begins to fade from regular use in writing on rhet. and lit. Although structuralist ling. and deconstruction resuscitated rhet. as a hermeneutical code in the 20th c., scheme was not restored to regular use as a term of art, and it is now rarely used to speak about figurative lang. in rhet. or lit.

In distinguishing schēma from trope, Quintilian calls it "a purposeful deviation in sense or language from the ordinary simple form; the analogy is now with sitting, bending forwards, or looking back" (Institutio oratoria). Later analogies reinforce this distinction between inward meaning and outward form by comparing schemes to costume, clothing, and ornament. Cl. definitions of scheme thus rely on an idea of ordinary (naked, natural, or plain) speech that is then clothed by the figures of rhet. The discursive force of such *ornament varies throughout rhet.'s long hist., with schemes swelling in number and acquiring greater currency in courtly cultures that emphasize fashion, performance, or external show as constitutive of identity. In theories of rhet. and poetics informed by mod. ling., there is considerable skepticism toward the notion that there exists an "ordinary" lang. to be ornamented by figures of speech. Such theory concludes that rhetorical figures are not supplementary decorations but rather fundamental structures of lang. and thought (Jakobson, Derrida, de Man). Although this theory of figures as constitutive of, and coextensive with, lang. makes its exemplary arguments with reference to tropes such as *metaphor and *metonymy, it has resulted in a generalized critical method inclined to discover substantive meaning in the lexical patterns and shapes of what used to be called rhetorical schemes.

See FIGURATION, LINGUISTICS AND POETICS, RHETORIC AND POETRY.

■ Jakobson and Halle, "Two Aspects of Language and Two Types of Aphasic Disturbances"; E. Auerbach, "Figura," trans. R. Manheim, Scenes from the Drama of European Literature (1959); O. Ducrot and T. Todorov, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Sciences of Language, trans. C. Porter (1979); G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan (1981); T. Todorov, Introduction to Poetics, trans. R. Howard (1981); de Man, "The Rhetoric of Temporality" and "The Rhetoric of Blindness"; P. de Man, "Anthropomorphism and Trope in the Lyric," The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984), and "Hypogram and Inscription" and "The Resistance to Theory," The Resistance to Theory (1986); J. Derrida, "White Mythology," Margins of Philosophy, trans. A. Bass (1986); Vickers, Defence; B. Dupriez, A Dictionary of Literary Devices (1991); Lanham; Renaissance Figures of Speech, ed. G. Alexander, S. Anderson, and K. Ettenhuber (2007); G. Burton, "Silva Rhetoricae," http://rhetoric.byu.edu.

J. C. MANN

SCHOOL OF SPENSER. A group of Eng. poets of the earlier 17th c., strongly under the influence of Edmund Spenser (1552–99). Their work is sharply distinguished from the more radical poetic movements of the time, epitomized by the *classicism of Ben Jonson and the *metaphysical style of John Donne. The principal poets of the Spenserian school—William Browne of Tavistock, Michael Drayton, George Wither, Giles and Phineas Fletcher, and the Scottish poets William Drummond of Hawthornden and Sir William Alexander—show the influence of Spenser in their sensuous imagery, smooth meter, archaic *diction, and fondness for narrative and *pastoral modes of expression. They also owe to Spenser their allegorical and moral tendencies. Such ambitious narrative poems as Giles Fletcher's Christ's Victory and Triumph and Phineas Fletcher's The Apollyonists suggest Spenser's Faerie Queene in their pictorial quality and their stanza forms (modified *Spenserian stanzas); they also anticipate John Milton, who, occasionally echoing the Fletchers, followed them in the use of Christian material for epic purposes and who himself acknowledged his indebtedness to Spenser, whom he called master.

■ H. E. Cory, Spenser, the School of the Fletchers, and Milton (1912); D. Bush, English Literature in the Earlier Seventeenth Century, 1600–1660, 2d ed. (1962); J. Grundy, The Spenserian Poets (1969); The English Spenserians, ed. W. B. Hunter Jr. (1977)—anthol.; P. J. Finkelpearl, "John Fletcher as Spenserian Playwright: The Faithful Shepherdess and The Island Princess," SEL 27 (1987); M. Quilligan, Milton's Spenser (1987); G. M. Bouchard, "Phineas Fletcher: The Piscatory Link between Spenserian and Miltonic Pastoral," SP 89 (1992).

A. PREMINGER; F. J. WARNKE

SCHÜTTELREIM. In Ger. verse, a rhyme, usually in a single line or couplet, that achieves witty and memorable effect by transposing the initial consonants of two words or syllables (in Ger., schütteln means "to shake"). Schüttelreim has existed since the 13th c. and was once considered a serious poetic form. Since the 19th c., however, it has been used as a comic verse form often of a lewd or suggestive nature. The sudden sound reversal lends itself well to humorous and satirical ends in Ger., e.g., "Als Gottes Atem leiser ging, schuf er den Grafen Keyserling" (attributed to Friedrich Gundolf), while it can also be found in proverbs. Among the shortest known schüttelreims are "Du bist Buddhist," and "Wo bist, Bovist?" Regine Mirsky-Tauber (Schüttelreime, 1904) and Anton Kippenberg have written entire cycles of *light verse in this form. The nearest equivalent in Eng. is the spoonerism, e.g., "You have hissed my mystery lecture; in fact, you have tasted a whole worm."

■ B. Papentrigk (pseud. of A. Kippenberg), Schüttelreime (1939); M. Hanke, Die Schüttelreimer (1968); Franz Mittler: Gesammelte Schüttelreime, ed. F. Torberg (1998).

T.V.F. BROGAN; U. K. GOLDSMITH; I. D. COPESTAKE

SCIENCE AND POETRY

I. Science and Literary Theory
II. The History of Science and Poetry
III. Poetry versus Science

Poetry has had many different connections with science: mod. literary theories have defined themselves in terms of poetry's relation to science; poems have treated science and its social consequences as a theme for wonder, critique, or didactic transmission; science has made possible machines for writing and circulating poems, as well as medicine to alter the poet's mind and body; poetry has been used by many different theories to represent forms of thought contrasted both favorably and unfavorably with science; poets have protested the encroachment of natural and social sciences that assume exclusive rights to authoritative knowledge over domains where poetry formerly flourished; poetry has aspired to be the site of quasi-scientific inquiry; practicing scientists have written poetry and crit. of poetry; and enterprising poets and scientists have proposed scientific studies of poetry. These broad categories are not exhaustive. Levine cautions anyone trying to understand the hist. of science and lit. to recognize "the variousness and incompleteness of writers' and scientists' interrelations." One reason for this incompleteness is that poets are rarely scientists, nor do they have direct access to the nontextual hinterland of science that Hilary Putnam calls "unformalizable practical knowledge" (Meaning and the Moral Sciences, 1978). The singular noun science itself can be misleading because science is far from a unity, comprised as it is of a changing array of heterogeneous sciences. Its hist. stretches back at least 4,000 years, according to recent historians of science; it has roots in India, China, and Persia, as well as cl. civilization and Europe; and what counts as a science changes over time. Astrology was considered scientific in Isaac Newton's time, and race science was still being published in Scientific American in the 1960s. There have even been recurrent attempts to establish sciences of poetry; Roman Jakobson argues that structuralist poetics is part of the science of ling. (see LINGUISTICS AND POETICS).

While science claims epistemological priority over other forms of knowledge and methods for acquiring it, poetry has almost always been sharply limited in its epistemological and expressive scope, if not by science then by religion, society, or custom. Douglas Bush's study Science and English Poetry (1950) triangulates this hist. as poetry's struggle to decide between loyalty to imagination's spiritual values and acknowledgment of the truths produced by sciences that increasingly negated such values with their pictures of an animal humanity and a mechanistic universe. Later scholarship has confirmed and extended Bush's identification of a long hist. of poetic engagement with science, while revealing that the connections between science and theology have been extremely diverse and complex. Negotiating around the epistemic authority of science entails more than simply bearing witness to science's dominance. The emergence of positivism and other scientific transformations of formerly humanistic modes of inquiry has created even more complexity. Science's epistemological authority has presented poets with a range of choices: they can follow in a long trad. of verse that includes Persian botanical poets, the astronomical poets of India and China, and Lat. medical poetry and report the prior findings of science using poetic technique to make the knowledge memorable; they can welcome the reception of scientific ideas and work for their cultural assimilation, as did the poets who celebrated Newton's achievement in the 18th c. and reconciled his insights with praise of the Creator who instigated these scientific laws; they can ally themselves with alternative worldviews against science, as Amiri Baraka does in his poem "Ka 'Ba" (1969), where Af. Americans are seen to be "defying physics in the stream of their will" by recovering the "magic" of their Af. heritage; they can directly resist the claims of science to universal knowledge; or they can lay claim to a poetic form of what Hejinian calls a "language of inquiry" and insist that poetry retains a valid cognitive capacity for research capable of standing up to the sciences. Poets faced with the authority of science can be synthesizers, cultural brokers, advocates of sheer imagination, or even researchers. What is hard to do is ignore science.

I. Science and Literary Theory. The ever-growing cultural centrality of science has meant that its relation to poetry is a significant part of the DNA of mod. literary theory. Many of our ideas can be traced back to the work of the Eng. rhetorician I. A. Richards and his attempts to reconcile literary crit. with logical positivism. His Science and Poetry (1926) offered a powerful summary of the apparent marginality of poetry in a scientific culture, arguing that it would appear that, in contrast to what Matthew Arnold believed, "the future of poetry is nil." Richards was an ambitious synthesizer who combined literary critical principles with Charles Sherrington's physiology of the impulses in the nervous system and the emerging philosophy of logical positivism, which equated the meaning of a statement with its method of verification. Poems, Richards concluded, can offer only simulacra of propositions or *"pseudo-statements," "pseudo" because the truth of these statements depends not on verification but merely on "acceptability by some attitude." Scientific propositions require rigorous testing; poetic utterances require merely an emotional response.

The idea that science and poetry are inevitably in conflict was foundational for the *New Criticism. For the New Critics, poetry was built both on expressive *ironies that put the propositions in quotation marks and on structures of *affect that supplanted reasoning and, therefore, sidestepped any confrontation with the sciences. Cleanth Brooks announced in Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939) that "all poetry since the middle of the seventeenth century has been characterized by the impingement of science upon the poet's world." This view became so widespread that even Crane, who attacked the New Criticism, agreed that the key question was how poetry could continue to justify itself in the face of science: "How, with science everywhere dominant and the method of science universally accepted as the one road to truth, can poetry still be made to seem a valuable and respectable form of mental activity, rather than merely a survival of prescientific modes of thought destined to disappear in the future?" (see CHICAGO SCHOOL). New Critical orthodoxy on this question was established by John Crowe Ransom in The World's Body (1938) and The New Criticism (1941), where he argues (against Richards) that, far from being merely affective, the statements made in poetry are ontologically distinct from those of science. Poetry "treats an order of existence, a grade of objectivity, which cannot be treated in scientific discourse." He goes on: "[W]e live in a world which must be distinguished from the world, or the worlds, for there are many of them, which we treat in our scientific discourses. They are its reduced, emasculated, and docile versions. Poetry intends to recover the denser and more refractory original world which we know loosely through our perceptions and memories. By this supposition it is a kind of knowledge which is radically or ontologically distinct." The final chapter of The New Criticism, titled "Wanted: An Ontological Critic," posits a critic who would mount a thoroughgoing defense of poetic knowledge as different in nature from scientific knowledge. Mod. science gives us a logical structure for the world; poetry departs from, defers, and diffuses that structure, which "testifies to a diffuseness in the constitution of the world which we are undertaking to know." Ransom's doctrine made its way into the opening sentence of the next ed. of the most influential textbook for the teaching of poetry, Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren's Understanding Poetry (1960), which announced that "poetry gives us knowledge" (see KNOWLEDGE, POETRY AS).

The New Criticism drew a sharp line between science and poetry. Why should a more ambitious literary theory not develop its own science? *Structuralism offered this hope. Jakobson, in his key essay "Linguistics and Poetics," writes that "poetics deals with problems of verbal structure," and "since linguistics is the global science of verbal structure, poetics may be regarded as an integral part of linguistics." Poetics is a science, and major poets can be called scientists: G. M. Hopkins, for instance, is "an outstanding searcher in the science of poetic language." On the other hand, as structuralism begat *poststructuralism, Jakobson's confidence in poetics as a science gave way to a decentered view of knowledge that construed science as a kind of poetry. In practice, this meant that the natural sciences, and their appeals to truth, reality, and fact, could be treated as socially constructed discourses. Here was a new twist to Richards's idea that poetic propositions are pseudo-statements; now even scientific propositions were revealed as pseudo-statements. Thomas Kuhn's theory of scientific revolutions and the more radical stance of science studies were often enlisted to support this view, as was the apparent subjectivism of key ideas in physics such as Werner Heisenberg's uncertainty principle or Niels Bohr's theory of complementarity. A recent essay on Victorian science and poetry by Dawson and Shuttleworth, for instance, argues that science "is intrinsically and inextricably textual, and relies on the same rhetorical structures and tropes found in all other forms of writing, including poetry, as well as being subject to a corresponding instability of meaning." Can science be said to be intrinsically the same as poetry? Others contend that such claims create a gulf between literary studies and most sciences, which are predicated on the belief that scientific knowledge offers a reliable account of a reality existing independently of observers and their lang. Levine believes the "science/literature dichotomy has got to be reimagined" so that we are not left treating either all science as poetry or all poetry as (bad) science.

II. The History of Science and Poetry. Cl. poets from Hesiod to Lucretius wrote extensively about subjects that would later become fields of scientific inquiry, such as medicine, astronomy, matter, and botany. Recent scholarship traces similar hists. of poetry in ancient and med. China, India, and the Middle East. Poetry was an effective form both for recording and transmitting knowledge; for learned writers such as Avicenna, it could be as appropriate for recording their own investigations as the short scientific essay is for scientists today. Christine van Ruymbeke introduces her account of Science and Poetry in Medieval Persia (2007) with an epigraph from the 12th-c. Ar. poet Niẓāmī that could be applied to many of these poets: the poet "must be well versed in many sciences and quick to pick up information from his environment; because, as much as poetry is of advantage in every science, so is every science of advantage in poetry." Dante and Chaucer both display considerable knowledge of contemp. sciences, notably astronomy. In Dante's Paradiso, the narrator sees different perspectives of the heavens, such as the "quattro cerchi giugne con tre croci" (1:39), the four great circles of the celestial sphere with three crosses formed by intersections of one circle with the others in the ninth Ptolemaic sphere. Cornish summarizes Dante's attitude: "the best kind of verse deserving the best language should also convey the best concepts arrived at through acquired knowledge (scientia) and innate genius (ingenium)."

Pierre Duhem claimed that mod. science began with Étienne Tempier's condemnation of Aristotelian doctrines in Paris in 1277, but its beginnings are more usually located in such events as the publication in one year, 1543, of both Nicolaus Copernicus's theory in De revolutionibus orbis coelestium that the earth orbited the sun and Andreas Vesalius's anatomy based on dissection. Copernicus's theory could be read as an adjustment of Ptolemaic astronomy, but the work of Johannes Kepler, Tycho Brahe (whose report on his astronomical observation of a supernova concluded with a poem in Lat., "Elegy to Urania"), and Galileo Galilei proved the validity of Copernican astronomy as a new cosmology. The power of the mechanical model to explain many features of the world and human life became increasingly evident. René Descartes' Discourse on Method (1637) presented a mechanical, corpuscular theory of the universe, incl. human bodies, though he thought the human capacity to talk and reason distinguished people from machines. William Harvey, trained in the Paduan trad., explained the circulation of the blood as a mechanical system in An Anatomical Study of the Motion of the Heart and of the Blood in Animals (1628). These new scientific texts did not appear antipoetic.

John Donne's poetry brilliantly conveys the excitement, confusion, and suspicion generated by the new natural philosophy. The "First Anniversarie" (1611) laments that "new philosophy calls all in doubt" and the cosmos is "crumbled out again to his atomies," while in the "Second Anniversarie" (1612), Donne begins to doubt the scope of the new knowledge: "Why grass is green, or why our blood is red / Are mysteries which none have reach'd unto." Like many 17th-c. poets, he recognizes the significance of the new sciences but maintains extensive references to older knowledges such as alchemy, astrology, magic, and Ptolemaic astronomy. Like Donne, John Milton hedges his bets, managing to balance the demands of competing Ptolemaic and Copernican alternatives. Still, Milton is generally up to date; his interest in color echoes the contemp. researches of Robert Boyle and others.

Early in the 17th c., Francis Bacon set out the necessary conditions for experimental science, ideas that eventually led to the founding of the Royal Society. Although he is often portrayed as an opponent of poetry, Bacon did find a niche for it within the production of knowledge even if it was "not tied to the laws of matter." In book two of The Advancement of Learning (1605), Bacon asserts that "the parts of human learning have reference to three parts of man's understanding, which is the seat of learning: history to his memory, poesy to his imagination and philosophy to his reason," conceding to poets their own role as part of a wider intellectual enterprise. The poet that Milton most admired after Edmund Spenser and Shakespeare, Abraham Cowley, was a founder of the Royal Society and wrote poems celebrating it; he thought poetry itself was a "divine science." The poets John Denham, John Dryden, and Edmund Waller were also members, although tensions between poetry and science were already evident. Jones notes that Thomas Sprat warned poets "that their interest is united with that of the Royal Society; and that if they shall decry the promoting of experiments they will deprive themselves of the most fertile subjects of fancy." Cowley's own poetry reveals the strain of trying not to be surprised by science. His comparing love to magnetism in Davideis (1656) is likely to strike mod. readers as demonstrating an inability to achieve a synthesis of poetry and science: "How is the Loadstone, Natures subtle pride, / By the rude Iron woo'd, and made a Bride?"

The establishment of the Royal Society and Newton's Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy (1687) were major devels. in the hist. of science. Newton offered mathematically formulated laws of gravitation and motion, giving natural philosophy seemingly unshakable foundations and showing incontrovertibly that science dealt with intangibles beyond the realm of the senses. His influence was enormous; he himself emblematized the new natural philosophy, and his ideas—about astronomy, motion, optics, electrical phenomena, and plant respiration—fascinated poets. Newton's physics became a favorite topic of poets incl. John Reynolds ("Death's Vision," 1709), Richard Blackmore ("The Creation," 1712), and James Thomson, whose poem The Seasons (1730) has often been considered the great Eng. scientific poem of the 18th c. He describes a rainbow in Newtonian terms as the "showery Prism" shining out of "The various twine of light, by thee disclos'd / From the white mingling Maze" ("Spring," 2.209–12). Poets read Newton, however, scarcely more than most poets today have read Albert Einstein's mathematical accounts of relativity or Heisenberg's scientific papers. Poets learned their science from popularizers, and the great majority of these early in the century wrote from a religious standpoint. Typical was William Derham, whose "Physico-theology" gave a name to this praise of science for revealing the wonderful complexities of a world created by a benevolent God.

Women found it esp. difficult to gain access to scientific training, and Mary Leapor ended "The Enquiry" (pub. posthumously in 1748) by saying that a poet trying to follow natural philosophy and hist. "has need of Judgment better taught than mine" (2.84–7). Her honesty about difficulties understanding the new natural philosophy is a reminder that 18th-c. poets rarely had firsthand expertise. This may partly be why poets had little to say about a science central to the Enlightenment, chemistry, and such crucial steps as the discovery of oxygen and the overthrow of the phlogiston theory by Antoine Lavoisier and others. Chemistry was hard to grasp without direct experience of experimental practice and perhaps offered fewer figures for human experience than Newtonian physics or biology. Not all poets found science relevant. Samuel Johnson speaks for many poets (and critics) before and since when he insists in his "Life of Milton" (1779) that learning about science is not worth the effort: "the truth is that the knowledge of external nature, and the sciences which that knowledge requires or includes, are not the great or the frequent business of the human mind. . . . [W]e are perpetually moralists, but we are geometricians only by chance."

Natural hist. gradually replaced the Newtonian sublime of astronomy and theology in poetry from mid-century on. Poems such as George Ritson's "Kew Gardens" (1763), Henry Jones's "Kew Garden" (1767), and John Dalton's "A Descriptive Poem, addressed to Two Ladies at their Return from Viewing the Mines near Whitehaven" (1755) offered extensive observations on plants and the natural landscape (see LANDSCAPE POEM). Erasmus Darwin's long poem "The Temple of Nature" (1803) aims to explain "how rose from elemental strife / Organic forms" in a theory of evolution, set out in rhymed *couplets, that helped inspire his grandson Charles Darwin.

A long trad. defines *romanticism as utterly opposed to science. An instance would be William Blake's prophetic vision of science as a partner to tyranny in the form of Urizen forming universal laws "in books formed of metals" and Blake's famous picture of Newton turning his back on the beauty of the world to measure with compasses. Perhaps the most cited response to science written by any poet appears in William Wordsworth's "The Tables Turned" (1798): "Sweet is the lore which Nature brings / Our meddling intellect / Misshapes the beauteous forms of things:—/ We murder to dissect." Recent historians have convincingly shown that this is a one-sided view; the romantic poets were broadly receptive to the sciences of their day, and, when they were critical of science, it was often technology that elicited hostility. Anna Barbauld watched many of Joseph Priestley's laboratory experiments; Lord Byron tested William Herschel's telescope for himself and met Humphry Davy several times; Davy wrote competent poetry and discussed connections between science and poetry with his early friend Robert Southey; and S. T. Coleridge, also a close friend of Davy, attended the meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science when the term scientist was first used to replace the older designation natural philosopher ("by analogy with artist," according to its proposer William Whewell). In the second ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800), Wordsworth made a famous declaration that comes much closer to the romantics' attitude toward science than his idea of the "meddling intellect" (though the dissonance between these statements is a reminder of how complex their reactions were):

> If the labours of men of science should ever create any material revolution, direct or indirect, in our condition, and in the impressions which we habitually receive, the poet will sleep then no more than at present; he will be ready to follow the steps of the man of science, not only in those general indirect effects, but he will be at his side, carrying sensation into the midst of the objects of science itself. The remotest discoveries of the chemist, the botanist, or mineralogist, will be as proper objects of the poet's art as any upon which it can be employed.

Wordsworth's poetry bears out his belief in many informed references to contemp. researches.

P. B. Shelley was a keen amateur scientist, and an atheist, whose poems such as Prometheus Unbound (1820) draw on chemistry and astronomy. Inspired by the discoveries of the astronomer Herschel, he argues in notes to "Queen Mab" (1813) that the "indefinite immensity of the universe" made it impossible to believe in a Christianity based on events local to one tiny planet, and in "Essay on a Future State" (1819), he uses scientific knowledge to dismiss the idea of resurrection. None of the Eng. poets went as far, however, as the Ger. poet and scientist J. W. Goethe, who believed that science had developed from poetry and who saw himself as much a scientist—interested in morphology, optics, theory of color, geology, mineralogy, and meteorology—as a poet. He was committed to the view that humanity was embedded in the natural world and that knowledge and experience formed a totality, a belief articulated in "Die Metamorphose der Pflanzen": "Alle Gestalten sind ähnlich, und keine gleichet der andern; / Und so deutet das Chor auf ein geheimes Gesetz, / Auf ein heiliges Rätsel. Oh könnt' ich dir, liebliche Freundin, / Überliefern sogleich glücklich das lösende Wort!" (All forms are alike but not identical, and thus they point to a secret law, a sacred mystery. If only I could pass it on to you, sweet friend, the crucial word that solves it [1790]). But even Goethe could not manage to become both a great scientist and a great poet and, though friendly with scientists of his time, was not treated as a scientist of the same rank as he was a poet, partly because of his belief in such ideas as the ur-plant.

Science expanded enormously in the 19th c., as chemistry provided bountiful opportunities for new industries and as physics, guided by J. C. Maxwell, Hermann von Helmholtz, Ernst Mach, and Michael Faraday, made it possible to control the energies of electricity, magnetism, and heat to the extent that human and animal labor would cease to be the main source of power. Charles Baudelaire's famous remark in a letter to Alphonse Toussenel in 1856 calling the *imagination "that most scientific of faculties" is as much a tacit acknowledgment of these changes as of any residual belief in the preeminence of poetry. Charles Darwin's theory of evolution demonstrated how powerful the scientific imagination had become, providing new and powerful metaphors of life and death that challenged religious certainties and constructed foundations for biology that would prove as durable as Newton's contribution to physics. Alfred, Lord Tennyson's poetry decisively registers the end of the natural theology characteristic of the later 18th c. and still prevalent in romantic poetry. In Memoriam (1850) makes extensive reference to the sciences of his time, incl. Charles Lyell's uniformitarian geology, Pierre-Simon Laplace's nebular hypothesis, and Robert Chambers's precursory theory of evolution; but the poem's strongest sentiment about science is pessimistic. If science thinks it can prove that humans are merely "clay," then "What matters Science unto men / At least to me?" (120.5–8). Instead of the uplifting visions seen by 18th-c. poets, Nature now reveals fossils that show its true colors: "A thousand types are gone: / I care for nothing, all shall go" (56.1–8).

G. M. Hopkins was one of the last Eng. poets able to work out a reconciliation of science, poetry, and religion. At the university, he was exposed to new scientific discoveries, incl. the energy physics of John Tyndall and the chemistry of the atmosphere. Clouds and sunlight form a heat engine in "nature's bonfire" in the sonnet "That Nature Is a Heraclitean Fire and of the Comfort of the Resurrection" (1888), and Beer (1992) aptly describes the poet as "beset by entropy and azure, delighted by optics and acoustics, and roused to combat and to embrace caprice." Signs of the future for poetry and science are evident in Thomas Hardy, whose melancholic vision of the natural world as a scene of struggle for survival yields no consolation to poetry.

The very name modernist underlines one of the most striking yet paradoxical features of 20th-c. poetry's relations with science. To be mod. was in part to be scientific. The very first thing that Ezra Pound tells his readers in his poetry textbook The ABC of Reading (1934) is that this is an "age of science"; In "A Collect of Philosophy" (1951) Wallace Stevens looks back over his career and tells his audience that the physicist Max Planck, the founder of quantum theory, is a "truer symbol of ourselves" than a philosopher or a poet; T. S. Eliot espouses impersonality in poetry because "it is in this depersonalization that art may be said to approach the condition of science." Walter Pater thought all art strove to achieve the pure form of music. Now some poets take for granted that science is the true model for poetry, and scholars such as Whitworth, Albright, and Tiffany have shown how readily modernist poets used scientific metaphors and models as a lang. for their poetics. Yet despite brave statements about the importance of science in their essays, these poets did not have so much to say explicitly in their poetry: Pound mentions only two mod. scientists, the Curies, and then somewhat dismissively; and Stevens's own poetic landscapes are filled with unscientifically conceived plants, animals, trees, and winds, nor is there any sign of the laboratories or technologies that might evoke the spirit of Planck. In "Cape Hatteras" from his *long poem The Bridge (1930), Hart Crane manages to ask explicitly whether the products of science will "carve us / Wounds that we wrap with theorems sharp as hail" and poses a question that touches on the broad issue of how science changes the life-world: he asks, "tell me, Walt Whitman, if infinity / Be still the same as when you walked the beach." The answer to this rhetorical question would have been no: Georg Cantor's mathematics had revealed new infinities. Many poets wrote about Einstein (W. C. Williams jokingly called him Saint Einstein) the way predecessors wrote about Newton. What is probably the best of these, Archibald MacLeish's poem "Einstein" (1929), imagines the scientist's own inner-world picture of life in a space-time comprised of nothing but the new forces and particles. As a poetic solution to the problem of how to represent the new science of relativity and quantum theory, the poem faces the same difficulties as Crane's. Whitman cannot know whether infinity has changed, nor can the surreal visions experienced by the Einstein of MacLeish's poem tell us anything authoritative about the theory of relativity. Neither poem knows how to engage with the methods, ontologies, and epistemological claims of the new sciences, other than by imagining a suffering subjectivity. Stevens is arguably more successful, because he follows out rigorously the implications of living in a world without teleology, a world of nothing more than matter in space and time, where imagination's subjective coloring needs to be erased in the attempt to "find the real" ("Notes Toward A Supreme Fiction," 1942).

Instead of trying imaginatively to inhabit the new world of the scientist as their predecessors might have done, some mod. poets step sideways and think of poetry as a possible scene of investigation similar to science. Science may be too complex and elusive to picture directly, but surely some of its methods and aims may be borrowed. Perhaps the poet can perform experiments? Eliot talks of the poet's mind as similar to the platinum in a test tube of oxygen and sulfur dioxide, Pound likens the critical comparison of passages of verse to the scientist's comparing microscope slides, and critics have thought that Gertrude Stein was scientific in the way she treated writing as a space for experiment. John Dewey gave credence to this idea in Art as Experience (1934), saying that the artist is an experimenter who is "as unsatisfied with what is established as is a geographic explorer or a scientific inquirer." Mina Loy's poem "Gertrude Stein" (written 1924) calls her "Curie / of the laboratory / of vocabulary" investigating the "radium of the word" (Gottfried Benn also spoke of the "Laboratorium für Worte"). Experiment could also lead to broader models of inquiry in which poets might observe the natural world (D. H. Lawrence's Birds, Beasts, and Flowers, 1923), inquire into past models of government and ethics (Pound's Cantos, 1925–72), or test verbal etymologies for their psychological insight (H.D.'s Trilogy, 1944–46). As these examples suggest, the forms of poetic inquiry involved, while they were influenced by the example of the success of the natural sciences, might diverge from the construction of testable hypotheses that characterizes natural science, though affinities with the social sciences may be more evident.

Over the course of the century, poets became increasingly engaged in writing directly about science for many reasons: the world wars, better scientific education, and a more sophisticated philosophical and historical understanding of science. World War II and its nuclear technology compelled poets opposed to nuclear deterrence to learn more about science. Scientific jours. aimed at the intelligent reader became more widely available, and controversies among scientists, whether over cloning, Darwinism, or climate change, have become staples of very public debate. The scientific rhet. of Charles Olson's essay *"Projective Verse" (1950) and the manifestos of *Language poetry only accelerated the trend.

Other Western lits. have had active mod. trads. of interrelations between science and poetry that can be mentioned only briefly here. The Fr. poet Paul Valéry had a lifelong interest in science and mathematics and even applied his understanding of group theory to his concepts of the aesthetic object. In Ger., Paul Celan extensively mined discursive connections between geology and physiology in his metaphors as in the poems "Schliere" ("Streaks," 1959) or "Entwurf einer Landschaft" ("Projection of a Landscape," 1958). This type of engagement then became a live question among a number of late 20th-c. Ger. poets such as Raoul Schrott, Hans Magnus Enzensberger, Thomas Kling, Ulrike Draesner, Brigitte Oleschinski, Durs Grünbein, and others. Enzensberger published the essay "Die Poesie der Wissenschaft" ("The Poetry of Science," 2002), claiming that supposed connections between the aims of science and the imagination of poetry were just Zufallsbekanntschaften (chance acquaintances), while others such as Schrott believe this consonance a sign of a Wahlverwandtschaft (echoing Goethe's idea of elective affinities or chemical bonds). Similar preoccupations can be found in Sp.-lang. poetry, notably the Nicaraguan Ernesto Cardenal's Cántico cósmico (Cosmic Can- ticle, 1989). The Scottish poet Robert Garioch ("The Muir," 1955), the Brit. poet J. H. Prynne (Wound Response, 1974), and the Am. Jena Osman ("The Periodic Table as Assembled by Dr Zhivago, Oculist," 1999) have all written poems that question scientific nationalisms, expose the values in scientific discourse, or work directly with scientific lit. Westerners are now "geometricians of nature," and images of the universe largely come from science rather than religion: nuclear particles and forces construct our world, genes encode our bodies, and we are encouraged to think of ourselves as mites on a small sphere in a huge cosmos. The Brit. poet Allen Fisher, author of Brixton Fractals (1985), probably overstates the case when he says that "a poet's attitude and understanding of quantum field theory will affect the poet's experience of gravity, drawing, and reading," but he is surely right that, for most poets writing in the 21st c., scientifically derived beliefs about the universe increasingly direct poetic vision.

III. Poetry versus Science. This hist. of poetic treatments of science raises many issues. Should poetry's relation to technology be considered an integral part of this hist.? Why has poetry been treated by philosophers and scientists as an abstraction representing a type of cognition variously to be praised or derided, and how has this treatment affected poetry and poetics? Many 20th-c. poets have responded to the encroachments of the natural and social sciences by emulating features of scientific inquiry. How valid are these attempts, and do they have antecedents in earlier poetry? Besides these questions, the hist. of poetic accounts of science often leaves out two further issues of importance. The scientific study of poetry, ranging from dubious rationalizations of *prosody to highly respectable empirical experiments on the brains of poetry readers, has a long and culturally significant hist. both inside and outside literary studies. And the hist. of poetry excludes as marginal most of the poetry and poetry crit. written by scientists themselves, although this activity is part of the cultural-historical relations of science and poetry.

Should we treat poems about technology, such as a poem by W. C. Williams about the then relatively new experience of driving, as scientific poems? This remains a contentious issue among philosophers, historians, and scientists themselves. In an essay on "Contemporary Science and the Poets" pub. in Science in 1954, J. Z. Fullmer, a chemist, dismissed mod. poems that mistakenly "equate the products of applied science with science itself" in favor of poems by Eliot, MacLeish, Robert Frost, and Marianne Moore that address pure science as "an attitude, a method, a point of view." When Williams (a doctor and, therefore, one of the very few scientifically trained poets) in his preface to The Wedge (1944) calls the poem a "small (or large) machine made of words," he asserts that the poem is a technology and, therefore, scientific (emphasis added). Tichi argues that Williams's poems "are unmistakably occasioned by the machine age in which acceleration in the pace of living had become a cultural commonplace and the machine a constant presence in everyday life," making an assumption about the close connection between poetry and technology that could be extrapolated to earlier and later lit. hists. If, therefore, we consider technology to be an inalienable element of the hist. of science, then the rich trad. of poems about optic glasses, satanic mills, loaded guns, express trains, the Titanic, big cars, the "hydrogen jukebox," and triodes are part of the story of science and poetry.

Another feature of the story is the long hist. of treating poetry and science as contraries. F.W.J. Schelling called the universe a poem and so implicitly treated science as a branch of poetry. Such optimism has been the exception; poetry is more usually treated as the antithesis of science and often as a shorthand for this opposition in a manner that has significant consequences for the self-image of poetry and poetics. Newton called poetry "ingenious nonsense"; the quantum physicist Erwin Schrödinger (who also wrote poetry, though the poet Stefan Zweig told him that he hoped his physics was better than his poetry) compared poetic imagination unfavorably with the sober clarity of scientific thought. Such comments have circulated widely and take a toll on the status of poetry. Even the geneticist and poet Miroslav Holub, who values poetry highly and writes with great clarity about science and poetry, still treats them as antithetical: "the scientific theme implies as much light as possible, the poetic one as many shadows as possible" (The Dimension of the Present Moment, 1990). The contrast of light and shadow implies a familiar negative hierarchy. The philosopher of science Wesley Salmon expresses the now-conventional view of science as almost the negation of poetry: "what makes a scientific world-picture superior to a mythic or religious or poetic world-view" is that "we have much better reason to regard that world-view as true" ("Scientific Explanation," 1990). W. H. Auden memorably expressed the effects of such disdain in The Dyer's Hand (1962): "When I find myself in the company of scientists, I feel like a shabby curate who has strayed by mistake into a drawing room full of dukes."

However, not all poets and thinkers grant intellectual authority to science. Martin Heidegger argues that mod. science forgets Being and insists that we have to look to poetry as the place where "language speaks" and Being can still manifest itself. In Science and Poetry (2001), the philosopher Mary Midgley calls for the imaginative vision of poetry to counterbalance the "over-exaltation of science," and her insistence that science is not "a central government under which both poetry and philosophy are minor agencies" has affinities with Richard Rorty's call for our "scientized" culture to be "poeticized" (Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity, 1989). Midgley has almost nothing to say about actual poems and poets; poetry functions as a placeholder for a general mode of being, as it does in much of the metadiscourse of science.

Since at least the 17th c., poets have feared the encroachment of science, and although this perceived threat has taken many forms, three stand out: science's indifference to human values, science's failure to recognize the truths of poetic imagination, and science's claims to exclusive methodological access to truth. The first two were recurrent themes in the hist. of science and poetry discussed earlier. What are the consequences of science's claims to exclusive access to the methods of producing reliable knowledge? The Am. poet and philosopher Emily Grosholz argues in Kurt Brown's collection The Measured Word (2001) that poetry risks handing "the discursive, systematic, and objective over to science" and retreating into a zone "that is relentlessly subjective, hermetic, and fragmentary." One strategy of resistance to science's expansionism is to insist on poetry's own rights to inquiry.

Explicitly epistemological preoccupations with the natural world, anthropology, government, and cultural memory inspire *invention in many poets, and increasingly so in the 20th c. Charles Bernstein writes in his poetic essay "Artifice of Absorption" (1987) that poetry must recognize its capacity for "epistemological inquiry," because otherwise it will "cede meaning" to what he calls "the hegemony of restricted / epistemological economies." This implies that poets could aspire to work on more equal terms with science. The art critic Stephen Wilson explains in Information Arts (2002) what it might mean for visual artists, arguing that if they are prepared to learn the science, artists can "explore technological and scientific frontiers" and even explore regions scientists are not able to study, tracing out "different inquiry pathways, conceptual frameworks, and cultural associations than those investigated by scientists and engineers." What might this mean for poets?

The Am. poet Alice Fulton offers a possible strategy: "I often lift scientific language for my own wayward purposes. That isn't to say I play fast and loose with denoted meanings. I'm as true to the intentions of science as my knowledge allows. But my appropriations from science are entwined with other discourses, other ideas" (Feeling as a Foreign Language, 1999). Many poets have done this. Muriel Rukeyser's The Life of Poetry (1949), which offers one of the most original mod. accounts of the interdependence of science and poetry, argues that this strategy of appropriation can be self-limiting if not informed by an understanding of the science behind the rhet. Poets trying to respond adequately to new scientific conceptions face a "trap . . . the use of the discoveries of science instead of the methods of science." Exhibiting scientific lang. and discoveries in poems can be restrictive; poets ought to try to develop forms of investigation informed by current scientific practices. One strategy adopted by poets has been to draw out the implications of scientific metaphors. In Open Fields, Beer eloquently justifies this process of linguistically focused inquiry: "new scientific and technical knowledge allows the poet to contemplate with fresh intensity intransigent questions which grip language in all generations." Support for poetry comes from philosophers of science such as Ernan McMullin, who share this belief that *metaphor is central to innovation and draw parallels between poetic metaphors and the use of models in scientific theory. A productive model of the object of scientific study is one that hints at possible improvements to the theory; similarly, a complex poetic metaphor also helps us begin to grasp new facets of something not yet well understood.

Metaphor is only one mode that scientifically aware poetic inquiry takes. As we saw in the case of *modernism, experiment is another. Reports of sustained, rigorous observation of self, nature, lang., and society are another. Denise Levertov offers one of the best statements of this in her poem "O Taste and See" (1964), where her remedy for estrangement, the sense that "The world is / not with us enough," is heightened sensory and cognitive attention represented by metaphors of ingestion. This poem, with its enveloping trad. of observation reaching back to the 18th c., is a rejoinder to the authoritative claims by physics to know that the world is made of invisible and intangible atomic particles. To sum up, the challenge for poets and critics is to understand the diversity of methods in the sciences without treating them as exhausting the possibilities of a poetics of inquiry.

The inverse of emulation is *parody. Implicit in the discussion so far is a certain respect toward science, usually a mix of awe, wonder, and critique. Ridicule is relatively rare because of the authority of science (Jonathan Swift's cucumbers are unusual), but one intermittent 20th-c. literary movement turned mockery into a full-scale genre of its own. 'Pataphysics originated with the Fr. writer Alfred Jarry, who proposed that 'pataphysics extended "as far beyond metaphysics as the latter extends beyond physics"; in Christian Bök's words, 'pataphysics questions the authority of science "by becoming its hyperbolic extreme." Its most prominent mod. exponent was probably the Fr. poet Raymond Queneau (Petite cosmogonie portative, 1950), but it continues to influence new generations of poets. The literary group *Oulipo, known for generative formulas (such as *acrostics and *lipograms) used in a spirit of ludic investigation, has roots in 'pataphysics, as does the work of other poets such as the Brazilian Eduardo Kac, and of artworks that merge science and aesthetics. 'Pataphysics may abandon all pretense that poetry can make a serious contribution to knowledge the way science does, but it then manages to reveal new possibilities for investigation that hint that this too may be an extrapolated mode of inquiry.

Scientists themselves have also been critics, readers, writers, and even experimental researchers of poetry. Darwin found poetry difficult but owed a conceptual as well as stylistic debt to his reading of Milton and Shakespeare. Such cross-pollination in mod. science is still an under-researched area of the mod. hist. of science. The poet, chemist, and Nobel laureate Roald Hoffmann strikingly attributes his insights into the geometry of protein folding to his love of the arts: "I have no problem doing (or trying to do) both science and poetry. Both emerge from my attempt to understand the universe around me" ("How I Work as Poet and Scientist," 1988). Scientists have rarely been significant poets in their own right: Goethe, Davy, and Holub are exceptions. But success as a poet is not necessarily the most important measure of the contribution of scientists to poetry; the mere involvement of scientists in poetry has contributed to its hist. Literary jours. have a long hist. of publishing essays by scientists aimed at the literary world. Less recognized is that scientific jours. also have a long trad. of publishing essays about poetry. In the 1930s, for instance, The Scientific Monthly offered articles on color and insects in poetry, followed later in the decade by others on "Poetry of the Rocks" and "Poetry and Astronomy."

The Ger. philosopher and historian Wilhelm Dilthey famously talked of a science of poetry. Many attempts have been made to provide a science based in mathematics or the natural sciences. In 1845, a "poetry-making machine" called Eureka that could generate sequences of randomly chosen words to form poetic lines was exhibited in London, an early popular manifestation (according to Hall) of a would-be "prosodic science," exemplified by Sidney Lanier's unabashedly titled Science of English Verse (1880). Scientists have used a changing array of mathematics, kymographs, machines for graphing vocal frequency, MRI scanners, cognitive science, and computer spectrography to investigate the material effects of reading poetry. Douglas Oliver is one of the few poets to have written extensively about the use of sonic analysis to study oral prosody, though he is revealingly coy about crediting the technology with authority when employing it to challenge F. R. Leavis's claim that Milton treats "language as a kind of musical medium outside himself": "A passage of Paradise Lost, examined by machine, can show that the music is by no metaphorical stretch 'outside' Milton, nor lacking in the most subtle currents of feeling and sensation. This time again, the machinery is being used only as objective evidence of my personal interpretation of the verse music."

The hist. of science and poetry presents a fast-changing picture. Louis Zukofsky's claim that poets are not in the least surprised by science encapsulates much of the hist. of the relation between poetry and science. Science continues to develop, surprise, and confirm prejudices among poets. New scientific insights also act retroactively on our understanding of the past. Sociology, hist., and philosophy of science are also rapidly evolving and indirectly helping reveal new aspects of the complex interrelations of science and poetry. Poets appear to be immersing themselves in science more than ever, and they too are changing our sense of the hist. and possibilities in science and poetry.

See COGNITIVE POETICS; FRACTAL VERSE; KNOWLEDGE, POETRY AS; NATURE; PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY; TECHNOLOGY AND POETRY.

■ Anthologies, Bibliographies, and Reference Works: Imagination's Other Place: Poems of Science and Mathematics, ed. Helen Plotz (1955); Poems of Science, ed. J. Heath-Stubbs and P. Salman (1984); R. S. Scholnick, "Bibliography: American Literature and Science through 1989," American Literature and Science, ed. R. S. Scholnick (1992); A Quark for Mister Mark: 101 Poems about Science, ed. M. Riordan and J. Turney (2000); Encyclopedia of Literature and Science, ed. P. Gossin (2002); British Council, "Hunting Down the Universe" (science and literature bibliography, 2003), downloadable from www.britishcouncil.org/revisedhunting_down_the_universe1.doc; Signs and Humours: The Poetry of Medicine, ed. L. Greenlaw (2007); Dark Matter: Poems of Space, ed. M. Riordan and J. B. Burnell (2008).

■ Criticism, History, and Theory: C. A. Fusil, La Poésie scientifique de 1750 à nos jours (1917); G. R. Stewart Jr., "Color in Science and Poetry," Scientific Monthly 30 (1930); R. Crum, Scientific Thought in Poetry (1931); L. Stevenson, Darwin among the Poets (1932); A. M. Schmidt, La Poésie scientifique en France au 16e siècle (1938); A. Gode, Natural Science in German Romanticism (1941); C. H. Waddington, The Scientific Attitude (1941); S. I. Hayakawa, "Poetry and Science," English Institute Annual—1942 (1943); J. B. Conant, "The Advancement of Learning in the United States in the Post-War World," Science 2562 (1944); M. H. Nicolson, Newton Demands the Muse (1946); R. S. Crane, "Cleanth Brooks: Or, the Bankruptcy of Critical Monism," MP 45 (1948); N. H. Pearson, "The American Poet in Relation to Science," American Quarterly 1 (1949); H. H. Waggoner, The Heel of Elohim (1950); H. Levy and H. Spalding, Literature for an Age of Science (1952); E. Larrabee, "Science, Poetry, and Politics," Science 3042 (1953); B. I. Evans, Literature and Science (1954); W. C. Williams, "The Poem as a Field of Action," Selected Essays (1954); K. Svendsen, Milton and Science (1956); The New American Poetry 1945–1960, ed. D. Allen (1960); W. Curry, Chaucer and the Medieval Sciences (1960); P. Ginestier, The Poet and the Machine, trans. M. Friedman (1961); G. E. McSpadden, "New Light on Speech Rhythms from Jorge Guillén's Reading of His Poem Gran Silencio (Based on Measurements of Sound Spectrograms)," HR 30 (1962); D. Davie, The Language of Science and the Language of Literature (1963); W. P. Jones, The Rhetoric of Science (1966); H. R. Jauss, "Paradigmawechsel in der Literaturwissenschaft," Linguistiche Berichte 1 (1969); Mathematik und Dichtung, ed. H. Kreutzer and R. Gunzenhauser, 4th ed. (1971); K. Richter, Literatur und Naturwissenschaft (1972); D. Ault, Visionary Physics (1974); I.F.A. Bell, Critic as Scientist (1981); Jakobson; N. K. Hayles, The Cosmic Web (1984); D. Oliver, Poetry and Narrative in Performance (1989); J. Roubaud, "Mathematics in the Method of Raymond Queneau," Oulipo (1986); F. Turner, "Space and Time in Chinese Verse," Time, Science, and Society in China and the West, ed. J. T. Fraser, N. Lawrence, F. C. Haber (1986); In the American Tree, ed. R. Silliman (1986); L. M. Steinman, Made in America (1987); C. Tichi, Shifting Gears (1987); R. Hoffman, "How I Work as Poet and Scientist," The Scientist (March 21, 1988); W. Lepenies and B. Harshav, "Between Social Science and Poetry in Germany," PoT 9 (1988); S. M. Fallon, Milton among the Philosophers (1991); E. Lamadrid, "The Quantum Poetics of Ernesto Cardenal," Ometeca 2 (1991); G. Beer, "Helmholtz, Tyndall, Gerard Manley Hopkins," Comparative Criticism 13 (1992); H. T. Crawford, Modernism, Medicine, and William Carlos Williams (1993); D. Albright, Quantum Poetics (1997); D. Brown, Hopkins' Idealism: Philosophy, Physics, Poetry (1997); J. Alder, "The Aesthetics of Magnetisation: Science, Philosophy, and Poetry in the Dialogue Between Goethe and Schelling," The Third Culture: Literature and Science, ed. E. S. Shaffer (1998); C. Altieri, "The Concept of Force as Modernist Response to the Authority of Science," Modernism/Modernity 5 (1998); T. Armstrong, Modernism, Technology, and the Body (1998); S. Peterfreund, William Blake in a Newtonian World (1998); J. Rogers, The Matter of Revolution: Science, Poetry, and Politics in the Age of Milton (1998); C. Andrews, Poetry and Cosmology (1999); S. Carter, Bearing Across (1999); K. L. Edwards, Milton and the Natural World (1999); A. Fisher, "The Poetics of the Complexity Manifold," Boundary 2 26 (1999); H. Groth, "Victorian Women's Poetry and Scientific Narratives," Gender and Genre, ed. I. Armstrong and V. Blain (1999); D. Brown, "Victorian Poetry and Science," The Cambridge Companion to Victorian Poetry, ed. J. Bristow (2000); A. Cornish, Reading Dante's Stars (2000); L. Hejinian, The Language of Inquiry (2000); M. N. McLane, Romanticism and the Human Sciences (2000); D. Tiffany, Toy Medium (2000); K. Brown, The Measured Word (2001); S. Meyer, Irresistible Dictation: Gertrude Stein and the Correlations of Writing and Science (2001); R. J. Owen, "Science in Contemporary Poetry," German Life and Letters 54 (2001); R. Sobel and G. Elata, "The Problems of Seeing and Saying in Medicine and Poetry," Perspectives in Biology and Medicine 44 (2001); M. H. Whitworth, Einstein's Wake (2001); C. Bök, 'Pataphysics (2002); From Energy to Information, ed. B. Clarke and L. D. Henderson (2002); L. Irigaray, To Speak Is Never Neutral, trans. G. Schwab (2002); T. Rajan, Deconstruction and the Remainders of Phenomenology (2002); C. J. Cavanaugh, "Reading Lorca through the Microscope," Hispania 86 (2003); G. Dawson and S. Shuttleworth, "Introduction: Science and Victorian Poetry," VP 41.1 (2003)—spec. iss.; C. Gruber, Literatur, Kultur, Quanten (2003); E. G. Wilson, The Spiritual History of Ice (2003); Science and Literature in Italian Culture, ed. P. Antonello and S. A. Gilson (2004); F. De Bruyn, "Reading Virgil's Georgics as a Scientific Text," ELH 71 (2004); G. P. Nabhan, Cross-Pollinations (2004); S. P. Sondrup, "Against Two Cultures: Östen Sjöstrand and the Poetry of QED," Cybernetic Ghosts, ed. D. M. Figueira (2004); M. Brady, "Galileo in Action: The 'Telescope' in Paradise Lost," Milton Studies 44 (2005); R. Richards, The Romantic Conception of Life (2004); N. Roberts, "The Science of the Subjective: An Interview with Peter Redgrove," http://www.liv.ac.uk/poetryandscience/essays/science-subjective.htm (2005); K. Blair, Victorian Poetry and the Culture of the Heart (2006); R. Crawford, Contemporary Poetry and Contemporary Science (2006); E. E. Langley, "Anatomizing the early-modern eye," Renaissance Studies 20 (2006); R. Tobias, The Discourse of Nature in the Poetry of Paul Celan (2006); P. Coleman, On Literature and Science (2007); J. Gillies, "Space and Place in Paradise Lost," ELH 74 (2007); M. Golston, Rhythm and Race in Modernist Poetry and Science (2007); J. D. Hall, "Popular Prosody: Spectacle and the Politics of Victorian Versification," Nineteenth-Century Literature 62 (2007); G. Levine, "Why Science Isn't Literature," Realism, Ethics, and Secularism (2007); A. M. Paliyenko, "Illuminating the Poetic Turn to Science," Romance Studies 26 (2008); Y. Haskell, "Latin Poet-Doctors of the Eighteenth Century," Intellectual History Review 18 (2008); M. M. Mahood, The Poet as Botanist (2008); R. O'Connor, The Earth on Show (2008); S. Faulkner, Poetry as Method (2009); J. Holmes, Darwin's Bards (2009); B. Gold, ThermoPoetics (2010); L. Vetter, Modernist Writings and Religio-Scientific Discourse (2010); N. Jackson, Science and Sensation in Romantic Poetry (2011).

P. Middleton

SCOP. The most common OE word for "poet": others include leopwyrhta (song-maker) and gleoman (gleeman). Scop is attested as late as the 13th c. (in Layamon's Brut); it is drawn from the same Germanic root as mod. shape and cognates with the same meaning are found in OHG (scof) and Old Saxon (scop). Gleoman continued in use throughout the ME period. Both scop and gleoman are used in Beowulf of oral poets reciting heroic lays, no doubt in traditional meter. Two OE poems are in the voice of such poets: Deor is the lament of a court poet who has lost his lord's favor, and Widsith is a catalog of names and places by a scop who claims to have traveled widely in space and time. But scop and other words are freely applied in both prose and poetry to poets of all kinds, incl. Homer and Boethius. The work of most OE scopas is anonymous, but a few can be named: Cædmon, whose miraculous gift of song is described by Bede; Cynewulf, who wove his signature into his works in *runes; King Alfred, who trans. the metrical portions of Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy into prose, then verse. The 7th-c. bishop Aldhelm is described in an OE poem as a scop, presumably because he wrote Lat. poetry; but he is reputed to have recited OE poetry so as to attract audiences for his sermons. The existence of a word gleomæden (glee-maiden) suggests that the scop may sometimes have been a woman. Though Beowulf depicts the scop as an important figure in the royal court (even the Danish king Hrothgar performs), he was not always held in high esteem: scop, gleoman, and related words are also used of low and scurrilous entertainers and productions; and as if rebuking Aldhelm, a rule for priests reads, "If a priest loves excessive drunkenness or becomes a glee-man or ale-scop, let him do penance for that."

■ I. M. Hollowell, "Scop and woðbora in OE Poetry," JEGP 77 (1978): 317–29; J. Opland, Anglo-Saxon Oral Poetry (1980).

P. S. Baker

SCOTLAND, POETRY OF

I. Scots and English
II. Gaelic

I. Scots and English. Scottish poetry has been written in Welsh, Lat., Gaelic, Lallans (Scots), and Eng.; in this section, the concern is for the last two and their admixture. Because Lallans from Northumbrian Anglian is undeveloped, it has steadily lost ground to Eng. (of the 1,200 separate poems submitted to New Writing Scotland 5 [1987], e.g., "a bare sprinkling" is in Lallans); nevertheless, just how much freshness, range, color, and memorability it can still command is clear in Sterts & Stobies, the Scots poems of Crawford and Herbert, as well as in the poetic prose of W. Lorimer's brilliant trans. of The New Testament in Scots.

The main sources of early Scottish poetry are three 16th-c. mss.: Asloan, Bannatyne, and Maitland Folio; however, Andrew of Wyntoun's (ca. 1350–ca. 1423) rhymed Cronykil (1424) is the source for what is possibly the oldest surviving fragment (ca. 1286)—eight octosyllabic lines rhyming abababab, of which the last three have now epitomized Scotland's hist. for 700 years: "Crist, borne in virgynyte, / Succoure Scotland, and ramede, / That is stade in perplexitie." Several unskilled romances such as Sir Tristrem followed these verses before 1374–75, when John Barbour (ca. 1320–95) composed The Bruce, Scotland's first literary achievement. A superb story of freedom, this "factional" romance, based on the Fr. *medieval romance, introduces a new subject matter: Scotland. Barbour, the poet-chronicler, seldom slackens his pace through 20 books of octosyllabic *couplets; when he does, it is often to show that he is remembered in Scotland because he himself remembers his countrymen's "hardyment," with such lines as "And led thair lyff in gret trawaill, / And oft, in hard stour of bataill, / Wan eycht gret price off chewalry, / And was woydyt off cowardy."

In 1424, Scotland crowned James Stewart after his 18-year imprisonment in London. As James I (1394–1437), he described Chaucer and John Gower to his court as "Superlative poetis laureate" and under their influence composed "The Kingis Quair." Here *rhyme royal, conventional *allegory of lover and rose, matter from Boethius, and ME all suggest that this James is the first and last *Scottish Chaucerian. The mid-15th c. claims Sir Richard Holland's (ca. 1415–82) The Buke of the Howlat, an ingenious *beast epic examining Scotland's court life. The late 15th c. claims Blind Harry's (ca. 1440–92) extravagant The Wallace, an epic romance in *heroic couplets extending Barbour's nationalism; Cockelbie's Sow, an anonymous country tale with alliterative play in irregular three- and five-beat couplets; and the anonymous, amusing Rauf Coilyear, a satiric antiromance on the theme of a king (Charlemagne) among unaware rustics. The 13-line stanza of Rauf (nine long and four short lines of black letter) parodies the old alliterative stanza of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. Last, the anonymous descriptive pieces "Christ's Kirk on the Green" and "Peblis to the Play" start a trad. of rustic brawl that finds new life in the 20th-c. merrymaking of Robert Garioch's "Embro to the Ploy." Other poems in this trad., like Robert Fergusson's "Leith Races" and Robert Burns's "Holy Fair," adapt the "Christ's Kirk" stanza of ten lines, 4-3-4-3-4-3-4-3-1-3 rhyming abababababcd, the last as *refrain.

Nowhere are the post–World War II advances in Scottish studies more apparent than with respect to Scottish poetry of the 15th c., the Aureate Age, the high creativity of the Scottish Chaucerians or makars. Influences on these superior poets are today known to have been not only Eng. but directly Fr. and It., as well as native. At the forefront were Robert Henryson and William Dunbar.

Robert Henryson (ca. 1425–1505?) drew on several med. literary forms (*lyric, *ballad, *pastoral) for his delightful "Robene and Makyne," arguing "The man that will nocht quhen he may, / Sall haif nocht quhen he wald." "The Annunciation" is unusual as religious verse of the Middle Ages in that its appeal is to intellect through paradox; "Orpheus and Eurydice," the most famous of the shorter love poems, masterfully illustrates cl. narration of romance material under Fr. and It. influences. The 13 beast fables after Aesop and Pierre de Saint Cloude are uncompromisingly Scottish. Skillfully, Henryson reveals personality by gesture and remark; delicately, he controls narrative rhythm in a blend of entertaining story and central moral. Political questions within the allegory (e.g., "The Tale of the Lion and the Mouse") present the poet as a democrat in the line of David Lindsay, Fergusson, and Burns. The fable "The Preiching of the Swallow" and The Testament of Cresseid, both in rhyme royal, are Henryson's two finest poems, full of charity, humanity, and high-mindedness. Central to the Testament is the question of why men made in the image of God become "beistis Irrational."

William Dunbar (ca. 1460–1513) was priest and poet at the court of James IV. Strong Fr. and Occitan influences on a variety of lyric forms are apparent in his 80-odd poems, never long. The temperament is Eur.; the craftsmanship superb in its intricacies, ling. virtuosity, and harmony of sound and sense; the tone variously personal, witty, exuberant, eccentric, blasphemous, and manic-depressive: "Now dansand mery, now like to dee." Dunbar's favorite subjects are himself, his milieu, woman (dame, widow, Madonna), and Catholic Christianity. Some poems, like "The Goldyn Targe," a dream allegory, and "Ane Ballat of Our Lady," belong to the poetry of rhet. and the court; thus, they are replete with the favorite phrase "me thocht," *internal rhyme, and *aureate diction. Other poems, such as "The Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedie" (see FLYTING) and "The Tretis of the Twa Mariit Wemen and the Wedo" (the first *blank verse in Scots, strongly alliterative), belong to the poetry of ribald speech.

Bishop Gavin Douglas (1475?–1522) and Sir David Lindsay (1490?–1555?) complete the makars' roll. More learned than either Henryson or Dunbar, Douglas focused his *dream vision The Palice of Honour on the nature of virtue and honor in educating a young poet and, therewith, acknowledged indebtedness to such It. humanists as Gian Francesco Poggio Braccilini and Petrarch. Douglas's magnum opus is his trans. of the Aeneid, also in heroic couplets, the first trans. of a classic into Scots and a major source for Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey's Aeneid, the first Eng. blank verse. Its prologues, notably that to book 7, reveal an individual voice, a wealth of lang., and the typical Scots poet's eye for nature and weather. Sir David, Lyon King-at-Arms, promoter of John Knox, intellectual revolutionary, and early defender of writing for "Iok" and "Thome"—i.e., the common people—in the maternal lang., made his reputation as the most popular Scots poet before Burns primarily on Ane Pleasant Satire of the Thrie Estaitis, a morality play or propaganda drama with Lady Sensuality and Flattery as the leads. Blending comedy and common sense, Lindsay gives answer to "What is good government?" in sophisticated verse forms: *bob and wheel, eight-line stanzas of iambic pentameter in linking rhyme for formal speeches, and exchange of single lines in couplets of *stichomythia.

With Robert Wedderburns's (ca. 1510–57) Gude and Godlie Ballatis, (assisted by his brothers John and James) and the songs of Alexander Scott (1520?–1583?), national Scotland approached the death of the Eng. queen, Elizabeth I (d. 1603), the Union of the Crowns (James VI of Scotland crowned James I of England), and the loss of court and courtly lang. Such loss, together with the King James Bible, the splendor of Edmund Spenser and Shakespeare, and the victories of Covenanting Puritans, makes it impossible to name one Scots poet of high distinction during the entire 17th c., not excluding Alexander Montgomerie (1555?–97?), poet of The Cherry and the Slae, dream vision and allegory; any other member of King James's "Castalian band"; or William Drummond of Hawthornden (1585–1649), who showed with some success what a Scotsman could compose in Eng. No longer a court lang., Scots lived on as the vernacular of folk lit.: ballad and song.

Scottish ballads represent an oral trad. (see Buchan 1972) of anonymous narrative songs arising in the late Middle Ages to flourish in the 16th and 17th cs. and to be collected in the later 19th c. by F. J. Child. Chief subjects are violent hist. ("Oterborne"), tragic romance ("Clerk Saunders"), and the supernatural ("Tam Lin"). The vernacular is simple and stark, grimly realistic and fatalistic. The vividly dramatic story unfolds through unity of action, characterization, and the relentless pace of the *ballad meter. *Formula, *epithet, *incremental repetition, refrain, *alliteration, and question and answer also advance the plot. Colors are primary; images are violent ("The curse of hell frae me sall ye beir / Mither, mither"), tender ("O waly, waly! but love be bony / A little time, while it is new"), eerie ("The channerin worm doth chide"), and beautiful ("And she has snooded her yellow hair / A little aboon her bree").

The period from 1603 to World War I produced many poets who began to choose literary Eng. as their medium because they thought it was impossible to use Lallans and be taken seriously. So, James Thomson (1700–48), poet of The Seasons; Robert Blair (1699–1746); and James Beattie (1735–1803) used standard Eng. for their remembered works. Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832) retained the vernacular of the ballads he collected and improved for his Minstrelsy but chose Eng. for his long poems (The Lady of the Lake) and for the excellent songs in his novels ("Proud Maisie"). Lord Byron (1728–1824) and Thomas Campbell (1777–1844) used Eng. and later poets such as Bysshe Vanolis (pseud. of James Thomson, 1834–82) and Robert Louis Stevenson (1850–94) again chose Eng. for City of Dreadful Night and A Child's Garden of Verses, respectively. Published poetry in Lallans, however, had been kept alive—just barely—until it experienced a significant revival when the 1707 Union of Parliaments had seemed to reduce Scotland to a "region" of Great Britain.

James Watson's Choice Collection in two vols. (1706–9) includes Robert Sempill the Younger's (ca. 1595–1663) mock elegy "The Life and Death of Habbie Simpson" (ca. 1650) in a stanza that gives name to the "standard Habbie," better known as the *Burns stanza; William Hamilton of Gilbertfield's (?1665–1751) "Bonny Heck" has the same stanza for the last words of a dying greyhound, anticipating Burns's "Poor Mailie's Elegy." These poems are in Lallans. So, too, are such works of Allan Ramsay (1685–1758) as are his invention of the *verse epistle (usually in tetrameters), his burlesque elegy on a church treasurer who could smell out a bawd, his poetic drama The Gentle Shepherd, many of the songs in his The Tea Table Miscellany, and all of the older Scots poems published in his The Ever Green. Ramsay's prosody becomes Robert Fergusson's (1750–74); Fergusson's becomes Burns's. Within the vernacular revival, these three poets compose their satires, genre poems, epistles, and comic narratives, principally in six verse forms: *ballad meter, octosyllabic couplets, heroic couplets, the standard Habbie, "Christ's Kirk," and "Cherrie and the Slee." Among Fergusson's poems in Lallans is his masterpiece "Auld Reekie," realistically describing everyday life in Edinburgh, "Whare couthy chiels at e'ening meet / Their bizzin craigs and mou's to weet."

More and more, the measure of Robert Burns's (1759–96) high accomplishment has become the satires like "Holy Willie's Prayer," The Jolly Beggars, the narrative "Tam o' Shanter," and the hundreds of songs. The cantata The Jolly Beggars has his characteristic merits of description, narration, dramatic effect, metrical diversity, energy, and sensitivity to the beauties inherent in Scottish words and music. Otherwise, hearing a song like "Scots wha hae" or "Ca' the Yowes," each showing masterful skill at uniting words and music, will unforgettably illustrate this genius. To Burns under the Scottish Enlightenment we owe the perpetuation of Scottish folk song. How rich this heritage is has been the further study of those like Cecil Sharp, James Bruce Duncan, and Gavin Greig in the 19th c. and Hamish Henderson and others at the School of Scottish Studies in the 20th. By contrast, literary songs from the 18th c. to the 20th c. tend toward sentimentalism, such as Jean Elliot's (1727–1805) "Flowers o' the Forest" or Carolina Oliphant, Lady Nairne's (1766–1845) "Caller Herrin."

Seldom does 19th-c. Scottish poetry better James Hogg's (1770–1835) idiosyncratic verse. Slavish imitations of Burns strike low, nor rise by the Whistle-Binkie (fiddler's seat at merrymakings) anthol. or the couthy (sociable) sentimentality of Kailyard (a type of fiction from about 1880 of rural life, dialect, and sentiment; see James M. Barrie's A Window in Thrums or Ian Maclaren's [pseud. of Rev. John Watson] verse epigraph).

Industrialization and the Calvinist ethic of profitability and genteel respectability bring poets to their knees. At century's close, however, Stevenson composes poems like "The Spaewife" in a literary Scots, the precision of which opposes the Kailyard; "blood and guts" John Davidson (1857–1909) experiments in Eng. with new myths, symbols of science's dethroning religion; and the founder of the Scottish renaissance grows as a lad in Langholm.

Christopher Murray Grieve (1892–1978) initiates the revival of cultural and creative confidence in the 1920s, throwing off Victorian sentimentalism with the war cry "Back to Dunbar!" Abandoning his early Eng. verse, he took the pseud. Hugh MacDiarmid to produce two collections of lyrics in a revived form of lowland Scots (Lallans). The audacious images of love and death in these poems combine expressionist intensity with a fine melodic power and balladlike structures in settings that are both domestic and cosmic:

> Mars is braw in crammasy,
> Venus in a green silk goun,
> The auld mune shak's her gowden feathers,
> Their starry talk's a wheen o' blethers,
> Nane for thee a thochtie sparin',
> Earth, thou bonnie broukit bairn!
> —But greet, an' in your tears ye'll droun
> The haill clanjamfrie!
>
> ("The Bonnie Broukit Bairn")

Such verses recall and indeed surpass the lyrical concentration and estrangement of early *imagism. MacDiarmid coined another slogan, "Not Traditions—Precedents!," to catch the energy of his masterpiece A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle (1926). This long poem sequence in different verse forms is Whitmanesque in scale, and as a romantic celebration of ever-changing and contradictory modes and moods, it is also modernist, invoking flux and crisis to match what the poet took to be the glorious instability of life itself, not to mention the parlous condition of mod. Scotland.

Taking their cue from MacDiarmid, poets (and poetry) play a leading part in the early years of the Scottish literary renaissance, with William Soutar (1898–1943) aiming to revive Lallans by way of "whigmaleeries" and "bairn rhymes" to capture a young audience. Soutar looked back to the ballad trad., as did Violet Jacob (1863–1946) and Marion Angus (1866–1946), whose eerie Scots lyrics (not without sentiment) anticipated and supported MacDiarmid's early work. In the 1930s, MacDiarmid returns to Eng. for an overtly socialist verse, followed by the *free verse and intermittent rhymes of "On a Raised Beach" (1934), one of the finest long philosophical poems in mod. lit. His late work seeks a unifying vision of scientific materialism and world lang. in a densely prosaic "poetry of fact," epic in scale and (rather like Ezra Pound's Cantos) finally unfinished or unfinishable. The Eng. lyrics of Edwin Muir (1887–1959) are the antithesis of MacDiarmid's materialistic optimism, as Muir is haunted by a sense of loss, going back to his idyllic childhood in Orkney and the family's traumatic move to Glasgow in 1901. Muir did not support MacDiarmid's program for the revival of Scots lang. and culture ("Burns and Scott, sham bards of a sham nation": "Scotland 1941"), and the two leading poets of the day fell out with each other. Images of frozen time and Edenic expulsion characterize Muir's often symbolic and melancholy verse ("Childhood," "One Foot in Eden," "The Labyrinth"). He and his wife, Willa, were the first to translate Franz Kafka into Eng. ("The Interrogation").

Notable work was done in Scots by Sydney Goodsir Smith (1915–75) whose poetic *persona harks back to the rambunctious Edinburgh of Fergusson. Under the Eildon Tree (1948) is his masterpiece, as 24 elegies on legendary lovers lead him to confront mortality and desire. The Scots poems of Robert Garioch (1909–81) are closer to contemp. urban speech, whether he is translating the 19th-c. Roman dialect *sonnets of Giuseppe Belli or casting a wry and often humorously satirical eye on the pretensions of his fellow citizens in the "Edinburgh Sonnets" or striking a more personal note on the constraints of everyday living in "The Percipient Swan." The verses of Tom Scott (1918–95) and Alexander Scott (1920–89) have a forceful and combative wit, and their commitment to the medium of Scots was taken up in later years by William Neill (1922–2010), who also wrote in Gaelic, and by the tender and understated plainness that is the characteristic Scottish voice of Alastair Mackie (1925–95) and his publisher, the editor and poet Duncan Glen (1933–2008).

Some of the best poetry of World War II was produced in Eng. by Hamish Henderson (1919–2002), most notably his sequence Elegies for the Dead in Cyrenaica (1948); by G. S. Fraser (1915–80); and by the Gaelic poets Sorley MacLean (1911–96) and George Campbell Hay (1915–84). A founder member of the School of Scottish Studies, Henderson wrote his own ballads and was an influential scholar of the folk-song revival in the 1950s and 1960s.

The leading lyric poets of what has been called the second generation of the literary renaissance are Norman MacCaig (1910–96) and George Mackay Brown (1921–96), who wrote only in Eng.; Iain Crichton Smith (1928–98), who also wrote in Gaelic; and MacLean, who wrote exclusively in Gaelic. The urbane poet and broadcaster Maurice Lindsay (1918–2009) was a tireless proponent of the cultural revival, editing its first anthol., Modern Scottish Poetry, in 1946. MacCaig's first poems were in the syntactically dense and quasi-surreal mode of the New Apocalypse group, two of whose leading members, J. F. Hendry (1912–86) and Fraser, were also Scottish; but the hundreds of short lyrics he went on to write, first in formal verse and later in a succinct free verse, are characterized by clarity, compassion, and an unsentimental delight in the natural world. These factors, along with his gift for memorable and witty images and a dryly humorous reading style, made him Scotland's most popular poet for over 30 years. Brought up in Lewis and indelibly marked by his Free Kirk background, Crichton Smith's poetry can achieve a piercing lyrical beauty ("Old Woman") with an undercurrent of loneliness and existential unease. Never quite "confessional" (see CONFESSIONAL POETRY), his later work was influenced nevertheless by Robert Lowell, with elliptical poems that reflect on exile and on the concept of the island as both a literal and metaphysical place ("Australia").

The "island" for Brown was undoubtedly his native Orkney. Unlike Muir, Brown spent almost all his life in Orkney, creating an impersonally spare free verse modeled on the sagas and the cryptic understatement of OE and ON verse. In collections such as Fishermen with Ploughs (1971), the cyclic patterns of farming and fishing are merged with the rituals of Catholic faith and carried across time to invoke archetypes of meaning and value that he could not find in the mod. world. George Bruce (1909–2002) had his own roots in the fishing communities of the northeast of Scotland. His Eng. verse also takes spareness as a virtue, but his vision is extravert and enthusiastic. After an early flirtation with the New Apocalypse and The Nightfishing (1955), a long poem that linked net fishing with the creative struggle, W. S. Graham (1918–86) spent most of his life in Cornwall reflecting on the nature of lang. and meaning. Poems such as "What Is the Language Using Us For" and "Malcolm Mooney's Land" show his finely nuanced, meditative, and subtly cerebral lines at their best.

Ian Hamilton Finlay (1925–2006) was also haunted by boats and nets, and the early poems of The Dancers Inherit the Party (1960) were influenced by the prosody of Robert Creeley. They offer *minimalism, gentle humor, and a Zen-like inconsequence as an antidote to what he saw as MacDiarmid's nationalist stridency and the grandiose ambitions of Anglo-Am. *modernism. Finlay matured to become an internationally recognized exponent of *concrete poetry, though he was less well appreciated in his home country. The 1960s and 1970s see what might be termed a third generation of poets, such as Finlay, who looked to America or Europe and were less interested in, or even hostile to, the cultural nationalism of the original renaissance. As a correspondent for The New Yorker and a major verse translator of Jorge Luis Borges and Pablo Neruda, Alastair Reid (b. 1926) stands outside to reflect on both lang. and place in a poetry that stems from his life in Scotland, Spain, and the U.S. The poetry of Kenneth White (b. 1936) is marked by the *Black Mountain school; his long engagement with Fr. academic culture marks the discipline he has called "geopoetics" and his interest in the value of marginal and in-between states. In the 1970s, D. M. Black (b. 1941) created surreal narratives with echoes of Kafkaesque absurdity, while the hip Blakean rage of Alan Jackson (b. 1938) caught the youth culture of the times with street-wise, protopunk *performance poems satirizing consumerism, bourgeois hypocrisy—and Scottishness.

The year 1968 saw the publication of The Second Life by Edwin Morgan (1920–2010). Although Morgan had published poems (and a verse trans. of Beowulf) beginning in the 1950s, The Second Life, followed by From Glasgow to Saturn (1973), marked his arrival as Scotland's most innovative, influential, and popular poet for decades to come, writing concrete poetry, *sound poetry, and "science fiction" poetry, as well as stark reflections on urban deprivation in his native Glasgow ("Glasgow Green"). Looking to Europe, America, and the cosmos rather than to England, experimental and eclectic, Morgan sees Scotland in even wider perspectives of space and time than MacDiarmid ever envisaged (Sonnets from Scotland, 1984), and not least in the discreet and finely tender love poems that speak for the poet's homosexuality ("One Cigarette," "Absence," the late sequence "Love and a Life"). Equally adept as a playwright, essayist, and translator, Morgan was appointed Scotland's first national makar in 2004, the year he composed a poem for the opening of the new parliament building.

Scottish writing gained renewed energy in the last 30 years of the 20th c., and poetry was no exception. The finely measured work of Douglas Dunn (b. 1942) comes to terms with class and national identity ("Washing the Coins") in formally structured poems, offering reflective commentaries on the world around him (Barbarians, 1979; St Kilda's Parliament, 1981; Northlight, 1988). The collection Elegies (1985) offers an almost unbearably powerful set of poems on the death by cancer of his first wife. At odds with Dunn's almost Georgian decorum, the poetry of Tom Leonard (b. 1944) uses the demotic Scots accent of the Glasgow streets to challenge all preconceptions of what poetry is or can be, along with the conventions of spelling and every social discrimination against those whose voices do not "fit": "if / a toktaboot / thi truth / lik wanna yoo / scruff yi / widny thingk / it wuz troo" (Intimate Voices, 1984). Less concerned with MacDiarmid's case for Lallans and the nation, these younger writers are much more engaged with issues of class, identity, and gender. Liz Lochhead (b. 1947) draws on the demotic energy of common lives and voices, in poems infused with subtle speech dynamics, colored by an ironic ear for rhyme, clichés, and puns, and marked by a sharp eye for the female condition in the masculinist culture of her native Glasgow. Lochhead is only the first of the women to have transformed contemp. Scottish writing in prose and poetry. Kathleen Jamie (b. 1962) came to interrogate her Scottish roots starting with the title poem of The Queen of Sheba (1994), which throws a wry and energizing light on the stifling of female aspiration in her home village and Scotland at large. Jackie Kay (b. 1961) draws on her own experience as an adopted black child in a working-class Glasgow family, to write beautiful poems transfused with compassion and energy, even as they recognize the pains of sexual and racial difference. Carol Ann Duffy (b. 1955) and Kate Clanchy (b. 1965) found themselves living in England from their early years, but their first sense of transition and ling. difference informs their work and their reflections on sexism in all its forms. Tessa Ransford (b. 1938) is more conventionally lyrical, while the poems of Valerie Gillies (b. 1948) are deeply engaged with ecology and the landscape. Sheena Blackhall (b. 1947) writes in broad northeastern Scots, while Magi Gibson (b. 1953), Dilys Rose (b. 1954), and Angela McSeveney (b. 1964) use Eng.

Lang. and identity are still an issue in the witty Eng. poems of Robert Crawford (b. 1959) who fondly reimagines Scotland's past and present through every kind of eclectic metaphor. He is joined in this by W. N. Herbert (b. 1961). They shared a volume (Sterts & Stobies) that revisited and supercharged the "artificial Scots" of MacDiarmid's lyrics to hilarious effect, but Herbert's muse is wilder still, simultaneously intellectual and playful, dense with arcane information and popular culture. Fellow Dundonian Don Paterson (b. 1963) shares something of this esoteric breadth. His work is self-aware, rooted in the real but ironically alert to literature, contingency, and mortality (God's Gift to Women, 1997). David Kinloch (b. 1959) reflects tellingly on sexuality and identity, while the long free-verse sequences of Frank Kuppner (b. 1951) generate a unique voice that is formal, even pedantically distanced, low-key, and ultimately strangely moving. The poetry of John Burnside (b. 1955) is much more conventionally lyrical, nuanced by his own Catholic faith, his fine landscapes, and interiors that often seem existentially numinous. The humane verse of Stewart Conn (b. 1936) has been steadily engaged with the interface between personal hist. and culture over many years, while Ron Butlin (b. 1949), Tom Pow (b. 1950), Brian McCabe (b. 1951), Andrew Greig (b. 1951), Donny O' Rourke (b. 1959), Gerry Cambridge (b. 1959), Richard Price (b. 1966), and Robin Robertson (b. 1955) have all made significant contributions to the richness that is the contemp. scene.

II. Gaelic

A. The "Classical" Tradition. The origins of written Scottish Gaelic poetry are closely entwined with those of the poetry of Ireland, a commonality evidenced in the shared "classical" trad. of the professional court poets, formalized in Ireland in the 12th c. and sustained by a hereditary caste of learned males who had undergone arduous training in established bardic schools (see IRELAND, POETRY OF; BARD). Cl. poetry in its strictest form continued to be composed without significant regional variation across Ireland and Gaelic Scotland into the early mod. period (as late as the 18th c. in Scotland), written in a shared literary supradialect, using identical heroic diction and identical meters (based on syllable count rather than the stress patterns of Gaelic speech), with an identical attention to complex rules of ornamentation. Poems of identifiably Scottish provenance are preserved in mss. of the 16th to 18th c. but are many fewer in number than their Ir. counterparts.

The excellence of bardic verse lies in its highly developed lang., its sophisticated allusive style, and above all in the elaborate, subtly modulated music of its intricate metrical patterns. Its limitations inhere neither in subject matter nor technique, but rather in a formalism of conventions inseparable from the office of the professional poet, that of public panegyrist to the great men of his society (see PANEGYRIC). *Syllabic verse that uses an easier, modified technique and makes concessions to vernacular speech is fairly common too, whether written by professionals or by aristocrats—male and female—who had at least some facility for composing competent verse. All these features of style are displayed in the earliest and principal collection of cl. verse surviving in Scotland: the book of the Dean of Lismore, compiled 1512–42, with the bulk of the Scottish poetic content composed from 1400 to ca. 1520. This ms. provides a surprisingly eclectic sample of the range and thematic variety of syllabic verse: as well as the predictable *encomia of court poets for their patrons, we find *satire, religious poetry, heroic "ballads" of Fionn and Oisein, moral and didactic verse, and poetry in the Eur. *courtly love trad., much of this *occasional verse composed by nonprofessionals. A prominent interest in the "argument about women" and the morals of the clergy further links the compilation to Lowland-Scots, Eng., and continental literary cultures. While much of the impetus and early leadership for cl. Gaelic culture came from Ireland, it is clear from the dean's book and other sources that, by the later med. and early Ren. period, some of the Scottish Gaelic literati were as engaged with their multilingual Scottish environment as with the pan-Gaelic world, not least in their preference for a Lowland-Scots-based orthography in "secretary hand" over the corra litir script of the bardic schools.

B. Vernacular Panegyric. The culture of the cl. poets was by definition literate, but oral song trads. (equally old or, conceivably, older) existed alongside the high-prestige bardic productions. The late survival of heroic clan society and the siege mentality brought about by the balkanization of the Gaelic polity in early mod. Scotland stimulated the devel. of a vernacular court panegyric praising the caste of aristocratic warrior-hunters who protected and rewarded their people. Panegyric—organized in sets of conventional images or formulas that work as a semiotic code—is a pervasive style, particularly in the period ca. 1600–1800, with its workings and reflexes traceable even in contemp. poetry. The vernacular bards were not, on the whole, literate, and their work was captured in writing only by 18th-c. or later collectors. Yet, too much can be made of the literacy-orality disjunction, since vernacular poetry continued to express many of the attitudes of cl. poetry and employ many of its *tropes, and irregularly stressed meters derived from syllabic versification survived demotically.

Among regularly stressed meters, one of the most distinctive is the so-called strophic meter, closely associated with vernacular panegyric—minimally, an asymetrical verse of two short lines and a longer line, to which musical symmetry is restored through repetition either of the unit or of the final line. A particularly interesting variant, deployed for occasions of high solemnity, allows the poet to stretch the run of short lines from anything between 4 and 14 lines within the same song, creating dramatic crescendos of musical and lyrical tension. The two great early practitioners of strophic forms whose work has survived, Mairi Nighean Alasdair Ruaidh (Mary Macleod, ca. 1615–1707) and Iain Lom (John MacDonald, ca. 1620–1710), are not, as was once claimed, innovators: although MacDonald is exercised by national issues, both are clan poets composing in a strong panegyric trad., and both clearly have the security of established practice behind them—perhaps even extending to before the introduction of Lat. learning.

C. The Female Tradition. Both Macleod and MacDonald also used meters associated with the subliterary trad. of generally anonymous female composition (typically marked by short verses and more complex *refrains and often used for *laments). Largely ignored by 18th- and 19th-c. collectors, this "folk-song" corpus has been hailed in more recent times as one of the glories of Gaelic lit., exceptional in its emotional intensity, its rhythmic subtleties, and its apparent lack of artifice. It ceased as an active creative trad. in the course of the 18th c. (in tandem with the demise of clan society), but a large static repertoire was preserved and transmitted well into the 20th c.

D. The Eighteenth to Twenty-first Centuries. In the dominant male *canon, fresh dimensions were added in the 18th c. to the scope and expressiveness of Gaelic poetry, particularly by Alastair mac Mhaighstir Alastair (Alexander MacDonald, 1700–70), the nationalist bard of the 1745 Jacobite uprising, and by the hunter-poet Donnchadh Bàn (Duncan Ban Macintyre, 1724–1812). A highly educated and daringly innovative poet who drew on all the resources of Gaelic, MacDonald is the outstanding literary figure of his age. Along with the controlled, detailed naturalism of Macintyre's "Praise of Ben Dorain," much of MacDonald's work embodies an audacious movement away from clan poetry and aristocratic panegyric. Rob Donn (Robert Mackay, 1714–78), like Macintyre a completely oral poet, is the most subtle satirist in Gaelic lit., while the poetry of Uilleam Ros (William Ross, 1762–90) manifests a wider sensibility—particularly in his anguished love songs—which certainly owes something to his learning in Eng. and the cl. langs.

In contrast to the innovative glories of the 18th c., 19th-c. verse has tended to be judged harshly as the nadir of Gaelic lit., the weak and sentimental expression of a trad. debilitated by the social upheaval of land clearance and mass emigration, the encroachment of Eng., and the nostalgic conservatism of émigré Gaelic communities. But more recent scholarship has highlighted the thematic breadth of songs of the period and their engagement with the technological and sociopolitical changes of their era. Certainly, while the devel. of a mod. Gaelic prose will continue to be seen as the period's greatest literary achievement, an appreciable body of vigorous oral poetry continued to be composed, notably against the background of land politics. The best work of Màiri Mhòr nan Òran (Mary Macpherson, 1821–98) is memorable for its delicate lyricism and its political commitment, while from the university-educated Seonaidh Phàdraig Iarsiadair (John Smith, 1848–81) came powerful, radical indictments of an immoral social order.

After World War I, the oral poetic trad. entered an era of terminal decline: it suffered irremediably from the ling.-cultural shift toward Eng. (in the wake of the 1872 Education Act) and from the loss of its organic context (communal orality centered around the cèilidh house) as mod. media and population change fundamentally altered Gaelic society. It showed astonishing resilience in its decline, however, its practice skillfully upheld into the later 20th c. by aging and increasingly isolated song makers. The most formidable of these was the stonemason Dòmhnall Ruadh Phàislig (Donald Macintyre, 1889–1964), who displayed the technical range and mastery of the best 18th-c. practitioners while addressing the issues of his own era. But the dependence of the oral bardic trad. on high-level ling. dexterity and density of diction and its attachment to traditional modes of thought and transmission placed it beyond the reach or tastes of most younger poets following World War II, so that the dominant devels. in poetic practice since the 1940s have been in written mod. poetry, typically by university graduates, and increasingly composed in freer metrics, though with not infrequent reference to the sung oral trad. (Songwriters, meanwhile, increasingly gravitated towards folk, country, and rock idioms.) The poetry of Somhairle MacGill-Eain (1911–96) in particular marked a point of no return, in its extraordinary fusion of traditional and modernist (see MODERNISM), Gaelic and non-Gaelic sensibilities; George Campbell Hay (1915–84) rehabilitated the subtle movement of older meters and opened up a vast creative space through his multilingual, multicultural adventurism; Ruaraidh MacThòmais (Derick S. Thomson, 1921–2012) decisively developed vers libre*, a departure of great interest in Gaelic metrics and of irreversible impact in Gaelic poetic practice. Iain Mac a' Ghobhainn (Iain Crichton Smith, 1928–98) and Dòmhnall MacAmhlaigh (1926–89) gave the modernist push further impetus.

The influence of MacGill-Eain and MacThòmais on younger poets has been liberating rather than shackling, and interestingly varied voices came to prominence in the last decades of the 20th c. (incl. those of nonnative Gaelic speakers), some of them startling in their detachment from Gaelic trad. Of these, a good number have gone on to develop an important body of work, e.g., Aonghas MacNeacail (b. 1942), Maoilios Caimbeul (b. 1944), Crìsdean Whyte (b. 1952), Meg Bateman (b. 1959), and Rody Gorman (b. 1960). In the 21st c., new voices have been sparser, with few signs of a wave of poets to rival the exuberant creativity of the 1980s and 1990s, a lull perhaps attributable to the remarkable florescence in fiction writing (supported by substantial public funding) in the first decade of the new millennium.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts. Scots and English: The Scots Musical Museum, ed. J. Johnson, 6 v. (1786–1803); Bishop Percy's Folio Manuscript, ed. J. Hales and F. Furnivall, 3 v. (1867–68); English and Scottish Popular Ballads, ed. F. J. Child, 5 v. (1883–98); The Bruce, ed. W. W. Skeat, 2 v. (1894); Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, ed. T. Henderson, 4 v. (1902); Traditional Tunes of the Child Ballads, ed. B. Bronson, 4 v. (1959–72); Oxford Book of Scottish Verse, ed. J. MacQueen and T. Scott (1966); Contemporary Scottish Verse, ed. N. MacCaig and A. Scott (1970); A Scottish Ballad Book, ed. D. Buchan (1973); Made in Scotland, ed. R. Garioch (1974); Collected Poems of S. G. Smith (1975); Voices of Our Kind: An Anthology of Modern Scottish Poetry, ed. A. Scott, 3d. ed. (1975); Poetry of Northeast Scotland, ed. J. Alison (1976); Modern Scottish Verse, 1922–77, ed. A. Scott (1978); Choice of Scottish Verse, 1560–1660, ed. R.D.S. Jack (1978); Akros Verse, 1965–82, ed. D. Glen (1982); Twelve More Modern Scottish Poets, ed. C. King and I. C. Smith (1986); A. Mackie, Ingaitherins: Selected Poems (1987); D. Dunn, Northlight (1988); The Best of Scottish Poetry: Contemporary Scottish Verse, ed. R. Bell (1989); D. Lindsay, Ane Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis, ed. R. Lyall (1989); Radical Renfrew: Poetry from the French Revolution to the First World War, ed. T. Leonard (1990); An Anthology of Scottish Women Poets, ed. C. Kerrigan (1991); The New Makars: Contemporary Poetry in Scots, ed. T. Hubbard (1991); The Faber Book of Twentieth-Century Scottish Poetry, ed. D. Dunn (1993); Scottish Ballads, ed. E. Lyle (1994); The Poetry of Scotland, Gaelic Scots and English, 1380–1980, ed. R. Watson (1995); The Christis Kirk Tradition: Scots Poems of Folk Festivity, ed. A. MacLaine (1996); Scottish Literature: An Anthology, ed. D. McCordick, 3 v. (1996); J. Barbour, The Bruce, ed. A. Duncan (1997); The Mercat Anthology of Early Scottish Literature, 1375–1707, ed. R.D.S. Jack and P.A.T. Rozendaal (1998); The Triumph Tree: Scotland's Earliest Poetry, AD 530–1350, ed. T. Clancy (1998); The Makars: The Poetry of Henryson, Dunbar and Douglas, ed. J. A. Tasioulas (1999); The New Penguin Book of Scottish Verse, ed. R. Crawford and M. Imlah (2000); Scottish Religious Poetry: An Anthology, ed. M. Bateman and R. Crawford (2000); Before Burns: Eighteenth-Century Scottish Poetry, ed. C. MacLachlan (2002); Dream State: The New Scottish Poets, ed. D. O'Rourke, 2d ed. (2002); Scottish Literature in the Twentieth Century: An Anthology, ed. D. McCordick (2002); Blind Harry, The Wallace, ed. A. McKim (2003); The Canongate Burns, ed. A. Noble and P. S. Hogg, rev. ed. (2003); Modern Scottish Women Poets, ed. D. McMillan (2003). Gaelic: Gàir nan Clàrsach / The Harps' Cry, ed. C. Ó Baoill, trans. M. Bateman (1994)—17th-c. verse; An Tuil, ed. R. Black (1999)—20th-c. verse; An Lasair, ed. R. Black (2001)—18th-c. verse; Caran an t-Saoghail / The Wiles of the World, ed. D. E. Meek (2003)—19th-c. verse; Duanaire na Sracaire / Songbook of the Pillagers, ed M. Bateman and W. McLeod (2007)—verse to 1600.

■ Criticism and History. Scots and English: T. F. Henderson, Scottish Vernacular Literature (1900); J. H. Millar, A Literary History of Scotland (1903); G. G. Smith, Scottish Literature, Character and Influence (1919); A. Mackenzie, Historical Survey of Scottish Literature to 1714 (1933); J. Speirs, The Scots Literary Tradition (1940); Scottish Poetry, ed. J. Kingsley (1955); K. Wittig, The Scottish Tradition in Literature (1958); T. Crawford, Burns: A Study of the Poems and Songs (1960); D. Craig, Scottish Literature and the Scottish People (1961); K. Buthlay, Hugh MacDiarmid (1964); D. Daiches, The Paradox of Scottish Culture (1964); D. Glen, Hugh MacDiarmid and the Scottish Renaissance (1964); F. Collinson, Tradition and National Music of Scotland (1966); T. Scott, Dunbar (1966); J. MacQueen, Robert Henryson: A Study of the Major Narrative Poems (1967); T. C. Smout, A History of the Scottish People, 1560–1830 (1969); H. M. Shire, Song, Dance and Poetry of the Court of Scotland under King James VI (1969); A. M. Kinghorn, Middle Scots Poets (1970); D. Buchan, The Ballad and the Folk (1972); Hugh MacDiarmid: A Critical Survey, ed. D. Glen (1972); R.D.S. Jack, The Italian Influence in Scottish Literature (1972); Robert Burns, ed. D. Low (1974); R. Fulton, Contemporary Scottish Poetry (1974); A. Bold, The Ballad (Critical Idiom) (1979); R. Knight, Edwin Muir (1980)—best study; G. Kratzmann, Anglo-Scottish Literary Relations, 1430–1550 (1980); W. R. Aitken, Scottish Literature in English and Scots (1982)—excellent bibl.; D. Daiches, Literature and Gentility in Scotland (1982); C. Kerrigan, Whaur Extremes Meet (1983)—study of MacDiarmid's work; J. MacQueen, Progress and Poetry, 1650–1800 (1982); Scotch Passion, ed. A. Scott (1982)—erotic poetry; The New Testament in Scots, trans. W. L. Lorimer (1983); Concise Scots Dictionary, ed. M. Robinson (1985)—intro. is Aitkin's excellent "History of Scots"; R.D.S. Jack, Scottish Literature's Debt to Italy (1986); W. Scheps and J. A. Looney, The Middle Scots Poets: A Reference Guide (1986); T. C. Smout, A Century of the Scottish People, 1830–1950 (1986); The History of Scottish Literature, ed. C. Craig, 4 v. (1987–88); A. Bold, MacDiarmid: A Critical Biography (1988); T. Lopez, The Poetry of W. S. Graham (1989); F. Stafford, The Sublime Savage: James Macpherson and the Poems of Ossian (1989); About Edwin Morgan, ed. R. Crawford and H. Whyte (1990); E. Morgan, Nothing Not Giving Messages: Reflections on His Life and Work, ed. H. Whyte (1990); N. MacCaig: Critical Essays, ed. J. Hendry and R. Ross (1990); P. Bawcutt, Dunbar the Makar (1992); Iain Crichton Smith: Critical Essays, ed. C. Nicholson (1992); M. Lindsay, History of Scottish Literature, 2d ed. (1992); C. Nicholson, Poem, Purpose, Place: Shaping Identity in Modern Scottish Verse (1992); Hugh MacDiarmid: Man and Poet, ed. N. K. Gish (1993); Liz Lochhead's Voices, ed. R. Crawford and A. Varty (1993); T. Royle, The Mainstream Companion to Scottish Literature (1993); Wood Notes Wild, Essays on the Poetry and Art of Ian Hamilton Finlay, ed. A. Finlay (1995); M. Walker, Scottish Literature since 1707 (1996); J. Corbett, Language and Scottish Literature (1997); A History of Scottish Women's Writing, ed. D. Gifford and D. McMillan (1997); Contemporary Scottish Women Writers, ed. A. Christianson and A. Lumsden (2000); J. D. McClure, Language, Poetry and Nationhood: 1887 to the Present (2000); L. McIlvanney, Burns the Radical: Politics and Poetry in Late Eighteenth-Century Scotland (2002); Scottish Literature in English and Scots, ed. D. Gifford, S. Dunnigan, A. MacGillivray (2002); J. Sheeler and A. Lawson, Little Sparta: The Garden of Ian Hamilton Finlay (2003); Modernism and Nationalism: Source Documents for the Scottish Renaissance, ed. M. McCulloch (2004); C. White, Modern Scottish Poetry (2004); M. Fergusson, George Mackay Brown: The Life (2006); B. Kay, Scots: The Mither Tongue (2006); R. Crawford, Scotland's Books (2007); The Edinburgh History of Scottish Literature, ed. I. Brown, 3 v. (2007); R. Watson, Literature of Scotland, 2d ed., 2 v. (2007); The Edinburgh Companion to Contemporary Scottish Poetry, ed. M. McGuire and C. Nicholson (2009); The Edinburgh Companion to Twentieth-Century Scottish Literature, ed. I. Brown and A. Riach (2009). Gaelic*: See the intros. to the anthols. above; J. MacInnes, "The Panegyric Code in Gaelic Poetry and Its Historical Background," Transactions of the Gaelic Society of Inverness 50 (1979); D. S. Thomson, "Gaelic Poetry in the Eighteenth Century: The Breaking of the Mould," The History of Scottish Literature, Vol. 2, ed. A. Hook (1987); W. Gillies, "Gaelic: The Classical Tradition," The History of Scottish Literature, Vol. 1, ed. R.D.S. Jack (1988); J. MacInnes, "Gaelic Poetry in the Nineteenth Century," The History of Scottish Literature, Vol. 3, ed. D. Gifford (1988); D. Thomson, An Introduction to Gaelic Poetry, 2d ed. (1989); W. Gillies, "Traditional Gaelic Women's Songs," Alba Literaria, ed. M. Fazzini (2005), and "Gaelic Literature in the Later Middle Ages: The Book of the Dean and Beyond," The Edinburgh History of Scottish Literature, Vol. 1, ed. T. O. Clancy et al. (2007); T. A. McKean, "Tradition and Modernity: Gaelic Bards in the Twentieth Century," The Edinburgh History of Scottish Literature, Vol. 3, ed. I. Brown et al. (2007); D. E. Meek, "Gaelic Literature in the Nineteenth Century," The Edinburgh History of Scottish Literature, Vol. 2, ed. S. Manning et al. (2007).

R. D. Thornton, R. Watson (Scots and Eng.); J. Macinnes, M. Byrne (Gaelic)

SCOTTISH CHAUCERIANS OR MAKARS. A name applied to a group of Scottish poets of the 15th and 16th cs. whose work, although the freshest and most original Eng. poetry of the period, shows a common indebtedness to the example of Chaucer. The most important Scottish Chaucerians were King James I of Scotland, Robert Henryson, William Dunbar, Gavin Douglas, and Sir David Lindsay; of these Henryson and Dunbar were poets of major importance. Henryson is remembered for "Robene and Makyne," a superb *pastoral, and for The Testament of Cresseid, a profound and moving elaboration and continuation of Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde. Dunbar, a poet of wider range, wrote elaborate *occasional verse, biting satires, and such memorable short poems as his famous elegiac "Lament for the Makaris." In formal terms, the Scottish Chaucerians continued the vogue of the seven-line stanza introduced into Eng. poetry by Chaucer; indeed, the name for this form, rhyme royal, was once thought to have been derived from its use by King James in his poem "The Kingis Quair."

See courtly makers; scotland, poetry of.

■ H. S. Bennett, Chaucer and the Fifteenth Century (1947); G. G. Smith, "The Scottish Chaucerians," CHEL 2 (1949); C. S. Lewis, English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Excluding Drama (1954); D. Fox, "The Scottish Chaucerians," Chaucer and Chaucerians, ed. D. S. Brewer (1966); A. M. Kinghorn, Middle Scots Poets (1970); G. Kratzmann, Anglo-Scottish Literary Relations, 1430–1550 (1980); W. Scheps and J. A. Looney, The Middle Scots Poets: A Reference Guide (1986); L. A. Ebin, Illuminator, Makar, Vates (1988); A. S. Tomko, "William Dunbar's Poetics: A Reconsideration of the Chaucerian in a Scottish Maker," DAI 56 (1996).

R. D. Thornton

SCOTTISH GAELIC POETRY. See scotland, poetry of.

SECONDE RHÉTORIQUE. In late med. Fr. poetic treatises, a distinction came to be made between the art of persuasion or oratory as applied in prose—i.e., rhet., the figures and *tropes—and the art of persuasion in verse—i.e., *versification or *prosody; the former came to be called first rhetoric and the latter second rhetoric. Patterson dates these treatises on the art of verse from 1370 to 1539; they form the link between the few Occitan and OF treatises and the Arts poétiques of the Pléiade* in the Ren.

How prosody came to be allied with rhet. is one of the chapters of *medieval poetics. In med. Lat., prosody was treated primarily as a branch of grammar, being either included in grammars as a chapter called "Prosodia" or else written as a separate manual, e.g., Bede's De arte metrica (both types are collected in Keil). Rhet. took a parallel but distinguishable course except in encyclopedic works such as Isidore of Seville's Etymologiae (7th c.; prosody and rhet. are the subjects of the first two chapters). Alternatively, some theorists viewed prosody as a branch of music (e.g., Augustine); these two trads. devolve from the metrici and rhythmici* of the ancients. In the 12th and 13th cs. emerged the treatises known as artes poeticae; such works, following the inspiration of Horace, treated both rhet. and prosody together. These are instanced in John of Garland's Parisiana poetria (much on prosody), Matthew of Vendôme's Ars versificatoria (virtually nothing), Geoffrey of Vinsauf's Poetria nova, Alexander of Ville Dei's Doctrinale, and Eberhard the German's Laborintus (collected in Faral). Dante's unfinished essay on poetry, De vulgari eloquentia (ca. 1304), which treats chiefly *diction and prosody, provides the transition to the vernaculars. By the 15th c., in France, manuals distinguish not between rhet. and prosody but between prose and verse, and since prosody treats of precisely those devices that are the differentia of verse form, it became a "second rhetoric"; pleine rhétoriques treated both. Langlois collects seven principal texts by Jacques Le Grand, Baudet Herenc, Jean Molinet, and four anonymous authors, but the most influential was Eustache Deschamps' L'Art de dictier (1392).

See RHÉTORIQUEURS, GRANDS.

■ Keil; E. Langlois, Recueil d'arts de seconde rhétorique (1902)—long intro.; Faral; Patterson; H. Lubienski-Bodenham, "The Origins of the Fifteenth-Century View of Poetry as 'Seconde Rhétorique,'" MLR 74 (1979); Hollier; E. Mechoulan, "La musique du vulgaire: Arts de seconde rhétorique et constitution de la littérature" Études littéraires 22 (1989–90); A. M. Finoli, "La ricezione della mitologia negli 'Arts de seconde rhétorique,'" Studi di Letteratura Francese 16 (1990); A.T.B. Butterfield, "Arts de seconde rhétorique," Medieval France: An Encyclopedia, ed. W. W. Kibler et al. (1995); C. Thiry, "Prospections et prospectives sur la Rhétorique seconde," Moyen Français 46–47 (2000); Poétiques en transition: entre Moyen Age et Renaissance, ed. J.-C. Mühlethaler and J. Cerquiglini-Toulet (2002).

T.V.F. BROGAN

SEGUIDILLA. A Sp. poetic form of popular origin. It probably originated as a dance song and was popular, at least in the underworld, early in the 17th c. In the beginning, it was probably a four-line *strophe of alternating long (usually seven- or eight-syllable) and short (five- or six-syllable) lines, the short (even-numbered) lines assonating (called seguidilla simple or seguidilla para cantar). Later, probably in the 17th c., a second, semi-independent part of three lines—short, long, short—was added, the short lines having a new *assonance. Eventually, the strophe became regularized as a literary form to lines of 7-5-7-5: 5-7-5 (the colon denotes a pause in thought), lines two and four having one assonance, lines five and seven another (called seguidilla compuesta or seguidilla para bailar), often found in 18th-c. poetry. Sometimes the rhythm has been used only in lines of seven plus five syllables, as by Rubén Darío in his Elogio de la seguidilla. The seguidilla favors all paroxytonic verses except when six-syllable oxytones are substituted for the five-syllable (paroxytonic) lines. The seguidilla sometimes serves as a conclusion (estribillo*) to another song.

The seguidilla gitana (Gypsy seguidilla), also called flamenca or playera, is usually a five-line strophe of 6, 6, 5, 6, 6 syllables, lines two and five assonating. Lines three and four may be written together as one line of from ten to twelve syllables.

■ F. Hanssen, "La seguidilla," Anales de la Universidad de Chile 125 (1909); F. Rodríguez Marín, La copla (1910); P. Henríquez Ureña, La versificación irregular en la poesía castellana, 2d ed. (1933); D. C. Clarke, "The Early Seguidilla," HR 12 (1944); José Mercado, La seguidilla gitana (1982); Navarro; L. Pastor Pérez, "La seguidilla: Trayectoria histórica de una forma poética popular," Lírica popular/lírica tradicional, ed. P. Piñero Ramírez (1998); R. E. González, "y arriba iré . . . Acerca de la seguidilla folclórica de México," Anuario de letras 39 (2001); J. M. Pedrosa, "Seguidillas sefardíes de Marruecos: Diacronía, poética y comparatismo," Revista de literaturas populares 2 (2002).

D. C. CLARKE

SEMANTICS AND POETRY

I. Development of Semantics as Science of Meaning
II. Poetic Language: A Challenge to Semantics

I. Development of Semantics as Science of Meaning. The term semantics (Gr. sēmantikos, "significant") is of fairly recent origin compared with its field of interest. The ponderings on the nature of meaning have their roots in Aristotelian logic, poetics, and rhet., as well as in a long trad. of philosophy and such areas of study as grammar, philology, literary theory, and *stylistics. Around 1825, Karl Reisig introduced the term semasiology to describe a subdivision of grammar focused on the study of meaning. In 1897, Michel Bréal proposed sémantique to denote the "science of meaning." Both Reisig and Bréal regarded semantics as a diachronic study, occupied mostly with historical changes of words and, at most, phrases. Thus, this initial stage can be called the philologically oriented lexical semantics. In 1909, Charles Bally presented his treatise on stylistics. In turn, Ferdinand de Saussure's structural way of thinking about lang. brought to the semanticists' attention the importance of such intralinguistic sense relations as synonymy, antonymy (oppositeness), hyperonymy (class inclusion), and *ambiguity. This view of lang. was complemented by the study of semantic fields by Ger. scholars (Trier, Weisgerber) and later broadened by the invocation of stylistic fields, scrutinized by statistical stylistics.

In the Am. behaviorist trad., Charles Morris (1946, 1971), inspired by Charles S. Peirce's works, proposed the tripartite subdivision of ling. into syntactics, semantics, and pragmatics. The first was supposed to deal with the internal relations of signs within lang., the second with the signification of signs (incl. reference to reality), the third with the relation between signs and their users in a specific context (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). It is owing to philosophers and logicians that ling. semantics, by making recourse to formal semantics, acquired its scientific shape and became sentence semantics. Considerable influence was also exerted by logical positivists, particularly the early Ludwig Wittgenstein (1921) and Rudolf Carnap; the Am. behaviorists Leonard Bloomfield and Willard v. O. Quine; the Am. analytical philosophers Saul Kripke, Donald Davidson (1972, 1975, 1978), and Nicholas Rescher; and the Oxford school of ling. philosophy, incl. the late Wittgenstein (1953), Gilbert Ryle (see crit. in Gellner), and John L. Austin (1961).

Semantics gradually broadened its scope to accommodate various functional aspects of lang. Apart from its leading representative function (communication of ideas), Karl Bühler specified the expressive and the vocative functions, both conspicuous in poetic lang. Further elaborations of the functional taxonomy (Ogden and Richards—emotive meaning; Jakobson 1960—*poetic function; Halliday—textual and imaginative function; Lyons—expressive function) prove the unfailing concern of semantics to accommodate within its scope all types of discourse marked with the feature of subjectivity, emotionality, and poeticity. Roman Jakobson implemented the ideas of *Russian formalism and artistic semiotics (Shklovsky; Lotman, cf. Shukman) in the description of poetic lang. Jakobson was also the first to introduce the concept of the large textual strategy by postulating *metaphor and *metonymy as two basic modes of ling. and semiotic construal and interpretation of artistic texts.

The philosophical contribution of ordinary lang. philosophers and the subsequent devel. of ling., along the lines laid most notably by the late Wittgenstein and carried on by Austin (1962) and John R. Searle within *speech act theory, have demonstrated that semantics and pragmatics ought to be treated as closely interrelated fields of research concerned with the felicitous functioning of human lang. in diverse contexts.

In America, the late 1960s and 1970s brought a devel. in formal semantics for natural lang. Within this trend, Davidson (1975) propagated the truth-functional model of semantics (based on the evaluation of sentences as true or false) and proposed a peculiar theory, according to which metaphorical constructions are meant literally and are either obviously true or patently false. Of much greater import was the devel. of modal logic and possible-worlds semantics. The former deals with such notions as, among others, necessity, (im)possibility, obligation, prohibition, knowledge, belief, doubt, wish, hope, beauty vs. ugliness, and goodness vs. evil. The latter allows us to extend these ideas to alternative worlds of imagination (Hintikka 1969, Kripke, Rescher). Such concepts as text worlds and discourse worlds of contemp. literary semantics are the adaptations of a formal logical construct called possible world to the analysis of fictional discourse. The issue of the ontological status of fictional discourse and fictional individuals, so important for all literary genres, has been tackled by John Woods, Searle (1975), Richard Rorty, and Umberto Eco (1990), among others.

The school of transformational-generative (TG) grammarians (Noam Chomsky and his followers), though focusing on the creative potential of human ling. competence, at first refused to accept semantics as a part of their model. Under the influence of Jerrold J. Katz and Jerry A. Fodor's semantic theory, Chomsky introduced some semantic considerations into his Standard Theory (1965). Yet poetic lang. under this system turned out to be either syntactically ill formed or semantically deviant. The Extended Standard Model of Chomsky allowed for a separate semantic component, called interpretative semantics (Jackendoff). The inability of the consecutive variants of TG grammar to deal with syntactically and semantically marked (anomalous) structures added to the emergence of generative semantics at the turn of the 1960s (McCawley, Lakoff). McCawley was also the first to use the term mental picture of the universe to explain how metaphors refer to imaginary situations. Indeed, he can be seen as a precursor of the possible-worlds thinking later applied to metaphoric lang. (Levin 1988, Hintikka and Sandu). Metaphor was perceived, then, as a violation of certain presuppositions conventionally cherished about reality (the actual world). Generative poetics also used Uriel Weinreich's idea about the need to recategorize syntactically deviant structures abundant in literary lang. The accompanying notion of a semantic calculator was meant to evaluate the degree of semantic oddity.

The 1970s saw an important devel. in ling. semantics. The semantico-pragmatic description (a combination of intra- and extralinguistic factors of meaning) crossed the boundaries of a single sentence and turned its attention to texts interpreted in various contexts by various interpreters (discourses). In Europe, Teun van Dijk's as well as Robert de Beaugrande's and Wolfgang U. Dressler's seminal works on text grammars enlarged the scope of semantic description to all kinds of texts. In the U.S., the functional approach of M.A.K. Halliday recognized the textual dimension of lang. already in 1973.

In turn, game-theoretic semantics revitalized the Wittgensteinian concept of language games. Though initially concerned only with sentences (propositions), with time it broadened its application to discourse, esp. in Lauri Carlson's Dialogue Games (1983). The semantics and pragmatics based on the conception of game, applicable to conversational exchanges, can also be extended to the study of literary texts, where authors and readers embark on semantic and pragmatic games of text production and text reception, respectively (Chrzanowska-Kluczewska 2004).

One of the most conspicuous paradigmatic shifts in ling. was the birth of cognitive grammar in the 1980s and its steady growth over the consecutive two decades. The cognitive approach to lang., which stresses the importance of conceptual metaphor and its pervasiveness in lang. (Lakoff and Johnson), has made poetic lang. a focus of interest for semanticists. In Europe, cognitive theory has caught on in several academic centers, as shown in Paul Werth's work on extended metaphor (1994) and later on text and discourse worlds (1999); Elena Semino's studies (1997, 2008, Semino and Short 2004) on various literary and nonliterary discourses, amply exemplified by poetic metaphor and supported by the quantitative findings of corpus stylistics (computer-assisted statistical analysis of style-related phenomena); Reuven Tsur's (1992, 2003) and Peter Stockwell's cognitive approach to poetics; the contribution of Zoltán Kövecses to metaphor studies and of Elżbieta Tabakowska to trans. studies in the light of cognitive poetics.

II. Poetic Language: A Challenge to Semantics. A gradual devel. of mod. semantic theories, as sketched above, from word-oriented to text-centered, provides a framework for the ling. investigation of literary texts, whether prose or poetry. Yet poetic lang., with its unbounded creativity and innovation, has proven a conundrum for all semantic theories. Not without reason did Philip Wheelwright (1974) postulate a separate poeto-semantics to deal specifically with literary texts.

The problems semantics has faced when applied to literary lang., which is predominantly fictional, are as follows.

(1) Poetic lang. has often been classified as logically deviant on two interrelated grounds: (a) reference failure and (b) problems with the assignment of truth values (true, false). For these reasons, already Gottlob Frege (in Schmidt 1976) proposed to distinguish between scientific and literary texts, while Richards referred to literary assertions as *"pseudo-statements." The introduction of the notion of possible worlds, text worlds, and discourse worlds alleviates such problems, for now fictional expressions can denote individuals and objects that exist not within the real world but within a specific imaginary world. For those unwilling to accept such a solution, the Russellian treatment of imaginary entities as purely ling. objects, existing as mere names, remains open and the concepts of metaphorical truth, truth in fiction, or truth by convention has to be invoked (Levin 1988). A steady devel. of nonclassical logical systems has offered solutions to the problems of nondenoting terms or truth assignment, such as free and neutral logics, both admitting of nondenoting terms in their domains of *interpretation. Many-valued logics offer either the indeterminate value I or a truth-value gap (neither true nor false) for fictional statements, whereas logics of inconsistency tolerate paradoxes in the system, where contradictory propositions can obtain simultaneously (cf. Haack 1974, Rescher and Brandom, Chrzanowska-Kluczewska 2010 for more details). The theories of nonstandard possible worlds that such logical systems are capable of supporting could be of interest to transrealistic genres of prose (e.g., fantasy, science fiction) and of poetry (e.g., *nonsense verse).

(2) Semino's work on the creation of poetic worlds (1997), invoking Marie-Laure Ryan's typology of fictional worlds, proves that poetic text worlds yield themselves not only to this type of description but also to the analysis within the alternative schema theory (with origins in cognitive psychology and artificial intelligence; cf. Schank and Abelson 1977), where schema stands for a mental structure in which our knowledge of the world is stored. The reader's interpretation and overall reception of a text world will depend on the way in which such schemata are activated and challenged (esp. in the case of more demanding, sophisticated or densely figurative texts, to which poetry obviously belongs).

(3) Within the theory of speech acts (which has a mixed semantico-pragmatic foundation), Austin (1962) described speech acts in poetry as parasitic upon real-world talk. In a similar vein, Richard Ohmann referred to fictional statements as "quasi-speech acts" or impaired and incomplete illocutions whose function is mimetic of real speech acts. Searle (1975) qualified them as nondeceptive pseudoperformance (but not lies, as in Plato's evaluation of literary statements). In a friendlier frame of mind, Levin (1976) proposes a covert performative prefix "I imagine this world and invite you to enter it" appended to every fictional work, thus formally capturing S. T. Coleridge's famed "willing suspension of disbelief," i.e., poetic faith.

(4) Figuration* is of utmost importance for poetry, where the density (clustering) of stylistic and rhetorical devices by far exceeds the one found in prose. The concern with figuration in mod. Anglo-Am. trad. runs from Richards (1936) and Max Black, the supporters of the theory of metaphor funded by the tension between its two elements vehicle and tenor (renamed source and target domain in cognitive ling.), in which both similarity and difference can be appropriately highlighted (also Nowottny). Wheelwright (1974) calls due attention to the strong symbolic undercurrent in poetry, often archetypal and mythical in nature, analyzed also by Ernst Cassirer. The realization that figuration structures not only poetic lang. but also human conceptual makeup is well visible in Kenneth Burke's study of four master tropes (metaphor, metonymy, *synecdoche, *irony), grounded in neoclassical rhet. and Giambattista Vico's thought. Master tropes, as "styles of thinking" are, thus, powerful text-organizing strategies (cf. Werth 1994, 1999 on megametaphors).

The rhetorical impact and ubiquity of figuration, described already in the poststructuralist writings of Roland Barthes, the philosophical concern with discourse and the limits of poetic lang. voiced by Michel Foucault, and the deconstructionist claims about the all-pervasive and even destructive play of ling. signs, coupled with the assumption of the ineradicable metaphoricity of lang. as propounded by Jacques Derrida, were all recognized in the works of Am. postmodernist and deconstructionist crit. Most noticeable were here the works of Paul de Man (1974, 1984), Geoffrey Hartman, and J. Hillis Miller. Tropology was also developed successfully by Harold Bloom's innovative treatment of figural intricacies present in poetry and of poetic influence, the latter apparently also regulated by figurative schemas of great generality. This preoccupation with the tacit, underlying level of figuration is an extension of the prolonged discussion on the double layering/coding/symbolization of literary and poetic lang. in particular (cf. Eco 2002). The idea of an inherent and pervasive presence of metaphor in human thought and lang. has found a sturdy continuation within the Lakoffian framework of cognitive studies devoted to conceptual metaphor, conventional and nonconventional alike. Its elaboration in Eur. thought has shaped cognitively oriented considerations of the poetic potential of human lang., esp. in metaphorical creativity (Werth 1994; Tsur 1992, 2003; Semino 2008). The cognitive paradigm runs parallel to a long-established classic ling. stylistics as practiced by Geoffrey Leech (1969, 2008) and Mick Short, which has focused on such aspects of poetic lang. as deviation (limits of *poetic license), deception, semantic indeterminacy, and stylistic foregrounding realized through figuration. Likewise, Michael Toolan (1990) in his literary-ling. approach proposes that the ling. and critical aspects of literary studies should be treated as complementary rather than competing.

The above-mentioned problems a semanticist faces while trying to analyze the highly unpredictable lang.

of poetry are accompanied by the phenomenon that Wheelwright (1968, 1974) called "plurisignation." A poetic artwork will never be adequately interpreted and evaluated if it is not taken as a complex object, endowed with several levels of signification. Such "integral" (holistic) meaning, according to Wheelwright, has to be additionally supported by the phonetics (*versification, *rhythm, sound effects; in a word, the poem's peculiar orchestration) and, at times, graphic effects (as in pattern poetry, concrete poetry, lettrisme, etc.). Literary semantics/stylistics/poetics also calls for the complementary investigation of interpretative strategies (Ingarden 1931, 1973, Iser 1978) and cognitive mechanisms of reading (Miall 2005). The fact that the relevance theory, developed by Dan Sperber and Deirdre Wilson (1986), has taken up the issue of figuration, esp. of irony and metaphor (Pilkington 2000), indicates that contemp. semantic thinking about poeticity is linked to psycho- and sociolinguistic considerations. Thus, the directions of future research on poetic lang. seem to be clearly laid out, incl. the philosophy of lang., for which the problematic of figuration remains an open question (Lycan 2000).

See LINGUISTICS AND POETICS, SEMIOTICS AND POETRY.

■ Linguistics: M. Bréal, Essai de sémantique (1897); F. de Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale (1916); C. K. Ogden and I. A. Richards, The Meaning of Meaning (1923); L. Bloomfield, Language (1933); K. Bühler, Sprachtheorie (1934); J. Trier, "Das sprachliche Feld. Eine Auseinandersetzung," Neue Jahrbücher für Wissenschaft und Jugendbildung 10 (1934); I. A. Richards, The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936); C. Bally, Traité de stylistique française [1909], 3d ed. (1951); L. Weisgerber, "Die Sprachfelder in der geistigen Erschliessung der Welt," Festschrift für J. Trier (1954); R. Jakobson, "Two Aspects of Language and Two Types of Linguistic Disturbances," Jakobson and Halle; N. Chomsky, Syntactic Structures (1957); R. Jakobson, "Linguistics and Poetics," Style in Language, ed. T. A. Sebeok (1960); M. Black, Models and Metaphors (1962); S. Ullmann, Semantics (1962); J. J. Katz and J. A. Fodor, "The Structure of a Semantic Theory," Language 39 (1963); N. Chomsky, Aspects of the Theory of Syntax (1965); U. Weinreich, "Explorations in Semantic Theory," Current Trends in Linguistics, ed. T. A. Sebeok, v. 3 (1966); J. D. McCawley, "The Role of Semantics in Grammar," Universals in Linguistic Theory, ed. E. Bach and R. T. Harms (1968); G. Lakoff, "On Generative Semantics," Semantics, ed. D. D. Steinberg and L. A. Jakobovits (1969); G. N. Leech, A Linguistic Guide to English Poetry (1969); J. R. Searle, Speech Acts (1969); R. Ohmann, "Speech Acts and the Definition of Literature," Philosophy and Rhetoric 4 (1971); T. van Dijk, Some Aspects of Text Grammars (1972); R. Jackendoff, Semantic Interpretation in Generative Grammar (1972); M.A.K. Halliday, Explorations in the Functions of Language (1973); J. Hintikka, Logic, Language-Games and Information (1973); J. R. Searle, "The Logical Status of Fictional Discourse," NLH 6 (1975); S. R. Levin, "What Kind of Speech Act a Poem Is?" and S. J. Schmidt, "A Pragmatic Interpretation of Fictionality," Pragmatics of Language and Literature, ed. T. van Dijk (1976); J. Lyons, Semantics, 2 v. (1977); G. Lakoff and M. Johnson, Metaphors We Live By (1980); D. Sperber and D. Wilson, "Irony and the Use-Mention Distinction," Radical Pragmatics, ed. P. Cole (1981); J. Hintikka and J. Kulas, The Game of Language (1983); D. Sperber and D. Wilson, Relevance (1986); S. Levin, Metaphoric Worlds (1988); G. Lakoff and M. Turner, More Than Cool Reason (1989); R.-A. de Beaugrande and W. U. Dressler, Introduction to Text Linguistics (1990); M. Toolan, The Stylistics of Fiction: A Literary-Linguistic Approach (1990); M.-L. Ryan, Possible Worlds, Artificial Intelligence and Narrative Theory (1991); R. Tsur, Toward a Theory of Cognitive Poetics (1992); E. Tabakowska, Cognitive Linguistics and Poetics of Translation (1993); J. Hintikka and G. Sandu, "Metaphor and Other Kinds of Non-Literal Meaning," Aspects of Metaphor, ed. J. Hintikka (1994); P. Werth, "Extended Metaphor," Language and Literature 3 (1994); M. Short, Exploring the Language of Poems, Plays and Prose (1996); E. Semino, Language and World Creation in Poems and Other Texts (1997); P. Werth, Text Worlds (1999); A. Pilkington, Poetic Effects (2000); Z. Kövecses, Metaphor (2002); P. Stockwell, Cognitive Poetics: An Introduction (2002); R. Tsur, On the Shore of Nothingness (2003); E. Chrzanowska-Kluczewska, Language-Games: Pro and Against (2004); E. Semino and M. Short, Corpus Stylistics (2004); D. S. Miall, "Beyond Interpretation," Cognition and Literary Interpretation in Practice, ed. H. Veivo, B. Pettersson, M. Polvinen (2005); G. Leech, Language in Literature. Style and Foregrounding (2008); E. Semino, Metaphor in Discourse (2008); D. Sperber and D. Wilson, "A Deflationary Account of Metaphor," The Cambridge Handbook of Metaphor and Thought, ed. R. Gibbs (2008); E. Chrzanowska-Kluczewska, "An Unresolved Issue: Nonsense in Natural Language and Non-Classical Logical and Semantic Systems," Philosophy of Language and Linguistics, ed. P. Stalmaszczyk (2010).

■ Literary Criticism: K. Burke, A Grammar of Motives (1962); W. Nowottny, The Language Poets Use (1962); P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain (1968); R. Ingarden, The Literary Work of Art, trans. G. G. Grabowicz (1973); P. Wheelwright, "Semantics and Poetry," Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger (1974); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1975); H. Bloom, A Map of Misreading (1975); A. Shukman, Literature and Semiotics: A Study of the Writings of Yu. M. Lotman (1977); W. Iser, The Act of Reading (1978); P. de Man, Allegories of Reading (1979), and The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984); G. Hartman, Easy Pieces (1985); J. Hillis Miller, "On Edge," Romanticism and Contemporary Criticism, ed. M. Eaves and M. Fischer (1986); V. Shklovsky, "Art as Technique" (1917), Contemporary Literary Criticism, ed. R. C. Davis and R. Schleifer (1986); U. Eco, The Limits of Interpretation (1990), and On Literature (2002), trans. M. McLaughlin (2004).

■ Philosophy: L. Wittgenstein, Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus (1921); E. Cassirer, Language and Myth, trans. S. Langer (1946); C. W. Morris, Signs, Language and Behavior (1946); R. Carnap, Meaning and Necessity (1947); L. Wittgenstein, Philosophical Investiga- tions, trans. G.E.M. Anscombe (1953); G. Ryle, The Revolution in Philosophy (1956); E. Gellner, Words and Things (1959); W. V. Quine, Word and Object (1960); J. L. Austin, Philosophical Papers (1961), and How to Do Things with Words (1962); M. Foucault, Raymond Roussel (1963); J. Hintikka, Models for Modalities (1969); M. Foucault, The Order of Things (1970); C. W. Morris, "Foundations of the Theory of Signs," Writings on the General Theory of Signs (1971); S. Kripke, Naming and Necessity (1972); Semantics of Natural Language, ed. D. Davidson and G. Harman (1972); S. Haack, Deviant Logic, Fuzzy Logic (1974); J. Woods, The Logic of Fiction (1974); D. Davidson, "Semantics for Natural Language," The Logic of Grammar, ed. D. Davidson and G. Harman (1975); N. Rescher, A Theory of Possibility (1975); R. C. Schank and R. Abelson, Scripts, Plans, Goals and Understanding (1977); D. Davidson, "What Metaphors Mean," Inquiries into Truth and Interpretation (1978); N. Rescher and R. Brandom, The Logic of Inconsistency (1979); R. Rorty, Consequences of Pragmatism (1982); G. Vico, The New Science of Giambattista Vico, trans. T. G. Bergin and M. H. Fisch (1984); Derrida; W. G. Lycan, Philosophy of Language (2000).

E. Chrzanowska-Kluczewska

SEMIOTICS AND POETRY. The mod. usage of the term semiotics is attributed to John Locke, who appropriated the Gr. semeiotiké to designate the doctrine of signs, "the business whereof is to consider the nature of signs the mind makes use of for the understanding of things, or conveying its knowledge to others." The study of *signs, however, has ancient roots. In speculating on the origin of lang., the Platonic dialogue Cratylus describes the linkage between ling. *sound and meaning as motivated by either nature or convention (physei versus thesei), thus establishing one of the basic dichotomies for all subsequent discussions. Aristotle's On Interpretation and Rhetoric and St. Augustine's De doctrina christiana (On Christian Doctrine) and The Teacher are other important ancient treatises on the subject, and various Scholastics continue the line of inquiry through the Middle Ages. The major mod. figures, besides Locke, are the philosophers and linguists G. W. Leibniz, Johann Heinrich Lambert, Étienne Bonnot de Condillac, Wilhelm von Humboldt, and Bernhard Bolzano. Contemp. semiotic studies are a combination of several intellectual trads. stemming from the turn of the 20th c. Three schools of thought esp. stimulate the application of sign theory to poetics: Peircean pragmatism, Husserlian phenomenology, and Saussurean structuralism.

The most comprehensive program for the general science of signs was charted by the Am. philosopher Charles Sanders Peirce. According to Peirce, "a sign or representamen is something which stands to somebody for something in some respect or capacity." Hence, every sign process (or semiosis) is the correlation of three components: the sign itself, the object represented, and the interpretant. The relationship between the sign and its object (as the above definition suggests) implies a certain inadequacy between the two. The sign does not stand for the object in its entirety but merely for some of its aspects. Peirce claimed that there are three basic modes in which the sign can represent something else and, hence, three types of signs. A sign that resembles its object (such as a model or a map) is an icon; a sign that is factually linked to its object (such as a weathercock or a pointer) is an index; a sign conventionally associated with its object (such as words or traffic signals) is a symbol. To interpret the word table, one can resort to an icon (by drawing its picture), an index (by pointing to an actual table), or a symbol (by supplying a synonym). In short, the process of *interpretation is nothing but the substitution of certain signs for others. From this perspective, then, thought or knowledge is a web of interconnected signs capable of unlimited self-generation.

In contrast to the Am. pragmatist Peirce, who considered the semiotics domain in its entirety, continental thinkers focused on lang. as the most important human signifying mechanism. The Ger. phenomenologist Edmund Husserl was concerned with verbal signs as vehicles of logical thought capable of embodying truth. For him, only a repeatable sign that retains its essential self-sameness under all circumstances can fulfill this role. In his quest for a universal semiotics, Husserl divided all signs into two categories: the self-identical expression (Ausdruck) and the vacillating indication (Anzeichen). To explain why expressions can remain unaffected by the context of the significatory act, Husserl analyzed the internal structure of the word to isolate a factor resistant to contextual change. "In the case of the name," he wrote, "we distinguish between what it 'shows forth' (i.e. a mental state) and what it means. And again between what it means (the sense or 'content' of its naming presentation) and what it names (the object of that presentation)." Both the "showing forth" and the "naming" are contingent on empirical reality (whether mental or physical) and, thus, cannot retain their sameness in repetition. Only the "content of an expression's naming presentation," the "meaning" (Bedeutung), is independent of the phenomenal context. It is, therefore, this lexical meaning inherent in the word prior to its representing other entities that endows the expression with its identity and distinguishes it from the indication.

The nature of verbal signs was also the central concern of another pioneer of mod. semiotics, the Swiss linguist Ferdinand de Saussure. Saussure focused exclusively on the system of ling. conventions (langue) that makes actual utterances (parole) understandable to lang. users. He considered langue a purely formal set of relations that (in the absence of other motivations) arbitrarily conjoin the two components of the ling. sign—the sensory signifier and the intelligible signified. Accordingly, the study of the signifier was to yield a set of oppositions (i.e., the phonological system) that provides sonorous substance (the continuum of the sound stream) with ling. form by articulating it into a limited inventory of phonemes, the minimal sound units capable of differentiating words of unlike meaning in a given lang. (e.g., the voiceless voiced bilabial stops p and b in pit and bit, sounds that would be identical except for the one "distinctive feature" of voicing, or vibration of the vocal cords, which feature alone creates, for speakers of Eng., two words, two meanings). The study of the signified, on the other hand, would be concerned with the semantic grid that segments extralinguistic reality into meaningful ling. units (words). The semantic value of every particular signified would be derived solely from its opposition to other signifieds coexisting within the grid, hence, creating a parallel matrix of distinctive oppositions. The Eng. mutton differs from Fr. mouton precisely because the meaning of the former is circumscribed by the word sheep, which has no equivalent in the Fr. vocabulary.

Another set of relations obtains in lang. through the combination of ling. elements into more complex units. If concatinated into a sequence, the value of each segment is determined both by its juxtaposition to all the actual components in the sequence that precede or follow it and by the presence or absence of all the potential elements of langue in some respect similar to it and capable of taking its place. The first of these, the aspect of the continguity of elements in sequence, which gives lang. its "horizontal dimension," Saussure termed the syntagmatic aspect of lang.; the latter, the "vertical dimension" in which one word that fills a slot in the syntactic string could be replaced, potentially, by others, Saussure termed the associative (in later usage, paradigmatic) aspect of lang. It remained for Roman Jakobson to give the equation relating the one to the other in verse via *equivalence as the "poetic principle." As Saussure persuasively argued, these two functions are operative at all three ling. levels: phonological, morphological, and syntactic. In the example above, the p in pit is opposed to the i that follows it as consonant to vowel, and at the same time, it is opposed to the absent b that could have been substituted for it (giving bit) as voiceless phoneme to voiced. The words pits, pitted, pitting, and bits that combine the same or different stems and affixes illustrate the same dual linkage at the morphological level as, mutatis mutandis, the lexical collocations drilling bit, drilling pit, and orchestra pit do at the syntactic level.

The first systematic attempts to apply the theory of signs to lit. date from the 1920s. The devel. of this critical method has to a large extent been linked to the worldwide interest in the structuralist paradigm over the past 60 years (see STRUCTURALISM). The cultural heterogeneity of this paradigm and its historical diversity have prevented semiotically inclined critics from reaching full agreement about the epistemological underpinnings of their enterprise, its scope and limits, or even common methodologies. What binds such critics together is merely the general explanatory model that regards lit. as a specific mode of signifying practice governed by conventions that are distinct from all other uses of verbal signs. In the practical application of this model, each school or critic focuses on different facets of literary semiosis, defines in separate terms the conventions governing it, and accounts for its distinctness accordingly.

Though critics have always been aware that the special manipulation of lang. is one of the indispensable properties of poetry, only the antimimetic revolt of modernist art at the turn of the 20th c. led them to scrutinize and schematize the ways in which the ling. medium can be used to achieve poetic effects (see MODERNISM). Keeping in step with Archibald MacLeish's celebrated dictum that "a poem should not mean / But be," the most radical theorists of the day denied verbal art any referential quality at all, rather identifying its telos with the striking orchestration of the ling. sound devoid of meaning. Semiotic poetics came about as a partial corrective to the one-sidedness of such *formalism. Without rejecting the salience of phonic devices for poetry, it attributed to them a value only insofar as they participate in poetic semantics.

This stance was first formulated by Jakobson, perhaps the most seminal figure of this critical trend, in his 1921 booklet on the Rus. futurist poet Velimir Khlebnikov. He based his argument on the two earlier theories of the ling. sign by Saussure and Husserl. Drawing particularly on the phonological insights of Saussure, Jakobson rejected the possibility of separating sound from meaning in lang. Phoné, as the signifier's substance, is always semanticized because its chief function is to distinguish among different signifieds. If poetry were to succeed in voiding the semantic charge from its sonorous substance, it would inevitably lose its verbal nature and turn into a kind of vocal music. Moreover, Jakobson made the semiotic orientation of his poetics explicit by anchoring it in Husserl's concept of expression. It is the "set (Einstellung) toward expression itself," Jakobson claimed, that designates it "as the only factor essential for poetry" and that imparts to verbal art its "thorough-going symbolic, multiplex, polysemantic essence." Jakobson also drew attention to the associative principles that underlie the two fundamental ling. operations of selection and combination. Selection substitutes one element for another on the basis of their partial lexical similarity, in the same way as does the rhetorical trope of *metaphor. Combination links elements that are spatially or temporally contiguous, very much as does the trope of *metonymy. The synthetic power of ling. consciousness stems from its capacity to create an interplay between the metaphoric and metonymic poles. Each concrete utterance strikes its own balance between the two, depending on the overall function it serves. Since a self-centered poetic message tends to establish as many equations among its constitutive elements as possible, assimilating them into coherent structures of *repetition and *parallelism at every level, poetry, in Jakobson's opinion, gravitates clearly toward the metaphoric extreme.

Jakobson's revision of Saussurean sémiologie rekindled interest in the most ancient issue of sign theory: how ling. sound is linked to its meaning. Saussure always insisted that, in most instances, the relation between the signifier and the signified is wholly conventional, wholly arbitrary. For him, compound words such as nineteen, whose signification is motivated through paradigmatic and syntagmatic relations with other words comprised of its constituent morphemes (nine, -teen), impose certain limits on this arbitrariness but do not invalidate it. For Jakobson, however, the signification of a poetic sign challenges Saussure's assumption. The meaning of a poem is above all a function of its ling. texture, and the very makeup of the signifier determines the signified. Hence, their relation is always motivated. In the 1960s, Jakobson turned to the semiotics of Peirce to support this claim and, in particular, to this concept of the icon.

The icon can be regarded as a motivated sign, since, according to Peirce, it "stands for something merely because it resembles it." This representational likeness, however, can have a variety of grounds, of which only two are directly relevant to the present discussion. An icon may resemble an object by sharing simple physical qualities with it (color, shape, etc.), in which case it is what Peirce termed an image. Or it might resemble an object by containing within itself the same intelligible relations as the object (the ratio of parts to whole, structural homology, etc.) in which case it is what Peirce called a diagram. It is the latter type of *iconicity that intrigued Jakobson. Traditional accounts of ling. *mimesis usually neglected this motivation and focused on words whose sound imitates a nonlinguistic sound, i.e., the process traditionally called *onomatopoeia. Given the paucity and marginality of such words in most langs., however, this argument obviously did not carry much weight. In contrast, Jakobson located the iconicity of lang. not in its sonorous matter but in the deep-seated diagrammatic likeness or homology of the signifier to the signified embodied in the sign's phonological, morphological, and syntactic structures. E.g., Caesar's dictum veni, vidi, vici, Jakobson insisted, is a motivated sign because the sequence of verbs repeats the sequence of reported events. However, in a nonreferential poetic utterance, the direction of motivation is reversed. Here the relational properties of the signifier, the interactions among its partial signs, create the structure of the signified, the poem's semantic universe.

Jakobson's fusion of previously separate doctrines of the sign into a coherent disciplinary matrix represents a stage in the hist. of semiotic poetics that reached its apogee in the late 1960s. In subsequent years, this theoretical model and the entire structuralist trad. it epitomizes were subjected to thoroughgoing scrutiny. The Fr. philosopher Jacques Derrida and the deconstructionist critics whom he inspired rejected the entire semiotic project tout court. It was marred from its inception, they argued, by adherence to "the Western metaphysics of presence," a tendency inimical to the very process of representation because of its drive to obliterate the essential precondition of this process—the radical difference or gap between the sign and what it stands for. Those critics who retained the concept of the sign in their discourse revised it in a number of ways. To schematize their dissent from Jakobsonian semiotics, we may group all these new devels. under three headings, the three charges most commonly leveled against the structuralist heritage: linguistic imperialism, semantic determinism, and monologism.

Linguistic imperialism is the reduction of poetic (and other) structures to ling. data. Structuralism might be right in seeing poetry as a purposive manipulation of lang., but not all patterns that a ling. analysis discovers in a text need be aesthetically effective or even perceived. "Stylistic facts," Riffaterre writes in Semiotics of Poetry, "must have a specific character, since otherwise they could not be distinguished from linguistic facts." In other words, the ling. code alone is an insufficient tool for reading a poem qua poem. It must be supplemented by additional codes, literary conventions that are extralinguistic. Thus, Culler (1981) claims that an adequate response to lyric poetry is predicated on the following set of conventional expectations that transcend lang.: (1) distance and *deixis (the text is detached from its originator and the speech situation); (2) coherence (it presents a unified whole); (3) significance (it contains a moment of epiphany); (4) resistance and recuperation (it can be processed despite its surface opacity). The semiotic analysis of poetry, however, need not stop at the subject of literary conventions. Soviet scholars from the Moscow-Tartu school (Viacheslav Ivanov, Jurij Lotman, Boris Uspenskij) conceive of verbal art as a "secondary modeling system," i.e., a code superimposed on lang. (the "primary system"), yet closely linked with other secondary systems (the arts, science, religion, etc.) within the overarching cultural system of a period. Thus, literary norms are the product of a complex interaction among all the semiotic codes and must be studied in conjunction with them. From this perspective, *poetics turns into a branch of the semiotics of culture, the general discipline concerned with the "collected nonhereditary information accumulated, preserved, and handed on by the various groups of human society."

As for semantic determinism, the patterning of the poetic signifier establishes the total range for the constitution of the signified. This assumption has been challenged on a number of grounds. Within the Prague School, a literary historian, Felix Vodička, drew attention to the temporal rupture between the literary sign and the set of conventions against which it is read. This hist. of literary reception furnishes copious examples of works reconstituted according to codes that did not exist at their inception, thus assuming new and unpredictable semiotic identities. Besides the vicissitudes of hist., the very organization of texts can make them resistant to a totalizing interpretation. Such are, in Eco's parlance, the "open works" that employ indeterminacy as their structuring principle. Their ambiguity may stem from the fact that they are simultaneously liable to incompatible codes or that they invite the reader to project them against the exigencies of an uncoded context. Roland Barthes's concept of a "writerly text" celebrates the infinite free play of signification in a work that is "a galaxy of signifiers, not a structure of signifieds," because "the codes it mobilizes extend as far as the eye can reach" and "are indeterminable (meaning here is never subject to a principle of determination, unless by throwing dice)." Julia Kristeva blames the deterministic tenor of structuralist semiotics on its neglect of the speaking subject as a psychobiological being. Poetic lang., she believes, is not just a system-governed activity but, above all, a system-transgressing creativity corresponding to a subject's capacity for enjoyment (jouissance). Rather than the smooth matching of a discrete signified to its proper signifier based on some logical isomorphism, literary discourse is a violent irruption of a subject's semiotic dispositions (e.g., libidinal drives) into preexisting symbolic systems. Hence its liberating force: it has the ability to dissolve the customary ling. grids and establish new networks of signifying possibilities.

With respect to monologism, the sign is studied only in relation to an abstract system (langue), apart from the communicative situation. This issue was raised in the late 1920s by the Rus. scholars around M. M. Bakhtin (P. N. Medvedev, V. N. Vološinov), but it gained wide currency only some 40 years later. For the Bakhtinians, lang. exists only in communication. In this process, the intersubjective ling. forms (hypostasized by Saussure as langue) serve merely as an auxiliary mechanism for the transmission of contents unique and particular to each interlocutor. Our understanding of the other speaker does not reside in a passive recognition of self-identical signs but in their active appropriation, the trans. of an alien word into our own tongue. Accordingly, every lang. use is a dialogue—a response to a word by a word—and the structure of the verbal parcel reflects this. The word is not a static entity with a fixed meaning but a locus of action, a cross-section of different and often clashing points of view. In literary discourse, it is the genre of the novel, the Bakhtinians claim, that best embodies this dialogic principle. Bakhtin's insights were subsequently used by Kristeva, who coined the term intertextuality* to designate the polyphonic nature of poetic lang., with its tendency to transpose one system of signs over another. Riffaterre employed the notion of intertextuality for his analyses of 19th- and 20th-c. Fr. poetry. In his view, poetic texts depend on what he terms *hypograms—*clichés, quotations, or sayings, the loci communes of the given period—and they make sense only if related to the verbal background they engender. The successful interpretation of a poem, therefore, requires the discovery of an appropriate hypogram, the semiotic key that locks disparate textual elements into a unified whole.

As a general theory of signs, semiotics extends beyond the field of poetics. Instrumental for this interdisciplinary diffusion of semiotics was the rise, in the early 1960s, of structuralism, which emphasized the analysis of semiotic codes governing such disparate phenomena as prose narrative (Gérard Genette, Cesare Segre, Tzvetan Todorov), mythical thought (Claude Lévi-Strauss), the unconscious (Jacques Lacan), fashion (Roland Barthes), and film (Jurij Lotman, Christian Metz). Semiotics also branched out into various behavioral sciences and new fields of inquiry that began to be charted: kinesics (gestures and body movements as conduits of information), proxemics (the meaning of spatial organization of the human environment), and animal communication (for which Thomas Sebeok coined the label of zoosemiotics).

See ANAGRAM, HISTORICISM, INTERTEXTUALITY, LINGUISTICS AND POETICS, SEMANTICS AND POETRY.

■ E. Husserl, Logische Untersuchungen (1900); E. Cassirer, Philosophie der Symbolischen Formen (1923–29); V. N. Vološinov, Marksizm i filosofija jazyka (1929); C. S. Peirce, Collected Papers, ed. C. Hartshorne and P. Weiss, 8 v. (1931–58)—esp. v. 2, 8; C. Morris, Foundations of the Theory of Signs (1938); J. Mukařovskij, Kapitoly z české poetiky (1941); L. Hjelmslev, Omkring sprogteoriens grundlaeggelse (1943); M. Bense, Theorie der Texte (1962); Jakobson—esp. v. 3; J. Derrida, De la grammatologie (1967); U. Eco, La struttura assente (1968); J. M. [Y.] Lotman, Struktura chudožestvennogo teksta (1970); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1970); Essais de sémiotique poétique, ed. A. J. Greimas (1972); C. Segre, Semiotics and Literary Criticism, trans. J. Meddemmen (1973); J. Kristeva, La Révolution du langage poétique (1974); R. Mayenova, Poetyka teoretyczna (1974); Culler—esp. ch. 3; U. Eco, A Theory of Semiotics (1976); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); J. Culler, The Pursuit of Signs (1981); T. Todorov, Theories of the Symbol, trans. C. Porter (1982); M. Riffaterre, Text Production, trans. T. Lyons (1983); H. Baran, "Structuralism and Semiotics," Terras; J. Culler, Ferdinand de Saussure, 2d ed. (1986); Encyclopedic Dictionary of Semiotics, ed. T. A. Sebeok (1986); R. Jakobson, Language in Literature, trans. K. Pomorska and S. Rudy (1987); F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics, ed. C. Bally and A. Sechehaye (1989), trans. W. Baskin [1974]; J. K. Sheriff, The Fate of Meaning (1989); W. Nöth, Handbook of Semiotics (1990); T. Sebeok, Global Semiotics (2001).

P. STEINER; H. SMITH RICHMOND

SENARIUS (Lat., "of six each"). The Lat. equivalent of the Gr. iambic trimeter, the senarius (x – x – x – x – x – ∪ –) is the common dialogue meter of Roman *comedy. This Lat. version is organized by feet rather than metra, as in the Gr., and all odd positions are *anceps except the eleventh position, which is always a pure short. So-called split *anapests are generally avoided; i.e., a resolved anceps (x – ∪ ∪ –) may not be followed or split in the middle by the end of a word spilling over from the preceding *foot. Avoidance of line ends ∪ – | ∪ – and – ∪ – | ∪ – was made so strict in Seneca and Petronius that an iambic word or word end cannot fill the fifth foot in their verses; the ninth position in Seneca's senarii is almost invariably a long even when a four-syllable word fills the last two feet. Though writers from the 1st c. BCE on adhere to the Gr. practice of allowing short syllables in the third and seventh positions, late Lat. archaizing poets, incl. Hilary of Poitiers and Ausonius, return to the senarius in its original Lat. form.

See CANTICUM AND DIVERBIUM, SEPTENARIUS.

■ Hardie, pt. 1, ch. 5; W. M. Lindsay, Early Latin Verse (1922); Norberg; Crusius; C. Questa, Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto (1967); Halporn et al.; J. Soubiran, Essai sur la versification dramatique des romains: Senaire iambique et septenaire trochaique (1988).

J. W. Halporn

SENHAL. A fanciful name (My Magnet, Tristan, Good Hope) used in Occitan poems to address a lady, patron, or friend. A few of the persons so addressed have been identified with some certainty, but for the most part, they remain either completely unknown or the objects of more or less probable conjectures.

See occitan poetry, troubadour.

■ M. Delbouille, "Les senhals désignant Raimbaut d'Orange et le chronologie de ces témoignanges," Cultura Neolatina 17 (1957); S. Gutiérrez García, "Le senhal occitan et le secret de la dame en galicien-portugais," Revue des langues romanes 107 (2003); O. Scarpati, "I senhals nella poesia catalana medievale," Cultura Neolatina 65 (2005).

F. M. Chambers

SENSIBILITY. A Eur. and Am. cultural phenomenon beginning in the late 17th c. that emphasized passionate experience and linked materialist concepts of body and mind to a moral system based on sympathy. Sensibility crossed all genres, from those now called literary to works of natural and moral philosophy, divinity, political economy, and medicine, and ideas of sensibility were a key influence for the Gothic and for *romanticism. The focus of sensibility on the human body and its passions promoted radical ideas of equality for many writers and readers, as it emphasized a universal basis for subjective experience. Sensibility thus played an important role in evolving ideals of individual liberty (William Godwin) and abolition (Harriet Beecher Stowe). Sensibility is closely related to its cognate, *sentimentality, though sentimentality increasingly takes on negative connotations from the 19th c. forward.

Sensibility engages two categories of sensory experiences: sensations that might be called external, coming from the five senses; and internal sensations, coming from the passions (emotion* generally does not find its mod. usage until the 19th c.). The origins of sensibility are in the rise of materialism and empiricism in the 17th and 18th cs. Mod. empiricism privileged sensory experience; John Locke argued that "all ideas come from sensation or reflection" (Essay Concerning Human Understanding, 1689), and David Hume went on to argue that the basis of all experience is either impressions (which include "sensations, passions, and emotions") or ideas ("the faint images of [impressions] in thinking and reasoning"; Treatise of Human Nature, 1739–40). While some thinkers did not care to speculate on the physical processes by which such ideas or impressions were formed, materialists argued that the physical bases of subjective experience were discoverable: for some, what mattered was the vibration of nerves (Isaac Newton), for others, the circulation of animal spirits (René Descartes, Thomas Willis) or the vibration of individual particles (Pierre Gassendi and later David Hartley). Eighteenth-c. devels. in associationist psychology and physiology helped drive scientific interest in sensation, but shifts in religious discourse, from Methodism to natural theology, also placed increased emphasis on the body, perceptual experience, and the passions. In Britain, a Pietist version of sensibility was dominant, but by the late century, particularly in France, sensibility was increasingly divorced from a lang. of faith or moralism and became a foundational part of a mechanist view of body and mind (Paul-Henri Thiry, Baron D'Holbach; Julien Offray de La Mettrie). The mechanist version of sensibility, which saw the body as a sensory machine bound by laws of causation—and nothing more—found its extreme form in the work of Donatien Alphonse François, Marquis de Sade.

There are several intellectual routes by which contemporaries understood the moral implications of the relations between mind and body posed by proponents of sensibility. In antiquity, the passions were seen to be interconnected; theories of such interrelations (Aristotle, Zeno of Critium, et al.) offered a way of understanding human motivations and implied rules for modifying thought and behavior, as the connections between passions might lead to good or ill. With early mod. theories of sensibility, the need for regulation pertained not only to the vehement passions (jealousy, fear, hatred, avarice, etc.) but to calm passions as well (benevolence, amity, pity, and, for Hume, even reason itself): e.g., if pity could lead to love, it might be a dangerous emotion for a young woman lacking parental guidance. Religious zeal, known as enthusiasm, was seen by many as highly communicable and, hence, particularly dangerous; writers such as John Dennis saw such enthusiasm as one of the contributing factors in the horrors of the Eng. Civil War.

One key strain of sensibility, however, can be traced to the aftermath of the Eng. Civil War. In part as a response to Thomas Hobbes's vision of a debased human nature, Ralph Cudworth, Henry More, Benjamin Whichcote, and others, known as the Cambridge Platonists, argued for the essential goodness of the human heart. In Leviathan (1651), Hobbes had argued that, in the state of nature, humankind would be dominated by the darker passions and would exist in a "war of all against all." Only the monarch's government could save his subjects from lives that would at best be "nasty, brutish, and short." The Cambridge Platonists argued that the social passions (particularly sympathy, benevolence, and love) were innate and just as active as their more violent counterparts. In their view, cultivation of those passions was as necessary to human happiness as was good government.

This line of reasoning was developed by so-called moral sense theorists such as Anthony Ashley Cooper, the third Earl of Shaftesbury, and Francis Hutcheson, who argued that we perceive beauty and virtue by a single, internal sense: susceptibility to beauty was also sensibility to virtue. Such theories of moral sensibility were key to the rise of aesthetics and placed increased critical and authorial focus on the affective components of art and on the affective potential of beauty, the picturesque, and the *sublime (see AFFECT). Links between morality and aesthetic sensibility also helped define and promote *taste as a marker of class privilege and gender identity for both men and women.

Adam Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759) offered a crucial paradigm for understanding the unique contribution of the arts to moral sensibility. Smith argued that the basis for social cohesion was the impulse toward sympathy, one of the "original passions of human nature," and that sympathy could come only from the *imagination. With Smith and his followers, the special place of some of the belles lettres in the cultivation of sensibility was reinforced because the imagination was understood to be the functional organ of sympathy; arts that best spoke to the imagination took on increased value. In this respect, the emergence of sensibility is closely linked to the emergence of the mod. idea of lit. from the concept of the belles lettres.

The lit. of sensibility is primarily associated with the celebration of *pathos, but as its affective range grew, it opened new themes and perspectives, offering new approaches to landscape, as well as a new focus on animals, slaves, madness, servants, mothers, children, the poor, and the so-called primitive. *Landscape poetry thrived, encompassing ekphrastic, painterly writing (see EKPHRASIS) as well as inquiry into natural philosophy (James Thomson's The Seasons, 1730; Erasmus Darwin's Loves of the Plants, 1791). In the late 18th c., Della Crucian poetry painted nature as itself sentient: "every flower / Enjoys the air it breathes" (Robert Merry, "Monody Addressed to Mr. Tickell," 1788). Stephen Duck's "Threasher's Labor" (1730) opened up the subjective experience of labor to poetic view, and he was imitated by many, incl. Ann Yearsley and Mary Leapor. The many poetic versions of the tale of Inkle and Yarico (Frances Seymour, William Pattison, John Winstanley, et al.) brought into Brit. popular culture the story of betrayal of a woman into slavery by her white lover. Elsewhere (in John Dyer's The Fleece, 1757; William Cowper's The Task, 1785; or Frank Sayers's "Dying African," ca. 1804), the horrors of slavery and the slave trade were represented with sympathetic intensity. Christopher Smart and Cowper explored madness as a state that opened one up to religious and poetic *inspiration and to prophecy (see PROPHETIC POETRY, VATES). Thomas Gray's "Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College" (1747) is a major work in the sentimental revaluation of childhood, a revaluation that led to the romantic vision of childhood innocence; and Hannah More, Anna Laetitia Barbauld, Felicia Hemans, William Blake, et al. explore the emotions of motherhood and images of maternity. In its celebration of the truth of the passions, the culture of sensibility also gave new value to "primitive" poetry, fostering interest in reclaimed oral trad. and in the ancient poetry of the British Isles. The Gothic, in part an outgrowth of sensibility, opened up a new emotional register, as well. Relying on the aesthetics of the picturesque and the increasing antiquarian interest in Eur. vernacular hist., the Gothic explored the darker side of sensibility. The passions of curiosity, fear, delight, lust, anger, envy, avarice, love, and benevolence were often combined with stories of (sometimes doomed) romance and were staples of Gothic poetry (e.g., Thomas Chatterton, Anne Radcliffe, and P. B. Shelley).

Some poetic genres were particularly important to the lit. of sensibility. The heroic epistle (letters written by abandoned women to their betrayers, a genre invented by Ovid) became a key locus for representing women's romantic passions and was adapted by Aphra Behn, Alexander Pope, and others. The greater (Pindaric) *ode was one of the dominant forms of the period, and it was seen as the most appropriate of the cl. forms for the representation of grand passions (Abraham Cowley, Mark Akenside, William Collins, and Gray). *Narrative poems were important as well, offering the freedom to develop numerous characters and vignettes of sympathetic interest (Thomson, Cowper, George Crabbe). The *hymn was a major poetic form, and the focus on the passions in Charles Wesley's hymns was part of a broad revaluation of religious enthusiasm. Landscape emerged as a locus for patriotic passions but also for the pleasures of grief, love, and aesthetic and religious contemplation in Thomson's Seasons or Edward Young's Night Thoughts (1742). *Pastoral and *georgic were rewritten to accommodate new understandings of how human sensation shapes our physical world (concepts stemming from devels. in natural philosophy by Newton, George Berkeley, and others), as well as the new promise and problems of human interconnection within and across mod. nations (first in Great Britain and later in Germany, France, and America). In the late 18th c., *sonnets were used increasingly for landscape meditations (W. L. Bowles, Charlotte Smith). Particular poets offered important models for *imitation as well. John Milton's "L'Allegro" (1645) was widely imitated, and his melancholy "Penseroso" (1645) was followed by a long series of poems about nocturnal wanderers, from Anne Finch through *graveyard poetry to Cowper, Smith, and William Wordsworth.

One of the most significant poetic subgenres focused on the poet's own sensibility (Gray, Collins, Helen Maria Williams, Frances Greville, et al.). There were multiple models in these poems for describing poetic inspiration, incl. the ancient *bards (Gray), the Aeolian harp (S. T. Coleridge), the associative and creative imagination (Akenside), and a range of personified passions, from Fear to Pity and Peace (Collins; see PERSONIFICATION). Sensibility, with its focus on subjective experience, contributed to the redefinition of poetry as something other than metrical writing: it was becoming linked to particular acts of heightened perception. This position is nascent in Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (1750) with its "mute inglorious Miltons," and it progresses through the meditative poems of Collins, Cowper, and Smith. The concept of poetic sensibility is foundational to Wordsworth's poetry, beginning with his first pub. poem, "Sonnet, on seeing Miss Helen Maria Williams weep at a Tale of Distress" (1787). Women's sensibility to painful emotion was a central theme in the lit. and culture of sensibility, but such emotion is a *topos not entirely or fundamentally gendered feminine: as Cowper writes in The Task: "I was born of woman, and drew milk, / As sweet as charity, from human breasts. / I think, articulate, I laugh and weep, / And exercise all functions of a man."

It is difficult and in some cases improper to isolate the poetry of sensibility from drama and novels (indeed, drama is the first genre to engage the rubrics of sensibility). Much of the lit. of sensibility is self-consciously experimental. Some of it is sui generis (Young's Night Thoughts), some deliberate in its manipulation of genre (georgic in Dyer's Fleece, Thomson's Seasons, or Cowper's Task). Such generic experimentation could blur boundaries between poetry and prose. The Gothic novel combined prose with poetry (M. G. Lewis's The Monk, the novels of Radcliffe). The popularity of the literary *fragment (a piece designed to seem unfinished, often carrying the fiction of being a discovery from ancient times), driven by both antiquarianism and the appeal of the Gothic, also meant that poetry, drama, and prose narrative could be mixed in interesting ways (e.g., the poetry of Ossian, or James Macpherson). Bishop Thomas Percy rewrote many Brit. *ballads in accord with the taste of the age of sensibility, and he drew on novels as well as drama for the revisions. In France, Jean-Jacques Rousseau's prose Les reveries du promeneur solitaire (1782) combined philosophical musings with lyric expressivity and meditation on nature and the passions.

The lit. and culture of sensibility were subject to sharp critique. Some objected to the publication of voices that had previously been silent. Female authorship and the representation of women's inner lives at times violated established rules of *decorum. The poetry of labor and of slavery carried political and social threats to established interests, and the Jacobin novel explored the potential of sensibility and its focus on the passions to foster radical social critique (Godwin, et al.). However, many—not least Immanuel Kant—questioned the validity of a moral system based on sympathy, contending that sympathetic identification was incomplete and idiosyncratic and was no substitute for moral precept. For radical thinkers as well, sympathy could not be an end in itself, even for those who owed an intellectual debt to theories of sensibility. Mary Wollstonecraft, e.g., saw the emphasis on women's sensibility as prejudicial to proper valuation of women's intellect and felt that it was dangerously sexualizing. The erotic potential of a cultivated sensibility made it subject to critique by religious thinkers, and the morality of the passions was also at times opposed to Christian revisions of Stoicism, which held that the regulation of the passions and the search for moderation and temperance were paramount for both sexes (see Greville's "A Prayer for Indifference," 1759). For critics thus influenced, reading and writing might be of moral use, helping to properly regulate the passions by exercising them, showing the relations between them (how envy, lust, and anger or how pity, benevolence, and joy are connected) or teaching how to avoid dangerous passions and their fruits. However, perceived excesses of sensibility were particularly problematic, and debased sensibility was scorned as mere sensation seeking by some and by others as effeminate and corrupting. The materialist underpinnings of sensibility were also subject to critique, esp. the more radical deistic or atheistic versions that came largely from France (D'Holbach, de la Mettrie, et al.). Reactions by conservatives to the Fr. Revolution also came to include denunciation of sensibility.

Critics took the dangers of sensibility to heart in their discussions of literary form, as well. Gothic writing, e.g., was often understood to undertake illegitimate, dangerous manipulation of the passions, leading its unwary readers astray. The Della Crucians were widely mocked and became a touchpoint for Wordsworth's revisions of poetic lang. (McGann). The focus on subjective experience was also at odds with cultural pressures that made first-person expression seem self-indulgent, indecorous, or solipsistic; first-person poetic forms were accordingly used less frequently throughout most of the 18th c. than second-person (particularly the hymn, invitation, and epistle) or third-person (generally narrative) poetic forms. It is not until the romantic period that first-person representations of sensibility become more widely accepted, though still subject to charges of solipsism and self-indulgence.

In the 19th c., sensibility does not die. Melodrama and Victorian sentimental lit. retained popularity through the late century. However, sensibility increasingly marked a fault line between high and low culture, esp. in the 20th c. High modernist poets found the emphasis on sympathetic emotion anathema to many of their poetic goals, and they largely abandoned that part of the ethos of sensibility (see MODERNISM). Nonetheless, sensibility still had resonance. While much of the celebration of pathos and sympathy as its own end disappeared, poetic subjects introduced or cultivated by the poets of sensibility persisted. The interest in domestic life continued, in new tenor, with Robert Frost, Anne Sexton, or Dylan Thomas, and, crucially, the idea of the *poet as a person of heightened sensibility has never quite been lost.

See FUROR POETICUS, LANDSCAPE POEM, PREROMANTICISM.

■ Eliot, "The Metaphysical Poets," Essays; A. Sherbo, English Sentimental Drama (1957); From Sensibility to Romanticism, ed. F. W. Hilles (1970); J. Hagstrum, Sex and Sensibility (1980); R. Williams, Keywords, 2d ed. (1983); J. Todd, Sensibility (1986); C. J. Barker-Benfield, The Culture of Sensibility (1992); J. J. McGann, The Poetics of Sensibility (1996); M. Doody, "Sensuousness in the Poetry of Eighteenth-Century Women Poets," Women's Poetry in the Enlightenment, ed. I. Armstrong and V. Blain (1999); S. Kaul, Poems of Nation, Anthems of Empire (2000); D. Griffin, Patriotism and Poetry in Eighteenth-Century Britain (2002); K. Goodman, Georgic Modernity (2004); G. G. Starr, Lyric Generations (2004).

G. G. STARR

SENTIMENTALITY. In poetry, sentimentality—along with the related forms sentimental and sentimentalism—often carries negative connotations, but some historical and critical uses of the term have also served a more neutral, descriptive function.

While sentimentality may simply refer to the quality of possessing *emotion or feeling, in calling poetry sentimental, a reader may mean to identify and condemn an emotional treatment in excess of its object, a false or contrived response that is not convincingly suited to an occasion. Candidates for such dismissal are poems that lament the suffering of another at a safe distance (H. W. Longfellow's "The Slave in the Dismal Swamp") and poems on the death of small animals (H. M. Williams's "Elegy on a Young Thrush"). William Cowper's lines to his pet rabbit in The Task exemplify the traits of sentimental poetry that easily fall prey to ridicule: "If I survive thee I will dig thy grave; / And when I place thee in it, sighing say, / I knew at least one hare that had a friend." Such scenarios are at least ostensibly intended to invoke pity or sympathy for suffering while demonstrating the exquisite feeling—and, therefore, humanity—of the poet. If the emotional expression is found to be insincere, however, an accusation of false feeling rebounds on the speaker, and the poem is understood as an indulgence in pleasure and self-congratulation at the expense of another's pain. Literary critics employ sentimentality in this condemnatory sense when they want to dismiss a work out of hand. But such condemnation often does little except to indicate the taste of the particular critic, for one person's sentimentality may be another's sincere expression of authentic emotion.

Though sentimentality carries a burden of negative judgment, it also refers to a strain of lit. that privileges the expression of feeling over intellect or reason. In this sense, sentimentality has a long and complex hist. that brings together philosophy, morality, and aesthetics, at least since the 18th c. Following in the wake of Anthony Ashley Cooper, third Earl of Shaftesbury, the Scottish moral philosophers Francis Hutcheson, David Hume, and Adam Smith located morality in the cultivation of "right feeling." Reason was not sufficient to forge constructive social bonds between people. Benevolent social relations might be arrived at through subordinating selfish feelings to emotions such as sympathy and pity, interpersonal feelings that enable caring for and helping others. In this historical sense, sentimentality is closely linked to *sensibility. As this project of social improvement increasingly fell under criticism and out of favor, sentimental poetic practices lost purpose and prestige, and sentimentality increasingly became a term of censure. Recently, however, scholarly interest in the emotions, as well as a general understanding that all social behaviors and feelings are at least in part socially constructed, has generated increased interest in and respect for the term, even to the point where, esp. in the study of 18th- and 19th-c. Am. lit., sentimentalism has been championed as an alternative feminine aesthetic and an effective mode of social reform.

Sentimentality spans all genres. Novelists in the sentimental trad. include Laurence Sterne and Samuel Richardson in the 18th c. and Charles Dickens and Harriet Beecher Stowe in the 19th. The initiation of the poetic trad. is commonly located between the Augustan and romantic periods, during what Northrop Frye designated the Age of Sensibility. Poets of that period include Thomas Gray, Cowper, Charlotte Smith, William Blake, Mary Robinson, Robert Burns, and Williams. William Wordsworth, Lydia Sigourney, Felicia Hemans, John Keats, and Longfellow are some of the 19th-c. inheritors of the trad. Recent critics, notably McGann and Pinch, have focused on the cultural and formal operations of sentimental poetry, analyzing rather than condemning them. Pinch argues that sentimentality in poetry renders legible the ways that emotions are both external and internal to the individual. Sentimental poetry exposes the way that feeling "constructs and mediates between the categories of literary convention and personal experience. . . . [T]he concept of sentimentality may be defined precisely as a confrontation between the personal and the conventional."

See AFFECT, EXPRESSION.

■ N. Frye, "Towards Defining an Age of Sensibility," ELH 23 (1956); J. Todd, Sensibility (1986); F. Kaplan, Sacred Tears: Sentimentality in Victorian Literature (1987); J. J. McGann, The Poetics of Sensibility (1996); A. Pinch, Strange Fits of Passion (1996); A. Douglas, The Feminization of American Culture (1998); J. Howard, "What Is Sentimentality?" American Literary History 11 (1999); J. Keith, "Poetry, Sentiment, and Sensibility," Companion to Eighteenth-Century Poetry, ed. C. Gerrard (2006).

E. RICHARDS

SEPHARDIC POETRY. See JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY.

SEPTENARIUS (Lat., "of seven each"). The Lat. equivalent of the Gr. trochaic tetrameter catalectic (– x – x – x – x – x – ∪ –). The Gr. form is scanned as composed of four metra (see METRON), but the Lat. version has seven feet and an additional syllable. It is the common recitative meter of Roman comedy. All the even positions except the last are *anceps in the septenarius; the 12th position is thus always a pure short. Generally, there is a *diaeresis after the eighth position. "Split dactyls" are generally avoided; i.e., a resolved anceps (– x – ∪ ∪) may not be followed or split in the middle by the end of a word spilling over from the preceding foot. There is the same avoidance of line ends ∪ – | ∪ – and ∪ – ∪ | ∪ – as in the *senarius. The septenarius also appears as the versus quadratus (see CLASSICAL PROSODY) of soldiers' songs and satires, as well as in late Lat. and med. Lat. hymns. Schipper uses the Latinate term septenary to refer to the iambic 14-syllable line in ME, based on an assumed derivation of the vernacular line directly from med. Lat., but this derivation glosses over significant problems of structure and transmission, and as such is but one instance of the appropriation of terminology from one verse system into another without due consideration of the fundamental differences between the two.

See CANTICUM AND DIVERBIUM.

■ Schipper; Hardie, pt. 1, chap. 7; W. M. Lindsay, Early Latin Verse (1922); E. Fraenkel, "Die Vorgeschichte des versus quadratus," Hermes 62 (1927); Beare; Norberg; Crusius; C. Questa, Introduzione alla metrica di

Plauto (1967); Halporn et al.; J. Soubiran, Essai sur la versification dramatique des Romains: Sénaire iambique et séptenaire trochaique (1988).

J. W. Halporn; T.V.F. Brogan

SEPTET. A seven-line stanza in one of a large number of metrical and *rhyme schemes. Isometric forms include the Sicilian septet, rhyming abababa, and the Sp. septet or septilla, traditionally octosyllabic, presently octosyllabic or pentameter and rhyming aabccba or abbacca. Heterometric forms include the roundelet, a med. Fr. seven-line stanza with *refrain, in which lines 1, 3, and 7 are identical, and with syllable counts of 4-8-4-8-8-8-4. These tight forms are marked by the play of a strict two-rhyme pattern and/or verbal repetitions; these schemes are adapted freely in ambitious poems like Eustache Deschamps' "Vous qui vivez à présent en ce monde" (14th c.), and, earlier, in *troubadour song. Septets are found in the poetries of Eur., East Asian, and West Asian lang. families. In Eng., septets are developed with subtlety and syntactic expansiveness by Mary Sidney Herbert in her dedicatory poem to her brother, "To the Angel Spirit of the Most Excellent Philip Sidney" in 13 stanzas of *iambic *pentameter septets; by John Donne in "The Good-morrow," and by John Milton in "On the Death of a Fair Infant Dying of a Cough," both of whom end their septets with an *alexandrine in the Spenserian mode. The richest septet form in Eng. is *rhyme royal, developed brilliantly by Chaucer and used as well by John Gower, Thomas Wyatt, Milton, and W. H. Auden.

■ Le Gentil.

T. Krier

SERBIAN POETRY. The earliest Serbian poetry dates from the period of the Nemanjići dynasty (12th–14th c.) and is of an ecclesiastical nature influenced by the Byzantine trad. The liturgical verse mostly originated from Gr. sources and was rendered in the Serbian recension of Old Church Slavonic, written in the Cyrillic alphabet. From the 14th c. comes a laudatory poem by Siluan (dates unknown) in honor of St. Sava, who established the Serbian monastery Hilandar on Mt. Athos and was a pivotal figure in reinforcing the Christian Orthodox faith among the Serbs. A prose poem by Stefan Lazarević (1377–1427), Slovo ljubve (Of Love, 1404 or 1409), is among the most lyrical texts of the period, as are two elegies by the nun Jefimija (ca. 1349–after 1405), wife of the despot Uglješa Mrnjavčević, one on the loss of her infant, the other in praise of Prince Lazar. The vibrant med. culture of the powerful Serbian state was brought to its knees by the invasion of the Ottomans, who ruled the region until the 19th c. Owing to these politically unfavorable conditions, the Serbian literary scene returned to life only during the Enlightenment. Even during the Ottoman period, however, traditional folk poetry continued to flourish, commemorating important historical events and preserving an awareness of national identity. Although *lyric and *ballad genres prospered as well, the most famous works are decasyllabic *epic songs, in particular one cycle dealing with Kraljević Marko and another with the battle of Kosovo, an event that marked the decline of the med. Serbian state.

Reduced literary activity led to closer ties with Russia and the introduction of the Rus. version of Church Slavonic. The two principal authors of the 18th c. were Jovan Rajić (1726–1801), who composed an allegorical-historical epic Boj zmaja s orlovi (The Battle of the Dragon with the Eagles, 1791), and Zaharije Orfelin (1726–85; Plač Serbii [Serbia's Lament, 1761]). Both wrote in the archaic lang. of the intellectual elite, which differed significantly from the vernacular. The Enlightenment introduced a note of individualism, as in the poetry of Lukijan Mušicki (1777–1837), which is dominated by a didactic orientation and cl. motifs.

While the romantic period saw folk poetry used throughout Europe as a way of encouraging greater national awareness, this was particularly true of Serbia. Vuk S. Karadžić (1787–1864) not only systematically collected a vast body of oral songs but proposed the lang. reform based on the vernacular lang. of folk songs and tales that became the foundation of contemp. Serbian. One of the most prominent singers in his collections is Filip Višnjić (1767–1834). Also influenced by both the romantic spirit and folk trad. is Sima Milutinović (1791–1847), best known for his long epic Serbijanka (1826), a chronicle of the Serbian uprising against the Turks. His student, the Prince-Bishop of Montenegro Petar Petrović Njegoš (1813–51), wrote work resembling oral epic poetry but using clearer, more refined lang. His most famous works are Luča mikrokozma (The Torch of the Microcosm, 1845), a philosophical epic poem in the manner of John Milton; and Gorski vijenac (Mountain Wreath, 1847), an epic that offers a vivid picture of Montenegrin life and hist.

A new orientation in Serbian poetry was introduced by Branko Radičević (1824–53), who built on the more diverse rhythms of folk lyric songs but also gradually departed from the folk idiom in favor of the more mod. expression typical of the Eur. scene. Lyric poetry and the romantic spirit remained staples of literary life for decades to come and produced some of the most important Serbian writers of the 19th c.: Jovan Jovanović Zmaj (1833–1904), known for his moving personal lyrics as well as his commentaries on contemp. society; Đura Jakšić (1832–78), who oscillated between elegiac personal verses (e.g., Na Liparu [In the Linden-Grove, 1866]) and patriotic poems; and Laza Kostić (1841–1910), a trans. of Shakespeare and author of numerous lyric poems.

The epoch of *realism is reflected in the descriptive poetry of Vojislav Illić (1862–94), who also raised the formal and aesthetic bar for later modernist authors. Aleksa Šantić (1868–1924) and Jovan Dučić (1874–1943), two poets from Herzegovina, both continued the legacy of Ilić, the former remaining more of a traditionalist with a focus on a range of themes from love to patriotism and social justice, and the latter very much a follower of *Parnassianism with an exceptional feel for the nuances of lang. and form. Milan Rakić (1876–1938) was an intellectually minded poet whose formally impeccable verses, influenced by Fr. poetic schools, are imbued with pessimism and irony. Dark motifs dominate the poetry of another symbolist, Sima Pandurović (1883–1960), for whom love is inevitably tied to the theme of dying. The collection Utopljene duše (The Drowned Souls, 1911) by Vladislav Petković-Dis (1880–1917) not only announced a new modernist era but eerily foreshadowed the author's tragic death by drowning. Unlike the more measured poets of his time, Dis often embarked on a journey in his verses, capturing the irrational quality of dreamlike states. Veljko Petrović (1884–1967) was a poet from Pannonia whose poems are filled with mythical motifs of fertile soil.

Although *modernism brought with it a number of different orientations, it was *expressionism—with its quest for vital immediacy, its merging of the unexpected and irrational, and its pursuit of cosmic heights—that left the deepest imprint. Poetry was liberated from formal requirements, and *free verse became predominant. Stanislav Vinaver (1891–1955) took this approach to an extreme by placing exclusive emphasis on sound while rejecting the importance of the semantic level.

Although better known for his prose works, Miloš Crnjanski's (1893–1977) elegiac verses about love and his homeland (Stražilovo, 1921) are some of the finest from this period. Other important authors include Momčilo Nastasijević (1894–1938), a poet of folkloric impressionism and conciseness; Rastko Petrović (1898–1949), who oscillates between Slavic paganism and dark expressionist moods; and the pacifist Dušan Vasiljev (1900–1924). The poems of Rade Drainac (1899–1943), a neoromantic who soon showed a kinship with the surrealist school (see SURREALISM), reflect in their imagery the technological advancement of his time but also provide powerful emotional landscapes. The prolific surrealist Oskar Davičo (1909–89) is best known for his early poetry bursting with emotion and unusual metaphors. One of a limited number of women poets, Desanka Maksimović (1898–1993), marked a whole era with her lyrical poetry of exceptional clarity and fluidity. Vasko Popa (1922–91), one of the finest Serbian authors, abandoned the surrealist model and treated poetry as a rational process in which one has to be cognizant of the form. His poems typically form part of a larger cycle. Miodrag Pavlović (b. 1928) is a contemplative poet who often employs images from Serbia's mythical past, while Stevan Raičković (1928–2007) was a melancholic nature-oriented lyricist.

Despite Branko Miljković's (1934–61) premature death, he left a deep mark on the Serbian poetic scene, particularly with his first collection, Uzalud je budim (I Am Waking Her in Vain, 1957), a symbiosis of mod. imagery and a heightened sensitivity for lang. Ivan V. Lalić (1931–96) was a neoclassicist of refined expression whose works include a vivid visual component, while Ljubomir Simović (b. 1935) turns toward rustic Serbia for his inspiration. Aleksandar Ristović (1933–94) was a neosymbolist poet of the quotidian, while Jovan Hristić (1933–2002) captured in his measured expression both the elegiac and resilient aspects of life. Belonging to the same generation but representing a host of poetic styles are Borislav Radović (b. 1935), Aleksandar Petrov (b. 1938), Matija Bećković (b. 1939), Rajko Petrov Nogo (b. 1945), Stevan Tontić (b. 1946), Novica Tadić (b. 1949), and Radmila Lazić (b. 1949).

■ Anthologies: Srpske narodne pjesme, ed. V. Karadžić, 4 v. (1958–64); Antologija srpskog pesništva, ed. M. Pavlović (1964); Antologija novije srpske lirike, ed. B. Popović, 12th ed. (1968); Srpske pesnikinje od Jefimije do danas, ed. S. Radovanović and S. Radaković (1972); Marko the Prince: Serbo-Croat Heroic Songs, ed. and trans. A. Pennington and P. Levi (1984); Anthology of Serbian Poetry: The Golden Age, ed. M. Dordevic (1984); Mediaeval and Renaissance Serbian Poetry, ed. P. R. Dragić Kijuk (1987); Serbian Poetry from the Beginnings to the Present, ed. M. Holton and V. D. Mihailovich (1988); Staro srpsko pesništvo: IX–XVIII vek, ed. Đ. S. Radojičić (1988); The Horse Has Six Legs: An Anthology of Serbian Poetry, ed. and trans. C. Simic (1992); Songs of the Serbian People: From the Collections of Vuk Karadžić, ed. and trans. M. Holton and V. D. Mihailovich (1997); Antologija moderne srpske lirike (1920–1995), ed. M. Šutić (2002); The Serbian Epic Ballads: An Anthology, trans. G.N.W. Locke (2002); Places We Love: An Anthology of Contemporary Serbian Poetry, ed. G. Božović (2006); An Anthology of Serbian Literature, ed. V. D. Mihailovich and B. Mikasinovich (2007); Jutro misleno: Nemanjićko doba: Zbornik srednjovekovne srpske poezije, ed. V. Popa (2008).

■ Criticism and History: A. Kadić, Contemporary Serbian Literature (1964); M. P. Coote and M. Kašanin, Srpska književnost u srednjem veku (1975); M. P. Coote, "Serbocroatian Heroic Songs," Heroic Epic and Saga, ed. F. J. Oinas (1978); S. Koljević, The Epic in the Making (1980); C. Hawkesworth, Voices in the Shadows: Women and Verbal Art in Serbia and Bosnia (2000); J. Deretić, Istorija srpske književnosti, rev. ed. (2002); D. Andrejević, Srpska poezija XX veka (2005).

A. VIDAN

SERIAL FORM. Serial form has a literary-historical provenance that distinguishes it from other critical terms used to describe the variety of long-poem forms that emerged during the 20th c. (see EPIC, LYRIC SEQUENCE, LONG POEM). Jack Spicer was the first to use the term to designate a distinct compositional method informing his poetry along with that of his *San Francisco Renaissance peers. In Admonitions (1958), Spicer credits Robert Duncan with helping him view the book as the central unit of composition, where individual poems become less important than the resonances and energies they generate through accumulation. Offering a more explicit definition in his 1965 Vancouver lectures, Spicer stresses the importance of openness, contiguity, and dictation.

Evolving from these early formulations—and learning from artistic production in other media incl. musical serialism, filmic montage, and cubist painting—serial form has assumed certain core attributes. Serial poems tend to be open rather than closed, prospective rather than introspective, and driven by empirical reality rather than internal necessity. They value process over product. Resisting thematic or narrative strictures, serial poems tend to be discontinuous, elliptical, and open to recombination and extension. While not present in every serial poem, these traits—more like malleable, informing concepts than strict formal prescriptions—distinguish the series from the mod. poetic sequence.

Though some have suggested Philip Sidney's Arcadia and the carmen perpetuum (perpetual song) of Ovid's Metamorphoses as early examples, poets and critics tend to cite more recent influences on a formal practice that achieved poetic currency only in the latter half of the 20th c. The idiosyncratic ordering of the poems in Emily Dickinson's fascicles suggest a prescient serial logic, while Walt Whitman's extended catalogs and his life's work as a whole, represented in multiple eds. of Leaves of Grass, exhibit dynamic variation and extension as they figure the adaptive capacities of serial form. Gertrude Stein's Tender Buttons (1912), W. C. Williams's Spring and All (1923), Jean Toomer's Cane (1923), and Langston Hughes's Montage of a Dream Deferred (1951), all of which abandon the integrity of the isolated lyric as they seek a more integrated, book-length serial structure, provide significant modernist touchstones. In works that served as a model for a socially engaged serialism, the objectivists (see OBJECTIVISM) developed an extensive body of serial work, incl. Charles Reznikoff's Rhythms (1918), George Oppen's Discrete Series (1934), Lorine Niedecker's New Goose (1946), and Louis Zukofsky's Anew (1946).

Since the 1960s, serial form has become a dominant long-poem form, whether it constitutes a short series, a book-length project, or an ongoing series. The trad. extends from Duncan's Passages (1968–87), Oppen's "Of Being Numerous" (1968), and Robert Creeley's Pieces (1968) to Rachel Blau DuPlessis's Drafts (1986–), Nathaniel Mackey's "Song of the Andoumboulou" (1985–), Michael Palmer's "Baudelaire Series" (1988), and beyond. Though serial poetics is most pronounced in Am. poetry, other national lits. also have pursued some version of the mode, most prominently in France, where Stéphane Mallarmé's Un coup de dés (1897) and his unfinished Igitur (1869) were models for subsequent work such as Edmond Jabès's Le Livre des Questions (1963–73) and Claude Royet-Journoud's Tetralogy (1972–97), among others.

See AVANT GARDE POETICS; BOOK, POETIC.

■ R. Blaser, "The Fire," Poetics of the New American Poetry, ed. D Allen and W. Tallman (1973); A. Golding, "George Oppen's Serial Poems," Contemporary Literature 29.2 (1988); J. Conte, Unending Design (1991); L. Keller, Forms of Expansion (1995); J. Spicer, The House That Jack Built (1998); C. Bernstein, "Reznikoff's Nearness," My Way (1999); B. Edwards, "Notes on Poetics regarding Mackey's Song, Callaloo 23.2 (2000); S. Marijnissen, "'Made Things': Serial Form in Modern Poetry from Taiwan," Modern Chinese Literature and Culture 13.2 (2001).

A. VANDER ZEE

SERRANILLA. A Sp. poem composed in any short meter, but esp. in the arte mayor* half line, and dealing lightly with the subject of the meeting of a gentleman and a pretty country girl. The serranilla was particularly characteristic of the late med. period. The most famous are those of the archpriest of Hita (1283?–1350?), and esp. those of the Marqués de Santillana (1398–1458); the latter may have been influenced by the "great volume of Portuguese and Galician cantigas, serranas, and decires" to which he says he had access in his youth.

See PASTOURELLE.

■ Le Gentil; B. W. Wardropper, "Góngora and the Serranilla," MLN 77 (1962); A. Swan, "Santillana's Serranillas: A Poetic Genre of Their Own," Neophilologus 63 (1979); Navarro; J. Dagenais, "Cantigas d'escarnho and serranillas: The Allegory of Careless Love," BHS 68 (1991); L. R. Bass, "Crossing Borders: Gender, Geography, and Class Relations in Three Serranillas of the Marqués de Santillana," La Corónica 25 (1996); M. García, "La 'serrana' castellana, ¿género paródico?" La Corónica 38 (2009).

D. C. CLARKE

SESTET (It. sestette, sestetto). According to the OED, the term first appeared in Eng. in 1867, when Leigh Hunt and S. Adams Lee used it to signify the minor division or last six lines of a *sonnet, preceded by an *octave. Sometimes the octave states a proposition or situation and the sestet a conclusion, but no fast rules for content can be formulated. The rhyme scheme of the sestet varies: in an It. sonnet, it is usually cdecde, in an Eng., efefgg, but there are others. The term sestet is not generally used for a six-line stanza apart from a sonnet. The older term sexain* is still used for such stanzas, which may be patterned in various ways.

■ The Book of the Sonnet, ed. L. Hunt and S. Adams Lee, 1:10–11 (1867).

R. O. EVANS; S. CUSHMAN

SESTINA (It. sestine, sesta rima). The most complicated of the verse forms initiated by the *troubadours, the sestina is composed of six stanzas of six lines each, followed by an *envoi of three lines, all of which are unrhymed, and all decasyllabic (Eng.), hendecasyllabic (It.), or *alexandrine (Fr.). The same six end words occur in each stanza, but in a shifting order that follows a fixed pattern: each successive stanza takes its pattern from a reversed (bottom-up) pairing of the lines of the preceding stanza (i.e., last and first, then next to last and second, then third from last and third). If we let the numbers 1 through 6 stand for the end words, we may schematize the pattern as follows:

stanza 1	:	123456
stanza 2	:	615243
stanza 3	:	364125
stanza 4	:	532614
stanza 5	:	451362
stanza 6	:	246531
envoi	:	531 or 135

More commonly, the envoi, or tornada*, is further complicated by the fact that the remaining three end words, 246, must also occur in the course of its three lines, so that it gathers up all six together.

The invention of the sestina is usually attributed to Arnaut Daniel (fl. 1180–95), and the form was widely cultivated both by his Occitan followers and by poets in Italy (Dante, Petrarch, Gaspara Stampa), Spain, and Portugal (Luís de Camões, Bernardim Ribeiro). A rhymed version (abcbca in the first stanza) was introduced into France by Pontus de Tyard (Erreurs amoureuses, 1549), a member of the Pléiade*; Philip Sidney dispenses with rhyme for "Ye Goatherd Gods," a double sestina in the Arcadia (1590, 1593). In Germany, the poets of the 17th c. were attracted to the sestina (Martin Opitz, Andreas Gryphius, G. R. Weckherlin). In France and England, the sestina enjoyed a revival in the 19th c., thanks to the Comte de Gramont and to A. C. Swinburne, both of whom developed rhymed versions, Gramont's all on the same two-rhyme model (abaabb in the first stanza), Swinburne's not surprisingly more variable, given that he also composed a double sestina of twelve 12-line stanzas ("The Complaint of Lisa"). Gramont prefaced his collection with a hist. of the sestina, in which he describes it as "a reverie in which the same ideas, the same objects, occur to the mind in a succession of different aspects, which nonetheless resemble one another, fluid and changing shape like the clouds in the sky." The sestina interested the Fr. and Eng. *Parnassians less than the other romance fixed forms, but it has enjoyed a growing popularity in the 20th and 21st cs. Ezra Pound called the sestina "a form like a thin sheet of flame, folding and infolding upon itself," and his "Sestina: Altaforte" and "Sestina for Isolt" reintroduced the form to readers. Following W. H. Auden's "Paysage moralisé" and Louis Zukofsky's "Mantis," Am. poets have shown a remarkable interest in the form. Anthony Hecht's "The Book of Yolek," Elizabeth Bishop's "Sestina" and "A Miracle for Breakfast," and John Ashbery's "Farm Implements and Rutabagas in a Landscape" suggest the form's flexibility, as the repetitions evoke states as different as uncanny menace, claustrophobic containment, and comic playfulness. Indeed, from the mid-20th c. to the present, the sestina has enjoyed a great popularity in Am. poetry, at least partly because it serves the poetic culture's needs. A favorite exercise in creative writing classes, it allows poets to demonstrate a professional skill while exploring its limits. The form's repetitions also inspire poets interested in word games, as lang. forms the material of composition.

■ F. de Gramont, Sestines, précédés de l'histoire de la sextine (1872); Kastner; F. Davidson, "The Origin of Sestina," MLN 25 (1910); A. Jeanroy, "La 'sestina doppia' de Dante et les origines de la sestine," Romania 42 (1912); H. L. Cohen, Lyric Forms from France (1922); E. Pound, The Spirit of Romance (1952); L. Fiedler, "Green Thoughts in a Green Shade," KR 18 (1956); J. Riesz, Die Sestine (1971); I. Baldelli, "Sestina," Enciclopedia Dantesca, ed. G. Petrocchi et al., 5 vols. (1970–78); M. Shapiro, Hieroglyph of Time: The Petrarchan Sestina (1980); Morier; A. Roncaglia, "L'invenzione della sestina," Metrica 2 (1981); Elwert, Italienische, sect. 82; J. F. Nims, A Local Habitation (1985); D. Caplan, Questions of Possibility: Contemporary Poetry and Poetic Form (2004); S. Burt, "Sestina! or, The Fate of the Idea of Form," MP 105 (2007).

A. Preminger; C. Scott; D. Caplan

SEXAIN, sixain, sextain, sextet, sestet, hexastich. Names used for various stanza patterns of six lines. The term sestet* is normally restricted to the final six lines of a sonnet, esp. an It. sonnet, in distinction to the term octave, or first eight lines. The other terms are applied indiscriminately to all six-line stanzas, only some of which have distinctive names. The best-known varieties of sexains in Eng. poetry are the following: (1) ababcc, in iambic pentameter, i.e., a heroic *quatrain capped by a *couplet, the so-called *Venus and Adonis stanza from its use by Shakespeare, common for Ren. *epyllia and *complaints and one of Matthew Arnold's favorite forms; (2) ababcc, in iambic tetrameter (e.g., William Wordsworth's "I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud"), very popular in Ger. poetry; (3) *tail rhyme, aa4b3cc4b3, sometimes called Romance-six, which is an extension of *ballad meter, popular in OF and ME verse, often used by 16th-c. dramatists, found in religious and secular poems up to George Herbert and evidenced as late as Thomas Hardy ("The Sigh") and Robert Bridges ("Nightingales"); (4) the *Burns stanza, aaa4b2a4b2, which may go back to Occitan models of the 11th c. and is found also in *medieval romances and miracle plays; (5) xayaza, e.g., D. G. Rossetti's "Blessed Damozel"; and (6) abcabc, popular in Eng. poetry since A. C. Swinburne, e.g., in W. B. Yeats, John Berryman, Dylan Thomas, Richard Wilbur, and Thom Gunn. In Sp., the octosyllabic sexain rhyming aabccb or ababcc is called a sextilla*. One of the earliest extant texts of Fr. verse, the Vie de Saint Leger, is set in 129 sexains rhyming in couplets and the rhétoriqueurs* termed a poem of three short-line sexains plate rime brisée (see CROSS RHYME). The most famous and most spectacular poetic form in sexains, the *sestina, uses elaborate patterns of repeated words. Six-line stanzas occur almost as often as quatrains and couplets and more frequently than five-line stanzas.

■ Schipper, History; Morier, "Sextine."

A. Preminger; E. Haüblein

SEXTILLA. A Sp. stanza form of six octosyllabic or shorter lines. In the classic period, the usual rhyme schemes were abbaab, ababba, ababab, abbaba, aabbab, and abaabb; mod. definitions often call for aabccb or ababcc (sometimes this last is called sestina) and occasionally stipulate that the b lines be oxytones and the others paroxytones. Sextillas have been pointed out in the prologue to the Galician-Port. Cantigas de Santa Maria (13th c.) of King Alfonso X el Sabio (the Wise) and in the Libro de buen amor (14th c.):

¡Ventura astrosa, cruel, enojosa,
captiva, mequina!
¿Por qué eres sañosa, contra mí tan dañosa,
e falsa vesina?

■ D. G. Rengifo, Arte poética española (1592); A. de Trueba, Arte de hacer versos (1905); Navarro.

D. C. Clarke

SHI (or shih, in Wade-Giles romanization).

I. Early History of Shi
II. From the Han to Jin Dynasties
III. Shi of the Southern Dynasties
IV. Medieval Shi Prosody
V. Shi of the Tang Dynasty
VI. Poetry of the Song to Qing Dynasties
VII. Shi Composed by Women
VIII. Modern Shi

I. Early History of Shi. The term shi, most frequently used to denote "poetry" in traditional China and translated as "lyric poetry," originally referred to the lyrics of a song (as opposed to the song's musical aspects or performance). However, by the Springs and Autumns period (770–476 BCE), the term would be used almost exclusively to denote a particular corpus of poems—the Shijing* (Classic of Poetry, also known as the Book of Songs). The Shijing primarily used a tetrasyllabic line; four-syllable lines were so strongly associated with the collection that later tetrasyllabic poetry was thought to evoke the Shijing's archaic simplicity. The assoc. of the Shijing with Confucius, as well as comments attributed to Confucius about the importance of learning the collection, has played a significant role in locating shi within a trad. of literary didacticism. In the Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE), a version of the early hermeneutical formula shi yan zhi, or "poetry articulates aims," would be invoked in a commentary to the Shijing. This formula would wield great influence on later poetics, essentially defining the poem as the literary expression of what was on the speaker's mind. To understand the poem, therefore, meant understanding the speaker's autobiographical occasion and historical situation—i.e., the critical trad. construed the poem as a work of factual statement, rather than of the fictive imagination. These critical assumptions could result in unconvincing allegorical readings of simple love songs, particularly where the Shijing was concerned.

Also important to the early history of shi was the Chuci* or Lyrics of Chu. This was an early anthol. associated with the semi-independent southern kingdom of Chu. The Chuci made striking use of a caesura-marker particle xi, which divided lines into hemistichs. In this anthol. was the "Jiu ge" ("Nine Songs"), a group of actually 11 songs attributed to the late Warring States figure Qu Yuan (c. 340–278 BCE) that recast Chu religious rites in poetic form. The "Nine Songs" were the precursor to the subgenre of "Chu songs," which were popular among Chu aristocracy and Han emperors. The Chu songs were the earliest surviving poetic compositions from the Western Han (206 BCE–9 CE), and the longer meter of the Chu song line has been identified as contributing to the rise of the heptasyllabic shi line in later centuries.

II. From the Han to Jin Dynasties. Though the Han has often been credited with the emergence of pentasyllabic shi poetry, it was only at the end of the dynasty that one finds much evidence of this. For much of the Han (and indeed in the two centuries after the Han), rhapsodic composition and tetrasyllabic poetry were still the dominant forms. There are examples of Western Han pentasyllabic shi poems, but these are generally problematic, as in the case of poems attributed to Su Wu (140–60 BCE) and Li Ling (d. 74 BCE). These were poems supposedly written between friends, one of whom was a Western Han general who had surrendered to the Xiongnu confederacy and the other a Han envoy to the Xiongnu. It is likely that the Su Wu-Li Ling corpus was actually composed near the end of the Eastern Han (25–220) and was part of a larger anonymous corpus known as gushi or "old poems." The most famous of these were a set of poems called the "Gushi shijiu shou" ("Nineteen Old Poems"). These pentasyllabic poems took up themes of carpe diem, insomnia, separation, and displacement. As a number of scholars have noted, these anonymous shi were closely associated with yuefu* (music bureau) poetry and indeed cannot always be clearly distinguished from them.

The historian Ban Gu (32–92) is identified as the first known historical author of a pentasyllabic shi, but it was during the Jian'an era (196–220) that pentasyllablic poetry truly came into its own. This period was dominated by the warlord Cao Cao (155–220), a talented writer of tetrasyllabic and pentasyllabic yuefu poetry. His heir Cao Pi (186–226) was also a fine poet, but the younger son Cao Zhi (192–232) was the major poet of the age. Cao Zhi composed with a confidence and inventiveness that neither his elder brother nor his father commanded. The Cao clan served as patrons to the so-called Seven Masters of the Jian'an, a group of writers that included the important poet Wang Can (177–217). Few poems survive from this period; but in those that remain, one can see how the pentasyllabic line emerged out of the tetrasyllabic line through the addition of a literary particle or an adjective. In addition to poems on gushi topics, Jian'an era poets composed in poetic subgenres such as youxian shi (poems on wandering with immortals) and gongyan shi (poems on the lord's feast). In the decades following Cao Pi's founding of the Wei (220–65), there was Ruan Ji (210–63), who composed 82 poems (mostly pentasyllabic), all entitled "Yong huai" ("Singing of My Cares"). Ruan Ji's poems are rather obscure, and they are almost always interpreted through the model of shi yan zhi and thought to contain veiled criticism of politics during the age.

Many shi poets during the subsequent Western Jin dynasty (265–316) elaborated upon Eastern Han and Jian'an period themes and styles. Ni gushi (poems in imitation of the old poems) were composed by leading writers such as Lu Ji (261–303). However, traditional critics have often complained that Western Jin poetry lacked vigor and suffered from a surfeit of rhetorical ornament. After the northern heartland was lost to ethnic non-Han Chinese tribes, the Jin relocated itself south of the Yangtze River. The most important poet of this age (though not celebrated as such during his own life) was Tao Qian (365–427), also known as Tao Yuanming. Tao Qian composed in a strongly autobiographical mode, describing his rejection of official life for a return to a life of farming. Although such tianyuan shi (farmland poetry) are often thought to idealize the agrarian life, Tao Qian's poems also describe the difficulties and hardships that he and his family faced. His imitations of gushi were in a more straightforward style than the Western Jin poets. Closely associated with Tao Qian was the poet Xie Lingyun (385–433), who is often identified as being the first great writer of shanshui shi (landscape poetry).

III. Shi of the Southern Dynasties. During the Southern Dynasties (420–579), increasing attention was paid to prosody, which was codified as the sisheng babing (four tones and eight faults) during the Yongming era (483–94). The "four tones" were the level, rising, departing, and entering tones; these differ from the current four tones of standard mod. Chinese. The "eight faults" stipulated the avoidance of using the same tones, initial consonants, and rhyme sounds in certain positions of each line or couplet. The practitioners of the new style championed the pentasyllabic line and worked in shi of eight lines, with strong grammatical *parallelism in the middle two couplets. They also composed in quatrains, which were called xiaoshi (little poems), or later, jueju, (cut-off lines.) The heptasyllabic line was also used, particularly in poems that drew on anonymous southern yuefu topics or styles. Leading poets of this period belonged to literary coteries and princely courts where normative competence was as important as individual brilliance. The poetic subgenre of yongwu shi (poems on things) was popular, allowing poets to display their verbal wit and elegance through riddling descriptions of objects at banquets. During the Liang dynasty, the Wen xuan (Selections of Refined Literature) was compiled by the crown prince Xiao Tong (501–31). This would become the major pre-Tang source for all genres, including shi. The poems contained here represent an orthodox view of lit., excluding yongwu poetry and erotic pieces. The counter-anthol. to the Wen xuan was the Yutai xinyong (New Songs from Jade Terrace), an anthol. devoted to love poems and supposedly aimed at a female readership. The Yutai xinyong is identified with gongti shi (palace-style poems), intricately crafted poems that thematized the leisure of palace life and women's longings in boudoirs.

IV. Medieval Shi Prosody. After the founding of the Tang dynasty, the Yongming prosodic rules would be both simplified and normalized. This new form would be known either as lüshi (regulated poetry) or as jinti shi (recent-style poetry), in contrast to the more relaxed form of guti shi (ancient-style poetry), which did not insist upon strict tonal balance or parallelism (though these were often employed). The Tang poets simplified the four tonal divisions by reducing them to two categories: level and deflected. The basic prosodic rules for regulated verse are as follows: (1) meters of either five or seven syllables; (2) poem lengths of four or eight lines; (3) a single rhyme in the level tone that falls on the last syllable of even-numbered lines (the last syllable of the first line might also rhyme); (4) a more or less fixed pattern of tonal balance. There are two patterns for the distribution of tones in regulated pentasyllabic verse. These are shown below, with "–" marking a level tone and " \ " marking a deflected tone (patterns are determined by the tone of the second syllable of the first line):

A. Deflected Tone Opening

	\ \ – – \
2	– – \ \ –
	– – – \ \
4	\ \ \ – –
	\ \ – – \
6	– – \ \ –
	– – – \ \
8	\ \ \ – –

B. Level Tone Opening

	– – – \ \
2	\ \ \ – –
	\ \ – – \
4	– – \ \ –
	– – – \ \
6	\ \ \ – –
	\ \ – – \
8	– – \ \ –

Moreover, within each line, there were also strictly regulated tone positions and variable tone positions. The second, fourth, and fifth positions were "fixed," while the other positions were not. Thus, in practice, the actual pentasyllabic couplet would appear as one of the following (with "x" marking variable tone positions):

x \ x –\ x – x \ –

x – x \ \
x \ x – –

Regulated heptasyllabic poems simply add two deflected tones or two level tones to the beginnings of what would otherwise be a pentasyllabic line. Again, there are fixed and unfixed tone positions, which are the second, fourth, sixth, and seventh syllables. As patterns, the couplets would appear as follows (along with the fixed position tonal distribution):

A. Deflected Tone Opening

\ \ – – – \ \	x \ x – x \ \
– – \ \ \ – –	x – x \ x – –

B. Level Tone Opening

– – \ \ – – \	x – x \ x – \
\ \ – – \ \ –	x \ x – x \ –

The heptasyllabic poem would then alternate these two couplet patterns to fill out its eight lines, whereas regulated quatrains, whether five- or seven-syllable, would simply consist of half of an eight-line poem.

V. Shi of the Tang Dynasty. The Tang is often called the golden age of shi poetry. Later literary scholars have divided the Tang into four distinct periods, based both on literary trends and political circumstances: the Early Tang, the High Tang, the Mid-Tang, and the Late Tang. Court poetry dominated much of the Early Tang period, though the most distinctive of poets in this age, such as Wang Ji (590–644), wrote outside the courtly circles and on topics far removed from the occasional verse of the court. It is the High Tang that most readers think of when discussing Tang shi. The poets Wang Wei (701–61), Li Bo (701–ca. 762), and Du Fu (712–70) were active during this time, along with a number of other famed poets. Wang Wei was a member of an important clan and served in the court during the long reign of Emperor Xuanzong (712–56). However, his poems often represent him in a Tao Qian-like mode of pastoral retirement. Particularly famous is his "Wangchuan ji" ("Wangchuan Collection"), a set of poems written about sites on his sizable estate. In contrast to the metropolitan Wang Wei, Li Bo was born in the western regions of China and was likely of mixed Central Asian background. An outsider in many ways, his route to the court was through his literary talent and his outlandish personality. Li Bo is best known for his imaginative and often extravagant yuefu poems, which transformed poetic conventions into astonishing visions of hyperbole. He is also known for a series of poems titled "Gufeng" ("Ancient Airs") and for his Daoist-inflected poems. Du Fu, arguably the greatest of the three great Tang poets, is remembered now for his powerful moral vision and his role as poetic witness to the An Shi Rebellion, which shook the Tang empire to its core. In many of his poems, one finds sympathy for the suffering of commoners, a sense of duty to the polity, and a ruthless sense of irony. This is the case with "Zi jing fu Fengxian yonghuai wubaizi" ("Singing of My Cares While Going from the Capital to Fengxian"). As he leaves the capital, Du Fu juxtaposes the pleasures of the wealthy with the frozen corpses of the poor but finds that he is himself implicated in this neglect, arriving home to discover that a young son has died in his absence.

Poets of the Mid-Tang often seem more self-conscious than those of the High Tang, looking back to figures such as Du Fu and Li Bo. Poets like Han Yu (768–824) and Liu Zongyuan (773–819) were associated with the archaist (fugu) literary circles, prizing a kind of awkwardness and rejecting the high sheen of court poetry. Others, like Bo Juyi (772–846), were famed for socially conscious "new yuefu" poems, which satirized inequalities of wealth and injustice. Li He (790–816) was a poet of real strangeness who invoked ghostly imagery and cryptically ominous scenes, outdoing even Li Bo's rhetorical extravagance. In the Late Tang, poets such as Du Mu (803–52), Li Shangyin (ca. 811–58), and Wen Tingyun (ca. 813–70) combined a sense of glamorous decadence with the use of historical allusions. A number of their poems looked back to the Southern Dynasties and to the Sui (581–617), evoking a sense of dynastic decline and belatedness.

VI. Poetry of the Song to Qing Dynasties. The composition of shi poetry was central to the ideal of the literatus (wenren) during the Song dynasty (960–1279). Major writers like Ouyang Xiu (1007–72) and Mei Yaochen (1002–60) reaffirmed the connection between poetry and Confucian moral transformation. Mei Yaochen is also responsible for one of the lasting critical judgments of Song poetry, describing it as pingdan (bland). Certainly, there was a kind of discursive quality to many of the famous Song poems, a willingness to engage in philosophical speculation. There was also an interest in the ordinariness of daily life, which had been introduced by Du Fu. The greatest poet of the Song was Su Shi (1037–1101), known also as Su Dongpo, whose poems reveal attention to subjective perception and a feel for particular details, bringing together Song philosophical abstraction with beautifully honed imagery. His poem "Zhouzhong yeqi" ("Standing Up on a Boat at Evening") plays with misperceptions of sensory evidence and the flickering sense of a lyric moment that passes quickly from a framed aesthetic scene back into the ordinary realm of noise. Wang Anshi (1021–86), remembered now as the architect of the "New Policies," was also an important poet and famed for his regulated quatrains. During the Southern Song, major poets included Yang Wanli (1124–1206), Lu You (1125–1210), and Fan Chengda (1126–93), who all knew one another and exchanged poems. At the end of the Song, there was Wen Tianxiang (1246–82), a poet famed for his patriotism to the Song, who indeed was martyred by order of Khubilai Khan (1215–1368), the founder of the Yuan dynasty (1279–1368).

During the Yuan, Ming (1368–1644), and Qing (1644–1911) dynasties, the Song ideal of wenren poetry gave way to poets of other social classes and groups. The sheer amount of shi poetry written and collected after the Song is staggering, with poetry writing becoming an increasingly popular activity for commoners, i.e., those born not of aristocratic or official families. Gao Qi (1336–74), who is often considered the greatest Ming poet (though most of his life was lived during the Yuan), was common-born but rose to renown in significant measure because of his literary talents. In his early poem "Qingqiuzi ge" ("Song of the Man of the Green Hill"), he constructs a pseudoautobiographical statement of his devotion to poetry through evocations of Li Bo and Chuci-influenced ascension lit. Gao Qi is also sometimes seen as a precursor to the Ming archaist poets, such as Li Mengyang (1473–1529), who were active in the middle period of the Ming dynasty and who insisted that the High Tang should be taken as the model for all good verse. That this period also saw a number of important compilations of earlier poetry and works of poetry crit. was a likely reason for the resurgence in archaist sentiment. The Qing conquest spurred loyalist passions in poets like Chen Zilong (1608–47) and the female poet Liu Shi (1618–64). The two poets were romantically linked, but she later married another famed poet, Qian Qianyi (1582–1664), who left his wife for her. Chen Zilong would achieve political martyrdom by committing suicide rather than be captured by Qing troops.

VII. Shi Composed by Women. The relationship between male and female poets would become more complex in the late imperial period. It has been speculated that Liu Shi was responsible (though uncredited) for the sections on women poets and the annotations in Qian Qianyi's anthol. of Ming poets, the Liechao shiji (Poetry Collections from the Arrayed Reigns [of the Ming]). It is also worth noting that the number of poetry collections by women increased in the late imperial period. There had always been women who composed shi, though in earlier periods, these were mostly court ladies, high-born daughters in aristocratic households, nuns, and courtesans—i.e., women who had a certain amount of freedom in their interactions with educated men. The Tang poets Xue Tao (770–830) and Yu Xuanji (840–68) socialized with leading Tang writers; significant portions of their poetry have been preserved. Yu Xuanji's poetry is particularly notable for the bitter awareness of how sex was a limit that talent could not overcome. During the Song, there was Li Qingzhao (1084–ca. 1151), though she was better known for her ci*, and Zhu Shuzhen (fl. 1100), whose poem "Zi ze" ("Reprimanding Myself") was a self-conscious critique of how women were not supposed to engage in literary pursuits. Beginning in the Ming, one finds female literary circles that were formed within family and social networks. One of the most famous of these was the Banana Garden Poetry Club, formed in the early days of the Qing. The male poet Yuan Mei (1716–98) also taught female students and published a volume collecting their poems.

VIII. Modern Shi. In more mod. times, cl.-lang. shi has made room for poetry written in mod. vernacular Chinese. Writers associated with the May Fourth Movement were interested in experimenting with Western-style *free verse. However, cl.-lang. shi continued to be written by poets like Lu Xun (1881–1936) and Mao Zedong (1893–1976) and indeed is still practiced by many poets today. However, the term shi in the contemp. literary context now refers to a general notion of "poetry," rather than to the specific cl. genre that is distinct from other cl. poetic genres.

See CHINA, POETRY OF; CHINA, POPULAR POETRY OF; CHINESE POETICS; CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN.

■ Anthologies: The Jade Mountain, trans. W. Bynner (1929); Poems of the Late T'ang, trans. A. Graham (1965); Anthology of Chinese Verse, ed. and trans. J. Frodsham with C. Hsi (1967); Sunflower Splendor, ed. W. Liu and I. Lo (1975); H. Stimson, Fifty-five T'ang Poems (1976); New Songs from a Jade Terrace, trans. A. Birrell (1982); Columbia Book of Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. B. Watson (1984); Columbia Book of Later Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. J. Chaves (1986); Waiting for the Unicorn, ed. I. Lo and W. Schultz (1986); The Red Azalea, ed. E. Morin (1990); Anthology of Modern Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. M. Yeh (1992); Columbia Anthology of Traditional Chinese Literature, ed. V. Mair (1994); Songs of the Immortals, trans. Y. Xu (1994); Anthology of Chinese Literature, ed. and trans. S. Owen (1996); Women Writers of Traditional China, ed. K. Chang and H. Saussy (1999); Classical Chinese Literature, ed. J. Minford and J. Lau (2000); W. Idema and B. Grant, The Red Brush (2004); The Anchor Book of Chinese Poetry, ed. T. Barnstone and P. Chou (2005); Classical Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. D. Hinton (2008); Transparante tranen, ed. and trans. W. Idema (2008).

■ Criticism and History: W. Hung, Tu Fu, 2 v. (1952); J.J.Y. Liu, Art of Chinese Poetry (1962); J. Diény, Les dix-neuf poèmes anciens (1963); K. Yoshikawa, Introduction to Sung Poetry (1967); J. Diény, Aux origines de la poésie classique en Chine (1968); J.J.Y. Liu, The Poetry of Li Shang-yin (1969); J. Hightower, The Poetry of T'ao Ch'ien (1970); A. Davis, Tu Fu (1971); B. Watson, Chinese Lyricism (1971); J. Lin, Modern Chinese Poetry (1972); S. Owen, Poetry of Meng Chiao and Han Yü (1975); J. Chaves, Mei Yao-ch'en and the Development of Early Sung Poetry (1976); H. Frankel, The Flowering Plum and the Palace Lady (1976); D. Holzman, Poetry and Politics (1976); M. Duke, Lu You (1977); S. Owen, Poetry of the Early T'ang (1977); P. Yu, The Poetry of Wang Wei (1980); S. Owen, Great Age of Chinese Poetry (1981); F. Cheng, Chinese Poetic Writing (1982); R. Miao, Early Medieval Chinese Poetry (1982); A. Davis, T'ao Yüan-ming, 2 v. (1983); R. Egan, The Literary Works of Ou-yang Hsiu (1984); R. Lynn, Guide to Chinese Poetry and Drama, 2d ed. (1984); S. Owen, Traditional Chinese Poetry and Poetics (1985); R. Bodman and S. Wong, "Shih"; and C. Hartman, "Poetry," Indiana Companion to Traditional Chinese Literature, ed. W. H. Nienhauser Jr., rev. ed. (1986); K. Chang, Six Dynasties Poetry (1986); C. Hartman, Han Yü and the T'ang Search for Unity (1986); P. Kroll, "Li Po's Transcendent Diction," JAOS (1986); Vitality of the Lyric Voice, ed. S. Lin and S. Owen (1986); P. Yu, The Reading of Imagery in the Chinese Poetic Tradition (1987); R. Mather, The Poet Shen Yüeh (1988); K. Yoshikawa, Five Hundred Years of Chinese Poetry, 1150–1650, ed. J. T. Wixted (1989); M. Fuller, The Road to East Slope (1990); K. Chang, The Late-Ming Poet Ch'en Tzu-lung (1991); S. Van Zoeren, Poetry and Personality (1991); M. Yeh, Modern Chinese Poetry (1991); J. D. Schmidt, Stone Lake (1992); P. Rouzer, Writing Another's Dream (1993); R. Egan, Word, Image, and Deed in the Life of Su Shi (1994); E. Chou, Reconsidering Tu Fu (1995); J. Kowallis, The Lyrical Lu Xun (1996); J. Hightower and F. Yeh, Studies in Chinese Poetry (1998); J. Diény, Les poèmes de Cao Cao (2000); Columbia History of Chinese Literature, ed. V. Mair (2001); P. Kroll and D. Knechtges, Studies in Early Medieval Chinese Literature and Cultural History (2003); P. Varsano, Tracking the Banished Immortal (2003); D. Warner, A Wild Deer amid Soaring Phoenixes (2003); X. Tian, Tao Yuanming and Manuscript Culture (2005); S. Owen, The Late Tang and Making of Early Chinese Poetry (both 2006); G. Sanders, Words Well Put (2006); How to Read Chinese Poetry, ed. Z. Cai (2007); X. Tian, Beacon Fire and Shooting Star (2007); D. Bryant, The Great Recreation: Ho Ching-ming (1483–1521) and His World (2008); W. Swartz, Reading Tao Yuanming (2008).

J. Chen

SHIJING. The Chinese poetic trad. begins spectacularly with the Shijing (Classic of Poetry, also known as Book of Songs), usually dated ca. 1000–600 BCE. This places the formation of the text during the rule of the Zhou royal kingdom, a time long associated with the foundations of early Chinese culture. Although the anthol.'s origin is shrouded in mystery and legend, its materials must have passed through a long period of oral transmission before becoming recorded and fixed. Even after being written down, the poems no doubt circulated primarily in a culture of secondary orality: recited, quoted, and heard but not often read. Our earliest example of this circulation is in quotations from the Zuo zhuan where a poem, or a few lines, is applied freely to the political or rhetorical situation at hand—the Zuo zhuan is a collection of historical narratives from the 8th–5th c. BCE, although its compilation dates from somewhat later. Thus, not only is there no sense of authorship to these poems, but, at this early date, even their meanings were contingent on their application.

Judging from textual and archaeological evidence, the Shijing that we now have appears to represent the text as known in the late cl. period—the greatest variations were in the written forms of the individual words. Thus, although there are many issues with interpretation of the poems, the poem texts themselves appear to have been stable at least since the 3d c. BCE. This collection eventually became one of the five Confucian classics and set the bedrock of cl. Chinese poetry.

The 305 poems (shi*) that form the anthol. are clearly of one cloth in terms of lang. and *prosody: composed mostly in four-syllable lines with regular end rhyme and sharing lang. and *tropes throughout. Yet within the "three hundred poems," as the collection was traditionally called, there is represented a wide variety of voices, themes, forms, and settings. The collection presents no grand narrative or overarching political or religious vision, but rather offers materials that intersect with numerous cultural practices, personae, and social sites. We find liturgical hymns to the early kings, narratives of dynastic legends, poems of feasting, agricultural calendars, and most famously, ballads of love and hardship from across the feudal states. As a sample of that range consider these two short poems. The first is a brief prayer (perhaps a fragment) to the founding Zhou king, written in solemn, austere lang.:

Pure and luminous
Are the laws of King Wen, Founding the rites
That now still triumph,
These auspicious omens of the Zhou.

(268)

Compare this to a rural ballad of lost friendship played out in two short stanzas built entirely of *incremental repetitions:

If along the wide road
I catch hold of your sleeve,
Do not hate me for it.
Be not hasty with old friends.
If along the wide road
I catch hold of your hand,
Do not be mad at me.
Be not hasty with loved ones.

(81)

Between these extremes of prayers from the hallowed halls of the Zhou ancestral temple and songs along the dirt roads in the state of Zheng are embedded many poetic strata. Those strata are first clearly announced by shape of the anthol., which orders and labels three separate sections: the "Airs" (feng), the "Odes" (ya), and the "Hymns" (song). These sections are then subdivided into 15 sets of airs by feudal state (poems 1–160); two sections of the odes, called "Minor" and "Major" (161–234, 235–65, respectively); and the hymns (266–305) are divided between two royal houses and the state of Lu. This general shape is attested as early as 6th c. BCE; the specific order of the individual poems has been set at least since the 1st c. CE. Both traditional and mod. scholars have also detected here a chronological layering, with the airs being the latest addition to the collection and the hymns, esp. those associated with the Zhou royal house, the oldest.

The Shijing has long been associated with Confucius and his school of thought. In fact, in the 1st-c. BCE general history, Shiji by Sima Qian, Confucius is claimed to have been the editor of the text; he is said to have worked with 3,000 poems, from which he "eliminated the duplicates and selected texts that could be used with ritual propriety," extracting the 305 (Allen). While the shape of the collection clearly results from the effort of an editorial hand, it is far from clear it was actually that of Confucius. Nonetheless, he and his school held the "three hundred poems" in very high regard, both as pedagogical tools and as moral models. The orthodox hermeneutical trad. that emerged in the 1st c. CE, the so-called Mao school, developed readings of the poems along these lines, interpreting them as commentaries on the moral and political conditions during the Zhou feudal period. These readings are now often criticized as patent fabrications, but they dominated understanding of the poems up until the 12th c., when more social and literary interpretations came to the fore. Late imperial scholarship focused on the philological aspects of the text. In the 20th and 21st cs., readings of the poems, in both China and abroad, typically pursue these literary, philological, or anthropological understandings of the anthol. The Shijing is seen as a literary masterpiece and as a window onto ancient Chinese ling. and material culture.

See CHINA, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: The She King or the Book of Poetry, trans. J. Legge (1871); The Book of Odes, trans. B. Karlgren (1950); The Confucian Odes, trans. E. Pound (1954); The Book of Songs, trans. A. Waley and J. Allen (1996).

■ Criticism: M. Granet, Festivals and Songs of Ancient China, trans. E. Edwards (1932); W. Dobson, "Linguistic Evidence and the Dating of the Book of Songs," T'oung Pao 51 (1964); C. H. Wang, The Bell and the Drum (1974); P. Yu, "Allegory, Allegoresis, and the Classic of Poetry," HJAS 43 (1983); C. H. Wang, From Ritual to Allegory (1988); S. Van Zoeren, Poetry and Personality (1991); H. Saussy, The Problem of a Chinese Aesthetic (1993); J. Allen, "A Literary History of the Shi jing," The Book of Songs, ed. S. Allen (1996); E. Shaughnessy, Before Confucius (1997); S. Owen, "Reproduction in the Shijing (Classic of Poetry)," HJAS 61 (2001); Text and Ritual in Early China, ed. M. Kern (2005); L. Zhang, Allegoresis: Reading Canonical Literature East and West (2005).

J. ALLEN

SHINKOKINSHŪ. Shinkokinshū, a work of 1,978 poems divided into multiple books, was commissioned by the retired Japanese emperor Go-Toba and formally submitted in 1205, though poems continued to be added at least through 1208. The copy on which the text used today is based was completed in 1216.

Go-Toba had begun laying the groundwork in 1200. Over the next several years, he sponsored a series of poetry events (contests, hundred-poem sequences, etc.; see POETIC CONTESTS), often with themes, that yielded many poems for the collection. In 1201, he revived the Wakadokoro (Bureau of Poetry), which had been dormant for about 250 years, to provide a locus for poetic activity and research and editing of the anthol. From the outset, Go-Toba was determined to balance the two major factions (the Rokujō and Mikohidari houses) and to promote the careers of young poets who had no ties to either faction (e.g., Asukai Masatsune, Kunaikyō, etc.). The most dramatic example of this is the Sengohyakuban uta-awase (Poetry Contest in 1500 Rounds), in which 30 poets representing all the major poetic schools and political factions were invited to submit 100-poem sequences (hyakushu no uta) following a set pattern. Go-Toba then configured these 3,000 poems into a series of one-on-one matchups and farmed them out in sections to be judged by eight prominent poet-scholars, incl. Fujiwara Teika himself and his allies and rivals. He thus, in effect, picked the brains of the top literary talents of his age, and 90 poems from this contest ended up anthologized in Shinkokinshū.

Go-Toba's orchestration of not only the anthol. but of the many events connected to it was an early step in his attempt to revive the centrality of the imperial house in relation to the aristocratic families in Kyoto and to the growing influence of the Kamakura Bakufu. (His effort came to a head in the Jōkyū War of 1221, in which he was defeated and sent into exile for the remainder of his life.)

The title of the collection—"New Kokinshū*"—suggests a neoclassical program, and in fact, the collection is well known for the use in many of its poems of the techniques of honkadori, an allusive practice that borrows a phrase or line from an earlier poem but places it in a new, reconfigured context; and honzetsu, where the allusion is to an earlier prose work. Teika, his father, Fujiwara Shunzei, and many other poets in Shinkokinshū, drew particularly from the prose classics of the mid-Heian period, esp. Genji monogatari (Tale of Genji). In so doing, they were staking out new territory in competition with the other major poetic school of their day, the Rokujō house, which prided itself as expert in the 8th c. Man'yōshū* poetry collection and the older, strictly poetic trads. So part of what made Shinkokinshū "new" was its intertextual relationship with Heian prose, with particular attention to the courtship narrative that leads inevitably to separation, frustration, and loss. The poem below simultaneously alludes to a Kokinshū poem, a Chinese legend, and the final chapter of the Tale of Genji:

Haru no yo no
Yume no ukihashi
Todae shite
Mine ni wakururu
Yokogumo no sora

(On a spring night
The floating bridge of dreams
Is interrupted—
Trailing across the sky
Clouds parted by the mountain peak.)

(Fujiwara Teika, Shinkokinshū 38)

The structural relationship of Shinkokinshū to Kokinshū is readily apparent, with a similar focus on the three major types of poetry: Seasonal, Love, and Occasional (e.g., poems of celebration, parting, and so on). However, with Shinkokinshū, the distinctions between these categories begin to be blurred, with Teika himself stating that the best poems combine the elements from more than one category. Thus, from Shinkokinshū onward, the category known as Miscellaneous takes on ever greater significance.

Shinkokinshū has enjoyed high esteem in the post-Meiji *canon of cl. Japanese lit. but was less esteemed in its time. One mark against it was its association with a disgraced emperor (Go-Toba), whose fall was so complete that neither he nor his son Juntoku, who aided him in his restoration efforts and who was similarly exiled, has a single poem in the final version of the next imperial anthol. (Shinchokusenshū). (In fact, neither Go-Toba nor Juntoku was allowed to be buried in Kyoto—their tombs stand together in the village of Ohara north of the capital.) Teika's own descendants, who dominated the world of poetry for the next several centuries, also shunned Shinkokinshū, presumably because it was compiled by a committee rather than by Teika alone. On the other hand, scholars and readers from the Meiji period onward have valued its innovative approach, the layers of meaning achieved through *allusion and overlapping syntactical phrasing, and its relatively sad, lonely tone that suits subsequent devels. in Japanese arts and aesthetics, as exemplified by, e.g., the tea ceremony.

See JAPANESE POETICS, WAKA.

■ R. Bundy, "The Uses of Literary Tradition: The Poetry and Poetics of the Shinkokinshū," DAI 45 (1984); A. Hirota, "Ex-Emperor Go-Toba: A Study in Personality, Politics and Poetry," DAI 51 (1989); D. Bialock, "Voice, Text, and the Question of Poetic Borrowing in Late Classical Poetry," HJAS 54 (1994); R. Bundy, "Santai waka: Six Poems in Three Modes," Monumenta Nipponica 49, 2 pts. (1994); E. Kamens, "Utamakura," Allusion, and Intertextuality in Traditional Japanese Poetry (1997); R. Huey, The Making of Shinkokinshū (2002).

R. HUEY

SIAMESE POETRY. See THAILAND, POETRY OF.

SICILIAN OCTAVE (ottava siciliana or napoletana). An eight-line It. stanza rhyming abababab and composed of *hendecasyllables. It was generally used for amatory topics of a popular nature. The origin of this type of octave is unclear. According to some scholars, it existed early in the 13th c. in southern Italy and Sicily and influenced the invention of the *sonnet by serving as the model for its *octave, appearing in Tuscany (ottava toscana) only toward the end of that century. Others tend to place its origin in Tuscany and consider it, conversely, a derivation from the octave of the sonnet. The Sicilian octave never had the success that ottava rima enjoyed, although it remained in popular use through the 15th c., when it was replaced by the *madrigal.

See STRAMBOTTO.

■ Spongano; Wilkins; A. Balduino, "Pater semper incertus. Ancora sulle origini dell'ottava rima," Metrica 3 (1982); F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); Elwert, Italienische; P. G. Beltrami, La metrica italiana (2002).

L. H. GORDON; C. KLEINHENZ

SICILIAN SCHOOL. A loosely organized group of poets writing in the vernacular who were active at the court of the Hohenstaufen monarchs in Sicily during the first half of the 13th c. They flourished particularly under Frederick II and his son Manfred. Some 30 poets are associated with the Sicilian school; the majority of them were Sicilians, but a fair proportion came from the It. mainland, some from as far north as Tuscany. The major importance of the Sicilian poets is that they established It. as a literary lang. They show familiarity with the work of the Occitan troubadours, the northern Fr. trouvères, and the Ger. Minnesänger (see MINNESANG). The primarily amatory content of their work is derived from troubadour models, but unlike their northern It. contemporaries, they abandoned Occitan, the traditional lang. of the love *lyric, and wrote in their own tongue. Of almost equal importance is their formal achievement: they invented the sonnet, and they developed from Occitan, Fr., and Ger. models the distinctive structure of the canzone, the two most important lyric forms of It. poetry. The sonnet of the Sicilian school, as written by its presumed inventor Giacomo da Lentini and others, shows in some instances what would become the characteristic feature of the form, the distinctive separation into octave and *sestet. The octave always rhymes abababab, and the sestet is either cdecde or cdcdcd.

These first It. poets exerted a powerful effect on all subsequent It. lyric verse through their influence, both formal and thematic, on the Tuscan poets of the 13th and 14th cs., Guittone d'Arezzo, Guido Guinizzelli, Dante, and Petrarch. Indeed, their influence was ling. as well as literary: the occurrence of typically southern locutions in the Tuscan dialect, which became the standard literary lang. of Italy, may be traced to their example. The best of the Sicilian poets, in addition to da Lentini, are Guido delle Colonne, Pier delle Vigne, Giacomino Pugliese, and Rinaldo d'Aquino.

See CANSO; ITALIAN PROSODY; ITALY, POETRY OF; SESTINA; SICILIAN OCTAVE.

■ G. A. Cesareo, Le origini della poesia lirica e la poesia siciliana sotto gli Svevi, 2d ed. (1924); V. de Bartholomaeis, Primordi della lirica d'arte in Italia (1943); W. T. Elwert, Per una valutazione stilistica dell'elemento provenzale nel linguaggio della scuola poetica siciliana (1955); E. Kantorowicz, Frederick the Second, 1194–1250 (1957); E. H. Wilkins, The Invention of the Sonnet and Other Studies (1959); Poeti del Duecento, ed. G. Contini, 2 v. (1960); D. Mattalia, "La Scuola siciliana," I Minori (1961); Le Rime della scuola siciliana, ed. B. Panvini, 2 v. (1962–64); G. Folena, "Cultura e poesia dei siciliani," Le Origini e il Duecento, ed. E. Cecchi and N. Sapegno (1965); W. Pagani, Repertorio tematico della scuola poetica siciliana (1968); A. Fiorino, Metri e temi della scuola siciliana (1969); E. Pasquini and A. E. Quaglio, Le origini e la scuola siciliana (1971); T. C. Van Cleve, The Emperor Frederick II of Hohenstaufen (1972); Wilkins; M. Marti, "Siciliana, scuola," Enciclopedia dantesca, ed. U. Bosco, v. 5 (1978); R. Antonelli, Repertorio metrico della scuola siciliana (1984); C. Kleinhenz, The Early Italian Sonnet (1986); The Poetry of the Sicilian School, ed. and trans. F. Jensen (1986); Poeti alla corte di Federico II, ed. C. Ruta (2001); K. Mallette, The Kingdom of Sicily, 1100–1250 (2005); I poeti della scuola siciliana: v. 1. Giacomo da Lentini, ed. R. Antonelli; v. 2. Poeti della corte di Federico II, ed. C. Di Girolamo (2008).

A. PREMINGER; T.V.F. BROGAN; C. KLEINHENZ

SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER. This triad originated in a series of lectures Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913) gave at the University of Geneva from 1906 to 1911. These were compiled by colleagues on the basis of student notes and published in 1916 under the title Cours de linguistique générale. The phrase sign, signified, signifier encapsulates one of Saussure's core insights, namely, that the ling. sign (signe) consists of two interdependent and necessary elements: a concept or "signified" (signifié) and an "acoustic image" or "signifier" (signifiant).

At the turn of the 20th c., ling. involved above all the gathering of data for comparative historical research, most notably into the origins of IE lang. According to Saussure, this paradigm impeded the study of "Language" (langage), an "instrument of thought" involving social, physiological, psychological, and other factors, and of "language" (langue), a socially determined system of signs. Saussure set aside inquiries into "Language," too heterogeneous to lend itself to scientific analysis, and into parole, a term that is usually translated as "speech" and that refers to the potentially infinite number of individual ling. utterances. He investigated "language" instead, a distinct and homogeneous system better suited to scientific inquiry. In particular, he focused on synchronic lings., namely, the systematic study of lang. at a particular moment in time, thereby breaking with the prevailing, data-driven diachronic or historical model. Saussure further disallowed what he saw as the Western privileging of writing over speech. Describing writing as a mere representation of spoken lang., he defined lang. as sequences of phonemes, which are the smallest units of sound that a lang. can use in permutation to create meaning. (The list of phonemes varies from lang. to lang.: Eng., but not Fr., includes /θ/, as in "thaw," while Fr., but not Eng., includes the phoneme /œ/, as in œuf, Fr. for "egg."

Saussure's decisions allowed him to disentangle a paradox at the heart of the Western view of lang., divided between the Adamic ideal of a lang. characterized by a perfect correspondence between words and things and the realization that no necessary relationship obtains between words and extralinguistic objects. Traces of the Adamic model can be found in our initial surprise when we learn that a familiar term does not have an equivalent in a foreign lang.: "What do you mean, there is no word for 'dating'?" This reaction betrays a deep-seated tendency to think of lang. as a nomenclature, a list of words that are one-to-one matches to something extralinguistic. And yet, as anyone who has learned a foreign lang. knows, the relationship between word and thing is arbitrary. Both Eng. and Fr., e.g., have words that signify a substance made of milk curd: cheese and fromage. Clearly, nothing in the foodstuff in question demands that it be called "cheese" or "fromage."

Saussure was hardly first in noticing the arbitrariness of the sign, but he took this observation several steps further and made it a centerpiece of his theory. First, he noted that signs are always arbitrary, even in the case of *onomatopoeias—Eng. "cock-a-doodle-doo" and Fr. "cocorico" represent very distinct phonetic sequences—and "spontaneous" exclamations such as Engl. "ouch!" and Fr. "aïe!" Second, recognizing the arbitrary nature of the sign led him to define lang. as a set of conventions imposed on individual speakers. Specifically, meaning is possible only because lang. is a closed system of interdependent elements that have "linguistic value." Eng., for instance, grants ling. value to the sounds /θ/, /ð/, and /t/ since they permit speakers to distinguish between "thaw" and "though," "theme," and "team." Fr., by contrast, assigns no ling. value to either /θ/ or /ð/ but does, unlike Eng., include the phoneme /œ/, thereby making possible the difference between /œf/ ("oeuf") and /uf/ (ouf, "phew"). In short, signifiers only signify within a particular ling. system of differences: theme equals "not team," and vice versa, while "oeuf" equals "not ouf," and vice versa.

Ling. value also operates at the level of the signified. Consider, to use one of Saussure's examples, the Eng. sheep and mutton and the Fr. mouton. The signified <sheep> equals <not other farm animals> plus <not dead meat>. <Mutton> equals <not other kinds of meat>. <Mouton>, on the other hand, equals <not other farm animals and not other kinds of meat>. In other words, mouton can mean "sheep" but does not have the same value as <sheep>, in part because it does not have a differential relationship with another signified that parallels the difference between sheep and mutton. In short, lang. is an arbitrary system of agreed upon and recognizable differential values. These and only these generate meaning, or, as Saussure famously claimed, "[I]n language, there are only differences."

The impact of Saussure's work has extended far beyond the field of lings. It put semiotics at the heart of 20th-c. poetics. Along with *Russian formalism, it laid the groundwork for *structuralism and *poststructuralism. Finally, it accounts for the "linguistic turn" that dominated Western thought of the last decades of the 20th c. Indeed, as the bibliography indicates, Saussure's triad has crossed over into a wide array of areas of inquiry, from literary theory, philosophy, anthropology, and psychoanalysis to art hist., sociology, law, and economics.

See ÉCRITURE, ICONOLOGY, POSTMODERNISM, SEMANTICS AND POETRY, SEMIOTICS AND POETRY, TEXT.

■ Criticism: J. Culler, Ferdinand de Saussure (1976); P. J. Thibault, Re-reading Saussure (1996); The Cambridge Companion to Saussure, ed. C. Sanders (2004).

■ Saussure's Legacy: C. Lévi-Strauss, Structural Anthropology (1958), trans. C. Jacobson and B. G. Schoepf (1963); R. Barthes, Writing Degree Zero, trans. A. Lavers and C. Smith (1967); F. Jameson, The Prison-House of Language (1972); U. Eco, A Theory of Semiotics (1976); J. Derrida, Of Grammatology, trans. G. C. Spivak (1974), and Writing and Difference (1967), trans. A. Bass (1978); J. Kristeva, Desire in Language, trans. T. Gora, A. Jardine, and L. S. Roudiez (1980); T. Todorov, Introduction to Poetics, trans. R. Howard (1981); J. Baudrillard, For a Critique of the Political Economy of the Sign, trans. C. Levin (1981); J. Derrida, Margins of Philosophy, trans. A. Bass (1982); M. Foucault, This Is Not a Pipe, trans. J. Harkness (1983); P. Bourdieu, Distinction, trans. R. Nice (1984); A. J. Greimas, Structural Semantics, trans. D. McDowell, R. Schleifer, and A. Velie (1984), and On Meaning, trans. P. Perron and F. Collins (1987); R. Posner, Law and Literature (1988); J.-J. Goux, Symbolic Economies, trans. G. C. Gage (1990); M. Bal and N. Bryson, "Semiotics and Art History," Art Bulletin 73 (1991); Economics and Language, ed. W. Henderson, T. Dudley-Evans, and R. Backhouse (1993); L. Irigaray, To Speak Is Never Neutral, trans. G. Schwab (2002); J. Lacan, Écrits, trans. B. Fink (2006).

C. Labio

SIGNIFYING is a dominant satiric form in Af. Am. verbal expression that provides a basis for both poetry and literary reception, a procedure for speakers and poets and a program by which Af. Am. writers read and interpret one another (Gates). Signifying subsumes many other tropes (e.g., *metaphor, *metonymy, *catachresis) and has many tones, often ironic. It was nurtured significantly in Af. Am. vernacular poetic forms such as *toasts, *sagas, and *blues. There is a toast trad. known specifically as the signifying monkey poem, which treats all kinds of subjects satirically. Among the sagas, "Titanic Shine" is perhaps the best known. The blues is replete with signifying lines such as "Ain't a baker in town / Can bake a sweet jelly roll like mine" and "Take this hammer and carry it to my captain: / Tell him I'm gone." Although not restricted to poetry, the use of the signifying trad. in Af. Am. writing can be traced from the earliest poets such as Jupiter Hammon (b. 1711) through Paul Laurence Dunbar (1872–1906), Langston Hughes (1902–67), then to poets of the 1960s and after such as Haki Madhubuti (Don L. Lee; b. 1942), Sonia Sanchez (b. 1934), Nikki Giovanni (b. 1943), and June Jordan (1936–2002).

See African American poetry, satire.

■ C. Mitchell-Kernan, "Signifying," Motherwit from the Laughing Barrel: Readings in the Interpretation of Afro-American Folklore, ed. A. Dundes (1973); G. Smitherman, Talkin and Testifyin (1977); H. L. Gates Jr., "The Blackness of Blackness: A Critique on the Sign and the Signifying Monkey," Figures in Black (1987), and The Signifying Monkey (1988); K. Euell, "Signifyin(g) Ritual: Subverting Stereotypes, Salvaging Icons," African American Review 31 (1997); M. Marrouchi, Signifying with a Vengeance (2002)—postcolonial culture; A. Smith, "Blues, Criticism, and the Signifying Trickster," Popular Music 24 (2005).

E. A. Peters

SILLOI (Gr., "squint-eyed pieces," i.e., satirical verses). Title of a *hexameter poem in three books by Timon of Philus (fl. ca. 250 BCE) satirizing dogmatic philosophers. Such satirical verse had earlier been written, and perhaps invented, by Xenophanes of Colophon (ca. 570–475 BCE), the philosopher-poet who founded Eliatic philosophy. By late antiquity, five books of silloi had been credited to him, but only fragments survive. Both poets used to be referred to as sillographers. Silloi parodied not personalities but the doctrines of philosophers or their schools.

■ Pauly-Wissowa; C. Wachsmuth, Sillographi graeci (1885); Schmid and Stählin; CHCL, v. 1.

T.V.F. Brogan

SILVA. A Sp. poem in Italianate *hendecasyllables and *heptasyllables in which the poet makes strophic divisions at will, usually in unequal lengths, and rhymes most of the lines without set pattern, sometimes leaving a few lines unrhymed. Other meters may be used. The silva, introduced in the 16th c., is sometimes considered a form of Italianate canción* and called canción libre. Morley and Bruerton distinguish four types in Lope de Vega's silvas, which are also the types generally used by other poets: (1) "silva de consonantes, aAbBcCdD, etc.," which "could be called pareados [couplets] de 7 y 11"; (2) "sevens and elevens mixed irregularly, no fixed order of length or rime, some unrimed lines"; (3) "all elevens, the majority . . . rimed, not counting the final couplet, no fixed order, mostly pairs," some abab and abba; these "may approximate to sueltos [free-riming lines] or pareados [couplets] de 11"; (4) "sevens and elevens mixed irregularly, all rimes in pairs."

■ S. G. Morley and C. Bruerton, The Chronology of Lope de Vega's "Comedias" (1940); Navarro; C. J. Pagnotta, "La silva y su proyección en la escritura dramática de Lope de Vega," Actas del XVI Congreso de la Asociación Internacional de Hispanistas, ed. P. Civil and F. Crémoux (2007); L. Fernández Guillermo, "La silva en la tragedia del Siglo de Oro," Hacia la tragedia áurea, ed. F. de Armas et al. (2008); R. Cacho Casal, "The Memory of Ruins: Quevedo's Silva to 'Roma Antigua y moderna,'" RQ 62 (2009).

D. C. Clarke

SIMILE. A figure of speech most conservatively defined as an explicit comparison using like or as—e.g., "black, naked women with necks / wound round and round with wire / like the necks of light bulbs" (Elizabeth Bishop, "In the Waiting Room"). The function of the comparison is to reveal an unexpected likeness between two seemingly disparate things—in this case, the necks of tribal women and light bulbs. Simile is probably the "oldest readily identifiable poetic artifice in European literature" (Holoka), stretching back through Homer and Mycenaean epic poetry to Sumerian, Sanskrit, and Chinese.

Critics and theorists disagree over what distinguishes simile from factual comparisons on the one hand and *metaphor on the other. While some theorists argue that factual comparisons ("My eyes are like yours") and similes (such as Chaucer's "hir eyen greye as glas") differ only in degree, others argue that they differ in kind (a confusion that William Wordsworth successfully exploits in "Tintern Abbey" when he follows the "wreaths of smoke / Sent up, in silence" with "as might seem / Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods"). Similarly, some critics adhere to the traditional view that metaphor is a compressed simile, distinguishable from simile only in being an implicit rather than an explicit comparison (Miller), whereas others conclude that not all metaphors and similes are interchangeable, that metaphor is a "use of language," whereas comparison itself is a "psychological process" (Ortony). These questions have entered the domain of ling., where at least one theorist has argued in favor of a single "deep structure" of comparison, variously realized as either simile or metaphor, that is capable of distinguishing both similes from factual comparisons and also metaphors from mere copulative equations such as "My car is a Ford" (Mack). The latter solution supports a growing sense that simile may be marked not only by like or as but also by many other comparative markers, incl. verbs such as resemble, echo, and seem; connectives such as as if and as though; and phrases such as the way that (Darian). From this perspective, it seems likely that simile encompasses analogy, rather than being a discrete form of comparison. At the very least, the current exploration into the range of simile suggests that it may be a far more pervasive aspect of both lang. and perception than has previously been thought.

In Western culture, there has been a traditional prejudice against simile in favor of metaphor. Wheelwright suggests that this trad. begins with Aristotle, who judges simile inferior for two reasons: since it is longer than metaphor, it is "less pleasing" and since simile "does not affirm that this is that, the mind does not inquire into the matter" (Rhetoric 3.4.1406b). As Derrida has noted, "[T]here is no more classical theory of metaphor than treating it as an 'economical' way of avoiding 'extended explanations': and . . . of avoiding simile." The 20th c. was esp. rigid in privileging metaphor over simile. At least prior to post-structuralist crit., many 20th-c. critics and theorists heralded metaphor as a model for understanding lang., thought, and philosophy. Frye, e.g., regards simile as a "displaced" metaphor, which, for him, corresponds to the displacement of mythic identity into *naturalism. Only recently have a few critics begun to regard simile not just as "literary embellishment" but as "a tool for serious thinking, scientific and otherwise" that "transcribes a paradigm of the creative act itself, whether in poetry or physics" (Darian).

Despite the long denigration of simile by critics, poets have consistently used the simile. The earliest recorded Western lit., Sumerian, uses similes in virtually every genre (Kramer). Among them are similes that seem uncannily familiar, such as "as wide as the earth" and "as everlasting as the earth." Similes are used throughout the Rig Veda—e.g., "In the East the brilliant dawns have stood / Like posts set up at sacrifices" (Cook). Certainly, Homer uses similes, though his nearly formulaic ones (such as Thetis's rising out of the sea like a mist) hover somewhere between *epithet and metaphor; and in this regard, it is provocative that Aristotle allies "proportional metaphor, which contains an epithet" with comparisons (McCall). As Green has pointed out, Virgil's "characteristic trope" is the simile. Chaucer frequently turns to simile, esp. for humor, as when describing "hende Nicholas" as being "as sweete as is the roote / Of lycorys, or any cetewale." Shakespeare achieves *irony by negating conventional similes in "My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun."

Despite the prevailing 19th-c. emphasis on the *symbol, P. B. Shelley habitually turns to simile. In the "Hymn to Intellectual Beauty," the "unseen Power" visits > with as inconstant wing

> As summer winds that creep from > flower to flower,— > Like moonbeams that behind some > piny mountain shower,
> It visits with inconstant glance
> Each human heart and countenance;
> Like hues and harmonies of evening,—
> Like clouds in starlight widely > spread,—
> Like memory of music fled—

Equally curious—given the early 20th-c. bias in favor of *imagism that followed Ezra Pound's injunction to "use no unnecessary word" (and that encouraged the excision of similes)—is Wallace Stevens's increasing use of the simile in key passages of his poetry. He concludes his Collected Poems with "It was like / A new knowledge of reality," a simile that calls attention to the problematic relation between poetry and what it represents.

The most revered form of simile is the epic simile, a lengthy comparison between two highly complex objects, actions, or relations. Homer is credited with inaugurating the epic simile, there being no known simile before the Iliad of such length or sophistication as the following:

> As is the generation of leaves, so is that of > humanity.
> The wind scatters the leaves on the ground, but > the live timber > burgeons with leaves again in the season of spring > returning.
> So one generation of men will grow while another > dies.

While the epic simile may be used by Homer for contrast, digression, or thematic amplification, subsequent poets such as Virgil, Dante, Ludovico Ariosto, Edmund Spenser, and John Milton refine the device, making it integral to the structure of the epic. Later poets frequently resuscitate specific Homeric similes (Holoka), as does Virgil when comparing the "whole crowd" to the "forest leaves that flutter down / at the first autumn frost" (Aeneid 6.305–10), or as does Milton when describing Lucifer's "Legions" that "lay-intrans't / Thick as Autumnal Leaves that strow the Brooks / In Vallombrosa" (Paradise Lost 1.301–3).

See UPAMĀ.

■ H. Fränkel, Die homerischen Gleichnisse (1921); W. P. Ker, Form and Style in Poetry (1928); C. M. Bowra, Tradition and Design in the "Iliad" (1930); J. Whaler, "The Miltonic Simile," PMLA 46 (1931); Z. E. Green, "Observations on the Epic Simile in the Faerie Queene," PQ 14 (1935); Frye; K. Widmer, "The Iconography of Renunciation: The Miltonic Simile," ELH 25 (1958); C. S. Lewis, "Dante's Simile," Nottingham Medieval Studies 9 (1965); P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain, rev. ed. (1968); M. H. McCall, Ancient Rhetorical Theories of Simile and Comparison (1969); S. N. Kramer, "Sumerian Simile," JAOS 89 (1969); S. G. Darian, "Simile and the Creative Process," Lang&S 6 (1973);

D. Mack, "Metaphoring as Speech Act," Poetics 4 (1975); J. Derrida, "White Mythology," NLH 6 (1975); J. P. Holoka, "'Thick as Autumnal Leaves,'" Milton Quarterly 10 (1976); R. H. Lansing, From Image to Idea: The Simile in Dante's "Divine Comedy" (1977); G. A. Miller, "Images and Models, Simile and Metaphors," and A. Ortony, "The Role of Similarity in Simile and Metaphors," Metaphor and Thought, ed. A. Ortony (1979); J. N. Swift, "Simile of Disguise and the Reader of Paradise Lost," South Atlantic Quarterly 79 (1980); K. O. Murtaugh, Ariosto and the Classical Simile (1980); A. Cook, Figural Choice in Poetry and Art (1985); J. V. Brogan, Stevens and Simile: A Theory of Language (1986); S. A. Nimis, Narrative Semiotics in the Epic Tradition: The Simile (1987); S. J. Wolfson, "'Comparing Power': Coleridge and Simile," Coleridge's Theory of Imagination Today, ed. C. Gallant (1989); W. Prunty, Fallen from the Symboled World (1989); S. Glucksberg, Understanding Figurative Language (2001).

J. V. Brogan; H. Smith Richmond

SINCERITY. Derived from Lat. sincerus (clean or pure), the word sincerity entered Eng. in the early 16th c. and briefly retained the meaning of its cognate, so that, e.g., "sincere wine" denoted wine that was undiluted. But William Shakespeare uses sincerity exclusively to indicate the absence of duplicity or dissimulation, and by 1600, the term had assumed its mod. connotations. It was not until the end of the 18th c. that sincerity became a valued literary commodity. For William Wordsworth and the romantics, sincerity was an indication of literary excellence since it emphasized the necessity of a congruence between the poet's emotion and his utterance. Matthew Arnold ambitiously expanded the concept, adding to it a moral dimension, when he claimed that the *touchstone of great poetry was "the high seriousness which comes from absolute sincerity."

Much poetry and crit. of the 20th c., however, has questioned the fundamental values implied by the term. Donald Davie has suggested that W. B. Yeats's mask, Ezra Pound's persona, and T. S. Eliot's view of the poem as an impersonal, essentially dramatic structure rendered the question of the poet's sincerity "impertinent and illegitimate." Roughly contemporaneous with the high modernists, the New Critics in America propounded a methodology that emphasized the formalist analysis of textual features such as *imagery, structure, *meter, and *rhyme (see new criticism). These formal concerns, which foreground the verbal artistry and design of the work, were inimical to a concern with the poet and, hence, with the concept of sincerity; and during the first half of the 20th c., the term fell into disuse.

Henri Peyre, however, has suggested that sincerity involves far more than a mere "transposing of autobiographical data," and he accords the longevity of Jean-Jacques Rousseau's writings, particularly the Confessions, to his singleminded devotion to sincerity. Yet even literary cultures less obviously attracted by the ideals of sincerity are considered by Peyre to have confronted and resolved the issue. For the 16th-c. Fr. poets Joachim du Bellay, Pierre de Ronsard, Philippe Desportes, as well as for the Eng. poets the Earl of Surrey (Henry Howard), Philip Sidney, and Edmund Spenser, the critical issue involves not so much whether the poet achieves sincerity as how forcefully the poet, deploying the various conventions of the *sonnet sequence, gives the impression of sincerity. And Eliot's interest in John Donne's verse, which eschewed several ornamentations that had encumbered Elizabethan poetry, resulted simply from the tendency "to read more sincerity in wit than in pathos, in impudence than in adoration."

Much contemp. literary theory, however, has called into question even such an accommodating definition of the term. Deconstructive theories emphasize the perpetual *indeterminancy of meaning, in which scheme sincerity, which depends upon the congruency of feeling and avowal, has no value. *Reader-response crit. finds that there is *unity not "in the text but in the mind of the reader" (Holland) and that the question of meaning involves analysis of the reading process (see reader). For both types of critics, and for much of the linguistically oriented crit. of the late 20th c., the most pressing engagement available for critical discussion is the one between reader and text, not the one between author and text; and sincerity, which concerns the latter relation, is not a fundamental concern of these methodologies. But there is no reason to assume that crit. might not return to its earlier interest. The recognition of sincerity depends upon the reader's ability to evaluate the successful fulfillment within the work of the author's *intention, and E. D. Hirsch's seminal work, Validity in Interpretation, still represents one of the most formidable attempts in the latter half of the 20th c. to reestablish authorial intention as the guideline for accurate interpretation.

Although recent appearances of the term have tended to follow the traditional lines discussed above, commentators concerned with ethnography and race have used sincerity in opposition to the term "authenticity." In Real Black, e.g., John L. Jackson states that "sincerity and authenticity have very different ways of imagining the real . . . and so racial sincerity, which should not be confused with racial authenticity, exemplifies an epistemologically distinct rendering of race, identity, solidarity, and reality." These different renderings vary among cultures, races, and ethnicities, but the binary oppositions often associated with ethnographic description (objectivity vs. subjectivity, collectivities vs. individuals, e.g.) elucidate the opposition between sincerity and authenticity, where the former is often complicit with traditional power structures, while the latter often opposes and deconstructs them.

■ G. H. Lewes, "The Principle of Sincerity," The Principles of Success in Literature (1865); I. A. Richards, Practical Criticism (1929); H. Peyre, Literature and Sincerity (1963); P. M. Ball, "Sincerity: The Rise and Fall of a Critical Term," MLR 59 (1964); D. Perkins, Wordsworth and the Poetry of Sincerity (1964); E. D. Hirsch Jr., Validity in Interpretation (1967); D. Davie,

"On Sincerity: From Wordsworth to Ginsberg," Encounter (1968); P. M. Spacks, "In Search of Sincerity," CE 29 (1968); H. Read, The Cult of Sincerity (1969); J. Derrida, "Structure, Sign, and Play in the Discourse of the Human Sciences," The Structuralist Controversy, ed. R. Macksey and E. Donato (1972); L. Trilling, Sincerity and Authenticity (1972); L. Guilhamet, The Sincere Ideal (1974); N. Holland, "Recovering 'The Purloined Letter,'" The Reader in the Text, ed. S. Suleiman and I. Crosman (1980); J. P. Russo, I. A. Richards (1989), chap. 15; J. L. Jackson, Real Black: Adventures in Racial Sincerity (2005).

S. Burris

SINDHI POETRY. See INDIA, POETRY OF.

SINHALESE POETRY. See SRI LANKA, POETRY OF.

SIRVENTES. A poem in med. Occitan that is strophic in form but is not a canso* or *love poem. The main themes are politics and current events, incl. war and the Crusades, ad hominem attacks or (occasionally) praise, social and literary satire, or moralizing on the decline of society and standards of behavior. The tone is mostly satiric, and gross vituperation is common. In form, the sirventes came to be seen as a subservient, less original genre than the love song, and it became common practice to borrow the tune, meter, and even rhyme sounds of an existing canso for a new sirventes. (Paden explains the name sirventes as reflecting the fact that the genre is often the "servant" of the canso.) Later med. poetic treatises foreground this imitative dimension, although it is very unlikely that the poets themselves saw it as essential to the genre. The popularity of the sirventes increased from the end of the 12th c. as the formal and thematic dynamism of the love song declined.

See OCCITAN POETRY, TROUBADOUR.

■ D. Rieger, Gattungen und Gattungsbezeichnungen der Trobadorlyrik (1976); S. Thiolier-Méjean, Les Poésies satiriques et morales des troubadours du XIIe siècle à la fin du XIIIe siècle (1978); Chambers; M. Aurell, La Vielle et l'épée: Troubadours et politique en Provence au XIIIe siècle (1989); G. Gouiran, "Un genre à la jonction de l'histoire et de la littérature: Les sirventés (à partir de textes de Bertran de Born)," Histoire et littérature au Moyen Age, ed. D. Buschinger (1991); E. M. Ghil, "The Triumph of the Sirventes in Thirteenth-Century Troubadour Poetry," Medieval Perspectives 9 (1994); S. Thiolier-Méjean, La poétique des troubadours: Trois études sur le sirventes (1994); W. D. Paden, "Sirventes," Medieval France: An Encyclopedia, ed. W. W. Kibler (1995); C. Léglu, Between Sequence and Sirventes: Aspects of Parody in the Troubadour Lyric (2000).

F. M. Chambers; R. Harvey

SKELTONIC. A kind of poem named after its originator, the Eng. *poet laureate John Skelton (ca. 1460–1529). Skeltonic poems are distinguished by short lines and long stretches of *monorhyme, called leashes. End *rhymes are not crossed. Lines have between two and five stresses, although three-stress lines occur most frequently. *Alliteration abounds, and although he writes primarily in Eng., Skelton includes scraps of Lat. and Fr. occasionally as well (see MACARONIC, XENOGLOSSIA). The rhymes continue "as long as the resources of the language hold out," in Lewis's phrase; rhyme, rather than meaning, seems to drive the poems forward.

A vigorous vernacular form, Skeltonics served Skelton primarily for his *satires, which ranged in *tone from the lighter humor of The Book of Philip Sparrow to the fierce misogyny of The Tunning of Elinor Rumming to the moral strains of Colin Clout to the vicious ad hominem attacks of Why Come Ye Not to Court?, to name the works most pub. in the 16th c. and most anthologized now. Although involved in the courts of both Henry VII and VIII; laureated by Oxford, Cambridge, and Louvain; and a Catholic priest, Skelton was long linked with popular or even vulgar verse. George Puttenham in The Arte of English Poesie (1589) dismissed him as a "rude rayling rimer," part of which critique is in reaction to his use of "short distances and short measures, pleasing only the popular ear."

Scholars have not yet achieved a consensus on the origin of Skeltonics: they have been seen as deriving from various med. trads., incl. Lat. verse, Lat. rhyming prose, and the Catholic liturgy, among others. Scholars and critics since Skelton's time also dispute the value of the Skeltonic. Many, following Puttenham, have seen it simply as *doggerel. Mod. poets such as Robert Graves and W. H. Auden held the Skeltonic in higher esteem. Among mod. critics, Lewis sees it as fitting only when representing "immature or disorganized states of consciousness," while Fish sees it as a choice of blunt moral content over false eloquence.

Other than Skelton himself, poets have rarely used Skeltonics, although some Protestant reformers employed them soon after his death. Although Skelton was a Catholic priest hired by Cardinal Thomas Wolsey to write an anti-Protestant propaganda poem (Replycacion), his attacks on the Church made his poetry easily assimilable to the Protestant cause, and several Protestant satires were written in Skeltonics, incl. The Image of Hypocrisy (1534) and Vox Populi Vox Dei (1547).

See ENGLAND, POETRY OF; RENAISSANCE POETRY.

■ W. Nelson, John Skelton, Laureate (1939); C. S. Lewis, English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Excluding Drama (1954); S. Fish, John Skelton's Poetry (1965); A. Kinney, John Skelton: Priest as Poet (1987); G. Walker, John Skelton and the Politics of the 1520s (1988); J. Griffiths, John Skelton and Poetic Authority (2006).

R. Kaplan

SKOLION. A type of early Gr. lyric poetry, a drinking song. The etymology of the term is uncertain but perhaps derives from Gr. skolios (crooked): the guests at a symposium would sing in sequence, each holding a myrtle branch, then passing it to another at random—"crookedly." Trad. ascribes its origin to Terpander (fl. mid-7th c. BCE), who was the first to give it artistic form. Skolia could be purely extemporized pieces, excerpts from lyric poetry, or even selections from Homer. Its stanzas were composed of two *phalaeceans, a *colon of the form ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – – ⏑ ⏑ – and another with – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – repeated. The skolion was accompanied by the lyre or flute and dealt with historical events, expressed deep personal feeling, or made a trenchant comment on daily life. In the course of the 5th c., it was considerably simplified.

■ R. Reitzenstein, Epigramm und Skolion (1893); W. Aly, "Skolion," Pauly-Wissowa, 2.5.558–66; Schmid and Stählin; Maas; A. M. Dale, Collected Papers (1969); Michaelides; West; G. Lambin, "L'origine du skolion," Eranos 91 (1993); V. Liapis, "Double Entendres in Skolia: The Etymology of Skolion," Eranos 94 (1996).

P. S. Costas; T.V.F. Brogan

SLAM, POETRY. See POETRY SLAM.

SLANG. See DICTION.

SLAVIC POETICS. See BOSNIAN POETRY; CROATIAN POETRY; CZECH POETRY; POLAND, POETRY OF; RUSSIA, POETRY OF; SERBIAN POETRY; SLOVENIAN POETRY.

ŚLEṢA (Sanskrit, "embrace"). Technically speaking, śleṣa is a literary device or "ornament" (alaṃkāra), one of many in the poet's tool kit. Authorities on Sanskrit poetics define it as a case of two sets of meanings (or two sets of signifiers, each with its own meaning) in "embrace," yielding a single, simultaneous utterance. Consider an illustration by the poet and theorist Daṇḍin (fl. 700 CE): "Here's a king who has risen to the top. / He's radiant, his surrounding circle glows, / and the people love him for his levies, / which are light." This verse depicts moonrise as a king's rise to power, by juxtaposing homonyms that lend themselves to the portrayal of both (e.g., kara denotes both "rays" and "taxes"). This sort of śleṣa is potentially translatable, if similar homonyms are found in the target lang. But Sanskrit poets developed a far more sophisticated repertoire of ling. embraces that can be reproduced only by a mere pair of parallel "translations." These include exploiting phonetic, morphological, and syntactic *ambiguities to create oronyms: strings of sounds that can be differently segmented into words. A simple example is nakṣatra, which can be taken as a single word (meaning "planet") or carved into two (na = "no," and kṣatra = "warrior"). Thus, this short utterance supports another simultaneous depiction of the moon (which "resides among the planets") and a king (who "fails to follow the warrior's path") by Daṇḍin.

This technical definition, however, ignores śleṣa's central role in defining a large and self-conscious literary movement in South Asia. Starting around the 6th c. CE, Sanskrit authors began to experiment extensively with simultaneity, using śleṣa to describe kings and gods concurrently (in royal eulogies), estrange poetic protocols by linguistically "embracing" unconventional pairs (as in Subandhu's 6th-c. Vāsavadattā), depict both the hidden and apparent sides of disguised characters (as in Nītivarman's Kīcakavadha, ca. 600), and conarrate India's major epics, the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata, in a manner that highlights their meaningful ties (as in a lost work by Daṇḍin, ca. 700, and Dhanañjaya's Dvisandhānakāvya, ca. 800). This literary movement boomed in the first centuries of the second millennium CE: prominent examples include Kavirāja's conarration of the epics in his Rāghavapāṇḍavīya and the concurrent depiction of Nala and the divinities impersonating him in Śrīharṣa's Naiṣadhacarita, both composed in the 12th c. The boom coincided with the extensive production of special lexicons and guidebooks catering to the needs of śleṣa poets and readers. Starting around the 1600s, this movement carried over to India's regional langs., most prominently Telugu and Tamil (see TELUGU POETRY, TAMIL POETRY AND POETICS). Śleṣa also existed in other artistic media, such as sculpted narrative panels. Even in Sanskrit poetics proper, śleṣa resisted being encapsulated as a mere device, and Daṇḍin himself argued that it replicates—and in that sense defines—the entire spectrum of poetic expressivity.

See POLYSEMY, SANSKRIT POETICS, SANSKRIT POETRY.

■ Y. Bronner, Extreme Poetry: The South Asian Movement of Simultaneous Narration (2010).

Y. Bronner

SLOVAKIA, POETRY OF. Poetry in Slovakia has evolved amid overlapping lang. trads., incl. Lat., Hungarian, Czech, and Ger. Since the reign of St. Stephen (977–1038), Upper Hungary—today's Slovakia—has been within the orbit of the Western Church. Czech and Slovak speech forms are very closely related, and earlier Slovak writing adhered in general to broadly Czech-derived ling. norms.

Earlier surviving compositions include Lat. humanist works, vernacular *ballads of love and war, and much *devotional poetry. From 1526 until the later 17th c., the Turks occupied much of Hungary. Some anonymous Slovak *love poetry recorded in 1604 is linked by affinity to the Hungarian poet Bálint Balassi (1554–94). Vernacular hymnography is represented esp. by Tranoscius (1636), named for its Lutheran Czech compiler, Jiří Třanovský (1592–1637). Love poems include "Obraz pani krásnej, perem malovaný" (Picture of a Beautiful Lady, Painted by the Pen, 1701), by a law student, Štefan Selecký (fl. 1700). A long moralizing cycle of 17,000 lines, Valašská škola—mravov stodola (Wallachian School—Garner of Morals, 1755) was composed by the Franciscan Hugolín Gavlovič (1712–87). Traditional song and balladry abounded, and the story of Juraj Jánošík, a Robin Hood-like bandit figure in 1711–13, captured, and hung from one of his ribs, became a favorite national theme.

A standardized West Slovak produced under the modernizing Hapsburg emperor Joseph II (1780–90) by the Catholic priest Anton Bernolák (1762–1813) was short lived. Its outstanding poet, the father of mod. Slovak poetry, was another priest, Ján Hollý (1785–1849), who translated Virgil's Aeneid (1828) and composed, in quantitative *hexameters, some cl.-style historical *epics, most notably Svatopluk (1833). His Theocritan *pastoral verse produces a fresh fusion of cl. and vernacular idiom. As a writer in Czech, Jan Kollár (1793–1852), a Protestant pastor and proponent of pan-Slavism, produced a celebrated and monumental *sonnet cycle Slávy dcera (Daughter of Slavia, 1824, 1832), with a sonorous prologue in quantitative elegiac *couplets, lamenting past oppression. The poet's beloved Mína metamorphoses into a Slav goddess's daughter; a pilgrimage traverses the Slav lands, then goes, Dante-style, into a Slavic Lethe and Acheron. Kollár's sonnets (and most later Slovak poetry) use stress-based meters. (Slovak has first-syllable word stress, like Czech, though premod. verse was generally syllabic.)

In the 1840s, Lutherans led by Ľudovít Štúr (1815–56) derived a new standard Slovak from central dialects, fundamentally today's variety (Kollár was antagonistic). Like Herder, Štúr stressed native originality. Poetry, the highest product of the spirit, should take folk song as a starting point, not its goal. Štúr's group energized Slovak poetry. In the revolutionary year of 1848, Janko Kráľ (1822–76) exhorted the villagers to overthrow their landowners. Incarcerated briefly, he then involved himself with pro-Hapsburg volunteers, entered government service after 1849, and virtually ceased writing. In his best work (sharply analyzed by Jakobson), folk idiom combined with a solitary central figure, divný Janko (weird Janko)—aspiring eagle-like to soar to freedom but relapsing into suicidal melancholy. Pastor Andrej Sládkovič (1820–72) wrote his lyrical-narrative masterpiece Marína (1846) in ten-line, sonnet-like stanzas, inspired by unhappy love. Where, for Kollár, erotic and patriotic love are divided, here they harmonize. Love is no mere sensual adventure of youth: it is a divine gift, enabling Hegelian transcendence, harmonizing body and mind, embracing truth through beauty. Ján Botto (1827–76) is most celebrated for his balladic Smrť Jánošíkova (Jánošík's Death, 1862). Tension between fairy-tale-like, messianic visions, and gloomy near-realism places freedom's ideals apart from the human world—where a chasm divides the bandit's dream world from the impassive peasantry.

Post-1867 Hungarian autonomy closed some Slovak high schools, giving the Hungarian lang. preference in education. Pavol Országh Hviezdoslav (1849–1921), a lawyer, became a prolific, preeminent poet. In Hájnikova žena (The Gamekeeper's Wife, 1884–86), Hanka kills her would-be rapist, a corrupted aristocrat. The life of the seasons blends with the life of the forest—fetching water, felling trees, picking raspberries, hunting deer, looking at the night stars, the woodland torrent crashing like chains, "which however does not bind, does not fetter legs, or spirit, does not confine in its circle the spirit which flew like an eagle in between the hills, to sate itself with freedom, and feel that it is spirit." Hviezdoslav's Parnassian diction pursues dense textures (see PARNASSIANISM). His Krvavé sonety (Sonnets of Blood, 1919) laments the madness of war, doubting divine justice, ending with hope. Svetozár Hurban-Vajanský (1847–1916), another lawyer and twice-imprisoned newspaper ed., combines realistic and nationalistic notes in his collection Tatry a more (The Tatras and the Sea, 1879). The pre-1914 Moderna group, close to *symbolism, had, as its major poet, Ivan Krasko (1876–1958), with two collections, Nox et solitudo (1909) and Verše (1912), of musically refined, often ostensibly simple (but enigmatic) lyricism, evoking landscapes of loneliness, melancholy, pessimism, hesitation, in mistily defined (often erotic) situations; Christianity functions here nostalgically, evoking trad. or collapsed values.

The Slovak lang. dominated after Czechoslovakia's creation in 1918. Emil Boleslav Lukáč (1900–79), pastor and parliamentary deputy, evolved from home-and-abroad meditations into tersely agonized erotic and reflective verse and castigatory treatment of social themes. Ján Smrek (1898–1982) established himself as a vitalist and deftly lyrical eroticist. Valentin Beniak (1894–1973) was a more enigmatic word spinner. His topics involve rural hardship, trad. and beauty, existential disharmony, artistic themes of France and Italy, apocalyptic war, with stimuli from symbolism, Czech poetism, *surrealism, and folklore. Ladislav Novomeský (1904–76), a communist of the DAV (Throng) group, although skeptical about poetry's public role, wrote associative, playful, gently melancholy, reminiscing, social, and personal avant-garde verses, loosely related to Czech poetism. Later, he recalled his 1952 incarceration as a "bourgeois nationalist" (rehabilitated 1962) but reaffirmed his socialism. Surrealism's chief voice was Rudolf Fabry (1915–82), with arresting imagery and phrases, e.g., in Vodné hodiny piesočné (Water Sandglass, 1938). Slovak Nadrealismus (suprarealism) also espoused antifascism.

Leading post-1945 and post-Stalinist names include Miroslav Válek (1927–91) and Milan Rúfus (1928–2009). Women have now become more prominent: Maša Haľamová (1908–95), the intimate Viera Prokešová (b. 1957), the sexually provocative Tatjana Lehenová (b. 1961), and the complex, psychologically probing Mila Haugová (b. 1942). In the bilingual volume Six Slovak Poets (2010), Haugová is placed alongside Ján Buzássy (b. 1935), Ivan Štrpka (b. 1941), Peter Repka (b. 1944), and Kamil Peteraj (b. 1945)—poets all variously meditative, inward, complex, elusive, or cryptic—as well as the younger Daniel Hevier (b. 1955), representing a more humorous poetic streak.

■ Anthologies and Translations: J. Botto, The Death of Jánošík, trans. I. J. Kramoris (1944); Anthology of Slovak Poetry, trans. I. J. Kramoris (1947); The Linden Tree, ed. M. Otruba and Z. Pešat (1963); P. O. Hviezdoslav, A Song of Blood: Krvavé sonety, trans. J. Vajda (1972); Janko Kráľ 1822–1972, trans. J. Vajda (1972); Anthology of Slovak Literature, ed. A. Cincura (1976); Not Waiting for Miracles: Seventeen Contemporary Slovak Poets, trans. J. Sutherland-Smith, V. Sutherland-Smith, Š. Allen (1993); M. Válek, The Ground beneath Our Feet, trans. E. Osers (1996); J. Buzássy, Melancholy Hunter, trans. J. Sutherland-Smith and V. Sutherland-Smith (2001); M. Haugová, Scent of the Unseen, trans. J. Sutherland-Smith and V. Sutherland-Smith (2003); In Search of Beauty: An Anthology of Contemporary Slovak Poetry in English, trans. J. Sutherland-Smith and J. Bajánek (2003); L. Novomeský, Slovak Spring, trans. J. Minahane (2004); M. Rúfus, And That's the Truth, trans. E. Osers, J. Sutherland-Smith, V. Sutherland-Smith (2006); Six Slovak Poets, trans. J. Minahane (2010).

■ Criticism and History: R. Jakobson, "The Grammatical Structure of Janko Král's Verses," Sborník filozofickej fakulty Univerzity Komenského 16 (1964); S. Šmatlák, Hviezdoslav: A National and World Poet (1969); P. Brock, The Slovak National Awakening (1976); G. J. Kovtun, Czech and Slovak Literature in English: A Bibliography, 2d ed. (1988); The Everyman Companion to East European Literature, ed. R. Pynsent and S. Kanikova (1993); Traveller's Literary Companion to Eastern and Central Europe, ed. J. Naughton (1995); P. Petro, History of Slovak Literature (1996); V. Petrík, Slovakia and Its Literature (2001).

J. Naughton

SLOVENIAN POETRY. Brižinski spomeniki (Monuments of Freising, ca. 10th c.), a semipoetic trans. of three religious texts into Slovenian, are the oldest recorded documents in the Lat. alphabet in any mod. Slavic lang. Not until the Protestant era many centuries later was the first poem proper written in Slovenian. Primož Trubar (1508–86) paved the way for the Slovene literary lang. with his composition of several original religious poems.

The first to write poetry of artistic value was the Franciscan friar Valentin Vodnik (1758–1819). But during the romantic period, France Prežeren (1800–49) developed Slovenian to as yet unequalled artistic heights. He is still considered the greatest Slovenian poet; he played an important role in establishing the Slovenian nation and is the author of the Slovene *anthem.

The poetry of Simon Jenko (1835–69) marks the transition from late romantic poetry to the work of four modernist poets of the late 19th c.: Oton Župančič (1878–1949), Josip Murn (1879–1901), Dragottin Kette (1876–99), and Ivan Cankar (1876–1918), who later become the leading Slovenian writer.

*Expressionism became the leading influence in the early 20th c., giving rise to revolutionary poetry during World War II. Numerous poets, incl. the apocalyptic Miran Jarc (1900–42), Edvard Kocbek (1904–81), Božo Vodušek (1905–78), and Lojze Krakar (1926–95), later joined by the revolutionary poets Matej Bor (1913–93) and Karel Destovnik Kajuh (1922–44), became strong social critics, while France Balantič (1921–43), a devout Catholic, died battling the partisan resistance.

The two leading 20th-c. Slovenian poets are Srečko Kosovel (1904–26) and Edvard Kocbek. Kosovel reached the peak of his short but creative life in his avant-garde constructivist poetry, published over 40 years after his death in 1926 (see CONSTRUCTIVISM). Kocbek suffered under the post-World War II regime because of his dissident views, but his poetry of cosmic energy and vision never voiced complaints.

Postwar poets faced the political suppression of free speech. The work of such poets as Jože Udovič (1912–86), Dane Zajc (1929–2008), Gregor Strniša (1930–70), Kajetan Kovič (b. 1931), Veno Taufer (b. 1933), Saša Vegri (1934–2010), Niko Grafenauer (b. 1940), and Svetlana Makarovič (b. 1939) became intimate, full of double meanings, and surrealistic imagery (see SURREALISM).

The next generation of poets—incl. Franci Zagoričnik (1933–97), Tomaž Šalamun (b. 1941), Iztok Geister (b. 1945), Andrej Brvar (b. 1945), Aleš Kernmauner (1946–66), Andrej Medved (b. 1947), Matjaž Hanžek (b. 1949), and Ivo Volarič-Feo (1948–2010)—deconstructed the semantic use of the word and turned it into a graphic or textual element. This poetic transformation paralleled political changes that allowed poets to explore their newly discovered freedom of expression. The new formalists Milan Dekleva (b. 1946), Ivo Svetina (b. 1948), Milan Jesih (b. 1950), and Boris A. Novak (b. 1953) went back to cl. poetic forms, while the generation of Vojko Gorjan (1949–75), Marjan Strojan (b. 1949), Jure Detela (1951–92), Iztok Osojnik (b. 1951), and Vladimir Memon (1953–80) clung to *free verse, insisting rather on a radical ethical stance.

Since the 1980s, there have been two poetic trends: the postmodernists Tone Škrjanec (b. 1953), Aldo Žerjal (b. 1957), Brane Mozetič (b. 1958), Aleš Debeljak (b. 1961), Alojz Ihan (b. 1961), Uroš Zupan (b. 1963), Peter Semolič (b. 1967), Primož Čučnik (b. 1971), Miklavž Komelj (b. 1973), Aleš Šteger (b. 1973), and Gregor Podlogar (b. 1974); and a group of women poets representing the strongest creative force in contemp. Slovene poetry, incl. Meta Kušar (b. 1952), Maja Vidmar (b. 1961), Tatjana Soldo (1962–92), Barbara Korun (b. 1963), Taja Kramberger (b. 1970), and Lucija Stupica (b. 1971).

■ Anthologies: Iz roda v rod duh išče pot, ed. J. Menart (1962); Afterwards Slovenian Writing, 1945–1995, ed. A. Zawacki (1999); The Imagination of Terra Incognita, ed. A. Debeljak (1999); Nova slovenska lirika, ed. R. Dabo (2002); "Unlocking the Aquarium: Contemporary Writing from Slovenia," ed. F. Sampson, A. Jelnikar, I. Osojnik, Orient Express 5 (2004)—special iss.; Nevihta sladkih rož, Antologija slovenske poezije 20. stoletja, ed. P. Kolšek (2006).

■ Criticism and History: B. Paternu, Od ekspresionizma do postmoderne (1965); Slovenska književnost, Leksikon Cankarjeve založbe, ed. K. Dolinar et al. (1982); J. Pogačnik, Twentieth-Century Slovene Literature, trans. A. Čeh (1989); B. A. Novak, "Poetry in the Slovene Language," trans. A. McDonell Duf, Left Curve 22 (1997), http://www.leftcurve.org/LC22WebPages/slovene.html; Slovenska književnost I, II, III, ed. J. Pogačnik and F. Zadravec (1998–2000); M. Mitrovič, Geschichte der slowenischen Literatur (2001); D. Poniž, Beseda se vzdiguje v dim, stoletje slovenske lirike 1900–2000 (2000); I. Popov Novak, Sprehodi po slovenski književnosti (2003).

■ Web Sites: Slovenia, Poetry International Web, http://slovenia.poetryinternationalweb.org/piw_cms/cms/cms_module/index.php?obj_id=23.

I. Osojnik

SMITHY POETS (Rus. Kuznitsa). A group of proletarian writers in the Soviet Union (1920–31) that published the jours. Kuznitsa (The Smithy, 1920–22) and Rabochii zhurnal (Workers Journal, 1924–25). Their poetry depicted collective labor, mechanization, and industrialization; they eschewed traditional rhythms and forms. The prevailing view considers their work crude and naïve. The group's prominent poets included Vasilii Aleksandrovskii, Vasilii Kazin, Vladimir Kirillov, Grigorii Sannikov, and Sergei Obradovich, among others. From the mid-1920s, the group was dominated by prose writers.

■ G. Z. Patrick, Popular Poetry in Soviet Russia (1929); A. Voronskii, "Prozaiki i poety Kuznitsy," Literaturno-kriticheskie stat'i (1963); E. J. Brown, The Proletarian Episode in Russian Literature 1928–1932 (1971); Terras; N. N. Skatov, Russkaia literatura XX veka: slovar' (2005).

W. E. Harkins; C. Doak

SOMALI POETRY. Poetry is at the core of Somali expressive culture and, until relatively recently, was composed, memorized, and disseminated in purely oral form. There are many genres, some folkloric in nature, such as work songs that accompany rural activities like watering camels, weaving mats, or loading camels. These songs may be widespread, but the original composer is no longer known. They are short and are often performed in sequence; furthermore, they may be changed by anyone who wishes to do so. They may also be composed to convey messages allusively to people within earshot to whom the performer might not be able to present his or her thoughts directly. Of the dance-song genres, such as dhaanto and wiglo, some are specific to certain areas of the Somali-speaking territories. These may be composed during the performance of a dance, and traditionally light-hearted competition in poetry between young men and women in such dances may occur. The generic term used for the work and dance songs is hees, although this term is now mostly used for mod. songs performed to musical accompaniment. Other genres, which are regarded as more prestigious, are those belonging to the classification sometimes referred to in Somali as maanso. These are poetic works of which the composer is known and of which, following the original recitation by the poet, the goal is to memorize them verbatim, which means that for each such poem there is a definitive text. Traditionally, all forms were performed to a particular type of tune (luuq), although this is much less common for maanso genres such as gabay and geeraar. One genre known as buraambur is used exclusively by women in a variety of contexts.

The earliest known Somali poems date from the middle of the 19th c. Some of the most famous are those of Raage Ugaas Warfaa, who is regarded as one of the greatest Somali poets and who composed on a range of subjects, such as the famous "Alleyl Dumay" (Night Has Fallen), a lament after the poet's fiancée married another. In the early 20th c., Sayid Maxamed Cabdille Xasan, the leader of the Dervish movement that fought the imperial powers in the northern areas, used poetry as a powerful tool for influence and propaganda. The use of poetry in the sociopolitical domain remained important. Some time after the defeat of the Sayid in 1921, a poet named Cali Dhuux composed an *invective poem addressing a particular lineage, which was replied to by a poet from that lineage, Qammaan Bulxan. Others then also joined in, and a poetic chain (silsila) ensued known as Guba, which became widely known. Such chains still occur every so often; some have been conducted via the Internet.

During the 1940s, a new form, the heello, developed out of another form known as belwo. Initially these were predominantly love poems and were also the first to be performed to musical accompaniment after Cabdullaahi Qarshe introduced the oud, a stringed instrument, to Somali culture and became one of the most important composers, not just of the music but of the poems. The heello subsequently developed into an important vehicle for nationalist poetry as part of the Somali struggle for independence, which was assisted by the introduction of radio as a further means of dissemination to a wider audience. It was at this time that theater began in Somalia. Plays were based on poetic texts composed by the playwright and then memorized by the actors, who would improvise the connecting parts in prose. Some parts of plays were sung to musical accompaniment as songs and became popular in their own right. After Somalia became independent in 1960, the heello developed into the mod. hees, which became the dominant form during the 1970s, a time when a number of famous young poets pioneered further devels., such as the use of traditional work song and children's song metrical patterns in serious poetry. Poetry became important politically both in support of and in opposition to the military regime that came to power in a coup in 1969.

All Somali poetry conforms to two stylistic requirements: *meter and *alliteration. The pattern of alliteration is such that every line in a poem, or every half line in certain genres, must contain a word beginning with the same sound, as in this extract from "Beledweyne" by Maxamed Ibraahim Warsame 'Hadraawi' (nicknames are widely used in Somali and are given throughout this entry in single quotation marks), in which the alliterative sounds are in italics: "webigoo *b*utaacoo / *b*eeraha waraabshoo / dhulka *b*aadku jiifshoo / dhirta ubaxu *b*uuxshoo" (as the river overflowed / watering the farms / the pasture lay on the ground / the flowers filled the trees). The alliterative sound is always the word's initial, and just the one sound is used throughout the poem. A poem may also alliterate in alif, which means that there must be a word beginning with a vowel in each line; any vowel may be used, in the short or long pronunciation. Alliteration is so important that it is used in naming characters in plays, in proverbs, even occasionally in naming children. In chain poems, mentioned above, the alliteration of each poem within the chain is most often the same; the Siinley chain of the early 1970s and Deelley of 1979–80 (both important chains of political poems) were named after the alliterative sound used in the poems. Certain sounds are considered more difficult than others depending on the number of words that begin with that sound; alif, b, or d are regarded as easier to compose in than n or j, with y probably the most difficult and recognized as such.

