitutive of the theories they express, rather than merely exegetical."

As the hists. of science and poetry show, metaphors and models are tools for thought that may or may not prove productive. When productive, they implant thoughts that become part of a society and culture—what we (unconsciously) think with, rather than think about. Pepper's World Hypotheses claims that different ways of life are based on "root metaphors" that affect every aspect of experience. For Blumenberg's philosophical anthropology, such a metaphor constitutes a worldview, a "set of institutions, customs, and expectations that maintain a life-world" and constitute its "selves" (Pavesich). The difference between creative and commonplace metaphors may be a function of the amount of consciousness they evoke.

While contributing to an understanding of its ling. features and conceptual implications, theories of metaphor show that it is not simply one critical problem among others, notable only for the number of disagreements it causes. Ricoeur finds in philosophic metaphor a potential for revealing the nature of being. But as that which lies outside the literal, normal, proper, or systematic, metaphor serves as a topic through which each theory and philosophy defines itself. Metaphor is not simply true or false but that which marks the limits of the distinctions between the two or between meaning and nonsense. As Derrida says, "Each time that a rhetoric defines metaphor, not only is a philosophy implied, but also a conceptual network in which philosophy itself has been constituted." Thus, agreement about the status of metaphor will be deferred until all other ling. and philosophic disputes have been resolved.

See FIGURATION, TROPE.

■ Anthologies: Philosophical Perspectives on Metaphor, ed. M. Johnson (1981); Metaphor and Thought, ed. A. Ortony (1993); Aspects of Metaphor, ed. J. Hintikka (1994); Grammatical Metaphor, ed. A.-M. Simon-Vandenbergen, M. Taverniers, and L. Ravelli (2003); Cognitive Linguistics, ed. D. Geerarts (2006); Corpus-Based Approaches to Metaphor and Metonymy, ed. A. Stefanowitsch and S. Gries (2006); The Cambridge Handbook of Metaphor and Thought, ed. R. W. Gibbs Jr. (2008).

■ History: M. Müller, Lectures on the Science of Language (1862, 1865); F. Brinkmann, Die Metaphern (1878); H. Werner, Die Ursprünge der Metapher (1919); W. B. Stanford, Greek Metaphor (1936); H. Konrad, Étude sur la métaphore (1939); E. Cassirer, Language and Myth, trans. S. Langer (1946); F. Nietzsche, "On Truth and Lies in a Nonmoral Sense" [1873], Philosophy and Truth, ed. D. Breazeale (1979); L. Doležel, Occidental Poetics (1990); K.W.F. Schlegel, "Dialogue on Poesy" [1799], Theory as Practice, ed. J. Schulte-Sasse (1997); G. Bergounioux, "La sémantique dans le champ de la linguistique francophone jusqu' à 1916" and B. Nerlich, "La métaphore et la métonymie," Sémiotiques 14 (1998); B. Nerlich and D. D. Clarke, "Mind, Meaning and Metaphor," History of the Human Sciences 14 (2001).

■ Texts: C. K. Ogden and I. A. Richards, The Meaning of Meaning (1923); C. Spurgeon, Shakespeare's Imagery (1935); G. Bachelard, La Formation de l'esprit scientifique (1938); S. K. Langer, Philosophy in a New Key (1942); S. Pepper, World Hypotheses (1942); C. Brooke-Rose, A Grammar of Metaphor (1958); M. Black, Models and Metaphors (1962); P. Wheelwright, Myth and Reality (1962); I. A. Richards, The Philosophy of Rhetoric ([1936] 1965); V. Shklovsky, "Art as Technique" [1917], Russian Formalist Criticism, ed. and trans. L. Lemon and M. J. Reis (1965); M. Hesse, Models and Analogies in Science (1966); H. Weinreich, "Explorations in Semantic Theory," Current Trends in Linguistics 3 (1966): G. Canguilhem, Études d'histoire et de philosophie des sciences (1968); N. Goodman, Languages of Art (1968); K. Burke, "Four Master Tropes," A Grammar of Motives ([1945] 1969); M. C. Beardsley, "The Metaphorical Twist," Philosophy and Phenomenological Research 22 (1962); G. Vico, The New Science, ed. and trans. T. G. Bergin and M. H. Fisch ([1744] 1970); H. White, Metahistory (1973); H. Bloom, A Map of Misreading (1975); H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method, trans. J. Weinsheimer and D. Marshall ([1960] 1989); H. Bloom, Wallace Stevens (1977); P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Metaphor, trans. R. Czerny ([1975] 1977); D. Davidson, "What Metaphors Mean," and P. de Man, "The Epistemology of Metaphor," CritI 5 (1978); V. Forrest-Thomson, Poetic Artifice (1978); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); M. Black, "How Metaphors Work," and N. Goodman, "Metaphor as Moonlighting," CritI 6 (1979); J. Derrida, The Archeology of the Frivolous, trans. J. Leavey ([1973] 1980); G. Lakoff and M. Johnson, Metaphors We Live By (1980); Group μ, "White Mythology," Margins of Philosophy, trans. A. Bass, ([1972] 1982); U. Eco, "The Scandal of Metaphor," PoT 4 (1983); M. Riffaterre, Text Production, trans. T. Lyons (1983); U. Eco, "Metaphor, Dictionary, and Encyclopedia," NLH 15 (1984); E. R. MacCormac, A Cognitive Theory of Metaphor (1985); S. Owen, Traditional Chinese Poetry and Poetics (1985); D. Sperber and D. Wilson, Relevance (1986); R. Jakobson, "Two Aspects of Language and Two Types of Aphasic Disturbances," 1956, rpt. in Jakobson, v. 2; E. F. Kittay, Metaphor (1987); M. Turner, Death Is the Mother of Beauty (1987); F. Cheng, "The Reciprocity of Subject and Object in Chinese Poetic Language," Poetics East and West, ed. M. Doleželová-Velingerová (1988–89); H. P. Grice, "Logic and Conversation," 1975, Studies in the Ways of Words (1989); G. Lakoff and M. Turner, More than Cool Reason (1989); Metaphor and Thought, ed. A. Ortony (1993)—see esp. M. Black, "More about Metaphor" (1977), R. Boyd, "Metaphor and Theory Change," T. Kuhn, "Metaphor in Science," S. Levin, "Standard Approaches to Metaphor," D. Rummelhart, "Some Problems with the Notion of Literal Meanings," J. Sadock, "Figurative Speech and Linguistics," and J. Searle, "Metaphor"; B. Indurkhya, "Metaphor as Change of Representation," and E. Steinhart and E. Kittay, "Generating Metaphors from Networks," in Aspects of Metaphor, ed. J. Hintikka (1994); R. M. White, The Structure of Metaphor (1996); G. Fauconnier, Mappings in Thought and Language (1997); S. Glucksberg, Understanding Figurative Language (2001); M. Leezenberg, Contexts of Metaphor (2001); G. Fauconnier and M. Turner, The Way We Think (2002); Z. Kövecses, Metaphor (2002); A.-M. Simon-Vandenbergen, "Lexical Metaphor and Interpersonal Meaning," Grammatical Metaphor, ed. A.-M. Simon-Vandenbergen et al. (2003); Z. Kövecses, Metaphor in Culture (2005); E. Rolf, Metaphertheorien (2005); E. Romero and B. Soria, "Cognitive Metaphor Theory Revisited," Journal of Literary Semantics 34 (2005); Corpus-based Approaches to Metaphor and Metonymy, ed. A. Stefanowitsch and S. T. Gries (2006); G. Fauconnier and M. Turner, "Conceptual Integration Networks," Cognitive Linguistics, ed. D. Geeraerts (2006); J. Derrida, "The Retrait of Metaphor," 1978, Psyche, ed. P. Kamuf and E. Rottenberg (2007); The Cambridge Handbook of Metaphor and Thought, ed. R. W. Gibbs Jr. (2008); V. Pavesich, "Hans Blumenberg's Philosophical Anthropology," Journal of the History of Philosophy 46 (2008); Z.-Q. Cai, "Introduction," How to Read Chinese Poetry, ed. Z.-Q. Cai (2008).

W. Martin

METAPHYSICAL POETRY. A term frequently applied to the poetry written by John Donne, George Herbert, Richard Crashaw, Andrew Marvell, Henry Vaughan, Thomas Traherne, and other 17th-c. Eng. poets. Metaphysical poetry is distinguished by metaphorical ingenuity, argumentative intellectuality, and stylistic obscurity. A term much less in use now than a generation ago, metaphysical poetry is a rubric so tainted by misogyny and misjudgment that we would surely have abandoned it if it did not still have some value. It is, moreover, a term that would have been unrecognizable to those it designates.

The hist. of the term indicates the circumspection with which it should be used. In Donne's lifetime, William Drummond of Hawthornden writes disparagingly of poems rife with "metaphysical Ideas and Scholastical Quiddities." Later in the 17th c., John Dryden misogynistically censures Donne for violating both nature and decorum by addressing women as intellectual creatures; Donne "affects the metaphysics not only in his satires, but in his amorous verses, where nature only should reign, and perplexes the minds of the fair sex with nice speculations of philosophy." In the 18th c., Samuel Johnson in his Life of Cowley complains about a group he terms "the metaphysical poets," who seek out the "discovery of occult resemblances in things apparently unlike. . . . The most heterogeneous ideas are yoked by violence together." Johnson argues that the recondite philosophy and strained *metaphors of the metaphysical poets violate *decorum, a critical value of 18th-c. aesthetics (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS).

Throughout the 18th and 19th cs., the reputation of metaphysical poetry suffers, although S. T. Coleridge expresses admiration for both Donne and Herbert. But the turn of the 20th c. ushers in a revaluation, heralded by the publication of Herbert Grierson's ed. of Donne's Poetical Works (1912) and his signal anthol., Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems of the Seventeenth Century (1921). Reviewing the latter volume, a young T. S. Eliot praises metaphysical poetry, discovering in its studied conjunction of thought and feeling a sensibility that had not suffered the *"dissociation of sensibility" afflicting neoclassical, romantic, and Victorian poetry. Eliot praises the metaphysical poets, and Donne in particular, for fusing thought and emotion, and admires their ability to "devour" "all kinds of experience." Following Eliot's cue, *modernism (ca. 1909–1950) embraces metaphysical poetry as an antidote for the disorders afflicting contemporaneous poetry. After 300 years, the metaphysical poets were again at the center of Eng. literary culture.

The New Critics of the 1930s and 1940s developed *close reading, a practice dedicated to the rigorous discovery of the formal containment of intellectual tension (Empson, Brooks; see NEW CRITICISM). This approach was well suited for metaphysical poetry, which rewards deep, ingenious, repeated readings. By emphasizing the poem as an isolated aesthetic structure, however, the New Critics sometimes elided the historical distinctiveness of this poetry. Important studies have convincingly demonstrated the links between metaphysical poetry and such phenomena as Ren. rhet., and the "new science" of the 17th c. (Tuve, Nicolson). Martz fruitfully explored the relationship between metaphysical poetry and Counter-Reformation theology, finding a model for certain metaphysical traits in the practices of formal religious meditation formulated by Ignatius Loyola. Other scholars established the importance of Reformation theology in the devel. of religious metaphysical poetry (Lewalski, Strier). And while critics focused on an imagined "school" of metaphysical poetry (Williamson, White), sometimes ignoring the distinctiveness of the various poets, studies of Herbert (Summers, Tuve, Strier, Schoenfeldt), of Crashaw (Young), of Marvell (Friedman, Colie), and of Vaughan (Post) have established the individual accomplishments of the various metaphysical poets.

Indeed, if there is a "school" of 17th-c. poets, it would probably be comprised of the followers of Herbert, not Donne; the poetry of the 17th c. is filled with direct responses to and imitations of Herbert by Crashaw, Vaughan, and various minor poets (Stewart). Any "school of Donne," moreover, would have to include Katherine Philips, who has traditionally been left out of discussions of metaphysical poetry (although Grierson included two of her lyrics in his anthol.). Philips assimilates Donne's style as fully as any subsequent writer, and ingeniously uses Donne's imagery to articulate the passions and goals of ardent female friendship. Many predecessors and contemporaries of Donne in Europe, moreover, wrote poems in the metaphysical style, and metaphysical poetry is sometimes linked to the *baroque, famous for exaggerated aesthetic ingenuity. If the term can be applied beyond Brit. borders, then, such poets as Jean de La Ceppède in France, Constantijn Huygens and Jacobus Revius in Holland, and Francisco de Quevedo in Spain seem certainly to deserve the name metaphysical poets.

In England, metaphysical poetry is frequently distinguished from the work of the *Cavalier poets, a mode dedicated to the social ease and formal fluency epitomized by Ben Jonson (Miner 1971). Metaphysical poetry, by contrast, is known for rough, irregular lines and tends to flout rather than observe convention. Donne's secular poetry in particular overtly rejects the Petrarchan rhet. of idealization and distant worship (see PETRARCHISM) in favor of a celebration of the pleasures and terrors of erotic intimacy. Herbert, Crashaw, and Vaughan redirect this dramatic immediacy, along with its concomitant emotions, to God. Donne's speakers are typically in conflict with the world or with conventional poetry. A commendatory poem to the first edition of Donne's poetry (1633), written by Thomas Carew, claims Donne as the author of a major transformation of Eng. verse: "The Muses garden with Pedantique weedes / O'rspred, was purg'd by thee; / The lazie seeds / Of servile imitation throwne away; / And fresh invention planted." Carew admires Donne's deliberate refusal of affected *ornament and obsequious *convention.

The term metaphysical poetry, then, can help us understand the complex metaphoric and intellectual aspirations of a particular kind of tough-minded yet heartfelt poetry. It is perhaps less useful when it leads critics to value overt intellectual complexity over the hard-won simplicity of an utterance by Herbert, Vaughan, Marvell, or Philips. As one can tell from the comments of those who praise and who castigate it, metaphysical poetry is characterized by intellectual complexity and metaphorical extravagance. Interested in the tacit relations between physical and spiritual existence, metaphysical poetry is capable of developing elaborate comparisons. In one of the most justly celebrated examples, Donne likens the emotional connection of lovers separated by distance to the legs of a compass ("A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning"). In its fondness for such deliberately startling metaphors, daring rhet., and strong lines, metaphysical poetry at its best aspires to rigorous exploration of the complex continua between physical and metaphysical existence. Its sometimes rough metrics and frequently intricate metaphorics dramatize the effort and pleasure of apprehending the covert unity of apparently disparate realms of existence.

Although some scholars understandably regard the term metaphysical poetry as something of a misnomer (Leishman), others have argued for its continued expedience (Smith). What began as a label of inappropriate derogation, and then became a term of infelicitous evaluation, may still prove useful as a way of comprehending the remarkable accomplishment of much 17th-c. poetry.

See BAROQUE, CONCEPTISMO, DEVOTIONAL POETRY.

■ Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems, ed. H.J.C. Grierson (1921); G. Williamson, The Donne Tradition (1930); J. B. Leishman, The Metaphysical Poets (1934); H. C. White, The Metaphysical Poets (1936); A. Warren, Richard Crashaw (1939); R. Tuve, Elizabethan and Metaphysical Imagery (1947); Brooks; Eliot, Essays—"The Metaphysical Poets" and "Andrew Marvell"; R. Wallerstein, Studies in Seventeenth-Century Poetics (1950); R. Tuve, A Reading of George Herbert (1952); Empson; J. H. Summers, George Herbert (1954); M. Praz, The Flaming Heart (1958); M. H. Nicolson, The Breaking of the Circle: Studies in the Effect of the "New Science" upon Seventeenth-Century Poetry, 2d ed. (1960); A. Alvarez, The School of Donne (1961); L. Nelson Jr., Baroque Lyric Poetry (1961); L. L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation, 2d ed. (1962); J. Bennett, Five Metaphysical Poets, 2d ed. (1964); H. Gardner, The Metaphysical Poets, 2d ed. (1967); A. Stein, George Herbert's Lyrics (1968); E. Miner, The Metaphysical Mode from Donne to Cowley (1969); R. L. Colie, My Ecchoing Song: Andrew Marvell's Poetry of Criticism (1970); D. Friedman, Marvell's Pastoral Art (1970); W. Halewood, The Poetry of Grace (1970); J. H. Summers, The Heirs of Donne and Jonson (1970); E. Miner, The Cavalier Mode from Jonson to Cotton (1971); B. K. Lewalski, Protestant Poetics and the Seventeenth-Century Religious Lyric (1979); J. Carey, John Donne (1981); R. V. Young, Richard Crashaw and the Spanish Golden Age (1982); J.F.S. Post, Henry Vaughan (1983); R. Strier, Love Known: Theology and Experience in George Herbert's Poetry (1983); S. Stewart, George Herbert (1986); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991); M. Schoenfeldt, Prayer and Power: George Herbert and Renaissance Courtship (1991); A. J. Smith, Metaphysical Wit (1992); W. Empson, Essays on Renaissance Literature (1993); H. Dubrow, Echoes of Desire (1995); J.F.S. Post, English Lyric Poetry: The Early Seventeenth Century (1999); R. V. Young, Doctrine and Devotion in Seventeenth-Century Poetry (2000); The Cambridge Companion to Donne, ed. A. Guibbory (2006); B. Saunders, Desiring Donne (2007); R. Targoff, John Donne, Body and Soul (2008).

M. SCHOENFELDT

METER (Gr. metron).

I. Four Categories
II. Debates About Meter
III. Functions

Meter is the *measure of sound patterning in verse, occurring when a *rhythm is repeated throughout a passage of lang. with such regularity that a base unit (such as a *foot) becomes a norm and governs poetic composition. Meter is an idealized pattern, a cultural construct understood as artistic shaping of the sound pattern of a lang. All langs. possess the makings of metrical systems. Metrical verse works the basic properties of a given lang. to a more highly regularized level. When studying meters, one focuses on their historical changes, on their cultural associations, and on describing and analyzing specific meters shaped by individual poets into metrical styles. As cultural constructs, meters are a major part of verse design. While design, like rhythm, is innate for humans desiring a sense of order, designs are made, learned, and passed on in a culture. They are open to innovation and transcend the linguistic material of which they are made (Hollander; Cushman). As a regularized organization of *sound, metrical design both uses and pulls against the speech patterning of lang. The ordinary rhythms of a lang. must rise to an unusual degree of prominence to become a meter. As a result, meter can heighten emotion and compete with sense. Aristotle noticed that a too-heightened rhythm could override sense and persuade, an effect Roman Jakobson regarded as the basis of the *poetic function (Sebeok). Julia Kristeva sees in this poetic function the argument between the rhythmic (the feminine) and the rational (the law, the masculine) dimensions of lang. (Cook).

Cultures develop particular verse trads. based on normative meters that are recognized tacitly as well formed or not, indicating that the rules are made by cultures and learned in the same way lang. competence is acquired. For this reason, meters also change; "rules" restrict what may count as metrical for a particular time and place, i.e., what linguistic situations in the verse may occur when exceptions to the norm appear in a verse meter (see individual entries for specific langs. and lit. hists., e.g., ARABIC PROSODY; CELTIC PROSODY; CHINA, POETRY OF). Measurement of verse in a given lang. may depend primarily on *quantity, *accent (stress), *syllable, tone (*pitch), or *syntax. One of these will be the dominant component of a meter, and one or more of the others may affect it, but full descriptions of the influence on metrical patterning of secondary features, such as *rhyme and sound (in all langs.; see Crystal), are still being developed by linguists.

In a stress-based lang. like Eng., two levels of stress—strong and weak—define the normative pattern that forms the idealized metrical base. Identifying the meter of a poem or part of a poem is accomplished by a process of marking stresses, called scanning, and yields a *scansion. In actuality, the idealized pattern is realized at three or four perceptual levels of stress. The term scansion has been traditionally reserved for marking the idealized pattern, but since the 1950s, theories using ling. have marked three or four levels in order to develop descriptive and explanatory "rules" (see below; see GENERATIVE METRICS, RELATIVE STRESS PRINCIPLE). Within these relative perceptual levels, the basic pattern can be perceived because the adjacent stresses remain weak or strong relative to each other (Chatman; Halle and Keyser). The actual levels of stress compose the rhythm of the passage and create sound, meaning, and expressive qualities specific to a poem. The idealized pattern gains flexibility or rigidity depending on "allowable" departures that have been built up (and continue to be built up) as a trad. of metrical composition by poets' adding new variations on the metrical base. The numbers and location of weak and strong stresses that comprise a unit define the type of meter. New meters that are devised may enter the metrical code of a literary trad. with sufficient use by poets and recognition by readers.

Four metrical categories are traditionally recognized in Eng. poetry, named for the distinguishing factor that establishes the unit of measure: accentual, accentual-syllabic (also known as accentual isosyllabic), syllabic (also known as isosyllabic), and quantitative (though this category is controversial; see below). The name of a metrical type (e.g., *ballad, *iambic *pentameter) refers variously to the poetic trad. of that meter, to an entire poem, to a section of a poem, or to the line pattern. Meter inhabits a context, as is demonstrated by lines that might be scanned as more than one meter if they occurred in different metrical contexts. E.g., this line from W. B. Yeats's "The Second Coming"—"Turning and turning in the widening gyre"—might be scanned as dactylic, except that the remainder of the poem is iambic pentameter. But the line is a quite traditional iambic pentameter, engaging an initial strong onset (Turn-), a strong fourth syllable, a strong (relative to the surrounding syllables) sixth syllable (in), and an elided weak stress (-ening) on the ninth syllable, which gives the line an extrametrical eleventh syllable that is weak.

The concept of measuring verse into units, called feet, and units into lines with a specified number of feet is an analytic one, originally imposed by the Greeks on poetic compositions as a way of describing the disciplining of rhythmic repetition into lines of verse when verse was written down. (Gr. prosodists were divided between the rhythmikoi, who measured by rhythm, as in music, and the metrikoi, who measured by foot.) Measuring meter in feet is known as the classical approach to meter; it was imported into Eng. during the Ren. and has prevailed as a guide to verse composition and prosodic study as influenced by Romance verse. Other approaches have been developed in the 20th c., thanks to mod. ling., scientific methods and goals of investigation, and the explosion of nonmetrical poetry. The most important of these have been systems grounded in generative metrics, linguistic theories of the sound patterning of the Eng. phrase, and the iambic-only theory of Eng. meter. While the cl. approach is the least adequate for describing and explaining the linguistic basis of metrical occurrence and function, it is the one used in common parlance, by the majority of poets, critics, and teachers.

Although actual sound can be measured with instruments, what counts in meter, as in all *prosody, is the perception of sound pattern. Sound in poetry has physical, mental, and psychological importance. It is heard and trans. by the brain into rhythm and meaning. It is felt as vibration in the areas that produce sound, from the chest up to the mouth and nasal cavity. The psychological recognition and importance of rhythmic repetition are probably as old as human beings, a physical order felt, heard, and understood in such universal experiences as the heartbeat, walking, breathing, dance, and ritual performances, some to music and some not (Hollander, Tsur). Poets throughout hist. have asserted that they write to the paces of these rhythmic repetitions. In most meters, one measuring feature must be principal, but others may exert some constraint. The name of the unit and the number of units per line are the characteristic ways of defining metrical type.

I. Four Categories.

A. Accentual Meter is the oldest meter in Eng., beginning with Anglo-Saxon verse; continuing into the devel. of the ballad across Great Britain, northern Europe, and Russia; and regaining prominence in the 19th and 20th cs. (see ACCENTUAL VERSE). In accentual meter, each accent (or stress) is felt as a strong pulse or *beat. Lines of verse typically repeat a set number of beats, but counting beats alone is not sufficient to make patterning felt with the regularity of meter, since accents are distributed over speech and prose as well. OE strong-stress meter is organized as half-lines, with two beats per half-line (*hemistich) on either side of a strong *caesura and various patterns of *alliteration governing the stresses. Over the course of the 20th c., theorists have attempted to describe OE meter, a difficult task since the nature of the Anglo-Saxon sound system must be understood from existing verse itself. Anglo-Saxon is not amenable to the cl. approach, so other systems have been developed to describe and explain the meter (see ENGLISH PROSODY, GERMANIC PROSODY). Anglo-Saxon strong-stress meter is not possible in mod. Eng. because its prosody does not have the structural patterning of the older lang. Nevertheless, poets since the Ren. have taken the four-beat alliterative characteristics of the form for verse cohesion, disregarding the other metrical restrictions. The Alliterative Revival in the late 19th and early 20th cs. saw many poets attempting alliterative accentual meter. G. M. Hopkins was inspired to write a strong accentual line with frequent alliteration, which he called *sprung rhythm. Poets such as Robert Bridges, Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, Wallace Stevens, W. H. Auden, Richard Wilbur, Robert Pinsky, and Seamus Heaney composed poems on the model and, on occasion, incorporated allusive, alliterative four-stress lines in free verse accentual-syllabic poems (see ALLITERATION).

The most common type of accentual poetry in Eng. is *ballad meter. The form appears to have developed from the strong-stress Anglo-Saxon meter and, in its oldest forms before the meter also developed accentual-syllabic regularity, is characterized by number of accents per line with a mid-line caesura and a variable number of syllables around accented syllables. In lines one and three of a ballad stanza, there are four stresses, two and two, on each side of a midline caesura. Lines two and four bear three stresses or, alternatively, pairings of two and two. Some argue that the number of syllables bearing weak stress and accompanying each strongly stressed syllable is restricted by a durational aspect. This restriction is likely due to musical bar-time—what can be sung or said within an isochronic perception of time (see Lehiste; ISOCHRONISM OR ISOCHRONY)—as the ballad developed as an oral form composed to music. Ballad meter is thus not a pure accentual meter for metrists who consider the pure form to be a measuring of accents only.

A pure accentual meter is rare since some regularity must be built up in order for the rhythm to be experienced as recurring with a high measure of regularity; however, the expectation trained into the ear by cultural codes for poetry may be expanded, as it has been in contemp. verse, which makes up for cohesion lost in metrical patterning with qualitative sound patterning. The five-beat line in the work of some poets (e.g., Stanley Plumly) is exemplary: positioning and grouping of units are not regular; only a norm of accents per line is. But there is leeway; some lines may bear four, six, or seven or even more beats. *Consonance and *assonance are relied on for repetition of sound. This style of metrical practice results in a "loose" accentual verse, analogous to the loose style of iambic pentameter; other critics regard this accentual style as a type of *free verse, since it only recalls, but is freed from, the accentual-syllabic constraints of traditional meters. The ten-beat line developed by C. K. Williams is another such meter: it can be viewed as a ten-beat accentual, a loose double iambic pentameter, or a free verse composition.

B. Syllabic Meter is defined by the number of syllables per line (see SYLLABIC VERSE). Simple or "pure" syllabism constitutes the basic meter of, e.g., Japanese poetry and Hungarian folk poetry. At various moments in their respective literary histories, it has also governed Polish poetry (as well as the Rus. verse based on Polish models), Slovak poetry, and Mordvinian folk songs. Complex or mixed syllabism, which combines syllabic patterning with some other obligatory linguistic feature, appears, for example, in Chinese poetry, which combines syllabism with tonal patterns, and Welsh poetry, which combines it with intricate rhyming. Sitting between these two categories, Fr. poetry presents an interesting borderline case: though usually considered syllabic, like Japanese, Fr. poetry depends heavily on rhyme to strengthen its syllabic frame in a way that Japanese poetry does not, although occasional alliteration, assonance, and consonance certainly enrich the latter. It. and Sp. versification are syllabic in their own complex ways, with a role for stress in determining the abstract pattern of the line—in general, stressed syllables must occupy certain positions—as well as rules governing the computation of syllables within and between words (see ELISION, HIATUS, DIAERESIS, SYNAERESIS); all of these factors figure in reckoning for metrical purposes the number of syllables in the line. In Eng., there is no traditional form that uses pure syllabic meter because in Eng. and other Germanic langs., accentual contour overrides the perception of syllable count. The mora-timed Japanese haiku (see HAIKAI) has been adapted to Eng., as three lines in a pattern of five, seven, and five syllables of any stress level; but what is heard foremost in Eng. are stresses, not syllables.

The limited perceptibility of the syllable in the inevitable presence of accents, however, does not mean that poets writing in Eng. do not use syllabic count as a basis for verse composition. A poet may decide to use the syllable as the compositional unit, establishing a certain number of syllables per line–either all lines having the same number of syllables or a pattern of syllables of different count for each stanza that may be quite idiosyncratic and different for each poem, such as the poems for which Marianne Moore is best known. Moore read her poems across line ends, without pause; on her printed copies, she marked the accents. Well-crafted syllabic verse may achieve a high degree of cohesion from repetition of syllable number and pattern, qualitative sound patterning, and spatial organization. As in Moore's poems, artful use of shape and space on the page, combined with repetition of phones, creates wonderful dramatic, semantic, emotional, and iconic effects (see VISUAL POETRY). On the one hand, by itself syllabic meter in poetry in a stress-based lang. is a weak device for cohesion, being aurally imperceptible or nearly so; the verse will sound rhythmic at best. On the other hand, syllabic patterning can make for strong cohesion in visual form. While some theorists maintain there can be no syllabic meter in Eng. (R. Wallace in Baker), others maintain that meter merely means measure, and the syllable-counting is one way of measuring a line, perceptible or not (Gioia in Baker). The debate about syllabic meter in Eng. turns on how meter is defined—as compositional or perceptual.

C. Accentual-Syllabic Meter is the most common by far in mod. Eng. poetry because of its synthetic devel. from Germanic and Romance langs. and poetries (see ACCENTUAL-SYLLABIC VERSE). The meter shares the structuring principles of syllabic meter and accentual meter, patterning a set number of strong and weak syllables in an idealized base. Thus, e.g., according to a cl. description, a line of iambic pentameter has five iambs (weak/strong, weak/strong, weak/strong, weak/strong, weak/strong). Iambic pentameter is the most common Eng. meter because of the flexibility with which it can be worked for rhythmic variety. The meter began as a synthesis when med. Eng. poets adapted Fr. verse forms to the accentual system of Eng. and to established Eng. verse forms. Russom's description of Anglo-Saxon metrics suggests that Chaucer may at least in part, have been writing OE metrical patterns to a syllabic base count, as he employed a ten-syllable line with stresses that follow the romance rule of alternating stress (see Halle and Keyser; Chomsky and Halle; Russom). Although iambic pentameter has a long trad., the meter cannot be said to have been in Chaucer's time or Thomas Wyatt's or John Milton's or Alexander Pope's what it has become today. To make definition and description of the meter even more complex, what poets and critics count as "acceptable" variations on the idealized pentameter pattern is not constant, even among those within a literary period. Disagreement abounds, as it did in the Ren. with Tottel's Miscellany (1557), as to whether some verse is iambic pentameter if it strays too far from the idealized base. In descriptive terms, though not always in prescriptive, iambic pentameter is regarded as occurring along a range, with strict at one end, where the stresses fall mostly on the stressed positions of the idealized pattern, and loose at the other end, allowing more leeway in stress placement and in the numbers of unstressed syllables between stresses. In terms of the meter's devel., describing the line's idealized meter as five feet of iambs may be inaccurate: as Marina Tarlinskaja's statistical analysis on a large corpus of Shakespeare's verse drama shows, only the last two "feet"—the final seventh through tenth syllables—consistently take the idealized pattern of a string of weak-strong units. According to her data, the first syllable is stressed in over 42 percent of Shakespeare's lines. The cl. approach to meter calls this stressed onset a trochaic substitution (see SUBSTITUTION). While this may be a convenient term, the concept is inconsistent with the reality of how the meter developed or was thought of by early versifiers, since cl. scansion was imported from Lat. after iambic pentameter came into existence. What this means is that versifiers did not write by "rules" devised in the cl. poetry; rather the "rules" were a later attempt begun in the mid-Ren. to regulate the verse meter by limiting variation. The restriction on numbers of syllables per line and positions allowable for stressed syllables encouraged a stricter metrical practice, and by the 18th c., the strictest form of the meter was being written, exemplified with the greatest flexibility in the verse practice of Pope. In the early 20th c., the meter achieved its loosest form, as developed and exemplified in the loose meter used in Robert Frost's poems to sound like conversation.

D. Quantitative Meter measures syllabic length or duration and is the basis of ancient Gr. and Lat. prosody (see CLASSICAL PROSODY, QUANTITY). In the Ren., poets experimented with quantitative meter in imitation of cl. models, but these experiments do not sound metrical to Eng. ears (see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES). No true quantitative meter is possible in Eng. because of its accent-based system; the Romance langs. exhibit an alternating rhythm, like mod. Eng., but rhythm based on duration, not the relative pitch-height that is the chief component of Eng. stress.

II. Debates About Meter. Disagreements over meter tend to be contentious and entrenched, pitting the cl. approach against mod. ling., and linguists themselves divide over basic issues such as what is the motivation for prominence assignment; whether meter involves only measurable sound features of the foot or whether meter cannot be separated from the rhythmic influence of higher level systems and nontemporal sound structures; whether musical theory applies to meter; whether actual readers' perceptions are relevant to meter; and whether a universal theory of meter is possible (see LINGUISTICS AND POETICS).

At the opposite extreme from the cl. approach are theories that admit only one type of meter in Eng. Some theorists have asserted that meter in Eng. is trochaic, citing the pronunciations of Germanic words and compounds, which stress the onset syllable, whereas others argue that Eng. is iambic, with line onset stresses adjusted to iambs by postulating a silent uptake before the stressed onset (Wallace and essays on this debate in Baker). Latinate words, by contrast, prefer an iambic rhythm, with the two heritages mixing to comprise the two basic meters, as well as the variety seen in iambic pentameter. In the iambic-only view, *anapests are elided iambs, *dactyls are elided trochees, and *spondees are iambs as their relative stress assignments show. Debates over these issues indicate that meter in mod. Eng. combines accentual and syllabic features. From the oldest existing poetry in Eng. to mod. free verse, units are built of stressed syllables with a varying but always limited number of relatively weaker syllables surrounding them. This character is perhaps inevitable given the alternating stress pattern of Eng. and the regularity of repetition that makes for perception of meter.

III. Functions. Meter signals *genre, elicits the pleasures of musicality in expectation and surprise, imitates meaning in the content (see ICONICITY, MIMESIS), contributes to *tone (e.g., ironic, satiric, oracular, conversational), and bears social and cultural meanings. The first three of these functions were much studied by *New Criticism and *structuralism (essays in Sebeok and in Chatman and Levin). The last two of these functions have been most neglected despite their analytic potential with respect to critical and cultural studies (Hurley). Because the definitions and limits of meters are preferences of a group or a time, what is called a meter can change, and the theories and functions of meter will also change over time.

■ Saintsbury, Prosody; Sebeok; Chatman; M. Halle and S. Keyser, "Chaucer and the Study of Prosody," CE 28 (1966): 187–219; Chomsky and Halle; Wimsatt; Essays on the Language of Literature, ed. S. Chatman and S. Levin (1975)—historical; P. Kiparsky, "Stress, Syntax, and Meter," Lang 51 (1975): 576–616; M.A.K. Halliday, Halliday: System and Function in Language, ed. G. Kress (1976); I. Lehiste, "Isochrony Reconsidered," JPhon 5 (1977): 253–63; Attridge, Rhythms; C. Hollis, Language and Style in "Leaves of Grass" (1983); S. Cushman, William Carlos Williams and the Meanings of Measure (1985); P. Kiparsky, "On Theory and Interpretation," Fabb et al.; G. Russom, Old English Meter and Linguistic Theory (1987); M. Tarlinskaja, Shakespeare's Verse (1987); Hollander; P. Kiparsky and G. Youmans, Rhythm and Meter (1989); T. Steele, Missing Measures: Modern Poetry and the Revolt against Meter (1990); R. Tsur, Toward a Theory of Cognitive Poetics (1992); C. Hartman, English Metrics: A Hypertext Tutorial and Reference (1995); English Historical Metrics, ed. J. Anderson and C. McCully (1996); Meter in English: A Critical Engagement, ed. D. Baker (1996); C. Hasty, Meter as Rhythm (1997); D. Crystal, Language and Play (1998); R. Pinsky, The Sounds of Poetry (1998); J. Wimsatt, "Alliteration and Hopkins' Sprung Rhythm," PoT 19 (1998); T. Steele, All the Fun's in How You Say a Thing (1999); V. Shemtov, "Metrical Hybridization: Prosodic Ambiguities as a Form of Social Dialogue," PoT 22, no. 1 (2001): 165–87; Carper and Attridge; M. Russett, "Meter, Identity, Voice: Untranslating 'Christabel'," SEL 43, no. 4 (2003): 773–97; J. Cook, Poetry in Theory (2004); Y. Moriya, "Alliteration versus Natural Speech Rhythm in Determining the Meter of ME Alliterative Verse," English Studies 85 (2004); M. Hurley, "The Pragmatics of Prosody," Style 41, no. 1 (2007): 46–65.

R. Winslow

METONYMY (Gr., "change of name"; Lat. denominatio). A trope in which one expression is substituted for another on the basis of some material, causal, or conceptual relation. Quintilian lists the kinds traditionally distinguished: container for thing contained ("I'll have a glass"); agent for act, product, or object possessed ("reading Wordsworth"); cause for effect; time or place for their characteristics or products ("a bloody decade," "I'll have Burgundy"); associated object for its possessor or user ("the crown" for the king). Other kinds, previously considered *synecdoche, are now often included in metonymy: parts of the body for states of consciousness associated with them (head and heart for thought and feeling), material for object made of it (ivories for piano keys), and attributes or abstract features for concrete entities.

Because metonymy involves some literal or referential connection between *tenor and vehicle, it is often contrasted with *metaphor, in which no such relationship exists. When the effect of metonymy is to create a sense of vividness or particularity—as in Thomas Gray's "drowsy tinklings" of sheep (the sound of their bells) or John Keats's "beaker full of the warm South"—the figure is often treated as an instance of *imagery. But the metonymies "drowsy tinklings" and "South" are not concrete images. Metonymic reference can evoke entire realms of meaning concisely, as in Ezra Pound's evocation of journalism and religion: "We have the press for wafer." W. H. Auden's "the clever hopes expire / Of a low dishonest decade" shows that a clear surface meaning can arise from metonymic associations of cause, attribute, and effect that are far from simple. Conversely, metonymy can create riddles, as in Dylan Thomas's "Altarwise by owl-light," which suggests facing east in the dark.

Ruwet points out that some metonymies result from verbal deletions that reduce redundancy. "A glass of Burgundy wine" becomes "a glass of Burgundy" or simply "Burgundy" or "a glass" when the sentence or context implies the rest. In "I just read [a novel by] Balzac," the phrase in brackets can be deleted because the context conveys its sense. Corpus-based studies of figurative lang. show that metonymy is often part of a ling. "collocation" in which several words always appear together. The phrase "provide [name of a country] with" produces a country-for-its-people metonymy, whereas "in [country]" is always interpreted literally. The word "heart," when preceded by a quantifier (some, few, many, all), is almost always metonymic (Hilpert).

Attempts to produce a definition of metonymy that would show what generic features its different types have in common have been part of the larger project of deriving a systematic rationale underlying *tropes. The meaning assigned to metonymy in such cases is determined by the number of tropes identified and the categorical features used to define them (ling., logical, semiotic, and/or psychological). Peter Ramus, Giambattista Vico, and their mod. followers hold that there are four basic tropes, the other three being metaphor, synecdoche, and *irony. Bloom retains six; Jakobson treats two, metonymy and metaphor. The meaning of metonymy expands as the number of tropes decreases. Among mod. adherents of fourfold classification, Burke would limit metonymy to "reduction" (incorporeal and corporeal); White defines it as part-whole reduction; Bloom treats it as a change from full to empty. In these three definitions, metonymy is not reversible: to substitute incorporeal for corporeal or empty for full would be another trope (synecdoche, for Burke and Bloom). These critics use the names of the tropes figuratively, applying them to passages or to entire texts.

In practice, it is often difficult to distinguish metonymy from the basic forms of synecdoche (part for whole, genus for species, or the reverse). Some hold that synecdoche entails a "one-many" substitution, or, in logical terms, a change of extension, whereas metonymy is a one-for-one replacement involving a change of intension (Henry). Rejecting that proposal, many critics use the term metonymy for both.

The opposition of metonymy to metaphor, treating these as the primary tropes, originated in Fr. *structuralism and *Russian formalism. Saussure held that there are two sorts of relationships between words: linear (syntagmatic) connections when they are used and associative (paradigmatic) connections of meaning in our minds. The Fr. psychologist Rondet referred to the linear connections as "contiguity," which sometimes evince metonymy. Paradigmatic changes, resulting from conceptual resemblance or similarity, were in his view metaphoric (Blank). Eichenbaum held that metaphor operates at a "supra-linguistic" level, that of the idea: a word is pulled from its semantic field to superimpose a second level of meaning on the literal level. Metonymy, he said, is a displacement, or lateral semantic shift, that lends words new meanings without leaving the literal plane. In "Marginal Notes on the Prose of the Poet Pasternak" (1935), Jakobson extended the dichotomy, suggesting that frequent use of metaphor unites the poet's mythology and being, separated from the world. Poets who prefer metonymy, on the other hand, project their being on an outer reality that their emotion and perception displace from the normal. The shifting, sequential character of metonymy, he said, was more common in prose than in poetry. Like Eichenbaum, Jakobson associated metaphor with poetry and metonymy with prose (Lodge).

Reworking the distinction in "Two Aspects of Language and Two Types of Aphasic Disturbances" (1956), Jakobson described metaphor as a metalinguistic operation—roughly speaking, a process through which an idea or theme is actualized in words. Metonymy, he said, was a change that operated on the hierarchy of ling. units, either affecting their order or substituting part of a word's meaning, or one associated with it, for the word itself. Both tropes can result from substitution of one word for another or from combination (the succession of words on the syntagmatic axis—see EQUIVALENCE). In metaphor, e.g., a single word can be substituted for another, or the two can be successive ("A is B"). A series of metaphors may point toward a single theme, as in Shakespeare's sonnet that successively likens old age to autumn, sunset, and a dying fire. Metonymy does not produce a metalinguistic idea unifying the chain. Jakobson held that these two tropes could be used to classify mental disorders (e.g., aphasia), literary movements (romanticism and symbolism being based on metaphor, realism on metonymy), styles in painting and cinematography, operations of the unconscious (Sigmund Freud's "identification and symbolism" being metaphor, whereas "displacement" and "condensation" are metonymy), and cultural practices (such as the two types of magic identified by J. G. Frazer—one based on similarity, the other on contiguity). Adapting Jakobson's taxonomy to his own psychoanalytic theory, Lacan treated discourse as a continuous metonymy, displaced from the real, in which metaphoric, unconscious signifiers sometimes appear (Ruegg, Vergote).

Attempts to revise or simplify the metonymy-metaphor opposition as conceived by Jakobson and Lacan have taken several forms. Henry defines metonymy as the result of a psychological focus that substitutes the name of one of a word's semantic elements (semes) for the word itself. Metaphor, in his view, is a combination of two metonymies. Le Guern argues that the "contiguity" of Jakobson's metonymy involves reference to reality, whereas metaphor is the product of a purely ling. or conceptual operation. De Man pushes this difference further, seeing metonymy not only as referential but as contingent or accidental, in opposition to the pull toward unification of essences that underlies most uses of metaphor. Bredin agrees that metonymy refers to the world and sees its "extrinsic relations" as "a kind of ontological cement holding the world together," not as contingencies. Metaphor is also referential in his view, both figures being opposed to the "structural" or intralinguistic relations underlying synecdoche.

The reliance of metonymy on reference to experience may account for the difficulty theorists have in defining it. To say that it depends on contiguity or the transfer of features in a single domain, scheme, or model is to admit metaphorically that it cannot be delimited. Traditional sources list 23 types of metonymy (Peirsman and Geeraerts); Radden and Kövecses identify 49. The inadequacy of referential, pragmatic, and semantic definitions has led to an analysis of tropes based on the mental operations underlying their ling. expression. For conceptual-metaphor theorists, metonymical connections between physical reality and ideas support the thesis that lang. emerged from bodily experience. Physical warmth, a red face, and high blood pressure generate metonymies related to anger; hand, heart, and head signify action, feeling, and thought. In cognitive linguistics, one finds simple verbal patterns explained as intricate configurations of metonymy. "I can see your point" becomes a metonymy for "I see your point" (potential for actual). Corporations become metonymic wholes, parts of which (company, executives, workers) are activated in different statements. Metonymy gives actions and actors the names of objects (a ski; to ski; skier). The complexity of this view, inadequately represented here, becomes apparent in the anthols. listed in the bibl. The discussion of metonymy produced by cognitive linguists and conceptual-metaphor theorists dwarfs that of the preceding two millennia. The objects of analysis are commonplace expressions that may make us aware of verbal intricacies but not of interesting variations. Poetry shares with everyday conversation a creative production of metonymy that sometimes attracts scholarly attention (Nerlich and Clarke).

Those who seek a logic underlying metonymy and other tropes are forced to redefine them, shifting some traditional meanings to other tropes and positing new conceptual entities that include the features that remain. In so doing, they often seek an explanation of tropes as rule-governed transformations of a posited conceptual literalism. The theoretical clarity thus obtained results from attempting to make the terminology of rhet. and poetics useful for philosophy, ling., and cognitive science.

See FIGURATION, TROPE.

■ Primary Texts: L. Roudet, "Sur la classification psychologique des changements sémantiques," Journal de psychologie 18 (1921); B. Eichenbaum, Anna Akhmatova (1923); K. Burke, A Grammar of Motives ([1945] 1969); Jakobson: v. 2 for "Two Aspects of Language" and v. 5 for essay on Pasternak (in Ger.); J. Lacan, Écrits, trans. B. Fink ([1966] 2006); A. Henry, Métonymie et métaphore (1971); M. Le Guern, Sémantique de la métaphore et de la métonymie (1973); H. White, Metahistory (1973); F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics, ed. C. Bally and A. Sechehaye, trans. W. Baskin (1974); H. Bloom, A Map of Misreading (1975); N. Ruwet, "Synecdoches et métonymies," Poétique 6 (1975); H. Bloom, Wallace Stevens (1977); D. Lodge, The Modes of Modern Writing

(1977); P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Metaphor, trans. R. Czerny (1977); P. de Man, Allegories of Reading (1979); M. Ruegg, "Metaphor and Metonymy," Glyph 6 (1979); G. Lakoff and M. Johnson, Metaphors We Live By (1980); J. Culler, The Pursuit of Signs (1981); G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan (1982); U. Eco, Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language (1984); R. Jakobson, Language in Literature, ed. K. Pomorska (1987); M. Hilpert, "Keeping an Eye on the Data," in Corpus-based Approaches to Metaphor and Metonymy, ed. A. Stefanowitsch and S. Gries (2006).

■ Criticism: A. Vergote, "From Freud's 'Other Scene' to Lacan's 'Other,'" Interpreting Lacan, ed. J. Smith and W. Kerrigan (1983); H. Bredin, "Metonymy," PoT 5 (1984); W. Bohn, "Jakobson's Theory of Metaphor and Metonymy, An Annotated Bibliography," Style 18 (1984); J. Hedley, Powers in Verse (1988); Lausberg; G. Radden and Z. Küvecses, "Towards a Theory of Metonymy," in Metonymy in Language and Thought, ed. K.-U. Panther and G. Radden (1999); A. Blank, "Co-presence and Succession," in Metaphor and Metonymy at the Crossroads, ed. A. Barcelona (2000); B. Nerlich and D. Clarke, "Ambiguities We Live By," Journal of Pragmatics 33 (2001); A. Barcelona, "Clarifying and Applying the Notions of Metaphor and Metonymy within Cognitive Linguistics," Metaphor and Metonymy in Comparison and Contrast, ed. R. Dirven and R. Pürings (2002); Metonymy and Pragmatic Inferencing, ed. K.-U. Panther and L. Thornburg (2003); A. Al-Sharafi, Textual Metonymy (2004); G. Steen, "Metonymy Goes Cognitive-Linguistic," Style 39 (2005); Y. Peirsman and D. Geeraerts, "Metonymy as a Prototypical Category," Cognitive Linguistics 17 (2006); K. Allan, Metaphor and Metonymy (2008).

W. Martin

METRICI AND RHYTHMICI (Gr. metrikoi, "students of metrics," rhythmikoi, "musical theorists"). Among the ancient Greeks, there were two schools of metrical theorists. The metrici were primarily grammarians; they held that only long and short syllables need be considered in *scansion and that a long syllable was always twice the length of a short; actual variations were ignored. The chief exemplar is Hephaestion (2d c. CE), whose Enchiridion, originally in 48 books, has survived in a one-book abridgment. In opposition to this group, the rhythmici, chiefly the musical theorist Aristoxenus of Tarentum (pupil of Aristotle, fl. 4th c. BCE; see Westphal, Pearson), viewed poetry as allied to music, maintaining that long syllables differ greatly from one another in *quantity and that even short syllables may differ in some degree, thus demanding more complicated methods of analysis.

Certainly, much early Gr. poetry was sung to the accompaniment of flutes or pipes (see MELIC POETRY), as were the songs in Gr. drama, although there was strictly recited verse such as *monody and the dialogic portions of drama were metrical. At issue among the theorists is not the question of performance mode but the more fundamental issue of whether meter is in ontological terms a structural phenomenon or a temporal one: essentially, metrici count the occurrence of events, while rhythmici also insist on taking account of the timing of those events. But on the extant evidence, we ought not overstate the clarity or depth of ancient theory: the metrici are mechanistic and oversimple, the rhythmici extremely difficult.

In fact, however, this plane of cleavage between competing theories of the nature of verse extends through the hist. of Western *prosody up to the present. The musical-rhythmical view is carried into the Middle Ages by Augustine (De musica, ca. 389 CE); later it is transformed into claims that quantitative verse could be written in the Eur. vernaculars (see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES)—a vestige of the lingering authority of Lat., which persisted until the emergence of cl. philology in the 19th c.; and in mod. times, it is revived in the "musical" theories of prosody of Joshua Steele (18th c.), Sidney Lanier (19th c.), Andreas Heusler and John C. Pope (20th c., for Ger. and OE), and a host of epigones, as well as in other temporal theories not strictly musical (e.g., T. S. Omond, G. R. Stewart, Derek Attridge)—for schema, see Brogan 142. Allied are those who deny that mod. verse is metrical at all, such as G. F. Nott (1815) and J. G. Southworth (1954). By contrast, the metrici include Aristotle, the Lat. grammarians (texts collected in Keil, v. 6), Bede, Philip Sidney, Samuel Daniel, William Mitford, Thomas Tyrwhitt, Edwin Guest, Jakob Schipper, J. B. Mayor, and most mod. prosodists such as W. K. Wimsatt and G. T. Wright.

■ R. Westphal, Die Fragmente und Lehrsätze der griechischen Rhythmiker (1861); and "Die Tradition der alten Metriker," Philologus 20 (1863); Scriptores metrici graeci, ed. R. Westphal, 2 v. (1866); Keil; J. Hadley, "Greek Rhythm and Metre," Essays Philological and Critical (1873); Aristoxenos von Tarent: Melik und Rhythmik, ed. R. Westphal, 2 v. (1883–93)—with commentary; T. D. Goodell, Chapters on Greek Metric (1901); C. Williams, The Aristoxenian Theory of Musical Rhythm (1911); Wilamowitz, pt. 1, ch. 3; H.D.F. Kitto, "Rhythm, Metre, and Black Magic," Classical Review 56 (1942); Brogan; West; Aristoxenus, Elementa Rhythmica, ed. L. Pearson (1990).

T.V.F. Brogan

METRON (pl. metra). In cl. Gr. and Lat. prosody, a unit of measurement in the metrical analysis of a *period that is attested as early as Herodotus. Metra are recurring and equivalent units of from three to six long and short syllables. Verse forms that can be analyzed in terms of metra are said to be organized kata metron, i.e., in *measure; such verse incl. stichic forms such as the *iambic *trimeter and *dactylic *hexameter (recitation meters); verse that is measured by cola (see COLON), by contrast, are said to be measured ou kata metron (see AEOLIC). The ancient grammarians and metrists also analyzed metrical units in terms of feet. In some Gr. meters—e.g., dactylic and *ionic—a metron is equivalent to a foot, while in others—e.g., iambic, *trochaic, *anapestic—it is equivalent to two feet (hence, the older term dipody). Thus the dactylic hexameter has six feet, but the iambic trimeter has three metra (scanned x – ⏑ –). It is best to measure Gr. verse in iambs, trochees, and anapests in metra primarily because verse composed in these three genres always consists of an even number of feet and certain features are restricted to the second foot. In the recited verse of Lat. comedy, however, there is no distinction between the two parts of iambic or trochaic metra; hence, these meters are measured in feet (see SENARIUS, SEPTENARIUS, OCTONARIUS). When the concepts and terms of cl. prosody were revived in the Ren. for the description of mod. meters, however, these subtleties were lost; hence, it was the foot rather than the meter that became the basis for prosodic description of intralinear metrical units.

See SYSTEM.

■ Wilamowitz, 103, 441 ff.; Beare, 76–77; Maas, secs. 52, 61–66; Koster, 16–17; Dale, chaps. 1–2, and Collected Papers (1969), chap. 4; Allen; West, 4–6, 198, 200.

J. W. HALPORN; T.V.F. BROGAN

MEXICAN AMERICAN POETRY. See CHICANA/O POETRY.

MEXICO, POETRY OF. A first problem: should an article on Mexican poetry consider only the lit. written after the country became independent, in 1821? Should it include colonial times or even the pre-Columbian period? Most anthols. and critical studies on the subject have elected to trace the lit. back to the indigenous past, since that trad. has survived in art and scholarship and still has an influence on present-day authors. The lit. of Mexico is always a mixture, a hybrid texture, the multiracial (mestizo) society, with dominant Eur. influences and suppressed indigenous elements that nonetheless arise, sometimes surreptitiously. This entry, thus, envisions the poetry of Mexico as inclusively as possible.

As with all ancient lit., poetry in Mexico before the Sp. conquest was associated with music, dance, and rituals. Although Mesoamerican societies (in the region that roughly comprehends Mexico and northern Central America) developed "books" (known as amoxtli), they were used mostly to record hist., genealogies, astronomical charts, divinatory tables, calendars, and religious ceremonies. Transmitted by oral trad., poetry was captured in print by Sp. priests during the colonial period. Even if there were many spoken langs. in Mesoamerica, most of the materials available today come from Nahuatl and Maya, the two langs. that dominated in the region. Two of the major sources on culture at the time of the conquest are Bernardino de Sahagún's Florentine Codex (written 1547–69, and after 1575 partially trans. into Sp., as Historia general de las cosas de la Nueva España (General History of the Things of New Spain), a major source on Aztec life and hist., in Nahuatl with illustrations; and Diego de Landa's Relación de las cosas de Yucatán (Yucatan before and after the Conquest, written ca. 1566), an important reference for Mayan life and cosmogony, written in Sp. A number of texts would become "poems" that detail the origins of life, according to Mesoamerican beliefs.

For Nahuatl poetry, the discovery at the end of the 19th c. of two mss., the Cantares mexicanos (Songs of the Aztecs, written in the 16th c.) and the Romances de los Señores de la Nueva España (Ballads of the Lords of New Spain, written 1582), was key to its later success, thanks to the work of two prominent scholars in this field: Ángel María Garibay and Miguel León Portilla. Garibay published three volumes studying and translating Nahuatl poetry (from the above-mentioned sources) in the 1950s and 1960s. León-Portilla continued this work, identifying 13 poets in Trece poetas del mundo azteca (1967; in a later ed., he adds two more). The most important poet-philosopher known from the pre-Hispanic period was Nezahualcoyotl (1402–72), also king of Texcoco in the eastern part of the Valley of Mexico. After a war against the Tepanecs of Azcapotzalco in 1428 (in alliance with the Aztecs), Nezahualcoyotl governed Texcoco until his death. According to Martínez (1972), 36 poems can be attributed to him. A number of themes appear in the poems: the brevity or fugacity of life, the nature of poetry, philosophical disquisitions about the creator of the world, celebrations of flowers and spring, praise of warriors, prophecies, and the afterlife. Instead of dedicating poems to known Mesoamerican gods (e.g., Quetzalcoatl, Coatlicue, Huitzilopochtli), Nezahualcoyotl addressed his poems to a god with the *epithets Ipalnemoani (Giver of Life), Moyocoyatzin (Inventor of Himself), or In Tloque in Nahuaque (Lord of the Close Vicinity), arguably a Toltec influence pertaining to the cl. Mesoamerican period, before the 10th c. The conceit of the world as the creation of a book of paintings (Mesoamericans wrote books using pictograms and *ideograms; see TLACUILOLLI) is strikingly mod. in a Borgesian way: "Like a painting, we will be erased." Nezahualcoyotl was the first major poet of Mexico.

After the conquest, Sp. institutions were established, and most known writers followed literary currents from Spain. Although a significant number of the writings, esp. in the 16th c., were chronicles of the conquest and compilations of oral indigenous lits., poetry was much more elaborate, pertaining mainly to the court. Three Sp. poets (Gutierre de Cetina, 1519–54; Eugenio de Salazar, 1530–1602; and Juan de la Cueva, 1543–1612) traveled to New Spain, bringing the techniques, styles, and worldviews that dominated poetry of the Iberian Peninsula during the 16th c. Cetina lived his last ten years in Mexico. Like Garcilaso de la Vega before him, he practiced *Petrarchism. Although his best-known poem, "Ojos claros, serenos" (Clear, Serene Eyes), may not have been written in New Spain, it is frequently quoted in anthols. for bringing Eur. poetic style to the Sp. colonies. Francisco de Terrazas (1525–1600), born in Mexico, continued in the same Petrarchan vein as those who brought it from Spain. Parallel to love sonnets in the 16th c., a common motif is the eulogy to Mexico. The jurist and colonial administrator Salazar wrote an epideictic poem ("Descripción de la laguna") in ottava rima about Tenochtitlan or Mexico City, the conquerors, and the viceroyalty of New Spain. The conquistador Bernal Díaz del Castillo's Historia verdadera de la conquista de la Nueva España (True History of the Conquest of New Spain, written after 1568) includes several passages of description that belong to this motif, notably that relating Cortés's entry into Tenochtitlan in terms of a locus amoenus. This trend continued with Mateo Rosas de Oquendo (b. 1559?) in "Indiano volcán famoso" (Famous Indian Volcano), a *descriptive poem about Popocatepetl, a volcano near Mexico City. And it culminates with a long poem by Bernardo de Balbuena (1561–1627), "Grandeza mexicana" (The Magnificence of Mexico, 1604), where the author describes with great detail and elaborate lang. all aspects of Mexico City, incl. its vegetation, climate, and architecture, emphasizing the splendor of what he believes is one of the greatest cities in the world. With Balbuena, Mexican poetry also moves toward the *baroque under the influence of the Sp. poets Francisco de Quevedo, Lope de Vega, Luis de Góngora, and others. *Poetic contests abounded in the 17th c. in New Spain, and many poets, often clerics, wrote elaborate and sophisticated poems for ceremonies at the court or for the church. Luis de Sandoval y Zapata (1620?–71), an honored poet of the time, was, according to some critics, a key figure who was influenced by the Sp. poets. But doubtless the most important writer of this period—and perhaps the greatest baroque poet in any lang.—was the nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (ca. 1648–95), a towering intellectual to whom the convent provided an institutional setting for her poetic and philosophical work. Sor Juana's greatest poetry can be found in her sonnets and in the long poem of ideas called Primero sueño (First Dream). She uses a battery of logical, poetic, and rhetorical devices (*antithesis, *parallelism, *acrostics, *alliteration, *paronomasia, *hyperbaton, *hyperbole), employs *satire and *wit, and incorporates Lat. and Nahuatl (see XENOGLOSSIA). Fully immersed in her poetic milieu, Sor Juana responded to literary challenges, wrote poems of petition, and addressed ceremonies and special occasions. Although she adapted the rhet. of the Sp. baroque, she was able subtly to alter the male perspective. E.g., in alluding to the last line of Góngora's sonnet "Mientras por competir con tu cabello" (While to compete with your hair) with the motif of carpe diem, she reframed the preceding lines into an ekphrasis of a portrait representing not fleeting beauty but deceit: "This that you gaze on, colorful deceit . . . is but cadaver, ashes, shadow, void." Many mod. readers, notably Octavio Paz, see in Sor Juana a poetic program that goes beyond the baroque to anticipate *modernism.

During the wars of independence (1810–21), poets participated actively in politics. A first generation of poets celebrated Mexico with "nationalistic" poems, such as Andrés Quintana Roo's (1787–1851) *ode "16 de Septiembre" (the date commemorates Independence Day in Mexico). But Quintana Roo and others were still absorbed in *neoclassical forms, and their poetry is heavily rhetorical. A little later, two subsequent groups emerged, the Academia de Letrán and the Liceo Hidalgo. With them, romanticism (linked to liberalism) arrived in Mexico, e.g., with the idealized version of the indigenous past, as in "La profecia de Guatimoc" (The Prophecy of Guatimoc, written 1839, pub. 1851) by Ignacio Rodríguez Galván (1816–42). Although better known for his novels, the jurist and politician Ignacio Manuel Altamirano (1834–93), a central figure of the 19th c., also wrote poems. An important poet of the period is Manuel Acuña (1849–73), best known for the "Nocturno (a Rosario)" and also for the melancholic tendency that ended in his suicide. The transition from romanticism to modernismo (the Sp. Am. version of Fr. *Parnassianism and *symbolism) went through Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (1859–95), a dandy who chronicled the city in many ways, esp. in "La duquesa Job" (Duchess Job), which mocks the lifestyle of the period. He also wrote somber poems, such as "Para entonces" (When My Time Comes). Other modernista poets are the highly popular Amado Nervo (1870–1919), Salvador Díaz Mirón (1853–1928), Manuel José Othón (1858–1906), and Efrén Rebolledo (1877–1929; his sonnets, under the title Caro Victrix, use explicit sexual imagery influenced by Charles Baudelaire).

Although Enrique González Martínez (1871–1952) wrote a sonnet in 1911 about the killing of the swan (to figure the end of modernismo) in favor of the owl, real poetic change in the 20th c. was introduced by Ramón López Velarde (1888–1921) and José Juan Tablada (1871–1945), both of whom started as modernistas but persisted to write a more critical poetry. Unlike the art of the murals or the novel, a poetry of the Mexican Revolution (1910–20) was not developed as such, perhaps because many of the prevailing poets of the time looked on angrily at the violent changes in the country. There was a popular and anonymous poetry associated with the movement, through the corridos or *ballads that celebrated various heroes and battles. In his first phase, Tablada had been one of the key poets of modernismo; his poem "Misa negra" (Black Mass) used symbolist imagery. As his work evolved, he introduced the Japanese *haiku (see RENGA) into Sp. (Un día [One Day], 1919; and Jarro de flores [A Vase of Flowers], 1921) and his poetry moved toward ideographic forms in the avant-garde style of Guillaume Apollinaire's Calligrammes (Li-Po y otros poemas [Li-Po and Other Poems], 1920). In La feria (The Fair, 1928), written in exile, he returned to Mexican folklore, with attention to food, drinks, and typical symbols of the country. López Velarde was called the poet of the province, for having written texts reflecting the ambience of the towns of the Mexican interior. He was also a poet of eroticism fused with humor, irony, and colloquial lang. Similar to that of the Argentine Ernesto Lugones, his poetry became more self-critical. He is also known for "La suave patria" (The Gentle Homeland, 1921), a poem that commemorates the first centenary of Mexican independence, seeking a more tender and reflective motherland after the armed struggle of the preceding decade. Even though Alfonso Reyes (1889–1959) was arguably the most important Mexican writer of the first half of the 20th c., he is known more for his essays, crit., and trans. than for his poetry (see JITANJÁFORA).

Even though they were trans. of the lit. of the Eur. *avant-garde, the poets who belong to the group called Contemporáneos (its name comes from the literary magazine they edited between 1928 and 1931) were reticent about excessive experimentation; for instance, *euphony and *rhythm were still important elements for them. Their poetry explores topics apart from the political and social issues of the revolution; they are more interested in intimacy, solitude, death, dreams, and love (incl., for Xavier Villaurrutia and Salvador Novo, homoeroticism). Villaurrutia (1903–50) is remembered by the nocturnes of Nostalgia de la muerte (Nostalgia for Death): reflective, insomniac texts, influenced by the dreamlike imagery of *surrealism, but without arriving at automatic writing; poems that explore the space between saying and not saying and forbidden pleasures. Muerte sin fin (Death without End) by José Gorostiza (1901–73) is thought to be one of the most significant poems of the 20th c. Inspired by Sor Juana's Primero sueño, Góngora's Soledades, and T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land, it is a philosophical poem concerning the search for intangible forms—God, time, spirit, silence—and the transformation of matter, like water, lang., plants, animals, and the body. All this metamorphosis is an expression of the death that flows as a constant in life. Very different is Carlos Pellicer (1897–1977), who explores the tropics in the Latin Am. landscape. If the poetry of Villaurrutia and Gorostiza is implosive, Pellicer's is explosive. From his first book of 1921 (contemporaneous with the debut of the young Chilean Pablo Neruda), he had already demonstrated his astonishment with nature through innovative metaphors. Salvador Novo (1904–74) is perhaps the most experimental member of the Contemporáneos group, or at least the most impudent. His humor and irony play with the icons of Mexicanness: "¿Quién quiere jugar tenis con nopales y tunas / sobre la red de los telégrafos?" (Who wants to play tennis with nopales and prickly pears / on the network of the telegraphs? [XX poemas, 1925]). Later, he will explore "sexual and moral dissent" (according to Monsiváis 1979) in Nuevo amor (New Love, 1933), namely, the taboo of homosexuality in the Mexico of the 1930s.

Estridentismo was an explicit avant-garde movement in Mexico, with *manifestos and proclamations in the style of *futurism, influenced by Sp. ultraísmo (see ULTRAISM). The most important poet of the group, Manuel Maples Arce (1898–1981), wrote Urbe, Superpoema bolchevique (Urbe: Super-Bolshevik Poem, 1924), a work that links the Mexican and the Rus. revolutions and that attempts to defy poetic conventions, concentrating on movements in the streets of Mexico City. But estridentismo did not have a major impact on future generations, compared to how the Contemporáneos influenced Mexican poets throughout the century.

In the following generation, there are two important poets who at first share a mistrust toward the group of Contemporáneos but eventually delineate two routes for Mexican writers: the poetry of lang. of Octavio Paz (1914–98), and the colloquial and political tones of Efraín Huerta (1914–82). In Paz's Libertad bajo palabra (Freedom on Parole, 1960) two of the tenets of surrealistic ethics, freedom and poetry, are a point of reference—liberty thanks to poetry, poetry thanks to liberty. "Piedra de sol" ("Sunstone," 1957), one of the most famous poems of the second half of the century, is circular: it ends with the same lines that begin it. The title is taken from the circular Aztec stone that reveals the cosmogony of the world. In the first part of the poem, analogy helps converge nature and love: "I go among your body as among the world . . . / I go among your eyes as I swim water . . ." But soon the poetic *persona is alone, in search of a feminine subject who eludes him. In the middle of the poem, a place and a date seem to break with poetic fluency: "Madrid, 1937." Although this line in Sp. is a perfect *hendecasyllable, the numbers cut the poem in two: it is the split of the atrocities of the war that places its mark and interrupts the harmony of the beginning. But opposed to it, a couple makes love in the middle of bombs, defying everything. For Paz, historical time is the conscience that provokes anxiety. Hence, he is constantly looking for the circular time of ancient civilizations, for the paradise of the beginning (before the expulsion from the Garden of Eden), the mystical silence in which everything is annulled to enter a sacred space, where pronouns and differences are obliterated, where the lost unity is found. "Sunstone" presupposes that love, liberty, and poetry (the famous surrealist triad) can transform the world. Several of the poems of Ladera Este (East Slope, 1969) concentrate on coitus as a way of denying differences through the rites of Tantrism. The culmination of this poetical model is "Blanco" (1967), a poem that combines readings of Stéphane Mallarmé, the theories of silence in the music of John Cage, and the ritual practice of Tantrism brought to the space of the poem. In Pasado en claro (A Draft of Shadows, 1974), an autobiographical long poem, Paz reflects on the effects of time, the role of lang., and (by the poet's standards) a more visceral tone. His childhood is seen both as troubled and as foundational to his later obsessions. In Árbol adentro (A Tree Within, 1987), poems in dialogue with painters, and the poem of love (his constant topic) "Carta de creencia" ("Letter of Testimony"), are central to the book.

Huerta is a more political and irreverent poet who uses colloquial idioms and offers paeans and diatribes to Mexico City. Late in his career, he wrote many poemínimos, very short sardonic poems that use any topic to make poignant observations. Alí Chumacero (1918–2010) belongs to the same generation as Paz and Huerta. His poetry (e.g., Palabras en reposo, [Words at Rest], 1956) uses sophisticated lang. and metaphors, sometimes with biblical and liturgical tones, to evoke people who are lonely, such as a widower, a suicidal person, or a pilgrim.

The next generation continued Huerta's use of colloquialisms and direct discourse. Jaime Sabines (1926– 1998) became the most popular poet of Mexico. His use of profanity, blasphemy, and jargon in clear, intelligible verse, and other elements ordinarily excluded from Mexican poetry, made him a celebrated poet known for poems such as "Algo de la muerte del mayor Sabines" (Something of the Death of the Elder Sabines) and "Los amorosos" (The Lovers). His readings attracted thousands of people. Rosario Castellanos (1925–74), also from the southern state of Chiapas, belongs to the same generation, although she focuses on women's role in society. After Sor Juana, she is the first poet to raise her voice against the dominant male culture in Mexican society. Tomás Segovia (1927–2011) is known for his *erotic poetry in the surrealist vein, and for Anagnórisis (1967), a long poem (incl., in turn, other poems invoked through a phrase or verbal image—see CENTO) that explores the ambience of the exile from different perspectives: memory, travel, and orphanhood. Homero Aridjis (b. 1940) follows this line of continuity in relation to surrealism. Informed by his ecological activism, his poems make constant reference to nature. José Emilio Pacheco (b. 1939) is a poet of daily life who observes with acuteness and pessimism the transience and the innovations of the moment. In his denunciation of the student massacre of 1968, he composed his poems using phrases and words taken from Garibay's trans. of the indigenous voices of the conquest, arranged in such a way that they become a condemnation of the events of the present. His poetry also explores the neglect and devastation of Mexico City. Gerardo Deniz's (b. 1934) poetry is cryptic, with erudite and mundane references that escape even the most avid readers. For him, every poem is an opportunity to challenge his readers and to amuse himself, sometimes with superficial themes. If the Chilean Nicanor Parra is the transparent antipoet (see CHILE, POETRY OF), Deniz is the baroque and obscure antipoet, combining multiple registers, deliberately confusing his readers. Heir of *Dada, he puts in doubt the concept of art itself. In Gloria Gervitz's (b. 1943) Migraciones (Migrations; a long poem that has grown over the years and in new eds.), a dialogue (or *monologue?) devoted to Jewish women who migrated from Eastern Europe to Mexico serves as a reinvention of the past, a reconstruction of the loss. As with Paz, Elsa Cross (b. 1946) is interested in Eastern philosophies, particularly of India. Her poetry explores the sacred as it relates to ancient cultures. David Huerta (b. 1949) has tried several different techniques. His Incurable (1987) is a memorable baroque poem, which combines the long verses of the Cuban poet José Lezama Lima and poststructuralist theory. Coral Bracho (b. 1951) is perhaps the most admired poet of her generation. Her first two books, intimately associated with Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari's concept of rhizome, have had a lasting influence on many younger writers. In Tierra nativa (Native Land, 1980), José Luis Rivas (b. 1951) recreates the tropics and his childhood in Veracruz, using long and sophisticated lines, reminiscent of the Fr. modernist Saint-John Perse. With Ojo de jaguar (Jaguar's Eye, 1982), Efraín Bartolomé (b. 1950) depicts the rain forest of Chiapas, in association with Mayan mythology, in a defense of nature. Although it may be difficult to point to a general characteristic of Alberto Blanco's (b. 1951) poetry, perhaps his tendency is to see the sacred in mundane situations. Myriam Moscona (b. 1955) is a Sephardic poet who employs Judeo-Sp. Her Negro marfil (Black Ivory, 2000) is a cubist poem of sorts, employing space, simultaneity, multiple readings, and images that resemble illegible graffiti or encoded messages (see CUBISM). María Baranda (b. 1962) combines epic dimensions with intimate feelings. Her dialogue with Dylan Thomas (Dylan y las ballenas [Dylan and the Whales], 2001) was enthusiastically received by the critics.

The number of contemp. poets in Mexico is very large (some would argue as many as 1,000); a diversity of themes, techniques, and poetics has been the norm since the 1970s. But despite the range, a few generalizations about its character are possible. Most Mexican poets inherited from Paz (and also from the Contemporáneos, López Velarde, Sor Juana, and others) the rigorous control of composition, sound, and words. There has tended to be a focus on craft and balance at the expense of spontaneity, even among poets who write in the idiom of the street. Ideology, politics, sentimentality, openly expressed passion, and confessionalism tend to be avoided. The idea of balance also impedes radical experimentation. Mexico lacks the unevenness—the deliberate aim of imperfection—of a poet such as the Peruvian César Vallejo or the frantic tone of the *Beat generation such as Allen Ginsberg's Howl. In the first decade of the 21st c., a new trend appeared: lit., incl. poetry, in indigenous langs. Mexico is returning to its roots, but with a contemp. edge. An example would be Natalia Toledo (b. 1968), a bilingual poet from Oaxaca, who writes in Zapotec and translates her work into Sp. Some of these poems reveal a world on the brink of obliteration.

See COLONIAL POETICS; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; NEOBAROQUE; SPAIN, POETRY OF; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: Antología de la poesía mexicana moderna, ed. J. Cuesta (1928); Poetas novohispanos, ed. A. Méndez Plancarte (1964); La poesía mexicana del siglo XIX, ed. J. E. Pacheco (1965); Poesía en movimiento, ed. O. Paz et al. (1966; also as New Poetry of Mexico, ed. and trans. M. Strand, 1970); Trece poetas del mundo azteca, ed. M. León Portilla (1967); Ómnibus de poesía mexicana, ed. G. Zaid (1971); Antología del Modernismo, 1884–1921, ed. J. E. Pacheco (1978); Poesía mexicana, 1915–1979, ed. C. Monsiváis (1979); Asamblea de poetas jóvenes de México, ed. G. Zaid (1980); Palabra nueva, ed. S. Cohen (1981); Mouth to Mouth: Poems by Twelve Contemporary Mexican Women, ed. F. Gander, trans. Z. Anglesey (1993); De la vigilia fértil: Antología de poetas mexicanas contemporáneas, ed. J. Palley (1996); El manantial latent, ed. E. Lumbreras and H. Bravo Varela (2002); Reversible Monuments: Contemporary Mexican Poetry, ed. M. de la Torre and M. Wiegers (2002); Sin Puertas Visibles: An Anthology of Contemporary Poetry by Mexican Women, ed. and trans. J. Hofer (2003); Words of the True Peoples: Anthology of Contemporary Mexican Indigenous-Language Writers, ed. and trans. C. Montemayor and D. Frischmann, v. 2 (2005); Connecting Lines: New Poetry from Mexico, ed. L. Cortés Bargalló, trans. and ed. F. Gander (2006).

■ Criticism and History: See prologues from anthols. above; A. M. Garibay, Historia de la literatura náhuatl (1953); R. Leiva, Imagen de la poesía mexicana contemporánea (1957); J. L. Martínez, Nezahualcóyotl (1972); J. J. Blanco, Crónica de poesía mexicana (1977); G. Sheridan, Los Contemporáneos ayer (1985); F. Dauster, The Double Strand: Five Contemporary Mexican Poets (1987); Lugar de encuentro: Ensayos críticos sobre poesía mexicana actual, ed. J. Fernández and N. Klahn (1987); O. Paz, Sor Juana, or the Traps of Faith, trans. M. Sayers Peden (1988); V. Quitarte, Peces del aire altísino: Poesía y poetas en México (1993); Los Contemporáneos en el laberinto de la crítica, ed. O. Paz, R. Olea Franco, A. Stanton (1994); O. Paz, Obras completas, v. 4 (1994); A. Stanton, Inventores de tradición: Ensayos sobre poesía mexicana moderna (1998); A. Paredes, Haz de palabras: Ocho poetas mexicanos recientes (1999); C. Monsiváis, Las tradiciones de la imagen: Notas sobre poesía mexicana (2001); E. Escalante, Elevación y caída del estridentismo (2002); E. Cross, Los dos jardines: Mística y erotismo en algunos poetas mexicanos (2003); Poesía mexicana reciente: Aproximaciones críticas, ed. S. Gordon (2005).

J. Sefamí

MICROPOETRIES. Micropoetry refers positively to the rawness of fragmentary, ephemeral, nonliterary, unintentional, or otherwise "unviable" poetry: *doggerel, occasional verse by amateurs, and other paraliterary detritus that achieves the poetic in its effect on the *reader, audience, or recipient. Because audiences and poetic discourses vary widely, micropoetries are intensely context-specific and often arise out of the cultural practices of subcultures or informal communities with little public acknowledgment or power. E.g., graffiti, prison poetry by nonliterary inmates (as distinct from figures such as Oscar Wilde, Osip Mandelstam, et al.), slogans, private (scrapbook or diaristic) or semiprivate (correspondence, blogs, or social network) writing, poetry written by children or their strange and charming utterances, écriture brute (outsider writing), thieves' cants and other argots or vernaculars, and so forth, may be considered micropoetries, as might newspaper poetry, greeting-card verse, prayers, and idiolects. Intended as a capacious rather than a narrowly specific term, the category of micropoetry widens the field of the poetic by valorizing artifacts that may be considered clumsy, awkward, and inadmissible within professional poetry circles.

Introduced in the late 1990s, the term reflects the democratization of poetry and poetry scholarship in the United States. The poetic nature of micropoetries inheres as much in the critical intervention as in the artifact itself. Micropoetry scholarship draws on the Rus. formalist principle of ostranenie or *defamiliarization, as an index of poetic lang. but, in accordance with insights from Rus. sociolinguists of the 1920s and Brit. cultural studies scholars of the 1970s and 1980s, aims to broaden the nature of this effect; it is also indebted to Walter Benjamin's method of combining phenomenological observation of ling. effects with social analysis and to the anthropologist Clifford Geertz's method of "thick description" as a way of making the micropoetic artifact meaningful. Micropoetry is genealogically related to ethnomusicologist Mark Slobin's term micromusics, musical subcultures that fall outside conventional (cl., popular, folk, and other commercial) networks of production and distribution but enjoy a relationship of productive adjacency to these mainstreams, challenging and combining with them to create new styles and otherwise to refresh popular musical culture. Micropoetry also derives from Emilie Conrad's working concept of "micro-movements," the smallest perceptible physical movements that the mover herself can detect; the practice of isolating these micromovements and inculcating awareness of them has been instrumental in working with brain- or physically injured patients. The influences of Slobin and Conrad indicate the micropoetic object's contingency and dependence on the contexts of its production and reception. In their ubiquity, micropoetries comprise a thicket of discourse and expression—quotidian, eccentric, ephemeral—that gives rise to more polished "high art" poetry and forms its background "noise," even while that elevated poetry defines itself by repudiating micropoetries in terms of complexity, craft, or taste.

See cultural studies and poetry, doggerel.

■ M. Damon, "Post-literary Poetry, Counterperformance, and Micropoetries," Class Issues: Pedagogy, Cultural Studies, and the Public Sphere, ed. A. Kumar (1997); "Poetries," spec. iss. Iowa Journal of Cultural Studies, 8-9, ed. M. Chasar and H. Bean (2006); D. Tiffany, Infidel Poetics (2009).

M. Damon

MIME (Gr., "imitation"). In the cl. sense of the term, a type of drama in which players rely mainly on gestures to tell a story. Found in ancient Greece and Rome, the mime probably arose, as its name implies, from the natural impulse to imitate persons or scenes from daily life. As a literary genre, however, it developed in Sicily and southern Italy, where Sophron of Syracuse (5th c. BCE) wrote, in colloquial prose, realistic scenes that border on the gross. Subsequently, Herodas (3d c. BCE) used metrics in his mimiambi, which, in turn, influenced the Alexandrian poetry of Theocritus; the Lat. poets Plautus, Terence, and Horace (Epodes, Satires); and the Roman mime writers Decimus Laberius and Publilius Syrus (1st c. BCE), of whose works only fragments survive. Lat. actors performed mime without masks and spoke in prose. Originally comic, the mime came to be closely associated with farce, which it supplanted at the ends of tragedies. Ribaldry and burlesque were its chief ingredients and its source of great popularity. The Church waged war on the mime and its actors, so that, finally in the 5th c. CE, all who took part in it fell under a ban of excommunication. As a genre, it again became popular in the commedia dell' arte of 16th-c. Italy, whence it spread to France and England. In 19th-c. France, L'Enfant Prodigue, a three-act mime play, culminates the hist. of the genre.

In the mod. sense of the term, which is distinct from the cl., mime or pantomime refers to a performance that relies exclusively on gesture instead of words, though it may be accompanied by music. This form was also known to the Romans, being introduced by Pylades of Cilicia in 22 BCE, but it became a sophisticated and refined form of performance with masks, in contrast to the increasingly vulgar mime described above. A famous late literary example is the dumb show in Hamlet; popular pantomime was revived in the 20th c.

See COMEDY.

■ H. Reich, Der Mimus (1903); O. Crusius, Die Mimiamben des Herondas (1926); A. Körte, Hellenistic Poetry (1929); A. Nicoll, Masks, Mimes and Miracles (1931); W. Beare, The Roman Stage, 2d ed. (1955); J.D.A. Oglivy, "Mimi, Scurrae, Histriones: Entertainers of the Early Middle Ages," Speculum 38 (1963); Trypanis, ch. 10; T. Leabhart, Modern and Post-Modern Mime (1989); D. Mann, "The Roman Mime and Medieval Theatre," Theatre Notebook 46 (1992); G. S. Sumi, "Impersonating the Dead: Mimes at Roman Funerals," AJP 123 (2002); C. Panayotakis, "Women in the Greco-Roman Mime of the Roman Republic and the Early Empire," Ordia prima 5 (2006); J. E. Merceron, "Pantomines dansées et jeux de rôles mimés dans les 'pastourelles assemblées,' les monologues de jongleur et les jeux carnavalesques," Chançon legiere a chanter, ed. K. Fresco and W. Pfeffer (2007).

R. A. HORNSBY; T.V.F. BROGAN

MIMESIS

I. Beginnings
II. Plato
III. Aristotle
IV. Later Greek Views
V. Legacy

I. Beginnings. Gr. mimesis is related to the noun mimos, which denotes both an actor of mime (in its ancient form, a subliterary dramatic genre with spoken text) and the genre itself. Performative vividness is accordingly one stratum of the semantics of mimesis. The cognate verb first occurs in connection with some kind of role playing by a chorus at Homeric Hymn to Apollo 162–64. Other early usage connects the mimesis word group with various kinds of depiction and expressive evocation in song, music, dance, and visual art.

In the 5th c. BCE, a trad. of poetics started to attach itself to this terminology. In Aristophanes' Thesmophoriazusae the tragedian Agathon, propounding a principle of creative identification between poets and their characters, says that "the qualities we do not possess ourselves must be found by mimesis" (155–56). The context here reduces to comic parody (Agathon is composing in female dress) a model of imaginative and dramatic simulation. By this date, as subsequent evidence confirms, mimesis was becoming embroiled in theoretical debates about the workings of poetic representation and expression. Although mimesis terms are also used of behavioral imitation and emulation, imitation is generally an inadequate trans. for the critical and aesthetic ideas associated with this vocabulary. From the cl. period onward, mimesis is a standard Gr. way of denoting the "second life" of poetry (and other artistic media). But the word itself does not automatically bring with it any specific suppositions about the sources or ontological status of the kinds of "life" to which poetry gives form.

II. Plato. The lang. of mimesis has a wide range of reference in the Platonic corpus; even the cosmos itself counts as the Creator's mimetic work of art (Timaeus, e.g., 39e). The most concentrated account of poetic mimesis, but with important shifts of perspective, occurs in books 2–3 and 10 of the Republic. At Republic 2.373b, Socrates treats mimesis as a broad cultural category embracing poetry, visual art, music, dance, and more besides: i.e., something like a general concept of artistic representation and *figuration. Later, however, at 3.392d, he limits the term (in a typology that has influenced mod. narratologists) to the dramatic, first-person mode of narrative discourse (diegesis), as opposed to the descriptive, third-person mode. Socrates maintains that the inward focus of poetic mimesis in this restricted sense engenders a corresponding intensity of experience for actors and readers (reading aloud is pertinent here), encouraging a kind of psychic multiplicity: an extension of the kind of theory parodied in Aristophanes' Thesmophoriazusae is visible here. This part of the Republic belongs within a larger framework that judges poetry principally in terms of ethical "truthfulness," while nonetheless allowing for elements of invention/fiction in narrative details (e.g., 2.382d). Neither here nor elsewhere does Plato treat poetic mimesis as standing in a simple relationship to the world.

In Republic book 10, Socrates returns to a broader concept of mimesis, notoriously using an analogy with mirrors to set up a provocative comparison of poetry with painting. But even the mirror *simile itself (10.596d–e) is far from straightforward. Socrates applies it to the representation of objects some of which ("everything in the sky and in Hades," 596c) are not accessible to actual mirrors. Elsewhere in the Republic (e.g., 5.472d), moreover, Socrates clearly acknowledges the existence of idealized, nonrealist painting. So the critique of poetic "appearances" and "simulacra" is principally directed at the phenomenology and ethical psychology of poetic experience, not at the literal truth or otherwise of poetry's materials. Mimesis functions here as a concept with which to analyze (and question) the ways in which poetry molds its own versions of the world. It does not in itself impose a uniform paradigm of poetic representation or expression, let alone any simple notion of imitation.

Crucial to book 10's critique is the affective process by which poetry seduces its audiences into internalizing its implicit values. At the climax of the critique, Socrates highlights the art form tragedy (incl. Homer, "teacher" of the tragedians), whose pessimistic force poses a peculiar challenge to a positive philosophical vision of reality. "Even the best of us," he says (605c–d), "surrender" to the intense emotions of such poetry: temporarily at least, tragedy makes the soul assimilate a worldview in its response to images of irremediable suffering and annihilation. The most significant aspect of mimesis, on this account, is not its use of naturalistic surfaces but its capacity to shape and imprint a whole sensibility.

Outside the Republic, there are many references to poetic/artistic mimesis that bear out the complexity of Plato's reflections on the subject. Cratylus 432a–d, e.g., advances a conception of (visual) mimesis as having a "qualitative" rather than replicatory relationship to what it represents. The Sophist distinguishes between two types of mimesis, "eicastic" (reliant on objective accuracy) and "phantastic" (involving a viewer-dependent perspectivism): the implications for poetry are not developed, though there are links with parts of Republic 10. Finally, the Laws contains many thoughts on mimesis, incl. an intricate analysis of the plural criteria (truth/fidelity, benefit, pleasure, beauty) by which the success of mimetic works might be judged (2.653–71). Contrary to many mod. summaries, there is no such thing as a fixed Platonic paradigm of mimesis, whether in poetry or elsewhere, only a series of attempts to define the triangular relationship between artistic expression, reality, and the minds of readers/viewers.

III. Aristotle. Aristotle's treatment of mimesis picks up from Plato's but gives the concept a role within a positive anthropology of human culture, whereas Plato had tended to freight it with philosophical doubts and problems. The first chapter of the Poetics adopts the premise, clearly assumed as familiar, that (most forms of) poetry, music, dance, and visual art are species of mimesis. Contrary to a common misunderstanding, Aristotle never says that those arts as such "imitate nature." That phrase (better translated as "follow the principles of nature") is found at, e.g., Physics 2.2, 194a21, referring not to artistic representations but to the teleology of human craftsmanship in imposing form on matter.

Aristotle nowhere defines mimesis. But in Poetics 3, he diverges from Republic book 3 by using mimesis rather than "narrative discourse" as the master category within which different modes of poetic representation can be distinguished. Since Aristotle distinguishes poetry, qua mimesis, sharply from factual discourse such as philosophy/science (Poetics 1) and hist. (Poetics 9), his notion of mimesis has affinities with later ideas of fiction. This certainly does not mean, however, that he disconnects poetic *imagination from reality. In Poetics 25, he states that poets, like other mimetic artists such as painters, can depict three kinds of world: actuality ("things as they are or were"), an amalgam of culturally accepted beliefs ("what people say and think"), or an ideal ("things as they ought to be"). This might seem to give poetry practically unlimited scope. Yet Aristotle's schema, while open to the operations of creative imagination (cf. Poetics 17), has no room for free fantasy. It presupposes that poets produce images of experience that can be grasped (both cognitively and emotionally) with implicit reference to consistent standards of human significance.

Throughout his discussion of tragedy and epic, Aristotle equates such standards with "probability and/or necessity." That formula, however, does not entail strict adherence to quotidian reality: how could it, where heroic characters and events are concerned? But it does require compelling dramatic coherence in the causality and psychology of the action portrayed. Mimesis, therefore, does not track particular features of the world. It is an exercise of emotionally engaged imagination in picturing things that "might happen" (Poetics 9). This produces a paradox in Aristotle's position: in Poetics 6, he calls tragedy "(a) mimesis of life," but in chs. 7–8, he stresses that the unity of a tragic/epic plot depends on narrative conditions far more rigorous than the diffuseness of life itself. Aristotelian mimesis is an artistic process that selectively reconfigures the "raw materials" of life. As such, it possesses a quasi-philosophical value: an ability to see beyond contingent particulars to a grasp of underlying structures of meaning. Poetics 4, which posits a human instinct for mimesis (as manifested in children's imaginative play), regards the desire to understand as a link between poetry and philosophy. Poetics 9 calls poetry "more philosophical" than hist., basing this judgment on poetry's capacity to convey an awareness of "universals." Unlike philosophy itself, mimesis makes this possible not through analysis and abstraction but through vivid concentration of narrative and expressive form.

IV. Later Greek Views. Mimesis remained a foundational concept of Gr. poetics (and philosophy of art more generally) throughout antiquity. While it always involves interpretation of the relationship between art and life/nature, its implications and nuances vary with the presuppositions of different critics and schools of thought. Broadly speaking, ideas of mimesis were divided between emphasis on fidelity (world-reflecting truthfulness) and the prioritizing of fiction (world-simulating inventiveness).

Of the two major Hellenistic schools of philosophy, the Stoics saw good poetry (like the life of Stoic virtue itself) as standing in mimetic conformity with the rational unity of the cosmos. This meant that they typically treated poetic mimesis as a medium in which philosophical ideas could be encapsulated in narrative and dramatic form: we find this, e.g., in Strabo's reading of Homer as a protophilosopher (Geography 1.1–2). On this account, mimesis entails true correspondence to the divine structure of reality, even if the correspondence is sometimes taken as allegorically encoded (see ALLEGORY). For Epicureanism, by contrast, mimesis is more like a superficial reflection of all the different views of life (incl. deluded beliefs) that poets and their audiences are capable of producing. This understanding of the concept makes it easy for Epicureans to see poetry as standing in no fixed relationship to truth and, accordingly, as containing space for fiction: Philodemus, in his (now fragmentary) treatise On Poems, appears to have occupied such a position.

Mimesis remained not only adaptable but problematic. Plutarch, in "How the Young Man Should Study Poetry," attempts to elaborate a moderate Platonism while also admitting some Aristotelian formulations. He blocks a more radical Platonic critique by equating mimesis with *invention and contrasting it sharply with (philosophical) truth. But by retaining a canon of "likeness to the truth," he struggles to reconcile the competing demands of fiction and ethical reliability in his model of poetry. A different kind of tension emerges at Philostratus's Life of Apollonius 6.19 (3d c. CE), where Apollonius, speaking of images of deities, contrasts mimesis as representation of "what has been seen" with phantasia as representation of what the artist has not seen but only creatively imagined. It is exaggerated, however, to claim evidence here for an entirely antimimetic aesthetic: sect. 2.22 shows that mimesis is still a basic tenet and can indeed be extended to the imaginative processes of the recipients of art.

Further ambiguities in the status of mimesis arise in Neoplatonism. Proclus's commentary on Plato's Republic fluctuates in its understanding of the concept. But it finally equates the mimetic with all poetry that works through an anthropocentric imagination and its emotions. Higher intellectual truths, according to Proclus, require poetic symbolism and allegory—or a hermeneutic that can discover these properties beneath the mimetic surface of a text. By philosophizing Homer, but also reading Plato himself as a partly mimetic writer, Proclus shows how ancient arguments over mimesis lead to deep perplexities about the resources and uses of poetry.

V. Legacy. Because of the variations and debates outlined above, mimesis should count not as a unitary concept but a "family" of ideas in poetic (and aesthetic) theory. Its legacy is far more complex than often suggested. Rendered by Lat. imitatio and vernacular equivalents, mimetic assumptions were a source of poetic theory from Ren. humanism to 19th-c. naturalism. But behind such slogans as the "imitation of nature" lurked plural conceptions of literary representation and expression. When *romanticism reacted against neoclassical canons, it did not abandon all mimetic premises, esp. since the latter could encompass (as we have seen) forms of idealism. Even in the 20th c., modified versions of mimesis remained detectable, partly in popular expectations of "truth to life" and the like, partly in more abstract theorizing. The results can be paradoxical: Bertolt Brecht, e.g., spurns the mimesis of bourgeois "illusionism" yet develops techniques for a new type of truthful realism; Roland Barthes discards belief in veridical representation but retains a "reality effect" whose credentials seem remarkably close to mimetic image-making. Despite a waning use of the older vocabulary of mimesis, many concerns associated with it have survived tenaciously in mod. poetics.

See COMEDY, EPIC, IMITATION, TRAGEDY.

■ G. Sörbom, Mimesis and Art (1966); P. Ricoeur, "Mimesis and Representation," Annals of Scholarship 2 (1981); R. Lamberton, Homer the Theologian (1986); C. Prendergast, The Order of Mimesis (1986); G. Gebauer and C. Wulf, Mimesis: Culture, Art, Society, trans. D. Reneau (1995); F. Burwick, Mimesis and Its Romantic Reflections (2001); S. Halliwell, The Aesthetics of Mimesis (2002), and "The Theory and Practice of Narrative in Plato," Narratology and Interpretation, ed. J. Grethlein and A. Rengakos (2009).

S. HALLIWELL

MINIMALISM. The principle of intentional reduction, whether formal or semantic, with respect to the size, scale, or range of a given poetic composition. The term may refer to poems that are very short and condensed, to poems that use short lines or abbreviated stanzas, or to poems that use a severely restricted vocabulary. But minimalism is not a term used to refer to just any short poem: it is not, for instance, applied to the *haiku (see HAIKAI) or *epigram. Rather, minimalism is a late 20th-c. designation for a poetics that holds that spareness, tautness, understatement, and reduction constitute poetic authenticity. As such, minimalism is an offshoot of phenomenology (see GENEVA SCHOOL), with its trust in the principle that W. C. Williams called "no ideas but in things."

The use of the term minimalism to designate poetic features is quite recent, having been coined originally to define specific movements in the visual arts and in music, respectively. Wollheim's 1965 essay "Minimal Art" was probably the first to define "a class of objects" that "have a minimal art-content, in that either they are to an extreme degree undifferentiated in themselves and therefore possess very low content of any kind, or else the differentiation that they do exhibit . . . comes not from the artist but from a nonartistic source, like nature or the factory." Wollheim cites the black canvases of Ad Reinhardt and the Readymades of Marcel Duchamp, but the more common reference of the term is to the primal geometric sculptures of Donald Judd, Sol LeWitt, and Robert Morris, as well as to the abstract color-field paintings of such artists as Frank Stella, Kenneth Noland, and Ellsworth Kelly.

In music, the term minimalism was first used to refer to compositions that use a minimum of material, such as John Cage's 4'33" or La Monte Young's Composition 1960 #7, which contains only the notes B and F# with the instructions "to be held for a long time." But since the early 1970s, minimalism specifically refers to the work of Philip Glass and related composers whose tonal works restrict progression (movement from one chord to the next) so as to explore the static devel. of sonorities.

When minimalism is transferred to poetry, it thus refers to such abbreviated lyrics as Robert Creeley's "The Box" (1967):

Three sides, four windows. Four doors, three hands.

Other poets whose minimalism is often discussed are Francis Ponge (France); Ernst Jandl (Austria); Tom Raworth, Bob Cobbing, and Ian Hamilton Finlay (Britain); and, in the U.S., Williams, the early H.D., the objectivists Louis Zukofsky and George Oppen (whom Kenner calls "the geometers of minima"), David Ignatow, Gary Snyder, James Laughlin, Clark Coolidge, Aram Saroyan, and Robert Lax. Contemp. Fr. poets like Emmanuel Hocquard, Claude Royet-Journoud, and Anne-Marie Albiach have sometimes been called "minimalists," in that their tiny, fragmentary poems are surrounded by white space on an all but bare page. But the greatest practitioner of minimalism, Samuel Beckett, was primarily a writer of prose: such "residua" as Imagination Dead Imagine, Ping, and Fizzles permutate a rigidly circumscribed set of words and phrases in minimal units of great tension and complexity.

See CONCISION, CONSTRAINT.

■ J. Cage, Silence (1962); R. Wollheim, "Minimal Art," Arts Magazine 39 (1965); Minimal Art, ed. G. Battcock (1968); H. Kenner, A Homemade World (1975); C. Gottlieb, Beyond Modern Art (1976); R. Kostelanetz, "An ABC of Contemporary Reading," Esthetics Contemporary (1978); D. H. Cope, New Directions in Music (1981); M. Perloff, "Preface," Contemporary Poets, 3d ed. (1985); E. Brater, Beyond Minimalism (1987); R. Creeley, Collected Essays of Robert Creeley (1989); B. Grumman, "Mnmlst Poetry: Unacclaimed but Flourishing," (1997); K. Alexander, "The Abstract Minimalist Poetry of Robert Lax," Interval(l)es 1.1 (2004); A. Saroyan, Complete Minimal Poems (2007).

M. PERLOFF

MINNESANG

I. The Later 12th Century
II. The 13th Century

The collective designation for lyrics on themes of love (minne), produced in Ger.-speaking areas from the 12th through the early 14th cs., the Minnesang is considerably influenced by the poetry of the troubadours and trouvères and forms part of a Eur. trad. that spread also to Sicily, north Italy, and Spain. In the 12th c., the poets were of knightly origin, but in the 13th c., there were also professional poets of lower social status. The songs (Minnelied, pl. Minnelieder) were intended for vocal performance with instrumental accompaniment before a courtly audience, but very little music survives. There is some evidence for indigenous lyric trads. in a few anonymous poems and in some poems by named Austro-Bavarian poets probably active from ca. 1150, indicating that the woman's stanza (Frauenstrophe), the woman's complaint of absence, desertion, or rivals (Frauenklage), and the indirect exchange between lovers (Wechsel) are native types, depicting the woman as subordinate to or equal with the man. The poems have simple structures and are predominantly monostrophic, though occasionally two, or more rarely three, stanzas may be loosely linked. (For details of the metrical structure of these and other forms described below, see GERMANIC PROSODY.) All the poets in this group whose names are known to us, and esp. Meinloh von Sevelingen, fuse native trads. with thematic features derived from knowledge of the *Romance lyric—e.g. the lover's submission to his lady, the complaint of ill-wishers—but remain uninfluenced by Romance forms.

I. The Later 12th Century. From ca. 1170, the thematic and formal influence of the Romance lyric, transmitted originally through a group of Rhineland and Western poets, becomes pervasive. The dominant type of poem, the equivalent of the Romance canso, is the first-person reflection on love, which may be combined with *apostrophe of love or the lady. Love service is presented in feudal terms as an arduous but ennobling aspiration, addressed to a lady who is a paragon of beauty and virtue but at the same time unwilling to react graciously to the man's courtship. He is, however, staying by her side with loyalty. The lady's missing approval is compensated by the devel. of courtly virtues such as loyalty (triuwe), consistency (stæte), a modest life (mâze), and high spirits (hôher muot). Often addressed is also an only vaguely defined group representing the values of society, God, or the personification of love or courtly values. A minor variant expresses the conflict between love and crusading duty (Kreuzlied); usually the crusader chooses his religious duty over the lady, but there are also songs that—as love is chosen—criticize the Crusades. On the pattern of the Romance lyric, polystrophic poems and tripartite stanza forms made up of short lines (see CANSO) become the norm; new types of rhyme are introduced, pure rhyme replaces *assonance, and dactylic rhythms occur for the first time. The connection between stanzas is often loose, reflecting the original predominance of the monostrophic poem.

In the period up to 1200, precise textual and formal borrowings from Occitan and OF poets may be traced in Friedrich von Hausen, Rudolf von Fenis, Bernger von Horheim, and Ulrich von Gutenburg (Frank); thereafter, direct imitation is rendered superfluous by widespread knowledge of Romance conventions and forms. However, poets such as Albrecht von Johansdorf and Reinmar, writing in areas more remote from Romance influence, those in which the lyric is first attested, also retain certain archaic features: women's stanzas and examples of the Wechsel and of long and unrhymed lines.