Meter in Somali poetry is quantitative and based on the patterning of long and short vowel syllables and syllable final consonants, which was first written about by the poet and scholar Maxamed Xaashi Dhamac 'Gaarriye' in 1976. The jiifto meter is the one most commonly used in mod. hees poetry, and its metrical patterning is presented here as an example of how the system works. In the basic pattern, ⏑⏑ is a metrical position in which either one long or two short vowel syllables may occur, and ⏑ indicates an obligatory short vowel syllable:

(⏑) ⏑⏑ (⏑) ⏑⏑ ⏑ ⏑⏑ ⏑⏑

A short optional vowel syllable might be found at the beginning of the line or after the first metrical position when the following syllable has a long vowel (only one optional syllable is allowed). Syllable final consonants can occur at the end of metrical positions; but when a position of the type ⏑⏑ is realized as two short vowel syllables, then the first of these syllables may contain a final consonant only in the first metrical position. E.g., the word dhulka (the earth, ground) may be found in the first metrical position, as in dhulka baad ku jiifshoo, but not in the other three positions of the shape ⏑⏑. The position in which a syllable final consonant may occur is also the only position in which a word break may occur and, hence, where the alliteration also occurs. Geminate or doubled consonants are always analyzed as heterosyllabic, so these also may only occur in these positions as do the consonants sh, s, f, t, k, j, w, and y, which behave in the meter as geminate consonants. A large number of metrical patterns are associated with particular genres of poetry. *Free verse never emerged in Somali, although some Somali poetry, particularly that of Cabdi Muxumed Aamiin, seems to use patterning that does not follow the accepted meters; this poetry was composed to be sung to musical accompaniment, however. The demands of meter and alliteration are used artistically by good poets as extra raw material with which to enhance their poems aesthetically, a characteristic that brings value to poetry in the mind of the audience.

■ B. W. Andrzejewski and I. M. Lewis, Somali Poetry: An Introduction (1964); J. C. Ciise, Diwaanka Gabayadii Sayid Maxamed Cabdulle Xasan (1974); J. W. Johnson, Heellooy Heelleellooy: The Development of the Genre Heello in Modern Somali Poetry (1974); S. S. Samatar, Oral Poetry and Somali Nationalism (1982); Literature in African Languages, ed. B. W. Andrzejewski et al. (1985); Poesia orale somala: storia di una nazione, ed. F. Antinucci and A. F. Cali 'Idaajaa' (1986); A. C. Abokor, Somali Pastoral Work Songs (1993); An Anthology of Somali Poetry, trans. B. W. Andrzejewski with S. Andrzejewski (1993); G. Banti and F. Giannattasio, "Music and Metre in Somali Poetry," and J. Johnson, "Musico-Moro-Syllabic Relationships in the Scansion of Somali Oral Poetry," Voice and Power: The Culture of Language in North East Africa, ed. R. J. Hayward and I. M. Lewis (1996); M. Orwin, "On Consonants in Somali Metrics," Afrikanistische Arbeitspapiere 65 (2001), and "On the Concept of 'Definitive Text' in Somali Poetry," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 63 (2003); War and Peace: An Anthology of Somali Literature, ed. R. S. Cabdillaahi 'Gadhweyne' (2009); "Night Has Fallen," trans. M. Orwin, http://pacoarts.com/PoetLangSite/flashpaper/raage1.swf.

M. Orwin

SONG (Lat. carmen, Fr. chanson, Ger. Lied). Song refers broadly to the combined effect of music and words in a composition meant to be heard as music rather than read silently. Music, in addition to being the vehicle of transmission, frequently reinforces or enhances the emotional force of the text as perceived by the composer of the musical setting. While some songs are dramatic, song is distinguished from extended compositions involving music and text (such as opera) by its relative brevity. Since most songs are poems set to music, by extension any poem that is suitable for combination with music or is expressive in ways that might be construed as musical may also be referred to as song, and occasionally song is used to designate a strictly musical composition without text, deemed "poetic" in its expressivity or featuring markedly "vocal" melodic writing for instruments. From the musical standpoint, song has been restricted almost exclusively to musical settings of verse; experiments in setting prose have been very limited. Further, song has usually been reserved for compositions for solo voice or a small group of voices (typically one or two voices to a part) rather than a full choir and for voice(s) alone or in combination with one or two instruments rather than a full orchestra. In any case, the resulting balance, favoring the audibility of the text and thus appreciation of the nuances of its combination with music, is a defining characteristic of the genre; for literary purposes, these characteristics have also fostered perception of song as personal utterance projecting a limited emotional stance experienced by a single *persona.

As a literary term, song is related to *lyric, originally a text or poem sung to the accompaniment of the lyre and eventually used in lit. in divergent senses to refer, on the one hand, to any poem actually set or intended to be set to music (*ditty), and, on the other, to any poem focusing on the arousal of *emotion as would be characteristic of the kind of poem typically sung to the lyre (or to any other musical accompaniment) as song. Lyric, however, has attained much wider currency than has song and is the commonly accepted term today for both these meanings, whereas song, as a literary term, means an utterance partaking in some way of the condition of music. The musicality of a poem may be thought of in relation to the ways a text might be interpreted by a musical setting. Some songs correspond closely to the formal properties of the text (incl. metrical, linear, and strophic form), while others emphasize the semantic properties (rendering the meaning of individual words or phrases or expressing the tone or mood of the poem). They need not, of course, exclude each other; indeed, it is frequently difficult if not impossible to separate what may be a metrical rendering from its expressive function. The distinction is useful, however, as some songs favor one or the other, in turn influencing what are considered song-like elements or effects in poetry. The association of poetry with music in the songs of the late Ren. in England offers examples of both types of correspondence. In some (as in songs by Thomas Campion, who wrote both words and music), the rendering of the formal dimensions of poetry is precise: musical meter is aligned with poetic *meter, lines of verse are of uniform length and set to musical phrases of the same length (words are not repeated or extended by musical means), and the strophic *repetition of the poem is rendered through repetition of music (as in traditional hymn singing). Poetry that lends itself to settings of this sort is typically predictable in all these dimensions; hence, such a poem may be designated song. In the *madrigal and in some lute songs, by contrast, such formal properties are likely to be ignored and musical devices instead correlated with individual words to enhance meaning. This might mean repetition of words of special poignancy ("weep, weep") or highlighting of such words through exaggerated duration or unusually high or low *pitch; frequently such representation is accomplished through a technique called word-painting, which aligns individual words with musical figures that can be said to depict their meaning (a descending scale for the word down; a *dissonance for the word grief). Such practices also lead to predictability, in this case, in *diction. In the poetic miscellanies of the period, song and sonnet* sometimes seem to be used interchangeably and often refer to poems with one or more of these characteristics. At worst, they are poems filled with *cliché and cloyingly regular in formal properties; at best, they achieve a delicate balance between the demands of successful musical rendition and fresh invention.

Songs featuring more general expressivity of mood or tone in music appear less frequently in this period, although the lutenist-composer John Dowland achieved some remarkable successes in this mode. Perhaps most famous is his "Lachrimae," which existed as an instrumental composition before being provided with its now-famous text, "Flow, my tears." The pervasively doleful mood of the piece is created musically in the accompaniment through its preponderance of descending melodic lines, its minor harmonies, its low register, and the slow, deliberate pace of its phrasing; the poem seems, in effect, to make verbal what the musical rhet. of emotion suggests. The role of music, then, in this type of song is less specifically text-dependent than in other types, and the required balance between music and poetry depends to a greater extent on the availability of appropriate instrumental resources to combine with the voice.

The lied* of 19th-c. Ger. lit. best exemplifies the fully developed expressive setting. In the hands of Franz Schubert, and to a great extent of those who followed him (Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, Hugo Wolf), the role of the accompanying instrument was enhanced to create a highly emotional song evocative of the overall tone or mood of the poem. Many give credit to the devel. of the mod. grand piano for the success of the lied. Although the notion of expressive setting was not new, as the role of the instrumental accompaniment in Claudio Monteverdi's "Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda" demonstrates, such pieces violated the required intimacy of voice and single instrument characteristic of song, and it was not until the devel. of a single instrument with the expressive range of the piano that this mode of song could flourish. The genre also depended on—and stimulated—a poetry that provided the appropriate moods, expressed in terms that could be adequately mimicked by music. This is found in the poetry of Ger. *romanticism, with its frequent evocation of nature or of ordinary human activity as the locus of emotion. For Schubert, the presence in the poem of a running brook or a woman spinning wool as the background to an emotion-filled reverie provided a means for music to enhance what the poem could only suggest. In this context, poetry can be said to be song-like if it presents an intense, sustained, clear, emotional stance, called forth by an activity that takes place in time. Typically, such poems feature only one such stance or a decided shift from one to another; striking *ambiguity or *paradox is less song-like insofar as these conditions are less readily imitated in music.

Curiously, poems that depend extensively on the so-called musicality of words (e.g., Edith Sitwell's "abstract poetry" and the later experiments in *sound poetry) are not necessarily song-like, because the sounds of the words draw attention to themselves and thereby detract from the poem's ability to evoke an emotional state.

The most extended use of song to refer to a kind of poetry takes the connection well beyond any mechanical representation or concurrence to questions of intent or of the relation to strains of creativity. Thus, Maritain uses song to designate the entire genre of lyric poetry, as distinct from narrative or dramatic, referring to "the Poem or the Song as the poetry of internal music . . . the immediate expression of creative intuition, the meaning whose intentional content is purely a recess of the subjectivity awakened to itself and things—perceived through an obscure, simple, and totally nonconceptual apperception." Such conceptions of the nature of song center on the ability of music to tap some source of understanding or sympathy that is not touched by lang. Kramer speaks of "the mythical union of a lower reality embodied in language and a higher one embodied in music," stating that "through song, usually the song of a disincarnate voice or of a figure touched by divinity, lang. is represented as broaching the ineffable"; this is the sense implied in the use of music to evoke the supernatural, whether through strictly instrumental means or through *charms, as is common in drama. Music has traditionally been associated with magic and with religious experience (despite the objections at various times of both Catholic and Puritan), and it is commonly thought of as the lang. of love. The fusion, therefore, of music and poetry in song has been thought to bring about the most perfect communication possible, combining the ineffable expressivity of music with the rational capabilities of words. And by derivation, poems that are perceived as visionary, conjuring some understanding beyond the normal capacities of words, may be called songs. Edmund Spenser's Epithalamion and Prothalamion, William Blake's Songs of Innocence and Experience, and Walt Whitman's "Song of Myself" come to mind.

Scholarship on song as music and text frequently focuses on function and social context. Vernacular song and folk song, for instance, have generated a huge independent lit. (not represented in the biblio. below). Although the distinctions between these and the many types of so-called art song are not always clear, the popular genres are less likely to have strong literary connections. Similarly, the literary connection is clearest with secular song, though the relations between music and text in sacred song run the same gamut as in secular. All song types, however, lend themselves well to critical methodologies of recent prominence (such as feminism or *New Historicism) and a growing number of comparative explorations of song lit. of other cultures has emerged.

Song has also come to designate certain purely musical compositions, presumably those, like poems called "song," that partake in some measure of the shared experience of music and poetry. Most frequent in this usage are such 19th-c. compositions as Felix Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words" for piano—short, expressive pieces, typically with a striking, singable melody and the sense that one could describe in words a suitable emotional frame of reference. Their proximity to the lied is probably not coincidence; song, or lied, in that context describes that combination of words and music producing a compressed and intense expression of the rhet. of emotion, and if words are merely implied, the effect is nevertheless present and the composition known as "song."

Several specialized types of song, established by use, have similarly given their names to poetic types, esp. *elegy, *lament, hymn, lay or lai, *ballad, *carol, *rondeau, and canzonet.

See AIR, ALBA, BLUES, CACOPHONY, CANSO, CARMEN, CHANT, DESCORT, GESELLSCHAFTSLIED, JAZZ POETRY, MUSIC AND POETRY, RHYTHM, SOUND, SPIRITUAL, TAGELIED.

■ Song as Music: F. Gennrich, Grundriss einer Formenlehre des mittelalterlichen Liedes (1932); J. Maritain, Creative Intuition in Art and Poetry (1953); R. Lebèque, "Ronsard et la musique," Musique et poésie au XVI siècle (1954); G. Müller and G. Reichert, "Lied," Reallexikon II 2.42–62; D. Cooke, The Language of Music (1959); A. Sydow, Das Lied (1962); C. M. Bowra, Primitive Song (1962); R. H. Thomas, Poetry and Song in the German Baroque (1963); The Penguin Book of Lieder, ed. S. S. Prawer (1964); R. Taylor, The Art of the Minnesinger (1968); B. H. Bronson, The Ballad as Song (1969); D. Ivey, Song (1970)—on musical settings of Eng., Fr., Ger., and It. poetry, 17th–20th cs.; E. Brody and R. A. Fowkes, The German Lied and Its Poetry (1971); J. M. Stein, Poem and Music in the German Lied (1971); M. C. Beardsley, "Verse and Music," Wimsatt; H. van der Werf, The Chansons of the Troubadours and Trouvères (1972); D. Fischer-Dieskau, Schubert's Songs: A Biographical Study (1977); Medieval English Songs, ed. E. J. Dobson and F. Ll. Harrison (1979); "Song" and "Lied," New Grove; M. Booth, The Experience of Songs (1981); R. C. Friedberg, American Art Song and American Poetry, 2 v. (1981); S. Ratcliffe, Campion: On Song (1981); J. A. Winn, Unsuspected Eloquence: A History of the Relations between Poetry and Music (1981); E. B. Jorgens, The Well-Tun'd Word: Musical Interpretations of English Poetry, 1597–1651 (1982); L. Kramer, Music and Poetry: The Nineteenth Century and After (1984); S. Banfield, Sensibility and English Song: Critical Studies of the Early Twentieth Century, 2 v. (1985); M. M. Stoljar, Poetry and Song in Late Eighteenth-Century Germany (1985); E. Doughtie, English Renaissance Song (1986); W. Maynard, Elizabethan Lyric Poetry and Its Music (1986); J. Stevens, Words and Music in the Middle Ages (1986); D. Seaton, The Art Song: A Research and Information Guide (1987)—esp. "Aesthetics, Analysis, Criticism"; J. W. Smeed, German Song and Its Poetry, 1740–1900 (1987); D. M. Hertz, The Tuning of the Word (1988); Lyrics of the Middle Ages, ed. J. J. Wilhelm (1990); L. E. Auld, "Text as Pre-Text: French Court Airs and Their Ditties," Literature and the Other Arts (1993); S. Hart, "Masking the Violence in Melody: Songs of World War II," The Image of Violence in Literature, the Media, and Society, ed. W. Wright and S. Kaplan (1995); M. L. Switten, Music and Poetry in the Middle Ages (1995); S. Zheng, "Female Heroes and Moonish Lovers: Women's Paradoxical Identities in Modern Chinese Songs," Journal of Women's History 8 (1997); D. Fischlin, In Small Proportions: A Poetics of the English Ayre, 1596–1622 (1998); D. Schaberg, "Song and the Historical Imagination in Early China," HJAS 59 (1999); P. Coren, "Singing and Silence: Female Personae in the English Ayre," Renaissance Studies 16 (2002).

■ Song in Literature: T. S. Eliot, The Music of Poetry (1942); W. R. Bowden, The English Dramatic Lyric, 1603–42 (1951); J. Hollander, The Untuning of the Sky: Ideas of Music in English Poetry, 1500–1700 (1961); P. J. Seng, The Vocal Songs in the Plays of Shakespeare (1967); E. Garke, The Use of Songs in Elizabethan Prose Fiction (1972); J. H. Long, Shakespeare's Use of Music (1972); C. Ericson-Roos, The Songs of Robert Burns (1977); B. H. Fairchild, Such Holy Song: Music as Idea, Form, and Image in the Poetry of William Blake (1980); W. R. Johnson, The Idea of Lyric (1982); L. Schleiner, The Living Lyre in English Verse from Elizabeth through the Restoration (1984); E. H. Winkler, The Function of Song in Contemporary British Drama (1990).

E. B. JORGENS

SONGBOOK. A multiauthored *lyric *anthology in a ms. codex volume of parchment leaves bound as a book, or printed book that displays an intention to gather and organize discrete (usually vernacular) lyric texts into a collection. Songbooks range from anthols. occupying only a few folios within a larger volume to large compilations coextensive with an entire codex. Given that all short med. texts are transmitted either in miscellanies (ranging from haphazard or practical incorporation to collections assembled on commission or speculation by a patron) or anthols. (items brought together according to some intelligible governing principle), the songbooks considered precursors to mod. eds. are the collections of individual nonnarrative poems in stanzaic form rather than single-author anthols., narrative anthols. in octosyllabic couplets (such as the OF romance or dit), or prose works that share thematic similarities with the *courtly love song. In the devel. of Western poetry, the most significant songbooks in terms of their typical qualities are the monumental mss. of the continental trad. compiled from the 13th c. on, such as the chansonniers of troubadour and trouvère poetry and Liederhandschriften of Ger. Minnesänger. These scribally compiled, multiauthored anthols. preserve and memorialize a lyric production that had been mostly transmitted orally since the beginning of the 12th c. They are among the earliest collections of secular lyric poetry in the Eur. vernaculars, and they organize lyric texts written out in prose by genre (cansos, sirventes*, tensos*; later formes fixes such as the motet and canción*) and by poet. While some contain musical notation, many songbooks of the Eur. vernaculars such as the Occitan chansonniers and MHG Liederhandschriften transmit only lyrics. In this way, these trads. differ notably from the Fr. chansonniers, which tend to preserve melodies and lyrics. Even when songbooks group nonlyric texts such as the biographies of poets in Occitan chansonniers (vidas) or prose commentaries (razos*) with lyrics to memorialize a trad. or collate heterogeneous elements of genre or lang. (long, moralizing texts with chansons*, Occitan and Fr.), they were compiled to manifest a deliberate coherence in their reading programs as a single entity while maintaining a variety of discrete pieces of poetry. As Huot has shown, the compilations often demonstrate a narrative or thematic coherence while emphasizing individual authors. In addition to being carefully organized under genre and author, songbooks often contain rubricated initials and miniatures, such as distinctive portraits of troubadours or more typical ones of aristocrats, clergy, or knights. In their comprehensive plans for rubrication—in particular, the importance of the figure of the poet—and attention to lit. hist., they are cultural objects in their own right while also serving as a vehicle for preserving poetry. They reflect a new consciousness of vernacular lyric as an object of study and codification. While the continental Eur. songbook trad. generally emphasizes authorial expression in contrast to the ME anthols. of mostly anonymous lyrics collated with other kinds of writing (such as prayers and hagiographies in the early 14th-c. Harley 2253 ms.), songbooks express an aesthetic motivation or design of a whole greater than the sum of its parts. Thus, even as the term songbook may be a misnomer as assigned to a compilation of nonlyric and lyric texts or to an anthol. contained within a section of a ms. rather than the entire codex, one may perceive a songbook as both compiling lyric poems and exhibiting the presence of artificial principles by which a reader may interpret those poems. As Nichols (1990) and Lerer have argued, such principles may be perceived in a ms.'s performance—through or despite the physical "manuscript matrix" of dissimilar materials from various points of time—or when the "idea of the anthology," the social, historical or literary purposes of a collection, become clear whether by textual disposition, organization, rubrication, or illustration.

Despite attempts in the 19th c. to establish stemmata of written sources that make a songbook, the mod. scholarly consensus is that the earliest vernacular songbooks are a combination of both oral and written transmission, as generally we lack early exemplars or song sheets; the textual variability of lyric texts in the mss. attests to an early stage of oral transmission and the performance of these lyrics as remembered improvisation (Holmes, Paden 1995, Van Vleck). While songbooks would have been assembled from different sources, incl. both local and circulating ur-models used for multiple collections, their compilation greatly contributed to the stabilization of the lyric trad. and the devel. of single-authored compilations of lyric cycles (Holmes). Older mss. such as the OF ms. U (Huot) show an earlier stage of lyric anthols. in that the lyrics are anonymous, are more randomly organized, and lack the illumination and generic organization that codify a lyric trad. Despite this range of editorial intention, songbooks differ from the earliest instances of vernacular lyric that contain these texts in the margins and flyleaves of ecclesiastical or legal codices (see Occitan lyrics in Paden and Paden; ms. 201, folio 89 verso and vernacular lyric in England in Thomson and Gullick) or include them in heterogeneous vernacular miscellanies based primarily on principles such as subject matter or practical considerations of accessibility. Songbooks may also be seen as contiguous with the trad. of middle Lat. songbooks incorporating vernacular texts, such as the Carmina Burana and the earlier Carolingian flores auctorum. Nichols (1996) believes the pandect, since the 6th c. a term for compilations of laws and later sacred writings, also provided a model for songbooks.

With the rise of vernacular literacy in western Europe during the 13th c., songbooks became a symbol of cultural prestige, as patrons and composers of lyric poetry in It., Iberian, and Ger. courts looked to associate themselves with a courtly mythology of poetic trad. In general, songbooks not only catalog lyrics but document and archive the social and cultural context from which the lyrics arose through their rubrication and commentary (Burgwinkle). In the case of troubadour chansonniers compiled in Italy, these mss. reflect the desire of It. aristocrats to establish a written trad. of a lyric poetry even as it was still orally transmitted in Occitan-speaking areas of southern France and northern Spain. Codices of the 14th c. and after, such as the large Heidelberg ms. of the MHG trad. known as the Codex Manesse and the 15th-c. Castilian cancioneros*, establish the songbook as a literary genre. Songbooks became a means of cultural self-justification for aristocrats and lettered men with social ambitions: the composition and publication of poetry in songbooks (mss. and then printed codices—see Dutton and Krogstad's bibl.) constituted an important courtly pastime. The individual songbook often represented a poetic coterie or particular court as was the case in the 15th- and 16th-c. Castilian cancioneros (see Gerli and Weiss, Dutton and Krogstad). Further, the codices of the troubadour trad. served as models for later It. lyric collections and for poets such as Dante and Petrarch (see PETRARCHISM).

Many scholars have noted that, as visual representations of oral poems and musical performances, songbooks show codicological practices and cultural agendas that have much to do with the formation of lyric trads. The arrangement of vernacular poetry in anthols. was an impetus for the idea of the author as the foundation of a literary *canon; it also affected the evolution of lyric genres, from the priority of the aristocratic chanson to formes fixes. The idea of the songbook belongs to the mod. reevaluation of so-called canonical works, as songbooks represent how much a canon and lit. itself are material and social products of times and places, and a category such as poet a social construction that reflects different lyric audiences (Hanna, Guillory). Thus, a discrete single literary work must be seen in relation to its mode of transmission and to other works in an assembly of works such as a songbook. In the mod. era, songbooks came to represent a culture of lyric poetry that could reinforce a geographical or ling. identity, such as the Galician-Port. cancioneiros for the Iberian trad. or Liederhandschriften for Ger.-speaking people. In this sense, during the 19th c., songbooks were implicated in the romantic search for ling. and national identity, as they reflected the desire to justify cultural or regional origins through ling. artifacts (Kendrick).

Whether determined by scribe, patron, or poet, the songbook—and by extension the textual crit. of songbooks—reflects cultural preoccupations governing the interpretation of poetry and its social role in different historical periods.

See LYRIC SEQUENCE, MINNESANG, SONNET SEQUENCE.

■ G. Gröber, "Die Liedersammlungen der Troubadours," Romanische Studien 2 (1875–77); D. S. Avalle, La letteratura medievale in lingua d'oc nella sua tradizione manoscritta (1961); A. Parédes, A Texas-Mexican Cancionero (1976); Codex Manesse: Die Grosse Heidelberger Liederhandschrift, Facsimile of Codex Palatinus Germanicus 848 of the Universitätsbibliothek Heidelberg, with "Interimstexten" from I. F. Walther (1975–78), commentary, ed. W. Koschorreck and W. Werner (1981); E. Poe, From Poetry to Prose in Old Provençal: The Emergence of the "Vidas," the "Razos," and the "Razos de trobar" (1984); J. Boffey, Manuscripts of Early Courtly Love Lyrics in the Later Middle Ages (1985); J. Guillory, "Canonical and Non-Canonical: A Critique of the Debate," ELH 54 (1987); S. Huot, From Song to Book: The Poetics of Writing in Old French Lyric and Lyrical Narrative Poetry (1987); S. G. Nichols, "Introduction: Philology in a Manuscript Culture," Speculum 65 (1990); El cancionero del siglo XV, c. 1360–1520, ed. B. Dutton and J. Krogstad, 7 v. (1990–91); T. Stemmler, "Miscellany or Anthology: The Structure of Medieval Manuscripts, MS Harley 2253, for Example," Zeitschrift für Anglistik und Amerikanistik 39 (1991); rev. in Fein (2000); A. Roncaglia, "Rétrospectives et perspectives dans l'étude des chansonniers d'oc," Lyrique romane médiévale: La tradition des chansonniers: Actes du Colloque du Liège, 1989, ed. M. Tyssens (1991); A. E. Van Vleck, Memory and Re-Creation in Troubadour Lyric (1991); W. D. Paden, "Manuscripts," A Handbook of the Troubadours, ed. F.R.P. Akehurst and J. M. Davis (1995); The Whole Book: Cultural Perspectives on the Medieval Miscellany, ed. S. G. Nichols and S. Wenzel (1996)—esp. Nichols, "'Art' and 'Nature': Looking for (Medieval) Principles of Order in Occitan Chansonnier N (Morgan 819)"; R. Hanna III, Pursuing History: Middle English Manuscripts and Their Texts (1996); Medievalism and the Modernist Temper, ed. R. H. Bloch and S. G. Nichols (1996)—esp. L. Kendrick, "The Science of Imposture and the Professionalization of Medieval Occitan Literary Studies"; Poetry at Court in Trastamaran Spain: From the "Cancionero de Baena" to the "Cancionero General," ed. E. M. Gerli and J. Weiss (1998); W. Burgwinkle, "The Chansonniers as Books," The Troubadours: An Introduction, ed. S. Gaunt and S. Kay (1999); O. Holmes, Assembling the Lyric Self: Authorship from Troubadour Song to Italian Poetry Book (2000); Studies in the Harley Manuscript, ed. S. Fein (2000); R. M. Thomson and M. Gullick, A Descriptive Catalogue of the Medieval Manuscripts in Worcester Cathedral Library (2001); S. Lerer, "Medieval English Literature and the Idea of the Anthology," PMLA 118 (2003); J.H.M. Taylor, The Making of Poetry: Late-Medieval French Poetic Anthologies (2007); Troubadour Poems from the South of France, ed. W. D. Paden and F. F. Paden (2007); G. Kornrumpf, Vom Codex Manesse zur Kolmarer Liederhandschrift: Aspekte der Überlieferung, Formtraditionen, Texte (2008); M. Galvez, Songbook: How Lyrics Became Poetry in Medieval Europe (2012).

M. GALVEZ

SONNET (from It. sonetto, "a little sound or song"). A 14-line line poem normally in *hendecasyllables (It.), iambic pentameter (Eng.), or *alexandrines (Fr.), whose rhyme scheme varies despite the assumption that the sonnet form is fixed. The three most widely recognized versions of the sonnet, with their traditional rhyme schemes, are the It. or Petrarchan (octave: abbaabba; sestet: cdecde or cdcdcd or a similar combination that avoids the closing couplet), the Spenserian (ababbcbc cdcdee), and the Eng. or Shakespearean (ababcdcdefef gg). Weeks showed in a sample of just under 6,000

Eng. sonnets that 60% used the abbaabba pattern for the octaves and 22% ababcdcd.

The It. pattern (the most widely used) invites a two-part division of thought: the octave's unified pattern leads to the volta* or "turn" in the more varied sestet. The abbaabba octave is a blend of three brace-rhyme quatrains: the middle four lines, whose sounds overlap the others, reiterate the identical envelope pattern but with the sounds reversed, i.e., baab. The sestet, with its element of unpredictability, its usually more intense rhyme activity (three rhymes in six lines coming after two in eight), and the structural interdependence of the tercets, implies acceleration in thought and feeling.

The Spenserian and Shakespearean patterns offer relief to the difficulty of rhyming in Eng. and invite a division of thought into three quatrains and a closing or summarizing couplet; even though such arbitrary divisions are frequently ignored by the poet, the more open rhyme schemes tend to impress the fourfold structure on the reader's ear and to suggest a stepped progression toward the closing couplet.

Most deviations from the foregoing patterns have resulted from liberties taken in rhyming, but a few innovations of the sonnet are the following: alternating, where the tercets alternate with the quatrains (Catulle Mendès); caudate*, with "tails" of added lines (G. M. Hopkins, Albert Samain, R. M. Rilke); chained or linked, each line beginning with the last word of the previous line; continuous, iterating, or monorhymed on one or two rhyme sounds throughout (Giacomo da Lentini, Stéphane Mallarmé, Edmund Gosse); corona*, a series joined together by theme (It.) or rhyme or repeated lines (Sp. and Eng., e.g., John Donne) for panegyric; curtal, a sonnet of ten lines with a halfline tailpiece, divided 6 + 4½ (Hopkins); dialogue, a sonnet distributed between two speakers and usually *pastoral in inspiration (Cecco Angiolieri, Austin Dobson); double, a sonnet of 28 lines (Monte Andrea); enclosed, in which the tercets are sandwiched between the quatrains (Charles Baudelaire, Jean Pierre Rambosson); interwoven, with medial as well as end rhyme; retrograde, reading the same backward as forward; reversed (also called sonettessa), in which the sestet precedes the octave (Baudelaire, Paul Verlaine, Ricarda Huch)—for a reversed Shakespearean sonnet, see Rupert Brooke's "Sonnet Reversed"; rinterzato, a sonnet with eight short lines interspersed, making a whole of 22 lines (Guittone d'Arezzo); terza rima*, with the linked-tercets aba bcb rhyme scheme; unrhymed, where the division into quatrains and tercets is still observed, but the lines are blank (Joachim du Bellay, J. R. Becher). In Eng., the 16-line poems of George Meredith's sequence Modern Love (1862) are clearly related to the sonnet in their themes and abbacddceffeghhg rhyme scheme.

Historically, the sonnet began as some variant of the It. pattern; it is probable that the form resulted either from the addition of a double refrain of six lines (two tercets) to the two-quatrain Sicilian strambotto* or from conscious modeling on the form of the canzone*. The current form of the sonnet originated in the Sicilian court of Frederick II (1205–50), with 60 of the Sicilian school's sonnets in existence today. The sonnets of Giacomo da Lentini (fl. 1215–33) were followed by those of Guido Guinizzelli and Guido Cavalcanti. Although others of Lentini's contemporaries (the Abbot of Tivoli, Jacopo Mostacci, Pier delle Vigne, Rinaldo d'Aquino) used the form and established the octave-sestet divisions (with quatrain-tercet subdivisions), it remained for d'Arezzo (1230–94) to invent the abbaabba octave, which became traditional through its use by Dante (Vita nuova, Rime) and Petrarch (Canzoniere); Antonio da Tempo, in his Summa artis rithmici (1332), is the first to enunciate theoretical discussion of the sonnet as a type. The sonnets of Dante to Beatrice and of Petrarch to Laura normally opened with a strong statement that was then developed; but they were not unmarked by the artificiality of treatment that stemmed from variations on the Platonic love themes, an artificiality that was to be exported with the form in the 15th and 16th cs. as the sonnet moved to Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, Poland, and England, and later to Germany, Scandinavia, and Russia, until its use was pan-Eur. and the number of poets not attempting it negligible. The sonnet entered the Heb. lang. (in hendecasyllables) in Italy and Spain, as a primary form in which rhyme entered its poetry, esp. in sonnets by Immanuel of Rome at the end of the 13th to the beginning of the 14th c. Following Petrarch, there was in Italy some diminution of dignity in use of the form (as in Serafino dall'Aquila [1466–1500]), but with the work of Michelangelo, Pietro Bembo, Baldassare Castiglione, Gaspara Stampa, Vittoria Colonna, and Torquato Tasso, the sonnet was reaffirmed as a structure admirably suited to the expression of emotion in lyrical mood, adaptable to a wide range of subject matter (e.g., love, politics, religion), and employed with skill by many writers in the centuries to follow (Vittorio Alfieri, Ugo Foscolo, Giosuè Carducci, Gabriele D'Annunzio).

It was the Marqués de Santillana (1398–1458), who introduced the sonnet form (in hendecasyllables, even) to Spain, although it was not established there until the 16th c., the time of Juan Boscán (ca. 1490–1542) and esp. Garcilaso de la Vega (1503–36), Félix Lope de Vega (1562–1635), and other dramatists of the siglo de oro. Francisco Sá de Miranda (1481–1558) and his disciple António Ferreira brought the sonnet to Portugal, where it is better known in the Rimas of Luís de Camões (1524–80) and in the exquisite work of Antero de Quental (1842–91). Clément Marot (1496–1544) and Mellin de Saint Gelais (1491–1558) introduced it to France, but du Bellay (ca. 1522–60) was most active, writing (in the Petrarchan pattern) the first non-Italian cycle, L'Olive, as well as Les Regrets and Les Antiquités de Rome (trans. by Edmund Spenser as The Ruins of Rome, a source for Shakespeare's sonnets). Pierre de Ronsard (1524–85), who experimented with the form in alexandrines, Philippe Desportes (1546–1606), and Louise Labé (1522–66) wrote many sonnets, while François de Malherbe (1555–1628) put his authority behind the abbaabbaccdede pattern in alexandrines, which became the accepted line length. After an era of decline in Europe in the 18th c., Théophile Gautier (1811–72), Gérard de Nerval (1808–55), and Baudelaire (1821–67) revived the form, as did Verlaine, Mallarmé, Arthur Rimbaud, J.-M. de Heredia (1842–1905), and Paul Valéry (1871–1945). Germany received the form relatively late, in the writings of G. R. Weckherlin (1584–1653) and, esp. insofar as creative achievement is concerned, Andreas Gryphius (1616–64). A period of disuse followed until Gottfried Bürger (1747–94) revived the form and anticipated its use by A. W. Schlegel, J. F. Eichendorff, Ludwig Tieck, and other romantic writers. The sonnets of August Graf von Platen (1796–1835), Sonette aus Venedig, rank among the best in mod. times, while in more recent years the mystical sequence Sonette an Orpheus (1923) of Rilke and the writings of R. A. Schröder have brought the Ger. sonnet to another high point.

The sonnet arrived in England from Italy via Thomas Wyatt (1503–42), who preferred the sestet's closing couplet. Wyatt adhered to the Petrarchan octave; Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey (1517–47), established the ababcdcdefefgg rhyme scheme, a pattern more congenial to the comparatively rhyme-poor Eng. lang. in that it filled the 14 lines by seven rhymes, not five. This pattern was popular in the Ren. Wide variation existed in rhyme schemes and line lengths; Shakespeare was its best practitioner. A rhyme scheme more attractive to Spenser (and in its first nine lines paralleling his *Spenserian stanza) was ababbcbccdcdee, a compromise between It. and Eng. patterns. The period also saw many *sonnet sequences, including those of Philip Sidney (Astrophil and Stella, pub. 1591), Samuel Daniel (Delia), Michael Drayton (Idea), Spenser (Amoretti), Lady Mary Wroth (Pamphilia to Amphilanthus), and Shakespeare. It remained for John Milton to introduce the true It. pattern, to break from sequences to occasional sonnets, to have a wider sense of content, to give greater unity to the form by frequently permitting octave to run into sestet (the "Miltonic" sonnet anticipated by the Elizabethans), and to give a greater richness to the texture by employing *enjambment. And sonnet-like structures of 14 lines have even been discerned in the stichic verse of Paradise Lost, a practice later echoed by William Wordsworth and Thomas Hardy (Johnson 1982). Milton's was the strongest influence when, after a century of disuse, the sonnet was revived in the late 18th c. by Thomas Gray, Thomas Warton, William Cowper, and William Lisle Bowles and reestablished in the early 19th by Wordsworth (who eased rhyme demands by use of an abbaacca octave in nearly half of his more than 500 sonnets), by Anna Seward, and by John Keats, whose frequent use of the Shakespearean pattern reaffirmed its worthiness. By this time, the scope of sonnet themes had broadened widely; in Leigh Hunt and Keats, it even embraced an unaccustomed humor. Sonnet theory was also developing tentatively during this period (as in Hunt's "Essay on the Sonnet") to eventuate in an unrealistic purism in T.W.H. Crosland's The English Sonnet (1917) before it was later more temperately approached. Since the impetus of the romantic revival, the form has had a continuing and at times distinguished use, as in D. G. Rossetti (The House of Life), Christina Rossetti, Elizabeth Barrett Browning (Sonnets from the Portuguese), and A. C. Swinburne. Few poets of the 20th c. (W. H. Auden, Dylan Thomas, Geoffrey Hill, and Seamus Heaney might be named) matched the consistent level of production found in the earlier work, although an occasional single sonnet, such as W. B. Yeats's "Leda and the Swan," has rare beauty.

While sonnets were ubiquitous in the colonial Americas, the form did not appear in New England until the last quarter of the 18th c., in the work of Col. David Humphreys, but once introduced, the form spread rapidly if not distinctively until H. W. Longfellow (1807–82), using the It. pattern, lifted it in dignity and lyric tone (esp. in the Divina commedia sequence) to a level easily equal to its counterpart in England. Subsequently, E. A. Robinson, Robert Frost, Claude McKay (born in Jamaica), Edna St. Vincent Millay, e. e. cummings, and Robert Lowell, among others, produced memorable sonnets, as have more recent Am. and Eng.-lang. poets such as Ted Berrigan, James K. Baxter (New Zealand), Rafael Campo, Anne Carson (Canada), Tony Harrison (England), Marilyn Hacker, John Hollander, Edwin Morgan (Scotland), and Bernadette Mayer.

In the 20th and early 21st cs., sonnets have continued to broaden to include almost any subject and mood. Structurally, even within the traditional patterns, the sonnet has reflected the principal influences evident in mod. poetry as a whole: *free-verse innovations have frequently led to less metronomic movement within the iambic norm; alternatives to exact rhymes have replenished the stock of rhyme pairs and have sophisticated acoustic relationships; and a more natural idiom has removed much of a burdensome artificiality. Such adaptability suggests continued interest in and use of the form.

See ONEGIN STANZA, PETRARCHISM, QUATORZAIN.

■ H. Welti, Gesch. des Sonettes in der deutschen Dichtung (1884); Schipper, 2.835 ff; L. Biadene, Morfologia del sonetto nei secoli XIII e XIV (1889); Sonnets on the Sonnet, ed. M. Russell (1898); M. Jasinski, Histoire du sonnet en France (1903); L. T. Weeks, "The Order of Rimes of the English Sonnet," MLN 25 (1910)—data; Thieme, 381 ff—lists 17 Fr. works, 1548–1903; F. Villey, "Marot et le premier sonnet français," Revue d'Histoire Littéraire de la France 20 (1920); R. D. Havens, The Influence of Milton on English Poetry (1922)—surveys 18th- and 19th-c. Eng. sonnets; W. L. Bullock, "The Genesis of the English Sonnet Form," PMLA 38 (1923); L. G. Sterner, The Sonnet in American Literature (1930); L. Zillman, John Keats and the Sonnet Tradition (1939); W. Mönch, Das Sonett (1955)—most comprehensive study to date, with extended bibl.; E. Rivers, "Certain Formal Characteristics of the Primitive Love Sonnet," Speculum 33 (1958); E. H. Wilkins, The Invention of the Sonnet and Other Studies in Italian Literature (1959); E. Núñez Mata, Historia y origen del soneto (1967); S. Booth, An Essay on Shakespeare's Sonnets (1969); Das deutsche Sonett, ed.

J. U. Fechner (1969); J. Levy, "The Development of Rhyme-Scheme and of Syntactic Pattern in the English Renaissance Sonnet," "On the Relations of Language and Stanza Pattern in the English Sonnet," rpt. in his Paralipomena (1971); M. Françon, "L'Introduction du sonnet en France," RPh 26 (1972); J. Fuller, The Sonnet (1972); L. M. Johnson, Wordsworth and the Sonnet (1973); F. Jost, "The Sonnet in its European Context," Introduction to Comparative Literature (1974); Wilkins; R. L. Colie, Shakespeare's Living Art (1974); C. Scott, "The Limits of the Sonnet," RLC 50 (1976); F. Kimmich, "Sonnets before Opitz," German Quarterly 49 (1976); D. H. Scott, Sonnet Theory and Practice in Nineteenth-Century France (1977); H.-J. Schlütter, Sonett (1979); S. Hornsby and J. R. Bennett, "The Sonnet: An Annotated Bibliography from 1940 to the Present," Style 13 (1979); J. Geninasca, "Forme fixe et forme discursive dans quelques sonnets de Baudelaire," Cahiers de l'Association internationale des études françaises 32 (1980); Brogan, 455 ff.; Fowler; L. M. Johnson, Wordsworth's Metaphysical Verse (1982)—blank-verse sonnets; Russkij sonet, ed. B. Romanov, and Russkij sonet, ed. V. S. Sovalin (both 1983)—anthols.; Elwert, Italienische, sect. 83; F. Rigolot, "Qu'est-ce qu'un sonnet?" Revue d'Histoire Littéraire de la France 84 (1984) C. Kleinhenz, The Early Italian Sonnet (1986); Hollier; S. L. Bermann, The Sonnet over Time (1989)—Petrarch, Shakespeare, and Baudelaire; P. Oppenheimer, The Birth of the Modern Mind (1989); G. Warkentin, "Sonnet, Sonnet Sequence," The Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. A. C. Hamilton et al. (1990); A. L. Martin, Cervantes and the Burlesque Sonnet (1991); Six Masters of the Spanish Sonnet, ed. and trans. W. Barnstone (1992); M.R.G. Spiller, The Development of the Sonnet (1992); D. Bregman, The Golden Way (1995)—Heb. sonnet; Moirer; H. Vendler, The Art of Shakespeare's Sonnets (1998); The Oxford Book of Sonnets, ed. J. Fuller (2000); Penguin Book of the Sonnet, ed. P. Levin (2001); The Making of a Sonnet, ed. E. Boland and E. Hirsch (2008); The Reality Street Book of Sonnets, ed. J. Hilson (2009); S. Burt and D. Mikics, The Art of the Sonnet (2010); The Cambridge Companion to the Sonnet, ed. P. Howarth (2010).

T.V.F. Brogan; L. J. Zillman; C. Scott; J. Lewin

SONNET SEQUENCE. A subset of the *lyric sequence consisting of a series of *sonnets, of any number, that may be organized according to some fictional or intellectual order. The sequence made entirely of sonnets is rarer than readers often suppose and seldom holds an author's or a culture's attention for long before deliberate variations emerge. The rise of the sonnet sequence in most Eur. langs. coincides with that of *Petrarchism: because Petrarch's late 14th-c. Canzoniere is made largely but not exclusively of sonnets (317 of 366 poems), many of its imitators and adapters in Fr., Eng., Port., and Sp. saw their roles as involving the domestication of his sonnet form; hence, the first Petrarchans in the vernaculars (e.g., Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey, in Eng.) are often the first sonneteers in their langs. as well (e.g., Joachim du Bellay and Pierre de Ronsard in Fr., Francisco Sá de Miranda and Luís de Camões in Port., Juan Boscán and Garcilaso de la Vega in Sp.). The most extreme vogue for sonnet sequences was that of Eng. poets in the later 16th c.: examples include Thomas Watson's Hekatompathia of 18-line sonnets (1582); Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella (written early 1580s, pub. 1591); Edmund Spenser's Ruins of Rome (1591—an adaptation of du Bellay's Antiquités de Rome [1558] and drawn upon by Shakespeare) and Amoretti (with its completing Epithalamion [1595]); Henry Constable's Diana (1592); Samuel Daniel's Delia (1592); Michael Drayton's much revised Idea (1593); and Shakespeare's Sonnets (written 1590s, pub. 1609). In the 17th c., while poets such as the Spaniard Francisco de Quevedo, Sidney's niece Mary Wroth, and the Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz continue to extend the reach of the amatory and philosophical sonnet sequence, the orientation of the sequence at large (like that of the lyric sequence) turns toward *devotional poetry. Aside from Quevedo and John Donne, notable religious sonneteers incl. the Ger. Andreas Gryphius, the It. Tommaso Campanella, the Dutchman Constantijn Huygens, and the Frenchman Jean de La Ceppède.

In the early mod. period generally, the sonnet sequence is often thought to have a special, almost automatic claim to overall integrity—whether topical (as in du Bellay's Les Regrets [1558]), meditative (as in the *"corona" used by Donne and others), or vaguely chronological (as in the common usage of the Eng. word century for 100 sonnets). As scholars such as Warley and Alduy have demonstrated, the sonnet sequence can be as much a political and economic as a literary construction—an arena or marketplace for the working out of collective interests; earlier scholars have dwelt on its character as a ritual experience, a type of public space, and an art form with analogues in painting, religion, and architecture, among other disciplines. The job of cultural mediation enacted by the sonnet sequence perhaps indicates why poetic amateurs of note—such as the It. sculptor and painter Michelangelo Buonarroti in the 1530s and 1540s, the Eng. Puritan polemicist Henry Lock in the 1590s, or the Am. philosopher George Santayana in the 1890s—are drawn to this form as a uniquely deprivileged space: it enables them to think through emotional, philosophical, or religious issues in a formally determined, publicly accessible medium. In fact, the first sonnet sequence in Eng.—Anne Lock's Meditation of a Penitent Sinner (1560), inspired by the Scottish Puritan John Knox—is the ideologically charged work of a poetic amateur, intervening in contemp. religious debates in the mode of a deeply personal meditation (Roche).

Like the lyric sequence, the sonnet sequence seems to have had few important instances in the 18th c. but became a major romantic and postromantic vehicle. Notable examples incl. William Wordworth's several sonnet sequences.; E. B. Browning's Sonnets from the Portuguese (1850); George Meredith's narrative Modern Love (1862), in which the "sonnets" have 16 lines; D. G. Rossetti's House of Life (1881); Rubén Darío's

"sonetos" and "medallones" in Azul . . . (1888), the book that impelled Sp.-Am. modernismo*, which had a recurrent fascination with the sonnet in loosely organized collocations; Fernando Pessoa's 35 Sonnets in Eng. (1918); R. M. Rilke's Sonette an Orpheus (1923); and e. e. cummings's several sonnet sequences in his early volumes Tulips and Chimneys (1923), & (1925), and XLI Poems (1925). With the 20th c. and *modernism came another hiatus, followed by a renewed sense of the sonnet sequence's potential for organizing experience, esp. love, though, in the later 20th c., it was perhaps impossible for the sonnet sequence to occur without formal irony, cultural critique, or anachronistic pathos. Thus, Nicolás Guillén's political volumes are founded on his early experiments as a sonneteer, a role to which he returns for ironic effect (as in "El abuelo" in West Indies, Ltd. [1934]); and John Berryman's adulterous Sonnets (written 1940s, pub. 1968) seek out a self-conscious Petrarchism (esp. 15, an adaptation of Canzoniere 189). Robert Lowell became all but exclusively a sonneteer in late career: his experiments in recasting the sonnet sequence Notebook 1967–68 as Notebook (1970), History (1973), and For Lizzie and Harriet (1973) might be considered the climax of his work, culminating in The Dolphin (1973) and Day by Day (1977). Among late-century adaptations in Eng. are Seamus Heaney's ten "Glanmore Sonnets" (in Field Work, 1979) and his eight-sonnet elegy "Clearances" (in The Haw Lantern, 1987); Tony Harrison's dissonant rewriting of the formal trad. in Continuous: 50 Sonnets from the School of Eloquence (1982); Marilyn Hacker's amatory Love, Death, and the Changing of the Seasons (1986), incl. an updated crown of sonnets; and Bill Knott's cultural polemic in Outremer (1989).

■ Elizabethan Sonnet-Cycles, ed. M. F. Crow (1896); L. C. John, The English Sonnet Sequences (1938); W. Mönch, Das Sonett: Gestalt und Geschichte (1955); European Metaphysical Poetry, ed. F. J. Warnke (1961); D. Stone, Ronsard's Sonnet Cycles (1966); B. Stirling, The Shakespeare Sonnet Order (1968); S. Booth, An Essay on Shakespeare's Sonnets (1969); T. Cave, Devotional Poetry in France 1570–1613 (1969); essays on Ronsard, Scève, and du Bellay in YFS 47 (1972); T. Cave, The Cornucopian Text (1979); J. de La Ceppède, From the Theorems, trans. K. Bosley (1983); R. A. Katz, The Ordered Text (1985)—du Bellay's sonnet sequences; J. Fineman, Shakespeare's Perjured Eye (1986); Hollier; T. P. Roche Jr., Petrarch and the English Sonnet Sequences (1989); G. Warkentin, "Sonnet Sequence," The Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. A. C. Hamilton et al. (1990); W. C. Johnson, Spenser's "Amoretti" (1990); A. R. Jones, The Currency of Eros: Women's Love Lyric in Europe, 1540–1620 (1990); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism (1991); E. Hanson, "Boredom and Whoredom: Reading Renaissance Women's Sonnet Sequences," Yale Journal of Criticism 10 (1997); R. Kuin, Chamber Music: Elizabethan Sonnet Sequences and the Pleasure of Criticism (1998); J. Holmes, Dante Gabriel Rossetti and the Late Victorian Sonnet Sequence (2005); C. Warley, Sonnet Sequences and Social Distinction in Renaissance England (2005); C. Alduy, Politique des "Amours" (1544–1560) (2007), and "Lyric Economies: Manufacturing Values in French Petrarchan Collections," RQ 63 (2010).

R. Greene

SOTADEAN. In cl. poetry, a type of stichic verse usually analyzed as a succession of three complete major ionic metra (– – ∪ ∪) followed by a doubly shortened (brachycatalectic) concluding one (– –). *Resolution and contraction are possible in any metron but the last, as is the substitution of – ∪ – ∪ or, in freer forms of composition, certain other tetrasyllabic variants. The meter was associated with obscene or satiric verse. Most examples are from the late Hellenistic or imperial period, the earliest Gr. ones being by Sotades himself, an Alexandrian poet (3d c. BCE). The sotadean was introduced to Lat. by Ennius, but while it can be found in Plautus, Accius, Varro (Menippean Satires), Petronius (twice), and Martial (3.29), it was never extensively used in Lat. poetry.

■ F. Koch, Ionicorum a maiore historia (1926); Crusius; Halporn et al; West.

A. T. Cole

SOUND

I. Theoretical Overview
II. Articulation, Acoustics, and Cognition
III. Recent Approaches to Sound
IV. Expressivity
V. Sound Effects and Sound Patterning in Poetry
VI. Conclusion

I. Theoretical Overview. This synthetic account of sound in poetry will recognize important devels. in poetry, poetics, literary theory and crit., ling., acoustics, and cognitive science without attempting to privilege one kind of knowledge over another. The topic of sound in poetry often raises an unresolvable theoretical controversy about the nature of poetry, namely, where the *poem exists: concretely on the page, temporally as a spoken verbal utterance, or liminally between the two. If a poem simply exists on the page, then what do its auditory qualities mean? If, as Paul Valéry argued, the poem should be approached as a musical score to be performed aloud, what happens to the poem when it is closed in a book and ceases to be read? The recent profusion of poetry in electronic and recorded media, which seems to present a new medium, a new type of *textuality, or what Ong has called a "secondary orality," nevertheless falls into the same two categories of visual representation on a screen or as hypertext and as oral performance recorded or streamed live. For present purposes, this philosophical antinomy may be resolved pragmatically: the poem exists in tension between the extremes of audible speech and silent reading.

The prosodies of different langs. focus on different qualities of sound (see PROSODY), and *meter typically focuses on one phonological element of lang.—stress, *pitch, or length (i.e., *quantity)—reducing the varying levels of such elements to a binary of more or less prominence. Some meters incorporate a second element in subsidiary patterns. This process, at work in every lang. and developed over time, is not subject to the whims of a poet since the element is intrinsic to the lang. Attempts by poets to select a different marker for the lang. (e.g., Eng. Ren. poets writing in *syllabic verse or quantitative meters) are generally academic exercises, because the lang.'s phonological features will, as Fussell has shown, overrun the intended metrical effect. While such attempts have played a constitutive role in the evolution of poetry and while poets consistently experiment with the limits of a given lang., nevertheless, the phonological limitations on the metrical resources of a lang. will dictate a native speaker's *performance of a poem or experience of one. In short, the rhythm of Eng. will trump syllabic length. Thus, the phonology of a lang. not only decides the meter but also typically locks the poet into the inherited trad.

II. Articulation, Acoustics, and Cognition

A. Articulation. The place and manner of articulation of vowels in the mouth are often graphically represented by a trapezoid broken into nine sections, high to low and front to back. Consonants are created by impeding, through the use of the tongue, lips, and palate, the flow of air at different positions of articulation.

B. Acoustics. According to the science of acoustics, sounds are waves passing through a medium. In the case of voiced poetry, that medium is air (with the Fr. lettrist group of the 1950s, the It. poet Arrigo Lora-Totino experimented with vocalizing poetry through water; see SOUND POETRY). A wave from one crest to another is a single cycle, while the number of cycles per second is the frequency of a sound and is measured in Hertz (Hz). Although the human voice ranges from 100 to 200 Hz, the ear can perceive a range from 20 to 20,000 Hz. Middle C is 261 Hz. The higher the frequency, the higher the pitch. The intensity of the sound, known as stress, is measured in decibels, i.e., amplitude or a sound's overall power (the height and depth of a wave's crests and peaks). Quantity refers to the *duration of a sound. Meter is at stake when these phenomena are applied to syllabic lang. and patterned in accordance—or in opposition to—its rules.

C. Cognition. Contemp. cognitive science holds that the hemispheres of the brain process sound in different ways or to different degrees. While the left hemisphere, which possesses logical and analytical functions, interprets ling. sounds for meaning, the right hemisphere processes ambient sounds and music. Simultaneous words and music, as in song, are analyzed by both hemispheres of the brain at once. For poetry, both hemispheres function in the apprehension and analysis of ling. and aesthetic sounds. The left hemisphere processes speech rhythm and lexical-semantic sounds, while the right analyzes poetic sound patterning and the aesthetics of poetry (Turner attempts to show the relation of cognition to meter). Thus, poetry, using both hemispheres at once, makes use of both ling. sound and poetic sound, mapping both lexical pattern and designed aesthetic patterns. In brain functions themselves exists the dichotomy of the sensuous and the semantic, of sound and sense.

III. Recent Approaches to Sound. The ascendancy of deconstruction during the late 20th c. largely relegated scholarship on sound to linguists and prosodists. Deconstruction's privileging of writing over speech left sound as a large gap in the analysis of poetry. The difference between langs. suggests that words are determined differentially. The difference in a single lang. between words like bit and bat, puck and puke, lock and lick suggested to Saussure that lang. was grounded through differentials, not the presence of word features. As Saussure himself observed, however, the etymological trad. does solidify meaning in practice (see also the discussion of *onomatopoeia below). Meaning depends on both the nature of signifiers and their hist. (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). Change clearly occurs through time, and the various forces of historical ling. are always at work (e.g., Grimm's law, vowel shifts). Transubstantiated as textualité, speech generally becomes a nonissue for deconstructionists and those who read poetry as they do, whether knowingly or not. L'écriture (writing; see ÉCRITURE) trumps lecture (speech) every time for Jacques Derrida; sound becomes a secondary matter in lang., if it matters at all.

However, beyond the meanings that may or may not be produced through the opposition of signifier and signified, lang. can also mean obliquely through *metaphor. Typically, when there is not a word for something, we do not feel the need to invent one, since no one else would know what it means. Rather, metaphor, *simile, and analogy generate meaning where there was none before (see Ricoeur). Metaphorical truth moves beyond arbitrary word-truth and encapsulates a role of poetry. It concedes or ignores the truth of the arbitrary signifier and moves in the opposite direction. While meaning can be perceived as just as unstable within metaphor as in lang., metaphor transcends the sign (sound-image and concept), and meaning at the edge of lang. emerges. The meaning of the tenor and the meaning of the vehicle, when combined, produce something that was not in the originals when they were separate, namely, a poetic meaning (see TENOR AND VEHICLE). Poetic lang. revels in words, while their representational function is diminished. Poets give primary importance to phonological patterning and sound effects. When lang. is transformed into poetry, when pattern is made through sound, and when poetic effects are produced by sound, words construct meaning through their effects on each other and the reader. The following W. B. Yeats line (from "The Lake Isle of Innisfree") aggregates meanings through sound juxtapositions that did not inhere individually in words like lap, lake, low, sound, shore, hear: "I hear lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore." Meaning, constructed and resilient through sound, is produced in poetry outside the signifier-signified dichotomy.

In La révolution du langage poétique (1974), Julia Kristeva gives poetic lang. a sexually charged, prerational, and bodily importance. Essentially, she agrees with both Ezra Pound, i.e., that poetry is lang. charged with meaning to the highest degree (see "How to Read," Literary Essays, 1968), and Jakobson, i.e., that poetic lang. represents standard lang. charged with its infinite possibilities—its study comprehends the becoming of signification, i.e., meaning. She divides the semiotic (i.e., nonverbal signifying systems) from the symbolic but insists that both are inseparable from the signifying process. Kristeva privileges the semiotic as preverbal, libidinal, and corporeal, in opposition to Alexander Pope's rational sound symbolism, as expressed in his Essay on Criticism (1711). The semiotic, however, includes rhythm (its effect on the body) in a variation on Mallarméan poetic mystery and power. According to Kristeva, the communication of libidinal subjectivity is the ultimate object of poetic lang. The sounds of words become their expressive desire and expressive meaning. Thus, they do not echo sense in a rational way but rather echo an individual's unconscious, chthonic drives. Where Pope locates the importance of sound in the mimetic imitation of the meaning of a line, Kristeva finds that poetic sound vibrates deeply in the core of one's being, ultimately agreeing with Roethke and complementing Turner's discussion of poetic rhythm and the brain.

It is also important to recognize the emergence of a poetry that is concerned almost exclusively with the sound of words and not, or at least not primarily, with their meaning. Twentieth-c. devels. in *sound poetry and later *Language poetry exploit the disjunction between signifier and signified, transforming signs into mere sounds divorced from semantic content. The *Dada poems of Hugo Ball or Kurt Schwitters are among the many important forerunners of this line of poetic inquiry. Similarly, Bernstein (1992) has questioned when it is that noise becomes semantically meaningful. There are all varieties of meanings composed at the subsemantic or sublexical units of lang. production (i.e., onomatopoeia, grunts, groans, nonlexical voicings of dissent and agreement, etc.). Where Bernstein disappointingly finds meaning self-embodied by the whole poem, he does provide a starting point for the discussion of nonlexical elements, though not always sound based, within a poem. Such questions find a predecessor in early 20th-c. avant-garde music and the futurist noise-art of Luigi Russolo (see FUTURISM).

Slam poetry, on the other hand, is to a far greater degree concerned with semantic meaning, often a poem's political or moral message (see POETRY SLAM). Such poetry, frequently memorized, is located almost exclusively as an oral phenomenon and later disseminated in textual transcription or recorded performance. Emerging from the convergence of a textual avant-garde, popular music, and the poetry reading, slam poetry created its own oral trad. with its clearest analogues in the 1950s *Beat poets. Its sonic qualities are most typically *alliteration, *assonance, *anaphora, and paromoiosis; thus, its difference from traditional poetry lies mostly in locale.

IV. Expressivity. One debate about sound and poetry, dating to Plato's Cratylus, concerns the inherent meaning in sound; i.e., does sound express meaning? The answer is no, but with numerous qualifications that have fascinated poets. Meaning can clearly be evoked or connoted by sounds as in onomatopoeia (see also the concept of the ideophone in Tedlock), but this kind of meaning in large part corresponds to a historical train of significance. If words are signifying abstractions, onomatopoetic effects seem to express a generalized meaning based on natural phenomena such as animal sounds or water. Ultimately, however, when we examine the written words that langs. have for the sounds animals make, the *trope descends almost to the arbitrariness of most words, e.g., the Eng. woof and the Fr. ouah ouah for the sounds of a dog; likewise, the Gr. barbaros for barbarians was derived from the sounds the Greeks ascribed to other langs. While such words stem etymologically from sound imitation, their meanings are virtually as arbitrary as those of any other signifier, given their subsequent devel.

*Iconicity, the concept that there is an analogy or resemblance between a word and the object to which it refers, was propagated by C. S. Peirce. Mimetic sound effects accordingly become central to the representational system of lang. Subsequent research in the 20th c. demonstrated its existence in all langs. and at every level of ling. structure. For Peirce, the icon, one of three types of *representation, is a sign that resembles its object, however inexactly (pop, hiss, murmur—the names of sounds tend to be onomatopoetic). The *phonestheme (a term coined by J. R. Firth) is a phoneme that has a recognizable semantic association because it appears in numerous words with similar meanings and sounds. Such words seem to have a familiar, natural force on a reader and seem mimetically expressive. In "Vowel and Consonant Patterns in Poetry," Masson has observed this phenomenon in the different connotations of the word for night across langs. Wellek and Warren use the term orchestration for such morphemic echoing in poetry. Perhaps more useful to poetry is kinesthetics, which associates the sound produced or being produced with a semantic meaning (i.e., traditional sound symbolism). Richards (1929) and Ransom (1936) demonstrated, through a dummy version of stanza 15 of John Milton's "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity" and a *parody of Alfred, Lord Tennyson's "Come Down, O Maid," respectively, that the same sounds and the same rhythm, when divorced from original meaning, lose their expressivity. (For an approach to sound expressiveness via pragmatic theory and relevance theory, see Pilkington.)

V. Sound Effects and Sound Patterning in Poetry. However arbitrary sound expressivity may be, readers may often experience an echo of sense in the sound of lines like Homer's "para thina poluphloisboio thalasses" (Iliad 1.34) and Matthew Arnold's "roar / Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling, . . . / Begin, and cease, and then again begin" ("Dover Beach," 9–10, 12), both purporting to imitate the actual sound of waves. Likewise, Milton's fricatives also accentuate meaning, as in "Out of my sight, thou Serpent, that name best / Befits thee with him leagu'd, thyself as false / And hateful" (Paradise Lost, 10.867–69). Any attempt to ascribe meaning to sound, however, should heed the warning proferred by Ransom's parody. Tennyson's "The moan of doves in immemorial elms, / The murmuring of innumerable bees" (30–31) becomes "The murdering of innumerable beeves," which demonstrates that, while sound may well echo sense, the same sounds in different words do not generate the same meanings. Sound as mimetic representation, thus, clearly entails a reader's recognition of the meaning of a line before the meaning of a sound pattern.

There are certain associations made with particular sounds, though there are invariably exceptions. High vowels tend toward brightness, highness, vivacity, sharpness (see COGNITIVE POETICS). P. B. Shelley's "To a Skylark" begins on a shrieking fever pitch of the four highest vowels, "Hail to thee, blithe spirit," setting the tone for the poem. In John Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale," the poet addresses the nightingale in appropriately high vowels in response to the bird's high-pitched song: "light-wingèd Dryad of the trees." By contrast, low vowels tend to convey wholeness, roundness, downness, heaviness, or darkness. Milton's "On the Late Massacre in Piedmont," e.g., is full of low vowels. In the final lines of the *sonnet, Milton's curse on the It. fields is set low, and the last line presents a steady descent "that from these may grow / A hundredfold, who having learnt thy way / Early may fly the Babylonian woe." Keats's ode similarly begins with low vowels of tubercular sleep before it ascends with the prospect of the nightingale—"drowsy numbness," the hemlock "drunk," the "dull opiate," and the speaker Lethe-ward "sunk." The final line of the first stanza alternates high and mid vowels, without low ones, before a striking ascent in the line's last syllable, "Singest of summer in full-throated ease." These associations are not, strictly speaking, meanings of sounds or abstractions but rather connotations that poets have traditionally embraced.

Consonants, too, have their feelings. Liquids, nasals, fricatives, and plosives produce their own peculiar sound effects and are often combined with alliteration. Yeats's famous lapping lake water illustrates sufficiently. The liquid consonants, l and r and sometimes w, are soft and melodic, giving the impression of water and smoothness, as in the famous Yeats line, or, in Keats's Endymion, "Wild thyme, and valley-lilies whiter still / Than Leda's love, and cresses from the rill" (1.157–58), which conveys languor and softness.

Nasals m, n, and ng (as in si*ng*) divert the flow of air into the nasal passage. Tennyson's murmuring bees imitate the insects with the string of nasals. Fricatives include f, th (both in *th*in and *th*en), s, sh, h, v, z, and the sound in the middle of the word "mea*s*ure." Milton consistently plays on fricatives; in Paradise Lost, book 10, Satan addresses the fallen angels as they turn into serpents: "On all sides, from innumerable tongues / A dismal universal hiss, the sound / Of public scorn[.] . . . punisht in the shape he sinn'd, / According to his doom: he would have spoke, / But hiss for hiss return'd . . . to Serpents all as accessories" (507–9, 516–18, 520).

The affricates ch, and j (as in "*j*udge") begin as plosives or stops and then, like the fricatives, rasp through a friction upon airflow. J is voiced, which means the vocal cords vibrate in its pronunciation. Philomel, her tongue cut out, throatily cries "jug, jug."

Plosives or stops—b, d, g, p, t, k—are the harshest consonants and are probably those the most often used to emphasize sense through sound. Yeats's "King Billy bomb balls" ("Lapis Lazuli") explodes in the speaker's mouth, while Pope twice uses plosives to imply constipation: in the Essay on Criticism, poets "Ev'n to the Dregs and Squeezings of the Brain; / Strain out the last, dull droppings of their Sense, / And Rhyme with all the Rage of Impotence" (607–9); and in the "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot" regarding Ambrose Philips, who "Just writes to make his barrenness appear, / And strains from hard-bound brains eight lines a year" (181–82).

In The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animal (1872), Charles Darwin used photographs to examine the facial expressions that occur with particular sounds. While Darwin did not concern himself so much with the actual sounds, Nims uses the photographs to analyze consonant clusters. Darwin reproduced a photograph by Oscar Gustave Rejlander of a woman sneering and exposing part of a canine tooth. Nims observes that most words beginning with the consonant cluster sn are as unpleasant as the expression of the woman in the photograph—sneer itself, snitch, snob, snaggle, snort, and snarl. The short u can be ugsome as in ugh and upchuck, slut, sludge, and pus, and in a photograph of Rejlander himself hamming an expression as he says the word disgusted. Such sounds can, as Nims says, physicalize a poem's meaning.

The use by poets of vowels and consonants to underline meaning in the line is often conjoined with alliteration or other nonfixed sound patterns to emphasize and underline the designed effect. These examples illustrate that, despite the popping of plosives, the mellifluousness of liquids, or the sliding of glides (semivowels w, y, and sometimes j), there is no inherent meaning within the sounds. The issue of sound expressivity or mimetic sound, while not a tenable theoretical position, provides an enactment of meaning or a gesture toward it. Poets dramatically associate sounds with the meaning of a word or line for emphasis or effect.

The archetypical demonstration of auditory pyrotechnics in Pope's Essay on Criticism delivers, as does the poem in its entirety, both the argument and evidence for the claim that "The Sound must seem an Echo to the Sense" (365). A soft wind must be demonstrated by a soft line, as Pope both says and shows through the repetition of the letter s (366–67). The loud, hoarse lines (368–69) likewise enact his own dictum as it roars. However, Pope alliterates with the same s sound, though the line is tempered by consonant clusters and heavy with monosyllables. Pope also envelops the two harsh, roaring *couplets (368–71) between the two soft couplets (366–67 and 372–73). The final two couplets of the passage (370–73), while spectacular for mostly metrical reasons, deserve analysis as well:

> When Ajax strives, some Rock's vast Weight to throw,
> The Line too labors, and the Words move slow;
> Not so, when swift Camilla scours the Plain,
> Flies o'er th'unbending Corn, and skims along the Main.

Ajax's slow, heavy lines are both loaded with monosyllables and consonants (even the typically mellifluous liquids are overpowered as they shudder and heave into the middle of the third foot). The first line of the Camilla couplet again repeats the alliterating s sounds, before moving into the fastest line in the Eng. lang. Line 373 sports more words beginning with vowels than the sole two in the previous Ajax couplet. The *elision and light vowels give the impression of speed. Lines 356–57 before this passage had castigated poets for using needless *alexandrines that are "languishingly slow," but Pope the metrical genius makes his speedy line 373 itself an alexandrine.

Sound pattern, like alliteration, assonance, paromoiosis (the *parallelism between the sounds of words in adjacent clauses or lines), *consonance, and onomatopoeia, can function to tag words of special importance. Sound patterning can then be used to underline the semantic import or key words of a line. Sound schemes are sometimes used to produce a demonstrable pattern on a higher level of design than simple repetition. Masson ("Vowel and Consonant Patterning") observed sequence (abcabc) and *chiasmus (abccba) at work in sound patterning and found them to be in consistent usage. *Envelope (abba) and simpler alternation (abab) of sound can also have broad application, although analysis of such patterns and their complications deserves further study. Consider, e.g., the Yeats line referenced throughout: "lake water lapping with low." The *l*s and w's alternate ababa at the beginning of each word. Such sound patterns can be used alongside rhythm to coincide or *counterpoint, just as, in Latin prosody, it has been suggested that stress was often patterned to coincide with long syllables in the fixed final feet of dactylic *hexameter.

All such sound-patterning shapes order and intensifies meaning and is, thus, essential to the analysis of a poem. *Rhyme is perhaps the most familiar sound patterning in poetry. According to Levý and others (Wimsatt, Hollander), rhyme, which binds two words that would normally not be connected in a prose sentence, produces secondary semantic effects, incl. ironical contrasts with humorous potential. Lord Byron is a master of this technique ("even when he prayed / He turned from grisly saints, and martyrs hairy, / To the sweet portraits of the Virgin Mary" [Don Juan, 2. 149. 6–8]), having learned it from Pope ("But thousands die without or this or that, / Die, and endow a College, or a Cat" ["Epistle to Bathurst," 97–98]). Or as Hopkins said, condensing this matter, "There are two elements in the beauty rhyme has to the mind, the likeness or sameness of sound and the unlikeness or difference of meaning."

VI. Conclusion. Sound, the foundation of lang., ultimately comprises the form and craft of poetry, subsuming meter; the schemes of alliteration, assonance, and rhyme; and the segmental phonemes of vowels and consonants. Such elements of sound have been analyzed with varying degrees of comprehensiveness. (See the only extensive bibl. in Brogan 1981.) There is no appropriate term for sound patterning as there is for *rhythm. Thus, prosody is frequently used to incorporate both metrical and segmental sound patterning.

Some have argued that there is a norm or experiential core behind the varying realizations of a single poem. Correct *scansion and recognition of rhyme depend on historical context. The study of recorded readings seems generally to assume this position by tracking the variety and range of differences. This approach ultimately proves, however, that there is no definitive performance of a poem. While there are a certain number of sounds that a speaker must get right to give a correct reading—the core or norm of the reading of a given poem—there are numerous ling. and nonphonemic differences that can vary from reader to reader while still constituting a perfectly acceptable reading of the poem, as one can discern clearly in the strange-to-modern-ears recordings by Yeats and what can be heard of Tennyson's. This wavering style of recitation, now out of favor, was "author-approved." An analysis of recorded readings should not, of course, be in any way seen as a foray into the realm of authorial *voice or the *intentional fallacy, in that the rightness of a sound is a matter of (1) historical devel. (2) an understanding of poetics, and (3) a recognition of design in a poem that is demonstrably patterned. Effects on a reader might vary, but the fact remains that designed effects occur.

Jakobson believes that every verbal element in a line of verse is transformed into an element of poetry or poetic speech. Though Jakobson's argument cannot be falsified, it is noteworthy in that it reminds a reader that both levels of lang., sound and meaning, intersect at all times in any poem and necessitate a synthetic analysis, treating neither in isolation from the other. At the same time, a systematic analysis of every element of sound, meaning, and their nexus at work is daunting. The interplay of sounds between themselves and on meaning fully expresses and accomplishes the craft of verse, as in T. S. Eliot's concept of the auditory imagination. Poetic lang. constitutes the poem and is creative action.

According to Wallace Stevens, the sound of words is their importance in poetry; sound is the principal business of poetry. The poet harnesses reality and makes a reader's or listener's first response an aesthetic one. As Stevens says, "A poet's words are of things that do not exist without the words." We attempt through words to express the truth of our existence, our thoughts, and feelings. And we respond to these words not only with analysis but with our physical senses, as in the case of William Blake's mellifluous phrasing in "To the Evening Star," "to wash the dusk with silver."

■ F. de Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale (1916); I. A. Richards, Practical Criticism (1929); J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1938); D. I. Masson, "Patterns of Vowel and Consonant in a Rilkean Sonnet," MLR 46 (1951); W. Stevens, "The Noble Rider and the Sound of Words," The Necessary Angel (1951); D. I. Masson, "Vowel and Consonant Patterns in Poetry," JAAC 12 (1953); "Word and Sound in Yeats's 'Byzantium,' " ELH 20 (1953); and "Free Phonetic Patterns in Shakespeare's Sonnets," Neophilologus 38 (1954); W. K. Wimsatt, "One Relation of Rhyme to Reason," The Verbal Icon (1954); J. Hollander, "The Music of Poetry," JAAC 15 (1956); Wellek and Warren; P. Valéry, "Poésie et pensée abstraite," Oeuvres, ed. J. Hytier, v. 1 (1957); The Journals and Papers of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. H. House and G. Storey (1959); D. H. Hymes, "Phonological Aspects of Style," Sebeok; D. I. Masson, "Thematic Analysis of Sound in Poetry," Proceedings of the Leeds Philosophical and Literary Society-Literary and Historical Section 9 (1960); C. S. Peirce, "The Icon, Index, and Symbol," Collected Papers of C. S. Peirce, v. 2, Elements of Logic, ed. C. Hartshorne and P. Weiss (1960); J. Hollander, The Untuning of the Sky (1961); D. I. Masson, "Sound Repetition Terms," Poetics—Poetyka—Poetika, ed. D. Davie et al. (1961); J. R. Firth, The Tongues of Men and Speech (1964); T. Roethke, "Some Remarks on Rhythm," On the Poet and His Craft (1965); A. A. Hill, "A Phonological Description of Poetic Ornaments," L&S 2 (1969); D. I. Masson, "The Keatsian Incantation," John Keats, ed. K. Muir (1969); J. Levý, "The Meanings of Form and the Forms of Meaning," Paralipomena (1971); J. C. Ransom, "Positive and Near-Positive Aesthetics," Beating the Bushes (1972); T. S. Eliot, "Milton I," Selected Prose, ed. F. Kermode (1975); A. A. Hill, "Analogies, Icons, and Images," and "Two Views of Poetic Language and Meaning," Constituent and Pattern in Poetry (1976); D. I. Masson, "Poetic Sound-Patterning Reconsidered," Proceedings of the Leeds Philosophical and Literary Society-Literary and Historical Section 16 (1976)—Masson's sonal summa and survey of eight national lits.; W. K. Wimsatt, "In Search of Verbal Mimesis," The Day of the Leopards (1976); J. M. Lotman, The Structure of the Artistic Text, trans. G. Lenhoff and R. Vroon (1977); P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Metaphor, trans. R. Czerny (1977); P. Fussell, Poetic Meter and Poetic Form, rev. ed. (1979); B. Hrushovski, "The Meaning of Sound Patterns in Poetry," PoT 2 (1980); Brogan; W. J. Ong, Orality and Literacy (1982); R. Chapman, The Treatment of Sounds in Language and Literature (1984); Hollander, "The Poem in the Ear"; F. Turner, "The Neural Lyre," Natural Classicism (1985); G. Stewart, Reading Voices (1990); C. Bernstein, "Artifice of Absorption," A Poetics (1992); J. F. Nims, Western Wind, rev. ed. (1992); R. Tsur, What Makes Sound Patterns Expressive? (1992); H. Gross and R. McDowell, Sound and Form in Modern Poetry, rev. ed. (1996); Close Listening, ed. C. Bernstein (1998); R. Tsur, Poetic Rhythm (1998); A. Pilkington, Poetic Effects (2000); D. Tedlock, "Ideophone," Key Terms in Language and Culture, ed. A. Duranti (2001); N. Fabb, Language and Literary Structure (2002); A. Hecht, "The Music of Forms," Melodies Unheard (2003); C. Noland, "Phonic Matters," PMLA 120 (2005); L. Wheeler, Voicing American Poetry (2008); The Sound of Poetry / The Poetry of Sound, ed. M. Perloff and C. Dworkin (2009); "Wallace Stevens and 'The Less Legible Meanings of Sound,' " The Wallace Stevens Journal 33.1 (2009)—spec. iss; R. Tsur, "The Poetic Function and Aesthetic Qualities: Cognitive Poetics and the Jakobsonian Model," Acta Linguistica Hafniensia 42.1 (2010)—spec. iss.

D. Wood

SOUND POETRY. If poetry is the verbal art in which *sound and sense are arranged in ideal tension, sound poetry (also "sonorist rhythms," "phonetic poetry," or poesie sonore) alters this relationship by multiplying, reducing, or denying semantic reference, while amplifying the phonetic and aural properties of lang. Some sound poems attempt to generate natural signifying relationships between sound and meaning through phonetic symbolism; others use sound as antagonistic or indifferent toward meaning. Sound poems challenge the limits of natural langs. and produce the illusion of lang. before, beyond, or after meaning, from the Adamic to the utopian.

Surveys of sound poetry often furnish it with a long genealogy encompassing all ancient and mod. uses of preverbal speech codes such as *onomatopoeia, *glossolalia, the *incantations of *oral poetry, *nonsense verse like Lewis Carroll's "Jabberwocky," and Stéphane Mallarmé's formulation of inanité sonore. While these codes are among sound poetry's principal resources and precedents, the practice of sound poetry has fairly distinct origins in an extensive, international network of avant-garde poets from the late 19th c. into the 1930s, and it has been extended and theorized by neo–avant-garde poets from the 1940s to the present (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS).

In Europe, nearly all the historical avant-garde movements practiced a version of sound poetry. In the pamphlet Declaration of the Word as Such (1913), the Rus. futurist Aleksei Kruchenykh coined the neologism zaum*' (transrational or beyonsense) to describe poems he had written "in their own language," of which the most notorious example is "Dyr bul schyl," though Velimir Khlebnikov's 1910 "Zaklyatie smekhom" ("Incantation by Laughter") also anticipated this tendency. While Kruchenykh's poems deploy nonce words or write through source texts via lipogrammatic removals of all consonants (see LIPOGRAM) in the attempt to "destroy language" and install referential indeterminacy, more ambitious zaum' poems, such as Khlebnikov's "Zangezi," dramatize a universal lang. of the future that fixes references at varying planes of psychic evolution, purporting to vocalize the speech of gods, birds, and other nonhuman phenomena. The Chilean poet Vicente Huidobro's Altazor (1931), the voyage of a poet-parachutist ejecting himself from the lang. system into what Octavio Paz calls a "post-Babelic" fantasy of ling. reunification, bears comparison (see CREATIONISM).

Experiments contemporaneous to zaum' in Italy include Aldo Palazzeschi's examples of a poetica del divertimento, playful poems in which infantile stutters and syllabic refrains are a refuge for the crepuscular poet discarded by the culture of modernity. Although he was briefly associated with It. *futurism, Palazzeschi's ludic sound has little in common with F. T. Marinetti's parole in libertà (words in freedom), a poetry that attempts to enact a synthetic *mimesis of the city or mod. warfare, most often through martial onomatopoeias such as Zang Tumb Tuum (1912). Guillaume Apollinaire voiced a familiar objection in his remark that this scientific notation of machine noise could be faulted as "gags" or trompe-oreilles.

In the germanophone context, *Dada sound poetry built on examples of nonsense poetry like that of Christian Morgenstern. Most often cited among the many varieties of sound poetry produced by the Dadaists, Hugo Ball's "gadji beri bimba," a cycle of five lautgedichte (noise poems) or verse ohne worte (wordless verses), posited a primitive refounding of the word in reaction to the commodification of lang. Performed at the Zurich Cabaret Voltaire in 1916, these poems offer a prophetic authority for sound poetry based on a magical "innermost alchemy" of antiquated words and a liturgical performance register, while also suggesting the babbling repetitions of a traumatized soldier. Other Dada sound poetry, such as Kurt Schwitters's lengthy Ursonata, established musical protocols and structuring devices for sound poetry, and Raoul Housmann's "optophonetic poetry" pioneered typographical notation systems for performance volume, tempo, and duration. Tristan Tzara and Richard Hülsenbeck employed the ethnographic imitation of Af. sounds, which North has identified as a ling. form of racial masquerade. Dada had a poorly documented but marked impact on the vanguard poets of the Sp. Caribbean, such as Luis Palés Matos, yet the misappropriation of pseudo-African vocables by Dada chantes negres must be sharply distinguished from the sound motifs characteristic of negrismo poetry of the late 1920s and 1930s such as that of Nicolás Guillén, who is also identified with the use of the *jitanjáfora inaugurated by the Cuban poet Mariano Brull's "Leyenda" (1928).

Despite the increasingly self-aware, international proliferation of sound poetry as a genre—esp. from 1910 to 1930—no poetry advertised itself as such in the Anglo-Am. trad. at that time. Sound play in the work of James Joyce and Gertrude Stein was instrumental to the late modernist notion of "the revolution of the word," and even Louis Armstrong's scat has been proposed as a cousin to sound poetry. However, the emergent orthodoxies of New Critical *formalism (see NEW CRITICISM) make T. S. Eliot's 1942 remark a mainstay of the anglophone view well into the postwar period: "We can be deeply stirred by hearing the recitation of a poem in a language of which we understand no word; but if we are then told that the poem is gibberish and has no meaning, we shall consider that we have been deluded—this was no poem, it was merely an imitation of instrumental music." As if anticipating and flounting such objections, Dada bruitisme and Rus. zaum' persistently employ *xenoglossia as a device. Indeed, the deliberate use of incomprehensible foreign langs. is a primary asemantic speech code in which sound poetry traffics, often in open response to the diasporic displacements of global cultures. Performed in the langs. of three warring nations at once, Tzara's 1916 "Simultaneist" poem "L'amiral cherche une maison à louer" (The Admiral Searches for a House to Rent) dilates this technique.

While even its staunchest proponents, such as Jolas, considered sound poetry to be a limited ling. strategy in the wake of World War II, the genre has a rich postwar life in Fr. lettrisme*, esp. in the work of Isidore Isou (1925–2007) and Henri Chopin (1922–2008), as well as in that of Bob Cobbing (1920–2002) in England, Ernst Jandl (1925–2000) in Austria, Jackson Mac Low (1922–2004) in the U.S., and later bpNichol (1944–88) and Steve McCaffery (b. 1947) in Canada. McCaffery, alongside Chopin and Fluxus artist Dick Higgins (1938–98), have been instrumental to the validation of sound poetry as a historical genre and performance practice. The U.S. Language poets emergent in the 1970s bear out that influence, as in Bernstein's remark in "Artifice of Absorption" that "there is no fixed / threshold at which noise becomes phonically / significant; the further back this threshold is / pushed, the greater the resonance at the cutting / edge" (see LANGUAGE POETRY). With some exceptions, Chopin's distinction holds that sound poetry before World War II is phonetic poetry, preserving an attachment to words and syllables as compositional units, while, after the war, lettrisme arbitrarily assigns phonic values to letters, moving sound poetry toward performance scores for "sub-phonemic" levels of noise. Postwar practitioners have placed greater emphasis on nontextual performance and recording media, often disseminating poems by tape recorder as in the works of François Dufrêne and stressing ambitious research programs over ludic play. Still, much *concrete poetry includes an active sound component, and the long *visual poetry trad. runs in tandem with that of sound poetry, as typographical innovations often enhance or dictate performance standards (see TYPOGRAPHY).

*Voice has become a major theoretical issue for sound poetry. Antonin Artaud's scream poems and Michael McClure's "beast language" offer an affiliation to sound poetry that reconnects the voice to biological priorities, while McCaffery has rethought the voice as a "paleotechnic" instrument in a wider media ecology. A third critical view, exemplified by the philosopher Giorgio Agamben, holds that written, asemantic speech codes are the textual figuration of embodied voice, opening poetry to an "unheard dimension sustained in the pure breath of the voice, in mere vox as insignificant will to signify." A countertendency could be located in a group of sound collagists and aleators working in the trad. of John Cage, for whom the approximation of lang. to noise often eschews the voice as a unifying performance principle in favor of random and found materials (see ALEATORY POETICS and CONSTRAINT).

Sound poetry has a complex but coherent status in the hist. of poetic forms, but it should be stressed that sound poetry also belongs to a hist. of dissonance and noise in 20th-c. cinema, music, phonographic reproduction, and radio, and emerges not by coincidence in a transformative historical period for auditory technologies. The generation of sound poets now reaching maturity, such as the Canadian poet Christian Bök (b. 1966), has suggested that the "theurgical," antitechnological reaction of early sound poets such as Hugo Ball is untenable for contemp. poets who may be the first "who can reasonably expect in our lifetime to write poems for a machinic audience." Bök's work in progress The Cyborg Opera refigures the sound poetry inheritance for an "undreamt poetics of electronica" or a "spoken techno" that he allies with the technical virtuosity of beatboxers such as Razael. Bök reimagines sound poems as participants in a "growing digital culture," as in his lettristic drum kit notation systems ("Bhm--T-Nsh--tpt'Bhm--T--Nsh [thsss]"), and he also systematically plumbs vernacular phonetic patterns: "my tongue muttering / an unsung lettering."

■ A. Reyes, "Las jitanjáforas," in La experiencia literaria (1942); I. Isou, Introduction à une Nouvelle Poésie et une Nouvelle Musique (1947); E. Jolas, "From the Jabberwocky to Lettrisme," Transition 1 (1948); G. Apollinaire, "The New Spirit and the Poets," Selected Writings, trans. R. Shattuck (1950); T. S. Eliot, "The Music of Poetry," Selected Prose, ed. F. Kermode (1975); H. Chopin, Poésie Sonore Internationale (1979); Sound Poetry, ed. S. McCaffery and bpNichol (1979); J. Schnapp, "Politics and Poetics in F. T. Marinetti's Zang Tumb Tuuum," Stanford Italian Review 5.1 (1985); O. Paz, Convergences, trans. H. Lane (1987); C. Bernstein, "Artifice of Absorption," A Poetics (1992); G. Janecek, Zaum (1996); M. North, The Dialect of Modernism (1997); G. Agamben, "Pascoli and the Thought of the Voice," The End of the Poem, trans. D. Heller-Roazen (1999); D. Kahn, Noise, Water, Meat: A History of Sound in the Arts (1999); S. McCaffery, Prior to Meaning (2001); T. J. Demos, "Circulations: In and Around Zurich Dada," October 105 (2003); C. Dworkin, "To Destroy Language," Textual Practice 18 (2004); The Sound of Poetry / The Poetry of Sound, ed. M. Perloff and C. Dworkin (2009).

■ Discography/Web Resources: Text Sound Compositions, RELP 1049, 1054, 1072–74, 1102–03 (1968–70)—seven records of the Stockholm festivals of sound poetry (partly available on UbuWeb); Futura: Poesia Sonora, ed. A. Lora-Totino, Cramps 5206-301–307 (1978)—six-record international anthol., available on UbuWeb, http://www.ubu.com (best audio resource on sound poetry).

■ Periodicals: Ou, ed. H. Chopin (1963–68); Stereo Headphones, ed. N. Zurbrugg (1969–)—most issues include records.

H. FEINSOD

SOUTH AFRICA, POETRY OF

I. Afrikaans
II. English

I. Afrikaans. The first examples of poetry in Afrikaans date from the late 19th c. and formed part of efforts to raise the political consciousness of Afrikaner people by elevating the status of the spoken lang. Afrikaans—derived from the 17th-c. Dutch spoken by the first colonizers of the Cape of Good Hope and influenced by Malay, Creole-Port., Ger., Fr., southern Nguni langs., and Eng.—to the status of a written lang. with its own lit. Because of the racially divided nature of South Af. society, this process partly excluded Afrikaans speakers of mixed racial descent who played a significant role in the devel. of the lang. The primary aims of the early Afrikaans poets were to inspire readers to fight for the official recognition of their lang., to educate, and to entertain. To do this, they focused on the lives of ordinary burghers, their folklore, South Africa as fatherland, religion, and topical events, also using humor in poems that contained elements of the surreal or absurd. The style was mostly rhetorical rather than original, naïve rather than sophisticated.

After the Anglo-Boer War (1899–1902), attempts to standardize Afrikaans and produce a body of lit. in that lang. gathered renewed impetus; Afrikaans gained official status only in 1925. This process gained credibility through the greater sophistication and literary sensibility displayed by poets of the "first generation": Jan F. E. Celliers (1865–1940), Totius (pseud. of J. D. du Toit, 1877–1953), and C. Louis Leipoldt (1880–1947). Their early volumes show the effects of the war, but their work included other subjects (the landscape, religion, historical themes, political matters), as well as a variety of poetic techniques and styles, incl. *free verse and the dramatic *monologue.

The following generation added new elements to the repertoire of Afrikaans poetry, such as greater individualism, eroticism, and cl. allusions; but it did not make the same impact as its predecessors. Toon van den Heever (1894–1956) can be regarded as the most important of the new poets, while older poets like Eugène Marais (1871–1936) and A. G. Visser (1878–1929) also published distinctive work in the 1920s. Marais explored new terrain in the volume Dwaalstories en ander vertellings (Rain Bull and Other Tales from the San, 1927), a small collection of stories and poems based on the oral trad. of the San tribe.

The early 1930s brought an important renewal in Afrikaans poetry with the emergence of a group of poets (N. P. van Wyk Louw [1906–70], W.E.G. Louw [1913–80], Uys Krige [1910–87], Elisabeth Eybers [1915–2007]) who consciously reflected on their vocation as artists. They argued for a lit. that would adhere to the highest possible aesthetic and artistic standards, taking the best in Dutch, Ger., Eng., Fr., and Sp. lit. as their benchmark. Their poetry was known for its confessional nature and explorations of inner life but also turned to topics such as hist., religion, philosophy, and politics. All these poets built important oeuvres in the subsequent decades; van Wyk Louw achieved the highest status with works such as the epic poem Raka (1942) and the volume Tristia (1962). Eybers dealt with female experience in poems of great sobriety and technical refinement in an oeuvre that spanned nearly 60 years.

The poets who made their debut in the late 1940s (D. J. Opperman [1914–85], Ernst van Heerden [1916–97], S. V. Petersen [1914–87], Olga Kirsch [1924–97], G. A. Watermeyer [1917-72]) reflected the reality of a modernizing, urban, postwar world in the themes, imagery, and formal attributes of their work. The most important poet of this generation was Opperman, whose poetry distinguished itself through its concrete imagery, symbolic layering, and verbal economy as well as its portrayal of racial tension in South Af. society. High points are the epic poem Joernaal van Jorik (Jorik's Journal, 1949) and the volume Blom en baaierd (Flower and Chaos, 1956).

The 1960s brought revolutionary change to Afrikaans lit., signaling the beginning of a strong antihegemonic strain in Afrikaans. This was preceded by the work of certain poets in the late 1950s. The immigrant Peter Blum (1925–90) published only two volumes before leaving South Africa in the early 1960s but remains acclaimed for the sophisticated, satirical, and challenging nature of his work. Ingrid Jonker's (1933–65) poetry is known for its surreal imagery and spontaneous musicality. She became an iconic figure after her early suicide and is esp. remembered for her poem "Die kind" (The Child) about the shooting of a child during political unrest in 1960. In this period, political verse was also written by Barend Toerien (1921–2009) and Adam Small (b. 1936), who used the Cape vernacular in his volume Kitaar my kruis (Guitar My Cross, 1961). The most radical departure from the existing trad. came with the work of Breyten Breytenbach (b. 1939), who made his debut in 1964. Under the influence of the Fr. surrealists and the Dutch experimental poets of the 1950s (see SURREALISM; LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE), Breytenbach wrote powerfully original free verse that transgressed boundaries through its use of every available register of lang. and the inclusion of startling imagery, explicit erotic content, and political commentary. Breytenbach's poetry also introduced Zen Buddhism to the largely Protestant Afrikaans trad.

The 1970s saw the emergence of several strong women poets. The most important of these were Sheila Cussons (1922–2004), who brought Catholic mysticism to Afrikaans poetry; Wilma Stockenström (b. 1933), who probed human insignificance within the vast theater of the Af. landscape; and Antjie Krog (b. 1952), who explored the compromised position of the creative woman in a patriarchal and racist society.

Although there were a number of new poets in the 1970s and 1980s who addressed existential issues in the traditional mode (Lina Spies [b. 1939], I. L. de Villiers [1936–2009], Petra Müller [b. 1935], T. T. Cloete [b. 1924]), this period also brought the introduction of poetry that openly explored gay sexuality (Lucas Malan [1946–2010], Johann de Lange [b. 1959], Joan Hambidge [b. 1956]), as well as "struggle poetry," written by mixed-race poets (Peter Snyders [b. 1939], Clinton V. du Plessis [b. 1963], Patrick Petersen [1951–97], Marius Titus [b. 1946]) in protest against the apartheid regime.

After the first democratic election in South Africa in 1994, new themes emerged under the pressure of the changing political and social landscape. Apart from exploring existing themes, poets focused on identity issues (Krog, Ronelda Kamfer [b. 1981]), ownership of the land (Krog, Bernard Odendaal [b. 1955]), ecological questions (Johann Lodewyk Marais [b. 1956], Martjie Bosman [b. 1954]), the position of Afrikaans in a multilingual society (Breytenbach, Diana Ferrus [b. 1953], Spies), and the new South Africa as a dystopia plagued by poverty, crime, and corruption (Toerien, Louis Esterhuizen [b. 1955]). In recent years Afrikaans poetry has seen a narrative turn, with poets using narrative elements, a parlando style, and a more accessible manner of writing in reaction to the existing trad. of hermetic poetry.

Although doubts were expressed about the sustainability of Afrikaans poetry around the change of the millennium, it regained its vigor and vitality by the end of the new century's first decade, showing an increase in the number of volumes pub. since 2005, as well as a lively interest in the Versindaba Web site (http://versindaba.co.za/) established to promote Afrikaans poetry.

II. English. South Africa first appears in Eng. poetry in the work of John Donne, John Milton, and John Dryden, in the wake of the Port. Luís de Camões, who creates in his epic The Lusiads (1572) the vivid mythological character Adamastor to stand for the dangers of the Cape of Good Hope. Anonymous Brit. visitors to South Africa, wintering from service in India, brought poetry to its shores, which, in 1820, became substantially colonized by Eng. speakers. The first South Af. Eng. poet as such, Thomas Pringle (1789–1834), emigrated from Scotland to the Eastern Frontier and adapted Scottish border *ballads and the Wordsworthian reverie for lyrics such as the widely anthologized "Afar in the Desert." Pringle also established The South African Literary Journal in 1824.

In 19th-c. South Africa, the violent conflict among Dutch speakers, indigenous blacks, and the Brit. gave rise to an alternate popular trad. of antiemancipationist verse in the person of Andrew Geddes Bain (1797–1863), who in the Victorian era used his polyglot resources for humorous purposes. His successor, Albert Brodrick (1830–1908), wrote of the diamond fields, the goldfields, and the early process of industrialization.

The Anglo-Boer War, which became a media event (incl. the first newsreels), was the first major occasion of 20th-c. *war poetry that extended into World War I. Rudyard Kipling on the jingo side advocated imperial progress; Thomas Hardy mourned the losses due to the imperial war in poems such as "Drummer Hodge" and "The Man He Killed." Meanwhile, Beatrice Hastings (1879–1943), born in London and raised in South Africa, defended home rule through her writings for the jour. New Age (1909–14). Black poets, particularly in multilingual newspapers, began a trad. of protest against deprivation of human rights, which persists to the present day.

After the Union of South Africa was established in 1910, Natal produced two major poets whose careers developed around the cultural magazine Voorslag in the 1920s: Roy Campbell (1901–57) and William Plomer (1903–73). Both eventually settled in Europe to pursue right-wing and left-wing politics, respectively. Campbell's early The Flaming Terrapin (1924) combined influences from *imagism and *symbolism to assert a futuristic Af. life force, while Plomer's successive volumes of 1927 maintained a democratic, satirical view of the segregated south.

After World War II, many returning soldier-poets, such as Anthony Delius (1916–89) and Guy Butler (1918–2001), asserted a "stranger-to-Europe" view of their local culture with a white Af. sense of belonging in the subcontinent. This, in turn, produced the jours., societies, and academic disciplines that constructed South Af. Eng. poetry as at least somewhat independent of the Brit. mainstream.

With the accession to power of the Afrikaner apartheid government in 1948, Eng. as a cultural medium moved into an oppositional role that has produced a lit. of resistance written by blacks and whites alike. The banning or forcing into exile of many poets in the 1960s, such as Dennis Brutus (1924–2009) and Mazisi Kunene (1930–2006), further fragmented the poetry into an international diaspora whose links to the internal scene were sometimes tenuous. But in 1971, with Sounds of a Cowhide Drum by Oswald Mtshali (b. 1940), a period of intense internal publication commenced and gave rise to the Black Consciousness movement, notably in the work of Sipho Sepamla (b. 1932), Keroapetse Kgositsile (b. 1938), and Mongane Serote (b. 1944), sometimes known (after the June 1976 uprising) as "Soweto poets."

The struggle over the end of apartheid, from the 1980s to the 1990s, led poets to question the role and importance of poetry in resisting continuing effects of colonialism and reimagining the newly democratic nation after 1994. Important poets of the 1980s include Douglas Livingstone (1932–96), Lionel Abrahams (1928–2004), Stephen Gray (b. 1941), Jeni Couzyn (b. 1942), Christopher Hope (b. 1944), and Jeremy Cronin (b. 1949). With the transition to democracy, South Af. poetry—like other postcolonial poetries in Eng.—has become increasingly transnational and global in thematic content and cross-cultural formal experimentation. Writing in traditional Eng. forms, Ingrid de Kok (b. 1951) borrows from Brit., Ir., Am., and Caribbean poetic trads. Born in South Africa but living in New York, Yvette Christiansë (b. 1954) writes of overlapping Af. Am. and South Af. hists. of racism and diaspora. Although many South Africans vigorously promoted the antiapartheid struggle, they have also been sharply critical of the ineffectiveness of South Africa's postapartheid governments in transforming the social order. *Performance poetry by Gcina Mhlophe (b. 1959), Lesego Rampolokeng (b. 1965), and Vonani Bila (b. 1972), among others, has been a powerful venue for making black South Af. experiences seen and heard, both at home and abroad. A younger generation of poets includes Seitlhamo Motsapi (b. 1966), Rustum Kozain (b. 1966), Mxolisi Nyezwa (b. 1967), Gabeba Baderoon (b. 1969), and Isobel Dixon (b. 1969). Jours. as diverse as Botsotso, Carapace, New Coin, and Timbila; the publishing houses Snail Press and Deep South; and online resources such as Poetry International have published an abundance of South Af. poems. South Af. poetry is marked by its ling. and ethnic hybridity: poets of many ethnic backgrounds borrow from indigenous and foreign cultural resources to embody the diversity of South Africa, whether their work concerns violence and poverty, HIV/AIDS and economic globalization, race and sexuality, the domestic and the everyday, or poetry itself.

See AFRICA, POETRY OF; COLONIAL POETICS; POSTCOLONIAL POETICS; XHOSA POETRY; ZULU POETRY.

■ Afrikaans. Anthologies: Afrikaans Poems with English Translations, ed. A. P. Grové and C.J.D. Harvey (1962); The New Century of South African Poetry, ed. M. Chapman (2002); Groot verseboek Deel 1–3, ed. A. Brink (2008). Criticism and History: Perspektief en Profiel Deel 1–3, ed. H. P. van Coller (1998, 1999, 2006); J. C. Kannemeyer, Geskiedenis van die Afrikaanse literatuur 1652–2004 (2005).

■ English. Anthologies: Centenary Book of South African Verse, ed. F. C. Slater, 2d ed. (1945); A Book of South African Verse, ed. G. Butler (1959); Penguin Book of South African Verse, ed. J. Cope and U. Krige (1968); Return of the Amasi Bird: Black South African Poetry (1891–1981), ed. T. Couzens and E. Patel (1982); Soweto Poetry, ed. M. Chapman (1982); Modern South African Poetry, ed. S. Gray (1984); Paperbook of South African English Poetry, ed. M. Chapman (1986); Penguin Book of Southern African Verse, ed. S. Gray (1988); Breaking the Silence: A Century of South African Women's Poetry, ed. C. Lockett (1990); Essential Things: An Anthology of New South African Poetry, ed. A. W. Oliphant (1992); The Heart in Exile: South African Poetry in English, 1990–95, ed. L. de Kock and I. Tromp (1996); The Lava of This Land: South African Poetry, 1960–1996, ed. D. Hirson (1997); Ten South African Poets, ed. A. Schwartzman (1999); The New Century of South African Poetry, ed. M. Chapman (2002); It All Begins: Poems from Postliberation South Africa, ed. R. Berold and K. Sole (2003); Botsotso: An Anthology of Contemporary South African Poetry, ed. A. K. Horwitz and K. Edwards (2009). Criticism and History: G. M. Miller and H. Sergeant, A Critical Survey of South African Poetry in English (1957); M. van Wyk Smith, Drummer Hodge: The Poetry of the Anglo-Boer War (1978); M. Chapman, South African English Poetry (1984); Companion to South African English Literature, ed. D. Adey et al. (1986); M. Van Wyk Smith, Grounds of Contest: A Survey of South African English Literature (1989); Writing South Africa: Literature, Apartheid, Democracy, 1970–1995, ed. D. Attridge and R. Jolly (1998); S. Nuttall, Entanglement: Literary and Cultural Reflections on Post-Apartheid (2000); A. O'Brien, Against Normalization: Writing Radical Democracy in South Africa (2001); D. Attwell, Rewriting Modernity: Studies in Black South African Literary History (2006); S. Graham, South African Literature after the Truth Commission (2009).

L. Viljoen (Afrikaans); S. Gray, O. Hena (Eng.)

SOUTH AMERICA, POETRY OF. See argentina, poetry of; bolivia, poetry of; brazil, poetry of; chile, poetry of; colombia, poetry of; ecuador, poetry of; gaucho poetry; guaraní poetry; indigenous americas, poetry of the; mapuche poetry; peru, poetry of; uruguay, poetry of; venezuela, poetry of.

SPACE, POETIC. Changing concepts of geographical relationships and accelerating processes of globalization, sometimes referred to as the spatial turn in cultural and social theory, can be identified in mod. and contemp. poetic practice. Lefebvre, in The Production of Space, explains that space is produced by human activity, rather than that activity occurring in an already existing space. The *free-verse poem can also be characterized as producing its own space, spreading over the page in unpredictable ways and ungoverned by any quantitative or qualitative regularity. Critics also have consistently questioned the idea of "place," a staple of romantic and postromantic poetry. Place becomes more than a bounded area within space and the accumulation of its own hists.; for Massey (1994, 2005) and other geographers, it is characterized as much by its interconnectedness as its exclusiveness. A "sense of place" becomes relational and its scale global. While national and regional poetries often use an idea of place to authenticate national identity or as unified places of resistance to colonial or imperial power through collapsing hist. into geography (see Gillian Clarke and R. S. Thomas in Wales, e.g., or Seamus Heaney in Ireland), other more experimental poets (Charles Olson in the U.S. or Roy Fisher or Lee Harwood in the U.K.) draw on a broader range of information to demonstrate the incoherent nature of places and their intersections. *Language poetry, a politicized movement from the U.S. that began in the 1970s, emphasized structuralist and synchronic ling. relationships within poetry to demonstrate the ways that lang. asserted and maintained structures of cultural and social power and control. As a consequence, the Language poets produced work that often lacked any relationship with an identifiable place in the material world. If there is a place in Language poetry, then it might be the specific poem itself, while space is that of the general lang. system. More recent poetry in the U.K. and U.S. has reintegrated a sense of place (and voice), while avoiding the more reductive or exclusive claims of earlier place-based work. It has developed elusive geographies and produced identities that reflect the process of the production of places and meanings that slip away or recombine into new meanings as perspectives and spatial configurations change.

The poem, in the process of its construction, also produces the space of the page. If, in an oral culture, poetry is distinguished by *rhythm and *rhyme (and Ezra Pound described rhythm as a form cut into time), then in page-based work, the visual design of the work becomes a poetic characteristic. A *sonnet, e.g., may be identified by its shape, and the regularity of the rhythm and rhyme of a poem such as E. A. Poe's "The Raven" may be guessed at by the regularity of the space it produces on the page. Free-verse poetry—the poem "All Fours," pub. in the 1990s by the Brit. poet Tom Raworth, is one example—often uses the visual appearance of the poem as part of the overall meaning. In "All Fours," the title foreshadows the four-line stanzas, their regularity accentuated not by patterns of stress or syllabic count but by a broadly similar line length, an absence of punctuation marks and capital letters, and the four walls of the house that features in the poem and a human figure that is on "all fours." Other work, ranging from Stéphane Mallarmé's Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice) to Eugen Gomringer's "silencio," uses the space the poem produces on the page to challenge the reading process itself. Mallarmé's text is characterized by the distribution of lines in a variety of fonts across the page in such a way that no single order to the lines or words is paramount and that different readings might produce new combinations. Gomringer's "silencio" baffles in a different way; its design suggests both reading the word from left to right, with a pause in the center, and a response that might itself be silence. Later poems by Brit. poet Bob Cobbing often have no text at all or occasional broken or fragmented words, and their performance often consists of subverbal sounds and gestures, giving a "time" to the space of the page. More contemp. poets have a range of digital tools with which to combine the spatial aspects of *concrete poetry with the time-based aspects of its performance.

A number of spatial concepts have been used to describe poetic form: the constellation (particularly in concrete or *visual poetry), the *collage in modernist experimental work, mapping as a process of making meaning, the rhizomatic as a description of ling. relationships in a poem, the nomadic as a process of inhabiting space without controlling it, and the situationist derive as a process of composition. Poets and critics often speak of the "architecture" of the poem and the ling. material as building blocks, as if the poem had three-dimensional form. The poetry resulting from these concepts tends to be governed by a logic of coincidence and contiguity. Things happen to be next to each other at the same time. Rather than the logic of cause and effect or a poem constructed from a single lyric voice that gives the "truth" of moments or relationships, such poems tend to produce multiple perspectives that destabilize any movement toward a single meaning. It is a distinction that may be exemplified by the shift in Frank O'Hara's work from the voice-driven "I do this, I do that" poems that apparently record O'Hara's walks through New York to the multivoiced "t.v." poems in "The End of the Far West" sequence that he wrote at the end of his life, where he combines voices from various sources on a fragmented ling. surface with a shifting left-hand margin. The rhizomatic, a concept taken from Deleuze and Guattari, describes a system without a center and without coordinates. It cannot be plotted. If collagist aesthetics and those of the *fragment are largely structuralist and synchronic, then the rhizome is poststructuralist and diachronic and concerned with simultaneously deconstructing space as it produces it. It has direction but also always has motion or flow and has no beginning or ending. These spatial concepts are descriptions of processes of composition but also support readings of a variety of "postmodern" and contemp. poems, in working with texts that seem stubbornly to resist closure and support varieties of competing meanings.

See COMPOSITION BY FIELD, CONCEPTUAL POETRY, TOPOS.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: An Anthology of Concrete Poetry, ed. E. Williams (1967); Poems for the Millennium, ed. J. Rothenberg, P. Joris, J. Robinson, 3 v. (1995–2009).

■ Criticism and Theory: G. Bachelard, The Poetics of Space, trans. M. Jolas (1964); G. Deleuze and F. Guattari, Anti-Oedipus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia, trans. R. Hurley et al. (1977); The L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E Book, ed. B. Andrews and C. Bernstein (1984); D. Harvey, The Condition of Postmodernity (1990); H. Lefebvre, The Production of Space (1991); D. Massey, Space, Place and Gender (1994); M. Davidson, Ghostlier Demarcations (1997); P. Barry, Contemporary Poetry and the City (2000); D. Massey, For Space (2005); I. Davidson, Ideas of Space in Contemporary Poetry (2007), and Radical Spaces of Poetry (2010).

I. DAVIDSON

SPAIN, POETRY OF

I. To 1700
II. 1700 to the Present

I. To 1700

A. Early Romance Orality. The origins of poetry in Spain are neither national nor exclusively Sp. Poetry flourished with many arts and sciences in med. Iberia under Muslim rule (711–1492). Thriving poetic communities in Ar. and Heb. antedate the earliest record (ca. 1042) of verse in Sp. (then called romance or Romance), in turn a century later than the first extant prose example. First recovered in 1948 by S. M. Stern, the kharjas*, fragments in Mozarabic Romance (the lang. spoken by Christians living in Muslim territory) or vernacular Ar., serve as lyric codas to *panegyric and erotic poems written in cl. Ar. and Heb. Used in *Al-Andalus (Muslim Spain) during the cultural flowering of the 10th and 11th cs., these brief single-rhymed *refrains stand in marked contrast to the longer muwashshaḥ. Yet the separate parts are yoked in perfect symbiosis: the young girl's love-longing serves as a figure for a male speaker's formal expressions of humility, gratitude, or expectation to a political superior. Kharjas and muwashshaḥāt were invented and cultivated by leading Andalusian poets of the 11th–13th cs., incl. King al-Mutamid, Ibn Quzmān (1078–1160), Jehudah Halevi (ca. 1074–1141), Moses Ibn Ezra (1055–1135), and Todros Abulafia (1247–after 1300). Both forms speak eloquently of med. cultural interaction among Arabs, Christians, and Jews.

The vernacular refrains point to the existence of an oral Romance trad. of love lyrics in the feminine voice. The Galician-Port. cantiga de amigo (a girl's song for her beloved), dating to the late 12th c., launches the collaborative poetic trad. known as lírica de tipo popular (lyric of the popular type). Its earliest forms, refrain-based, are the zéjel* or zajal (another peninsular innovation in Ar.), villancico*, and cossante*. Codified, colloquial female-voiced poetry forms one of the strongest strands of Sp. *lyric. Its direct eroticism, set in the natural fertility of agrarian life, is heard in contrast with the tortured male-voiced codes of Occitan and Sp. courtly poetry and the tendentious voices of *epic and philosophical and didactic verse.

Cantiga* forms, intermingled with Occitan themes and song types, are also found in male-voiced lyric, most famously in the Cantigas de Santa María of Alfonso X el Sábio (the Wise; 13th c.), who offers himself as Mary's "troubadour," promising to abandon objects of idolatrous devotion. The 420 cantigas fuse praise and petitions with testimonials to Mary's intervention on behalf of efforts to return southern Spain to Christian control. Its text and musical notation, preserved in a ms. richly illuminated with scenes from the Toledan court and the frontier with Islam, constitute an invaluable resource for studying the intertwining of art and life in 13th-c. Spain.

It is telling that the first instances of Iberian Romance lyric should perform poetic crossings of lines of gender, race, lang., and class. In kharjas, muwashshaḥāt, and cantigas is foreshadowed the complex coexistence of multiple codes and compositional forms, each bearing traces of different national and ling. origins, that is a hallmark of Sp. poetry. In the later med. and early mod. periods, the interweaving of motifs and langs. shapes voices, works, genres, movements, and literary polemics. The strength of early oral lyric also works to extend poetry's ties with music well into the early mod. period.

B. Medieval Epic and Religious Verse. Epic trads. germinated in the conflicted political and social world of the so-called Reconquista (Reconquest). The Poema del Cid, saga of the life and deeds of Rodrigo Díaz de Vivar, is the most complete cantar de gesta (see CAN-TAR, CHANSON DE GESTE), composed in the 12th c. and extant in a 1207 copy by the cleric Per Abat (Peter Abbott). Like other poems of the *minstrel school (mester de juglaría) lost and only partially reconstructed (Poema de Fernán González, Los siete Infantes de Lara), Abbott's version of the Poema del Cid draws on hist. and legend for its two plots, the hero's exile and his daughters' unfortunate marriages, stories connected through King Alfonso VI and his vassal's shared quest to restore Rodrigo's honor. The rise of Castile to political leadership and the emergence of Castilian as the dominant Iberian vernacular are both reflected and enabled by this remarkable poem, laced with appeals to a communal audience to endorse standards of vassalage, Christian soldiery, familial devotion, and personal honor. Among the poem's vividly rendered voices are Rodrigo weeping as he goes into exile, his men and wife Ximena, the young girl who defies the king's order to shun Rodrigo, hoodwinked Jewish moneylenders, and Moors calling on a Christian to rescue them from their rulers.

The broad popularity of minstrel sagas becomes clear in succeeding centuries with the emergence of the romance* (*ballad), the most uniquely Sp. of poetic forms. Early ballads adapt epic into octosyllabic verses with a single assonant rhyme on even lines and no strophic division, creating a model still standard in the 21st c. Like the cantares de gesta, the anonymous ballads of the Romancero Viejo (Old Balladry) were *performance art, acted and sung for audiences before being transcribed and provided with musical scores beginning in the 14th c. Ballad families include tales from national hist. and legend (King Rodrigo, blamed for Muslim dominance, and celebrated in epic episodes), frontier encounters (Reconquest sieges, intrigues involving Christians, Moors, and half-castes), Carolingian chivalric material, and "novelesque" songs about faithful wives, adulterers, incest, prisoners, and sentimental treason (as in the famous "Fontefrida" [Cooling Fount]). As a group, according to Gilman, ballads speak a distinct poetic lang., used to conjure a shared past and a communal present. Ballad speeches often become proverbial, repeatedly cited by figures like Don Quixote and in colloquial usage. The trad. has offered poets of many centuries the lang. of conservatism on the one hand and of protest and popular empowerment on the other. Med. Sp. balladry has enjoyed a long life in peninsular orality and in Sephardic and other Sp.-speaking communities around the world, giving rise to later ballad genres such as the Mexican corrido.

Med. religious poetry reflects the larger contexts of two strikingly different centuries. The 13th c., under Fernando III el Santo (the Holy) and Alfonso X el Sábio, saw unification of Castile and León and dramatic Christian advances into southern Andalusia, while Aragon conquered Mallorca. With these successes, Castilian monasteries expanded their local influence and royal courts enjoyed a cultural flowering of the arts reflecting Alfonso's cosmopolitan cultural vision. Early works like Vida de Santa María Egipcíaca (Life of St. Mary the Egyptian) and the Catalan Libre dels tres reys d'Orient (Book of the Three Kings of the Orient) reflect Fr. influence. As the clerical style (mester de clerecía) coalesces in the form known as cuaderna vía* (*monorhyme quatrains of 14-syllable lines divided at the *hemistich), poems such as the Libro de Aleixandre on the life of Alexander the Great and the Libro de Apolonio on Apollonius of Tyre, anticipate the work of the century's most important poet, the Rioja native Gonzalo de Berceo (ca. 1196–ca. 1264). Berceo wrote four saints' lives in verse (two associated with local Benedictine monasteries: Santo Domingo de Silos and San Millán de la Cogolla) and a number of devotional poems to the Virgin Mary (Duelo de la Virgen [The Virgin's Lament], Loores de Nuestra Señora [A Eulogy on Our Lady], Milagros de Nuestra Señora [Miracles of Our Lady]), all preserved in 14th-c. copies. His poetic lang.—learned, yet intimate and gracefully colloquial—reveals ties to the mester de juglaría, the cantiga trad., and *troubadour lyric. His Milagros show Berceo's familiarity with Marian lore popularized by Gautier de Coincy (1177–1236). The 13th c. also nurtured a lively trad. of poetic debates on religious and philosophical issues, notably Disputa del alma y el cuerpo (Debate between the Body and the Soul) and Elena y María. Another remarkable debate poem, made famous by the 20th-c. poet Pedro Salinas, is Razón de amor con los Denuestos del Agua y el Vino (Poem of Love with the Dispute between Water and Wine), which frames its debate with the dream of a young scholar whose beloved appears to him, speaking the lang. of female desire of the cantigas.

Three major figures and a pair of works reflect the 14th c.'s dynastic struggles, growing cities, and intellectual and religious ferment. Little is known of Juan Ruiz (ca. 1284–1351) other than what he reports in the celebrated Libro de buen amor (Book of Good Love, 1330–43), where he styles himself simultaneously as a wayward priest in search of erotic fulfillment and a penitent sinner bent on teaching "Good Love" to his fellow men. Framed with prayers to Christ and the Virgin, Aristotelian discourses on natural sexuality, and Ovidian lessons in lovemaking, his sentimental adventures move through social and literary worlds of unprecedented variety, evoked in multiple prosodic forms (cuaderna vía, traditional lyric, serranilla*) and narrative types (notably the Oriental alcahueta or procuress motif). Ruiz's mirror of cultural diversity, the piquancy and freshness of his lang., and his own ironic and ambivalent authorial figure ensure the book's enduring popularity and influence. More recognized in his own day was the great Heb. poet Sem Tob ibn Ardutiel ben Isaac (ca. 1290–1369), known as Santob de Carrión. The dark vision of his only work in Sp., Proverbios morales (ca. 1350), whose text also circulated in Heb. characters, spoke powerfully from trads. of Jewish scripture and thought, using Ar., Lat., and Castilian sources, to communities in impending religious crisis. Two other texts at the intersection of three cultures are cuaderna vía poems about Joseph in Egypt: the early 14th-c. Coplas de Yosef, composed in Sp. in Heb. script, and the later Aragonese Poema de Yúçuf, in aljamiado or Sp. in Ar. script. A third figure from the public sphere, the chancellor of Castile Pero López de Ayala (1332–1407), anthologized his religious, moral, and didactic poems, with some Marian lyrics, in the Rimado de Palacio.

C. Poetry of Fourteenth- and Fifteenth-Century Courts. The reigns of Castilian monarchs Juan I (1379–90), Enrique III (1390–1406), and Juan II (1406–54) witnessed factional strife over royal succession, eventually resolved in favor of the Catholic Queen Isabel I (1479–1504), whose marriage in 1469 to Fernando of Aragon ultimately brought political unity with the taking of Granada in 1492. The period also saw widespread anti-Jewish riots in 1391 and a subsequent wave of conversions, ominous signs of the high human and cultural price that would be paid for national unification. But thriving courts, urban centers, and increased trade prompted a cultural renewal that Lida de Malkiel called a "Spanish pre-Renaissance."

Poetry of the 15th c. boasts its share of giants. Juan de Mena (1411–56) studied in his native Córdoba and in Salamanca and Rome before entering the service of Juan II as royal chronicler and Lat. secretary. Author of short love lyrics and political and moral verses, Mena owes his exalted place in lit. hist. to the long poem titled Laberinto de Fortuna (1444). Merging the goddess Fortune with the figure of the labyrinth, the poet creates an *allegory for his time that is at once political, philosophical, theological, and aesthetic. Alternating examples contrast Fortune's followers with those of a personified Providence, who ultimately points the way out of the maze. Politically, the Laberinto puts forward Juan II and the controversial constable of Castile Álvaro de Luna as instruments of Providence. Composed in arte mayor* (regularly accented 12-syllable lines), the poem itself constitutes a maze of Latinate lexicon and syntax, cl. *allusions, and imitations that earned the scholar-poet the admiration of 16th- and 17th-c. apostles of learned poetry.

Another giant is Mena's friend, Íñigo López de Mendoza, the Marqués de Santillana (1398–1458), author of allegorical decires*, a poetic tribute to a Catalan poet contemporary (Coronación de Mossén Jordi di Sant Jordi), a Triumphete de Amor inspired by Petrarch, and the political poems Comedieta de Ponza and Bías contra Fortuna. Noted for his 42 Sonetos fechos al Itálico modo (Sonnets in the Italian Style), which anticipate the 16th-c. Italianate mode, and a Carta-Prohemio (Letter-Preface) on the aristocratic practice of poetry, Santillana is perhaps most admired for his eight serranillas, lighthearted, rustically erotic pastorelas (see PASTOURELLE). A third singular voice is that of the soldier-courtier Jorge Manrique (1440–79), known for fine *courtly love lyrics and a celebrated elegiac poem dedicated to his father, Rodrigo Manrique. In these Coplas por la muerte de su padre (Verses on the Death of His Father, ca. 1476–79) Manrique meditates on the transitory nature of mortal existence, celebrates his father's devotion to family and society, and imagines Death knocking at Don Rodrigo's door, received with "free and cheerful will" as a messenger of God's omniscience. The poem musters literary devices such as the ubi sunt (where are they?) *topos and cl. heroic examples, biblical lang., and the med. trad. of the danza de la muerte (dance of death), intertwining them with simple imagery (the soul waking from mortal sleep, life as a delta of rivers flowing to the sea), simple axioms, and direct, intimate address of the ethical and metaphysical dimensions of life and death. Unique in med. poetry, this elegant fusion of elevated and colloquial registers, of popular and learned discourses, has earned the Coplas their firm place in the memory of Sp. speakers. A fourth figure deserving of special mention is the great Catalan lyric poet Ausiàs March (1397–1459), inheritor of Fr. and It. lyric trads., whose arresting psychological portrayals inspired numerous 16th-c. Castilian poets.

The arte menor* (short Castilian meters) production of the late 14th and 15th cs. is found in the period's numerous cancioneros*, which anthologize compositions representing decades of poetic activity. Chief among these are the Castilian and Aragonese Cancionero de Palacio (ca. 1400), the Cancionero de Baena (1445–54), the Navarrese Cancionero de Herberay des Essarts and contemp. Neapolitan Cancionero de Stúñiga (ca. 1460–63), Hernando del Castillo's Cancionero general (1511), and the Cancionero Musical de Palacio (1505–20). The cancioneros' aristocratic and chivalric conception of poetry as science, lettered ally of arms, suasory discourse, sister art of music—formulated in the poetics of Juan Alfonso de Baena (1406–54), Santillana, and Juan del Encina (ca. 1468–1529 or 30)—grows out of a courtly and urban context. Among cancionero poets and their audiences, there was considerable diversity of region, class, education, occupation, religion, and ethnic identity. Eclectic in content, *anthologies embraced many poetic kinds (political poems and panegyrics, *satires, religious verse, *love poetry) and verse and compositional types (see SONGBOOK).

Whether sacred or profane, elevated or colloquial, cancioneros favor the code known as conceptismo*, which features a tightly controlled lexicon, witty wordplay, and a taste for *antithesis, *paradox, and contradiction. Their figurative lang. draws on social and bodily experience (wars, castles, prisons, cathedrals, servitude, wounds, plagues, death) rather than on nature. Courtly love poems represent the psychic anguish of individual subjects in the mirror (often inverted) of social and political order. Paradigms of frustration, defeat, and morbidity enact rhetorically willed subjection of the (usually male) body and soul. Like med. balladry, cancionero poetry and its conceptista lang. have a long afterlife in the polyphonic world of Ren. and *baroque poetry.

D. Renaissance Reinvention of the Lyric. The hist. of Sp. poetry took a striking turn early in the reign of the Hapsburg king and Holy Roman emperor Charles V (1516–58), as It. prosodic and compositional types brought the themes and practices of Ren. humanism fully into courtly verse, revising the traditional hierarchy of poetic codes. Spearheading the Italianizing movement were the Catalan Juan Boscán (ca. 1490–1542) and the Toledan Garcilaso de la Vega (1503–36).

Italianate modes held understandable appeal for these well-placed courtiers and imperial soldiers, who collaborated (Boscán as trans., Garcilaso as prologuist) in bringing out Baldassare Castiglione's Book of the Courtier in Sp. (1534). The two friends' works were published together (1543) following Boscán's death. The latter's poems feature Petrarchan *sonnets of frustrated love, a striking *verse epistle on the joys of married life, and a version of the *fable of Hero and Leander (see PETRARCHISM).

Strictly speaking, the Italianate revolution had begun a century or more earlier, with Santillana's experimental sonnets and with imitations of Petrarch by Mossén Jordi di Sant Jordi (ca. 1400–24) and March. But it was with Garcilaso's works that It. forms and the imitation of cl. authors were naturalized into the Castilian lang., altering it permanently. Running to a handful of villancicos, 40 sonnets, two *elegies, a verse epistle, and three *eclogues, the slim corpus won the young poet, killed in battle in Provence at 33, instant recognition; a host of imitators; a series of learned commentaries of the sort devoted to Virgil, Dante, and Petrarch; and the title Prince of Spanish Poets. Eclectic by contrast with the It. giants and dispensing with their Christian itinerary of sin, guilty penance, and the journey toward salvation, the Toledan chooses entirely secular subjects set against the competing backdrops of *pastoral's locus amoenus and the military campaigns and the imperial geography of his aristocratic experience. New to Sp. vernacular verse is his attention to idealized nature, human beauty, Neoplatonic love, and unchristianized cl. mythology. While continuing to draw on 15th-c. poets such as March and Garci Sánchez de Badajoz (ca. 1460–1526), particularly in sonnets and canciones, Garcilaso demonstrates familiarity with Lat. authors and It. models encountered during imperial service.

Most of his sonnets are love sonnets. Although often startling in their movement between the stark conceits and insistent redundancy of cancionero codes and the copious sensuous imagery of Lat. and Italianate material, they nonetheless achieve unprecedented collaboration among these trads. Garcilaso experiments with the flexible structure of the canción, inventing a new type, subsequently much used, the lira*, in the "Oda ad florem Gnidi" ("Ode to the Flower of Gnido [Naples]"). The solitary deserts and allegorical dramas of Canciones 1, 2, and 4 stand in dramatic contrast to the verdant island setting and political subtext of the third song and to the discursive coyness and mythological figures of the fifth.

Their choice of subject anticipated in turn-of-the-century pastoral dramas of Encina, Garcilaso's eclogues display the poet's extraordinary range. The three poems share themes, characters (Salicio, Nemoroso, Elisa), and the device of ekphrasis.* The first prefaces two freestanding, symmetrical monologues of shepherds with a dedication to the viceroy of Naples, whom Garcilaso served from 1532 to 1536. The second, longest and most challenging, is divided into two parts, posing a pastoral drama about the shepherd Albanio's love madness against the river spirit Severo, whose ekphrastic description of an urn depicting exploits of the House of Alba is offered as a cure for lovesickness. In the third, an invisible poet describes four nymphs who spin from the sands of the Tagus river tapestries representing tragic love stories. Three of their stories come from ancient fable (Orpheus and Eurydice, Daphne and Apollo, Venus and Adonis); the last and most elaborate creates the mod. myth of Elisa and Nemoroso. The poem, whose Orphic dedication gave Pedro Salinas the title for his volume La voz a ti debida, also features an eclogue within an eclogue, as the poet catches strains of the exchanged songs of living shepherds, whose approach sends the weaver nymphs back into the waves.

In the Eclogues, the poet's figure occupies the center of Garcilaso's self-mirroring and self-monumentalizing creation, acting as protagonist, in parallel with military and political figures such as the emperor or the Duke of Alba, in campaigns of cultural conquest acted out not on a placeless allegorical landscape but on real geography (the rivers Tagus and Tormes, the Mediterranean, North African outposts, and shores of the Danube) as the poetic project of emulative imitation of ancient Rome coincides with Hapsburg imperialism. Garcilaso's use of Virgil's homoerotic shepherds and the Aeneid's Dido as prototypes for tragic subjectivity, projected against ancient and mod. contexts, opens new avenues of expression for male lyric subjects.

Firmly established for succeeding generations of poets is the Ren. aesthetic of *imitation and the practice of syncretic appropriation from multiple models. Garcilaso borrows not only from Petrarch but from Dante, Jacopo Sannazaro, Pietro Bembo, and Luigi Tansillo; not only from Virgil, Ovid, and Horace but also from Lucretius, Seneca, Tibullus, and more. In the area of style, Garcilaso embraces the *hendecasyllable (11-syllable line—impossible to divide into hemistichs), melodious *cadences, subtle *enjambments, cultivated (though not obscure) Latinate lexicon and allusion, luxurious near-synonyms, narrative *pathos, and plastic idealization of human and natural beauty. Key to the success of Italianization was Garcilaso's demonstration that rich *conceits and melodic *syntax could be fused, elegantly and seamlessly, with the stark imagery, terse wit, emphatic *rhythms, and insistent *repetition of Castilian codes.

Success in courtly circles did not guarantee the Italianate coup universal acceptance. Cristóbal de Castillejo (ca. 1490–1550) called the new poetry and its jarringly new lang. to account in mock-inquisitorial proceedings against the suspect foreigners and heretics, charges that would resonate throughout 16th- and 17th-c. polemics. If some traditionalists rejected alien forms and diction, most 16th-c. poets opted for ambidextrous alternation between native and imported styles. Period anthols. and prosimetric pastoral romances like the Port. Jorge de Montemayor's Diana collect diverse examples of both kinds. The new poetics spread through educated, cosmopolitan circles, where humanistic imitation of It. and Roman culture was an article of personal pride and Sp. imperial ambition, refashioning cultivated Sp. to a degree comparable with Petrarch's reinvention of Tuscan It.

Among the first to adopt Italianate poetics were three other soldier-poets: Diego Hurtado de Mendoza (1503–75), historian, satirist, imperial ambassador to Rome and Venice, and author of sonnets on paradoxes of sentiment and Fábula de Adonis; Gutierre de Cetina (ca. 1510–54), native of Seville, soldier in Europe and Mexico, best known for the sweetness of his verse and for his *madrigal "Ojos claros, serenos" (Eyes So Bright and Serene), who (like Garcilaso) uses the ruins of empire as a figure for erotic anguish; and Hernando de Acuña (ca. 1520–80), friend of the emperor, author of sonnets and Fábula de Narciso, best known as author of the emblematic imperial sonnet, "Ya se acerca, señor, o es ya llegada" (Now approaches, sire, or has already arrived). In the next generation, a Castilian school of soldier-poets, incl. Francisco de la Torre (1534?–94?), Francisco de Figueroa (1536–1617), and Francisco de Aldana (1537–75), who died with King Sebastian of Portugal in Africa, contributed to the growing body of Sp. sonnets, canciones, eclogues, elegies, and epistles. A Salamanca school of contemplative, Christian humanist poets took shape around the figure of the university professor, biblical scholar, and Inquisition target Luis de León (1527–91), who translated into Sp. the Song of Songs and the book of Job, as well as Virgil and Horace. The Augustinian's Neoplatonic odes—notably "Vida retirada," "A Francisco de Salinas" (organist at Salamanca's cathedral), and "Noche serena"—set the standard for elegant clarity favored by Francisco de Quevedo (1580–64), who published León's poems with those of Torre in 1631 as a poetic manifesto against Gongorism.

To the south, a Sevillian school of Andalusian poets headed by Fernando de Herrera (1534–97) included Baltasar del Alcázar (1534–78), Juan de Arguijo (1567–1623), Andrés Fernández de Andrada (1575–1648, probable author of "Epístola moral a Fabio"), Rodrigo Caro (1573–1647, known for his "Canción a las ruinas de Itálica"), and Pedro Espinosa (1578–1650), who published an influential anthol., Flor de poetas ilustres (Flower of Illustrious Poets, 1605), and Fábula de Genil. The densely figured diction of Herrera's Pindaric odes (commemorating the Christian naval victory at Lepanto and King Sebastian's ill-fated Af. campaign), Petrarchan sonnets dedicated to the Countess of Gelves ("Luz"), canciones, and eclogues, representing the height of Sp. *mannerism, earned him the epithet El Divino and the role of ling. innovator, forerunner of Luis de Góngora. Fittingly, the schools of Salamanca and Seville produced the first erudite commentaries on Garcilaso's verse: the restrained notes to the ed. (1574) of Francisco Sánchez de las Brozas (1523–1600), known as El Brocense, and Herrera's encyclopedic Anotaciones (1580), which offer lengthy treatment of imitation, *metaphor, vernaculars, the passions, and Sp. national character. Enunciating a heroic poetics of Sp. cultural supremacy, the Andalusian scholar-poet champions learned *difficulty and figurative abundance but pronounces against *obscurity, thereby standing both as a forerunner of the baroque and a rhetorical conservative who will be invoked in the battle over Góngora.

Throughout the 16th c., religious themes attract poets like Montemayor (1520?–1561), much of whose verse uses traditional Sp. meters. In 1575, Sebastián de Córdoba's (1545–1604) Christian adaptation "a lo divino" of love poems by Boscán and Garcilaso ushers in a vogue of Petrarchan sonnets addressed to Jesus and Mary (see CONTRAFACTUM). Partly prompted by these forgettable verses come the extraordinary mystical poems of Juan of Yepes or St. John of the Cross (1542–91), the Carmelite friar tied to Salamanca and, like Luis de León, imprisoned by the Inquisition. Using Garcilaso's five-line lira stanza, John's three most celebrated poems—Cántico espiritual (Spiritual Canticle, ca. 1584), Noche oscura del alma (Dark Night of the Soul, ca. 1578) and "Llama de amor viva" ("Living Flame of Love," ca. 1584)—draw deeply on León's trans. of the Song of Songs, traditional feminine-voiced lyric, cancionero conceits, and Garcilaso's own verses to evoke the erotic torment and rapture of the Bride (Soul) searching for union with God. The poet and his fellow Carmelite Teresa of Ávila (1515–82) use Castilian meters and the cancionero code to ponder the mystical paradoxes of learned ignorance and death in life.

E. Imperial Epic and the New Balladry. The Italianate turn also led to the reinvention of epic, from midcentury on composed mainly in tercets and octaves, dressed in *diction elevated by Latinate vocabulary and cl. learning. Imitators of Homer, Virgil, Lucan, Ludovico Ariosto, Luís de Camões, Torquato Tasso, and others could draw on a wave of prose and verse trans. into Sp., widely disseminated by printing. There they found Virgilian *similes, heroic orations, sea battles and shipwrecks, dramas of exile and discovery, fables of dynastic foundation, and philosophical and ideological lessons germane to national and imperial projects. Publication statistics put their broad appeal beyond dispute: Pierce finds some 150 Sp. epic poems in print from 1550 to 1700, often reprinted and extended. The largest number treat Christian themes (lives of Mary, Jesus, OT figures; saints' lives, crusades, miracles, and conversions). Notable among these are Félix Lope de Vega's (1562–1635) El Isidro (1599), a life of Madrid's farmer patron composed in Castilian quintillas*; his voluminous Tasso imitation La Jerusalén conquistada (1609); Cristóbal de Virués's (1550–1614) El Montserrate (1587); and Diego de Hojeda's (1570–1615) La Christiada (1611). Luis Barahona de Soto (ca. 1548–95) and Lope, among others, produce Ariosto spinoffs featuring the elusive Angelica. Celebrating Sp. hist. and legend are works such as Juan de la Cueva's (ca. 1550–1610) Conquista de la Bética (1603), Juan Rufo Gutiérrez's (1547–1620) La Austríada (1584, about the emperor's son and Lepanto commander Juan de Austria), and Bernardo de Balbuena's (1561–1627) El Bernardo (1624). Among New World verse epics are Alonso de Ercilla's (1533–94) influential La Araucana (1569–89), Gabriel Lobo Lasso de la Vega's (1555–1615)

Mexicana (1594), Juan de Castellanos's (1522–1607) Elegías de Varones Ilustres de Indias (Eulogies of Illustrious Men of the Indies, 1589), the Chilean Pedro de Oña's (ca. 1570–1643) Arauco domado (Arauco Tamed, 1596), and Lope's saga of Francis Drake, La Dragontea (1598). The 17th c. sees the creation of burlesque epics such as Miguel de Cervantes's (1547–1616) Viaje del Parnaso (Journey to Parnassus, 1614) on the *mock-heroic quest of Sp. poets and Lope's feline epic La Gatomaquia (War of the Cats, 1634).

Popularity of cultivated epic is matched by a new vogue of balladry, visible in the proliferation of anthols. of med. ballads such as the 1547–48 Cancionero de romances, the 1561 Silva de varios romances, and the 1600 Romancero general. This most accessible and easily improvised form is pressed into the service of news making, self-promotion, scandal-mongering, political manipulation, and mockery. Seventeenth-c. poetic giants gravitated toward the ballad. Lope de Vega, who styled himself in pastoral and Moorish ballads as the rustic Belardo and the sentimental Moor Zaide, also published a Romancero espiritual (1619). Luis de Góngora (1561–1627), who launches the captive's ballad, uses the form to appropriate Ariosto's Angelica and Medoro in intensely erotic verses and to subject cl. myths (Hero and Leander, Pyramus and Thisbe) to parodic deformation. Quevedo's caustic ballads send up cl., chivalric, and national myths; his most original contribution are picaresque ballads called jácaras, whose protagonists, the convict Escarramán and his concubine La Méndez, trade missives about their low-life adventures.

Bardic narrative, dialogue, and performative lyric are among the resources that make ballads the bedrock of poetic dramatization in the theater, where they play the leading prosodic role in the polymetric Comedia Nueva (New Comedy). Many plays spin out stories from traditional romances viejos. As ballads came to be written in a vast range of poetic and rhetorical codes, from the religious and aesthetic sublime to the obscene, they serve as sites for the intermingling of learned and popular (culto and popular), native and foreign, that spills over into other forms.

F. Horizons of Baroque Poetry. The mannerist transition toward baroque poetics begins to appear in the last decades of the 16th c., in the poetry of figures such as Herrera and the equally learned Aragonese brothers Lupercio and Bartolomé Leonardo de Argensola (1559–1613 and 1562–1631, respectively), in anthols. like Espinosa's, and in early compositions by Cervantes, Góngora, Lope de Vega, and Quevedo. The overwhelming majority of 17th-c. poets are literary polyglots, fluent in a variety of poetic idioms, rhetorical registers, and tones, and increasingly inclined to mix them. Heirs to Petrarch, Garcilaso, and earlier generations of their imitators, most poets were from the start avid sonneteers, though not—or not long—to the exclusion of other types. Many, as we have just seen, wrote ballads, along with other traditional Sp. forms like the villancico and the letrilla*. Italianate canción varieties continued in frequent use; *tercets were a popular choice for verse epistles, solemn and satiric, and other long poems. In addition to heroic octaves, poets gravitated toward the more open, irregular patterning of the silva, famously used by Góngora in his meandering Soledades (Solitudes, 1613) and by Lope de Vega in his feline epic.

New thematic and formal preferences emerge. One is the long mythological poem, whose larger-than-life protagonists provide allegorical mirrors for dramas of *affect (love, jealousy, melancholy) and art. Among poems of this kind, Góngora's sensational Fábula de Polifemo and Galatea (1613), which adopts Polyphemus as a prototype of erotic frustration and his tortured song as the standard-bearer for the Cordoban's controversial new poetics, enjoys pride of place as the period's most original mythography. Along with Góngora's fable and Lope's Filomena (1621) and Circe (1624) came others: an earlier Polifemo by Luis Carrillo de Sotomayor (1585–1616), *Phaeton*s and an Adonis by Juan de Tassis y Peralta, Count of Villamediana (1582–1622) and Pedro Soto de Rojas (1584–1658), a Hero and Leander by Gabriel Bocángel (1603–58), and many mythological dramas by Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1601–81) and others, incl. the Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (ca. 1648–95).

The choice of outsized allegorical *personifications of the poet went along with flamboyant self-fashioning and complex poetic *personas made up of contradictory extremes. Two cases in point are Lope de Vega, whose Petrarchan Rimas (1602) are transmuted a lo divino into histrionic confessionals and penance in his Rimas sacras (1614) and later subjected to a festive send-up in the Rimas humanas y divinas (1634) of his alter ego, the Licenciado Tomé de Burguillos. Quevedo's verse spans perhaps the most extreme range of moods and tastes, running from the spiritual sublime of Un Heráclito cristiano (1613) and the erotic sublime of love lyrics to biting satire sonnets and taste for the grotesque, obscene, and scatological. Affinity for extreme contrasts generates ubiquitous antitheses and the baroque coincidentia oppositorum of the conceit.

Publication hist. in this period tells its own story. Many poets did not gather their own work in pub. volumes but instead circulated it in ms., recited it in *poetic contests and meetings of literary academies, or contributed it to collections. Many published discrete works separately, as Lope de Vega did often. Cervantes left his lyrics scattered throughout his prose works; Góngora circulated his major poems in ms. only; and Quevedo, like his Andalusian rival, left most of his poetry to be collected after his death. In this age of inflated opulence and class-enforced leisure, poetry was a social practice and a widespread one at that. Many complained that there were far too many aspiring poets; others could rejoice that practicing poets included women like María de Zayas y Sotomayor (1590–1669?) and Catalina Clara Ramírez de Guzmán (1611–70?).

Poetry's popularity meant that its form and matter could become burning questions for society. The central issue for early 17th-c. Spain was the proper nature of poetic lang. and the purpose (moral, social, epistemological) of poetry itself. Tensions over competition between Sp. and Italianate styles boiled over in reaction to the ms. circulation (1613–14) of Góngora's Polifemo and the unfinished Soledades. Enthusiasts of the poems' layered *artifice seized on this new New Poetry, which would earn the poet posthumous epithets such as the Sp. Homer and the Andalusian Pindar, as heroic cultural triumph. But critics including Juan de Jáuregui (1583–1641) and Francisco Cascales (1564–1642) decried their prohibitive difficulty as the mask of heresy (the pejorative term culteranismo, used to caricature Góngora's style, is modeled on Luteranismo or Lutheranism) or atheistic nihilism, designed to bring down the edifice of Poetry and Culture. The poet, once hailed as Prince of Light, became a Luciferine Prince of Darkness. Lope and Quevedo joined the traditionalist assault claiming that Góngora's multiple metaphors, Latinate lang., and cl. allusions were anti-Sp. They proposed native conceptismo, based on agudeza* or *wit—which Baltasar Gracián (1601–58) would honor as the quintessential Sp. attribute in his Agudeza y arte de ingenio (Cleverness and the Art of Wit, 1642, rev. ed. 1648)—rather than on *ornament, as the intellectually and politically respectable choice. Over critics' objections, many poets imitated Góngora eagerly; most were influenced by his verse. Indeed, while partisan rhet. made culteranismo and conceptismo appear to be worlds apart, it is not easy to find clear examples of one or the other. Superficially imitated in the 18th c. and discredited in the 19th, this baroque giant would be resurrected by the Generation of 1927 as artistic patron of a poetics centered on the *image and on ling. freedom.

Debts to Counter-Reformation theology are implicit in the contradictory baroque aesthetic, which embraces corporeal beauty, opulence, and artifice, only—or the better—to represent their disintegration, disappearance, and annihilation. Among the period's most exquisite poems are sonnets by Góngora ("Mientras por competir con tu cabello" [As long as, to compete with your hair], "Ilustre y hermosísima María" [Illustrious and Beautiful Maria], "Menos solicitó veloz saeta" [Less swiftly did the arrow seek]) and Quevedo ("Cerrar podrá mis ojos" [My eyes may be closed], "¡Ah de la vida!" [Is any life home?], "Miré los muros de la patria mía" [I gazed upon my walls]) that reflect acute consciousness of the imminence of death. Frequent effects of ling. and sensory trickery (*hyperbaton, *paronomasia, *catachresis, paradox, trompe-l'oeil, dreams) set up dramas in which illusion is ritually succeeded by disillusion, the baroque desengaño. These interests give poetry strong ties to comedies of trickery such as Tirso de Molina's (1584–1648) El burlador de Sevilla (The Trickster of Seville, 1630), philosophical plays such as Calderón's La vida es sueño (Life Is a Dream, 1635–36), allegorical and liturgical drama, painting, architecture, ekphrasis, *emblems, and public ceremonials.

The relevance of Spain's trans-Atlantic experience to the evolution of baroque poetry is generally acknowledged, though the nature of that relation remains unclear. It is often said that the peninsular baroque was exported to *Spanish America, where it did some of its most exuberant flowering. But there is considerable evidence to suggest that the baroque style may be as much a response to awareness of that New World as a cultural gift to it. Words, proper names, and poetic rhythms in Lope; Góngora's gold, silver, and gems; Quevedo's obsession with Sp. greed, alchemy, the perils of navigation, and nouveau riche intruders—such references work to make the New World the invisible backdrop against which dramas of desire, identity, and cultural values are played out.

II. 1700 to the Present

A. The Eighteenth Century. The death in 1681 of Calderón, the last major author of the Sp. baroque, marked the end of an epoch. The 1737 Poética of Ignacio de Luzán (1702–54)—heavily indebted to It. sources and somewhat less to Nicolas Boileau—denounced the excesses of baroque poetry, esp. Góngora and his followers, but did not lead immediately to a vital Sp. neoclassicism (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS). The canonical poets of the 18th c., in fact, are clustered in the last third of the century. Sp. lit. of this period is still the object of a great deal of condescension. In the standard view, the turn away from the achievements of the Sp. baroque, together with the emulation of Fr. neoclassical poetics, led to an epoch of dutifully mediocre verse. Not coincidentally, other genres of imaginative writing suffered a similar fate during this period. The theater fared better than prose fiction, but provided little that might be compared to the achievements of the siglo de oro (Golden Age) of Lope de Vega and Calderón.

Some critics continue to value the poetry of the 18th c. only to the extent that it is preromantic (see PREROMANTICISM)—as though the neoclassical aesthetic itself were inherently devoid of interest. From the perspective of intellectual hist., however, we can see this period as one in which prominent Enlightenment figures, ilustrados, used the medium of verse along with that of prose, and for similar ends. Eighteenth-c. writers held a Horatian idea of verse as a medium suited to a wide variety of purposes, incl. satire, epistle, and moral instruction. Many significant intellectuals of the Sp. Enlightenment left behind a significant body of verse along with their prose writings. The result is a healthy diversity of genres, metrical forms, and poetic subjects.

The most prominent poet of the century was Juan Meléndez Valdés (1754–1817), who imitated Alexander Pope's Essay on Man and participated in the vogue for *anacreontic odes. This genre, practiced by many other poets of the period, incl. others in Meléndez Valdés's circle such as José Cadalso (1741–82), was devoted to the celebration of the pleasures of life. The animal fables in verse of Tomás de Iriarte (1750–91) and Félix María de Samaniego (1745–1801) are also worthy of note, although Iriarte is now better regarded than Samaniego. Neither is as significant as Jean de La Fontaine is for Fr. lit. Nicolás Fernández de Moratín (1737–80) practiced a Horatian aesthetic of instructing and delighting, devoting poems to bullfighting and prostitution. Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos (1744–1811), the most prominent thinker of his time, also left behind a significant number of poems. He is perhaps the best model of the ilustrado whose works of literary creation form part of a larger intellectual project but who does not conform to the postromantic ideal of the literary creator.

Cadalso's preromantic anguish is more in tune with later taste, although, in this case, the poetic prose of Noches lúgubres (Lugubrious Nights, 1798) remains somewhat better known than the verse of Ocios de mi juventud (Leisures of my Youth, 1781).

B. The Nineteenth Century. Sp. *romanticism has been disparaged, in much the same way Sp. neoclassicism was, as belated, lacking in first-rate poets, and overly derivative of foreign models. The failure of neoclassical poetics, in this conventional view, derives from a weak and imitative Sp. Enlightenment, whereas the weakness of Sp. romanticism parallels the political failure of liberalism, repressed by the regime of Fernando VII (1813–33).

The historical romances of Ángel de Saavedra, Duke of Rivas (1791–1865) are of interest mostly to specialists, though they kept alive the ballad trad. that had always been a part of Sp. popular culture. This trad. had persisted in the anonymous romances de ciego (blind man's ballads) of the 17th and 18th cs.—a genre often disparaged by Enlightenment intellectuals. José Zorrilla (1817–93), whose most famous work was the play Don Juan Tenorio (1844), originally made his name with a funeral oration in verse read at the funeral of José de Larra, the prominent essayist who committed suicide in 1837. Like Larra, the Byronic José de Espronceda (1808–42) died young. His long poem, El estudiante de Salamanca (1840), reprises the Don Juan myth. He wrote two other long poems, El diablo mundo (1841) and Canto a Teresa (1837), preserving some of the generic diversity of the neoclassical period.

The Sevillian Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer (1836–70) wrote romantic poetry long after the heyday of Eur. romanticism. His adaptation of some features of the oral trad., such as assonant rhyme, makes him a favorite of 20th-c. poet Luis Cernuda. Most other 19th-c. Sp. poets, in contrast, are given to overblown rhet. Rosalía de Castro (1837–85), one of the most interesting figures of the period, wrote poetry both in Sp. and in Galician and is often compared to Bécquer. Her major work in Sp. was En las orillas del Sar (On the Banks of the Sar, 1884). Castro was not the only female poet of the century: Carolina Coronado (1821–1911) and Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda (1814–73) were more or less conventional romantic poets who enjoyed some popularity.

While not a poet himself, the Sp. folklorist Antonio Machado y Álvarez (1848–93) collected the lyrics of the cante jondo* in two major anthols., anticipating the neopopularist movement of the early 20th c. and the work of his own sons, Antonio and Manuel Machado. The latter part of the century also saw the satirical Humoradas of Ramón del Campoamor (1817–1901) and the patriotic verse of Gaspar Núñez de Arce (1834–1903). Something of the 18th-c. impulse toward generic diversity and moral edification persists in the work of these poets, who otherwise have little to offer. The residence in Spain of the Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darió, beginning in 1898, introduced modernismo* to the peninsula, a welcome antidote to the prosaic poetic *realism of Campoamor.

C. The Twentieth Century and Beyond. Two influential poets stand at the beginning of the 20th c.: Antonio Machado (1875–1939) and Juan Ramón Jiménez (1881–1958). Both come to reject the perceived excesses of modernismo, with its ornamental conception of verse. Machado, following Bécquer, purified his style in the neosymbolist Soledades, Galerías y otros poemas (Solitudes, Passageways, and Other Poems, 1907). Campos de Castilla (Fields of Castile, 1912) is another emblematic book, bringing the consciousness of Sp. *decadence characteristic of other writers of the so-called Generation of 1898. Machado famously defined himself as "good, in the good sense of the word" and denounced the decadence of a Castilian culture that "despises all that it does not know." Such phrases have become touchstones for subsequent Sp. poets and intellectuals.

Jiménez, like Machado, rejected modernismo but did so in order to pursue an even more rigorous stylistic perfection. In so doing, he became the sponsor of high modernist projects like those of José Ángel Valente. He has often been disparaged for developing a kind of narcissistic poetics, even as he was admired for his devotion to his craft. Jorge Guillén (1893–1984) and Pedro Salinas (1891–1951) began as neosymbolist poets influenced by Jiménez's *pure poetry. Salinas is known mostly for the rather abstract love poetry of La voz a ti debida (My Voice Because of You, 1936). Guillén, while a close friend of Salinas, is ultimately a different sort of poet: he devised a formally elaborate discourse to express a jubilant vision of a reality subjected to the poet's ordering imagination. The second ed. of Cántico, pub. in 1936, collected his most enduring poetry.

The most celebrated poet of the 1920s and 1930s is Federico García Lorca (1898–1936). In Spain, Lorca is known mostly as a neopopularist poet, somewhat akin to the virtuosic Rafael Alberti (1902–99). Internationally, he is the sponsor of the duende and the quasi-surrealist author of Poeta en Nueva York (Poet in New York), which was not published until 1940. His most popular work in his own lifetime was the 1928 Primer romancero gitano (First Gypsy Ballad Book). His most significant influence has been on the poetry of the U.S., where Af. Am. and gay poets took up his cause. Lorca is known in the Eng.-speaking world primarily as a "Spanish surrealist," but he was not, in fact, affiliated with *surrealism. The surrealist-influenced poetry of Vicente Aleixandre (1898–1984) and Luis Cernuda (1902–63), along with analogous works by the Chilean poet Pablo Neruda (who resided in Spain in the 1930s), has had an enthusiastic reception in the Eng.-speaking world; but, in reality, most Sp. poetry of this period was not surrealist.

The period from about 1918 to 1936 is a fertile one, with a profusion of styles arising in rapid succession: the pure poetry of Jiménez, Guillén, and Salinas; *ultraísm, an avant-garde movement derived from Vicente Huidobro's Chilean *creationism; neopopularism; some short-lived experiments in a neobaroque aesthetic (Alberti's Cal y canto [1929], e.g.); neoclassicism; and the quasi-surrealist mode seen in some books of Aleixandre and Cernuda. In many cases, a single poet might experiment with two or three of these styles with no sense of contradiction. Alberti and Gerardo Diego (1896–1987) were poets of great flexibility and virtuosity.

During the Sp. Civil War (1936–39), poets affiliated with both sides wrote ballads to be sung on the front lines. Miguel Hernández (1910–42), who died of tuberculosis in a Francoist prison, composed the heart-wrenching "Nanas de la cebolla" (Lullaby of the Onion) lamenting that his young son had only onions to eat. His Romancero y cancionero de ausencias (Ballads and Songs of Absence, 1958), to which this poem belongs, turns away from the neobaroque style of his prewar work as well as from the propagandistic rhet. of his war poetry. Poets on the right included Luis Rosales (1910–92), Luis Felipe Vivanco (1907–75), and Manuel Machado (1874–1947), the latter an erstwhile follower of Darío's modernismo. Many poets who initially supported the military rebellion became dissidents during the ensuing Franco dictatorship, experiencing a kind of "inner exile."

The assassination of Lorca at the beginning of the war, the death of Antonio Machado in 1939 as he was fleeing to France, and the exile of numerous other significant figures (Salinas, Guillén, Cernuda, Alberti) left a void in Sp. poetry of the postwar period. Prominent poets who remained behind in Spain included Diego, Dámaso Alonso (1898–1990), and Aleixandre. Aleixandre became a mentor to young poets of successive generations within Spain and would go on to win the Nobel Prize in 1984. Major works written by exile poets include Salinas's El contemplado (The Contemplated One, 1946), a set of formally virtuosic variations on a single theme, the contemplation of the sea, and Jiménez's densely metaphysical Dios deseado y deseante (God Desired and Desiring, 1949). Jiménez won the Nobel Prize in 1956. Cernuda's dramatic *monologues, collected in successive editions of La realidad y el deseo (Reality and Desire, 1936) were more influential on subsequent Sp. poets than any other comparable figure. His final work, Desolación de la quimera (Desolation of the Chimera, 1962), contains vitriolic attacks on figures of his own generation such as Salinas and Alonso.

The Garcilasismo of José García Nieto (1914–2001), emphasizing traditional forms and patriotic content, enjoyed a brief vogue in the 1940s. This movement was a carryover from the neoclassical trend of the years immediately before the war. The major movement in postwar poetry, however, was the social poetry of Blas de Otero (1916–79) and José Hierro (1922–2002). These poets are both masters of traditional verse. Otero began with the existentialist anguish typical of the 1950s and moved toward a more sharply defined political stance. Hierro's groundbreaking Libro de las alucinaciones (Book of Hallucinations, 1964) presented a phantasmagoric vision of reality. Gabriel Celaya (1911–91) wrote poetry of social protest in a more bombastic and verbose mode. At the margins of major trends was a belated avant-garde movement: postismo, led by Carlos Edmundo de Ory (1923–2010). The use of the label postismo for this avant-garde movement indicates its anachronism, but, in some respects, Ory was ahead of his time, anticipating the neo-avant garde of the 1970s and 1980s.

Claudio Rodríguez (1934–99), a visionary poet, inaugurated a new era with Don de la ebriedad (Gift of Drunkenness, 1954), heralding the decline of social poetry in the following decade. Rodríguez, the most naturally gifted Sp. poet since Lorca, is linked to other contemporaries in the so-called Generation of the 1950s. These poets practiced a more ironic mode of social poetry or, like Francisco Brines (b. 1932), wrote in a meditative mode at the margins of political engagement. Jaime Gil de Biedma (1929–90), influenced by W. H. Auden, founded the School of Barcelona along with his friends Carlos Barral (1928–89) and José Agustín Goytisolo (1928–99). Some poets of this cohort who lived in neither Madrid nor Barcelona emerged into view somewhat later, in the 1970s and 1980s: María Victoria Atencia (b. 1931) in Málaga, and Antonio Gamoneda (b. 1931) in León. The cultural decentralization of the post-Franco period led to a greater recognition of these peripheral figures.

The anthol. Nueve novísimos poetas españoles (Nine Very New Spanish Poets, ed. J. Castellet), pub. in 1970, brought to the foreground a group of younger poets who rejected what they felt was the drab realism of social poetry, drawing inspiration instead from the poetic *modernism of Sp. poetry of Lorca's generation, from the international avant-garde of the period between the two world wars, and from popular culture, esp. the movies. These poets practiced an exuberantly allusive, though sometimes melancholic, "culturalism." Of the nine poets included in the anthol., José María Álvarez (b. 1942), Pere Gimferrer (b. 1945), Guillermo Carnero (b. 1947), and Leopoldo María Panero (b. 1948) best illustrated the prototype of novísmo poetry. Gimferrer produced his early work in Sp. before turning to his native Catalan. La muerte en Beverly Hills (Death in Beverly Hills, 1968) is dreamlike *collage of images from classic Hollywood movies. Carnero's 1967 Dibujo de la muerte (Sketch of Death) reflects the aestheticism of this era, while the hyperrationalism of Variaciones y figuras sobre un tema de La Bruyère (Variations and Figures on a Theme by La Bruyère, 1974) connects him to neoclassical lit. The poetry of Panero, the son of the prominent right-wing poet of the 1940s Leopoldo Panero (1909–62), self-consciously reflects on the discourse of schizophrenia. Other poets emerging in this period, like Aníbal Núñez (1944–87), Jenaro Talens (b. 1946), José-Miguel Ullán (b. 1944), and Jaime Siles (b. 1951), who were not included in this anthol., may ultimately turn out to be as significant as the novísimos themselves.

Sp. poetry after 1980 witnesses three major devels.: (1) The emergence of a new movement of women poets, incl. Ana Rossetti (b. 1950), Isla Correyero (b. 1957), Blanca Andreu (b. 1959), and Amalia Iglesias (b. 1962), who use a neo-avant-garde style to write freely about issues of gender identity and sexuality; (2) a neorealist reaction against the perceived excesses of the novísmo aesthetic, spearheaded by a group of mostly Andalusian poets, among them Luis García Montero (b. 1958), Felipe Benítez Reyes (b. 1960), and Aurora Luque (b. 1962); and (3) the persistence of a "late modernist" aesthetic in the work of two major figures, José Ángel Valente (1929–2000) and Gamoneda, and in the work of many younger poets, incl. Miguel Casado (b. 1954), Chantal Maillard (b. 1951), and Juan Carlos Mestre (b. 1956). Valente was a somewhat imperious presence, championing an austere aesthetic rooted in the trads. of Sp. mysticism. Gamoneda takes inspiration from mod. Fr. poetry (René Char, Saint-John Perse) in Libro del frio (Book of the Cold, 1992). In Libro de los venenos (Book of Poisons, 1997), a multilayered commentary on a Ren. trans. of an ancient treatise on poisons and their remedies, Gamoneda breaks down the barrier between poetry and prose.

Because proponents of both the neo-avant garde and of Valente's high modernism tend to disparage García Montero's "poetry of experience," and vice versa, there is as yet no universally accepted *canon for the poetry of this period. During the 1990s, it seemed as though García Montero's approach, in the trad. of the dramatic monologues of Cernuda and the ironic social poetry of Gil de Biedma and Ángel González (1925–2008), was the most significant tendency in contemp. Sp. poetry. In the first decade of the 21st c., however, Gamoneda has emerged as a significant elder statesman. His mature work, beginning with his 1977 Descripción de la mentira (Description of the Lie), strongly resonates with the contemp. concern for the recuperation of the historical memory of the Civil War and the political repression of the Franco regime. Poets who are more or less in Gamoneda's orbit practice a wide variety of styles. They are linked only by a certain seriousness of purpose and by a rejection of facile aesthetic solutions. Olvido García Valdés (b. 1950) writes an extremely subtle poetry of sharp syntactic and prosodic ruptures, working through cinematic montage. Jorge Riechmann (b. 1962), influenced by Char and by the intellectual trad. of Marxism, writes out of a deep social and environmental consciousness.

The dominance of an artificial canon of male poets, perpetuated by institutional sclerosis, by the "generational" method of literary historiography, and by the ghettoization of women's writing, persists even in post-1975, democratic Spain. Two significant anthols. of poetry written by women have made an impact on this situation. The 1985 Las Diosas Blancas (The White Goddesses), ed. by Ramón Buenaventura, presented poetry written by women through the anthologist's sexualized filter: while celebrating the genuine novelty of this body of work, Buenavantura tended to highlight its more sensationalistic aspects. Ellas tienen la palabra (They Have the Word, ed. N. Benegas and J. Munáriz), pub. in 1998, presents a more inclusive and measured view. The critical introduction frames the work of women poets born after 1950 in the context of a trad. in women's poetry from the romantic movement to mid-century precursors such as Gloria Fuertes (1917–98) and Ángela Figuera (1902–84). Significant poets represented in this anthol. are too numerous to list by name. Standouts include Julia Otxoa (b. 1953), who experiments with the *prose poem and laments the violent hist. of her native Basque country; Concha García (b. 1956), who explores the tedium of everyday life in a *neobaroque style; Lola Velasco (b. 1961), who writes long sequences with a subtle interplay among poetic voices; and Luisa Castro (b.1966), with her unsparing vision of a semisavage childhood.

See AUTO SACRAMENTAL; AVANT-GARDE POETICS; BASQUE COUNTRY, POETRY OF THE; CATALAN POETRY; GALICIA, POETRY OF; ITALIAN PROSODY; ITALY, POETRY OF; JUDEO-SPANISH POETRY; MEDIEVAL POETICS; MEDIEVAL POETRY; RENAISSANCE POETICS; RENAISSANCE POETRY; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF; SPANISH PROSODY.

■ I. To 1700. Anthologies, Bilingual Editions, and Translations: Spanish Poetry of the Golden Age, ed. B. W. Wardropper (1971); Garcilaso de la Vega y sus comentaristas, ed. A. Gallego Morell et al., 2d. ed. (1972); Renaissance and Baroque Poetry of Spain, ed. E. L. Rivers (1972)—Sp. texts with Eng. paraphrase; The Spanish Traditional Lyric, ed. J. G. Cummins (1977); J. Ruiz, Libro de Buen Amor/The Book of True Love, ed. A. N. Zahareas, trans. S. R. Daly (1978); Poesía de la Edad de Oro, vol. I, Renacimiento, vol. II, Barroco, ed. J. M. Blecua (1984); Corpus de la antigua lírica popular hispánica (siglos XV a XVII), ed. M. Frenk (1987); Poesía de cancionero, ed. A. Alonso (1995); Alfonso X, el Sabio, Cantigas de Loor, ed. by M. G. Cunningham (2000)—Sp. and Eng. texts with musical score; St. John of the Cross, The Poems, trans. R. Campbell (2000); The Golden Age: Poems of the Spanish Renaissance, trans. E. Grossman (2006); The Dream of the Poem: Hebrew Poetry from Muslim and Christian Spain, 950–1492, ed. and trans. P. Cole (2007); Selected Poems of Góngora, trans. J. Dent-Young (2007); Spanish Ballads, trans. W. S. Merwin (2008); Selected Poems of Garcilaso de la Vega, trans. J. Dent-Young (2009); Selected Poems of Francisco de Quevedo, trans. C. D. Johnson (2009). Criticism and History: P. Salinas, Reality and the Poet in Spanish Poetry (1940); M. R. Lida de Malkiel, Juan de Mena, poeta del Prerrenacimiento español (1950); R. Menéndez Pidal, D. Catalán, J. Galmés, Cómo vive un romance (1954); T. Navarro Tomás, Métrica española (1956); R. Lapesa, La obra literaria del Marqués de Santillana (1957); B. W. Wardropper, Historia de la poesía lírica a lo divino en la cristiandad occidental (1958); D. Alonso, Estudios y ensayos gongorinos (1960); O. H. Green, Spain and the Western Tradition, 4 v. (1963–66); R. Menéndez Pidal, En torno al Poema del Cid (1963); C. F. Fraker, Studies on the "Cancionero de Baena" (1966); A. Collard, Nueva poesía: conceptismo, culteranismo en la crítica española (1967); P. Bénichou, Creación poética en el romancero tradicional (1968); F. Pierce, Poesía épica del Siglo de Oro, 2d. ed. (1968); R. Lapesa, La trayectoria poética de Garcilaso, enlarged ed. (1968); S. Reckert, Style and Symbol in Iberian Traditional Verse (1970); A. D. Deyermond, A Literary History of Spain: The Middle Ages (1971); M. Frenk, Entre folklore y literatura: lírica hispánica antigua (1971); R. O. Jones, A Literary History of Spain. The Golden Age: Prose and Poetry (1971); S. A. Gilman, "On Romancero as a Poetic Language," Homenaje a Casalduero, ed. R. Pincus Sigele et al. (1972); F. Márquez Villanueva, Investigaciones sobre Juan Álvarez Gato, 2d ed. (1974); E. de Chasca, The Poem of the Cid (1976); M. Molho, Semántica y poética: Góngora, Quevedo (1977); A. Martínez Arancón, La batalla en torno a Góngora (1978); E. L. Bergmann, Art Inscribed: Essays on "Ekphrasis" in Spanish Golden Age Poetry (1979); J. Beverley, Aspects of Góngora's "Soledades" (1980); Quevedo in Perspective, ed. J. Iffland (1982); C. Smith, The Making of the "Poema de Mío Cid" (1983); L. S. Lerner, Metáfora y sátira en la obra de Quevedo (1984); F. López Estrada, Las poéticas castellanas de la Edad Media (1984); L. López Baralt, San Juan de la Cruz y el Islam (1985); J. A. Maravall, Culture of the Baroque, trans. T. Cochran (1986); M. E. Barnard, The Myth of Apollo and Daphne from Ovid to Quevedo (1987); M. P. Manero Sorolla, Introducción al estudio del Petrarquismo en España (1987); F. Márquez Villanueva, Lope: vida y valores (1988); P. J. Smith, Writing in the Margin (1988); A. Egido, Fronteras de la poesía en el Barroco. B. López-Bueno, Templada lira: Estudios sobre la poesía del Siglo de Oro (1990); A. L. Martin, Cervantes and the Burlesque Sonnet (1991); A. Terry, Seventeenth-Century Spanish Poetry: The Power of Artifice (1993); I. E. Navarrete, Orphans of Petrarch: Poetry and Theory in the Spanish Renaissance (1994); R. Greene, Unrequited Conquests (1999); E. B. Davis, Myth and Identity in the Epic of Early Modern Spain (2000); "Poetry of Medieval Spain," "Renaissance Poetry," "Making of Baroque Poetry," The Cambridge History of Spanish Literature, ed. D. T. Gies (2004); L. M. Girón-Negrón, "El laberinto y sus 'reveses' en Juan de Mena, Medioevo Romano 28 (2004); R. Padrón, The Spacious Word (2004); R. Helgerson, A Sonnet from Carthage: Garcilaso de la Vega and the New Poetry of Sixteenth-Century Europe (2007); C. Chemris, Góngora's "Soledades" and the Problem of Modernity (2008); J. Dodds, M. R. Menocal, A. K. Balbale, Arts of Intimacy: Christians, Jews, and Muslims in the Making of Castilian Culture (2008); L. Middlebrook, Imperial Lyric: New Poetry and New Subjects in Early Modern Spain (2009); Studies on Women's Poetry of the Golden Age, ed. J. Olivares (2009); C. D. Johnson, Hyperboles: The Rhetoric of Excess in Baroque Literature and Thought (2010).

■ II. 1700 to the Present. Anthologies: Poesía española, ed. G. Diego (1932); Veinte años de poesía española, ed. J. M. Castellet (1962); Nueve novísimos poetas españoles, ed. J. M. Castellet (1970); Roots and Wings, ed. H. St. Martin (1976); Las diosas blancas, ed. R. Buenaventura (1985); Ellas tienen la palabra, ed. N. Benegas and J. Munáriz (1998); Feroces, ed. I. Correyero (1998). Criticism and History: D. Alonso, Poetas españoles contemporáneos (1952); J. Guillén, Language and Poetry (1961); J. A. Valente, Las palabras de la tribu (1971); C. B. Morris, Surrealism and Spain (1972); G. Siebenmann, Los estilos poéticos en España desde 1900 (1973); A. P. Debicki, Poetry of Discovery (1982); S. Daydí-Tolson, The Post–Civil War Spanish Social Poets (1983); G. Carnero, La cara oscura del siglo de las luces (1983); P. Silver, La casa de Anteo (1985); C. Soufas, Conflict of Light and Wind (1989); S. Kirkpatrick, Las románticas (1989); C. Soufas, Conflict of Light and Wind (1989); Novísimos, postnovísimos, clásicos, ed. B. Ciplijauskaité (1990); J. Mayhew, The Poetics of Self-Consciousness (1994); A. P. Debicki, Twentieth-Century Spanish Poetry (1994); J. Wilcox, Women Poets of Spain (1997); M. Persin, Getting the Picture (1997); P. Silver, Ruin and Restitution (1997); J. Mayhew, Apocryphal Lorca (2008), and The Twilight of the Avant-Garde (2008).

M. M. Gaylord (to 1700); J. Mayhew (1700 to present)

SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF. At the time of the first Sp. conquests in the Americas (notably Mexico in 1519–21 and Peru in 1532), the poetry of Castilian-speaking Spain was being transformed by Italianate and Petrarchan forms (see petrarchism), Greco-Roman mythology, and cl. models. Spain's first viceroyalties, New Spain and then Peru, established court societies and monasteries in which poetry played a significant role. While the romance* (*ballad), based on the *octosyllable, continued to flourish as the basis of popular poetry (Rio Plate gauchesque, Chilean lira, Mexican corrido), the *hendecasyllable became the standard for lettered verse, two strands that continued until the 20th c., when *free verse became dominant. Poetry's strength was perhaps enhanced by the fact that prose romances and, later, novels were nominally banned in the colonies from 1531.

Naturally, the first Sp. Am. poets were Spaniards who had settled in the New World. Alonso de Ercilla y Zúñiga (1533–94) is the author of La Araucana (1569, 1578, and 1589), a verse epic in ottava rima that both celebrates the Sp. conquest in Chile and praises the enemy. Particularly moving are the scenes of Araucanian women seeking to bury their dead and of vivid battle. Recognized as the best epic poem in Sp., it was followed by Pedro de Oña's (1570–1643?) Arauco domado (1596).

*Baroque practice took hold in Sp. America toward the end of the 16th c. Conventions of cl. mythology, strange and wonderful phenomena, and a highly wrought lang. are signs of the Barroco de Indias (Baroque of the Indies). Just as architecture adapted elements from indigenous cultures, so lit. recorded Am. wonders and marvels. Bernardo de Balbuena's (Spain, 1561–1627) Grandeza Mexicana (1604) extols Mexico City's riches. Later, Rafael Landívar (Guatemala, 1731–93) wrote an extensive poem in Lat. celebrating Am. landscapes, Rusticatio Americana (1781). This celebration of America's distinctive bounty will recur throughout 18th- and 20th-c. poetry, from Andrés Bello's silvas to Pablo Neruda's Canto general.

*Satire was prominent in colonial poetry, inevitable where fortunes were quickly made and lost, circumstances of birth were reinvented, and viceregal courts dazzled in stark contrast to surrounding native realities. Juan del Valle Caviedes's (Peru, 1652–97) Diente del Parnaso (The Tooth of Parnassus, 1689) attacks doctors; its coarse lang. and physical emphasis present a counterpoint to religious or courtly verse. Also in Lima, Mateo Rosas de Oquendo (b. 1559?) published a scatological romance of over 2,000 lines, "Sátira . . . a las cosas que pasan en el Perú" (Satire of Events in Peru) in 1598.

The place of honor in colonial letters is occupied by a poet at the close of the baroque period, the Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (ca. 1648–95), who exhibited a genius for all forms of poetry and theater, as well as her famous epistle in defense of her intellectual ambitions. Showing the cultural fluidity of the times, she wrote villancicos* in Nahuatl, the Aztec lang., as well as in Sp. Her masterwork is the Primero sueño (First Dream, 1692), an exploration of the mind's coming into consciousness.

Like Sor Juana, poets wrote in other langs. and translated from native langs. to Sp. In Perú, the Andean chronicler Felipe Guáman Poma de Ayala (ca. 1535–1616) includes poems in Quechua in his El primer nueva corónica y buen gobierno (First New Chronicle and Good Government, ca. 1615). The Peruvian mestizo historian known as El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega (1539–1616), a cousin of the Sp. poet of the same name, dedicated a chapter of the Comentarios reales de los Incas (Royal Commentaries of the Incas, 1609, 1617)—book 2, chap. 27—to a description of Incan poetry.

Enlightenment ideals came late to Sp. America, brought in part by scientists such as Alexander von Humboldt. These intellectual values had to struggle against the vestiges of the Counter-Reformation, which had attempted to silence Sor Juana and frustrated ideals of liberty and scientific experiment. The Jesuits, teachers of cl. langs. and scholars of native langs., were expelled in 1767. The ideal of liberty, important for 18th-c. revolutions and for the Haitian Revolution of 1802, was seen as dangerous by both church and crown.

In the 18th and 19th cs., periodical publications took on greater importance, and the long poem (whether *narrative, *dramatic, or *lyric), unwieldly for the aims of journalism and popular debate, ceded importance to shorter forms. The introduction of photography in the 19th c. shifted the notion of representation itself, just as the introduction of film at the turn of the 20th c. was to change the dynamics of represented movement.

Early 19th-c. poetry was involved in the revolutionary struggles, with countless *odes to military heroes and statesmen. Anthols. collected these poems and distributed them throughout the Americas, helping to establish national literary trads. in the nascent republics (except for Cuba and Puerto Rico, which remained colonies of Spain until the Sp.-Am. War of 1898). The period witnessed an intense interest in the space of Sp. America—its landscape, its indigenous civilizations (particularly ruins), and patriotic fervor. Mariano Melgar (Peru, 1790–1815) adapted the Quechua song form, the yaraví, to Sp. poetry.

Andrés Bello (Venezuela, 1781–1865) was an architect of Latin Am. independence. Sent to England in 1810 by the revolutionaries, he had been exposed to Eng. and Continental philosophy and poetics, as well as to the Industrial Revolution. His "Alocución a la poesía" (Discourse to Poetry, 1823) proclaimed the future to be Am., not Eur. His Silvas americanas (1823), which include "A la agricultura de la zona tórrida" (The Agriculture of the Torrid Zone), set forth an ideal, bucolic society to heal the ravages of the revolutionary wars. Bello replaces cl. allusions with Am. ones; he is important as a translator of Lord Byron, Alphonse de Lamartine, and Victor Hugo. (Neruda will return to the Silvas as one of his primary sources for Canto general.)

The Cuban José María Heredia (1803–39) presents, contemporaneously with Bello's neoclassical stance, a *romanticism tinged with melancholy, evoking his exile from Cuba. "En el teocalli de Cholula" (On the Pyramid of Cholula, 1820), a meditation on the Aztec past, and "A Niágara" (To Niagara, 1824) embody romanticism's divided self and the *sublime. His focus on exile will be repeated by other poets.

Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda (Cuba, 1814–73) was a poet, dramatist, and novelist tutored by Heredia. While she lived most of her adult life in Spain, America, esp. Cuba, is a central topic of her poetry, which involved experimentation with metrics. "Al partir" (On Leaving, 1836), dedicated to Cuba, is her most famous *sonnet.

José Joaquín de Olmedo (Ecuador, 1780–1847) contributed the best-known ode to the wars of independence. His "Victoria de Junín: Canto a Bolívar" (1825), modeled on Virgil, incorporated the Incan past as a ghost who prophesies Simón Bolívar's victory and acclaims the revolutionaries as scourges of the Sp. Although Bolívar himself noted the paradox of an Indian figure applauding the Spaniards' descendants, the Indian in 19th-c. poetry often appears as a prophetic *muse or a doomed hero.

Esteban Echeverría (Argentina, 1805–51) was sent to Paris, where he was initiated into romantic doctrines. Because of his publications, he was forced into exile in Uruguay in 1840. His masterwork in poetry is the long narrative poem "La cautiva" (The Captive, 1837), which relates the story of a white woman captured by Indians, a common topic in 19th-c. lit.

Bartolomé Hidalgo (Uruguay, 1788–1823) brought to print culture the oral trad. of the gauchos (see GAUCHO POETRY), whose singing contests had roots in the med. romance. Hidalgo, with the cielito (little heaven) and the diálogo, initiates a lettered trad. that reaches its height with the Argentinian epic Martín Fierro (1872) by José Hernández (1834–86). Martín Fierro recounts the story of the outcast gaucho as deserter soldier in the eyes of the government, an enemy as seen by the Indians. The Vuelta de Martín Fierro (The Return of Martín Fierro, 1879) reconciles the gaucho with his past and with the law. As shown by Ludmer, the passage to print culture parallels the government's militarization of the gaucho (wanderer, delinquent) during the wars of independence; thus, his body is used by the army and his voice by print culture. Comic and parodic possibilities of the gauchesque are exploited in Estanislao del Campo's (Argentina, 1834–80) Fausto.

The rise of modernismo* begins with the publication of Rubén Darío's (1867–1916) Azul . . . (1888); the movement is often thought to end with his death in 1916. Yet by the 1880s, there was already poetry in the new spirit. Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (Mexico, 1859–95), José Martí (Cuba, 1853–95), Julián del Casal (Cuba, 1863–93), and José Asunción Silva (Colombia, 1865–96) were innovative poets who explored outside Sp. trad. Unquestionably the poet of his century, Darío transformed poetry in Spain as well as in Sp. America. For the first time, the leadership of an influential literary movement in a Eur. lang. emerged from the New World, not from Europe.

Modernismo appeared in a Sp. America on the threshold of modernity, esp. in its largest cities. The central premise of the modernistas was innovation, and they reacted against emergent capitalism, positivism, and 19th-c. canons of propriety. Their models were Charles Baudelaire, Paul Verlaine, Walt Whitman, and E. A. Poe, as well as visual sources such as the *Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood and art nouveau. The modernistas introduced to poetry a new technical vigor, a cosmopolitanism (their orientalism is notable), and a new *syntax. Modernismo rediscovered the musical harmonies of poetry, and Darío himself reached back into med. Sp. trad., Fr. *Parnassianism, and *symbolism for his inspiration. He reintroduced the *alexandrine into Sp. and experimented rhythmically as well as metrically. Besides Azul . . ., his central volumes are Prosas profanas (1896) and Cantos de vida y esperanza (1905), where he addresses political themes, particularly the domination by the U.S. after the Sp.-Am. War.

Born of mixed ancestry in Nicaragua, Darío ventured first to Chile, where he published Azul . . ., and then to Buenos Aires. Like many modernistas, he supported himself through journalism. Darío's taste for the exotic, his explicit eroticism, and his direct, often intimate tone shocked many who disparaged him and his followers as modernistas, a title they soon embraced.

Martí was very different from Darío but is important as an innovator. His Ismaelillo (1886) and Versos sencillos (Simple Verses, 1891, in redondillas* based on the octosyllable) reintroduced into lettered culture traditional and popular rhythms. His posthumous Versos libres (Free Verse, 1913) are more hermetic, with reflections on exile, mod. urban life (he spent a great deal of his life in New York), and internal strife.

Gutiérrez Nájera was known for his natural scenes and lively verse such as the poem "La Duquesa Job" (Duchess Job, 1884). A journalist, he specialized in short, contemp. accounts called crónicas (chronicles). In Mexico, the modernistas grouped around the Revista Moderna (1894–96) and the Revista Azul (1892–1915), whose art and poetry emphasized *decadence and eroticism. Del Casal produced a series of sonnets based on paintings by Gustave Moreau. His "impure love of the city" shifts the scene from the natural world to an urban one. His younger compatriot and friend Juana Borrero (1877–96) excelled at both painting and poetry until her early death.

In Argentina, the primary modernist was Leopoldo Lugones (1874–1938). His Lunario sentimental (Sentimental Moon Calendar, 1909) introduced verse free of conventional meter, and its parody of the moon and introduction of the colloquial signaled a fissure in the aesthetics of modernismo. Jorge Luis Borges acknowledged Lugones as an antecedent to *ultraism. The careers of Lugones and Julio Herrera y Reissig (Uruguay, 1875–1910) converge in their early works, since both were influenced by the Fr. symbolist Albert Samain. They are also counterparts in pushing poetic systems to the limit, as in Herrera y Reissig's "Tertulia lunática" (Lunatic Gathering, 1911) where shocking wordplay presaged vanguardist energies.

One of the most striking voices of modernismo was the Uruguayan Delmira Agustini (1886–1914). She is the most sexually explicit, introducing female sexuality into modernista currents, and was the starting point for a new generation of female poets, incl. the Argentinian Alfonsina Storni (1892–1938) and the Chilean Gabriela Mistral (1889–1957).

Other modernistas include Ricardo Jaimes Freyre (Bolivia, 1868–1933), who explored Nordic mythology, and Enrique González Martínez (Mexico, 1871–1952), whose 1912 poem on wringing the neck of the swan complains about striving for eloquence. José Santos Chocano (Peru, 1875–1934) introduced a new thematics into modernista poetry called mundonovismo (New Worldism) that exalted America's indigenous past. Amado Nervo (Mexico, 1870–1919) was the most read poet of his generation. José Juan Tablada (Mexico, 1871–1945) experimented with *haiku and ideographic forms incl. the *calligramme. Ramón López Velarde's (Mexico, 1888–1921) poetry has gained increased critical attention. His "Suave patria" (The Gentle Homeland, 1921) is a tribute to a gentler Mexico of the provinces. His work (e.g., "Mi prima Agueda" [My Cousin Agueda], 1916) wrestles with eroticism but also the speech of daily life.

Octavio Paz writes that, after modernismo, there are two directions in Sp. Am. poetry: that of Lugones in Lunario sentimental and that of Darío; and that mod. poetry follows the path of Lugones. This is true in the sense of poetic form, since vanguardist poets and their followers will largely dispense with rhyme and meter, while another trad. will employ the forms of previous centuries. This second trad. is also tied to the declamation of poetry, a *performance practice important in public events in Latin America until the mid-20th c. (see RECITATION).

Closely following the modernistas was a new generation eager to clear the way for a different kind of lit. Vanguardist movements sprang up in all Latin America—e.g., estridentismo in Mexico, ultraísmo in Argentina, indigenismo in Peru, diepalismo in Puerto Rico, antropofagia* in Brazil—as did little magazines such as Prisma (Argentina 1921–22), Martín Fierro (1924), Proa (1922–25), Elipse (Chile, 1922), Irradiador (Mexico, 1923), Vórtice (Puerto Rico, 1922), Revista de Avance (Cuba, 1927–30), and Contemporáneos (Mexico, 1928–31). In Peru, the vanguard is often linked to the indigenous question, most famously in José Carlos Mariátegui's jour. Amauta (1926–30), but also in Boletín Titikaka (based in Puno) with poets such as Gamaliel Churata (1897–1969).

The vanguard sought to strip poetry of its excess, to reduce it to essentials. They dispensed with meter, rhyme, and extended patterns of imagery in favor of free verse of high visual and aural impact. With film now widespread, poets sought ways to incorporate new techniques of perception. In the estridentistas, the influence of It. *futurism and the fascination with technology was strong; the ultraísta movement in Buenos Aires, led by Borges (Argentina, 1899–1986), sought to reduce poetry to its basic element, the *metaphor. Borges adopted the orthography of colloquial speech in his books dedicated to Buenos Aires: Fervor de Buenos Aires (1923), Luna de enfrente (Moon across the Way, 1925), and Cuaderno San Martín (San Martín Notebook, 1929). Over time, he returned to conventional forms, disavowing his vanguardist past.

What distinguishes the vanguards of Sp. America from those of Europe and the U.S. are the political and ethnic issues involved. Yet this presented a dilemma: how is vanguard poetry to be meaningful socially? Many believed, like Vicente Huidobro (Chile, 1893–1948), that changing lang. was itself revolutionary. Huidobro called his aesthetic creacionismo (*creationism) and was, with César Vallejo, the most radical innovator of his generation. Interested in *cubism, he collaborated with artists such as Juan Gris in poempaintings. His Altazor (1931) is a verse epic of a journey through the spheres in the aftermath of destruction. As the poem evolves, lang. loses its representational character, becoming only dispersed sounds.

In Peru, César Vallejo (1892–1938), from a provincial background, became, with Neruda, the most influential Sp. Am. poet of the 20th c. His Heraldos negros (The Black Heralds, 1919) has echoes of modernismo but shows the earthiness of his stripped down lang. and a loss of faith in overarching systems, esp. Christianity. Trilce (1922) is hermetic and baffling, destroying syntax and confounding meaning. Its visceral appeal has inspired generations of poets, as has the posthumous political poetry collected in Poemas humanos (1939).

In Chile, Pablo Neruda (pseud. of Ricardo Neftalí Reyes Basoalto) (1904–73) gained notice first as the author of Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada (Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair, 1924). As a diplomat in Asia, he continued work on the Residencia en la tierra (Residence on Earth, 1933–47), which expressed inner turmoil in relation to the natural and material world. In 1937, he published España en el corazón (Spain in Our Hearts) in solidarity with the Republicans in the Sp. Civil War. Canto general (General Song, 1950) is a vast epic of the Americas. Originally inspired by Bello's Silvas americanas (1823), Neruda traces Am. origins from prehistoric vegetal and animal states to the cold-war realities of the 1940s. He recounts hist.—esp. conquest and independence heroes, along with sections devoted to rivers, birds, the common man and woman ("La tierra se llama Juan"). The most famous section is "Alturas de Macchu Picchu," which evokes the Incan past out of its slumber within the stones of the ruined city. Neruda went on to break new ground in his Odas elementales (Elemental Odes, 1954), celebrating the natural and the everyday in short verses, with odes to artichokes, socks, and dictionaries.

Nicolás Guillén's (Cuba, 1902–89) long writing career gave voice to Afro-Cuban aesthetics and a new political urgency. His early publications, Motivos de son (Son Motifs, 1930) and Songoro cosongo (1931), develop the possibilities of an Afro-Cuban music and dance in the form of the son, a rhythmic pattern with roots in African slave culture of the colonial period. Guillén reproduces vernacular *diction and dialect (see DIALECT POETRY) in these works, asserting the legitimacy of Afro-Cuban speech and affirming the beauty of the black woman, taking her from racist cliché to personhood. Guillén joined Fidel Castro's revolution and became a cultural symbol and the head of the writers' union in Cuba.

Not all poets cast off formal restraints. Mistral and Storni, both teachers of modest origins, were traditionalists in form. Mistral, who favored the nine-syllable line, paid special attention to themes of motherhood, children, and the natural world, and generations of children in Sp. America have learned to recite her poems. Desolación (1922), Tala (Clearcut, 1938), and Lagar (Winepress, 1954) are her principal poetic works; the latter volume introduces a new *hermeticism, and Poema de Chile (1967) presents a puzzling antiepic of a journey through the homeland. Mistral received the Nobel Prize in 1945, the first Latin Am. to be so honored. Storni presents a sharper edge to the female voice in poetry. She is faithful to poetic form until her final works but shatters convention by expressing rage and sorrow at the female condition in a male-dominated society as in her most anthologized poems, "Tú me quieres blanca" (You Want Me White, 1918) and "Hombre pequeñito" (Little Man, 1919). Her urban poems capture the dislocations brought about by immigration. After a prolonged illness, she committed suicide in 1938 in a dramatic and self-publicized way. Her contemp. Juana de Ibarbourou (Uruguay, 1895–1979) was extremely well known in her time, fitting more easily into the conventions for women. Her lyric poetry includes themes of nature and of love.

The Mexican Revolution (1910–20) brought visibility to indigenous and mestizo issues in a range of arts, incl. the murals of Diego Rivera, David Alfaro Siqueiros, and José Clemente Orozco and the later paintings of Frida Kahlo. Nonetheless, a group of poets, Los Contemporáneos (named for their magazine), ignored postrevolutionary politics and devoted themselves to interiority, as in Xavier Villaurrutia's (1903–50) beautiful and sometimes homoerotic Nocturnos (1933), José Gorostiza's (1901–73) Muerte sin fin (Death without End, 1939), and Carlos Pellicer's (1897–1977) tropical landscapes. Salvador Novo (1904–74) is also associated with this group.

The impact of *surrealism continued well into the century, esp. with Octavio Paz (Mexico, 1914–98). In addition to being the leading poet of his era (he won the Nobel Prize in 1990), Paz was a commanding voice on poetics and lit. hist. The books of criticism El arco y la lira (The Bow and the Lyre, 1956) and Los hijos del limo (Children of the Mire, 1974) have shaped our understanding of poetry in theory and act. His poetic work ranges widely, with roots in pre-Columbian and Asian cosmologies, eroticism, and Mexican realities.

Conversational style became increasingly important around mid-century with Nicanor Parra's (Chile, b. 1914) "anti-poetry" (Poemas y antipoemas, 1954) and the work of Roque Dalton (El Salvador, 1935–75). Dalton's colloquial style became associated with Central Am. liberation movements and the poetry of political denunciation throughout Latin America. A special mention should be made of Violeta Parra (Chile, 1917–67) and her incorporation of oral culture into written poetry. Basing her work on the octosyllable, she wrote and performed her décimas* throughout Chile and in Europe, bringing full circle a trad. as old as the conquest.

Military conflicts and dictatorships of the 1970s and 1980s provided poets such as Juan Gelman (Argentina, b. 1930), Ernesto Cardenal (Nicaragua, b. 1925), Claribel Alegría (El Salvador, b. 1924), Juan Luis Martínez (Chile, 1942–93), and Raúl Zurita (Chile, b. 1950) material for some of their most notable poetry.

Gonzalo Rojas (Chile, 1917–2011), Blanca Varela (Peru, 1926–2009), José Emilio Pacheco (Mexico, b. 1939), and Alejandra Pizarnik (Argentina, 1936–72) are central to recent decades.

Also important is a group of *neobaroque poets inspired by the Cuban José Lezama Lima (1910–76), incl. the Argentine Néstor Perlongher (1949–92), the Cuban José Kozer (b. 1940), and the Argentine Diana Bellessi (b. 1946), among others. A renewal of pan-indigenous movements in the Americas has sparked new interest in indigenous langs. and topics.

See ARGENTINA, POETRY OF; AVANT-GARDE POETICS; BOLIVIA, POETRY OF; CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE; CHILE, POETRY OF; EL SALVADOR, POETRY OF; GUATEMALA, POETRY OF; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; MEXICO, POETRY OF; NICARAGUA, POETRY OF; PERU, POETRY OF; SPAIN, POETRY OF; URUGUAY, POETRY OF; VENEZUELA, POETRY OF.

■ G. Brotherston, Latin American Poetry: Origins and Presence (1975); A. Rama, Las máscaras democráticas del modernismo (1985); O. Rivera-Rodas, La poesía hispanoamericana del siglo XIX (Del romanticismo al modernismo) (1988); Las vanguardias latinoamericanas: textos programáticos y críticos, ed. J. Schwartz (1991); O. Paz, Children of the Mire: Modern Poetry from Romanticism to the Avant-Garde, trans. R. Phillips (1991); V. Unruh, Latin American Vanguards: The Art of Contentious Encounters (1994); The Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, ed. R. González-Echeverarría and E. Pupo-Walker, 2 v. (1996); C. Jrade, Modernismo, Modernity, and the Development of Spanish American Literature (1998); W. Rowe, Poets of Contemporary Latin America: History and Inner Life (2000); A. Bush, The Routes of Modernity: Spanish American Poetry from the Early Eighteenth to the Mid-Nineteenth Century (2002); M. González and D. Treece, The Gathering of Voices: The Twentieth-Century Poetry of Latin America (2002); J. Ludmer, The Gaucho Genre: A Treatise on the Motherland, trans. M. Weigel (2002); S. Yurkiévich, Fundadores de la nueva poesía latinoamericana: Vallejo, Huidobro, Borges, Girondo, Neruda, Paz, Lezama Lima (2002); Encyclopedia of Twentieth-Century Latin American and Caribbean Literature, 1900–2003, ed. D. Balderston and M. González (2004); J. Kuhnheim, Spanish American Poetry at the End of the Twentieth Century: Textual Disruptions (2004); Literary Cultures of Latin America: A Comparative History, ed. M. J. Valdés and D. Kadir, 3 v. (2004); Compromiso e hibridez: Aproximaciones a la poesía hispánica escrita por mujeres, ed. T. Escaja (2007); A. González, A Companion to Spanish American "Modernismo" (2007).

G. KIRKPATRICK

SPANISH PROSODY. Until the advent of *free verse and aside from time-measured song form (verso lírico medieval) and the chanted epic verse (verso épico, mester de juglaría), Sp. verse measure was based on syllable count, involving the principles of *hiatus, *synaloepha, *synaeresis, and *diaeresis. Syllables per line are counted to the last stressed syllable, plus one count. In the earliest period, hiatus was obligatory in syllable counting, but by the late 14th c., synaloepha in court poetry prevailed. *Hemistichs are metrically independent.

One of the earliest and most durable of Sp. verse forms is the octosyllable or romance (Sp. ballad) meter. The earliest *strophe is probably the *couplet (pareado ; see SEXTILLA). Med. two-part verse of the mester de juglaría (minstrel verse) dating from or before the 12th c. is the earliest known long-form measure, found primarily in the cantar de gesta (popular epic; see CANTAR). The hemistichic lines vary in length from about 10 to 20 syllables. The more sophisticated mester de clerecía (clerical verse) poems composed in cuaderna vía* stanzas, whose seven + seven syllable alejandrino lines were probably in imitation of the Fr. *alexandrine, date from ca. 1200 (see COPLA, SERRANILLA, ZÉJEL). The all-purpose copla de arte menor, a stanza of any moderate length in octosyllabic or shorter verse, and its variation, the copla de pie quebrado, became popular. In verse, the favored long lines, all with *caesuras creating metrically independent hemistichs, were 12, 14, or 16 syllables in length, each with its optional quebrado.

While these forms, along with other less prominent strophic arrangements (e.g., villancico*), were being developed for both didactic purpose and popular entertainment, the courtly and learned poets of the 14th and 15th cs. were often composing in Galician-Port., which had been used in the 13th c. by King Alfonso X el Sábio (the Wise), e.g., in his Cantigas de Santa María, and was still lingering in the early 15th c., when most poets were favoring Castilian. The couplet (pareado, pareja), the *tercet (terceto) in any rhyme scheme, various types of eco (see ECHO VERSE), and some experimental forms are found. Poetic license was tolerated, e.g., accent shift in a word, *syncope, haplology, disregard of the penult of a proparoxytone, and acoustic *equivalence for true rhyme (see ARTE MAYOR, ARTE MENOR, DÉCIMA, ENDECHA, ESTRIBILLO, FINIDA, GAITA GALLEGA, GLOSA, LETRILLA, MOTE, PREGUNTA, REFRÁN, REMATE).

The 16th and 17th cs. in Spain firmly established Italianate verse and stanza forms. The sáfico (see SAPPHIC) soon appeared. Old forms were regularized (e.g., the alejandrino, the seguidilla*). The pentasílabo (pentasyllable) served occasionally as hemistich of the hendecasyllable and was also used with the adónico (pentasyllabic paroxytonic verse) to form the sáfico adónico strophe (three sáficos plus one adónico), also known as the oda sáfica. Italianate importations incl. the *soneto, terza rima, octava rima, or heroico or real octave (see OTTAVA RIMA), verso suelto (unrhymed verse, usually hendecasyllabic, sometimes combined with seven- or five-syllable verse; cf. VERSI SCIOLTI). The hendecasyllabic romance heroico (or endecasilábico or real), the lira* variations, and the silva* are among the new. The redondilla*, quintilla*, seguidilla, and their relatives became popular, as did irregular meters and such minor stanza forms as the ensalada*, espinela*, and folia.*

Publication of Ignacio de Luzán's Poética (1737) coincides approximately with the beginning of Sp. neoclassicism, when poets resurrected, restored, and regularized the old and borrowed (mainly from Fr.) or created new variations on old verse and stanza forms (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS). Experimentation was common. From the alejandrino and verso de arte mayor to the trisílabo (three-syllable verse), every verse length, often with set rhythmic pattern, can be found. Decasyllabic patterns included (1) ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – (⏑); (2) – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ | – ⏑ ⏑ – (⏑); (3) ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ | ⏑ – ⏑ – (⏑); (4) the double adonic (adónico doblado or asclepiadeo); and (5) the libre, without fixed pattern. The nine-syllable line includes the eneasílabo iriartino (predominantly ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – [⏑]), the esproncedaico (⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ – [⏑]), the eneasílabo de canción (⏑ ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ ⏑ – [⏑]), the eneasílabo laverdaico or brachycatalecto (⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ ⏑ – ⏑ – [⏑]), and the eneasílabo libre or polirrítmico (no set pattern). Occasionally, an octosyllabic poem has stress consistently on the third syllable, simulating *pie quebrado. A fixed rhythm, esp. *iambic, sometimes appears in heptasyllabic compositions; the hexasílabo, usually with fluctuating inner stress patterns, is occasionally *trochaic. The seldom independent pentasyllabic adónico, generally in combination with the hendecasyllabic sáfico, may have fluctuating inner stress.

Romantic nostalgia was reflected in the use of the verso de arte mayor, the alejandrino, and their quebrados but did not slow the process of innovation: the alcaico (five + five syllable line), the nine-syllable laverdaico, and the anapestic 13-syllable were added to the repertory. Within a poem, random *assonance could replace true rhyme, and rhythm mixing served a purpose. Essentially ad hoc strophes were common; free verse was in the offing. In the mod. period, poets continued reaching for the new while clinging to the old, further loosening the rules without releasing them completely. The major advance was the full acceptance of verso libre, a natural outgrowth of centuries of change. Metrical structure no longer dominates or restricts verse but serves it flexibly as the background instrumental accompaniment to the words.

See CATALAN POETRY; GALICIA, POETRY OF; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

■ J. Vicuña Cifuentes, Estudios de métrica española (1929); P. Henríquez Ureña, Versificación irregular en la poesía castellana, 2d ed. (1933); D. C. Clarke, Una bibliografía de versificación española (1937); E. Díez Echarri, Teorías métricas del siglo de oro (1949); D. C. Clarke, Chronological Sketch of Castilian Versification (1952); Navarro; J. Domínguez Caparrós, Diccionario de métrica española (1985); A. Quilis, Métrica española, 3d ed. (1986); Issues in the Phonology and Morphology of the Major Iberian Languages, ed. F. Martínez-Gil and A. Morales-Front (1997); G. A. Toledo, "Jerarquías prosódicas en español," Revista Española de Lingüística 29 (1999); J. Domínguez Caparrós, Métrica española, 2d ed. (2000).

D. C. CLARKE

SPASMODIC SCHOOL. A term applied by contemp. critics (generally negatively) to a loosely affiliated group of mid-Victorian poets. Heavily influenced by Lord Byron and P. B. Shelley and also to a high degree by the early works of Alfred, Lord Tennyson and Robert Browning, "spasmodic" poets tended to produce poems characterized by extravagant lang. and imagery and varying verse forms, often centered on a tormented poet-hero musing at length on his cosmic ambitions and failings. The best-known examples of the genre are Alexander Smith's A Life-Drama (1853) and Sydney Dobell's Balder (1854), both of which were championed by the critic George Gilfillan and achieved short-lived but intense critical acclaim and popular success. Other minor poets associated with spasmodic writing include P. J. Bailey (author of Festus), J. Stanyan Bigg, J. Westland Marston, Ebenezer Jones, and Gerald Massey. Several of these writers came from working-class backgrounds, and the radical political, religious, and social beliefs of some spasmodic writers can be perceived in the energies of their verse and its often sensational plotlines. After the publication of a superb parody by W. A. Aytoun, Firmilian (1854), spasmodism became a subject of ridicule. Yet it lingered on as a critical concept, and its influence on canonical Victorian poetry was considerable: Matthew Arnold's 1853 Preface was partly aimed at the spasmodics, while Tennyson's Maud, Elizabeth Barrett Browning's Aurora Leigh, and A. C. Swinburne's Poems and Ballads have been read in terms of their spasmodic tendencies.

■ J. H. Buckley, The Victorian Temper (1951); M. A.

Weinstein, W. E. Aytoun and the Spasmodic Controversy (1968); "Spasmodic Poetry and Poetics," spec. iss. of VP 42:4, ed. J. Rudy and C. Laporte (2004).

K. Blair

SPATIAL FORM. A concept describing various structures revealed when a text is apprehended as a simultaneous whole rather than as a sequence unfolding in time. Constituted by patterns of repetition and self-reflexive reference, such structures are said to contribute a sense of internal coherence and unity to literary works. The mod. use of the term originates in Frank's influential essay "Spatial Form in Modern Literature" (1945), which argues that mod. poets and novelists such as T. S. Eliot, James Joyce, and Djuna Barnes resist temporal succession in order to create atemporal patterns of simultaneity in their work. Challenging G. E. Lessing's distinction between the temporal character of poetry and the spatiality of the plastic arts, Frank suggests that mod. lit. resists the tendencies of its own medium so as to produce forms of unity in defiance of the vicissitudes of passing time. Following from Eliot's "mythic method," these forms are also understood as an attempt to replace the perceived chaos of hist. with the timeless certainties of myth. Critics generally acknowledge that spatial form is only a metaphor. It is spatial, for instance, only in the sense that its patterns are understood to be perceived simultaneously. Many critics have also questioned Frank's suggestion that spatial form is a particular feature of *modernism, arguing that the reading of any text produces synchronic structural patterns. Some of the most severe crits. of the concept, however, accept its validity as a formal description of modernist texts but link its celebration of myth and its attempt to impose order to a vision of modernism defined by its extremist politics.

■ J. Frank, "Spatial Form in Modern Literature," The Widening Gyre (1963); F. Kermode, The Sense of an Ending (1967); M. Krieger, "Ekphrasis and the Still Movement of Poetry, or Laokoön Revisited," The Poet as Critic, ed. P. W. McDowell (1967); W.J.T. Mitchell, "Spatial Form in Literature," The Language of Images, ed. W.J.T. Mitchell (1980); J. Frank, The Idea of Spatial Form (1991).

B. Glavey

SPEAKER. See persona; voice.

SPEECH ACT THEORY. A pragmatic theory of lang. first articulated by J. L. Austin and elaborated by H. P. Grice and John Searle, and compatible in many respects with the philosophy of the later Ludwig Wittgenstein, speech act theory defines lang. in terms not of formal structure but of use. When people speak, they assume a complex system of rules that give meanings to particular utterances according to the context in which they are performed. For speech act theorists, the minimal ling. unit is, therefore, not the symbol, word, or sentence but "the production or issuance of the symbol or word or sentence in the performance of [a] speech act" (Searle 1969).

This understanding led Austin to recognize a little-examined aspect of speech that he called "illocutionary action." Even a declarative sentence, he argues, is more than a proposition (locution) expressing truth or falsehood insofar as it implies the speaker's stance toward the utterance. Searle classifies illocutionary acts into five categories: representatives (e.g., claiming, predicting, suggesting); directives (e.g., requesting, commanding, inviting); commissives (e.g., promising, threatening, vowing); expressives (e.g., congratulating, thanking, welcoming); and declarations (e.g., blessing, baptizing, firing). While all illocutionary acts are performative in the sense that they function as social action, a declaration actually brings about the state of affairs it predicates.

Austin calls an illocution "felicitous" when it successfully evokes the conditions conventionally attached to the particular speech act. In ordinary circumstances, e.g., "Your dress is ugly" would not constitute a compliment, and "I marry you" would be infelicitous if the speaker were already married to someone else. This approach locates *intention not in a psychological or moral state but in the evocation of conventions, incl. the convention that an illocutionary act will be sincere. Speech acts "properly" accomplished should generate "perlocutionary effects": e.g., the act of asking will conventionally produce an answer; the act of firing will cause an employee to recognize that she has been dismissed.

Since illocutionary action relies on complex rules and assumptions about sociocultural behavior and lang. use, the meaning of an illocutionary act depends less on its precise verbal form than on the conventions of its performance. "That stove is hot" might be an assertion, a warning, a complaint, or even a compliment. Conversely, a warning about the stove might be expressed in any number of sentences. As Grice observes, communicators draw on contextual assumptions to make inferences; the sentence "I have an aspirin," said in response to "I have a headache," can constitute an offer even though no explicit words of offering have been expressed. Speech act theory thus suggests that context limits the potential of lang. for *ambiguity and free play. However, such rules of inference assume shared understandings that may not be operating in a given speech act, a particular problem for written discourse given its detachment from the site of its production.

The most direct avenue speech act theory opens for lit. concerns the study of textual speakers and characters, as, e.g., in Fish's reading of the double banishment in Shakespeare's Coriolanus, Altieri's analysis of W. C. Williams's "This is Just to Say," or, more recently, Nolan-Grant's take on Austen's "language-based society," all of which consider aspects of discourse that formal analysis overlooks. But Austin complicated the application of speech act theory to lit. by considering speech acts to be "hollow or void if said by an actor on the stage, or if introduced in a poem, or spoken in soliloquy." On this basis, he identified fictional speech as "not serious" and "parasitic." This exclusion, along with disagreements about lang., meaning, and subjectivity, generated extensive debate between speech act theory and deconstruction beginning with a famous exchange between Searle and Derrida in Glyph 1 (1977).

Some theorists argue that lit. is itself a context rather than a detachment from context. Searle, Wolfgang Iser, Richard Ohmann, and Mary Louise Pratt have all understood fictional speech acts to carry a particular kind of illocutionary force. Using Grice's work on "implicature," which postulates maxims that govern ordinary conversation, Pratt evolved characteristics for the specific speech situations of lit. Searle has employed speech act theory to analyze such "literary" tropes as *irony and *metaphor. Speech act theory has attracted scholars with interests ranging from law to the Bible, some of whom also attempt to ameliorate speech act theory's tendency to abstract speaking subjects and conventions of speech from historical and cultural contexts. Hillis Miller has framed literary speech acts as forms of ethical conduct underwriting the formation of social communities. Petrey has usefully shifted literary inquiry from intention to effect, though Gorman charges Petrey with misapprehensions of speech act theory that he also attributes to nearly all literary theorists and scholars who have engaged with Austin's work.

Esp. because speech act theory understands speech as performance, it has also influenced important trends in postmod. thought. Felman's analysis of the seductive false promises of Don Juan (Le Scandale du corps parlant, 1980) synthesized Lacanian psychoanalysis with Austin's ideas in ways that both critique and revalue speech act theory as a lens for understanding the precarious performativity of promises, the embodied theatricality of speech, and the play of transgression that destabilizes pragmatic approaches to lang. In Felman's wake, Butler argues (1993) for the performativity of gender relations and exposes the "binding power" of authoritative speech acts such as marrying, while showing how performance can destabilize that power. In Excitable Speech, Butler maintains "that speech is always in some ways out of control" and stresses the temporal gaps and social differences that intervene between performance and consequence. Through such fruitful conversations with a wide range of theories, texts, and performative settings, speech act theory continues both to influence the study of lang. and lit. and to rethink its own formulations.

■ J. L. Austin, How To Do Things with Words (1962); J. Searle, Speech Acts (1969); R. Ohmann, "Literature as Act," Approaches to Poetics, ed. S. Chatman (1973); H. P. Grice, "Logic and Conversation," Syntax and Semantics, ed. P. Cole and J. Morgan, v. 3 (1975); Glyph 1 (1977); M. L. Pratt, Toward a Speech Act Theory of Literary Discourse (1977); T. Van Dijk, Text and Context (1977); W. Iser, The Act of Reading (1978); J. Searle, Expression and Meaning (1979); S. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? (1980); C. Altieri, Act and Quality (1981); S. Lanser, The Narrative Act (1981); S. Felman, The Literary Speech Act, trans. C. Porter (1983); D. Sperber and D. Wilson, Relevance (1986); "Speech Act Theory and Biblical Criticism," special iss. of Semeia 41, ed. H. White (1988); H. P. Grice, Studies in the Way of Words (1989); S. Petrey, Speech Acts and Literary Theory (1990); J. Butler, Bodies That Matter (1993) and Excitable Speech: A Politics of the Performative (1997); D. Gorman, "The Use and Abuse of Speech Act Theory in Criticism," PoT 20 (1999); J. H. Miller, Literature as Conduct: Speech Acts in Henry James (2005); C. Nolan-Grant, "Jane Austen's Speech Acts and Language-Based Societies," SEL (2009).

S. S. Lanser

SPENSERIAN STANZA. The Spenserian stanza has been taken up by poets from Robert Burns to John Keats to Alfred, Lord Tennyson; but as its name suggests, it has never escaped association with its inventor, Edmund Spenser (1552–99). Its combination of versatility and idiosyncrasy may be unmatched: nine lines long, with a mix of alternating rhyme and *couplets (ababbcbcc), it proceeds in strict *pentameter up to its concluding *alexandrine. Spenser's principal sources were doubtless the Chaucerian *rhyme-royal stanza, which shifts, like his, to couplets at the fifth line (ababbcc), and the ottava rima* of It. epic (abababcc). The stanza is also shaped by the manifold narrative, imagistic, argumentative, and visionary uses to which The Faerie Queene puts it.

The first jolt the stanza gives its reader is that unexpected couplet. At the beginning of book 1, we learn that Red Cross's armor bears "The cruell markes of many a bloudy fielde," and in the next breath, "Yet armes till that time did he neuer wield" (1.1.1). It is the first of many double takes. That fifth line can also usher in a new stage of argument or a new event; it can drive a point home with double force; it can offer a resting place in the middle of the stanza. Any rest, however, is provisional at best, for the alternating rhymes promptly resume.

Some version of the same effect happens at the stanza's end, but this time, the line that completes the couplet has an extra foot. Length gives a sense of finality, and the alexandrine makes a good home for the poem's frequently sententious pronouncements ("That blisse may not abide in state of mortal men" [1.13.44]). There is authority in the nod to epic *hexameter and in the evenhandedness of the usual medial *caesura. That split down the middle, however, can also have a contrary effect, introducing, with the help of an unstated *beat at the joint, the native jounce and narrative carry of *ballad meter ("She turnd her bote about, and from them rowed quite" [2.12.16]).

Spenser uses this peculiar stanza to think with, and it suits his epic's self-critical habits of mind: sometimes careening but more often pausing to doubt, to declare, and then to doubt again. Other poets have variously adapted these potentials. James Thomson's Castle of Indolence is full of Spenserian stops and starts; Keats's "Eve of St. Agnes" is more apt to swoon through the middle of the stanza without taking a breath, as Tennyson does in "The Lotus Eaters." Some of the stanza's inheritors conjure Spenser's resuscitated medievalism, some his dreamy storytelling; all of them conjure Spenser, who can never be cast out of the strange room he built.

■ Empson; P. Alpers, The Poetry of "The Faerie Queene" (1967); J. Dolven, "The Method of Spenser's Stanza," Spenser Studies 21 (2004).

J. Dolven

SPIRITUAL. Although blues singers often say "all of our music came out of the church," the spiritual and the *blues are quite different. Originating probably in the 18th c., the spiritual is a religious folk song distinct from the *hymn, the *psalm, and other sacred songs of a biblical or ecclesiastical character. Originally called jubilee, the spiritual was centered in the daily lives and concerns of Af. slaves and driven by the Protestant revivals of the 18th and 19th cs. Arna Bontemps observed the earthiness of the blues in contrast to the heavenly aspirations of the spiritual. In addition, the spiritual is communal and choral, whereas the blues is often individualistic and even idiosyncratic.

Epstein and Lovell discuss the devel. of the Af. Am. spiritual in historical perspective and discuss the reactions of 19th- and 20th-c. observers. Tribute to the deeply moving music may be found in accounts by James Weldon Johnson, W.E.B. Du Bois, Thomas W. Higginson, and others. Higginson repeatedly refers to the texts of the songs as poetry, a description often used by others who heard the music. The influence of Af. musical and verbal forms as well as the nature of the spiritual's transformation of camp-meeting hymns (popular with white Protestants of the 19th c.) is a topic of perennial discussion. But there is no doubt that the Af. Am. spiritual is a distinctive fusion of Eur. and Af. models, Am. frontier Christianity, and the experience of slavery. The best of the songs, in Johnson's words, "sang a race from wood and stone to Christ."

See African American poetry, devotional poetry.

■ T. W. Higginson, Army Life in a Black Regiment (1870); W.E.B. Du Bois, The Souls of Black Folks (1903); G. P. Jackson, White Spirituals in the Southern Uplands (1933); J. W. Johnson and J. R. Johnson, The Books of American Negro Spirituals (1940); G. P. Jackson, White and Negro Spirituals (1943); A. Bontemps, "Introduction," The Book of Negro Folklore, ed. L. Hughes and A. Bontemps (1958); J. Lovell Jr., Black Song (1974); D. J. Epstein, Sinful Tunes and Spirituals (1977); A. J. Raboteau, Slave Religion (1978); W. T. Walker, "Somebody's Calling My Name": Black Sacred Music and Social Change (1979); E. J. Lorenz, Glory Hallelujah! The Story of the Camp-Meeting Spiritual (1980); D. J. Epstein, "A White Origin for the Black Spiritual? An Invalid Theory and How It Grew," American Music 1 (1983); E. Peters, "The Poetics of the Afro-American Spiritual," Black American Literature Forum 23 (1989), and Lyrics of the Afro-American Spiritual (1991); W. F. Pitts, Old Ship of Zion: The Afro-Baptist Ritual in the African Diaspora (1993).

S. E. Henderson

SPLIT LINES. Originating in cl. drama, split lines are metrically complete lines shared by two or more speakers, often producing an effect of rapidity in the exchange between them. Examples include exchanges between Oedipus and Creon in Sophocles' Oedipus Rex and between Medea and her nurse in Seneca's Medea. In his essay on Senecan tragedy in Elizabethan trans., T. S. Eliot quotes the latter, calling the split lines "minimum antiphonal units." Split lines became a feature of Elizabethan drama, with Thomas Kyd, Christopher Marlowe, John Webster, and Ben Jonson among those using them, in addition to Shakespeare, whose plays show a steady increase in the percentage of split lines over his career—the late plays contain from 15 to almost 20%, peaking in Antony and Cleopatra and Coriolanus—as the point of breaking in the line steadily moves to the right. Whereas the First Folio of Shakespeare's plays does not distinguish split lines visually, they appear with a distinct visual format—the second part of the line indented beyond the end of the first after an intervening strophic boundary—in William Wordsworth's "Tintern Abbey," in which the visible break signals some transition in the speaker's thought or feeling, rather than an exchange between two speakers. Among the modernists, visible split lines appear in the poems of Robert Frost (his two-speaker dramatic poems), Wallace Stevens, Ezra Pound, W. C. Williams, and Eliot, among others. But often in the case of Williams or Pound, a question arises: in verse without a metrical norm, how can one distinguish between, on the one hand, two or more parts of a single line and, on the other, two or more lines with visual formatting that uses indentation? In the later 20th c., Charles Wright made split lines his signature technique (as in Halflife, 1988), speaking of the "dropped line" or "low rider" and signaling the intralinear status of his breaks by capitalizing the first words of left-justified lines.

■ T. S. Eliot, Elizabethan Dramatists (1963); M. G. Tarlinskaja, Shakespeare's Verse (1987), ch. 4; G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988), ch. 8.

T.V.F. Brogan; G. Braden; S. Cushman

SPOKEN WORD. See performance, poetry slam.

SPONDEE (Gr., "used at a libation," i.e., poured to the accompaniment of the two long notes). In *classical prosody, a metrical unit consisting of two long syllables; in the mod. accentually based prosodies, a *foot of two stressed syllables. Cl. meters entirely composed of spondees—versus spondaicus (spondaic verse)—are rare but do occur (West). But normally, as in the dactylic hexameter, the spondee is an optional substitution for a *dactyl in the first five feet and obligatory in the last (metrical marking of closure is a widely attested phenomenon). Allen, therefore, thinks the spondee "can hardly be termed a 'foot' in its own right," since it does not manifest internal opposition or contrast of members, and cites Pohlsander, who holds that the spondee "has no real existence of its own . . . but must always be considered the contracted form of some other metrical unit."

In the prosodies of the mod. Germanic langs., which have been traditionally scanned in feet, the existence of spondaic feet is disputed. Several knowledgable and sensible mod. metrists (J. B. Mayor, George Saintsbury, Fitzroy Pyle, Clive Scott, G. T. Wright) have long held that the foot of two heavy syllables is a legitimate variation in iambic verse: they point to examples such as the last two syllables of the following lines: "The dove pursues the griffon, the mild hind" (Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream 2.1.232), or "The long day wanes, the slow moon climbs" (Alfred, Lord Tennyson, "Ulysses"), or "Silence, ye troubl'd waves, and thou Deep, peace" (John Milton, Paradise Lost 7.216), or the third and fourth syllables of "That in one speech two negatives affirm" (Philip Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 63.14). Absolutists, these metrists hold that, if two contiguous odd-even stresses in a line are both strong—perhaps not perfectly equal in strength (though that is certainly possible) but nearly so—then they should both be counted as strong, and the foot is, thus, a spondee. That is, if both stresses are, on a scale of four degrees of stress (1 strongest, 4 weakest), 1s or 2s (i.e., either the sequence 1-2 or 2-1), then *scansion should reflect the fact that these levels are both above 3 and 4. As in the examples from Tennyson and Milton, such alleged instances of spondees are often made possible by two adjacent monosyllables or, more clearly, by a major syntactic juncture within the foot.

Other mod. metrists (e.g., Edwin Guest, W. W. Skeat, Jakob Schipper, Derek Attridge, Susanne Woods), esp. those who base their theories on ling., deny the existence of the spondee and *pyrrhic in mod. verse, either on the basis of their definition of the foot itself as an element of metrical theory or else on the basis of Otto Jespersen's Relative Stress Principle (RSP), which explicitly prohibits absolute weighting of stress (hence, two heavy syllables within one foot). Jespersen's relativity principle assumed the existence of metrical feet and amounted to the claim that stress matters only in relation to immediately contiguous syllables, esp. the one syllable preceding. Hence, for him, the sequence "and thou Deep, peace" amounts to two iambs—unequal ones, perhaps, but iambs. The RSP yielded, for many metrists, elegant and subtle scansions that preserved both extensive metrical conformity (it allowed only iambs and trochees, in effect) and expressive readings. But it did this at the expense of variety in feet and of, some felt, due recognition of weighting in the line. Pyle rightly identifies the underlying issue at stake as being the question of "how far does the metre actually influence our rendering of stress as we read?" Readers and metrists who grant a strong influence will deny the existence of spondees (McAuley), those a weak influence, affirm (Pyle). Relativist scansion more accurately tracks the shape of line movement; absolutist scansion more accurately takes account of which syllables are heavy and which not.

It is evident that, in certain contexts where full syllable realization is granted every syllable, spondaic words can occur (Fussell gives the example of "Amen"), but these may represent an unusual performance mode and so be exceptions. In any event, the normal processes of stress alternation and reduction operate so systematically in Eng. phonology that, in compound words or in phrases of any length, spondees are difficult at best. Still, absolutists in scansion can produce strong examples, as Wright does from Shakespeare. Of course, mod. imitations of cl. meters such as the *hexameter attempt to reproduce spondees either accentually or by some theory of quantities.

See CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES.

■ P. Fussell, Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (1965); J. McAuley, Versification (1966); F. Pyle, "Pyrrhic and Spondee," Hermathena 107 (1968); Allen; West; Scott; Attridge, Rhythms; G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); Meter in English: A Critical Engagement, ed. D. Baker (1996); C. Addison, "Stress Felt, Stroke Dealt: The Spondee, the Text, and the Reader," Style 39 (2005).

T.V.F. BROGAN

SPONTANEITY. A key term in romantic poetics, spontaneity falls at one end of the perennial debate over whether great art results from craft or *inspiration. Although Horace allows for *invention, he claims that technique and moral sense are "the source and font of proper writing" (Ars poetica 309). This position influenced the poetics of the Ren. In Certayne Notes of Instruction (1575), George Gascoigne recommends that the poet "stand most upon the excellencie of [his] Invention, & sticke not to studie deepely for some fine devise" but emphasizes the necessity of tempering invention with technical precision. Likewise, although Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1595) refers to the poet being "lifted up with the vigour of his own inventions," Sidney ultimately prioritizes moral instruction as the task of true poetry. Seventeenth-c. empirical philosophy, notably in Thomas Hobbes and John Locke, opposes the innateness of emotional awareness to acquired knowledge and skill, stressing the need to control *wit and invention through reason and judgment. Given the influence of these ideas on the Enlightenment, spontaneity was not esp. prized in the 18th c.; witness Alexander Pope's poetry and Samuel Johnson's crit.

The Eng. romantics, who connected spontaneity with *sincerity and *naturalism, make the strongest claims. William Wordsworth's Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads proclaims "good poetry" the "spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings." P. B. Shelley's Defence of Poetry (1821; pub. 1840) distinguishes poetry from reasoning, "a power . . . exerted according to the determination of the will," insisting that "[a] man cannot say 'I will compose poetry.'" In "The Two Kinds of Poetry" (1833), John Stuart Mill states that "the poetry of a [natural poetic mind] is Feeling itself, employing Thought only as the medium of its utterance." Mill's account parallels Friedrich Schiller's notion of naive Dichtung—itself based on Immanuel Kant's characterization of how poetry "expands the mind . . . by letting it feel its faculty—free, spontaneous, and independent of determination" (3d Critique § 53). Other 19th-c.

writers, incl. Thomas Carlyle and R. W. Emerson, emphasize the lyrical nature of the poet's sentiments; in "The Poet," Emerson counsels, "Doubt not, O poet, but persist. Say 'It is in me, and shall out.' "

Fin de siècle poetics valued the subjective immediacy of spontaneity as a vehicle for conveying instantaneous feelings; consider Walter Pater's aesthetics and the Fr. symbolists (see SYMBOLISM). Modernist movements, esp. *Dada, inherited this interest in subjective immediacy, as evinced in the *sound poetry of Hugo Ball, Tristan Tzara, and Richard Huelsenbeck. Spontaneity also proved particularly important for the automatic techniques of *surrealism in the expression of imagination and emotion without deliberate control. Drawing on elements of late surrealism and socialist realism, 20th-c. Lat.-Am. avant-garde poetry advanced a new conception of the relationship between spontaneity and method; witness Pablo Neruda's notion of espontaneidad dirigida (directed spontaneity) and Octavio Paz's insistence that poetry is born out of the "struggle" or "embrace" between spontaneity and "conscious lucidity." After World War II, the *Beat poets, with their loose structures and spontaneous prosody, furnish other good examples—as does, more recently, the work of *performance and spoken-word poets, such as Hedwig Gorsky, Cid Corman, David Antin, and Lemn Sissay.

See INTENTION.

■ Abrams; W. J. Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970); J. Engell, The Creative Imagination: Enlightenment to Romanticism (1981); W. Fox, Immediacy: A Poetic Stance from the Romantics to the Contemporaries (1981); D. Belgrad, The Culture of Spontaneity: Improvisation and the Arts in Postwar America (1999); L. Wheeler, Voicing American Poetry: Sound and Performance from the 1920s to the Present (2008).

J. L. MAHONEY; C. DONALDSON

SPRUCHDICHTUNG. The term Spruchdichtung is used in med. studies to denote two predominantly didactically oriented text types in Ger. lit. of the 12th to 15th cs. and partly of the 16th, which, however, are genetically unconnected. These text types—involving, on the one hand, spoken poems of short or medium length in four-beat rhyming *couplets (Reimsprüche, Reden) and, on the other, sung stanzas (Sangsprüche) composed in more or less complicated forms—are not directly related to *didactic poetry in Lat. or in the Romance-speaking areas. The term Spruch for spoken texts was already common in the Middle Ages, while the term Spruch or Sangspruch for sung stanzas was not coined until the 19th c.

The text type, Sangspruch, is found from the 12th c. alongside other forms of the med. Ger. song (Minnelied, the spiritual and secular leich, and other spiritual songs). Sangspruch texts incorporate elaborations on all kinds of teaching about religion, morals, and social class; positions taken on political events and their protagonists; learned nature studies; praise of poets; and polemics between poets. Until the middle of the 14th c., the monostanzaic principle prevailed: each stanza was in principle an independent entity, though several single stanzas could combine to form more or less loose groupings. This principle constituted an important formal difference between the Sangspruch and the Minnelied, in which several stanzas were the rule. From the middle of the 14th c., the polystanzaic principle became the rule in Spruchdichtung. It is characteristic that the stanzaic forms and melodies the authors used were for the most part not employed only once (as was the case with Minnesang*), but the individual poets also had at their disposal a definite, if small, repertoire of Töne (sing. Ton), which they employed repeatedly for texts of the most varied contents. Ton is understood to be the combination of stanzaic form (metrical and rhyme scheme) and melody. From the period around 1200, the tripartite form was prescribed for the Töne, consisting of two metrically and melodically identical parts (AA = Aufgesang, upsong) and a divergent third part (B = Abgesang, downsong) or a variant of this.

The Sangspruch poets were predominantly professional authors who gained their livelihood for the most part as traveling poets writing on commission. They were often in competition with one another as well as with other entertainers. They drew on a well–developed awareness of their own art and trad. Their typical role was that of the knowledgeable teacher, which explains the then-customary designation as meister, i.e., magister, a title that emphasized their authority.

The traceable hist. of Spruchdichtung begins with two authors of the late 12th c. whose texts have been passed down under the single name Spervogel (sparrow). The text type reaches its high point around 1200 with Walther von der Vogelweide (who was at the same time the most important Ger. Minnesinger). Through the high quality of Walther's poetry and his integration of political themes, Spruchdichtung became the second most important genre of med. Ger. song. Between Walther's time and about 1475, some 60 Sangspruch poets are known. Other famous poets include Frauenlob (d. 1318), Heinrich von Mügeln (d. ca. 1370), and Michel Beheim (d. ca. 1472 or 1479). From ca. 1400, Spruchdichtung was imitated and continued by the urban mastersingers down to the 18th c.

The Reimspruch lasted from the early 13th c. to the 16th. The authors of this formally less demanding art were professional poets or dilettantes. Religious and secular teaching of all kinds, politics, and, at times, entertainment were also involved here. Three poets of particular note in this connection are, in the 13th c., Freidank, author of a widely circulated collection of poems with short texts of a didactic and contemp. character, and der Stricker, author of, among others, spiritual, secular-didactic, and political Spruchdichtung; in the 14th c., Heinrich der Teichner. From the 15th c. on, poetry-writing artisans in towns made particular use of this form, which in the 16th c. underwent a further revival, thanks to Hans Sachs.

■ Criticism and History: E. Lämmert, Reimsprecherkunst im Spätmittelalter (1970); B. Wachinger, Sängerkrieg (1973); H. Brunner, Die alten Meister (1975); F.

Schanze, Meisterliche Liedkunst, 2 v. (1983–84); Repertorium der Sangsprüche und Meisterlieder des 12. bis 18. Jhs., ed. H. Brunner and B. Wachinger, 16 v. (1986–2009); Sangspruchdichtung, ed. D. Klein et al. (2007).

■ Primary Texts: Reinmar von Zweter, ed. G. Roethe (1887); Heinrich der Teichner, ed. H. Niewöhner, 3 v. (1953–56); Heinrich von Mügeln, ed. K. Stackmann, 3 v. (1959); Michel Beheim, ed. H. Gille and I. Spriewald, 3 v. (1968–1972); Frauenlob, ed. K. Stackmann and K. Bertau, 2 v. (1981); Walther von der Vogelweide, ed. K. Lachmann and C. Cormeau (1996).

H. Brunner

SPRUNG RHYTHM. G. M. Hopkins coined the term sprung rhythm to characterize the poetic rhythm that he used first in his great ode "The Wreck of the Deutschland" and in numerous subsequent poems, incl. most of his best known. Hopkins describes the rhythm most valuably in his Author's Preface, composed for the later poems, "Deutschland" and after, and in a long letter to his poet-friend, Canon Richard Watson Dixon (October 5, 1878). He tells Dixon the "echo" of the rhythm long "haunted" his ear before he "realized [it] on paper" in the ode. To explain how poetic rhythm may be "sprung," he instances the work of John Milton, "the great standard in the use of counterpoint." *Counterpoint is prominent in Paradise Lost and Paradise Regain'd, and then Milton carries it much further in the choruses of Samson Agonistes, which are "counterpointed throughout" so that each line "has two different coexisting scansions. But when you reach that point the secondary or 'mounted rhythm,' which is necessarily a sprung rhythm, overpowers the original or conventional one and then this becomes superfluous." Sprung rhythm, as Hopkins points out, cannot be counterpointed.

Hopkins tells Dixon that sprung rhythm "consists in scanning by accents or stresses alone . . . so that a foot may be one strong syllable or it may be many light and one strong." His imprecision does not mean, however, that the foot patterns are in his mind arbitrary or of no importance, as his explanation in his Author's Preface shows. Except for "particular effect," the sprung-rhythm foot will have one to four syllables. The nuclear stress may come at any point in the foot, but "it is a great convenience to follow the example of music and take the stress always first," producing "four sorts of feet, a monosyllable and the so-called accentual Trochee, Dactyl, and the First Paeon [four syllables (′xxx)]. And there will be four corresponding natural rhythms." However, labeling a poem's rhythm accordingly, as, for instance, the poet's headnote identifying "The Windhover" as "falling paeonic," seems of minimal practical help for *scansion. It is more useful to consider the effect that the poet aims for with sprung rhythm.

Hopkins wants his poetry to be "logaoedic," to combine the advantages of prose and verse. Writing to Robert Bridges (August 21, 1877), he states he uses sprung rhythm "because it is the nearest to the rhythm of prose, that is the native and natural rhythm of speech, the least forced, the most rhetorical and emphatic of all possible rhythms, combining, as it seems to me, opposite and, one wd. have thought, incompatible excellences, markedness of rhythm—that is rhythm's self—and naturalness of expression." In sprung rhythm, two kinds of verbal music happily intersect: on the one hand, it has marked rhythm, requiring a clearly defined recurrence of stress; on the other hand, it has naturalness, the stress pattern of natural speech. The *paeon is of particular interest to Hopkins. In his lecture notes on "Rhythm and Other Structural Parts of Rhetoric," he observes that the foot patterns that Aristotle prescribes for oratory are the first and fourth paeon, neither of which can make "meters" (verse lines) in the common ("running") rhythms. Sprung rhythm, however, makes the metrical paeon possible.

The naturalness of sprung rhythm results importantly from its free mixing of foot types, producing both adjacent and widely separated stress, thereby obscuring the underlying regularity of the rhythm. Hopkins emphasizes that his rhythm does not result from laxity in timing, but rather is carefully planned. He contrasts his rhythm with Walt Whitman's, whose verse he admired: Whitman's verses verge on "decomposition into common prose," while his own are "very highly wrought. . . . Everything is weighed and timed in them" (letter to Bridges, Oct. 18, 1882). "The native and natural rhythm of speech" that Hopkins aims for with sprung rhythm, then, does not arise from imitating ordinary linguistic intonation. Instead, it comes from an artful reconstitution of it. He tells his brother Everard in a late letter (Nov. 5, 1885), "Sprung rhythm makes verse stressy; it purges it to an emphasis as much brighter, livelier, more lustrous than the regular emphasis of common rhythm as poetry in general is brighter than common speech." A reading of sprung rhythm verse will be "poetical" rather than rhetorical; in his Author's Preface, he instructs the reader of sprung rhythm "strongly to mark the beats of the measure . . . not disguising the rhythm and the rhyme, as some readers do, who treat poetry as if it were prose fantastically written to rule . . . , but laying on the beat too much stress rather than too little." He declares to Bridges (May 21, 1878), "Stress is the life of it."

■ Correspondence of Gerard Manley Hopkins and R. W. Dixon, ed. C. C. Abbott (1935); Letters of Gerard Manley Hopkins to Robert Bridges, ed. C. C. Abbott (1935); M. Holloway, Prosodic Theory of Gerard Manley Hopkins (1947); W. Ong, "Hopkins' Sprung Rhythm and the Life of English Poetry," Immortal Diamond, ed. N. Weyand (1949); Journals and Papers of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. H. House and G. Storey (1959); E. Schneider, Dragon in the Gate (1968); C. Scott, A Question of Syllables (1986), chap. 5; P. Kiparsky, "Sprung Rhythm," Rhythm and Meter, ed. P. Kiparsky and G. Youmans (1989); N. MacKenzie, "Metrical Marks," Poetical Works of Gerard Manley Hopkins, 5th ed. (1990); J. I. Wimsatt, "Alliteration and Hopkins's Sprung Rhythm," PoT 19 (1998), and Hopkins's Poetics of Speech Sound (2006).

J. I. Wimsatt

SRI LANKA, POETRY OF

I. Sinhala
II. Tamil
III. English

Sri Lankan poetry covers work in three langs.: Sinhala, which dates to the 1st c. CE; Tamil, which developed a distinctly Sri Lankan identity in the 20th c.; and Eng., of which a small but significant body of work now exists, dating mainly from the mid-20th c.

I. Sinhala. The Sinhala lang. has been used almost exclusively in Sri Lanka, but the contours of Sinhala's poetic heritage resonate with those generally found elsewhere in South Asia. These contours include two key features of literary cultures in premod. South Asia: the restriction of the production of poetry to a limited number of langs., such as Sanskrit and various literary Prakrits, and the recourse to multiple langs. by authors within a single literary culture. These two features have left a profound imprint on Sinhala poetry writing across the centuries, first, in terms of a continuing sense of Sinhala's intrinsic exceptionalism in poetry and, second, in terms of how Sinhala poetry was often inflected by values and conventions that originated in poetry written in other langs.

The most striking feature of exceptionalism in Sinhala literary cultures is in the very fact of the use of Sinhala as a vehicle for poetry. Along with Tamil, Sinhala was among the first local langs. used for poetry in South Asia, with significant examples of poetry and poetic crit. surviving from at least the 7th c. CE. Sinhala poets seem remarkably early to have considered the Sinhala lang. as equal to Sanskrit in its capacity to be a vehicle for poetry, and, ironically, they displayed this confidence in their poems at about the same time that theorization about poetry in Sanskrit explicitly denied that local langs. like Sinhala were capable of poetry. If Sinhala provides some of the earliest evidence for a literary culture in South Asia using a local lang. for poetry, it also provides evidence that this choice must have involved self-consciousness on the part of poets about not being bound by at least some of the conventions that defined literary works and persons in Sanskrit literary culture, even though it was generally normative in premod. South Asia.

Sinhala also provides evidence that the transformation of a lang. used for everyday interaction into one capable of poetry occurred through a standardization and theorization of lang. in grammar and poetics. The processes that transformed Sinhala into a lang. of poetry, however, were often the result of interaction with thinking about poetry found in other langs. The 9th-c. Siyabaslakara (Poetics of One's Own Language), one of the earliest extant scholarly works in Sinhala, is a handbook on poetics that turned to Sanskrit texts such as Daṇḍin's Kāvyādarśa for models of thinking about poetics, while the cl. Sidatsangarava (Compilation of Methods), a work of both grammar and poetics, seems related to a similar text in Tamil, the 11th-c. Viracoliyam. Moreover, in view of this exceptionalism, Sinhala poets were quite self-conscious about their literary heritage, and they took a variety of steps to ensure the continuity of the lang. used in Sinhala poetry. Their success in this is evident in the gulf between the lang. commonly used in poetry and that used in other written expressions and in speech.

The generative interaction between Sinhala literary cultures and the poetry and poetics produced in other langs. has resulted in a composite Sinhala poetic heritage, one with distinct strands that display their origin in the interaction of Sinhala poets with other literary langs., esp. with Sanskrit, Tamil, and Eng. Another distinct strand within the Sinhala poetic heritage comes from interaction with various forms of folk poetry in Sri Lanka, whether in the form that shades into secular songs or in the form that shades into religious rituals. Folk poetry, whether closer to *song or to ritual expression, is marked by the absence of identifiable poets. A case could be made that the trads. of folk poetry continually nourished and sustained the poetic heritage of Sinhala literary cultures but that, in a stricter sense, those cultures were concerned with the production of poets, as identifiable figures, as much as with the production of poems.

The earliest extant examples of poetry in Sinhala are found at Sigiriya, a ruined palace complex in central Sri Lanka. A body of poems about representations of women in paintings found at these ruins was inscribed by visitors at Sigiriya between the 7th and 9th cs., and the poetic conventions found in these graffiti are clearly continuous with the lang. and form of Sinhala poetry written between the 10th and 15th cs. While there are meters used in the poems that seem to be unique to Sinhala poetry, there also seems to be a sophisticated awareness of *Sanskrit poetry and poetics.

Beginning around the 11th or 12th c., Sinhala poets began to adapt more of the conventions of Sanskrit poetry, esp. in ornate poems (mahākāvya) that recounted the stories of the previous lives of the Buddha. The content of these poems often seems subordinate to the conventions of the genre in Sanskrit, such as the descriptions of a set number of topics, but they also preserved the formal qualities of Sinhala poetry in meter and style. The greatest of these poems perhaps is Kavsilumina (The Crest Gem of Poetry), which continues to occupy a central place in the canon of Sinhala poetry.

This adaptation of models from Sanskrit for Sinhala poetry continued throughout the med. period, esp. in the genre of messenger poems (sandēśa), which took Kālidāsa's Meghadhūta as a model. The Sinhala poems produced in this genre, such as the Sālalihini sandēśa, share distinctive features with poems composed on the same model across southern South Asia—in Sanskrit, *Malayalam, and *Tamil—in the same period.

In the early mod. period, Sinhala poets adapted more from Tamil poetry than seems to have been the case earlier, as can be seen in *internal rhyming patterns and literary *allusions, but at the same time, Sinhala poets of this era expanded the scope of appropriate subjects for poetry writing beyond the set topics that had characterized earlier poetry. As a result, these poets, writing in the colonized southern coastal regions of the island, introduced a greater sense of personal emotion into the heritage of Sinhala poetry. New forms of adaptation from other poetic models occurred in the 20th c., when nationalist movements stimulated literary activity, much of it Buddhist, classicist, revivalist, and didactic. The 20th c. also saw the growth of a secular poetry, nationalist in theme and traditional in form. By the 1930s, Munidasa Kumaranatunge (1887–1944) had begun a movement for lang. reform termed Hela, to rid Sinhala of Sanskrit influences. Kumaranatunge's critical writings had considerable impact, and his poems for children introduced a new simplicity into Sinhala poetry.

The major breakthrough came with the introduction of nisandäs kavi (*free verse). G. B. Senanayake (1913–85) had experimented with unrhymed verse forms as early as 1945 in his poems in Paligänima (Revenge). However, it was Siri Gunasinghe (b. 1925) in Mas Le Näti Äta (Bones without Flesh or Blood, 1956), Abhinikmana (Renunciation, 1958), and Ratu Käkulu (Red Buds, 1962) who established and popularized the form. Gunasinghe together with others such as Gunadasa Amerasekera (b. 1929) and Wimal Dissanayake, who were part of the literary world of the University of Peradeniya in the 1950s, became known as the Peradeniya poets. Influenced by the literary theories of Am. *New Criticism, they were at first criticized as Westernized ivory-tower aesthetes, but their work soon gained acceptance. Their writings gave a new vitality and flexibility to the lang. Ediriweera Sarachcharanda (1914–96), the foremost critic and theorist of the group, also revolutionized the theater with his poetic dramas Maname (1956) and Simhabahu (1958).

The 1970s saw a fresh burst of poetic activity by writers whose works reflected a strong social concern. However, their evocative use of lang. and the confidence with which they drew on cl. and folk as well as foreign lits. gave their work an energy that overrode the didacticism. Mahagama Sekera's (1929–76) Heta Irak Payayi (Tomorrow a Sun Will Rise, 1971), Nomiyami (I Will Not Die, 1973), and Prabuddha (1976); Parakrama Kodituwakku's Akikaru Putrayakuge Lokayak (The World of a Disobedient Son, 1974) and Alut Minihesk Ävit (A New Man Has Come, 1976); and Monica Ruwanpathirana's (1945–2004) Tahanam Desayakin (From a Forbidden World, 1972) and Obe Yeheliya Äya Gähäniya (Your Friend, She Is Woman, 1975) are some of the important works of this group.

The dynamic energy of the 1970s slackens perceptibly by the 1980s. The civil war, disturbing and demoralizing but strangely distant because it was fought in the north, left hardly any mark on the poetry. The creative impetus seems to shift away from poetry to drama. However, the 21st c. has seen the resurgence of a vibrant poetic idiom in the work of Liyanage Amarakeerthi. He draws from life in rural Sri Lanka in conflict with political and social change in his collection Ekamatha Eka Pita Rataka (2005).

II. Tamil. While the Tamil presence in Sri Lanka goes back to very early times, Tamil lit. gained a distinct Sri Lankan identity only much later. The earliest reference to a Sri Lankan Tamil poet is in the Sangam lit. of the 3d c. CE, where verses attributed to Putatevanar with the prefix Elathu (Lanka) appear. In 1310 CE, Caracotimalai by Pocaraca Panditar was presented in the court of the Sinhala king Parakramabahu III at Dambadeniya. These are the only references for the early period.

The flourishing Tamil kingdom in the Jaffna peninsula (14th–17th c.) gave rise to several poetical works. The best known was Rakuvamcam by Aracakecari, the *poet laureate. Under colonial rule, the proselytizing activities of Christian missionaries spawned a genre of religious poetry that was given further impetus by the introduction of printing.

Early Sri Lankan Tamil poetry had traditionally been seen merely as an extension of Indian Tamil writing; but by the 1940s, a renaissance occurred, when many young poets began to emphasize their Sri Lankan identity. A distinctly different Tamil poetry soon evolved. Nantaran, Kantacami, and Mahakavi are important poets of this period. Simplicity, colloquial meters, and concrete visual images are the hallmarks of this Lankan Tamil poetry.

When Sinhala was made the official lang. in 1956, a new political consciousness evolved among the Tamils. Three schools of poetry emerged. The first was nationalist, in support of a Tamil federal state. The second group called themselves Progressives, was influenced by left-wing ideologies, and advocated a radical transformation of Sri Lankan society, both Sinhala and Tamil. The third refused to be identified with either group and wrote a very individualized poetry. Mod. forms such as free verse were introduced, and poets and poetry proliferated.

By the 1970s, Tamil political aspirations for a separate state led to guerrilla war. Thereafter, the experience for Sri Lankan Tamil poets was blood, tears, violence, battle, exile, death, and life amid death. The new *war poetry reflected these realities. Sri Lankan Tamil poetry now charts its own course and is entirely different from Indian Tamil writing unexposed to such experiences. During the second half of the war, from the mid-1990s, poetry became the foremost choice as the medium of literary expression. The major poets of the time are Jeyapalan, Ceran, Ceyan, Yecuraca, Vicayentran, Puthuvai Rathnadurai, and Vilvaratinam.

Love and war had been the basic themes of early Sangam lit. Once Tamil military exploits ceased after colonial conquest, war poetry died out. It is notable that Tamil-speaking writers of different regions in Sri Lanka have used the medium of poetry to express their lives in time of war and interethnic conflict. The Muslim writers in Tamil from the eastern region, such as Vedanti, Natchathiran Sevvinthiyan, N. Atma, Deva Abira, and Aswagosh have written about their distinct experience of displacement during the Tamil-Muslim conflict in the north and their experience as a Tamil-speaking community separate from the ethnically Tamil community of Sri Lanka. There are also the writers of the Tamil diaspora based in countries such as Canada, the U.K., France, and Germany who are using the poetic medium to express their experience of the Sri Lankan conflict and their private experience within the context of exile. Jeyapalan, Vijayendran, and Aravinthan use imagery at times that is a part of their migrant lives but new to *Tamil poetry.

III. English. English poetry in Sri Lanka developed its own identity in the mid-20th c. Lakkdasa Wickremasinghe in his pioneering work boldly experimented with the rhythms of Lankan Eng. Lustre Poems (1965) has a dynamic energy, while later works such as The Grasshopper Gleaming (1976) show his growing control of his medium. Yasmine Gooneratne's (b. 1935) Word, Bird and Motif (1971) and Lizard's Cry (1972) reveal her flair for the satiric mode, where her control of tone and sensitivity to the nuances of words have full play. Anne Ranasinghe's (b. 1925) Poems (1971) and Plead Mercy (1975) provide sharp insights into a range of personal experiences that bridge two worlds. Ranasinghe's works draw from her experiences as a Holocaust survivor and a child growing up in Europe during World War II and later as a resident in Sri Lanka by marriage. In works such as July 1983 (1983), she comments from the inside with the perspective of the outsider, drawing parallels between historic events of extreme violence and cruelty in Europe and South Asia. Basil Fernando (b. 1944) in A New Era to Emerge (1973) and Jean Arasanayagam (b. 1931) in Apocalypse (1983) and A Colonial Inheritance (1985) write movingly of the realities of Sri Lankan life. Several new voices emerged at the beginning of the 21st c.: Vivimarie VanderPoorten (b. 1967), Nothing Prepares You (2007) and Stitch Your Eyelids Shut (2010); Ramya Chamalie Jirasinghe (b. 1971), There's an Island in the Bone (2010); and Malinda Seneviratne (b. 1965), Threads (2007). VanderPoorten uses sparse lang. to capture the experiences of violence, war, and exclusion, while Jirasinghe employs local *metaphor and vivid *imagery to write about personal narratives of identity and belonging against larger political and social structures. There are also a few of poets and writers of Sri Lankan origin who reside overseas, such as Rienzi Crusz (b. 1925) in Canada. They have appropriated a poetic lang. heavy with desire and longing to write about the experience of displacement, as Crusz does in Love Where the Nights Are Green (2008). The readership for Eng. poetry in Sri Lanka is small but influential, with the potential of international importance.

See ORAL POETRY, SANSKRIT POETICS.

■ Anthologies: Poetry from the Sinhalese, trans. G. Keyt (1939); Sigiri Graffiti, ed. and trans. S. Paranavitarne (1955); An Anthology of Classical Sinhalese Literature, ed. C. Reynolds (1970); "Poetry of Sri Lanka," Journal of South Asian Literature 12.1 (1976)—spec. iss.; Modern Writing in Sinhala, ed. R. Obeyesekere and C. Fernando (1978); "Sinhala and Tamil Writing from Sri Lanka," Journal of South Asian Literature 22.2 (1987)—spec. iss.; Twelve Centuries of Sinhala Poetry, trans. L. de Silva (2004); The Penguin Book of Tamil Poetry: The Rapids of a Great River, ed. and trans. L. Holstrom (2009); Kaleidoscope 2: An Anthology of Sri Lankan English Literature, ed. D.C.R.A. Goonetilleke (2010).

■ Criticism and History: C. E. Godakumbura, Sinhalese Literature (1955); K. S. Sivakumaran, Tamil Writing in Sri Lanka (1964); R. Obeyesekere, Sinhalese Writing and the New Critics (1974); K. Sivathamby, Tamil Literature in Eelam (1978); The Sri Lanka Reader: History, Culture and Poetics, ed. J. C. Holt (2011).

C. HALLISEY, R. OBEYESEKERE (SINHALESE); D.B.S. JEYARAJ (TAMIL); R. OBEYESEKERE, R. C. JIRASINGHE (ENG.)

STANCES. A Fr. verse form that is, on the one hand, synonymous with the *strophes of the *ode and, on the other hand, often confused with strophes, from which stances appear to differ by their restriction to lyrical themes and, in conformity with the etymology (Lat. stantia, "pause"; It. stanze, "stopping places"), by a more definite pause at the end of each division. Introduced into France from Italy in the second half of the 16th c., stances continued in use until well into the 19th c. (e.g., Alfred de Musset, F.R.A. Sully-Prudhomme). In early 17th-c. theater, esp. *tragedy, they were used as highly organized lyric *monologues: their thematic density, varied meters, and complex *rhyme schemes contrasted vividly with the *alexandrine couplets of dialogue. In the first half of the 18th c., stances were banished from the theater in the name of verisimilitude: that characters should possess such poetic skill when in the throes of violent emotion was no longer considered logical.

See FRENCH PROSODY.

■ P. Martinon, Les Strophes (1912), App. 2; J. Scherer, La Dramaturgie classique en France (1950), pt. 2, ch. 6; D. Janik, Geschichte der Ode und der "Stances" vom Ronsard bis Boileau (1968); M-F. Hilgar, La Mode des stances dans le théâtre tragique français 1610–1687 (1974); B. de Cornulier, Art poëtique: Notions et problèmes de métrique (1995).

A. E. EUSTIS; C. KLEINHENZ

STANZA. A unit of poetic lines organized by a specific principle or set of principles. The possibilities include *alliteration, *syntax, lineation, *meter, arc of thought, although most familiarly in Eng., the end rhyme fashions a stanza. Stanzas are sequential: they are identified as such by the intervals and by the other units of lines (often isomorphic with the first stanza) before and after them. They are periodic, guiding the reader alternately through a sojourn in their organized lines, then through the suspensions of stanzaic intervals. Traditionally, they are partitioned from each other by techniques of closure, e.g., a tag in another lang., *couplet or strong rhyme, *refrain or *envoi, *proverb or aphorism, *dialogue, lengthened or shortened line, or *tail rhyme. Longer, nonisomorphic groups of lines are sometimes referred to as *strophes.

Stanzas are found in poetic cultures both written and oral. They may emerge from a *song tradition in which words are composed to accompany a preexisting melody—an origin asserted in poetics from George Puttenham to Ezra Pound and manifest in the practice of poets like Thomas Campion and George Herbert. Stanzas arise also within the widespread professional cultures of compositional virtuosity like the *bardic and skaldic guilds of northwest Europe, the *troubadour culture of southern Europe, or late med. clerical and courtly milieux; these are often stanzas of technical intricacy. Stanza forms are also continually developed by major poet-thinkers of form (e.g., in Eng., the Gawain/Pearl-poet, Chaucer, Edmund Spenser, Ben Jonson, the John Keats of the odes, Thomas Hardy, Langston Hughes, A. R. Ammons, and Jorie Graham). In Eng., end rhyme has been the chief means of binding the massed lines of a stanza for more than 600 years, though poetries in other langs., as well as earlier alliterative work in OE and modernist and postmod. practice, manifest other ways of conceiving stanzaic form. Stanzas may hew to a simple pattern, three or four lines with one or two rhyme sounds, e.g., the *blues stanza or the *ballad stanza; a stanza may have identical or varying line lengths within a single stanza (*isometric or *heterometric, respectively); Eng. line lengths themselves may be as brief as one or two syllables, as long as a William Blake or a C.K. Williams can extend them. In spacious stanza forms—e.g., ballade and pseudo-ballade, long-line alliterative stanzas, ottava rima, *rhyme royal, the more ambitious tail-rhyme stanzas, *Spenserian stanza—rhyme patterns and groupings of line create dynamic complexities of internal movement. Such complexity is also evident in terse stanzas like the skaldic eight-line form drottkvaett or the Eng. common meter in the hands of Emily Dickinson. Syntax threads pathwise through the enclosed space of the stanza; the flexible play of syntax in relation to rhyme and line creates variety and movement through sequences of stanzas, while metrical structure maintained and repeated through sequences creates stability.

The relationship between the stanza and its interval offers flexible resources for shaping the stanza's *closure and the reader's temporal experience of periodicity; stanzas often deploy verb forms, tense, mood, and aspect as means to slow, to quicken, to close off, or to open upon the interval. (The Spenserian stanzas of P. B. Shelley and Lord Byron are swift-moving and climactic; the Spenserian stanzas of Keats are weightier and noun-based; those of Spenser himself are characterized by verbs of temporal extensivity, marking actions habitual, sustained, or repeated.)

Most descriptive and taxonomic work on Eur. stanza forms focuses on the stanza as an object or chunk of matter, a box-like unit, a "room" of poetic discourse in which aural elements governed by rules are lodged and fixed. Apropos of Eng. stanzas, this tendency to take the stanza as object or structure is intensified by defining stanzas chiefly in relation to their rhyme scheme. Stanzas have thus been evaluated by the degree to which they demonstrate internal coherence or integrity, in terms of form, syntax, content, and *figuration. Readers who require this sense of stanzaic integrity are often disappointed with stanzaic devels. in the 20th and 21st cs., when aesthetics and philosophy articulate an opposition to the spatialization of time in preference to process and duration; when *organicism inherited from romantic poetics, *free verse, and field poetics challenge set forms; and when Western poets' encounters in the first half of the 20th c. with Chinese poetry and poetics (see CHINESE POETICS) give them access to a syntactic freedom and spareness that releases them from their sense of Eur. stanzaic traditions' enervation. But in light of early med., modernist, and postmod. practice as well as research in *ethnopoetics, no account of stanzas can be limited to the single story of form versus freedom; a global account would include multiple stories of stanzas' changeful work in mediating temporal experience.

Specific stanza forms arise and thrive in specific moments and cultures. They are always being embroiled in debates about form and freedom. But the political and ideological implications of specific stanza forms are never intrinsic, nor their future life predictable. The rigid form of the sestina, which had pretty well disappeared from Eur. poetries after two decades of popularity in the 16th c., was revitalized in 20th-c. Am. poetry; the Persian ghazal with its single rhyme and its couplets has come into Eng. in the late 20th and 21st cs.; traditional Eng. poetry and free verse have shaken up 20th-c. Chinese poetry just as cl. Chinese poetry did Eng. modernism; Alexander Pushkin's *Onegin stanza now does interesting work in verse and novel all over the world; the engagements of Af. Am. and Caribbean writers with Eng. stanza trads. demonstrate the shifting and generative work of stanzaic form.

■ Schipper, History; P. Martinon, Les Strophes: Études historiques et critiques sur les formes de la poésie lyrique on France depuis la Renaissance (1912); I. Frank, Répertoire métrique de la poésie des troubadours, 2 vols. (1953–57); Maas; W. Pfrommer, Grundzüge der Strophenentwicklung in derfranzösischen Lyric von Baudelaire zu Apollinaire, diss., Tübingen (1963); Koster; T. Navarro, Repertorio de estrofas españolas (1968); U. Mölk and F. Wolfzettel, Répertoire métrique de la poésie lyrique française des origines à 1350 (1972); F. Schlawe, Die deutsche Strophenformen: Systematisch-chronologische Register zur deutschen Lyrik 1600–1950 (1972); Wimsatt; S. Ranawake, Höfische Strophenkunst: Vergleichende Untersuchungen zur Formen-typologie von Minnesang und Trouverelied an der Wende zum Spatmittelalter (1976); Tarlinskaja; E. Häublein, The Stanza (1978); H. J. Frank, Handbuch der deutsche Strophenformen (1980); A. Solimena, Repertorio metrico dello Stil novo (1980); T.V.F. Brogan, English Versification, 1570–1980: A Reference Guide with Global Appendix (1981); F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); G. S. Smith, "The Stanza Typology of Russian Poetry 1735–1816: A General Survey," Russian Literature 13, no. 2 (1983); T.V.F. Brogan, Verseform: A Comparative Bibliography (1989); Gasparov, History; P. Seital, The Power of Genre: Interpreting Haya Oral Literature (1999); A. Addison, "Little Boxes: The Effects of the Stanza on Poetic Narrative," Style 37, no. 2 (2003);

D. Hymes, Now I Know Only So Far: Essays in Ethnopoetics (2003); J. Boffey and A.S.G. Edwards, A New Index of Middle English Verse (2005).

T. Krier

STASIMON (Gr., "stationary song"). In Gr. drama, an *ode sung by the *chorus after it has taken its position in the orchestra. Aristotle distinguishes the stasimon from the parodos, the entrance ode of the chorus (in anapestic meter) as it marches into the orchestra, and defines it as "a song of the chorus without anapests or trochees" (Poetics 1452b). The stasima alternate with the episodes, the dialogue passages delivered by the actors; their number in *tragedy varies between three and five. Originally, and during the greater part of the 5th c. BCE, the stasima were intimately connected with the subject matter of the episodes. However, this connection gradually became tenuous until finally Agathon (ca. 447–400 BCE) replaced them by the embolima, intercalary pieces, mere choral interludes that could be introduced into any play (Poetics 1456a).

■ W. Aly, "Stasimon," Pauly-Wissowa; W. Kranz, Stasimon (1933); W.J.W. Koster, "De metris stasimi I and II Electrae Euripidis," Mélanges Emile Boisacq, v. 3 (1938); A. M. Dale, Collected Papers (1969)—esp. ch. 3; Michaelides.

P. S. Costas

STAVE, a back-formation from the pl. staves, of staff. (1) The old term for a group of lines or a stanza of a poem or song, particularly a hymn or drinking song, both of which often use *refrains. The term was perhaps derived from the musical staff and once was restricted to poems intended to be sung. (2) The initial *alliteration (sound) in a line of Old Germanic or OE verse. This sense of the term comes from Ger. Stab (staff)—hence, the Ger. terms Stabreim for alliteration and stabreimender Vers or Stabreimvers for alliterative verse.

See GERMANIC PROSODY, ENGLISH PROSODY, MUSIC AND POETRY.

R. O. Evans

STICHOMYTHIA (Gr., "line-speech"). Refers to a highly formalized kind of *dialogue in Gr. and Lat. drama in which each speech is confined to a single metrical line. Equally formalized are two related phenomena: distichomythia, in which the exchanges are each exactly two lines long, and repartee in *split lines (the split line being called antilabé) in which one of two speakers gets the beginning of a line and the other gets the end (we might call this hemistichomythia). Every one of the 33 extant Gr. tragedies makes use of stichomythia (50, 75, or 100 lines of stichomythia occur), and many use the other two kinds as well. Long passages of stichomythia or distichomythia are not characteristic of Aristophanes or of Menander, who likes to start speeches midline. This naturalism was passed on to the Roman comic poets, who make no use of stichomythia. The fragments of the Roman tragic poets before Seneca show no traces of it. It was revived by Seneca, who uses it in most of his plays, though the long runs of stichomythia characteristic of Gr. tragedy are rare.

Seneca's use of stichomythia and antilabé for repartee influenced William Shakespeare (e.g., Richard III 4.4 and Hamlet 3.4) and Molière. J. W. Goethe uses stichomythia in Iphigenia auf Tauris. An adaptation of stichomythia to another genre is the amoebean verse contest in *pastoral poetry (e.g. Theocritus, Idyll 5, and John Milton, Comus). There is a hilarious parody of tragic stichomythia and distichomythia in A. E. Housman's "Fragment of a Tragedy" (Burnett).

■ A. Gross, Die Stichomythie in der griechischen Tragödie und Komödie (1905); J. L. Hancock, Studies in Stichomythia (1917); J. Myres, The Structure of Stichomythia in Attic Tragedy (1950); W. Jens, Die Stichomythie in der frühen griechischen Tragödie (1955); E.-R. Schwinge, Die Verwendung der Stichomythie in den Dramen des Euripides (1968); B. Seidensticker, Die Gesprächsverdichtung in den Tragödien Senecas (1968), and "Die Stichomythie," Die Bauformen der griechischen Tragödie, ed. W. Jens (1971); S. Ireland, "Stichomythia in Aeschylus," Hermes 102 (1974); D. J. Mastronarde, Contact and Discontinuity (1979), chaps. 3 and 4; The Poems of A. E. Housman, ed. A. Burnett (1997).

W. H. Race; D. Kovacs

STICHOS, Gr., "row," "line"; pl. stichoi. In cl. prosody, the term for a line of verse. A single line (or a poem one line long) is, therefore, called a *monostich, a couplet a *distich, a half line a hemistich, etc. Outside of cl. prosody, the noun form now used is line, though the adjectival stichic is still common. Stichic verse—e.g., *narrative poetry—is that which is written kata stichon, i.e., in a continuous run of *isometric lines, whereas in stanzaic verse—e.g., the *lyric—a small number of lines or cola (usually fewer than ten but often four or multiples of four) are grouped together by structures such as *rhyme into integral units. Stichic arrangement is the norm for recited verse (see RECITATION)—in antiquity, the dactylic hexameter for *epic and the iambic trimeter for drama—whereas song verse (incl. the lyric) is normally stanzaic. It is not exactly true, as Maas points out, that verse forms are either stichic or strophic: there are some intermediary or transitional forms, and some of the same principles of construction apply to both types.

See ALLÆOSTROPHA, STANZA, STROPHE.

■ J. W. White, The Verse of Greek Comedy (1912); Maas; A. M. Dale, "Stichos and Stanza," Collected Papers (1969).

T.V.F. Brogan; R. J. Getty

STOCK (also called sto(c)kreg(h)el, reg(h)el, sluutvers). The refrain that concludes each stanza of the Dutch refrein* and that expresses the theme of the poem. The stock is borrowed from the Fr. ballade* and is generally a single line, although occasionally it is a half line, one-and-a-half-lines, or even two lines. The refrein was popularized in the 15th c. by the Rhetoricians (rederijkers*). The ling. borrowing and neologisms that characterized the poetry and drama of the Rhetoricians are manifest in the stock, as many of the loan words were used to achieve rhymes. McTaggart argues that the stock fulfilled a more structural or musical function than the refrain in the ballade, which often had greater semantic import.

See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE.

■ A. Borguet, "De 'stok' van het Referein," Revue des langues vivantes 12 (1946); A. van Elslander, Het refrein in de Nederlanden tot 1600 (1953); W. Waterschoot, "Marot or Ronsard? New French Poetics among Dutch Rhetoricians in the Second Half of the Sixteenth Century," Rhetoric–Rhétoriqueurs–Rederijkers, ed. J. Koopmans et al. (1995); T. Susato, Musyck boexken: Dutch Songs for Four Voices, ed. T. McTaggart (1997); E. M. Kavaler, "Renaissance Gothic in the Netherlands: The Uses of Ornament," Art Bulletin 82 (2000); B. Parsons and B. Jongenelen, "The Refrein and the Chambers of Rhetoric in the Early Modern Low Countries," European Medieval Drama 12 (2008).

R. F. LISSENS; D. J. ROTHMAN

STORNELLO (sometimes called fiore). A short It. folk verse form whose name (perhaps from Occitan estorn, "struggle") suggests the manner in which it was sung—responsively—as well as the sort of popular *poetic contests that measure the improvisational talents of the competitors. While the earliest examples date from the 15th c., the stornello flourished in Tuscany in the 17th c. and from there spread throughout central and southern Italy. The stornello has three principal forms: (1) a rhymed *couplet of *hendecasyllables, the oldest form and a type now common in Sicily, which may trace its origin to rhymed proverbs; (2) a tercet of hendecasyllables, the first and third rhyming and the second in *assonance or *consonance with them; and (3) a couplet of hendecasyllables prefixed by a five-syllable (quinario) or a seven-syllable verse (aBB, aBA), which often consists of an invocation to a flower or plant (hence, the alternate name, fiore) or an exclamatory or vocative phrase.

See HEPTASYLLABLE, TENSO.

■ V. Santoli, I Canti popolari italiani (1940); Spongano; L. Castelnuovo, La metrica italiana (1979); A. Falassi, Per forza e per amore (1980); F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); Elwert, Italienische, sect. 99; A. M. Cirese, Ragioni metriche (1988); S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994); G. Sica, Scrivere in versi (2003).

J. G. FUCILLA; C. KLEINHENZ

STRAMBOTTO. A monostrophic It. composition generally of eight or six *hendecasyllables (less commonly of four or ten). One of the oldest of It. verse forms, the strambotto has uncertain but popular origins. The term derives from Fr. estrabot (Occitan estribot), but whereas the French used it to apply to satirical compositions, the Italians have restricted it to rhymes that are sentimental and amatory in content. The number of its verses and the characteristic rhyme scheme vary from region to region: the so-called Sicilian strambotto has the pattern abababab, and the Tuscan variety (ottava toscana or rispetto*) has several: abababcc, ababccdd, aabbccdd, ababcc, abababab, and aabbcc. In its Sicilian form, the strambotto may have influenced the devel. of the *sonnet by serving as the model for the *octave. The form has been employed by many poets over the centuries, from the 15th c. (Leonardo Giustiniani, Angelo Poliziano, Lorenzo de' Medici, Francesco Galeota) to the 19th (Giosuè Carducci, Giovanni Pascoli).

See OTTAVA RIMA, SICILIAN OCTAVE.

■ H. R. Lang, "The Spanish estribote, estrambote and Related Poetic Forms," Romania 45 (1918–19); E. Li Gotti, "Precisazioni sullo strambotto," Convivium 5 (1949); G. D'Aronco, Guida bibliografica allo studio dello strambotto (1951); Spongano; Wilkins; L. Castelnuovo, La metrica italiana (1979); F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); Elwert, Italienische, sect. 98; A. M. Cirese, Ragioni metriche (1988); S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994); G. Sica, Scrivere in versi (2003).

J. G. FUCILLA; C. KLEINHENZ

STROPHE. From the Gr. for turn or bend, a defined unit of movement with song performed in ancient Gr. drama by the *chorus as it turned now one way (strophe), then another (*antistrophe), then stood (*epode). Strophe and antistrophe were of identical metrical and musical structure, with the epode of a different structure. In cl. antiquity and later poetry modeled on it, the term came to refer to a structural unit of a poem, like a *stanza, with varying line-length, notably in *odes with their expansive strophes (e.g., Pindar, Horace, Ben Jonson, Thomas Gray, John Keats). But a strophe could be brief, as with the two-line dactylic *distich or the four-line *sapphic strophe; other cl. forms included the elegiac strophe, the *alcaic strophe, and the *asclepiadean strophe. In all of these, a crucial feature is the repetition, at least once, of the first strophe's metrical pattern. In analysis of song and poetry derived from song, a strophe is one of a metrically and melodically identical set of stanzas; thus, popular song, *troubadour song, Ger. lieder, blues stanzas, verse-and-refrain forms like the muwashshaḥ and the zéjel proceed by adding new strophes to the melody of the first strophe. In contemp. usage about Eng.-lang. poetries, strophe is sometimes used for long, nonisomorphic units, stanza for more regular ones. Biblical scholars speak of several strophes gathered together into a single stanza, but the unit definitions are not airtight. Discourses about Gr. and Lat. drama and poetics, about Ar. and Andalusian med. song and performance practice, about Semitic poetries, about music forms, and ethnopoetic studies in sub-Saharan Af. poetries often use strophe for its flexibility in discussing poetic performance with music, gesture, dance, and breath. In either case, stanza carries a long-standing implication of fixed "rooms" or boxes of verse; "strophe" implies movement of speakers/singers, currents, alternation of speakers, shared or exchanged parts.

See ARABIC POETRY, DACTYL, ELEGIAC DISTICH, STICHOS.

■ F. M. Warren, "The Troubadour canso and Latin Lyric Poetry," MP 9 (1912); D. C. Clarke, "Miscellaneous Strophe Forms in the Fifteenth-Century Court Lyric," Hispanic Review 16, no. 2 (1948); G. Rouget, "African Traditional Non-Prose Forms: Reciting, Declaiming, Singing, and Strophic Structure," Proceedings of a Conference on African Languages and Literatures, ed. J. Berry, R. P. Armstrong, and J. Povey (1966); R. H. Finnegan, Oral Literature in Africa (1970); S. M. Stern, Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry: Studies, ed. L. P. Harvey (1974); Halporn et al; A Handbook of the Troubadours, ed. F.R.P. Akehurst and J. M. Davis (1995); J. P. Fokkelman, Reading Biblical Poetry: An Introductory Guide, trans. Ineke Smit (2001); H. Heijkoop and O. Zwartjes, Muwassah, Zajal, Kharja: Bibliography of Strophic Poetry and Music from al-Andalus and Their Influence in East and West (2004).

T. Krier

STRUCTURALISM

I. Prague School
II. Moscow-Tartu School
III. French and American Schools

I. Prague School. The Prague school (P. S.) is an established label for the international group of scholars in ling., lit., theater, folklore, and general aesthetics that was organized as the Prague Linguistic Circle from 1926 to 1948. Initially, the P. S. was partly indebted to *Russian formalism, esp. the Moscow Linguistic Circle (see below), whose institutional name it echoed, sharing both some of its members (Pyotr Bogatyrev, Roman Jakobson) and also the concept of lit. as the art of lang. At the same time, the P. S. borrowed from the Czech trad. of 19th-c. Herbartian formalism (Josef Durdík, Otakar Hostinský), which conceived of the artistic work as a set of formal relations, and also certain post-Herbartian devels. in poetics and theater (Otakar Zich). Among other schools of thought, the P. S. was influenced by Saussurean ling., Edmund Husserl's phenomenology, and Gestalt psychology. Such intellectual affinities were welcomed by the members of the P. S., since they perceived their enterprise as the crystallization of a new scholarly paradigm for the humanities and social sciences, which, in 1929, they christened structuralism—the term was coined by Jakobson.

The hist. of the P. S. can be divided into three periods. The first begins with the establishment of the Circle in 1926 and continues until 1934. During this period, the research of the Prague structuralists focused on the internal organization of poetic works, esp. their sound stratum. Jakobson's and Jan Mukařovský's hists. of old and mod. Czech metrics are the most representative works of this phase. The subsequent period, 1934–38, opens with Mukařovský's study of a little-known Czech poet of the early 19th c., Milota Zdirad Polák, and ends with the Circle's collective volume devoted to the leading Czech romantic, Karel Hynek Mácha. In this period, the P. S. began to study verbal art in relation to other social phenomena. The earlier preoccupation with poetic sound was supplemented with a concern for how literary works signify extralinguistic reality. The last period, dating roughly from 1938 to 1948, is delimited by external interventions. The Ger. invasion forced some members of the P. S. (Bogatyrev, Jakobson, René Wellek) to leave Czechoslovakia; the communist takeover ten years later effectively banned the structuralist study of art and eventually led to the disbanding of the Circle. During this final period, the research of the P. S. shifted to the study of the human dimension of the artistic process, both author and perceivers. Felix Vodička's systematic attempt at elaborating the hist. of literary reception belongs among the most promising devels. of this period.

In the postwar years, the intellectual heritage of the P. S. was disseminated throughout the world by those members who left Prague. The structuralist revolution of the 1960s in France and the United States (see below) was largely stimulated by Jakobson, who in the 1940s helped establish the Linguistic Circle of New York, of which the Fr. anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss was a member. Bogatyrev, who returned to his native land after the outbreak of the war, performed a similar role in the Soviet Union. A group of young literary scholars (Miroslav Červenka, Lubomír Doležel, Mojmír Grygar, Milan Jankovič) attempted to resurrect the P. S. in Czechoslovakia in the 1960s, but the Soviet invasion of 1968 dealt a final blow to structuralism in that country.

For the P. S., structuralism was a dialectical synthesis of the two global paradigms dominating Eur. thought in the 19th c.: *romanticism and positivism. The former sacrificed empirical data to universal philosophical schemes; the latter tipped the scales in the opposite direction. Structuralism, the Prague scholars argued, would avoid the onesidedness of its predecessors by being neither a philosophical system nor a concrete science but an epistemological stance negotiating between the general and the specific. What characterizes the Prague version of structuralism in particular is a conceptual frame of reference formed by the interplay of three complementary notions: structure, function, and sign.

The concept of structure requires special attention. For the P. S., it referred to two distinct entities. On the one hand, it denoted the holistic organization of a single work as a hierarchical system of dominant and subordinate elements. But just as Ferdinand de Saussure recognized that every concrete utterance (parole) is meaningful only against the background of the collectively shared ling. code (langue), the Prague scholars saw every individual artwork as an implementation of a particular aesthetic code—the set of artistic norms. These they also termed a structure. Unlike Saussure, however, the P. S. did not believe that any code exists in and of itself. Rather, these sets of norms together comprise a higher structure—the cultural system valid for a given society at a particular stage in its historical devel.

The second key concept, function, was the trademark of P. S. It served the circle's members as a criterion for differentiating among discrete cultural codes. Functionally speaking, such codes are nothing but hierarchies of norms regulating the attainment of socially sanctioned values. The dominance of the symbolic function, e.g., distinguishes the symbolic code from the aesthetic and theoretical codes. Particular artifacts embody these immaterial structures, and their material organization implements the hierarchy of functions they serve. However, artifacts not only carry out their functions, but signify them: hence, the importance of the third element of the P. S. frame of reference, the sign. As a conjunction of the material vehicle and immaterial meaning, the sign reiterates the dual nature of the concept of structure—its mental, socially shared existence and its physical embodiment in individual artifacts. From the semiotic point of view, culture appears as a complex interaction of signs mediating among the members of a given collectivity (see SEMIOTICS AND POETRY).

In the field of poetics, the P. S. pioneered the ling. approach to verbal art. Its members conceived of lit. as a particular mode of using lang.: a functional dialect. In contrast to other such dialects (e.g., the emotive, the practical), which focus on the extralinguistic components of the speech act (the speaker, the referent), poetic lang. foregrounds the very medium of discourse, the ling. sign itself. This "set toward the message" has important consequences for the structure of poetic signs and the way they signify. The sound stratum of poetic lang. is organized according to the code peculiar to this dialect. Consequently, the P. S. investigated problems of sound orchestration, intonation, and *prosody in poetic compositions. The distinctive feature of these inquiries was their phonological basis. For the Prague structuralists, only those phonic elements of lang. capable of differentiating cognitive meanings could be exploited poetically. The P. S. regarded the sound configurations permeating the poetic work not as mere formal constructs but as partial semantic structures comprising the overall meaning of the text. The unusual arrangement of poetic sounds in the literary sign disrupts the conventional link between the signifier and the signified, and the meaning of the work becomes a function of its internal organization rather than of the reality outside it. Hence, the poetic designation refers only obliquely, and its truth value cannot be tested. By problematizing the process of verbal representation, poetic lang., according to the P. S., performs a signal role in the ling. system. Whereas other functional dialects stress the adequacy of signs to what they stand for, poetic lang. underscores the reciprocal inadequacy of the two, their deep-seated nonidentity. In this way the *poetic function promulgates ling. self-awareness, enabling us to renew our semiotic grasp of reality and revealing lang. as the most versatile tool of human cognition and communication.

II. Moscow-Tartu School. (M.-T. S.). This term designates a broad research effort in semiotics and such related disciplines as structural poetics, verse theory, cultural theory, folklore, and mythology that began in 1960 and was since carried on by a number of Soviet scholars, principally at the Academy of Sciences in Moscow (Viacheslav Ivanov, Vladimir Toporov, Mikhail Gasparov, Eliazar Meletinskij) and at Tartu University in Estonia (Jurij Lotman, Zara Minc, Igor Chernov). The M.-T. S. originated in the relatively liberal atmosphere of the Khrushchev period and represented both a rejection of official Marxist-Leninist scholarship and a return to the strong Rus. philological trad. of the early 20th c. Initially, it drew on the critical heritage of Rus. formalism and P. S. structuralism, esp. the work of Yuri Tynianov and Jakobson. This theoretical legacy was enriched by perspectives offered by general ling., semiotics, information theory, and cybernetics; by comparative IE and Asian studies; by the study of versification, reconstituted in the late 1950s after lying in abeyance for decades; and by the intellectual heritage of a number of major Rus. thinkers, some of them reclaimed from obscurity by the efforts of the M.-T. S.: e.g., Mikhail Bakhtin, Ol'ga Frejdenberg, Pavel Florenskij, Gustav Shpet, Vladimir Propp, and Bogatyrev. As important as the many publications of the M.-T. S., esp. the celebrated Tartu series Trudy po znakovym sistemam (Works on Semiotics, 1967–92), were its summer schools (which ended in the mid-1970s), noted for their effervescent and interdisciplinary atmosphere.

During the 1970s and early 1980s, several key figures of the M.-T. S. emigrated to the West (Aleksandr Pjatigorskij, Boris Ogibenin, Boris Gasparov, Dmitrij Segal), yet the movement remained the focus of intensive scholarly and cultural activity by younger scholars.

In its early phase (until the mid-1970s), the methodology of the M.-T. S. was based primarily on the model provided by structural ling. (esp. Saussure, Nicolai Trubetzkoy, and Jakobson), the central concepts of which—e.g., langue/parole (code/message), synchrony/diachrony, and marked/unmarked—were broadly applied. Lit., folklore, myth, film, and other fields of human cultural activity where signs play a central role were described as secondary modeling systems or languages: these were regarded as built upon the basis of natural lang., hence analyzable in similar terms. Thus, for each system, one could establish both a lexicon (a set of signs and their associated meanings) and a grammar (combinatorial rules). A number of studies from this period offer descriptions of simple semiotic systems such as the system of road signs, the rules for cartomancy, or the paremiological genres in folklore (G. Permjakov, Ot pogovorki do skazki [1970], and other works): behind these efforts lay a broad assumption that describing more complex objects, such as the novel or lit. as a whole, would be a more difficult yet fundamentally similar task. The initial optimism faded in the 1970s, however, when the methodology of much of the M.-T. S. work shifted away from the ling. model. While their terminology remained the same, many of the scholars focused on the text rather than the code, turning from simple systems describable by means of formalized metalangs. toward complex semiotic objects, each of which involved far more than an implementation of a particular set of rules. Culture, regarded as a complex mechanism of interrelated, often conflicting codes, became the principal focus of the M.-T. S., while the role of neurolinguistic and sociological factors in its creation, preservation, and transformation received special attention.

Poetry and poetics were areas of major interest for the M.-T. S., because of the influence of the Rus. trad. of the ling. study of the poetic text (Lev Shcherba, Jakobson), the role of verse theory in formalist and early structuralist endeavors, and the special situation of post-Stalinist Russia, where entire layers of early 20th-c. culture, esp. lit., had to be brought out of the oblivion to which they had been officially consigned.

In poetics, two main research trends have characterized the activities of the M.-T. S. The first, structuralist in the traditional sense, has involved the study of the discrete text, regarded as a hierarchy of levels (phonic, rhythmical, grammatical) that may be studied separately or as a totality. This approach, discussed extensively in Lotman's early monographs (1976, 1977) and at the core of his structuralist poetics, owes much to Jakobson, esp. his classic article "Linguistics and Poetics" (1960) and his many studies of the "grammar of poetry," as well as to Tynianov's classic work on poetic semantics. Lotman emphasizes the notion that the poetic function establishes hierarchically organized networks of *equivalence (parallelisms) throughout the poetic work, and he traces the effect of such relationships (absent in ordinary discourse) on both the paradigmatic and the syntagmatic planes, seeking to identify the underlying semantic opposition(s) from which the work as a whole may be seen as deriving. In addition to studying the semantic effects resulting from lang. operating within the horizontal (intralinear) and vertical (interlinear, interstrophic) dimensions of the poem, Lotman and his colleagues focused on the structural role of extratextual factors, esp. on the aesthetic results of the poem's relationship to various contexts (a poetic cycle, a collection, an author's oeuvre, the work of a poetic school); here they relied on a semiotic conception of the text that emphasizes the flexibility of its boundaries and its mutually reinforcing relationship with different cultural codes.

The other trend in M.-T. S. poetics involved research on three broad classes of phenomena:

A. Verse Rhythm, studied by means of the linguostatistical model developed by Boris Tomashevsky, expanded by Kiril Taranovsky in the 1950s, and reformulated by the mathematician Andrej Kolmogorov and his students. Major work, in some cases applying newer ling. methodologies to problems of versification (e.g., generative theory), has also been carried out by such scholars as P. A. Rudnev, V. S. Baevskij, and Mikhail Lotman (son of Jurij). Subsequently, major interest turned to the hist. of Rus. verse, incl. mapping the metrical repertoires of individual poets and poetic movements. Gasparov and others were also increasingly drawn to the relationship between metrical forms and semantics, i.e., toward the hist. of associations between certain meters and specific themes.

B. Poetic Lexicon, the study of which attracted a number of scholars in the early period of the M.-T. S. Establishing the specific vocabulary used by a poet in a single work, a collection, a period, or an oeuvre has been seen as a way of objectively analyzing the shifts lang. undergoes in the process of poetic creation and of pinpointing the difficult, often highly displaced meanings of images and motifs in the work of mod. poets.

C. Intertextual Relations, which came into the purview of the Soviet structuralists in the early 1970s in connection with their research into *acmeism. Much research also has been devoted to intertextual elements of works by symbolist authors, esp. Alexander Blok, Andrei Bely, and Fyodor Sologub (see SYMBOLISM), and by other major Silver Age figures (Mikhail Kuzmin, Aleksej Remizov). Minc is the author of the conception of the polygenetic nature of symbolist (modernist) subtexts: in many cases, a cited element may derive from several different sources, which themselves may enter into complex, potentially conflicting relationships with each other (see her "Funkcija reminiscencij v poetike A. Bloka," Trudy po znakovym systemam 6 [1973]). The shift toward the text as a principal focus of M.-T. S. research brought an increased emphasis on *intertextuality, with the concept being extended to other areas of semiotic activity such as film.