II. The 13th Century. Ger. Minnesang is written down mainly in three collective mss., known as A, B and C. A, the so-called small Heidelberg ms. (about 1265, Alsace) contains 719 stanzas, B, the Weingarten ms. (first half of 14th c., Constance), 602 stanzas. C, the so-called large Heidelberg ms. (about 1300, Zürich), also known as the Manesse ms. because of its connection to the Manesse family in Zürich, contains 5,240 stanzas. Authorship determines the order of the mss.; for each writer, a new sequence starts. The mentioning of titles in the mss. allows the quite precise allocation of different statuses to the authors such as monarchs, members of the aristocracy, or professional poets. Because the mss. were compiled at the end of the 13th or beginning of the 14th c. in southern Germany and Switzerland, the bulk of the material preserved belongs to the 13th c. and to areas close to the places of compilation. Thus, whereas there are only some 16 to 20 poets who can be assigned to the 12th c., about 130 belong to the 13th c., mostly the latter half and, on occasion, beyond. The transmission undoubtedly gives a distorted picture of the frequency and geographical distribution of poetic production at each stage but nonetheless bears witness to the immense popularity of the Minnesang over a long period.

The most original poets belong to the turn of the 12th c., when established trads. allowed scope for innovation. Walther von der Vogelweide is unique in his thematic and formal range and in his synthesis of native, Romance, and med. Lat. trads. Wolfram von Eschenbach is the first major exponent of the "dawn song" (see TAGELIED). Neidhart creates two new and formally distinct types of poem depicting summer and winter festivities and dancing, in which the poet vies with peasant rivals for his lady's favor. Both realistic details of setting, clothing, and proper names and elements of *parody and satire are juxtaposed with Minnesang conventions. Like Walther, Neidhart is familiar with med. Lat. and probably also with the OF pastourelle. There are other major 13th-c. poets with a substantial oeuvre, some like Walther with a wide repertoire, incl. the leich* and the didactic lyric, but also a host of minor poets.

Particularly in the first half of the 13th c., earlier features survive—single and women's stanzas, examples of the Wechsel and of crusading themes, and simple isometric forms—but in the main, the 13th c. is characterized by new devels., largely in a second wave of Romance influence. The genres of dawn song, leich, and dialogues in the manner of the Occitan tenso* are introduced; and there is a marked increase in the use of refrains, a phenomenon very rare in the 12th c. but paralleled in the 13th-c. OF lyric. The nature introduction (see NATUREINGANG), also rare in the 12th c. except in Heinrich von Veldeke, becomes common, on the pattern both of OF and Neidhart, who uses it in virtually every poem. The schematic description of beauty, often reduced to the single symbolic feature of the red mouth, is widespread and is particularly characteristic of Gottfried von Neifen. There is a strong tendency, already present in Walther, to treat love themes didactically, which results in generalized praise of women. From Neidhart on, realism, parody, and satire form one strand in the Minnesang. Because the traditional themes had become so worn, there is increasing emphasis, particularly in the later 13th c., on formal virtuosity, manifested in complex structures, displays of rhyming skill, and combinations of alternating and dactylic rhythm, a feature first found in Heinrich von Morungen and Walther. In the middle of the 14th c., the trad. of Minnesang and Spruchdichtung, as it is written down in the main collective mss., comes to an end. The mss. of the late 14th, 15th, and 16th cs. show a new approach to love lyrics, even if they—on different levels—still refer to the trad. of Minnesang.

See GERMAN POETRY.

■ Criticism and History: H. Kolb, Der Begriff der Minne und das Entstehen der höfischen Lyrik (1958); Der deutsche Minnesang, ed. H. Fromm, 2 v. (1963, 1985); H. Kuhn, Minnesangs Wende, 2d ed. (1967); Walther von der Vogelweide, ed. S. Beyschlag (1971); Die deutsche Lit. des Mittelalters, Verfasserlexikon, ed. K. Ruh et al., 2d ed. (1978–2008); P. Wapnewski, Hartmann von Aue, 7th ed. (1979); P. Hölzle, Die Kreuzzüge in der okzitanischen und deutschen Lyrik des 12. Jahrhunderts (1980); O. Sayce, The Medieval German Lyric (1982); Lyrik des Mittelalters, ed. H. Bergner et al. (1983); U. Müller, Die mittelhochdeutsche Lyrik (1983); Neidhart, ed. H. Brunner (1986); J. F. McMahon, The Music of Early Minnesang (1989); H. de Boor, Die höfische Literatur, ed. U. Hennig, 11th ed. (1991); G. Schweikle, Minnesang, 2d ed. (1995); E. Lienert, "Hœrâ Walther, wie ez mir stât. Autorschaft und Sängerrolle im Minnesang bis Neidhart," Autor und Autorschaft im Mittelalter, ed. E. Andersen (1998); J. Bumke, Geschichte der deutschen Literatur im hohen Mittelalter, 4th ed. (2000); H. Haferland, Hohe Minne (2000); J. Bumke, Wolfram von Eschenbach, 8th ed. (2004); M. G. Scholz, Walther von der Vogelweide, 2d ed. (2005); N. Zotz, Intégration courtoise (2005); A. Classen, "Love of Discourse and Discourse of Love in Middle High German Minnesang," Words of Love and Love of Words in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, ed. A. Classen (2008); G. Hübner, Minnesang im 13. Jahrhundert (2008); J. Janota, Ich und sie, du und ich. Vom Minnelied zum Liebeslied (2009); Marburger Repertorium Deutschsprachige Handschriften des 13. und 14. Jahrhunderts, http://www.mr1314.de; Paderborner Repertorium der deutschsprachigen Textüberlieferung des 8. bis 12. Jahrhunderts, http://www.paderborner-repertorium.de.

■ Music: Kritische Ausgabe der Weisen, ed. W. Müller-Blattau, v. 2 (1956); B. Kippenberg, Der Rhythmus im Minnesang (1962); Ausgewählte Melodien des Minnesangs, ed. E. Jammers (1963); R. J. Taylor, Die Melodien der weltlichen Lieder des Mittelalters (1964); U. Aarburg, "Melodien zum frühen deutschen Minnesang," Der deutsche Minnesang, ed. H. Fromm, 3d ed. (1966); Deutsche Lieder des Mittelalters, ed. H. Moser and J. Müller-Blattau (1968); R. J. Taylor, The Art of the Minnesinger (1968); Litterae, Göppinger Beiträge zur Textgeschichte, ed. U. Müller et al. (1971–)—facsimiles of mss. with music and transcriptions; Frauenlob, ed. K. Stackmann and K. Bertau (1981); Die Berliner Neidhart-Handschrift c (mgf 779), ed. I. Bennewitz-Behr and U. Müller (1981).

■ Primary Texts: Trouvères et Minnesänger, ed. I. Frank, v. 1 (1952); Liederdichter des 13. Jahrhunderts, ed. C. von Kraus, 2d ed. (1978); Des Minnesangs Frühling, ed. H. Moser and H. Tervooren, 38th ed. (1988); Die Schweizer Minnesänger, ed. M. Schiendorfer, rev. ed. (1990–); Romanisch beeinflusste Lieder des Minnesangs, ed. O. Sayce (1999); Deutsche Lyrik des frühen und hohen Mittelalters, ed. I. Kasten (2005).

O. L. Sayce; A. Bostelmann

MINSTREL. The general term for a professional performer of med. lyric or narrative poetry, incl. the med. Lat. histrio (actor) and joculator (jester), the OE scop* and the ME minstral, the Fr. jongleur* and the Occitan joglar, the Ger. Spielmann, and the Rus. skomorokh. As popular entertainers, minstrels moved in a world of traveling musicians, actors, mimes, acrobats, clowns, beggars, and others of more dubious character. Christian moralists expressed disapproval of their wicked ways from Tertullian through Thomas Aquinas, who was the first to deny that their profession was intrinsically sinful. Many minstrels traveled great distances, either as messengers or as wanderers, but others were sedentary, either because they were domestic servants or because their service had been rewarded with a gift of property.

Scholars differ over the degree of literacy that may be ascribed to the minstrels; partisans of the *oral-formulaic theory of epic composition argue that they composed by a technique similar to that of the 20th-c. unlettered Yugoslavian guslar (Lord, Duggan). The troubadour Guiraut Riquier distinguished four classes of Occitan joglars: the lowly buffoon; the court musician and singer or joglar in a strict sense; the composer of melody and words or *troubadour; and the teacher or doctor of composition—a title Guiraut claimed for himself. Med. Lat. ministerialis applied to any servant active in a noble, royal, or episcopal household, or to a messenger, whether or not he performed music or poetry.

See goliardic verse, occitan poetry.

■ E. Faral, Les Jongleurs en France au moyen âge (1910); E. K. Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages (1945), ch. 3; R. Menéndez Pidal, Poesía juglaresca y orígenes de las literaturas románicas (1957)—esp. on Spain; J. Ogilvy, "Mimi, sucrrae, histriones," Speculum 38 (1963); J. Duggan, The "Song of Roland": Formulaic Style and Poetic Craft (1973); C. Bullock-Davies, Menestrellorum Multitudo (1978)—on England; R. Zguta, Russian Minstrels (1978); W. Hartung, Die Spielleute (1982)—historical sociology; W. A. Quinn and A. S. Hall, Jongleur (1982); K. Sutherland, "The Native Poet: The Influence of Percy's Minstrel from Beattie to Wordsworth," RES 33 (1982); W. Salmen, Der Spielmann im Mittelalter (1983)—musicians; C. Page, The Owl and the Nightingale: Musical Life and Ideas in France, 1100–1300 (1989); J. Southworth, The English Medieval Minstrel (1989); P. Dronke, The Medieval Lyric, 3d ed. (1996); E. B. Vitz, Orality and Performance in Early French Romance (1999); Lord; M. Dobozy, Re-Membering the Present: The Medieval German Poet-Minstrel in Cultural Context (2005); M. Lawrence, "The Protean Performer: Defining Minstrel Identity in Tristan Narratives," Cultural Performances in Medieval France (2007); R. Schuchard, Last Minstrels: Yeats and the Revival of the Bardic Arts (2008).

W. D. Paden

MOCK EPIC, MOCK HEROIC. The mock heroic is a literary mode, primarily satiric, in which present realities are juxtaposed to a noble and heroic past, only to be found wanting. Authors sometimes evoke the heroic past by mentioning figures or events (as in Jonathan Swift's "Battle of the Books"), but more often they do so allusively, by imitating heroic style, characterizations, actions, and so forth. Mock epic draws its heroic precedents specifically from the standard repertoire of the epic: invocations, dedications, celestial interventions, epic similes, canto divisions, and battles.

Although the mock heroic has ancient roots in the Homeric Batrachomyomachia (Battle of the Frogs and Mice) and instances can be found up to the present, the heyday of the form was the neoclassical movement of the 17th and 18th cs. Nicolas Boileau's 1674 Le Lutrin (The Lectern) is commonly cited as the first neoclassical mock epic. The mock heroic was common in prose (as in Henry Fielding's Joseph Andrews and Tom Jones). This period also saw other mock forms (mock odes, elegies, pastorals, romances, and others), but the mock heroic/epic most fully exemplified the tenor of the time.

In tone, neoclassical mock-heroic/epic satire is sometimes light, as in the amiable raillery of Alexander Pope's Rape of the Lock; in such cases, the present reality is seen as trivial, so that the contrast with the heroic point of reference is more amusing than dangerous. But more often, the satire ranges toward ridicule and humiliation of its victims (as in John Dryden's "MacFlecknoe" and Pope's Dunciad). In these cases, the present reality is a matter not of amusement but of cultural, social, and moral threat. Typically, the derision is grounded in class prejudice, juxtaposing high literary form (and its noble values) and low persons pretending or, worse, acting above their station to demean the commonweal. High-born miscreants are not exempt, however, esp. when they act below their station. Less commonly, gender roles also provide a basis for mock-heroic satire.

■ R. P. Bond, English Burlesque Poetry, 1700–1750 (1932); G. deF. Lord, Heroic Mockery (1977); U. Broich, The 18th-Century Mock-Heroic Poem (1990); G. G. Colomb, Designs on Truth: The Poetics of Augustan Mock Heroic (1992); R. G. Terry, Mock-Heroic from Butler to Cowper (2005).

G. G. Colomb

MODERNISM. For many of its protagonists, the opening phase of literary modernism signaled a decisive shift from music to painting as the privileged model for a new poetry. As the linguist Roman Jakobson observes in Language in Literature, "The Romantic slogan of art gravitating toward music was adopted to a significant degree by Symbolism. The foundations of Symbolism first begin to be undermined in painting, and in the early days of futurist art it is painting that holds the dominant position." This quotation is from an essay on Boris Pasternak, and Jakobson is thinking primarily of devels. in Rus. art; but the proposition is familiar as one definitive way of thinking about the evolution of modernism, as it navigates its way out of the self-reflecting, interiorized world of fin de siècle *decadence and into the light of an external world whose vivid energies provoke lit.'s long-deferred encounter with the definitively "modern." The It. futurist *manifesto of 1909 (see FUTURISM) launched this modernism with its vociferous condemnation of the symbolist association of music with forms of ideality and its related poetics of memory, loss, and desire (see SYMBOLISM). The new painting and sculpture offered the basis for a radically different aesthetic, one for which spatiality coincided with the avant-garde preoccupation with modernity—with dynamism, simultaneity, and multiple points of view. This emphasis provides one consistent strand linking the various modernist tendencies. Even *surrealism, famous for its fascination with the movements of the unconscious, saw the historical transition in much the same way, with the eds. of the jour. Surréalisme observing in 1924 that "[u]ntil the beginning of the twentieth century, the ear had decided the quality of poetry: rhythm, sonority, cadence, alliteration, rhyme; everything for the ear. For the last twenty years, the eye has been taking its revenge. It is the century of the film" (quoted in Jay).

Talk of such momentous transitions has to be handled with care, however, and, while, in one of his first draft cantos, Ezra Pound would muse on the rewards to be had "[i]f for a year man write to paint, and not to music" ("Three Cantos. I"), his own early practice was deeply indebted to models of verbal musicality, from the chansons of the Occitan *troubadours to the first volumes of W. B. Yeats, "the greatest living poet" for Pound when he arrived in London in 1908 (Pound 1971). In many ways, of course, the idea of substituting one model for another risks blurring the dialectical relation of residual and emergent forms on which this sort of redistribution of emphasis depends. There had indeed been much fin de siècle speculation about, as Arthur Symons put it in his hugely influential The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899), "shutting the eyes of the mind, and deadening its sense of hearing," but the now conventional association of poems with a dimly resonating inner world of dream was to be one of the first casualties of modernism's emergence. Even so, the shift was again hardly as programmatic as we might like to assume. In Pound's case, e.g., Yeats's early conception of rhythm as a hypnotic condition in which "we are both asleep and awake" (Yeats 1961) soon began to reveal its limitations, but to Pound's already educated ear, much could still be learned from the older poet's practice about how a fluid rhythm might work in counterpoint to the punctual repetitions of rhyme.

Such insights would not be wholly effaced by the discovery of vers libre*. Indeed, as the new formal "freedoms" became popular, Pound in Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (1920) and T. S. Eliot in the quatrain poems of Ara Vos Prec (1920) staged ostentatious returns to traditional metrics (Beasley, Theorists of Modernist Poetry). In the aggressive campaigning for modernism, however, the auditory imagination did begin to assume a decidedly second place to what Pound's friend Wyndham Lewis termed "the philosophy of the EYE," in his book Men without Art (1934). The futurist manifesto had excoriated "the sickly, nostalgic poetry of distance and memory," and while the painters and writers loosely organized around Pound and Lewis as the vorticists (see VORTICISM) pilloried F. T. Marinetti when he lectured in London, the Italians had set the bar high, giving substance to Arthur Rimbaud's ringing phrase from the 1870s, "one must be absolutely modern," a prescription in light of which poetry might well now have seemed the most resistant of the arts to modernization. Rimbaud had memorably criticized even his radical precursor Charles Baudelaire on the grounds that "the form which is so much praised in him is trivial. Inventions from the unknown demand new forms." The absoluteness of that demand for formal innovation would be echoed many times in the early years of the next century—in, e.g., Lewis's disappointed reaction to the poems by Pound published in Blast: "they 'let down,' I felt, the radical purism of the visual contents, or the propaganda of same."

For many poets, of course, the necessity of "new forms" was clear enough, though inevitably some, like W. H. Auden, would continue to express a fondness for traditional meters. Rimbaud's talk of "inventions from the unknown" was, after all, both thrilling and disconcerting, gesturing toward a vertiginous future in which complex cultural hists. might be canceled at a stroke. "Why should we look back?" Marinetti had asked, why engage in "this eternal and futile worship of the past?" On this issue, however, mod. poetry was to be deeply divided, falling into often quite distinct national groupings, themselves divisible between two broad tendencies that some recent critics—e.g., Bürger—have distinguished as avant-garde and modernist. For those aligned with the former, it was indeed as if the aube-de-siècle arts had suddenly opened a window on the future, with poets such as W. C. Williams, Blaise Cendrars, and Guillaume Apollinaire variously celebrating the dynamism of modernity as a correlative to the energies of the *imagination. Radically new forms were needed, as Rimbaud had foreseen: the avant-gardist poets associated with *Dada, It. and Rus. futurism, and with Ger. *expressionism experimented with simultaneity, *sound poetry, and graphic effects, inventing a dazzling array of new artistic devices, most of which originated from experimentation in the visual arts: *collage, Marinetti's parole in libertà (words in freedom), Apollinaire's calligrammes, August Stramm's "telegram style," zaum' or the "transrational" lang. of Velimir Khlebnikov and Aleksei Kruchenykh, Hugo Ball's Verse ohne Worte (Poems without Words), and the surrealists' automatic writing, to name only a few. Marinetti's call for the "destruction of syntax" was being widely heeded.

*Avant-garde poetics constantly pushed at the boundaries of art as traditionally conceived, dismantling its auratic structures in the name of modernity itself. Technology and consumerism were radically reconfiguring conventional notions of time and space, and painters and sculptors were quick to grasp the new contours of their world as liberation from the constraints of a tired, academic culture. When, e.g., Williams first saw Marcel Duchamp's Nude Descending a Staircase in the New York Armory Show of 1913, his immediate reaction was to "burst out laughing from the relief it brought me!" (1970). Rather as in Umberto Boccioni's 1911 painting The Street Enters the House, the everyday world was suddenly invading the poem: Apollinaire incorporated fragments of overheard dialogue in his *conversation poems; Cendrars and Valéry Larbaud hymned the pleasures of international travel and consumerism, while even the mordant balladry of Bertolt Brecht acknowledged that "In the asphalt cities I'm at home" ("Of Poor B.B.").

Yet there were also those—Eliot, Pound, R. M. Rilke, Eugenio Montale, and Umberto Saba, e.g.—who sought in the arts of modernism a kind of defense against what were felt to be the degenerative forces of modernity, the "sculpture of rhyme" still standing firm against the new mass-produced "mould in plaster" that the age apparently demanded (Pound, Hugh Selwyn Mauberley). For those representing this second, modernist tendency, the authentically new work was one rooted in a developed "historical sense . . . not only of the pastness of the past, but of its presence," as Eliot put it in "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919). Rimbaud's demand for the "absolutely modern" was thus qualified by a dialectical understanding of the relation of new to old according to which "[t]he poem which is absolutely original is absolutely bad; it is, in the bad sense, 'subjective' with no relation to the world to which it appeals" (Eliot, "Introduction: 1928," in Pound 1928). The "good" poem intimated here reins in the recklessly expansive gestures of avant-gardism: the tone is ironic and impersonal, the mode allusive, deliberately "difficult," and clearly controlled. Riding and Graves remarked on "the divorce of advanced contemporary poetry from the common-sense standards of ordinary intelligence," an effect produced, in part, by the allusiveness that Eliot saw as poetry's necessary response to the "great variety and complexity" of the mod. world ("The Metaphysical Poets," 1921). In a similar vein, Pound, in "Noh" or Accomplishment (1916), explained his and Yeats's enthusiasm for Japanese *Nō plays in terms of "this love of allusion in art."

The poetry of high modernism could in this respect seem somewhat lofty, aloof from the reader in its ironic projection of fictive identities and hermetically playful in its witty handling of partly hidden echoes and *allusions. The poetic "I" when it appeared at all became mercurial and deceptive, concealing itself within a shifting play of *personae or masks. In part, this was occasioned by a dissatisfaction with the transparency of the traditional *lyric, but it also reflected a self-consciously "modern" sense of poetic expression as a kind of deliberate posturing. As was clear from the earlier poetry of Jules Laforgue and Tristan Corbière—both influential precursors of modernism—the poet's awareness of his pose produced a complex mix of humor and anxiety (Eliot's "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" is the canonical example). Readers of poets as various as Yeats, Stefan George, Pound, Eliot, and Paul Valéry soon learned to be wary of poets speaking apparently in propria persona and began to listen attentively for ironic refractions and modulations of voice. "I banish myself," begins a poem by Salvatore Quasimodo that bears the knowingly paradoxical title "One Buried in Me Declares." Poets such as Fernando Pessoa and Antonio Machado would go further, developing various fictitious characters through whom to speak (see HETERONYM). Modernist poetry had moved far beyond John Stuart Mill's romantic opposition of "poetry" to "eloquence"—"eloquence is heard, poetry is over-heard," Mill had declared in "What Is Poetry?" (1833)—approaching more closely to Yeats's idea that "[w]e make out of the quarrel with others, rhetoric, but of the quarrel with ourselves, poetry" (Mythologies, 1959). Both definitions of poetry removed it from the orbit of rhet.—this would be a central tenet of modernist poetics—but Yeats's Nietzschean formulation significantly redefined subjectivity as essentially divided and potentially fictive.

The assumption that poetic "voice" was hybrid, unstable, and perhaps ultimately indeterminate had implications for modernist poetry that were at once psychological and formal. In the case of the first, this might register the poet's experienced uneasiness as expatriate or as creature of the literary salon (as in Eliot's "Portrait of a Lady" and in Pound's Hugh Selwyn Mauberley), or it might provide an opportunity to interrogate reflexively the nature of the aesthetic (as in Wallace Stevens's "The Comedian as the Letter C" and Marianne Moore's "Poetry"). At the formal level, the "disappearance of the poet as speaker" that Stéphane Mallarmé had predicted several decades before ("Crise de vers," 1886, 1896) governed both the stripped-down intensities of the early phase of imagist writing and the elliptical structures of the newly conceived long poem that would dominate the later phase of modernist poetry. The visual charge of the *image was intended to situate emotion in relation to clearly perceived objects, as in Pound's prototypical "one-image poem" "In a Station of the Metro," and thereby to replace literary "psychology" with a kind of painterly abstraction. Pound spoke of the image as expressing a "freedom from time limits and space limits" (1954), but perhaps the most significant freedom announced by these scrupulously poised and reduced works was a freedom from metaphorical elaboration. Imagism made much of seeing things clearly and directly—an emphasis also prominent in Rilke's Dinggedichte (thing-poems) and in the productions of the acmeist poets in Russia, Osip Mandelstam, Anna Akhmatova, and Nikolai Gumilev, who were aware of the London imagists, as Painter has shown. In France, poets close to *cubism stressed in more technical fashion how the poem "situated" or "transplanted" objects from the real world to the aesthetic one; as Max Jacob put it in Le Cornet á dès (The Dice-Cup, 1917), "[O]ne recognizes that it's situated by the little shock that one gets from it or again from the margin which surrounds it, the special atmosphere where it moves."

The new "language of form and color" for which Pound called (1916) was a means by which to substitute that "shock" of encounter for the kind of periphrastic indirection he associated with the term rhetoric. That term haunted modernist poetics as an encoded crit. of several interconnected tendencies: thus, rhet. could allude specifically to aspects of symbolist writing (as, e.g., in Mallarmé's deliberate use of *periphrasis "to unravel the word into qualities belonging to inner realms" (Friedrich), and it could also gesture toward more general habits of literary inflation, as in Laforgue's "I find it stupid to mouth big words and play at eloquence" (quoted in Hamburger). Beyond this, rhet. as a negative counter in the discourse of modernism targeted the perceived slipperiness of lang. and its tendency to cohabit with the ideologies of power—for Yeats, "The rhetorician would deceive his neighbours, / The sentimentalist himself" ("Ego Dominus Tuus"), while for Pound, rhet. often equated directly to "any glorification of war" ("A Flock from Oxford"), similarly denoting the knowing use of abstraction to manipulate an audience. At the same time, though, commonplace denunciations of rhet. did not necessarily mean that those who criticized it foreswore it in practice: Altieri notes of Yeats and Stevens, e.g., that "despite their abiding hatred of 'rhetoric' their poetry frequently turns to the figure of the orator as a figure for the powers of idealization they project for their imaginative labors" (2004).

Indeed, certain forms of "mock-rhetoric" would play an important part in the writings of, e.g., Valéry, Saint-John Perse, Stevens, W. H. Auden, Mina Loy, and, later, John Ashbery, though this tendency was countered in part by an opposite turn to the abbreviated and the fragmentary by poets as different as Pound, H.D (Hilda Doolittle), Giuseppe Ungaretti, George Oppen, Lorine Niedecker, and Mandelstam. This strand of literary *minimalism testified to a countervailing conviction that sincerity derived from acts of local verbal precision, from the craftsman's concern with the Flaubertian mot juste rather than from the artfully inflated figures of the rhetorician. Technique should become "the test of a man's sincerity," a phrase of Pound's (1954) that, for a younger generation of modernist poets, would come to encapsulate the need "to objectify the poem, to make the poem an object" (Oppen)—an object in itself, i.e., rather than a vehicle for something else (a preconceived thought or moral doctrine, e.g.). The incorporation of *jazz and *blues rhythms in the work of the *Harlem Renaissance poet Langston Hughes, e.g., coupled vernacular expression with a finely tuned sense of contingent urban rhythms. Just as *free verse promised a highly mobile and evolving form for the *long poem, so the work's meaning would be indissolubly bound up with its emergent shape (Wallace Stevens's "Of Modern Poetry" thus conjures with "The poem of the mind in the act of finding / What will suffice" [emphasis added]). As Riding and Graves noted in their Survey, the modernist long poem no longer depended on Victorian uniformities of voice and meter as guarantors of formal order; Eliot's The Waste Land proceeded, they observed, not primarily by logic of narrative design but by "delicate transitions from one atmosphere to another." Such "atmospheres" were the productions of a startling array of different voices and poetic measures, "The Fire Sermon" section of the poem, e.g., modulating among formal rhymed stanza, *blank verse, and a designedly "more ragged," syncopated lyricism.

Some modernist long poems would, like The Waste Land, look also to the deep-lying structures of ancient mythologies and prehists. for paradigms of formal and conceptual order (Pound's The Cantos [1925–72], Hart Crane's The Bridge [1930], H.D.'s Trilogy [1944–46], and David Jones's In Parenthesis [1937] are obvious examples). Others—Valéry's La jeune Parque (The Young Fate, 1917), Rilke's Duino Elegies (1922), Eliot's Four Quartets (1936–42), Yves Bonnefoy's later Du mouvement et de l'immobilité de Douve (On the Motion and Immobility of Douve, 1953)—reinflected symbolist modes, sustaining extended meditative sequences by a subtle and insistent musicality of thought. And with a more pragmatic twist, perhaps, the poem as *"epic" could also be thought of as providing the mod. world with what Pound in an early draft of the opening of his Cantos called "a rag-bag to stuff all its thought in" ("Three Cantos. I"). Here was yet another version of the modernist long poem, one taking its cue in part from the capacious rhythms of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass, a model for poems with an encyclopedic scope that could weave together the life experience of the poet's self with the larger movements of hist. ("An epic is a poem including history," Pound pithily declared [1954]). The evolution of The Cantos was typically modernist in its rejection of a first tentative use of Browningesque dramatic *monologue in favor of a juxtapositional presentation of highly diverse materials. Pound did not now write about hist. but instead drew directly on its texts, incorporating them elliptically into the poem (chunks of Ren. prose here consorted with passages more patently cast in a lyric register). This paratactic method would be immensely influential, in part because of its capacity to do justice to the heterogeneity of experience, past and present, but also because it proposed a process-oriented model of writing that could be sustained over a long period of time, in Pound's case over more than 50 years.

Pound's legacy has been a powerful one, securing for poetry both public and private voices, voices expressing myriad concerns and speaking in diverse langs. This was, to borrow Scots poet Hugh MacDiarmid's words, a poetry that represented "a stand made against intellectual apathy, / Its material founded, like Gray's, on difficult knowledge" ("The Kind of Poetry I Want," 1961). In many of the long poems spawned at least in part by Pound's example—Williams's Paterson (1946–58), Basil Bunting's Briggflatts (1966), Louis Zukofsky's "A" (1959–75), Pablo Neruda's Canto general (1950), Charles Olson's The Maximus Poems (1960–75)—the modernist commitment to the demands of "difficult knowledge" remained firm. But that difficulty was one of both content and form: even the clearly marked structural motifs of Four Quartets were constantly impugned and undermined by Eliot himself as he weighed and questioned the claims of poetry to truth. In the case of The Cantos and its legatees, the risks in pursuit of formal "openness" were even greater. Pound acknowledged as much when he asked his readers in "Dr. Williams' Position" to "consider the number of very important chunks of world-literature in which form, major form is remarkable mainly for its absence" (1937). Perhaps, then, it is the case, as Milne states, that "[r]ather than heroically achieved structures, the poetics [of these modernist long poems] are those of baroque folly and neoclassical ruins." Yet, as Milne also notes, ruins may be hospitable where monuments are not. Like the new painting from which it so often derived its inspiration, modernist poetry situated itself quite deliberately amid the ruins of the old, its own fragmentary and unfinished shapes signaling not the absence of some idealized "major form" but rather its pursuit of a knowledge whose difficulty would continue to engage, perplex, and fascinate its readers.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS, PAINTING AND POETRY, RHETORIC AND POETRY.

■ Criticism and History: L. Riding and R. Graves, A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1927); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939); E. Heller, The Hazard of Modern Poetry (1953); F. Kermode, The Romantic Image (1957); J. H. Miller, Poets of Reality (1965); Modern Poets on Modern Poetry, ed. J. Scully (1966); M. Hamburger, The Truth of Poetry: Tensions in Modern Poetry from Baudelaire to the 1960s (1969); H. Kenner, The Pound Era (1971); H. Friedrich, The Structure of Modern Poetry, trans. J. Neugroschel (1974); D. Tashjian, Skyscraper Primitives, Dada and the American Avant-Garde 1910–1925 (1975); G. Bornstein, Transformations of Romanticism in Yeats, Eliot, and Stevens (1976); Modernism, ed. M. Bradbury and J. McFarlane (1976); D. Perkins, A History of Modern Poetry, 2 v. (1976, 1987); H. Kenner, A Homemade World (1977); J. P. Hurston, French Symbolism and the Modernist Movement (1980); J. T. Gage, In the Arresting Eye: The Rhetoric of Imagism (1981); T. Hermans, The Structure of Modernist Poetry (1982); T. Diggory, Yeats and American Poetry (1983); S. Kern, The Culture of Time and Space, 1880–1918 (1983); C. Christ, Victorian and Modernist Poetics (1984); A. M. Clearfield, These Fragments I Have Shored: Collage and Montage in Early Modernist Poetry (1984); M. H. Levenson, A Genealogy of Modernism: A Study of English Literary Doctrine 1880–1922 (1984); A. Robinson, Symbol to Vortex: Poetry, Painting, Ideas, 1885–1914 (1985); S. Schwartz, The Matrix of Modernism: Pound, Eliot, and Early Twentieth-Century Thought (1985); P. Bürger, Theory of the Avant-Garde, trans. M. Shaw (1986); M. Dickie, On the Modernist Long Poem (1986); M. Perloff, The Futurist Moment (1986); A. Ross, The Failure of Modernism: Symptoms of American Poetry (1986); C. K. Stead, Pound, Yeats, Eliot and the Modernist Movement (1986); M. Calinescu, Five Faces of Modernity: Modernism, Avant-Garde, Decadence, Kitsch, Postmodernism (1987); M. Ellmann, The Poetics of Impersonality: T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound (1987); J. Longenbach, Modernist Poetics of History: Pound, Eliot, and the Sense of the Past (1987); C. Altieri, Painterly Abstraction in Modernist American Poetry (1989); A. Eysteinsson, The Concept of Modernism (1992); R. Jakobson, Language in Literature, ed. K. Pomorska and S. Rudy (1993); M. Jay, Downcast Eyes: The Denigration of Vision in Twentieth-Century French Thought (1993); J. J. McGann, Black Riders: The Visible Language of Modernism (1993); V. Sherry, Ezra Pound, Wyndham Lewis, and Radical Modernism (1993); R. Emig, Modernism in Poetry (1995); E. Gregory, Quotation in Modern American Poetry (1996); C. Laity, H.D. and the Victorian Fin de Siècle: Gender, Modernism, Decadence (1996); J. N. Riddel, The Turning Word: American Literary Modernism and Continental Theory (1996); M. Bell, Literature, Modernism and Myth (1997); K. Tuma, Fishing by Obstinate Isles: Modern and Postmodern British Poetry and American Readers (1998); A. Davis and L. M. Jenkins, Locations of Literary Modernism: Region and Nation in British and American Modernist Poetry (2000); The Idea of the Thing in Modernist American Poetry, ed. C. Giorcelli (2001); M. Perloff, Twenty-First Century Modernism: The "New" Poetics (2002); C. Altieri, "Rhetoric and Poetics: How to Use the Inevitable Return of the Repressed," A Companion to Rhetoric and Rhetorical Criticism, ed. W. Jost and W. Olmstead (2004); J. Goldman, Modernism 1910–1945 (2004); M. K. Blasing, Lyric Poetry (2006); S. Churchill, The Little Magazine "Others" and the Renovation of Modern American Poetry (2006); K. B. Painter, Flint on a Bright Stone: A Revolution of Precision and Restraint in American, Russian, and German Modernism (2006); D. Young, Six Modernist Moments in Poetry (2006); R. Beasley, Theorists of Modern Poetry: T. S. Eliot, T. E. Hulme, Ezra Pound; and Ezra Pound and the Visual Culture of Modernism (both 2007); The Cambridge Companion to Modernist Poetry, ed. A. Davis and L. M. Jenkins (2007); Modernism, ed. A. Eysteinsson and V. Liska (2007); P. Nicholls, George Oppen and the Fate of Modernism (2007); M. Golston, Rhythm and Race in Modernist Poetry and Science (2008); C. Altieri, The Art of Twentieth-Century American Poetry (2009); P. Howarth, British Poetry in the Age of Modernism (2009); P. Nicholls, Modernisms: A Literary Guide, 2d ed. (2009); D. Milne, "Politics and Modernist Poetics," Teaching Modernist Poetry, ed. P. Middleton and N. Marsh (2010); M. Whitworth, Reading Modernist Poetry (2010); The Oxford Handbook of Modern and Contemporary Poetry, ed. C. Nelson (2011).

■ Primary Texts: E. Pound, Gaudier-Brzeska: A Memoir (1916); "Three Cantos. I" and "A Flock from Oxford," Poetry 10 (1917); Personae (1926); Selected Poems (1928); and Polite Essays (1937); Eliot, Essays; E. Pound, Literary Essays of Ezra Pound (1954); W. B. Yeats, Essays and Introductions (1961); Letters of Wyndham Lewis, ed. W. K. Rose (1963); W. C. Williams, Imaginations, ed. W. Schott (1970); E. Pound, Selected Letters, ed. D. D. Paige (1971); F. T. Marinetti, Futurist Manifestos, ed. U. Apollonio (1973);

A. Rimbaud, Complete Works, trans. P. Schmidt (1976); M. Jacob, The Dice-Cup, trans. M. Brownstein (1979); G. Oppen, The Selected Letters of George Oppen, ed. R. B. DuPlessis (1990); Modernism: An Anthology of Sources and Documents, ed. V. Kolocotroni et al. (1994).

P. Nicholls

MODERNISMO. A literary movement that took shape in the 1880s in Sp. America and that has traditionally been identified with efforts to reinvigorate Sp. letters through the pursuit of formal perfection and innovation. It was, however, more than an aesthetic undertaking. Modernismo offered a complex response to the profound social and cultural shifts that accompanied the arrival of modernity in Sp. America. Its influence extended to both sides of the Atlantic, largely because of the artistic genius of the peripatetic Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darío (1867–1916), who selected its name and, by example and decree, came to define the movement. He established connections with the most celebrated Eur. and Am. writers of the day and, by 1896, as the sole survivor of the movement's founding members, became its creative center of gravity. While the influence of modernismo lasted well into the 20th c., its closing date is generally held to coincide with Darío's death in 1916.

Because of its pursuit of artistic freedom and its openness to different styles, the movement was viewed at first as limited in depth. Early critics, many of whom were Sp., failed to understand the sociopolitical and philosophic underpinnings of these endeavors and viewed modernismo as primarily concerned with imitation and invention at the expense of ideas. They attacked what they deemed to be an attitude of art for art's sake as well as its cosmopolitan and openly francophile perspective as escapist, often comparing it negatively with the contemporaneous and more authentic Sp. Generation of 1898, even though both groups shared certain philosophic and artistic premises. The first studies focused on tracing these diverse influences and exploring the many ways in which the modernistas departed from the strict rules of Sp. poetics. The modernistas made meter more flexible with the use of *enjambment, movable *caesuras, and rhythmic dislocations. They enriched their poetic arsenal with the creative use of the tetrasyllable, octosyllable, eneasyllable, hendecasyllable, hexameter (modeled on the cl. Gr. line), *alexandrine, and lines of combined verse length. They experimented with inventive rhyme schemes, *synaesthesia, *onomatopoeia, and imitation of the pictorial and musical arts.

As significant as these innovations were, they are now understood to be the outward signs of the ongoing engagement of modernismo with the multiplicity of issues related to modernization, a relationship common to Western lit. When seen from this broader perspective, characteristics of the movement that were first examined in isolation take on new meaning and reveal the basis for the impact of modernismo on later writers. As Sp. America's first literary response to the social, political, and cultural alterations brought about by modernity, modernismo is a sophisticated encounter with concerns that continue to have an impact on intellectual life.

Throughout Sp. America, the penetration of mod. life was and, to a certain extent, continues to be uneven. Nevertheless, by the 1870s, the political independence and relative stability in the region had begun to enable increased international trade, which resulted in the importation of luxury items, books, and jours., as well as the introduction of socially progressive ideas and an increasing reliance on science and technology. The turn toward industrial capitalism, most notably in major urban centers like Santiago de Chile and Buenos Aires, where Darío lived during the 1880s and 1890s, was accompanied by an erosion of entrenched colonial arrangements. While these changes contributed to a sense of heightened well-being, prosperity, and affluence for some, for others they led to socioeconomic displacement and hardship. There developed among the writers of the period a troubled ambivalence toward what had been defined as progress.

As the poets became better acquainted with the world beyond their national borders through reading or travel or both, they recognized that many of their own anxieties had been explored in the works of others. Like the romantics, *Parnassians, and Fr. symbolists before them (and the Anglo-Am., Eur., and Brazilian modernists after them), Sp. Am. modernistas questioned the dominance of the market economy, as well as the hegemony of empiricism, technology, and pragmatism in mod. life. They offered an alternative vision that aspired to create a space for individuality, creativity, spirituality, and aesthetic values in an increasingly materialistic world. Their defense of poetry, despite its lack of a practical application, tied them to the pursuit of formal purity of the Parnassians, while their search for transcendence through musicality and evocation linked them to the symbolists (see SYMBOLISM).

At the same time, the modernistas were acutely aware of their unique place in the hist. of Sp. America, esp. their complex relationship with the national identities that were emerging from the political consolidation following the wars of independence. The resurgence of philological studies in the 19th c. provided additional support for imagining lang. as a way to understand hidden meaning and historical depth. As a result of all these factors, there developed within modernismo a belief, rooted in the legacy of *romanticism, that held to the superior epistemological power of art. Lit. was conceived as an instrument of vision and knowing that is capable of uncovering profound realities concealed by the inflexibility of empirical methods and the stultification of bourgeois concerns and values. It was also seen as a medium for addressing politics and power, one that plays an essential role in the formation of national cultures. This aspect appears most directly in the many prose pieces that make up a large part of modernista texts, but it also operates in the poetry, becoming increasingly more pronounced as the movement matures. It is no coincidence that these nationalistic concerns also play a role in Catalan modernisme and Anglo-Am. devels. In all its endeavors, modernismo reveals its fundamental faith in the transformative capacity of art, a characteristic that remains a strong feature of international *modernism well into the 20th c.

As the modernistas faced the complexities of mod. life free from the political and cultural domination of Spain, they formulated responses that would reverberate throughout the 20th c. They defined the poet as both visionary and outcast, at odds with the dominant social values, while striving to reveal those aspects of reality hidden by habit and convention. No longer protected by a privileged and patronized position in society, the modernistas struggled with newly commercialized social arrangements. In response, some invented refuges in premod. visions similar to those that appear in the Pre-Raphaelite paintings with which their work has been compared (see PRE-RAPHAELITISM). They sought through their poetry to fill the void left as critical reason increasingly undermined the fundamentals of religious beliefs. Their experimentation with genre, meter, and poetic structures reflected their insistence on the artistic freedom needed to capture the perceptions of the enlightened seer, the high priest of art. They pursued a lang. that was flexible enough to reflect the rhythms and harmonies they found in the natural world around them (a harmonious order linked to the Pythagorean music of the spheres), and—in a break with the conservatism of the past—in the fusion of male and female through unencumbered sexuality, a feature that lent decadent overtones to some of the poetry. In the occult sciences that were in vogue in the 19th c., they found legitimacy for their search for transcendence in the syncretic blending of diverse and, at times, highly unorthodox religious beliefs and symbols. They pursued the eternal through myth (cl., Eur., Asian, and indigenous) and addressed the present through references to fashion, to the headlines of the day, and to technological advances (such as the steamship, the railroad, the trolley, the dirigible, immunology, analytic chemistry, the telephone, the telegraph, and the phonograph). Modernity was seen in the departure from anachronistic, local reality and in the embrace of all times and all styles, a blending that made room for the autochthonous and the foreign as well as for the past, present, and future. In this way, the modernistas, like other modernists, also confronted their sense of the changing nature of time. No longer pure abstraction, time became tied to the human experience, expandable in its duration, containing traces of the past. The mod. emphasis on progress and perfectibility likewise seemed to move the utopian goals of these writers into a constantly receding future.

The most influential and famous modernista was Darío, whose skills and creativity have been compared to the greatest poets of the Sp. Golden Age and whose influence can be found in virtually all poets (and many prose writers) who followed in his wake. His work encompassed the full breadth of the movement, ranging from the sexually playful, highly decorative, dramatically iconoclastic, and politically engaged to the deeply philosophic and reflective. Believing that each poet must be free to read and decipher the universe, Darío prescribed the pursuit of individual visions and styles and rejected poetic rules. As a result, as the movement took shape and matured, the diversity of its manifestations defied easy categorization, yet inspired by the initiatives of this writer from a small town in Nicaragua, modernistas from all corners of the Sp.-speaking world envisioned themselves as sharing the same goals. The first poets to join ranks with Darío were Manuel González Prada (Peru), José Martí (Cuba), Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (Mexico), Julián del Casal (Cuba), and José Asunción Silva (Colombia). Those who later identified themselves as modernistas included Amado Nervo (Mexico), José Juan Tablada (Mexico), Enrique González Martínez (Mexico), Ricardo Jaimes Freyre (Bolivia), Guillermo Valencia (Colombia), José María Eguren (Peru), José Santos Chocano (Peru), Leopoldo Lugones (Argentina), Julio Herrera y Reissig (Uruguay), and Delmira Agustini (Uruguay). The Sp. poets most directly associated with modernismo were Antonio Machado, Manuel Machado, Juan Ramón Jiménez, and Ramón del Valle-Inclán. The end of the movement is marked by an ever-greater loss of faith in the decipherability of the universe, a more emphatically ironic stance, and heightened rebellion against conventional poetic lang. and social structures, features that came to define the vanguardia, i.e., the Hispanic avant-garde.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; CATALONIA, POETRY OF; FRANCE, POETRY OF; SPAIN, POETRY OF; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: Poesía modernista 1884–1921, ed. J. E. Pacheco (1978); Antología crítica de la poesía modernista hispanoamericana, J. O. Jiménez (1985); Poesía modernista hispanoamericana y española (Antología), ed. I. A. Schulman and E. P. Garfield (1986); A. Acereda, El Modernismo poético (2001); An Anthology of Spanish American Modernismo, ed. K. Washbourne, trans. S. Waisman and K. Washbourne (2007).

■ Criticism and History: M. Henríquez Ureña, Breve historia del modernismo (1962); N. J. Davison, The Concept of Modernism in Hispanic Criticism (1966); I. A. Schulman, Génesis del modernismo (1968); O. Paz, Children of the Mire, trans. R. Phillips (1974); F. Perus, Literatura y sociedad en América Latina (1976); S. Yurkiévich, Celebración del modernismo (1976); R. Gullón, El modernismo por los modernistas (1980); J.-C. Mainer, Modernismo y 98 (1980); R. Gutiérrez Giradot, Modernismo (1983); A. Rama, Las máscaras democráticas del modernismo (1985); G. Kirkpatrick, The Dissonant Legacy of Modernismo (1989); J. Ramos, Desencuentros de la modernidad en América Latina (1989); ¿Qué es el modernismo?, ed. R. A. Cardwell and B. McGuirk (1993); C. L. Jrade, Modernismo, Modernity, and the Development of Spanish American Literature (1998);

A. González, A Companion to Spanish American Modernismo (2007).

C. L. Jrade

MOLOSSUS. In cl. prosody, a metrical foot consisting of three long syllables: – – –. It is found very rarely as an independent foot and never in a connected series. Sometimes it replaces an *ionic a minore by the contraction of the first two short syllables, and less often an ionic a maiore or a *choriamb. West suggests that, like the *spondee, it derived from slow, solemn chants where every syllable is fully intoned.

■ D. Korzeniewski, Griechische Metrik (1968); West, 55–56.

P. S. Costas; T.V.F. Brogan

MONGOLIA, POETRY OF

I. History
II. Form

I. History. The origins of Mongolian poetic expression lie in shamanic *incantation and in epic. The oral culture, which prevailed up until the 1921 revolution and which still exerts a profound influence on the literary arts, was one in which the landscape, the gods, and ancestors were celebrated, propitiated, and invoked. Our principal example of early Mongolian poetry is the 13th-c. Mongol Nuuts Tuuh, an uneven collection of passages with lines of varying lengths and meters, presumably fashioned from different sources. Over the following centuries, poets came to write in a more sophisticated style, such as in the chronicle Erdeniyin Tobchi, in which regular verse forms were employed and more sophisticated devices developed. Mongolia's epic (üliger) trad. contains texts of up to 20,000 verses, centered around heroes such as Chinggis Haan, Erintsen Mergen, and Gesar. These are transmitted orally and are an excellent example of the standard structural form, tolgoi süül (see below). Despite the influence of Tibetan Buddhism, and thereby Tibetan culture, from the mid-19th c., poets such as the controversial monk Danzanravjaa (1803–56) began to fashion a specifically Mongolian style of poetry, addressing themes common to nomadic and steppe-dwelling people—livestock (esp. horses), seasonal movement, traditional culture, and ancestral lineage. Danzanravjaa's verses range from love lyrics to lengthy, although witty and entertaining, Buddhist religious instruction. The poetry scene of the 19th c. is also characterized by the preeminence of the family of the poet Vanchingbal, whose four sons (Gularansa, Sunveidanzan, Günchig, and Injinashi) each made his own significant contributions to the devel. of poetic form.

Following the revolution of 1921, Mongolian lit. was severely censored, and Mongolian writers repressed, by the government of Marshal H. Choibalsan. D. Natsagdorj (1906–37), who is generally credited with opening up Mongolian lit. (esp. the short-story form) to the West, was educated during the 1920s in Leipzig, and, following his return, became one of the most influential poets and cultural figures in Mongolia. His death, from a stress-induced heart attack, together with that of another poet, S. Buyannemeh (1902–36), in the same year, came at the height of Choibalsan's cultural and political purges. Despite being regarded as a catalyst for postrevolutionary poetry in Mongolia, Natsagdorj's style and imagery are not esp. different from those of his contemporaries. Indeed, the Group of Revolutionary Writers (Huvsgalin Uran Zohiolchnarin Bülgem, founded in 1929) consisted of many of Natsagdorj's contemporaries, whose aim was to propagandize and develop revolutionary theory as it applied to lit. and its relationship to the people. Among these, poets such as B. Rinchen (1905–77), D. Chimed (1904–32), Buyannemeh, and Ts. Damdinsüren (1908–86) also made considerable contributions to the poetry from both the literary and the political point of view.

From the 1930s until Nikita Krushchev's denunciation of Josef Stalin in 1956, Mongolian poetry was very much in a state of ideological repression, with poets writing revolutionary verse to order, while prevented to some degree by their level of personal safety from writing their own poetry. In the late 1950s, B. Yavuuhulan (1929–82) started to revive the traditional poetry, that of Danzanravjaa, Vanchingbal, and his sons, and the earlier writers of epic poetry, under the general title of the New Tendency (Shine Handlaga). Yavuuhulan was committed to teaching and developing a poetry that brought the best of foreign lit. (he is famous for his trans. of Sergei Esenin and of Japanese *haiku) together with the Mongolian trads. His students included possibly the three most important poets of the late 20th c., D. Nyamsüren (1949–2002), O. Dashbalbar (1957–99), and G. Mend-Ooyo (b. 1952). These three can be credited for the vibrant state of Mongolian poetry at the present time, and Mend-Ooyo's Academy of Culture and Poetry (Soyol, Yaruu Nairgin Akademi) publishes Eng. trans. of Mongolian poetry, as well as original texts by contemp. writers. Of the younger generation, the majority is following Yavuuhulan's trad. T. Bavuudorj (b. 1969) and T- Ö. Erdenetsogt (b. 1974) use Buddhist imagery alongside the ideas of landscape and hist. to develop new ways of working with ancient ideas and forms. Although there are very few writers actively involved with formal experimentation, there is some interest in postmodernism and the Rus. OBERIU movement among poets such as B. Odgerel (b. 1967), G-A. Ayurzana (b. 1970) and B. Galsansuh (b. 1972).

II. Form. There is one standard form of Mongolian poetry, which goes back to the epic and which was clearly a mnemonic device for recitation. This is the head/tail (tolgoi/süül) form, where the first letter (occasionally syllable) of every line (whether of a poem, a couplet, or a verse) is the same and where (now less frequently) the last word of every line is the same.

■ W. Heissig, Geschichte der Mongolische Literatur (1972); Danzanravjaa, Perfect Qualities, trans. S. Wickham-Smith (2006); O. Dashbalbar, The River Flows Gently, trans. S. Wickham-Smith (2008); Anthology of Mongolian Literature, ed. S. Wickham-Smith and Sh Tsog (2008); B. Yavuuhulan, Mongolian Verse, trans. S. Wickham-Smith (2009).

S. Wickham-Smith

MONK'S TALE STANZA. An eight-line stanza derived by Chaucer from the Fr. ballade* octave, a stanza first used in OF for narrative verse by Oto de Graunson. The monk's rhyme scheme, ababbcbc, is found as well in Chaucer's "ABC," and several of his ballads: "To Rosamounde," "The Former Age," "Fortune," and "Lenvoy de Chaucer a Bukton." His "Complaint of Venus" follows a slightly different pattern: ababbccb. The line itself, called iambic pentameter by some, contains five metrical stresses; most lines are decasyllabic.

■ H. Braddy, Chaucer and the French Poet Graunson (1947); J. Scattergood, "Chaucer's Complaint of Venus and the 'Curiosite' of Graunson," in Essays in Criticism 44, no. 3 (1994); Helen Phillips, "The Complaint of Venus: Chaucer and de Graunson," The Medieval Translator 4 (1994).

L. L. Howes

MONODY. Early Gr. *melic poetry is divided into two general classes: the choral *ode, sung to flute accompaniment with a dancing chorus—e.g. *threnodies, *paeans, maiden songs, wedding songs, expressive dances (hyporchemata), processional songs (prosodia), *dithyrambs, praises of great men (enkomia), and victory songs (epinikia)—and the solo song or monody—originally an ode sung by a single voice, e.g., by one of the characters in a tragedy, or to a more private audience, as at a symposium. The *sapphic and *alcaic are the principal subgenres. Its themes were wider in scope than those associated with mod. lyric—they include politics and satire—but it came to be associated with the lamentation of a single mourner and, hence, came to refer to a *dirge or funeral song. In metrical form, the *strophes are *isometric, i.e., repeated without variation. In Eng. poetry, John Milton's "Lycidas" is referred to (in the epigraph) as a monody, though it is written in irregular Eng. *canzoni rather than in regular strophes. Matthew Arnold titled his *elegy on A. H. Clough "Thyrsis, A Monody"; likewise, S. T. Coleridge elegizes Thomas Chatterton in "Monody on the Death of Chatterton"; Herman Melville's "Monody" is either for his own son Malcolm or for Nathaniel Hawthorne.

See GREEK POETRY, LAMENT.

■ J. H. Baron, "Monody," Musical Quarterly 54 (Oct. 1968); G. M. Kirkwood, Early Greek Monody (1974); Trypanis; CHCL, v. 1; M. Davies, "Monody, Choral Lyric, and the Tyranny of the Hand-Book," CQ 82 (1988).

T.V.F. Brogan; R. A. Hornsby

MONOLOGUE. In the widest sense, a sustained first-person utterance for which, whether or not an audience is expressly evoked, rhetorical motives outweigh meditative or deliberative ones. Orations, petitionary prayers, and *laments are often monologues; so are many *lyric poems. Thus, monologue is less a genre than a device many genres employ. Arising from the implied circumstances that shape it, monologue has a clearly dramatic element: it characteristically defines elements of subjectivity and personality against pressures—destiny, hist., other people—whose resistance gives those elements shape. The term may refer to sections within a longer work that privilege a single voice and unitary standpoint. The technical, literary sense of monologue is not inconsistent with more ordinary usage: speech that monopolizes conversation, or the patter of a stand-up comic.

In poetry, monologue has clear connections to drama. Soliloquy refers to a form of monologue in which an actor speaks alone on stage, whether overheard in the act of formulating private thoughts and feelings (Hamlet) or addressing the audience directly (Iago). Sometimes a work opens like Christopher Marlowe's Doctor Faustus or Lord Byron's Manfred with a soliloquy by the main character. Heard or overheard, monologue invites complex interplay between character and audience. Some of the most powerful passages in dramatic poetry are written as monologue.

The technique is ancient and so entwined with the ritual roots of drama that no distinct origin may be specified. Significant biblical examples occur in the Psalms and the prophets, where utterances cast in monologic form riveted the connection between vatic inspiration and impassioned verse. Lengthy speeches couched in refined rhet. and articulating an individual position appear in cl. epics and odes as well as dramas. Some miming included single-voiced speech, although dialogue was preferred there.

The cultivation of first-person speakers in Theocritus's idylls produced admirable examples of monologue, as did elegiac poems by Propertius. Elegies, diatribes, and comic harangues often display strong monologic elements; philosophical poems seldom do; verse epistles, while meant to be read rather than declaimed, still are monologic in their emphasis on the written performance of character. *Prosopopoeia, a cl. rhetorical form feigning speech by a personage of note (Athena, Hector), held an important place within pedagogy. It also influenced the female impersonations comprised by Ovid's Heroides, a work strikingly analogous to the independent Chinese trad. wherein courtiers sought preferment by addressing to the emperor poems in the guise of an abandoned woman.

Monologue like other devices stemming from drama remains open to ironies of context, although in some historical phases these may lie dormant. Germanic lit., incl. OE derivatives like "The Wanderer" and "The Wife's Lament," employs the monologue to valorize subjectivity. Devotional poetry tends to canonize monologue: in the later Middle Ages, e.g., speeches addressed by the Virgin to the Cross became a fixed subgenre. The dramatic element incubated within med. religious verse emerged in early mod. variations on the cl. epistle and *complaint. Poets from William Dunbar to Thomas Wyatt bred out of Chaucer's stock, with grafts from Ovid and Horace, a precedent emulated throughout the later 16th c. by George Gascoigne, Walter Ralegh, and others. These Elizabethans, like their dramatist counterparts, exploited monologic effects ranging from uncompromising rhetorical directness to the self-anatomy of a divided mind. Satan's monologue at the start of John Milton's Paradise Lost, book 4, culminates this development; Milton's complementary "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" point up the tendency for monologue to solicit, or preempt, response.

Retreating in the face of socially preoccupied Restoration and Augustan verse, monologue remained essential to Alexander Pope's self-fashioning, most subtly in "Eloisa to Abelard," a poem that inspired many successors during the *sensibility era. In the romantic period, the normative identity of poet with speaker elevated monologue to stardom as a vehicle for heroic recuperations of creative selfhood as performed in elegy and ode. Yet, at the same time, the ironic potential suppressed under high romanticism flourished in the comedy routine that was Byron's Don Juan. Even in more sober productions like William Wordsworth's "Tintern Abbey," monologue so winnowed consciousness as to render the confessing mind an object of curiosity to itself. S. T. Coleridge's term for the lyric genre thus produced, conversation poem*, expresses a paradox that resided within monologue all along.

Lineally descended from this romantic genre, the Victorian dramatic monologue represents the most significant generic flowering of the device in postromantic poetry. Robert Browning called "My Last Duchess" and its congeners "dramatic lyrics," a name that emphasizes the genre's hybridity. Browning preeminently, but in tandem with Alfred, Lord Tennyson and Elizabeth Barrett, drove to new intensity monologue's constitutive tension between speakers' psychological complexity and the web of ambient circumstance in which they are enmeshed. Formally, the Victorian dramatic monologue embraced both the legacy of stage monologue in blank verse and also the trad. of the *ballad, with adapted stanzaic forms whose artifice figures the genre's oblique but persistent link to narrative. In Maud: A Monodrama, Tennyson took monologue where a prosopopoeia like his "Ulysses" had pointed, toward a serial tableau portraying mercurial moods of a single mind rather than a dramatic situation powerfully conceived. Later Victorian and Edwardian poets developed these overtures, most notably William Morris, D. G. Rossetti, Christina Rossetti, A. C. Swinburne, and Augusta Webster.

Affinities between these 19th-c. devels. and *closet drama show the dramatic monologue anticipating modernist playwriting by August Strindberg, Luigi Pirandello, and Samuel Beckett. Browning's conception flows through modernist poetry via Ezra Pound, Tennyson's via T. S. Eliot, whose doctrine of impersonality adjoined W. B. Yeats's doctrine of the mask or *persona to provide the mod. poetic monologue with theoretical support. Among Am. poets E. A. Robinson, Edgar Lee Masters, Robert Frost, and Langston Hughes worked regional or ethnic variations on monologue's capacity to project a representative identity, while in later generations Robert Lowell, Sylvia Plath, Elizabeth Bishop, and John Ashbery renewed the discrepancy between poet and speaker by spinning the psychological thread of monologue to a virtually clinical fineness. To rehistoricize this trad. and highlight its political subtexts has been the achievement of such contemp. poets as Richard Howard, Frank Bidart, Ai, and Carol Ann Duffy.

See DIALOGUE, DRAMATIC POETRY.

■ F. Leo, Der Monolog im Drama (1908); E. W. Roessler, The Soliloquy in German Drama (1915); I. B. Sessions, "The Dramatic Monologue," PMLA 62 (1947); H. Schauer and F. W. Wodtke, "Monolog," Reallexikon II, v. 2; R. Langbaum, The Poetry of Experience (1957); A. D. Culler, "Monodrama and the Dramatic Monologue," PMLA 90 (1975); R. W. Rader, "The Dramatic Monologue and Related Lyric Forms," CritI 3 (1976); A. Sinfield, Dramatic Monologue (1977); J. Blundell, Menander and the Monologue (1980); K. Frieden, Genius and Monologue (1985); L. D. Martin, Browning's Dramatic Monologues and the Post-Romantic Subject (1985); A. Rosmarin, The Power of Genre (1985); W. Clemen, Shakespeare's Soliloquies (1987); J. T. Mayer, T. S. Eliot's Silent Voices (1989); W. D. Shaw, Origins of the Monologue (1999); G. Byron, Dramatic Monologue (2003).

B. A. NICHOLS; H. F. TUCKER

MONOMETER. A metrical line consisting of one measure, either a *foot (in the mod. langs.) or a *metron (in cl. verse). Poems in monometer are rare, the shortness of the lines making for severe segmentation of syntax. The best known Eng. example is Robert Herrick's "Upon his Departure Hence," an epitaph of 15 lines beginning "Thus I /; Passe by /; And die. . . ."

T.V.F. BROGAN

MONORHYME (Ger. Reimhaufung). Refers to a passage, stanza, or entire poem in which all lines have the same end rhyme, i.e., the rhyme scheme aaa . . . Although monorhyme may seem singularly limited in its expressive capabilities, its distinguished use in Eng., Lat., Ar., Fr., Ger., Sp., and Filipino poetry suggests the opposite. Monorhyme has a rich hist. in med. Lat. poetry (Commodian, St. Augustine, Notker, and Gottschalk). It was also used by the Goliards in stanzas of four 13-syllable lines (see GOLIARDIC VERSE). Monorhyme couplets appear in 12th-c. Fr. narrative poetry; Warren argues that their frequency derives from the epic *strophe, which was also written in monorhyme. In mod. Fr., monorhyme has been employed by Voltaire, Jean-Jacques Lefranc de Pompignan, and Théophile Gautier. Ger. examples of monorhyme (gehäufter Reim) are rare, but an early 13th-c. lied by Walther von der Vogelweide has stanzas monorhymed on the vowels a, e, i, o, and u (Richardson). In Sp., Julián del Casal's monorhymed tercets are notable for their influence on his modernist successors (Nunn). The Ar. ghazal and qaṣīda* sustain monorhyme across hundreds of lines: when performed at the musha'arah, the dramatic monorhymes of the ghazal keep the listener in a constant state of suspense. Monorhyme is also common in some Tagalog oral poetry such as the tanaga, for which a single rhyme facilitates memorization and transmission (Lumbera), and in the heptasyllabic Mangyan ambahan (Postma).

Monorhyme conjures a variety of moods, from comic to reverent. Calin notes the "solemnity and sonority" that monorhyme couplets can provide in Fr., and this is certainly true in Eng. examples by William Blake ("Silent, Silent Night") and D. G. Rossetti ("The Woodspurge"). Although monorhyme in Eng. is uncommon, it is hardly unknown; other prominent examples are found in John Skelton, Robert Herrick ("Upon Julia's Clothes"), Edward Lear ("To Miss Lear on her Birthday"), Thomas Hardy ("The Respectable Burgher"), and Robert Frost ("The Rose Family"). Hardy seizes on monorhyme's potential for biting satire, Herrick and Frost on monorhyme's playfulness. One of the longest and most virtuosic examples of monorhyme in Eng. belongs to the 13-year-old Lear (112 lines ending in "-tion").

■ F. M. Warren, "Some Features of Style in Early French Narrative Poetry," MP 4 (1907); C. F. Richardson, A Study of English Rhyme (1909); M. Nunn, "Julián del Casal, First Modernista Poet," Hispania 23 (1940); W. Calin, "Cain and Abel in the 'Mystère d'Adam,'" MLR 58 (1963); C. Lyons, "The Effect of Monorhyme on Arabic Poetic Production," Journal of Arabic Literature 1 (1970); A. Postma, The Concept of Time among the Mangyans (1985); B. Lumbera, Tagalog Poetry, 1570–1898 (1986).

T.V.F. Brogan; W. Hunter

MONOSTICH. A poem consisting of a single line. Before the advent of mod. *free verse, a single line would have to have been metrical to be recognized as verse; and there are certainly a considerable number of metrical gnomes, *epigrams, proverbs, and funerary inscriptions of the ancient world, both in cl. Gr. and Celtic, that presumably were thought of as, in some sense, poetic. The Delphic Oracle spoke thus. The several collections of monostichs attributed to Menander, who used them both seriously and ironically in his plays, fall into this category, too, though probably few of the 800-odd extant lines are genuinely his. Cf. the Greek Anthology, 11.312. Although most mod. monostichs lack meter, and hence may be viewed by some as jokes or aperçus rather than poems, the more effective ones operate as other very short poems do. Some offer descriptive vignettes in the manner of *imagism or of pared-down *haiku. Others are humorous or satirical, epigrams as compact as a comedian's one-liner, or deploy puns to suggest figures.

The most famous mod. example, entitled "Chantre" ("Singer"), was composed by Guillaume Apollinaire in 1913:

Et l'unique cordeau des trompettes marines
(And the single string of the marine trumpets)

Appended to the proofs of Alcools at the last moment, this little poem is a dense cord of puns. In addition to its primary meaning, e.g., "cordeau" evokes a conch (cor d'eau) and the sea (corps d'eau). The trompette marine was a single-stringed med. instrument, played with a bow. The poem itself is divided into two units of equal significance, the title and the monostich proper. Read this way, it counterposes the poet and the instrument, or—in cosmological terms—God and the source of the divine music that governs existence. (In the Middle Ages, the Pythagorean concept of universal harmony was often illustrated by drawings of an instrument with a single string.) Together the two units constitute an *alexandrine, the traditional building block of Fr. poetry.

As in Apollinaire's case, many monostichs would be pointless or obscure without the context provided them by titles. In the mod. period and beyond, the form has remained infrequent, although notable examples have been created by Yvor Winters, A. R. Ammons, W. S. Merwin, Howard Nemerov, and others.

See gnomic poetry, stichos.

■ W. Görler, Menandrou gnomai (1963); G. Apollinaire, Alcools, trans. A. H. Greet (1965); A. Fongaro, "Un Vers univers," Revue des Lettres Modernes (1976); rpt. in Apollinaire poète (1988); M. Poupon, "Un Parangon de poésie apollinarienne 'Chantre'," Revue des Lettres Modernes (1976); D. Gullentops, "Lecture de 'Chantre'," Revue des Lettres Modernes (1996).

T.V.F. Brogan; R. B. Shaw; W. Bohn

MORA (pl. morae or moras; Lat. mora, "delay"; cognate with Old Ir. maraim, "remain" [OED]). A short syllable, as measured in langs. (e.g., Gr., Hawaiian, Slavic, Japanese) where duration is an aspect of meaning and/or *rhythm. While the short syllable is one mora (monomoraic), the long syllable may consist of two moras or a duration midway between one and two moras (bimoraic) or as many as three moras (trimoraic). In Eng., mora appeared as early as 1569 in Scottish legal texts and continues to the present as a legal term meaning unnecessary delay in bringing forth a claim. In prosody, the earliest use appears in the Encyclopedia Americana and is used thereafter in rhythmic and metric studies of cl. langs. The term was adopted by Leonard Bloomfield in 1933 to refer to a relative quantity of sound structure (OED) and was taken up by George Trager several years later to denote a segment of a syllabic unit that functions to mark prominence when the entire syllable is not the marker. The mora is important as a unit of durative measure in langs. with relative durations (lengths of time) on vowels, such as Japanese, which counts moras instead of syllables. The haiku is measured by moras, not syllables: thus, the three lines of the form consist of five, seven, and five moras, respectively. A syllable may have more than one mora, depending on the length of time required for pronunciation. So, the haiku, or any Japanese word, may have an identical number of mora but not the same number of syllables. Langs. differ as to the relation of moras to syllables as prosodic markers of prominence. Linguists do not agree on the nature and occurrence of moras in stressed langs. such as Eng., where duration may vary with individual or dialect as length of time is always one of three features for marking prominence, the most important being *pitch change.

See haikai, meter, prosody, quantity.

■ L. Bloomfield, Language (1933); G. Trager, "The Theory of Accentual Systems," Language, Culture and Personality, ed. L. Spier et al. (1941); J. Clark, C. Yallop, and J. Fletcher, Introduction to Phonetics and Phonology, 3d ed. (2007).

R. Winslow

MORALE ÉLÉMENTAIRE (Fr., "elementary morality"). The generic name for a poem in fixed form invented by Raymond Queneau (1903–76), first presented in his last book Morale élémentaire (1975). Almost exclusively practiced by members of the *Oulipo group, it is a 15-line poem in three parts: the opening consists of 12 noun-adjective couplings (or biwords) presented over six lines, or three *couplets containing 3-1, 3-1, 3-1 adjective-noun pairings; the interlude consists of six lines, varying in length from one to five syllables; and, the concluding couplet repeats the 3-1 structure of the opening, possibly repeating words previously used. Queneau explicitly defined the form in a note accompanying the publication of several early morales élémentaires (1974), at which time Georges Perec (1936–82) directly borrowed words from that definition to write "Roubaud's Principle," a poetics written in the form and pattern of a morale élémentaire. The form has received keen attention by members of the Oulipo because of both Queneau's influence and the form's flexibility. Ian Monk's bilingual "Morale élémentaire/Elementary Morality" (2003) plays on the difference in Fr. and Eng. word order, the noun-adjective/adjective-noun sequences, while exploiting true and false cognates:

Roman court	bled rose double grave	mobile suspect
Main plate	pied fin dire nature	smoking orange
Dancing trouble	instant rose base promise court comment on court comment on court	vague future
Base double	main alternative double content	vague promise

■ P. Fournel, Élémentaire morales (1978); J. Roubaud, Autres morales élémentaires (1992), and Trois ruminations (1996); F. Forte, Petite morale élémentaire portative (2008); "Morale Élémentaire: Aventures d'une forme poétique," La Licorne 81 (2008)—spec. iss.; M. Grangaud, Les temps traversés (2010).

J.-J. Poucel

MOSAIC RHYME. (Occitan rim trencatz, Ger. gespaltener Reim, It. rime composte), sometimes broken rhyme, split rhyme, rarely heteromerous rhyme. The "piecing together" of two or more short (often monosyllabic) words to rhyme with one longer (usually polysyllabic) one. Cases where both the rhymes are made out of more than one word, e.g., "pray thee / slay thee," "greet me / meet me" (J. G. Whittier), are viewed by some as mosaic but by most as simply double or feminine rhymes (see MASCULINE AND FEMININE). Traditionally, *rhyme concerns the phonological structure of one or more syllables but respects morphological categories; mosaic rhymes, by contrast, transgress word boundaries in order to effect the rhyme, highlighting that fact in the rhyme by the contrast between the rhyme fellows. Thereby, they expand the range of the rhyme device. Lord Byron has the famous mosaic rhyme "intellectual / hen-peck'd you all." J. R. Lowell has "Unqualified merits, I'll grant, if you choose, he has 'em, / But he lacks the one merit of kindling enthusiasm." Robert Browning, who was partial to the device, has 16 out of a possible 37 in "A Grammarian's Funeral," incl. such novelties as "fabric / dab brick," "far gain / bargain," "all meant / installment," "failure / pale lure," "soon hit / unit," "loosened / dew send." G. M. Hopkins has "I am and / diamond."

Since polysyllables are, despite greater commonality of endings, more difficult to rhyme and since Eng. as a Germanic lang. has a greater stock of monosyllables than the Romance langs., one might think that this sort of rhyming would be limited in scope and confined mainly to Eng. But the effect is striking, and this is not the case: the mosaic technique, which takes advantage of compounding in morphology and which can be combined with other strategies, has been popular in other langs. Occitan, Fr., and Ger. developed a variety of mosaic rich or *identical rhyme in which two words rhyme with one, both members having the same spelling and sound but different senses, e.g., a roi / aroi, des cors / descors. This is known in Fr. as rime équivoque; first attested in Gautier de Coincy (13th c.), it was very popular among the rhétoriqueurs* of the late 15th and early 16th cs., e.g., the brothers Badouin and Jean de Condé, and even Clément Marot in some épitres. Guillaume Apollinaire rhymes "Ah, Dieu" with "adieu"; Louis Aragon develops the technique, which he calls rime complexe. Cognate is Ger. rührende Reim, in which one of the rhyming words is a compound of the other, e.g. Ger. zeigen / erzeigen or Eng. mortal / immortal, though these are not, strictly, mosaic.

See TRIPLE RHYME.

■ A. Tobler, Le Vers français ancien et moderne (1885); Patterson, 168–69 and index; L. Schourup, "Mosaic Rhyme," Lang&S 21 (1988).

T.V.F. Brogan

MOSCOW-TARTU SCHOOL. See STRUCTURALISM.

MOTE. A Sp. poem consisting of a single line or *couplet, rarely more, containing a complete thought. Usually, but not always, this thought is glossed in verse, the whole composition then being called either mote or glosa*, occasionally villancico* or letra. One mote may be glossed by several poets or by the same poet in several versions. The mote was particularly popular in the 15th c.

■ Le Gentil; Navarro.

D. C. Clarke

MOTIF. (Fr. motif, an overarching theme, often a color scheme within the visual arts; It. motivo, "motive," theme, or pattern). Motif often refers to a melodic phrase that provided structure and unity to a musical work. It has been used in lit. since the 19th c. to mean a salient and recurrent feature, theme, character, subject, or image within a work. A poetic motif may also occur as reiterated words or patterned phrases such as in a *refrain at the conclusion of stanzas.

See ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY, THEMATICS, TOPOS.

■ A. Dundes, "The Motif Index and the Tale-Type Index: A Critique," Journal of Folklore Research 34 (1997).

A. M. GUGLIELMO

THE MOVEMENT. A group of Eng. poets who came to prominence in the 1950s: Philip Larkin, Kingsley Amis, Thom Gunn, Donald Davie, John Wain, Robert Conquest, D. J. Enright, Elizabeth Jennings, and John Holloway. They were originally publicized as a distinct phenomenon in a series of BBC radio broadcasts in 1952–53, which emphasized the group's "dry anti-romantic flavor." A year later the London Spectator coined the term the Movement to label this new generation, dubbing it skeptical, robust, and ironic. Alternative names for the group included the University Wits, Empsonians, and New Augustans, but it is the vaguer Movement that persisted. Subsequently, the Movement was represented by two anthologies: Enright's Poets of the 1950s and Conquest's New Lines.

While the poets belonging to the Movement denied an intention to form a unified group, their anthols. and other publications presented a distinctive aesthetic program that championed lucidity, moderation, and, in Enright's words, "chastened common sense." Turning away from *free verse and other modernist experiments, the Movement poets often used traditional *prosody, rhyme, and stanzaic patterns, which they admired as a sign of stability and order. In Purity of Diction in English Verse (which Davie later described as the *manifesto the group might have adopted, if they had agreed to adopt one), Davie lauded poetry with "pure diction," "prosaic strength," and economy of metaphor. In their subject matter, the Movement poets gravitated toward the ordinary rather than the grandiose, exemplified by Larkin's "Born Yesterday" (1954). Larkin, who became the most prominent poet of the Movement, suggests that being average, ordinary, and even dull is preferable to clichéd notions of beauty and love, because an excess of anything might "pull you off your balance." As a counterweight to the unbridled, exalted sentiment of *romanticism and neoromanticism, Larkin's poem takes a characteristic Movement stance in its advocacy of equilibrium and restraint and offers an alternative form of emotion that finds its power in subtlety and attentiveness: a "flexible, / Unemphasised, enthralled / Catching of happiness." The hesitant, skeptical, unsentimental poetic *persona often found in Movement poems was intended as an antidote to the "heavy dramatization of the poet's personality," as Wain termed it, that the group saw in some of their predecessors. Not limited to an aesthetic program, the Movement also embodied a social rebellion: most of its members were provincial university lecturers from lower- or middle-class backgrounds who saw their work as a protest against an urban, upper-class, literary establishment.

Historically, the Movement's members positioned themselves simultaneously against the neoromantic, neoapocalyptic, symbolist tendencies of 1940s poets (particularly Dylan Thomas, whom they regarded as emotionally excessive and self-indulgent) and the *modernism of T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound. As Enright put it, they "steered between the rock of Wastelanditis and the whirlpool of Dylanitis." They modeled themselves after figures such as Thomas Hardy, Robert Graves, William Empson, and F. R. Leavis. Yet in the broader context of 20th-c. poetry, the Movement represents less of a rejection of modernism than is commonly supposed. Their poetic stance returns not just to premodernist and preromantic poetry but to an early, tempered version of modernism itself, embodied in Pound's and H.D.'s Anglo-Am. *imagism of the 1910s. Both the Movement poets and the imagists positioned themselves as antisymbolist (see SYMBOLISM); rejected grandiose themes, *sentimentality, and *obscurity; called for sobriety, hardness, and precise craftsmanship; and similarly proffered "good prose" as a model for poetry. While in practice the two groups produced very dissimilar works, the coincidence of their aims exemplifies the recurring impulse toward clarity and moderation that often follows a generation regarded as extreme, obscure, or outrageous.

In later years, the Movement poets moved apart from each other, and, as a clearly demarcated phenomenon, the Movement is thought to have ended with the 1950s. Davie's essay "Remembering the Movement" has been regarded by some critics as its epitaph. Several of the individual poets continued to pursue the Movement's aesthetic principles for the rest of their careers, however, and the term Movement has come to indicate a broader aesthetic, found not only in the original nine poets but in later poets. For a retrospective essay on the Movement published in 2009, Conquest wrote a new poem that aptly celebrates the "Movement spirit": "Neither too mad nor too mild, / Neither too tame nor too wild."

■ D. Davie, Purity of Diction in English Verse (1952); A. Hartley, "Poets of the Fifties," Spectator no. 193 (August 27, 1954); J. Scott, "In the Movement," Spectator no. 193 (October 1, 1954); Poets of the 1950s, ed. D. Enright (1955); New Lines, ed. R. Conquest (1956); W. O'Connor, The New University Wits and the End of Modernism (1963); D. Davie, "Remembering the Movement" (1959), The Poet in the Imaginary Museum (1977); B. Morrison, The Movement (1980); J. Bradley, The Movement (1993); The Movement Reconsidered, ed. Z. Leader (2009).

K. B. PAINTER

MOZARABIC POETRY. See AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

MUSE (Gr. mousa, pl. moũsai, related to mnaomai, "I remember" and "I remind"). The ancient Gr. goddesses of artistic *inspiration were the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne. Hesiod states in the Theogony (ca. 700 BCE) that Zeus lay with Mnemosyne for nine nights and thus conceived nine daughters: Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polymnia, Urania, and Calliope. It was not until the Roman period that the Muses were linked with discrete activities; we now generally associate Calliope with poetry, Clio with hist., Thalia with comedy, Melpomene with tragedy, Euterpe with music, Terpisichore with dance, and Urania with astronomy. In various times and places since antiquity, the word muse refers to that mysterious place, either outside or within the *poet, from which artistic inspiration emanates.

If the Muses were born from Mnemosyne, the personification of memory, then part of their work, as Hesiod demonstrates, is to inspire artists to sing of the past. In the Odyssey, the Iliad, and the Theogony, Homer and Hesiod emphasize the Muses' status as active bearers of stories, truth, knowledge, and wisdom. The invocation by which the Muses are called discretely or as a group to speak through or for the poet was a standard introduction in the ancient literary trad. And yet the Muse is not simply a formality with which the Gr. poets quickly dispensed. Not only do the Muses tell Hesiod what to sing, but they give him the structure of the verse, the arrangement of the song, the poem itself. In Plato's Ion (ca. 380 BCE), Socrates explains the importance of the figure of the Muse: art emanates directly from the Muses, who spin a web of influence that extends through the ages.

As the Common Era began, two different meanings of the word muse evolved. The first refers to the Gr. deities who tell the rather passive poet what to write—the Muse of *epic. The importance of the epic Muse begins to ebb with the decline of Roman antiquity, exemplified by a satirical reference in the first book of Horace's Satires (ca. 35 BCE). Curtius explains that the dwindling references signal med. poetry's rejection of the cl. Muse in view of her pagan associations. At this point, what we might call the personal muse begins her ascendance. Med. vernacular lyric poetry e.g., by Bernart de Ventadorn, Dante, and Petrarch, is rife with references to the beloved dame or donna, the object of the poet's love, the inspiration of his verse. During the Ren., the epic Muse once again becomes an important symbol for poetic inspiration: Edmund Spenser calls to his patron, Queen Elizabeth, "holy virgin chief of mine," for inspiration (The Faerie Queene, 1590, 1596), while Shakespeare intends Henry V (1600) to take its place as one of Britain's foundational epics when the Chorus invokes the Muse in the first lines of the play. John Milton in Paradise Lost (1667, 1674) addresses three invocations to the Muse, in books 1, 3, and 9, inflected with his ambition to "soar / Above th' Aonian Mount," the traditional home of the Muses on Mount Helicon, as well as his Puritan faith ("O Spirit, that dost prefer / Before all Temples th' upright heart and pure." But some of these poets may also call to a personal muse, as Shakespeare does in the sonnets when he addresses both an epicene young man and a sexually experienced dark woman. Eighteenth-c. France is known for rational, well-ordered writings such as political tracts and encyclopedias, and in Britain, William Blake bids the Muse adieu in "To the Muses" (1783). Enlightenment writers and philosophers mention "enthusiasm," a creative furor that is associated with poetic inspiration, but they generally do not refer to divine forces. Eighteenth-c. thinkers saw poetry as a spiritual exercise that combined *imagination, sentiment, and reason, not as divinely inspired by a being or force outside the mind of the poet. The romantic period witnessed a resurgence in references to the Muse, although often she is associated with *nature, a more profound source of inspiration for poets such as William Wordsworth or Alphonse de Lamartine (although the latter, like Dante, has a decidedly personal muse named Elvire, who inspired "Le Lac" [1820], one of the most famous poems in Fr.).

Like the corresponding poets, who may be socially marginal figures, the symbolist and modernist muse is knocked off her pedestal (see SYMBOLISM, MODERNISM) and suffers the humiliations of urban, quotidian experience. Arthur Rimbaud writes in Illuminations, "One evening I took Beauty in my arms—and I thought her bitter—and I insulted her," while in "N.Y." Ezra Pound exclaims,

> My City, my beloved,
> Thou art a maid with no breasts.
> Thou art slender as a silver reed.
> Listen to me, attend me!
> And I will breathe into thee a soul,
> And thou shalt live for ever.

Because most references to the muse involve a male poet and a female muse and because the mod. muse is often a passive female figure inspiring an active male poet, the issue of gender has been a fruitful one in scholarly discussions. Plato is credited with calling Sappho "the tenth muse," and the epithet has been applied to several women poets such as Anne Bradstreet (The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America, 1650) and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. In fact, through the ages, women poets were often referred to as muses, perhaps as a way of containing their literary power; cast as muses instead of acknowledged as creators, they are relegated to the passive role that the inspirer generally inhabits. Contemp. literary critics have theorized what the traditional figure of the muse means for women poets, incl. (as DeShazer has it) mother-muses, female lover-muses, and muses that are "complex multiplicities of selves in communion with others." However, for the most part, the muse is an antiquarian rather than an immediate reference for contemp. poets, even while many of them acknowledge other unconscious forces at work in the act of literary creation. The literary figure of the muse touches on many issues central to discussions of poetry and art in general: inspiration, creation, *genius, gender, power, and *influence.

See COURTLY LOVE, DANCE AND POETRY, GENDER AND POETRY, GREEK POETRY, MYTH, ORAL POETRY, SAPPHIC.

■ Curtius; J. F. Diehl, "'Come Slowly—Eden': An Exploration of Women Poets and Their Muse," Signs 3 (1978); P. Murray, "Invocation to the Muses," Greece Old and New, ed. T. Winnifrith and P.

Murray (1983); M. K. DeShazer, Inspiring Women: Reimagining the Muse (1986); A. Becq, Genèse de l'aesthétique moderne française (1994); G. Levy, Refiguring the Muse (1999); Figures modernes de la muse, ed. J.-M. Maulpoix (2002); R. Hard, "Lesser Deities and Nature-Spirits," The Routledge Handbook of Greek Mythology, 7th ed. (2003).

G. Levy

MUSIC AND POETRY (Gr. mousikē, "the art of the Muses"). Our best evidence about primitive song suggests that melodies and rhythms precede words, that the first step toward poetry was the fitting of words to preexistent musical patterns. Primitive cultures did not make the distinctions we now make between music and poetry: the Egyptian "hymn of the seven vowels," e.g., appears to have exploited the overtone pitches present in the vowels of any lang. The ancient Gr. ling. system of pitch accents was strikingly similar to the tetrachordal system of ancient Gr. music. Spoken Gr. moved between two stable pitches, a high pitch (indicated in post-Alexandrian texts by the acute accent) and a low pitch (indicated by the absence of accent); these pitches framed an area from which the sliding pitch indicated by the circumflex accent arose; the grave accent may also indicate such a medial pitch. Gr. music also moved between two fixed pitches; these tones, a perfect fourth apart, framed a middle area containing two sliding microtonal pitches. The ling. pitch system operated independently from the rhythmic system we now call quantitative meter; high-pitched syllables did not necessarily correspond with long positions in the meter. But the scraps of ancient music we possess do show a general correspondence between pitch accent and melodic shape, and studies of "accentual responsion" in the lyrics of Sappho and Pindar suggest that the poet's choice of words in an *antistrophe may have been constrained by an attempt to have those words correspond to the melodic pitch pattern established in the *strophe.

The Greeks used the same word, mousikē, to describe dance, music, poetry, and elementary education. Mousikē was essentially a "mnemonic technology," a rhythmic and melodic way of preserving the wisdom of the culture; alphabetic writing, the next advance in mnemonic technology, forced changes. It was adopted as a musical notation soon after its introduction, with letters of the alphabet written above the vowels in a poetic line to indicate pitches. Thanks to the quantitative conventions of Gr. meter, no separate rhythmic notation was necessary. The visual separation of pitches and words in the new notation began to separate the once unified arts; alphabetic writing led to both rhetorical and musical theory, the latter of which, thanks to Pythagorean mysticism, quickly became concerned with advanced theoretical and mathematical problems virtually divorced from performance.

Roman poetry, in which the normal word accents of Lat. words were arbitrarily distorted as those words were wedged into what had once been the rhythms of Gr. music, was another step in the separation. What began as mousikē, an organically unified art, had now become not two but four elements: performed music, music theory, poetry, and rhetorical theory. Christian thought altered the relative prestige of the four elements: the Church fathers embraced the elaborate mathematical music theory of the ancient world and allegorized its numbers; they banished instrumental music from the Church and sought to alter and control vocal music; on the literary side, by contrast, pagan poetry itself had to be saved by *allegory, while rhetorical theory was treated with suspicion. The drift in Lat. poetry away from quantitative verse toward *accentual-syllabic verse, in which the hymns of Ambrose and Augustine are important documents, was a motion away from writing Lat. words to Gr. tunes toward writing Lat. words to Christian tunes whose origin was probably Heb.

In the early Middle Ages, liturgical chant became longer, more complex, and more ornate, despite attempts by Charlemagne and Pope Gregory I to arrest its devel. When the lengthy melismatic passages sung to the last a of the word alleluia proved hard to memorize because church singers had a much less accurate notational system than the now-forgotten letters of the ancient Greeks, monks began writing words for them; the resulting works were called sequences or proses, though they employ many devices we would call poetic. By fitting new words to a preexisting melody, such sequence poets as Notker Balbulus (ca. 840–912) again altered poetry, moving it still closer to mod. stanzaic form, including *rhyme. The troubadours and trouvères, composer-poets writing in the vernacular, took over and extended the formal innovations of the sequence, producing increasingly complex stanzaic forms with elaborate rhyme schemes. In their art, poetic form was more complex than musical form, and by the time Dante defined poetry as a combination of music and rhet., music had become a somewhat metaphorical term. Not only were the It. poems in forms derived from the troubadours normally written without a specific tune in mind, but poetic form itself had become sufficiently demanding to occupy the attention once devoted to making words fit a preexisting tune.

Musicians, who were now increasingly called on to compose settings of preexisting words, made an important technical advance in the invention of polyphony. They may have gotten the idea of combining two or more melodies from the literary notion of allegory, realizing that the mystical simultaneity of an OT story and its NT analogue could become, in music, actual simultaneity. One result, oddly parallel to the dropping away of music from the troubadour trad., was that texts became less audible in polyphonic vocal music than in the monodic singing of all previous music. In early polyphony, the tenor or lowest part often sustained one vowel for many long notes, while the more rapidly moving upper parts sang as many as 40 short notes on one vowel. Predictably, these upper parts often picked up new texts, including Fr. texts glossing or commenting ironically on the liturgical Lat. text being sustained in the lower part.

Influenced by Christian versions of the ancient Gr. numerological theory, in which the universe was conceived as created and ordered by numbers, med. poets and composers frequently constructed their pieces by complex, mystical, mathematical formulas. Fr. isorhythmic motets, tricky crab canons in which one line is the other sung backward, *anagram poems concealing the names of mistresses—all elaborate forms whose principles of construction cannot be heard in performance—flourished as representations of the numerical mystery of the universe or (for adepts in both arts) as secret displays of technical ingenuity. In the service of such causes, musicians treated texts as a tailor treats cloth: they cut them up, stretched them out, redistributed their rhythms in ways that entirely destroyed the original poetic form, obscured the rhyme scheme, and made the content impossible to hear—esp. in motets, where three different texts in two different langs. were sung simultaneously. Guillaume de Machaut (ca. 1300–77), who was at once the leading composer and the leading poet of his period, wrote such motets but also simpler monodic songs such as chansons, virelais, and lais in which expression of the text was an artistic concern.

In Ren. poetry and music, techniques initially developed as virtuoso modes of construction, such as rhyme in poetry and chordal harmony in music, began to acquire expressive values. A new rereading of the ancient poets and rhetoricians, with fresh interest in persuasion, emotion, and the moral force of sounds, was an important factor. Med. composers had often worked out their music before pasting in a text, but Ren. composers normally started with a text and worked in various ways at animating or expressing it. Josquin des Prez (ca. 1450–1521), who used dissonant harmonies at painful moments in the text, pointed the way toward the witty rhetorical musical expression of the It. *madrigal school, which developed a number of harmonic and melodic "word-painting" conventions for setting words dealing with running, weeping, dying, and so forth. When Cardinal Bembo's edition of 1501 restored Petrarch as a model for *lyric poetry, composers of secular songs were compelled to increase the musical sophistication of their settings, and in searching for musical equivalents of Petrarchan *oxymorons—"freezing fires" or "living deaths"—they developed a more expressive use of harmony. Despite this general motion toward expression, however, the highly elaborate methods of construction typical of med. art survived, as virtuosity or mysticism, in both arts, esp. in England, where the hidden numerical schemes of Edmund Spenser's poetry and the abstract patterns of John Bull's keyboard fantasias provide extreme examples.

The increased attention to the rhet. and meaning of poetry on the part of composers did not satisfy the literary reformers now called the "musical humanists" (the Camerata of Giovanni de' Bardi in Florence and the Académie of Jean-Antoine de Baïf in Paris). Fired by ancient myths concerning the capacity of music to arouse various passions, these men concluded that it would do so most effectively by submitting to the rule of the text: they opposed independent musical rhythm, arguing that music should exactly follow the rhythm of the poem; they opposed the staggered declamation typical of the madrigal, favoring homophonic, chordal singing or *monody. Such composers as Claudio Monteverdi paid lip service to the aims of this reform program but did not allow it to deprive their art of the techniques it had developed since the Middle Ages. Operatic recitative is the most familiar legacy of musical humanism, but Monteverdi's operas show as much attention to musical construction as to literary expression. By the later 17th c., opera singers had become more important in the public view than either composers or librettists, and arias designed for vocal display became a central part of operatic practice.

While most Ren. poets possessed some technical understanding of music, thanks to the importance of music in the traditional school curriculum, poets in later centuries often lacked such knowledge, and their mimetic theories of musical expression proved increasingly inadequate. In 18th-c. vocal music, such composers as J. S. Bach continued to employ versions of the mimetic word-painting techniques of the madrigal; Alexander Pope's witty lines on "sound and sense" in the Essay on Criticism are a poetic analogy. But composers, unlike poets, were able to use materials that originated in such local *mimesis as building blocks from which to construct a larger structure. Trained by such rhetorically organized texts as Johann Fux's Gradus ad Parnassum (1725), a treatise on counterpoint praised by Bach, they were also learning to combine canonic procedures with an increasingly stable tonal grammar; these devels. liberated instrumental music, which could now embody several kinds of purely musical meaning. The willingness of later 18th-c. concertgoers to attend purely instrumental performances demonstrated once and for all the inadequacy of Ren. theories that had maintained that music's only legitimate function was to animate texts. Mimetic theorists, however, shifted their ground. No longer able to maintain that composers were imitating words, they now insisted that they were imitating or expressing feelings, a doctrine that led to the Affektenlehre, a systematic catalog of musical formulas for expressing passions.

Two fundamentally opposed conceptions of music were now coexisting uneasily: poets and philosophers continued to insist on the mimetic function of music, now calling it a lang. of the passions, but composers and some theorists, by developing the tight musical syntax we now call the tonal system, had given music a grammar of its own, a meaning independent of imitation that made possible such larger forms as the sonata-allegro. The romantic poets, just as ignorant of musical technique as their Augustan predecessors, now embraced music for the very qualities that had made it unattractive to those older poets, its supposed vagueness, fluidity, and "femininity." They sought in their poetry to imitate these myths about music, not the logical, witty music actually being written by such composers as Franz Joseph Haydn. In the cause of a more "musical" poetry, the romantics loosened Eng. syntax, while Haydn and W. A. Mozart were tightening and refining musical syntax. But eventually these romantic and literary myths about music began to affect composers, and in the music of Hector Berlioz, Franz Liszt, and Richard Wagner, all of whom acknowledge literary influences, a similar loosening of musical syntax takes place. Later 19th-c. composers frequently embraced poetic aims: "program" music, the idea of the leitmotif, the revived claim that music could express emotions and tell stories.

Wagner's opponent Eduard Hanslick insisted on the autonomy of music, espousing the revolutionary idea that musical structure itself was the real subject of music. Contemporaneous poetic theories of *autonomy were somewhat similar in their drive to separate poetry from its subject matter. But while Hanslick rejected all attempts to describe music as a lang., the poetic autonomists (E. A. Poe, Oscar Wilde, Walter Pater) claimed to want to make poetry more like music. Fr. symbolist poetry (see SYMBOLISM), in its fascination with sound and its attempt to maximize the extent to which words in a poem acquire their meaning from that particular poetic context alone, attempts to realize the program announced in Paul Verlaine's familiar declaration de la musique avant toute chose (music before everything). Still, the waning of the tonal system in 20th-c. music and Arnold Schoenberg's success in devising a new system for composition suggested again the limitations of attempts to describe music in ling. terms. Twentieth-c. relations between the arts often followed the old axes of numerical construction: Schoenberg was profoundly influenced by the mathematical constructive procedures in the poetry and music of Machaut; in his "expressionist" period, he used poetic line lengths to determine musical structure. Alban Berg organized his Lyric Suite on a sonnet by Stéphane Mallarmé but suppressed the text; W. H. Auden, in seeking a musical sophistication of technique, invented poetic forms closely related to the serial techniques of mod. music. Despite the large differences in the way music and poetry are practiced in the mod. world, Ezra Pound's cranky insistence that "poets who will not study music are defective" acknowledges the advantages of a long and fruitful partnership.

See AIR, BALLAD, BLUES, CACOPHONY, DITTY, EUPHONY, JAZZ POETRY, SONG, SOUND.

■ Bibliographies: Modern Language Association of America, A Bibliography on the Relations of Literature and the Other Arts 1952–1967 (1968); S. P. Scher, "Literatur und Musik: Eine Bibliographie," Literatur und Musik: Ein Handbuch zur Theorie und Praxis, ed. S. P. Scher (1982); M. L. Switten, Music and Literature in the Middle Ages: An Annotated Bibliography (1990).

■ Criticism: G. Reese, Music in the Middle Ages (1940); T. S. Eliot, The Music of Poetry (1942); C. S. Brown, Music and Literature (1948); B. Pattison, Music and Poetry of the English Renaissance (1948); Source Readings in Music History, ed. O. Strunk (1950); G. Reese, Music in the Renaissance, 2d ed. (1954); A. Einstein, Essays on Music (1956); J. Hollander, "The Music of Poetry," JAAC 15 (1956); J G. Springer, "Language and Music: Parallels and Divergencies," For Roman Jakobson, ed. M. Halle (1956); Sound and Poetry, ed. N. Frye (1957); D. Feaver, "The Musical Setting of Euripides' Orestes," AJP 81 (1960); J. Hollander, The Untuning of the Sky: Ideas of Music in English Poetry, 1500–1700 (1961); J. Stevens, Music and Poetry in the Early Tudor Court (1961); C. M. Bowra, Primitive Song (1962); K. G. Just, "Musik und Dichtung," Deutsche Philologie im Aufriss, ed. W. Stammler, v. 3, 2d ed. (1962); A. Wellek, "The Relationship between Music and Poetry," JAAC 21 (1962); F. W. Sternfeld, Music in Shakespearean Tragedy (1963); D. T. Mace, "Musical Humanism, the Doctrine of Rhythmus, and the St. Cecilia Odes of Dryden," Journal of the Warburg and Courtland Institutes 27 (1964); H. Petri, Literatur und Musik: Form- und Strukturparalleln (1964); W. Mellers, Harmonious Meeting (1965); G. Reichert, "Literatur und Musik," Reallexikon II, v. 2; M. Pazzaglia, Il verso e l'arte della Canzone nel De vulgari Eloquentia (1967); S. P. Scher, Verbal Music in German Literature (1968); C. S. Brown, "Musico-Literary Research in the Last Two Decades," Yearbook of Comparative and General Literature 19 (1970), ed., spec. iss. of CL 22 (1970); L. Lipking, The Ordering of the Arts in Eighteenth-Century England (1970); E. Wahlström, "Accentual Responsion in Greek Strophic Poetry," Commentationes Humanarum Litterarum 47 (1970); J. M. Stein, Poem and Music in the German Lied from Gluck to Hugo Wolf (1971); P. Johnson, Form and Transformation in Music and Poetry of the English Renaissance (1972); H. Van der Werf, The Chansons of the Troubadours and Trouvères (1972); D. J. Grout, A History of Western Music, 2d ed. (1973); R. Hoppin, Medieval Music (1978); Michaelides; Dichtung und Musik, ed. G. Schnitzler (1979); D. Hillery, Music and Poetry in France from Baudelaire to Mallarmé (1980); J. A. Winn, Unsuspected Eloquence: A History of the Relations between Poetry and Music (1981); E. B. Jorgens, The Well-Tun'd Word (1982); W. Mullen, Choreia: Pindar and Dance (1982); S. P. Scher, "Literature and Music," Interrelations of Literature, ed. J. P. Barricelli and J. Gibaldi (1982); L. Kramer, Music and Poetry: The Nineteenth Century and After (1984); L. Schleiner, The Living Lyre in English Verse from Elizabeth through the Restoration (1984); B. Stimpson, Paul Valéry and Music (1984); Hollander, esp. chs. 1, 2, 4; E. Doughtie, English Renaissance Song (1986); J. Neubauer, The Emancipation of Music from Language (1986); J. Stevens, Words and Music in the Middle Ages (1986); J. P. Barricelli, Melopoiesis (1988); D. M. Hertz, The Tuning of the Word (1988); G. Comotti, Music in Greek and Roman Culture, trans. R. V. Munson (1989); C. O. Hartman, Jazz Text (1991); The Jazz Poetry Anthology, ed. S. Feinstein and Y. Komunyakaa (1991); Music and Text, ed. S. P. Scher (1992); D. K. McColley, Poetry and Music in Seventeenth-Century England (1997); International Assoc. for Word and Music Studies, Word and Music Studies (1997–)—annual pub.; D. Albright, Untwisting the Serpent (2000); S. Bruhn, Musical Ekphrasis (2000); Musico-poetics in Perspective, ed. J.-L. Cupers and U. Weisstein (2000); P. Kivy, Antithetical Arts (2009).

J. A. Winn

MUWASHSHAḤ. See al-andalus, poetry of; arabic poetry; hebrew poetry.

MYTH

I. Myth and Society
II. Myth and Metaphor
III. Mythological Tradition
IV. "The Mythical Method" in High Modernism
V. Mythological Allusion

I. Myth and Society. Everyone knows what a myth is, but perhaps nobody can arrive at a foolproof definition. Myths are universal and ubiquitous, like Pan, but elusive and variable, like Proteus. A myth is a generally received, quasi-authoritative, widely known and relied-upon story, generally independent of a specific author or text, in some sense deathless, unique, tenacious, and recurrent: often a somewhat fabulous or fantastical narrative or account of events in which at least some of the agents are supernatural beings, or lack the natural limitations of ordinary humans or other sentient creatures, and/or are marked for special and distinguished destinies, and in which the occurrences or story events are miraculous, unprecedented, charged with archetypal or generic significance, and have enduring consequences or abiding influence in the human world and experience. Any given myth is also a constituent unit within a mythology. And—almost by definition—a myth is a story that is *re*told (and reworked) for the lifetime of a given culture. It is more or less unauthored. From this, it follows that the word myth may be more loosely applied to any accepted or received story that typifies or illustrates widely diffused ideas, principles, or concepts by means of a narrative (e.g. the Horatio Alger myth that hard work pays off in success for the enterprising individual in a capitalistic society). Myths belong to societies and define them, and they are propagated there, so long as the particular society itself survives or is conserved in a subsequent culture's memory (e.g., "the myth of the French Revolution" as popularly received by the contemp. French).

A. Myth Criticism. In both society and lit., myth has little independent existence, insofar as it tends to appear in compound form, i.e., with ritual, cult, drama, theogony, heroic *saga, folktale, romance, legend, *archetype, psychological "complexes," primordial hist., historical reminiscence, aristocratic and tribal pedigrees, totemism, etiological tale and beast fable ("just so stories"), hearsay, hagiography, miracle stories, the practice of magic, magical thinking, animism, dream psychology, fantasy, *allegory, *personification, *metaphor, and lit. Mod. myth crit. can divide along these lines, but as often it crossbreeds them.