III. French and American Schools. Inspired by devels. in structural ling. and structural anthropology, structuralism as a method of analysis and a theory of lit. reached its height in France in the 1960s, in the work of Roland Barthes, Gérard Genette, A. J. Greimas, Jakobson, and Tzvetan Todorov, whence it was transported to Am. crit. Structuralism is difficult to delimit because structuralist work swiftly became assimilated to so-called *poststructuralism, a movement often defined in opposition to structuralism but that, in fact, carried on many of its projects.

Structuralism can be opposed to all atomistic theories that attempt to explain phenomena individually. Saussure, the founder of mod. ling., distinguishes concrete speech acts (parole) from the underlying system of the lang. (langue), a formal entity whose elements have no positive or inherent qualities but are defined solely in relational terms. Synchronic study, treating lang. as a formal system of interrelated elements functioning at a particular time, takes precedence over diachronic study tracing the hist. of individual elements. Lévi-Strauss, the central figure of structuralism, adopted this perspective in anthropology and rejected attempts to explain social and cultural phenomena in piecemeal fashion, treating them instead as manifestations of underlying formal systems. For Lévi-Strauss, the codes by which myths operate are sets of binary oppositions drawn from different areas of experience that can be used to express a variety of contrasts; they thus bear striking resemblance to those operative in poetic discourse. Structuralist analysis of this logic of the concrete is related to semiology, the study of sign systems. The two fundamental insights on which structuralism is based are (1) that social and cultural phenomena do not have essences but are defined both by their internal structures and by their place in the structures of the relevant social and cultural systems and (2) that social and cultural phenomena are signs: not physical events only, but events with meaning. The most successful structural analyses isolate those structures that permit phenomena to function as signs.

Structuralism in lit. crit. began as a revolt against the lit. hist. and biographical crit. that dominated the Fr. university orthodoxy. Structuralism sought to return to the text, but, unlike Anglo-Am. New Criticism, it assumed that one could not study a text without preconceptions and that, in order to discover structures, one required an objective methodological model. The goal of structuralism was not the interpretation of texts but the elaboration, through particular texts, of an account of the modes of literary discourse and their operation. Barthes distinguished criticism, which places the text in a particular context and assigns it meaning, from a science of lit. or poetics, which studies the conditions of meaning, the formal structures that organize a text and make possible a range of meanings. Trans. of the Rus. formalists in the late 1960s gave structuralists analogues to their own work and stimulated the study of lit. as an autonomous institution. Two versions of structuralism can be distinguished by their different uses of ling.: as a technique applied directly to the description of the lang. of texts or as the model for a poetics that would stand to lit. as ling. stands to lang.

The first strain involves study of the patterns formed by the distribution in the text of elements defined by phonological and syntactic theory. Jakobson's characterization of the poetic function of lang. as "the projection of the principle of equivalence from the axis of selection into the axis of combination" led to study of the ways in which items that are paradigmatically equivalent (related by membership of a grammatical, lexical, or phonological class) are distributed in ling. sequences (on the axis of combination). Jakobson's analyses of poems focus on symmetrical and asymmetrical patterns of distribution that unify the text and throw certain elements into relief. It has been claimed that many patterns he discovers are irrelevant to the reader's experience and thus to the meaning of the poem, but the issue is a difficult one, since appeal to the reader's experience is scarcely decisive—patterns may work subliminally—and formal patterns need not contribute to meaning to have a unifying effect.

Structuralist poetics is founded on the presumption that, while lit. uses lang., it is also itself like a lang.; its meanings are made possible by systems of convention that serve readers as models for interpretation. The work of Genette, Riffaterre, and esp. Barthes has contributed to a metalang. that serves both as a theory of lit. and as the outline of an analytical method.

Within the literary system, ling. signs become second-order signifiers whose signifieds are their special meaning in the literary discourse. The conventions that give sentences additional meanings and functions are those of what Barthes calls an écriture*: a particular mode of writing involving an implicit contract between author and reader. The system or institution of lit. is made up of a series of écritures that constitute its historical or generic moments. In reading a sentence in a lyric differently from a sentence in a newspaper report, one is implicitly recognizing and employing the conventions of a particular lyric écriture.

According to structuralism, cultures tend to naturalize their signs, to motivate the connection between signifier and signified so that meanings seem natural and not the result of convention; lit. may, therefore, be described according to the ways in which it resists or complies with this process. *Interpretation is itself a mode of naturalization or recuperation, the attempt to bring the text within a logical discursive order by making it the expression of a meaning. We read texts in accordance with a series of codes that provide, on the one hand, models of human behavior (coherence and incoherence of personality, plausible and implausible relations between action and motive, logical and illogical chains of events) and, on the other hand, models of literary intelligibility (coherence and incoherence, plausible and implausible symbolic extrapolations, significance and insignificance) that enable us to make sense of texts by organizing their elements into coherent series. These codes are models of the vraisemblable, in the broad sense in which structuralists use the term—models of the natural and intelligible; and a work that lends itself to this process of recuperation is lisible (readable), whereas one that is unintelligible in terms of our traditional models is scriptible (writable): it can be written but not read, except in a kind of vicarious writing. A structuralist analysis of a work aims at examining the ways in which it responds to the reader's attempts to make it unified and coherent. The critic attends to a play of signifiers that defer meaning by offering materials that exceed meanings that can be assigned them—e.g., meter, rhyme, and sound patterns in poetry, all instances of the surplus of the signifier. The play of the signifier is the productivity of the text because it forces the reader to become the active producer of meaning and the participant in the exploration of possible modes of order.

This series of concepts leads to a stress on the text as ling. surface. The play of lang. is valued insofar as it leads to a questioning of the relationship between lang. and experience; hence, critics attend to effects of intertextuality: the interaction within a text of various modes of discourse or of langs. drawn from other literary texts and from other discourse about the world. Whereas the Rus. formalists saw the text as a way of "making strange" ordinary objects or activities (see DEFAMILIARIZATION), structuralists emphasize the "making strange" of discourses that order the world and that the work puts on display.

Structuralist work on poetry may be grouped under several headings. (1) The reconstruction of poetic codes or systems: Genette has described *baroque imagery as a system of interrelated items defined less by individual connotation than by oppositions and has analyzed images of day and night as a poetic code; Zumthor has reconstructed the codes of med. poetry, from the generic types of discourse to systems of topoi (see TOPOS), rhythmical formulas, descriptive schemata, and conventionalized knowledge. (2) The correlation of particular structures with the interpretive operations they require: Riffaterre has analyzed a variety of poetic devices, from the revitalized *cliché to the extended metaphor of surrealist poetry, and describes lyrics as periphrastic transformations of clichés or prior literary formulas; Levin's theory of "couplings" shows how phonological or grammatical equivalence affects semantic interpretation. Greimas and his followers have attempted to show how a level of coherence or isotopie is attained in the interpretation of poetic sequences. (3) The rehabilitation of rhet.: Genette, Group μ, and others have redefined rhetorical figures in ling. terms and opened the way to a theory that would treat the figures as instructions for symbolic reading, as sets of conventional operations that readers may perform on poetic texts. (4) The reinvention of poetic artifice: Julia Kristeva and poets of the Tel Quel school (Marcelin Pleynet, Denis Roche) have undertaken readings of poets designed to show how they undermine by their formal invention the traditional operations of the sign and have emphasized the need for contemp. poets to question and write against the codes and implicit contracts of poetry.

See CULTURAL CRITICISM; INFLUENCE; LINGUISTICS AND POETICS; SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER; STRUCTURE; TEXTUALITY.

■ Prague School: Jakobson, esp. v. 3, 5, 6; A Prague School Reader on Esthetics, Literary Structure, and Style, ed. P. L. Garvin (1964); J. Vachek, The Linguistic School of Prague (1966); R. Wellek, The Literary Theory and Aesthetics of the Prague School (1969); Semiotics of Art: The Prague School Contribution, ed. I. R. Titunik and L. Matejka (1976); S. Rudy, "Jakobson's Inquiry into Verse and the Emergence of Structural Poetics," Sound, Sign, and Meaning, ed. L. Matejka (1976); J. Mukařovský, Structure, Sign, and Function (1977); and The Word and Verbal Art (1978), both ed. and trans. J. Burbank and P. Steiner; The Prague School: Selected Writings, 1929–1948, ed. P. Steiner (1982); F. W. Galan, Historic Structures: The Prague School Project, 1928–1946 (1985); J. G. Merquior, From Paris to Prague: A Critique of Structuralist and Post-Structuralist Thought (1986); J. Striedter, Literary Structure, Evolution, and Value (1989); J. Toman, The Magic of a Common Language: Jakobson, Mathesius, Trubetzkoy, and the Prague Linguistic Circle (1995); Jan Mukařovský and the Prague School, ed. V. Macura and H. Schmid (1999); L. Doležel, "Structuralism of the Prague School," CHLC, v. 8, ed. R. Selden (2005); Structuralism(s) Today, ed. V. Ambros, R. Le Huenen, A. Perez-Simon (2009); Roman Jakobson: Themes in His Science of Language, ed. K. I. Yamanaka and E. Asazuma (2010).

■ Moscow-Tartu School: Anthologies: Texte des sowjetischen literaturwissenschaftlichen Strukturalismus, ed. K. Eimermacher (1971); Semiotics and Structuralism: Readings from the Soviet Union, ed. H. Baran (1976); Soviet Semiotics, ed. and trans. D. P. Lucid (1977); Readings in Soviet Semiotics, ed. L. Matejka et al. (1977); Russian Poetics in Translation, ed. L. M. O'Toole and A. Shukman, 10 v. (1975–83). Bibliography: K. Eimermacher and S. Shishkoff, Subject Bibliography of Soviet Semiotics: The Moscow-Tartu School (1977). Criticism and History: E. M. Meletinskii and D. M. Segal, "Structuralism and Semiotics in the USSR," Diogenes 73 (1971); D. M. Segal, Aspects of Structuralism in Soviet Philology (1974); V. V. Ivanov, Ocherki po istorii semiotiki v SSSR (1976); J. M. Lotman, Analysis of the Poetic Text, ed. and trans. D. B. Johnson (1976); and Structure of the Artistic Text, trans. G. Lenhoff and R. Vroon (1977); A. Shukman, Literature and Semiotics: A Study of the Writings of Ju. M. Lotman (1977); Y. Tyianov, The Problem of Verse Language, trans. M. Sosa and B. Harvey (1981); H. Baran, "Structuralism and Semiotics," Terras; E. Bojtár, Slavic Structuralism, trans. H. Thomas (1985); S. Rudy, "Semiotics in the USSR," The Semiotic Sphere, ed. T. Sebeok and J. Umiker-Sebeok (1986); H. Baran, "Ob itogax i problemax semioticheskix issledovanij," Trudy po znakovym sistemam 20 (1987); B. A. Uspenskij, "K probleme genezisa tartusko-moskovskoj semioticheskoj shkoly," Trudy po znakovym systemam 20 (1987); P. A. Rudnev, Vvedenie v nauku u russkom stixe. Vyp. 1 (1989); B. M. Gasparov, "Tartuskaja shkola 1960-x godov kak semioticheskij fenomen," Wiener Slawistischer Almanach 29 (1989); Moskovsko-tartuskaja semiotiċeskaja škola, ed. S. Nekliudova (1998); Conceptual Dictionary of the Tartu-Moscow Semiotic School, ed. J. Levchenko (1999); Lotman and Cultural Studies: Encounters and Extensions, ed. A. Schoenle (2006).

■ French and American Schools: General: J. Harari, Structuralists and Structuralisms (1971); Culler; J. M. Miller, French Structuralism: A Multidisciplinary Bibliography (1981); S. Freedman and C. Taylor, Roland Barthes (1983). Criticism and History: R. Barthes, Le Degré zéro de l'écriture (1953); M. Titzmann, "Struktur, Strukturalismus," and G. Martens, "Text," Reallexikon II 4.256–78, 403–17; Jakobson, esp. v. 3, 5; C. Lévi-Strauss, La Pensée sauvage (1962); S. Levin, Linguistic Structures in Poetry (1962); R. Barthes, Essais critiques (1964); C. Lévi-Strauss, Le Cru et le cuit (1964); M. Pleynet, Comme (1965); R. Barthes, Critique et vérité (1966); and "Introduction á l'analyse structurale des récits," Communications 8 (1966); G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan, 3 v. (1981); A. J. Greimas, Sémantique structurale (1966); M. Foucault, Les Mots et les choses (1966); "Structuralism," YFS 36–37 (1966)—special iss.; J. Derrida, L'Écriture et la différence (1967); "Structuralism: Idéologie et méthode," Esprit 35.360 (1967)—special iss.; P. Caws, "Structuralism," DHI; U. Eco, La struttura assente (1968); Qu'est-ce que le structuralisme? ed. F. Wahl (1968); D. Roche, Eros énérgumène (1968); P. Sollers, Logiques (1968); J. Kristeva, Semeiotikè (1969); S. Booth, An Essay on Shakespeare's Sonnets (1969); G. Deleuze, Proust et les signes (1970); A. J. Greimas, Du Sens (1970); T. Todorov, La Littérature fantastique (1970); J. Geninasca, Analyse structurale des Chimères de Nerval (1971); Essais de sémiotique poétique, ed. A. J. Greimas (1971); M. Riffaterre, Essais de stylistique structurale (1971); J. Derrida, La Dissémination (1972); F. Jameson, The Prison-House of Language (1972); N. Ruwet, Langage, musique, poésie (1972); The Structuralist Controversy, ed. R. Macksey and E. Donato (1972); P. Zumthor, Essai de poétique médiévale (1972); R. Jakobson, Questions de poétique (1973); J. Broekman, Structuralism: Moscow, Prague, Paris (1974); R. Scholes, Structuralism in Literature (1974); E. Stankiewicz, "Structural Poetics and Linguistics," Current Trends in Linguistics, XII, ed. T. A. Sebeok (1974); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1975); Culler; A. J. Greimas, Maupassant (1976); Sound, Sign and Meaning, ed. L. Matejka (1976); Group μ, Rhétorique de la poésie (1977); T. Hawkes, Structuralism and Semiotics (1977); V. Forrest-Thomson, Poetic Artifice (1978); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (1978); and La Production du texte (1979); Group μ; J. Culler, Roland Barthes (1983); A. J. Greimas, Du Sens II (1983); D. Rice and P. Schofer, Rhetorical Poetics (1983); F. de Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale, ed. R. Engler [1967–68], trans. R. Harris (1983); K. Silverman, The Subject of Semiotics (1983); J. Fekete, The Structural Allegory (1984); J. Culler, Ferdinand de Saussure, 2d ed. (1986); J. G. Merquior, From Prague to Paris (1986); R. Harland, Superstructuralism (1987); R. Jakobson, Language in Literature, ed. K. Pomorska and S. Rudy (1987); P. Caws, Structuralism: The Art of the Intelligible (1988); V. B. Leitch, American Literary Criticism from the Thirties to the Eighties (1988), ch. 9; T. G. Pavel, The Feud of Language (1989); D. Holdcroft, Saussure (1991); F. Dosse, History of Structuralism (1991).

P. Steiner (P.S.); H. Baran, C. Klamann (M.-T. S.); J. Culler (Fr. and Am.)

STRUCTURE (Ger. Aufbau). Structure is an important interpretive and methodological concept for critics who are more interested in the internal dynamics of a literary work (the interrelationships that comprise a literary system) than in its relation to hist., its thematic content, or its genetic origins. Emphasis on structure allows the literary work to be conceived as an autonomous object (see autonomy) and to be characterized in terms of its structural or internal relations. One early example of a focus on structure is Aristotle's claim in the Poetics to analyze "poetry in itself and of its various kinds." This approach has certain affinities with important 20th-c. understandings of structure (though Aristotle ultimately relegates the formal character of poetic structure to the periphery in favor of such psychological issues as catharsis*).

Some of the most crucial aspects of the concept of structure may be seen in the difference between two dominant theoretical models: the generic and the organic. *Genre crit. stresses the relationship between the whole (the overall generic code that articulates the structural rules, formal characteristics, or subcategories of the class) and the part (the discrete poem that deviates merely in details). This formulation of the relationship of part to whole is unlike that of organic theories of poetry that assume that each discrete poem, each poetic structure, is unique. In the organic model, the structure of the poem has priority over generic rules, and its identification (the structure of its logical argument or its figurative patterns) is the object of study.

The distinction between the internal structure of the poem and its extraliterary or contextual references is set forth clearly in Am. *New Criticism and esp. Cleanth Brooks's influential study The Well Wrought Urn (1947), subtitled Studies in the Structure of Poetry. Brooks is not concerned with a conventional analysis of content; rather, he endeavors to work out a systematic theory of *poetics. In Brooks's conception, what is essential is the inner, paradoxical structure of the poem, with its tensions and contradictions. As he writes, the structural "principle is not one which involves the arrangement of the various elements into homogeneous groupings, pairing like with like. It unites the like with the unlike." These inner tensions and paradoxes uniting "like with unlike" define poetic structure. Far from seeking to establish some homogeneous grouping (common themes, period styles, recurring images), Brooks seeks to isolate the "pattern of resolved stresses" that comprises the completed structure of the poem. John Crowe Ransom, too, in "Criticism as Pure Speculation" (1941) directs the critic's attention away from extralinguistic references toward the inner form and verbal autonomy of the poetic structure itself. Ransom differs from Brooks in that the logical structure of the poem is bound up with its local *texture, which he articulates in an architectural conceit: poetic structure corresponds to the walls, beams, and supports of a house; texture to the paint, wallpaper, and surface decoration. For Ransom, poetic structure is bound up with texture's sensuous immediacy and vital concreteness. Ransom's distinction was taken up by M. C. Beardsley (Aesthetics, 1958), who extended it to the plastic arts, music, and narrative.

The separation of the formal poetic structure from the object of reference formed an important assumption in Eur. structuralist crit. from the 1950s to the 1980s. In contrast to the usage of the term in New Criticism, Eur. thinking about structure discards an organic model for a ling. paradigm. What is important in *structuralism is the primacy of the signifier itself (the sounds or letters that are meaningful in a given lang. system (see sign, signified, signifier). This displacement brackets the object of reference. As a result, the fundamental locus becomes the complex differential relationships of the signifiers within the boundaries of a ling. system, not the relation of the signifier to the external world. Drawing on work of the Swiss linguist Ferdinand de Saussure with his crucial distinction between langue (the ling. possibilities that make up a total lang. system) and parole (the local and contingent speech acts that are performed by individuals), a critic attempts to restore to the object of study the hidden and unarticulated rules of its synchronic functioning (or dysfunctioning). As Roland Barthes notes in "The Structuralist Activity," "[S]tructure is therefore actually a simulacrum of the object, but a directed, interested simulacrum, since the imitated object makes something appear which remained invisible or, if one prefers, unintelligible in the natural object."

Such a construct of a synchronic system allows Roman Jakobson and Claude Lévi-Strauss to delineate a basic poetic structure in Charles Baudelaire's "Les Chats" ("Cats") In particular, the emphasis on synchronic structure makes visible the tensions between two sets of symmetrical/asymmetrical relations. This decoding device foregrounds "a division of the poem into two sestets separated by a distich whose structure contrast[s] vigorously with the rest." In the first, real cats occupy an important place; in the second, an unexpected reversal opens an imaginary space beyond the factual and physical world where surreal cats stand out. Structural analysis highlights how these intentional ambiguities combine to produce a new utterance: the sensual and external world of the first *sestet is maintained at the same time that it is transferred to the intellectual and internal world of the second. There is no doubt that Jakobson and Lévi-Strauss's reading of "Les Chats" is a paradigmatic example of analysis based on structure. Yet it should be noted that other critics have contested their decipherment of the formal features in question. Riffaterre, e.g., suggests that the structure of the sonnet is "a sequence of synonymous images, all of them variations on the symbolism of the cat as representative of the contemplative life."

The same application of a ling. or synchronic model to poetry is to be found in the poetics of Tzvetan Todorov, where the task of the critic is the discovery and description of an overall "structure of significations whose relations can be apprehended." For Todorov, like Jakobson and Lévi-Strauss, the speech act is reconstituted as a signifying system or set of ling. relations so that the content of a poem becomes lang. itself. E.g., in his analysis of the Odyssey, the emphasis is on events of lang. (speeches, the songs of the Sirens, and prophecies) rather than Odysseus's adventures.

In the late 1970s and 1980s, structure was reconceived with an emphasis on its formal gaps or breaks. Gérard Genette's Figures in Literary Discourse emphasizes the spaces and gaps inscribed within the poetic text, distinguishing his microscopic analyses of poetic structure from Todorov's more general theoretical propositions about poetic lang. According to Genette, "[P]oetry finds its place and its function where language falls short, in precisely those shortcomings that constitute it." For Genette, poetic structure is the particular space that disconnects two or more forms. Yet poetic structure is also a negation of the gap, for it projects a utopia of lang. in which the gap between signifier and signified would be effaced. Poetry, Genette writes is "gap from the gap, negation, rejection, oblivion, effacement of the gap, of the gap that makes language; illusion, dream, the necessary and absurd utopia of language without gap, without hiatus—without shortcomings." At the same time, it should be noted that Genette's theory of poetics is unmistakably linked with that of Todorov, in that both critics attempt to define the formal properties of poetic structures.

The question of structure is taken up by the poststructuralist thinker Jacques Derrida and other theorists (most notably the Tel Quel* group and, in particular, Julia Kristeva). This group of writers undertakes the deconstruction of those structures that fix a poem conceptually as a centered structure or a transcendental signified. Such hypostasized structures—Derrida sees them as metaphysical substances or mythical plenitudes—derive from a nostalgia for origins, a longing for a metaphysic of absolute presence. Derrida attempts to escape the closure of such a centered structure by emphasizing the free play of the signifier. This *indeterminacy of the heterogeneous text is intimately connected with what he has called différence, a term that implies both difference and deferral: an interminable temporal movement of signification that cannot be arrested in an absolute presence or closure of "meaning." However, it must be recognized that Derrida's ultimate emphasis on the free play of the signifier is still tied to the way the question of structure is posed within the ling. premises and traditional logic of Western metaphysics. The decoding of poetic script, the textual decipherment of poetry's specific structures, can be achieved in the first place only in terms of the older modes of lang. and thought that Derrida sets out to deconstruct—i.e., in terms of what he called the "always-already-written" (the trace). This suggests that Derrida's deconstructionist readings and analyses remain somehow structural, in spite of his effort to avoid the metaphysical closure of centered structure or absolute presence.

*Poststructuralism's emphasis on the free play of the signifier inspired poets to think of structure in a less restrained way. Alan Davies, associated with Am. *Language poetry, writes a series of short aphorisms about structure, sometimes contradictory, all without an attempt to create a logical *argument. In the 21st c., the Prague critic Louis Armand situates structural analysis within the new technologies of computing and artificial intelligence, a strategy that conceives structure in a mobile, dynamic form. "For discourse, for possibility to be what it is," he writes, "it must risk everything in its openness to what structures and underwrites the very concept of the limit." This openness puts in question the coherence of an organic model of structure and the finite combinations of lang. models. At the same time, an awareness of limit suggests the continued significance of structure.

■ Crane—important critique of Brooks; R. S. Crane, The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry (1953); S. Fishman, "Meaning and Structure in Poetry," JAAC 14 (1956); Sens et usage du terme structure, ed. R. Bastide (1962); H. Meyer, "Über der Begriff Struktur in der Dichtung," Neue Deutsche Hefte 10 (1963); R. Wellek, "Concepts of Form and Structure in Twentieth-Century Criticism," Concepts of Criticism (1963); M. Riffaterre, "Describing Poetic Structures," Structuralism, ed. J. Ehrmann (1970); R. Barthes, "The Structuralist Activity," Critical Essays, trans. R. Howard (1972); R. Jakobson and C. Lévi-Strauss, "Charles Baudelaire's 'Les Chats,'" The Structuralists, ed. R. DeGeorge and F. DeGeorge (1972); F. Jameson, The Prison-House of Language (1972); D. Wunderlich, "Terminologie des Strukturbegriffs," Literaturwissenschaft und Linguistik, ed. J. Ihwe, v. 1 (1972); F. Martínez-Bonati, "Die logische Struktur der Dichtung," Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 47 (1973); Culler; T. Hawkes, Structuralism and Semiotics (1977); J. M. Lotman, The Struc- ture of the Artistic Text, trans. G. Lenhoff and R. Vroon (1977); T. Todorov, The Poetics of Prose, trans. R. Howard (1977); T. D. Young, "Ransom's Critical Theories: Structure and Texture," Mississippi Quarterly 30 (1977); J. Derrida, "Structure, Sign and Play," Writing and Difference, trans. A. Bass (1978); and "Living on: Border Lines," H. Bloom, P. de Man, J. Derrida, G. Hartman, and J. H. Miller, Deconstruction and Criticism (1979); G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan (1982); R. Williams, "Structural," Keywords, 2nd ed. (1983); J. Kristeva, Revolution in Poetic Language, trans. M. Waller (1984); The L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E Book, ed. B. Andrews and C. Bernstein (1984); J. C. Rowe, "Structure," Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. F. Lentricchia and T. McLaughlin, 2d ed. (1995); L. Armand, Literate Technologies: Language, Cognition, Technology (2006).

P. McCallum

STURM UND DRANG (Ger., "storm and stress"). The term refers to a revolutionary literary movement that flourished in Germany from the late 1760s to the early 1780s. Because most of its representatives ceased to be radicals with advancing years, the term frequently denotes a brief period of youthful exuberance or maladjustment, although the *hendiadys originally meant the impulse to give violent expression to one's individuality. It also refers to the second title of a wildly bombastic play (1776) by F. M. Klinger. Participants in the movement were often called Originalgenies (original geniuses); thus, Geniezeit (genius epoch or time) is an earlier term for Sturm und Drang.

Hostile to neoclassicism as exemplified in Fr. lit. and hence often deliberately indecorous in theme and lang., Sturm und Drang was greatly influenced by Fr. and Eng. *preromanticism, the latter esp. important in that, since the 1740s, Eng. lit. had been regarded as particularly congenial to the Ger. national character. A general repudiation of normative aesthetics based itself on (1) the new sense of historical relativism and the importance attributed to environmental differences, (2) the revaluation of the primitive and of early national lit. and art, and (3) the cult of original *genius, which J. G. Herder, like Adam Ferguson, conceived as dynamic.

Sturm und Drang developed as the optimism of 18th-c. rationalists began to seem unwarranted in light of what the Enlightenment had actually achieved. Herder and his theologically less liberal teacher J. G. Hamann were both centrally concerned with religious issues, and many Sturm und Drang writers subscribed to a Herderian pantheism in which elements of Baruch Spinoza and G. W. Leibniz were sometimes fused with pietistic subjectivism. With nature felt to be a demonic force not entirely accessible to reason, a deliberate cult of the irrational—and of *myth as opposed to *allegory—became widespread.

For drama, Shakespeare, as formally unconventional, and Denis Diderot and Louis-Sébastien Mercier, as socially realistic, were inspirations and models. The *lyric was permanently enriched with folk song elements (new structural freedom, simpler and more direct lang.) and forceful Pindaric directness (esp. in J. W. Goethe), although the *ode after F. G. Klopstock was still cultivated, esp. by members of the Göttingen Dichterbund. Yet despite new, almost expressionistic technical experiments in drama and lyric, the movement was abortive. Repudiation of despotic absolutism was perhaps the only sociopolitical attitude shared by all Sturm und Drang writers, whose apparent concern with contemp. social issues often reflects only the choice of unconventionally naturalistic themes. As Sturm und Drang writers' primary interests were private rather than social, Sturm und Drang could not realize its vision of a broadly popular national lit. in a complex and sophisticated age. Analogous features of Sturm und Drang have been discerned in some other 18th-c. lits. (Swedish, Eng.), but only in Germany was Sturm und Drang a self-conscious movement. Though strongly secular and limitedly cosmopolitan, by radically undermining traditional conceptions of poetry, Sturm und Drang undoubtedly hastened the first flowering of a conscious *romanticism, that of Germany in the 1790s.

■ Anthologies: Sturm und Drang: Kritische Schriften, ed. E. Loewenthal (1949); Sturm und Drang: Dramatische Schriften, ed. E. Loewenthal, 2 v. (1959); Sturm und Drang, ed. R. Strasser, 3 v. (1966); Sturm und Drang: Dichtungen und theoretische Texte, ed. H. Nicolai, 2 v. (1971); Sturm und Drang und Empfindsamkeit, ed. U. Karthaus (1978); Sturm und Drang: Weltanschauliche und Ästhetische Schriften, ed. P. Müller, 2 v. (1978); Sturm und Drang, ed. A. Leidner (1992); Klassische Schullektüre, Sturm und Drang: Bilder, Texte, Materialien zu einer Epoche, ed. D. Lüttgens (1994); Gedichte des Sturm und Drang und der Klassik, ed. G. Malsch (1997).

■ Criticism and History: K. Wais, Das antiphilosophische Weltbild des französischen Sturm und Drang (1934); E. A. Runge, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Sturm und Drang Literature (1946); H. B. Garland, Storm and Stress (1952); F. S. Schneider, Die deutsche Dichtung der Geniezeit (1952); R. Pascal, The German Sturm und Drang (1953); Wellek, v. 1.9; E. Blackall, "The Language of Sturm und Drang," Stil- und Formprobleme in der Literatur, ed. P. Böckmann (1959); S. Atkins, "Zeitalter der Aufklärung," Fischer-Lexikon: Literatur, v. 2 (1965); W. Kliess, Sturm und Drang (1966); H. A. Korff, Geist der Goethezeit, 8th ed., v. 2 (1966); A. Heuyssen, Drama des Sturm und Drang (1980); H. Thomke, "Sturm und Drang," Reallexikon II 4.278–96; Kollektiv für Literaturgeschichte, Sturm und Drang, 6th ed. (1983); B. Kieffer, The Storm and Stress of Language (1986); E. McInnes, Ein Ungeheures Theater: The Drama of the Sturm und Drang (1987); A. Leidner, The Impatient Muse: Germany and the Sturm und Drang (1994); M. Luserke, Sturm und Drang Autoren, Texte, Themen (1997); B. Duncan, Lovers, Parricides, and Highwaymen: Aspects of Sturm und Drang Drama (1999); G. W. Bertram, Philosophie des Sturm und Drang (2000); U. Karthaus, Sturm und Drang (2000); S. Frank, Kunst-Konzepte des Sturm und Drang (2002); Literature of the Sturm und Drang, ed. D. Hill (2002); G. Kaiser, Aufklärung, Empfindsamkeit, Sturm und Drang (2007); S. Frank, Kunst-Konzepte des Sturm und Drang (2008); Sturm und Drang Junge Autoren blicken auf eine Epoche, ed. H.-G. Koch (2009).

S. Atkins; K. Bowers

STYLE. Style is the way something is done or made: not the what, but the how; not the method, but the manner. This rudimentary definition has been current for millennia, but the word commands interest not least for its contradictions. It has been used to define the distinctive voice of an individual and also the common features that identify the works of particular places, times, groups, or schools; for the holistic charisma of first impressions and the scrupling analyses of *stylistics; for the highest artistic achievement (having a style) and the season's passing fashions. That range is a challenge for theory and suggests (as such contradictions do) how much cultural work style does, defining how we recognize likeness and difference, community and individuality, present and past in our works and in one another.

In the Western trad., style was treated first as a department of rhet. Style for Aristotle consists of those aspects of lang.—*syntax, *diction, *figuration—that can be adapted to suit a persuasive occasion. He bequeathed this emphasis on decorum to Cicero, whose Orator codifies the flexibility of style in three genera dicendi, or kinds of speech: high, middle, and low. The high style, "forceful, versatile, copious and grave," suits affairs of state; the low, "refined, concise [and] stripped of ornament," is "clear rather than impressive" and serves for explanation and familiar talk. The middle is a compromise (never as clearly defined as its neighbors, in Cicero or in the trad. that followed him). This tripartite scheme offers a set of rhetorical strategies that may be taught to anyone, and though variations were proposed (like Hermogenes's 2d-c. Seven Types of Style), it remained central to rhetorical instruction through the Middle Ages and into the Ren. Its flexibility encourages a conceptual distinction between manner and matter, as though a single subject could be dressed (a common metaphor) in a variety of styles. Similarly persistent was the promise of a normative or best style: Cicero himself held that role for many Ren. humanists, and it was the characteristic aim of 18th-c. rhetorical manuals.

Cicero might also be said to be the source of a rival strand of the trad. His De oratore, written ten years before the Orator, asks, "Do you not expect that we shall find almost as many styles of oratory as orators?" Here is style as the mark of an individual, a signature (to take up the metaphor implicit in the Latin stilus, or pen). The idea of individual style, cultivated or innate, was a persistent undercurrent in Eur. letters through the 18th c. and became a critical preoccupation in the 19th. Style simultaneously developed into a central category for historical understanding. Ren. *historicism arguably began in the recognition of stylistic difference, as eds. of cl. texts learned to date them (and to unmask forgeries) by changes in lang. over time. Art historians of the 18th and 19th cs. elaborated taxonomies of style to define periods and schools. Indeed, style, understood as the recognition of origins, might be said to be the most vivid way that historical stratification is present in daily life (Ginzburg): we are surrounded by things that look like the time and place they were made or pretend to have been made.

In the 20th c., ling. and technology transformed the study of style for literary analysis. The revolution of Noam Chomsky's generative grammar gave rise to a subdiscipline of stylistics that considers stylistic variation in relation to deep structure. Computers permitted ambitious statistical portraits of texts, providing evidence for dating and even attribution to individuals. In breaking texts down into features (like relative letter frequency) that no reader could be expected to notice, much less quantify, computer-assisted stylometrics has moved far away from the immediate power of style. That extension from total impression to incidental, telltale element has been a provocation to theorists, and philosophical thinking of the last 50 years has centered around a few recurring questions. Do texts, objects, or people have specifically stylistic features? This question is a version of the matter and manner problem: can we separate the subject of a poem, say, or its form, from what defines its style? Mod. opinion has tended to reject any a priori distinction—saying in advance what features of a text can and cannot count as stylistic—but there have been many attempts to set criteria. Stylistic features may be those, e.g., that express or solicit an affective response (Bally) or that express the psychology of the maker (Wollheim, Gilmore) or that convey the way something was made (Walton). Another common question is whether style requires a choice among possible alternatives. Would style be intelligible if there were only one style; is having a style necessarily a conscious choice? Other theorists have treated stylistic difference as the deviation from a norm, so that style, choice or no, is necessarily supplementary to the usual or the merely useful (Barthes, Todorov). The unity of style has attracted comment, too, much of it engaging the work of Spitzer. If a novel has a style, is that style necessarily present in each of its details? Is unity—which the critic discovers by traveling Spitzer's hermeneutic circle, moving from detail to whole and around again—the criterion of style?

Such theoretical questions coexist with a popular conversation about style that makes its social aspects particularly obvious. Style defines communities of people who dress similarly and read similar books, as well as communities that make similar poems. Having a style affords all of them a certain ease or at least a way of knowing what to do or how to do it. That goes for membership in a group as well as for individual style, insofar as a poet with a recognizable style can be said to imitate himself or herself. (The word's adaptability both to singling out and to collecting allows for delicate calibrations of affiliation and independence, in art and life.) In a social context, it becomes clear that the affiliations we perceive when we recognize a style are more than merely formal. We also register something like charisma: style impresses us when we see not only a way of proceeding but how someone might want to act or dress or make something that way (whether we ourselves would want to or not). Much of our life with works of art involves such negotiations of imitative desire, as we map the stylistic variety of our world, its communities and its hist., and define the boundaries of *taste within which we will live.

For all this attention and interest, the concept of style, still vital in art hist. and musicology, has been relatively peripheral to lit. crit. of the last 50 years. The *New Criticism often treated stylistic description as a distraction from the interpretive challenges of the particular text. Neither *poststructuralism nor historicism found terms for reviving its currency. But the bearing toward the world that style names is perdurably important to literary experience, and reading for the style—for who wrote the text, where it comes from, but also for what the writer's life might be like and what it might offer our own—is arguably far more widespread than formal *interpretation. Style has great promise for contemp. crit. as a neglected connection among form, society, and hist.

See ESTILISTICA.

■ W. Pater, "Style," Appreciations (1889); L. Spitzer, Linguistics and Literary History (1948); C. Bally, Traité de stylistique française, 3d ed. (1951); S. Ullman, Language and Style (1964); S. Sontag, "On Style," Against Interpretation (1966); E. Gombrich, "Style," International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, ed. D. L. Sills (1968); G. Hough, Style and Stylistics (1969); Literary Style: A Symposium, ed. S. Chatman (1971)—see esp. R. Barthes, "Style and Its Image," and T. Todorov, "The Place of Style in the Structure of the Text"; R. Lanham, Style: An Anti-Textbook (1974); N. Goodman, "The Status of Style," CritI 1 (1975); D. Russell, "Theories of Style," Criticism in Antiquity (1981); W. Sauerländer, "From Stilus to Style," Art History 6 (1983); The Concept of Style, ed. B. Lang, rev. ed. (1987)—see esp. K. Walton, "Style and the Products and Processes of Art," and R. Wollheim, "Pictorial Style: Two Views"; G. Genette, Fiction and Diction, trans. C. Porter (1993); C. Ginzburg, "Style as Inclusion, Style as Exclusion," Picturing Science, Producing Art, ed. P. Gallison and C. A. Jones (1998); J. Gilmore, The Life of a Style (2000).

J. DOLVEN

STYLISTICS. In its broadest sense, the study of style. In literary studies, stylistics most often refers to approaches that use mod. ling. to analyze and interpret the lang. of literary art. Ling. stylistics is the study of style in all genres, treating style as register, lang. associated with social uses and meanings, defined by M.A.K. Halliday as comprising field, tenor, and mode (semantic domain, relationship of communicative participants, and speech or writing). Mod. ling. has transformed stylistics so thoroughly that stylistics is regarded by many as the application of the concepts and tools of ling. to the study of style in lit.

The goals of literary stylistics include investigating the style of a particular author, period, genre, or national style; attributing authorship and dates; describing and analyzing an author's or group's "mind style" or habitual thought (psychological, philosophical, political, etc.); theorizing how lang. features are selected from among options (theoretical stylistics); analyzing socially constructed lang. of groups and genres (feminist stylistics, critical stylistics, functional stylistics). In the past four decades, stylistics has branched in several directions, each investigating style using a different field or more often a combination of fields: functional ling., feminist studies, critical studies, pragmatics, philosophy of lang., discourse analysis, reception theory, reader-response theory, performance theory, psycholinguistics, sociolinguistics, cognitive ling., cognitive psychology, semiotics, and *cognitive poetics. These branches share the problem of defining what style is and locating whatever it is in specific texts. Of the many definitions of style that have been put forth, style as "choice" is the most accurate and widely used (see also Wales). "Choice" distinguishes the "way" content is expressed in a specific instance of lang. (parole) as selected from among the available options in a lang. (langue). The objects for study are elements of style, called stylistic features, as they are structured and function in actual verbal instances. All the levels of the linguistic system are investigated and interrelated: phonological, syntactic, lexical, and semantic. Structures with functions above the sentence level, such as point of view, frames, and social interaction codes, are excluded except insofar as the elements of style affect the large structures. And since the small elements are always the actual lang., the large structures are said to contain, stylistics is relevant to the interpretations made by discourse analysts. Nevertheless, little work combining discourse-level analysis and stylistic analysis has been done. A small minority of stylistic studies include discourse studies, e.g., narratology (for discussions and opposing views, see Shen; Fludernik and Margolin). To examine style as choice is necessarily to view it as something separable from content, as something that includes both conscious and unconscious selection of features and structures, and as something individual as well as shared e.g., characteristic of a group, era, nation, genre). Actual separation between the "way" (style) and the "what" (content) of lang. elements, known as dualism, has been strenuously debated, and the dichotomy does not hold up in all senses and situations, esp. in poetry. Stylistic monists consider the substitution theory advanced by Roman Jakobson (in Sebeok and in Weber) to be inaccurate and insist that selection involves differences in meaning, however minute (e.g., the *New Critics were monists in theory; see Levin). A middle ground is sensibly used in actual analytic practice: a cline gives a more accurate way to regard lang. options, a slide from most similar to least similar options (see Ross on grammar clines); but stylistics analysis cannot proceed without the assumption of some degree of form/content divide. The problem of an assumed norm against which a style can be measured plagued early stylistics because there is no actual norm; instead, scholars must use their impression of a norm of use, or they must gather data on examples of writing comparable to the texts under investigation. Comparative studies require large-corpus data analysis, arduously compiled before computer programs by pioneers like Josephine Miles in the 1950s and 1960s, and Marina Tarlinskaja in the 1970s and 1980s. Miles researched continuity and change over 500 years of Eng. poetry, using representative sampling of a small set of features for analysis from a large representative sampling. Tarlinskaja examined a similar corpus of poetry, and later the corpus of Shakespeare's verse drama, for a full picture of metrical characteristics. Now data can be gathered and partially analyzed with the aid of increasingly powerful computer programs (see Semino, Short, and Culpepper for methodology and for results on Henry James's style; for computer applications, see Hoover et al.; Siemens and Schreibman). Large comparative data sets greatly assist the analyst in determining norms, but the analyst still has to exert good intuitive insight into which features stand out as salient—distinctive and significant to the functioning of a particular text or group of texts.

Mod. stylistics has direct roots in the Ren. version of cl. rhet., when rhet. was largely style (see RHETORIC AND POETRY): in Fr. stylistique, which extended cl. ideas and further reduced style to ethos in the 18th c., famously in Buffon's declaration, "Style is the man" (Le style c'est l'homme); and in Ger. Stilforschung, which examined style as expressiveness of authorial attitudes, a viewpoint that reigned in stylistics in the mid-20th c. and manifests in cognitive stylistics as "mind style" at present. From ancient Gr. into the 20th c., with few exceptions, stylistics was prescriptive, concerned with propriety of lang. usage or effective style. Stylistics relied on rhetorical analysis for concepts and categories, from the Sophists through the practical crit. of I. A. Richards and the New Critics, but turned descriptive and analytic in the 1920s with Richards in the U.S. and with *Rus. formalism and structural ling. in Europe (in Great Britain with T. E. Hulme in 1908; see Hulme in Cook). The Indiana Conference on Style of 1958 brought practical crit. and *structuralism together in an attempt at reaching agreement, but the aims and methods of the two were substantially different. Though both orientations investigated formal elements, practical crit. (U.S. and Great Britain) was interested in analyzing and evaluating individual poems, while the Eur. schools had as their goal building a systematic view of lang. and literary code. The conference launched ling.-based stylistics in the U.S. as poetics, a field that at the time was limited to the stylistic investigation of structural elements of poetry and their function (see Jakobson's closing statement in "Linguistics and Poetics" in Sebeok and in Cook). Since then, practical crit. and stylistics have continued uneasily side by side in the U.S., with stylistics developing analytic rigor and the more impressionistic practical crit. sometimes employing linguistic concepts and approaches, although sometimes not. Helen Vendler is the foremost defender of the view that the stylistics of the individual critic is superior to the objectivity of linguistic approaches (in Cook).

The 1980s saw stylistics about to become the central literary analytic method; in fact, stylistics did thrive in Britain and Europe, but it suffered a decline in the U.S. because of the combined influence of deconstruction, *poststructuralism, culture and canon wars, and the privileging of narrative over poetry. Subsequently, the U.S. has become the world center for narratology, and Great Britain has risen to the fore in stylistics, powered by Halliday's devel. of functional ling., which provided a detailed communicative framework that could be used for differentiating, analyzing, interpreting, and integrating aspects of lang. within all genres (see Birch and O'Toole). Germany is foremost in combining narratology and stylistics, as both are required courses of study in university curricula (see Fludernick and Margolin). Continuing its long interest in speaker/author, Fr. stylistics is distinguished by its continued focus on subjectivity. Fr. stylistics is divided, as is its U.S. counterpart, on the issue of whether using ling. is the best avenue; like Great Britain, Fr. stylistics takes for study all genres and has branched in several directions, with special interest, like Brit. functional stylistics and discourse stylistics, in styles of professional, political, and social genres (Rotge). In line with these interests, Fr. stylistics prefers cognitive stylistics, as do the cognitive poetics centers in the Netherlands (see the jour. Poetics) and Israel (see Tsur). Across the globe, Chinese stylistics has continued a trad. of objective investigation drawing from mod. Western ling., focusing on text elements as they affect discourse-level structures (see Shen).

The burgeoning of the ling.-based stylistics has not meant that insightful studies have not continued along the lines of older literary-historical and critical models. Excellent research in stylistics has continued with traditional topics and methods while incorporating some aspects of lingusitics: e.g., Marie Borroff's work on various poets' styles and Emerson Marks's study of period stylistics. The alliance of lit. hist. and crit. with ling. has yielded greater objectivity, systematization, and explanatory power because meaning and affect can be located in the functions of lang. as shared knowledge. Impressionistic practices, to the extent that they depend on individual assessments of meaning and affect, have lost much of their former authoritative power.

The next territories to be explored appear to be the continued expansion of cognitive stylistics and the intersections of stylistics with pragmatics and narratology: intensive investigation into how the mind makes, receives, and reconstructs lang. features; how lang. features affect the large extralinguistic structures, their functions, and meanings (see Leech and Short; Short; Turner; Birch; Downes; Semino and Culpepper; and Dan). Until the 1960s, the near-exclusive investigation in stylistics was on the lang. of poetry, much of it on *prosody, since sound structure was viewed as the defining aspect of literary art (see essays in Sebeok; and in Chatman and Levin). The first stylistics collection on prose, published in 1966, applied practical crit. to fiction (Lodge). The seminal work on linguistic approaches to fiction appeared in 1981 (Leech and Short). Reactions in the 1960s to the code as an objective entity without consideration for how texts come to be and how they are understood have progressed from various pragmatic, *speech-act, and reader-based theories to the current keen interest in cognitive studies, sparked by such influential studies as George Lakoff's on conceptual metaphor. Tropes have long been a principal area of investigation in stylistics, since Freud and Jakobson based their theories of lang. on *metaphor and *metonymy. The study of metaphor in lit., however, is, as yet, excessively constrained by most of the cognitive linguistic work, which seeks determinate meanings (e.g., see essays in Barcelona), whereas literary artists seek to "raid the inarticulate"—to indicate new worlds, new thought, new ways of indicating experience that is not adequately expressible in the ordinary shared lang. that ling. studies (see Ricoeur; Tracy and Ricoeur in Sacks; Levin; Ross 1972 and 1984; Tsur 2003; and Winslow). While cognitive studies have been centrally concerned with shared stylistic indicators (e.g., lexical) and mental processing for shared gestalts and frames (e.g., Lakoff; Turner), what is needed is more investigation into how literary texts defamiliarize by leaving gaps and creating blocks in the shared frames to promote new thought and world views.

See ESTILISTICA, LINGUISTICS AND POETICS, NEW CRITICISM, STYLE.

■ Richards; L. Spitzer, Linguistics and Literary History (1948); H. A. Hatzfeld, A Critical Bibliography of the New Stylistics Applied to Romance Literatures (1953); J. Miles, Eras and Modes in English Poetry (1957); Sebeok; S. Levin, Linguistic Structures in Poetry (1962); D. Lodge, Language of Fiction (1966); S. Chatman and S. Levin, Essays on the Language of Literature (1967); S. Chatman, ed., Literary Style, A Symposium (1971); J. Ross, "Squishing," Canadian Journal of Linguistics, 17.2 (1972); and "Parallels in Phonological and Semantic Organization," Papers from the Parasession on Functionalism, ed. J. Kavanagh and J. Cutting (1975); M.A.K. Halliday, Halliday: System and Function in Language, ed. G. Kress (1976); P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Language (1976); Tarlinskaja; H. White, Tropics of Discourse (1978); M. Borroff, Language and the Poet (1979); S. Sacks, ed., On Metaphor (1979); S. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? (1980); G. Lakoff and M. Johnson, Metaphors We Live By (1980); G. N. Leech and M. H. Short, Style in Fiction (1981; 2d ed., 2007); J. Ross, "Speaking the Unspeakable," The Counterfeit Ark, ed. J. Leaning and L. Keyes (1984); J. Bennett, Bibliography of Stylistics and Related Criticism, 1967–83 (1986); N. Fabb, D. Attridge, A. Durant, and C. MacCabe, The Linguistics of Writing (1987); M. Tarlinskaja, Shakespeare's Verse (1987); D. Birch and M. O'Toole, Functions of Style (1988); S. Levin: Metaphoric Worlds (1988); R. Tsur, Toward a Theory of Cognitive Poetics (1992); H. Widdowson, Practical Stylistics (1992); G. Cook, Discourse and Literature: The Interplay of Form and Mind (1994); D. Birch, Context and Language: A Functional Theory of Register (1995); J. Mills, Feminist Stylistics (1995); R. Fowler, Linguistic Criticism (1996); M. Turner, The Literary Mind: The Origins of Language and Thought (1996); J. Weber, ed., The Stylistics Reader: From Roman Jakobson to the Present (1996); D. Crystal, Language Play (1998); W. Downes, Language and Society (1998); E. Marks, Taming the Chaos: English Poetic Diction Theory Since the Renaissance (1998); A. Barcelona, ed., Metaphor and Metonymy at the Crossroads: A Cognitive Perspective (2000); K. Wales, A Dictionary of Stylistics (2000); M. Toolan, Narrative: A Critical Linguistic Introduction, 2d ed. (2001); Cognitive Stylistics: Language and Cognition in Text Analysis, ed. E. Semino and J. Culpepper (2002); R. Tsur, On the Shore of Nothingness (2003); J. Cook, Poetry in Theory (2004); M. Fludernik and U. Margolin, "Introduction," Style: Special Issue on German Stylistics 38.3 (Fall 2004); W. Rotge, "Stylistics in France Today," Style 38.4 (Winter 2004); E. Semino, M. Short, and J. Culpepper, A Corpus-Based Study of Speech, Thought and Writing in a Corpus of English Writing (2004); R. Winslow, "Troping Trauma: Conceiving (of) Experiences of Speechless Trauma," JAC (2004); D. Shen, "How Stylisticians Draw on Narratology: Approaches, Advantages and Disadvantages," Style 39:4 (Winter 2005); E. Black, Pragmatic Stylistics (2006); D. Hoover, J. Culpepper, B. Louw, and M. Wynne, Approaches to Corpus Stylistics (2007); R. Siemens and S. Schreibman, Blackwell Companion to Digital Literary Studies (2007); M. Lambrou and P. Stockwell, Contemporary Stylistics (2008).

R. WINSLOW

SUBLIME

I. Classical
II. Enlightenment to Modern

I. Classical. Sublime (Lat. sublimis, "[on] high, lofty, elevated") owes its currency as a critical and aesthetic term to the anonymous Gr. treatise Peri hypsous (On the Sublime; hypsos, "height, elevation") once ascribed to the rhetorician Longinus of the 3d c. CE but now generally agreed to belong to the 1st c., perhaps around 50 CE. Whatever his name and origin, its author was certainly a rhetorician and a teacher of the art, but one of uncommon mold. His treatise, with its intimacy of tone (it is addressed to a favorite pupil, a young Roman) and breadth of spirit, stands more or less isolated in its own time but has had a recurrent fascination for the mod. mind since the 17th c.

The idea of sublimity had its roots in the rhetorical distinction, well established before Longinus, of three levels of *style—high, middle, and low. His achievement was to draw it out of the technical sphere, where it had to do primarily with style, and to associate it with the general phenomenon of greatness in lit., prose and poetry alike. The author regards sublimity above all as a thing of the spirit, a spark that leaps from the soul of the writer to the soul of his reader and only secondarily as a matter of technique and expression. "Sublimity is the echo of greatness of spirit." Being of the soul, it may pervade a whole work (speech, hist., or poem: the author pays little attention to generic distinctions), or it may flash out at particular moments. "Father Zeus, kill us if thou wilt, but kill us in the light." "God said, 'Let there be light,' and there was light." In such quotations as these, Longinus shows among other things his sharp eye for the particular passage and his capacity for empathy with the actual work, qualities that are, in fact, rare in ancient crit. and that presage the mod. spirit.

The distinguishing mark of sublimity for this ancient author is a certain quality of feeling. But he will not allow it to be identified simply with *emotion, for not all emotions are true or noble. Only art can guard against exaggerated or misplaced feeling. Nevertheless, art is subordinated to *genius in his thinking. He enumerates five sources of the sublime: great thoughts, noble feeling, lofty figures, *diction, and arrangement. The first two, the crucial ones, are the gift of nature, not art. He even prefers the faults of a great spirit, a Homer, a Plato, or a Demosthenes, to the faultless mediocrity that is achieved by following rules.

In later antiquity and the Middle Ages, the treatise remained unknown, or at least exercised little influence. In the Ren., it was first published by Francesco Robortello in 1554, then translated into Lat. in 1572 and into Eng. in 1652 by John Hall. But it made no great impression until the late 17th c. Paradoxically enough, it was Nicolas Boileau, the high priest of Fr. neoclassicism, who launched the Peri hypsous on its great mod. career and thus helped to prepare the ultimate downfall of *classicism. His trans. (1674) had immense reverberation, esp. in England. The English, always restive under the so-called Fr. rules, instinctively welcomed Longinus as an ally. As neoclassicism advanced and subjectivity became increasingly central to Eng. thinking, not only about lit. but about art in general, the sublime became a key concept in the rise of *romanticism in poetry and the concurrent establishment of aesthetics as a new, separate branch of philosophy.

II. Enlightenment to Modern. In the 18th c., the sublime represented merely one type of experience that could be described under the general philosophical rubric of sensationism (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS). For a host of writers producing everything from aesthetic treatises to Gothic novels, it was synonymous with irresistible forces that produced overwhelming sensations. In the 18th and 19th cs., sublime came increasingly to be a term of aesthetic approbation, as attested by the interest in both sublime landscapes and paintings of sublime landscapes. In the popular view, the term amounted to a description: it represented primarily a subject matter, the wild and desolate natural scene (see NATURE) or the natural force that dwarfed the individual human figure. Its effect was simultaneously to make one conscious of one's own comparative weakness in the face of natural might and to produce a sense of the strength of one's own faculties. As John Baillie put it in his Essay on the Sublime (1747), "Vast Objects occasion vast Sensations, and vast Sensations give the Mind a higher Idea of her own Powers."

Along with the increasing currency of the term in the 18th c., two particularly strong arguments about the place of the sublime and sublime nature emerged: Edmund Burke's Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful (1757) and Immanuel Kant's Critique of Judgment (1790; commonly referred to as his Third Critique, after the Critique of Pure Reason [1781] and Critique of Practical Reason [1788]). In the hist. of what we now call aesthetics, these two works were esp. important for according significance to pleasure in objects that were not, strictly speaking, beautiful. Burke developed the sensationist position into an affectivism that continually connected the sublime with the issue of an individual's relationship to society, and Kant made his discussion of the sublime a cornerstone of a formalist account of aesthetics (see INTUITION).

Burke's Enquiry sets out the affectivist position on the sublime in an argument that emphasizes the power of experience. In the "Introduction on Taste" added to the 2d ed. (1759), Burke made two claims for the importance of *taste. First, his emphasis on the regular operation of the senses makes taste as meaningful and as generalizable as reason: "as the conformation of their organs are nearly, or altogether the same in all men, so the manner of perceiving external objects is in all men the same, or with little difference." Second, his emphasis on the origin of the passions treats taste as a field of determinate knowledge in which the "remembrance of the original natural causes of pleasure" can be distinguished from the acquired tastes that fashion and habit promote. People, he observes, are not likely to be mistaken in their reactions to sensation even though they may often be confused in their reasoning about them.

Burke traced the attractions of the beautiful and the sublime to human impulses that are ultimately utilitarian. The beautiful he saw as a manifestation of the human instinct toward sociability, with sociability, in turn, serving the purpose of the continuation of the species. The sublime he treated as a manifestation of the instinct for self-preservation, the response of terror that "anticipates our reasonings, and hurries us on by an irresistible force." The beautiful represents what we love (and love specifically for submitting to us and flattering our sense of our own power); the sublime represents all that we fear for being greater and more powerful than we are.

If the notion of sympathy (see EMPATHY AND SYMPATHY) had for writers like Adam Smith suggested how persons might identify with the interests of others, Burke's discussion of the sublime and the beautiful emphasizes relations between individuals and objects far more than intersubjective relations. Yet Burke argues for the social utility of our feelings of the sublime and beautiful. He increasingly aligns the beautiful not merely with the sociable and pleasing but with a relaxation of the bodily functions that eventually becomes disabling. The sublime, by contrast, presents difficulties that require "exercise or labour" to be overcome. Although the sublime feelings of astonishment or awe may resemble pain, the excitation and exertion that they produce yield a very real pleasure—a consciousness of one's own powers and even a physical exercise that keeps the various organs of sensation in tone. Burke's account may be empiricist in suggesting that objects have regular and predictable operations on the senses, but it ultimately deemphasizes knowledge of the external world and stresses instead the uses of objects in gratifying and challenging the individual human organism.

Kant, in his Critical Observations on the Feeling of the Beautiful and Sublime (1784), does not depart strikingly from the Burkean position. He identifies the beautiful and the sublime as terms under which contrasting kinds of objects of experience might be subsumed; and he sees the enjoyment or displeasure in these objects as having essentially a psychological dimension. In this, his remarks are consistent with the familiar critical view that shifted discussions of pleasure in art and nature from an emphasis on production—what the artist must do to achieve certain effects—to an emphasis on reception—how the response to certain objects raises questions of a viewer's or reader's psychology.

With the Third Critique, however, Kant reoriented aesthetic discussion. Burke and other writers (incl. the Kant of the Observations) had described the sublime and the beautiful in terms of both natural and human-made objects; Homeric and Miltonic poetry could serve as examples of sublimity as well as the seemingly infinite expanse of the ocean or a powerful animal in whom "the terrible and sublime blaze out together." Kant reduced the metaphorical reach of the term sublime and identified it exclusively with natural objects. The effect of this reduction was to enable him to argue that the sublime is not—or not particularly—important for establishing human inferiority relative to natural might. Rather, the pleasure that one takes in sublime nature reveals a pleasure in judging objects that are not the vehicles of a message and not expressions of anyone's intentions. If a poem or a statue cannot exist without the intentional action of its maker, natural sublimity appeals to human viewers in a fashion that stands outside such communication of *intention.

Kant's claim for sublime intentionlessness obviously opposes itself to the "argument from design," which reads the book of nature as revealing divine intention. Its primary significance, however, is not so much to argue against belief in divinity as to identify aesthetic judgment as a faculty that is, in interesting ways, unable to ground itself in claims about the prior value of external objects. The sublime becomes the primary vehicle for the Kantian argument about the importance of "purposiveness without purpose" in aesthetic objects. While natural beauty might appear to have been formed by design (echoing Joseph Addison's sense of the mutually enhancing relationship of art and nature to one another), the sublime, lacking the form of beautiful nature, bespeaks pleasure in an object that is without bounds not merely in appearing infinite but in having no form. The aesthetic judgment, i.e., does not respond to the intrinsic beauty of an object in appreciating natural sublimity, but neither does it merely provide a screen on which individual psychology is projected. Rather, the sublime in its intentionlessness and formlessness makes visible the judgment's role as a form-giving faculty.

In the 1970s and after, the sublime gained prominence in *poststructuralism, rhetorical crit., and continental philosophy. In the work of Jacques Derrida, for instance, it figured in his challenge to Kantian formalism. Indeed, for many critics it came to represent something like an inversion of the Kantian claim about it: namely, the view that the sublime represents an "excess" in lang. that keeps it from ever assuming any fixed form or meaning. More recently, the Fr. philosopher Jean-François Lyotard revisited the Kantian sublime as an Enlightenment anticipation of the epistemological complexity associated with *postmodernism, while the Slovenian philosopher Slavoj Žižek has argued that political regimes depend on extrapolitical "sublime objects" (such as the state or religion) to frame their subjects' worldview. Meanwhile, many literary scholars have been concerned to develop the material, psychological, and transhistorical dimensions of the sublime.

See BATHOS, DESCRIPTIVE POETRY, HEBRAISM, IMAGINATION, JE NE SAIS QUOI, ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS.

■ T. R. Henn, Longinus and English Criticism (1934); S. H. Monk, The Sublime: A Study of Critical Theories in XVIII-Century England (1935); B. Weinberg, "Translations and Commentaries on Longinus to 1600, A Bibliography," MP 47 (1949–50); F. Wehrli, "Der erhabene und der schlichte Stil in der poetisch-rhetorischen Theorie der Antike," Phylobolia fauur P. von der Mauuhll (1946); E. Olson, "The Argument of Longinus' On the Sublime," Crane; Wimsatt and Brooks, esp. chs. 6, 14; W. J. Hipple, The Beautiful, The Sublime, and the Picturesque (1957); J. Brody, Boileau and Longinus (1958); M. H. Nicolson, Mountain Gloom and Mountain Glory (1959); E. Tuveson, The Imagination as a Means of Grace (1960); M. Price, "The Sublime Poem," Yale Review 58 (1969); Saisselin; A. Litman, Le Sublime en France, 1666–1714 (1971); D. B. Morris, The Religious Sublime (1972); T.E.B. Wood, The Word "Sublime" and Its Context, 1650–1760 (1972); A. O. Wlecke, Wordsworth and the Sublime (1973); W. P. Albrecht, The Sublime Pleasures of Tragedy (1975); T. Weiskel, The Romantic Sublime (1976); J. Derrida, "Economimesis," trans. R. Klein, Diacritics 11 (1981); P. H. Fry, The Reach of Criticism (1983); P. de Man, "Hegel on the Sublime," Displacement, ed. M. Krupnick (1983); A. Leighton, Shelley and the Sublime (1984); N. Hertz, The End of the Line (1985); E. Escoubas, "Kant ou la simplicité du sublime," Poésie 32 (1985); S. Knapp, Personification and the Sublime: Milton to Coleridge (1985); "The Sublime and the Beautiful: Reconsiderations," NLH 16.2 (1985)—spec. iss.; The American Sublime, ed. M. Arensberg (1986); P. Lacoue-Labarthe, "La Verité sublime," Poésie 38 (1986); L. W. Marvick, Mallarmé and the Sublime (1986); J. Derrida, The Truth in Painting, trans. G. Bennington and I. McLeod (1987); La Via al Sublime, ed. M. Brown et al. (1987); T. M. Kelley, Wordsworth's Revisionary Aesthetics (1988); P. Boitani, The Tragic and the Sublime in Medieval Literature (1989); P. Crowther, The Kantian Sublime (1989); Das Erhabene, ed. C. Pries (1989); J.-F. Lyotard, The Differend, trans. G. Van Den Abbeele (1988); and "The Sublime and the Avant-Garde," The Lyotard Reader, ed. A. Benjamin (1989); J. Ramazani, "Yeats: Tragic Joy and the Sublime," PMLA 104 (1989); S. Guerlac, The Impersonal Sublime (1990); R. Wilson, American Sublime (1991); V. A. De Luca, Words of Eternity: Blake and the Poetics of the Sublime (1991); F. Ferguson, Solitude and the Sublime (1992); N. A. Halmi, "From Hierarchy to Opposition: Allegory and the Sublime," CL 44 (1992); J.-L. Nancy, "The Sublime Offering," Of the Sublime, trans. J. S. Librett (1993); Eighteenth-Century Studies 28.1 (1994)—several essays on the sublime in France and Germany; M. Lollini, Le muse, le maschere e il sublime (1994); J.-F. Lyotard, Lessons on the Analytic of the Sublime, trans. E. Rottenberg (1994); Beauty and the Critic, ed. J. Soderholm (1997); D. Bromwich, "The Sublime before Aesthetics and Politics," Raritan 16 (1997); E. Baker, "Fables of the Sublime: Kant, Schiller, Kleist," MLN 113 (1998); S. Budick, The Western Theory of Tradition (2000); M. Donougho, "Stages of the Sublime in North America," MLN 115 (2000); J. Turner, "Wordsworth and the Psychogenesis of the Sublime," Romanticism 6 (2000); R. Gasché, "The Sublime, Ontologically Speaking," YFS 99 (2001); I. Balfour, "The Sublime between History and Theory: Hegel, de Man, and Beyond," After Poststructuralism, ed. T. Rajan and M. J. O'Driscoll (2002), and "The Sublime Sonnet in European Romanticism," Romantic Poetry, ed. A. Esterhammer (2002); M. Blackwell, "The Sublimity of Taste in Edmund Burke's A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful," PQ 82 (2003); H. Ram, The Imperial Sublime: A Russian Poetics of Empire (2003); Georgia Review 58.2 (2004)—symposium on the poetic sublime; C. Duffy, Shelley and the Revolutionary Sublime (2005); Phrasis 46.1 (2005)—several essays on the sublime; I. Balfour, "Torso: (The) Sublime Sex, Beautiful Bodies, and the Matter of the Text," Eighteenth-Century Studies 39 (2006); A. J. Cascardi, "The Genealogy of the Sublime in the Aesthetics of the Spanish Baroque," Reason and Its Others, ed. D. Castillo and M. Lollini (2006); B. Kim, "Generating a National Sublime: Wordsworth's The River Duddon and The Guide to the Lakes," SIR 45 (2006); C. Battersby, The Sublime, Terror and Human Difference (2007); R. Rothman, "Modernism, Postmodernism, and the Two Sublimes of Surrealism," Modernism and Theory, ed. S. Ross (2009); S. Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology, 2d ed. (2009); R. A. Barney, "The Splenetic Sublime: Anne Finch, Melancholic Psychology, and Post/Modernity," Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture 39 (2010); A. Richardson, The Neural Sublime (2010); C. Stokes, Coleridge, Language, and the Sublime (2011).

G. F. Else, T.V.F. Brogan (cl.); F. Ferguson, R. Greene (mod.)

SUBSTITUTION. According to traditional Eng. versification, one of several ways of explaining why a particular line departs from the meter of a poem. The idea is that poets need not strictly adhere to a meter: one kind of foot can be substituted for another. E.g., in 1906, Saintsbury argued that George Chapman shows artistry in his trans. of the Iliad by substituting an anapest (-ible cave*) where the reader expects an *iamb: "From bréasts heróic; sént them fár, to thát invis*ible cáve*."

Substitution fully entered Eng. prosodic thinking only in the mid-19th c. Attridge (1974), Fussell, and Taylor have explained that, in the 17th and 18th cs., prosodists paid little attention to departures from the meter. Typically, they described meter only by counting the number of syllables. When they did discuss stress, they argued that the pattern must be regular and that departures were flaws.

In proposing the idea of substitution, Victorian prosodists imported a concept from *classical prosody. As Gasparov explains, when the notion of the *foot appeared in Gr. verse sometime between 1000 and 750 BCE, the concept of substitution arose at the same time: where the line called for a long syllable, two short syllables could be substituted instead.

In the 20th c., linguists rejected substitution for failing to explain how many and what kinds of substitution a line could bear before another meter emerged or the meter collapsed entirely. E.g., each of these lines has only two iambs, but Robert Browning's is heard as iambic pentameter ("Your búsiness is nót to cátch mén with shów"; "Fra Lippo Lippi") while Hollander's is not ("Withóut ány arrángement of dównbeats"). Linguists responded to such problems by trying to articulate the unspoken rules of meter; and in 1966, Halle and Keyser founded *generative metrics when they replaced the concepts of foot and substitution with the concept of position.

The work of Halle and Keyser and of their successors has largely gone unnoticed by literary scholars, who have tended to follow the lead of Wimsatt and Beardsley, who, in 1959, famously rejected linguistic efforts, believing that substitution creates a *counterpoint between the abstract grid of meter and the actual *rhythm of each line. In 1962, Halperin argued that iambic meters accommodate substitution more easily than other meters; but in 1996, Finch and Wallace countered that substitution appears frequently in noniambic meters as well, a claim disputed by Steele.

The success of Wimsatt and Beardsley has led to a continuing divide between the understanding of meter found in poetry handbooks, poetry classes, and most literary scholarship, on the one hand, and the understanding of meter explored by linguists, on the other. In 1982, Attridge tried to bridge the gap between literary and linguistic approaches.

See LINGUISTICS AND POETICS, METER, RHYTHM.

■ Saintsbury, Prosody; Wimsatt and Beardsley; M. Halperin, "On the Two Chief Metrical Modes in English," PMLA 77 (1962); P. Fussell, Theory of Prosody in Eighteenth-Century England (1966); M. Halle and S. J. Keyser, "Chaucer and the Study of Prosody," CE 33 (1966); D. Attridge, Well-Weighed Syllables (1974); Attridge, Rhythms; D. Taylor, Hardy's Metres and Victorian Prosody (1988); D. Baker, Meter in English (1996)—see essays by Finch, Wallace, and Steele; Gasparov, History; J. Hollander, Rhyme's Reason (2001).

M. L. MANSON

SUMERIAN POETRY. A corpus of more than 100 compositions in the Sumerian lang. written out on clay tablets in verse form, ranging from short lyric pieces to narrative *epics of over 700 lines. Uncertainty about Sumerian phonetics hinders appreciation of how Sumerian poetry sounded. The earliest Sumerian poetry dates to the mid-3d millennium BCE. Most manuscripts date approximately to the 18th c. BCE, when Sumerian was a cultural rather than a spoken lang.; the latest date to the Achaemenid and Hellenistic periods. Native rubrics suggest that Sumerian poetry was closely associated with performance, by singers individually or in chorus, accompanied by drums, winds, and harps.

Although lines of Sumerian poetry often show a loose rhythm of syllables or words, no strict meter has been detected. *Simile, *metaphor, wordplay, and *chiasmus are highly cultivated. Some genres, such as *laments, make extensive use of *refrains, *repetition, and simple replacive *parallelism. More complex parallelism is developed in *love poetry and epic narratives. *Assonance and *alliteration are rare but striking when they occur, as in magic spells, which also use *concatenation and *chain rhyme. Political and historical *allegory have been alleged but disputed.

Religious poetry includes *hymns of praise to deities and temples and laments. Frequently compared to mountains, temples are described as linking heaven and earth, their glory radiating throughout the land. Hymns to major deities, such as Enlil, Utu, Nanna, and Inanna, praise their transcendent powers, support of justice and order, beauty, and valor. Some of the earliest known religious hymns of praise were written cryptographically, but this practice disappeared thereafter. Laments over the destruction of cities and the land of Sumer range from 300 to 500 lines, divided into units called kirugus. These depict social disorder, violence, invasion, famine, and destruction, followed by restoration at the command of the gods. Although they contain historical references, their lang. tends to be stereotypical. Ritual laments to appease the anger of the gods are known as late as the Hellenistic period. They were performed in a special Sumerian dialect called "thin," characterized by major phonetic changes (e.g., zeb for dug, sweet).

Mythological narratives relate the deeds of deities, among them creation stories and etiologies. They include a group about the hero-god Ninurta, in one of which he defeats a volcano and assigns destiny to stones; a group about the chief god on earth, Enlil, and his sanctuary at Nippur; a group about Enki, god of wisdom, in one of which he organizes the world; and a group about Inanna, goddess of love and procreation.

Court poetry includes epic tales of kings of the remote past, praises of living kings, and *poetic contests. Four epics celebrate the victories of two legendary kings of Uruk—Enmerkar and Lugalbanda—over the lord of the city of Aratta in Iran. These trials of valor, rhet., and ingenuity provide vehicles for fanciful and entertaining narratives. A cycle of poems about the hero-king Gilgamesh includes episodes incorporated into the later Mesopotamian Epic of Gilgamesh, such as an expedition to cut cedar trees and a battle with the bull of heaven; but others not in the later epic, notably the death and burial of Gilgamesh, in the later epic are transformed into the death and burial of Gilgamesh's companion Enkidu.

Hymns in praise of kings of the dynasty of Ur (late 3d millennium BCE), in the case of Shulgi redolent of a personality cult, praise their bravery, athleticism, musical and linguistic skills, and other courtly attainments, and in some cases refer to important events of their reigns. These were imitated in the successor state of Isin, the best known focusing on the king's role in the hieros gamos, or ritual wedding with a goddess, but disappear thereafter.

Poetic contests pit against each other elements of Sumerian civilization, such as sheep and grain; tools, such as plow and pickaxe; seasons, such as summer and winter; animals, such as bird and fish; and materials, such as silver and gold and tree and reed, disputing their relative usefulness to the human race. At the end, a winner is declared. Like the court epics, these are witty, elegant, and amusing, but they offer penetrating analyses of Sumerian culture. Other poetic dialogues include literary abuse and school debates between masters and students.

More than 25 love songs deal with the courtship and marriage of the deities Inanna and Dumuzi (Tammuz), portrayed as young lovers. These too have been associated with the hieros gamos. Related to these are mythological narratives dealing with Dumuzi's death, such as Dumuzi's Dream and The Descent of Inanna to the Netherworld, and laments about Dumuzi's death.

Miscellaneous Sumerian poetry includes short drinking, work, and love songs; *elegies; and even a royal lullaby.

Much Sumerian poetry was copied and composed in an Akkadian-speaking environment (see ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, POETRY OF) and some was transmitted in bilingual versions, but mutual literary influences have not yet been explored in depth.

The native term sher (song) comes closest to the mod. term poetry. There is no word for "poet" but only for performers of poetry (nar, singer; gala, singer of ritual laments). There are no native treatises or remarks on poetics. Most Sumerian poetry is anonymous, with the major exception of a group of compositions ascribed in antiquity and mod. times to Enheduanna, daughter of King Sargon of Akkad (ca. 2300 BCE). These are noteworthy for their original style and subject matter, difficult diction, autobiographical content, remarks on the creative process, and intense feeling, so invite consideration as the first identifiable oeuvre of an individual poet in world lit.

■ Anthologies: The Harps That Once, trans. T. Jacobsen (1987); The Literature of Ancient Sumer, trans. J. Black (2009); Love Songs in Sumerian Literature, ed. Y. Sefati (1998).

■ Criticism: C. Wilcke, "Formale Gesichtspunkte," Assyriological Studies 20 (1976); W. Heimpel, "Mythologie" [in Eng.], Reallexikon der Assyriologie (1993, 1997); A. Zgoll, Rechtsfall der En-hedu-Ana (1997); G. Rubio, "Sumerian Literature," From an Antique Land, ed. C. Ehrlich (2009).

B. Foster

SURREALISM

I. Overview
II. Definitions
III. History

I. Overview. One of the principal experimental movements of the 20th c., surrealism grew from a Paris-based group of young poets and artists to a broadly international intellectual phenomenon, gaining adherents and fellow travelers throughout the world from the 1920s through the late 1960s. The word surrealism designates two major poetic inclinations. It refers, first, to the active, organized network of friends and collaborators who contributed to surrealist periodicals, met regularly in cafés, and signed the group's political tracts. At the same time, surrealism also signifies a more general tendency in poetry, plastic arts, and thought associated with experimental techniques such as automatic writing, *collage, the game of "exquisite corpse," and the analysis of dreams.

For André Breton (1896–1966), a leading poet and principal theorist of the movement, the distinction between a committed surrealist practice and a generalized surrealism hinged less on the use of formal techniques than on a commitment to fusing the group's poetic ambitions with a liberatory political imperative. As Breton put it in a 1934 speech, "What Is Surrealism," the movement evolved according to an unceasing aversion to belles lettres, a wish "at all costs to avoid considering a system of thought as a refuge." Surrealism pursued instead a wide-ranging set of investigations that contributed to the intellectual as well as literary life of the 20th c. Pioneering the Fr. reception of G.W.F. Hegel and Sigmund Freud after World War I, surrealism was instrumental to mod. devels. in psychoanalysis, philosophy, and aesthetics. Surrealist poets and artists likewise participated in contemp. thinking about gender and subjectivity, as well as in the fields of ethnography and political philosophy. In spite of its predominantly Fr. origins, active surrealist groups developed—and, in some cases, continue to exist today—throughout Eastern and Western Europe, Latin America, the Caribbean, and North Africa, as well as in the U.S. and Japan. Moreover, as a major intellectual movement between and after the world wars, surrealism offered both an influence and a target for later experimental groups, incl. Negritude, existentialism, lettrisme, Oulipo, Fluxus, situationism, magical realism, the theorists of Tel Quel, and, more broadly, the feminist and anticolonial movements of the post-World War II era.

This broad yet heterodox set of resonances owes much to the availability of surrealism as a freestanding set of creative activities beyond the organized movement. Surrealism's hist. is rife with debates about the consequences of abstracting its poetic devices and creative processes from the group's political imperatives. All the same, a large number of so-called excommunicated, marginal, and dissident figures claimed to practice no less viable forms of surrealism. Other poets and artists have engaged with surrealism more obliquely, based on their interest in surrealist poets or techniques or their pursuit of the movement at a geographical or historical remove.

II. Definitions. In the words of literary critic Chénieux-Gendron, surrealism presents itself less as a concept or literary-historical school than as "a machine for integration." Refusing the divisions on which Enlightenment reason is founded—between *genius and hack, art and nonart, private experience and public politics, truth and falsehood—surrealism sought to mingle imagination, expression, and desire in ways that involved all the institutions and social forms that affected mod. life.

Breton, in his first Manifeste du surréalisme (Manifesto of Surrealism, 1924), gave two provisional definitions of surrealism: the first describes a creative process, the second a philosophy of mind. Both announced a fundamental break with existing modes of communication and the conventional manner in which one perceives and accepts the exterior world. The first definition promotes the practice of "psychic automatism," the work of disclosing repressed activities of the mind through oral, written ("automatic writing"), or other means. The second definition, called "encyclopedic" by Breton, expands on the first; it describes the epistemological and social effects of the "actual functioning of thought" outlined in the first definition. According to Breton, surrealism forges an alternative network of signs and meanings capable of replacing the existing systems we take for granted; it proposes the "superior reality" of discomfiting associations, powerful dream states, sexual desire, and the disinterested play of thought.

Throughout the movement's hist., the surrealists developed numerous experimental artistic and critical strategies. In addition to automatic writing, surrealist practices included the creation of collage poems and multimedia poèmes-objets; the exploration of cities according to the dictates of chance; the collection of found objects ("readymades" and trouvailles) and *found poetry; the simulation of hysterical and psychotic states; and collaborative poetic exercises such as the "exquisite corpse" game, in which hybrid phrases or images are composed by participants unaware of what the other contributions look like. More than the sum of its poetic devices, surrealism describes the project of using these and other techniques toward a renewal of the *imagination and an application "to the principal problems of life." Poetry in this context becomes a means and not an end: "Lyricism is the development of a protest," declared Breton and his colleague Paul Éluard (1895–1952) in Notes sur la poésie (1936).

III. History. Surrealism began in the same manner as it persisted for more than 50 years: through a series of encounters and upheavals that first took place in the aftermath of World War I. The young Fr. poets Breton and Louis Aragon (1897–1982), who both trained as medical students during the war, met Philippe Soupault (1897–1990), himself a war veteran, through Guillaume Apollinaire (1880–1918). After publishing early poems in avant-garde jours., they founded their own jour., Littérature, in 1919. This ironically titled periodical, whose early issues featured poems by Paul Valéry, André Gide, Pierre Réverdy, Léon-Paul Fargue, Max Jacob, and other older modernists, along with unpublished texts by Stéphane Mallarmé, Apollinaire, and Arthur Rimbaud, soon became the flagship jour. for the Parisian incarnation of *Dada. With the arrival of Tristan Tzara (1896–1963) from Zurich in 1919, Parisian Dada became the gathering place for a contentious group of young poets galvanized by their contempt for France's postwar efforts to return to bourgeois normality and in particular for the resurgence of nationalism and xenophobia in Europe.

Over the next several years, the Paris Dada group expanded to include the poets Éluard, Benjamin Péret (1899–1959), and Robert Desnos (1900–45), as well as the artists Max Ernst, Joan Miró, Man Ray, and Francis Picabia. After collaborating on the first extended work of automatic writing, Les Champs Magnétiques (The Magnetic Fields, 1919), Breton and Soupault assumed editorial control of Littérature, which became increasingly attentive to literary hist. The jour., which launched a "new series" in 1922, fused its Dada iconoclasm with surveys about the group's literary preferences. As their ranks expanded, the group began to scandalize canonical Fr. cultural figures, while championing an alternative genealogy of literary precursors excluded from official Fr. culture. This latter group included—along with the largely Germanic Dada movement itself—Ger. romantics such as Novalis, Gérard de Nerval, Achim von Arnim, and Hegel, as well as Freudian psychoanalysis; the ideologically unsettling work of the Marquis de Sade; and symbolist poets such as Charles Baudelaire, Germain Nouveau, and Rimbaud. Of particular significance to the young protosurrealists was the virtually unknown Comte de Lautréamont (pseud. of Isidore Ducasse, 1846–70), whose elaborate *metaphors would deeply inform surrealist poetics, most notably the line from Les Chants de Maldoror (1869), "as beautiful as the chance encounter of an umbrella and a sewing machine on a dissecting table."

This increased historical self-consciousness had much to do with the protosurrealist group's break with Dada and its subsequent emergence, in 1924, as the surrealist movement. The genealogy of visionary and subversive figures assembled by the Littérature group would form the conceptual basis for surrealist thinking and the common ground for subsequent articulations of surrealist poetics. These "precursors" were notable for the extent to which they reoriented the arts from the aesthetic to the epistemological, replacing the contemplation of beauty with an investigation into "the marvelous," defined by Aragon in 1924 as "the contradiction that reveals itself within the real."

Apollinaire himself had used the word surréaliste to qualify his satirical play Les Mamelles de Tirésias (The Breasts of Tirésias), first staged in 1917. In separating themselves rhetorically and ideologically from Dada, the surrealist group appropriated the term for the masthead of its flagship jour. La Révolution surréaliste (1924–29) and redefined it in texts such as Breton's *manifesto and Aragon's "Une Vague de rêves" (A Wave of Dreams, 1924). The surrealist coalition thus formed consisted of both poets and artists incl., along with Breton, Soupault, and others, the writers Antonin Artaud, René Crevel, Michel Leiris, Raymond Queneau, Roger Vitrac, and eventually a rehabilitated Tzara. A number of artists joined forces with them—incl. Ernst, Miró, Salvador Dalí, Luis Buñuel, Yves Tanguy, and André Masson—along with a largely autonomous group of Belgian surrealists that included René Magritte, E.L.T. Mesens, and Paul Nougé. Under the leadership of Breton, there emerged a laboratory atmosphere probing lang., human relationships, objects, and sites in the contexts of psychoanalysis, ling., ethnography, alchemy, and the laws of probability. Much of the theoretical writing, poetry, accounts of experiments, and surrealist games appeared in the series of jours. that began with La Révolution Surréaliste and continued with Le Surréalisme au service de la Révolution (1930–33) and Minotaure (1933–39), as well as later jours. around the world, incl. The London Bulletin (1938–40), Tropiques (1941–45), VVV (1942–44), NEON (1948–49), Médium (1953–55), Les Lèvres nues (1954–58), and Le Surréalisme, meme (1955–57), among others.

In 1924, the surrealist group marked the death of the novelist Anatole France with a defamatory pamphlet "A Corpse," which brought them into contact with a group of young Marxist intellectuals from the jour. Clarté who had similarly expressed their critique of jingoistic Fr. tributes to the late novelist. The ensuing collaboration would lead to a foray into organized leftist politics, stemming from the combined group's protest against Fr. colonial activity in Morocco during the Rif War (1920–26). Their increasing political involvement led to numerous disagreements and exclusions, which have often characterized accounts of this period. From 1925 through 1939, the surrealists would continually struggle to maintain their political thrust in the face of an increasingly orthodox Communist Party, as well as a gradual rightward turn in Fr. culture during the 1930s. During this period, the surrealists sought to uphold not only the subversive quality of their work but the imperative for an experimental poetics of the revolutionary Left as well. Resisting the enshrinement of socialist realism as Stalinism's official revolutionary style, the surrealists advocated for a fundamental upheaval in human consciousness that drew as much from collective poetic activity, psychoanalysis, and the unruliness of sexual desire as from Communist militancy. A second generation of active surrealists included René Char (1907–88), Aimé Césaire (1913–2008), Jules Monnerot (1909–95), A. Pieyre de Mandriargues (1909–91), Lise Deharme (1898–1980), Jehan Mayoux (1904–75), Gisèle Prassinos (b. 1920), Georges Hugnet (1906–74), Vítězslav Nezval (1900–58); and the artists Hans Bellmer, Claude Cahun, Leonora Carrington, Jindřich Štyrský, Toyen, Meret Oppenheim, and Victor Brauner.

During the 1930s and 1940s, surrealist groups emerged in other cities threatened by fascism—particularly Prague, Bucharest, Tokyo, and London. As the Nazi occupation of France forced the Parisian surrealists to disperse, the older surrealists also extended their internationalism, with Breton and others visiting and working with intellectuals in Martinique, Haiti, Mexico, Quebec, and New York. After the war, Breton's return to Paris and a major international surrealist exhibition in 1947 marked a renewal of the movement's activity in France, while incurring increasing pressure from younger intellectual movements on the Left, such as existentialism. The Breton-centered group would continue its activities with an anti-Stalinist and anticolonial emphasis, becoming particularly active in its support of Algerian independence in the 1950s. Later incarnations of the movement emphasized unconventional modes of political leftism based on ideas of collectivity derived from thinkers other than Karl Marx, such as Charles Fourier, as well as from a revised genealogy of indigenous and hermetic "precursors" from around the world. After Breton's death in 1966, the Parisian movement continued for three years before officially disbanding in 1969, though some participants contested this decision.

Alternative modes of surrealist activity continue to permeate the arts throughout Europe and Latin America, particularly in countries previously under authoritarian regimes. With a particular focus on anticolonial struggle and independence movements, the various incarnations of surrealism have remained committed to a political poetics: as Breton famously put it, "Beauty will be convulsive or it will not be." Figures in the broader surrealist diaspora include the Latin and South Am. poets César Moro (1903–56), Octavio Paz (1914–98), Aldo Pellegrini (1903–73), Braulio Arenas (1913–88), Enrique Molina (1910–97), and Enrique Gomez-Correa (1915–95); the Franco-Egyptian poets Joyce Mansour (1928–86) and Georges Henein (1914–73); the Romanian poets Gherasim Luca (1913–94), Paul Celan (1920–70), and Gellu Naum (1915–2001); the U.S. writers Franklin Rosemont (1943–2009), Penelope Rosemont (b. 1942), Mary Low (1912–2007), and Ted Joans (1928–2003); the Fr. writers José Pierre (1927–99), Jean Schuster (1929–95), Nora Mitrani (1921–61), Gerard Legrand (1927–99), and Julien Gracq (1910–2007); and artists such as Alexander Calder, Arshile Gorky, Matta, Wifredo Lam, Dorothea Tanning, Remedios Varo, Mimi Parent, Nelly Kaplan, Maya Deren, and Jan Švankmajer.

Since 1965, there has been extensive research on surrealism, particularly in France, the U.K., and the U.S. Much scholarly documentation has been collected in archives such as the Bibliothèque Littéraire Jacques Doucet in Paris and at research forums such as the Centre de Recherche sur le Surréalisme, and disseminated in its jour. Mélusine. In the U.S., major holdings include the collections at the Museum of Modern Art, the Philadelphia Museum of Fine Art, the Getty Research Institute, the Menil Collection, and the Harry Ransom Center, as well as at the Universities of Iowa and Michigan.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; FRANCE, POETRY OF; MODERNISM.

■ M. Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933); D. Gascogne, A Short Survey of Surréalisme (1935); G. Lemaître, From Cubism to Surrealism in French Literature (1941); M. Nadeau, Histoire du surréalisme (1945); and Documents surréalistes (1946); A. Balakian, Literary Origins of Surrealism (1947); J. Gracq, André Breton (1948); C. Mauriac, André Breton (1949); A. Bosquet, Surréalismus (1950); W. Fowlie, Age of Surrealism (1950); A. Kyrou, Le Surréalisme au cinéma (1952); J. Hardré, "Present State of Studies on Literary Surrealism," Yearbook of Comparative and General Literature 9 (1960); F. Alquié, The Philosophy of Surrealism, trans. B. Waldrop (1965); J. H. Matthews, Introduction to Surrealism (1965); R. Short, "The Politics of Surrealism," The Left-Wing Intellectuals between the Wars, 1919–1939, ed. W. Laqueur and G. Mosse (1966); R. Champigny, Pour une esthétique de l'essai: "Une Définition du Surréalisme" (1967); P. Ilie, The Surrealist Mode in Spanish Literature (1968); M. A. Caws, The Poetry of Dada and Surrealism (1970), and André Breton (1971); A. Balakian, André Breton (1971); X. Gauthier, Surréalisme et sexualité (1971); J. H. Matthews, Surrealism and Film (1971); P. Ray, The Surrealist Movement in England (1971); S. Alexandrian, Le Surrealisme et le rêve (1974); M. Carrouges, André Breton and the Basic Concepts of Surrealism, trans. M. Prendergast (1974); H. Gershman, The Surrealist Revolution in France (1974); The Poetry of Surrealism, ed. M. Benedikt (1974); M. Riffaterre, "Semantic Incompatibilities in Automatic Writing," About French Poetry, ed. M. A. Caws (1974); L. Binni, Il movimiento surrealista (1975); M. Bonnet, André Breton: Naissance de l'aventure surréaliste (1975); J. H. Matthews, The Custom-House of Desire (1975); G. Legrand, Breton en son temps (1976); J. H. Matthews, Toward the Poetics of Surrealism (1976); M. Bonnet, Le Surréalisme dans le texte (1978); A. Breton, What Is Surrealism? ed. F. Rosemont (1978); G. Legrand, Breton (1978); P. Hammond, The Shadow and Its Shadow (1978); H. Finkelstein, Surrealism and the Crisis of the Object (1979); The Autobiography of Surrealism, ed. M. Jean (1980); Tracts surréalistes et déclarations collectives (1922–1969), ed. J. Pierre (1980); M. A. Caws, A Metapoetics of the Passage (1981); M. Fauré, Histoire du surréalisme sous l'occupation (1982); J. H. Matthews, Surrealism, Insanity, and Poetry (1982); J. Chénieux-Gendron, Le Roman surréaliste (1983); D. Desanti, Les Clés d'Elsa (1983); M. Foucault, This Is Not a Pipe, ed. and trans. J. Harkness (1983); J. Pierre, Surréalisme et l'anarchie (1983);

A. Balakian, Surrealism: The Road to the Absolute (1986); J. H. Matthews, Languages of Surrealism (1986); R. Riese, Surrealism and the Book (1987); H. Lewis, The Politics of Surrealism (1988); André Breton Today, ed. A. Balakian and R. Kuenzli (1989); J. Chénieux-Gendron, Surrealism, trans. V. Folkenflik (1990); S. Suleiman, Subversive Intent (1991); G. Bataille, The Absence of Myth, ed. and trans. M. Richardson (1994); K. Conley, Automatic Woman (1996); Refusal of the Shadow, ed. and trans M. Richardson and K. Fijalkowski (1996); M. A. Caws, The Surrealist Look (1997); E. Adamowicz, Surrealist Collage in Text and Image (1998); C. Reynaud-Paligot, Parcours politique des surréalists (1919–1969) (1998); Surrealist Women, ed. P. Rosemont (1998); Surrealism against the Current, ed. and trans. M. Richardson and K. Fijalkowski (2001); R. Vaneigem, A Cavalier History of Surrealism, trans. D. Nicholson-Smith (2001); G. Durozoi, History of the Surrealist Movement, trans. A. Anderson (2002); S. Harris, Surrealist Art and Thought in the 1930s (2004); M. A. Caws, Surrealism (2006); Undercover Surrealism, ed. D. Ades and S. Baker (2006); Surréalisme et politique-Politique du surréalisme, ed. W. Asholt and H. Siepe (2007); J. Eburne, Surrealism and the Art of Crime (2008); Black, Brown & Beige, ed. F. Rosemont and R. Kelley (2009); E.-A. Hubert, Circonstances de la poésie (2009); M. Sanouillet, Dada in Paris, rev. and enl. A. Sanouillet, trans. S. Ganguly (2009).

J. P. Eburne

SWAHILI POETRY

I. Swahili Prosody
II. History of Swahili Poetry

Swahili lit. occupies a distinctive place among lits. in Af. langs., having a trad. that dates to the 18th or even the 17th c. All the old mss., written in Ar. script, were of poetic texts, composed predominantly in the dialects of the islands of Pate (Kipate) and Lamu (Kiamu), and from the 19th c. onward also in the dialect of Mombasa (Kimvita); mss. in prose appear only in the 19th c. (chronicles of the coastal Swahili towns).

I. Swahili Prosody. Most Swahili poetry is metrical and meant to be sung or chanted. Swahili prosody is based on counting syllables (sing. and pl. mizani) and involves a monosyllabic rhyme (kina, pl. vina) at the end of metrical units. The shortest independent metrical unit is called kipande (pl. vipande), of three, four, five, six, or eight mizani. The arrangement of vipande in a stanza (ubeti, pl. beti) characterizes the individual poetic forms. Vipande are written down in lines (mstari, pl. mistari, or mshororo, pl. mishororo).

The most common poetic forms are utenzi and shairi. Utenzi (or utendi, pl. tenzi/tendi) is the form used for long epic descriptions (tenzi frequently have hundreds, even thousands of stanzas), but also for religious instruction. It has four vipande per stanza, and each kipande has eight (rarely six) mizani. The three first vipande rhyme with one another, and the last kipande has a rhyme that goes throughout the entire poem (aaax).

Shairi (pl. mashairi) is a form used for witty elaborations of moral and philosophical concepts. Typically, it has four lines with two eight-syllable vipande per line. The first vipande of the first three lines rhyme, as do the second vipande of these lines. The last line may only consist of one kipande, rhyming with the last vipande of the first lines, or a second kipande rhyming with the first vipande of the first lines (ab/ab/ab/ba); sometimes this last kipande does not rhyme with anything, or it has a rhyme going through the whole poem (ab/ab/ab/bx). The last line may also be the same in every stanza in the shairi, making a *refrain (ab/ab/ab/xy).

Other forms include wimbo (three 12-syllable lines per stanza), kisarambe (four 11-syllable lines per stanza), or ukawafi (two, four, or five 15-syllable lines per stanza).

II. History of Swahili Poetry. The dating of Swahili mss. or the compositions themselves is often controversial. It relies on available historical sources (e.g., information known about the events or the poets), coupled with a relative chronology based on ling. criteria. Although some of the poems include a poetic colophon—the last stanza or stanzas naming the poet and the year of composition—it does not always provide reliable information to date the ms. The dates may contain unclear words or illegible figures and, depending on the interpretation of these, the dating can differ by as much as a century.

Ancient Swahili compositions were mostly religious in content, such as qaṣīda* (praise poems to the Prophet Muhammad and his family) and maghazi (descriptions of fights between the early Muslims and their enemies). A famous example of the former is Hamziya (literally, "a poem rhyming in [the Ar. character of] hamza"; the Swahili poem is a trans. from the Ar.; in Swahili, the poem rhymes in -ma), composed by Sayyid Aidarus bin Athman. The ms. is dated by Knappert (1968) to 1062 AH (1651/52 CE), but Hichens (1934) dates it to 1162 AH (1748/49 CE), a discrepancy derived from different readings of one word in the colophon. The poem, an ukawafi in two-line stanzas, describes the extraordinary qualities of the Prophet Muhammad. An example of early maghazi lit. is Utendi wa Tambuka (Utenzi of [the battle of] Tabuk), also called Chuo cha Herkali (Book of Herakleios), by Mwengo bin Athuman. It is dated to 1141 AH (1728/29 CE) by Knappert (1979), but 1241 AH (1825/26 CE) by Zhukov. This utenzi describes the miraculous victory of Muslims led by Muhammad over the army of the Byzantine emperor Herakleios.

A secular trad. in old Swahili poetry is represented by the half-legendary hero Fumo Liyongo. While the lifetime of the warrior and poet is disputed, the dates suggested by researchers range from the 9th c. (Ahmed Nabhany, Joseph Mbele, cited in Mulokozi 1999) to the 1700s (Neville Chittick, cited in Knappert 1983). Fumo Liyongo is the possible author of the ancient Takhmis ya Liyongo, a praise poem to himself. The composition is usually attributed to Sayyid Abdallah bin Ali bin Nasir, who lived in Pate sometime between 1720 and 1820 and who is also the author of the renowned Al-Inkishafi (see below), but convincing arguments have been presented by Carl Meinhof that the poem may have double authorship: the last two lines of this five-line ukawafi appear to be more ancient (the lang. is older and contains fewer Arabisms, and the imagery is more vivid), and the first three lines may have been added by a later poet.

The early 19th c. produced some of the most remarkable compositions in Swahili. Al-Inkishafi (literally "it is revealed," also translated as "the soul's awakening" or "self-examination") describes the fall of the once powerful and rich Pate sultanate. Built on the commonplaces of the vanity of earthly delights and the illusory nature of worldly fame and riches and presenting plastic descriptions of downfall and decay, the poem admonishes the soul to turn to religion, the way to avoid the punishment for sins in hell and a source of true happiness.

The secular trad. continues in the poems of the Mombasan poet Muyaka bin Haji bin Ghassaniy (ca. 1776–1840) and his contemporaries in Lamu, who employed the shairi form in dialogic political poetry. Muyaka's poems are characterized by great wit and ingenious use of lang., typically playing with the many meanings of homonymous words.

A famous composition from the second half of the 19th c. is Utendi wa Mwana Kupona, composed by Mwana Kupona binti Mshamu (ca. 1810–1860) in 1858 for her 17-year-old daughter. Within the framework of Islam, the poet tells her child how a Swahili woman is expected to behave in society and in the domestic sphere, how to treat her husband, how to keep herself and her home clean and appealing for the husband, and how to observe religious duties.

The period of the early colonization of the Swahili territory by the Brit. and the Germans (ca. 1890–1930) has produced a vast historiographic lit., mostly in utenzi or shairi form. The most notable poets of this era came from the family of poets from Tanga, el Buhriy. In 1930, the Inter-Territorial Language Committee of the East African Dependencies decided the standard form of Swahili (Kiswahili Sanifu), based on the dialect of Zanzibar Town (Kiunguja). Among the ardent devotees of Standard Swahili was Shaaban Robert (1909–62), who introduced new genres (such as the novel) and topics into Swahili lit. while remaining true to the existing trad. of Swahili poetry in form and spirit.

In the first decades after independence, poetry developed in different ways in Tanzania and Kenya. Kenyan poets, who mostly originated from the coastal area, often rejected Standard Swahili and continued writing in their native dialects (Kimvita, Kiamu, etc.). The most prominent among them are the Mombasan half-brothers Ahmad Nassir Juma Bhalo (b. 1936), the prolific author of several poetry collections and innumerable lyrics for taarab songs, and Abdilatif Abdalla (b. 1946), who became famous for poetry he wrote during his imprisonment for opposing the Kenyatta regime (1969–72), Sauti ya Dhiki (The Voice of Agony, 1973).

Tanzanian poetry after independence was much less traditionalist, possibly because of revolutionary spirit of the policy of ujamaa (Tanzanian socialism). Standard Swahili, used in all areas of life, became the medium of expression of many authors whose ethnic background was not Swahili. Poetry was often used for the propagation of ujamaa. Mathias Mnyampala revived a type of dialogic poetry called ngonjera and employed it for political education of the masses. A true revolution in Swahili poetry took place at the University of Dar es Salaam in the late 1960s and early 1970s. A group of students rejected the traditional prosodic rules and started writing poetry in *free verse, inspired both by oral poetry in their native langs. and by Eng. poetry. Euphrase Kezilahabi (b. 1944), one of the best Swahili novelists, is the author of three collections: Kichomi (Sharp Pain, 1974), Karibu ndani (Welcome Inside, 1988), and Dhifa (Banquet, 2008). As in his novels, Kezilahabi uses a simple, everyday lang. in his poems to elaborate highly complex philosophical topics.

Since the 1990s, the literary devels. of Tanzania and Kenya have converged, with Kenya gradually gaining the upper hand in publishing and on the book market. In both countries, metrical poetry continues to be highly popular (daily newspapers have a poetry page with circumstantial commentaries in verse). A number of young poets are convinced "traditionalists," producing poetry that is metrical in form and conservative in tone, such as the poet and novelist Omar Babu (b. 1967). On the other hand, many authors do not feel obliged to subscribe to either metrical or free-verse poetry and write in both ways or in a mixture of styles. This is the case of the nestor of Swahili lit., Said Ahmed Mohamed (b. 1947) from Zanzibar, and the versatile Kenyan poet, novelist, and literary theorist Kyallo Wadi Wamitila (b. 1965).

■ Anthologies: "Das Lied des Liongo" (Liongo's Song), ed. and trans. C. Meinhof, Zeitschrift für Eingeborenen-Sprachen 15 (1924–25); The Advice of Mwana Kupona upon the Wifely Duty, ed. and trans. A. Werner and W. Hichens (1934); Al-Inkishafi: The Soul's Awakening, ed. and trans. W. Hichens (1939); Swahili Poetry, ed. and trans. L. Harries (1962); Poems from Kenya: Gnomic Verses in Swahili by Ahmad Nassir bin Juma Bhalo, ed. and trans. L. Harries (1966); Traditional Swahili Poetry, ed. and trans. J. Knappert (1967); "The Hamziya Deciphered," ed. and trans. J. Knappert, African Language Studies 9 (1968); Swahili Islamic Poetry, ed. and trans. J. Knappert, 3 v. (1971); Tendi, ed. and trans. J.W.T. Allen (1971); Al-Inkishafi: Catechism of a Soul, ed. and trans. J. de V. Allen (1977); Muyaka: Nineteenth-Century Swahili Popular Poetry, ed. and trans. M. H. Abdulaziz (1979); Four Centuries of Swahili Verse, ed. and trans. J. Knappert (1979); Epic Poetry in Swahili and Other African Languages, ed. and trans. J. Knappert (1983); Tenzi Tatu za Kale (Fumo Liyongo, Al-Inkishafi, Mwanakupona) (Three Ancient Tenzi; Fumo Liyongo, Al-Inkishafi, Mwanakupona), ed. M. M. Mulokozi (1999); Kala Shairi: German

East Africa in Swahili Poems, ed. and trans. G. Miehe, K. Bromber, S. Khamis, R. Grosserhode (2002); Liyongo Songs: Poems Attributed to Fumo Liyongo, ed. and trans. G. Miehe et al. (2004).

■ Criticism and History: F. Topan, "Modern Swahili Poetry," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 37 (1974); G. Miehe, "Die Perioden der Swahililiteratur und ihre sprachliche Form," Paideuma 36 (1990); A. A. Zhukov, "The Dating of Old Swahili Manuscripts: Towards Swahili Paleography," Swahili Language and Society. Notes and News 9 (1992); M. M. Mulokozi and T.S.Y. Sengo, History of Kiswahili Poetry (AD 1000–2000) (1995); A. Biersteker, Kujibizana: Questions of Language and Power in Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century Poetry in Kiswahili (1996).

■ Swahili Prosody: K. A. Abedi, Sheria za Kutunga Mashairi na Diwani ya Amri (Rules of Composing Poetry and Amri's Collection, 1954); J. Knappert, "Swahili Metre," African Language Studies 12 (1971); I. N. Shariff, Tungo Zetu (Our Compositions, 1988).

A. Rettová

SWEDEN, POETRY OF. While runic inscriptions show the existence of a lost heroic poetry, the oldest preserved poems in Sweden date from the beginning of the 14th c., in the form of trans. of three Fr. verse novels. The anonymous versified chronicle Erikskrönikan was written a few decades later. The many folk *ballads are a significant feature of the poetry of the Swedish Middle Ages. They exist only in late records from the end of the 16th c. and onward. Most likely, the majority of them were created in the 14th and 15th cs. and then transmitted orally until they were written down.

All the ballads are anonymous. With a few exceptions, it is not until the 17th c. that we find poets identified, most important, Georg Stiernhielm (1598–1672). His Hercules (1658) is a long allegorical and didactic poem written in *hexameters where the *quantity of cl. poetry was replaced by accentuation. Ascending rhythm, however, soon became the rule, and the most common verse form is the *alexandrine. This is the case both in the pseudonymous Skogekär Bergbo's collection of *sonnets (1680) and in Gunno Dahlstierna's (1661–1709) long poem in *ottava rima written for the funeral of King Karl XI. More appreciated by mod. readers are the poems of Lars Wivallius (1605–69), Lars Johansson Lucidor (1638–74), and Johan Runius (1679–1713).

In the 18th c., the strong Ger. influence on Swedish poetry was replaced by Fr. and, later, Eng. models. Olof von Dalin (1708–63) was most important as a prose writer, but he also developed most genres of poetry. His writing was a step away from the *baroque style of the previous century and a step closer to Fr. neoclassicists like Nicolas Boileau and Voltaire.

An even more crucial contribution was made around 1760, when Hedvig Charlotta Nordenflycht (1718–63), Gustaf Fredrik Gyllenborg (1731–1808), and Gustaf Philip Creutz (1731–85) published their best poems. Nordenflycht stood out as early as the 1740s as a pioneer for a subjective, emotional poetry, which has been compared to Eng. *preromanticism, and Creutz is the author of a minor classic, the long *pastoral poem Atis och Camilla (1761).

The breakthrough of Fr. neoclassical taste came during the reign of Gustav III (1771–92), a time that saw a great rise in cultural life. In 1786, the Swedish Academy was established, and over the following hundred years, the academy would influence literary life in various ways. The most important author and critic during this period was Johan Henrik Kellgren (1751–95), who wrote both satires in Voltaire's spirit and lyrical poems influenced by Eng. and Ger. preromantics. The leading Swedish preromantics, however, were Thomas Thorild (1759–1808) and Bengt Lidner (1757–93), while Fr. neoclassicism was represented by Johan Gabriel Oxenstierna (1750–1818) and Carl Gustaf Leopold (1756–1829). Anna-Maria Lenngren's (1754–1817) witty satires, written in a simple, informal style and with a keen eye for realistic details, still have their dedicated readers.

The most important Swedish poet of the 18th c. is Carl Michael Bellman (1740–95). His poetry is deeply original but indebted nonetheless to the songs of Lucidor, Runius, and Dalin. Most of his poems are songs, which is one explanation for their enormous success. Fredmans epistlar (Fredman's Epistles, 1790), published with an enthusiastic foreword by Kellgren, is regarded by many as the most important of all Swedish poetry collections. Fredman is an apostle of Bacchus, and the songs are letters to his faithful group of followers, worshipers of the gods of wine and love.

The poetry collection most read in the 18th and 19th c. was the hymnbook, legalized by the state and the Lutheran Church. The ed. of 1695, where the most important poets were Jesper Svedberg (1653–1735) and Haquin Spegel (1645–1714), was used until 1819, when a new edition was published, in which Johan Olof Wallin (1779–1839) and Frans Michael Franzén (1772–1847) made the greatest contributions.

In the 1810s and 1820s, Swedish poetry moved toward *romanticism. The Fr. influence became weaker, and the models now were Eng. and Ger. Fr. Enlightenment ideas made room for Ger. romanticism and philosophical idealism. Med. material—mainly from ON—was often used. The interest in the Vikings had its center in Götiska Förbundet (The Gothic Society), whose leading poet was Erik Gustaf Geijer (1783–1847).

The greatest poet of the period was Esaias Tegnér (1782–1846). His poems connect to Ger. neoclassicism in both form and ideas. Tegnér is the author of some of the greatest occasional poems in Swedish lit. but also of subjective lyrical poems. His best-known work is Frithiofs saga (1824), a formally brilliant cycle of 24 romances in different meters, with a story based on an Old Icelandic saga. This work with its synthesis of cl., ON, and romantic motifs and forms became the foremost Swedish poetic classic for the following hundred years.

The central figure in Swedish romanticism, both as a poet and a critic, was Per Daniel Amadeus Atterbom (1790–1855). Several of his shorter poems have worn well, but his largest poetical work Lycksalighetens ö (The Isle of Bliss, 1824–27), an extensive drama, formally and ideologically highly interesting, has not been much read by posterity. The case of Erik Johan Stagnelius (1793–1823) is quite different. He was little noticed by his contemporaries but has been more appreciated by succeeding generations. His formally perfect poems, cl. in form but romantic in motifs, are influenced by Neoplatonic ideas. Thematically, they often express the opposition between mysticism and erotic passion.

Tegnér's metaphor-laden, rhetorical style was infectious for his many imitators over the 19th c., and the reaction was not late in coming. Carl Jonas Love Almqvist's (1793–1866) poems Songes, written in the 1830s and 1840s, are distinguished by a simplicity free from both metaphors and rhetorical patterns, which must have been seen as a powerful deviation from Tegnér's poetry. And as early as 1830, Johan Ludvig Runeberg (1804–77) made his debut with a collection of poems that, with a simple style and few metaphors, also strongly contrasted to Tegnér's poetry. Runeberg lived in Finland but was hailed by many contemporaries as the greatest poet in the Swedish lang. He was a master both in lyric poetry and in narratives in hexameter, in which he portrays the life of the Finnish people. In other poems, he uses ancient Nordic and cl. motifs. The most important of his works is Fänrik Ståls sägner (The Tales of Ensign Stål, 1848), a series of poems portraying characters from the war with Russia (1808–9), in which Sweden lost Finland and thereby its position as a great political power. A second part of the tales was published in 1860.

Among the poets from the 1860s and 1870s, Carl Snoilsky (1841–1903) stands out with his formal virtuosity. His Svenska bilder (Swedish Pictures, 1894), a series of poems with motifs from Swedish hist., was for a long time a classic reader in Swedish schools. Viktor Rydberg (1828–95) continued the idealistic line from the romantics and from Tegnér. Many of his poems were written as early as the 1870s, but his two collections of poems were published relatively late, in 1882 and 1891.

The most important genres in the 1880s were the drama and the novel, with August Strindberg (1849–1912) as the main representative of both. He was, however, important as a poet as well. Dikter (Poems, 1883) and Sömngångarnätter på vakna dagar (Sleepwalking Nights on Wide-Awake Days, 1884) are both connected to Strindberg's general critique of society and to his programmatic anti-idealism. In Ordalek och småkonst (Word Play and Minor Art, 1905), which includes some of his best poems, Strindberg is not far from Fr. and Ger. *symbolism.

The poets from the end of the 19th c. who are closest to symbolism are Ola Hansson (1860–1926) and Oscar Levertin (1862–1906). Verner von Heidenstam (1859–1940) stood for a more romantic, national—if not provincial—direction. His mix of orientalism, decadence, the cult of beauty, and national activism were features typical of the end of the century, but they have led to a diminished interest in his poems by posterity. He is at his best in the short format. His last collection, Nya dikter (New Poems, 1915), is marked by simplicity and a strong expression.

Erik Axel Karlfeldt (1864–1931) and Gustaf Fröding (1860–1911) both derived motifs from their native provinces, Karlfeldt from Dalarna and Fröding from Värmland. Karlfeldt is formally masterful but impersonal in his poetry, whereas Fröding does not shy away from depicting his broodings and his loneliness in deeply personal poems. With Fröding's five collections of poems from the 1890s, traditional verse reaches its culmination in Swedish poetry. He is probably the most popular of all Swedish poets. Formally, he has never been surpassed. After him, Swedish poetry would be forced to find new ways.

A new direction was pointed out by Vilhelm Ekelund (1880–1949). In the first decade of the 20th c., he published seven collections of poems, in which he gradually approaches a *free verse without rhyme, mainly built on rhythm. The starting point is Fr. symbolism, but gradually patterns from antiquity and Ger. neoclassicism emerge. His poems became important both formally and thematically for a growing modernist poetry over the following decades.

The first attempts at *modernism came in the 1910s. In 1916, Pär Lagerkvist (1891–1974) published a collection of poems with a title typical of its time: Ångest (Anguish). In the same year, Edith Södergran (1892–1923) made her debut with a volume Dikter (Poems). Södergran belonged to the Swedish-speaking minority in Finland. She had studied in St. Petersburg and had read both Rus. and Ger. contemp. poetry. Her four collections of poems are among the highlights in Swedish 20th c. lit., and they constitute the prelude to Finland-Swedish modernism in the interwar period. During this time, Elmer Diktonius (1896–1961), Gunnar Björling (1887–1960), and Rabbe Enckell (1903–1974) would become leading names.

Both Södergran and Lagerkvist could be called expressionists (see EXPRESSIONISM). Birger Sjöberg (1885–1929) started his writing with very popular songs—Fridas bok (Frida's Book, 1922)—that he also performed. A few years later, he surprised his audience with the expressionistic Kriser och kransar (Crises and Wreaths, 1926), the most remarkable of all Swedish collections of poems in the 1920s. It would gradually gain great importance, esp. for poets during the 1940s and 1950s.

Bo Bergman (1869–1967), Anders Österling (1884–1981), and Hjalmar Gullberg (1898–1961) are more traditional. Gullberg was the most praised poet of the 1930s. He was a virtuoso with a simple, often ironic style of expression. In his last collections of poems from the 1950s, he approached modernism without ever neglecting formal demands. Johannes Edfelt (1904–97), who was close to Gullberg stylistically and thematically, positioned himself between traditional verse and modernism, as did Karin Boye (1900–41) and Nils Ferlin (1898–1961), who was one of the most original and also most popular poets of the period.

Three writers most prominently represented poetic modernism in the 1930s: Artur Lundkvist (1906–91), Harry Martinson (1904–78), and Gunnar Ekelöf (1907–68). For four decades, Lundkvist was the most influential Swede in introducing foreign modernist poetry, primarily as a critic but also as a translator. While Lundkvist's poems are expansive, a never-ending torrent of images, many of Martinson's best poems are highly compressed. He is a master of form, creating exquisite nature poems with precise observations of reality. But he is also a committed poet of ideas, strongly critical of mod. technical civilization. The various themes in his poetry join together in his most famous work, the space epic Aniara (1956), pub. at the beginning of the space age.

Ekelöf occupies the main position in Swedish 20th-c. poetry. In his two first collections of poetry (from 1932 and 1934), he introduces *surrealism—in style, in theme, and in the ideas presented. In Färjesång (Ferry Song, 1941), the influence of T. S. Eliot can be detected. These three collections of poetry would have considerable influence in the 1940s. Non serviam (I will not serve, 1945) and Om hösten (In Autumn, 1951) include several of Ekelöf's best-known poems. Strountes (Trifles, 1955) marked a new phase in his career, one that would have great significance for Swedish poetry in the 1960s. His three last collections of poems from 1965 to 1967 form a trilogy distinguished by formal simplicity, Byzantine motifs, and an attitude to life close to mysticism. Its intensity is unmatched in 20th-c. Swedish lit.

The real breakthrough for lyric modernism came in the 1940s. Erik Lindegren's (1910–68) mannen utan väg (the man without a way, 1942) is the most important collection of poems of that decade, both formally and thematically. More accessible are the poems in his two subsequent collections, Sviter (Suites, 1947) and Vinteroffer (Winter Rites, 1954).

While Lindegren is linked with symbolism and surrealism, Karl Vennberg (1910–95) was most influenced by Eliot. For decades, Vennberg would be a leading critic and poet; he personified better than anyone the lyric modernism of the 1940s with its demand for a poetry that is ideologically aware, covers essential and preferably universal themes, and is written in a trad. of experimentation.

Werner Aspenström's (1918–97) style is clear and simple, and his motifs are often concrete and close to reality. His nature miniatures sometimes resemble the poetry of Martinson. Ragnar Thoursie (1919–2010) has a place of his own. His poetic technique was of great importance for the poets of the 1950s and 1960s. Elsa Grave (1918–2003) and Rut Hillarp (1914–2003) have motherhood and love as their leading themes.

The 1950s was a harvest time for Swedish poetry, a decade when many poets from the 1930s and 1940s published their best works. The lyrical modernism in Swedish lit. would reach its peak with Lindegren's and Ekelöf's late poems. Among the new poets that would appear in the 1950s, Lars Forssell (1928–2008) is of special interest. In his poetry, the links to the modernism of the 1940s are quite clear. Formally, he is a virtuoso in several genres, high and low, serious and humorous. However, the Nobel laureate Tomas Tranströmer (b. 1931) is the key figure continuing the modernist legacy and the most important Swedish poet of the latter half of the 20th c. His works are not extensive, however. The poems are often short, strongly compressed, and rich in ingenious and innovative metaphors. More than any other Swedish poet, he has reached an international audience. Among the other poets of the 1950s, Östen Sjöstrand (1925–2006), Göran Printz-Påhlson (1931–2006), Majken Johansson (1930–93), Lennart Sjögren (b. 1930), and Kjell Espmark (b. 1930) should be mentioned.

A reaction against lyrical modernism, or perhaps rather against its symbolist variant, came in the early 1960s. The reaction was twofold, through a poetic lang. that approached spoken lang. and dealt with everyday motifs (the so-called neosimplicity) and through a sort of neo-avant-gardism (the so-called *concrete poetry). Concrete poetry would prove to be a poetic cul-de-sac. The most important of the movement's representatives, Bengt Emil Johnson (1936–2010), would soon abandon it and develop into a tranquil poet of nature.

Neosimplicity was more successful, at least when it came to its most prominent representatives. Sonja Åkesson (1926–77) is one of the truly important poets of the period. Her style is often ironic, and the poems deal with everyday experiences and women's lives. She has a successor in Kristina Lugn (b. 1948), whose poems are not formalistically innovative but use a subtle self-irony. Göran Palm (b. 1931), in his capacity as both critic and writer, led the attack on symbolism. Consequently, he turns his back on the whole of modernism in his main work Sverige En vintersaga (Sweden: A Winter Tale, 1984–2005), an extensive and genre-transcending poem written in blank verse (see BLANK VERSE).

Göran Sonnevi (b. 1939), on the other hand, would remain faithful to modernism. He was one of the first in the 1960s to write poetry with political themes. His collections of poems are often extensive, filled with what could be described as torrents of images and reflections. Because of this, he is in many ways the opposite of Tranströmer. The same can be said about Lars Norén (b. 1944), who in the beginning of the 21st c. was the most celebrated playwright in Sweden but who from his debut in 1963 and in the following two decades published poetry almost exclusively (15 collections of poems in various styles over 18 years).

Lars Gustafsson (b. 1936) has since the early 1960s established a place of his own. His poems have a distinctly intellectual mark. They often have philosophical content and use images and motifs from technical and scientific hist. This intellectual line in poetry is continued by, among others, Jesper Svenbro (b. 1944) and Ulf Eriksson (b. 1958).

Among the poets who had their breakthrough in the 1970s, Tobias Berggren (b. 1940), Gunnar Harding (b. 1940), and Bruno K. Öijer (b. 1951) attracted the most attention. In the last decades of the 20th c., female dominance was striking in Swedish poetry. Eva Ström (b. 1947), Eva Runefelt (b. 1953), and Birgitta Lillpers (b. 1958) have all been noticed for their personal style and their existential themes.

In the 1980s, modernism returned, now as *postmodernism, and with Stig Larsson (b. 1955) as its leading poet. The most important poets at the end of the 20th c. were Katarina Frostenson (b. 1953), who works with a fragmented poetical lang. with great power of suggestion, and Ann Jäderlund (b. 1955), whose poetry is based on rhythmic patterns and merges simplicity with complexity. At the beginning of the 21st c., Swedish poetry shows great variation, both formally and thematically.

■ Anthologies: Svensk dikt från trollformler till Lars Norén, ed. L. Gustafsson (1987); Svensk lyrik från medeltid till nutid, ed. G. Lindström et al. (1993); De bästa svenska dikterna: från Stiernhielm till Aspenström, ed. J.-O. Ullén (2007).

■ Criticism and History: A. Gustafson, A History of Swedish Literature (1961); E. H. Linder, Fem decennier av 1900-talet, 2 v. (1965–66); Ny illustrerad svensk litteraturhistoria, ed. E. N. Tigerstedt, 2d ed., 4 v. (1967); G. Brandell and J. Stenkvist, Svensk litteratur 1870–1970, 3 v. (1974–75); I. Algulin, A History of Swedish Literature, trans. J. Weinstock (1989); I. Algulin and B. Olsson, Litteraturens historia i Sverige (1995); A History of Swedish Literature, ed. L. G. Warme (1996); Aspects of Modern Swedish Literature, ed. I. Scobbie (1999); Den svenska litteraturen, ed. L. Lönnroth et al., 2d ed., 3 v. (1999); Finlands svenska litteraturhistoria, ed. J. Wrede and C. Zilliacus, 2 v. (1999–2000); S. Bergsten, Den svenska poesins historia (2007).

S. Göransson

SWITZERLAND, POETRY OF

I. German
II. French
III. Italian
IV. Romansh

Although Switzerland officially defines itself as a multilingual country, each lang. group forms a geographically separate and—with few exceptions—monolingual area. Ger. is the dominant lang.; with approximately 64% of the speakers in 2002, it largely outnumbers Fr. (20%), It. (6.5%), and Romansh-speaking (0.5%) Swiss. The question of whether lit. from Switzerland should be considered a single entity constitutes a matter of debate. Official cultural institutions such as Pro Helvetia uphold a national perspective by supporting interaction among the four lang. groups. Attempts by Swiss intellectuals to promote a truly national lit., linked to a privileged role for Switzerland as mediator between Latin and Germanic cultures in Europe—the Helvetia Mediatrix idea—proved to be utopian. In reality, each lang. group forms a separate literary entity. For this reason, they are presented here discretely.

In a country with only 7.8 million inhabitants, writers largely depend on sales outside Switzerland. Most authors reject the label "Swiss writer" because of the fear of appearing provincial and choose instead to be grouped with writers from other countries who write in the same lang. A constitutive element in all Swiss lits. is the perception of belonging to a minority. Even Ger.-Swiss writers, who form the majority in Switzerland, constitute a small minority within Ger. lit. Another important characteristic of Swiss intellectual life is the tension between internationalism and localism in the definition of identity. Migration is a recurrent topic; several of the most important Swiss authors lived abroad and incorporated this foreign experience in their work. In addition, the influx of refugees during times of international crisis made neutral Switzerland a temporary intellectual center of Eur. importance. Examples include the foundation of the *Dada movement in Zurich during World War I and the Zurich Schauspielhaus, the major anti-Fascist theater in Ger.-speaking Europe during World War II. However, Switzerland's multilingual conception of national identity and its international orientation stand in sharp contrast to its tendency toward political isolation and intellectual "narrowness." Heidi, the country's famous literary creation by Johanna Spyri (1827–1901), symbolizes the glorification of alpine, "typically Swiss" virtues in combination with a strong distrust of potentially dangerous urban and foreign influences. This tendency was reinforced in the late 1930s with the promotion of Swiss patriotism in order to combat aggressive Fascist and Nazi propaganda from neighboring countries. Lit. played a key role in this "spiritual defense" of Switzerland.

I. German. During the Middle Ages, present-day Switzerland was officially part of the Holy Roman Empire of the Ger. nation. Lat. was the written lang. in Ger.-speaking Europe, but religious centers such as the abbey of Saint Gall aided the devel. of *med. poetry in the Ger. vernacular. In the mid-14th c., a rich collection of songs by Minnesingers, the Codex Manesse, was compiled in Zurich (see MINNESANG). The military victories against Hapsburg in the 14th c. and the expansion of the Swiss Confederacy until 1515 created an awareness of cultural singularity within Ger.-speaking Europe. This perception reflected itself in the production of heroic verse about battles and mythical figures such as William Tell. Switzerland's separate evolution from Germany was reinforced by the Reformation, which stimulated the use of the vernacular in militantly Protestant religious poetry.

The birth of a consciously distinctive Swiss lit. is traditionally linked to the publication, in 1732, of Die Alpen (The Alps), a long poem by the famous naturalist Albrecht von Haller (1708–77). Haller idealized the alpine people as the true successors of the heroic Confederates who had guaranteed Swiss freedom against foreign aggressors. Haller himself lived in the city of Berne and used the Alps as a contrast to the decadent lifestyle of the Bernese upper class. With his poems, he created the basis of the alpine myth that strongly influenced both the national and international image of Switzerland. A similar utopian vision of harmony and purity characterized the internationally famous Idyllen (Idylls, 1756) by Salomon Gessner (1730–88). The trad. of patriotic lit. was continued by the physiognomist Johann Caspar Lavater (1741–1801) in his collection of Schweizerlieder (Swiss Songs) in 1767.

In the 19th c., lit. from Switzerland achieved a prominent position in Ger.-speaking lit. with the novelists Jeremias Gotthelf (1797–1854), Gottfried Keller (1819–90), and Conrad Ferdinand Meyer (1825–98). Keller and Meyer also wrote poetry. Many of Keller's poems reflect his commitment to the foundation of the liberal Swiss Federal State in 1848. The words of his poem O mein Heimatland! (Oh My Fatherland) acquired the popularity of a national *anthem. Meyer's poetic work is apolitical and characterized by an aesthetic symbolism. He excels in the evocation of landscapes and city life, most famously those of Venice and Rome. His description of a Roman fountain in Der Römische Brunnen is considered a perfect Dinggedicht*. Heinrich Leuthold (1827–79) is one of the few Swiss authors who dedicated himself almost exclusively to poetry. His work is strongly aesthetic, though considerably less expressive than that of Meyer.

The work of Nobel Prize winner Carl Spitteler (1845–1924) has almost completely fallen into obscurity, incl. his allegoric-epic poem Olympischer Frühling (Olympic Spring, 1905). The opposite can be said about his contemp. Robert Walser (1878–1956), whose short stories, novels, and poems were rediscovered in the 1970s as important writings of literary *modernism. Hans Morgenthaler (1890–1928) also made his reputation posthumously. He worked as a geologist in Asia and attempted to transcend exoticism in his literary work, incl. poems. The poetic work of the Ger. Nobel Prize winner Hermann Hesse (1877–1962), who in 1923 became a naturalized Swiss, is characterized by its introspection and Buddhist influence. Despite the presence in Zurich of prominent Ger. Dadaists such as Hugo Ball (1886–1927), Emmy Hennings (1885–1948), and Hans (Jean) Arp (1887–1966), the impact of *expressionism and the avant garde was weak among Swiss poets (see AVANT-GARDE POETICS). These new currents did, nevertheless, influence the work of the graphologist Max Pulver (1889–1952), the melancholic poetry of Albin Zollinger (1895–1941), the politically committed, urbane work of Albert Ehrismann (1908–98), and the surrealistic poems of the famous artist Meret Oppenheim (1913–85).

As Switzerland had remained neutral during World War II, there was no immediate need for a break with the past. The division of Berlin and consequent loss of a dominant Ger. cultural center increased the importance of Swiss cities such as Zurich and Basel that could compete as equals with Frankfurt, Munich, Hamburg, Cologne, and Vienna. The Swiss novelists and playwrights Max Frisch (1911–91) and Friedrich Dürrenmatt (1921–90) achieved leading positions in Ger.-speaking lit. In postwar poetry, traditional forms continued with the aesthetic work of Werner Zemp (1906–59), the melancholic poems of the gardener Rainer Brambach (1917–83), and most prominently with Gerhard Meier (1917–2008) and Erika Burkart (1922–2010), whose poems on the splendor of nature, the discovery of beauty in small things, and the lost innocence of childhood transcend nostalgic romanticizing.

A different path was chosen by Alexander Xaver Gwerder (1923–52), who vehemently opposed the bourgeois mentality in his cynical poetry. Gwerder's lifelong search for a poetic form that suited his rebellious character ended in resignation and suicide. An important formal innovation was achieved by Eugen Gomringer (b. 1925), the father of *concrete poetry. Gomringer originally worked as secretary of the architect and designer Max Bill (1908–94), whose ideas on concrete art he applied to poetry.

The poetic work of Kurt Marti (b. 1921) combines the ideas of two leading Swiss intellectuals: formally, Marti was influenced by Gomringer, and intellectually, he followed the trad. of political commitment set out by the theologian Karl Barth. Commitment is also a key word in Dürrenmatt's (few) poems as well as in the *protest poetry of investigative journalist Niklaus Meienberg (1940–93).

While poetry in the 1950s and 1960s was a hotbed of literary innovation, this has changed since the 1970s. Poets such as Herbert Meier (b. 1928) and Jörg Steiner (b. 1930) turned to prose, and younger writers such as Klaus Merz (b. 1945), who started with poetry, favored prose as soon as their talent was discovered. Prominent authors such as Hugo Loetscher (1929–2009), Jürg Federspiel (1931–2007), Franz Hohler (b. 1943), and Thomas Hürlimann (b. 1950) published important poetic work but remained primarily focused on prose. Poetry has become a niche market for devotees yet continues to surprise with the beautifully illustrated broadsheets of Beat Brechbühl (b. 1939), for instance, or the musical poetry of Raphael Urweider (b. 1974), influenced by the lively Swiss hip-hop scene.

Although local dialects can be found all over Ger.-speaking Europe, nowhere do they have a higher social standing and a greater common usage than in Switzerland. There exists an important Swiss *dialect poetry. The trad. began at the end of the 18th c., when Switzerland's autonomy was threatened by France. For a long time, patriotism was an important characteristic of this poetry. With Josef Reinhart (1875–1957) and Meinrad Lienert (1865–1933), dialect poetry achieved a status almost comparable to standard Ger. During the "spiritual defense" in the 1930s, the use of dialect was encouraged in order to distinguish the Swiss from their Ger. neighbors. In protest against this overly patriotic policy, the famous dialect writer Carl Albert Loosli (1877–1959) provocatively switched to standard Ger. and restricted his use of dialect to poetry. In the 1960s, dialect poetry went through a revival with singer-songwriter Mani Matter (1936–72), who had a great influence on the lively Swiss dialect music scene. Prominent authors have also used colloquial dialect for their poetry, as was the case with Gomringer, Marti, and Kuno Raeber (1922–92), who developed his unique poetic lang. on the basis of the Lucerne dialect.

II. French. The unique identity of lit. from Fr.-speaking Switzerland (Romandy) is primarily the result of the Reformation (in opposition to Catholic France). The teachings of John Calvin stimulated the use of the vernacular in poetry supporting the Protestant cause. Fr. refugees, driven by religious persecution, stimulated intellectual life in Romandy. In the mid-18th c., Geneva temporarily became a Eur. intellectual center with the presence of the philosophers Voltaire (1694–1778) and Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78), whose introspection and celebration of natural purity had a long-lasting influence on Romand lit.

For centuries, poetry in Romandy remained moralizing and didactic. Although the general mood was patriotic, poets such as Juste Olivier (1807–76) slavishly imitated Fr. patterns. With Charles Ferdinand Ramuz (1878–1947), a radical break took place. On his return from Paris in 1914, Ramuz rejected all moralization and provocatively identified himself no longer with France, Switzerland, or Romandy, but only with his rural canton Vaud. He abandoned the artificial Fr. he had been using and invented his own syntax in combination with an expressive, polyphonic lang. that he applied in lyrical novels and poems. In Le Petit Village (The Little Village, 1903), he experimented with *free verse. Ramuz's literary journal Cahiers vaudois (Journal from Vaud) generated new talents, among them the deeply solitary poet Gustave Roud (1897–1976) and Pierre-Louis Matthey (1893–1970), whose strongly musical and baroque poetry achieved mythological dimensions. The journalist and poet Edmond-Henri Crisinel (1897–1948) represents a singular case. Crisinel's poetry, in cl. prosodic forms, reflects his paranoia, which resulted in long periods of institutionalization.

Whereas Ramuz was a confirmed regionalist, albeit in a metaphysical, tragic, and cosmic dimension, Blaise Cendrars (1887–1961) was a quintessential cosmopolite. In 1904, he left Switzerland and later became a naturalized Fr. citizen. Inspired by the modernity of New York, Cendrars wrote Les Pâques à New York (Easter in New York, 1912), which became a landmark in the devel. of mod. poetry. His strongly rhythmic, utterly mod. and wholly unconventional style in free verse had a strong influence on the surrealist Guillaume Apollinaire and Brazilian modernism.

The dominant figure in postwar Romand poetry is Philippe Jaccottet (b. 1925), who analyzes poetry from different angles: in his theoretical works, his literary trans., and his own poetic production. Jaccottet, who left Switzerland at young age and has lived in France ever since, writes introspective poetry in which light and darkness, nature and the trauma of war play an essential role. Introspection also characterizes the work of Anne Perrier (b. 1922), Pierre Chappuis (b. 1930), and Pierre-Alain Tâche (b. 1940). Alexandre Voisard (b. 1930) placed much of his poetry at the service of the secessionist movement in the (Fr.-speaking and Catholic) Jura in opposition to the (primarily Ger.-speaking and Protestant) canton Bern. The work of Maurice Chappaz (1916–2009) and Jacques Chessex (b. 1934) combines regionalism with baroque magniloquence. Chappaz's poetry reveals concern about the environment in his canton Valais. His struggle with Calvinist morality led to an unrestrained celebration of sensuality. In 1973, he was the first Swiss to win the prestigious Fr. Prix Goncourt award. Ágota Kristóf (b. 1935), who came to Switzerland as a refugee from Hungary, made her literary debut in Fr. with poetry. Her later prose work on topics such as war and destruction, love and loneliness, remained characterized by a strongly lyrical lang.

Romand poets of a younger generation such as Pierre Voélin (b. 1949), Frédéric Wandelère (b. 1949), and José-Flore Tappy (b. 1954) found themselves confronted by the cultural centralism of Paris. In the wake of trends toward regionalization, however, Romandy has undoubtedly gained a sharper profile against Fr. cultural domination.

III. Italian. Theoretically, It.-speaking Switzerland is limited to some 300,000 people in the (traditionally Catholic) canton Ticino and some valleys in the (traditionally Protestant) canton Grisons. Because of immigration from Italy, however, there are some 200,000 It.-speaking Swiss in other parts of the country. Nevertheless, It. remains a tiny minority lang. in Switzerland, and the cultural attraction of Italy and its nearby metropolis Milan is immense.

The first Swiss-It. writer of Eur. importance is Francesco Chiesa (1871–1973), who, because of his long life, remained the dominant literary personality in Ticino for almost a century. Chiesa was a traditionalist, who celebrated an idyllic and slightly moralistic, though not humorless, vision of his region in poems and novels.

After the war, a new generation of writers took over Chiesa's dominant position. Among them was Giorgio Orelli (b. 1921), whose strongly rhythmical poetry, characterized by an ironic ambiguity, made him famous beyond the borders of Switzerland. With Remo Fasani (1922–2011), whose poetry reflects a deep concern about the environment, the It.-speaking Grisons transcended its literary provincialism. Alberto Nessi (b. 1940) writes poetry primarily about outsiders: people stricken by illness, poverty, and physical decay.

The youngest generation of Swiss-It. poets increasingly manifests itself in close collaboration with colleagues from the northern It. Lombardy region. Many of them combine their literary activities with teaching, journalism, and trans. work. One example is Fabio Pusterla (b. 1957), who played an essential role in the dissemination of Jaccottet's poetry in Italy.

IV. Romansh. With approximately 40,000 speakers, Romansh is one of the smallest langs. in the world. Its official status, achieved in 1938, should be seen in the context of Switzerland's "spiritual defense" and emphasis on a multilingual, democratic Swiss identity in opposition to Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy.

Romansh is a generic term for several langs. that were only (artificially) standardized in 1982. Despite considerable government support, its chances of survival in the predominantly Ger.-speaking canton Grisons are uncertain.

The emergence of Romansh as a literary lang. is generally dated to the mid-16th c. when the Reformation stimulated the use of the local vernacular. Cultural awareness became stronger in the 19th c. in opposition to both an attempted Germanization of the region and to It. irredentism that considered Romansh an It. dialect. Much of the poetry by Gion Antoni Huonder (1824–67), Giacun Hasper Muoth (1844–1906), and Peider Lansel (1863–1943) reflects this concern about a proper Romansh identity.

After World War II, poetry became less political and more concerned with aesthetics, most notably in the case of Andri Peer (1921–85), Hendri Spescha (1928–82), and Luisa Famos (1930–74). The youngest generation of poets increasingly publishes bilingual (Romansh-Ger.) work, in which both langs. appear separately or in a mixed form.

See AUSTRIA, POETRY OF; FRANCE, POETRY OF; GERMAN POETRY; ITALY, POETRY OF.

■ Swiss Poetry, General: M. Gsteiger, "Comparative Literature in Switzerland," Yearbook of Comparative and General Literature 30 (1981); H. Loetscher, How Many Languages Does Man Need? (1982); Anthology of Modern Swiss Literature, ed. H. M. Waidson (1984); Modern Swiss Literature, ed. J. L. Flood (1985); The Four Literatures of Switzerland, ed. B. Stocker et al. (1996); Images of Switzerland, ed. J. Charnley and M. Pender (1998); H. Loetscher, Lesen statt klettern (2003); Nationale Literaturen heute, ed. C. Caduff and R. Sorg (2004); Schweizer Literaturgeschichte, ed. P. Rusterholz and A. Solbach (2007); From the Margins to the Centre, ed. P. Studer and S. Egger (2007).

■ In German: Geschichte der deutschsprachigen Schweizer Literatur im 20. Jahrhundert, ed. K. Pezold (1991); P. von Matt, Die tintenblauen Eidgenossen (2001); P. von Matt and D. Vaihinger, Die schönsten Gedichte der Schweiz (2002); "Young Swiss Writers," Dimension 2, ed. R. Sabalius and M. Wutz (2007).

■ In French: J. Monnier, Contemporary French-Swiss Literature (1975); D. Maggetti, L'Invention de la littérature romande (1995); Histoire de la littérature en Suisse romande, ed. R. Francillon, 3 v. (1996–99); Dictionnaire de poésie, ed. M. Jarrety (2001); La poésie en Suisse Romande depuis Blaise Cendrars, ed. M. Graf and J. F. Tappy (2005); L'anthologie de la poésie romande hier et aujourd'hui, ed. J. Küpfer and C. Delafontaine-Küpfer (2007).

■ In Italian: G. Calgari, Storia delle quattro letterature della Svizzera (1959); Svizzera italiana, ed. G. Orelli (1986); Lingua e letterature italiana in Svizzera, ed. A. Stäuble (1989); A. Stäuble and M. Stäuble, Scrittori del Grigioni Italiano (1998).

■ In Romansh: The Curly-Horned Cow, ed. R. R. Bezzola (1971); I. Camartin, Rätoromanische Gegenwartsliteratur in Graubünden (1976); D. B. Gregor, Romontsch Language and Literature (1982); C. Riatsch, Mehrsprachigkeit und Sprachmischung in der neueren bündnerromanischen Literatur (1998).

J. DEWULF

SYLLABIC VERSE

I. System of Versification
II. English

I. System of Versification. Syllabic verse is one of the earliest and most widespread modes of versifying: it is evidenced in Old Iranian, Sanskrit, ancient Gr., and the earliest Chinese and Japanese poems. Its defining feature is that the lines match (or, more rarely, contrast) only in the number of syllables they contain. The syllabic line's rhythm is termed a simple primary rhythm because a single type of event, a syllable, is repeated. A passage of syllabic verse is, thus, a series of fours, sixes, or eights or whatever line length the poet chooses.

Versifying by counting syllables alone has serious drawbacks, the first of which is that some syllables have no consonant at their boundary with the next, and the result may be pronounced as one syllable or two. This has largely been left to fashion: in cl. verse, such adjacent vowels counted as one syllable (by *elision or *synaloepha); in med. Lat., they counted as two (by *hiatus); and in mod. romance verse, they almost always count as one.

The other drawbacks of syllabic verse are more fundamental. One reflects the psychological limits to human counting: we can learn to recognize a series of threes, sixes, or even eights intuitively, but a series of tens or fifteens is beyond us. For that reason, syllabic meters must be either short (up to eight syllables) or compound (made up of regular subunits each with no more than eight syllables). The second drawback is that the syllables of most langs. have properties that are more obvious than their number, such as length (see DURATION), stress (see ACCENT), and *pitch. The moment poets begin to regularize any of these, the verse is no longer simply syllabic, and for this reason, most syllabic meters have developed into something rather more complex.

Gr., Sanskrit, and Chinese poets soon departed from strictly syllabic verse and introduced patterns in the duration or the pitch of their syllables. Japanese poets introduced the refinement of recognizing long vowels as two syllables. Lat. poets seem at first to have counted words, not syllables; but by the 2d c. BCE, they had adopted the Gr. system with its contrasts between long and short syllables. By the 3d c. CE, most Lat. speakers had lost any intuitive sense of the difference between long and short vowels, and for several centuries, some Lat. poets composed in the old meters but with the wrong length given to some of their syllables. Most Lat. poets, however, followed the example of the composers of popular hymns and wrote syllabic verse.

There were also new forces influencing versification: *assonance and *rhyme, which were occasional devices in cl. Lat., became mandatory in the new syllabic meters; and stress, which had played a minor role in cl. Lat. meters, became a vital element. The essence of systematic assonance and rhyme is stress: thus, rhymes are either oxytonic (cat/mat) or paroxytonic (horses/courses), depending on whether a posttonic syllable follows the stressed, rhymed syllable.

Much med. Lat. verse is syllabic, although some poets clearly favored certain positions in their lines for stress, esp. between 1100 and 1500. And in the 11th c., Fr. verse became syllabic: from then on, only the final stresses of lines and *hemistichs had metrical significance. Syllabic verse fits well the mod. Fr. lang., where only phrasal stress has survived.

When poets of other langs. tried to adopt Fr. syllabic metrics, they faced the problem of word stresses in midline, which interfered with the reader's perception of the syllabic pattern. Hispanic and It. poets used these midline stresses to produce a variety of rhythms in their lines, but Eng. poets used them to create regular patterns—that is, *accentual-syllabic verse.

Rhyme and syllable count entered Eng. verse after the Norman Conquest, but in England, something happened to strict syllable count. It began in Anglo-Norman (the official lang. from 1066 to 1363), where the ubiquitous octosyllabe was often a syllable short or in excess (see OCTOSYLLABLE). Eng. audiences had always counted stresses, not syllables, and many poets and scribes in this period tolerated lines with approximately eight syllables, providing they had four stresses. Eng. poets never really accepted syllabic verse in their own lang., having incorporated stress patterns from the very first.

These two distinctions have remained: most Eng. verse is *accentual-syllabic, most Fr. syllabic. Mod. Fr. metrists argue that the syllable-timed delivery of their lang. means that syllabic lines occupy equal time in performance and that such equal-time units are the essence of Fr. verse rhythm. Eng. with its stress-timing offers no such *isochrony, and the prevalence of *syncope in the lang. leaves the syllabification of many words ambiguous (thus, mystery may be two syllables or three). But this has not prevented mod. Eng.-lang. poets from attempting syllabic meters, incl. W. B. Yeats, W. H. Auden, and Marianne Moore.

II. English. In many poetries, including Japanese and those of the Romance languages, meter is organized around the counting of syllables, known as syllabism (see METER, 1.B.). The prevalence of this principle, however, is qualified by the fact that purely syllabic meters are uncommon. Traditional Japanese prosody, which depends on the regulation of syllables or *morae in the line and favors five- and seven-syllable lines as in the 31-syllable *tanka, is perhaps the most thoroughly syllabic of any major lang.

As Martin Duffell observes, "in the verse traditions of most languages syllabism came to be compounded or replaced by the regulation of some other suprasegmental feature, such as duration/weight (as in Sanskrit and Ancient Greek), pitch (as in Chinese), or stress (as in Iranian, Greek, Romance, and the Slavonic languages), and some evidence of such regulation is often present in the earliest surviving texts in these languages." Duffell notes that purely syllabic meters are "fragile," and that syllable counts alone are not "obvious" enough for readers and listeners. Even med. Lat. verse, where syllabism arose after 300 CE in the ruins of quantitative prosody, often depends on stress patterning and rhyme to support the less perceptible syllable count. OF versification took note of the regulation of word stress in med. Lat., and came to include the principle that the final position in each line (and in longer lines, the final position in each hemistich) must contain a stress. While the location of the stress itself is regulated by the syllable count (e.g. in an octosyllable it must occur in the last of eight positions), it also in turn defines the end of the line for metrical purposes; where additional syllables occur after the stress, they are not counted, and therefore the syllabic line is negotiated rather than strictly empirical. "This metre," Duffell writes, "although it regulates phrasal stress, is termed syllabic in traditional French metrics"; its phrasal-stress versification became the basis for syllabism in many languages "from Italian and Spanish in the South to Polish and Russian in the North." The devel. of particular syllabic meters often involved further negotiations with local conditions, especially an accommodation of word stress in those languages where it was phonologically prominent.

In Eng., syllabic verse is not so much a metrical program as an experiment or even a curiosity. Many poets and scholars have doubted that verse lines in Eng. regulated by nothing more than identity of numbers of syllables would be perceived by auditors as verse, for there would be nothing to mark them as such except for end-of-line pauses in performance, if that (though Robert Beum argues otherwise). Paul Fussell and others have questioned whether syllabic versification accords with the accentual nature of Eng. Notwithstanding such skepticism on the part of prosodists troubled by the auditory elusiveness of syllabic verse, the number of syllabic poems in Eng., already considerable, continues to grow.

Aside from some debatable Ren. examples, the practice is a mod. one, pioneered by Robert Bridges in the late 19th and early 20th cs. Bridges wrote nearly 5,000 lines of syllabic *alexandrines, esp. for New Verse (1925) and The Testament of Beauty (1929), the longest syllabic-verse poem in the lang. In the 1910s, Adelaide Crapsey invented the cinquain. Beginning in the same decade, Marianne Moore, the Am. poet best known for the practice, wrote poems in elaborate syllabic stanzas featuring wide variations in line length, complex patterns of rhyme or half rhyme, and conspicuous use of prose rhythms. This last point, highlighted by Roy Fuller and others, suggests that Moore's version of syllabic verse has affinities with the *verset and the *prose poem. From the mid-20th c. on, notable syllabic poems have been written by Elizabeth Daryush, Dylan Thomas, W. H. Auden, Donald Justice, Thom Gunn, Richard Howard, Robert Wells, and others. Some have used haiku as stanzas; Richard Wilbur in doing so rhymes the first and third lines of each. As Steele notes, most poets working in syllabic verse in Eng. attempt to avoid sustained regular (particularly iambic) rhythms, although, for expressive purposes, these may be admitted. Syllabic verse can, in fact, be so accommodating to audible patterns that it can be mistaken for other forms: some of Daryush's syllabic poems can be read as accentual-syllabic with minor variations, and Justice's "For the Suicides," in seven-syllable lines, can be read as an accentual poem because the three beats in each line, though variably placed, are invariably prominent. That which makes syllabic verse conceptually dubious to some prosodists has made it artistically inviting to a widening array of poets, some of whom view it as a half measure between traditional meter and *free verse, and all of whom exploit its paradoxical combination of constraint (in the strict syllable count) and freedom (in the possibility of shifting rhythms at will within the syllabic matrix). The term syllabic verse used in relation to Ir. and Welsh prosody is not a categorically exclusive designation, since in these systems, the syllable count of a line is but one of a number of required prosodic features.

See CHINESE PROSODY, FRENCH PROSODY, ITALIAN PROSODY, JAPANESE PROSODY, SPANISH PROSODY.

■ Versification: G. B. Pighi, Studi di ritmica e metrica (1970); M. L. West, "Greek Poetry 2000–700 BC," CQ 23 (1973), and "Indo-European Metre," Glotta 51 (1973); S. Oliva, Mètrica catalana (1980); P. M. Bertinetto, Strutture prosodiche dell' italiano (1981); P. G. Beltrami, La metrica italiana (1991); B. de Cornulier, Art poëtique (1995); M. L. Gasparov, A History of European Versification, trans. and ed. G. S. Smith, M. Tarlinskaja, and L. Holford-Strevens (1996); R. Pensom, Accent and Metre in French, 1100–1900 (1998); J. Domínguez Caparrós, Métrica española, 2d ed. (2000); M. J. Duffell, "French Symmetry, Germanic Rhythm, and Spanish Metre," Chaucer and the Challenges of Medievalism, ed. D. Minkova and T. Tinkle (2003); Syllable and Accent: Studies on Medieval Hispanic Metrics (2007); and Duffell.

■ English: R. Bridges, "New Verse: Explanation of the Prosody of My Late Syllabic 'Free Verse'," Collected Essays, vol. 2 (1933); E. C. Wright, Metaphor, Sound and Meaning in Bridges' "Testament of Beauty" (1951); R. Beum, "Syllabic Verse in English," Prairie Schooner 31 (1957); R. Beloof, "Prosody and Tone," KR 20 (1958); Sr. M. G. Berg, The Prosodic Structure of Robert Bridges' "Neo-Miltonic Syllabics" (1962); R. Fuller, "An Artifice of Versification," Owls and Artificers (1971); E. Daryush, "Note on Syllabic Metres," Collected Poems (1976); P. Fussell Jr., Poetic Meter and Poetic Form, rev. ed. (1979); Brogan; T. Steele, All the Fun's in How You Say a Thing (1999); M. Holley, "Syllabics: Sweeter Melodies," Finch and Varnes; M. J. Duffell, "The Metric Cleansing of Hispanic Verse," BHS 76 (1999); Duffell; Gasparov, History; R. H. Brower, "Japanese," A. B. Giamatti, "Italian," L. Nelson, Jr., "Spanish," and J. Flescher, "French"—all in Wimsatt.

M. J. DUFFELL (VERSIFICATION); T.V.F. BROGAN; R. B. SHAW (ENG.)

SYLLABLE. The syllable is at once a traditional element of grammatical analysis handed down since antiquity and one of the most elusive concepts of 21st-c. ling. The sound stream that is speech is segmented by junctures (pauses) into sentences, sentences into phrases, and phrases into words. These can be identified with digital instrumentation. But the analysis of words into syllables is not so easily determined. The rules for syllabification of words in a lang. such as Eng. are far from consistent or exact.

From the point of view of articulatory phonetics, the syllable has been conceived as (1) one separate respiratory movement (R. H. Stetson's "chest pulse"), (2) one opening and closing of the vocal tract aperture (Ferdinand de Saussure), (3) one peak of sonority in the sound stream (Otto Jespersen), and (4) simply a fiction (Scripture); but no one phonetic criterion or definition has proven sufficient. In any event, the definition must be posed at the phonemic level, not the phonetic, since rules of syllabification are, in part, conventional and lang. specific. Thus, a speaker of Tamil may hear a certain sound sequence as one syllable, while a speaker of Eng. will hear it as two; this follows from differences in the phonemic structure of the two langs.

In general, however, it is possible to develop a structure that will describe the syllable in most langs. Specific terms vary, but the syllable can be said to have three parts, "onset," "nucleus" or "peak," and "coda." The nucleus most often corresponds to a vowel; the onset and coda are consonants or consonant clusters. The syllable is thus commonly schematized as consonant + vowel + consonant, or CVC. Syllables are also differentiated as to whether "closed" or "open" (the coda may be absent); the rules of syllabic *quantity in Gr. and Lat. prosody depend on whether the vowel is long and whether the syllable is closed. This CVC schema also proves remarkably useful for analyzing varieties of sound patterning in poetry such as *alliteration and *rhyme.

When lang. is submitted to the system of phonological organization in poetry that is meter, the syllable is made equivalent to the metrical "position," normally one syllable but under some conditions two. Thus, iambic pentameter has ten positions, and the normal line of such verse will have ten syllables. The relation of syllable to position can take only three forms: one to one, many to one, or one to many; metrical theory specifies which forms are allowed and then gives "correspondence rules" for the mapping of syllables onto positions in the line. These vary somewhat from age to age as usage and conventions for pronunciation (and spelling) change, and our ability to read earlier poetry correctly thus depends on evidence obtained from research in historical phonology. Such questions carry more prosodic weight in some langs. than in others; e.g., the syllable carries more weight as a unit of meter in Fr. and Japanese poetry, where accentual considerations play a minimal role. For further discussion of the handling of syllabification in metrics, see ELISION.

In ling., the problem of syllable boundaries is an issue that becomes a question of whether the syllable is to be taken as running from onset to onset or peak to peak. This makes a difference but can be bypassed in the phonemic model; it has been suggested that statistical probabilities of the various consonant combinations permitted in a given lang. should determine structure. Early in the 20th c., a good deal of effort was invested in trying to apply research in acoustics directly to metrics (for references, see Brogan, 226 ff.), incl. the question of syllable boundaries. At mid-century, Roman Jakobson treated sound in poetry as phonemic not phonetic, rendering boundaries irrelevant to metrics by taking syllables as given in any ordinary dict. For those less willing to rely on phonemic abstractions, the issue remains context-dependent, and therefore much thornier. What is most important for metrics is, more simply, the issue of how many syllables there are in a line, i.e., whether syllables were elided in contemporaneous pronunciation or pronounced in full. In some periods, syllabification is fairly carefully coded into orthography ("heav'n" is monosyllabic, while "heaven" is disyllabic), in others not. There is a presumption that *scansion and possibly also *performance should conform to the usage of the time.

■ E. W. Scripture, Elements of Experimental Phonetics (1902); E. Hermann, Silbenbildung im Griechischen und in den anderen indogermanischen Sprachen (1923); K. L. Pike, Phonemics (1947); E. Haugen, "The Syllable in Linguistic Description," For Roman Jakobson (1956); B. Hala, "La syllabe, sa nature, son origine et ses transformations," Orbis 9 (1961)—full review of the older theories; Chatman, chap. 3; E. Pulgram, Syllable, Word, Nexus, Cursus (1970); R. A. Zirin, The Phonological Basis of Latin Prosody (1970), chap. 1; Allen, esp. chap. 3; E. O. Selkirk, "The Syllable," The Structure of Phonological Representations II, ed. H. van der Hulst and N. Smith (1978); Syllables and Segments, ed. A. Bell and J. B. Hooper (1978); Scott; Brogan; Morier, under "Syllabe"; E. O. Selkirk, Phonology and Syntax (1984), 22 ff.; J. A. Goldsmith, Autosegmental and Metrical Phonology (1990), esp. 103 ff.; D. Minkova, "Syllable Weight, Prosody, and Meter in Old English," Diachronica (1994).

T.V.F. Brogan; J. M. Cocola

SYLLEPSIS (Gr., "taking together"). A figure closely related to and probably one species of *zeugma, i.e., constructions in which one word serves two others (typically a verb and a compound object); in zeugma, the "yoking" word agrees grammatically or semantically with both its objects or subjects, but in syllepsis, it agrees with only one. (Since both grammar and sense are involved, technically one could make a fourfold distinction.) The one word, then, bears two differing senses, the first one asserted, the second one only implied—hence, the surprise. Herodian, the Gr. rhetorician of the 2d c. CE, gives an example from Homer (Iliad 9.5): "The north wind and the west wind that blow from Thrace" (true only of the north wind; the verb is the predicate of a compound subject). And Virgil (Aeneid 5.508) has: "alta petens, pariterque oculos telumque tetendit" (he looked up [at the target, a pigeon] with gaze and arrow alike extended). Syllepsis is rare in the It. and Fr. sonneteers, but Shakespeare makes it a major verbal device for double entendre both witty and serious, as at Othello 4.1.34 ff., where Iago plays on the senses of "lie," in order to inflame Othello, and all by implication. Alexander Pope uses syllepsis frequently: "Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea"; "Or stain her honour, or her new brocade"; "Or lose her heart, or necklace, at a ball" (The Rape of the Lock). All three of these instances agree grammatically but not semantically ("brocade" being stained literally, but honor abstractly). The effect, which is striking, depends on the sudden reinterpretation of the sentence as the reader realizes the shift in meaning. As such syllepsis seems one form of *paronomasia or pun; some have also seen it as an effect of *ambiguity, though there it would seem that an element of doubt is introduced that the Pope examples do not evince. Riffaterre, following Jacques Derrida, who uses syllepsis in the sense of pun to point to the binding together of opposite senses in a word, even as one coin has two sides, distinguishes three roles for syllepsis and hence three types of *intertextuality; he sees the two ways we understand the word as its "contextual meaning" versus its "intertextual meaning" and thus views syllepsis as "the literary sign par excellence." For further bibliography, see ZEUGMA.

■ M. Riffaterre, "Syllepsis," CritI 6 (1980); J. M. Molesworth, "Syllepsis, Mimesis, Simulacrum: The Monk and the Grammar of Authenticity," Criticism 51 (2009); K. Puckett, "Some Versions of Syllepsis," Partial Answers 9 (2011).

T.V.F. Brogan

SYMBOL

I. In Culture
II. In Poetry

In literary studies, the term symbol (Gr. verb symballein, "to put together," and the related noun symbolon, "mark," "token," or "sign," referring to the half coin carried away as a pledge by each of the two parties to an agreement) has had a broad range of applications and interpretations. In the study of lang., e.g., words are symbols of what they stand for, but the more common ling. terminology after Ferdinand de Saussure (see STRUCTURALISM; SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER) is sign, which joins a signifier and a signified. Sign generally refers to a relatively specific representation of one thing by another—a red traffic light, e.g., means "stop"—while symbol refers to a more polysemous *representation of one thing by another—as when the sea, e.g., is used to stand for such different feelings as the danger of being overwhelmed (by analogy with drowning) or the excitement and anxiety of making a transition (as in a journey) or the power and fulfillment of strength (as in mighty), and so on.

For the present purpose, however, the meanings and uses of symbolism can be analyzed in terms of two main categories: on the one hand is the study of the symbol in such larger contexts as lang. and the interpretation of lang. (philology, rhet., ling., semantics, *semiotics, *hermeneutics), of philosophy (metaphysics, epistemology, aesthetics), of social science (sociology, anthropology, psychology), and of hist. and religion; on the other hand is the study of the symbol in its discrete contexts as an aspect of art, of literary theory and crit., and of poetry (Wimsatt 1965, Hayes).

I. In Culture. Historically as well as logically, the larger field comes first. Where people once tended habitually to see the physical world in terms of emotional and spiritual values, they now tend to separate their values from the world. It has become one of the clichés of mod. crit. that, due to the anti-imagistic crusade of the Protestant Reformation (see IMAGERY), the growth of science and its search for "objective" knowledge, the changes in focus from sacred to secular gradually effected in school curricula, and the mere passage of time, many traditional symbols have been rendered meaningless to poets and readers alike. Thus, received symbolism was called in the 20th c. the "lost" or "forgotten" lang. (Bayley, Fromm).

It may be said, then, that the evolution of symbolism began with the evolution of primitive humanity. It was not until the med. period, however, that symbols and the interpretation of symbols became a branch of learning. The patristic trad. of biblical *exegesis, heavily under the influence of the Platonic and Neoplatonic schools of thought, developed standards and procedures for the doctrinal interpretation of scripture according to four levels of meaning—literal, allegorical, moral and tropological, and anagogic. The purpose was twofold: to reconcile the OT with the NT and to reconcile various difficult portions of each with Catholic teaching. Thus, e.g., while the Song of Songs is a mildly erotic wedding poem on the literal level, its true meaning on the allegorical level is the "marriage" of Christ and the Church.

This exegetical trad. evolved during the 16th c. into Ren. nature philosophy and, under the influence of the mysticism of the Ger. Jakob Boehme (1575–1624) and the Swede Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), into the doctrine of correspondences, which viewed the external world as a system of symbols revealing the spiritual world in material form. By the romantic period, the view that nature is the visual lang. of God or spirit became established as one of the mainstays of poetry, but two fundamental shifts had occurred: the material and spiritual worlds were seen as merged rather than related simply as representation to the thing represented; and, as a result, the meaning of symbols became less fixed and more ambiguous (Seward, Sewell, Hirst, Wimsatt, Todorov, and Adams).

Out of this romantic trad. grew a large and influential 20th-c. movement that tried to reunite what the Reformation and science ostensibly had sundered. Following the lead of such writers as Urban, Cassirer, Langer, and Wheelwright, mod. philosophers and critics developed a set of concepts whereby the lang. of symbols can be regarded as having as much epistemological status as—if not more than—the lang. of fact and reason. The question, therefore, is as follows: if the latter refers to the "real" or "objective" world, and is subject to test and verification, what does the former refer to, and does it too have analogous evaluative procedures?

The answers range along a spectrum: at the one extreme are the positivists, who say that the lang. of fact and science is the only true lang. and, therefore, that all other langs. are nonsense; at the other end are the mystics, who claim that the lang. of fact and science is trivial and that the only true lang. is that of symbols. Northrop Frye, in Anatomy of Criticism, however, falls off the spectrum altogether: neither world for him, at least as literary critic, exists. He simply postulates that there is an "order" of lit., that this order has an objective existence in the totality of literary texts, and that it is based on the fundamental seasonal monomyth of death and rebirth (see ARCHETYPE).

Closer to the center are two other positions that seek either to balance this subject-object split or to reconcile it. The first is exemplified by I. A. Richards, who accepted the distinction between scientific and poetic lang. but then proceeded to accord to the latter a status and value of its own. Thus, he distinguished between "referential" lang., the lang. of fact and science, and "emotive" lang., the lang. of poetry. The status and value of the latter were found in its ability to arouse and organize our emotions, thus giving poetry some sort of psychological and therapeutic if not metaphysical "truth." The *New Criticism, not entirely satisfied with this distinction, claimed further that poetry gives us another and "higher" kind of truth, a truth of human existence that is more complex and profound than that of mere fact and science.

The reconcilers, exemplified chiefly by Cassirer and Langer and their followers, claim that all langs., whether of science or poetry, or of any in between, are various ways in which the human mind constructs reality for itself and, therefore, that all our knowledges give pictures of reality rather than reality itself. For this school, humanity has not "lost" or "forgotten" the lang. of symbols; it has merely come to prefer one kind of symbolic lang. to another.

Such is the process of hist., however, that this ambitious theory itself has been turned inside out, and later movements have claimed that, since all our langs. are equally symbolic, they are all equally meaningless—at least insofar as the quest for "objective" truth is concerned. Thus, we find the theory of "paradigms" in the philosophy of science (Kuhn, Rorty; see SCIENCE AND POETRY), which says that scientific hypotheses are merely arbitrary constructs that may appear true in one era but are supplanted by other hypotheses in another era— "truth" being more a matter of cultural convenience, mental set, and consensus than of objective verifiability. And we find the theory of deconstruction in ling. and lit. theory and crit. (Culler), which claims that, since the relation between signifier and signified is arbitrary, lang. itself carries multiple meanings.

Another and somewhat more "rational" approach, represented by Wimsatt (1954), Kermode, and Fingesten, and anticipated by Whitehead, is that symbols, since they come between ourselves and reality, can be the agents of distortion and error as well as of knowledge and insight. Thus, they urge that the subjective be balanced by the objective.

II. In Poetry. To the reader considering how to recognize and interpret symbols in poetry, these philosophical disputes may seem not only bewildering but irrelevant. However, one's practical approach to symbols will be governed in large part by one's theory, for a critic's use of any given term is determined by the assumptions he or she makes about lit., lang., and reality, and by the kind of knowledge sought.

Olson (in Crane), e.g., as a neo-Aristotelian, is primarily concerned with literary works in their aspect as artistic wholes of certain kinds; therefore, he regards symbolism as a device that is sometimes used in the service of the work's artistic effect—to aid in the expression of remote ideas, to vivify what otherwise would be faint, to aid in framing the reader's emotional reactions, and the like. Yeats, by contrast, is primarily interested in the suggestive powers of poetry, so he extends his definition of symbolism to include not only images, *metaphors, and *myths, but all the "musical relations" of a poem—*rhythm, *diction, *rhyme, *sound. Or again, Wheelwright, Langer, Cassirer, and Urban, as antipositivists, are concerned to defend poetry as having epistemological status, so they stress symbolism's powers of bodying forth nondiscursive meaning, truth, or vision. Burke, as a student of lang. in terms of human motives, deduces the form of a literary work from speculations as to how it functions in relation to the poet's inner life, so he emphasizes how various elements of that work symbolize an enactment of the poet's psychological tensions.

But the simplest way to begin interpretation is to regard symbols, although they may derive from literal or figurative images or both, as a kind of figurative lang. in which what is shown (normally referring to something material) means, by virtue of some sort of resemblance, suggestion, or association, something more or something else (normally immaterial).

A. Identification. When interpreting symbols in a poem, it is helpful to begin by identifying its *figuration—incl. metaphor, *metonymy, and *synecdoche—and analyzing the source of those figures in experience, whether from the natural world, the human body, human-made artifacts, or so on. We then proceed to ask how the figures in question are something other than literal. A figure may present itself as figurative in several ways, notably (1) it may be presented as if it were literal, but as it develops we see that it is, rather, a dream, a vision, a fantasy, or an imaginary action and, hence, must be understood entirely on a symbolic level, as is the case in W. B. Yeats's "Sailing to Byzantium," where the speaker talks about crossing the sea and coming to the holy city, which seems literally improbable; (2) there is a literal action and situation, but certain metaphors and *similes are presented in relation to one another and to the literal action so as to produce an additional level of meaning—by way of expanded, recurring, or clustered figures (Burke, Brower).

Thus, symbolism resembles figures of speech in having a basic doubleness of meaning between what is meant and what is said (*tenor and vehicle, but it differs in that what is said is also what is meant. The "vehicle" is also a "tenor," so a symbolism may be said to be a metaphor in reverse, where the vehicle has been expanded and put in place of the tenor, while the tenor has been left to implication [cf. Bartel]). And this applies even to recurring figures within a literal action, because such figures are embedded in a context of more complex relationships within the work as a whole rather than occurring simply as figures per se.

Similarly, symbolism resembles allegory. Technically, allegory refers to the use of personified abstractions in a literary work. Edmund Spenser's The Faerie Queene is a standard example: the Redcrosse Knight represents the Christian soul, Duessa the duplicity of temptation, Una the true Church, and so on. Not only the characters may be allegorical, however; the setting and actions may follow suit. Thus, the work in its entirety may be allegorical. The difference between this form and symbolic works is that allegory begins with the tenor, the vehicle being constructed to fit, while symbol begins with the vehicle and the tenor is discovered, elicited, or evoked from it. Beginning with J. W. Goethe and S. T. Coleridge, this distinction was turned into a value judgment, with allegory being condemned as didactic and artificial and symbol being praised as natural and organic. This judgment became a commonplace of romantic and mod. crit., until a line of defense was established for allegory by more recent critics such as Honig, Fletcher, Hayes, de Man, Brett, Bloomfield, Todorov, and Adams. De Man, in particular, developed a detailed contrast between symbol and allegory as modes of representation distinguished by their avoidance and acknowledgment, respectively, of temporality in human existence; he proceeded from this contrast to build a critique of romantic ideology, esp. the romantics' celebration of symbol over allegory.

B. Interpretation. Once we know that something in the figurative inventory of a poem is symbolic, we need to see how it became so and, therefore, what it means. As a final practical suggestion, we will inquire into the various ways in which links may be established between a figure and an idea to form a symbol.

(1) The connection, as in metaphor and simile, may be based on resemblance, as mentioned above. A great many natural and universal symbols arise in this way: accomplishing something is like climbing a mountain, making a transition in life is like a journey to a new land, and so on. Examples are to be found everywhere in poetry (Bevan, Kimpel, Frye, Douglas, Embler), as well as in everyday usage.

(2) The link may evolve into an associative connection by virtue of repetition, as when a metaphor or simile is repeated so often, either in the work of a single author or in literary trad., that the vehicle can be used alone to summon up the tenor to which it was usually attached, somewhat in the manner of a code. An example is found by comparing Stéphane Mallarmé's swan imagery in "Le Vierge, le vivace et le bel aujourd'hui" with Yeats's in "Leda and the Swan" and "Among School Children."

(3) The connection may be based on the internal relationships that obtain among the elements of a given work, whereby one thing becomes associated with another by virtue of structural emphasis, arrangement, position, or devel. (which is, of course, true to some degree in all works containing symbols). Examples are the wall as division between the primitive and civilized in Robert Frost, the guitar and the color blue as the aesthetic imagination in Wallace Stevens, and the island as complacency and the sea as courage in W. H. Auden.

(4) The connection may be based on primitive and magical associations, as when the loss of a man's hair symbolizes the loss of strength (Samson) or the rejection of worldly desires (monastic and ascetic practice), not because of any resemblance between them but rather because a mythic and ritualistic relationship has been established among secondary sex characteristics, virility, and desire. The underlying sterility/fertility symbolism in T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land is a conspicuous example.

(5) The connection may be derived from a particular historical convention, such as the transmutation of lead to gold as redemption, the lily as chastity and the rose as passion, or the fish as Christ (Hirst). A noted poetic instance is Yeats's use of the Rosy Cross, derived from Rosicrucianism, to symbolize the joining of flesh and spirit.

(6) The connection may derive from some private system invented by the poet—e.g., the phases of the moon as the cycles of hist. combined with the psychology of individuals in Yeats, or embalmment as an obstacle that cannot be overcome in the attempt to resurrect the spirit in Dylan Thomas (Olson 1954).

Critics rightly warn that symbolic associations should be neither too explicit nor too fixed, for implications of this sort are better felt than explained and they vary from work to work depending on the individual context (see, e.g., Carlson, Mischel, Cary, Wimsatt 1965, and Todorov).

See CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION, CONVENTION, POLYSEMY.

■ W. B. Yeats, "The Symbolism of Poetry," Ideas of Good and Evil (1903); H. Bayley, The Lost Language of Symbolism, 2 v. (1912); D. A. Mackenzie, The Migration of Symbols (1926); I. A. Richards, Science and Poetry (1926); A. N. Whitehead, Symbolism (1927); H. F. Dunbar, Symbolism in Medieval Thought (1929); E. Bevan, Symbolism and Belief (1938); W. M. Urban, Language and Reality (1939); K. Burke, The Philosophy of Literary Form (1941); S. K. Langer, Philosophy in a New Key (1942); C. M. Bowra, The Heritage of Symbolism (1943); E. Cassirer, An Essay on Man (1944), and Language and Myth, trans. S. Langer (1946); E. W. Carlson, "The Range of Symbolism in Poetry," South Atlantic Quarterly 48 (1949); M. Foss, Symbol and Metaphor in Human Experience (1949); R. Hertz, Chance and Symbol (1949); R. A. Brower, The Fields of Light (1951); E. Fromm, The Forgotten Language (1951); T. Mischel, "The Meanings of 'Symbol' in Literature," Arizona Quarterly 8 (1952); E. Olson, "A Dialogue on Symbolism," Crane; "Symbol and Symbolism," spec. iss., YFS 9 (1952); H. D. Duncan, Language and Literature in Society (1953); C. Feidelson Jr., Symbolism in American Literature (1953); "Symbolism," spec. iss., JAAC 12 (1953); E. Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, trans. R. Manheim, 3 v. (1953–57); B. Kimpel, The Symbols of Religious Faith (1954); E. Olson, The Poetry of Dylan Thomas (1954); P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain (1954); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954); Symbols and Values (1954) and Symbols and Society (1955), both ed. L. Bryson et al.; F. F. Nesbit, Language, Meaning and Reality (1955); W. Y. Tindall, The Literary Symbol (1955); Wellek and Warren, ch. 15; Frye; F. Kermode, Romantic Image (1957); S. K. Langer, Problems of Art (1957); J. Cary, Art and Reality (1958); E. Honig, Dark Conceit (1959); J. W. Beach, Obsessive Images (1960); Literary Symbolism, ed. M. Beebe (1960); Metaphor and Symbolism, ed. L. C. Knights and B. Cottle (1960); B. Seward, The Symbolic Rose (1960); Symbolism in Religion and Literature, ed. R. May (1960); H. Musurillo, Symbol and Myth in Ancient Poetry (1961); E. Sewell, The Orphic Voice (1961); T. J. Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions (1962); R. Ross, Symbols and Civilization (1962); Truth, Myth, and Symbol, ed. T.J.J. Altizer et al. (1962); P. Wheelwright, Metaphor and Reality (1962); Myth and Symbol, ed. B. Slote (1963); A. Fletcher, Allegory (1964); D. Hirst, Hidden Riches (1964); E. Sewell, The Human Metaphor (1964); Literary Symbolism, ed. H. Rehder (1965); W. K. Wimsatt, Hateful Contraries (1965); K. Burke, Language as Symbolic Action (1966); W. Embler, Metaphor and Meaning (1966); G. Hough, An Essay on Criticism (1966); N. Goodman, Languages of Art (1968); Perspectives on Literary Symbolism, ed. J. P. Strelka (1968); R. Wellek, "Symbol and Symbolism in Literature," DHI; R. L. Brett, Fancy and Imagination (1969); H. D. Duncan, Symbols and Social Theory (1969); C. Hayes, "Symbol and Allegory," Germanic Review 44 (1969); Interpretation, ed. C. S. Singleton (1969); M. Douglas, Natural Symbols (1970); P. Fingesten, The Eclipse of Symbolism (1970); C. Chadwick, Symbolism (1971); J. R. Barth, The Symbolic Imagination (1977); R. Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1979); Symbol, Myth, and Culture, ed. D. P. Verene (1979); Literature, Criticism and Myth, ed. J. P. Strelka (1980); Allegory, Myth, and Symbol, ed. M. Bloomfield (1981); J. D. Culler, On Deconstruction (1982); T. Todorov, Theories of the Symbol, and Symbolism and Interpretation, both trans. C. Porter (1982); H. Adams, Philosophy of the Literary Symbolic (1983); R. Bartel, Metaphors and Symbols (1983); de Man, "The Rhetoric of Temporality"; J. Whitman, "From the Textual to the Temporal: Early Christian 'Allegory' and Early Romantic 'Symbol,'" NLH 22 (1991); Morier; D. Fried, "The Politics of the Coleridgean Symbol," SEL 46 (2006); N. Halmi, The Genesis of the Romantic Symbol (2007); R. E. Innis, "The Making of the Literary Symbol: Taking Note of Langer," Semiotica 165 (2007).

N. Friedman

SYMBOLISM

I. Origins and Characteristics
II. History and Evolution
III. Criticism

A major artistic movement of the late 19th and early 20th cs., which included lit. (esp. poetry, but also drama and prose), visual arts, and music. Like many "-isms," it is impossible to define precisely; some of its leading practitioners avoided the term entirely, while others embraced it but construed it idiosyncratically. It is often associated with other labels—*decadence, *aestheticism, neoromanticism, hermeticism, modernismo, and *imagism. As a self-conscious "school," symbolism had its greatest flowering in France and, somewhat later, in Russia; however, it was a truly pan-Eur. phenomenon, in one way or another influencing major figures in most national lit. trads., e.g., R. M. Rilke and Stefan George in Germany; Hugo von Hofmannsthal in Austria; Federico García Lorca in Spain; Gabriele D'Annunzio in Italy; and W. B. Yeats, T. S. Eliot, and Ezra Pound in the Eng.-speaking world. Fr. symbolism also left an indelible mark on South America (esp. in the seminal work of Rubén Darío) and in Asia, both in Japan, where Ueda Bin's trans. of Fr. poetry had an enormous impact on subsequent poets, and in China, notably in the work of Lin Jinfa and Dai Wangshu.

I. Origins and Characteristics. The word symbol goes back to the Greek noun symbolon (sign, token), suggesting things that are split in two and need to be rejoined to obtain their full value. Since the concept of the *symbol is found in virtually all cultures, it can hardly be seen as the distinctive feature of the symbolist movement. What distinguishes the symbolists is not their reliance on symbols, but rather their understanding of the term, which drew on Ger. aesthetic thought of the 18th and early 19th cs. As part of this trad., J. W. Goethe praised "symbol" at the expense of "*allegory," the former being dynamic, the latter schematic. According to his argument, a symbol does not function as a standard *metaphor (naming one thing by another), but rather as a *synecdoche, using a specific instance to designate a general principle or abstract concept. Goethe intimated (and the symbolists developed this line of thinking) that the symbol offered—if only fleetingly—a means of reaching beyond a physical phenomenon to the otherwise inexpressible realm of the eternal. Neither Goethe nor the symbolists recognized a fixed one-to-one correspondence between the physical and the metaphysical; few poems attempt to spell out a specific "meaning" of the symbol. Charles Baudelaire's sonnet "Correspondances," often seen as a seminal text of symbolism, features a typically elusive exploration of nature's "forests of symbols." To the symbolist, symbols are multivalent, allowing broad interpretive possibilities. As Yeats wrote in an essay on P. B. Shelley: "It is only by symbols that have numberless meanings . . . that any highly subjective art can escape from the barrenness and shallowness of a too conscious arrangement, into the abundance and depth of nature." According to such a conception, the rose is not simply a symbol of love or of death but a combination of all the significations it has possessed in countless cultures through the ages.

In contrast to decadence and naturalism, both of which denied the existence of a world beyond the quotidian, symbolism considered physical reality either a distorted reflection or a too-faint echo of the world of essences. The paradigm of the former would be Plato's cave allegory, of the latter the mystical Tabula smaragdina (emerald tablet) of Hermes Trismegistus, according to which "things below are copies." Establishing a connection to a higher, spiritual reality was a symbolist preoccupation. However, there was little consensus on how to achieve this goal. One finds a range of possibilities within symbolism, at times within the work of a single poet: (1) a theory of discovery, whereby maximum receptivity (contemplation of the natural world) leads directly to a visionary moment; (2) a theory of invention, requiring a heroic act of will to transform the phenomenal world; (3) a recognition of an inability to achieve true transcendence, hence a focus on the moment of anticipation that precedes it. A fourth position, which disregards the very possibility of transcendence and luxuriates in the world's imminent demise, should be labeled as decadent, not symbolist; but it can be found with some frequency in the works of the symbolists, whether as a pose or as a conviction (Paul Verlaine's "Je suis l'Empire à la fin de la décadence," Valerii Briusov's "Griadushchie gunny" [Coming Huns]).

The Rus. symbolist Viacheslav Ivanov formulated the symbolist program with the slogan a realibus ad realiora (from the real to the more real). To receive access to the "more real" demanded a special type of visionary poet and poetic technique. Symbolists were open to virtually any means of encountering this mysterious "other" world—from erudite studies of philosophy (Plato and the Neoplatonists), religion (orgiastic cults of antiquity, med. mystics), lit., and myth (of all nations) to immersion in hermeticism (magic, astrology, alchemy, the occult), and experiments in personal life with séances, alcohol, and mind-altering drugs. Symbolist perception reflected what Stéphane Mallarmé called "changes in our basic mental disposition." It was apt to mix the senses—hence the centrality of *synaesthesia from Baudelaire's "Correspondances" to Arthur Rimbaud's "Voyelles," where each vowel is assigned a color, to the composer Alexander Scriabin, who assigned specific colors to musical keys and chords.

Musicality is arguably a part of all poetry, but the extent to which the symbolists turned to music was unprecedented. Ger. aesthetic thought prepared the way: Arthur Schopenhauer had granted music the highest status of the arts. Richard Wagner's operas exemplified the marriage of text and music, and his notion of the Gesamtkunstwerk encouraged a wide range of theories about the synthesis of the arts. The first Fr. symbolist journal was called La Revue Wagnerienne, and the vogue for Wagner can be traced through the Rus. periodical lit. as well. Music frequently enters symbolist poetry as a theme but also as an ideal. In his programmatic "Art poétique," Verlaine insisted on the nature of poetry as "Music above all else" ("De la musique avant toute chose"); the very title of his book Romances sans paroles (Songs without Words) underlines this musical orientation. In Russia, Andrei Bely (pseud. of Boris Bugayev) initiated his career by writing "symphonies," rhythmic prose works divided into "movements" and using numbered leitmotifs. Another way to create a musical quality in poetry was technical, based on a high degree of *assonance or *alliteration that produced an effect of incantation, e.g., Verlaine's "Chanson d'automne" or Konstantin Bal'mont's "Pesnia bez slov" (Song without Words). Often the symbolist poet chooses words on the strength of their sound rather than their sense or, put another way, believes that specific sounds supply a priori meanings. The most abstract of the arts, music was praised for its suggestivity, a means of hinting at something without actually naming it. The creation of a mood, rather than a precise subject, aligned symbolist poetry with music, and it made new demands on the reader.

The interest in music led to increased attention to formal questions of verse. René Ghil sought to determine a scientific basis for the correlation between instrumental sound and sound combinations in poetic lang. Other Fr. symbolists (e.g., Gustave Kahn) argued for a return to med. verse forms and irregular line length. Some of the most important work of Baudelaire and Rimbaud is in the form of prose poems, a genre that takes the immediacy and musicality of poetry without its formal constraints. The Rus. symbolists likewise extended the technical possibilities of verse; they domesticated accentual verse, esp. the dol'nik, which was introduced by Zinaida Gippius and canonized by Alexander Blok, and intricate Eur. models, ranging from sapphic stanzas to terza rima*. They initiated a *sonnet renaissance, including such tours de force as the crown of sonnets and the sonetto di risposta (a sonnet written in response to another, using the same rhymes).

Though inspiration could not be taught—and the symbolists believed in the Poet with the capital letter, the seer—they also believed in craft. E. A. Poe's "The Philosophy of Composition" was a key precursor text. In both France and Russia, poetry circles were formed around a venerable figure. The Tuesday meetings led by Mallarmé had their counterpart a decade later in the Wednesday symposia at Ivanov's Tower in St. Petersburg. Stefan George, who had visited Mallarmé's gatherings, created a similar circle in Germany. These meetings had a major impact on their respective national cultures, serving as both a training ground for young poets and a locus for open philosophical colloquy.

The themes of symbolism are perhaps its least distinctive feature. The Fr. symbolist landscape is marked by repeated images: gray skies; a variety of birds and flying creatures such as fireflies and bees; a topography of wastelands, glaciers, stagnant pools, frozen parks, fossilized and shining stones. These melancholy vistas suggest an end-of-the-world lassitude, a notion of festering beauty, a general sense of mortality, but also the possibility of an encounter with the absolute. Themes of Rus. symbolism range from "decadent" ennui, demonism (often in specifically Rus. variants), and urban debauchery (influenced by Baudelaire) to the eternal feminine (originating in Goethe but refracted through Rus. Sophiology) and Russia herself as a force of mystical renewal.

Though lyric poetry was the central genre of symbolism, drama was by no means neglected. Many of the major symbolist poets turned to the theater; but few of their plays were successful, and virtually none has entered the permanent repertoire. This drama tended to eschew conflict between characters in favor of dream or reflection. Psychology—in terms of standard human motivations (greed, revenge, power)—is often entirely absent. Even love is on a purely spiritual plane, hence the absence of traditional love plots. The characters, faceless or masked, exist in a mythical or undefined place with little resemblance to the contemp. world. The lang. is hieratic, often in verse, consciously avoiding the vernacular. Symbolist theater mystified an audience accustomed to realist drama, yet it left a significant legacy to the 20th c. in terms of acting, directing, and mise en scène. Its static quality (repetition of action, of key words, and even of entire phrases) and spiritual nature forced directors to think about presentation, about redefining the relationship of actor and audience. This theater aspired to music; it is noteworthy that Maurice Maeterlinck's drama Pelléas et Mélisande is now known only as the source of the libretto for Claude Debussy's opera. It is likewise revealing that Vsevelod Meyerhold, the great innovator of "antirealist" modernist theater, was a champion of Rus. symbolist drama, directing and playing the lead role in Blok's Balaganchik (The Puppet Booth). Meyerhold applauded and tried to implement Ivanov's idea that the theater should remove the physical and spiritual boundaries that separate audience and actor, uniting them in the spirit of religious rites of antiquity.

In France, the concept of the novel with its centrality of narrative was generally viewed as inimical to symbolism (J.-K. Huysmans's work, e.g., is not considered symbolist, but rather decadent.) However, the Rus. symbolists produced any number of plot-oriented novels, the best of which were admired in their own time and are now canonical. Fyodor Sologub's Melkii bes (The Petty Demon), at once an homage and a parody of the great Rus. 19th-c. novelistic trad., gives an unforgettable picture of the madness of a sadistic provincial schoolteacher. While Sologub grounds his style in the prose of his realist predecessors, Bely produced a true symbolist prose, unique and immediately recognizable in its syntax, punctuation, repetitions of words and phrases, sound orchestration, and protocubist portrayals of people and scenes. Serebrianyi golub' (The Silver Dove) revolves around a poet's encounter with an orgiastic cult of provincial sectarians, while the urban Petersburg concerns the revolutionary events of 1905 as reflected in the family of a high-ranking civil servant.

Both personally and spiritually, the symbolists had close ties to visual art. Virtually all the significant Fr. artists of the period (e.g., the Nabis and the Pont Aven school, as well as Georges Seurat and Paul Gauguin) were in one way or another connected to symbolism. Some of Verlaine's most celebrated poems (Fêtes galantes) were inspired by Antoine Watteau. The impressionist Edouard Manet, a close friend of Mallarmé, illustrated the poet's "L'Après-midi d'un faune" as well as his prose trans. of Poe's "The Raven." Leading Fr. symbolist artists include Pierre Puvis de Chavannes and Odilon Redon; the latter produced lithographs for Mallarmé's Un coup de dés. Redon was acquainted with a number of Rus. symbolists as well, and his work was featured in an issue of the Rus. symbolist journal Libra. Though Mikhail Vrubel's dreamlike canvases were the fullest visual expression of the Rus. symbolist spirit, the symbolists themselves were more closely affiliated with members of the Petersburg Mir isskustva (World of Art) movement, noted esp. for its interest in "prerealist" depictions of earlier, more stylized epochs.

II. History and Evolution. Scholars of Fr. lit. usually distinguish between the small group of minor poets who consciously called themselves symbolists and the truly major poets who either predated the term (Baudelaire and to a considerable extent Mallarmé, who had written most of his work before the movement existed) or were simply not eager to accept this appellation (Verlaine, Rimbaud). The term symbolism was coined in 1885 by Jean Moréas (pseud. of Jean Papadiamantopoulos, a Gr. by nationality, living in Paris), who used it in contradistinction to decadence. Moréas was soon forgotten, and he himself rejected the movement within a few years. However, the name caught on and came to be associated with all Fr. poetry of the period and subsequently with kindred souls such as Paul Valéry and Paul Claudel. Symbolism was less a Fr. phenomenon than a Parisian one, which is to say that Paris, as the cultural capital of Europe, attracted aspiring poets from all over the world and turned them into symbolists. Hence, the "Fr." symbolists include Belgians (Emile Verhaeren, Maeterlinck), Grs. like Moréas, and Ams. (Francis Viélé-Griffin and Stuart Merrill). The fact that Rilke, George, Hofmannsthal, Yeats, J. M. Synge, Miguel de Unamuno, and D'Annunzio gravitated to Paris by the end of the century ensured that the innovations of Fr. poetry would be widely disseminated.

In Russia, the first inklings of symbolism occurred in the early 1890s. Dimitri Merezhkovsky praised it as a method in an 1892 essay; a book of his poetry called Symbols appeared that same year. A year later Briusov published the first of three miscellanies called Russian Symbolists. The second, "younger" generation—so-called not because of their age but because of their later appearance on the cultural scene—includes Ivanov, Blok, and Bely, the movement's greatest theoretician, poet, and prose writer, respectively. This generation viewed the Fr. influence as superficial; they traced their inspiration to Rus. sources—esp. the romantic poet Fyodor Tiutchev, the "realist" novelist Fyodor Dostoevsky, the mystic philosopher Vladimir Soloviev—and to Germany (Goethe, Novalis, Friedrich Nietzsche, Wagner). Since both generations often collaborated, the distinction is largely heuristic, indicating tendencies subject to exception. However, the younger symbolists were more overtly philosophical and religious. They had a more ambitious program; in their thinking, symbolism is a worldview, a means for cognizing, changing and—in Bely's conception—even creating reality.

III. Criticism. Fr. critics consider the label symbolist applicable to poets in the 15-year period of 1885–1900. Non-Fr. critics go back to Baudelaire and include Verlaine, Mallarmé, and Rimbaud. Although Rimbaud coexisted with the symbolists, his theories about the poet as "seer" emerged in his "voyant" letter (see SURREALISM) published posthumously in 1912. Edmund Wilson's Axel's Castle (1931; the title refers to a play by Auguste Villiers de l'Isle-Adam) popularized the symbolist movement in America, as did Arthur Symons's The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899, rev. 1919)—dedicated to and admired by Yeats—in England and Ireland. Though symbolism dominated Rus. cultural life in the first decade of the 20th c., its hegemony was forcefully challenged by other movements (e.g., *acmeism and *futurism) and its legacy distorted by political events. With the exception of Blok (whose ambiguous poem The Twelve was read as a canonic Soviet text), the Rus. symbolists were rarely republished or studied in the USSR.

See FRANCE, POETRY OF; IMAGERY; POÈTE MAUDIT; PURE POETRY; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS; RUSSIA, POETRY OF.

■ Bibliographies: H. Krawitz, A Post-Symbolist Bibliography (1973); D. L. Anderson, Symbolism: A Bibliography (1975). P. Davidson, Viacheslav Ivanov: A Reference Guide (1996).

■ Criticism: A. Symons, The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899, rev. ed. 1919); R. Taupin, L'Influence du symbolisme français sur la poésie américaine (de 1910 À 1920), rev., trans, and ed. W. Pratt ([1929] 1985); E. Wilson, Axel's Castle (1931); M. Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933); P. Valéry, Existence du Symbolisme (1939); S. Johansen, Le Symbolisme (1945); G. Michaud, Message poétique du symbolisme, 3 v. (1947), and Documents (1947); T. S. Eliot, From Poe to Valéry (1948); A. G. Lehman, The Symbolist Aesthetic in France (1885–95) (1950); K. Cornell, The Symbolist Movement (1951); Index du vocabulaire du symbolisme, ed. P. Guiraud, (1953–60); RR 46.3 (1955)—spec. iss.; K. Cornell, The Post-Symbolist Period (1958); G. Donchin, The Influence of French Symbolism on Russian Poetry (1958); H. M. Block, Mallarmé and the Symbolist Drama (1963); P. Ricoeur, "Le Symbolisme et l'explication structurale," Cahiers Internationaux du Symbolisme 4 (1964); A. Balakian, The Symbolist Movement (1967);

R. Wellek, "The Term and Concept of Symbolism in Literary History," Discriminations (1970); T. Todorov, Théories du symbole (1977), trans. C. Porter (1982); J. P. Houston, French Symbolism and the Modernist Movement (1980); An Anthology of French Symbolist Poetry, ed. J. P. Houston and M. T. Houston (1980); Symbolism, ed. T. G. West (1980); K. Tu, "The Introduction of French Symbolism into Modern Chinese and Japanese Poetry," Tamkang Review 10 (1980); The Symbolist Movement in the Literature of European Languages, ed. A. Balakian (1982); P. Florence, Mallarmé, Manet and Rodin (1986); Andrey Bely, ed. J. E. Malmstad (1987); D. M. Hertz, The Tuning of the Word (1987); P. Hoffmann, Symbolismus (1987); J. Kearns, Symbolist Landscapes (1989); W. Fowlie, Poem and Symbol (1990); K. Newmark, Beyond Symbolism (1991); A. Pyman, A History of Russian Symbolism (1994); Creating Life: The Aesthetic Utopia of Russian Modernism, ed. J. Grossman and I. Paperno (1994); R. Keys, The Reluctant Modernist: Bely and Russian Fiction (1996); A. Wanner, Baudelaire in Russia (1996); S. Morrison, Russian Opera and the Symbolist Movement (2002); O. Matich, Erotic Utopia (2005); J. Acquisto, French Symbolist Poetry and the Idea of Music (2006).

M. Wachtel

SYNAERESIS (Gr., "drawing together"). The coalescing of two contiguous vowels within a word, usually for metrical purposes, e.g., theoi for thĕoĭ (Iliad 1.18) or Thēudŏsĭŭs for Thĕŏdŏsĭŭs. Strictly speaking, synaeresis in Gr. denotes coalescing, where the second vowel is iota or upsilon, in order to form a diphthong. This is indicated in Gr. by the cornois mark (equivalent to smooth breathing). The term is often confused with or synonymous with synizesis, *syncope, and *synaloepha. An Eng. example would be "seest" for "seēst." In the opening line of Paradise Lost, "Of Man's First Disobedience, and the Fruit," the ie in "Disobedience" changes to what is called a "y-glide," reducing the word from five syllables to four. But to some degree, synaeresis is simply a normal linguistic process frequently carried on in ordinary speech, of which the poet takes advantage for writing verse with regulated syllable count: several words have syllabically alternative forms, e.g., "heaven" as both disyllable and monosyllable. Coalescing of vowels across a word boundary (end of one word, beginning of next) is synaloepha.

See elision.

■ Allen; Morier; West.

T.V.F. Brogan; R. A. Hornsby; J. W. Halporn

SYNAESTHESIA. The phenomenon in which one sense is felt, perceived, or described in terms of another, e.g., describing a voice as velvety or sweet or a trumpet blast as scarlet ("To the bugle," says Emily Dickinson, "every color is red"). In poetics, it is usually considered a species of *metaphor. Evidence for synaesthesia in lit. is ancient and cross-cultural; its critical conceptualization in the West, however, dates from the 18th c., and a specific term for it appeared only in 1891 (Century Dictionary). In the literary sense, it seems to have been first employed by Jules Millet in 1892. Synaesthesia was popularized by two *sonnets, Charles Baudelaire's "Correspondances" (1857) and Arthur Rimbaud's "Voyelles" (1871), as well as by J.-K. Huysmans's novel À rebours (1884); from these sources, it became one of the central tenets of *symbolism. The device had been widely employed earlier in Ger. and Eng. romantic poetry, and it also can be found in some of the earliest lit. of the West (in the Iliad 3.152, the voices of the old Trojans are likened to the "lily-like" voices of cicadas; in the Iliad 3.222, Odysseus's words fall like winter snowflakes; and in the Odyssey 12.187, in the "honey-voice" of the Sirens). In Aeschylus's Persians (395), "the trumpet set all the shores ablaze with its sound." In the Bible, Heb. 6.5 and Rev. 1.12 refer to "tasting" the word of God and "seeing" a voice. Dante refers to a place "where the sun is silent" (Inferno 1.60). John Donne mentions a "loud perfume," Richard Crashaw a "sparkling noyse." P. B. Shelley refers to the fragrance of the hyacinth as "music," Heinrich Heine to words "sweet as moonlight and delicate as the scent of the rose."

Synaesthesia as the expression of intersense analogues has been exploited in lit. for a variety of effects, particularly increase of textural richness, complication, and unification. It is evident that other kinds of metaphor, esp. in the *tenor and vehicle model, and *simile can also approximate the same kinds of suggestion, albeit in looser and more taxonomic forms. Shelley, one of the first Eng. poets to use synaesthesia extensively, employs it particularly in connection with visionary and mystical states of transcendental union ("Alastor," "Epipsychidion," "The Triumph of Life"); in these, synaesthesia suggests not only a greater "refinement and complexity of sensuous experience" but a "harmony or synthesis of all sensations" and a kind of "supersensuous unity" (O'Malley 1964). Cf. Baudelaire's "métamorphose mystique / De tous mes sens fondus en un" ("Toute Entière").

Because of its susceptibility to modify "inappropriate" objects (Meltzer), color has a long hist. of metaphorical richness, and the critical lit. has paid particular attention to it. One important species of synaesthesia is audition colorée, in which sound (or even silence) is described in terms of colors. Silence is "perfumed" (Rimbaud), "black" (Pindar, Peretz Markish), "dark" (James Macpherson, Ossian), "green" (Giosuè Carducci, Georg Trakl), "silver" (Oscar Wilde), "blue" (Gabriele D'Annunzio), "purple" (David Fogel), "chill" (Edith Sitwell), "green water" (Louis Aragon). Perhaps the most famous example of the use of synaesthesia in poetry is Rimbaud's sonnet "Voyelles" (Vowels) beginning "A noir, E blanc, I rouge, U vert, O bleu, voyelles . . ." Such terms as "golden voice," coloratura soprano, "chromatic scale," Ger. Klangfarbe (sound-color; see timbre) show the assimilation of audition colorée into both common and scholarly usage. More important still is the "light–dark" opposition in vowels first demonstrated by Köhler in 1910 and subsequently shown to exist in many of the world's langs.: Köhler argued that this opposition is not merely metaphorical but, in fact, a feature of all the senses resulting from some "central physiological perceptual correlate."

The related term synaesthesis appears in the late 19th c. in the course of evolving psychological theories of beauty to mean a wholeness in perception or anti-atomism in epistemology. I. A. Richards takes up this term for his psychological theory of crit. as part of his neurologically derived account of literary value (Principles of Literary Criticism, 1925): he too uses it in the sense of "wholeness" to refer to the synergistic nature of sense-experience, wherein wholes, "sensation-complexes," are greater than the sum of their parts (see UNITY).

The increasing interest in synaesthesia not only in psychology but in neuroscience, ling., and other fields has enhanced the interest in, and study of, literary synaesthesia. Literary critics have begun looking at various kinds of pseudosynaesthesia or "conceptual synaesthesia" (Sacks)—i.e., the use of concepts or other nonsensory objects as sensory data—to understand better the metaphorical relationships between the senses and how this metaphorical resource is used in the construction of poetic discourses.

See COGNITIVE POETICS, PSYCHOLOGY AND POETICS.

■ Criticism, General: W. Köhler, "Akustische Untersuchungen," Zeits. für Psychologie 54–72 (1910–15); J. E. Downey, "Literary Synesthesia," Journal of Philosophy, Psychology and Scientific Methods 9 (1912); A. Wellek, "Das Doppelempfinden im abendländischen Altertum und Mittelalter," and "Zur Geschichte und Kritik des Synästhesie-Forschung," Archiv für die gesamte Psychologie 79–80 (1931); W. B. Stanford, Greek Metaphor (1936) and "Synaesthetic Metaphor," Comparative Literature Studies 6–7 (1942); A. G. Engstrom, "In Defense of Synaesthesia in Literature," PQ 25 (1946); S. Ullmann, The Principles of Semantics (1951); G. O'Malley, "Literary Synesthesia," JAAC 15 (1957); L. Schrader, Sinne und Sinnesverknüpfungen (1969)—synaesthesia in It., Sp., and Fr.; P. Ostwald, The Semiotics of Human Sound (1973); P. E. Dombi, "Synaesthesia and Poetry," Poetics 3 (1974); L. Vinge, The Five Senses (1975); S. Sandbank, Shtei Breikhot Ba-ya'ar (Two Pools in the Wood, 1976); L. E. Marks, The Unity of the Senses (1978); D. Johnson, "The Role of Synaesthesia in Jakobson's Theory of Language," International Journal of Slavic Linguistics and Poetics 25–26 (1982); L. E. Marks, "Synesthetic Perception and Poetic Metaphor," Journal of Experimental Psychology: Human Perception and Performance 8 (1982); L. E. Marks, "Synesthetic and the Arts," Advances in Psychology 19 (1984); J. H. Ryalls, "Synaesthesia," Semiotica 58 (1986); J. P. Russo, I. A. Richards (1989); R. Tsur, "Literary Synaesthesia," Hebrew Linguistics 28–30 (1990); J. Harrison and S. Baron-Cohen, "Synaesthesia," Leonardo 27 (1994); R. Tsur, "Picture Poetry, Mannerism, and Sign Relationships," PoT 21 (2000); A. Motoyoshi, "Sensibility and Synaesthesia," Journal of Arabic Literature 32 (2001); R. E. Cytowic, Synesthesia (2002); O. Sacks, Musicophilia (2008).

■ Criticism, Poets: W. Silz, "Heine's Synaesthesia," PMLA 57 (1942); E. Noulet, Le premier visage de Rimbaud (1953); C. F. Roeding, "Baudelaire and Synaesthesia," Kentucky Foreign Language Quarterly 5 (1958); G. Guder, "The Meaning of Colour in Else Lasker-Schüler's Poetry," German Life and Letters 14 (1961); R. H. Fogle, "Synaesthetic Imagery in Keats," Keats, ed. W. J. Bate (1964); G. O'Malley, Shelley and Synaesthesia (1964); R. Étiemble, Le Sonnet des voyelles (1968); G. Cambon, "Synaesthesia in the Divine Comedy," Dante Studies with the Annual Report of the Dante Society 88 (1970); N. Ruddick, "Synaesthesia in Emily Dickinson's Poetry," PoT 5 (1984); J. Finkin, "Markish, Trakl, and the Temporaesthetic," Modernism/Modernity 15 (2008).

■ Criticism, Senses and Movements: J. Millet, Audition colorée (1892); V. Ségalen, "Les synesthésies et l'école symboliste," Mercure de France 42 (1902); I. Babbitt, The New Laokoön (1910)—attacks synaesthesia as decadent; E. von Erhardt-Siebold, "Synäksthesien in der englischen Dichtung des 19. Jahrhunderts," Englische Studien 53 (1919–20); A. Argelander, Das Farbenhören und der synästhetische Faktor der Wahrnehmung (1927); E. von Erhardt-Siebold, "Harmony of the Senses in English, German, and French Romanticism," PMLA 47 (1932); S. de Ullmann, "Romanticism and Synaesthesia," PMLA 60 (1945); A. H. Whitney, "Synaesthesia in Twentieth-Century Hungarian Poetry," Slavonic and East European Review 30 (1952); K. Mautz, "Dir Farbensprache der expressionistischen Lyrik," Deutsche Vierteljahrschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 31 (1957); M. Chastaing, "Audition colorée," Vie et langage 105, 112 (1960, 1961); F. Meltzer, "Color Cognition in Symbolist Verse," CritI 5 (1978).

T.V.F. BROGAN; A. G. ENGSTROM; J. FINKIN

SYNALOEPHA, synalepha, synalephe (Gr., "coalescing"). In *classical prosody, the term for all forms of elision in which two syllables are reduced to one. In mod. usage, it tends to be restricted to the coalescing of a vowel at the end of one word with one that begins the next word. Crasis (Gr., "mixture," "combination") is a synonymous term sometimes used for the fusion of a vowel or diphthong with another that follows, e.g., haner for ho aner, kago for kai ego, onax for o anax, and mentan for mentoi an. Synaloepha is not allowed in *French prosody—a final mute e followed by a vowel is simply elided—but is used liberally in It. In Sp., it is used moderately and generally unobtrusively. In Eng., it is a conspicuous feature of 17th- and 18th-cs. prosody, e.g., in works by John Milton and Alexander Pope, where it is used to maintain the syllabic conformity of lines. In metrical theory, therefore, synaloepha is the important mechanism affecting situations where the relation of metrical position to syllable is one to many, acting to reduce an excess of syllables. By contrast, *diaeresis affects the situation position : syllable = many:one. Coalescing of contiguous vowels within a word is *synaeresis.

See ELISION.

■ Koster; Allen (1973); West.

T.V.F. BROGAN; R. J. GETTY

SYNAPHEIA (Gr., "fastening together"). In cl. verse, prosodic continuity between any two syllables or syllable sequences that follow each other in delivery without interruption, as part of the same flow of sound. As a general rule, synapheia exists between all contiguous syllables that do not constitute the beginning and ending of separate, independent rhythmical sequences such as *stichos or *strophe. Even sequences in contrasting rhythms—the components of most *asynartete verses—could be "in synapheia" provided that neither one, taken by itself, constituted an autonomous rhythmical whole. Break in synapheia involved some sort of pause in delivery at word end—a pause long enough to legitimize juxtapositions of a final vowel or diphthong with a succeeding initial one that ordinarily count as objectionable instances of *hiatus and to lengthen a final syllable that would have been short under other circumstances (brevis in longo or final *anceps). The occurrence of either hiatus or brevis in longo in a poetic text is thus an indication that synapheia has been broken. Their absence, however, need not indicate that synapheia has been maintained: a break may simply have occurred at a point where there are no short syllables or contiguous vowels to reveal its presence—hence, some of the uncertainties that plague mod. eds. of Gr. lyric texts. In the absence of identifiable breaks in synapheia, it can be difficult to know where one basic rhythmical unit ends and another begins.

See PERIOD, SYSTEM.

■ L. E. Rossi, "La sinafia," Studi in onore di Anthos Ardizzoni (1978).

A. T. COLE

SYNCOPATION. In mod. discussions of Gr. prosody, syncopation is a common way of referring to what musicians would call a "hold" or "rest," i.e., the suppression (syncope*) of one syllable in a metrical pattern and the supplying of its time value either by a pause (usually notated by a dot or caret) or by protraction of an adjoining long syllable so that it becomes the durational equivalent of three or four shorts rather than two. These two phenomena are the "empty time length" (kenos chronos) and the "trisemic" (⏑⏑|) or "tetrasemic" (|⏑⏑|) longs of ancient metrical theory. Both have been regarded on occasion as peculiar to late—i.e., Hellenistic or post-Hellenistic—stages of Gr. versification, but their occurrence in the lyrics of Gr. drama—frequently where the rhythm is iambic or trochaic, sporadically elsewhere—is now widely accepted. It provides a plausible explanation for certain restrictions on the use of *resolution that all the dramatic poets observe when composing in those meters. In discussions of mod. prosody, however, the term syncopation is used only by those who hold that time, or particularly musical time, is the basis of metrical organization; and these theories are not widely accepted by post-19th c. theoreticians.

See LOGAOEDIC, ISOCHRONISM OR ISOCHRONY.

■ J. D. Denniston, "Lyric Iambics in Greek Drama," Greek Poetry and Life, Essays Presented to Gilbert Murray (1936); Dale, "Iambic, Trochaic and Iambo-Trochaic"; West, "Drama: Song," sect. IIIC; J. B. Lidov, "Alternating Rhythm in Archaic Greek Poetry," Transactions of the American Philological Association 119 (1989); E. C. Kopff, "Diggle's Critique of Dale's Canon of Iambic Resolution," La colometria antica dei testi poetici greci, ed. B. Gentili and F. Perusino (1999).

A. T. COLE

SYNCOPE (Gr., "a cutting up"). The omission of a letter, syllable, or a sound from the middle of a word, related to *aphaeresis (initial omission) or *apocope (final omission). Punctuation is often used ("e'er" for "ever," "giv'n" for "given") to indicate syncope. Shakespeare's double syncope of "overtaken" removes excess syllables and exposes a rhyme: "She might have been o'erta'en; and yet she writes, / Pursuit would be but vain" (All's Well That Ends Well, 3.4). It may be used solely to approximate the sounds of speech. Paul Laurence Dunbar's "A Warm Day in Winter" offers both: "Missis gone a-drivin', / Mastah gone to shoot; / Ev'ry da'ky lazin' / In de sun to boot," where "Ev'ry" is shortened for either metrical rhythm or speed of dialect, but "da'ky" (for "darky") is strictly dialect.

See ELISION.

K. MCFADDEN

SYNECDOCHE (Gr., "act of taking together," "understanding one thing with another"). A *trope (change of meaning) in which part is substituted for whole (hired "hands" for hired men); species for genus (live by the "sword" for weapons) or vice versa; or individual for group (the "Romans" won for the Roman army). Lausberg and Group μ, discussed below, would limit synecdoche to these types. In cl. rhet., synecdoche also includes material for the object made of it ("steel" for sword) and abstract quality for its possessor ("pride" for the person displaying it).

In 20th-c. attempts to organize the terminology inherited from rhet., one group of critics held that there are four basic tropes, and another claimed that there are only two. For discussion of these views, see METAPHOR and METONYMY. Definitions of synecdoche and metonymy have always overlapped. Both entail a material, factual, or conceptual connection to the literal meaning evoked. Genette and Eco show that the name of the trope can depend on how the example is interpreted.

Ruwet and Le Guern argue that most examples of synecdoche are not figurative: they either are part of ordinary usage or can be understood literally. The use of "tree" or "oak" for oak tree or "weapon" for pistol need not be considered synecdoche since the generic name can be applied literally to the species. Linguists find that purported instances of synecdoche often result from *ellipsis—deletion of a phrase that, if included, would be redundant. "A herd of thirty head" does not require "of cattle." "The animal that laughs" (man) and "the gods of blood and salt" (Mars and Neptune) can be classified as *periphrasis rather than as synecdoche with qualification. Thus, synecdoche can often be viewed as a stylistic phenomenon, its effect being dependent on whether it is expected in its context (Klinkenberg).

Todorov and Group μ reawakened interest in synecdoche with their claim that it is the fundamental figure, based on an increase or decrease of a word's semes (lexical features), from which metaphor and metonymy are derived. They found four possible changes of meaning in synecdoche: generalizing or particularizing, and material (part-whole) or conceptual (species-genus). "The enemy," meaning the enemies, is particularizing; the cl. example of part for whole is "sail" for ship; "mortal" for man is species for the genus.

Attempting to draw a clear distinction between metonymy and synecdoche, Sato and Seto suggest that synecdoche be limited to semantic or conceptual relations, with all material connections, such as part–whole, being assigned to metonymy. Meyer (1985) would limit the latter to contextual or accidental connections, synecdoche being a more abstract relation. Others see synecdoche as a figure of integration, metonymy representing fragmentation or reduction. Each of these views has something to recommend it, but evidence and logic do not show that any of them is correct. In popular usage and handbooks, "metonymy" usually includes all tropes that have been called synecdoche. This is especially true in ling. and fields such as conceptual metaphor theory and cognitive ling.

Synecdoche does remain important in one area of literary study. Like Burke, practitioners of *New Historicism show how lit. and life produce events representing the social structure as a whole. Burke's examples of the importance of synecdoche range from the traditional idea of microcosm and macrocosm to crucial issues of political representation. A character named Synecdoche in a Restoration play says, "By me a single Monarch makes himself a multitude . . . a whole Kingdome fits in Parliament at once." By the absolute ruler, as Thomas Hobbes said, "a multitude of men are made one person" (Christiansen, Baldo). Further examples of such representations appear in studies of synecdoche in Shakespeare's plays. The trope remains important in both sociology and anthropology (Parsons, Fernandez). Attempts to assign part-whole and species-genus relations to either metonymy or synecdoche eliminate the crucial space of their interaction, which is ideology. This is clear in anthropological studies, where synecdoche mediates between groups in the social structure and the species and genera found in nature. Analogous situations appear today. Synecdoche has become a crucial trope in arguments between environmentalists and commercial interests (Moore). Often appearing as a particular example representing the norm or ideal of the genus, synecdoche remains important in poetics, rhet., and other disciplines.

■ K. Burke, "Four Master Tropes," A Grammar of Motives (1945); T. Todorov, "Synecdoques," Communications 16 (1970); M. Le Guern, Sémantique de la métaphore et de la métonymie (1973); N. Ruwet, "Synecdoques et métonymies," Poétique 6 (1975); A. Parsons, "Interpretive Sociology," Human Studies 1 (1978); N. Sato, "Synecdoque, un trope suspect," Revue d'esthétique 1 (1979); B. Meyer, "Synecdoques du genre?" Poétique 57 (1980); Group μ; G. Genette, "Rhetoric Restrained," Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan, 2d ed. (1982); J. Klinkenberg, D. Bouverot, B. Meyer, G. Silingardi, J.-P. Schmitz in Le Français moderne 51 (1983); B. Meyer, "La synecdoque d'espèce," Langues et Littératures 3 (1983); U. Eco, "Metaphor, Dictionary, and Encyclopedia," NLH 15 (1984); B. Meyer, "Sous les pavés, la plage: Autour de la synecdoque du tout," Poétique 62 (1985); Beyond Metaphor, ed. J. Fernandez (1991); M. Moore, "Constructing Irreconcilable Conflict," Communication Monographs 60 (1993); J. Baldo, "Ophelia's Rhetoric, or Partial to Synecdoche," Criticism 37 (1995); Lausberg; K. Seto, "Distinguishing Metonymy from Synecdoche," Metonymy in Language and Thought, ed. K.-U. Panther and G. Radden (1999); N. Christiansen, "Synecdoche, Tropic Violence and Shakespeare's Imitatio in Titus Andronicus," Style 34 (2000); K. Acheson, "Hamlet, Synecdoche and History," College Literature 31 (2004).

W. Martin

SYNTAX, POETIC (Gr., syntaxis, "a putting together in order"). All oral and written lang. uses that fall under culturally specific definitions of poetry have syntax, if that term is defined as a meaning-making arrangement of words in a sequence. But not all poetries, oral or written, are distinguished from other discourses in ways that would allow us to say that they have poetic syntax, as opposed to syntax in general; nor is there scholarly consensus about what that former (poetic syntax) phrase might mean across different times, places, and langs. Mod. linguists have, for instance, noted parallels among ancient Gr., Ar., and Indian (Sanskrit) concepts of the proposition or sentence, a unit that Aristotle defined in his Rhetoric as expressing a "complete" thought and that has been foundational to many theories of syntax. But cross-cultural generalizations about syntax are difficult: problems of trans. arise not only between what linguists call natural langs. but also between competing professional metalanguages for describing syntactic features in relation to sometimes overlapping ones assigned to related areas such as grammar, morphology, phonemics, *semantics, and *rhetoric, with its many rules aimed at classifying and controlling the use of *tropes. Tropes in some taxonomic systems include a specific category of syntactic figures (figures of speech) recognized as such by virtue of their alleged deviation from what is thought to be ordinary or normal lang. use.

As a term that denotes both an object and a field of study, syntax has been decisively marked by the origins of the word itself in ancient Greece. The earliest uses of syntaxis have to do not with words or mathematical symbols but with soldiers. But many scholars have seen issues of hierarchy, governance, and obedience as no less critical to the workings of ling. syntax than they are to the workings of armies and of the societies that armies are thought to serve. Deutscher compares sentences to military maneuvers; in both, "chaos would prevail" without a chain of command subordinating some elements to others through rules that can be specified.

Metaphysically and socially charged debates about order are at the center of a Greco-Eur.-Eng. trad. of thinking about syntax in relation to poetry, a trad. that this article constructs provisionally and, of necessity, by relying in part on a terminology for syntax that some mod. theorists have critiqued as fundamentally inadequate to the understanding of ling. phenomena. The critiques come chiefly from those associated with the structuralist movement in ling. led by Ferdinand de Saussure (see STRUCTURALISM); this movement turns away—in conjunction with similar turns in many areas of modernist thought—from a mimetic or "substantialist" theory of lang. inscribed into the very notion of the noun as a "substantive." Structuralism directs us to a view of lang. as a fluid system constituted by differential relations among various elements. Acknowledging the philosophical problems in the substantialist trad. but acknowledging at the same time the continuing importance of that trad. for those who write, read, recite, hear, and reflect on poetry, this entry attempts a dialectical approach to the topic. The differential relations of "poetic syntax" are here considered as arising not only from a system of discourse that can be analyzed synchronically in terms of key binary oppositions (between "ordinary" and "extraordinary" word order, or poetry and prose, or poetry and science, or poetry and "not poetry"); the relations also arise along vectors of time, space, and trans. among some of the world's more than 6,000 (now extant) langs. We cannot know in how many of these langs. "syntax" and "poetry" exist as loci of historical influence, current practice, and reflection. The present entry assumes that what linguists call a "natural" lang. is not a unified entity; differently positioned and differently educated practitioners within a certain lang. field have construed and indeed encountered poetic syntax differently.

In the Greco-Eur.-Eng. trad. discussed here, "appropriate" syntactic arrangements have typically been seen as imitating an order given by nature or by logic. The latter is sometimes conceived as a subset of the former, but sometimes these two key strands of a "mimetic" trad. diverge, with interesting consequences for views of syntax (see MIMESIS). Those who see syntax primarily as reflecting an external reality have tended to focus on an iconic dimension of syntax, i.e., on ways in which the placement of words, phrases, clauses, and other units can be interpreted as imitating—and indeed as being determined by—a real sequence of events in "Nature" or in hist. Deutscher invokes Caesar's famous series of parallel clauses, veni, vidi, vici (I came, I saw, I conquered), to illustrate the principle that "the order in which events are expressed in language mirrors the order in which they occur in reality." (For Deutscher, it is only a joke, not a threat to Caesar's principle, that the first clause, in Lat. or in Eng., has a bawdy figurative meaning that allows the premise of a single natural order to expand into nine possibilities for ostensibly mimetic clause arrangement.)

A second major mimetic principle of syntax has been adduced—also debatably—to explain why grammatical subjects precede verbs and objects in a "majority" of the world's langs. (Dirven and Verspoor, Deutscher). A natural hierarchy in which the human actor and particularly the self are of supreme importance is said to be recognized by "most" speakers' preferences for arrangements in which the subject precedes the verb and object; linguists writing in Eng. term these SVO or SOV patterns and find them predominating in all but a handful of langs. Deutcher mentions Welsh, biblical Heb., and Maori as exceptions to this rule of (human) subject-first. But many other exceptions can be and have been adduced in ways that do not accept the premise of exceptionality. Some scholars of written Ar. consider a "verb-subject-object" pattern typical, for instance, while other scholars see case endings as more important than word order for understanding this lang. Peled observes that, among students of written Ar., sentence types and word order have been a focus for debate since med. times. Inflected langs. such as Lat., Ger., and Gr. do not exhibit a clear tendency toward subject-first syntactic arrangements in declarative sentences, at least if one considers the partial evidence about lang. use provided by the written record. A sentence pattern that puts the "object" or predicate first, followed by a subject and verb—which may well be expressed in one rather than two words—is clearly familiar to poets working in many langs.; it was known to poets writing in Eng. for centuries from their grammar-school study of Lat. classics, incl. Virgil's Aeneid, which begins, "Arma virumque cano" (arms and the man I sing). We need not accept foundationalist claims for the relation between syntax and the world to recognize that many poets have experimented with syntactic patterns in ways that might be called "mimetic" but that might also be called "thematic": interpreters have found syntactic patterns mimicking both natural spaces (dells, for instance) and culturally charged objects (Christ's cross can be evoked by a "chiastic" pattern in a line or couplet; see CHIASMUS).

Poetic theories and practices also cluster around a second major strand of thought about mimetic syntax that stretches back to the ancient Greeks: this is the theory that sees syntax "following" logic or reason (the Gr. term logos, which becomes central to Christian theological discourses). On this view, syntax illuminates the workings of a rational order assumed to precede lang. and to have universal qualities. Although this line of thought is sometimes expressed as a corollary to the first, the two strands of the mimetic theory at times diverge in consequential ways. Both Land and Cohen have traced one historical instance of divergence in 17th- and 18th-c. Eng. writing about lang., a movement from a "grammar of things" focused on relations among signs and their referents to a "grammar of the mind" focused on "bundles" of words and on those parts of speech that have no obvious analogues in the world. John Locke illustrates this tendency in his Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690), which holds that knowledge "consists in propositions." For Locke, as for the Port-Royal group of lang. philosophers in 17th-c. Paris, the verb takes priority over the noun because it is seen as critical to acts of judgment; moreover, there is a marked interest in the "syntax of connectives" (Cohen). Locke argues that the humble particle has been unjustly neglected; he approaches syntactic relations as windows into the way in which the mind pursues "connexion, restriction, distinction, opposition, emphasis, etc." (Essay 3.7.2). A number of scholars have found a significant correlation between such a philosophical view of syntax and features of neoclassical poetry, particularly the use of parallel and antithetical clauses in the rhymed *couplets of John Dryden, Jean Racine, Pierre Corneille, and Alexander Pope (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS).

For the major strands of Occidental speculation that conceive of syntax as imitating a corresponding order of reality, tropes are anomalous; paradoxically, they are also typical of poetry perceived as a form of discourse granted "license" to deviate from ordinary lang. "Aside from figurative speech," as Chomsky states the central idea of the Port-Royal grammarians, "the sequence of words follows an 'ordre naturel,' which conforms "à l'expression naturelle de nos pensées' [to the natural expression of our thoughts]." It can be argued, however, that poetic syntax, which stresses questions of figurative lang., is constitutive of, rather than marginal to, syntax as an object of multicultural knowledge with Gr. roots. This is so partly because theorists from Aristotle on define the basic units of syntax as phenomena that, when correctly performed in speech or writing, reflect reality in ways that reveal both completeness of thought (dianoia) and elegance of expression (lexis, sometimes trans. as *"diction"). Moreover, as Basset has shown, when Aristotle discusses syntactic units such as the *colon or the *period in terms of such qualities as elegance and completeness, it is hard to know whether he is judging such units for their rhythmic, grammatical, or logical properties, or for a combination of these in which "appropriateness" of tropes plays a role.

By the 1st c. BCE, syntaxis began to be used by Gr. grammarians and philosophers in ways that encompassed discussions of "parts" of speech and relations of "agreement" among forms of words signaling such concepts as gender, tense, mood, number, and grammatical case. The first extant Gr. treatise on syntax, Peri Syntaxeôs (2d c. CE), sees syntactic irregularities as corruptions of a rule that reflects reason and that can be traced back to a pristine natural past. Written by Apollonios Dyskolos (the "surly"), who worked as a teacher of grammar in Alexandria, the treatise analyzes examples of "ungrammaticality" (akatallēlia) drawn both from ordinary usage and from poetry, esp. the Homeric epics. As Blank shows, Apollonios oscillates between correcting errors and explaining them (away) when they occur in Homer. Deeply influenced by Stoic logic, which distinguished between "complete" and "deficient" propositions and which saw the former as demonstrating an ethical ideal of self-sufficiency (autoteleia), Apollonios repeatedly discusses syntactic issues by contrasting arrangements of words that are morphologically, syntactically, and semantically akin.

The subject of syntax as Apollonios constructs it is dependent on comparative judgments; it becomes even more complexly comparative when Gr. discourses on syntax are appropriated by Roman poets and educators and, subsequently, by later Eur. and Eng. writers extensively educated in Lat. grammar, poetry, and rhet. In treatises that variously transliterate the Gr. word syntaxis into Roman letters or render it in the Lat. words constructio, dispositio, or ordinatio, the subject of syntax retains its focus on the illustration and discussion of errors in lang., whether these occur in single words or in larger signifying units. Though the names for these errors are legion and the category distinctions among them are often perplexing—esp. as the examples begin to appear in both Gr. and Lat. forms—there is considerable continuity in this discursive trad. focused on right and wrong syntax. The trad. mingles poetical examples with pedagogical and philosophical precepts. Priscian, whose influential 6th-c. CE discussion of syntax in the final two books of his Institutionem Grammaticorum appropriates many points from Apollonios, repeatedly asks his readers "whether a phrase is right or wrong" ("recta sit an non," 17:14). Prisician's analysis of "irregularities" (incongruae or inconcinnae), however, conceives lang. as a phenomenon with a past. This may complicate present judgments of correct usage. Priscian cites many poetic lines illustrating "uncommon" usages that are, he acknowledges, "preferred by old communities" (2:122). His use of ancient Gr. examples along with his awareness of ling. "preferences" among old Lat.-speaking communities highlights how hist. impinges on a theory or practice of syntax considered primarily as a set of rules.

Moreover, Priscian's Institutio contributes to a continuing question about the place of syntax in a course of study: is it a subset of grammar, as Joseph Aiken indicated in his British Grammar (1693), where the subject is divided into orthography, prosody, etymology, and syntax? Or is syntax a step above grammar in a hierarchy that points further up toward the study of poetry or bonae literae (good letters, a humanist ideal) in Lat. and in those vernacular langs. lexically and syntactically indebted to Lat.? In many 16th-c. Eng. grammar schools, syntax was studied by boys in the third form after basic Lat. grammar and before poetry approached as a matter to be translated from Lat. to Eng. and back again. According to the OED, as late as the 19th c., the term syntax denoted a school subject below poetry and above grammar.

Wherever syntax is placed in school curricula, it has often been viewed as a surly and difficult subject. This perception derives in part from the fact that syntactic analysis requires a historical education in several taxonomic schemes and in multilingual terminologies for rhetorical tropes involving varying perceptions of "transgressive" behavior in the construction of sentences. The figure of *hyperbaton, for instance, denoting "various forms of departure from ordinary word order" (Lanham), is called transgressio in Lat. and "the trespasser" by George Puttenham in The Arte of English Poesie (1589). Despite or perhaps because of the fact that there is no stable or single concept of ordinary (or common or natural) syntax that crosses from Gr. to Lat. to the Eur. vernaculars, the notion of difficult syntax—as a written and later a printed phenomenon that members of an educated elite can appreciate as something different from "vulgar" speech—has been valued by writers such as Torquato Tasso, Giovanni della Casa, Luis de Góngora, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, Maurice Scève, and John Milton, as well as by mod. poets such as Stéphane Mallarmé, Giuseppe Ungaretti (see HERMETICISM), R. M. Rilke, e. e. cummings, and Ezra Pound. Different instances of a poetic syntax designed to deviate conspicuously from vernacular usages may, of course, refract quite different political and philosophical views about ordinary lang. and the people who are thought to speak it.

In his Institutio oratoria (1st c. CE), Quintilian suggests that a "difficult" style might appropriately be described as "Virgilian" or even as "rhythmical"—the latter quality presented in a way that admits of no clear division between admirable poetry and artistically crafted prose. The best way we have of making our speech (sermonem) rhythmical (numerosum), writes Quintilian, is by "opportune change[s] of [word] order" (8.6. 64–65). Such changes clearly raise questions about the appropriate limits of poetic license both for the writer and the reader. Quintilian avers that "language would very often be rough, harsh, limp, or disjointed if the words were constrained as their natural order demands" (si ad necessitate ordinis sui verba redigantur; 8.6.62); however, he also insists that the freedom exhibited in hyperbaton and related syntactic figures would not be allowed in oratio (rendered as "prose" by one Eng. translator at 8.6.66). Oratio, however, can also be translated as "speech," and Quintilian in the same passage praises Plato for trying out many different patterns of word order in his prose sentences (8.6.64). Worrying that errors may arise from hyperbata that are too long, Quintilian does not say exactly how long is too long; nor does he distinguish clearly between aesthetic and moral dimensions of appropriate and inappropriate syntax. Finally, he relies on tropes to explain what counts as "good" syntax: "Words," he writes, are to be "moved from one place to another so as to join where they fit best, just as, in constructions made of unhewn stones, the irregularity itself (ipsa enormitas) suggests the right stones which each piece can fit or rest upon" (9.4.27).

Many poems in various langs. create effects of "irregularity" in ways that call attention to poetic form while asking the reader or listener to reflect on what often began as his or her subconscious knowledge of verbal regularity in a given lang. Such calling attention to the medium is central to what Jakobson defines as the *poetic function of lang. The writer's or linguist's or literary critic's educated perspective on what constitutes regular and irregular patterns in a given evidentiary field makes poetic syntax into an object of study but seldom warrants generalizations about it across cultures. An exception might be in those cases where we can hypothesize a foreign influence on an Eng. poetic construction that can be observed in numerous examples from a certain era. An example is the "absolute participial" construction that occurs with some frequency in med. and early mod. Eng. lit.—in this line of Hamlet, for instance: "The passion ending, doth the purpose lose" (3.2.185). Some linguists have explained the apparent irregularity of this line—what is its grammatical subject and how does that "agree" with the verb form?—as a sign of the significant influence of Lat. or Fr. syntax on Eng. poetry.

In a famous letter, John Keats deplored the "gallicisms" of Chaucer's poetry and found Milton's Paradise Lost a "corruption" of the Eng. lang. But Keats himself had been criticized for "bad" writing, and many of his lines imitate Milton's in syntax and diction. For poets and their interpreters, the distinction between proper and improper usages is fluid and usually open to testing, as is the distinction between native and foreign. Inversions of word order, so critical to Quintilian's understanding of what makes an admirable high style like Virgil's, occur as often in Pope's poetry as in Milton's, according to Brogan; and such "inversions" also occur in poems by those who explicitly reject a high style. S. T. Coleridge described one of his *conversation poems, for instance—"Reflections on Having Left a Place of Retirement"—as a "poem which affects not to be Poetry"; he elaborates the paradox in that phrase with his first line, which conspicuously departs from what many feel is the usual word order of Eng.: "Low was our pretty Cot!" In versions printed after 1797, moreover, Coleridge's poem begins with a Lat. epigraph: "Sermoni propriora." Charles Lamb jokingly translated this as "properer for a sermon," whereas others—more seriously but not necessarily more correctly—have rendered it "more suitable for conversation/prose." The adjective in its original context, however (Horace's Satire 4) is spelled differently: propiora, which is usually translated into Eng. as "nearer." Coleridge plays with the meaning of the Eng. word proper as "one's own." Is a low style, nearer to prose, more properly Eng. than a high style? Like many other poets, Coleridge poses the question without providing a definitive answer.

As this story of trans. indicates, matters of poetic syntax invite analysis in relation to other aspects of a poem or the culture where it was produced and where it continues to be interpreted. Chomsky proclaimed the existence of an "autonomous syntax principle" and of a phenomenon he named ling. "competence" and defined as an "innate" knowledge of syntactic and grammatical rules possessed by every speaker of a natural lang. His theory, frequently revised, is important because it calls attention to the issue of constraints on syntax without moralizing them—but also without considering them in relation to educational institutions or to the entire domain of what Chomsky called "performance" and defined as a set of specific utterances produced by native speakers. Chomsky's "performance," which some critics have allied with Saussure's "parole," is conceived without reference to the institution of the theater or to some cultures' trads. of oral poetic performances (see ORAL POETRY). For poetic syntax considered in a comparative context, there is no "autonomous" principle of syntax, ontological or hermeneutic. There is, however, a useful heuristic notion (also a spatial metaphor) proffered by structuralist theorists in the 20th c.: the notion of the "syntagmatic" and "paradigmatic" axes of lang. Formulated by Saussure for the field of semiotics and elaborated for poetry by Jakobson, Jameson, Silverman, Culler, and others, this interpretive schema relies on Gr. terms but departs from Gr. presuppositions concerning syntax as mimesis and tropes as instances of both culpable and admirable erring. The notion of the two axes—often visually represented as a horizontal (syntagmatic) line crossed by numerous vertical (paradigmatic) ones—allows Saussure to explain how ling. meaning arises from two kinds of difference: that which we might provisionally see as occurring in a syntactic unit (a clause or a sentence) as extended in the time of speech or the space/time of the text; and that which arises in the reader's or hearer's mind from the relations between a sign and other elements in its "system." The vertical axis, which Saussure called "associative," works with the syntagmatic axis to create sequences of various degrees of complexity. The paradigmatic axis may include case endings or parts of speech other than the ones actualized in the words of a given sentence or clause; the paradigmatic axis is more commonly thought of as "supplying" the missing terms of a *metaphor or alternate sounds or letters of a rhyme or a pun. Any word, *line, couplet, or *stanza of poetry can be analyzed with reference to these axes, with syntactic elements now construed as aspects of lang. working in concert (via forms of *parallelism incl. tropes such as *isocolon) but also in tension with other elements of the poetic line and/or with other signifying units.

Many syntactic units are, of course, smaller or larger than the sentence; and many poets have worked against as well as with the traditional idea, inherited from Aristotle and the Stoics in many elegantly circular forms, that a proper sentence or clause "reflects" a complete thought. One could indeed say that the enigmatic idea of a proper sentence (as memory or expectation or pedagogical rule) exists on the paradigmatic axis created jointly by many Eng. poems and their readers and hearers; consider, for instance Pound's "In a Station of the Metro," which consists of two syntagms (incl. the title) that traditional Western grammarians would call sentence fragments. Inspired in part by Japanese and Chinese poems, Pound uses the fragment to present a new reality; in one of his *manifestos for *imagism, he contrasts poetic "presenting" with painterly "describing" ("A Retrospect," 1913). But his *fragment poem relies on the reader's knowledge of what counts as a complete sentence, as do many poems that delay a main verb in long invocations of a *muse who figures *inspiration.

An approach to poetic syntax that is at once structuralist (synchronic) and historical (diachronic) is difficult, as Jameson observes in his Prison-House of Language (1972); but attempting it allows us to construct a paradigmatic axis that extends over time and space to encompass a recurring contrast between theories and practices of "difficult" syntax and those devoted to a style that aspires to plainness and that presents features of colloquial, even dialectal, speech, the vulgar or "mother" tongue (see PLAIN STYLE). Under a different figure, this is what William Wordsworth, in the Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800), called lang. "really spoken by men." But which lang. is that? And does it exist except as it has been historically (re)constructed in relation to a poetic lang. marked by "irregularities" such as *elision and inverted word order?

Elision and inversion are perennially interesting and conceptually difficult for a comparative approach to poetic syntax or to syntax in general. Lacking evidence of normal speech patterns for many past cultures and some present ones, we cannot securely distinguish between approved omissions of words (elisions) and ones that are classified as errors (vitia) in the Occidental written record, often under such Gr. terms as barbarism and solecism. Like children, foreigners, and jokesters, poets often use lang. in ways that have been deemed transgressive; but for past cultures, even in the West, we do not know who would have judged a transgression playful, enigmatic (because the sign of textual corruption), or inept. Some forms of elision have been named, noticed, and generally approved as achieving effects of *wit. Elision combines with complex *figuration in *zeugma or *syllepsis: consider, e.g., Pope's famous couplet comparing, contrasting, and compressing the idiomatic Eng. phrases "take counsel" and "take tea" (The Rape of the Lock, 1714). Other forms of elision arise from syntactic arrangements extending over many lines and often creating instances of double syntax: a syntagm that starts by inviting one interpretation but grows to invite a second reading that conceptually revises the first; see, e.g., the first four lines of cummings's "since feeling is first" or the transition between stanzas 3 and 4 of Emily Dickinson's "A bird came down the walk" (Empson, Ferguson). Elisions of main-clause verbs in Eng. and Am. poetry have sometimes accompanied semantic inquiries into domination and subordination, disobedience and obedience to rules, and the relation of parts to putative wholes. An example is W. C. Williams's "The Young Sycamore," which uses ambiguous syntax to explore whether a sapling is an independent entity or is not (yet). The rhetorical figures of anapodoton (omitting a main clause from a conditional sentence) and *aposiopesis (breaking off suddenly in the middle of speaking) are important to poems that explore and dramatize relations between syntax and a fictional speaker's emotional states; Virgil, for instance, illustrates the sea god Neptune's anger—and his ability to control it—in a famous aposiopesis in the Aeneid: "quos ego—! sed motos praestat componere fluctus" (whom I—! But better it is to calm the troubled waves [1.135]). Milton combines anapodoton and aposiopesis in Satan's opening address to Beelzebub in Paradise Lost ("If thou beest he; But oh how falln, how changed / From him . . .). The initial subordinate conditional clause breaks off, and Satan (as represented by the narrator) seems to forget his conventional obligation to complete his thought with a main clause.

Like Milton's Satan, many poets have conspicuously failed to obey the rules of the "well-formed" sentence, and sometimes they have done so by following the in-completely codified and imperfectly translated rules of tropes. Sometimes, however, poets transgress in ways that strain even the cl. notion of *poetic license, which relies on hypotheses about the poet's *intention and about the poem's ultimate intelligibility. In "Adonais" (51–53), P. B. Shelley, for instance, often writes sentences that are "almost impenetrable" (Austin 1993):

> Thy extreme hope, the loveliest and the last,
> The bloom, whose petals nipped before they blew
> Died on the promise of the fruit, is waste.

What rules of (Eng.) syntax is Shelley breaking or bending here? How are historically variable conventions of printing and punctuation (here, the absence of the expected "closing" comma after "blew") implicated in our perceptions of what is and is not an intelligible sentence? Shelley's sentence appears to illustrate Chomsky's argument that a "well-formed" sentence, one operating correctly by a recursive rule of sentence formation, may nonetheless be "unacceptable." Indeed, Shelley's sentence appears to illustrate the phenomenon of "center-embedding" that Chomsky uses to explain the distinction between grammaticality and acceptability; an example is "The man who the boys who the students recognized pointed out is a friend of mine." Such a sentence fails to be acceptable to an Eng. speaker, Chomsky suggests, because of a problem in the domain of performance, not competence. In MacCabe's paraphrase of Chomsky, "the body is simply unable to store the necessary bits of information to decode the sentence although it does have the necessary decoding mechanisms." Shelley's lines, however, like the prose passage by James Joyce that MacCabe analyzes to show "center-embedding" at work, challenge us to think recursively, testing the human memory encountering something like a sentence in the medium of print. Shelley's lines counter common assumptions about lang. as communication while suggesting the social value of puzzles and *riddles, traditionally close kin to certain experiments in extreme syntax.

Poetic syntax, like unmodified syntax, has seemed a surly subject to many school children taught to attend to lang. through syntactic categories. But poets shaped by multilingual educational theories and practices have been in constant conversation with philosophers, teachers, and linguists on the question of what is a proper sentence—in the senses both of being correct and of belonging to one's own ling. trad. Chomsky generated a mod. chapter in this conversation when, in his Syntactic Structures (1957), he gave an example of a syntactically correct sentence that is "unacceptable" because it makes no sense: "Colorless green ideas sleep furiously." A number of writers, incl. Chinese linguist Yuen Ren Chao and Am. poets John Hollander and Clive James, have contested Chomsky's point by using figuration and recontextualization to make his string of words legible after all, if not necessarily on first glance. In so doing, such writers participate in a long-enduring and multicultural game that exploits the resources of syntax and tropes—the "colors" of rhet.—to test the boundaries between sense and nonsense, figurative and proper meanings, practices and theories of lang., and last but not least, between prose and poetry. Hollander's poem makes Chomsky's sentence into a subordinate clause in a larger syntactic unit titled "Coiled Alizarine." The title serves as an apt concluding emblem for the transformational powers of poetic syntax. "Coiled" like a snake, with the potential for fuller extensions in the future, poetic syntax has metamorphic powers like those of alizarine: an organic dye used in the past, and still used today, to change the colors of various paints and inks.

See ELLIPSIS, HYPOTAXIS AND PARATAXIS, LINGUISTICS AND POETICS.

■ E. Pound, "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste," Poetry 1 (1913); and ABC of Reading (1934); F. T. Prince, The Italian Element in Milton's Verse (1953); Empson; D. Davie, Articulate Energy (1955); J. Miles, Eras and Modes in English Poetry (1957); C. Brooke-Rose, A Grammar of Metaphor (1958); F. Perry, Poet's Grammar (1958); E. Wasserman, The Subtler Language (1959); S. Levin, Linguistic Structures in Poetry (1962); W. Nowottny, The Language Poets Use (1962); C. Ricks, Milton's Grand Style (1963); N. Chomsky, Aspects of a Theory of Syntax (1965); R. Levin, "Internal and External Deviation in Poetry," Word 21 (1965); F. T. Visser, An Historical Syntax of the English Language (1966); W. Baker, Syntax in English Poetry, 1879–1930 (1967); W. N. Francis, "Syntax and Literary Interpretation," Essays in the Language of Literature, ed. S. Chatman and S. Levin (1967); J.-C. Chevalier, Histoire de la syntaxe . . . (1530–1750) (1968); B. H. Smith, Poetic Closure (1968); R. Mitchell, "Toward a System of Grammatical Scansion," Lang&S 3 (1970); I. Michael, English Grammatical Categories and the Tradition to 1800 (1971); F. Jameson, Prison-House of Language (1972); J. M. Sinclair, "Lines and 'Lines,'" Current Trends in Stylistics, ed. B. Kachru and H.F.W. Stahlke (1972); J. S. Borck, "Blake's 'The Lamb': The Punctuation of Innocence," TSL 19 (1974); S. K. Land, From Signs to Propositions (1974); Culler; G. Dillon, "Inversions and Deletions in English Poetry," Lang&S 8 (1975); and "Literary Transformations and Poetic Word Order," Poetics 5 (1976); I. Fairley, E. E. Cummings and Ungrammar (1975); D. C. Freeman, "Iconic Syntax in Poetry: A Note on Blake's 'Ah! Sun-Flower,'" University of Massachusetts Occasional Papers in Linguistics 2 (1976); J. M. Lipski, "Poetic Deviance and Generative Grammar," PTL 2 (1977); J. M. Lotman, The Structure of the Artistic Text, trans. G. Lenhoff and R. Vroon (1977); E. Kintgen, "Perceiving Poetic Syntax," CE 40 (1978); M. Borroff, The Language and the Poet (1979); M. Cohen, Sensible Words: Linguistic Practice in England, 1640–1785 (1979); R. Cureton, "e. e. cummings: A Study of the Poetic Use of Deviant Morphology," PoT 1 (1979); H. Golomb, Enjambment in Poetry (1979); D. Simpson, Irony and Authority in Romantic Poetry (1979); R. Cureton, "'He danced his did': An Analysis," JL 16 (1980); and "Poetic Syntax and Aesthetic Form," Style 14 (1980); Brogan; R. Cureton, "e. e. cummings: A Case Study of Iconic Syntax," Lang&S 14 (1981); R. Jakobson, "The Poetry of Grammar and Grammar of Poetry," Jakobson, v. 3; J. Moulton and G. M. Robinson, The Organization of Language (1981); G. Roscow, Syntax and Style in Chaucer's Poetry (1981); D. Blank, Ancient Philosophy and Grammar (1982); A. Easthope, Poetry as Discourse (1983); K. Silverman, The Subject of Semiotics (1983); M. Sirridge, "Socrates' Hood: Lexical Meaning and Syntax in Jordanus and Kilwardby," Cahiers de l'Institut du Moyen-Âge Grec et Latin 44 (1983); T. R. Austin, Language Crafted (1984); V. Bers, Greek Poetic Syntax in the Classical Age (1984); D. Donoghue, Style in Old English Poetry (1984); M. Tarlinskaja, "Rhythm–morphology–syntax–rhythm," Style 18 (1984); R. Cureton, "Poetry, Grammar, and Epistemology: The Order of Prenominal Modifiers in the Poetry of e. e. cummings," Lang&S 18 (1985); M.A.K. Halliday, An Introduction to Functional Grammar (1985); R. Hasan, Linguistics, Language, and Verbal Art (1985); Hollander; C. Miller, Emily Dickinson: A Poet's Grammar (1987); J. P. Houston, Shakespearean Sentences (1988); A. Kaster, Guardians of Language (1988); R. M. Baratin, La naissance de la syntaxe à Rome (1989); H. Pinkster, Latin Syntax and Semantics (1990); D. Lateiner, "Mimetic Syntax: Metaphor from Word Order, Especially in Ovid," AJP 3 (1990); Lanham; R. Cureton, Rhythmic Phrasing in English Verse (1992); T. R. Austin, "Syntax, Poetic," The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T.V.F. Brogan (1993); R. Cureton, "Poetry, Language, and Literary Study: The Unfinished Tasks of Stylistics," Language and Literature 21 (1996); T. J. Taylor and M. Toolan, "Recent Trends in Stylistics," The Stylistics Reader, ed. J. J. Weber (1996); R. Cureton, "Linguistics, Stylistics, and Poetics," Language and Literature 22 (1997); and "Toward a Temporal Theory of Language," Journal of English Linguistics 25 (1997); F. J. Newmeyer, Language Form and Language Function (1998); M. Collins, "On Syntax in Poetry," Field (1999); R. Dirven and M. Verspoor, Cognitive Explorations in Language and Linguistics (1999); R. Cribiore, Gymnastics of the Mind (2001); M. De Grazia, "Shakespeare and the Craft of Language," The Cambridge Companion to Shakespeare, ed. M. de Grazia and S. Wells (2001); Cambridge Grammar of the English Language, ed. R. Huddleston and G. K. Pullum et al. (2002); C. MacCabe, James Joyce and the Revolution of the Word, 2d ed. (2003); Z. Pickard, "Milton's Latinisms" (2003): http://www.chass.utoronto.ca/~cpercy/courses/6362Pickard1.htm; Syntax in Antiquity, ed. P. Swiggers and A. Wouters (2003)—see esp. L. Basset, "Aristote et la Syntaxe"; A. Luhtala, "Syntax and Dialectic in Late Antiquity"; P. Swiggers and A. Wouters, "Réflexions à propos de (l'absence de?) la syntaxe dans la grammaire Gréco-Latine"; and T. Viljamaa, "Colon and Comma. Dionysius of Halicarnassus on the Sentence Structure"; G. Deutscher, The Unfolding of Language (2005); M. Ferguson, "Poetic Syntax," The Norton Anthology of Poetry, ed. M. Ferguson, M. J. Salter, J. Stallworthy, 5th ed. (2005); A. Luhtala, Grammar and Philosophy in Late Antiquity (2005); A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, Latin Word Order (2006); Y. Peled, Sentence Types and Word-Order Patterns in Written Arabic (2009).

M. W. Ferguson

SYSTEM (Gr. systema). In Gr. metrics, a *period composed of a sequence of either similar cola in *synapheia with each other or identical metra (also in synapheia), whether or not grouped into cola. In this (mod.) sense, a system is a special kind of period; ancient metrists tend to use it as a term for any sequence of cola in synapheia that exceeds a certain length, whether or not the cola are identical. When sequences of identical metra resist grouping into cola, the usual term is hypermeter, coined on the analogy of *trimeter, *tetrameter, *hexameter, etc., to designate a structure that differs from those forms only in that it goes over (hyper) the customary limit on the maximum number of metra a single line may contain. Hypermeters are a characteristic feature of comic versification, and the longest attested examples appear in the comic poets of the 4th c. BCE.

See COLON, METRON.

■ J. W. White, "Analysis of Systematic Periods," The Verse of Greek Comedy (1912); Dale, "Strophic Construction"; West, "Iambic and Trochaic Runs," sec. IIIB.

A. T. Cole

SYZYGY (Gr. syzygos, "yoked together"). In *classical prosody, an older term for fusion, combination: so the *hexameter is by some metrists said to be a syzygy of two (hemistichic) metrical cola. In the 19th c., phonetic syzygy is a term coined apparently by Sylvester and adopted by Lanier to describe types of sound patterns and *elision, but this usage is eccentric and never found acceptance.

■ J. J. Sylvester, Laws of Verse (1870); S. Lanier, The Science of English Verse (1880).

T.V.F. Brogan

T

TACHTIGERS (Dutch, "'80ers," "Movement of the 1880s"). A group of young Dutch poets and prose writers active during the last two decades of the 19th c. who were united by a shared aversion toward the then-dominant sentimentalism, didacticism, and domesticity of Dutch poetry. Many of the poems and prose works of the Tachtigers, as well as an important body of lit. crit., first appeared in the periodical De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide, first issue 1885), ed. by the poets Willem Kloos, Albert Verwey, and Frederik van Eeden. Other prominent members of the movement were Jacques Perk and Herman Gorter, whose long poem Mei (May) may be considered one of the finest products of the Tachtigers. The most famous descriptions of the poetics of the Tachtigers—with doctrines of *impressionism, *aestheticism, and a strongly individualistic and passionate vision of the *poet, elevated above everyday reality and influenced by Eng. *romanticism and Fr. art for art's sake—were written by Kloos. Other Tachtigers, esp. van Eeden, were closer to Fr. *naturalism and defended a more socially engaged kind of authorship. This opposition between a more ethical and a more aesthetically oriented vision of artistry marked the decline of the movement after 1890. Despite its brief duration and its lack of a coherent poetic program, the Tachtigers represent a high point in the hist. of Dutch poetry.

See LOW COUNTRIES, POETRY OF THE.

■ H. Brandt Corstius, Het poëtisch programma van Tachtig (1968); W. van den Berg and P. Couttenier, Alles is taal geworden (2009).

F. J. WARNKE; S. MAREEL

TAGELIED (Ger. Tageliet, tagewîse, "dawnsong"). A subgenre of Minnesang*, 13th–16th c., probably influenced by the Romance alba*; often a *dialogue. While Minnesang precludes sexuality, the tagelied presupposes (and often describes) a situation when lovers have to separate in the morning. If the new light of the day is celebrated in religious and profane poetry of most lits., as Hatto suggests, the tagelied complains of its threat to secret love; in this regard, the tagelied shares the social values of Minnesang and its mode of klage (*lament), but unlike the Minnesang, it can imagine the sensuality of mutual attraction. After the end of the 12th c., the tagelied accompanies the courtly Minnekanzone (Dietmar von Aist, Heinrich von Morungen, Walther von der Vogelweide). It also can be the foil of an unfulfilled love (Reinmar von Hagenau's antidawn song). Wolfram von Eschenbach's tagelied particularly focus on the danger and the fear of being discovered, the grief of separation, and the last passionate embrace; one tagelied praises marriage as the happier alternative to helde minne (secret love). Wolfram introduces the role of the wechter (watchman), the knight's faithful servant, warning the lovers. Later, the tagelied could become a matter of parody, as in the poetry of Steinmar, the repertoire of roles involved could be expanded (Ulrich von Liechtenstein), and the social characteristics of the lovers (knight and lady) and the inherent social conflict could be abandoned. In this broader sense, by the late Middle Ages, every lyric complaining of the separation of lovers at dawn can be called "tagelied" (Oswald von Wolkenstein, Hans Folz, anonymous songbooks). So, the borderlines between Gesellschafts- and Volkslied (folk song) are blurred (see GESELLSCHAFTSLIED). There are allusions to tagelied in other genres, even epic and dramatic (Romeo and Juliet).

■ Eos: An Enquiry into the Theme of Lovers' Meetings and Partings at Dawn in Poetry, ed. A. T. Hatto (1965); U. Knoop, Das mittelhochdeutsche Tagelied (1976); A. Wolf, Variation und Integration: Beobachtungen zu hochmittelalterlichen Tageliedern (1979); Deutsche Tagelieder von den Anfängen der Überlieferung bis zum 15. Jahrhundert, ed. S. Freund (1983); Owe, do taget ez: Tagelieder und motivverwandte Texte, ed. R. Hausner, v. 1 (1983); H. Fromm, Der deutsche Minnesang, 2 v. (1985); C. Cormeau, "Zur Stellung des Tagelieds im Minnesang" and G. Hahn, "'Es ruft ein wachter faste' oder 'Verachtet mir die Meister nicht!': Beobachtungen zum geistlichen Tagelied des Hans Sachs," Festschrift Walter Haug und Burkhard Wachinger, ed. J. Janota et al., 2 v. (1992); Tagelieder des deutschen Mittelalters, ed. M. Backes (1992); H.-J. Behr, "Die Inflation einer Gattung: Das Tagelied nach Wolfram" Lied im deutschen Mittelalter, ed. C. Edwards (1996); U. Ruberg, "Gattungsgeschichtliche Probleme des geistlichen Tagelieds. Dominanz der Wächter- und Weckmotivik bis zu Hans Sachs" Traditionen der Lyrik: Festschrift für Hans-Henrik Krummacher, ed. W. Düsing (1997); A. Schnyder, Das geistliche Tagelied des späten Mittelalters und der frühen Neuzeit (2004).

J.-D. MÜLLER

TAIL RHYME (Med. Lat. versus tripertiti caudate; Fr. rime couée; ME rime couwee; Ger. Schweifreim; rarely, caudate rhyme). A stanza of six or 12 lines in which a rhyming couplet is followed by a shorter tail line, the rhyme of which unites the stanza, i.e., aabccb or aabaab, or aabccbddbeeb or aabaabaabaab. "At once jubilant and stately," tail rhyme can be seen as an extension of the ballad stanza, made by doubling the first and third lines (Hamer), and indeed both William Wordsworth ("Three Years She Grew") and W. H. Auden ("A Summer Evening") have made tail rhyme serve as a kind of ballad stanza. Tail rhyme appears in med. Lat. and OF verse, from which it was transmitted to ME, where it flourished in the 14th c. In ME, the six-line form, or "Romance six," came to be associated with the *lyric and the 12-line form with romance; half of the 70 extant metrical romances use this form, which enjoyed a vogue in East Anglia in the 14th c. (Trounce). The Fr. douzaine (aabaabbbabba in octosyllables) is similar to tail rhyme, but the b line is of the same length as the a.

In med. Lat., tail rhyme is used almost exclusively for religious lyric (not at all for narrative verse); in Eng., however, tail rhyme appears in a wide variety of verse genres. Although Chaucer's parody of tail rhyme in "Tale of Sir Thopas" has sometimes been considered the death knell of the form, the tail-rhyme stanza continued to be used after 1500 to lend an old-fashioned, rustic air to dialogue. Erler notes that pastoral dialogues in tail rhyme were popular in the 16th c., beginning with trans. of Clément Marot and Théodore de Beza that found their way to Mary Sidney, whose shepherds Thenot and Piers converse in tail rhyme. Edmund Spenser, in the March *eclogue from The Shepheardes Calender, has two of his shepherds speak to each other in tail rhyme. Tail rhyme can be seen more generally as an index of character. The 15th-c. morality play The Castle of Perseverance, e.g., uses the tail-rhyme stanza to mark the three lowest vices (Virtue, meanwhile, appears in *rhyme royal); Edward Taylor employs a tail-rhyme stanza for Christ's reply to the Soul in Gods Determinations (Wright). There are many later examples of tail rhyme in Michael Drayton ("Nymphidia"), Thomas Gray ("Ode on the Death of a Favorite Cat"), William Collins ("Ode to Pity"), Christopher Smart (A Song to David), Alfred, Lord Tennyson ("The Lady of Shalott"), Robert Burns ("To a Mouse"), and Paul Laurence Dunbar, who uses tail rhyme in his 1898 poem "The Conquerors," written for black Am. soldiers in the Sp.-Am. War. A particularly clever instance of tail rhyme comes from Lewis Carroll, whose lines extend sinuously down the page in the shape of a tail ("The Mouse's Tale"—see CALLIGRAMME).

See BOB AND WHEEL, CAUDA, CAUDATE SONNET.

■ Schipper; Meyer, v. 1; C. Strong, "History and Relations of the Tail Rhyme Strophe in Latin, French, and English," PMLA 22 (1907); A. McI. Trounce, "The English Tail-Rhyme Romances," Medium Aevum 1–3 (1932–34); N. Wright, "The Morality Tradition in the Poetry of Edward Taylor," AL 18 (1946); E. Hamer, The Metres of English Poetry (1954); U. Dürmüller, Narrative Possibilities of the Tail-Rime Romance (1975); A. T. Gaylord, "Chaucer's Dainty 'Dogerel,'" SAC 1 (1979); J. R. Payne, "Afro-American Literature of the Spanish-American War," MELUS (1983); M. Erler, "Davies's Astraea and Other Contexts of the Countess of Pembroke's 'A Dialogue,'" SEL 30 (1990); T. Steele, All the Fun's in How You Say a Thing (1999); M. Tajiri, Studies in the Middle English Didactic Tail-Rhyme Romances (2002).

T.V.F. BROGAN; W. HUNTER

TAMIL POETRY AND POETICS. The Tamil lang., the earliest attested member of the Dravidian lang. family, is India's only mod., living lang. with a lit. trad. reaching back over 2,000 years. Tamil is spoken by about 65 million people in the South Indian state of Tamil Nadu but also in Sri Lanka, Malaysia, Singapore, Mauritius, and diasporic communities around the world, notably in Europe, Canada, and the United States. Premod. or cl. Tamil lit., i.e., the lit. composed before roughly the second half of the 19th c., is almost entirely written in verse. Narrative prose lit. (such as novels and short stories) did not emerge before the colonial period. Tamil developed its own *prosody based on different combinations of various elements: letters/syllables (eḻuttu), metrical syllables (acai), feet (cīr), linkage between feet (taḷai), metrical lines (aṭi), and ornamentation or tropes (toṭai) such as *alliteration (mōṇai), initial rhyme (etukai), and others. The earliest extant Tamil texts, datable to the beginning of the common era, are known today collectively as Caṅkam lit., since a legend tells us that they were composed by academies of poets (caṅkams). This lit. consists of approximately 2,400 poems ranging in length from four to about 800 lines that are collected in two books, each containing several anthols. of poems: the Eṭṭuttokai (Eight Anthologies), which includes the famous collections Kuṟuntokai (Anthology of Short [Poems]) and Puṟanāṇūṟu (Four Hundred [Poems on] Puṟam), and the Pattuppāṭṭu (Ten Poems). The theoretical framework required to understand the highly refined and sophisticated poetics underlying Caṅkam lit. is detailed in the Tolkāppiyam, the oldest known treatise on Tamil grammar and poetics (considered to be contemporaneous with the Caṅkam poems but probably altered variously until perhaps the 5th c. CE). The Tolkāppiyam divides the poems into two distinct genres: akam (interior), love poetry, and puṟam (exterior), poems on war, kings, or social and historical circumstances. Both akam and puṟam poems derive much of their beauty from a complex system of nature imagery that draws on a taxonomy of five poetic Tamil landscapes (hill, seashore, forest and pasture, countryside, wasteland), providing repertoires of flora, fauna, and other elements deployed to evoke specific feelings. In the akam poems, these landscapes are linked metaphorically to different phases of love, the times of day, and the seasons appropriate for these phases. Thus, the hillside is the landscape of (first) union, at night, during the cool season; forest and pasture provide the landscape of the woman's patient waiting for her lover and of domestic togetherness, late in the evening and during the rainy season, and so on.

Between ca. 400 and 900 CE, there developed a trad. of *epic poetry, notably with the two thematically interlinked poems Cilappatikāram (Tale of an Anklet, 5th c.?) and Maṇimēkalai (The Jewel Belt, ca. 500). The Cilappatikāram, combining great poetic beauty with a gripping narrative, tells the story of a young merchant who is unjustly executed by the king of Madurai for a crime he did not commit and of his faithful wife who takes revenge, destroys the city of Madurai, and turns into a goddess of chastity. While the Maṇimēkalai, which continues the story of the Cilappatikāram, is clearly influenced by Buddhism, the Cīvakacintāmaṇi (9th c.?), which describes the many love conquests of prince Cīvakaṉ, is considered a Jain text. Jain influence is also found in the Tirukkuṛaḷ (ca. 5th c.), a comprehensive manual on ethics, polity, and love in 1,330 pithy *couplets and a book that remained highly popular through the ages as a repository of ancient Tamil wisdom and a symbol of Tamil culture.

After about the 6th c., some of the poetic strategies of Caṅkam poetry were absorbed by a corpus of religious hymns extolling the Hindu gods Śiva and Viṣṇu through the expression of intense personal devotion (Bhakti). The earliest Tamil Bhakti poets were devotees of Śiva known as nāyaṉmār (lords). This group included the female poet Kāraikkāl Ammaiyār and the three poets whose verses are collected in the Tēvāram, Appar and Campantar (both 7th c.) and Cuntarar (8th c.), known as the "harsh devotee." The 9th-c. Śaivite poet-saint Māṇikkavācakar is known for his collection of hymns Tiruvācakam and his poem Tirukkōvaiyār. The latter explicitly redeploys akam amatory poetics for religious purposes and weaves the discrete vignettes of the Caṅkam poems into a narrative. Among the devotees of Viṣṇu, known as Āḻvār, were the female poet Āṇṭāḷ (8th c.) and Nammāḻvār (9th c.). Their works and the works of the other Vaiṣṇava saint-poets were collected during the 10th or 11th c. as the Nālāyirativviyappirapantam (Four Thousand Divine Works), the Vaiṣṇava canon.

The period between the 11th and 14th cs. saw the flourishing of the great courtly culture of the med. Cōḻa (Chola) dynasty that led to the production of new literary texts, such as the most famous Tamil version of the pan-Indian Rāmāyaṇa story, the Kaṃparāmāyaṇam, and the authoritative hagiography of Śaivite nāyaṉmār saints, the Periyapurāṇam (Great History [of the Holy Servants of Lord Śiva]). At the same time, a process of "philologization" led to new perspectives on Tamil grammar and poetics, crystallizing in the heavily Sanskrit-influenced treatises Vīracōḻiyam and Taṇṭiyalaṅkāram, and later the Naṉṉūl, which remained the standard Tamil grammar for several centuries. Iḷampūraṇār's commentary on the Tolkāppiyam, written during this period, may have been part of this new surge of interest in and revision of Tamil lit. and grammar, as were the works of the other three great commentators on the Tolkāppiyam, Cēṉāvaraiyar, Pērāciriyar, and Nacciṇārkkiṉiyar, all of which belong to the period between the 11th and 14th cs. and which are some of the few examples of premod. Tamil prose. The extant Chola court poems stand out as tokens of refined literary sensibilities and courtly culture, e.g., the court poet Oṭṭakkūttar's Mūvarulā (Procession Poems on the Three [Kings]), which portray how women of various ages are entranced by seeing the Chola king, a paragon of virtue and beauty, ride by in his glamorous royal procession (ulā); or Cayaṅkoṇṭār's *panegyric Kaliṅkattupparaṇi (1113–18), which not only celebrates the victory of the Cholas in the second Kaliṅga war but is a masterful *satire with terrifying and macabre imagery in its descriptions of the fierce goddess Kāḷi and her demons feasting on corpses on the battlefield. The ulā and the paraṇi were new poetic genres that, together with a number of others, became known as pirapantams (compositions). The term pirapantam (from Sanskrit prabandha-) subsumes a motley group of traditionally 96 different genres in verse form as described in the so-called pāṭṭiyal grammars (the nature [iyal] of poetry [pāṭṭu]), which were written from about the 10th c. until the end of the 19th c. with a view toward theorizing the characteristics of pirapantam poems. Some of these genres may be defined by their form (especially stanzaic structure), e.g., antāti or iraṭṭaimaṇimālai, some by their content, e.g., ulā (poems about the king in procession), kātal (courtly love poems), or paraṇi (poems on war and the battlefield); and some by a combination of both content and form, e.g., piḷḷaittamiḻ (poems in praise of the childhoods of gods or human characters), tūtu (messenger poems), kōvai (narrative "garlands" of love or devotional poems), or kuṟavañci (fortune-teller dramas). Their length varies, and some of them are older than others. This relative diversity, however, has not prevented Tamil poetological trad. from grouping all of them together under the single term pirapantam or under the term ciṟṟilakkiyam (small or minor lit.).

Despite its name, this "minor literature" came to play an increasingly important part in the literary production from the late med. period on. The two most important locales of literary production and circulation were the courts of local kings and princes and religious institutions, such as monasteries and temples. Many poets depended entirely on the patronage of kings and religious authorities and wrote all their verses as commissioned works. Some of the better-known poetic works during this period include the religious poetry of Aruṇakirināṭar (15th c.) and Tāyumāṉavar (17th c.); the 16th-c. epic Naiṭatam, which elaborates the love story between prince Nala and princess Damayantī from the Mahābhārata; and the Tirukkuṟṟālakkuṟavañci (ca. 1718), a play on Lord Śiva in Kuṟṟālam. This period also saw the rise of the great Tamil temple myths (talapurāṇams), verse narratives relating the myths and legends around the foundation of a Śiva temple, as well as the oldest fully extant Muslim poem in Tamil, Vaṇṇapparimaḷap Pulavar's Āyiramacalā (One Thousand Questions, 1572). The widespread system of late med. literary patronage gradually fell apart during the latter half of the 19th c., when the many transformations of a colonial society also affected literary production and reception. While the advances of the printing press meant that more texts reached more people than ever before, prose became valued over poetry as the vehicle of mod. thought and expression.

Mod. Tamil poetry begins for many critics with the works of the famous patriot-poet and social reformer C. Cuppiramaṇiya Pārati (1882–1921), better known simply as Bharati and perhaps the most important voice of 20th-c. Tamil lit. But while Bharati certainly is much better known, a case can also be made for Māyūram Vētanāyakam Piḷḷai (1826–89), remembered chiefly as the first Tamil novelist, to have been the first mod. poet, since his Nītinūl (Book of Moral Conduct), pub. in 1859, purposely deviated from the traditional learned poetics of his time in order to create something that was both formally and thematically new. Though Bharati died young, his more than 250 poems cover a wide range of themes, such as love, nature, mythology, philosophical and religious speculation, and political ideas. His candid patriotism is important, as is his experimentation with what he called prose poetry, an ancestor of Tamil *free verse or what was later referred to as putukkavitai (new poetry). Bharati's poetic innovations and experimentations were continued in the 1930s and 1940s by a number of writers associated with the avant-garde literary magazine Maṇikkoṭi (The Jewel Banner), notably N. Pitchamurthy (1900–77), who was inspired by Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass (1855), and K. P. Rajagopalan (1902–44), who wrote about love and village life. Kanaka Subburatnam (1891–1964) called himself Bharatidasan (Bharati's slave) and continued to write patriotic and nature poetry following but also modifying Bharati's style. Another literary magazine, C. S. Chellappa's Eḻuttu (Writing) founded in 1959, gave further impetus to the develop. of mod. poetry or putukkavitai. In 1962, editor Chellappa published his milestone anthol. Putukkuralkaḷ (New Voices), featuring some of the now canonical mod. poets: Nakulan (pseud. of T. K. Doraiswamy, 1922–2007), Sundara Ramaswamy (1931–2005), S. Vaidheeswaran (b. 1935), S. Mani (1936–2009), and Pramil (pseud. of Dharmu Sivaram, 1939–97).

In the 21st c., Tamil poetry is a multifaceted global phenomenon, with Tamil poets and their audiences living in many different countries. Some of the most exciting contemp. poetry is written by South Indian Dalit poets, such as Ravikumar (b. 1960), Vizhi. Pa. Idayavendhan (b. 1962), Adhavan Deetchanya (b. 1964), and N. T. Rajkumar (b. 1968), calling for a renegotiation of the role of Dalits in society, as well as by female, often feminist, poets. Candid poems about women's roles in society and the female body by poets such as Salma (b. 1968), Kutti Revathi (b. 1974), Malathi Maitri (b. 1968), and Sukirtharani (b. 1973) have caused considerable controversy. Poets of Sri Lanka such as S. Sivasegaram (b. 1942), M. A. Nuhman (b. 1944), V.I.S. Jayapalan (b. 1944), S. Vilvaratnam (1950–2006), Solaikkili (b. 1957), R. Cheran (b. 1960), and S. Sivaramani (1968–1991) have focused—among other themes—on the atrocities of the Sri Lankan civil war and the new modes of life found in the diaspora. Malaysian hip-hop artists, such as Yogi B. (b. 1974) and Dr. Burn (b. 1981), continue to explore new poetic modes and possibilities of doing things with Tamil words.

See INDIA, POETRY OF; SRI LANKA, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies and Translations: The Interior Landscape, trans. A. K. Ramanujan (1967); Hymns for the Drowning: Poems for Viṣṇu by Nammāḻvār, trans. A. K. Ramanujan (1981); Poems of Love and War, trans. A. K. Ramanujan (1985); Modern Tamil Poetry, trans. M. S. Ramaswami (1988); Bharathi Patalkal, ed. T. N. Ramachandran (1989); Songs of the Harsh Devotee: The Tēvāram of Cuntaramūrttināyaṇār, trans. D. Shulman (1990); Tiruvalluvar: The Kural, trans. P. S. Sundaram (1990); The Tale of an Anklet, trans. R. Parthasarathy (1993); The Four Hundred Songs of War and Wisdom (Puṟanāṇūṟu), trans. G. L. Hart and H. Heifetz (1999); "Ancient Tamil Literature," Ancient Indian Literature, ed. T.R.S. Sharma (2000); "Tamil," Medieval Indian Literature, ed. K. Ayyappa Paniker (2000); Lute-song and Lament: Tamil Writing from Sri Lanka, ed. C. Kanaganayakam (2001); The Kamba Ramayana, trans. P. S. Sundaram (2002); Cīvakacintāmaṇi: The Hero Cīvakaṉ, the Gem That Fulfills All Wishes, v. 1, trans. J. D. Ryan (2005); Tamil New Poetry, trans. K. S. Subramanian (2005); The History of the Holy Servants of the Lord Siva: A Translation of the Periya Purāṇam of Cēkkiḻār, trans. A. McGlashan (2006); The Rapids of a Great River: The Penguin Book of Tamil Poetry, ed. L. Holmström, S. Krishnaswamy, and K. Srilata (2009).

■ Criticism and History: K. Zvelebil, The Smile of Murugan (1973); K. Zvelebil, Tamil Literature (1974); G. L. Hart, The Poems of Ancient Tamil (1975); K. Zvelebil, Tamil Literature (1975); D. Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths (1980); Vallikkaṇṇaṉ, Putukavitaiyiṉ tōṟṟamum vaḷarcciyum (The Emergence and Development of New Poetry), 2d ed. (1980); F. Hardy, Viraha Bhakti: The Early History of Kṛṣṇa Devotion in South India (1983); U. Niklas, "Introduction to Tamil Prosody," Bulletin de l'École Française d'Extrême-Orient 77 (1988); I. V. Peterson, Poems to Śiva: The Hymns of the Tamil Saints (1989); K. Zvelebil, Lexicon of Tamil Literature (1995); M. Muilwijk, The Divine Kuṟa Tribe: Kuṟavañci and Other Prabandhams (1996); I. Manuel, Literary Theories in Tamil (1997); P. Richman, Extraordinary Child (1997)—on the piḷḷaittamiḻ genre; E. Wilden, Literary Techniques in Old Tamil Caṅkam Poetry (2006); S. Ebeling, Colonizing the Realm of Words: The Transformation of Tamil Literature in Nineteenth-Century South India (2010).

S. EBELING

TASTE. The term taste first emerged in early mod. Europe as a *metaphor for aesthetic appreciation. For the ancients, taste and smell ranked low on the philosophical hierarchy of the senses because they were associated with bodily pleasure rather than cognition. Whereas sight and hearing were thought to allow for a proper representative distance from the object of contemplation (hence, the regulating principles of consciousness and morality), taste was bound up with the physical whims of the body. It appealed, therefore, to bodily instinct and pleasure, which Aristotle maintained was not the objective of art. While the exertion of the "higher" senses theoretically led to more mind, taste led through the chemical physiology of the body to the "lower" corporeal realm of appetites and aversions. The neck physically separated the head from the body as the seat of all the passions, which stemmed from the stomach and ruled human behavior without reference to shared principles or ideals. Whereas sight and hearing came to be known as "objective" senses, taste and smell were clumped together as suspiciously "subjective." (Touch wavered somewhere between these two extremes and was sometimes demoted to the bottom of the sensation hierarchy.) Traditionally thought to be less mentally reflective than the "distal" senses, taste was associated with sensuousness and overindulgence.

In Enlightenment Europe, however, taste became the dominant metaphor for a disinterested appreciation of the arts—and more generally beauty. Precisely when the metaphorical usage of taste was first adopted to indicate mental discernment is up for debate. Townsend traces it to the Ren. polymath Leon Battista Alberti (1404–72) and Saisselin to a later generation of It. humanists (Michelangelo, Ludovico Ariosto, and Benvenuto Cellini, among others). In the aristocratic world of neoclassical France, the je ne sais quoi* tied to the inexplicable quality of gustatory preference came to stand in for the rhetorical irreducibility of aesthetic experience. The 18th-c. trad. of Brit. taste philosophy follows Joseph Addison's 1711 Spectator essay on taste (no. 409), which credits the Sp. *baroque author Baltasar Gracián (1601–58) with the application of the gustatory metaphor to mental discernment. Like the "sensitive taste" of the tongue, the "mental taste" of the critic was defined by Addison as "that faculty of the soul, which discerns the beauties of an author with pleasure, and the imperfections with dislike." His analogy between the art connoisseur and the tea taster, who could distinguish blindly among different blends of tea, informed the Enlightenment concept of taste as an ideal of cultured refinement, grounded in natural sensibility.

The paradox characterizing the so-called Man of Taste was this tension between subjective response and objective principles. Even Immanuel Kant, who dismissed empiricist sensation psychology as philosophically unsound, began his reflections on taste in Anthropology from a Pragmatic Point of View (1772–73) as a rumination on the physicality of the metaphor: "How might it have happened," he asked, "that the modern languages particularly have chosen to name the aesthetic faculty of judgement with an expression (gustus, sapor) which merely refers to a certain sense-organ" and that mental discrimination as well as physical preference should be determined by it. What Kant faced was the difficulty of proceeding logically, according to a priori logic, when aesthetic-taste experience was stubbornly somatic. The difficulty plagued most taste theorists who sought principles on which to found legitimate judgments of taste.

Bodily taste may be dependent on the fleshy organ of the tongue with its sensory "tentacles" or papillae, but mental taste conceived of as a feeling or sentiment of beauty must entail more than physical sensation. It had to involve an element of necessity, or there could be no meaning ascribed to it—no standard, no principles, nothing beyond physical instinct. In addition to David Hume ("Of the Standard of Taste," 1757), empiricist philosophers of taste included John Gilbert Cooper (Letters concerning Taste, 1757), Edmund Burke (A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful, 1757), Hugh Blair (Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, 1783), Thomas Reid (Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, 1785), and Archibald Alison, Essays on the Nature and Principle of Taste, 1790). Yet the dilemma continued in philosophical discourse of the early 19th c.

In his Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800), William Wordsworth disapproved of those "who will converse with us gravely about a taste for poetry, as they express it, as if it were a thing as indifferent as a taste for rope-dancing, or Frontiniac or Sherry." Along similar lines, S. T. Coleridge remarked disapprovingly in his Philosophical Lectures of 1819 on the gustatory metaphor: "One man may say I delight in Milton and Shakespeare more than Turtle or Venison another man that is not my case for myself I think a good dish of turtle and a good bottle of port afterwards give me much more delight than I receive from Milton and Shakespeare you must not dispute about tastes." There may be no disputing physical-taste preference, but the extensive amount of disputation about aesthetic taste suggests that the maxim de gustibus non est disputandum did not apply philosophically. Like the moral-sense theorists (e.g., Anthony Ashley Cooper, the third Earl of Shaftesbury, Characteristics [1711] and Francis Hutcheson, An Inquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas [1725]), Kant drew on the idea of an "inner sense" capable of apperception to characterize taste as an innate. Nevertheless, his Critique of Judgment (1790) continued to be preoccupied with the analogy as a stumbling block to a coherent aesthetics: "a man may recount to me all the ingredients of a dish, and observe of each and every one of them that it is just what I like," yet I must "try the dish with my own tongue and palate" in order to "pass judgement according to their verdict (not according to universal principles)."

Beauty was the object of aesthetic taste, and empiricists like Hume believed that certain qualities that could excite a sentiment of aesthetic pleasure (or its converse, disgust) must exist "out there" in the object, waiting to be perceived correctly. Such logic dictated that to judge correctly was to judge without interest from a condition of subjective transparency—hence, universality or "disinterest." (As Eagleton notes, the rhetoric of taste had always been juridical.) The critic's job was to discriminate among undigested material, like the famous wine tasters of Sancho Panza's anecdote retold by Hume in "Of the Standard of Taste." These men, who could detect beauties as well as defects, e.g., an old key tied to a leathern thong at the bottom of a hogshead of wine, were emblems of refinement no less than the tea connoisseur cited by Addison. Voltaire's article on taste (Goût), begun by Montesquieu for Denis Diderot and Jean d'Alembert's Encyclopédie, also highlights the analogy: "just as the gourmet immediately perceives and recognizes a mixture of two liqueurs, so the man of taste, the connoisseur, will discern in a rapid glance any mixture of styles. He will perceive a flaw next to an embellishment." In addition to being "cleared of all prejudice," therefore, the ideal critic must achieve (as Hume puts it) a "perfect serenity of mind."

Backing the 18th-c. philosophical idealism that aesthetic-taste experience could be shared was a political optimism: taste is a "social quality" uniting all citizens in a sensus communis or political body from which all idiosyncrasies of birth, habit, prejudice, and circumstance have been cleared. The requisite for aesthetic experience, i.e., personal objectivity or disinterestedness, also promised social cohesion through a "standard of taste." Starting out from the assumption that taste could be shared, Hume (like Burke [Philosophical Enquiry], Alexander Gerard [Essay on Taste, 1759], and Lord Kames [Elements of Criticism, 1762]), believed that when "men vary in their judgments, some defect or perversion in the faculties may commonly be perceived." For these men in "the Century of Taste" (Dickie's phrase), the standard of taste amounted to the collective opinion of a group of ideal critics with acute natural sensibilities, improved by years of practice, and experience with the best models of what has been thought and done in any given culture. Recent challenges to canonical formulations of "the best," however, remind us that the serene and dispassionate, hegemonic Man of Taste was a cultural construct often involving privilege (the leisure and means to gain experience and exposure) and unequal power relations. One name for the aesthetic arena of taste is Jürgen Habermas's "public sphere," another the Enlightenment "Republic of Letters."

In many ways, the Enlightenment concept of taste was a reaction to the Hobbesian view of society as a brutish state of nature, or clash of individual appetites. What Elias has identified as "the civilizing process" represented a trajectory away from instinctual desire toward cultured refinement. As the middle classes grew in importance economically, individuals were taught to regulate themselves and their motivating appetites from within—in part through the aesthetic ideology of 18th-c. taste philosophy, in part through the cultural barrage of conduct manuals, painting and dancing masters, and other practical guides to culture and etiquette. Taste was a middle-class mode of producing subjects, and the consumer was to attain social distinction by navigating the fine line between aesthetic appreciation and material desire. The shift in the nature of that subject from amateur (or lover of the arts) to professional followed the shift from taste to aesthetics.

■ W. J. Bate, From Classic to Romantic (1946); E. Cassirer, The Philosophy of the Enlightenment, trans. F.C.A. Koeblu and J. P. Pettegrove (1951); I. Kant, Critique of Judgment, ed. and trans. J. C. Meredith (1952); R. G. Saisselin, Taste in Eighteenth-Century France (1965); N. Elias, The Civilizing Process: The History of Manners, trans. E. Jephcott (1978); P. Bourdieu, Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgment of Taste, trans. R. Nice (1984); H. Caygill, Art of Judgement (1989); T. Eagleton, The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990); L. Ferry, Homo Aestheticus: The Invention of Taste in the Democratic Age, trans. R. de Loaiza (1993); G. Dickie, The Century of Taste (1996); I. Kant, Anthropology from a Pragmatic Point of View, ed. and trans. V. L. Dowdell (1996); D. Townsend, "Taste: Early History," Encyclopedia of Aesthetics, ed. M. Kelly (1998); C. Korsmeyer, Making Sense of Taste: Food and Philosophy (1999); D. Gigante, Taste: A Literary History (2005).

D. Gigante

TECHNOLOGY AND POETRY. Poetry has long maintained relations with technology, ranging from the concrete and practical to the philosophical and theoretical. Poets have employed multiple technologies in the composition of their works, and a hist. of these technologies is relevant to an understanding of poetry's own hist. However, the philosophical trad. has often obscured these interrelations, attempting to separate poetry from technology in order to assert poetry's privileged access either to nature or divine truth. In the Platonic dialogues, for instance, poiēsis*, the Gr. root of poetry, is carefully distinguished from technē, the Gr. root of technology, often meaning "craft" or "knowledge." As a consequence, a tension emerges between poetic making and mechanical fabrication. This tension has shaped discourses on poetry throughout the ages, producing a paradoxical situation in which the poetic genre identifies itself in opposition to the very means on which it relies and through which it evolves.

Socrates (via Plato) frequently defines technē as type of knowledge that is practically oriented: a technē is a craft, such as building a ship, healing a body, or playing the harp. In the Republic, Plato makes a further distinction between higher and lower forms of craft or making. The highest craft, that of statesmanship, involves a deep knowledge, an understanding of the Forms; it is an epistemē to be distinguished from the lower form of making, poiēsis (from poiein, both to make and to compose poetry). In book 10, Plato argues further that the *poet (poiētēs), like the painter, imitates Forms at a third remove. The demise of poetry as a form of *knowledge, and the beginning of its conflict with other types of craft (techniques and technology), is established here. In the Symposium, poiēsis appears somewhat differently: as a generative force responsible for everything from sexual procreation to the cultivation of the soul. But such associations cannot save poetry per se from being considered by Plato to be a craft of persuasion grounded in neither morality nor truth.

Martin Heidegger makes the next crucial step in the philosophical understanding of poetry's relation to technology, and he does so by standing Plato on his head. In opposition to the argument advanced in the Republic, Heidegger's essays of the 1950s submit that it is poetry, rather than discourses based on reason and mathematical calculation, that enjoys a privileged relation to truth. For Heidegger, poetry is the most elevated of all the technai, and its elevation consists precisely in its distance from crafts implicated in the blind pragmatics of mod. industrialization. Heidegger introduces a new distinction between technē as damaging, "enframing" technology and technē as the poetic revelation of truth. In "The Origin of the Work of Art" (1950), Heidegger posits that poetry, as the highest form of lang., "brings what is, as something that is, into the Open for the first time." Thus, instead of being elided with the imitation—at three removes—of Forms, poetry reveals the very truth of being. Poetry remains a kind of technē, but only, Heidegger underscores, insofar as we understand technē to be "a mode of knowing," a "bringing out of beings." By imposing a strict distinction between technē as poetic "revealing" (poiēsis) and technē as "enframing" (Gestellung), Heidegger produces a clean break between poetry and technology or, more specifically, between the two types of lang. counterposed during his own generation: poetic writing and technologically mediated radiophonic speech.