Although Aristotle's Poetics (ca. 384–322 bce) uses mythos narrowly to mean the ground plan for the main action imitated by a drama ("by myth I mean the arrangement of the incidents," presumably originally a sequence of ritual reenactments), the dramatic plots Aristotle cites are mythic in the sense eventually found in the word's wider application in various typologies for the social sciences. While myth's use to mean the archetypal aspect of any dramatic plot in lit. is prominent in the work of Northrop Frye, the most articulate exponent of this usage, he also writes about myth as a kind of ineradicable anthropological and ideological substrate in humanity's self-understanding and self-representation.

B. Myth and Culture. Figuring prominently in earlier mod. psychology, myths have been read there as projections of infantile or regressive fantasies, as the return of socially repressed or prohibited impulses and practices in fantasy form, or as paradigms for the devel. of personalities or character traits. In the psychoanalytic lit., as Alfred Adler puts it, " 'analogical thinking,' that is, the attempted solution of problems according to the analogy of former experiences, is more strongly and distinctly expressed in him [the neurotic] than in normal individuals." Moderns have indeed perceived their contemporaries' lives as individually determined by Jungian archetypes of the collective unconscious, Freudian complexes, parental imagos, narcissistic and histrionic personality disorders, and so forth, all as if myth were alive and well among the remains of the "old brain" and old culture, dwelling among the foundations of experience. In the Dictionary of the History of Ideas (1973), Mircea Eliade notes that Freud's Totem and Taboo "insists that the beginnings of religion, morals, society, and art converge in the Oedipus complex"; and under the strong influence of psychoanalysis's heavy father figure, there are recent literary critics (such as Harold Bloom and William Kerrigan) who have seemed eager to agree.

Prominent in much social anthropology from the last century, the study of a society's myths as foundational also belongs to academic work on ritual, ceremonial, and religious practices, originally those deemed "primitive" or belonging to "natives" and their characteristic thought processes. J. E. Harrison cites Gr. definitions of myth as "the things that are spoken in ritual acts" (in her 1927 Thespis and her 1922 Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion: after Pausanius 2.37.2, with Galen, de usu part. 6.14). Thus, the Bible's recital of the first week in Genesis ("things spoken") inculcates Sabbath keeping ("things done"). Therefore, things reported as done in the mythic past can explain things done in the social present, as Harrison notes in Themis (1927): "The outrageous myth of the birth of Athena from the head of Zeus is but the religious representation . . . of a patrilinear social structure." Anthropological approaches study mythic narratives and cultic practice among indigenous peoples as reflecting their socioeconomic realities, local livelihoods, ecological niches, and institutions of clanship and connubium. The book of Genesis advances ethnological explanations for Israel's relations with its near neighbors in foundational tales of divided brothers. (In the latter day, the two characters in Robert Frost's "Mending Wall" reerect some of these same mythic divisions between them—and/or between their properties. Pine trees host parasites fatal to apple orchards—hence, the neighbors' breached defenses.)

The analogical thinking characteristic of myth-making and magic typically coordinates divine or sacral practice with social or secular practice or asserts a likeness between them—or between culture and nature. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight implicitly underwrites the ordeal undergone by its protagonist with initiation into an esoteric fertility or virility mystery; Gawain subjects himself to a ritual bloodletting on the feast of the Circumcision—as Christ submitted to pangs to redeem humankind from the Old Law (and Adam's ancient contract with the devil), so the New Year delivers the Old North from the bondage of winter.

In Frazer's influential Golden Bough (1890) and the allied Cambridge School, myths are read backward, as ancient scripts for ritual practices concerned with the political and economic well-being of a community and its food supply. Folklorists have found mythic material and practice surviving in concealed form in fairy tales for children. The enchanted Brunhilde becomes Briarrose or Snow White—or Little Red Riding Hood's grandmother dissimulates a shaman garbed in wolf skins. In this vein, it is notable that the Eng. church's hymn "We Plough the Fields and Scatter" is sung to the tune of the old Eng. folk song "John Barleycorn"—here, the title character may go back to Beowa (barley) in Anglo-Saxon genealogies and Beowulf. The old verses relate Barleycorn's suffering, murder, sparagmos (dismemberment), and resurrection, and the reviving effects of consuming his blood: he dies so others, eating bread made from his body, may live. A rhythm of cyclic recurrence or redoing seems to underlie both the action and telling of myth, as in William Blake's "monomythic" epitome "The Mental Traveller."

Despite the scholarly propensity to allegorize myths to overcome irrationality or contradiction in them, myths are also seen (as by Claude Lévi-Strauss) as originally helping to define, classify, rationalize, and regulate the initiate's and the native's conduct and his or her material world, elements in a tale dividing variously between such polarizations as vital and moribund, safe and lethal, palatable and inedible, pure and defiled, licit and proscribed, sacred and profane, seemly (or comme il faut) and taboo (or transgressive), couth and uncouth, advantageous and detrimental, incorporable and excommunicable. In Francis Bacon's Wisdom of the Ancients, however, myths are not connected backward to the natural cycle and the circulation and supply of food and water but forward to the supply of knowledge: i.e., they are read as protoscientific thinking and conjecture in the poetic, parabolic, and riddling disguise of the cl. gods.

Crit. of myth must mediate between opposed conceptions of a mythic world, in which nearly everything possible to be believed is true, and a mythical one, where those same possibilities are regarded as mainly false, fabulous, and superstitious—the age of their childish miracles, bad science, and old wives' tales being quite past. The rationalization of myth takes two prominent forms. Early in the 18th c., Giambattista Vico asserted that every culture invents its own Hercules, while Euhemerus, in the late 4th c. BCE, believed that myths merely deified the deceased rulers and other prominent and venerable or notorious personages of the historical past ex post facto. From the point of view of the comparative folklorist in the democratic age of the "common man," Vico's observation applies to the promulgation of legendary stories like those of Paul Bunyan and John Henry. Euhemerus's theory, on the other hand, might help explain Bram Stoker's conflation of the vampire myth with the name of Dracula, the patronymic of the 13th-c. Wallachian dynast whose savage practices also earned him the name Vlad the Impaler.

Myth has often been rationalized as encrypted knowledge by reading its fabulous stories as allegories of moral and historical or natural, physical, calendrical, and astronomic phenomena: solar allegories have been particularly popular. They have been found ingeniously dissimulated throughout Odysseus's adventures and likewise in the ursine year cycle for Beowulf's occultations. Although the determination of any given myth's meaning, reference, or original "site-in life" is the somewhat ineffable Holy Grail of myth's mod. study (Mircea Eliade, Cosmos and History [1952]), presumably the more esoteric the significance—psychological, ethnographic, cultural, religious, anthropological, ideological, historical, protoscientific—the more investigators must be initiated into it (Radin) and, thus, themselves become its referent by some reenactment of it.

II. Myth and Metaphor. Following Jacob Grimm's Deutsche Mythologie (1812–15), Max Müller and Adalbert Kuhn traced the origins of mythology to a "disease of language." "Myth," by these lights, substitutes Odysseus's Calypso for solar eclipses and gold-recovering Beowulf (bee hunter) for the ursine seeker of honey. Anglo-Saxon *kennings such as whale-road for sea are condensed metaphors, and an analogous process appears in the constructions of mythical thought: the hyphenation of earth-goddess or sun-god (Helios Hyperion, Phoebus Apollo) or the personification in Mother Nature or Father Time. The connection between myth and metaphor is apparent when Emily Dickinson writes, "The lightning is a yellow fork / from tables in the sky / By inadvertent fingers dropped": the "awful cutlery" once belonged to a sky-god like the Jehovah who sends lightning in Job 38:35 or the earth-shaker Poseidon with his trident. But submitted to philological and etymological study, langs. are themselves revealed as cemeteries of moribund metaphors and lost connections (hospital/hospitality), quasi-mythic links of the pathic kind included: the bowels of the earth, an act of God, a devil of a time, at the height of his powers, fatalities, disasters, dismal (dies malae), influence, etc. Capitalizing on lang.'s natural process but reversing its direction, poetry activates and mythicizes natural objects and phenomena by crediting them with intentions and psychopathies. According to Lucien Lévy-Bruhl's widely accepted theory, indigenous people think participatively, i.e., they do not sharply divide between subject and object. Ernst Cassirer (Mythical Thought) on Mother Earth is instructive: "In Plato's Menexenos, we . . . find it said that it is not the earth which imitates women in conceiving and giving birth but women who imitate the earth. But for the original mythical intuition there is here no before or after, nor first or second, only the complete and indissoluble involvement of the two processes." Amphion's lyre raises cities, and a comparable furor poeticus* aligns the lyre-like cables of Hart Crane's Brooklyn Bridge.

But myth in poetry and story, as in thought, has both a participatory and departicipatory aspect, the first turning on homeopathic and sympathetic operations as found in magical and folkish thinking and practice and the second on these operations' suspension or rejection as a *pathetic fallacy. When the Chorus asks Sophocles' Oedipus what drove him to blind himself, he answers: "It was Apollo, friends, it was Apollo. He brought on these troubles, the awful things I suffer. But the hand which stabbed out my eyes was mine alone." Even the Azande rule out sorcery in suicide.

III. Mythological Tradition. The collecting, recording, cataloguing, and archiving of myth begins with the Vedas, the Homeric Hymn collection, and Hesiod; and it continues in the renarrating of Pausanius, Apollodurus, Plutarch, Ovid, and Hyginus, and in the age of print from Natale Conti right down to the elephants' graveyard of mythic story in William Morris's The Earthly Paradise. Following in med. mythographers' and Giovanni Boccaccio's academic line, a considerable branch of subsequent literary culture in the West has been devoted to the expounding of cl. myths and cults and their symbology in pantheonlike wholes. Often this work of taxis has been governed by a unifying or universalizing thesis, such as Pythagorean doctrine in Ovid, Christian typology in Ovid moralized, sacred kingship and the life-story of the year-spirit in Frazer, and calendrical symbolism in Max Müller (solar) and Robert Graves (lunar).

Thomas Mann said time is the medium of narration, and myths are stories; but if everybody knows them, then the storyteller is deprived of the attention-getting devices of suspense and surprise, which are the product of the dynamic way in which a story is told, by means of a specific, fixed temporal arrangement of incidents and information in relation to evolving states of knowledge—or a plot. Myths can be characterized as "curious" by a cultural outsider; but, being also "timeless," they are not organized around the novelistic or dramaturgical disclosure of a secret episode located in a story's "past" or temporal background—contra the hero's very existence in Oedipus Rex. A variation on the timelessness or static character of myth appears in the myths of historical priority and/or origins: the first human, the first sin, clothes, murder, voyage, evil (Pandora's box), and the variants of absented civilizations (Babel, Atlantis, Utopia), and a lost golden age, time of innocence, or paradisal or antediluvian state.

A. Mythic Story Cycles and Cyclical Stories. Myth's seemingly synoptic or universal nature leads to Joseph Campbell's coinage monomyth for the overall career of the divine or godlike hero. Works such as Robert Graves's The White Goddess and W. B. Yeats's A Vision show individual authors constructing their own monomyth out of the common stock. On the one hand are omnibus-like cycles in which myths agglomerate—e.g., the Mahābhārata, the Volsung saga, etc.—on the other hand, the abbreviated, single-author treatments or reinventions of mythic material in such works as Blake's Four Zoas, John Keats's Endymion, P. B. Shelley's Prometheus Unbound, Richard Wagner's Ring cycle, Henrik Ibsen's Peer Gynt, Thornton Wilder's The Skin of Our Teeth, and J.R.R. Tolkien's Lord of the Rings. The single-author works all seem haunted by tasks of the first half of life found in the mythologem of the hero, whose birth, childhood adventures, and visits to the realm of the dead are sometimes thought to be late in the devel. of any given avatar's or hero's life story: "products of a phase when the hero is passing into myth," according to H. M. and N. K. Chadwick in The Growth of Literature (1940). In mythic plots, birth often betokens rebirth, incl. the regeneration of a given myth. The birth of Rabelais's Dionysian Pantagruel, e.g., can symbolize the advent of the Ren. itself—with its "myth of learning's rebirth."

The monomyth's most salient feature, in Campbell's Frobenius-influenced version of it ("separation-initiation-return"), is the mythicized hero's otherworld or underworld quest-journey (interior or distant) for the sake of unrevealed knowledge, esp. that of death or the afterlife; as found in the Epic of Gilgamesh, Orphic underworld visits in Roman narratives, the pilgrimage in Dante's Divina commedia, the Menippean lunar journey of Ludovico Ariosto's Astolfo, Edmund Spenser's Guyon's three days in Mammon's Plutonian Cave, John Milton's Satan traversing Chaos in Paradise Lost, the descent of J. W. Goethe's Faust to "the Mothers," Marlow's passage up the Congo in Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness, and Bloom's visit to Nighttown in Joyce's Ulysses. On the female side—anciently that of the Sumerian goddess Inanna—mod. yet Inanna-like examples are Jean Cocteau's movie of Beauty and the Beast and, more obliquely, James Agee's short story "A Mother's Tale."

The most important myth in the lit. of the Middle Ages is that of Christ's harrowing of hell, as found in Dante and William Langland and on many church walls; it has, of course, both cl. antecedents and Ren. successors. E.g., the late med. prose Ovid Moralisé explains Perseus as Christ, Andromeda as Eve, the sea monster as the gulf of hell, the espoused bride as Holy Church, and the marriage feast as paradise. This approximates Spenser's allegorical St. George legend, which begins with the Redcrosse Knight escaping the Laocoön-like coils of a monstrous Error, who has stabled and whelped deep in the selva oscura of a wandering wood.

B. Mythic Templates. Like the fable or ground plot in Ren. theories of fiction, a mythical analogate can function in Ren. poetry as an internalized blueprint or the skeletal or structural armature around which a sculpture gets molded: Apollo's enfance (infancy; from Gr. hymns and choruses) in Milton's Nativity ode (see NATIVITY POEM), or the Mediterranean Adonis-lament (as inherited by Virgil's "Daphnis" and Luigi Alamanni's first *eclogue) in the same poet's pastoral *elegy "Lycidas." The cl. myth of Proserpina, which illustrates and embodies, by means of an explanatory fable, the annual polarization of seasonal change by the death and rebirth of vegetation, flowering and going to seed, when taken with the comparable Adonis myth, informs Spenser's interlaced tales of Florimell and Marinell, with his Proteus standing in for Old Man Winter. In Milton's Paradise Lost, Adam and Eve's courtship and congress are hedged with allusions to Echo and Narcissus, Daphne and Apollo, Helen and Paris, Dido and Aeneas, and Zeus and Hera—plus the poet's own mythic prodigies Sin and Death. While the primal scene of our first parents' pairing reverses the moral tenor and immediate outcome of the others cited (i.e., delusion and drowning, erotic frustration, marital breakdown, the Punic Wars, wifely deception, and incestuous rape), it is nonetheless gendered along the ominous lines of the myths and tales it departs from.

The Enlightenment's dismissals of myth as an archaic, primitive, childish, irrational kind of magical thinking are somewhat contradicted by the views of J. G. Herder, who saw myth as an essential part of the inherited code of any culture, no less expressive of its genius than lang., customs, beliefs, and poetry: understanding any nation's or gens' character required immersion in its mythology. Artistic and revisionary re-creations of myths, esp. in poetry, from Herder's time on, likewise react to the Enlightenment view. We find the literary redeployment and reassertion of myth in major individual authors as themselves mythmakers: Fall and Gnostic myths in Blake's "prophecies," the Prometheus myth in Shelley's "unbound" drama and Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, Don Juan's myth of the seducer in Lord Byron's epic jeu d'esprit and G. B. Shaw's protofeminist play, the rescripted compact of Faust's myth in Goethe's masterwork, and the Sinaitic revelation in Friedrich Nietzsche's Thus Spoke Zarathustra. These more mod. treatments revise their heroes' stories under the inspiration and pressure of unprecedented historical changes. Traditionally, myths endow supernatural agents with powers that humankind lacks yet has since acquired; thus, Prometheus's theft of fire is as crucial for the industrializing era as the technological myth of Daedalus may prove for ours. James Joyce's would-be writer Stephen Dedalus, pursuing arts, escaped from an island to a continent. Within six months of the fictive date of Stephen's Icarian descent in Ulysses, the Wright brothers had achieved flight, and humankind had begun to slip the surly bonds of earth on wings of its own manufacture.

IV. "The Mythical Method" in High Modernism. When cross-referenced with either a realistic or contemp. alternative, an older myth accommodates a two-way traffic: a legendary story can be demythicized by a mod. or historicizing treatment of it, but it can also be reinstated this way, by allusions to it as governing precedent and archetype. In Yeats's "Leda and the Swan," Leda's mythic rape and impregnation recasts Luke 1:35: "The power of the Highest shall overshadow thee." In the same poet's "The Second Coming," the migration of the unborn, sphinxlike "rough beast" to the site of the Nativity reanimates Matt. 2:15: "Out of Egypt have I called my son" (followed by "Then Herod . . . slew all the children that were in Bethlehem"). Each of Yeats's poems ends with a rhetorical question addressing the re-aborning myth of the Annunciation: one that violently un-begins Christian hist.

In "'Ulysses,' Order and Myth" (1923), T. S. Eliot called attention to both Yeats and the literary impact of The Golden Bough in his influential notice of "the mythical method" of Joyce's Ulysses. Eliot's declaration that "instead of narrative method, we may now use the mythical method" might also be applied to the poetics of Joyce's Finnegans Wake. The satirical hash resulting from the multiple crossovers among mythic, historic, and more local parallels in that work, as continuously afforded by the unprecedented lexical density of its puns, portmanteau words, polyvocality, and running fantasia of the unconscious, seems appropriate to a scandalous story that is also a garbled one—one way of understanding myths themselves. Closer to Eliot's method in The Waste Land, Ezra Pound's Cantos 39 and 47 shore lyric fragments of mythic and Frazer-like rites of spring against the ruins of an Odyssean cultural peripatetic. "[B]earing the golden bough of Argicida" (Argus-killer) at the end of Canto 1, Pound's *persona presents his Frazerian passport to a land of the dead—the poem's archival bricolage of texts, myths, cultures, and historical records. Cubism and related movements brought the abstract geometry underlying visual art into prominent view, and high modernist literary practice gave an analogous prominence to the mythic elements underlying the arts of literature.

V. Mythological Allusion. Older lit. lacks a firm distinction between itself and the retailing of myths, legends, and tales of humans patronized by gods or performing superhuman or miraculous acts. Newer lit. does not necessarily dispense with a mythical story, but it does tend to exploit or capitalize on ironic differentia. Shakespeare's Hotspur, or Percy, is a warrior and a horseman, his names suggesting he's "hot as Perseus" and as bent on rescuing a gorgonion-like honor from drowning in the deep. But his mythical identification with March-Mars finds him competing to distinguish himself from his princely rival Hal, who is figuratively mounted, with the Ren. Perseus, on Pegasus, as a May-Mercury. These mythic twins prove one too many to occupy the same sphere. More ironic authors may well disavow such comparisons, even while covertly bruiting them: "He was not the hero descending from heaven bright-sworded to smite a woman's fetters off her limbs and deliver her from the yawning mouth-abyss," George Meredith reports of Vernon Whitford, the eventual rescuer of Clara Middleton from an unwanted engagement to marry The Egoist's title character—who is a kind of monster in human disguise, as Sir Willoughby Patterne. But Patterne's name and story encrypt the villain of the cold pastoral locked into the story on willow-pattern china. Myths are patterns.

More recent mytho-heroic identifications have obviously made a mod.-day comeback, esp. in crit.: the art critic Robert Hughes, when he was a reviewer for Time, once identified Mick Jagger performing in a gap-ridden bodysuit as the Apollo-skinned Marsyas, and he recognized a pitiless Mithraic sun fixed over a tragic bullring in the lightbulb hanging over the fallen swordsman in Picasso's Guernica. The annual rite in which an American president spares a Thanksgiving turkey renews, mythically speaking, Pilate's release of Barabbas ("Son of the Father") to the people: a NT scenario that recreated the original scapegoat ritual from the OT.

Such artful mythological allusions have often been indistinguishable from the very substance of a *lyric poem, as in Petrarch's *sonnets depending on his protracted reference to Laura worshipped as Apollo's sacred tree. R. M. Rilke's sequence Sonnets to Orpheus locates the title character's Sagenkreis (1.20) in the aesthetic, perceptive, and sensual receptivities that survive, reembody, and hallow Orpheus's existence in the poet's own psyche, despite his living in the age of machines: like "the singular twig that instead of breaking bends itself into a lyre" (1.17) or the transformed Daphne that "feels laurel" and wants the pursuing Apollo to turn into the breeze (2.12)—or the breath of praise (Lat. laurus)—passing through her leaves as if through the text's own pages. Rilke thus revisits Europe's most celebrated sonneteer's principal mythic allusion and shows poetry's eloquent recuperation of the old gods while approaching a virtual theophany. Whether a myth is implanted subliminally or acknowledged in full flourish, its presence is conservative, implicitly and inevitably perpetuating "reverence for the archetype" (Herman Melville, "Greek Architecture")—even where ingenious mythopoeia is at work recasting and reenshrining our deepest intuitions, apprehensions, and customary practices in more local habitations and newly evocative names.

■ O. Rank, The Myth of the Birth of the Hero, trans. F. Robbins and S. E. Jeliffe (1914); L. Lévy-Bruhl, How Natives Think, trans. L. A. Clare (1926); M. Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934); F. M. Cornford, The Origin of Attic Comedy (1934); J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough, 3d ed., 12 v. (1905–15); P. Radin, Primitive Religion: Its Nature and Origins (1937); J. Seznec, The Survival of the Pagan Gods: The Mythological Tradition and its Place in Renaissance Humanism and Art, trans. B. F. Sessions (1953); E. Cassirer, Mythical Thought, v. 2 of The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, trans. R. Manheim (1955); Myth: A Symposium, ed. T. Sebeok (1958); D. Bush, Mythology and the Renaissance Tradition in English Poetry, new rev. ed. (1963); C. Lévi-Strauss, The Savage Mind (1966); N. Frye, "Literature and Myth," Relations of Literary Study, ed. J. E. Thorpe (1967); Myth and Cosmos: Readings in Mythology and Symbolism, ed. J. Middleton (1967); D. Bush, Mythology and the Romantic Tradition in English Poetry, 2d ed. (1969); The Rise of Modern Mythology, 1680–1860, ed. B. Feldman and R. D. Richardson (1972); F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic (1973); M. Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion, trans. R. Sheed (1974); J. Campbell, The Masks of God, 4 v. (1976); H. Blumenberg, Work on Myth, trans. R. M. Wallace (1985); Jung on Mythology, ed. R. M. Segal (1995); The Myth and Ritual Theory, ed. R. M. Segal (1998); N. Conti, Mythologiae, trans. J. Mulryan and S. Brown (2006).

J. Nohrnberg

N

NAHUATL, POETRY OF. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE.

NAÏVE-SENTIMENTAL. An antinomy developed by Friedrich Schiller in the last of his aesthetic philosophical essays, "Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung" (1795–96). The naïve was already an established category, having been treated recently by Moses Mendelssohn, Denis Diderot, J. G. Sulzer, and Immanuel Kant, but by opposing it to the sentimental, Schiller insisted on the relative or perspectival character of both conceptions. The natural becomes naïve only when it is contrasted with art or artifice. The naïve is, thus, a moral, not an aesthetic, pleasure (as Kant defined the terms) since it is mediated by a concept. In the first installment of Schiller's essay, the naïve seems closer to the sentimental than to traditional ideas of the naïve, in effect because he focuses on our interest in the naïve, not on how things would seem to a naïve poet. The difference is that, viewed as naïve, *nature puts art to shame, while from the sentimental perspective (which is only introduced in later installments), artificiality and culture have a value of their own that compensates for a loss of naturalness. When Schiller in the first installment contrasts the Greeks, who felt or experienced naturally, to the moderns, who experience nature, offering Werther's response to Homer as an example, it is an instance of being moved by the naïve, but it is not what Schiller means by sentimental.

When he comes to contrast naïve and sentimental types of poets, Schiller levels his conception of naïve, as in this statement: the naïve poet is nature, while the sentimental poet seeks it. This has led to a common reductive understanding of his intentions in drawing the contrast. He did not characterize J. W. Goethe as a naïve poet in the sense Homer was (or is now for us) but as a mod. poet drawn to imitate the manner if not the mentality of the Greeks, in contrast to his own poetic stance, which acknowledges the reflective break with nature and the resulting mod. tension between feelings and principles but which seeks its strength in that tension and in the "abstract" ideas and ideals that perpetuate it (see his letters to Goethe, Aug. 23, 1794; to Wilhelm von Humboldt, Oct. 26, 1795; and to J. G. Herder, Nov. 4, 1795). In a later installment of the essay, Schiller remarks that in much of Sorrows of Young Werther, Tasso, Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, and in the first part of Faust, Goethe is clearly a sentimental poet. Given Schiller's complex and changing devel. of these ideas, it was perhaps inevitable that their influence would proceed from a reduced version. His comments on *genius as a property of the naïve resonated throughout *romanticism, while on a deeper level his (scrupulously qualified) contrast of the cultural situations of the cl. (Gr. but not Roman) and the mod. poet subsequently proved important for Friedrich Hölderlin, K.W.F. Schlegel, A. W. Schlegel, G.W.F. Hegel, Matthew Arnold, and others. The essay has received recent attention as an early definition of das Moderne (Hinderer), yet Sharpe concludes a review of the critical reception of Schiller's aesthetics saying this last essay is "still a neglected work," and this holds true.

See PRIMITIVISM, ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS, SENTIMENTALITY.

■ U. Gaede, Schillers Abhandlung "Ueber naive und sentimentalische Dichtung" (1899); H. Meng, Schillers Abhandlung ueber naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1936); H. Cysarz, "Naive und sentimentalische Dichtung," Reallexikon II; O. Sayce, "Das Problem der Vieldeutigkeit in Schillers Ästhetischer Terminologie," Jahrbuch der deutschen Schillergesellschaft, ed. F. Martini, W. Muëller-Seidel, and B. Zeller (1962); H. Jäger, Naïvität (1975); H. Koopmann, Friedrich Schiller, v. 2 (1977)—overview of the secondary lit.; L. Sharpe, Schiller's Aesthetic Essays: Two Centuries of Criticism (1995); W. Hinderer, "Schiller's Philosophical Aesthetics," A Companion to the Works of Friedrich Schiller, ed. S. D. Martinson (2005).

J. BARNOUW

NARRATIVE POETRY

I. History
II. Poetic Form and Narrative Poetry
III. Criticism

Narrative turns the raw material of story—the "telling" of a concatenation of events unfolding in linear time—into a (more or less) artful organization of those events that may complicate their chronology, suggest their significance, emphasize their affect, or invite their interpretation. Narrative poetry heightens this process by framing the act of telling in the rhythmically and sonically constructed lang. of verse. Although particularly monumental and foundational works from many cultures (e.g., the Mesopotamian Epic of Gilgamesh, the Sanskrit Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaṇa, the Homeric epics, the OE Beowulf, the MHG Nibelungenlied) and certain poetic genres (e.g., *epic, metrical *romance, *ballad) are particularly associated with narrative poetry, poetic narrative is a capacious category and also embraces beast *fable, *satire, the dramatic *monologue, reflective spiritual autobiography (e.g., William Wordsworth's The Prelude), allegorical anatomy (Roman de la Rose, Piers Plowman), some elegies (e.g., Walt Whitman's "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd" and G. M. Hopkins's "The Wreck of the Deutschland"), and, albeit in fragmented or subverted form, the modernist *lyric sequences of Hart Crane, T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, and W. C. Williams (see LONG POEM). Furthermore, the boundaries between narrative and lyric verse are always fungible: poems usually classified as *lyric may supply a significant amount of narrative context for an act of reflection unfolding in arrested time (as in the work of Elizabeth Bishop, Robert Lowell, and Seamus Heaney).

Although theories of narrative tend to focus primarily, if not exclusively, on the novel, narrative poems vigorously exploit and in many cases anticipate the literary practices we find in sophisticated prose fictions. Traditional ballads like "Tam Lin" often make telling use of *ellipsis and parataxis (see HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS). The late 14th-c. alliterative romance Sir Gawain and the Green Knight interlaces and eventually fuses its multiple plot motifs with great elegance and power. Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde presents its characters with a degree of verisimilitude and a detailed attention to their physical surroundings and speech that has provoked some readers to praise its "novelistic" qualities. The epic narrative of John Milton's Paradise Lost elaborately reorders linear chronology and interrupts narrative sequence with prolepsis and flashback. Robert Browning's well-known dramatic monologue "My Last Duchess" makes use of a framed narration and an unreliable narrator. Many of Robert Frost's narrative poems advance action and develop character through the careful unfolding of dialogue.

The heightened, ordered lang. of pre-20th-c. narrative poetry does mean, however, that the illusion of transparent representation of experience so valued in the realist novel will be adumbrated by the visible and sometimes elaborate *artifice of poetic form. Indeed, major narrative poems become the occasion for the invention of new stanzaic vehicles, fresh rooms for the creation of a particular imaginative universe (e.g., the nine-line stanza developed by Edmund Spenser for The Faerie Queene, the terza rima* of Dante's Divina commedia, and the sonnet-like stanzas of Alexander Pushkin's Evgenij Onegin). Complex internal patterning can produce its own order of *mimesis: the evocation of a particular kind of experience may be achieved through metrical design or the structures of rhyme (as we see in the use of *enjambment and *caesura to organize meaning across Milton's blank verse paragraphs or in the deployment of Chaucer's hypnotic repetition and recontextualization of semantically loaded rhyme pairs—routhe / trouthe, herte / smerte, Troye / joye—across the narrative arc of Troilus and Criseyde). Poetic fictions can, moreover, draw on the dynamics of lyric to interrupt linear narrative drive, sometimes offering pauses, reflection, and dilation by way of a shift in the genre of represented utterance (e.g., the elegiac digressions within the later stages of Beowulf), sometimes embedding songs within the action (as in Alfred, Lord Tennyson's The Princess), sometimes by way of a larger hybridization produced by the fusion of "lyric" and "narrative" (or synchronic and diachronic) possibility.

I. History. The hist. of narrative poetry suggests that different poetic modes speak to the needs of particular historical moments; at the same time, it is one of perpetual return as genres are reclaimed and revised. In preliterate cultures, the protocols of orally composed poetry—formulaic diction, the rhythmic patterning of elevated utterance, the deployment of traditional themes and episodes—help to bind and fix important narratives: stories of origin (etiologies, theodicies, genealogies), cultural hists., hero tales, national myth. Homeric epic also foregrounds, in the Odyssey, the narrative capacity of the individual as well as the tale of the tribe: Odysseus, the man of many turns and many stories, repeatedly refashions himself in narrative. The later hist. of epic reveals that monumental poetic acts of storytelling are always in dialogue with other narrative poems. Virgil's Aeneid (29–19 BCE) adapts Homeric epic to celebrate the values of Augustan Rome; his appropriation of Homer's characters and his repositioning of Trojan refugees as the founders of his own city fuse the wars of the Iliad and the wanderings of the Odyssey within a single work that translates the Homeric warrior code into the civic duty and stoicism of the virtuous Aeneas. The Aeneid discloses, furthermore, the time-bending capacity of poetic narrative: the Trojan past and the events of Virgil's own historical moment are folded into the struggles of his hero.

Ovid's Metamorphoses (1–8 CE) reimagines epic, inserting idiosyncratic and selective coverage of events from the Iliad, Odyssey, and Aeneid in books 12–14 of its ambitious compendium of myth and hist. The work's narrative technique is strikingly inventive and even experimental, incl. complex framings of embedded episodes and acts of internal storytelling, formal virtuosity (as in the phrases reflecting across line endings in book 3's account of Narcissus at the pond), and stylistic play (extending at times into *parody, as in the hyperbolic pastoral lyric of the giant Polyphemus).

The vernacular long poems of the Eur. Middle Ages include heroic narratives (e.g., the Chanson de Roland and the Poema del Cid) but more notably fuse chivalric and courtly ideals in the romances that flourished in the wake of Chrétien de Troyes's 12th-c. Arthurian narratives, whose octosyllabic rhymed *couplets frame courtly dialogue and explorations of interiority as well as knightly adventure. Romance slides toward lyric in the Lais of Chrétien's near-contemporary, Marie de France, whose tales include short evocative mood pieces (e.g., Chevrefoil). In Eng., the author of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight demonstrates the power of sophisticated alliterative verse to frame a quest narrative that is also a moral journey, although it is metrical romance (King Horn, Sir Orfeo, The Squire of Low Degree) that constitutes the predominant popular narrative mode. Chaucer's late 14th-c. narrative poems are remarkable for their modal range (they include *fabliaux, *dream visions, saint's lives, beast fables, Ovidian adaptations, the sophisticated romance of the aforementioned Troilus and Criseyde), and the lively frame of the storytelling competition between the pilgrims of the Canterbury Tales embraces numerous carefully imagined alternative narrators who variously present their tales in protoheroic couplets or formal stanzas.

The most ambitious experiments of med. narrative poetry are notably evident in Italy. Dante's Commedia (written 1307–21) offers religious epic focused through a first-person narrator; his introduction of Virgil as the narrator's guide through hell and purgatory puts his work in quite literal conversation with cl. epic. The recursive rhymes of the Commedia's terza rima afford a particularly striking medium for the descriptive, meditative, and visionary passages that interweave its protagonist's three-part journey. The innovative lyric sequence of Dante's near-contemporary. Petrarch, the Canzoniere, while not strictly a narrative project, demonstrates the potential for a congeries of lyric moments to provoke or suggest a narrative dynamic; subsequent lyric sequences (most notoriously Shakespeare's Sonnets) have continued to provoke narrative interpretation.

The great narrative poems of the Ren. fuse multiple genres even as they stake their claims for vernacular national poetries. Ludovico Ariosto's Orlando furioso (1516) and Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata (1581) interlace erotic quests with heroic matter, and Ariosto marshals a striking mixture of tones in his cheerfully errant and digressive storytelling. Both use the intricate ottava rima* stanza developed by Giovanni Boccaccio in his Teseida and Il Filostrato two centuries previously. Spenser's The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596) complicates epic-romance with sophisticated allegorical anatomy; although influenced by Ariosto, the author replaces ottava rima with his own nine-line stanza. The Faerie Queene's mythopoesis often draws on and revises the Metamorphoses; lighter ventures into Ovidianism appear in the shorter *epyllion (or "short epic") form, most notably Christopher Marlowe's Hero and Leander (1593) and Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis (1593). Marlowe's poem offers a striking example of the narrative possibilities of the *heroic couplet, not only in its passages of rapid action but also in elaborate rhetorical set pieces and ekphrastic digressions.

Milton's Paradise Lost (1667, 1674) breaks with what he termed the "bondage" of rhyme and offers the first Eng. blank-verse epic. In the poet's ambitious retelling of the origins of the human condition, lengthy *verse paragraphs elaborate meaning and complicate the sequential unfolding of thought through sustained enjambment, mirroring on the small scale the work's challenging representation of a timeline that encompasses both genesis and apocalypse. In the century after Milton, the long satirical narratives and *mock epics of John Dryden and Alexander Pope eschew *blank verse in favor of the more aphoristic possibilities of the heroic couplet; in the later 18th c., George Crabbe discloses the quieter and more naturalistic capacities of that particular form in the rural narratives of The Village (1783).

The romantics appropriate and revise the blank-verse epic (most obviously in the spiritual autobiography of Wordsworth's The Prelude [1805, pub. 1850], although Wordsworth also employs blank verse in shorter narrative works such as "Michael"). Their poetry also reworks other narrative forms. The traditional ballad's effective use of simple, charged diction, minimalist but telling description, and a narrative dynamic heavily reliant on repetition with variation had attracted more literary treatments in earlier centuries (e.g., in Walter Ralegh's "Walsingham"); the very title of Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge's Lyrical Ballads (1798) suggests an interest in appropriating the form in a more reflective manner (both Wordsworth and Coleridge experiment with a more dilatory six-line stanza in, e.g., the former's "The Idiot Boy" and the latter's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner). Elsewhere, John Keats's use of an abbreviated final line in the quatrains of "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (1820) modifies the conventional ballad stanza to create a powerful sense of loss, diminishment, and melancholy.

Keats borrows the recursive *Spenserian stanza for the leisurely sensuous romance narrative of "The Eve of St. Agnes" (1820); Lord Byron deploys its capacity for digression and interruption to very different effect in his satirical epic Don Juan (1819–24). As the 19th c. unfolds, a continuing interest in the long narrative poem diverges, on the one hand, into nostalgia and neomedievalism (Tennyson's Idylls of the King, the poems of D. G. Rossetti, and, eventually, W. B. Yeats's Celtic mythologies) and, on the other, into something not dissimilar to the verisimilitude of the realist novel. Pushkin's Evgenij Onegin (1825–32) makes a complex and artful stanzaic form the vehicle for representing colloquial description and dialogue and reflections on contemp. life (see ONEGIN STANZA). Robert Browning's multipart blank-verse narrative The Ring and the Book (1868–69) brings together a sequence of idiosyncratic dramatic monologues retracing the same set of events in Ren. Italy; Elizabeth Barrett Browning's account of the travails of a female artist in Aurora Leigh (1856) offers a contemp. blank-verse Bildungsroman. George Meredith's Modern Love (1862) co-opts the lyric sequence for quasi-novelistic purposes. Moving into the 20th c., one finds a sparser, starker version of romantic blank-verse narrative in the snapshot rural narratives (e.g., "The Death of the Hired Man," "Home Burial") of Robert Frost's North of Boston collection (1914).

With the particular valorization of the lyric (and the lyric sequence) in the 20th c., poetic storytelling tends to fall out of favor and becomes associated with middlebrow "parlor poetry" (like some of the highly recitable works of Rudyard Kipling and H. W. Longfellow) or with the Victorian *light verse of Lewis Carroll and W. S. Gilbert. Its early 20th-c. exponents are little read, although they too can revisit older modes, as in John Masefield's beast fable Reynard the Fox (1919) or G. K. Chesterton's melodramatic take on Ren. heroic poetry in "Lepanto" (1911). Narrative poetry does not, however, disappear. The accessible vignettes of Edgar Lee Masters's Spoon River Anthology (1916) have a more sophisticated modernist counterpart in Melvin B. Tolson's lyric sequence Harlem Gallery (1965). T. S. Eliot's structural use of the Grail quest myth and his fragmentary and fragmented quotation of earlier narrative poetry and familiar forms (dramatic blank verse, the narrative quatrain) in The Waste Land (1922) work in tension with the ellipses and discontinuities of a poem that keeps entertaining narrative possibilities only to frustrate them.

The ballad has continued to attract mod. and contemp. practitioners (see, e.g., W. H. Auden's "As I Walked Out One Evening" and Dudley Randall's "Ballad of Birmingham"). An almost Ovidian interest in rewriting old stories in new terms characterizes the work of Carol Ann Duffy ("Mrs. Midas," "Little Red Cap"). The Caribbean poet Derek Walcott's expansive postcolonial epic Omeros (1990), composed in a modified version of terza rima, embraces extended allusions to Homeric and Dantean journeyings (and exiles) as it both retraces the horrors of the middle passage and slides into metapoetic reflections. Rather less monumentally, Vikram Seth's The Golden Gate (1986) attempts a Pushkinesque narrative in tetrameter sonnets set in contemp. California. Narrative poetry has been championed by some New Formalists (such as Annie Finch and Mark Jarman—see NEW FORMALISM), but less conservative artists have also worked in this territory. The experimentalist Ronald Johnson creates a new story by selectively erasing much of the text of the first four books of Paradise Lost in RADI-OS OI-OIV (1976); the classicist Anne Carson offers a postmod. spin on the Geryon/Hercules myth in Autobiography of Red (1998); Lyn Hejinian's at once highly structured and paratactic sequence of prose poems My Life (1980–87) might be seen as a contemp. (and differently gendered) response to The Prelude.

II. Poetic Form and Narrative Poetry. In narrative poetry, the resources of poetic form have always been thoroughly entangled with the fiction-making process. At the conclusion of each long stanza of alliterating lines in Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, an isolated line with a single stress is followed by a rhymed quatrain, and this five-line *bob and wheel presents new information in a particularly emphatic manner. A stanza detailing the hero's lonely quest is followed by the miniature line "al one" (all alone), whose very isolation emphasizes the protagonist's condition; after an extended description of the alien warrior who invades King Arthur's court, the information that he is not only mysterious but entirely green is delayed to the final emphatic rhyme word of the quatrain. The wandering romance narratives and perpetual self-complication of Spenser's Faerie Queene are complemented by its stanzaic design whose ababbcbcc rhyme scheme encourages recapitulation, a small-scale doubling back that augments or reexamines what has already been said; at the same time, Spenser's switch from iambic pentameter to a longer *alexandrine in the ninth lines of each stanza produces repeated (and repeatedly superseded) moments of summary, gloss, or provisional closure that complement the larger narrative's own insistent swerves from any final ending. Spenser's additional predilection for allowing sonic effects to heighten narrative action is evident in the following description of his Red Cross Knight's encounter with the female monster Errour:

> Yet kindling rage, her selfe she gathered round,
> And all attonce her beastly body raizd
> With doubled forces high above the ground:
> Tho wrapping up her wrethéd sterne arownd,
> Lept fierce upon his shield, and her huge traine
> All suddenly about his body wound

The repeated rhymes on "wound" encourage the stanza to wind about the reader even as the monster entangles the knight.

Repetition with variation, a favorite strategy of both the traditional and the literary ballad, can be deployed with powerful narrative force. In "She Moved through the Fair," a poignant folk lyric collected by the Ir. poet Padraic Colum, the words of the narrator's lost beloved, "It will not be long, love, / 'Til our wedding day," take on a quite different meaning when, as a ghost, she reiterates her promise in the work's concluding stanza. In The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, Coleridge's occasional expansion of the traditional four-line stanza into six lines, repeating with minimal variation the fourth line in the sixth, enhances the obsessive and incantatory nature of the tale told by the Mariner to the Wedding Guest. Meter can also powerfully shape narrative tone and mood: in Christina Rossetti's Goblin Market (1862), the steady accretion of lines beginning with trochaic and dactylic feet not only emphasizes the feverish quality of the fable but heightens, in its climactic stanzas, the assault on all the senses endured by its heroine. G. M. Hopkins's innovative *sprung rhythm in "The Wreck of the Deutschland" (1918) evokes the turbulence and uncertainty of tempest and shipwreck.

Narrative poems in rhymed couplets offer in each rhyme's completion temporary gestures toward containment and *closure that may operate in tension with the forward drive of plot and foster the witty and epigrammatic quality of poets as disparate as Chaucer, Marlowe, and Pope. In satiric narrative, they can also offer exquisitely controlled moments of comic *anticlimax, as in the following from Pope's Rape of the Lock (1714): "The skilful nymph reviews her force with care / 'Let spades be trumps!' she said, and trumps they were." (Wilfred Owen's World War I dream narrative "Strange Meeting" [1918] poignantly unbalances the confident pace of couplet narrative in its employment of half- and slant rhymes throughout.) Blank-verse narrative removes sonic closure, and its enjambments can open up line endings to a powerful sense of semantic uncertainty, vigorously exploited by Milton in Paradise Lost, whose extended and flexible verse paragraphs regularly qualify meaning and create surprise, as in the retrospective reinflection of the word "merit" by the enjambed line that follows in the poet's description of how, in imperial splendor,

> Satan exalted sat, by merit raised
> To that bad eminence.

The mere absence of rhyme does not preclude, of course, the heightened effects of poetic diction and meter: in the following description of Satan's voyage through Chaos, the accumulation of monosyllables and *spondees in the second and third lines and the pounding *iambs that place strong stress on verbs of movement in the fourth powerfully evoke a laborious, scrabbling, almost animal journeying:

. . .the Fiend
O'er bog or steep, through strait, rough, dense, or rare,
With head, hands, wings, or feet pursues his way,
And swims or sinks, or wades or creeps or flies.

The deployment of strong caesurae in both blank and rhymed verse also contributes to strong narrative effects; a metrical pause can allow discourse to change direction or create a space for the reader to fill. Browning uses these tactics simultaneously when the murderous narrator of "My Last Duchess" offers self-revelation at the very moment that he swerves from full confession:

I gave commands;
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below.

Narrative poetry can, furthermore, deploy the resources of *typography to reinforce the work of form in shaping the unfolding of a fiction. In Frost's "Death of the Hired Man," a final *split line packs a climactic punch:

"Warren?" she questioned.
"Dead," was all he answered.

In Eliot's The Waste Land, by contrast, typography repeatedly shatters the formal containment of putative plot: teasing fragments of narrative are interrupted by white space; new beginnings or fruitless returns erupt out of nowhere.

III. Criticism. Little critical work has focused specifically on narrative poetry, although the critical taxonomies and terminologies developed by narrative theorists such as Chatman, Genette, and Ricoeur may be usefully applied to narrative in verse. This is, to a large extent, the result of a critical tendency to rely on a poetry/prose binary that reduces poetry to lyric and elides the presence and work of poetic narrative; the influential stylistic poetics of Jakobson, e.g., associates epic with the "metonymical" capacity of prose fiction as opposed to the "metaphoric" nature of lyric. Scholes, Kellogg, and Phelan's The Nature of Narrative pays more sustained attention to narrative poetry than any other work in this field, although the authors' interest in the historical develop. of narratives allows relatively little space for discussion of the particular shaping capacities of poetic form. Among crit. not strictly aimed at narrative poetry, McHugh's rich essay on the linear unfolding of meaning in lyric and the pivotal force of the line ending in "making and breaking" sense might be equally well applied to the workings of narrative poetry. Among works on particular narrative poets or particular narrative genres, the crit. of Boitani (on med. poetic narrative), Greene (on the epic trad.), Berger (on Spenser's Faerie Queene), Crosman (on Milton's Paradise Lost), Fischer (on romantic verse narratives), and Tucker (on the Victorian *long poem) offer particularly useful insights.

See DRAMATIC POETRY; FICTION, POETRY AS; MEDIEVAL ROMANCE; ORAL POETRY.

■ R. Jakobson, "Linguistics and Poetics," Style in Language, ed. T.A. Sebeok (1960); T. M. Greene, The Descent from Heaven: A Study in Epic Continuity (1963); F. Kermode, The Sense of an Ending (1967); S. Chatman, Story and Discourse: Narrative Structure in Fiction and Film (1978); R. Crosman, Reading "Paradise Lost" (1980); G. Genette, Narrative Discourse, trans. J. Lewin (1980); F. G. Andersen, O. Holzapfel, and T. Pettitt, The Ballad as Narrative (1982); P. Boitani, English Medieval Narrative in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries, trans. J. K. Hall (1982); The Oxford Book of Narrative Verse, ed. I. Opie and P. Opie (1983); P. Ricoeur, Time and Narrative, trans. K. McLaughlin and D. Pellauer (1984); H. Berger Jr., Revisionary Play: Studies in the Spenserian Dynamic (1988) P. Zumthor, Oral Poetry, trans. K. Murphy-Judy (1990); H. Fischer, Romantic Verse Narrative (1991); C. R. Kinney, Strategies of Poetic Narrative: Chaucer, Spenser, Milton, Eliot (1992); H. McHugh, "Moving Means, Meaning Moves: Notes on Lyric Destination," Poets Teaching Poets, ed. G. Orr and E. B. Voigt (1996); After New Formalism: Poets on Form, Narrative and Tradition, ed. A. Finch (1999); N. Roberts, Narrative and Voice in Postwar Poetry (1999); P. Cobley, Narrative (2001); R. Scholes, R. Kellogg, and J. Phelan, The Nature of Narrative, 2d ed. (2006); H. F. Tucker, Epic: Britain's Heroic Muse, 1790–1910 (2008).

C. R. KINNEY

NARRATOR. See PERSONA; VOICE.

NATIONAL POETRY. Although poetry as a form of human expression is ancient, national poetry is a mod. phenomenon, a product of nationalism and the institutionalization of lit. It manifests two different conceptions of sovereignty, that of a people as a unique ethnic group and that of lit. as a discrete aesthetic category. In order to understand national poetry, therefore, we have to grasp these two mod. forces: the will to unite an ethnic group and endow it with political independence and the impulse to create an autonomous lit. to express the new national reality.

While the Epic of Gilgamesh, the verses of Sappho, or Aztec poetry were composed and rooted in their respective langs. and societies, they were neither considered a reflection of their cultures nor regarded as autonomous aesthetic artifacts. National poetry, on the other hand, is a paradoxical entity, both a self-conscious aesthetic form and a participant in social life.

Nationalism arose as a powerful ideology in Europe during the latter part of the 18th and early 19th cs. A complex manifestation of social, political, cultural, and economic factors, nationalism molded ancient ethnicities into mod. nations. Although people had always organized themselves into separate groups, dividing those inside from those outside, nationalism gave this tendency a political foundation. In other words, nationalism politicized the human practice of distinguishing the self from the other, making ethnicity the basis for self-government. It made culture, the identity of the ethnic group, the foundation of the new state, bringing about a marriage between culture and politics, nation and state.

This new nation-state was to have its own apparatus (e.g., army, bureaucracy, borders) and symbols (lang., flag, *anthem). Lit. emerged as one of the most characteristic signs of the nation, both giving voice to and promoting national uniqueness. Literary figures were often determined supporters of national independence and in some cases became political figures. The rise of national lit. demonstrates the public nature of poetry—that it partakes in the daily life of the community.

This could only have taken place because lit. itself was gradually emerging as a partitioned phenomenon, manifesting a far grander process of social compartmentalization or what sociologists refer to as functional differentiation—the division of society into separate spheres of human activity such as the economy, culture, law, medicine, and so on. Lit., in other words, was taking shape as an institution unto itself, with its own regulations (to separate "good" from "bad" writing, the high from the low), social sites (publishing houses, newspaper book reviews, university curricula), and modes of consumption (leisure, serious, academic, and pedagogic reading). Residing within the greater institution of art, lit. was constituted by the *genres of poetry, the novel, short stories, drama, and nonfiction and necessitated a particular way of interpreting texts, both oral and written. In short, it unified diverse types of texts and of approaches.

Thereafter, poetry would belong to this institution of lit. and to the cultural trads. of nations. Indeed, with the exception of a few supranational figures such as Rubén Darío (1867–1916) in Sp. America (see MODERNISMO), most poetry would henceforth be considered national, i.e., it would indisputably belong to one people, helping this people differentiate itself from the cultural productions of its neighbors. That poetry turned inward and looked back to its indigenous ling. and literary roots does not mean, however, that it somehow became backward. On the contrary, to the extent that it was national lit., it lit the path to modernity. National poetry was as much a sign of modernity as capitalism, industrialization, the train, or the jet engine. Indeed, it promoted modernization by asking people to see themselves as members of nation-states and consumers of self-consciously aesthetic products.