Anticipating Heidegger, the Brit. romantics conceived of poetry as singularly capable of providing human beings with alternatives to technologically mediated forms of contact with the world (see ROMANTICISM). William Blake's ambivalence toward rapid industrialization set the tone for the reception of new technologies during the romantic period. The "dark satanic mills" of Blake's Songs of Innocence and Experience (1794) underscored the threat of technology, even as their author innovated in the printing technique of etching. William Wordsworth perfected the negative posture toward mod. industrialization (and thus, as a corollary, technology and science): in The Prelude (pub. posthumously in 1850) even "skill" is placed under suspicion, whereas seeing with "a heart / That watches and receives" is praised. Other famous expressions of poetry's epistemological (and moral) superiority over technē may be found in S. T. Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798) and "The Eolian Harp" (1795). P. B. Shelley's "Letter to Maria Gisborne" (1820) displays an ambivalent attitude toward technology (in the form of a steam engine), while John Keats's "Isabella" (1820) laments the inevitable implication of technology in the pursuit of capital. Romantic poetry's most powerful reflections on technē revolve around the figure of Prometheus (Shelley's Prometheus Unbound [1820] and Lord Byron's "Prometheus" [1816]). Here, the Enlightenment emblem of progress returns in romantic verse as simultaneously demon and hero, reflecting the poet's ambivalent attitude toward the tangible consequences of technology and its industrial exploitation.

The encroachment of technology into everyday life only increased during England's Victorian age. As Picker argues, mod. technologies not only suggested thematic material but also imposed alterations on the poet's sensorium. The invention of the microphone in 1827 and other means of acoustic amplification changed the very experience of sound and, thus, writing, reading, and listening practices. Poets from the Victorian age onward began to integrate at the level of composition the technologies of their age in a manner that was both self-aware and purposeful. What Heidegger fears in ". . . Poetically Man Dwells . . ." (1951) was thus actualized in a curious way: it turned out that accommodating and even imitating "radiophonic" and other forms of technologically mediated speech were not incompatible with the unfolding of poetry's own potential as a form of reflection and critique.

It is ironic, then, that Heidegger sought to distinguish poetry from the discourse of broadcasting ("radiophonic speech") at the very moment that many poets were exploring the potential of radio and other new media to disseminate and produce poetry. Heidegger's recoil from such "fallen," technologically mediated speech was arguably a perverse reaction to the poets' own enthusiastic embrace of the same. The response of many poets to technology was curiosity, not disdain. Alfred, Lord Tennyson, for one, excitedly recorded parts of The Princess (1847) on a phonograph presented to him by Thomas Edison himself. And in France, poets rarely hesitated to adopt recording technologies for their own use. (Radio became widely accessible when transmissions from the Eiffel Tower were standardized in 1921.) Blaise Cendrars, Jean Cocteau, and Robert Desnos all performed on the radio; the latter worked with Paul Deharme, Alejo Carpentier, and Jean-Louis Barrault to produce radio shows throughout the 1930s. Bertolt Brecht ("Radiotheorie" [1927]) and Theodor W. Adorno (see his unfinished writings on radio collected in Current of Music: Elements of a Radio Theory, 2009) remained skeptical because of radio's implication in the advertising world. However, Paul Deharme (Pour un art radiophonique [1930]), Walter Benjamin ("Reflections on Radio" [1931]), and Rudolf Arnheim (Radio [1936]) all discerned the avant-garde potential of the radiophonic medium, as did Velimir Khlebnikov, F. T. Marinetti, Gertrude Stein, and Ezra Pound. Some major poetic works were conceived specifically for the radio, such as Antonin Artaud's Pour en finir avec le jugement de Dieu (1947) and Francis Ponge's Le Savon (1965), to mention just a few.

The interest these poets exhibited in the radio was only the most recent instance of poetry's enduring fascination with—and appropriation of—technological means. The story often told is that the invention of radiophonic, phonographic, cinematic, and televisual technologies signaled the demise of the voice, and with it, the subjective *lyric genre. However, hist. shows the reverse to be true. Echoing Heidegger, Kittler has insisted that once the voice could be recorded, poetry was no longer required. *Rhythm and *rhyme suddenly became "superfluous," writes Kittler, as "technology triumphs over mnemotechnology. And the death bell tolls for poetry, which for long had been the love of so many." While typical, this account ignores that, for many poets, the possibility of registering the voice—first with the phonograph, then with the tape recorder—was seen as an opportunity, not a threat. The phonograph itself was invented by a poet, Charles Cros, in 1877, at roughly the same time it was conceived by Thomas Edison, who had the means to put the invention into production. Although some poets lacked access to technology, they still expressed their enthusiasm by imitating the sounds and rhythms of various machines: Blaise Cendrars's and Sonia Delaunay's La Prose du Transsibérien et de la petite Jehanne de France (1913) reproduces the rhythm of the train and the seriality of film; F. T. Marinetti's Zang Tumb Tuuum (1914) copies the sounds of machine guns; Guillaume Apollinaire's "Lettre-Océan" (1914) portrays the concentric circles of TSF (Télégraphe sans fil) transmission; Jean Cocteau's Parade (1917) integrates the sound of typewriting, while La Voix humaine (1930) features telephones; Pierre Reverdy emulates cinematic montage in Les ardoises du toit (1918); and André Breton borrows "automatic writing" from electronic modes of sound recording (Le Manifeste du surréalisme, 1924).

As the 20th c. dawned, industrialists joined forces with inventors to make recording technologies more available to the general public. The entrepreneurial Émile Pathé provided financial support for the first phonographic recording of poems by Apollinaire, Emile Verhaeren, and René Ghil in 1913. Their daring act paved the way for Marinetti, who published the first bona fide poetry record, "La Battaglia di Andrianopoli," in 1924. Marinetti was followed by Kurt Schwitters, who recorded parts of Ursonate in 1925 and Joyce Joyce, who recorded "Anna Livia Plurabelle" in London in 1929. Writing in 1917, Apollinaire made it clear that poets sought from phonographic technologies not an accurate registration of the lyric voice (pace Kittler) but rather a revelation of sounds not formerly considered poetic. He and others hoped to amplify the aural matter at the heart of poetic expression, thereby uncovering a kind of auditory unconscious that would rival the "optical unconscious" described by Walter Benjamin in "The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction" (1936). Representing the early 20th-c. avant-garde, Apollinaire exclaimed in "La Victoire" (1917): "We want new sounds new sounds new sounds." Phonographic technologies were embraced because they offered the opportunity to record a vast array of aural phenomena, from glottal and labial vocalizations such as the licking, sucking, and gulping introduced into lyric circulation by Christian Morgenstern in his Fisches Nachtgesang (1905) to nonhuman sounds such as the breaking dishes and sleigh bells Apollinaire employed in his soundscape for Les Mamelles de Tirésias (1917). Arguably, the most significant contribution to poetry was the avant-garde's intuition that diverse elements of the aural universe could become poetic materials in their own right. In the 1950s, the same logic would inspire poets in both France and the United States to experiment with the most advanced audio technology of their own generation, the tape recorder. Elaborating on the techniques of *Dada and *surrealism, William Burroughs and Brion Gysin produced "cut-ups" by manipulating magnetic tape, which had been introduced into wide circulation during the post–World War II era. In France, François Dufrêne inaugurated the movement known as poésie sonore (*sound poetry) with his Crirythmes (1953). Extending the work of Hugo Ball, Antonin Artaud, and Luigi Russolo, Dufrêne reimagined poetry as an electroacoustic vocal improvisation, a sequence emerging from both amplified human sounds (groans, coughs, nasalizations) and the microphone itself (invented in 1925). Bernard Heidsieck and Henri Chopin soon followed suit, composing written scores with phonetic and semantic content in the first instance, and exploring the expressive possibilities of amplifiers, microphones, and the body's own internal organs in the second. In this way, technological means originally invented for military use were placed at the service of poetic experiment.

Far from proving that advanced technologies ring the death knell for poetry, hist. shows that poets frequently celebrate—and even anticipate—the possibilities they offer. The phonetic babble of Ball, the simultanéisme of Henri Martin Barzun, and the zaum'* poetry of Velimir Khlebnikov and Aleksei Kruchenykh were all forms that called for technologies still to come. "The history of every art form shows critical epochs in which a certain art form aspires to effects which could be fully obtained only with a changed technical standard," Benjamin wrote in 1936. Funkhouser makes a similar observation with regard to digital poetry, arguing that the foundations of the new genre existed conceptually decades before personal computers became available. The proleptic quality of poetic experiment is a historical constant. Although recording devices from the magnetic to the digital permit poets to disseminate their works to a larger audience, the true aesthetic entailments of mod. audio technologies have been creative rather than reproductive.

The same thing could be said for printing methods. Well before George Herbert's canonical *technopaegnion "Easter Wings" (1633), poets began to exploit the possibilities of movable type. Invented in the Western hemisphere in 1450 by Johannes Gutenberg (in China, in 1040), movable type placed visual emphasis on the isolated letter, the graphemic rather than the phonic content of words. During the 19th c., typographic layout became a focal point for creative innovation. Kittler has argued that Stéphane Mallarmé turned his attention to the letter (and to *textuality per se) as a defense against the phonographic registration of the voice. However, it is more likely that Mallarmé's interest in the spatial and pictorial dimensions of the page grew in tandem with devels. in publishing and cinematographic media. Mallarmé's meditation on the paper medium was part of a generational concern with the evocative and semantic potentials of *typography, which reached its apotheosis in late 19th-c. newspaper and advertising graphics. Whereas radio, cinema, and television would become the mass media technologies of the 20th c., print was the quintessential mass media technology of Mallarmé's time. When Richard March Hoe increased the rapidity of print processing with his lithographic rotary press in 1843 and Ottmar Mergenthaler introduced linotype in 1884, the presence of printed text and graphics in daily life became inescapable. However, as Drucker has observed, devels. in the use of print were governed less by the invention of new technologies than by larger social changes, such as the emergence in England, France, and the U.S. of a strong industrial core, the formation of a literate bourgeoisie, and the weakening of the *patronage and academy systems in the domain of high art.

Mallarmé's typographic experiment of 1897, Un coup de dés, was the most daring appropriation of print technologies for the use of poetic composition to date. Sensitive to the way mod. readers approached typographic display as a spectacle for the eye, Mallarmé replaced the temporality of prosody with the simultaneity of spatial organization, imposing the constraint of the two-page spread as a frame in which to arrange words or phrases. In the first print version (in the jour. Cosmopolis, 1897), he suppressed all punctuation and references to the hand, voice, or breath of the writer that had existed in the drafts. Anticipating Albert Lord's argument in The Singer of Tales (1960) concerning the transition from oral to written poetry, Mallarmé approached writing not as secondary, a dictation subordinated to speech, but rather as an originary medium producing uncontrollable *ambiguities realized through acts of reading. Mallarmé also claimed that cinema played a crucial role in his experimental practice; he advanced a parallel between the déroulement (unfolding) of filmic projection and the processual format of Un coup de dés. Mallarmé's insight was prescient: in the 20th c., achieving a poetic rendering of cinematic phenomenality would become one of poetry's central preoccupations. As Ortel (La littérature à l'ère de la photographie [2002]), North (Camera Works [2005]), and Wall-Romana (Cinepoetry [2012]) have cogently argued, visual media such as photography and film transformed the very way poets conceive of the word in space.

The visual possibilities of letters were exploited further by 20th-c. poets such as Apollinaire (Calligrammes*, 1918), the Rus. constructivists (see CONSTRUCTIVISM); the Lettristes, e. e. cummings, Ezra Pound, and Wyndham Lewis; the Brazilian concrete poets Augusto and Haroldo de Campos (see NOIGANDRES); and Eugen Gomringer, Ian Hamilton Finlay, and Pierre Garnier. Another important inheritor of Mallarmé's spatial poetics is Charles Olson, who experimented in the American context with *composition by field. If Mallarmé's major sources of inspiration were print graphics and the cinema, Olson's poetry was profoundly shaped by the mechanics of the typewriter. Invented simultaneously in Denmark by Rasmus Malling-Hansen and in the U.S. by Christopher Latham, the typewriter was introduced into mass production by the arms manufacturing company Remington in the 1860s. By the time Olson began writing after World War II, the typewriter was a ubiquitous tool. Whereas Heidegger lamented that the typewriter tears composition from the hand, degrading the written word by separating it further from human speech, Olson believed, on the contrary, that typewriting reverses the momentum of Gutenberg's revolution. "It is the advantage of the typewriter," he wrote in *"Projective Verse" (1950), that "it can, for a poet, indicate exactly the breath, the pauses, the suspensions even of syllables, the juxtapositions even of parts of phrases, which he intends." The visual arrangements on the page (or field) can thus allude to aural and corporeal phenomena; further, they can be perceived as a map forming semantically charged patterns in plastic space.

Creating patterns with letters and words is not original to Olson, Apollinaire, or even Mallarmé. Scholars point to examples found in ancient Greece (2d and 3d cs. BCE) as well as George Herbert. Dick Higgins, an artist associated with the Fluxus movement and one of the early theorists of computer-generated texts, observes that pattern poetry becomes possible as soon as writing appears, i.e., as soon as the word, to paraphrase Ong, is committed to space. In a similar vein, Derrida theorizes that writing (as écriture* or spacing) is the exemplary technology, the originary corruption of an immediate phusis (nature) by an artificial technē that brings nature into consciousness of itself. Without écriture, there would be no storing of experience, he reasons, no self-reflexivity and, thus, no apprehension of the difference between poiēsis and technē in the first place. Opposing Heidegger, Derrida asserts not only that speech is a variety of writing but that the subjective immediacy of lyric is made possible through the impersonal mediation of a technics—whether that technics be conceived as *rhetoric, *prosody, *convention, or lang. itself. Writing during the same period, Adorno approaches the issue from a more historical perspective, insisting that relations and means of technological production dominant during any given era inflect the procedures employed by the artist. Technai, or modes of spacing, vary according to generation; thus, a true understanding of poetry's relation to technology can be attained only when historically specific modes of production are identified and their influence deeply probed. Adorno points out that technological means and their aesthetic entailments always permeate cultural environments; to refuse technological means is not to escape them but merely to remain blind to the way they already inform the poetic *imagination at work.

Adorno's praise is awarded to poets who, like Arthur Rimbaud, openly acknowledge that lyric subjectivity is far from immediate and that it belongs to a discursive "apparatus" (for Michel Foucault, a dispositif) generated by a particular technology-based medium in a particular medialogical, or socioeconomic, context. This historicized notion of écriture as apparatus is a useful tool for approaching the intensified relations between poetry and technology in the 21st c. Today's poets are mobilizing computer word-processing systems, animation software, digital cameras, and even mobile phones to produce poems combining kinetic, graphic, and verbal elements. The pioneers of digital poetry—incl. Max Bense, Theo Lutz, Pedro Barbosa, Philippe Bootz, Jackson Mac Low, and Alan Sondheim—expanded the experimental use of computer technologies for the creation, and not simply dissemination, of poems. Members of early 21st c. movements such as *Flarf and Conceptual ("Uncreative") Writing (see CONCEPTUAL POETRY) maintain that the internet has provided the possibility for appropriative and permutational procedures that redefine not only what constitutes poetry but also what constitutes poiēsis itself. Hayles (2005) argues that human subjectivity is now so thoroughly mediated by digitality that the expressivity supposedly at the root of poetic writing is no more than an epiphenomenon of a hybrid consciousness constantly interfacing with code. As ever, poetry finds itself in the thick of debates on what constitutes the human being. Through its relations with technology across time, poetry offers a laboratory for exploring the ever-changing nature of what we are.

See ALEATORY POETICS; AVANT-GARDE POETICS; BOOK, POETIC; CODEWORK; COMPUTATIONAL POETRY; CONCRETE POETRY; CYBERTEXT; ELECTRONIC POETRY; PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY; VISUAL POETRY.

■ C. Olson, Selected Writings of Charles Olson, ed. R. Creeley (1950); G. Apollinaire, Oeuvres complètes, ed. M. Adéma and M. Décaudin (1959); Lord; W. Benjamin, Illuminations, ed. H. Arendt, trans. H. Zohn (1969); M. Heidegger, Poetry, Language, Thought, trans. A. Hofstadter (1971); M. Carrouges, Les Machines célibataires (1976); W. Ong, Orality and Literacy: The Technologizing of the Word (1982); R. Debray, Cours de médiologie générale (1991); J. Drucker, The Visible Word: Experimental Typography and Modern Art, 1909–1923 (1994); Wireless Imagination: Sound, Radio, and the Avant-Garde, ed. D. Kahn and G. Whitehead (1994); T. W. Adorno, Aesthetic Theory, ed. and trans. R. Hullot-Kentor (1997); Derrida; F. A. Kittler, Gramophone, Film, Typewriter, trans. G. Winthrop-Young and M. Wutz (1999); C. Noland, Poetry at Stake: Lyric Aesthetics and the Challenge of Technology (1999); P. Ortel, La Littérature à l'ère de la photographie: enquête sur une révolution invisible (2002); J. M. Picker, Victorian Soundscapes (2003); M. North, Camera Works: Photography and the Twentieth-Century Word (2005); N. K. Hayles, My Mother Was a Computer: Digital Subjects and Literary Texts (2005); C. T. Funkhouser, Prehistoric Digital Poetry: An Archaeology of Forms, 1959–1995 (2007); J.-P. Bobillot, Poésie Sonore: Éléments de typologie historique (2009); M. Perloff, Unoriginal Genius: Poetry by Other Means in the New Century (2010); C. Wall-Romana, Cinepoetics: Imaginary Cinemas in French Poetry (2012).

C. NOLAND

TECHNOPAEGNION (Gr., "shaped poetry," pl. technopaegnia, Lat. carmina figurata). A poem in which the letters, words, or lines are arrayed visually to form recognizable shapes, usually the gross forms of natural objects. While the origins of technopaegnia in the West are unknown (a Cretan piece dating from ca. 1700 BCE and some Egyptian pieces dating from 700 BCE are debated examples), there are six surviving poems by Gr. *bucolic poets, shaped as an axe, an egg, wings, two altars, and a syrinx. In late cl. Lat., there is a panegyric cycle by P. Optatianus Porphyrius (fl. 325 CE) praising the emperor Constantine the Great, for whom he was court poet. These poems are for the most part rectilinear or square, with "intexts" woven into or cancelled out from the main text (hence, their names carmina, quadrata, and carmina cancellata). This subgenre, revived at the Merovingian court by Fortunatus, was also popular in the Carolingian renaissance (Boniface, Alcuin, Josephus Scotus) and was the dominant form of visual poetry through the Middle Ages and into the 12th c., when the popularity of the mode waned. Extant intexts are shaped as a galley with oars (Optatian) and a crucified Christ (Hrabanus Maurus [ca. 784–856]; texts in Migne, PL, 107.133 ff.); about 70 late cl. and med. pieces are known.

A second and larger wave of technopaegnia began in the 16th c., at first written mainly in Lat. and Gr. by learned poets in imitation of the Greek Anthology*, but, later, in virtually all the vernaculars of Europe as well as Heb. and Lat., in such new shapes as suns, circles, pyramids, and columns, and in dozens of less common shapes (Puttenham, book 2, ch. 12). By the 17th c., shaped poems had become associated with occasional verse, though in Eng. George Herbert (1593–1633) and Robert Herrick (1591–1674) wrote serious instances; Herbert's "The Altar" and "Easter Wings" are widely anthologized. While from this period nearly 2,000 pieces are known, a reaction against *visual poetry set in with the spread of *neoclassical poetics in the late 17th c. Caustic comments were heaped on shaped poems in the 18th and early 19th cs., e.g., by Joseph Addison in Spectator no. 58. When the technopaegnion was accepted at all, it was taken as suitable only for comic verse, e.g., "The Mouse's Tale" in Alice in Wonderland.

But late in the 19th c., visual poetry in an expanded sense reemerged as an innovative technique, notably in Stéphane Mallarmé's Un coup de dés (1897) and Guillaume Apollinaire's Calligrammes (1918), which proved inspirational to *Dadaism and later the *concrete poetry movement germinating in Brazil, greater Latin America, and Ger.-speaking Europe in the mid-20th c. Dylan Thomas's "Vision and Prayer" is comprised of stanzas arranged in geometric forms in spatial dialogue with the verse itself, a trait also consistent in John Hollander's Types of Shape (1969). The Fluxus figure Dick Higgins (see ALEATORY POETICS) was a tireless collector of what he called pattern poetry. Most recently, David Daniels's The Gates of Paradise (2000) stands as the longest pub. volume of visual poetry, at over 400 pages.

Close analogues to technopaegnia exist in many non-Western poetries, such as hüi-wen in Chinese (from the late Han, 2d c. CE, up to mod. times), ashide-e in Japanese (esp. in the early Tokugawa, 16th c.), and citra-kāvyas in Sanskrit (from the 7th c. CE on) and other langs. of the Indian subcontinent. Like Western technopaegnia, these latter are composed in traditional shapes and classified by these into bandhas, with each bandha having its own associations and trads.

See CALLIGRAMME, VISUAL POETRY.

■ Bucoli graeci, ed. A.S.F. Gow, 2 v. (1958)—the Greek Anthology; Curtius; K. Jhā, Figurative Poetry in Sanskrit Literature (1975); "Die Entwicklung der optischen Poesie in Antike, Mittelalter und Neuzeit," Germanisch-Romanische Monatsschrift 26 (1976); C. Doria, "Visual Writing Forms in Antiquity: The Versus intexti," Visual Literature Criticism, ed. R. Kostelanetz (1979); G. Pozzi, La Parola depinta (1981); D. W. Seaman, Concrete Poetry in France (1981); J. Adler, "Technopaegnia, carmina figurata and Bilder-reime," Yearbook of Comparative Criticism 4 (1982); U. Ernst, "Europäische Figurengedichte in Pyramidenform aus dem 16. und 17. Jahrhundert," Euphorion 76 (1982); W. Levitan, "Dancing at the End of the Rope," TAPA 115 (1985); Hollander, esp., "The Poem in the Eye," and Types of Shape, 2d ed. (1991); E. Cook, Seeing through Words (1986); Pattern Poetry, ed. D. Higgins, spec. iss. of Visible Language 20.1 (1986); D. Higgins, Pattern Poetry: Guide to an Unknown Literature (1987); R. Greene, "The Concrete Historical," Harvard Library Bulletin NS 3.2 (1992); D. Colón, "Embodying the Ideogram: Orientalism and the Visual Aesthetic in Modernist Poetry," diss., Stanford University (2004); Puttenham.

D. A. Colón

TELESILLEUM, telesillean. In cl. prosody, the technical term for the metrical sequence – ∪ ∪ – ∪ ∪ – , which is one of the *aeolic cola (an *acephalous glyconic), though its use is not confined to the Aeolic poets. It is named after Telesilla, a poetess of Argos of the early 5th c. BCE, who used it for stichic verse. It also occurs in Gr. choral lyric and in the choruses of Gr. drama. The catalectic form of the telesilleum, i.e. the sequence x – ∪ ∪ – – , is sometimes called the Reizianum, so named by the early 19th-c. cl. scholar Hermann after his teacher Reiz (1733–90). In Lat. the Reizianum has a slightly different form and occurs both as a colon (in Plautus it has the form x – x – –) and as part of an *asynarteton, i.e., a verse composed of two differing cola, known as the versus Reizianus and having the pattern x – x – x – ∪ – | x – x – – .

See COLON.

■ L. Havet, "Le Distique (dit 'vers') de Reiz," REL 19 (1941); J. W. Halporn, "Reizianum (2)," Lexikon der alten Welt (1965), 2572; Koster; Dale; Snell; West.

J. W. Halporn

TEL QUEL. Tel Quel was a Fr. quarterly literary jour. that ran from 1960 to 1982 and was the platform for many of the radical and avant-garde critical and creative practices in France during that period. The jour. and the writers who produced it (principally Philippe Sollers, Marcelin Pleynet, Julia Kristeva, and Denis Roche) were associated with a highly theoretical approach to lit., drawing on the work of Louis Althusser, Jacques Lacan, and Roland Barthes. However, the specifically theoretical moment in the jour.'s hist. (1965–71) should not obscure its long advocacy of lit., esp. poetic lang., as exceptional with regard to social and psychological norms and its challenge to readers to question the epistemological assumptions on which they rest. While the political affiliations of the review, specifically Marxism and Maoism, charted the attempts to weld the radical affirmation of lit.'s exceptional status to social and political revolution, the more lasting legacy of Tel Quel is twofold. First, the review consistently proposed a revalorization of the hist. of lit., disseminating new material, new trans., and new critical readings of major figures of the past. In the field of poetry and poetic lang., Tel Quel featured extensive renewals and reconfigurations of the work of Dante, Stéphane Mallarmé, Friedrich Hölderlin, James Joyce, Ezra Pound, the Comte de Lautréamont, Arthur Rimbaud, Antonin Artaud, Georges Bataille, and the surrealists (of whom Tel Quel was severely critical; see SURREALISM). As this chain of names suggests, the poetry affirmed by Tel Quel tended to feature exceptional rather than conventional figures, and there was an orientation toward poetic prose rather than verse poetry, although this was not explicit. The theory of poetic lang. proposed by Kristeva (the principal theorist associated with the jour., e.g., in La Révolution du langage poétique, 1974), held that it has the capacity to reorganize the signifying system on which meaning as such is based; this system also incl. the social and historical framework of the *work and the *poet. In the critical work of Sollers, the permanent and directive presence behind Tel Quel, the hist. of lit. is punctuated with certain "limit texts," which express an exceptional logic and puncture the illusions of collective social life. Dante, the Marquis de Sade, Mallarmé, Joyce, Louis-Ferdinand Céline, and an increasing host constitute this chorus of moral revolt. The second aspect of Tel Quel's contribution to the hist. of poetry and poetics was the publication of contemp. poetry in the jour. itself. Associated in its early years with the rhetorically innovative work of Francis Ponge, the poets associated with the review began in the 1960s to develop a style of poetry that eschewed lyricism and subjective poetry (Lautréamont), favored the incorporation of "foreign" elements (newspaper clippings, Chinese characters, Etruscan runes, the I Ching), but, significantly, tended over time toward a destructive critique of poetry as such. Thus, Roche's Le Mécrit (1972) was announced as a destruction of "poetry" and included texts written in undecipherable characters. Marcelin Pleynet's poetic oeuvre (Stanze, 1973; Rime, 1981) tends increasingly toward the *fragment, the residue of an aggressivity directed against lang. In terms both of its challenge to the critical trad. and its affirmation of lit. and of the poetic as such, Tel Quel is a crucial point of reference.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; FRANCE, POETRY OF; POSTSTRUCTURALISM.

■ Tel Quel, 94 v. (1960–82); P. Sollers, Writing and the Experience of Limits, ed. D. Hayman, trans. P. Bernard and D. Hayman (1983); J. Kristeva, Revolution in Poetic Language, trans. M. Waller (1984); P. ffrench, The Time of Theory: A History of "Tel Quel" (1996).

P. ffrench

TELUGU POETRY. Telugu, a Dravidian lang. spoken by about 70 million people who live mostly in the south Indian state of Andhra Pradesh, has a thousand years of continuous literary production in various separate but interrelated trads.

The earliest extant text in Telugu is the first two and a half volumes of a Telugu rendering of the Sanskrit Mahābhārata, by the 11th-c. Nannaya, who is called the ādi kavi, the first poet. Nannaya was associated with the court of the Calukya king Rājarāja, who ruled from Rājamahendri, the present day Rajahmundry, on the banks of the river Godavari. Though Rājarāja's kingdom was short-lived, he commissioned a poem that survived to create lasting conventions of courtly poetry in Telugu. The poem begins with a prayer to the gods; goes on to describe its royal patron; describes in some detail the court scene where the king praises the poet, his scholarship, and his literary skills; expresses his interest in the particular book he wants composed; and commissions the poet to write it. The poet reverently accepts the commission and prepares to compose the poem, wishing continued good luck to his patron. The chapters are addressed to the patron as they open and end with eulogizing vocatives. The colophon includes the poet's name and titles.

This template, which Nannaya established, lasted for almost a thousand years with minor changes to the end of the 19th c. Nannaya's choice of meters selected from Sanskritic and Dravidian sources, along with a judicious combination of verses with heightened prose, also lasted as long. However, Nannaya's storytelling style, his economy of words with deep meaning that make the character come alive in the narrative, and his talent of combining words to create controlled and balanced sonic effects were never replicated in a thousand years. Nannaya's narrative requires a trained performer to present it for an educated audience, the performer adding his own commentary to make it immediately accessible. Nannaya's discrete verses captivate the attention of listeners, who memorize them for their mantric quality of sound. Such qualities make Nannaya the "first poet" for Telugu in a sense other than the chronological accident of his being the earliest. He mapped the literary path for all later generations. His followers, Tikkana (13th c.) and Errāpragaḍa (14th c.), who completed the Telugu rendering of the Mahābhārata Nannaya had begun, firmly established the path Nannaya had created.

The trad. Nannaya created does not, however, indicate a singularity of literary production. In less than two centuries after Nannaya's achievement, Pālkuriki Somanātha voices a protest calling for a countertrad. in a meter not derived from Sanskrit. This meter, called dvipada (a unit of two lines that can be combined to narrate a long story or a series of stories) and amenable to being sung collectively, closes the distance between the reader and the listener, which Nannaya's work requires, and promotes instead absorption into a collective identity. Pālkuriki Somanātha wrote two major works in dvipada—Basavapurāṇa and Paṇḍitārādhya caritra—to celebrate the two 12th-c. leaders of the Vāra Śaivas, militant worshippers of the god Śiva—Basaveśvara and Mallikārjuna Paṇḍitārādhya—who propagated an antiestablishment religion that demanded that its adherents reject their caste in favor of an egalitarian ethic and treat all members of their cult equally, even if they were untouchables and other low castes. In time, this movement gave way to its own caste hierarchy. The literary trad. of this group gradually waned for lack of *patronage.

Meanwhile, the dominant literary trad. continued to flourish with poets such as Nācana Somanātha and Śrīnātha of the 14th and 15th cs., respectively. Śrīnātha, who was called kavisārvabhauma (the emperor of poets), was a prolific author who traveled across the length and breadth of the Telugu-speaking area. His legendary biography speaks of his conquest of a certain Diṇḍima Bhaṭṭu in the court of the Karṇāṭa king Devarāya II. Diṇḍima, the legend says, carried a bronze drum to exhibit his superiority over other poets. Śrīnātha, who defeated him in a literary debate, had the drum smashed in public and was, in the end, rewarded by the emperor with a shower of gold. Śrīnātha's works include Śṛṅgāranaiṣadhamu, a Telugu rendering of Srīharsha's Naiṣadhīyacarita, which tells the love story of Nala and Damayanti and which is celebrated as the most erudite poem in Sanskrit. Śrīnātha was the first poet to imagine an Andhra land and a Telugu literary empire of which he was the unchallenged ruler.

The 16th c. is generally called the golden age of Telugu poetry. During this period, court poets of the Vijayanagara emperor Krishnadevarāya (r. 1509–29) wrote superbly imagined and exquisitely descriptive poems called mahā-prabandha. Among them, Peddana excels with his justly famous Svārociṣamanusambhavamu, popularly called Manucaritramu. This is ostensibly the story of the birth of the first man Manu but famously includes the celebrated love story of the heavenly Gandharva woman Varūdhini, who falls in love with a brahmin man called Pravara.

The poets of the mahā-prabandha broadly follow the narrative structure Nannaya initiated but entirely transform the quality of the poetic lang. with descriptions of events and things in minute detail—a richly imagined world. Characters in their psychological nature are exquisitely presented, and extensive, detailed descriptions intensify the narrative. The ornate diction deliberately maintains a ling. distance but surprisingly brings the poem's evocative quality closer to real-life experience. The mahā-prabandhas of this period, at least the best of them, can be classed among the classics of any great lit. produced by the world's great civilizations.

The emperor Krishnadevarāya himself wrote one of the masterworks of this period, Āmukatamālyada (The Girl Who Gave the Garland She Had Worn to God), perhaps the most remarkable poem in Telugu. A long narrative of human-divine love loosely combined with several other narratives, descriptions of seasons and lives of common people and kings, and an argument concerning the policy a king should adopt in ruling his kingdom, in verses that range from lyrical to ornate, realistic to fantastic, in simple Telugu words and jawbreaking Sanskrit compounds, this long poem remains a high literary achievement.

This period includes another great poet, Bhaṭṭumūrti, also known as Ramarājabhūṣaṇuḍu, who wrote Vasucaritramu (The Story of Vasu). This is an artful poem of semantically dense verses that are nonetheless lyrical and musical, creating inexhaustible new worlds in every reading.

During the late 16th and early 17th cs., Telugu poetry underwent a significant shift in the works of Piṅgaḷi Sūranna, who flourished in the second half of the 16th c. His two verse narratives, Kaḷāpūrṇodayamu (Birth of Kaḷāpūrṇa) and Prabhāvatī Pradyumnamu (The Story of Prabhāvatī and Pradyumna), might be called the earliest novels in Telugu. These poems follow the psychological devel. of the characters through their inner conflicts, with unpredictable surprises.

While the mahā-prabandha genre continued in a courtly style, an entirely different line of poetry flourished, composed by poets who were devoted to a deity associated with temples. Potana (14th c.) wrote the Bhāgavatamu, which told stories of Viṣṇu and his avatars, chiefly Kṛṣṇa, and of his devotees. Prahlāda, the demon king Bali, the elephant Gajendra, Rukmiṇi who eloped with Kṛṣṇa, and the gopi cowherd girls who fell in love with him, became household names in Telugu primarily because of Potana.

Among the temple poets, Annamayya or Annamācārya (15th c.), who served the god Venkaṭeśvara in Tirupati, a temple town in southern Andhra Pradesh, stands out as a composer of songs. His songs, known as padams, number into the several thousands—Annamayya's grandson gives a symbolic number, 32,000. The songs, editorially classified into two groups, śṛṅgāra (erotic) and adhyātma (metaphysical), were inscribed on copper plates even during the life of Annamayya and are now preserved in the temple museum.

Later padam writers who followed Annamayya include Kṣetrayya and Sāraṅgapāni. The erotic lyrics that Kṣetrayya wrote were objectionable to Eng.-educated, Victorianized new literati but came to be preserved when new interpretations of the songs emerged, reading spiritual meanings into them. Earlier, these songs had been sung by courtesans to their customers. The practice ended when, in the mid-20th c., the occupation of the courtesan was prohibited as immoral.

During the 17th and 18th cs., Telugu poets moved south to Tanjavur and Madurai (presently in Tamil-Nadu), under the patronage of Nayaka kings and later Maratha kings who ruled the area. During this period, women who were courtesans flourished as poets, such as Rangājamma and Muddupaḷaṇi. Muddupaḷaṇi's Rādhikāsvāntanamu was condemned by 20th-c. male critics as obscene in that a female poet wrote explicitly about Kṛṣṇa and his beloved Rādhā making love; however, the poem received better treatment among feminist critics. The 17th c. is also the period in which new classes of literati, who mostly served as scribes and accountants for landowners but acquired a social status of their own, composed poems that they attributed to famous poets and kings of the past such as Pĕddana and Krishnadevarāya. Stories told about Tenāli Rāmaliṅgaḍu, a fictitious poet said to be in the court of Krishnadevarāya, belong in this trad. These verses and stories were and continue to be quoted orally in conversations among literate communities. Such verses, known as cāṭus, number in the hundreds and suggest a public literary culture unrelated to any king or his court. Themes in these verses represent a subtle social crit. of irresponsible kings and bad poets and demonstrate a community with a good taste for poetry.

A genre called śataka, comprising about 100 independent verses loosely connected with one vocative addressing a deity in a local temple, became popular in the late 16th c. and after. Several of these śatakas are known for their social crit. and protest, and were written by poets frustrated by the behavior of degenerate kings or those who could not accept the many radical changes occurring in society around them. Among such śatakas, Dhūrjaṭi's Kāḷahastīśvara śatakamu is noteworthy for the quality of poetry and for the courage of the poet. It is partly confessional in nature, and its agonizing subjectivity and emotional intensity appeal to any reader who recognizes the pain of living in a troubled world.

By and large, the period of the 17th and 18th cs. ushers in what might be called an indigenous modernity in Telugu poetry, with its depiction of a new subjectivity, a cultivation of interiority, a psychologized personhood, and a representation of personal privacy and social mobility.

The 19th and 20th cs. bring about yet another radical shift in Telugu lit. with the opening of new ideas and sensibilities from the introduction of Eng. into colonial schools and colleges. Gurajada Apparao is often credited as the leading figure of modernity during this period, and his play Kanyāśulkam is regarded as the first mod. play in Telugu. A movement called Bhāvakavitvam (Poetry of Feeling) follows Apparao. Poets of Bhāvakavitvam sing of romantic love and celebrate nature. They depict woman not as an object of desire but as a person to be loved and adored. Poets such as Devulapalli Krishna Sastri and Rayaprolu Subbarao set the tone for the poetry of this period, with their delicate and carefully chiseled verses speaking of the meeting of hearts and dreamlike images of the beloved. Poets of this period rebelled against the excessively eroticized descriptions of women in the prabandha poetry, rejecting conventional pundits who tried to control poetry with their outdated grammar and fossilized poetics.

Within decades, Bhavākavitvam was rejected by a group of poets influenced by an international wave of Marxism. Led by Srirangam Srinivasa Rao, better known as Sri Sri, a large number of young poets, who called themselves abhyudaya (progressive) poets, wrote about the poor and the downtrodden working class, calling for them to reject the dominance of the wealthy. Rapid changes in Telugu poetry such as these brought about a rejection of what was considered to be the misguided and derivative modernity of the colonial period in favor of the imported revolutionary fervor of the progressive poets, with an invitation to celebrate India's indigenous literary and cultural strength, which had suffered under colonialism. Viswanatha Satyanarayana led this move with his six-volume Rāmāyaṇa Kalpavṛikṣamu (Ramayana, the Wish-Giving Tree) and his magnum opus Veyipaḍagalu (Thousand Hoods).

More recent devels. include feminist poems by women against male dominance, by Dalits (former untouchables) against the injustices done to them by the upper castes, and by Muslims about their oppression as minorities. Muslim women and Dalit women write about the double injustice done to them by men of upper castes, as well as their own community. Telangana writers also demand recognition of their identity separate from Andhra.

The hist. of Telugu poetry of the past thousand years presents a conspectus of the historical and cultural devels. in Andhra. At the same time, the corpus transcends time and place to appeal to literary connoisseurs across langs.

See ASSAMESE POETRY; BENGALI POETRY; GUJARATI POETRY; HINDI POETRY; INDIA, POETRY OF; INDIA, ENGLISH POETRY OF; RĀMĀYAṆA POETRY; SANSKRIT POETICS; SANSKRIT POETRY.

■ Siva's Warriors: Basava Purāna of Pālkuriki Somanātha, trans. V. Narayana Rao (1990); When God Is a Customer: Telugu Courtesan Songs by Ksetrayya and Others, ed. A. K. Ramanujan, V. Narayana Rao, D. Shulman (1994); A Poem at the Right Moment: Remembered Verses from Premodern South India (1998), and Classical Telugu Poetry: An Anthology (2002), both ed. V. Narayana Rao and D. Shulman; V. Vallabharaya, A Lover's Guide to Warrangal: Vallabharaya's Kridabhiramamu, trans. V. Narayana Rao and D. Shulman (2002); Hibiscus on the Lake: Twentieth-Century Telugu Poetry from India, ed. and trans. V. Narayana Rao (2003); P. Sūranna, Sound of the Kiss, or the Story That Must Never Be Told, trans. V. Narayana Rao and D. Shulman (2003); Annamayya, God on the Hill: Temple Songs from Tirupati, trans. V. Narayana Rao and D. Shulman (2005); P. Sūranna, The Demon's Daughter: A Love Story, trans. V. Narayana Rao and D. Shulman (2006); G. Apparao, Girls for Sale: Kanyasulkam. A Play from Colonial India, trans. V. Narayana Rao (2007).

V. NARAYANA RAO

TENOR AND VEHICLE. Because he was dissatisfied with the traditional grammatical and rhetorical account of *metaphor, which he believed emphasized its merely decorative and embellishing powers, I. A. Richards in 1936 reintroduced this pair of terms—already reflected, as Engell points out, in the 18th c. in Samuel Johnson's Dictionary (1755) and used by such later Augustan rhetoricians as George Campbell and Hugh Blair—with the notion of "a borrowing between and intercourse of thoughts." Since any metaphor at its simplest gives two parts, the thing meant and the thing said, Richards used tenor to refer to the thing meant—purport, underlying meaning, or main subject of the metaphor—and vehicle to mean the thing said—that which serves to carry or embody the tenor as the analogy brought to the subject.

But Richards intended more than simply to reintroduce this terminology for existing concepts; rather, he intended to develop a mod. concept not just of metaphor but of the nature of *poetry itself. Having traced out tenor and vehicle as the elements of metaphor, he (and the critics who followed him) went on to distinguish between poetic metaphor and other kinds. In attempting to show that true poetic metaphor is never merely decorative, logical, explanatory, or illustrative, he claimed that the "transaction" it establishes between tenor and vehicle "results in a meaning (to be clearly distinguished from the tenor) which is not attainable without their interaction"—which is, in effect, not attainable by direct and literal prose statement. The vehicle, he continued, "is not normally mere embellishment of a tenor which is otherwise unchanged by it but . . . vehicle and tenor in cooperation give a meaning of more varied powers than can be ascribed to either."

These special powers of poetic metaphor Richards credited to the way the vehicle brings with it, because it derives from an aspect of experience outside or different from the literal experience in the poem, a host of implicit associations that, although circumscribed by the tenor, are never quite shut out entirely. This unsuppressible range of connotations closely resembles what John Crowe Ransom later called "irrelevant texture," which he (and other mod. critics) valued as the very essence of poetry. Such an approach to poetry presumed special qualities for poetic lang.—*ambiguity, *irony, *paradox, and so on—which found their cause in the tension set up between the tenor in a poetic metaphor and the emotional, sensory, or conceptual connotations brought into the poem by the vehicle. This approach goes beyond simply attributing emotional and imaginative powers to metaphor to claim for it special cognitive powers as well. Thus, e.g., Hawkes sees metaphor as embodying in little the larger relation between lang. and reality: there is the world (tenor), and there are the terms in which we see it (vehicle); Ricoeur finds an interesting similarity between metaphor and the psychoanalytic concept of transference, where an adult tends to see the world of the present (tenor) via the habits of mind he or she learned from the parents as a child (vehicle).

Other critics, however, have found the tenor-and-vehicle distinction unclear, inconsistent, or inaccurate. Black develops the boundaries of four distinct theories of metaphor—the comparison, integration, interaction, and substitution theories—as a way of placing Richards's concept in a fuller context. While most critics (Wimsatt, Shibles, Gerhart, and Russell) agree that the tension of difference and interaction between tenor and vehicle is central, Empson and Brooke-Rose, e.g., emphasize the presence of the necessary basic similarity and fusion. Still others, such as Wheelwright, try to coin new definitions for tenor and vehicle.

However this may be, two main points should be kept in mind. First, metaphor depends, as Aristotle said, on the perception of the similarity in dissimilars. It is true that the vehicle must be logically different from the tenor, but it is also true that the basic effect depends on seeing the similarities between two things that at first appear to be different. It is true, moreover, that a third and new meaning is created between tenor and vehicle that is not the same as the tenor, but this effect depends not so much on the "irrelevancies" or differences imported by the vehicle as on the surprising fullness of appropriate meanings it brings to the tenor There are, thus, two additional parts to a metaphor: the point or points of contact or similarity between tenor and vehicle, often called the ground, and the role played by the consequent differences. The second and related point is that the interpretation must be limited and controlled by the poetic context.

In the well-known "stiff twin compasses" figure in John Donne's "A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning," the tenor (two lovers about to part) and the vehicle (a piece of mechanical drawing equipment) seem particularly remote, even incongruous. But closer inspection will reveal the similarity or point of contact: the lovers will remain connected in separation even as the legs of the compass remain attached at the top when pushed apart at the bottom. And there are the obvious differences, esp. if we consider the range of connotations: a compass is a scientific measuring device, is cold and impersonal, and is stiff and unbending, while the lovers are passionate, yearning, and fearful. Interpretation could emphasize difference by pointing up the complexity of the speaker's mind, uniting thought and feeling, aware of the subtle contradictions of love; or it could remain within the poem's context and show how the analogy is appropriate to the speaker's effort to console his lady about their impending separation: he is trying to cool their passion, arguing that a separation will not be a threat to their love. The "irrelevant texture" is relevant after all, and the third and new meaning, which arises out of the interaction between "lovers parting and needing to be consoled" as tenor and "compasses which remain connected at the top even when their feet are separated" as vehicle, is that there is a strong and precise mental and spiritual bond between true lovers that unites them when they must part physically. The meanings brought into the tenor by the vehicle have mainly to do paradoxically with making "material" the bond that is on its deepest level mental and spiritual: the compass, i.e., while denoting unity in separation, connotes the qualities of accuracy and firmness, and it does this in terms of a sharp and clear image. These meanings and their interplay create a complex of meanings that could not be conveyed by a direct and literal prose statement—exemplified by the present interpretation of "A Valediction"—because a large part of what is being conveyed is thought and feeling in-situation. This contextual reality could be "explained" in prose, but it could not very well be felt, and that is the function of poetic metaphor.

■ H. W. Wells, Poetic Imagery (1924); K. Burke, Permanence and Change (1935); I. A. Richards, The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939); J. C. Ransom, The New Criticism (1941); W. Empson, The Structure of Complex Words (1951); W. K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon (1954); Wellek and Warren; C. Brooke-Rose, The Grammar of Metaphor (1958); M. Black, Models and Metaphors (1962); P. Wheelwright, Metaphor and Reality (1962); W. Embler, Metaphor and Meaning (1966); K. K. Ruthven, The Conceit (1969); M. Peckham, "Metaphor," The Triumph of Romanticism (1970); W. A. Shibles, An Analysis of Metaphor in the Light of W. M. Urban's Theories (1971); M. C. Beardsley, "The Metaphorical Twist," Essays on Metaphor, ed. W. A. Shibles (1972); T. Hawkes, Metaphor (1972); D. Lodge, The Modes of Modern Writing (1977); P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Metaphor, trans. R. Czerny (1977); Metaphor, ed. D. S. Miall (1982); M. Gerhart and A. M. Russell, Metaphoric Process (1984); E. R. MacCormac, A Cognitive Theory of Metaphor (1985); D. E. Cooper, Metaphor (1986); J. Engell, "The New Rhetoricians," Psychology and Literature in the Eighteenth Century, ed. C. Fox (1987); R. J. Fogelin, Figuratively Speaking (1988); S. Glucksberg and B. Keysar, "Understanding Metaphorical Comparisons: Beyond Similarity," Psychological Review 97 (1990); K. Walton, Mimesis as Make Believe (1990); S. Glucksberg and B. Keysar, "How Metaphors Work," Metaphor and Thought, ed. A. Ortony, 2d ed. (1993), and "Metaphor and Communication," PoT 13 (1993); K. Walton, "Metaphor and Prop-Oriented Make-Believe," European Journal of Philosophy 1 (1993); D. Hills, "Aptness and Truth in Verbal Metaphor," Philosophical Topics 25 (1997).

N. Friedman

TENSO (Occitan, also tençon; It. tenzone). A type of poetic composition that matured in Provence early in the 12th c., tenso consists of a verbal exchange largely in the form of invective expressed through the medium of sirventes or coblas*. The earliest example seems to be by Cercamon and Guilhelmi. Later it developed into the partimen* or joc partit, an exchange minus the personal element, and was applied to moral, literary, and political problems. In many cases, the subject matter is imaginary, and often the original argument and the exchange are by the same person. The troubadours carried the device into Italy, where we find Lanzia Marques and Alberto Malaspina making use of it in Occitan compositions. In Sicily, the feigned tenso in canzone-form called contrasto was quite popular (e.g., Cielo d'Alcamo, Giacomino Pugliese). In Italy, however, a tenso (tenzone) generally assumes the form of an exchange of *sonnets between two (or more) poets on a specific topic. One general characteristic of the tenzone is the practice of responding per le rime, i.e., in the answering sonnet the poet would adopt the same rhymes used in the initial sonnet. An early tenzone of the *Sicilian school treats of the nature of love and contains sonnets by Jacopo Mostacci, Pier delle Vigne, and Giacomo da Lentini. In Tuscany, the tenzone was also adopted for discussion of political, literary, and moral topics. The example of Guittone d'Arezzo was extremely influential in making it common among his followers (the guittoniani) and the poets of the Dolce stil nuovo*, incl. Dante and Cino da Pistoia.

See ITALY, POETRY OF; OCCITAN POETRY.

■ P. E. Guarnerio, Manuale di versificazione italiana (1893); H. Stiefel, Die italienische Tenzone des XII Jahrhunderts und ihr Verhältnis zur provenzalischen Tenzone (1914); S. Santangelo, Le tenzoni poetiche nella letteratura italiana delle origini (1928); D. J. Jones, La Tenson provençale (1934); E. Köhler, GRLMA, v. 2.1.B.3; Elwert, Italienische; S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994); Il genere "tenzone" nelle letterature romanze delle origini, ed. M. Pedroni and A. Stäuble (1999); P. Bec, La Joute poétique (2000); C. Giunta, Due saggi sulla tenzone (2002), and Versi a un destinatario (2002).

J. G. Fucilla; C. Kleinhenz

TERCET. A verse unit of three lines, usually rhymed, most often employed as a stanzaic form. It was first developed systematically in It. poetry (terzina): Dante chose the tercet with interlocking rhymes (terza rima*) for the stanza of the Divine Comedy, whence it spread to the other vernacular poetries. In those versions of the *sonnet derived from It., the *sestet is made up of two tercets rhyming (often) cdecde. Eng. users of tercets or terza rima include Thomas Wyatt, John Donne, Robert Herrick ("Whenas in Silks my Julia Goes") and P. B. Shelley ("Ode to the West Wind," "The Triumph of Life"). The tercet became the major form of the mature Wallace Stevens: fully half of the poems in his last three books of poetry use it, incl. nearly all of the major poems ("Notes toward a Supreme Fiction," "Auroras of Autumn," "Sea Surface Full of Clouds"). W. C. Williams uses a variant "triadic stanza" as his staple form. Monorhymed tercets in stichic verse are *triplets. Though three-line stanzas are less common in the poetries of the world than *quatrain, they are important nonetheless: the Fr. *villanelle comprises five tercets and a quatrain, and two forms of Welsh englynion are in tercets, incl. most of the work of Llywarch Hen (6th c.; see ENGLYN). Western adaptations of the Japanese *haiku (see RENGA) normally set it as a tercet of five-, seven-, and five-syllable lines, unrhymed. ■ E. Berry, "W. C. Williams' Triadic-Line Verse," Twentieth-Century Literature 35 (1989).

T.V.F. BROGAN

TERZA RIMA. It. verse form consisting of interlinked *tercets, in which the second line of each tercet rhymes with the first and third lines of the one following, aba bcb cdc, etc. The sequence of tercets formed in this way may be of any length and is usually brought to a conclusion by a single final line, which rhymes with the second line of the tercet preceding it, aba a. Terza rima has a powerful forward momentum, while the concatenated rhymes provide a reassuring structure of woven continuity, which may on occasion, however, imprison the poet in a movement of cyclical repression or driven mindlessness (Alfred de Vigny, "Les Destinées"; Hugo von Hofmannsthal, "Ballade des äusseren Lebens"). In all its realizations, terza rima suggests processes without beginning or end, an irresistible perpetuum mobile.

Terza rima (in *hendecasyllables) was introduced by Dante as an appropriate stanza form for his Divina commedia. Its symbolic reference to the Holy Trinity, its other numerological implications, and the overtones of tireless quest and of the interconnectedness of things were particularly apposite. Most probably Dante developed terza rima from the tercets of the sirventes*, but whatever the origin of the form, it found immediate popularity with Giovanni Boccaccio, who used it in his uncompleted Amorosa visione, and with Petrarch (I Trionfi). After Dante, terza rima became the preferred verse form for allegorical and didactic poems such as Fazio degli Uberti's Dittamondo and Federico Frezzi's Quadriregio. But its implicit difficulty discouraged its widespread use after the 14th c., although Vincenzo Monti in the late 18th c. and Ugo Foscolo in the early 19th c. had recourse to it.

In France, terza rima first appeared in the work of Jean Lemaire de Belges ("Le Temple d'honneur et de vertus," 1503; "La Concorde des deux langages," 1511) and was taken up by poets of the Pléiade*—Pontus de Tyard, Étienne Jodelle, Jean-Antoine de Baïf. The *decasyllable almost invariably used by these 16th-c. poets yielded to the *alexandrine in the form's 19th-c. revival, which was subscribed to by *Parnassians (Théodore de Banville, Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle) and symbolists alike (see SYMBOLISM).

The form makes even greater demands on poets who write in a lang. less rich in rhymes than It. or Fr. Chaucer first experimented with terza rima in Eng. for parts of his early "Complaint to His Lady," but its first significant use is by Thomas Wyatt, followed by Philip Sidney and Samuel Daniel. The romantics experimented with it, Lord Byron for "The Prophecy of Dante" and P. B. Shelley for "Prince Athanase" and "The Triumph of Life." Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind" is composed of five sections, each rhyming aba bcb cdc ded ee (see TERZA RIMA SONNET). Since the romantics, it has been used, sometimes with variation of line length and looser rhymes, by Thomas Hardy, W. B. Yeats, T. S. Eliot, W. H. Auden ("The Sea and the Mirror"), Roy Fuller ("Centaurs"; "To my Brother"), and Archibald MacLeish ("Conquistador"). More recently, in Derek Walcott's Omeros (1990), an almost free-rhyming terza rima ("Dantesque design") is combined with a polymorphous *hexameter (Homer); in this "undone" state, terza rima supports a thematics of woundedness and of the difficult curing of the present by the past, but still manages to embody the poem's final line: "When he left the beach the sea was still going on."

See ITALIAN PROSODY.

■ L. E. Kastner, "A History of the Terza Rima in France," ZFSL 26 (1904); J.S.P. Tatlock, "Dante's Terza Rima," PMLA 51 (1936); L. Binyon, "Terza Rima in English Poetry," English 3 (1940); J. Wain, "Terza Rima," Rivista di Letterature Moderne 1 (1950); R. Bernheim, Die Terzine in der deutschen Dichtung (1954); M. Fubini, "La Terzina della Commedia," DDJ 43 (1965); P. Boyde, Dante's Style in His Lyric Poetry (1971); J. D. Bone, "On 'Influence' and on Byron and Shelley's Use of Terza Rima in 1819," KSMB 32 (1982); J. Freccero, "The Significance of Terza Rima," Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, ed. A. S. Bernardo and A. L. Pellegrini (1983); P. Breslin, "Epic Amnesia: Healing and Memory in Omeros," Nobody's Nation: Reading Derek Walcott (2001); M. Hurley, "Interpreting Dante's Terza Rima," FMLS 41 (2005).

L. J. ZILLMAN; C. SCOTT

TERZA RIMA SONNET. A term used to describe a quatorzain whose rhyme scheme has four *tercets in the interweaving pattern characteristic of terza rima (aba bcbcdcded), followed by a closing *couplet (ee). It has sometimes been suggested that this pattern, of which P. B. Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind" provides the most celebrated cycle of examples, resembles the Spenserian sonnet with its couplet ending (ababbcbc cdcdee). But the connection is tenuous: the *quatrains of the Spenserian sonnet are a sequence of overlapping, alternating rhyme pairs rather than a series of interlinked tercets; and its final couplet does not function as a *refrain or invocation or exhortation as those in Shelley's cycle do. On the other hand, it should be noted that the Sicilian sonnet has been proposed as the source of terza rima. In any event, this hybrid form (cf. the terzanelle) has not been lost from sight: Robert Frost's "Acquainted with the Night" (in an *envelope pattern) is a splendid mod. example.

■ H. Haworth, " 'Ode to the West Wind' and the Sonnet Form," Keats–Shelley Journal 20 (1971).

C. Scott

TETRAMETER (Gr., "of four measures").

I. Classical
II. Modern

I. Classical. In Gr. and Lat., the basic meter for recitation forms is the trochaic tetrameter catalectic, i.e., four trochaic metra (units of measurement; see METRON): – ∪ – x | – ∪ – x | – ∪ – x | – ∪ – x where x = *anceps (a syllable that, independently of its real metrical value, can be counted as long or short, according to the requirements of the meter), with truncation (see CATALEXIS) of the final anceps. There is a *diaeresis (coincidence of a word ending with the end of a metrical unit) after the second anceps, which in comedy is sometimes replaced by a *caesura before it or, more rarely, the third breve. In Gr. drama, this meter is often associated with scenes of excitement. Several prosodic phenomena, such as (1) the occasional *responsion of – ∪ ∪ ∪ with a trochaic metron in Aristophanes; (2) the fact that even in the strict versification of Solon, Havet's *bridge in his tetrameters is slightly less stringent than Porson's bridge in his trimeters; and (3) the lower rate of the substitution of ∪ ∪ for ∪ or x as compared to the *trimeter suggest that the trochaic tetrameter was less constrained in its access to the rhythms of Gr. speech than some other meters. Ancient trad. (e.g., Aristotle, Rhetoric 1407; Marius Victorinus 4.44) considered the trochaic tetrameter a faster meter than the iambic trimeter. At any rate, the greater speed of the tetrameter is probably more than a matter of conventional performance tempo and may reflect a universal feature of falling rhythm in ordinary speech. The trochaic tetrameter catalectic was employed by the archaic iambographers (writers of *iambs); Aristotle (Poetics 1449a2) states that it was used in tragedy before the iambic trimeter, but in extant drama, it is much less frequent than the latter.

Besides its use in trochaic, the tetrameter length was also used in antiquity with anapestic and iambic metra. The anapestic tetrameter catalectic is used in comic dialogue. It is characterized by metron diaeresis as well as regular median diaeresis, frequent contraction of all but the last pair of brevia, and resolution of longa. The iambic tetrameter catalectic was used by Hipponax and is fairly frequent in comedy for the entrance and exits of choruses and for contest scenes. Diaeresis after the second metron is preferred but caesura after the third anceps is common; resolution and substitution are frequent. The *acatalectic iambic tetrameter is used only by Sophocles in the Ichneutai and in Ion's satyr-play Omphale.

The Lat. adaptation of the Gr. trochaic tetrameter catalectic is the trochaic septenarius*, used commonly for comic dialogue and favored by Plautus. It stands in the same relation to its Gr. model as does the senarius*, showing the same regard for linguistic stress. The absence of polysyllabic oxytones (words whose last syllable is stressed) and infrequency of proparoxytones (words stressed on the antepenultimate syllable) in Lat. means that the frequent trochaic closes of paroxytonic words (stressed on the penultimate syllable) will effect a prevailingly trochaic rhythm. As a popular form, it is known as the versus quadratus. Beare summarizes the long-held view that it was this meter, widely used for popular verse forms such as the marching songs of Caesar's legions, and common in late antiquity, that became the basis for much of med. Lat. versification. It is the meter of the Pervigilium veneris and a number of Christian *hymns, notably Venantius Fortunatus' Pange lingua, and was surpassed only by the iambic dimeter hymn quatrain (itself octosyllabic when regular) and the sequence as the most popular meter of the Middle Ages.

II. Modern. In mod. langs., the tetrameter is based on feet rather than metra; hence, it is but half as long as the cl. type. The mod. vernacular tetrameter, strictly speaking, is a verse line of four regular metrical feet; with freer metrical patterning, it is simply an *octosyllable as in Fr. and Sp. versification, or else stress verse, as in ballad meter and hymn meter. The Fr. tétramètre, however, is a 12-syllable line with four divisions. In Eng. poetry, the tetrameter is second only to iambic pentameter in wideness of use; it is employed frequently in popular verse, *nursery rhymes, songs, *hymns, and *ballads, as well as literary verse. Eng. tetrameters are chiefly in iambic rhythm, although trochaic tetrameters are also common. Eng. and Scottish traditional ballads usually consist of four-line stanzas that alternate iambic tetrameter and trimeter. Considerably less common than iambic and trochaic tetrameters, anapestic and dactylic tetrameters were popular during the romantic period; the most famous example is Lord Byron's "The Destruction of Sennacherib," in anapestic rhythm. Eng. tetrameter is almost always rhymed: in a famous footnote to his 1933 Leslie Stephen lecture, A. E. Housman singles out as one of the mysteries of versification "why, while blank verse can be written in lines of ten or six syllables, a series of octosyllables ceases to be verse if they are not rhymed." Well-known examples of iambic tetrameter verse in Eng. include one (only) of William Shakespeare's sonnets (145), John Donne's "The Extasie," Andrew Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress," William Wordsworth's "I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud," Alfred, Lord Tennyson's In Memoriam, and Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening." Something of a literary curiosity, Herman Melville's Clarel: A Poem and Pilgrimage in the Holy Land (1876), at nearly 18,000 lines the longest poem in Am. lit., is composed (except for its epilogue) in iambic tetrameter.

Rus. poetry features iambic tetrameter most famously and successfully in the work of Alexander Pushkin, who wrote nearly 22,000 tetrameters, over half his entire output, for The Bronze Horseman (1833) and Evgenij Onegin (1825–32).

Trochaic tetrameters are almost as common in Eng. as iambic, a fact of interest because trochaic pentameters, e.g., are almost nonexistent (see PENTAMETER). One of the more notorious and frequently parodied instances of mod. trochaic tetrameter is H. W. Longfellow's "Song of Hiawatha" (1855). Eng. poems in trochaic tetrameter frequently employ catalexis, truncating the second syllable of the line's last foot. Examples include Thomas Carew's "A Prayer to the Wind" and W. H. Auden's "Lullaby." Other famous poems in tetrameter combine iambic and trochaic feet along with catalexis: John Milton's "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" and P. B. Shelley's "Lines Written among the Euganean Hills."

■ Classical: J. Rumpel, "Der trochäische Tetrameter bei den griechischen Lyrikern und Dramatikern," Philologus 28 (1869); H. J. Kanz, De tetrametro trochaico (1913); Beare; F. Crusius, Römische Metrik, 2d ed. (1955); F. Perusino, Il tetrametro giambico catalettico nella commedia greca (1968); West; A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, Language and Metre (1984).

■ Modern: Schipper, History; W. L. Schramm, "Time and Intensity in English Tetrameter Verse," PQ 13 (1934); P. Habermann, "Tetrameter," Reallexikon I; V. Nabokov, Notes on Prosody (1964); J. Bailey, Toward a Statistical Analysis of English Verse (1975); Attridge, Rhythms; M. Tarlinskaja, "Meter and Meaning: The Semantic 'Halo' of Verse Form in English Romantic Lyrical Poems (Iambic and Trochaic Tetrameter)," AJS 4 (1986); Morier.

A. M. DEVINE, L. D. STEPHENS (CLASSICAL); T.V.F. BROGAN, E. T. JOHNSTON (MODERN)

TÉTRAMÈTRE. A term used to denote the metrical structure of the regular 12-syllable Fr. alexandrine and so distinguish it sharply from the less common trimètre structure. Strictly speaking, the regular alexandrine has only two fixed accents, on the sixth and twelfth syllables, i.e., at the *caesura and at the line ending, marking off each *hemistich. It is usual, however, for the alexandrine to have two further "secondary" accents, of no fixed position, one in each hemistich, making a total of four in the line—hence, tétramètre. Jean Racine's Phèdre affords a famous example: "C'est Vénus / tout entière // à sa proie / attachée" (1.3.306).

A regular tétramètre may, therefore, contain two accents only, e.g., in Charles Baudelaire: "Elle se développe // avec indifférence" (six-six); or three, e.g., in Guillaume Apollinaire: "Une chanson d'amour // et d'infidélité" (four-two-six); or four, e.g., in Alfred de Vigny: "La Nature t'attend // dans un silence austère" (three-three-four-two); but four is the conventional number. The optionality and mobility of the two secondary accents furnish the tétramètre with 36 different rhythmic configurations. The trimètre, by contrast, which has three measures and no caesura, is indelibly ternary in structure; even when the tétramètre has three accents, its medial caesura still preserves its essentially binary character. The tétramètre, whose roots go back at least to Le Pèlerinage de Charlemagne (12th c.), was shaped in the cl. age by the strict rules of François de Malherbe into the form championed by Nicolas Boileau and brought to perfection in the tragedies of Pierre Corneille and Racine.

■ Kastner; Elwert; Mazaleyrat; Scott; C. Scott, A Question of Syllables (1986); H. Morier, "L'Alexandrin classique était bien un tétramètre," Langue, littérature du XVIIe et du XVIIIe siècle, ed. R. Lathuillère (1990).

A. G. ENGSTROM; C. SCOTT

TEXT. Text belongs to a way of designating writing associated with certain values and emphases, a way of thinking about writing and lit. The usage arose in France in the 1960s and in the decades following as part of the general tendency toward a more scientific or more formalized approach to lit. It was associated with an approach to lit. that has been called antihumanist, and this label is accurate insofar as the term and the way of thinking it represents sought in different ways to displace the authority of the human agent (i.e., author or *poet) supposedly "behind" the writing and to valorize the writing itself.

The term text is used and emphasized differently, however, by various schools of thought and now may have entered into the common critical currency to such a degree that the values with which it was associated are taken for granted. It is evident, nevertheless, that a text is not the same as a book, a work*, or a poem*, and that it cuts across generic boundaries. It is less easy to identify and circumscribe the values that the word carries, but they can be more or less precisely situated historically and epistemologically.

Historically, text and textuality came to the fore in the 1960s in France primarily in the wake of the so-called structuralist controversy that had displaced the dominant philosophical program of Sartean existentialism. *Formalism, *semiotics, and *structuralism shifted the focus from the psychology of the intentional subject to the *form of the work or its signifying structure. Textuality, however, emphasized the written aspect of the object, the act of writing that produced it, and the act of reading that reproduces it. This stress on writing emerges as a key focus in the work of Roland Barthes, Julia Kristeva, and Jacques Derrida. With important distinctions, all three propose the text as a quite new object of study. From this basis, and with the significant advocacy of the group of writers associated with the jour. Tel Quel*, textuality expands beyond its initially Fr. context and enters into the vocabulary and ethos of scholars and practicing writers around the world.

Textuality is associated on the one hand with a negative, critical moment in the hist. of lit. crit.: the displacement of the figure of the author (as, e.g., in Barthes's "Death of the Author," 1967), or of the notion of a reality external to the writing that it purports to represent. A text has a scriptor, or more plainly, a writer, rather than an author. Texts are not primarily representative but exist independently of their referents. An important element in the thought behind the notion of the text, in other words, is the *autonomy of writing. Textual crit. thus sought to liberate the study of lit. and of written documents more generally from the apparent constraints of psychological or metaphysical worldviews. Text, however, also carries positive values. Liberated from its referent, a text consists of meaning, of sense. The term text is closely connected to the semiological perspective that sees lang. as a network of signs (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). As a signifying entity, the text is necessarily plural. It is a network, system, or structure of signs or signifiers, susceptible to an analysis that will disassemble it. But if semiology produces the austerity of Roman Jakobson and Claude Lévi-Strauss's "technical" analysis of Charles Baudelaire's "Les Chats," e.g., the more ludic textual approach emphasizes the plurality of meanings in the text or that the text produces. It sees the text as a field or volume of meanings produced in the act of reading, imagines the writing as a woven texture of lines of sense, and allows a certain freedom to the reader in the creation of these strands. Barthes's book S/Z (1970) proposed a reading of Honoré de Balzac's novella Sarrasine (1830) according to the elements of sense that were scattered across the text "like gold dust," suggesting with the felicitous term "parsimonious plural" that Balzac's "classical" text nevertheless contained elements of a mod., plural, and heterogeneous philosophy of writing, or at least could be read as such.

For Barthes, the text is a utopia or a horizon. In the useful article "From Work to Text" (1971), he emphasizes that a text is not an "accountable object." In other words, text means a way of thinking about writing that foregrounds those elements that liberate us from the doxa (or commonly unquestioned beliefs), from ideological determination, from human psychology. Text denotes a utopia of writing that paradoxically carries something of an existential drive—a liberation of meaning from established and stereotypical values, or more simply, a freeing of meaning, as a present participle, from fixed meanings (whence the Fr. term signifiance often associated with the text or Kristeva's notion of the text as a "signifying practice"). Text as essentially a space for the "free play" of meaning also represents—and this is very palpable in the work of Barthes—a space of freedom and pleasure for the subject, reader, or writer who engages with it.

The plurality of a text is closely associated with its connectedness to other texts. The term intertextuality* designates the flow of meaning from text to text; texts are engaged with other texts in explicit or implicit processes of rewriting, but intertextuality, an important element of textual thinking, also suggests on the one hand that a piece of writing is potentially engaged with the entirety of the "anterior textual corpus" (Kristeva). Innovative or "limit texts" are those that displace this previous textual body. On the other hand, however, the notion of intertextuality and the generalized notion of text propose a far more radical view that "everything is a text." If the term text connotes the weaving together of strands, like Penelope by day, there is the suggestion that the human subject, too, is a textual entity, that hist. consists of a plurality of meanings and is, therefore, a text (which can be rewritten), that the everyday real we perceive is a text that we are constantly in the process of reading, rereading, writing, and rewriting.

See BOOK, POETIC; ÉCRITURE; POSTSTRUCTURALISM.

■ The Structuralist Controversy, ed. R. Macksey and E. Donato (1970); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1974); and "Death of the Author" and "From Work to Text," Image-Music-Text, trans. S. Heath (1977); J. Derrida, Writing and Difference, trans. A. Bass (1978); J. Kristeva, Desire in Language, trans. T. Gora et al. (1980); J. Derrida, Dissemination, trans. B. Johnson (1981); S. Gavronsky, Toward a New Poetics: Contemporary Writing in France (1994); C. Belsey, Critical Practice (2002).

P. FFRENCH

TEXTUAL CRITICISM is the term traditionally used to refer to the scholarly activity of analyzing the relationships among the surviving texts of a work so as to assess their relative authority and accuracy. It is also often taken, more broadly, to encompass scholarly editing, in which the conclusions drawn from such examination are embodied in the texts and annotation of a new ed. (printed or electronic). Textual criticism is a historical undertaking, for its aim is to elucidate the textual hist. of individual works and to attempt to reconstruct the precise forms taken by their texts at particular past moments. Like all other efforts to recover the past, it depends on judgment at every turn, and the word criticism* is therefore an appropriate element in the standard name for this endeavor. Nevertheless, there has been a widespread misconception of textual crit. as somehow mechanical or objective, and one often encounters the view that textual criticism precedes lit. crit.—that the textual critic merely establishes the text for the literary critic to interpret. But in fact, the text constructed by a textual critic is inevitably a product of lit. crit.: a textual critic's decisions (about what words and visual features—such as *punctuation, indentation, and *stanza breaks—should constitute the text of a given work) will reflect, whether consciously or not, some point of view toward lit. in general, some assumptions about the nature of poetic production, and some interpretation of the work in question and its constituent passages. It is consequently as inappropriate to call a scholarly ed. containing a critically edited text definitive as it is to apply that adjective to a critical essay. Conceivably, the apparatus in such an ed. can be definitive, if it accurately reports all known relevant evidence; but the text itself can never be, for the conclusions it embodies cannot be declared the only reasonable ones that can ever emerge from an assessment of that evidence.

Textual crit. and lit. crit. are therefore not separable activities: questioning the makeup of the text is an essential element in the act of reading, and any conclusions about it reflect a critical position. Paradoxically, however, many literary critics (esp. from the mid-20th c. onward) have used terms like textual analysis or textual criticism to refer to their activities, without having this point in mind. They have generally been led into this usage by thinking of text and work as synonyms. Yet distinguishing texts and works—or, more precisely, distinguishing the texts of documents from the texts of works—is fundamental to all discussion of lit. (or any other verbal communication) and goes to the heart of why textual crit. is necessary. A text is a specific arrangement of elements; a literary work—a verbal construct—does consist of a text (or succession of texts), but its text cannot be assumed to coincide with any written or printed text purporting to be the text of that work. The medium of lit. is lang., which is intangible, not paper and ink, which merely serve as one vehicle for transmitting lang. Therefore works of lit. do not exist on paper, and the texts that appear there are only the texts of physical documents, which may be relatively successful or unsuccessful in representing the texts of works. This point is not inconsistent with the fact that some writers, particularly poets, incorporate visual features into their works; they are not thereby changing the ontology of lang. but rather creating mixed-media works. Similarly, the effect of a literary work on a reader is sometimes linked to the physical features of the document in which the work is read; but those features were not necessarily part of the work as conceived by any of its producers and might not be present in other documentary appearances of it.

Determining the accuracy (according to one standard or another) of documentary texts is a matter of judgment, and we can never know with certainty how accurate any of them, or any editorial reconstruction, is. But if we are interested in works rather than documents, all we can do is continually to attempt the recreation of works by critically assessing the evidences of those works that we find in the extant printed or ms. texts at our disposal. Most readers understand that typographical errors and slips of the pen can occur, and many readers occasionally detect and correct such errors. But few seem to be aware that by this elementary action they are recognizing a basic truth about the nature of lit.—that the effort to read the texts of literary works requires a questioning of the texts of the documents that attempt to convey those works. This problem is equally central in poetry and in prose, in the texts of med. mss. and in those of mod. printed books: it is the unavoidable consequence of the intangibility of the medium of lit. (Similar points could be made about oral texts or the texts of other arts, like music, that employ intangible media.)

There is thus no such thing as a literary work that does not pose a textual problem, if work is taken to mean a communication from the past. Readers may, of course, choose not to approach lit. historically, and there are various schools of lit. crit. founded on that premise. For such readers and critics, texts are not links to the past but found objects existing in the present. Any text they encounter can serve as the subject of analysis, and textual crit. is therefore largely irrelevant to their concerns—unless they make historical connections between texts, such as saying that two texts are from the same period or by the same author. Even if all surviving texts of a work were found to be identical, the historical scholar would still have to examine that single text critically with a view to detecting errors in it. But texts of a work usually differ, and not only because of scribes' and printers' errors (which are almost inevitable whenever a text is copied or reset in type). Authors may revise their works—sometimes repeatedly—and textual variants may reflect shifting authorial intentions at different points in the author's life. Variants may also result from alterations made by other persons involved in bringing a work to the public, as when a publishing-house ed. imposes a house style or tones down an expression of opinion that might give offense. Readers who wish to approach a work as a communication from the past need to know the variants that have appeared in its documentary texts and the errors that former readers have postulated, so that they are not at the mercy of the idiosyncrasies of particular documents.

Investigating the textual hist. of a work involves the identification and examination of the documents (both ms. and printed) containing texts of it, along with any relevant associated documents, such as letters, notebooks, diaries, books that served as the author's sources, and publishers' records. Just which of the documentary texts of a work are relevant depends on one's historical focus: if one is interested in the author's intentions (whether early or late), e.g., the group of documents to be considered might be different from those that would be relevant if one's concern were with the texts that were available to readers at a given time. Once the potentially relevant documentary texts are located, they must be collated (compared word by word, punctuation mark by punctuation mark) and any differences in them recorded. The variant readings are then analyzed in an effort to determine the relationships among the texts, identifying which are direct ancestors or descendants of others, which represent collateral lines of descent, and which result from conflation of different lines. Several methods have been advanced over the years for performing this analysis, such as the classic "genealogical method," as codified by Paul Maas (Textual Criticism, 1958), and quasi-mathematical ones, like Vinton A. Dearing's (A Primer of Textual Geometry, 2005). All these efforts strive for objectivity, but each reaches a point where critical judgment is required.

The problem of determining relationships among the extant texts of a work is most acute for ancient writings, which are generally represented by mss.—sometimes in great number—produced long after the authors' deaths. But the problem also exists for later writings, published during their authors' lifetimes in printed eds., because the text of each successive ed. is not always based on that of the immediately preceding ed. It is a fundamental truth of textual crit. that the chronology of mss. and printed eds. (if it can be established) does not necessarily coincide with the genealogy of the texts contained in those documents. Nevertheless, the analysis of the physical evidence present in documents is essential for understanding how the production hist. of documents affects the texts they contain. Much work of this kind on printed material was accomplished in the 20th c., using the methods illustrated in R. B. McKerrow's An Introduction to Bibliography for Literary Students (1927), Fredson Bowers's Principles of Bibliographical Description (1949) and Bibliography and Textual Criticism (1964), and G. T. Tanselle's Bibliographical Analysis (2009); some of the necessary background in printing hist. for this kind of work has been provided in Philip Gaskell's A New Introduction to Bibliography (1972).

What use eds. make of a hypothesized genealogy of the texts of a work depends principally on their view of two questions, the first of which is the role of judgment in historical inquiry. One position on this matter is that editorial judgment should be kept to a minimum and that the most valuable editorial activity is the accurate transcription or reprinting of individual documents. Judgment is nevertheless involved here in deciding (in the light of the genealogy) which documents to focus on and—in the case of handwritten material—deciphering the script; but beyond that the editor's judgment is not allowed to operate. In contrast, one may believe that the textual accidents embodied in individual documents make the texts of those documents a less reliable guide to past intentions than eclectic texts, which aim—through editorial choices among variant readings (recensio in cl. textual crit.) and editorial emendations of perceived errors (emendatio)—to restore texts to the states that existed or were intended at times in the past. Thus every text presented by an ed. is either documentary, attempting to reproduce without alteration what appears in a particular document, or critical, embodying critical judgments regarding choices among variant readings and the incorporation of further corrections.

The other major influence on editors' approaches to their task is their assumptions about the nature of literary works—indeed, of all works made of words—and their consequent preference for one stage rather than another in the hist. of individual works. Even a facsimile ed. is affected by the critical predisposition of its ed.: e.g., eds. who believe that literary works are essentially the products of writers working alone might choose an author's final ms. for reproduction rather than the published ed. based on it, whereas eds. who feel that literary works are social products, resulting from the interaction of authors and other persons involved in the publishing process, would be inclined to choose the printed ed. Most discussion of this issue, however, has occurred in connection with critical eds.; and over the centuries, most of the thinking about such eds. has assumed that the aim of making alterations in documentary texts was to bring them closer to what their authors intended. This aim has not necessarily meant that authors were regarded as having had single intentions: in some cases, such as William Wordsworth's The Prelude or Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass, an author's changed intentions at different times have been recognized as producing discrete versions that are deserving of separate eds. The advent of electronic eds., with their unlimited space, has enabled eds. more easily to present multiple texts, both documentary and critical, rather than choosing a single one; but it has not eliminated the necessity for eds. to think through all the issues they have always dealt with.

In the second half of the 20th c., the traditional focus on authorial intention was repeatedly challenged. The debate in the Eng.-speaking world centered on the rationale of W. W. Greg and Fredson Bowers, who argued that, in the absence of contrary evidence, final authorial intention could be best reconstructed by incorporating into an early "copy-text" any later variants judged to be authorial. One class of objections came from those who advocated a more "social," and less author-centered, view, such as Jerome J. McGann (who regarded published works as inevitably collaborative) and D. F. McKenzie (who believed that the visual features of printed texts, such as typography and layout, deserve more editorial attention as part of the social context that influences readers' responses). Another view focused on the study of textual growth and change, as in the work of Almuth Grésillon and the Fr. school of critique génétique. Arguments for particular approaches have frequently been offered as if their acceptance entails the rejection of other approaches; but there is no exclusively valid approach to the past. An interest in authors' intentions (or their revisions) and an interest in the public texts that were made available to readers do not invalidate one another: each focuses on a different aspect of textual hist., and each therefore tells one part of a larger story. Textual crit., like other forms of hist., can never tell the whole story, nor can it reconstruct any part of it with certainty; but we must make the attempt to uncover the story whenever we wish to read works as communications from the past.

■ For extensive listings of relevant material, see G. T. Tanselle, Introduction to Scholarly Editing, 2d ed. (2002), http://www.rarebookschool.org/tanselle.

F. Bowers, Textual and Literary Criticism (1959); W. W. Greg, "The Rationale of Copy-Text" [1950], Collected Papers, ed. J. C. Maxwell (1966); E. J. Kenney, The Classical Text (1974); F. Bowers, Essays in Bibliography, Text, and Editing (1975); J. J. McGann, A Critique of Modern Textual Criticism (1983); A. E. Housman, "The Application of Thought to Textual Criticism" [1921], Collected Poems and Selected Prose, ed. C. Ricks (1988); G. T. Tanselle, A Rationale of Textual Criticism (1989), and Textual Criticism and Scholarly Editing (1990); L. D. Reynolds and N. G. Wilson, Scribes and Scholars, 3d ed. (1991); D. C. Greetham, Textual Scholarship (1992); A. Grésillon, Éléments de critique génétique (1994); G. T. Tanselle, "Editing without a Copy-Text" [1994], Literature and Artifacts (1998); Scholarly Editing, ed. D. C. Greetham (1995)—incl. G. T. Tanselle, "The Varieties of Scholarly Editing"; P. Shillingsburg, Scholarly Editing in the Computer Age, 3d ed. (1996), and Resisting Texts (1997); D. F. McKenzie, Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts (1999); G. T. Tanselle, Textual Criticism Since Greg (2005).

G. T. Tanselle

TEXTUALITY. A key concept in *poststructuralism that enabled that movement's way of understanding writing, reading, and the relations between them. It was meant to stand in opposition to the idea of the *work, its unity, and its humanistic underpinnings and thus underwrote an attack on the metaphysical presuppositions of the traditional conception of lit. in the West.

According to the assumptions that precede a poststructuralist approach to lit., the concept of the work entails meaning, unity, and the authority of a transcendent source. A work is complete, it exists in space, and it is wrought by the creative power of the artist. On the other hand, a text in the particular lexicon of poststructuralism—distinct from the term as used, for instance, in *textual criticism—inhabits and is inhabited by lang., without a privileged outside, an origin or source, to guarantee or authorize its meaning. The source of each text is always another text, but there is always another text before that. No text lies outside the endless play of lang., and no text is complete: each exhibits traces or "sediments" of some other text in an endless repetition of originary lack. To humanistic ("logocentric") assertions of a transcendent referent (the transcendental signified) that organizes human experience and renders lang. meaningful, textuality opposes the notion that, at the origin, there is "always already" lang., writing, a trace of some other text. The terms trace, supplement, and writing indicate an absence in the text, its impossibility of self-presence. Each text is haunted by this absence, which opens it up to an entangled web of relations with every other text and which permits the articulation of a "subtext." The subtext is not that which is "meant" or "expressed" but rather that which tends to "dissimulate or forbid" and which it nonetheless makes evident at certain points of stress or conflict. The subtext functions as a text's unconscious—what it does not know it knows—and indicates a reading against the grain.

The subtext was not always conceived as a strategic dismantling of the text. In the view of *Russian formalism and early *structuralism, the subtext was one of the visible components of the text, one of the parts that fitted into the whole. The stable ling. that gave rise to structuralism perceived the subtext as a partially hidden segment of the text, elucidation of which would provide a synchronic view of the whole. Later views of textuality, which perceived the text diachronically rather than synchronically, in terms of what is missing or absent rather than merely hidden from view, think of the subtext as a destabilizing element in the play of significations. The subtext is not assimilable to the text; it works against and undermines a text's potential meaning.

Textuality is thus fraught with dissonance. Each text is a locus of conflict that cannot be decided without repression. In a further phase of its application, textuality became associated with questions of power: the power not only between text and subtext but of the competing claims and ideologies that make themselves evident in a text. The major effect of textuality is to problematize the question of knowledge—the relation between what we know and how we know. Textuality assumes the impossibility of thought without lang., thus effectively subsuming knowledge within lang. itself. Disciplinary knowledge, like the work, also lacks a transcendental signified and is not authorized by any epistemological high ground. Each discipline constitutes itself as a discipline by repressing its ling., rhetorical nature, but textuality disrupts this movement of repression, highlights it, and focuses on what a field of knowledge tends to "dissimulate" or "forbid." Textuality assumes the "textuality" of all disciplines and thus the tropological (rhetorical) nature of all knowledge.

See ALLUSION, INTERTEXTUALITY, ORGANICISM.

■ M. Foucault, The Archaeology of Knowledge and the Discourse on Language, trans. A. M. Sheridan Smith (1972); R. Barthes, Le plaisir du texte (1973); and "De l'oeuvre au texte," Revue d'esthétique (1974); E. Said, "Abecedarium Culturae," Beginnings (1975); J. Derrida, Of Grammatology, trans. G. C. Spivak (1976)—essential preface by Spivak; E. Said, "The Problem of Textuality: Two Exemplary Positions," CritI 4 (1978); Textual Strategies, ed. J. Harari (1979)—excellent intro., bibl.; M. Foucault Power/Knowledge, ed. and trans C. Gordon (1980); Untying the Text, ed. R. Young (1981); G. Bruns, Inventions: Writing, Textuality, and Understanding Literary History (1982); J. Culler, On Deconstruction (1982); J. Derrida, "Signature, Event, Context," Margins of Philosophy, trans. A. Bass (1982); The Question of Textuality, ed. W. Spanos and P. Bové (1982); M. Riffaterre, Text Production, trans. T. Lyons (1983); H. Baran, "Subtext," Terras; J. MacCannell, "The Temporality of Textuality: Bakhtin and Derrida," MLN 100 (1985); Demarcating the Disciplines, ed. S. Weber (1986); Textual Analysis, ed. M. A. Caws (1986); Unnam'd Forms: Blake and Textuality, ed. N. Hilton and T. A. Vogler (1986); G. Harpham, The Ascetic Imperative in Culture and Criticism (1987); C. Norris, Derrida (1987); S. Weber, Institution and Interpretation (1987); G. Jay, "Paul de Man: Being in Question," America the Scrivener (1990); R. Scholes, "Canonicity and Textuality," Introduction to Scholarship in Modern Languages and Literatures, ed. J. Gibaldi (1992); C. Norris, "Textuality, Difference, and Cultural Otherness: Deconstruction v. Postmodernism," Common Knowledge 3.3 (1994); Texts and Textuality: Textual Instability, Theory, and Interpretation, ed. P. Cohen (1997); J. McGann, Radiant Textuality: Literature after the World Wide Web (2001); J. Drucker, "Theory as Praxis: The Poetics of Electronic Textuality," Modernism/Modernity 9 (2002); Reimagining Textuality: Textual Studies in the Late Age of Print, ed. E. B. Loizeaux (2002); J. Mowitt, "What Is a Text Today?," PMLA 117 (2002); J. A. Walker, "Why Performance? Why Now? Textuality and the Rearticulation of Human Presence," Yale Journal of Criticism 16 (2003); N. K. Hayles, My Mother Was a Computer:

Digital Subjects and Literary Texts (2005); "Textual Materialism," PMLA 125.1 (2010)—spec. section.

H. R. Elam; R. Greene

TEXTURE. Texture signifies the palpable, tangible details inscribed in the poetic text. It refers to the distinguishing elements in a poem that are separate and independent of its structure, the elements that persist when the argument of a poem has been rendered into a prose paraphrase (see paraphrase, heresy of). The term has close affinities with the concept of surface detail in painting and sculpture. Such a conception is designed to solve the difficulties posed by schematic and overgeneralized theories of *poetics. A poem has texture to the degree that the phonetic and ling. characteristics of its surface promote stylistic density. At one level, texture involves the familiar poetic techniques of *assonance and *alliteration; at another level, it assumes the form of sensory intensities and tactile association (harshness or softness). It is to these surface qualities that texture corresponds and is made more complex by metrical patterns.

Texture was of crucial importance to Am. *New Criticism, esp. to John Crowe Ransom. For Ransom, the texture of the poem is specifically related to "a sense of the real density and contingency of the world" ("Criticism as Pure Speculation"). By definition, then, texture is intended to correct the exaggerations of "logic" in poetry that cause colorful local details to disappear into the grayness of systematized abstraction. Thus, in his formulation, poetic texture is characterized by its "sensuous richness," by its "fullness of presentation," by its "immediacy," and by its "concreteness." Such an emphasis is quite distinct from what Ransom saw as the prominence of structure for Cleanth Brooks. In Ransom's view, the function of the concrete detail is not to authorize the abstract generality of structure (as, e.g., in Brooks's claim that paradoxical structure underpins all poetry from the Odyssey to The Waste Land). For Ransom, the detail becomes formally and explicitly disjoined from the structure when the poet chooses words, metaphors, images, and other devices. This reversal of Brooks's emphasis on structure serves to reimmerse poetics in the immediate and sensory experience of contingent reality (something Ransom felt Brooks's paradoxically abstract poetics could not address). From such a viewpoint, it follows that one important function of detail is precisely to impede the argument of the poem. A poet's accommodation of the details to the demands of *meter and *euphony affords unexpected insights that then become themselves the most prominent feature of texture and generate a set of unforeseen and unique meanings out of the reach of structure.

In avant-garde experimental *concrete poetry and *sound poetry of the late 20th c., texture takes on material forms: voice, intonation, even grunts and shrieks, constitute the poetry, a flow of breath through lungs and throat. To be sure, poetry has been sung, recited, and chanted since its beginnings. Both sound and concrete poetry, however, mobilize modernist concepts of *"defamiliarization" or "making strange," together with psychoanalytical and psychological theories of repression and release. As poet and critic Steve McCaffery writes, "When considering text-sound it is energy, not semantically shaped meaning that constitutes the essence of communicated data." The texture of sound poetry releases "forces of libido" caught in "the overcoded structure of grammar." Other forms of concrete texture include overprinted columns of text, poetry incised into wood or stone, or the use of materials to interact with the words of the poem. In the Scottish poet Ian Hamilton Finlay's "Wave-rock," e.g., letters are etched into colored glass so that their arrangement suggests the texture of water and shore. The Brazilian avant-garde *Noigandres group (see, e.g., the poetry of Augusto de Campos) produces poetry whose visual combinations of lines and curves create fabriclike texture. Poet and critic Scobie points out that skills in reading visual images are crucial for interpreting these new constructions of texture in poetry.

See artifice, form.

■ J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1932); and "The Inorganic Muses," KR 5 (1943); Brooks; Wimsatt and Brooks; M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958); J. E. Magner, John Crowe Ransom: Critical Principles and Preoccupations (1971); T. D. Young, "Ransom's Critical Theories: Structure and Texture." Mississippi Quarterly 30 (1977); S. McCaffery, Sound Poetry: A Catalogue (1978); Ransom, "Criticism as Pure Speculation" and "Wanted: An Ontological Critic"; N. Masselink, "Apparition Head versus Body Bush: The Prosodical Theory and Practice of John Crowe Ransom," Southern Quarterly 29 (1991); M. Perloff, Radical Artifice: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media (1991); M. Jancovich, The Cultural Politics of the New Criticism (1992); S. Scobie, Earthquakes and Explorations: Language and Painting from Cubism to Concrete Poetry (1997)—esp. ch. 9.

P. McCallum

THAILAND, POETRY OF. Poetry dominated Thai lit. until the early 20th c., when prose also became widespread. Noted for rhyme and sound play, Thai poetry is written in syllabic meters in five major verse forms: rāī, khlōng, kāp, chan, and klọn. The Thai (Siamese) lang. presently has five tones that also form part of the metrical requirements. The king and court poets used these forms nearly exclusively until 1932, though in many cases the works are anonymous.

The earliest verse appeared during the Sukhothai period (ca. 1240–1438). Sukhothai reached a high level of civilization, but extant poems are few; the only significant extant text is Suphāsit phra ruang, a series of moral maxims written in rāī and credited to King Ramkhamhaeng (ca. 1279–98). These stanzas have an indefinite number of five-syllable lines linked by rhyme. Melodious and concise phrases, suggestive of poetry, also appear in inscriptions from the period.

The Ayutthaya period (1351–1767) saw the rise of classics in rāī, khlōng, kāp, and chan. Khlōng, like rāī, originally appeared when Thai had only three tones. Khlōng consists of five-syllable lines grouped into stanzas of two lines (khlōng sọng), three (khlōng sām), and four (khlōng sī). The kāp stanzas, probably borrowed from Khmer, include yānī with two 11-syllable lines, surāngkhanāng with seven four-syllable lines, and chabang with one four-syllable line between two six-syllable lines. Indic in origin, the chan meters were adapted from meters found in *Sanskrit and Pali poetry during this period.

One of the earliest and most difficult Ayutthayan works is ōngkān chāēng nam (the Water Oath), a composition used by officials to reaffirm their loyalty to the king. Throughout the era, Buddhist themes dominate many compositions. In 1482, King Traylokkhanat (1448–88) commissioned a royal version of the Vessantara Jataka, the Buddha's life prior to his last birth on earth. This version, the Mahāchāt kham luang, consists of passages in Pali followed by Thai trans. into rāī, khlōng, and chan. Important compositions with historical themes began with Lilit yuan phāī (ca. 1475). Written anonymously in lilit, a combination of rāī and khlōng, this poem describes the victories of King Traylokkhanat. The popular nirāt genre, in which the poet compares his lover's features to the beauties of nature, also developed about this time. During the reign of King Narai (1656–88), the court became a major center of poetry production, and the era came to be known as the Golden Age of Thai lit. Probably the most famous of Narai's court poets was Sri Prat. In and out of favor with the king because of his sharp wit, he composed the famous Kamsuan sī prāt, a nirāt describing his journey into exile. The chan meters gained prominence with the adaptation of Buddhist birth stories into verse such as the Samutthakhōt kham chan and Sụa khō kham chan. The most famous work from this period, although some scholars date it in the reign of King Traylokkhanat, is the lilit classic Phra lọ, the tragic romance of Prince Phra Lọ and two princesses from a neighboring kingdom. Literary output declined after Narai, however, because of war and internal strife. Notable works from the end of the Ayutthaya period include a collection of boating songs in kāp, Kāp hāē rụa, and a description in chan of the king's journey to a Buddhist shrine, Bunnōwāt kham chan. In 1767 the Burmese destroyed Ayutthaya.

The establishment of the new capital at Bangkok in 1782 revived literary production at court, this time primarily in klọn, which probably first appeared during the Thonburi period (1767–82). Since then it has been the favored Thai verse form, with two types used regularly: klọn hok with six syllables per line and klọn pāēt with eight. The four-line klọn stanzas are famous for rhyme schemes and rhyme links that often continue for thousands of stanzas. Hoping to recreate lost works, Rama I, Phra Phutthayotfa (1782–1809), the first king at Bangkok, organized a royal composition committee that produced the Rāmakian (the Thai version of the Indian classic, the Rāmāyaṇa) and parts of Inau and Dālang (romances based on the Javanese Panji cycle introduced through Malaysia). Rama II, Phra Phutthaloetla (1809–24), continued the literary revival with another version of the Rāmakian and a complete version of Inau, which, it is thought, he composed much of himself. Sunthorn Phu (1786–1856), arguably Thailand's greatest poet, used klọn for many nirāt poems and for the long imaginative romance Phra aphaimanī. Probably written down as a complete poem after the founding of Bangkok with parts attributed to Rama II and Sunthorn Phu, Khun Chāng Khun Phāēn relates the lifelong competition between two friends for the love of a village beauty, who also happens to be their childhood friend. Originally composed by wandering poets in the late Ayutthaya period, the poem is famous for its depiction of customs, trads., and lifeways of ordinary people. Prince Paramanuchit (1790–1853), monk, poet, and Indic classicist, contributed textbooks on the chan meters, the final part of Samutthakhōt kham chan, and Lilit talēng phāī, a glorification of the battles of King Naresuan. Khun Phum (1815–80), the leading woman poet of the 19th c., produced satirical poems of biting wit in her famous literary salons. Traditional narrative poetry continued into the 20th c. in compositions by Prince Bidyalongkarana (1876–1945): one of his most noted works is Sām krung, a hist. of the three Thai capital cities, Ayutthaya, Thonburi, and Bangkok.

The 1932 revolution gave Thailand a constitutional monarchy, and court-dominated poetry thereafter ceased. Post-1932 poetry differed from cl. works in its brevity, its lyricism, and its emphasis upon crit. and instruction in the ongoing social world. Many of these changes resulted from the efforts of Chao Phraya Thammasakdimontri, known as Khru Thep (1876–1943), a journalist-poet. Later, in the 1940s and 1950s, Assani Phonlachan (1918–1987) sought to deemphasize the importance of rhyme and sound in Thai poetry. At the same time, Chit Phumisak (1932–66), a left-wing political idealist, helped launch the Art for Life's Sake movement, which attacked individuals and even whole political systems; Phumisak criticized cl. Thai poetry for not meeting the needs of the people. Other poets such as Prakin Xumsai, writing as Ujjeni (b. 1919), and later Naowarat Pongpaiboon (b. 1940) emphasized nature, love, and emotion along with social crit. The 1960s saw much experimentation with verse forms, incl. free verse (klọn plāū). During this time, the poet-painter Angkarn Kalayanapongse (b. 1926), probably the most respected of contemp. poets, developed his themes and style. Often described as a nature poet, he finds expressions of universal messages in Buddhism, nature, art, and the past. The fluid political climate of the early 1970s revived protest and socialist themes. The student uprising of October 14, 1973; the return to democracy; and the subsequent suppression on October 6, 1976, have provided the themes for much of Thai poetry up to the present. Naowarat Pongpaiboon (b. 1940) has emerged as the most eloquent chronicler of these events. Women's issues, along with moral, political, and social concerns, remain major themes in contemp. poetry. Paramount among these themes is the lament for the loss of the environment and traditional Thai culture and values because of Western influences and globalization. Important poets working with these themes include Sujit Wongthet (b. 1945), Saksiri Meesomsueb (Krittisak, b. 1957), Chiranan Pitpreecha (b. 1955), Rewat Phanpipat (b. 1966), and Montri Sriyong (b. 1968). The emergence of regional lit., esp. from northeastern Thailand, can be found in the poetry of Paiwarin Khaongam (b. 1961) and in Tossa's 1990 study of a northeastern folk epic. Political and social crit. provides major themes of Thai poetry today, and poets continue to use both cl. and a variety of experimental verse forms.

■ Anthologies and Translations: P. na Nakh ǫ n, Prawat wannakhadī Thai (History of Thai Literature, 1964); R. Jones and R. Mendiones, Introduction to Thai Literature (1970); Sang Thong, trans. F. S. Ingersoll (1973); Ramakien, trans. J. M. Cadet (1982); Mere Movement, trans. N. Pongpaiboon (1984); Thai P.E.N. Anthology, ed. N. Masavisut and F. S. Jose (1984); A Premier Book of Contemporary Thai Verse, ed. M. Umavijani et al. (1985); Phādāēng Nāng Ai: A Thai-Isan Folk Epic in Verse, trans. W. Tossa (1990); Sunthorn Phu, ed. M. Umavijani (1990); T. J. Hudak, The Tale of Samuttakote (1993); P. Khaongam, Banana Tree Horse and Other Poems, trans. B. Kasemsri (1995); The S.E.A. Write Anthology of Thai Short Stories and Poems, ed. N. Masavisut and M. Grose (1996); S. Chongstitvatana, "Love Poems in Modern Thai Nirat," Journal of the Siam Society 88 (2000); ASEAN Short Stories and Poems by S.E.A. Write Awardees, 1999, ed. S. Poolthupya (2001); C. Baker and P. Phongpaichit, "Phlai Kaeo Ordains as a Novice: A Chapter from Khun Chang Khun Phaen," Journal of the Siam Society 95 (2007); C. Baker and P. Phongpaichit, "The Career of Khun Chang Khun Phaen," Journal of the Siam Society 97 (2009).

■ Criticism and History: H. H. Prince Bidyalankarana, "The Pastime of Rhyme-making and Singing in Rural Siam," Journal of the Siam Society 20 (1926); P. Schweisguth, Étude sur la littérature siamoise (1951); J. N. Mosel, A Survey of Classical Thai Poetry (1959), and Trends and Structure in Contemporary Thai Poetry (1961); M. Chitakasem, "The Emergence and Development of the Nirat Genre in Thai Poetry," Journal of Siam Society 60 (1972); T. H. Bofman, The Poetics of the Ramakian (1984); K. Wenk, Sunthǫn Phū—ein Thai Literat (1985); C. Nagavajara, "Literary Historiography and Socio-cultural Transformation: The Case of Thailand," Journal of the Siam Society 73 (1985); H. P. Phillips, Modern Thai Literature with an Ethnographic Interpretation (1987); W. J. Gedney, "Siamese Verse Forms in Historical Perspective," Selected Papers on Comparative Tai Studies, ed. R. J. Bickner et al. (1989); T. J. Hudak, The Indigenization of Pali Meters in Thai Poetry (1990); R. J. Bickner, An Introduction to the Thai Poem "Lilit Phra Law" (1991); Thai Literary Traditions, ed. M. Chitakasem (1995); N. Eoseewong, Pen & Sail, ed. C. Baker and B. Anderson (2005); T. J. Hudak, "Tai Aesthetics," The Tai-Kadai Languages, ed. A.V.N. Diller et al. (2008).

T. J. Hudak

THEMATICS. The study of patterns (repetitions of *imagery, codes, rhetorical figures, etc.) in lit. In general, the evolution of thematics has paralleled that of *topoi or topics (Ger. Toposforschung, Curtius 1948) and *stylistics/explication du texte, developing into various strains of text-immanent and intertextual (paradigmatic, syntagmatic) interpretation. Critics such as Armstrong have cited an interaction between the poetic "world"—divided into dialogical or oppositional fields reflecting differing degrees of abstractness and concreteness—and thematics. The existence of an objective "structure" distinct from social forces or intentional consciousness remains open to debate.

According to Zholkovsky (1984), generic themes reveal their invariability through structural patterns; thematic analysis furnishes essential information for typological modeling. Bachelard (1943, 1957), the so-called *Geneva school, Raymond, Richard (1954, 1961, 1979), Poulet, Béguin, and Starobinski have made important contributions to the discourse of thematics, using tools of psychology and phenomenology (with a debt to *surrealism in the case of Bachelard). Text-immanentist *New Criticism, beginning with I. A. Richards and enjoying a vogue from roughly 1940 to 1970, focuses on repetition and *irony as major features of thematics.

The study of genetic paradigms in thematics begins with Shklovsky, founder of the Society for the Study of Poetic Language, on the "resurrected word" (1917), *defamiliarization (1917), and the canonization of subgenres (1925). In Paris in the Nineteenth Century, Benjamin explores, e. g., the motif of the crowd in Charles Baudelaire, examining the literary-historical sequence from the minutest particular to the universal. Studies using thematics in conjunction with other disciplines include Williams, sociology; Wardley, sociology and gender studies; Langan, history of ideas (freedom) and Toposforschung; Komar, character refiguration in mod. lit. and media, gender studies; Turner, cultural hist.; Rickels and Ronell, psychoanalysis; de Baecque, art and political hist.; and Zholkovsky (1984, 1994), lit. hist. and poetics. While *poststructuralism has called into question its metatextual status, thematics remains useful in fields of research (concerning gender, race, multiculturalism) surpassing an exclusively literary epistemē, requiring judgment and evaluation of distinct yet comparable sign-systems (Todorov). T. Ziolkowski has traced character transfiguration during specific historical periods.

The study of motivation, not to be confused with Burkean motive, addresses compositional technique, sequencing, scaling, modeling, projection, and perspectivization, drawing connections among lit., anthropology, and sociology. The aesthetic function of motivation is to create an illusion of reality for the audience/reader (aut prodesse . . . aut delectare) according to a horizon of expectations. *Russian formalism distinguishes fable, a temporal sequence of events assigning cause, from sujet, which brings the fable into sharper, more complex focus through stylization. In the sujet, a lit. text takes on spatial or temporal contours in order to shape readerly experience. The fable, on the other hand, is nothing more than the sum of motivic elements. Jakobson; Barthes (1966, 1970), using methods adapted from Alexander von Humboldt's studies of J. W. Goethe and the Rus. formalists; Genette; and Greimas (1966) have developed sophisticated theoretical instruments, such as semiotics (see SEMIOTICS AND POETRY), to analyze fable and sujet not as static but rather as dynamic elements or actants.

In folklore studies, beginning with the categorization of tale types by Aarne, fable has assumed central importance. Thompson assigned ling. labels (e.g., "Snow White," "The Brave Tailor") and type numbers. Both Propp and Dundes took motivic indexing to task for inattention to narrative structure. Propp's classification emphasizes function, isolating seven fundamental character types in Rus. fairytales (skaz). Dundes has criticized the ambiguity of the term motif*, inasmuch as it can be applied to "actors, items, or incidents" while calling for a reinvigorated study of the meaning of the tale. Daemmrich and Daemmrich understand motivic and thematic patternings in literary texts as centripetal or centrifugal but also link the study of thematics and motivation to period codes. Hybridizing Shklovsky and Tynianov, Bakhtin valorizes *intertextuality (dialogism in Rabelais, Dostoevsky, stylization of antecedent texts, the carnivalesque, polyphony). Among his most important discoveries is the notion of "genre memory" ("semantic halos" associated with meters). The studies of Girard (1977, 1978, 1982), constituting a critical oeuvre, stand among anthropological crit., the study of motifs, and thematics; their rigorously polemical approach to received ideas in anthropology and lit. crit., provocative readings of the Bible, and analyses of violence and sacrifice address fundamental issues of social being, lit., and religion.

By widening its epistemic horizon and challenging its own reading practices, thematics has evolved from a literary typology transcending national lits. to the evaluation of period themes and cultural codes uncovered by such disparate methodologies as *New Historicism (shaming, surveillance, confession, the "social presence to the world" of the lit. text and of that world in the text; see Greenblatt 1980, 1987), and the philosophy of knowledge (skepticism, fanaticism; see Cavell) in the context of the Ren.

See RHETORIC AND POETRY.

■ A. Aarne, Verzeichnis der Märchentypen (1910); L. Spitzer, Studien zu Henri Barbusse (1920); B. Tomashevsky, Russkoe stikhoslozhenie (1923); V. Zhirmunsky, Rifma (1923; rpt. 1970); L. Spitzer, "Der Unanismus Jules Romains im Spiegel seiner Sprache," Archivum Romanicum 8 (1924); V. Zhirmunsky, Bařron i Pushkin (Byron and Pushkin, 1924); W. Benjamin, Arcades Project, ed. R. Tiedemann, trans. H. Eiland and K. McLaughlin (2002); B. Tomashevsky, Literary Theory (1928); M. Raymond, De Baudelaire au surrealisme (1933); A. Béguin, L'âme romantique et le êve (1937); R. Jakobson, "The Statue in Pushkin's Poetic Mythology," Slovo a slovesnost 3 (1937); J. Honti, "Märchenmorphologie und Märchentypologie," Folkliv 3 (1939); G. Bachelard, L'eau et les rêves (1943); V. Propp, Istoricheskie korni volshebnoĭ skazki (Historical Roots of the Magic Tale, 1946); S. Thompson, The Folktale (1946); Curtius; J.-P. Richard, Littérature et sensation (1954); S. Thompson, Motif-Index of Folk Literature, rev. ed. (1955–58); J.-P. Richard, L'univers imaginaire de Mallarmé (1961); L. Spitzer, "Zu Charles Péguy's Stil," Stilstudien 5 (1961); V. Shklovsky, "Art as Technique," Russian Formalist Criticism: Four Essays, trans. L. T. Lemon and M. J. Reis (1965); E. Frenzel, Stoff-, Motiv- und Symbolforschung (1966); G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan (1981); G. Poulet, Metamorphoses of the Circle, trans. C. Dawson and E. Coleman (1966); V. Propp, Morphology of the Folk-Tale, trans. L. Scott [1958], ed. L. A. Wagner, 2d ed. (1968); T. Todorov, "Motif," Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Sciences of Language, ed. O. Ducrot and T. Todorov, trans. C. Porter (1979); T. Ziolkowski, Fictional Transfigurations of Jesus (1972); V. Shklovsky, "The Resurrection of the Word," trans. R. Sherwood, Russian Formalism: A Collection of Articles and Texts in Translation, ed. S. Bann and J. Bowlt (1973); R. Williams, The Country and the City (1973); R. Barthes, S/Z, trans. R. Miller (1974), and "Introduction to the Structural Analysis of Narrative," NLH 6 (1975); J. Honti, Studies in Oral Epic Tradition, trans. Eva Róna (1975); E. Frenzel, Motive der Weltliteratur (1976); R. Girard, Violence and the Sacred, trans. P. Gregory (1977); Y. Tynianov, "Dostoevsky and Gogol (On the Theory of Parody)," Poetika: istoriya literatury kino (1977); T. Ziolkowski, Disenchanted Images (1977); R. Girard, Things Hidden since the Foundation of the World, trans. S. Bann and M. Metteer (1978), and "To Double Business Bound": Essays on Literature, Mimesis, and Anthropology (1978); P. N. Medvedev and M. M. Bakhtin, The Formal Method in Literary Scholarship, trans. A. J. Wehrle (1978); Y. Tynianov and R. Jakobson, "Problems in the Study of Literature and Language," Readings in Russian Poetics, Formalist and Structuralist Views, ed. and trans. L. Matejka and K. Pomorska (1978); J.-P. Richard, Microlectures (1979); S. Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning (1980); "Thematologie," Vergleichende Literaturwissenschaft, ed. M. Schmeling (1981); R. Girard, The Scapegoat, trans. Y. Freccero (1982); E. Frenzel, Stoffe der Weltliteratur (1983); A. Greimas, Structural Semantics: An Attempt at Method, trans. D. McDowell, R. Schleifer, A. Velie (1983); T. Ziolkowski, Varieties of Literary Thematics (1983); M. M. Bakhtin, Problems of Dostoevsky's Poetics, ed. and trans. C. Emerson (1984); A. Zholkovsky, Themes and Texts: Towards a Poetics of Expressiveness, trans. K. Parthé (1984); S. Cavell, Disowning Knowledge in Six Plays of Shakespeare (1987); H. S. Daemmrich and I. Daemmrich, Themes and Motifs in Western Literature: A Handbook (1987); J. Starobinski, Jean-Jacques Rousseau: Transparency and Obstacle, trans. A. Goldhammer (1988); Gattungsinnovation und Motivstruktur, ed. T. Wolpers, v. 1 (1989); S. J. Greenblatt, "Towards a Poetics of Culture," The New Historicism, ed. H. A. Veeser (1989); L. Doležel, Occidental Poetics: Tradition and Progress (1990); V. Shklovsky, Theory of Prose, trans. B. Sher (1990), and Gender at the Crossroads of Knowledge, ed. M. di Leonardo (1991); N. Armstrong, "A Brief Genealogy of Theme," Harvard English Studies 18 (1993); The Return of Thematic Criticism, ed. W. Sollors (1993); G. Bachelard, The Poetics of Space, trans. M. Jolas (1994); A. Zholkovsky, Text Counter Text: Rereadings in Russian Literary History (1994); Thematics Reconsidered, ed. T. Ziolkowski and F. Trommler (1995); A. Dundes, "The Motif Index and the Tale-Type Index: A Critique," Journal of Folklore Research 34 (1997); A.

de Baecque, The Glory and the Terror, trans. C. Mandell (2001); A. Ronell, Stupidity (2002); J. G. Turner, Libertines and Radicals in Early Modern London (2002); K. Komar, Reclaiming Klytemnestra: Revenge and Reconciliation (2003); T. Ziolkowski, The Hesitant Hero (2004).

R. G. Eisenhauer

THERAPY AND POETRY

I. Historical and Theoretical Foundations
II. Application

The use of poetry and of a variety of poetic methods (e.g., *metaphors, jour. writing, letter writing, and ceremonies) in health and mental-health disciplines has been widely reported in the professional lit. Poetry therapy is defined as the use of lang., symbol, and story in therapeutic, educational, and community-building capacities. The purview of poetry therapy includes bibliotherapy, narrative therapy, and jour. therapy. The field of poetry therapy is interdisciplinary, drawing from helping disciplines (e.g., psychology, social work, and medicine), literary and creative arts (poets/writers), and education (elementary through university level). Central to understanding the connection between literary and therapeutic viewpoints are the professional boundaries and perspectives that each discipline brings to poetry therapy. A poet, e.g., may be invited into a hospital, runaway shelter, hospice, or prison to teach or read poetry to the patients or residents. The purpose for the poet is to provide support and enrichment, not therapy, but there are therapeutic qualities inherent in writing or listening to poetry. For the therapist, however, the writing of, listening to, or reading of poetry could serve to validate feelings, provide a method to express feelings, serve a means for communication, or restore some sense of order and control. Thus, while there are inherent therapeutic and educational qualities involved in the process of poetry therapy, its use must be consistent with the individual's professional background and role.

The healing and empowering aspects of the lang. arts can be found in the spontaneous outpouring of poetry, lyrics, letters, and stories resulting from shootings on high-school and college campuses and the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. Poetic response to social, psychological, and health concerns include writing programs for inmates, runaway teenagers, battered women, and the terminally ill. Like music in many ways, poetry and other literary genres have the power to evoke, validate, and universalize powerful personal feelings. The popularity of performance poetry (e.g., *poetry slams) is a recent example of the therapeutic and social value of poetry.

I. Historical and Theoretical Foundations. The starting point for poetry therapy has been traced to ancient Gr. mythology and Apollo, the god of both poetry and medicine (Leedy 1969). The potential for *catharsis to effect an emotional cure and contribute to insight and recognition of universal truths has also been attributed to Aristotle's Poetics. Blinderman traced the use of poetry for promoting health to preliterate times and the use of *incantations and invocations. The power of ritual could be seen in the use of the chanted word to bring about change in oneself, in others, or in one's environment.

Poetry and other literary genres have been used both formally and informally in healing capacities in the U.S. since the early 19th c., when psychiatric patients wrote poems for the Pennsylvania Hospital newspaper The Illuminator (Jones). Prescott, a professor of Eng. noted the therapeutic value of poetry for troubled individuals in its capacity to provide an emotional outlet in his 1922 work; and in 1925, Robert Haven Schauffler wrote The Poetry Cure: A Pocket Medicine Chest of Verse.

Many mental-health professionals have long recognized the potential healing power of poetry. Through the work of Jack J. Leedy, M.D., poetry therapy was formally recognized in 1969 with the establishment of the Association for Poetry Therapy and, in 1981, became institutionalized as The National Association for Poetry Therapy (NAPT). NAPT holds annual conferences at various sites across the United States, has developed standards for practice, and is part of the National Coalition of Arts Therapies Association (NCATA). Membership in NAPT is interdisciplinary and international. Contributors to the scholarly and practice base of poetry therapy include Leedy, Arthur Lerner, Arleen McCarty Hynes, and Nicholas Mazza.

The Journal of Poetry Therapy: The Interdisciplinary Journal of Practice, Theory, Research, and Education is the leading jour. in this field, having been established in 1987. A review of the lit. indicates a wide use of poetic methods across populations (along developmental markers, culture, and socioeconomic status), problem areas (e.g., trauma, depression, stress, anxiety, cancer, AIDS, homelessness, and physical disabilities), and institutions (e.g., mental-health centers, hospice, family-service agencies, hospitals, and counseling centers).

II. Application. Mazza's (2003) multidimensional poetry-therapy practice model encompasses the complete range of poetry-therapy methods through its three primary domains: (1) Receptive/Prescriptive—introducing existing poems (or other forms of lit.) in a therapeutic capacity to validate a feeling, promote self-expression, or advance group process; (2) Expressive/Creative—the use of written expression (e.g., poetry, letters, jours., and stories) for clinical/health purposes; and (3) Symbolic/Ceremonial—the use of metaphors, rituals, symbols, storytelling, and *performance (e.g., dance and movement) to deal with life transitions.

This tripartite system is a synthesis of the major poetry-therapy methods that may be applied in an independent or integrated manner. Consider, e.g., the role of poetic material in dealing with death. Grieving individuals often use creative writing to release powerful feelings, create meaning, and honor the memory of a loved one. Writing a letter to the deceased loved one and engaging in a ceremonial act, such as burning or burying it, is one example. Reading or listening to a poem often provides a measure of comfort, insight, and strength. Of course, experiencing a poem or song can also bring up powerful emotions that might overwhelm the individual. The power of poetry is clearly evident, and the place of poetry as a healing tool is in the early stages of systematic empirical investigation.

Poetry therapy and the therapeutics of poetry will continue to develop through interdisciplinary study, practice, and evaluation. The promise of the poetic in the classroom, clinic, or larger community will be best served through the complementarity of art and science. ■ F. C. Prescott, The Poetic Mind (1922); Poetry Therapy, ed. J. J. Leedy (1969), esp. R. E. Jones, "Treatment of a Psychotic Patient by Poetry Therapy"; A. Blinderman, Shamans, Witch Doctors, Medicine Men and Poetry, Poetry the Healer, ed. J. J. Leedy (1973); Poetry in the Therapeutic Experience, ed. A. Lerner (1978); A. M. Hynes and M. Hynes-Berry, Biblio/Poetry Therapy: The Interactive Process: A Handbook (1986); J. V. Knapp, Striking at the Joints: Contemporary Psychology and Literary Criticism (1996); N. Mazza, Poetry Therapy (2003); and "Twenty Years of Scholarship in the Journal of Poetry Therapy: The Collected Abstracts," Journal of Poetry Therapy 21 (2008); C. J. Maddalena, "The Resolution of Internal Conflict through Performing Poetry," The Arts in Psychotherapy 36 (2009); http://www.poetrytherapy.org.

N. F. Mazza

TIBET, CONTEMPORARY POETRY OF. From the adoption of Indian kāvya poetic codes in the 13th c. until the 1950s, Tibetan poetic production was tremendous, but poets demonstrated limited interest for innovation. One late exception was the iconoclastic genius Gendun Choephel (1903–51), who brought in a new tone and contemp. themes, while in some pieces rehabilitating pre-kāvya versification (mainly *hexameters) and ancient historical themes. He may be considered a key figure in the transition from the Indian-inspired cl. Tibetan poetry to the new Tibetan poetry.

With the Chinese occupation starting in 1950, the Tibetan literary scene saw the emergence of a "monastic vanguard" (Hartley 2008), consisting of traditionally trained Buddhist clerics co-opted by the Chinese Communist Party, to eulogize the new regime and its platforms, as well as material progress. The clerics' poetic works, communist in content, remained strongly reminiscent of their traditional, Indian-influenced literary training. From the mid-1950s onward, strong resistance to radical communist reforms led to a virtual halt in original Tibetan literary production, as many intellectuals and educated people were excluded from official circles, imprisoned, or even killed. The Cultural Revolution (1966–76) further ostracized the intellectual elite. As a consequence, between the late 1950s and the late 1970s, hardly any poetic innovation, or even writing, is to be noted in the Tibetan lang.

Within a few years of Mao's death in 1976, a new era dawned: Tibetan-lang. literary and cultural jours., supported and controlled by the Chinese state, started to appear. A turning point in contemp. Tibetan lit. occurred in 1983 when the poem Lang-tsho'i rbab-chu (Waterfall of Youth) was published. This long poem, written by the short-lived prodigy Dondrupgyal (1953–85), is considered the very first *free-verse work in Tibetan, although rare instances of verse irregularity can be found in earlier writings. The irregular structure of Lang-tsho'i rbab-chu encouraged people not trained in the cl. Tibetan *canon to compose poetry according to their own terms, without restraint or arduous training in the subtleties of traditional poetics. The result was a sudden and long-lasting surge in poetic composition among Tibetan lay youth, whereas poetic composition had been for centuries a quasi-monopoly of clerics.

The next evolution came with Jangbu (pseud. of Dorje Tsering, b. 1963), who was inspired both by Dondrupgyal and by Chinese "obscure poetry" (Chinese menglong shi, Tibetan rab-rib kyi snyan-ngag). An obscurity of meaning, a chaotic flow of clauses, and total irregularity in form became marks of this new genre. A small coterie of Tibetan authors, trained in the mod. educational system, familiar with Chinese, and possessing a strong connection to Tibetan folk culture, led this movement. Like Dondrupgyal, they were frowned upon by traditionalists, who despaired at finding neither meaning nor Tibetan flavor in these enigmatic and personal works. But the new, lay intellectual elite, eager to be in tune with literary modernity in the rest of the world, was enthusiastic.

The year 2005 marked the latest turning point, with the first privately organized poetry festival in Tibet, also titled "Waterfall of Youth." The festival has since been held in 2007, 2009, and 2011. Under Jangbu's leadership, it has brought together eminent poets to discuss and recite their poetry and to meet students in local schools. Also in 2005, led by Kyabchen Dedröl (b. 1977), the poetic circle mi-rabs gsum-pa (Third Generation, a name inspired by Chinese artistic circles) was formed, a group of about 20 poets and intellectuals in their 30s and 40s who write either in Tibetan or Chinese, who are free from any trend or current, and whose generation follows that of Dondrupgyal and Ju Kälzang (b. 1960). Members of the group do not profess a particular style, nor any political stance. Their specificity lies not so much in their style or content as in their close friendship and openness to world lit.

Although it is difficult to summarize the wealth of themes that inform Tibetan poems today, religion is no longer the dominant theme. Instead, frequent themes include individual moods, with an emphasis on sadness and solitude; a sense of commonality among Tibetans; and dismay toward an uncertain future, with nature offering convenient and discreet parallels to political concerns too sensitive to be expressed openly. Social concerns and everyday life also have become prominent topics.

A common feature of Tibetan poets is their relatively young age: very few manage to develop a literary career in the long term. Only a handful have become lasting and prolific: Jangbu, Ju Kälzang, and, in the younger generation, Kyabchen Dedröl, Chän Metak (b. 1968), and Gangzhün (pseud. of Sangye Gyatso, b. 1969). Among them, only Jangbu has achieved international fame and is published in Eng. Women poets also lack visibility, with the exception of Palmo (b. 1968) and Dekyi Drolma (b. 1966), who have earned well-deserved recognition in the otherwise male-dominated Tibetan poetic scene.

While there are six million Tibetans, only half of whom are literate, about 100 Tibetan-lang. magazines are currently being published in China, half of them state sponsored. Most are either literary or cultural, and they always include poems, sometimes to the exclusion of other literary genres, as is the case for Ganggyän Metok (Snow Flower). In addition, Web sites in the Tibetan lang. have gradually begun to appear since 2005, and many offer a daily delivery of online poems.

With the occupation of Tibet, a number of highly educated Tibetans have gained mastery in the Chinese lang. and have begun writing poetry in Chinese. First came Yidam Tsering (1933–2004), whose poetry is informed by a good knowledge of Chinese and Tibetan culture. His often nationalistic tone endeared him to Tibetans, and a selection of his works has been translated into Tibetan. Tsering Woeser (b. 1966) has also published a number of poetic works, some of which have been translated into Eng. Tsobu Gade, born in the late 1980s and a member of the third-generation group, won two all-China literary prizes in 2009.

Regarding the exile Tibetans after the Chinese occupation, poetic creation temporarily came to a halt in the first years after the settlement in India (1959), although some poems did appear in Shecha (Knowledge), the first magazine founded by the Tibetan government-in-exile. The new generation educated in India started Young Tibet (later changed to Lotus Fields) in 1977, the first exile Tibetan literary magazine, which published only poems written in Eng. Poetic writing in the Tibetan lang. gained vitality and renewal only after the second wave of refugees, fleeing Tibet from the mid-1980s onward, brought with them the concept of literary magazines written in Tibetan and free-verse poetry. The launching of Jangshön (Young Shoot) in December 1990, a magazine dedicated to old and new Tibetan-lang. poetry and fiction, heralded a new era. From then onward, more and more magazines began to be published, usually at the initiative of recently arrived exiles with a poor knowledge of Eng. but good mastery of Tibetan script. There are currently over 30 jours. and magazines in Tibetan pub. in exile, most of which include poetry. A Guild of Tibetan Writers was created in India in 1999 and joined the PEN Club in 2003, becoming the Tibetan Writers Abroad PEN Center. It is headed by the acclaimed writer and Tibetan lit. expert Chabdak Lhamokyab (b. 1963).

Finally, a number of exile Tibetans now write poetry in Eng., such as Tenzin Tsundue (living in India, b. ca. 1975) and Bhuchung Sonam (India, b. ca. 1972). Their work is often political, with a strong presence of Tibet- and exile-related themes. Tsering Wangmo Dhompa (U.S., b. 1969) stands out as an acclaimed award-winning woman poet whose work is highly personal and creative.

See CHINA, MODERN POETRY OF; TIBET, TRADITIONAL POETRY AND POETICS OF.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: The Blighted Flower and Other Stories, ed. R. Virtanen (2000); Manoa 12: Song of the Snow Lion, ed. F. Stewart, H. J. Batt, T. Shakya (2000); Muses in Exile: An Anthology of Tibetan Poetry, ed. B. D. Sonam (2005); T. Woeser, Tibet's True Heart: Selected Poems, trans. A. E. Clarke (2009); Jangbu, The Nine-eyed Agate: Stories and Poems, trans. H. Stoddard (2010).

■ Criticism and History: L. R. Hartley, "Themes of Tradition and Change in Modern Tibetan Literature," Lungta 12 (1999); Contemporary Tibetan Literary Studies. PIATS 2003: Proceedings of the Tenth Seminar of the International Association for Tibetan Studies, Oxford, 2003, ed. S. J. Venturino (2007); Modern Tibetan Literature and Social Change, ed. L. R. Hartley and P. Schiaffini-Vedani (2008)—esp. L. R. Hartley, "Heterodox Views and the New Orthodox Poems: Tibetan Writers in the Early and Mid-Twentieth Century"; Y. Dhondup, "Roar of the Snow Lion: Tibetan Poetry in Chinese"; P. Bhum, "'Heartbeat of a New Generation': A Discussion of the New Poetry," and "'Heartbeat of a New Generation' Revisited"; S. Gyatso (Gangzhün), "Modern Tibetan Literature and the Rise of Writer Coteries"; H. Jigme, "Tibetan Literature in the Diaspora."

■ Electronic Sources: The Lamp (in Tibetan), www.tibetcm.com; Where Tibetans Write (in Eng.), www.tibetwrites.org.

F. ROBIN

TIBET, TRADITIONAL POETRY AND POETICS OF.

The Tibetan formal term for poetry is snyan-ngag (Sanskrit, kāvya), "ornamental language," and its author is the snyan-ngag-mkhan (Sanskrit, kavi). Snyan-ngag is characterized by the use of rhetorical ornament (don-rgyan, Sanskrit, arthālaṃkāra) and phonetic ornament (sgra-rgyan, Sanskrit, śabdālaṃkāra). It may be either verse or prose, and there is little deliberate use of rhyme. Colloquially, however, Tibetans speak of rtsom, literally "composition," to refer to poetic verse in particular. Tibetan verse typically consists of *quatrains, with lines of 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, or 15 syllables, and sometimes more in very ornate verse. The use of shorter lines is characteristic of archaic and folk poetry, while trans. of Sanskrit verse and poetry influenced by Sanskrit models use lines of seven or more syllables. The lines forming a single verse most often are metrically regular, generally in trochaic feet, with the addition of a final stressed syllable when the line consists of an odd number of syllables, though meters not according with this scheme are also known. Parallel syntax is often employed, one or more syllables being repeated at the beginning, middle, or end of each line, or with repetitions of the same syllable within a single line. *Tropes include various sorts of *simile (dpe-rgyan) and *metaphor (gzugs-rgyan), and the use of elegant literary synonyms (mngon-brjod).

The indigenous Tibetan poetic genres, little influenced by translated lit., include folk songs (glu, songs of varied meter, and gzhas, dance songs of four six-syllable lines), *epic and bardic verse (sgrung-glu), and versified folk oratory (tshig-dpe/mol-ba). Traditionally, these were generally unwritten but have informed Tibetan lit. in many respects, beginning with the earliest known Tibetan poetic works, dating to the early 9th c. and discovered at Dunhuang. In later times, the inspiration of folk song permeates the poems of the Sixth Dalai Lama (1683–1706), as in this example, in the characteristic trochaic trimeter of the dance song (using accents to mark the stressed syllables):

Mdzángs ma'i thúgs dang bstún na
Tshé 'di chós skal chád 'gro
Dbén pa'i rí khrod 'gríms na bú mo'i thúgs dang 'gál 'gro.

(If I follow my girl friend's heart,
Life's religious wealth will run out;
If I adhere to single retreat,
I'll be running against my girl's heart.)

The subject matter of Tibetan folk song may include love and courtship; politics; grief; nature; or activities such as grazing, sowing, and harvesting; construction work; or picnicking. Literary redactions of Tibet's epic and bardic trads. are represented by ms. and printed versions of the popular tales of King Gesar (ge-sar sgrung). Folk oratory, on the other hand, was seldom recorded before recent times, though its colorful rhetoric occasionally punctuates Tibetan yogic songs and biographical lit., particularly in the writings of authors from the nomadic regions of Tibet's far eastern provinces, Khams and Amdo.

The Tibetan script and literary lang. developed in the 7th c. CE, an early literary effort incl. very extensive trans., particularly of Indian Buddhist lit. During the 13th c., this translated lit. was canonized in the form of two great collections: the Kanjur (literally "translated pronouncements") in roughly 100 volumes, consisting of the discourses attributed to the Buddha, and the Tanjur (literally "translated treatises") in roughly 200 volumes, consisting mostly of the writings of later Indian scholars and sages. These include much verse, providing enduring examples for Tibetan writers. The latter collection also includes trans. of Sanskrit treatises on the "language sciences" (sgra-rig, Sanskrit śabdavidyā)—grammar, synonymics, poetics (above all the Kāvyādarśa [Mirror of Poetry], by the Indian poet Daṇḍin, ca. 700), metrics, dramaturgy—the basis for all later Tibetan literary education. Following are notes on some of the major genres of Indian-influenced Tibetan poetic composition, with the names of a few prominent authors and works in each field. (For reasons of space, a given author is mentioned only once, even though he may have contributed to several of the genres mentioned.)

As in India, verse was often the vehicle for works on philosophy and dogmatics (lta-ba/grub-mtha'). While highly technical works were versified for mnemonic reasons, poetic elaboration of Buddhist doctrine employed scriptural figures of speech, as in this example, from the work of Klong-chen Rab-'byams-pa (1308–64):

Life is impermanent like clouds of autumn,
Youth is impermanent like flowers of spring,
The body is impermanent like borrowed property,
Wealth is impermanent like dew on the grass.

Many of Tibet's major religious writers, incl. Karma-pa III Rang-byung-rdo-rje (1287–1339), Tsong-kha-pa (1357–1419), and 'Jigs-med Gling-pa (1729–98), composed outstanding doctrinal verse.

*Gnomic poetry (legs-bshad, Sanskrit subhāṣita) modeled on aphorisms from Indian books of polity (nītiśāstra) found their greatest exponent in Sa-skya Paṇḍita (1181–1252), whose Legs-bshad rin-po-che'i gter (Treasury of Aphoristic Gems) is cited proverbially. Other famed aphoristic collections are those of Paṇ-chen Bsod-nams grags-pa (1478–1554), Gung-thang Bstan-pa'i sgron-me (1762–1823), and Mi-pham rnam-rgyal (1846–1912). Ethical and spiritual instructions (zhal-gdams) may closely adhere to doctrinal models or to the conventions of gnomic verse, but they may also make powerful use of colloquialisms and elements of folk song, as do the Ding-ri brgya-rtsa (Hundred Admonitions to the People of Ding-ri) attributed to Pha-dam-pa Sangs-rgyas (12th c.), by origins an Indian yogin, and the Rgyal-sras lag-len so-bdun-ma (Thirty-seven Skills of the Bodhisattva) by Rgyal-sras Thogs-med bzang-po (1295–1369).

The intricate ritualization of Tibetan religion encouraged the devel. of ritual and devotional verse (cho-ga, gsol-'debs). Accomplished academic poets, such as Paṇ-chen Blo-bzang chos-rgyan (1570–1662), author of a popular Bla-ma mchod-pa (Worship of the Guru), have contributed here, as have inspired "treasure-discoverers" (gter-ston), whose visionary verses are chanted daily by devout Buddhists throughout Tibet.

Drama (zlos-gar) often included vivid poetic passages and was represented above all by the popular "Tibetan opera" (lha-mo), usually based on religious legends. Indian dramaturgy also inspired some Tibetan poems, though these were not, despite their titles, actually plays. An example is the much admired Lha-chos-dang mthun-pa'i gtam Padma'i tshal-gyi zlos-gar (Drama of Padma-tshal: A Divine Discourse) by O-rgyan 'Jigs-med chos-kyi dbang-po (1808–87).

Verse narratives (rtogs-brjod) embrace fables and legends, as well as hists. and biographies (rnam-thar), incl. autobiographies. Among them are works that are sometimes reminiscient of Indian Puranic texts, as is the Padma bka'-thang (Testament of Padmasambhava), redacted by O-rgyan Gling-pa (b. 1323), or ornate poems modeled on refined Sanskrit kāvya, as are the Mi-dbang rtogs-brjod (Narrative of the Lord of Men) and other writings by Mdo-mkhar Tshe-ring dbang-rgyal (1697–1763).

Drawing thematic inspiration from the Apabhraṃśa songs of the Indian Buddhist tantric masters and imagistic and metrical resources from indigenous bardic and popular verse, the Buddhist yogins of Tibet created an entirely distinctive family of verse forms, collectively known as mgur (yogic songs). The greatest author of mgur was the inspired sage Mi-la-ras-pa (1040–1123), who is virtually famed as Tibet's national poet. Here he sings of his foremost disciple, Ras-chung (1085–1161):

> He's gone off riding a fine steed:
> Others' steeds are skittish,
> But Ras-chung's steed doesn't shy.
> On the stallion of thought's vital wind,
> My son Ras-chung, he's gone riding off.

The poetry *anthology was not a well-developed form in Tibet, perhaps owing to the emphasis placed on the collected works (gsung-'bum) of single authors and the collected songs (mgur-'bum) of individual yogins, above all. Commentarial treatises on Buddhist doctrine often make such extensive use of quotations that they amount to anthols. in any case. Nonetheless, mention must be made of the extraordinary Bka'-brgyud mgur-mtsho (Ocean of Songs of the Bka'-brgyud School), originally compiled by the eighth Karma-pa hierarch, Mi-bskyod rdo-rje (1507–54), an anthol. of masterpieces of the mgur genre.

Indian erotic lore was known primarily through tantric Buddhist lit., and frankly erotic imagery is often used symbolically in religious verse, less frequently in secular verse. A mod. author, Dge-'dun chos-'phel (1894–1951), composed an original and highly amusing 'dod-pa'i bstan-bcos (Treatise on Love), inspired primarily by the Kāma Sūtra but in some respects reminiscent of Ovid's Ars amatoria.

Owing to the stability of the Tibetan cl. literary lang., the form and lexicon of Tibetan poetic composition until very recently differed little from models dating back a millennium. The secularizing and colloquializing tendencies of contemp. Tibetan writing in general have influenced recent Tibetan poetry, however, as has exposure to contemp. poetry from outside of Tibet. These devels. are addressed in the entry TIBET, CONTEMPORARY POETRY OF.

■ Criticism and History: P. Poucha, "Le vers tibetain," Archiv Orientalni 18 (1950) and 22 (1954); J. Vekerdi, "Some Remarks on Tibetan Prosody," Acta Orientalia 2 (1952); K. Chang, "On Tibetan Poetry," Central Asiatic Journal 2 (1956); R. Stein, Tibetan Civilization (1972); Tibetan Literature: Studies in Genre, ed. J. Cabezón and R. Jackson (1995); M. Kapstein, "The Indian Literary Identity in Tibet," Literary Cultures in History: Perspectives from South Asia, ed. S. Pollock (2003).

■ Folk Verse and Bardic Traditions: R. Stein, L'épopée tibétaine de Gesar dans sa version lamaîque de Ling (1955), and Recherches sur l'épopée et le barde au Tibet (1959); G. Tucci, Tibetan Folk Songs, 2d ed. (1966); N. N. Dewang, "Musical Tradition of the Tibetan People: Songs in Dance Measure," Orientalia Romana: Essays and Lectures, II, ed. V. S. Agrawala (1967); M. Helffer, Les chants dans l'épopée tibétaine de Ge-sar d'après le livre de la Course de cheval (1978); B. Aziz, "On Translating Oral Traditions: Ceremonial Wedding Poetry from Dingri," Soundings in Tibetan Civilization, ed. B. N. Aziz and M. T. Kapstein (1982).

■ Translations: Three Tibetan Mysteries, trans. J. Bacot (1924); Le Dict de Padma, trans. G. Toussaint (1933); The Buddha's Law among the Birds, trans. E. Conze (1955); The Hundred Thousand Songs of Milarepa, trans. G. Chang (1962); A Treasury of Aphoristic Jewels, trans. J. Bosson (1969); Vie et Chants de 'Brug-pa Kun-legs le Yogin, trans. R. Stein (1972); The Rain of Wisdom, trans. Nalanda Translation Committee (1980); Songs of the Sixth Dalai Lama, trans. K. Dhondup (1981); Visionary Journey: The Story of Wildwood Delights and the Story of Mount Potala Delights, trans. H. Guenther (1989); The Life of Shabkar: The Autobiography of a Tibetan Yogin, trans. M. Ricard et al. (1994); The Tale of the Incomparable Prince, trans. B. Newman (1996); Songs of Spiritual Experience, trans. T. Jinpa and J. Elsner, (2000); In the Forest of Faded Wisdom: 104 Poems by Gendun Chopel, trans. D. Lopez Jr. (2009).

T. T. RINPOCHE; M. T. KAPSTEIN

TIMBRE, tone color, sound color (Ger. Klangfarbe). There is no generally accepted term. Timbre derives from low Lat., then Fr. terms for a drum, a bell, the sound of a bell. Timbre now denotes the sonorous quality of a *sound, as opposed to its length (duration) or loudness or pitch or accent. (Note that the quality of a color, its tint or shade, is called its tone.) Technically, timbre is changed by increasing the intensity of one or another set of harmonics of formants comprising the sound. Formants may be roughly defined as pitch zones in which voice overtones are strengthened, owing to the voice-cavity configuration. In music and speech, timbre is the characteristic auditory quality of a musical instrument or voice producing a sound and, by extension, the kinesthetic "feel" of the sound to the listener. Common adjectives for the description of sound deriving from sight, touch, and taste include heavy, light, dark, soft, rough, crisp, salty, sweet, sharp, dim, long, shallow, and blunt: these are the province of the phenomenon known in Eng. as synaesthesia*.

Beyond synaesthesia, how might timbre be identified in poetry? Two possibilities suggest themselves: (1) place of articulation and (2) distinctive features. It is necessary first to distinguish between articulatory phenomena (manner and place of production of the sound), acoustic phenomena (the inherent characteristics of the sound itself, as measured with instruments in acoustics experiments), and perceptual (auditory) phenomena (the way sounds are classed by hearers). Concerning place of articulation—i.e., high-mid-low and front-mid-back on the standard phonetic chart of articulatory points in the mouth cavity—there is evidence that auditors make category distinctions between groups of sounds, e.g., all vowels that are high versus low or front versus back. This could be subject to patterning in poetry, as could the several sets of binary pairs of distinctive acoustic features of sounds, as classified by mod. linguists such as Morris Halle and Roman Jakobson. Distinctive feature analysis is a system of metrical analysis developed by Karl Magnuson and Frank Ryder in the late 1960s to identify those features that are prosodically (metrically) distinctive. Whether and how the sounds of poems have been patterned on the basis of such features remain to be shown—as do, indeed, the full relations of this class of human sound response to the other two major classes, *mimesis (see ONOMATOPOEIA) and association.

■ K. Bühler, Sprachtheorie (1934); K. Hevner, "An Experimental Study of the Affective Value of Sounds in Poetry," American Journal of Psychology 49 (1937); M. M. Macdermott, Vowel Sounds in Poetry (1940); P. Delattre, "The Physiological Interpretation of Sound Spectrograms," PMLA 66 (1951); F. Lockemann, Das Gedicht und seine Klanggestalt (1952); P. Delbouille, Poésie et sonorités, 2 v. (1961, 1984); R. Jakobson, G. Fant, M. Halle, Preliminaries to Speech Analysis (1965); N. S. Trubetzkoy, Principles of Phonology, trans. C.A.M. Baltaxe (1969); K. Magnuson and F. G. Ryder, "The Study of English Prosody," CE 31 (1970), and "Second Thoughts on English Prosody," CE 33 (1971); D. Chisholm, "Lexicality and German Derivational Suffixes," Lang&S 6 (1973); K. Magnuson, "Rules and Observations in Prosody," Poetics 12 (1974); D. Chisholm, Goethe's Knittelvers (1975), and "Generative Prosody and English Verse," Poetics 6 (1977); R. Cogan, "Tone Color," Sonus 1 (1980); W. Slawson, Sound Color (1985); J. D. Puterbaugh, "Between Location and Place: A View of Timbre through Auditory Models and Sonopoietic Space," DAI 60 (1999); K. Bergeron, "A Bugle, a Bell, a Stroke of the Tongue: Rethinking Music in Modern French Verse," Representations 86 (2004); G. Olwage, "The Class and Colour of Tone," Ethnomusicology Forum 13 (2004); W. Everett, "Painting Their Room in a Colorful Way: The Beatles' Exploration of Timbre," Reading the Beatles, ed. K. Womack and T. F. Davis (2006).

T.V.F. BROGAN

TISH was a Canadian little magazine (subtitled a poetry newsletter) pub. in Vancouver from 1961 to 1969. Used more broadly, the term refers to the poetry and poetics associated with the eds. of the magazine, whose work came to represent the first wave of *postmodernism in Canadian poetry. The name, an anagram for shit, is in part indicative of the group's poetics, which eschewed the finely crafted *lyric in favor of an intense, embodied, and improvised immediacy. TISH was significant as a literary movement in a national lit. often lacking such collective formations.

Inspired by the introduction to the *anthology The New American Poetry 1945–1960, ed. by Donald Allen (1960), and by lectures given in the summer of 1961 by the Am. poet Robert Duncan (1919–88) in the Vancouver home of the poetry scholar Warren Tallman, the first (of three) editorial collectives, consisting at first of George Bowering (b. 1935), Frank Davey (b. 1940), David Dawson (1942–2008), Jamie Reid (b. 1941), and Fred Wah (b. 1939), brought out 19 consecutive monthly eds. of the magazine until disbanding after the Vancouver Poetry Conference in the summer of 1963. TISH the magazine was modeled on underground Am. magazines such as the Black Mountain Review and Floating Bear. As a vanguard movement in an aesthetically conservative and soundly postcolonial country, TISH pointed the way to a more engaged practice, enabling later devels. such as the Toronto avant-garde that formed around bpNichol and Steve McCaffery, as well as Vancouver's *Kootenay School of Writing.

Participants in TISH have produced some of the most innovative and significant Canadian lit. in the past 40 years. Through the 1970s and 1980s, Bowering produced numerous serial poems, from his anti-imperialist At War with the US (1974) to his transformations of R. M. Rilke across time and space in Kerrisdale Elegies (1984). Like many TISH poets, Daphne Marlatt (b. 1942) has explored the significance of place and hist. in her book-length poem Steveston (1974), as well as her evolving sexuality in such groundbreaking *lesbian poems as "Booking Passage" (1991). Wah, winner of the Governor General's Award for Waiting for Saskatchewan (1985), has published several volumes of his lifelong prose poem Music at the Heart of Thinking (beginning in 1987). Davey, while continuing to publish poetry, has become one of the most influential critics of his generation.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; CANADA, POETRY OF.

■ TISH: 1–19, ed. Frank Davey (1975)—an anthol.; The Writing Life: Historical and Critical Views of the Tish Movement, ed. C. H. Gervais (1976); Beyond TISH, ed. D. Barbour (1991); P. Butling and S. Rudy, Writing in our Time: Canada's Radical Poetries in English, 1957–2003 (2005).

S. COLLIS

TLACUILOLLI (Nahuatl, "painting" or "writing"). Tlacuilolli is a pictorial script with classic period (250–1000 CE) antecedents that flourished during the postclassic period (1000–1521 CE) in Central Mexico and regions to the southeast of Central Mexico. This script remained in use during the early colonial period, immediately following the Sp. conquest (1519–21).

Pre-Columbian tlacuilolli script was painted onto cotton sheets or screen-fold books and rolls made of deerskin or native bark paper, or carved into stone and painted on pottery and murals. Largely because of the ravages of conquest and the early colonial period, there are a limited number of extant pre-Columbian painted books, sheets, and rolls. Scholars include at least 12 works in this category. A larger number of tlacuilolli writings survive in which Eur. stylistic influence is slight or debatable.

The surviving examples of pre-Columbian painted books are either historical or ritual in nature. Native and Eur. sources from Mexico's early colonial period describe additional genres of tlacuilolli writings, incl. lineage books, books of divinities, dream books, *songbooks, maps, and administrative documents.

Tlacuilolli script integrates *ideograms and pictographs with numerical and symbolic information. Pictographs depict persons, objects, or information in a way that recognizably corresponds to their fundamental form or qualities. The concept mountain, e.g., is painted as a stylized mountain, and the year two rabbit is depicted with two dots beside a stylized rabbit. Ideograms convey more abstract concepts. Speech scrolls emerging from the mouths of human beings or animals represent voice and song. Similarly, footprint trails indicate human directional movement or reading direction. Tlacuilolli script uses color to render meaning symbolically and, to a very limited degree, represents sounds. An example of phonetic information in tlacuilolli works by Nahuatl speakers is the image of teeth (tlantli), to represent the homonymous suffix tlan (at or place of; next to or below).

Tlacuilolli script continued to be produced decades after the conquest, albeit transformed through contact with Eur. artistic conventions and scriptural technologies. Tlacuilolli writings of this period were frequently produced on Eur. paper, employed Eur. artistic perspective, or incorporated alphabetic glosses and Christian dates. By the end of the 16th c., however, tlacuilolli script had largely been replaced by alphabetic writing.

See COLONIAL POETICS; INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; MEXICO, POETRY OF.

■ M. León-Portilla, Pre-Columbian Literatures of Mexico, trans. G. Lobanov and M. León-Portilla (1969); G. Brotherston, Book of the Fourth World (1992); J. Lockhart, The Nahuas after the Conquest (1992); M. León-Portilla, "Have We Really Translated the Mesoamerican 'Ancient Word'?" On the Translation of Native American Literatures, ed. B. Swann (1992); J.M.D. Pohl, "Mexican Codices, Maps, and Lienzos as Social Contracts," Writing without Words: Alternative Literacies in Mesoamerica and the Andes, ed. E. H. Boone and W. D. Mignolo (1994); D. Robertson, Mexican Manuscript Painting of the Early Colonial Period (1994); G. Brotherston, Painted Books from Mexico (1995); E. H. Boone, "Pictorial Documents and Visual Thinking in Postconquest Mexico," and F. E. Karttunen, "Indigenous Writing as a Vehicle of Postconquest Continuity and Change in Mesoamerica," Native Traditions in the Postconquest World, ed. E. H. Boone and T. Cummins (1998); E. H. Boone, Stories in Red and Black: Pictorial Histories of the Aztecs and Mixtecs (2000); M. León-Portilla, Códices: Los Antiguos Libros del Nuevo Mundo (2003); G. Brotherston, Feather Crown: The Eighteen Feasts of the Mexican Year (2005); K. A. Nowotny, Tlacuilolli: Style and Contents of the Mexican Pictorial Manuscripts with a Catalog of the Borgia Group, ed. and trans. G. A. Everett Jr. and E. B. Sisson (2005).

S. SCHMIDT

TMESIS (Gr., "a cutting"); also diacope. Insertion of a word within another word or phrase. Addition of a mere syllable (sometimes for metrical purposes) is *epenthesis. Group μ defines tmesis to include "all the cases where two morphemes or syntagms that grammatical usage ties together strictly are separated by the insertion of additional elements." Earlier rhetoricians traditionally separated such syntactical permutations into two forms of tmesis according to whether a single word or a sentence was divided by an intercalated element. In Gr. syntax, tmesis means the separation of a preposition from its verb to which, in postepic lang., it was completely joined. In Attic Gr. poetry, the two elements were separated by unimportant words for the sake of emphasis. Lat. poetry does the same thing, e.g., seque gregari for segregarique. Eng. allows the breaking up of any compound word, e.g., "that Man—how dearly ever parted" (Chaucer, Troilus and Criseyde 3.3.96); "See his wind—lilycocks—laced" (G. M. Hopkins, "Harry Ploughman"). By far the most extensive mod. practitioner of tmesis in Eng.-lang. poetry is e. e. cummings, who makes it virtually a constitutive principle of poetic form in his verse. Mod. ling. describes one form of this process in colloquial speech as "expletive insertion," commonly scissoring words such as outstanding by a profanity. An example of syntagmatic interpolation is "Lay your sleeping head, my love, / Human on my faithless arm" (W. H. Auden, "Lullaby").

■ F. Amory, "Tmesis in Medieval Latin, Old Norse, and Old Irish Poetry," Arkiv für Nordisk Filologi 94 (1979); Group μ; Lausberg; Morier; E. R. Anderson, A Grammar of Iconism (1999).

R. A. HORNSBY; A. W. HALSALL; T.V.F. BROGAN

TOAST. A long poetic tale or saga of salute or tribute (hence, the term), a form of street and prison poetry found in the Af. Am. community. The toast, like the *dozens, is characteristically a recited poetry generally created and performed by males. The origin of the form dates to the second half of the 19th c. in celebrations of bad men, bandits, and tricksters and possibly back to the praise poem trad. that is pervasive in Africa. Some toasts are related to and derived from the narrative trad. of the Wild West. The oral form has been appropriated into written lit. by writers such as Nikki Giovanni and Julius Lester. The raconteur may open or close the performance with a tribute or salute to the celebrant, e.g., "Here's to Shine!" The subject of the toast is generally secular and its lang. witty, satiric, bawdy, and profane, told mostly in *couplets or in *ballad meter (xbyb in alternating four- and three-stress lines). There may be internal rhyme, off-rhyme, and triplet rhymes as well. Through its adventurous narrative, the toast may provide astute commentary on any number of subjects from human vanity to politics. It is episodic, lengthy, and detailed. Because it is improvised, the toast requires of its composer tremendous verbal ingenuity and dexterity for creating wit and excitement, for controlling the rhyme and the frequently irregular rhythm, and for maintaining a high level of spontaneity. The dominant tone of the toast is braggadocio. Typical of the disposition of the speaker are the lines: "I've got a tombstone disposition, graveyard mind, / I know I'm bad motherfucker, that's why I don't mind dying" (Levine).

See EPIDEICTIC POETRY, POETIC CONTESTS.

■ R. D. Abrahams, Deep Down in the Jungle (1970); B. Jackson, Get Your Ass in the Water and Swim like Me (1974); L. W. Levine, Black Culture and Black Consciousness (1977); G. Smitherman, Talkin and Testifyin (1977); A. M. Reynolds, "Les Toasts de 'zonards' noirs de Los Angeles," Cahiers de littérature orale 31 (1992).

E. A. Peters

TONE (Gr. tonos, Lat. tonus, "stretching"). Tone primarily refers to the perceptible quality (*pitch, intensity or loudness, and inflection) of *sound, particularly of the spoken or sung human voice. While all langs. use tone to convey meaning, phonetics distinguishes nontonal langs., in which tone is primarily a syntactical determinant, from tonal langs., such as Mandarin Chinese, in which tone is also an essential feature of the meaning of individual words (lexical tone). While the notion of a literary tone is relatively recent, it has important precedents in cl. Gr. and Lat. rhet. and philosophy.

Cl. treatments of tone in rhet. are informed by the view that the tone of the human voice naturally expresses the emotions and attitudes of the speaker. Aristotle in the Rhetoric complains that earlier rhetoricians had not paid sufficient attention to the "delivery" of their oration, which is "a matter of voice, as to the mode in which it should be used for each particular emotion; when it should be loud, when low, when intermediate; and how the tones (tonoi), i.e., shrill, deep, and intermediate, should be used" (1403b). Aristotle's discussion relies on the notion that the tone of the human voice should be in tune with human emotion, an idea indebted to the Pythagorean-Platonist philosophy that uses a mathematical model of music to interpret the universe and the human being in terms of harmony (Spitzer). The notion that the human voice, and indeed the body, is a musical instrument that expresses the emotions tonally becomes, after Aristotle, a crucial aspect of the third and final part of rhet. (pronunciatio or actio). The mathematical-musical model is reflected in Cicero's discussion of delivery, which he finds "the dominant factor in oratory" in De oratore: "nature has assigned to every emotion a particular look and tone of voice and bearing of its own; and the whole of a person's frame and every look on his face and utterance of his voice are like the strings of a harp, and sound according as they are struck by each successive emotion" (3.212, 216). The sense that the tone of the human voice expresses the emotional state of the speaker is carried by the first vernacular variations of the word (12th c. in Fr., 14th c. in Eng.), and it is reflected by the psychological descriptors often used with the word. Although cl. rhet. discusses the significance of sound in oratory, treatments of tone are largely restrained to the literal sense of tone as the material quality of the human voice, and as such they remain part of the third and final part of rhet. (Vega Ramos).

While in the cl. rhetorical trad. discussions of the tone of the voice belong to delivery, mod. literary discourse has applied the term to written texts. From the perspective of cl. rhet., this may be considered a category mistake, and it certainly leads to complications in the mod. use of the concept. In both tonal and nontonal langs., the tone of the voice may be used to enhance and complement the semantic content of the utterance, as well as to add to, modify, or even reverse it (as in the case of *irony). While some uses of vocal tone support meaning that may be grammatically codified and may appear in script (from sentence types to emphases), the mod. literary use of tone usually refers precisely to those aspects of written lang. that are neither lexical nor syntactical, but that appear, at least at first, somewhat intangibly, as a quality of the text as a whole, or of a significant part of it.

This mod. usage of tone is often considered a metaphorical use of the original concept, but it also goes back to the original meaning of the Gr. tonos as "stretching" and "tension." Indeed, the Pythagorean-Platonist concept of the human being as instrument was not restrained to the human voice or even to sound in general, and the notion that nonaural phenomena may have tone is central in Stoic philosophy, where tone is used to describe a tensile force that holds together inimical elements at both cosmological and psychological levels. This sense of tone as a cohesive force and harmony is evident in cl. and Christian philosophy through the Middle Ages and the Ren. (Spitzer).

In the 17th c., some Eur. vernaculars began to use tone to refer to a person's character, style, and manners, as well as to the air and mood of a phenomenon or a person. Parallel with this devel., the concept was also applied to written text, often in the same sense as an expression of the author's personality, manners, or mood; Madame Sévigné wrote, in 1691, that "[mes lettres] ont des tons, et ne sont pas supportables quand elles sont ânnonées" (my letters have tones, and they are intolerable when read monotonously). This application of tone to written texts implies a shift in what may be called the rhet. of tone: while in cl. rhet., the tone of the voice belongs to the actual vocal delivery of the oration, the mod. literary sense of tone belongs to what cl. rhet. discussed under the category of style (elocutio).

Within this trad. that takes tone as a feature of the written text, we may distinguish two distinct views. In the first, tone is associated with the mood or general atmosphere of the written text. This view is esp. prominent within the Ger. trad. after J. W. Goethe, and its most important and controversial proponent is the romantic poet Friedrich Hölderlin, who in a series of difficult theoretical writings produced a theory of poetry as tonal movement (the so-called Tönewechsel doctrine). In Hölderlin's theory, the three "basic" tones of poetry correspond to the three basic genres: the heroic tone to the tragic genre, the idealist tone to the lyric genre, and the naïve tone to the epic genre. Hölderlin uses the Ger. word Ton (tone, sound) essentially synonymously with the word Stimmung (mood, attunement), a word crucial to both the poetics and the philosophy of the postromantic era.

The other trad., by contrast, tends to associate the tone of the written text with a personal attitude, whether that of the author or of an implied speaker within the text. The most influential theorist of this position in Eng. lit. crit. is Richards, who in Practical Criticism identified tone as one of the "Four Kinds of Meanings." Besides sense, feeling, and intention, Richards codified the term tone to refer to that aspect of the utterance that "reflects [the speaker's] awareness of [his] relation [to his listener], his sense of how he stands toward those he is addressing." Richards's definition is remarkable in its profound debt to cl. rhet.: tone in Practical Criticism refers to that aspect of the poem that reflects the author's awareness of how an audience might receive his discourse. While Richards's definition thus conflates the Aristotelian notions of ethos (the orator's character constructed in the oratorical performance) and pathos (the emotional response that the orator tries to obtain from an audience), it essentially identifies the tone of the text with the style of the text. Indeed, it is as such an index of authorial self-awareness that Richards considers tone to be one of the most important and most difficult aspects of poetry: "many of the secrets of 'style' could, I believe, be shown to be matters of tone, of the perfect recognition of the writer's relation to the reader in view of what is being said and their joint feelings about it." Finally, this also implies that Richards can locate the cl. rhetorical notion of propriety in the tone of the text; tone can be proper or improper, and "faults of tone are much more than mere superficial blemishes. They may indicate a very deep disorder."

While Richards's attempt to codify the literary meaning of tone had an enormous influence on *New Criticism, in more recent lit. crit. the concept has received considerably less attention, partly because of the psychological assumptions that support it in Richards's definition. Attempts have been made to sever the concept from Richards's psychological framework; thus, Ngai theorizes a notion of tone that allows one "to generalize, totalize, and abstract the 'world' of the literary object, in a way that seems particularly conducive to the analysis of ideology." Yet in an essay on treatments of lyric poetry after the New Critics, Culler has argued that, even for a critic like Smith, to interpret the poem is to "identify the concerns to which the speaker is responding and the tone of the response." If lyric poems are fictional representations of personal utterances, Culler states, "the methodological heritage of the New Critics encourages us to focus above all on the complexities of the speaker's attitude revealed over the course of the overheard utterance, and on the culmination of the poem in what Cleanth Brooks calls the 'total and governing attitude.'" He goes on to suggest that, while continental theorists were instrumental in the shift from the New Critical interest in poetic tone to a structuralist investment in narrative voice and mood (Genette), the post-New Critical era has not produced a general theory of the lyric.

The recent reluctance to use tone as an analytical concept is probably due to difficulties implied in the application of the term for written lang.: most conspicuous in Richards's definition of tone as an expression of the author's attitude to an audience is the fact that the tone of a written text is identified not in particular textual features but by its alleged effect on the reader. On the other hand, the hist. of the concept shows that tone began to be used for written texts precisely in order to refer to that intangible quality of the text that cannot be immediately accessed through an analysis of individual textual features; it is, rather, a holistic quality, something that belongs to the text as such. Indeed, the New Critics's concept of tone was never an analytical tool for poetry only; rather, tone in their sense might be characterized as a rhetorical effect common to all ling. utterances. A more accurately poetic concept of tone is implied in Stewart's discussion of sound. She asserts that, in the case of written texts, to speak about sound is to speak about the recollection of sound that the written text evokes from the reader. Stewart goes on to discuss G. M. Hopkins's theoretical writings, which define the poem as "the figure of spoken sound" and which ultimately suggest that "emotional intonation" is produced in the poem by the tension between the rhythms of speech and the poetic meter. Although this method of rhythmic *dissonance has been analyzed in the works of many other poets, it has rarely been considered as the "tone" of the poem, even though it would be a proper recycling of the term's connotation as "stretching" and "tension" for the purposes of poetics.

■ I. A. Richards, Practical Criticism (1929); G. M. Hopkins, "Rhythm and the Other Structural Parts of Rhetoric—Verse," The Journals and Papers of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. H. House (1959); L. Spitzer, Classical and Christian Ideas of World Harmony: Prolegomena to an Interpretation of the Word "Stimmung" (1963); G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan (1981); B. H. Smith, On the Margins of Discourse (1981); J. Culler, "Changes in the Study of the Lyric," Lyric Poetry: Beyond New Criticism, ed. C. Hošek and P. Parker (1985); S. Stewart, "Letter on Sound," Close Listening: Poetry and the Performed World, ed. C. Bernstein (1998); "Tone," A Dictionary of Linguistics and Phonetics, ed. D. Crystal (1992); "Tönerhetorik," Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik, ed. G. Ueding (1992–); M. J. Vega Ramos, El secreto artificio (1992); "Tone Languages" The Encyclopedia of Language and Linguistics, ed. R. E. Asher (1994); D. Wellbery, "Stimmung," Ästhetische Grundbegriffe, ed. K. Barck (2003); S. Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2005); "Ton," Le dictionnaire culturel en langue française, ed. A. Rey (2005).

D. Marno

TOPOS (Gr., literally, "place, region"; pl. topoi). A conventionalized expression or passage in a text that comes to be used as a resource for the composition of subsequent texts. The term is first used in a technical sense in cl. rhet., where it is treated under *invention and refers to a standard line of argument based on generally accepted logical probabilities such as "possible or impossible" or "greater or lesser" or "post hoc ergo propter hoc" or "a fortiori," as when it is argued, e.g., that, since Achilles gave in to wrath, it is not surprising that ordinary citizens sometimes do so too. Topoi can be specific to a certain type of discourse—demonstrative, legal, or epideictic—or common to all types. The former are eide; the latter are koinoi topoi (Lat. loci communi), which translates literally as *commonplaces. This calls attention to the enlargement of meaning of the term to include standard metaphors and "topics" such as the invocation of the Muse or the description of the ideal "pleasant place" (locus amoenus)—e.g., Eden—by poets and writers of narrative. Originally, topoi were presumably not formulas but spontaneous creations, and even in their schematized form, they are activated out of a distinct aesthetic feeling.

Topos in the sense of a standard topic is central to the approach to lit. taken by Curtius. In his system, topoi are established schemes of thought, extended *metaphors, standardized passages of description, and the like that recur in the lit. of Western Europe from Homer to the mod. age, most strikingly during the Lat. Middle Ages and the Ren. The topos constitutes a principal unifying element in this lit. Among the examples related by Curtius are the "inexpressability" topos, in which the poet describes his inability to do his subject justice (see ADYNATON); the "world upside-down" topoi (mundus inversus), in which the world's disorder is shown by fish in trees, children ruling parents, and the like; and set pieces like the locus amoenus topos. The opposite of the locus amoenus topos is the wasteland topos, which was adapted from med. sources in T. S. Eliot's poem The Waste Land. Among metaphors considered topoi by followers of Curtius are "the world as a stage," "the Book of Nature," and the "cosmic dance." Generalized in this way, the use of topoi is closely related to *imitation, and there is a legitimate sense in which many of the standard motifs of any well-established med. or early mod. genre—for instance, the Petrarchan *sonnet sequence (see PETRARCHISM) can be called topoi).

Although certain kinds of topoi are related to certain literary forms or genres, the forms and genres are not themselves topoi, since the term refers to a standardized matter rather than a structure or a regular sequence of events. Thus, the literary consolation (consolatio) has a definite shape created by its use of a selection from among a number of consolatory topoi (e.g., "all must die," "he is gone to a better world," "his memory will be eternal," "his example will lead many to virtue") but is not, itself, a topos. A perfect example of a poem that is almost a collage of such topoi plus many others from different trads. such as *pastoral is John Milton's lament for the death of his friend Edward King, "Lycidas." The remarkable vitality of topoi over centuries is illustrated by independent use of many of the same ones found in "Lycidas" over two centuries later by Matthew Arnold in "Thyrsis" and by Walt Whitman in "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd."

Later critics (e.g., H. G. Gadamer, Theodor Adorno) have taken Curtius as a point of departure for a critique of ideas of cultural unity and continuous trad. Others (e.g., Antonio Garcia-Berrio) have pointed out that the very existence of a well-defined set of topoi and conventions such as those found in the Petrarchan sonnet gives the poet a means of expressing individuality by variations on expected norms.

See COMMONPLACE, MOTIF.

■ Curtius; J. M. Lechner, Renaissance Conceptions of the Commonplaces (1962); B. Emrich, "Topik und Topoi," Deutschunterricht 18 (1966); A. R. Evans Jr., "E. R. Curtius," Four Modern Humanists, ed. A. R. Evans Jr. (1970); Topik-Forschung: Eine Dokumentation, ed. P. Jehn (1972); Topik-Forschung, ed. M. L. Baeumer (1973); Topik: Beiträge zur interdisziplinären Diskussion, ed. D. Breuer and H. Schanze (1981); F. J. D'Angelo, "The Evolution of the Analytic Topoi: A Speculative Inquiry," Classical Rhetoric and Modern Discourse, ed. R. J. Connors et al. (1984); L. Bornscheuer, "Topik," Reallexikon II; R. Wellek, "Ernst Robert Curtius als Literarkritik," Französische Literatur des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts (1986); R. J. Goebel, "Curtius, Gadamer, Adorno: Probleme literarische Tradition," Monatshefte (1986); E.P.J. Corbett, "The Topoi Revisited," Rhetoric and Praxis, ed. J. D. Moss (1986); The Return of Thematic Criticism, ed. W. Sollors (1993); E. U. Grosse, "Curtius et les Topoi," Ernst Robert Curtius et l'idée d'Europe, ed. J. Bem and A. Guyaux (1995); G. Prince, "Notes on the Categories 'Topos' and 'Disnarrated,'" Thematics Reconsidered, ed. F. Trommler (1995); C. Landauer, "Ernst Robert Curtius and the Topos of the Literary Critic," Medievalism and the Modernist Temper, ed. R. H. Bloch and S. G. Nichols (1996); R. Ceserani and C. Meiner, "Le défi de la topologie littéraire," Revue Romane 42 (2007).

O. B. HARDISON; E. H. BEHLER

TORNADA. A final short stanza, comparable to the Fr. envoi*, added to many Occitan poems as a kind of dedication to a patron or friend. In form, the tornada usually reproduces the metrical structure and the rhymes of the last part of the preceding stanza. Some poems have two or even three tornadas, addressed to different persons.

See OCCITAN POETRY.

■ U. Mölk, "Deux remarques sur la tornade," Metrica 3 (1982); Chambers.

F. M. CHAMBERS

TOTTEL'S MISCELLANY was an anthol. of Eng. poetry compiled by the printer Richard Tottel, to which he gave the title Songes and Sonettes. The first ed. was published in June 1557; an amplified second ed. appeared at the end of July. Tottel's main distinction was to offer to the public the poetry of two famous members of the court of Henry VIII, the Earl of Surrey (Henry Howard), whose name is on the title page, and Thomas Wyatt; their poems together (97 by Wyatt and 40 by Surrey) make up about half of the 271 poems in the collection. (Another 40 belong to Nicholas Grimald, and 94 are by "uncertain authors.") Surrey's and Wyatt's poems include the first known *sonnets in Eng.; Surrey's set the *rhyme scheme (ababcdcdefefgg) that comes to be known as the Eng. or Shakespearean sonnet. The importation of the sonnet comes as part of the first sustained attention in Eng. *lyric poetry to Petrarch's Canzoniere, a sequence that, in the course of the 16th c., exercises a strong influence on the devel. of vernacular lyric throughout western Europe. Surrey and Wyatt translate a number of Petrarch's poems and imitate his distinctive manner throughout their work. Collectively that work, first composed and circulated in ms. within elite circles, sets a new course for Eng. lyricism; Tottel's collection made it generally available at a propitious moment, 18 months before the accession of Elizabeth I; in its popularity, it became one of the foundational texts for Elizabethan lit. It was regularly reprinted during Elizabeth's reign; there are at least nine eds. by the end of the century, and it served as a model for a run of similar anthols. that were a major route by which Elizabethan poetry reached its readership. Tottel's collection is mentioned in Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor (1.1.198–99) as a valued practical asset in courtship and seduction.

The avant-garde Am. poet Ron Silliman published a jour. called Tottel's from 1970 to 1981, implicitly making (but also ironically disavowing) for *Language poetry what the original Tottel's was for Eng. Ren. verse, a *canon-defining event.

See ENGLAND, POETRY OF; PETRARCHISM; RENAISSANCE POETRY.

■ Tottel's Miscellany, ed. H. E. Rollins (1966); Richard Tottel's Songes and Sonettes, ed. P. A. Marquis (2007).

G. BRADEN

TOUCHSTONES. Matthew Arnold's term for "short passages, even single lines" of poetry that serve as an "infallible" resource "for detecting the presence or absence of high poetic quality and also the degree of this quality, in all other poetry which we may place beside them." The examples given in "The Study of Poetry" (1880, rpt. 1888 in Arnold's Essays in Criticism, 2d ser.) are 11 lines, three each from Homer, Dante, and Milton, and two from Shakespeare, most based on *similes. Arnold's criteria for inclusion were impersonality, "truth and seriousness," along with a commensurate "diction" and "rapid movement." Chaucer ("not one of the great classics") was excluded as lacking in "high seriousness."

Reference to such passages, according to Arnold, permits a "real estimate" rather than a merely "historic" or "personal estimate" of poetic value. Objective excellence, he believed, needed simple means of defense against historicist and impressionist critics, for whom all terms of *taste were relative. Arnold feared that democracy and consumerism would encourage, as "a vast and profitable industry," the production of a "charlatan" lit. His touchstones were to slow that devel. by making excellence accessible in anthols.

Neither the problem as Arnold formulated it nor his much-belittled solution has disappeared with time. As late as 1987, Hirsch introduced a related approach to pedagogy that was popular with those unhappy with a choice between theory-based and context-based literary study. An academic consensus, however, still rejects Arnold's solution for its ahistoricism. As Kermode put it in 2004, touchstones "cannot, for all time and for everybody, bear the broad cultural significance [Arnold] claims for them."

The method of commenting on individual lines of poetry is ancient (Longinus) and was in vogue in the 18th c. (Denis Diderot, Joseph Addison, John Dennis, Joseph Warton); but in Arnold's case, lines are cited more for their aesthetic than their moral value. His method may be closer to that of Chinese "poetry-talk" crit. (shih-hua tz'u-hua), in which, beginning in the 11th c., lines were selected for purely aesthetic appreciation, out of context.

■ J. Eels, The Touchstones of Matthew Arnold (1955); Wellek, v. 4, ch. 7; E. D. Hirsch, Cultural Literacy (1987); M. Schneider, Poetry in the Age of Democracy (1989); P. Rose, "Getting and Spending: Nostalgia for the Old Way of Reading Poetry," American Scholar 70 (2001); D. Kline, "'Unhackneyed Thoughts and Winged Words': Arnold, Locke, and the Similes of Sohrab and Rustum," VP 41 (2003); F. Kermode, Pleasure and Change (2004); J. Caufield, "'Most Free from Personality': Arnold's Touchstones of Ethics," Cambridge Quarterly 38 (2009).

J. M. PERL

TRADITION

I. Literary or Written
II. Oral

I. Literary or Written. Tradition is a term used routinely to name a line of literary works falling under a particular description, which may be generic ("the epic tradition"), historical ("the Augustan tradition"), thematic ("the modern tradition"), or composed of any combination of features ("the tradition of 19th-c. African American women's writing"). More generally, tradition has been defined as "the body of texts and interpretations current among a group of writers at a given time and place" (Cunningham)—a definition suggestive of the degree of contingency most contemp. critics ascribe to the concept. These usages seem neutral and commonsensical, but trad. is a concept implicated in almost every aspect of the crit. of poetry, and it acquired in the 20th c. a good deal of polemical baggage.

An emphasis on the traditional character of successful poetry has been a feature of crit. since Aristotle's Poetics. This emphasis reflects the premise that lit. is a highly conventional activity; that new writers develop, differently but not necessarily progressively, the forms and themes of their predecessors; that we learn to understand and to evaluate a poem by placing it first in the context of the "tradition," meaning the whole of the lit. we know, and then in the more restricted context of the trad. or trads. (e.g., "epic," "romantic") to which we judge it to belong. This contextualization may produce analyses that are structural, emphasizing formal similarities and differences, or genetic, emphasizing sources and influences, or both. Avant-garde or experimental writing is, on this view, still writing that can be understood only in terms of the trad. from which it deviates; and such writing once widely practiced may be regarded as constituting a trad. of its own.

How a poem fits into the trad., which trad. or trads. it is best understood in the context of, whether its mix of conformity and difference constitutes a "strong" or a "weak" response to the trad.—these questions are at the heart of much crit. of poetry, both scholarly and appreciative. They bear as well on the consideration of a number of central literary values, issues, and techniques: *imitation, *influence, *originality, *textuality, authority, belatedness, *allusion, appropriation, and intentionality (see INTENTION). For most of the mod. era, trads. were conceived of along national (Brit. poetry) or ling. lines (anglophone poetry). Recent crit. tends to emphasize transnational and hybrid trads. as contexts for understanding individual writers and texts.

Since the 1920s, the term has been strongly associated with Anglo-Am. modernist poetry (see MODERNISM), particularly with W. B. Yeats, Ezra Pound, and T. S. Eliot, who make prominent mention of "the" trad., referring sometimes to the whole of the literary past, more often to a single line of poetry (and other, sometimes nonliterary, writing) that the poet regards as central to the civilization and within which his own work is designed to fit. Eliot's "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919) remains the classic theoretical expression of the modernist idea. New work acquires its significance from its relation to the preexisting trad.: "For order to persist after the supervention of novelty, the whole existing order must be, if ever so slightly, altered, and so the relations, proportions, values of each work of art toward the whole are readjusted; and this is conformity between the old and the new." Eliot may have been responding to a book containing attacks on Pound's poetry and his own, Waugh's Tradition and Change (1919); "Tradition and the Individual Talent" was an attempt (hugely successful) to legitimate modernist formal innovation as "traditional" in the true sense and to condemn apparently traditional writing, e.g., the poetry of the Brit. Georgians, as merely conventional.

That the appropriation of the term by poets who seemed to many contemp. observers to be breaking with trad. was a tactical coup was made clear by essays such as Eliot's "The Metaphysical Poets" (1921), which championed 17th-c. *metaphysical poetry by arguing that it belonged to "the direct current of English poetry," with the suggestion that most Eng. poetry of the 19th c. did not. The defense of modernist poetry in the name of a continuity that leapfrogged a century or more of Eng. lit. became standard among modernism's academic champions, notably Brooks and Leavis. Eliot's insistence that poetry be judged "as poetry" was echoed by 20th-c. critics in other fields, notably Greenberg in his defense of abstract painting, "Avant-Garde and Kitsch" (1939).

In the later crit. of Eliot and in the writings of some of the New Critics, tradition and its synonyms became a homogeneous culture of Western Christendom that liberalism and secularism were accused of destroying. And even when tradition is intended in a neutral descriptive sense, connotations of orthodoxy and exclusion are difficult to avoid. Since the 1950s, the idea of "the tradition" has become clouded by the suspicion that, as Frye argued, the criteria for inclusion always involve, tacitly, extraliterary values. Crit. since the 1960s has, consequently, sometimes explicitly in reaction to Eliot and the *New Criticism, taken an interest in the politics of literary trad. making (or, more commonly, "canon-formation"; see CANON). The received trad., it has been argued, reflects the interests of a dominant culture whose ostensibly purely literary criteria in fact exclude minority or deviating voices—hence, the construction by some critics of alternative canons, defined sometimes as cohesive in their own right, sometimes as subverting the dominant trad. The interest, since the 1970s esp., in lit. by women as a discrete category of writing is the most prominent instance of this widespread trend. Motivated by different concerns, Bloom (1973) proposed a theoretical model of the relations between trad. and the individual talent to replace Eliot's. Bloom stressed the efforts of the new poet to escape the oppressive influence of his precursors—by, among other rhetorical strategies, misreading their work to make his own possible. This theory tends to support a trad. composed principally of writers, such the Brit. romantic poets, largely written out of the modernist and New Critical canon.

Crit. that uses the concept of a literary trad. as the basis of analysis is formalist: it treats lit. as an autonomous practice in which poems can be understood primarily "as poems" and in the context of other poems. On such claims are academic lit. departments founded. But (as Eliot understood) the assertion of a transhistorical trad. in a social formation—modernity—characterized by discontinuity and change is a means of claiming legitimacy. Groups in mod. societies "invent" trads. (Hobsbawm and Ranger), much as Eliot and Pound can be said to have invented theirs, and trads. also function, in such societies, as forms of social memory (Nora). The provisional and historically determined character of any so-called trad. is now widely accepted, but the basic hermeneutical issue—how to understand the relations between what is new and what is already there—remains. That question is addressed significantly in the work of Gadamer, which emphasizes the impossibility of stepping outside the interpretive matrix of one's own trad., but the general issue has absorbed the attention of critics from a variety of philosophical persuasions.

II. Oral. The 20th c. has also witnessed the rediscovery of oral poetic trads., both defunct and continuing, in cultures all over the world. With the classicist Parry, his coworker Lord, and the advent of the *oral-formulaic theory, scholars became aware of the oral traditional roots of Homer and dozens of other trads. This school of "literary anthropology" has shown how oral poets eschew the original in favor of the traditional and how they use not only a repertoire of repeated "formulas" to compose metrical lines in performance but also an array of stock narrative patterns ("themes") to move the story forward. Tradition in this sense is the sum total of all the oral performances by all the poets who practice in the culture and, thus, comes also to refer both to what lies behind the texts that are written down and to the transitional poems that derive from oral trads.

■ A. Waugh, Tradition and Change (1919); G. Murray, The Classical Tradition in Poetry (1927); J. L. Lowes, Convention and Revolt (1930); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation (1936); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939); A. Tate, Reason in Madness (1941); G. Highet, The Classical Tradition (1949); T. S. Eliot, "Tradition and the Individual Talent" [1919] and "The Metaphysical Poets" [1921], Essays (1950); Frye; H. Rosenberg, The Tradition of the New (1959); J. V. Cunningham, Tradition and Poetic Structure (1960); H. Bloom, The Visionary Company (1961); C. Greenberg, "Avant-Garde and Kitsch," Art and Culture (1961); E.M.W. Tillyard, The English Epic Tradition (1969); W. J. Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970); H. Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence (1973); H.-G. Gadamer, Truth and Method, ed. and trans. G. Barden and J. Cumming (1975); R. K. Martin, The Homosexual Tradition in American Poetry (1979); H. Bloom, The Breaking of the Vessels (1982); E. Hobsbawm and T. Ranger, Inventing Tradition (1983); Parry; J. Foley, Oral Formulaic Theory and Research (1985); Oral Tradition (1986–)—jour.; L. Menand, Discovering Modernism (1987); S. Gilbert and S. Gubar, No Man's Land, 2 v. (1987–89); L. Keller, Remaking It New: Contemporary American Poetry and the Modernist Tradition (1987); J. Foley, The Theory of Oral Composition (1988); Les Lieux de mémoire, ed. P. Nora, trans. as Realms of Memory, ed. L. Kritzman, trans. A. Goldhammer (1996–98); Lord; C. Ricks, Allusion to the Poets (2002); T. S. Eliot and the Concept of Tradition (2007), ed. G. Cianci and J. Harding.

L. Menand (written); J. M. Foley (oral)

TRAGEDY

I. Origins, Early History, and Concept
II. Performances

I. Origins, Early History, and Concept. Tragedy was invented in Greece in the 6th–5th c. BCE, its heyday and reputedly greatest poets—Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides—spanning Athens's 5th c. Scholars have speculated ever since on its derivation from a putative "tragico-lyrical chorus," the *dithyramb, or sacrifice and ritual violence: the Gr. root of the word for tragedy refers to goats. Its rites would mark a spring regenerative cycle (Murray), a break between a "Dionysiac" gloving of humans in a natural world and their rational "Apollonian" split from it (Nietzsche), or a path from inhuman asocial chaos to ordered society and culture (Girard). The tragic protagonist would be a scapegoat whose death or rejection rejuvenates, cleanses, even makes civil society. Besides being tautological, drawn from (very few) tragedies, such speculations require a purely Western idea of reason as defeating a prior absent or "savage" reason. Let us just say that tragedies act out a hardship of human effort before a determining process (fate, gods, social compulsion) that humans know imperfectly—though the very action of tragedies posits knowledge, showing and working through this condition. Tragedies insist that humans live essentially in a world of scission and rupture: human from divine, reason from unreason or emotion, written from spoken, culture from barbarism, us from others. This seems a defining facet of Western cultures, as of their judgment of other cultures. It may be why tragedy first appeared in Greece and was long limited to Western cultures. Perhaps tragedy helps defeat those ruptures. Certainly, doing so often defines mod. non-Western tragedy.

What we know of ancient tragedy draws on 33 plays from among hundreds (or thousands), a few material facts, Plato's censure, and Aristotle's Poetics. Yet the usual critical claim has been that tragedy was constant and largely homogeneous from between 536 and 533 BCE when Thespis of Athens performed a so-called tragedy at his city's Greater Dionysia. This article's first section doubts the claim and the broad speculations dependent on it. Ninety-nine percent of tragedies from the earliest centuries are lost. Facts are a dubious few. For what likely began as a duet of poet-protagonist and *chorus, Aristotle tells that Thespis invented the tragic mask: face paint, then cloth, later clay. Arion of Corinth may have developed the dithyramb. Cleisthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, perhaps dedicated to Dionysus the tragic choruses. At Phleius, Pratinas perhaps wrote the first satyr plays, whose genre then often ended an eventual set of four plays each by rival tragic poets who probably competed with one another from the start. Aeschylus is said to have been first to compose such a thematic tetralogy. He also introduced a second actor, Sophocles a third—said Aristotle a century later.

By the early 5th c., performances of the Dionysia occurred in a wooden structure built on stone footings at the southern base of the Acropolis. This and other impermanent buildings have left little trace. The first stone structure dates from the late 4th c. BCE. The theater of Dionysus visible today is a much later structure on a site that has seen many buildings. Vase paintings, reliefs, figurines, and mosaics offer glimpses of performers and performance, masks, clothing, and stage apparatus—but all "had their own plots to weave" (Hart). To draw clear dramatic facts from art forms with their own conventions is very delicate, even as they signal theater's weight in Gr. life (Hart, Taplin 2007). The chorus danced before a raised stage, accompanied by a musician (auletes) playing a double pipe. (Later, the stage was lifted higher.) The chorus was composed of citizens from one deme; actors were semiprofessional. All were male. Stage machinery included cranes, multisided revolving "flats," and other devices.

Dearth of plays is another bar to speculation on tragedy's origins and meaning. Though we have myriad fragments of 5th–4th-c. BCE tragedies, a handful survive in full: 7 each by Aeschylus and Sophocles, 18 by Euripides (plus one doubtful, Rhesus). One of the earliest poets, Phrynichos, like Choirilos, was said to have written 160 tragedies; Astydamas II, from the 4th c. BCE, 240. Aeschylus and Euripides both composed 70 to 90 plays, Sophocles 120 to 130. These are only 6 of many. Some 60 authors are known from the Hellenistic era, and records survive of competitions late into the 1st c. BCE. This implies thousands of plays. The extant corpus is tiny. Furthermore, its survival is due to far later Alexandrian anthologists, whose aims were not literary or dramatic but philological, grammatical, and rhetorical.

Finally, we have Plato and Aristotle. While the first rejected tragedy as menacing the city's good order by raising violent emotions, the second contradicted him, defining tragedy and its benefits, among them that tragedy, in fact, calmed such emotions. Aristotle stated that tragedy had six basic parts: *plot, character, *diction (poetic *style and order), thought, spectacle, and music. The first two were supreme. Later critics, scholars, and dramatists agreed that this gives tragedy's rules, its models of actual performance coming from the Greeks and Seneca. They affirmed that its aim was that of *catharsis taken vaguely as a "purging" of the spectator's emotions of pity and terror, a "medical" reduction of their force, or a "religious" emotional purification making the spectator wiser and more tolerant. Catharsis, said Aristotle, occurred through *mimesis or *representation, enabled by tragedy's structure as a linear "plot" or mythos, leading the spectator from a beginning *in medias res through a confused middle with at least one "change of fortune" (peripeteia) to an end that embodied "recognition" (anagnorisis) of earlier ignorance and new understanding. Tragedy's main protagonist was a person of high estate, neither wholly good nor bad, who suffered this experience because of a "tragic flaw" (hamartia).

Unfortunately, battles have been continual over the meaning of even these fundamentals. Catharsis has been the single most disputed term, yet it occurs but once in the Poetics. Mimesis has posed similar problems, though it is now generally agreed that it does not mean representational copying but rather depiction of what is essential to human action, enabling specific instances to be generalized as in some way typical. Mythos denotes the form of such depiction. Hamartia has also proved provocative. From the Ren. until quite lately, hamartia was interpreted as a trait close to hubris, an overweening pride, whose exemplary Ren. figures were Christopher Marlowe's Tamburlaine and Faustus: indeed, this interpretation works well when applied to the growing stress on individualism and psychological "self-understanding" increasingly depicted in late Ren. and Enlightenment tragedy. The term was then interpreted in a fundamentally ethical sense, as a moral failure for which the protagonist was personally responsible. This has now been shown not to work for Gr. drama, with its wholly different view of subject and character, and to be an erroneous interpretation of Aristotle (Vernant and Vidal-Nacquet). Closer analysis of the Poetics has shown that the term is connected not so much with lack of will (though it can imply that) as with unwittingness. Indeed, Halliwell shows that it ranges from willful evil (but is that then a "failure"?) to plain lack of knowledge. We can then say that hamartia, the so-called "tragic flaw," simply named the apparent single cause of any failure by the protagonist to act or to know, offered as such to the spectators' understanding.

Finding a generalizable ancient meaning for these terms is impossible. It would lie in the huge lost corpus. But that trying to do so can affect judgment and consideration of facts is shown by argument for a view of tragedy that is quite un-Greek, though used to assert tragedy's mod. "death," also a clearly inexact perception. As Steiner writes, "[A]ny realistic notion of tragic drama must start from the fact of catastrophe. Tragedies end badly." From the early Ren. to now, many have held this view. But for the Greeks, catastrophe was a technical device that did not have to end a tragedy, as we see in some plays (e.g., Eumenides, Philoctetes, Oedipus at Colonus, or Helen) and learn from Aristotle, who preferred fortunate endings. To see final catastrophe as defining tragedy means "we must either exclude a very large part of extant Greek tragedy or redefine tragedy or badly" (Reiss, 1980). Nor does the caveat apply only to Gr. tragedy. Were Pierre Corneille's Le Cid or Horace tragedies? What of Jean Racine's Bérénice or Nahum Tate's King Lear? Certainly, the first two contain catastrophe, but it would be a nice critic who could define their endings as unambiguous in that regard. As for Bérénice, does it even contain a catastrophe? (Does Euripides' Alcestis?) And while a contemp. reader might think Tate's Lear an absurd botching of a glorious predecessor, neither late 17th- nor 18th-c. audiences thought so: they preferred it.

The Poetics instituted a trad.; mod. philology, fresh discoveries, contextual awareness, all enjoin us to take it warily. Let us give separate due to authors and audiences of the Gr. 5th c. BCE, the Sp., Fr., and Eng. 16th–17th cs., the Ger. and Scandinavian 19th c., and those of a 20th c. running from Georg Büchner to Gerhart Hauptmann to Bertolt Brecht, Aimé Césaire, Wole Soyinka, Ola Rotimi, and Zulu Sofola; to J. P. Clark-Bekederemo, Athol Fugard, and Efua Sutherland, Ebrahim Hussein, Silvain Bemba, Maryse Condé, August Wilson, and Femi Osofisan; to the mod. Japanese film and theater trad. represented by Akira Kurosawa, Tadashi Suzuki, and Yukio Ninagawa; or to earlier Indian reuses of Shakespeare. This pell-mell list signals not just the global contemp. wealth of tragedy (clearly not "dead") but that, despite differences of hist., society, and culture, people have yet been able to believe, if not in the identity of tragedy through time and place, surely in sufficient similarity and above all utility of function or meaning. We can explore that similarity precisely by emphasizing those very historical and cultural differences. Indeed, only by so doing can we get a clear idea of what tragedy has actually done, of what has been the cultural function of tragedies in the environments where they have really existed. For it is manifest that a dramatic form called tragedy persistently recurred at times in the Western trad., and now many others, since the Greeks.

Much disputation may be avoided if we understand that Aristotle's descriptive terms had their origin in his effort to comprehend how tragedy functioned in his own time and place. For if a few facts further to those named at the start do exist in papyri, occasional remarks (e.g., by Herodotus), and vase paintings, our main source remains the Poetics, written in the mid-4th c. BCE, a century and a half later. His stated goal was to analyze tragedy's structure and function, comparing it to *epic and *comedy—the part on comedy is lost—but evidence is that he used his account of tragedy's hist. for political and ideological ends (Jones). Of the vast body of plays he knew, he stressed his favorites. One of these retains pride of place: Oedipus Rex exemplified tragedy, telling a serious, complete, and unique human action (introduced in medias res), showing its typicality and its limitation, involving people of high rank and issues vital to the whole polis, depicting characters not wholly good or bad passing through changes of fortune, recognition, and catastrophe. The play embodied tragedy's six essential parts, ending with music and spectacle.

The importance of the last two is certain. Trad. tells us that, in 5th-c. Athens, performances first occurred in the agora (marketplace), which we have no reason to doubt, the less so since we know that the tragedies of Félix Lope de Vega, Pedro Calderón de la Barca, Tirso de Molina, or Francisco de Rojas Zorilla were played in the inn yards of Golden Age Spain, those of Marlowe, Shakespeare, Thomas Middleton, and their fellows in open-air Eng. theaters, while those of many of the African dramatists named earlier also occur in public spaces. There were, too, the Caribbean and Aztec areitos, widely reported by 16th-c. Europeans, performed by "three and at times four thousand and more men [and women]" who intriguingly "represented an image of their deeds in the manner of comedy or tragedy," said Francisco Hernández, ca. 1575 (1986). Probably, he meant dramatic performance. Be that as it may, via music and spectacle, Aristotle further stressed, beside the aesthetic and emotional, the public reality of tragedy performance, its role in the polis as political and historical debate.

That Aristotle politicized aesthetic goals is no surprise. Through the 5th c. BCE, Athens (and Greece as a whole) suffered anxious political conflict. Tragedies and their authors were vitally involved from the start. In 500, the Ionian cities of Asia Minor provoked the Persian Wars. Their revolt ended in 494 with the fall of Miletos. Serious threat ended in 480–79, but war dragged on until 449. Others soon lit up. Aeschylus and Sophocles were much involved: the first fought at Marathon and Salamis. Sophocles was strategos with Pericles in the Samian war of 441–39 and again in 428; often used as an ambassador, he was a member of the ruling council after 413. Political and military events are clearly not irrelevant to the devel. of tragic drama: they give the context essential to any understanding of tragedy's role in Athenian society, and they still play such a role, offering no little explanation as to why tragedy has gone dramatically global over the last half century. Tragedies were a deeply serious forum to address political and religious issues. In 472, e.g., Aeschylus's Persians targeted Greece's war, as had Phrynichos's Capture of Miletos (performed 493–92, just a year after the fall of that city). One of the usual interpretations of Aeschylus's Oresteia (the only extant trilogy) has been that it shows passage from a society dominated by divine justice to one relying on human justice in a city the authority for whose status remains divine. (The goddess Athena finally exonerates Orestes as she simultaneously institutes a new governing order.) No one, surely, doubted the political significance of tragedies.

This draws immediate attention to a notable fact about tragedy: besides "tragedy" itself, two things are common to its several historical occurrences.

First, tragedy has occurred in eras of precarious social and political consolidation, which soon proved times of transition from one sort of society to another. In Greece, the heyday of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides fell right between the Persian and Peloponnesian wars. The first war signaled a turn from archaic Gr. society toward city-state consolidation; the second marked decay of those conflict-prone states before Macedonian hegemony and advent of a "Hellenistic world." Similarly, in the Eur. 16th and 17th cs., the great age of tragedy was also an age of warfare, incl. revolts against the Hapsburgs of Spain and of the Holy Roman Empire, religious wars in France, the Thirty Years' War, the Eng. Civil War, and the Frondes. It was an age navigating between dying feudalism and strengthening capitalism. In Germany, the age between the mid-18th and mid-19th cs. (from G. E. Lessing, Friedrich Schiller, and J. W. Goethe to Heinrich von Kleist, Friedrich Hölderlin, and Franz Grillparzer) saw transformation from the 18th-c. feuding statelets to the Prussian Customs Union of 1830, into eventual unification and empire under Otto von Bismarck. Similarly fraught places and times certainly include the Germany of two world wars and Brecht; the postwar Japan of Kurosawa's Throne of Blood (Macbeth) and Ran (Lear), and equally arresting nō-bunraku-* and kabuki-inflected workings of Medea, Oedipus Rex, The Bacchae, Troiades, and others by Ninagawa and Suzuki; the era of Caribbean and African independence struggles and their aftermath; the postwar U.S. civil rights and militaristic decades, all with their outpourings of tragedies. Tragedy again offers ways to manifest political dilemmas at times of profound social crisis and, as important, to ponder and analyze them.

Second, tragedy has in every case been followed by the consolidation of a political theory of extraordinary power: Plato and Aristotle, Thomas Hobbes and John Locke, G.W.F. Hegel and Karl Marx. Whether such will follow the tragedies of the 20th c.'s second half, it is too soon to know; but it is as if tragedy had found in its confused environment, and then related, a new conceptual and discursive process enabling certain doubts to be overcome, clearing up the incomprehensions inherent in earlier political and social decay and dissolution and facilitating instauration of a new order of rationality (Quayson, Scott). Many recent analysts have observed just how much Gr. tragedy focused on "lack of security and misplaced certainty in and about lang." (Goldhill 1986; cf. Segal 1981, 1986). The same is true of Ren. tragedy in Fr. and Eng. (Reiss 1980) and Ger. (Benjamin). Within those limits, what links tragedies is their presentation of protagonists whose will to reach some goal seems inevitably to confront limits against which they are powerless, cut off, ruptured from that objective. The limits may be self-created, imposed from without (by gods, people, or some social force), or even an inability to establish any exact sense of what is at stake (as is usual in the Ren. tragedies of George Buchanan, for instance). The result is an impasse for the protagonist—defeat, humiliation, often death. Whatever particular interpretation we may make of this, in general such drama signals a tense process in a transitional time after collapse of a stable order and before establishment of another.

II. Performances. Throughout the 5th c. BCE, tragedy had remained deeply caught up in issues both of the internal political order of an Athens whose form of government and power relations were a constant matter of debate and conflict and of external relations whose instability climaxed in the war with Sparta in 431. Final defeat came in 404. But the entire period was one of political and military struggle in which the Athenians had mounted various offensives. Among these was tragedy: Aeschylus produced his first play in 499, losing to Thespis, and took his first victory in 484, four years before Salamis. Phrynichos did a play on the fall of Miletos in 493–92, while Aeschylus won with his Persians in 472 and again with his war tragedy Seven against Thebes in 467. His Oresteia trilogy of 458 is generally seen to concern the inception of the well-ordered patriarchal city-state, even as Eumenides, its last play, can be read as a plea for concord in a city rent by factionalism. Sophocles' Antigone, a tragedy naturally read in political terms as a conflict between two perceptions of what laws rightly guide human behavior in civil society, was likely first played in the same decade or soon after. Oedipus Rex and Ajax, plays targeting right rule and the grief and madness of war, were probably produced shortly after outbreak of war with Sparta. We know that Philoctetes, a tragedy on war, betrayal, disloyalty, and dejected hope, was staged in 409. Oedipus at Colonus, apparently Sophocles' last play, was staged in 401, after Athens's defeat in 404, projecting a last plea for his city. Euripides also saw tragedy as tied to his century's political and military upheavals, seeing in them reflection of the decay and loss of trust in divine support for the city—or indeed for human life more broadly.

Contrary to what is often claimed, tragedy has less demonstrated human incapacity in face of a powerful or incomprehensible event than explained, or at least shown, what might otherwise be unintelligible. It has traced why, even how, a given group or person failed or was defeated in given conditions. The Athenians sought to build a new, trustworthy political and epistemological order. To do that, in addition to real practice, they had to create some ordered conceptual process to "enclose" whatever might elude that knowledge and order (any conceptual or political process requires selection and exclusion) and set it outside their new system. They had to find a way either to show that nothing eluded such order or to assert that it explained and understood events that did escape it. Tragedy was one of those ways, and the audience had thus to understand it. It performed order in a theater where semiprofessional actors, a representative chorus of the deme, and the citizen body gathered together on the slopes of the Acropolis within shouting distance of the Pnyx, the everyday arena of political debate (Else 1965).

As Athens neared defeat in 404 BCE (a process violently figured in Euripides' Bacchae, where state order yields to a dissolution forced by Dionysus himself, divine warrant of Gr. tragedy), tragedy became quite direct. The Bacchae and Oedipus at Colonus were performed posthumously during Athens's final defeat. They mark the end of the great age of Gr. tragedy (and Athens). The "classics" began to be played again after 385, but, in that era of "revival," tragedy was the work of itinerant professional troupes and no longer central to any city's political and cultural fabric. Never again in antiquity would it recover that role. Perhaps the lack of cultural centrality explains why from the 500 years between 5th-c. Athens and Nero's Rome, when Seneca wrote tragedies the nature of whose performances (if any) remains disputed, there survive little but fragments and titles of tragedies and their authors' names.

Tragedy was "rediscovered" by Italy, France, Spain, England, and the Netherlands in the 16th–17th cs. Seneca was the major influence, esp. in his bombastic style, but Sophocles and Euripides had mild impact. Initially, a school exercise in rhetorical composition and performance, a way to amend vernaculars and reproduce antiquity's political and ethical commonplaces, Ren. humanist tragedy rapidly took on an aura of national political commentary. It also helped create vernaculars able to rival Gr. and Lat. in expressive quality and enabled writers to forge an elite literary genre whose perfection would contribute to making the new Eur. cultures equal to those of antiquity (see RENAISSANCE POETICS). At the same time, esp. in France, tragedies became tools in real political battles: Protestant and Catholic hostilities occurred on stage as well as on the battlefield. Théodore de Beza's 1550 Abraham sacrifiant was thus answered by Étienne Jodelle's 1552 Cléopâtre captive, praising Henri II and equating him with Octavian. In Spain, the tragedies of honor by dramatists such as Lope de Vega and Calderón reflected both the glory of imperial Spain and the worries of growing internal instability and external threats. In England, the hubristic individualist tragedies of Marlowe and Shakespearean tragedies that seem to place their protagonists up against conflicts they cannot resolve gave way to the darkening tones and violence of Jacobean revenge tragedy, as if preparing for the political and military struggles to come. In France, humanist tragedy was replaced by that of the elder Corneille, Jean Mairet, Georges de Scudéry, Pierre du Ryer, François Tristan l'Hermite, and Jean Rotrou. In Corneille esp., one can follow that era's confrontations between feudal nobility and central monarchical authority, between conspiratorial conflict and state stability. That trad. was continued (in his own way) by Racine, whose tragedies are easily interpreted as a set of experiments performed on different political situations and conditions. At the same time, these plays show how individuals and circumstances threatening to social stability were overcome and removed.

Among many tragic writers of the age, Shakespeare is preeminent. Writing in *blank verse on subjects drawn from hist. or legend, he draws characters ranged against obstacles frequently not simply of their own choosing but not even of their own making: Hamlet and Macbeth introduce supernatural elements, to be sure, but these do not gravely affect the instance of choice. Richard II glories in his eloquent railing but fails by mistaking his place in a now-altered divine order. King Lear may be the most terrifying tragedy of all, in that Lear himself seems responsible for setting the heavens against him, visiting disaster on innocent and guilty victims alike in a general collapse of the realm. In France, the debate was always between the opulent elder Corneille and Racine, whose clarity of diction, paucity of display, and tautness of *alexandrine, were all unique. All three created the mod. psychological tragic figure, as Friedrich Schlegel and A. W. Schlegel and other Ger. romantic critics claimed Lope de Vega and Calderón did in Spain (though recent work suggests otherwise) and, less familiarly, the Dutch Shakespeare, Joost van den Vondel, whose 1556 Lucifer was a source of Milton's epic and a possible precursor of Goethe's Faust.

In 18th-c. Europe, tragedy became a dry effort to recover that earlier active tragedy and tended to be a pale reflection of the political and conceptual order in whose creation earlier tragedy had shared. Some work was interesting, but most offered moralistic support for an accepted order of Enlightenment rationality and political organization. Only in Germany from the mid-18th c. does tragedy attain the sort of constructive process seen in 5th-c. BCE Athens or the 16th- to 17th-c. authors just named. Lessing was the first to launch this creative tragedy, and the process culminated in Schiller, Goethe, Kleist, and Hölderlin. After 1850, Henrik Ibsen and August Strindberg are the best candidates for consideration as writers of tragedy. Yet here, characters do not really compose a realm of knowledge and action but rather address systematic truths that preexist their activities—much as did 18th-c. protagonists. Among mod. Eur. dramatists of tragedy maybe in Federico García Lorca into the Spanish Civil War and mostly in Brecht, the questions haunting the great ages of tragedy are again "constitutive." In his theatrical practice, Brecht rediscovered tragedy as a place to reflect a new systematic process in an era marked by overthrow of cultural and political order. He denied that he wrote tragedies because he accepted the still-usual critical trad. holding tragedies to show human incomprehension to be ineluctable, so he saw them as elite tools of ideological mystification. But in showing his protagonists striving to grasp a historical process they themselves make—and must make—meaningful, even as they are made by it, he adopts a practice of tragedy like that described here. In Brecht, tragedy again becomes creative of a new order and a new understanding of the social and political action enabled by such order.

But most of the provocative, productive, and even socially and politically constitutive tragedies of mod. times surely come from other parts of the world and most notably from peoples whom Europeans have one way or another oppressed. Their use of tragedy has often been to express forms of that oppression and ways to break it. In the U.S., if Lee Breuer's famed 1980s Gospel at Colonus, tying Sophocles and African American Christian gospel trads., yielded a praise song to post-civil rights comity, perhaps the most powerful U.S. tragedy from this or any other decade is August Wilson's Ma Rainey's Black Bottom, in which racist oppression and sentiment enforce the victims' self-immolation. In the 1990s, Rita Dove's The Darker Face of the Earth reworked Oedipus Rex to explore slavery, miscegenation, and a bleak aftermath of violently harmful exploitation, while in the same decade, Rhodessa Jones, rethinking Medea in prison performance, forged it into an ongoing project to free incarcerated women literally but also, through continuing self-made performances, from the social and political torments that prison iterates, exacerbates, and represents metaphorically (Fraden). In the last two decades in fact, Medea has proven to be a rich medium for new expression, esp. in Europe, Japan, and South Africa.

We have mentioned postwar Japanese reworkings of Gr. and Shakespearean tragedy in film and theater, hinting that they too have turned to tragedy as a way to reflect and analyze fraught social and political times. Long before, in the late 19th c., writers and publics in Bengal (notably) had used Shakespearean tragedy to analogous ends: to cope with inequities of colonialism, certainly, but more complicatedly with their sense both of the inferiority of their much older culture and of its already being deeply inflected by Brit. culture. Today, many Asian theaters look to Gr. tragedy, not always, sadly, for such locally driven reasons, as Diamond observes, criticizing a Malay-lang. production, the Beijing Opera, and Taiwan's Contemporary Legend Theatre for what she sees as "multicultural" performances of The Bacchae and Oresteia aimed less at a local spirit of place than at a global, chiefly Eur. audience. This may, of course, have a less "kitsch" future in an ever more globalizing world and, in that changing context, come to speak constructively and constitutively. That remains to be seen, as does the future of the mod. Arab theater's striking use of Oedipus (Carlson; Decreus and Kolk) and, again, reworkings of Shakespeare.

Soyinka (1994) has fun with this, suggesting that Shakespeare got Romeo and Juliet, at least, from the Arabs, even as he notes how much Arab poets and dramatists translated or adapted Shakespeare from the late 19th c. on. Soyinka is himself among those who have done much to transfer tragedy between cultures. His The Bacchae of Euripides (1973) makes that play a reflection on colonialism and performance of a "communion rite" that rethinks a decolonizing culture and society, defeating ruptures of slavery and rule, belief and disbelief, freedom and force, while Death and the King's Horseman (1975) reflects from inside Yoruba hist. on the violent distortions inherent in unequal conflicts of different cultures. Here, too, hope for a future community is held. Katrak remarks that "the goal of Yoruba tragedy is to energize the community at the conclusion; therefore, the need for calamitous endings is eliminated. The resolution lies not in the protagonist's death but in his bringing new strength into the communal life-blood." This is true of much other African tragedy and is one of the ways that African tragedies in particular reply to Western tragedy.

Soyinka is one among many African dramatists who use tragedy to meditate on conditions of violently stressed change. Sometimes they again adapt the Greeks, sometimes they use reminders of Gr. tragedy as elements in a plot otherwise entirely locally based, but sometimes no direct reference outside African culture is apparent. Of the first, one could mention Sutherland's Edufa (Alcestis), Osofisan's Tegonni (Antigone) and Women of Owu (The Trojan Women), Rotimi's The Gods Are Not to Blame (Oedipus), Soyinka's Bacchae, and many others. Of the second, Fugard's The Island (Antigone), Bemba's Noces posthumes de Santigone, and Clark-Bekederemo's Song of a Goat are good examples; of the third, Ama Ata Aidoo's Anowa, Hussein's Kinjeketile, Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o and Micere Mugo's Trial of Dedan Kimathi, and Sony Labou Tansi's La parenthèse de sang (Parentheses of Blood).

Their political probings tend to be focused via four overlapping narratives. One involves colonization and its horrors; a second, conflicts that enfeebled cultures before colonial onslaught; a third, current struggles of cultural values, often entailing failures of combative will and act; a fourth, neocolonialism and its elites' crimes and corruptions. All mean to inform and enable political action. Rotimi's Ovonramwen Nogbaisi (1974) typifies the first (Rotimi said it also did the fourth), exploring the ruin of the Empire of Benin by an Eng. army: death of a culture, end of an era, loss of values. A noted case of this narrative is the Swahili dramatist Hussein's Kinjeketile (1970), relating the 1906 Maji Maji uprising against Ger. colonizers in southern Tanganyika. Aidoo's Anowa (1970) tells this narrative otherwise, showing how Kofi Ako's collusion with the colonists in the 1870s enriches but crushes him, his wife Anowa, and trad. Rotimi's Kurunmi (1971) epitomizes the second narrative, telling of a precolonial war to uphold traditional against new deforming values. Sofola's Old Wines Are Tasty (1981) portrays the third, its strife between trad. and neocolonialism baldly direct, ending in the death of the latter's misguided delegate. Césaire's Une saison au Congo exemplifies the fourth, notably in its final version (1973), which ends not with its sanza player's optimistic banter toward a new future but with the tyrant Mokutu publicly rehabilitating the Lumumba he has murdered yet, enraged by the crowd's joy, ordering his guards to shoot, killing many, including the sanza player. Similarly, Rotimi's 1979 If acidly shows the poverty, the abuse of the people, and "the tragedy of the ruled" and savagely damns the corrupt wealth and misused power of neocolonial elites. Labou Tansi's "tragic farce" La parenthèse de sang, also from 1979, condemns equally ferociously the dictatorial corruption rampant in Zaire, ending with a stage covered in blood (as the play's title implies).

Not a few of these plays echo Soyinka's Bacchae in offering hope and a new community. Kinjeketile's eponymous hero dies, but in doing so offers a path to collective unity and power to resist. Bemba's Santigone (1988), a tragedy of neocolonial corruption inspired by Sophocles' Antigone, turns that play against its trad., damning division and the agony it depends on: Melissa Yadé, Antigone, will die in the end in a plane crash, but she and her death will live in people's memory to inspire them to a new future. Much the same is true of Rotimi's The Gods Are Not to Blame (1968), which ends with Odewale, Oedipus but also Ogun, walking off with his children at the end, leaving a reformed village community behind but taking to the road again (like the god he represents), always with the hope of forging another new community. Many of these plays, too, incorporate debate about the uses and force of tragedy in their very structure and dialogue: this is esp. the case in Clark-Bekederemo's Song of a Goat (1961), from its title to its characters to its dialogue a self-conscious working of Gr. tragedy to capture a local collective reality.

Much such tragedy, we saw, has no Gr. reference. Rotimi's Ozidi (1966) takes local trads., song, dance, and dialogue. Played a year before the outbreak of the Biafran War as tensions grew to a peak, it also pleads to be read as reflecting those events, as Rotimi's Gods was during them and Soyinka's Bacchae after. Labou Tansi's Parenthèse uses a healing ceremony, kingizila, as the basis for its tragic ridiculing of neocolonial doublespeak and violence. Nor does tragedy in Africa always make colonization, its forerunners and aftermath, its focus—or it may do so only obliquely. Sofola's Wedlock of the Gods (1972) is a kind of Romeo and Juliet story, concerned with how a series of breached taboos ensuant on greed for wealth ends in disaster not only for the two main protagonists, whose death ties them in a "wedlock of the gods," but for entire families and the community—community being usually, one way or another, a major concern of these tragedies.

A similarly enormous wealth of explorations in tragedy has occurred in the Caribbean. Best known, no doubt, are Césaire's Saison and La tragédie du roi Christophe, which focus on the Haitian revolution and, not unlike Kinjeketile and others, hold hope for a new future community. This is poles apart from Derek Walcott's earlier Henri Christophe (1949), which tells of a revolt whose leadership is awash in self-interest and the venalities of power. One could also mention Condé's 1972 Dieu nous l'a donné and 1973 Mort d'Oluwémi d'Ajumako, whose first follows the failures and pettiness of Caribbean colonialism into disaster, but whose second shows how the appropriation of death can be turned into a claim for the power of a threatened culture. Kamau Brathwaite's Odale's Choice again uses Antigone. Many Caribbean playwrights have turned to Gr. tragedy to forge local commentary: the Haitian Félix Morisseau-LeRoy's Antigone en creole (1953); the Cuban Antón Arrufat's prize-winning Los siete contra Tebas (1968), which was, however, banned from the Cuban stage as being a censure of the revolution (which it was not, though it certainly criticized aspects of what the revolution had become ten years later); the Puerto Rican Luis Rafael Sánchez's La pasión según Antigona Pérez (1968).

All this just scratches the surface. Tragedy is alive and well in part because, as Quayson observes, it gives an ordered way to set "real-life events . . . in the emotionally and philosophically charged discourse of literary tragedy." He risks the example that to see Sani Abacha's murder of Ken Saro-Wiwa (who wrote of his Ogoni people's genocide as a "tragedy") in this tragic prism "arouse[s] a silent people into engagement with their history." Similarly, Scott argues from a rereading of C.L.R. James's hist. of the Haitian Revolution, which he shows between its first and second ed. transformed its narrative from one of romance to one of tragedy, that tragedy allows its spectators (or readers) to apply a particular sort of plot to historical events, a particular order that lets them become actors envisaging, planning for, avoiding, and changing outcomes. This is, of course, why from the start, tragedies marked transitional times in societies in transformation, always (so far) being followed by powerful analytic political theories producing actual polities and real-life consequences and outcomes. Whether these mod. tragedies will entail such theories (or have already done so), they certainly play the same reflective role.

See CLASSICAL POETICS, DRAMATIC POETRY, GENRE, GREEK POETRY, TRAGICOMEDY.

■ F. Nietzsche, Die Geburt der Tragödie (The Birth of Tragedy, 1872); A. C. Bradley, Shakespearean Tragedy (1904); C. J. Sisson, Shakespeare in India (1926); A. Pickard-Cambridge, Dithyramb, Tragedy and Comedy (1927); G. Murray, Aeschylus, the Creator of Tragedy (1940); G. F. Else, Aristotle's Poetics (1959); H.D.F. Kitto, Greek Tragedy, 3d ed. (1961); E. Olson, Tragedy and the Theory of Drama (1961); G. Steiner, The Death of Tragedy (1961); J.H.F. Jones, On Aristotle and Greek Tragedy (1962); G. F. Else, The Origin and Early Form of Greek Tragedy (1965); A. Lesky, Greek Tragedy (1965); R. Williams, Modern Tragedy (1966); B. M. Knox, The Heroic Temper: Studies in Sophoclean Tragedy (1966); N. Frye, Fools of Time: Studies in Shakespearean Tragedy (1967); C. Leech, Tragedy (1969); R. Girard, La violence et le sacré (1972); B. Vickers, Towards Greek Tragedy (1973); W. Soyinka, Myth, Literature and the African World (1976); W. Benjamin, The Origin of German Tragic Drama, trans. J. Osborne (1977); G.W.F. Hegel, Hegel on Tragedy, ed. A. Paolucci and H. Paolucci (1978); O. Taplin, Greek Tragedy in Action (1978); B. M. Knox, Word and Action (1979); R. B. Sewall, The Vision of Tragedy, 2d ed. (1980); T. J. Reiss, Tragedy and Truth (1980); J. Orr, Tragic Drama and Modern Society (1981); M. S. Silk and J. P. Stern, Nietzsche on Tragedy (1981); C. Segal, Tragedy and Civilization (1981); J. Dollimore, Radical Tragedy (1984); G. Steiner, Antigones (1984); C. Belsey, The Subject of Tragedy (1985); H. P. Foley, Ritual Irony: Poetry and Sacrifice in Euripides (1985); G. F. Else, Plato and Aristotle on Poetry (1986); S. Goldhill, Reading Greek Tragedy (1986); Greek Tragedy and Political Theory, ed. J. P. Euben (1986); S. Halliwell, Aristotle's Poetics (1986); F. Hernández, Antigüedades de la Nueva España (1986); K. H. Katrak, Wole Soyinka and Modern Tragedy (1986); M. C. Nussbaum, The Fragility of Goodness: Luck and Ethics in Greek Tragedy and Philosophy (1986); C. Segal, Interpreting Greek Tragedy (1986); N. Loraux, Tragic Ways of Killing a Woman (1987); J.-P. Vernant and P. Vidal-Nacquet, Myth and Tragedy in Ancient Greece, trans. J. Lloyd, rev. ed. (1988); E. Hall, Inventing the Barbarian: Greek Self-Definition through Tragedy (1989); Nothing to Do with Dionysos: Athenian Drama in Its Social Context, ed. J. J. Winkler and F. I. Zeitlin (1989); M. J. Smethurst, The Artistry of Aeschylus and Zeami: A Comparative Study of Greek Tragedy and Nō (1989); J. P. Euben, The Tragedy of Political Theory (1990); M. McDonald, Ancient Sun, Modern Light: Greek Drama on the Modern Stage (1992); C. Meier, The Political Art of Greek Tragedy (1993); F. Macintosh, Dying Acts: Death in Ancient Greece and Modern Irish Tragic Drama (1994); W. Soyinka, Art, Dialogue, and Outrage: Essays on Literature and Culture, 2d ed. (1994); T. Olaniyan, Scars of Conquest, Masks of Resistance: The Invention of Cultural Identities in African, African-American and Caribbean Drama (1995); The Cambridge Companion to Greek Tragedy, ed. P. E. Easterling (1997); J. Drakakis and N. C. Liebler, Tragedy (1998); L. A. Johnson, Shakespeare in Africa (and Other Venues): Import and the Appropriation of Culture (1998); C. Diamond, "The Floating World of Nouveau Chinoiserie: Asian Orientalist Productions of Greek Tragedy," New Theater Quarterly 15 (1999); (Dis)Placing Classical Greek Theatre, ed. S. Patsalidis and E. Sakellaridou (1999); D. A. Shankar, Appropriating Shakespeare (A Study of Shakespeare's Plays Rendered into Kannada between 1895–1932) (1999); Shakespeare in Indian Languages, ed. D. A. Shankar (1999); Medea in Performance, 1500–2000, ed. E. Hall, F. Macintosh, O. Taplan (2000); R. Fraden, Imagining Medea: Rhodessa Jones and Theater for Incarcerated Women (2001); A. D. Nuttall, Why Does Tragedy Give Pleasure? (2001); Amid Our Troubles: Irish Versions of Greek Tragedy, ed. M. McDonald and J. M. Walton (2002); T. J. Reiss, "The Law, the Tragic and Cultures of Dissonance," Against Autonomy: Global Dialectics of Cultural Exchange (2002); K. J. Wetmore Jr., The Athenian Sun in an African Sky: Modern African Adaptations of Classical Greek Tragedy (2002), and Black Dionysus: Greek Tragedy and African American Theatre (2003); T. Eagleton, Sweet Violence: The Idea of the Tragic (2003); M. McDonald, The Living Art of Greek Tragedy (2003); A. Quayson, Calibrations (2003); Dionysus since 69: Greek Tragedy at the Dawn of the Third Millennium, ed. E. Hall, F. Macintosh, A. Wrigley (2004); Rereading Classics in "East" and "West": Post-Colonial Perspectives on the Tragic, ed. F. Decreus and M. Kolk (2004); D. Scott, Conscripts of Modernity: The Tragedy of Colonial Enlightenment (2004); A Companion to Tragedy, ed. R. Bushnell (2005)—esp. T. J. Reiss, "Using Tragedy against Its Makers: Some African and Caribbean Instances"; The Arab Oedipus: Four Plays, ed. M. Carlson (2005); V. Lambropoulos, The Tragic Idea (2006); B. Goff and M. Simpson, Crossroads in the Black Aegean: Oedipus, Antigone, and Dramas of the African Diaspora (2007); O. Taplin, Pots and Plays: Reflections of Tragedy and Comedy in Greek Painted Pottery of the Fourth Century B.C. (2007); Rethinking Tragedy, ed. R. Felski (2008); A.C.Y. Huang, Chinese Shakespeares (2009); Sophocles and the Greek Tragic Tradition, ed. S. Goldhill and E. Hall (2009); E. Hall, Greek Tragedy: Suffering under the Sun (2010); The Art of Ancient Greek Theater, ed. M. L. Hart (2010).

T. J. Reiss

TRAGICOMEDY. A term that refers to *tragedies, melodrama, and ironic drama that contain comic scenes or characters. The earliest plays mixing such elements are those of Euripides (ca. 480–406 BCE), e.g., Alcestis; Aristotle remarks on a public taste for plays in which bad characters came to a bad end and good characters survived happily (Poetics 13). Plautus (ca. 254–184 BCE) coined the term tragicomedy, applying it to his Amphitruo, a play anomalous in its time for mixing noble and humble characters as well as serious and comic action. However, Plautus established no clear generic form (Herrick), and the forms of liturgical drama in the Middle Ages precluded tragicomedy. It began to emerge only in the Ren., when both Neo-Lat. and vernacular plays adapted cl. Lat. comic forms to the dramatization of biblical narrative. A number of them, such as George Gascoigne's (1534–77) Glass of Government, mix melancholy material with endings that avoid catastrophe and include explicit moral lessons.

Secular tragicomedy became firmly established in Italy in the plays of Giambattista Giraldi Cinthio (1504–73), though he is careful to avoid commitment to the idea of a separate genre. His essay Discorso intorno al comporre dei romanzi (Discourse on the Composition of Romances, 1554) identifies two kinds of tragedy, one ending in sorrow, the other in happiness. Cinthio prefers the second: "Plots that are terrible because they end unhappily (if it appears the spirits of the spectators abhor them) can serve for closet dramas; those that end happily for the stage" (Gilbert, Herrick).

What Cinthio calls a type of tragedy, Giovanni Battista Guarini (1538–1612), the most important Ren. partisan, openly and extensively defends as tragicomedy. In his Compendium of Tragicomic Poetry (1601), Guarini's argument, like that of Cinthio, places its main theoretical emphasis on audience response, but more than a happy ending is involved. He regards tragedy, as Aristotle defines it, as less likely to settle the troubled passions of the audience than tragicomedy. He proposes, therefore, to retain compassion and forgo horror. Hence, his definition of tragicomedy as a mean between affective extremes: "the mingling of tragic and comic pleasure, which does not allow hearers to fall into excessive tragic melancholy or comic relaxation" (Gilbert).

Guarini's aim is to produce a balanced and harmonized state in the soul of the spectator by means of tightly plotted comic intrigues moving from potential disaster to a happy conclusion. Guarini would retain elevated or distinguished protagonists but situate them in private, domestic experience. More important perhaps is the paradigm he establishes for character devel.: in his Il pastor fido (The Faithful Shepherd, 1590) he employs for his protagonist Silvio the *topos of inner transformation from scorning to acceptance of love, "a natural metaphor for his conception of tragicomedy as a genre that functions as a medicine to purge the human temperament of excesses and so bring men, like Silvio, to a happier balance" (Cope).

One of the chief inheritors of both the romantic plots of Cinthio and the pattern of inner change formulated by Guarini was Shakespeare, though, with the exception of The Tempest, he inclined to a much greater looseness of plot and everywhere mingled levels of character and incongruous subjects in successful defiance of neoclassical principles of *decorum. An indifference to rules of structure or decorum was standard in Eng. Ren. drama, and the habit of mixing the serious and the farcical, even in plays nominally identified as tragic, such as Dr. Faustus or King Lear, seriously undermined neoclassical concepts of *genre. In Shakespeare's later plays and in some of the work of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher, the presence of tragicomedy is evident in the encouragement of paradoxical responses through the mixture of fantastic event and moral redemption. In The Winter's Tale, there is repeated stress on artifice, as in Hermione's long survival as a statue, where adherence to the rules would require verisimilitude.

Fr. theater of the 17th c. tended to a more rigorous observance of imposed standards and, hence, to less theoretical tolerance of tragicomedy, though Pierre Corneille's Le Cid is a tragedy with a happy ending, and his self-justifying "Discourse on Tragedy" (1660) argues, as Guarini had, that the catastrophic ending was not the best kind. Hence, his tragedies can be viewed as tragicomic under a different name, and Le Cid as "the supreme flowering of neoclassical tragicomic romance" (Hirst; see Lancaster for discussion of tragicomedy as a dominant genre in 16th- and early 17th-c. France). There are elements of tragicomedy in the work of Molière as well, as in Le Misanthrope. In Eng., the 17th and early 18th c. witnessed radically opposed opinions on tragicomedy. John Milton decries the "error of intermixing Comic stuff with Tragic sadness and gravity" (Preface to Samson Agonistes), a view echoed by Joseph Addison (Spectator no. 40). But John Dryden in his Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668) approves of tragicomedy as more natural and indeed wrote several plays in that mode. Samuel Johnson's judgment is prophetic of more recent views: "Is it not certain that the tragic and comic affections have been moved alternately with equal force and that no plays have oftener filled the eye with tears and the breast with palpitation than those which are ariegated with interludes of mirth?" (Rambler no. 156).

With the decline of verse drama and the relaxing of firm generic standards, tragicomedy becomes associated with 19th-c. popular melodrama and the more cerebral plays of G. B. Shaw and Anton Chekhov (Hirst). Two formal patterns can be identified in the 19th c.: one largely involves the rescue of sympathetic victims at the last minute, continuing the emphasis on careful and suspenseful plotting established by Guarini; the other is more a matter of tone, a mixing of attitudes toward character and event that tends toward a drama of ironies. Thus, the critical and theoretical terms for discussion of tragicomedy emphasize audience response over formal or generic contexts or patterns of character change. Twentieth-c. drama ignored such considerations as the social status of characters, consistency in levels of lang., and decorum in subject matter, deliberately mixing tragic and comic elements without any attempt at the harmony and balance advocated by Guarini. As in T. S. Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral, the audience may be encouraged simultaneously to tragic empathy and comic detachment; and complexity of tone and, hence, of response become common features of mod. dramas as diverse as those by Shaw and Chekhov and the writers of the Theater of the Absurd.

See COMEDY, DRAMATIC POETRY.

■ H. C. Lancaster, The French Tragicomedy (1907); H. Corbach, "Tragikomödie," Reallexikon I, v. 4; K. S. Guthke, Geschichte und Poetik der deutschen Tragikomödie (1961); M. T. Herrick, Tragicomedy (1962); G. Guarini, The Compendium of Tragicomic Poetry, excerpted in Literary Criticism Plato to Dryden, ed. A. Gilbert (1962); J. L. Styan, The Dark Comedy (1962); C. Hoy, The Hyacinth Room (1964); K. Guthke, Modern Tragicomedy (1966); J. Hartwig, Shakespeare's Tragicomic Vision (1972); J. Cope, The Theater and the Dream (1973); M. Esslin, Theatre of the Absurd, 3d ed. (1980); B. J. Bono, Literary Transvaluation from Vergilian Epic to Shakespearean Tragicomedy (1984); M. Carlson, Theories of the Theatre (1984); D. L. Hirst, Tragicomedy (1984); P. Hernadi, Interpreting Events (1985); R. Dutton, Modern Tragicomedy and the British Tradition (1986); J. Orr, Tragicomedy and Contemporary Culture (1990); The Politics of Tragicomedy: Shakespeare and After, ed. G. McMullan (1992); L. Cabranes-Grant, "La resistencia a la tragicomedia: Giraldi Cintio y una polemica sobre 'Celestina,'" Celestinesca 22 (1998); R. Barker, "Tragical-Comical-Historical Hotspur," ShQ 54 (2003); V. A. Foster, The Name and Nature of Tragicomedy (2004); T. Miller, "Ridiculously Modern Marsden: Tragicomic Form and Queer Modernity," Modernist Cultures 2 (2006); Z. Lesser, "Tragical-Comical-Pastoral-Colonial: Economic Sovereignty, Globalization, and the Form of Tragicomedy," ELH 74 (2007); V. Forman, Tragicomic Redemptions (2008); T. Pollard, "Romancing the Greeks: Cymbeline's Genres and Models," How to Do Things with Shakespeare, ed. L. Maguire (2008); C. Nocentelli, "Spice Race: The Island Princess and the Politics of Transnational Appropriation," PMLA 125 (2010).

R. L. MONTGOMERY; R. GREENE

TRANSCENDENTALISTS. Am. transcendentalist poets and cultural theorists were part of a loosely organized mid-19th-c. intellectual movement centered in New England (primarily Concord, Massachusetts, and the Boston area). The term transcendentalists derives from the unsystematic connection of their thought to the idealist philosophy of Immanuel Kant, as they emphasize attributes of reality that in part transcend sensual perception. The transcendentalists served as the most important conduit of Eur. *romanticism to America. Leading figures include R. W. Emerson (1803–82), H. D. Thoreau (1817–62), and Sarah Margaret Fuller (1810–50). Members of the circle met periodically, sometimes as the Transcendental Club, and produced The Dial (1840–44) under the editorship of Fuller, then Emerson. The Dial published a significant number of their texts. Although better known for their prose—Emerson's addresses, lectures, and essays; Fuller's Woman in the Nineteenth-Century (1845); and Thoreau's "Resistance to Civil Government" (or "Civil Disobedience," 1849) and Walden (1854)—the transcendentalists wrote much pub. and unpub. verse and accorded poetry a primary cultural role. Their theories of poetry, esp. those of Emerson, are indispensable to Am. romanticism and much subsequent Am. poetry.

For all their differences, shared tendencies of their poetry are clear. Notions of divinity are particularly important to the poets, but they depart from traditional theism to locate divinity not within conventional religious figures, institutions, and texts but within humankind, nonhuman nature, life itself, and a wide diversity of writings. Unlike Unitarianism, from which most transcendentalists emerged, transcendentalism celebrates enthusiasm, *emotion, *imagination, and *intuition over moderation, cognition, and tuition. Key terms, derived from Emerson, include self-reliance and nonconformity, by which he means not hyperindividuality but reliance on oneself instead of on dominant social structures or popular opinion for one's beliefs. The transcendentalists stress both the infinite value and potential of all individuals and social reform. Their faith in a definitive interconnection among beauty, truth, goodness, joy, and action led to their involvement in such political and social issues as abolition, women's rights, poverty, and the Italian Revolution; and the formation of two communes, Brook Farm and Fruitlands. Seeking revolutionary ways of thinking and writing, they address a wide range of topics, incl. philosophy, national cultures, education, and science. Through their interest in J. W. Goethe, William Wordsworth, S. T. Coleridge, and Asian literary and religious texts, the transcendentalists paradoxically aspire to create uniquely Am. voices but also broadly to affirm global culture.

Transcendentalist poetry treats the beauty and sacredness of bucolic nature, self-actualization, the power of poetry and of the imagination, and political reform. Formally, the transcendentalists emphasize matter over manner; Emerson famously claims in his essay "The Poet," "It is not metres, but a metre-making argument, that makes a poem." Their forms are relatively conventional, but they engage in considerable experimentation within them. Often, their poetry contains compressed orphic utterances—epigrammatic proverbs or assertions—sometimes in interpolated voices. Heavily influenced by 17th-c. Brit. poets, esp. George Herbert and John Milton, they consider Shakespeare the quintessential poet in Eng. even as they emphasize the need for distance from him.

The most important transcendentalist poet is Emerson, who played a central role in encouraging other transcendentalist poets, as well as Walt Whitman. Emerson published over 200 poems and trans. (often from Ger. versions of *Persian poets, esp. Ḥāfiẓ), many of them collected in his two main books of poetry, Poems (1847) and May-Day and Other Pieces (1867). Poems, the more groundbreaking volume, includes most of Emerson's best-known pieces, among them, "The Sphinx," "The Rhodora," "The Snow-Storm," "Hamatreya," "Bacchus," "Uriel," "Concord Hymn," and the elegy for Emerson's young son, "Threnody." May-Day is best read with Herman Melville's Battle-Pieces and Whitman's Drum-Taps as a response to the Am. Civil War. The volume represents poetry as a call to justice, a reminder of natural beauty, and a balm to heal suffering after the conflict. Among its best poems are "Brahma," "Boston Hymn," "Voluntaries," "Days," "Two Rivers," "Waldeinsamkeit," and "Terminus."

Thoreau wrote a great deal of poetry early in his life, then turned his primary attention to prose. Esp. prolific as a poet from 1839 to 1843, Thoreau produced over 200 poems and published 85 in some form, many in his prose work A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers (1849). Some poems treat his youthful sense of inadequacy ("Sic Vita"), but most celebrate nature. The few poems that Fuller published appear in her nonfiction prose, esp. Summer on the Lakes (1843) and Woman in the Nineteenth Century. Yet she wrote a significant amount of poetry, esp. in the mid-1840s. Some of her best poems—"Double Triangle, Serpent and Rays," "Sistrum," "Winged Sphynx," and "Raphael's Deposition from the Cross"—employ mythic female emblems to depict feminist self-actualization through the attainment of combined power and equilibrium.

Although he wrote poetry much of his life, Jones Very (1813–60) is remembered for his ecstatic, visionary religious sonnets. Written from 1838 to 1849, the poems appear in sometimes mingled voices of the godhead and the poet himself. Although Very was for a time psychologically unmoored and briefly incarcerated in an asylum, Emerson encouraged him, editing the one book Very published in his lifetime, Essays and Poems (1839).

Among the other transcendentalist poets, Christopher Pearse Cranch (1813–92), poet, painter, caricaturist, is the strongest, with such poems as "Enosis" and "Correspondences" that versify transcendentalist philosophy. William Ellery Channing (the Younger, 1817–1901) was the most prolific, publishing periodical verse and eight books of poetry from 1843 to 1886 that treat nature, solitude, and poetic aspiration, and furnish portraits of other transcendentalists. He was also the most criticized, famously by E. A. Poe, for technical flaws and incoherence; Emerson and Fuller almost alone defended him. Ellen Sturgis Hooper (1812–48) and her sister Caroline Sturgis Tappan (1818–88) also published poems in The Dial. Bronson Alcott (1799–1888), father of Louisa May Alcott, published verse in periodicals and within his prose volumes in the period 1860–80, as well as producing the autobiographical New Connecticut (1881) and Sonnets and Canzonets (1882).

The influence of the transcendentalists remains disproportionate to the small size and brief duration of the initial movement. Whitman and Emily Dickinson, their most direct descendants, reflect close thematic similarities. Tonally and formally, Whitman's poetry tends to resemble Emerson's prose, and Dickinson's poetry often resembles Emerson's poetry (one of her anonymously pub. poems was attributed to him). Transcendentalist influence has also spanned the globe. Thoreau and Emerson were important to Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr., and Fuller promoted internationalism by serving as a foreign correspondent. In his essay "Emerson," the Cuban revolutionary and poet José Martí calls Emerson's poems "the only polemic verse to sanctify the great struggle on this earth." Some 20th-c. poets wrote of their indebtedness to Emerson's prose and poetry, among them Robert Frost, A. R. Ammons, and Mary Oliver, while other poets acknowledged their admiration for Thoreau and Fuller. In some senses, much U.S. postromantic, ecopolitical, and social-reform poetries continue and sometimes contest the transcendentalist trads.

See GERMAN POETRY; ROMANTIC AND POSTROMANTIC POETRY AND POETICS; ROMANTICISM; UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: The American Transcendentalists (1957) and The Transcendentalists, both ed. P. Miller (1958); The Dial, 4 vs., rpt. (1961); H. D. Thoreau, Collected Poems, enl. ed., ed. C. Bode (1964); W. E. Channing II, Collected Poems, ed. W. Harding (1967); C. P. Cranch, Collected Poems, ed. J. M. DeFalco (1971); M. Fuller, The Essential Margaret Fuller, ed. J. Steele (1992); American Poetry: The Nineteenth Century, Vol. I, ed. J. Hollander (1993); J. Very, Complete Poems, ed. H. R. Deese (1993); Ralph Waldo Emerson: Collected Poems and Translations, ed. H. Bloom and P. Kane (1994); Transcendentalism, ed. J. Myerson (2000); H. D. Thoreau, Henry David Thoreau: Collected Essays and Poems, ed. E. H. Witherell (2001); The American Transcendentalists, ed. L. Buell (2006).

■ Criticism: O. B. Frothingham, Transcendentalism in America (1876); L. Buell, Literary Transcendentalism (1974); H. H. Waggoner, Emerson as Poet (1974); D. Porter, Emerson and Literary Change (1978); R. A.

Yoder, Emerson and the Orphic Poet in America (1978); The Transcendentalists, ed. J. Myerson (1984)—esp. essays by R. E. Burkholder and Myerson (Emerson), F. C. Dahlstrand (Alcott), F. B. Dedmond (Channing), R. N. Hudspeth (Fuller), M. Meyer (Thoreau), D. Robinson (Cranch and Very); L. Buell, "The American Transcendentalist Poets," Columbia History of American Poetry, ed. J. Parini (1993); Encyclopedia of American Poetry: The Nineteenth Century, ed. E. L. Haralson (1998)—esp. H. R. Deese (Very), L. Honaker (Cranch), P. T. Kane (Emerson), J. Steele (Fuller), K. Walter (Channing), E. H. Witherell (Thoreau), G. R. Woodall (Alcott); S. Morris, "'Metre-Making' Arguments: Emerson's Poems," Cambridge Companion to Ralph Waldo Emerson, ed. J. Porte and S. Morris (1999); B. Packer, "The Transcendentalists," Cambridge History of American Literature, ed. S. Bercovitch, v. 4 (2004); The Oxford Handbook of Transcendentalism, ed. J. Myerson, S. H. Petrulionis, and L. D. Walls (2010), esp. S. Morris, "Twentieth-Century Poetry."

■ Websites: The Emerson Society: http://www.cas.sc.edu/engl/emerson/; The Margaret Fuller Society: http://mendota.english.wisc.edu/~jasteele/index.html/; The Ralph Waldo Emerson Institute: http://www.rwe.org/; The Thoreau Society: http://www.thoreausociety.org/; The Web of American Transcendentalism: http://www.vcu.edu/engweb/transcendentalism/.

S. Morris

TRANSLATION. "Till I heard Homer speak out loud and bold": many readers know that the eighth line of John Keats's famous sonnet "On First Looking into Chapman's Homer" (1817) does not read this way. Why not? The legendary Gr. name fits the iambic beat as neatly as the less venerable "Chapman" that takes its place. Through this unexpected substitution, Keats calls attention to the key role that trans. plays in the transmission and creation of poetic culture. By relying on a trans., Keats admits that he cannot read the original Gr., as his university-educated precursors and contemporaries might have. He also flaunts his unorthodox taste by spurning Alexander Pope's then-standard trans. in favor of George Chapman's less favored Ren. version. He raises, moreover, the vexed issue of the translator's relationship to his or her poetic source: the poem's climactic moment comes when the speaker hears not Homer's voice but that of his latter-day translator.

The two Homers Keats presumably knew suggest other questions of poetic trans. Both Pope and Chapman employ *rhyme and *meter in transmitting the Gr. text. Chapman uses the epic *fourteener, while Pope draws on a tidier iambic *pentameter with tightly rhymed neoclassical *couplets: neither aims to reproduce the dactylic *hexameter of the original. Would the results have been more faithful if they had? Though Eng.-lang. *versification derives from cl. sources, the ling. structure of Eng. can only approximate, through *accents, the long- and short-vowel alternation that shapes ancient Gr. *prosody. The very verse structure of Eng. is, thus, an imperfect trans. of its early model: the iambs and trochees of anglophone verse would be unrecognizable to those who first used the terms.

The form Keats employs, moreover, likewise derives from foreign sources, as its Italianate name suggests: without the 14th-c. Petrarchan sonetto, there would be no 19th-c. Eng. *sonnet celebrating a 17th-c. trans. from the ancient Gr. Indeed, the plethora of prosodic terms, in Eng. and other langs., that owe their existence to trans., ancient and mod., points to the constant "crossbreeding and hybridization" (Osip Mandelstam) that shape the Western poetic trad. Trans. not only sustain the cultural "afterlife" of poetic works, as Walter Benjamin states in "The Task of the Translator"; they generate future incarnations: "I want Ovid . . . and Catullus to live once more and I am not satisfied with the historical Ovid . . and Catullus," Mandelstam insists in "The Word and Culture."

Translating poetry is, the adage runs, impossible. It is also, so Keats's sonnet suggests, imperative. Keats's mod. poem springs from a work available to him only through the ling. mediation of others, and such mediation, when successful, provides the immediate shock of the new that catalyzes further poetic creation. This paradox is key not just to the hist. of verse trans. but to its analysis and reception. Various theorists and practitioners have seen poetic trans. as dominated by one of three guiding principles. The translator may aspire to (1) semantic accuracy or (2) prosodic accuracy; or he or she may aim instead for the kind of (3) "creative transposition" (Jakobson), "raid" (Heaney), or "imitation" (Lowell) that relies on "the muse of translation" (Young) to generate new inspiration.

"The clumsiest literal translation is a thousand times more useful than the prettiest paraphrase," Vladimir Nabokov insists in the intro. to his notoriously clunky trans. of Alexander Pushkin's Evgenij Onegin. His fellow exile and self-translator Joseph Brodsky was equally adamant on the need for "prosodic verisimilitude": the translator must endeavor to reproduce, above all, the rhyme and meter of the original poem. Robert Lowell, whose Rus. "imitations" Nabokov abhorred, freely "dropped lines, moved lines, moved stanzas and altered meter and intent" in his efforts to avoid translatorly "taxidermy." Which approach is correct? None, or all of the above. Poetic trans. can be no more "pure" than the various trads. it shapes and is shaped by: "There is no answer, there are only the choices people make," Heaney remarks pragmatically. Much discussion of poetic trans. focuses on the problems inherent in each of these three emphases and on the continuous negotiation among them that constitutes so much translatorly practice.

What is a literal trans.? Nabokov curtails all debates with brusque efficiency: "The term 'literal translation' is tautological since anything but that is not truly a translation." Poets from Pope to Paul Valéry have seen things differently. Pope deplores "servile, dull adherence to the letter" ("Preface to the Iliad of Homer"), while Valéry upends the old cliché (itself translated from the It.) about translators as traitors: "Where poetry is concerned, fidelity to meaning alone is a kind of betrayal" ("Variations on the Eclogues"). In "The Poetry of Grammar and the Grammar of Poetry," Jakobson insists on the inseparability of meaning and form—in both its ling. and prosodic embodiments—that marks poetic speech. "Sense in its poetic significance is not limited to meaning," as Benjamin comments. Poetic lang. transforms the very notion of literal meaning by activating semantic possibilities in places we do not ordinarily think to look for them. If one goal of poetic lang. is to shake the reader loose from the fetters of literal mindedness, then a literal rendering of a poetic text, such as Nabokov's Onegin, runs the risk of violating more than just the spirit in its fidelity to the letter. What is poetic lang. deprived of poetry?

It follows from Jakobson's argument that too strict a reverence for poetic form poses its own dangers. Brodsky's insistently structured trans. of his own poems often do violence not just to the virtuosic forms he borrowed in many cases from adoptive Eng. forebears from John Donne to W. H. Auden but also to the extraordinary Rus. originals. Moreover, metrical structures carry different semantic charges from lang. to lang. and culture to culture. Czesław Miłosz takes his inspiration, metrical and otherwise, from Auden's New Year Letter for his own—still untranslated—"Traktat moralny" (Treatise on Morals, 1947). But the familiar rhythms of Auden's iambic *tetrameter come as a shock when translated into a lang. where fixed penultimate stress lends itself far more readily to trochees.

Miłosz's acerbic take on postwar Polish intellectual life gains an additional measure of ironic distance through his use of a borrowed metrical structure, esp. when combined with his wittily polonized revamping of Auden's couplets and slant rhymes. Miłosz's prosodic virtuosity in his native Polish goes virtually unseen in the Eng. trans. he shepherded into being with the help of various cotranslators, though. Here he stood opposed to Brodsky: "good enough" was "good enough for him," since, as he told his long-time collaborator Robert Hass, "it is after all a poem in Polish, not a poem in English." His most metrically intricate work—often inspired by Anglo-Am. models—remains largely untranslated or has been translated, at Miłosz's insistence, into *free verse.

Are all poetic trans. either doomed to marginal success at best or destined for the dubious distinction of becoming "stand-alone" poems that make only passing reference to their purported originals? Are we left only with multiple embalmments, desecrations, and "Lowellizations"? Of course not. Every poem, as many critics have noted, is a complex, shifting system participating in numerous other systems—literary, ling., social, historical, political, and so on. Poetic trans. must likewise remain in constant motion if it is to do justice to each poem's distinctive "mode of signification" (Benjamin). When Valéry speaks of "the labor of approximation, with its little successes, its regrets, its conquests, and its resignations," he describes both poetic creation and its subsequent trans.

Holmes describes the translator as a decoder and reencoder of the "hierarchy of correspondences" governing the individual poetic work. The Polish poet and translator Stanisław Barańczak suggests something similar in his notion of the "semantic dominant": "The translator's decision process can be described precisely as the process of realizing what in the 'poetry' of the original is the most characteristic, important and irreplaceable; in other words, it is the process of forming for oneself a system of priorities, one valid solely within the precincts of this and not another poem."

Barańczak's own practice as translator and poet suggests ways in which creative fidelity to the forms of meaning and the meaning of forms can lead in turn to the "form creation" that Mandelstam sees as activating poetic speech. Elizabeth Bishop's famous poem "One Art" (1975) marks a creative revision of yet another poetic transplant, the *villanelle. Barańczak's Polish version retains both the original's intricate structure and, to a startling degree, the sense that this structure embodies. He cannot salvage the seemingly crucial rhyme of "master" / "disaster"; nor can he duplicate the eloquent series of rhymes and half rhymes that Bishop builds around this pairing. And it is a loss, but it is not a disaster. Even the literal meaning of the movingly imperfect rhymes he employs in the stanzas' second lines shows how closely he keeps to the original poem's sense: "foreboding," "keys," "to flee," "pang," "won't return," "in art." Most important, he sustains the villanelle's structuring patterns of continuity and slippage, repetition and change: the perfect analogue to its concern with what is lost through time and what survives.

Barańczak later took inspiration from Bishop's poem and his own trans. to create one of the most moving love lyrics in the Polish trad. In "Płakała w nocy" (She Cried at Night), he follows Bishop's lead in psychologizing the villanelle form, as repetition, recognition, and resistance intertwine to dramatize the psyche's efforts both to evade and to accept knowledge almost past bearing. The poem's power was perceived immediately by Polish critics and readers. But they took the form to be Barańczak's own invention: there is no villanelle trad. in Poland. Or rather, there was no such trad. before Barańczak's poem: the form has subsequently been taken up by a number of younger Polish writers.

"Poetry is what is lost in translation," Robert Frost infamously—and perhaps apocryphally—proclaimed. Bishop's villanelle suggests ways in which poetry itself may be conceived as "the art of losing," a mode clearly akin to "the art of loss" (Felstiner) that is poetic trans. "You can't translate a poem," Yves Bonnefoy insists in "Translating Poetry." Yet there is likewise "no poetry but that which is impossible," he comments in the same essay, and this is its bond with trans., which is "merely poetry re-begun." "Translation and creation are twin processes," Octavio Paz observes ("Translation: Literature and Letters").

Loss, impossibility, trans., and new creation: let us return in this context to mod. imaginings of ancient epics. "We have no satisfactory translation of any Greek author," Ezra Pound proclaims in "How to Read": "Chapman and Pope have left Iliads that are of interest [only] to specialists." Keats may celebrate trans. as immediate discovery, but Pound takes his reader on a different kind of voyage some hundred years later, as he journeys through layers of lang. and hist. in a work that is simultaneously a trans., a meditation on trans., and the magnificent poem that launches his lifework, the Cantos:

> And then went down to the ship,
> Set keel on the swart breakers, forth on the godly sea, and
> We set up mast and sail on that swart ship, > Bore sheep aboard her, and our bodies also > Heavy with weeping. . . .

Pound's trans. from book 11 of the Odyssey comes mediated through his own earlier rendition of the Eng. med. poem "The Seafarer"; Anglo-Saxon *alliteration and monosyllables shape the story of the ancient Gr. wayfarer. Pound tips his hand still further as the canto concludes:

> Lie quiet Divus. I mean that is Andreas Divus,
> In officina Wecheli, 1538, out of Homer.

Pound's Lat. was stronger than his Gr., and he relied on Andreas Divus's 16th-c. Lat. Odyssey in composing his own trans. cum poem. This poem does not open to the unexplored expanses uncovered by Keats's Cortez; nor does it lead him home, with the wandering Odysseus. It draws him instead into the dense, interlingual web of culture and hist. represented in the poem by trans. The romantic Keats converts mediation into immediacy, while the modernist Pound makes a virtue of inescapable mediation. Both poets point, though, to the symbiotic relationship between those two "impossibilities," poetry and poetic trans., that has shaped the Western trad.

■ E. Pound, ABC of Reading (1951); E. Pound, "How to Read" [1929], Literary Essays of Ezra Pound, ed. T. S. Eliot (1954); R. Lowell, Introduction, Imitations (1961); J. Holmes, "Describing Literary Translations: Models and Methods," Literature and Translation, ed. J. Holmes, J. Lambert, R. van den Broek (1978); R. Jakobson, "Poetry of Grammar and Grammar of Poetry," Verbal Art, Verbal Sign, Verbal Time, ed. R. Jakobson, K. Pomorska, S. Rudy (1985); S. Heaney, "The Impact of Translation," The Government of the Tongue (1988); B. Raffel, The Art of Translating Poetry (1988); The Art of Translation: Voices from the Field, ed. R. Warren (1989); Translating Poetry: The Double Labyrinth, ed. D. Weissbort (1989); S. Barańczak, Ocalone w tlumaczeniu (1992), and "Saved in Translation . . . : Well, Part of It," Harvard Review 1 (1992); Theories of Translation: An Anthology of Essays from Dryden to Derrida, ed. R. Schulte and J. Biguenet (1992)—essays by Benjamin, Mandelstam, Nabokov, Valéry, Bonnefoy, Paz; J. Felstiner, Paul Celan: Poet, Survivor, Jew (1995); M. Friedberg, Literary Translation in Russia: A Cultural History (1997); S. Bassnett, "Transplanting the Seed: Poetry and Translation," Constructing Cultures: Essays on Literary Translation, ed. S. Bassnett and A. Lefevre (1998); S. Heaney and R. Hass, Sounding Lines: The Art of Translating Poetry (2000); Translation Studies Reader, ed. L. Venuti (2000); D. Davis, "All My Soul Is There: Verse Translation and the Rhetoric of English Poetry," Yale Review 90 (2002); C. Cavanagh, "The Art of Losing: Polish Poetry and Translation," Partisan Review 70 (2003); Oxford History of Literary Translation in English, Volume 3: 1660–1790, ed. S. Gillespie and D. Hopkins, (2005); Translation: Theory and Practice: A Historical Reader, ed. D. Weissbort and A. Eysteinson (2006); V. Nabokov, Verses and Versions: Three Centuries of Russian Poetry, ed. B. Boyd and S. Shvabrin (2008); Oxford History of Literary Translation in English, Volume 1: To 1550, ed. R. Ellis (2008); L. Venuti, The Translator's Invisibility: A History of Translation (2008); S. Weber, Benjamin's Abilities (2008); P. Robinson, Poetry and Translation: The Art of the Impossible (2010); Oxford History of Literary Translation in English, Volume 2: 1550–1660, ed. G. Braden, R. Cummings, S. Gillespie (2011); E. M. Young, The Mediated Muse: Catullan Lyricism and Roman Translation (2012).

C. Cavanagh; Y. Lorman

TRIBRACH. In Gr. and Lat. verse, a sequence of three short syllables, almost always a resolved iamb or trochee rather than an independent *foot (see resolution). The *ictus falls on the second syllable if it replaces an iamb and on the first if it replaces a trochee.

■ Koster; West.

P. S. Costas

TRILOGY. In Gr. drama, a group of three *tragedies that treat a single myth. At the annual Great Dionysia in Athens, three poets competed, each offering three tragedies plus a satyr play, a *parody of the tragic form that employed a *chorus of satyrs; if this satyr play also deals with the same myth, then the whole is called a tetralogy. The origin of the custom requiring three tragedies is unknown; the addition of the satyr play occurred around 500 bce. Aeschylus is believed to have been the first playwright to connect the plays in one year's offering into a trilogy or tetralogy. In the Oresteia, the only extant trilogy, Aeschylus traces the problem of blood-guilt through successive generations of Agamemnon's family; Seven against Thebes, the final tragedy in a trilogy on the House of Laius, exhibits a similar concern with a family curse. Yet the outcomes are very different: the Theban trilogy ends in the ruin of the royal house, while Eumenides, which concludes the Oresteia, dramatizes a resolution of the guilt and the foundation of a new order of justice. The Danaid trilogy, of which the first play, Suppliant Women, survives, evidently climaxed in a similar celebration of the sanctity of marriage. Yet this trilogy differs in that its three tragedies dramatized a single, tightly knit event spanning only a few days rather than events separated by many years. The fragmentary evidence of other Aeschylean trilogies suggests that such *unity of plot was not uncommon. After Aeschylus, the trilogy as a genre fell into disuse. Sophocles abandoned it (the composition of his three Theban plays spanned 40 years, so that one refers to the Oedipus cycle as a trilogy only in a loose sense), and Euripides apparently only once offered three tragedies connected in subject matter: his Trojan Women is the third play in a series on the Trojan War. The terms trilogy and tetralogy were not current in 5th-c. Athens, nor does Aristotle use them; they first appear in Alexandrian commentaries. A mod. sequence of plays consciously based on the ancient model is the trilogy by Eugene O'Neill, Mourning Becomes Electra.

It was uncommon in the Ren. to link tragedies, but sequences of two plays were written occasionally, e.g., Christopher Marlowe's Tamburlaine (pts. 1 and 2), Shakespeare's Henry IV (pts. 1 and 2), and George Chapman's Bussy D'Ambois and The Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois. Shakespeare's Henry VI is in three parts, and he wrote two series of four hist. plays that mod. scholars (but no Elizabethans) sometimes call tetralogies. These are the four plays extending from Henry VI, pt. 1, to Richard III (the first historical "tetralogy" to be written, though the later of the two tetralogies chronologically) and the four plays extending from Richard II to Henry V. In mod. usage, the terms refer to dramatic or literary works written in three or four parts.

■ G. F. Else, The Origin and Early Form of Greek Tragedy (1967); A. Lesky, Die tragischen Dichtung der Hellenen, 3d ed. (1972); A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, The Dramatic Festivals of Athens, 2d ed. (1989).

V. Pedrick; O. B. Hardison

TRIMETER (Gr., "of three measures"). Aristotle (Poetics 1449a24, Rhetoric 1408b33) regards the iambic trimeter as the most speech-like of Gr. meters (see iambic). It is first employed mixed with dactylic hexameters in the Margites ascribed to Homer, though some scholars regard the first line of the "Nestor's cup" inscription, ca. 750–700 bce, as a trimeter. Despite ancient trad. (e.g., Pseudo-Plutarch, De musica 28), Archilochus (fl. 650 bce) is not its inventor, although he was the first to use the word iamb and developed the trimeter as a medium for personal *invective, a practice in which he was followed by Semonides. The Athenian lawgiver Solon used the trimeter for political poetry. The trimeter is the basic dialogue meter of Gr. tragedy, satyr-play, and comedy. It consists of three iambic metra (units of measurement; see metron) (x represents *anceps [a syllable which, independently of its real metrical value, can be counted as long or short, according to the requirements of the meter]): x – ∪ – | x – ∪ – | x – ∪ –. The penthemimeral *caesura (after the fifth position [second anceps]) is much more frequent than the hephthemimeral (after the seventh position [second breve]); median *diaeresis (coincidence of a word ending with the end of a metrical unit) is permitted occasionally in tragedy, though in Euripides only when accompanied by *elision (omission or blurring of a final unstressed vowel followed by a vowel or mute consonant). *Resolution of a longum (long syllable) is permitted at differing rates in all feet but the last. The final element may be short (brevis in longo). Most of these departures from the basic iambic pattern are subject to a complex of finely graded phonological, lexical, and syntactic constraints that form a hierarchy of strictness that decreases from the archaic iambographers (writers of iambs) through early tragedy and later Euripides to satyr-play and finally comedy. The trimeter is subject to a number of *bridges, the strictness of which follows the same generic and stylistic hierarchy.

The Lat. adaptation of the Gr. trimeter is the senarius*, first used by Livius Andronicus. The senarius is a common dialogue meter of early Lat. drama and was frequently used in funerary inscriptions. This version of the trimeter, however, is organized as six feet rather than three metra. The most striking departure from the Gr. trimeter is the permissibility of *spondees in the second and fourth feet. This variation and many differing constraints on word boundaries are motivated by the differing nature of the Lat. stress accent. Iambic-shaped words, even those of the type not regularly subject to *iambic shortening, are severely restricted in the interior of the line, since otherwise they would produce conflict of accent with metrical *ictus. Spondee-shaped (or -ending) words, however, could be permitted in trochaic segments of the verse, since their stress pattern would preserve the iambic rhythm. In contrast to the senarius, the Lat. lyric poets, such as Catullus and Horace, and Seneca in his dramas, follow the pattern of the Gr. trimeter more closely, excluding spondees in even feet, restricting resolution and substitution, and not admitting iambic shortening.

The prosodies of the mod. vernacular followed the Lat. metrical practice of scanning in feet rather than metra, so that the trimeter of the Germanic langs. (incl. Eng.) of the later Middle Ages, Ren., and mod. period is most often a very short line of three binary feet or six syllables—too short to be capable of sustained effects in *narrative or *dramatic verse, but very suitable for song and for humor or *satire. Literary examples include a dozen songs by Thomas Wyatt ("I will and yet I may not," "Me list no more to sing"); Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey; Ben Jonson's "Dedication of the King's New Cellar" (with feminine rhymes); Elizabeth Barrett Browning's "The Mourning Mother"; a dozen poems by P. B. Shelley (incl. "When the Lamp Is Shattered," and another of them, "To a Skylark," trochaic trimeter with an *alexandrine close), and Theodore Roethke's "My Papa's Waltz" (with occasional extra syllables at the ends of lines). In French prosody, the line now called the trimètre is not a trimeter in this sense: it is an alexandrine of 12 syllables divided into three rhythmical phrases and made its appearance only with the advent of *romanticism.

■ Schipper, History; F. Lang, Platen's Trimeter (1924); J. Descroix, Le Trimètre iambique (1931); G. Rosenthal, Der Trimeter als deutsche Versmasse (1934); P. W. Harsh, Iambic Words and Regard for Accent in Plautus (1949); Maas; D. S. Raven, Latin Metre (1965); C. Questa, Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto (1967); Allen; S. L. Schein, The Iambic Trimeter in Aeschylus and Sophocles (1979); West; A. M. Devine and L. D. Stephens, Language and Metre (1984); M. Lotman, "The Ancient Iambic Trimeters: A Disbalanced Harmony," Formal Approaches to Poetry, ed. B. E. Dresher and N. Friedberg (2006).

A. M. Devine; L. D. Stephens; T.V.F. Brogan; E. T. Johnston

TRIMÈTRE. In French prosody, a variation on the tétramètre; an *alexandrine of three *measures rather than four. It is an extension of the rhythmic and expressive range of the tétramètre, not an alternative form, since no poems have been written exclusively in trimètre. Examples of trimètre are to be found in the freer alexandrines of the Pléiade* poets and in the less punctilious genres of the 17th and 18th cs. (*comedy, *fable). It was with the romantics, and with Victor Hugo in particular, that it achieved an ideological status and a subversive intention, hence, another of its names, the alexandrin romantique (it is also called the alexandrin ternaire). Care should be taken to distinguish between different degrees of trimètre. The romantics and the poets who preceded them maintained the possibility of an accent on the sixth syllable, even though, in the event, it was not accented; in other words, the *caesura still enjoyed a spectral existence despite being effaced by the greater syntactic and rhythmic claims of ternary structure; the romantic trimètre is thus quite easy to envisage as a tétramètre with enjambment at the caesura, e.g., in Hugo: "Nous demandons, vivants // douteux qu'un linceul couvre" (4-4-4). The romantic trimètre usually has this regular 4-4-4 pattern, though it may occasionally explore other combinations, e.g., 3-5-4. The Parnassians and symbolists (see parnassianism, symbolism) developed extremer forms of the trimètre, by frequently erasing the caesura completely, e.g., in Théodore de Banville: "Où je filais pensivement la blanche laine" (4-4-4), and by multiplying asymmetrical combinations of measures, e.g., in Stéphane Mallarmé: "Une ruine, par mille écumes bénie" (4-5-3). In these more radical forms, the trimètre became a central feature of vers libéré.

■ Kastner; G. Aae, Le Trimètre de Victor Hugo (1909); J. Mazaleyrat, "Élan verbal et rythme ternaire dans l'alexandrin,"Français Moderne 40 (1972); Elwert; M. Grimaud, "Trimètre et rôle poétique de la cesure chez Victor Hugo," RR 70 (1979); Scott; Mazaleyrat.

C. Scott

TRIOLET. A Fr. fixed form with eight lines, two rhymes, and two *refrain lines, patterned ABaAabAB. It may be split into two *quatrains or employed as a *stanza form, although poems of one *strophe are typical. Line length and meter are not fixed.

In the 13th c., it was not considered a poetic form unto itself, but merely a common variant of the *rondel; today, it is considered the Urform of the entire *rondeau family. Descended from popular round dance (ronde) songs, not the courtly trouvère* tradition, it was sung to two musical strains, A and B, that matched its poetic structure. Examples can be found in the Cléomades by Adenez le Roi, "King of the Minstrels." Lyric poets incl. Guillaume d'Amiens, Adam de la Halle, and Jean Froissart produced poems in the form, usually on the subject of love. In his 1392 L'Art de dictier, Eustache Deschamps tagged the form the rondel sangle or "simple rondel."

The name triolet emerged in the 15th c. While Paul Marcotte links the term to the three "A" lines and Helen Cohen to three-part song, Leo Spitzer suggests that it may be a corruption of kyrie eleison, reflecting the Christian religious lyrics that had been put to many of the old refrain songs. Jean Regnier; Octavien de Saint-Gelais; and Clotilde de Surville, a woman, wrote 15th-c. specimens.

The Pléiade* poets succeeded in driving the triolet and other med. poetic genres out of fashion during the last half of the 16th c. But with the Fronde uprisings of the 17th c., the triolet was put to political use. Both sides generated "attack triolets," which could be sung to popular tunes. Marc-Antoine Girard de Saint-Amant, produced a collection of Nobles Triolets. Eng. poet Patrick Carey, studying for a time in France, encountered the form and harnessed it for religious poems.

Although Alexis Piron in France and several Ger. poets produced triolets during the years that the *heroic couplet, then romantic nonce-forms, were ascendant, the triolet fell into dormancy until being revived by Fr. poet Théodore de Banville in the 1840s. Arthur Rimbaud, Stéphane Mallarmé, Maurice Rollinat, and Alphonse Daudet were among 19th-c. Fr. poets using the form, usually as a stanza form and with feminine "b" rhymes. Banville's fixed-forms revival spread to England in the 1870s, with Robert Bridges being the first to publish a triolet. Vers de société poets such as Austin Dobson and Edmund Gosse chose to foreground the triolet's artifice in their examples, reflecting Gosse's view of the form as a "tiny trill of epigrammatic melody, turning so simply on its own innocent axis." But Thomas Hardy achieved dramatic intensity within its confines, although G. M. Hopkins was less successful in using it to "gloss" quoted lines of text. In America, writers incl. H. C. Bunner and Clinton Scollard produced triolets.

By the mid-20th c., the triolet seemed relegated to Saturday Evening Post *light verse or the juvenilia of poets such as Dylan Thomas and Sylvia Plath. But with the rise of *New Formalism, new life was breathed into the eight-line pattern once again. Sandra McPherson, Wendy Cope, and A. E. Stallings have produced memorable poems in the form, while Marilyn Nelson's "Triolets for Triolet" is an eight-poem sequence that approaches the range of *epic.

■ T. de Banville, Petit traité de poésie française (1872); E. Gosse, "A Plea for Certain Exotic Forms of Verse," Cornhill Magazine 36 (1877); G. White, Ballades and Rondeaus (1887); Kastner; P. C. Standing, "Triolets and Their Makers," The English Illustrated Magazine 32 (1904/05); H. L. Cohen, Lyric Forms from France (1922); P. Champion, Histoire poétique du XV siècle, 2 vols. (1923); M. Françon, "La pratique et la théorie du rondeau et du rondel chez Théodore de Banville," MLN 52 (1937); L. Spitzer, "Triolet," RR 39 (1948);

J. M. Cocking, "The 'Invention' of the Rondel," FS 5 (1951); P. J. Marcotte, "An Introduction to the Triolet," Inscape 5 (1966); A. Thomas, "G. M. Hopkins: An Unpublished Triolet," MLR 61 (1966); P. J. Marcotte, "A Victorian Trio of Triolet Turners" and "More Late-Victorian Triolet Makers," Inscape 6 (1968); C. Scott, "The 19th-Century Triolet: French and English," OL 35 (1980); Morier; K. West, "Triolet: Trippingly on the Tongue," Finch and Varnes.

A. Preminger; C. Scott; J. Kane

TRIPLE RHYME. Three consecutive syllables at the end of two or more lines that rhyme. Rhyming more than two syllables in sequence is difficult in Eng., hence relatively rare. In Eng. Ren. verse, double and triple rhymes are more common than is usually supposed, however. These are almost always the result of deliberate imitation of It. models; since sdrucciolo (proparoxytonic) endings on words are more frequent in It. than in the other Romance langs. (see verso sdrucciolo), compound rhymes of two, three, or more syllables are an important component of It. versification. Philip Sidney mentions triple rhyme in the Defence of Poesy and has virtuoso examples of it in the Arcadia. Since Lord Byron (Don Juan, Beppo, etc.), however, most examples have been comic and deliberately exhibitionist: thus, Byron has "gymnastical / ecclesiastical" (Beppo) and "intellectual / hen-peck'd you all" (virtually quadruple, if -te- in intellectual is elided; cf. meticulous / ridiculous). In the 20th c., good examples are to be found in Ogden Nash.

In the most common form of triple rhyme, only the first syllable of the three is stressed, the other two being extrametrical—e.g., glaringly / sparingly. The word shape is *dactylic, which is sometimes used as an alternate term for triple rhyme, as is double feminine. But all three syllables might be metrical if the third syllable bears secondary stress (*cretic word shape) and falls under the final *ictus in the line. Since in Eng. it is more difficult to rhyme two polysyllabic words than a phrase of monosyllables, most triple rhymes (e.g., the second Byron example) are mosaic—i.e., several short words rhyming with one long one (see mosaic rhyme). Triple rhyme is to be distinguished from the *tercet, a rhymed stanza of three lines, and the *triplet, a run of three rhymes in couplet verse.

See rhyme.

T.V.F. Brogan

TRIPLET (Ger. Dreireim). In Eng. Restoration and 18th-c. verse written in *heroic couplets, a run of three lines rhymed together. Often these are marked visually as well by a brace in the margin. John Dryden says that he employs them "frequently" because "they bound the sense"; he makes the third line an *alexandrine ("Dedication to the Aeneis"). Triplets are familiar in Dryden and (less so) in Alexander Pope; John Donne wrote most of his *verse epistles in monorhymed iambic triplets. Schipper shows other examples in the *fourteeners and *pentameters of George Chapman and Robert Browning. John Keats follows Dryden for their use in "Lamia."

■ Schipper; C. A. Balliet, "The History and Rhetoric of the Triplet," PMLA 80 (1965).

T.V.F. Brogan

TROBAIRITZ. Feminine form of troubador, found in a 13th-c. grammar and the Occitan romance Flamenca. Twenty named trobairitz were active between 1170 and 1260, a period of relative power for aristocratic women in Occitan society. They composed songs in the style of the troubadours, whose already well-established poetic system they manipulated with the same inventive shifts, reversals, repetitions, and variations as male poets, though in general with less virtuosic formal play in rhyme schemes. The vidas and razos* included in some chansonniers (song mss.) name 13 trobairitz, five with short biographies. Tibors, Comtessa de Dia, Azalais de Porcairagues, Castelloza, and Lombarda are represented with the same qualities as their male counterparts: they are noble, agreeable, educated, courteous, and knowledgeable in composing songs. Their poems as well as documented historical evidence show that trobairitz participated fully in the social network of troubadour song as patrons and friends, subjects as well as objects of love, sisters, daughters, and wives of troubadours. Maria de Ventadorn, the wife of Eble V (the grandson of Eble III, patron and rival of Bernart de Ventadorn), became the patron of many troubadours. Named in numerous poems, she initiated a tenso* with Gui d'Ussel, who according to a razo sang his love for her. Formal analysis shows the Comtessa de Dia (possibly Beatrice, wife of William II of Poitiers) in poetic correspondence with Raimbaut d'Aurenga, Bernart de Ventadorn, and Azalais, who sent a planh* for Raimbaut to Ermengarde of Narbonne.

Though small, this remarkable repertoire of some 40 songs brings onstage a rare group of med. women poets (cf. Ar. women poets of Al-Andalus and women trouvères* of northern France). Trobairitz poems are scarce in northern mss., somewhat better represented in important Occitan collections, and most numerous in Catalan and It. chansonniers, where they are sometimes gathered together. The corpus remains difficult to determine exactly, given questionable attributions, unnamed poets, and female speakers invented by male poets. Among mod. scholars, disagreements abound over whether anonymous or even certain named poets represent fictions or refer to real women.

The trobairitz composed mostly cansos* and tensos but also participated in other lyric genres: sirventes*, salut d'amor (love letter), planh, alba*, and balada*. Only Comtessa de Dia (four cansos, incl. the single extant melody) and Castelloza (three or four cansos) are assigned more than one song; all the others have one each (the typical troubadour oeuvre is three to four poems).

The voices of trobairitz are most distinctive in their choice and mixing of different personae. The self-effacing Castelloza performs a double reversal of male/female roles by taking for herself the feminized stance of poet-lover as humble servant, while Comtessa de Dia retains the pride typically invested in the troubadour's lady, now combined with the verbal power of the troubadour's poetic first person and modulated through the *persona of a sensuous, desiring woman conventional to women's song. Trobairitz who engage in dialogue about love with male poets, like Guilielma de Rosers and Lombarda, playfully demonstrate their wit and innuendo; others keep the conversation on the distaff side to exchange views on more unexpected topics (childbirth and sagging breasts or the deprivations of sumptuary laws). All the trobairitz call our attention to what may happen when the silent lady of the troubadours begins to speak for herself within the conventionalized world of troubadour lyric.

See OCCITAN POETRY, DIVAN.

■ Anthologies: Biographies des troubadours, ed. J. Boutière and A. H. Schutz (1973); Trobairitz, ed. A. Rieger (1991); Chants d'amour des femmes-troubadours, ed. P. Bec (1995); Songs of the Women Troubadours, ed. M. Bruckner et al. (2000).

■ Criticism: P. Bec, "'Trobairitz' et chansons de femme: Contribution à la connaissance du lyrisme féminin au moyen âge," Cahiers de Civilisation Médiévale 22 (1979); T. Garulo, Dīwān de las poetisas de Al-Andalus (1986); The Voice of the Trobairitz, ed. W. D. Paden (1989); M. Bruckner, "Fictions of the Female Voice: The Women Troubadours," Speculum 67 (1992); K. Gravdal, "Metaphor, Metonymy, and the Medieval Women Trobairitz," RR 83 (1992); M.-A. Bossy and N. Jones, "Gender and Compilational Patterns in Troubadour Lyric: The Case of Manuscript N," French Forum 21 (1996); E. W. Poe, "Cantairitz e trobairitz: A Forgotten Attestation of Old Provençal Trobairitz," Romanische Forschungen 114 (2002).

M. T. BRUCKNER

TROBAR CLUS, TROBAR LEU. Controversy between *troubadours defending the trobar clus (enclosed, hermetic poetry) and those extolling the trobar leu (light or easy poetry) is found ca. 1160–1210, with later echoes, and seems to have centered on some poets' desire to write for a select audience of connoisseurs. The clus manner is characteristically allusive, oblique, and recherché in vocabulary and rhymes (e.g., Raimbaut d'Orange), though similar features occur in earlier troubadours who make no claim to be clus (e.g., Marcabru). Though the trobar leu ultimately prevailed, the trobar clus influenced a manner often called trobar ric (rich, i.e., elaborate poetry) involving verbal and metrical acrobatics without much of the profundity of thought claimed by clus poets. All three categories concerned poetic aims rather than specific stylistic traits and were never mutually exclusive: Guiraut de Bornelh, notably, claimed to excel in trobar clus and trobar leu alike. The terminology itself was far from fixed: trobar car (dear) and trobar prim (delicate, subtle) seem to refer to much the same manner as trobar ric, while trobar plan (smooth) is a synonym of trobar leu.

See OCCITAN POETRY.

■ U. Mölk, Trobar clus, trobar leu (1968); A. Roncaglia, "Trobar clus: discussione aperta," Cultura Neolatina 29 (1969); L. M. Paterson, Troubadours and Eloquence (1975); M. A. Bossy, "The trobar clus of Raimbaut Aurenga, Giraut de Bornelh and Arnaut Daniel," Mediaevalia 19 (1996).

J. H. MARSHALL

TROCHAIC (Gr., trochee, choree, respectively, "running," "belonging to the dance"). A term used for both metrical units and whole *meters having the rhythm "marked–unmarked" in series. In the mod. accentual meters, a trochee is a *foot comprising a stressed syllable followed by an unstressed; in the quantitative meters of the cl. langs., however, the elements were long and short. In Lat., the trochaic foot comprised one long syllable followed by one short, whereas in Gr., the unit was the trochaic metron, – ⏑ – x (x denotes anceps). Trochaic measures were used in archaic Gr. poetry at least from the time of Archilochus; and in Gr. *tragedy and *comedy, they appear in both choral lyric and spoken dialogue. In Lat. comedy, the trochaic seems to have lent itself esp. well to rapid movement and dancing; the most common meter of Plautus and Terence is the trochaic tetrameter catalectic or *septenarius. This is the meter also used by Caesar's legions for marching songs (Beare). In all these registers, it seems to maintain close ties with popular speech and popular verse genres.

In mod. verse, trochaic meter used for entire poems is far less common than *iambic and does not appear until the Ren.: the first clearly accentual trochaics in Eng. are by Philip Sidney (Certain Sonnets 7, 26, 27), followed by Nicholas Breton. From Sidney's example, they became more popular in the 1590s, though still mainly in *tetrameters. King Lear's "Never, never, never, never, never" is an exception meant to reaffirm the iambic rule. On the other hand, trochaic meters are quite common in many *songs and *chants; in idioms, formulaic expressions, *proverbs, *riddles, slogans, *jingles, and cheers; and in much popular and folk verse. In short, trochaic verse is rare in literary poetry but common in popular. The most obvious explanation for this difference would be that most of these forms have some close relation to song. They are either sung to music, recited in a singsong chant, or originally derived from song. In music, trochaic rhythm is structural since a stress begins every bar. It is presumed that the use of trochaic meters for text simplifies the fitting of the words to music.

Some metrists (e.g., Boris Tomashevsky, V. E. Xolsevnikov) have denied that there is any difference between iambic and trochaic meters except for the first syllable (see ANACRUSIS). But, in fact, poets make it very clear that they perceive a radical distinction between the two meters. Whole poems in trochaic meter are relatively rare in any mod. verse trad. (Saintsbury, 3.529; Gasparov 1974), and trochaic meter is clearly associated with only certain kinds of genres, subjects, and rhythmic movements. The distribution of line forms is also quite different; trochaic pentameter is almost unheard of, while trochaic tetrameters are as common as iambic, if not more so. Poems where metrical code switching between iambic and trochaic is systematic are rare (in Marina Tsvetaeva in Rus.; in the verse known as "8s and 7s" in Eng.). And internal line dynamics differ radically: first-foot stress reversals are four times more common in iambic verse (12%) than in trochaic (3%) in Eng. and 30 times more common in Rus. There is a widespread perception among poets and prosodists that trochaic meters are in some way more rigid, more brittle, "more difficult to maintain" (Hascall) than iambic ones.

In Eng., there is a mixed iambo-trochaic form known as "8s and 7s," instanced most famously in John Milton's "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso," which seems to mix iambic and trochaic lines seamlessly or else to mix normal iambic lines with *acephalous ones that only seem to be trochaic (see RISING AND FALLING RHYTHM). This problem points up the importance of distinguishing between trochaic meters and trochaic rhythms in iambic meters. Traditional Eng. metrics would say that an iambic pentameter line such as "And quickly jumping backward, raised his shield," although in iambic meter, has a "falling rhythm" that is the result of trochaic word shapes. While meter organizes lang. on the phonological level, it nevertheless affects, and is affected by, morphology as well.

There is some evidence that trochaic rhythms predominate in certain speech contexts, esp. children's speech, and that trochaic rhythms are easier both to produce and to perceive. But it is disputed whether Eng. as a lang. is essentially iambic or trochaic in character. Comprehensive data on word shapes in the lexicon (i.e., how many are monosyllabic, disyllabic iambic, disyllabic trochaic, trisyllabic, polysyllabic) and the frequencies of these words in ordinary speech versus poetry (many words in the dictionary will never appear in poetry), along with comparable data on the shapes of Eng. phrases and their frequencies, are difficult to come by, even for one lang. Gil makes a global distinction between iambic and trochaic langs.: iambic "are characterized by subject-verb-object (SVO) word order, simple syllable structures, high consonant-vowel ratios, and the absence of phonemic tones," while trochaic have SOV, complex syllable structures, low C-V ratios, and phonemic tone.

Several efforts have been made to analyze the frequency of word types both in iambic versus trochaic verse and in these as set against the norm of the lang. to try to discover significant statistical deviations (e.g., Jones; Tarlinskaja, following Gasparov). Some striking statistics have emerged. But the very idea of a ling. "norm" against which poetic lang. "deviates" is an approach now viewed as suspect. Lexical selection is not the only or even perhaps the central issue; certainly, poets think in terms of significant words, but more generally these must be woven into the fabric in syntactically predetermined ways. Analyzing word-shape rhythms in relation to line rhythms misses the crucial point that lines are not formed by stringing words together but, rather, mainly by putting phrases together: most words come in packaged phrasal containers of relatively fixed rhythmic shape—prepositional phrases, noun phrases, compound verbs. And once a poet selects a word in a line, the range of relevant words for that or even following lines is constrained by the chosen semantic field. It is precisely the power of iambic verse, e.g., that an iambic line may comprise two monosyllables and four trochaic words. Word shapes are the elements, and, certainly, these vary in significant ways; but it is the stitching that counts.

See BINARY AND TERNARY, PYRRHIC, SENARIUS, SPONDEE.

■ Schipper 2.375–98; W. Brown, Time in English Verse Rhythm (1908); H. Woodrow, A Quantitative Study of Rhythm (1909); Schipper, History, chs. 13, 14.2; J.E.W. Wallin, "Experimental Studies of Rhythm and Time," Psychology Review 18 (1911), 19 (1912); J. W. White, The Verse of Greek Comedy (1912); Wilamowitz, pt. 2, ch. 5; K. Taranovski, Ruski dvodelni ritmovi (1953); P. Fraisse, Les Structures rythmiques (1956); Beare; Norberg, 73 ff.; C. L. Drage, "Trochaic Metres in Early Russian Syllabo-Tonic Poetry," Slavonic and Eastern European Review 38 (1960); Saintsbury, Prosody; P. Fraisse, The Psychology of Time, trans. J. Leith (1963); Koster, ch. 6; C. Questa, Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto (1967); Dale; G. Faure, Les Élements du rythme poétique en anglaise moderne (1970); D. L. Hascall, "Trochaic Meter," CE 33 (1971); P. Fraisse, Psychologie du rythme (1974); M. L. Gasparov, Sovremennyj russkij stix (1974); R. P. Newton, "Trochaic and Iambic," Lang&S 8 (1975); Tarlinskaja; D. Laferrière, "Iambic versus Trochaic: The Case of Russian," International Review of Slavic Linguistics 4 (1979); R. G. Jones, "Linguistic and Metrical Constraints in Verse," Linguistic and Literary Studies in Honor of A. A. Hill, ed. M. ali Jazayery et al., v. 4 (1979); Halporn et al.; Snell; West; D. Gil, "A Prosodic Typology of Language," Folia Linguistica 20 (1986); G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988), ch. 13; B. Bjorklund, "Iambic and Trochaic Verse," Rhythm and Meter, ed. P. Kiparsky and G. Youmans (1989); CHCL, v.1.5; M. L. Gasparov, "The Semantic Halo of the Russian Trochaic Pentameter: Thirty Years of the Problem," Elementa 2 (1996); D. Zec, "The Prosodic Word as a Unit in Poetic Meter," The Nature of the Word, ed. K. Hanson and S. Inkelas (2009).

T.V.F. BROGAN

TROPE (Gr., "turn"). In its most restricted definition, a trope is a figure of speech that uses a word or phrase in a sense other than what is proper to it. Cl. rhetoricians describe this change in meaning as a movement: the artful deviation of a word from its ordinary signification, a deviation that usually involves the substitution of one word or concept for another. As devices of rhetorical *style, tropes give lang. what Aristotle calls a "foreign air" (xénos), using strange words to refer to familiar concepts or assigning novel meaning to ordinary words (Rhetoric). Quintilian distinguishes tropes from other figures of speech by defining them as stylistic deviations that affect only a word or a small group of words (Institutio oratoria). According to this understanding, tropes such as "the Lord is my shepherd" (*metaphor), "from the cradle to the grave" (*metonymy), and "the face that launched a thousand ships" (*synecdoche) operate by changing the signification of the words "shepherd," "cradle," "grave," and "face." Tropes allow lang. to mean more or something other, leading to Richards's position that a metaphor allows two or more ideas to be carried by a single word or expression (the vehicle), its meaning (the tenor) resulting from their "interaction" on the basis of a relation (the ground).

In order to define trope as a figure of speech, cl. rhet. naturalizes ordinary locutions as the basic norms of lang., as when Quintilian identifies trope as "language transferred from its natural and principal meaning to another for the sake of embellishment" (Institutio oratoria). This depiction of *figuration as movement from a fixed location recurs in definitions of trope from antiquity forward, as tropes "transport" words from their normal, familiar habitat. As Barthes observes, the distinction between proper and figured lang. frequently becomes expressed as a distinction between the native and the foreign or the normal and the strange. Definitions of trope are thus themselves inescapably metaphorical, that is, relying on an idea of "home" (oikos) to theorize the ling. transports of figures of speech, as when César Chesneau Dumarsais defines metaphor as occupying a "borrowed home" (Traité des Tropes, 1730).