National poetry manifested wider cultural tensions between *tradition and modernity, *mimesis and *originality, locality and universality, homogeneity and heterogeneity. While in theory poetry seemed to push toward the old, the regional, and the standardized, in all these cases, it was actually created, and it encouraged the interaction between the individual and the general, the self and the other. It was syncretic while all the time claiming to be monocultural.

The mod. Gr. poet Dionysios Solomos (1798–1857) exhibits the hallmarks of the national poet: he is now celebrated as a *bard, representative of Greece, the inventor of the mod. lyric trad., the composer of its national anthem, and the manifestation of excellence in poetic craft (see GREEK POETRY). Yet, in both his life and his work, he typified the contradictions of writers of 19th-c. Europe and of 20th-c. postcolonial societies.

Born on the Ionian island of Zakynthos, then a Venetian possession and later to be taken over by Great Britain, Solomos grew up speaking Gr. and It. After spending ten years studying in Italy, he returned to his place of birth, more at home in It. than in Gr. His first poems were composed in It.; indeed, his later mature work was originally written in the lang. of the colonizer and then translated into demotic. What is now hailed as supremely Gr. lyric had originally been composed in It. and suffused with Ger. idealist philosophy. National in name, his work was federative in practice—which is what makes it so national in the first place. Solomos's genius lay in fashioning a synthesis between the vernacular tongue and the work of Friedrich Schiller, folk poetry and cosmopolitan romantic discourse, the lang. of the occupier and the idiom of the freedom fighter. This makes his oeuvre, and that of any other poet, national and transnational at the same time, a paradox much like the title of his well-known poem The Free Besieged.

Mod. writers, Solomos himself noted, differ from village poets in being conscious of their place in the institution of national lit.: "the nation asks us that the treasure of our individual intelligence be dressed in national garments." The mod. poet often reflects on the aesthetic and political task ahead, which makes him feel socially engaged and alienated at the same time. On the one hand, this self-reflexivity brings about a distance between artist and society, as G.W.F. Hegel well understood; but on the other, it fosters a common, public sense of purpose. Solomos manifested both tendencies. Tortured by the romantic theory of the absolute, he slaved away at various versions of his poems, rarely publishing final drafts in his lifetime. In fact, most of his corpus exits in fragmentary form. Yet in aspiring toward the aesthetic *sublime, Solomos also understood that poets were living in transitional times, which demanded that they engage in the creation of new social systems and novel poetic trads. Solomos, like Ger. poets before him and many after him all over the world, profoundly experienced the belatedness of his society. His studies in Italy forced him to confront the gap between his own colonized, economically backward country and the progress and enlightenment of metropolitan Europe.

His work is paradigmatic of how poets in modernizing societies see themselves as agents of change. The comparisons these poets and intellectuals make between advanced and developing societies prompt them to initiate and promote projects of modernization and nationalism. In assisting the creation of national cultures and national lits., these writers participate in a mod. act, pushing their populations toward a globalized modernity, toward engagement with the outside world rather than retrenchment.

On his own return home, Solomos discovered the absence of an institution of lit.: the lack of a literary ling. medium, of genres beyond lyric, and the social network required to support a national lit. So he set out to create it with his verse, bending romantic theory into the *ballad form, translating metaphysical philosophy into the vernacular, modernizing traditional rhythm for a new purpose. He combined, in other words, the principles of aesthetic and national consolidation. This double dance ensured that his poetry would remain lit. above all, rather than a sheer reflection of the nation. Although his Free Besieged deals with the revolutionaries of Missolonghi—the place where Lord Byron met his death in the struggle for Gr. independence from Ottoman rule—the poem is not a *panegyric, cheering the warriors to victory, but about military and aesthetic failure. Just as the warriors are defeated by the Ottomans, the poem too is crushed by the contradictions of the poet's task to express absolute "form with the demotic language."

The contradictions inherent in poetic lang. render national poetry an unsettled and unsettling medium, never sliding into one-dimensional portrayal of social reality. Moreover, the tensions of the entire modernizing project also ensure that such poetry is a syncretic phenomenon, fitting imported institutions to local needs. As such, national poetry is another manifestation of the human negotiation between the local and the universal, between aboriginal realities and imported ideologies and institutions.

One of the abiding dreams of national poetry is the search for and depiction of the unique ethnic self. If national poetry is born out of comparisons between self and other, colonizer and colonized, the indigenous and the transnational, it is to be expected that the local defines itself always with respect to external agents and forces. Yet again, even if this project resembles an ontological hunt for truth, it comes to be through a confrontation with difference. This dialogue with the other prevents national poetry from becoming merely a celebration of the nation. That a national culture is established does not mean that all differences are extinguished in the new foundation, much as standardization of lang. within the nation does not erase all ling. diversity. The Brazilian poet and critic Haroldo de Campos (1929–2003), observing the context around the avant-garde movement of the 1920s and after known as antropofagia*, proposes to replace "ontological nationalism" ("a model which inspires and underlies any literary historiography which seeks to identify a 'national classicism,' a moment of perfection of a slow blossoming") with "a modal, differential nationalism," which considers "nationalism as a dialogical movement of difference": "the dis-character, instead of the character, the rupture instead of the linear course." The "great and unclassifiable" novelist Machado de Assis, Campos remarks, has swallowed Laurence Sterne and "innumerable others"; he "is national because he is not national." At the very core, lit. always maintains a negotiation between the local and the global, the national and the transnational.

Authenticity, moreover, becomes a rallying call for innovation and *invention. This insight is confirmed by the experience of Germany, the country where so much thought about nationalism originally took shape. Toward the end of the 18th c., many bourgeois intellectuals found themselves shut out from the public sphere by an aristocracy beholden to Fr. culture. To a certain extent, these intellectuals devised the notion of an authentically Ger. identity to displace the privileged position of Fr. lit. in Ger. society. In a quintessential class struggle against the aristocracy, they tried to imagine a unified Ger. nation before it had been achieved politically, using culture as a weapon to augment their social position. G. E. Lessing (1729–81) gave voice to this cultural and social exclusion in Hamburg Dramaturgy (1767): "[W]e are the sworn copyists," he argued, "to all that is foreign; especially, are we still the obedient admirers of the never sufficiently admired French?" J. G. Herder (1744–1803) similarly wondered whether the Ger. people were fated to remain translators and imitators. Why, he asked, did young Germans prefer It., Fr., and Eng. writers?

This disquieting question has since been posed countless times in modernizing societies by writers who have to confront the avowed supremacy of their more powerful neighbor or their colonizing state. We have heard it from Herman Melville in the U.S., Antonio Gramsci in Italy, José Rizal in the Philippines, Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o in Kenya, José Carlos Mariátegui in Peru, and Margaret Atwood in Canada. The question "where are our great authors?" indicates how far-reaching the discourse of nationalism has been in promulgating the belief that each nation needs its own lit., incl. poetry. In the age of nationalism, the act of copying foreign models is supremely humiliating because it places the home culture in a derivative situation, seemingly secondary and inauthentic. The belief that all nations are products of and capable of originality is a powerful message against the universality of imperialism. Based on the Herderian notion of the incommensurability of cultures, it is a driving force against foreign rule, emboldening people to look for the center of their creativity in indigenous models.

In the case of Germany, this theory was tested by the Napoleonic invasions of Germany in 1800. Although Ger. intellectuals and poets were supportive, often enthusiastically, of the Fr. Revolution, this attack forced them to look to their own trads. J. G. Fichte (1762–1814) gave voice to this resistance in a series of lectures he gave in a vanquished Berlin during the years 1807–8, lectures that would become important nationalist documents. He tried to rouse the Germans to look at the cultural ties binding them together against a common foe. Each separate nation, he asserted, "has the right to take independent charge of its affairs and to govern itself." Culture becomes, then, the basis for self-governance. Unity by culture leads to unity by citizenship. This remains a potent political message to this day.

If we often think that lit. is itself a secondary agent in society, lit.'s role in nationalizing societies shows its relevance in great political struggle. National poetry does not by itself lead to revolution. It cannot overthrow the aggressor or build a new society. But it provides the arguments, figures, and lang. for the assertion of national independence and self-governance. Indeed, poets often offer images of national unification years before the actual consolidation of the state.

That poetry engages in such a mission does not make it into a positivistic discourse, a mouthpiece for the general and the bureaucrat. We have to keep in mind that the very label national poetry identifies it as a partly political and partly aesthetic enterprise. The *tropes of poetic lang. remind readers that the text before them is primarily a literary document rather than a political tract; it transmits representations, images, and fictions. These tropes themselves oppose nationalization, playing havoc with the very idea of one single, unitary identity.

The Gr. case demonstrates this well. Solomos may have helped found a trad. of national poetry on the basis of the demotic lang., but a half century later, C. P. Cavafy (1863–1933) resisted this nationalization of Gr. letters. Although hailed as a canonical figure today, Cavafy was marginalized in his time. He lived most of his life in Alexandria, outside the borders of the Gr. kingdom, having visited Greece only a few times. Moreover, he felt at home in Eng., the lang. of the colonial power in Egypt, even as he ignored contemp. Egypt in his verse. In so many ways, his writing does not fit comfortably within the walls established by Solomos and his followers, pointing in this way to the different, often conflicting schools that can form within the national *canon.

First of all, mod. Greece, as a sociopolitical reality, rarely enters Cavafy's work. Second and more important, Cavafy gave voice to the ling. variety of the Gr. trad. Rather than adopting demotic, the lang. of national lit., he wrote in a hybrid of vernacular and learned registers. What is more, he also incorporated the vast historical range of Gr. His poems often contain words, phrases, or entire passages from cl., late antique, and Byzantine Gr., demonstrating poetically the ling. heterogeneity that made his work possible.

Moreover, Cavafy offered an unorthodox view of Gr. hist. While his contemporaries were celebrating the glories of 5th-c. BCE authors, representing themselves implicitly and explicitly as the heirs of that period, Cavafy wrote of decline, the Hellenistic epoch, and the time of late antiquity when the Gr. world had been conquered by Rome. Cavafy spoke of barbarians at the walls of the city, of imperial expansion and a great mixing of peoples, langs., and religions: "We the Alexandrians, the Antiochians, / the Celeucians and the many / other Greeks of Egypt and Syria, / and those of Media and Persia" ("In the Year 200 BC"). His historical figures are often people who find themselves on the wrong side of glory, provincial types trying to ape the ways of elites in Rome. Cavafy shares an ironic view of Gr. hist., showing tarnished accomplishments and shabby realities. He writes about when Greece was in decline and when Gr. culture, spread throughout the eastern Mediterranean, was characterized by a proud multiculturalism.

This ironic interpretation of the past is enhanced by Cavafy's frank treatment of homosexuality and his implicit critique of virile nationalism. The poems set in both mod. and ancient Alexandria feature men adoring other men: "Lines of the body. Red lips. Erotic limbs. / Hair as if taken from Greek statues" ("Much I Observed"). The "faultlessly beautiful" young men of Alexandria, so enamored of their own masculine attraction, seem distant from the fighters in Missolonghi. Yet they constitute part of the same canon, which goes to show that no national poetry is monolithically national. The canon contains diverse styles, trads. and interpretations often in conflict with one another. These trads. give voice to a diversity of lang. and historical experience that the title national poetry seems to occlude. National poetry is as much about the other as it is about the self.

The trajectory of national poetry in the 19th and 20th cs. was made possible by the privileging of the powers of narrative and of lit. to express identities. In the 21st c., however, poetry outside mass culture is no longer considered a dominant literary form. We cannot be sure, therefore, that national poetry will continue to signify in the 21st c. what it did in the previous two. What is certain, however, is that people still organize themselves into distinct ethnic and national groupings. They still have to negotiate between transnational economic and cultural flows and their own lives. Poetry, perhaps in association with other aesthetic forms and new media, may still adapt to express this dialectic between self and other.

See AUTONOMY, POET LAUREATE, POLITICS AND POETRY.

■ J. G. Fichte, Addresses to the German Nation (1835); J. G. Herder, Reflections on the Philosophy of the History of Mankind, ed. F. E. Manuel (1968); J. C. Mariátegui, Seven Interpretive Essays on Peruvian Reality, trans. M. Urquidi (1971); Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o, Homecoming: Essays on African and Caribbean Literature, Culture and Politics (1972); B. Anderson, Imagined Communities (1983); B. Harlow, Resistance Literature (1987); P. U. Hohendahl, Building a National Literature: The Case of Germany 1830–1870 (1989); J. G. Herder, Against Pure Reason: Writing on Religion, Language, and History, trans. M. Bunge (1989); Nation and Narration, ed. H. Bhabha (1990); G. Jusdanis, Belated Modernity and Aesthetic Culture: Inventing National Literature (1991); D. Sommer, Foundational Fictions: The National Romances of Latin America (1991); R. Helgerson, Forms of Nationhood: The Elizabethan Writing of England (1992); G. Jusdanis, The Necessary Nation (2001); D. Damrosch, What Is World Literature? (2003); H. de Campos, "The Rule of Anthropophagy: Europe under the Sign of Devoration," Novas, ed. A. S. Bessa and O. Cisneros (2007).

G. JUSDANIS

NATIVE AMERICAN POETRY. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; INUIT POETRY; NAVAJO POETRY.

NATIVITY POEM. Though it might seem a minor occasional genre associated with lauda*, *carols, and *hymns, the nativity poem has closely tracked literary, religious, and political changes since the 4th c. The nativity poem emerged in early med. culture as a liturgical practice wary of echoing pagan and Roman natal celebrations. Thus, the hymns and poems of Prudentius and Ephrem in the 4th c. typically offer typological reflections or theological explorations of the Incarnation.

Within the literary vernaculars of the 14th c., the nativity poem became less strictly liturgical as the influence of the Franciscans and the popularity of mystery plays encouraged a more participatory, affective spirituality. The *courtly love trad. inspired visions of the maiden Mary, while naturalistic depictions thrived as lower classes found their struggles dignified by the humble setting of Christ's birth. Chaucer's Marian verse is exemplary among the numerous Nativity-themed lyrics through the 15th c.

In the 16th and 17th cs., the genre grew increasingly complex, incorporating *epic and *pastoral *tropes and *baroque *conceits while negotiating the religio-political tensions engendered by the Reformation and Counter-Reformation. Luis de Góngora is important here, as is John Milton, whose "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity" balances Puritan disdain for Catholic imagery with subtle reverence for Christ's birth scene. After the mid-17th c., more conventionally pious nativity poems predominated even as the diminishing numbers of the genre reflected the rise of the new science, deism, and other challenges to traditional pieties.

While meditative and innovative nativity poems continued to thrive across the last two centuries (e.g., S. T. Coleridge, Christina Rossetti, W. H. Auden, and Joseph Brodsky), *romanticism opened a new relationship with the Nativity, which became an allusive presence in works addressing broader ontological concerns, as in William Wordsworth's "Ode: Intimations of Immortality." In the 20th c., the genre grew increasingly ironic and reflexive. Consider T. S. Eliot's oblique Nativity reference in "Gerontion" to a time "swaddled in darkness" or the insinuating Nativity theme in post-colonial poets such as Christopher Okigbo.

See DEVOTIONAL POETRY, LITURGICAL POETRY, RELIGION AND POETRY.

■ L. C. Sledge, Shivering Babe, Victorious Lord: The Nativity in Poetry and Art (1981); "Nativity," A Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature, ed. D. L. Jeffrey (1992); Divine Inspiration, ed. R. Atwan, G. Dardess, and P. Rosenthal (1998); Middle English Marian Lyrics, ed. K. Saupe (1998); A. Vander Zee, "Milton's Mary: Suspending Song in the Nativity Ode," MP 108 (2011).

A. VANDER ZEE

NATURALISM. There are two principal ways in which this multivalent term is used in the study of poetry: one emphasizes (esp. in Eng. poetics) a set of romantic principles concerning the "lyrical" evocation of *nature and their prevalence throughout most of the Victorian era, while the other, more narrowly, identifies an aesthetic program that is based on an aggressively antiromantic system of philosophical-scientific doctrines. Walter Pater has the former concept in mind when, in the Preface to The Renaissance (1873), he mentions William Wordsworth's naturalistic vision as "that strange, mystical sense of a life in natural things, and of man's life as a part of nature." Naturalism here refers to the poetic representation of a vital reciprocity between the human being and his living (natural) environment, an experience that may allow intimations of a transcendent reality to emanate from this close sympathy between private sensibilities and the domain of organic life. Alfred, Lord Tennyson's view of nature as "red in tooth and claw," on the other hand, is predicated on the contrary notion that a person's existence is a constant "struggle for life," dominated by morally indifferent compulsions and subject to a blind dynamism of regeneration undone by destruction. The Am. novelist Frank Norris called it "the primal instinct of the brute struggling for its life." Nature here is an impediment to virtuous self-fulfillment, to humane civilization, and to ennobling vision. In either case, whether nature is perceived as a benign source of value or as an agent of rapacious biological and environmental destiny, the term naturalism refers to an abiding preoccupation with nature, usually equated with objective reality, as the essential determinant of life.

More restrictively, however, the term naturalism in poetics is closely associated with the mechanistic and deterministic principles developed by late 19th-c. science. In this context, the term refers to the programmatic systematization of a literary aesthetic that sought to reconcile the aims of art with the all-pervasive authority of the natural sciences. This meant subordinating an "antimodern" insistence on creative individualism to nomological methods of construction that reflect the techniques of advanced scientific specialization. In consequence, the categorical difference between art and reality was being blurred, and lit., esp. poetry, began to circulate widely as merely one of many forms of popular entertainment. Its challenge was to stay up to date ("experimental").

Use of the term naturalism to designate a style or a movement is infrequent in Eng. literary scholarship, while the Era of Naturalism in Am. writing (1900–15) is applied only to distinctive prose fiction (by Norris, Stephen Crane, later by Theodore Dreiser and J. T. Farrell). An exception may be the socially conscious verse of William Vaughn Moody (1869–1910). In Europe, where naturalism was generally identified with Émile Zola's programmatic essays and his novels, critics and readers often reacted with vituperative derogations. Most of the poets from the naturalistic generation (incl. Zola's groupe de Médan of 1880, which produced no distinctive verse in their master's vein) therefore preferred to call themselves realists or modernists. The reason for this was twofold: while many "naturalists" were engaged with social and political issues as partisans of working-class aspirations, they needed the bourgeoisie as their readers and thus had to accommodate themselves to bourgeois preferences that considered art a domain independent of and above the conflicts of politics and labor. At the same time, the cultural program, e.g., of social democracy (or any other nonrevolutionary workers' organization) rejected all naturalistic art for its choice of "sordid milieus" and "depraved characters" as an offense to the industrial workers' self-esteem.

This holds true esp. for Germany, where Otto von Bismarck's Sozialistengesetz of 1878 (an emergency measure that also protected official Prussian culture against "socialist subversion") was not repealed until 1890. Even so, naturalism had come into its own by 1885, earlier in France and later in Britain, with *manifestos and poetry anthols., both proclaiming group solidarity. But, in fact, diffuse thematic and stylistic orientations prevailed, and no poet practiced what his or her stated purposes postulated. A good example of this discrepancy between the pathos of revolutionary aims and, all in all, an eclectically epigonous, though technically accomplished, style is the collection Moderne Dichter-Charaktere (1885), ed. by W. Arent, H. Conradi, and K. F. Henckell, that offers a sampling of work by 22 contributors. The only poet in Germany (and perhaps anywhere) who philosophically justified (in Die Kunst und ihre Gesetze, 2 v., 1891–93; and in Revolution der Lyrik, 1899) and practiced (in Das Buch der Zeit: Lieder eines Modernen, 1886) what he called "konsequenter Naturalismus" (consistent naturalism) was Arno Holz (1863–1929). But this naturalism soon turned into a method, a virtuoso's purely formal concern, rather than the poetically realized expression of an engagement with social issues. His chef d'oeuvre, the prose poem Phantasus (first version 1898–99), depicts the poet in an ever-expanding variety of even cosmic metamorphoses. The poet's soul is part of a hypertrophic growth and subsequent dissolution of the world of objects, kaleidoscopic but totally arbitrary. The lang. of this "gigantic-Phantasus-nonplusultra poem" (Holz) has abandoned all but one formal *constraint: it is arranged along an imaginary central axis as symmetrical half lines. The attempt, finally, to turn art back into nature (reality), reflecting a subjectivistic conception of nature, has produced a hypernaturalism that is an excessive impressionism.

■ St. A. Brooke, Naturalism in English Poetry (1920); F.W.J. Hemmings, "The Origins of the Terms Naturalisme, Naturaliste," FS 8 (1954); C. C. Walcutt, American Literary Naturalism (1956); Literarische Manifeste des Naturalismus 1880–1892, ed. E. Ruprecht (1962); W. R. Maurer, The Naturalistic Image of German Literature (1972); J. Schutte, Lyrik des deutschen Naturalismus, 1885–1893 (1976); Naturalismus, Ästhetizismus, ed. C. Bürger, P. Bürger, J. Schulte-Sasse (1979); R. C. Cowen, Der Naturalismus, 3d ed. (1981); W. B. Michaels, The Gold Standard and the Logic of Naturalism: American Literature at the Turn of the Century (1987); G. Mahal, Naturalismus, 2d ed. (1990); F. Caudet, "Clarín y el debate sobre el naturalismo en España," Nueva revista de filolgía Hispánica 42 (1994); The Cambridge Companion to American Realism and Naturalism, ed. D. Pizer (1995); Spectacles of Realism, ed. M. Cohen and C. Prendergast (1995); G. Nouzeilles, "Pathological Romances and National Dystopias in Argentine Naturalism," Latin American Literary Review 24, no. 47 (1996); Y. Chevrel, "Poétique du naturalisme," Histoire des poétiques, ed. J. Bessiere et al. (1997); Documents of American Realism and Naturalism, ed. D. Pizer (1998); G. Finney, "Poetic Realism, Naturalism, and the Rise of the Novella," The Camden House History of German Literature, v. 9 (2005).

M. Winkler

NATURE. In their classic study of the term, Lovejoy and Boas teased out 61 categories of meaning for our word nature. Given the term's vast breadth and cultural significance, Williams's observation, which has been repeatedly echoed (often in exasperation) by literary critics, is hardly surprising: "any full history of the uses of 'nature' would be a history of a large part of human thought." Complicating matters, our concept of nature was influenced not only by the Lat. natura, from whence our word derives, but by the Gr. physis and OE cyn. Nonetheless, while their hists. are intricate and circuitous, behind each of these words lies a single, shared meaning.

Physis, natura, and cyn each originally denoted birth and growth. This core meaning is so old that it predates the first Gr., Lat., and OE utterances, having its origin in two IE words: bheue (from which we get physis) and gen (which gave us natura and cyn). Although the ancient IE sense of birth and growth is rarely invoked when we use the word nature today, this meaning was still available to Heraclitus and his student Cratylus: to both philosophers, physis signals birth, growth, and passing away, the endlessly reoccurring process of becoming, whereby everything everywhere is ever coming into and out of existence. Because Cratylus observed that such change happens quickly, he criticized (as Aristotle noted) "Heraclitus for saying that one cannot step twice into the same stream, for he himself thought it could not be done even once." Doubting that lang. could successfully represent nature, which he saw as manifestly and wildly in flux, Cratylus chose to communicate only by gesturing, silently pointing to nature endlessly in flux.

Because he argued that lang. failed to represent nature successfully, the mute and gesturing Cratylus was profoundly worrisome to Plato. Fortunately for Plato, he found a teacher, Socrates, who promised to save lang. from the relentless flux of nature by postulating a fixed and immutable realm securely "beyond nature" (metaphysikē), which, he reasoned, is what lang. must refer to, or at least should represent, if uttered truthfully by a knowledgeable person. Not content with merely theorizing this supersensory realm, in his dialogue Cratylus (389c), Plato triumphantly underscored this achievement by redefining physis as equivalent to his changeless Ideas (which he postulated as existing only in the metaphysical realm), thereby turning the old definition, which Cratylus still echoed, on its head.

Plato thus marks a turning point in the hist. of the concept of nature, which resulted in nature's being locked into (and seen as the inferior member of) a binary structure with the metaphysical. As a result, after Plato, "true nature" is often imagined as that which lies firmly beyond the flux of nature. This dualistic view quickly came to dominate Western thinking, first through Plotinus and the Neoplatonists, then in Christian thinking, esp. with the Scholastics, with heaven imagined as the superior, metaphysical realm and the soul actually at risk of contamination from the earthly environment. By the Ren., this view had become a commonplace.

Shortly after Plato, the poet Theocritus, by way of the pastoral mode of writing he largely inaugurated, imagined nature as entangled with other concepts. A member of Ptolemy's court in Alexandria, Theocritus wrote of country places (fondly recalled from his youth in rural Sicily) from the perspective of city and court, praising the country at the expense of the latter (see ALEXANDRIANISM). Thus, the dyad that Theocritus explored, which Plato had already taken up more generally, was one in which culture opposed nature. In *pastoral poetry, built environments (like cities) and strongholds of human culture (like courts) often stand in opposition to places where nature is imagined to still be unfolding freely, unimpeded by human interaction. Of course, as we now know, the pastures depicted in pastoral poetry were themselves highly modified environments, the result of wholesale deforestation maintained by the constant grazing of livestock (as Harrison and others have observed). Nonetheless, pastoral poetry, which is nearly always written from an urban vantage point, generally, and often wistfully, portrayed these places as the refuge of nature, even as it acknowledged and lamented their passing as a result of human action.

The manner by which Plato and Theocritus (along with a range of other Gr. thinkers) reconceived of nature had profound consequences. First, because nature was imagined in opposition to certain places, such as cities, it became more a spatial than a temporal category. Having inherited this view, we often think of nature as a place (such as a rural locale, following Theocritus), rather than that by virtue of which all places—and everything else, for that matter—are changed over time. Moreover, in setting up nature in opposition to culture, these Gr. thinkers presaged an enormously influential distinction, often first attributed to Cicero, between "first nature," existing separately from human intervention, like an untouched forest, and "second nature," which references human culture and works, such as a table made from the forest's trees. This is an important distinction that is still very much alive today, as we often judge "naturalness," be it of a place or a consumer product, on the extent of its human modification. The first/second nature dyad echoes a similar distinction that emerged with the Greeks, between nature and art, with the latter often being seen (such as in the close of Plato's Republic) as an inferior reflection of nature

Not surprisingly, the question of the relation of nature to art is one to which writers from Aristotle through Edmund Spenser and into the 21st c. have repeatedly turned. Moreover, as Watson has recently argued, the issue of whether writers and artists could truly be successful in their efforts to represent nature caused a great deal of anxiety even in the late Ren. More recently, poststructural thinkers (such as Derrida), following the phenomenologists of the first half of the 20th c., have reopened this question.

In both his Eclogues and Georgics, Virgil took up the question of first and second nature. In his first *eclogue, which both Alpers and Patterson argue established the paradigm for nearly all subsequent pastoral, Virgil reflected on the pastoral mode he inherited by considering how culture (by way of political decisions) can affect nature (i.e., first nature, in the form of a rural locale). Following Hesiod, Cato, and Varro, and postulating, like the authors of Genesis, that human beings once lived at peace with nature in a golden age but lost that perfect state through human folly, in his Georgics Virgil focused on the necessary creation of second nature through agriculture. In general, as ecocritics have repeatedly made clear, in Gr., Roman, Heb., and Christian thinking, human beings are frequently imagined as living in an adversarial relationship with nature, mandated to convert an inhospitable (in Genesis "fallen") first nature into second through backbreaking labor.

With nature understood in so many ways, its value was drawn into question for future writers. E.g., conceiving of nature as locked into two binaries (nature vs. the metaphysical, nature vs. city; being marginalized in the first, privileged in the second) raised a key question: is nature evil or good? The Ren. poet Petrarch, who wrote of his "hate . . . of Town, and love of the woods" in his letters, nonetheless related that he became "enraged" with himself for "admiring earthly things" (a beautiful mountaintop) when his mind's eye should have been turned toward God and heaven. In some sense, this dilemma was resolved by thinkers after Petrarch, such as Baruch Spinoza, who, rejecting metaphysical dualism, saw God as not separate from but rather immanent in nature. This approach paved the way for the romantics, many of whom saw nature as a manifestation of deity.

Not everyone, however, would see God as immanent in nature. Francis Bacon, e.g., who inherited the Gr. and med. trad. of imagining nature as a goddess, saw her not only as the most elemental and important object of scientific inquiry but (as Merchant, following Adorno and Horkheimer, has stressed) as desperately in need of control. To facilitate this project of gaining power over nature by way of knowledge, Bacon favored terse aphoristic prose, which has given birth to mod. scientific and technical writing. In contrast, as Fletcher has argued, from the late Ren. onward, writers took up the daunting challenge of developing poetic lang. that could describe and praise nature without making it an object of scientific enquiry. To Fletcher, this project culminates with the poetry of John Ashbery.

With the advent of technological modernity and the so-called Industrial Revolution, the second nature of industrial cities and suburbs was often seen in opposition to areas least altered by human beings—which were becoming a rarity throughout Europe by the close of the Ren. Thus, as it was increasingly understood spatially, first Nature (now often capitalized) soon became a near synonym for wilderness. In order to understand the emotional response that wilderness was increasingly invoking, in the 18th c., Immanuel Kant and Edmund Burke (and others) revised Longinus's cl. notion of the *sublime as a way of expressing the simultaneous awe and attraction that human beings were developing toward wilderness. By the 19th c., first nature/wilderness not only was often seen as a manifestation of deity but became a fetish object for a broad range of writers and artists across Europe and America, incl. J. W. Goethe, William Wordsworth, H. D. Thoreau, Walt Whitman, and Thomas Hardy. This strain of broadly romantic reverence for nature continued into the 20th and 21st cs. with writers such as Dylan Thomas, Robert Frost, Seamus Heaney, and Wendell Berry. However, as untouched wilderness was quickly being domesticated throughout the Northern Hemisphere, benign areas imagined as wilderness, which had in fact already been extensively modified by human beings, such as the Lake District of 19th-c. England and Thoreau's Walden Pond, soon began to stand for wilderness in much nature writing.

Thus, an inversion in the way that nature (as wilderness) was looked on took place in modernity, insofar as earlier representations of nature, such as in the med. period (i.e., Beowulf, "The Seafarer"), often portrayed it as dangerous and menacing, while in the mod. period domesticated wilderness was frequently romanticized as welcoming, even if invoking sublime awe. John Milton is a pivotal figure here insofar as Paradise Lost contains both a foreboding wilderness and a hospitable garden that it surrounds. Yet even in Milton's time, there was an anxiety over the domestication of wilderness (see, e.g., Justus Lipsius, Andrew Marvell, and George Herbert). Nonetheless, because domesticated wilderness was increasingly represented by a range of poets and artists as intensely appealing, this essentially pastoral impulse resulted in the romanticizing of earlier periods as environmental golden ages, which were imagined as eradicated by extensive changes in mod. agricultural and industrial practices, as well as by the expansion of cities and their suburbs. Examples of this impulse include Wordsworth's "Michael" and even T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land. Supporting this pastoralization of the past were works such as George Marsh's The Earth as Modified by Human Action (1884), a sweeping reassessment of human hist. as bringing environmental devastation to vast regions of the globe.

Critically, nature has received a great deal of attention in recent decades. In the 1980s, the deep ecology movement, which was preoccupied with wilderness and its preservation, spawned interest in texts that celebrated first nature, such as by Arne Næss, Bill Devall, and George Sessions. While interest in such texts continued in the 1990s, with notable works by Buell on Thoreau and Bate on Wordsworth, at the same time Latour and Haraway largely deconstructed the binary of first and second nature, which contributed to interest in both the liminal space between first and second nature and places where nature has been significantly altered by human beings, such as cities and suburbs. As the 21st c. dawned, works such as The Environmental Justice Reader drew attention to the fact that class, race, gender, colonialism, and other factors significantly influence perceptions of nature. Complex visions of nature have recently influenced a range of writers, incl. Barbara Kingsolver, Michael Pollan, and Bill McKibben, to name but a few.

See ENVIRONMENT AND POETRY, GEORGIC, LANDSCAPE POETRY.

■ A. O. Lovejoy and G. Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); L. White Jr., "The Historical Roots of Our Ecological Crisis," Science 155 (1967); T. W. Adorno and M. Horkheimer, Dialectic of Enlightenment, trans. J. Cumming (1972); C. Merchant, The Death of Nature: Women, Ecology, and the Scientific Revolution (1980); R. Williams, Keywords, 2d ed. (1983); B. Devall and G. Sessions, Deep Ecology (1985); A. Patterson, Pastoral and Ideology: Virgil to Valéry (1987); A. Næss, Ecology, Community and Lifestyle: Outline of an Ecosophy, trans. D. Rothenberg (1989); J. Bate, Romantic Ecology: Wordsworth and the Environmental Tradition (1991); D. J. Haraway, Simians, Cyborgs, and Women: The Reinvention of Nature (1991); R. P. Harrison, Forests: The Shadow of Civilization (1992); B. Latour, We Have Never Been Modern, trans. C. Porter (1993); L. Buell, The Environmental Imagination: Thoreau, Nature Writing, and the Formation of American Culture (1995); P. Alpers, What is Pastoral? (1996); The Environmental Justice Reader: Politics, Poetics, and Pedagogy, ed. J. Adamson, M. M. Evans, and R. Stein (2002); A. Fletcher, A New Theory for American Poetry: Democracy, the Environment, and the Future of Imagination (2004); R. N. Watson, Back to Nature: The Green and the Real in the Late Renaissance (2006).

K. HILTNER

NATUREINGANG (Ger., "nature opening" or "nature introduction"). The term is traditionally used by philologists for the seasonal opening or nature exordium of a troubadour canso or sirventes* in *Occitan poetry; it is also applied to similar situations in vernacular lyric genres of the noble register. Occurring in the beginning of the lyric text, usually in but not limited to the first stanza, the Natureingang is an abbreviated form of cl. topoi* such as the invocation to nature and the ideal landscape (locus amoenus). In contrast to cl. precedents and to a certain extent the Middle Lat. love lyric that contain seasonal exordia (see GOLIARDIC VERSE), the troubadour Natureingang adapts the cl. topography or harmonious description of a pleasant place within a highly developed declaration of self-referentiality and poetic activity. The opening lyric stanza in troubadour texts stages a turning away from this place, even if limited to only a few elements of the cl. topos. Once thought to be a determinant feature of a canso, the Natureingang is now considered an expansion of the invariant opening of the speaker's admission of the here-and-now engagement of verbal or musical activity and the final result of the poem (Ghil). A typical example consists of temporal elements (usually of springtime), such as descriptions of vegetation or scenery characteristic of the season (foliage, birdsong, water), positively qualified as pleasant or sweet and producing joy. After the description, the speaker adapts these seasonal elements to his or her needs. The season may move the speaker to think about love and sing, or the song may emerge from the contradiction between the joy of spring and the lover's despair over separation from the loved one (see Bernart de Ventadorn, "Can l'erba fresch'e·lh folha par" [When the new grass and leaves come forth] and Jaufré Rudel, "Lanquan li jorn son lonc en may" [When days grow long in May]). Other notable versions include sophisticated seasonal descriptions that foreground the poet's rhetorical artistry using a floral or vegetal lexeme (Arnaut Daniel) and inversions of the conventional nature opening (Raimbaut d'Aurenga, Bernart de Ventadorn) in which the lover takes the effects of the season for its contrary or the speaker states his joy in spite of the season's dreariness: "Ar resplan la flors enversa / Pels trencans racx e pels tertres / Cals flors? . . . Quar enaissi m'o enverse / Que bel plan mi semblon tertre" (Now the reversed flower / shines among the sharp cliffs and among the hills. / What flower? . . . For I reverse things in such a way that now hills seem a beautiful plain to me [Pattison 39.1–3, 9–10]) and "Tant ai mo cor ple de joya / tot me desnatura" (My heart is so full of joy that she transforms everything for me).

See LANDSCAPE POEM, NATURE; REVERDIE.

■ Primary Texts: The Life and Works of the Troubadour Raimbaut d'Orange, ed. W. T. Pattison (1952); Canzoni, ed. G. Toja (1960)—Arnaut Daniel; Bernart de Ventadorn: Chansons d'amour, ed. and trans. Moshé Lazar (1966); The Songs of Jaufré Rudel, ed. R. T. Pickens (1978).

■ Criticism and History: Curtius; E. Schulze-Busacker, "En marge d'un lieu commun de la poésie des troubadours," Romania 99 (1978); E. M. Ghil, "The Seasonal Topos in the Old Provençal canzo: A Reassessment," Studia Occitanica, ed. H.-E. Keller (1986); S. Bianchini, "Guglielmo IX, Pos vezem de novel florir (BdT 183, 11): esordio stagionale o invocazione alla natura?" Annali dell'Istituto Universitario Orientale–Sezione Romanza 41 (1999).

M. GALVEZ

NAVAJO POETRY. In the late 1890s, Dr. Washington Matthews, an army surgeon who had an interest in Navajo ceremonial ways, described Navajo oral storytellers and singers as "poets" and their songs as "poems." He argued that, if the Navajo lang. (Diné bizaad) were written, one would find that Navajo poets had as many poetic devices as their Eng. counterparts, if not more. Written poetry by Navajos, however, began not in the Navajo lang. but in Eng., and, indeed, the impetus for writing poetry came from the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) and the school system of the time. E.g., in 1933, a short, eight-line poem was published in Indians at Work, a U.S. government publication (Hirschfelder and Singer). The poem was composed by Navajo students at Tohatchi School in New Mexico, on the Navajo Nation. This poem, "If I Were a Pony," is one of the first published poems by a Navajo; it is written entirely in Eng.

The BIA schools, through their Creative Writing project, encouraged the writing of poetry by young Navajos as a way to teach them Eng., which led to the publication of the annual jour. Arrow from 1968 to 1974, a venue for many young Native American poets, incl. Navajos. Some pub. poetry included Navajo vocabulary such as mą'ii (coyote) and shicheii (my grandfather), here written in the current orthography of the Navajo Nation. Poems often addressed contemp. issues facing Navajos, such as siblings at war in Vietnam or the poverty on the Navajo Nation. The poet and artist Gloria Emerson published politically engaged poetry in the overtly political The Indian Historian out of San Francisco. In 1977, as Eng.-lang. Navajo poetry became more visible, Nia Francisco published a poem in Navajo in the journal College English. In the 1980s, even more poetry would be published by Navajos. By the mid- to late 1980s, individually authored books of Navajo poetry were appearing more frequently. In 1989 and 1995, Rex Lee Jim published two collections of poetry through the Princeton University Library, Áhí Ni' Nikisheegiizh and saad, that were written entirely in Navajo; and in 1998, Jim published Dúchas Táá Kóó Diné, a trilingual collection of poetry in Navajo, Gaelic, and Eng. Alyse Neundorf, a poet and linguist, published poetry in both Navajo and Eng. during the 1990s. In 1993, the Navajo Community College Press published Storm Patterns, a collection of poetry by two Navajo women, Della Frank and Roberta Joe–one of the only examples of a book of Navajo poetry published on the Navajo Nation. Most Navajo poetry is published either by university presses in the southwestern U.S. or by independent poetry publishers off the reservation.

Recognized Navajo poets in addition to the figures mentioned above include Tacey Atsitty, Rutherford Ashley, Shonto Begay, Esther Belin, Sherwin Bitsui, Norla Chee, Hershman John, Blackhorse Mitchell, Luci Tapahonso, Laura Tohe, Orlando White, and Venaya Yazzie. Some, like Jim, Tapahonso, and Tohe, are recognized both on and off the Navajo Nation, while others, like Belin, are better known outside the Nation.

Contemp. Navajo poetry is primarily written in Eng. While Navajo is spoken by many residents on the Navajo Nation, literacy in Navajo is not widespread (McLaughlin). Indeed, poets such as Tohe—whose Navajo was almost entirely oral—have actively begun to learn the written lang.

Navajo poets often write about topics and themes connected with home and history. Most Navajo poets have written about the Long Walk (1864–68), when many Navajo were forcibly relocated from their homeland for four years, and connected it with contemp. concerns about identity and homeland. Poets have also written about such topics as the loss of the lang., what it means to be a Navajo in a Western world, and economic and environmental inequalities. Some Navajo poets employ poetry as a way to educate non-Navajos about important cultural, spiritual, and philosophical issues. The themes of growing up on the Navajo Nation and experiencing government-operated boarding schools continue to be central in Navajo poetry. In these examples, Navajo poets present their writing as a historical and cultural supplement to the Westernized education received by young Navajos. The awareness and confirmation of Eng. as a tribal (Diné) lang. emerge as intriguing themes in the writing of contemp. Navajo poets.

Sound symbolism (and *iconicity more broadly), *parallelism, quoted speech, and a variety of poetic devices found in traditional Navajo oral poetry have been actively incorporated into some contemp. written poetry as well. Navajo poets have also experimented with *free verse, *sestinas, *limericks, *concrete poetry, *haiku (see RENGA), and other poetic trads.

Contemp. poets in *performance have taken on the roles of tribal storyteller and hataali (traditional Navajo chanter who performs healing through singing). Narrative remains very popular. In many Navajo narrative genres—Coyote stories, e.g.—there can be a sung portion within the narrative (Webster), and two poets in particular, Mitchell and Tapahonso, have incorporated song into their poetry readings. While the strong influence of Eng. literacy and education has thwarted many traditional Navajo practices, the visibility of poets in cultural celebrations indicates the transformation of poetry into an essential factor for Navajo cultural survival.

See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; ORAL POETRY.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: W. Matthews, Navaho Legends (1897)—reissued 1994; T. D. Allen, "Please Read Loose," in B. Mitchell, Miracle Hill, (1967)—2d ed. (2004) omits Allen's intro.; J. Milton, The American Indian Speaks (1969); G. Emerson, "The Poetry of Gloria Emerson," The Indian Historian 4 (1971); and "Slayers of the Children," The Indian Historian 5 (1972); S. Allen, Yei (1972); The Whispering Wind, ed. T. Allen (1972); J. Milton, Four Indian Poets (1974); N. Francisco, 'táchéédh,' CE 39 (1977); The South Corner of Time, ed. L. Evers (1980); L. Tapahonso, Seasonal Woman (1982); L. Tohe, Making Friends with Water (1986); L. Tapahonso, A Breeze Swept Through (1987); N. Francisco, Blue Horses for Navajo Women (1988); R. L. Jim, Áhí Ni' Nikisheegiizh (1989); D. McLaughlin, When Literacy Empowers: Navajo Language in Print (1992); Rising Voices: Writings of Young Native Americans, ed. A. Hirschfelder and B. Singer (1992); D. Frank and R. Joe, Storm Patterns: Poems from Two Navajo Women (1993); L. Tapahonso, Sáanii Dahataak: The Women are Singing (1993); N. Francisco, Carried Away by the Black River (1994); S. Begay, Navajo Visions and Voices across the Mesa (1995); R. L. Jim, saad (1995); L. Tapahonso, Blue Horses Rush In (1997); R. L. Jim, Dúchas Táá Kóó Diné (1998); E. Belin, From the Belly of My Beauty (1999); A. Neundorf, "Dííjį́ Nánísdzá, I come home today," "Diné Hosiidlį́ʼgi," "Hayíiłká, At Dawn," "Hóyéé," Red Mesa Review 6 (1999); L. Tohe, No Parole Today (1999); V. Browne, Ravens Dancing (2000); R. Ashley, Heart Vision 2000 (2001); N. Chee, Cedar Smoke on Abalone Mountain (2001); Sister Nations, ed. H. Erdrich and L. Tohe (2002); S. Bitsui, Shapeshift (2003); G. Emerson, At the Hems of the Lowest Clouds (2003); L. Tohe, Tséyi': Deep in the Rock (2005); V. Yazzie, Livin Matriarchal: Chapbook I (2006); H. John, I Swallow Turquoise for Courage (2007); L. Tapahonso, a radiant curve (2008); T. Atsitty, amenorrhea (2009); S. Bitsui, Floodsong (2009); O. White, Bone Light (2009).

■ Criticism and History: E. G. Belin, "Contemporary Navajo Writers' Relevance to Navajo Society," Wicazo Sa Review 22 (2007); All by A. K. Webster—"Coyote Poems: Navajo Poetry, Intertextuality, and Language Choice," American Indian Culture and Research Journal 28 (2004); "The Mouse That Sucked: On 'Translating' a Navajo Poem," Studies in American Indian Literature 18 (2006); Explorations in Navajo Poetry and Poetics (2009); "Imagining Navajo in the Boarding School," Journal of Linguistic Anthropology 20 (2010)—ling. analysis of Tohe's No Parole Today; "Towards a History of Navajo English in Navajo Poetry," World Englishes 29 (2010); "'Please Read Loose': Intimate Grammars and Unexpected Languages in Contemporary Navajo Literature," American Indian Culture and Research Journal 35 (2011).

E. G. BELIN; A. K. WEBSTER

NEAR RHYME, generic rhyme, half rhyme, imperfect rhyme, oblique rhyme, off-rhyme, pararhyme, partial rhyme, slant rhyme. There is no standard term in Eng.; near rhyme will be used here as a cover term for several varieties of rhyming practice that are related to yet do not fulfill the canonical definition of rhyme* nor exceed it, as in *rich rhyme. Judgmental adjectives were better avoided, for they carry the pejorative implication that a near rhyme is a failure to achieve true rhyme, either on account of deficiency of lang. resources or incompetence of the poet—equally dubious assumptions, both. Near must be taken, therefore, not in the sense of "imperfect" but rather of "approximate," i.e., close to the narrow band of instances qualifying as canonical end rhyme but outside it, in the wider field of "related but alternative forms of sound correspondence" (Scherr). Within the Eng. taxonomy, most forms of near rhyme, of which there are several, amount to various complex types of *consonance and produce such rhymes as "justice" / "hostess" (Jonathan Swift), "port" / "chart" (Emily Dickinson), or word such as grope / cup, maze / coze, drunkard / conquered. Zirmunskij distinguishes the forms of rhyme as "exact," "augmented" (by deletion or addition), and "altered" (by both, meaning substitution), a typology accepted and extended by Gasparov.

In judging rhymes, it is important not to be misled by shifts in historical phonology, whereby rhymes that now seem only near were actually true rhymes in their day, e.g., Alexander Pope's "obey" / "tea." Further, it is important that near rhyme be conceived not solely in terms of Eng. practice; for since the early 20th c., the status of near rhyme in Eng. has been problematized, while in Rus., e.g., prosodists since Zirmunskij have recognized both "approximate" and "inexact" rhyme as part of the standard definition of rhyme (see Scherr). In Celtic prosody, too, esp. Ir. and Welsh, near rhyme has been recognized and approved as an important and constructive element of rhyming technique since the Middle Ages under the rubric of generic rhyme; and indeed, near rhyme first appears in Eng. deliberately in Henry Vaughan, in imitation of Welsh prosody. In Fr. prosody of the early 20th c., the term accord was proposed by Jules Romains (pseud. of Louis Farigoule, 1885–1972) and Georges Chennevière (1884–1927), poets and theorists of the movement known as unanimism, for a variety of forms of consonance and near rhyme. The accords of Romains were attacked by Maurice Grammont but may have influenced the pararhyme of Wilfred Owen.

In fact, near rhyme has played an important role in most of the major Western prosodies of the late 19th and early 20th cs.—not only Brit. (G. M. Hopkins, W. B. Yeats, Owen, W. H. Auden, Cecil Day-Lewis, Stephen Spender, Louis MacNeice, Dylan Thomas) and Am. (Dickinson—from whom much of the later Am. practice derives), but Rus. (Alexander Blok, Valery Bryusov, Vladimir Mayakovsky, Boris Pasternak). In Eng., the trad. of canonical rhyme was old but not deeply established, having always had to contend with the enormous force of Shakespearean and Miltonic *blank verse and, after 1855, *free verse. But Rus. never developed extensive trads. of either blank or free verse, so that, in the 20th c., Rus. modernist poets experimented extensively with new and variant rhyme forms—as many as 50% of Mayakovsky's rhymes are noncanonical. In the West, the avant-garde prosodies sought to dispense with both meter and rhyme, but, in Russia, it was only the former: rhyme practice was not abandoned but expanded. Experiments with the one went hand in hand with experiments with the other, but renunciation of the one did not necessarily entail the other as well. In Eng., free verse, of course, dropped rhyme, but several major poets who retained traditional verse forms and meters, e.g., Yeats and Auden, also chose to explore near rhyme: Yeats's practice includes rhymes such as "push"/"rush" and "up"/"drop" in a sonnet, e.g., ("Leda and the Swan"). Owen developed what he called pararhyme, a kind of frame rhyme in which the initial and final consonants are repeated while the vowel is varied—e.g. "killed"/"cold," "mystery"/"mastery," "friend"/"frowned"—deliberately to express the wrenching sensation of war. This sort of effect is explored also by Dickinson and Hopkins, as it had been by Vaughan.

In much late Victorian and Edwardian crit., one finds frequent attacks by reactionary prosodists on all less-than-correct rhyming as decadent, degenerate, and incompetent, attacks epitomized in George Saintsbury and Brander Matthews. But in retrospect, such practice is to be seen not as a falling away from a standard but as a redefinition of that standard. In a radical age, the breaking of conventions is an expansive and creative act. Near rhyme is, in this sense, not an abandonment of rhyme in defeat but an opening up of possibilities, not supplanting rhyme but enriching it.

There is evidence from Rus., if any were needed, that each poet develops his or her own distinctive idiolect in near rhyme, preferring to explore not the entire range of possibilities but rather only certain types. But no extensive and reliable set of data on rhyme has yet been collected. The practice of near rhyme in art verse is, of course, the primary interest, but it has also been used extensively and probably for much longer in *light verse, *satire, and (perhaps) *dialect poetry.

■ K. Meyer, Primer of Irish Metrics (1909); V. Zirmunskij, Rifma (1923), ch. 3; J. Romains and G. Chennevière, Petit traité de versif (1923); J. Hytier, Les techniques modernes du vers français (1923), reviewed by M. Grammont in Revue des langues romanes 62 (1923); T. W. Herbert, "Near-Rimes and Paraphones," SR 14 (1937); L. Pszczolowska, Rym (1972); B. P. Goncarov, Zvukovaja organizatsija stixa i problemy rifmy (1973); M. Shapiro, Asymmetry (1976), ch. 4; W. E. Rickert, "Rhyme Terms," Style 12 (1978); M. L. Gasparov, "Towards an Analysis of Russian Inexact Rhyme," Metre, Rhythm, Stanza, Rhyme, ed. G. S. Smith (1980); Scott, 233–36; W. Frawley, "A Note on the Phonology of Slant Rhyme," Lang&S 17 (1984); Scherr, ch. 4; B. J. Small, Positive as Sound (1990)—Dickinson.

T.V.F. Brogan

NEGATIVE CAPABILITY. In an 1817 letter to his brother and sister-in-law, the Brit. romantic poet John Keats coined the term "Negative Capability, that is when man is capable of being in uncertainties, Mysteries, doubts, without any irritable reaching after fact & reason" (Letters). Keats begins by defining the quality broadly as that which informs "a Man of Achievement" but also specifies it as an urgent literary principle with Shakespeare as the primary model.