The cl. definition of trope as deviation from a ling. norm (variously defined as the ordinary, proper, or familiar) has repeatedly been challenged in the mod. era, first by romantic critics (Johann Georg Hamann, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and Friedrich Nietzsche), and still more aggressively by linguistically oriented literary theorists (Jakobson, Barthes, Genette, Todorov, Derrida, de Man). While cl. rhet. presumes the existence of two langs., one proper and one figured, mod. literary theory identifies trope as a fundamental structure of a single ling. system, rather than an exception or deviation from a prior norm. From the romantic point of view, tropes such as metaphor comprise our most basic mechanisms of thought and expression: we have no way of understanding "the Lord" except through the application of metaphors such as "shepherd." From a deconstructive perspective, "the Lord" does not exist prior to the "shepherd" metaphor; rather, the trope confers an illusory presence on what it signifies (its signified). The argument that trope is the principle of thought and verbal organization leads to the claim that lit. is a privileged vehicle for access to the problems that lang. poses for understanding (de Man).

See CATACHRESIS, LINGUISTICS AND POETICS, ORNAMENT, RHETORIC AND POETRY, SCHEME, TENOR AND VEHICLE.

■ I. A. Richards, The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936); K. Burke, "Four Master Tropes," A Grammar of Motives (1945); Jakobson and Halle, "Two Aspects of Language and Two Types of Aphasic Disturbances"; E. Auerbach, "Figura," trans. R. Manheim, Scenes from the Drama of European Literature (1959); J. L. Austin, "The Meaning of a Word," Philosophical Papers (1961); O. Ducrot and T. Todorov, Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Sciences of Language, trans. C. Porter (1979); G. Genette, Figures of Literary Discourse, trans. A. Sheridan, 3 v. (1981); P. Ricoeur, The Rule of Metaphor, trans. R. Czerny et al. (1981); P. de Man, "The Rhetoric of Temporality," "The Rhetoric of Blindness," Blindness and Insight; and "Anthropomorphism and Trope in the Lyric," The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984); and "Hypogram and Inscription" and "The Resistance to Theory," The Resistance to Theory (1986); J. Derrida, "White Mythology," Margins of Philosophy, trans. A. Bass (1986); Vickers, Defence; R. Barthes, "The Old Rhetoric," The Semiotic Challenge, trans. R. Howard (1988); P. Parker, "Metaphor and Catachresis," The Ends of Rhetoric, ed. J. Bender and D. Wellbery (1990); Lanham; Tropical Truth(s): The Epistemology of Metaphor and Other Tropes, ed. A. Burkhardt and B. Nerlich (2010).

T. BAHTI; J. C. MANN

TROUBADOUR. Med. Occitan lyric poet. The term expresses the agent of the verb trobar (to find, invent, compose verse); the etymon of trobar may have been hypothetical med. Lat. tropare (to compose a trope, a liturgical embellishment, Gr. tropos) or hypothetical Sp. Arabic trob (song) from cl. Ar. ṭarab (to sing) or Lat. turbare (to disturb, stir up). These proposed etyma correspond to theories of the origin of *courtly love in med. Lat., Ar., or cl. Lat.

Extant troubadour production dates from ca. 1100 to ca. 1300, beginning with William IX, Duke of Aquitaine and Count of Poitiers (1071–1126) alternately bawdy and courtly, and continuing with Jaufré Rudel (fl. 1125–48), whose distant love tantalizingly blends secular and religious qualities; the biting moralist Marcabru (fl. 1130–49); the love poet Bernart de Ventadorn (fl. 1147–70); the witty Peire Vidal (fl. 1183–1204); the political satirist and war poet Bertran de Born (ca. 1150–1215); and the jolly, worldly Monk of Montaudon (fl. 1193–1210). Composition in a difficult style or trobar clus is associated with the names of Peire d'Alvernhe (fl. 1149–68), Raimbaut d'Aurenga (ca. 1144–1173), and Arnaut Daniel (fl. 1180–95); Giraut de Bornelh (fl. 1162–99), "the master of the troubadours," practiced both trobar clus* and trobar leu, or the easy style. In the early 13th c. appear the trobairitz* or women troubadours, incl. the moody Castelloza and the vivacious Comtessa de Dia, who left several songs apiece. Peire Cardenal (fl. 1205–72) followed the satirical trad. of Marcabru and Bertran de Born but was more concerned with religious issues in the period of the Albigensian Crusade; late in the century, Guiraut Riquier (fl. 1254–92) lamented that he was among the last of the troubadours. In the 14th to 15th cs., Occitan poetry became an academic prolongation of the earlier trad.; those who wrote it are not called troubadours but poets. We know some 360 troubadours by name.

Though we have the melodies of only one-tenth of the extant troubadour poems, it is generally assumed that most of them were set to music. The troubadour wrote both text and melody, which were performed by the joglar (see JONGLEUR), who served as the messenger for a particular troubadour by singing his song before its addressee. We have circumstantial information about 101 individual troubadours in the prose vidas* and razos* that accompany the poems in some mss. This information is reliable in objective matters, such as the troubadour's place of birth, place of death, and social class, but not in regard to amorous adventures, which were largely invented by the prose writers on the basis of what they read in the poems. The outstanding example of such imaginative biography is the vida of Jaufré Rudel, which has him perish of love in the arms of his beloved, the countess of Tripoli.

The troubadours exerted influence on the Fr. trouvères* as early as the 12th c. and in the 13th c. on poets writing in Galicia and in Ger. (see MINNESANG). In Italy, their influence was felt in the Sicilian school presided over by Frederick II Hohenstaufen and then by Dante and his friends, who created the Dolce stil nuovo. Through Petrarch, who acknowledged his debt to them, they affected the develop. of poetry of the Ren. and beyond.

See OCCITAN POETRY, SONGBOOK.

■ M. R. Menocal, "The Etymology of Old Provençal trobar, trobador: A Return to the 'Third Solution,'" RPh 36 (1982); J.-C. Huchet, L'amour discourtois (1987); P. Bec, Écrits sur les troubadours et la lyrique médiévale (1992); M. L. Meneghetti, Il pubblico dei trovatori (1992); Handbook of the Troubadours, ed. F.R.P. Akehurst and J. Davis (1995); Songs of the Troubadours and Trouvères, ed. S. N. Rosenberg et al. (1998); Troubadours, ed. S. Gaunt and S. Kay (1999); Troubadour Poems from the South of France, trans. W. D. Paden and F. F. Paden (2007).

W. D. PADEN

TROUVÈRE. Med. lyric poet of northern France. The term corresponds to Occitan (of southern France) troubadour; it is commonly applied to northern Fr. lyric poets who composed in the troubadour manner, but not to distinctively Fr. lyric poets such as Rutebeuf or the authors of OF narrative. We know over 300 troubadours by name and over 200 trouvères. Troubadour lyrics were written ca. 1100–1300 and waned with the decline of the Occitan lang.; extant trouvère production began somewhat later, ca. 1190, and continued until ca. 1300, when Fr. poetry evolved into new forms. The lyric corpus in the two langs. is comparable in size (about 2,500 songs); the trouvères cultivated esp. the genres of the courtly chanson or love song, religious verse, and the pastourelle*, while avoiding the sirventes* or satire. Genres in the popular style, better preserved in Fr. than in Occitan, include the mal mariée*, the chanson de toile*, and dance songs such as the rondet de carole, the balete, and the estampie (see ESTAMPIDA). We have the melodies for only one-tenth of troubadour poems, but for three-quarters of those of the trouvères.

See FRANCE, POETRY OF; OCCITAN POETRY.

■ Anthologies: The Medieval Lyric, ed. M. Switten et al., 3 v. (1987–88); The Anglo-Norman Lyric, ed. D. L. Jeffrey and B. J. Levy (1990); Chansons des trouvères, ed. S. N. Rosenberg (1995); 'Prions en chantant': Devotional Songs of the Trouvères, ed. M. J. Epstein (1997); Songs of the Women Trouvères, ed. E. Doss-Quinby et al. (2001).

■ Bibliographies: H. Spanke, G. Raynauds Bibliographie des altfranzösischen Liedes neu bearbeitet und ergänzt (1955); N.H.J. van den Boogaard, Rondeaux et refrains du XIIe siècle au début du XIVe (1969); R. W. Linker, Bibliography of Old French Lyrics (1979); E. Doss-Quinby, The Lyrics of the Trouvères: A Research Guide (1970–1990) (1994); M. L. Switten, Music and Poetry in the Middle Ages: A Guide to Research on French and Occitan Song, 1100–1400 (1995).

■ Criticism and History: J. Frappier, La Poésie lyrique française aux XIIe et XIIIe siècles (1954); R. Dragonetti, La Technique poétique des trouvères dans la chanson courtoise (1960); R. Guiette, D'une poésie formelle en France au moyen âge (1972); P. Zumthor, Essai de poétique médiévale (1972); Bec—study with texts; W. Pfeffer, "Constant Sorrow: Emotions and the Women Trouvères," The Representation of Women's Emotions in Medieval and Early Modern Culture, ed. L. Perfetti (2005); M. O'Neill, Courtly Love Songs of Medieval France (2006); M. G. Grossel, "'J'ai trové qui m'amera': Chansons de femmes et 'troveresses' dans la lyrique d'oïl," Chançon legiere a chanter, ed. K. Fresco and W. Pfeffer (2007); H. Dell, Desire by Gender and Genre in Trouvère Song (2008).

■ Versification and Music: U. Mölk and F. Wolfzettel, Répertoire métrique de la poésie lyrique française des origines à 1350 (1972); H. van der Werf, The Chansons of the Troubadours and Trouvères (1972); J. Stevens, Words and Music in the Middle Ages (1986); C. Page, The Owl and the Nightingale: Musical Life and Ideas in France, 1100–1300 (1989).

W. D. PADEN

TUMBLING VERSE. A phrase used by King James VI of Scotland in his Reulis and Cautelis (1584) for making Scottish verse to characterize lines that in mod. terminology we would say are loosely anapestic or else in falling rhythm and four-stress *accentual verse. James distinguishes "tumbling" verse from "flowing" (text in Smith, 1.218–19, 223, 407n); the latter clearly means "regular," so the former may simply mean *doggerel, i.e., irregular, rough. He also terms it "rouncefallis" (OED, "rouncival") and associates it with *flyting. In Eng. poetry, the example of tumbling verse usually pointed to is Thomas Tusser's very popular Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry (1557 et seq.), which is in *anapests and other meters. Schipper thought that tumbling verse was the descendant of the ME alliterative line, a view now abandoned. Ker relates it to the four-stress lines of popular song, ballad meter, and Sp. arte mayor. Tumbling verse seems more likely crude terminology than any distinct species of verse.

■ Schipper, 2.223–25; Smith; Schipper, History, 89–90; Saintsbury, Prosody, 1.326–28, 408; W. P. Ker, Form and Style in Poetry (1928); C. S. Lewis, English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Excluding Drama (1954)—discusses Tusser; D. Parkinson, "Alexander Montgomerie, James VI, and 'Tumbling Verse,' " Loyal Letters, ed. L.A.J.R. Houwen and A. A. MacDonald (1994).

T.V.F. Brogan

TURKIC POETRY

I. Oral Poets in Central Asian Nomadic Turkic Society
II. Pre-Islamic Poetry
III. Islamic Poetry
IV. The Modern Period

I. Oral Poets in Central Asian Nomadic Turkic Society. The term Central Asia is here understood as the region of the newly independent Turkic republics of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, and Turkmenistan. After Russia had concluded its conquest of the region (1864–89), it became known as Rus. Turkistan, which also included Tajikistan. Under Soviet rule (1917–91), the territory was referred to as Kazakhstan and Central Asia. The following is an overview of common devels. in Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Uzbek, and Turkmen poetry and prosody.

The Kazakhs, Kyrgyz, Turkmens, and the so-called Kypchak Uzbeks led a nomadic or seminomadic life until the beginning of the 1930s, when Soviet policies forced them to become sedentary. Nomads in general honored oral poets called aqïn, jïrchï/ïrchï (Kaz., Kyr.), jïrau (Kaz.), bagshï/baxshi (Trkm., Uzb.), or dostonchi, shoir (Uzb.) who were the historians of their tribes and tribal groups, accompanying themselves on the dombïra (Kaz.) or the dutar/dutor (Trkm., Uzb.), a two-stringed lute, or the qobïz/komuz (Kaz., Kyr.), qopuz (Trkm.), a two- or three-stringed fiddle. These poets sang heroic and romantic-lyrical epic songs and competed in singing contests of improvised poetry in which women too participated.

The oral poets enjoyed a high status in Turkic nomadic society. Well-known Kazakh aqïn/jïrau would serve as advisors to khans, as, e.g., Bûxar jïrau (ca. 1693–1787) served Khan Ablay (1711–81), himself a gifted singer and küychi (composer of melodies). Kazakh singer/poets were also known as leaders of the many uprisings the Kazakhs staged against the Rus. conquerors. Famous is the aqïn Maxambet Ütemisûlï (1804–46), who together with his friend Isatay Taymanûlï led an uprising in 1837–38. He composed several fiery songs against some of the khans who had collaborated with the Russians. In one of them, he sings, Xan emessiñ—qasqïrsiñ.

Qara albastï basqïrsïñ.
Dostarïñ kelip tabalap,
Dûspanïñ seni basqa ursïn!

(You are not a khan—you are a wolf.
You are an evil spirit, an oppressor.
May your friends scorn you,
May your enemy hit you on the head!)

Maxambet's outspokenness was much admired. He inspired generations of Kazakh poets before and after the establishment of Soviet colonial rule in 1917. His continuing influence can be seen in a collection of poems about him written by 98 Kazakh poets between 1963 and 2003 (Jïr arqauï—Maxambet [The Power of the Song—Maxambet], 2003).

II. Pre-Islamic Poetry

A. Orkhon Turkic Poetry. All Turkic peoples consider the funeral inscriptions of the 8th c., written in the Turkic runic alphabet and known as the Orkhon Inscriptions, their common heritage. Although the texts were written in prose, certain lines have always stood out as lines of poetry. A good example is the Kül Tegin Inscription, inscribed on a stele erected in 732 for Prince (Tegin) Kül, the younger brother of Bilgä Kaghan, "the Wise Kaghan" (d. 734). Bilgä Kaghan himself eloquently commemorates in the second part of the inscription the life story of his brother Kül, relating his accomplishments and campaigns until his death: inim kül tegin kärgäk boltï (My younger brother Kül passed away). At this point, Bilgä Kaghan is overcome by grief:

Özim saqïntïm.
Körir közim körmäz täg boltï
Bilir bilgim bilmäz täg boltï
Özim saqïntïm.

(I mourned deeply.
My eyes, always seeing, became like not-seeing.
My mind, always knowing, became like not-knowing.
So much I mourned.)

By arranging the above lines, written as prose in the original text, into consecutive lines, we have before us the original, pre-Islamic metrical scheme of Turkic poetry characterized by a fixed number of syllables in each line expressing one complete idea. The internal *alliteration in the second and third verse lines is remarkable. The end rhyme occurs as the result of *repetition and *parallelism. By repeating the same sentence structure, the same one-syllabic suffix will appear at the end of each verse line, creating a simple grammatical end rhyme.

Poetical lines like those cited above prompted Stebleva (1965) and Joldasbekov (1986) to rearrange the prose texts, particularly those of the Kül Tegin and the Tonyuquq Inscriptions into verses and to translate them into Rus. and Kazakh, respectively. In doing so, both scholars paid attention to the close connection between the poetic style of the inscriptions and the memorial songs and *laments recorded much later, considered to be the foundation of the Turkic heroic epic (Joldasbekov, Winner). The Orkhon Inscriptions present the first written examples of Turkic oral poetry.

B. Old Uighur Poetry and the Syllabic Meter/Initial Alliteration. Written Old Uighur poetry that has come down to us dating from the 8th to the 13th c. can be considered a continuation of the Orkhon Turkic poetry with one additional distinctive feature: initial alliteration. The written Manichaean and Buddhist Old Uighur poetry (Arat) displays the fully developed features of the syllabic meter that became known as barmak (finger) meter (ttü. parmak hesabi, finger counting). On the basis of the examples given by Arat, one can characterize the barmak as follows: (1) restricted number of syllables in each verse line, the preferred number being seven or eight, but extension to 11 or 14 syllables is also possible; (2) initial alliteration, whereby the initial word of two or more consecutive verse lines must start with the same syllable, consisting either of a vowel or a consonant and a vowel (the vowels u and o and ö and ü are equivalent in alliteration).

The syllabic meter with mostly seven or eight syllables, combined with initial alliteration, has been considered the traditional meter of Central Asian Turkic oral lit., particularly of the epic songs such as the Kyrgyz heroic epic Manas. Most likely because of the influence of the singers of Manas, many of today's Kyrgyz poets continue to use initial alliteration with the barmak meter. The situation is different in Kazakhstan. Texts of heroic epic songs recorded in the second half of the 19th c. rarely show lines with initial alliteration, although they use syllabic meter. However, some Kazakh oral poets like Maxambet employed initial alliteration in their songs, as in the example above. Kazakh-writing poets of the crucial period before and after the establishment of Soviet rule, like Maġjan Jumabayûlï (1893–1938), seemed to have revived the initial alliteration in some of their patriotic songs. In Uzbek, as in Ottoman Turkish poetry, initial alliteration seems to be less known, though the barmak meter is widely employed in oral as well as written poetry (Andrews). The strongest use of initial alliteration in combination with the seven- or eight-syllabic meter is to be found in Mongolian oral poetry, notably in epic songs (Poppe). It survived in mod. Mongolian written poetry (Wickham-Smith and Shagdarsüren). The prevalence of initial alliteration in conjunction with the syllabic seven or eight meter among the Altai Turks and the Tuvans (Taube) is probably due to Mongolian influence (Doerfer).

III. Islamic Poetry

A. Arabo-Persian Aruz Meter. With the acceptance of Islam, the knowledge of Ar. and Persian became fashionable among the intellectuals of the sedentary and later the nomadic groups of the Turkic world. Soon Arabo-Persian rules and trads. were introduced, regardless of the fact that they did not fit the Turkic lang. The prosodic system of the Arabo-Persian ʿaruz distinguishes between short and long vowels (see DURATION, QUANTITY), a distinction that does not exist in Turkic (Andrews).

B. Karluk-Karakhanid Poetry. The first Turkic poetical work displaying the influence of Arabo-Persian prosody is the Qutadgu Bilig (The Knowledge of How to Become Happy, 1069–70) by Yusuf Hass Hajib, who wrote the work in Karakhanid Turkic or Middle Turkic, based on Old Turkic, i.e., Orkhon Turkic and Old Uighur. In his choice of verse pattern, the poet was influenced by Firdawsī's (940–1025) use of the Arabo-Persian mutaqārib in the Shah-nameh (Dankoff).

C. Chagatay Turkic Poetry. Like in the Qutadgu Bilig, a sense of urgency of writing down one's life experiences as a lesson for future generations can also be detected in Mir Alisher Navāʾī's (1441–1501) last work Mahbub-ul-qulub (The Beloved of the Hearts, composed its 1500). The work consists of three parts. The first two present a crit. of society, whereas the third part, Tanbihlar (Admonitions), consists of authoritative advice in the oral style of *proverbs. Indeed, Navāʾī's words were soon accepted as proverbs, cited by Uzbek elders even today, as, e.g., tilga ihtiyorsiz, elga eʾtiborsiz (Disrespect for one's language is disregard for one's people). Navāʾī wrote mostly in Chagatay Turkic and has been revered as the promoter of the Chagatay Turkic literary lang. However, his extensive use of Persian and Ar. words cannot be overlooked. He also favored exclusively the Arabo-Persian meter and poetical forms, as, e.g., the ghazal*. The 15th c., esp. the second half, has been called the golden period of Chagatay Turkic poetry. Because of Navāʾī's Majālis un-nafāʾis (Meeting of the Finest, 1492), a collection of short biographies of over 400 poets with citations of their works, we are well informed about the poets of that time.

IV. The Modern Period

A. From Oral to Written Poetry. Among the forerunners of the mod. period was the much revered Turkmen poet Makhtumquli (Trkm. Magtïmguli, 1733–98). Like Navāʾī, Makhtumquli was a Sufi. His poems express mystical-religious messages, wisdom, and advice like those of the Sufi saint Ahmad Yasawī (d. 1166). Concerned with the political situation of the Turkmen tribes, he also composed patriotic songs calling on the Turkmens to unite in the face of attempts by Persia, Chiwa, and Bukhara to occupy their territory. Makhtumquli is considered the first Turkmen poet to write his verses; his counterparts in the other Turkic regions are the Kazakh oral poet Abay (1845–1904) and the Kyrgyz Moldo Kilich (1868–1917). Like Makhtumquli, Abay received his first education in Muslim schools (maktab, madrasa), learned Persian and Ar., and became acquainted with cl. Persian-Ar. lit. Later, he studied Rus. and translated many Rus. poets into Kazakh. His greatest concern was the survival of the Kazakh trads., lang., and culture after the Rus. conquest of the Kazakh steppe. Kilich composed his poetry in such a pure Kyrgyz that it was suggested that his lang. be made a model for a common literary lang. for all Turkic people, one of the goals of the reformer Ismail Gaspirali/Gasprinskiy (1851–1914). Kyrgyz scholars termed his poems ghazals (Kyr. kazal) without commenting on his frequent initial alliteration, short lines of seven or eight syllables, and the lack of strophic arrangements. In 1910, he composed a long poem, Zilzala, about an earthquake which had occurred in the same year in northern Kyrgyzstan. He describes in this poem the earthquake itself and predicts that in five or six years more calamities will strike the Kyrgyz. These lines have been interpreted as a forecast of the great uprising of 1916, when the Central Asian Turkic people revolted against Rus. colonialism.

B. Poetry of the Jadids/Reformers, 1905–38. Meanwhile in the region of the Kazakhs, Abay's concern about the future of his people was soon taken up by other Kazakh intellectuals. Their voices were echoed in the neighboring Turkic regions as well, becoming stronger and stronger after 1905, the year of Russia's defeat in its war against Japan, demonstrating to the Central Asians that Russia was not invincible. In all Central Asian Turkic regions intellectuals (Jadids) established schools according to the methods (usul-i jadid) of the Crimean Tatar Gaspirali/Gasprinskiy. While they cared about their native langs. and the education and status of girls and women, their ultimate concern was freedom from Rus. and Soviet colonial oppression. The Jadids' preferred medium for reaching out to the public was poetry. The Kazakh Jadids, by some called enlighteners, Baytursïnûlï (1873–1937), Älixan Bökeyxanûlï (1870–1937), and others, though originally not known for their poetry, trained themselves as poets. Writing or composing poetry was expected of any educated Central Asian, and only poetry was considered lit. Moreover, the high regard for the oral poet as a leader and teacher had been transferred to the writing poet. In the Central Asian Turkic regions, written poems, if well received, would become songs (Kaz. öleń), thus reaching a wider audience.

The voices from Uzbekistan were equally powerful, reminding the people of their hist. and invoking the spirits of their ancestors. Abdurauf Fitrat (1886–1938), a scholar and educator who had spent several years in Istanbul, appealed in his poems to the spirit of Amir Temur (1336–1405) to help the Turkic people gain their freedom. His poetry is written in a free style or in the barmak (Uzbek barmoq) meter. He was against the use of the ʿaruz meter and urged his contemporaries to write in the syllabic barmoq, which he called "our national meter." Next to Fitrat, the most influential and courageous poet of the period was Abdulhamid Sulayman (1898–1938), known as Cholpon (the Morning Star). Like Fitrat and other Jadids, he felt obligated as a poet to be a spokesperson for his people, disregarding any dangers. His poetic style shows many variations, with no preference for Arabo-Persian prosody. To some of his poems, he would give the title qo'shiq (folk song), or he would even indicate the melody for a given poem, as if he were striving to become an oral poet through the combined power of word and sound. A few lines from one of his most frequently sung and cited poems will show the intensity of his words:

Men va Boshqalar
Kulgan boshqalar, yig'lagan menman
O'ynagan boshqalar, yigragan menman,
Erk ertaklarini eshitgan boshqa.
Qulluq qo'shig'ini tinglagan menman. . .
Erkin boshqalardir, kamalgan menman,
Hayvon qatorida sanalgan menman. (1921)

(I and the Others
Others are laughing, but I am weeping,
Others are playing, but I am wailing,
Others are hearing tales of freedom,
Only I listen to words of slavery.
Others are free, only I am a prisoner,
Only I am treated like an animal.)

As a subtitle to this poem, Cholpon added the words "From the Mouth of an Uzbek Girl," prompting many readers to interpret it as a reflection of the restricted life of women living behind the walls of the traditional homes in Uzbekistan. It is more likely, however, that Cholpon is describing here life in general and his own life under Soviet rule. He voices similar sentiments in other poems pub. in 1922 in a collection titled Uyg'onish (Awakening), e.g., in Vijdon erki (Freedom of Conscience), where he concludes "faqat, erkin vijdonlarga / ege bo'lmoq munkin emes" ([Tyrants] can never control free consciences).

In 1937–38, all Jadids mentioned above and countless more were shot on the orders of Josef Stalin. During these years, Kazakhstan alone lost about 60,000 intellectuals. The Uzbek losses may have been even higher. Stalin's purges affected not only individuals but their families, who were also sent to concentration camps. Generally, poets and writers could be grouped in two: the silent or silenced ones and those who carried out the directives of the Communist Party. All this changed with the death of Stalin in March 1953, when the terror was lifted.

C. The Generation of the 1960s: Heralds of Independence. With the new Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev's denouncement of Stalin's crimes in 1956, a period of relaxation began, called the Thaw. Censorship became less strict, and Stalin's victims who were still alive were released from the gulags. Those who had perished were posthumously acquitted. A young generation of poets and writers, who were between 20 and 30 years of age at the beginning of the 1960s, became known as the Generation of the 1960s. Their first task was to challenge the restrictive Soviet doctrine of "Socialist Realism." Next, they took up the question the Jadids had asked: "Who were we, who are we now?" Like the much admired Kyrgyz writer Chingiz Aitmatov (1928–2008), who raised this question in all his works, poets reminded their compatriots to honor the spirits of their ancestors and to respect their traditions and values. Some wrote patriotic poems about their own motherland and their own people. Others wrote about historical personalities. The Uzbek poet Muhammad Ali (b. 1942), e.g., composed a lengthy poem (doston) about Amir Temur in 1967 and in 1979 a doston centered on Dukchi Eshon, the leader of the 1898 uprising against the Russian colonizers. During the years of Gorbachev's glasnost and perestroika (1985–91) Central Asian Turkic poets and writers of the generation of the 1960s became fully engaged in the struggle for independence, which they helped to achieve in 1991.

See ARABIC POETRY, ORAL POETRY, PERSIAN POETRY.

■ General Introductions: B. Hayit, "Die Sowjetisierung Turkistans," Turkestan im XX. Jahrhundert (1956); A. Adamovich, "The Non-Russians," Soviet Literature in the Sixties, ed. M. Hayward and E. I. Crowley (1964); E. Allworth, "The Changing Intellectual and Literary Community" and "The Focus on Literature," Central Asia: 130 Years of Russian Dominance, A Historical Overview, ed. E. Allworth (1994).

■ Pre-Islamic Literature: R. R. Arat, Eski Türk Şiiri (1965); A. Bombaci, "The Turkic Literatures: Introductory Notes on the History and Style"; and G. Doerfer, "Die Literatur der Türken Südsibiriens," Philologiae Turcicae Fundamenta, ed. J. Deny and L. Bazin, v. 2 (1965); I. V. Stebleva, Poetika Drevnetyurkskoy Literatury i ee Transformatsiya v Ranne-Klassiceskiy Period (1976); N. Poppe, The Heroic Epic of the Khalkha Mongols, trans. J. Krueger, D. Montgomery, M. Walter (1979); A. von Gabain, "Zentralasiatische türkische Literaturen I: Nichtislamische alt-türkische Literatur," Handbuch der Orientalistik, ed. H. Altenmüller et al. (1982); M. Joldasbekov, Asïl Arnalar (1986); K. Reichl, Turkic Oral Epic Poetry: Tradition, Form, Poetic Structure (1992).

■ Islamic Period: J. Eckmann, "Die Tschagataische Literatur"; and M. F. Köprülü, "La Metrique 'Aruz Dans la Poesie Turque, Philologiae Turcicae Fundamenta, ed. J. Deny and L. Bazin, v. 2 (1965); Z. V. Togan, "Zentralasiatische Türkische Literaturen II: Die Islamische Zeit," Handbuch der Orientalistik, Turkologie, ed. H. Altenmüller et al. (1982); W. G. Andrews, Poetry's Voice, Society's Song (1985); O. Nosirov, "Aruz va O'zbek xalq og'zaki ijodi," Xalq ijodi xazinasi, ed. O. Nosirov and O. Sobirov (1986).

■ Regions. Kazakh: T. G. Winner, The Oral Art and Literature of the Kazakhs of Russian Central Asia (1958); Qazaq Poeziyasïndağï Dästür Ûlasuï, ed. A. Narïmbetov et al. (1981)—trad. in Kazakh poetry; XV–XVIII Ġasïrdağï Qazaq Poeziyasï, ed. A. Derbiselin et al. (1982); XIX: Ġasïrdağï Qazaq Poeziyasï, ed. A. Derbiselin, B. Aqmuqanova et al. (1985)—anthol. of 19th-c. lit; Bes Ġasïr jïrlaydï. 15. Gasïrdan 20. ġasïrdïñ bas kezine deyingi qazaq aqïn-jïraularnïñ shïgarmalarï, ed. M. Maġauïn and M. Baydildaev (1989); M. Dulatûlï, Oyan Qazaq (1991); Qazaqtïñ XVIII–XIX Ġasïrdağï ädebiyetiniñ tarixïnan oçerkter, ed. S. Muqanov (2002)—hist. of 18th and 19th-c. lit. Kyrgyz: M. Kïlïç, Kazaldar, ed. Sooronov (1991)—ghazals; Z. Bektenov and T. Bayjiev, Kïrgïz adabiyatï (1993); Manas: Kïrgïz elinin baatïrdïk eposu. Sagïmbay Orozbakovdun variantï boyuncha akademiyalïk basïlïshï, 3 v. (1995)—Manas, Kyrgyz national epic; "Kïrgïz Ruxu—Manas," Ala-Too (1995)—spec. iss. on Manas. Turkmen: Türkmen Poeziyasïniñ Antologiyasï (1958)—anthol.; J. Benzing, "Die Türkmenische Literatur," Philologiae Turcicae Fundamenta, ed. J. Deny and L. Bazin, v. 2 (1965); Mahtumkulu Divani, ed. H. Biray (1992)—divan of Makhtumquli; W. Feldman, "Interpreting the Poetry of Makhtumquli," Muslims in Central Asia: Expressions of Identity and Change, ed. J.-A. Gross (1992); Songs from the Steppes of Central Asia: The Collected Poems of Makhtumkuli, Eighteenth Century Poet-Hero of Turkmenistan, ed. B. Aldiss, trans. Y. Azemoun (1995); S. Zeranska-Kominek and Arnold Lebeuf, The Tale of Crazy Harman, trans. J. Ossowski (1997). Uzbek: E. Vohidov, Muhabbat: Saylanma, 2 v. (1986)—poetry; E. Allworth, The Modern Uzbeks: From the Fourteenth Century to the Present: A Cultural History (1990); T. Kocaoglu, "Özbekler ve Özbek Edebiyati," Türk Dili ve Edebiyati Ansiklopedisi 7 (1990); B. Orak, "Modern Özbek Edebiyati va Erkin Vohidov," Erkin Vohidov: Seçme Şiirler, ed. B. Orak (1991); M. Ali, Saylanma (1997)—poetry; A. Oripov, Tanlangan Asarlar, 4 v. (2000).

■ Translations: T. Tekin, A Grammar of Orkhon Turkic (1968); Tuwinische Lieder: Volksdichtungen aus der Westmongolei, ed. and trans. E. Taube (1980)—oral poetry from western Mongolia; Y. K. Hajib, Wisdom of Royal Glory (Kutadgu Bilig): A Turko-Islamic Mirror of Princes, trans. R. Dankoff (1983); Rawshan: Ein Usbekisches Mündliches Epos, trans. K. Reichl (1985)—oral epic Ravshan; S. Cabbar, Kurtulush Yolïnda: A Work on Central Asian Literature in a Turkish-Uzbek Mixed Language (2000)—Jadid period poetry; Das usbekische Heldenepos Alpomish: Einführung, Text, Übersetzung, trans. K. Reichl (2001)—epic Alpomish; Ancient Splendor: The Best of Mongolian Poetry, ed. and trans. S. Wickham-Smith and T. Shagdarsüren (2006); The Semetey of Kenja Kara: A Kirghiz Epic Performance on Phonograph with Musical Score and AC, ed. and trans. D. Prior (2006).

I. LAUDE-CIRTAUTAS

TURKISH POETRY

I. Early Poetry: Prosody, Form, Content
II. The History of Ottoman/Azeri Poetry
III. The Tanzimat and the Dawn of Modernism
IV. Modern Turkish and Azeri Poetry
V. Modern Azeri Poetry

The poetry of the major western Turkic dialects, Azeri, and Ottoman Turkish are the heirs of two quite different trads.: that of Turkic peoples with roots in Central Asia and an adopted Perso-Ar. Islamicate high-culture trad. (Here and below, Islamicate and Persianate refer to the fact that not all "Islamic" style poetry was written by Muslims and not all "Persian" poetry was written by Persians.) When Turkic peoples began to enter the central Middle East in large numbers as invaders or settlers in the 11th c., they encountered a highly developed Persian literary trad. dominated by poetry. At the courts of Turkic rulers and among the intellectual and literary elites in Asia Minor, the early tendency was to adopt Persian as the lang. of poetry, together with its verse forms, style, and poetic sensibility. At the same time, village and nomadic Turks generally retained their native forms and lang., which had gradually absorbed themes and some vocabulary from the Islamicate trad. since as early as the 9th c. in Central Asia. The tensions, divisions, and junctions between these two distinct formal and ling. trads. and their reflections of class and status ground nearly all general discussions of Turkish poetry of all periods.

I. Early Poetry: Prosody, Form, Content. The Turkish lang. does not recognize vowel qualities (vowel length and brevity, or accent) as rhythmic elements, so the traditional prosody of the Turkic dialects—called parmak hesabı (finger counting) or hece vezni (syllable meter)—was based on the number of syllables in a line and on repeated groups of syllables separated by *caesuras (+). E.g., an 11-syllable line might scan as 11 unbroken syllables and repeat itself in that form throughout a poem. However, each 11-syllable line in another poem might be broken by caesuras into groups of 4+4+3 syllables or, in yet another poem, 5+6 syllables. There are many possible syllable counts for a poetic line and many possible groupings, and each verse form has its own preferred line lengths and groupings. E.g., the following is one 4+3 stanza of a verse form called mani, in which the four-line stanzas rhyme aaba ccda:

Kız saçların + örmezler
Seni bana + vermezler
Sen bu gece + bana kaç
Ay karanlık + görmezler

(Girl they'll never + braid thy hair
Let us live as + wedded pair
So tonight run + off to me
Moonless dark will + hide us there)

Turkish poetry—written, oral, and sung—in this trad. has continued to be popular from the earliest days of the Turkish presence in the western Middle East to the present. Although the popular trad. is generally oral and anonymous, even the devel. of a high-culture Turkish poetry in the Persian style was strongly influenced by mystical love (aşk, ışk) poetry in popular Turkish forms with which Sufi missionaries began to spread Muslim mysticism among Turkish and non-Turkish villagers and nomads at least as early as the 12th c. Perhaps the most widely known poet from this period is Yunus Emre (late 13th, early 14th cs.), whose nondoctrinal mystical verses hover between Persianate and Turkic forms as in the following excerpt in four-line stanzas with a *refrain and eight-syllable lines (4+4×2) rhyming aaab cccb:

Ben yürürem + yana yana // aşk boyadı + beni kana
Ne âkilem + ne divane // gel gör beni + aşk neyledi

Geh eserim yiller gibi geh tozarım yollar gibi
Geh akarım seller gibi gel gör beni aşk neyledi

(I go and as + I go I cry // love's painted me + with bloody dye
Nor wise nor wit + less now am I // come see what love + has made of me

Now just like the winds do I blow, then like the roads all dusty grow
Now like the torrents do I flow, come see what love has made of me)

Following the Mongol invasions of the mid-13th c., the Seljuk dynasty of Rum (Asia Minor) lost control of large areas that were dominated culturally and intellectually by Persian and Ar. This, combined with the need to express the Islamic cultural heritage in a lang. that they and their supporters could understand, inclined Turkic rulers to begin demanding and patronizing Turkish poetry in the Persian style.

The Turkish version of the Perso-Ar. trad. employs the traditional Islamic verse forms: the gazel (Ar. ghazal)*, a more or less sonnet-length lyric love poem; the kaside (Ar. qaṣīda*), a longer *panegyric or occasional poem; the mesnevi (Ar. mathnavī), an extended narrative poem in rhyming couplets, rubāʿī (quatrain), and an assortment of stanzaic forms incl. some (şarkı, türkü, tuyuğ) that closely resemble popular Turkic forms. The basic building block of these forms is the couplet (beyt) and all, except the mesnevi and some stanzaic forms, are monorhyming, most often with a rhyming first couplet. Serious poets collected their poems in volumes called divans* and this type of Ottoman-Azeri poetry is often referred to as divan poetry.

The prosodic system, which the Turks called aruz, is a further adaptation of the Persian adaptation of the formal rhythms of Ar. In all three cases, rhythm is created by the alternation of "long" syllables (cV: consonant + long vowel) or cvc (consonant + short vowel + consonant) and "short" syllables (cv) grouped into "feet" of various lengths (e. g., short [u] + long [—] + long [u——] or long + short + long + long [—u——]), which are combined in standardized rhythmic lines (miṣraʿ). In Ar., the feet have some syllables that can be lengthened or shortened. In Persian, the feet are fixed, with a few minor exceptions, and flexibility is achieved by permitting certain vowels (e.g., the vowel of the izafet [the adjectival/genitive connector] and the "vocalic h = a/e") to be read as either long or short and by using "shortened" versions of some common words (e. g., māh = > meh [moon]). Ottoman Turkish poets, who copiously adopted Persian and Ar. vocabulary and even some syntax, created their own adaptation of Persian prosody and its flexibility, much as the Persians had adapted Ar. Because there are no long vowels in Turkish, only "closed" (cvc), syllables are naturally long according to Perso-Ar. prosody, and words with extended strings of short (cv) syllables are quite common. However, unlike Ar. and Persian, there was no fixed spelling of Turkish words in the Ar.-Ottoman script, so it was always possible, although frowned on to some extent, to spell Turkish words using some Ar.-Ottoman script long vowels and at times to consider such vowels as long for purposes of rhythm. The following is the initial couplet, with an indication of scansion and rhyme, of a five-couplet gazel by Zātā (1471–1546), an elite Ottoman poet of the early 16th c.:

u — — — / u — — — / u — — —/u — — —
Garībem gur/bete düşdüm/ gönül āvā/re yār*um yok*
Benüm āh etdügüm ʿayb etmen kim ihtiyār*um yok*

(I'm a stranger, plunged into exile, my heart a vagabond, no beloved do I have
Do not find fault with me, when I go around sighing, for no choice do I have)

In these lines, the rhyme is in ār (underlined) with a repeated postrhyme element called redif (originally the name for a warrior who rides on the back of another's saddle).

Poetry that adapted the Perso-Ar. trad. was hugely popular among western Turkish speakers during the Ottoman period, from the 14th c. through the early 20th. Hundreds upon hundreds of recognized poets from rulers, high officials, and courtiers to soldiers, shopkeepers, and mendicant dervishes are recorded in the collections of biographies of poets of every era and were said to be only the visible members of a vast poetic population. Although poems were written about almost everything, the core of Ottoman and Azeri elite poetry, whether lyric, narrative, or panegyric, was the emotional content of a love, most commonly homoerotic love, which often carried with it a burden, large or small, of mystical passion. In a context where public expressions of heterosexual love were disapproved, love poetry commonly had as its object young men, some of whom became quite famous. The presumed occasion of this poetry was a gathering of friends (often transmuted into mystical [dervish] ceremonial gatherings) that in many ways resembled the Gr. symposion, in which food, drink (often alcoholic), witty conversation, love, music, and, above all, poetry were the primary ingredients. Its setting was an idealized garden—reflected everywhere in Ottoman art and decoration—wherein every natural phenomenon was a potential metaphor for some feature of the lover, the beloved, and the gathering.

II. The History of Ottoman-Azeri Poetry. The periodization of Ottoman-Azeri poetry is a controversial topic. However, it is possible to sketch some broad tendencies and trends. The rise of the Ottomans as the dominant power in western Anatolia and Eastern Europe, which began in the second quarter of the 14th c., initiated a gradual consolidation of literary *patronage affirmed by an Ottoman literary historical view that adopted, as Ottoman precursors, famous early poets such as Şeyhi (d. ca. 1431), a court poet whose primary patron was the prince of the independent province of Germiyan, and Nesimi (d. ca. 1404), an Eastern Anatolian-Syrian Azeri mystical poet.

The centralization of Ottoman Islamic poetic production escalated with the conquest of Constantinople in 1453. The patronage of poetry burgeoned in the court of Mehmet the Conqueror. His grand vizier and court poet Ahmet Pasha (d. 1469) is said to have raised the level of Ottoman poetry to compete with Persian, in part by translating some Chagatai (Eastern Turkic) gazels by Mir Ali Shir Neva'i (1441–1501) sent from the court of the Timurid ruler Huseyn Baykara in Herat. At much the same time, the other acknowledged foundational poet, known by the pseud. Necati (1451?–1509), rose from slave status to wealth and fame with verses such as the following that reflect his skill at combining folk wisdom with the most refined themes:

The whole world is ignited by your beauty from the tip of your locks
When they happen by night, fires cause the populace great loss

Is it any wonder that my heart moans as you give me advice
You should know, if they sprinkle water on it, the fire cries out

By the late 15th c., the stage had been set for the great Ottoman renaissance of Islamic culture that would take place in the 16th c. At the cultural pinnacle, Turkish incorporated the vocabularies of Persian and Ar. to create a ling. tool capable of astounding flights of rhetorical fancy, which adorned expressions of intense emotional power. From the Anatolian courts of Ottoman princes and cultural centers in Eastern Europe, poets flocked to the capital, competing to join the literary salons of the rich and powerful. The princely court of Amasya in the east produced Mihri Hatun (d. ca. 1512), the most famous Ottoman woman poet. The courtly-mystical poet Hayali (d. 1557) came from Vardar Yeniçesi in Bosnia, Zātī from the town of Balıkesir. From the time of Mehmet the Conqueror to the mid-16th c., hundreds of poets received annual stipends from the royal treasury.

During this time, Lami'i (1472–1532) adapted several masterpieces of Persian narrative verse to Turkish, and Ca'fer Chelebi (ca. 1463–1515), a powerful official, composed a unique narrative describing a love affair with a married woman during a spring camping trip to a popular park. Zātī made a living solely on gifts given in exchange for panegyrics and love poems. Even the rulers of the age participated in poetry. Shah Ismail Safavi (1487–1524), founder of the Safavid dynasty of Persia, composed Azeri mystical love poetry in both the Islamicate and popular Turkic trads., which helped rally the Turkmen tribes to his Sufi vision of Shi'ite Islam:

Go now, go now, go . . . let Him be yours
Let a fully committed beloved be yours

If you launch yourself into the air and fly high
Let the sky reaching up from all the earth be yours

Suleyman the Magnificent (r. 1520–66) too was an avid poet and patron of poets. He writes of his beloved wife Hurrem:

My solitude, my everything, my beloved, my gleaming moon
My companion, intimate, my all, lord of beauties, my sultan

My life's essence and span, my sip from the river of Paradise, my Eden
My springtime, my bright joy, my secret, my idol, my laughing rose

In Suleyman's intimate circle was the master poet of the century, Baki (1526–1600), who rose to the second highest canon-law position in the empire and dominated the period with verses, such as the first and last couplets of his famed meditation on old age:

The time of spring has suffered loss of fame and loss of face
The leaves of trees have fallen in the meadow far from grace
. . .
On this meadow-earth, the leaves of books and trees are torn, Baki
It seems they have a true complaint against the winds of time and fate

The Iraqi poet Fuzuli (d. 1556), who compiled divans in Ar., Persian, and Azeri Turkish, is much beloved by the Turks and is considered an Ottoman poet, which has more to do with the conquest of Iraq in 1534 than his actual lang. and culture. He composed exquisite love poetry often in a mystical mode and produced a retelling of the mystical love story of Leyla and Mecnun in Azeri Turkish. The following is an example of his passionate mystical verses:

My heart blooms joyous when it sees your tousled locks
I lose the power to speak, when I see your rosebud laughing

I look at you, blood spatters from my eyes
When our glances meet, eyelash arrows pierce my heart

By the 17th c., the regularization of bureaucratic and intellectual institutions combined with a decline in patronage reduced opportunities for aspiring poets, many of whom then found their inspiration in dervish lodges rather than in the gatherings of the powerful. Nonetheless, one of the most brilliant poets of the age, Nef ʿi (d. 1635), was best known as a court panegyrist (and lampooner of rivals and stingy patrons). His most famous panegyric begins with a paean to spring initiated by the following couplet (with a supererogatory internal rhyme reminiscent of popular quatrains):

As the springtime breezes blew, at morn the roses bloomed anew
Oh let our hearts be blooming too, please, saki, pass the cup of Djem

Perhaps the most striking elite poetic movement during this period was the introduction of an adaptation of the Persian "Indian Style" (named for the style perfected in the Mughal courts of India). Complex and often formidably obscure, this style was esp. suitable for mystical verse, as the following by Na'ili (d. 1666) exemplifies:

Who thirsts with dry lips for the stream of desire, slips onto paths of rejection
Who rushes in haste after his desire, ever wanders the waste of distraction

The 17th-c. decline in opportunity for poets at the elite level is balanced by the burgeoning of more popular poetry. The saz (long lute) poets and wandering aşıks (lovers) like the famed Aşık Ömer (d. ca. 1707), who also dabbled in elite-style verses, provided a link between elite and common, village and city with their verses most often set to music. E.g., from Aşık Ömer,

I'm a lover, alas, alack
Bewitched by you, don't burn me black
Keep that dog of a rival back
One soul has tight embraced another

In the early 18th c., an era of peace and the rise of a prosperous merchant class led to a period of exuberant cultural production called the Tulip Period (1718–30) after the tulip craze that swept the Ottoman Empire and Europe. In an atmosphere of lavish spending on parties, pleasure gardens, and parks, poetry flourished, typified by the poems of Nedim (d. 1730), many of which echoed the lang., forms, and topical themes of popular verse, as in this example:

Saki, let my soul rejoin my body, come to the gathering
To that goblet sacrifice all promises and all repenting
Have a care where you set your foot, my monarch and my king
There may be wine spilt here and too the broken bottles of the drunks

The latter years of the century were marked by the poetic genius of Şeyh Galip (1757–99), who while still young became the master of a prestigious Mevlevi dervish lodge, the confidant of a reformist sultan, and the author of an original narrative poem entitled "Beauty and Love" that represents an allegorical summing up in the Indian style of the mystical trad. descended from Rūmī and the last great masterpiece of Ottoman narrative poetry.

III. The Tanzimat and the Dawn of Modernism. By the 19th c., the impetus for political, social, and even cultural reform gradually became overwhelming. The reformers were energized, but adherents of the old cultural order despaired, as is poignantly expressed in the following couplet by ʿİzzet Molla (1786–1829):

We have reached a season of spring in this world
When the bulbul is silent, the pool empty and the rose-bed is in ruins

The bulbul, one of the central metaphors of cl. poetry, would soon be relegated to the footnotes of lit. hist. by advocates of literary modernization. Namık Kemal (1840–88), one of the major proponents of constitutionalist reform, subverted the mystical subtext of the ageless *topos and evoked an encaged nightingale crying out for freedom, a direct reference to the liberal inclinations of the Young Ottomans. The new focus of poetry was on the here and now. In the wake of the westernizing Tanzimat reforms of 1839, reformist intellectuals, paying little heed to the high levels of illiteracy, domesticated Fr. literary models and focused on the need to develop an engaged lit. that would enlighten the people and support even more wide-ranging changes. They argued that the metaphorical nature of cl. lit. was unsuited to that purpose. The lang. issue became central. Writers explored ways to bridge the gap between the learned literary lang. and ordinary speech. Though poets, such as İbrahim Şinasi (1826–71), Ziya Paşa (1825–80), and Kemal explored a great variety of new themes, poetry was the least affected by change. Traditional high-culture poetry, its prosody, and its major genres were maintained. This relative conservatism was not surprising since the reformists' main endeavor was the appropriation of new literary genres such as the novel, short story, and drama. Nonetheless, huge controversies raged over the origins, sources of inspiration, and role of poetry.

IV. Modern Turkish and Azeri Poetry. In the light of conflicting influences ranging from Fr. *romanticism to *Parnassianism, poets such as Abdülhak Hamit (1852–1937) and Recaizade Mahmud Ekrem (1847–1914) questioned the instrumentalization of poetry and introduced new aesthetic concerns together with a more confessional dimension. In particular, Ekrem's theoretical writings had a lasting impact on the neo-Parnassian poets of the Edebiyat-ı Cedide (New Literature) group who advocated an elitist art-for-art's-sake approach. Muallim Naci (1850–93) defended ideas that were quite close to those of Ekrem, his nemesis; but as he was closer to intellectual circles linked to the authoritarian regime of Sultan Abdülhamid II, he is unjustly seen as an advocate of literary conservatism by historians. The neo-Parnassian poets' elaborate and sometimes artificial lang. was the source of much crit. by the nationalist proponents of neofolk poetry, who supported the use of the syllabic folk meter and the Istanbul vernacular. The publication of Türkçe Şiirler (Poems in Turkish) in 1899 by Mehmed Emin (1869–1944) was the starting point of a long-lasting and often ruthless battle of words between elitist neo-Parnassians and populists. After the relative liberalization following the promulgation of the second constitution in 1908, the ephemeral jour. Genç Kalemler (1911) played a major role in the promotion of the neofolk movement. With the blessings of the Union and Progress government and later the early republican authorities, nationalist versifiers, such as the Five Syllabists, influenced by the writings of Ziya Gökalp (1867–1915), the father of Turkish nationalism, developed a discourse on the supposed foreignness of the traditional aruz prosody and its inappropriateness for the Turkish lang. Nonetheless, four late masters of the aruz had a major impact on the devel. of Turkish poetry even after the foundation of the republic in 1923: Tevfik Fikret's (1867–1915) engaged humanism, Mehmet Akif's (1873–1936) mod. Islamicist verse, Ahmet Haşim's (1884–1933) Ottoman symbolism, and Yahya Kemal's (1884–1958) neoclassicism. Fikret's, Akif's and Haşim's experiments with *free verse (şir-i müstezad) that broke up the traditional couplet into lines with changing numbers of aruz rhythmic feet were a precursor of truly mod. free verse. This devel took place partly under the influence of Fr. vers libre*, but it was also partly in response to a perceived need to integrate the spoken lang. into poetry. A new generation of syllabists emerged, marrying the symbolist quest for musical perfection with nationalist endeavors. Among them, Fazıl Hüsnü Dağlarca (1914–2008) deserves particular notice as he lived through the century, unaffected by changing fashions, and left behind works that delved into themes ranging from mysticism to anticolonialism and remained popular for generations.

Syllabism, however, was outflanked by younger poets such as Ercüment Behzad Lav (1903–84), who discovered Ger. *expressionism, and Nazım Hikmet (1901–63), who explored Rus. *futurism. A new divide appeared between the mainly left-wing advocates of free verse and the mostly conservative and nationalist proponents of folk prosody.

Relentlessly hounded by the Kemalist state, Hikmet nonetheless revolutionized Turkish poetry. After a short-lived futurist period, he worked, while imprisoned in Bursa in the 1930s, toward a fusion of futurist, folk, and cl. elements while developing a novel form of subjective *realism. Heavy censorship made it difficult for socialist poets to explore Hikmet's new endeavors, which explains why they, with some exceptions, espoused a rather rigid interpretation of socialist realism. Only after the military coup of 1960 and the ensuing democratic reforms did Hikmet's poetry become easily available and hugely influential for a new generation of socialist poets, such as Ataol Behramoğlu (b. 1942).

Toward the end of the 1930s, a group of young poets, Orhan Veli (1914–50), Melih Cevdet Anday (1915–2002), and Oktay Rifat (1914–88) launched the Garip movement. They combined subjective realism and *surrealism and finally published a groundbreaking *manifesto in 1941. The movement caused a huge upheaval during the 1940s, even though its perceived apolitical stance was often the subject of reproach. Influenced by independent poets, such as Asaf Halet Çelebi (1907–58) and Behçet Necatigil (1916–79), who explored correspondences between modernist verse and the cl. trad., a new generation of poets who were later to be known as the İkinci Yeni (Second Renewal) questioned the downgrading of poetry by the prolific offspring of the Garip generation and developed a more individualist, and to a certain extent opaque, poetry that explored even the darkest realms of human experience and consciousness. Some of the original advocates of this new trend, among them Turgut Uyar (1927–85), Edip Cansever (1928–96), Cemal Süreya (1931–90), Gülten Akın (b. 1933), and Hilmi Yavuz (b. 1936), proved to have a profound influence on a new generation of poets who rediscovered their works in the 1990s, in the context of wide-ranging debates about the role of the Ottoman trad. in mod. Turkish poetry.

Reclaiming and subverting the heritage of Akif and Necip Fazıl Kısakürek (1905–83), a modernist Islamicist poetry movement surfaced. It was championed by Sezai Karakoç (b. 1933) and Cahit Zarifoğlu (1940–87) and gained strength during the 1970s. Though political, in particular socialist, poetry was much in vogue during that decade, the years following the 1980 military coup were characterized by the depoliticization of the literary field and saw the devel. of elitist concerns ranging from neoimagism to modernist appropriations of Ottoman elite lit. Nonetheless, two major new devels. testified to the transformations affecting Turkish society and poetry. One was the growing number of women poets published during the 1980s. Some of them, such as Gülseli İnal (b. 1947), Lale Müldür (b. 1956), and Nilgün Marmara (1958–87), were hugely influential. Though their works bore the marks of post-1980 poetry, they consciously subverted the male-dominated poetry trad. with a novel lang. and daring images. The other was a group of young Kurdish poets who published both in niche magazines and mainstream literary jours. They introduced original features such as proclaiming their Kurdishness in Turkish through a deconstruction of Turkish syntax and the transposition of Kurdish expressions into Turkish, as well as by focusing on the Kurdish experience.

V. Modern Azeri Poetry. In Azeri-speaking regions during the 18th and 19th cs., cl. trends survived. The Rus.-Iranian wars of 1813–28 and subsequent treaties dividing Azeri-speaking populations on both sides of the Araxes River did not impede cultural and social interactions. Poets such as Molla Panah Vagif (1717–97), Mirza Shafi Vazeh (1792–1852), Seyyid Azim Shirvani (1835–88), and Ali Agha Vahid (1896–1965) continued to write love poems, many glorifying earthly love in cl. aruz meters, and achieved fame throughout the area with poems often set to music. The 20th c. saw the rise of a realistic trend that became more pronounced after the workers' uprising in Russia (1905) and the Iranian constitutional revolution (1906). Ali Akbar Sabir (1862–1911) and Mo'juz of Shabustar (1872–1932), e.g., devoted themselves to poetic socialist realism, condemning illiteracy, injustice, and the plight of women. In the second half of the century, poets wrote a wide variety of poetry in both aruz and free-verse forms, among them Shahriyar (pseud. of Mohammad-Hoseyn Behjat-Tabrizi, 1907–86), Suleyman Rustam (1906–89), and Bakhtiyar Vahabzada (1925–2009).

■ Anthologies: English: Ottoman Literature: The Poets and Poetry of Turkey, trans. E.J.W. Gibb (1901); The Penguin Book of Turkish Verse, ed. N. Menemencioğlu (1978); Modern Turkish Poetry, ed. F. Kayacan Fergar (1982); An Anthology of Turkish Literature, ed. K. Silay (1996); Eda: An Anthology of Contemporary Turkish Literature, ed. M. Nemet-Nejat (2004); Translation Review: Turkish Literature and Its Translation 68 (2004)—trans., biblio., articles; A Brave New Quest: 100 Modern Turkish Poets, ed. T. S. Halman (2006); Ottoman Lyric Poetry: An Anthology, ed. and trans. W. G. Andrews, N. Black, and M. Kalpakli, rev. ed. (2006). French: Anthologie de la Poésie Turque Contemporaine, ed. J. Pinquié and Y. Levent (1991); Anthologie de la poésie turque XVIIIè–XXè siècle, ed. N. Arzik (1994). German: Aus dem Goldenen Becher: Türkische Gedichte aus Sieben Jahrhunderten, ed. A. Schimmel (1993).

■ Criticism and History: Modern Azeri Poetry: Azerbaijan Poetry: Classic, Modern, Traditional, ed. M. Ibrahimov (1976); S. Berengian, Azeri and Persian Literary Works in the Twentieth Century Iranian Azerbaijan (1988); H. Sultan-Qurraie, Modern Azeri Literature: Identity, Gender and Politics in the Poetry of Mo'juz (2003). Ottoman Poetry: E.J.W. Gibb, A History of Ottoman Poetry, 6 v. (1900–09)—copious information, but unacceptable racist and orientalist critique; W. G. Andrews, Introduction to Ottoman Poetry (1976), and Poetry's Voice, Society's Song (1985); V. Holbrook, The Unreadable Shores of Love (1994); W. G. Andrews and M. Kalpakli, The Age of Beloveds (2005). Post-Tanzimat Poetry: T. S. Halman, "Poetry and Society: The Turkish Experience" Modern Near East: Literature and Society, ed. C. M. Kortepeter (1971); M. Fuat, "Giriş," Çağdaş Türk Şiiri Antolojisi (1985); G. Turan, "The Adventure of Modernism in Turkish Poetry," Agenda 38.3–4 (2002).

W. G. Andrews; L. Mignon

TYPOGRAPHY. Typography is the act of setting text with regularly formed, repeatable letters made with metal, film, digitally generated output, or other mechanical means. Typographic formats usually conform to conventions of linearity and quadrature established by the constraints of hot-metal type. While linearity is a feature of writing practices almost since their invention over 5,000 years ago, quadrature is a specific feature of metal casting and the mechanical process of creating letters on the square or rectangular bodies required for composition. Typographic production contrasts strikingly with calligraphic writing, in which the expressive gesture of the hand leaves an affective trace. Calligraphic methods are largely production techniques resulting in one copy at a time from a single hand. Each copy is distinct and unique, even when many are produced simultaneously. Typographic methods are reproductive in nature and lend themselves to editioned works in which the copies are more similar than different. These distinctions between productive/calligraphic and reproductive/typographic modes are easily blurred, particularly in more recent technologies.

While conventional typesetting was codified by Johannes Gutenberg's invention in the 15th c., other possibilities for reproduction have expanded the range of typography. Photographic methods treat the image on film as information and can manipulate the original source image in a variety of ways, stretching, resizing, scaling, and distorting it. Digital media treat all information as data and are capable of taking keyboarded input and typographic notation and transforming them into any output format available. Digital media allow for all manner of calligraphic marks to be output in multiple formats, manipulated in photographic and algorithmic manner, and created without the same constraints of material that were inherent in the production of letterforms using trad. methods. Given the fluidity of current methods of writing production, the distinction between calligraphic and typographic methods is no longer absolutely clear.

The earliest technologies of writing include both productive and reproductive techniques. Incising, scratching, marking, painting, and drawing are ways of making unique written marks, while seals and stamps were used for repeating signs. Successive inventions expanded the range of possibilities rather than replacing earlier methods. In commercial industries, economic pressures sometimes cause certain technologies to be abandoned or discarded (e.g., early versions of phototypesetting or digital production have become obsolete as more advantageous innovations have appeared). New technologies do not necessarily find their aesthetic potential immediately. No technological obstacles prevented Gutenberg's type from being set at a diagonal or in a circle, but the idea of using type in this way, or in any manner that freed it from the constraints of linear setting in the rationalized grid of letterpress, simply did not occur. Older models for such formats are embodied in med. decorative techniques, esp. in designs of micrographia, but did not transfer easily into metal type.

Technological means of producing texts do not determine aesthetic values, and poetical forms do not stand in a fixed relation to material modes of expression. But every visual form of writing has certain inherent tendencies that dispose it to certain graphic arrangements over others. For instance, while handwriting is hard to discipline into regular square rows of even-shaped letters, hot-metal type can only be set in a free form flow with great difficulty, and neon signage has never been used for extended presentation of verse. The techniques of typography carry cultural and historical associations in their material and are integral to poetic composition.

While a poem carved in stone has a different presence from one scribbled on a sheet of notepaper, the effect of different production techniques on the semantic value of a poem is difficult to calculate. All written texts are material instantiations that call forth associations. They are also indexes of production, signaling the state of a culture and its ideological beliefs (what counts as official poetry or intimate verse is often indicated by the material of expression). At its most formal, written lang. carries the authority of the state, church, or other ruling body; at its most ephemeral, it is the trace of human life, brief and transient. Most written forms of poetic expression lie somewhere between the monumental and the ephemeral, clustered around the vast middle ground of conventional formats on semipermanent materials.

No direct relationship exists between media of writing and lineation or other graphical encoding of verse forms. The oldest extant example of poetic composition is a cuneiform tablet of a work by Enheduanna, the daughter of the Akkadian ruler Sargon, composed some time about 2300 BCE. The two-column format of the tablet and the distinct act of lineation in this work reinforce its identity as a song. Many examples of ancient writing did not contain spaces between words, no matter what the means of production, and were written in tightly packed lines, or using *boustrophedon (in which the direction of alternate lines is reversed, as is the direction of the letters). Expectations about the function of writing and its ability to connect metrical and graphical forms of poetic expression took time to develop. Evidence for constructing a hist. of these visual conventions is fragmentary. Early scribal culture combined economic motivation with lineation, maximizing the space used on the surface of parchment while making standard line lengths a metric for setting fees for transcription. Verse forms were not standardized in Western mss. until the later Middle Ages, around 1000–1100. Even then, conventions varied according to the familiarity of the scribe with the lang. of the work and assumptions this carried about the relation of sound to graphic forms or verse lines. Lines with standard metrics closer to the scribe's tongue (and ear) were more likely to be lineated, for instance, than those whose rhymes and meter the writer could not understand or "hear" (see LINE).

Typographic conventions for the presentation of verse become steadily more fixed across the hist. of printing. Verse forms and graphical structures come to share an identity (e.g., the couplet comes to be seen as a graphical unit as well as a metrical one). The typographic features of line breaks, indentation, capitalization, *punctuation, spacing, and so on become conventions capable of being manipulated and violated. But the technical underpinnings of typographic form—linearity and quadrature—remain intact once they migrate from ms. notation into metal type. Exceptions are remarkable and notable, such as shaped or pattern poems (see CARMINA FIGURATA). On close examination, most such works created with metal type turn out to have a format consistent with the linearity of its technology (type has to be set in a solid form in order to be printed), since deviations are time consuming and difficult to print.

Between the 15th and the 19th cs., the methods for reproducing writing (aside from letterpress printing) included relief impressions from the surface of wood or metal or intaglio impressions from engraved plates. Neither of these is an efficient means of producing large amounts of text. Each involves drawing and/or carving each individual letter, rather than taking advantage of the considerable efficiencies of reusable metal type. Interesting tensions in the cultural authority of typographic methods show in the efforts of writing masters to demonstrate the virtues of their methods through engraved reproductions. Engravers and carvers had considerable license to deviate from strict linear formats, but in so doing, they marked their writing as a different order of notation. Competition for business was particularly keen in the 18th c., and one remarkable artifact, the volumes of Brit. engraver John Pine's Horace (issued in 1733–37), was printed from plates engraved to resemble metal type.

Display fonts, those typographic forms created to compete for attention in the commercial marketplace, had been developed extensively in the 19th c. (in hot metal, in wood, and in lithographic poster design). The graphical imagination of floriated, shadowed, textured, and otherwise decorative and decorated letters brought a staggering number of new visual letterforms into being, almost none of which was considered acceptable for literary purposes. Late 19th-c. improvements that automated setting, namely, the monotype and linotype machines, inscribed linear characteristics even more absolutely because of their methods of casting type in lines. Not until the early 20th c. were the regular linear patterns of hot metal disturbed for poetic purposes. Even Stéphane Mallarmé's landmark 1897 work Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice) kept horizontal and vertical axes intact. In the 1910s, Guillaume Apollinaire's Calligrammes, some set using dental plaster to hold the metal type in place, and F. T. Marinetti's Zang Tumb Tuuum, along with the work of many Dada and futurist poets, broke the stranglehold of letterpress convention on poetic forms. Mixing font sizes and faces, disposing their work in arrangements that resembled advertising, they pushed typography to exploit its unruly potential rather than its capacity for well-governed behavior.

Two very different innovations extended typographic potential in the 19th c.: stone lithography, whose receptive surfaces allowed for hand-drawn letterforms of any imaginative invention to be reproduced, and the typewriter, a device whose mechanisms disciplined the hand and body to its own requirements. The typewriter is a writing machine, a means of authorial expression and formalization that relies on a single operator. Though designed for business, its characteristic alignments allowed for the grid of vertical and horizontal relations to be activated as part of a semantic field. The mechanical regularity of the typewriter was perceived as an asset by many graphically inclined poets who used it inventively to create figurative and imaginative visual works, esp. in the 20th c.

Photographic methods of type production became the industry standard in the mid-20th c. These replaced hot metal with images produced in a camera using filmstrips and photo-sensitive paper. Poets in the Fr. group known as the Lettrists began to play with the distorting possibilities of film in the 1950s, curling and cutting the negatives to create dimensional illusions in the printed versions of their texts. This technique added a new spatial quality to the appearance of texts on the page that often justified the diminishment of legibility in favor of effect.

Press type, a plastic film that was produced in sheets meant to be transferred to paper or other surface by burnishing, became a commercially viable product in the 1960s. The flexibility offered by having a sheet one could lay anywhere on a surface, wall, page, or image allowed for layering and overlap not possible in a letterpress approach. Press type changed conventions for spacing and put commercial display fonts into the hands of poets and writers. Press type could be used in a clean studio, on a desktop or kitchen table, to assemble works with elaborately complex shapes, like the circular pieces of Ferdinand Kriwet. But press type was expensive, difficult to align, and both tedious and time consuming to use.

In the 1970s, the first digital devices for phototypesetting appeared. These quickly expanded their capabilities and improved in quality. They output a sheet of photo paper that could be readily collaged into inventive layouts. In phototype, letterform designs did not have to follow the conventions of traditional type. Imaginative fonts like Baby Teeth and Jitter figured the letters in imaginative ways or fractured their once-solid forms in modes unthinkable in an era of metal and wood that worked well in the photo-mechanical techniques of offset printing.

The arrival of desktop capabilities for digital type production and font design radically altered the field of typography. Letters could be programmed and so could texts. Their sizes and shapes could be altered through software designed to stretch or distort them. Their forms could be generated with algorithmic protocols that conceived of letters as a rasterized object, a pixilated image, or a set of instructions for drawing. The integration of text and image in Photoshop and drawing programs blurred boundaries with vertiginous results for experimentation in poetry of all kinds. The use of programs for animation introduced movement and temporality into poetic expression. The idea of poetry as an animated medium spawned poetic experiments. Letters and texts could be generated through procedural means that had been slow in a mechanical or even photographic world, impossible in an analogue universe where the sheer mass of calculations involved in their production would have made such work impossible. Whether digital means will expand the capacities of poetic production in any substantive way remains to be seen (see ELECTRONIC POETRY).

■ D. B. Updike, Printing Types: Their History, Forms and Use (1962); M. Parkes, Pause and Effect: A History of Punctuation in the West (1992); C. Perfect and J. Austen, The Complete Typographer (1992); J. McGann, The Black Riders (1993); E. Lupton and A. Miller, Design Writing Research (1996); R. Huisman, The Written Poem: Semiotic Conventions from Old to Modern (1998); A.-M. Christin, The History of Writing (2002); Rhetoric Before and Beyond the Greeks, ed. C. Lipson and R. Binkley (2003); J. Drucker and E. McVarish, Graphic Design History: A Critical Guide (2009).

J. DRUCKER

U

UKRAINE, POETRY OF. The hist. of Ukrainian poetry can be divided into three major periods, made all the more distinct by sharp discontinuities among them. Underlying and producing these discontinuities are profound shifts in Ukrainian society; not only do basic political and social structures disappear, to be replaced by entirely new ones, but, at least until the mod. period, Ukrainian literary and historical consciousness does not succeed in bridging these changes.

The first period, from the 10th–11th cs. to roughly the 14th c., coincides largely with the lit. of Kyivan Rus', which is taken as the common patrimony of the East Slavs—the Ukrainians, Belarusians, and Russians. The second, middle period, late 16th to the late 18th cs., reflects primarily the poetics of the *baroque; and the third period, beginning 19th c. to the present, coincides with the birth of the mod. Ukrainian nation and the emergence of literary Ukrainian based on the vernacular.

One can speak of poetry in Old Ukrainian (Kyivan) lit. in terms of (1) the oral trad., (2) trans. and "borrowed" lit., and (3) verse elements in the original lit. Old Ukrainian oral lit. is often identified with folklore, but this lit., while oral, was probably a product of a court or "high" trad., which over the centuries "sank" into the repertoire of folklore. Whether the epic cycle of byliny (in Ukrainian staryny; see BYLINA) that depict the Kyivan context but were preserved in the northern Rus. territories or the gamut of ritual poetry related to the agricultural cycle and pagan rites, the actual texts date only from the 18th–19th cs., conclusions about the range and function of oral lit. in this earliest period remain speculative.

Verse as such is found in the various trans. and adaptations of Byzantine liturgical lit., particularly hymnography (see BYZANTINE POETRY). These *hymns influenced contemp. Kyivan texts and had an impact on the bookish versification of the 16th to 18th cs. The major poetic work of this period is the Slovo o polku Ihorevi (Tale of Ihor's Campaign) describing an unsuccessful military campaign of 1185. Written in the early 13th c., it was discovered and published at the turn of the 19th c. Its sonorous, vivid lang. and imagery, its deft narrative of rhythmic prose, have made the Slovo for all the mod. East Slavic lits. the quintessential poetic correlative of Kyivan Rus'.

In the middle period, sometime in the 16th c., a new form of oral poetry emerged, the duma (pl. dumy), which supplanted the older staryny and was to have a strong impact on much of subsequent Ukrainian poetry. The dumy, sung by wandering, often blind singers, were not a narrowly folkloric genre—its perspective encompassed all Ukrainian society. These "sacred songs," conveying profound social and historical experiences like wars with the Turks and Tatars or wars of liberation from Poland, reflected elements of heroic *epic, *ballad, and *elegy.

At the end of the 16th c., Ukrainian society and culture underwent a remarkable revitalization, which culminated in the mid-17th c. with an autonomous Cossack state that was to last more than a century. A characteristic feature of Middle Ukrainian lit. is its bilingualism: in the 17th and early 18th cs., it is Ukrainian or Polish, depending on theme, genre, or projected audience; by the mid-18th c., it is Ukrainian-Rus. In both cases, the choice of the other lang. reflects not a hedging of the writer's Ukrainian identity but rather the conventions of the literary system.

The earliest poetry of this period, beginning from the 1580s and 1590s, is syllabic in meter; in genre, emblematic and heraldic. Throughout the first part of the 17th c., Ukrainian poetry is represented mainly by *panegyric, historical, and *didactic poetry; by the second half of the 17th c., it shows a relatively broad range of forms and a differentiation into "high" genres (reflecting *baroque poetics) and popular genres. In the former, such important poets as Lazar Baranovych (1616–93) and esp. Ioan Velychkovs'ky (ca. 1640–1701), writing in both bookish Ukrainian and Polish and reflecting religious themes, give a new depth to national self-expression. The popular genres—*fables, *satires, and Christmas and Easter verse—are mostly anonymous and close to the vernacular.

The early 18th c. witnesses the maturation of Ukrainian school drama. Feofan Prokopovich's (1681–1736) tragicomedy Vladymir (1705) exemplifies the didactic poetics of this genre, as the historical theme—the Christianization of Kyivan Rus'—becomes a vehicle for political satire and for the apotheosis of the Ukrainian hetman (leader) Ivan Mazepa. At the end of the 18th c., there appears the most significant talent of premod. Ukrainian lit.: the peripatetic philosopher and poet Hryhorii Skovoroda (1722–94). His book of devotional poetry, The Garden of Divine Songs, synthesizing cl. and biblical, mystical and folk elements, remains the high point of 18th-c. Ukrainian poetry.

Mod. Ukrainian poetry is traditionally dated with the appearance of Ivan Kotliarevs'ky's Eneida of 1798, a travesty of Virgil's Aeneid. Finding its analogue to the fall of Troy in the destruction of the last Cossack stronghold (the Zaporozhian Sich), marking the end of Ukrainian autonomy in the 18th c., Eneida focuses on the wanderings of a band of Cossacks and provides an encyclopedic and loving account of Ukrainian provincial life and customs. Mixing an energetic optimism, satire, and nostalgia for the past with broad humor, the poem became a rallying point for a new Ukrainian lit. in the vernacular. Kotliarevs'ky (1769–1838) drew on a wide range of comic and burlesque devices characteristic of 18th-c. Ukrainian poetry, and this burlesque mode was adopted by other poets, Petro Hulak-Artemovs'ky (1790–1865) among them.

Beginning with the 1820s, Ukrainian *romanticism introduced an entirely new poetics: the focus of this poetry fell on the turbulent Cossack past and on the wealth of Ukrainian folklore. Early romantic poets, like Levko Borovykovys'ky (1806–89), Amvrosii Metlyns'ky (1814–70), and esp. Mykola Kostomarov (1817–85), and clergymen-poets in western Ukraine, then under Austria-Hungary, the so-called Ruthenian Trinity (Markiian Shashkevych [1811–43], Ivan Vahylevych [1811–66], and Yakiv Holovats'ky [1814–88]), sought to legitimize the vernacular lang., to rediscover historical and ethnic roots, and to advance cultural and national autonomy.

Taras Shevchenko (1814–61), born a serf and freed at the age of 24, came to be lionized by both Ukrainian and Rus. society as a uniquely powerful and inspired romantic poet. Arrested in 1847 in connection with the secret society the Brotherhood of Saints Cyril and Methodius and exiled for ten years, he returned in ill health but with poetic powers unimpaired. Seen as a martyr and bard even in his lifetime, Shevchenko became on his death the animating spirit of the Ukrainian national movement and remains a popular cult figure to this day. Shevchenko's poetry, traditionally called Kobzar (the Minstrel) after his first collection of 1840, divides along the lines of intimate *lyric poetry; political poetry, with powerful excoriations of social and national oppression, particularly by tsarist authority; and narrative poems, incl. historical poems and *ballads. All these modes are unified and guided by structures of mythical thought, which project a movement from the present state of victimization to a redeemed and purified humanity.

Panteleimon Kulish (1819–97)—friend, critic, and rival of Shevchenko—significantly broadened the range of Ukrainian poetry by new historical themes and expanded formal concerns and by renderings of the Bible, Shakespeare, Lord Byron, and other Western poets. Shevchenko's successors tended either to emulate him, like the western Ukrainian poet Yuri Fed'kovych (1834–88), or to resist the pull of the bard's model, like Stepan Rudans'ky (1834–73) and Yakiv Shchoholiv (1823–98), two poets on the borderline of romanticism and *realism.

Ukrainian poetry in the second half of the 19th c. was strained by the weight of perceived realist obligations and by official Rus. edicts of 1863 and 1876 banning the publication and importation of Ukrainian books. A poet who exemplifies both the call of national civic duty and the thrust of an authentic personal poetry is the western Ukrainian Ivan Franko (1856–1916). A renaissance man of indefatigable energy, Franko covers a broad gamut of genre and styles—historical, satiric, lyrical, and confessional, the last by far the most successful.

Throughout much of the 20th c., Ukrainian lit. was dominated by two competing aesthetic views: *modernism with its call for innovation and artistic freedom and its Eur. orientation vs. the populism that morphed into socialist realism under Soviet rule. Another important classification of Ukrainian literary production that resulted from the failure to establish a Ukrainian state after World War I and that remained valid until independence is the split of lit. into Soviet and émigré. This political divergence influenced aesthetic approaches and resulted in different literary models.

The period of early modernism, generally from the 1890s to World War I, witnessed the differentiation of the Ukrainian literary marketplace and the emergence of poetry for a more select public. One of the first to turn to Eur. and universal historical and philosophical themes was Lesia Ukrainka (1872–1913); her poetic drama also presents a powerful vehicle for gender concerns. A call for modernization and a rejection of utilitarian obligations were at the heart of the Moloda muza (The Young Muse) poetic group's activity, whose oeuvre betrays decadent and neoromantic inclinations.

On the eve of World War I, there appeared the symbolist poetry of Mykola Vorony (1871–1942), Mykola Filians'ky (1873–1938), and Oleksandr Oles' (1878–1944), anticipating the outstanding poet of the 20th c.: Pavlo Tychyna (1891–1967) (see SYMBOLISM). At first a symbolist and spirited supporter of the Ukrainian national revolution and at the end of his life an orthodox spokesman for the Soviet system, Tychyna underwent a complex evolution; but in his early and mature poetry, he remains the most innovative and influential poetic voice of his time.

In the 1920s, with the establishment of Soviet rule in Ukraine and the official policy of "Ukrainization," Ukrainian lit. experienced a spectacular revival, as manifested in the proliferation of separate modernist and avant-garde movements, mainly neoclassicism, with such outstanding poets as Maksym Ryl's'ky (1895–1969) and Mykola Zerov (1890–1937); and *futurism, with Mykhail Semenko (1892–1937) and Mykola Bazhan (1904–83), who began as a futurist but quickly shifted to become the second most important Ukrainian Soviet poet of the century. Other notable poets from this period include Yevhen Pluzhnyk (1898–1936) and Volodymyr Svidzins'ky (1885–1941).

By the 1930s, the Stalinist terror had crushed the national and cultural revival, and hundreds of writers perished in camps. The poetic scene shifted to western Ukraine, then under Poland, and farther abroad. The most significant émigré poetic group that emerged in the interwar period was the so-called Prague school. Such poets as Yevhen Malaniuk (1897–1968), Oleksa Stefanovych (1899–1970), and Oksana Liaturyns'ka (1902–70) evinced patriotic fervor without sacrificing high standards of poetic craft. But the greatest poet of that period in western Ukraine was Bohdan Ihor Antonych (1909–37), known for his novel imagery and formal experimentation. In his mature poetry, he attained an expressive power and metaphysical and symbolic complexity that put him in the forefront of 20th-c. Eur. poetry.

In the postwar period, the high point of Ukrainian émigré poetry was the New York Group that originated in the mid-1950s and continued its activity into the 1990s. Such poets as Bohdan Boychuk (b. 1927), Yuriy Tarnawsky (b. 1934), Bohdan Rubchak (b. 1935), and Emma Andijewska (b. 1931), all born in the interwar period, eagerly experimented with poetic forms privileging vers libre* and *metaphor and embraced such fashionable artistic and philosophical trends as *surrealism and existentialism. Gravitating toward the group were two poets of a slightly older generation, Oleh Zuievs'ky (1920–96) and Vasyl Barka (1908–2003), whose oeuvre manifested hermetic difficulty in its search for purity.

Soviet Ukrainian poetry experienced a major revival in the early 1960s with the appearance of such poets as Lina Kostenko (b. 1930), Mykola Vinhranovs'ky (1936–2004), and Ivan Drach (b. 1936). Known as the Generation of the Sixties, they strove for authenticity and liberalization. Their works, imbued with lyric intensity, centered on ethical and historical concerns but did not overtly experiment with poetic forms. More innovative and experimental were the poets of the Kyiv school who had their literary debuts also in the 1960s, though they were not encouraged by the state. Nonconformists and aesthetes, Vasyl Holoborod'ko (b. 1945), Mykola Vorobiov (b. 1941), Viktor Kordun (1946–2005), and Mykhailo Hryhoriv (b. 1947) published most of their oeuvre in the 1980s and 1990s, having a limited impact on the literary process of the 1960s. This is also true of such cerebral dissident poets as Vasyl Stus (1938–85) and Ihor Kalynets' (b. 1939). Their contribution was fully acknowledged only after 1991.

Beginning with the 1980s, a new generation of poets emerged. With the advent of Mikhail Gorbachev's perestroika, this generation no longer faced the prospects of harsh censorship. They focused on aesthetic freedom and on constructing a new cultural identity. The poetry of Ihor Rymaruk (1958–2008) and Vasyl Herasym'iuk (b. 1956) offers a dense, metaphoric language, biblical and regional motifs, and contemplates creativity as such. Other poets of the same generation reacted differently to the Soviet legacy. The period immediately preceding independence in 1991 witnessed the formation of many poetic groupings in Lviv, Kyiv, Kharkiv, and other cities, all finding distinctive ways to resist the symptoms of Sovietization. The most prominent among them, the Bu-Ba-Bu group, founded in the mid-1980s by Yuri Andrukhovych (b. 1960), Viktor Neborak (b. 1961), and Oleksandr Irvanets' (b. 1961), professed poetry as *performance and employed postmodernist devices such as *parody, *pastiche, and self-reference. Mocking the seriousness of their predecessors and debunking Soviet and nationalistic taboos became Bu-Ba-Bu's favorite pastime.

Ukrainian poetry of the postindependence period is dynamic and stylistically diverse. There is a strong undercurrent of female poetic voices, from the fiercely feminist and intellectual oeuvre of Oksana Zabuzhko (b. 1960) to more gender-balanced approaches of the younger Mar'iana Savka (b. 1973) and Marianna Kiianovs'ka (b. 1973). While the performative and playful manner of the Bu-Ba-Bu poetics appealed to some younger poets, with Serhii Zhadan (b. 1974) as the most talented, others rejected the group's carnivalesque spirit in favor of a more intellectual, ironic, and even metaphysical approach. Among the latter, Kostiantyn Moskalets' (b. 1963) and esp. Vasyl Makhno (b. 1964) deserve recognition. The youngest generation of Ukrainian poets, entering the poetic scene in the 2000s, displays a wide range of attitudes, from an offhand colloquiality to existential reflection. Unlike the poets of the 1980s, this generation does not need to assert its artistic freedom: these young poets just live it.

■ Anthologies: The Ukrainian Poets, ed. and trans. C. H. Andrusyshen and W. Kirkconnell (1963); Khrestomatiia davn'oi ukrains'koi literatury, ed. O. I. Bilets'kyi (1967); Koordynaty, ed. B. Boychuk and B. T. Rubchak (1969); Antolohiia ukrains'koi liryky, ed. O. Zilyns'kyi (1978); Ukrains'ka literatura XVIII st., ed. O. V. Myshanych; (1983); Antolohiia ukrains'koi poezii, ed. M. P. Bazhan et al. (1984); Visimdesiatnyky, ed. I. Rymaruk (1990); Poza tradytsii, ed. B. Boychuk et al. (1993); From Three Worlds: New Ukrainian Writing, ed. E. Hogan et al. (1996); A Hundred Years of Youth: A Bilingual Anthology of Twentieth-Century Ukrainian Poetry, ed. O. Luchuk and M. M. Naydan (2000); Pivstolittia napivtyshi, ed. M. G. Rewakowicz (2005); Dvi tonny naikrashchoi molodoi poezii, ed. B.-O. Horobchuk and O. Romanenko (2007); Dyvoovyd, ed. I. Luchuk (2007); In a Different Light: A Bilingual Anthology of Ukrainian Literature, ed. O. Luchuk (2008); Ukrains'ki literaturni shkoly ta hrupy 60–90 rr. XX st., ed. V. Gabor (2009).

■ Criticism and History: G. Luckyj, Literary Politics in the Soviet Ukraine 1917–1933 (1956); Istoriia ukrains'koi literatury, ed. IE. P. Kyryliuk et al. (1967–71); D. Čyževs'kyj, A History of Ukrainian Literature (1975); G. Grabowicz, Toward a History of Ukrainian Literature (1981); G. Grabowicz, The Poet as Mythmaker (1982); O. S. Ilnytzkyj, Ukrainian Futurism (1997).

G. G. Grabowicz; M. G. Rewakowicz

ULTRAISM. An iconoclastic Sp. movement that first appeared in 1919 and had virtually disappeared by 1923. Spain's answer to the Eur. avant-garde, ultraism proposed to merge advanced contemp. artistic tendencies. The Argentinian Jorge Luis Borges, who was in Spain in 1918, contributed to the origins of ultraism and took its theories to Buenos Aires in 1921. A founder and major theoretician of the group was the critic Guillermo de Torre, author of the Manifiesto Vertical. Rafael Cansinos-Assens, writer and intellectual figure of the postwar period, also had much to do with the promotion of the new aesthetic, and Ramón Gómez de la Serna deserves his place as a significant antecedent. Both led important tertulias such as the one in the Café Colonia, and the latter writer was the first to publish F. T. Marinetti's futurist manifesto in Sp. (see FUTURISM). Ultraism was a youthful revolt against outworn, secondhand modernismo; it fiercely opposed routine and inertia. The ultraists welcomed mod. life and were guided by subversive postwar attitudes. Above all, they sought to rehabilitate the poem by daring imagery; their most characteristic poems were generally formed by a series of unconnected images, the more original the better. The poets of ultraism rejected narrative and anecdotal matter as well as sentimentality, ornamentality—a reference to the style of Rubén Darío—and rhetorical effusion, preferring to cultivate a humor and playfulness reminiscent of futurism. They advocated *free verse and the elimination of rhyme and punctuation, and they strove to give visual form to their images by typographical techniques. Although rebelling against modernismo, they were, in fact, influenced by *symbolism and *Parnassianism.

It has been said that ultraism had no great poet, nor did it produce lasting works; hence, to some extent it has been disregarded by literary historians. Nevertheless, many jours. of the time published ultraist poems by such writers as Gerardo Diego and Juan Larrea. Lucía Sánchez Saornil was one of the few women ultraists. Others of the ultraism movement were Isaac del Vando-Villar, Pedro Grafias (Spain), Raúl González Tuñón, F. L. Bernárdez, R. Güiraldes, and E. González Lanuza (Argentina).

Diego's Manual de espumas (1924) is usually cited as the best ultraist book, although images modeled on the same aesthetic precepts can be found in a number of poets. Moreover, ultraism promoted creative freedom and experimentation concomitant with what was taking place in other countries, esp. in Latin America, as evidenced by the journal Proa (1924–26), and it opened new avenues for the future.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS; SPAIN, POETRY OF.

■ M. de la Peña, El ultraísmo en España (1925); G. de Torre, Literaturas europeas de vanguardia (1925); R. Cansinos-Assens, La nueva literatura (1927); G. Videla, El ultraísmo (1963); G. de Torre, Historia de las literaturas de vanguardia (1965); J. G. Manrique de Lara, Gerardo Diego (1970); M. Scrimaglo, Literatura argentina de vanguardia (1920–1930) (1974); Los vanguardismos en la América Latina, ed. O. Collazos (1977); J. Cano Ballesta, Literatura y tecnología. Las letras españolas ante la revolución industrial: 1900–1933 (1981); W. Bohn, The Aesthetics of Visual Poetry, 1914–1928 (1986); H. Wentzlaff-Eggebert and D. Wansch, Las vanguardias literarias en España: Bibliografía y antología crítica (1999); H. Martínez Ferro, Ultraism, Creacionismo, Surrealismo: Análisis textual (1999); P. Rocca, "Las orillas del Ultraismo," Hispamérica 31 (2002); Las vanguardias literarias en Argentina, Uruguay y Paraguay, ed. C. García (2004); R. M. Silverman, "Questioning the Territory of Modernism: Ultraism and the Aesthetic of the First Spanish Avant-Garde," RR 97 (2006).

A. W. PHILLIPS; K. N. MARCH; R. GREENE

UNITED STATES, POETRY OF THE

I. English

A. Beginnings to 1900. A hist. of poetry in the U.S. "from the beginning" must begin by acknowledging that "the beginning" has always been a matter of debate. "Where to begin?" is the critical question, and the common answer has been to begin again in the present. The earliest anthol. to use American poetry as an organizing concept was Elihu Hubbard Smith's (1771–98) American Poetry, Selected and Original (1793), which heavily emphasized the poems of Smith's fellow *Connecticut Wits (1770s–90s) while ignoring the poetry of the 17th c. Later *canon-makers followed the same strategy by excising the 18th c. to endorse the 19th. Rufus Wilmot Griswold's (1815–57) anthols. of the 1840s, The Poets and Poetry of America (1842) and Female Poets of America (1848), centered on the work of New York poets affiliated with the Young America movement (1840s); and Edmund Clarence Stedman's (1833–1908) Poets of America (1885), an influential collection of essays, grounded Am. poetry in the work of the *Fireside poets (1870s–80s). All these efforts were overturned in the 20th c., which reinvented two minor poets of the previous century, Walt Whitman (1819–92) and Emily Dickinson (1830–86), as the only legitimate claimants to the beginnings of a poetic trad. that could genuinely be called American. Thus, the poetic hist. of the U.S. has often been conditioned by the effort to find a usable beginning that leads to the present.

Perhaps the major problem is that Am. poetry seems always to have begun somewhere else. The Am. hemisphere, depicted as an Edenic paradise of noble savages and natural abundance or as a howling wilderness of pagan devilry, was a rich source of imagery and inspiration for a number of Eur. poets who wrote from a distance, such as Shakespeare, Luís de Camões, or Joost van den Vondel, as well as others who envisioned and settled North Am. colonies, including George Sandys (1577–1644), Walter Ralegh (1552–1618), and George Berkeley (1685–1753), whose "Verses on the Prospect of Planting Arts and Learning in America" (written 1726, pub. 1752), prompted by a sojourn in Rhode Island, coined the line "Westward the Course of Empire takes its Way," which encapsulated a key motif for New World poetics.

Early poetry on America was generally published in Europe and tended to adopt cl. themes, meters, and styles. It also participated overtly in the imperial contests between Eur. powers. While elite authors took from New World materials to furnish poems for a Eur. readership, the process also worked in reverse: Port., Dutch, Sp., Fr., and Eng. settlers in New World plantations brought *songs with them. These popular *ballads, sea chanteys, work songs, and bawdy lyrics often adapted the Native Am. and Af. song trads. with which Eur. settlers came into contact. While primarily oral and improvisational, such songs were also based on established trads. of versification mediated by cheap print. New words could readily be fitted to old tunes, making it easy for songs to comment on current, local events in modes familiar to audiences that need not have been literate to enjoy them.

Like such popular lyrics, religious *hymns and *psalms also circulated widely, usually with the consent of colonial authorities. The Bay Psalm Book (1640, known in its day as The New England Psalter), a metrical trans. of the Psalms, is considered the first book of poems printed in colonial North America. The Puritan apostle John Eliot (ca. 1604–90) also published verse trans. of the Psalms in the Massachusett lang., to aid in converting the Native Am. peoples in the New England colonies.

Although these song and hymn trads. ranged across North America, the earliest printing press was licensed in Cambridge, in the Massachusetts Bay colony, in 1638, and printing penetrated most deeply in New England (no other press was licensed until 1686, in Philadelphia); thus, the Eng. Puritans have tended to dominate the hist. of 17th-c. colonial poetry. Anne Bradstreet (1612?–72) is perhaps the best-known Puritan poet; her volume The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America (1650) employed the *conceits and elaborate *similes of the *metaphysical poets on religious, political, and domestic subjects. Other popular New England poets included Michael Wigglesworth (1631–1705), whose best-selling poem on the Last Judgment, The Day of Doom (1662), popularized a style of *quatrain with internal rhymes on the first and third lines; and Benjamin Tompson (1642–1714), author of New England's Crisis (1676), a providential epic recounting King Philip's War. This sort of text was both poetry and also information about the conflict for highly interested audiences around the Atlantic (see INFORMATION, POETRY AS). Such work indicates the multiple functions poetry served in early Am. culture.

It is important to note that, with the exception of the rhyming *abecedarius The New England Primer (1690), possibly the best-selling book of the 18th c., books of poems were published in London (as were most books for the Am. market) and remained unavailable to all but the wealthiest colonial readers. Aside from psalters and primers, the most common type of poetry printed in North America was the *elegy, which was typically written by one minister for another (or a person of wealth and standing), as illustrated by Urian Oakes's (1631–81) elaborately titled "An Elegie Upon that Reverend, Learned, Eminently Pious, and Singularly Accomplished Divine, my ever Honoured Brother, Mr. Thomas Shepard" (1677). While they circulated freely, usually as broadsides, such texts also extolled the ministry as the proper guardians of public discourse. Elegies were performed as part of Puritan mourning rituals and were reproduced in *commonplace books, weavings, and tombstones, among other locations, underwriting a culture of mourning that would be satirized by Benjamin Franklin and Mark Twain.

Like the Puritan elegy, almost every early Am. poem printed in North America appeared in the cheapest possible formats: single-sheet broadsides, stitched pamphlets, almanacs, newspapers (after 1720 or so), and magazines (after 1760 or so); typical genres included ballads, *satires, squibs, pasquinades, execution songs, tavern songs, and versified sermons, which were usually anonymous, set to a familiar tune (such as "Chevy Chace") and sold for a penny or two. "The Poor Unhappy Transported Felon's Sorrowful Account of His Fourteen Years Transportation at Virginia" (ca. 1670s), by the possibly apocryphal author James Revel (1659–80), is an example of a broadside narrative derived from a long trad. of scaffold verse. Its opening stanza indicates the mixed mediation characteristic of so much 17th-c. verse:

> My loving countrymen pray lend an ear,
> To this relation that I bring you here,
> My present sufferings at large I will unfold,
> Altho' its strange, 'tis true as e'er was told.

We can imagine a ballad monger singing these lines in a London street, gathering an audience that would indeed lend an ear to the story and possibly buy a sheet to take home. This poem about the hardships of Virginia was published in London for an Eng. audience; it is hard to overstate the degree to which colonial poetry was oriented toward London, the cosmopolitan metropole of the anglophone world. Only from the retrospective vantage point of U.S. nationalism does such an orientation seem a problem; early Americans located themselves within the world system of Eur. colonialism. Colonial literary rivalries, such as that between the Tory wits Joseph Green (1706–80) and Mather Byles (1707–88), were triangulated through Brit. periodicals like the London Magazine, where Green placed two poems in 1733. Metropolitan jours. carried greater weight in Boston than the local New-England Weekly Journal, where Byles's popular "Proteus Echo" series had appeared, and colonial authors often wrote with a trans-Atlantic audience in mind.

Yet despite the prestige that certain publications offered, the vast majority of early Am. poets did not publish in print but circulated their works in ms., often to a small coterie of friends, but sometimes to a much more extended audience. The circulation of ms. poems through competing coffeehouses fueled most of the conflict between Byles and Green. The now-famous works of the Massachusetts minister Edward Taylor (1642–1729), Preparatory Meditations and Gods Determinations (1680s–1720s), known only to a few contemporaries, were not published until 1939. Unlike the worldly wit of Byles and Green, which was meant to dazzle and win prestige, Taylor used complex *syntax and elaborate metaphysical conceits to make his poems a form of spiritual exercise, as in a meditation on 1 Cor. 3.22:

> Thy Grace, Dear Lord's my golden Wrack, I finde
> Screwing my Phancy into ragged Rhimes,
> Tuning thy Praises in my feeble minde
> Untill I come to strike them on my Chimes.

While Taylor intended his poems for private devotional use, many colonial poets chose ms. circulation as the polite alternative to print. Literary circles like the Annapolis-based Tuesday Club (1745–56) sprang up across the colonies in emulation of London counterparts. Their purpose was to cultivate members' sentiments and sensibilities through belles lettres and polite conversation. *Epigrams, *acrostics, *riddles, *anagrams, and *dialogues were some of the favored poetic vehicles for the display of *wit and learning among members.

"Publishing" poems through the circulation of mss. was esp. common for early Am. women poets, whose access to print was highly limited. Even an elite woman like Annis Boudinot Stockton (1736–1801), who wrote more than 100 poems, published only about 20, all anonymously. Instead of print publication, most women poets participated in coteries. One prominent circle of elite Quaker women living in the Delaware Valley included poets Milcah Martha Moore (1740–1829), Hannah Griffitts (1727–1817), Susanna Wright (1697–1784), and Elizabeth Graeme Fergusson (1737–1801). They gathered to read and discuss poems, commented on them in letters and diaries, and wrote poems in response to each other on a wide variety of topics. Another circle living around Boston promoted the ms. poetry of Phillis Wheatley (1753–84) before the publication in London of her volume Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773). Wheatley, known as the "the sable prodigy" and "the Ethiopian Poetess," had been kidnapped as a child from the Gambian coast and, as a slave, became a literary celebrity in prerevolutionary Boston. These coterie poems tended to adopt neoclassical styles (authors often signed in *pastoral pseuds. like "Aminta") and discussed matters of both domestic and political interest. Poetry was a key vehicle for debating gender roles and the place of women in colonial society (a discussion known as the battle of the sexes), but such debates mostly occurred within the constraints of politeness—in ms., in parlors, and among fellow elites—rather than in the emerging realm of printed discourse.

That printed discourse was often hurly-burly. The dismantling of Stuart absolutism that followed the Glorious Revolution in England (1688), esp. the end of prepublication state censorship in 1695, created the conditions for a market-oriented print world. The Whig ascendancy after the Hanoverian succession (1714) forced a generation of Tory authors, thrown out of power and with no hope of state *patronage, to write for money. Concentrated in an impoverished district surrounding London's Grub Street, these "hacks," as they became known, developed a combative poetic idiom that sought to expose the corruptions of the new social and economic order through scurrilous, personalized attacks on figures of authority. The Grub Street ethic translated easily to 18th-c. colonial entrepôts such as Boston, Philadelphia, and New York City, where perennial conflicts among colonial governors (appointed by the Crown), assemblies (elected by the local population), and various local factions ensured a steady market for political controversy. In these "paper wars," stinging, catchy ballads (passed in song, ms., and print) proved esp. useful. In Philadelphia, Henry Brooke (1678–1736), an Oxford-educated scion, led a riotous campaign against the Quaker authorities, particularly their crackdown on public drinking. Brooke's mastery of impromptu compositions, esp. epigrams, combined the Georgian ideal of belletristic wit with tavern culture's masculine ethos and led to instantly popular satirical portraits of officials such as William Penn. The reign of Jonathan Belcher (1730–41) in Massachusetts provoked another such war, in which anonymous pasquinades against the governor were nailed to doors, copied into commonplace books, and passed around in taverns. In New York, Cadwallader Colden (1688–1776), James Alexander (1691–1756), and Lewis Morris Sr. (1671–1746) used an extensive arsenal of poems to further the political aims of their Country Party in endless machinations against the Merchant Party of Governor William Cosby. Morris's verse *fable "The Mock Monarchy; or, the Kingdom of the Apes" (1730) circulated in ms. throughout the colony and in England. Morris also used the press to attack his political enemies, who retaliated by publicly burning two Country Party ballads denouncing Cosby. Meeting fire with fire, Cosby hired Archibald Home (1705–44) to circulate anti-Morris songs and poems. So impressed was Morris by his rival's literary flair that he recruited Home to his side.

Home later moved to New Jersey, where he presided over a polite literary circle in Trenton. His example shows how the rowdy culture of the tavern, the coffeehouse, and the press developed in tandem with the polite realm of the coterie, the parlor, and the tea table. Benjamin Franklin (1706–90) memorably described the masculine culture of the printing houses in Boston, Philadelphia, and London, where hard words, hard work, and hard drinking went together. However, Franklin's rise was driven by his facility with both the vituperative discourse of print and the polite conversation of civility. As a boy, he wrote several successful broadside poems, which he described as "wretched Stuff, in the Grubstreet Ballad Style," as well as an Aesopian fable against Governor Jonathan Belcher, "The Rats and the Cheese" (1730), and throughout his career he capitalized on his mastery of print controversy. But access to the library of his patron Matthew Adams (d. 1753) familiarized Franklin early with key works in the discourse of civility (famously, The Spectator), and this familiarity with the rhet. of politeness helped him flourish in the sociable world of 18th-c. mercantilism. Some of Franklin's closest associates were fellow belletrists, such as the poets Aquila Rose (1695–1723) and Joseph Breintnall (1695–1746), an inaugural member of the Junto, the literary circle Franklin founded in 1727.

Breintnall's elegy "To the Memory of Aquila Rose, Deceas'd" (1740) addressed a trans-Atlantic circle of friends in the terms of poetic sociability:

> Ye Rose's Friends, that in Britannia dwell
> Who knew his Worth, and best the Loss can tell:
> As I transmit such mournful News to you,
> Do you the tuneful sad Account pursue.
> And ye bright Youths, that meet at Bendall's > Board,
> An Elegy his hov'ring Shade afford:
> Had one of you deceas'd, and he surviv'd,
> His Memory by him had been reliv'd.

The transmission of poetry grounded communities locally (in Boston, Philadelphia, or London) and across long distances, and the spaces opened by death could be filled, at least in part, by the circulation of "tuneful sad Accounts" or elegies, which secured the bonds of fellowship.

While Britain's victory in the Seven Years' War (1756–63) secured Eng. hegemony in North America, it also drove the Crown to seek ever greater control over the economy and governance of the colonies. The resulting imperial crisis was mediated through institutions of oratory (club, tavern, pulpit) and print (broadsides, pamphlets, newspapers), and poetry worked through all the media of debate. Popular songs such as "Yankee Doodle" ostentatiously appropriated well-known Brit. tunes for patriot purposes. Poets such as Wheatley petitioned key figures such as the Earl of Dartmouth and George Washington in verse. A leading circle of revolutionary-era poets, the Connecticut Wits, incl. Joel Barlow (1754–1812), Timothy Dwight (1752–1817), John Trumbull (1750–1831), and David Humphreys (1752–1818), made recourse to poetry in support of the colonies. Trumbull's mock epic M'Fingal (1775, 1782), e.g., was a ubiquitous piece of revolutionary rhet. Philip Freneau (1752–1832), Ann Eliza Bleecker (1752–83), Lemuel Haynes (1753–1833), and Mercy Otis Warren (1728–1814) all produced patriotic verse supporting Am. independence. Sung in homes, taverns, and battlefields; recited during sermons and orations; or circulated in mss., broadsides, and newspapers, this poetry underwrote the discourse of liberty that authorized revolution.

After the revolution, however, poetry was circuited into the partisanship of the Federalist era. Humphreys, Barlow, Trumbull, and Lemuel Hopkins (1750–1801) collaborated on The Anarchiad (1786–87), a *mock epic satirizing social disorder in the wake of Shays's Rebellion; Dwight wrote one *epic attacking deism (The Triumph of Infidelity, 1788) and another supporting Federalist orthodoxy (Greenfield Hill, 1794). Barlow switched sides to Paineite democracy (The Conspiracy of Kings, 1792), and Jeffersonian republicanism (The Columbiad, 1808). These epics and mock epics featured neoclassical balance, *periphrasis, and an immensely complex set of references that can be difficult for mod. readers to parse without extensive footnotes. But their rhet. of satirical declension, ideological unmasking, and civic renewal was well known to contemporaries through the popularity of Augustan authors such as Alexander Pope, Jonathan Swift, and James Thomson.

The Boston wit Robert Treat Paine Jr. (1773–1811) expressed Federalist ambitions for the U.S. amid the welter of Eur. revolutions and Barbary Coast warfare in a 1798 song, "Adams and Liberty":

> In a clime, whose rich vales feed the marts of the world,
> Whose shores are unshaken by Europe's commotion,
> The trident of Commerce should never be hurled,
> To incense the legitimate powers of the ocean.
> But should pirates invade,
> Though in thunder arrayed,
> Let your cannon declare the free charter of trade.

(Incidentally, Paine's anthem of Federalist pieties borrowed the tune of "To Anacreon in Heaven," a ribald drinking song that Francis Scott Key's (1779–1843) "The Defense of Fort McHenry"—later "The Star-Spangled Banner"—also adopted). In reality, the U.S. population in 1798 was young, rural, agrarian, and poor. Literacy rates were increasing, but the rise was uneven, with the Northeast outpacing the South and the trans-Appalachian West. Limited roads and bridges made transportation and communication between regions difficult. Consequently, there was no national market for books, periodicals, or newspapers; and chronically undercapitalized printers preferred steady sellers to risky new imaginative works. Coastal ports and, later, river and canal boomtowns were distinct literary capitals with a flourishing business reprinting popular Eng. authors. The existence of parallel domestic markets and the absence of an international copyright meant that Am. readers were more likely than Eng. to read books such as William Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge's Lyrical Ballads (1798) or Walter Scott's The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805). The literary nationalist James Kirke Paulding (1778–1860) expressed his frustrations about the Am. scene in an 1818 epic, The Backwoodsman:

> Neglected Muse! of this our western clime,
> How long in servile, imitative rhyme,
> Wilt thou thy stifled energies impart,
> And miss the path that leads to every heart? . . .
> Thrice happy he who first shall strike the lyre,
> With homebred feeling, and with homebred fire.

Paulding's call for "homebred" materials would be echoed by the Young America movement of the 1840s and the International Copyright League of the 1890s. Yet while an Am. poetry did not gain a stable institutional form until after the Civil War, Am. citizens, pace Paulding, were writing, reading, singing, circulating, and performing all kinds of poems. The Marylander Francis Scott Key published "The Defense of Fort McHenry" (the first stanza of which became the national *anthem in 1916) in a Baltimore newspaper in 1814; William Cullen Bryant (1794–1878), who had written an anti-Jeffersonian satire, "The Embargo," as a 13-year-old, published the instant classic "Thanatopsis" (1817) in The North American Review, a Boston jour. founded in 1815 to foster Am. letters; and "A Visit from St. Nicholas," by Clement Moore (1779–1863), was published anonymously in a Troy, New York, newspaper in 1822. All these poems were wildly popular across the entire country.

However, the most influential poet of early 19th-c. America was Lydia Huntley Sigourney (1791–1865). Sigourney commanded national acclaim and attention in poems on all possible topics, from child elegies ("dead-baby poems") and domestic instruction to Indian removal and slavery. Following the model of the Eng. poet Felicia Hemans, Sigourney deployed the *persona of the *Poetess, a gendered form of literary authority that spoke in nationalist, even imperialist cadences through the voice of sentimental domesticity. Her best work, like "To a Shred of Linen" (1838), demonstrated the centrality of women's labor to the hist. of the nation. Many, although not all, women poets gained access to public representation through the privatized figure of the Poetess: these included Elizabeth Oakes Smith (1806–93), Sarah Helen Whitman (1803–78), Maria Brooks (Maria del Occidente, 1794–1845), and the Ojibwe poet Jane Johnston Schoolcraft (Bamewawagezhikaquay, 1800–42).

As a figure for popular verse, the Poetess also influenced mid-century male authors. Two of the most prominent, E. A. Poe (1809–49) and H. W. Longfellow (1807–82), followed dramatically opposed trajectories in the literary world. By the 1830s, improved material conditions in the U.S. (a larger reading public, greater economic capitalization, and better internal communication), had made a literary career possible; but economic instability (exemplified by the Panic of 1837) made it a tenuous occupation, at best. Hundreds of newspapers and periodicals were founded in the 1830s, but the average one lasted less than a year before closing. Poe tried unsuccessfully to make his way in this literary climate, editing magazines in Richmond, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, but always seeming to fail on the brink of success. His work was very popular—"The Raven" (1845) was one of the most reprinted and parodied poems in Am. lit.—but it could not earn him a living, and he died in poverty.

Poe's Gothic work cannily adopted many of the Eur. themes and motifs that abounded in antebellum magazine culture. "Lenore" (1843), "Ulalume" (1847), and "Annabel Lee" (1849) evoke a dreamy state of unreality, like the Am. Republic of Letters Poe imagined but could not realize. Poe was eccentric to the circles of literary authority that existed in his lifetime, and he reserved particular wrath for the literary culture of Boston ("Frogpondia" to him): the *Transcendentalist circle associated with R. W. Emerson (1803–82); and the group of Harvard-based poets that included O. W. Holmes (1809–94), J. R. Lowell (1819–91), and, esp., Longfellow.

Longfellow was the most successful poet of the mid-19th c. In long poems such as Evangeline (1847), Hiawatha (1855), and Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863), he fused North Am. themes such as Native Am. lore and the Revolution with cl. and Eur. meters and the narrative structures of poems like the Canterbury Tales and the Divine Comedy (which Longfellow, a scholar of the Romance langs., translated in the 1860s). Hiawatha combined Ojibwe stories (based on the ethnography of H. R. Schoolcraft) with the *trochaic tetrameter of the Finnish epic the Kalevala, while Evangeline was one of the most successful (and controversial) experiments with Eng. *hexameters:

> This is the forest primeval. The murmuring pines > and the hemlocks,
> Bearded with moss, and in garments green, indistinct in the twilight, > Stand like Druids of eld, with voices sad and > prophetic,
> Stand like harpers hoar, with beards that rest on > their bosoms.

The syncretism of this work (Poe called it "plagiarism") aspired to an ideal of comparative lit. that Longfellow, the Smith Professor of Modern Languages at Harvard, sought to forge in the image of J. W. Goethe's Weltliteratur. From his position at Harvard and by way of his close alliances with Boston's publishers, Longfellow enjoyed unprecedented cultural prestige and business success (he became the first author to own the stereotype plates of his work, e.g.). Hiawatha was a runaway best seller in 1855, the same year a relatively obscure newspaperman in New York City issued Leaves of Grass.

Although its eccentricity to the orbit of antebellum letters was greatly exaggerated in the 20th c., Leaves of Grass was an unusual book (mostly because it lacked the organizing structures that mid-century readers had come to expect: a table of contents, titles for poems, line numbers, and, esp., a named poet). In lieu of a name (which appeared unexpectedly within the poems), the frontispiece showed the image of a typical workingman, with open collar and hand on hip, eyes staring boldly into the reader's. This sort of assertive yet anonymous intimacy also marked the poems. The long lines, mostly lacking a recognizable meter or rhyme pattern, conformed to the space of the page, thus incorporating print materiality into the poems' structure, while the loosely organized *strophes encouraged readers to create their own ways of reading the work. "I celebrate myself, / And what I assume you shall assume," it began, and, throughout the long poem later known as "Song of Myself," Walt Whitman pursued a leveling strategy for the reading of poetry: "Have you practiced so long to learn to read? / Have you felt so proud to get at the meaning of poems? / Stop this day and night with me and you shall possess the origin of all poems, / You shall possess the good of the earth and sun." *Interpretation was very much subordinated to intimacy in Whitman's poetics: reading, for him, should be like sex.

This project of intimacy thrust Leaves of Grass into the fraught and violent politics of the 1850s: not only did Whitman (who 13 years earlier had written a temperance novel) seek to check the growing stigmatization of the body in reform discourses like the temperance movement ("Welcome is every organ and attribute of me, and of any man hearty and clean, / Not an inch nor a particle of an inch is vile"), he sought to establish a poetic basis for collective experience, which the political system of the era had resoundingly failed to provide. Thus, the poems were filled with the daily experiences of ordinary people in lengthy *catalogs (the most aesthetically controversial aspects of the poems, then and now; see INFORMATION, POETRY AS). Whitman piled incident atop humdrum incident in an effort to make working life poetic, to extend the circle of democratic belonging further and further outward. We could all find ourselves in these poems, he suggested, and no one would assume priority over anyone else.

Whitman's faith in Am. democracy was shaken by the Civil War and the assassination of Abraham Lincoln (who, incidentally, also wrote poetry). But by way of his elegies to Lincoln, "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd" (1865) and "O Captain! My Captain!" (1865), his most popular poem, he gradually reached wide appreciation in the 1880s, with devoted readers (known as Whitmaniacs) making pilgrimages to his small home in Camden, New Jersey.

Between 1882 and 1894, all the major poets of the mid-19th c. died. The culture felt a palpable sense of loss. Where would poetry go? In the last decade of the century, the first eds. of Emily Dickinson's poems produced an unexpected publishing sensation. Dickinson had died in 1886, but for almost 30 years before her death she had been known to her familiar correspondents as a poet (though no one knew how extensive her collection of ms. poetry had grown until after her death). Some of those correspondents were important in the public sphere, so 11 of Dickinson's poems appeared in print during her lifetime by their hands. But in the elaborately ed. volume Poems (1890), her editor's description of Dickinson's verse as "something produced absolutely without the thought of publication, and solely by expression of the writer's own mind" became a model of *lyric expression protected from what one review called "the mass of popular print." Somewhat ironically, the poet whose writing life participated intimately and actively in so many of the reading and writing practices we have traced in Am. poetry (hymnal meter, the figure of the Poetess, familiar circulation followed by publication in print) became representative of a poetry held apart from the spirit of its age.

This myth about Dickinson has been so persistent that she and Whitman are still often mischaracterized as the first mod. Am. *lyric poets, but it is important to note that, at the end of the 19th c., Dickinson and Whitman were not the only examples of poets produced in expensive print eds. and made to look like exceptions to earlier rules. In 1896, Paul Laurence Dunbar's (1872–1906) Lyrics of Lowly Life was introduced as if it were an innocent version of black culture removed from the realities of the last decade of the 19th c. If Dickinson became a lyric representative by being characterized as isolated from the public in which her lyrics would circulate, Dunbar became another representative made to personify a culture imagined as less mod. than the rest of America. The framing of Dickinson and Dunbar as throwbacks, as poets too pure for the modernity that welcomed them, speaks to the ways that the 20th c. would begin to think of poems as expressions of individual alienation and as dramatic versions of fictional speakers. Before 1900, poetry in America was much more often thought of as the expression of a group and, after the late 18th c., as the expression of a nation. The era after 1900 would seek to elevate poetry through an ever-increasing complexity of lyric expression, thus closing a period when all kinds of verse circulated as the most popular genres of literary production in the U.S.

B. Modernist Poetry, 1900–1945. The "word of the modern, the word En-Masse" that Whitman celebrates describes the dynamic modernity of an emerging mercantile America—a dynamism that many modernists deplored. Dickinson's formal innovations were effaced by early eds. who limited her canon to more conventional poems on love and nature. The two most important poets of the late 19th c. had to wait for their *modernism to be born.

Poetry in the United States entered the 20th c. as a conservative retrenchment. Edwin Arlington Robinson (1869–1935), Edgar Lee Masters (1868–1950), Robert Frost (1874–1963), and John Crowe Ransom (1888–1974) form a transitional group that confronted the period's secularization and materialism by vaunting a rural, regional ethos. Building on the model of Robert Browning, several of these poets developed dramatic *monologues and poetic dialogues, often in the voices of rural speakers who epitomized the virtues of small-town values against cosmopolitan malaise.

Masters's Spoon River Anthology (1915) offers an example of these tendencies, chronicling the diverse population of his western Illinois small-town heritage. His portraits earned him a wide reputation, even though he often satirized the limits and provincialism of his readers. Perhaps speaking for the limits of poets of his generation, Petit, the poet, ruefully regrets his blindness to the heroic potential of his rural life composing "Triolets, villanelles, rondels, rondeaus, / Seeds in a dry pod, tick, tick, tick . . . what little iambics, / While Homer and Whitman roared in the pines?"

Robinson did write *villanelles and *rondeaux, chronicling the varied life of rural America based on his native town, Gardiner, Maine. Robinson's preference for complex stanzaic forms, regular rhyme schemes, and conventional meters contrasts with the psychological *realism and dramatic *voice of his characters. His persistent exploration of the unfulfilled life anticipates T. S. Eliot.

Frost offers the closest bridge between the Emersonian trad. of New England and his modernist peers. Like Masters and Robinson, Frost chronicled rural life through dramatic monologues. Often regarded as a New England moralist, Frost is a considerably more complex figure whose poems present irreconcilable ethical choices for people often ill equipped to confront the implications of their acts. "Mending Wall" (1914) is usually seen as a warning against the building of barriers ("Something there is that doesn't love a wall, / That sends the frozen-ground-swell under it"), yet as its farmer-philosopher speaker demonstrates, the act of seasonal rebuilding of a rustic wall brings neighbors together to cement a taciturn yet resilient community. Frost's repudiation of *free verse made him a reluctant modernist, yet his mastery of *blank verse offered "a momentary stay against confusion."

Frost's preference for rural life looks back to Wordsworth, and it was perhaps this retrospective quality to much U.S. poetry that prompted the Brit. poet and critic George Barker to observe in his 1948 essay "Fat Lady at the Circus" that "American poetry is a very easy subject to discuss for the simple reason that it does not exist." W. C. Williams (1883–1963) saw this as Am. poetry's great advantage—the possibility of a new, perhaps violent beginning. In Paterson (1946–58), Williams posed the question that animated the work of many of his generation:

How to begin to find a shape—to begin to begin again, turning the inside out: . . .

For Williams, son of a Brit. father and a Puerto Rican mother, the question was how "American" was Am. poetry when written by ex-slaves, Rus. Jewish immigrants, Native Americans, and the sons and daughters of Mexican Californios?

Poets responded to the claim that the U.S. lacked a unitary culture in a variety of ways. Some, such as T. S. Eliot (1888–1965), H.D. (1886–1961), Gertrude Stein (1874–1946), and Ezra Pound (1885–1972), expatriated to Europe in order to "make it new" amid older, more established cultural trads. Others, including Frost, Hart Crane (1899–1932), Wallace Stevens (1879–1948), Marianne Moore (1887–1972), and Williams hoped to "find a shape" on native soil and in the Am. idiom. Af. Am. poets who migrated to Harlem following World War I negotiated what it meant to be both black and a bard in Jim Crow America. A number of these writers—Langston Hughes (1902–67), Richard Wright (1908–60), Claude McKay (1890–1948)—also traveled abroad, living for periods of time in Europe and the Soviet Union.

Of the expatriate group, Pound offered the most sustained diagnosis of what was wrong with contemp. verse. He felt poetry needed to rid itself of *sentimentality, platitudes, and "emotional slither" by means outlined in the March 1913 issue of Poetry:

1. Direct treatment of the "thing" whether subjective or objective.
2. To use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation.
3. As regarding rhythm: to compose in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in sequence of a metronome.

These axioms, the basis of *imagism, provided an alternative to Victorian rhet. and romantic excess by their advocacy of clear, concrete images. Pound's third axiom proposed a more flexible metric tied to emotive and acoustic properties in each line. In defining the *image, Pound fused a symbolist poetics of the autonomous aesthetic object (see SYMBOLISM) with a psychologist's model of integrated consciousness, "an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time." His own imagist experiments reflected the influence of Chinese and Japanese precedents. "In a Station of the Metro" (1913) reflects the influence of Japanese haiku:

The apparition of these faces in the crowd,
Petals on a wet, black, bough.

Imagism was only one component in Pound's early attempt to master all forms and idioms of poetry. His early "masks of the self" constituted a poetic apprenticeship on his way to writing an epic poem. The most important transitional poem, in this respect, is Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (1920), which provided Pound with a method of collating different voices to mark a historical epoch, a method already being tested in the early sections of The Cantos, upon which he worked for the rest of his life.

The Cantos (1925–72) attempted to tell the "tale of the tribe," to create a cultural hieroglyph of values, both Eastern and Western, that would awaken society from its collective sleep. Mythological references, trans. from cl. sources and Romance langs., quotations from historical chronicles, catalogs of historical figures, personal conversations, and moments of great lyrical beauty create a dense, often incomprehensible cultural *collage. Rather than link these fragmentary materials via editorial or rhetorical commentary, Pound left them as "luminous details" to constellate a larger cultural edifice. Unfortunately, that edifice increasingly took the form of a totalitarian ethos. Pound's support for Mussolini and the Axis powers during World War II led to his incarceration near Pisa and then in a Washington, D.C., mental hospital for 13 years after the liberation. While he was incarcerated after the war, he published in 1948 The Pisan Cantos (Cantos 74–84), which, amid controversy, won the Bollingen Prize sponsored by the Library of Congress. Pound continued to work on The Cantos until his death, publishing Rock Drill (Cantos 85–95) in 1955 and Thrones (Cantos 96–109) in 1959. In the poem's last segments, Drafts and Fragments (1969), Pound seemed to feel that his poem would itself resemble one of the ruins depicted in his poem: "Tho' my errors and wrecks lie about me. / And I am not a demigod, / I cannot make it cohere."

In the January 1913 "Imagist" number of Poetry, Pound presented as his exemplary case the work of Hilda Doolittle (who took the pen name H.D.), whose early poetry (Sea Garden [1916], Heliodora [1924]) provided a model of spareness that fused the economy and clarity of the Greek Anthology* with streamlined modernity, as in her "Oread" (1914):

Whirl up, sea–
whirl your pointed pines, splash your great pines
on our rocks,
hurl your green over us,
cover us with your pools of fir.

H.D.'s early poetry drew from the cl. lyric and drama (she translated Euripides's Ion). Her first books of poetry refined a short, epigrammatic lyric, often spoken from the standpoint of a nymph or nature god. The poems in Sea Garden contested the usual romantic association of women with flowers by creating poems about violent natural forces, gods of the harvest, and tough, resilient plants that survive against the elements. In her later, longer poems, she expanded her critique of patriarchal authority by rewriting masculine stories—stories of war and violence often legitimated by reference to deceptive female figures such as Helen of Troy or Eve or Pandora. In place of masculinist stories of deceptive or dangerous women, H.D. posited priestesses and worshippers of Isis. Much of her work was indebted to readings in hermetic trads., Neoplatonic philosophy, and pre-Christian myth. Helen in Egypt (1961) has been seen as a pointed riposte to many of her male colleagues who see the Trojan War from the standpoint of its putative cause.

T. S. Eliot also benefited from Pound's support and tutelage, most famously through the latter's editing of The Waste Land (1922), which turned a *pastiche of Popean satire, Browningesque monologues, and Pre-Raphaelite imitations into one of the most important poems of the era. Born in St. Louis, Missouri, Eliot completed most of his Ph.D. in philosophy at Harvard, then moved to London, where he lived for the rest of his life. His early poems, collected in Prufrock and Other Observations (1917), were influenced by the Fr. symbolists as well as Browning's dramatic monologues. "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (1915) summarizes a mood of claustrophobia and solipsism that typified his early verse, and other poems—"Preludes" (1910–11), "Portrait of a Lady" (1917), and "Gerontion" (1920)—provided psychological portraits of the era.

Eliot's "impersonal theory of art," as he developed it in the essays "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919), "Hamlet and His Problems" (1919), and "The Metaphysical Poets" (1921), constitutes one of the most important components of modernist poetics, providing much of the theoretical armature for the *New Criticism of the 1940s and 1950s. At the core of his poetics is an abiding desire to recover what he calls "the historical sense," which can be achieved only if the poet transcends his or her particular psychological state and creates a "general emotion" to which all readers throughout time could respond. Eliot's advocacy of impersonality was by no means strictly literary; it bespoke his own psychological condition, an instability that led to several stays at sanitaria and a disastrous early marriage.

Eliot's most important work, The Waste Land, chronicles in five sections the mod. era's malaise and spiritual vacuity through a series of vivid images of sterility:

> April is the cruellest month, breeding
> Lilacs out of the dead land, mixing
> Memory and desire, stirring
> Dull roots with spring rain.

The poem represents a series of disembodied voices that narrate the fall of empires, the despoliation of nature, and the debasement of sexuality and reproduction. Underlying these instances of contemp. violation lie subterranean references to Arthurian legend, pre-Christian vegetation myth, and Eastern religion. Precedent for this layering of cultural materials, past and present, had been provided by the "mythic method" that Eliot saw in James Joyce's novel Ulysses (1922). Although Eliot provided no single narrator for his poem, he adapted the cl. figure of the blind Theban prophet Tiresias into a "spectator" to the events of the poem.

Eliot found doctrinal solution to this dehumanized landscape by converting to Anglo-Catholicism in 1927, following which the poems became increasingly concerned with theological questions of faith, incarnation, and belief. Ash Wednesday (1930), the inaugural poem of this period, coincided with his new religion and Brit. citizenship. Later poems such as The Four Quartets (1936–42) and his plays were attempts to give vertical authority to temporal progress, seeking, as he said, "the still point of the turning world" and a kind of incarnation of the word in silence. This synthesis of religious incarnation with aesthetic perfection is the hallmark of Eliot's contribution to many poets of the 1940s seeking an organic fusion of local particulars and universals in a secular age.

Eliot's impact on subsequent poets was substantial, but not everyone appreciated his example. Williams spent much of his career in a one-way debate with the poet of The Waste Land, feeling that, by adopting Eurocentric values and conservative political and religious views, Eliot had turned his back on the possibility of a vibrant U.S. trad. The Waste Land, Williams wrote in his Autobiography (1951), "set me back twenty years." Eliot's cultural elitism provided Williams with a much-needed foil for his own home-grown avant-garde response. Instead of living the bohemian life in Europe, Williams went to medical school and served as a general practitioner for the rest of his life in Rutherford, New Jersey. He maintained contact with Am. abstract painters such as Marsden Hartley, Charles Sheeler, and Charles Demuth and supported vanguard publications such as Broom and Others that forged alliances between new poetry and Eur. movements such as *Dada and *surrealism.

Williams's early poetry in Al Que Quiere! (1917), Sour Grapes (1921), and Spring and All (1923) celebrates the quotidian and the ordinary:

> so much depends > upon
>
> a red wheel > barrow
>
> glazed with rain > water
>
> beside the white > chickens

This focus on the unadorned reality of things—what he and others later called objectivism*—stressed not only the value of the ordinary object but the power of the imagination to bring the object into view. The wheelbarrow upon which "so much depends" is framed in a specific landscape, "glazed with rain / water // beside the white / chickens," and the alternating three- and one-word lines reinforce the material creation of that landscape in words.

Williams's frontal attack on trad., manners, and received opinion are characteristic of his work, culminating in his epic poem Paterson. Unlike Pound's Cantos with its sources in Eur. and Chinese hist., Paterson is based on the author's New Jersey hometown as a *metonymy for the possibility of renewal. Like William Blake's archetypal Albion, Paterson is a sleeping giant, waiting to be reborn, while Dr. Paterson, the local poet-doctor tries to piece him together. In this sense, Williams continued Whitman's hope for an epic grounded in his native country and Am. speech. Williams identified his doctor-hero with the city itself, its hist. merging with the poet's own hist. In book 2, he begins to deploy a new kind of lineation, a triadic, stepped stanza that became the model for much of his later verse. In The Desert Music (1954) and Pictures from Breughel (1962), he experimented further with what he called this variable foot*, which he linked with the possibilities of a specifically Am. idiom.

Stevens is Williams's counterpart in his desire to ground the poem in a reality that does not exist without the imagination. But whereas Williams stakes everything on the object (incl. the poem), Stevens is interested in the subjective apprehension of the object, the constant oscillation of imaginative self and bare reality. In the absence of sustaining myths and transcendental options, "Poetry / exceeding music must take the place / Of empty heaven and its hymns." This may sound like a latter-day version of symbolist escapism, yet Stevens felt that, through poetry, one would be returned to an earth one had forgotten how to see. Like Williams, Stevens had a professional career, working as an insurance lawyer in the firm of Hartford Accident and Indemnity Company. It was not until he was 44 that he published his first book, Harmonium (1923), in whose lyrics and satires Stevens wrote dazzling, often witty monologues on philosophical matters, often in vivid, color-drenched imagery. In subsequent work, he increasingly dramatized the mind in its speculative acts. Later long poems such as "Notes toward a Supreme Fiction" (1942), "Esthetique du Mal" (1945), "The Auroras of Autumn" (1947), and "An Ordinary Evening in New Haven" (1950) are less a departure from his early, symbolist-influenced lyrics than a logical evolution of problems advanced in them. "Notes toward a Supreme Fiction" speculates over 31 sections on how the "first idea" or "supreme fiction" is incarnated in the poem. But the "supreme fiction" must be discovered in the propositional logic of the poem itself; it cannot be imposed, as Stevens's Canon Aspirin supposes: "He imposes orders as he thinks of them, . . . But to impose is not / To discover." Stevens rejects imposition in favor of immanent discovery, marking a crucial link with earlier romantics and looking ahead to the immanent poetics of postmod. poets.

If poetry for Stevens offers a "supreme fiction" for a skeptical age, poetry for Moore offers *"sincerity" in a mendacious age, "a magnetism, an ardor, a refusal to be false." Semantic approximations of sincerity, such as authenticity, integrity, and genuine, appear throughout her poetry, but one never encounters the kinds of moral imperatives that such terms imply. Sincerity in "Poetry" (1919) is hard won:

> I, too, dislike it: there are things that are important > beyond all this fiddle.
> Reading it, however, with a perfect contempt for > it, one discovers in > it after all, a place for the genuine.

Moore's poetry seeks the genuine in a wild menagerie of flora and fauna—jerboas, steam rollers, pangolins, elephants, and wood weasels. An inveterate fan of the Brooklyn Dodgers and hired for a time to name a new Ford automobile (her suggestions were rejected in favor of the name Edsel), Moore was often portrayed as a kind of spinster crank; yet her tightly controlled *syllabic lines, extensive *allusions to literary and scientific texts, and wry, spare *irony show her work to be a good deal more complicated. Moore's longtime affection for mythological beasts, sea creatures, armored animals, and curious insects is more than a naturalist's curiosity but an *objective correlative for psychological and affective states. She often begins a poem with a minute description of an animal but then becomes distracted by other associations. In "The Pangolin" (1936), Moore seems to remark in her opening lines on the persistence of these figures and, perhaps, on herself: "Armor seems extra," yet like her tightly controlled syllabics, armor offers a shield that is both decorative and protective at the same time.

If Moore conducted her critique of lang. by quoting works of natural hist. and H.D. by revising cl. myth, Stein conducted hers by a radical deformation of lang. itself. There are no vegetation gods or cl. sources behind her works; nor, in fact, are there symbols attached to them. For Stein, words are returned to their grammatical, phonemic, and morphemic elements, as if to ground writing in the sheer materiality of words on the page. Her early psychological experiments while a student of William James at Radcliffe College convinced her that patterns of verbal repetition are a marker of character or "bottom nature" by which each person could be recognized. Although she applied such theories in her early prose works such as "Melanctha" (1905) or The Making of Americans (1911), she deployed *repetition extensively in her poems as well, particularly those that she called "portraits" of objects and people. Her theory of repetition was also influenced strongly by Eur. modernist painters, particularly Henri Matisse, Pablo Picasso, and Georges Braque, whom she and her brother Leo befriended in Paris. In her most sustained comment on poetry, "Poetry and Grammar" (1934), she notes that the function of poetry is with "using with abusing, with losing with wanting, with denying with avoiding with adoring with replacing the noun." Nowhere is this practice of uncovering the noun more pronounced than in Tender Buttons (1914), a series of prose meditations on ordinary objects, rooms, and food, in discontinuous sentences often generated by *paronomasia, verbal associations, and rhymes.

Stein, Moore, Stevens, and Williams all in some way attempted to return, as Stevens said, to the "basic slate" of a given locale, to deal with a godless world and to find immanent potential in ordinary things. For their younger contemporary Hart Crane, the Brooklyn Bridge, which serves as the centerpiece of his epic poem, stands as a complex symbol for Am. potentiality, space, and psychic resonance. The bridge "lends a myth to God" and gives form to a hist. from which we have become alien. Crane, like Eliot, imbibed the spirit of symbolism through Arthur Symons's The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899) and, throughout his short career, attempted to follow what he called a "logic of metaphor" to map unconscious associations between things. The son of a candy manufacturer, Crane worked in his early years for his father's business while imbibing A. C. Swinburne, Ernest Dowson, and Oscar Wilde, the decadent lit. of the fin de siècle. His early poems were modeled on the Victorian poetry of Swinburne and Alfred, Lord Tennyson, and he never quite lost his taste for sensuous, alliterative textures in lang. His first book, White Buildings (1926), reflects his reading of other modernist peers via pastiches of Eliot, Pound, Stevens, Williams, and others.

Crane's magnum opus, The Bridge (1930), attempts an epic survey of United States hist., from Columbus's first landing through the Civil War, westward expansion, and Indian Wars to mod. technologies (rail, electricity, telephones, subways). The Bridge features multiple voices, from its rhapsodic opening ("O Sleepless as the river under thee . . .") to the jazz rhythms of "The River" ("Stick your patent name on a signboard / brother–all over–going west–young man / Tintex–Japalac–Certain-teed Overalls ads . . .") to the ecstatic finale of "Atlantis." Throughout, Crane is conscious of prior epic trads.—from Homer to Dante to Whitman—and self-consciously places himself as their Am. heir. As much as The Bridge is a celebration of Am. hist. and accomplishment, it is often a poem of the isolato, in Crane's case, the homosexual poet whose solitude is flanked by the bustling crowds, tall buildings, and racing conveyances of the mod. metropole.

Crane's optimistic belief in the mythic potential of the Am. city was not shared by Af. Am. poets, who had yet to achieve anything like social or economic equality. The first real flowering of an Af. Am. intellectual and artistic renaissance could be seen in the *Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s. Alain Locke (1885–1954) provided the seminal call to arms through his anthol. of writings by black intellectuals The New Negro (1925), whose introduction observed that the Negro had been more of a formula than an expression of human complexity and that the time had come for a change in black self-expression through music, painting, lit., and debate. Among black poets, this change took the form of a debate over lang. Should Af. Am. poetry be based, as Langston Hughes believed, in the vernacular, oral trad. of black people, influenced by jazz rhythms and speech rhythms—or should it be based, as Countee Cullen (1903–46) and Claude McKay demonstrated, in traditional meters and stanzaic forms? Dunbar, the early James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938), and McKay had written significant black *dialect poetry, and among Harlem Renaissance poets, a number, incl. Hughes and Sterling Brown (1901–89), drew on the rich heritage of the black vernacular. Writing in reaction to Cullen's tendency to write in traditional *sonnets and versification, Hughes argued in "The Negro Artist and Racial Mountain" (1926) that the use of such models reflected the hegemony of whiteness—the "racial mountain" by which black writers configured their work around white models. In "The Weary Blues" (1926), Hughes quotes a *blues lyric within the larger poem, thereby creating a double-voiced representation of the black experience.

Cullen and McKay's ballads and sonnets often asserted race-conscious themes, in a sense "blackening" the white canon just as white poets had attempted, through Uncle Remus tales and popular music, to "whiten" black culture. McKay's "If We Must Die" (1919) is written in the form of an Elizabethan sonnet, yet its content concerns black resistance to racism and lynching:

> If we must die, let it not be like hogs
> Hunted and penned in an inglorious spot, . . .

Harlem Renaissance women writers such as Georgia Douglas Johnson (1880–1966), Anne Spencer (1882–1975), Angelina Weld Grimké (1880–1958), and Alice Dunbar-Nelson (1875–1935) also wrote in traditional meters and stanzaic patterns yet filled these forms with issues relating directly to the politics of an emerging black community, as well as to matters of gender and domesticity.

The 1930s and the Popular Front produced another version of modernism, galvanized by the Depression and fueled by political activism. Prominent poets of the period—Muriel Rukeyser (1930–80), Edwin Rolfe (1909–54), and Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892–1950)—rejected avant-garde formal strategies of the earlier modernists and subjected poetic form to political ends. "Not Sappho, Sacco," Rukeyser advised other poets, speaking of the need to turn from modernists' appropriation of cl. models to contemp. events such as the trial of accused anarchists Ferdinando Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. Rukeyser adapted Eliot's mythic method in her own *documentary poem "Book of the Dead" (1938), which chronicles a mining workplace disaster in West Virginia and the congressional hearings into corporate malfeasance that led to the deaths of miners from silicosis. Millay, in "Justice Denied in Massachusetts" (1927), attacked the legal malfeasance surrounding the Sacco and Vanzetti trial in 1920, and in "Say That We Saw Spain Die" (1938) responded to the defeat of the Sp. Republic by Franco's fascists.

One group of poets who came to prominence during the Popular Front era and combined modernist aesthetics and politics were the objectivists (see OBJECTIVISM): Louis Zukofsky (1904–78), George Oppen (1908–84), Charles Reznikoff (1894–1976), Carl Rakosi (1903–2007), and Lorine Niedecker (1903–70). Although they resisted defining themselves as a movement, they nevertheless built upon the examples of Pound and Williams in creating a poetry of direct presentation and economy. Zukofsky's essay "An Objective" (1930–31) stresses the unity of seeing eye and object: "An Objective: (Optics)—The lens bringing the rays from an object to a focus. That which is aimed at. (use extended to poetry)—Desire for what is objectively perfect . . ." Such perfection implies not fidelity to nature but sincerity or honesty in "thinking with the things as they exist." Zukofsky's involvement in Left politics can be felt in his long poem "A," composed throughout the poet's life between 1927 and 1978, where, in several instances, he quotes directly from Karl Marx's Das Kapital and relates the labor of writing to other forms of social materiality. Similarly, his colleague Oppen in Discrete Series (1934) creates short lyrics that attack capitalism and its excrescences: "Closed car–closed in glass– / At the curb, / Unapplied and empty: / A thing among others: . . ." The bare-bones style of such poems offers lang. unadorned, its surfaces and grammatical structure returning a degree of use value to lang., a quality that would become important to poets of the *Black Mountain school and *Language poetry movement.

More conservative poets of the period felt that ideological concerns of the Popular Front were irrelevant to art. In the wake of modernist excesses and experimentation, what was needed was a return to the poem as aesthetic *artifact, detached from its historical conditions or its author's psychology. Poets and critics who formed around John Crowe Ransom at Vanderbilt University, known as the *Fugitives, included Allen Tate (1899–1979) and Robert Penn Warren (1905–89). Their agrarian *manifesto I'll Take My Stand (1930) endorsed Southern rural values and the cl. curriculum against forms of collectivism and cosmopolitanism. They staked their aesthetics on Eliot's crit., with its emphasis on the impersonality of the poet, the devel. of the objective correlative, and the formally closed text. Their poems used traditional meters and complex metaphors and, in many cases, were based on southern hist. Tate's "Ode to the Confederate Dead" (1928) is an elegy for universal ideals and moral authority that he associates with the defeated South. The subject of the poem is twofold: the crisis of mod. solipsism and the death of heroic possibilities in a secular society. The narrator, speaking on an autumn afternoon in a Confederate military cemetery, muses on his alienation from the heroic dead but also senses his inability to rectify the "fragmentary cosmos," as Tate calls it in an essay on the poem ("Narcissus on Narcissus," 1938), of contemp. reality. To this extent, Tate echoes Eliot's warnings against solipsism in poems like "Prufrock" and The Waste Land, except that in his *ode, Tate locates the crisis of inaction against a specific U.S. historical moment.

Warren, Tate, and Ransom, along with fellow Fugitive Cleanth Brooks (1906–94), were perhaps better known as literary critics whose New Criticism offered a technical, even scientific alternative to the often impressionistic, biographical crit. of the era. Ransom's crit., esp. "Poetry: A Note in Ontology" (1934), repudiated what he called "Platonic poetry" (the poetry of ideas) and "Physical Poetry" (imagism and the various forms of objectivism) in favor of what he called "Metaphysical Poetry," which created a "miraculist" fusion of universal ideas and concrete particulars. The religious implications of miraculism suggest the ways that the New Critics sought a secular version of Christian incarnation through the aesthetic. Such ideas, when institutionalized in Brooks and Warren's influential teaching anthol. Understanding Poetry (1938), exerted an enormous influence on literary pedagogy for generations to come.

C. Postwar Poetry, 1945–2010. World War II produced its own poetry. Perhaps the most representative poem of the period was Randall Jarrell's (1914–65) "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner" (1945), written from the standpoint of an Air Force gunner, "hunched" in the belly of an airplane like an animal and who, when killed, is "washed . . . out of the turret with a hose." This bleak vision of the hopelessness of war is matched by the sequence of 12 sonnets by Gwendolyn Brooks (1917–2000), "Gay Chaps at the Bar" (1945), based on letters from black soldiers in the then-segregated army that chronicles the difficult tension between learning "white speech" and knowing black alienation. Finally, there are poems by those who opposed the war, incl. Pound, William Everson (1912–94), Robert Lowell (1917–77), William Stafford (1914–93), and Robert Duncan (1919–88), who, whether as conscientious objectors or, in the case of Pound, war criminals, were incarcerated for periods during the war. One might add to this list many poets and intellectuals on the Left who were disaffected by the pact between Hitler and Stalin at the war's outset.

Poets who came of age in the period immediately after World War II found themselves in a difficult relation to their modernist predecessors. On the one hand, the work of Eliot, Pound, Stevens, Frost, Moore, and Crane had provided younger poets with an extraordinary range of formal and thematic resources; at the same time, this variety also proved a stumbling block to further experimentation. It seemed to Jarrell that modernism, "the most successful and influential body of poetry of this century—is dead." Such an elegiac assessment of the era masked a desire felt by many poets of this generation to have a clean slate. Innovative works such as Williams's Spring and All, Pound's Cantos, Stein's Stanzas in Meditation, or Eliot's The Waste Land had challenged the structure of traditional verse, and now it was time for a stock-taking that would seize upon the liberating advantages of Fr. vers libre* and the derived Anglo-Am. free verse while curbing their excesses.

Writers born in the first two decades of the 20th c.—Theodore Roethke (1908–63), Elizabeth Bishop (1911–79), John Berryman (1914–72), Jarrell, Lowell, Howard Nemerov (1920–91), and Richard Wilbur (b. 1921)—turned away from free verse and developed a technically complex, rhetorically difficult poetry modeled on the values of the New Critics, esp. the work of metaphysical poets such as John Donne and George Herbert. Where poets of the first generation capped their careers by writing long epic or dramatic poems, postwar poets perfected a kind of reflective, ironic lyric that would become the formal model for the two decades following World War II.

Eliot's lit. crit. provided a major impetus for many of these tendencies, and his cultural crit. introduced a religio-ethical frame within which poetry could be assessed. The characteristic voice in poems written during this period is arch and ironic, cautious of bardic pronouncements yet assured in its mastery of complexity and contradiction. Irony now implies more than saying one thing while meaning another; it signals that the artist is in control, able to moderate feeling by transforming it into rhet. In a paradox that seemed quite normal to the age, Wilbur spoke of irony as being the "source . . . of what richness and honesty we may sense in a poem," as illustrated by his own example from The Beautiful Changes (1947):

> Does sense so stale that it must needs derange
> The world to know it?

Wilbur's "Praise in Summer" (1947), with its careful management of ironic tension, richly embroidered *figuration, and steady iambic meters, seems destined less for sensual *appreciation than for *explication. As Jarrell conceded, it was an "age of criticism" in which the techniques of *close reading and scientific analysis were perfected in ways that ultimately affected how poems were written. The postwar years saw colleges and universities expanding their enrollments with students on the G.I. Bill, and the curriculum needed practical critical methodologies to accommodate this influx. For the first time in hist., poets in increasing numbers became teachers, and creative writing became part of the literary curriculum. Whereas for the first generation of modernists, poetry emerged within bohemian enclaves and expatriate communities, it now became a province of the university quarterly and the English Department classroom.

Arguably, the three poets who most typify—but at the same time challenge—the conservative tenor of the times were Lowell, Berryman, and Bishop. Lowell's first two books, Land of Unlikeness (1944) and Lord Weary's Castle (1946), exhibit the effects of his close relationship to his New Critical mentors, Ransom and Tate. In these works, Lowell takes the metaphysical mode to an extreme, employing a gnarled, convoluted syntax and *alliteration to represent issues of incarnation and existential doubt. With Life Studies (1959), Lowell shocked his teachers and friends by dropping his metaphysical style and speaking in a more personal voice about his ambivalent relationship to his patrician New England family, troubled marriages, mental breakdowns, and theological anxieties. Despite Lowell's new personalism, he still maintained the formal *diction and iambic *cadences of his earlier work:

> These are the tranquilized Fifties, > and I am forty. Ought I to regret my seedtime?

Lowell's rather archaic diction and heavy alliterations temper his *confessional poetry with a need to contain feeling within definite formal boundaries. In later volumes (History, For Lizzie and Harriet, and The Dolphin, all 1973) he returned to a more traditional verse, working extensively in unrhymed, blank-verse sonnets.

Berryman began by writing in the style of W. H. Auden and W. B. Yeats, but with "Homage to Mistress Bradstreet" (1956) and even more powerfully in 77 Dream Songs (1964), he developed an idiosyncratic use of persona that permitted him a wide range of voices to dramatize various sides of his rather volatile personality. In the former poem, he collapses his own voice into that of America's first poet, speaking of his own existential malaise through Anne Bradstreet's confessions of spiritual doubt. His major work, The Dream Songs (1969), confronts the poet's own biography in a long sequence of lyrics, each built on three six-line stanzas, written from 1955 until the time of his death in 1972. Despite its autobiographical content, The Dream Songs offers a complex series of personae in which mocking accusation merges with ironic self-deprecation:

> Life, friends, is boring. We must not say so.
> After all, the sky flashes, the great sea yearns.
>
> ("Dream Song 14")

Bishop, though less rhetorically explosive than either Lowell or Berryman, combined flexible meters with microscopically sharp observations to achieve a broken, tense lyricism, reminiscent of Moore. She describes the skin of a fish as

> . . . like wallpaper: > shapes like full-blown roses > stained and lost through age.
>
> ("The Fish")

In such lines, lang. isolates and refines the image until it loses its conventional associations and becomes something exotic and even heroic. Without moralizing commentary, Bishop sees a world of vivid particulars that gain luster by her patient, at times obsessive, enumerations. In Bishop, as in her two poetic peers, formal mastery implies less the creation of seamless artifice than it does a charged ling. and rhetorical field in which cognitive acts may be tested. Lowell's and Berryman's harsh, crabbed lang. and Bishop's enjambed, condensed lines represent a *formalism impatient with its own limits, dramatizing by sheer verbal energy areas of psychological intensity that cannot yet be expressed.

Lowell's poetry after Life Studies made an indelible mark on a number of writers, incl. Sylvia Plath (1932–63), Anne Sexton (1928–75), W. D. Snodgrass (1926–2009), and, to a lesser extent, Berryman. Despite their emphasis on charged psychic materials, these poets reflect a much more carefully modulated response to their personal content. The strength of Plath's vehement attack in "Daddy" (1962) comes not from its specific address to her actual father, Otto Plath, who died when she was a child, but from its conscious and careful manipulation of conflicting discursive modes (childhood rhymes, holocaust imagery, obsessive repetitions) that form an objective correlative to her psychological condition. Confessional poetry, as M. L. Rosenthal pointed out in his inaugural essay on that movement ("Poetry as Confession," 1959), should be considered not as a prescriptive formula held by any one group but as a general permission felt by most poets of the period to treat personal experience, even in its most intimate and painful aspects.

If Eliot, Auden, and Frost exerted a pervasive influence on the dominant trad. of the 1950s, Pound and Williams began to exert a like effect on an emerging experimental trad. Pound's Cantos had provided a model for a historical, "open" poetry, and Williams's hard, objectivist lyrics had encouraged a poetics of visual clarity and metrical experimentation. Charles Olson's (1910–70) essay on "projective verse" (1950) extended their ideas with a special emphasis on the poetic line as a register of physiological and emotional contours. He sought to reinvigorate poetic lang. by what he called composition by field, in which poetic form extends directly from subject matter and in which the line is a register of momentary perceptions. He explored this stance in his Maximus Poems (written 1950–70, pub. 1960–75), which dwells on the separation of the individual from his or her locale because of the ill effects of entrepreneurial capitalism. Early portions of The Maximus Poems engage the hist. of Olson's hometown, Gloucester, Massachusetts; but in later sections, his interests extend outward to Asia, Africa, and the Americas and back to the Pleistocene period.

Although "projective verse" had few adherents when it first appeared, it was a harbinger of things to come, as poets sought a loosening of poetic forms and an alternative to New Critical strictures. The most public announcement of a change came from Allen Ginsberg (1926–97), whose long poem Howl (1956) revived romanticism in its most vatic form and with Whitmanesque enthusiasm made the poet's specific, personal voice the center of concern:

> I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed > by madness, starving hysterical naked, > dragging themselves through the negro streets at > dawn, looking for an angry fix

Ginsberg's protest against institutional mind control and McCarthy-era paranoia was made in what he called his "Hebraic-Melvillian bardic breath" and in a lang. as direct and explicit as Wilbur's or Lowell's was oblique. The carefully nuanced ironies of the period were jettisoned in favor of a tone alternately funny, frank, and self-protective. Howl received its first major critical forum in the San Francisco Municipal Court when its publisher, City Lights Books, went on trial for pornography, adding new meaning to the poem's social indictment and bringing a mass readership to the work of other Beat generation writers (see BEAT POETRY). Many of Ginsberg's colleagues—Jack Kerouac (1922–69), Lawrence Ferlinghetti (b. 1920), LeRoi Jones (b. 1934, now known as Amiri Baraka), Gregory Corso (1930–2001), Michael McClure (b. 1932)—provided their own critique of the era, reviving a demotic, populist poetics inspired by Whitman and Williams as well as the romantic, visionary work of William Blake and P. B. Shelley. Performing their poetry in jazz clubs or coffeehouses, occasionally accompanied by jazz, the Beat poets made the *poetry reading a primary fact of postwar literary life.

The Beat movement is the most public face of a general romantic revival during the late 1950s and 1960s. Whether through Olson's notion of composition by field, Robert Bly's (b. 1926) ideas of the psychological *deep-image, or Frank O'Hara's (1926–66) personism, poets began to think of the poem not as an imitation of experience but as an experience itself, a map of moment-to-moment perceptions whose value is measured by immediacy and sincerity rather than artistic unity. As Duncan said, "[T]he order man may contrive upon the things about him . . . is trivial beside the divine order or natural order he may discover in them." Duncan's remark reinvests John Keats's *negative capability with sacramental implications: the poet relinquishes order that he may discover an order prior to and immanent within experience.

In the late 1950s, these general tendencies could be seen in little magazines such as Origin, The Black Mountain Review, Yugen, The Fifties, Evergreen Review, and, most important, in Donald Allen's 1960 anthol. The New American Poetry 1945–1960, which first divided the experimental tendencies of Am. poetry into five groups. One group consisted of the poets associated with Black Mountain College in North Carolina, incl. Olson, Robert Creeley (1926–2005), Duncan, Denise Levertov (1923–1997), and Edward Dorn (1929–99). Another group, the *New York school, incl. O'Hara, John Ashbery (b. 1927), Kenneth Koch (1925–2002), and James Schuyler (1923–91), was closely associated with painters and musicians. The *San Francisco Renaissance was represented by poets such as Jack Spicer (1925–65), Robin Blaser (1925–2009), Brother Antoninus (the aforementioned William Everson), and Philip Lamantia (1927–2005). A fourth category included other West Coast writers such as Gary Snyder (b. 1930), Philip Whalen (1923–2002), and David Meltzer (b. 1937). Along with the Beats, these groups shared less a common aesthetic than a spirit of bohemian exuberance and antiestablishment camaraderie.

In a similar vein but coming from different sources, Bly, James Wright (1927–80), W. S. Merwin (b. 1927), Galway Kinnell (b. 1927), Mark Strand (b. 1934), and others were developing a poetics of the "deep-image." Using Sp. and Fr. surrealism as a source, they experimented with associative techniques that would circumvent discursive thought and tap into unconscious realms. Among Deep Image poets, one can draw a distinction between those who create discontinuous "leaps" within a minimal, denuded landscape and those for whom the "leap" implies access to a world of numinous presence. Strand and Merwin would be examples of the first sort, creating poems in which lang. has been reduced to a bare minimum. In Wright's or Bly's poetry, conversely, the deep image serves to join quotidian, unreflective experience with realms of spiritual or natural value. Taking a walk, mailing a letter, or wasting time becomes an initiatory rite of passage into archetypal experiences. In Bly's "Snowfall in the Afternoon," (1962), a snowstorm transforms a barn into a "hulk blown toward us in a storm at sea; / All the sailors on deck have been blind for many years." Waking in the morning "is like a harbor at dawn; / We know that our master has left us for the day" ("Waking from Sleep," 1962).

The Eur. avant-garde provided a common ground for another group that was initially associated with Bly and Wright but ultimately moved in a very different direction. David Antin (b. 1932), Jackson Mac Low (1922–2004), Jerome Rothenberg (b. 1931), and Armand Schwerner (1927–99) merged a strong interest in Dada and surrealism with the poetics of Stein, the aesthetic theories of Marcel Duchamp and John Cage, and the theatrical "happenings" movement. In a desire to find aesthetic models that exist outside of Western trad. (or marginalized within it), many of these poets turned to oral and nonliterate cultures, creating along the way an *ethnopoetics that stresses cultural and social sources of poetry.

The identity politics of the 1960s brought new constituencies into the poetry world, assisted by access to cheap, offset printing technologies and art venues. Af. Am., gay and lesbian, Asian Am., Native Am., and Chicana/o poets drew on alternative cultural models to challenge the canon of anglocentric, male models. Poet and playwright LeRoi Jones threw off his previous Black Mountain and Beat affiliations and adopted the name Imamu Amiri Baraka to signal his alliance with the Black Nationalist movement. The *Black Arts movement with which Baraka was associated created an angry, frontal poetry that addressed racism, drawing on Afrocentric cultural trads., free jazz improvisation (see JAZZ POETRY), and street vernacular. Other poets not directly tied to the Black Arts movement—David Henderson (b. 1942), Audre Lorde (1934–92), June Jordan (1936–2002), and Michael S. Harper (b. 1938)—also worked to foreground black cultural experience and lang. Although alternate cultural sources became important allies in this endeavor (the use of jazz rhythms in black writing, the use of oral chant in Native Am. poetry, bilingualism in *Chicana/o poetry), the primary formal imperatives came from the more populist, oral styles of the Beats and other new poetry movements.

Coinciding with the growth of literary communities among ethnic minorities, women writers began to write out of the social and political context of the feminist movement. Presses, reading spaces, distribution services, and anthols. provided a range of new resources for women writers, many of whom—like Adrienne Rich (1929–2012)—began their careers within the predominantly male literary community. Although "women's poetry" defines less a set of stylistic features than a spectrum of gendered concerns, many women writers agreed with the necessity for revision as defined by Rich: "the act of looking back, of seeing with fresh eyes, of entering an old text from a new critical direction." Many of Rich's poems are just such revisions of previous texts as she sorts through the "book of myths" ("Diving into the Wreck," 1972) to find moments in which women have been marginalized—or ignored outright. Although she began by writing poems very much in the formalist mode of the 1950s, Rich's style gradually loosened to admit her own changing awareness of women's oppression and to express her anger at patriarchal authority.

The proliferation of poetic styles during the 1970s and 1980s repeated many of the tendencies of the modernist period, with subtle refinements. Poets rejected the more bardic and expressive gestures—what Stanley Plumly (b. 1939) calls "experience in capital letters"—of the 1960s in favor of a discursive, even chatty surface that belies more complex social and psychological issues. The dominant mode of the 1970s and 1980s is a reflective lyricism in which technical skill is everywhere evident but nowhere obtrusive. The overtly romantic stance of 1960s poetry, with its emphasis on participation, orality, and energy, gave way to quiet speculation.

One can identify three general areas of practice among mainstream writers of the 1970s and 1980s linked by a shared concern with *voice and *tone. Among the first group, A. R. Ammons (1926–2001), Ashbery, Robert Pinsky (b. 1940), Louise Glück (b. 1943), Sandra McPherson (b. 1943), and Robert Hass (b. 1941) merge the philosophical skepticism of Stevens with the ethical, cultural concerns of Yvor Winters (1900–68) or Warren. Ashbery's poetry, perhaps the most sophisticated and complex of the group, manifests what he calls "the swarm effect" of lang., vacillating between opposing lures of what he calls "leaving out" or "putting in." His long, desultory lyrics such as "The Skaters" (1966), Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror (1975), and the prose trilogy Three Poems (1972) record the fluctuating patterns of a disjunct consciousness. Unable to believe either in a supreme fiction or in a self-sufficient ego, Ashbery leaves "the bitter impression of absence" in lines that are often hilariously funny even as they are self-deprecating. Ammons's poetry, while similar to that of Stevens in its treatment of philosophical issues, builds upon Frost's naturalism and his concern for the morality of "place." For Ammons, "small branches can / loosen heavy postures" ("Essay on Poetics," 1970), and he conducted a quiet campaign for the restorative effects of weather, seasonal change, animal life, and horticulture as they interact with the speculative intellect. Hass's poetry continues Ammons's naturalist concerns—Frost and Kenneth Rexroth (1905–82) are important sources as well—but builds upon subtle shifts of voice and tone. Philosophical speculation alternates with epiphanic moments.

A second group, closely aligned with the first but extending more directly out of the deep-image aesthetic of Bly and Merwin, would include poets such as C. K. Williams (b. 1936), Marvin Bell (b. 1937), Philip Levine (b. 1928), Tess Gallagher (b. 1943), Charles Wright (b. 1935), Plumly, and Carolyn Forché (b. 1950). In their work surrealist juxtaposition combines with a spare, sometimes minimalist style to expose unconscious or atavistic resonances in everyday events. Less inclined toward the ecstatic "leaps" of Bly and James Wright, these poets prefer a more narrative progression and an elaborate use of analogy that allows the poet to achieve some kind of transcendence or political clarity amid mundane particulars.

A third variation on the dominant mode, what von Hallberg characterizes as "the Cosmopolitan Style," is represented by John Hollander (b. 1929), Richard Howard (b. 1929), James Merrill (1926–95), and Anthony Hecht (1923–2004). In this work, discursiveness becomes a foil for strategies of self-preservation and effacement. At the same time, a tendency toward conversation conflicts with the use of formal meters and complex *internal and terminal rhymes. This tension can be felt in the work of Merrill, which often uses its own aesthetic virtuosity to mock aesthetic solutions. His poems are willfully bookish, his tone, derived to some extent from Auden, arch and urbane. Merrill's reticence and detachment are calculated frames for viewing a conflicted personal hist., a condition given fullest treatment in his trilogy, The Changing Light at Sandover (1980). In this long poem, the poet's personal ardors, his "divine comedies," are subjected to an extraordinary anthol. of literary forms, from sonnets and verse dramas to blank-verse paragraphs, all subsumed under the pose of having been received during Ouija board séances. Like many of his earlier poems, The Changing Light at Sandover is a poem about writing, a celebration of the "surprise and pleasure [of] its working-out," that offers an elaborate allegory about erotic and spiritual love in an increasingly secularized society.

Merrill is usually regarded as a principal influence on a movement known as the *New Formalism, which would include Alfred Corn (b. 1943), Marilyn Hacker (b. 1942), Brad Leithauser (b. 1953), Katha Pollitt (b. 1949), and Gjertrud Schnackenberg (b. 1953). Their renewed interest in traditional forms (as well as the possibilities of *narrative poetry) has been undertaken less as a rear-guard attack on debased culture than as a recovery of the liberating potential of limits. New Formalists stress that writing in traditional forms aims to rebalance scales that had tipped too strongly in the direction of free verse since the 1960s, leading, as a result, to a rather amorphous autobiographical lyricism in which open form became an excuse for sloppy practice. The challenge for New Formalists has been to hide or at least diminish pattern through the use of slant rhyme, nonce forms, syllabic rhythms, and expressive variants on repeated meters. At the same time, poets attempt to combine their use of regular meters and rhyme with diction drawn from contemp. life, using the idiom of urban experience, technology, and advertising to blur the usual association of traditional forms with "high" or nonstandard diction.

All these tendencies could be linked by their resistance to the more autobiographical and vatic modes of the 1960s. The most frontal critique of such tendencies has come from writers associated with *Language poetry. The work of Lyn Hejinian (b. 1941), Bruce Andrews (b. 1948), Rae Armantrout (b. 1947), Carla Harryman (b. 1952), Charles Bernstein (b. 1950), Ron Silliman (b. 1946), Bob Perelman (b. 1947), and Barrett Watten (b. 1948) explores the degree to which the "self" and "experience" are constructs, enmeshed in social discourse. Deriving from Black Mountain, *futurism, and objectivism, these writers foreground lang. as signifying system (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). Fragmentation and non sequitur open up new realms of play and semantic complexity that invite (or cajole) the reader into cocreation of the poem. Language poets' interest in the *prose poem and nonlinear sentencing challenges the generic boundaries of lined verse. That interest can be taken as a marker of a certain crise de vers that haunts recent poetry in general. If "a word is a bottomless pit" (Hejinian), a lang.-oriented poetry joins poet and reader in an agency by which that pit shall be explored, and postmod. poets have taken this realization as a generative fact.

By the end of the 20th c., many of the techniques associated with language writing (non sequitur, collage, decentered point of view) became standard features of much mainstream verse, leading the Marxist critic Fredric Jameson to feel that avant-garde innovation was the cultural dominant, as evident in advertising or fashion as in experimental art. At the same time, the increased importance of creative-writing programs and the MFA in college curricula has produced a generic "workshop poem" that, as Altieri explains, "appears spoken in a natural voice [with] a sense of urgency and immediacy to this 'affected naturalness' so as to make it appear that one is re-experiencing the original event." Such "studied artlessness" has itself become a kind of formula, leading some academic critics to wonder if poetry can survive its own institutionalization. Books and articles with titles like After the Death of Poetry (V. L. Shetley, 1993) and Can Poetry Matter? (D. Gioia, 1992) bemoan the domestication of poetry through creative-writing programs and the detachment of poetry from public life. This elegiac response to an increasing professionalization on the one hand and to the increasing fragmentation of traditional poetic values on the other is premised on the illusion that there was an earlier, more vibrant moment in which poetry mattered in public life.

These elegiac remarks conflict with the historic upsurge of *performance poetry in coffeehouses, art spaces, and bars. Often distant from academic venues, slams, stand-up, and spoken-word events have brought poetry back to the public arena, merging formal rhymes and patterned rhythm with *hip-hop and rap music. The *Nuyorican Poets Café, founded by Miguel Algarín (b. 1941) in 1973 in New York, featured a multicultural mix of spoken-word poetry, open mike, and performance events. *Poetry slams involve poets competing for the best improvised poem on a given theme (see POETIC CONTESTS). Although the spirit of spoken-word poetry has precedents in Dada performance as well as Beat poetry readings, its strongly community-based, democratic ethos contrasts with coterie or school-based poetry movements.

If the "little magazine" revolution of the 1960s was a poetry of the page in which *typography and lineation represented expressive intent, the digital revolution of the 1990s and after inaugurated new forms of digital poetry (see ELECTRONIC POETRY) in which the word is released to cyberspace. In some cases, poets adapted the computer to *aleatory (chance-generated) composition. In other cases such as *Flarf, poems are created out of Web searches and databases. This new media also made poetry available in ways unimaginable in an era of tape recorders and offset printing. Sites such as the Buffalo Electronic Poetry Center (EPC), Ubuweb, Pennsound, and online magazines such as Jacket and Big Bridge allow readers around the world to hear live poetry readings and interviews and even to participate in the composition of new work.

The collaborative potential of digital poetry problematizes the expressivist basis of much previous poetry. The natures of *presence, voice, orality, and identity are rendered esp. complex in hypertext, where different links may provide multiple narrative roads for the reader to follow or where multiple readers may interact with the text. Issues of beginnings and closure, the page and scoring no longer have the same relevance in the age of the scrolling screen. Claims for the democratization of poetry through digital media have led to a renewed consideration of new forms of public address. Flarf practitioners use open-source software principles to access free information on the Web that is then modified, redistributeds, and deformed.

It seems clear that the emergent poetry of the 21st c. no longer can be described by binaries such as "raw and cooked" (Robert Lowell's description of his contemporaries in 1960), experimental and formalist, symbolist and immanent, speech-based and text-based. In a digital and postidentity age, collective labels (Black Mountain, Deep Image) and categories of identity seem both limiting and beside the point. The strong lyric tendency of poetry of the 1970s and 1980s is now matched by an equally strong commitment to narrative, prose poetry, performance, and satiric verse. To adapt the title of a recent anthol., we live in an age of the Am. hybrid, linking formalists and experimentalists, proceduralists and stand-up poets. The outlines of a 21st-c. U.S. poetry are still difficult to see, but the resilient spirit of Emerson's "metre-making argument" endures.

II. Spanish. See CARIBBEAN POETRY (SPANISH), CHICANA/O POETRY, NUYORICAN POETRY.

III. French. See FRANCOPHONE POETS OF THE U.S.

IV. Indigenous Language. See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; INUIT POETRY; NAVAJO POETRY.

See AFRICAN AMERICAN POETRY, AMERICAN SIGN LANGUAGE POETRY, ASIAN AMERICAN POETRY.

■ To 1900. Anthologies: African-American Poetry of the Nineteenth Century, ed. J. R. Sherman (1992); American Poetry: The Nineteenth Century, ed. J. Hollander, 2 v. (1993); American Women Poets of the Nineteenth Century, ed. C. Walker (1995); American Poetry: The Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries, ed. D. S. Shields (2007). Criticism and History: F. O. Matthiessen, American Renaissance (1941); R. H. Pearce, The Continuity of American Poetry (1961); A. Gelpi, The Tenth Muse: The Psyche of the American Poet (1975); S. Cameron, Lyric Time: Dickinson and the Limits of Genre (1979); W. Dowling, Poetry and Ideology in Revolutionary Connecticut (1990); D. S. Shields, Oracles of Empire: Poetry, Politics, and Commerce in British America (1990); S. Cameron, Choosing Not Choosing: Dickinson's Fascicles (1992); Breaking Bounds: Whitman and American Cultural Studies, ed. B. Erkkila and J. Grossman (1996); D. S. Shields, Civil Tongues and Polite Letters in British America (1997); M. P. Brown, " 'BOSTON/ SOB NOT': Elegiac Performance in Early New England and Materialist Studies of the Book," American Quarterly 50 (1998); M. L. Kete, Sentimental Collaborations: Mourning and Middle-Class Identity in Nineteenth-Century America (2000); C. Wells, The Devil and Doctor Dwight: Satire and Theology in the Early American Republic (2002); P. B. Bennett, Poets in the Public Sphere: The Emancipatory Project of American Women's Poetry, 1800–1900 (2003); C. C. Calhoun, Longfellow: A Rediscovered Life (2004); M. Loeffelholz, From School to Salon: Reading Nineteenth-Century American Women's Poetry (2004); E. Richards, Gender and the Poetics of Reception in Poe's Circle (2004); M. Warner, "Introduction," The Portable Walt Whitman (2004); V. Jackson, Dickinson's Misery: A Theory of Lyric Reading (2005); M. Cavitch, American Elegy: The Poetry of Mourning from the Puritans to Whitman (2007); The Traffic in Poems: Nineteenth-Century Poetry and Transatlantic Exchange, ed. M. McGill (2008); M. C. Cohen, "Contraband Singing: Poems and Songs in Circulation during the Civil War," AL 82 (2010); J. van der Woude, "The Migration of the Muses: Translation and the Origins of American Poetry," Early American Literature 45 (2010).

■ 1900–2010. Anthologies: The Book of American Negro Poetry, ed. J. W. Johnson (1931); An "Objectivists" Anthology, ed. L. Zukofsky (1932); The Morrow Anthology of Younger American Poets, ed. D. Smith and D. Bottoms (1985); Shadowed Dreams: Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance, ed. M. Honey (1989); The Oxford Anthology of Modern American Poetry, ed. C. Nelson (2000); In the American Tree, ed. R. Silliman (2002); American Hybrid: A Norton Anthology of New Poetry, ed. C. Swensen and D. St. John (2009); Against Expression: An Anthology of Conceptual Writing, ed. C. Dworkin and K. Goldsmith (2011). Criticism and History: J. H. Miller, Poets of Reality: Six Twentieth-Century Writers (1965); H. Kenner, The Pound Era (1971); C. Altieri, Enlarging the Temple: New Directions in American Poetry during the 1960s (1979), and Self and Sensibility in Contemporary American Poetry (1984); M. Perloff, The Dance of the Intellect: Studies in the Poetry of the Pound Tradition (1985); R. von Hallberg, American Poetry and Culture, 1945–1980 (1985); H. A. Baker Jr., Afro-American Poetics: Revisions of Harlem and the Black Aesthetic (1988); M. Levenson, A Genealogy of Modernism: A Study of English Literary Doctrine, 1908–1922 (1989); C. Nelson, Repression and Recovery: Modern American Poetry and the Poetics of Cultural Memory, 1910–1945 (1989); R. Pérez-Torres, Movements in Chicano Poetry: Against Myths, Against Margins (1995); A. Nielsen, Black Chant: Languages of African-American Postmodernism (1997); The Objectivist Nexus: Essays in Cultural Poetics, ed. R. B. DuPlessis and P. Quartermain (1999); R. B. DuPlessis, Genders, Races and Religious Cultures in Modern American Poetry (2001); New Media Poetics: Contexts, Technotexts, and Theories, ed. A. Morris and T. Swiss (2006); T. Yu, Race and the Avant-Garde: Experimental and Asia American Poetry since 1965 (2009); M. Davidson, On the Outskirts of Form: Practicing Cultural Poetics (2011).

M. COHEN (TO 1900); M. DAVIDSON (MODERNIST, POSTWAR)

UNITY. A fundamental—quite possibly the fundamental—aesthetic criterion, akin to harmony, integrity, and coherence. In the Phaedrus, Plato holds that an oration should have unity analogous to the organic unity of a living creature; in the Symposium, he suggests, in connection with the musical scale, that unity is a reconciliation of opposites or discords. The first full-blown Western theory of dramatic unity emerges in Aristotle's Poetics. Unity of plot is dramatic in that it expresses unity of action (the only unity Aristotle actually sponsors). Tragedy is held to be superior to *epic because of its tighter internal relations (5.23–24). The ideal tragedy is an imitation of a unified action, large enough to be clear while small enough to be comprehensible. Aristotle's conception of unity is closely related to his artistic requirements of probability and necessity as they constitute the criteria for the connection of parts (6–9).

Aristotle is concerned only with dramatic unity; Horace has a looser but broader conception of unity that refers not only to action but, even more, to diction. He thinks of it as an effect of harmony obtained by skillful "order and arrangement," analogous either to music or, more significantly, to the blending of colors, light, and shadow in painting (ut pictura poesis). Peri hypsous (On the Sublime), the late cl. text long ascribed to Longinus, includes an analysis of an ode by Sappho in which intensity of feeling is seen to produce an organic unity that manifests itself as a reconciliation of opposing elements, a view that has obvious affinities to both Plato and Horace.

With the rediscovery of the text of Aristotle's Poetics and its trans. and commentary by Lodovico Castelvetro in the Ren. (Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e sposta; 1570, 1576), Aristotle's argument for unity of action gradually became doctrine, then ossified into a prescription, one of the poetic "rules" of Fr. *classicism, the three unities—of action, time, and place. Aristotle had remarked that tragedies confined themselves to the events of a single day, but it was J. C. Scaliger who first established the tendency to identify the duration of the action represented with the duration of the representation. This was done in the name of verisimilitude; Philip Sidney thought it was common reason (i.e., concern for *verisimilitude) as well as Aristotle's precept that the stage should always represent only one place and the events of one day. Yet, as formal criteria, the three unities rather challenge the artist to concentrate on the autonomy of his or her work. In the heyday of the unities, in the drama of 17th-c. Fr. classicism, Jean Racine clearly drew strength from them, while Pierre Corneille strained against them—his play Le Cid occasioned a great controversy over the unities.

The three unities were never fully adopted in England, and John Dryden assessed the reasons in the Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668), justifying the Eng. preference for subplot. Samuel Johnson's "Preface to Shakespeare" (1765) showed, with great humor, how such mistaken scruples as to verisimilitude were given the lie by the very nature of dramatic illusion. The audience manages a shift of scene from Rome to Alexandria with the same ease it accepts the original setting as Rome. At the same time, the artifice of strictly observing the unities enhances the dramatic illusion wherever the concentration is psychologically compelling. Eng. critics since Dryden, particularly John Dennis, had gone back to Aristotle for a deeper grasp of the principle of dramatic unity in its interdependence with probability and necessity as felt by the audience. The three unities were, thus, not central to the more general concern with dramatic unity but merely a subset of it.

From antiquity up to the mid-18th c., theories of unity had been mainly theories of dramatic unity. But 18th-c. theories of unity dealt with other genres besides drama, as René Le Bossu's Traité du Poëme épique (1675) and Joseph Addison's Spectator papers on Paradise Lost show. And the rise of psychological aesthetics in the 18th c. opened the way to more adequate ideas of the role of unity in lyric poetry as well. New and enlarged conceptions of the creative *imagination and the shift from a mechanistic to a vitalist worldview led to the romantic emphasis on organic unity. This appeared variously as unity of feeling, unity as an imitation of the poet's mind in the act of creation, and imaginative unity, with the imagination being the shaping, unifying ("esemplastic"), and reconciling power (S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, ch. 14).

The conception of poetic unity fostered by the *New Criticism of the mid-20th c. was directed against *romanticism but remained romantic nonetheless. Organic unity was also a mainstay of the subsequent schools of formalist, psychological, and myth crit., both as a standard of judgment and as a method of exposition. Thus, even beyond the explicitly Aristotelian emphasis of the *Chicago school, poetic unity was explained by Richards as a reconciliation of impulses; by Brooks as a reconciliation of thought and feeling manifested in the interaction of theme with lang. and metaphor; by the surrealists as a unifying of the total mind through freeing of the unconscious; by the Freudians through poetic analogues of the "dream-work" following associations of symbols; and by the Jungians in the replication of archetypal motifs.

At the same time, the principle of unity was variously questioned and even made problematic by some of these same movements, just as some romantics had developed an aesthetic of the *fragment. Indeed, such a reversal may be implicit in the sophistication of the sense of unity, which drew it away from formal constraints. The structuralist and poststructuralist tendencies that followed in the wake of New Criticism may outwardly have resembled it in its attention to the complexities and tensions that articulate a given work as a whole; but, in effect, they showed its unity to be contingent, relative, and superficial. The text is a meeting place for myriad relations that have no common objective form; real unity is either that of the underlying systems or an illusion, the lure held out by the surface of the work. The poetic gesture of imposing or inducing unity is just a jar in Tennessee (as Wallace Stevens might say), as poetry itself turns against that pretension. Yet the will to form may always have to express itself in art by breaking with accustomed modes of unity, and one sort of crit. will find its task in showing that, where a work is experienced as art, some manner of unity has been created and communicated. For further discussion of modes of unity and the postmodernist reaction thereto, see ORGANICISM.

■ H. Breitinger, Les Unités d'Aristote avant le Cid de Corneille (1895); H. B. Charlton, Castelvetro's Theory of Poetry (1913); Richards; J.W.H. Atkins, Literary Criticism in Antiquity, 2 v. (1934); M. Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934); Brooks; Crane; Abrams; Wellek; Wellek and Warren; G. F. Else, *Aristotle's Poetic*s (1957); Frye; Wimsatt and Brooks; G.M.A. Grube, The Greek and Roman Critics (1965); Aristotle's Poetics, trans. L. Golden, with commentary by O. B. Hardison Jr. (1968); D. W. Lucas, The Poetics (1968); Culler; G.J.H. van Gelder, Beyond the Line (1982)—Ar. poetry; de Man; L. Castelvetro, Castelvetro on the Art of Poetry, ed. and trans. A. Bongiorno (1984); M. F. Heath, Unity in Greek Poetics (1989). G. C. Carrington Jr., The Dramatic Unity of "Huckleberry Finn" (1976); S. Halliwell, Aristotle's Poetics (1986) and The Poetics of Aristotle, trans. and with commentary by S. Halliwell (1987); M. Davis, Aristotle's Poetics (1992); Aristotle's Poetics, ed. J. Baxter and J. P. Atherton, trans. G. Whalley (1997).

R. H. FOGLE; J. BARNOUW

UPAMĀ. Since similarity is the basis of many poetic figures, upamā is regarded in Sanskrit poetics as the most important kind of arthālaṃkāra or semantic poetic figure. When two different objects are compared on the basis of some resemblance, it is an instance of upamā. Usage of upamā involves four elements: (1) upameya (the object to be compared with something), (2) upamāna (the something with which it is compared), (3) the point of comparison, and (4) the word used to suggest the comparison. In the sentence "kamalaiba mukham sundaram" (The face is beautiful like a lotus), e.g., "mukham" (face) is the upameya, "kamalam" (lotus) is the upamāna, and "iba" (like) is the word suggesting comparison. Upamā can be broadly divided into two categories: purṇopamā, where all four elements are manifested, and luptopamā, where not all the elements appear. E.g., in the expression "mukhaminduryathā" (the moonlike face) we have the upameya (the face) and the upamāna (the moon). We have also the word iba (like), suggesting resemblance, but the point of resemblance (beauty) is not mentioned. It is lupta (lost/hidden/understood), so it is called luptopamā. Both purṇopamā, and luptopamā have many subdivisions depending on the different kinds of grammatical form used such as verbal root, compounds, and syntactic structures. Vāmana puts great emphasis on upamā and propounds that upamā or comparison lies at the root of all poetic figures, which is given the collective name of upamā-prapañca.

See SANSKRIT POETICS, SANSKRIT POETRY, SEMANTICS AND POETRY, SIMILE.

■ Daṇḍin, Kāvyādarśa (1924); Vāmana, Kāvyālaṃ kārasūtra (1928); Bharata, Nāṭyaśāstra (1950); P. V. Kane, Sāhityadarpaṇa: Paricchedas I, II, X Arthālaṃ kāra with Exhaustive Notes (1965); Rudraṇa, Kāvyālaṃ kāra (1965); Ruyyaka, Alaṃ-kārasarvaśva (1965); R. Mukherji, Literary Criticism in Ancient India (1966); Bhāmaha, Kāvyālaṃkāra (1970); Dhvanyāloka of Ānandavardhana, ed. K. Krishnamoorthy (1974); S. K. De, History of Sanskrit Poetics (1976); K. Kapoor, Literary Theory: Indian Conceptual Framework (1998); B. Pal, Alamkāra-Vicintā (2007).

M. K. RAY

URDU POETRY. Urdu, the mother tongue of more than 60 million people in India and Pakistan, is read or understood by many more millions across South Asia and around the world. In the past, most Urdu poets were better known by their takhallus, pen names either derived from the poet's actual name or words reflective of the poet's sense of himself. The practice is much less common now. (Below, takhallus are given within quotation marks at the end of a name.)

Urdu's earliest poetic texts appeared chiefly at two Muslim courts in South India, Bijapur and Golconda, where rulers of the Adil Shahi (1490–1685) and Qutub Shahi (1518–1687) dynasties patronized major poets and often practiced the art. Much of that sizable poetry—now linguistically remote—consists of ghazals* (lyrics) and substantially long masnawī (or masnavī* in Ar., narrative poetry). The latter are either historical accounts or indigenous and foreign love stories, enjoyable both as secular romances and tales of Sufi quests.

When in the second half of the 17th c. the Mughals destroyed the two courts, the center of *patronage for Urdu poetry moved northward, eventually to Delhi. A shift in literary taste also occurred. While the ghazal remained greatly popular, the masnawī seemingly lost appeal. Two other significant devels. took place at Delhi. First, poetry became an art that one learned by becoming the pupil (shāgird) of some master poet (ustād). The master explained the intricacies of poetics to the pupil, corrected his verse for grammar and idiom, and defended him if the pupils of another master criticized him at frequently held assemblies of poets called mushā'ira. Second, more poets began to compile books, called tazkira, containing very brief biographies of their peers and earlier poets, together with a selection of their verses, frequently interspersed with evaluative comments—commonly regarded as the first examples of lit. crit. in Urdu.

As the Mughals grew weaker in the 18th c., various invaders plundered Delhi, and the city's ability to provide patronage rapidly declined. By the 1780s, Delhi was steadily losing its best poets to such regional courts as Lucknow and Hyderabad. At Lucknow, Shi'a rulers and nobility provided particular patronage to the poets who excelled at writing religious elegies known as marsiya. Also at Lucknow, some poets popularized a kind of verse called rekhtī. Written exclusively by men, it used vocabulary, idioms, and themes that were intimately feminine. Originally merely entertaining, rekhtī is now invaluable for its unusual lexical richness.

After the Brit. took Delhi from the Marathas and the Fr. in 1803, peace and prosperity gradually returned to the city. Talented people stopped emigrating, and before long Delhi again had its share of notable poets. Meanwhile, Urdu poetry continued to flourish at Lucknow, Patna, Hyderabad, and other places, leading to much rivalry among poets on the basis of their affiliation to an ustād or a place. The introduction of lithography in the 1840s revolutionized book production in Urdu and made possible newspapers and literary jours. that enabled poets to gain readership far beyond local audiences.

After the failed rebellion of 1857, Brit. control over North India became absolute. Earlier, in 1837, the Brit. had replaced Persian with Urdu in official use, and now they gave the lang. further prominence by making it a part of school curricula. Through their tight control of public education, colonial authorities encouraged lit. that would, in their view, be "useful" and "moral." Their ideas found immediate favor with the emerging Muslim middle class and its reform-oriented leaders, who scorned traditional poetry for its elaborate *conceits, *hyperbole, and frank descriptions of love. Invoking the prestige of poetry in Urdu culture, the reformists called for a new poetry that could lift Muslim youth into worldly success. Two influential poet-critics, Muhammad Husain "Āzād" (1830–1910) and Altāf Husain "Hālī" (1837–1914), set out to create an Urdu poetry that was "simple" and "natural," thus also "moral" and "useful." They quickly found many followers. These ideas remained dominant until the 1920s, when a rehabilitation of Urdu's poetic heritage began, partly as a generational reaction but mostly inspired by a better understanding of Western, Persian, and Indian poetries. Though the Nationalist movement and Marxist Progressivism briefly reinforced the notion that poetry must serve some good cause, a more balanced literary view has prevailed since the 1950s.

Until the 1880s, Urdu poetics was fundamentally what Urdu poets had adopted from Persian and Ar. The primary unit of expression in that poetics was bait—two metrically identical lines, each line generally a syntactic whole. The bait was then used as the chief building block to construct poems in various genres. Even a *quatrain, e.g., used a binary logic. Previously, the most significant genres had been qaṣīda, masnawī, marsiya, and ghazal; in the 20th c., a fifth—nazm—became equally important.

A *qaṣīda is a poem of substantial length in high diction, consisting of *couplets, with the rhyme scheme aa ba ca da ea. In Urdu, it is usually a *panegyric, praising some religious figure or the poet's actual or prospective patron and seeking some spiritual or worldly gain. The opening section of a qaṣīda, called tashbīb, can itself be an *ode-like poem on any theme, in which the poet can display his prowess with words and thought. Some powerful *satires and literary polemics also exist in this form. The famous names in qaṣīda are Muhammad Nusrat "Nusratī" (d. 1674), Muhammad Rafi' "Saudā" (1713–80)—he is also Urdu's fiercest satirist—Insha'allah Khan "Inshā" (1756–1817), Shāh Nasīr "Nasīr" (d. 1838), Muhammad Ibrāhīm "Zauq" (1788–1854), and Asadullah Khan "Ghālib" (1797–1869).

In a masnawī, both lines of every couplet rhyme, but the rhyme itself changes from couplet to couplet. Its relative freedom makes masnawī the preferred genre for narratives that demand linear progression, such as romances, hists., ethical discourses, and topical or anecdotal verse. It flourished more in South India, where several poems of epic length were composed. While those poets mostly treated popular romances as narratives of mystical passion, the practice became rare at Delhi and disappeared completely at Lucknow. The best masnawī writers in Urdu were Nusratī, Asadullah "Wajahī" (d. 1659), and Sirājuddin "Sirāj" (1714–63) in the Deccan; Muhammad Taqī "Mīr" (1722–1810) at Delhi; and Mīr Hasan "Hasan" (1727–86), Dayāshankar "Nasīm" (1811–43), and Nawāb Mirzā "Shauq" (1773–1871) at Lucknow.

Marsiya literally means *"elegy," but in Urdu lit. hist. it chiefly refers to poems that honor the martyrdom of Imam Husain—a grandson of the Prophet Muhammad—and his companions in the battle of Karbala (680 CE). These elegies form an integral part of the ritual of public mourning during certain months for the Shi'a Muslims of South Asia. Initially, a marsiya could be written in any form. But in the early 19th c., both the writing of a marsiya and its public declamation—often accompanied with hand gestures and facial expressions—became profound arts at the hands of several masters, who exclusively used the six-line stanza form called musaddas (aaaabb). A marisya ultimately seeks to produce a cathartic effect in its listeners. It is never exclusively lachrymose; it makes an effort to exhilarate the devout by presenting, at various moments, descriptions of natural beauty, amusing details of familial relationships, and awe-inspiring battle scenes. Two outstanding practitioners of this genre at Lucknow were Babar Alī "Anīs" (1802–74) and Salāmat Alī "Dabīr" (1803–75), whose family members and pupils further enriched the trad. The religious elegies of Anīs and Dabīr elevated musaddas to such high esteem that several later poets chose the form for their own secular poems on social and political themes. Hālī's Madd-o-Jazr-i-Islām (The Tide and Ebb of Islam)—a poem of unique significance in the cultural hist. of South Asian Muslims—is a musaddas, as are "Shikwa" (Complaint) and "Jawāb-i-Shikwa" (Reply to the Complaint)—an exchange with God—by Muhammad Iqbāl "Iqbāl" (1877–1938).

Formally identical to the qaṣīda, the ghazal is shorter in length but more discursive thematically. Also, in almost every ghazal, each couplet demands that it be experienced as a discrete little poem in itself. That perhaps came about because Urdu poetry was more heard than read, and two lines were easier to hold in attention and savor than five or six. Even now, as in the past, Urdu speakers regularly experience poetry at gatherings called mushā'ira, where poets present their verses—predominantly ghazals—to large audiences over several hours. The audience, in turn, interacts with the poets, responding to each couplet as it is presented, praising or criticizing it. Further, ghazal couplets are quite casually quoted in common discourse in Urdu—from ordinary conversations to newspaper columns—and deemed to possess the same quality of truth or wisdom as a *proverb or an *epigram.

The ghazal, in essence, is poetry of relationships, be they cosmic, human, elemental, verbal, or graphic. Images in a ghazal couplet come bundled with other images, and *metaphors open into other metaphors—if the rose reminds the poet of his beloved and makes him think of himself as a nightingale, it also recalls for him the garden that bloomed in spring but was ravaged in autumn, and where a hunter lurked to catch the nightingale, or lightning crashed down from a gladdening rain cloud and destroyed the bird's meager nest. So it is also with the words: they link up with each other on the basis of phonetics, etymology, or calligraphic features; through conventional binary oppositions; or in some other manner. At its best, a traditional ghazal couplet lays down a "net of awareness," woven out of different strands, that grabs the reader's attention with tantalizing multiple readings. The list of great ghazal poets is long, but two names tower above everyone: Mīr and Ghālib—the first for a simplicity of diction that belies perceptive explorations of human emotions and the second for a deliberate intellectuality that is rich with *wit while profound in thought. Other major names are Sirāj, Saudā, Ghulām Hamdānī "Mushafī" (1750–1824), and Khwaja Haidar Alī "Ātish" (1778–1846) among the elders. Iqbāl and Wājid Ali "Yagāna" (1822–87) dominated the 20th c. in ghazal, followed by Shād Arifī (1900–64), Faiz Ahmed "Faiz" (1911–84), and Asrārul Hasan Khan "Majrūh" (1919–2000) in setting the trends for other poets. In the 1950s, there began a new phase in Urdu ghazal's hist. when poets such as Nāsir Kāzmī (1925–72), Munīr Niyāzī (1928–2006), Ahmed Mushtāq (b. 1929), Zafar Iqbāl (b. 1933), and Parvīn Shākir (1952–94) further pushed the possibilities in the form.

Nazm first meant "poetry" but in the late 19th c. also came to indicate "poem." From then through the 1930s, the word identified any poem that carried a title or had a single definable topic. Ever since *blank verse and *free verse took firm hold in Urdu in the 1930s, nazm has come to mean a poem that is constructed with lines, not couplets, and has an irrevocable linear progression that gives the poem completeness and is itself not bound to some traditional genre convention. Topical poems were always popular in Urdu. Walī Muhammad "Nazīr" of Agra (1735–1830) excelled at the nazm, and his poems on festivals and market scenes are still read with pleasure. But nazm gained much greater currency under the impetus of the sociopolitical movements mentioned above. Earlier poets had used various traditional forms; those who followed employed stanzaic poems of several kinds. Now blank and free verse are the preferred forms.

In popularity with Urdu poets, nazm is second only to the ghazal. Iqbāl's profound explorations of myriad issues—philosophical, political, and existential—were done in nazm. Shabbīr Hasan Khān "Josh" (1898–1982) wrote on nature and politics in this genre. Faiz and two of his contemporaries, Nūn Mīm Rāshid (1910–75) and Sanā'ullah Dār "Mīrājī" (1912–49), created separate distinct contours of thought and diction that still attract imitators. Other major poets of that generation were Asrārul Haq Majāz (1909–55), Majīd Amjad (1914–74), and Akhtarul Īmān (1915–96). Since the 1960s, many more distinct voices have established themselves, the most noteworthy being Wazīr Āghā (1922–2010), Shafīq Fātima Shi'rā (b. 1937), Muhammad Alvī (b. 1927), Munīr Niyāzī, Sāqī Fārūqī (b. 1936), Kishwar Nāhīd (b. 1940), Fahmīda Riyāz (b. 1946), Afzāl Ahmad Sayyad (b. 1946), and Azrā Abbās (b. 1950).

See ARABIC PROSODY; GHAZAL; INDIA, POETRY OF; PERSIAN POETRY.

■ Anthologies: The Golden Tradition, ed. and trans. A. Ali (1973)—premod. poetry; We Sinful Women, ed. and trans. R. Ahmad (1990)—feminist poets; An Evening of Caged Birds, ed. and trans. F. Pritchett and A. Farrukhi (1999)—postmodernist poets; An Anthology of Modern Urdu Poetry, ed. and trans. R. Habib (2003); The Oxford Anthology of Modern Urdu Literature, ed. M. A. Farooqi, 2 v. (2008); Pakistani Urdu Verse: An Anthology, ed. and trans. Y. Hameed (2010).

■ Criticism and History: R. Russell and K. Islam, Three Mughal Poets (1968); Studies in the Urdu Ghazal and Prose Fiction, ed. M. U. Memon (1979); M. Sadiq, A History of Urdu Literature (1984); R. Russell, The Pursuit of Urdu Literature (1992); A. J. Zaidi, A History of Urdu Literature (1993); F. Pritchett, Nets of Awareness (1994)—premod. poetry and its critics; C. M. Naim, Urdu Texts and Contexts (2004); S. R. Faruqi, The Flower-Lit Road (2005)—premod. and mod. poetics; S. A. Hyder, Reliving Karbala (2006)—the marsiya; A. H. Mir and R. Mir, Anthems of Resistance (2006)—Marxist "progressive" poetry.

C. M. NAIM

URUGUAY, POETRY OF. There is no documentary evidence of an indigenous oral poetic trad. within the territory now called Uruguay, whose genesis is the product of imperialist disputes among the Sp., Port., and Brit. empires and among the centralist aspirations of Montevideo and Buenos Aires. Generally speaking, in the 18th and 19th cs., poets were either Hispanic or descendants of Sp. families settled in the River Plate region. Literary tendencies were, thus, mostly rooted in Hispanic foundations. Poetic production attests to the conflict between the city, as an image of cosmopolitanism but also of dependence, and the countryside as an image of freedom and telluric nationality. This conflict is evidenced in the works of Bartolomé Hidalgo (1788–1822) and Francisco Acuña de Figueroa (1791–1862), whose extensive oeuvre encompassed all poetic trends and tendencies manifest in Sp.-Am. cultural centers until the advent of *romanticism. The latter movement was considered as a national project by the *epic poem Tabaré (1886) by Juan Zorrilla de San Martín (1855–1931). In the 20th c., the dialectic between urban and rural life resurfaced in diverse quarrels among different poetic schools and found a synthesis in the works of Juan Cunha (1919–85) and Washington Benavídes (b. 1930).

The hist. of Uruguayan poetry in the 20th c. is often considered by starting with the works of Julio Herrera y Reissig (1875–1910) and Delmira Agustini (1886–1914), two poets who contributed in a fundamental way to the devel. of Latin Am. and Sp. *_modernismo_. Among the late flourishing of *avant-garde movements, the work of Alfredo Mario Ferreiro (1899–1959), a response to It. *futurism, is the most important. The poets who subverted and undermined that trad. include Álvaro Figueredo (1907–66), who developed a highly personal and critical use of received forms—esp. the *sonnet—that stood out against the more conventional formalist approach of the established Uruguayan poetic writing in the first half of the century. After 1945, the Generation of '45 or Critical Generation—as the critic Angel Rama named it—showed a new appraisal of everyday reality and the poet's social and political commitment to the problems of his or her times. One of the foremost figures of this period was the poet and translator Idea Vilariño (1929–2009), for decades a highly visible intellectual presence; the most complex counterfigure of the era was Juana de Ibarbourou (1895–1979), whose work is often strongly telluric and erotic.

The military dictatorship (1973–85) favored silence and exile for poets; therefore, poetry arose from the countercultural margins, whether it was overtly opposed to the values of the established culture (as was the group that formed around the publishing house Ediciones de Uno) or symbolically so, as expressed in the brief and intense work of Julio Inverso (1963–99). It also brought about a reapprochement among poets of the Southern Cone, such as the hermeneutic project of the Neobarroso, a southern reaction of the 1980s—partly mediated through Brazilian *_antropofagia_—to the Latin Am. Neobarroco or *neobaroque, the name first applied by critics of Caribbean origins. (Since barroso is a neologism, the term Neobarroso is untranslatable into Eng.) Exile as a poetic *trope also inspired new readings of the works of Uruguayan poets writing in Fr., such as Isidore Ducasse (1846–70; pub. as the Comte de Lautréamont) and Jules Supervielle (1884–1960). Among the poets who work in exile, Eduardo Milán (b. 1952) is worthy of mention, while among those who did so in insile, Marosa Di Giorgio (1932–2004) was one of the most original and influential. Two of the foremost names of the 20th c. are Melisa Machado (b. 1966) and Aldo Mazzucchelli (b. 1961).

At the beginning of the 21st c., Uruguayan poetic production is highly dispersed. Revisionist currents producing different readings of social and gendered poetic trads. and readings of *postmodernism coexist—more or less aligned with the poetic productions of Argentina and Chile. In addition, there is also strong evidence of attempts to revitalize traditional verse forms and hybridized versions of popular *song and refined poetry forged in performative spaces and *visual poetry, whose most important local exponents are Clemente Padín (b. 1939) and Jorge Caraballo (b. 1941).

See SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies and Primary Texts: Poesía uruguaya siglo XX, ed. W. Rela (1994); Antología Plural de la poesía uruguaya siglo XX, ed. W. Benavides, S. Lago, R. Courtoisie—20th-c. poetry (1996); Medusario, ed. R. Echavarren et al. (1996)—Neobarroso poems; Orientales, ed. A. Hamed (1996)—20th-c. poetry.

■ Criticism and History: A. Zum Felde, Proceso Intelectual del Uruguay y Crítica de su Literatura (1930); Á. Rama, 180 años de literatura: Enciclopedia uruguaya II (1968); C. Maggi, C. Martínez Moreno, C. Real de Azúa, Capítulo oriental: (1968–69); Nuevo Diccionario de Literatura Uruguaya, ed. A. Oreggioni and P. Rocca (2001).

F. TOMSICH

UT PICTURA POESIS. In Horace's Ars poetica, the phrase ut pictura poesis (as is painting, so is poetry) offers an analogy to painting to describe the effects of poetry. Some texts, Horace argues, reveal their value when scrutinized more closely than others; some please on one encounter, while others bear repeated examination. This comparison of painting and poetry has precedents, as in Simonides' formulation that "painting is mute poetry and poetry a speaking picture." Over time, however, Horace's dictum has moved from designating a comparison, to outlining a contest between the arts, and then to functioning prescriptively rather than descriptively, commanding that poetry and painting resemble each other. It has also faced questions about the validity of the initial analogy and participated in theories of representation that blur the boundaries between different categories of signs.

The relationship between painting and poetry underwent various early forms of examination, such as Dion of Prusa (Chrysostom)'s statement that a poem develops in time, unlike a painting. (The dichotomy of space and time would continue to inform discussions of ut pictura poesis throughout its hist.) During the Middle Ages, orthodox Christian culture asserted the text's superiority over the image, mistrusting the latter's potential falsity. At the same time, poetry continued to interact with visual art, as in Petrarch's reference to Homer as a painter. In the Ren., Leonardo da Vinci's paragone made the competition between the two arts explicit. Reasoning that sight is the most direct sense and that the sequentiality of writing divides up the experience of the beautiful, da Vinci argued for painting's superiority. The Ren. also explored *emblems as a means of approaching the goal of ut pictura poesis, offering poetry that functioned in visually "hieroglyphic" ways (Hagstrum—see HIEROGLYPH). Early mod. and *baroque painters seemed to use the terms of poetics to legitimize and ennoble their tasks, Nicolas Poussin being esp. renowned for his learning and his interartistic approach to theorizing painting. But, according to Lee, painters' work was often more deeply informed by earlier visual trads. G. E. Lessing's Laokoön (1766), an important critique of ut pictura poesis, disapproved of the use of painting as a metaphor for poetry. For Lessing, the more a poem tries to be visually descriptive, the more it shows how it cannot be—if short, it lacks sufficient detail; if long, it becomes too sequential. But rebuttals to Lessing followed, such as J. G. Herder's contention that poetry, not describing action, lacks sequentiality. During the romantic period, according to Steiner, the importance of the painting-poetry analogy waned, and discussions of these arts focused less than they had earlier on either's connections to empirical reality. In the mod. and postmod. periods, the work of art's self-conscious materiality encouraged reexamination of the interartistic comparison. Multimedia artistic objects have also complicated such comparisons. Even if, in these cases as well, one form ultimately dominates the other (Wimsatt), such art develops Friedrich Schlegel's and others' earlier interest in relations of accompaniment and simultaneity between the arts, rather than analogical comparison.

Throughout this hist., analogy and metaphor surface as important but problematic terms. Lessing's misgivings about critical attempts to literalize artistic metaphor through ut pictura poesis. These are revisited in contemp. critiques of the vagueness of metaphors comparing different arts. Analogical and metaphorical comparisons between the arts, Wellek and Warren note, cannot trace patterns of *influence and devel. At the same time, ut pictura poesis has consistently wielded power in discussions of poetics. For Krieger, metaphors of space and visuality "inevitably" inflect the critic's lang. for describing poetic *form. And while arguments of analogy and *metaphor impose certain limits on investigations of the interaction between painting and poetry, they also suggest a provocative challenge to transcend the analogy itself in the examination of the "sister arts."

Interartistic crit. and practice move beyond analogy in part by providing a forum to discuss representation and signs. Plato's writings on poetry and painting regarded representation itself as a tool of analysis; to Plato, painting's and poetry's capacity as representational arts also exposed their deceptiveness. Rather than critiquing *mimesis, Aristotle sought in each art the achievement of a form with its own unity (energeia) through, for instance, plot in drama or design in painting. Plutarch privileged the vividness of imitation (energeia*) available to painting and poetry, holding up painting as the art form with the closest relationship to reality. For Joshua Reynolds, a painting's representation of reality was a "sign," like the signs used in poetry; but in separate ways, each art should activate an encompassing imagination, rising above the specular faculty. Markiewicz asserts that, while Lessing emphasized the material differences between poetry's and painting's respective signs, he also saw the potential for arbitrary signs to become natural signs, particularly in drama. For Mitchell, the Blakean "art of both language and vision" addresses the contrast wherein the signs of writing signify through difference and absence, whereas the visual image does so through similitude and presence.

These visually oriented issues surrounding ut pictura poesis suggest further questions about the nature of the image and the imagination. E.g., how do we define the images that painting and poetry each produce? One approach to the image appears in Hagstrum's "literary pictorialism," the relationship between a poem's evocation of a visual *image and its overall structure. Richards, however, points out that different readers perceive the images in a literary work differently; thus, a poetic image cannot be evaluated for its pictorial potential. Ut pictura poesis potentially asserts the image-making quality of lit. (explored in Marxist studies), yet it also exposes questions about the possibility of mental images. Assessing the mental image requires a turn to the beholder, another topic preoccupying interartistic discourse. Horace's dictum has been called a species of reception theory by Gadoin, with Trimpi asserting that its terms reveal a mistrust of "excessive scrupulosity" as an analytical method. For some, e.g., Gombrich and Faust, the intersection of the arts demands attention to the role of the viewer's imagination in constructing visual or verbal objects. Ut pictura poesis involves a specifically visual imagination (as distinct from the romantic imagination) and a need to investigate and transcend its own analogy. In response, we might conceive of an interdisciplinary poetics: art speaking about poetic representation in its own visual terms (Davidson, Chaganti), rather than having its visual features converted through the verbal machinery of metaphor.

■ I. Babbitt, The New Laokoön (1910); I. A. Richards, Principles of Literary Criticism (1924); R. Wellek and A. Warren, "Literature and the Other Arts," Theory of Literature (1949); J. H. Hagstrum, The Sister Arts (1958); R. W. Lee, Ut Pictura Poesis (1967); H. D. Goldstein, "Ut Poesis Pictura: Reynolds on Imitation and Imagination," Eighteenth-Century Studies 1 (1968); M. Krieger, "Ekphrasis and the Still Movement of Poetry: or, Laokoön Revisited," Perspectives on Poetry, ed. J. L. Calderwood and H. E. Toliver (1968); E. Panofsky, Idea, trans. J. S. Peake (1968); W. K. Wimsatt, Day of the Leopards (1976)—esp. "Laokoön: An Oracle Reconsulted" and "In Search of Verbal Mimesis"; W. Trimpi, "Horace's 'Ut Pictura Poesis': The Argument for Stylistic Decorum," Traditio 34 (1978); J.-M. Croisille, Poésie et art figuré de Néron aux Flaviens (1982), and rev. in Journal of Roman Studies 73 (1983); R. A. Goodrich, "Plato on Poetry and Painting," BJA 22 (1982); W. Steiner, The Colors of Rhetoric (1982); M. Davidson, "Ekphrasis and the Postmodern Painter Poem," JAAC 42 (1983); D. E. Wellbery, Lessing's "Laocoön" (1984); N. Bryson, "Intertextuality and Visual Poetics," Style 22 (1988); H. Markiewicz, "Ut pictura poesis: A History of the Topos and the Problem," NLH 18 (1987); G. E. Lessing, Laocoön, trans. E. A. McCormick (1989); W.J.T. Mitchell, Picture Theory (1994); E. H. Gombrich, Art and Illusion, 3d ed. (2000); I. Gadoin, "Re-reading Lessing's Laocoön," Études Britannique Contemporaines 31 (2006); J. Faust, "Blurring the Boundaries: Ut pictura poesis and Marvell's Liminal Mower," SP 104 (2007); S. Chaganti, The Medieval Poetics of the Reliquary (2008).

S. Chaganti

UTPREKṢĀ. Utprekṣā, or poetical fancy, is a term in *Sanskrit poetics for imagining an object as almost identical with something else. The imagining, however, must be deliberate, not the effect of an illusion. The 17th-c. philosopher Viṣvanātha follows the Alaṃkārasarvasva of the 12th-c. poetic theorist Ruyyaka in the division of utprekṣā into vācyā (expressed) and pratīyamānā (implied). Vācyā, or the expressed utprekṣā, occurs when particles like iba, "like," are employed; and pratīyamānā, or the implied, occurs when such particles are not employed. Vācyā, then, is further subdivided into 56 varieties and pratīyamānā into 16.

Since both the terms upamā* (*simile) and utprekṣā are based on similarity, how can one distinguish an utprekṣā from an upamā? When the upamāna is taken from ordinary life, the poetic figure is upamā. The word iba then indicates the similarity. But when the upamāna is not taken from ordinary life but is a figment of the poet's fancy, then the figure is utprekṣā. The word iba then is used in the sense of "probably identical." When iba is employed in utprekṣā, the poet purposely represents one thing as almost identical with another. In upamā, on the other hand, the only object of using iba is to indicate the similarity between the two objects.

Therefore, the essence of utprekṣā is that the upameya must be represented as probably identical with the upamāna drawn not from ordinary life but from fancy and that this representation, being an alaṃkāra*, must be charming and based on implied resemblance.

See SANSKRIT POETICS, SANSKRIT POETRY.

■ Daṇḍin, Kāvyādarśa (1924); Vāmana, Kāvyālaṃkārasūtra (1928); Bharata, Nāṭyaśāstra (1950); P. V. Kane, Sāhityadarpaṇa: Paricchedas I, II, X Arthālaṃkāra with Exhaustive Notes (1965); Rudraṭa, Kāvyālaṃkāra (1965); Ruyyaka, Alaṃkārasarvaśva (1965); R. Mukherji, Literary Criticism in Ancient India (1966); Bhāmaha, Kāvyālaṃkāra (1970); Dhvanyāloka of Ānandavardhana, ed. K. Krishnamoorthy (1974); S. K. De, History of Sanskrit Poetics (1976); K. Kapoor, Literary Theory: Indian Conceptual Framework (1998); B. Pal, Alamkāra-Vicintā (2007).

M. K. RAY

V

VARIABLE FOOT. A term associated with W. C. Williams, who first used it to explain the triadic stanzas of his Paterson 2.3 (1948), later reprinted separately as "The Descent." Claiming that the concept of the foot had to be altered to suit a newly relativistic world, Williams insisted that the variable foot allowed both order and variability in so-called *free verse, which he claimed could never be truly free. The variable foot, he asserted, supplanted the fixed foot of traditional Eng. prosody in order to represent more accurately the speech rhythms of the mod. Am. idiom. Attempting to demonstrate his measurement of the variable foot, Williams explained that he counted "a single beat" for each line of his three-line stanzas so as to regulate the "musical pace" of his verse, though, in fact, his lines contain varying numbers of stresses and syllables. But, as his nine-poem sequence "Some Simple Measures in the American Idiom and the Variable Foot" (1959) shows, Williams did not always identify the variable foot with the triadic stanza form. Because his own explanations of the device often lack precision and consistency, subsequent critics have questioned the legitimacy of the concept of the variable foot, one remarking that the variable foot in verse is as impossible as a variable inch on a yardstick; an alternative approach to Williams's prosody lies in treating it as primarily visual (see VISUAL POETRY). E. A. Poe had used the term to describe the *caesura; for Poe, the caesura was "a perfect foot," the length of which would vary in accordance with the time it takes to pronounce other feet in the line. Williams read Poe's essays on prosody, which apparently influenced his conception of verse structure.

■ E. A. Poe, "The Rationale of Verse," Complete Works, ed. J. A. Harrison, vol. 14 (1902); W. C. Williams, Letter to R. Eberhart (May 23, 1954), Selected Letters, (1957); I Wanted to Write a Poem, ed. E. Heal (1958); "The American Idiom," Interviews with W. C. Williams, ed. L. Wagner (1976); H. M. Sayre, The Visual Text of W. C. Williams (1983); S. Cushman, W. C. Williams and the Meanings of Measure (1985); R. Gates, "Forging an American Poetry from Speech Rhythms: Williams after Whitman," PoT 8 (1987); E. Berry, "W. C. Williams' Triadic-Line Verse," Twentieth Century Literature (Autumn 1989); R. Bradford, The Look of It (1993); N. Gerber, "Getting the 'Squiggly Tunes Down' on the Page: Williams's Triadic-Line Verse and American Intonation," Rigor of Beauty, ed. I. Copestake (2004).

S. CUSHMAN

VARIATION is used in several senses in the study of poetry. In OE, the term refers to a technique of poetic composition by which the metrical pattern of half lines is deliberately not repeated from the first half line to the second. Variation seems to have been a deliberate attempt to avoid monotony in line construction. Metrical variation is often cited as an explanation for the fact that many actual lines of poetry do not entirely match the pattern of the *meter they are said to be written in. Variation is also integral to the basic structure of the classic *blues lyric, whereby the second line of a three-line stanza is a variation on the first, to be countered in the concluding line. More generally, variation is often held to be a desirable characteristic of structure that sustains readers' interest. Critics who see literary works as developing, exploring, or asserting themes (see THEMATICS) sometimes adapt the analogy of "theme and variation" from music, as in the construction of a symphony, where variation is recognized as one of only a few compositional strategies open to any composer. Auditors' and readers' recognition of a variation as in some respects different from but in others conforming to a prior theme is simply one form of pattern recognition, a fundamental cognitive process applicable across media.

■ C. P. Smith, Pattern and Variation in Poetry (1932); W. K. Wimsatt, "When Is Variation 'Elegant?'" The Verbal Icon (1954); K. Pomorska, Themes and Variations in Pasternak's "Poetics" (1975); C. S. Brown, "Theme and Variations as a Literary Form," Yearbook of Comparative and General Literature 27 (1978); S. L. Tarán, The Art of Variation in the Hellenistic Epigram (1979); F. C. Robinson, "Beowulf" and the Appositive Style (1985).

T.V.F. BROGAN; K. M. CAMPBELL

VATES. Two concepts of the *poet—as craftsman (maker) and as inspired seer or quasi-priest—are already established in early Gr. lit. In Pindar, they coexist, but Plato (notably in the Ion) exaggerates the notion of poetic "mania" (see FUROR POETICUS) to devalue the poet's claim to rational knowledge of truth. Lat. lit. adopted the Gr. term poeta in the sense of craftsman; accordingly, Ennius, followed by Lucretius, attacked the native vates, soothsayer and oracle-monger, as uncouth and ignorant. But under the influence of the Stoic philosopher Posidonius and of Varro Reatinus, the Augustans revived the term vates, suitable to their notion of the genuinely Roman poet voicing the moral reforms inspired by the new regime. This vatic ideal is esp. advanced in Horace's Ars poetica (391–407), where Orpheus is hailed as the original vates, though poets are also exhorted to tireless improvement of their lines by the "labor of the file." Virgil claimed to be a vates (Aeneid 7.41), but after his death in 19 BCE, enthusiasm for the vates waned even in Horace; and Ovid pokes open fun at his claims. But later poets like Manilius and Lucan are more respectful, and even in Tacitus's Dialogus, some memory of the Augustan status of the poet as seer persists. Eventually, in Longinus's treatise

On the Sublime, the concept of the inspired poet took on fresh and influential life. Although the term vates is culturally specific, parallels of the underlying concept are prevalent around the world.

See CLASSICAL POETICS, INSPIRATION, LATIN POETRY.

■ T. Carlyle, Heroes and Hero-Worship (1841), lecture 3; J. K. Newman, The Concept of Vates in Augustan Poetry (1967); C. O. Brink, Horace on Poetry, The "Ars Poetica" (1971).

J. K. NEWMAN

VEDIC POETRY. See INDIA, POETRY OF.

VENEZUELA, POETRY OF. Venezuela first acquired geopolitical status in 1777, when the Sp. colonial power issued a real cédula (royal decree) by which seven provinces were united in the Capitanía General (General Captaincy) of Venezuela. Its politically independent status, however, was reached in a series of steps: first, the Declaration of the Republic in 1811; then, the War of Independence, which ended in 1821; and, finally, the definitive secession from Gran Colombia in 1830. Venezuelan poetry is considered to begin in the early stages of the republic, from the 1820s on.

Nineteenth-c. poetry in Venezuela is conventionally organized by the same categories as Fr. lit.: neoclassicism (see NEOCLASSICAL POETICS), *romanticism, and Parnassianism. The founding figure of Venezuelan poetry is Andrés Bello (1781–1865), whose voluminous oeuvre spanned philological and literary studies, speeches, political essays, trans., and poetry. His best-known poems are the silvas "Alocución a la poesía" (Address to Poetry, 1823) and "A la agricultura de la zona tórrida" (Agriculture of the Torrid Zone, 1826). Both texts, neoclassical in style and intention, undertake a distinctly Americanist project: to create poetry inspired by the themes and the landscape of the New World. This neoclassical Americanism inspired the poetry of the humanist bellistas, incl. Fermín Toro (1806–65), Rafael María Baralt (1810–60), and Cecilio Acosta (1818–81).

Perhaps because he translated Victor Hugo's poetry, Bello's *diction demonstrated recognizable romantic influence, heralding a new generation of romantic Venezuelan poets: José Antonio Maitín (1804–74), Abigaíl Lozano (1821–66), José Ramón Yepes (1822–81), José Antonio Calcaño (1827–97), and Juan Antonio Pérez Bonalde (1846–92). Although Maitín and Lozano were no doubt consequential, the most prominent figure of the group is Pérez Bonalde, whose writing evokes a life besieged by loss and haunted by existential doubts. His two most significant poems are "Vuelta a la patria" (Return to the Homeland), included in his first book of poems, Estrofas (Stanzas, 1876), and "Poema del Niágara" (Poem on Niagara Falls), pub. in his second book of poems, Ritmos (Rhythms, 1880).

The poetas parnasianos were inspired by the precepts and rhet. of the Fr. Parnassian movement. The group included, among others, Jacinto Gutiérrez Coll (1845–1901), Miguel Sánchez Pesquera (1851–1920), Gabriel E. Muñoz (1863–1908), and Andrés Mata (1870–1931). They adopted without reserve the characteristic traits of Parnassian poetry: exotic and cl. subject matter along with highly crafted composition. Nowadays, however, they are considered rather marginal or transitional figures.

At the end of the century, Venezuelan literary historiography began to deviate from the Fr. model. The Sp.-Am. literary movement modernismo*, which evolved from Eur. *symbolism, had a small following in Venezuela; however, few of its adherents achieved international renown. Rufino Blanco Fombona (1874–1944), Alfredo Arvelo Larriva (1883–1934), José Tadeo Arreaza Calatrava (1882–1970), and Ismael Urdaneta (1885–1928), among others, influenced by the Nicaraguan modernista Rubén Darío, opened the spectrum of lyric subject matter and diction: the politics of contemp. Venezuela, eroticism, military life, mining, and the emergence of modernity appear in their poetry presented in a variety of forms.

In 1901, Francisco Lazo Martí (1869–1909) published his "Silva criolla" (Creole Silva), a poem that revived the regionalist trend inaugurated by Bello. This interest in regionalism, labeled criollismo (creolism) or nativismo (nativism), emphasized the themes and motifs of Venezuelan rural life and landscape.

Perhaps because of the ironclad dictatorship (1908–36) of Juan Vicente Gómez, the *avant-garde movement was almost unsubstantial in Venezuela, although Salustio González Rincones (1886–1933) is sometimes considered an early adherent. His "Carta de Salustio para su mamá que estaba en Nueva York" (Letter from Salustio to his Mother, Who Was in New York [1907]), which combines colloquialism, humor, and self-referentiality, has no precedent in Venezuelan poetry. José Antonio Ramos Sucre (1890–1930) and Antonio Arráiz (1903–62) are also counted as defining authors of Venezuelan avant-garde poetry. Arráiz's book Áspero (Rough, 1924), which explored native Venezuelan themes, is usually considered the point of inception of the avant-garde; Ramos Sucre, on the other hand, wrote *prose poems of an extreme verbal austerity and precision.

Twentieth-c. Venezuelan lit. is typically organized either in terms of generations or by the literary magazines that gave cohesion to groups of writers. Two generations emerged during Gómez's dictatorship: the Generation of 1918 and the Generation of 1928, although only the first one was distinctly artistic and literary. The Semana del estudiante (Week of the Student) of February 6–12, 1928, characterized by a series of student protests and political editorials, gave name to the second, but it is unclear what produced the first appellation. The Generación del 18 was made up by the poets Enrique Planchart (1894–1953), Fernando Paz Castillo (1893–1981), Andrés Eloy Blanco (1897–1955), Luis Enrique Mármol (1897–1926), and Jacinto Fombona Pachano (1901–51). Paz Castillo wrote highly reflective, metaphysical poetry; Planchart, Mármol, and Fombona Pachano explored sober forms of expression, interiorizing the landscape, while Blanco wrote poetry with a decidedly popular slant.

In 1936, a collective of writers founded the literary group Viernes (Friday), which would later become a literary magazine and press of the same name. This magazine responded to the new political aperture with a cosmopolitan agenda, publishing trans. and reviews of world lit. alongside texts by contemporaneous Venezuelan writers. The group included Luis Fernando Álvarez (1901–52), Vicente Gerbasi (1913–91), Otto de Sola (1908–75), José Ramón Heredia (1900–87), Ángel Miguel Queremel (1899–1939), Miguel Ramón Utrera (1909–93), and Pablo Rojas Guardia (1909–78). Álvarez adopted the prose poem and a kind of surrealist lang. to explore the inner anxiety of urban life. Gerbasi's work, on the other hand, exhibited a balanced mixture of *surrealism, metaphysics, magical transfiguration of landscape, and exuberant versification. His book-length poem Mi padre, el inmigrante (My Father, the Immigrant, 1945) is considered his masterpiece, along with his next book, Los espacios cálidos (Balmy Spaces, 1952).

Not all poets, however, can be categorized by generations or literary magazines. While the poets of Viernes were publishing their first books, three women poets published theirs independently: Enriqueta Arvelo Larriva (1886–1962), Luisa del Valle Silva (1902–62), and María Calcaño (1906–56). These three poets were the founders of a women's literary movement that would not consciously develop until the late 20th c. In their works, they explored motifs of immediacy, intimacy, and reflection, sometimes in a gender-defined, body-conscious erotic poetry.

In the 1940s, a heterogeneous group of poets reacted against the cosmopolitanism of Viernes and proposed a return to conservative aspects of the Sp. poetic trad. This reactionary movement is mostly identifiable in isolated figures rather than a single group. Ida Gramcko (1924–94), Luz Machado (1916–99), and Ana Enriqueta Terán (b. 1918) rigorously explored complex rhythmic and rhyme patterns in a thematically idiosyncratic poetry, while reinforcing the growing trad. of women's poetry in the country. Juan Liscano (1915–2001), a markedly productive and versatile poet who explored a variety of subjects (eroticism, metaphysics, Americanism, etc.), was to become as well a prolific essayist and one of the most dedicated critics and promoters of Venezuelan lit.

José Ramón Medina (1921–2010) was the most relevant figure of the literary magazine Contrapunto (Counterpoint, 1948–50). He was not only one of Venezuela's main poets but a devoted historian and anthologist of its lit. Among the founders of the literary magazine Cantaclaro (Chanticleer, one issue in 1950) were Rafael José Muñoz (1928–81), Jesús Sanoja Hernández (b. 1930), and Miguel García Mackle (b. 1927). Muñoz was the first avant-garde Venezuelan poet in the strict sense of the term, and his book El círculo de los tres soles (The Three-Sun Circle, 1968) displayed a gamut of invented langs., *nonsense, neologisms, and mathematical speculations.

A herald of the Generación de los 60 (Generation of the 1960s), Juan Sánchez Peláez (1922–2003) is considered the most revolutionary, complex, and stimulating Venezuelan poet of the 20th c. His poetry bore some thematic resemblance to previous poets (Ramos Sucre, Gerbasi) but distinguished itself by a revolutionary lang. that combined the grammatical transgressions of the avant-garde with a singular and tender intimacy, recognizable even in his first book Elena y los elementos (Elena and the Elements, 1952). The publication of his Animal de costumbre (The Usual Animal, 1958)—notably, in the same year as the downfall of dictator Marcos Pérez Jiménez—marked the beginning of a new era of poetic experimentation. The Generación de los 60 enjoyed the newfound creative liberty enabled by Sánchez Peláez. Arnaldo Acosta Bello (1927–96), Rafael Cadenas (b. 1930), Francisco Pérez Perdomo (b. 1930), Juan Calzadilla (b. 1931), Alfredo Silva Estrada (1933–2009), Guillermo Sucre (b. 1933), and Ramón Palomares (b. 1935) constituted the most remarkable series of poets in the hist. of Venezuelan poetry. Each of these writers created highly idiosyncratic forms of poetry; Palomares renewed and complicated the nativista trad. by infusing it with a new lang. simultaneously regional and surrealistic; Silva Estrada adopted a constructivist poetics (a unique case in Venezuelan poetry; see CONSTRUCTIVISM) marked by rigorous experiment with classic forms applied in the trad. of abstract poetry; Calzadilla explored short forms (*epigrams, aphorisms) to make a resolutely urban poetry; and Cadenas created a multifarious oeuvre—beginning with existential and hallucinatory situations à la Rimbaud, and (influenced by Ramos Sucre), he later wrote a concentrated, reflexive, almost aphoristic poetry with a philosophical slant.

The subsequent group of authors is sometimes classified with the Generación de los 60, although they are usually considered a transitional group because of their attempts to undermine the tenets of that generation. This group included Victor Valera Mora (1935–84), Caupolicán Ovalles (1936–2001), Ludovico Silva (1937–88), Miyó Vestrini (1938–91), Gustavo Pereira (b. 1940), Eugenio Montejo (1938–2008), Luis Alberto Crespo (b. 1941), José Barroeta (1942–2006), Reinaldo Pérez So (b. 1945), Julio Miranda (1945–98), Hanni Ossott (1946–2002), Márgara Russotto (b. 1946), William Osuna (b. 1948), Ramón Ordaz (b. 1949), and Alejandro Oliveros (b. 1949). Vestrini and Russotto reinforced the women's poetry movement with new forms of verbal exploration; Crespo and Barroeta revitalized the movement of regional poetry through their oneiric and even abstract perspective; Valera Mora and Ovalles, in the trad. of avant-garde poetry, combined lang. experimentation and political positioning; Ossott created an intensely personal and hermetic poetry in which abstract elements were supplemented with motifs from the philosophical trad.; Osuna inscribed himself in the trad. of urban poetry; Oliveros adopted an objectivist form of poetry (see OBJECTIVISM); and, finally, Montejo—along with Cadenas, the most internationally renowned Venezuelan poet—left behind a complex oeuvre, published under several *heteronyms. His verbal explorations ranged from quasi-vanguardist experimentation to playful engagement with cl. formality, sometimes with a whiff of irony. Under the name Montejo (also a pseud.) he wrote poetry in which remembrance and presence are woven through an artisanal attention to lang.

The last discernible cohort is the Generación de los 80. These poets were divided into two literary groups: Tráfico (Traffic) and Guaire, the name of the river that runs through Caracas. Both groups reacted bitterly against what they considered the deviations of previous poetry. Theirs was to be the poetry of reality—a poetry that would put an end to the outdated metaphysical, hermetic, escapist writing of the recent past, with Caracas (the "real" city) as its background. This generation included, among others, Armando Rojas Guardia (b. 1949), Igor Barreto (b. 1952), Yolanda Pantin (b. 1954), Miguel Márquez (b. 1955), Rafael Arráiz Lucca (b. 1959), Rafael Castillo Zapata (b. 1959), and Luis Pérez Oramas (b. 1960). After their early confrontational phase, most of these poets would go on to produce personal works that would become integrated into the poetic trad. they originally challenged.

The poets of the last decade of the 20th c. generally assembled in groups with no explicit creative agendas. However, a strongly growing trend is that of women's poetry, led by María Auxiliadora Álvarez (b. 1956), Laura Cracco (b. 1959), Martha Kornblith (1959–97), María Antonieta Flores (b. 1960), Patricia Guzmán (b. 1960), Claudia Sierich (b. 1963), Gabriela Kizer (b. 1964), Jacqueline Goldberg (b. 1966), Carmen Verde Arocha (b. 1967), and Eleonora Requena (b. 1968). Three poets—Arturo Gutiérrez (b. 1963), Luis Moreno Villamediana (b. 1966), and Luis Enrique Belmonte (b. 1971)—won international awards at the turn of the century and, along with Alexis Romero (b. 1966), already have a consolidated oeuvre. Each of these figures exhibits a heightened awareness of the trad. of Venezuelan poetry. They renew and rewrite it, combining a reflexive attention to the details of the surrounding world with the complex use of a number of verbal registers. The future, therefore, seems open to a widening spectrum of possibilities.

See INDIGENOUS AMERICAS, POETRY OF THE; SPAIN, POETRY OF; SPANISH AMERICA, POETRY OF.

■ Anthologies: Las cien mejores poesías líricas venezolanas, ed. P. P. Barnola (1935); Las mejores poesías venezolanas, ed. G. Sucre (1958); La nueva poesía venezolana, ed. J. R. Medina (1959); Antología venezolana. Verso, ed. J. R. Medina (1962); La antigua y la moderna literatura venezolana, ed. P. Díaz Seijas (1966); Antología general de la poesía venezolana, ed. J. A. Escalona-Escalona (1966); Poesía de Venezuela: Románticos y modernistas, ed. J. R. Medina (1966); Orígenes de la poesía colonial venezolana, ed. M. Páez Pumar (1979); Antología actual de la poesía venezolana, ed. J. A. Escalona-Escalona, 2 v. (1981); Antología dispersa de la poesía venezolana, ed. E. R. Pérez (1981); Poetas parnasianos de Venezuela, ed. P. A. Vásquez (1982); Contemporary Venezuelan Poetry, ed. J.Tello (1983); Antología de la moderna poesía venezolana, ed. O. D'Sola, 2 v., 2d ed. (1984); Antología de la poesía venezolana, ed. D. Palma (1987); Los poetas de 1942, ed. L. Pastori (1988); Poetas parnasianos y modernistas, ed. L. León, 2d ed. (1988); Antología comentada de la poesía venezolana, ed. A. Salas (1989); Cuarenta poetas se balancean, ed. J. Lasarte (1990); Poesía en el espejo, ed. J. Miranda (1995); Antología de la poesía venezolana, ed. R. Arráiz Lucca (1997); Veinte poetas venezolanos del siglo XX, ed. R. Arráiz Lucca (1998); Diez poetas venezolanos del siglo XIX, ed. R. Arráiz Lucca (2001); Antología histórica de la poesía venezolana del siglo XX (1907–1996), ed. J. Miranda (2001); Navegación de tres siglos (antología básica de la poesía venezolana 1826/2002), ed. J. Marta Sosa (2003); Antología. La poesía del siglo XX en Venezuela, ed. R. Arráiz Lucca (2005); Conversación con la intemperie, ed. G. Guerrero (2008); En-obra, ed. G. Saraceni (2008).

■ Criticism and History: P. Venegas Filardo, Estudios sobre poetas venezolanos (1941); E. Crema, Interpretaciones críticas de la literatura venezolana (1955); F. Paz Castillo, Reflexiones de atardecer, 3 v. (1964); P. Díaz Seijas, La antigua y la moderna literatura venezolana (1966); D. Miliani, Vísperas del modernismo en la poesía venezolana (1968); F. Paz Castillo, De la época modernista (1968); R. Agudo Freites, Pio Tamayo y la vanguardia (1969); P. P. Barnola, Estudios crítico-literarios (1971); U. Leo, Interpretaciones estilísticas (1972); G. Picón Febres, La literatura venezolana en el siglo XIX, 3d ed. (1972); V. Vargas, El devenir de la palabra poética (1980); J. Liscano, Panorama de la literatura venezolana actual, 2d ed. (1984); and Lectura de poetas y poesía (1985); N. Osorio, La formación de la vanguardia literaria en Venezuela (1985); M. Picón Salas, Formación y proceso de la literatura venezolana, 5th ed. (1984); G. Sucre, La máscara, la transparencia, rev. ed. (1985); E. Vera, Flor y canto: 25 años de poesía venezolana (1985); Diccionario general de la literatura venezolana, ed. L. Cardozo and J. Pintó, 2. v. (1987); P. Venegas Filardo, 53 nombres de poetas venezolanos (1990); J. R. Medina, Noventa años de literatura venezolana (1992); J. Miranda, Poesía, paisaje y política (1992); G. Zambrano, Los verbos plurales (1993); J. Miranda, "Generaciones, movimientos, grupos, tendencias, manifiestos y postulados de la poesía venezolana del siglo XX," Antología histórica de la poesía venezolana del siglo XX (1907–1996), ed. J. Miranda (2001); E. Nichols, Rediscovering the Language of the Tribe in Modern Venezuelan Poetry (2002); Jorge Romero, La sociedad de los poemas muertos (2002); R. Arráiz Lucca, El coro de las voces solitarias (2003); Nación y literatura, ed. L. Barrera, C. Pacheco, B. González (2006).

■ Electronic Resources: Poetas Venezolanos (in Sp.), http://poetasvenezolanos.blogspot.com; Veneopoetics (in Eng.), http://venepoetics.blogspot.com/; El Salmon, http://revistadepoesiaelsalmon.blogspot.com.

L. M. ISAVA

VENUS AND ADONIS STANZA. The most popular *sexain, consisting of a heroic quatrain and couplet rhyming ababcc in iambic pentameter. Its name derives from Shakespeare's verse epic Venus and Adonis, although it was used before Shakespeare by the Earl of Surrey, Philip Sidney, Edmund Spenser (January and December eclogues of the Shepheardes Calender), John Donne ("The Expiration"), and other Ren. poets for solemn lyrics as well as for shorter amatory and longer narrative poems: it is particularly common for *complaints and epyllia (see EPYLLION). Shakespeare used it again in Romeo and Juliet, Love's Labour's Lost, and other plays. Many 18-line poems of the 16th c. contain three Venus and Adonis stanzas; some of them (many of the 100 sonnet-related poems in Thomas Watson's Hekatompathia; Sidney's Old Arcadia 46, Certain Sonnets 19; Lodge's Scillaes Metamorphoses) seem to be larger structural imitations of the stanza form itself: two corresponding or analogous stanzas are followed by a third departing from the analogy and concluding the poem succinctly. This AA/B pattern is descended from the canzone* and canso. The Shakespearean sonnet clearly resembles such poems in that it ends with a couplet having the same closural function. The Venus and Adonis stanza has been one of the most popular and superbly handled forms in Eng. and Am. poetry up to our time (seven poems by William Wordsworth; John Wain, "Time Was"; Theodore Roethke, "Four for John Davies"; Thom Gunn, "Mirror for Poets"; Robert Lowell, "April Birthday at Sea").

E. HAÜBLEIN; T.V.F. BROGAN

VERISIMILITUDE. See MIMESIS.

VERS. (1) In Occitan, a term used by the early troubadours to designate any song, incl. the love song, later called canso or chanso. The term derives from med. Lat. versus. Distinctions between canso and vers were discussed by some troubadours ca. 1200, when it was becoming an outmoded term. During the 13th c., it was revived to denote songs on moral, political, or satirical subjects (see SIRVENTES) rather than amatory ones. The vers is apt to have short and uncomplicated stanzas. (2) In mod. Fr., the principal term for both the discrete line of verse and verse taken generically, as a form or mode of expression.

■ Jeanroy, v. 2; J. Chailley, "Les Premiers Troubadours et le versus de l'école d'Aquitaine," Romania 76 (1955); J. H. Marshall, "Le Vers au XIIe siècle: Genre poétique?" Revue de langue et littérature d'Oc 12–13 (1965); Chambers; E. Köhler, "'Vers' und Kanzone," GRLMA 2.1.3 (1987); and "Zum Verhaltnis von vers und canso bei den Trobadors," Etudes de philologie romane et d'histoire litteraire offerts a Jules Horrent, ed. J. M. D'Heur et al. (1980).

F. M. CHAMBERS; J. H. MARSHALL; C. SCOTT

VERSE AND PROSE

I. Definitions and Background
II. History of Verse and Prose
III. Collaborations between Verse and Prose
IV. Transformations by Paraphrase or Translation
V. Free Verse and Prose Poetry
VI. Conclusions

I. Definitions and Background. The term verse derives from the Lat. versus, which originally denotes "a turning" of a plough at the end of a furrow or the furrow itself. By analogy, the word means "a row" or "a line of writing," esp. a line a poet composes in making a poem. Etymologically, versus may recall the *boustrophedon or "turning-ox" style of writing we find in some Etruscan and early Roman inscriptions, in which the lines travel, like an ox drawing a plough back and forth on a field, alternately from right to left and left to right. The Gr. equivalent of versus is metron, "meter" or "measure," which conveys the same suggestions of length and regularity.

The ancients lack a specific noun for prose, a circumstance to which we will return below. Their nearest equivalents, the Gr. logos and the Lat. oratio, carry a wide range of denotations, incl. "word," "language," "speech," "story," "conversation," "oration," "discourse," "argument," "opinion," and "account." To indicate "prose," particularly in terms of its literary practice, Roman writers often attach an adjective to oratio. The most common of the resulting phrases is oratio soluta, "speech loosened [from meter]," but we also encounter (e.g., Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 1.5.18) prosa oratio, "straightforward speech." Versus is related to vertere, "to turn," and prosus to provertere, "to turn forward"; and this morphological connection between versus and prosus and their sharply contrastive characters—the first word signifying recurrence to a previously established course or pattern, the second indicating continuous movement in one direction—could explain why, in late antiquity and the Middle Ages, prosa oratio, in the ultimately contracted form of prosa, establishes itself as our noun.

In addition to its primary meaning, the term verse serves, esp. in the U.K., as a synonym for "stanza." Verses also refer to those numbered divisions of the chapters of the Bible that became standard after the scholar and printer Robert Estienne introduced them into his ed. of the Gr. NT of 1551. Of the secondary meanings of prose, the most notable may be that which applies to the texts of the melismas, or "sequences," of the med. mass. Since the melismas required performers to chant complicated musical phrases to a single syllable, young singers esp. had difficulty remembering them. To make the melodies easier to recall, writers started, in the 9th c., to set words to them. Because these texts were initially in prose, they took that name, though prosae were gradually elaborated and, by the 11th c., were composed in rhymed accentual verse.

Writers and readers commonly regard verse and prose as distinct from or even opposite to one another. Verse involves *measure—it organizes speech into units of a specific length and rhythmical character—whereas prose flows more freely at the discretion of the writer or speaker employing it. Verse is, as the OED puts it, "metrical composition, form, or structure; language or literary work written or spoken in metre; poetry, esp. with reference to metrical form. Opposed to prose." Prose is, in contrast, "the ordinary form of written or spoken language, without metrical structure: esp. as a species or division of literature. Opposed to poetry, verse, rime, or metre."

In one respect, we exhaust the subject by noting the difference between verse with its rhythmical organization and prose with its rhythmical freedom; yet in other respects, many factors complicate the relationship of the two media and blur the boundary between them. Throughout lit. hist., verse writers and prose writers share stylistic concerns and rhetorical strategies, and their methods of composition overlap in fascinating ways. Further, the relative status of verse and of prose shifts over time. Whereas from antiquity through the Ren., verse is preeminently the vehicle for imaginative lit., thereafter prose genres like the novel enjoy increasing prominence. Moreover, the expressive theories of lit. that arise during the romantic period call into question the efficacy of artifice, and many writers come to believe that verse, with its regulated rhythm, is unduly mechanical and that prose, with its freer rhythms, possesses greater organic authenticity. Such convictions contribute, in the 20th c., to the devel. and widespread adoption of *free verse, many of whose modes blend into verse elements of composition formerly associated with prose. And despite what dicts. say, some might argue that the opposition between the media has ceased to obtain and that, as W. C. Williams urges in a letter in 1948 to Horace Gregory, "there's an identity between prose and verse, not an antithesis."

II. History of Verse and Prose. As a literary medium, verse develops earlier than prose. Archaeological evidence indicates that music, dance, and *song played critical roles in the lives of our prehistoric ancestors. Our earliest surviving poetic texts, which date from 19th and 18th c. BCE and which appear on clay tablets from Sumer and papyri in Egypt, already employ such devices as syllabic and grammatical *parallelism, *antithesis, and *refrains. By the middle of the first millennium BCE, poets have worked out sophisticated prosodies and have produced verse of the highest order in, to cite three notable instances, China, India, and Greece. Ancient peoples also practice prose, using it to document commercial transactions, to record legal statutes and religious customs, and, as in the Heb. Bible and in Herodotus's Histories, to chronicle legends and events that have shaped their world. Yet most of the central early texts—e.g., the Epic of Gilgamesh, The Tale of Sinuhe, the Vedic poems, the Iliad and Odyssey, and the Shih Ching—are in verse. And this pattern repeats in later communities. Verse writers such as Abolqasem Ferdowsi, Dante and Chaucer are the first to explore and demonstrate the literary resources of their langs.

The mnemonic appeal of verse is the chief reason for its primacy. Because verse is rhythmically organized, we remember it more readily than prose. For much of our hist., literacy is rare and book production laborious, and the survival of texts depends to a great extent on oral transmission. People naturally favor verse as a means of articulating and preserving those stories and experiences that most deeply express their humanity. By the same token, insofar as people share an instinct for rhythm, verse suits public ritual and ceremony, as the folk songs and hymns of many cultures testify. The repetitive harmonies of verse give the body in general, and the ear in particular, a purchase on meaning and significance. So, too, when a lang. is young or in a state of transition, metrical constraints help writers focus its grammar and explore its idioms and vocabulary, with the result that poets and their verse forms exercise a permanent influence on subsequent linguistic evolution. Mod. Eng., for example, would not have developed quite in the way it has, nor would we speak and think in quite the ways we do, if the iambic pentameter and William Shakespeare had never existed.

When literary prose does arise, its writers often begin by imitating verse, as can be seen in the Eur. trad. When in the 5th c. BCE, Gorgias establishes oratory as an independent art, his effort involves nothing less than importing into prose devices suggestive of verse, incl., according to Diodorus Siculus (Library of History 12.53.2-5), *isocolon (clauses of similar length), parison (balanced clauses) and *homoeoteuleton (flectional rhyme). More specifically, Gorgias's revolutionary periodic style (lexis periodos) aims to make, as Demetrius remarks (On Style 12), "the periods succeed one another with no less regularity than the hexameters in the poetry of Homer" (trans. Loeb Library ed.). Similarly, when Gorgias's student Isocrates starts systematically to cultivate prose rhythm, his motive is to attract to prose the attention people devote to verse. As Cicero later reports (Orator 174), "When [Isocrates] observed that people listened to orators with solemn attention, but to poets with pleasure, he is said to have sought for rhythms to use in prose as well" (trans. Loeb Library ed.). From this follows the preoccupation with *prose rhythm that we encounter among writers on rhet. from Aristotle forward (see RHETORIC AND POETRY). Indeed, this preoccupation is one reason that Roman prose writers, in speaking of their medium, characterize it not simply as oratio but by an adjective like solutus, prosus, numerosus ("rhythmical, melodius"), or compositus ("orderly, well-knit") to suggest its degree of rhythmical arrangement.

In the Middle Ages, the rhythmical basis of Eur. speech changes. The perception of syllabic length declines, and its place is supplied, both in Lat. and the emerging vernaculars, by syllabic accent. Yet the practice of prose rhythm persists, even to the extent that as the use of rhyme increases in med. Lat. verse, so it also increases in med. Lat. prose. (Trads. of rhymed prose also appear in Chinese lit. of the Han period and in cl. Ar. lit.) More to the point, verse remains the primary art, as is illustrated by Dante's De vulgari eloquentia, the earliest sustained study of poetics directed toward a mod. Eur. lang. In the first paragraph of the second book of this treatise, Dante proposes to demonstrate that It. is as "equally fit for use [for literature] in prose (prosaice) and in verse (metrice)" and then explains why he will treat verse first: "Because prose writers rather get this language from poets, and because poetry seems to remain a pattern to prose writers, and not the converse, which things appear to confer a certain supremacy, let us first disentangle this language as to its use in meter (metricum)" (trans. A.G.F. Howell, Medieval Literary Criticism, 1974). Further, just as most of the great imaginative writers of cl. times employ verse, it is the main instrument of expression for such med. and Ren. authors as Dante, Petrarch, François Villon, Ludovico Ariosto, Shakespeare, Lope de Vega, and Jean Racine.

During the Ren., however, the relation between verse and prose begins to alter. One factor in this process is Johannes Gutenburg's devel. in the 1450s of the printing press. This facilitates the production and distribution of books and makes memory less essential to textual preservation and transmission. Another factor is the entrance of Aristotle's long-lost Poetics into wide circulation in the 16th c. In the wake of this event, the study of poetry focuses increasingly on the nature and theory of the art per se and draws away from its historical associations with rhet. In the rhetorical trad., verse is the essence of poetry, in that verse is what distinguishes poetry from that other art of persuasive speech, oratory. Aristotle himself reflects this view when, in his Rhetoric (3.8.3), he identifies prose oratory with *rhythm and poetry with *meter: "Prose (logon) must be rhythmical (rhythmon), but not metrical (metron), otherwise it will be a poem (poiēma)" (trans. Loeb Library ed.). However, in his Poetics, which considers poetry in comparison not to oratory but to all forms of discourse, Aristotle rejects this identification, arguing instead (Poetics 1447b9–12; 1451b1–12) that a poem is first and foremost an imitation (mimesis) of human action embodied in a story or plot (mythos). Aristotle acknowledges that people customarily identify poets with their meter (metron) and treat both Homer and Empedocles as epic poets because they both write in dactylic hexameter; but he insists that only Homer imitates and deserves the name of poet (poiētēs), whereas Empedocles should be termed a physics writer (physiologos). And this mimesis-centered (or substance-not-style-centered) analysis of poetry gives rise to the view, which will strengthen over time, that verse embellishes rather than defines poetry and that poetry can be written just as well without verse as with it. As Philip Sidney puts it in his Defence of Poesy (1595), "Poesie therefore is an art of imitation, for so Aristotle termeth it in his word Mimesis . . . verse being but an ornament and no cause to Poetry, sith there have been many most excellent Poets that never versified [Sidney alludes here to ancient authors of prose romances like Xenophon and Heliodorus], and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of Poets."

No less significant is the rise of the mod. physical sciences. These give the mod. world an intellectual triumph comparable to that achieved by the ancients in the arts; and insofar as science is associated with prose—with, as Thomas Sprat puts in his History of the Royal Society (1667), "a close, naked, natural way of speaking, positive expressions, clear senses, a native easiness, bringing all things as near the Mathematical plainness as they can"—prose comes to be seen as more reliable and accurate than verse, which is increasingly connected with *fancy, sentiment, and caprice.

In addition, in the 18th and 19th cs., the prose novel rises to challenge and dislodge verse as the principal vehicle for imaginative writing. The very novelty of the novel attracts gifted authors like Gustave Flaubert, who writes to Louise Colet in 1852, "Prose was born yesterday. . . . Verse is the form par excellence of ancient lits. All possible prosodic variations have been discovered; but that is far from being the case with prose." So fresh and impressive are the achievements of 19th-c. novelists like Jane Austen, Stendhal, Honoré de Balzac, Ivan Turgenev, Flaubert, Leo Tolstoy, George Eliot, and Henry James that, early in the 20th c., we find Ford Madox Ford repeatedly instructing younger authors like Ezra Pound that, as Ford puts it in Thus to Revisit, "Verse must be at least as well written as prose if it is to be poetry." Though Ford's position makes perfect sense in light of the literary conditions of his day, his dictum also reflects that prose has taken over verse's traditional status as the leading form for imaginative lit.

Finally, *romanticism, with its emphasis on spontaneity and naturalness, undermines the traditional idea that prosodic rules assist the poet and sets in its place the belief that the structures of verse hinder self-expression. More specifically, meter becomes associated with mechanical sterility and freer rhythm with organic richness. Martin Tupper terms his Proverbial Philosophy (first series, 1837), an early popular work in what we might now call free verse, "Rhythmics"; and in his long scriptural line, and in Walt Whitman's subsequent transformation of it, we see beginnings of what George Saintsbury calls, writing of Tupper in The Cambridge Companion to English Literature, "the revolt of rhythm against metre." Moreover, many late 19th- and early 20th c. poets come to identify metrical composition itself with the dated idioms and stale subjects of Victorian poetry and, as a result, believe that to get rid of those idioms and subjects, they also need to dismantle the structures of verse. And the second and third decades of the 20th c. witness an explosion of poetic styles that forgo traditional metrical arrangement. If by the end of the 18th c., the prose novel has supplanted the verse epic—and if by the end of the 19th, drama has gone over to prose—by the end of the 20th, the *lyric has largely abandoned verse as historically understood. Whereas an ancient critic like Quintilian worries (9.4.53–57) that students of oratory may, in their concern for rhythm, turn prose into quasi-verse, mod. readers sometimes worry that poets are too little attentive to rhythmical arrangement and that the ascendance of prose has reduced verse to, in Edmund Wilson's famous phrase, "a dying technique."

III. Collaborations between Verse and Prose. Though often distinguished from one another, verse and prose collaborate in several literary genres. Chief among these is the *prosimetrum, an extended work of prose into which, at more or less regular intervals, the author inserts poems or passages of verse. First coined to designate those mixed-mode Eur. med. works, of which Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy and Dante's Vita nuova are the masterpieces, the term has since been expanded to include texts that, from other times and cultures, also feature prose with verse inserts. Within this enlarged category fall such ancient works as the Upanishads and Petronius's Satyricon; such med. works as the popular texts from the T'ang dynasty in China that dramatize and illustrate Buddhist teachings (pien-wen), Sadi's Rosegarden from Persia, and the Fr. folk tale Aucassin et Nicollette (which its anonymous author calls a chantefable, a "song-story"); and such Ren. and mod. works as François Rabelais's Gargantua and Pantagruel, the Arcadias of Jacopo Sannazaro and Sidney, the *haibun (prose-and-haiku style) writings of Bashō, H. D. Thoreau's Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, Lewis Carroll's "Alice" books, Jean Toomer's Cane, and Vladimir Nabokov's The Gift.

It is difficult to generalize about prosimetra since they run the gamut from the somber moralizing treatises of Boethius and Sadi to the racy Menippean satires of Petronius and Rabelais to the contemplative travelogues of Bashō and Thoreau. Also, while in some instances (e.g., Sadi and Dante) the poetic inserts are entirely by the author of the overarching prose text, in others (e.g., Bashō and Thoreau) authors introduce not only their own verse but also verse by friends or by poets of the past. Nevertheless, one pattern recurs throughout the genre: the prose passages tend to be devoted to narrative or argument, whereas the verse is reserved for moments of lyric intensity or summary reflection. This practice appears to confirm the widely held belief that prose is best suited to discursive modes and moods, whereas verse is better adapted to concentrated expressions of thought and feeling. Further, because prosimetra appear in so many times and places and in such a variety of literary trads., it seems reasonable to infer that the genre expresses an almost universal curiosity, among people who relish lang., about the different tonal qualities of verse and prose and about the ways these qualities can be brought into effective contrast or balance.

Other works that mix verse and prose include certain Elizabethan and Jacobean dramas, in which the different media signal the social or political status of the dramatis personae. In his "Renaissance in England," J. V. Cunningham observes, "In A Midsummer Night's Dream . . . the heads of state speak a dignified blank verse, the wellborn lovers blank verse and couplets; the rude mechanicals speak rudely in prose; and the extra-human characters have their class distinction: they may use lyric measures." The mixed mode also occurs when a prose commentary is attached to a poem. Since this process usually involves two writers working separately—a poet composing the poem first and a scholar composing the commentary afterward—the result is, as a rule, not truly or uniformly prosimetric. However, in Nabokov's Pale Fire, a single author creates both the verse text and prose commentary and does so in such a way that the two run parallel to each other and tell intertwining stories. An analogous situation transpires when a writer plays the dual role of poet and scholiast, as S. T. Coleridge does in his The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, writing both the verses of his poem and the marginal prose glosses on it. A version of the mixed mode also arises, in an oral context, when poets, in public presentations of their work, pass back and forth between reading poems and supplying anecdotal background about their genesis or meaning.

IV. Transformations by Paraphrase or Translation. If prosimetric forms demonstrate that verse and prose can collaborate, paraphrase and trans. suggest that the border between the two media is open and permits free passage between them.

In mod. parlance, paraphrase means restating, at length and for purposes of clarity, a piece of writing that presents some difficulty of interpretation; but from antiquity through the Ren., paraphrasis entails the more challenging exercise of turning verse passages and texts into prose and turning prose passages and texts into verse. Paraphrase is part of the curricula of the Roman schools of rhet., as it is in schools in the Middle Ages; and it contributes to literary practice in a number of ways.

Paraphrase in this sense has two basic forms. One involves a writer's taking a source work from another writer and turning it into verse if the source is in prose or prose if it is in verse. The second involves writers' creating their own prototypes in verse or prose and then rewriting them in the other medium. An instance of the first type of paraphrase occurs when Socrates, awaiting execution in prison and wishing to make poetry (poiesanta poiemata) before he dies, versifies (enteinas) some of Aesop's prose fables (Aisopou logous). Anticipating the theme that Aristotle will develop in the Poetics, Socrates explains that he believes that writing poetry entails not only versification but composing stories (poiein mythous); and because he is not a maker of stories (mythologikos), he avails himself of Aesop's (Phaedo 60D–61B). Another example of this type of paraphrase is provided by Chaucer's "Clerk's Tale": this presents, in elegant ME *rhyme royal verse, the tale of Patient Griselda, closely tracking in the process Petrarch's Lat. prose version of the story (which, in turn, is an adaptation of the final novella of Giovanni Boccaccio's It. prose Decameron). Shakespeare not only adopts plots from prose sources but on occasion metrifies passages from them. A case in point is Enobarbus's description (Antony and Cleopatra 2.2.198ff.) of the sensational appearance Cleopatra makes on her barge when she arrives in Cicilia and first meets Antony: Shakespeare skillfully cuts, pastes, and compresses, into iambic pentameter, much of Thomas North's trans. of Plutarch's account of the scene. Many poems of the Christian church are verse paraphrases of biblical prose. This trad. extends from the late-ancient paraphrases into Lat. hexameters of various OT and NT texts down to hymn collections like the Scottish church's Translations and Paraphrases in Verse of Several Passages of Sacred Scripture (1781). Well-known instances in Am. lit. of verse-to-prose paraphrases appear in Nathaniel Hawthorne's Wonder Book, some of the stories of which retell, in prose for young readers, verse tales from antiquity, such as Ovid's account of Midas and the golden touch.

Of those paraphrasers who work from their own prototypes, Virgil is the best known. Having learned to paraphrase during his studies of law and rhet., he writes the Aeneid in prose before turning it into meter (Donatus, Life of Virgil, 23). (He uses the prose version chiefly to keep in mind the epic's general structure while pursuing his unusual compositional technique of working, as the mood strikes him, on bk. 3 one day, bk. 7 the next, bk. 2 the day after that, and so on.) Ironically, the Aeneid becomes upon publication an instant classic, and generations of students are set the exercise of paraphrasing it back into prose; Augustine informs us (Confessions 1.17.27) that he won a prize at school for turning into prose (solutis verbis) those verses (versibus) in bk. 1 in which Juno rages about her inability to exterminate the small band of Aeneus-led Trojans who escaped the sack of their city.

Other paraphrasers working from their own prototypes include Bede, who writes his Life of Cuthbert in verse in 716 and then produces an expanded prose version five years later, and Ben Jonson, who tells William Drummond (Conversations, 15) that "he wrote all his [verses] first in prose, for so his master Camden [i.e., William Camden, the great scholar and antiquarian who was Jonson's teacher at Westminster School] had learned him." It is also interesting that E. A. Robinson's "Captain Craig," a poem about a down-and-out philosopher manqué, derives from an earlier prose sketch of its subject, while John Updike first creates and examines, in a poem titled "Ex-Basketball Player," a figure who in time will morph, after a brief stop as a character in the short story "Ace in the Hole," into the protagonist of his Rabbit novels.

As different as these examples are, they all suggest that verse and prose can be related interchangeably and that subjects and ideas expressed in one medium can sometimes be usefully transferred to the other. Not for nothing do Cleanth Brooks and the New Critics condemn paraphrase as "heresy." Form and content are always, in fine writing, vitally connected and mutually supportive; but effective paraphrase would seem to dispute the New Critical doctrine that they are inseparable (see NEW CRITICISM).

Like paraphrase, trans. sometimes has the effect of placing verse and prose in interchangeable relation rather than setting them in opposition to one another. This is esp. true of trans., in the Ren. and after, in which a poetic text from cl. Gr. or Lat. appears on one page while the facing page features a trans. version in a vernacular lang. (or sometimes in Lat. if the original is Gr.). Often, the trans. versions are in prose, with the result that the parallel texts and media seem equivalent.

An important and related case involves trans. that do not feature the original text but lay out on the page a literal line-by-line trans. of it, with line numbers given in the margin so that the reader can refer back and forth between it and a copy of the original text with an ease that would not be possible were the trans. written out as prose. Corresponding literally and linearly to the original poem but lacking its meter, such trans. produce an impression of free verse several centuries before its time; and in fact Pound begins his largely free-verse epic The Cantos, by rendering into Eng. a passage from just such a trans., Andreas Divus's 1538 Lat. trot of the Odyssey. As the poet and trans. Robert Wells once observed in conversation, Divus's stripped-down, lineated Lat. prose version of Homer appears to anticipate Pound's technique—evident in his earlier poems and trans., but esp. striking in The Cantos—of breaking up traditional verse rhythm and cutting away poetic ornament to drive directly at his subjects. (Pound, in his essay "Translations of Greek: Early Translators of Homer," praises Divus's Lat. for its "constant suggestions of the poetic motion.")

During the second half of the 20th c., trans. at times not only blurs the boundary between verse and prose but obscures the role verse has played in lit. hist. Fewer and fewer translators have the inclination or training to render earlier foreign-lang. poetry into native meter, and free trans. of metrical poems of the past become very common. Unlike earlier nonmetered trans., which usually present themselves simply as aids to study (or as prose), these later trans. often make claims to independent poetic merit. In many respects, these claims are justified. However, collectively such trans. leave some readers—esp. those who experience foreign lang. and lit. mainly or only through trans.—with a version of lit. hist. in which authors like Homer, Virgil, Horace, and Dante cease to write conventional verse and appear instead as practitioners of the looser rhythmical styles of mod. poetry. Such trans. tend, that is, to diminish the sense that verse is a medium with a long trad. distinguishable from other media and trads.

V. Free Verse and Prose Poetry. In addition to prosimetric forms—and in addition to paraphrastic or trans. works that transpose verse to prose or prose to verse—certain types of composition blend or fuse the two media.

Free verse is probably the preeminent form in this category. Because so many kinds of free verse exist, it is impossible to summarize it neatly. But many of its varieties occupy the area that lies, as Ford notes in his defense of *vers libre in Thus to Revisit, "between the entrenched lines of Prosaists and Versificators . . . the territory of Neither-Prose-Nor-Verse." In certain esp. impressive free-verse poems, such as Wallace Stevens's gravely cadenced "The Snow Man" and Williams's haunting "Widow's Lament in Springtime," one feels that the poet is exploring rhythms beyond the register of traditional meter, while at the same time retaining—mainly by means of repetitions of phrases and syntactical patterns—a feeling of the structural concentration of verse. In less sensitively organized forms, such as we find in the poetry of Edgar Lee Masters and Carl Sandburg, vers libre appears closer to prose than to verse, though it retains a connection to the latter, thanks to the mod. typographer's configuring its lines on the page in ways that visually suggest metrical or stanzaic arrangement.

If certain sorts of free verse achieve their effects by moving verse in the direction of prose, the mod. *prose poem accomplishes something comparable by moving prose in the direction of verse. The idea of prose poetry is ancient. The Elder Seneca describes (Controversiae 2.2.8) Ovid's student exercises in declamation as solutum carmen, which means "loose song" or "loose poem" but which also echoes the common phrase for prose, oratio soluta. (Seneca suggests that Ovid's speeches were, in their stylistic panache, poetry made of prose; and Ovid himself relates, in Tristia, 4.10.23–26, that even when, as a young man, he tried to write prose, it came out as verse.) Lucian, too, speaks (How to Write History 8) of "prosaic poetry" (peze poietike) when he discusses hist. and notes that it has a story-telling affinity to poetry without, however, employing the meters, fictions, and figurative ornaments that poets use. Yet the mod. prose poem, as it emerges in France in the 19th c., has a more specific character and aim than anything the ancients discuss. The mod. prose poem attempts to bring into prose the memorable rhythm and sensitivity of verse. This objective is well articulated by Charles Baudelaire when he writes in the preface to his own Little Poems in Prose, "Who among us has not, in his ambitious moments, dreamed of the miracle of a poetic prose, musical without rhythm and without rhyme, sufficiently subtle and sufficiently abrupt, to adapt to the lyrical movements of the soul, to the waves of reverie, to the tremblings of consciousness?"

Related mod. efforts to create a poetic prose include Amy Lowell's experiments with "polyphonic prose" and some of Gertrude Stein's work. (Wyndham Lewis, in Time and Western Man, characterizes Stein's Three Lives with a phrase—"prose-song"—very like that which the Elder Seneca applies to Ovid's declamations.) James Joyce also sometimes cultivates a species of prose poetry, as when he begins the Sirens episode in Ulysses with a burst of disjointed phrases rich in rhyme and alliteration.

Free verse and prose poetry remind us that, though verse and prose may be distinct, a continuous spectrum of rhythm connects the two. Just as we can slide around a color wheel from red to green by way of shades of orange and yellow and then back to red via shades of blue and violet, so we can pass by degrees from the loosest prose through increasingly organized speech to metrical arrangement and back again to prose. This continuity of rhythm is perhaps most strongly borne home to us when we hear speakers or writers of prose ascend unconsciously, because of strong feeling or pressing circumstances, into highly rhythmical utterance. George Bernard Shaw captures this phenomenon in that early scene in Pygmalion when Higgins demands to know why Doolittle has called on him but so bullies the dustman that he cannot get a word of explanation in edgewise until he forcibly asserts, "I'm willing to tell you. I'm wanting to tell you. I'm waiting to tell you." Another instance is supplied by Charles Dickens, who often drifts into blank verse when stirred by thoughts about death or love. Below, for instance, lineated as unrhymed iambic pentameter, is the final paragraph of David Copperfield, in which the hero, alone at his writing table late at night, apostrophizes his second wife and speaks of the inspiration she has given him to compose the book he has just finished. The third line breaks awkwardly in the middle of a word—indeed, the enjambment it produces suggests a parody of John Milton's use of that device—but the iambic tread of the passage is unmistakable. (If the passage were an actual poem, we would call its final syllable "a feminine ending.")

> O Agnes, O my soul, so may thy face > be by me when I close my life indeed;
> so may I, when realities are melt> ing from me, like the shadows which I now > dismiss, still find thee near me, pointing upward!

VI. Conclusions. Because verse plays such a diminished role, vis-à-vis prose, in imaginative lit. in recent centuries, we might well concur with Wilson's assessment that it is a dying technique. Since human communities most notably embrace verse in their earlier stages and turn increasingly to prose as their technologies and institutions grow more complex, perhaps it is only natural that verse should have declined and perhaps it is inevitable that it will die. In "The Nature of Verse and Its Consequences for the Mixed Form," Kristin Hanson and Paul Kiparsky, discussing the manner in which prose narrative has replaced verse narrative in Eur. lit., comment generally, "Once the shift has taken place [in a tradition of writing], verse is never restored to the function of narrative within that trad., and may even be eventually eclipsed in all its functions by prose."

Nevertheless, even in a technological age, memory remains crucial to our species. It preserves us from the brutal and brutalizing conception of existence as an irreversible succession of moments with no depth beneath them and no dimension beyond them. Verse is an art of memory. More than any other literary form, we can take it into mind and heart. Lines of verse can return to us unbidden in times of grief to illuminate and make them bearable; and it is often with verse that we celebrate the joys of friendship and love and mark the occasion of a marriage or a birth. It is not just the ear or eye that pauses and turns back at the end of the line. The psyche, too, turns back, recovering and renewing a measure of being larger than itself and, at the same time, moving forward into its own mysterious future.

Finally, though the world seems always and confusingly in flux, human evolution occurs slowly, and we mod. peoples differ little, in our genetic and biochemical constitution, from our ancestors who, in Sumer, Egypt, China, Greece, and India, first started composing verse. Just as they responded to lang. and to its rhythms, symmetries, and surprises, so do we. For this reason alone, verse will likely endure in our culture, alongside of prose and among all the other media of imaginative lit. that serve and honor poetry.

See CHANTE-FABLE, RHYME-PROSE, SCANSION, VERSIFICATION.

■ Historical Works: G. Saintsbury, A History of English Prose Rhythm (1912); F. M. Ford, Thus to Revisit (1921); P. F. Baum, The Other Harmony of Prose (1952);

Abrams; Auerbach; Curtius; G. F. Else, Aristotle's "Poetics" (1957); I. Watt, The Rise of the Novel (1957); J. Greenway, Literature among the Primitives (1964); H. N. Schneidau, "Imagism as Discipline: Hueffer and the Prose Tradition," Ezra Pound (1969); H. Kenner, The Pound Era (1971); J. V. Cunningham, The Collected Essays of J. V. Cunningham (1976); West; Norden; W. Trimpi, Muses of One Mind (1983); M. Roberts, Biblical Epic and Rhetorical Paraphrase in Late Antiquity (1985); P. O. Kristeller, "The Modern System of the Arts" and "Afterword, 'Creativity' and 'Tradition,'" Renaissance Thought and the Arts, exp. ed. (1990); T. Steele, Missing Measures (1990); M. Kinzie, The Cure of Poetry in an Age of Prose (1993); A. Finch, The Ghost of Meter (1993); P. Dronke, Verse with Prose from Petronius to Dante (1994); G. A. Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric (1994); H. Bloom, Shakespeare (1999); M. E. Fassler, "Sequence," The Harvard Dictionary of Music, 4th ed. (2003); R. B. Shaw, Blank Verse (2007).

■ Criticism: A. Quiller-Couch, "On the Difference between Verse and Prose," On the Art of Writing (1916); A. E. Housman, The Name and Nature of Poetry (1933); E. Wilson, "Is Verse a Dying Technique?" The Triple Thinkers (1938); Brooks; Y. Winters, "The Influence of Meter on Poetic Convention," In Defense of Reason (1947); E. Pound, Literary Essays of Ezra Pound, ed. T. S. Eliot (1954); The Selected Letters of William Carlos Williams, ed. J. C. Thirlwall (1957); P. Valéry, "Concerning Adonis," The Art of Poetry, trans. J. Mathews (1958); W. C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961); T. S. Eliot, "Reflections on Vers Libre," To Criticize the Critic (1965); C. Baudelaire, Oeuvres Complètes, ed. C. Pichois (1975); I. A. Richards, Verse versus Prose (1978); C. O. Hartman, Free Verse (1980); The Letters of Gustave Flaubert: 1830–1857, trans. F. Steegmuller (1980); S. Cushman, William Carlos Williams and the Meanings of Measure (1985); Hollander; P. Levi, "Rhyming on the Counterattack," The Mirror Maker, trans. R. Rosenthal (1990); K. Hanson and P. Kiparsky, "The Nature of Verse and Its Consequences for the Mixed Form," Prosimetrum, ed. J. Harris and K. Reichl (1997); D. Davis, "All My Soul Is There: Verse Translation and the Rhetoric of English Poetry," Yale Review 90 (2002); A. Bradley, Book of Rhymes (2008).

T. Steele

VERSE DRAMA. See dramatic poetry.

VERSE EPISTLE (Gr. epistole, Lat. epistula). A poem addressed to a friend, lover, or patron, written in familiar style and in *hexameters (cl.) or their mod. equivalents. Two types of verse epistles exist: the one on moral and philosophical subjects, which stems from Horace's Epistles, and the other on romantic and sentimental subjects, which stems from Ovid's Heroides. Though the verse epistle may be found as early as 146 bce (L. Mummius Achaicus's letters from Corinth and some of the satires of Lucullus), Horace perfected the form, employing common *diction, personal details, and a *plain style to lend familiarity to his philosophical subjects. His letters to the Lucius Calpurnius Piso and his sons (ca. 10 bce) on the art of poetry, known since Quintilian as the Ars poetica, became a standard genre of the Middle Ages and after. Ovid used the same style for his Tristia and Ex Ponto but developed the sentimental epistle in his Heroides, which are fictional letters from the legendary women of antiquity—e.g., Helen, Medea, Dido—to their lovers. Throughout the Middle Ages, the latter seems to have been the more popular type, for it had an influence on the poets of *courtly love and subsequently inspired Samuel Daniel to introduce the form into Eng., e.g., his "Letter from Octavia to Marcus Antonius." Such also was the source for John Donne's large body of memorable verse epistles ("Sir, more than Kisses, letters mingle souls") and Alexander Pope's "Eloisa to Abelard."

But it was the Horatian epistle that had the greater effect on Ren. and mod. poetry. Petrarch, the first humanist to know Horace, wrote his influential Epistulae metricae in Lat. Subsequently, Ludovico Ariosto's Satires in terza rima* employed the form in vernacular It. In all these epistles, Christian sentiment made itself felt. In Spain, Garcilaso de la Vega's "Epístola a Boscán" (1543) in *blank verse and the "Epístola moral a Fabio" in terza rima introduced and perfected the form. Fr. writers esp. cultivated it for its "graceful precision and dignified familiarity"; Nicolas Boileau's 12 epistles in couplets (1668–95) are considered the finest examples. Ben Jonson began the Eng. use of the Horatian form (The Forest, 1616) and was followed by others, e.g. Henry Vaughan, John Dryden, and William Congreve. But the finest examples in Eng. are Pope's Moral Essays and the "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot" in *heroic couplets. The romantics did not value the verse epistle, though P. B. Shelley, John Keats, and W. S. Landor on occasion wrote them. Examples in the 20th c. incl. W. H. Auden's New Year Letter and Auden and Louis MacNeice's Letters from Iceland.

■ H. Peter, Der Brief in der römische Litteratur (1901); J. Vianey, Les Epéitres de Marot (1935); W. Grenzmann, "Briefgedicht," Reallexikon II; J. A. Levine, "The Status of the Verse Epistle before Pope," SP 59 (1962); W. Trimpi, Ben Jonson's Poems (1962); J. Norton-Smith, "Chaucer's Epistolary Style," Essays on Style and Language, ed. R. Fowler (1966); John Donne: The Satires, Epigrams and Verse Letters, ed. W. Milgate (1967); N. C. de Nagy, Michael Drayton's "England's Heroical Epistles" (1968); R. S. Matteson, "English Verse Epistles, 1660–1758," DAI 28 (1968); D. J. Palmer, "The Verse Epistle," Metaphysical Poetry, ed. M. Bradbury and D. Palmer (1970); M. Motsch, Die poetische Epistel (1974); A. B. Cameron, "Donne's Deliberative Verse Epistles," English Literary Renaissance 6 (1976); M. R. Sperberg-McQueen, "Martin Opitz and the Tradition of the Renaissance Poetic Epistle," Daphnis 11 (1982); J. E. Brown, "The Verse Epistles of A. S. Pushkin," DAI 45 (1984); C. Guillén, "Notes toward the Study of the Renaissance Letter," Renaissance Genres, ed. B. K. Lewalski (1986); M. Camargo, The Middle English

Verse Love Epistle (1991); W. C. Dowling, The Epistolary Moment (1991)—on the 18th c.; D. Aers, "'Darke Texts Need Notes': Versions of Self in Donne's Verse Epistles," Critical Essays on John Donne, ed. A. Marotti (1994); B. Overton, "Aphra Behn and the Verse Epistle," Women's Writing 16 (2009).

R. A. Hornsby; T.V.F. Brogan

VERSE NOVEL. See NARRATIVE POETRY.

VERSE PARAGRAPH. If a paragraph is defined as one or more sentences unified by a dominant mood or thought, then poetry, like prose, can be seen as moving forward in units that could be called paragraphs. Typically, the term verse paragraph is used to designate a group of lines that lacks regular stanzaic form and contains a nonstandardized number of lines and that is separated from the other verse paragraphs of a poem through indentation or blank space. Rhymed verse paragraphs do occur (e.g., the irregular canzoni of John Milton's "Lycidas" or the indented sections of varying numbers of couplets within the subdivisions of Alexander Pope's Essay on Man), but the term is used most frequently in relation to *blank verse. Lacking the somewhat arbitrary organization provided by an established *rhyme scheme, blank verse must provide units supporting the organization of idea such that the narration, description, or exposition unfolds in a series of stages felt as justly proportioned. In this sense, the verse paragraph is a syntactic period, frequently a single complex or periodic sentence, deployed in enjambed *stichic verse so that the beginnings and ends of the syntactic frames conspicuously do not coincide with those of the metrical frames (the lines), with the result that meter and syntax are in counterpoint or tension.

The verse paragraph is a common feature of Old Germanic heroic poetry and is an important element in Eng. poetry as early as Beowulf, where sentences often begin at the *caesura. But by general consent, the greatest master of the verse paragraph is Milton, who, in writing Paradise Lost, needed "to devise a formal unit not regularly rhymed, not necessarily brief, sufficiently coherent but sufficiently flexible, intermediate between the line and the book" (Weismiller 189). Many of the most characteristic effects of Paradise Lost—its majesty, its epic sweep, its rich counterpoint of line and sentence rhythms—are produced or enhanced by Milton's verse paragraphs. Certain shorter poems in Eng., such as William Wordsworth's "Tintern Abbey," also make use of the verse paragraph. In addition, many *free-verse poems, such as Walt Whitman's "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking," which operate without a rhyme scheme or other regular structural organization, can be described as being composed of verse paragraphs.

■ G. Hübner, Die stilistische Spannung in Milton's Paradise Lost (1913); R. D. Havens, The Influence of Milton on English Poetry (1922); J. Whaler, Counterpoint and Symbol (1956); E. Weismiller, "Blank Verse," A Milton Encyclopedia, ed. W. B. Hunter Jr., et al. (1978); W. H. Beale, "Rhetoric in the OE Verse Paragraph," NM 80 (1979); J. Hollander, "'Sense Variously Drawn Out'" in Hollander; J. K. Hale, Milton's Languages (1997).

A. Preminger; E. R. Weismiller; T.V.F. Brogan; P. Kline

VERSE SYSTEMS. See METER.

VERSET. This term is derived from the short "verses" of the Bible (cf. versicle) and etymologically refers to short lines (Occitan and OF); in Eng., it has been so used, esp. to refer to the lines of Heb. and biblical verse trans. However, in Fr., it refers to lines longer than standard meters in the later 19th-c. symbolist prosodies of poets such as Paul Claudel. In this sense, it denotes a Blakean or Whitmanesque line of variable but most often long length, neither rhymed nor metrical but organized by rhythmic and phrasal cadences. The influence of Walt Whitman on late 19th- and early 20th-c. Fr. verse ensured that the Fr. verset was rhythmically oriented more toward verse than prose, however multiform its realizations. Traditionally, three kinds of verset have been distinguished. In the verset métrique, such as Paul Fort's Ballades françaises (1898–1958), metrical forms remain perceptible, dividing the verset into smaller units. In the lyrical verset cadencé, such as Claudel's Cinq grandes odes (1910), the verset becomes a hybrid; "line" and "paragraph" are indistinguishable, except that the verset is clearly a rhythmic whole. The movement between degrees of rhythmicity allows an ascension from rhapsodic involvement with the world's primary elements, from a cataloguing "connaissance" to a less differentiated realm of omniscient "conscience." In the verset amorphe of Blaise Cendrars, fragmented syntax and disrupted discursivity result from the juxtaposition of short and long units of sense. Even where, as in Charles Péguy's verse (Les Mystères, 1910–13), the verset emerges from prose, lineation provides those variations in accentual prominence, length of *measure, and markedness of juncture that bespeak the modalities of inspiration and response: prose is transcended by the poised and expanded consciousness of verse. In Saint-John Perse's work (Anabase, 1924), the verset confronts the reader with challenging decisions about segmentation and association: the verset is a journey punctuated by a variety of rhythmic thresholds and boundaries. If accounts of the structure of the verset veer between ones that find in it a larger agglomeration of recognizably traditional rhythmic and metrical units and ones that locate its rhythm in the movements of enunciation in a periodicity founded on acoustic echoing and syntactic patterning, it is perhaps because the form is inclusive enough to tolerate their coexistence.

See VERSE AND PROSE.

■ P. Fort, Préface, Le Roman de Louis XI (1898); P. Claudel, "Réflexions et propositions sur le vers français," Positions et propositions, 2 v. (1928); L. Spitzer, "Zu Charles Péguys Stil," Stilstudien, 2 v. (1928); Y. Bozon-Scalzitti, "Le Verset claudélien," Archives des Lettres Modernes (1965): P. van Rutten, Le Langage poétique de

St.-John Perse (1975); F. Moreau, Six études de métrique (1987); C. Scott, Vers libre (1990).

T.V.F. Brogan; C. Scott; D. Evans

VERSIFICATION. Versification refers to the making of verse or verse craft. Derived from the Lat. versificatio, a form combining versus (turning a plow at the ends of successive furrows, which, by analogy, suggest lines of writing; see boustrophedon) and facio (make), versification for a long time meant making lines. With the advent of mod. *free verse, esp. of *composition by open field, the original sense of versification as making lines according to some *measure, or *meter (Gr. metron, OE mete) has expanded to include all aspects of making poetry, from the smallest aspects of *sound to *stanzas to whole-poem forms and genres.

Versification is still sometimes defined and used as synonymous with *prosody (Gr. prosodia, the song accompaniment to words, pitch variation as spoken; Lat*., prosodia*, the marking of accent on a syllable). Prosody has referred to the sound patterns of lang. since the early Ren. and with verse practice since the mid-Ren. (OED). With the Ren., experiments with Romance models spurred close attention to rules for making lines and stanzas. By the late Ren., when poetry followed the taste for strict versions of metrical conformity, prosodie referred to both the practice of marking accents and to the rules for duration in pronunciation (OED). The marking of accents in making meters was a primary and necessary part of making verse, so the two terms served equally in discussing verse and became conflated. To the present, the two terms are sometimes interchangeable. W. K. Wimsatt (in 1972), e.g., was still using versification to mean the craft of making metrical poetry, even while John Hollander (in 1981) was distinguishing verse, as metered lines, from a mod. sense of poetry, as requiring the making of new metaphors.

With energetic Ren. experiments in adapting duration-based cl., It., and Fr. forms to the pitch-based prosody of Eng. (see classical meters in modern languages), versification was often a matter both of counting syllables and, in some cases, of determining their lengths as either "short" or "long"; thus, a versifier was largely occupied with prosodic considerations. Med. and Ren. grammars regarded prosody as pronunciation and often placed verse within the province of prosody. Because verse was an oral as well as a written art, pronunciation was a central concern.

With the expansion of styles and forms over the past century, individual poets and critics may use versification to refer to various aspects of poetry, incl. rhetorical structure (see rhetoric and poetry), point of view, *figuration, *diction, *syntax, fixed forms (such as the *sonnet), and the use of a particular lyric *genre or mode (such as *ode, *elegy, dramatic monologue), as well as sound patterning (e.g., *rhythm, *meter, *assonance, *consonance, *rhyme), visual patterning (see visual poetry), or the blending of the auditory and the visual, as in the case of *line or stanza integrity. The historical emergence of free verse, along with the expanded construing of poetry to signify many kinds of linguistic poesis, has largely rendered versification outmoded as a term in its original sense.

Contributing to the declining value and significance of the term versification are the ongoing reconsiderations of some of the basic terms associated with the craft of verse. The traditional metered line came under attack during *modernism, when a wave of experimentation with verse broke the consistency of meters, loosened them, or attempted to define and use new measures. Unlike Ren. innovations, modernism exploited the prosodic potentials in the lang. medium; the importation of foreign-lang. forms accounted for but a small portion of new line and verse forms (e.g., from OE and ME, Japanese, and Chinese). The line as it had been conceived until 1910 was exploded, freeing it to be redefined as metrical, nonmetrical, visual, or newly defined, as in W. C. Williams's poetry. The breakdown of the traditional meters, with the *prose poem and *concrete poetry being the extreme forms, spurred a reactive need to redefine the line and assert its priority as the most distinguishing marker of poetry. Accordingly, James Longenbach and others have argued for discarding the term line breaks for the more accurate fulfillment, since a line is not "broken"; it simply ends before another begins. The value placed on line integrity requires that a line be "fulfilled," i.e., that it have reason for being a piece of meaning, affect, and sound, as opposed to a randomly sliced bit of chopped prose. Similarly, a stanza (It. for "room") needs to be organized as a room of its own at the same time that it contributes to the whole. For Hollander and others, a verbal work must achieve the figurative level of metaphor to be a poem. These aspects of poetry point more clearly to the qualitative ends of verse craft: principles, assumptions, rules, guidelines, etc., exist for the writing of good poetry. When poetry was largely synonymous with verse and verse meant metered lines, versification pertained mostly to descriptions of craft. Now that boundaries between verse and prose have become less distinct and poetry, for many, serves as a general term for artful lang., discussions of versification have necessarily become more prescriptive, as they advance particular views of what poetry is or should be.

■ Wimsatt; P. Fussell, Poetic Meter and Poetic Form, rev. ed. (1979); J. Hollander, Figure of Echo (1981), and Rhyme's Reason: A Guide to English Verse (1981); Attridge, Rhythms; The Line in Postmodern Poetry, ed. R. J. Frank and H. M. Sayre (1988); G. T. Wright, Shakespeare's Metrical Art (1988); J. McCorkle, ed., Conversant Essays, Contemporary Poets on Poetry (1990); T. Steele, Missing Measures: Modern Poetry and the Revolt against Meter (1990); S. Cushman, Fictions of Form in American Poetry (1993); Gasparov, History; H. Gross, Sound and Form in Modern Poetry, 2d ed. (1996); Finch and Varnes; R. Abbott, "T. S. Eliot's Ghostly Footfalls: The Versification of 'Four Quartets," Cambridge Quarterly 4 (2005): 365–85; Radiant Lyre: Essays on Lyric Poetry, ed. D. Baker and

A. Townsend (2007); J. Longenbach, The Art of the Poetic Line (2008).

R. Winslow

VERSI SCIOLTI (It., versi sciolti da rima, "verses freed from rhyme"). In *Italian prosody, verses (generally *hendecasyllables, i.e., endecasillabi sciolti) not bound together by *rhyme or grouped in regular *strophes. Versi sciolti appear late in the 13th c. in the anonymous satire the Mare amoroso but were first cultivated during the Ren. as the It. equivalent of the cl. *epic meter, the *hexameter. Giangiorgio Trissino used them in his tragedy Sophonisba (1524; cf. his treatise La poetica, 1529) and in his epic L'Italia liberata dai Goti (begun 1528, pub. 1547), as did Torquato Tasso in his Le Sette giornate del mondo creato sophonisba (1594). They quickly became the preferred meter for It. trans. of cl. epics (e.g., Annibale Caro's Eneide, 1581). Despite Trissino's lack of success, however, a controversy arose between the advocates of cl. austerity and the advocates of rhyme. In the 16th c., rhyme won the day, but in the 18th c. and thereafter, versi sciolti were used with great success, particularly by Giuseppe Parini (Il Giorno, 1763–1801), Ugo Foscolo (I Sepolcri, 1807), Giacomo Leopardi (some of I Canti, 1831), and Alessandro Manzoni (Urania, 1807). Vittorio Alfieri almost singlehandedly made them the standard meter for *tragedy. In the 20th c., the dramatist Sem Benelli used them, as did Giovanni Pascoli in his Poemi Conviviali (1904) and, to a lesser extent, Guido Gozzano, Umberto Saba, Giuseppe Ungaretti, and Franco Fortini. Endecasillabi sciolti are equivalent to *blank verse and were an important influence on the devel. of that form in Eng.

■ J. M. Steadman, "Verse Without Rime: Sixteenth-Century Defenses of Versi Sciolti," Italica 41 (1964); Wimsatt; F. Caliri, Tecnica e poesia (1974); L. Castelnuovo, La metrica italiana (1979); Elwert, Italienische, sect. 72, 57, 119; O. B. Hardison Jr., Prosody and Purpose in the English Renaissance (1989); A. Menichetti, Metrica italiana: Fondamenti metrici, prosodia, rima (1993); S. Orlando, Manuale di metrica italiana (1994).