This single letter is the only remaining record of Keats's use of the term, but the concept deeply informs the poet's thought and poetic works. In a letter of 1818, for instance, Keats's definition of the "poetical Character" as having "no character" appears consistent with the protean mobility of mind that the quality of negative capability entails: the ability not to insist on a conclusion or decision that would eliminate alternate possibilities. Unlike the "wordsworthian or egotistical sublime" that "stands alone," the poetical character "has no self—it is everything and nothing—It has no character—it enjoys light and shade; it lives in gusto, be it foul or fair, high or low, rich or poor, mean or elevated—It has as much delight in conceiving an Iago as an Imogen." As an aesthetic principle, negative capability becomes visible in the blurring of the line between subject and object in "Ode to Psyche" and "Ode to a Nightingale" and in the absence altogether of the pronoun "I" in "To Autumn."

Negative capability enables, moreover, the pursuit of the twin concepts of beauty and truth. "[W]ith a great poet," Keats writes, "the sense of Beauty overcomes every other consideration, or rather obliterates all consideration." Keats criticizes his friend's inability to arrive at a truth as stemming from a lack of negative capability: this friend, Charles Dilke, "cannot feel he has a personal identity unless he has made up his Mind about every thing. The only means of strengthening one's intellect is to make up ones [sic] mind about nothing—to let the mind be a thoroughfare for all thoughts. Not a select party." While the self-containment of individual "identity" limits the imaginative capacity, negative capability embraces the values of uncertainty and doubt that open the mind to multiple possibilities, thereby expanding the imagination so as better to approximate beauty and truth.

See EMPATHY AND SYMPATHY.

■ J. Keats, Letters of John Keats, ed. H. Rollins, 2 v. (1958); N. Roe, Keats and the Culture of Dissent (1997)—230–67 on politics of negative capability; S. Wolfson, "Keats and Gender Criticism," The Persistence of Poetry, ed. R. Ryan and R. Sharp (1999); R. Kaufman, "Negatively Capable Dialectics: Keats, Vendler, Adorno, and the Theory of the Avant-Garde," CritI 27 (2001).

E. ROHRBACH

NEGRITUDE. Negritude began as an aesthetic and literary movement in the 1930s, centering on black consciousness and black creativity. While the movement has no single founding text, it was led by the writings of two black scholars from Fr. colonies, Aimé Césaire of Martinique and Léopold Sédar Senghor of Senegal.

The Fr. term négritude had both a cultural and a political dimension. It gained international recognition as a literary movement with the publication of Césaire's book-length poem Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Notebook of a Return to the Native Land) in 1939. Césaire and Senghor met as colonial scholarship students in Paris. Both had been strongly influenced by recent movements rehabilitating black hist. and culture like the *Harlem Renaissance and such Haitian literary movements as indigénisme and noirisme, and admired greatly the work of such poets as James Weldon Johnson and Claude McKay. The Revue du monde noir (Review of the Black World, 1931–32), introduced them to the work of such thinkers as Langston Hughes and Alain Locke; they were also influenced by the presence in Paris of the Fr. Guyanese author René Maran, the author of Batouala, which had won the Fr. Prix Goncourt in 1921 and had subsequently been banned in Fr. Af. colonies. Together with a group of fellow students, they launched a literary magazine, L'Etudiant noir (The Black Student), which took a militant stand against black cultural assimilation by actively seeking to explore the singularity of the black cultural experience; the publication inaugurated the use of the word Negritude, managing roughly a half-dozen issues before closing in 1936. It contained the work of writers from both Africa and the West Indies, incl. Césaire, Léon Damas, Léonard Sainville, Senghor, and Birago Diop. Together, these publications created the intellectual ferment that gave birth to Negritude. The movement became a framework for the articulation of black consciousness and its attendant cultural expression, esp. important given the context of colonialism and racism.

Initially, Negritude drew heavily on Fr. *surrealism, which first made its appearance in postwar France and influenced greatly recent arrivants like Césaire. To this liberating vein must be added the work of Leo Frobenius, particularly his groundbreaking History of African Civilization, which exploded the myth of Negro barbarity. Negritude's writers inscribed art, emotion, intuition, and rhythm as intrinsic opposites to supposedly Western characteristics of order, reason, and logic.

Negritude embodied an assertion of pride, reversing the traditional denigration of black subjectivity. Through the Cahier's voicing these sentiments, poets rediscovered empathy with their African ancestry, enabling them to join lyricism to self-revelation. Negritude became a framework for creative cultural expression that valorized black civilizations past and present and, thus, at least in the Cahier, challenged the static acceptance of colonial inferiority by actively asserting an alternative historical viewpoint.

Senghor differed from Césaire in both his vision and his practice of Negritude; uncovering the values of the Af. world led him to affirm basic life forces as the enabling framework for a poiēsis of Af. civilization. Senghor promulgated a return to historical and cultural sources through the cultivation of indigenous langs. and trads., reflected in the themes and symbolism of his published poetry.

In his Hosties noires (Black Hosts) and the collection Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue française, Senghor celebrates the culture and trad. of his Af. homeland. In contrast to Césaire's, his writing stresses a particular black emotional and psychological experience, drawing on a specifically Af. relationship to the forces of the universe that is strongly non-Western. For Senghor, the black African perceives and internalizes external stimuli primarily in an emotional way, while the Westerner, in her turn, comprehends the world through analysis and reason. This argument extended a particular ontology to the concept of Negritude, engendering a sense of difference that allowed it to provide an enabling framework for a growing number of Af. and Caribbean writers to express their vision of their own cultural and historical experience, ultimately turning these cultural ends to a politics of liberation.

Negritude was above all a product of its time, one whose primary shortcoming was that it drew unconsciously on the binaries of the colonial era. It gave rise to a flood of creative black expression, but alternative approaches to black identity eventually took its place. Ultimately, it put into practice a discourse of cultural and colonial contestation that led to Caribbean literary movements like antillanité and créolité, as well as independence movements across francophone Africa. Negritude gave value to the black world by embodying the antithesis of the West and by emphasizing an incendiary, if not indeed an insurrectional, vocabulary.

See AFRICA, POETRY OF; CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE.

■ J-P. Sartre, "Orphée Noir," Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue française, ed. L. S. Senghor (1948); L. S. Senghor, Liberté 1: négritude et humanisme (1964); S.W. Bâ, The Concept of Negritude in the Poetry of Léopold Sédar Senghor (1973); B. Cailler, Proposition poétique: une lecture de l'oeuvre d'Aimé Césaire (1976); R. Scharfman, Engagement and the Language of the Subject in the Poetry of Aimé Césaire (1980); A. J. Arnold, Modernism and Negritude: The Poetry and Poetics of Aimé Césaire (1981); Aimé Césaire: The Collected Poetry, trans. C. Eshleman and A. Smith (1983); P. Taylor, The Narrative of Liberation: Perspectives on Afro-Caribbean Literature, Popular Culture, and Politics (1989); R. Confiant, Aimé Césaire: une traversée paradoxale du siècle (1993); M. Richardson, Refusal of the Shadow: Surrealism and the Caribbean, trans. K. Fijalkowski and M. Richardson (1996); G. Davis, Aimé Césaire (1997); C. Filostrat, Negritude Agonistes: Assimilation against Nationalism in the French-Speaking Caribbean and Guyane (2008).

H. A. MURDOCH

NEOBAROQUE. A style of poetry common in the late 20th c. in Latin America, in which *artifice, *figuration, and a consciousness of *textuality are highly developed, often with explicit or covert reference to the *baroque poetry of the early mod. period. The term neobarroco as applied to Latin Am. lit. was arguably coined by the Brazilian poet Haroldo de Campos (1929–2003), writing about Umberto Eco's opera aperta (open work), to refer to the unconventional nature of contemp. writing. As Campos was to insist on several occasions, Latin Am. cultures share a genealogy from the time of their cultural formations under the auspices of the Eur. baroque; they contributed their own inflections to what came to be called the Barroco de Indias (Baroque of the Indies), a major devel. that included the work of perhaps the greatest baroque poet in the Americas, the Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (ca. 1648–95). Through Paul Verlaine and Stéphane Mallarmé, several of the poets of Sp. Am. modernismo* (the Nicaraguan Rubén Darío [1867–1916], the Uruguayan Julio Herrera y Reissig [1875–1910], and the Argentinian Leopoldo Lugones [1874–1938], among others) revisited the poets of the 17th-c. baroque, rereading Francisco de Quevedo, Luis de Góngora, and Félix Lope de Vega in a spirit of appropriation and transformation. In 20th-c. Spain, Federico García Lorca (1898–1936) and his fellow poets belonged to the Generation of 1927, which refers to the tercentenary of Góngora's death (1627). The Mexican poet and critic Alfonso Reyes (1889–1959) and the Cuban José Lezama Lima (1910–76) dedicated influential essays to the Sp. poet. All this is to say that, when Campos first articulated the epithet neobaroque, he was reaching into a complex relation between Latin Am. cultures, mod. as well as colonial, and the early mod. baroque.

In 1972, the seminal essay "El barroco y el neobarroco" by the Cuban writer Severo Sarduy (1937–93) oriented the discussion of the baroque and its outcomes in Latin Am. lit. to the Fr. structuralist and poststructuralist poetics of the Tel Quel* group (see STRUCTURALISM, POSTSTRUCTURALISM). Pointing to writing strategies, Sarduy referred to *intertextuality and intratextuality as signs of the heavily textual fabric of the neobaroque (which extends from lit. to other media, such as film, the visual arts, music, and popular culture). By substitution, proliferation, or condensation of signs, this lit. involves an unusual degree of artifice in lang., esp. the recirculation of *metaphors from all epochs (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). Sarduy referred to various Latin Am. novels that had appeared a few years before his essay, such as Lezama Lima's Paradiso, Gabriel García Márquez's Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude), Guillermo Cabrera Infante's Tres tristes tigres (Three Trapped Tigers), and Alejo Carpentier's El siglo de las luces (The Century of Lights). Following Sarduy, many articles and books on Latin Am. narrative describe a neobaroque poetics and invoke the nomenclature, sometimes as a replacement for lo real maravilloso (usually translated into Eng. as magic realism). But Sarduy also referred in his essay to Pablo Neruda and to a new type of poetry that Campos developed in Galáxias (pub. as individual poems after 1963, collectively in 1984 and 2004), a series of 50 "texts" that play on the border between prose and poetry, between *semantics and *sound. Using *paronomasia as a major technical device, the book is a metonymic adventure in search of the materiality of lang.

Lezama Lima's poetry, Sarduy's essays, the Poundian style of the Peruvian poet Rodolfo Hinostroza's (b. 1941) Contranatura (1970), the erudite new antipoetry of the Mexican Gerardo Deniz (b. 1934), and, in Brazil, the work of Campos and the concretistas served as the background for a new generation of poets that could be loosely linked to the neobaroque. Néstor Perlongher (1949–92) coined the term Neobarroso in order to link it to the dirt or mud of the River Plate. Eduardo Espina (b. 1954) spoke in the same playful tone of barrococó (obviously a play with baroque and rococo*). In 1996, Medusario, a major compilation of neobaroque poetry, circulated widely in Latin America, and this type of poetry became one of the dominant trends in Latin Am. lit. at the end of the 20th c. In addition to the above, other Latin Am. poets commonly associated with the neobaroque are José Kozer (Cuba, b. 1940), David Huerta (Mexico, b. 1949), Coral Bracho (Mexico, b. 1951), Mirko Lauer (Peru, b. 1947), Arturo Carrera (Argentina, b. 1948), Raúl Zurita (Chile, b. 1950), Eduardo Milán (Uruguay, b. 1952), Marosa di Giorgio (Uruguay, 1932–2004), and Reynaldo Jiménez (Peru, b. 1959).

■ J. Lezama Lima, "La curiosidad barroca," La expresión americana (1957); A. Carpentier, "Lo barroco y lo real maravilloso," Razón de ser (1976); H. de Campos,

"The Open Work of Art," trans. M. L. Santaella Braga, Dispositio 6 (1981); S. Sarduy, Ensayos generales sobre el barroco (1987); E. Milán, Una cierta mirada (1989); J. Sefamí, "El llamado de los deseosos: poesía neobarroca latinoamericana (1970–?)," Siglo XX/20th Century 12 (1994); Caribe transplatino, ed. N. Perlongher (1991); Medusario, ed. R. Echavarren, J. Kozer, J. Sefamí (1996); N. Perlongher, Prosa plebeya (1997); J. Sefamí, "Los poetas neobarrocos y el modernismo," Todo ese fuego, ed. Mara García (1999); H. de Campos, "Anthropophagous Reason: Dialogue and Difference in Brazilian Culture" (1982), trans. O. Cisneros, Novas, ed. A. S. Bessa and O. Cisneros (2007); R. Greene, "Baroque and Neobaroque: Making Thistory," PMLA 124 (2009).

J. Sefamí

NEOCLASSICAL POETICS

I. General Survey
II. National Literatures

I. General Survey. Neoclassical poetics concerns the literary aspect of that broad movement in Eur. culture and the arts extending from the early 17th c. to approximately the mid-18th c. Separate literary cultures offer discrete attitudes and varying emphases, but in terms of what is more widely shared, neoclassical poetics is first of all a set of interests deriving from an effort to imitate and reconstitute the literary values of ancient Greece and Rome, continuing the attention of humanism to those values (see RENAISSANCE POETICS) but doing so in reaction against what were thought the stylistic indiscipline and excessive *invention of Ren. poets, esp. the concettismo of the Romance poetries and the Eng. metaphysical mode (see CONCEPTISMO; METAPHYSICAL POETRY). This reactive mood also sets neoclassical poetics against other artistic tendencies in the late 17th and early 18th cs., esp. efforts at verbal *wit, exotic fiction, and contemp. realism. Two general criteria influenced neoclassical crit. with respect to its championing of the ancients: first, the belief that their poems were a more direct and faithful representation of *nature, esp. human nature, than has usually been achieved since; and second, the conviction that the restraint, simplicity, and impersonality in style observable in the best Roman poets were more likely to please an audience. These two values were the principal grounds for an embattled polemic mounted against what was called a barbaric or "gothic" taste (Dominique Bouhours, Conversations of Aristo and Eugene, 1671; Joseph Addison, Spectator nos. 58–63 [1711]).

Influenced by the Renaissance practice of *commonplace collection, Ben Jonson (1572–1637) considers properly exercised *imitation as the assimilation of the best of ancient poetic forms and style to a personal idiom, "to draw forth out of the best and choisest flowers, with the Bee, and turne all into Honey" (Timber [1641]). This concept developed into an adherence to cl. ideas of *decorum and *genre, but there are various shadings of opinion. Bouhours (1628–1702) warns against "larceny" and limiting oneself to cl. models, while Jean de La Bruyère (1645–96) gloomily announces that the ancients have already said everything worth saying (Caractères, 1688). Samuel Johnson (1709–84), on the other hand, recommends caution on the grounds that a copy is almost always inferior to its model (The Rambler no. 121 [1751]).

The cult of imitation, however much its partisans might insist on assimilation and adaptation, nevertheless tended to imply the inimitable mastery of Homer and Virgil, and to a lesser extent of the Gr. and Roman dramatists and lyric poets. It thus gave rise to debates over the relative worth of ancient and mod. writers (see QUERELLE DES ANCIENS ET DES MODERNES) that often took the form of quarreling over which group had the better contact with nature. Nicolas Boileau (1636–1711), e.g., mocks the literal realism of Marc-Antoine Girard de Saint-Amant, who has the fish watching the Israelites marching between the parted waters of the Red Sea (Art poétique [1674], canto 3), and Jonathan Swift (1667–1745) in "The Battle of the Books" (1710) charges the mods. with spinning matter out of their own entrails, like spiders. The ancients, having discovered the natural "laws" governing literary genres, which, in turn, realize the various forms of human social organization and universal (as opposed to particular) experience, thereby stood as a model to be followed by all but the most exceptionally imaginative *genius (Alexander Pope, Essay on Criticism [1711]). This argument depends on a view that associates the ancients with common sense, nature, and the rules of composition, though it must be noted that the rules were often understood as practical guides. Such is the lesson Pierre Corneille (1606–84) hoped to teach in his three "Discours" introducing the 1660 ed. of his works. These essays, his belated answer to the French Académie's adverse judgment of Le Cid (1637), set common sense and the artistic judgment of the poet against the arbitrary authority of the state and trad. At the same time, the natural, far from being the detailed recording of current actuality, is seen as manifested in the typical and in that which transcends temporal and cultural difference (Wellek). The value of such imperatives is that they help to make the works of the past in some sense contemp. The disadvantage, as the partisans of the mod. pointed out, is the discouraging of contemp. talent, the elimination of freshness and variety, and the hardening of poetic forms into fixed genres. One result is the paradox that the most conventional literary forms are considered the closest to nature.

The concept of probability, which for Aristotle had governed the structure of *plot and guaranteed the universality of poetry, formed the heart of this system and was justified on the grounds that inventions that were fantastic or divergent from common experience would be unwelcome to an audience. The unities are defended by many critics on the grounds that they encourage the audience's sense of the correspondence between stage events and likely events. As Crites in John Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668) remarks, "that play is thought to be the nearest imitation of nature, whose plot is confined within [24 hours]." The rules had the effect of imposing strict limitations on poetic invention or exuberance, but their implications in neoclassical poetics go well beyond their apparent status as arbitrary, conventional, and restrictive. Appealing to doxa, what neoclassical critics call probability is closer to what we call public opinion. Poets were given license to modify the details of ancient works to adapt the ancient texts to current stereotypes and social mores. Theories assumed that the contemporary spectator sought the reflection of her own, present-day beliefs and experiences in ancient works. Even so, it escaped no one's notice that, from Homer to John Milton, there were a few exceptional figures whose works could be seen to exemplify the very faults of logic or sense that neoclassical critics liked to enumerate or whose genius seemed to have nothing to do with the observance of established conventions. Moreover, the general neoclassical preference for the *epic as the first among genres is evident in comments testifying to its scale and abundance, e.g., Boileau's approval of its lavish use of trope and myth (L'Art poétique), René Le Bossu's (1631–80) insistence on the greatness and importance of its action (Traité du poème épique, 1675), Thomas Hobbes's (1588–1679) seconding of the "majesty" of the heroic style (Answer to Davenant's Preface to "Gondibert," 1650), and John Dennis's (1657–1734) enthusiastic endorsement of Milton's Paradise Lost as "the greatest poem ever written" (The Grounds of Criticism in Poetry, 1704). And despite Le Bossu's position that epic poems are rationally planned, tightly structured, and basically didactic works, what Alexander Pope (1688–1744) called "a grace beyond the reach of art" and the Fr. termed je ne sais quoi*, the inexplicable, was widely acknowledged. Some 20th-c. scholars argued that this acknowledgment in critics such as Dryden (1631–1700) or Boileau or Johnson reflects a commendable effort to offer a balanced theory of poetics (e.g., Mahoney, Engell), but it can also be seen as a reflection of a profound distrust of the contemp. and of the subjective, a view bolstered by the tendency in 17th- and 18th-c. critical theory to subordinate the writer to his task and his audience, to caution him against vanity and self-indulgence, charges from which Johnson does not exempt Shakespeare, however generous his praise. Nevertheless, contemp. poetry had strong defenders, e.g., Dryden early in his career (An Essay of Dramatic Poesy), Charles Perrault ("Le Siècle de Louis Le Grand," 1687), and Addison (Spectator no. 160 [1711]).

If it is to offer its audience images of nature, then, as John Dennis asserted, "the speech by which poetry makes its imitation must be pathetic" (The Advancement and Reformation of Poetry, 1701). For all the neoclassical claims to a rational, commonsensical, orderly poetic system, it is nevertheless the case that the prerogatives of form exist side by side with a firm belief that the central appeal of poems, plays, and works of fiction is their *representation of human emotion or their providing the audience with an emotional rendering of human events. The rules of verisimilitude were formulated to maximize the likelihood of cathartic response by minimizing the awareness of *artifice. This means that neoclassical poetics invests in the passions as the objects of representation and in emotional response as the portion of the audience, though such orthodox thinkers as Corneille and René Rapin (1621–87) also suppose that, by the end of a *tragedy, the spectator's mind must be, as Corneille remarks, "serene."

Neoclassical and 18th-c. attention to *emotion has further implications. Aristotle proposed as the source of the audience's emotion the movement of tragic action from ignorance to knowledge. This gives way to a mode of action as conflict between irreconcilable claims, and the audience is prompted to respond to the drama of inner conflict, moving away from Aristotle's priority of action to that of character (Corneille, "Essay on Tragedy," 1660). Two separate but related lines of thought about the impact of *tragedy may be noted. On the one hand, there is a reiteration and partial rethinking of the Aristotelian notion of tragic pleasure. *Catharsis, according to Rapin (Réflexions sur la Poétique d'Aristote, 1674), is the spectator's total absorption into the feelings of tragic characters, so that the soul is "shaken" and the mind is cured of its fears; earlier, Boileau had simply required strong emotionalism, and Corneille had seen the tragic emotions as a kind of warning to the audience. Dryden argues that emotions other than pity and fear are common in mod. tragedies ("Heads of an Answer to Rymer," 1677), and Thomas Rymer (1641–1713) himself assents that the effectiveness of tragedy lies in its management of poetic justice ("Tragedies of the Last Age Considered," 1678). Generally, in the early 18th c., there is an increasing emphasis on sympathy or compassion (see EMPATHY AND SYMPATHY) as the spectatorial response to suffering; this is perhaps a reaction to the partial displacement of strictly cl. forms by domestic *pathos. Neoclassical theories of how poetry can engage the emotions to promote moral education prepares a vocabulary that, combined with the etiquette protocol of court society, eventually migrates to shape the discourse of ethics (e.g., Adam Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments, 1767).

The second feature of tragic crit. is what has been called the "Lucretian return upon ourselves," the argument that spectacles of distress and suffering are tolerable and pleasurable because the spectators are themselves exempt, onlookers only (Hathaway). Such a view often equates spectacles such as public executions, in which people actually suffer and die, with theatrical representations. But Jean-Baptiste Du Bos (1670–1742), for one, argued that no one ever mistook a play for real events (Réflexions critiques sur la poésie et la peinture, 1719–33). Perhaps the most sophisticated (though not an influential) theory is David Hume's (1711–76) proposal that the formal properties of the tragedy as a work of art transform and shape events and emotions so that the responses of spectators are themselves different from what they would be to an actual event: "the fiction of tragedy softens the passion, by an infusion of new feeling" ("Of Tragedy," 1757; cf. Cohen).

Interest in kinds of audience response also centers in the sublime*. The term had been used in the Ren. to characterize the grand style (see STYLE), which was thought to prompt the strongest emotion. Boileau's trans. of Longinus's Peri hypsous (On the Sublime, 1674), and esp. his introduction and subsequent comments ("Réflexions"), served to promote an entirely different concept, emphasizing grandness of conception translated by simple and understated lang. The sublime rapidly became a popular subject of critical thought in England and Germany (less so in France and Italy), eventually extending well beyond theories of style or literary representation to include the arts and the experience of landscape, esp. features of overwhelming grandeur such as the Alps (Monk, Nicolson). As a theory of emotional experience, the sublime served neoclassical poetics precisely because it envisaged a transcendence of the limits, visual and imaginative, central to neoclassical aesthetics, offering a contrast of scale by which to differentiate types of aesthetic experience. Artistic representations observing human scale and clearly perceived limits were the province of beauty, a difficult term in that it evoked debate over whether aesthetic experience was entirely subjective or was the consequence of particular properties in the viewed object (Jean-Pierre de Crousaz, Traité du beau, 1685; Francis Hutcheson, Inquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, 1725). Implicated in the debate over the nature of beauty, which was usually defined as unity in multiplicity and as symmetry or its perception, was the troubled question of *taste. Apart from the rather obvious effort of late 17th- and 18th-c. critics to argue for a universal standard of taste, based either in the authority of cl. models or the theories of Johnson and Hume that time reveals universal excellence, taste reveals the neoclassical hunger for an experience of art as spontaneous and uncalculated as possible, joined to a recognition that a superior taste requires study, experience, and civilized company (Edmund Burke, A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful, 1757; Hume, "Of the Standard of Taste," 1757).

The neoclassical interest in measurable limits shows in a concern for the sensory, and esp. the visual, as a component of lang. New significance was given in 17th- and 18th-c. theory to the ancient rhetorical notion of evidentia, which held that lang. could render objects as if present to the sight. John Locke's (1632–1704) theory that lang. represents "ideas" (i.e., mental images) of objects, rather than objects themselves, results in an emphasis on mental "seeing" as a process, as opposed to a static, quasi-pictorial representation (Burke; cf. Hagstrum 1958). A word may prompt us to recall an object, or more properly the idea of an object, but our individual experience, as described by associationist psychology, entails that what we recall is a context. This complicated the neoclassical desire for clarity of representation by suggesting variability of meaning, a problem intensified by the post-Lockean doctrine that words have arbitrarily, not naturally, assigned meanings or referents. It was also eventually to trouble the effort to establish a universal standard of taste, as well as the persistent effort to discover in lang. a means to reconnect the mind with essential nature, i.e., with states of sympathetic feeling.

These tendencies combine in the neoclassical interest in the Horatian formula ut pictura poesis*. This emerged at first in efforts to make fairly simple parallels between the plastic and verbal arts (Dryden, "A Parallel of Poetry and Painting," 1695), and then, beginning with Du Bos's Réflexions and culminating in G. E. Lessing's (1729–81) Laokoön (1766), developed into a countermovement concentrating on the psychological and aesthetic consequences of the radical differences between these media. Poetry was seen to be conditioned by the temporal linearity of lang., and painting and sculpture were understood to represent frozen moments in a narrative—notions that for both Du Bos and Lessing guarantee the superiority of poetry. At the same time, the critical effort involved in these and similar discussions continued to regard words as vehicles rather than objects. In moving from a debate over style to theories of perception and *affect, the attention to lang. also produced extensive efforts, such as those of Étienne Bonnot de Condillac (1715–80), to establish the origins of lang., an activity continued in preromantic and romantic critical theory (see ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS). Yet behind the awareness of lang. as a dynamic system of representation, there lingers the neoclassical desire for a vision of universal and permanent forms and fixed truths (Aarsleff), a desire suggested by the wide interest in the visual and also by the efforts in 17th- and 18th-c. crit. to refine and settle vernacular styles into enduring modes.

II. National Literatures

A. France. France is generally conceded to have established the main outlines of neoclassical poetics to which the rest of Europe responded and referred. One of the earliest critics to offer prescriptive standards for poetry, Jean Chapelain (1595–1674), censures Giambattista Marino's Adone (1623), for its lack of verisimilitude (what ought to be) and its promotion of the marvelous in excessive *ornament: both, he argues, distract the reader to secondary and inessential features of the poem. His approach is neo-Aristotelian and Horatian: he prescribes utility joined to pleasure, proclaims the natural origin of the rules and conventional genres, and insists on a style limited to what the subject matter dictates ("Letter . . . Conveying His Opinion of Adone," 1623). Chapelain is famous for having attacked Corneille's handling of the unities in his Les Sentiments de l'Académie française sur la tragi-comédie du Cid (1638), which eventually prompted Corneille's Trois Discours sur le poème dramatique (Three Discourses on Dramatic Poetry, 1660), in which the playwright generally adhered to a version of cl. rules while significantly modifying them. Jean Racine (1639–99) offered a more strictly correct dramatic practice, one that combined severe formal restraint enclosing powerful emotional conflict. The 17th c., which saw the appearance of the major writers of Fr. *classicism—Corneille, Racine, Molière, and Jean de La Fontaine—has been described as a time when poetry achieved an esp. concentrated analysis of the human character (Peyre), but it should also be understood as a period of primary critical attention to the impact of poetry on its audience.

Strictness of generic form and prescriptions for style are the twin poles of Fr. classicism as urged by the two most influential critics of the later 17th c., Bouhours and Boileau. Bouhours crystallized the reaction against concettismo and *baroque support of verbal ornament, arguing for restraint in *metaphor and a congruity of subject matter and expression. He thus established the influential view that verbal ornament by itself is vain, that it can be tolerated only by logical indebtedness to a prior and authorizing concept. Boileau expressed similar views in arguing for a reasoned and calculated exercise of the established poetic genres, though his comments on the sublime propose less obvious relationships, and his instructions for tragic drama, in contrast to the pedantic Abbé d'Aubignac (1604–76), allow room for elevated diction and strong metaphor as agencies of powerful emotional effect. Generally the tone of Boileau's treatise is reasonable, but his critical procedure accepts the inevitability of genres and the aim of pleasing as requiring the knowledgeable artist, i.e., a man of taste (Brody 1958). Some mod. crit. tends to emphasize the sanity, rational freedom, even the wise conformity of the major Fr. classicist critics and poets (Borgerhoff, Peyre). Although there is a tendency to see classicism as dissipated in the early 18th c. under pressure from Enlightenment thinking (Peyre), Voltaire (1694–1778) continues the standard views of tragic form, and Du Bos, who explores the topic of pleasure, can be seen as extending neoclassical interests in theatrical spectacle. Rapin's neo-Aristotelian writings were widely echoed, among other things in maintaining the doctrine of illusion in conformity with "bienséance" (decorum), and verisimilitude. Denis Diderot's (1713–84) dramatic crit. (Entretiens sur le fils naturel, 1757; De la poésie dramatique, 1758; Le Paradoxe sur le comédien, 1770–77), shifts away from neoclassical orthodoxy, arguing against the maneuvers of illusionism and the theatricality of rules and poetic lang. Nevertheless, the triumph of Fr. classicism lies in its concern for the theatrical both as genre and as a basis for theoretical speculation.

B. Britain. Here neoclassical poetics has its foreshadowings in Jonson and extends nearly to the end of the 18th c. (Crane), but its maturity owes much to the Fr. example, however often Eng. critics deplore Fr. pedantry and rigidity. Dryden translated Boileau's Art poétique, and though he was sensitive to a variety of critical views, the burden of his dramatic crit. is to argue with Fr. theories with Fr. examples in mind. Rymer, the translator of Rapin, is the most obviously orthodox of the Eng. neoclassical critics, demanding strict attention to the unities and rigid probability, as his negative account of Othello indicates ("A Short View of Tragedy"). Addison's view of Eng. tragedy is scarcely more generous, measuring the local taste for "butchery" on stage against superior continental delicacy (cf. Spectator no. 42, 44). Many critics in spite of their allegiance to classicist standards accepted what were considered the obvious deviations of Shakespeare—Dryden, Pope, and Johnson are the critics most often cited—while others, such as Addison, sought to accommodate Milton to neoclassical standards (Spectator no. 279).

More broadly viewed, Eng. neoclassical poetics is a continuing effort to reduce lit. and its crit. to a system governed by a theory of pleasure derived from empirical psychology and responsive to what Addison calls a "polite" imagination (Spectator nos. 409–10). On the one hand, this disposition shares in the Fr. distaste for excesses of stylistic ornament and penchant for powerful emotional affect; on the other hand, it anticipates the extensive Eng. and Scottish interest in aesthetics. Addison, though himself most unsystematic, with the help of Anthony Ashley Cooper, the third Earl of Shaftesbury (1671–1713), is the key figure, raising the issues of taste, *imagination, and visual and verbal affect that were taken up by Hutcheson, Burke, Hume, Alexander Gerard (1728–95), and Lord Kames (Henry Home, 1696–1792), to name the more obvious.

Dennis's interest in emotionalism (The Grounds of Criticism in Poetry, 1704), Addison's discussion of the sublime in Spectator no. 412, and Mark Akenside's incoherent but immensely popular poem The Pleasures of Imagination (1774) helped make the sublime a central topic of Eng. crit. throughout the 18th c. Burke's definition of the sublime as terror of the unseen links it to tragedy, and it has from the time of Hobbes been tied to heroic poetry, esp. by Dennis and Addison. Although the sublime was generally supposed as a result of Boileau's theory to be a category of experience and thought beyond lang., it was nevertheless seen to result in the lang. of transport. At the same time, its devel. in Eng. was closely linked to an interest in landscape (see LANDSCAPE POETRY).

For many mod. critics, Samuel Johnson represents the most mature and flexible representative of neoclassical thought in his insistence on a timeless, universal critical standard ("Preface to Shakespeare" [1765]), his belief that the poet's task is to record the typical (Rasselas, ch. 10 [1759]), and his dislike of romance. Consistently, he censures the metaphysicals for a lack of logic, while conceding their learning, and praises Shakespeare while depriving him of everything local, Elizabethan, and idiosyncratic (Life of Cowley [1779], "Preface to Shakespeare").

C. Germany. German neoclassical poetics has two phases. The first, exemplified by J. C. Gottsched's (1700–66) Versuch einer kritischen Dichtkunst (1730), is deeply indebted to Boileau and Fr. classicism and characterized by their doctrines of imitation, style, and genre. The second and aesthetic phase, which owes something to Gottsched's concept of beauty as the perfection of the poem, begins in Johann Winckelmann's (1717–68) Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in der Malerei und Bildhauerkunst (Thoughts on the Imitation of the Painting and Sculpture of the Greeks, 1755) and culminates in the critical reflections and early work of J. W. Goethe (1749–1832). Ger. neoclassicism overlaps substantially with *romanticism, sometimes in the same writer. Both strains are powerfully philosophical, neoclassical poetics being grounded in the rationalism of G. W. Leibniz (1646–1716) and the Cartesian psychology of Christian Wolff (1679–1754). There is a consistent and conscious line of critical theorizing from A. G. Baumgarten (1714–62), G. F. Meier (1718–77), and Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86) to Lessing that argues for a poetics following the general laws of reason, probability, and internal consistency deduced from the nature of the representational faculties. This theory links the poem to beauty as a relation between the object, its representation, and the effect in the soul. Since the relationship is all important, the verbal sign must be transparent (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). Lessing develops this theory by proposing that the object of aesthetic enjoyment is not the words of the poetic text but the imaginative concepts they prompt (Laokoön, ch. 17). Ger. neoclassical aestheticism flourished in the context of the Hellenism popularized by Winckelmann, for whom the Gr. concept of beauty was its supposed "noble simplicity and tranquil grandeur," a view challenged by Lessing's theory of narrative and dramatic dynamism.

The classicism of Friedrich Schiller (1759–1805) and Goethe proposes a new direction, beginning with Schiller's idea of an absolute value for the work of art independent of its effect on the reader or spectator. Schiller opposes mimetic emotional immediacy and requires an artistic idealizing (review of Bürger's poems, 1791; Hohendahl). Goethe supplements Schiller by a concept of style that universalizes and objectifies, producing the cl. symbolic form as a cognition of essences; thus, he moves toward a concept of lit. as autonomous (Hohendahl; see AUTONOMY).

D. Italy. It. neoclassical poetics is complicated by the 17th-c. Fr. attack on Ren. It. poets, esp. Torquato Tasso and Giambattista Marino, which divided the sympathies of It. critics drawn to neoclassical doctrine. With the arrival of G. V. Gravina (1664–1718), however, a spirit of undivided neoclassicism took over, a reaction against Marino having taken root in the founding of the academy Arcadia at Rome in 1690. Dedicated to the propagation of buon gusto (good taste) and the establishment of the laws of poetry manifested in generic orthodoxy and simplicity of style and feeling, the influence of the Arcadian academy reached well into the 18th c. Gravina's attention to the ties between science and art included an interest in the early hist. of poetry, esp. the Homeric poems, but unlike Giambattista Vico (1668–1744), who looked on early poetic expression as a necessary feature of barbaric humanity, Gravina finds in them an expression of Gr. life. Another Arcadian, G. M. de'Crescimbeni (1663–1728), links the vernacular to Gr. poetry and prescribes an internal spiritual beauty against external, superficial ornament. Somewhat differently, the familiar topics of the beautiful and the true as the objects of imitation, as well as the problem of taste, appear in Giuseppe Spalletti's (fl. 1746) Saggio sopra la bellezza (1765). An empiricist, Spalletti contends that beauty is determined by repeated sensory observation and that aesthetic pleasure has its source in human amour propre (self-regard). The Enlightenment interest in lit. hist. emerges in the extensive antiquarian studies of L. A. Muratori (1672–1750), who with Gravina sought in promoting visual representation and probability to recover the best elements of It. Ren. poetry from the indiscipline of the baroque. A different side of It. neoclassicism appears in the work of Melchiorre Cesarotti (1730–1808). An admirer of Gravina, he was familiar with Brit. empiricism, argued against Du Bos and Hume about tragic emotion, praised Lucian over Homer, and produced important essays on the philosophy of linguistic change.

E. Spain. The effects of Eur. neoclassical poetics and of neoclassicism in general are belated in Sp. culture and coexist with vestiges of baroque styles during the early 18th c. and with sentimental and preromantic impulses somewhat later. As elsewhere, Fr. classicist doctrine was imported to combat what some saw as excessive and lawless habits of expression. A beginning is illustrated in the Real Academia Española's effort to regularize the vernacular in its dictionary (1714) and the attempt at encouraging a standard marks the Poética (1737) of Ignazio de Luzán (1702–54), a Boileau-like manifesto urging moral purpose in lit. by means of common sense, clarity, and simplicity of style, restraint of the imagination, verisimilitude, and the imitation of nature. A member of the symptomatically named Academia del Buen Gusto (Academy of Good Taste), Luzan belonged to an anti-Góngora set in reaction to baroque style, much as had their Fr. predecessors Bouhours and Boileau. The Benedictine essayist B. J. Feijoo (1676–1764) was perhaps the most instrumental figure in urging northern Eur. culture on Spain. His volumes Teatro critico universal (1726–39) and Cartas eruditas y curiosas (1742–60) involved every conceivable subject while focusing on ignorance and superstition, encouraged literary rules, but conceded the exemption of genius (no sé qué).

Later 18th-c. Sp. neoclassical poetics is exemplified by Nicolás Fernández de Moratín (1737–80), ed. of the periodical El Poeta (est. 1764) and a tragedian. His work argued for traditional values and historical and patriotic subjects, but like much Sp. neoclassical tragedy at this time, it reflected the taste of the court rather than the theater-going population at large. His son, Leandro Fernández de Moratín (1760–1828), produced comedies and within a neoclassical framework developed a form of *comedy featuring contests between the forces of reason and unreason. Besides the obvious influence of writers such as Boileau, Voltaire, and Jean-Jacques Rousseau, educated Sp. taste was conversant with the works of André, Charles Batteux, Du Bos, Diderot, and Jean-François Marmontel, as well as Hutcheson, Addison, Pope, Shaftesbury, Burke, and Blair. And as in the countries from which Sp. neoclassical crit. drew its examples, it gave way at the end of the century to preromantic and romantic tendencies with which it had coexisted in its later stages, tendencies that in various ways dissipated concerns for critical rationalism, rules, imitation, stylistic moderation and simplicity, and various forms of restraint.

F. Russia. Almost entirely derivative from Fr. and Eng. models, Rus. neoclassical poetics was encouraged by Peter the Great's efforts to modernize Rus. culture. It largely took shape as an interest in the standard litzerary genres and their rules or features, as presented in Boileau's Art poétique. Much translated into Rus. in the 18th c., this work was seminal in encouraging judgment, discrimination, and simplicity of style, though Mikhail Lomonosov (1711–65), with some affinity for the strain of précisité* in 17th-c. Fr. lit., and influenced in part by Ger. baroque aesthetics, in part by the work of the Jesuit Nicolas Caussin, offered a more emotive and rhetorically ornamental version of the *ode. At the same time, he accepted the cl. rhetorical doctrine of three levels of style. A more thoroughly conventional adaptation of Fr. doctrine informs the Kiev Academy lectures of Feofan Prokopovich (1681–1736) on poetics and rhet. (1705–7). These insisted on imitation of Gr. and Lat. models for style and repeated the usual Horatian imperatives of delight and utility.

The central figure in Rus. neoclassicism is A. P. Sumarokov (1717–77). Using Boileau to propagate the concept of dramatic rules, Sumarokov wrote in some detail on the genres and unities and discussed the major figures in Fr. classicism, as well as exhibiting some acquaintance with Shakespeare, Milton, Tasso, and Luís de Camões. In all, he wrote nine tragedies, imitating Racine, Corneille, and Voltaire, a practice that indicates that neoclassical imitation was as much an effort to adapt nearly contemp. models as it was a conformity to Gr. or Roman originals (Brown). Other features of the Rus. movement may be seen in the ode on taste of V. I. Maikov (1728–78), a follower of Sumarakov's, and in the didacticism of G. R. Derzhavhin (1743–1816). Although the dominance of neoclassicism in Rus. lasted only a brief time (ca. 1747–70), when the drift toward romanticism begins, it is important in Europeanizing and modernizing Rus. lit. and critical thinking and in providing examples and concepts that significantly broadened and sophisticated Rus. letters.

See NAÏVE-SENTIMENTAL, PREROMANTICISM, SENSIBILITY, SENTIMENTALITY.

■ General Studies: K. Borinski, Die Antike in Poetik und Kunsttheorie, 2 v. (1914–23); S. H. Monk, The Sublime: A Study of Critical Theories in XVIII-Century England (1935); B. Hathaway, "The Lucretian 'Return upon Ourselves' in 18th-Century Theories of Tragedy," PMLA 62 (1947); J. Hagstrum, Samuel Johnson's Literary Criticism (1952); R. S. Crane, The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry (1953); Wellek; Wimsatt and Brooks; J. Hagstrum, The Sister Arts (1958); M. H. Nicolson, Mountain Gloom and Mountain Glory (1959); R. Cohen, "The Transformation of Passion: A Study of Hume's Theories of Tragedy," PQ 41 (1962); L. Lipking, The Ordering of the Arts in 18th-Century England (1970); Saisselin; T. Jones and B. Nicol, Neoclassical Dramatic Criticism, 1560–1770 (1976); H. Aarsleff, From Locke to Saussure (1982); D. L. Patey, Probability and Literary Form (1984); J. Mahoney, The Whole Internal Universe: Imitation and the New Defense of Poetry (1985); J. Engell, Forming the Critical Mind: Dryden to Coleridge (1989); J. Levine, The Battle of the Books: History and Literature in the Augustan Age (1991); R. L. Montgomery, Terms of Response (1992); R. Habib, A History of Literary Criticism (2005); A Companion to Eighteenth-Century Poetry, ed. C. Gerrard (2006); P. Shaw, The Sublime (2006); The Classical Tradition, ed. A. Grafton, G. Most, S. Settis (2010).

■ National Literatures. France: R. Bray, La Formation de la doctrine classique en France (1931); P. Bénichou, Morales du Grand Siècle (1948); H. Peyre, Qu'est-ce que le classicisme?, rev. ed. (1965); B. Tocanne, L'idée de nature en France dans la seconde moitié du XVII siècle (1978); G. Pocock, Boileau and the Nature of Neo-Classicism (1980); M. Hobson, The Object of Art (1982); Hollier; P. Dandry, "Les deux esthétiques du classicism français," Littératures classiques 19 (1993); B. Beugnot, La Mémoire du texte: essais de poétique classique (1994); P. Dandry, "Qu'est-ce que le classicisme?," L'état classique, 1652–1715, ed. H. Méchoulan and J. Cornette (1996); N. Cronk, French Neoclassicism and the Language of Literature (2003); B. Craveri, The Age of Conversation (2005); L. Norman, The Shock of the Ancient: Literature and History in Early Modern France (2011). Britain: J.W. H. Atkins, English Literary Criticism: Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1951); R. Cohen, "The Augustan Mode in English Poetry," Eighteenth-Century Studies 1 (1967); P. Stone, The Art of Poetry: 1750–1820 (1967); J. Johnson, The Formation of English Neoclassical Thought (1967); E. Marks, The Poetics of Reason (1968); R. Stock, Samuel Johnson and Neoclassical Dramatic Theory (1973); E. Pechter, Dryden's Classical Theory of Literature (1975); Horace Made New, ed. D. Hopkins and C. Martindale (1993); The Sublime: A Reader in British Eighteenth-Century Aesthetic Theory, ed. A. Ashfield and P. De Bolla (1996); Augustan Critical Writing, ed. D. Womersley (1997); B. Parker, The Triumph of Augustan Poetics (1998); Eighteenth-Century British Aesthetics, ed. D. Townsend (1999); A Companion to Hume, ed. E. Radcliffe (2011). Germany: E. Cassirer, The Philosophy of the Enlightenment, trans. F.C.A. Koelln and J. P. Pettegrove (1951); A. Nivelle, Les théories esthétiques en Allemagne de Baumgarten à Kant (1955); H. Allison, Lessing and the Enlightenment (1966); K. Scherpe, Gattungspoetik im 18. Jahrhundert (1968); D. Wellbery, Lessing's "Laocoön": Semiotics and Aesthetics in the Age of Reason (1984); K. Berghan, "From Classicist to Classical Literary Criticism, 1730–1806," A History of German Literary Criticism, 1730–1980, ed. P. Hohendahl (1985); H. Nisbet, "Introduction," German Aesthetic and Literary Criticism, ed. H. Nisbet (1985); B. Bennett, Goethe's Theory of Poetry (1986); F. J. Lamport, German Classical Drama (1992); P. Mitchell, Johann Christoph Gottsched (1700–1766) (1995); S. Marchand, Down from Olympus: Archaeology and Philhellenism in Germany, 1750–1970 (1996); A New History of German Literature, ed. D. Wellbery, J. Ryan, and H. U. Gumbrecht (2004). Italy*: H. Quigley, Italy and the Rise of a New School of Criticism in the Eighteenth Century (1923); M. Fubini, Dal Muratori al Baretti (1946); B. Croce, La letteratura italiana del Settecento (1949); J. Whitfield, A Short History of Italian Literature (1960); Antologia della critica letteraria, ed. G. Petronio, v. 2 (1967); G. Petrocchi, Questioni di critica letteraria (1970); G. Natali, Il settecento, 4th ed., ch. 6 (1973). Spain*: J. Cook, Neoclassical Drama in Spain: Theory and Practice (1959); N. Glendinning, A Literary History of Spain: The Eighteenth Century (1972); J. Stamm, A Short History of Spanish Literature (1979); F. Aguilar Piñal, Introducción al Siglo XVIII (1991); R. Sebold, La perduración de la modalidad clásica (2001); J. Berbel, Orígenes de la tragedia neoclásica española (1737–1754) (2003); Cambridge History of Spanish Literature, ed. D. Gies (2004). Russia*: D. Cizevskij, History of Russian Literature from the Eleventh Century to the End of the Baroque (1970); The Eighteenth Century in Russia, ed. J. G. Garrard (1973); R. Neuhauser, Towards the Romantic Age: Essays on Sentimental and Preromantic Literature in Russia (1974); Russian Literature in the Age of Catherine the Great, ed. A. Gross (1976); W. E. Brown, A History of Eighteenth-Century Russian Literature (1980); Cambridge History of Russian Literature, ed. C. A. Moser (1989).

R. L. Montgomery, K. Hume

NEO-GONGORISM. A term used to designate a brief but significant 20th-c. Sp. poetic trend stemming from a revival of the 17th-c. *baroque poet Luis de Góngora (1561–1627) on the tricentennial of his death. Góngora's style, characterized by brilliant if extravagant *metaphors and convoluted or Latinate syntax, created a new interest in the formal possibilities of lang. that led to the publication of mod. eds. of his work and important stylistic studies of his poetry. Among contributors to this vogue were Dámaso Alonso, Gerardo Diego, and José Maria de Cossío. Renewed enthusiasm for Góngora was esp. reflected in the poets of the Generation of 1927, whose name may be attributed to the commemoration they organized in that year. The group carried out a conscious revision of baroque lit., which affirmed its own difficulty. The first rediscovery of Góngora's writing has also been attributed to the poetic revisions by Sp. Am. writers José Martí and Rubén Darío, and later Alfonso Reyes, prior to the Generation of 1927. The Novísimos generation of 1968 again paid homage to Góngora.

The selection of baroque art as a basis for renovation has been explained by the lack of a strong romantic movement in Sp. In part, the 20th c.'s interest came from Góngora's identity as an unassimilated or "different" poet; his techniques of ling. structure sought a fundamental renovation of creative expression in a way paradoxically similar to the *avant-garde poetics emerging at the same time. While the avant-garde rejected Western high culture and was antiacademy, Góngora was accepted because he signified the reworking of syntax and the creation of neologisms. Important works by this movement include Rafael Alberti's Cal y canto, Gerardo Diego's Fábula de Equis y Zeda, Miguel Hernández's Perito en Lunas, and Federico García Lorca's remarkable lecture on poetic imagery in Góngora's work.

See creationism; spain, poetry of; ultraism.

■ H. Friedrich, Die Struktur der modernen Lyrik (1956); P. Salinas, Reality and the Poet in Spanish Poetry (1966); C. B. Morris, A Generation of Spanish Poets, 1920–1936 (1969); J.-C. Mainer, La edad de plata (1902–1939) (1981); J. L. Bernal, Gerardo Diego y la vanguardia hispánica: Actas del Congreso Internacional Iberoamérica y España en la Génesis de la Vanguardia Hispánica (1993); R. González Echevarría, Celestina's Brood: Continuities of the Baroque in Spain and Latin America (1993); N. Palenzuela, "Cubismo y neogogorismo en las poéticas narrativas de los años veinte" (1994); J. Delgado Casado and P. Canelo, Gerardo Diego y la poesía española del siglo XX (1996); Hispanic Baroques: Reading Cultures in Context, ed. N. Spadaccini and L. Martín Estudillo (2005).

A. W. Phillips; K. N. March

NEOTERICS (Gr. neoteroi, "new poets"). In Roman antiquity, the term and its cognates (Lat. poetae novi and cantores Euphorionis; Gr. neoteroi) are applied by Cicero to the members of the fashionable trend in Roman poetry to which he belonged himself in his younger period, influenced by Alexandrian Gr. poetry and its later devels. The most famous example is Catullus, but others whose work survives in fragments are Laevius, Calvus, Cinna, Cornificius, Furius Bibaculus, and Ticidas. The Alexandrian poets who served as antecedents included Callimachus and Theocritus. The term neoteric has been extended to later cohorts in the Roman trad.—a notable instance is a group, often called the poetae novelli, flourishing in the 2d c. CE—and to postclassical vernacular poets in Europe who styled themselves (or were retrospectively designated) as new poets.

See alexandrianism, latin poetry.

■ J. de Ghellinck, "Neotericus, neoterics," Archiuum Latinatis Medii Aevi 15 (1940); B. Otis, Virgil (1963); E. Castorina, Questioni Neoteriche (1968); R. Helgerson, "The New Poet Presents Himself: Spenser and the Idea of a Literary Career," PMLA 93 (1978); R.O.A.M. Lyne, "The Neoteric Poets," CQ 28 (1978); W. V. Clausen, "The New Direction in Poetry," CHCL, v. 2; J. K. Newman, Roman Catullus (1990); R. D. Brown, "The New Poet": Novelty and Tradition in Spenser's "Complaints" (1999); R. Greene, "Spenser and Contemporary Vernacular Poetry," Cambridge Companion to Spenser, ed. A. Hadfield (2001).

J. K. Newman

NEPĀL BHĀṢA. See newar poetry.

NEPALI AND PAHARI POETRY. The Pahari langs. form a band along the Himalayan range from Kashmir through Nepal. By the early 19th c., the entire region was divided among small principalities in the west, territory under the control of the Brit. Empire in the center, and the newly consolidated kingdom of Nepal in the east. Of the various langs., Nepali came to serve as the vehicle of a national lit. of the mod. type, while Dogri has been named one of the official langs. of the Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir. Between these extremes, the territory now forming the Indian states of Himachal Pradesh and Uttarakhand adopted Hindi as the official lang., with Pahari langs. persisting as the tongues of household and of oral lit. and ritual.

One of the striking characteristics of all Pahari-speaking territories is the richness of oral poetic trads. Noteworthy are *ballad singing (cf. the Gaine of central Nepal), humorous and satiric poetry and song, and the role of mythic narrative as part of rituals, sometimes of shamanic healing. Throughout, poets have maintained what is probably an ancient office of praising kings (see EPIDEICTIC POETRY, PANEGYRIC). In particular, the Central Himalayan region, incl. Uttarakhand and far western Nepal, shows a distinctive devel. of *narrative poetry performed by singer-drummers. These bards perform *epics, heroic ballads, vernacular renditions of Hindu epics and myths, and narrative *hymns to the regional gods, in a variety of styles.

Throughout the Himalayas, the last centuries have also seen the devel. of vernacular written lits. inspired both by Sanskritic and North Indian models and by local trads.

Western Pahari courtly langs. served for the trans. of religious poetry, while Dogri has had an established literary trad. since the 18th c. In the Central Himalayas, poetry has been written in the two main langs., Garhwali and Kumaoni, since the early 19th c. Lok Ratna Pant "Gumāni" (1791–1846) is said to have established Kumaoni as a literary lang., while Gaurī Datt Pāṇḍe "Gaurdā" (1872–1939) is remembered for sensitive and sometimes satirical poetry, often in the cause of social reform and Indian independence. In the Indian Himalayas, efforts to valorize regional langs. have continued, and there has been a renaissance of topical and popular song, often with a political edge.

In Nepal, the earliest written poetry, dating from the late 18th c., consists of martial epics praising the king. But the foundational text of Nepali lit. is usually considered Bhānubhakta's (1814–68) rendition of the Rāmāyaṇa, composed in something close to spoken Nepali. This work was rediscovered by Motīrām Bhaṭṭa (1866–96), another major poet. Three great names dominated the 20th c.: the master craftsman Lekhnāth Pauḍyāl (1884–1965), who was influenced by oral poetic forms; Bālkṛṣṇa Sama (1902–81), known primarily for his dramas; and the neoromantic Lakṣmīprasād Devkoṭa (1909–59; see Rubin), who composed his ballad Munā Madan, still sung today, in folk meters. From the 1940s, traditional verse forms were challenged, and from the 1960s, with the Tesro Āyām (Third Dimension) poets, there was an opening to personal expression. Since then, Nepali poetry has gone through a series of movements, all related, as elsewhere in the Pahari-speaking region, to political struggles. The tension here is among poetry as a self-referential craft of lang., as a vehicle of sometimes subtle self-expression, and as a tool for social transformation.

See HINDI POETRY; INDIA, POETRY OF; KASHMIRI POETRY; RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY.

■ D. Rubin, Nepali Visions, Nepali Dreams: The Poetry of Laxmiprasad Devkota (1980); K. Pradhan, A History of Nepali Literature (1984); K. Meissner, Malushahi and Rajula: A Ballad from Kumaun (1985); M. Hutt, Himalayan Voices: An Introduction to Modern Nepali Literature (1991); C. C. Pande, Echoes from the Hills: Poems of Gaurda (1997); G. Maskarinec, Nepalese Shaman Oral Texts (1998).

J. LEAVITT

NETHERLANDS, POETRY OF THE. See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE.

NEWAR POETRY. Nepāl Bhāṣā (Kathmandu Newar), the lang. of the Newars, is a Tibeto-Burman lang. spoken primarily in the Kathmandu Valley. The term Nepāl Bhāṣā is the traditional and preferred term, although Newar and Newari are often used. Written sources from the med. period date back as early as 1114 CE. Of the approximately 350 Tibeto-Burman langs., only three others have literary trads. of comparable historical depth.

In the Malla era (1400–1769), the cl. literary lang. was highly Sanskritized, with much of the vocabulary from Indic sources. Verse forms imitating Sanskrit models appeared in the 15th c., sometimes authored by royalty, often anonymous. These sung verse forms (mye) were primarily religious, with the exception of the bākhā mye (ballad songs) and sinhājyā mye (rice-planting songs). Characteristically, in Newar, the sinhājyā mye invoke the spring passions of men and women working together during planting season. Many continue to be sung in the mod. period.

With the Gorkha conquest of the Kathmandu Valley in 1769 and the promotion of Nepāli, an Indic lang., under the Shah regime (1769–1847), Newar cultural institutions began to suffer. During the Rana period (1905–51), Newar-lang. publications were banned outright, writers and activists jailed. Shaped by this oppression, the mod. era also contains the seeds of resistance and a literary renaissance. Among the poets of this period, Siddhi Dās Āmātya (1867–1930) and Yogbir Singh Kansākār (1885–1941) were foundational influences.

The iconic poet of the 20th c. Nepāl Bhāṣā movement is Chittadhar Hṛdaya (1906–82). Jailed five years for literary activism, Chittadhar withstood confinement by writing his masterpiece Sugata Saurabha and having the chapters smuggled out of prison. The epic poem (19 chs.) is a deeply erudite Nepāl Bhāṣā redaction of the Buddha's life in rhymed *couplets, employing Sanskrit meters and allusions to canonical Buddhist biographical and philosophical trads. More significant where the canonical sources lacked narrative detail, the poet localizes the Buddha's story, weaving in details unique to Newar culture: food, domestic life, clothing and jewelry, music, rites of passages, marriage customs, rituals, festivals, even local architecture. The chapters teem with allusions to contemp. social concerns. Similarly, the vocabulary ranges from esoteric religious terms to colloquial, onomatopoeic expressions ubiquitous in Newar conversation. This complex intertextuality brings Nepāl Bhāṣā poetry into the mod. period. Others of Chittadhar's poems reflect contemp. themes and greater formal flexibility. In TB, a recovering wife in a sanitarium finds her husband has taken a second wife. Pragati is an allegorical critique of the mod. concept of progress.

With the onset of a fragile democracy in 1951, contemp. poets exhibit increased formal freedoms, political awareness, and secularization. Durga Lāl Śhresta (b. 1937), a prolific composer of songs, plays, and poems, writes richly melodic lines: imagistic, deeply personal and political. Purna Vaidya (b. 1941) brings introspective *free-verse sensibilities to contemp. Newar poetry. With the increasing influence of Eng. and the educational system's emphasis on Nepali as a national lang., today's poets face the challenge of sustaining the Nepāl Bhāṣā literary community.

See INDIA, POETRY OF; NEPALI AND PAHARI POETRY; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY.

■ K. P. Malla, Classical Newari Literature (1982); Songs of Nepal, ed. S. Lienhard (1984); C. Hṛdaya, Dega (Pagoda), trans. V. P. Lācoul, M. Karmācārya, U. Malla (1996); A Representative Collection of Nepal Bhasa Poems, ed. K. C. Pradhan, trans. T. L. Tulādhar and W. Amtis (1997); D. L. Śhresta, Twists and Turns, trans. T. T. Tulādhar (2000); Contemporary Writing in Nepāl Bhāṣā, ed. B. P. Śhresta and P. S. Tulādhar (2000); C. Hṛdaya, Sugata Surabha, trans. T. T. Lewis and S. M. Tulādhar (2007).

D. HARGREAVES

NEW CRITICISM. A term used to designate the work of a wide variety of Anglo-Am. critics writing between the 1920s and 1960s. It was first coined by John Crowe Ransom in his 1941 book by the same name, a critical study of the work of I. A. Richards, William Empson, T. S. Eliot, and Yvor Winters. At various times, the label has also been applied to critics as diverse as Kenneth Burke, R. P. Blackmur, and René Wellek. However, as most commonly used, the term refers to the movement to reform Am. literary scholarship and pedagogy spearheaded by Ransom and a group of his former students: Cleanth Brooks, Allen Tate, and Robert Penn Warren. These writers advocated a formalist approach to practical crit., a distillation of modernist ideas about lit. that had circulated among the literary avant-garde since the 1910s and 1920s.

As an institutional movement, the New Criticism originated at Vanderbilt University in the early 1920s. Ransom, a lecturer at the university, introduced the method of *close reading into his classes. An accomplished poet, he also became the central figure in a modernist literary coterie called the *Fugitives, which encompassed several of Ransom's most gifted students, incl. Tate and Warren. This group evolved into a regionalist political movement known as the Agrarians and published their key manifesto, I'll Take My Stand, in 1930. This text argued for the preservation of a distinctive southern U.S. culture and economics against the intrusion of the industrial North. By the mid-1930s, Ransom and many fellow Agrarian writers had become disenchanted with regional politics and instead focused their energies upon the reform of literary studies. Ransom became the ed. of the influential critical jour. The Kenyon Review. Warren and Brooks joined The Southern Review and also published a series of undergraduate textbooks that reshaped Am. literary pedagogy: Understanding Poetry and Understanding Fiction. The resulting New Criticism was less an abandonment of the Agrarians' anti-industrial, conservative ideology than a reconstitution of it on other grounds. The New Critics viewed lit. as a repository of the anti-scientific rationality that they had previously associated with the traditional culture and agricultural economy of the southern U.S. In Ransom's terms, poetry embodies an experience of preconceptual particularity, what he called the "world's body," otherwise inaccessible to the mod., Western mind. The New Critics hoped to transform literary studies into a discipline capable of tracing the ontological maneuver by which the lang. of poetry evades the rationalism of scientific thought.

Most of the New Critics contrasted this approach to crit. to two types of literary scholarship predominant in the 1930s academy. First, they distanced themselves from biographical and historical studies of lit. Second, they rejected the impressionistic crit. of humanists such as Irving Babbitt. Like the Rus. formalists of the 1920s, they instead argued for an objective crit. that would identify the literariness of literary lang.—the structural and linguistic features that distinguish it from other types of writing. These features were esp. evident in poetry—for the New Critics, the quintessential literary art. In particular, the New Critics highlighted the pervasiveness of *irony and *paradox in poetry, which disrupted the denotative clarity of ordinary prose.

This emphasis upon the literariness of literary lang. led the New Critics to develop a set of rules and injunctions that they hoped would henceforth guide practical crit. Chief among these was the "heresy of paraphrase," a term coined by Brooks. Because of their semantic complexity, works of lit. could not be summarized or redacted without effacing their distinctive literary qualities. Nor could critics uphold commonsense distinctions between literary form and content; a poem's form is not a mold or container that can be separated from its content. W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley added two more injunctions: the *intentional fallacy held that poems should be read without appeal to the poet's biographical intent, which is inaccessible to the critic and meaningless given literature's semantic irreducibility, while the *affective fallacy held that poems should be read without appeal to the emotions or responses that they potentially evoke in the reader. Both fallacies, Wimsatt and Beardsley argued, distract critics with empirical considerations that take them away from the poem itself. Both also threaten to dissolve literary study into one of several rival disciplines that had been colonized by scientific positivism: sociology, hist., and psychology.

The New Critics also advanced an organicist account of lit.; they imagined the successful poem as a complex unity, with its inner semantic tensions held in balance by its overarching structure. In Brooks's terms from The Well Wrought Urn, this structure should be understood in dramatic terms, as a series of statements and counterstatements unfolding in time. The resulting organic unity could be experienced but never described, which lent an abstruse cast to many New Critical pronouncements about poetry. In Archibald MacLeish's terms, a poem must not "mean" but "be." This emphasis upon complex unity also led the New Critics to disparage didactic and overly prosaic lit.—notably much of the *protest poetry and naturalist fiction produced by left-wing writers in the 1930s.

In the U.S., the New Criticism profoundly reshaped literary studies. As Gerald Graff details in Professing Literature, the Am. New Critics began to popularize their ideas shortly before the rapid expansion of the university system after World War II. Close reading, which eschewed biographical and historical research, seemed ideally suited to the postwar influx of first-generation university students, many of whom did not share any common cultural background. At the same time, close reading enabled critics to conceive of literary studies as a professional discipline, capable of competing with while remaining distinct from the sciences and social sciences in the postwar multiversity. Ransom outlined this ambition in his aptly titled 1937 essay, "Criticism, Inc.," which called for formalist critics within the university to institutionalize a rigorously systematic approach to lit. that would rival the positivist techniques of the hard sciences. The New Criticism was thus part of the more general movement toward disciplinary specialization that characterized the post–World War II academy. At the same time, the New Critics transformed high and middlebrow literary tastes. They disseminated previously neglected works of modernist lit. to a generation of students and more generally helped elevate linguistic and structural complexity into the chief criteria of literary value. Indeed, as John Guillory argues, the New Criticism's principal disciplinary effect was to transform literary interpretation into an advanced form of cultural capital.

The New Critical hegemony began to dissolve in the 1960s, with the emergence of alternative approaches such as the archetypal crit. of Northrop Frye and various strands of Fr. structuralist and poststructuralist thought. In particular, the generation of politically oriented students and young professors who disrupted the 1968 Mod. Lang. Assoc. convention chafed against the New Criticism's ostensibly apolitical *formalism, which they associated with cold-war consensus and the technocratic rationalism of the postwar university. Most subsequent trends in literary theory were oriented against some key tenet of the New Criticism. Deconstructive critics, while retaining the New Critics' emphasis upon literature's semantic irreducibility, rejected their notion of organic unity. *Reader-response critics abandoned the affective fallacy, while New Historicists revitalized the context-based crit. that the New Critics had banished to sociology and hist.

Nevertheless, many of the changes wrought by the New Criticism proved to be enduring. While most critics reject the ontological assumptions that once underlay close reading as a disciplinary practice, they continue to rely upon it in their scholarship and pedagogy. The New Critics' valuation of interpretive complexity also seems self-evident to most literary critics, as does their tendency to imagine lit. as an antipositivistic discipline. For better or for worse, the institutional effects of the New Criticism outstripped its founders' ideological intentions and established a paradigm for literary professionalism still influential in the present day.

See NEW HISTORICISM, READER, RUSSIAN FORMALISM.

■ J. C. Ransom et al., I'll Take My Stand (1930); J. C. Ransom, "Criticism, Inc.," The World's Body (1938); J. C. Ransom, The New Criticism (1941); C. Brooks and R. P. Warren, Understanding Fiction (1943); Brooks; W. K. Wimsatt and M. C. Beardsley, "The Intentional Fallacy" and "The Affective Fallacy," The Verbal Icon (1954); Brooks and Warren; G. Hartman, Beyond Formalism (1970); T. D. Young, Gentleman in a Dustcoat (1976); F. Lentricchia, Beyond the New Criticism (1981); G. Graff, Professing Literature (1987); J. Guillory, Cultural Capital (1993); M. Jancovich, The Cultural Politics of the New Critics (1993); S. Schryer, "Fantasies of the New Class," PMLA 122 (2007).

S. SCHRYER

NEW FORMALISM. A movement, largely in the U.S., that promoted the use of metrical verse technique and rhyme. The group emerged during the 1980s, consisting (in Jarman and Mason's account) of poets born after 1940. The group's forceful prose gained wide attention. Prominent statements include Dana Gioia's "Notes on the New Formalism" (Can Poetry Matter?, 1992) and Timothy Steele's Missing Measures. Following the trend of Am. poets claiming outsider status, Gioia described "formal verse" as "the unexpected challenge [to] the long-established, ruling orthodoxy" of *free verse. As in his other crit., Gioia described New Formalism as a populist movement that rejected academic specialization and emphasized poetry's aural pleasures.

While Gioia dismissed "metrical versus nonmetrical verse" as "a tired argument," others insisted on this distinction, arguing for the former's superiority. In Missing Measures, Steele traces why free-verse technique attracted mod. poets. In the book's polemical conclusion, Steele argues that metrical verse uniquely "nourishes" virtues such as "a love of nature, an enthusiasm for justice, a readiness of good humor." At such moments, Steele argues for metrical verse's essential goodness.

New Formalism also gained attention by publishing anthologies: most notably, Richman's The Direction of Poetry and Jarman and Mason's Rebel Angels. Annie Finch's A Formal Feeling Comes attempted to "contradict the popular assumption that formal poetics correspond to reactionary politics and elitist aesthetics," a charge often made by critics of New Formalism. (The term New Formalism was first used by Ariel Dawson in her attack upon "The Yuppie Poet" [AWP Newsletter, May 1985].) Figures associated with New Formalism developed publishing venues, incl. Story Line Press, and jours. such as The Formalist (1990–2004) and The Reaper (1980–89). In 1995, Gioia and Michael Peich, publisher of Aralia Press, founded the annual Exploring Form and Narrative Conference, held at West Chester University.

Like other movements, New Formalism sought to distinguish its work from that of its predecessors and perceived competitors, often at the cost of simplifying lit. and cultural hist. The distinction of "free" and "metrical" verse remains crude. The specific forms and meters that the poets employ and those they avoid more tellingly suggest the poet's aesthetic commitments. For instance, many New Formalist poets use *iambic verse, a meter amenable to the conversational tones they favor. While many observers describe a "return" to "traditional forms," it is more accurate to observe that the movement promotes a selective reclamation of a particular aspect of Eng.-lang. poetic trad. Continuing previous debates between "innovative" and "traditional" poets, critics often distinguish the New Formalists from the Language poets (see LANGUAGE POETRY), casting the two groups as opponents. Yet this vision of the "poetry wars" neglects the many distinguished writers of metrical verse—ranging from Donald Justice to Thom Gunn to H. L. Hix—who show a familiarity with self-professed avant-garde writers and their work, sharing perhaps more than their admirers care to admit. New Formalism's influence may be observed in the next generation of poets, who draw from different verse trads. without necessarily pitting one against the other.

As in the wake of other literary movements, the challenge that critics face after New Formalism is to identify the major figures' distinctive achievements, whether R. S. Gwynn's light verse, B. H. Fairchild's narrative poetry, or Marilyn Hacker's dexterous handling of intricate verse forms.

■ A. Shapiro, "The New Formalism," CritI 14 (1987); D. Wojahn, "Yes, But: Some Thoughts on the New Formalism," Crazyhorse 32 (1987); D. Gioia, "Notes on the New Formalism," HudR 40 (1987); R. Richman, The Direction of Poetry (1988); Expansive Poetry, ed. F. Feirstein (1989); T. Steele, Missing Measures: Modern Poetry and the Revolt Against Meter (1990); A Formal Feeling Comes, ed. A. Finch (1994); Rebel Angels: 25 Poets of the New Formalism, ed. M. Jarman and D. Mason (1996); After New Formalism, ed. A. Finch (1999); New Expansive Poetry: Theory, Criticism, History, ed. R. S. Gwynn (1999).

D. CAPLAN

NEW HISTORICISM was less a specific interpretive methodology than a particular historical moment, a constellation of critics, institutions, and events over a 25-year period. The label was partially a revision of *New Criticism, the interpretive mode that had dominated Eng. departments for the previous 30 years. New Historicism argued that the most interesting thing about poetry and lit. generally was its embodiment of hist. Instead of celebrating a poem's articulation of transhistorical truths or its capacity to be "an instance of the doctrine which it asserts" (Brooks), New Historicism saw the poem as an example of the operation of hist.—of a particular society's ability to do what it could not otherwise say (Adorno). New Historicism often retained the minute attention to detail associated with New Criticism. What changed was the ultimate point of that attention. As Montrose argued, New Historicism focused on both the "historicity of texts" and the "textuality of history." Hist. itself became the object of *close reading, and New Historicism began to read closely everything from Edmund Spenser's participation in Eng. imperialism in Ireland to the homeless living around Tintern Abbey on July 13, 1798 (Greenblatt 1980, Levinson).

Though the turn to a New Historicism was in many respects an extension of New Criticism, it also set in motion an extremely wide range of materials. New Historicism closely resembled the critical practices of the mid-20th-c. critics Erich Auerbach, Kenneth Burke, Leo Spitzer, and William Empson. It also drew heavily on the structuralist arguments of Claude Lévi-Strauss; the Fr. historiography by Michel Foucault and Michel de Certeau; the Marxism of the *Frankfurt school, E. P. Thompson, and Louis Althusser; Lacanian psychoanalysis; the sociology of Max Weber and Pierre Bourdieu; and the anthropology of Victor Turner and Clifford Geertz. The methods of these fields were deployed in a self-consciously eclectic fashion, but they also supplied new subjects to which many of the skills of a literary critic could be applied. The jour. founded at the University of California, Berkeley, in the early 1980s was named Representations in part because it meant that textual representations of any sort were ripe for close analysis (Gallagher and Greenblatt).

Two characteristic features of New Historicism are worth isolating from its heterogeneous methods: the use of the *anecdote and a concern with structural totality. New Historicist analyses frequently began with a historical anecdote, a short narrative out of which the rest of the essay developed. The anecdote was meant to provide a historical scene, a "touch of the real," without necessarily subscribing to a grand historical narrative as an explanatory frame (Fineman 1989, Gallagher and Greenblatt). The anecdote also functioned to delimit a specific area of hist. in order to bring a momentary end to the otherwise endless flux of hist. (Simpson 1995, Liu 1990). However, the anecdote was caught up in a more general question of postmodern understandings of hist.; despite its name, New Historicism's anecdotes often also simultaneously participated, however complexly, in the general absence of hist. that is also a feature of *postmodernism (Jameson, Thomas).

Some of the advantages of and difficulties with this use of anecdotes were esp. apparent in New Historicism's vexed relation with the legacy of New Critical emphasis on poetic *closure and the question of *structure. The explicit turn to hist. was, in one sense, a clear rejection of poetic closure; the poem was seen as working within a historical world, rather than insulated from or transcending it. Yet New Historicism often ended up treating that historical world much as a New Critical lyric. Whereas for New Criticism the poem might be treated as a self-referential unit, for New Historicism that unit was often culture more broadly conceived. In this light, Foucault's conceptions of knowledge and power became crucial terms. Like the structure of a poem, the epistemē or discourse of knowledge of a society seemed to control all circulation of cultural energy within it. Out of this latent *structuralism emerged a sometimes acrimonious debate about whether works could subvert, or were contained by, the power structures they expressed (Dollimore, Greenblatt 1985). At the same time, this tacit structuralism also made possible striking homologies between texts as seemingly diverse as, e.g., Frank Norris's McTeague, Georg Simmel's The Philosophy of Money, and Thomas Nast's political cartoons, by understanding them all as part of an elusive "gold standard" (Michaels, Jameson).

The stress on political readings led many practitioners of New Historicism to imagine themselves as inaugurating a break with a formalist, ahistorical, and elitist past (Greenblatt 1990). New Historicism was a prime participant in the culture wars of the 1980s and 1990s (Guillory). Esp. influential were Williams's critiques of the class politics of literary classics and Althusser's critique of humanism. Nevertheless, what a "political reading" meant was often unclear. Sometimes it meant something as specific as the reinforcement of class oppression in questions about Shakespeare on Brit. school examinations (Sinfield); sometimes it meant reading Jacobean poems under a Foucauldian rendering of monarchical absolutism (Goldberg); sometimes it meant revising the Wordsworthian imagination as a specific historical dilemma (Liu 1989, Simpson 1987). A frequent target of such political crit. was the sovereign subject or individual. Whereas previous generations of critics had sometimes celebrated a poem as the private utterance of an autonomous *poet or *persona, New Historicism tended to see not only the poem but the very concept of individuality as a component in a broader historical movement (Fineman 1986). Hist. made individuals and poems subjectivities—rather than the other way around.

Notwithstanding its sophisticated deployment of a broad range of critical theory, New Historicism had one paradoxical outcome to its methodological heterogeneity: a deep-seated antitheoretical bent. New Historicism was as often as not "Against Theory," as one highly influential article was titled (Michaels and Knapp), and it bore a great deal of similarity to Am. pragmatism (Poirier). Great stress was placed on "practice" rather than on abstract theoretical principles: Gallagher and Greenblatt titled their 2000 book Practicing New Historicism, and the bulk of the book consists of examples of particular readings rather than an abstract account of a method.

See HISTORICISM, HISTORY AND POETRY.

■ Brooks; L. Althusser, "Ideology and Ideological State Apparatuses (Notes towards an Investigation)," Lenin and Philosophy and Other Essays, trans. B. Brewster (1971); R. Williams, The Country and the City (1973); S. Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning (1980); J. Goldberg, James I and the Politics of Literature: Jonson, Shakespeare, Donne and Their Contemporaries (1983); Political Shakespeare: New Essays in Cultural Materialism, ed. J. Dollimore and A. Sinfield (1985)—esp. J. Dollimore, "Transgression and Surveillance in Measure for Measure," S. Greenblatt, "Invisible Bullets: Renaissance Authority and Its Subversion, Henry IV and Henry V," and A. Sinfield, "Give an account of Shakespeare and Education, showing why you think they are effective and what you have appreciated about them. Support your comments with precise references"; W. B. Michaels and S. Knapp, "Against Theory," Against Theory: Literary Studies and the New Pragmatism, ed. W.J.T. Mitchell (1985); J. Fineman, Shakespeare's Perjured Eye: The Invention of Poetic Subjectivity in the Sonnets (1986); M. Levinson, Wordsworth's Great Period Poems (1986); L. Montrose, "The Elizabethan Subject and the Spenserian Text," Literary Theory/Renaissance Texts, ed. P. Parker and D. Quint (1986); D. Simpson, Wordsworth's Historical Imagination (1987); W. B. Michaels, The Gold Standard and the Logic of Naturalism: American Literature at the Turn of the Century (1988); J. Fineman, "The History of the Anecdote," The New Historicism, ed. H. A. Veeser (1989); A. Liu, Wordsworth and the Sense of History (1989), and "Local Transcendence: Cultural Criticism, Postmodernism, and the Romanticism of Detail," Representations 32 (1990); S. Greenblatt, Learning to Curse: Essays in Early Modern Culture (1990); T. W. Adorno, "On Lyric Poetry and Society," Notes to Literature, ed. R. Tidemann, trans. S. W. Nicholsen (1991); F. Jameson, Postmodernism or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); B. Thomas, The New Historicism and Other Old-Fashioned Topics (1991); R. Poirier, Poetry and Pragmatism (1992); J. Guillory, Cultural Capital (1993); D. Simpson, The Academic Postmodern and the Rule of Literature (1995); C. Gallagher and S. Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism (2000).

C. WARLEY

NEW NORSE (NYNORSK). One of the two official written langs. of Norway, Nynorsk was reconstructed in the mid-19th c. by the philologist Ivar Aasen (1813–96) from rural dialects that were directly descended from ON. Aasen wanted to give his country a literary lang. less influenced by Danish, and he demonstrated the viability of landsmaal, as it was called at the time, by translating foreign poetry and writing his own literary works of national romanticism in various genres. The first important poet to write in Nynorsk was Aas-mund Vinje (1818–70), who established the combination of cosmopolitan intellectual engagement and regional consciousness that can be seen in many later Nynorsk writers. Around the turn of the 20th c., Arne Garborg (1851–1924) and Olav Aukrust (1883–1929) demonstrated the remarkable power and rich melody of the new medium. Since then, many of Norway's most innovative literary figures have used Nynorsk, incl. the expressionist Kristofer Uppdal (1878–1961), the novelist and poet Tarjei Vesaas (1897–1970), and the revered poet Olav H. Hauge (1908–94), who translated many key 20th-c. writings to the lang. Contemp. lit. in Nynorsk boasts some artistically brilliant figures, such as the novelist Kjartan Fløgstad (b. 1944) and the widely acclaimed dramatist and poet Jon Fosse (b. 1959).

See NORWAY, POETRY OF.

■ O. J. Falnes, National Romanticism in Norway (1933); L. S. Vikør, The New Norse Language Movement (1976); Twenty Contemporary Norwegian Poets, ed. T. Johanssen (1984); S. Walton, Farewell the Spirit Craven: Ivar Aasen and National Romanticism (1987); T. Vesaas, Through Naked Branches, ed. and trans. R. Greenwald (2000); O. H. Hauge, The Dream We Carry, trans. R. Bly and R. Hedin (2008).

S. LYNGSTAD; D. KROUK

NEW YORK SCHOOL. Among the several closely related strands of the New American Poetry during the decades following World War II, the New York school is distinguished for its affinity with Eur. (esp. Fr.) *modernism and the visual arts. John Ashbery, Barbara Guest, Kenneth Koch, Frank O'Hara, and James Schuyler are most commonly identified as founders of the "school," so named by a gallery director, John Bernard Myers, who sought to lend the poets some of the glamour that the New York school of painting (Jackson Pollock, Willem de Kooning, et al.) had recently acquired as rival to the school of Paris (Pablo Picasso, Henri Matisse, et al.). Abstract expressionism, an alternative term for the new Am. painting, further distinguishes the New York school poets from their literary contemporaries, the Beats (see BEAT POETRY). Although expressionist, like the Beats, New York school poets tended to be more abstract in their emphasis on the verbal medium. Words could assume their own expressive quality independent of representational meaning.

New York City, the scene that brought the poets together during the 1950s, is often depicted in vivid detail in their work, esp. that of O'Hara, but city life informs the New York school aesthetic most profoundly in abstract qualities of scale and dynamics. O'Hara admired the painters for producing "works as big as cities," and the *long poem became a New York school specialty. However, in examples such as Koch's Ko, or a Season on Earth (1959), O'Hara's Second Avenue (1960), Schuyler's Hymn to Life (1974), Guest's The Countess from Minneapolis (1976), and Ashbery's Flow Chart (1991), the individual voice stands out, rather than any common style. Ashbery in particular is noted for the meditative pace of his expansive verse, a quality that might seem to set it at a distance from the frenzy often associated with urban experience. But at the core of New York school poetry is a "quietness," as O'Hara called it, reflecting a human angle even on experience that many contemporaries found alienating. In the "urban pastoral" mode that several critics have identified with O'Hara, the poet is usually walking the city streets, rather than racing through them in a car like the Beats.

During the 1960s, the Lower East Side of Manhattan provided a laboratory for a "second generation" to extend the experimental spirit of the New York school into an experiment in community. Attracted by cheap rents, younger poets such as Bill Berkson, Tony Towle, Frank Lima, Ted Berrigan, Anne Waldman, Lewis Warsh, Ron Padgett, and Larry Fagin found themselves living in proximity. Accustomed to sharing work with one another, they readily took the next step of sharing in public, through readings at coffee houses such as Les Deux Mégots and Le Metro, and through mimeographed magazines published by the poets themselves, such as Adventures in Poetry, Angel Hair, and C. In 1966, such activities inspired the formation of the Poetry Project at St. Mark's Church in the Bowery, which for many years published its own magazine, The World. As an enduring institution, the Poetry Project has kept alive the spirit of the New York school despite the passing of the first generation, starting with O'Hara's untimely death in the year of the project's founding. Meanwhile, second-generation poets carried that spirit far beyond the confines of New York City. For instance, during the 1970s, Berkson and Warsh were among several New York poets who developed a rural version of the Lower East Side community in the hamlet of Bolinas on the northern California coast. In 1975, while still officially director of the Poetry Project, Waldman collaborated with Allen Ginsberg in founding the Jack Kerouac School of Disembodied Poetics at the Naropa Institute in Boulder, Colorado.

Collaboration among two or more poets (or among poets and artists) is one of the experimental techniques that reflect the New York school sense of community. Other reflections include prominent attention to the details of daily life, frequent use of personal names (friends of the poet, often otherwise left unidentified), various adaptations of diary or jour. form, and the projection of an intimate tone or voice. The term personism, also the title of an essay by O'Hara (1959), has come to stand for this constellation of features. During the 1960s, when protest against the Vietnam War put pressure on poets to assume a public voice, the apparent privacy and self-absorption of New York school poetry threatened to render it irrelevant. In subsequent decades, identity politics has given personism a political spin, particularly in the direction of gay liberation. O'Hara, Schuyler, and (much more cryptically) Ashbery wrote from their experience as gay men, as have later poets associated with the New York school (John Giorno, Tim Dlugos, David Trinidad). After Guest, younger women such as Waldman, Alice Notley, and Eileen Myles have shown special concern for the female voice in this trad., Myles speaking explicitly for "The Lesbian Poet" (1994).

Within the politics of poetry, personism has been regarded with suspicion by the Language poets, who reject the "I" of traditional lyric and emphasize instead the social forces that construct the subject position in and through lang. (see LANGUAGE POETRY). On the East Coast, the New York school nurtured the devel. of Language poets such as Charles Bernstein, Nick Piombino, and Hannah Weiner, all of whom participated in Bernadette Mayer's workshops at the Poetry Project in the early 1970s. As a result, Language poets' critiques often aimed at saving the New York school from itself, praising textual appropriation and *collage in Ashbery's The Tennis Court Oath (1962), e.g., while regretting the regression into romantic subjectivity in Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror (1975), the volume that secured Ashbery's place in the mainstream of Am. poetry. However, doctrinaire distinctions have yielded to the pressure of poetic practice. Poets emerging since the 1990s have drawn on the practice of lyric in the New York school as a rich resource for further experiment.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; EXPRESSIONISM; GAY POETRY; UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE.

■ The Poets of the New York School, ed. J. B. Myers (1969); An Anthology of New York Poets, ed. R. Padgett and D. Shapiro (1970); Out of This World, ed. A Waldman (1991); D. Lehman, The Last Avant-Garde (1998); A Secret Location on the Lower East Side, ed. S. Clay and R. Phillips (1998); G. Ward, Statutes of Liberty, 2d ed. (2001); W. Watkin, In the Process of Poetry (2001); The Scene of My Selves, ed. T. Diggory and S. P. Miller (2001); D. Kane, All Poets Welcome (2003); M. Nelson, Women, the New York School, and Other True Abstractions (2007); M. Silverberg, The New York School Poets and the Neo-Avant-Garde (2010).

T. DIGGORY

NEW ZEALAND, POETRY OF

I. Maori Poetry
II. Maori Poetry in English
III. Poetry in English

I. Maori Poetry. Maori poetry is a *song and *chant trad. beginning more than 800 years ago with the Polynesian settlement of Aotearoa, now New Zealand; it retains many of its oral features such as adept manipulation of lang., *repetition, and patterning accompanied by illustrative gestures by performers (see ORAL POETRY). Poetry was recited or sung during everyday activities and group occasions. An orator was supported at the end of a speech by a relevantly themed song or waiata. Highly structured musically and thematically, some of the many song types include waiata aroha or love lyrics often addressing loss and longing; pao or topical, linked *epigrams (McLean and Orbell 1979); poi or performance art incl. swinging poi-ball actions; oriori or educational compositions sung at the birth of children; waiata tangi or *laments concerning the dead or misfortunes; and karanga or ceremonial calls of welcome, encouragement, or farewells to the departed.

Recited types include the haka (assertive posture-dance with or without weapons, with vocals akin to "stylized shouting" [McLean and Orbell 1979], "hair-raising blood-curdling shouts" [Ngata] designed "to stiffen the sinews, to summon up the blood" [Kāretu]). Kaioraora (cursing chants) are noted for their fury in venting past wrongs. Karakia are *incantations, *charms, and invocations; because of their sacerdotal function, they are rarely recorded. Whakaaraara pā were cried by sentinels as they watched fortresses.

Nationally known composers of the past included tribal and pan-Maori nobility, community leaders, and educators. The famed Rihi Puhiwahine's (1816?–1906) lyrics are colorful and deeply felt. In "Kāore Hoki Koia Te Rangi Nei" ("Oh What a Day"; Orbell), she wittily catalogs her aristocratic lovers while making reassuring asides to their spouses and incorporates the symbolic landmarks of her adventures with them. Noted compositions by others include the 19th-c. haka "Ka mate ka mate" (I Die, I Die) by the chief Te Rauparaha (ca. 1760–1849); "Poia atu taku poi" (Swing Out My Poi) by Erenora Taratoa (fl. 1850s), which was composed in response to Puhiwahine's disapproval of Taratoa's affair with Puhiwahine's brother (Royal); and the early 20th-c. songs "Po Atarau" (Moonlit Night) by Maewa Kaihau (b. 1879), popularized overseas as "Now Is the Hour" by Gracie Fields and later by Bing Crosby, and "Pokarekare ana" ([The Waves] Are Breaking) by Paraire Tomoana (1874?–1946). In the 20th c., composers adapted lyrics to popular tunes; for instance, Tuini Ngāwai's (1910–65) Maori battalion farewell "Arohaina Mai" (Bestow Your Love) was set to George Gershwin's "Love Walked In." These well-known tunes aided the recall of concert groups who performed on occasions such as the opening of meeting houses, anniversaries, and welcomes (Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, Spittle). Ngāwai wrote many popular songs. Ngoi Pēwhairangi (1922–85) composed the lyrics for the very popular "Poi E" (Swing) which was turned into a music video featuring break dancers with the Pātea Maori Club; the Prince Tui Teka hit song "E Ipo" (Beloved); and the waiata "Whakarongo" (Listen), exhorting listeners to retain and speak the Maori lang. Nontraditional Maori lang. poetry is continually evolving, while traditional forms are relatively fixed vocally and musically in performance.

With the continuing revival of Maori culture and lang., there are many performances of both contemp. and traditional waiata and haka in concert parties; tribal, regional, and national events and competitions; televised performances; and musical albums. The most prominent published collections are by George Grey (1802–98), who compiled Ko nga moteatea me nga hakirara o nga Maori (Poems, Chants and Traditions of the Maoris, 1853), and Apirana Ngata (1874–1950), whose four-volume collection Ngā Moteatea (The Sung Poems) was completed posthumously by other scholars. There are numerous other book, audiovisual, and ms. collections as well as contemp. composers and performers. Hirini Melbourne (1950–2003) did much to popularize the waiata and traditional Maori music within wider contemp. culture.

II. Maori Poetry in English. The critically and popularly acclaimed Hone Tuwhare (1922–2008) was the first Maori to publish a single-authored literary collection. His oeuvre of 13 books began in 1964 with No Ordinary Sun. His poetry is imbued with affective significance, a term coined by the Marxist aesthetician Christopher Caudwell, whose work influenced Tuwhare, and code switching (Manhire) from hieratic to demotic modes. Mitcalfe's term hotu (heart notes), used to describe sung feelings in Puhiwahine's Maori-lang. poems, is apt for Tuwhare's complete oeuvre. Naturalistic and sensual, Tuwhare also wrote political verse centered on Maori land-rights struggles from the mid-1970s. Many scholars (Keown, DeLoughrey, Battista, Sullivan) note Tuwhare's mythological symbolism, such as the tree-deity Tāne Mahuta appealing to humanity, in his antinuclear poem "No Ordinary Sun": "O tree / in the shadowless mountains/ the white sea plains and / the drab sea floor / your end at last is written." Tuwhare's animation of natural elements perhaps extends from Maori-lang. poetics, as do repetition of words and musical and incantatory phrasing. His appetitive poetry enjoys sexual themes and humor. Tuwhare was a national icon and influenced many New Zealand poets.

The Booker Prize–winning author Keri Hulme (b. 1947) refers to place names, close observations of the natural environment, "living time" rather than "calendar time," and Maori female deities to indicate indigenous alterities and worldview. Like Tuwhare, Hulme is a connoisseur of land and sea who brings the natural world into the body of her writing ("pink flesh of smoked eels, then tiny succulence of oysters . . . ," [Strands, 1992]) and delivers a feminist poetics that easily aligns with the earth-mother. Identity is a key issue for the writer in her collection The Silences Between Moeraki Conversations, 1982).

The pioneer author J. C. Sturm (1927–2009) began publishing poems in 1947. In Dedications (1996) and Postscripts (2000), Sturm writes on intimate and larger scales about family, death, public occasions, race relations, the contemp. and historical effects of colonization, and life's vicissitudes. Her lines favor a three- or four-stress meter, reminiscent of Maori-lang. poetry. Sturm was married to the eminent New Zealand poet James K. Baxter (1926–72), who was esp. influenced by Maori poetics in his later work.

Robert Sullivan's (b. 1967) collections Star Waka (1999), Captain Cook in the Underworld (2002), and Voice Carried My Family (2005) traverse Eur., Polynesian, and Maori historical figures, as well as personal, family, and tribal narratives. Roma Potiki's (b. 1958) collection, Oriori: A Maori Child Is Born (1999), a collaboration with the painter Robyn Kahukiwa, is a series of meditations on birth centered on the traditional book-title form. In Stones in Her Mouth (1993), she confronts and negotiates the masculine workings of power within Maori society. Many poems focus on motherhood, its joys and challenges. Apirana Taylor (b. 1955) emerged in the late 1970s as a playwright and poet. His work emphasizes sound qualities and is often performed with musical accompaniment such as with the koauau or bone flute and the guitar. Taylor's 1996 poem "Te Ihi" (The Essential Force or Awe) explores the multidimensionality of a Maori word within a repetitive soundscape that directly evokes the haka form. Rangi Faith's (b. 1949) two collections show a concern for the environment within traditional and recreational contexts, excavations of tribal memories, and the impact of war on friends and families. The poet and musician Hinemoana Baker's (b. 1968) opening title poem in her collection Mātuhi/Needle (2004) alludes to an oratorical chant used at the beginning of speeches and interlaces Maori phrases throughout that collection while song elements such as the nose-flute also feature. Trixie Te Arama Menzies (b. 1936) belongs to the collective of women writers and artists Waiata Koa. She draws on traditional arts such as weaving by master craftswomen for inspiration. Vernice Wineera Pere, domiciled in Hawai'i, writes from a Maori and Polynesian perspective in nuanced and lyrically adept poems that explore mixed-race identity and spirituality, among other issues. The pioneer playwright Rore Hapipi (b. 1933) has composed many poems often sung in dramatic performance, as does Brian Potiki (b. 1953), whose collection Aotearoa (2003) is a mixture of songs and poetry influenced by the *Beat movement, the hist. of 19th-c. Maori pacifist resistance, and fellow writers and artists. Arapera Blank (d. 2002) deploys rich cultural symbolism in both langs., such as a garden of sweet potatoes representing the abundance of families and flax representing womankind. Michael O'Leary (b. 1950) writes on a wide range of Irish-Maori, personal, literary, satirical, and historical themes. Phil Kawana's (b. 1965) first poetry collection, The Devil in My Shoes (2005), ranges from ostensibly cultural to urban themes. Many poets have yet to achieve book publication.

III. Poetry in English

A. The Nationalist Era. To understand the hist. of New Zealand poetry in Eng., it is best to begin in the middle. In 1945, Allen Curnow (1911–2001) published the single most influential anthol. of New Zealand poetry, A Book of New Zealand Verse, 1923–1945. In a trenchant introduction, Curnow declared his own generation to be the first to see the true purpose of a distinctly New Zealand poetry: "a real expression of what the New Zealander is and a part of what he may become." He was withering in his crit. of the poetry of the first quarter of the 20th c., which he saw as marked by a "lack of any vital relation to experience [and] a fanciful aimlessness." Kowhai Gold, the unfortunately twee title of Quentin Pope's 1930 anthol. (referring to the beautiful yellow flowers of the native kowhai tree), became the generic term for these self-consciously "exoticizing" approaches to the New Zealand landscape, and the reputation of the poets from this period has never really recovered from Curnow's attack.

Curnow's unifying account of a generation of poets dedicated to "forms as immediate in experience as the island soil under [their] feet" both relied on and helped foster a certain selectivity of focus. When R.A.K. Mason (1905–71) wrote in "Sonnet of Brotherhood" of "this far-pitched perilous hostile place," he was referring to the planet earth "fixed at the friendless outer edge of space," but the nationalist paradigm made it difficult not to read this alongside Charles Brasch's (1909–73) "Remindingly beside the quays, the white / Ships lie smoking . . . distance looks our way" ("The Islands"); Curnow's own "In your atlas two islands not in narrow seas / Like a child's kite anchored in the indifferent blue" ("Statement from Not in Narrow Seas"); or A.R.D. Fairburn's (1904–57) vision of the colonists "sprouting like bulbs in warm darkness, putting out / white shoots under the wet sack of Empire" ("Dominion").

The title of Ursula Bethell's (1874–1945) first England-pub. collection, From a Garden in the Antipodes (1929), suggested an anglocentric approach to her New Zealand experience; but in Curnow's anthol., her universally comprehensible lament for the transience of "our small fond human enclosures" and prayer that her garden "become established quickly, quickly . . . For I am fugitive, I am very fugitive" ("Pause") seemed of a piece with Robin Hyde's (1906–39) account of a "young crude country" forging a new identity and Denis Glover's (1912–80) iconic story of the magpies indifferently singing "Quardle oodle ardle wardle doodle" as a local farm fails and falls to "the mortgageman" ("The Magpies").

Curnow's own poetry in the anthol. adopts a less confident stance than his introduction. New Zealand's hist. appears marred by violence—"The stain of blood that writes an island story"—and radically ungraspable:

> It is something different, something
> Nobody counted on.
>
> ("The Unhistoric Story")

In a much-quoted meditation on the skeleton of an extinct native bird, Curnow declared that it would not be him or his generation, but rather "some child, born in a marvelous year" who "will learn the trick of standing upright here" ("The Skeleton of the Great Moa in the Canterbury Museum, Christchurch").

B. The Wet Sack of Empire. This sense of a hist. evolving too rapidly to be understood would have been familiar to the colonial forebears of the nationalist poets. Eng.-lang. poetry first finds New Zealand as a remote and none-too-welcoming coast; in the brief precolonial period of Eur. contact, Brit., Australian, and Am. seamen, sealers, and whalers work their hard-won New Zealand experience into their shanties and work-songs:

> We cured ten thousand skins for the fur, for the fur,
> Yes we cured ten thousand skins for the fur.
> Brackish water, putrid seal,
> We did all of us fall ill,
> For to die, for to die, for to die.
>
> (Anonymous, "David Lowston," ca. 1810–15)

After the Treaty of Waitangi in 1840 ceded sovereignty from the Maori chiefs to the Brit. Crown, a steady stream of Brit. colonists, the usual mixture of the adventurous and the desperate, began to arrive (and, often, depart again), with many using poetry to make sense of their experience. The prototype of the colonial poet is Alfred Domett (1811–87), the model for Robert Browning's "Waring," who, aged 20, "gave us all the slip . . . With no work done, but great works undone" to build a life "where whole new thousands are." Domett, briefly New Zealand's premier, produced a bloated epic, Ranolph and Amohia: A South-Sea Day-Dream (1872), designed to present an exotic world that is readily legible in familiar conceptual frames. Whether as edenic rebuke to our supercivilized world or savage reminder of a primitive past, Domett's poem works to cast the New Zealand landscape and the Maori inhabitants into familiar conceptual templates.

Nonetheless, the poem also registers the "unhistoric" drift that is making a nation "nobody counted on." At the end of the poem, Ranolph, a white adventurer, returns to Britain with Amohia, his Maori princess bride, fully conscious of the shock such a union will create in Brit. drawing rooms but determined "from the ebon-ivory range / Of chequered days and chance and change, / [to] Draw symphonies serene and strange." This same utopian sense of the possibility of a radical reconfiguration of national and racial identity in the fluid colonial environment can be found in David McKee Wright's (1868–1928) "Our Cities Face the Sea" (1900):

> Cousin Jack and Cockney, Irishman and Scot,
> And the native is a brother to the whole blooming lot.
> Pulling, pulling on the one rope strong
> Bringing up the future with a shout and a song.

Colonial plasticity could also offer the possibility of deliberate reinvention. William Pember Reeves (1857–1932), another colonial politician, proclaimed himself "rooted. Firm and fast" in a New Zealand whose apparent crudity masked a vital creative opportunity ("A Colonist in His Garden," 1904):

> "No art?" Who serve an art more great
> Than we, rough architects of State
> With the old Earth at strife?

In "The Passing of the Forest" (1898), though, Reeves acknowledged the "bitter price" of "beauty swept away" that the art of nation building exacted. The "Burnt bush" appeared as a rebuke in Blanche Baughan's (1870–1958) "A Bush Section" (1908), too. Of the Maori inhabitants of that bush and the bloody price they paid for New Zealand's transformation, few Eng.-lang. poets made explicit mention. Jessie Mackay (1864–1938), however, the ardent proponent of Ir. and Scottish Home Rule, universal suffrage, and temperance, wrote scathing satires on the settler government's belligerent and self-serving approach to the Maori.

C. The Maori Renaissance. The emergence of a Maori voice in New Zealand poetry in Eng. was one of the principal devels. of the post–World War II years. Beginning in the 1950s with the Cook Islands Maori writer Alistair (later Alistair Te Ariki) Campbell (1925–2009), whose first, intensely lyrical, collections made no mention of the ethnic origins that would later become an abiding concern, continuing in the 1960s with Rowley Habib (b. 1933) and with Tuwhare, whose "No Ordinary Sun" drew on a deep Maori reverence for the forests to voice a moving lament for the effects of nuclear testing, and flourishing in the later work of poets such as Taylor, Hulme, Sturm, and Sullivan, Maori poets have in one sense fulfilled the utopian hopes of Wright, while forcing a radical reexamination of the outright racism and blithely paternalistic ethnocentrism that New Zealand's official myth of racial harmony too often belied.

D. Marvelous Children. Elsewhere, the synthetic power of Curnow's nationalist thesis was challenged almost immediately in the 1950s. The so-called Wellington Group, a loosely affiliated group of poets incl. James K. Baxter (1926–72), W. H. Oliver (b. 1925), Alistair Campbell, and Louis Johnson (1924–88), attacked Curnow's localism as a historical dead end and declared themselves to be internationalists. By the 1960s, both sides in this once heated debate had come to seem old hat. Charles Doyle's 1965 anthol., Recent Poetry in New Zealand, features self-descriptions from poets such as Doyle (b. 1928), Fleur Adcock (b. 1934), Kendrick Smithyman (1922–95), and C. K. Stead (b. 1932) that proclaim a rigorously decontextualized commitment to "craft" as their highest ideal.

The 1970s saw an explosion of new voices in New Zealand poetry. The jour. The Word Is Freed (1969–72) was the epicenter of the new poetry, and its title gestured toward the formal experimentation that would become the rallying cry of the new generation, incl. poets such as Ian Wedde (b. 1946), Alan Brunton (1946–2002), Jan Kemp (b. 1949), and Murray Edmond (b. 1949). *Open form was the shibboleth of the movement, and the championing of Am. models such as Charles Olson and Robert Creeley seemed to mark a turn away both from any last holdovers of colonial fealty to Britain and from the old obsession with "what the New Zealander is."