L. H. Gordon; C. Kleinhenz

VERS LIBÉRÉ. Not to be confused with either vers libre*, i.e., 19th-c. Fr. free verse proper, or with the vers libres classiques of the 17th and 18th cs., i.e., regular lines irregularly disposed, vers libéré is Fr. verse "liberated" from many of the traditional rules concerning *meter, *caesura, and end-stopping but still observing the principles of isosyllabism and regularly patterned rhyme. The beginnings of this process are to be found among the romantic poets, who employed enjambment and the trimètre with less inhibition than their forebears. However, as Cornulier and others have argued, while this was presented and interpreted as a liberation, the underlying 6 + 6 metrical pattern of the cl. *alexandrine was not forgotten, and vers libéré drew powerful expressive effect from the tensions between meter and *syntax at the caesura and line end. As Paul Verlaine observed, Charles Baudelaire was the first to place an unaccentuable word before the caesura, as in "Les Petites Vieilles": "Pour entendre un de ces // concerts riches de cuivre, Exaspéré comme un // ivrogne qui voit double." Arthur Rimbaud, Verlaine, Stéphane Mallarmé, and Jules Laforgue took this to extremes, often placing a word over the caesura, e.g., Verlaine in "Madrigal": "Du bout fin de la que // notte de ton souris" (3 + 4 + 5). The trimètre and enjambment thus became radical in the latter half of the 19th c., the line-terminal word often being no more than a particle, the trimètre assuming ever more asymmetrical configurations (5 + 3 + 4, 3 + 6 + 3, 4 + 3 + 5, etc.) The poets of vers libéré also cultivated the vers impair and the expressive, but rhythmically disruptive, effects of the coupe lyrique (see COUPE). All this contributed to the rhythmic destabilization of the line and undermined its cl. integrity. Metrical verse lost its firm contours and, consequently, its aptitude for eloquent and oratorical utterance; instead, it acquired a certain looseness, fluidity, and indeterminacy that favored the intimate, the prosaic, the impromptu, the fantaisiste. Similarly, Verlaine's fondness for poems in exclusively feminine rhymes is part of a wider tendency to disregard the rule prescribing the alternation of *masculine and feminine rhymes, a tendency whose origins lie in Baudelaire's "Ciel brouillé" (Cloudy sky) and "A une mendiante rousse" (To a begging redhead) (both 1857) and in Théodore de Banville's "Erinna" and "L'Enamourée" (both 1866). Other rules of rhyming were also infringed: masculine words rhyme with feminine ones (Banville's "Élégie," 1846; Verlaine's "Ariettes oubliées VI," (Forgotten Ariettas) 1874), singulars with plurals (Laforgue). Thus, even though rhyme was still felt to be indispensable to Fr. verse, poets sought to reduce its privileged status, both by treating it carelessly and by smudging the line ending. Some poets, however—Mallarmé and Banville, in particular—worked with inordinately rich rhymes, not only to subvert rhyme by comic excess but to activate larger acoustic fields. The step from vers libéré to vers libre was a short one; it was a step taken by Rimbaud ("Marine" and "Mouvement," both 1873) and by Laforgue (Derniers Vers, 1890); but Rimbaud also developed in a more radical prosodic direction (the *prose poem), as did Mallarmé, whose Un coup de dés (A Throw of the Dice) in 1897 already exploits most of the resources of *visual poetry.

See FRENCH PROSODY.

■ L. Guichard, Jules Laforgue et ses poésies (1950); M. Grammont, Le Vers français, rev. ed. (1961); Elwert; Mazaleyrat; B. de Cornulier, Théorie du vers (1982); C. Scott, Vers Libre (1990)—esp. ch. 2; B. de Cornulier, Art poëtique (1995); J.-M. Gouvard, La Versification (1999), and Critique du vers (2000); Le Vers français: Histoire, théorie, esthétique, ed. M. Murat (2000); D. Evans, Rhythm, Illusion and the Poetic Idea (2004); A. English, Verlaine, poète de l'indécidable (2005).

C. Scott; D. Evans

VERS LIBRE. Because of its prosodic relatedness to vers libres classiques and vers libéré*, this term is best reserved for 19th-c. Fr. *free verse and those modernist free-verse prosodies that acknowledge a debt to it (e.g., It. *futurism; the Anglo-Am. vers libristes Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot; and *imagism). The directions mapped out by the vers libristes of the late 19th c., mostly advocates of the fashionable aesthetic of *symbolism with its emphasis on musicality, were variously explored and adapted by 20th-c. practitioners such as Guillaume Apollinaire, Blaise Cendrars, Pierre-Jean Jouve, Pierre Reverdy, Paul Éluard, Robert Desnos, René Char, Yves Bonnefoy, and Michel Deguy.

The emergence of vers libre is specifically datable to 1886, the year in which the review La Vogue, ed. by Gustave Kahn, published, in rapid succession, Arthur Rimbaud's free-verse Illuminations, "Marine," and "Mouvement" (possibly written in May 1873); trans. of some of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass by Jules Laforgue; Kahn's series of poems titled "Intermède" (to become part of his Les Palais nomades, 1887); ten of Laforgue's own free-verse poems (later collected in his posthumous Derniers Vers (Last verses), 1890); and further examples by Paul Adam and Jean Moréas. To this list of initiators, Jean Ajalbert, Édouard Dujardin, Albert Mockel, Francis Vielé-Griffin, Émile Verhaeren, Adolphe Retté, Maurice Maeterlinck, Camille Mauclair, and Stuart Merrill added their names in the years immediately following. Vers libre caused either considerable enthusiasm or anxiety, since its rejection of a traditional metrical order in favor of unbridled individuality appeared highly subversive in the context of Third Republican efforts to eradicate difference and create a stable, unified national identity; Mauclair, in F. T. Marinetti's Enquête internationale sur le vers libre (International survey on free verse, 1909), writes, "There are as many kinds of free verse as there are poets," while Laforgue claims, "My keyboard is constantly changing, and there is no other identical to mine. All keyboards are legitimate" (Mélanges posthumes, 1903). The conservative Catulle Mendès, however, in his governmentally commissioned Rapport sur le mouvement poétique français 1867–1900 (Report on the French Poetic Movement, 1902) blames such rampant anarchy on the influence of foreigners and women, such as the Peruvian exile Della Rocca de Vergalo (Poétique nouvelle, 1880) and the Polish Jew Marie Krysinska (Rythmes pittoresques, 1890).

One might believe that the relative freedoms of vers libres classiques combined with those of vers libéré would produce the absolute freedom of vers libre, but this is not quite so. Certainly, vers libre is *heterometric and rhymes freely, and its lines are rhythmically unstable. But it goes further still; it rejects the indispensability of *rhyme with its line-demarcative function and instead relates lineation not to number of syllables but to the coincidence of units of meaning and units of rhythm or to integral impulses of utterance or else simply to the optimal expressive disposition of its textual raw materials. And indeed, the vers-libristes seek to abandon the principle of syllabism itself, by making the number of syllables in a line either irrelevant or indeterminable or both (see SYLLABIC VERSE). The undermining of the syllabic system is facilitated by the ambiguous syllabic status of the eatone (mute e)—should it be counted when unelided?—and by doubts about the syllabic value of contiguous vowels. Laforgue summarizes the tabula rasa of vers libre in a letter to Kahn of July 1886: "I forget to rhyme, I forget about the number of syllables, I forget about stanzaic structure."

Paradoxically, however, syllabic amorphousness produces rhythmic polymorphousness and *polysemy; in other words, a single line of vers libre is potentially several lines, each with its own inherited modalities. In addition, because of its heterometricity, vers libre can maximize rhythmic shifts between lines, creating a verse texture of multiplied tonalities. Within this paradox lies another fruitful contradiction. One of the original justifications for vers libre was its inimitability, its resistance to abstraction and systemization; thus, it could theoretically mold itself to the uniqueness of a personality, a psyche, a mood. Again Kahn: "For a long time I had been seeking to discover in myself a personal rhythm capable of communicating my lyric impulses with the cadence and music which I judged indispensable to them" (Préface to Premiers Poèmes, 1897). Yet, vers libre equally proposes a range of rhythmic possibilities that the reader is left to resolve into any one of a number of specific recitations. Given the significance of typographical arrangement in vers libre, this contradiction might be reformulated as a polarization of the visual and the oral, of the ling. and the paralinguistic, of the text as text, demanding to be read on its own terms, and the text as script, a set of incomplete instructions to the reader's *voice. One further contradiction might be mentioned: for all vers libre's ambiguation of syllabic number, with its transference of focus from syllable to accent, from number of syllables to number of measures, many free-verse poems are constructed on a "constante rythmique" (rhythmic constant), an intermittently recurrent measure that can be defined only syllabically.

Two broad currents of devel. can be distinguished in vers libre: one derives its rhythmic purchase from its varying approximation to, and distance from, recognizably regular lines and often cultivates ironic modes of utterance; the other seeks to undermine the primacy of the line by promoting rhythmic units larger than the line—the verset* or the *stanza—or smaller than the line—the individual *measure; this latter strain is often informed by a rhapsodic voice. But in both currents, the line's role as guardian of metrical authority and guarantor of verse as ritual and self-transcendence is removed.

In both currents, too, the stanza finds itself without pedigree, infinitely elastic, ensuring no structural continuity. The stanza of vers libre ends not in conformity with some visible structural imperative—though who may say what invisible imperatives operate—but because a movement of utterance comes to an end and because only by ending can a sequence of lines define its own field of structural and prosodic activity. The stanzas of vers libre are a pursuit of unique kinds of formality constantly renewed, not the repeated confirmation of a certain stanzaic blueprint.

Vers libre can claim, with some justification, to have "psychologized" verse structure, to have made the act of writing apparently simultaneous with the changing movements of mind: "a poem is not a feeling communicated just as it was conceived before the act of writing. Let us acknowledge the small felicities of rhyme, and the deviations caused by the chances of invention, the whole unforeseen symphony which comes to accompany the subject" (Laforgue, Mélanges posthumes). By allowing the aleatory and the improvised to inhabit verse (see ALEATORY POETICS), by exploiting the psychological layering produced by variable rhyme interval and variable margin, by locating verse at the intersection of multiplied coordinates (rhyme, rhymelessness, *repetition, the metrical, the nonmetrical), by using ling. structures to attract and activate paralinguistic features (tempo, *pause, *tone, accentual variation, emotional coloring), vers libre establishes its affinities with the stream of consciousness of contemp. fiction and proffers a stream of consciousness of poetic reading.

■ Thieme 386; T. M. Dondo, Vers Libre: A Logical Development of French Verse (1922); E. Dujardin, Les Premiers Poètes du vers libre (1922); J. Hytier, Les Techniques modernes du vers français (1923); Patterson; L.-P. Thomas, Le Vers moderne: ses moyens d'expression, son esthétique (1943); H. Morier, Le Rythme du vers libre symboliste, 3 v. (1944); P. M. Jones, The Background of Modern French Poetry (1951), pt. 2; Z. Czerny, "Le Vers libre français et son art structural," Poetics, Poetyka, Poetika, ed. D. Davie et al. (1961); T. S. Eliot, "Reflections on Vers Libre" (1917), To Criticize the Critic (1965); Le Vers français au 20e siècle, ed. M. Parent (1967); F. Carmody, "La Doctrine du vers libre de Gustave Kahn," Cahiers de l'Association Internationale des Etudes Françaises 21 (1969); J. Mazaleyrat, "Problèmes de scansion du vers libre," Philologische Studien für Joseph M. Piel (1969); J. Filliolet, "Problématique du vers libre," Poétique du vers français, ed. H. Meschonnic (1974); Elwert; Scott; Mazaleyrat; D. Grojnowski, "Poétique du vers libre: Derniers Vers de Jules Laforgue (1886)," Revue d'histoire littéraire de la France 84 (1984); C. Scott, A Question of Syllables (1986), Vers Libre: The Emergence of Free Verse in France (1990), and Reading the Rhythm: The Poetics of French Free Verse 1910–1930 (1993); Morier; M. Murat, Le Vers libre (2008).

C. SCOTT; D. EVANS

VERS MESURÉS À L'ANTIQUE. Imitations of the quantitative meters of cl. versification in Fr. verse mainly of the 16th c. Given the emphasis, during the Ren., on the imitation of cl. models, it is not surprising that poets of the Pléiade* such as Pierre de Ronsard, Jean-Antoine de Baïf, and Étienne Jodelle and their contemporaries. Étienne Pasquier and Jacques de la Taille wanted to transfer to poetry in the vernacular the metrical principles that had given rise to the august *canon of cl. poetry: how to attain similar ends but by similar means? The impulse was particularly strong where direct trans. was involved. These attempts usually entailed a rigid and quite arbitrary specification of quantitative values (long or short) for Fr. syllables, from which any functional distinction between long and short vowels had all but disappeared (see SYLLABIC VERSE). Of the 16th-c. quantitative poets, Baïf was perhaps the most celebrated and most prolific (e.g., Étrènes de poézie fransoèze au vers mesurés, 1574, which contains *hexameters, iambic trimeters, sapphics, *alcaics, and other cl. meters). Even though reactions to Baïf's experiments were at best skeptical and at worst mockingly incredulous, others followed in his footsteps, notably Nicholas Rapin and Agrippa d'Aubigné. After a prolonged absence, vers mesurés reappeared in the 18th c., championed by l'Abbé d'Olivet and A.R.J. Turgot. Vers mesurés work best when supported by rhyme—a most unclassical device but long perceived as an essential rhythmic point de repère for the Fr. ear—and when patterns of accented and unaccented vowels are made to correspond to cl. patterns of long and short (i.e., accentual imitations of quantitative verse). But even where this latter equivalence is practiced, the gradual weakening of the Fr. accent, with its consequent shift from word to word group, has left fewer accents at the Fr. poet's disposal than there are long syllables in the cl. meter being imitated. The greater frequency of accents in Eng. and Ger. is one reason that verse based on cl. meters has had a longer hist. in these two poetries.

See ACCENT, CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES, METER, QUANTITY.

■ L. Bellanger, Études historiques et philologiques sur la rime française (1876); Kastner; Patterson; F. Deloffre, Le vers français, 2d ed. (1973); Elwert; B. E. Bullock, "Quantitative Verse in a Quantity-Insensitive Language: Baïf's Vers mesurés," Journal of French Language Studies 7 (1997); J. Vignes, "Brève histoire de vers mesurés français au XVIe siècle," Albineana 17 (2005).

C. SCOTT

VERSO PIANO. In It. prosody, any line that has the principal accent on the penultimate syllable, making the line ending paroxytonic; It. line forms are named on this basis. Thus, an endecasillabo piano is a line of 11 syllables with the principal accent on the tenth (e.g., Dante, Inferno 1.1: "Nel mezzo del cammin di nostra vita"); a settenario piano is a line of seven syllables with the principal accent on the sixth (e.g., Petrarch, Canzoniere 71.1: "Perché la vita è breve"). The verso piano is the most common line form in It.

See HENDECASYLLABLE, HEPTASYLLABLE, ITALIAN PROSODY, VERSO SDRUCCIOLO, VERSO TRONCO.

■ Wimsatt; Elwert, Italienische; F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); A. Menichetti, Metrica italiana (1993).

L. H. GORDON; C. KLEINHENZ

VERSO SDRUCCIOLO. In It. prosody, any line that ends in a parola sdrucciola, a word with the principal accent on the antepenultimate syllable, making the line ending proparoxytonic. Thus, an endecasillabo sdrucciolo has 12 syllables with the principal accent on the tenth (e.g., Dante, Inferno 15.1: "O-ra cen por-ta l'un de' du-ri mar-gi-ni"). A settenario sdrucciolo has eight syllables, retaining the principal accent on the sixth (e.g., Cielo d'Alcamo: "Ro-sa fre-sca au-len-tis-si-ma"). The endecasillabo sdrucciolo was cultivated in the 16th c. instead of the Lat. iambic *trimeter: Ludovico Ariosto used it in his comedies to imitate that meter in the theater of Plautus and Terence; Vincenzo Monti used it later in the Canto d'Apollo and in his Prometeo; Giosuè Carducci used it still later in his Canto di Marzo, wherein he tried to reproduce even the accents and pauses of the iambic trimeter.

See HENDECASYLLABLE, HEPTASYLLABLE, ITALIAN PROSODY, VERSO PIANO, VERSO TRONCO.

■ Wimsatt; Spongano; Elwert, Italienische; F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); A. Menichetti, Metrica italiana (1993).

L. H. GORDON; C. KLEINHENZ

VERSO TRONCO. In It. prosody, any line ending with an accented syllable, i.e., oxytonic. In particular, an endecasillabo tronco is a line with the principal accent on the tenth, because the final unstressed syllable has been dropped (tronco, from troncato, cut off), giving the line ten rather than the usual 11 syllables (e.g., Dante, Inferno 4.60: "E con Rachele, per cui tanto fé"). In the generation after Dante, Antonio Pucci began a sonnet with a verso tronco ("Caro sonetto mio, con gran pietà") and used versi tronchi throughout the octave of another ("Maestro mio, deh non mi mandar più"). The caccia* frequently presents examples of versi tronchi. Later poets occasionally employed such lines for special metrical effects (e.g., Alessandro Manzoni and Aldo Palazzeschi).

See HENDECASYLLABLE, HEPTASYLLABLE, ITALIAN PROSODY, VERSO PIANO, VERSO SDRUCCIOLO.

■ Wimsatt; Elwert, Italienische; F. P. Memmo, Dizionario di metrica italiana (1983); A. Menichetti, Metrica italiana (1993).

L. H. GORDON; C. KLEINHENZ

VIDA (Occitan, "life"; from Lat. vita). A brief Occitan prose biography, rarely more than a few sentences long, that precedes a set of poems by a *troubadour in certain of the late 13th- and 14th-c. chansonniers, or anthols. of lyric verse. Using simple, highly formulaic lang., vidas situate the troubadour geographically and socially and often provide a general commentary on the quality of his or her verse. They frequently name the troubadour's patron and the person celebrated in the songs. Vidas, many of which occur in more than one ms., survive for approximately 100 troubadours. Although they undoubtedly originated with jongleurs*, who invented them for performance purposes, they were collected by troubadour-scholars (notably Uc de Saint Circ and Miquel de la Tor), who cast them in their present written form.

See OCCITAN POETRY, RAZO.

■ J. Boutière and A. H. Schutz, Biographies des troubadours, 2d ed. (1964); The Vidas of the Troubadours, trans. M. Egan (1984); E. W. Poe, From Poetry to Prose in Old Provençal (1984), and "Vidas and Razos," Handbook of the Troubadours, ed. F.R.P. Akehurst and J. M. Davis (1995).

E. W. POE

VIETNAM, POETRY OF. Poetry permeates all aspects of Vietnamese life and became the most important medium of expression in Vietnamese society. Vietnamese *lyric poetry is indebted to both the poetic and cultural trads. and vernacular, or the spoken lang. At the same time, the cl. or formal trad. was modeled on poetic trads. from China (see CHINA, POETRY OF). The commitment to Confucian orthodoxy affixed poetry as a principal mode of literary production using Chinese script among the scholar gentry. Because of the tonal lang., the folk poetic trad.—meant to be sung—gave birth to a variety of verse forms and poetic genres.

Vietnamese independence, established in 939 CE, combined with nation-building, provided the textual trad. of different poetic forms. By the late 15th c., the canonical poetic trad. in Vietnam developed in ways that differed significantly from the folk trads. both in content and form. From the time of Vietnamese independence, thơ Đường luật (lüshi; see SHI) became the ideal literary form within the intelligentsia's textual trad. and was required as part of civil-service exams. The thất ngôn bát cú, seven syllables and eight lines styled after the lüshi form, became the preferred poetic pattern until the thơ mới period at the beginning of the 20th c. Borrowed from 9th-c. Tang Dynasty poetry, this form was modified by poets to fit Vietnamese ling. features and taste. There were also the song thất lục bát, a hybrid form combining the seven-syllable Tang lüshi form and the indigenous Vietnamese lục bát or six-eight *couplet, with a structure of the two seven-syllable lines and six eight-syllable lines; ngũ ngôn (five-syllable), and tứ tuyệt (a four-line poem with either four, five, or seven syllables per line). Cl. poetry dealt with the Confucian view of the world and the relationship between the individual and society; topics included moral cultivation, filial piety, neo-Confucian ideologies, heaven and earth, humanity and nature, love, fate, leisure, and beauty.

Poet-scholars adopted both the more formal lüshi as well as lục bát (six-eight), a more open, freer, indigenous Vietnamese form originally propagated orally. Most folk poems are written in lục bát. A lục bát poem in its smallest unit consists of a six-eight couplet. There is no limit to the number of couplets in a lục bát poem, though it must end in an even number. The Vietnamese lang. uses six tones divided into two main groups: low and high. The letter S (sharp or trắc) indicates an accented syllable, and the letter F (flat or bằng) indicates an unaccented syllable or tone. The odd numbered positions in a line can either be flat (bằng) or sharp (trắc) and is symbolized as O. The second, sixth, and eighth syllables are flat (F), while the fourth syllable is sharp (S). As a rule, the last syllable of the first line (FR1) rhymes with the sixth syllable of the second line (the eight-syllable line, FR1). If a poem has four lines (two couplets), the eighth syllable of the second line (FR2) rhymes with the sixth syllable of the third line (FR2). The rhyme scheme continues with the same pattern—i.e., the sixth syllable of the third line (FR2) rhymes with the sixth syllable (FR2) of the fourth line:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8
1st line	O	F	O	S	O	FR1
2d line	O	F	O	S	O	FR1	O	FR2
3d line	O	F	O	S	O	FR2
4th line	O	F	O	S	O	FR2	O	FR3
5th line	O	F	O	S	O	FR3
6th line	O	F	O	S	O	FR3	O	FR4

From the 11th to the 16th cs., the Buddhist trad. predominated under the Lý and Trần kings. Poets became more familiar with Buddhist concepts during this period. Thơ Văn Lý Trần (A Collection of the Poetry of Lý and Trần Dynasties), esp. the Thiền Uyển Tập Anh in Chinese script, provided reputable matter (Nguyen 1997). Buddhist notions of delusion, temporality, enlightenment, nirvana, and Buddha nature are distinctive characteristics of Lý Trần Zen poetry. Most of the poems are composed using the five-syllable quatrain characteristic of Tang style.

The vernacular lang. played a significant role in the emergence of nationalism and modernity in Vietnam. During the Trần Dynasty (13th c.), the devel. and standardization of the nôm script, modified Chinese characters used to record Vietnamese phonetics and vernacular lang., transformed and demarcated a distinctive Vietnamese literary trad. With the devel. of the nôm script, Vietnamese poetry arose as the preferred form to express the Vietnamese psyche, experience, and identity. Nôm script also prepared the way for the creation of the romanized writing system in the 17th c. The great Vietnamese poet Nguyễn Trãi (1380–1442) is noted for his Quốc Âm Thi Tập (Anthology of Verse in the National Language). The Hồng Đức Quốc Âm Thi Tập (Hồng Đức's Anthology of Verse in the National Language), a collection of cl. Vietnamese poetry composed by King Lê Thánh Tông (1442–97) and members of his Tao Đàn Academy, was also compiled in the 16th c.

The reestablishment of national unity, expansion, and order under the Nguyễn Dynasty (1802–1945) ushered in social and political conditions conducive to the formulation of a new literati aesthetic. Bà Huyện Thanh Quan (b. 1800?), often writing in nôm script in the lüshi form and thất ngôn bát cú, skillfully captured natural images and sceneries with the intention of conveying the psychological states of the individual. Her poems can be read as autobiographical narratives. Hồ Xuân Hương (1772–1822) championed an indigenous and feminine perspective by using poetry as a critique of Confucian morality, esp. attitudes toward sexuality. She skillfully used the vernacular lang. and lüshi forms, as well as Confucian philosophical *tropes. She often masterfully used wordplay, esp. a form of Vietnamese secret lang. called nói lái (inverted speech). Many of her poems are designed to be read in two wholly different manners; thus, a reader may find her poems beautiful while remaining oblivious to the hidden meaning. Using inverted speech, her poems are also playful and full of sexual innuendoes alluding to and depicting sexually obscene images and sex acts. She frequently challenged the unconditional acceptance of norms—namely, the rights and privileges bestowed on male scholars—and ridiculed the oppression of women.

During this period, scholars became disillusioned and apathetic toward sociopolitical affairs and more focused on personal expression. New poet-scholars emerged, most notably Nguyễn Du (1765–1820), the author of Truyện Kiều or The Tale of Kieu. This novel in verse, considered to be the masterpiece of Vietnamese poetry, is composed in both verse and the vernacular using the lục bát form in 1627 couplets. Nguyễn Du used romantic love as an allegory for political affiliation and suffering, simultaneously negotiating loyalty and its multiple obligations. Less concerned with the sociopolitical realm, 19th-c. poets such as Nguyễn Công Trứ, Cao Bá Quát, and Nguyễn Khuyến composed poems focused on personal experiences.

It took more than 300 years for the Vietnamese to embrace and adopt chữ Quốc ngữ, or the Roman alphabet writing system, after it was introduced to Vietnam by Eur. missionaries, specifically Alexander de Rhode (1591–1660). Poet Tản Đà Nguyễn Khắc Hiếu (1889–1939) delineated the sharp transition from the cl. trad. to the thơ mới movement, allowing countless others to follow suit. Phan Khôi experimented with the new form in "Tình Già" (Old Love) and was credited with using the first *free verse in romanized Vietnamese writing. As the Western writing system became more readily accepted, significant transformations in the aesthetic and content of poetry occurred, and a new crop of poets burgeoned: Thế Lữ, Lưu Trọng Lư, Huy Cận, Tố Hữu, Nguyễn Bính, Chế Lan Viên, Hàn Mạc Tử (who died of leprosy), and Xuân Diệu (who advocated art for art's sake). The form of the new poetry movement preserved many aspects of the lüshi form but was freer in rhyme patterns. These prewar poets (thi nhân tiền chiến) sought to cut Vietnamese poetry off from past conventions by incorporating Fr. poetic styles and *metaphors.

Poetry at the second half of the 20th c. was profoundly influenced by war. Leading prewar poets like Huy Cận, Xuân Diệu, Chế Lan Viên, and esp. Tố Hữu (who later served as minister of culture under the Social Democratic government of Vietnam) chose to join the Việt Minh and were committed to writing political poetry. Other poets of the thơ mới movement either emigrated to the South or remained invisible in the North throughout the war. On the emergence of a relatively free land in the South, a new poetic movement in the Republic of South Vietnam (RSVN) evolved. Vũ Hoàng Chương, Tô Thùy Yên, Tương Phố, Nguyên Sa, Đông Hồ, and Bùi Giáng, to name a few, brought the movement to new heights. Bùi Giáng used poetic tropes to play with meaning. He often used the lục bát style and is considered the most prolific poet for his ability to create poetry extemporaneously; he is famous for having written a hundred couplets in a day. While the war in the North generated a more radical tendency, poets such as Trần Dần, Phùng Quán, Hoàng Cầm, Lê Đạt, and others distanced themselves from political involvement and used free verse to experiment with form. Poetry in the postwar period followed a number of paths. Young female poets such as Vi Thùy Linh and Ly Hoàng Ly defied poetic conventions and male-dominant sexual politics by exploring female sexualities. However, their works were subject to censure and unfavorable crit.

■ Criticism and History: M. Durand and T. Nguyen, An Introduction to Vietnamese Literature (1985); D. H. Nguyen, Vietnamese Literature: A Brief Survey (1994); C. T. Nguyen, Zen in Medieval Vietnam: A Study and Translation of Thiền Uyển Tập Anh (1997); E. Pastreich, "Reception of Chinese Literature in Vietnam," Columbia History of Chinese Literature, ed. V. H. Mair (2001).

■ Translations: N. B. Nguyen et al., A Thousand Years of Vietnamese Poetry (1975); The Heritage of Vietnamese Poetry, trans. S. T. Huynh (1979); D. Nguyễn, The Tale of Kieu, trans. S. T. Huynh (1983); An Anthology of Vietnamese Poems, trans. S. T. Huynh (1996); X. H. Ho, Spring Essence, ed. and trans. J. Balaban (2000); Black Dog, Black Night: Contemporary Vietnamese Poetry, trans. D. Nguyen and P. Hoover (2008).

Q. Phu Van

VILLANCICO. A Sp. poem, often on a religious or popular theme and usually composed in a short meter, to be sung as a *carol. The introductory stanza (cabeza, estribillo, repetición, or retornelo), typically brief, sets forth the theme to be glossed in the body of the poem and frequently serves, in whole or in part, as the refrain (estribillo). The body (pies) of the poem, composed of a few (usually about six) *strophes, each of about six lines plus the *chorus, develops the theme, often repeating verbatim phrases or lines from the introduction.

■ D. G. Rengifo, Arte poética española (1592); P. Henríquez Ureña, Versificación irregular en la poesía castellana, 2d ed. (1933); Le Gentil; P. Le Gentil, Le Virelai et le villancico: Le problème des origines arabes (1954); A. Sánchez Romeralo, El Villancico (1969); Navarro; M. Moraña, "Poder, raza, y lengua: La construcción étnica del Otyro en los villancicos de Sor Juana," Colonial Latin American Review 4 (1995); J. Martínez Gómez, "'Plebe humana y angelica nobleza': Los villancicos de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz," Cuadernos hispanoamericanos supp. 16 (1995); M. Lilia Tenorio, Los villancicos de Sor Juana (1999); S. Armistead, "Kharjas and Villancicos," Journal of Arabic Literature 34 (2003).

D. C. Clarke

VILLANELLE (from It. villanella, a rustic song, villano, a peasant). As known today, a 19-line poem with two rhymes and two *refrain lines, in the form A_1bA_2 abA_1 abA_2 abA_1 abA_2 abA_1A_2, where capital letters indicate refrains. Fr. poet Théodore de Banville compared the interweaving a, b, and refrain lines to "a braid of silver and gold threads, crossed with a third thread the color of a rose." Also distinctive is the *quatrain occurring at the end of a series of *tercets, the extra line in the last stanza furnishing a sense of closure to the repetitive pattern with a conclusive *couplet. In the 16th c., however, the villanelle had no set form other than the presence of a refrain after each verse. When Fr. poets such as Joachim du Bellay and Philippe Desportes began writing lyric poems in the spirit of the villanella—a trendy It. style of song that imitated rustic dance tunes from the oral trad., although its composers were courtly and literate—the rhyme schemes varied widely, the refrain could be one to five lines in length, and there could be any number of verses, although four was the most common in both the musical and poetic versions. Many of the 16th-c. poetic villanelles were set to music by composers of the time, and references to the villanelle through the 17th c. portray it as a musical and not poetic genre.

Throughout the 18th c., the same single example of the villanelle was frequently cited: Jean Passerat's 19-line alternating-refrain "Villanelle" ("J'ay perdu ma Tourterelle"), first pub. in 1606. Most 18th-c. texts defined the villanelle simply as a "peasant song," but an obscure 1722 Fr. grammar by Denis Gaullyer asserted that the villanelle required the first and last lines of the first verse to alternate as refrains. A similar claim in Pierre-Charles Berthelin's 1751 rev. ed. of Pierre Richelet's authoritative rhyming dictionary and prosody manual probably had more influence. Nineteenth-c. Fr. dictionaries, grammars, encyclopedias, and handbooks subsequently defined the villanelle as a traditional schematic poetic form, but Passerat's form was one of a kind until Banville's "Villanelle de Buloz" of 1845. Significantly fortified by Banville's popular handbook Petit traité de poésie française, the mistaken belief that the villanelle was an antique form persisted tenaciously throughout the 19th and 20th cs.

Enthusiasm for med. and Ren. forms in the 19th c. also helped establish the villanelle among authentic antique Fr. forms such as the *triolet, *rondeau, and ballade. French Parnassian poets (see parnassianism) believed that a villanelle might be any length (like a poem written in terza rima); but in 1878, Joseph Boulmier published an entire volume of 19-line villanelles on the Passerat template, arguing in an intro. that this was the best length. Boulmier also pointed out that the villanelle was not a poetic form in the Ren., but this correction went largely unnoticed. Eng. *aestheticism also admired archaic forms, and in the 1870s, Edmund Gosse helped make the villanelle a staple of *light verse. Poets such as Oscar Wilde, Andrew Lang, and (in America) E. A. Robinson wrote 19-line villanelles, which established that length as a rule.

Hardly any Fr. poets wrote villanelles after the 19th c., but the form gradually became surprisingly important in Eng.—though Eng. writers continued to refer to the villanelle as a "French form." James Joyce's 1916 Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man included a scene about the composition of a villanelle in which Joyce's mod. stream-of-consciousness prose contrasts starkly with the outdated fin de siècle theme and form of his hero's poem. But William Empson's "Villanelle" ("It is the pain, it is the pain endures") of 1928 was highly mod.; and when W. H. Auden adopted the form, his villanelles, like Empson's, were *pentameter: almost all earlier Eng. villanelles are *tetrameter or *trimeter. Dylan Thomas's first villanelle was a 1942 *parody of Empson titled "Request to Leda," but it was Thomas's 1951 "Do not go gentle into that good night" that ensured the villanelle's survival and status in Eng. poetry. Throughout the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, major poets occasionally wrote villanelles.

Elizabeth Bishop's 1976 villanelle "One Art," along with the emergence of *New Formalism, introduced what might be called the postmodern villanelle. In the last quarter of the 20th c., poet after poet adopted the villanelle, often making use of a new license to use *near rhyme and near refrain and overtly obeying or challenging to the supposedly strict, traditional rules of the form. Poets also began to invent similar forms, most unique but some not: the prose villanelle, the terzanelle (a hybrid with terza rima), and, most notably, a ludicrously repetitive form invented by Billy Collins. The paradelle, which Collins claimed was a langue d'oc form of the 11th c., is a "parody villanelle" whose origin story is only slightly falser than the one commonly told of the "real" villanelle.

■ J. Passerat, Recueil des oeuvres poétiques (1606); D. Gaullyer, Abregé de la grammaire françoise (1722); P. Richelet, Dictionnaire des rimes, ed. P. C. Berthelin (1751); T. de Banville, Petit traité de poésie française (1872); E. Gosse, "A Plea for Certain Exotic Forms of Verse," Cornhill Magazine 36 (1877); J. Boulmier, Villanelles (1878); C. Scott, French Verse-Art (1980); D. G. Cardamone, The Canzone Villanesa alla Napolitana and Related Forms, 1537–1570 (1981); R. F. McFarland, The Villanelle (1987); J. Kane, "The Myth of the Fixed-Form Villanelle," MLQ 64 (2003); The Paradelle, ed. T. W. Welford (2006); A. L. French, "Edmund Gosse and the Stubborn Villanelle Blunder," VP 48 (2010).

J. Kane; A. L. French

VIRELAI (also called chanson baladée and vireli). Originally a variant of the common dance song with refrain, of which the *rondeau is the most prominent type, this med. Fr. lyric form developed in the 13th c. and at first may have been performed by one or more leading voices and a *chorus. It begins with a *refrain, followed by a stanza of four lines of which the first two have a musical line (repeated) different from that of the refrain. The last two lines of the stanza return to the music of the refrain. The opening refrain, words and music, is then sung again. The virelai usually continues with two more stanzas presented in this same way. A virelai with only one stanza would be a bergerette. In Italy, the 13th-c. lauda* and, in Spain, the cantiga*, follow the same form. The syllables vireli and virelai were probably nonsense refrains that later came to designate the type.

The large number of variations and optional elements both in the lai* and in the virelai (as practiced by Guillaume de Machaut, Jean Froissart, Christine de Pisan, and Eustache Deschamps) produced much uncertainty among recent prosodists about how both forms should be defined, so that one must approach any mod. definition with great caution. Most recent commentators follow Théodore de Banville (Petit traité de poésie française, 1872), who, relying on the authority of the 17th-c. prosodist le Père Mourgues (Traité de la poésie française, 1685), tried to settle matters by defining the lai as a poem in which each stanza is a combination of three-line groups, two longer lines followed by a shorter one, with the longer lines sharing one rhyme sound and the shorter lines another (aabaabaab ccdccdccd, etc.). Then, calling on a false etymology of virelai—from virer (to turn) and lai—he defined the virelai as a lai in which the rhyme sounds are "turned" from stanza to stanza; i.e., the rhyme of the shorter lines becomes the rhyme of the longer lines in the following stanza (aabaabaab, bbcbbcbbc, etc.). Calling the virelai thus defined the virelai ancien, Banville goes on to describe the virelai nouveau, which bears no relation to the virelai ancien and is, if anything, more like the *villanelle. The virelai nouveau opens with a refrain, whose two lines then recur separately and alternately as the refrains of the stanzas following, reappearing together again only at the end of the final stanza, but with their order reversed. The stanzas of the virelai nouveau may be of any length and employ any rhyme scheme, but the poem is limited to two rhyme sounds only. Here again, Banville merely follows le Père Mourgues, whose "Le Rimeur rebuté" is used as an illustration. John Payne's "Spring Sadness" (virelai ancien) and Austin Dobson's "July" (virelai nouveau) are the only evidence that these two forms have excited any interest.

■ E. Gosse, "A Plea for Certain Exotic Forms of Verse," Cornhill Magazine 36 (1877); G. White, Ballades and Rondeaus (1887); Kastner; H. L. Cohen, Lyric Forms from France (1922); Le Gentil; P. Le Gentil, Le Virelai et le villancico (1954); M. Françon, "On the Nature of the Virelai," Symposium 9 (1955); G. Reaney, "The Development of the Rondeau, Virelai, and Ballade," Festschrift Karl Gustav Fellerer (1962); F. Gennrich, Das altfranzösische Rondeau und V. im 12. und 13. Jahrhundert (1963); F. Gennrich and G. Reaney, "Virelai," MGG 13.1802–11; N. Wilkins, "Virelai," New Grove; Morier; R. Mullally, "Vireli, Virelai," Neuphilologische Mitteilungen 101 (2000); J.-F. Kosta-Théfaine, "Les Virelais de Christine de Pizan," Moyen Français 48 (2001).

U. T. Holmes; C. Scott

VISUAL ARTS AND POETRY. See CARMINA FIGURATA; CONCRETE POETRY; EKPHRASIS; PAINTING AND POETRY; UT PICTURA POESIS; VISUAL POETRY.

VISUAL POETRY

I. Forms
II. Functions
III. Development

IV. Free Verse
V. Mixed and Electronic Media

Visual poetry is poetry composed for the eye as well as, or more than, for the ear. All written and printed poetry is visual poetry in a broad sense, in that, when we read the poem, the visual form affects how we read it and so contributes to our experience of its sound, movement, and meaning. The overwhelming majority of lyric poems are meant to fit on a codex page, hence, to meet the reader's eye as a simultaneously apprehensible whole. As Mooij points out, "written poetry allows for devices of foregrounding not available to oral poetry." Among these devices are lineation, line length, line grouping, indentation, intra- and interlinear white space, punctuation, capitalization, and size and style of type. In traditional verse, however, the written text serves mainly a notational role, and its visual aspects are subordinate to the oral form they represent. In visual poetry in the strict sense, the visual form of the text becomes an object for apprehension in its own right. In some visual poetry, text is combined with nontextual graphic elements.

I. Forms. In general, the visual form of a poem may be figurative or nonfigurative; if figurative, it may be mimetic or abstract. In cl. and Ren. pattern poetry, we find figurative visual form that is mimetic, the printed text taking the shape of objects (see TECHNOPAEGNION); the best-known examples are two poems by George Herbert, "The Altar" and "Easter Wings." There are also 20th-c. examples of mimetic visual form, among them the *calligrammes of Guillaume Apollinaire and some *concrete poetry. Poems in the shape of geometric figures such as circles and lozenges, another kind of pattern poetry, realize the possibility of figurative visual form that is abstract: in the Ren., 15 such forms are enumerated by George Puttenham. Less rigidly geometric forms are not uncommon in conventional poetry (Ranta).

The visual form of most poems is nonfigurative: such poems are isometrical or heterometrical, hence, consist of regular or irregular blocks of long and/or short lines. Open arrangements of lines in the page space are usually also nonfigurative. Such nonfigurative visual form may contribute significantly to the effect of the poem. In the case of short poems, the shape of the whole poem is apprehended immediately as open or dense, balanced or imbalanced, even or uneven, simple or intricate. In stanzaic poems, the regular partitioning of the text may convey a sense of order and control and generate an expectation of regular closure. Further, the individual stanzas themselves are apprehensible visual units. Stanzas in symmetrical shapes may suggest stability or stillness, while asymmetrical shapes may suggest instability or movement in a direction. Stanzas of complex shape may convey a sense of elaborate artifice. Stanzas where lines of different lengths, or with different rhymes, are indented by different amounts, as in John Donne's Songs and Sonnets, may appear esp. highly ordered. For the reader steeped in poetry, the visual forms of stanzas may also recall antecedent poems written in stanzas of similar shape. The basic shape of the *sapphic stanza, e.g., is recognizable even in extreme variations.

II. Functions. The viability of visual poetry as a literary mode depends directly on the functions that can be served by visual form. These fall into two classes: (a) those that reinforce the sense of the poem's unity and autonomy and (b) those that point up its *intertextuality. In group (a), we can enumerate six integrative functions: (1) to lend prominence to phonological, syntactic, or rhetorical structures in the text (this would include scoring for performance and the use of white space to express emotion, invite contemplation, or signal closure); (2) to indicate juxtapositions of images and ideas; (3) to signal shifts in topic, tone, or perspective; (4) to render iconically the subject of the poem or an object referred to in it (incl. the use of white space as an icon of space, whiteness, distance, void, or duration); (5) to present the reader with an abstract shape of energy; and (6) to help foreground the text as an aesthetic object. In group (b), we can identify six dispersive functions: (1) to signal a general or particular relation to poetic trad.; (2) to allude to various other genres of printed texts; (3) to engage and sustain reader attention by creating interest and texture; (4) to cross-cut other textual structures, producing counterpoint between two or more structures occupying the same words; (5) to heighten the reader's awareness of the reading process; and (6) to draw attention to particular features of the text and, more generally, to defamiliarize aspects of lang., writing, and *textuality. The visual form of a given poem may realize several different functions, even ones from the two opposed classes, at once.

III. Development. Historically, "all poetry is originally oral, and the earliest inscriptions of it were clearly ways of preserving material after the tradition of recitation had changed or been lost" (Hollander). Subsequently, "the development has been from . . . visual organization of phonological data . . . to a visual organization that carries meaning without reference to the phonological" (Cummings and Simmons). "[O]nce the inscribed text was firmly established as a standard . . . end-product of literary art and typical object of literary appreciation, it was only natural that the literary artist would exploit the rich aesthetic possibilities offered by the inscribed medium" (Shusterman). From ca. 300 BCE, visual effects have been exploited in various modes of visual poetry and in mixed-media works.

Perhaps the best known of the modes of visual poetry is what is anachronistically called pattern poetry, a mode used by Western poets from the 4th c. BCE to the present. Less familiar than poems in figurative or geometric shapes are versus intexti, also called carmina cancellata, a subgenre of pattern poetry. Such poems were composed on a grid, 35 squares by 35, each square containing a letter, with type size and, later, color and outlining used to distinguish visual images from the background of the rest of the text. First composed in the 4th c., they reached their fullest devel. in the work of Hrabanus Maurus (9th c.). Another ancient visual genre, the *acrostic, subverts the convention of reading from left to right and from top to bottom. Inscriptions, originally cut in stone with no regard for the appearance of the text, acquired beautiful lettering in Roman monumental art, which was reproduced and imitated in the Ren. In the 16th and 17th cs., esp. in northern Italy, they flourished briefly as a literary genre in printed books (Sparrow). The form, used mainly for religious and political eulogy, was really lineated prose—prose composed and printed in centered lines of uneven lengths, with the line divisions supporting the sense. A mixed-media genre, the *emblem, flourished during the Ren. Typically, it comprised a short motto, a picture, and an explanatory, moralizing poem.

The 20th c. saw a diverse abundance of highly visual works. These were heralded, just before the turn of the century by Stéphane Mallarmé's late work Un coup de dés, a visual composition with text in various type sizes arranged in the space of two-page spreads. It was followed, early in the century, by Apollinaire's calligrammes, in which lettering (often handwriting) of different sizes typically sketches the shape of an object, e.g., a cigar with smoke. The typographical experiments of *futurism and *Dada, the typewriter compositions of the Am. poet e. e. cummings, and concrete poetry all use visual form in ways that counteract the transparency of the written medium.

IV. Free Verse. Visual form plays a more important role in the prosody of *free verse than in that of metrical verse. One distinguishing feature of much modernist free verse—the eschewal of line-initial capitals—is a purely visual feature. On the one hand, besides serving to label the verse as nonmetrical, the use of lower-case letters at the beginnings of lines (unless they are also beginnings of sentences) may have the effect of reducing the visual prominence of the line as a unit. On the other hand, where lineation and line grouping are not determined by meter and rhyme, lines and line groups may be constitutively visual units. Even where lines are phonological, syntactical, and/or semantic units as well, their visual aspect may be important to their effect.

In most cases, visual form in free verse assumes a subservient, pattern-marking role. E.g., lineation, in its visual aspect, may serve to juxtapose images, as in Ezra Pound's classic imagist poem "In a Station of the Metro." Lineation, layout, and other visual features may serve to score the text for oral performance. Charles Olson, in his 1950 essay *"Projective Verse," claimed that there should be a direct relationship between the amount of white space and the length of pause. Regardless of whether it signals pause, intra- or interlinear white space can work mimetically, expressively, and rhetorically. Many free-verse poets exploit these possibilities through arrangement of text in the page space, as does Denise Levertov in this passage from "The Five-Day Rain":

> Sequence broken, tension > of sunlight broken.
>
> So light a rain > fine shreds > pending above the rigid leaves.

Less commonly, the visual form takes on a privileged, pattern-making role. Where lines do not coincide with units of the text's linguistic structure, they may, esp. in the case of short lines, set up a counterpoint to it. Free-verse poets, notably W. C. Williams, sometimes arrange their lines in "sight-stanzas," perceptible as stanzas only by virtue of having equal numbers of lines and creating iterated visual patterns. Here, the visual order of the stanzas may compensate aesthetically for considerable density or sprawl in syntax or argument. In other free-verse poems, white space serves to defamiliarize split or isolated textual elements, as in these lines from the Canadian poet bpNichol's The Martyrology:

> hand
>
> the h & > what else

V. Mixed and Electronic Media. Besides exploiting the visual elements of written lang. for various effects, experimental poets occasionally incorporate pictorial elements in their texts. Some poets compose, or collaborate with visual artists in composing, works that combine visual art and text. Asian poetry has a long trad. of such work. William Blake's illuminated books are a major Western example. The artist's book, a mode developed by visual artists, has been used by some contemp. experimental poets to explore the visual properties of texts. Along the continuum from purely literary art to purely visual, there are many possibilities for visual poetry with a dual aesthetic appeal—even for poetry without words. Other lines of poetic experimentation also offer visual possibilities; thus, scores for *sound poetry have been treated as a type of visual poetry.

In recent decades, the wide availability of the computer has given poets a means of text production and presentation that opens new possibilities for visual poetry. For the visually oriented poet, its value lies not in its allowing automated generation of text (see ELECTRONIC POETRY), but in its facilitating creation of spatial form, integration of graphic elements with text, use of color, and, esp., control of the pace of appearance and disappearance of segments of text (see TYPOGRAPHY). This control allows poets to incorporate temporal rhythms into visual form.

See LETTRISME.

■ G. Puttenham, The Arte of English Poesie (1589), rpt. in Smith; J. Sparrow, Visible Words (1969); R. Massin, La Lettre et l'image, 2d ed. (1973); Speaking Pictures, ed. M. Klonsky (1975)—anthol.; J.J.A. Mooij, "On the 'Foregrounding' of Graphic Elements in Poetry," Comparative Poetics, ed. D. W. Fokkema et al. (1976); J. Ranta, "Geometry, Vision, and Poetic Form," CE 39 (1978); Visual Literature Criticism, ed. R. Kostelanetz (1979); R. Kostelanetz, The Old Poetries and the New (1981); Morier, under "Blanchissement," "Vide"; R. Shusterman, "Aesthetic Blindness to Textual Visuality," JAAC 41 (1982); M. Cummings and R. Simmons, "Graphology," The Language of Literature (1983); H. M. Sayre, The Visual Text of W. C. Williams (1983); S. Cushman, W. C. Williams and the Meanings of Measure (1985), chap. 2; C. Taylor, A Poetics of Seeing (1985); Hollander; W. Bohn, The Aesthetics of Visual Poetry, 1914–1928 (1986); R. Cureton, "Visual Form in e. e. cummings' No Thanks," Word & Image 2 (1986); J. Adler and U. Ernst, Text als Figur (1987); The Line in Postmodern Poetry, ed. R. Frank and H. Sayre (1988); "Material Poetry of the Renaissance / The Renaissance of Material Poetry," ed. R. Greene, Harvard Library Bulletin NS 3.2 (1992); Experimental—Visual—Concrete, ed. K. D Jackson et al. (1996); Visuelle Poesie, ed. H. L. Arnold and H. Korte (1997); J. Drucker, Figuring the Word (1998); New Media Poetics, ed. A. Morris and T. Swiss (2006).

E. Berry

VISUAL RHYME. See EYE RHYME.

VOICE. To define voice in written poetry immediately poses a problem, for there is no literal voice in the poem: voice is an oral *metaphor employed in the description and analysis of the written word. It is not just any metaphor, however, but one that foregrounds fundamental distinctions underpinning Western culture: orality and literacy, speaking and writing. Regardless of how much one insists that writing is not speaking and that voice is not literally present in the poem, literary critics have persistently relied on metaphors of voice to analyze writing; it is difficult to imagine how one would go about discussing poetry in particular if we were forbidden to use the terms voice, speaker, and other vocal terms like monologue* or song*, to give a few examples. Teachers, students, and scholars regularly say that poetry "speaks" and readers "listen." The hist. of lit. crit. is saturated with more or less self-conscious uses of oral and aural terms for poetry. Though there are theories of narrative "voice"—see the work of Bakhtin and Genette, e.g.—poetry is regularly imagined to be the privileged site of vocal *presence; those who seek to demystify that presence work to dislodge or trouble oral metaphors that cleave far closer to poetry than to fiction, nonfiction, or perhaps even drama.

Studies of orality offer one approach to explaining why voice is so closely affiliated with poetry. These studies tend to agree that poetry is a crucial vehicle for the transmission of information in oral cultures. The repetitive sound structures that define poetry—*rhythm, *rhyme, *refrain, *alliteration, *assonance, *parallelism, *anaphora—are a central technology of cultural memory and historical transmission. In the absence of written documentation, sound patterns form a lang. system that enables recollection and recitation. Though oral cultures are certainly not extinct and though oral practices coexist alongside written practices in literate cultures, there is an abundance of work on the historical transition from orality to literacy in Western culture. Havelock, e.g., offers a theory of the "literate revolution" in Greece in the 7th to 4th cs. BCE that accounts for the saturation of vocal and aural figures in Gr. lit. During that time, oral strategies—singing, *recitation, memorization—were not simply supplanted by a literate culture's documentary practices; instead, the two modes entered into "competition and collision." The jostling of literacy by the traces of orality never ended: "the Muse never became the discarded mistress of Greece. She learned to write and read while she continued to sing." Metaphors of orality continue to inhabit, unsettle, and complicate the textual realm to the present day. The earlier, crucial functions of poetry, however, have been replaced by more peripheral, optional practices. Rather than a warehouse for a culture's knowledge, poetry now serves, e.g., as an entertaining pastime, a form of individualized or collective aesthetic expression, or a tool in commercial marketing.

The profound if conflicted affiliation between orality and literacy is the subject of numerous investigations of textual communication that take voice as the central operative term. In his work on orality and literacy, Ong posits writing as an extension of speaking and, thus, uses the term voice to refer to both. As temporal rather than spatial practices, both writing and speech permit access to interiority—they exteriorize thoughts and feelings in human expression—and, therefore, enable communication. As Ong has it, spatial practices objectify, but temporal practices enable intersubjective exchange. While writing has spatial, objective qualities (see BOOK, POETIC; VISUAL POETRY), it is first and foremost temporal and communicative. For Ong, as for many other theorists, poetry's operations are the ideal example of literary communication. In the *lyric poem, the author masks his or her expression by speaking through an objectified figure of voice. In this way, the "poem . . . advertises the distance and remoteness which, paradoxically, are part of every human attempt to communicate, and it does this in so far as it is under one aspect 'objective,' . . . which is to say, non-vocal." But under another aspect, it is not objective, since it is trying to communicate; in this sense, the poem has a voice. That voice is not simply individual but compound, however, since the speaker anticipates the listener and vice versa. They meet in the poem.

A number of landmark romantic and postromantic studies place voice, and particularly what has come to be known as lyric voice—a figure that closely associates the poem's "speaker" with the author's perspective—at their centers, without commenting explicitly on their use of oral and aural metaphors to define written practices. William Wordsworth's Preface to the 2d ed. of Lyrical Ballads (1800) defined "the poet" as "a man speaking to men" in "a selection of the language really spoken by men." Here the spoken word is clearly the inspiration for Wordsworth's thoughts about writing poetry; he seems to mean that the *poet should try to write after the manner of everyday conversation. Distinguishing between poetry and eloquence in "What Is Poetry?" (1833), John Stuart Mill famously asserted that "eloquence is heard; poetry is *over*heard. Eloquence supposes an audience. The peculiarity of poetry appears to us to lie in the poet's utter unconsciousness of a listener." Here again, Mill uses oral terms to describe written practices without remarking on a difference of which he was surely aware. Mill's metaphors for poetry primarily come from the stage rather than from, as with Wordsworth, the street or other locations of everyday life. Mill likens poetry to soliloquy, the actor's monologue to himself onstage that puts the audience in the position of unperceived listeners. Mill also summons the oral art of song. Both theater and song are vocal and embodied, a persistent poetic ideal. The elision between speaking and writing is typical in treatises on poetry of the romantic period, which set the terms for the ways many critics write about poetry to the present day.

In his essay "The Three Voices of Poetry" (1954), T. S. Eliot extends Mill's argument by articulating distinctions among three kinds of poetic voice that lie along a dramatic spectrum. These are ideas or ideals, never found in their pure form; all poems tend in their expression one way or another, but all poems are combinatory. The "first voice is the voice of the poet talking to himself—or to nobody. The second is the voice of the poet addressing an audience. The third is the voice of the poet when he attempts to create a dramatic character speaking in verse." For Eliot, the third voice is the most difficult to accomplish because it requires the most complete self-concealment and imaginative *empathy on the part of the writer; Shakespeare's plays are the most memorable achievement in this mode. Eliot himself wrote verse dramas and discussed in this essay the difficulty of creating autonomous characters. Eliot's second voice is more commonly known as dramatic *monologue, though he insists that the dramatic *persona is merely a mask for the poet; in this way, he collapses dramatic monologue back into lyric. Eliot's interest in the dramatic and the impersonal is indicative of a larger transition "from lyrically expressive to dramatically objective norms for reading" consolidated by the *New Criticism, according to Tucker. The New Critics insisted on assuming "always that the speaker is someone other than the poet himself," even or esp. when reading lyric poetry. As Tucker observes, this attempt to move away from subjectivity actually reinforces it, precisely through the insistence on the orality of poetry: the emphasis on voice continues to invoke an isolated, "overheard" lyric subjectivity, now the speaker's rather than the poet's.

Tucker diagnoses this persistent tendency to think of poetry as oral and, therefore, rooted in the interior of a speaking subject who seeks to communicate with another as an "anxiety of textuality." It betrays the fear that the reader will be lost in a sea of unmotivated verbiage if he or she cannot organize reading experiences around a familiar model of individualized psychology: "What is poetry? Textuality a speaker owns." The insights of deconstruction, however, have made it increasingly impossible to overlook the *textuality of poetry, so that reading poems as if one were hearing them seems increasingly fantastical and inadequate. On the other hand, "the abysmal disfigurements of a deconstruction that would convert poetry's most beautiful illusion—the speaking presence—into a uniform textuality" is equally shortsighted.

The unsettling insights of deconstruction are articulated most compellingly in the work of Jacques Derrida, whose formulations inaugurated a new strain of lit. crit. that seeks to disrupt and show the limits of the oral/aural understanding of poetic textuality. In Of Grammatology (1967, trans. into Eng. 1976), Derrida decries the tyranny of voice that underpins and justifies an ethnocentrism rooted in what he calls "logocentrism." Logocentrism "is also a phonocentrism: absolute proximity of voice and being, of voice and the meaning of being, of voice and the ideality of meaning." He reads the Western philosophical trad., from Aristotle to Jean-Jacques Rousseau to Ferdinand de Saussure, as profoundly privileging the spoken word, which, in turn, privileges self-presence. The mind communing with itself speaks a kind of interior, universal lang. that vocal expression most closely approximates. For Derrida, this is the founding principle of metaphysics, which dichotomizes body and soul or spirit, presence and absence, speaking and writing. Writing in this system is derivative and discredited, a copy of a copy, "mediation of mediation"; it signifies "a fall into the exteriority of meaning." Its signs are arbitrary and bear no enchanted proximity to the inner workings of the mind. In the beginning was the spoken word, and it brought a worldview into being that Derrida seeks to overturn. His proposed grammatology, as opposed to *linguistics, which operates according to the vocal privilege, would be a way to begin to interrogate and dismantle the tyranny of voice.

Focusing a deconstructive lens on poetry (and esp. Charles Baudelaire's poetry) in "Anthropomorphism and Trope in Lyric" (1984), Paul de Man condemns the tendency to read voice into lyric as "delusional." That delusion emerges from a "terror" of modernity and a retreat into escapist nostalgia: terror calls lyric voice into being. Lyric reading practices that hear voices where there are only words anthropomorphize at their own peril (though de Man never specifies what precisely the danger is).

Critics after Derrida and de Man, for the most part, begin from two mutually incompatible premises: either they continue to assert that hearing voices in poetry is not delusional but rather an integral component of that literary experience, or they seek ways to grant the written or textual qualities of poetry a power independent of, or at least not subordinated within, an oral/aural framework. An example of the former approach is William Waters's sophisticated treatment of vocal and sensual metaphor in his study of *apostrophe, Poetry's Touch (2003). Acknowledging that writing cannot literally speak or touch, Waters nonetheless goes on to explore a persistent tendency of poetry to try to speak and gesture beyond the limits of the word, to communicate physically in a disembodied medium. Susan Stewart, in Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002), also acknowledges the fictive and sometimes clichéd deployment of vocal metaphors in the study and practice of poetry; nevertheless, she offers a valuable exploration of why we love certain voices and how poetry serves as a vehicle for the beloved voice. That voice is not singular, even though it emerges from an individual; it is imprinted by other voices, possessed by the hist. of those voices that have been heard by the speaker. Our voices carry and are composed of the voices of others. Poetry is the medium for these possessed voices.

The critical work that questions rather than embraces the oral/aural framework for reading poetry often draws on media hist., thinking through the ways technologies that transmit the word, written or spoken, might change the ways that people think, speak, and write. Because there were powerful media revolutions in the Ren. and the 19th c., much of this work is grounded in those periods—for instance, Mazzio's argument that the Ren. voice does not always coincide with eloquence and Griffiths's exploration of the written, textual, and specifically "printed" properties of the Victorian poetic voice.

See ADDRESS, DRAMATIC POETRY, EXPRESSION, ORAL POETRY.

■ T. S. Eliot, On Poetry and Poets (1957); F. Berry, Poetry and the Physical Voice (1962); W. J. Ong, The Barbarian Within (1962); M. M. Bakhtin, The Dialogic Imagination, ed. M. Holquist, trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist (1981); W. R. Johnson, The Idea of Lyric (1982); G. Genette, Narrative Discourse, trans. J. E. Lewin (1983); P. de Man, The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984); H. Tucker, "Dramatic Monologue and the Overhearing of Lyric," Lyric Poetry: Beyond New Criticism, ed. C. Hošek and P. Parker (1985); J. Goldberg, Voice Terminal Echo: Postmodernism and English Renaissance Texts (1986); E. Havelock, The Muse Learns to Write: Reflections on Orality and Literacy from Antiquity to the Present (1986); E. Griffiths, The Printed Voice of Victorian Poetry (1989); F. A. Kittler, Discourse Networks 1800/1900, trans. M. Metteer (1990); P. Zumthor, Oral Poetry, trans. K. Murphy-Judy (1990); B. R. Smith, The Acoustic World of Early Modern England (1999); Y. Prins, "Voice Inverse," VP 42 (2004); C. Mazzio, The Inarticulate Renaissance (2008); J. A. Peraino, Giving Voice to Love: Song and Self-Expression from the Troubadours to Guillaume de Machaut (2011).

E. RICHARDS

VOLTA, volte (It., "turn"). A musical and prosodic term for a turn, particularly the transition point between the *octave and *sestet of the *sonnet, which, in its It. form, usually rhymes abbaabba cdecde: the volta is significant because both the particular rhymes unifying the two quatrains of the octave and also the *envelope scheme are abandoned simultaneously, regardless of whether this break is further reinforced syntactically by a full stop at the end of the octave (though usually it is), creating a decisive "turn in thought." By extension, the term is applied to the gap or break at line nine of any sonnet type, though in the Shakespearean form, e.g., the type of rhyming (*cross rhyme) is not abandoned at that point.

T.V.F. BROGAN

VORTICISM. Vorticism was an Eng. avant-garde movement in the visual arts, primarily sculpture and painting. It is also important to literary modernism because of the guiding roles of Ezra Pound and Wyndham Lewis. Vorticism's literary corpus is small (largely restricted to the short-lived journal Blast, 1914–15), but the documents and debates surrounding the movement's brief flourishing remain historically significant. Given the general absence of other *manifesto-based groups in Eng. literary modernism, vorticism's direct engagement with *cubism, *expressionism, and, above all, *futurism provides a valuable record of Eng. modernism's relationship to the aesthetic practices and key ideas of the international avant-garde. Like these avant-gardes, vorticism explicitly explores the relationship between modernity in lit. and in the other arts, thus contributing to Eng.-lang. modernist aesthetics more generally. Because of Pound's and Lewis's extensive connections, other major modernists who were not themselves vorticists (e.g., F. M. Ford, T. S. Eliot, Rebecca West, and T. E. Hulme) are linked to the movement either historically or in subsequent crit.

The vorticist aesthetic seeks a charged synthesis of dynamism and stasis. In the visual arts, this involved a critique of both cubism's alleged stasis and of the futurist worship of speed and motion. In lit., this meant an effort to move beyond the static character of the image that now, for Pound, defined the imagist movement with which he had previously been associated (see IMAGISM). Pound describes the vortex as "a radiant node or cluster . . . from which, and through which, and into which ideas are constantly rushing." Poetic vorticism's program combined epigrammatic intensity with dynamism and movement; thus, it concisely formulates a central problem of modernist poetics.

The movement's politics remain a subject of controversy. Long held to be close in spirit and style to It. futurism, vorticism's violent rhet. often reinforces this interpretation, as do the later sympathies of both Lewis and Pound for radical right-wing politics. Particularly with Lewis, however, vorticist aggression is often mixed with humor and elements of self-critique largely lacking in futurism, to say nothing of fascism. Similarly, while vorticism does self-consciously represent a style specific to the machine age and its wars, it cannot be said to offer a straightforward celebration.

See AVANT-GARDE POETICS, MODERNISM.

■ BLAST 1–2 (1914–15, rpt. 1982); E. Pound, Gaudier–Brzeska: A Memoir (1916); W. Lewis, Wyndham Lewis on Art, ed. W. Michel and C. J. Fox (1969); H. Kenner, The Pound Era (1971); W. C. Wees, Vorticism and the English Avant-Garde (1972); F. Jameson, Fables of Aggression (1979); E. Pound and W. Lewis, Pound/Lewis, ed. T. Materer (1985)—letters; R. W. Dasenbrock, The Literary Vorticism of Ezra Pound and Wyndham Lewis (1985); M. Perloff, The Futurist Moment (1987); P. Peppis, Literature, Politics, and the English Avant-Garde (2000).

C. BUSH

W

WAKA. Waka, also referred to at times as yamato uta (Japanese verse) or simply uta (verse), is the oldest form of poetry in continuous use in Japan. The term is often taken to mean cl. poetry in Japanese, in distinction from poetry written in Chinese (kanshi; see CHINESE POETRY IN JAPAN). In this broad sense, waka encompass four of the earliest Japanese verse forms: chōka, tanka, sedōka, and bussokuseki-ka. Of these, only chōka (long verse) and tanka (short verse) survived past the 8th c. Although the chōka were used sporadically after this point, the overwhelming majority of waka were tanka, consisting of 31 syllables in five measures, with occasional allowance for additional syllables (ji-amari) or fewer (ji-tarazu) in each measure. This entry uses the narrowest definition of waka as tanka composed from the 8th c., when they first appear in texts, until the onset of westernization in the mid-19th c.

Early waka were exchanged between members of the court at banquets and royal rituals, as well as in more informal settings. By the 10th c., they had also become a means for legitimating political power through poetry matches (uta-awase) and anthols. By the end of the 12th c., waka had become a cl. lang. acquired through the formal study of archaic texts. Proficiency in this highly codified lang. was dependent on instruction by hereditary households of aristocratic poet-scholars. Competition between these households and educated commoners in the 17th c. stimulated growth in the fields of poetics and philology, culminating in the devel. of kokugaku (natavist learning), which viewed the earliest waka poetry as the expression of an eternal Japanese sensibility uncontaminated by continental culture.

In fact, waka's distinctive prosody arose from a complex interplay between the cl. East Asian ideal of symmetry on the one hand and a desire for its complementary opposite in the form of an asymmetric (and therefore indigenous) structure on the other. The pentasyllabic and heptasyllabic measures common to all waka were derived from shi* poetry. Unlike its Chinese counterpart, however, which amplified its trademark *parallelisms by consistently using one measure in any given verse, each waka poem alternated in an irregular pattern of 5-7-5-7-7 between both measures. At the same time, waka often reflected the yin-yang binary structures informing traditional East Asian notions of self, society, and the world. In particular poems, this binary could take the shape of a dialogue between two parties, a question and answer, or a sentence split by a concessive, causal, or hypothetical construction. Just like shi poems, in which the basic unit of meaning was the couplet, waka often consisted of an "upper line" (kami no ku) in the first three measures and a "lower line" (shimo no ku) in the last two. This tendency toward a binary structure spurred on the devel. of renga* ("linked verse"), in which the upper and lower lines of a waka became separate poems.

One reason for waka's ubiquity in Japanese court culture was its inherent interconnectedness with other texts and media. The word first appears in Man'yōshū poem prefaces, where it refers to verses that responded to earlier ones. Many of the earliest 31-syllable verses in that anthol. are hanka (envoi verses) that capped a longer chōka in the same manner as shorter Chinese poems might follow a lengthy fu* (prose rhapsody). By the end of the 8th c., prefaces written in literary Chinese replaced chōka, initiating a trad. of narrative contextualization that would drive waka's subsequent hist. Henceforth, waka would accompany prose passages that ranged in size from terse notes on a poem's topic in an anthol. to extended narratives in vernacular tales (monogatari) and memoirs (nikki; see JAPANESE POETIC DIARIES).

Even after the word waka came to mean primarily "Japanese verse," it continued to operate on some level as a response to a particular topic and social context, fictional or otherwise. The dialogic aspect of waka extended to its relations with other media: poems were often paired with shi couplets, decorated paper, paintings, plants, or dioramas. In their most common textual forms, waka were also typically paired with other waka. Careful integration of poems into associative and progressive sequences meant that any individual verse gained significance in relation to preceding ones. These sequencing techniques spurred on the devel. of elaborately organized imperial anthols. like the Kokinshū and Shinkokinshū, as well as tightly integrated, miniaturized versions known as hyakushu (hundred-verse sequences). Poetry collections also contributed to the categorization of poems according to particular seasonal, social, and religious topics (dai), each of which possessed a tightly defined set of connotations.

As a form of uta (song), waka were often recited with melodic flourishes and rhythmic pauses. *Euphony can be inferred in some poems from their arrangement of consonants and vowels into recognizable patterns. Canonical poetics, however, usually criticized the phonetic repetitions associated with rhyme and assonance. Instead, waka prosody has focused on syllabic meter (see SYLLABIC VERSE). Unlike traditional forms of Eng. meter, each syllable in a waka is given equal stress as a distinct *mora. The resulting metronome beat may explain why the chief verb for composition (yomu) also denoted counting and percussive rhythm. Metrical rhythm in waka is conventionally determined by the placement of the *caesura at different points between the poem's five measures. The earliest waka favor a tripartite structure using a 5-7 rhythm, with the caesura after the second and fourth measures (5-7, 5-7, 7) or after the second and third ones (5-7, 5, 7-7). From the 9th c., a 7-5 rhythm became increasingly common, with the caesura at the first and third measures (5, 7-5, 7-7) or, esp. in later waka, only after the third measure (5-7-5, 7-7). Individual letters in written poems could also make up *acrostics (oriku), *palindromes (kaimon), and elaborate kutsu-kamuri (shoe-and-cap) configurations, in which the first and last letters in a group of poems made up other poems. Such forms of word play often ignored the distinctions between voiced and unvoiced consonants observed in mod. Japanese orthography.

The rhetorical devel. of waka can be charted through the shifting emphasis placed on kokoro (mind) and mono (things). These two elements corresponded to distinct grammatical registers as well as phenomenological ones. Kokoro referred to emotions, sensations, perceptions, reasoning, and actions. In the agglutinative structure of Japanese, it was conveyed through verbs and adjectives that inflected to indicate tense, aspect, and mood. Mono, on the other hand, were concrete nouns indicating phenomena apprehended by the senses in the external world. Initially, emphasis was laid on mono, which were often sweeping depictions of landscapes whose epithet-laden names functioned as *synecdoches encapsulating mythic narratives and regional trads. By the 9th c., poetic depictions of landscape had become more generic, as they shifted focus inward toward the paintings and gardens of aristocratic urban mansions. During this period, kokoro came to occupy a growing proportion of the poem, and the vocabulary for expressing it expanded significantly. Greater emphasis on kokoro led in turn to greater interest in its narrative contextualization in tales and memoirs. By the 12th c., however, there was a growing countermovement away from kokoro and toward more noun-heavy poems, in which every object was infused with emotions through its intertextual links to earlier poems and narratives. Further innovations in the 13th c. involved strictly segregating mono and kokoro content into separate poems, which were then scrutinized through the lens of minute temporal or spatial distinctions.

Many waka tropes consist of different methods for configuring the mono and kokoro elements in a poem. Early verses typically opened with a poetic toponym (utamakura), preceded by a five-syllable epithet (makurakotoba) or embedded in a larger prefatory phrase (jokotoba). At the end would come a relatively brief and conventional expression of kokoro. In such cases, scene and sentiment could be linked by implicit metaphor, metonymy, or sound repetition. The most distinctive means of binding mono to kokoro were kakekotoba (pivot words), a form of *zeugma in which a cluster of syllables simultaneously signified both elements. Because kakekotoba also pivoted between separate syntactic registers, they could splice together distinct sentences with maximum economy. A related form of rhet. was mitate (double vision) in which objects that were normally temporally or spatially discrete overlapped visually. In the 12th c., the consolidation of waka as a written trad., along with heightened interest in using intertextuality to infuse landscape scenes with human sentiments, led to the codification of such techniques as honkadori (literally "taking from an original poem") and honzetsu (allusion to a cl. prose narrative). Another rhetorical figure, engo (linked words), studded related lexemes throughout a poem, creating metonymic connections that crosscut syntactic divisions. The devel. of engo in turn contributed to such med. literary forms as renga poetry and nō* drama. Taken as a whole, waka tropes influenced virtually every other vernacular literary genre in premod. Japan.

Within the court society that claimed it as its own distinctive lang., diction and social decorum defined waka as much as its formal prosody. In many ways, the brevity of waka offers an extreme example of the general predisposition in Japanese toward heavily context-dependent utterances. Unlike their prose equivalents, however, waka even omitted the honorifics through which addresser and addressee were traditionally specified. Coupled with the lang.'s general tendency to omit grammatical number, person, and gender, this meant that any given poem could accommodate multiple speakers and contexts irrespective of gender or social status. The resulting semantic fluidity allowed waka to function as a common lang. binding together an otherwise intensely hierarchical court community through the expression of sentiments regulated by a sense of decorum that was finely attuned to seasonal and social rhythms.

At the same time, lexical restrictions in waka increasingly came to distinguish the court community from other social groups. By the 11th c., utakotoba (poetic diction) was limited to the roughly 2,000 words used in the first three imperial anthols. Subsequent poetry matches and collections adjudicated disputes over the precise boundaries of this lexicon, which expanded incrementally over time, esp. when waka interacted with the informal renga poetry adopted by townspeople and warriors in the 15th c. Beginning in the 17th c., these commoners also developed a parodic form of waka, known as kyōka (mad verse), which inverted distinctions between utakotoba and contemp. forms of lang. Unlike its "unorthodox" (haikai*) partner, which used bodily functions and popular culture as comic material, courtly waka strove to be "serious" (ushin), avoiding most Chinese loan-words, colloquial syntax, and inelegant diction in the process. The chief source for innovation was the Man'yōshū, whose antiquity guaranteed its legitimacy. With the introduction of Western lit. crit. at the end of the 19th c., traditional diction was repudiated wholesale, and waka were reincarnated as mod. tanka (see JAPAN, MODERN POETRY OF).

The narrow strictures on meter, diction, and decorum that governed the composition of waka for over a millennium endowed it with ritual qualities. Throughout premod. Japanese hist., waka were seen as a suprahuman form of lang. shared with native spirits and Buddhist deities. Supernatural beings could address mortals in verse, and humans could use poems to entreat them in turn. Insofar as the court aristocracy in general (and members of the imperial family in particular) claimed divine descent, they too were often the subject of waka. Perhaps the prime examples of waka's sacral authority are the imperial anthols. that were compiled between the 10th and 15th cs. to legitimate the court's leaders. From a mod. critical perspective that values intensely individual or innovative forms of expression, such qualities have sometimes made waka seem little more than a fossilized art form for most of its long history. Regardless, they have also enabled it to play a distinguished role in articulating both aesthetic values and notions of community in Japan right up to the present, when tanka are composed at the imperial palace on New Year's Day.

See JAPANESE POETICS, KOKINSHŪ, MAN'YŌSHŪ, SHINKOKINSHŪ.

■ Anthologies and Translations: Nihon kagaku taikei (Japanese Poetics Series), 13 v. (1956–64); Shinpen kokka taikan (New Compendium of Japanese Poetry), 10 v. in 20 (1983–92); Waiting for the Wind, trans. and intro. S. Carter (1989); An Anthology of Traditional Japanese Poetry Competitions, comp. and trans. S. Ito (1991); A Waka Anthology, trans. E. Cranston, 2 v. (1993, 2006); Traditional Japanese Poetry, trans. and intro. S. Carter (1993).

■ Criticism and History: A. Waley, Japanese Poetry (1919, rpt. 1976); J. Konishi, "Association and Progression," HJAS 21 (1958); R. Brower and E. Miner, Japanese Court Poetry (1961); P. Harries, "Personal Poetry Collections," Monumenta Nipponica 35.3 (1980); S. Carter, "Waka in the Age of Renga," Monumenta Nipponica 36.4 (1981); S. Ito, "The Muse in Competition," Monumenta Nipponica 37.7 (1982); H. McCullough, Brocade by Night (1985); M. Morris, "Waka and Form, Waka and History," HJAS 46.2 (1986); H. Sato and B. Watson, From the Country of Eight Islands (1987); R. Huey, Kyōgoku Tamekane (1989); S. Hideo, Kodai waka shiron (A History of Early Waka, 1990); E. Miner, "Waka," HJAS 50.2 (1990); P. Nosco, Remembering Paradise (1990); J. Mostow, Pictures of the Heart (1996); E. Kamens, Utamakura, Allusion, and Intertextuality in Traditional Japanese Poetry (1997); R. Thomas, "Macroscopic vs. Microscopic," HJAS 58 (1998); K. Kawamoto, The Poetics of Japanese Verse (2000); T. LaMarre, Uncovering Heian Japan (2000); R. Huey, The Making of Shinkokinshū (2002); S. Carter, Householders (2007); G. Heldt, The Pursuit of Harmony (2008).

G. HELDT

WAR POETRY

I. Early Period
II. Middle Period
III. Modern Period

I. Early Period. War poetry, incl. depictions of battle, celebrations of victory, lamentations over defeat and captivity, and meditations on confronting death, has existed since the birth of lit. Although what binds an army has always been a concern, in early lit. poets probed the loyalty of men dominated by a vertical rather than a lateral or fraternal relation, usually expressed as the bond of the fighter to his ruler or ruling deity. In the Heb. Ps. 44:5, written sometime between the 10th and the 6th cs. BCE, the psalmist cried out to his God, "Through thee will we push down our enemies: through thy name will we tread them under that rise up against us." In the Sanskrit Bhagavad-Gitā of the 1st c. BCE, Arjuna labors to serve Krishna. Even as the epic opens with his exclamation about facing an imminent civil war, "I see no good in killing my kinsmen in battle," Arjuna closes in exalted obedience to Krishna and enters battle with unquestioning devotion toward the divine source of his strength and in serene defiance of death. While loyalties to multiple and quarreling deities are subject to destructive fraternal pressure in Homer's 8th-c. BCE epic, the Iliad, the fidelity to hierarchical authority is similar: petty, vindictive, or unjust as the Gr. gods may seem, they shape the hero's destiny, and war remains the necessary platform of that destiny.

But in this long period of fatalistic acceptances, ancient texts looked clearly enough at war's tragic consequences to suggest their resistance to war as masculine fate and human inevitability. The 12th-c. BCE Hebrew text of the song of Deborah and Barak in Judg. 5 offers striking views of women that deny the customary all-male cast of warfare. A male sensibility more typically owns the emotional field of the 10th-c. Anglo-Saxon "The Battle of Maldon," in which a grim exaltation rules the performance of right action: "When the shield breaks, the corselet sings a terrible song." The Maldon poet describes a battlefield loyalty and bravery in which an amor fati binds men; there is a joy in dying "by the side of my lord, by the man so dearly loved." In a variant of that intense love of men for men, the possibly preexilic lamentation of David for the deaths of Saul and Jonathan in 2 Sam. 1:25–26 offers another time-melting flash: "O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places . . . thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women." But in the Trojan Women, the 5th-c. BCE Gr. dramatist Euripides shifts the coverage of grief away from the familiar battle glory and extends it to war's devastating impact on civilians. Other early fragments from Gr. poets, such as the 7th-c. BCE poet Archilochus, subvert the authority of heroic bonding and anticipate further antiheroic themes. Two 8th-c. Chinese poems, Tu Fu's "Song of the War-Carts" and Li Po's "War South of the Great Wall," represent a remarkable devel. away from the detail-parched space of other war poems toward a world of weather, plants, and animals, one notably occupied by humble foot soldiers.

II. Middle Period. The next millennium of war poetry expanded in range and depth. Chaucer's 1386 prologue to the Canterbury Tales introduces the "verray parfit gentil knighte" who will lead us to the mythical world of the dueling protagonists of "The Knight's Tale." But the premise of warfare as the making and testing of masculine character is undercut by a persistently dry comic wit and by the ironies of a detailed survey of the glories of the temple of Mars in which Mars presides over a world of horrifyingly savage and discordant fatality. At some distance from Chaucer's fantastic realism, George Gascoigne in "The Fruites of Warre" (1575) urges the perspective of the warrior morally and physically bruised by conquest, pillage, and captivity. He laments bitterly: "Search all thy bookes, and thou shalt finde therein, / That honour is more harde to holde than winne." A larger, more nuanced version of war poetry occurs within William Shakespeare's tragedy Macbeth and in historical plays like Julius Caesar and the Henry cycle. In these plays, thickening details of circumstance and character signal a literary advance in which many-faceted portraits of men and women caught up in armed conflict stress more than battleground, siege, and skirmish. A set piece from Henry V (3.1.1–34) affirms traditional martial strengths and loyalties, yet this play puts an array of rogues into battle alongside its heroes, as Shakespeare details the cowardice and venal betrayal attending war with an angle of attention unknown to the Anglo-Saxon bards. Political intrigue and power control but do not obliterate the vivid selves of those trapped between love and honor in Antony and Cleopatra, while the aggressive, state-switching pursuit of death and glory in Coriolanus offers a sustained investigation of the ethical imagination of the military hero.

In the ensuing centuries, as nation-states arise from feudal communities, Eng. war poetry, still largely written by literate observers rather than principals, both decries and praises war. Cannon mouths and rifle barrels increasingly displace slings, arrows, and muskets, with a ramifying sense of national pride, as well as a thorough despair at war's waste. "I hate that drum's discordant sound," says John Scott of Amwell in 1782, "To me it talks of ravaged plains, / And burning towns and ruined swains, / And mangled limbs, and dying groans, / And widows' tears and orphans' moans[.]" The spectacle of Napoleonic warfare, prelude to the global wars that would sweep the 20th c., stirred poets across Europe. S. T. Coleridge in "Fears in Solitude" urges repentance for misguided violence. In 1812, the Am. poet Joel Barlow's "Advice to a Raven in Russia" tells "the black fool" who cannot tear flesh from the frozen corpses littering the retreat from Moscow to wait further afield: his class is the only one Napoleon will never disappoint. Heinrich Heine's "Die Grenadiere" takes from the same piled bodies evidence of heroic loyalty. By 1853, Victor Hugo's "L'Expiation" describes the snow-covered retreat this way: "On ne connaissant plus les chefs ni le drapeau. / Hier la grande armée, et maintenant troupeau" ("You can't make out officers or flag. / Yesterday the Grand Army, today a herd"). An even more appalled view of battle suffuses Thomas Hardy's *The Dynasts (*1903–7). Confronting the devastation wrought at Waterloo, Hardy's "Spirit Ironic" cries out: "Warfare mere, / Plied by the Managed for the Managers." A centuries-old contempt for the common soldier (termed the "scum of the earth" by the Duke of Wellington) gradually yielded to concern for wounded soldiers and their after-service lives, prompting poems like E. B. Browning's "The Forced Recruit." Arthur Rimbaud's "Le Dormeur du Val" offers an even starker image of hapless innocence. In 1865, Am. war poetry came of age with the color and high tenderness of Walt Whitman's Drum-Taps. A year later, Herman Melville in "A Utilitarian View of the Monitor's Fight" presciently saw how the increasing mechanization of war nullifies the individual's code of honor—a motif of increasing importance in subsequent decades.

III. Modern Period. From the Khyber Hills to Ypres, Rudyard Kipling's thumping rhyme, unforgiving of weak command but committed to imperial conquest, urged the dignity of the common soldier. Poets of World War I moved even more markedly to write poetry from an egalitarian perspective. Still, in 1907, the erotic tinge of R. M. Rilke's nostalgia for aristocratic gallantry in poems like "Der Fahnenträger" ("The Flagbearer") and "Letzter Abend" ("The Last Evening") was followed by wildly popular poems espousing similar codes of honor and country by Rupert Brooke and Julian Grenfell, who died early in World War I. Staggered by mass casualties, medics like Georg Trakl, writing in Ger., and Giuseppe Ungaretti, in It., emphasized instead the mechanized butchery, as did soldier-poets like Wilfred Owen, Siegfried Sassoon, and Isaac Rosenberg. Occasionally, as these poets let glory fade from the generals, a kind of haggard reverse glory enfolded the lower ranks. Edmund Blunden, Robert Graves, Rosenberg, Owen, and Sassoon all register how the old disciplinary order needed to stiffen a conscript army broke down in the bloody stalemate of trench warfare. Machine-gun fire had supplanted the cavalry rush of Alfred, Lord Tennyson's "The Charge of the Light Brigade," and a paternalistic vertical loyalty receded before the lateral strength of the fraternal bond between soldiers, a bond strengthened by the perceived incomprehension of the home front. In "Dulce et Decorum Est," Wilfred Owen says that if a home-front supporter had seen a gas attack, "you would not tell with such high zest / To children ardent for some desperate glory, / The old Lie: Dulce et decorum est / Pro patria mori." Owen remained ambivalent about pacifism but returned to action and to poems portraying the numbing brutality that emerges from "the cess of war." Rosenberg and Owen were killed in action. Sassoon, after having his objections to the war's conduct read aloud in the House of Commons, rejoined his regiment, was wounded, and continued to write antiwar poems like "On Passing the New Menin Gate"; eventually, he advocated armed resistance against Nazism. In the decades succeeding 1914–18, Owen and Sassoon came to stand as the preeminent voices of antiwar feeling.

In "Spain 1937," W. H. Auden supported the Sp. loyalists but still saw "The conscious acceptance of guilt in the necessary murder[.]" Auden begins "September 1, 1939" by saying, "I sit . . . Uncertain and afraid / As the clever hopes expire / Of a low dishonest decade"; yet at poem's end, the speaker, "Beleaguered by . . . Negation and despair" must "Show an affirming flame." War guilt continued to travel in a direct line from hapless soldiers to impotent or war-mongering civilians, while the poets who succeeded Auden—Keith Douglas, Alun

Lewis, Henry Reed, and Roy Fuller—were burdened by a sense of belatedness. Soldier-poets moved faster across a wider geographical canvas and, unlike their World War I predecessors, shared with the civilian an overview of war by means of the ubiquitous camera. R. N. Currey remarked, "This is a civilization in which a man, too squeamish to empty a slop pail or skin a rabbit, can press a button that exposes the entrails of cities." In World War II, poets moved from the gaunt, mud-splattered soldiers of the trenches in World War I to survey scenes that the Czech poet Jaroslav Seifert described in "Never Again" as "A hundred houses . . . in ruins, / nearly a thousand . . . damaged / by aerial bombs" (trans. Ewald Osers).

Immense changes in war poetry had occurred when the professional soldier gave way to the literate conscript or volunteer. War poets not only introduced fresh meditations on the abrupt transit of living flesh to dead matter in tune with a prior generation's fixation on the crisis of mutability but turned more conspicuously to the ethics of killing. Terms like antiwar poetry should be used with care, since the frightfulness of war may be told as fully by those committed to violent resolution of conflict as by those opposed to it; yet poets have undeniably moved from the glory of killing to the glory of being killed and then to the doubt and shame of killing, the latter articulated in poems like Keith Douglas's "How to Kill" and Herbert Read's "The Happy Warrior," which updated William Wordsworth's poem of the same name. The novelty of an antiheroic verse may have lessened after World War I; but as the end of World War II merged seamlessly into the cold war, the contours defining war as heroic business, or its outcome as definitive victory or defeat, continued to crumble. In poems like Howard Nemerov's "Redeployment," Am. war poets resisted the training of soldiers into machines for perpetual war. Randall Jarrell turned the misery of the ball turret gunner in a bomber's crew into passive infantilism; "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner" begins: "From my mother's womb I fell into the State, / And I hunched in its belly till my wet fur froze." It ends, "When I died they washed me out of the turret with a hose."

When war poets registered how technology was expanding the work of war into civilian factories and rear-echelon administration, refugees, forced labor, war prisoners, and concentration camp inmates began to displace battle as subjects. War poems gave way to poems about resistance and occupation, and lines between civilians and combatants blurred, as in the work of Polish poets Tadeusz Różewicz and Zbigniew Herbert. Anna Akhmatova's Requiem details the agony of Stalinist war, while in 1946, the searing poems of the Hungarian Holocaust victim Miklós Radnóti were unearthed at a newly exposed burial site. Postwar poems by Lee Roripaugh and Lawson Inada describe victims of the atom bomb and consider the lives of interned Japanese Americans. 20th-c. war poets explore psychological injury: James Dickey's "The Firebombing," about Am. use of napalm over Japan, showed the toll of aerial attacks on civilian and pilot. The Vietnam War, like the Korean War, sparked many poems about aftermath by refugees who in the postwar period settled in the U.S.

In the wake of both Asian wars, many Am. soldier-poets began to see the soldier not simply as victim but as perpetrator of war's atrocities. In the 1972 anthol. of poems from the Vietnam War, Winning Hearts and Minds, ed. Larry Rottmann, Jan Barry, and Basil Paquet wrote, "What distinguishes the voices in this volume is their active identification of themselves as agents of pain and war—as 'agent-victims' of their own atrocities." Many poems by combat veterans like Bruce Weigl, Yusef Komunyakaa, W. D. Ehrhart, and Doug Anderson bear out this conclusion. Civilian protests by W. S. Merwin, Robert Bly, Denise Levertov, Hayden Carruth, and Galway Kinnell convey a national sense of shame and political impotence. Most of these poems mined colloquial and official diction for satiric effect and experimented with narrative technique from cinema and prose fiction. Prompted by the era's personal candor and increased awareness of the mental disorders bred by war, Vietnam War poetry included friendly fire, civilian casualties, and sexual relations. Yet the brotherhood of soldiers still preoccupied these poets, even when that bond was negatively inflected by class, race, and nation.

As global politics changed the nature, mobility, and visibility of war waged in countries such as Nicaragua, Bosnia, and Iraq, poems like Adrienne Rich's "The School among the Ruins" tell what happens to children, as teachers "sang them to naps told stories [and] washed human debris off boots and coats[.]" As the boundaries between home and battle front eroded, as gender assignments loosened, and as the cold war moved America and its allies into an endless war alert, war poetry absorbed these factors into its aesthetic. In Klaonica, Poems for Bosnia (1993), the Eng. poet Jon Silkin writes, "We, bitter heat-seeking / animals must make conscience. But touching / whose pain?" In the spreading wars of the 20th and 21st cs., civilians, soldiers, and men and women of all ethnic groups now readily blend their urge to witness into journalism, memoir, and fiction, as well as poetry. But as total war and ceaseless low-intensity imperial conflict have pitched the balance of suffering overwhelmingly toward civilians, war poetry, too, springs from ever-more diverse sites and circumstances.

■ Anthologies: The War Poets, ed. O. Williams (1945); Winning Hearts and Minds, ed. L. Rottmann, J. Barry, and B. Paquet (1972); R. N. Currey, Poets of the 1939–1945 War (1960); The Penguin Book of First World War Poetry, ed. J. Silkin (1981); The Oxford Book of War Poetry, ed. J. Stallworthy (1984, 1987); Carrying the Darkness, ed. W. D. Ehrhart (1989)—the Vietnam War; Holocaust Poetry, ed. H. Schiff (1995); The Faber Book of War Poetry, ed. K. Baker (1996); Poetry of the Second World War, ed. D. Graham (1998); The Wound and the Dream, ed. C. Nelson (2002)—the Spanish Civil War*; Poets against the War*, ed. S. Hamill (2003); Poets of World War II, ed. H. Shapiro (2003); 101 Poems against War, ed. P. Keegan and M. Hollis (2003); Amer- ican War Poetry, ed. L. Goldensohn (2004); Poems of the Second World War, ed. H. Haughton (2004); Poets of the Civil War, ed. J. D. McClatchy (2005).

■ Criticism and History: P. Fussell, The Great War and Modern Memory (1975); V. Scannell, Not Without Glory (1976)—poets and WWII; E. Longley, Poetry in the Wars (1986); S. Schweik, A Gulf So Deeply Cut (1991)—women poets and WWII; M. Bibby, Hearts and Minds (1996)—Vietnam era; S. Chatterji, Memories of a Lost War (2001)—Vietnam era; L. Goldensohn, Dismantling Glory (2003)—soldiers in the 20th c.; The Oxford Handbook of British and Irish War Poetry, ed. T. Kendall (2007); J. A. Winn, The Poetry of War (2008).

L. Goldensohn

WARTBURGKRIEG (Ger., "Wartburg contest," Sängerkrieg, "minstrel's contest"). A corpus of strophic poems dating between the 13th and 15th cs. that treat a *poetic contest supposedly held at the castle Wartburg by the Count Hermann I of Thuringia in the early 13th c. Johannes Rothe designated the term as a collective title in the 15th c. It is misleading because the castle is not necessarily the scene of events in all cases (see Weigelt). The Wartburgkrieg occurs in two different Töne (a Ton being a verse form together with its melody): the Thüringer-Fürsten-Ton and the Schwarzer Ton (see GERMANIC PROSODY, MEISTERSINGER). The participants in the contest involve poets known from other sources as composers of Minnesang* and Sangspruch (political poetry) such as Walther von der Vogelweide, Wolfram von Eschenbach, and fictional figures such as the necromancer Klingsor von Ungerlant derived from Wolfram's Parzival and various spirits. The loosely linked corpus of *strophes was composed in different stages over time, and the earliest ms. dates from around 1300. The corpus is transmitted in three mss., The Grosse Heidelberger (Manessische) Manuscript, the Jenaer Manuscript, and the Kolmarer Manuscript. The most important episodes of the contest date from the 13th c. The older account in Schwarzer Ton transmits the Rätselspiel (puzzle game) episode, in which a poetic duel takes place between Wolfram and the Hungarian sorcerer Klingsor. In the *riddle contest, Wolfram proves his pious learning against Klingsor's heathen knowledge by solving riddles with spiritual meaning. The Fürstenlob (praise of lords) episode in Thüringer-Fürsten-Ton treats a contest among six poets before Count Hermann and his wife: Heinrich von Ofterdingen, Walther von der Vogelweide, Biterolfe, Reinmar von Zweter, Wolfram von Eschenbach, and the Tugendhafte Schreiber. The poets compete on how best to sing praises of a prince, a set piece motif of Sangspruchdichtung, choosing different patrons for praise. Walther defeats Heinrich by a ruse, but the latter calls on Klingsor to arbitrate; this episode is regarded as a prequel to the Rätselspiel. Mod. interest in the Wartburgkrieg may be seen in Novalis's Heinrich von Ofterdingen (1802) and Richard Wagner's adaptation of the story for his opera Tannhäuser (1845). Moritz von Schwind's frescoes of the Wartburgkrieg on the occasion of the restoration of the Wartburg castle (1854–56) and the oil sketch by Karl Theodor von Piloty for his painting of the contest hanging in the Conference Room of the Bavarian State Parliament in Munich attest to the Wartburgkrieg as a Ger. cultural symbol.

See GERMAN POETRY.

■ Criticism and History: B. Wachinger, Sängerkrieg: Untersuchungen zur Spruchdichtung des 13. Jahrhunderts (1973); H. Wolf, "Zum Wartburgkrieg: Uberlieferungsverhaltnisse, Inhalts-und Gestaltungswandel der Dichtersage," Festschrift für Walter Schlesinger, ed. H. Beumann et al. (1973); S. Weigelt, "Johannes Rothes Darstellung der Sage vom Sängerkrieg und ihre Quellen," Deutsche Sprache und Literatur in Mittelalter and früher Neuzeit, ed. H. Endermann and R. Bentzinger (1989); B. Wachinger, "Wartburgkrieg," Verfasserlexikon, ed. W. Stammler (1999); F. Wenzel, "Textkoharenz und Erzahlprinzip: Beobachtungen zu narrativen Sangspruchen an einem Beispiel aus dem 'Wartburgkrieg'-Komplex," Zeitschrift für Deutsche Philologie 124 (2005); B. Kellner and P. Strohschneider, "Poetik des Krieges: Eine Skizze zum Wartburgkrieg-Komplex," Das fremde Schöne: Dimensionen des Ästhetischen in der Literatur des Mittelalters, ed. M. Braun and C. Young (2007); A. Matthews, "Literary Lives in Medieval Germany: The Wartburg Song Contest in Three Hagiographical Narratives," Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 84 (2010).

■ Editions: Der Wartburgkrieg, ed. Karl Simrock (1858); Der Wartburgkrieg, ed. T.A. Rompelman (1939); Parodie and Polemik in mittelhochdeutscher Dichtung: 123 Texte von Kürenberg bis Frauenlob samt dem Wartburgkrieg nach der Großen Heidelberger Liederhandschrift C, ed. G. Schweikle (1986); Repertorium der Sangsprüche und Meisterlieder des 12. bis 18. Jahrhunderts, ed. H. Brunner and B. Wachinger (1986–)—list of mss. and details of strophe transmission.

M. Galvez

WELSH POETRY has a hist. spanning 15 centuries, from the odes of Taliesin and Aneirin to the odes of the poets who now compete for the chair every year at the Royal National *Eisteddfod of Wales. From Gildas's diatribe on the bards of Maelgwn, king of Gwynedd (d. ca. 547 CE), who used their gift to glorify their king rather than God, we can deduce that theirs was a trad., derived through the Celts from IE peoples, that accorded bards a special role in relation to their rulers because of the magical powers attributed to them. They were expected to call into being and to praise in those rulers the qualities most needed to fulfill their functions, esp. prowess and valor in battle. In short, bards were assigned a sacral role in the life of their people.

While the earliest known Welsh poetry is attributed to poets who flourished in the 6th c., the oldest surviving texts of these poems date from the 13th c., and these necessarily reflect a long hist. of oral transmission and adaptation by generations of reciters and scribes. Poetry composed from the beginning of the Welsh lang. to the end of the 11th c. is usually called Yr Hengerdd (the Old Song), and its composers are called Y Cynfeirdd (the Early Bards). Nennius's Historia Brittonum (9th c.) records the names of five 6th-c. Cynfeirdd: Talhaearn (known as Tad Awen, "Father of the Muse"), Neirin (or Aneirin), Taliesin, Blwchfardd, and Cian (known as Gwenith Gwawd, "Wheat of Song"). Of these, only two—Taliesin and Aneirin—have left works that survive to the present day. Most of the extant poetry written before the death of the last Welsh princes in 1282–83 is preserved in the Black Book of Carmarthen, The Book of Aneirin, The Book of Taliesin, The Hendregadredd Manuscript, and the Red Book of Hergest, ms. v. written between ca. 1250 and ca. 1400.

The Book of Taliesin, written in the first half of the 14th c., purports to contain the poems of Taliesin, but it is obvious from linguistic and thematic features that several of these works are of later date and relate to a different Taliesin: a legendary figure loosely connected with the 6th-c. poet, who, like Myrddin (Merlin), was credited with magical and prophetic powers by med. Welsh writers. While this mystical and mythological poetry represents a later accretion to the Taliesin corpus, there remains a core of twelve poems, mainly *panegyrics, that have been accepted by scholars as the work of the historical Taliesin. Most of these poems are addressed to Urien, who ruled ca. 575 over Rheged, a realm incl. parts of mod. Galloway and Cumbria.

The Book of Aneirin (ca. 1265) opens with the statement in Welsh, "This is the Gododdin. Aneirin sang it." The Gododdin, originally the name of a people in northeast England and southeast Scotland, is a long poem celebrating the bravery of a war band sent to recapture a stronghold from the English about the year 600 CE, although the date lacks any archaeological backing. The warriors fought and died almost to a man, gloriously but unsuccessfully. Aneirin eulogizes them for the most part individually, so that the poem comprises a series of elegies. The Book of Aneirin contains two versions of the Gododdin, one (the A text) roughly contemporaneous in lang. with the date of the ms., and the other (the B text) datable on ling. grounds to the 9th or 10th c.; both presumably derive from an older oral trad. that may extend back to the 7th c.

While these earliest works of the Cynfeirdd may have been composed outside Wales, there is a considerable degree of continuity between the poetic trad. of the Britons of southern Scotland and the Britons of Wales, which enabled the Welsh in later centuries to appropriate the poetry of Taliesin and Aneirin as their own. Like later Welsh verse, this poetry was sung to exalt the rulers on whose heroic qualities the survival of the people depended, and it used the same types of poetic embellishments: end rhyme to link lines and, within the line, the repetition of consonant or vowel sounds, a kind of incipient cynghanedd* (see ODL, RHYME). In any case, there is very little linguistically to distinguish the earliest poetry produced in Wales from that of ancient northern England and southern Scotland, since at such an early date the differences between the various Brit. dialects were not great.

By the middle of the 9th c., Powys, the kingdom adjoining Gwynedd in north Wales, was hard pressed by the Eng. Its struggle is reflected in the work of a bard or school of bards who composed series of linked englynion (see ENGLYN) woven round the 6th-c. figure of Llywarch Hen (Llywarch the Old) and the 7th-c. princess Heledd, sister of Cynddylan, prince of Powys. While the narrative voices in these poems are those of Llywarch and Heledd and the events recounted are set in the 6th and 7th cs., the works themselves date from a later period and reflect the emotions aroused by contemp. events on the borders of Powys. These poems are often referred to as the saga englynion, since it has been theorized that they represent verse passages extracted from longer prose epics—now lost—that told the tales of Llywarch and Heledd. Such examples of *prosimetra (prose tales with verse inserted at moments of strong emotion or heightened tension) are typical of early Ir. lit., but there is no clear evidence for the existence of comparable sagas in early Welsh lit., and the figures described in these englynion would likely have been familiar to 9th-c. poets and their audiences even if the poems were presented without an epic narrative framework.

The med. Welsh kingdoms found themselves in a state of endemic warfare not only against the Eng. but among themselves. Since they were slow to accept primogeniture inheritance, internecine dynastic feuds were frequent, and in their function as praise poets for the princes, Welsh bards could not fail to be propagandists. Some of them claimed powers of vision and prognostication; in times of dire distress, these took on the role of prophesying victory against the Eng. foe. The most remarkable Welsh prophetic poem, Armes Prydain (The Prophecy of Britain), composed about 930 CE, foretold that the Welsh would be joined by the Cornishmen, the Bretons, the Britons of Strathclyde, and the Irish, incl. the men of Dublin (the Danes), to overthrow the Eng. and banish them across the sea whence they had come. Although in the Welsh trad. the legendary Taliesin and the equally legendary Myrddin were the seers par excellence and as such were credited with many anonymous prophecies, internal evidence suggests that Armes Prydain was composed by a monk in one of the religious houses of south Wales. Vaticinatory poems appear throughout the Middle Ages and were esp. numerous in the form of cywyddau (pl. of cywydd*; sometimes referred to as cywyddau brud, prophetic cywyddau) during the Wars of the Roses.

At one time, it appeared that the Normans would conquer Wales as easily as they had conquered England, but the Welsh rallied and preserved their independence more or less intact until 1282–83. The national revival that secured the survival of the Welsh under their princes manifested itself also in a fresh flowering of poetry. The Beirdd y Tywysogion (the Poets of the Princes), sometimes called the Gogynfeirdd (the "not-so-early" bards, to distinguish them from their predecessors the Cynfeirdd) sang in much the same way Taliesin had sung, but they were not content simply to imitate their predecessors; they developed a much more complex poetic style and a more sophisticated system of cynghanedd, sometimes called cynghanedd rydd ("free" cynghanedd, to distinguish it from the codified cynghanedd gaeth or "strict" cynghanedd that the bards of the nobility later evolved). The meters of the traditional Welsh verse forms also became more fixed and regularly syllabic during this period. The increased attention paid to structure and ornament in the poetry of the Gogynfeirdd reflects the likelihood that they formed a kind of order in which the pencerdd, the master craftsman who had won his position in competition, taught one or more apprentices in a school of ars poetica. According to some accounts, the function of the pencerdd was to sing the praise of God and the king. Next in order of rank stood the bardd teulu, originally the bard of the king's household troops; apparently he was expected to sing to these troops before they set off for battle, but he could also be called to sing to the queen in her chamber. At the bottom of the scale and not accepted as full members of the poetic class were the cerddorion or "minstrels," also known as the clêr: low-class performers who lacked the bards' professional training and were sometimes criticized for their ribald or satirical verses.

Among the foremost of these Gogynfeirdd were Gwalchmai (ca. 1140–80), Cynddelw (ca. 1155–1200), Llywarch ap Llywelyn (ca. 1173–1220), and Dafydd Benfras (ca. 1220–57). Their range of themes was not large, and their poetry dazzles by the intricacies of its cynghanedd, the superb command of lang., and by the wealth of literary and historical references rather than by any great individuality of thought. If the Gogynfeirdd borrowed their themes and much of their technique from the Cynfeirdd, they succeeded by their ingenuity in elaborating the former and refining the latter, producing poems remarkable for their subtlety of expression. After the defeat of the Welsh princes who were their patrons, they were saved from extinction partly by the resilience of their guild, though mostly by patronage from the newly emergent nobility. It is thus appropriate that the Welsh poets after 1282 are known as the Poets of the Nobility, Beirdd yr Uchelwyr.

In the reorganization following 1282, Welsh society finally had to shed its heroic-age features: no wars were allowed, and martial prowess and valor ceased to have their old value. The poets as well as the nobility had to reassess their function, the former becoming more of a craft guild than an order. The cywydd deuair hirion superseded the various forms of awdl (ode; pl. awdlau) as the favorite meter, "strict" cynghanedd took the place of "free" cynghanedd, and entertaining the nobility became more important than exalting it. The effects of foreign influences were mediated mainly by the new religious orders and by a few clerici curiales, esp. Einion Offeiriad, whose "bardic grammar" sought not only to impose order on the practice of the poets but to give it a new intellectual framework. Einion's is the earliest extant attempt at a metrical analysis of Welsh poetry. His division of "meters" into the three categories of awdl, cywydd, and englyn—subject to the modifications by Dafydd ab Edmwnd, who in 1450 arranged the traditional "24 meters" of Welsh poetry into these three classes—remains a fundamental feature of "strict-meter" poetry to this day.

Dafydd ap Gwilym (fl. 1320–50) perhaps owes a great deal of his indisputable brilliance as a poet to the fact that he had inherited the poetic craft of the Gogynfeirdd and was able to adapt it to popularize the new poetic forms of the 14th c. He wrote awdlau in the old style, but by grafting the embellishments associated with them, the system of cynghanedd, on a lower-order verse form, the traethodl, he made the resulting cywydd deuair hirion into a meter that the new poets of the nobility took pride and delight in using and that won the favor and patronage of the nobility. Because of the popularity of the cywydd form in the 14th to 16th cs., Dafydd and his followers are collectively referred to as the Cywyddwyr (cywydd poets). Dafydd addressed cywyddau to his patron Ifor ap Llywelyn (fl. 1340–60), celebrating Ifor's generosity so much that he became renowned as Ifor Hael (the generous), henceforth the exemplar of all bardic patrons. But Dafydd's fame rests ultimately on his cywyddau to women and his masterly expression in them of his love of women and of nature.

Dafydd must have recited or sung these cywyddau to small audiences for their entertainment. One of his favorite strategies is to picture himself in a false or undignified situation, making himself the butt of his audience's laughter. Thus, he describes in a cywydd how one night in an inn he tried to make his way in the dark to the bed of a girl whose favor he had obtained by wining and dining her, only to strike his leg against a stool and his head against a trestle table, knocking over a huge brass pan in the process, and creating such a din that the household woke up and began to search for him as an intruder. It was only through the grace of the Lord Jesus and the intercession of the saints, he tells us, presumably with tongue in cheek, that he escaped detection, and he begs God for forgiveness. But Dafydd describes such situations with such wit, invention, verbal dexterity, and technical skill that one must conclude that the audience's enjoyment of the theme was secondary to its enjoyment of the expression and that the poet's extensive use of dyfalu* (hyperbolic metaphor), sangiadau (poetic asides), and other complex ornamentation presumes a high degree of literary appreciation on the part of his listeners.

It was inevitable that Dafydd ap Gwilym should set the stamp of his poetry on that of his younger contemporaries and immediate successors and that, once the shock of his originality and exuberance had been absorbed, the trad. should reassert itself, albeit in modified form. The poets retained their guild organization, their way of transmitting knowledge of the poetic craft, and sundry privileges. But they and their patrons had become aware of the world outside Wales—the influences of the Hundred Years' War must not be underestimated—and some at least had become conscious that the eulogies that Welsh poets produced for their patrons could be interpreted as sycophancy. A poet of strong conscience, such as Siôn Cent in the first quarter of the 15th c., could not fail to feel this tension, and his vivid pessimism and gloomy Weltanschauung made him condemn the traditional Welsh muse as deceitful and proclaim his own as the "true" or Christian muse. But Siôn Cent had few followers. The bardic institution was strong enough to withstand his influence, as well as the disastrous effects of the Owain Glyndŵr Rebellion and the Black Death.

Indeed, there is evidence that, contrary to expectation, Wales shared, albeit to a lesser extent, the prosperity that England enjoyed in the 15th c. The Black Death seems to have put greater wealth in the hands of fewer people, and the poets shared in the new prosperity of their patrons. The result is that the century 1435–1535, the grand siècle of Welsh poetry, is remarkable not only for its large number of poets but for the very high standard achieved by many of them. The poets were sufficiently self-confident to assemble in eisteddfodau—first in Carmarthen (about 1450) and then in Caerwys (1523)—to make improvements in the rules of meter and cynghanedd. Dafydd ab Edmwnd is the poet esp. associated with the first eisteddfod, and Tudur Aled with the second, but other great names are not lacking: Dafydd Nanmor, Guto'r Glyn, Lewis Glyn Cothi, and Gutun Owain. Such poets (and the work of many has survived) broadened the themes of praise to include the more domestic and civilized: dynastic marriages, well-built mansions with gardens, excellent table fare, and material as well as cultural wealth. Although Middle Welsh strict-meter poetry was almost exclusively a male domain, at least one female poet, Gwerful Mechain (fl. 1462–ca. 1500), left a significant corpus of verse and participated in ymrysonau (poetic debates, conducted in verse) with her male colleagues (see YMRYSON).

After 1282, perhaps the most important date for Welsh poetry is 1485, the year Henry VII acceded to the throne of England, though the implications of that event became apparent only gradually. Under the Tudor dynasty, the Welsh nobility found greater opportunities for advancement in England, so that many of them abandoned their role as patrons of the Welsh muse. And there were a number of others whose contact with the Reformation and the Ren. made them eager to bring their native culture into line with that of England and the continent. This meant that Welsh poets should abandon their guild organization, make the secrets of their craft accessible to the general public, and, more important still, assimilate the new learning proffered by the recently invented printing press, esp. knowledge of the art of rhet. Above all, a purpose other than praise, particularly unwarranted praise, had to be found for the Welsh muse.

Most of these points were raised in the famous ymryson farddol (poetic debate) of 1580–87 between Archdeacon Edmwnd Prys and the poet Wiliam Cynwal and in an open letter that Siôn Dafydd Rhys addressed to the poets in 1597. Some efforts were indeed made to help the Welsh poets adjust to the new circumstances: descriptions of the Welsh poetic art and handbooks of rhet. were published. Of special interest is the description of the poetic art published by Dr. Gruffydd Robert of Milan, a Roman Catholic in exile: he advocated a relaxing of the rules of "strict" cynghanedd and the adoption of the "free" accentual meters for epic poetry. But it was extremely difficult to abandon a poetic trad. and practice that had endured for a thousand years, and very few Welsh poets found it possible to take up the new learning. Deprived of patrons, the poets found themselves devoid of incentive either to teach or to learn the art that hitherto had been handed down from generation to generation. Grufydd Phylip of Ardudwy, who died in 1666, was the last of the "old" or professional poets. Henceforth their art was to be kept alive by amateurs drawn from the clergy or the ranks of the gentry. By the end of the first quarter of the 18th c., the old poetic trad. seemed dead.

In some mss. written after 1550, poems in free accentual meters began to appear side by side with poems in the strict (syllabic) meters. There is no reason to suppose that the free accentual meters had not previously been used; however, it would seem that they were not at first considered worthy enough to be copied into ms. collections with the more professional strict-meter poems. Their presence in increasing numbers implies that they were becoming more esteemed. It is usual to distinguish two kinds of free accentual meters, one old and native, the other new and borrowed, although some of the embellishments of the strict meters were added to both. The newly borrowed accentual meters were based on those of Eng. songs set to popular airs. There is, for instance, a Welsh ballad dated 1571 to be sung to the tune "Adew my Pretie Pussie." The practice of composing Welsh lyrics to musical airs, native and borrowed, continued throughout the 18th and 19th cs. and persists to this day.

In the quatrains of the hen benillion (literally, "old verses" or "old stanzas") that have been preserved orally and are sung to the accompaniment of the harp, we may find traces of a more indigenous trad. of Welsh verse in free meters. Sometimes several stanzas are strung together and deal with one theme, but generally the hen benillion consist of single verses. Some are strongly didactic, functioning as verse proverbs; most give expression to familiar feelings with varying degrees of literary artifice. Of anonymous authorship, they have been kept alive for their didactic and entertainment value and have been collected and preserved since the 16th c. The best-known collection is T. H. Parry-Williams's Hen Benillion (1940), and Glyn Jones has produced many fine Eng. trans. Dafydd Johnston notes that many of the hen benillion "project a female point of view" and suggests that this verse form may have provided an outlet for women poets excluded from the "male-dominated" world of Welsh strict-meter poetry.

Wales experienced two revivals in the 18th c.: one religious, the other literary. The religious or Methodist revival is important in the hist. of Welsh poetry, indirectly because it helped to extend literacy among the people by encouraging Bible reading and directly because it gave an impetus to the composition of hymns and hence to other kinds of poetry as well. William Williams, "Pantycelyn" (1717–91), wrote a long poem, Theomemphus, in which he describes the spiritual experiences of a soul caught up in the Methodist revival, as well as hundreds of hymns. Pantycelyn has every right to be regarded as the father of the mod. Welsh lyric. A later hymn-writer, Ann Griffiths (1776–1805), rivals him in the emotional intensity of her expression, if not in the extent of her poetic output. Unlike Pantycelyn, Griffiths never published any of her hymns during her lifetime, and most of her surviving work consists of verses reconstructed from memory by Ruth Evans, a maidservant who heard Ann sing them.

The literary revival is associated with the "Morrisian" circle, whose leading members—Lewis Morris (1701–65), Goronwy Owen (1723–69), and Evan Evans ("Ieuan Fardd," 1731–88)—were not only poets but scholars and, as such, drew much of their inspiration from the contemp. Eng. literary scene. The Ossianic productions of the Scot James Macpherson had stimulated general interest in the ancient popular lits., and the Morrisian circle was eager to demonstrate the antiquity of the Welsh poetic trad. Evans, their finest scholar, searched for material in the libraries of the landed gentry. Though most of the material he collected remained unpublished, his Specimens of the Poetry of the Antient Welsh Bards (1764) marked an important milestone in the rediscovery of the Welsh poetic trad. It also anticipated the publication of the Myvyrian Archaiology of Wales in three volumes, of which volume 1 (1801) was until mod. times the only printed source for the texts of the work of the Cynfeirdd and the Gogynfeirdd.

Goronwy Owen, the Morrisian circle's most accomplished poet, was so enamored with the Welsh strict-meter trad. that he could not bring himself to call anything else poetry. He was prepared to accord every praise to John Milton's compositions, but since they were not written in cynghanedd, he could not call them poetry. Yet at the same time he was too much of a cl. scholar not to accept that the most significant poetic genre was the heroic epic. Much to his disappointment, the Welsh poetic trad. could not boast a heroic epic in strict meter. This deficiency he attempted to supply by writing Cywydd y Farn Fawr (The Cywydd of the Great Judgment); he also left a legacy of critical ideas, esp. the principles that poetry should follow strict rules of composition and that it could be judged according to criteria derived therefrom.

Edward Williams (1747–1826), a stonemason from the Morgannwg (Glamorgan) region in southern Wales, better known by his bardic name "Iolo Morgannwg," was another of the chief architects of the Welsh revival of the 18th and early 19th cs. Although today he is largely remembered as a forger and a laudanum addict, Iolo was also a prolific writer and an autodidact who had gained an encyclopedic knowledge of the bardic trad. and Welsh strict-meter poetry from studying the great ms. collections of 18th-c. Wales. He contributed to the production of the first published ed. of Dafydd ap Gwilym's poetry, Barddoniaeth Dafydd ap Gwilym (1789), and was one of the eds. of the Myvyrian Archaiology. Unfortunately—much like Macpherson with his Ossian cycle—Iolo was unable to resist inventing material to fill in the gaps in the Welsh bardic trad.: both Bardd. Dafydd ap Gwilym and the M. Arch. contain numerous forgeries fabricated by Iolo. Determined to prove the primacy of his native Glamorgan in the hist. of Welsh versification, he even concocted an entire system of mesurau Morgannwg (Glamorgan measures), which he claimed were older than the 24 cl. meters standardized by the eisteddfod of 1450. Iolo's mastery of Welsh literary forms enabled some of his forgeries to remain undetected for many years after his death, and some 19th-c. Welsh poets even composed verse in his "Glamorgan measures," believing them to be authentic.

The eisteddfodau of the early 19th c. were meetings at which small groups of poets delivered themselves of impromptu verses to test their skill and to entertain a few bystanders. The eisteddfod has since developed in several ways, but even as the range of the competitions held has been extended to include music and the other arts, one feature has remained constant: the highest honor (the "chair") is still awarded to the poet who can produce the best long poem in strict meters. When Goronwy Owen's view that poetry without strict meters was impossible could no longer be maintained, the second highest honor (the "crown") was added to reward the poet who could produce the best pryddest, a long poem in the free accentual meters or even in free verse. However, the presupposition for all these poetic competitions remained Owen's tenet that poetry is composed according to certain rules, so that success in following these rules can be measured and judged. On the whole, poems in the strict meters lent themselves better than those in the free accentual meters to this kind of competition: indeed, the two categories invited different kinds of crit. Still, both sorts of poems tend to have common characteristics: they are predominantly objective, impersonal, descriptive, formal in structure, and stylized in diction.

Although Welsh literary culture in the 19th c. had remarkable achievements to its credit, incl. the work of Evan Evans ("Ieuan Glan Geirionydd," 1795–1855), John Blackwell ("Alun," 1707–1840), and Robert Williams ("Robert ap Gwilym Ddu," 1766–1850), it had no firm base in a well established educational system. Schooling did not become compulsory until the end of the century, and even then only scant attention was paid to the Welsh lang. One of the results was a curious lack of self-confidence shown even by the most talented poets: an inability to recognize what they could do best and a failure to persevere and develop it when they achieved success. This is true of Ebenezer Thomas ("Eben Fardd," 1802–63), who wrote the best eisteddfodic awdl of the century in strict meter, Dinystr Jerusalem (The Fall of Jerusalem) for the Welshpool Eisteddfod of 1824 and then, dissatisfied with his success in the strict meters, wrote a long mediocre poem on the Resurrection (Yr Adgyfodiad) in the free accentual meters.

As a poet, critic, and ed., William Thomas ("Islwyn," 1832–78) concentrated in his mature years on poetry in the strict meters, but his major contribution to Welsh poetry was made as a young man, when he wrote two long poems entitled Y Storm (The Storm). They show a young poet struggling to express thoughts and emotions vaguely understood in words only rarely adequate, but they leave the reader with a feeling that, in better circumstances and with more persistence, he could have developed into a finer poet. Islwyn was claimed as the "father" of a group of poets who called themselves the New Poets. They believed that they were breathing new life into the Welsh poetic trad. by eschewing the strict meters in favor of the free accentual meters for long philosophical poems. But the nebulous nature of their thought is betrayed in their equally nebulous lang., which is often extremely bombastic.

John Morris-Jones (1864–1929) had a clearer vision than the "New Poets" of what was needed and undertook the task of restoring the literary standards of cl. Welsh. By emphasizing the entire span of the Welsh poetic trad. from its beginnings, he was able to reveal its greatness and to uncover some of the forgotten secrets of the prosody underlying that greatness. As a professor and author of both the standard grammar of the lang. and the definitive description of its prosody, his authority was unassailable; but he was also a successful poet in both strict and free meters and, hence, a constant adjudicator at the national eisteddfodau of his time. He took the Welsh nation to school. And he was fortunate in his brilliant disciples, some even more generously gifted at poetry than he. His influence is most obvious in the work of T. Gwynn Jones, W. J. Gruffydd, and R. Williams Parry. The next generation of poets—T. H. Parry-Williams, D. Gwenallt Jones, Waldo Williams, and Saunders Lewis—also benefited from his work on the lang. but developed their own ideas of poetic diction and form. Although many mastered the art of the strict meters, their most outstanding contributions have been in the free accentual meters. Some, notably Euros Bowen, have developed *vers libre in which a form of cynghanedd is almost essential. Euros Bowen, Bobi Jones (R. M. Jones), and Gwyn Thomas are among the most prolific, most diverse, and most significant poets of their generation.

Under the leadership of strict-meter poets like Alan Llwyd, Dic Jones, T. Arfon Williams, and Gerallt Lloyd Owen, the period since 1970 has witnessed a remarkable increase in the popularity of traditional verse forms among the younger generation of Welsh poets. This is perhaps because television and radio have provided a platform for poetry as entertainment. Teams drawn from the Welsh counties compete with each other in composing poems in the strict meters, the cywydd, the englyn, as well as lyrics in the free accentual meters; their meetings are recorded for broadcast, and successful teams compete again at the National Eisteddfod in Y Babell Lên, the Literary Pavilion. Such has been the success of these meetings that a Strict Meter Society (Cymdeithas Cerdd Dafod) has been established with more than a thousand members, publishing a periodical called Barddas as well as volumes of poetry and lit. crit. As a revitalized strict-meter poetry reaches a growing and receptive audience in Wales, poets like Menna Elfyn and Einir Jones continue to expand the horizons of Welsh lit. with innovative works in free meters and vers libre, while other writers like Iwan Llwyd successfully cross back and forth between the two trads.

See BRETON POETRY; CELTIC PROSODY; IRELAND, POETRY OF; POETIC CONTESTS.

■ General: C. Donahue, "Medieval Celtic Literature" in Fisher; R. Bromwich, Medieval Celtic Literature (1974); Llyfryddiaeth Llenyddiaeth Gymraeg, ed. T. Parry and M. Morgan (1976); G. O. Watts, "Llyfryddiaeth Llenyddiaeth Gymraeg," BBCS 30 (1983).

■ Anthologies: Poems from the Welsh (1913), Welsh Poems of the 20th Century (1925), both ed. H. I. Bell and C. C. Bell; The Burning Tree (1956), Presenting Welsh Poetry (1959), both ed. G. Williams; Oxford Book of Welsh Poetry, ed. T. Parry (1962); Medieval Welsh Lyrics (1965), ed. J. P. Clancy; The Gododdin, ed. K. H. Jackson (1969); The Earliest Welsh Poetry, ed. J. P. Clancy (1970); The Poetry of Llywarch Hen, trans. P. K. Ford (1974); Dafydd ap Gwilym: A Selection of Poems, ed. R. Bromwich (1982); Dafydd ap Gwilym, trans. R. M. Loomis (1982); 20th-Century Welsh Poems, ed. J. P. Clancy (1983); Welsh Verse, ed. T. Conran, 2nd ed. (1986)—long intro. and useful appendices; Cyfres Beirdd y Tywysogion, 7 vols., ed. R. G. Gruffudd et al. (1989–96); Early Welsh Saga Poetry, ed. J. Rowland (1990); Cyfres Beirdd yr Uchelwyr, 36 vols., ed. A. P. Owen et al. (1994–2007); A People's Poetry: Hen Benillion, trans. Glyn Jones (1997); The Bloodaxe Book of Modern Welsh Poetry, ed. M. Elfyn and J. Rowland (2003); Welsh Women's Poetry 1460–2001, ed. K. Gramich and C. Brennan (2003); Legendary Poems from the Book of Taliesin, ed. and trans. M. Haycock (2007).

■ Criticism and History: H. I. Bell, The Development of Welsh Poetry (1936); G. Williams, An Introduction to Welsh Poetry (1953); Parry, History; R. Bromwich, Aspects of the Poetry of Dafydd ap Gwilym (1986); B. Jones and G. Thomas, The Dragon's Pen (1986); H. Fulton, Dafydd ap Gwilym and the European Context (1989); The New Companion to the Literature of Wales, ed. M. Stephens (1998); A Guide to Welsh Literature, 7 vols., ed. O. H. Jarman, G. R. Hughes, R. G. Gruffydd et al. (1992–2003).

■ Prosody: J. Loth, La métrique galloise, 2 vols. (1900–2), but see the rev. by Morris-Jones in ZCP 4 (1903), 106–42; Morris-Jones—still useful, indexed by G. Bowen, Mynegai i Cerdd Dafod (1947); E. I. Rowlands, "Introduction" to Poems of the Cywyddwyr (1976); R. M. Jones, "Mesurau'r canu rhydd cynnar," BBCS 28 (1979); A.T.E. Matonis, "The Welsh Bardic Grammars and the Western Grammatical Tradition," MP 79 (1981); "Appendix on Metres," Welsh Verse, 2nd ed. (1986); The New Companion to the Literature of Wales, ed. M. Stephens (1998); M. ap Dafydd, Clywed Cynghanedd (2003); A. Llwyd, Anghenion y Gynghanedd (2007).

J.E.C. WILLIAMS; B. BRUCH

WELSH PROSODY. See CELTIC PROSODY.

WEST INDIAN POETRY. See CARIBBEAN, POETRY OF THE.

WHEEL. See BOB AND WHEEL.

WIT. Wit first entered the Eng. lang. via the Anglo-Saxon ge-witan (to know), although its original derivation (from the IE wid-) suggests a provenance of far greater antiquity. From before Beowulf until after Chaucer, wit or wits referred to the rational faculties: intelligence, consciousness, wisdom. In the 16th c., however, cl. learning and humanism designated a new definition for the word: wit indicated not simply the ability to know something but, more precisely, the kind of thing that was known: i.e., it came to specify a particularly literary skill, the verbal dexterity that characterized the "good wit" of the Shakespearean clown. In their Lat. puns and learned wordplay, Erasmus and Thomas More exemplified the Ciceronian skill of winning an audience over by means of an intelligent and well-placed joke, so that, when 16th-c. translators and commentators praised their "wit," it referred not simply to their knowledge but to their jesting expression. This verbal play, moreover, had a profound philosophical rationale, for it followed the method of Socratic *irony whereby the very errors of the human mind were used to access the truth that was presumed to lie behind them. Puns and double meanings might appear to show the inefficiency of human lang., but the joke that came of putting two apparently unrelated homophones together (e.g., More and Encomium Moriae, The Praise of Folly) suggested an underlying semantic connectedness. However far lang. might have fallen from an originally ideal state, every word was understood to refer, ultimately, to a foundational truth or God-given Logos. Thus, the name play, multilingual puns, and folk etymologies in The Faerie Queene demonstrate what Craig called the "secret wit" of Edmund Spenser's lang.: the belief that such apparently fortuitous ling. coincidences were in fact redeemed by the deeper meaning that their interconnectedness revealed. What Philip Sidney called our "erected wit" represented all that was godlike in the human being—the spark that inspired Neoplatonists to divine the mystical secrets that lay behind the surface of the universe. Equally, however, such wit was inseparable from our "infected will," so that the same quality that vaulted human beings heavenward threatened to make connections that were at bottom illusory or false.

These alternatively positive and negative estimations of wit persisted but, in the 17th and 18th cs., the force of the contrast increased dramatically. This was a direct consequence of the great epistemological revolution during which knowledge—formerly perceived as something God-given and presupposed—came to be reconceived as a field of possibility and probability to be deduced empirically and proved scientifically. In Foucauldian terms, the period marked a shift in epistemē from the age of similitudes to an age of signs (see SIGN, SIGNIFIED, SIGNIFIER). The old sense that meaning had inhered within the universe as a transcendental presence to be patiently uncovered gradually gave way to a sense that words were mere representations. What followed was an extraordinary devel. in the understanding of wit: an explosion of new meanings, definitions, confusions, and redundancies, in response to which Alexander Pope's plaintive question—"What is this Wit, which must our cares employ?"—could be taken as indicative. The 17th and 18th cs. are often designated the Age of Wit, not because this now key word then stabilized but rather because, bearing the brunt of the period's great paradigm shift, wit was in crisis.

Allowing for obvious areas of overlap, the history of wit during this crucial period reveals that the word responded to this shift in three broadly different ways. The first of these was an initial resistance to change. In the first half of the 17th c., a renewed emphasis on mystical similitudes became evident in the devel. of the retrospectively but aptly named "metaphysical" wit (see METAPHYSICAL POETRY). Treatises by Counter-Reformation Jesuits such as Baltasar Gracián and Emanuele Tesauro and poems by the so-called metaphysicals strove to perpetuate the belief that wit constituted the apprehension of divine truths. This understanding of wit remained essentially a poetics of the Word, for, albeit in different ways, each of these writers conceived of the universe as the supremely witty production of a poetic Creator. The sometimes bizarre or outlandish comparisons that the metaphysicals were later accused of producing—the result of their determination to see similitudes in dissimilar things—could be argued to reflect the strain of trying to keep alive an intellectual paradigm that was already on its way out.

The second response to the new epistemology was a readiness to accept its potentially radical implications but only under essentially conservative conditions. On the one hand, lang. was effectively being liberated from the old order of similitudes, which, in the light of empirical science, were beginning to look increasingly antiquated, quaint, and (to use Samuel Johnson's word) "occult." On the other, if lang. was no longer presumed to be grounded in some prior truth, what was there to guarantee its meaning? Unmoored from Logos, the verbal connections that lang. randomly threw up threatened to be arbitrary indeed, and wit ran the risk of being mere surface play. The response to this dilemma was an attempt to have it both ways: to enjoy the newly liberated power of wit (still prized as the supreme exercise of human creativity and as the enemy of its dreaded opposite, dullness) while at the same time strictly to regulate and monitor that power, subjecting it to the scrutiny of a second, more sober agency. This uneasy compromise—heir to earlier 16th-c. anxieties—found its classic expression in the period's most famous debate: wit vs. judgment. John Locke spoke for many when he declared that, while wit made connections "wherein can be found any resemblance or congruity," judgment lay "quite on the other side, in separating carefully, one from another, ideas . . . thereby to avoid being misled by similitude."

The third response followed on logically from the second but developed an altogether more pessimistic assessment that was to have serious consequences for the future history of wit. It began to be acknowledged that, if lang. was an arbitrary system of reference, verbal connections could still be made, regardless of whether they made sense or had any truth-value. Whatever steps "judgment" might take to try to ward off the danger, wit was still capable of escaping its containment. The result was an attempt to come down on the term more heavily than before. An increasingly moralized narrative developed in which wit came to be characterized negatively as a rogue element that badly needed to be quarantined, condemned, and if necessary declassified altogether. Thus, the kind of wit that persisted in making trivial and purely external connections was said not to be wit at all but, rather, "false wit," a low form that, in Joseph Addison's famous distinction, evoked merely "the similitude in Words." "True wit," by contrast, was worthy of the name because it preserved the sense that lang. was a vehicle for truth and thereby promised to rescue meaning from the abyss.

For wit to remain "proper" and "true" in this period, it increasingly had to be linked to judgment, the result being (somewhat ironically) that it ceased to be wit at all. Thus, by the 19th c., the apprehension of presence, of the *sublime, of a divine order of things (what had been wit in the 16th and early 17th cs.) became, for the romantics, judgment. Meanwhile "mere wit" could be reduced—as it was, e.g., by William Hazlitt—to "some casual and partial coincidence which has nothing to do . . . with the nature of things."

Wit would have remained languishing in this depleted condition had it not been for the radical movements in philosophy and aesthetics that developed toward the end of the 19th c. Nothing less than the death of God, a dedicated assault on "inner" truth, and a profound scepticism toward the powers of the rational mind would be capable of lifting wit up from the depths to which it had sunk. The future of wit lay with Friedrich Nietzsche's philosophy, with Oscar Wilde's cult of insincerity, and with Sigmund Freud's book on jokes. However, it was not until the age of Fr. deconstruction and différance, when Saussurean ling. asserted that signification was predicated not on presence but on absence and difference, that the potential liberation first glimpsed by 17th c. epistemology came to be realized fully. This is why the revival of interest in the wit of metaphysical poetry in the 1920s turned out to be a false lead, for the attempt to resuscitate the Logos was no less of a dead end then than it had been in the 17th c. Instead, wit's future lay with the thorough discrediting of such logocentric theology, for, with Samuel Beckett's pronouncement in Murphy that "In the beginning was the pun," the old reverential poetics of the Word came definitively to an end. No longer bound by the pseudoethical belief that lang. served the higher purposes of communicating a prior, God-given meaning, writers (of philosophy, as well as of fiction) found themselves free to follow what Culler styles "the call of the phoneme": able to revel in new verbal connections. Never before had wordplay so manifestly been word play as such: something that could be enjoyed for its own sake; that, no longer bearing the weight of ulterior motive, could afford to be unbearably light; and that could induce, at its best, an intoxicating joy, a Nietzschean gaiety or the (more typically Fr.) "pleasure of the text." With *postmodernism, wit enjoyed more license than it ever had before. If any period has claims to be an "age of wit," then perhaps it is this.

See AGUDEZA, BAROQUE, INVENTION, RENAISSANCE POETICS.

■ W. G. Crane, Wit and Rhetoric in the Renaissance (1937); W. Empson, The Structure of Complex Words (1951); M. A. Goldberg, "Wit and the Imagination in Eighteenth-century Aesthetics," JAAC 16 (1957); C. S. Lewis, Studies in Words (1960); A. Stein, "On Elizabethan Wit," SEL 1 (1961); G. Williamson, The Proper Wit of Poetry (1961); J. B. Leishman, The Monarch of Wit (1966); D. Milburn, The Age of Wit 1650–1750 (1966); M. Craig, "The Secret Wit of Spenser's Language," Elizabethan Poetry, ed. P. Alpers (1967); M. Kundera, The Joke (1967), trans. M. H. Heim (1982); M. Roston, The Soul of Wit: A Study of John Donne (1974); E. Gilman, The Curious Perspective: Literary and Pictorial Wit in the Seventeenth Century (1978); On Puns, ed. J. Culler (1988); A. J. Smith, Metaphysical Wit (1992); J. Sitter, Arguments of Augustan Wit (1992); C. Hill, The Soul of Wit: Joke Theory from Grimm to Freud (1993); N. Saccamano, "Wit's Breaks," Body and Text in the Eighteenth Century, ed. V. Kelly and D. von Mücke (1994); C. Bates, Play in a Godless World: The Theory and Practice of Play in Shakespeare, Nietzsche, and Freud (1999); B. Michelson, Literary Wit (2000); R. Lund, "Infectious Wit: Metaphor, Atheism, and the Plague in Eighteenth-century London," Literature and Medicine 22 (2003), and "Wit, Judgement, and the Misprisions of Similitude," Journal of the History of Ideas 65 (2004).

C. BATES

WORD-COUNT. In the 1960s, the Am. poet Robert Francis wrote several poems in a verse form to which he gave the name word-count. In his autobiography, Francis later claimed to be the originator of the form. A word-count poem, as he explained it, is one in which every line has the same number of words. This is the only stipulation of the form: the number of syllables or of stresses in any line may vary greatly, depending on what words the poet has chosen. Although Francis usually arranged his word-count poems in stanzas, the form does not appear to require this. When Francis's lines are longer, as in "Dolphins," the form is not easy for readers to identify; in a shorter-lined poem like his "Icicles," it is more visually apparent.

Since the 1960s, other Am. poets have occasionally experimented with word-count. Whether they borrowed the concept from Francis or happened upon it independently is uncertain. Examples, generally brief, may be found in the work of May Swenson ("Four-Word Lines"), A. R. Ammons ("Chasm," "Mirrorment," and others), and Jonathan Williams (the sequence "Meta-Fours"). Extending Francis's strategy, a word-count poem featuring a recurring pattern of longer and shorter lines is eminently possible. "The Red Wheelbarrow," by W. C. Williams, written decades before Francis's pieces, is such a poem (each of its stanzas has three words in its first line and one in its second). A sustained rhythm may occur in a word-count poem, as it notably does in Louise Bogan's "Train Tune"; but since any such effect is not requisite to the form, it seems best to categorize word-count as a type of *free verse, albeit one displaying an unusual degree of visibly calculated shaping.

■ R. Francis, The Trouble with Francis (1971); P. Hoover, "Counted Verse: Upper Limit Music," in Finch and Varnes; J. Williams, note to "Meta-Fours," Jubilant Thicket (2005).

R. B. Shaw

WORK (Lat. opus, Fr. oeuvre, Ger. werk, It. opera, Sp. obra). A literary composition viewed as the product of its author or the entire production of a writer (as in "Eliot's work"), though, in most langs., the plural works (e.g., werke, opere, obras) is used to suggest collected writings. The term work connotes a composition appreciated by educated readers for its superior quality and is often used to enforce a distinction from popular writings. Counterintuitively, for much of lit. hist., the literary work is distinguished from textual productions more obviously marked by labor and the marketplace (i.e., a "work" is not produced to meet popular demand, nor does the artist toil primarily for remuneration)—though this usage changes as professional writers come to dominate literary production.

First used ca. 1300 to signify textual productions, the term work became associated with the rise of print culture after 1450. (Only in the 16th c. is the word work applied to a painting, sculpture, or other production in the fine arts.) The Venetian publisher Aldus Manutius issued Virgil's Opera as his first octavo volume in 1501, and thereafter the poems of Dante and other vernacular poets were often designated as opere. Often, in early mod. usage, work suggests a literary product resulting from the use or fashioning of a particular material. In one sense, a work may involve lang. being wrought into some desired shape; more often, it suggests the creative adaptation of earlier models (as in Michel de Montaigne, trans. by John Florio, in "Of the Institution and Education of Children"): "So of peeces borrowed of others, he may lawfully alter, transforme, and confound them, to shape out of them a perfect peece of worke [Fr. "ouvrage"], altogether his owne").

Perhaps through its association with the classics and with sacred texts, work came to signify a text both learned and timeless (e.g., in Edmund Spenser's Shepheardes Calender: "workes of learned wits and monuments of Poetry abide for euer"). As a work requires learning and guarantees immortality, accordingly it becomes associated with poetic ambition. One who embodies such "great ambition" is Ben Jonson, whose The Workes of Benjamin Jonson (1616) was the first folio in Eng. to contain stage plays. For his audacity, Jonson was targeted in an *epigram: "Pray tell me Ben, where doth the mystery lurk, / What others call a play, you call a work." A friend of Jonson answered: "Bens playes are works, when others works are plays." Here, work signifies what is serious and permanent, with a trace of professionalism. Collecting John Marston's plays into a single volume, William Sheares defends the publication: "I cannot perceive wherein they should appear so vile and abominable, that they should be so vehemently inveighed against. Is it because they are Plays? The name, it seems, somewhat offends them; whereas, if they were styled WORKS, they might have their approbation also." Here, the appellation work for a literary production confers cultural stature.

With the rise of the professional writer in the 18th c., work changed connotations and came to mean a specimen of lit. produced by labor for pay. Fitting the ironic tone of the era, work often was used satirically, as in Henry Fielding's numerous references to "this prodigious work" and "this mighty work" in Tom Jones. By the romantic era, however, the elevated sense of the literary work as a kind of secular scripture effaced the term's brief association with commerce. Moreover, the developing esteem for the *originality of the product contributed to a sense of work distinct from its earlier association with adaptation. Thus, the mod. sense of work contains an expectation of a text more wholly original.

A related, useful term from bibliographic studies is superwork, which includes all manifestations and treatments of an original work (incl. performances, adaptations, trans., eds., etc.) along with all texts derived from it (e.g., crit., biblios., etc.).

See artifact, poetry as; canon; poem; text; textuality.

■ G. George, "The 'Work-of-Artness' of a Work of Art," Queen's Quarterly 77 (1967); M. Heidegger, "The Origin of the Work of Art," Poetry, Language, Thought, trans. A. Hofstadter (1971); R. Poirier, Robert Frost: The Work of Knowing (1977); U. Eco, The Open Work, trans. A. Cancogni (1989); G. Genette, The Work of Art, trans. G. M. Goshgarian (1997); J. Hollander, The Work of Poetry (1997); A. Wernick, "The Work of Art as Gift and Commodity," Experiencing Material Culture in the Western World, ed. S. M. Pearce (1997); D. E. Palmer, "Heidegger and the Ontological Significance of the Work of Art," BJA 38 (1998); W.J.T. Mitchell, "The Work of Art in the Age of Biocybernetic Reproduction," Modernism/Modernity 10 (2003); W. Benjamin, "The Work of Art in the Age of Its Technological Reproducibility," trans. E. Jephcott and H. Zohn, The Work of Art in the Age of Its Technological Reproducibility and Other Writings on Media, ed. M. W. Jennings et al. (2008); D. H. Hick, "When Is a Work of Art Finished?" JAAC 66 (2008)—theories of M. C. Beardsley; see reply by P. Livingston in the same v.; D. Attridge, "On Knowing Works of Art," Inside Knowledge, ed. C. Birdsall et al. (2009).

M. Taylor

WRENCHED ACCENT. The forcing of an accent onto a syllable that is not accented, in order to conform to a meter. The term seems to have been first used by Parsons in his manual English Versification. As the name suggests, it is generally considered a sign of faulty technique, as seen in a relatively inexperienced John Keats's attempt in Endymion to wrench "purplish" into rhyming accentually as well as phonetically with "fish." Because wrenched accent would override the standard stress pattern of a word (pur*plish* instead of *pur*plish), wrenched accent asks the reader to let the metrical scheme override the rhythmic impulse of variation, in an extreme way, therefore calling attention to the artifice of the meter. The effect is common in ballads in order to accommodate a melody, as in "Sir Patrick Spens":

> Sir Patrick Spens is the best sailór
> That ever sailed the sea.

However, in premod. poems, what appears to be a wrenched accent may be an older pronunciation of a word. Thus, S. T. Coleridge, rhyming "countree" with "see" in The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, harks back to the original pronunciation of "country," which placed the accent on the second syllable. Whether read as wrenched accent or older pronunciation, the technique lends to the effect of the poem's imitation of an archaic folk ballad. Wrenched accent has also been used for ironic or comic purpose, as in the anapestic lines of T. Hardy's "The Ruined Maid," where his exaggerated wrenchings of "la-dy" and "prosperi-ty" characterize the affected manners of the country girl turned kept woman.

See ACCENT, METER, SCANSION, SCHEME.

■ J. C. Parsons, English Versification (1891); J. B. Esenwein and M. E. Roberts, The Art of Versification (1913); E. Smith, Principles of English Metre (1922).

W. WENTHE

X

XENOGLOSSIA, also xenoglossy. Denotes the intelligible use, through speech, aural comprehension, reading, or writing, of a natural lang. one has not learned formally and/or does not know. It derives from the Gr. xenos (foreign or strange), and glossa, which, since the time of Aristotle, has referred to speech foreign to the lang. of use or obscure terminology whose meaning is not understood; Quintilian, in Institutio oratoria, speaks of "glossemata" as particularly unusual sounds belonging to the "more mysterious language, which the Greeks call glossas" (lingua secretior, quam Graeci glossas vocant), thereby setting such "glosses" apart from nonsense. Xenoglossia and xenolalia (Gr., "foreign speaking/babbling"), or the faculty of speaking in human langs. unknown to the speaker, are to be distinguished from glossolalia* (Gr. "speaking, babbling in tongues, glosses"), which refers to the production of lexically noncommunicative utterances, as found in a range of cultural and historical contexts.

The first appearance of xenoglossia in print dates to 1905, when the Fr. physiologist Charles Richet used xénoglossie to define the inexplicable experiences of a Madame X, who reputedly wrote long sentences in Gr. while in a trance, without having learned the lang. However, the canonical narrative of xenoglossia in Western lit. reaches back to the Acts 2:4ff., wherein, on the day of Pentecost, the Holy Spirit is said to have descended upon the Apostles of Christ, bestowing on them suddenly the ability to speak in langs. previously alien to them and effectively remedying the confusion of tongues meted out as divine punishment for construction of the Tower of Babel in Gen. 11:5–8. In 1 Cor. 1:12–14, Paul warns that speaking divine mysteries in an unknown tongue requires an accompanying act of *interpretation, lest speaker and listener be rendered barbarians to one another, making infantile understanding of prophesy. Whether these key biblical passages describe instances of semantically intelligible speech (xenoglossia) or incomprehensible speech (glossolalia) has been the subject of extensive scholarly debate; however, theologians from the time of Augustine onward generally agree that the Pentecostal narrative describes a xenoglossic miracle that would serve as a vehicle for spreading the Christian faith by facilitating the conversion of foreign populations, whereas the polemic of Paul has been understood as a critique of charismatic glossolalia. The ambiguity or traffic between lexical intelligibility and unintelligibility continues to characterize examples and discussions of xenoglossia to this day, setting the practice apart from more syncretic, fluent strains of polylingualism: as Agamben writes, "Glossolalia and xenoglossia are the ciphers of the death of language: they represent language's departure from its semantic dimension and its return to the original sphere of the pure intention to signify."

Later narratives of Pentecostal inspiration such as those contained in the 14th-c. Actus Beati Francisci et Sociorum Eius (trans. and adapted into Tuscan It. as I fioretti di San Francesco d'Assisi) describe holy men and women who reconcile ling. difference by means of a "marvelous" eloquence in preaching comprehended by listeners of different native tongues. The oral/aural nature of xenoglossia expands to include miraculous literacy in works such as The Book of Margery Kempe (ca. 1438), where the ill-written transcription of the protagonist's revelations in a mongrel blend of Eng. and Ger. is miraculously understood and eventually translated into Lat. Such tales of miraculous trans. are thought to evince a yearning for the promise of correspondence between langs., and thereby of erased cultural difference, at moments when literary and scriptural trans. between Lat. and a range of vernaculars was on the rise. Xenoglossia is, in the domain of spiritual experience, what *macaronic verse is in the domain of satire. Dante's De vulgari eloquentia (ca. 1304), which argues (through the medium of Lat.) for an illustrious vernacular in a context of vast ling. confusion, is an early example of a search for the origins of distinct common idioms in an Adamic tongue.

While these historical examples present narratives of xenoglossy, the spontaneous or strategic deployment of unknown tongues becomes a material component of modernist poetries that register the sudden, unruly copresence of previously remote langs. in an environment of increased mobility, mass communication, and urbanization at the turn of the 20th c. The cross-ling. research and contamination pervading *avant-garde poetries—from *Dada and sound poetry, which appropriated Af., South Pacific, and other "tribal" lyrics, to Rus. zaum', with its "transrational" investigation of a lost aboriginal tongue in common, and surrealist automatism (see SURREALISM)—may be read as xenoglossic as opposed to glossolalic insofar as these poetries integrate more or less submerged fragments of human langs., ultimately locating meaning in an elsewhere beyond the conventions of any single dominant idiom, as opposed to negating it. Examples of the literal transposition of tongues unlearned or unknown to a "native" textual fabric range from the mimetic broken Eng. of illiterate immigrants in the poems of Giovanni Pascoli (see, e.g., "Italy—Sacro all'Italia raminga" and "The Hammerless Gun") through the highly orchestrated cosmopolitan montages of Ezra Pound's Cantos.

More recently, the term xenoglossia has been used to describe the plurilingual, creolistic, and translational strategies of *postcolonial poetics and poetries of migration and exile. No longer restricted to the domain of the paranormal, irrational, or exotic, the term xenoglossia encompasses ling. phenomena increasingly prevalent as texts reflect the incomplete weaving of unlearned or alien langs. into national or "mother" tongues, exemplifying an age of global networking, transit, and dislocation.

■ Criticism and History: C. Richet, "Xénoglossie: L'écriture automatique en langues étrangères," Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 19 (1905-07); E. Bozzano, Polyglot Mediumship (Xenoglossy), trans. I. Emerson (1932); F. H. Wood, This Egyptian Miracle; or, The Restoration of the Lost Speech of Ancient Egypt by Supernormal Means (1939); I. Stevenson, Xenoglossy: A Review and Report of a Case (1974), and Unlearned Language: New Studies in Xenoglossy (1984); É. Glissant, Poetics of Relation, trans. B. Wing (1990); G. Agamben, The End of the Poem, trans. D. Heller-Roazen (1996); S. McCaffery, Prior to Meaning: The Protosemantic and Poetics (2001); M. K. Blasing, Lyric Poetry: The Pain and the Pleasure of Words (2006); C. F. Cooper-Rompato, The Gift of Tongues: Women's Xenoglossia in the Later Middle Ages (2010).

■ Primary Texts: T. Tzara, Poèmes nègres (1916); V. Khlebnikov, Zangezi (1922); J. Joyce, Finnegans Wake (1939); E. Villa, 17 variazioni su temi proposti per una pura ideologia fonetica (1955); E. Adnan, L'Apocalypse arabe (1980); T. H. K. Cha, Dictee (1982); Y. Tawada, Nur da wo du bist da is nichts/Anata no iru tokoro dake nani mo nai (1987); E. Torres, The PoPedology of an Ambient Language (2007); M. NourbeSe Philip, Zong! (2008); C. Bergvall, Meddle English: New and Selected Texts (2010).

J. Scappettone

XHOSA POETRY. Xhosa is the lang. spoken by a group of peoples who settled along the southeastern coast of South Africa. It is a member of the Bantu family of langs. widely distributed throughout the southern continent and is closely related to neighboring Nguni langs. such as Zulu, Swazi, and Ndebele. Poetry in Xhosa is principally transmitted through the spoken word and the printed word in books and newspapers.

Xhosa oral poetry (izibongo) is of one kind: it is praise poetry, commonly found in Africa in forms such as the Yoruba oríkì, Bahima ekyevugo, or Shona nhétémbo. It consists essentially of a set of names that can be expanded into a line or a variable number of lines. The names that form the core of these verses and stanzas can be *metaphors (often drawn from the animal kingdom) or compound names such as Stamps while Fighting (Lwaganda) or Watch the Red Dawn (Jongumsobomvu) or the names of relatives or ancestors. Nelson Mandela, e.g., is known by the praise name of one of his royal forebears, Madiba, a name that is expanded into the praise verse uMadiba owadib' iindonga (Filler who filled gullies), because the original Madiba united the estranged factions of his people. The core praise names, which may be used as alternative names in ordinary discourse, commemorate poetically physical features, actions, or attributes. These units—praise names, verses, and stanzas—are the "praises" that constitute a "praise poem."

Praises may be composed about domestic animals such as dogs, cattle, or horses or about inanimate objects such as motor cars; traditional praise poems about birds once formed a common stock. At various times, praises may be composed by any member of the community about him- or herself or by his or her associates and assembled to form a personal praise poem; there are also traditional poems about clans, which consist of the names and praises of the clan ancestors. Izibongo may be uttered to encourage animals or people, to express pride or gratitude. The clan praises, or the praises of ancestors, may be cited as invocations in ritual contexts. The order of the praises varies from one performance to the next: izibongo are not linear in structure, but are unified in presenting facets, not always flattering, of the subject of the poem. Nor are izibongo explicitly narrative. The elliptical *allusions, often cryptic in their compression, may be clarified by narrative if explanations are sought, but not in the poetry itself: izibongo are a set of shorthand references that encapsulate a person's evolving career or defining qualities or establish his or her relation to others. They are expressions of individual and communal identity.

Izibongo of members of the royal family are performed by men who present themselves as praise poets (iimbongi, sing. imbongi). They undergo no formal training in poetry, any more than ordinary members of the public do: they appear on ceremonial occasions and are tacitly absorbed into the royal entourage. They are poets of the chiefdom, not appointees of the chief. They wear hats and cloaks of animal skin and carry two spears or clubs. Through their poetry they mold social cohesion, uphold social norms, criticize excess or injustice, and mediate between ruler and ruled. The presence of iimbongi at royal courts is attested by visiting missionaries as early as 1825 and can be documented throughout the 19th and early 20th cs. The greatest of all iimbongi is widely acknowledged to be Samuel Edward Krune Mqhayi (1875–1945), who produced an izibongo in honor of the Prince of Wales on his visit to South Africa in May 1925. During the apartheid period, when many chiefs were co-opted under the government's homeland policy, many iimbongi declined to celebrate illegitimate rulers; but since 1994, the trad. has undergone a resurgence and national recognition, with iimbongi performing at the inauguration of Nelson Mandela as president and appearing in television commercials. Women, formerly barred as iimbongi, now perform poetry in public. An ed. and trans. of the oral poetry of the imbongi Bongani Sitole (1937–2003) was published in 1996, and a biography of the imbongi D.L.P. Yali-Manisi (1926–99), with trans. of his poetry, was published in 2005.

Christian missionaries transcribed and printed the Xhosa lang. for the first time in 1823. In the first decade of the 20th c., they began publishing original works of creative lit., but these books were mainly designed for use in schools. Submissions to mission presses that did not conform to Christian ideology or were considered too political were rejected or bowdlerized. Later commercial publishers were also constrained to satisfy the requirements of government departments, since there was a limited readership for Xhosa books outside educational institutions. Xhosa authors, obliged to censor themselves, were further disadvantaged when the spelling system was revised in 1936 and submissions that did not conform to the new orthography were rejected; this unpopular orthography was revised yet again in 1955. Xhosa lit. in published books is thus skewed, restricted in content and directed at students. It encouraged Western genres such as drama, which does not exist in Xhosa oral trad., and Western forms of poetry. Lyric poetry was solicited for early anthols. and narrative poetry for junior classes; poetry in Western stanzaic structures and rhyme, alien to Xhosa trad., was favored.

The earliest volumes of poetry published under such restrictions were John Solilo's Izala (A rubbish heap, 1925) and Mqhayi's Imihobe nemibongo (Songs and lullabies, 1927). To bypass the ideological control of the press, eds. and poets occasionally paid for the printing of their own books: W. B. Rubusana (1858–1936) paid for the printing and distribution of his pioneering anthol. Zemk'inkomo magwalandini (There go your cattle, you cowards!, 1911), which included the earliest collection of traditional izibongo, now long out of print and available only in an abridged ed. that excludes the poetry; D.L.P Yali-Manisi paid for the printing of his second volume of poetry, Inguqu (A return to the attack, 1954), which includes the earliest poem in praise of Nelson Mandela, then under banning orders.

Perhaps the most successful early poet who wrote in a Western mode was J.J.R. Jolobe (1902–76), who published two volumes of poetry, Umyezo (The orchard, 1936) and Ilitha (The sunbeam, 1959), as well as a volume of poetry for younger children (1952). The dominant poet who wrote largely in the style of traditional izibongo remains Mqhayi. In addition to Imihobe nemibongo, he wrote a set of poems about the king Hintsa (1937) and Inzuzo (Reward, 1942); his novel Ityala lamawele (The trial of the twins, 1914) includes more of his poetry. Michael S. Huna published two epic poems, on the cattle sickness (1966) and on the prophet Ntsikana (1973), while in recent years Peter T. Mtuze has been prominent as an ed. and poet. Poets are now free to adopt Western or traditional style.

Newspapers and jours. in Xhosa were issued by mission presses as of 1837. They sought to encourage contributions from readers but initially accepted poetry only in Western form. This restriction lapsed after 1884, with the appearance of secular newspapers under black editorial control, which served as major vehicles for lit. until the middle of the 20th c. A large proportion of this literary output was in poetry, written by adults for adult readers, free of ideological restrictions. Many poets who contributed to newspapers never subsequently published books; some of the poetry that appeared in newspapers was later included in published books; the vast majority of the newspaper poetry awaits collecting and publication. But it is to this medium that one must turn to find the unrestricted voice of the Xhosa poet in print.

The first generation of poets whose reputations were made in newspapers included M. K. Mtakati (fl. 1880s); Isaac Williams Wauchope (1852–1917); Jonas Ntsiko (d. 1918), who wrote under the pseud. Uhadi waseluhlangeni (Harp of the Nation); and William Wellington Gqoba (1840–88), all of whom adopted Western form. As ed. of the newspaper Isigidimi samaXosa (The Xhosa messenger), Gqoba published obituary poems, as well as two long serial poems that for many years remained the most sustained poetic achievements in Xhosa. Presented in octosyllabics as formal debates on education and on Christianity, they included strong expressions of social crit.

As of 1897, Mqhayi began contributing poetry to newspapers, mostly in traditional form, under a variety of pseuds. He is the most prolific Xhosa poet in this medium, publishing poetry regularly until 1944, the year before his death. Hundreds of his poems await republication, though a start has been made with an ed. and trans. of his historical and biographical articles (2009), many of which include poems about people. From 1920 to 1929, Nontsizi Mgqwetho published nearly a hundred poems in a Johannesburg newspaper, the first woman to write Xhosa poetry on a considerable scale. Her poetry is highly critical of ineffective black political leadership and immoral behavior among urban blacks; of white territorial dispossession, political control, and economic exploitation; and of male dominance over women. As a woman, she could not function as an imbongi, nor would her poetry have been suitable for publication in book form; but the medium of the newspaper empowered her and gave her access to her public. Her poetry was collected, translated, and republished in 2007.

■ Zemk'inkomo magwalandini, 2d ed., ed. W. B. Rubusana (1911); J. Opland, Xhosa Oral Poetry (1983); Qhiwu-u-la!! Return to the Fold!! A Collection of Bongani Sitole's Xhosa Oral Poetry, ed. and trans. R. H. Kaschula and M. C. Matyumza (1996); J. Opland, Xhosa Poets and Poetry (1998); R. H. Kaschula, The Bones of the Ancestors Are Shaking: Xhosa Oral Poetry in Context (2002); J. Opland, The Dassie and the Hunter (2005); N. Mgqwetho, The Nation's Bounty, ed. and trans. J. Opland (2007); S.E.K. Mqhayi, Abantu besizwe (People of the country), ed. and trans. J. Opland (2009).

J. Opland

XUL. A literary jour., XUL began publication in 1981 during the second half of the most repressive era in the hist. of Argentina. The magazine was founded during the military government (1976–83) that resulted in thousands of disappearances and exiles. A challenge to official censorship, the magazine was committed primarily to exploring the poetics and politics of formal experimentation. As Jorge Santiago Perednik, one of the founding editors, wrote in 1982: "XUL's engagement with reality is found in its commitment to language: to again make legible that which has been used for coercion and deception."

The jour. owed its name to Xul Solar, the experimental painter, poet, and philosopher who influenced Jorge Luis Borges during his formative years. Organized against the backdrop of the colloquial poetry of the 1970s, the jour., published intermittently over the course of 11 issues, shared many of the interests found in the U.S.-based L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E jour. (see LANGUAGE POETRY). There was, however, no direct contact between the contributors of both jours. until the mid-1990s. XUL dedicated several issues to displaying a variety of new poets (Arturo Carrera, Roberto Cignoni, Perednik, Néstor Perlongher, and Susana Pujol, among others) and poetics that in many cases were informed by a strong interest in literary theory. The last issue of the jour. was published in 1997.

See ARGENTINA, POETRY OF.

■ The XUL Reader, ed. E. Livon-Grosman—for a facsimile and archival edit. of all issues, see http://www.bc.edu/research/XUL/index.html.

E. LIVON-GROSMAN

Y

YIDDISH POETRY

I. Pre-nineteenth-century Verse
II. The Nineteenth Century
III. The Twentieth Century

Yiddish is the lang. of Eastern Eur. Jewry and that culture's offshoots the world over. It is commonly believed to date back at least a thousand years, with its roots in Western Europe. Mod. Yiddish poetry exhibits every subject and technique known in the lits. of Europe and America and derives an extra measure of cosmopolitanism from a readership distributed over five continents. But out of its combined prehist. and hist. of nearly a millennium, only two or three generations have witnessed this unrestricted flourishing. In traditional Ashkenazic culture, it was rather study—the continuous interpretation of basic Talmudic law in the light of changing conditions of life—that absorbed the creative passions of the society. Literary expression in the Western sense was unimportant, and Jewish poetry of the premod. period (both Yiddish and Heb.) is marked, for all its diversity, by a generally ancillary character.

Then, with the revolutionary upheavals in Eastern Eur. Jewry in the late 19th and 20th cs.—urbanization, industrialization, internal migration and emigration, political organization, and eventual civic emancipation, attended by widespread secularization and "Europeanization" of Jewish culture—Jewish poetry in both langs. was lifted to the very top of the cultural values of Jewish culture. It attracted a body of talent that, in previous centuries, would have been otherwise engaged; and, in accordance with the increased receptivity of its writers and readers to outside influences, it quickly managed to catch up with common Eur. accomplishments. Yiddish poetry "in one grand leap landed in the general 20th century" (Harshav and Harshav 1986). Even in its treatment of specifically Jewish themes in an imagery full of traditional allusions, Yiddish poetry became avowedly and factually part and parcel of mod. Eur. and Am. poetic culture.

I. Pre-nineteenth-century Verse. The origins of Yiddish lit. have been lost, but early contemp. references to it, as well as the developed poetic technique of the oldest dated works so far discovered (1382), indicate a prehist. antedating the extant evidence. Prior to the 19th c., Yiddish lit., the bulk of which is in verse, was written in an idiom based predominantly on Western Yiddish dialects, a standardized lang. that functioned without interruption until it fell into disuse in Western Europe about 1800 and was superseded by a rapidly evolving new standard based on Eastern Eur. Yiddish dialects. In the premod. period, the influence of med. Ger., its poetic trads., and a stylistic irradiation from intentionally literal Bible trans. caused the literary Yiddish to be highly stylized, thereby offering only a weak reflection of contemp. colloquial speech.

*Epic poems both of the general Eur. repertoire (King Arthur, Gudrun, etc., with specifically Christian references deleted) and OT themes (e.g., Samuel or the sacrifice of Isaac) are extant in 14th- and 15th-c. recensions that show relatively strict meters and, generally, "long-line" stanza structure of the type xaxa xbxb. Scholars originally theorized that much of this verse was meant for oral *performance by professional *minstrels or laymen, esp. since, even after the intro. of printing, the tune was often specified at the beginning or end of a work. More recently, however, strong arguments have been advanced against the so-called shpilman theory, positing that the Eur. epics are transcriptions or trans. of Ger. originals, while the works based on Jewish themes (Bible and Midrash) were authored by scribes or other well-educated writers (Shmeruk 1988). This critical revision, however, still awaits further research. In the "post-epic" period (at least since the 17th c.), there is a case to be made for the direct association of Yiddish poetic creativity with contemporaneous modes of public entertainment and performances at weddings or on holy days.

Two 16th-c. verse novels, Bove Bukh (1541) and Pariz un Viene (1556), strikingly bridge the gap between original Jewish works and borrowed secular ones. The first was composed by Elye Bokher (Elia Levita, 1469–1549) in 1507, and the second either by him or his unidentified disciple. Using It. sources, these works created novels in ostensibly superior versions in which the primary material has been reworked and Jewish elements freely integrated. In addition, Elye Bokher introduced *ottava rima into Yiddish well over a century before it was attempted in Ger. poetry, and he seems to have been the first to use accentual iambs in any Eur. poetry.

The metrical structures of epic poetry were not carried forth elsewhere in Yiddish verse. This is evident in collections of 16th- and 17th-c. popular songs (which reflect a convergence of traditional with current Ger. models), in religious lyrics, in the many verse chronicles and *dirges describing historical events, and in satirical or moralizing *occasional verse, where the meters decrease in regularity until the number of syllables per measure of music varies widely and sometimes grows quite high. Yiddish poetry of early mod. times thus corresponds in its free-accentual basis to most contemp. Ger. verse. Drawing on the Heb. liturgical trad., Yiddish verse sometimes made use of the *acrostic and ornamental extravagances such as making all lines of a reasonably long poem end in the same syllable.

II. The Nineteenth Century. Through most of the 19th c., the folk song flourished, and the recitative improvisation, the narrative (on biblical subjects), and the moralizing poem remained productive genres. the Meanwhile, Yiddish lit. made a new beginning, centered this time in Eastern Europe and carried by the emigrations toward the end of the century to England, the U. S., and the far corners of the globe. The new writers were stimulated mostly by the Haskalah (Enlightenment) movement, which encouraged familiarity with Eur. (esp. Ger. and Rus.) lit. and made Jewish writers increasingly self-conscious about the underdeveloped state of their langs., Yiddish and Heb., for the purposes of social crit., philosophy, and secular education.

While Heb. lit. toyed with a biblical manner, Yiddish writers explored the cultural framework offered by the folk song, which was noticed at last after a "submerged" existence spanning centuries, during which it was neither recorded nor reflected in lit. The Yiddish folk song favored an xaxa stanza and a free-accentual meter (usually four stresses per line) in which, compared with Ger. folk song, the use of unstressed syllables to fill the musical measures was increased, probably as a result of the Slavicized prosodic structure of the lang. However, more Eur. standards of song construction and phrasing introduced more elaborate rhyme schemes (abab and aabccb became widespread), and strict syllabotonic meters became de rigueur in the theater and in quasi-theatrical songs. The rising labor movement furnished a new public for song verse but also for declamatory verse—an additional factor conducive to regular syllabotonic meters.

In the 1890s, Yiddish poetry hit its stride at last. Though it lagged noticeably behind the devel. of prose—particularly the shorter forms—it now became the vehicle of truly lyrical expression, as exemplified by Shimen Frug (1860–1916, widely credited with introducing syllabotonic prosody into mod. Yiddish poetry), I. L. Peretz (1852–1915), and Morris Rosenfeld (1862–1923). These authors, who had all complained about the lexical and stylistic inadequacy of Yiddish, now laid the foundations of mod. Yiddish poetry by efforts to master a lyrical viewpoint and experiments with a variety of imagery and structural patterns.

III. The Twentieth Century. The existence of a new intelligentsia with secular education, some of it acquired in Yiddish-lang. schools, cast Yiddish poetry in this period of its culmination into the mainstream of contemp. world trends. Yiddish lit. now showed itself more sensitive than ever to devels. in other lits. with which it was in contact. Writers had the interest and the formal means to attempt *modernism along Am., Ger., and Rus. lines. At the same time, in the Yiddish poetic culture, there appeared genuine internal responses to innovation. In Russia, Dovid Hofshteyn (1889–1952) introduced some decisive innovations in meter and strophic structures. In America, the group Di Yunge (Young Ones, e.g., M.-L. Halpern [1886–1932], Mani Leib [1883–1953], and Zisha Landau [1889–1937]) early in the century reacted to the political tendentiousness and rhet. of the labor poets by trying to write poetry that would be "more poetic" in diction and subject matter and more individuated in its sentiments.

Dedicated to art for art's sake, the poets of Di Yunge emphasized the expression of aesthetic experience even while supporting themselves as laborers: "Thank goodness I'm not a cobbler who writes poems, / But a poet who makes shoes" (Mani Leib). Di Yunge cherished a vision of Yiddish lit. in which a monolingual reader could be a well-educated world citizen. To this end, they turned some of their energies to trans. and to introducing "exotic" themes, such as Christianity and sexuality, into Yiddish poetry.

Di Yunge called forth the protest of In zikh (the Introspectivists), a group (Aaron Leyeles [1889–1966], Jacob Glatstein [1896–1971], and N. B. Minkoff [1893–1958], among others) which, avowedly inspired by Yehoyosh (1872–1927), and influenced by contemp. Eng. and Am. poetry, denied in principle a distinction between the intellectual and the emotional and opened wide the door of its poetry to all themes, all words, all rhythms, no matter how free or regular, so long as they embodied the personal experience of the poet. As expressed in its *manifesto of 1920, the In zikh poets saw no theoretical reason to identify themselves as Jewish artists other than that they were Jews and wrote Yiddish. Moreover, although they accepted syllabotonic meters as a possibility, they were, in fact, convinced that free rhythms were the surest vehicle for achieving poetic truth. Finally, they had no fear of exposing their deepest psychic realities, embracing free association as their chief poetic method.

As the cumulative effect of a growing corpus of poetry made itself felt, the demands for *originality pushed Yiddish poets onto new paths. *Assonance as a substitute for rhyme was explored (e.g., by Alter Katzizne [1885–1941] and Peretz Markish [1895–1952]). *Sonnet sequences and works in the more difficult Romance fixed forms were successfully created (e.g., by Mani Leib). Syntactic *parallelism, etymological figures, and *consonance were mobilized to recreate biblical Heb. effects in a new Jewish medium. Epic poems, verse novels, and verse drama (esp. by H. Leivick [1888–1962]) were produced and acclaimed. Interest in Old Yiddish poetry was awakened, and several writers attempted new works in 16th-c. lang. The poems of Solomon Etinger (1800–56), a forgotten modernist, were published posthumously. The folk song reappeared, but this time in subtly stylized forms (e.g., by Halpern and Itzik Manger [1901–69]).

Post-World War I regional constellations such as the expressionist group Di Khalyastre (the Gang) in Warsaw (U. Z. Greenberg [1896–1981], Melech Ravitch [1893–1976], and others) and Yung-Vilne (Young Vilna) in Vilna (notably Chaim Grade [1910–82] and Abraham Sutzkever [1913–2010]) set themselves specialized tasks against a common literary background. The sweet awareness of a poetic trad. being formed was reflected in poetic allusions to well-known poems. A standardized literary lang. came into use in which dialectal rhymes became often restricted for conspicuously emotive mood.

In this period, the "discovery of the mother tongue," now emancipated in its functions, was completed. Poets by the scores, following the major writers of the late 19th c., learned to use the Yiddish lang. to its full extent. Yiddish prosodic structure, Germanic but largely reconfigured along Slavic lines (concomitant with mod. Rus. poetry), was employed to create easy triple and even paeonic meters (see PAEON). The refreshing syntax of conversational folk Yiddish was channeled into poetry (notably by Eliezer Shteynbarg, 1880–1932). The pernicious etymologizing approach of the past was dead: words were used according to their precise Yiddish phonology and semantics, without reference to—and sometimes in defiance of—their form and meaning in the stock langs. Sound frequencies typical of a particular component of Yiddish were forged into a new poetic device, making it possible, for instance, to suggest "Slavicness," and hence village earthiness, by an accumulation of z and c sounds (thus, Moshe Kulbak, 1896–1940), or "Germanness" by emphasizing a and final e sounds (e.g., Glatstein).

At the same time, the idiom of traditional Jewish study was annexed to the mod. literary lang.; it found use not only when required by the subject (as in the poetry of Menahem Boreisho [1888–1949], Aaron Zeitlin [1899–1974], or Grade), but in thematically unspecialized writing, where it functions simply as a flexible abstract vocabulary. Above all, the many derivational patterns of Yiddish grammar were exploited for the enrichment of the lang. New coinages abounded, and some, like umkum (violent death) and vogl (restless wandering), have become common elements of the lang. The poetry of Glatstein and Sutzkever is particularly rich in novel derivations.

With the genocide of six million Jews by Germany and her Axis collaborators, Jewish cultural life in most of Eastern Europe was virtually destroyed; what was left received a second devastating blow through Stalin's ban of Yiddish culture and the elimination of Yiddish writers in the USSR after 1949, culminating in the August 12, 1952, murder of the Yiddish poets Peretz Markish, Dovid Hofshteyn, Leib Kvitko (b. ca. 1890), and Itzik Fefer (b. 1900), among others. The Holocaust of the war years naturally became the central theme of Yiddish lit., not only in the Nazi-made ghettos but globally. After 1948, however, the rebirth of a Jewish state in Israel opened new vistas, descriptive, psychological, existential, and ethical, to Yiddish poetry. Soon, an active Yiddish cultural life rapidly developed in Israel, incl. publication of Di goldene keyt (The Golden Chain), the premier Yiddish literary jour. (1949–95), and the establishment of a few Yiddish publishing houses in the late 1950s. Major postwar centers of Yiddish poetry were also in North America, Europe (esp. in France and, until the late 1960s, Poland), and post-Stalin Soviet Union (since the 1960s).

The technical brilliance of Yiddish poetry did not diminish in the postwar period. In its rhythmic features, however, postwar writing seems to have retreated from the experimentation of the previous period. As Leyeles put it, "When there are no bounds to suffering, create, through pain, a ritual fence [i.e., a preventive measure] of rigorously restrained patterning."

What might be called the second generation since the catastrophic events of the Holocaust and Stalinism reveals a shift in the balance of Yiddish verse. Whereas actual poetic production is shrinking, scholarship has reached new levels of sophistication and intensity. This phenomenon is directly related to the decline of the Yiddish-speaking community and, hence, the number of native speakers of Yiddish. Those poets who remained in the final decades of the 20th c., such as Yonia Fain (b. 1914), Rivka Basman Ben-Haim (b. 1925), and Alexander Spiegelblatt (b. 1927) had to contend with the problem of creating in a lang. whose future as a vibrant medium of mod. poetry was at best, uncertain: "During daytime a funeral, at night a concert / And inevitably, I go to both" (Sutzkever). Scholarly research, by contrast, became increasingly active and undertaken more and more by those who are not native speakers of Yiddish. Their work, encompassing a wide variety of perspectives, e.g., historical, social, feminist, psychoanalytic, and comparative, highlights the tremendous vitality of the poetic corpus, even if the number of living poets is small. Among the major outcomes of late 20th-c. studies and anthols. were the greater recognition and appreciation of Yiddish women poets, as well as poets whose work had been ignored out of earlier political considerations.

The turn of the 21st c. witnessed the steep decline of secular Yiddish lit. Since the 1990s, however, a new postwar generation has begun to make its mark, albeit on a substantially reduced scale and often in estranged surroundings. It consists of a drastically smaller and geographically dispersed group of poets born between the 1950s and the 1980s. Their work continues to be published in contemp. Yiddish periodicals, e.g., Di tsukunft (New York), Gilgulim (Paris), and Yerusholaymer Almanakh (Jerusalem).

See HEBREW POETRY.

■ Anthologies: Di yidishe muze, ed. J. Fichman (1911); Antologye: finf hundert yor yidishe poezye, ed. M. Bassin, 2 v. (1917); Yidishe dikhterins, ed. E. Korman (1928); Naye yidishe dikhtung, ed. Y. Paner and E. Frenkl (1946); Dos lid iz geblibn, ed. B. Heller (1951); Mivhar shirat yidish, trans. M. Basuk (1963)—Hebrew; A shpigl af a shteyn, ed. K. Shmeruk (1964)—works of murdered Soviet Yiddish writers; A Treasury of Yiddish Poetry, ed. I. Howe and E. Greenberg (1969); Selected Poems of Jacob Glatstein, trans. R. Whitman (1972); Perl fun der yidisher poezye, ed. J. Mlotek and E. Mlotek (1974); M.-L. Halpern, In New York: A Selection, ed. and trans. K. Hellerstein (1982); American Yiddish Poetry: A Bilingual Anthology, ed. B. Harshav and B. Harshav (1986); Penguin Book of Modern Yiddish Verse, ed. I. Howe et al. (1987)—Yiddish and Eng.; Early Yiddish Texts, 1100–1750, With Introduction and Commentary, ed. J. Frakes (2004)—Yiddish; Proletpen: America's Rebel Yiddish Poets, ed. A. Glaser and D. Weintraub, trans. A. Glasser (2005)—Yiddish and Eng.; Sing, Stranger: A Century of American Yiddish Poetry: A Historical Anthology, ed. B. Harshav and B. Harshav (2006); Step by Step: Contemporary Yiddish Poetry, ed. E. Bemporad and M. Pascucci (2009)—Yiddish and Eng.; With Everything We've Got: A Personal Anthology of Yiddish Poetry, ed. and trans. R. Fein (2009)—Yiddish and Eng.

■ Criticism and History: L. Wiener, History of Yiddish Literature in the Nineteenth Century (1899); M. Erik, Di geshikhte fun der yidisher literatur (1928); D. Hofshteyn and F. Shames, Literatur-kentenish (poetik), 2 v. (1928); and Teorye fun literatur: Poetik (1930); Z. Reyzen, Leksikon fun der yidisher literatur, 4 v. (1928); M. Weinreich, Bilder fun der yidisher literatur-geshikhte (1928); Y. Tsinberg, Di geshikhte fun der literatur bay yidn, v. 6 (1935); N. B. Minkoff, Yidishe klasiker poetn, 2d ed. (1939); Y. Mark, "Yiddish Literature," The Jews, ed. L. Finkelstein, v. 2 (1949); N. B. Minkoff and J. A. Joffe, "Old Yiddish Literature," and S. Niger, "Yiddish Literature of the Past 200 Years," The Jewish People Past and Present, v. 3 (1952); B. Hrushovski [Harshav], "On Free Rhythms in Modern Yiddish Poetry," The Field of Yiddish, ed. U. Weinreich, v. 1 (1954); Leksikon fun der nayer yidisher literatur, 8 v. (1956–81); Y. Tsinberg, Pyonern fun yidisher poezye in amerike, 3 v. (1956); U. Weinreich, "On the Cultural History of Yiddish Rime," Essays on Jewish Life and Thought, ed. J. L. Blau (1959); B. Hrushovski, "The Creation of Accentual Iambs," For Max Weinreich on his Seventieth Birthday (1964); S. Liptzin, The Flowering of Yiddish Literature (1964); and The Maturing of Yiddish Literature (1970); I. Howe, World of Our Fathers (1976), ch. 13; J. Hadda, Yankev Glatshteyn (1980); D. Goldberg, "The Juncture of Dialect and Rhyme in Yiddish Poetry," Ha-Sifrut (1986)—in Heb.; K. Shmeruk, Prokim fun der yidisher literatur-geshikhte (1988); R. Wisse, A Little Love in Big Manhattan (1988); F. W. Aaron, Bearing the Unbearable: Yiddish and Polish Poetry in the Ghettos and Concentration Camps (1990); B. Hrushovski, The Meaning of Yiddish (1990); A. Spiegelblatt, Bloe vinklen, Itsik Manger—lebn, lid un balade (2002); K. Hellerstein, "Gender and the Anthological Tradition in Modern Yiddish Poetry," and J. Shandler, "Anthologizing the Vernacular: Collections of Yiddish Literature in English Translations," The Anthology in Jewish Literature, ed. D. Stern (2004); M. Lev, Literarishe portretn (2007).

U. Weinrich; J. Hadda; D.-B. Kerler

YMRYSON. The Welsh noun ymryson (pl. ymrysonau) is used to describe poetic debates or bardic contests. Most extant med. examples are in the strict-metre cywydd* form (pl. cywyddau), with the longest being the 14th-c. ymryson between Dafydd ap Gwilym and Gruffudd Gryg (containing a total of eight cywyddau, four by each poet). The 16th-c. ymryson between Edmwnd Prys and Wiliam Cynwal ran to a total of 54 cywyddau. While the origins of the trad. might stem in part from competitions for patronage, little is known about the exact social context(s) in which the med. ymrysonau were composed and performed. A legendary dimension is provided by poems attributed to the character Taliesin, an all-knowing supernatural poet whose victory over Maelgwn Gwynedd's court poets is described in the 16th-c. narrative Ystoria Taliesin. Some extant ymrysonau contain discussions of aesthetics and bardic learning; e.g., while starting ostensibly as an argument over a broken promise, the ymryson between Prys and Cynwal became a forum for pitting the merits of the new humanist learning against the traditional values of the Welsh bardic profession. However, most med. and early mod. ymrysonau are also characterized by—and at times completely dominated by—boasting, belligerent posturing and ad hominem attacks of a bawdy and scatological nature. Parallels can be found in other literary trads., incl. the Scots flyting* and Occitan tenso*. The term ymryson has continued in use during the 20th and 21st cs., and since the middle of the 20th c., it has been applied to Welsh-lang. poetic contests held on radio, television and the field of the National Eisteddfod.

See eisteddfod, poetic contests, welsh poetry.

■ A. Matonis, "Barddoneg a Rhai Ymrysonau Barddol Cymraeg yr Oesoedd Canol Diwedd," Ysgrifau Beirniadol 12 (1982); Ymryson Edmwnd Prys a Wiliam Cynwal, ed. G. A. Williams (1986); Ystoria Taliesin, ed. P. K. Ford (1992); M. Davies, "'Aed i'r coed i dorri cof': Dafydd ap Gwilym and the Metaphorics of Carpentry," Cambridge Medieval Celtic Studies 30 (Winter 1995); J. Hunter, "Cyd-destunoli Ymrysonau'r Cywyddwyr: Cipolwg ar 'Yr Ysbaddiad Barddol'," Dwned 3 (1997): 33–52; D. Johnston, Llên yr Uchelwyr: Hanes Beirniadol Llenyddiaeth Gymraeg 1300–1525 (2005), esp. 375–400.

J. Hunter

YORUBA POETRY. See africa, poetry of.

YUEFU. The term yuefu is not a poetic genre but a label that has been applied retrospectively and inconsistently to a bewildering array of poetic texts related to musical performance over many centuries of Chinese hist. It first appears in the Former Han dynasty as the name of a music bureau, consolidated by Emperor Wu (156–87 bce) to collect songs from his subjects, compose songs by imperial command, and perform music for court functions. Apart from some ritual hymns and a few pieces of dubious attribution to members of the Han court cited in the Han shu (The History of the Former Han Dynasty), it is unlikely that any text from this time has survived.

The literate ruling class continued to compose and perform song lyrics under a repertoire of melody titles through the dissolution of the Han and into the Wei and Jin dynasties, from the 1st to the early 4th c. ce. Many of these songs supposedly were performed at banquets by rulers such as Cao Cao (155–220) and his sons, Cao Pi (187–226) and Cao Zhi (192–232), while others are attributed to a group of scholars known as the Jian'an qi zi (Seven Masters of Jian'an), which included Wang Can (177–217). Other notable figures were Fu Xuan (217–278), Zhang Hua (232–300), and Lu Ji (261–303). These attributed song texts and a larger corpus of unattributed texts share a repertoire of melody titles and are usually in an irregular meter tending toward a five-syllable line. They overlap significantly with a corpus of attributed and unattributed gushi (old poems) in a regular five-syllable line not associated with specific music. Common elements among the corpora suggest that there was a shared repertoire of poetic resources (themes, adopted voices, topics, images, diction, grammar, sequence) that literate people would draw on to compose and perform poetry as the occasion demanded. The song texts from this era are referred to as "northern" and are characterized as having a masculine or martial air with a sense of urgency and an occasional satirical edge.

The Jin dynasty moved its capital to south of the Yangtze river in 317 CE, which led to the succession of the Southern Dynasties lasting to 589. The ruling class came into contact with an indigenous southeastern song trad., Wusheng ge (Songs of Wu), performed by singing girls in urban entertainment quarters. These slightly risqué, entertaining songs were brought into the repertoire of the elite, spawning a new wave of song texts, usually in five-syllable quatrain form, composed by men in the voices of women. While some texts are attributed directly to singing girls, such as the "Ziye ge" (Girl of the Night Songs), internal evidence suggests that extant texts were court compositions playing with informal registers. Rulers such as Xiao Yan (464–549) practiced this song form, while his younger son, Xiao Gang (503–51), sponsored Yutai xinyong (New Songs from a Jade Terrace), a collection incl. hundreds of song texts in this "southern" trad., which is characterized as being feminine and ornate. Some figures, such as Bao Zhao (d. 466), continued writing song texts in imitation of the earlier Han and Wei masculine style, even though the accompanying music had long been lost.

Two imperial anthols. of the 6th c.—the aforementioned Recent Songs and Wenxuan (Literary Selections), sponsored by Xiao Tong (501–31)—along with works of lit. crit.—such as "Yue zhi" (Treatise on Music) by Shen Yue (441–513) and Wenxin diaolong (The Literary Mind and the Carving of Dragons) by Liu Xie (465?–532?)—treated the trad. of song texts from the 1st through 6th cs. as a distinct corpus, giving it the label yuefu as a loose bibliographical term for a wide range of texts related to musical performance. The anthols. served to fix a lit. hist. for these fluid texts and to fashion a canon of northern and southern yuefu distinct from "old poems." The corpus of yuefu poetry continued to grow, though the term remained highly elastic and of inconsistent application, into the Tang dynasty (618–907), which saw Li Bai (701–62) take the adopted voices of yuefu to hyperbolic heights, and Bai Juyi (772–846) self-consciously fashion "Xin Yuefu" (New Yuefu) as a vehicle for social critique.

The evolution of the term yuefu reached its endpoint in the late Northern Song dynasty (960–1127) when Guo Maoqian (12th c.) compiled a collection of 5,500 song texts titled Yuefu shiji (Compendium of Yuefu Poetry), in which he attempted to preserve all received yuefu texts from earliest times to his day, grouping them into early folk pieces and later literary imitations, which constitute 80% of the collection. Guo had no direct access to the music, and many of his textual sources are lost or of unknown provenance. Recent scholarship suggests that many of the "original" folk pieces he cites are unattributed song texts by literati attempting to simulate the vitality of song performances that they imputed to earlier times. During the Northern Song, the composition of words to music passed to the more recently established form of poetry known as "lyrics" (ci*), although the term yuefu was still used occasionally.

See SHI.

■ Anthologies: New Songs from a Jade Terrace, trans. A. Birrell (1982); Columbia Book of Chinese Poetry, ed. and trans. B. Watson (1984); An Anthology of Chinese Literature: Beginnings to 1911, ed. and trans. S. Owen (1996).

■ Criticism and History: J. Allen, In the Voice of Others: Chinese Music Bureau Poetry (1992); C. Egan, "Were Yüeh-fu Ever Folk Songs? Reconsidering the Relevance of Oral Theory and Balladry Analogies," Chinese Literature: Essays, Articles, Reviews 22 (2000); R. Cutter, "Poetry from 200 B.C.E. to 600 C.E.," Columbia History of Chinese Literature, ed. V. Mair (2001); S. Owen, Making of Early Chinese Poetry (2006).

G. SANDERS

Z

ZAUM'. A coinage by Rus. futurist poets Velimir Khlebnikov and Aleksei Kruchenykh based on the Rus. adjective zaumnyi (beyond comprehension, too complicated to understand) and used by them to name their nonstandard poetic lang. A synonym of zaumnyi iazyk (transrational, transsense, metalogical lang., "beyonsense"), zaum', with its soft m' (indicated by an apostrophe), was a feminine, more compact nominal neologism covering the concept with a touch of greater abstraction (za beyond, outside; um, mind, reason, intellect). This poetic lang. was not intended to be meaningless or nonsense; rather, its meaning was indefinite or yet to be established. Kruchenykh adhered more closely to the former idea, while Khlebnikov sought to create new words that would ideally be used to name new and future phenomena with perfect iconic clarity. Before 1913, Khlebnikov had written poems that qualify as zaum' (e.g., "Bobeobi pelis' guby" ["Bobeobi sang the lips"] and "Zakliatie smekhom" ["Incantation by Laughter"], both 1909); but in that year, two of the most famous early examples of zaum' appeared: in March, Kruchenykh's three-part poem "dyr bul shchyl" (untranslatable zaum'; see below) in the collection "Pomada" (Pomade), and in December, the futurist opera Pobeda nad solntsem (Victory over the Sun), with text by Kruchenykh, prologue by Khlebnikov, and set and costume designs by Kazimir Malevich. Both of these works are considered to be preeminent examples of Rus. cubo-futurism, as distinct from It. *futurism, in which transrational lang. did not figure significantly. Zaum' was further developed by Kruchenykh and Il'ja Zdanevič in Tiflis (present-day Tbilisi) in 1917–21.

Zaum' can be classified by type, depending on the ling. level in which it deviates from norms of the given lang. For instance, semantic zaum' would use standard words in standard forms but combine them in such a way that the meaning is indefinite or absurd; morphological zaum' would use recognizable roots, prefixes, and suffixes in new combinations (Khlebnikov's "Incantation by Laughter" is of this sort, with many neologisms based on the root smekh (laughter); phonetic zaum' would use combinations of letters and sounds in which it would be difficult to identify familiar word components. Combinations and borderline cases are common. E.g., "dyr bul shchyl" begins with three monosyllables that have only hints of meaning (dyr [hole?]; bul [bulka, bun]?; shchyl [shchel', crevice?]), while the second line, ubeshchur, is a combination of three possible interpretants (ubeshchat' [to promise]; ubezhdat' [to convince]; chur [fain, mum]). The third line, skum, also has several possibilities (see scomber [a fish]), while the final two lines of the first part trail off into syllables and discrete sounds (vy so bu / r l ez). The second part talks more clearly about the black tongue of love, while the final part returns to phonetic and morphological zaum' but, in contrast to the harsh consonant clusters of the first part, is focused mainly on soft, liquid sounds, suggesting that there is an erotic subtext to the work. Nevertheless, the meaning is kept at a level of *indeterminacy akin to abstract art, in which the colors and shapes have an indefinite relationship to the natural world.

Zaum' in the sense of indefinite lang. can be found in the poetry of various eras and peoples, esp. in folklore and children's verse.

See NONSENSE VERSE; RUSSIA, POETRY OF; SOUND POETRY.

■ E. Beaujour, "Zaum'," Dada/Surrealism 2 (1972); R. Vroon, Velimir Xlebnikov's Shorter Poems: A Key to the Coinages (1983); D. Mickiewicz, "Semantic Functions in Zaum'," Russian Literature 15 (1984); V. Shklovsky, "On Poetry and Trans-Sense Language" (1916), October 34 (1985); G. Janecek, "A Zaum' Classification," Canadian-American Slavic Studies 30 (1986); N. Gourianova, "Suprematism and Transrational Poetry," Elementa 1 (1994); G. Janecek, ZAUM' (1996); N. Firtich, "Rejecting 'The Sun of Cheap Appearances': Journey Beyond 'Zero' with Kručenych, Malevič, Belyj, Jakobson and Jean-Luc Godard," Russian Literature 65 (2009).

G. J. JANECEK

ZÉJEL (Ar. zajal, Fr. zadjal). A Sp. poem consisting of an introductory *strophe (known as the cabeza), presenting the theme to be developed and followed by strophes each patterned as follows: a monorhymed *tercet, called the mudanza, followed by the vuelta (repetition) of one line or more rhyming with the introductory stanza. The simplest form of this strophe is the quatrain rhyming aaab cccb and so on, the b rhyme remaining constant throughout the poem. Multiple variations of this basic form are found. The octosyllable is a frequent line length, though others are also used. The problem of the zéjel's origins is the subject of scholarly debate: colloquial Hispano-Romance, med., Lat., and Hispano-Ar. poetry each have their advocates.

See AL-ANDALUS, POETRY OF.

■ P. Le Gentil, "A propos de la 'strophe zéjelesque,'" Revue des langues romanes 70 (1949); and Le Virelai et le villancico (1954); M. Frenk, Estudios sobre lirica antigua (1978), esp. 309–26; E. C. Minkarah, "The Zéjel in Fifteenth-Century Castile," Fifteenth-Century Studies 6 (1983); Navarro; V. Beltrán Pepió, "De zéjeles y dansas: Orígenes y formación de la estrofa con vuelta," Revista de Filología Española 64 (1984); J. T. Monroe, "Poetic Quotation in the Muwassaha and Its Implications: Andalusian Strophic Poetry as Song," La Corónica 14 (1986); M. Morras, "¿Zéjeles o formas zejelescas?," La corónica 17 (1988); J. T. Monroe, "Which Came First, the Zajal or the Muwaššaḥa? Some Evidence for the Oral Origins of Hispano-Arabic Strophic Poetry," Oral Tradition 4 (1989).

D. C. Clarke

ZEUGMA (Gr., "means of binding"; cf. Gr. zeugos, "yoke"). Form of brachylogy in which multiple clauses are governed by a single word, most often a noun or verb. According to Quintilian (Institutio oratoria 9.3.62), who calls the figure synezeugmenon, the governing word is always a verb (e.g., "Lust conquered shame, audacity fear, madness reason"). The Rhetorica ad Herennium (4, 27:37–38) allows for noun governance as well, a construction it labels diazeugmenon (e.g., "The Roman people destroyed Numantia, razed Carthage, and overthrew Fregellae").

Later rhetoricians extended the definition of zeugma to the "yoking" together of any two parts of speech by means of any other. Following Quintilian, George Puttenham (The Arte of English Poesie [1589], bk. 3, chap. 12) and other Ren. rhetoricians (e.g., Johannes Susenbrotus, Epitome troporum ac schematum [1541], and Henry Peacham, The Garden of Eloquence [1577]) distinguished three zeugmatic constructions according to whether the governing word precedes the words it governs (prozeugma); stands between them (mesozeugma, e.g., "Much he the place admired, the person more"—Milton, Paradise Lost 9.444); or follows them (hypozeugma).

There is little consensus regarding the distinction between zeugma and *syllepsis. Puttenham argues that, whereas in zeugma the governing word agrees grammatically with each of the governed clauses, in syllepsis, it agrees with only one, thus producing what he calls the "double supply," a semantic sleight-of-hand. What seems clear is that zeugma, unlike syllepsis, requires an ellipsis. Peacham and others (e.g., A. Quinn, Figures of Speech [1982], 98) thus view zeugma as the opposite of hypozeuxis, in which the governing words are repeated in each clause (e.g., Winston Churchill's "We shall fight on the beaches, we shall fight on the landing grounds, we shall fight in the fields and in the streets. . . ."). Considered in relation to hypozeuxis, zeugma can be seen as an efficient means of emphasis (i.e., it lacks iteration).

Alexander Pope favors the figure, and he frequently employs mixed zeugmas (e.g., "See Pan with flocks, with fruit Pomona crowned" [Windsor Forest, 37], which relies on both hypozeugma and prozeugma to produce a *chiasmus).

■ C. Walz, Rhetores Graeci, 9 vols. (1832–36), 8.474, 686, 709; M. Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947); L. A. Sonnino, Handbook to 16th-Century Rhetoric (1968); Lausberg, sect. 702–7; Vickers.

C. H. Moore

ZULU POETRY

I. Verse Structure
II. Early Zulu Poets
III. Post-Apartheid Era

Zulu (isiZulu) poetry has developed from oral to written form. Traditional Zulu poetic genres consist of oral praise poems called izibongo, the most important and influential of the traditional forms, which include clan praises (izithakazelo), lullabies (imilolozelo), and folk songs (amaculo).

Characteristics retained in mod. Zulu poetry reflect the influence of the praise poem. Compositional techniques can be divided into external and internal. External characteristics refer to sentences, e.g., oppositions and patterns of repetition; and to stanza construction, e.g., two lines, three lines, or more than three lines. Internal characteristics refer to the content, esp. to the various figures of speech (izifengqo) and imagery.

I. Verse Structure. Traditional Zulu poets could not have had any idea of verses. Their poetry knew no structural appearance of poetry as we know it today. The division into verse structure was introduced by the mod. poet when he or she tried to commit the oral poem to paper, and the idea of the length of each line must have been based on formulas (see ORAL-FORMULAIC THEORY, ORAL POETRY). This loose style of the praise poem generally has been referred to as poetry composed in lines without patterns of rhyme and meter.

Zulu traditional poems, esp. praise poems, are composed in lines that are based on the stresses resulting from the meaning of the line and its natural and punctuated pauses. Intonation is important in Zulu praise poems because Zulu is a tonal lang., like most Af. langs., and it is difficult to apply Eng. structural patterns to it. Various types of repetitions are characteristic of Zulu poetry. Rhythm in Zulu results from a particular patterning of the sounds of words in a line that reflects the poet's use of emphasis and tempo as well as stressed and unstressed syllables. Some elements of verse structure are:

(1) Apostrophe, or honorific address. E.g., in UMenzi kaNdaba! (He is Menzi [the Doer)], son of Ndaba!), King Senzangakhona, father of King Shaka, is praised as a descendant of King Ndaba and also as a member of the royal family. An *apostrophe is often formulated in relationship to someone else, esp. important members of the family.

(2) Simile and Metaphor. Simile* involves using comparative words, such as njenga (like), nganga (as), kuna (than):

UBhid' elimathetha ngezinyembezi
Linjeng' elikaPhik' eBulawini (Variegation like a multicolored animal Like that of Phiko at Bulawini)

*Metaphors are often poetic exaggerations.

(3) Description. Description is often couched in metaphoric lang.:

Ibhicongo elimzimba buthaka
Ozithebe zihle uMjokwane
Ozithebe zihle zidlel' amancasakazi

(Tree with a fragile trunk
Whose eating mats are beautiful
Whose beautiful eating mats are eaten from by the womenfolk)

This means that King Senzangakhona was popular with women.

(4) Parallelism (Impindamqondo). In parallelism*, related (similar or contrasting) ideas are linked by using similar constructions or words in successive lines. The following lines from the praises of King Ndaba show perfect parallelism:

Obeyalala wangangemifula,
Obeyavuka wangangezintaba.
(Who when he lay down was the size of rivers,
Who when he got up was the size of mountains.)

Normally, parallelism by final linking involves repetition of a noun, as in King Shaka's praises, where the term uhlanya joins the following two lines (see ANADIPLOSIS):

UMahlom'ehlathini onjengohlanya,
Uhlanya olusemehlwen' amadoda.
(He who armed in the forest, who is like a madman,
The madman who is in full view of the men.)

II. Early Zulu Poets. B. W. Vilakazi is the pioneer of Zulu poetry. In his first book, Inkondlo kaZulu (Zulu Poems, 1935), Vilakazi experimented with rhyme. According to Nyembezi (1961), Vilakazi's eminence can be attributed to the fact that "he was mainly responsible for developing poetry whose form departed radically from the Izibongo (or praises). Instead of adapting the style and pattern of the Izibongo, he experimented with Eur. form." Ten years later, in 1945, Vilakazi's second book of poems appeared under the title Amal'Ezulu (Zulu Horizons); he apparently was not happy with the results of his Eur. experiment because, in Amal' Ezulu, he discarded rhyme almost completely.

The most important poet to appear in the 1950s was J. C. Dlamini. His first volume, Inzululwane (Dizziness), was published in 1959. Cope remarks, "In his volume of verse he shows a return to the traditional model of the praise poem, with a completely different sort of content. Dlamini uses the technique of the traditional praise-poem to express his philosophical and psychological problems . . . often obscure but constantly strong and deep."

The 1980s can justifiably be regarded as the "decade of poetry" in Zulu. More volumes of poetry in Zulu were published than at any previous time. Poets who published at least four titles include L.B.Z. Buthelezi, L.T.L. Mabuya, and C. T. Msimang. Msimang's Iziziba Zothukela (Deep Pools of the Thukela River, 1980) contains both praise poems and mod. poems. Like their predecessors, these poets manage to produce a synthesis of traditional and mod. styles, composing many poems in the style of the typical oral praise poem. The most outstanding book, however, is Z.L.M. Khumalo's voluminous work Amabhosho (Bullets, 1989); in this work, Khumalo composed mod. praise poems and used parallelism, linking, refrains, and repetitions that are characteristic of Zulu poetry.

III. Post-Apartheid Era. The beginning of the 1990s saw many political changes in South Africa, particularly the coming of democracy in 1994. The new era brought its own difficulties and challenges, incl. reconciling the various factions formed under apartheid, dealing with the past, building a cohesive nation, and fighting crime, drugs, and HIV/AIDS. These challenges demanded the focus and energy of the Zulu poets to respond to the situation with their poetry.

The 21st c. saw the emergence of many female Zulu poets. An anthol. of women's poetry, Izimbali Zesizwe (Flowers of the Nation), was published in 2005; Ithunga Lenkosazana (The Lady's Milking Pail) in 2007; Izintombi Zengcugce (Maidens of Ingcugce Regiment) in 2008. The poet Lungile Bengani published Kwenzekeni Bazali Bami? (What Has Happened, My Parents?) in 2008. These titles do not provide any significant description; the poet chooses any title for his or her book.

Traditional oral Zulu poetry was characterized by simplicity of form. Mod. Zulu poets have since tried their hand at more sophisticated Western forms, with a certain measure of success. In these attempts, they have also realized the necessity of retaining some of the simpler elements found in traditional poetry so that their work may retain a distinct form, a typical Zulu character that cannot be achieved by following Western standards in all respects.

■ C.L.S. Nyembezi, A Review of Zulu Literature (1961); Izibongo, Zulu Praise-Poems, ed. T. Cope (1968); D.B.Z. Ntuli and C. F. Swanepoel, South African Literature in African Languages (1993); N. Canonici, Zulu Oral Poetry (1994); C.L.S. Nyembezi, A Catalogue of Literature (2007).

A. M. MAPHUMULO

Index

Page numbers in boldface indicate article titles.

"A" (Zukofsky), 322, 504, 592
Aakjær, Jeppe, 346
Aarestrup, Emil, 346
Aarseth, E. J., 328
Aasen, Ivar, 939, 954
Abay, 1467, 1468
ʿAbbās ibn al-Aḥnaf, 67, 570
ʿAbd al-Sabūr, ṣalāḥ, 70, 392
Abdalla, Abdilatif, 1381
Abdel-Halim, Kamal, 392
Abdulla, Fathy, 392
abecedarius, 1, 6
Abela, Eduardo, 203
Abelard, Peter, 620, 790, 856, 1041
"Abendlied" (Keller), 1139
Abenteuer des frommen Helden Aeneas, Die (Blumauer), 104
Abercrombie, David, 495
Abercrombie, Lascelles, 556
Abhinavagupta, 620, 1247, 1248
aboriginal Australian poetry, 100, 101, 102, 763, 1154
Abraham a Sancta Clara, 104
Abraham sacrifiant (Beza), 511, 1449
Abrams, M. H., 318, 473, 831, 991, 1046, 1047, 1061
Abrégé de l'art poétique françois (Ronsard), 174, 1042, 1059 Absalom and Achitophel (Dryden), 40, 59, 420, 1058, 1064, 1257 absorption, 1–2
Abū al-Abbas al-Amā al-Tutīlī, 28
Abū al-ʿAlāʾ al-Maʿarrī, 68
Abū al-Atāhiya, 67
Abū Hilāl al-ʿAskarī, 64
Abū Ishāq Ibrahīm ibn Sahl, 28
Abulafia, Abraham, 600
Abulafia, Todros, 1333
Abū Māḍī, Īliyyā, 70
Abū Nuwās, 28, 67, 391, 541, 570
Abū Rīsha, ʿUmar, 70
Abū Saʿīd-i Abi al-Khayr, 1227
Abū-Shādī, Aḥmad Zakī, 70, 392
Abu-Sinna, Mohamad Ibrahim, 392
Abū Tammām, 28, 63, 68, 391
Abutsu, 757
"Académie de Poésie et de Musique" (Baïf), 251
Acasubi, Hilario, 79, 540 accent, 2–3, 252, 385, 526, 1541–42 accentual-syllabic verse, 3–4, 115, 119, 246, 367, 430, 431 accentual verse, 4–5, 119, 373, 411, 496–97, 574, 873–74, 1396; Christabel meter, 246, 422
Accessus ad auctores (Tegernsee), 678
Accioly, Marcus, 163
Acconci, Vito, 292
acephalous, 5, 47, 130, 213
Acevedo, Rafael, 206
Acharnians (Aristophanes), 580, 1107, 1183
Achebe, Chinua, 465
Achillini, Claudio, 847
Achleitner, Friedrich, 105, 1038
Achterberg, Gerrit, 823
Achyutananda Das, 984
acmeism, 5–6, 607, 891, 1218, 1236, 1363
Acorn, Milton, 179
Acosta, Agustín, 203
Acosta, Cecilio, 1504
Acosta, Feliciano, 587
Acosta, Vicente, 400
Acosta Bello, Arnaldo, 1505
"Acquainted with the Night" (Frost), 436, 1424 acrostic, 1, 6, 48, 167, 399, 612, 764–65, 799, 1547
Acuña, Hernando de, 1337
Acuña, Manuel, 880
Acuña de Figueroa, Francisco, 1499
Adam, Helen, 130
Adam, Paul, 1517
Adam de la Halle, 509, 1008, 1460
Adam Homo (Paludan-Müller), 346
Adam of St. Victor, 646
Adamovich, Georgy, 1241
"Adams and Liberty" (Paine), 1483
"Adam's Curse" (Yeats), 464, 728
Adamson, Robert, 102
Adán, Martín, 458, 1029
Adapa (epic), 96
Adcock, Fleur, 944
Addison, Joseph, 48, 57, 98, 478, 598, 762, 782, 1374, 1417, 1496; false wit, 1540; genius, 550; georgic, 557; image, 660; imagination, 669, 672; neoclassical poetics, 929, 931, 933; taste, 1412; tragicomedy, 1453 address, 6–8, 1145, 1162
Adel und Untergang (Weinheber), 105
Adenez le Roi, 1460
Adiaffi, Jean-Marie, 17
Admonition (Spicer), 1295
Adolescence clémentine, L' (Marot), 510
Adolphe (Constant), 1220
"Adonais" (Shelley), 397, 423, 1406
Adone, L' (Marino), 123, 847, 930, 986 adonic, 8–9
Adorno, Theodor W., 108, 112, 124, 294, 635, 715, 772, 1066, 1443; Frankfurt school, 518–20, 521, 522; lyric, 326, 832, 1061; politics, 1079; technology, 1414, 1416
Adoum, Jorge Enrique, 389
Adūnis (pseud. of ʿAlī Aḥmad Saʿīd), 64–65, 70, 819
Ady, Endre, 643
adynaton, 9, 61
Ælfic, 559
Aeneid (Virgil), 13, 35, 39, 43, 59, 60, 61, 94, 98, 214, 257, 349, 448, 556, 616, 628, 648, 912, 993, 1183; aposiopesis, 61, 1405; ekphrasis, 393; epic conventions, 440, 441, 442–43, 444–45; eroticism, 456; French parody, 511; hexameter, 627, 628; historical record, 636; imitation, 676, 678, 679; inspiration, 709; male prowess, 544; medieval rewriting, 852, 854; prose paraphrase, 1511; rota virgiliana, 1226, 1227; syllepsis, 1391; syntax, 1402; translations, 145, 146, 147, 148, 251, 265, 313, 414, 420, 432, 511, 625, 1007, 1274–75, 1516; Ukrainian travesty, 1477
Aenigmata (Symphosius), 53 aeolic, 9–10, 51, 260, 435, 576
Aeschylus, 41, 46, 245, 253, 261, 266, 282, 377, 470, 781, 1054, 1154; synaesthesia, 1398; tragedy, 579, 1446, 1447, 1448, 1449, 1450; trilogy, 1458
Aesop, 37, 476, 1510
Aesthetes (Armenia), 84–856
aestheticism, 10–11, 62, 88, 109, 110, 161, 182, 424, 512–13, 566, 634, 1061, 1079, 1194, 1216, 1234; decadence, 338–39; fleshly school, 492–93; Pre-Raphaelites, 1103, 1215
Aethiopis (Arctinus), 442
Aetia (Callimachus), 34–35, 255, 444, 1150
"Afar in the Desert" (Pringle), 1330
Afeqerq Yohannis, 462 affect, 11–12, 13, 77, 1059. See also emotion affective fallacy, 11, 12–13, 365, 404, 936, 937, 1146 afflatus, 13, 709, 1058
Afifi Matar, Mohamad, 392
Africa (Petrarch), 264, 443, 740, 857, 1164
Africa, poetry of, 13–20, 516, 596–97, 1062, 1380–82
African American poetry, 20–25, 43, 279, 337, 433, 717, 1485, 1486, 1489, 1493; canon, 187; dialect, 356, 361; signifying, 1002, 1306. See also blues; Harlem Renaissance; hip-hop poetics; jazz; Negritude Afro-Caribbean poetry. See Caribbean, poetry of

"Again I Visited" (Pushkin), 150
Against Expression (Dworkin), 292
"Against Fruition" (Suckling), 286
"Against Hope" (Cowley), 286
Against Voluptuous Bodies (Bernstein), 108
Agamben, Giorgio, 1328–29, 1543
Agard, John, 1094
Agarwala, Chandrakumar, 94
Agathias, 53, 172
Agathon, 1357
Age of Anxiety, The (Auden), 379, 425, 1005
Agnon, S. Y., 600
Agolli, Dritëro, 31
Agrarians, 25–26, 130, 531, 936
Agricola, Mikael, 489
Agricola, Rudolphus, 1179
"Agrippa" (Gibson), 395
Agrippa, Heinrich Cornelius, 89, 445
agudeza, 26, 122, 291, 586, 1339
Agudeza y arte de ingenio (Gracián), 26, 122, 290, 843, 1060, 1159, 1166, 1339
"Agueynaba el bravo" (Rivera), 201
Águila o Sol (Paz), 697
Aguilera, Fausto, 588
Aguilö, Marià, 212
Aguiló, Tomàs, 212
Aguiluchos, Los (Marechal), 80
Aguirre, Juan Bautista, 388
Agustini, Delmira, 481, 895, 1345, 1499–1500
Agyeya (pseud. of S. H. Vatsyayan), 631–32
Ahavat Tapu'ach Hazahav (Rabikovitch), 608
Ahima'ats, 604, 605
Ahluwalia, Jasbir Singh, 1133
Ahmed Ibn Tulun, 391
Ahmet Pasha, 1471
Aḥwaṣ al-Anṣāri, al-, 570
Ai, 898
Aichinger, Ilse, 105, 568
Aidoo, 1451
Aidt, Naja Marie, 348
Aiiieeeee! (anthol.), 92
Aiken, Joseph, 1402
air, 26
"Air That They Breathe Out West, The" (Kiskaddon), 313
Aistis, Jonas, 810
Aitmatov, Chingiz, 1468
Ajax (Sophocles), 1449
Ak'abal, Humberto, 589, 698
Akenside, Mark, 421, 669–70, 931, 972, 1291
Åkesson, Sonia, 1384
Akhmatova, Anna, 5, 111, 398, 481, 607, 818, 891, 1051, 1156, 1234, 1235; politics, 1079, 1236, 1237; war poetry, 1532
Akhṭal, al-, 67
Akif, Mehmet, 1473, 1474
Akiko, Baba, 751
Akiko, Yosano, 750, 819
Akin, Gülten, 1473–74
Akkadian poetry. See Assyria and Babylonia, poetry of "A la agricultura de la zona tórrida" (Bello), 1504
Aladdin (Oehlenschläger), 149
Alamanni, Antonio, 838
Alamanni, Luigi, 145, 556, 742, 909, 972, 1015
alaṃkāra, 27, 354, 685, 1245, 1247, 1310, 1502
"A la musique" (Rimbaud), 513–14 al-Andalus, poetry of, 27–29, 68–69, 203, 1333, 1337, 1342
Alan of Lille, 286, 413, 791, 854, 1115
Ālāol, 137
"A la pà" (Aribau), 212
Alarcón de Folgar, Romelia, 589
Alas, Javier, 401
"Alastor" (Shelley), 423, 1014, 1398 alba, 29–30, 307–8, 508
"Alba" (Creeley), 30
"Alba" (Pound), 30
Alba, Patricia, 1030
Albania, poetry of, 30–31
Albert-Birot, Pierre, 842
Alberti, Leon Battista. See Battista Alberti, Leon
Alberti, Rafael, 189, 934, 1340, 1341
Albertus Magnus, 478, 854
Albiach, Anne-Marie, 483, 887
Albinus, 619
Albiston, Jordie, 103
Albizu Campos, Pedro, 203
Albizzi, Francheschino degli, 375
Albrecht von Johansdorf, 887
Alcaeus, 31, 90, 209, 244, 262, 333, 573, 725, 817, 971; aeolic, 9, 576; lyric fragments, 577, 645, 826, 827; monodic, 862; sapphic, 1254 alcaic, 31, 260, 817, 862, 897
Alcalá y Herrera, Alonso, 809
Alcântra, Oswaldo (pseud. of Baltasar Lopes da Silva), 17–18
Alcázar, Baltasar, 449, 1337
Alcestis (Euripides), 600, 1183, 1453
Alchemist, The (Jonson), 6, 417
Alchemist, The (Pound), 224
Alciato, Andrea, 562
Alcibiades, 451
Alcidamas, 444
Alcman, 31, 245, 261, 577
alcmanic verse, 31
Alcools (Apollinaire), 515
Alcover, Joan, 212
Alcuin of York, 208, 790, 1116
Aldana, Francisco da, 148, 1337
Aldhelm, 6, 790, 994, 1116, 1200, 1273
Aldington, Richard, 675
aleatory poetics, 31–34, 334, 983, 1059, 1518
Alegría, Claribel, 401, 948, 1347
Aleijadinho, O, 122
Aleixandre, Vicente, 542, 1340, 1341
Alencar, José de, 279
Aleppo Codex, 610
Alexander (Gr. rhetorician), 50, 61
Alexander, Elizabeth, 24, 761
Alexander, James, 1482
Alexander, Meena, 92
Alexander, William, 1264
Alexander Numerenius, 225
Alexander of Hales, 853
Alexander of Ville Dei, 1281
"Alexander's Feast" (Dryden), 371, 393, 972
Alexandreis (anon.), 330
Alexandrescu, Grigore, 1205
Alexandriad (Gualtier), 330
Alexandrianism, 34–35, 255–56, 581–82, 934 alexandrine, 35–36, 340, 370, 410, 508, 526, 625, 1043, 1197, 1425; couplet, 310, 377–78
Alexandru, Ioan, 1206
Alexie, Sherman, 761, 1108
Alexis, Guillaume, 150
Alexis of Thurii, 283
Alfabet (Brøndal), 348
Alfani, Gianni, 374
Alféri, Pierre, 516
Alfieri, Vittorio, 191, 736, 743, 744, 745, 1319
Alfonso X el Sábio (King of Castile/León), 1297, 1333, 1334, 1348
Alfonso, Antonio d', 184
Alfred (Anglo-Saxon king), 1115, 1273
Algarín, Miguel, 961, 962, 1494
Algonkian, 699–700
Alharisi, Yehuda, 993
Ali, Agha Shahid, 92, 1064, 1093–94
Ali, Muhammad, 1468 alienation effect, 378, 1146
Alishan, Ghevont, 84
Alisjahbana, Sutan Takdir, 702
Alison, Archibald, 670, 1412
Alix, Juan Antonio, 201
Aliyu, Akilu, 597
Alizadeh, Ali, 102
Alkman, 863
allaeostropha, 36–37
Allais, Alphonse, 514, 987
Allama Prabhu, 767 allegory, 37–40, 253, 258, 413, 415, 508, 552, 629, 633, 636, 739, 1099; dream vision, 384; eclogue, 386; epic, 445, 446, 484; figura vs., 486; hermeneutics, 619–20; iconology, 656–57; interpretation, 633, 1036–37; medieval, 620; obscurity, 964–65; personification, 1026; religious, 1155; symbol vs., 660, 671, 1393, 1395. See also myth Allegria (Ungaretti), 747
"Allegro, L'" (Milton), 41, 129–30, 419, 618, 782, 898, 965, 970, 1425, 1463; companion poem, 286; imitations of, 1291
Allen, Donald, 54, 102, 144–45, 287, 645, 975, 1110, 1439, 1492
Allen, Elizabeth Akers, 1149
Allen, Paula Gunn, 482
Allen, Robert, 285
Allen, W. S., 1017, 1137

"All Fours" (Raworth), 1332
Alliksaar, Artur, 460
Allingham, William, 728 alliteration, 4, 40–42, 90, 224, 501, 804; English prosody, 411, 412, 430, 431–32; Germanic prosody, 558, 559; Icelandic poetry, 653–54; jingle, 763; light verse, 799–800; Norse poetry, 952; repetition, 1169
Alliterative Morte Arthure, The, 558
Alliterative Revival, 412, 431, 873
Allston, Washington, 963 allusion, 35, 42–43, 862
Almada-Negreiros, José Sobral de, 1091
Almagro, Diego de, 153
Almario, Virgilio S., 1032
Almeida, Guilherme de, 161
Almeida, Leonor de, 1090
Almeida, Manuel Pires de, 466–67
Almqvist, Carl Jonas Love, 1383
"Alocución a la poesía" (Bello), 1504
Alonso, Amado, 458, 459
Alonso, Dámaso, 124, 458, 459, 934, 1218, 1341
Alonso, Manuel, 201
"Al Parana" (Lavardén), 79
Alpen, Die (Haller), 562, 1385
Alphabet (Brøndal), 348
Alphabet (Valéry), 1113
Alphabet of Tales, 470
Alphen, Hieronymus van, 821
Alps, The (Haller), 562, 1385
Al Que Quiere! (Williams), 1487
Alsop, Richard, 297
"Altar, The" (Herbert), 497, 1146, 1417, 1523
Altazor (Huidobro), 230, 316, 1328, 1346
Altenberg, Peter, 680, 1113
Alterman, Nathan, 607, 608, 614
Althusser, Louis, 135, 324, 405, 635, 938, 939, 1418
Altieri, Charles, 813
Alunāns, Juris, 794
Alurista (pseud. of Alberto Urista Heredia), 228
Alvarado, Hipólito, 389
Alvarado, Huberto, 588
Alvarado Tenorio, Harold, 276
Alvarenga, Luis, 401
Alvarenga, Silva, 160
Alvarez, A., 1079–80
Álvarez, José María, 1341
Álvarez, Mario Rubén, 587
Álvarez, Montserrat, 1030
Alvarez Castro, Miguel, 400
Alver, Betti, 460
Alvim, Francisco, 163
Amabhosho (Khumalo), 1554
Amadiume, Ifi, 819
A máquina do mundo repensada (Campos), 163
Amarakeerthi, Liyanage, 1356
Amaral, Ana Luísa, 1092
Amarilis, 1028
Amaruśataka (anthol.), 1101
"Amatory Lines" (Gray), 140
Amauta (jour.), 1028, 1029, 1346
Ambición de las flores (Belloc), 82 ambiguity, 43–45
Aṃbikātanayadatta (pseud. of D. R. Bendre), 767
Ambokhnerë Khelagavaretz (Charents), 85
Ambrogini, Agnolo. See Politian
Ambrose, 29, 134, 138, 353, 468, 620, 1155; hymn, 645–46, 652, 789, 856, 970, 1184
Amerasekera, Gunadasa, 1356
Amerbach, Veit, 669
"America" (Ginsberg), 1122
America and Other Poems (Whitfield), 20
America Is in the Heart (Bulosan), 91
American Hybrid (anthol.), 644, 645
American Indian poetry. See indigenous Americas, poetry of the "American Poems" (Dias), 161
American poetry. See United States, poetry of the American Poetry, Selected and Original (Smith, ed.), 1480 American Sign Language poetry, 45, 1191
Amers (Perse), 516
Âme solitaire, L' (Lozeau), 182
Ameto (Boccaccio), 1007, 1116
Amharic poetry. See Ethiopia, poetry of Amichai, Yehudah, 608, 614, 615, 818, 819, 1125, 1157
Aminta (Tasso), 124, 1007
Amis, Kingsley, 425, 799, 901
Amittai ben Shephatiah, 605
Ammons, A. R., 311, 360, 437, 783, 899, 1096, 1455, 1493, 1540
"Amo a mi amo" (Morejón), 205
"Among School Children" (Yeats), 336, 425, 986, 1188, 1394
Amores (Ovid), 396, 451, 456, 624
Amoretti (Spenser), 220, 415, 416, 959, 1031, 1086, 1320, 1321
Amorosa visione (Boccaccio), 6, 736
"Amouret Anacreontic, An" (Drayton), 367
"Amoureuse, L'" (Éluard), 515
Amour fou, L'(Breton), 32
Amours, Les (Ronsard), 289, 510, 1031, 1086
Amours de Psyche et Cupidon, Les (La Fontaine), 1231 Amours de Voyage (Clough), 424 amphibrach, 45, 49, 140, 1235
Amphion, 510, 908, 1048
Amphitruo (Plautus), 282, 1453 amplification, 45–46, 1129
"AM/TRAK" (Baraka), 761
Anabase (Perse), 516
anaclasis, 46, 372
anacoluthon, 46–47, 61, 484
Anacreon, 9, 46, 53, 573, 579, 817, 826, 862, 972, 1042, 1108
Anacreontea (anthol.), 46, 579 anacreontic, 46, 47, 190, 579, 725, 817, 972, 1339 anacrusis, 47–48, 652–53 anadiplosis, 48, 50, 220
Anagnórisis (Segovia), 882 anagram, 6, 48–49, 399, 904
Anahuac, 691, 695–98
"Anakreons Grab" (Goethe), 46 analogy. See metaphor; simile; symbol Ānandavardhana, 354, 620, 1246–47
Ananius, 244
Ananta Das, 984
Anantapuravarṇṇanam, 839
anapest, 4, 49–50, 139, 433, 1109, 1202 anaphora, 50, 111, 122, 150, 214, 524, 651, 1044
Anarchiad, The, 297, 1483
Anathémata, The (Jones), 425, 813
Anatomy of Melancholy, The (Burton), 640
Anaxagoras, 179
anceps, 9, 50–51, 86
Anceschi, Luciani, 747–48
Anchieta, José de, 160
"Ancient Gypsy, The" (Vörösmarty), 642
Andalas Nusa Harapan (Yamin), 701
Anday, Melih Cevdet, 1473
"And Death Shall Have No Opinion" (Thomas), 300
Andersen, Benny, 347
Andersen, Steindór, 1201
Andersen, Vita, 348
Anderson, Doug, 1532
Anderson, James, 178
Anderson, Maxwell, 378
Anderson, Sherwood, 596
"An die Freude" (Schiller), 564, 972
"An die Nachgeborenen" (Brecht), 438
Andijewska, Emma, 1479
Andrada, Francisco de, 1089
Andrade, Eugénio de, 542, 1092
Andrade, Mário de, 161–62, 163, 535, 542, 692
Andrade, Oswald de, 161, 162, 950, 1048
André, Paul, 133
"Andrea del Sarto" (Browning), 394, 423, 1145
Andreas Capellanus, 311
Andreu, Blanca, 1342
Andrewes, Lancelot, 599
Andrew of Crete, 171
Andrew of Wyntoun, 1274
Andrews, Bruce, 506, 784, 1048, 1494
Andrukhovych, Yuri, 1479 anecdote, 51, 938
Aneirin, 218, 1533, 1534
Anelida and Arcite (Chaucer), 432, 1193
Angelou, Maya, 24
Angira, Jared, 15
Angle of Ascent (Hayden), 23
Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 411
Ang Mahal na Pasion (Aquino), 1032

Angus, Marion, 1276
Aniara (Martinson), 149
Anil (pseud. of Atmaram Ravji Deshpande), 847
Aniñir, David, 846
Anīs (Babar Alī), 1498
Aniversario de una visión (Saenz), 154
"Annabel Lee" (Poe), 1484
Annales (Enius), 256
Annamayya (Annamācārya), 1420
Anne de Marquets, 354
Annenskii, Innokenty, 1234, 1235
Annie Allen (Brooks), 23, 482
Anniversaries (Donne), 123, 286, 449, 1267
Annus Mirabilis (Dryden), 420
Anotaciones (Herrera), 124
Another Time (Auden), 425
Anowa (Aidoo), 1451
Anscombe, G.E.M., 108
Anselm, 633, 719
Anteparaíso (Zurita), 232
Antequere, José de, 153 anthem, national, 51–52; African American, 22, 596; El Salvador, 400; Ethiopian, 463; German, 565; Greek, 583; Hungarian, 642; U.S., 51, 1483
anthimeria, 52, 1086–87
Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue française (Senghor, ed.), 16, 197, 926 anthology, 52–55
anthropology and poetry, 55–57; oral-formulaic theory, 976–77
anticlimax, 57–58, 128
Antigona Furiosa (Gambaro), 781
Antigone (Sophocles), 781, 1449, 1451, 1452
Antigone en creole (Morisseau-LeRoy), 1452
Antimachus, 443, 581
antimetabole, 58
Antin, David, 710, 1018, 1353, 1493
antipast, 58
Antiphon (Barnes), 380
antiquaroamos, 1223
Antiquités de Rome, Les (Bellay), 1043, 1319, 1321 antistrophe, 58, 453, 627, 971 antithesis, 58–59, 1139
"Antologia" (Bandeira), 220
Antonio, Manoel, 538
Antonio da Tempo, 173
Antonius, A Tragœdie (Garnier), 416
antonomasia, 59
Antony and Cleopatra (Shakespeare), 9, 382, 417, 848, 1351, 1510, 1531
Antonych, Bohdan Ihor, 1478
antropofagia, 59–60, 162, 1500
Antschel, Paul. See Celan, Paul
Antunes, Arnaldo, 163
Anwar, Chairil, 702
Anyidoho, Kofi, 14
Anzaldúa, Gloria, 280, 482, 797, 798, 1062, 1140
Aparanetsi, Simeon, 84
Apel, K.-O., 622
aphaeresis, 60, 1400
aphorism. See epigram apocope, 60, 1400
Apollinaire, Guillaume, 111, 208, 316, 514, 950, 991, 1328, 1387, 1517; calligramme, 175, 176, 533, 629, 696, 746, 890, 1416, 1417, 1523, 1524; conversation poem, 304–5, 891; cubism, 321, 322; fragments, 506; manifesto, 843; monostich, 899; mosaic rhyme, 900; surrealism, 515, 1378; tétramètre, 1425; typography, 1414–15, 1476
Apollinaris Sidonius, 789, 993, 994
Apollo/Apollonian, 216, 255, 256, 266, 335, 990, 1064, 1213, 1446
Apollonios Dyskolos, 1403
Apollonius of Rhodes, 34, 35, 349, 443, 444, 581
Apollonius of Tyre, 859
Apollo Society (Cairo), 70
"Apologia Pro Vita Sua" (Wright), 862
Apologie pour Hérodote (Estienne), 1042 aporia, 44, 60
aposiopesis, 60–61, 1405 apostrophe, 61–62, 411, 1026, 1121, 1145, 1526
"Apostrophe" (Culler), 61
Apostrophe (Kennedy), 292
Apparao, Gurajada, 1420
Appayya Dīkṣita, 1, 1248, 1249
Appel, Karel, 132 appreciation, 62
"Après-midi d'un faune, L" (Mallarmé), 82, 336, 514, 680, 1012, 1397
"Apu Inca Atawallpaman," 1027
Apukhtin, Aleksei, 1233
Apuleius, 128, 1257
Apu Ollanta, 694
ʿAql, Sāʿid, 70
ʿAqqād, Mahmoud Abbas al-, 70, 392
Aquila, Serafino dall', 1319
Aquinas. See Thomas Aquinas
Aquino de Belen, Gaspar, 1032
Aquitaine, Duke of. See William IX
"Arabesco" (Díaz), 203
Arabescos mentales (Boti), 202
Arabic poetics, 62–65
Arabic poetry, 65–72, 362, 391–92, 858, 1136, 1467. See also al-Andalus, poetry of Arabic prosody, 68, 72–75
Aracakecari, 1356
Arachilochus, 79
"Arado de palo" (Queupul), 845
Aragon, Louis, 198, 515, 900, 1378
Aragona, Tullia d', 1031
Arana, Sabino, 127
Arango, Gonzalo, 276
Arango, José Manuel, 276
Arango, Luis Alfredo, 588
Arany, János, 641, 642
Arapi, Faros, 31
Arasanayagam, Jean, 1357
Aratus, 362, 581, 788
Araucana, La (Ercilla), 79, 229–30, 278, 280, 441, 443, 484, 695, 1008, 1164, 1327, 1343
Araucanian poetry. See indigenous Americas, poetry of the Arauco domado (Oña), 230, 1343
Aravinthan, 1357
Ara Vos Prec (Eliot), 890
"Araxi Artasuke" (Patkanian), 84
Arbeláez, Fernando, 276
Arbeláez, Jota Mario, 276
Árbol adentro (Paz), 881
Arbor of Amorous Devices, The (Breton), 54
Arcades Project (Benjamin), 504
Arcadia (Sannazaro), 351, 741, 1007, 1116, 1165, 1510
Arcadia (Sidney), 251, 351, 628, 964–65, 1000, 1007, 1032, 1162, 1165, 1297, 1510
Arcanjo, Neide, 163
Arce, Manuel José, 588
Arce, Manuel Maples, 881
Arc-en-ciel pour l'Occident chrétien, Un (Depestre), 199
"Archaïscher Torso Apollos" (Rilke), 506 archaism, 75–76, 442, 446 archetype, 76–79, 906, 1128–29, 1392
Archias, 256
Archil II (King of Georgia), 555
archilochian, 79, 97
Archilochus, 97, 261, 396, 454, 476, 577, 652, 723, 749, 817, 1459, 1530
Archpoet, 574
Arciniegas, Ismael Enrique, 275
Arctinus of Miletus, 442, 443
Arden, John, 378
Ardoises du toit, Les (Reverdy), 515
Arenas, Reinaldo, 205
Arendt, Hannah, 87–88
Areopagitica (Milton), 156
Areopagus, 79
Aretino, Pietro, 455, 456
Arévalo Martínez, Rafael, 587
Are We Rome? (Murphy), 266
Arezzo. See Guittone d'Arezzo
Argentina, La (Barco), 79
Argentina, poetry of, 79–82, 1014, 1344, 1345, 1346; gaucho, 540; XUL, 1545–46
Arghezi, Tudor, 1206
Argonautica (Apollonius), 34, 443, 444, 581
Arguedas, José María, 694, 1027, 1029
Argueta, Manlio, 401
Arguijo, Juan de, 1337 argument, 82
Aribau, Bonaventura Carles, 212
ʿArīḍa, Nasīb, 70
Aridjis, Homero, 437
Ariel (Plath), 426
Arion (Gr. poet), 371, 577
Arion, Frank Martinus, 193
Ariosto, Ludovico, 103, 121, 190, 191, 289, 351, 363, 456, 471, 583, 736, 741, 742, 792, 838, 860; epic, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445–46; gender, 545; hendecasyllable, 735; imitation, 679, 1162; in medias res, 708; narrative poem, 913, 1060; ottava rima, 913, 986; paronomasia, 1004; patronage, 1011; Renaissance poetics, 1160, 1162, 1164; verse epistle, 1513; verso sdrucciolo, 1519

Ariosto, Corneille e Shakespeare (Croce), 1061
Aristarchus, 255
Aristophanes (448–380 BCE), 220, 245, 253, 281, 282, 377, 435, 749, 788, 1054, 1183; comedy, 580–81; mimesis, 884–85; parabasis, 996; priamel, 1107 Aristophanes of Byzantium (257–180 BCE), 255, 1131, 1259–60
Aristotle, 46, 63, 64, 98, 122, 123, 224, 226, 245, 295, 441, 468, 580, 718; affect, 11, 1059; ambiguity, 43; antithesis, 59; belief, 134, 136; catharsis, 214, 215, 216, 403, 443, 929, 1010, 1045, 1126, 1146, 1434, 1447; classical poetics, 253, 254–55, 257, 1509; comedy, 282; concision, 293; dactylo-epitrite, 333; decorum, 341; description, 349; diction, 359; Dolce stil nuovo, 374; drama, 376; enargeia, 409; epic, 443–44, 445, 446; epideictic oratory, 448; episodic plot, 441; ethos, 464; expression, 473; genres, 551–52, 1059; Gorgian figures, 1193; history, 633, 636, 637; homoeoteleuton, 639; hyperbole, 648, 1010; iambic trimeter, 1459; icon, 656; imagery, 662; imagination, 667, 669; imitation, 676, 677, 803, 805, 1059, 1162, 1173; intuition, 719–20; invention, 724; irony, 731; medieval poetics, 853–54; metaphor, 864, 865–66, 1200, 1307; mimesis, 507, 633, 885, 990, 1071, 1161, 1173, 1177; myth, 906; paean, 990; pathos, 1010; philosophy, 1034–35; plot, 441, 707, 928, 1044, 1045; poetic license, 1057; poetic theory, 1058, 1059, 1060, 1065, 1066, 1172; poetry and prose, 1509; Renaissance rediscovery of, 741, 1158–59, 1161, 1180, 1496, 1509; rhetoric, 1177, 1178, 1179; rhythm, 1114; riddle, 1200; simile, 865, 1307; stasimon, 1359; structure, 1366; style, 1369; tone, 1441; tragedy, 579, 1035, 1160, 1447, 1448; tragicomedy, 1453; trochaic tetrameter, 1424; unity, 1496, 1591
Aristoxenus, 496, 878, 1135
Arjan, Gurū, 1132
ʿArjī, al-, 570
Armand, Louis, 1367
Armando (pseud. of H. D. van Dodeweerd), 824
Armantrout, Rae, 482, 1494
Armenian poetry and poetics, 82–86
Armes Prydain, 1534
Armitage, Simon, 426
Armour, Richard, 799
Armstrong, Jeannette, 180
Arnaut Daniel, 508, 736, 950, 1071, 1297, 1464
Arnaut de Maruelh, 302
Arndt, Ernst Moritz, 565
Arnheim, Rudolf, 1414
Arnim, Achim von, 118, 564–65, 1220, 1378
Arnold, Gottfried, 562
Arnold, Matthew, 49, 135, 187, 270, 286, 357, 423–24, 471, 498, 911, 1127, 1194, 1223, 1265, 1297, 1348; aestheticism, 10; Christian plain style, 1041; classical meter, 252, 1114; concision, 293; cultural criticism, 323, 324, 325; didacticism, 363; English prosody, 433; evaluation, 465; Hebraism vs. Hellenism, 598; heroic couplet, 625; historicism, 634; imagination, 669; intensity, 711; knowledge, poetic, 772; landscape, 783; monody, 897; parody of, 1003; poetics, 1060; postromanticism, 1215; promotion, 1110; religious poetry, 1156; sincerity, 1308; sound, 1324–25; topos, 1443; touchstones, 1444
Aronputo, Karl, 490
"A Roosevelt" (Darío), 946
Arp, Hans (Jean), 32, 112, 333, 335, 1386
Arráz, Antonio, 1504
Arrebo, Anders, 345
Arregi, Rikardo, 127
Arrese-Beitia, Felipe, 127
Arrivants, The (Brathwaite), 196, 1094
Arrufat, Antón, 1452
Ars amatoria (Ovid), 311, 362, 456, 679, 817, 993 arsis and thesis, 86, 166
Ars poetica. See Horace
Ars poética (Huidobro), 316
"Ars Poetica" (MacLeish), 1000, 1047
Artaud, Antonin, 131, 378, 379, 387, 1328, 1378, 1414, 1415, 1418
Art de dictier, L' (Deschamps), 507, 853, 1282
Artefactos (Parra), 231
arte mayor, 86
arte menor, 86–87, 1335
Arte nuevo de hacer comedias, El (Lope), 123, 148, 377
Arte of English Poesie, The. See Puttenham, George
"art for art's sake." See aestheticism
Arthurian legend, 412, 414, 423, 446, 508, 560, 659, 741, 859, 860, 912
"Arthur's Flogging" (Swinburne), 986 artifact, poetry as, 87–89, 1047–48 artifice, poetic, 89–90, 634
Artmann, H. C., 105, 568
Art of Dancing, The (Jenyns), 336
Art of Love (Ovid), 175
"Art poétique" (Verlaine), 513, 680
Art poétique, L' (Boileau), 124, 263, 828–89, 933, 1166; Dryden trans., 931
Art poétique, L' (Peletier), 174, 1161
Artur, Armando, 19
Arturo, Aurelio, 275
ʿArūḍmetrics, 73–75
Aruṇakirināṭar, 1410
Arvelo Larríva, Arvelo, 1505
Arzamas, 90
Arze, Joxean, 127
Asādhya Vīṇā (Agyeya), 631–32
Ascasubi, Hilario, 540
Ascensius, Badius, 1158
Ascham, Roger, 251, 628, 677, 679, 1159, 1161
asclepiad, 90–91
Asclepiades, 53, 90
Aseev, Nikolai, 1236
Ashbery, John, 8, 46, 267, 365, 366, 379, 543, 783, 898, 921; New York school, 940, 941, 1492; pantun, 995; postmodernism, 1095, 1096; prose poem, 1113; sestina, 1297; voice and tone, 1493
Ashes (Bely), 1235
Ash Wednesday (Eliot), 425, 1157, 1487
Asian American poetry, 91–93
Asian Canadian poetry, 92, 180
"Asian Peace Offers Rejected without Publication" (Bly), 1081
Aşik Ömer, 1472
Asís Fernández, Francisco, 947
"As I Walked Out One Evening" (Auden), 9, 914
ʿAskarī, Abū Hilāl al-, 64
"Ask Me No More" (Carew), 217
Ask Your Mama (Hughes), 376, 1170
Asmaʾu, Nana, 597
Aspazija (pseud. of Elza Rosenberga-Pliekšāne), 794
Aspenström, Werner, 1384
Asra, Der (Heine), 570
Asrā al-balāgha (al-Jurjāni), 64
Assamese poetry, 93–94
Assefa Gebre-Mariyam Tessemma, 463
assonance, 41, 94–95, 147, 173, 224, 804
Assyria and Babylonia, poetry of, 6, 95–97, 439, 681
Ast, Friedrich, 621
Astādhyāyi (Pāṇini), 983
Astel, Arnfrid, 149
"Asters" (Benn), 1106
"As the Cat" (Williams), 294
"As Toilsome I Wander'd Virginia's Woods" (Whitman), 451
"Astrophel" (Spenser), 415
Astrophil and Stella (Sidney), 50, 110, 416, 438, 449, 479, 532, 959, 999, 1031, 1043, 1058, 1086, 1109, 1142, 1150, 1164, 1179, 1320, 1321
Asturias, Miguel Ángel, 587–88
Astydamas, 1447
Aśvaghoṣa, 1244, 1252
Asymmetries (Mac Low), 33
asynarteton, 79, 97, 396
asyndeton, 15, 97–98, 400; polysyndeton vs., 1088

As You Like It (Shakespeare), 417, 479, 545
"Atardi" (Corsen), 192–93
Atencia, María Victoria, 1341
Athalie (Racine), 245
Athenaeum (jour.), 732, 733, 1061, 1219
Athenaeus, 649
Athenian Dionysia. See Great Dionysia
Atlàntida (Verdaguer), 212
Atmosphères, Les (Loranger), 182
"Atomernes Oprør" (Claussen), 346
Atsotizak eta neurtizak (Oihenart), 127
ʿAṭṭār, Farīd al-Dīn, 1022, 1228
Attendant Godot, En (Beckett), 379, 380, 381 attention, 98–99, 403
Atterbom, Per Daniel Amadeus, 1382–83
"At the Carnival" (Spencer), 22
"At the Closed Gate of Justice" (Carrothers), 21
"At the Fishhouses" (Bishop), 772
"At the Grave of Burns" (Wordsworth), 170
Attridge, Derek, 344, 496, 1110, 1352, 1375
Atwood, Margaret, 178, 179, 180–81, 483, 917, 1095
Atxaga, Bernardo, 127
"Aubade" (Auden), 30
"Aubade" (Larkin), 30
Aubanel, Théodore, 480
Aubignac, Abbé d', 245, 931
Aubigné, Théodore Agrippa d', 123, 124, 510, 511, 1518
Aucassin et Nicolette (anon.), 223, 507, 858, 1116, 1510
Audelay, John, 208
Auden, W. H., 23, 30, 57, 142, 143, 252, 266, 311, 320, 364, 386, 425, 433, 452, 541, 892, 919, 993, 1059, 1270; adynaton, 9; allusion, 42, 43; anaphora, 50; antonomasia, 59; asyndeton, 98; ballad, 914; bucolic, 167; choliambus, 244; consonance, 299; cossante, 308; description, 352; diction, 361; dimeter, 367; dramatic poetry, 378, 379; elegy, 397, 398; ellipsis, 400; heterometric stanza, 627; iambic tetrameter, 1425, 1457; as influence, 1491–92, 1494; irony, 733; landscape, 783; light verse, 799, 800; liturgical poem, 812; love poetry, 819; meiosis, 860–61; meter, 873–74; metonymy, 876; monologue, 409; music, 905; near rhyme, 925; occasional verse, 966; octosyllable, 970; ode, 973; pastiche, 1005; performance, 1017; poetic knowledge, 7, 773; priamel, 1107; reader, 1145, 1146; recusatio, 1150; religious poetry, 1157; rhyme, 1187; rhyme royal, 1194, 1294; sestina, 1297; Skeltonic, 1309; sonnet, 1320; syllabic verse, 1389; symbol, 1394; tail rhyme, 1308; terza rima, 1423; translation, 1457; villanelle, 1522; war poetry, 1531 audience. See performance; reader; reader response; rhetoric and poetry Auerbach, Erich, 40, 486, 487, 500, 599, 633, 650, 679, 938, 1041
"Auf eine Lampe" (Mörike), 566
Augusta, José de, 845
Augustine, 1, 83, 98, 156, 210, 296, 342, 878, 1036, 1179, 1193, 1281, 1511; belief, 134; Christian plain style, 1041; classical poetics, 258; exegesis, 467; Hebraism, 598, 599, 620; history, 633, 636; hymns and psalms, 645, 652, 1184; imitation, 676; interpretation, 714; intuition, 720; medieval poetics, 852, 853, 856; number, 958
Augusto, Rui, 19
Aukrust, Olav, 940, 955
Auld, William, 457
aureate diction, 99
Aurora Leigh (Browning), 423, 424, 447, 545, 913, 1052, 1216, 1348
"Auroras of Autumn, The" (Stevens), 813, 1423, 1488
Auseklis (pseud. of Miķelis Krogzems), 794
Ausländer, Rose, 568
Ausonius, 209, 220, 1289
Austen, Jane, 957, 1221
Austin, Alfred, 1065
Austin, John L., 182, 183, 514, 1284, 1349, 1350
Austin, Mary, 437
Australia, poetry of, 100–103, 223, 763, 1154
Austria, poetry of, 103–6, 139
Austria-Hungría (Perlongher), 82
"Au sujet d'Adonis" (Valéry), 99 authorial intention. See intention "Author's Abstract of Melancholy" (Burton), 286 Autobiography of Red (Carson), 181, 914 automatic writing, 31, 32, 515, 618, 890, 1059, 1108, 1377, 1378, 1415 autonomy, 106–9, 112, 1061, 1066 auto sacramental, 109, 123
autotelic, 109–10
Autumn Journal (MacNeice), 425, 729
auxesis, 110; meiosis vs., 860 avant-garde poetics, 110–13, 424–25, 514–15, 890–91, 992, 1067; expressionism, 474–75; found poetry, 503–4; imagism as response, 674–75; sound technology, 1415. See also cubism; Dada; futurism; surrealism; vorticism
Avant-Mère, L' (Bauwens), 133
Aveliño, Andrés, 203
Avellaneda, Gertrudis de, 201
"Ave maris stella" (hymn), 1155
Aventuras sigilosas (Lezama Lima), 204
Aventures de Télémaque (Fénelon), 149
Averroës, 677, 854, 1060, 1158
Avesta, 362, 1202
Avia, Tusiata, 1085
Avianus, 476
Avicenna, 1266
Avidan, David, 608
Awoonor, Kofi, 14
Axel's Castle (Wilson), 1397
Axion esti (Elytis), 584
Ayerra y Santa María, Francisco de, 200
Aytoun, W. A., 1348
Ayukawa Nobuo, 753
ʿAyyūqī, 860
Āzad (Muhammad Husain), 1498
"Azatutyun" (Nalpantian), 84
Azat Yerger (Patkanian), 84
Azbouchna molitva (Preslavski), 167
Azeredo, Ronaldo, 950
"Aztec Angel" (Salinas), 229
Aztec poetry. See indigenous Americas, poetry of the Azul . . . (Darío), 202, 945, 1345

Bābā Ṭāhir, 1227
Babbitt, Irving, 550, 673
Babits, Mikhály, 643
"Babi Yar" (Evtushenko), 1069
Babrius, 476
Babstock, Ken, 181
Babu, Omar, 1381
Babylonian poetry. See Assyria and Babylonia, poetry of Baca, Jimmy Santiago, 229
Bacchae, The (Euripides), 470, 1449, 1450
Bacchae of Euripides, The (Soyinka), 1451
bacchius, 114, 372
Bacchylides, 245, 261, 410, 450, 453, 580, 645, 862
Bach, J. S., 904
Bachan, Harivansh Rai, 631
Bachelard, Gaston, 549, 1059
Bachmann, Andreas, 251
Bachmann, Ingeborg, 105, 482, 568, 1038
"Backwater Blues, The," 151
Backwoodsman, The (Paulding), 1483
Bacon, Francis, 123, 249, 369, 557, 637, 669, 672, 921, 1041, 1049, 1141, 1159, 1179, 1209; Hebraism, 598; invention, 724; myth, 907; penitential psalms, 1015; poetics, 1060; science, 1267
Bacovia, George, 1206
Baczyński, Krzysztof Kamil, 1076
Bad Boys (Cisneros), 229
Badejo, Fabian, 193
Baderoon, Gabeba, 15, 1331
Baena, Juan Alfonso de, 185, 1335
Bagehot, Walter, 293
Baggesen, Jens, 345
Baghishetsi, Arakel, 83
Baghy, Gyula, 457
Bagritskij, Eduard, 301
Bagryana, Elisaveta, 169
Bahāʾ al-Dīn Zuhayr, 69, 391
Bahār, Muḥammad Taqī, 1024

Baha Zain, 841
Baïf, Jean-Antoine de, 251, 454, 510, 526, 628, 904, 1052, 1163, 1165, 1423, 1518
Bai Juyi, 243, 1551
"Bailadora de rumba" (Guirao), 204
Bailey, P. J., 1348
Baillie, John, 1373
Bain, Andrew Geddes, 1330
Bajgorić, Halil, 590
Baka, Józef, 1073
Baker, David, 386
Baker, Hinemoana, 942, 1085
Baker, Houston A., 152
Baker, Marie Annharte, 180
Bakhtin, Mikhail, 44, 358, 445, 447, 957, 1002–3, 1082, 1241, 1257; genre theory, 553, 554; intertextuality, 717, 1433; sign, 1289; structuralism, 1362
Baki, 1472
Bakratuni, Arsen, 84
Bakst, Léon, 338
Bal, Mieke, 992
balada, 114
Baladeva Ratha, 984
Balagtas (pseud. of Francisco Baltazar), 1032 balagtasan, 114
Balaram Das, 984
Balassi, Bálint, 641, 642
Balaz, Joseph, 1085
Balboa y Troya de Quesada, Silvestre de, 200
Balbuena, Bernardo de, 880, 1327
Balde, Jacob, 792
Balder (Dobell), 1348
Baldus (Folengo), 742, 792
Balesca, Fernando, 389
Balkavi (pseud. of T. B. Thombre), 846
Ball, Hugo, 111, 112, 333, 334, 567, 573, 890, 1324, 1386; sound poetry, 1329, 1353, 1415
Balla, Giacomo, 534, 843 ballad, 114–18, 356, 357, 818, 874, 1184, 1210, 1224, 1275, 1276; incremental repetition, 118, 681; narrative, 911, 912, 914; oral, 978, 979; wrenched accent, 1542. See also broadside ballad ballade, 118–19, 1193, 1221
"Ballade, Upon a Wedding" (Suckling), 452
Ballades françaises (Fort), 1514 ballad meter, hymn meter, 119, 733; octosyllable, 970
"Ballad of Birmingham" (Randall), 914
"Ballad of John Silver, A" (Masefield), 368
"Ballad of Reading Gaol" (Wilde), 117, 119, 541, 728
Ballads of the Lords of New Spain (anthol.), 698, 879
Ballard, Ron, 542
Ballegas, Emilio, 203, 204, 764, 1135
"Ballets" (Mallarmé), 336–37
Bally, Charles, 458, 459, 548, 1282
Bal'mont, Konstantin, 1217, 1234, 1396
Balsells Rivera, Alfredo, 588
Baltazar, Camil, 1206
Balzac, Honoré de, 992, 1221, 1426
Bāna (Bānānabhaṭṭa), 1253
Banamali, 984
Bañas, Antonio, 588
Bandeira, Manuel, 162, 163, 220, 1048
Bandera de Chile, La (Hernández), 232
Bang, Herman, 680
Banga, Dezider, 1208
Banville, Théodore de, 36, 119, 160, 224, 367, 640, 970, 995, 1001, 1126; rich rhyme, 1199; rondeau, 1225, 1226; trimètre, 1460; triolet, 1460; vers libéré, 1516; villanelle, 1521; virelai, 1522
Bao Zhao, 1551
Baquero, Gastón, 205, 542
Barahona de Soto, Luis, 1337
Baraka, Amiri (formerly Le Roi Jones), 131, 296, 761, 1062, 1265, 1492; Black Arts movement, 23, 24, 144, 1096, 1493; poetry slam, 1070
Baralt, Rafael María, 1504
Baranauskas, Antanas, 810
Barańczak, Stanisław, 1077, 1082, 1457
Baranda, María, 882
Baranovych, Lazar, 1477
Barante, Prosper de, 637
Baratashvili, Nikoloz, 555
Baratynsky, Evgenii, 1221, 1222, 1231–32, 1233
Barba Jacob, Porfirio, 275
"Barbara Allen" (ballad), 116
Barbauld, Anna Letitia, 420, 1104, 1222, 1268, 1291
Barbeitos, Arlindo, 19
Barber, Mary, 728
Barbey d'Aurevilly, Jules-Amédée, 1112
Barbier, Auguste, 652
Barbosa, Jorge, 17
Barbosa, Pedro, 1416
Barbosa Rodriguez, José, 692
Barbour, John, 1274
Barbu, Ion, 1206
Barclay, Alexander, 386, 1194
Barclay, John, 1257
Barco Centerera, Martín del, 79
bard, 120–21, 164, 217, 218, 393, 487, 488; Frisian, 528; Irish, 726–27; Scottish, 1278–79
Bardi, Giovanni de', 904
"Barefoot Boy" (Whittier), 491, 1150
Baretti, Giuseppe, 1211
Bargītas (Mādhavadeva), 93
Barka, Vasyl, 1479
Barker, George, 1485
Barker, S. Omar, 313
Barlow, Joel, 55, 297, 557, 1224, 1483, 1531
Barne muinetan (Orixe), 127
Barnes, Barnabe, 839
Barnes, Djuna, 380
Barnes, William, 356, 357
Barney, Natalie, 797
Barnfield, Richard, 456
Barnstone, W., 388
baroque, 98, 121–26, 265, 1166; précio-sité, 160, 1101–2; Spanish America, 122, 124, 1339, 1343–44. See also neobaroque Baroque et classicisme (Tapié), 124
Barral, Carlos, 1341
Barrault, Jean-Louis, 1414
Barreno, María Isabel, 1092
Barreto, João Franco, 466, 1089
Barrie, James M., 1275
Barroco, Il (Battistini), 124
Barros, Manoel de, 163
Barry, Jan, 1532
Barthes, Roland, 44, 210, 267, 298, 299, 304, 404, 405, 473, 679, 705, 814, 886, 992, 1025, 1062, 1087, 1128, 1284, 1418; "death of the author" thesis, 713; écriture, 387, 1364; intertextuality, 717; politics, 1081; semiotics, 1288–89, 1432; structuralism, 1363, 1364, 1366; text, 1425, 1426
Bartholomew Fair (Jonson), 377, 417, 1162
Bartolomé, Efraín, 882
Bartra, Agustí, 213
Bartsch, Kurt, 567
Bārūdī, Maḥmūd Sāmī al-, 69, 391–92
Barykova, A. P., 1149
Barzaz Breiz (Villemarqué), 164
barzelletta. See frottola and barzelletta
Barzun, Henri Martin, 1415
Bašagić, Safet-beg, 159
Basava, 767
Basheva, Miriana, 169
Bashīr, Yūsuf Tījāni al-, 70
Bashō (Matsuo Bashō), 293, 592, 593, 594, 751, 755–56, 757, 759, 1050, 1155, 1510
"Bashō An" (Paz), 595
Bashshār ibn Burd, 67
Basile, Giambattista, 124
Basque Country, poetry of the, 126–28
Bataille, George, 365, 387, 1418
Bate, Jonathan, 437
Bate, W. J., 43, 703, 704
"Bateau ivre, Le" (Rimbaud), 485, 514, 541, 745 Bates, Sally, 314
bathos, 57–58, 128
Bathos, The (Hogarth), 128
Batiushkov, Konstantin, 90, 1231
Batouala (Maran), 926
Batres Montúfar, José, 587
Batsányi, János, 642
"Battaglia di Andrianopoli, La" (Marinetti), 1415
Batteux, Charles, 473, 932
Battistini, Andrea, 124
Battista Alberti, Leon, 150, 251, 628, 735, 1159, 1412
"Battle of Maldon, The" 410, 430, 1530

"Battle of the Books, The" (Swift), 265, 889, 928, 1142
Bauçà, Miguel, 213
Bauchau, Henry, 133
Baudelaire, Charles, 36, 107, 242, 297, 367, 456, 506, 519–20, 521, 644, 890, 1056, 1156, 1222; allegory, 38; avant-garde, 110; baroque, 121, 124; cliché, 267; conceit, 290; decadence, 338; descriptive values, 352; enjambment, 436; French poetry, 512, 513, 516; as influence, 202, 346, 424, 822, 1345; love poetry, 818; lyric, 832; lyric sequence, 835; model of poet, 1051; nature of poem, 1047; obscurity, 965; painting, 991; pantun, 995; priamel, 1107; prose poem, 513, 1112, 1512; pure poetry, 1134; rejet, 1153; romanticism, 1216–17, 1218; Satanic hero, 1255; simulacrum, 1175; sonnet, 1320; structure, 1366–67; surrealism, 1378; symbolism, 663, 1395, 1396, 1397; synaesthesia, 1398; tétramètre, 1425; textual analysis of, 1426; vers libéré, 1516
Baudissin, Wolf Graf, 148
Baudri of Bourgueil, 790
Baugh, Edward, 196
Baughan, Blanche, 943
Bauman, R., 979–80
Baumgarten, A. G., 621, 672, 932, 1046–47
Bauwens, Claude, 133
Bavuudorj, T., 896
Baxeiras, Rodríguez, 538
Baxter, James K., 942, 944, 1085, 1320
Baxter, Nathaniel, 703
Bayer, Konrad, 105
Bay Psalm Book, The, 812, 1124, 1165, 1480
Bayyātī, Abd al-Wahhāb al-, 70
"Beach Burial" (Slessor), 101
Beardsley, Aubrey, 338
Beardsley, Monroe C., 142, 362, 404, 814, 833, 866, 1366, 1375; meter theory, 368. See also affective fallacy; intentional fallacy beast epic, 128–29, 476, 559, 1274 beat, 129–30
Beat poetry, 23, 92, 128, 130–31, 145, 152, 373, 433, 482, 523, 1095, 1112, 1243, 1492; haiku, 595; jazz, 760, 761; New York school vs., 940; performance, 1018, 1070; spontaneity, 1353
Beatrice, 738, 739, 1036, 1319
Beattie, James, 121, 670, 1275
Beaujon, Aletta, 193
beaulieu, derek, 180
Beaulieu, Michel, 183
Beaumont, Francis, 417, 624, 1453
Beauties of English Poetry, The (Goldsmith), 54
Beautiful Changes, The (Wilbur), 1491
Beautiful Maid of the Mill, The (Müller), 565
Beaver, Bruce, 102
Becker, Jürgen, 568
Becket (Tennyson), 378
Beckett, Samuel, 12, 42, 111, 267, 357, 378, 379, 380, 381, 409, 887, 898, 1540
Beckford, William, 471
Bécquer, Gustavo Adolfo, 201, 1113, 1218, 1340
Bedacht, Rudy, 193
Bede, 6, 410, 411, 558, 857, 958, 1049, 1116, 1273, 1281
Bednyi, Demian, 1236
Bedregal, Yolanda (Yolanda of Bolivia), 154
Beer, June, 948
Beethoven, Ludwig van, 564, 972
"Before the Feast of Shusahn" (Spencer), 22
Before the War (Inada), 91
Beggar's Daughter of Bednall Green, The (ballad), 116
Beggar's Opera (Gay), 117, 284
Béguin, Albert, 548, 549
Behar, Almog, 608
Behar, Ruth, 464
Beheim, Michel, 1353
Behn, Aphra, 420, 456, 797, 1291
Behramoğlu, Ataol, 1473
Beier, Ulli, 463
Beijing Opera, 283, 1450
Being and Time (Heidegger), 621, 1038
Beinteinsson, Sveinbjörn, 1201
Bekentenis in Toledo (Debrot), 193
Bélance, René, 198
Belarus, poetry of. See Russia, poetry of Beledian, Krikor, 85
Belgium, poetry of, 131–34, 822 belief and poetry, 134–37
Beli mugri (Racin), 837
Belinsky, Vissarion, 1231
Bell, Clive, 108, 403
Bell, Marvin, 1493
Bellaing, Vefa de, 165
Bellay, Joachim du, 6, 48, 264–65, 305, 307, 527, 792, 820, 1007; decasyllable, 340; echo verse, 386; French poetry, 507, 509, 510, 511, 1159, 1161; heroic verse, 625; invention, 724; Latin poetry, 1165; Petrarchism, 1031, 1043, 1163; Pléiade, 1042, 1043, 1163; recusatio, 1150; rich rhyme, 1199; sonnet, 35, 36, 1043, 1319, 1321; villanelle, 1521
"Bell-Birds" (Kendall), 100
Bellear, Lisa, 102
Belleau, Remy, 510, 1042–43
"Belle Dame sans Merci, La" (Keats), 913
Bellefeuille, Normand de, 183
Bellessi, Diana, 82, 1347
Bellezza, Dario, 748
Belli, Carlos Germán, 1029
Belli, Gioconda, 948
Belli, Giuseppe, 356, 744
Bellman, Carl Michael, 1382
Bello, Andrés, 79, 230, 693, 1344, 1346, 1504
Belloc, Bárbara, 82
Belloc, Hilaire, 119
Bellum Punicum (Naevius), 1258
Belmonte, Luis Enrique, 1506
Belševica, Vizma, 794
Bely, Andrei (pseud. of Boris Bugayev), 573, 1217, 1234–35, 1363, 1396–97
Bemba, Sylvain, 1447, 1451
Bembo, Pietro, 249, 356, 736, 741, 791, 838, 904, 1007, 1159, 1163; sonnet, 1031, 1319
Bénabou, Marcel, 987
Benart de Ventadorn, 508
Benavídes, Washington, 1499
Bene, Sennuccio del, 375
Benedict, Ruth, 57, 76, 464
Benediktsoon, Einar, 654
Bengali poetry, 94, 137–38, 279
Bengani, Lungile, 1554
Ben-Haim, Rivka Basman, 1549
Beniak, Valentin, 1311
Benítez Reyes, Felipe, 1342
Benítez Rojo, Antonio, 194
Benjamin, Walter, 2, 38, 88, 99, 112, 122, 123, 124, 504, 680, 832, 883, 1432; Frankfurt school, 518–20, 521; technology, 1414, 1415; translation, 1456, 1457
Benjamin ben Abraham degli Mansi, 605
Benn, Gottfried, 41, 343, 475, 525, 567, 1106
Bennett, Gwendolyn, 481, 596
Bennett, Louise, 195, 196, 483, 1093, 1094, 1108
Benois, Alexandre, 338
Bense, Max, 32, 706, 1416
Bentley, Edmund Clerihew, 266
Bentley, Richard, 47, 86, 433, 1260
Benucci, Alessandra, 741
Ben-Yitzhak, Avraham, 607
Beowulf (epic), 40, 94, 174, 224, 344, 356, 410, 411, 430, 439, 453, 493, 558, 574, 858, 911, 912, 979, 1041, 1054, 1273; metrical resolution, 1174; ring system, 1201
Béranger, Pierre-Jean de, 517
Berceo, Gonzalo de, 321, 1334
Berchet, Giovanni, 744
Berenguer, Carmen, 232
Berenguer de Masdovelles, Joan, 212
Bérénice (Racine), 123, 1447
Berg, Alban, 904
Bergbo, Skogekär, 1382
Berger, Peter, 108
Berggren, Tobias, 1384
Bergman, Bo, 1383
Bergson, Henri, 281, 549, 675, 720, 721, 957, 1037, 1072, 1075
Bergvall, Caroline, 288, 483, 504
Berkeley, George, 1211, 1480
Berkson, Bill, 940
Berlioz, Hector, 1221
Bernard Andreas, 1064
Bernard of Clairvaux, 574, 676

Bernard of Cluny, 790
Bernardus Silvestris, 791, 854, 1115
Bernart de Ventadorn, 302, 902, 967, 1464
Berndt, R. M., 100
Bernger von Horheim, 887
Bernhard, Thomas, 378, 1038
Berni, Francesco, 191, 216, 740, 742
Bernini, Gian Lorenzo, 121
Bernstein, Charles, 90, 506, 941, 1069, 1096, 1113, 1271; Language poetry, 784, 785, 1064, 1081, 1328, 1494; obscurity, 964, 965
Bernstein, Jay, 108
Berrigan, Ted, 835, 940, 1070, 1320
Berry, Eleanor, 523
Berry, Wendell, 26, 437, 922
Berryman, John, 296, 433, 813, 835, 969, 1025, 1322, 1490, 1491
Bersani, Leo, 1139
Berssenbrugge, Mei-mei, 92
Bersuire, Pierre, 852
Berthelsen, Rasmus, 722
Berthou, Erwan, 164
Bertin, Charles, 133
Bertrand, Aloysius, 512, 513, 1112
Bertrand de Bar-sur-Aube, 221
Bertran de Born, 1144, 1464
Berzsenyi, Dániel, 642
Beshigtashlian, Mgrdich, 84
Besiki (Bessarion Gabashvili), 555 bestiary, 138, 476
Bethancourt, Agustin, 192, 193
Bethell, Ursula, 943
Bethge, Hans, 471
Betjeman, John, 425, 1065
Betti, Emilio, 622
Bettinelli, Saverio, 1211
Between Two Worlds (Paredes), 227
Beunans Meriasek, 306
Beveridge, Judith, 102
Beverley, John, 1064
Beyers, Chris, 523
"Beyond Kergulen" (Kendall), 100
Beza, Théodore de, 110, 353, 511, 1124, 1409, 1449
Bezbarua, Lakshminath, 94
"Bezoek" (Marugg), 193
Bezruč, Petr, 331
Bhā al-din, 69
Bhāgabata (Oriya trans.), 984
Bhagat, Niranjan, 590
Bhagavad-Gītā, 846, 1115, 1154, 1250, 1530
Bhāgavata Purāṇa, 93
Bhakti poetry, 353, 354, 686, 815, 846, 847, 1155
Bhaktiratnāvali (Mādhavadeva), 93
Bhalo, Ahmad Nassir Jumal, 1381
Bhāmaha, 27, 1244, 1245
Bhānubhakta, 935
Bhāratacandra, 137
Bharati, Subramania (C. Cuppiramaṇiya Pārati), 687, 1410–11
Bhāravi, 1253
Bhartṛhari, 817, 1253
Bhāsa, 1253
Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka, 1247
Bhaṭṭikāvya, 1253
Bhaṭṭumūrti, 1419
Bhavabhūti, 1100, 1144
Bhavarthdeepika (Dnyaneshwar), 846
Bhimabhoi, 984
Bhoja (King of Dhār), 27, 1247–48
Bhuchung Sonam, 1436
Bialik, Hayyim Nachman, 606, 614, 615
Białoszewski, Miron, 1077
Bible. See Hebraism; Hebrew poetry; psalm; religion and poetry
Biblioteka Poeta series, 1236
Bidart, Frank, 296, 898, 1025
Bide Barrijak (Lauaxeta), 127
Bīdil, 1023
Biebl, Konstantin, 331, 535
Biedermeier, 139, 565–66
Biedrzycki, Miłosz, 1077
Bierce, Ambrose, 476
Biermann, Wolf, 567, 568, 771
Bigg, J. Stanyan, 1348
Bignozzi, Juana, 81
Bigongiari, Piero, 623
Big Sea, The (Hughes), 22
Bihāri Lal, 817, 1253
Bihbihānī, Sīmīn, 571, 1024
"Bijoux, Les" (Baudelaire), 436
Bila, Vonani, 1331
Bilac, Olavo, 161
Bilderdijk, Willem, 821
Bill, Max, 294, 1386 binary and ternary, 139–40, 214, 385. See also amphibrach; anapest; dactyl Binet, Claude, 1042
Bing Xin, 1053
Binkis, Kazys, 810
Binning, Sadhu, 1133
Binns, Niall, 437
Bin Ueda, 1395
Biographia Literaria (Coleridge), 88, 135, 478, 667, 672, 780, 1061, 1214, 1222 biography and poetry, 140–43, 1050. See also intention Bion, 659, 1006, 1165
Biotz begietan (Lizardi), 127
Birch, Tony, 102
Birds (Aristophanes), 580
Birds, Bees, and Flowers (Lawrence), 1269
Birney, Earl, 179
Birth of Tragedy, The (Nietzsche), 216, 367, 1213
Bishop, Elizabeth, 2, 4–5, 61, 101, 118, 328, 361, 482, 644, 772, 797, 898, 912, 1145, 1490, 1491; landscape, 783; poet laureate, 1065; sestina, 1297; villanelle, 1457, 1522
Bishop, Judith, 103
"Bishop Orders His Tomb, The" (Browning), 41, 423
bissett, bill, 180
Biton, Erez, 608
Bizkarrondo, Indalezio ("Blintz"), 127
Bjarkamál, 344
Björling, Gunnar, 491, 1383
Bjørning, Thorkild, 347
Bjørnson, Bjørnstjerne, 149, 955
Black, D. M., 1277
Black, M., 866–67, 869, 1284
"Black Art" (Baraka), 23, 296
Black Arts movement, 23–24, 143–44, 482, 596, 1096, 1493; jazz poetry, 760, 761, 762
Blackburn, Paul, 145, 967, 1018
Black Consciousness movement, 15, 195, 1331
"Black Dance" (Palés Matos), 336
Black Hair (Soto), 229
Blackhall, Sheena, 1277–78
Black Heralds, The (Vallejo), 1029, 1346
Black Hosts (Senghor), 926
Black Love (Brooks), 23
Black Magic (Baraka), 23
Blackmore, Richard, 1267
Black Mountain school, 102, 111, 113, 130, 144–45, 287, 342, 343, 482, 523, 964, 1095, 1110, 1112, 1490, 1492, 1494
Blackmur, R. P., 295, 365, 936
"Black Orpheus" (Sartre), 16
"Black Snake, The" (Oliver), 42
Blackwell, Thomas, 473, 673
Blaga, Lucian, 1206
Blair, Hugh, 473, 670, 1412, 1421
Blair, Robert, 575, 1275
Blake, William, 10, 147, 422, 437, 450, 522, 545, 728, 1058, 1103, 1291, 1293, 1316; alliteration, 41; anacrusis, 47; apostrophe, 61; ballad, 117; as Beat influence, 130; chant, 223; companion poems, 286; concision, 293; cradle songs, 825; didacticism, 363; envelope, 436; form, 497, 498; fourteener, 504; Hebraism, 598, 600, 601; heptameter, 617–18; illuminated book, 157, 1524; imagination, 667, 668, 670, 671; monorhyme, 898–99; Muse, 902; myth, 907, 908, 909; parallelism, 999, 1169; pathetic fallacy, 1009; prophetic poetry, 1112; punctuation, 1131; religious poetry, 1156, 1157, 1223; romanticism, 422, 1220, 1222, 1223, 1267; sound, 1327; technology vs. poetry, 1414
Blanchard, Laman, 1052
Blanchot, Maurice, 710
"Blanco" (Paz), 881
Blanco, Alberto, 437, 882
Blanco, Andrés Eloy, 1504
Blandín de Cornualla (anon.), 211
Blank, Arapera, 942, 1085
blank verse, 145–50, 252, 313, 340, 378, 410, 818; English, 414, 417, 421, 432, 433, 498, 913; heroic, 625; Italian, 735; narrative, 913; verse paragraph, 1514 Blaser, Robin, 181, 287, 542, 1492 blason, 150–51, 214, 289–90, 349, 394, 545, 662
Bleecker, Ann Eliza, 1483
Bleich, David, 1147
Blessing the Boats (Clifton), 24

Blest Gana, Guillermo, 230
Blight, John, 101
Blind Harry, 1274
Bloch, Ernst, 1113
Bloem, J. C., 822
Blok, Alexander, 4, 95, 150, 338, 607, 1217, 1234, 1235, 1237, 1363; dol'nik, 375, 1396; near rhyme, 925; symbolism, 1396, 1397
Bloom, Harold, 43, 96, 136, 600, 679–80, 863, 1063, 1070, 1157; figuration, 1284; influence, 703, 704, 705, 717, 1127, 1170; tradition, 1445; trope types, 876
Bloomfield, Robert, 1224
Blot in the 'Scutcheon, A (Browning), 378
"Blue Girls" (Ransom), 209
Blue Lagoon, The (anthol.), 1237 blues, 15, 22, 151–52, 326, 481, 596, 892, 1489; ballad, 116–17, 118; complaint, 287
Blum, Peter, 1330
Blumauer, Alois, 104
Blunden, Edmund, 1531
Bly, Robert, 77, 296, 353, 1081, 1113, 1157, 1532; Deep Image school, 342–43, 1492, 1493
Boas, Franz, 57, 1108
bob and wheel, 152, 216, 914
"Bobèobi pelis' guby" (Khlebnikov), 534
Bobrowski, Johannes, 567
Bobyshev, Dmitrii, 1237
Bocage, Manuel Maria Barbosa du, 1090
Bocángel, Gabriel, 1338
Boccaccio, Giovanni, 6, 43, 127, 141, 214, 286, 375, 413, 508, 532, 540, 740, 1007, 1037, 1510; caccia, 173; eclogue, 386, 1007, 1165; imitation, 679; invention, 724; Italian prosody, 736; medieval poetics, 852, 857–58; on obscurity, 964; ottava rima, 736, 913, 986, 1193; Petrarchism, 1030; poetry defense, 1158; prosimetrum, 1116; terza rima, 736, 1423
Boccioni, Umberto, 891
Bodart, Roger, 133
Bodas de Sangre (García Lorca), 1218
Boddason, Bragi, 953
Bodel, Jean, 509, 859
Bodmer, Jakob, 672, 1055
Boeci, 967, 1115
Boehme, Jacob, 364, 469, 668, 1392
Boeotian corpus, 577–78
Boethius, 9, 46, 49, 384, 413, 619, 676, 789, 852, 967, 1003, 1273; personification, 1026; prosimetrum, 1115, 1116, 1509
Bogado Rolón, Zenón, 587
Bogan, Louise, 1541
Bogatyrev, Pyotr, 1239, 1361
Bogdanovich, Ippolit, 1231
"Bogurodzica" (anon.), 1072
Bohtory, al-, 391
Boiardo, Matteo Maria, 445, 736, 740, 741, 860, 986, 1007, 1030, 1164, 1165
Boiko (Slaveikov), 168
Boileau, Nicolas, 41, 119, 124, 128, 160, 263, 300, 351, 435, 450, 510, 550, 562, 1066; Hebraism, 598; lyric, 828–29; mock epic, 889; neoclassical poetics, 928, 929, 931, 932, 933, 1220; ode, 972; Peri hypsous trans., 668, 678, 710, 828, 930, 1105, 1373; querelle des anciens et des modernes, 1141, 1142; tétramètre, 1425; verse epistle, 1511
Bois e'ébene (Roumain), 198
Boito, Camillo and Arrigo, 745
Bo Juyi, 1300
Bök, Christian, 112, 180, 225, 288, 292, 301, 809, 965, 1096, 1271, 1329
Bokher, Elye (Elia Levita), 1547
Boland, Eavan, 483, 730, 1108
Bolden, Tony, 152
Boletín Titikaka (jour.), 1029, 1346
Bolinger, Dwight, 975, 1039
Bolintineanu, Dimitrie, 1205
Bolívar, Simón, 279
Bolivia, poetry of, 152–54
Bolster, Stephanie, 181
Bólu-Hjálmar (Jónsson), 654
Bolzano, Bernhard, 1286
"Bombardamento" (Marinetti), 533
Bonaparte, Marie, 1127
Bonaventure des Périers, 340, 718, 1155
Bón Bón, Shorty, 961
Bond, Edward, 378
Bongo, Pietro, 959
Bonhours, Dominique, 762
Boni, Tanella, 17
Bonincontri, L., 175
Bonnefoy, Yves, 184, 352, 516, 892, 1113, 1457, 1517
Bønnelycke, Emil, 346
Bonneville, René, 197
"Bonnie Boukir Bairn, The" (MacDiarmid), 1276
"Bonny Heck" (Hamilton), 1275
Bontemps, Arna, 22, 1351
Bonvicino, Régis, 163 book, poetic, 154–58
Book of American Negro Poetry, The (Johnson, ed.), 22 Book of Bells, 218
Book of Ceremonies, 171
Book of Common Prayer, 812, 1157
Book of Dede Korkut, 1116
Book of Good Love (Ruiz), 321, 858, 1334
Book of Invasions (Kinsella adapt.), 729
"Book of Jonah, The" (Babits), 643
Book of Leinster, 367
Book of Margery Kempe, The, 1543
Book of Songs, The (Heine), 565
Book of the Courtier (Castiglione), 249, 415–17, 741, 1159, 1179, 1336
Book of the Dead (Egypt), 391, 1151
"Book of the Dead" (Rukeyser), 373, 1489
Book of the Duchess (Chaucer), 398, 399, 413, 970
Book of Thel, The (Blake), 157
Book of the Rhymers' Club, 1194
Book of the Snow, The (Jacqmin), 133
Booth, Wayne, 226
Bootz, Philippe, 395, 1416
Borderlands/La Frontera (Anzaldúa), 1140
Bording, Anders, 345
Borduas, Paul-Émile, 182
Borel, Petrus, 338
Borges, Jorge Luis, 80, 203, 541, 585, 595, 600, 1027, 1113, 1277, 1345, 1346, 1479, 1547
"Boriqueña, La" (Rodríguez), 201
Boris Godunov (Pushkin), 149, 378, 1232
Borkovec, Petr, 332
Born, Nicolas, 438
Bornholdt, Jenny, 944
Borrero, Juana, 1345
Borum, Poul, 347
Boscán, Juan (Joan Boscà Almogàver), 148, 184, 185, 200, 212, 291, 1031, 1163, 1319, 1321, 1335–36, 1337
Boschère, Jean de, 132
Bose, Buddhadeva, 138
Bosnian poetry, 159
Bossa Nova, 163
Boswell, James, 1105
Boteauville, Michel, 251
Botev, Hristo, 168
Boti, Regino E., 202–3
Botlover, Abraham Ber, 614
Botticelli, Sandro, 39
Botto, António, 1091
Boturini, Lorenzo, 698
Boucher, André du, 516
Bouchet, Jean, 1181, 1182
Bouge of Court, The (Skelton), 414
Bouhours, Dominique, 928, 931, 932
Boukman, Dutty, 198
Boukolika (Theocritus), 386
Boulez, Pierre, 32
Boulmier, Joseph, 1521
Bourdieu, Pierre, 136, 324, 466, 938, 1066
Bourgeois, Pierre, 132
Bourget, Paul, 680
Bourke, Eva, 730
boustrophedon, 159–60
"Boustrophedon" (Wasserman), 159
Boutens, P. C., 822 bouts-rimés, 160
Bouza Brey, Fermín, 538
Bove Bukh (Bokher), 1547
Bow and the Lyre, The (Paz), 772
Bowen, Euros, 1538
Bowering, George, 179, 180, 1439
Bowers, Fredson, 1428
Bowles, William Lisle, 1320
"Box, The" (Creeley), 886–87
Boyadzhiev, Dimitur, 169
Boychuk, Bohdan, 1479
Boye, Karin, 1383
Boyle, Michael F., 542
Boyle, Robert, 1141
"Boy Reciter, The" (Everett), 1149

Boyson, Emil, 955
Brabcová, Zuzana, 332
Bracho, Coral, 819, 882, 927, 1064
Braddon, Mary, 10
Bradley, F. H., 963, 1037
Bradstreet, Anne, 20, 125, 279, 902, 1041, 1481, 1491
Bradūnas, Kazys, 811
Brady, Nicholas, 1125
Bragg, Bernard, 45
Brahe, Tycho, 1266
Braithwaite, William Stanley, 21, 595
Brambach, Rainer, 1386
Brand (Ibsen), 378, 954
Brand, Dionne, 180, 483
Brandes, Georg, 346
Brandom, Robert, 622
Brandt, Jørgen Gustava, 347
Brant, Sebastian, 363, 561
Braschi, Charles, 943
Brathwaite, Kamau, 193, 196, 1093, 1094, 1096, 1108, 1452
Brault, Jacques, 183
Braun, Volker, 149, 567, 707
Braut von Messina, Die (Schiller), 148, 149
Brazdžionis, Bernardas, 810
Brazil, poetry of, 18, 19, 160–63, 279, 535, 950; indigenous, 161, 691, 692
"Bread and Wine" (Hölderlin), 564
"Bread, Hashish, and Moonlight" (Qabbānī), 70
Brechbühl, Beat, 1386
Brecht, Bertolt, 1, 4, 117, 252, 283, 284, 344, 379, 438, 521, 567, 568, 698, 771, 891, 956, 996, 1125, 1414; alienation effect, 378, 1146; defamiliarization, 1241; expressionism, 474; mimesis/realism, 886; Nō, 949; politics, 1079; tragedy, 1450
Brecht, George, 33
Breeze, Jean ("Binta"), 196
Breeze, Mary-Anne. See Mez
Breikšs, Leonīds, 794
Breintnall, Joseph, 1482
Breitinger, J. J., 672
Brekke, Paal, 955–56
Bremond, Henri, 203, 1134
Bremser, Bonnie, 130, 131
Bremser, Ray, 131
Brennan, Christopher, 101
Brennan, Michael, 103
Brentano, Clemens, 95, 118, 564–65, 1220
Breton, André, 32, 50, 81, 132, 198, 199, 290, 504, 515, 710, 1113, 1238, 1415; surrealism, 992, 1377, 1378, 1379
Breton, Nicholas, 54, 311, 1462
Breton poetry, 164–65, 219, 859; Cornish, 305–6
Breuer, Lee, 1450
Breva, Juan, 189
Brew, Kwesi, 14
Breytenbach, Breyten, 1330
Březina, Otokar, 331
Bṛhatkathā, 1100
Bridell, Bedřich (Fridrich Bridelius), 330
Bride of Abydos (Byron), 1012 bridge, 165–66
Bridge, The (Crane), 42, 77, 813, 835, 892, 1269, 1489
Bridges, Robert, 4, 246, 250, 359, 360, 424, 873–74, 971, 1017, 1225, 1354; elision, 399; hexameter, 628; long/short syllables, 1137; poet laureate, 1065; sexain, 1297; syllabic verse, 1389; triolet, 1460
Brierre, Jean, 198
Briggflatts (Bunting), 426, 892
Brik, Osip, 1239, 1241
Brines, Francisco, 1341
Brinkmann, Rolf Dieter, 568
Brinninstool, E. A., 313
Brinton, D. G., 697, 698, 700
"Brise marine" (Mallarmé), 745
Brito, Eugenia, 231
Brito, Paul Henriques, 163
Brittons Bowre of Delights (Breton), 54
Briusov, Valerii, 1234, 1395, 1397
Briviesca y Arellano, Francisca de, 153
broadside ballad, 115, 116–17, 119, 166, 979
Brockes, Barthold, 525, 562
Brockmann, Reiner, 359
Brodrick, Albert, 1330
Brodsky, Joseph, 125, 150, 166, 375, 575, 811, 919, 1229, 1237, 1238; grammatical rhyme, 575; poet laureate, 1065; translation, 1456, 1457
Brodzińsju, Kazimierz, 1074 Broken Jug, The (Kleist), 378 broken rhyme, 166, 220, 1189
Brøndal, Viggo, 348
Broniewski, Władysław, 1076
"Bronze Head, A" (Yeats), 1194
Bronze Horseman, The (Pushkin), 1232, 1425
Bronzino, Agnolo, 39
Brooke, Henry, 1482
Brooke, Rupert, 359, 424, 556, 1319, 1531
Brooks, Cleanth, 3, 54, 88, 99, 118, 135, 267, 269, 295, 303, 317, 363, 369, 833, 1177; close reading, 269, 1062; connotation, 298; difficulty, 366; explication, 471, 472; form, 499; Fugitives, 531; New Criticism, 936, 937, 1033, 1080; paradox, 997; paraphrase as heresy, 999–1000, 1511; poetic tone, 1442; science, 1265, 1266; structure, 1366, 1430; tradition, 1445; unity, 1496
Brooks, Gwendolyn, 23, 24, 118, 152, 482, 596, 1490
Brooks, Maria (Maria del Occidente), 1483
Brossa, Joan, 213
Brossard, Nicole, 180, 183, 1064, 1140
"Brothers, The" (Wordsworth), 1224
Brothers Karamazov, The (Dostoyevsky), 957–58
Brouard, Carl, 198
Broughton, James, 542
Broumas, Olga, 483, 798
Brower, Reuben, 269, 833, 1025
Brown, Charles Brockden, 409
Brown, Earl, 32
Brown, F. M., 1102
Brown, George Mackay, 1276, 1277
Brown, Lee Ann, 288
Brown, Rita Mae, 798
Brown, Sterling, 22, 144, 152, 595, 596, 1152, 1489
Browne, Colin, 774
Browne, Maria, 1091
Browne, Thomas, 125, 1114
Browne, William, 1264
Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, 50, 128, 423, 424, 447, 898, 913, 1216, 1348, 1531; euphony, 465; gender, 480, 545; heptameter, 618; love poetry, 818; as Poetess, 1052, 1053; sonnet sequence, 1320, 1321; trimeter, 1459
Browning, Robert, 56, 57, 357, 359, 361, 369, 370, 943, 1016, 1036, 1103; adynaton, 9; alba, 29; alliteration, 41; anapest, 49, 433; binary meter, 140; blank verse, 147, 433; cacophony, 173; closet drama, 270; companion poems, 286; consonance, 299; couplet, 311; difficulty, 365; dramatic verse, 376, 378; dramatic monologue, 394, 409, 423, 499, 545, 733, 832, 912, 913, 1145, 1216, 1485, 1487; falling rhythm, 1203; heroic couplet, 625; identical rhyme, 658; idyll, 659; ionic, 725–26; meter, 431, 433; mosaic rhyme, 900; recitation, 1017; triplet, 1461
Browning Society, 1017
Bruce, George, 1277
Bruce, The (Barbour), 1274
Brueghel, Peter, 42, 43
Bruinja, Tsead, 529
Brull, Mariano, 203, 763, 764, 1135, 1149, 1328
Bruma, Eddy, 192
Brun, Johan Nordahl, 953, 954
Brunck, R.F.P., 53
Brunetière, Ferdinand, 551
Bruni, Antonio, 847
Bruni, Leonardo, 532
Bruno, Giordano, 123, 668, 965
Brunton, Alan, 944
Brutus (Cicero), 249
Brutus, Dennis, 15, 1331
Brūveris, Pēters, 795
Bryant, William Cullen, 364, 491, 783, 1149, 1223, 1483
Bryson, Norman, 991
Bryusov, Valery, 95, 338, 628, 925, 1217
Buarque, Chico, 163
Bu-Ba-Bu group (Ukraine), 1479
Buber, Martin, 408, 614
Buchanan, George, 792, 1125, 1165
Buchanan, Oni, 395
Buchanan, Robert, 492
Buch der Lieder, Das (Heine), 565
Buchner, August, 333
Buch von der Deutschen Poeterey (Opitz), 124, 562

Buci-Glucksmann, Christine, 122, 124
Buckley, Vincent, 101
Buckower Elegien (Buckow Elegies) (Brecht), 657 bucolic, 167, 386, 659; diaeresis, 354, 627
Bucolics (Virgil). See Eclogues
Budai-Deleanu, Ion, 1205
Budi, Pjetër, 30
Bueil, Honorat de, 1007
Bugayev, Boris. See Bely, Andrei
Buhez Mabden, 164
Bühler, Karl, 1282
Bùi Guáng, 1520
Buile Shuibne, 726
Buke of the Howlat, The (Holland), 1274
Bukharin, Nikolai, 1082
Bulgaria, poetry of, 115, 167–70
Bulgarski baladi (Trayanov), 169
Bull, Olaf, 955
Bulloch's bridge, 165–66
Bulosan, Carlos, 91, 1033
Bulwer, John, 1111, 1180
Bunić, Ivan, 320
Bunina, Anna, 1233
Bunner, H. C., 1460
Bunting, Basil, 426, 892, 964
Bunyan, John, 37, 40, 384, 598, 599 burden, 170
Bürger, Gottfried August, 148, 563–64, 1224, 1320
Bürger, Peter, 112, 113, 992
Burgess, Anthony, 986
Burgos, Julia de, 206, 482
Burhaneddin, Kadī, 1228
Burkart, Erika, 1386
Burke, Edmund, 11, 498, 545, 931, 933, 1215, 1223; image, 661; imagination, 667, 670; sublime, 598, 710, 922, 931, 1105, 1211, 1373–74; taste, 930, 1373, 1412, 1413
Burke, Kenneth, 269, 936, 938, 1058, 1127, 1177, 1178, 1180, 1284, 1393, 1401 burlesque. See contrafactum; parody; pastiche
Burliuk, David, 111, 534
Burne-Jones, Edward and Georgiana, 1103
Burnet, Gilbert, 89
Burns, Robert, 117, 118, 170, 357, 363, 398, 424, 1049, 1125, 1150, 1224, 1274, 1275, 1293; dialect, 356, 361, 422; imagery, 664; pathetic fallacy, 1009; recitation, 1149; tail rhyme, 1409
Burnside, John, 1278
Burns stanza, 170, 367, 1275, 1297
"Burnt Norton" (Eliot), 142
Burroughs, William, 32, 131, 288, 962, 1415
Burssens, Gaston, 823
Burton, Robert, 122, 125, 286, 640
Bury, J. B., 638
Bush, Douglas, 1265
Būṣīrī, al-, 69, 353, 391, 1136
Buson, Yosa, 593, 594
Busta, Christina, 105
Bustamante, Ricardo José, 153
Bustānī, Buṭrus, 69
Bustos y rimas (Casal), 202
Buthelezi, L.B.Z., 1554
Butler, Charles, 26
Butler, Guy, 1331
Butler, Judith, 483, 1139
Butler, Samuel, 373, 446, 640, 970
Butterfly Valley: A Requiem (Brøndal), 348
Byles, Mather, 1481
bylina, 115, 170–71
Bylsma, Meindert, 529
Bynum, David E., 977
Byrne, Bonifcacio, 202
Byron, Lord, 46, 99, 161, 265, 297, 357, 422, 423, 471, 583, 728, 898, 917, 1205, 1275, 1348, 1414; amphibrach, 45; anapest, 49; binary meter, 140; broken rhyme, 166; canto, 190; closet drama, 270; dramatic verse, 378; epigram, 420; form, 498; fragments, 506; heptameter, 618; heroic couplet, 625; love poetry, 818; metrical psalms, 1125; mock epic, 447; mosaic rhyme, 900, 1461; myth, 909; novel in verse, 958; octave, 969; octosyllable, 970; ottava rima, 986; parody, 628, 1002; publication sales, 1012; rhythmic figure, 1198; romanticism, 744, 1215, 1217, 1220–21, 1222, 1223, 1224; Satanic hero, 1255; science, 1268; soliloquy, 897; sound rhyme, 1326; Spenserian stanza, 913, 1358; terza rima, 1423; tetrameter, 1425; triple rhyme, 1461
Bysshe, Edward, 433
Byzantine poetry, 171–72, 350, 604

Cabana, Darío Xohán, 538
Cabanillas, Ramón, 538
Cabdullaahi Qarshe, 1313
Cabral, Astrid, 163
Cabral, Manuel del, 204, 205
Cabral de Melo Neto, João, 162, 163, 950
Cabrera, Miguel, 200
caccia, 173, 736
Caccia, Fulvio, 184
Caccia di Diana (Boccaccio), 173
cacophony, 1, 173, 370
Cadalso, José, 1339, 1340
Cadenas, Rafael, 1505
cadence, 173–74
Cadernos de Poesia, 1091–92
Cædmon, 410, 557–58, 857, 1049, 1273
Caesar, Julius, 98, 217, 650, 1288, 1402
caesura, 174–75, 354, 411, 435, 616, 624, 848, 1013, 1503, 1516
Cage, John, 32–33, 110, 288, 301, 886, 1329, 1493
Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Césaire), 16, 17, 197, 198, 205, 515–16, 926, 1093
Cahiers vaudois (jour.), 1387
Caillois, Roger, 199
Cain (Byron), 270
Cairo, Edgar, 192
Caitanya, 138
Caitanyarcaritāmṛta (Kavirāja), 137
Cai Yong, 530
Cajanus, Juhana, 489
Çajupi, Anton Zako, 30
Čaks, Aleksandra (pseud. of A. Čadarainis), 794
Calages, Marie de, 443
"Calamus" (Whitman), 999
Calcaño, María, 1505
Calcomanías (Girondo), 80
Caldas Barbosa, Domingos, 160
Calderón, Damaris, 206
Calderón de la Barca, Pedro, 109, 123, 283–84, 377, 458, 1211, 1338, 1339; tragedy, 1448, 1449, 1450 calendrical poetry, 175, 959
"Calibán" (Fernández Retamar), 205
"Caliban upon Setebos" (Browning), 56, 57
Cali Dhuux, 1313
Calixto Mixco, José, 400
Callaloo (jour.), 192
Callanan, Jeremiah Joseph, 728
call-and-response, 117, 152, 358, 1152, 1169
calligramme, 48, 175–76, 208, 515, 533, 696, 890, 1416, 1417, 1523, 1524; hieroglyph, 629
Calligrammes (Apollinaire), 175, 208, 506, 515, 629, 696, 746, 1416, 1417, 1476, 1523
Callimachus, 34–35, 53, 165–66, 244, 255, 256, 257, 261, 444, 454, 581, 582, 788, 934; galliamb, 540; hymn, 581, 645, 971; recusatio, 1150
Callinus, 396, 577
Calmeta, Il, 1159
Calpurnius Siculus, 1006
Calvin, John, 646, 718, 1124, 1387
Calvino, Italo, 987
Calvo, César, 1030
Calvus, 35, 256, 368
Cal y Canto (Alberti), 934
Calzadilla, Juan, 1505
Camacho, Jorge, 458
Camaj, Martin, 31
Camargo, Edmundo, 154
Camarillo, Lydia, 228
Cambodia, poetry of, 176–78
Cambridge, Ada, 100
Cambridge Platonists, 1290
Cambridge Ritualists, 336
Cambridge school, 76, 907, 1153
Cambridge Songs. See Carmina Cantabrigiensia
Cameron, Norman, 195
Camille, Roussan, 198
Camões (Garrett), 148, 1090
Camões, Luís Vaz de, 17, 94, 124, 160, 278, 440, 441, 443, 446, 457, 471, 484, 835, 1007, 1089, 1090, 1165, 1166, 1330; epic, 1160, 1164; Évora critics, 466–67; inspiration, 709; ottava rima, 986; Petrarchism, 1031; sonnet, 1319, 1321

Campana, Dino, 623, 747
Campanella, Tommaso, 743, 1321
Campano, Giannantonio, 972
Campbell, Alistair Te Ariki, 944, 1084–85
Campbell, David, 101
Campbell, George, 1421
Campbell, Joseph, 908
Campbell, Roy, 1331
Campbell, Thomas, 54, 1275
Campbell, Walter, 314
Campbell, William Wilfred, 178
Campert, Jan, 823
Campion, Thomas, 251, 252, 417, 628, 1015, 1159, 1315
Campo, Estanislao del, 79, 540, 1345
Campo, Rafael, 1320, 1543
Campoamor, Ramón de, 202, 1340
Campos, Augusto de, 162, 294, 692, 950, 967, 1416, 1430
Campos, Geir, 307
Campos, Haroldo de, 111, 162–63, 294, 439, 557, 595, 692, 706, 914, 927, 950, 1064, 1416
Camp Printing (Waldrop), 365
Camproux, Charles, 968
Camus, Albert, 536
Canada, poetry of, 51, 178–84, 196, 516, 774–75, 1226, 1439; indigenous, 178, 180, 700, 721–23
Canales, Tirso, 401
Cañas, Juan J., 400
"Canção do exílio" (Diaz), 161 canción, 184, 185, 1157–58, 1336
"Canción de las Antillas" (Lloréns), 202
Canción de la vida sencilla (Burgos), 206
Cancionero Araucano (Quilaqueo), 845
cancionero/cancioneiro, 184–86, 189, 341, 1088
Candelaio (Bruno), 123
Caṇḍīdāsa, 137
Candler, Ann, 1012
Cangiullo, Francesco, 534
Can Grande della Scala, 133
Canigó (Verdaguer), 212
"Cannibales, Des" (Montaigne), 691, 1108
"Cannibalist Manifesto" (Brazil), 162
Cannocchiale aristotelico, Il (Tesauro), 122, 124, 290, 1159
Cannon, Hal, 314
Cannon, Moya, 730
canon, 186–88
"Canonization, The" (Donne), 1019
Cansever, Edip, 1473–74
canso, 188, 735, 887; alba vs., 29
cantar, 188
Cantares gallegos (Castro), 538, 1218
Cantares mexicanos, 698, 879
Canta sola a Lisi (Quevedo), 289
cante jondo, 188–89
Canterbury Tales (Chaucer), 5, 42, 413, 456, 477, 505, 508, 678, 912, 970, 1054, 1156, 1193, 1530
Canti (Leopardi), 352, 745
Cántico cósmico (Cardenal), 1269–70
Cántico espiritual (John of the Cross), 1156 canticum and diverbium, 189, 1003 cantiga, 189–90, 302, 572, 1333; Galician-Portuguese, 537–38, 1088; Judeo-Spanish, 765
Cantiga de Alén (Valente), 538
Cantigas de Santa María (Alfonso X), 1333, 1348
Cantilène de Sainte Eulalie, 310, 526
Cantique des cantiques (Roinard), 338
Cantiques spirituels (Racine), 511 canto, 190
Canto a Bolívar (Olmedo), 388
"Canto de guerra de las cosas" (Pasos), 946–47
Canto general (Neruda), 231, 695, 892, 1344, 1346
Canto Kechwa (Arguedas, ed.), 694
Cantos, The (Pound), 38, 190, 286, 364, 373, 425, 447, 504, 638, 645, 659, 707, 719, 813, 835, 837, 892, 893, 909, 1202, 1458, 1490, 1511; description of, 1486; as "open" poetry model, 1492
Cantos de Adolescencia/Songs of Upitj (Paredes), 227–28
Cantos del Siboney (Fornaris), 201
Cantos de vida y esperanza (Darío), 1345
"Canto to My Womanness" (Gonzales), 228
Canto y grito mi liberación (Sánchez), 228
"Can vei la lauzeta mover" (Bernart), 302 canzone, 58, 184, 188, 190–91, 374, 616, 734, 736, 738, 817, 1304 canzoniere, 191
Canzoniere (Petrarch), 61, 153, 190, 191, 264, 289, 303, 375, 414, 416, 449, 739–40, 834, 857–58, 913, 959, 1007, 1030, 1066, 1109, 1163, 1319, 1321, 1322, 1444
Cao Cao, 1550
Cao Pi, 240, 1298, 1550
Cao Zhi, 530, 1298, 1550
Capacho (José Rodríguez Ucres), 200
Čapek, Karel, 331
Capella, Martianus, 854, 858, 1115
capitolo, 191, 736
"Captain Craig" (Robinson), 1511
Capture of Miletos (Phrynichos), 1448, 1449
Caraballo, Jorge, 1500
Caractères (La Bruyère), 224
Caraion, Ion, 1206
Caramuru (Durão), 160
Carbó, Nick, 93
Cardarelli, Vincenzo, 747
Cardenal, Ernesto, 437, 698, 946, 947, 1269–70, 1347
Cardenal, Peire, 967, 1464
Cardoza y Aragón, Luis, 587
Carducci, Giosuè, 191, 251, 252, 735, 736, 745, 746, 972, 1217, 1319; rispetto, 1203; sapphic, 1254; verso sdrucciolo, 1519
Carême, Maurice, 132
Carew, Thomas, 122, 209, 217, 419, 871, 1166, 1425
Carey, Patrick, 1460
Caribbean, poetry of the, 180, 183, 191–207, 433, 447, 948; colonial, 278, 515–16; indigenous, 692–93; Negritude, 926–27; postcolonial, 280, 483, 1093, 1094; primitivism, 1108
"Caribbean Calypso" (Roach), 194
Carlyle, Thomas, 363, 405, 637–38, 668, 671, 1171, 1215, 1223, 1353
Carman, Bliss, 178
Carme Kruckenberg, María do, 538
carmen, 207
"Carmen saeculare" (Horace), 971
Carmina (Catullus), 207
Carmina (Horace), 448
Carmina Burana (anthol.), 53, 456, 574, 790, 857, 858, 1008
Carmina Burana (Orff), 560
Carmina Cantabrigiensia (anthol.), 53, 559, 790, 857–58 carmina figurata, 175, 207–8, 295
Carnap, Rudolf, 1282
Carner, Josep, 212
Carnero, Guillermo, 1341
Carnival (McCaffery), 157
Caro, Annibale, 307, 1516
Caro, Miguel Antonio, 274–75
Caro, Rodrigo, 1337
carol, 164, 208–9, 1155
Carolan, Turlough, 728
Caroline poets. See Cavalier poets
Caroso, Fabritio, 336
carpe diem, 46, 209, 217
Carpelan, Bo, 490
Carpenter, Humphrey, 142, 143
Carpentier, Alejo, 203, 280, 1414
Carrà, Carlo, 534
Carranza, Eduardo, 275
Carranza, María Mercedes, 276
Carrera, Arturo, 927, 1546
Carrera, Jorge, 389
Carreta, Margarita, 588
Carretto, Galeotto del, 1254
Carriego, Evaristo, 80
Carrillo de Sotomayor, Luis, 1338
"Carrion Comfort" (Hopkins), 713
Carroll, Lewis, 44, 800, 913, 987, 1004, 1127, 1327, 1328, 1510; acrostic, 6; nonsense verse, 950, 951; tail rhyme, 1409
Carroll, Paul, 144
Carrothers, James D., 21
Carruth, Hayden, 761, 1532
Carson, Anne, 181, 336, 451, 828, 863, 914, 960, 1320
Carson, Ciaran, 426, 730
Cartagena Portalatín, Aída, 205
Cartarescu, Mircea, 1207

Carter, Martin, 196
Cartwright, William, 217
Cāru, Bhadra, 94
Carvalho, Ronald de, 161
Carver, Raymond, 1107
Cary, Alice, 187
Cary, Elizabeth, 270, 416
Cary, Phoebe, 187
Casa, Giovanni della, 741, 742
Casa de Bernarda Alba, La (García Lorca), 1218
Casado, Miguel, 1342
Casa grande, La (Kamenszain), 81
Casal, Julián del, 202, 260, 895, 898, 1345
Casaubon, Isaac, 224
"Casey at the Bat" (Thayer), 119
"Casey Jones" (ballad), 117
Casiano, Américo, 961
Casinos-Assens, Rafael, 1479
Casoni, Guido, 848
Casper, Leonard, 1033
Cassian, John, 854
Cassin, Barbara, 485
Cassiodorus, 853, 1015
Cassirer, Ernst, 77, 469, 474, 673, 1026, 1284, 1392, 1393
Cassity, Turner, 1080
Castalia bárbara (Freyre), 154
Castellanos, Dora, 276
Castellanos, Juan de, 274, 1338
Castellanos, Rafael Antonio, 587
Castellanos, Rosario, 482, 882
Castelli, Ignaz Franz, 104
Castelloza, Comtessa de, 1461, 1462, 1464
Castelvetro, Lodovico, 215, 637, 677, 770, 1158, 1160, 1180, 1496
Castera, George, 200
Castiglione, Baldassare, 249, 415–16, 741, 843, 1159, 1179, 1319, 1336
Castilho, António Feliciano de, 1090–91
Castilian poetry, 185–86, 1334–36
Castillejo, Cristóbal de, 1164, 1336
Castillo, Ana, 229
Castillo, Eduardo, 275
Castillo, Hernando del, 185, 1335
Castillo, Otto René, 588
Castillo y Guevara, Sor Francisca Josefa del, 274
Castle of Indolence (Thomson), 1350
Castle of Perseverance, The (morality play), 1409
Castro (Ferreira), 148
Castro, Américo, 124
Castro, Eugénio de, 148, 1091
Castro, Luisa, 1342
Castro, Rosalía de, 538, 1218, 1340
Castro Alves, Antônio de, 161
Castro Palomino, Juan Miguel, 200 catachresis, 209–11, 664, 863
Catalano, Gary, 102
Catalan poetry, 115, 211–13, 535 catalexis, 5, 9, 49, 86, 130, 213–14, 652, 802, 1425 catalog, 214
Catalogue of Women (Hesiod, attrib.), 577, 578 catharsis, 214–16, 254, 282, 403, 443, 929, 1010, 1045, 1058, 1059, 1126, 1146, 1158, 1434, 1447
Cathay (Pound), 93, 241, 963
Cather, Willa, 437
Ćatić, Musa Ćazim, 159
Catilina (Ibsen), 149
Catlives (Kirsch), 568
Cats, Jacob, 821
"Cats, The" (Baudelaire), 1056, 1366–67, 1426
Catullus, 35, 61, 207, 209, 256, 350, 368, 444, 452, 454, 541, 735, 1108; choliambus, 244, 723; epigram, 449; erotic poetry, 456; galliamb(us), 540; hendecasyllable, 616, 617; invective, 723; Latin poetry, 786, 787, 788; love poetry, 817; lyric, 826–27; neoterics, 934; paraclausithyron, 996; phalaecean, 1032; poetic calling, 1050; sapphic, 1254; trimeter, 1459
Caucasian Chalk Circle (Brecht), 283 cauda, 216
caudate sonnet, 216, 216, 1319
Caudwell, Christopher, 942
"Caupolicán" (Darío), 945
Caupolicán (Sanfuentes), 230
Causabon, Isaac, 1256
Caussin, Nicolas, 933
"Cautiva, La" (Echeverría), 79–80, 1344
Cavacchioli, Ernesto, 534
Cavafy, C. P., 7, 352, 542, 583, 584, 1067, 1080
Cavalcanti, Guido, 374, 738, 964, 1319
Cavalier poets, 216–17, 303, 418–19; metaphysical poets vs., 871
Cavallotti, Felice, 1254
Cavell, Stanley, 715
Cavendish, Margaret, 125, 357
Caxton, William, 156, 414, 1131
Cayley, John, 158, 271–72, 328, 395
Cazón, Fernando, 389
Cecco Angiolieri, 738
Čech, Svatopulk, 331
Cejador y Frauca, J., 1152
Celan, Paul, 8, 46, 105, 294, 366, 388, 484, 521–22, 568, 1037, 1057, 1125, 1157, 1207, 1269, 1379
Celaya, Gabriel, 1341
Çelebi, Asaf Halet, 1473
Celestina (Rojas), 283
Celestina's Brood (González Echevarría), 124
Céline, Louis-Ferdinand, 1418
Celliers, Jan F. E., 1329
Celtic bard, 120, 121, 217–18
Celtic Literary Revival, 1194
Celtic prosody, 217–20
Celtis, Conrad, 103, 561, 792
Cenci, The (Shelley), 270, 378
Cendrars, Blaise, 111, 503–4, 515, 890, 891, 1113, 1387, 1414, 1514, 1517
Cenelles, Les (Lanusse, ed.), 517–18
Cennabasava, 767
Cent mille milliards de poèmes (Queneau), 32, 987 cento, 220
"Central, El" (Arenas), 205
Cephalas, Constantine, 449, 575
Ceran, 1356
Cercamon, 1422
Cernadas de Castro, Diego A., 538
Cernuda, Luis, 542, 1113, 1340, 1341, 1342
Cerruto, Oscar, 154
Certamen (epic), 444
Certeau, Michel de, 135, 572, 938
Cervantes, Lorna Dee, 228, 229, 1243
Cervantes, Miguel de, 122, 124, 148, 153, 363, 400, 493, 679, 860, 957, 1007, 1162, 1164, 1200, 1219, 1338
Césaire, Aimé, 16, 17, 18, 197, 198, 199, 205, 280, 378, 515–16, 772, 926, 1093, 1094, 1108, 1379, 1451
Cesarotti, Melchiorre, 932, 1211
C'est (André), 133
Cetina, Gutierre de, 879, 1337
Céu, Sóror Maria do, 1089
Céu, Sóror Violante do, 1089
Ceyan, 1356
Cézanne, Paul, 367
Cha, Theresa Hak Kyung, 92–93, 483, 1140
Chabdak Lhamokyab, 1436
Chabot, Bart, 824
Chaibrera, Gabriello, 743 chain rhyme, 220. See also broken rhyme
Chakrabarti, Amiya, 138
Chakrabarty, D., 279
C'halan, Reun ar, 165
Chalk Circle (Li), 283
Chamberland, Paul, 183
Chamberlayne, William, 624
Chambertrand, Gilbert de, 197
Chamie, Mário, 162
Chamisso, Adelbert von, 995
Champ d'iles, Un (Glissant), 199
Champollion, Jean-François, 629, 659 chance, 31–34, 112
Chandan, Amarjit, 1133
Chang, Juliana, 91, 92
Chang Chŏng-il, 779
Changing Light at Sandover, The (Merrill), 813, 1494
Chan Metak, 1436
Channing, William Ellery, 1455
chanson de geste, 188, 220–22, 340, 355, 507–8, 764, 780, 967, 979, 1202
Chanson de Guillaume, 221, 508
Chanson de Roland, 94, 221, 222, 310, 340, 439, 471, 507–8, 544, 780, 858, 912, 1041, 1054
Chanson de Sainte Foy, 967
Chanson des Saisnes (Bodel), 859 chanson de toile, 222, 508 chant, 50, 222–23, 1084 chante-fable, 223, 236, 858 chant-royal, 223–24

Chants de Maldoror, Les (Lautréamont), 290, 513, 1113, 1378
Chants d'ombre (Senghor), 16
Chants for Socialists (Morris), 223
Chapelain, Jean, 930
Chapman, Arthur, 313
Chapman, George, 87, 89, 122, 307, 532, 617, 624, 640, 959, 1459; hymn, 646; penitential psalms, 1015; translation, 504, 1375, 1456, 1458; triplet, 1461
Chappaz, Maurice, 1387
Char, René, 182, 515, 1113, 1156, 1379, 1517 character, Theophrastan, 224
Characteristics (Shaftesbury), 478
Charents, Yeghishé, 84, 85
"Charge of the Light Brigade, The" (Tennyson), 140, 707, 1531
Chariot of the Sun (Crosby), 98
Charles d'Orléans, 119, 509, 1126
"Charles Guiteau" (ballad), 116 charm, 224–25
Charmes (Valéry), 514
"Charogne, Une" (Baudelaire), 290
Charron, François, 183
Charry Lara, Fernando, 276
Chartier, Alain, 509, 1182
Charyapada (Oriya poems), 983
Chastlelain, George, 1181, 1182
chastushka, 225
Chateaubriand, François-René de, 471, 511, 512, 744, 1216, 1220, 1221
Chatman, Seymour, 640, 1016
"Chats, Les" (Baudelaire), 1056, 1366–67, 1426
Chatterton, Thomas, 421–22, 897, 1051, 1105, 1194, 1224, 1291
Chaucer, Geoffrey, 39, 42, 43, 75, 95, 145, 187, 190, 373, 413, 414, 469, 470, 508, 1030, 1054, 1215, 1274, 1530–31; abecedarius, 1; acephalous, 5; alba, 29; ballade, 119; beast epic, 128; bob and wheel, 152, 432; book, 156, 157; Breton lay, 780; burden, 170; caesura, 174, 175; carol, 208; catalog, 214; chiasmus, 225; complaint, 286; couplet, 311; courtly love, 311; decasyllable, 340, 432, 625, 970; dialect, 356, 413; dream vision, 384; elegy, 398–99; English prosody, 431, 432, 433; envoi, 438; fabliau, 456, 477; feigning, 479; fragment, 505; imitation, 678, 679; influence, 432, 703, 705, 740; masculine/feminine rhyme, 848; medieval poetry, 855, 860, 1156; meter, 875; monk's tale stanza, 897, 969; narrative poetry, 912; Nativity poem, 919; octosyllable, 970; palinode, 993; paraphrase, 1510; parody, 1002; patronage, 1011; personification, 1026; poet laureate, 1064; prosimetrum, 1115; proverb, 1122, 1123; punctuation, 1132; rhyme, 1184; rhyme royal, 1193, 1194, 1294; rich rhyme, 1199; roundel, 1227; science, 1266; Scottish Chaucerians, 1281; simile, 1307; tail rhyme parody, 1409; terza rima, 1423
Chavchavadze, Alexandre, 555
Chavchavadze, Ilia, 555
Chavée, Achille, 132
Chávez, Fray Angélico, 227
Cheke, John, 251
Chekhov, Anton, 380, 381, 382, 1454
Chellappa, C. S., 1411
Chen Duxin, 233
Cheney-Coker, Syl, 15
Chénier, André, 36, 363, 435, 511–12, 652, 1051
Chennevière, Georges, 925
Chen Zilong, 818, 1301
Chernyshevsky, Nikolai, 1233
"Cherubikon" (hymn), 1154
Chesnutt, Charles, 595
Chessex, Jacques, 1387
Chester cycle, 812
Chesterton, G. K., 119, 266, 913, 951
Chetta, Nicolai, 30
Chevalier de la charrette, Le (Chrétien), 312
"Chhinnabhinna Chhun" (Joshi), 590
Chiabrera, Gabriello, 31, 190, 735, 736, 972
Chiang, Fay, 92
Chiarini, G., 252
chiasmus, 58, 59, 96, 225–26, 1402
Chiasson, Herménégilde, 516
Chicago school, 226–27, 679, 981, 1177, 1496
Chicana/Chicano poetry, 227–29, 280, 1493
Chicana Falsa and Other Stories of Death, Identity and Oxnard (Serros), 229
Chiesa, Francesco, 1387
Chiffren (Trakl), 105
Chihuailaf, Elicura, 232, 280, 437, 695, 845, 846
Chikamatsu Monzaemon, 283
Chilam Balam, 279, 697
Child, F. J., 116, 119, 368, 1275
Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (Byron), 422, 1012, 1221, 1222
"Children of the World" (ballad), 116
Chile, poetry of, 229–32, 315–16, 437, 1343, 1345, 1346, 1347; indigenous, 232, 437, 695, 845–46
Chima, Richard A., 16
Chimères, Les (Vigny), 512
Chimombo, Steve, 16
Chimsoro, Samuel, 16
Chin, Marilyn, 92
Chin, Staceyann, 1070
China, modern poetry of, 232–33, 279–80, 1067, 1154; Tibetan, 1436
China, poetry of, 234–35, 246; poet, 1050; rhyme, 1182, 1183; riddle, 1200; technopaegnion, 1417. See also shi
China, popular poetry of, 223, 235–37, 247–48
"Chinaman, Laundryman" (Tsiang), 91
Chinese American poetry. See Asian American poetry
"Chinese Mail" (Du Fu), 242
Chinese poetic drama, 235, 236, 237–38, 248, 283
Chinese poetics, 238–41
Chinese poetry in English translation, 235, 241–42
Chinese poetry in Japan, 242–44, 756, 844
Chinese Written Character as a Medium for Poetry, The (Fenollosa/Pound, ed.), 287, 294, 659
Chintulov, Dobri, 168
Chinweizu, 14, 1062
Chionides, 282
Chipasula, Frank M., 16
Chittadhar Hṛdaya, 935–36
Chittendon, William L. ("Larry"), 313
Chladenius, J. M., 621
Chocano, José Santos, 895, 1028, 1345
Ch'oe Namsŏn, 777
Choirilos, 444, 1447
Choirosphaktes, Leo, 172
choliambus, 244, 578, 723
Cholpon (Abdulhamid Sulayman), 1468
Chomsky, Noam, 805, 806, 1118, 1119, 1170, 1283, 1369, 1403, 1404, 1406
Chŏng Chi-yong, 778, 1157
Chŏng Yag-yong, 777
Choniates, Michael, 172
Chopin, Henri, 322, 1328, 1415
choriamb, 244, 260
"Choriambics" (Swinburne), 244 chorus, 244–46, 1359, 1360
"Choucoune" (Durand), 197
Choudhary, Bhinabai, 846
Chrétien de Troyes, 310, 311, 312, 435, 508, 560, 858, 859, 912
"Christabel" (Coleridge), 4, 246, 422, 456, 498, 506, 522
Christabel meter, 246, 422, 433, 498
Christakos, Margaret, 180
Christensen, Inger, 347–48
Christiad (Vida), 440
Christiansë, Yvette, 1331
Christine de Pizan, 37, 119, 480, 509, 545, 1008, 1015, 1052, 1226, 1522
Christmas carol, 208
"Christ's Kirk on the Green" (anon.), 1274
Chronicle (Ahima'ats), 604
Chronicle of Morea (Manasses), 172
Chronicle of Tocco (Manasses), 172
Chuci, 235, 240, 246–47, 530, 1298
Chudhuri, Ramākānta, 94
Chukhontsev, Oleg, 1238
Chumacero, Alí, 881
"Chun wang" (Du Fu), 239
Churata, Gamaliel, 1346
"Church Going" (Larkin), 426
Churchill, Caryl, 378
Churchill, Charles, 40, 421, 625
"Chymisch" (Celan), 294
Chyrystos, 798
Chytraeus, N., 175

ci, 235, 236, 237, 238, 240, 247–49, 818
Ciardi, John, 960
Cibber, Colley, 1065
Čičerin, A. N., 301
Cicero, 6, 122, 134, 220, 225, 255, 256, 257, 283, 316, 384, 574, 718, 787; afflatus, 13, 709; allegory, 38; amplification, 46; decorum, 341, 341–42, 1369; expression, 473; figura, 485; first/second nature dyad, 921; furor poeticus, 532; hiatus, 629; homoeoteleuton, 639; imagery, 662; imitation, 676, 677–78, 1161; invention, 724, 1165; irony, 731–32; medieval poetics, 852, 853, 854; neoterics, 934; number, 958; personae theory, 1024; plain style, 1040; poetic madness, 1058; pronunciation, 1110; prose rhythm, 1508; quantity, 1114; rhetoric, 1161, 1162; rhyme-prose, 1193; style, 1369; tone, 1441
Ciceronianism, 249–50, 1177, 1179, 1180
Ciceronianus (Erasmus), 249, 677–78, 1161
Cid, El. See Poema del Cid
Cid, Le (Corneille), 1453, 1496
"Ciel brouillé" (Baudelaire), 1516
Cielitos y diálogos patrióticos (Hidalgo), 79
Cielo d'Alcamo, 738
Cifuentes, Edwin, 588
Cignoni, Roberto, 1546
Cilappatikāram (epic), 1409
"Cimetière marin, Le" (Valéry), 340, 398, 514
Cinna (Corneille), 58
Cino da Pistoia, 374, 738, 1030
Cinq grandes odes (Claudel), 972, 1514
cinquain. See quintain
"Cinque Maggio, Il" (Manzoni), 735
Cinthio, Giambattista Giraldi, 445, 1007, 1060, 1158, 1160, 1453
Cioabă, Luminiţa, 1208
Ciorno, John, 543
Ciraut de Roussillon, 967
"Circus Animals' Desertion, The" (Yeats), 425, 986
Cisneros, Antonio, 1030
Cisneros, Sandra, 229
Cixous, Hélène, 387, 483
Clajus, Johannes, 251
Clampitt, Amy, 360
Clanchy, Kate, 1277
Clapton, Eric, 152
Clare, John, 117–18, 175, 356, 437, 1049, 1125, 1224
Clark, Charles Badger, 313
Clark, Gilliam, 483
Clark, J. P., 14
Clarke, Austin, 729
Clarke, Cheryl, 798
Clarke, George Elliott, 180
Clarke, Gillian, 1332 classical meters in modern languages, 250–52 classical poetics, 252–60; historical record, 636, 637; mimesis, 254, 473, 884–86; pastoral, 1005–6; plain style, 1040–41; as Renaissance models, 1162; Roman, 256–58, 786–89; sublime, 1372–73; Western, 1059–60. See also Greek poetry classical prosody, 260–63, 333 classicism, 263–66
Clauberg, Johannes, 620
Claudel, Paul, 378, 514, 971, 972, 1113, 1156, 1397, 1514
Claudian, 484, 788, 843, 994
Claus, Hugo, 823–24
Claussen, Sophus, 346, 347
clavis, 266
"Cleanness" (ME poem), 412
Cleanthes, 255, 645
Clemens, Éric, 133
Clement of Alexander, 619
Clepsidra (Pessanha), 1091
clerihew, 266, 799
"Clerk's Tale" (Chaucer), 1510 cliché, 267–68, 862; dead metaphor vs., 337
Cliff, William, 133
Clifton, Harry, 729
Clifton, Lucille, 24, 482 climax, 268
closed couplet. See heroic couplet closed style. See trobar clus close reading, 268–69, 472, 500, 833, 871, 937, 938, 1062 close rhyme, 269–70, 1191 closet drama, 270, 416, 898 closure, 270–71
Clothed with the Son (Chávez), 227
"Cloud Messenger" (Kālidāsa), 290
Clouds (Aristophanes), 253, 435, 1183
Clough, A. H., 31, 252, 424, 897
Cloutier, Stéphane, 723
Cobbett, William, 139
Cobbing, Bob, 887, 1328, 1332
cobla, 271
Cobo Borda, Juan Gustavo, 276
CoBrA (Belgian group), 132, 823
Cocai, Merlin. See Folengo, Teofilo
Cochin, Charles-Nicolas fils, 1294
Cockelbie's Sow (anon.), 1274
Cockney school of poetry, 271
Cocteau, Jean, 1415
codework, 271–72, 396
"Coeur couronne et miroir" (Apollinaire), 322 cognitive poetics, 272–73, 1063, 1129
Cohen, Hettie, 23
Cohen, Leonard, 179
Coicou, Masillon, 197
"Coin, Ars Poetica, The" (González), 229
Coixtlahuaca, 696
Colden, Cadwallader, 1482
Cold Mountain poems (Hánshān), 1155
Coleridge, S. T., 82, 88, 109, 286, 295, 396, 422, 437, 456, 522, 919, 958, 1145, 1260, 1268, 1483, 1531; affective fallacy, 11; ballad, 117; chiasmus, 225; Christabel meter, 246; classical meters, 250, 252; conversation poem, 147, 304, 422, 1404; diction, 358, 359; didacticism, 363; dramatic poetry, 378, 382; emotion, 405, 406; fancy, 478 (see also subhead imagination vs. fancy); formalism, 500; fourteener, 504; fragments, 506; genius, 550, 669; georgic verse, 557; Hebraism, 598; imagination, 135, 405, 669, 670, 671–72, 672–73, 725, 818, 1126, 1222; imagination vs. fancy, 478, 667, 668, 1214; influence, 703; inspiration, 709, 982; Lake school, 780–81; love poetry, 818; lyric, 830–31, 832; mechanic vs. organic form, 498; metaphysical poets, 871; meter, 4; monody, 897; narrative poem, 913, 914; objective correlative, 963; ode, 972; organicism, 981, 1109; parody of, 1003; paronomasia, 1004; phalaecean, 1032; philosophy, 1037; poetics, 1061; poetry definition, 982; "practical criticism," 670, 672; primitivism, 1108; rhyme royal, 1194; rhythmic absorption, 1; romanticism, 1211, 1214, 1216, 1219–20, 1222, 1223, 1224; sublime, 598; symbol, 664, 672; symbol vs. allegory, 660, 1383; sympathy, 408; taste, 1412; technology, 1414; verse and prose, 1510; "willing suspension of disbelief," 382, 670, 1284; wrenched accent, 1542
Colinet, Paul, 132
collage, 111, 274, 321, 425, 533, 645, 1096, 1377
Collected Works of Billy the Kid, The (Ondaatje), 180
Collier, Mary, 420
Collingwood, R. G., 405, 673
Collins, Ann, 354
Collins, Billy (b. 1941), 1065, 1522
Collins, William (1721–59), 91, 471, 667, 829, 970, 1058, 1291, 1409; ode, 971, 972; pathetic fallacy, 1009
Colombia, poetry of, 274–77, 1345; indigenous, 693, 695
Colombo (Porto Alegre), 161 colon, 277, 616, 639, 749
Colón, Jesús, 961 colonial poetics, 277–80, 1108. See also Caribbean, poetry of the; Spanish America, poetry of "Colonist in His Garden, A" (Reeves), 943
Colonna, Vittoria, 741, 1031, 1319
Colop, Enrique Luis Sam, 589
Color (Cullen), 22
Coltrane, John, 23, 144, 761–62, 1170
Colum, Padraic, 914
Columbanus, 9, 789
Columbiad, The (Barlow), 1224
Columbia Square Journal (Corbett), 175
Comadira, Narcís, 213
"Comedian as the Letter C, The" (Stevens), 365, 891

comedy, 245, 255, 256, 280–85, 377, 417, 676, 1059, 1174; Cicero definition, 676; classical, 261, 262, 579, 580–81; humours, 640–61; Latin, 787; mime, 883–84; parabasis, 995–96; Renaissance, 1160, 1162
"Come live with me and be my love" (Marlowe). See "Passionate Shepherd to His Love" Comenius, 123, 125, 330
comma poem, 91, 285
Comme un pommier (Noullez), 133
Commodian, 6, 789
commonplace, 285–86
Compadre Mon (Del Cabral), 204, 205 companion poems, 286
complaint, 287
Complaintes, Les (Laforgue), 514, 991
Complas de ʿAliyá, 765
Complete Field Notes (Kroetsch), 181
"Composed Upon Westminster Bridge" (Wordsworth), 997 composition by field, 287–88, 1416, 1492
Composition No. 1 (Saporta), 32
Compton, Wayde, 180
computational poetry, 288, 1416. See also codework; cybertext; electronic poetry Comus (A Mask) (Milton), 147, 209, 363, 419, 850 concatenation, 288–89
conceit, 209, 289–91, 369, 418, 863
Concepción Valdés, Gabriel de la ("Plácido"), 201, 204 conceptismo, 291–92, 586, 1073, 1089, 1166 conceptual poetry, 292–93, 983, 1416 concision, 293–94
Concordia discors, 122, 369 concrete poetry, 294–95, 322, 433, 516, 950, 1386, 1417; haiku, 595; hieroglyph, 630; texture, 1430; visual forms, 1523, 1524. See also calligramme; visual poetry concrete universal, 295–96, 720, 988
Condillac, Étienne Bonnot de, 930, 1209, 1210, 1214, 1286
Con esta boca en este mundo (Orozco), 81
Confessio amantis (Gower), 413, 431, 470, 970 confessional poetry, 24, 296–97, 426, 482, 833, 1491; Language poetry vs., 784; postmodern, 1095, 1096
Confessions. See Augustine
Confucius, 239, 240, 243, 362, 636, 675, 982, 1034, 1155, 1298; Shijing, 1302
Congreve, William, 148, 377, 972, 1513
Coninck, Herman de, 824
Conn, Stewart, 1278
Connaissance de l'Est (Claudel), 514, 1113
Connecticut Wits, 297–98, 1480, 1483 connotation and denotation, 75, 298–99
Conquest, Robert, 901
Conrad, Emilie, 883
Conrad of Hirsau, 853
"Consolation à M. du Périer" (Malherbe), 526
Consolatione philosophiae, De (Boethius), 9, 384, 413, 858, 967, 1026, 1115, 1509 consonance, 299–300, 804, 1325; reversed, 1175
Constable, Henry, 1321
Constant, Benjamin, 1220
Constantine Cephalus, 53
Constantine the Rhodian, 172
"Constitution and the Guerrière, The" (ballad), 116 constraint, 300–301, 809, 986 constructivism, 301–2, 535, 546, 1416
conte dévot, 302
Contemplado, El (Salinas), 1341
Contemplations (Hugo), 513, 1273 contests, poetic. See poetic contests; poetry slam contrafactum, 286, 302–3, 510–11, 1337
Contranatura (Hinostroza), 927
Controversy of Poets, A (Kelly/Leary, ed.), 645 convention, 303–4
"Conversation" (Cowper), 98 conversation poem, 147, 304–5, 422, 891, 1222, 1404
"Convict's Tour to Hell, A" (MacNamara), 100
Convivio (Dante), 374, 468, 620, 633, 738, 1060, 1065, 1116
Cook, Peter, 45
Cooley, Dennis, 179
Coolidge, Clark, 761, 887
Cooper, Anthony Ashley. See Shaftesbury, third Earl of Cooper, John Gilbert, 1412
"Cooper's Hill" (Denham), 351, 624, 782
Cope, Wendy, 119, 1460
copla, 185, 305
Coplas a la muerte de Don Diego de Almagro (anon.), 153
Coppée, François, 119, 372, 512, 1001 copyright, 982, 1105, 1145, 1483
coq-à-l'âne, 305
Coquillart, Guillaume, 150, 1181
Coração em Africa (Tenreiro), 18
Corazzini, Sergio, 746
Corbett, Richard, 217
Corbett, William, 175
Corbière, Tristan, 339, 891, 1051
Corbin, Henri, 200
Cordeiro de Matta, Joaquim, 17
Cordero, Luis, 388
Córdoba, Sebastián de, 1337
"Corinna's Going A-Maying" (Herrick), 217
Coriolanus (Shakespeare), 1349, 1351, 1531
Corman, Cid, 145, 179, 1048, 1353
Corn, Alfred, 1494
Corneille, Pierre, 58, 124, 160, 310, 378, 511, 735, 1055, 1101, 1425, 1447; catharsis, 215; neoclassical poetics, 928, 929, 930, 931, 933, 1059; tragedy, 1447, 1450, 1453, 1496
Cornejo Polar, Antonio, 1027
Cornford, Francis, 1153
Cornish poetry, 219, 305–6
Cornutus, Lucius Annaeus, 255, 619 corona, 306–7, 1319, 1321
"Corona, La" (Donne), 835
coronach, 307
"Corona de sonetos" (Campos), 307
Coronado, Carolina, 1340
Coronel Urtecho, José, 946, 947
"Coronet for His Mistress Philosophy" (Chapman), 307
Corpi, Lucha, 229
Corpus Christi carol, 209
Corpus Christi cycles, 377, 1155
Corpus Christi hymn, 646, 791
Correa, Viola, 228
Correas, Gonzalo, 1152
Correia, Natália, 1092
Correia, Raimundo, 161
correlative verse, 307
"Correspondences" (Baudelaire), 663, 1395, 1398
Corretjer, Juan Antonio, 203
Correyero, Isla, 1342
corrido, 117, 227, 228, 1205
"Corrido de Gregorio Cortez, El" (anon.), 227
Corrozet, Gilles, 476
Corsen, Joseph Sickman, 192–93
Corsino, Fortes, 19
Corso, Gregory, 131, 962, 1018, 1492
Cortázar, Julio, 32, 947
Cortegiano, Il (Castiglione). See Book of the Courtier
Corte-Real, Jerónimo, 148, 1089
Cortés, Alfonso, 946
Cortez, Jayne, 24, 761, 762
Cosas de negros (Cuçurto), 82
Cosas y el delirio, Las (Molina), 81
Coşbuc, George, 1206
Coseriu, Eugenio, 459
Cosmic Canticle (Cardenal), 1269–70
Cossa, Francesco del, 39
cossante, 307–8, 1333
Cossío, José Maria, 934
Costa, Cláudio Manuel da, 160
Costa, Horácio, 163
Costa, Isaac da, 821
Costa Alegre, Caetano da, 17
Costa Andrade, Fernando, 18
Costa i Llobera, Miquel, 212
Costa Semedo, Odete, 19
Costin, Miron, 1205
Cote Baraibar, Ramón, 277
Cote Lamus, Eduardo, 276
Côtes-Rodrigues, Armando, 1091
Cotruş, Aron, 1206
Couchoud, Paul-Louis, 594
"Counterpart" (Oldham), 286 counterpoint, 308–9, 1354
counterpoint rhythm, 309
Countess of Montgomery's Urania (Wroth). See Urania
Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, The (Sidney). See Old Arcadia; Arcadia country house poem, 309, 393, 394, 418, 782, 995 Coup de dés, Un (Mallarmé), 32, 157, 175, 287, 515, 747, 992, 1217, 1296, 1332, 1397, 1415–16, 1417, 1476, 1516, 1524 coupe, 309–10

couplet, 265, 307, 310–11, 370, 377–78, 397, 421, 433, 970; enjambment, 436; rhyme scheme, 1194. See also heroic couplet
Courbe ardente, La (Verboom), 132
Courbet, Gustave, 1148
Couronnement de Louis, Le, 221
Courtier, The (Castiglione). See Book of the Courtier courtly love, 311–12, 374, 384, 790, 814, 817, 857, 858, 966; erotic poetry vs., 456; gender, 544 courtly makers, 312–13
Courville, Thibault, 510
Cousin, Victor, 10
Couto, Mia, 18
Coventry Mystery Play, 825 cowboy poetry, 313–15. See also gaucho poetry
Cowderey, Mae, 596
Cowley, Abraham, 46, 286, 290, 363, 624, 829, 972, 1267, 1291
Cowper, William, 49, 98, 304, 420, 421, 646, 1149, 1254, 1320; georgic verse, 557; metrical psalm, 1125; pathetic fallacy, 1009; sensibility, 1291, 1292, 1293
Cox, Ida, 481
"Coyote, Reflecting on Just Criticism, Decides to Mend His Ways" (Hymes), 57
Crabbe, George, 363, 421, 624, 625, 913
Craig, Alexandre, 959
Cranch, Christopher Pearse, 1455
Crane, Hart, 42, 77, 95, 300, 365, 388, 531, 761, 783, 908, 1037, 1269, 1486, 1488–89, 1490; gay poetry, 541, 542; long poem, 813, 892, 911; lyric sequence, 835
Crane, R. S., 226, 679
Crane, Stephen, 1044
Crapsey, Adelaide, 1142, 1389
Crashaw, Richard, 286, 394, 418, 450, 646, 743, 847, 870, 871, 988, 1125, 1156, 1165, 1182, 1398
Crates of Mallos, 255, 256, 282
Cratylus (Plato), 885, 975, 1324
Craveirinha, José, 18, 1093
Crawford, Isabella Valancy, 178
Crawford, Robert, 1278
"Creación, La" (Tovar), 153
"Creation, The" (Johnson), 22
creationism, 203, 230, 315–16, 538, 1346
"Creative Writers and Day-Dreaming" (Freud), 1127
"Creek at the Four Graves, The" (Harpur), 100
Creeley, Robert, 30, 56, 144, 145, 179, 287, 343, 761, 835, 944, 975, 1018, 1277, 1492; minimalism, 886–87; objectivism, 964; serial form, 1296
Crémazie, Octave, 181–82
Creole Drum (anthol.), 192
Crepúscolos del jardín, Los (Lugones), 80
Crescimbeni, G. M. de', 932
Cretan Renaissance, 582–83, 584
cretic, 316
Cretin, Guillaume, 510, 1181, 1182
Creutz, Friedrich Karl Kasimir von, 575
Creutz, Gustaf Philip, 1382
Crichton Smith, Iain, 1276–77, 1279
"Cricket Sang, The" (Dickinson), 40
Cri de terre (LeBlanc), 516
Crinitus z Hlaváčova, David, 330
"Crippled Soldiers" (Yin), 177
Crirythmes (Dufrêne), 1415
Crisinel, Edmond-Henri, 1387
"Critic as Artist, The" (Wilde), 11, 1215–16 criticism, 316–19; close reading, 268–69; evaluation, 465–66; explication, 471–72; textual, 1426–29. See also cultural criticism; New Criticism
Critique of Judgment. See Kant, Immanuel
Critique of Pure Reason. See Kant, Immanuel
Croatian poetry, 319–20
Croce, Benedetto, 121, 124, 361, 404–5, 458, 465, 478, 554, 638, 1048, 1177, 1217; expression, 473–74, 1061; imagination, 673; intuition, 718–19, 721
Croggon, Alison, 102–3
Croker, John Wilson, 271
Croll, Maurice, 139
"Crónica de Indias" (Díaz), 280
Cros, Charles, 471, 1414
Crosby, Fanny, 646
Crosby, Harry, 98
Cross, Elsa, 882
cross rhyme, 321, 714, 995
Crouch, Stanley, 632
Crousaz, Jean-Pierre, 930
Crow (Hughes), 426
Crowley, Robert, 1041
Crusade Cycle, 221, 507–8, 967
Crusz, Rienzi, 1357
Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la, 109, 117, 200, 354, 544, 764, 797, 880, 882, 902, 1007, 1031, 1048; baroque, 121, 122, 124, 927, 1166, 1338, 1344; love poetry, 815; obscurity, 965; sonnet sequence, 1321
Cruz, Victor de la, 698
Cruz, Viriato da, 18
Cruz e Silva, António Dinis, 148, 1090
Cruz e Sousa, João, 161
Crystallography (Bök), 301
Csokonai Vitéz, Mihály, 642
cuaderna vía, 321
Cuadra, Pablo Antonio, 698, 946
Cuadra, Roberto, 947
Cuauhtitlan Annals, 695–96
Cuba, poetry of, 200, 201, 202–4, 206, 279, 1093, 1344, 1345, 1346, 1452; jitanjáfora, 763–64; pure poetry, 1134–35 cubism, 32, 175, 274, 316, 321–22, 503, 514, 645, 891, 1113; manifesto, 842 cubo-futurism, 533, 534–35, 746, 1113
Cucalambé, El. See Nápoles Fajardo, Juan Cristóbal
Cuçurto, Washington (pseud. of Santiago Vega), 82
Cudworth, Ralph, 1290
cueca chilena, 322–23
Cuéllar, José María, 401
Cuervo, Rufino José, 275
Cueva, Juan de la, 879, 1327
Culcambé, El, 201
Cullen, Countee, 22, 542, 596, 760, 1122, 1489
Culler, Jonathan, 61, 405, 649, 834, 1062
culteranismo, 124, 291, 1166, 1339 cultural criticism, 323–24, 325, 404 cultural studies and poetry, 324–27, 1063, 1392–93
Culture and Anarchy (Arnold), 323, 325, 598, 1041 Culture and Society (Williams), 324 cummings, e. e., 91, 162, 166, 174, 321, 365, 1120, 1320, 1322, 1405; enjambment, 436; visual poetry, 1416, 1524
Cunha, Juan, 1499
Cunningham, J. V., 447, 723, 1041, 1150, 1510
Cunningham, Merce, 33, 110, 287, 336
Curculio (Plautus), 316, 996
Curial y Güelfa, 860
Curnow, Allen, 942, 943, 944
Currey, R. N., 1532
Curros Enríquez, Manuel, 538
Curse of Minerva, The (Byron), 1224
cursus, 1114
curtal sonnet, 216, 327–28, 553, 1319
Curtay, Jean-Paul, 798
Curtius, E. R., 500
Curtius, J. M., 1443
Cushing, Frank, 699
Cussons, Sheila, 1330
cut-ups, 288, 301, 1415
cybertext, 328, 965, 966; codework, 271–72
"Cyborg Manifesto" (Haraway), 843
Cyborg Opera, The (Bök), 1329
Cyclops (Euripides), 46, 1107, 1257
Cymbeline (Shakespeare), 850, 1160
Cynddelw, 1535
Cynewulf, 411, 1273
Cynfeirdd, 1535, 1537
cynghanedd, 94, 164, 219, 328–29, 973, 1534, 1538
Cynwal, Wiliam, 1536
Cyr, Gilles, 184
Cyrano de Bergerac (Rostand), 378

Cyranowicz, Maria, 1077
Cysneiros, Violante de, 1091
cywydd, 218–19, 329, 434, 435, 973, 1550
Cywydd y Farn Fawr (Owen), 1537
Czechowicz, Józef, 1076
Czechowski, Heinz, 438, 567
Czech poetry, 329–32, 535, 1361

Dabīr (Salāmat Alī), 1498
Dabydeen, David, 196, 426
Dach, Simon, 333, 570
Dacier, André, 245, 446
Dacier, Anne, 1142
dactyl, 8, 49, 139, 333, 454, 1202; classical prosody, 260, 262; hexameter, 627, 993. See also double dactyl dactylo-epitrite, 333
Dada, 32, 33, 106, 110, 111, 112, 113, 127, 130, 131, 147, 157, 333–35, 336, 450, 514, 515, 567, 1108, 1206, 1385, 1386, 1417, 1493, 1524; futurism, 535, 746; glossolalic poems, 573; Japanese, 753; sound poetry, 1324, 1328, 1353, 1415; surrealism, 1378
"Dada Manifesto," 546, 842
"Daddy" (Plath), 42, 1491
Dador (Lezama Lima), 204
Daen, Daniel (pseud. of Willem Abma), 529
"Daffodils" (Wordsworth). See "I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud" Dafydd ap Edmwnd, 1535, 1536
Dafydd ap Gwilym, 218–19, 329, 385, 1535, 1550
Dafydd Benfras, 1535
Dagbjarts-Dóttir, Vilborg, 655
Dağlarca, Fazil Hüsnü, 1473
Dahlstierna, Gunno, 1382
Daivajña, Sūrya Khaḍi, 94
Dai Wangshu, 233, 1395
Dakani, Walī, 571
Dakotsu, Iida, 751
Dalchev, Atanas, 169
Daley, Victor J., 100–101
Dalgarno, George, 457
Dalí, Salvador, 213, 992
Dalimilova kronika (anon.), 330
Dalin, Olof von, 1382
Dalton, John, 1267
Dalton, Roque, 401, 1347
Damas, Léon Gotran, 16, 17, 198, 926
Damasio, A., 12, 406
Damian, Peter, 790
Damnés de la terre, Les (Fanon), 16, 1093
Dāmodaradeva, 94
"Damon" (Milton), 351
Damon, Maria, 327, 1063
Dana, Richard, Sr., 1223
"Dance, The" (Schiller), 336
"Dance, The" (Williams), 337 dance and poetry, 114, 335–37, 377
Dance of the Obscure, The (Saarikoski), 490
Dancers Inherit the Party, The (Finlay), 1277
"Dandelion" (Valli), 45
Daṇḍin, 767, 1244, 1245, 1253, 1310, 1355, 1437
Daniel, Samuel, 48, 209, 357, 371, 416, 417, 433, 637, 986, 1031, 1150; poet laureate, 1064; sonnet sequence, 1320, 1321; terza rima, 1423; verse epistle, 1513
Daniello, Bernardino, 1031, 1161, 1162
Daniels, David, 1417
Danilov, Kirsha, 170
Dānishnāma (Maysarī), 1022
Danish poetry. See Denmark, poetry of Dannhauer, J. C., 620
D'Annunzio, Gabriele, 338, 680, 735, 736, 746, 972, 1217, 1319, 1395, 1397
Danrin school, 593
dansa, 337
Danske Rimkrønike (anon.), 345
Dante, 42, 77, 133, 141, 216, 264, 311, 343, 413, 486, 487, 504, 553, 605, 718, 903, 908, 966, 1304, 1418, 1543; allegory, 37, 40, 620, 633, 739, 964, 1060; canzone, 190, 191, 735; clavis, 266; diction, 358, 360; didactic poetry, 362; difficulty, 365; Dolce stil nuovo, 374, 817; eclogue, 386, 1007, 1165; emotion, 405; epic, 441, 442, 444, 445, 446; exegesis, 468, 469; furor poeticus, 532; gender, 544; genius, 1220; hendecasyllable, 616, 735; imitation, 678, 679; inspiration, 709; intuition, 720; Italian poetry, 738–39, 741; Italian prosody, 734, 735, 736; medieval poetics, 853, 855, 857; meiosis, 860; Muses, 902; narrative poetry, 912–13; numerology, 959; obscurity, 964; persona, 1025; philosophy, 1036; poetic calling, 1050, 1071; poetic knowledge, 773; "poetry" as term, 1066; poetry definition, 676; prosimetrum, 1116, 1509; religious poetry, 1155; science, 1266; seconde rhétorique, 1281; sestina, 736; sonnet, 1319; synaesthesia, 1398; tercet, 1423; terza rima, 736, 912, 1155, 1423; touchstone lines, 1444; translation, 458, 1103, 1206, 1484; vernacular, 355, 1159; verse and prose, 1508
Dantesque Legend (Charents), 85
Dantin, Louis, 181
Danto, Arthur, 715–16
Danzanravjaa, 896
"Daphaida" (Spenser), 398
Darío, Rubén, 154, 202, 546, 587, 698, 934, 947, 1067, 1340, 1480, 1504; modernismo, 894–95, 927, 945–46, 1001, 1028, 1341, 1345; national poetry, 916; seguidilla, 1282; sonnet sequence, 1321–22; symbolism, 1395
Darío Lara, Álvaro, 401
Dark End of the Street, The (Damon), 327
Darker Face of the Earth, The (Dove), 1450
"Dark Lady" sonnets (Shakespeare), 545
Darkness under the Trees/Walking behind the Spanish (Salinas), 229
Dark Room Collective, 337
"Dark Symphony" (Tolson), 23
Darrāj, Faysal, 65
Darwin, Charles, 55, 56, 695, 783, 1268, 1271, 1325
Darwin, Erasmus, 363, 553, 1036, 1267, 1291
Darwīsh, Maḥmūd, 70, 280, 1228
Daryush, Elizabeth, 1389, 1390
Das, Jibanada, 138
Das, Kamala, 483
Dāsa Mādhavadeva Nīllakaṇṭha, 94
Dashbalbar, O., 896
Dass, Petter, 954
Dati, Leonardo, 154, 251, 735
Dato, Luis G., 1033
Daudet, Alphonse, 1460
"Dauer im Wechsel" (Goethe), 1035
Daumal, René, 515
Daurel et Beton (epic), 221
Dautbegović, Josefina, 159
Dávalos y Figueror, Diego, 153
Davenant, William, 217
Davenport, Guy, 56
Davertige (pseud. of Villard Denis), 200
Davey, Frank, 1439
Davičo, Oskar, 1295
David (Heb. OT), 140, 414, 574, 610, 709, 1530; as poet, 1049; psalms, 645, 1015, 1123, 1154, 1165; war poetry, 1530
David, Urbain, 517
David Copperfield (Dickens), 1512
David of Sassoun (epic), 84
Davidson, Donald, 25, 122, 531, 622, 867–68, 869, 1282
Davidson, John, 1227, 1276
Davidson, Michael, 1243
Davie, Donald, 425, 901, 1041, 1124
Davies, Alan, 1367
Davies, John, 6, 335, 449
Dávila, César, 389
Dávila, Virgilio, 202
Davis, Jack, 100
Davis, W. H., 556
Davitt, Michael, 729
Davy, Humphry, 1268, 1271
Dawe, Bruce, 102
Dawn of Humanity (anthol.), 475, 567 dawn song. See alba; tagelied
Dawson, Ariel, 938
Dawson, David, 1439
Day (Goldsmith), 503
Day, Sarah, 102
Day-Lewis, Cecil, 425, 628, 925, 1065
Day of Doom, The (Wigglesworth), 1481 dead metaphor, 267, 337–38, 863, 868
Dean, Tim, 1139
"Death" (Williams), 398

Death and the King's Horseman (Soyinka), 1451
"Death Fugue" (Celan), 568
"Death in the Plains" (Trayanov), 169
Death Is the Mother of Beauty (Turner), 869
Death of Edward, The (ME poem), 431
"death of the author" thesis, 713, 1425
"Death of the Ball Turret Gunner, The" (Jarrell), 1490, 1532
"Death of the Hired Man, The" (Frost), 913, 915
Death of the Last Black Man in the Whole Entire World (Parks), 382
"Death of the Poet, The" (Lermontov), 1232
"Death Song" (Bede), 558
Death without End (Gorostiza), 881, 1347
Debbebe Seyfu, 462
Debelyanov, Dimcho, 169
Deber de urbanidad (Rojas), 231
Debrot, Cola, 193
Debussy, Claude, 189, 514, 1396
"Decade, A" (Lowell), 546
decadence, 119, 338–40, 1103; Rhymers' Club, 1194
Decade of Tongues, A (Clark), 14
Decameron (Boccaccio), 413, 508, 740, 1116 decasyllable, 340, 432, 433, 616, 624, 970; heroic verse, 625, 626. See also pentameter Decay of Lying (Wilde), 1215, 1216 décima, 340, 458
decir, 184, 341
"Declaration on a Day of Little Inspiration" (Cervantes), 228 Decolonising the Mind (Ngugi), 280 decolonization. See postcolonial poetics deconstruction. See poststructuralism decorum, 249, 341–42, 377, 404, 552, 668, 829, 1369
Dede Korkut (Turkic), 544
De doctrina christiana. See Augustine
Deep Image, 296, 342–43, 784, 1493 defamiliarization, 343–44, 365, 805, 883, 1146, 1200, 1241, 1430
Defence of Poesy. See Sidney, Philip Defence of Poetry. See Shelley, P. B.
Defence of Ryme, A (Daniel), 417, 433
Defensa de damas (Dávalos), 153
Defense and Enrichment of the French Language (Bellay). See Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse
"Defense of Fort McHenry, The" (Key), 1483
Deffence et illustration de la langue françoyse, La (Bellay), 264–65, 305, 509, 724, 1031, 1042, 1159, 1161, 1163
"Definition of Love, The" (Marvell), 420
Degeneration (Nordau), 339
Deghakrutyun Kantvogh Kaghaki Me Hamar (Beledian), 85
Deguy, Michel, 516, 1113, 1517
Deharme, Paul, 1414
De harmonia musicorum instrumentorum (Gafurio), 369
Deification of Arsinoe (Callimachus), 444
De imaginatione sive phantasia (Pico), 668
Deinolochus, 282
Dei sepoleri (Foscolo), 744
deixis, 344, 807, 1288
Déjacques, Joseph, 518
"Dejection: An Ode" (Coleridge), 405, 972 de Kok, Ingrid, 15, 1064
Dekyi Drolma, 1436
Delacroix, Eugène, 39, 513, 991
de la Mare, Walter, 424, 556, 960
De l'amour (Stendhal), 570
De laudibus Sanctae Crucis (Maurus), 208
De laudibus virginitatis (Aldhelm), 6
Delaunay, Robert, 991
Delaunay, Sonia, 1414
Delcarte, Françoise, 133
Deleuze, Gilles, 122, 125, 1099, 1128
Delgado, Abelardo, 228
Delgado, Susy, 587
Delia (Daniel), 416, 417, 1031, 1150, 1320, 1321
"Delight in Disorder" (Herrick), 217
Deligne, Gastón Fernando, 202
Delille, Jacques, 511
Delius, Anthony, 1331
Dell, Floyd, 21–22
De loin aussi d'ici (Dotrement), 132 de Man, Paul, 38, 60, 61, 225, 296, 297, 499, 649, 665, 733, 833, 851, 1025, 1063; anti-intentionalism, 712; metaphor vs. metonymy, 877; paradox, 997; poststructuralism, 1099; prosopopoeia, 1121; symbol vs. allegory, 1393; trope, 1464; voice, 1526
Demeny, Paul, 110
Demetillo, Ricaredo, 1033
Demetrius, 50, 60, 257, 268, 476, 619, 975, 1020, 1508
Democritus, 257, 532, 1057
Demon, The (Lermontov), 1217
Demosthenes, 256, 1114, 1180
demotion, 344, 1198
Dendy, Gail, 15
Denez, Per, 165
Deng Xiaping, 234
Denham, John, 351, 624, 782, 1267
Denis, Michael, 104, 433
Denis, Villard. See Davertige
Deniz, Gerardo, 882, 927
Denmark, poetry of, 149, 344–48
Dennis, John, 668, 929, 931, 971, 1496
DeNores, Jason, 1160
denotation. See connotation and denotation
Deo, Ashwini, 547
De oratore. See Cicero
Depestre, René, 198–99, 200
De poeta (Minturno), 1158
De Quincey, Thomas, 996–97, 1113
De Rada, Girolamo, 30
De rerum natura (Lucretius), 255, 350, 362, 553, 556, 1035–36
Derham, William, 1267
Derksen, Jeff, 180, 774
Derniers poèmes de l'obscur (Boschère), 132
Derricotte, Toi, 24
Derrida, Jacques, 60, 135, 136, 210, 225, 316, 404, 473, 485, 673, 1063, 1139, 1349, 1416; anti-intentionalism, 712; archetypal criticism, 1129; écriture, 387; genre, 551, 552; hermenutics, 622; imagery, 661, 665; intertextuality, 717, 718; Lacanian psychoanalysis, 1128; Language poetry, 784; metaphor, 869, 1284, 1307; parenthesis, 1000–1001; political theory, 1081; poststructuralism, 1098, 1099, 1286, 1367; sublime, 1374; syllepsis, 1391; text, 1425; voice, 1526
Derzhavin, Gavrila, 125, 372, 933, 1230–31, 1233, 1240
De Sacra poesi Hebraeorum (Lowth), 89–90, 671, 807, 971
Desautela, Denise, 183
Desbiens, Patrice, 184
Desbordes-Valmore, Marceline, 512
Descartes, René, 123, 457, 719, 1141, 1209, 1266
"Descent of Winter, The" (Williams), 174
Deschamps, Eustache, 6, 119, 223, 224, 507, 509, 853, 1193, 1226, 1282, 1294, 1460, 1522
Descomposición (Lukin), 81
descort, 348–49, 780
"Description of a City Shower" (Swift), 664
"Description of Cookeham" (Lanyer), 309, 418
Description of Durham, The (ME poem), 431 descriptive poetry, 150–51, 349–52. See also ekphrasis
Descriptive Sketches (Wordsworth), 351, 782
Desde lejos (Orozco), 81
Desdunes, Pierre-Aristide, 518
"Deserted Village, The" (Goldsmith), 178, 728
Desert Music, The (Williams), 1488
Desmeth, Paul, 132
Desmond, Jimmy, 1070
Desnos, Robert, 515, 1113, 1378, 1414, 1517
Desolación (Mistral), 230–31, 1346
Desolación de la quimera (Cernuda), 1341
Desportes, Philippe, 510, 1165, 1319, 1521
DesRochers, Alfred, 182
Des Roches, Roger, 183
"Destined to Die" (Darío), 946
"Destruction of Sennacherib, The" (Byron), 49, 140, 1424 det (Christensen), 347–48

Detambel, René, 151
De tumulis (Pontano), 451
"Deutschland, Deutschland über alles" (Hoffmann), 565 Devall, Bill, 922
de Vere, Aubrey, 728
Devlin, Denis, 729
devotional poetry, 352–54, 415, 1165; Nativity poem, 918–19
De vulgari eloquentia (Dante), 21, 190, 343, 355, 359, 362, 374, 676, 734, 738, 857, 966, 1159, 1508, 1543
Dewart, D. H., 178
Dewdney, Christine, 180
Dewey, John, 403, 404, 1037, 1269
Dey, Bishnu, 138
Dge-'dun chos-'phel, 1438
Dhaka, 138
Dhū al-Rumma, 67
dhvani, 354, 620, 1246
Dhvanyāloka (Ānandavardhana), 620, 1246
Dia, Comtessa de, 302, 508, 1461, 1462, 1464
Dia, Hamidou, 17
diacope. See tmesis
diaeresis, 174, 354, 627
Dial (jour.), 1454, 1455 dialect poetry, 354–57, 361, 413, 422, 744; African American, 21, 22, 1489; rhyme, 1184, 1189; Scottish, 1276, 1278–79; Swiss, 1386
Dialog etre Arzur Roe d'an Bretounet ha Guynglaff, 164
Dialog on Orators (Tacitus), 257–58 dialogue, 357–58, 411
"Dialogue between the Soul and the Body" (Marvell), 357
"Dialogue of Self and Soul, A" (Yeats), 357
Dialogues of the Dead (Lucan), 357
Diamond, Jared, 1004
Diana (Montemayor), 1007, 1165, 1336
Dias, Antônio Gonçalves, 161, 279
Días como flechas (Marechal), 80
Díaz, Orozco, 124
Díaz, Vigil, 203
Díaz del Castillo, Bernal, 280, 880
Díaz de Vivat, Rodrigo, 1333
Díaz Mirón, Salvador, 880
"Dichtung and Wahrheit" (Auden), 1059
Dick, B. F., 1009
Dickens, Charles, 1512
Dickey, James, 1532
Dickinson, Emily, 89, 120, 229, 336, 354, 388, 398, 403, 423, 1067, 1095, 1156, 1216, 1296, 1455, 1480, 1485; alliteration, 40; consonance, 300; demotion, 344; elision, 1405; epigram, 450; gender, 544, 545, 797; hyperbaton, 647; love poetry, 818; lyric, 832, 1485; lyric sequence, 835; meter, 434; near rhyme, 925; paronomasia, 1004; persona, 1025; personification, 1026; plain style, 1041; Poetess, 1053; punctuation, 1120; rhythmic figures, 1198; riddle, 1200; synaesthesia, 1398
Dickson, Robert, 516
Dictée (Cha), 92
diction, 358–61
Dictionnaire de Musique (Rousseau), 121 didactic poetry, 350, 361–64, 370, 402, 413, 1060, 1080; exemplum, 470; fable, 476
Diderot, Denis, 99, 363, 403, 743, 911, 931, 933, 996, 1108, 1209, 1214, 1368
Dido, 442–43, 444, 456
Dido (Marlowe), 46
Diego, Eliseo, 205
Diego, Gerardo, 538, 934, 1341, 1480
Diego, José de, 202
Diego Padró, José I. de., 203
Dierx, Léon, 1001
"Dies irae" (hymn), 646, 791, 856, 1155
"Dies irae" (Penderecki), 398
Dietmar von Aist, 103, 1408
Díez de Leiva, Fernando, 200
10 sonetos para mil y más obreros (Velado), 401
Difesa della Commedia di Dante (Mazzoni), 446, 1060 difficulty, 361, 364–66, 425
Digenis Akritis, 171
Diggwa, 462
Di Giorgio, Marosa, 1500 digital poetry. See electronic poetry digression, 440–41
Digte (Ibsen), 954
Digte (Jensen), 346
Digte (Oehlenschläger), 345
Digte (Staffeldt), 345
Diktonius, Elmer, 490, 491, 1383
Dilthey, Wilhelm, 408, 621, 672, 714, 1038, 1214 dimeter, 367, 652, 970, 1272
Dimitrova, Blaga, 169
Dimitrova, Kristin, 170
Dimkovska, Lidija, 838
Dimov, Leonid, 1207
dindshenchas, 367
Dinescu, Mircea, 1207
Dinggedicht, 367–68, 565, 891, 1386
Dinh, Linh, 93
Dinystr Jerusalem (Eben Fardd), 1537
Diodorus Siculus, 120, 217, 1508
Diogenianus, 53
Diolier, Per, 165
Diomedes, 1256
Dion of Prusa, 1500
Dionysia. See Great Dionysia
Dionysiaca (Nonnus), 582, 627
Dionysius of Halicarnassus, 256, 256–57, 359, 975, 990, 1059
Dionysius Thrax, 256
Dionysus/Dionysian, 216, 266, 370, 371, 1213, 1446
Diop, Birago, 926, 1108
Diosas Blancas, Las (anthol.), 1342 dipodism, dipodic verse, 368, 433 di Prima, Diane, 131, 482
Dirceu (pseud. of Tomás António Gonzaga), 160, 1090 dirge, 368–69, 410; epicedium vs., 448
"Dirge in Woods" (Meredith), 369
"Disappointment, The" (Behn), 420 discordia concors, 290, 369, 1211
Discrete Series (Oppen), 1490
Diseño del ala (Sotomayor), 206
Dismissal of Greek Envoys, The (Kochanowski), 150, 1073
Disparition, La (Perec), 987
Dissanayake, Wimal, 1356 dissociation of sensibility, 369, 670, 965, 1166 dissonance, 370
distich, 311, 370, 624. See also elegiac distich Distichs of Cato, 370
dit, 370, 508
"Dit de la panthère d'amours" (Margival), 223 dithyramb, 254, 261, 370–71
Ditlevsen, Tove, 347
ditty, 371
Divagations (Mallarmé), 35, 1113
Divakaruni, Chitra Banerjee, 92
divan, 371–72, 541
Divan (Ḥāfiẓ), 371
diverbium. See canticum and diverbium
Divetiā, Narsinhrao, 590
Divina Commedia (Divine Comedy) (Dante), 37, 141, 211, 264, 386, 441, 442, 444, 445, 458, 486, 544, 620, 679, 709, 736, 857, 912, 912–13, 913, 959, 964, 1025, 1036, 1050, 1155, 1206, 1423, 1484; overview of, 738–39 divine inspiration. See furor poeticus
"Diving into the Wreck" (Rich), 1493
Divus, Andreas, 1458, 1511
Dīwān (al-Mutanabbī), 68
Dixon, Isobel, 1331
Dixon, Richard Watson, 1354
dizain, 372
Dizdar, Mak (Mehmedalija), 159
dizer, 372
Djanggawul cycle, 1154
Djurić, Rajko, 1208
Dlamini, J. C., 1554
Dlugos, Tim, 940
Dmitriev, Ivan, 1231
Dnyaneshwar, 846
Dobell, Sydney, 1348
Dobrovsk, Josef, 331
Dobru (pseud. of Robin Ravales), 192
Dobson, Austin, 119, 1225, 1460, 1522
Dobson, Rosemary, 102
dochmiac, 372
Doctor Faustus (Mann), 56
Doctor Faustus (Marlowe), 417, 718, 897
Doctor Zhivago (Pasternak), 957 documentary poetics, 372–73
Dodecalogue of the Gypsy, The (Palamas), 583 dodecasyllable, 172
doggerel, 4, 373
Doinaș, Stefan Aug, 1206
Dolce stil nuovo, 190, 191, 266, 311, 374–75, 738, 817, 857, 964, 1422, 1465

dol'nik, 252, 375, 1234, 1396
"Dolores" (Swinburne), 49
Domett, Alfred, 943
Domin, Hilde, 568
Domínguez Camargo, Hernando, 274
Donatus, 444, 445, 676, 852, 1131
Dondrupgyal, 1435
Dones i els dies, Les (Ferrater), 213
Don Juan (Byron), 99, 166, 422, 447, 498, 898, 909, 913, 969, 1002, 1223; ottava rima, 986; as verse novel, 958
Don Karlos (Schiller), 148
Donne, John, 88, 141, 146, 217, 224, 246, 272, 394, 541, 828, 1146, 1165, 1166, 1237, 1330; alba, 29; allusion, 42; apostrophe, 61; attention, 98, 99; baroque, 122, 123, 124, 125; broken rhyme, 166; close rhyme, 269, 1191; companion poems, 286; conceit, 289, 290; corona, 307; devotional/religious poems, 353, 812, 1156, 1157; difficulty, 365; dissociation of sensibility, 369; English poetry, 416–17, 418, 419, 420; English prosody, 432–33; epanalepsis, 438; epideixis, 449; epithalamium, 452, 966; eroticism, 456; foot, 494; Hebraism, 599; heroic couplet, 624; heterometric stanza, 627; iambic tetrameter, 1424; lyric sequence, 835; metaphysical poetry, 870–72, 1490; paraclausithyron, 996; paradox, 996; paronomasia, 1004; performance, 1019; Petrarchism, 1031; prose rhythm, 1114; quintain, 1142; rhyme, 1187; rhyme counterpoint, 1192; satire, 1257; science, 1267; septet, 1294; sincerity, 1308; sonnet sequence, 553, 1321; synaesthesia, 1398; tenor and vehicle, 1422; tercet/terza rima, 1423; triplet, 1461; Venus and Adonis stanza, 1506; verse epistle, 1513; visual poetry, 1523
Donoso Cortés, Juan, 1218
"Do not go gentle into that good night" (Thomas), 1522
Don Quixote (Cervantes), 122, 124, 860, 957, 1162, 1164, 1219
Don't Cry, Scream! (Madhubuti), 23–24
Don Álvaro (Saavedra), 1218
Doolittle, Hilda. See H. D.
Doon de Mayence, 508
Doorn, Johnny van, 824
Doplicher, Fabio, 748
Dor, Moshe, 608
Dorat, Jean, 510, 1042
Dorescu, Eugen, 1207
Dorion, Hélène, 183
Dörmann, Felix, 104
Dorn, Edward, 144, 1005, 1492
Dos Anjos, Augusto, 161
Dos Anjos, Federico Gustavo, 19
Dossi, Carlo, 745
Dostoevsky, Fyodor, 534, 957–58, 1233, 1397
Dotremont, Christian, 132, 133
Dottrina Christiana (Budi), 30
"Double Ballade of Primitive Man" (Lang), 55–56 double dactyl, 333, 375–76, 799 doubt. See aporia
Doue ha mem bro (Joubiouz), 164
Dou E yuan (Guan), 237
Douglas, Gavin, 145, 628, 1274, 1281
Douglas, Keith, 1531, 1532
Douglass, Frederick, 21
Dove, Rita, 24, 813, 1065, 1450
"Dover Beach" (Arnold), 286, 424, 1110, 1156, 1227, 1324–25
"Dover Bitch" (Hecht), 286, 1003
Dowland, John, 1015, 1315
"Down There" (Auden), 244
Dowson, Ernest, 338, 424, 531, 1194, 1225, 1227, 1489
Doyle, Charles, 944 dozens, 376, 1055
Dpir, Paghtasar, 84
Drach, Ivan, 1479
Drachmann, Holger, 346
Dracontius, 789
Draesner, Ulrike, 1269
Draft of Shadows, A (Paz), 881
Drafts and Fragments (Pound), 1486
Dragojević, Daniel, 320
Drainac, Rade, 1295
Dramatic Idylls (Browning), 659 dramatic monologue. See monologue dramatic poetry, 376–84, 417, 551, 579; Chinese, 237–38; chorus, 244–45; closet drama, 270. See also tragedy
Dramatis Personae (Browning), 423
Drant, Thomas, 251, 1256
Draumkvæde, 954
Drayton, Michael, 125, 367, 416, 624, 986, 1031, 1064, 1264, 1320, 1321, 1409
"Dreamlife of Letters, The" (Stefan), 158, 395, 965–66
Dream of a Common Language, The (Rich), 482
"Dream of the Rood, The," 411, 1155
Dreams at Work (Ofeimun), 14
"Dreams of Water" (Justice), 367
Dream Songs (Berryman), 813, 1025, 1491 dream vision, 100, 185, 384, 394, 411, 413, 662, 854, 1058, 1155
Drennan, William, 728
Dr. Esperanto (Lazar Ludvik [Markovich] Zamenhof), 457
Dreyfus, Mariela, 1030
Driegroschenoper, Die (Brecht/Weill), 117, 284
Drive: The First Quarter (Cervantes), 229
Droste-Hülshoff, Annette von, 139, 566, 1052
Drouet, Minou, 1049
Droz, Vanessa, 206
Drozio, Henry Louis Vivian, 682
Drummond, William, 110, 190, 837, 847, 871, 1009, 1264, 1275
Drummond de Andrade, Carlos, 162, 163, 819, 1048
Drum-Taps (Whitman), 1531
Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle, A (MacDiarmid), 425, 1276
"Dr. Williams' Position" (Pound), 893
Dryden, John, 48, 94, 187, 245, 357, 363, 418, 420, 450, 616, 641, 646, 829, 871, 1055, 1267, 1330; alliteration, 40, 41; antithesis, 59; baroque, 125; chiasmus, 59, 225; classicism, 265; consonance, 300; dissociation of sensibility, 369; dithyramb, 371; ekphrasis, 393; English prosody, 433, 1260; epanalepsis, 59; fancy vs. imagination, 478; feigning, 479; georgic verse, 556, 557; heroic couplet, 310, 624–25, 913; heroic verse, 625; history, 637; imagination, 667, 670; imitation, 679; intensity, 710; invective, 723; isocolon, 59; mannerism, 843; mock epic, 446, 889, 913; neoclassical poetics, 929, 931; ode, 972; parody, 1002, 1256; phonestheme, 1039; plot, 928; poetic madness, 1058; poetics, 1060, 1066; poet laureate, 1064; political poetry, 1080; querelle des anciens et des modernes, 1141; satire, 1257; tragedy, 929; tragicomedy, 1453–54; triplet, 1461; unities, 1496; verse epistle, 1513
Dry Salvages, The (Eliot), 361
Držić, Džore, 319
Držić, Marin, 319
Duarte, Vera, 19
Duarte de Brito, 1088
Duarte de Carvalho, Rui, 19
Dubarova, Petya, 169
Du Bartas, Guillaume de Salluste, 345, 511, 709
Du Bois, W.E.B., 21, 595, 596, 1170, 1351
Du Bos, Jean-Baptise (Abbé), 550, 929, 930, 931, 932–33, 1142 dub poetry (reggae), 14, 196, 356, 385, 426, 1018
Dubuffet, Jean, 32
Ducasse, Isidore. See Lautréamont, Comte de
Duchamp, Marcel, 32, 111, 112–13, 503, 715, 886, 891, 983, 987, 1493
Dučić, Jovan, 159, 1294–95
Duck, Stephen, 1291
Ducos de la Haille, Pierre, 39–40
Dudek, Louis, 179
Duff, William, 550, 670, 671
Duffy, Ann, 483
Duffy, Carol Ann, 426, 898, 914, 1065, 1277
Duffy, William, 342
Dufrêne, François, 1328, 1415
Du Fu, 239, 242, 818, 1300
Du Gardin, Louis, 526
Dugas, Marcel, 182
Duggan, Laurie, 102
Duhem, Pierre, 1266
Duineser Elegien (Rilke), 105, 149, 398, 566, 892, 1156
Dulce daño, El (Storni), 80

"Dulce et Decorum Est" (Owen), 650, 1531
Dumitrescu, Geo, 1206
Dumont, Fernand, 132
Dumont, Marilyn, 180
Du Mu, 531, 1300
Dunash Ibn Labrat, 604, 1200
Dunbar, Paul Laurence, 21, 187, 361, 595, 1225, 1306, 1400, 1409, 1489; lyric, 832, 1485
Dunbar, William, 99, 493, 781–82, 812, 1194, 1274, 1281
Dunbar-Nelson, Alice, 1489
Duncan, James Bruce, 1275
Duncan, Robert, 173–74, 287, 542, 964, 1018, 1140, 1243, 1295, 1296; Black Mountain school, 144, 145, 1490, 1492; gay poetry, 541, 542, 543; lyric sequence, 835; political poetry, 1080, 1081; Vancouver lectures, 179, 1439
Dunciad, The (Pope), 363, 421, 446, 889, 1002, 1039
Dunciad Minor (Hope), 625
Dunn, Douglas, 1277
Dunqul, Amal, 392
Duns Scotus, John, 708
Düntzer, Heinrich, 976
Dupin, Jacques, 516, 1113
DuPlessis, Rachel Blau, 482, 592, 966, 1296
Durán, Agustin, 1204, 1218
Durand, Oswald, 197
Durão, José de Santa Rita, 160 duration, 385
Durcan, Paul, 729
Durdević, Ignjat, 320
D'Urfé, Honoré, 1007
D'Urfey, Thomas, 799
Durgāvara, Behulā, 93
Durkacović, Ferida, 159
Durkheim, Émile, 57
Dürrenmatt, Friedrich, 1386
Dushen'ka (Dogdanovich), 1231
Dutch poetry. See Low Countries, poetry of the Dutt, Michael Madhusudan, 94, 137, 279, 682, 687
Dutt, Toru, 682–83, 1053
Dutta, Sudhindranath, 138
Duval, Anjela, 165
Duvalier, François, 198, 200
Dwight, Timothy, 297, 1483
Dworkin, Craig, 288, 292, 365, 504, 833
Dyer, Edward, 79, 251
Dyer, John, 557, 1291, 1292
Dyer's Hand, The (Auden), 1270
dyfalu, 385
Dykstra, Waling, 528
Dylan, Bob, 533, 800, 806–7
Dynasts, The (Hardy), 270, 364, 1531
Dzarugian, Antranig, 85
Dziady (Mickiewicz), 1220
Dzoraporetsi, Sahak, 83

Eady, Cornelius, 24
Eagleton, Terry, 499
Earle, John, 224
Early Auden (Mendelson), 143
Earth as Modified by Human Action, The (Marsh), 922
Earthly Paradise, The (Morris), 1103
"Easter, 1916" (Yeats), 425, 728, 761, 966
"Easter Wings" (Herbert), 497, 1156, 1198–99, 1415, 1417, 1523
East Slope (Paz), 881
Eben Fardd (Ebenezer Thomas), 1537–38
Eberhard the German, 1281
Ebner-Eschenbach, Marie von, 104
Ebreo, Leone, 1043
Ecbasis captivi (beast epic), 559
Ecerinis (Mussato), 264
Echavarría, Rogelio, 276
Echeverría, Esteban, 79–80, 386, 1344
echo verse, 386, 1199
Éclogas (Rodrigues), 1089 eclogue, 35, 133, 167, 175, 350, 386–87, 397, 415, 1054, 1336. See also pastoral
"Eclogue" (Marot), 397
Eclogues (Calpurnius), 1006
Eclogues (Garcilaso), 386, 1107, 1336
Eclogues (Nemesianus), 1006
Eclogues (Virgil), 167, 256, 350, 357, 386, 415, 444, 445, 451, 556, 575, 1006, 1165, 1226, 1227
Eco, Umberto, 474, 866, 927, 1288
ecopoetry. See environment and poetry écriture, 304, 387, 1364 ecstatic poetry, 387–88, 1057
Ecuador, poetry of, 388–89, 1028, 1344; indigenous, 695 edda, 389–90, 558, 1054, 1116
Edelman, Lee, 1139
Edfelt, Johannes, 1383
Edgar, Stephen, 102
Edmond, Lauris, 944
Edmond, Murray, 944
Edson, Russell, 1113
"Edward" (ballad), 357, 681
Edwards, Jonathan, 125
Edwards, Richard, 54
Edward II (Marlowe), 417
Eeden, Frederik van, 822, 1408
"Effarés, Les" (Rimbaud), 514
Effenberger, Vratislav, 332
Effendi, Rustam, 702
Eggleton, David, 1085–86
Eglītis, Andrejs, 794 ego-futurism, 535
Eguren, José María, 895, 1028
Egypt, poetry of, 390–93, 456
Ehoiai (Hesiod, attrib.), 577, 578
Ehrenstein, Albert, 105
Ehrhardt, A. O., 192
Ehrismann, Albert, 1386
Ehrwart, W. D., 1532
Eichel, Isaac, 606
Eichenbaum, Boris. See Eikhenbaum, Boris
Eichendorff, Joseph von, 565, 1221, 1320
Eichhorn, J. G., 471
Eielson, Jorge Eduardo, 1029
Eighteen Days without You (Sexton), 175
Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte, The (Marx), 519
80 Flowers (Zukofsky), 969
Eigner, Larry, 145, 437
Eijkelboom, Jan, 824
Eikhenbaum, Boris, 876–77, 1239, 1240, 1241
Einar Tambeskielver (Brun), 954
Einhard, 790
Einion Offeiriad, 1535
"Einstein" (MacLeish), 1269
Eisenstein, Sergei, 659 eisteddfod, 328, 393, 1055, 1533, 1537, 1550
Ekelöf, Gunnar, 149, 1384
Ekelund, Vilhelm, 1383
Ekkehard of St. Gall, 790
Eknāth, 846
ekphrasis, 256, 349, 350, 393–94, 409, 448, 661, 990–91, 1291; epic, 441; imagery, 662
Ekrem, Recaizade Mahmud, 1473 electronic poetry, 158, 175, 271–72, 394–96, 965, 1416, 1474, 1475, 1494–95; cybertext, 328; fragments, 506; obscurity, 965, 966; visual forms, 1524 Elegía a las Musas (Fernández), 148 elegiac distich, 311, 370, 396–97, 451, 627, 735 elegiac stanza, 397
"Elegiac Stanzas Suggested by Peele Castle" (Wordsworth), 397
Elegías de Varones Ilustres de Indias (Castellanos), 274
Elegies de Bierville (Riba), 213
Elegies for the Dead in Cyrenaica (Henderson), 1276
"Elegie upon the death . . . of John Donne, An" (Carew), 122 elegy, 368, 397–99, 418, 423, 1065, 1221; classical Greece, 577, 578, 817; pathetic fallacy, 1009; Persia, 1023–24
Elegy 19 (Donne), 61
"Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (Gray), 59, 363, 397, 421, 450, 451, 575, 1231, 1291
Elemental Odes (Neruda), 231, 1346
Eleven Lady-Lyrics and Other Poems (Chávez), 227
"Elf King, The" (Goethe), 564
Elfyn, Menna, 1538
Elgoes (Perse), 197
Elgskyttarne (Runeberg), 489
Eliade, Mircea, 76, 673, 906, 907, 1170
Elias, N., 1413
Elíasson, Gyrðir, 655
Eliot, George, 38, 360, 398, 447, 1114, 1223
Eliot, John, 1480–81
Eliot, T. S., 2, 4, 7, 11, 21, 56, 57, 82, 127, 135, 147, 267, 321, 322, 339,

Eliot, T. S. (continued)
358, 360, 364, 425, 531, 638, 833, 919, 922, 955, 1000, 1002, 1013, 1037, 1237, 1485, 1486; alliteration, 41–42; alliterative accentual meter, 873–74; allusion, 42, 43; anaphora, 50; anti-intentionalism, 711, 713; antithesis, 59; appreciation, 62; archaism, 75; archetype, 76, 77; autonomy, 108; biography, 142, 143, 1050; career/works of, 1485, 1487, 1490–91; chorus, 245; classicism, 263; close rhyme, 269, 1191; closet drama, 270; descriptive values, 352; devotional theme, 354; diaeresis, 354; diction, 358, 360, 361; difficulty, 365, 366, 425; dissociation of sensibility, 369, 670, 965, 1166; dramatic poetry, 376, 378, 379, 380; ellipsis, 400; emotions vs. feelings, 11–12, 403, 405; English prosody, 433; epanalepsis, 50, 438; epistrophe, 50; foot, 494, 495; formalism, 500; fragments, 506; free verse, 522, 523; Georgianism critique, 556; hermeticism, 623; heroic couplet, 625; hybrid poetry, 644–45; hypallage, 647; imitation, 982; impersonality, 814, 898, 1025, 1050, 1487, 1490; as influence, 81, 130, 347, 703–4, 753, 823, 1487, 1491–92; inspiration, 710; logopoeia, 862; long poem, 813, 911; macaronic, 837; metaphysical poetry, 125, 290, 828, 871; modernism, 57, 111, 425, 447, 890, 891, 892, 893, 901, 1093, 1096, 1490; myth, 56, 909; narrative poetry, 913, 915; New Criticism, 936; objective correlative, 135, 368, 474, 711, 719, 963; originality, 982–83; paronomasia, 1004; performance, 1017; periphrasis, 1021; on poet, 1071; poetic knowledge, 772, 774; politics, 1081; polysemy, 1087; polysyndeton, 1088; primitivism, 1108; pure poetry, 1134; reaction against, 287; religious poetry, 1153, 1157; science, 1269; sound, 1326, 1328; split lines, 1351; symbol, 1394; symbolism, 1395; terza rima, 1423; topos, 1443; tradition, 1445; tragicomedy, 1454; voice, 1526
Elísio, Filinto, 148, 1090
elision, 399–400, 1405
Elizabeth I (Queen of England), 414–15, 416, 417, 442, 446, 510, 545, 850, 902, 1164, 1444
Elizandro, Sergio, 228
Elksne, Ārija, 794
Ellendt, Johann-Ernst, 976
Ellington, Duke, 762
Elliot, Jean, 1275
ellipsis, 399, 400
Ellis, Thomas Sayers, 337
Ellison, Ralph, 151, 376, 760
Éloge pour une cuisine de province (Goffette), 133
Eloges (Perse), 197
"Eloisa to Abelard" (Pope), 48, 421, 898, 1039, 1513
Eloquent Peasant, The, 390
El Salvador, poetry of, 400–401, 1347; indigenous, 698
Elsbergs, Klāvs, 794
Elskamp, Max, 131
Éluard, Paul, 151, 182, 198, 343, 515, 594, 623, 1113, 1378, 1517
"Elvira" (Varela), 79
Elyot, Thomas, 640, 1110
Elytis, Odysseus, 584
Ema Saikō, 242, 243
Emaux et camées (Gautier), 512
Embeirikos, Andreas, 584 emblem, 394, 401–2, 562
"Embracing Sand" (Qu), 247
Emerson, Gloria, 923
Emerson, R. W., 214, 285–86, 363, 409, 437, 471, 486, 1037, 1109; consonance, 300; dirge, 369; imagination, 668, 669, 670, 672; on imitation, 981; landscape, 783; on lyric poet, 831–32, 1051; metalepsis, 862; romanticism, 1216, 1223, 1353; Transcendentalism, 1223, 1454, 1455, 1484
Emin, Gevork, 85
Emin, Mehmed, 1473
Eminescu, Mihai, 1205–6, 1220
Emmet, Robert, 728 emotion, 402–8, 929, 1056; objective correlative, 963 empathy and sympathy, 408–9, 421, 673. See also sensibility
Empedocles, 362, 578, 1509
Empedocles upon Etna (Arnold), 270
Empire, L' (Savitzkaya), 133
Emplumada (Cervantes), 229
Empson, William, 44, 62, 90, 267, 295, 298, 404, 471, 938, 1082, 1127, 1180; close reading, 268, 1062; formalism, 500; as Movement model, 901; New Criticism, 936; villanelle, 1522 enargeia, 349, 409, 1501
Enchiridion (Hephaestion), 58
Encina, Juan del, 1007, 1335, 1336
Enckell, Rabbe, 491, 1383
encomium, 409–10; panegyric vs., 994
Encomium of Helen (Gorgias), 253
"Encountering Sorrow" (Qu), 246, 247
endecha, 410
Endgame (Beckett), 381
Endless Song, The (Ojaide), 14
"End of the Far West, The" (O'Hara), 1333
"End of the World" (Hoddis), 562 end-stopped, 410, 417, 632, 802; enjambment vs., 435
Endymion (Keats), 271, 273, 423, 436, 624, 908, 1325, 1542
Eneida (Kotliarevs'ky), 1477
Eneide (Caro), 1516
Enemigo rumor (Lezama Lima), 204
Enfant Prodigue, L', 884
Engel, Friedrich, 518, 519, 520–21
Engelbretsdatter, Dorothe, 954
Engels, Chris (pseud. of Luc Tournier), 193
England, poetry of, 410–30. See also English prosody
England's Parnassus (Allen), 285
Englische Metrik (Schipper), 174, 175
English and Scottish Popular Ballads (Child, ed.), 119
English Elegy, The (Sacks), 398
English prosody, 430–34, 1118–19; Great Vowel Shift, 95; rising and falling rhythm, 1202–3; syllabic verse, 1389–90
English Psalter, 1165 englyn, 434–35, 495, 618, 973, 1423, 1538
Engonopoulos, Nikos, 584
Enheduanna (first hist. poet), 1049, 1154, 1376–77, 1475 en(h)oplian, 435
enjambment, 410, 435–36, 498, 802, 914, 974, 1187, 1320; blank verse, 146, 147, 149, 417, 432; couplet, 310–11; rejet, 1153
Enk von der Burg, Michael, 104
En la masmédula (Girondo), 80
Ennius, 6, 35, 256, 262, 283, 396, 532, 627, 786, 1183, 1256, 1322, 1503
Enno, Ernst, 460
Ennodius, 31
Enoko shū (Teitoku), 593
En Révant à partir de peintures énigmatiques (Michaux), 132
Enrico ouvero Bisancio acquistato (Marinella), 443
Enright, D. J., 901
ensalada, 436
Ensenhamem (Guerau), 211
ensenhamen, 436
Entartung (Nordau), 339
Enuma Elish (epic), 96, 997–98 envelope, 436, 1139, 1189, 1424; Hebrew prosody, 613–14 environment and poetry, 437–38, 922; Inuit, 722 envoi, 118, 119, 188, 438
Enzensberger, Hans Magnus, 438, 568, 1269
"Eolian Harp, The" (Coleridge), 422, 1037, 1414 epanalepsis, 50, 59, 62, 438–39, 1044 epenthesis, 439
Ephraim of Bonn, 606
epic, 439–48, 484, 551, 636, 828, 1059; Alexandrianism, 34, 35, 581; ballad vs., 114; beast, 128–29; classical, 253, 254, 255, 256, 578; conventions, 440–42, 1164; description, 349–51; formula, 502–3; gender, 442–43, 543, 544; genre, 553; in medias res, 707; mock epic, 889; oral, 978–79; parody of, 1002; religious, 1154; Renaissance, 736, 1159–60, 1162, 1164; ring composition, 1201; simile, 1307

"Epic and Novel" (Bakhtin), 447 epicedium, 368, 448
Epicharmus, 282, 357
Epicoene or the Silent Woman (Jonson), 417
Epic of Gilgamesh, 50, 95, 96, 225, 439, 522, 541, 681, 772, 781, 911, 979, 1009, 1049, 1376 epideictic poetry, 253, 350, 448–49, 449, 978, 1081; Hebrew, 605; panegyric, 994–95 epigram, 340, 364, 370, 418, 449–50, 451, 1166; Greek Anthology, 575, 577, 582
Epigram (Jonson), 224
"Epigram (After the Greek)" (H.D.), 675
Epigrammaton (Martial), 624 epinikion, 409, 410, 450, 453, 580 epiploke, 450
Epistles (Horace), 257, 386, 1513
"Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot" (Pope), 59, 304, 421
"Epistola a Belardo" (Amarilis), 1028
epistrophe. See anaphora
Epistulae metricae (Petrarch), 1513
Epistulae Morales (Seneca), 1040 epitaph, 450, 450–52
Epitaphium Damonis (Milton), 397, 446
"Epitaph on an Army of Mercenaries" (Housman), 848–49 Epithalamion (Spenser), 415, 449, 452, 959, 972, 1316, 1321 epithalamium, 415, 452–53, 484, 966 epithet, 360, 439, 453
Epitomé (Tchicaya), 17
epitrite, 333, 453
epode, 453–54, 577, 749, 971
Epodes (Horace), 350, 386, 1135
e-poetry. See electronic poetry epyllion, 416, 454, 581, 913, 1166
Epystole (Petrarch), 791
Equiano, Olaudah, 1223
equivalence, 439, 454–55, 804, 1174–75, 1286
Erasmus, Desiderius, 127, 249, 285, 349, 350, 401, 410, 677–78, 957, 1161, 1162; paradox, 996; satire, 1255, 1256; wit, 1539
Eratosthenes, 255, 444
Erba, Luciano, 748
Erben, Karl Jaromír, 331
Ercilla, Alonso de, 79, 190, 229–30, 232, 278, 280, 484, 695, 986, 1008, 1327, 1343; epic conventions, 441, 1164
Erdenetsogt, T.-Ö., 896
Erec et Enide (Chrétien), 508, 858
Eriksson, Ulf, 1384
Erkko, J. H., 489
Erlau, Wolfger von, 103
"Erlkönig" (Goethe), 564
Ernoul le Vieux, 780
Ernst, Max, 32, 1378
Eroding Witness (Mackey), 24
Eroica (Bellessi), 82
Eros, the Bittersweet (Sappho/Carson trans.), 828 erotic poetry, 455–57, 815, 1108
Erotiske Situationer (Aarestrup), 346
Erra and Ishum (epic), 95
Errāpragaḍa, 1419
Erzählungen (Wielund), 148
Eschenbach. See Wolfram von Eschenbach
Escobar, Eduardo, 276
Escobar Galindo, David, 401
Escobar Valedo, Oswaldo, 400
Escritores indígenas actuales, 698
Escudero, Gonzalo, 389
Esenin, Sergei, 607, 1236
Eshleman, Clayton, 1029
Eskimo poetry. See Inuit poetry
España (Gautier), 512
"España, aparta de mí este calíz" (Vallejo), 1122
España en el corazón (Neruda), 1346
Espanca, Florbela, 1091, 1092
Espantapájaros (Girondo), 80
Espejo de paciencia (Balboa), 200
Esperanto poetry, 457–58
Espill (Roig), 212
Espina, Eduardo, 927
Espinal, Cayo Claudio, 206 espinela, 340, 458
Espinheira Filho, Ruy, 163
Espino, Alfredo, 400
Espínola, Adriano, 163
Espinosa, Pedro, 124, 1337, 1338
Espinosa Medrano, Juan de, 1027
Espírito Santo, Alda do, 18
Espontaneidades da minha alma (Silva), 17
Espriu, Salvador, 213
Espronceda, José de, 230, 1218, 1340
Essay of Dramatic Poesy (Dryden), 125, 928, 1060, 1066, 1141, 1453, 1496
Essay on Criticism, An. See Pope, Alexander
Essay on Man (Pope), 310, 624, 772, 1514
Essay on the Sublime (Baillie), 1373
"Essay on What I Think about Most" (Carson), 863 Essais (Montaigne), 691
estampida, 458
Estathios, 1079
Esteves, Sandra María, 961, 962
Esther (Racine), 245
Esthétique (Véron), 473
Estienne, Henri. See Henricus Stephanus Estienne, Robert, 1507
estilística, 458–59
Estonia, poetry of, 459–61
Estrada Colindres, Isabel, 948
Estrella segregada (Cerruto), 154 estribillo, 461
Etheredge, George, 377
Ethiopia, poetry of, 461–63
ethnopoetics, 463–64, 692, 980 ethos, 464
Étiemble, René, 151
Et in Arcadia Ego (Poussin), 991
Etincelles (Depestre), 198
Etinger, Solomon, 1548
Etiopia (Atxaga), 127
Etxahum (Pierre Toper), 127
Etxepare, Bernard, 126–27
Etymologiae (Isidore), 138, 645, 1281
"Etymological Dirge" (McHugh), 863
Eucleides, 649
Eugenianos, Niketas, 172
Eugenius of Toledo, 789
Euhemerus, 907
eulogy, 391, 444
Eumenides (Aeschylus), 1449, 1458
Eunoia (Bök), 180, 225, 288, 292, 809, 965, 1096
euphony, 464–65
Euphronius of Chersonesus, 1108
Eupolemius, 791
Eupolis, 282
Euripides, 46, 244, 253, 261, 282, 349, 350, 377, 444, 470, 600, 1054, 1183, 1257; epinikion, 450; ploce, 1043; priamel, 1107; tragedy, 579, 580, 1446, 1447, 1449, 1450; tragicomedy, 1453; trilogy, 1459; war portrayal, 1530
Eusden, Laurence, 1064
Eusebio Caro, José, 274
Eustathios, 1079
evaluation, 465–66
Evangelienbuch (Otfrid), 559, 1184
Evangeline (Longfellow), 252, 628, 1484
Evans, Evan, 1537
Evans, Mari, 24
Évanturel, Eudore, 181
Evening Flames (Fet), 1234
Evening Walk, An (Wordsworth), 351
Evenou, Erwan, 165
"Eve of St. Agnes, The" (Keats), 423, 913, 1358
Everett, David, 1149
Everson, William, 1243, 1490, 1492
Every Man in His Humour (Jonson), 417, 464, 640, 641
Every Man out of His Humour (Jonson), 417, 640
"Eve's Apologie in Defense of Women" (Lanyer), 544
Evgenij Onegin (Pushkin), 575, 912, 913, 958, 974, 1138, 1217, 1221, 1231, 1239, 1425; translations, 1456, 1457
Evia, Jacinto de, 388
Évora critics, 466–67
Evtimii, Patriarch, 167–68
Evtushenko, Evgenii, 1069, 1237
Ewald, Johannes, 149, 345 exact rhyme. See identical rhyme
Examen de ingenios (Huarte), 124
"Ex-Basketball Player" (Updike), 1511 Excursion, The (Wordsworth), 51, 147, 498, 557, 719 exegisis, 467–70
exemplum, 470
"Exequy" (King), 369, 398
Exeter Book, 214, 410, 411, 1200
Exiles of Desire (Herrera), 229
exoticism, 422, 470–71, 512, 973, 1067

"Expiation, L'" (Hugo), 1531
"Explanation of America, An" (Pinsky), 304 explication, 471–72
explication de texte, 472–73, 500
Expositio Vergilianae continentiae (Fulgentius), 852 expression, 473–74
expressionism, 474–75, 566–67
"Extasie, The" (Donne), 1424
Extrana permanencia (Brito), 232
Eybers, Elisabeth, 1329–30
Eye of the Earth, The (Osundare), 14 eye rhyme, 475
Ezra Pound (Eliot), 963

fable, 97, 128, 138, 476–77; allegory vs., 37
Fables (La Fontaine), 511
Fables du très ancien Esope Phyrgien (Corrozet), 476 fabliau, 456, 477–78, 508, 854, 967
Fabré, Lucien, 1134
Fabri, Pierre, 147
Fabry, Rudolf, 1311
Fábula de Faetonte (Aldana), 148
Fábula de Polifemo and Galatea (Góngora), 1338
Facetas (Moure), 230
"Factory" (Antler), 543
Fadiman, Clifton, 266
Faerie Queene, The (Spenser), 37, 38, 41, 75, 190, 209, 214, 279, 289, 308, 351, 415, 441, 442, 445, 446, 456, 469, 484, 505, 545, 648, 703, 705, 728, 902, 908–9, 912, 913, 914, 915, 965, 1007, 1108, 1160, 1164, 1350, 1393, 1539
Fagin, Larry, 940
Fagot Müller, Ana Rosa, 948
Fahey, Diane, 102
Faïk-Nzuji, Clémentine, 17
Fain, Yonia, 1549
Fairchild, B. H., 938
Fairfax, Edward, 986
Fairfax, Thomas, 208
Faith, Rangi, 1085
Faithful Shepherd, The (Guarini), 1453
Faithful Shepherdess, The (Fletcher), 1160
Faiz, Faiz Ahmed, 687, 1499
Fakirmohan Senapati, 984
Falabella, Soledad, 846
Falcão, Cristóvão, 1089
Falco, João (pseud. of Irene Lisboa), 481, 1091
Falla, Manuel de, 189 falling rhythm. See rising and falling rhythm
Fall of Hyperion, The (Keats), 506, 1049, 1222
Fallon, Padraic, 729
Faludy, György, 643
"Famine Year, The" (Wilde), 728
Famos, Luisa, 1388
Fan Chengda, 1300
fancy, 478; imagination vs., 478, 666–67, 1214
Fandango (Vestal), 314
Fanon, Frantz, 16, 197, 280, 1093
"Fantasías indígenas" (Pérez), 201
Fantoni, Giovanni, 31
Farabi, al-, 854
Farazdaq, al-, 67
Farce de Maître Pierre Pathelin (anon.), 509
Fardd, Ieuan, 329
Fargue, Léon-Paul, 1378
Faria e Sousa, Manuel de, 466–67
Farid, Sheikh (Fariduddin Ganj-i-shakar), 1132
"Farm Implements and Rutabagas in a Landscape" (Ashbery), 1096
Farquhar, George, 377
Farrell, Fiona, 944
Farrell, Michael, 103
Farrer, J. A., 55, 56
Farrukhzād, Furūgh, 819, 1024
Fasani, Remo, 1387
Fasti (Ovid), 175
Fastoul, Baude, 509
fatras, 478–79
Fauconnier, Gilles, 272, 869
Faula (Torroella), 211
Faulkner, William, 199, 536
Faust (Goethe), 95, 245, 270, 512, 545, 563, 909, 1017, 1036, 1219, 1220, 1255, 1450
Faustino, Mário, 163
Faustino Sarmiento, Domingo, 230
Fausto (Campo), 540, 1345
Faverey, Hans, 192, 824
Faye, Jean-Pierre, 516
Fayrfax, Robert, 208
Faytūrī, Muḥammad Miftāḥ al-, 70, 392
Fazio degli Uberti, 736, 1423
"Fears in Solitude" (Coleridge), 304, 1531
Febrer, Andreu, 211
Febrer i Cardona, Antoni, 212
Febriany, Shinta, 703
Feddema, Anne, 529
Fed'kovych, Yuri, 1478
Fefer, Itzik, 1549
feigning, 479–80
Feinberg, Leslie, 797
Feldman, Morton, 32
Félibrige, 480, 968
Feliński, Alojzy, 1074
"Felix Randal" (Hopkins), 173, 225
Fell, Alison, 482
Felman, Shoshana, 1128, 1350
Female Poets of America (Griswold, ed.), 1480 feminine ending. See masculine and feminine feminist approaches to poetry, 465, 466, 480–84, 712, 1044–45; écriture, 387; influence studies, 704–5; intertextuality, 717; lesbian, 82, 796, 797–98; Poetess, 1052
"Feminist Manifesto" (Loy), 481, 843
Fénelon, François, 149, 1142, 1230
Feng Menglong, 238
Fénix Renascida (anthol.), 1090
Fenollar, Bernat, 212
Fenollosa, Ernest, 241, 287, 294, 373, 471, 659, 949, 1173
Ferguson, Adam, 1368
Ferguson, Samuel, 728
Fergusson, Elizabeth Graeme, 1482
Fergusson, Robert, 170, 1274, 1275, 1276
Ferlin, Nils, 1383
Ferlinghetti, Lawrence, 131, 1018, 1243, 1492
Fernandes de Oliveira, Mário Antonio, 18
Fernandes Torneol, Nuno, 307–8
Fernández, Luis, 1007
Fernández de Andrada, Andrés, 1337
Fernández de Moratín, Leandro, 148, 932
Fernández de Moratín, Nicolás, 932, 1143, 1340
Fernández de Oviedo, Gonzalo, 200
Fernández Madrid, José, 274
Fernández Moreno, Baldomero, 80
Fernández Retamar, Roberto, 205, 459
Fernández Spencer, Antonio, 205
Fernando, Basil, 1357
Fernando Álvarez, Louis, 1505
Fernán Vello, Miguel Anxo, 539
Ferrater, Gabriel, 213
Ferré, Rosario, 206
Ferreira, António, 148, 1031, 1089, 1319
Ferreira de Lacerda, Bernarda, 1089
Ferreiro, Alfredo Mario, 1500
fescennine verses, 484
"Feste burg ist unser Gott, Ein" (Luther), 561
Fet, Afanasy, 1222, 1232, 1234, 1236
Fiallo, Fabio, 202
Fichman, Jacob, 607, 614
Fichte, J. G., 478, 621, 673, 1037, 1212, 1213, 1214, 1219
Ficino, Marsilio, 532, 672, 709, 740
Ficowski, Jerzy, 1208 fiction, poetry as, 484–85
"Fidelia" (Zenea), 201
Fidget (Goldsmith), 46, 292
Fiedler, Leslie, 1127
Field, Barron, 100
Field, Michael, 424
Fielding, Henry, 58, 889, 1541
Fiesta de toros en Madrid (Ferández), 1143
Figiel, Sia, 1085
Figueredo, Álvaro, 1500
Figueroa, Francisco de, 1007, 1337
figura, 485–86, 487, 1263–64
"Figura" (Auerbach), 486
figuration, 486–87, 1284–85, 1464. See also metaphor
Fijeza, La (Lezama Lima), 204
Fikret, Tevfik, 1473
Filelfo, Francesco, 791, 972, 1031 fili, 487–88
Filians'ky, Mykola, 1478
Filipa de Almada, 1088
Filipino American poetry, 91, 92, 1033. See also Philippines, poetry of the Filkova, Fedya, 169

Filostrato, Il (Boccaccio), 413, 740, 913, 986
"Final Soliloquy of the Interior Paramour" (Stevens), 1038
Finch, Anne (1661–1720), 420, 421, 1052, 1104, 1291
Finch, Annie (b. 1956), 49, 914, 937–38
Fin de partie (Beckett), 381
Finding the Center (Tedlock), 699
Fineman, J., 827
"Fine View, A" (Knoebel), 395
Fingal (alleged ancient Celtic epic), 1223–24
finida, 488
Finismundo, a última viagem (Campos), 163
Finland, poetry of, 260, 488–91, 997, 999, 1154, 1220
Finland-Swedish modernists, 490, 491
Finlay, Ian Hamilton, 426, 887, 1277, 1416, 1430
Finnegans Wake (Joyce), 909, 1004
Firdawsī, Abū al-Qāsim, 140, 994, 1022–23, 1200
Firebearers, 490, 491
"Firebombing, The" (Dickey), 1532
Fireside poets, 491–92, 1480
"First Anniversarie" (Donne), 1267
First Dream (Cruz), 121, 880, 1344
First Fruits of Australian Poetry (Field), 100
Firth, J. R., 1038, 1324
Fisch, H., 601
Fischart, Johann, 251, 1226
Fischerová, Sylva, 332
Fish, Stanley, 365, 407, 622, 806, 1146, 1147
"Fish, The" (Bishop), 5, 1491
Fisher, Allen, 426, 1270
Fisher, Roy, 426, 1332
"Fisherman, The" (Yeats), 728
Fisherman's Invocation, The (Okara), 14
Fishta, Gjergj, 30
Fitrat, Abdurauf, 1468
FitzGerald, Edward, 209, 471, 973–74, 1067, 1228
Fitzgerald, Robert, 101
"Five Bells" (Slessor), 101
"Five-Day Rain, The" (Levertov), 1524
Five Great Odes (Claudel), 1156
5 metros de poemas (Oquendo), 1029
"Five Words in a Line" (Stein), 292
Flaherty, Robert J., 372
Flamenca, 312, 859, 957, 967
Flaminio, Marcantonio, 646, 792, 972
Flarf, 492, 503, 983, 1096, 1416, 1495
Flash poem, 158
Flaubert, Gustave, 108, 338, 1213–14, 1509
Fleming, Paul, 124, 562
Flemish poetry, 822–23, 824
fleshly school of poetry, 492–93
Fletcher, Angus, 863
Fletcher, Carmen William ("Curley"), 313, 314
Fletcher, Giles and Phineas, 1264
Fletcher, John (1579–1625), 417, 1007, 1160, 1453
Fletcher, John Gould (1886–1950), 471
Fleurs du mal, Les (Baudelaire), 36, 513, 991, 1156, 1216–17, 1218
Flight of Zalán, The (Vörösmarty), 642
Flint, F. S., 424, 674, 675
Floire et Blancheflor, 850
"Flood, The" (Reyes), 1033
Florante at Laura (Balagtas), 1032
Florence, Penny, 991–92
Florenskij, Pavel, 1362
Florentine Codex (Sahagún), 697, 879
Flores, Juan Carlos, 206
Flores, Marco Antonio, 588
Flórez, Julio, 275
Florian, J.-P.-C., 476
Floricanto en Aztlán (Alurista), 228
Florio, John, 89
Florit, Eugenio, 203, 1134–35
"Flowers and Moonlight on the Spring Water" (Bragg), 45 Flowers of Evil, The (Baudelaire), 36, 513, 991, 1156, 1216–17, 1218
Fluxus, 33, 113
flyting, 357, 493, 1054
Fogarty, Lionel, 102
Foix, Josep Vicenç, 213
Folengo, Teofilo, 742, 792, 837
Foley, J. M., 977, 980
Folger, Mosha, 723
Folgóre, 738
Folgore, Luciano (1888–1966), 534
Folhas Caídas (Garrett), 1090
folia, 493
folk poetry. See oral poetry
Folz, Hans, 861, 1408
Fombona Pachano, Jacinto, 1504
Fondane, Banjamin, 1206
Fonseca, Manuel da, 1092
Fontane, Theodor, 1149
Fontanella, Francesc, 212
Fontanier, Pierre, 1000, 1121
Fontenelle, Bernard le Bovier de, 265, 1141 foot, 493–97, 898; variable, 1503
Footfalls (Beckett), 381
Foppa, Alaide, 589
Foquelin, Antoine, 865
Forage (Wong), 180
Forbes, John, 102
Forché, Carolyn, 948, 1493
Ford, Charles Henri, 542
Ford, Ford Madox, 680–81, 963, 1509
Forefathers' Eve (Mickiewicz), 1220
Forel' razbivaet led' (Kuzmin), 1235
"For Hope" (Cowley), 286
"For Hope" (Crashaw), 286 form, 497–99, 501–2, 634
Formal Feeling Comes, A (Finch), 937–38 formalism, 499–502, 711, 712, 1445. See also New Criticism; New Formalism; Russian formalism Formosa, Feliu, 213 formula, 360, 502–3, 577, 976
For My People (Walker), 23
Fornaris, José, 201
Fornes, Maria Irene, 378
Forns-Broggi, Roberto, 437
Forrest-Thomson, Veronica, 90, 426, 1048
Forssell, Lars, 1384
Fort, Paul, 1514
Fortes, Corsino, 19
"For the Suicides" (Justice), 1390
For the Time Being (Auden), 59, 425
"For the Union Dead" (Lowell), 966
Fortini, Franco, 748
Fortunatus, Venantius, 6, 789, 1193, 1417, 1424
40-tal (jour.), 536
Foscolo, Niccolò, 1217
Foscolo, Ugo, 145, 575, 736, 744, 745, 1319, 1423
Foster, R. F., 142, 143
Foster, Sesshu, 93
Foucault, Michel, 135, 296, 325, 466, 541, 784, 797, 828, 982, 1063, 1128, 1284, 1416; anti-intentionalism, 712; intertextuality, 717, 718; New Historicism, 938; poststructuralism, 1099
Fouinet, Ernest, 995 found poetry, 322, 503–4, 542, 1377
Fountain, a House of Stone, A (Padilla), 205
Fourcade, Dominique, 516 fourfold method of interpretation. See exegesis
Four Hymns (Spenser), 646
Fournadzhiev, Nikola, 169
Four Quartets (Eliot), 4, 75, 269, 287, 354, 425, 438, 892, 893, 1157, 1191 fourteener, 504–5, 617, 625, 628; Homer translation, 1456
"Four Tones and Eight Faults" (Chinese prosody), 1299
Four Zoas, The (Blake), 422, 908
Fowler, Alastair, 362
Fowler Calzada, Victor, 206
Fracastoro, Girolamo, 792, 1161
Fracco, A., 175
fractal verse, 505
fragment, 505–6, 670
Fragmenter af en Dagbog (Claussen), 347
Fragmenti (Dalchev), 169
Fragmentos a su imán (Lezama Lima), 204
Fragments of Ancient Poetry (Macpherson), 506
Fraire de Joi e sor de Plaser (anon.), 211
Frakulla, Nezim, 30
Francastoro, Girolamo, 363
France, Anatole, 1001, 1378
France, poetry of, 506–17. See also French prosody
Francesc de la Via, 211
Franciade, La (Ronsard), 36, 340, 511, 1161, 1164
Francis, Jacob and Immanuel, 605
Francis, Robert, 1540
Francisco, Nia, 923

Francis de Sales, 98
Francis of Assisi, 735, 737
Franco, Francisco, 127, 211, 213
Franco, Veronica, 545
Franconetti, Silverio, 189 francophone poets of the U.S., 184, 517–18
Frank, Della, 923
Frank, J., 1349
Frank, Sebastian, 996
Frank, Waldo, 21, 596
Frankfurt school, 108, 112, 323, 518–22, 784, 938
Frank-Kamenetsky, Izrail, 1241
Franklin, Benjamin, 1481, 1482
Franklin, R. W., 835
Franko, Ivan, 1478
Frankopan, Fran Krsto, 320
Franzén, Frans Michael, 149, 489, 1382
Fraser, G. S., 1276
Fraser, Kathleen, 482
Frashëri, Naim, 30
Frauenlob (Heinrich von Meissen), 560–61, 861, 1353
Fraunce, Abraham, 251, 1125
Frazer, Brenda, 130
Frazer, J. G., 56, 76, 673, 681, 877, 907, 909, 1108, 1153
Fréchette, Louis, 181
Fredmans epistlar (Bellman), 1382
Fredro, Aleksander, 1074
Free Besieged, The (Solomos), 583, 916, 917
Freedom on Parole (Paz), 881 free verse, 309, 433, 501–2, 522–25, 674; Japanese, 752–54; line, 523–24, 802, 803; prose fusion, 1511; visual form, 1524
Freidank, 1353
Freidenberg, Olga, 1241
freie Rhythmen, 525, 567 freie Verse, 525
Freiligrath, Ferdinand, 565
Freire Castrillón, Manuel, 538
Freitas Filho, Armando, 163
Frejdenberg, Ol'ga, 1362
Frénaud, André, 516
French African poetry, 16–17, 516, 1093
French Basque poetry, 126–28
French Canadian poetry, 180, 181–84, 516
French Caribbean poetry, 196–200, 515–16, 1093
French poetry. See France, poetry of French prosody, 525–28; alexandrine, 35–36; couplet, 310; decasyllable, 340; distich, 370; enjambment, 435; hiatus, 629; meter, 874; octosyllable, 970; rhyme, 1184, 1190; rich rhyme, 1199; stances, 1357; trimètre, 1460
French Swiss poetry, 1387
Freneau, Philip, 1483
"Frère Lubin" (Marot), 119
Frescobaldi, Dino, 374
Frescobaldi, Matteo, 375
Frese, Jakob, 489
Fresnoy, Charles Alphonse du, 843
Freud, Sigmund, 11, 12, 56, 94, 162, 265, 343, 398, 425, 438, 481, 673, 704, 1108, 1129, 1174, 1240, 1540; archetype, 76; comedy, 281, 282; emotion, 403, 405; empathy, 408; hermeneutics, 22, 618; image, 661; inspiration, 710, 1058; intertextuality, 717; metaphor, 877; myth, 906; psychoanalysis, 1126–27, 1128; repetition, 1170; surrealism, 1377, 1378
Freyre, Ricardo Jaimes, 153–54, 895, 1345
Frezzi, Federico, 1423
Fribytterdrømme (Kristensen), 346
Fried, Erich, 105, 438, 568
Fried, M., 1, 89
Friedan, Betty, 481–82
Friedrich, Caspar David, 1221
Friedrich von Hausen, 560, 887
Frimann, Claus, 953
Frisian poetry, 528–30
Frithiofs saga (Tegnér), 1382
Frobenius, Leo, 56, 908, 926
Fröding, Gustaf, 1383
Frogs (Aristophanes), 253, 282, 580, 1054
Froissart, Jean, 119, 223, 384, 413, 629, 1116, 1226, 1460, 1522
From Glasgow to Saturn (Morgan), 1277
Fromm, Erich, 518
From the Cables of Genocide (Cervantes), 229
Frost, Robert, 41, 111, 141, 147, 357, 361, 556, 625, 644, 833, 907, 922, 960, 1292, 1455, 1457; chain rhyme, 220; cliché, 267; didacticism, 364; envelope, 436, 1424; epanalepsis, 438; georgic, 557; hypotaxis, 650–51; iambic tetrameter, 1424; landscape, 783; meter, 431, 433, 875; monologue, 898; monorhyme, 899; narrative poem, 912, 913, 915; performance, 1017, 1019; poet laureate, 1065; sonnet, 1320; split lines, 1351; symbol, 1394; U.S. poetry, 1485, 1486, 1490, 1491–92, 1493
"Frost at Midnight" (Coleridge), 225, 304, 422
Frostenson, Katarina, 1385 frottola and barzelletta, 190, 530
Frug, Shimen, 1548
Frugoni, Carlo Innocenzo, 736
"Frühlingsfeier" (Klopstock), 525
"Fruites of Warre, The" (Gascoigne), 1531
Fry, Christopher, 270, 378
Fry, Roger, 499
Frye, Northrop, 7, 216, 370, 373, 469, 679, 704, 937, 982, 1004, 1047, 1126, 1153, 1177, 1257, 1293; archetype, 77–78, 906, 1129, 1392; plot, 1044, 1045; poetics, 1059; riddle, 1200; simile vs. metaphor, 1307
Frynta, Emanuel, 332
fs (pseud. of Indrek Mesikapp), 460 fu, 235, 240, 242, 530–31, 775, 1115
Fuera del juego (Padilla), 205
Fuertes, Gloria, 1342
Fugitives, 25, 531, 645, 936, 1490
Fujiwara Shunzei, 1303
Fujiwara Teika, 1303–4
Fulgentius, 39, 445, 809, 852
Fuller, Margaret, 1223, 1454, 1455
Fuller, Roy, 1389, 1423, 1532
Fullmer, J. Z., 1270
Fulton, Alice, 483, 505, 1271
Fumo Liyongo, 1380
Funnyhouse of a Negro (Kennedy), 380
"Fu on Climbing a Tower" (Wang), 41, 530
"Fu on the Luo River Goddess," 530
"Fu on the Owl" (Jia), 530
Fürecker, Christopher, 794
furor poeticus, 531–33, 550, 709, 1043, 1057–58, 1059, 1111, 1112, 1126, 1178, 1503
Fürstenspiegel genre, 413, 414
Fussell, Paul, 495
Fuster, Valeri, 212
futurism, 5, 157, 213, 481, 515, 533–36, 675, 716, 746, 890, 1113, 1217, 1235, 1236; avant-garde, 110, 111–12, 113; calligramme, 175, 176; Dada, 334; gender, 546; obscurity, 965; typography, 1476, 1524; vorticism, 1527; zaum', 1552
"Futurist Manifesto" (Marinetti), 111, 113, 515, 842, 843, 890, 1479
Fux, Johann, 904
Fu Xian, 531
Fu Xuan, 531, 1550
Fuzuli, 1472
Fyrtiotalisterna, 536

Gaarriye (Maxamed Xaashi Dhamac), 1314
Gabashvili, Bessarion, 555
Gabe, Dora, 169
Gabo, Naum, 301
Gabrieliad (Pushkin), 1233
Gabrielle de Coignard, 354
Gadamer, Hans-Georg, 176, 619, 622, 672, 714, 715, 866, 1106, 1174, 1443, 1445 Gaelic poetry. See Ireland, poetry of; Scotland, poetry of Gaelic Revival, 728
Gafurio, Franchino, 369
Gagnon, Madeleine, 183
Gaines, Reg E., 1070
gai saber, 211, 537, 968, 1055
gaita gallega, 537
Gaitán Durán, Jorge, 275
Gajcy, Tadeusz, 1076
Galateia (Callimachus), 444
Galáxias (Campos), 162–63, 1064
Gałczyński, Konstanty Ildefons, 1076
Galgenlieder (Morgenstern), 566
Galhegos, Manuel de, 466, 467
Galich, Alexander, 1237
Galicia, poetry of, 537–40, 1088
Galindo, Antonia, 400

Gallagher, Tess, 1493
Galland, Antoine, 471
Gallegos, Brenda, 401
Gallery of Harlem Portraits, A (Tolson), 23
galliamb(us), 540, 725
Gallows Songs (Morgenstern), 566
Gallus, Cornelius, 786
Galton, Francis, 663, 664
Gama, Basílio da, 148, 160
Gama, Joana da, 1088
Gambara, Veronica, 1031
Gambaro, Griselda, 781
Gamero, Antonio, 401
Gamoneda, Antonio, 1341, 1342
Gandiaga, Bittoriano, 127
Gandlevskii, Sergei, 1238
Gangopadhyay, Sunil, 138
Gangotena, Alfredo, 389
Gangzhün (pseud. of Sangye Gyatso), 1436
Gao Ming, 237
Gaon, Saadia, 604
Gao Qi, 1300
"Gao yuan" (Wang trans.), 241
Garbage (Ammons), 311, 783
Garborg, Arne, 940, 955
Garcés, Henrique, 153
García, Concha, 1342
Garcia-Berrio, Antonio, 1443
Garcia Granados, Pepita, 587
García Lorca, Federico, 189, 203, 343, 484, 536, 623, 927, 1092, 1218, 1340; gay poetry, 542, 543; haiku, 595; lyric sequence, 835; neo-Gongorism, 934; refrain, 1152; romance, 1205; symbolism, 1395; tragedy, 1450
García Mackle, Miguel, 1505
García Maffla, Jaime, 276
García Marruz, Fina, 205
García Montero, Luis, 1342
García Nieto, José, 1341
García Valdés, Olvido, 1342
Garcia Villa, Jose, 91, 285, 1033, 1175
Garcilaso de la Vega (1501–36), 148, 200, 212, 250, 1335–36, 1337; canción, 184, 185, 1336; conceptismo, 291; eclogue, 386, 1007, 1336; Petrarchism, 1031, 1163, 1164; sonnet, 1319, 1321, 1336; verse epistle, 1513
Garcilaso de la Vega (El Inca) (1539–1616), 279, 694, 1344
"Garden, The" (Marvell), 394, 420, 1135
Gardner, Gail, 313, 314
Gardner, Helen, 4, 54
Garfield, James, 116
Gargantua and Pantagruel (Rabelais), 957, 1162, 1510
Garibay, Ángel María, 879, 882
Garioch, Robert, 1270, 1276
Garneau, Alfred, 181
Garneau, François-Xavier, 181
Garneau, Hector de Saint-Denys, 182
Garnier, Pierre, 516, 1416
Garnier, Robert, 416, 511
Garréta, Anne, 987
Garrett, Almeida, 148, 1090
Garrido, Edna, 200
Garshāspnāma (Ṭūsī), 1023
Gascoigne, George, 289, 415, 624, 835, 1015, 1041, 1260, 1352, 1453; metrical psalm, 1125; poulter's measure, 1100; rhyme royal, 1194; war portrayal, 1531
Gaskell, Philip, 1428
Gasoline (Corso), 131
Gaspard de la Nuit (Bertrand), 513, 1112
Gasparov, Boris, 1362
Gaspirali/Gasprinskiy, Ismail, 1467–68
Gassendi, Pierre, 476
Gassol, Ventura, 213
Gaston Fébus (Count of Foix), 968
Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., 43, 717, 1002, 1170
Gates of Paradise, The (Daniels), 1417
"Gather ye rosebuds while ye may" (Herrick), 209, 419, 504, 1198
Gatón Arce, Freddy, 205
Gatsos, Nikos, 584
Gatto, Alfonso, 623
Gaucelm Faidit, 1041
gaucho poetry, 79, 356, 540, 691, 1014, 1344–45
Gaude mater Polonia (hymn), 1072
Gauguin, Paul, 991, 1397
Gautier, Judith, 471
Gautier, Théophile, 5, 36, 107, 337, 367, 425, 471, 512–13, 652, 970; decadence, 338; Parnassianism, 1001; sonnet, 1319–20
Gautier Benírez, José, 201
Gautier d'Arras, 859
Gautier de Coinch, 900
Gautier de Dargies, 780
Gauvreau, Claude, 182
Gavidia, Francisco, 400
Gawain and the Green Knight. See Sir Gawain and the Green Knight Gay, John, 41, 117, 140, 284, 386, 476, 557, 970 gAy BCs (Williams), 543
"Gay Chaps at the Bar" (Brooks), 1490 gay poetry, 10–11, 456, 483, 540–43, 545, 546, 940; love poetry, 815, 816, 817, 818; queer poetry vs., 1139, 1140. See also lesbian poetry
Gay Science (Nietzsche), 537
Gearts van der Meulen, Tsjibbe, 528
Geburt der Tragödie, Die (Nietzsche), 216, 367, 1213
Geda, Sigitas, 810
Gedichte (Lenau), 104
Geertz, Clifford, 883, 938
Geibel, Emanuel, 566, 1149
Geijer, Erik Gustaf, 1382
Geistliche Sonnette (Greiffenberg), 103–4
Geldman, Mordecai, 608
Gell, A., 88
Gellert, C. F., 476, 477, 525, 563
Gelman, Juan, 81, 1347
Gelsted, Otto, 346
Gendall, Richard, 306
gender and poetry, 543–47; blason, 150–51; complaint, 286; courtly love, 312, 817; decadence, 338; epic, 442–43, 543; intertexuality, 717–18; love poetry, 816–19; mal mariée, 842; muse, 902; Poetess, 1051–53, 1483–84; poststructuralism, 1098–99; querelle des femmes, 545, 1204; sapphic, 1254; sensibility, 1291–92; sonnet, 1031; trobairitz, 1461–62. See also feminist approaches to poetry; gay poetry; lesbian poetry Generation of 1927 (Spain), 595, 927, 934, 1092, 1339 generative metrics, 547–48
generic rhyme, 218, 548, 925, 973
"Generic Titles" (Bates), 314
Genette, Gérard, 44, 679, 717, 863, 1045, 1062; structuralism, 1363, 1364, 1365, 1367
Genevan Psalter, 1165
Geneva school, 548–49, 721
"Genghis Chan: Private Eye" (Yau), 92
Génie du christianisme (Chateaubriand), 511 genius, 107, 108, 549–51, 563, 928, 1049, 1220, 1232; furor poeticus, 531–33; imagination, 667, 668, 669; inspiration, 709; intensity, 710; as masculine, 546; naïve, 911; Sturm und Drang, 1368
Genji monogatari, 755, 757, 1303
Genovese, Eugene, 26 genre, 551–54, 828, 829, 830, 833, 1059, 1433
Gentile, Giovanni, 718, 721
Geoffrey Gaimar, 970
Geoffrey of Monmouth, 859
Geoffrey of Vinsauf, 317, 678, 791, 853, 1110, 1179, 1281
Geometres, John, 172
George, Stefan, 8, 104, 149, 541, 566, 822, 891, 1017, 1113; symbolism, 1395, 1396
Georgia, poetry of, 554–56
Georgianism, 303, 424, 556
Georgian Poetry (anthols.), 556, 675
georgic, 362, 364, 394, 556–57, 1291
Georgics (Virgil), 154, 175, 350, 362, 363, 444, 445, 454, 511, 556, 1226, 1227
Gerald fitz Maurice, 726–27
Geraldini, Alessandro, 200
Geraldini, Antonio, 386
Gerard, Alexander, 550, 669, 670, 931, 1413
Gerard of Cremona, 854
Gerbasi, Vicente, 1505
Gerbe de Sang (Depestre), 198
Gergei, Albert, 641
Gerhardt, Paul, 562
Gerlach, Eva, 824
German expressionism, 474–75, 566–67
Germania Death in Berlin (Müller), 380

Germanic prosody, 557–59; alliteration, 40, 41, 42, 94, 95; classical meter, 250, 251, 252; hemistich, 616; hendecasyllable, 617; hexameter, 628; leich, 795–96; metrics, 873, 1174
Germanien (Lerner-Holenia), 105
Germanov, Andrei, 169
German poetry, 559–69
German Psalter, 1165
German Swiss poetry, 1385–87
Geroi nashego vremeni (Lermontov), 1220, 1221
"Gerontion" (Eliot), 425, 919, 1485
Gerov, Alexander, 169
Gerov, Naiden, 168
"Gertrude Stein" (Loy), 1269
Gerusalemme conquistata (Tasso), 742
Gerusalemme liberata (Tasso), 121, 124, 350–51, 441, 442, 443, 446, 456, 466, 736, 742, 913, 986, 1160, 1164
Gervais de Bus, 128
Gervase of Melkley, 853
Gervitz, Gloria, 882
Gesellschaftslied, 570
Gesner, Conrad, 251, 1032
Gessner, Salomon, 1113, 1386
Gesta Danorum, 344
Gestalt psychology, 1361
Gesta Romanorum, 470
Geste: narrations (Grangaud), 516
Gesualdo, Giovanni Andrea, 1031
Geta, Hosidius, 53, 220
Geub, Piet, 347
Geuzenliedboeken (anthols.), 821, 823
Gezelle, Guido, 822
Ghafar Ibrahim, 841
Ghālib, 571, 1156–57, 1490, 1499 ghazal, 67–68, 92, 290, 565, 570–72, 1021, 1023, 1094, 1156–57, 1358, 1497, 1499; couplet, 310; identical rhyme, 658; love poetry, 815, 817, 818, 819; monorhyme, 898, 1183; refrain, 1152
Gheorghe, Ion, 1206
Gherardi da Prato, Giovanni, 375
Ghil, René, 1396, 1415
Ghirandello da Firenze, 173
Ghrimetsi, Martiros, 84
Ghuṣūb, Yūsuf, 70
Giacomo, Salvatore di, 356
Giacomo da Lentini, 374, 737, 1304, 1319, 1422
Giacosa, Giuseppe, 735
Gianni, Lapo, 374
Giaour (Byron), 506
Gíbaro, El (Alonso), 201
Gibbon, John Murray, 178
Gibran, Kahlil (Khalīl Jubrān), 69–70
Gibson, Magi, 1278
Gibson, Wilfrid, 556
Gibson, William, 395, 650, 651
Gide, André, 336, 680, 1012, 1113, 1378
Gidlow, Elsa, 797
Gidō Shūshin, 243
"Gift Outright, The" (Frost), 438
Giguère, Roland, 182, 183
Gijsen, Marnix, 822
Gilabert de Pròxida, 211
Gilbert, Kevin, 100
Gilbert, Nicolas-Joseph, 1051
Gilbert, W. S., 10, 800, 913, 1004, 1184
Gilbert de Berneville, 509
Gilboa, Amir, 608, 615
Gil de Biedma, Jaime, 1341, 1342
Gildon, Charles, 1111
Giles of Rome, 854
Gilgamesh. See Epic of Gilgamesh
Gilkin, Iwan, 131
Gill, Claes, 955
Gille, Valère, 131
Gillies, Valerie, 1277
Gilmore, Mary, 101
Gimferrer, Pere, 213, 1341
Ginsberg, Allen, 23, 50, 77, 130, 144, 174, 223, 296, 373, 433, 573, 882, 940, 1050, 1145, 1492; anaphora, 50, 524; furor poeticus, 533; gay poetry, 456, 542; haiku, 594, 595; hybrid poetry, 644; inspiration, 710; line, 802; Nuyorican Poets Café, 962; parallelism, 999, 1169; poetry readings, 1018, 1069; political/protest poetry, 1081, 1122; San Francisco Renaissance, 1243
Ginzburg, Lidiya, 1239, 1241
Gioia, Dana, 315, 326, 937, 1018
Giorgi, Francesco, 600
Giorgio, Marosa di, 927
Giorno, Il (Parini), 743, 1516
Giorno, John, 940
Giotti, Virgilio, 748
Giovanni, Nikki, 482, 1306, 1440
Giovanni da Cascia, 173
Gippius, Zinaida, 338, 481, 1234, 1396
Girard, René, 679, 1174, 1433
Girart de Roussillon, 221
Girart de Vienne, 221, 222
Giraud, Albert, 131
Giraut de Bornelh, 967, 1464
"girdle" poem. See muwashshaḥ
Girk Chanaparhi (Charents), 85
Girondo, Oliverio, 80
Girri, Alberto, 81
Gītagovinda (Jayadeva), 137, 630, 688
Gitanjali (Tagore), 137, 687
Gīti Rāmāyaṇa (Durgāvara), 93
Giusti, Giuseppe, 744
Giustiniani, Leonardo, 740, 1203
Gjuzel, Bogomil, 838
Glannadour, Maodez, 165
Glas (Derrida), 316
Glass, Philip, 886
"Glass Essay, The" (Carson), 960
Glass of Government, A (Gascoigne), 1453
Glatigny, Albert, 1001
Glazner, Gary Mex, 1070
Gleim, Johann Wilhelm Ludwig, 563
Glen, Duncan, 1276
Glinka, Mikhail, 189
Glissant, Édouard, 199–200, 280, 516, 1062
glosa, 572
glossolalia, 572–73, 1543
Glover, Denis, 943
Glück, Louise, 354, 1065, 1493
glyconic, 91, 260, 573
Gnedich, Nikolai, 628, 1231
Gnedov, Vasilisk, 535
gnomic poetry, 172, 411, 574, 1437
"Go, lovely Rose" (Waller), 209, 217, 1142
Goblin Market (Rossetti), 424, 914, 1103
"God" (Derhavin), 1230
Godfrey of Bouillon, 1164
Gododdin, 1533
"God of War, The" (Brecht), 1079
Godolphin, Sidney, 217
Godoy Acayaga, Lucila. See Mistral, Gabriela
"Gods of Greece, The" (Schiller), 564
God's Trombones (Johnson), 22, 596
Goemans, Camille, 132
Goethe, J. W., 4, 46, 87, 142, 270, 345, 356, 363, 450, 512, 522, 744, 818, 909, 922, 1232, 1397, 1484; alliteration, 41; amphibrach, 45; assonance, 95; authorial intention, 465; blank verse, 148, 149; catharsis, 215; chorus, 245; classical meter, 252; classicism, 263; description, 351; divan, 371; elegy, 397; exoticism, 471, 1067; freie Rhythmen, 525; gender, 545; genius, 550, 1220; genre, 830; German poetry, 563, 564, 565; Gesellschaftslied, 570; ghazal, 571; Hellenism, 598; hendecasyllable, 617; hexamenter, 628; imagination, 667, 668, 672; imagination vs. fancy, 478; Knittelvers, 310, 861; lied, 799; lyric, 828, 830, 1368; naïve-sentimental, 911; neoclassical poetics, 932; octosyllable, 970; ode, 972; organicism, 981; performance, 1017; philosophy, 1035, 1036, 1038; primitivism, 1108, 1223; romanticism, 1210, 1219, 1220; Satanic hero, 1255; science, 1268, 1269, 1271; stichomythia, 1359; symbol vs. allegory, 1383, 1395; three poetic forms, 826; tragedy, 1450
Goethe Gesellschaft, 1017
Goffette, Guy, 133
Goga, Octavian, 1206
Gogol, Nikolai, 1221
Gogynfeirdd, 1534–35, 1537
Goldberg, Jonathan, 1060
Goldberg, Leah, 607, 608, 614
Golden Ass (Apuleius), 128
Golden Gate, The (Seth), 553, 914, 958, 1138
Golding, Arthur, 87, 504
Goldoni, Carlo, 283, 735
Goldsmith, Kenneth, 46, 286, 292, 503, 983, 1047
Goldsmith, Oliver (1728–74), 54, 140, 178, 363, 377, 471, 625
Goldsmith, Oliver (1794–1861), 178

Goldsworthy, Peter, 102
Goliardic verse, 53, 560, 574, 857, 898
Gombert, Nicolas, 173
Gómez, Ana Ilce, 948
Gomez, Jewelle, 798
Gómez Carrillo, Enrique, 587
Gómez de Avellaneda, Gertrudis, 1340, 1344
Gómez de la Serna, Ramón, 586, 1479
Gómez Rosa, Alexis, 206
Gomringer, Eugen, 294, 322, 568, 1332, 1386, 1416
Goncharova, Natalia, 111
Goncourt brothers, 680
Gondibert (Davenant), 217
Góngora, Luis de, 81–82, 122, 123, 124, 160, 230, 388, 880, 919, 927, 988, 1073, 1166, 1211; conceit, 289, 290; conceptismo, 291, 1089; letrilla, 798; mannerism, 843; neo-Gongorism, 934; pastoral, 1007, 1165; Spanish poetry, 1337, 1338, 1339
Gonne, Maud, 143, 728
Gonzaga, Tomás António, 160, 1090
Gonzales, Judy Flores, 228
Gonzales, Rodolfo, 228
González, Odi, 694
González, Rafael Jesús, 229
González, Ángel, 1342
González Echevarría, Roberto, 124
González Huguet, Carmen, 401
González Martínez, Enrique, 895, 1345
González, Otto Raúl, 588
González Prada, Manuel, 895, 1028
González Rincones, Salustiio, 1504
González Tuñón, Raúl, 80
Gonzalo Marín, Francisco, 201
Goodison, Lorna, 196, 483, 1094, 1096
Goodman, Felicitas, 573
Goodman, Paul, 379, 542, 867
"Good-morrow, The" (Donne), 29, 1294
Googe, Barnabe, 386, 415
Gooneratne, Yasmine, 1357
Goossens, Roger, 133
Gopalakrishna Patnaik, 984
Gorbachev, Georgii, 1240
Gorboduc (Sackville/Norton), 146, 432
Gordillo, Fernando, 947–48
Gordon, Adam Lindsay, 100
Gordon, Judah Leib, 606, 614
Gordon, Lyndall, 142, 143
Gorgani, Fakharradin, 860
Gorgias, 253, 254, 1114, 1193, 1508
Gor'ky, Maksim, 1236
Gormont et Isembard (epic), 221
Gorodetsky, Sergei, 5
Gorostiza, José, 881, 1135, 1347
Gorski Putnik (Rakovski), 168
Gorsky, Hedwig, 1353
Gorter, Herman, 822, 1408
Gorton, Lisa, 103
Gospel at Colonus (Brewer), 1450
Gospodinov, Georgi, 170
Gosse, Edmund, 119, 1053, 1225, 1460, 1521
Goswami, Jay, 138
Go-Toba, 1303
Gotrian, Simon, 348
"Götter Griechenlands, Die" (Schiller), 564
"Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser!" (Haschka), 104
Gottfried von Neifen, 888
Gottfried von Strassburg, 560, 820, 1055
Göttingen circle, 563
Gottsched, Johann Christoph, 563, 931–32
Götz, Johann Nikolaus, 1226
Gough, Lysius, 313
Gould, Alan, 102
Gourahari, 984
Gourmont, Remy de, 369, 513
Govardhana, 1253
Govoni, Corrado, 534, 746
Gower, John, 119, 413, 414, 431, 470, 791, 855, 970, 1274; poet laureate, 1064; rhyme royal, 1193, 1294; rich rhyme, 1199
Goya, Francisco, 991
Goytisolo, José Agustín, 1341
Gozzano, Guido, 746
Gqoba, William Wellington, 1545
Grabbe, C. D., 148
"Gräber, Die" (Creutz), 575
Grabowiecki, Sebastian, 1073
Grabowski, Antoni, 457
Gracián, Baltasar, 122, 124, 160, 212, 224, 250, 290, 1060, 1159, 1166, 1539; agudeza, 26, 586, 1339; conceptismo, 291; mannerism, 843; taste, 1412
Gradus ad Parnassum (Fux), 904
Graff, Gerald, 937
Graham, Jorie, 366
Graham, Martha, 336
Graham, W. S., 425, 1146, 1277
Grahn, Judy, 482, 797, 798
Grainger, James, 557
"Grammarian's Funeral, A" (Browning), 900 grammatical rhyme, 574–75, 640, 1186
Grammont, Maurice, 925
Gramont, Comte de, 1297
Gramsci, Antonio, 324, 325, 917, 1063
Granda, Euler, 389
Grandbois, Alain, 182, 183
Grande fala do índio guaraní, A (Romano), 163
Grands Rhétoriqueurs. See Rhétoriqueurs, Grands
Grangaud, Michelle, 516
Grant, Jeff, 993
Grass, Günter, 149, 568
"Grasshopper, The" (Lovelace), 217
Gratiant, Gilbert, 197
Grave, Elsa, 1384
"Grave, The" (Blair), 575
Gravenburg, Wirnt von, 860
Graves, Robert, 56, 365, 556, 591, 818, 901, 908, 960, 1228, 1309, 1531 graveyard poetry, 356, 575
Gravina, G. V., 932
Gray, David, 492
Gray, G. B., 611
Gray, Robert, 102, 575, 1157
Gray, Thomas, 59, 121, 140, 359, 363, 421, 450, 451, 782, 1231, 1320; elegiac stanza, 397; metonymy, 876; ode, 829, 972; sensibility, 1291, 1293; tail rhyme, 1409
Grazie, Le (Foscolo), 744
Great Dionysia (Athens), 245, 282, 335, 377, 579, 580, 581, 1054, 1446, 1458
"Great Elegy to John Donne" (Brodsky), 125
"Great Hymns" (Goethe), 525
Great Vowel Shift, 95, 1184, 1189
Greban, Arnoul, 509
"Grecian Galley, The" (Housman), 41
Greek Anthology, 48, 53, 263, 289, 307, 386, 401, 451, 575–76, 675, 899, 1001; epigram, 449, 577, 582; riddle, 1200; technopaegnion, 1417
Greek poetics. See Alexandrianism; Byzantine poetry; classical poetics Greek poetry, 576–86, 787–89, 1065; allegory, 37, 38–39; classical, 576–82; medieval (see Byzantine poetry); modern, 582–85, 916–17, 918
Green, Joseph, 1481
Greenacre, Phyllis, 1127
Greenberg, Clement, 1061
Greenberg, Uri Zvi, 607, 614, 615
Greenblatt, Stephen, 88, 939, 1060, 1063
Greenfield Hill (Dwight), 297
Greenlaw, Lavinia, 426
Greg, W. W., 1428
Gregory, Augusta, Lady, 118
Gregory of Nareg, 83
Gregory of Nazianzus, 46, 53, 172, 993
Gregory of Nyssa, 467
greguería, 586
Greiff, León de, 275
Greiffenberg, Catharina Regina von, 102–3, 124, 562
Greig, Gavin, 1275
Greimas, A. J., 1363, 1365
"Grenadiere, Die" (Heine), 1531
Grenfell, Julian, 1531
Grenier, Robert, 157–58, 328
Grenna, Eamon, 729
Grenville, Fulke, 986
Grésillon, Almuth, 1428
Gresset, Jean-Baptiste, 340, 511, 1204
Greville, Fulke, 79, 1041, 1100
Grey, George, 941
Grice, H. P., 365, 622, 867, 941, 1349, 1350
Grief and Renaissance Elegy (Pigman), 398
Grieg, Nordahl, 955
Grierson, Herbert J. C., 54, 871
Grierson, John, 372
Grieve, Christopher. See MacDiarmid, Hugh

Griffin, Bartholomew, 50
Griffin, Susan, 798
Griffiths, Ann, 1537
Griffitts, Hannah, 1482
Griggs, Sutton E., 595
Grigorian, Violet, 85
Grigoriev, Apollon, 1233
Grillparzer, Franz, 104, 139, 148
Grimald, Nicholas, 624, 1100, 1445
Grimké, Angelina Weld, 22, 596, 797, 1053, 1489
Grimm, Jacob, 356, 907
Grimm, Wilhelm, 269, 356
Grimmelshausen, Hans Jakob Christoph von, 124
Gris, Juan, 1346
Griswold, Rufus Wilmot, 1480
"Groanes from Newgate" (anon.), 398
Grochowiak, Stanisław, 1077
"Grod und Wein" (Hölderlin), 564
Grosholz, Emily, 1271
Grosz, Georg, 334
Groth, Klaus, 356
Grotius, Hugo, 599–600
Gruffudd Gryg, 1550
Gruffydd, W. J., 1538
Grufydd Phylip, 1536
Grün, Anastasius, 104
Grünbein, Durs, 568, 1269
Grundtvig, N.E.S., 345
Grundtvig, Svend, 116
Grünewald, José Lino, 950
Grünthal, Ivar, 460
Grünthal-Ridala, Villem, 460
Gruwez, Luuk, 824
Grymeston, Elizabeth, 1015
Gryphius, Andreas, 98, 122, 123, 124, 562, 575, 1166, 1297, 1320, 1321
Gualtier de Châtillon, 330
Guan Hanqing, 237
"Guanju" (Shijing poem), 239–40
Guaraní poetry, 586–87, 691–93
Guarini, Giovanni Battista, 838, 1007, 1160, 1453, 1454
Guatemala, poetry of, 587–89, 1344; indigenous, 696–97
Guattari, Félix, 882, 1099, 1128, 1333
Gu Cheng, 966
Guerau de Cabrera, 211
Guerau de Liost (pseud. of Jaume Bonfil i Mates), 212
Guérin, Maurice de, 1112
Guesa, O (Sousa Andrade), 161
Guest, Barbara, 89, 482, 940, 941
Guest, Edwin, 1260, 1352
Guevara, Antonio de, 1007–8
Guevara, Miguel de, 124
Gui de Pibras, 574
Guide to Kulchur (Pound), 56
Guidi, Alessandro, 191
Guido y Spano, Carlos, 80
Gui d'Ussel, 1461
Guilhem IX (Aquitaine), 508, 509
Guilhelmi, 1422
Guillaume d'Amiens, 1460
Guillaume de Lorris, 37, 508, 854, 855
Guillaume des Autels, 1042
Guillaume d'Orange, 221, 508
Guillén, Claudio, 44
Guillén, Jorge, 206, 1134, 1340, 1341
Guillén, Nicolás, 198, 204, 205, 206, 356, 542, 764, 1093, 1094, 1322, 1328, 1346
Guillet, Pernette du, 510
Guillory, John, 187, 188, 705, 937
Guimaraens, Alphonsus de, 161, 1156
Guinizzelli, Guido, 374, 738, 857, 964, 1304, 1319
Guirao, Ramón, 204, 764
Guiraut de Bornelh, 1462
Guiraut Riquier, 889, 967, 1464
"Guitarreros" (Paredes), 227–28
Guittone d'Arezzo, 190, 191, 735, 738, 1304, 1319, 1422
Gujarati poetry, 589–90
Gullar, Ferreira (pseud. of José Ribamar Ferreira), 163
Gullberg, Hjalmar, 1383
Gullevic, Eugène, 516
Gumilev, Nikolai, 5, 891
Gummere, F. B., 640, 681, 832
Gunasinghe, Siri, 1356
Gunderrode, Karoline, 568
Gundissalinus, Dominicus, 853, 854
Gundulić, Ivan, 125, 319–20
Gunn, Thom, 425, 618, 901, 938, 1389, 1507
Gunslinger (Dorn), 1005
Günther, Johann Christian, 562
"Guo feng" (Shijing section), 240
Guo Maoqian, 1551
Guo Moruo, 233, 279–80
Guramishvili, David, 555
Gurdas, Bhai, 1132
Guri, Haim, 608
Guro, Elena, 111, 534
Guru Granth Sāhib, 1133
gushi, 1298, 1299
guslar, 590–91
Gustafsson, Lars, 1384
Gut, Elisabetta, 158
Gutenberg, Johannes, 156, 1415, 1416, 1474, 1475, 1509
Gutiérrez, Arturo, 1506
Gutiérrez Martínez, Manuel, 895
Gutiérrez Nájera, Manuel, 202, 880, 1345
Gutt, Tom, 133
Gutzkow, Karl, 148
Guys, Constantin, 991
Gwala, Mafika Pascal, 15
Gwalchmai, 1535
Gwenallt Jones, D., 1538
Gwerder, Alexander Xaver, 1386
Gwerful Mechain, 1536
Gwernig, Youenn, 165
Gwilhom, Joakim, 164
Gwynn, R. S., 938
Gwynn Jones, T., 1538
Gyllenborg, Gustaf Fredrik, 1382
Gyöngyösi, István, 642
Gypsies (Korzeniowski), 150
Gypsy poetry. See Romani poetry
Gysin, Brion, 32, 1415
Haagiwara Sakutarō, 753
Haan, Josse de, 529
Haavikko, Paavo, 490
Habermas, Jürgen, 620, 1413
Habib, Rowley, 944
Habibe, Henry, 193
Habspurgische Ottobert, Der (epic), 103
Hacker, Marilyn, 483, 545, 553, 798, 938, 1320, 1322, 1494
Hacks, Peter, 149, 771
Haddad, Fouad, 392
Hadewych, 820
Ḥadīqat al-Ḥaqīqa (Sanā'ī), 849, 1022
Hadraawi (Maxamed Ibraahim Warsame), 1313
Haes, Frans de, 133
Hāfez Ibrāhīm, 392
Ḥāfiẓ, 138, 290, 371, 563, 815, 817, 1023, 1155, 1455
Ḥafsa bint al-Ḥajj al-Rakuniyya, 28
Haft Paykar, 1023
Hagedorn, Friedrich von, 525, 563
Hagerup, Inger, 955
Haggard, H. Rider, 55
Hahn, Oscar, 231
Hahn, Susan, 296
haibun, 592, 756, 757, 1155, 1510
haikai, 43, 293, 592–94, 650, 754, 755–56, 757, 758, 759, 818, 899; modern, 750, 751–52 haiku, Western, 91, 182, 450, 594–95, 818, 880, 1423; imagism, 675, 757, 1486; meter, 874
"Haile, sterne superne Haile, in eterne" (Dunbar), 99
Haiti, poetry of, 197–200, 355, 1452
"Hajj Malik El-Shabazz, El" (Hayden), 23
Hālā, 1253
Halas, František, 331
Halbertsma, Eeltsje, 528
Hálek, Vítězslav, 331
Haleti, Azmi-zade, 1228
Halevi, Jehudah, 353, 605, 1157, 1200, 1333 half line. See hemistich
Hälfte des Lebens (Hölderlin), 352
Half the World in Light (Herrera), 229
Hālī (Altāf Husain), 1498
Halkin, Simon, 608
Hall, Donald, 342, 1065
Hall, John, 1373
Hall, Joseph, 224, 624
Hallam, Arthur Henry, 423
Hallam, Henry, 1132
Halle, Morris, 547, 1118, 1119, 1375
Haller, Albrecht von, 525, 562, 1385–86
Hallgrímsson, Jónas, 654
Hallgrímur Pétursson, 654
Halliday, M.A.K., 495, 1370, 1371
Halliwell, James Orchard, 960
Hallucinated City (Andrade), 162
Halpern, M.-L., 1152, 1548
Halte-Hulda (Bjønstjerne), 149
Halt in the Wilderness, A (Brodsky), 1237
Hamadhānī, Badī' al-zamān al-, 1183
Hamann, Johann Georg, 794, 1210, 1368

Hämärän tanssit (Saarikoski), 490
Hamburg Dramaturgy (Lessing), 917
Hamilton, William, 1275
Hamit, Abdülhak, 1473
Hamlet (Puttenham), 289
Hamlet (Shakespeare), 42, 58, 60, 380, 382, 405, 435, 648, 664, 703, 720, 1004, 1110, 1359, 1404, 1450; line end, 88; objective correlative, 963; psychoanalytic study, 1127, 1128; punctuation, 1131; scansion, 1261; soliloquy, 896
"Hamlet and His Problems" (Eliot), 963, 1487
Hammann, Kirsten, 348
Hammer-Purgstall, Joseph, 371
Hammon, Jupiter, 1306
Hammond, James, 397
Hamoir, Irène, 132
Hamsun, Knut, 680, 955
Hamzah, Amir, 701–2
Hamzah Fansuri, 841
"Hand, The" (Zarzyski), 314
Handefull of Pleasant Delites, A (Robinson), 54
Handley, George, 437
Handlyng Synne (Mannyng), 470
Hands, Elizabeth, 1012
"Hand That Signed the Paper, The" (Thomas), 46
Hang Yong-un, 778
Hanka, Václav, 331
Hankey, Katherine, 646
Hanner, Johann David, 104
Hans, Käsu, 459
Hánshān, 1155
Hanslick, Eduard, 905
Hanson, Kristin, 251, 547–48, 1512
Hans-Sachs-Vers, 770
Hansson, Ola, 1383
Han Yu, 531, 1300
Hapipi, Rore, 942
"Happily" (Hejinian), 665
Happy Days (Beckett), 42
"Happy Warrior, The" (Read), 1532
"Happy Warrior, The" (Wordsworth), 1532
Haraway, Donna, 546, 843
Hardenberg, Friedrich von. See Novalis
Harding, Gunnar, 1384
Harduwijn, Justus de, 821
Hardy, Thomas, 42, 117, 270, 357, 405, 424, 426, 451, 531, 707, 733, 848, 1103, 1225, 1320; demotion, 344, 1198; dialect, 356, 361; didacticism, 364; English prosody, 433; heterometric stanza, 627; landscape, 783; love poetry, 455; monorhyme, 899; as Movement model, 901; nature, 922; occasional verse, 966; phalaecean, 1032; poetic knowledge, 773; sapphic, 1254; science, 1268; sexain, 1297; terza rima, 1423; triolet, 1460; war poetry, 1331, 1531; wrenched accent, 1542
Haremi Vará (Grigorian), 85
Harington, John, 449, 624, 986
Ḥarīrī, al-, 1193, 1200
Harishchandra, Bharatendu, 631
Harjo, Joy, 437, 761, 797, 798, 1108
Harlem Gallery (Tolson), 23, 913
Harlem Renaissance, 15, 16, 18, 22, 152, 195, 198, 203, 356, 542, 595–96, 760, 762, 797, 892, 1108, 1122, 1489
Harlem Shadows (McKay), 22
Harley lyrics, 431, 1184
Harley Manuscript (anthol.), 53
Harmens, Erik Jan, 825
"Harmonie du Soir" (Baudelaire), 995
Harmonium (Stevens), 1488
Harper, Frances Ellen Watkins, 20, 187, 545, 595, 1052–53
Harper, Michael S., 24, 761, 1170, 1493
Harpur, Charles, 100
Harri eta Herri (Mirande), 127
Harris, Joel Chandler, 476
Harris, Tomás, 232
Harrison, Hubert, 595
Harrison, Jane, 1153
Harrison, Martin, 102
Harrison, Tony, 359, 426, 1004, 1320, 1322
Harry, J. S., 102
Harryman, Carla, 1494
Harsdörffer, Georg Philipp, 124, 562
Hart, Kevin, 102
Hartford Wits. See Connecticut Wits
Hartleben, Otto Eric, 1226
Hartley, Marsden, 541
Hartman, Geoffrey, 1063, 1284
Hartmann, Sadakichi, 91
Hartmann von Aue, 560, 820, 860
Hartnett, Michael, 727, 729
Hart-Smith, William, 763
Hartwig, Julia, 1076–77
Harvey, Gabriel, 79, 251
Harvey, William, 1266
Harwood, Gwen, 101
Harwood, Lee, 1332
Harzreise, Der (Heine), 352
Harzreise im Winter (Goethe), 351
Haschka, Lorenz Leopold, 104
Hasenclever, Walter, 149
Haṣim, Ahmet, 1473
Haskalah, 606, 614, 1548
Hass, Robert, 592, 1065, 1243, 1457, 1493
Ḥassān ibn Thābit, 67
Hasselt, André van, 131
Hastings, Beatrice, 1331
"Hasty Pudding, The" (Barlow), 55, 297
Hauge, Olav H., 940, 956
Haugen, Paal-Helge, 956
Haugová, Mila, 1311
Haulot, Arthur, 133
Hauptmann, Gerhart, 149, 378, 771, 1447
Hausa poetry, 596–97
Hausmann, Raoul, 335
Hawaiian poetry, 1083, 1084, 1085
Hawes, Stephen, 99, 1110, 1194
Ḥāwī, Khalīl, 70
Hawk in the Rain, The (Hughes), 426
Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 38, 1223, 1510
Hay, George Campbell, 1276, 1279
Hayali, 1471
Hayashi Razan, 243
Hayden, Robert, 23, 152
Haydn, Joseph, 173
Hayes, Bruce, 547
Hayk Diutzazn (Bakratuni), 84
Hayles, N. Katherine, 271
Hayman, Robert, 178
Haynes, Lemuel, 1483
Hay Otra Voz Poems (Villanueva), 228
Hay un país en el mundo (Mir), 206
Hazlitt, William, 271, 498, 550, 667, 670, 679, 710–11, 1222, 1223, 1540
H.D. (Hilda Doolittle), 5, 50, 145, 263, 373, 450, 481, 505, 797, 887, 892, 921, 1269, 1486–87, 1488, 1510; fragment, 506; free verse, 522, 523; imagism, 674, 675, 1486; long poem, 813, 892; primitivism, 1108
Healing Fiction (Hillman), 77
Healy, Eloise Klein, 797
Heaney, Seamus, 352, 361, 386, 426, 730, 819, 912, 922, 1004, 1108, 1332, 1456; alliterative accentual meter, 873–74; sonnet, 1320, 1322
Heart of Darkness (Conrad), 465
Heart-Shape in the Dust (Hayden), 23
Heath-Stubbs, John, 1228
"Heaven" (Herbert), 386
"Heavensgate" (Okigbo), 13–14
Heavysege, Charles, 178
Hebbel, C. F., 148, 367
Hébert, Anne, 182
Hebraism, 597–601, 1041
Hebrew poetry, 14, 75, 140, 601–10, 1157, 1334; abecedarius, 1; devotional, 353; divine spirit, 709; lament, 781; love poetry, 816, 819 (see also Song of Songs); modern, 606–9, 614–15; numerology, 959; ode, 971; parallelism, 598, 602, 603, 611, 998–99, 1114, 1125, 1169; poet, 1049; prophetic, 1111; refrain, 1151; riddle, 1200; verset, 1514; war poetry, 1530. See also Judeo-Spanish poetry; penitential psalms
Hebrew prosody and poetics, 602, 610–16; modern, 613–15
Hebron, Malcolm, 98
Hecale (Callimachus), 444, 454
Hecatomphilia (Battista Alberti), 150
Hecht, Anthony, 147, 286, 354, 375–76, 433, 1003, 1004, 1297, 1493
Hecuba (Euripides), 350
Hédelin, François, 976 hedonism, 45, 209
Heere, Lucas d', 821
Heer-Ranjha (Shah), 1133
Hegel, G.W.F., 108, 387, 507, 583, 718, 911, 1066, 1215, 1377, 1378; aesthetics, 10; concrete universal, 295, 988; counterpoint, 308; on epic, 446, 447; fancy vs. imagination, 478; genre, 551; hermeneutics, Hegel, G.W.F. (continued) 621; historicism, 634–35; imagination, 671, 672, 818, 1061; intuition, 719, 720; lyric, 831, 832; philosophy, 1037; romanticism, 1061, 1210, 1213, 1221; tragedy, 1035

Heiberg, Johan Ludvig, 345
Heidegger, Martin, 87, 136, 387, 771, 1037, 1038, 1129, 1174, 1214; hermeneutics, 621–22; poetics, 1063; poiesis, 1072; religion, 1156, 1157; science, 1270; technology, 1413–14, 1416
"Heidelberg" (Hölderlin), 91
Heidelberg circle, 564–65
Heidenstam, Verner von, 1383
Heidsieck, Bernard, 1415
Heine, Heinrich, 41, 95, 139, 565, 567, 598, 1531; description, 352; freie Rhythmen, 525; ghazal, 570; hendecasyllable, 617; riddle, 1200; romanticism, 1220, 1221; synaesthesia, 1398
Heinrich der Teichner, 1353
Heinrich von Meissen. See Frauenlob
Heinrich von Morungen, 560, 888, 1408
Heinrich von ofterdingen (Novalis), 1534
Heinrich von Sax, 796
Heinrich von Veldeke, 560, 888
Heinsius, Daniel, 125, 1158
Heiserman, Arthur, 226
Heissenbüttel, Helmut, 568
Heiteres Herbarium (Waggerl), 105
Hejinian, Lyn, 270, 286, 366, 482, 665, 715, 914, 1037, 1140; Language poetry, 784, 785, 1064, 1243, 1494; lyric sequence, 835
Hekigotō, Kawahigashi, 751
Hektorović, Petar, 319
Heledd cycles, 434
Helen in Egypt (H.D.), 1486–87
Helge (Oehlenschläger), 345
Hélias, Per Jakez, 165
Helicon, 256
Heliodorus, 172
Helkavirsiä (Leino), 489
Hellaakoski, Aaro, 490
Hellas (Shelley), 245
Hellenism. See Greek poetry; Hebraism
Hellenistic poetics. See Alexandrianism; classical poetics Hellenistic poetry. See Greek poetry
Heloise, 856
Hemacandra, 1247, 1248
Hemans, Felicia, 422, 545, 1052, 1053, 1291, 1293, 1483
Hemensley, Kris, 102
hemiepes, 616
hemistich, 430, 504, 537, 616
Hémon, Robert, 165
Hen Benillion (Parry-Williams), 1536
hendecasyllable, 616–17, 735, 1032, 1254, 1304; blank verse, 148, 149, 150
Henderson, Alice C., 54
Henderson, David, 1493
Henderson, Hamish, 1275, 1276
Henderson, John M., 595
hendiadys, 617
Hendren, J.W., 139
Hendry, J.F., 1276
Henley, W.E., 119, 1225
Hennings, Emmy, 1386
Henriade, La (Voltaire), 511
Henri Christophe (Walcott), 1451
Henricus Stephanus (Henri Estienne), 46, 1042
Henríquez, Camilo, 230
Henriquez, Denis, 193
Henríquez, Enrique, 202
Henríquez, Gloriantonia, 948
Henríquez Ureña, Pedro, 200, 436
Henry V (Shakespeare), 45, 902, 1160, 1162, 1459, 1531
Henryson, Robert, 99, 476, 1194, 1274, 1281
Henz, Rudolf, 105
Hephaestion, 36–37, 58, 493, 540, 749, 878, 1260 heptameter, 617–18
heptasyllable, 190, 618
Heraclito Cristiano (Quevedo), 123
Heraclitus, 253, 255, 920
Heraldo negros, Los (Vallejo), 1029, 1346
Herasym'iuk, Vasyl, 1479
Heraud, Javier, 1029–30
Herbert, George, 61, 120, 122, 141, 311, 394, 417, 418, 544, 922, 1015, 1041; devotional poetry, 353, 1166; echo verse, 386; English prosody, 433; epigram, 449–50; epithet, 453; liturgical poetry, 812; lyric sequence, 835; metaphysical poetry, 870, 871, 1490; paronomasia, 1004; pattern poetry, 208; psalms, 599, 1124; recusatio, 1160; religious lyric, 1156; rhyme counterpoint, 1192; rhythmic figure, 1198–99; sexain, 1297; as Transcendentalist influence, 1455; visual poetry, 497, 1415, 1416, 1417, 1523
Herbert, Mary Sidney (Countess of Pembroke), 251, 270, 353, 416–17, 1294, 1409; psalter, 646, 1125, 1165
Herbert, W.N., 1278
Herbert, Zbigniew, 1077, 1080, 1150, 1532
Herbert of Cherbury, Lord, 708
"Herbert White" (Bidart), 1025
Herculano, Alexandre, 1090
Herder, J.G., 473, 563, 620, 694, 794, 866, 917, 1500–1501; dialect, 356; Hebraism, 598; imagination, 671, 672, 673; metaphor, 866, 868; myth, 909; parallelism, 998; priamel, 1107; romanticism, 1210, 1219; Sturm und Drang, 1368
Heredia, J.-M. de (1842–1905), 367, 471, 512, 1001, 1320
Heredia, José María (1803–39), 201, 1344
Heredia Maya, José, 1208
Heredities (Martinez), 229
"Heritage" (Cullen), 22
Herliany, Dorothea Rosa, 702
Hermann, Gottfried, 47, 86
Hermann und Dorothea (Goethe), 563, 628
Hermannus Alemannus, 677, 854 hermeneutics, 600, 618–23, 672, 1059, 1212 Hermes Trismegistus, 965, 1395 hermeticism, 623, 747
Hermite, Tristan l', 510
Hermogenes, 994
Hernández, Elvira, 232
Hernández, Francisco, 1448
Hernández, José, 79, 356, 540, 691, 1014, 1345
Hernández, Miguel, 934, 1341
Hernández Cruz, Victor, 1243
Hernández Franco, Tomás, 204, 205
Hernández Montecinos, Héctor, 232
Hernani (Hugo), 435, 1218, 1220
Hero and Leander (Marlowe), 416, 454, 624, 913
Herodas, 244, 883
"Hérodiade" (Mallarmé), 336, 338, 514
Herodian, 1043, 1391
Herodier, Claudia, 401
Herodotus, 244, 444, 579, 636, 637, 1011
Heroica (Claussen), 346 heroic couplet, 58–59, 145, 310, 311, 340, 396, 400, 410, 433, 623–25, 913, 1100 heroic verse, 139, 146, 625–26, 1159–60
Heroides (Ovid), 153, 287, 624, 678, 789, 817, 897
Hero of Our Time, A (Lermontov), 1220, 1221
Herrera, Fernando de, 124, 291, 1007, 1031, 1164, 1337, 1338
Herrera, Francisco, 148
Herrera, Juan Felipe, 229
Herrera y Reissig, Julio, 895, 927, 1345, 1499–1500
Herrick, Robert, 46, 89, 367, 972; carpe diem, 209; Cavalier poets, 217, 419; epigram, 450; epitaph, 451; epithalamium, 452; fourteener, 504; monometer, 898; monorhyme, 899; rhythmic figure, 1198; tercet/terza rima, 1423; visual poetry, 1417
Herrieu, Loeiz, 164
Hertzen-Freud und Seelen-Trost (Templin), 104
Herwegh, Georg, 565
Herzberg, Judith, 824
Hesiod, 35, 42, 175, 214, 253, 255, 261, 350, 1154; didactic verse, 362, 556, 581; epic, 443, 444, 446; fable, 746; furor poeticus, 532; Greek poetry, 576, 577–78, 581; imitation, 676; inspiration, 709; Muses, 901–2, 1049; periphrasis, 1021
Hesperides (Herrick), 89, 419, 450
Hess, Amira, 608

Hesse, Hermann, 1386
Hessel, Franz, 680
Hetanos Yerker (Varujan), 85
heterodyne. See homodyne and heterodyne heterogram, 626
heterometric, 626–27, 1192
heteronym, 627, 1091
Hetting, Eeltsje, 529
Hettinga, Tsjêbbe, 529
"Het Wilhelmus" (anthem), 51
Heusler, Andreas, 47, 878
Hewitt, John, 729
hexameter, 145, 578, 625, 627–29, 639, 658, 735, 796; dactyl, 333, 993; pastoral, 1005
Heym, Georg, 475, 566
Heyse, Paul, 148
Heytze, Ingmar, 825
Heywood, Jasper, 504
Heywood, John, 357, 449, 1123
Heywood, Thomas, 624
hiatus, 629
Hiawatha (Longfellow), 14, 55, 700, 1129, 1425, 1484
Hidalgo, Bartolomé, 79, 540, 1344–45, 1499 Hier ist der Wort (Weinheber), 105 hieroglyph, 629–30, 659, 668, 697
Hieroglyphica (Horapollo), 629
Hierto, José, 1341
Higgins, Dick, 1328, 1416, 1417
Higginson, Thomas W., 1351
Highland Lute, The (Fishta), 30
Ḥijāzī, Aḥmad ʿAbd al-Muʿṭi, 70
Hikmet, Nazim, 127, 1228, 1473
Hilary of Poitiers, 31, 91, 652, 789, 1184, 1289
Hildebert of Le Mans, 790
Hildebrandslied, 558, 559
Hildegard of Bingen, 544, 560, 812, 1155
Hill, Barry, 102
Hill, Geoffrey, 358, 360, 426, 1095, 1125, 1157, 1320
Hill, Richard, 209
Hillarp, Rut, 536, 1384
Hillman, James, 77, 1129
Hindi poetry, 630–32, 684, 689
Hinostroza, Rodolfo, 927, 1030 hip-hop poetics, 14, 15, 144, 326, 376, 632–33, 761; chain rhyme, 220; close rhyme, 269; interal rhyme, 714
Hippolyte, Kendel, 196
Hipponax of Ephesus, 244, 261, 454, 578, 1424
Hiršal, Josef, 332
Hirsch, E. D., Jr., 465, 622, 712, 1308, 1444
Hispano-Arabic poetry. See al-Andalus, poetry of Hisperica Famina, 726
Hissmann, Michael, 672
Histoire de ne pas rire (Mariën), 138
Histoires naturelles du Nouveau Monde (Morency), 184 historicism, 466, 471, 486, 621, 633–35, 680. See also New Historicism history and poetry, 633, 635–38; poetic license, 1057
History of Britain (Milton), 636
Hitomaro, Kakinomoto no, 844
Hittite poetry, 638–39, 681
Hix, H. L., 948
Hjelmslev, Louis, 298, 474
Hjertebogen (Schade), 347
Hjortens Flugt (Winther), 346
Hlaváček, Karel, 331
Hoax Poets, 506
Hobbes, Thomas, 281, 369, 487, 660, 663, 669, 672, 710, 865, 929, 931, 1112, 1290, 1352, 1401, 1413; fancy, 478, 666–67
Hobby, Thomas, 415–16
Hoccleve, Thomas, 414, 1011, 1194
Hocquard, Emmanuel, 516, 887
Hoddis, Jakob van, 475, 566
Hodgins, Philip, 102
Høeck, Klaus, 347
Hoffman, C. F., 1223
Hoffmann, E.T.A., 99, 1213, 1220, 1221
Hoffmann, Roald, 1271
Hoffmann von Fallersleben, August Heinrich, 565
Hofmannsthal, Hugo von, 104, 105, 149, 566, 680, 771, 1112–13; symbolism, 1395, 1397
Hofmanswaldau, Christian Hofmann von, 124, 562
Hofmo, Gunvor, 956
Hofshteyn, Dovid, 1548, 1549
Hogarth, William, 128, 681
Hogg, James, 118, 1224, 1275
Hoggart, R., 324, 326
Hohberg, Wolf Helmhard von, 103
Hohlov, Nikolai, 457
Hojas al viento (Casal), 202
Hojeda, Diego de, 1337
Højholt, Per, 347
hokku. See haiku
Holan, Vladimír, 331
Holberg, Ludvig, 340, 954, 1213
Hölderlin, Friedrich, 9, 31, 252, 352, 522, 564, 567, 621, 911, 1038, 1058, 1418; fragment, 506; freie Rhythmen, 525; heptameter, 618; inspiration, 709; ode, 972; poetic calling, 1049; prose poem, 1113; religious poetry, 1156, 1157; romanticism, 1219, 1220; tone, 1441; tragedy, 1450
Holin, Igor, 1237
Holland, Norman N., 407, 1146
Holland, Richard, 1274
Hollander, John, 113, 364, 376, 863, 1150, 1320, 1406, 1417, 1493, 1515
Holloway, John, 901
"Hollow Men, The" (Eliot), 59, 77
Hollý, Ján, 1310
Holman, Bob, 961, 962, 1070
Holmes, O. W., 491, 1484
Holocaust (Reznikoff), 707
Holocaust poetry, 615, 642, 1157, 1208, 1357, 1532, 1549
Holst, Adriaan Roland, 822
Holst, Henriëtte Roland, 822
Holstein, Ludvig, 346
Holt, Yvette, 102
Hölty, Ludwig Christoph Heinrich, 563–64
Holub, Miroslav, 331, 1270, 1271
Holy Forest, The (Blaser), 181
Holy Sonnets (Donne), 124, 307, 418, 835, 996, 1031, 1156
Holz, Arno, 525, 920
Holzer, Jenny, 286
Hom, Marlon K., 91
"Homage to Mistress Bradstreet" (Berryman), 969, 1491
"Hombre pequeñito" (Storni), 1346
Home, Archibald, 1482
Home, Henry. See Kames, Lord
"Home Burial" (Frost), 913
Homenaje a los indios americanos (Cardenal), 698
Homer, 34, 42, 56, 87, 190, 261, 448, 578; allegorizing of, 37, 38–39, 258, 1036; archetypal image, 77; asyndeton, 98; biography, 141; catalog, 214; cento, 220; classical poetics, 253, 255, 258; codex, 155; concrete universal, 720; description, 349, 350, 351, 393; diaeresis, 354; dialect, 355; ekphrasis, 349, 393; enargeia, 409; epic, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 912, 979; epithet, 360, 439, 453; equivalence, 454; exoticism, 470; formula, 502–3, 577; furor poeticus, 532; gender, 544; Greek tragedy precedents, 579; Hellenistic poets, 581; historical record, 636; hyporchema, 649; imitation, 676, 678, 679, 982; inspiration, 709; lament, 781; landscape, 782; in medias res, 707; medieval poetics, 854; Muses, 902, 1057; oral-formulaic theory, 976–77, 979, 1445; oral poetry, 1066; pastoral, 1005; pathetic fallacy, 1009; poetic knowledge, 772–73; as poet ideal, 1048–49, 1509; rewriting of, 280; rhapsode, 1175; rhyme, 1183; ring composition, 1201; simile, 864, 1307; sound effects, 1324; synaesthesia, 1398; syllepsis, 1391; touchstone lines, 1444; translations, 148, 265, 420, 504, 617, 624, 628, 1142, 1231, 1456, 1458; war poetry, 1530. See also Iliad; Odyssey
Homeric Hymns, 578, 645
Homme rapaillé, L' (Miron), 183 homodyne and heterodyne, 639
homoeoteleuton, 639–40; grammatical rhyme vs., 575 homosexuality. See gay poetry; lesbian poetry Hongo, Garrett, 92
"Honor" (Lovelace), 217
Hood, Thomas, 1004
Hooft, Pieter Corneliszoon, 125, 821
Hooker, Richard, 141

Hooper, Ellen Sturgis, 1455
Hope, A.D., 101, 625, 986
Hope of Liberty, The (Horton), 20
Hopffer Almada, José L., 19
Hopil, Claude, 511
Hopkins, G. M., 56, 90, 224, 370, 424, 433, 640, 800, 804, 1103, 1266, 1442; alliteration, 41, 42, 873; broken rhyme, 166; cacophony, 173; caudate sonnet, 216; chiasmus, 225; close rhyme, 269; consonance, 300; counterpoint, 308, 309; curtal sonnet, 553; cynghanedd, 328; devotional poetry, 35, 353, 424; diction, 359, 361; difficulty, 365; echo verse, 386; ecstatic poetry, 388; enjambment, 436; epizeuxis, 1044; inscape, 673, 708; internal rhyme, 713; masculine/feminine rhyme, 849; mechanic vs. organic form, 498; mosaic rhyme, 900; narrative poetry, 911; near rhyme, 925; octave, 969; ode, 973; paronomasia, 1004; pathetic fallacy, 1009; phonestheme, 1039; psalms, 1125; religious poetry, 1156; on rhyme, 1188, 1326; running rhythm, 1229; triolet, 1460. See also sprung rhythm
Hopkins, John, 120, 504, 646, 1015, 1125, 1165
Hopkins, Lemuel, 297, 1483
Hopkins, Sharon, 396
Hopscotch (Cortázar), 32
Horace, 9, 10, 31, 35, 44, 58, 79, 122, 189, 207, 217, 249, 304, 316, 357, 362, 363, 449, 668, 718, 883, 1042, 1161; afflatus, 13; archilochian, 79; artifact, 87; asclepiad, 90–91; asyndeton, 98; belief, 134; carpe diem, 209; choriamb, 244; classical poetics, 256, 257; classical prosody, 262; classicism, 263; description, 350; diction, 359; didactic poetry, 362; dithyramb, 371; eclogue, 386; emotional response, 402, 403, 404; encomium, 410; epic, 444, 445; epode, 454; expression, 473; furor poeticus, 532; genre, 552; glyconics, 573; gnomes, 574; hypotaxis, 650; imagery, 662; imitation, 676–77, 678, 982, 1165; ionic, 725; Latin poetry, 787, 788, 789; lyric, 826–27, 828; in medias res, 440, 707; medieval poetics, 852, 853, 1060; ode, 971–72, 973; patronage, 1011; philosophy, 1035; plain style, 1040; poetic calling, 1049; poetic license, 1057; poetic madness, 1058; poetic theory, 1046, 1047, 1352; polysyndeton, 1088; priamel, 1107; pythiambic, 1135; reader, 1145; recusatio, 1150; rhetoric, 1177; sapphic model, 1254; satire, 1256, 1257; trimeter, 1459; ut pictura poesis, 274, 349, 393, 657, 662, 680, 930, 990, 1047, 1061, 1500, 1501; vatic ideal, 1503; verse epistle, 1513
Hora cero (Cardenal), 947
"Hora de tinieblas" (Pombo), 274
Horae Canonicae (Auden), 308, 1157
Horapollo, 401, 629
Horas de amor (Cuervo), 275
"Horatian Ode" (Marvell), 971, 972
Horkheimer, Max, 518, 521, 772
Hornburg, Lupold, 861
"Horseshoe Finder, The" (Mandelstam), 1081
Horta, Maria Teresa, 1092
Horton, George Moses, 20
Horvitz, Yair, 608
Hoskins, John, 46
"Hospodine pomiluj ny," 330
Hosties noires (Senghor), 926
Hostos, Eugenio María, 201
Houdard de la Motte, Antoine, 1142
Houellebecq, Michel, 310
House of Fame, The (Chaucer), 431, 479, 970
House of Life, The (Rossetti), 424, 1320, 1321
Housman, A. E., 3, 22, 41, 209, 362, 403, 424, 848–49, 1359, 1424; epitaph, 451; meiosis, 860; recusatio, 1150
Housmann, Raoul, 1328
Hove, Chenjerai, 16
hovering accent, 640
Hovnatan, Naghash, 84
HOW(ever) (jour.), 482
Howard, Henry. See Surrey, Earl of
Howard, Richard, 898, 1389, 1493
Howden, John, 791
Howe, Daniel C., 395
Howe, Susan, 373, 483, 504, 784, 785, 835, 965, 1095
Howell, Douglass Morse, 168
Howells, William Dean, 21, 550
Howl (Ginsberg), 77, 130, 144, 296, 373, 524, 542, 802, 882, 999, 1050, 1069, 1145, 1169, 1243, 1492
"How They Brought the Good News" (Browning), 49
"How to Kill" (Douglas), 1532
"How to Write History" (Lucian), 636
Hoxha, Enver, 31
Hoyers, Anna Ovena, 562
Hrabanus Maurus, 6, 208, 676, 1193, 1417, 1524
Hristov, Boris, 169
Hristov, Kiril, 169
Hrotsvit of Gandersheim, 544, 559
Huajian ji (anthol.), 248
Huang, Yunte, 93, 1063
Huansha ji (Liang), 238
Huarochirí Manuscript, 693–94
Huarte de San Juan, Juan, 124, 709
Hubin, Christian, 133
Huchel, Peter, 567, 771
Hudibras (Butler), 446, 640, 970 hudibrastic verse, 640, 970
Hudson, Flexmore, 763
Hudson, William Henry, 62
Hueffer, Ford Madox, 675
Huelsenbeck, Richard, 112, 333, 335, 1353
Huenún, Jaime Luis, 695
Huerta, David, 882, 927
Huerta, Efraín, 881
Huéspedes secretos, Los (Cabral), 204
Huezo Mixco, Miguel, 401
Hughes, Langston, 23, 118, 144, 198, 361, 426, 826, 898, 926, 1306, 1486, 1489; blues, 151, 152, 596, 892; dozens, 376; gay poetry, 542; Harlem Renaissance, 16, 110, 228, 595, 596; jazz, 760, 761, 762, 892; repetition, 1170; serial form, 1296
Hughes, Robert, 910
Hughes, Ted, 56–57, 300, 352, 358, 1065, 1108
Hugh Primas of Orléans, 574
Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (Pound), 425, 890, 891, 1006, 1187, 1486
Hugo, Victor, 36, 41, 57, 58, 139, 174, 181, 270, 512, 513, 517, 527, 549, 600, 1066, 1142, 1504; enjambment, 435; exoticism, 471, 512; iambe, 652; as influence, 197, 945; ode, 972; pantun, 995; prose poem, 1112; rejet, 1153; rich rhyme, 1199; romanticism, 1216, 1218, 1220, 1221; trimètre, 1460; war poetry, 1531
Huidobro, Vicente, 203, 204, 230, 275, 315–16, 368, 538, 1328, 1341, 1346
Huinao, Graciela, 695
huitain, 640
Hulda (pseud. of Unnur Benediktsdóttir Bjarklind), 655
Hulme, Keri, 942, 944, 1085
Hulme, T. E., 263, 265, 403, 424, 522, 594, 675, 711, 713, 1371
Hülsenbeck, Richard, 1328
Human Document, A (Mallock), 158
Humboldt, Alexander von, 693, 696, 1344, 1432
Humboldt, Wilhelm von, 598, 1210, 1220, 1286
Hume, David, 98, 190, 403, 407, 408, 487, 545, 929, 930, 931, 932, 1211, 1293; imagination, 667, 669, 670, 672; taste, 1412, 1413
Hume, Patrick (Polwart), 493
Hummelt, Norbert, 149
Humo, Hanza, 159
humors, 464, 640–41
Humphreys, David, 297, 1320, 1483
Huna, Michael S., 1545
Huncke, Herbert, 130
Hundred Sundry Flowers, A (Gascoigne), 415
Hundred Thousand Billion Poems (Queneau), 288
Hungary, poetry of, 641–44, 874
Hunt, Leigh, 139, 170, 271, 498, 624, 1223, 1296, 1320
Hunt, Sam, 944
Hunt, W. H., 1102, 1215
Huon, Ronan, 165
Huon de Bordeaux, 221
Huonder, Gion Antoni, 1388
Hur, Arjan, 529
Hurston, Zora Neale, 595
Hurtado de Mendoza, Diego, 1337

Husayn, Tāhā, 64
Hu Shi, 232
Hushigk Hayrenyats Hayots (Alishan), 84
Husserl, Edmund, 387, 548–49, 1286, 1287, 1361
Hutcheon, Linda, 1059, 1171
Hutcheson, Francis, 930, 931, 933, 1293, 1412
Hutchinson, Lucy, 443, 717
Hutchinson, Pearse, 729
Hutchinson, Thomas, 20
Hutten, Ulrich von, 561
Huygens, Christian (scientist), 156–57
Huygens, Constantijn (poet), 125, 821, 1321
Huysmans, J.-K., 338, 1396, 1398
Huyssen, Andreas, 113
Hviezdoslav, Pavol Országh, 1311
Hwang Chini, 776
Hwang Chi-u, 779
hyangga (Korean song), 775, 1155 hybrid poetry, 644–45, 1093–94
Hyde, Robin, 943
Hymes, Dell, 57, 463, 980, 1018 hymn, 353, 645–47, 649, 652, 970, 1291, 1424; carol vs., 208; fourteener, 504
Hymn (Cædmon), 557–58
"Hymne au vent du Nord" (DesRochers), 182
"Hymnen an die Nacht" (Novalis), 564
Hymnes of Astraea (Davies), 6
"Hymn of Apollo" (Shelley), 646
"Hymn of Pan" (Shelley), 646
"Hymn on the Seasons, A" (Thomson), 646
Hymns (Callimachus), 581, 645
Hymns (Proclus), 645
Hymns of the Passion (Hallgrímur), 654
"Hymn to Apollo" (Callimachus), 1150
"Hymn to Apollo" (Keats), 646
"Hymn to Inanna" (Enheduanna), 1154
"Hymn to Intellectual Beauty" (Shelley), 422, 646, 1307
"Hymn to Liberty" (Solomos), 583
hypallage, 647
hyperbaton, 647–48, 651, 1403
hyperbole, 46, 648, 1010
Hyperion (Hölderlin), 618, 1219
Hyperion (Keats), 408, 423, 506
hypermetric, 47, 648
hypertext. See electronic poetry hypogram, 649, 1289
hypometric, 649
hyporchema, 335, 649
hypotaxis and parataxis, 287, 602, 650–61, 706 hysteron proteron, 651

iambe, 577, 578, 652, 1202
Iambes, Les (Barbier), 652
Iambes, Les (Chénier), 511, 652 iambic, 652–53; tetramenter, 1424–25, 1457; trimeter, 1459; trochaic, 1463 iambic shortening, 653
I Am Joaquin/Yo Soy Joaquín (Gonzalez), 228
Iaru, Florin, 1207
Iashvili, Paolo, 555
Ibaragi Norko, 753
Ibarbourou, Juana de, 1346, 1500
Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, 27, 28, 67–68
Ibn ʿAbdūn of Évora, 28
Ibn al-Arabī, 28, 353
Ibn al-Fāriḍ, 69, 353, 391
Ibn al-Khaṭīb, 28
Ibn al-Labbana, 28
Ibn al-Muʿtazz, 63, 68
Ibn al-Zaqqāq, 28
Ibn ʿAmmār, 28
Ibn ʿArabī, 69
Ibn Bājja, 28
Ibn Dāniyāl, 69
Ibn Darrāj al-Qasṭallī, 28
Ibn Ezra, Moses, 605, 1333
Ibn Fāris, 63
Ibn Gabirol, Solomon, 353, 605
Ibn Hamdīs, 28
Ibn Hānī. See Abū Nuwās
Ibn Ḥazm, 28, 63, 68
Ibn Khafāja, 28
Ibn Labrat, Dunash, 604
Ibn Mālik, 69
Ibn Nagrela ha-Nagrid, Samuel. See Samuel the Prince
Ibn Quzmān, 28, 69, 1333
Ibn Rashīq, 64
Ibn Rushd. See Averroës
Ibn Shaprut, Hasday, 604
Ibn Shuhayd, 28, 68, 709
Ibn Ṭabāṭabā, 62
Ibn Zamrak, 28
Ibn Zaydūn, 28, 68, 571
Ibrahim, Hāfez, 69, 392
Ibsen, Henrik, 149, 378, 380, 382, 908, 954, 1450
Ibycus, 261, 579
Iceland, poetry of, 389–90, 653–55, 1201
I Ching, 32
iconicity, 487, 655–56, 974–75, 1172, 1174, 1288, 1324 iconology, 656–57
ictus, 657–58
ʿId, Yumnā al-, 65
Idanre (Soyinka), 14
Idea boni interpretis (Dannhauer), 620
"Ideal und das Leben, Das" (Schiller), 564
Idea's Mirror (Drayton), 416, 1031 identical rhyme, 658–59, 900, 1199 ideogram, 175, 241, 287, 294, 424, 659
"Ides of March" (Cavafy), 7
Idiliy (Todorov), 168
"Idiot Boy, The" (Wordsworth), 913, 1142
Idris, Suhayt, 64
idyll, 350, 386, 659–60
Idyllen (Gessner), 1386
Idylls (Theocritus), 336, 350, 410, 452, 581, 581–82, 1006, 1054
Idylls of the King (Tennyson), 147, 423, 446, 659, 913
Ieuan Fardd (Evan Evans), 1537
"If" (Kipling), 1150
"If I Were a Pony" (Navajo), 923
"If We Must Die" (McKay), 22, 596, 1489
Igayman, Guillermo, 845
Igitur (Mallarmé), 1296
Iglesias, Amalia, 1342
Igloliorti, Philip, 722
"Ignacio de Cantabria, El" (Góngora), 230
Ignat'ev, Ivan, 535
Ignatios the Deacon, 172
Ignatow, David, 342, 887
Ihara Saikaku, 593, 756
"I-Juca Pirama" (Dias), 161, 279
Ikkyū Sōjun, 243
Ilabaca Nuñez, Paula, 232
Iliad (Homer), 34, 39, 155, 209, 214, 220, 253, 255, 336, 454, 479, 507, 544, 577, 902, 911, 912, 979, 1183; aristeii, 442; contests, 1054; ekphrasis of Achilles shield, 349, 393, 441; epic conventions, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444; formula, 503; as history, 636; imitation of, 679; inspiration, 709; lament, 781; in medias res, 707; rhapsode, 1175; ring system, 1201; scansion of, 1259; simile, 1307; syllepsis, 1391; synaesthesia, 1398, 1456, 1458; translations, 123, 148, 504, 628, 1142; translation substitutions, 1375; as war poem, 1530
Ilio, Dominador I., 1033
"I Live in Music" (Shange), 762
Iljaz, Šaban, 1208
Ilkov, Ani, 169
Illić, Vojislav, 1294
I'll Take My Stand (anthol.), 25, 936, 1490
"Ill-tempered Lover" (MacKay), 9
Illuminations (Rimbaud), 747, 902, 1112, 1517
Illyés, Gyula, 643
Ilosvay-Selymes, Péter, 641 image, 76–78, 659, 660–62
imagery, 409, 660, 661, 662–66
imagination, 135, 405, 421, 479, 663, 666–74, 678, 703, 818, 1058, 1061, 1126; fancy vs., 478, 666–67, 1214
imagism, 393, 424, 450, 556, 660, 664, 674–75, 891, 901, 1034, 1486–87
"Imagisme" (Pound), 241
Imagistes, Des (anthol.), 556, 675
Imaruittuq, Emile, 721–22
Im Hwa, 778
Imihobe nemibongo (Mqhayi), 1545 imitation, 349, 675–80, 803, 805, 928, 1171, 1173, 1291; invention vs., 725
Imitations (Lowell), 679
Immanuel of Rome, 605, 613
Immermann, Karl, 148
Immigrant Acts (Lowe), 92

Imperial, Francisco, 186
Importance of Being Earnest, The (Wilde), 11 impressionism, 680–81, 991
Inada, Lawson Fusao, 91, 761, 1532
Inal, Gülseli, 1474
"In Answer of Sir John Suckling's Verses" (Waller), 286
"In a Station of the Metro" (Pound), 229, 294, 373, 450, 506, 594, 650, 664, 675, 891, 1405, 1486, 1524
Inau (Rama II), 1431
Inber, Vera, 301
incantation, 681
"Incantation by Laughter" (Khlebnikov), 965, 1552
Inca poetry. See indigenous Americas, poetry of the Incháustegui Cabral, Héctor, 205–6
"Incident" (Cullen), 1122 incremental repetition, 118, 681–82
Incurable (Huerta), 882
In Defense of Archias (Cicero), 256
In Defense of Reading (Brower), 269
Indes, Les (Glissant), 199
indeterminacy, 33, 682; ambiguity vs., 44
India, English poetry of, 682–83, 686, 687
India, poetry of, 48, 223, 683–87; postcolonial, 1093, 1094
Indian prosody, 687–90
indigenous Americas, poetry of the, 690–701, 1344, 1346–47; ecopoetry, 437; Guaraní, 586–87; Mapuche, 845–46; tlacuilolli, 1439–40
Indonesian poetry, 701–3; Dutch, 825; Malay, 840–52
Infana raso, La (Auld), 457
Inferno (Dante), 264, 444, 445, 504, 739
Infierno musical, El (Pizarnik), 81
"Infinito, L'" (Leopardi), 745
"In Flanders Fields" (McCrae), 1226 influence, 703–5, 717–18, 1127 information, poetry as, 705–7
Ingamells, Rex, 101, 763
Ingres, Jean-August-Dominique, 991
"Inherited House" (Chin), 177
Inicials del misal, Las (Fernández), 80
Injustice to Dou E, The (Guan), 237
Inkishafi, Al- (Sayyid), 1381
Inkondlo kaZulu (Vilakazi), 1554 in medias res, 440, 707–8, 852
In Memoriam (Tennyson), 31, 225, 269, 398, 423, 424, 452, 708, 835, 996, 1010, 1139, 1268, 1424
In Memoriam James Joyce (MacDiarmid), 425
In Memoriam stanza, 31, 436, 708, 970
"In Memory of Sigmund Freud" (Auden), 398
"In Memory of W. B. Yeats" (Auden), 98, 970, 973, 1145, 1146, 1187
In Parenthesis (Jones), 425, 892
"In Praise of Limestone" (Auden), 311 inscape and instress, 673, 708–9
"Inside Us the Dead" (Wendt), 1085
"Insomnia" (Bishop), 61 inspiration, 703, 709–10; muse, 902. See also furor poeticus
Institutio oratoria. See Quintilian
Insurrección solitaria, La (Martínez), 947 intensity, 710–11 intention, 465, 500, 711–13, 1308, 1428 intentional fallacy, 142, 465, 711–12, 713, 936–37, 1062 internal rhyme, 328, 713–14, 973 interpretation, 473, 637, 714–16, 1036, 1037, 1056, 1393–94 intertextuality, 129, 299, 600, 679, 716–18, 927, 1129, 1178, 1289, 1363, 1426, 1433; allusion vs., 42
In the House of Words (Ojaide), 14
"In the Penal Colony" (Kafka), 37
"In the Spanish Cloister" (Browning), 733
"Intimations" (Wordsworth). See "Ode: Intimations of Immortality"
"Into the Dusk-Charged Air" (Ashbery), 1096
Introducción al Barroco (Díaz), 124 intuition, 718–21, 1373
Inuit poetry, 721–23, 1055
Inu Tsukuba shû (Sōkan), 593 invective, 244, 723–24
invention, 724–25, 852–53, 928–29, 1165 inverse rhyme. See reverse rhyme
Inverso, Julio, 1500
Invitación al polvo (Otero), 206
"Invitation to Miss Marianne Moore" (Bishop), 1145
Invocations and Admonitions (Chinweizu), 14
Iolo Morgannwg (Edward Williams), 1537 ionic, 9–10, 261, 725–26
Ipellie, Alootook, 722
Iphigenie auf Tauris (Goethe), 148, 149, 1359
Ippekirō, Nakatsuka, 752
Iqbāl, Muḥammad, 571, 1022, 1499
Iracema (Alencar), 279
Irāmāvatāram (Kamban), 1144
Iranian poetry. See Persian poetry
Ireland, poetry of, 726–31; bard, 120, 121; Celtic prosody, 217–19
Iriarte, Tomás de, 476, 1339
Irigaray, Luce, 483, 1098–99
Irigari, Joxe Anjel, 127
Irisawa Yasuo, 753
Iron John (Bly), 77
irony, 711, 731–33, 936, 1491
Iroquois League of Nations, 700
Irvanets, Oleksandr, 1479
Irving, Washington, 139, 1223
"Isabella" (Keats), 272–73, 969, 986, 1414
Ise Monogatari, 286
Iser, Wolfgang, 1146, 1147, 1350
Isherwood, Christopher, 378
Ishigaki Rin, 753
Ishikawa Jōzan, 243
Isidore of Seville, 138, 532, 625, 647, 676, 852, 853, 854, 1281
"Iskusstvo kak priem" (Shklovsky), 343
Isla en peso, La (Piñera), 205
Islam, Kazi Narul, 138
Isla ofendida, La (Cabral), 204
Islywn (William Thomas), 1538
Ismaelillo (Martí), 202, 1345 isochronism or isochrony, 495, 733–34
isocolon and parison, 58, 59, 734
Isocrates, 52, 580, 677
isometric, 152, 734, 801
Isou, Isidore, 798, 843, 1328
"I Speak an Illusion" (Lucero), 228
Issa, Kobayashi, 594
Issahakian, Avetik, 84
Issan Ichinei (Yishan Yining), 243
Istomin, Karion, 1229
it (Christensen), 347–48
Itaca (Wiethüchter), 154
Italia liberata dai Goti, L' (Trissino), 145, 1160
Italian futurism. See futurism
Italian prosody, 616, 617, 618, 734–37
Italian Swiss poetry, 1387
Italy, poetry of, 737–49
ithyphallic, 749
"It Is Dangerous to Read Newspapers" (Atwood), 180–81
I-to, Wen, 91
Ivanescu, Mircea, 1206–7
Ivanov, Georgy, 1234, 1238
Ivanov, Viacheslav, 974, 1288, 1395, 1396, 1397
Ivanova, Mirela, 170
Ivask, Ivar, 460
iviutiit, 722, 1055
Ivo, Ledo, 162
"I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud" (Wordsworth), 1110, 1145, 1297, 1424
Iwaszkiewicz, Jarosław, 1076
Izagirre, Koldo, 127
Izala (Solilo), 1545
Izayoi nikki, 757
Iziziba Zothukela (Msimang), 1554
Izoard, Jacques, 133
Izumi Shikibu, 757, 818

Jääpeili (Hellaakoski), 490
"Jabberwocky" (Carroll), 44, 950, 951, 1327
Jabès, Edmond, 600, 1157, 1296
Jac, F. P., 348
jácara, 587, 1205, 1338
Jaccottet, Philippe, 184, 516, 1157, 1387
Jacinto, António, 18
Jacinto Millanés, José, 201
Jackson, Alan, 1277
Jackson, Laura Riding, 710
Jackson, Louis, 944
Jackson, Major, 337

Jackson, Virginia, 835
Jacob, Max, 316, 321, 322, 891, 1113, 1378
Jacob, Violet, 1276
Jacobs, Friedrich, 53
Jacobsen, Jens Peter, 346, 680
Jacobsen, Rolf, 955, 956
Jacopo da Bologna, 173
Jacopone da Todi, 736, 737, 791, 795
Jacqmin, François, 133
Jäderlund, Ann, 1385
Jæger, Frank, 347
Jagannātha Paṇḍitarāja, 1248, 1249
Jahn, J., 192
Jahr der Seele, Das (George), 8
Jain texts, 589–90, 1144, 1409–10
Jakobson, Roman, 90, 108, 112, 298, 343, 455, 472, 534, 547, 572, 573, 602, 664, 915, 1039, 1170; information theory, 706; linguistics, 803–8, 1265, 1266, 1363, 1371; metaphor/metonymy, 867, 868, 877, 1178; meter, 872; modernism, 889; numerology, 958; performance, 1016; poetic function, 1046, 1056, 1364; Russian formalism, 1239, 1241, 1283, 1361, 1362; semiotics, 1283, 1286, 1288, 1426, 1432; sound, 1326, 1391; structuralism, 1361, 1362, 1363, 1366–67; stylistics, 1371; syntax, 1404, 1405; on translation, 1457; trope, 876
Jamaican poetry, 14, 21, 194, 196, 356, 483, 1018, 1093, 1094
Jameel Bothaaina, 391
James I (King of England), 99, 417, 1275, 1465
James I (King of Scotland), 1193, 1274, 1281
James VI (King of Scotland). See James I (King of England)
James, Clive, 1406
James, Henry, 225, 1044
James, William, 99, 406, 669, 1037, 1488
Jameson, Fredric, 113, 135, 635, 715, 1081, 1095, 1405, 1494
Jamie, Kathleen, 426, 1277
Jamieson, Robert, 960
Jamil Buthayna, 67
Jamin, Maï, 165
Jan I (Duke of Brabant), 820
Janco, Marcel, 112, 333, 334, 335
Jandl, Ernst, 106, 568, 887, 1328
Janequin, Clément, 173
Janevski, Slavko, 837, 838
Jangbu (pseud. of Dorje Tsering), 1435, 1436
Janicíus (pseud. of Klemens Janicki), 1073
Jankowski, Jerzy, 535
Jansen, Tjitske, 825
Japan, modern poetry of, 750–54, 756, 1067
Japan, poetry of, 754–56. See also Chinese poetry in Japan; Man'yōshū; Nō; waka
Japanese American poetry. See Asian American poetry
Japanese linked verse. See renga
Japanese poetic diaries, 756–57, 1050, 1168, 1528
Japanese poetics, 757–60
Japicx, Gysbert, 528
Jara, Efraín, 389
Jaramillo, Carlos E., 389
Jaramillo Escobar, Jaime, 276
Jardín des Tropiques, Le (Thaly), 197
Jarem, Ali al-, 392
Jarīr, 67
Jarman, Mark, 914
Jarrell, Randall, 95, 531, 960, 1490, 1532
Jarry, Alfred, 1271
Jasieński, Bruno, 1076
Jasnorzewska-Pawlikowska, Maria, 1076
Jastrow, Joseph, 663
Jataka tales, 684
Jaufré, 859, 957, 967
Jaufré Rudel, 508, 1464, 1465
Jauss, H. R., 554, 1146, 1147
Java, poetry of. See Indonesian poetry
Jawdat, Saleh, 392
Jayadeva, 137, 630
Jāyasī, 630
Jayat, Sandra, 1208
Jay-Z, 632
jazz poetry, 15, 23, 24, 130, 144, 152, 356, 373, 760–62, 892, 1489, 1493
Jean de Meun, 37, 413, 508, 545, 854, 855, 1115
Jean-Paul, 478
Jedidiah, Nathan, 605
Jeffers, Honoree Fannonne, 152
Jeffers, Robinson, 42, 437, 533
Jefferson, Thomas, 20, 26, 1223, 1260
Jefimija, 1294
Jena circle, 345, 506, 564, 733 je ne sais quois, 762–63, 929, 1105, 1412
Jenkinson, Biddy, 729
Jenko, Simon, 1312
Jenness, Diamond, 721
Jennings, Elizabeth, 425, 901
Jennings, Kate, 102
Jensen, Johannes V., 346
Jensma, Wopko Pieter, 15
Jentzsch, Bernd, 567
Jenyns, Soame, 336
Jerome, 645, 720, 856, 1131
Jerusalem (Blake), 1156, 1220
Jerusalem Delivered (Tasso). See Gerusalemme liberata
Jespersen, Otto, 974, 1040, 1135, 1153, 1260, 1352
"Jeune captive, La" (Chénier), 511–12
Jeune Parque, La (Valéry), 82, 892
Jewish poetry. See Hebrew poetry; Judeo-Spanish poetry; Yiddish poetry
Jew of Malta, The (Marlowe), 417
Jeyapalan, 1356, 1357
Jiang Yang, 530
Jian'ian qi zi, 1550
Jia Yi, 246, 530
Ji Junxiang, 283
Jim, Rex Lee, 923
Jimenes, Moreno, 203
Jiménes González, Nicolás, 1208
Jiménez, Juan Ramón, 275, 623, 835, 895, 1113, 1134, 1340, 1341
Jiménez, Reynaldo, 927
Jindyworobak, 101, 763
Jing Cuo, 246
jingle, 4, 129, 763
Jin Shengtang, 237
Jirasinghe, Ramya Chamalie, 1357
jitanjáfora, 763–64, 1135, 1149, 1328
Ji Xian, 233
Joans, Ted, 131, 1379
Joaquin, Nick, 1033
Job le pauvre (Boschère), 132
Jochumsson, Matthías, 654
Jodelle, Étienne, 510, 1042, 1423, 1449, 1518
Joe, Roberta, 923
Johannesen, Georg, 956
Johannes Stobaeus, 53
"John Col" (Alexander), 761
"John Henry" (ballad), 117, 151
John of Damascus, 171
John of Garland, 444, 678–79, 791, 853, 1281; rota virgiliana, 1226–27
John of the Cross, 353, 388, 1156, 1337
Johns, Jasper, 38
Johnson, Barbara, 1063, 1128, 1170
Johnson, Bengt Emil, 1384
Johnson, Fenton, 21
Johnson, Georgia Douglas, 22, 1489
Johnson, Helene, 22, 481
Johnson, James Weldon, 22, 361, 595–96, 926, 1351, 1489
Johnson, Lemuel, 15
Johnson, Linton Kwesi, 14, 196, 356, 426, 1018
Johnson, Lionel, 553, 1194
Johnson, Louis, 944
Johnson, Mark, 272, 1129
Johnson, Pauline, 178, 1053
Johnson, Robert, 152
Johnson, Ronald, 543, 914
Johnson, Samuel, 295, 351, 356, 397, 405, 420, 446, 772, 1080, 1153, 1210–11, 1352; anticlimax, 57; appreciation, 62; artifice, 90, 634; ballad, 114; belief, 135; biography, 141; conceit, 290; convention, 303; didactic poetry, 363; discordia concors, 369, 1211; doggerel parody, 373; English prosody, 433, 434, 1260; epitaphs, 451; feigning, 479; heroic couplet, 625; imagination, 670; imitation, 928, 1060; irony, 732; lyric, 829–30; metaphor, 865; metaphysical poets, 290, 828, 871, 1210–11; neoclassicism, 929, 930, 931; ode, 972; Ossian fraud, 1105; pastoral, 1007; pathetic fallacy, 1009; reader, 1146; representative meter, 1171; romantic tenets, 1210, 1211; science, 1267; tenor and vehicle, 1421; tragicomedy, 1454; unities, 1496
Johnston, Andrew, 944

Johnston, Dafydd, 1536
Jojants Tun (epic cycle), 84
Jolly Beggar, The (Burns), 1275
Jolobe, J.J.R., 1545
"Jonah's Prayer" (Babits), 643
Jonas, Stephen, 542
Jones, Bobi (R.M. Jones), 1538
Jones, Daniel, 1111
Jones, David, 425, 812, 813, 892
Jones, Dic, 1538
Jones, Ebenezer, 1348
Jones, Einir, 1538
Jones, Ernest, 1127
Jones, Glyn, 1536
Jones, Henry, 1267
Jones, Hettie, 130
Jones, Inigo, 850
Jones, Lawrence, 1056
Jones, Le Roi. See Baraka, Amiri
Jones, Philippe, 133
Jones, Rhodessa, 1450
Jones, Sir William ("Oriental"), 471, 831
jongleur, 223, 764, 889, 967, 1017, 1465; vida, 1519
Jongleur de Notre Dame, 302
Jonker, Ingrid, 1330
Jonson, Ben, 224, 285, 289, 324, 432, 453, 464, 549, 1162; acrostic, 6, 799; Cavalier poets, 217, 419, 871; comedy, 284, 417, 640–41; country house poem, 309, 394, 418, 782; dramatic verse, 377; English poetry, 417–18, 419; English prosody, 433; epideictic epigram, 449; epitaph, 451; epithalamium, 452; feigning, 479; heroic couplet, 624; imitation, 668, 679, 928, 1162; In Memoriam stanza, 708; lyric sequence, 835; masque, 335–36, 417–18, 850; neoclassical poetics, 928, 931, 1166; obscurity, 965; palindrome, 993; patronage, 1011–12; plain style, 1041; poet laureate, 1064; punctuation, 1131; split lines, 1351; tetrameter, 970; trimeter, 1459; unities, 1160; verse and prose, 1511; verse epistle, 1513; works, 156, 1541
Jónsson, Hjálmar, 654
Jonynas, Antanas, 811
Jooris, Roland, 824
Joos, Kurt, 336
Jordan, June, 24, 482, 1306, 1493
Jordi de Sant Jordi, Mossén, 211, 1336
Jorge de Aguiar, 1088
Jørgensen, Johannes, 346
Jorn, Asger, 132
Jósef, Attila, 50
Joseph the Hymnographer, 171
Josephus, 976
Josh (Shabbir Hasan Khān), 1499
Joshi, Suresh, 590
Joshi, Umāshankar, 590
Josquin des Prez, 302, 510, 904
Joubert, Joseph, 668
Joubiouz, Yann Vari, 162
Jouet, Jacques, 987, 987–88
Jourdain, Pierre-Albert, 516
Jourdain de Blaye, 221
Journal d'un animal marin (Depestre), 198
Journal of English Days, A (Wright), 175
Journals of Susanna Moodie, The (Atwood), 180, 1095
"Journey of the Magi" (Eliot), 360, 1088
Jovellanos, Gaspar Melchor de, 1340
Joyce, James, 1, 56, 76, 108, 111, 118, 162, 384, 425, 439, 447, 670, 729, 950, 959, 1059, 1243, 1418, 1487; écriture, 387; envelope, 436; exegisis, 469; hexameter, 629; imagism, 675; imitation, 679; incremental repetition, 681; irony, 732; myth, 909; paronomasia, 1004; poetry recording, 1415; prose rhythm, 1114, 1512; sound play, 1328; villanelle, 1521–22
Joyce, Trevor, 729
József, Attila, 643
Juárez Toledo, Enrique, 588
Juaristi, Felipe, 127
Jubrān, Khalīl. See Gibran, Kahlil
Judeo-Spanish poetry, 604–5, 614, 764–66, 1200
Judita (Marulić), 319
Juhász, Gyula, 643
Juives, Les (Garnier), 511
Ju Kälzang, 1435
Julian, Madhav, 846
Julius Caesar (Shakespeare), 61, 647, 732, 734, 1531
Jung, C.G., 343, 405, 673, 700, 1058, 1108, 1123, 1126; archetype, 76–77, 1128–29
Jungfrau von Orleans, Die (Schiller), 148, 149
Jungmann, Josef, 331
Junoy, Josep-María, 213, 535
Junqueiro, Guerra, 1091
Jurjāni, Ābd al-Qāhir al-, 64, 68
Juškevičius, A., 810
Justice, Donald, 367, 938, 995, 1389, 1390
Justo tiempo humano, El (Padilla), 205
Juul, Pia, 348
Juvenal, 123, 362, 470, 1150, 1166; satire, 1255, 1256, 1257
Juvencus, 789, 791
Juvenilia (Mjeda), 30
Juvonen, Helvi, 490

Kaalep, Ain, 460
"Ka 'Ba" (Baraka), 1265
Kabbalah, 600, 605, 607
Kabeš, Petr, 332
Kaʿb ibn Zuhayr, 67, 69, 353
Kabīr, 631, 1155
Kabtiilani Marduk, 95
kabuki, 283
Kac, Eduardo, 716, 1271
Kadare, Ismail, 31
Kadhani, Mudereri, 16
Kadokawa Haruki, 752
Kafka, Franz, 32, 37, 81, 111, 364, 536, 1113, 1276
Kagerō nikki, 756–57
Kahan, Jacob, 614
Kahi Kavita (Mardhekar), 847
Kahn, Gustave, 1396, 1517
Kaifūsō (anthol.), 243
Kailas, Uuno, 490
Kajetan, Tomasz, 1073–74
Kajokas, Donaldas, 811
Kalahele, Imaikalani, 1085
Kalayanapongse, Angkarn, 1431
Kale, Arun, 847
Kaléko, Mascha, 568
Kalevala (Lönnrot), 389, 460, 488, 979, 1154, 1220, 1484; parallelism, 997, 998, 999
Kalevala meter, 488
Kalevipoeg (Kreutzwald), 460
Kālidāsa, 290, 688, 781, 817, 839, 1144, 1244, 1246, 1252, 1253, 1355
Kalinin, Valdemar, 1208
Kallikles, Nicholas, 172
Kalloc'h, Yann-Ber, 164
Kalniņš, Imants, 794
Kalocsay, Kálmán, 457
Kalokyris, Dimitris, 585
Kaltneker, Hans, 105
Kalvos, Andreas, 583
Kamban, 1144
Kambara Ariake, 753
Kamen' (Mandelstam), 1236
Kameni spavač (Dizdar), 159
Kamensky, Vaily, 534
Kamenszain, Tamara, 81
Kames, Lord (Henry Home), 670, 931, 1413
"Kami Anak Zaman Ini" (Masuri), 841
Kamov, Janko Polić, 320
Kamparāmdāyan (epic), 1410
Kanakadāsa, 767
Kanaka Maoli, 1083
Kan Chazan, 243
Kandalī, Rudra, 93
Kandalī, Mādhava, 93
Kane, Amadu Elimane, 17
"Kangaroo, The" (Field), 100
Kangro, Bernard, 460
Kannada poetry, 689, 767
Kanshi, 242, 756
Kant, Immanuel, 10, 11, 109, 135, 282, 403, 606, 911, 1037, 1205, 1216, 1292, 1352, 1454; aesthetics, 465, 501, 520, 634, 1061; autonomy, 106–7, 108, 1061; fancy vs. imagination, 478; gender, 545; genius, 550; hermeneutics, 621; imagination, 667, 669, 670, 672, 673, 818, 1061; intuition, 719–20; organicism, 981; romanticism, 1210, 1211–12, 1213, 1214, 1219, 1220; sublime, 545, 922, 1373, 1374; taste, 1412
Kānt, Kavi, 590
Kantacami, 1356
Kanteletar, 1154
Kantemir, Antiokh, 149, 1229–30
Kanze Motomasa, 949
Kaplan, Cora, 1053
Kaplinski, Jaan, 460, 461
Kapsalis, Dionysis, 585

Kaputikian, Silva, 85
Karadžić, Vuk S., 1294
Kāraikkāl Ammaiyār, 354, 1410
Karakoç, Sezai, 1474
Karamzin, Nikolai, 90, 1231
Karandikar, Vindar, 687
Kareva, Doris, 460
Karlfelds, Erik Axel, 1383
Karlsson, Kristján, 655
Karluk-Karakhanid poetry, 1467
Karni, Yehuda, 607
Károli, Gáspár, 641
Karouzos, Nikos, 585
Karpinska, Aya, 395
Karsch, Anna Luise, 563
"Karun" (Beshigtashlian), 84
Karyotakis, Kostas, 584
Kashmiri poetry, 620, 768, 1245–48
Kasprowicz, Jan, 1075
Kassák, Lajos, 643
Kassia, 172
Kaštelan, Jure, 320
Kästenr, Erich, 567
Kathasaritsagara (Somadeva), 684
Käthchen von Heilbronn, Das (Kleist), 148
Katipa, Kamar (Raphael Patkanian), 84
Katzenleben (Kirsch), 568
Katzizne, Alter, 1548
Kaufman, Bob, 131
Kaupers, Renārs, 795
Kauraka, Kauraka, 1085
Kavanagh, Patrick, 729
Kavirāja, Kṛṣnadāsa, 137, 1310
Kavirājamārga, 767
Kavsilumina, 1355
kāvya, 290, 685, 687, 1250–51, 1254
Kāvyādarśa (Daṇḍin), 1244, 1245, 1355, 1437
Kāvyālaṃkāra (Bhāmaha), 27, 1244
Kāvyaprakāśa (Mammaṭa), 1246–47
Kawai Suimei, 752, 753
Kawaji Ryūkō, 752, 753
Kawana, Phil, 942
Kay, Jackie, 483, 1277
Kayper-Mensah, A. W., 14–15
Kazakh poetry. See Turkic poetry
Kazantzakis, Nikos, 584
Kazinczy, Ferenc, 642
Keating, Geoffrey, 219
Keats, John, 22, 117, 142, 265, 271, 357, 384, 398, 423, 728, 1103, 1293; artifact, 87, 89; dialect rhyme, 1189; emotion, 406; empathy, 408; English prosody, 433; enjambment, 436; envelope, 436; fragments, 504; heroic couplet, 624; hymn, 646; imagery, 663; imagination, 478, 667, 670, 671, 1222; intensity, 711; love poetry, 818; metonymy, 876; myth, 908; nature of poem, 1047; negative capability, 925–26, 1059, 1104, 1214, 1492; octave, 969; ode, 423, 971, 972–73; originality, 703; ottava rima, 986; oxymoron, 988; pathetic fallacy, 1009; poetic calling, 1049; publication demand, 1012; rhythmic figure, 1199; romanticism, 1214, 1222, 1223, 1224; Shelley elegy for, 397, 423; sonnet, 1320; sound, 1325; Spenserian stanza, 913, 1350, 1358; syntax, 1404; technology, 1414; on translation, 1456, 1458; triplet, 1461; wrenched accent, 1542
Kebbede Mikaél, 462
Keble, J., 473
Keene, John, 337
keening, 727
Kefala, Antigone, 102
Keineg, Paol, 165
Keller, Gottfried, 566, 1139, 1386
Kellgren, Johan Henrik, 149, 1382
Kelly, Robert, 342, 645
Kelmscott Press, 157, 1103
Kemal, Namik, 1472–73
Kemal, Yahya, 1473
Kemala (Ahmad Kamal Abdullah), 841
Kemp, Jan, 944
Kenarov, Dimiter, 170
Kendall, Henry, 100
Kennedy, Adrienne, 380
Kennedy, Bill, 292
Kennedy, Walter, 493
Kennelly, Brendan, 729
Kenner, H., 674
kenning, 390, 411, 768–69, 953
Kenyon Review (jour.), 936
Kepler, Johannes, 1266
Kermode, F., 1444
Kerouac, Jack, 130–31, 144, 152, 373, 523, 595, 1492
Kerrigan, William, 906
Keshavsut (pseud. of Krishnaji Keshav Damle), 846, 847
Kets, John, 272–73
"Kew Gardens" (Jones), 1267
"Kew Gardens" (Ritson), 1267
Key, Francis Scott, 1483
Keynes, Geoffrey, 1131
Keyser, S. J., 547, 1375
Kezilahabi, Euphrase, 1381
Kgositsile, Keroapetse, 15, 1331
Khalīl, Yūsuf al-, 70, 72, 73
Khalīl ibn Aḥmad, al-, 68, 1183
Khāqānī, 1024
Kharitonov, Evgenii, 1237
kharja, 27, 29, 68–69, 604, 613, 769–70, 858, 1152, 1183, 1333
Kharms, Daniil, 1236, 1237
Khayyām, ʿUmar, 362, 973, 1022, 1067, 1228
Khlebnikov, Velimir, 111, 112, 166, 334, 343, 993, 1056, 1238, 1239, 1287; futurism, 534, 1235; glossolalia, 573; obscurity, 965; prose poem, 1113; radiophonic medium, 1414; zaum', 890, 1327, 1328, 1415, 1551, 1552
Khmer poetry. See Cambodia, poetry of Khodasevich, Vladislav, 150, 1238, 1241
Khomiakov, Aleksei, 1232
Khumalo, Z.I.M., 1554
Khusraw, Amīr, 1023
Khusraw, Nāṣir, 1023
Khusraw va Shīrin, 1023
Khvostenko, Aleksei, 1237
Kibirov, Timur, 1238
Kidna, Sten, 165
Kiefer, Anselm, 38
Kierkegaard, Søren, 282, 732, 996, 1213
Kierlighed uden Strømper (Wessel), 954
Kiestra, D. H., 528
Kifle-Yohannis, 462
Kigay, Friedrich, 562
Kiianovs'ka, Marianna, 1479
Kijō, Murakami, 751
Kilich, Kyrgzy Moldo, 1467
Killigrew, Thomas, 270
Kim, Myung Mi, 92–93
Kim, Willyce, 798
Kim Chi Ha, 779
Kim Hyesoon, 779
Kim ŏk, 777
Kim Sowŏl, 777–78
Kim Su-yŏng, 778, 779
Kinaston, Francis, 1194 kind, 770
Kindergarten (Boti), 202
King, B. B., 152
King, Edward, 419, 966, 1443
King, Henry, 369, 398
King, Jane, 196
"Kingis Quair, The" (James I of Scotland), 1193, 1274, 1281
King James Bible, 156, 598, 599, 1275
King John (Shakespeare), 146, 438
King Lear (Shakespeare), 42, 138, 406, 417, 861, 1044, 1180, 1450
Kingo, Thomas, 340
"King of Thule, The" (Goethe), 564
Kingsley, Charles, 252, 1009
Kinloch, David, 1278
Kinnell, Galway, 77, 342, 1492, 1532
Ki no Tsurayuki, 758, 774
Kinsella, John, 102, 160
Kinsella, Thomas, 729
Kiparsky, Paul, 547–48, 806, 807, 808, 1056, 1117, 1512
Kipling, Rudyard, 55, 424, 433, 913, 1331; recitation poems, 1150; war poems, 451, 1531
Kippenberg, Anton, 1265
Kiprian, 168
Kirāṭārjunīya (Bhāravi), 1253
Kircher, Athanasius, 122
Kirchhofs Gedanken (Gryphius), 575
Kirsch, Rainer, 567
Kirsch, Sarah, 438, 567, 568
Kisakürek, Necip Fazil, 1474
Kiskaddon, Bruce, 313
Kiss, József, 642
Kitāb al-Badī (Ibn al-Muʿtazz), 62, 68
Kitāb alṣinā atayn (ʿAskarī, ed.), 64
Kivi, Aleksis (pseud. of Alexis Stenvall), 489
Kivisildnik, Sven, 460
Kiyoko, Fujiki, 752
Kiyooka, Roy, 92, 180

Kizer, Carolyn, 482, 995
Klaj, Johann, 562
Klaonica, Poems from Bosnia (Silkin), 1532
Klein, A.M., 179
Klein, Melanie, 1128
Kleisheim, Anton von, 104
Kleist, Heinrich von, 148, 149, 378, 1213, 1450
Klemens, Janicki. See Janicíus
Klepfisz, Irena, 482, 798
Kliment, 167
Kline, Franz, 32
Kling, Thomas, 568, 1269
Klinger, F.M., 1368
Kliuev, Nikolai, 1236
Kloos, Willem, 822, 1408
Kloosterman, Simke, 528
Klopstock, F.G., 31, 91, 104, 345, 563, 564, 565, 628, 953; choriamb, 244; classical meter, 250, 252; freie Rhythmen, 525; ode, 972, 1368; sapphic, 1254
Knaben Wunderhorn, Des (Arnim/Brentano, ed.), 118, 564–65
Knapp, Steven, 295, 713
Kneale, J. Douglas, 1121
Kniaźnin, Franciszek Dionizy, 1074
Knibbs, Henry Herbert, 313
Knight, Etheridge, 24
Knight, W.F.J., 639
"Knight's Tale, The" (Chaucer), 432, 1026, 1227, 1530–31
Knipscheer, Jos, 192
Knittelvers, 310, 345, 373, 561, 770–71, 861, 954
Knoebel, David, 395
Knopfli, Rui, 18
Knorr, Josephine von, 104
Knott, Bill, 1322 knowledge, poetry as, 771–73, 1266
Knowles, Alison, 843
Knox's bridge, 165, 166
Knudsen, Erik, 347
Kobzar (Shevchenko), 1478
Kocbek, Edvard, 1312
Koch, Kenneth, 940, 986, 1492
Kochanowski, Jan, 150, 1062, 1073
Kochowski, Wespazjan, 1073, 1074
Kocmánek, Václav František, 330
Kodak-Ensueño (Boti), 203
Koehler, Krzysztof, 1077
Koenders, Julius, 192
Kogawa, Joy, 483
Koidula, Lydia, 460
Kojiki (8th-c.), 1115, 1155, 1167
Kokan Shiren, 243
Kokinshū (anthol.), 755, 758, 773–74, 1303, 1528
Kokoschka, Oskar, 105
Kolatkar, Arun, 687
Kolbe, Uwe, 568
Kölcsey, Ferenc, 642
Kolk, Raimond, 460
Kollár, Jan, 331, 1310–11
Kolleritsch, Alfred, 106
Kolmar, Gertrud, 568, 1053
Kolmogorov, Andrej, 1363
Kolross, Johann, 251
Komenský, Jan Amos (Comenius), 123, 125, 330
Komunyakaa, Yusef, 24, 152, 761, 1532
Koneski, Blaže, 837, 838
Kong Sverre (Bjørnson), 149, 955
"König in Thule, Der" (Goethe), 564
Konnula, Margus, 461
Konopnicka, Maria, 1075
Konstantine (Cyril) the Philosopher, 167
Kooser, Ted, 1065
Kootenay school, 179–80, 774–75, 1439
Kopland, Rutger, 824
Korea, poetry of, 9, 286, 775–79
Korean American poetry. See Asian American poetry
Kornaros, Vitsentzos, 582–83
Körner, Theodor, 565
Kortum, Karl Arnold, 771
Korzeniowski, Jozef, 150
Koskenniemi, V.A., 490
Kosmas of Maiouma, 171
Kostenechki, Konstantin, 168
Kostenko, Lina, 1479
Kostomarov, Mykola, 1478
Kosztolányi, Dezső, 643
Kothayer Azza, 391
Kotliarevs'ky, Ivan, 1477–78
Ko Un, 779
Kouwenaar, Gerrit, 823, 824
Kovács, András Ferenc, 643
Kovner, Abba, 608
Kowhai Gold (Pope, ed.), 942–43
Koy, Sarun, 177
Kozain, Rustum, 1331
Kozer, José, 205, 927, 1347
Koźmian, Kajetan, 1074
Krag, Vilhelm, 955
Král, Janko, 1311
Kralik, Richard von, 104
Krämer, Hans, 622
Kramer, Theodor, 105
Kramsu, Kaarlo, 489
Krasicki, Ignacy, 1073
Krasiński, Zygmunt, 1075
Krasko, Ivan, 1311
Kraus, Karl, 504, 771
Kredhel, Ursula, 482
Kreutzwald, F.R., 460
Krige, Uys, 1329–30
Kriser och kransar (Sjöberg), 1383
Krishnadevarāya, 1419
Kristensen, Tom, 346
Kristeva, Julia, 44, 299, 387, 405, 483, 679, 872, 1063, 1098, 1128; intertextuality, 716–17, 718; semiotics, 1289; sound, 1323–24; structure, 1365, 1367; Tel Quel, 1418; text, 1425, 1426
Kristóf, Ágota, 1387
Kriwer, Ferdinand, 1476
Krleža, Miroslav, 320
Kroeher, Karl, 437
Kroetsch, Robert, 181
Krog, Antjie, 1330
Król-Duch (Słowacki), 1075
Krolow, Karl, 568
Kross, Jaan, 460
Krpo of Mush, 84
Kruchenykh, Aleksei, 111, 112, 534, 890, 1327–28, 1415, 1552
Krull, Hasso, 461
Krustev, Krustyu, 168
Krylov, Ivan Andreyevich, 476, 477, 1231, 1233
Krynicki, Ryszard, 1077
Krysinska, Marie, 1517
Krysolov (Tsvetaeva), 1235
"Kubla Khan" (Coleridge), 1, 82, 422, 504, 506, 709, 1058, 1222, 1223
Kuchak, Nahapet, 84
Kugler, Paul, 1129
Kuhlmann, Quirinus, 123, 124
Kuhn, Adalbert, 907
Kuhn, Thomas, 1266, 1392
Kuiper, Elmar, 529
Kulavkova, Katica, 838
Kulbak, Moshe, 1549
Kulenović, Skender, 159
Kulish, Panteleimon, 1478
Kumaranatunge, Munidasa, 1356
Kumārasambhava (Kālidāsa), 781
Kumayt ibn Zayd, al-, 67
Kumin, Maxine, 1065
Kumulipo, 1084
Kunchev, Nikolai, 169
Kunene, Daniel P., 15
Kunene, Mazisi, 15, 1331
Kunert, Günter, 438, 567
Kunio, Tsukamoto, 751
Kunitz, Stanley, 1065
Kunjahi, 1133
Kunst-Ding, 367
Kunstgeschichtliche Grundbegriffe (Wölfflin), 121
Kunze, Reiner, 567
Kuppner, Frank, 1278
Kuroda Saburō, 754
Kurunmi (Rotimi), 1451
Kurvava pesen (Slaveikov), 168
Kusatao, Nakamura, 752
Kuthayyir ʿAzza, 67
Kutzo Shel Yod (Gordon), 606
Kuvempu (pseud. of K.V. Puṭṭappa), 767
Kuzmin, Mikhail, 542, 1235, 1363
Kvitko, Leib, 1549
Kwantagora, Salihu, 597
Kweli, Talib, 220
Kyabchen Dedröl, 1435, 1436
Kyd, Thomas, 270, 286, 1351
Kyger, Joanne, 130, 131, 1243
Kyoshi, Takahama, 751, 752
Kyōtai, Katō, 594
Kyūsei, 1167

Laaban, Ilmar, 460
Labakī, Ṣalāḥ, 70
Laban, Rudolf, 336
Labé, Louise, 510, 834, 1031, 1050, 1052, 1319
Laberinto de Fortuna (Mena), 1335
Laberius, Decimus, 883
Laboa, Mikel, 127

La Bruyère, Jean de, 224, 928, 1141
Labyrinths (Okigbo), 14
Labyrinths of the Delta (Ojaide), 14
"Lac, Le" (Lamartine), 61, 902
Lacan, Jacques, 44, 122, 124, 405, 483, 508, 635, 682, 718, 784, 938, 1139, 1418; metaphor vs. metonymy, 877; psychoanalysis, 1098, 1128, 1129; signifier, 1174
La Ceppède, Jean de, 124, 511, 835, 871, 1015, 1321
"Lachrimae" (Dowland), 1315
Laclau, Ernesto, 210
Lacoue-Labarthe, Philippe, 733
La Cour, Paul, 346–47
Lactantius, 789, 1193
Ladera Este (Paz), 881
Ladino poetry. See Judeo-Spanish poetry
Ladrón de Guevara, Francisco Vélez, 274
Lady Audley's Secret (Braddon), 10
Lady Johanna Gray (Wieland), 148
"Lady of Shalott, The" (Tennyson), 423, 1409
Lady of the Lake (Scott), 307, 1275
Lafont, Robert, 968
La Fontaine, Jean de, 119, 310, 351, 476, 477, 511, 931, 1066, 1141, 1226, 1231, 1339–40
Laforest, Edmond, 198
Laforgue, Jules, 339, 340, 369, 425, 514, 891, 892, 991–92, 1516, 1517, 1518
Lagar (Mistral), 1346
Lagerkvist, Pär, 1383 laghukāvya, 685
Lahor, Jean, 1001
La Hueterie, Charles de, 150
Lahuta e Malcís (Fishta), 30 lai, 164, 780, 796
Lai, Him Mark, 91
Laicens, Linards, 794
Laina, Maria, 585
L.A.I.R.E. group, 395
Lais (Villon), 509
laisse, 94, 188, 221, 780
"Lake Isle of Innisfree, The" (Yeats), 465
Lake school, 780–81
Lakoff, George, 272, 868, 1129, 1372
Lalleshwari (Lal Ded), 768
Lalo, Eduardo, 206
Lalonde, Michèle, 184, 516
Lamantia, Philip, 1243, 1492
Lamartine, Alphonse de, 61, 139, 212, 310, 471, 512, 513, 517, 902, 972, 1205, 1216, 1231
Lamb, Charles, 139, 270, 550, 661–62, 1222, 1404
"Lamb, The" (Blake), 61
Lambersy, Werner, 133
Lambert, Johann Heinrich, 1286
Lamborghini, Leónidas, 81 lament, 188–89, 410, 781–82, 978, 1042; blues, 151; dirge, 368–69; epicedium, 448; planctus, 1041
"Lament about the Destruction of Tartu" (Hans), 459
"Lament for Adonis" (Bion), 1006
Lament for Art O'Leary (O'Connell), 727, 781
"Lament for Qu Yuan" (Jia), 246
"Lament for the Makaris" (Dunbar), 1281
Lament of Mary, The, 641
"Lamia" (Keats), 423, 667, 1224, 1461
Lamming, George, 195
Lamontagne-Beauregard, Blanche, 182
Lampman, Archibald, 178
Lancelot (Chrétien), 312, 508
Landa, Diego de, 879
Landau, Zisha, 1548
Landini, Francesco, 173
Landino, Cristoforo, 532, 791
Landívar, Rafael, 587, 1344
Land of Unlikeness (Lowell), 1491
Landon, Letitia Elizabeth (L.E.L.), 1052
Landor, W. S., 471
Landriani, Gerardo, 249 landscape poem, 782–84, 931, 1080, 1291
Landstad, M. B., 954
Lane, Patrick, 179
Lang, Andrew, 55–56, 119, 1521
Lange, Hartmut, 149
Lange, Norah, 80
Langer, 1392, 1393
Langevin, Gilbert, 183
Langgässer, Elisabeth, 568
Langland, William, 37, 384, 412–13, 432, 908, 1155
Langlois, Charles-Victor, 478
Lang-tsho'i rbab-chu (Dondrupgyal), 1435
L = A = N = G = U = A = G = E (jour.), 1546
Language poetry, 90, 111, 366, 433, 501, 645, 710, 716, 784–86, 964, 1048, 1064, 1096, 1113, 1243, 1324, 1328, 1332, 1444, 1490, 1494; New Formalists vs., 938; New York school, 941; obscurity, 965, 966; open form, 976; politics, 1081
Langworthy, Christian, 93
Lanham, Richard, 9
Lanier, Sidney, 139, 878, 1197, 1260–61, 1272
Lansel, Peider, 1388
Lanson, Gustave, 471, 473
Lantos, Sebestyén Tinódi, 641
Lanusse, Armand, 517–18
Lanyer, Aemilia, 309, 354, 417, 418, 544
Laokoön (Lessing), 215, 351, 661, 663, 930, 932, 991, 1061, 1209–10, 1500
Laor, Yitzhak, 608
La Péruse, Jean de, 1042
Lapointe, Gatien, 183
Lapointe, Paul-Marie, 183
Lara, Oruno, 197
Larbaud, Valéry, 891
Larcom, Lucy, 187
Larkin, Philip, 30, 267, 361, 425, 426, 433, 708, 901, 1041
Larra, José de, 1340
Larrea, Juan, 1480
Lars, Claudia (pseud. of Carmen Brannon), 400
Larsen, Marianne, 348
Larsson, Stig, 1385
Lasa, Amaia, 127
"Lascaux" (Char), 1156
Lasker-Schüler, Else, 475, 481, 544, 566, 568
Lasnier, Rina, 182
Lasso de la Vega, Gabriel Lobo, 1337–38
Last Day of Mankind, The (Kraus), 504
"Last Poet, The" (Baratynsky), 1232
Lasus of Hermione, 371, 809
Latiff Mohidin, 841
Latil, Alexandre, 517
Latin America, poetry of. See Spanish America, poetry of; specific countries
Latin American baroque, 122, 123, 124, 1339, 1343–44
Latini, Brunetto, 507, 738
Latin poetics. See classical poetics; classicism; medieval poetics
Latin poetry, 8–9, 786–93, 1065–66; Alexandrianism, 34, 35, 582; allegory, 38, 39; classical, 256–58, 786–89; didactic, 362, 363; medieval, 789–91, 856–58; Renaissance, 791–92, 1165; rhyme, 1183, 1184, 1185; Saturnian, 1258; vatic, 1503
Latin prosody. See classical prosody
Lattimore, Richmond, 31
Latvia, poetry of, 793–95
Lauaxeta (Esteban Urkiaga), 127 lauda, 736, 737, 795
Laudi (D'Annunzio), 746
Laudun, Pierre de, 1160
Lauer, Mirko, 927
Lauffer, Pierre, 193
Laugesen, Peter, 347
Laughlin, James, 887
"Laundry Song, The" (I-to), 91
Laura, 739, 740, 910, 1031, 1319
laureate. See poet laureate
Laurence Bloomfield in Ireland (Allingham), 728
"Laurentian Shield" (Scott), 179
Lausberg, Heinrich, 97–98
Laus pisonis (anon.), 410
Lautréamont, Comte de (pseud. of Isidore Ducasse), 131, 290, 387, 513, 1113, 1378, 1418, 1500
Lav, Ercüment Behzad, 1473
Lavant, Christine, 105
Lavardén, Manuel José de, 79
Lavater, Johann Caspar, 1386
Laverman, Bartle, 529
Laviera, Tato, 961, 962
La Vigne, André de, 1181, 1182
"Law Like Love" (Auden), 50, 1107
Lawrence, Anthony, 102
Lawrence, D. H., 56, 111, 405, 424, 556, 598, 1269; free verse, 522, 523; primitivism, 1108
Lawson, Henry, 100
Lax, Robert, 887

Laycock, Samuel, 356
Lay of Hildebrand, The, 558, 559
Layton, Irving, 179
Lazarus, Emma, 1053, 1198
"Lazarus 1962" (Ḥāwī), 70
Lazo Martí, Francisco, 1504
Lazzarelli, L., 175
Lea, Bronwyn, 103
Leandro (Boscán), 148
Leapor, Mary, 421, 1267, 1291
Lear, Edward, 799, 800, 807, 899, 950–51, 1004
Leary, Paris, 645
Leaves of Grass (Whitman), 21, 22, 141, 438, 541, 835, 892, 1109, 1120, 1145, 1216, 1296, 1517
Leavis, F. R., 62, 303, 324, 369, 465, 901, 1272, 1445
Lebanese poetry. See Arabic poetry
Leben Jesu, Das (Melk), 103
LeBlanc, Raymond, 516
Le Bossu, René, 929, 1496
Lechoǹ, Jan, 1076
Lecomte, Marcel, 132
Leconte de Lisle, Charles-Marie, 36, 367, 512, 995, 1001
"Leda and the Swan" (Yeats), 425, 909, 1320, 1394
Ledesma, David, 389
Lee, Don L. See Madhubuti, Haki
Lee, Li-Young, 92
Lee, Robert, 196
Lee, S. Adams, 1296
Leedy, Jack J., 1434
Leeflang, Ed, 824
Lef (jour.), 1241
Lefebvre, Henri, 1332
Le Fevre de la Boderie, Guy, 511
Left Front in Art, 1235, 1240
Legacies (Padilla), 205
Legagneur, Serge, 183
Le Gallienne, Richard, 119, 224
Legenda Christiani, 329
Légende des siècles, La (Hugo), 513
Legend of Good Women (Chaucer), 432, 993
Legend of King Arthur, 412
Legend of St. Catherine, 330
Legends from Camp (Inada), 91
Leggott, Michele, 944
"Legion" (Dworkin), 504
Le Gonidec, Jean-François, 164
Legrand, Jacques, 507, 1282
Lehmann, Geoffrey, 102
Lehmann, Wilhelm, 568
Leib, Mani, 1548
Leibniz, G. W., 123, 457, 621, 667, 668, 669, 672, 719, 932, 1209, 1230, 1286, 1368 leich, 561, 795–96, 888
Leipoldt, C. Louis, 1329
Leino, Eino, 489, 490
Leiris, Michel, 199, 1378
Leishman, J. G., 31
Leithauser, Brad, 328, 1494
Leiva, Raúl, 588
Leiva, René, 589
Lejeune, Claire, 133
Lekhnāth Pauḍyāl, 935
Lekuona, Juan Mari, 127
L.E.L. (Letitia Elizabeth Landon), 1052
Le Lionnais, François, 987, 988
Lelywarch Hen, 434
Lemaire de Belges, Jean, 510, 1181, 1182, 1423
Lemaître, Jules, 1001
Lemaître, Maurice, 798
Leminski, Paulo, 163
Lenau, Nikolaus (pseud. of Franz Nikolaus Niembsch), 104, 565–66, 1207
Lencastre, Catarina de, 1090
Lenngren, Anna-Maria, 1382
"Lenore" (Bürger), 564, 1224
"Lenore" (Poe), 1039, 1484
Lensing, George, 342
Lentz, Ella Mae, 45
Lenz, Rodolfo, 845
Léon, Édouard, 132
León, Luis de, 1007, 1015, 1165, 1337
Leonard, Tom, 1277
Leonidas of Tarentum, 53, 1108
Leonidze, Giorgy, 555
leonine rhyme, verse, 396, 627–28, 796, 1183
León-Portilla, Miguel, 278, 879
Leopardi, Giacomo, 145, 190, 191, 352, 736, 744–45, 746, 747, 972, 1217, 1221
Leopold, Aldo, 437
Leopold, Carl Gustaf, 1382
Leopold, J. H., 822
"Lepanto" (Chesterton), 913
Lepik, Kalju, 460
Lépouzé, Constant, 517
Lerberghe, Charles van, 131
Lermontov, Mikhail, 150, 974, 1217, 1220, 1221, 1232, 1233, 1236
Lerner, Kenny, 45
Lerner-Holenia, Alexander von, 105
Le Sage, Alain René, 970 lesbian poetry, 82, 456, 481, 482, 483, 546, 796–98, 941; love poems, 545, 815, 816, 818–19; queer poetry vs., 1139, 1140
Leśmian, Bolesław, 1075
Lessing, Doris, 673–75
Lessing, G. E., 148–49, 215, 378, 476, 525, 672, 917, 1107, 1349; description, 351; image, 661, 663; neoclassicism, 930, 932; painting, 991, 1061, 1500, 1501; romanticism, 1209–10; tragedy, 1450
Lestari, Putu Vivi, 703
letrilla, 201, 798
letter, verse. See verse epistle
Letters from Iceland (MacNeice), 1513
Letter to Lord Byron (Auden), 1194
"Letter to Ralegh" (Spenser), 708
"Lettre du Voyant" (Rimbaud), 110
"Lettre-Océan" (Apollinaire), 322, 1414–15 lettrisme, 32, 113, 798, 1328, 1416, 1476; calligramme, 175–76
Letzten Tage der Menschheit, Die (Kraus), 504
Leuthold, Heinrich, 1386
Levao, Ronald, 479
Levchev, Vladimir, 169
Levenson, Micha Joseph, 606
Levertin, Oscar, 1383
Levertov, Denise, 77, 144, 145, 287, 343, 482, 812, 1018, 1243, 1271, 1492; antiwar poetry, 1532; visual poetry, 1524
Levin, Harry, 472
Levinas, Emmanuel, 366, 673
Levine, Philip, 1065, 1493
Levine, Sherrie, 983
Levisohn, Shlomo, 606, 614
Lévi-Strauss, Claude, 76, 673, 693, 699, 907, 938, 1426; poetic function, 1056; structuralism, 1097, 1170, 1361, 1363, 1366–67
Levski, Vasil, 168
Levy, Amy, 545–46
Lévy-Bruhl, Lucien, 56, 908
Lew, Walter K., 92
Lewes, G. H., 142, 673
Lewis, Alan, 1532
Lewis, C. S., 142, 1017
Lewis, Saunders, 1538
Lewis, Wyndham, 111, 424, 535, 890, 1416, 1512, 1527
Ley, tu ley, La (Bignozzi), 81
"Leyenda" (Brull), 763, 1328
"Leyendas, visiones" (Chihuailaf), 845
Leyes de la versificación castellana (Freyre), 154
Leyland, Winston, 542
Leys d'amors, 507, 968
Ley-Sievers system. See Sievers's system
Lezama Lima, José, 122, 125, 204, 205, 206, 280, 542, 882, 927, 1347
Liang Chenyu, 238
Liang Shambo, 236–37
Liaturyns'ka, Oksana, 1478
Li Bai, 818, 1551
Liberman, Mark, 495
Libertad bajo palabra (Paz), 881
"Liberté" (Daumal), 515
Li Bo, 1300
Libretto for the Republic of Liberia (Tolson), 23
Libro de buen amor (Ruiz), 321, 858, 1334
Libro del Caballero Zifar, 860
Libro del cortegiano (Castiglione). See Book of the Courtier
Libro-seme (Gut), 158
Liburnio, Niccolò, 145
Li Ch'ing-chao, 1050
Lichtenstein, Alfred, 475
Lichtzwang (Celan), 105
Liebert, Jerzy, 1076
lied, 565, 571, 798–99, 1315, 1316
Liederbuch, 104
Lienert, Meinrad, 1386
Lienlaf, Leonel, 437, 695, 845–46
"Life and Death of Habbie Simpson, The" (Sempill), 170, 1275
Life: A User's Manual (Perec), 987

Life-Drama, A (Smith), 1348
Life Immovable (Palamas), 583
Life Is a Dream (Calderón), 458, 1339
Life, Letters and Literary Remains of John Keats (Milnes), 142
Life of Apollonius (Philostratus), 886
Life of Cowley (Johnson), 290, 871, 931, 1211
Life of Dante (Boccaccio), 141
Life of Goethe, The (Lewes), 142
Life of Homer (Herodotus attrib.), 141
Life of Virgil (Donatus), 444, 445
Life Studies (Lowell), 296, 1491
"Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" (Johnson), 22, 596
Lighthall, W. D., 178 light verse, 119, 266, 799–800, 970
Li He, 1300
Lihn, Enrique, 231, 232
Liiv, Juhan, 460
Liliencron, Detlev von, 689
Liliev, Nikolai, 169
Li Ling, 1298
Lilla Weneda (Słowacki), 150
Lille, Jacques de, 363
Lille Per Räff, 345
Lillo y Robles, Eusebio, 230
Lillpers, Birgitta, 1385
Lilly, Ruth, 1013
Lim, Shirley Geok-lin, 92
Lima, Conceição, 19
Lima, Frank, 940
Lima, Jorge de, 162
Lima, José María, 203
Li Mengyang, 1300
limerick, 49, 367, 799, 800–801, 950, 1100 limit texts, 387
Lim Swee Tin, 841
Lin, Tan, 92
Linacre, Thomas, 640
Lincoln, Abraham, 1484
Lindau, Baruch, 606
Lindegren, Erik, 536, 1384
Linderman, Frank, 313
Lindo, Ricardo, 401
Lindsay, David, 1274, 1275, 1281
Lindsay, Maurice, 1276
Lindsay, Norman, 101
Lindsay, Vachel, 223, 761 line, 801–3, 1515; end-stopped, 410; enjambment, 435–36; foot, 494; forms, 497–98; fourteener, 504; free verse, 523–24
Lingua (Tomkis), 148
Linguae Vasconum Primitiae (Etxepare), 126–27 linguistics and poetry, 803–9. See also structuralism
Lingvo Serena, La (Ragnarsson), 457
Lin Jinfa, 1395 linked verse. See renga
Linmark, R. Zamora, 92
Linna, Väinö, 490
Lin Shi, 818
Linton, James, 993
Lión, Luis de, 589
Lion and the Jewel, The (Soyinka), 378
Li Po, 1050, 1530
lipogram, 300, 809, 987, 1327
Lipps, Theodor, 408, 673
Lipsius, Justus, 922, 1041
Lipska, Ewa, 1077
Lipszyc, Jarosław, 1077
Li Qingzhao, 248, 544, 1301
lira, 184, 809, 1336
Lira, La (Maraino), 847
Lisboa, Irene, 481, 1091
Liscano, Juan, 1505
Li Shangyin, 1300
Lispector, Clarice, 1140
"Listen" (Hopkins), 396
"Litani Domba Kudus" (Rendra), 702
"Litany of Atlanta, A" (Du Bois), 21
Literature and Dogma (Arnold), 59
Lithuania, poetry of, 809–11
litotes, 811–12, 860
"Little Gidding" (Eliot), 425
Little Poems in Prose (Baudelaire), 1512 liturgical poetry, 208, 812; anaphora, 50; chant, 222–23; Christian Latin, 789–91, 856. See also Hebrew poetry; psalm Liu Shi, 1301
Liu Yong, 248
Liu Zongyuan, 1155, 1300
Livesay, Dorothy, 178
Lives of the Poets (Johnson), 141, 1210
Livingston, Ira, 1063
Livius Andronicus, 256, 283, 1258, 1459
Livre (Mallarmé), 32
Livre de jade (Gautier/Gautier), 471
Livre de la neige, La (Jacqmin), 133
Livre de sept portes, Le (Namur), 133
Livre des Lumières, Le (anthol.), 476
Livre el labourer (Gwilhom), 164
Livšic, Benedikt, 534
Livy, 484, 637
Li Xingfu, 283
Liyong, Taban lo, 15
Li Yu, 248
Lizardi, Xabier, 127
"Ljag" (Turian), 84
Llàgrimes de viudesa (Martí), 212
Llanto por Ignacio Sanchez Mejías (García Lorca), 1218
"Llegada del invierno, La" (Ureña), 201
Llibre de concordances (March), 211
Llibre de Fra Bernat (Francesc), 211
Lloréns Torres, Luis, 202, 203
Lluís d'Averçó, 211
Llull, Ramon, 211
Llwyd, Alan, 1538
Llwyd, Iwan, 1538
Llywarch ap Llywelyn, 1535
Lobwasser, Ambrosius, 1165
Locana (Abhinavagupta), 620
Lochhead, Liz, 483
Lock, Anne, 415, 1015, 1321
Lock, Henry, 1321
Locke, Alain, 595, 596, 926, 1489
Locke, John, 98, 285, 487, 599, 660, 662, 663, 667, 669, 670, 672, 710, 865, 930, 1104, 1209, 1211, 1224, 1286, 1290, 1352; syntax, 1402–3; on wit, 1539
Locker-Lampson, Frederick, 799
Lockhard, John Gibson, 271
Loerke, Oskar, 567
"Lo Fatal" (Darío), 946
Lofft, Capel, 1138
Lo Gaiter de Llobregat (pseud. of Rubío i Ors), 212 logaoedic, 309, 375, 812–13
Logau, Friedrich von, 333
logopoeia, 862
Lohenstein, Daniel Caspar von, 124, 562
Lokasenna (epic), 493
Lokhvitskaya, Mirra, 338
Lomax, John A., 314, 315
Lombardi, Bartolomeo, 1158
Lomonosov, Mikhail, 125, 372, 933, 1061, 1230, 1231
"London" (Blake), 1131
"London" (Wordsworth), 61
Longfellow, H. W., 14, 55, 175, 364, 433, 700, 913, 1223, 1484; archetype, 1129; classical meters, 252, 1114; as Fireside poet, 491, 492; recitation poems, 1149; sentimentality, 1293; sonnet, 1320; trochaic tetrameter, 1425, 1484; unrhymed hexameter, 628
"Longing" (Herbert), 599
Longinus, 11, 50, 128, 134, 256, 258, 349, 350, 388, 465, 550, 718; diction, 359; enargeia, 409; Hebraism, 598–99; hyperbaton, 647; imagery, 662; imagination, 668, 678; imitation, 678, 704; inspiration, 709; intensity, 710; invention, 725; lyric, 828, 829, 831, 832; periphrastus, 1020; polysyndeton, 1088; translations, 668, 678, 710, 828, 829, 930, 1105, 1177. See also On the Sublime
Longley, Michael, 426, 730
Longman anthologies, 54 long poem, 813–14, 911, 912, 915; modernist, 892–93; postmodern, 1095–96; serial form, 1296
Lönnrot, Elias, 460, 488, 1154, 1220
Loose Woman (Cisneros), 229
Loosli, Carl Albert, 1386
Lope de Vega, Félix, 109, 117, 123, 124, 148, 363, 764, 880, 927, 1028, 1138, 1139, 1166; comedy, 283–84, 1160, 1162; conceptismo, 291; dramatic verse, 377; endecha, 410; lipogram, 809; pastoral, 1007; Petrarchism, 1031, 1338; religious epic, 1337; tragedy, 1448, 1449, 1450
Lopes, Adília, 1092
Lopes, José, 18
Lopes, Manuel, 18
López, Luis Carlos, 275
López Abente, Gonzao, 538
López Casanova, Arcadio, 538
López de Ayala, Pero, 321, 1335
López de Mendoza, Íñigo. See Santillana, Marqués de
López-Pícó, Josep Maria, 212
López Vallecilos, Italo, 401
López Velarde, Ramón, 880, 1345
Lopez y Planes, Vicente, 79

Loranger, Jean-Aubert, 182
Lorca, Federico Garciá. See Garciá Lorca, Federico
Lord, Albert, 159, 503, 1416. See also oral-formulaic theory
"Lord Beichan" (ballad), 116
Lorde, Audre, 24, 294, 482, 797, 798, 1062, 1493
"Lord Randall" (ballad), 118, 357, 681
Lord Weary's Castle (Lowell), 1491
Loreau, Max, 133
Lorenzaccio (Musset), 378
Lorenzetti, Pietro, 39
Lorenzo de' Medici, 375, 530, 736, 740, 741, 1030, 1163, 1203
Loseff, Lev, 1238
Lotman, Jurij (father), 1241, 1288, 1363
Lotman, Mikhail (son), 1363
"Lotus Eaters, The" (Tennyson), 1350
Lotze, R. H., 408
"Louie, El" (Montoya), 228
Louisiana francophone poets, 517–18
Louw, W.E.G., 1329, 1330
Lovato dei Lovati, 264
Love, Death, and the Changing of the Seasons (Hacker), 545
Love Elegies (Hammond), 397
Løveid, Cecilie, 956
Lovejoy, A. O., 549, 920, 1223
Lovelace, Richard, 217
"Loveliest of Trees, the Cherry Now" (Housman), 209
"Love Poem" (Nims), 244 love poetry, 188, 396, 397, 814–20; alba, 29–30. See also courtly love; erotic poetry
Love's Labour's Lost (Shakespeare), 146, 417, 734, 1507
"Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock, The" (Eliot), 376, 862, 891, 1088, 1487
Loving in the War Years (Moraga), 229
Low Countries, poetry of the, 51, 820–25
Lowe, Lisa, 92
Lowell, Amy, 173, 267, 471, 481, 522, 594, 1053, 1512; imagism, 675; lesbian poetry, 546, 797, 818–19
Lowell, J. R., 491, 550, 900, 1484
Lowell, Robert, 23, 42, 57, 102, 433, 813, 912, 966, 1025, 1081, 1277, 1456; confessional poetry, 296, 1096, 1491; consonance, 299; Fugitives, 531; hybrid poetry, 644, 645; imitation, 679; monologue, 898; religious poetry, 1157; sonnet, 1320, 1322; symbol, 1394; U.S. poetry, 1490, 1491, 1495; Venus and Adonis stanza, 1507
Löwenthal, Leo, 518
Lowth, Robert, 58, 89–90, 471, 598, 599, 610, 671, 807, 971, 998; prophetic poetry, 1111, 1112; sublime, 1105
Loy, Mina, 111, 425, 481, 761, 843, 892, 1269
Loynaz, Dulce María, 205, 481
Loyola, Ignatius, 98
Lozano, Orietta, 277
Lozeau, Albert, 182
Luaces, Joaquín Lorenzo, 201
Lubrano, Giacomo, 847–48
Luca, Gherasim, 1206, 1379
Lucan, 123, 257, 445, 532, 788, 1053
Lucebert (pseud. of L. J. Swaanswijk), 823, 824
Lucero, Judy, 228
Lucian, 52, 357, 636, 932, 957, 1257, 1512
Lucić, Hanibal, 319
Lucidor, Lars Johansson, 1382
Lucifer (Vondel), 1450
Lucilius, 35, 257, 787, 1256, 1257
Lucini, Gian Pietro, 746–47
Lucretius, 41, 48, 52, 75, 255, 256, 262, 300, 362, 476, 532, 553, 786, 789, 1058, 1503; didactic verse, 350, 556; periphrasis, 1021; philosophy, 1035–36
"Lucretius" (Johnson), 553
"Lucretius" (Tennyson), 244
"Lucy Gray" (Wordsworth), 117
Ludwigslied, 857
Lugn, Kristina, 1384
Lugones, Leopoldo, 80, 154, 895, 927, 1345
Luik, Viivi, 460
Lu Ji, 530, 1298, 1550
Lukáč, Emil Boleslav, 1311
Lukács, Georg, 447, 475
Lukin, Liliana, 81
lullaby, 825–26
"Lullaby" (Gascoigne), 415
Lummis, Charles, 313
Lunario sentimental (Lugones), 80, 1345
Lunch Poems (O'Hara), 835
Lunden, Eldrid, 956
"Lundi rue Christine" (Apollinaire), 304–5
Lundkvist, Artur, 1383–84
Luque, Aurora, 1342
Lusiads, Os (Camões), 17, 94, 160, 278, 440, 441, 443, 446, 466–67, 471, 484, 709, 983, 1089, 1090, 1164, 1330; Esperanto trans., 457
Lusitano, Câdido, 1090
Lussan, Auguste, 517
Lute, The (Gao), 237
Luther, Martin, 120, 353, 363, 468, 562, 598, 996; hymn, 561, 646; interpretation, 714; metrical psalms, 1124; penitential psalms, 1015
Lutrin, Le (Boileau), 889
Lutz, Theo, 32, 1416
"Lu wen" (Cao), 240
Luxorius, 53
Lu Xuan, 1301
Lu You, 248, 1300
Luz, Caridad de la ("La Bruja"), 962
Luzán, Ignazio de, 932, 1211, 1339, 1348
Luzel, François-Marie, 164
Luzi, Mario, 623
Luzūm mā lā yalzam (al-Maʿarrī), 68
Luzzatto, Moses Hayyim (Ramchal), 605, 606, 614
Luzzatto, Samuel David (Shadal), 606
"Lycidas" (Milton), 303, 351, 397, 398, 399, 405, 419, 438, 464–65, 550, 600, 634, 703, 897, 966, 986, 1147, 1165, 1443, 1514
Lycksalighetens ö (Atterbom), 1383
Lydgate, John, 99, 146, 384, 414, 432, 679, 703, 812, 1064, 1194
Lyly, John, 1007, 1122
Lynge, Aqqaluk, 722
Lyotard, Jean-François, 1095, 1099, 1374
lyric, 12, 326, 551, 826–34, 857, 1065; dit, 370; lullaby, 825–26; oral, 978–79; poetic contests, 1055; religious, 1156; Sturm und Drang, 1368 Lyrical Ballads (Wordsworth/Coleridge), 50, 117, 303, 343, 359, 422, 473, 498, 506, 634, 637, 671, 710, 780, 830, 831, 832, 913, 982, 1041, 1059, 1061, 1112, 1214, 1218, 1219–20, 1224, 1268, 1352, 1405, 1412, 1483, 1525 lyric sequence, 834–36; narrative poem, 911–12, 913
Lyrics of Chu. See Chuci
Lyrics of Life and Love (Braithwaite), 21
Lyrics of Lowly Life (Dunbar), 21, 832, 1485

Maalouf, Amin, 1228
Maʿarrī, Abū al-ʿAlāʾ al-, 68
Maas, Paul, 333
Mabanckou, Alain, 17
Mabille, Pierre, 199
Mabuya, L.T.L., 1554
macaronic verse, 51, 99, 208, 837
Macaulay, Thomas, 668, 1142
Macbeth (Shakespeare), 224, 404, 417, 617, 681, 732, 1044, 1450, 1531
MacCaig, Norman, 425, 1276
Maccaroneae (Folengo), 837
Mac Cumhaigh, Art, 727
MacDiarmid, Hugh (pseud. of Christopher Grieve), 425, 892, 1080, 1276, 1277, 1278
MacDonald, Alexander, 1279
Macdonald, D., 799
MacDonald, John, 1279
Macedo, José Agostinho de, 1090
Macedonian poetry, 837–38
Macedonski, Alexandru, 1206
Mačernis, Vytautas, 810
MacEwen, Gwendolyn, 180
MacField, David, 948
"MacFlecknoe" (Dryden), 48, 420, 446, 641, 889, 1055, 1257
MacGill-Eain, Somhairle, 1279
Mácha, Karel Hynek, 331, 1220, 1361
Machado, Antonio, 343, 447, 594, 891, 895, 1340, 1341
Machado, Manuel, 189, 895, 1340, 1341
Machado, Melisa, 1500
Machado y Álvarez, Antonio, 1340
Machar, Josef Svatopluk, 331
Machaut, Guillaume de, 223, 384, 413, 507, 508, 509, 904, 905; ballade, 119, 1193; prosimetrum, 1116; virelai, 1522

Machi, Tawara, 751
Machiavelli, Niccolò, 377, 741, 1179
Macintyre, Donald, 1279
Macintyre, Duncan Ban, 1279
Mackay, Jessie, 944
MacKay, Louis, 9
Mackay, Robert, 1279
Mackey, Nathaniel, 24, 1061, 1296
Mackie, Alastair, 1276
Mackus, Algimantas, 811
Maclaren, Ian (pseud. of John Watson), 1275
MacLean, Sorley, 1276
MacLeish, Archibald, 56, 937, 1000, 1047, 1269, 1286, 1423
Macleod, Mary, 1279
MacLise, Angus, 175
Mac Low, Jackson, 33, 365, 379, 501, 983, 1328, 1416, 1493
MacNamara, Francis ("Frank the Poet"), 100
MacNeice, Louis, 252, 269, 364, 425, 729, 925, 1513
Macpherson, James, 421, 446, 506, 522, 618, 642, 727, 1105, 1210, 1223, 1224, 1292, 1537
Macpherson, Mary, 1279
Macrin, Salmon, 792
Macrobius, 384, 854
Madd-o-Jazr-i Islām (Hālī), 1498
Mademoiselle de Maupin (Gautier), 107
Mādhavadeva, 93
Madhubuti, Haki (formerly Don L. Lee), 23–24, 144, 761, 1306 Madhumālatī (Manjhan), 630
Madhusudan Rao, 984
madness, poetic. See furor poeticus; poetic madness
"Madrid, 1937" (Paz), 881 madrigal, 137, 208, 736, 838–39, 904, 1315
"Madrigal" (Verlaine), 1516
Madubuike, Ihechukwu, 1062
Madzirov, Nikola, 838
Maecenas, Gaius Cilnius, 1011–12, 1017
Maehva, 767
Maerlant, Jacob van, 820
Maeterlinck, Maurice, 131, 378, 680, 1234, 1396, 1397, 1517
Maggi, Vincenzo, 1158
Māgha, 1253
Māghūṭ, Muḥammad al-, 70
Magic familière (Goossens), 133
Mágico prodigioso, El (Calderón), 123
Maginn, William, 1003
Magnes, 282
Magnuson, Karl, 1116–17, 1438–39
Magritte, René, 132, 1378
Magyar poetry. See Hungary, poetry of Mahābhārata (Sanskrit epic), 48, 93–94, 362, 439, 636, 684, 685, 687, 689, 767, 911, 979, 1023, 1250, 1251, 1252, 1310; Malayalam version, 839–40; Oriya translation, 983, 984; prosimetrum, 1115; putative author, 1048; as religious epic, 1154; Telugu version, 1418–19
Mahadevi Verma, 631
Mahādēviyakka, 767, 817, 1155
Mahakavi, 1356
Mahāvīracarita (Bhavabhūti), 1144
Mahberot Immanuel, 605
Mahbub-ul-qulub (Navā'ī), 1467
Mahieu le Poirier, 1008
Mahimabhaṭṭa, 1248
Mahmud, al-, 138
Maḥmūd of Ghazna, 994
Mahon, Derek, 426, 730
Mahsatī, 1227
Maiden, Jennifer, 102
Maikov, V. I., 933
Maillard, Chantal, 1342
Maini, S., 1411
Maironis (pseud. of Jonas Mačiulis), 810
Maîtres et maisons de thé (Lambersy), 133
Máj (Mácha), 331
Maj, Bronisław, 1077
"Majdagen" (Tullin), 954
Majnūn Laylā, 67
Major, Clarence, 24
Major and Minors (Dunbar), 21
Makhno, Vasyl, 1479
Makhotin, Djura, 1208
Makhtumquli, 1467
Makhzan al-asrār, 1023
Maksimović, Desanka, 1295
Malā'ika, Nīzak, 70
Malancioiu, Ileana, 1207
Malanga, Gerard, 542
Malaniuk, Yevhen, 1478
Malaspina, Alberto, 1422
Malayalam poetry, 839–40
Malay poetry, 840–42, 995
Malcolm X, 23, 144
Maldan behera (Mirande), 127
Maléndez Valdés, Juan, 1339
Malherbe, François de, 372, 435, 510, 526, 629, 970, 1043, 1101, 1166, 1319, 1425
Malinen, Ontrei, 488
Malinowski, Ivan, 347
Malipiero, Girolamo, 303, 834–35
Mal Lara, Juan de, 449, 1152
Mallarmé, Stéphane, 32, 35, 89, 101, 107, 131, 162, 175, 198, 206, 287, 425, 508, 623, 716, 891, 904, 927, 1001, 1037, 1378, 1418; anecdote, 51; argument, 82; book, 157, 992; bouts-rimés, 160; concision, 293; dance, 336–37; decadence, 338, 339; descriptive values, 352; écriture, 387; hybrid poetry, 644; hypogram, 649; impressionism, 680; as influence, 745, 747, 950, 1206; minimalism, 706; obscurity, 965; performance, 1017; on poet, 1051; prose poem, 1113, 1120; publication demand, 1012; pure poetry, 1134; romanticism, 1217; serial form, 1296; sonnet, 1320; sound poetry, 1327; space, 1332; symbolism, 513, 514, 892, 1394, 1395, 1396, 1397; translation, 1234; triolet, 1460; typography, 1415–16, 1476; vers libéré, 1516; visual poetry, 1417, 1516, 1524
Mallarmé, Manet and Redon (Florence), 991–92
"Malley, Ern" (hoax), 101
Mallock, W. H., 10, 158
Mallol, Anahí, 81
mal mariée, 222, 842
Malory, Thomas, 860
Malouf, David, 102
Ma'lūf, Fawzī, 70
Malzkuhn, Eric, 44
"Mama Afrika e krei fu en pikin" (Koenders), 192
Mamālik, Adīb al-, 1024
Mamelles de Tirésias, Les (Apollinaire), 1415
Mammaṭa, 27, 1246–47, 1249
Mañach, Jorge, 203
Manakara, 93
Manalang Gloria, Angela C., 1033
Manas (epic), 1467
Manasses, Constantine, 172
Manciet, Bernat, 968
Mancini, Donato, 180
Mandela's Earth and Other Poems (Soyinka), 14
Mandelbrot, Benoît, 505, 706
Mandelstam, Osip, 5, 623, 891, 892, 969, 1051, 1081, 1156, 1217–18, 1235, 1236, 1237; acmeism, 5, 1236; protest poetry, 1121; on translation, 1456, 1457
Mandragola (Machiavelli), 377
Mandūr, Muḥammad, 64
Manet, Edouard, 1397
Manetti, Giannozzo, 173
Manfred (Byron), 270, 378, 897
"Man from Snowy River, The" (Patterson), 100
Mangan, James Clarence, 728
Manhire, Bill, 944
Mani, Avraham Barukh, 606
Manifeste du surréalisme (Breton), 290, 1377, 1378 manifesto, 842–43
"Manifesto antropófago" (Andrade), 59, 162
"Manifesto da Poesia Pau-Brasil" (Andrade), 59, 162
Māṇikkavācakar, 1410
Manilius, 362, 1503
Maṇimēkalai (Tamil epic), 1409
Man in the Panther's Skin, The (Rustaveli), 554
Maniu, Adrian, 1206
Manjhan, 630
"Mankutyan Orer" (Nalpantian), 84
Mann, Klaus, 476
Mann, Paul, 113
Mann, Thomas, 56, 252, 338, 393, 474, 1058
Manner, Eeva-Liisa, 490
mannerism, 843–44
Manninen, Otto, 490
Manning, Maurice, 167
Mannyng, Robert, 470
Manquilef, Manuel, 845

Manrique, Gómez de, 186
Manrique, Jorge, 186, 1335
Mansfield, John, 424
Mansour, Ali, 392
Mantuan (Baptista Spagnuoli Mantuanus), 175, 386, 791, 1007, 1165
Manual de espumas (Diego), 1480
Manuel, Juan, 185
Manuš, Leksa, 1208
Manuskripte (jour.), 106
Manutius, Aldus, 401, 1031, 1131, 1158, 1163, 1541
"Man with the Blue Guitar" (Stevens), 322
Man'yōshū (anthol.), 243, 755, 758, 774, 844–45, 1155, 1167, 1528
Manzano, Sonia, 389
Manzoni, Alessandro, 735, 736, 744, 746, 747, 972, 1221, 1519
Maori poetry, 941–42, 944, 1083, 1084, 1085–86
Mao Zedong, 1301
Mapanje, Jack, 16
Mapheus Vegius, 679
Mapuche poetry, 232, 437, 695, 845–46
Maquiera, Diego, 232
Maragall, Joan, 212
"Ma Rainey" (Brown), 22
Ma Rainey's Black Bottom (Wilson), 1450
Marais, Eugène, 1329
Maramág, Fernando M., 1033
Maran, René, 926
Maranhão, Salgado, 163
"Marani" (Baratashvili), 555
Marathi poetry, 846–47, 1101
Marat/Sade (Weiss), 378
Marbod of Rennes, 790
Marcabru, 967, 1464
Marc-Antoine de Gérard, 1460
Marčenas, Aidas, 811
March, Ausiàs, 211, 1335, 1336
March, Jaume, 211
Marchand, Clémens, 182
"Marcha patriótica" (Lopez), 79
Marcianus Graecus, 172
Marcinkevičius, Justinas, 810
Marcuse, Herbert, 518, 521, 1241
Mardhekar, B. S., 687, 847
"Mare Amoroso, Il" (anon.), 145
Marechal, Leopoldo, 80
Marenzio, Luca, 838
Margarit, Joan, 213
Margites (Homer attrib.), 1459
Margival, Nicole de, 223
Marguerite de Navarre, 510
María, Manuel, 538
Maria de Ventadorn, 1461
Mariah, Paul, 542
"Mariana" (Tennyson), 423
Maria Stuart (Schiller), 148, 149, 378
Mariátegui, José Carlos, 917, 1028, 1346
Marie de France, 164, 476, 508, 780, 912
Mariën, Marcel, 132
Mariengof, Anatoly, 1235
Marienleich (Frauenlob), 103
Marília de Dirceu (Gonzaga), 160, 1090
Marín de Solas, Mercedes, 230
Marinella, Lucrezia, 443, 848
Marinello, Juan, 203
Marinetti, F.T., 157, 158, 287, 334, 424, 515, 1113, 1328; avant-garde, 111, 112, 113; futurism, 533–34, 535, 675, 746, 890, 1476, 1479; manifesto, 842, 843; politics, 1081; radiophonic medium, 1414, 1415
Marinhas, As (Arcanjo), 163
Marinism, 124, 125, 743, 847–48, 1073, 1102, 1166
Marino, Giambattista, 290, 736, 742, 743, 847, 930, 932, 1073; baroque, 122, 123, 124; oxymoron, 988; pastoral, 1007
Mariposa de obsidiana, 697
Maritain, Jacques, 720, 1315
Marius Victorinus, 493
Marivaux, Pierre de, 283
Markish, Peretz, 1549
Marlatt, Daphne, 179, 180, 483, 1439
Marlowe, Christopher, 122, 146, 270, 396, 415, 416, 432, 454, 456, 718, 1058, 1351; contrafactum, 286, 303; dramatic poetry, 378, 417; heroic couplet, 624, 913; hyperbole, 648; soliloquy, 897; tragedy, 1447, 1448, 1449, 1459
Marmara, Nilgün, 1474
Marmion (Scott), 446, 1012
Mármol, José, 206
Mármol, Luis Enrique, 1504
Marmontel, Jean-François, 36, 933
Marot, Clément (son), 6, 119, 150, 223, 289, 305, 353, 372, 397, 449, 452, 508, 509, 510, 646, 900, 1164, 1182, 1409; eclogue, 1007, 1165; metrical psalms, 599, 1124, 1125, 1165; rondeau, 1225, 1226; sonnet, 1319; translation of Petrarch, 1031
Marot, Jean (father), 501, 1164, 1181, 1182, 1226
Marques, Lanzia, 1422
"Marriage" (Moore), 481
Marriage of Anansewa, The (Sutherland), 284
Marriage of Heaven and Hell, The (Blake), 422, 450, 1156, 1222
"Married State, A" (Philips), 419
Marruz, García, 205
Marṣafī, Ḥusayn al-, 64
Marsden, William, 995
Marsh, Edward, 556, 675
Marsh, George, 922
Marsh, Selina Tusitala, 1085
Marshall-Stoneking, Billy, 763
Marsman, Hendrik, 823
Marson, Una, 195
Marston, John, 550, 624, 1256, 1257, 1541
Marston, J. Westland, 1348
Marston, Philip Bourke, 492
Martelli, Pier Jacopo, 735
Martí, Claudi, 968
Martí, José, 201, 202, 206, 279, 895, 934, 945, 1345, 1455
Marti, Kurt, 1386
Martí, Miquel Anton, 212
Martial (pseud. of Marcus Valerius Martialis), 53, 123, 155, 156, 217, 224, 396, 624, 723, 788; epigram, 449, 1166; epitaph, 451; on plagiarism, 982; plain style, 1040; translation, 510
Martial of Limoges, 1041
"Martian Sends a Postcard Home, A" (Raine), 57
Martillo, Jorge, 389
Martinaitis, Marcelijus, 810
Martineau, Harriet, 1223
Martinez, J. Michael, 229
Martínez, Juan Luis, 232, 1347
Martínez Rivas, Carlos, 947
Martínez Villena, Rubén, 203
Martín Fierro (Hernández), 79, 356, 540, 691, 1014, 1345
Martín Fierro (jour.), 80, 81
Martinique, poetry of, 197, 199, 515, 1093
Martinovski, Vladimir, 838
Martinson, Harry, 149, 1384
Martí Pineda, Andreu, 212
Martorell, Joannot, 860
martyrological poetry, 605–6
Martyrology, The (Nichol), 181, 1524
Marugg, Tip, 193
Marulić, Marko (pseud. of Marcus Marulus Splatensis), 319
Marullo, Michele, 451, 646, 791
Marvell, Andrew, 9, 42, 43, 217, 244, 387, 419–20, 500, 922, 1081; baroque, 123, 125; carpe diem, 209; country house poem, 309, 394, 782; dialogue poem, 367; ekphrasis, 394; English prosody, 433; epigram, 450; metaphysical poetry, 870, 871; ode, 971, 972; pyrrhic, 1135; tetrameter, 970, 1424
Marx, Karl, 94, 110, 135, 425, 518, 519, 520–21, 553, 618, 1490
Mar y la montaña, El (Boti), 202–3
Mar y tú, El (Burgos), 206
Masakazu, Toyama, 753
Masao, Ueyama, 457
Masaoka. See Shiki, Masaoka
Mascarilla y trébol (Storni), 80 masculine and feminine, 146, 546, 780, 802, 848–49, 1186 masculinity. See gender and poetry
Masefield, John, 368, 556, 913, 1065
Masheu Bishvil Misheu (Avidan), 608
Mashtots, Mestop, 83
Masing, Uku, 460
Mask of Anarchy (Shelley), 422
masnavī, 849, 1021, 1022, 1023, 1024, 1497, 1498
Masnavī (Rūmī), 781, 1155
Mason, John, 1111, 1180
Mason, R.A.K., 943
masque, 335–36, 377, 417–18, 419, 452, 849–50

Massenet, Jules, 338
Massey, Gerald, 1348
Massinger, Philip, 417
Masson, André, 32
Massumi, Brian, 12
Masters, Edgar Lee, 21, 357, 451, 898, 913, 946, 1485, 1511
Mastronardi, Carlos, 81
Masuri S. N., 841
Mateer, John, 102
Matevski, Mateja, 838
Matfre Ermengau, 967
Mathews, Harry, 987
Mathieu, A.C.G., 131
Matos, Gregório de ("Boca de Inferno"), 124, 160, 279
Matoš, Antun Gustav, 320
Matos Paoli, Francisco, 206 matrix, 851
Matsuo Bashō. See Bashō
Matter, Mani, 1386
Matthew of Vendôme, 853, 1110, 1281
Matthews, Brander, 925
Matthews, James, 15
Matthews, Washington, 023
Matthey, Pierre-Louis, 1387
Matthisson, Friedrich von, 45
"Mattina" (Ungaretti), 294
Matute, Carmen, 589
Matyan Voghbergutyan (Narekatsi), 83
Maud (Tennyson), 140, 423, 898, 1348
Maura, Georges (pseud. of Gaston Waringhien), 457
Maurice, F. D., 62
Mauropous, John, 171, 172
Maxambet Ütemisûlï, 1466, 1467
Maxamed Ibraahim Warsame. See Hadraawi
Maxamed Xaashi Dhama. See Gaarriye
Maximin, Daniel, 200
Maximoff, Mareo, 1208
Maximus Poems, The (Olson), 373, 504, 659, 813, 892, 1492
Maxwell, Glyn, 426
Maya, Rafael, 275
Mayakovsky, Vladimir, 111, 112, 166, 389, 534, 607, 746, 950, 1236, 1241; futurism, 1235, 1236; near rhyme, 925; obscurity, 965; performance, 1018; poetic calling, 1050; political poetry, 1079
Mayan poetry. See indigenous Americas, poetry of the May-Day and Other Poems (Emerson), 1455
Mayer, Bernadette, 941, 1302
Mayo, Hugo, 389
Mayr, Resl, 104
Mayröcker, Friederike, 106, 568
Maysarī, Ḥakīm, 1022
Mayūra, 1253
Māzinī, Ibrāhīm al-, 64, 70, 392
Mažuranić, Ivan, 320
Mazzoni, Giacopo, 446, 1060
Mazzucchelli, Aldo, 1500
Mbemba, Léopold Congo, 17
McAuley, James, 101–2
McCaffery, Steve, 112, 157, 180, 1064, 1328, 1430, 1439
McClure, Michael, 1243, 1328, 1492
McCrae, John, 1226
McDonald, Ian, 196
McDougall, Brandy Nālani, 1085
McGann, Jerome J., 1428
McGonigal, William, 799
McGuckian, Medbh, 426, 730
McHugh, Heather, 863, 915
McKay, Claude, 16, 21–22, 195, 542, 595, 596, 926, 1108, 1486, 1489; sonnet, 1320, 1489
McKay, Don, 181
McKenzie, D. F., 1428
McKeon, Richard, 226, 679
McKerrow, R. B., 1428
McLachlan, Alexander, 178
McMaster, Rhyll, 102
McMillan, Terry, 24
McMullin, Ernan, 1271
McPherson, Sandra, 1460, 1493
McSeveney, Angela, 1278
Meabe, Miren Agur, 127–28
Meander, 448, 581, 645 measure, 385, 851
Mechthild of Magdeburg, 560
Meckel, Christoph, 771
Mécrit, Ke (Roche), 1418
Medea (Geta), 53, 220
Medea (Jones), 1450
Medea (Seneca), 1351
medieval poetics, 851–55
medieval poetry, 855–58 medieval romance, 858–60
Medina, José Ramón, 1505
Meditation of a Penitent Sinner, A (Lock), 415, 1321
"Meditations in Time of Civil War" (Yeats), 300, 425
Méditations poétiques et religieuses (Lamaratine), 512
Medius Is the Maker, The (Miller), 549
Medjedović, Avdo, 590, 977
Medvedev, P. N., 1289
Medvedev, Silvester, 1229, 1241
Meehan, Paul, 730
"Meeting at Night" (Browning), 286
Meghadhūta (Kālidāsa), 688, 839, 1252, 1355
Mehmedinović, Semezdin, 159
Mehren, Stein, 956
Mehta, Narsinh, 589
Méhul, Étienne, 173
Mei (Gorter), 1408
Meienberg, Niklaus, 1386
Meier, Herbert, 1386
Meillet, Antoine, 977
Meinlob von Sevelinger, 887
meiosis, 811–12, 860–61; auxesis vs., 110
Meirelles, Cecília, 162, 163
Meisetsu, Naitō, 594
Meistersinger, 561, 861, 1055
Mei Yaochen, 1300
Mejía Sánchez, Ernesto, 947
Mekas, Jonas, 811
Melançon, Robert, 184
Melancthon, Philipp, 669
Melbourne, Airini, 942
Melcior de Gualbes, 211
Meleager of Gadara, 53, 449, 575
Melendes, Joserramón, 203
Melgalvs, Māris, 795
Melgar, Mariano, 694, 1028, 1344
Meli, Giovanni, 356
melic poetry, 9–10, 573, 826, 861–62, 878; dithyramb, 370–71; monody, 897
Melitsat Yeshurun (Levinson), 606
Melk, Ava von (Frau Ava), 103
Melk, Heinrich von, 103
Mell, Max, 771
Mellard, Rudolph, 314
Mello, Thiago de, 163
Mello Breyner, Sophia de, 1092
Melnick, David, 965
Melo, Francisco Manuel de, 1089–90 melopoeia, phanopoeia, logopoeia, 862
Meltzer, David, 1492
Melville, Herman, 38, 93, 130, 214, 451, 897, 917, 1223, 1425, 1455, 1531
Melville, Stephen, 174
"Melville's Marginality" (Howe), 965
memento mori verses, 451
Memmott, Talan, 271, 272, 288
Mémoire de rien (Lejeune), 133 memorization. See recitation
Mena, Juan de, 86, 186, 1335
Ménage, Gilles, 160
Menander, 245, 255, 283, 899, 994
Men and Women (Browning), 423
Ménard, Louis-Nicolas, 1001
Menćetić, Sigismund, 319
Menchú, Rigoberta, 589, 698
Mendelson, Edward, 143
Mendelssohn, Felix, 1316
Mendelssohn, Moses, 598, 606, 911, 932
Mendès, Catulle, 1001, 1517
Mendes, Murilo, 162
Méndez de la Vega, Luz, 588
"Mending Wall" (Frost), 907, 1485
Mendive, Rafael María de, 201
Mendonça, José Luís, 19
Mend-Ooyo, G., 896
"Me 'n' Dunbar" (Carrothers), 21
Menéndez Pidal, Ramón, 458
Menéndez y Pelayo, Marcelino, 1218
Mengistu Lemma, 462
Meng Jiangnü legend, 236
Menil, René, 199
"Men in the Off Hours" (Carson), 451
Menippus, 957, 1115, 1257
Menosprecio de corte y alabanza de aldea (Guevara), 1007–8
Menschheitsdämmerung (anthol.), 475, 567
Menschliches (Nietzsche), 121
"Menschliches Elende" (Gryphius), 123
Mensch shreit, Der (Ehrenstein), 105 mental image. See image
"Mental Traveller, The" (Blake), 907

Menzies, Arama, 942
Meogo, Pero, 1088
Mercier, Louis-Sébastien, 36, 1368
Mère (Carême), 132
Meredith, George, 252, 281, 369, 424, 433, 540, 910, 913, 1103; sonnet sequence, 1319, 1321
Merezhkovsky, Dmitrii, 1234, 1397
"Mer Hayrenik" (Nalpantian), 84
"Mermaid Tavern, The" (Keats), 436
Merrill, James, 147, 360, 452, 471, 542, 545, 813, 1093–94, 1095, 1493, 1494; haibun, 592; ottava rima, 986; paronomasia, 1004; politics, 1079
Merriman, Brian, 727
Merry Wives of Windsor (Shakespeare), 647, 1444
Merseburger Zaubersprüche, 559
Mersenne, Marin, 526
Merton, Thomas, 946, 947
Merwin, W. S., 56, 77, 342, 437, 571, 899, 1108, 1121, 1532; Deep Image, 342, 1492, 1493; poet laureate, 1065; prose poem, 113; punctuation, 1120
Merz (Schwitters), 274
Merz, Klaus, 1386
Merzliakov, Alexei, 1231
Meschinot, Jean, 510, 1181
Mesens, Théodore, 132, 1378
Meshram, Bhujang, 847
Meshullam ben Qalonymos, 603
Mesikapp, Indrek. See fs
Messenger, The (Swetlund), 158
Messerli, D., 785
Messias, Der (The Messiah) (Klopstock), 563, 628
Mestanza, Juan de, 400
Mestre, David, 19
Mestre, Juan Carlos, 1342
metalepsis or transumption, 862–63
Metamorphoses (Ovid), 13, 35, 87, 128, 148, 214, 264, 350, 393, 454, 456, 504, 541, 628, 677, 709, 717, 912, 913 metaphor, 122, 670, 863–70, 1178; catachresis, 210, 211; dyfalu, 385; metonymy vs., 876–77; simile vs., 1307; symbol vs., 1395; synaesthesia, 1398. See also dead metaphor Metaphors We Live By (Lakoff/Johnson), 1129
metaphysical poetry, 54, 125, 303, 353, 418, 420, 425, 433, 828, 870–72, 1166, 1222, 1445; conceit, 289, 290; difficulty, 361, 365; discordia concors, 369; dissociation of sensibility, 369; New Criticism, 1490; obscurity, 965; paradox, 996; Petrarchism, 1031; rhyme counterpoint, 1192; wit, 1539, 1540
"Metaphysical Poets, The" (Eliot), 369, 425, 828, 891, 1445, 1487
Metastasio (pseud. of Pietro Trapassi), 190, 736, 743 meter, 244, 851, 872–76, 1110; ballad, 119–20, 874; beat, 129–30; binary and ternary, 139–40; Christabel, 246, 433; classical, 250–52, 260; cuaderna vía, 321; free verse, 524; functions of, 875; generative metrics, 547–48; heroic, 625; line, 801, 802, 807; political verse, 1078–79; quantitative, 875; rhythm vs., 1197; Saturnian, 262; scansion, 1259–63; substitution, 1375–76; syllabic, 874, 1388–90
"Meter and Demeter: An Epic" (Krull), 461
Meters of Boethius (Alfred, attrib.), 1115
Methodius, 167
metonymy, 160, 784, 862, 876–78. See also metaphor; synecdoche
"Me Too Boogie" (Cendrars), 503–4
"Metope" (Bull), 955
Métraux, Alfred, 199
metrici and rhythmici, 385, 878, 1135, 1137, 1281
Metrodorus of Lampsacus, 253
metron, 46, 49, 367, 368, 725–26, 851, 878–79, 898
Mexía de Fernengíl, Diego, 153
Mexico, poetry of, 879–83, 1135, 1345, 1346–47; auto sacramental, 109; baroque, 122, 123, 124, 1343–44; ecopoetry, 437; indigenous, 697–98. See also Chicana/Chicano poetry, indigenous Americas
Mexico City Blues (Kerouac), 130–31, 144
Meyer, Agnes Ernst, 322
Meyer, C. F., 149, 367
Meyer, Claudia, 401
Meyer, Conrad Ferdinand, 566, 1386
Meyerhold, Vsevelod, 379, 1396
Meyer's bridge, 165
Mez (Mary-Anne Breeze), 271, 272, 396
Meza, Miguelángel, 587
Mezarents, Misak, 84
Mežavilka, Rūta, 795
M'Fingal (Trumbull), 297, 1483
Mgqwetho, Nontsizi, 1545
Mhlophe, Gcina, 1331
"Mi bandera" (Byrne), 202
"Michael" (Wordsworth), 147, 860, 913, 922, 1224
Michaels, Walter Benn, 713
Michalski, Eugen, 457
Michaux, Henri, 132, 133, 516
Michelangelo Buonarroti, 88, 121, 124, 216, 456, 541, 736, 817, 990; sonnets, 1031, 1319, 1321
Michelet, Jules, 638
Michna z Otradovic, Adam, 330
Mickel, Karl, 567
Mickiewicz, Adam, 139, 1074, 1075, 1220, 1221, 1233
Micone, Marco, 184
Microcosme (Scève), 511
micropoetics, 883
Middlemarch (Eliot), 360, 1114
"Middle Passage" (Hayden), 23
Middleton, Thomas, 417, 432–33, 1448
Midgley, Mary, 1270
Midnight, The (Howe), 504
Midsummer Night's Dream, A (Shakespeare), 41, 146, 417, 479, 504, 647, 669, 996, 1057, 1178–79, 1510
"Midsummer Noon in the Australian Forest, A" (Harpur), 100
Mieses Burgos, Franklin, 205
Mieželaitis, Eduardas, 810
"Mighty Fortress Is Our God, A" (Luther), 561
Migjeni, 30
"Mignonne, allons voir si la rose" (Ronsard), 209
Mihalič, Slavko, 320
Mi Heng, 531
Mihri Hatun, 1471
Miki, Roy, 92, 180
Mikita, Valdur, 460
Mila, Karlo, 1085
Miladinov, Konstantin, 837
Milà i Fontanals, Manuel, 212, 1204
Milán, Eduardo, 927, 1064, 1500
Mi-la-ras-pa, 1438
Milbank, J., 136
Miles, Josephine, 1371
Milev, Geo, 169
Miljković, Branko, 1295
Mill, John Stuart, 7, 473, 831, 833, 891, 1145, 1176, 1194, 1352; poetry vs. eloquence, 1525–26
Millahueique, César, 846
Millais, J. E., 1102, 1215
Millán, Gonzalo, 231
Millás, Vendrell de, 184
Millay, Edna St. Vincent, 481, 797, 1053, 1320, 1489
Miller, J. Hillis, 548, 549, 1063, 1170, 1284, 1350
Miller, Jules, 1398
Miller, N. K., 717, 718
"Miller's Tale, The" (Chaucer), 477
Milnes, Richard Moncton, 142
Miłobędzka, Krystyna, 1077
Miłosz, Czesław, 811, 1059, 1076, 1077, 1079, 1150, 1457
Milton (Blake), 422
Milton, John, 12, 31, 35, 48, 148, 156, 225, 246, 303, 351, 360, 363, 405, 417, 419, 522, 634, 762, 792, 1059, 1211, 1330, 1450; allaeostropha, 36; alliteration, 41; allusion, 42, 43; anadiplosis, 48; anthimeria, 52; asclepiad, 91; assonance, 41; asyndeton, 98; attention, 98; aureate diction, 99; baroque, 122, 123, 125; beat, 129–30; biography, 141, 1050; blank verse, 146, 147, 148, 913; canon, 187; carpe diem, 209; catalog, 214; catharsis, 216; caudate sonnet, 216; Cavalier poets, 217; chorus, 245; closet drama, 270; companion poems, 286; correlative verse, 307; counterpoint, 308, 1354; didactic poetry, 363; difficulty, 365; dissociation of sensibility, 369; ekphrasis, 393; elegy, 397, 398, 966; English prosody, 433; enjambment, 417, 436, 802, 914; epanalepsis, 438; epic, 441, 442, 443, 444, 446, 456, 553, 828, 912, 1160; epic simile, 1307; epithet, 453; euphony, 464–65; feminine endings, 146; figura, 486; form, 498; furor poeticus, 533; gender, 544; genius, 550; Hebraism, 599, 600, 601, 971; heptasyllable, 618; history, 636, 637; hypallage, 647; iambic trochaic, 1463; identical rhyme, 658; imagination, 667; imitation of, 1291; influence, 563, 703, 718, 1223, 1264, 1455; inspiration, 709; intertextuality, 718; knowledge, 772; landscape, 782; Latin poetry, 1165; masque, 850; in medias res, 708; monody, 897; monologue, 897–98; Muse, 902; myth, 909; narrative, 914–15; Nativity poem, 919; nature, 922; neoclassical poetics, 929, 931; number, 958, 959; obscurity, 965; octosyllable, 970; ode, 972; originality, 982; ottava rima, 986; oxymoron, 988; parody, 1002; paronomasia, 1004; pastoral, 351, 397, 1007, 1165; polysyndeton, 1088; promotion, 1110; prophetic poetry, 1112; psalms, 1124, 1165; reader response, 1147; religious epic, 1156; rhyme, 1188, 1189, 1191; rhyme royal, 1194, 1294; rhythmic figure, 1198; rota virgiliana, 1227; Satanic hero, 1255; on satire, 1256; science, 1072, 1267; septet, 1294; sonnet pattern, 1320; sound symbolism, 1324, 1325; synaeresis, 1398; synaloepha, 1399; syntax, 1404, 1405; tetrameter, 970, 1425; topos, 42, 1443; touchstone lines, 1444; on tragicomedy, 1453; translation, 148, 511; verse paragraph, 1514; zeugma, 1553

"Milton II" (Eliot), 369
Miluju tě k zbláznění (Topal), 332
Milutinović, Sima, 1295
Mīmāṃsā, 1248
mime, 883–84
mimesis, 87, 134, 507, 667, 884–86, 990, 1046, 1071, 1177, 1402; figural, 486, 487; representation, 1171, 1173; sound, 1324; visual, 1523. See also imitation
Mimesis (Auerbach), 679
Mimnermus, 396, 577, 581
Minaev, Dmitrii, 974, 1233
Minase sangin hyakuin, 1168
Mind Breaths (Ginsberg), 710
Mine Eyes Dazzle (Campbell), 1084–85
Minerai noir (Depestre), 198
minimalism, 886–87, 892
Minne, Richard, 823
Minneleich (Frauenlob), 103
Minnesang, 103, 190, 302, 311, 560, 796, 857, 861, 887–89, 967, 1017, 1353, 1408, 1533; contests, 1054–55 minstrel, 83, 889
Minstrelsy (Scott), 1275
Minter, Peter, 103
Minturno, Antonio, 215, 445, 677, 770, 827, 972, 1158, 1159, 1160, 1161, 1177, 1195
Minulescu, Ion, 1206
Miquel de la Tor, 1519
Mīr, 1499
Mir, Pedro, 205, 206
Mīrābāī, 354, 388, 1155
Mīrājī (Sanā'ullah Dār), 1499
Mirande, Jon, 127
Mirandula, Octavianus, 54
"Mi Reflejo" (Camarillo), 228
Mirikitani, Janice, 92
Miró, Joan, 1378
Miroir de l'ame pecheresse (Marguerite de Navarre), 510
Miron, Gaston, 183, 355
Mirón Álvarez, Oscar, 588
Mirouer de la mort (Breton), 164
Mirra (Alfieri), 743
Mirror and the Lamp, The (Abrams), 318, 473, 991, 1061
Mirror for Magistrates, A (anthol.), 414, 1193 mirror-for-princes genre, 413, 414
Mirsky, Aharon, 614, 615
Mirsky-Tauber, Regine, 1264
Misas herejes (Carriego), 80
Miscelánea Austral (Dávalos), 153
Misfat (Jac), 348
Mishkovsky, Zelda, 608, 615
Miškinis, Antanas, 810
"Mis ojos hinchados" (Alurista), 228
Mistral, Frédéric, 966, 968
Mistral, Gabriela (pseud. of Lucila Godoy Acayaga), 230–31, 232, 437, 480, 481, 545, 819, 1345, 1346
Misul (jour.), 168, 169
Mitä tapahtuu todella? (Saarikoski), 490
Mitchell, Blackhorse, 923, 924
Mitterer, Erika, 105
Mitylenaios, Christopher, 172 mixed metaphor, 863
Mjeda, Ndre, 30
Mkhitar Sebastatsi, 84
Mnyampala, Mathias, 1381
mock epic, mock heroic, 104, 148, 340, 420, 446, 447, 511, 889, 913; macaronic, 837; rococo, 1204; satire, 1002 modernism, 1–2, 5, 23, 49, 57, 76, 828, 889–94, 1103; affective fallacy, 11; anti-intentionalists, 711; avant-garde vs., 111, 113; difficulty, 365, 472; epic, 447; feminist approaches, 480–81; Fyrtiotalisterna, 536; hybrid poetry, 644–45; masculine discourse, 546; philosophy, 1037–38; political outlook, 1081; primitivism, 1108; spatial form, 1349; tradition, 1445. See also postmodernism modernismo, 80, 154, 161, 162, 202, 212, 316, 481, 587, 698, 894–96, 927, 945–46, 1028, 1345–46
Modern Love (Meredith), 424, 913, 1103, 1319, 1321
Modern Poetry and the Tradition (Brooks), 369, 1265
Modest Proposal, A (Swift), 732
Moens, Wies, 822
Moestrup, Mette, 348
Mogin, Jean, 133
Moguči, Matti (pseud. of Priidu Beier), 460
Mohamed, Said Ahmed, 1381
Mohn und Gedächtnis (Celan), 105
Moholy-Nagy, László, 99
Mohr, Nicholasa, 961
Mo'juz of Shabustar, 1474
Mokatsi, Nerses, 84
Mokichi, Saitō, 750, 751
Molas, J., 213
Molière (pseud. of Jean-Baptiste Poquelin), 119, 124, 148, 284, 310, 363, 378, 380, 511, 931, 1008, 1101, 1359, 1453
Molina, Tirso de, 1339, 1448
Molinari, Ricardo, 80
Molinás, Enrique, 81, 1379
Molinet, Jean, 510, 1171, 1172
Molinier, Guilhem, 507, 536
Molla, İzzet, 1472–73
"Moll Magee" (Yeats), 118
molossus, 896
Monastyrsky, Andrei, 1063
Monchoachi, 200
Mondo creato, Il (Tasso), 742
Mondrian, Piet, 108
Monet, Claude, 680, 991
Mongolia, poetry of, 896
Mongolie plaine sale (Savitzkaya), 133
Monk, Ian, 626, 900
Monk, The (Korzeniowski), 150
Monkey's Mask, The (Porter), 102
Monk of Montaudon, 1464
monk's tale stanza, 432, 897, 969
Monnerot, Jules, 199, 1378
monody, 862, 897
"Monody" (Melville), 897
"Monody on the Death of Chatterton" (Milton), 897 monologue, 394, 409, 423, 425, 832, 897–98, 912, 913, 1145, 1216, 1485, 1487; form, 498–99; gender, 545–46; irony, 733; voice, 1526
monometer, 898 monorhyme, 898–99, 1083, 1309
monostich, 899
Monro, Harold, 674
Monroe, Harriet, 21, 54, 1013
Montague, John, 426, 727, 729
Montague, Mary Worthley, 386, 421
Montagut, Abel, 457, 458
Montaigne, Michel de, 58, 363, 456, 678, 718, 762, 1041, 1058; indigenous

Montaigne, Michel de (continued) Americas, 691, 692, 695; primitivism, 1108
Montale, Eugenio, 623, 747, 835, 891
Montalvo, Toro, 1030
Montañas del oro, Las (Lugones), 80
Montecúccoli, Gray, 104
Monteforte Toledo, Mario, 588
Montejo, Eugenio, 1505–6
Montemayor, Carlos, 698
Montemayor, Jorge de, 1007, 1165, 1336, 1337
Montesinos, Fray Ambrosio, 436
Montesquiou-Fezensac, Robert de, 338
Monteverdi, Claudio, 839, 904, 1315
Montgomerie, Alexander, 493, 1275
Months (Simias), 175
Monti, Vincenzo, 736, 1423, 1519
Monto, Harold, 556
Montoya, José, 228
Montrose, Louis, 1063
"Monument to a Scholarly Error" (Shklovsky), 1239
Moody, William Vaughn, 919
Moore, Clement, 1483
Moore, George, 1134
Moore, Jessica Care, 762
Moore, Julia, 799
Moore, Marianne, 42, 91, 368, 433, 481, 891, 1486, 1488, 1490; landscape, 783; syllabic verse, 874, 1388
Moore, Milcah Martha, 1482
Moore, Thomas, 46, 471, 624, 728 mora, 385, 899
Moraes, Vinícius de, 163
Moraga, Cherríe, 229, 798 morale élémentaire, 900
Morales, Beltrán, 947
Morales, Martita, 961, 962
Morales Santos, Francisco, 588
Moral Fabillis of Esope (Henryson), 476
Moralia (Plutarch), 996 morality plays, 377
Morán, Francisco, 206
Moran, Ronald, 342
More, Hannah, 1223, 1291
More, Henry, 1290
More, Thomas, 449, 1255, 1539
Moréas, Jean (pseud. of Jean Papadiamantopoulos), 514, 1397
Moreau, Gustave, 202, 338, 1345
Moréau, Jean, 1517
Morejón, Nancy, 205, 483
Morency, Pierre, 184
Moreno Jimenes, Domingo, 230
Moreno Villamediana, Luis, 1506
Moretti, Marino, 746
Morgan, Edwin, 426, 1277, 1320
Morgann, Maurice, 670
Morgante Maggiore (Pulci), 740, 742, 986, 1164
Morgenstern, Christian, 252, 566, 1328, 1415
Morgenthaler, Hans, 1386
Moriae encomium (Erasmus). See Praise of Folly, The Mörike, Eduard, 139, 252, 352, 367, 566
Morin, Paul, 182
Morisseau-Leroy, Félix, 355, 1452
Moritake, Arakida, 593
"Moritat von Mackie Messer, Die" (Brecht/Weill), 117
Moritz, K. P., 148
Moritz von Schwind, 1533, 1534
Morley, Hilda, 145
Morley, S. G., 1204
Morley, Thomas, 26, 371
Moro, César, 1029, 1379
Moropant, 846
Morpurgo, Rachel Luzzarto, 606
Morris, Charles, 1282
Morris, Lewis (1671–1746), 1482
Morris, Lewis (1701–65), 1537
Morris, Mervyn, 196
Morris, Tracie, 761, 762, 1070
Morris, William, 10, 49, 88, 157, 223, 424, 446, 492, 898, 1103
Morris-Jones, John, 1538
Morrison, Toni, 24, 760
Morrison circle, 1537
Morsztyn, Jan Andrzej, 123, 1073
Morte Arthure (ME poem), 412
Morte d'Arthur, La (Malory), 860 mosaic rhyme, 166, 900, 1186, 1199, 1461
Moschus, 581, 659, 1006, 1065
Moscona, Myriam, 882
Moscow Conceptualists, 1063
Moscow-Tartu school, 1239, 1361, 1362–63
Mosenthal, Salomon, 104
Moses (Heb. OT), 1049
Moses of Khoren, 83
Moskalets, Kostiantyn, 1479
Moss, Thylias, 1002
Mostacci, Jacopo, 1422
mote, 900
Mother Goose, 960
Mother Goose's Melodies, 801, 815
Motherwell, William, 116, 118 motif, 900–901
Motion, Andrew, 426, 1065
Motīrām Bhaṭṭa, 935
Motivos de son (Guillén), 204, 1346
Motolinía (pseud. of Fray Toribio de Benavente), 695
Motsapi, Seitlhamo, 1331
Motte-Fouqué, Friedrich de la, 565
Moua, Pos, 93
Moulton, R. G., 62
Mouré, Erin, 180, 181
Moure, Magallanes, 230
Mourgues, Père, 1522
"Mourning at Bethesda" (Bontemps), 22
Mourning Bride, The (Congreve), 148
Mousa Paidike (Strato), 53
"Mouse's Tale, The" (Carroll), 800, 1409, 1417
Movement, the, 425–26, 901, 1041
Movement of the Fifties, 823–24
Moving Image, The (Wright), 101
Movses Khorenatsi, 83
Mozarabic poetry. See Spain, poetry of Mqhayi, S.E.K., 1544, 1545
Msimang, C. T., 1554
Mtakati, M. M., 1545
Mtshali, Oswald, 15, 1331
Mtuze, Peter T., 1545
Mudan ting (Tang), 238
Muddupaḷini, 1420
Mudie, Ian, 763
Mueller, Joanna, 1077
Muerte de Narciso (Lezama Lima), 204
Muerte sin fin (Gorostiza), 881, 1347
Mügelin, Heinrich von, 1353
Muhammad Haji Salleh, 841
Muḥammad Maḥmud al-Qabri, 27
Muir, Edwin, 1276, 1277
Muir, François, 133
"Mujer nigra" (Morejón), 205
Mujía, María Josefa, 153
Mukařovský, Jan, 1361
Mukhtār-nāma (Aṭṭār), 1228
Mukteshwar, 846
Muktibodh (pseud. of Gajanan Madhav), 632
Mulcaster, Richard, 1159
Mulder, Tiny, 529
Muldoon, Paul, 426, 727, 730, 1096, 1108
Müldür, Lale, 1474
Mulford, Wendy, 483
Mulicks, Lukijan, 1294
Mullen, Harryette, 24, 288, 1140, 1170
Müller, Friedrich Max, 55–56
Müller, Heiner, 149, 378, 380
Müller, Max, 663, 907
Müller, Wilhelm, 565
Mummius Achaicus, 1513
Munch-Petersen, Gustaf, 347
Muoth, Giacun Hasper, 1388
Mura, David, 92
Muratori, L. A., 670, 932
Muravev, Mikhail, 1231
Murder in the Cathedral (Eliot), 245, 379, 1454
Murillo, John, 229
Muris, Santiago, 277
Murko, Matija, 976, 977
Murner, Thomas, 363
Muromets, Ilya, 170–71
Murphy, Cullen, 266
Murphy, Gerard, 218
Murphy, Richard, 729
Murray, Gilbert, 76, 1153
Murray, J. H., 800
Murray, Les, 102, 763
Musa de la mala pata, La (Olivari), 80 muse, 709, 901–3
"Muse" (Nekrasov), 1233
Muse & Drudge (Mullen), 24, 1170
"Musée des Beaux Arts" (Auden), 42, 860–61
Muses, 253, 440, 709, 901–2, 1049, 1057 music and poetry, 565, 580, 903–6, 1067; anthem, 51–52; blues, 151–52; cadence, 173–74; chant,

222–23; Chinese poetic drama, 237–38; discordia concors, 369; jazz, 760–62; lied, 798–99; madrigal, 838, 839; metrici and rhythmici, 878; paraclausithyron, 996; repetition, 1169; romanticism, 1213, 1221, 1222; symbolism, 1395–96. See also dance and poetry; song
Musica Transalpina (anthol.), 838–39
Music of Changes (Cage), 32
Muspilli (fragment), 558, 559
Mussato, Albertino, 264
Musset, Alfred de, 57, 139, 161, 270, 378, 517, 972, 1216, 1220, 1221, 1225, 1357
Musset, Hugo de, 1216
Musttapää, P., 490
Mutabaruka, 14, 196
"Mutability Cantos" (Spenser), 415, 443
Muʿtamid ibn ʿAbbād, al-, 28, 1333
Mutanabbī, al-, 63, 68, 69, 391, 994
Muteia, Hélder, 19
Muthiamboi Aisopeioi (Babrius), 476
Mutis, Álvaro, 275–76
Muṭrān, Khalīl, 64, 69, 392
muwashshaḥ, 27, 28, 68, 69, 604, 612–13, 858, 1152, 1183, 1228, 1333
Muyaka bin Haji bin Ghassaniy, 1381
Mwana Kupona binti Mshamu, 1381
My Emily Dickinson (Howe), 1095
Myers, John Bernard, 940
My Father Was a Toltec and Selected Poems (Castillo), 229
Mykolaitis-Putinas, Vincas, 810
"My Last Duchess" (Browning), 376, 423, 499, 625, 733, 898, 912, 1145
Myles, Eileen, 941
My Life (Hejinian), 286, 785, 835, 914
Myrddin (Merlin), 1533
Myricae (Pascoli), 746, 1203
My Sister Life (Pasternak), 1235
Mystère de la parole (Hébert), 182 mystical allegory, 671
myth, 676, 906–10; anthropology, 55, 56, 57, 1097; archetype, 76, 77, 78, 1129; political poetry, 1080, 1081. See also allegory; epic
My Wicked Wicked Ways (Cisneros), 229

Nabokov, Vladimir, 1238, 1456, 1510
Naborowski, Daniel, 125, 1073
Nābulusī, ʿAbd al-Ghanī al-, 69
Nācana Somanātha, 1419
"Nacer hombre" (Zamudio), 154
Naci, Muallim, 1473
Nadal, Jerónimo, 153
Nadson, Semen, 1233
Næss, Arne, 922
Naevius, 256, 283, 1258
Nagi, Ibrahim, 392
Nagra, Daljit, 1108
Nagy, Ágnes Nemes, 643
Nahuatl poetry, 200, 400, 695–98, 879, 1344; tlacuilolli, 1439–40
Naidu, Sarojini, 1053
Naʾili, 1472
Naipaul, V. S., 195
naïve-sentimental, 911
Nájera, Gutiérrez, 1345
Nājī, Ibrāhīm, 70
Naked Genius (Horton), 20
Naked Lunch (Burroughs), 131
Naked Poems (Webb), 181
Nakhla, Rashīd, 70
Nakulan (pseud. of T. K. Doraiswarny), 1411
Nalješković, Nikola, 319
Nalpantian, Mikayel, 84
Nāma ghoṣā (Mādhavadeva), 93
Namora, Fernando, 1092
Namur, Yves, 133
Nānak, Gurū, 630, 1132
Nancy, Jean-Luc, 733, 992
Nanmor, Dafydd, 385
Nannaya, 1418–19
Nantaran, 1356
Naobumi, Ochiai, 750
Napalpantian, Mikayel, 84
Nápoles Fajardo, Juan Cristóbal (El Culcambé), 201
Narain, Kunwar, 632
Narbut, Vladimir, 5
"Narcisse parle" (Valéry), 514
Narcisso Walters, Erna, 948
Narek (Narekatsi), 83
Narekatsi, Grigor, 83
Narmad, 590
narrative poetry, 911–15. See also ballad; chanson de geste; epic narrator. See persona; voice
Narrow Road to the Interior, The (Bashō), 592, 1050, 1155
Naruszewicz, Adam, 1073
Nash, Ogden, 166, 364, 800, 1461
Nashe, Thomas, 456
Nasr, Ramsey, 825
Nasrin, Taslima, 483
Nathan der Weise (Lessing), 148, 378 national anthem. See anthem, national national poetry, 344, 915–18, 1066, 1220, 1224, 1227. See also poet laureate National Poetry Slam, 1070
"National Song" (Petőfi), 642
Native American poetry. See indigenous Americas, poetry of the; Inuit poetry; Navajo poetry
Native Guard (Trethewey), 24 Nativity poem, 918–19
Natsagdorj, D., 896
Natsume Sōseki, 243 naturalism, 919–20
nature, 16, 352, 902, 919, 920–22, 1105; pathetic fallacy, 1009–10; sublime, 1374. See also environment and poetry; pastoral Natureingang, 888, 922–23
Nature of Love, The (Singer), 815–16
Naum, Gellu, 167, 1206, 1379
Navagero, Andrea, 792
Navāʾī, Mirʿ Alī shīr, 1467, 1471
Navajo poetry, 923–24
Navarrete y Ribera, Francisco, 809
"Navio negreiro" (Castro Alves), 161
Naylor, Gloria, 24
Neal, Larry, 143 near rhyme, 548, 924–25
Neborak, Viktor, 1479
Nebrija, Antonio de, 148
Necati, 1471
Necatigil, Behçet, 1473
Necessary Angel, The (Stevens), 1061
Neculmán, Teodoberta, 845
Nedim, 1472
Nefʿi, 1472
negative capability, 925–26, 1059, 1104, 1214, 1492
Negoiţescu, Ion, 1206
Nègre de Chicago, Le (Bodart), 133
Negritude, 16, 17, 18, 198, 199, 462, 516, 596, 926–27, 1093, 1094, 1108
"Negro's Complaint, The" (Cowper), 421
"Negro Speaks of Rivers, The" (Hughes), 22
Neidhart, 103, 560, 888
Neill, William, 1276
Neilson, John Shaw, 101
Nejar, Carlos, 163
Nejime Shōichi, 753
Nekrasov, Nikolai, 1232, 1233, 1235
Nekrasov, Vsevolod, 1063
Nelligan, Émile, 181–82
Nelson, Cary, 1060
Nelson, Marilyn, 1460
Nemerov, Howard, 147, 899, 1490, 1532 neobaroque, 121, 122, 125, 280, 927–28, 1064, 1347, 1500 neoclassical poetics, 263–64, 265, 297, 828, 843, 928–34, 1066, 1348; French dramatic verse, 377; lyric, 828–29; mock epic, 889; premodernism vs., 1104, 1105; sublime, 1373 neo-Gongorism, 934
Neon Vernacular (Komunyakaa), 24
Neoptolemus of Parium, 255–56, 257, 444 neoterics, 35, 256, 454, 934
Nepāl Bhāṣa. See Newar poetry
Nepali and Pahari poetry, 934–35
Nergal and Erishkigal (epic), 96
Neruda, Jan, 331
Neruda, Pablo (pseud. of Ricardo Neftalí Reyes Basoalto), 57, 198, 202, 204, 231, 331, 343, 388, 437, 456, 484, 588, 695, 881, 1048, 1341, 1344, 1346; long poem, 892; love poetry, 818, 819; lyric sequence, 835; ode, 972; prose poem, 1113; spontaneity, 1353; translations of, 1277
Nerval, Gérard de, 36, 471, 512, 1058, 1320, 1378
Nervi, Mauro, 458
Nervo, Amado, 880, 895, 1345
Nesimi, 1228

Nessi, Alberto, 1387
Nestroy, Johann, 139
Netherlands, poetry of the. See Low Countries, poetry of the Neto, Agostinho, 18
Neto Jorge, Luísa, 1092
Neue Gedichte (Rilke), 105, 367
Neuf-Château, François, 36
Neundorf, Alyse, 923
"Neutral Tones" (Hardy), 455
"Never Again" (Seifert), 1532
Neves, Gonçalo, 458
New American Poetry, 179, 482, 784, 940, 1110
New American Poetry 1945–1960, The (Allen, ed.), 54, 102, 144–45, 287, 645, 975–76, 1110, 1439, 1492
Newar poetry, 935–36
New Criticism, 11, 54, 130, 142, 226, 296, 303, 317, 318, 323, 369, 482, 546, 634, 679, 936–37, 1033, 1062, 1328; affective fallacy, 13, 1146; ambiguity, 44; artifice, 90; attention, 99; ballad, 115, 118; belief, 135; close reading, 268–69; Coleridge as forerunner, 670, 672, 673; concision, 293; concrete universal, 295; connotation, 298; difficulty, 365, 366; emotion, 404; explication, 471–72; formalism, 500, 634, 711, 712; Fugitives, 531; imagery, 665; imagination, 673; impersonality, 1487; intentional fallacy, 711, 712, 713; internal structure, 1366; irony, 711; lyric, 833; metaphor, 864; metaphysical poetry, 828, 871; meter function, 875; New Historicism, 938, 939; open form vs., 975; organicism, 981, 1177; paradox, 997; paraphrase as heresy, 1000, 1511; persona, 1025; poetic autonomy, 634; poetic knowledge, 771; poetic tone, 1442; political poetry, 1080; science, 1265–66, 1392; stylistics, 1370, 1371; texture, 1430; tradition, 1445; unity, 1496; U.S. poetry, 1490, 1491; voice, 1526
New England Psalter, The. See Bay Psalm Book, The
New Formalism, 147, 501, 502, 914, 937–38, 1494
New Historicism, 109–10, 304, 500, 635, 704, 712, 937, 938–39, 981, 1060, 1063, 1081–82, 1401, 1433
Newlove, John, 179
New Negro, The (Locke, ed.), 1489
New Norse (Nynorsk), 939–40, 954
New Republic, The (Mallock), 10
New Science (Vico), 473, 670, 1037, 1071–72, 1211
Newton, John, 646
Newton, Thomas, 504
New Verse (Mandelstam), 1236
New Year Letter (Auden), 425, 1427, 1513
New Year Letter (Tsvetaeva), 1235
New York Puerto Ricans. See Nuyorican poetry
New York school, 89, 92, 102, 130, 145, 323–24, 523, 940–41, 1097, 1492
New Zealand, poetry of, 941–45; Polynesian, 1083, 1084–86
Nezahualcoyotl, 698, 879
Nezval, Vítězslav, 331, 535, 1379
Ngai, Sianne, 12, 404
Ngata, Apirana, 941–42
Ngāwai, Tuini, 941
Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o, 280, 917
Nguyen Trái, 1520
Niazi, Munir, 1133
Nibelungenlied (anon.), 103, 544, 560, 911, 945, 1202
Nibelungenstrophe, 560, 945
Nicaragua, poetry of, 202, 437, 698, 945–48
Nichol, bp, 180, 181, 1096, 1328, 1439, 1524
Nicholls, Peter, 366
Nichols, Grace, 196, 426, 483
Ní Chonaill, Eibhlín Dubh (Eileen O'Connell), 727, 781
Ní Chuilleanáin, Eiléan, 729–30
Nicostratus, 476
Ní Dromhnaill, Nuala, 729
Niedecker, Lorine, 437, 482, 557, 892, 964, 1296, 1489
Nielsen, Frederik, 722
Nielsen, Morten, 347
Niemandsrose, Die (Celan), 105
Niemcewicz, Julian Ursyn, 1074
Nieto, Fernando, 389
Nietzsche, Friedrich, 117, 121, 215–16, 265–66, 525, 622, 720, 823, 869, 909, 1037, 1058, 1075, 1099, 1397, 1540; dance, 335, 336; Dinggedicht, 367; expressionism, 474; gai saber, 537; paradox, 997; romanticism, 1213–14, 1217; tragedy, 1035, 1446
Nieve (Casal), 202
Nigel of Longchamps, 128
Night Blooming Cereus, The (Hayden), 23
"Nightingale, The" (Coleridge), 304, 1224
Night of My Blood (Awoonor), 14
"Night-Piece on Death" (Parnell), 575
Night Thoughts (Young), 575, 1291
Night Train to Tuxtla (Herrera), 229
Niit, Ellen, 460
Nijhoff, Martinus, 823
Niketas of Herakleia, 172
Nikitin, I. S., 1149
Nikolchina, Miglena, 169
Niles, John Jacob, 209
Nil Volentibus Arduum, 948–49
Nims, John Frederick, 244, 1325
"Nine Songs" (Qu), 246–47, 1154, 1298
"Nine Yearnings" (Wang), 247
Nishiwaki Junzaburō, 753
Niss, Millie, 288
Niẓāmī, 849, 1023, 1024, 1266
Njegoš, Petar Petrović, 1294
Nō, 81, 377, 380, 382, 755, 891, 949–50
No, Los (Kamenszain), 81
No. III 2.7.93–10.20.96 (Goldsmith), 286, 292
Noble, Eustache le, 476
Noble Numbers (Herrick), 419
Noces posthumes de Santigone (Bemba), 1451
Noche, La (Saenz), 154
"Noche de diciembre" (Pombo), 274
"Nocturne" (Leino), 489
Noël, Bernard, 516
Nogales, Lydia (pseud. of Raúl Contreras), 400
Nogar, Rui, 19
Noguchi, Yone, 91
"Noh" or Accomplishment (Pound), 891
Noigandres (jour.), 60, 162, 163, 557, 706, 950, 1430
Nolla, Olga, 206
Nonnus, 349, 582, 627
nonsense verse, 763, 800, 807, 950–51, 1327, 1328
Noonuccal, Oodgeroo (Kath Walker), 100, 763
No Ordinary Sun (Tuwhare), 1085
Noot, Jan van der, 821
Nordau, Max, 339
Nordbrandt, Henrik, 347
Nordenflycht, Hedvig Charlotta, 1382
Nordiske Digte (Oehlenschläger), 345
Nordlands Trompet (Dass), 954
Nordsee, Die (Heine), 352, 525, 565
Norém, Lars, 1384
Norge, Géo, 132
Norges Dæmring (Welhaven), 954
Noriega, Enrique, Jr., 588
Noriega Varela, Antonio, 538
Norley, Alice, 941
Norse, Harold, 543
Norse poetry, 389–90, 558, 559, 951–53
Norske Selskab, 345, 953–54, 954
"North American Sequence" (Roethke), 813
North of Boston (Frost), 147, 913
North Sea, The (Heine), 352, 525, 565
Nortje, Arthyr, 15
Norton, Thomas, 146, 432
Norton anthologies, 54, 317
Norway, poetry of, 149, 939–40, 954–56; Norske Selskab, 953–54
Norwid, Cyprian, 150, 1075
Nostalgies françaises (Thaly), 197
Notebook (Lowell), 813, 1322
Notebook of a Return to the Native Land (Césaire), 16, 17, 197, 198, 205, 515–16, 926, 1093
"Notes on Organic Form" (Levertov), 145
"Notes toward a Supreme Fiction" (Stevens), 835, 1423, 1488
Notker Balbulus (Notker of St. Gall), 646, 790, 903
Nougé, Paul, 131–32, 1378

Noullez, Lucien, 133
Nourritures terrestres (Gide), 1113
Nouveau, Germain, 1378
Nouvelles Impressiones d'Afrique (Roussel), 225
Novak, Helga, 1113
Novák, Ladislav, 332
Novalis (pseud. of Friedrich von Hardenberg), 525, 564, 623, 670, 672, 835, 1113, 1213, 1219, 1378, 1397, 1534
novas (rimadas), 957 novel, 447, 553, 807 novel, poetry in the, 957–58, 1509–10, 1512 novel, verse. See narrative poetry
Novello da Polenta, Guido, 374
Noventa, Giacomo, 748
"Novijat den" (Trayanov), 169
Novo, Salvador, 542, 881, 889, 1347
Novogodnee (Tsvetaeva), 1235
Novomeský, Ladislav, 1311
Novoneyra, Uxío, 538
Nowak, Mark, 373
Nowak, Tadeusz, 1077
Nowlan, Alden, 179
Nox and Stacks (Cunningham/Carson), 336
Ntiru, Richard, 15
Nu'ayma, Mīkhā'īl, 70
Nucio, Martin, 1204
"Nuestra América" (Martí), 202
"Nueva Chicana, La" (Correa), 228
Nueva Novela, La (Martínez), 232
Nugent, Richard Bruce, 542
"Nuit de Sine" (Senghor), 1093 number(s), 958
numerology, 958, 958–59
Numerorum mysteria (Bongo), 959
Núñez, Hernán, 1152
Nunnenpeck, Lienhard, 861
"Nuns Fret Not" (Wordsworth), 294 nursery rhymes, 4, 95, 220, 801, 959–60
Nuyorican poetry, 356, 960–62
Nuyorican Poets Café, 356, 961, 962, 1070, 1494
"N.Y." (Pound), 902
Nyamubaya, Freedom, 16
Nyezwa, Mxolisi, 1331
"Nymph and Her Fawn, The" (Marvell), 244
"Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd, The" (Ralegh), 415

"Oak, The" (Tennyson), 316
Oak and Ivy (Dunbar), 21
Oakes, Urian, 1481
Oberkofler, Joseph, 104
Obeso, Candelario, 275
objective correlative, 135, 368, 474, 711, 719, 963
objectivism, 145, 645, 963–64, 1296, 1487, 1489–90 object-poem. See Dinggedicht
"O Black and Unknown Bards" (Johnson), 22
Obras, Las (Boscán), 1031
Obregón, Carlos, 276
Obregón, Roberto, 588
Ó Bruadair, Dáibhi, 727 obscurity, 964–66
Obstfelder Sigbjørn, 955
Ocampo, Victoria, 1027
"O Canada" (national anthem), 51
"O Captain! My Captain!" (Whitman), 187, 1484 occasional verse, 966, 1065, 1066
Occitan poetry, 9, 29, 221, 507, 508, 859, 966–69, 1309; courtly love, 311, 312, 560; Dolce stil nuovo, 374; Italian prosody, 734, 735–36, 737; jongleur, 764, 889; rhyme, 1184, 1185, 1190; trobairitz, 1461–62; troubadour, 1464–65. See also Catalan poetry
Occom, Samson, 279
"Ocean to Cynthia, The" (Ralegh), 415
Ochiai Naobumi, 750
Ocho poemas negros (Cabral), 204
O'Connor, Flannery, 26
O'Connor, Mark, 102 octave, 969; rhyme, 1188
octonarius, 970
"Octopus, An" (Moore), 783
octosyllable, 3, 118, 221, 310, 431, 970–71
Oculi, Okello, 15
"Oda a la piña" (Zequeira), 201
"Oda a Rubén Darío" (Coronel), 947
"Oda a Walt Whitman" (García Lorca), 542
Odas elementales (Neruda), 231, 1346
Odassi, Tisi degli, 837
ode, 36–37, 58, 91, 207, 340, 420, 423, 433, 818, 966, 970, 971–73, 1154, 1368; lyricization, 827, 829–30
Ode à Cassandra (Ronsard), 1043
Ode au Saint-Laurent (Lapointe), 183
"Ode: Intimations of Immortality" (Wordsworth), 351, 422, 919, 972
Oden (Klopstock), 563
"Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College" (Gray), 782, 1291
"Ode on a Grecian Urn" (Keats), 423, 663, 972, 1214, 1224
"Ode on the Capture of Chocim" (Lomonosov), 1230
"Ode on the Death of Sir Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison" (Jonson), 972
"Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington" (Tennyson), 973, 1065
"Ode on the Poetical Character" (Collins), 971
Odes (Horace), 9, 31, 79, 87, 90–91, 209, 257, 371, 410, 573, 982, 1254
Odes (Ronsard), 509
Odes (Valéry), 972
Odes and Lyrics (Kalvos), 583
"Ode to a Nightingale" (Keats), 406, 423, 478, 925, 973, 1222, 1325
"Ode to Ben Jonson" (Herrick), 217
"Ode to Death" (Smith), 713
"Ode to Evening" (Collins), 91
"Ode to Joy" (Schiller), 564, 972
"Ode to Psyche" (Keats), 423, 478, 925, 971
"Ode to the Confederate Dead" (Tate), 973, 1490
"Ode to the Memory of Mrs. Anne Killigrew" (Dryden), 972
"Ode to the West Wind" (Shelley), 178, 972, 1423–24
Odi barbare (Carducci), 252
Ó Direáin, Máirtín, 729
odl, 973
Odoevsky, Vladimir, 1221
O'Dowd, Bernard, 101
O'Driscoll, Dennis, 729
Odyssey (Homer), 34, 37, 39, 56, 220, 253, 258, 454, 544, 577, 902, 911, 912, 979; epic conventions, 439, 440–41, 443, 444, 445; formula, 503; imitation of, 679; inspiration, 709; Kazantzakis modern sequel, 584; lament, 781; in medias res, 707; pastoral, 1005; rewriting of, 280; rhapsode, 1175; structure, 1367; synaesthesia, 1398; translations, 148, 213, 256, 624, 1258, 1458, 1511
Oedipus Rex (Sophocles), 1045–46, 1448, 1449, 1450, 1459
Oehlenschläger, Adam, 149, 345
Oeuvres Complètes (Senghor), 17
Oeuvres poétiques (Tati-Loutard), 17
Ofeimun, Odia, 14
Ogibenin, Boris, 1362
O Guesa (epic), 692, 693
Ogun Abibiman (Soyinka), 1094
Ogyū Sorai, 243
O'Hara, Frank, 158, 296, 542, 644, 835, 842, 1096, 1333; New York school, 940, 1492
"Oh! Breathe Not His Name" (Moore), 728
"Oh, heroic gallows!" (Vazov), 168
O Hissope (Cruz e Silva), 148
Ohmann, Richard, 1350
Oignons, Les (Norge), 132
Oihenart, Arnaut, 127
Öijer, Bruno K., 1384
Ojaide, Tanure, 14
"Ojos claros, serenos" (Cetina), 879
Okai, Atukwei (John), 14
Okara, Gabriel, 14
Okigbo, Christopher, 13–14, 819, 919, 1094
Okopenko, Andreas, 106, 1108
Okot p'Bitek, 13, 14, 15, 1093, 1094, 1108, 1152
Okudzhava, Bulat, 1237
Okura, Yamanoue no, 844
Ólafsson, Eggert, 654
"O Land, I am Your Daughter" (Papusza), 1208
Old Arcadia (Sidney), 91, 372, 416, 838–39, 986, 1142, 1507
"Old Botany Bay" (Gilmore), 101
Old English Benedictine Office (anon.), 812

Oldham, John, 286
"Old Ironsides" (Holmes), 491
Olds, Sharon, 296
"Old Trapper Speaks, The" (Chapman), 313
Old Uighur poetry, 1466–67
Old Wines Are Tasty (Sofola), 1451
O'Leary, Michael, 942, 1085
Oleinikov, Nikolai, 1236
Oles', Oleksandr, 1478
Oleschinski, Brigitte, 1269
Olier, Youenn, 165
Oliphant, Carolina, 1275
Olivari, Nicolás, 80
Olive, L' (Bellay), 1031, 1319
Oliveira, Alberto de, 161
Oliver, Douglas, 1272
Oliver, Mary, 42, 437, 1455
Oliver, W. H., 944
Olivet, Abbé d', 1518
Olivier, Juste, 1387
Olmedo, José Joaquín de, 388, 1028, 1344
"Ololoi" (Deligne), 202
Olsen, Tillie, 373
Olsen, Ursula Andkjær, 348
Olson, Charles, 56, 144, 145, 173, 174, 179, 373, 944, 1332; composition by field, 287, 1416, 1492; ecological poetry, 437; found poetry, 504; free verse, 523; hieroglyphs, 630; ideogram, 659; inspiration, 710; line, 803; long poem, 813, 892; open form, 975; performance, 1018; postmodernism, 1096; projective verse, 975, 1109–10, 1269, 1492, 1524
Olson, Elder, 226, 679
Olsson, Hagar, 491
Omar Khayyám quatrain, 973–74, 1067, 1139
O mein Heimatland! (Keller), 1386
Omeros (Walcott), 280, 447, 914, 1094, 1423
Omond, T. S., 139–40
Oña, Pedro de, 230, 1338, 1343
"On an Invitation to the United States" (Hardy), 966
"On a Raised Beach" (MacDiarmid), 1276
"On Being Brought from Africa to America" (Wheatley), 20
Ondaatje, Michael, 180, 181
"On Difficulty" (Graham), 366
"One Art" (Bishop), 2, 61, 1457, 1522
Onegin for Our Times (Minaev), 1233
Onegin stanza, 553, 912, 913, 958, 974, 1138, 1358
O'Neill, Alexandre, 1092
Onerva, L., 489–90
1001 Nights (Arabic tales), 69, 71, 471, 684
"One Word More" (Browning), 1016
"On First Looking into Chapman's Homer" (Keats), 87, 89, 423, 1456, 1458
Ong, W. J., 1525
"On His Deceased Wife" (Milton), 1188
"On Imitation" (Hazlitt), 679
Onofri, Arturo, 623
onomatopoeia, 41, 90, 96, 173, 974–75, 1038, 1288, 1305
Ono no Komachi, 818
"On Shakespeare" (Milton), 419
"On Some Motifs in Baudelaire" (Benjamin), 521
On Style (Demetrius), 60, 257
On the Cave of the Nymphs (Porphyry), 258, 350
On the Characteristics of Animals (Philes), 172
On the Defense of the Comedy of Dante (Mazzoni), 446, 1060
"On the Late Massacre in Piedmont" (Milton), 1188, 1325
"On the Morning of Christ's Nativity" (Milton), 419, 919, 972, 1194, 1324
On the Sublime (Longinus, attrib.), 128, 256, 258, 409, 598, 647, 668, 678, 709, 710, 725, 1059, 1146, 1177, 1372–73, 1496, 1504; Boileau translation, 668, 678, 710, 828, 930, 1105, 1375
On the Sublime and Beautiful (Burke), 710, 930
"On the Tragedies of Shakespeare" (Lamb), 270
"On Translations of Homer" (Tennyson), 628
Onwuchekwa Jemie, 1062
Open Boat, The (Hongo, ed.), 92
open form, 715, 975–76
Opera Wonyosi (Soyinka), 284
Opie, Iona and Peter, 960
Opitz, Martin, 124, 252, 289, 345, 386, 525, 562, 570, 770, 1165, 1166; sestina, 1297
Oppen, George, 1, 366, 887, 892, 1037, 1296; objectivism, 963, 964, 1489, 1490
Oppenheim, Meret, 1386
Oppenheimer, Joel, 144–45
Oquendo de Amat, Carlos, 1029
Oracions (Rusiñol), 212 oral-formulaic theory, 66, 439, 590, 976–78, 979, 1169, 1445–46 oral poetry, 4, 978–80, 1066; chant, 222–23; incremental repetition, 681. See also ballad; epic; performance
"Orara" (Kendall), 100
Ó Rathaille, Aogán, 727
Orators, The (Auden), 425
orature, 196, 587, 1085–86
Orbelian, Stepanos, 83
Orbeliani, Grigol, 555
"Orchestra, or a Poem of Dancing" (Davies), 335
Order and Disorder (Hutchinson), 443
Ordinalia (Cornish trilogy), 306
"Oread" (H.D.), 373, 1486
Orelli, Giorgio, 1387
Oresteia (Aeschylus), 1448, 1449, 1450, 1458
Orfelin, Zaharije, 1294
Orff, Carl, 560
organicism, 498, 672, 673, 981, 1109–10, 1171, 1177
Orgel, Stephen, 850
Orientales, Les (Hugo), 512, 995
Orientalism. See exoticism
Orientalism (Said), 278, 279, 325, 1092
Oriente, O (Macedo), 1090
Origen, 134, 468–69, 619–20, 854, 1036, 1041 originality, 550, 981–83, 1058; influence, 703
Orikuchi, Shinobu (Shaku Chōkū), 750
Ó Riodáin, Sean, 729
Orixe (Nicolas Ormaetxea), 127
Oriya poetry, 983–85
Orlando furioso (Ariosto), 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 456, 545, 708, 736, 741, 742, 913, 986, 1011, 1060, 1160, 1164
Orlando innamorato (Boiardo), 740, 741, 1164, 1165
Orléans. See Charles d'Orléans ornament, 985–86
Orozco, Olga, 81
Orphan of the Zhao Family (Ji), 283
"Orphée Noir" (Sartre), 16
Orphelin de la Chine (Voltaire), 283
Orpheus, 710, 1048, 1049, 1503
"Orpheus" (Auden), 771
Orpheus (Buchner), 333
Orphic Hymns, 645
Orr, James, 278
Ortega y Gasset, José, 1218
Ortiz, Simon, 1096
Ory, Carlos Edmundo de, 1341
Osborne, Dorothy, 419
Ó Searcaigh, Cathal, 729
Osgood, Frances Sargent, 6
O'Shaughnessy, Arthur, 492
Osman (Gundulić), 125, 319, 320
Osman, Jena, 1270
Osorio, Amilkar, 276
Osório, Oswaldo, 19
Ossian poems (Macpherson), 446, 506, 522, 642, 727, 1105, 1210, 1211, 1223, 1224, 1292, 1537
Ossi di seppia (Montale), 835
Ostaijen, Paul van, 822–23
Ostanovka v pustyne (Brodsky), 1237
Österling, Anders, 1383
Österreichische Trilogie (Henz), 105
Ostriker, Alicia, 482
Ó Súilleabháin, Eoghan Rua, 727
O'Sullivan, Maggie, 426, 483
Osundare, Niyi, 14
Oswald von Wolkenstein, 103, 183, 561, 1408
Osztojkán, Béla, 1208
"O Taste and See" (Levertov), 1271
Otero, Blas de, 1341
Otero, Manuel Ramos, 206
Otfrid of Weissenburg, 559, 770, 1184
Othello (Shakespeare), 46, 48, 381, 647, 931, 1088, 1162, 1391
Othón, Manuel José, 880
Oto de Graunson, 897

Otsuni, Iwama, 594
ottava rima, 200, 498, 730, 736, 913, 986–87; rhyme royal, 1193; Yiddish poetry, 1547
Ottoman-Azeri poetry, 1471–72
Ó Tuama, Seán, 727
Otway, Thomas, 478
Otxoa, Julia, 1342
Ouchitelno evangelie (Preslavski), 167
Ouellette, Fernand, 183
Oulipo, 32, 288, 501, 503, 516, 626, 987–88, 1096, 1271; constraint, 301; morale élémentaire, 900; originality, 983; palindrome, 993
Oulipoems (Niss), 288
"Our Cities Face the Sea" (Wright), 943
"Out, Out—" (Frost), 650–51
"Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" (Whitman), 398, 1514
Ouyang Xiu, 248, 1300
Ovando, Sor Leonor de, 200
Overbury, Thomas, 224
Ovid, 13, 35, 53, 87, 123, 190, 207, 262, 264, 311, 444, 454, 532, 541, 723, 897, 913; beast epic, 128; calendrical poetry, 175; catalog, 214; complaint, 287; description, 350, 393; didactic poetry, 362; distich, 624; elegy, 397; epic, 912; epitaph, 451; epyllion, 416, 1166; erotic poetry, 456; heroic epistle, 1291; hexameter, 628; imitation, 677, 678, 679; inspiration, 709; intertextuality, 717, 718; Latin poetry, 786, 788, 789; love poetry, 396, 817; medieval poetics, 852, 854, 857; palinode, 993; paraclausithyron, 996; poetic calling, 1050; poetic madness, 1058; recusatio, 1150; rhyme, 1183; translations of, 148, 153, 504; verse and prose, 1512; verse epistle, 1513
Oviedo, José Miguel, 1027
Owen, Gerallt Lloyd, 1538
Owen, Goronwy, 329, 1537
Owen, Jan, 102
Owen, Wilfred, 42, 300, 359, 424, 650, 914, 925, 973, 1039, 1531
Owl and the Nightingale, The, 412, 790, 1054, 1184
Oxenstierna, Johan Gabriel, 1382
oxymoron, 59, 122, 988–89, 996
Ozidi (Rotimi), 1451
"Ozymandias" (Shelley), 87, 1124

Paaltjens, Piet (pseud. of François HaverSchmidt), 821
"Pace non trovo e non ho da far guerra" (Petrarch), 9
Pacheco, Francisco, 363
Pacheco, José Emilio, 280, 437, 882, 1347
Pachín (Francisco Gonzalo Marín), 201
Pacuvius, 1256
Padgett, Ron, 940
Padilla, Herberto, 205
Padín, Clemente, 1500
Padmāvat (Jāyasī), 630
paean, 990
paeon, 990
Page, Geoff, 102
Page, P. K., 179
Pagis, Dan, 608, 615
Pahari poetry. See Nepali and Pahari poetry
Paine, Robert Treat, Jr., 1483
"Painter of Modern Life, The" (Baudelaire), 107 painting and poetry, 891, 990–93, 1061; baroque, 121, 122, 125; impressionism, 680–81; Pre-Raphaelites, 1102, 1103; romanticism, 1221; surrealism, 1378, 1379; symbolism, 1397. See also ut pictura poesis; visual poetry
"Pair of Tricksters, A" (Sapir), 57
Pak Il-lo, 777
"Pak Utih" (Usman), 841
Palacký, František, 331
Palamas, Kostis, 583, 584
Palatine Anthology, 53, 449, 575
Palau i Fabre, Josep, 213
Palazzeschi, Aldo, 534, 746, 747, 1328, 1519
Pale Fire (Nabokov), 1510
Palencia, Arturo, 588
Palés Matos, Luis, 203–4, 336, 1328
Palestinian poetry, 70, 280
Palgrave, Francis, 54
palindrome, 48, 225, 993; boustrophedon vs., 159 palinode, 993–94
Pali poetry, 176–77, 1431
Pālkuriki Somanātha, 1419
Pallais, Azarías H., 946
Pallarés, Pilar, 539
"Pallone Frenato Turco" (Marinetti), 533
Pallotini, Renata, 163
Palm, Göran, 149, 1384
Palma, Ricardo, 1028
Palmer, Michael, 506, 1038, 1296
Palmo, 1436
Palomares, Ramón, 1505
Paludan-Müller, Frederik, 346
Pàmias, Jordi, 213
Paṃpa, 767
Pamperis, Ambrose, 993
Pamphilia to Amphilanthus (Wroth), 418, 545, 1031, 1320
Pana, Saşa, 1206
Panaetius, 341
"Panama ou les aventures de mes sept oncles, Le" (Cendrars), 504
Panchatantra, 128, 476, 684
Paṇ-chen Blo-bzang chos-rgyan, 1437
Pandit, Waman, 846
Pandurović, Sima, 1295
Pane, Sanusi, 701
panegyric, 28, 122, 171–72, 409, 978, 994–95, 1022
Paneles del infierno (Coronel Urtecho), 946
Panero, Leopoldo (father), 1341
Panero, Leopoldo María (son), 1341–42
"Pangolin, The" (Moore), 1488
Pāṇini, 983, 1245, 1250, 1253
Pann, Anton, 1205
Pannonius, Janus (pseud. of János Csezmiczei), 641, 792
Panofsky, E., 656–57
Panormita (pseud. of Antonio Beccadelli), 791
Pansaers, Clément, 131
Pan Tadeusz (Mickiewicz), 1074
pantun, 650, 701, 840–41, 995
"Pantycelyn" (Williams), 1537
Pan Yue, 530
Paollo, Rosella de, 1030
Paparrhegopoulos, Demetrios, 583
Papusza (Bronisława Wajs), 1207–8
"Papyrus" (Pound), 506
Pâques à New York, Les (Cendrars), 1387
Paquet, Basil, 1532
parabasis, 995–96
Paracelsus (Browning), 270 paraclausithyron, 452–53, 929, 996
Paradise Lost (Milton), 12, 41, 42, 48, 52, 98, 146, 147, 214, 225, 307, 351, 365, 393, 417, 419, 433, 442, 486, 498, 533, 563, 669, 703, 708, 718, 762, 897, 902, 909, 913, 914, 922, 959, 982, 1004, 1050, 1110, 1112, 1255, 1325, 1354, 1450, 1553; Christian Hebraism, 600; epic conventions, 441, 442, 443, 444, 446, 456, 1002; gendered elements, 544; landscape, 782; narrative, 914–15; oxymoron, 988; reader-response study of, 1147; rhymes, 1189, 1191; romantic poetics, 1223; stichos, 1320; synaeresis, 1398; theology of, 1156; translations of, 148, 511; verse paragraph, 1514
Paradise Regain'd (Milton), 146, 351, 446, 958
Paradiso (Dante), 264, 365, 441, 444, 469, 720, 739, 773, 1036, 1266
Paradiso (Lezama Lima), 125, 204, 927 paradox, 122, 936, 988, 996–97
paralipsis, 997; aposiopesis vs., 61 parallelism, 455, 734, 804, 997–99; free verse, 524; Hebraism, 598, 602, 603, 611, 1114, 1125, 1169; syntax, 807 paraphrase, heresy of, 999–1000, 1456, 1510–11 pararhyme, 299, 924–25, 973
Paraschos, Achilleas, 583
parataxis. See hypotaxis and parataxis
Parcerisas, Francesc, 213
Pardo y Aliaga, Felipe, 1028
Paredes, Americo, 227–28
parenthesis, 1000–1001
Parini, Giuseppe, 363, 736, 743, 744, 1204, 1516
parison. See isocolon and parison
Pariz un Viene (Bokher attrib.), 1547
Park, Josephine Nock-Hee, 93
Parker, Dorothy, 420, 1226
Parker, Pat, 798
Parker, Patricia, 1060
Parkes, Frank Kobina, 15

Parks, Suzan-Lori, 378, 380, 382
Parland, Henry, 491
Parliament of Fowls (Chaucer), 128, 225, 418, 432, 1026, 1193, 1194
Parmenides, 578, 708
Parnaso Antártico (Mexía de Fernengil), 153
Parnassianism, 5, 119, 131, 160, 161, 182, 202, 367, 512, 583, 1001, 1134, 1199, 1460, 1521
Parnassus (Emerson), 286 parody, 59, 121, 128, 476, 580, 717, 1001–3, 1256, 1271; liturgical, 812; pastiche vs., 1005; of stichomythia, 1359; of tagelied, 1408 paroemiac, 49, 1003
parole in libertà, 111, 157, 287, 334, 533–34, 798, 890, 1328 Parole sans lieu, La (Hubin), 133 paronomasia, 48, 62, 122, 1003–4
Parque Lezama (Perlongher), 82
Parra, Nicanor, 231, 232, 437, 882, 1347
Parra, Violeta, 231, 1347
Parry, Milman, 159, 502–3. See also oral-formulaic theory
Parry-Williams, T. H., 1536, 1538
Parse (Dworkin), 288
Parshchikov, Alexei, 1238
Parsits Paterazm (epic), 83
Parthasarathy, Rajagopal, 687, 1094
Partheneion (Alcman), 31
partimen, 1004–5
"Parting at Morning" (Browning), 29, 286
Partis pris des choses, Le (Ponge), 835
Part of Speech, A (Brodsky), 575
Partridge, Taqralik, 723
Parun, Vesna, 320
Parzival (Wolfram), 560, 860, 1533
Pasado en claro (Paz), 881
Pascal, Blaise, 123, 996, 1141, 1209
Pascal, Paul and Naomi, 375–76
Paschasius Radbertus, 397
Pascoaes, Teixeira de, 148, 1091, 1259
Pascoli, Giovanni, 649, 735, 736, 746, 747, 1203, 1516, 1543
Pašić, Mubera, 159
Pasolini, Pier Paolo, 747
Pasos, Joaquín, 946–47
Pasquier, Étienne, 110, 449, 1518
Passages (Duncan), 835, 1296
Passerat, Jean, 1521
"Passionate Shepherd to His Love, The" (Marlowe), 286, 303, 415
Passíusálmar (Hallgrímur), 654
Pasternak, Boris, 95, 534, 889, 925, 957, 1079, 1235–36, 1237 pastiche, 476, 1005; collage vs., 274; parody vs., 1002 Pastior, Oskar, 626, 987, 995 pastoral, 30, 167, 175, 351, 479, 627, 1005–8, 1054, 1291; idyll, 659; pathetic fallacy, 1009
Pastor fido, Il (Guarini), 605, 1007, 1160, 1453 pastourelle, 222, 508, 1008–9
Pater, Walter, 62, 293, 338, 424, 473, 487, 905, 1353; aestheticism, 10–11, 1216; imagination, 673; intensity, 711; naturalism, 919; objective correlative, 963; Pre-Raphaelites, 1103, 1215, 1234
Paterson (Williams), 244, 274, 373, 504, 783, 813, 835, 892, 1485–86, 1487–88, 1503
Paterson, Don, 1278 pathetic fallacy, 408, 1009–10, 1026 pathos, 128, 464, 1010
Patkanian, Raphael, 84
Patraquim, Luís Carlos, 19
Patria de sal cautiva (Cerruto), 154
"Patriarchal Poetry" (Stein), 481
Patrizi, Francesco, 1161 patronage, 788, 994, 1010–13, 1082. See also poet laureate pattern poetry. See calligramme; concrete poetry; technopaegnion; visual poetry
Patterson, A. B. ("Banjo"), 100
Paul (apostle), 134, 156, 485, 572, 598, 620, 1041; imitation, 676; xenoglossia, 1543
Paulding, James Kirke, 1483
Paulicéia desvairada (Andrade), 162
Paulin, Tom, 730
Paulinus of Aquileia, 790
Paulinus of Nola, 789, 994
"Paul Laurence Dunbar" (Carrothers), 21
"Paul Revere's Ride" (Longfellow), 491
Paul the Deacon, 790
Paul the Silentiary, 172, 350
Paumacariya (Vimalasūri), 1144 pause, 801, 802, 1013–14; caesura vs., 174
Pauvre Belgique (Baudelaire), 121
Pavese, Cesare, 747
Pavlov, Konstantin, 169
Pavlova, Karolina, 1233
Pavlović, Miodrag, 1295
Pavón, Pastora, 189
Paya, Ziya, 1473
payada, 1014–15
Payne, John, 492, 1522
Paysage, Le (Racine), 351
Pays où tout est permis, Le (Podolski), 133
Paz, Octavio, 595, 697, 772, 819, 880, 882, 947, 1238, 1345; poetic criticism, 1048; prose poem, 1113; renga, 1168; spontaneity, 1353; surrealism, 1347, 1379; translation, 1457
Paz Castillo, Fernardo, 1504
Pazos, Julio, 389
Pazzi, Alessandro, 1158
Peacham, Henry, 46, 647, 656, 677, 1553
Peacock, Thomas Love, 637, 1215
Pearl, 289, 384, 412
Pearse, Patrick, 370, 728–29
"Peblis to the Play" (anon.), 1274
Peckham, Morse, 1129
Pedaya, Haviva, 608
Peddana, 1419
Peder Paars (Holberg), 340, 954
Pedro, António, 1092
Pedroso, Regino, 203
Peele, George, 1007
Peer Gynt (Ibsen), 378, 908, 954
Péguy, Charles, 1514
Peich, Gioia and Michael, 938
Peichev, Ivan, 169
Peintres cubistes, Les (Apollinaire), 321
Peiper, Tadeusz, 1076
Peirce, Charles S., 719, 974, 1282, 1286, 1288; iconicity, 655, 656, 1172, 1324
Peire Cardenal, 967, 1464
Peire d'Alvernhe, 312, 967, 1464
Peire Vidal, 1464
Peking opera, 237
Peláez Sánchez, Juan, 1505
Pelegrinović, Mikša, 319
Pèlerinage de Charlemagne, 35, 1425
Peletier du Mans, Jacques, 110, 174, 510, 1031, 1042, 1043, 1161
Pell de brau, La (Espriu), 213
Pelléas et Mélisande (Maeterlinck), 1396
Pellicer, Carlos, 881, 1347
Pemberton, Henry, 433
Pembroke, Countess of. See Herbert, Mary Sidney
Penates, 549
Penderecki, Krzysztof, 398
Penev, Penyo, 169
penitential psalms, 414, 1015
Penn, Alexander, 607
Penna, Sandro, 623, 747
"Pensamientos en La Haban" (Lezama Lima), 204
"Penseroso, Il" (Milton), 286, 419, 618, 898, 965, 970, 1425, 1463; imitations of, 1291 pentameter, 4, 145, 147, 340, 434, 1015–16
penthemimer, 174, 1016
Peony Pavilion, The (Tang), 238
Pepel' (Bely), 1235
Pepper, Stephen, 1178
Peralta, Arturo and Alejandro, 1029
Peralta Barnuevo, Pedro de, 1027
Percy, Thomas, 54, 116, 117, 421, 1210, 1224, 1292
Perdomo, Willie, 962
Pere (Catalan poet), 211
Perec, Georges, 809, 900, 987, 993
Pere de Queralt, 211
Perednik, Jorge Santiago, 1545, 1546
Pereira de Castro, Gabriel, 466
Pereleshin, Valerii, 974
Perelman, Bob, 1494
Pere Quart (pseud. of Joan Oliver), 213
Péret, Benjamin, 1378
Peretz, I. L., 1548
Pérez, Floridor, 231
Pérez, José Joaquín, 201
Pérez Bonalde, Juan Antonio, 1504
Pérez de Guzmán, Fernán, 186
Pérez de Villegrá, Gaspar de, 227
Pérez de Zambrana, Luisa, 201
Pérez Perdomo, Francisco, 1505
Perez-Wendt, Mahealani, 1085

performance, 1016–20, 1494; avant-garde, 111, 515; cowboy poetry, 315; Dada, 334; flyting, 493; hip-hop, 632–33; poetry reading, 1068–70; recitation, 1149–50; recording technology, 1414, 1415
Peri Bathous (Pope), 61, 128
Peri hypsous (Longinus attrib.). See On the Sublime period, 1020
periphrasis, 59, 225, 442, 1020–21
Peristephanon (Prudentius), 1154
Perk, Jacques, 1408
Perloff, Marjorie, 90, 966, 1057, 1063, 1087
Perlongher, Néstor, 81–82, 927, 1064, 1347, 1546
"Permanence in Change" (Goethe), 1035
Perr, Andri, 1388
Perrault, Charles, 929, 960, 1141
Perronet, Edward, 646
Perros y antiperros (Elizondro), 228
Pers, Ciro di, 847
Persae (Aeschylus), 261
Perse, Saint-John, 41, 57, 197, 199, 516, 892, 1113, 1514
Persephone (Gide), 336
Persian Eclogues (Collins), 471
Persian poetry, 75, 140, 781, 1021–24, 1136, 1200, 1227; divan, 371; ghazal, 570, 571, 817; masnavī, 849
Persians, The (Aeschylus), 470, 579, 781, 1398, 1448, 1449
Persians, The (Timotheus), 580
Persian Song of Hafiz, A (Jones), 471
Persiles (Cervantes), 124
"Persimmons" (Lee), 92
Persius, 1040, 1150, 1257
persona, 898, 1024–25, 1526 personification, 37, 38, 443, 647, 670, 827, 1025–27; pathetic fallacy, 1009–10; prosopopoeia, 1121
"Personism: A Manifesto" (O'Hara), 542, 940
Persuasion (Austen), 957
Perttunen, Arhippa, 488
Peru, poetry of, 200, 1027–30; indigenous, 694–95, 1027, 1344, 1346
Perucho, Joan, 213
Pessanha, Camilo, 1091
Pessoa, Fernando, 161, 181, 450, 542, 627, 891, 1025, 1091, 1259, 1322
Peter of Blois, 790
Peters, Lenrie, 15
Petersen, Nis, 346
Peterson, Kristjan Jaak, 460
Petites Légendes (Carême), 132
"Petites Vieilles, Les" (Baudelaire), 1516
Petits poèmes en prose (Baudelaire), 513, 1112
Petőfi, Sándor, 642, 1220
Petrarca spirituale, Il (Malipiero), 303
Petrarch, 9, 26, 103, 156, 303, 443, 633, 678, 838, 857–58, 910, 959, 1163, 1304; address, 7; anadiplosis, 48; antithesis, 58; apostrophe, 61; borrowings from, 1030; canzone, 190; canzoniere, 191, 289; capitolo, 191; Ciceronianism, 249; classicism, 264; Dolce stil nuovo, 375; eclogue, 386, 1007, 1165; epic, 1164; epideixis, 449; imitation, 679, 740, 1161; invective, 723; Italian poetry, 739–40, 741; Italian prosody, 736; landscape, 782; Latin poetry, 791, 1165; love lyric, 817; lyric sequence, 834–35, 913, 1165; Muses, 902; nature, 921; pastoral, 1007; philosophy, 1037; poetic calling, 1050, 1066; poet laureate, 1064; polysyndeton, 1088; proem, 1109; psalm, 599; sonnet (see sonnet, Petrarchan); terza rima, 736, 1423; translation, 153, 416, 1031; vernacular, 1163; verse epistle, 1513
Petrarchism, 127, 146, 153, 200, 211, 291, 312, 375, 739, 741, 742, 834–35, 844, 879, 905, 1030–32, 1163–64, 1166; baroque, 122; colonial poetics, 278–79; conceit, 289, 290; correlative verse, 307; dizain, 372; England, 414, 416; France, 510, 1043; imagery, 663; lover's complaints, 286; oxymoron, 988; paradox, 996; Portugal, 1088, 1089; sonnet sequence, 1321, 1322; Spain, 1336
Petri, György, 643
Petriada (Kantemir), 1229
Petronius, 53, 257, 445, 786, 787, 1115, 1257, 1510
Petrov, Avvakum, 125
Petrović, Veljko, 1295
Petrus Helias, 852–53
Petruslied (hymn), 559
Petsinis, Tom, 102
Petty, William, 157
Pétursson, Hannes, 655
Petzold, Alfons, 105
Pexegueiro, Alfonso, 538
Peyre, Henri, 1308
Pfister, Oskar, 572
Pflanzl, Otto, 104
Phaedrus, 476, 788
Phaer, Thomas, 628
Phainomena (Aratus), 581
phalaecean, 1032
Phan Khôi, 1520
phanopoeia, 862
Phantasus (Holz), 920
Pharonnida (Chamberlayne), 624
Pharsalia (Lucan), 257
Phèdre (Racine), 94
Phelan, James, 226, 997
Phelps, Anthony, 183, 200
Philes, Manuel, 172
Philip, Marlene NourbeSe, 483, 1062, 1094
Philippe de Beaumanoir, 859
Philippide, Alexandru, 1206
Philippines, poetry of the, 114, 279, 1032–33. See also Filipino American poetry
Philips, John, 557
Philips, Katherine, 419, 797, 871, 1026, 1052
Philip Sparrow (Skelton), 397, 398, 414, 812
Phillips, Carl, 24–25, 337
Phillips, Stephen, 378
Phillips, Tom, 158
Philo, 468
Philoctète, René, 200
Philoctetes (Sophocles), 1449
Philodemus of Gadara, 255, 257
Philo Judaeus, 959
Philolaus, 369
Philo of Alexandria, 619 philosophy and poetry, 1033–38, 1071, 1072, 1214–15; belief, 134–37; hermeneutics, 618–22
"Philosophy of Composition, The" (Poe), 1396
Philostratus, 656, 668, 886
Philoxenus, 371
Phoebammon, 225
Phoenix Nest, The (anthol.), 54, 415 phonestheme, 1038–39, 1324
Phonlachan, Assani, 1431
Phormis, 282
Phrynichos, 1447, 1448, 1449
Phumisak, Chit, 1431
Physiologus, 138, 411
Picabia, Francis, 504, 1378
Picasso, Pablo, 38, 56, 321, 514, 992, 1488
Pichardo Moya, Felipe, 203
Pichler, Caroline, 104
Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni, 600, 668, 669, 740, 1163
"Picture Bride" (Song), 92
Picture of Dorian Gray, The (Wilde), 11, 634, 692
Pictures from Breughel (Williams), 1488
Pictures of the Floating World (Lowell), 594 picturesque, 782, 783
Pieces (Creeley), 835
"Piedra de Sol" (Paz), 881 pie quebrado, 1039
Piercy, Marge, 482
Pier delle Vigne, 1304, 1422
Piers Plowman (Langland), 37, 384, 412, 413, 432, 558, 911, 1026, 1155
Pieterse, Cosmo, 14
Pietri, Pedro, 961, 962
Pietro, Magister, 173
Piferrer, Pau, 212
Pigman, G. W., 398
Pigments (Damas), 16, 198
Pigna, Giambattista, 445
Pignatari, Décio, 162, 294, 557, 950
Pike, Kenneth, 733
Pilgrim's Progress (Bunyan), 37, 384
Pilinszky, János, 645
Pills to Purge Melancholy (D'Urfey), 799
Pimentel, Luis, 538
Pinciano, Alonso, 1158
Pindar, 253, 261, 333, 368, 410, 448, 449, 450, 453, 582; choral lyrics, 245, 579–80; hymn fragments, 645; lipogram, 809; lyric, 826, 829; ode, 966, 971, 972, 1154; paean, 990; patronage, 1011; political poetry, 1080–81; priamel, 1107

Pindarique Odes (Cowley), 972
Pindemonte, Ippolito, 744
Piñera, Virgilio, 205, 206
Piṅgaḷi Sūranna, 1419–20
Pinsky, Robert, 304, 326, 873–74, 1018, 1065, 1243, 1493
Pinthus, Kurt, 567
Piombino, Nick, 941
Pipa ji (Gao), 237
Pirandello, Luigi, 898
Piriou, Yann-Ber, 165
Piron, Alexis, 451, 970, 1460
Pirotte, Jean-Claude, 133
Pisan Cantos, The (Pound), 1013, 1486
Pisarev, Dmitrii, 1233
Piscatoriae (Sannazaro), 791–92
Pisides, George, 171, 172
Pitaloka, Rieke Diah, 703
Pītambara Dāsa, 93 pitch, 385, 524, 1039–40
Pitchamurthy, N., 1411
Piva, Roberto, 163
Pizarnik, Alejandra, 81, 1347
Pjatigorskij, Aleksandr, 1362
Place, Vanessa, 292
Plácido (Gabriel de la Concepción Valdés), 201, 204 plagiarism, 982, 983; allusion vs., 42 plain style, 99, 415, 1040–41, 1164, 1405
Planchart, Enrique, 1504
Planck, Max, 1269
planctus, 1041–42
planh, 1042
Planudes, Maximus, 476; anthology, 53, 449, 575
Plat, Hugh, 415
Platelis, Kornelijus, 811
Platen, August von, 31, 244, 565, 571, 1254, 1320
Plath, Sylvia, 42, 77, 167, 270, 426, 898, 1053, 1491; address, 7; confessional poetry, 296, 482, 1096
Platner, Ernst, 667, 672
Plato, 52, 87, 134, 215, 256, 257, 404, 468, 531, 580, 743, 815, 990, 991, 1057, 1324, 1413; allegory, 629; criticism, 317; dance, 335; decorum, 341; dialect, 355; dialogue, 357; form, 497; furor poeticus, 531–32, 1059, 1111, 1126, 1503; hermeneutics, 619; Homer critique, 443, 445; iconicity, 975; imagery, 662, 665; imitation, 349, 443, 676, 677, 1160–61; inspiration, 709; intuition, 719–20; irony, 731; madness typology, 1057, 1058; medieval poetics, 854; mimesis, 633, 667, 668, 884–85, 886, 1171; Muses, 902; nature, 920–21; number, 958; poetry critique, 253–54, 258, 349, 388, 479, 618, 633, 667, 1033–34, 1036, 1057, 1059, 1060, 1071, 1145, 1146, 1150; poiēsis, 1071, 1072; rhetoric, 1177, 1178; tragedy, 1447; unity, 1496
"Plato's Pharmacy" (Derrida), 665
Plautus, 6, 9, 49, 189, 256, 262, 316, 377, 581, 725, 883, 1519; comedy, 282, 283, 787; ithyphallic, 749; octonarius, 970; paraclausithyron, 996; paroemiac, 1003; tragicomedy, 1453; trochaic, 1462
Playa sola (Girri), 81
Playnet, Marcelin, 1365
Plays for Dancers (Yeats), 378, 380
"Pleasures of the Imagination" (Addison), 669 Pleasures of the Imagination, The (Akenside), 421, 669–70, 931
"Pledge" (Brown), 288
Pléiade, 75, 79, 91, 119, 223, 265, 340, 454, 509, 510, 1042–43, 1163, 1518; blason, 151; canzone, 190; classical meters, 1518; dizain, 372; as Dutch influence, 820; ode, 972; rich rhyme, 1199; terza rima, 1423; trimètre, 1460; triolet, 1460
Plekhanov, Georgii, 1233
Pleurs, Les (Desbordes-Valmore), 512
Pleynet, Marcelin, 1418
Plisnier, Charles, 131
Plivačica (Dizdar), 159
ploce, 1043–44, 1086, 1087
Plomer, William, 1331 plot, 82, 707, 928, 1044–46
Plotinus, 134, 258, 295, 388, 667–68, 854, 921
Plumly, Stanley, 874, 1493
Plutarch, 52, 123, 253, 258, 637, 662, 996, 1060, 1501
Plutus (Aristophanes), 282, 580
Pluzhnyk, Yevhen, 1475
Pobre barquilla mia (Lope de Vega), 410
Pocaraca Panditar, 1356
Poch, John, 328
Podbevšek, Anton, 535
Podolski, Sophie, 133
Podsiadło, Jacek, 1077
Poe, E. A., 6, 109, 224, 286, 298, 363, 433, 623, 1052, 1058, 1455, 1484; alliteration, 40; close rhyme, 269; decadence, 338; gender, 545; as influence, 1345, 1396; intensity, 711; lyric, 832; music, 905, 1067; nature of poem, 1047; phonestheme, 1039; psychoanalytic studies of, 1127, 1128; pure poetry, 1134; quintain, 1142; refrain, 1152; repetition, 1169, 1170; romanticism, 1216, 1221, 1223; space, 1332; translations, 513, 1234, 1397; variable foot, 1503 poem, 1046–48. See also poetry
Poema de Chile (Mistral), 231
Poema del cante jondo (García Lorca), 189
Poema del Cid (anon.), 188, 471, 858, 912, 1333–34
Poema en veinte surcos (Burgos), 206
Poema gory (Tsvetaeva), 1235
"Poema konca" (Gnedov), 535
Poemas & Hibridos (Atxaga), 127
Poemas de una sola angustia (Incháustegui), 205–6
Poemas exactos a mí misma (Burgos), 206
Poemas Lusitanos (Ferreira), 1089
Poemas mapuches en castellano (Queupul), 845
Poema sujo (Gullar), 163
Poemas y antipoemas (Parra), 231, 1347
"Poem beginning 'The'" (Zukofsky), 504
"Poem by the Bridge at Ten-Shin" (Pound), 241
Poème et la langue, Le (Thiry), 132
Poèmes de l'Amérique étrangère (Schendel), 183
Poèmes de métro (Jouet), 987–88
Poèmes saturniens (Verlaine), 513
Poemo de Utnoa (Montagut), 457
Poem of the Mountain (Tsvetaeva), 1235
Poems (Ibsen), 954
Poems and Ballads (Swinburne), 492, 1348
Poems for the Millennium (Rothenberg, ed.), 54
Poems to Lisi (Quevedo), 289
Poesia Pau-Brasil (Andrade), 59, 162
Poésies nationales (Coicou), 197 poésie sonore. See sound poetry poet, 1048–51, 1058, 1071, 1232, 1273; autonomy, 106–8, 112, 1061, 1066; biography, 140–43; emotion, 404–5; sensibility, 1292; as vates, 1503–4; voice, 1525
"Poet, The" (Emerson), 670, 831–32, 1051, 1216, 1353, 1455
Poeta en Nueva York (García Lorca), 835, 1340 poète maudit, 130, 132, 1051, 1058
Poètes maudits, Les (Verlaine), 1051
Poetess, 1051–54, 1483–84, 1485
Poética (Luzán), 943, 1211, 1339, 1348
Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e sposta (Castelvetro), 1158 poetic artifice. See artifice, poetic poetic contests, 97, 114, 127, 212, 245, 282, 577, 1054–56; bouts-rimés, 160; cancionero/cancioneiro, 185–86; eisteddfod, 393; gai saber, 537; poetry slam, 1070; troubadour, 968; Wartburgkrieg, 1533 poetic diction. See diction
"Poetic Diction" (Hopkins), 90 poetic drama. See dramatic poetry
Poetic Edda (Snorri), 389, 390
Poetices libri septem (Scaliger), 452, 677, 1158 poetic function, 803–6, 1046, 1056–57 poetic license, 1057, 1406 poetic madness, 1057–58, 1126, 1178–79, 1224. See also furor poeticus
"Poetic Principle, The" (Poe), 1134
Poetics. See Aristotle
poetics, Western, 1058–64; canon, 186–88 poetic space. See space, poetic poetic syntax. See syntax, poetic poetic tone. See tone

Poet in New York (García Lorca), 835, 1340
Poetischer Trichter (Harsdörffer), 124
Poetiske Skrifter (Oehlenschläger), 345 poet laureate, 968, 1011, 1055, 1964–65
Poet Lied, The (Ofeimun), 14
Poetria nova (Geoffrey of Vinsauf), 317, 678, 853, 1110, 1179 poetry, 1065–68; definitions of, 89, 676, 677, 982, 1525
Poetry (magazine), 21, 556, 674, 963, 964, 1013, 1486
"Poetry" (Moore), 891, 1488
Poetry and Drama (Eliot), 379
"Poetry: A Note in Ontology" (Ransom), 1490 poetry reading, 1017–18, 1068–70 poetry slam, 874–75, 879, 961, 962, 1022, 1070, 1324, 1494 poetry therapy. See therapy and poetry
Poet's Calendar, The (Longfellow), 175
Poggioli, Renato, 112
poiēsis, 1070–72, 1171 point of view. See persona; plot; voice
Poirier, Richard, 136, 365
Poirters, Adriaen, 821
Polain, Marcella, 102
Polák, Milota Zdirad, 1361
Poland, poetry of, 125, 150, 1072–78
Polemo-Middinia (Drummond), 837
Polezhaev, Alexander, 1232
Polgar, Alfred, 1113
Polifemo (Góngora), 123, 1339
Politian (pseud. of Agnolo Ambrogini), 91, 530, 556, 736, 740–41, 986, 1030 political verse, 51–52, 1078–79 politics and poetry, 1079–83
Politis, Nikolaos, 583
Poliziano, Angelo. See Politian
Pollard, Peggy, 306
Pollard, Velma, 196
Pollarolo, Giovanna, 1030
Pollitt, Katha, 1494
Pollock, Jackson, 32, 287
Polo, Gaspar Gil, 1007
Polonsky, Yakov, 1233
Polotsky, Simeon, 125, 1229
Polwart (Sir Patrick Hume), 493
Polydouri, Maria, 584
Polynesian poetry, 1083–86
polyptoton, 58, 1086–87
polysemy, 32, 168, 1087–88; ambiguity vs., 44; indeterminacy vs., 682 polysyndeton, 97–98, 1088
Poma de Ayala, Felipe Guamân, 694, 1027, 1344
Pombo, Rafael, 274
Ponce, Javier, 389
Pondal y Abente, Eduardo, 538
Ponge, Francis, 516, 707, 835, 887, 1113, 1414, 1418
Pongpaiboon, Naowarat, 1431
Poniatowski, Stanisław August, 1073
Ponna, 767
Pontano, Giovanni, 451, 646, 740, 791, 972
Ponte, Antonio José, 206
Pont-Sainte-Maxence, Guernes de, 1142
Pontus de Tyard. See Tyard
"Poor Mailie's Elegy" (Burns), 1275
"Poor Omie" (ballad), 116
Popa, Vasko, 1295
Popdimitrov, Emanuil, 169
Pope, Alexander, 297, 304, 316, 351, 357, 363, 385, 420, 421, 450, 634, 668, 829, 904, 1052, 1080, 1171, 1291, 1352; allegory, 40; alliteration, 41; allusion, 43; anadiplosis, 48; anticlimax, 57; antithesis, 59; aposiopesis, 61; bathos, 128; broken rhyme, 166; cacophony, 173; caesura, 174; canto, 190; classicism, 265; concision, 293; couplet, 421; demotion, 344; elision, 1405; ellipsis, 400; end-stopped line, 410; English prosody, 433, 434; epic, 420; epitaph, 451; euphony, 465; on genius, 550, 928; genre, 552; heroic couplet, 310, 624, 625, 913, 914; hiatus, 629; imagery, 664; invention, 724; landscape, 782; litotes, 811; mock epic/mock heroic, 446, 889, 913, 1002, 1204; monologue, 898; neoclassical poetics, 929, 933; number, 958; parody, 1002; phonestheme, 1039; plain style, 1041; ploce, 1043; poetic knowledge, 772; poetics, 1060; punctuation, 1131; rhyme, 1188; rhythmic figures, 1198; sapphic, 1254; satire, 1256, 1257; sound, 1324, 1325–26; syllepsis, 1391; synaloepha, 1399; translation, 145, 420, 1456; verse epistle, 1513; verse paragraph, 1514; on wit, 1539; zeugma, 1553
Pope, John C., 878
Pope, Quentin, 942–43
Poplavsky, Boris, 1238
Popol Vuh, 279, 280, 587, 691, 696–97, 698
Popova, Liubov, 111 popular ballad. See broadside ballad
Poradeci, Lasgush, 30
Porphyrius, Publius Optatianus, 208, 1417
Porphyry, 39, 258, 350, 854
Porson's bridge, 165, 166, 1424
Porson's law, 261
Porta, Antonio, 748
Porta, Carlo, 744
Portal, Magda, 1029
Porter, Dorothy, 102
Porter, Peter, 102
Porto Alegre, Manuel Araújo, 161
"Portrait of a Lady" (Eliot), 891, 1487
Portugal, poetry of, 1088–92; Africa, 17–19; al-Andalus, 27–29; Évora critics, 466–67; Galicia, 537–40
Posada, Dina and Emma, 401
Posidonius, 120, 217, 341, 1503
"Poslednii poet" (Baratynsky), 1232
Possolo, Francisca de Paula, 1090 postcolonial poetics, 151, 712, 833, 1092–95, 1096; Africa, 13, 16, 18, 19, 433; antropofagia, 59–60; autotelic, 109–10; colonial poetics, 278, 280; cultural studies, 325; evaluation, 465; feminist writing, 483; primitivism, 1108; xenoglossia, 1543–44
Posthumous Fragments of Margaret Nicholson (Shelley), 506 postmodernism, 485, 1062–63, 1095–97, 1103; glossolalia, 573; intertextuality, 717; irony, 733; poststructuralism vs., 1099; primitivism, 1108; speech act theory, 1350; sublime, 1374; wit, 1540 postromanticism, 1215–16
poststructuralism, 304, 500, 622, 673, 711, 721, 992, 1062–63, 1097–1100, 1241, 1305; ambiguity, 44; anti-intentionalism, 712; aporia, 60; appreciation, 62; belief, 135–36; connotation, 299; écriture, 387; emotion, 404; explication, 473; feminist poets, 483; historicism, 635; imitation, 679; indeterminacy, 682; nature, 921; organicism, 981; paradox, 997; primitivism, 1108; semantics, 1284; signifier, 1367; sincerity, 1308; sublime, 1374; textuality, 1429; voice, 1526
"pós-tudo" (Campos), 162
Potebnya, A. A., 1235
Potiki, Brian, 942, 1085
Potiki, Roma, 942, 1085
Potocki, Wacław, 1073
Pot of Earth (MacLeish), 56
Poulet, Georges, 548, 549
poulter's meaure, 120, 432, 1100; fourteener, 504
Pound, Ezra, 5, 21, 38, 41, 82, 88, 93, 111, 229, 252, 286, 287, 294, 322, 358, 365, 367–68, 505, 531, 625, 660, 719, 833, 835, 862, 905, 1006, 1013, 1058, 1095, 1108, 1418, 1486, 1490; alba, 30; alliterative accentual meter, 873–74; allusion, 35; anthropology, 56, 57; avant-garde, 424–25; ballade, 119; biography, 142, 143; cadence, 173; caesura, 174; canto, 190; charm, 224; classicism, 263; concision, 294; didacticism, 364; ellipsis, 400; English prosody, 433; evaluation, 466; expatriatism, 1486; found poetry, 504; fragments, 506; free verse, 522; Georgianism critique, 556; haiku, 594, 675, 757, 818, 1486; hermeticism, 623; hieroglyphs, 630; history, 638;

Pound, Ezra (continued)
hybrid poetry, 645; on iambic, 653; ideogram, 659; image, 659, 660–61, 664; imagism, 373, 450, 674–75, 1524; imitation, 679; as influence, 81, 145, 162, 163, 179, 425, 898, 950, 1492; information, 706–7; legacy of, 892; long poem, 813, 892, 911; macaronic, 837; metonymy, 876; modernism, 424–25, 447, 536, 546, 890, 891, 892, 893, 901, 1096; muse, 902; myth, 909; Nō, 949; objective correlative, 963; objectivism, 964; occasional verse, 966; open form, 975; originality, 981–83; parataxis, 650; performance, 1017; persona, 1025; poem, nature of, 1047, 1324; politics, 1079, 1080, 1081; primitivism, 1108; radiophonic medium, 1414; on reader, 1146; redondilla, 1151; rhyme, 1187; on rhythm, 1332; ring composition, 1202; sapphic, 1254; scansion, 1261; science, 1268, 1269; sestina, 1297; split lines, 1351; symbolism, 1395; syntax, 1405; tradition, 1445; translation, 241, 1457–58, 1511; troubadour, 967; visual poetry, 1416; vorticism, 535, 1527
Pour en finir avec le jugement de Dieu (Artaud), 1414
Poussin, Nicolas, 991, 992, 1500
Poveda, José Manuel, 202
Powys, J. C., 598
Poydras de Lalande, Julien, 517
Pozo Garza, Luz, 538
Prado, Adélia, 163
Prado, Pedro, 230
Praga, Emilio, 745
Prague school, 804, 805, 1116, 1241, 1288, 1361–62
Prahlāda Caritra (Saraswatī), 93
"Prairies, The" (Bryant), 783
"Praise in Summer" (Wilbur), 1491
Praise of Folly, The (Erasmus), 410, 957, 996, 1162, 1255, 1256, 1539 praise song, 14, 1081, 1082. See also epideictic poetry Prakrit poetry, 1100–1101
Prakrit prosody, 687–89
Pramil (pseud. of Dharmu Sivaram), 1411
Prasad, Jaishankar, 687
Pratinas, 1446
Pratt, A. V., 77
Pratt, E. J., 178
Pratt, Mary Louise, 1350
Prayer to Spider Woman/Rezo a la Mujer Araña (Rosaldo), 229
Preciado, Antonio, 389
préciosité, 160, 1101–2
Preface to a Twenty-Volume Suicide Note (Baraka), 23, 131 pregunta, 185, 1102
Preil, Gabriel, 608
Prelude, The (Wordsworth), 51, 141, 147, 293, 304, 351, 422, 436, 447, 478, 484, 667, 668, 671, 911, 913, 914, 1050, 1145, 1150, 1220, 1222, 1223, 1414
"Preludes" (Eliot), 1487
"Preludio al Mamoré" (Bustamante), 153
Preparatory Meditations (Taylor), 353, 835, 1481
Preradović, Petar, 320, 993
Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, 75, 424, 1102–3, 1215, 1345
Pre-Raphaelitism, 10, 338, 492, 493, 1103–4, 1215, 1234 preromanticism, 265, 550, 783, 1104–5, 1219, 1231, 1368 presence, 1105–7
Preslavski, Konstantin, 167
Preti, Girolamo, 847
Prévert, Jacques, 198
Prežeren, France, 1312
Prezzolini, Giuseppe, 747 priamel, 1107–8
priapea, 1108
Price-Mars, Jean, 197
Priestley, Joseph, 667, 670
Prigov, Dmitrii, 1238
Primer for Black Folks (Brooks), 23
Primero sueño (Cruz), 121, 880, 1344
Primer romancero gitano (García Lorca), 1340 primitivism, 55, 56, 60, 161, 203, 334–35, 471, 474, 763, 1105, 1108–9, 1223, 1291
Prince, Alan, 495, 547, 548
Prince, The (Machiavelli), 1179
Princess, The (Tennyson), 912, 1414
Príncipe de naipes (Rojas), 231
Pringle, Thomas, 1330
print technology. See typography
Prior, Matthew, 799, 970
Priscian, 1403
Pritam, Amrita, 1133
Pritchett, Patrick, 812
Privat, Edmond, 457
Proba, 220, 789
Problem of "Hamlet", The (Robertson), 963 procedural poetry. See aleatory poetics; conceptual poetry; Oulipo proceleusmatic, 1109
Proclus, 258, 619, 645, 668, 886
Proctor, Thomas, 54
Prodiges ordinaires, Les (Schmitz), 133
Prodromos, Theodore, 171–72
proem, 34, 221, 440, 447, 1109
Proença, Helder, 19
Proglas kâm Evangelieto (Konstantine), 167
"Prohibition, The" (Donne), 438 projective verse, 173, 964, 975, 1018, 1109–10, 1492, 1524
"Projective Verse" (Olson), 145, 287, 710, 1269, 1524
Prokopovich, Feofan, 933, 1229, 1477
Prologos (Albinus), 619
"Promenade de trois morts" (Crémazie), 181
Promenoir magique (Pirotte), 133
Prometheida, La (Tamayo), 154
"Prometheus" (Byron), 1414
Prometheus Unbound (Shelley), 270, 363, 908, 909, 1220, 1268, 1414 promotion, 1110
Pronouns, The (Mac Low), 33
pronunciation, 1110–11, 1180; Great Vowel Shift, 95, 1184, 1189
Propertius, 35, 53, 123, 262, 369, 397, 451, 470, 788, 817, 897, 1011, 1159
"Prophet, The" (Pushkin), 1232 prophetic poetry, 1111–12, 1291
Propp, Vladimir, 1239, 1362
Prosas profanas (Darío), 202, 698, 945–46, 1345
Prose della volgar lingua (Bembo), 249, 741, 1159
Prose du Transsibérien et de la petite Jehanne de France (Cendrars), 515, 1414
Prose Edda (Snorri), 389–90
"Prose of Departure" (Merrill), 592 prose poem, 322, 392, 513, 514, 516, 1057, 1112–13, 1120, 1396, 1511–12, 1516 prose rhythm, 1113–15, 1508 prosimetrum, 223, 236, 237, 787, 858, 1115–16, 1509–10 prosodic feature analysis of verse, 1116–17
prosody, 1117–20, 1515. See also meter; rhythm; sound Prosopopéia (Teixeira), 160, 1089 prosopopoeia, 61, 350, 897, 1026, 1120–21, 1145 protest poetry, 143–44, 1121–22, 1532
Prothalamion (Spenser), 452, 972, 1152, 1316
Proust, Marcel, 130, 680
Provençal poetry. See Occitan poetry proverb, 14, 15, 1122–23, 1152
"Proverb from Winfrid's Time," 558
Prudentius, 29, 31, 39, 49, 91, 353, 445, 646, 679, 789, 791, 812, 857, 919, 1154
Prufrock and Other Observations (Eliot), 425, 1487
Prynne, J. H., 426, 1270
Prys, Edmwnd, 1536, 1550
Przyboś, Julian, 1076
psalm, 1, 140, 223, 251, 353, 599, 603, 856, 971, 1123–24, 1154; penitential, 414, 1015
Psalm 23, 603, 998, 999, 1124, 1165
Psalm 51, 415, 1015
Psalm 130, 14, 1015
psalms, metrical, 119, 120, 599, 1015, 1124–25, 1142, 1165 pseudo-statement, 403, 1000, 1125–26
Pshavela, Vazha (pseud. of Luka Razikashvili), 555 Psyche (Tighe), 728 psychoanalytic psychology, 622, 1045–46, 1096, 1126–28, 1170, 1240; poststructuralism, 1098, 1099; surrealism, 1377, 1378, 1379 psychology and poetry, 1126–31; affect, 11, 12; archetype, 76–77; primitivism, 1108; therapy, 1434–35. See also emotion

Psychomachia (Prudentius), 39, 445
Puchmayer, Antonín Jaroslav, 331
Puerto Rican Obituary (Pietri), 961
Puerto Rico, poetry of, 194, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 206, 482; Nuyorican, 356, 960–62
Pugliese, Giacomino, 1304
Puhiwahine, Rihi, 941
Pujol, Joan, 212
Pujol, Susana, 1546
Pulci, Bernardino, 1007
Pulci, Luigi, 299, 736, 740, 742, 860, 986, 1164
Pule, John Puhiatau, 1086
Pulter, Hester, 354
Pulver, Max, 1386
pun. See paronomasia punctuation, 1120, 1131–32
Punjabi poetry, 631, 1132–34
Pupačić, Josip, 320
Puraṃdaradāsa, 767
Purāṇas, 93, 630
Purcell, Henry, 51
Purdy, Al, 179
Pure Love at a Seaside Spa (Norwid), 150 pure poetry, 203, 764, 1134–35
Purgatorio (Dante), 264, 374, 735, 739, 1071
Purgatorio (Zurita), 232
Purser, John T., 133
Puschmann, Adam, 861
Pushkin, Alexander, 90, 139, 149–50, 252, 378, 506, 522, 534, 957; genius, 1220; grammatical rhyme, 575; hexameter, 628; iambic tetrameter, 1425; octave, 969; Onegin stanza, 553, 912, 913, 958, 974, 1138, 1358; ottava rima, 986; romanticism, 1217, 1221; Russian poetry, 1231, 1232, 1233, 1234, 1235, 1236, 1237, 1238, 1239; translations of, 1456, 1457
Pusterla, Fabio, 1387
Putatevanar, 1356
Puttenham, George, 59, 61, 210, 225, 251, 268, 289, 311, 449, 651, 1166; courtly makers, 312–13; eclogue, 386; feigning, 479; heroic couplet, 624; history, 637; hyperbaton, 648, 1403; hyperbole, 648; imagination, 668; imitation, 677; lyric, 827; meiosis, 860; metalepsis, 862; palindrome, 993; ploce, 1043; poetics, 1060–61, 1071, 1159; pronunciation, 1111; punctuation, 1131; quintain, 1142; scansion, 1260; Skeltonic, 1309; visual poetry, 1523; zeugma, 1553
Puvis de Chavannes, Pierre, 1397
Pye, Henry James, 1065 pyrrhic, 1135
pythiambic, 1135

Qabbānī, Nizār, 70
Qammaan Bulxan, 1313
Qandil, Fatma, 392
Qarṭājanni, Ḥāzim al-, 28, 64, 69
qaṣīda, 28, 68, 605, 1021, 1023, 1136, 1228, 1380, 1498; monorhyme, 898, 1183
"Qaṣīdat al-Burdah" (al-Būṣīrī), 353, 391
Qian Qianyi, 1301
Qin Zihao, 233
qiṭʿa, 1021, 1136–37
qu, 236, 240
Quad (Beckett), 381
quantity, 250–51, 260, 417, 628, 875, 1114, 1137–38
Quarles, Francis, 449, 574, 599
Quartermain, Meredith, 180
Quasha, George, 463
Quasimodo, Salvatore, 623, 891
quatorzain, 1138
quatrain, 397, 969, 1138–39, 1227; Omar Khayyám, 973–74
Qubaneishvili, Kote, 555
Qudāma ibn Jaʿfar, 63, 1183
Quechua poetry, 690, 693–95, 1027, 1344
"Queen Mab" (Shelley), 1268 queer poetry, 11, 202, 365–66, 483, 1002, 1044–45, 1139–41
Quejas (Veintimilla), 388
Queneau, Raymond, 32, 198, 288, 900, 987, 1271, 1378
Quental, Antero de, 1091, 1319 querelle des anciens et des modernes, 265, 678, 928, 1060–61, 1141–42
querelle des femmes, 545, 1204
Quessep, Giovanni, 276
"Qu'est-ce pour nous mon coeur . . ." (Rimbaud), 527–28
Queupul, Sebastián, 695, 845
Quevedo, Francisco de, 26, 123, 124, 160, 289, 388, 880, 927, 1166; conceptismo, 291; letrilla, 798; metaphysical poetry, 871; Petrarchism, 1031; sonnet sequence, 1321; Spanish poetry, 1337, 1338, 1339
Quevedo Castel-Branco, Vasco Mouzinho de, 1089
Queyras, Sina, 180
Quezada, Jaime, 231
Quiché poetry, 587, 589, 696–97
Quilaqueo, Anselmo, 845
Quino, Humberto, 154
Quiñónez, Delia, 588
quintain, 1142, 1389
Quintilian, 122, 225, 249–50, 268, 341, 636, 718, 1509, 1543; allegory, 38; amplification, 46; antimetabole, 58; antonomasia, 59; aposiopesis, 60, 61; apostrophe, 61; asyndeton, 97, 1088; belief, 134; catachresis, 210, 664; classical poetics, 256, 257, 258; dance, 336; description, 349; diaeresis, 354; enargeia, 409; figura, 485, 1263; hiatus, 629; hyperbaton, 648; hyperbole, 648; icon, 656, 975; imagery, 662; imagination, 668; imitation, 677; invention, 724, 725, 1176; irony, 731, 732; meiosis, 860; metalepsis, 862; metaphor, 864, 866; metonymy, 876; number, 958; performance, 1017; periphrasis, 1020; ploce, 1043; polysyndeton, 1088; pronunciation, 1110; prosopopoeia, 1121; rhetoric, 1161, 1176, 1179, 1180; rhyme-prose, 1193; satire, 1256, 1257; scheme, 1263–64; syntax, 1404; trope, 863, 1463–64; zeugma, 1553 quintilla, 184, 1142–43
Quirini, Giovanni, 374
Quirós, Manuel José de, 587
Quita, Reis, 1090
Qutadgu Bilig (Yusuf), 1467
Qu Yuan, 246–47, 530, 675, 1154, 1298

Raab, Esther, 607
Raage Ugaas Warfaa, 1313
"Rabbi Ben Ezra" (Browning), 423
Rabelais, François, 44, 363, 509, 957, 1162, 1510
Rabikovich, Dahlia, 608
Rabinal Achí, 587, 697
Raboni, Giovanni, 748
Raça (Almeida), 161
Racin, Kočo, 837
Racine, Jean, 94, 123, 124, 215, 310, 351, 363, 735, 1055, 1447; chorus, 245; devotional poetry, 511; dramatic poetry, 378, 511; neoclassical poetics, 263, 930, 931, 933; tétramètre, 1425; tragedy, 1447, 1450; tragic unities, 1496
Radauskas, Henrikas, 811
Radcliffe, Anne, 1291
Rader, Ralph W., 226
Radhanath Ray, 984
Radičević, Branko, 1294
radīf, 1021, 1152, 1183, 1227,
RADI-OS OI-OIV (Johnson), 914
Radlov, Wilhelm, 976
Radnóti, Miklós, 642, 1532
Radulova, Nadejda, 170
Raeber, Kuno, 1386–87
Raghuvaṃśa (Kālidāsa), 1144
Ragnarsson, Baldur, 457
Rahi, Ahmed, 1133
Rahman, Shamsur, 138
Rahnev, Elin, 170
Raíces amargas (Valiente), 401
Raiftearaí, Antaine, 727
Raimbaut d'Aurenga, 967, 1464
Raimon de Cornet, 967
Raimondi, E., 124
Raimund, Ferdinand, 104, 139
Raine, Craig, 57
Rainey, Lawrence, 674–75
Rainey, Ma, 152, 481, 797
Rai San'yō, 243
Rajagopalan, K. P., 1411
Rājaśekhara, 1101
Rajić, Jovan, 1294
Rakić, Milan, 1295

Rakitin, Nicola, 169
Rakosi, Carl, 963–64, 1489
Rakovski, Georgi, 168
Rakovszky, Zsuzsa, 643
Rakuvamcam (Aracakecari), 1356
Ralegh, Walter, 415, 637, 913, 1041, 1480
Raley, Rita, 271
Ralitsa (Slaveikov), 168
Rama II, Phra Phutthaloetla, 1431
Rāmakerti, 176
Rāmakian, 1431
Ramanujan, A. K., 687, 1093, 1094, 1108
Ramaswamy, Sundara, 1411
Rāmāyaṇa poetry, 94, 279, 362, 630, 685, 689, 911, 979, 1154, 1250–51, 1252, 1310; Cambodian version, 176; historical record, 636; Malayalam version, 839; Nepali version, 935; Oriya version, 984; poet, 1049; poetry, 93, 94, 137, 684, 1144, 1253; Tamil version, 1410; ten-day enactment of, 377
Rambouillet, Marquise de, 1101
Rāmcaritmānas (Tulsīdās), 630–31, 1144
Ramchal, 605, 606, 614
Ramdas, 846
Ramírez, Diego, 232
Ramírez, Sergio, 947
Ramírez de Guzmán, Catalina Clara, 1338
Ramis, Joan, 212
Ramos Sucre, José Antonio, 1504
Rampolokeng, Lesego, 14, 15, 1331
Ramsay, Allan, 118, 170, 1007, 1275
Ramus, Peter, 250, 290, 724, 866, 876, 1179
Ramuz, Charles Ferdinand, 1387
Ranasinghe, Anne, 1357
Ranch Verses (Chittendon), 313
Rancière, Jacques, 108, 472
Randall, Dudley, 24, 914
Randolph, Thomas, 217, 972
randomness. See aleatory poetics
Ranjina, Dinko, 319
Ranjina, Nikša, 319
Ranke, Leopold von, 634, 638
Rankine, Claudia, 373
Ranna, 767
Ranolph and Amohia (Domett), 943
Ransford, Tessa, 1277
Ransom, John Crowe, 209, 295, 298, 471, 1485; Agrarians, 25; formalism, 500; Fugitives, 531, 1490; New Criticism, 268, 936, 937, 1000, 1062, 1490, 1491; poetic knowledge, 771; representation, 1171; rhyme, 1186; science, 1265–66; sound symbolism, 1324; structure, 1366; texture, 1430
Raoul de Cambrai (chanson de geste), 221
rap. See hip-hop poetics
"Rape" (Rich), 1081
Rape of Lucrece, The (Shakespeare), 416, 1193–94
Rape of the Lock, The (Pope), 43, 57, 400, 421, 446, 664, 889, 914, 1002, 1043, 1180, 1391, 1405
Raphael, 10, 13
Rapin, Nicholas, 1515
Rapin, René, 929, 931, 1141
"Rapper's Delight" (song), 632
"Rapsodia para el mulo" (Lezama Lima), 204
"Rapture" (Carew), 217
rasa, 354, 684–85, 1034, 1246, 1247–50, 1252
Rāshid, Nūn Mīm, 1499
Rasmussen, Knud, 721, 722
Ratcatcher (Tsvetaeva), 1235
Rathnadurai, Puthuvai, 1356
Ratosh, Jonathan, 607, 614
Ratschky, Joseph Franz, 104
Ratzabi, Shalom, 615
Rauschenberg, Robert, 32, 33
"Raven, The" (Poe), 269, 1058, 1152, 1169, 1332, 1397, 1484; semiotic analysis of, 298
Ravn, Hans Mikkelsen, 345
rawlings, a., 180
Raworth, Tom, 426, 887, 1332
Ray, Man, 1378
Raymond, Marcel, 548, 549
Rayuela (Cortázar), 32
Razin (Khlebnikov), 534
razo, 141, 1116, 1144
Razón de amor con los Denuestos del Agua y el Vino (Berceo), 1334
Razos de trobar (Vidal), 211, 537
Raztsvetnikov, Asen, 169
Read, Herbert, 1532 reader, 1144–46; absorption, 1–2; affective fallacy, 11, 12–13; appreciation, 62; belief, 134–37; biographical information, 142–43; emotion, 402–7; image, 661, 662; imagination of, 670. See also close reading reader response, 721, 937, 1146–48, 1308
Reading the Illegible (Dworkin), 365
"READ THIS WORD" (Acconci), 292 realism, 634, 1148–49; artifice vs., 90
Reamker (epic), 176
"rebel baron" epics, 221
"Rebelión" (Lienlaf), 845
Rébora, Clemente, 747 reception theory. See reader response recitation, 186, 1017, 1149–50; Fireside poets, 491, 492 recording technology, 1414, 1415
Records of Women (Hemans), 422
Recorrer esta distancia (Saenz), 154 recusatio, 257, 1150–51
Réda, Jacques, 516
Reddy, W. M., 12
rederijkers, 1151, 1152, 1359–60
Rede zum Shakespeares-Tag (Goethe), 1210
Redi, Francesco, 735
Rediscovery (Awoonor), 14
Redon, Odilon, 1397
redondilla, 1142, 1151
"Red Wheelbarrow, The" (Williams), 294, 322, 1541
Reed, Henry, 1532
Reed, Ishmael, 24
Reed in the Tide (Clark), 14
Réel absolu, Le (Lapointe), 183
Reeves, William Pember, 943
"Reeve's Tale, The" (Chaucer), 477
"Reflections on Having Left a Place of Retirement" (Coleridge), 304, 1404 refrain, 114, 173, 1151–52
refrán, 1152
refrein, 1152–53, 1359
"Refusal, A" (Hardy), 848
Regalado, Silvia Elena, 401
Regards et jeux dans l'espace (Garneau), 182
Rege, P. S., 687
reggae. See dub poetry
Regina Mortua (Trayanov), 169
Regrets, Les (Bellay), 35, 36, 1031, 1150, 1319, 1321
Reichardt, Johann Friedrich, 799
Reid, Alastair, 1277
Reid, Jamie, 1439
Reid, Thomas, 1412
Reimspruch, 1353
Rein, Evgenii, 1237, 1238
Reinhardt, Ad, 886
Reinhart, Josef, 1386
Reinmar von Hagenau, 103, 560, 887, 1408
"Reis glorios, verais lums e clartatz" (Giraut), 29
Reisig, Karl, 1282
Reiss-Andersen, Gunnar, 955
Reizianum, 1418
Reiznerová, Margita, 1208
Rej, Mikołaj, 1073
rejet, 36, 1153
"Reklameskibet" (Gelsted), 346
Rekviem. See Requiem
relative stress principle, 658, 1118, 1153, 1352; dipodism, 368 Religio Laici (Dryden), 624–26 religion and poetry, 1153–57; carol, 208; chant, 50, 223; exegesis, 467–69; hermeneutics, 619–21. See also devotional poetry; hymn; liturgical poetry; psalm Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (Percy, ed.), 54, 116, 117, 421, 1210, 1224 remate, 488, 1157–58
Rembrandt van Rijn, 125, 992
Remedia amoris (Ovid), 311, 993
"Remembering the Movement" (Davie), 901
Remizov, Aleksej, 1363
Rémond de Saint Mard, Toussaint, 36
Remorse (Coleridge), 378
"Remote Parsee" (Stefan), 93
Renaissance poetics, 1060–61, 1158–63; Petrarchism, 1030–32
Renaissance poetry, 1163–67; England, 414–20; France, 409–11; gender, 545; Italy, 741–42; in Latin,

791–92; mannerism, 843–44; narrative, 913; obscurity, 964–65
Renart, Jean, 859
Renault, Annaïg, 165
Renaut de Montauban, 221
Rendezvous with America (Tolson), 23
Rendra, W. S., 702
renga, 289, 293, 592–93, 754, 757, 818, 1167–68
repetition, 807, 1168–71, 1488; anaphora, 50; ballad, 117, 681; blues, 151; epanalepsis, 438; ploce, 1043–44; polyptoton, 1086–87 representation, 707, 1171–74
Republic. See Plato
Requiem (Akhmatova), 398, 1079, 1235, 1237, 1532
Rerum vulgarium fragmenta (Petrarch). See Canzoniere
Resende, André de, 1089
Resende, Garcia de, 1088
Residencia en la tierra (Neruda), 231, 1346
resolution, 1174
"Resolution and Independence" (Wordsworth), 682, 1194, 1224 responsion, 184, 1174–75
Restless Serpents (Zamora), 229
Restrepo, Elkin, 276
"Resurrection of the Word, The" (Shklovsky), 1239
"Retirement" (Cowper), 98
"Retrospect" (Pound), 1047
Reuchlin, Johann, 600
Revaluation (Leavis), 369
Revel, James, 1481
reverdie, 1175
Reverdy, Pierre, 316, 321, 515, 1113, 1378, 1415, 1517 reversed consonance, 1175 reverse rhyme, 1175
Revius, Jacobus, 871
Rexroth, Kenneth, 1243, 1493
Reyes, Alfonso, 763, 880–81, 927, 934, 1149
Reyes, Ponciano, 1033
Reynard the Fox, 128, 561, 1255
Reynard the Fox (Masefield), 913
Reynolds, John, 127
Reynolds, Joshua, 533, 550, 668, 669, 1501
Rėza, Liudvikas, 810
Reznikoff, Charles, 373, 504, 707, 963, 964, 1296, 1489 rhapsode, 1175
Rhenanus, Johannes, 148
Rhetoric. See Aristotle
Rhetorica ad Herennium (anon.), 58, 445, 852, 1179, 1193 rhetoric and poetry, 249–50, 1175–81; pronunciation, 1110–11; Renaissance, 1161–62; seconde rhétorique, 1281–82 Rhétoriqueurs, Grands, 32, 48, 509–10, 640, 714, 900, 1181–82, 1186, 1199 rhopalic verse, 1182
rhyme, 1182–92; assonance, 94, 95; ballad meter, 119; blank verse, 146, 147; blues, 151; free verse, 524; generic, 548; hip-hop, 632; homoeoteleuton vs., 640; identical, 658–69; internal, 713–14; jingle, 763; masculine/feminine, 848–49; monorhyme, 898–99; sound, 1326; space, 1332; triple, 1461; Welsh, 973 rhyme counterpoint, 1192 rhyme-prose, 1193 rhyme royal, 190, 414, 432, 438, 1193–94, 1281, 1294, 1350
Rhymers' Club, 1194 rhyme scheme, 160, 1194–95
Rhys, Siôn Dafydd, 1536
rhythm, 1195–98; counterpoint, 309; generative metrics, 547; prose, 1113–15; quantitative, 1137; repetition, 1169–70; rising and falling, 1202–3; running, 1229; scansion, 1261–62. See also sprung rhythm rhythmic figures, 129–30, 1198–99
rhythmici. See metrici and rhythmici
Riba, Carles, 213
Ribeiro, Bernardim, 1089
Ribeiro, Tomás, 1091
Ribera, Luis de, 153
Ribera Chevremont, Evaristo, 203
Ribner, Tuvia, 615
Ricard, L.-X. de, 1001
Ricardo, Cassiano, 162
Rich, Adrienne, 77, 294, 296, 456, 482, 1060, 1081, 1493; ghazal, 571, 819; lesbian poetry, 545, 797, 798; long poem, 813; love poetry, 818, 819; war poetry, 1532
Richard, Jean-Pierre, 548, 549
Richard, Zachary, 518
Richard II (Shakespeare), 9, 146, 1450
Richard III (Shakespeare), 734, 1359, 1459
Richards, I. A., 11–12, 13, 135, 216, 298, 363, 471, 660, 670, 673, 752, 851, 863, 866, 1129, 1284, 1371, 1501; close reading, 268; emotional response, 403; emotive function, 1056; formalism, 500; imagery, 664; metaphor, 863, 865, 866, 1464; New Criticism, 936; paraphrase, 1000; poetic tone, 1442; poetry theory, 1058, 1177; pseudo-statement, 1125–26; reader response, 1146; science, 1265, 1266, 1392; sound symbolism, 1324; synaesthesia, 1399; tenor and vehicle, 1421; unity, 1496
Richardson, Alan, 272
Richardson, William, 670
Richepin, Jean, 119
Richet, Charles, 1543 rich rhyme, 658, 1190, 1199
Richter, Hans Werner, 568
Richter, J.P.F., 1213
Ricks, Christopher, 43, 48, 54, 267
Ricoeur, Paul, 136, 622, 673, 714–15, 869 riddle, 53, 765, 1199–1201
Riding, Laura, 365, 531, 581
Riechmann, Jorge, 1342
Riedemann, Clemente, 232
Riese, J. H., 993
Rifat, Oktay, 1473
Rifbjerg, Klaus, 347
Riffaterre, Michael, 269, 298, 649, 717, 851, 965, 1056, 1062, 1288, 1289, 1364, 1365, 1391
Riga, Peter, 791
Rigby, Carlos, 948
Rig Veda (Sanskrit collection), 353, 453, 688, 1151, 1200
Rig Veda Americanus (Brinton, trans.), 697
Riḥānī, Amīn, 69
Riley, Denise, 426, 483, 1062
Riley, James Whitcomb, 21
Rilke, R. M., 41, 95, 104–5, 111, 225, 252, 336, 347, 525, 565, 567, 621, 680, 812, 910, 1127, 1235; caudate sonnet, 216; descriptive values, 352; Dinggedicht, 367, 565, 891; expressionism, 474; fragments, 506; modernism, 891, 892; painting, 990; primitivism, 1108; prose poem, 1113; religious poetry, 1156, 1157; self-epitaph, 451; sonnet sequence, 105, 566, 1320, 1322; symbolism, 1395, 1397; war poetry, 1531
Rilski, Neofit, 168
rimadas. See novas
Rimado de Palacio (López de Ayala), 321
Rimas (Camões), 1089, 1319
Rimas (Echeverría), 79
Rimas (El libro de los gorriones) (Bécquer), 1218
Rimbaud, Arthur, 36, 82, 105, 131, 310, 456, 485, 623, 1051, 1156, 1217, 1234, 1378, 1416, 1418; avant-garde, 110; decasyllable, 340; French prosody, 527–28; gay poetry, 541; hexameter, 628; hybrid poetry, 644; hypogram, 649; as influence, 745, 747; love poetry, 818; modernism, 890, 891; muse, 902; prose poem, 513–14, 1112, 1516; sonnet, 1320; stylistics, 1057; synaesthesia, 1398; symbolism, 663, 1395, 1396, 1397; triolet, 1460; vers libéré, 1516, 1517; war poetry, 1531
Rimbereid, Øyvind, 956
Rime (Bembo), 741
Rime (Marino), 124
Rime (Tasso), 742
rime équivoque, 900
Rime of the Ancient Mariner, The (Coleridge), 117, 363, 406, 408, 422, 498, 664, 913, 914, 1224, 1414, 1510, 1542
rime riche. See identical rhyme; rich rhyme

Rime sparse (Petrarch). See Canzoniere
Rime toscane (Alamanni), 145
Rimon, Yosef Zvi, 615
rímur, 654, 1201
Rinaldo d'Aquino, 1304
Rinconete y Cortadillo (Cervantes), 493
Ring, Der (Wittenwiler), 561
Ring and the Book, The (Browning), 147, 357, 423, 658, 913, 1145 ring composition, 6, 218, 436, 1201–2
Ringelnatz, Joachim (pseud. of Hans Bötticher), 567
Rinuccini, Cino, 375
"Río Grande de Loíza" (Burgos), 206
Ripa, Cesare, 656
Rires et Pleurs (Durand), 197 rising and falling rhythm, 140, 1197, 1202–3, 1463
"Rising Village, The" (Goldsmith), 178
rispetto, 1203
Risset, Jacqueline, 516
"Rite de la Méduse, Le" (Cixous), 387
"Rites and Ceremonies" (Hecht), 354 ritornello, 1203–4
Ritson, George, 1267
Ritsos, Yiannis, 584–85
Rittler, Franz, 809
Rivas, Bimbo, 961
Rivas, Pedro Geoffroy, 401
Rivas Groot, José María, 275
Rivera, Daniel de, 201
Rivera, José Eustacio, 275
Rivera, Oswaldo Calisto (Cachivache), 389
riverIsland (Cayley), 328
Rivero, Mario, 276
Rivers, Larry, 158
"River Snow" (Liu), 1155
Rixt (pseud. of Hendrika A. van Dorssen), 528
Rizal, José, 279, 917, 1032
Roach, Eric, 194
"Roaming Afar" (Qu), 247
"Robene and Makyne" (Henryson), 1274, 1281
Robertet, Jean, 1181
Roberts, Charles G. D., 178
Roberts, Michael, 799
Roberts, Michele, 482
Robertson, J. M., 963
Robertson, Lisa, 181
Robinja (Lucić), 319
Robinson, Clement, 54
Robinson, E. A., 21, 147, 531, 644, 898, 1320, 1485, 1511, 1521
Robinson, Mary, 1052, 1293
Robinson, Roland, 101, 763
Robles, Al, 92
Robortello, Francesco, 445, 678, 1158, 1177, 1180, 1373
Roca, Juan Manuel, 276–77
Rocca de Vergalo, Della, 1517
Rocha, Jofre, 19
Rocha, Luis, 947
Roche, Denis, 301, 1365, 1418
Rochester, Earl of (John Wilmot), 420, 456, 723, 1257
"Rock Me to Sleep" (Allen), 1149 rococo, 1204
Rodas, Ana Maria, 589
Rode, Ajmer, 1133
Rode, Helge, 346
Rodenbach, Georges, 131
Rodgers, Carolyn, 24
Rodin, Auguste, 105, 367
Rodrigues Lobo, Francisco, 1089
Rodríguez, Claudio, 1341
Rodriguez, Judith, 102
Rodríguez, Luciano, 539
Rodríguez, Reina María, 206
Rodríguez Baxeiras, Xavier, 538
Rodríguez de Tío, Lola, 201
Rodríguez Marín, F., 1152
Rodríguez Portillo, Armando, 400
Rodríguez Ucres, José, 200
Roemer, Astrid, 192
Roethke, Theodore, 42, 300, 813, 960, 1459, 1490, 1507
Rohan, Anne de, 797
Roíç de Corella, Joan, 211
Roidis, Emmanuel, 583
Roig, Jaume, 212
Roinard, Paul-Napoléon, 338
Rojas, Fernando de, 283
Rojas, Gonzalo, 231, 1347
Rojas, Waldo, 231
Rojas Herazo, Héctor, 276
Rokha, Pablo de (pseud. of Carlos Díaz Loyola), 230, 232
Roland, 221, 222
Rolfe, Edwin, 1489
Rolle, Richard, 791
Rolli, Paolo, 31
Rollinat, Maurice, 119, 1460
Rollins, H. R., 54
Romaguera, Josep, 211
Romains, Jules (pseud. of Louis Farigoule), 515, 925 romance (Spanish), 79, 115, 117, 200, 1204–5
Romancero Gitano (García Lorca), 1218
Romances de los Señores de la Nueva España (anthol.), 698, 879
Roman d'Alexandre, 35, 508, 859
Roman de Brut (Wace), 859
Roman de Fauvel, Le, 128
Roman de fortune, 1115
Roman de la Rose, 357, 370, 384, 507, 508, 511, 854, 857, 859, 860, 911, 993; Chaucer trans., 413, 508, 970; Jean de Meun continuation, 37, 508, 545
Roman de Renart, 476, 508, 859
Roman de Troie (Benoît), 859
Roman Elegies (Goethe). See Römische Elegien
"Roman Fountain, The" (Meyer), 566
Romania, poetry of, 115, 1205–7
Romani poetry, 1207–8
Romano, Giulio, 39
Romano de Sant'Anna, Affonso, 163
Roman poetics, 256–58, 786–89. See also Latin poetry
Romansh (Swiss) poetry, 1387–88 romantic and postromantic poetry and poetics, 135–36, 142–43, 410, 660, 679, 1208–19
romanticism, 1061–62, 1219–25; classicism vs., 263, 265; English, 422–23, 433–34; French, 512–13; gender dynamics, 545–46; German, 564–65; imagination, 667, 671, 672–73, 818; intensity, 710–11; Italian, 744; modernist critics vs., 711; Russian, 1231; science vs., 1267–68; sensibility, 1290, 1291; Spanish, 1340; spontaneity, 1352–53; sublime, 1373; Transcendentalists, 1454–55
Romeo and Juliet (Shakespeare), 29, 417, 850, 1004, 1450, 1507
Romero, Alexis, 1506
Romero, Armando, 276
Romerske Bassiner (Malinowski), 347
Römische Brunnen, Der (Meyer), 1386
"Römische Brunnen, Der" (Meyer), 566
Römische Elegien (Goethe), 397, 563, 628, 818
Romualdo, Alejandro, 1027
Roncalla, Fredy Amilcar, 694
rondeau, 28, 118, 1225–26, 1227, 1485 rondel, 432, 1226, 1227
Ronsard, Pierre de, 46, 91, 209, 265, 435, 449, 452, 454, 507, 526, 646, 1059; alexandrine, 36, 1043; anadiplosis, 48; caesura, 174; conceit, 289; decasyllable, 340; eclogue, 386, 1007; epic, 1160, 1164; French poetry, 509, 510, 511; heptasyllable, 618; imitation, 1161; as influence, 820; lyric sequence, 835; octosyllable, 970; ode, 972; Petrarchism, 1031, 1043, 1163; Pléiade, 1042, 1043, 1163, 1164, 1199, 1518; poetic madness, 1058; polyptoton, 1086; rhyme, 527; rich rhyme, 1199; sonnet, 1050, 1319, 1321
Roof Slates (Reverdy), 515
Room of One's Own, A (Woolf), 70, 480–81
Roripaugh, Lee, 1532
Rorty, Richard, 136, 485, 622, 732, 733, 1081, 1270, 1392
Rosa, Václav Jan, 330
Rosa de la espinela, La (Adán), 458
Rosaldo, Renato, 229
Rosales, Luis, 1341
Rosas, Juan Manuel, 79
Rosas de Oquendo, Mateo, 880, 1344
Rose, Aquila, 1482
Rose, Dilys, 1278
Rose, Jacqueline, 1128
Rosegger, Peter, 102, 104
Rosenberg, Isaac, 556, 1531
Rosenberg, Jim, 395
Rosenblatt, Louise, 1146
Rosenfeld, Morris, 1548
Rosenlöcher, Thomas, 149
Rosenplüt, Hans, 1107
Rosenstock, Gabriel, 729

Rosenthal, M. L., 296, 297, 1491
Rosidi, Ajip, 702
Rosselló-Pòrcel, Bartomeu, 213
Rossetti, Ana, 1342
Rossetti, Christina, 117, 354, 423, 424, 818, 898, 914, 919, 960, 1227, 1320; Pre-Raphaelites, 1102, 1103, 1215
Rossetti, D. G., 338, 424, 898, 899, 913, 959, 1297, 1320, 1321; aestheticism, 10; fleshly school, 492, 493; Pre-Raphaelites, 1102, 1103
Rossetti, W. M., 492, 1215
Rostand, Edmond, 378
Rostpochina, Evdokiia, 1233 rota virgiliana, 444, 678, 1226–27
Rothe, Johannes, 1533
Rothenberg, Jerome, 54, 463, 692, 812, 1018, 1493
Rotimi, Ola, 1447, 1451
Rotrou, Jean, 124
rotrouenge, 1227
Rottman, Larry, 1532
Roubaud, Jacques, 301, 516, 649, 967, 987, 1168
"Roubaud's Principle," 900
Roucher, Jean-Antoine, 36
Roud, Gustave, 1387
Rough Field, The (Montague), 729
Roumain, Jacques, 198, 199
Roumanille, Joseph, 480
Roumer, Emile, 198
roundel, 1227
Rouquette, Dominique and Adrien, 517
Rouquette, Max, 968
Rousseau, Jean-Baptiste, 340, 511, 512
Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 99, 121, 157, 296–97, 336, 670–71, 818, 866, 868, 932, 1108, 1292, 1308, 1387; romanticism, 1209, 1210, 1214, 1216, 1219
Roussel, Raymond, 32, 225, 987
Rousset, Jean, 122, 123, 124, 548, 549
Rovenský, Václav Holan, 330
Rowe, Nicholas, 1064, 1260
Rowley poems (Chatterton), 422
Royet-Journoud, Claude, 887, 1296
Rozanova, Olga, 111
Różewicz, Tadeusz, 1076, 1532
Rozmor, Naïg, 165
Różycki, Tomasz, 1077
Ruan Ji, 1298
Rubadiri, David, 16
rubāʿī, 1021, 1227–28
Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, The (FitzGerald trans.), 209, 362, 471, 973–74, 1228
Rubaiyat stanza. See Omar Khayyám quatrain
Rubchak, Bohdan, 1479
Rubens, Peter Paul, 37, 125
Rubinshtein, Lev, 1063, 1238
Rubio, Rafael, 232
Rubusana, W. B., 1545
Rückert, Friedrich, 565, 571
Rudans'ky, Stepan, 1478
Rudraṭa, 27, 1246
Rueda, Manuel, 205
Rúfus, Milan, 1311
Rugama, Leonel, 947
"Rugby Chapel" (Arnold), 49
Rühm, Gerhard, 105
Rühmkorf, Peter, 568
Rui, Manuel, 18, 19
"Ruinas" (Ureña), 201
"Ruined Maid, The" (Hardy), 1542
Ruins of Rome, The (Bellay). See Antiquités de Rome, Les Ruins of Rome, The (Spenser), 1321
Ruiz, Juan, 321, 858, 1334
Rukeyser, Muriel, 373, 481, 557, 797, 1271, 1489
"Rumba, La" (Tallet), 204
Rūmī, Jalāl al-Dín, 140, 353, 388, 541, 571, 667, 1022, 1023; lament, 781; love poetry, 815, 817; religious poetry, 849, 1155; rubāʿī, 1228
Rummānī, al-, 64
Rummo, Paul-Eerik, 460
Rumores del Hórmigo (Nápoles), 201
"Runagate Runagate" (Hayden), 23
Runciman, S., 168
rune, 344, 411, 1228–29
Runeberg, Johan Ludvig, 489, 1383
Runefelt, Eva, 1385
Rungsteds Lyksaligheder (Ewald), 345
Runius, Johan, 1382
Runnel, Hando, 460
running rhythm, 1229
Runoja (Saarikoski), 490
Ruodlieb (med. romance), 790
Ruolf von Fenis, 887
Rūpa Goswamin, 1248–49
Rupchev, Georgi, 169
Ruṣāfī, Maʿrūf al-, 28, 69
Rusiñol, Santiago, 212
Ruskin, John, 10, 363, 404, 478, 634, 1215; imagination, 673; pathetic fallacy, 1009, 1010; Pre-Raphaelites, 1102, 1234
Russia, poetry of, 1229–39
Russian formalism, 1, 303, 500, 501, 534, 634, 664, 807, 1062, 1080, 1239–42, 1305, 1361, 1371; defamiliarization, 343–44, 1146; Language poetry, 784; metaphor vs. metonymy, 876; organicism, 981; parody, 1002; poetic function, 1056; rhyme semantics, 1188; structuralism, 1361, 1362–63, 1364; textuality, 1429; thematics, 1432–33
Russian futurism. See futurism
Russolo, Luigi, 1324, 1415
Rustaveli, Shota, 554
Rutebeuf, 507, 509, 1465
Ruwanpathirana, Monica, 1356
Ruymbeke, Christine van, 1266
Ruyyaka, 27, 1502
Ryan, Brendan, 103
Ryan, Gig, 102
Ryan, Kay, 1065
Ryan, Tracy, 103
Rybnikov, P. N., 170
Ryder, Frank G., 1116–17, 1439
Ryl's'ky, Maksym, 1478
Rymaruk, Ihor, 1479
Rymer, Thomas, 929, 931, 1141
Rymkiewicz, Jarosław Marek, 1077
Ryōkan, 243
Ryōta, Ōshima, 594

Saar, Ferdinand von, 104
Saarikoski, Pentti, 490
Saaritsa, Pentti, 490
Saavedra, Ángel de, 1218, 1340
Sab (Avellaneda), 201
Saba, Umberto, 747, 891
Sabina, Maria, 573
Sabines, Jaime, 881–82
Sabir, Ali Akbar, 1474
Sablé, Antoine de la, 837
Sables (Delcarte), 133
Sabri, Ismail, 392
Sá-Carneiro, Mário de, 1091
Sacchetti, Franco, 173, 530
Sacerdos, 1017
Sachs, Hans, 561, 861, 1353
Sachs, Nelly, 482, 568
Sacks, Sheldon, 226
Sackville, Thomas, 146, 414, 432, 1193
Sacré, James, 516
Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (Lowth), 89–90, 598, 671, 807, 971
Sacred Wood, The (Eliot), 379
Sá de Miranda, Francisco, 148, 1031, 1088, 1089, 1164, 1319, 1321
Sadino, Elmano, 1090
Saʿdī, 571, 1023
"Sad Strains of a Gay Waltz" (Stevens), 336
Saduktikarṇāmṛta, 1252
Sáenz, Jaime, 154
Šafařík, Pavel Josef, 331
Safavi, Ismail Shah, 1471
Ṣafī al-Din al-Ḥillī, 69
saga, 1243
Sagarra, Josep Maria de, 212, 213
Saggil-kinam-ubbib, 95, 97
Sagradas poesías (Ribera), 153
Sahagún, Bernardino de, 697, 879
Sahakdukht, 83
Sahak Partev, 83
Sahay, Raghuvir, 632, 687
Sahtouris, Miltos, 585
Ṣāʾib, 571, 1023
Saʾīd, Alī Aḥmad. See Adūnis
Said, Edward, 278, 279, 325, 1092, 1170
Saʿīd Yaqṭīn, 65
Saigyō, 1055
"Sailing to Byzantium" (Yeats), 425, 986, 1393
Saint-Amant, Marc-Antoine Girard de, 124, 510, 928, 1460
Saint-Aude, Clément Magloire, 199, 200
Saint-Aurèle, Poirié de, 197
Sainte-Beuve, Charles Augustin, 711, 1043, 1112, 1216
Saint-Évremond, Charles de, 1141
Saint-Gelais, Mellin de, 372, 509, 1031, 1319
Saint-Gelais, Octavien de, 1181, 1182, 1226, 1460

Saint Joan of the Stockyards (Beckett), 378
Saint-Lambert, Jean-François, 511
Saintsbury, George, 373, 455, 494, 495, 925, 1114, 1135, 1375, 1509
Sainville, Léonard, 926
Saison au Congo, Une (Césaire), 1451
Saison en enfer, Une (Rimbaud), 514, 541, 1057
Saisons, Les (Jacqmin), 133
Saisons, Les (Saint-Lambert), 511
Salarrué (pseud. of Salvador Salazar Arrué), 400
Salaverry, Carlos Augusto, 1028
Salazar, Eugenio de, 879–80
Salazar Bondy, Sebastián, 1027
Salinas, Luis Omar, 229
Salinas, Pedro, 1134, 1334, 1340, 1341
Salkeld, Blanaid, 730
Sall, Amadou Lamine, 17
Sall, Babacar, 17
Salla, Jerome, 1070
Salle 14 (Huidobro), 316
Salmasius, Claudius (Claude Saumaise), 53, 449
Salmon, Wesley, 1270
Salomão, Waly, 163
Salomé (Wilde), 338
Salon de 1845 (Baudelaire), 991
Salústia, Dina, 19
Salutati, Coluccio, 532, 740, 1161
Salut d'amor (anon.), 211
Salvatorino, Giovanni, 834–35
Salvat-Papasseit, Joan, 213, 535
Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum (Lanyer), 418, 544
Samain, Albert, 216, 1345
Samaniego, Félix María de, 1339
Samarin, W. J., 572, 573
Samarqandi, 140
Samio, Maekawa, 750–51
Samoan poetry, 1084, 1085
Sam Oeur, U, 177
Samson Agonistes (Milton), 36, 147, 216, 245, 270, 308, 522, 599, 600, 1354
Samuel the Prince, 605
San, Debra, 629
Sanā'ī, 571, 849, 1022
Sánchez, Louis Rafael, 1452
Sánchez, María Teresa, 948
Sánchez, Richard, 228
Sanchez, Sonia, 24, 144, 482, 761, 1306
Sánchez de Badajoz, Diego, 109
Sánchez de Badajoz, Garci, 186, 1336
Sánchez de las Brozas, Francisco, 1337
Sánchez Saornil, Lucía, 1480
Sanctis, Francesco de, 1217
Sandburg, Carl, 21, 761, 1511
Sandford, James, 251
Sandoval y Zapata, Luis, 124, 880
Sandys, George, 624, 1125, 1480
San Francisco Renaissance, 102, 130, 145, 1018, 1243–44, 1295, 1492
Sanfuentes y Torres, Salvador, 230
Sang, August, 460
Sange ved Havet (Drachmann), 346
Sangster, Charles, 178
Sanguineti, Edoardo, 748, 1168
Śaṅkaradeva, 93, 94
Sannazaro, Jacopo, 351, 386, 741, 791–92, 838, 1007, 1009, 1116, 1165, 1510
Sanoja Hernández, Jesús, 1505
Sanskrit poetics, 27, 1244–50, 1310, 1501–2
Sanskrit poetry, 1250–54; dhvani, 354; Indian classical, 684–85; Khmer, 176; Prakrit, 1100–1101; Rāmāyaṇa, 1144; as Sinhalese model, 1355; upamā, 1497
Sanskrit prosody, 687–89
Sansón Argüello, Mariana, 948
Santa Cruz, Nicomedes, 1027
Santana, Ana de, 19
Santayana, George, 669, 672, 1037, 1038, 1321
Sant'Elia, Antonio, 112
Santiago, Esmeralda, 961
Santiago Waria (Hernández), 232
Šantić, Aleksa, 159, 1294
Santillana, Marqués de, 186, 617, 1152, 1164, 1319, 1335
Santob de Carrión (Sem Tob ibn Ardutiel ben Isaac), 1334
Santos, Marcelino dos, 18
Santos Febres, Mayra, 206
Sapardi Djoko Damono, 702
Sapgir, Genrikh, 1237
Sapir, Edward, 57, 464, 974
Sapir-Whorf hypothesis, 1210
Saporta, Marc, 32
sapphic, 8, 9, 12, 50, 52, 91, 216, 252, 260, 862, 897, 1254–55; hymn, 646; lyric, 826
Sappho, 244, 245, 262, 388, 448, 544, 546, 551, 576, 902, 971; erotic poetry, 456, 815; fragments, 505, 506, 577, 828; glyconic, 573; lesbian poetry, 797; love poetry, 815, 816–17; lyric, 577, 826, 827, 828; monodic melic poetry, 862; as Poetess prototype, 1052, 1053; poetic calling, 1049, 1050; recusatio, 1150; unity, 1496
"Sappho and Phaon" (Robinson), 1052
Saptapadi (Joshi), 590
Sarachcharanda, Ediriweera, 1356
Sarada Kinenbi (Machi), 751
Sarafian, Nigoghos, 85
Sarala Das, 984
Sarantaris, Giorgos, 584
Sarashina nikki, 757
Sarasvatī, Kavi Ratna, 93–94
Saraswatī, Hema, 93
Saravanamuttu, Ditpi, 102
Sarbiewski, Maciej Kazimierz, 792, 1073
Sarduy, Severo, 205, 927, 1140
Sargon and Naram-Sin (epic), 96
Saro-Wiwa, Ken, 1452
Sarrasine (Balzac), 992, 1426
Sarrionandia, Joseba, 127
Sarsanedas, Jordi, 213
Sartor Resartus (Carlyle), 1215
Sartre, Jean-Paul, 16, 17, 387
Sarvig, Ole, 347
Sasamegoto (Shinkei), 1168
Sa-skya Paṇḍita, 1437
Sasna Tzrer (epic cycle), 84
Sassoferrato, Olimpo da, 150
Sassoon, Siegfried, 424, 556, 1531
Sastri, Devulapalli Krishna, 1420
Śatakatrayi (Bhartṛhari), 1253
Satanic school, 1255
Satellites (Peters), 15 satire, 35, 59, 67, 172, 362, 363, 418, 957, 1255–58; ballad, 117; blason, 150; colonial poetry, 279, 1344; comedy, 284, 417; dizain, 372; imagery, 664; parody, 1002; prosimetrum, 1115; silloi, 1306
Satire (Ariosto), 191, 741
Satires (Horace), 257, 1256
Satires (Juvenal), 1255
Satires (Kantemir), 1229–30
Sattasaī (Hālā), 1253
Sattasaī (Prakrit anthol.), 1101
Saturnian, 48, 256, 262, 1258–59
Satyanarayana, Viswanatha, 1420
"Satyr against Virtue" (Oldham), 286
Satyres (Donne), 146
Satyricon (Petronius), 257, 445, 1115, 1510 saudosismo, 1259
Saul (Alfieri), 743
"Saul" (Browning), 140
Saumaise, Claude, 53, 449
Saunders, Tim, 306
Saussure, Ferdinand de, 48, 298, 458, 459, 474, 548, 649, 664, 876, 974; intertextuality, 717; representation theory, 1172, 1174; semantics, 1282; semiotics, 1286–88, 1289, 1404–5; sign, 1304–5, 1391; structuralism, 1097, 1170, 1361, 1362, 1363, 1366, 1402
Savitzkaya, Eugène, 133
Savka, Mar'iana, 1479
Savon, Le (Ponge), 1414
Saxo Grammaticus, 344
Sayat-Nova, 84
Sayer, Frank, 1291
Sayid Maxamed Cabdille Xasan, 1313
Ṣāyigh, Tawfiq, 70
Sayyāb, Badr Shākir al-, 70
Sayyid Abdallah bin Ali bin Nasir, 1381
Sayyid Aidarus bin Athman, 1380
Sbárbaro, Camillo, 747
Scalapino, Leslie, 1140, 1243
Scaliger, J. C., 134, 289, 397, 445, 449, 452, 668, 677, 1159, 1172, 1177; commentary on Aristotle, 1158; invention, 724; kind, 770; meiosis, 860; panegyric vs. encomium, 994; poem, 1046; tragedy, 1160, 1496 scansion, 130, 494, 873, 1259–63; hovering accent, 640
"Scared Money" (Williams), 269
Scarron, Paul, 511
"Scented Herbage of My Breast" (Whitman), 541

Scève, Maurice, 110, 372, 510, 511, 1031, 1163, 1165
Schade, Jens August, 347
Schallenberg, Christoph von, 103
Schaukal, Richard von, 104
Scheffler, Johannes, 562
Scheler, Max, 408
Schelling, F.W.J., 345, 478, 621, 667, 668, 673, 866, 1035, 1037, 1214, 1232, 1270 scheme, 1263–64
Schendel, Michel van, 183
Schiller, Friedrich, 107, 109, 245, 252, 336, 345, 356, 450, 564, 818, 916, 957, 1352; aestheticism, 10, 1061; blank verse, 148, 149; catharsis, 215; classicism, 263; dramatic verse, 378; elegiac distich, 396, 398; fancy vs. imagination, 478; imagination, 672, 673, 818; Knittelvers, 310; naïve-sentimental, 911; neoclassicism, 932; objective correlative, 963; ode, 564, 972; organicism, 981; primitivism, 1108; riddle, 1200; romanticism, 744, 1210, 1212, 1219, 1220, 1221; tragedy, 1450
Schipper, Jakob, 4, 5, 140, 174, 175, 494, 504, 640, 1352
Schlag, Evelyn, 106
Schlegel, A.W., 148, 190, 252, 345, 364, 498, 564, 672, 911, 1450, 1501; echo verse, 386; fragments, 506; genre, 830; organicism, 981; romanticism, 1061, 1212–13, 1219; sonnet, 1320
Schlegel, Friedrich, 345, 471, 506, 672, 911, 1037, 1450; paradox, 996; romanticism, 1061, 1208–9, 1211, 1212–13, 1219, 1220
Schlegel, J.E., 148
Schlegel, J.H., 148
Schlegel, K.W.F. See Schlegel, Friedrich
Schleiermacher, Friedrich, 136, 143, 619, 621, 672, 714, 1212, 1214, 1219
"Schliere" (Celan), 1269
Schmatz, Ferdinand, 106
Schmidt, Augusto Frederico, 1156
Schmidt, Michael, 1013
Schmitz, André, 133
Schnackenberg, Gjertrud, 1494
Schneemann, Carolee, 157
Schniflis, Laurentius von, 104
Schoenberg, Arnold, 905
Schöne Müllerin, Die (Müller), 565
"School among the Ruins, The" (Rich), 1532
Schoolcraft, H.R., 1484
Schoolcraft, Jane Johnston, 1483 school of Spenser, 1264
Schopenhauer, Arthur, 107, 215, 282, 720, 1035, 1075, 1205, 1213, 1232, 1395
Schoulz, Soveig von, 490
Schröder, Rudolph Alexander, 972, 1320
Schrödinger, Erwin, 1270
Schrott, Raoul, 106, 1269
Schubert, Franz, 799, 1221, 1315
Schulhof, Stanislav, 457
Schurer, Fedde, 528–29
Schutt (Grün), 104
Schüttelreim, 1264
Schutting, Jutta, 106
Schuyler, James, 644, 940, 1492
schwa, 439
Schwarz, Sibylle, 562
Schwarzer Orpheus (Jahn), 192
"Schweizerpsalm" (Swiss national anthem), 51
Schwerner, Armand, 463, 1493
Schwitters, Kurt, 111, 112, 274, 504, 1324, 1328, 1415
science and poetry, 1037, 1264–73, 1291, 1392
Scienza nuova (Vico), 473, 670, 1037, 1071–72, 1211
Scofield, Gregory, 180
Scollard, Clayton, 1460
scop, 889, 1273
Scotland, poetry of, 425, 426, 493, 1105, 1273–81; ballad, 116, 118; bard, 120; Burns stanza, 170; Celtic prosody, 218, 219; Gaelic, 1278–79; psalter, 1125
Scots Makar, 1065, 1274
Scott, Alexander, 1275, 1276
Scott, Dennis, 196
Scott, Duncan Campbell, 178
Scott, F.R., 178–79
Scott, John, 1531
Scott, John A., 102
Scott, Jordan, 180
Scott, Tom, 1276
Scott, Walter, 139, 140, 307, 446, 447, 638, 1012, 1275, 1483; anapest, 49; ballad, 116, 118; envoi, 438; heptameter, 618, 1221; romanticism, 744, 1221, 1223, 1224
Scott, W.B., 1102
Scottish Chaucerians or Makars, 99, 1281
Scottish stanza. See Burns stanza Screen (Wardrip-Fruin), 395
Scudéry, Mlle. de, 1101
Scuola siciliana. See Sicilian school
Scutenaire, Louis, 132
"Sea and the Mirror, The" (Auden), 311, 1423
"Sea Dreams" (Tennyson), 128
Sea Garden (H.D.), 1486
Searle, John, 733, 867, 868, 1146, 1283, 1284; speech act theory, 1349, 1350
Season in Hell, A (Rimbaud), 514, 541, 1057
Seasons, The (Thomson), 148, 351, 363, 421, 557, 773, 782, 1267, 1275, 1291, 1292
"Sea Surface Full of Clouds" (Stevens), 1134, 1423
Sébillet, Thomas, 150, 151, 370, 372, 509, 625, 1199
Sechehaye, Albert, 548
"Second Anniversarie" (Donne), 1267
Second Book of the Rhymers' Club, 1194
"Second Coming, The" (Yeats), 147, 425, 728, 873, 909, 1127
Seconde Sepmaine (Du Bartas), 511
Second Life, The (Morgan), 1277 second rhétorique, 507, 1281–82
Secondus, 386, 792
Secreto artificio, El (Vega Ramos), 90
"Secret of the Struma, The" (Trayanov), 169
Secretum (Petrarch), 638
Secundus, 386, 792
Sedakova, Ol'ga, 1238
"Sedih" (Yamin), 701
Sedulius, Caelius (5th c.), 789, 791, 1116
Sedulius Scottus (9th c.), 790
Seed-book (Gut), 158
Sefer ha-Iyyunim we-ha-Diyyunim (Ibn Ezra), 605
Seferis, George, 57, 352, 583, 584
Segal, Dmitrij, 1362
Segalen, Victor, 514
S'eggayé (Tseggaye) Gebre-Medhin, 462
Segovia, Tomás, 882
seguidilla, 188, 189, 493, 1282
Segundo Cerco de Diu (Corte-Real), 148
Segura, Manuel Ascencio, 1028
Seidl, Johann Gabriel, 104
Seifert, Jaroslav, 331, 535, 1532
Seifullina, Lidiya, 1240
Sein und Zeit (Heidegger), 621, 1038
Seisensui, Ogiwara, 751–52
Seishi, Yamaguchi, 752
Séjour, Victor, 517
Sekera, Mahagama, 1356
Sekou, Lasana, 193
Sela, Rachel Bluwstein, 607
Selden, John, 599–600
Self Portrait(s) [as Other(s)] (Memmott), 288
Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror (Ashbery), 941, 1493
"Selige Sehnsucht" (Goethe), 970
Selkirk, Elizabeth, 494
Sel noir, Le (Glissant), 516
Selva, Salomón de la, 946
Selvinskij, Il'ja, 301
Selvon, Sam, 195
semantics and poetry, 1282–86
Semenko, Myxajl, 535
Semenov, Gleb, 1237
Semino, Elena, 1283
semiotics and poetry, 298, 474, 1062, 1286–89, 1361–62, 1426, 1432–33; hypogram, 649; matrix, 851; representation, 1172; sign, 1304–6; symbol, 1392; syntax, 1404–5
Semonides, 165, 577, 1459
Sempill, Robert, 170, 1275
Sena, Jorge de, 1092
Senanayake, G.B., 1356
senarius, 189, 1289–90
Seneca, 122, 123, 245, 270, 377, 504, 532, 787, 788, 1512; adonics, 9; anapest, 49; cantica, 189; classical

Seneca (continued) poetics, 255, 256, 258; classical prosody, 262; epigrams, 53; imagination, 677; invention, 725; persona, 1024; plain style, 1040; Renaissance poetics, 1162; split lines, 1351; stichomythia, 1359; tragedy, 1449; trimeter, 1459
Seneviratne, Malinda, 1357
Senghor, Léopold Sédar, 16, 17, 18, 197, 280, 516, 819, 1062; Negritude, 926, 1093, 1108 senhal, 1290
sensibility, 421–22, 1108, 1290–92, 1293. See also dissociation of sensibility
"Sensitive Plant, The" (Shelley), 1139 Sentences (Grenier), 157, 328 sentimentality, 267, 546, 911, 1052, 1292–93
Sepamla, Sipho, 15, 1331
Sephardic poetry. See Judeo-Spanish poetry
Sepmaine: ou, Creation du Monde, La (Du Bartas), 345, 511
"Sepolcri, Dei" (Foscolo), 575
Sepscha, Hendri, 1388
Sęp Szarzyński, Mikołaj, 1073
"September 1, 1939" (Auden), 733, 966, 1531
"Septemvri" (Milev), 169
septenarius, 119, 262, 377, 504, 617, 1293–94
septet, 1294
Sepúlveda (Corte-Real), 148
Serbian poetry, 1294–95
Serembe, Giuseppe, 30
serial form, 1096, 1295–96
Serious Money (Churchill), 378
Serote, Mongane, 15, 1331
Serradell, Bernat, 211
serranilla, 185, 1008, 1296
Serros, Michele, 229
Šeršenevič, Vadim, 535
Servius, 617
Sessions, George, 922
Sesson Yūbai, 243
sestet, 1296, 1297, 1304
sestina, 658, 736, 817, 1191, 1296–97, 1358
Sestra moia zhizn' (Pasternak), 1235
Seth, Vikram, 553, 914, 958, 1138
Seuphor, Michel, 132
Sevak, Paruyr, 85
Seven against Thebes (Aeschylus), 1449, 1458
Seven Masters of the Jian'an, 1298
"Seven Sisters" (Wordsworth), 117
Seven Types of Ambiguity (Empson), 44, 268, 1062
77 Dream Songs (Berryman), 835, 1491
Severim de Faria, Manuel, 466
Severini, Gino, 534
Severjanin, Igor', 535
Sévigné, Madame de, 122
Seward, Anna, 420, 1104, 1320
sexain, 1297, 1506–7
sextilla, 1297–98
Sexton, Anne, 175, 818, 1292; confessional poetry, 296, 482, 1491
Sextus Empiricus, 255
Şeyh Galip, 1472
Şeyhi, 1471
Shābbī, Abū al-Qāsim, 70
Shabtai, Aharon, 608
"Shadows" (Nugent), 542
Shadow Songs (Senghor), 16
Shadwell, Thomas, 48, 641, 1064
Shaftesbury, third Earl of (Anthony Ashley Cooper), 10, 409, 478, 668, 672, 931, 933, 1104, 1290, 1293, 1412
Shah, Bulleh, 1132–33
Shāh, Rājendra, 590
Shah, Waris, 1133
Shâhnâma (Firdawsī), 471, 781, 979, 1022–23, 1024, 1200
Shahryār, Sayyid Muḥammad Ḥusayn, 571
Shakespear (Herder), 1210
Shakespeare, William, 45, 56, 60, 94, 95, 138, 156, 246, 280, 295, 300, 397, 454, 456, 913, 1156, 1211, 1349, 1455; address, 7, 1162; adynaton, 9; alba, 29; alliteration, 41; allusions to, 42; amplification, 46; anacoluthon, 46; anacrusis, 47; anadiplosis, 48; anagram, 48; anthimeria, 52, 1086; antithesis, 58; apostrophe, 61; auxesis, 110; baroque, 121, 125; blank verse, 146, 147, 149; broken rhyme, 166; burden, 170; caesura, 174, 175; canon, 187; charm, 224; classical models, 1162; closet drama, 270; comedy, 284; complaint, 286; conceit, 289–90; concision, 293; correlative verse, 307; credibility of, 135; demotion, 344; diction, 360; dramatic irony, 732; dramatic poetry, 377, 378, 381, 382, 383, 417, 418; emotion, 404, 405; English poetry, 416, 417, 418; English prosody, 432–33; enjambment, 417, 435; epanalepsis, 438; epizeuxis, 1043–44; feigning, 479; fourteener, 504; gay poetry, 541, 817; gender, 545; as genius, 550, 1220; hemistich, 616; hendiadys, 617; hypallage, 647; hyperbaton, 647; hyperbole, 648; hysteron proteron, 651; image, 661–62; imagery, 664, 665; imagination, 669, 670, 818; influence, 703; intensity, 710; intertextuality, 718; intuition, 720; language, 804–7; line, 802; masculine/feminine rhyme, 848; masque, 850; meiosis, 861; meter, 875; muse, 902; mythic allusion, 909; negative capability, 925–26, 1214; objective correlative, 963; oxymoron, 988; paraclausithyron, 996; parison, 734; paronomasia, 1004; pastourelle, 1008; performance, 380, 1162; phonestheme, 1039; poetic madness, 1057, 1178–79; polyptoton, 1086; priamel, 1107; punctuation, 1131; recitation of, 1149; rhyme royal, 1193–94; romantic view of, 1210, 1213, 1219, 1222, 1223; satire, 1257; scansion, 1260, 1261; sexain, 1297; sillepsis, 1391; sincerity, 1308; sonnet pattern, 1318, 1319, 1443–44; split lines, 1351; stichomythia, 1359; as Sturm und Drang model, 1368; syncope, 1400; touchstone lines, 1444; tragedy, 1448, 1449, 1450–51, 1459; tragicomedy, 1453; translations of, 148, 457; unconscious, 1127; unities, 1160; Venus and Adonis stanza, 1506, 1507; verse and prose, 1510; voice, 1526; war portrayal, 1531
Shakespeare's Sonnets. See Sonnets
Shakhova, Elizaveta, 1233
Shakuntala (Jones), 471
"Shallows of the Ford, The" (Knibbs), 313
Shalom, Shin, 614
Shanfarā, al-, 66
Shange, Ntozake, 24, 761, 762
Shang shu, 238, 239–40
Shapcott, Thomas, 102
Shapiro, David, 1038
Shapiro, Karl, 364, 1065
Sharīf al-Ṭalīq, al-, 28
Sharp, Cecil, 209, 1275
Sharpe, William, 550
Sharqawi, Abdel-Rahman al-, 392
Shaw, G. B., 56, 339, 377, 909, 1454, 1512
Shawqī, Aḥmad, 69, 392
Shchoholiv, Yakiv, 1478
Shearer, William, 1541
Sheikh, Malika Amar, 847
Shekhar, Agni, 768
Shelley, Mary, 141, 909
Shelley, P. B., 7, 141, 178, 271, 357, 437, 601, 704, 866, 1012, 1036, 1060, 1061, 1103, 1291; artifact, 87; chorus, 245; closet drama, 270; on didacticism, 363; dramatic verse, 378; elegy, 397, 423; emotion, 405, 406; English poetry, 422–23; epic, 446; falling rhythm, 1203; fragments, 506; gender dynamics, 545; history, 637; hymn, 646; hysteron proteron, 651; imagination, 670, 671, 672, 673, 725; as influence, 130, 728, 1328; inspiration, 709; intensity, 710; lyric, 831; myth, 908, 909; octave, 969; ode, 972; ottava rima, 986; parody, 1003; pathetic fallacy, 1009; philosophy, 1037, 1214–15; phonestheme, 1039; poetic calling, 1051, 1232; poetic knowledge, 772; power of poetry, 1066, 1215; rhyme scheme, 1139; romanticism, 1214–15, 1220, 1222, 1224; scientific knowledge, 1268; simile, 1307; sound, 1325; Spenserian stanza, 1358; spontaneity, 1352; symbols, 1395; synaesthesia, 1398; syntax, 1406; technology, 1414; tercet/terza rima, 1423–24; tetrameter, 1425; trimeter, 1459

Shen Jing, 238
Shenoda, Matthew, 761
Shephatiah ben Amittai, 605
Shepheardes Calender, The (Spenser), 41, 175, 357, 386, 402–3, 415, 479, 532, 703, 993, 1007, 1165; allegorical obscurity, 964; tail rhyme, 1409
"Shepherd and Goatherd" (Yeats), 397
Shepherd's Calendar, The (Clare), 175
Shepherds Play (Chester cycle), 812
Sherborne, Craig, 103
Sherburne, Edward, 847
Sheridan, Thomas, 1111, 1180
Sherry, Richard, 46
Shershenevich, Vladimir, 1235
Shetley, Vernon, 366
Shevchenko, Taras, 1220, 1478
shi, 234–35, 236, 237, 238–39, 240, 242, 243, 247, 248, 775, 818, 1066, 1298–1302, 1528
Shidyāq, Aḥmad Fāris al-, 69
"Shield of Achilles, The" (Auden), 1194
Shield of Herakles (pseudo-Hesiod), 349, 577, 578
Shijing (anthol.), 9, 234, 239, 774, 1034, 1298, 1302–3
Shiki, Masaoka, 594, 750, 751, 752
Shinkei, 759, 1167, 1168
Shinkokinshū (anthol.), 755, 1303–4, 1528
Shinsen Tsukubashū (anthol.), 1167
"Shi pin" (Zhong), 240
Ship of Fools, The (Brant), 561
Shirey Tiferet (Weizel), 613
Shirim (Amichai), 608
Shirim Shonim (Zach), 608
Shirley, James, 850
Shklovsky, Viktor, 343, 365, 805, 1045, 1062, 1173, 1200, 1432, 1433; Russian formalism, 1239–40, 1241
Shlonsky, Abraham, 607, 608, 614, 615
Shneor, Zalman, 607
Shnorhali, Nerses, 83
Shokubutsusai (Samio), 750
Shorter, Dora Sigerson, 730
Shorter American Memory (Waldrop), 373
Shpet, Gustav, 1362
Shropshire Lad, A (Housman), 424
"Shroud of Color, The" (Cullen), 22
Shteynbarg, Eliezer, 1549
Shūji, Miya, 751
Shūji, Terayama, 751
Shukrī, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, 70, 392
Shūōshi, Mizuhara, 752
Shuttle in the Crypt (Soyinka), 14
Shut Up Shut Down (Nowak), 373
Shvarts, Elena, 1238
Siamese poetry. See Thailand, poetry of Sic et Non (Abelard), 620
Sicilian octave, 969, 1304
Sicilian school, 190, 191, 374, 735, 737, 857, 1304, 1422, 1424
Sidatsangarava, 1355
Siddhi Dās Āmātya, 935
Sidney, Mary. See Herbert, Mary Sidney
Sidney, Philip, 249, 289, 353, 363, 399, 667, 852, 959, 1145, 1158, 1539; allegorical obscurity, 964–65; anadiplosis, 48; anaphora, 50; artifice, 89, 90; asclepiad, 91; auxesis, 110; belief, 134, 135; blank verse, 146; borrowing from, 42; correlative verse, 307; dizain, 372; emotional response, 403; English poetry, 415, 416–17, 418; epanalepsis, 438; epideixis, 449; feigning, 479; furor poeticus, 532; history, 633, 634, 637; iambic pentameter, 432; imagery, 663; imagination, 668, 669; imitation, 677, 1160; inspiration, 709; intensity, 710; invention, 725; lyric, 827; madrigal, 838–39; ottava rima, 986; parallelism, 999; parenthesis, 1000; pastoral, 351, 1007, 1165; Petrarchism, 1031; phalaecean, 1032; ploce, 1043; poem, 1046; on poetic creation, 1048, 1058, 1172, 1352; poetics, 1060, 1071, 1158, 1159, 1509; poetry definition, 677; polyptoton, 1086; poulter's measure, 1111; proem, 1109; pronunciation, 1111; prophetic poetry, 1112; psalter, 416–17, 599, 646, 1124, 1125, 1142, 1165; quantitative verse, 251, 628; quintain, 1142; recusatio, 1159; rhetoric, 637, 1162, 1177, 1179; on rhyme, 1184; sapphic, 1254; on satire, 1256; sestina, 1297; sonnet sequence, 553, 1164, 1320, 1321; terza rima, 1423; triple rhyme, 1461; trochaic, 1462; unities, 1160; Venus and Adonis stanza, 1506, 1507; verse and prose, 377; versimilitude, 1496
Sidney Psalter, 416–17
Sidonius. See Apollinaris Sidonius
Sidran, Abdulah, 159
Siege of Szigetvár, The (Zrínyi), 125, 641, 642
Siete contra Tebas, Los (Arrufat), 1452
Sievers, Eduard, 558–59, 610
Sievers's system, 430, 558–59, 610–11 sign, signified, signifier, 474, 679, 1099, 1282, 1304–6, 1324, 1361–62, 1364, 1366, 1367, 1494; hieroglyph, 629; iconicity, 655; imagery, 664; intertextuality, 717, 1087; representation, 1172, 1174; semiotics, 1286–89; symbol, 1391, 1392; text, 1426 signifying, 43, 760, 1002, 1055, 1170, 1306
Signo, Nuevo, 589
Sigourney, Lydia, 545, 1052, 1293, 1483
Sigurd Slembe (Bjørnson), 955
Sigurd the Volsung (Morris), 446
Sigvarth och Hilma (Kellgren), 149
Sikelianos, Angelos, 584
Silano, 604, 605
"silencio" (Gomringer), 294, 1332
Silesius, Angelus, 124, 562
Silkin, Jon, 426, 1532
Silko, Leslie Marmon, 699, 1108
Silliman, Ron, 113, 288, 506, 785, 964, 965, 1038, 1081, 1096, 1243, 1444, 1494 silloi, 1306
silva, 1306
Silva, Fernando, 947
Silva, José Asunción, 202, 275, 895, 1345
Silva, Medardo, 388–89
Silva, Ramón, 587
"Silva criolla" (Lazo Martí), 1504
Silva da Brito, Luís da, 466
Silvae (Statius), 350
Silva Estrada, Alfredo, 1505
Silva Maia Ferreira, José de, 17
Silvas americanas (Bello), 79, 693, 1346
Silva-Santisteban, Ricardo, 1028
Silva-Santisteban, Rocío, 1030
Sima Gung, 239
Sima Qian, 246
Sima Xiangru, 530
Simias of Rhodes, 175, 207–8
Šimić, Antun Branko, 159, 320
Simic, Charles, 1065
simile, 27, 58, 864, 1306–8, 1393; image, 660, 664; metaphor vs., 864, 865; touchstones, 1444
"Si mis párpados, Lisi, labios fueran" (Quevedo), 26
Simmons, James, 730
Simoko, Patu, 16
Simonides of Ceos, 53, 245, 261, 368, 371, 393, 410, 450, 451, 579, 645, 662, 1500
Simonsuuri, Kirsti, 490
Simplifications (Desmeth), 132
Simpson, Louis, 342
Şinasi, Ibrahim, 1473
Sinavaiana, Caroline, 1085 sincerity, 404, 1308–9
Sindhi poetry. See India, poetry of Sinervo, Elvi, 490
Singer, Irving, 815–16
Singer of Tales, The (Lord), 159, 977, 979, 1416
Singh, Bhai Vir, 1133
Singh, Moham, 1133
Singh, Puran, 1133
Sinhalese poetry, 1355–56
Siniddu Gebru, 462
Sinijaarv, Karl Martin, 461
Sîn-liqe-unninni, 95, 1049
Sino-Japanese poetry. See Chinese poetry in Japan
"Siona" (Klopstock), 244
Siôn Cent, 1536
Sioui, Jean, 184
Sipihrī, Suhrāb, 1024
Sipikin, Mudi, 597

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 394, 412, 431, 558, 859, 907, 912, 914, 1274; bob and wheel, 152
Siri Zainon Ismail, 841
"Sir Patrick Spens" (ballad), 504, 1542
sirventes, 185, 191, 1042, 1309
Sisheng yuan (Xu), 238
Sissay, Lemn, 1353
Sister Outsider (Lorde), 482
"Sisters, The" (Lowell), 1053
Site of Ambush (Ní Chuilleanáin), 729–30
Sitor Situmorang, 702
Sitwell, Edith, 425, 1315
Siunetsi, Stepanos, 83
Sivaram, Dharmu, 1411
Sixma van Heemstra, E. S., 529
Six Town Eclogues (Montague), 421
Siyabaslakara, 1355
Sjerodam, R. B., 377
Sjöberg, Birger, 149, 1383
Skáldatal, 953
Skeat, W. W., 1352
Skelton, John, 373, 384, 397, 398, 414, 432, 493, 812, 837, 1064, 1309; monorhyme, 899; rhyme royal, 1193
Skeltonics, 414, 1309
Skenderija, Saša, 159
Skhlovsky, Viktor, 534
skolion, 410, 990, 1309–10
Skovoroda, Hryhorii, 1477
Skovron, Alex, 102
Skujenieks, Knuts, 794
"Skunk Hour" (Lowell), 1025
Sládkovič, Andrej, 1311
slam, poetry. See poetry slam
Slamnig, Ivan, 320
slang. See diction
Slaveikov, Pencho, 168
Slaveikov, Petko, 168
"Slave Mother, The" (Harper), 20
"Slávy dcera" (Kollár), 331
Slaying of Meghanada, The (Dutt), 279
Sleepers Joining Hands (Bly), 77
Sleeping with the Dictionary (Mullen), 24, 288 śleṣa, 1310
Slessor, Kenneth, 101
"Slim" poems (Brown), 596
"slippingglimpse" (Strickland), 158
Slobin, Mark, 883
śloka, 310, 684, 687–89, 1049, 1132
Slovakia, poetry of, 1310–12
Slovenian poetry, 535, 1312
Slovo o polku Ihorevi, 1477
Słowacki, Juliusz, 139, 150, 1074–75
Sluchevsky, Konstantin, 1233
Smart, Christopher, 223, 420, 522, 557, 999, 1012, 1058, 1125, 1169, 1291, 1409
Smith, Adam, 408, 409, 670, 929, 1291, 1293, 1373
Smith, A. J. M., 178–79
Smith, Alexander, 1348
Smith, Barbara Herrnstein, 272, 601
Smith, Bessie, 152, 481
Smith, Charlotte, 420, 557, 713, 1293
Smith, Elihu Hubbard, 297, 1480
Smith, Elizabeth Oakes, 1483
Smith, John, 58
Smith, Marc, 1070
Smith, Michael, 196
Smith, Patricia, 1070
Smith, Sydney Goodsir, 1276
Smith, Wycliffe, 193
Smither, Elizabeth, 944
Smithyman, Kendrick, 944
Smithy poets, 1312–13
Smrek, Ján, 1311
Smuul, Juhan, 460
Snead, James A., 1169
Snell, A. F. L., 246
Snell, J. A. N., 306
Snellman, J. W., 489
Snodgrass, W. D., 296, 967, 1491
Snoilsky, Carl, 1383
Snorri Sturluson, 389–90, 1116
"Snowfall in the Afternoon" (Bly), 1492
"Snow Man, The" (Stevens), 1511
Snyder, Gary, 56, 57, 93, 131, 241, 343, 699, 887, 1081, 1108, 1157, 1243, 1492; ecological poetry, 437; haiku, 595
Soares de Brito, João, 466
Soares de Passos, António Augusto, 1091
Soares de Taverió, Pai, 185
Sŏ Chŏng-ju, 778, 779
Socrates, 254, 258, 335, 549, 619, 633, 709, 902, 920, 990, 991, 1034, 1413; dialogue, 357, 718, 1065; irony, 731, 732; mimesis, 884; paraphrase, 1510; poetic madness, 1057, 1058
Södergran, Edith, 490, 491, 1383
Soffici, Ardengo, 534, 746
Sofia, José Antonio, 230
Sofola, 1451
Sōgi, Inō, 1167
Sohrab and Rustum (Arnold), 471
Sōkan, Yamazaki, 593
Solar, Xul, 1545–46
Soldanieri, Niccolò, 173
Sole, Kelwyn, 15
Soledades (Góngora), 123, 289, 1165, 1339
Soleil de la conscience (Glissant), 199
Solger, Karl, 1213
Solie, Karen, 181
Solilo, John, 1545
Soliloquy (Goldsmith), 292
"Soliloquy of the Spanish Cloister" (Browning), 173
Sôlin, Nishiyama, 593
"Solitary Reaper, The" (Wordsworth), 451
Šoljan, Antun, 320
Sollers, Philippe, 387, 1418
Sologub, Fyodor, 1234, 1363, 1396
Solomos, Dionysios, 583, 916–17, 918
Solon, 578, 1459
Soloviev, Vladimir, 1156, 1397
"Solway Ford" (Gibson), 650
Somadeva, 684
Somali poetry, 1313–14
Someck, Ronny, 608
Somerville, William, 557
Sommer, Piotr, 1077
Sommerfugledalen—et requiem (Brøndal), 348
Somov, Konstantin, 338
Sondheim, Alan, 271, 272, 396, 1416
Sondheim, Stephen, 800, 1184
Sonetos de la Muerte (Mistral), 545
Sonette an Orpheus, Die (Rilke), 105, 566, 1320, 1322
Sonette aus Venedig (Platen), 1320
Sonetti Lussuriosi (Aretino), 455, 456 song, 420, 1314–16
Song, Cathy, 92
songbook, 1317–18
Songe de Vaux, Le (La Fontaine), 351
Songes and Sonettes. See Tottel's Miscellany
"Song for St. Cecilia's Day, A" (Dryden), 225, 972
"Song My Paddle Sings, The" (Johnson), 178
Song of Agushaya, 96
"Song of Hiawatha" (Longfellow). See Hiawatha
Song of Lawino (Okot), 14
"Song of Myself" (Whitman), 48, 706, 813, 1169, 1216, 1223, 1316, 1474
Song of Roland. See Chanson de Roland
Song of Solomon (Heb. OT), 140, 1049. See also Song of Songs
Song of Songs (Heb. OT), 39, 140, 349, 353, 388, 452, 456, 598, 603, 659, 814, 816, 1157, 1392
"Song of the Husbandman," 288–89
"Song of the Merchant Kalashnikov" (Lermontov), 150
"Song of the Smoke, The" (Du Bois), 21
"Song of the War-Carts" (Tu), 1530
Song of Udhra (Mackey), 24
"Song of Ullikummi," 639
Songoro cosongo (Guillén), 204, 1346
Songs and Sonnets (Donne), 418, 419, 433, 996, 1523
Songs from the Wilderness (Parkes), 15
Songs of Chu. See Chuci
Songs of Innocence and Experience (Blake), 147, 157, 286, 293, 422, 825, 1157, 1316, 1414
Songs of the Aztecs (anthol.), 698, 879
Songs of the Great Dominion (Lighthall), 178
Songs of the Sage (Fletcher), 314
Songs of the Soil (Johnson), 21
"Songs of the Western Slavs" (Pushkin), 149
Song Yu, 246
Sonne, Jørgen, 347
sonnet, 146, 340, 374, 969, 1086, 1318–21, 1527; caudate, 216, 1319; corona, 306–7; curtal, 327–28; Dutch, 820–21; English, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 420, 422, 423, 424, 1031, 1164, 1318, 1319, 1320, 1321–22, 1424, 1443–44; French, 509, 510, 1001, 1043, 1319–20, 1321; German, 1320; Hebrew, 605, 613, 614; Italian, 735, 737, 738, 1318, 1319; Petrarchan, 414, 415, 416, 553, 708, 736, 827, 835, 1031, 1050, 1189, 1318, 1319, 1321, 1444, 1457; Portuguese, 1319, 1321; rhyme scheme, 160, 1194, 1195; sestet, 1296, 1297; Sicilian school, 1304, 1424; Spanish, 617, 1319, 1321, 1336, 1339; terza rima, 1423–24. See also sonnet sequence

"Sonnet Reversed" (Brooke), 1319
Sonnets (Shakespeare), 48, 58, 94, 125, 405, 414, 416, 553, 835, 1031, 1050, 1056, 1164, 1318, 1319, 1320, 1321, 1424; conceit, 289–90; concision, 293; "Dark Lady," 545; Esperanto translation, 457; gender, 545; linguistics, 804–7; lyric, 827, 913; muse, 902; paired, 286; polyptoton, 1086; polysyndeton, 1088; repetition, 1169; rhyme scheme, 1194, 1195; rhythmic figures, 1198
Sonnets, The (Berrigan), 835 sonnet sequence, 372, 736, 817, 834–35, 959, 987, 1050, 1320, 1321–22
Sonnets from the Portuguese (Browning), 423, 1216, 1320, 1321
Sonnets to Orpheus (Rilke), 105, 566, 910, 1156, 1320, 1322
Sonnevi, Göran, 1384
Sons of Ben. See Cavalier poets
Sontag, Susan, 716, 1002
Šop, Nikola, 320
Sophist (Plato), 885, 1160
Sophists, 43, 253, 725, 1114
Sophocles, 244, 265, 266, 377, 649, 908, 1127, 1154, 1351, 1424; lament, 781; plot, 1045–46; tragedy, 579, 1428, 1446, 1447, 1448, 1449, 1450, 1451; trilogy, 1458–59
Sophonisba (Trissino), 145
Sophron, 282, 357, 883, 1006
Sordello (Browning), 365
Sorescu, Marin, 1207
Sor Juana. See Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la
Sosa, Roberto, 819
Sosnora, Viktor, 1237
Sosnowski, Andrzej, 1077
sotadean, 993, 1322
Sotades, 993, 1322
Soto, Gary, 229
Soto de Rojas, Pedro, 1338
Sotomayor, Aurea María, 206
Soto Vélez, Clemente, 203
Sougarev, Edvin, 169
Soulages, Pierre, 32
Souls of Black Folk, The (Du Bois), 21 sound, 50, 224, 273, 385, 1322–27; alliteration, 40–41; assonance, 94–95; cacophony, 173; dissonance, 370; euphony, 464–65; rhyme, 1187–89; timbre, 1438–39; tone, 1441, 1442 sound poetry, 89, 112, 180, 1324, 1327–29, 1353, 1430; glossolalia, 573; jitanjáfora, 763–64
Sounds of a Cowhide Drum (Mtshali), 1331
"Sounds of Sixth Street, The" (Morales), 961
Soupault, Philippe, 515, 1378
Sour Grapes (Williams), 1487
Souris, André, 132
Sousa, Francisco de, 1088
Sousa, Noémia, 18
Sousa Andrade, Joaquim de, 161
Souster, Raymond, 179
Soutar, William, 1276
South Africa, poetry of, 14, 15, 51, 1329–32, 1544–45, 1553–54
South America, poetry of. See specific countries
Southern Road (Brown), 22, 596
Southey, Robert, 250, 252, 285, 438, 471, 628, 780, 958, 1254, 1255, 1268
Soutsos, Alexandros, 583
Souza, Eunice de, 1094
Soyfer, Jura, 105
Soyinka, Wole, 13, 14, 284, 378, 1094, 1450–51 space, poetic, 1332–33
Spagnuoli Mantuanus, Baptista. See Mantuan
Spahr, Juliana, 710, 1140–41
Spain, poetry of, 1333–43; al-Andalus, 27–29; Basque Country, 126–28; Catalan, 211–13; Judeo-Hebrew, 604–5; Judeo-Spanish, 764–65. See also Spanish prosody
"Spain, Take This Cup from Me" (Vallejo), 1122
Spain in Our Hearts (Neruda), 1346
"Spain 1937" (Auden), 1531
Spalletti, Giuseppe, 932
Spanish America, poetry of, 278–79, 1343–47; baroque, 122, 124, 1339; indigenous, 690–98; modernismo, 894–96; neobaroque, 927–28, 1347
"Spanish Dancer" (Rilke), 336
Spanish prosody, 1347–48; cuaderna vía, 321; espinela, 458; folia, 493; glosa, 572; hendecasyllable, 617; octosyllable, 970; redondilla, 1151; remate, 1157–58 spasmodic school, 423, 1348–49
Spasova, Kamelia, 170
spatial form, 1349
Spaziani, Maria Luisa, 748
Spazieren in Berlin (Hessel), 680
"Spaziergang, Der" (Schiller), 398, 564
speaker. See persona; voice
Speak Low (Phillips), 24–25
"Speak What" (Micone), 184
"Speak White" (Lalonde), 184, 515
Spectator (jour.), 48, 660, 931
Spee, Friedrich, 124, 562 speech act theory, 514, 1146, 1349–50
Spegel, Haquin, 1382
Spencer, Anne, 22, 596, 1489
Spender, Stephen, 425, 452, 541, 648, 925
Spengler, Oswald, 1037
Spenser, Edmund, 79, 147, 224, 251, 357, 361, 398, 418, 469, 972, 986, 1159, 1166, 1316; allegorical obscurity, 964; allegory, 37, 38, 40, 445, 446, 484, 908–9, 1393; alliteration, 41; archaism, 75; calendrical poetry, 175; canon, 187; canto, 190; carpe diem, 209; catalog, 214; chain rhyme, 220; colonial poetics, 279; complaint, 286; concatenation, 289; cossante, 308; couplet, 311; description, 351; diction, 358; eclogue, 386, 415, 1007, 1165; emotional response, 402–3; English poetry, 415, 1264; English prosody, 430, 432, 433; epic, 441, 442, 443, 445, 446, 456, 1160, 1164; epideixis, 449; epithalamium, 452, 966; epithet, 453; fragment, 505; furor poeticus, 532; gender, 545; history, 637; hymn, 646; hypallage, 647; hyperbaton, 648; imagination, 669; imitation, 679, 1162; as influence, 703, 1264; influences on, 705; Irish poetry, 728; in medias res, 708; Muse, 902; narrative poem, 912, 913, 914, 915; numerology, 959; palinode, 993; paronomasia, 1004; pastoral, 479, 1007; pastourelle, 1008; poet laureate, 1064, 1227; polyptoton, 1086; refrain, 1152; rhetoric, 1162; rhyme royal, 1194; rich rhyme, 1199; rota virgiliana, 1227; sonnet pattern, 1031, 1318, 1319, 1424; sonnet sequence, 1320; tail rhyme, 1409; Venus and Adonis stanza, 1506; wit, 1539
Spenserian stanza, 415, 912, 913, 1264, 1350–51, 1359
Speroni, Sperone, 1159
Spervogel, 1353
Spicer, Jack, 542, 1096, 1243, 1295, 1492
Spiegelblatt, Alexander, 1549
Spinelli, Alexian Santino, 1208
Spingarn, Joel, 1177
Spinola, Magdelena, 589
Spinoza, Baruch, 620, 668, 672, 719, 822, 921, 1368 spiritual, 22, 152, 1351
Spiritual Exercises (Loyola), 98
Spitteler, Carl, 1386
Spitzer, Leo, 44, 123, 458, 459, 500, 938
Spitzweg, Carl, 139
"Spleen, The" (Finch), 420
Spleen de Paris, Le (Baudelaire), 513, 1112 split lines, 146, 149, 802, 1351
Spoerri, Daniel, 33
Sponde, Jean de, 123, 124, 510–11
spondee, 165, 1351–52
spontaneity, 550, 1058, 1352–53
spoonerism, 647, 1264

Spoon River Anthology (Masters), 357, 451, 913, 946, 1485 sprezzatura, 249, 415, 843
Spring and All (Williams), 436, 1296, 1487, 1490
"Spring and Fall" (Hopkins), 800
"Spring Images" (Wright), 524
Spring in New Hampshire (McKay), 22
"Spring Prospect" (Du Fu), 239
Spruchdichtung, 560, 1353–54, 1533
Sprung, Mervyn, 1010 sprung rhythm, 308, 424, 433, 436, 653, 813, 873, 914, 1216, 1354
Squarzafico, Hieronimo, 1031
Squire, J. C., 556
"Squire's Tale, The" (Chaucer), 705
Srengenge, Sitok, 702
Sri Lanka, poetry of, 1355–57
Śrīnātha, 1419
Sri Sri (Srirangam Srinivasa Rao), 1420
Sruoga, Balys, 810
Srvandztiantz, Karekin, 84
"Stabat mater dolorosa" (hymn), 791
Stabo, 255
Stadler, Ernst, 475, 566
Staël, Germaine de, 109, 1216
Staff, Leopold, 1076
Staffeldt, A. W. Schack von, 345
Stafford, William, 77, 342, 571, 1490
Stagnelius, Erik Johan, 149, 1383
"Stalin Epigram" (Mandelstam), 1121
Stallings, A. E., 1460
Štambuk, Drago, 320
Stampa, Gaspara, 741, 1031, 1319
Stanca, Radu, 1206
stances, 1357
standard Habbie. See Burns stanza Stanescu, Nichita, 1206
Stanislavski, Konstantin, 380–81, 382
Stanley, Thomas, 217
Stanyhurst, Richard, 251, 628, 1125
stanza, 1357–59
Stanzas for Iris Lezak (Mac Low), 33
Stanzas in Meditation (Stein), 1490
Stanze (Politian), 740–41
"Star, The" (Taylor), 1149
Starobinski, Jean, 548, 549
"Star-Spangled Banner, The" (anthem), 51, 972, 1483 Star Waka (Hulme), 1085
stasimon, 1359
Statische Gedichte (Benn), 567
Statius, 98, 350, 532, 678, 788, 859 stave, 1359
St.-Céran, Tullius, 517
Stead, C. K., 944
Stedman, Edmund Clarence, 1480
Steele, Joshua, 47, 878, 1039–40, 1197
Steele, Peter, 102
Steele, Timothy, 937
Steendam, Jacob, 821
Stefanovych, Oleksa, 1478
Stefans, Brian Kim, 93, 158, 288, 395, 965–66
Steffens, Heinrich, 345
Stein, Charles, 463
Stein, Gertrude, 12, 99, 145, 292, 336, 368, 452, 505, 664, 1037, 1243, 1269, 1486, 1488, 1490, 1493; avant-garde, 111, 764; cubism, 321, 322; difficulty, 365; dramatic poetry, 378, 379, 380; feminist poetry, 481; hybrid poetry, 645; lesbian poetry, 797, 1140; long poem, 813; minimalism, 706; originality, 983; prose poem, 1113, 1512; radiophonic medium, 1414; repetition, 1169, 1488; serial form, 1296; sound play, 1328
Steinarr, Steinn, 654–55
Steinberg, Jacob, 607
Steiner, Franz Baermann, 105
Steiner, Jörg, 1386
Steiner, Wendy, 991
Stelaru, Dimitrie, 1206
Stèles (Segalen), 514
Stello (Vigny), 1051
Stelzhamer, Karl, 104
Stemmen uit Afrika (Arion), 193
Stemninger (Jørgensen), 346
Stendhal (pseud. of Marie Henri Beyle), 38, 570, 1216, 1220, 1221
Stern, Anatol, 535
Stern, Samuel M., 769, 858
Sterne, Laurence, 1202
Sternhold, Thomas, 120, 504, 646, 1015, 1125, 1165
Stesichorus, 453, 578–79, 993
Stevens, Wallace, 51, 82, 142, 336, 354, 364, 368, 437, 450, 833, 869; alliteration, 41–42; alliterative accentual meter, 873–74; blank verse, 147; choliambus, 244; cubism, 321, 322; diction, 358, 360, 361; difficulty, 365; hermeticism, 623; imagination, 673; long poem, 813; lyric sequence, 835; meter, 433; modernism, 891, 892; paronomasia, 1004; philosophy, 1036, 1037, 1038; pure poetry, 1134; recusatio, 1150; romanticism, 1061; science, 1268–69; simile, 1307; sound, 1326–27; split lines, 1351; symbol, 1394; tercet, 1423; U.S. poetry, 1486, 1488, 1490; verse and prose, 1511
Stevenson, Robert Louis, 960, 1275, 1276
Stewart, Douglas, 101
Stewart, George, 496
Stewart, Harold, 101
Stewart, Susan, 12, 464, 972, 993, 1526–27
stichomythia, 149, 386, 1359
stichos, 9, 36–37, 1020, 1320, 1359
Stiernhielm, Georg, 1382
Stifter, Adalbert, 139
Stikhi o prekrasnoi dame (Blok), 1234
stil nuovo. See Dolce stil nuovo
Stilo, Aelius, 256
Stivell, Alan, 164
stock, 1359–60
Stockenström, Wilma, 1330
Stockton, Annis Boudinot, 1481–82
Stolberg, Christian, 563
Stolberg, Friedrich, 563
Stone (Mandelstam), 1236
Stoppard, Tom, 42, 111, 377
"Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" (Frost), 220, 1019, 1424
"Stops and Rebels" (Stefans), 288
stornello, 1360
Storni, Alfonsina, 80, 1345, 1346
Storyteller (Silko), 699
Strabo, 120, 217, 885
Strachey, Lytton, 142
strambotto, 1360
Stramm, August, 475, 566, 890
Strand, Mark, 571, 1065, 1095, 1492
Strange, Sharan, 337
"Strange Meeting" (Owen), 914
Strassburg, Gottfried von, 860
Stratan, Ion, 1207
Strato of Sardis, 53
Strauss, Leo, 622
Strauss, Richard, 338
Strazdas, Antanas, 810
Street in Bronzeville, A (Brooks), 23
Strehlow, T.G.H., 100
Stricker, Der (The Weaver), 561, 1353
Strickland, Stephanie, 158, 395
Strindberg, August, 378, 898, 1383, 1450
Stringer, Arthur, 178
Strittmatter, Erwin, 149
Ström, Eva, 1385
strophe, 26, 31, 971, 1360–61; antistrophe, 58 structuralism, 49, 60, 142, 304, 474, 664, 704, 927, 1062, 1097, 1098, 1170, 1265, 1286, 1305, 1361–66, 1366–67; imagination, 673; meter function, 875; metonymy vs. metaphor, 876; science, 1266. See also poststructuralism structure, 1366–68, 1430
Strunge, Michael, 348
Stuart, Jesse, 531
Stub, Ambrosius, 340
Stuckenberg, Viggo, 346
Stunden-Buch, Das (Rilke), 104–5
"Stupid america" (Delgado), 228
Štúr, Ľudovít, 1311
Sturluson, Snorri. See Snorri Sturluson
Sturm, J. C., 942, 944, 1085
Sturm und Drang, 550, 634, 663, 743, 1108, 1210, 1368–69 style, 1369–70, 1372–73 Styles, Morag, 960
stylistics, 1370–72
Su, Armand, 457
Subandhu, 1310
Subbarao, Rayaprolu, 1420
sublime, 128, 258, 365, 409, 421, 563, 704, 1059, 1105, 1146, 1372–75; Hebraism, 598, 601, 614; imagination, 669, 678; inspiration, 709; intensity, 710; intuition, 720; landscape, 782–83, 931; as masculine, 545, 546; nature, 922, 1374; neoclassical poetics, 929–30, 931; ode, 972; poetic transport, 1177;

romanticism, 1211, 1224; sensibility, 1291 substitution, 260, 875, 1375–76
Suckling, John, 217, 286, 419, 452, 1166
Sucre, Guillermo, 1505
Suenan timbres (Vidales), 275
Sueño de las escalinatas, El (Zalamea), 275
Sueños (Quevedo), 123
Suetonius, 141, 256
Sugata Saurabha (Chittadhar), 935–36
Sugawara no Michizane, 243
Suger, Abbot, 39, 40
Suicide in an Airplane (Stefan), 158
Suite logique (Brossard), 183
Suits, Gustav, 460
Suknaski, Andrew, 179
Sullivan, Gary, 492
Sullivan, Robert, 942, 944, 1085
Sully-Prudhomme, F.R.A., 1001, 1357
Sulzer, J. G., 667, 670, 672, 911
Sumarokov, Alexander, 933, 1230, 1231
Sumerian poetry, 96, 638–39, 1376–77
Sumerki (Baratynsky), 1231–32
Sundaram, 590
"Sunday Morning" (Stevens), 147, 244, 354
"Sundays of Satin-Legs Smith, The" (Brooks), 23
"Sun Rising, The" (Donne), 29, 418, 1019
Sunthorn Phu, 1431
Supervielle, Jules, 1500
Süreya, Cemal, 1473–74
Surprised by Sin (Fish), 365
surrealism, 32, 82, 290, 504, 515, 679, 992, 1108, 1112, 1347, 1353, 1377–80; avant-garde, 111, 112, 113; Dada, 334–35; masculine discourse, 546; Tel Quel critique of, 1418
Surrey, Earl of (Henry Howard), 145–46, 286, 340, 628, 1274, 1506; as courtly maker, 312–13; English prosody, 432, 1184; Petrarchism, 1031, 1164; poulter's measure, 1100; psalms, 599, 1165; sonnet, 414, 416, 1320, 1321; trimeter, 1459. See also Tottel's Miscellany
Suryakant Tripathi ("Nirala"), 631
Susenbrotus, Johannes, 58, 1044, 1553
Su Shi (Su Dongpo), 248, 1300
"Susie Asado" (Stein), 336
Susukida Kyūkin, 753
Sutardji Calzoum Bachri, 702
Sutherland, Efua, 284
Sutherland, John, 179, 180
Su Wu, 1298
Su Wu-li Ling, 1298
Suyemoto, Toyo, 91
Suze sina razmetnoga (Gundulić), 319–20
Svedberg, Jesper, 1382
Svenbro, Jesper, 1384
Svenska bilder (Snoilsky), 1383
Sverige—en vintersaga (Palm), 149
Světlá, Karolina, 331
Svidzins'ky, Volodymyr, 1478
Swahili poetry, 1380–82
Sweden, poetry of, 490, 491, 536, 1382–85
Swedenborg, Emanuel, 1216, 1392
Sweeney Agonistes (Eliot), 379
Sweet New Style. See Dolce stil nuovo
Sweet Nosgay, or Pleasant Posye, A (Whitney), 415
Swensen, Cole, 644, 645
Swenson, May, 797, 1540
Swetlund, Frances L., 158
Świetlicki, Marcin, 1077
Swift, Jonathan, 297, 373, 386, 420–21, 433, 727, 728, 1200; didactic poetry, 363; irony, 732; mock epic, 889; psychoanalytic study of, 1127; querelle des anciens et des modernes, 265, 928, 1142; satire, 664, 1255; tetrameter, 970
Swinburne, A. C., 31, 117, 119, 140, 244, 252, 358, 424, 438, 492, 531, 898, 974, 1216, 1348, 1489; aestheticism, 10; anapest, 49, 433; decadence, 338; fleshly school, 492; meter, 431; ottava rima, 986; phalaecean, 1032; Pre-Raphaelites, 1103; roundel, 1227; sestina, 1297; sonnet, 1320
Swir, Anna (Anna Świrszczyńska), 1077
Switzerland, poetry of, 1385–88
Syair Ken Tambuhan, 841
Sybesma, R. P., 528
Syed, Najm Hosain, 1133
syllabic verse, 433, 874, 952, 1388–90; accentual, 3–4 syllable, 40–41, 47, 49, 50, 1390–91; accent, 2–3; alexandrine, 35–36; ellipsis, 400; quantity, 260, 1137. See also octosyllable syllepsis, 1086, 1391; zeugma vs., 1553
Sylvain, George, 198 symbol, 55, 671, 1391–95. See also allegory symbolism, 10, 11, 70, 82, 487, 892, 901, 905, 991, 1103, 1395–98; decadence, 338; difficulty, 365; Dinggedicht, 367; hermeticism, 623; hybrid poetry, 644; imagery, 663; impressionism, 680; lyric, 832; pure poetry, 1134; synaesthesia, 1398; trimètre, 1460
Symeon the New Theologian, 172, 1079
Symons, Arthur, 119, 832, 890, 1194, 1397, 1488 sympathy. See empathy and sympathy
"Symphony in Yellow" (Wilde), 708 Symphosius, 53, 1200
synaeresis, 1398
synaesthesia, 1395, 1398–99, 1438 synaloepha, 1399
synapheia, 1399–1400
syncopation, 309, 1400
syncope, 1400
synecdoche, 59, 664, 876, 958, 1400–1401
Synge, J. M., 118, 1397
Synopsis Chronike (Manasses), 172 syntax, poetic, 1401–7
Sypher, Wylie, 843
Syquia, Luis, 92
Syrtes, Les (Moréas), 514
Syrus, Publius, 883 system, 1407
syzygy, 1407
S/Z (Barthes), 299, 992, 1426
Szabó, Lőrine, 643
Szilágy, Domokos, 643
Szymborska, Wisława, 1077, 1080
Szymonowic, Szymon, 1073

Tabaré (Zorrilla), 1499
Tabidze, Galaktion, 555
Tabidze, Titsian, 555
Tabito, Ōtomo no, 844
Tablada, José Juan, 594, 880, 895, 1345
"Tables Turned, The" (Wordsworth), 1267–68
Table-Talk (Coleridge), 598
Tabori, George, 381
Tachtigers, 1408
Tacitus, 257–58, 557, 574, 1503
Taeuber-Arp, Sophie, 336
Tafdrup, Pia, 348
tagelied, 29, 560, 888, 1408
Tagoona, Armand, 722
Tagore, Rabindranath, 137, 138, 279, 353, 590, 687, 819
Tāhā, ʿĀlī Maḥmūd, 70, 392
Ṭahṭāwī, Rifāʿa al-, 69
Tahuantinsuyu, 690, 691, 693–95
Taibo, Victoriano, 538
Taigi, Tan, 594
Taille, Jacques de la, 1159, 1518 tail rhyme, 216, 431, 432, 796, 1408–9; Burns stanza, 170
Taine, Hippolyte, 711, 1216
Takahashi, Matsuo, 543
Takahashi Shinkichi, 753
Takamura Kōtarō, 753
Takehiro, Sage Uʻilani, 1085
Takeo, Kuwabara, 752
Takuboku, Ishikawa, 750
Tala (Mistral), 1346
Taldir-Jaffrennou, François, 164
Tale of Genji, The, 755, 757, 1303
"Tale of Sir Thopas" (Chaucer), 152, 373, 432, 1002, 1409
"Tale of the Fisherman and the Fish" (Pushkin), 149
"Tales of a Wayside Inn" (Longfellow), 1484
Tales of Ise, The, 286
Talfourd, Thomas Noon, 1145
Taliesin, 1533, 1534, 1535, 1550
Tallet, José Zacarías, 203, 204, 764
Tallis, Thomas, 51
Tallman, Warren, 1439
Talvik, Heiti, 460
Tamariz, Hugo Salazar, 389

Tamayo, Franz, 154
Tamburlaine the Great (Marlowe), 417, 648, 1459
Tamil poetry and poetics, 689, 1355, 1356–57, 1409–11
"Tam Lin" (ballad), 116
Tamura Ryūichi, 753
Tan (epic), 1116
Tanaka, Ronald, 92
Tandeakan Araspel (Charents), 85
Tandori, Dezső, 643
Tang Xianzu, 238
tanaga, 898, 1032
Tanikawa Shuntarō, 753
tanka, 750–51, 1142, 1528, 1529, 1530
Tannhäuser, 796, 1534
Tanselle, G. T., 1428
Tansi, Labou, 1451
Tansillo, Luigi, 742
Tao Qian (Tao Yuanming), 530, 1299
Tapahonso, Luci, 923, 924
Tappan, Caroline Sturgis, 1455
Taranovsky, Kiril, 1363
Taratoa, Erenora, 941
Tarlinskaja, Marina, 875, 1371
Tarn, Nathaniel, 56, 463
Tarnawsky, Yuriy, 1479
Task, The (Cowper), 304, 421, 557, 1291, 1292, 1293
Tassis y Peralta, Juan de, 1338
Tasso, Bernardo, 742, 972
Tasso, Torquato, 46, 48, 190, 350–51, 471, 736, 741, 838, 932, 1007, 1165, 1231; baroque, 121, 124, 125; epic, 441, 442, 443, 445, 446, 456, 1059, 1160, 1162, 1164; Évora critics, 460; heroic verse, 625; imitation, 679, 1161, 1162; Italian poetry, 742, 743; narrative poem, 913; ottava rima, 913, 986; poem, 1046; sonnet, 1031, 1319; versi sciolti, 1516
Tassoni, Alessandro, 736, 743 taste, 62, 106–7, 421, 473, 634, 782, 1373, 1411–13; je ne sais quois, 762–63; neoclassical poetics, 930, 931, 933
Tastu, Amable, 1052
Tate, Allen, 23, 25, 295, 771, 973, 1125; Fugitives, 531, 1490; New Criticism, 936, 1000, 1062, 1490, 1491; poet laureate, 1065
Tate, Nahum, 1064, 1125, 1447
Tatius, Achilles, 172
Tatlin, Vladimir, 301
"Tattoos" (Wright), 862
Taufiq Ismail, 702
Taussig, Michael, 464
Tavares, Ana Paula, 19
Tavaststjerna, Karl August, 489
Táxi ou poema de amor passageiro (Espínola), 163
Taylor, Apirana, 942, 944, 1085
Taylor, Edward, 6, 125, 353, 486, 835, 1409, 1481
Taylor, Jane, 1149
Taylor, John, 993
Taylor, Peter, 531
Taylor, William, 252
Tāyumāṇavar, 1410
Tchernikhovsky, Saul, 607, 614
Tchicaya U'Tamsi, 17
Te Ariki. See Campbell, Alistair Te Ariki
"Tears of Blood" (Papusza), 1208
Teasdale, Sara, 1227
"Teatro" (Morales), 961 technology and poetry, 1067, 1413–17. See also electronic poetry; typography technopaegnion, 175, 1417–18, 1523
Tedlock, Barbara, 463
Tedlock, Dennis, 463, 699, 980
Tegernsee, 678
Tegnér, Esaias, 1382, 1383
Teige, Karel, 331, 535
Teika. See Fujiwara Teika
Teillier, Jorge, 231
Teimuraz I (King of Georgia), 554–55
Teitoku, Matsunaga, 593
Teixeira, Bento, 160, 1089
Teixeira, Judith, 481, 1091
Tekeyan, Vahan, 84
Tekkan, Yosano, 750
telesilleum, 1418
Tello, Julio, 692–93
Tel Quel (jour.), 133, 387, 473, 927, 1365, 1367, 1418, 1425
Telugu poetry, 1418–21
"Temblor de Lima, El" (Oña), 230
Tempest, The (Shakespeare), 56, 125, 170, 280, 409, 417, 850, 1008, 1160, 1453
Tempier, Étienne, 1266
Temple, The (Herbert), 418, 450, 599, 835, 1156
Temple, William, 265, 1141, 1142
Templin, Procopius von, 104
Tempo, Antonio da, 1031
Tender Buttons (Stein), 99, 322, 481, 813, 1113, 1140, 1296, 1488
Tenebrae (Hill), 1157
Tennis Court Oath, The (Ashbery), 941
Tennyson, Alfred, Lord, 10, 128, 269, 316, 357, 361, 363, 369, 423, 446, 553, 832, 913, 1044, 1052, 1103, 1248; alcaic ode, 31; alliteration, 41; binary meter, 140; biography, 141; blank verse, 147, 433; chiasmus, 225; choliambus, 244; classical meter, 252, 1114; dialect, 356; dramatic verse, 378; elegy, 398, 423, 424; envelope stanza, 1139; epithalamium, 452; exoticism, 471; galliambus, 540; hexameter mockery, 628; iambic tetrameter, 1424; idyll, 659; as influence, 1489; information, 707; In Memoriam stanza, 708, 1145; landscape, 783; lyric sequence, 835; meter, 431; monologue, 423, 898, 1145; narrative poem, 912; nature, 919; ode, 973; paraclausithyron, 996; pathetic fallacy, 1009, 1010; performance, 1017; phalaecean, 1032; phonestheme, 1039; poet laureate, 1065; recitation poems, 1149; recording technology, 1414; sapphic, 1254; science, 1268; sound symbolism, 1324; Spenserian stanza, 1350; tail rhyme, 1409; war poetry, 1531 tenor and vehicle, 442, 467, 664, 863, 1421–22
Tenreiro, Francisco José, 18 tenso, 185, 493, 1422
Tentation du visage, La (Muir), 133
Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America, The (Bradstreet), 902, 1481
Tenzin Tsundue, 1436
Teofilov, Ivan, 169
Tepepulco Manuscripts, 697 tercet, 220, 1423
Terence, 82, 189, 256, 283, 485, 581, 653, 883, 1462, 1519
Terent'ev, Igor, 535
Terentianus Maurus, 1259
Teresa of Ávila, 98, 354, 388, 1337
Térey, János, 643
Tereza (Breton poet), 165
Terian, Vahan, 84
"Terje Vigen" (Ibsen), 954
ternary. See binary and ternary
Ternura (Mistral), 231
Terpander, 577
"terra" (Pignatari), 557
Terrasses et Tableaux (De Haes), 133
Terrazas, Francisco de, 879
Terre inuiète, Un (Glissant), 199
Tersilla, 1418
Tersteegen, Gerhard, 562
Tertullian, 485–86, 676, 1193
terza rima, 173, 191, 200, 220, 414, 416, 432, 736, 912, 913, 1015, 1155, 1423
terza rima sonnet, 1423–24
Tesauro, Emanuele, 122, 124, 290, 1159, 1539
Teseida (Boccaccio), 740, 913
Testament d'En Bernat Serradell (Serradell), 211
"Testamento de Potosí" (anon.), 153
Testament of Beauty, The (Bridges), 1389
Testament of Cresseid, The (Henryson), 1281
Testimony (Reznikoff), 373, 504, 707
Testut, Charles, 518
Tetens, J. N., 478, 667
Tetmajer, Kazimierz Przerwa, 1075 tetrameter, 4, 433, 652, 970, 1424–25; anapest, 49; bridge, 165; catalexis, 214; trochaic, 1462–63 tetrameter couplet. See Knittelvers tétramètre, 1425
text, 1425–26, 1429
textual criticism, 1425, 1426–29
textuality, 1429–30. See also intertextuality texture, 1430
T'ga za jug (Miladinov), 837
Tgha, Grigor IV, 83
Thābit ibn Jābir, 66

Thackery, William, 166
Thailand, poetry of, 1430–32
Thākar, Lābhshankar, 590
Thākore, B. K., 590
Thākura, Daityāri, 94
Tha'lab, 62–63
Thaletas of Gortyn, 649
Thaly, Daniel, 197
Thaly, Kálmán, 642
Thám, Václav, 331
Thaman, Konai Helu, 1085
"Thanatopsis" (Bryant), 1483
"Thanksgiving, The" (Herbert), 61
Thaxter, Celia, 187
Theagenes of Rhegium, 253, 619
thematics, 1432–34
Thénon, Susana, 81
Theocritus, 4, 34–35, 167, 336, 350, 386, 452, 581, 788, 883, 897, 934; pastoral, 581–82, 659, 921, 1005–6, 1054, 1165
Theodicy (Saggil-kinam-ubbib), 95, 97
Theodorakis, Mikis, 584
Theodore of Stoudios, 172
Theognis, 253, 396, 578
Theogony (Hesiod), 253, 362, 446, 532, 577, 578, 709, 901–2, 1049, 1154
Theophrastus, 224, 443, 1020
Théorer, France, 183
therapy and poetry, 1434–35
There Is No Natural Religion (Blake), 157
Thesen, Sharon, 180
Thesmophoriazusae (Aristophanes), 884–85
Thespis of Athens, 257, 1446
"They Flee from Me" (Wyatt), 414, 1194
Thibaut de Champagne, 509
Thibodeau, Serge-Patrice, 184
Thierry, Camille, 518
Thierry of Chartres, 852–53 thing-poem. See Dinggedicht
"Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" (Stevens), 322
Thiry, Marcel, 132
This Connection of Everyone with Lungs (Spahr), 710
"This Is Just to Say" (Williams), 7
"This Lunar Beauty" (Auden), 367
Thoby-Marcelin, Philippe, 198
Thomas, Dylan, 42, 46, 56, 82, 357, 425, 901, 922, 1124, 1292, 1394; assonance, 95; consonance, 299, 300; metonymy, 876; near rhyme, 925; parallelism, 999; performance, 1017; poetry readings, 1069; sonnet, 1320; syllabic verse, 1389; villanelle, 1522; visual poetry, 1417
Thomas, Ebenezer, 1537–38
Thomas, Edward, 424, 556
Thomas, Gwyn, 1538
Thomas, Piri, 961
Thomas, R. S., 352, 425, 1332
Thomas, William. See Islywn
Thomas and Beulah (Dove), 24, 813
Thomas Aquinas, 134, 136, 467, 478, 620, 633, 718, 854, 889, 1155; hymn, 646, 791; intuition, 720
Thomas of Celano, 791
Thomas of Chobham, 853
"Thomas Rhymer" (Child), 368
Thompson, E. P., 938
Thompson, Lawrance, 142
Thomsen, Søren Ulrik, 348
Thomson, Derick S., 1279
Thomson, James, 41, 148, 351, 363, 421, 782, 1267, 1275, 1291, 1292; georgic verse, 557; hymn, 646; metrical psalms, 1125; poetic knowledge, 773; science, 1267; Spenserian stanza, 1350
Thorarensen, Bjarni, 654
Thoreau, H. D., 214, 314, 437, 668, 922, 1223, 1455, 1456, 1510
Thorild, Thomas, 1382
Thorius, Raphael, 646
Thorp, N. H. ("Jack"), 315
Thoughts: A Series of Sonnets (Harpur), 100
Thoursie, Ragnar, 1384
Thousand-Line Theology (Choirosphaktes), 172
Thrasymachus of Chalcedon, 1114
"Three Graves, The" (Coleridge), 117
Threepenny Opera, The (Brecht/Weill), 117, 284
Three Poems (Ashbery), 1493
"Three Voices of Poetry, The" (Eliot), 833, 1526
"Three Women" (Plath), 270
"Threnodialist's Dozen, A" (Monk), 626
"Threnody on His Young Son" (Emerson), 369, 1455 Throw of the Dice, A (Mallarmé). See Coup de dés, Un
Thucydides, 46, 636, 645
Thurber, James, 476
Thus Spoke Zarathustra (Nietzsche), 909
Thynne, William, 156
"Thyrsis, A Monody" (Arnold), 897, 1433
Tianinen, Arja, 490
Tibet, contemporary poetry of, 1435–36
Tibet, traditional poetry and poetics of, 1436–38
Tibetan American poetry, 93, 1436
Tibullus, 262, 397, 451, 788, 817, 1231
Tickell, Thomas, 117
Ticknor, George, 1223
Tieck, Dorothea, 148
Tieck, Ludwig, 112, 148, 565, 1213, 1219, 1320
"Tied Maverick, The" (Clark), 313
Tiempo, Edith L., 1033
Tiepolo, Giambattista, 39
Tierra de promisión (Rivera), 275
Tietjens, E., 267
Tighe, Mary, 728
Tigran and Azhdahak, 83
Tikhonov, Nikolai, 1236
Tikkana, 1419
Tikulti-Ninurta (epic), 96
Tilemakhida (Trediakovsky), 1230
Timber (Jonson), 285
timbre, 1438–39
Timoneda, Juan de, 109
Timon of Philus, 1306
Timotheus, 371, 580, 645
"Tintern Abbey" (Wordsworth), 351, 422, 436, 663, 664, 898, 1079, 1224, 1306, 1351, 1514
Ṭirimmāḥ, al-, 67
TISH/TISH (literary magazine/movement), 179, 180, 1439
"Titanic, The" (ballad), 117
Titchener, E. B., 408
"Tithonus" (Tennyson), 147, 423
Tiutchev, Fyodor, 95, 969, 1222, 1232, 1235, 1397
Tjanting (Silliman), 288, 1096
Tkaczyszyn-Dycki, Eugeniusz, 1077 tlacuilolli, 1439–40
tmesis, 1440
"To a Hearing Mother" (Lentz), 45
"To a Lamp" (Mörike), 566
"To a Lark" (Herrick), 367
"To a Mountain" (Kendall), 100
"To Anacreon in Heaven" (song), 972, 1483
"To an Old Philosopher in Rome" (Stevens), 1038
"To a Poor Old Woman" (Williams), 1169
"To a Shred of Linen" (Sigourney), 1483
"To a Skylark" (Shelley), 422, 1325, 1459 toast, 1055, 1440–41
"To Astra" (Coleridge), 498
"To Autumn" (Keats), 398, 423, 925, 973
Toda a América (Carvalho), 161
Tod des Empedokles, Der (Hölderlin), 1213
"Todesfuge" (Celan), 568
Todorov, Petko, 168
Todorov, Tzvetan, 1059, 1241, 1363, 1367
Todorovski, Gane, 838
Toerien, Barend, 1330
Toeti Heraty, 702
"To Helen" (Poe), 1142
"To His Coy Mistress" (Marvell), 9, 43, 209, 217, 420, 970, 1424
"To John Keats, Poet, at Spring Time" (Cullen), 22
Toledo, Abraham, 765
Toledo, Aida, 589
Toledo, Natalia, 882
Tolentino, Bruno, 352
Tolentino de Almeida, Nicolau, 1090
Tolkāppiyam (anthol.), 1409
Tolkien, J.R.R., 266, 908
Tolomei, Claudio, 735, 1159, 1254
Tolson, Melvin B., 23, 152, 913
Tolstoy, A. K., 1233
Tolstoy, Leo, 26, 534, 711
"To Lucasta, on Going to the Wars" (Lovelace), 217
"To Lucy, Countess of Bedford" (Jonson), 1011

Tomashevsky, Boris, 1239, 1240, 1363
"Tombeau d'Edgar Poe, Le" (Mallarmé), 1217
Tombeau des rois, Le (Hébert), 182
Tomioka Taeko, 753
Tomkis, Thomas, 148
Tomlinson, Charles, 352, 426, 783, 1168
Tommaseo, Niccolò, 744
Tomoana, Paraire, 941
Tompson, Benjamin, 1481 tone, 1441–42
Tonegaru, Constant, 1206
Toomer, Jean, 1108, 1296, 1510
Topelius, Zachris, 489
"To Penshurst" (Jonson), 309, 324, 394, 418, 449, 549, 782
Toper, Pierre ("Etxahun"), 127
Toplady, Augustus Montague, 646 topographical poetry, 351, 557, 1104 Topol, Jáchym, 332
topos, 782, 1442–43; allusion vs., 42
Tordeur, Jean, 133 tornada, 188, 1296–97, 1443
Toro, Fermín, 1504
"To Roosevelt" (Darío), 946
Torquato Tasso (Goethe), 148
Torre, Francisco de la, 1337
Torre, Guillermo de, 80, 535, 595, 1479
Torrellas, Pere, 185
Torres, Carlos Arturo, 275
Torres, Manuel, 189
Torres, Màrius, 213
Torroella, Guillem de, 211
To Scorch or Freeze (Davie), 1124
Tōson, Shimazaki, 752
Tōta, Jabeji, 752
Tóth, Árpád, 643
"To the Evening Star" (Blake), 1327
"To the Muses" (Blake), 902
"To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time" (Herrick), 209, 217, 419
Totius (pseud. of J. D. du Toit), 1329
Tottel, Richard, 53–54, 414, 1443–44
Tottel's Miscellany (anthol.), 53–54, 146, 286, 414, 875, 1164, 1443–44
touchstones, 1444
Tournier, Luc. See Engels, Chris
Tovar, Manuel José, 153
"Towards an Open Universe" (Duncan), 145
Towazugatari, 757
Tower, The (Yeats), 425
"To What Serves Mortal Beauty" (Hopkins), 166
"To William Wordsworth" (Coleridge), 304
Towle, Tony, 940
Toxophilus (Ascham), 251, 1159
Trād, Michel, 70
tradition, 1444–46
tragedy, 244, 261, 377, 378, 579, 676, 1035, 1446–53; chorus, 245; classical, 254–55, 261, 551, 579, 581, 1059; comedy parallel, 282; dochmiac, 372; emotional response, 407, 929; fourteener, 504; irony, 733; lament, 781; neoclassical, 929, 931, 933; Renaissance, 1158, 1160; resolution, 1174; trilogy, 1458–59; unity, 1496. See also catharsis
Tragedy of Tragedies, The (Fielding), 58 tragicomedy, 1160, 1453–54
Tragiques, Les (Aubigné), 123, 511
Tragodía, 1: Statement of Facts (Place), 292
Traherne, Thomas, 418, 541, 870, 965, 1156
"Train Tune" (Bogan), 1541
Trakl, Georg, 105, 343, 475, 525, 567, 623, 1157, 1531
Tranocius (Slovak hymn), 1310
Transcendentalists, 1216, 1223, 1454–56, 1484
Transeunte, El (Echavarría), 276 translation, 1456–58, 1511
"Translation" (Cayley), 158
Tranströmer, Tomas, 1384
transumption. See metalepsis or transumption
Tranter, John, 102
Trapassi, Pietro. See Metastasio
Trapp, Joseph, 829, 831
Trask, Haunani-Kay, 1085
Trattatello in laude di Dante (Boccaccio), 141
Trauerspiele (Benjamin), 123
Trauerspiele (Lohenstein), 124
Träumenden Knaben, Die (Kokoschka), 105
Travisano, Thomas, 296
Trayanov, Teodor, 169
Treatise of the Sublime (Boileau), 128
Trediakovsky, Vasily, 125, 149, 252, 1061, 1230
"Trees, The" (Larkin), 708
Tree Within, A (Paz), 881
Trefossa (pseud. of Henri Franz de Ziel), 192, 193
Treinin, Avner, 615
Trembecki, Stanisław, 1073–74
Trethewey, Natasha, 24, 337
Tretyakov, Sergei, 1241
Tribe of Ben. See Cavalier poets tribrach, 1458
Trilce (Vallejo), 1029, 1346
Trilling, Lionel, 1058, 1127 trilogy, 1458–59
Trilogy (H.D.), 813, 892
Trimberg, Hugo von, 363
trimeter, 4, 145, 165, 1459–60
trimètre, 174, 1459, 1460
Trinidad, David, 940
triolet, 1226, 1460–61
"Triolets for Triolet" (Nelson), 1460
Trionfi (Petrarch), 191, 736, 740, 1163
Trionfo della Morte (Petrarch), 416
Tripiṭaka, 1250
triple rhyme, 1186, 1461
triplet, 1461
Trissino, Giangiorgio, 145, 147, 735, 742, 972, 1158, 1160, 1516
Tristan (Gottfried), 560
Tristan legend, 859, 860
Tristia (Mandelstam), 1236
Tristia (Ovid), 1512
Triumph of Death (Petrarch), 416
Triumph of Infidelity, The (Dwight), 297
"Triumph of Life, The" (Shelley), 506, 1222, 1423 Triumph of Peace (Shirley), 850 trobairitz, 146, 302, 508, 1052, 1461–62
trobar clus, trobar leu, 424, 508, 623, 738, 967, 1462, 1464 trochaic, 139, 1462–63; iambic vs., 652–53 trochaic tetrameter, 1424, 1425, 1462–63, 1484
Troelstra, Paiter Jelles, 528
Troia (Bremser), 131
Troilus and Criseyde (Chaucer), 29, 43, 156, 284, 311, 413, 414, 432, 703, 912, 993, 1193, 1194, 1281
Troilus stanza. See rhyme royal
Trois stoppages étalon (Duchamp), 32
Trojan Women (Euripides), 1459, 1530
Trollope, Anthony, 957
trope, 151, 210, 863, 865, 876, 1401, 1463–64; figura vs., 485. See also irony; metaphor; metonymy; synecdoche
Trophées (Heredia), 1001
Trópico negro (Cabral), 204 troubadour, 28–29, 141, 175, 508, 509, 857–58, 966, 967, 968, 1462, 1464–65; contests, 1054–55; courtly love, 311, 312; Dolce stil nuovo, 374; gai saber, 537; jongleur, 764, 1017. See also Minnesang; trobairitz
Trou du souffleur, Le (Castera), 200
Troupe, Quincy, 761, 762
Trout Breaks the Ice, The (Kuzmin), 1235 trouvère, 175, 223, 302, 311, 508–9, 764, 857, 967, 1052, 1465. See also Minnesang
Trubar, Primož, 1312
Trubetsky, Tōnu, 460
Trubetzkoy, Nicolai, 1362
Truisms (Holzer), 286
Trujillo, Rafael Leónidas, 44, 204, 205, 206
Trumbull, John, 297, 1483
"Truth, The" (rap), 220
Trygaeus, 220
Tryptyk rzymski (Wojtyła), 1077
Tsaloumas, Dimitris, 102
Tsamblak, Grigorii, 168
Tsanev, Ivan, 169
Tsanev, Stefan, 169
Tsereteli, Akaki, 555
Tsering Wangmo Dhompa, 93, 1436
Tsering Woeser, 1436
Tsiang, H. T., 91
Tsobu Gade, 1436
Tsui, Kitty, 798
Tsukubashū (anthol.), 1167

Tsur, Reuven, 272, 1063
Tsurayuki, Ki no, 758, 774
Tsvetaeva, Marina, 481, 969, 1051, 1053, 1234, 1235, 1237
Tsvetkov, Aleksei, 1238
Tucholsky, Kurt, 567, 771
Tudoran, Dorin, 1207
Tudur Aled, 1536
Tufanov, Aleksandr, 535
Tu Fu, 1050, 1530
Tullin, Christian Braunman, 954
Tulsīdās, 630–31, 1144
Tumanian, Hovhannes, 84 tumbling verse, 432, 1465–66
"Tú me quieres blanca" (Storni), 1346
Tuntún de pasa y grifería (Matos), 204
Tupi-Guaraní poetry. See Guaraní poetry
Tupper, Martin, 1509
Tūqān, Fadwā, 70
Turberville, George, 415
Turgot, A.R.J., 1518
Turian, Bedros, 84
Turkic poetry, 1228, 1466–69, 1470
Turkish poetry, 371, 1136, 1469–74
Turkka, Sirkka, 490
Turnèbe, Adrien, 36–37
Turner, Brian, 944
Turner, Mark, 272, 868, 869
Turner, Victor, 938
Turnovski, Teodosiy, 168
Turtiainen, Arvo, 490
Ṭūsī, Asadī, 1023
Tusser, Thomas, 140, 556, 1465
"Tutecotzimi" (Darío), 945
Tuve, Rosemond, 88, 290, 656
Tuwhare, Hone, 942, 944, 1085
Tuwim, Julian, 1076
Twain, Mark, 21, 420, 762, 1481
Twardowski, Jan, 1077
Twelve, The (Blok), 1235, 1397
Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair (Neruda), 231, 818, 835, 1346
"Twenty-One Love Poems" (Rich), 545, 813, 818
XXI Poems (Brennan), 101
Twilight (Baratynsky), 1231–32
"Two Cultures, The" (Snow), 1126
Twynne, Thomas, 628
Tyard, Pontus de, 123, 510, 709, 965, 1042, 1043, 1297, 1423
Tychyna, Pavlo, 1478
"Tyger, The" (Blake), 47, 436
Tyler, Parker, 542
Tyler, Royall, 386
Tylor, E. B., 55–56
Tynan, Katharine, 730
Tyndale, William, 598
Tynianov, Yuri, 344, 1062, 1239, 1240, 1241, 1362, 1363, 1433 typewriter, 1416, 1524
typography, 515, 982, 1163, 1415–16, 1474–76, 1494; avant-garde, 111; book, 156–58, 1194; broadside ballad, 115, 116–17, 119, 166; calligramme, 175–76; comma poem, 285; concrete poetry, 294, 295; emblem, 402; futurism, 533; open form, 975; punctuation, 1131; visual poetry, 1524
Tzara, Tristan, 32, 111, 112, 515, 546, 1206; Dada, 333, 334, 335, 1378; manifesto, 843; sound poetry, 1328, 1353
Tzeghin Sirde (Varujan), 85

Uba, George, 92
ubi sunt, 214, 1335
UbuWeb, 1018
Uc de Saint Circ, 1144, 1519
Uc Faidit, 967
Udbhaṭa, 1246
Üdi, Jüri (pseud. of Juhan Viiding), 460
Udith (Calages), 443
Ufliand, Vladimir, 1237
Uguay, Marie, 183
Uighur poetry, 1466–67
Uhadi waseluhlangeni (pseud. of Jonas Ntsiko), 1545
Uhland, Ludwig, 141, 1221
Ujević, Augustin Tin, 320
Ukraine, poetry of, 1477–79
Ukrainka, Lesia, 1478
"Ulalume" (Poe), 1484
Ulisseia (Pereira), 466
Ülle, Kauksi, 461
Ulrich von Gutenburg, 887
Ulrich von Lichtenstein, 103
Ulrich von Winterstetten, 796 ultraism, 80–81, 203, 535, 1345, 1479–80
Ulven, Tor, 956
Ulysses (Joyce), 56, 76, 425, 439, 447, 629, 679, 909, 1059, 1114, 1487, 1512
"Ulysses" (Tennyson), 147, 423, 898
"Ulysses and the Siren" (Daniel), 357
ʿUmar ibn Abī Rabīʾa, 67, 570
ʿUmda, al- (Ibn Rashiq), 64
Unamuno, Miguel de, 148, 1218, 1397
unanimism, 515, 925
Uncle Remus stories, 129, 476, 1489 unconscious, 11, 60, 82, 618, 710, 877, 1058, 1105; archetype, 77, 1128; Dada, 335; plot, 1045; poststructuralism, 1098; primitivism, 1108; psychoanalysis, 1126, 1127, 1129; representation, 1174
Under, Marie, 460
"Under Ben Bulben" (Yeats), 425, 451
Understanding Poetry (Brooks/Warren, ed.), 54, 471, 1000, 1266, 1490
Under the Eildon Tree (Smith), 1276
Under the Microscope (Swinburne), 492
Ungar, Krys, 458
Ungaretti, Giuseppe, 294, 352, 623, 736, 747, 892, 1531
"Unhistoric Story, The" (Curnow), 943
United States, poetry of the, 1480–95; canon, 187–88; poet laureate, 1065; romanticism, 1216–17, 1222–24
Unity, 254, 269, 500, 672, 673, 1059, 1060, 1160, 1496–97, 1501
"Unknown Citizen, The" (Auden), 861
"Unsaid Word, An" (Rich), 294
"Untergrundbahn" (Benn), 41
Unvergnügte Proserpina, Die (epic), 103
upamā, 27, 1497, 1502
Upanisads (collection), 362, 1510
"Up at a Villa—Down in the City" (Browning), 9
Updike, John, 1511
Up from the Boogie (Murillo), 229
"Upon Appleton House" (Marvell), 309, 394, 450, 782
"Upon his Departure Hence" (Herrick), 898
"Upon Julia's Clothes" (Herrick), 217, 899
"Upon the Translation of the Psalms by Sir Philip Sidney and the Countess of Pembroke" (Donne), 417
Uppdal, Kristofer, 940, 955
"Up the Country" (Lawson), 100
Upward, Allen, 675
Uraguai, O (Gama), 148, 160
Urania, 418, 1031
Urdu poetry, 632, 689, 1136, 1497–99
Ureña, Salomé, 201
Uriarte, Iván, 947
Uribe, Kirmen, 128
Urkiaga, Esteban, 127
Urondo, Francisco, 80–81
Urretabizkaia, Arantxa, 127
Urriola, Malú, 232
Ursonate (Schwitters), 112, 1328
Uruguay, poetry of, 540, 1344–45, 1499–1500
ʿUrwa ibn al-Ward, 66
Urweider, Raphael, 1386
ʿUsfur, 65
Usman Awang, 841
Uspenskij, Boris, 1288
Utendi wa Mwana Kupona (Mwana), 1381
Utin, Boris, 1233
ut pictura poesis, 274, 349, 393, 657, 662, 680, 930, 990, 1047, 1061, 1209, 1496, 1500–1501
utprekṣā, 1501–2
Uttarāmacarita (Bhavabhūti), 1144
Uyat, Turgut, 1473–74

V (Strickland), 158, 395
Vaarandi, Debora, 460
vacana, 689, 767, 1152, 1155
Vacarescu, Ienache, 1205
Vācietis, Ojārs, 794
Vaginov, Konstantin, 1236
"Vague de rêves, Une" (Aragon), 1378
"Vahagn" (Varujan), 84–85
"Vahagn Vishapagagh" (epic), 83
Vaidheeswaran, S., 1411
Vaillant, H., 175
Vajda, János, 642
Vakalo, Eleni, 585
Vakhtang VI, 555

Vala, Katri, 490
Valdelomar, Abraham, 1028
Valdevieso, José de, 109
"Valediction: Forbidding Mourning, A" (Donne), 289, 872, 1422
Válek, Miroslav, 1311
Valencia, Guillermo, 275, 895
Valens, Vettius, 53
Valente, José Ángel, 539, 1340, 1342
Valera, Blas, 694
Valéry, Paul, 35, 57, 82, 88, 111, 337, 357, 388, 398, 623, 1001, 1025, 1071, 1378; attention, 99; chant royal, 224; decasyllable, 340; diction, 359; inspiration, 710, 1206; modernism, 891, 892; ode, 972; poetry description, 1106; prose poem, 1113; pure poetry, 764, 1134; science, 1269; sonnet, 1320; symbolism, 513, 514, 892, 1397; translation, 1456–57
Valiente, Lydia, 401
Valla, Giorgio, 445
Valla, Lorenzo, 638, 740, 1158
Valle, Francisco, 947
Valle, Luz, 589
Valle, Rosamel del (pseud. of Moisés Filadelfio Gutiérrez Gutiérrez), 230
Valle-Inclán, Ramón del, 895
Vallejo, César, 204, 343, 484, 694–95, 882, 1027, 1028–29, 1122, 1346
Valle Silva, Luisa del, 1505
Valle y Caviedes, Juan del, 200, 279, 1027, 1344
Valli, Clayton, 45
Vālmīki, 684, 1049, 1144, 1250. See also Rāmāyaṇa poetry
Vāmana, 27, 1245, 1246
Vanchingbal, 896
Vancouver Poetry Conference, 179, 774–75, 1439 van den Heever, Toon, 1329
Vandercam, Serge, 133
VanderPoorten, Vivimarie, 1357
Van Duyn, Mona, 328
vanguardism, 162, 315–16, 587, 946–47; Spanish America, 1346–47
Van hee, Myriam, 824
Vanier, Denis, 183
Vanity of Human Wishes, The (Johnson), 420
van Kempen, M., 192
Van Mulier, L., 193
Vaṉṉ apparimaḻap Pulavar, 1410
Vannozzo, Francesco di, 530
Van Otterlo, W., 1201
van Tieghem, Paul, 1104, 1142 van Wyk Louw, N. P., 1329, 1330
Vaptsarov, Nikoa, 169
Vaquiero, Victor, 538
Varela, Blanca, 1029, 1347
Varela, Juan Cruz, 79
Vargas Tejada, Luis, 274
Vargjet e Lira (Migjeni), 30 variable foot, 173, 1488, 1503
variation, 1503
Variboba, Giulio, 30
Varnalis, Kostas, 584
Varqa o Golšāh (Ayyūqī), 860
Varro, 532, 723, 725, 1257, 1503
Varró, Dániel, 643
Vartio, Marja-Liisa, 490
Varua Tupu (anthol.), 1086
Varujan, Tanyel, 84–85
Vasa, Pashko, 30
"Vasauro, El" (Góngora), 230
Vāsavadattā (Subandhu), 1310
Vasconcelos, Mário Cesariny de, 1092
"Vaso grego" (Oliveira), 161 vates, 532, 533, 709, 1111, 1172, 1503–4
Vathek (Beckford), 471
Vattimo, Gianni, 136
Vaughan, Henry, 217, 417, 418, 870, 871, 925, 965, 1156, 1192, 1513
Vauquelin de la Fresnaye, Jean, 1161
Vazov, Ivan, 168
Vázquez, Pura, 538
Vechernie ogni (Fet), 1234
Vedānta, 1248
Vedic poetry. See India, poetry of
"Ved Rundarne" (Vinje), 954
Vega, Garcilaso de la. See Garcilaso de la Vega
Vega, José Luis, 206
Vega, Julio de la, 154
Vega, Lope Félix de. See Lope de Vega, Félix
Vega, Santiago. See Cucurto, Washington
Vega Ramos, M. J., 90
Veggio, Maffeo, 791 vehicle. See tenor and vehicle
"Veil" (Bernstein), 965
Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada (Neruda), 231, 818, 835, 1346
Veinte poemas para ser leídos en el tranvía (Girondo), 80
"Veinticinco de mayo de, El" (Varela), 79
Veintimilla de Galindo, Dolores, 388
Velado, Escobar, 401
Velard, López, 882
Velasco, Lola, 1342
Velázquez de Velasco, Diego Alfonso, 1015
Veldeke, Hendrik van, 820
Velho da Costa, Maria, 1092
Veli, Orhan, 1473
Vellutello, Alessandro, 1031
Veloso, Caetano, 163
Velychkovs'ky, Ioan, 1477
Venafro, Sylvano da, 1031
Venclova, Tomas, 810–11
Vendler, Helen, 269, 466, 833, 1019, 1371
Venevitinov, Dmitrii, 1232
Venezuela, poetry of, 1344, 1504–6
"Veni, creator Spiritus" (hymn), 1155
"Venice II" (Blok), 338
Venice Preserved (Otway), 478
Vennberg, Karl, 536, 1384
Venseni Andare (Sarafian), 85
Venus and Adonis (Shakespeare), 416, 454, 913, 1506
Venus and Adonis stanza, 1297, 1506–7
Vepkhis tqaosani (Rustaveli), 554
Veranés, Félix, 200
Vera y Pintado, Bernardo, 230
Verboom, René, 132
Verdaguer, Jacint, 212
Verde, Cesário, 1091
Verhaeren, Émile, 131, 1113, 1397, 1415, 1517
Verheggen, Jean Pierre, 133
Verhesen, Fernand, 133
Verlaine, Paul, 36, 94, 95, 119, 456, 541, 927, 1001, 1051, 1217; decadence, 338; decasyllable, 340; dizain, 372; impressionism, 680; as influence, 346, 1345; love poetry, 818; music, 905, 1396; ode, 972; poètes maudit, 1051; sonnet, 1320; symbolism, 513, 514, 1395, 1396, 1397; vers libéré, 1516
Verma, Shrikant, 687 vernacular. See dialect poetry
Verney, Luís António, 1090
Véron, Eugene, 473
vers, 1507; canso vs., 188 verse and prose, 377, 551–54, 807, 1120, 1507–13. See also prose poem verse drama. See dramatic poetry verse epistle, 340, 421, 1513–14
verse novel. See narrative poetry verse paragraph, 780, 1514
Verses on the Beautiful Woman (Blok), 1234
"Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift" (Swift), 421, 970 verse system. See meter verset, 1514–15
vers héroique. See heroic verse versification, 1115–16
versi sciolti, 145, 1516
vers libéré, 1516, 1517 vers libre, 36, 89, 294, 435, 534, 1217, 1516–18. See also free verse vers mesurés à l'antique, 251, 526, 1518
verso piano, 1518
verso sdrucciolo, 1518–19
Versos libres (Martí), 202, 1345
Versos sencillos (Martí), 202, 1345 verso tronco, 1519
Vertov, Dziga, 372
Ver-Vert (Gresset), 340, 1204
Verwey, Albert, 822, 1408
Very, Jones, 1455
"Very Like a Whale" (Nash), 800
Vesaas, Halldis Moren, 956
Vesaas, Tarjei, 940, 956
Vesalius, Andreas, 1286
Vestal, Stanley (pseud. of Walter Campbell), 314
Vestdijk, Simon, 823
Vetranović, Mavro, 319

Via (Bergvall), 288, 504
Viau, Théophile de, 124, 510
Viazemskii, Petr, 90
Vicayentran, 1356
Vicenç Garcia, Francesc, 212
Vicente, Gil, 1007, 1088
Vico, Giambattista, 470, 473, 478, 620, 621, 633, 634, 718, 720, 932, 1170, 1214; metaphor, 866, 868, 1284; myth, 907; new science, 470, 670, 1037, 1211; poiēsis, 1071–72; trope, 876
"Victoria de Junín: Canto a Bolívar, La" (Olmedo), 388, 1028, 1344
Victoria de Lepanto (Corte-Real), 148
Victorino Lastarria, José, 230 vida, 141, 508, 1116, 1144, 1519
Vida, Marco Girolamo, 440, 443, 445, 625, 646, 792, 1158, 1161
Vida es sueño, La (Calderón), 458, 1339
Vidal, Raimon, 211, 537, 967
Vidales, Luis, 275
Vida nueva, La (Zurita), 232
Vidrić, Vladimir, 320
Vidyāpati Ṭhākura, 137
Vie de Saint Alexis, 340, 1142
Vie de Saint Léger, 310, 507, 970, 1297
Vieira, António, 124
Vieira, Arménio, 19
Vieira, Maruja, 276
Vie mode d'emploi, La (Perec), 987
Vienna Group, 105–6, 111, 113
Vierge incendié, Le (Lapointe), 183
"Vierge, le vivace et le bel aujourd'hui, Le" (Mallarmé), 1394
Vietnam, poetry of, 1519–21
Vietnamese American poetry, 93
Vie unanime, La (Romains), 515
View of the Present State of Ireland, A (Spenser), 279
Vigny, Alfred de, 139, 511, 512, 1051, 1216, 1221, 1425
Vijayendran, 1357
"Vijver in het meer, De" (Faverey), 192
Vilaire, Etzer, 198
Vilakazi, B. W., 1554
Vilanova, Manuel, 538, 539
Vilariño, Idea, 1500
Villadsen, Villads, 722
Village, The (Crabbe), 421, 913
Village Voices (Osundare), 14
villancico, 28, 184, 208, 838, 1333, 1521
villanelle, 220, 817, 1423, 1457, 1485, 1521–22
"Villanelle" (Empson), 1522
Villanueva, Alma, 228
Villanueva, Tino, 228
Villarroya, Tomàs, 212
Villatoro, José Luis, 588
Villaurrutia, Xavier, 542, 881, 1135, 1347
Villegas, Estéban de, 1254
Villemarqué, Théodore Hersart de la, 164
Villiers de L'Isle-Adam, Auguste, 107, 338
Villon, François, 6, 119, 360, 456, 509, 510, 643, 1058, 1225; huitain, 640; model of poet, 1051; rondeau, 1225
"Villonaud for this Yule" (Pound), 119
Vilvaratinam, 1356
Vimalasūri, 1144
Vināyaka (pseud. of V. K. Gokak), 767
Vincent of Beauvais, 852, 853
Vinea, Ion, 1206
Vinhranovs'ky, Mykola, 1479
Vinje, Aasmund, 939–40, 954
Vin profond, Le (Norge), 132
Vinueza, Humberto, 389
Violeta, La (Olivari), 80
Violin del diablo, El (González), 80
Violín y otras cuestiones (Gelman), 81
virelai, 118, 1522
Virgil, 42, 48, 53, 104, 164, 256, 262, 264, 265, 394, 448, 454, 487; afflatus, 13; allegorizing, 39; ambiguity, 43; antonomasia, 59; aphaeresis, 60; aposiopesis, 61, 1405; archaisms, 75; archetypal image, 77; assonance, 41, 94; asyndeton, 98; biography, 141; bucolic, 167; calendrical poetry, 175; catalog, 214; cento, 220; as Dante's guide, 739, 857, 913, 1036, 1050; description, 349–50, 351, 393; dialogue, 357; diction, 359; didactic poetry, 362, 363; eclogue, 35, 386, 397, 415, 1006, 1007, 1054, 1165; elegiac distich, 451; elegy, 397; enargeia, 409; enjambment, 435; epic, 440, 441, 442, 444–45, 446, 447, 553, 912; erotic poetry, 456; ethos, 464; exoticism, 470; georgic, 556, 557; grammatical rhyme, 575; Hellenistic Greek poetry, 582; hemistich, 616; hendiadys, 617; hexameter, 627, 628, 639, 735, 993; hypallage, 647; hyperbole, 648; hypermetric, 648; hysteron proteron, 651; imitation, 678, 679, 982, 1161; inspiration, 709; Latin poetry, 786, 787, 788, 789; male prowess, 544; medieval poetics/poetry, 852, 856, 857, 859; ornament, 985; paraphrase, 1511; parody of, 511, 1002; pastoral, 1006, 1165; patronage, 1011; periphrasis, 1021; as "The Poet," 1049–50; recusatio, 1150; rhetoric, 1177; rhyme, 1183; simile, 1307; syllepsis, 1391; syntax, 1402; triad of works, 1226–27; as vates, 1503. See also Aeneid
Virgil (Dryden), 363
Virgile travesti (Scarron), 511
Virgilian wheel. See rota virgiliana
Virués, Cristóbal, 1337
Virus (Millán), 231
Viscarra Fabre, Guillermo, 154
Vischer, F. T., 408
Vision, A (Yeats), 425, 728, 908
"Vision and Prayer" (Thomas), 1417
Vision of Columbus, The (Barlow), 297
Vision of Judgment (Byron), 628, 986
Vision of Judgment (Southey), 628
"Vision of Sir Launfal, The" (Lowell), 491
Visions of the Dusk (Johnson), 21
Visions of the Sleeping Bard (Wynne), 385
"Visit from St. Nicholas, A" (Moore), 1483
Visnapu, Henrik, 460
Viṣṇu Pūri, 93
Vis o Ramin (Gorgani), 860
Visscher, Anna, 821
Visscher, Maria Tesselschade, 286, 821
Visser, A. G., 1329
visual arts and poetry. See carmina figurata; concrete poetry; ekphrasis; painting and poetry; ut pictura poesis visual poetry, 162, 322, 497, 595, 874, 1516, 1522–25; book, 157, 158; calligramme, 175–76; emblem, 401–2; line, 802–3; technopaegnion, 1417–18. See also concrete poetry, typography visual rhyme. See eye rhyme
Viśvanātha, 1502
Vita nuova (Dante), 191, 311, 374, 444, 620, 738, 852, 1066, 1116, 1509
Vitier, Cintio, 205
Vivanco, Luis Felipe, 1341
Vives, Juan Luis, 669, 1041
Vivien, Renée (Pauline Tarn), 797
Vivier, Robert, 133
Vizenor, Gerald, 700
Vizyenos, Georgios, 583
Vladymir (Prokopovich), 1477
Vocance, Julien, 594
Vodička, Felix, 1361
Vodnik, Valentin, 1312
Vogel, David, 607
Vogelweide. See Walther von der Vogelweide
"Voghbam Zkez Hayots Ashkharh" (Alishan), 84
Voghb Yedsio (Shnorhali), 83 voice, 90, 411, 1057, 1328–29, 1525–27
"Voice from the Closet" (Ballard), 542
Voiculescu, Vasile, 1206
Void, A (Perec), 987
Voisard, Alexandre, 1387
Voiture, Vincent, 510, 1101, 1225
Vold, Jan Erik, 956
Volkova, Anna, 1233
Volkslieder (Herder), 1210
Vološinov, V. N., 1289
Volpone (Jonson), 417, 1162
Volponi, Paolo, 748
volta, 1527
Voltaire (François-Marie Arouet), 46, 190, 283, 340, 450, 471, 511, 741, 743, 970, 1055, 1387; history, 637; neoclassical poetics, 931, 932, 933; ode, 972; taste, 1412
Vondel, Joost van den, 125, 821, 1450
Von Reiche, Momoe Malietoa, 1085
Voronca, Ilarie, 1206

Vorony, Mykola, 1478
Vörösmarty, Mihály, 641, 642 vorticism, 82, 111, 424, 535, 890, 1527
"Vos'mistishiia" (Mandelstam), 969
Voss, Johann Heinrich, 252, 563–64
Vossler, Karl, 458
Voutimski, Alexander, 169
"Voyelles" (Rimbaud), 663, 1395, 1398
"Vozes d'África" (Castro Alves), 161
Vrchlický, Jaroslav, 331
Vries, Abe de, 529
Vries, Nyk de, 529
Vrowen dienst (Ulrich), 103
Vrubel, Mikhail, 1397
Vuelta de Martín Fierro (Hidalgo), 1345
Vujnović, Nikola, 590
Vulgarín, Agustín, 389
vyāñjanā, 354
Vyasa, 1048
Vyotsky, Vladmir, 1237
Vyzantios, Alexandros, 583

Wace, 508, 859, 970
Wadman, Anne, 529
Waga Izumo Waga Chinkon (Irisama), 753
Waggerl, Karl, 105
Wagner, Richard, 861, 905, 908, 1017, 1075, 1222, 1395–96, 1397, 1534
Wah, Fred, 92, 179–80, 1439
Wain, John, 901, 1507
Waiting for Godot (Beckett), 379, 380, 381 waka, 91, 243, 293, 453, 592, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 773–74, 818, 1528–30; Hausa, 596; modern tanka, 750–51; syllabic meter, 1389; Western, 594
Wakan rōeishū, 243
Wakefield Master (anon.), 377
Wakoski, Diane, 482
Wal, Cornelis van der, 529
Walāda bint al-Mustakfī, 28
Walcott, Derek, 196, 280, 361, 378, 386, 447, 914, 1108; postcolonial poetics, 1092–93, 1094, 1096; terza rima, 1423; tragedy, 1451
"Waldgespräch" (Schlegel), 386
Waldman, Anne, 940, 941, 1070
Waldmüller, Ferdinand, 139
Waldrop, Rosmarie, 365, 373, 835, 1038
Waley, Arthur, 949
Wali, Na'ibi, 597
Walker, Alice, 24, 482
Walker, John, 1111
Walker, Kath. See Noonuccal, Oodgeroo
Walker, Margaret, 22–23
Walker, Obadiah, 1111
"Walking" (Thoreau), 314
Wallace, Bronwen, 180
Wallace-Crabbe, Chris, 101–2
Wallach, Yona, 608
Waller, Edmund, 187, 209, 217, 286, 433, 624, 995, 1142, 1267
Wallin, Johan Olof, 1382
Walser, Robert, 1386
"Walsingham" (Ralegh), 913
Walter of Châtillon, 574, 790
Waltharius (Ekkeharad, attrib.), 790
Walther von der Vogelweide, 98, 103, 141, 560, 861, 888, 898, 1353, 1408, 1533
Walther von der Vogelweide (Uhland), 141
Walton, Izaak, 141
"Waltzing Matilda" (Patterson), 100
Walwicz, Ania, 102
Wamitila, Kyallo Wadi, 1381
"Wan Bon" (Dobru), 192
Wandering Silk (Liang), 238
Wandor, Michelene, 482
Wang, Dorothy J., 93
Wang Anshi, 1300
Wang Can, 41, 530, 1298, 1550
Wang Ji, 1300
Wang Shifu, 237
Wang Shizhen, 240
Wang Wei, 241, 1300
Wang Xiaoni, 966
Wang Yi, 246, 247
Wardrip-Fruin, Noah, 395
Warhol, Andy, 37, 715, 983
"Waring" (Browning), 943
Waringhien, Gaston, 457
Warnell, Ted, 271
war poetry, 451, 1226, 1490, 1530–33; protest, 1121, 1122, 1532
Warren, Mercy Otis, 1483
Warren, Robert Penn, 3, 54, 118, 125, 267, 269, 366, 471, 664, 833, 1000, 1266, 1493, 1501; Agrarians, 25; Fugitives, 531, 1490; New Criticism, 936, 1033, 1062, 1490; poet laureate, 1065
Warsh, Lewis, 940
"War South of the Great Wall" (Li), 1530
Wartburgkrieg, 1533
Warton, Joseph, 421, 670
Warton, Thomas, 421, 1065, 1223, 1260, 1320
Wasps (Aristophanes), 749, 1183
Wasserman, Roseanne, 159
Waste Land, The (Eliot), 2, 42, 43, 76, 77, 322, 354, 360, 366, 425, 433, 447, 506, 625, 638, 647, 753, 813, 892, 909, 913, 915, 922, 1071, 1443, 1490; description of, 1487; symbol, 1394; translation of, 955
Wat, Aleksander, 535, 1076
Waterhouse, Peter, 106
Waters, Muddy, 152
Waters, William, 1526
Watkins, Calvert, 218
Watson, Andira, 948
Watson, James, 1275
Watson, Sam, 102
Watson, Thomas, 251, 1321, 1507
Watteau, Antoine, 1397
Watten, Barrett, 1494
Watts, Alaric, 799–800
Watts, Isaac, 119, 646, 825, 971, 1125, 1254
Wauchope, Isaac Williams, 1545
Wayman, Tom, 774
"Ways of Love, The" (Browning), 50
We Are Going (Noonuccal), 100
Wearne, Alan, 102, 986
"Weary Blues, The" (Hughes), 152, 1489
Weary Blues, The (Hughes), 22, 760, 761
Weather, The (Robertson), 181
Weaver, Richar, 26
Weavers, The (Velázquez), 121
Webb, Francis, 102, 1157
Webb, Phyllis, 179, 180, 181
Webbe, William, 89, 251, 1159
Weber, Max, 938
Webster, Augusta, 423, 898
Webster, John, 146–47, 417, 432–33, 1351
Weckherlin, G. R., 570, 972, 1226, 1297, 1320
Wecksell, J. S., 489
Wedde, Ian, 944
Wedderburn, Robert, 1274
Wedding of Mustajbey's Son Bećirbey, The (Bajgorić), 590
Wedding of Smailagić Meho, The (Medjedović), 977
Wedekind, Frank, 378, 771
Wegerland, Henrik Arnold, 954, 955
Weigl, Bruce, 1532
Wei Liangfu, 238
Weinberg, Bernard, 226
Weiner, Hannah, 941
Weinheber, Josef, 104, 105
Weiss, Peter, 378, 771
Weizel, N. H., 613–14
Welhaven, Johan Sebastian, 954, 955
Wellek, René, 364, 472, 720, 936, 1361, 1501
Wells, Robert, 1389, 1511
Well Wrought Urn, The (Brooks), 269, 499, 937, 997, 1000, 1062, 1366
Welsh, Lew, 131
Welsh poetry, 328–29, 385, 393, 425, 483, 973, 1533–38, 1550; bard, 121; englyn, 434–35, 618; National Poet, 1065; ring device, 1202. See also Breton poetry
Welsh prosody. See Celtic prosody
"Weltende" (Hoddis), 566
Weltfreund, Der (Werfel), 105
Wendt, Albert, 1085
"Wendung" (Rilke), 95
Wen Tianxiang, 1300
Wen Tingyun, 1300
Wen xuan (anthol.), 1299
Wen Yiduo, 233
Weöres, Sándor, 643
Werfel, Franz, 105, 475

Wergeland, Henrik Arnold, 149, 954, 955
Wernher der Gartenaere, 561
Wershler, Darren, 180
Werth, Paul, 1056, 1283
Wesley, Charles, 420, 646, 1125, 1291
Wessel, Johan Herman, 953, 954
Wessely, Naphtali Hirz, 606
Westerberg, Caj, 490
West Indian poetry. See Caribbean, poetry of the Westlake, Wayne Kamuali'i, 1085
Weston, J. L., 56, 76
West-östlicher Divan (Goethe), 371, 563, 1067
Westphal, J. C., 333
Westphalen, Emilio Adolfo, 1029
Weustenraad, Théodore, 131
"We Wear the Mask" (Dunbar), 1225
Whaitiri, Reina, 1085
Whalen, Philip, 1243, 1492
Wharton, Henry, 546
"What Is Poetry?" (Mill), 7, 473, 1145
Whatley, Thomas, 670
Wheatley, Phillis, 20, 24, 279, 1053, 1482, 1483
wheel. See bob and wheel
Wheelwright, Philip, 44, 77, 1285, 1393
"When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd" (Whitman), 398, 911, 966, 1433, 1484
"When the Towers Fell" (Kinnell), 77
Whewell, William, 1268
Whichcote, Benjamin, 1290
Whistler, J.S.M., 499–500
White, Eduardo, 19
White, Hayden, 1178
White, Kenneth, 1277
White, Petra, 103
White Buildings (Crane), 1489
White Goddess, The (Graves), 56, 908
Whitehead, William, 1065
Whiter, Walter, 661
Whitfield, James M., 20
Whitman, Albert A., 21
Whitman, Sarah Helen, 1483
Whitman, Walt, 21, 22, 91, 101, 359, 361, 388, 422, 437, 456, 471, 976, 1067, 1109, 1216, 1354, 1455; address, 8, 1145; anadiplosis, 48; anaphora, 50, 111, 651; biography, 141; cadence, 173; canon, 187–88; catalog, 214; chant, 223; deixis, 344; didacticism, 363; documentary poetics, 372–73; elegy, 398; epanalepsis, 438; epitaph, 451; free verse, 433, 522, 523; furor poeticus, 533; gay poetry, 541, 542, 543; gender, 545; georgic verse, 557; as influence, 130, 542, 945, 1345, 1411; information, 706, 707; long poem, 813, 892; love poetry, 818; lyric, 831–32; lyric sequence, 835; narrative poetry, 911; nature, 922; occasional verse, 966; parallelism, 999, 1169; poetic calling, 1050; poetry readings, 1017, 1068; polysyndeton, 1088; prose poem, 1113, 1120; romanticism, 1223, 1224; serial form, 1296; song, 1316; topos, 1443; translation of, 1517; U.S. poetry, 1480, 1484–85, 1487–88, 1492; verse paragraph, 1514; verset, 1514; war poetry, 1531
Whitney, Isabella, 415, 1041
"Whitsun Weddings, The" (Larkin), 426
Whittier, J. G., 364, 491, 618, 1150
Who Lives Well in Russia? (Nekrasov), 1233
"Wichita Vortex Sutra" (Ginsberg), 373
Wickremasinghe, Lakkdasa, 1357
"Widow's Lament in Springtime" (Williams), 1511
Wieland, Christoph, 148, 525, 563, 672, 1212
Wiener, Oswald, 105
Wieners, John, 131, 145, 542
Wierzyński, Kazimierz, 1076
Wieseltier, Meir, 608
Wiesner, Ljubo, 320
Wiethüchter, Blanca, 154
Wigalois (Gravenburg), 860
Wigglesworth, Michael, 125, 1481
Wigman, Mary, 336
Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, Ulrich von, 46
Wilamowitz's bridge, 165
Wilbur, Richard, 42, 147, 433, 873–74, 1065, 1490, 1491, 1492; line end, 802; priamel, 1107; syllabic verse, 1389
Wilde, Jane Elgee, 728
Wilde, Oscar, 109, 338, 357, 377, 420, 673, 692, 728, 1051, 1489; aestheticism, 11, 424, 634; ballad, 117, 119; gay poetry, 541; In Memoriam stanza, 708; Irish poetry, 728; music, 905; postromanticism, 1215–16; prose poem, 1113; rhyme, 1184; villanelle, 1521; wit, 1540
"Wilde en Tamme Zangster" (Vischer), 286
Wildenbruch, Ernst von, 149
Wildenvey, Herman, 955
Wilder, Thornton, 908
Wild Iris, The (Glück), 354
Wild Swans at Coole, The (Yeats), 425
Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre (Goethe), 565
Wilhelm Tell (Schiller), 148
Wilkins, John, 457, 1111
"Will and Testament, The" (Whitney), 415
William IX (Duke of Aquitaine), 857, 967, 1464
William of Conches, 854
William of Moerbeke, 677, 853
William of Poitiers, 170
Williams, C. K., 874, 1493
Williams, Edward, 1537
Williams, Jonathan, 145, 543, 1540
Williams, N.J.A., 306
Williams, Raymond, 324, 325, 939
Williams, Saul, 269, 762, 1070
Williams, T. Arfon, 1538
Williams, Waldo, 1530
Williams, W. C., 41, 57, 145, 274, 322, 368, 373, 437, 440, 833, 835, 1037, 1515; address, 7; cadence, 173; calendrical poetry, 175; choliambus, 244; concision, 294; dramatic poetry, 379; elegy, 398; ellipsis, 400; English prosody, 433; found poetry, 504; free verse, 522, 523; hybrid poetry, 645; imagism, 675; as influence, 23, 956; landscape, 783; long poem, 813, 892, 911; love poetry, 818; measure, 851; minimalism, 886, 887; modernism, 890, 891, 892, 1096; objectivism, 964, 1487; occasional verse, 966; poem definition, 89; primitivism, 1108; prose poem, 1113, 1120; repetition, 1169; science, 1269, 1270; serial form, 1296; split lines, 1351; syntax, 1405; triadic stanza, 1423; U.S. poetry, 1485–86, 1487–88, 1490, 1492; variable foot, 1488, 1503; verse and prose, 1508, 1511; visual poetry, 1524; word-count, 1541
Williams, William, 1537
Williams Parry, R., 1538
Wilmot, John. See Rochester, Earl of Wilson, August, 1450
Wilson, Edmund, 1058, 1127, 1397, 1509, 1512
Wilson, Stephen, 1271
Wilson, Thomas, 724–25, 1110–11, 1180
Wimpheling, Jakob, 208
Wimsatt, W. K., 62, 90, 142, 295, 317, 363, 487, 814, 833, 1025; affective fallacy, 11, 12–13, 1146; emotion, 404; homoeoteleuton, 640; identical rhyme, 658; intentional fallacy, 465, 711–12, 713, 936–37, 1062; meter theory, 368; rhyme, 1187, 1188; substitution, 1375; symbol, 1393; versification, 1515
Winckelmann, J. J., 10, 265, 266, 351, 598, 931–32, 1210
"Windhover, The" (Hopkins), 166, 436, 849
"Winding across wide waves" (Stevens), 42
"Windsor Forest" (Pope), 782
windsound (Cayley), 395
"Wine of Cyprus" (Browning), 128
Winning Hearts and Minds (anthol.), 1532
Winstanley, John, 420
Winter Journey (Müller), 565
"Winter Lake, The" (Scott), 178, 179
Winterreise, Die (Müller), 565
Winters, Yvor, 466, 899, 936, 1041, 1493
Winter's Tale, The (Shakespeare), 383, 417, 850, 1160

Winther, Christian, 345–46
Wir lagen in Wolhnien im Morast (Kramer), 105 wit, 421, 1539–40
"Witch of Atlas, The" (Shelley), 969, 986
Wither, George, 599, 1012, 1264
Wittenwiler, Heinrich, 561
Wittgenstein, Ludwig, 89, 106, 440, 514, 661, 664, 706, 715, 722, 835, 951, 965, 1037–38, 1061; representation, 1173; semantics, 1282, 1283; speech act theory, 1349
Wittig, Monique, 483
Wivallius, Lars, 1382
Wivel, Ole, 347
"Wodwo" (Hughes), 56–57
Woestijne, Karel van de, 822
Wojtyła, Karol (Pope John Paul II), 1077
Wolf, Friedrich, 976
Wolff, Christian, 478, 621, 667, 672, 932, 1211
Wölfflin, Heinrich, 121, 124, 843, 1239
Wolfram von Eschenbach, 98, 560, 820, 860, 861, 888, 1055, 1408, 1533
Wolfson, Susan J., 500–501
Wolkenstein. See Oswald von Wolkenstein
Wollheim, C., 886
Wollstonecraft, Mary, 1292
Wolman, Gil J., 32
Wolosky, Shira, 466
Woman's Labour, The (Collier), 420 women and poetry. See feminist approaches to poetry; gender and poetry; lesbian poetry; Poetess
Wong, Rita, 180
Wong, Sunn Shelley, 92
Wood, Robert, 976
Woods, Susanne, 1352
Woolf, Virginia, 480–81, 704, 1216
Wootton, Brenda, 306 word-count, 1540–41
Word Is an Egg, The (Osundare), 14 word painting, 132, 904, 1315
"Word Power Manifesto" (Knowles), 843
Words nd Ends from Ez (Mac Low), 33, 365
Wordsworth, Dorothy, 1145
Wordsworth, William, 216, 297, 358, 422, 423, 437, 484, 818, 919, 958, 1026, 1260, 1297, 1320, 1483, 1532; anecdote, 51; apostrophe, 61; ballad, 117, 119; biography, 141, 913; blank verse, 147, 913; Burns stanza, 170; canon, 187; concision, 293, 294; convention, 303; conversation poem, 304; defamiliarization, 343; definitioin of poetry, 1214; description, 351, 352; diction, 358, 359; didacticism, 363, 364; difficulty, 365; elegiac stanza, 397; emotion, 403, 405, 406, 1059; enjambment, 436; epigraph, 451; epitaph, 450; epithet, 453; expression, 473; form, 498; gender dynamics, 545; georgic verse, 557; Hebraism, 598; heptameter, 618; history, 634, 637; iambic tetrameter, 1424; imagery, 663, 664; imagination, 667, 668, 670, 671, 673, 725, 1214, 1222; imagination vs. fancy, 478; indeterminacy, 682; intensity, 710; intuition, 719; Lake school, 780–81; landscape, 782; lyric, 830–31; lyric sequence, 835; memory, 1150; meiosis, 860; monologue, 898; narrative poetry, 911; nature, 902, 919, 922, 1008; ode, 972; originality, 982; paradox, 997; parody of, 1003; pathetic fallacy, 1009–10; performance, 1016; philosophy, 1037; plain style, 1041, 1405; poet definition, 1525; poetic calling, 1050; poetic knowledge, 772; poetics, 1059, 1061; poet laureate, 1065; poetry definition, 982; political poetry, 1079, 1082; primitivism, 1108; proem, 447; promotion, 1110; prose poem, 1112; quintain, 1142; reader, 1145; repetition, 1170; rhyme royal, 1194; rhythmic figure, 1198; romanticism, 1211, 1214, 1218, 1219–20, 1221, 1222, 1223, 1224; science, 1267–68; sensibility, 1291, 1292, 1293; simile, 1306; sincerity, 1308; sonnet sequence, 1321; split lines, 1351; spontaneity, 1352; tail rhyme, 1408; taste, 1412; technology vs. poetry, 1414; Venus and Adonis stanza, 1507; verse paragraph, 1514 work, 1541
Workes of Benjamin Jonson, The, 156, 1541
Works and Days (Hesiod), 175, 350, 362, 444, 556, 577, 578
Works of Geoffrey Chaucer (Morris), 157
Works of Ossian, The (Macpherson), 421
Works of the English Poets (Johnson), 90
Worlde of Wordes (Florio), 89
Woronicz, Jan Paweł, 1074
Worra, Bryan Thao, 93
Worringer, Wilhelm, 474
Wotton, William, 1141
Wouters, Liliane, 133
"Wreck of the Deutschland, The" (Hopkins), 911, 914, 969, 973, 1156, 1354
wrenched accent, 1541–42; hip-hop, 632
Wretched of the Earth, The (Fanon), 16, 1093
Wright, Charles, 175, 242, 783, 862, 1157, 1351, 1493
Wright, David, 45
Wright, David McKee, 943
Wright, George T., 494, 1018–19
Wright, James, 241–42, 342, 524, 1113, 1492, 1493
Wright, Judith, 101
Wright, Richard, 376, 596, 1486
Wright, Susanna, 1482
Wright, Thomas, 640
Wriothesley, Henry, 48
Wroth, Mary, 418, 545, 1031, 1320, 1321
Wusheng ge, 1551
Wu Tsao, 797, 819
Wu Wenying, 248
Wyatt, Thomas, 145, 286, 340, 414, 479, 1225; as courtly maker, 312, 313; English prosody, 432, 1184; metrical psalms, 599, 1124, 1125, 1165; ottava rima, 986; penitential psalms, 1015; Petrarchism, 1031, 1164; plain style, 1041; rhyme royal, 1194, 1294; rich rhyme, 1199; sonnet, 1320, 1321; tercet/terza rima, 1423; Tottel's Miscellany, 1443–44; trimeter, 1459
Wybenga, Jan, 529
Wycherley, William, 377
Wynne, Ellis, 385
Wyspiański, Stanisław, 1075

"Xantippe" (Levy), 545–46
Xenakis, Iannis, 32
xenoglossia, 361, 572, 573, 1328, 1543–44
Xenophanes, 253, 443, 578, 723, 1306
Xenophon, 335, 580, 619, 651, 1161, 1509
Xhosa poetry, 51, 1544–45
Xiao Tong, 1299, 1551
Xiao Yan, 1551
Xie Lingyun, 1299
Xin Qiji, 248
Xisto, Pedro, 595
xiwen, 237
Xixiang ii, 237
Xue Tao, 1301
XUL (jour.), 82, 1545–46
Xun Kuang, 530
Xu Wei, 238
Xu Zhimo, 233

Yaba, Shida, 592, 593
Yakamochi, 844, 845
Yakovlev, Mikhail, 1240
Yale papyrus codex, 53
Yale school, 1063, 1099
Yali-Manisi, D.L.P., 1544, 1545
Yamamoto, Hisaye, 91
Yamin, Muhammad, 701
Yang Wanli, 1300
Yang Xiong, 530
Yan Yu, 240
Yao, Steven G., 93
Yaoz-Kest, Itmar, 615
yaraví, 694, 1028, 1344
Yashaschandra, Sitanshu, 590
Yasin Ma'mor, Muhammad, 841
Yasobanta Das, 984
Yau, John, 92–93, 1096
Yavorov, Peyo, 168, 169
Yavuuhulan, B., 896

Yavuz, Hilmi, 1473–74
Yāzijī, Nāṣīf al-, 69
Year (MacLise), 175
Year of My Life, The (Issa), 592
"Year of Sorrow, The" (de Vere), 728
Yearsley, Ann, 1105, 1291
Yeats, W. B., 3, 26, 54, 223, 279, 364, 531, 638, 761, 913, 1013, 1025, 1048, 1127; alliteration, 42; ballad, 118; biography, 142, 143; blank verse, 147; closet drama, 270; consonance, 300; dance, 336; dialogue, 357; diction, 361; dramatic poetry, 378, 380, 383; elegy, 397; English poetry, 424, 425; English prosody, 433, 1119; euphony, 465; Hebraism, 600; as influence, 822; Irish poetry, 728; modernism, 890, 891, 892; myth, 908, 909, 913; near rhyme, 925; Nō, 949; obscurity, 965; occasional verse, 966; ottava rima, 730, 986; performance, 1017; persona, 898; politics, 1081; postcolonial poetics, 1093, 1094; priamel, 1107; primitivism, 1108; reader, 1145; recusatio, 1150; refrain, 1152; rhyme, 1188; rhyme royal, 1194; Rhymers' Club, 1194; scansion, 873; self-epitaph, 451; sonnet, 1320; sound, 1325, 1326; syllabic verse, 1389; symbolism, 1393, 1394, 1395, 1397; tradition, 1445
Yecuraca, 1356
Yelidá (Franco), 204
Yelk (Beledian), 85
Yerznkatsi, Hovhannes (Pluz), 83
Yerznkatsi, Kostandin, 84
Yeshurun, Avot, 607–8
"Yet Do I Marvel" (Cullen), 22
Yevtushenko, Yevgeny, See Evtushenko, Evgenii
Yidam Tsering, 1436
Yiddish poetry, 860, 1547–50
Yi Hwang, 776
Yi Kyu-bo, 775, 1155
Yin Luoth, 177
Yip Wai-lim, 241
Yishan Yining, 243
Yi Sŏng-bok, 779
Yllescas, Edwin, 947
ymryson, 493, 1536, 1550
Yogbir Singh Kansākār, 935
Yohannis Geblawî, 462
Yolanda of Bolivia, 154
"Yo misma fui mi ruta" (Burgos), 482
Yoruba poetry. See Africa, poetry of Yosano, Tekkan, 750
Yose ben Yose, 604
Yoshimi, Kondō, 751
Yoshimoto, Nijō, 1167
Yoshimoto, Takaaki, 753
Yoshioka Minoru, 753
"You Cramp My Style, Baby" (Cervantes), 228
Young, Al, 761
Young, Edward, 286, 550, 575, 670, 982, 1104, 1291
Young, Kevin, 152, 337
Young, La Monte, 33, 886
Young Fate, The (Valéry), 82, 892
"Young Sycamore, The" (Williams), 1405
"You're" (Plath), 7
Yousef, Saeed, 1228
Yrigoyen, José Carlos, 1030
Yu, Ouyang, 102
Yu, Timothy, 93
Yuan Chen, 388
Yuan Mei, 1301
yuefu, 1298, 1550–51
Yuen Ren Chao, 1406
Yun Sŏn-do, 777
Yun Tong-ju, 778
Yunus Emre, 1470
Yūshīj, Nīmā, 1228
Yusuf Hass Hajib, 1467
Yu Xin, 530
Yu Xuanji, 1301

Zabolotsky, Nikolai, 1236
Zabuzhko, Oksana, 1479
Zacarías Watson, Brígida, 948
Zach, Nathan, 608, 614
Zadura, Bohdan, 1077
Zagajewski, Adam, 1077
Žagar, Anka, 320
Zaharieva, Verginiya, 170
Zahāwī, Jamīl Ṣidqī al-, 69, 1228
Zaire (Voltaire), 511
zajal. See zéjel
Zalamea, Jorge, 275
Zālīte, Māra, 794
Zaman al-shiʿr (Adūnis), 65
Zamenhof, Lazar Ludvik (Markovich), 457, 458
Zamir, Shlomo, 615
Zamora, Bernice, 229
Zamora, L. P., 122, 125
Zamudio, Adela, 153–54
Zanella, Giacomo, 745
"Zangezi" (Khlebnikov), 1328
Zang Maoxun, 238
Zang Tumb Tuuum (Marinetti), 157, 533, 1328, 1414, 1476
Zanzotto, Andrea, 748
Zarifoğlu, Cahit, 1474
Zarzyski, Paul, 313, 314
Zātī, 1471
zaum', 112, 573, 890, 965, 1327–28, 1415, 1552
Zavíš, Master, 330
Zaya, Marius de, 322
Zayas y Sotomayor, María, 1338
Zdanevič, Il'ja, 534, 1552
Zeami Motokiyo, 949
"Zebra Dun, The" (anon.), 313–14
Zegarra, Chrystian, 1030
zéjel, 28, 29, 68, 69, 461, 571, 1333, 1552–53
Zekkai Chūshin, 243
Zelinskij, K. L., 301
Zelter, Carl Friedrich, 570, 799
Zemk'inkomo magwalandini (Rubusana), 1545
Zemp, Werner, 1386
Zenchiku, Komparu, 949
Zenea, Juan Clemente, 201
Zenodotus of Ephesus, 255
Zequeira, Manuel, 201
Zero-Hour (Cardenal), 947
Zerov, Mykola, 1478
Zesen, Philipp von, 124, 562
Zetlitz, Jens, 953
Zettel (Wittgenstein), 706, 1061
zeugma, 165, 400, 1391, 1553
Zhadan, Serhii, 1479
Zhang Hua, 1550
Zhong Rong, 240
Zhukovsky, Vasily, 90, 149, 1221, 1231, 1233
Zhu Shuzhen, 1301
Zhu Xi, 239–40, 243, 246, 776
Zhu Yingtai, 236–37
Zhu Yizun, 248
Zhu Youdun, 238
Ziedonis, Imants, 794
Ziemiaństwo polskie (Koźman), 1074
Zifu, Mao, 457, 458
Zimunya, Musaemura, 16
Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig Graf von, 562, 1105
Zipfel, Carlo, 588
Žirmunskij, 924, 1185, 1188
Ziryāb, 27
Žižek, Slavoj, 136, 824, 1128, 1374
Zlatarić, Dominko, 319
Zmaj, Jovan Jovanović, 1294
Zola, Émile, 378, 843, 919, 1216
Zolf, Rachel, 180
Zollinger, Albin, 1386
Zondek, Verónica, 232
Zone: Zero (Strickland), 158
Zoranić, Petar, 319
Zorrilla, José, 230, 1218, 1340
Zorrilla, Rafael Augusto, 203
Zorrilla de San Martín, Juan, 1499
Zrínyi, Miklós, 125, 641–42
Zuhayr ibn Abī Sulmā, 66, 67
Zuievs'ky, Oleh, 1479
Zukofsky, Louis, 322, 366, 504, 887, 892, 969, 1036, 1096, 1109, 1296, 1297; objectivism, 963, 964, 1489–90; science, 1272
Zulu poetry, 1553–54
Zúñiga, Hernán, 389
Zuni poetry, 698–99
"Zürcher See, Der" (Klopstock), 91
Zurinah Hassan, 842
Zurita, Raúl, 232, 695, 927, 1064, 1347
Zwagerman, Joost, 824
Zweig, Stefan, 680, 1270
Zwicky, A., 806–7
Zwicky, Fay, 102
Zwicky, Jan, 181